Civil Liberties and Human Rights

Helen Fenwick

Fourth edition

Routledge·Cavendish
Taylor & Francis Group

Civil Liberties and Human Rights

This fourth edition has been extensively re-written in order to consider the impact of the Human Rights Act 1998 over the first seven years of its existence. It considers recent key domestic decisions in the post-Human Rights Act era, including Campbell, A and Others v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, Ghaidan v Mendoza and R (Gillan) v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Particular attention is paid to recent Labour legislation, especially in the fields of criminal justice and terrorism, including the Terrorism Acts 2005 and 2006 and the Serious and Organised Crime and Police Act 2005. A new chapter on developments in counter-terrorism law has been included for this edition. Important recent developments in the sphere of media freedom are also covered, including the impact of the Communications Act 2003, and in the field of anti-discrimination law, including the Equality Act 2006.

This book is a detailed, thought-provoking and comprehensive text that is valuable, not only for students, but also for all those interested in the development of human rights and civil liberties in the early years of the twenty-first century. This is an era in which human rights are coming increasingly under pressure – one in which terrorism concerns are dominating the political and legal agenda, but also one that has seen the inception of the Human Rights Act.

Helen Fenwick is Professor of Law at the University of Durham and Director of the Human Rights Centre.

Civil Liberties and Human Rights

Fourth edition

Helen Fenwick

ROUTLEDGE
Routledge·Cavendish
Taylor & Francis Group

Fourth edition published 2007
by Routledge-Cavendish
2 Park Square, Milton Park, Abingdon, Oxon OX14 4RN

Simultaneously published in the USA and Canada
by Routledge-Cavendish
270 Madison Ave, New York, NY 10016

This edition published in the Taylor & Francis e-Library, 2009.

To purchase your own copy of this or any of Taylor & Francis or Routledge's collection of thousands of eBooks please go to www.eBookstore.tandf.co.uk.

Routledge-Cavendish is an imprint of the Taylor & Francis Group, an informa business

© 1994, 1998, 2002, 2007 Helen Fenwick

Previous editions published by Cavendish Publishing Limited

First edition 1994
Second edition 1998
Third edition 2002

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reprinted or reproduced or utilised in any form or by any electronic, mechanical, or other means, now known or hereafter invented, including photocopying and recording, or in any information storage or retrieval system, without permission in writing from the publishers.

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data
A catalog record for this book has been requested

ISBN 0-203-86788-2 Master e-book ISBN

ISBN10: 1–85941–937–2 (pbk)

ISBN13: 978–1–85941–937–3 (pbk)

For Paul, Clare, Daniel and Patrick

Contents

Preface xiii
Table of cases xv
Table of UK statutes lvii
Table of UK statutory instruments lxxvii
Table of national legislation from other jurisdictions lxxxi
Table of treaties and conventions lxxxiii
Table of EC legislation xci

PART 1
Theories of rights; legal protection for rights and liberties in the UK 1

1 The nature of rights and liberties 5

1 Where do rights derive from? 6
2 What is meant by a right? 10

2 The European Convention on Human Rights 17

1 Introduction 17
2 The supervisory procedure for the Convention 20
3 The substantive rights and freedoms 39
4 Additional guarantees to the primary rights 106
5 Restriction of the rights and freedoms 110
6 Conclusions 112

3 Methods of protecting civil liberties in the UK; the Bill of Rights debate foreshadowing the Human Rights Act 115

1 Introduction 115
2 Methods of protecting civil liberties in the UK 116
3 The 'Bill of Rights' debate 140
4 Conclusions 156

4 The Human Rights Act 157

1 Introduction 157
2 The choice of rights 165
3 The interpretative obligation under s 3; the remedial process and pre-legislative scrutiny 169
4 The position of public authorities under the Human Rights Act 215
5 Private bodies and indirect horizontal effect 249
6 The stance of the judiciary in adjudicating on the Human Rights Act 256
7 Scrutiny of the workings of the HRA 291
8 Conclusions 295

PART II
Expression 299

5 Restraining freedom of expression under the law of contempt 316

1 Introduction 316
2 Publications prejudicing proceedings: the strict liability rule 319
3 Intentionally prejudicing proceedings: common law contempt 363
4 Prior restraints restricting reports of court proceedings 383
5 Protecting justice as a continuing process 394
6 Disclosure of jury deliberations 398
7 Protection of sources 408

6 Offensive speech 451

1 Introduction 451
2 Law and pornography: theoretical considerations 453
3 Legal responses to explicit expression 461
4 Blasphemy, seditious libel, religious and racial hatred 484
5 Regulating broadcasting 509
6 The internet, films and videos 550
7 Conclusions 587

7 Official secrecy; access to state information 590

1 Introduction 590
2 Official secrets 592
3 Breach of confidence 616
4 Defence Advisory notices 624
5 Freedom of information: general principles and the position prior to the 2000 Act 625
6 The Freedom of Information Act 2000 630

8 Freedom of protest and assembly 659

1 Introduction 659
2 Rights to assemble and to protest 678
3 Legal regulation of meetings and marches: the statutory framework 701
4 Criminalisation of trespass and obstruction of the highway 733
5 Breach of the peace, binding over and bail conditions 750
6 Criminalising public disorder and anti-social behaviour 780
7 Riot, violent disorder and affray 799
8 Conclusions 800

PART III
The protection of privacy 803

9 Protection for personal information 809

1 Introduction 809
2 Protection for personal information under the Human Rights Act 813
3 Broadcasting regulation and press self-regulation 830
4 Specific reporting restrictions 851
5 Trespass, defamation, harassment; proposals for a new privacy tort 866
6 Liability for disclosing personal information under the new privacy doctrine 876
7 The Data Protection Act 1998 920
8 Balancing speech and privacy claims under the HRA 937
9 Remedies 981
10 Conclusions 990

10 Powers of the security and intelligence services; state surveillance; search and seizure of property 993

1 Introduction 993
2 Police powers of entry and search 995
3 Powers of the security and intelligence services 1010
4 The interception of communications 1032
5 State surveillance 1053
6 The single tribunal 1080
7 The Anti-Terrrorism, Crime and Security Act: acquisition of information 1090
8 Conclusions 1097

PART IV
Personal liberty 1099

11 Freedom from arbitrary search, arrest and detention; suspects' rights in criminal investigations 1101

1 Introduction 1101
2 Stop and search powers 1111
3 Powers of arrest 1139
4 Detention in police custody 1163

12 Police questioning: safeguards for suspects 1186

1 Introduction 1186
2 Police interviews 1192
3 The right of access to legal advice 1208
4 The right to silence 1234

13 Redress for police malpractice 1255

1 Introduction 1255
2 The Human Rights Act and trial remedies 1259
3 Exclusion of evidence 1262
4 Tortious remedies 1303
5 Complaints against the police and disciplinary action 1310
6 Prosecution of the police 1321
7 Conclusions 1323

14 Anti-terrorism law and human rights 1328

1 Introduction 1328
2 Terrorism and human rights 1335
3 The Terrorism Acts 2000 and 2006 – extending the ambit of the counter-terrorism scheme 1363
4 The Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001, Part IV – the detention without trial scheme 1421
5 The Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005 – control orders 1438
6 Conclusions 1462

PART V
Equality and theories of anti-discrimination laws 1469

15 Anti-discrimination legislation 1476

1 Introduction 1476
2 Sources of anti-discrimination law 1479

3 Domestic anti-discrimination measures 1486
4 Direct discrimination on grounds of sex, marital status, gender reassignment, race, disability, sexual orientation 1526
5 Indirect discrimination on grounds of sex, race or sexual orientation; disability-related discrimination 1538
6 Victimisation and harassment: sex, race, disability, sexual orientation 1556
7 Lawful discrimination 1567
8 Positive action: sex, race, disability, sexual orientation 1572
9 Remedial action: efficacy of the individual method 1586
10 The Commission for Racial Equality; the Equal Opportunities Commission; the Disability Rights Commission; the new Commission for Equality and Human Rights 1593
11 Conclusions 1600

Index 1604

Preface

This fourth edition was completed six years after the third. The delay was partly due to the great changes that have occurred in the legal landscape in this field over that period of time, which made completing the fourth edition a daunting task. In writing this fourth edition the contradictions surrounding the Human Rights Act (HRA) have been thrown into sharp relief. On the one hand, it is beginning to bed down, and there has been, since the Belmarsh case in 2004 in the House of Lords, a sea-change in the judicial attitude towards it. The judges have, for the last three years, quite often shown that they treat the duty under s 6 HRA with a seriousness that was not apparent in the first few years of the HRA's life. In a series of cases, often related to counter-terrorism law, the judges have departed from the government's view as to justifiable infringements of liberty. On the other hand, since 9/11, the HRA has come under threat. For almost the whole of its existence it has been under attack, from the government, parts of the media and the Conservative party, largely on the ground that it stands in the way of an effective counter-terrorist policy. The tensions between the HRA and the four main counter-terrorist statutes introduced over the life of the Blair Government are explored in a lengthy new chapter, Chapter 14.

The second and third editions of this book were written during the early stage of the Blair Government, when a new era seemed to be dawning in Britain in human rights terms. This edition was completed at the end of the Blair years, at a time at which the future of the HRA looks highly uncertain in Britain. The future of human rights in Britain clearly does not depend only on the HRA; Britain would, of course, remain bound to the Convention rights at the international level; moreover, this book charts a number of other positive developments under the Labour Government, such as the Equality Act 2006 and the Freedom of Information Act 2000. But in some contexts, such as public protest, police powers, counter-terrorist powers, the HRA has proved crucial in protecting rights. The case for the HRA has not been made to the British public, allowing the Conservative Party to pass off the plan to repeal the HRA as an aid to counter-terrorist strategy, and a return to 'British values', in the sense that the less responsible sections of the media can and will present it in that way, playing on the ignorance of the British people as to the relationship between the HRA and the European Convention on Human Rights. The inception of the Commission for Equality and Human Rights in 2007 might have some counteractive effect in explaining the HRA to the British public and selling it to them as the protector of vulnerable persons, such as old people in care homes.

Contradictions are also evident in the judicial attitude to the HRA. This book traces the signs of the judicial acceptance of a constitutional human rights jurisdiction, held back at present to an extent by the House of Lords' decisions in Ullah and in Price. As Chapter 4, in particular, seeks to suggest, Ullah can be circumvented and in any event is in tension, not only with R v A, A and Others (No 2) (the 2005 'foreign torture evidence' judgment) and with Campbell, but with the whole enterprise of the HRA and the general approach in Britain to constitutional instruments. The tension between the approach that sees the HRA merely as a vehicle for giving easier access to the Convention domestically and the one that sees it as a constitutional human rights instrument is reaching a head, and forms one of the main themes of this book. It is perhaps somewhat ironic that, just at the moment when the HRA seems ready to step forward as a Bill of Rights, plans to repeal it to replace it with a 'British Bill of Rights' have been put forward by the Conservative Party and are also being considered by Gordon Brown.

The decision was taken in writing this new edition to reach for depth rather than breadth, and to that end certain chapters were dropped, in particular the chapter on freedom of movement. If this discipline is to retain some coherence and to move forward in a way that continues to appeal to students, it needs to be selective and to recognise how far it overlaps with others, such as employment law or immigration law.

I must acknowledge the contribution of all the people who helped in formulating the ideas expressed in this book. In relation to this edition my thanks are due to Aaron Baker, Senior Lecturer at Durham University, for reading and commenting on Chapter 15 and to Professor Gavin Phillipson of Durham University who commented on Chapter 4. Professor Colin Warbrick offered helpful criticism of early drafts of Chapters 2 and 3 of the first edition. Daniel Fenwick gave invaluable help at the proof stage of the book. I have drawn on certain of my articles and books as indicated at various points.

The main body of the text was completed by January 2007, but it was possible to add some later material in May and June 2007.

The book is dedicated with love and affection to Paul, Clare, Daniel and Patrick.

Durham
July 2007

Table of cases

A and Byrne and Twenty-Twenty Television v United Kingdom (1998) 25 EHRR CD 159 ... 946–48, 960, 968, 980
A and Others v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2004] UKHL 56; [2004] QB 335; [2005] 2 AC 68; [2005] 2 WLR 87; [2005] 3 All ER 169, HL; [2002] EWCA Civ 1202, CA ... 202, 205, 260, 266, 282, 283, 287, 288, 290, 297, 1066, 1099, 1328, 1332, 1336, 1337, 1338, 1341, 1345–47, 1362, 1363, 1430–38, 1442, 1443, 1454, 1465, 1467
A (Disclosure of Medical Records to the GMC), Re, [1998] 2 FLR 641 ... 433
A Health Authority v X [2001] 2 FLR 673 ... 433
A v B plc [2003] QB 195 ... 254, 438, 883, 911
A v Secretary of State for the Home Department (No 2) [2004] EWCA Civ 1123; [2005] 1 WLR 414, CA; [2005] UKHL 71, HL ... 1345, 1454–60
A v UK (1999) 27 EHRR 611 ... 46, 47, 75
ADT v UK (2001) 31 EHRR 33 ... 82
Abdulaziz, Cabales and Balkandali v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 471 ... 89, 109, 135, 1432
Abrahamsson and Anderson v Fogelqvist Case C-407/98 [2000] IRLR 732 ... 1584
Absolam (1989) 88 Cr App R 332, CA ... 1193, 1196, 1197, 1281, 1282, 1284
ACAS v Taylor EAT/788/97 ... 1574
Ackroyd v Mersey Care NHS Trust [2003] EMLR 820 ... 426–30, 434, 435, 437, 438
Aerts v Belgium [1998] EHRR 777 ... 63
Abu Qatada and Secretary of State for the Home Dept File No SC15/2002 ... 1428
Ahmed v UK (1998) 5 BHRC 111; [1999] IRLR 188 ... 93, 98
Airedale NHS Trust v Bland [1993] AC 789; [1993] 1 All ER 821, CA and HL ... 42, 77

Airey v Ireland (1979) 2 EHRR 305 ... 63, 72
Aitken and Others (1971) (unreported) ... 593, 595
Akdivar v Turkey (1997) 23 EHRR 143 ... 30
Aksoy v Turkey (1996) 23 EHRR 553 ... 46, 47, 1176, 1435
Al Fayed v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis [2004] EWCA Civ 1579 ... 1156
Albert v Lavin [1982] AC 546; [1981] 3 All ER 878, HL ... 755, 760, 761, 1111, 1140, 1142
Alexander v Home Office [1988] 1 WLR 968 ... 1509
Ali v Office for National Statistics (2005) (unreported) ... 1527
Ambard v Attorney General for Trinidad and Tobago [1936] AC 322; [1936] 1 AII ER 704 ... 396
Ambrose (1973) 57 Cr App R ... 782
American Cyanamid Co v Ethicon Ltd [1975] AC 396; [1975] 1 All ER 504, HL ... 378, 618, 984, 986–88
AMICUS v Secretary of State for Trade and Industry [2004] EWHC 860 ... 1571, 1572
Amin [1983] 2 AC 818, HL ... 1505, 1508
Amin [2000] 1 WLR 1071; [2000] Crim LR 174 ... 1324
Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato v Simmenthal Case 106/77; [1978] ECR 629 ... 138
Amuur v France (1996) 22 EHRR 533 ... 55
Anderson [1972] 1 QB 304; [1971] 3 WLR 939; [1971] 3 All ER 1152, CA ... 470, 471, 472
Anderson v UK Case No 33689/96; (1998) 25 EHRR CD 172; [1998] EHRR 218 ... 99, 697, 699, 749
Andronicou and Constantinou v Cyprus (1996) 22 EHRR CD 18; (1998) 25 EHRR 491 ... 41, 63, 1163
Anisminic Ltd v Foreign Compensation Commission [1969] 2 AC 147, HL ... 1030, 1085
Anton Piller KG v Manufacturing Processes Ltd [1976] Ch 55; [1976] 1 All ER 779, CA ... 791, 1006
Anufrijeva and Another v Southwark London Borough Council [2004] QB 1124; [2004] 2 WLR 603 ... 241, 244
Appleby v UK 6 May 2003 ... 682, 699
Archer v Williams [2003] EMLR 38 ... 982
Archibald v Fife Council [2004] IRLR 651 ... 1553
Arrowsmith v Jenkins [1963] 2 QB 561; [1963] 2 All ER 210 ... 679, 734, 737
Arrowsmith v UK No 7050/75, 19 DR 5 (1978) ... 98
Asch v Austria (1990) Case 30/1990/221/283;(1991) 15 EHRR 597 ... 66
Ashworth Hospital Authority v MGN Ltd [2002] 1 WLR 2033; [2002] 4 All ER 193, HL; [2001] 1 WLR 515; 1 All ER 991, CA ... 420–38, 448–50

Associated Provincial Picture House v Wednesbury Corporation [1948] 1 KB 223; [1948] 2 All ER 680, CA 127–29, 131, 133, 273, 276, 277, 285, 288, 300, 447, 564, 649, 692, 693, 768, 783, 839, 1087, 1156, 1157, 1305, 1432, 1520
Association X v UK (1978) Appl No 7154/75; 75, 14 DR 31 ....41, 42
Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank [2004] 1 AC 546 ....195, 219, 225–31, 240
Attorney General v Antigua Times Ltd [1976] AC 16 151
Attorney General v Associated Newspapers and Others [1994] 1 All ER 556; (1994) 142 NLJ 1647 399
Attorney General v BBC [1981] AC 303; [1980] 3 WLR 109, HL 349
Attorney General v BBC (1992) The Independent, 3 January 350
Attorney General v BBC 1 December 1995 (unreported) 346
Attorney General v BBC, Same v Hat Trick Productions Ltd (1996) The Times, 26 July 341, 345, 354
A-G v BBC [2001] EWHC Admin 1202 350
Attorney General v Birmingham Post and Mall Ltd [1998] 4 All ER 49 ....340, 347
Attorney General v Blake [2001] 1 AC 268 611
Attorney General v English (Dr Arthur's case) [1983] 1 AC 116; [1982] 2 All ER 903, HL 125, 351–55, 357–58, 360
Attorney General v Express [2005] EMLR 13 351
Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers Ltd (No 1) (Spycatcher litigation) [1987] 3 All ER 316; [1987] 1 WLR 1248, CA and HL 618, 619, 951
Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) (Spycatcher litigation) [1990] 1 AC 109; [1990] 3 WLR 776; [1988] 3 All ER 545, HL 595, 597, 617–22, 810, 877, 887, 897, 900, 920
Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers (No 3) [1992] 1 WLR 874; [1992] 3 All ER 38, CA 350, 359, 388, 415
Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers [1999] EMLR 904 ....345, 347–48, 353–56
Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers [2001] EWCA Crim 1351 ....388, 389
Attorney General v Hislop and Pressdram [1991] 1 QB 514; [1991] 1 All ER 911; [1991] 2 WLR 219, CA 338, 341, 342, 345, 350, 359, 368, 381
Attorney General v Independent TV News and Others [1995] 2 All ER 370 ....342, 343, 353
Attorney General v Jonathan Cape [1976] QB 752 616
Attorney General v Jones and BBC (1995) (unreported) 341
Attorney General v Leveller Magazine Ltd [1979] AC 440; [1979] 2 WLR 247, HL 384, 390

Attorney General v MGN [1997] 1 All ER 456 ... 340, 342, 344, 353, 356
Attorney General v MGN (1997) EMLR 284 ... 340
Attorney General v MGN [2002] EWHC 907 ... 351
Attorney General v New Statesman [1981] QB I ... 405, 406
Attorney General v News Group Newspapers [1987] 1 QB 1; [1986] 2 All ER 833; [1986] 3 WLR 365, CA ... 332, 340, 342
Attorney General v News Group Newspapers plc [1989] QB 110; [1988] 3 WLR 163; [1988] 2 All ER 906 ... 363–66, 368, 395
Attorney General v News Group Newspapers (1999) (unreported) ... 343
Attorney General v Newspaper Publishing plc (1990) The Times, 28 ... 369
Attorney General v Newspaper Publishing plc (Spycatcher) [1988] Ch 333; [1987] 3 All ER 276; [1988] 3 WLR 942, CA ... 124, 364
Attorney General v Newspaper Publishing plc (No 2) (Spycatcher) [1990] 1 AC 109; [1990] 3 WLR 776; [1988] 3 All ER 545, HL ... 381, 382
Attorney General v Newspaper Publishing plc and Others [1997] 3 All ER 159; (1997) The Times, 2 May, CA ... 369
Attorney General v Punch, 6 October 2000 (unreported), QB ... 371
Attorney General v Punch [2003] 1 AC 1046; [2003] 2 WLR 49; [2003] 1 All ER 289 ... 365, 370–82
Attorney General v Scotcher [2005] 1 WLR 1867 ... 402, 403, 406, 408
Attorney General v Sport Newspapers Ltd [1991] 1 WLR 1194 ... 365, 366
Attorney General v Times Newspapers Ltd [1974] AC 273; [1973] 3 All ER 54; [1973] 3 WLR 298, HL ... 335, 336, 339, 358, 395
Attorney General v Times Newspapers Ltd [1992] 1 AC 191; [1991] 2 All ER 398; [1991] 2 WLR 994, HL ... 329, 333, 363, 369, 370
Attorney General v Times Newspapers Ltd (Tomlinson case) (2001) EMLR 19 ... 623, 895
Attorney General v Times Newspapers Ltd and Others (1983) The Times, 12 February, DC ... 340, 346, 353, 358
Attorney General v TVS Television, Attorney General v HW Southey & Sons (1989) The Times, 7 July ... 359, 360
Attorney General v Unger (1998) EMLR 280 ... 342, 348, 353, 354
Attorney General ex rel McWhirter v IBA [1973] QB 629, CA ... 477
Attorney General for New South Wales v Trethowan [1932] AC 526 ... 155
Attorney General of Hong Kong v Lee Kwong-Kut [1993] AC 951 ... 273
Attorney General's Reference (No 3 of 1999) [2001] 2 WLR 56, HL ... 1077, 1290, 1291, 1324, 1325

Attorney General's Reference (No 3 of 2000) [2001] Crim LR 645 ... 1299
Attorney General's Reference (No 4 of 2002) [2003] EWCA Crim 762; [2003] 3 WLR 1153; [2004] 1 All ER 1 ... 1390, 1391, 1394, 1409, 1464
Attorney General's Reference (No 1 of 2004) [2004] 1 WLR 211 ... 178
Attorney General's Reference (No 4 of 2004) [2004] UKHL 43; [2005] 1 AC 264; [2005] 1 All ER 237 ... 1337, 1354, 1355, 1356
Austin and Saxby v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis [2005] HRLR 20; [2005] EWHC 480 ... 125, 703, 722, 723, 763–71, 801, 1157, 1308
Austria v Italy (1961) Appl No 788/60 4 YB 112 ... 1278
Autronic AG v Switzerland (1990) 12 EHRR 485 ... 36
Averill v UK (2001) 31 EHRR 36; (2000) The Times, 20 June ... 65, 1209, 1211–15, 1221, 1234, 1240, 1277
Aydin v Turkey (1997) 25 EHRR 251 ... 47
Aziz v Trinity St Taxis [1988] WLR 79; [1988] 2 All ER 860, CA ... 1563–65

B (A Minor), Re, [1981] 1 WLR 1421, CA ... 42
B v Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset Constabulary [2001] 1 WLR 340 ... 790, 792
B v France (1992) 16 EHRR 1; (1992) 13 HIRLJ 358 ... 70, 85, 86, 95
B v UK (1983) 34 D & R 68; (1983) 6 EHRR 354 ... 81
BB v United Kingdom (2004) 39 EHRR 635 ... 243
BBC Scotland v UK (1998) 25 EHRR CD 179 ... 234, 324, 325, 326, 329, 331, 354, 355
Badek and Others v Landesanwalt bein Staatgerichtshof des Landes Hessen (Case C-158/97) [2000] All ER (EC) 289 ... 1584
Badham [1987) Crim LR 202 ... 1005
Baggs v UK (1987) 52 DR 29 ... 90
Bailey v Williamson (1873) LR 8 QB 118 ... 678
Baldry v Director of Public Prosecutions of Mauritius [1983] 2 AC 297; [1982] 3 All ER 973 ... 396
Balfour v Foreign and Commonwealth Office [1994] 2 All ER 588 ... 1088, 1343
Barber and Others v NCR (Manufacturing) Ltd [1993] IRLR 95 ... 1501
Barbéra, Messegué and Jabardo, Judgment of 6 December 1988, A 14 6(2) (1989) ... 64, 65, 1188, 1263
Barclay v UK (1999) Appl No 35712/97 ... 816, 826, 945
Barreto v Portugal [1996] 26 EHRR 214 ... 71

Barrett v Enfield LBC [1999] 3 All ER 193 62
Barry v Midland Bank [1999] 1 WLR 1465 1543
Barrymore v NGN Ltd [1997] FSR 600 .... 881, 887, 902, 903, 910, 916
Barton v Investec [2003] ICR 1205 1560
Bates v UK (Appl No 26280/95) 1351
Baynton v Saurus [1999] IRLR 604 1549
Beales [1991] Crim LR 118 1272
Beatty v Gillbanks (1882) 9 QBD 308 691, 723, 772, 773, 778, 779
Beckles v UK (2002) 36 EHRR 162 .... 1246, 1249, 1327
Belgian Linguistic Case (No 2), Judgment of 23 July 1968, A 6; (1968) 1 EHRR 252 .... 62, 70, 105
Belilos v Switzerland (1988) EHRR 466 112
Bellinger v Bellinger [2001] EWCA Civ 1140; [2003] 2 AC 467 .... 86, 179, 182, 185, 186
Benham v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 293 .... 789, 792, 1342, 1410
Bensaid v UK [2001] 33 EHRR 10 .... 863, 961, 967
Bentham v UK, B 80 (1983) 61
Benthem v Netherlands (1985) 8 EHRR 1 63
Bentley v Brudzinski [1982] Crim LR 825; (1982) The Times, 3 and 11 March 1110
Benveniste v University of Southampton [1989] IRLR 122 1499 Berktay v Turkey (Application No 22493/93 March 1, 2001) 766, 769
Bernstein v Skyviews & General Ltd [1978] QB 479; [1977] 2 All ER 902 994
Beycan [1990] Crim LR 185 1231
Bibby v Chief Constable of Essex (2000) The Times, 24 April 779
Bilka-Kaufhaus GmbH v Weber von Hartz [1986] IRLR 317; [1986] CMLR 701 .... 1498, 1501–03, 1540, 1541, 1547, 1549
Birch v Director of Public Prosecutions [2000] Crim LR 301 735–37
Birmingham City Council ex p EOC [1989] AC 1155; [1989] 1 All ER 769, HL 1527, 1537
Birse v HM Advocate (2000) (unreported) 1009
Black v Director of Public Prosecutions (1995) (unreported) 1116
Blackledge and Others (Ordtech) [1996] 1 Cr App R 326, CA 370
Bladet-Tromsø v Norway (1999) 6 BHRC 599 623
Blair v Associated Newspapers (Case no HQ0001236) 889, 894
Blake [1989] 1 WLR 432, CA 1281
Blake [1991] All ER 481 1272
Bonnard v Perryman [1891] 2 Ch 269, CA 368
Borowski v AG of Canada (1987) 39 DLR (4th) 731 80
Botta v Italy (1998) 26 EHRR 241 .... 71, 1483
Bouamar v Belgium, Judgment of 29 February, A 129 (1988); [1988] 11 EHRR I 54

R v Bowden (1999) The Times, 25 February 1245, 1249
Bowers v Hardwick [1986] 478 US 186 82
Bowman v UK (1998) 25 EHRR 1 93
Boyle v Rice, Judgment of 27 April 1988, A 131 90
Bozano v France (1986) 9 EHRR 297 .... 55, 57
Brannigan and McBride v UK Series A 258-B (1993); (1993) 17 EHRR 539 and 594; (1993) The Times, 28 May 37, 57, 111, 1168–70
Brennan v UK (2002) 34 EHRR 18 .... 1209–14, 1225, 1240
Brickley and Kitson v Police (1988) Legal Action, July 706
Bridges v California (1941) 314 US 252 398
British Gas v Sharma [19911] ICR 19; [1991] IRLR 101 1588
British Steel Corporation v Granada Television [1981] AC 1096; [1981] 1 All ER 417, HL 410, 419, 424, 916
Broadcasting Complaints Commission ex p Granada TV Ltd (1993) The Times, 31 May; affd [1995] EMLR 163; (1994) The Times, 16 December, CA 839
Broadcasting Standards Commission ex p BBC [2000] 3 WLR 1327 .... 818, 839, 848, 849
Brogan, Coyle, McFadden and Tracey v UK, Judgment of 29 November 1988, A 145; (1989) 11 EHRR 117 .... 37, 57, 111, 135, 1148, 1167–70
Brokdorf Case (1985) 69 BVerfGE 315 .... 572, 665
Brown [1993] 2 WLR 556; [1993] 2 All ER 75, HL 83
Brown v Stott [2001] 2 WLR 817; [2001] 2 All ER 97, PC 176, 184, 190, 261, 268, 271, 693, 1252, 1253, 1261, 1279, 1325
Brown v TNT Express Worldwide (UK) Ltd [2001] ICR 182 1563
Bruggemann and Scheuten v Federal Republic of Germany (1975) 10 DR 100 89
Brutus v Cozens [1973] AC 854; [1972] 2 All ER 1297; [1972] 3 WLR 521; (1973) 57 Cr App R 538, HL 782
Bryan v UK (1995) 21 EHRR 342 63
Bryce [1992] 4 All ER 567; (1992) 95 Cr App R 230; (1992) 142 NLJ 1161, CA 1297
Buchholz, Judgment of 6 May 1981, A 42 63
Buckley v UK (1997) 23 EHRR 101 89
Bugdaycay v Secretary of State for Home Affairs [1987] AC 514, HL 129
Burden v Rigler [1911] 1 KB 337 680
Burden v UK (2006) App no 93378/05 203
Burton v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 135 CD 90
Burton and Another v De Vere Hotels [1996] IRLR 596; (1996) The Times, 3 October 1517, 1558, 1561, 1562

C v UK (1989) 61 DR 285 ... 324, 326
CRE ex p Westminster City Council [1984] IRLR 230, QBD ... 1535
Cable and Others v UK, Appl No 24436/94; (1999) The Times, 11 March ... 63
Caesar-Gordon ex p University of Liverpool [1990] 3 All ER 821 ... 679
Calder (John) Publishing v Powell [1965] 1 QB 159; [1965] 1 All ER 159 ... 470
Calder and Boyars [1969] 1 QB 151; [1968] 3 WLR 974; [1968] 3 All ER 644; [1968] 52 Cr App R 706, CA ... 470, 471, 472
Cambridge Health Authority ex p B [1995] WLR 898; (1995) TLR 159, CA ... 131
Camelot Group Ltd v Centaur Communications [1998] EMLR 1; [1999] QB 124 ... 272, 415–19, 450
Camenzind v Switzerland, RJD 1997-III 2880 ... 72
Cameron v Network Rail [2006] EWHC 1133 QB ... 218
Campbell v Frisbee [2002] EMLR 31 ... 957
Cambell v MGN [2004] 2 WLR 1232; [2004] 2 AC 457 ... 253–55, 297, 430, 431, 438, 449, 701, 826, 863–65, 851, 867, 875, 878, 882, 884, 888, 889, 893, 895, 911–15, 919, 920, 932–35, 938, 957–59, 963, 965, 968, 969, 970, 972, 976, 977, 979, 982, 991, 1180, 1181
Campbell v UK (1992) 15 EHRR 137 ... 91
Campbell and Cosans v UK, Judgment of 25 February 1982, A 48; (1982) 4 EHRR 293 ... 47, 74, 105
Campbell and Fell v UK, Judgment of 28 June 1984, A 80; (1985) 7 EHRR 165 ... 61, 1400
Campbell and Hartley v United Kingdom (1990) 13 EHRR 157 ... 1152, 1143, 1160, 1164
Canale [1990] 91 Cr App R 1; [1990] All ER 187, CA ... 1276
Capon v DPP Case CO/3496/97 Judgment 4 March 1998, LEXIS transcript; [1998] Crim LR 870–75 ... 673, 740, 742, 743, 747, 748
Castells v Spain A 236; Judgment of 23 April 1992; (1992) 14 EHRR 445 ... 94
Castorina v Chief Constable of Surrey (1988) 138 NLJ 180, CA ... 1151–56
Caunt (1947) 64 LQR 203 ... 487
Central Criminal Court ex p Crook [1995] 1 WLR 139; (1984) The Times, 8 November ... 391, 971
Central Criminal Court ex p Francis and Francis [1989] AC 346; [1988] 3 All ER 375; [1988] 3 WLR 989, HL ... 1003, 1009

Central Independent Television plc and Others, Re, [1991] 1 All ER 347; [1991] 1 WLR 242 ... 387
Chahal v UK (1997) 23 EHRR 413 ... 49, 53, 55, 58, 1343, 1344, 1359, 1360, 1423, 1424, 1437, 1450, 1457
Chalkley and Jeffries [1998] 2 All ER 155; [1998] 3 WLR 146; [1998] 2 Cr App R 79, CA ... 126, 1157, 1266, 1286, 1290, 1291, 1324
Chamberlain and Emezie v Emokpae; Webster v Brunel University 8 February 2004, (unreported) ... 1528, 1586
Chandler v Director of Public Prosecutions [1964] AC 763; [1962] 3 AII ER 142, HL ... 594
Chapman v Director of Public Prosecutions (1988) Cr App R 190; [1988] Crim LR 843 ... 1154, 1155
Chappel v UK (1990) 12 EHRR 1; No 1258/86 (1987); (1988) 10 EHRR 510 ... 90, 687, 688, 725
Chappell & Co Ltd v Columbia Gramophone Co [1914] 2 Ch 745 ... 874
Chassagnou v France (1999) 7 BHRC 151, Judgment of 29 April 1999; (2000) 29 EHRR 615 ... 230, 435, 737
Cheall v UK (1985) 8 EHRR 74 ... 97
Chief Constable for Devon and Cornwall ex p CEGB [1982] QB 458 ... 753
Chief Constable of Avon ex p Robinson [1989] All ER 15; [1989] 1 WLR 793 ... 1223
Chief Constable of Kent Constabulary ex p Kent Police Federation Joint Branch Board and Another (1999) The Times, 1 December ... 1164
Chief Constable of Lancashire ex p Parker and McGrath [1993] 2 WLR 428; [1993] 1 All ER 56;(1992)142 NLJ 635 999, 1001, 1002
Chief Constable of North Wales Police ex p Thorpe [1999] QB 396 ... 917, 970
Chief Constable of Sussex ex p International Ferry Traders Ltd [1999] 2 AC 418; [1999] 1 All ER 129 ... 273, 692, 748
Chief Constable of West Midlands Police ex p Wiley, Chief Constable of Nottinghamshire Police ex p Sunderland [1995] 1 AC 274; [1994] 3 All ER 420; (1995) 1 Cr App R 342, HL ... 1320
Chief Constable of West Yorkshire Police ex p Khan (2001) The Times, 16 October, HL; [2000] IRLR 324; [2000] ICR 1169, CA ... 1563, 1565
Chief Metropolitan Magistrates' Court ex p Choudhury [1991] 1 QB 429; [1991] 1 All ER 306 ... 137, 486, 487, 492, 493
Chorherr v Austria A 266-B (1993) ... 69, 97, 321, 681, 686, 697, 759

Christian Lawyers Assoc of South Africa v The Minister of Health 1998 (11) BCLR 1434 ... 80
Christians Against Racism and Fascism v UK (1984) 24 YB ECHR 178; No 8440/78; 21 DR 138 ... 97, 709, 729
Christie v UK (1993) No 21482 / 93, 78-A DR E Com HR 119 ... 1026, 1027, 1029, 1043, 1044, 1046, 1061, 1074, 1089
Christou [1992] QB 979; [1992] 4 All ER 559, CA ... 1296, 1297
Clarke v General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corp plc [1998] 1 WLR 1647 ... 174
Clarke v Eley IMI Kynoch Ltd [1983] ICR 703 ... 1540
Clegg [1995] 2 WLR 80 ... 45
Clerkenwell Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate ex p The Telegraph and Others [1993] 2 All ER 183; (1992) The Times, 22 October ... 386
Clymo v Wandsworth LBC [1989] ICR 250 ... 1544
Coco v AN Clark (Engineers) Ltd [1969] RPC 41 ... 877, 882, 899, 901, 920
Coffin v Smith (1980) Cr App R 221 ... 1110
Cohen v California (1971) 403 US 15 ... 307, 491
Colloza v Italy, Judgment of 12 February 1985, A 89; (1985) 7 EHRR 516 ... 64
Commission v France (Case 318/86); [1989] 3 CMLR 663; [1988] ECR 3559 ... 1579–81, 1583–85
Condron v UK [2001] 31 EHRR 1, Appl No 35718/97; [2000] Crim LR 679; Judgment of 2 May ... 189, 1246, 1247, 1249, 1325
Condron and Another [1997] 1 Cr App R 185; (1997) 161 JP 1; (1996) The Times, 4 November, CA ... 1244, 1245
Conegate Ltd v Customs and Excise Commissioners [1987] QB 254; [1986] 2 All ER 688 ... 479
Confait Case Report of the Inquiry by the Hon Sir Henry Fisher, HC 90 (1977-78) ... 1103, 1230, 1267
Connors v UK [2006] 40 EHRR 189 ... 197
Constantine v Imperial Hotels [1944] KB 693 ... 1507
Corelli v Wall (1906) 22 TLR 532 ... 873
Cosgrove v Caesar and Howie [2001] IRLR 653 ... 1548
Cossey v UK, Judgment of 27 September 1990, A 184; (1990) 13 EHRR 622 ... 38, 39, 85, 95, 103
Costello-Roberts v UK, Judgment of 25 March 1993, A 247-C; (1993) 19 EHRR 112; (1993) The Times, 26 March ... 47, 75, 76
Council of Civil Service Unions v Minister for Civil Service (GCHQ) [1985] AC 374; [1985] 3 WLR 1174; [1984] 3 All ER 935, HL ... 100, 127
Council of Civil Service Unions v UK (1987) No 11603/85, 50 DR 228; (1988) 10 EHRR 269 ... 37, 101

Cox [1993] Crim LR 382 ... 1196
Coyne v UK, Judgment of 24 October 1997; RJD 1997-V 1842 ... 63
CRE ex p Prestige Group plc [1984] 1 WLR 335; [1984] ICR 473 ... 1594–98
CRE v Dutton [1989] WLR 17; [1989] 1 All ER 306, CA ... 1508
Cream Holdings Ltd and others v Banerjee [2004] 3 WLR 918 ... 355, 378, 379, 622, 957, 988–91
Creation Records Ltd v News Group Newspapers Ltd [1997] EMLR 444 ... 900
Crémieux v France (1993) 16 EHRR 357 ... 91
Crown Court at Snaresbrook ex p Director of Public Prosecutions [1988] QB 532; [1988] 1 All ER 315 ... 1003
Culnane v Morris [2006] 2 All ER 149 ... 183
Cumming v Chief Constable of Northumbria Police [2003] EWCA Civ 1844 ... 1152, 1153
Cyprus v Turkey (1976) 4 EHRR 482 ... 89

D v UK (1998) 24 EHRR 423 ... 46, 194
Daily Express Case (1981) The Times, 19 December ... 359
Dallison v Caffrey [1965] 1 QB 348; [1964] 3 WLR 385, CA ... 1151
Darbo v Director of Public Prosecutions [1992] Crim LR 56; (1992) The Times, 4 July ... 475
Dattani v Chief Constable of West Mercia Police (2005), (unreported) ... 1536
Davis, Rowe and Johnson [1993] 1 WLR 613 ... 1076
Dawkins v Department of Environment [1993] ICR 517 ... 1508 de Freitas v Permanent Secretary of Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries, Lands and Housing [1999] 1 AC 69 ... 286, 287, 289, 406, 407, 414, 416, 430, 434, 439, 449
De Geouffre de la Pradelle v France (1993) HRLJ 276 ... 106
De Haes and Gijsels v Belgium (1997) 25 EHRR 1 ... 64
De Jong, Baljet and Van de Brink, Judgment of 22 May 1984, A 77; (1984) 8 EHRR 20 ... 59
De Souza v Automobile Association [1986] ICR 514 ... 1557, 1569
De Vargattirgah v France (1981) Appl 9559/81 ... 30
De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp v Belgium (1971) EHRR 373 ... 91
Dekker v VJV Centrum [1991] IRLR 27; [1990] ECR I-3941 ... 1530, 1532
Dehal v Crown Prosecution Service [2005] EWHC 2154 ... 506, 507, 736, 745, 783, 785, 797
Delaney (1989) 88 Cr App R 338; (1988) The Times, 20 August, CA ... 1274, 1275, 1286
Derbyshire v St Helen's Metropolitan BC [2006] ICR 90 ... 1566

Derbyshire County Council v Times Newspapers [1992] 3 All ER 65, CA; [1993] AC 534; [1993] 1 All ER 1011; [1992] 3 WLR 28, HL ... 125, 126, 128, 130, 137, 152, 203, 303
Director of Public Prosecutions ex p Kebilene and Others [1999] 4 All ER 801; [1999] 3 WLR 372, HL ... 178, 204, 265, 271, 272, 273, 280, 690, 691, 693, 695, 817, 829, 830, 957, 1260, 1337, 1347–53, 1369, 1405, 1413, 1464
Director of Public Prosecutions ex p Treadaway (1997) The Times, 18 November ... 1180, 1305, 1316
Director of Public Prosecutions v A and BC Chewing Gum Ltd [1968] 1 QB 159 ... 472
Director of Public Prosecutions v Bayer [2003] EWHC 2567 (Admin); 167 JP 666; [2003] All ER (D) 28 (Nov), High Court ... 744
Director of Public Prosecutions v Billington [1988] All ER 435; (1988) Cr App R 68 ... 1280
Director of Public Prosecutions v Blake [1989] 1 WLR 432, CA ... 1108, 1172, 1281
Director of Public Prosecutions v Capon: see Capon v DPP
Director of Public Prosecutions v Channel Four Television Co Ltd and Another [1993] 2 All ER 517; (1992) The Times, 14 September ... 443, 445, 446
Director of Public Prosecutions v Clarke [1992] Crim LR 60 ... 784, 788, 789, 796
Director of Public Prosecutions v Fidler [1992] 1 WLR 91 ... 782, 783
Director of Public Prosecutions v Hawkins [1988] 1 WLR 1166; [1988] 3 All ER 673 ... 1159, 1160
Director of Public Prosecutions v Jones and Lloyd [1997] 2 All ER 119, DC; [1999] 2 WLR 625; [1999] 2 All ER 257; [1999] AC 240, HL ... 126, 692, 700, 711–21, 725, 730, 745
Director of Public Prosecutions v Jones [2002] EWHC 110 ... 723, 726, 727, 735
Director of Public Prosecutions v Jordan [1977] AC 699, HL ... 473
DPP v Meaden [2003] EWHC 3005 (Admin); [2004] 1 WLR 945 ... 724
Director of Public Prosecutions v Morgan [1976] AC 182 ... 869, 870
Director of Public Prosecutions v Moseley, Woodling and Selvanayagam, Judgment of 9 June 1999; The Times 23 June 1999; [1999] J Civ Lib 390 ... 126, 793, 795
Director of Public Prosecutions v Orum [1988] 3 All ER 449 ... 782
Director of Public Prosecutions v Rouse; Same v Davis (1992) Cr App R ... 1108
Director of Public Prosecutions v Whyte [1972] AC 849; [1972] 3 All ER 12, HL ... 470, 471

Director of the Serious Fraud Office ex p Smith [1993] AC 1; [1992] 3 WLR 66 1250
Djeroud v France (1991) A 191-B 89
Doe v Bolton (1973) 410 US 179; (1973) 35 L E 2d 201 76
Donelly v Jackman (1970) Cr App R 229; [1970] 1 WLR 562 1110
Dornan v Belfast County Council [1990] IRLR 179 .... 1528, 1536
Douglas (Michael, Catherine Zeta-Jones, Northern and Shell plc) v Hello! Ltd [2001] 2 WLR 992; [2001] 2 All ER 289; [2001] QB 967, CA 252, 254, 366, 378, 431, 701, 838, 867, 875, 882, 883, 890, 902–12, 970, 983, 985, 986, 987, 1180, 1181
Douglas v Hello! Ltd (No 3) [2005] EWCA 595 .... 826, 894, 911, 982, 983
Driskel v Peninsula Business Services Ltd [2000] IRLR 151 1561
Dudgeon v UK, Judgment of 22 October 1981, A 45; (1982) 4 EHRR 149 .... 70, 72, 76, 81, 82, 98, 746, 803, 976, 1571
Duncan v Jones [1936] 1 KB 218 .... 663, 772
Dunn (1990) 91 Cr App R 237; [1990] Crim LR 572, CA 1285
Durant v Financial Services Authority [2003] EWCA Civ 1746; [2004] FSR 28 927

Ex p United States Tobacco [1992] 1 QB 353 131
East African Asians cases (1973) 3 EHRR 76 .... 25, 48, 98, 108
Eckle A 51; (1982) 5 EHRR 1 60
Editor of New Statesman (1928) 44 TLR 301 .... 394, 396, 397
Edward Fennelly [1989] Crim LR 142 .... 1138, 1288, 1289
Edwards v Director of Public Prosecutions (1993) 97 Cr App R 301; (1993) The Times, 29 March 1144–46
Edwards v UK (1992) 15 EHRR 417; (1993) The Times, 21 January 64
Effick (1992) 95 Cr App R 427; (1992) 142 MU 492, CA; [1994] 3 WLR 583; (1994) 99 Cr App R 312, HL 1050
Ekbatani v Sweden (1988) 13 EHRR 504 64
Elias v Secretary of State for Defence (2005), (unreported) 1578
Ellen Street Estates Ltd v Minister of Health [1934] 1 KB 590, CA 155
Elliniki Rasdio Phonia Tiles Rassi AE v Dimotiki Etaria (1991) ECR 1-2925 .... 139, 140
Elsholz v Germany [2000] 2 FLR 486 944
Empower Scotland Ltd v Khan (2005), (unreported) 1561
Enderby v Frenchay [1994] 1 All ER 495; [1993] ECR 1-5535, ECJ; [1992] IRLR 15, CA and ECJ 1499, 1501, 1503, 1541
Engel v The Netherlands (No 1) (1976) 1 EHRR 647 .... 790, 792
Ensslin, Bader and Raspe v Germany (1978) 14 DR 64 48
Entinck v Carrington (1765) 19 St Tr 1029 124

Erikson v Italy, Appl 37900 / 97; 26 October 1999 42
Esbester v UK (1993) 18 EHRR CD 72 .... 1026, 1027, 1029
Ezelin v France (1991) A 202-A; (1991) 14 EHRR 362 .... 39, 662, 680, 683, 688, 696, 723–26, 730, 736, 737, 746–48
Fairnie (Decd) and Others v Reed and Another (1994) 20 May, Transcript from LEXIS, CA 896, 899
Falkirk Council v Whyte [1997] IRLR 560 1541
Farah v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis [1997] 1 All ER 289, CA 1509
Fanell v Secretary of State for Defence [1980] 1 All ER 166, HL 791
Fayed v UK (1994) 18 EHRR 393 .... 61, 62
Federal Communications Commission v Pacifica Foundation (1978) 438 US 726 510
Fell [1963] Crim LR 207 593
Fenelley [1989] Crim LR 142 .... 1288, 1289
Fernandez v Government of Singapore [1971] 2 All ER 691 936
Fey v Austria (1993) 16 EHRR 387 63
Findlay v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 221 63
Fitzpatrick v Sterling Housing Association [1998] 2 WLR 225, CA; [1999] 3 WLR 1113, HL 1525
Forbes [2001] 2 WLR 1; [2001] Crim LR 649 .... 1288, 1303, 1324
Foulkes v Chief Constable Merseyside Police [1998] 3 All ER 705 755
Fox, Campbell and Hartley v UK, Judgment of 30 August 1990, A 178; (1990) 13 EHRR 157 .... 54, 56, 765, 769, 1153, 1160, 1161
Francis (1992) LEXIS CO/1434/91 1115
Francome v Mirror Group Newspapers Ltd [1984] 1 WLR 892; [1984] 2 All ER 408 .... 311, 811, 898–900, 904, 909, 910, 915, 918, 984
Francovich v Italy [1992] 21 IRLR 84; [1991] ECR 1-5357; [1995] ICR 722 937
Fraser v Evans [1969] 1 QB 349 917
Fressoz and Roire v France (2001) EHRR 2 427
Friedl v Austria, No 15225 / 89; A 305B; (1995) 21 EHRR 83 97
R v Friend [1997] 1 WLR 1433; [1997] 2 All ER 1012 1239
Fulling [1987] QB 426; [1987] 2 WLR 923; [1987] 2 All ER 65, CA 1271
Funke v France (1993) 16 EHRR 297 .... 65, 72, 91

G v Director of Public Prosecutions [1989] Crim LR 150 1146
G v Federal Republic of Germany No 13079/87(1980) 21 DR 138 .... 683, 747

G, H and I v UK 15 EHRR CD 41 ... 1025, 1028
Gall (1990) 9O Cr App R 64,CA ... 1289
Garyfallou AEBE v Greece (1999) 28 EHRR 344 ... 61
Gaskin v UK (1990) 12 EHRR 36 ... 73, 94, 135, 626, 803, 924–25
Gay News v UK (1982) 5 EHRR 123 ... 310, 467, 485, 487, 488, 496, 942, 966
Geillustreerde de Pers NV v the Netherlands [1977] D & R 8 ... 109
Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza [2002] 4 All ER 1162; [2003] 2 WLR 478; [2004] 3 WLR 113; [2004] 2 AC 557 (HL) ... 174, 180, 184–87, 190, 200, 214, 281, 286, 297, 729, 1525, 1526
Gibson [1990] 2 QB 619; [1991] 1 All ER 439; [1990] 3 WLR 595, CA ... 474, 477, 482, 483, 568, 587
Gill v Hearst Publishing Co 253 P 2d 441 (Cal 1953) ... 821
Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbeach Area Health Authority [1986] AC 112; [1985] 3 WLR 830, HL ... 259, 557, 960, 961
Gillingham Borough Council v Medway Dock Co [1992] 3 All ER 931 ... 798
Gladstone Williams (1983) Cr App R 276 ... 1111
Glasenapp v Federal Republic of Germany (1986) 9 EHRR 25 ... 93, 97
Glasgow CC v Zafar [1998] ICR 120 ... 1527, 1538
Glimmerveen and Hagenbeek v Netherlands (1979) 18 DR 187 ... 500
Goldberg [1988] Crim LR 678 ... 127
Golder v UK Judgment of 21 February 1975, A 18 ... 37, 62, 66, 135
Goldsmith and Another v Bhoyrul and Others [1997] 4 All ER 268;(1997) The Times, 20 June ... 126
Goodwin v UK (1994) No 17488/90 Com Rep; (1996) 22 EHRR 123, (1994) The Guardian, 26 May ... 126, 272, 286, 287, 289, 379, 399, 407, 408, 413–19, 421, 424, 425, 427–32, 435–37, 439, 440, 445, 446
Goodwin v UK [2002] ECHR 583 ... 85, 86,
Goswell v Commissioner of Metropolitan Police (1996) The Guardian, 27 April ... 1305
Gough v Chief Constable of the Derbyshire Constabulary [2002] QB 459 ... 791
Govell v UK (1997) 4 EHRLR 438 ... 1069
Graham-Kerr [198811 WLR 1098; 88 Cr App R 302, CA ... 478, 557
Graham Waddon (1999) Southwark Crown Court, 30 June; appeal dismissed 6 April 2000 ... 583

Granger v UK, Judgment of 28 March 1990, A 174 ... 62
Grant v South West Trains Ltd (Case 249/96) [1998] IRLR 206 ... 1516
Gray [1900] 2 QB 36; (1900) 69 LJ QB 502 ... 396
Greek Case (1969) Report of 5 November; (1969) 12 YB 1 ... 46, 75, 76, 111, 1175
Greene v Home Secretary [1942] AC 284 ... 1305
Gregory v UK (1997) 25 EHRR 577 ... 406
Griggs v Duke Power Company 401 US 424 (1971) ... 1489
Griswold v Connecticut (1965) 381 US 479 ... 624
Guerra v Baptiste (1995) The Times, 8 November ... 151
Guerra v Italy (1998) 26 EHRR 357 ... 42, 71, 90
Guildford Four Case, Final Report, 1993-94 HC 449 ... 1103, 1171
Guildhall Magistrates' Court ex p Primlacks Holdings
Co (Panama) Ltd [1989] 2 WLR 841 ... 441, 1003
Gul v Switzerland (1996) 22 EHRR 93 ... 70
Gulec v Turkey (1999) 28 EHRR 121 ... 43
Gustaffson v Sweden (1996) 22 EHRR 409 ... 98
Guzzardi v Italy (1980) 3 EHRR 333 ... 55, 765, 769, 1120, 1131, 1132, 1451, 1452

H v Norway (1992) 17004/90 (1992) 73 DR 155 ... 43, 80
H v UK (Appl No l5023/89) ... 1350
H, re, [1998] AC 72 ... 192
HL v UK (Application No 45508/99) ... 763
H, W, P and K v Austria (1989) 62 DR 216 ... 665
HRH Prince of Wales v Associated Newspapers Ltd [2006]
EWCA Civ 1776, [2006] All ER (D) 335 ... 827, 878, 881, 882, 883, 893, 894, 970, 977–79, 981, 991
HRH Princess of Wales v MGN Newspapers Ltd and Others (1993) 8 November (unreported) ... 883–85, 891, 892, 898–901, 909, 910, 920, 1069
H v UK 33 D & R 247 (1983) ... 30
Haase (1977) Report of 12 July; DR 11(1978) ... 63
Habermann-Beltermann [1994] ECR 1-1657 ... 1531
Hadjianastassiou v Greece (1992) 16 EHRR 219 ... 64
Hagan (1987) The Times, 20 May 968
Hague v Committee for Industrial Organisation 307 US
496 (1938) ... 661
Halford v UK [1997] IRLR 471; (1997) 24 EHRR 523;
(1997) The Times, 3 July ... 775, 1034, 1038, 1042, 1043, 1055, 1074, 1083, 108
Hamer v UK (1979) Report of 13 December; 24 DR 5 ... 103
Hampson v Department of Education and Science [1991]
1 AC 171; [1990] 2 All ER 513, HL ... 1540, 1547
Hancock and Shankland [1986] AC 455; [1986] 1 All
ER 641; [1986] 3 WLR 1014, HL ... 363

Handels-og Kontorfunktionaeremes Forbund i Danmark v Dansk Arbejdsgiverforening (the Danfoss case) (Case 109/88) [1989] ECR 3199; [1989] IRLR 532 .... 1501, 1502
Handyside v UK, Judgment of 7 December 1976, A 24; (1976) 1 EHRR 737 .... 14, 36, 37, 69, 81, 94, 278, 310, 451, 464, 465, 467, 485, 532, 542, 543, 568, 588, 677, 729, 780, 942, 966
Hansen v Turkey (2004) 1 FLR 142, App no 36141/97 945
Harman and Hewitt v UK Appl 1211 75/86; (1992) 14 EHRR 657 .... 74, 1010, 1025, 1026, 1027, 1029, 1069, 1089
Harman and Hewitt v UK (no 2) Appl No 20317/92 (1993) (unreported) 1026
Harman v UK (1982) Appl 10038 / 82; (1984) Decision of 11 May; [1984] 38 DR 53 67
Harris v Harris [2001] 2 FLR 895 962
Harris v Minister of the Interior (1952) (2) SA 428 155
Harrison v Duke of Rutland [1893] 1 QB 142 .... 714, 717
Harrow London Borough Council v Qazi [2004] 1 AC 983 197
Harvey [1988] Crim LR 241 1273
Hashman and Harrup v UK (1996) 22 EHRR CD 184; (1999) 30 EHRR 241; (2000) 8 BHRC 104 .... 480, 668, 680, 683, 684, 686, 689, 691, 746, 751, 752, 759, 775, 777
Hautanemi v Sweden (1996) 22 EHRR CD 156 220
Hayes v Malleable WMC [1985] ICR 703 1530
Hayward v Cammell Laird [1988] 2 All ER 257, HL 1496, 1497, 1503
Heinz v Kendrick [2000] IRLR 141 1549
Hellewell v Chief Constable of Derbyshire [1995] 1 WLR 804; [1995] 4 All ER 473 .... 811, 811, 878, 888, 884, 898–901, 904, 915, 916, 984, 1078
Hendrickson and Tichner [1977] Crim LR 356 707
Herbage v The Times Newspapers and Others (1981) The Times, 1 May 873
Herczegfalvy v Austria A 244; (1992) 14 HRLJ 84; (1993) 15 EHRR 437 91
Hereford and Worcester County Council v Clayton [1996] ICR 514 1557
Hicklin (1868) 3 QB 360 .... 469, 471
Hickman v Maisey [1900] 1 QB 752 .... 711, 714, 716, 717, 994
Hills v Ellis [1983] QB 680; [1983] 1 All ER 667 .... 1110, 1111
Hilton v UK No 5613/72, 4 DR 177 (1976) 98
Hirst and Agu v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire (1987) 85 Cr App R 143 .... 679, 734–36
Hoare v UK [1997] EHRLR 678 .... 466, 569
Hoffman v Austria (1993) 17 EHRR 293 70

Hokkanen v Finland (1994) 19 EHRLR 139 ... 70, 71 945
Holden (Amanda) v The Star (2001) (unreported) see (2001) The Guardian, 2 July; (2001) The Observer, 15 July ... 838
Holgate-Mohammed v Duke [1984] 1 AC 437; [1984] 1 All ER 1054, HL ... 1156, 1305
Hollandia, The [1983] 1 AC 565 ... 152
Holmes v Bournemouth Crown Court (1993) (unreported) ... 772, 777
Holy Monasteries v Greece (1995) 20 EHRR 1 ... 220
Hood v UK (2000) 29 EHRR 365, Judgment of 25 February 1997 ... 63
Horseferry Road Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate ex p Siadatan [1991] 1 QB 260; [1991] 1 All ER 324; [1990] 3 WLR 1006 ... 786, 787
Horsham Justices ex p Farquharson [1982] 2 WLR 430; [198212 All ER 269, CA ... 385, 386
Howard v UK (1987) 52 DR 198 ... 90
Howell [1982] 1 QB 416; [1981] 3 All ER 383, CA; [1981] 1 WLR 1468, HL ... 752, 753, 769, 780, 1141
Hubbard v Pitt [1976] QB 142; [1975] 3 All ER 1 ... 677, 691, 719, 798, 799
Huber v Austria (1973) Report of 8 February DR 2 (1935) ... 91
Huber v Austria (1974) Appl 6821/74; 6 DR 65(1977) ... 59
Huddersfield (University of) v Wolff [2004] ICR 828 ... 1528
Hughes [1988] Crim LR 519, CA ... 1222, 1223, 1271, 1279
Hughes v Holley (1988) 86 Cr App R 130 ... 751
Hulbert (1999) (unreported) ... 397
Humphries v Connor (1864) 17 ICLR 1 ... 755, 760
Hunter v Canary Wharf [1997] AC 655 ... 994
Huntingdon Life Sciences Ltd and Another v Curtin and (1997) The Times, 11 December; (1998) 3(1) J Civ Lib 37 ... 793, 794
Hurtado v Switzerland A 280-A (1994) Com Rep ... 75, 1175
Hussain and Singh v UK (1996) 21 EHRR 1 ... 58
Hussein v Chong Fook Kam [1970] AC 942 ... 1153
Hutchinson (1954) (unreported) ... 469
Huvig v France (1990) 12 EHRR 547 ... 1026

Ibrahim [1914] AC 599 ... 1273
Igen v Wong [2005] ICR 931 ... 1528, 1536, 1586, 1587
Ignaccolo-Zenide v Romania (2000) Reports of judgments and decisions 2000-I ... 945
Imbrioscia v Switzerland (1993) 17 EHRR 441; A 275 (1993) ... 1210
Incal v Turkey (1999) 29 EHRR 449 ... 1355, 1395, 1413

Inquiry under the Companies Security (Insider Dealing) Act 1985, Re, [1988] 1 All ER 203 411
Interbrew SA v Financial Times Ltd [2002] EMLR 24 .... 419–22, 426, 429, 430, 434–39, 449
International Transport Roth GmbH v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2002] 3 WLR 344 .... 184, 281
Ireland v UK (1978) 2 EHRR 25 .... 46, 47, 98, 1432
Isequilla [1975] All ER 77 1267
Isgro v Italy (1991) Case 1/1990/192/252; [1993] Crim LR 261 66
Ismet Ala v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2003] EWHC 521 276

JS v UK Appl No 191173/91, 3 January 1993 71
James and Others v UK (1986), A 98; (1986) 8 EHRR 123 104
James v Eastleigh Borough Council [1990] AC 751; [1990] 2 All ER 607, HL 1527, 1534, 1537, 1538, 1548
Jenkins v Kinsgate [1981] IRLR 388 1498
Jepson and Dyas-Elliott v The Labour Party [1996] IRLR 116 1574
Jersild v Denmark (1992) 14 HRLJ 74; (1994) 19 EHRR 1 .... 90, 93 310, 312, 500, 501, 515, 532, 533, 942, 947, 966
JM v UK (2001) 2 EHRLR 215 187
Jockey Club ex p RAM Racecourses Ltd [1993] 2 All ER 225 233
Johansen v Norway (1996) 23 EHRR 33 945
John v Express Newspapers (2000) The Times 26 April 417, 418, 429, 450
Johnson v HM Prison Service and Others (1996) The Times 31 December 1589
Johnson v UK (1997) 27 EHRR 296 1309
Johnson v Whitehouse [1984] RTR 38 1511
Johnston v Chief Constable of the RUC (Case 222/84) [1986] ECR 1651 .... 108, 1579, 1581–85
Johnstone v Ireland, Judgment of 18 December 1986, A 112; (1987) 9 EHRR 203 103
Jones and Lloyd v DPP see Director of Public Prosecutions v Jones and Lloyd
Jones v Chief Adjudication Officer (1990) EOR 1991 1542
Jones v Post Office [2001] IRLR 384; [2001] ICR 805 1549
Jordan v Burgoyne [1963] 2 QB 744; [1963] 2 All ER 225 .... 772, 783
Jordan, Kelly, Arthurs, Donnelly and Others v UK (2001) The Times 18 May 40, 207
Joseph [1993] Crim LR 206, CA 1280

Judith Miller, Petitioner v US and M Cooper and Time inc, Petitioners v US, Supreme Court (2005) No 04–1508 ... 409
Julie Bower v Cheapside (SSL) Ltd (formerly Schroder Securities Ltd) ET (2002), (unreported) ... 1590

K, F and P v UK (1984) 40 DR 298 ... 30
Kalanke v Freie Hansestadt Bremen (Case 450/93) [1995] IRLR 660 ... 1579, 1580, 1583–85
Kamasinski (1988) Report of 5 May; (1991) 13 EHRR 36 ... 65
Katz v US (1967) 389 US 347 ... 1071
Kay v Lambeth London Borough Council [2006] UKHL 10 ... 195, 197, 248, 267, 883
Kay v UK (1998) 40 BMLR 2O ... 55
Kaye v Robertson and Another [1991] FSR 62; (1991) The Times, 21 March, CA ... 832, 868, 873–77, 910, 955
Keenan [1990] 2 QB 54; [1989] 3 WLR 1193; [1989] 3 All ER 598, CA ... 1280
Kelly v BBC [2000] 3 FCR 509; [2001] 1 All ER 323; [2001] 2 WLR 253; [2001] Fam 59 ... 858, 860, 864, 952, 960, 968, 973
Kelly v Chief Constable of Hampshire (1993) The Independent, 25 March ... 772, 779
Kelly v UK (1990) Appl 17579/90; (1993) 16 EHRR CD 20; [1993] 74 D & R ... 43, 44, 45
Kent v Metropolitan Police Commissioner (1981) The Times, 15 May ... 288, 693, 708, 721
Khan [1993] Crim LR 54, CA ... 1279
Khan (Sultan) [1995] QB 27, CA; [1997] AC 558; [1996] 3 All ER 289; [1996] 3 WLR 162; (1996) 146 NLJ 1024, HL ... 126, 1056, 1077, 1289, 1324
Khan v UK (1999) 27 EHRR CD 58; (2000) 8 BFRC 310 ... 1055, 1056, 1074, 1089, 1267, 1291–94, 1320
Khanna v MOD [1981] ICR 653 ... 1528
Khorasandjian v Bush [1993] 3 All ER 669; [1993] QB 727; [1993] 3 WLR 476, CA ... 994
King v Hodges [1974] Crim LR 424 ... 760, 1142
Kiszko (Stefan) (1992) The Times, 18 February ... 1103
Klass v Federal Republic of Germany, Judgment of 6 September 1978, A 28; (1978) 2 EHRR 214 ... 27, 73, 101, 107, 108, 1009, 1025, 1028, 1029, 1032, 1036, 1041, 1042, 1044, 1046, 1068, 1074, 1081, 1097
Knudsen v Norway, No 11045/84, 42 DR 247 (1985) ... 236

Knuller v Director of Public Prosecutions [1973] AC 435; [1972] 3 WLR 143; (1972) 56 Cr App R 633, HL 310, 434, 470, 476, 477, 480, 482, 483, 587, 942, 966
Kokkinakis v Greece A 260-A, p18 (1993) 98
Kommunistische Partei Deutschland v Federal Republic of Germany (1957) Appl 250/57; YB 1 (1955-57) 30, 167
Kopp v Switzerland (1999) 27 EHRR 91; [1998] HRCD 6 .... 480, 814, 1008, 1009, 1042–44
Korematsu v United States 584 F Supp 1406 (1984) 289
Kosiek v FRG (1987) 9 EHRR 328 .... 93, 97
Kownacki v Commissioner of Metropolitan Police (1996) The Guardian, 30 April 1306
Krause (1902) 18 TLR 238 707
Kröcher and Möller v Switzerland No 8463/78, (1983) 34 DR 25; (1984) 6 EHRR 345 .... 37, 48
Kruslin v France (1990) 12 EHRR 528 .... 1023, 1043
Kuddus v Chief Constable of Leicester Constabulary [2002] 2 AC 122 1590
Kuhnen v FRG (1988) 56 DR 205 500
Kuwait Airways Corporation v Iraqi Airways Co (Nos 4 and 5) [2002] UKHL 19, [2002] 2 AC 883 1456

LCB v UK (1998) 27 EHRR 212 .... 40, 42
Laker Airways v Department of Trade [1977] QB 643; [1976] 3 WLR 537, CA 100
Lam v Koo and Chiu [1992] Civil Transcript No 116, CA 900
Lambert v France (1999) 1 EHRLR 123 1044
Lambeth BC v CRE [1990] IRLR 231, CA 1570, 1574
Lamy v Belgium (1989) 11 EHRR 529 .... 59, 84
Latif [1996] 1 WLR 104; [1996] 1 All ER 353, HL 1266
Lauko v Slovakia [1999] EHRR 105 61
Lawless v Ireland (1959) Report of 19 December, B 1 (1960-61) p 64; Judgment of 1 July 1961, A 3 (1960-61); (1961) 1 EHRR 15 .... 32, 36, 53, 54, 765, 1133, 1425, 1435
Leander v Sweden, Judgment of 26 March 1987, A 116; (1987) 9 EHRR 443 .... 37, 72, 73, 106, 1027, 1029
Leeds City Council v Price [2006] UKHL 10 .... 195, 197, 201, 248
Lehideux and Isornia v France (1998) 5 BHRC 540 500
Lemon (Gay News) [1979] QB 10; [1978] 3 WLR 404, CA; [1979] AC 617; [1979] 2 WLR 281; [1979] 1 All ER 898, HL 485, 487, 496
Lennon v News Group Newspapers [1978] FSR 573 931

Letellier v France (1991) A 207; (1991) 14 EHRR 83 ... 57
Leverton v Clwyd County Council [1989] 2 WLR 47; [1989] 1 All ER 78, CA and HL ... 1495, 1497
Lewis v Cox (1985) Cr App R I ... 1110
Lewis ex p (1888) 21 QBD 191 ... 678
Li Shu-Ling [1989] Crim LR 58 ... 1204
Li Yau-wai v Genesis Films Limited [1987] HKLR 711 ... 900
Liberal Party v UK (1980) 21 DR 211 ... 106
Lingens v Austria (No 2) (1986) 8 EHRR 103 ... 90, 310, 966
Lion Laboratories v Evans and Express Newspapers [1985] QB 526; [1984] 2 All ER 417, CA ... 616, 917, 984
Lithgow v UK (1984) Report of 7 March, A 102; (1986) 8 EHRR 335 ... 64
Litster v Forth Dry Dock Engineering [1989] 1 All ER 1194 ... 174
Liverpool Juvenile Court ex p R [1987] All ER 688 ... 1270
Loizidou v Turkey (1996) 23 EHRR 513 ... 90
London Regional Transport v Mayor of London [2003] EMLR 4 ... 963
London Underground v Edwards (No 2) [1998] IRLR 364 ... 1543, 1544
Lonhro plc and Observer plc, Re, [1990] AC 154; [1989] 2 All ER 1100, HL ... 349
Lopez Ostra v Spain (1994) 20 EHRR 277 ... 71, 90
Lord Advocate v Scotsman Publications Ltd [1990] 1 AC 812; [1989] 2 All ER 852 ... 599, 612, 620
Lord Chancellor ex p Lightfoot [2000] 2 WLR 318 ... 130, 133
Lord Chancellor ex p Witham [1998] QB 575; [1997] 2 All ER 779 ... 130, 131, 152
Lord Saville of Newdigate ex p A [1999] 4 All ER 860; [2000] 1 WLR 1885 ... 130, 132, 953
Ludi v Switzerland (1993) 15 EHER 173 ... 1298
Lustig-Prean and Beckett v UK (1999) 29 EHRR 548; (1999) 7 BHRC 65 ... 72, 76, 81, 1207, 1208, 1514, 1516, 1518, 1520, 1521

M v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2004] EWCA Civ 324 ... 1430
M v UK (1982) Appl 9907/82; [1983] 35 DR 130 ... 48
M and N (Minors), Re, [1990] 1 AC 686; [1988] 3 WLR 485, HL ... 136, 970
MCN Pension Trustees Ltd v Bank of America National Trust and Savings Association [1995] EMLR 99 ... 353, 387
MS v Sweden, RJD 1997-IV 1437; (1999) 28 EHRR 313 ... 72, 1023
McCann v Manchester Crown Court [2002] 4 All ER 593 ... 791, 794
McCann, Farrell and Savage v UK, A 324; (1995) 21 EHRR 97 ... 37, 40, 44, 45, 207
Macdonald v Advocate General for Scotland; Pearce v Governing Body of Mayfield School [2003] UKHL 34 ... 1517–19, 1558, 1564

McElduff v UK (Appl No 21322/92): see Tinnelly v UK
McFeeley v UK (1980) 20 DR 44 852
McGlinchey v UK (2003) 37 EHRR 41 1175
McGonnell v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 56 63
McCowan v Chief Constable of Kingston on Hull [1968] Crim LR 34 1000
McGinley and Egan v UK (1998) 27 EHRR 1 70
McIlkenny and Others (Birmingham Six Case); see R v McIlkenny and Others
McKennitt v Ash [2006] EWCA Civ 1714 .... 254, 255, 827, 878, 883, 890, 893, 913–15, 919, 933, 991
McKenzie [1993] 1 WLR 453; (1992) 142 NLJ 1162, CA 1301
McLeod v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis [1994] 4 All ER 553 755
McLeod v UK (1998) 27 EHRR 493 .... 761, 776, 777
McLorie v Oxford [1982] 1 QB 1290 993
McVeigh, O'Neill and Evans v UK (1981) Report of 18 March; [1981] 25 D & R 15; (1981) 5 EHRR 71 .... 53, 1133
Markt Intern Verlag v FRG A 165 (1989) 92
Maguire (1990) 90 Cr App R 115; [1989] Crim LR 815, CA 1194, 1195
Maguire (Maguire Seven Case), see R v Maguire
Mainstream Loudoun v Board of Trustees 2 F Supp 2d 783 (EDVa 1998); 4 F Supp 2d 552 (1998) 581, 582
Malone v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis (No 2) [1979] Ch 344 .... 115, 898, 982, 1033, 1054
Malone v UK (1982) Report of 17 December, A 82; (1984) 7 EHRR 14 .... 73, 114, 775, 898, 1033, 1042, 1043, 1055, 1072, 1074, 1097
Mandla v Dowell Lee [1983] 2 AC 548; [1983] 2 WLR 620; [1983] 1 All ER 1062, HL 1508
Mansfield Justices ex p Sharkey [1985] QB 613 774
Mantovanelli v France (1997) 24 EHRR 370 64
Mapp v Ohio 367 US 643 (1961) 1265
Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330 .... 70, 87, 1525
Marschall v Land Nordrhein-Westfalen Case C-409/95, Judgment of 11 November 1997; [1998] IRLR 39 .... 1584, 1585, 1576
Marsh [1991] Crim LR 455 1194–96
Marshall (1992) The Times, 28 December 1274
Marshall (No 2) [1993] 4 All ER 586 .... 139, 1589
Martin Secker and Warburg [1954] 2 All ER 683; [1954] 1 WLR 1138 469
Mary Quayson [1989] Crim LR 218 1282
Mason [1987] Crim LR 119; [1988] 1 WLR 139; [1987] 3 All ER 481, CA 1272, 1277, 1296

Mathias (1989) The Times 24 August; (1989) 139 NLJ 1417, CA ... 1274, 1275
Mathieu-Mohin v Belgium (1987) 10 EHRR 1 ... 106
Mats Jacobson v Sweden (1990) 13 EHRR 79 ... 60, 104, 113
Matthews (1990) Cr App R 43; [1990] Crim LR 190, CA ... 1193–97
Maudsley v Palumbo and Others (1995) The Times, 19 December ... 899, 901
Medway Council v BBC [2002] 1 FLR 104 ... 860, 864
Meer v Tower Hamlets [1988] IRLR 399 ... 1546
Metropolitan Police Commissioner ex p Blackburn [1968] 2 All ER 319, CA ... 397, 477
Miailhe v France (1993) 16 EHRR 332 ... 69, 91
Michalak v Wandsworth LBC [2002] EWCA Civ 271 ... 1525
Middleweek v Chief Constable of Merseyside [1992] AC 179; [1990] 3 WLR 481 ... 1304
Miller v California (1973) 413 US 15 ... 469
Mills (Heather) v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2001] EMLR 41; (2001) WL 720322; 879, ... 889, 893, 907–9, 911, 915, 919, 938, 951, 953–56, 970, 985, 987, 988
Minister of Home Affairs v Fisher [1980] AC 319 ... 192
Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food ex p Hamble [1995] 2 All ER 714 ... 129
Ministry of Defence ex p Smith and Others [1996] 2 WLR 305; [1996] 1 All ER 257; [1996] ICR 740, CA ... 128, 129, 286, 1305, 1520
Minto v Police [1987] 1 NZLR 374 ... 756
Miranda v Arizona 384 US 436 (1966) ... 1265
Mohammed (Allie) v State [1999] 2 WLR 552 (Trinidad and Tobago) ... 1284
Monnell and Morris v UK (1987) 10 EHRR 205 ... 64
Morris v Duke-Cohen (1975) 120 SJ 826 ... 1487
Montgomery v Lord Advocate [2003] 1 AC 641; [2001] 2 WLR 779 ... 1454
Moonsar v Fiveways Express Transport Ltd EAT (2004) 27 September ... 1560
Moor [20001 J CIv Lib 155 ... 77
Moran v Burbine 475 US 412 (1986) ... 1265
Morgans v Director of Public Prosecution [1999] 1 WLR 968, CA; [2000] 2 WLR 386, HL ... 1050
Morgentaler v R [1988] 1 SCR 60 ... 80
Morpeth Ward Justices ex p Ward (1992) 95 Cr App R 215 ... 772, 773
Morse v Wiltshire CC [1998] ICR 1023; [1998] IRLR 352 ... 1551
Moss v McLachlan [1985] IRLR 76 ... 125, 756, 757, 760–62, 771
Moustaquim v Belgium (1991) 13 EHRR 802 ... 89

Mullady v DPP [1997] COD 422; WL 1103678 ... 1159
Mullen [1999] 2 Cr App R 143; [1999] 3 WLR 777 ... 1260, 1266
Müller v Switzerland (1991) 13 EHRR 212 ... 95, 465, 481, 483, 484, 488, 588, 684, 783
Murray v DPP [1994] 1 WLR 1; 99 Cr App R 396, HL ... 1239
Murray v UK (1994) 19 EHRR 193 ... 54, 56, 72, 74, 1152, 1160, 1161, 1208, 1221, 1232, 1234, 1235, 1249, 1327
Murray (John) v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 29; [1996] Crim LR 370; (1996) The Times, 9 February ... 65, 1209, 1210–15, 1239, 1240, 1252

N v Portugal Appl No 20683/92, 20 February 1995 ... 71, 945
N v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2005] 2 WLR 1124 ... 194, 267
Nadir Choudhary v UK (1999) 1 EHRLR 522 ... 1044, 1050
Nagarajan v London Regional Transport [1999] 4 All ER 65; [1999] 3 WLR 425 ... 1564, 1565
Nagy v Weston [1966] 2 QB 561; [1965] 1 WLR 280 ... 734, 735
Napier v Scottish Ministers [2005] UKHRR 268 ... 1176
Nebraska Press Association v Stuart 427 US 539 (1976) ... 320
Nedrick [1986] 3 All ER 1; [1986] 1 WLR 1025, CA ... 363
Neumeister v Austria, Judgment of 27 June 1968; (1979–80); (1968) 1 EHRR 91 ... 57, 58, 64
New York Times Co v US (Pentagon Papers Case) 403 US 713 (1971) ... 445, 604
News Group Newspapers Ltd v SOGAT [1986] ICR 716; [1986] IRLR 337 ... 705, 798
News Verlags v Austria (2001) 31 EHRR 8; (2000) 9 BHRC 625 ... 322, 326, 327, 333, 354, 355, 382
Nicol v Director of Public Prosecutions (1995) 160 JP 155; (1996) 1 J Civ Lib 75 ... 773, 774, 777–79
Nielsen v Denmark (1988) 1 EHRR 175; (1959) Appl 343/57, 2 YB 412; (1961) 1 DR 388 ... 29, 30
Niemietz v Germany, A 251-B; (1992) 16 EHRR 97 ... 72, 73, 74, 818, 1009, 1070
Nold v Commission [1974] ECR 481 ... 138
Noone [1988] ICR 813; [1988] 83 IRLR 195 ... 1589
Norris v Ireland (1991) 13 EHRR 186 ... 72
Norwich Pharmacal Co v Customs and Excise Commissioners [1974] AC 133 ... 410, 420, 426, 427, 436, 437, 439, 448, 449
Norwood v DPP (2003) WL 21491815 ... 506, 784
Norwood v DPP [2004] EWHC 69 ... 797
Norwood v UK (2005) 40 EHRR SE 11 ... 506, 784

Nottingham CC v Mohammed Amin [2000] 1 WLR 1071; [2000] Crim LR 174, CA 1299
Nottinghamshire CC v Meikle [2004] IRLR 703 1552

O v UK (1987) 10 EHRR 82 61
O'Connor v Euromoney Publications Inc (1999) Guardian, 6 June 1522
O'Hara v Chief Constable of the RUC [1997] WLR 1; [1997] 1 All ER 129, HL 1150, 1152, 1154, 1155
O'Kelly v Harvey (1883) 14 LR Ir 105 755
O'Leary [1988] 87 Cr App R 387; [1988] Crim LR 827, CA 1300
O'Neill (1996) The Times, 7 June 1531
Oberschlick v Austria (1997) 25 EHRR 357 90
Observer v UK; Observer and Guardian v UK A 216; (1992) 14 EHRR 153 ..... 94, 96, 597, 620, 794, 946, 985, 1355, 1357
Ocalan v Turkey (1999) 30 November 113
Ojutiku v Manpower Services Commission [1982] IRLR 418 ..... 1540, 1546
Oliver, Hartrey and Baldwin [2003] Cr App R 28 ..... 478, 557
Olsson v Sweden, A 130; (1988) 11 EHRR 259 ..... 69, 72
Olsson v Sweden (No 2), A250 (1992) 34
Open Door Counselling and Dublin Well Woman v Ireland (1992) 15 EHRR 244 ..... 43, 80, 93, 95, 407
Oransaye [1993] Crim LR 772, CA 1194
Osman v Director of Public Prosecutions (1999) The Times, 29 September 1126
Osman v UK (2000) 29 EHRR 245; [1999] 1 FLR 193; (1999) BHRC 293 ..... 41, 61, 62, 246, 952
Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria (1994) 19 EHRR 34 ..... 38, 95, 467, 486, 488–96, 568, 570, 944, 946, 948
Owino [1995] Crim LR 743 45
Oxfordshire County Council [1997] 1 FLR 235 960
Oxfordshire Council v L and F [1997] 1 FLR 235 968
Ozgur Gundem v Turkey (2001) 31 EHRR 49 ..... 422, 446, 447

P, Re, [2007] EWCA Civ 2 ..... 242, 268, 269

P v S and Cornwall County Council, Judgment of 30 April 1996; [1996] ECR 1-2143; [1996] 1 IRLR 347; [1996] All ER (EC) 397; [1996] ICR 795 ..... 139, 1504, 1516
Pakelli v Germany, Judgment of 25 April 1983, A 64; (1983) 6 EHRR 1 66
Paris, Abdullah and Miller (Cardiff Three Case) (1993) 97 Cr App R 99; [1994] Crim LR 361, CA 1207, 1230, 1272
Parris [1989] Crim LR 214; [1989] 9 Cr App R 68, CA 1300
Pataki (1960) Appl 596/59; YB III 31
Paton v UK (1981) 3 EHRR 408 43

Paton v Procurator Fiscal (Alloa) (1999) Judgment of 24 November ... 1215
Pearson (1998) The Times, 20 February ... 1261
Peck v United Kingdom (2003) 36 EHRR 41 ... 818, 819, 822, 884, 885, 894, 946, 968
Pel Ltd v Modgifi [1980] IRLR 142 ... 1535
Pendragon v UK No 31416/96 (1998) ... 687, 688, 725, 726, 736
Pepper v Hart [1993] 1 AC 593; [1993] 1 All ER 42; [1992] 3 WLR 1032, HL ... 241, 279
Percy v Director of Public Prosecutions [1995] 3 All ER 124 ... 772, 775, 779
Perera v Civil Service Commission [1983] IRLR 166; [1983] ICR 428, CA ... 1541, 1546
Peterkin v Chief Constable of Cheshire (1999) The Times, 16 November ... 756, 761
Petrovic v Austria (2001) 33 EHRR 14 ... 1525
Pharmaceuticals Ltd v Director of the SFO [2002] EWHC 3023 ... 1007, 1010
Pickstone v Freemans [1989] AC 66; [1988] 2 All ER 803; [1988] 3 WLR 265, HL ... 174, 1494
Piddington v Bates [1961] 1 WLR 162 ... 752, 753
Ping Lin [1976] AC 574 ... 1267
Plange v Chief Constable of South Humberside Police (1992) The Times 23 March ... 1154
Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v Casey (1992) 505 US 833 ... 80
Plattform 'Ärzte für das Leben' v Austria (1982) Appl 1012/82; [1985] D & R 44; (1988) 13 EHRR 204 ... 37, 97, 107, 778
Plon (Société) v France (No 58148/00, 18 May 2004) ... 432
Poitrimol v France, A 277-A (1993); (1993) 18 EHRR 130 ... 65
Ponting [1985] Crim LR 318 ... 117, 593, 594
Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Associations Ltd and the Secretary of State for the Environment v Donoghue [2001] 3 WLR 183; [2001] EWCA Civ 595, CA ... 175, 184, 220–224, 226, 230, 231, 607, 608
Powell v UK (1990) 12 EHRR 355 ... 72, 90
Pratt v Attorney General for Jamaica [1993] 3 WLR 995; [1993] 4 All ER 769 ... 151, 152
Preston (1992) 95 Cr App R 355, CA; [1994] 2 AC 130; [1993] 3 WLR 891; [1993] 4 All ER 638; (1994) 98 Cr App R 405, HL ... 1049–51
Pretty v UK (2002) 35 EHRR 1 ... 77
Price v Civil Service Commission [1977] 1 WLR 1417; [1978] 1 All ER 1228 ... 1539
Price v Leeds City Council [2005] 1 WLR 1825 ... 197, 198, 199, 279
Pullar v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 391 ... 63

Quinn [1990] Crim LR 581; (1990) The Times, 31 March, CA ... 1289

R [1992] Fam Law 108; [1991] 4 All ER 481; [1991] 3 WLR 767; [1992] Crim LR 207, HL ... 67, 148
R v A [2002] 1 AC 45 (HL); [2001] 2 WLR 1546; [2001] 2 Cr App R 21 ... 174, 178, 184, 185, 186, 187, 190, 202, 209, 214, 408, 729
R v Alladice (1988) 87 Cr App R 380; [1988] Crim LR 608, CA ... 1223, 1272, 1275, 1282, 1286
R v Anderson [1993] Crim LR 447 ... 1278
R v Argent [1997] 2 Crim App R 27; (1996) The Times, 19 December, CA ... 1238, 1244
R v Bailey and Smith [1993] 3 All ER 513; (1993) The Times, 22 March, CA ... 1296
R v Beck ex p Daily Telegraph [1993] 2 All ER 177 ... 388
R v Beckles [2004] EWCA Crim 2766 ... 1246, 1247, 1249, 1327
R v Bow Street Stipendiary Magistrate, ex p Pinochet Ugarte (No 3) [1999] 3 WLR 827 ... 46
R v Bournewood Community and Mental Health NHS Trust ex p L [1999] 1 AC 458 ... 764
R v Bowden [2000] 2 All ER 418 ... 478, 586
R v Bresa [2005] EWCA Crim 1414 ... 1247, 1248
R v Bristol Crown Court ex p Bristol Press and Picture Agency Ltd (1987) 85 Crim App R 190 ... 447, 448
R v Broadcasting Complaints Commission ex p Granada Television Ltd [1995] EMLR 163 ... 849
R v Central Criminal Court ex p Bright [2001] 2 All ER 244 ... 447
R v Central Criminal Court ex p Telegraph plc [1993] 1 WLR 980 ... 385, 387
R v Central Independent Television [1994] Fam 192 ... 856, 970, 971
R v Chief Constable of Sussex ex p International Ferry Traders Ltd [1999] 1 All ER 129; [1999] 2 AC 418 ... 273, 748
R v Coney (1882) 8 QBD 534 ... 766
R v Cowan [1996] 1 Cr App R 1 ... 1238
R v Darrach (2000) 191 DLR (4th) 539 ... 189
R v Director of Public Prosecutions [2006] All ER (D) 250 ... 782, 784
R v Director of Public Prosecutions, ex p Kebilene, see DPP ex p Kebilene and Others
R v El-Faisal [2004] EWCA Crim 456 ... 1417
R v Friend [1997] 1 WLR 1433 ... 1239
R v Governor of Durham Prison ex p Singh [1984] 1 WLR 704 ... 1424
R v H [2004] UKHL 3; [2004] 2 AC 134 ... 1344
R v Hammond [2004] EWHC 69 ... 783, 797
R v Hampshire Farmers Markets, ex p Beer [2003] EWCA Civ 1056 ... 226, 228–29

R v Holding [2006] 1 WLR 1040 ... 183
R v HM Treasury, ex p Cambridge University [2000] 1 WLR 2514 (ECJ) ... 223
R v Hundal (Avtar Singh); R v Dhaliwal (Kesar Singh) 2004 WL 62035 (CA (Crim Div)), [2004] 2 Cr App R 19, [2004] 2 Cr App R (S) 64, (2004) Times February 13, [2004] EWCA Crim 389 ... 1392
R v IBA ex p Whitehouse (1985) The Times 4 April ... 848
R v James (1996) Crim LR 650 ... 1197
R v Johnstone (Robert Alexander) [2003] UKHL 28 ... 178
R v Jones; R v Milling; R v Olditch; R v Pritchard; R v Richards; Ayliffe v Director of Public Prosecutions; Swain v Director of Public Prosecutions [2006] UKHL 16 ... 744, 745
R v Jones and Mirrless 65 Cr App R 250, CA ... 766
R v Kansal [2002] 2 AC 69 ... 240
R v Keogh [2007] All ER (D) 105 (Mar); [2007] EWCA Crim 528 ... 1337, 1354, 1355, 1356
R v Khan [1997] AC 558 ... 270, 273, 828
R v Killen [1974] NI 220 ... 1350
R v Lambert [2001] 3 All ER 577 ... 177, 178, 185, 239
R v Lambert [2002] 2 AC 545 ... 1390
R v Maguire [1992] 2 All ER ... 1103, 1171
R v McIlkenny and Others [1992] 2 All ER 417; (1991) The Times, 28 March ... 324, 332, 339, 1103, 1104, 1171, 1315
R v Manchester Crown Court, ex p H and D [2000] 2 All ER 166 ... 394
R v Mirza, R v Connor [2004] 1 All ER 929; [2002] 2 WLR 201 ... 400–4, 406
R v Mushtaq [2005] 1 WLR 1513 ... 1269, 1270
R v Offen [2001] 1 WLR 253 ... 185, 186, 1362
R v Panel of Take-overs and Mergers ex p Datafin [1987] QB 815 ... 231
R v Perrin [2002] EWCA Crim 747, CA ... 472, 584, 586
R v Shaheed [2002] 2 NZLR 377 (CA) ... 1266
R v Shayler [2002] 2 WLR 754 ... 375, 376, 599, 607–11, 615
R v Smith [2005] 1 WLR 704 ... 401, 405
R v Spear [2003] 1 AC 734 ... 267
R v Staines; R v Morrisey [1997] 2 Cr App R 426, CA ... 1251
R v Taylor (1993) 98 Cr App R 361, CA ... 345, 382
R v Ward (1992) 96 Cr App R 1 ... 1103, 1171
R (A) v Partnerships in Care Ltd [2002] EWHC 529 ... 224–25, 231
R (Bernard) v Enfield LBC (2003) HRLR 111 ... 247
R (Brehony) v Chief Constable of Greater Manchester [2005] EWHC 640 ... 706, 722, 726
R (Burkett) v Hammersmith and Fulham LBC [2002] UKHL 23 ... 241

R (D) v Secretary of State for the Home Department
[2003] 1 WLR 1315 202
R (European Roma Rights Centre) v Immigration Officer at Prague Airport (United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees intervening) [2005] 2 AC 1 .... 1135, 1136
R (Greenfield) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2005] 1 WLR 673 .... 195, 242, 244, 247
R (H) v Mental Health Tribunal, North and East London
Region and Another (2001) The Times, 2 April 192, 201, 202, 204
R (Haw) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2006]
EWCA Civ 352 732
R (Limbuella) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2005] UKHL 66; [2004] QB 1440 1360
R (Mambakasa) v Secretary of State for the Home Office
[2004] QB 1124; [2004] 2 WLR 603 241
R (MB) v Secretary of State for the Home Department
[2006] EWCA Civ 1140 179
R (N) v Secretary of State for the Home Office [2004]
QB 1124; [2004] 2 WLR 603 241
R (on the application of Alan Lord) and the Secretary of State for the Home Department [2003] EWHC 2073 636
R (on the application of Alconbury Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] 2 All ER 929; (2001)
NLJ 135, HL 107, 183, 184, 192,
201, 202, 237, 276
R (on the application of Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2003] 1 AC 837 .... 177, 181, 185, 186, 360
R (on the application of B) v Mental Health Review Tribunal [2002] EWHC 1553 .... 243, 850
R (on the application of Ford) v Press Complaints Commission [2002] EMLR 5 233
R (on the application of Gillan) v Commissioner of Metropolitan Police [2006] UKHL 12 .... 269, 274, 277–78, 726, 1119–21, 1131–37,
1139, 1140, 1158,
1325, 1356, 1465
R (on the application of Heather and others) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation [2002] EWCA Civ 336; [2002]
2 All ER 936 .... 223–224, 226–32,
234, 247, 248
R (on the application of Johnson) v Havering London
Borough Council [2007]All ER 271 .... 222, 226–227, 231
R (on the application of KB and Others) v Mental Health Review Tribunal and Another [2003] 2 All ER 209;
[2002] EWHC 639 .... 243, 247

R (on the application of the Kurdistan Workers' Party and others) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2002] EWHC Admin 644 ... 1358, 1402, 1415
R (on the application of Laporte) v Chief Constable of Gloucester [2004] EWCA Civ 1639 ... 287, 288, 290, 297, 662, 690, 692, 693, 721, 730, 733, 751, 755, 757–63, 766, 767, 770, 771, 775, 777, 801, 1140
R (on the application of Laporte) (FC) v Chief Constable of Gloucestershire [2006] UKHL 55 ... 1140, 1142, 1143, 1251
R (on the application of Marper) v Chief Constable of South Yorkshire [2004] 1 WLR 2196 ... 187, 194, 267, 1339
R (on the application of Pretty) v DPP and Secretary of State for the Home Department [2001] UKHL 61 ... 77, 374
R (on the application of the Prolife Alliance) v BBC [2002] 2 All ER 756; [2004] 1 AC 185 ... 179, 234, 274–76, 280, 510, 530–45, 851
R (on the application of Rottnam) v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis [2002] 2 All ER 865 ... 1000
R (on the application of Ullah) v Special Adjudicator [2004] UKHL 26 ... 188, 194, 196, 199, 267, 279, 1338, 1339
R (Quark Fishing Ltd) v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs [2005] 3 WLR 837 ... 195
R (S) v Chief Constable of the South Yorkshire Police [2004] UKHL 39, [2004] 1 WLR 2196 ... 1437
R (SB) v Denbigh High School [2006] 2 WLR 719 ... 195, 275, 286
R (Uttley) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2003] 1 WLR 1590 ... 202
Rai, Alimond and 'Negotiate Now' v UK (1995) 81-A DR 46; (1995) 19 EHRR CD 93 ... 68, 685
Rainey v Greater Glasgow Health Board [1987] AC 224; [1986] WLR 1017; [1987] 1 All ER 65, HL ... 1498, 1499, 1503, 1547
Ramsay and Foote (1883) 15 Cox CC 231 ... 484, 485
Rasool [1997] 4 All ER 439; (1997) The Times, 17 February; CA ... 1050
Redmond-Bate v DPP [1999] All ER (D) 864; (1999) Crim LR 998; (1999) The Times, 28 July ... 661, 662, 691, 701, 723, 778, 779, 801
Rees v UK, Judgment of 17 October 1986, A 106; (1986) 9 EHRR 56 ... 38, 85, 103, 139
Reid [1987] Crim LR 702 ... 125, 705
Remli v France (1996) 22 EHRR 253 ... 63
Remmers and Hamer v The Netherlands (1999) 27 EHRR CD 168 ... 1046
Rennie [1982] 1 WLR 64; [1982] 1 All ER 385, CA ... 1268

Re S and W, see: S (Children) (Care Order: Implementation of Care Plan) Re
Reynolds (Albert) v Times Newspapers Ltd and Others [1998] 3 WLR 862; [1999] 4 All ER 609; [1999] 3 WLR 1010, HL ... 126, 311, 376, 377, 715, 718, 917, 951, 954, 1358
Ribemont v France (1995) 20 EHRR 557 ... 327, 357, 382
Ribbitsch v Austria (1992) 21 EHRR 573 ... 48, 1175
Rice v Connolly [1966] 2 QB 414; [1966] All ER 649; [1966] 3 WLR 17 ... 1109
Ricketts v Cox (1981) Cr App R 298 ... 1110
Riem v Sweden (1992) 16 EHRR 155 ... 70, 88
Ringeisen v Austria, Judgment 16 July 1971, A 13; (1971) 1 EHRR 455 ... 61, 1086, 1319, 1341
Roberts v Parole Board [2005] UKHL 45 ... 1344
Rodriguez v British Columbia (1993) 85 CCC (3d) 15 ... 78
Rowe and Davis v UK, Appl No 28901/95; [1999] Crim LR 410; (2000) 30 EHRR 1 ... 64, 1259, 1320
Ruiz-Mateos v Spain (1993) 16 EHRR 505 ... 64
Runa Begum v Tower Hamlets London [2002] 2 All ER 668 ... 280
Rutherford v Sec of State for Trade and Industry (No 2) [2006] UKHL 19 ... 1542

S, (Children) (Care Plan: Implementation of Care Plan), Re, [2002] 2 AC 291; [2002] UKHL 10 ... 184, 185, 186, 430, 1341
S, (A Child), Re, [2004] UKHL 47; [2005] 1 AC 593 ... 826, 855, 861–85, 957, 959, 961, 963, 968–70, 972–75, 979–81
S v Miller 2001 SC 977 ... 792
SW v UK; and C v UK (1995) 2I EHRR 404 ... 67
Saidi v France (1994) 17 EHRR 251 ... 1187, 1259
Salabiaku v France (1988) A 141-A; (1988) 13 EHRR 379 ... 64, 191, 794, 1350, 1351
Salgueiro da Silva Mouta v Portugal (1999) Judgment of 21 December ... 1521
Salman v Turkey, Judgment of 27 June 2000 ... 47
Saloman v Commissioners of Custom and Excise [1967] 2 QB 116 ... 136
Samuel [1988] QB 615; [1988] 2 All ER 135, [1988] 2 WLR 920, CA ... 1217, 1220, 1223, 1225, 1234, 1281, 1283, 1284, 1288, 1289
Samuel v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis (1999) (unreported) ... 1138
Sang [1980] AC 402; [1979] 3 WLR 263; [1979] 2 All ER 1222, HL ... 1268, 1277, 1289, 1290, 1295, 1297
Sat-Bhambra (1988) JP Rep 365; (1988) Cr App R 55, CA ... 1300

Saunders v Punch Ltd [1998] 1 WLR 986 ... 417, 418, 429, 450
Saunders v Richmond-upon-Thames London Borough Council [1978] IRLR 362 ... 1528
Saunders v Scottish National Camps (1981) EAT 7/80 ... 1522
Saunders v UK (1994) No 19187/91; (1997) 23 EHRR 313 ... 65, 271, 1239, 1240, 1250–54, 1270, 1279
Savundranayagan and Walker [1968] 3 All ER 439; [1968] 1 WLR 1761, CA ... 335, 365
Schabas (1994) 43 ICLQ 913 ... 48
Schenk v Switzerland (1988) 13 EHRR 242 ... 270, 1291, 1299
Scherer v Switzerland, A 287 (1993) Com Rep 281 ... 466, 467, 568, 569
Schering Chemicals v Falkman [1981] 2 WLR 848 ... 915, 918
Schmidt and Dahlströhm v Sweden, Judgment of 6 February 1976, A 21; (1976) 1 EHRR 632 ... 102
Schwabe v Austria (1992) 14 HRLJ 26 ... 94
Schuler-Zraggen v Switzerland (1993) 16 EHRR 405 ... 1483
Scialacqua v Italy (1998) 26 EHRR CD 164 ... 42
Scott [1991] Crim LR 56, CA ... 1194
Secretary of State for Defence v Guardian Newspapers [1985] AC 339; [1984] 3 All ER 601, HL ... 411, 419, 420, 445
Secretary of State for the Home Department v Rehman [1999) INLR 517 (SIAC); [2000] 3 All ER 778; (2000) The Times, 31 May, CA; [2001] 3 WLR 877, HL ... 1088, 1343, 1425, 1426
Secretary of State for Defence ex p Perkins [1997] IRLR 297 ... 1516
Secretary of State for Employment ex p Equal Opportunities Commission (EOC) [1994] 2 WLR 409; [1994] 2 WLR 409, HL ... 132, 152, 294, 1598
Secretary of State for Employment ex p Seymour-Smith and Perez (No 2) [2000] 1 WLR 435; [2000] IRLR 263, HL ... 1542, 1543
Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs ex p The World Development Movement [1995] 1WLR 386; [1995] 1 All ER 611 ... 236
Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Chahal [1995] 1 WLR 526; [1995] 1 All ER 658; (1993) The Times, 12 March, CA ... 1088, 1089
Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Ruddock [1987] 1 WLR 1482; [1987] 2 All ER 518 ... 1023
Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Stitt (1987) The Times, 3 February ... 127
Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Adams [1995] All ER (EC) 177 ... 139
Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Brind [1991] 1 AC 696; [1991] 1 All ER 720; [1991] 2 WLR 588, HL ... 127, 128, 129, 152, 237, 304

Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Daly, [2001] 3 All ER 433; [2001] UKHL 26, HL 131, 285, 286, 374, 609
Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Hosenball [1977] 1 WLR 766; [1977] 3 All ER 452, CA 127
Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p McQuillan [1995] 3 All ER 400; (1994) The Independent, 23 September 128
Secretary of State for the Home Department and Others ex p Norney and Others (1995) The Times, 6 October 132
Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Northumbria Police Authority [1989] QB 26; [1988] 2 WLR 590; [1988] 1 All ER 556, CA 127
Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Simms [2000] 2 AC 115; [1999] QB 349; [1999] 3 All ER 400, CA; [1999] 3 WLR 328, HL 130, 152, 237, 300, 310, 311, 314, 377, 715, 855, 939–42, 950, 951, 954, 966, 979, 1458
Secretary of State for the Home Department v E [2007] EWHC 33 (Admin) 1342, 1346, 1452
Secretary of State for the Home Department v JJ and Others [2006] EWHC 1623 (Admin) 1451–54
Secretary of State for the Home Dept v Rideh and J [2007] EWHC 804 (Admin) 1346, 1453
Secretary of State for Social Security ex p Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants [1996] 4 All ER 385; (1996) 146 NLJ 985 .... 130, 132
Secretary of State for Transport ex p Factortame [1990] 2 AC 85; [1989] 2 WLR 997; [1989] 2 CMLR 353, HL 139, 154, 1599
Secretary of State v MB [2006] EWHC 1000; [2006] HRLR 29; [2006] 8 CL 108 .... 1340, 1342, 1447, 1453, 1461
Selmouni v France (2000) 29 EHRR 46, 47, 1175
Shannon [2001] 1 WLR 51, CA 1296, 1299, 1303, 1325
Shafir ur Rehman see Secretary of State for the Home Department v Rehman
Sharpe v Director of Public Prosecutions (1993) JP 595 1289
Shaw v Director of Public Prosecutions [1962] AC 220; [1961] 2 WLR 897, HL 481, 482
Shayler (2001) 14 May Hearing 1030
Sheffield and Horsham v UK (1998) 27 EHRR 163; [1998] 2 FLR 928 85
Sheldrake v DPP [2004] UKHL 43; [2005] 1 AC 264; [2005] 1 All ER 237 .... 178, 185, 1391, 1414
Shelley Films Limited v Rex Features Ltd [1994] EMLR 134 .... 884, 898, 900, 901, 920

Shields v E Coomes [1978] WLR 1408; [1979] 1 All ER 456, CA ... 1497
Sibson v UK A 258; (1993) 17 EHRR 193; (1993) The Times, 17 May ... 99
Siddiqui v Swain [1979] RTR 454 ... 1155
Sidhu v Aerospace Composite Technology Ltd [1999] IRLR 683 ... 1558
Sidiropoulos v Greece (1998) (unreported) ... 98, 1359, 1401
Sidis v F-R Publishing Corporation 113 F 2d 806 (2d Cir) (1940) ... 885
Silcott (1991) The Times, 9 December ... 1236
Silver v UK, Judgment of 25 March 1983, A 61; (1983) 5 EHRR 347 ... 66, 90
Simon-Herald v Austria (1969) App 430/69 CD 38; 14 YB 352 ... 41
British Railway Engineers [1986] ICR 22 ... 1547
Skirving [1985] QB 819 ... 470, 472
Skoogstrom v Sweden (1981) 1 Dig Supp para 5.2.2.1; (1982) 5 EHRR 278 ... 56
Slade (1996) LEXIS CO/1678/96 ... 1115
Smith v Gardner Merchant [1996] ICR 790; [1996] IRLR 342; [1998] 3 All ER 582; [1999] ICR 134 ... 1516, 1517
Smith and Grady v UK (2000) 29 EHRR 493 ... 72, 81, 107, 285, 286, 1207, 1516, 1518, 1520, 1571
Smurthwaite [1994] 1 All ER 898; (1994) 98 Cr App R 437, CA ... 1295, 1296, 1299
Socialist Party and Others v Turkey, App No 20/1997/804/1007; (1999) 27 EHRR 51 ... 38, 97, 98, 681, 1358
Soering v UK, Judgment of 7 July 1989, A 161; (1989) 11 EHRR 439 ... 37, 43, 48–50, 98, 113, 1359
Spencer (Earl) v UK (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105; [1998] EHRLR 348 ... 30, 71, 816, 817, 828, 831, 901, 945
Sporrong and Lonroth v Sweden (1982) 5 EHRR 35 ... 104
Stedman v UK (1997) 23 EHRR CD 168 ... 1483
Steel v The Post Office [1977] IRLR 288 ... 1539
Steel, Lush, Needham, Polden and Cole v UK Appl No 24838 / 94; (1999) 28 EHRR 603 ... 68, 242, 683, 685–89, 694, 695, 722, 725, 730, 736, 741, 746, 747, 775, 777–80, 797, 800
Stephens v Avery [1988] Ch 449; [1988] 2 WLR 1280; [1988] 2 All ER 477 ... 881, 896, 899, 902
Stewart v Cleveland Guest Ltd [1996] ICR 535 ... 1557

Stewart v UK (1982) Appl 10044/82; 39 DR 162 (1984);
(1985) 7 EHRR 453 ... 43
Stott v Brown 2000 SLT 379 ... 1252
Straker [1965] Crim LR 239 ... 477, 479
Sunday Times v UK, Judgment of 26 April 1979, A 30;
(1979) 2 EHRR 245 ... 36, 68, 94, 135, 150, 310, 322, 324, 329, 333, 335–60, 362, 395, 966
Sunday Times v UK (No 2) (1991) 14 EHRR 229 ... 759
Sutherland v UK, Appl No 25186/94; (1996) 22 EHRR
CD 182; (1997) EHRLR 117 ... 81, 82
Swanston v Director of Public Prosecutions (1997)
The Times, 23 January ... 782

T v Malta (1999) 29 EHRR 185 ... 57
Tammer v Estonia (2003) 37 EHRR 43; (2001) 10 BHRC
543 ... 945, 946, 963, 972, 976
Taylor [1994] TLR 484 ... 333
Taylor v Anderton [1995] 2 All ER 420, CA ... 1320
Taylor v Director of Public Prosecutions [1973] AC 964 ... 799
Teixeira de Castro v Portugal (1998) 28 EHRR 101 ... 1214, 1259, 1267, 1291, 1293, 1294, 1298, 1299
Tekin v Turkey (2001) 31 EHRR 4 ... 1175
Theakston v MGN [2002] EMLR 22 ... 909, 911
Thomas [1990] Crim LR 269, DC ... 1289
Thomas (Esther) v News Group Newspapers (2001)
WL 753464, Judgment of 18 July ... 871
Thomas v NUM [1985] 2 WLR 1081; [1985] 2 All ER 1 ... 124
Thomas v Sawkins [1935] 2 KB 249 ... 676, 1000
Thompson v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis
[1997] 3 WLR 403; [1997] 2 All ER 762, CA ... 1306, 1310
Thompson and Venables v Associated Newspapers and Others: see Venables, Jon, Thompson, Robert v News
Group Newspapers Ltd, Associated Newspapers Ltd, MGM Ltd
Thompson Newspapers Ltd ex p Attorney General [1968]
1 All ER 268; [1968] 1 WLR 1 ... 253, 334, 367, 391
Thorgeir Thorgeirson v Iceland (1992) 14 EHRR 843 ... 93, 94, 310, 966
Thynne, Wilson and Gunnel v UK, Judgment of 25 October
1990, A 190; (1990) 13 EHRR 666 ... 58, 113
Tilly v Director of Public Prosecutions (2001) The Times
27 November ... 741, 743, 744
Tinnelly and McElduff v UK (1998) 27 EHRR 249 ... 61, 62, 1031, 1088, 1320, 1343, 1344
Tisdall (1984) The Times, 26 March ... 96, 593
Tolstoy Miloslavsky v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 442; The Times, 19 July ... 96
Tomasi v France (1992) 15 EHRR 1 ... 46, 48, 1175, 1176

Tottenham Three case (1991) The Times, 9 December ... 1103
Tower Boot Co v Jones [1997] ICR 254; [1997] IRLR 168 ... 1561, 1564
Treadaway v Chief Constable of West Midlands (1994) The Times, 25 October ... 1305
Trussler [1988] Crim LR 446 ... 1274
Turley v Allders [1980] ICR 66 ... 1529
Tyrer v UK, Judgment of 25 April 1978, A 26; (1978) 2 EHRR 1 ... 32, 47

UDR Four Case [1988] 11 NIJB 1 ... 1171
United Communist Party of Turkey v Turkey 1998 WL 1043934 (ECHR); 4 BHRC 1; (1998) 26 EHRR 121; [1998] HRCD 247 ... 1357

VGT v Switzerland (2000) 34 EHRR 159 ... 209, 539, 542
Vagrancy Cases, Judgment of 18 June 1971, A 14 (1972) 1 EHRR 373 ... 55
Valenzuela v Spain (1998) 28 EHRR 483 ... 1044
Van Colle v Chief Constable of Hertfordshire [2006] EWHC 360 QB ... 247
Van der Mussele v Belgium Judgment of 23 November 1983, A 70; (1983) 6 EHRR 163 ... 51
Van Mechelen v Netherlands (1998) 25 EHRR 647 ... 1259
Van Oosterwijck v Belgium, Judgment of 6 November 1980, A 40; (1980) 3 EHRR 557 ... 33
Vel v Owen (1987) JP 510 ... 1278
Venables, Jon, Thompson, Robert v News Group Newspapers Ltd, Associated Newspapers Ltd, MGM Ltd [2001] 1 All ER 908; [2001] 2 WLR 1038 ... 890, 905–7, 908, 909, 911, 912, 915, 938, 951, 956, 970, 985, 987, 988
Vernillo v France (1991) 13 EHRR 880 ... 63
Vernon [1988] Crim LR 445 ... 1222
Victoria Park Racing Co v Taylor (1937) 58 CLR 479 ... 994
Video Appeals Committee of the BBFC ex p BBFC [2000] EMLR 850 ... 548, 554, 564, 565, 569, 570
Vijayanathan v France (1992) 15 EHRR 62 ... 27
Vilvarajah and Four Others v UK (1991) Judgment of 30 October 1991;(1991) 14 EHRR 248; A 215 (1991) ... 30, 49, 107
Vince and Another v Chief Constable of Dorset (1992) The Times, 7 September ... 1171
Vogt v Germany (1995) 21 EHRR 205 ... 98, 1359
Von Hannover v Germany (2006) 43 EHRR 7 ... 195, 431, 818–24, 828, 830, 836–38, 845, 848, 880, 883–85, 893–95, 914, 915, 933, 948–50, 956, 968, 969, 979, 991, 1070

W, Re, [2002] 2 AC 291 ... 184, 186, 968
W (A Minor) (Wardship: Freedom of Publication), Re, [1992] 1 All ER 794 CA ... 856, 859, 960, 961, 968
W (A Minor) (Wardship: Restriction on Publication), Re, (1995) 2 FLR 466 ... 856, 968
W (Children), Re, [2005] EWHC 1564 ... 972–5, 980
W v Egdell [1990] Ch 359; [1989] 2 WLR 689, CA; [1990] 1 WLR 1502, HL ... 916
W v UK (1983) Appl 9348/81; 32 DR 190 (1983) ... 41
W and B (Children) (Care Plan), Re, [2002] 2 WLR 720 ... 176, 177
W, B v UK (1987) Judgment of 8 July; A 121; (1987) 10 EHRR 29 ... 88
Waddington v Miah [1974] 1 WLR 683; [1974] 2 All ER 377, CA and HL ... 123
Wahab [2003] 1 Cr App R 15 ... 1274
Wainwright v Home Office [2004] 2 AC 406 ... 239, 240, 810, 825, 866, 991, 1107, 1136, 1176, 1177–81, 1326
Wales v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis [1995] IRLR 531 ... 1564
Walsh [1989] Crim LR 822; (1989) 19 Cr App R 161, CA ... 1280, 1283, 1287
Ward v Chief Constable of Somerset and Avon Constabulary (1986) The Times, 26 June, CA ... 1151
Watkins (Respondent) v Home Office (Appellants) and Others [2006] UKHL 17 ... 239
Watson v UK [1997] EHRR 181 ... 58
Webb v Chief Constable of Merseyside Police [2000] 1 All ER 209 ... 1410
Webb v Emo Air Cargo (UK) Ltd (No 2) [1994] 3 WLR 941; [1994] All ER 115; [1994] QB 718 ... 1531–33
Webb v Emo Air Cargo (UK) Ltd [1992] CMLR 793, CA; [1993] 1 WLR 49; [1992] 4 All ER 929, HL ... 1530, 1533
Webber [2004] UKHL 1 ... 1239
Webster v Southwark London Borough Council [1983] QB 698; [1983] 2 WLR 217 ... 678
Weekes [1993] Crim LR 222; (1992) The Times, 15 May, CA ... 1195, 1196
Weeks v UK, Judgment of 5 October 1988, A 114; (1987) 10 EHRR 293 ... 53, 58, 234
Welch v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 247 ... 67
Weldon v Home Office [1991] WLR 340; [1990] 3 All ER 672, CA ... 1304, 1307
Wemhoff v Germany, Judgment of 27 June 1968; (1968) 1 EHRR 58 ... 58
West Midlands Passenger Transport Executive v Jaquant Singh [1988] WLR 730, CA ... 1536

Westminster City Council v Morris [2006] 1 WLR 505 ... 203
Wheeler v Leicester City Council [1985] AC 1054; [1985] 2 All ER 1106, HL ... 125
Whelan v Director of Public Prosecutions [1975] QB 864 ... 1394
White v Metropolitan Police Commissioner (1982) The Times, 24 April ... 1305
Whitehead v Brighton Marine Palace and Pier Company Ltd (2005) Case 3102595/04 18 April ... 1560
Whitfield v Cleanaway UK (2005) 4 February (unreported) ... 1560
Wickramsinghe v UK [1998] EHRLR 338 ... 61
Widmer v Switzerland, No 20527/92(1993) (unreported) ... 42
Wiggins v Field [1968] Crim LR 50 ... 477
Williams [198713 All ER 411; [1987] Crim LR 167 ... 45
Williams [1989] Crim LR 66 ... 1196
Williams and O'Hare v Director of Public Prosecutions [1993] Crim LR 775 ... 1296, 1299
Wilson v Chief Constable of Lancashire Constabulary (2000) 23 November (unreported) ... 1159
Wilson v The First County Trust Ltd [2001] 3 All ER 229; [2001] EWCA Civ 633 ... 175, 176, 186, 200, 286
Winder v Director of Public Prosecutions (1996) The Times, 14 August ... 739, 740, 743, 747
Windisch v Austria (1990) 13 EHRR 281 ... 66
Winer v UK (1986) 48 DR 154 ... 71, 815, 816, 828

Wingrove v UK, Judgment of 25 November 1996, (1994) 18 EHRR CD 54; (1996) 24 EHRR 1 ... 38, 490, 491, 494, 496, 570
Winn v Director of Public Prosecutions (1992) 142 NLJ ... 786
Winterwerp v Netherlands, Judgment of 24 October 1979, A 33; (1979) 2 EHRR 387 ... 52, 55
Wise v Dunning [1902] 1 KB 167 ... 772, 773, 780
Wloch v Poland (2002) 34 EHRR 9 ... 327
Woodward v Hutchins [1977] 1 WLR 760; [1977] 2 All ER 751, CA ... 918–20, 931, 984
Woolgar v Chief Constable of Sussex [1999] 3 All ER 604 ... 433
Woollin [1999] 1 AC 82, HL ... 363
Worm v Austria (1997) 25 EHRR 557; (1998) 25 EHRR 454 ... 321–26, 328, 329, 331, 353–57, 362, 382
Wynne v UK (1994) 19 EHRR 333 ... 58

X v Austria (1963) Appl 1852/63; (1965) YB VIII ... 91
X v Austria (1970) Appl 4428/70; (1972) YB XV ... 66, 67
X v Austria (1976) No 7045/75, 7 DR 87 ... 236
X v Austria (1973) Appl 5362/72, Coll 42; 42 DR 145 ... 64

X v Austria (1979) 18 DR 154 ... 74
X (A Child), Re, [2001] 1 FCR 541 ... 860, 864, 970, 971
X (Minors) v Bedfordshire CC [1995] 2 AC 633, CA; [1995] 3 WLR 152; [1995] 3 All ER 353, HL ... 62
X v Belgium (1961) 4 YB 324 ... 97
X v Denmark (1979) Appl 8828/79; 30 DR 93 (1982) ... 48, 56
X v Federal Republic of Germany (1956) 1 YB 202 ... 90
X v Federal Republic of Germany (1969) Appl 4045/69; (1970) YB XIII ... 109
X v Federal Republic of Germany (1970) Appl 4653/70; (1974) 46 CD 22; 17 YB 148 ... 51
X v Federal Republic of Germany (1979) Appl 8410/78; (1979) 18 DR 216 ... 51
X v Federal Republic of Germany (1980) DR 17 ... 65
X v Ireland (1973) 16 YB 388 ... 52
X v Morgan Grampian Publishers and Others [1991] AC 1, CA; [1990] 2 WLR 1000; [1990] 2 All ER 1, HL ... 412–15, 418, 419, 420, 425
X v Netherlands (1974) 2 DR 118 ... 70
X v Netherlands (Appl 2894/66); (1966) 9 YB 564 ... 57
X v Norway (1961) Appl 867/60; 4 YB 270 ... 27
X v Spain Appl 10227/82; DR 37(1984) ... 43
X v Sweden (Appl 7911/77) (1977) 12 DR 192 ... 105
X v UK (1973) Appl 5877/72; 16 YBCHE 328 ... 814, 1070
X v UK (1975) Appl 6564/74; 2 DR 105 (1975) ... 104
X v UK (1978) Appl 8324/78 (unpublished) ... 48
(1978) Appl No 7154/75; 14 DR 31(1978) ... 39, 41, 42, 70
X v UK (1980) Appl 8416/78; 19 DR 244 (1980) ... 43, 80, 89
X v UK (1981) Appl 7990/77; 24 DR 57 ... 30, 203
X v UK (1981) Appl 8306/78, 25 DR 147; (1981) 3 EHRR 63 ... 28, 30, 1521
X v UK (1982) 5 EHRR 273 ... 60
X v UK (1998) 25 EHRR CD 88 ... 61
X v UK and Ireland (1982) Appl 9829/82 (unpublished) ... 41
X v Y [1988] 2 All ER 648 ... 916
X (A Minor) (Wardship: Injunction) (The Mary Bell Case) [1984] 1 WLR 1422 ... 855, 961
X and the Church of Scientology v Sweden (1977) Appl 7805/77; (1979) YB XXII; 16 DR 68 ... 92
X and Y v Austria (1974) Appl 7909/77; 15 DR 160 (1978) ... 65
X and Y v Netherlands (1985) 8 EHRR 235 ... 70, 74, 804
X, Y and Z v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 143 ... 87
Young, James and Webster v UK, Judgment of 13 August 1981, A 44; (1981) 4 EHRR 38 ... 34, 99, 150
YL v Birmingham City Council and Others [2007] All ER 271, CA; [2007] UKHL 27, HL ... 222, 226, 227

Z (A Minor) (Identification: Restrictions on Publication), Re, [1995] 4 All ER 961, CA ... 855, 856–59, 862, 865, 946, 957, 959, 960, 961, 968, 969, 980
Z v Finland (1997) 25 EHRR 371 ... 425, 430, 432, 438
Z and E v Austria (1986) 49 DR 67 ... 88
Z and Others v UK Appl 28945/95; (2001) The Times 31 May ... 62
Zamir v UK (1983) Report of 11 October, 40 DR 42 (1983) ... 55
Zana v Turkey (1998) 4 BHRC 242; (1997) 27 EHRR 667 ... 64
Zand v Austria (1978) 15 DR 70 ... 63
Zaveckas (1970) 54 Cr App R 202, CA ... 1268, 1273
Ziliberberg v Moldova App no 61821/00, 4 May 2004, (unreported) ... 680, 759
Zimmermann and Steiner v Switzerland (1983) 6 EHRR 17 ... 90

Table of UK statutes

Abortion Act 1967 ... 284, 285

Access to Health Record Act 1990 ... 926

Access to Personal Files Act 1987 ... 923, 924, 926

Administration of Justice Act 1960
- s 12(1) ... 390, 853

Administration of Justice Act 1973
- Sched 5 ... 570

Ancient Monuments and Archaeological Areas Act 1979 ... 687

Anti Social Behaviour Act 2003 ... 660, 672, 701, 706, 788, 854
- s 57 ... 739

Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 ... 203, 211, 1090–94, 1329, 1332, 1334, 1335, 1374, 1407, 1408, 1421–26, 1458, 1466, 1468
- Pt 3 ... 1090, 1091, 1093
- Pt 4 ... 171, 228, 289, 1332, 1363, 1421–39, 1443, 1463, 1465, 1466
- Pt11 ... 1090, 1091, 1093
- s 17 ... 1092
- s 17(2) ... 1092
- s 17(2)(a) ... 1091, 1093
- s 17(2)(b) ... 1091, 1093
- s 17(2)(c) ... 1091, 1092, 1093, 1094
- s 17(2)(d) ... 1091, 1092, 1093, 1094
- s 17(3),(4) ... 1092
- s 17(5) ... 1092, 1093
- s 17(6) ... 1092
- s 18 ... 1093
- ss 21–23 ... 1429, 1432
- s 21 288, 289, 1427, 1433, 1455, 1436
- s 21(1) ... 1426, 1427
- s 21(1)(a), (b) ... 1430
- s 21(2) ... 1426
- s 21(3) ... 1426
- s 21(5) ... 1426
- s 21(8) ... 1429
- s 23 ... 288, 289, 1427, 1433, 1438, 1455, 1436
- s 23(1) ... 1427
- s 23(2) ... 1427
- s 25 ... 1429, 1455
- s 27(9) ... 1430
- s 30 ... 1431
- s 39 ... 781
- s 94 ... 1122
- ss 102, 103 ... 1093
- s 116 ... 1019
- s 117 ... 1412

Appellate Jurisdiction Act 1876 ... 1019, 1398

Armed Forces Act 1996
- ss 21–28 ... 1568

Army Act 1955 ... 100
- s 66 ... 1519

Atomic Energy Act 1946
- s 11 ... 615

Bail Act 1976 774

Banking Act 1987 1249

Broadcasting Act 1981
s 29(3) 302

Broadcasting Act 1990 .... 234, 274, 512, 518, 519, 537
s (2) 550
s 6(1)(a) 179, 516, 535
s 43 546
s 142 839
s 162 .... 509, 520, 524
s 164(2), (4) 498

Broadcasting Act 1996 .... 512, 516, 519, 537, 546, 842, 848
s 89 546
s 106 .... 528, 840
s 107 841
s 119 841

Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1971 s 1(2) 170

Children Act 1989
s 1(1) 856, 972
s 97 853

Children and Young Persons Act 1933
s 39(1) 392, 394, 854, 906
s 49 854
s 53(1) 906

Cinemas Act 1985 .... 551, 561

Cinematograph Act 1909 .... 262, 551, 561

Cinematograph (Amendment) Act 1982... 587

Civil Aviation Act 1942
s 40 994

Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982.... 469, 583, 585
s 57(1) 1215

Civil Partnerships Act 2004 1472

Civil Procedure Act 1997 168

Civil Service Reform Act 1978 591

Companies Act 1985 1251
s 431(5) 1239
s 432(2) 1250
s 437 .... 271, 1239, 1249

Communications Act 2003 .... 206, 208, 214, 296, 315, 511–16, 518, 519, 812, 840
Pt3 516
s 2(1), (2) 520
s 198(1) 520
s 198(2) 521
s 198(5), (6) 521
ss 232–40 .... 520, 546
s 237 520
s 296 511
s 309 511
s 319 .... 209, 514, 520, 521
s 319(c) 511, 523, 524, 533
s 319(1), (2) 522
s 319(2)(a) 522
s 319(2)(f) 522, 523
s 319(2)(g) 209, 210, 518
s 319(4) 522, 523
s 319(4)(f) 523
s 320 511
s 321 .... 209, 210, 533
s 321(2), (3) 209, 518
s 392 520
Sched1 841

Computer Misuse Act 1990 .... 923, 924

Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875
s 7 .... 669, 705

Constitutional Reform Act 2005 257

Consumer Credit Act 1974
s 127(3) 175, 200

Contempt of Court Act 1981 .... 32, 94, 150 183, 330, 334–363, 394, 398
s 1 .... 337, 361

s 2 ... 361
s 2(2) ... 339, 340–357, 361, 362
s 2(3) ... 338
s 3 ... 361
s 4(a)-(e) ... 338
s 5 ... 124, 331, 337–361, 362, 674
s 6(c) ... 363
s 8 ... 402
s 10 ... 420
ss 12, 13 ... 338
Sched 1 ... 338

Courts and Legal Services Act 1990
s 71 ... 1080

Crime and Disorder Act 1998
s 1 ... 673, 674, 780, 854, 872
s 1(10) ... 674
s 25 ... 673, 1122
s 28 ... 781
s 31 ... 781

Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 ... 854
s 28 ... 58
s 29 ... 181
s 45 ... 392

Criminal Appeals Act 1968 ... 338
s 2(1) ... 1260

Criminal Appeals Act 1995 ... 1260

Criminal Attempts Act 1981 ... 739
s 1(4) ... 739

Criminal Justice Act 1987 ... 1250
s 2 ... 1249
s 2(4) ... 999

Criminal Justice Act 1988
ss 23, 25, 26 ... 1294
s 93D(6) ... 1349
s 99 ... 1217
s 139 ... 1114
s 160 ... 476, 478, 481

Criminal Justice Act 1991
s 33(2) ... 202
s 34 ... 58
s 37(4) ... 202
s 39 ... 202

Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001 ... 673, 1090, 1099, 1129, 1255, 1256, 1310, 1323
Pt 2 ... 442
s 41 ... 872
s 42 ... 780, 787
s 50 ... 441, 442, 1003, 1255
s 50(1),(2) ... 1003
s 51 ... 1255
s 51(1)–(2) ... 1129
ss 52-61 ... 442
s 54 ... 442
s 55 ... 442
s 60 ... 442
s 61 ... 442
s 62 ... 442
s 62(4) ... 442
s 73 ... 1160, 1166, 1172
s 76 ... 1204
Sched1 ... 1003

Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 ... 118, 119, 123, 159, 669, 670, 701, 710, 738, 1101, 1104, 1111, 1113, 130, 1137, 1186, 1189–91, 1209, 1236, 1239, 1244, 1249, 1250, 1255, 1284, 1323, 1325, 1364, 1366
s 34, 36, 37 ... 1205, 1209, 1213, 1235, 1238, 1239, 1241–43, 1247, 1327
s 34–37 ... 1189, 1212, 1235
s 34 ... 1238, 1239, 1240, 1242, 1244, 1247, 1248
s 34(1) ... 1237
s 34(1)(A) ... 1241
s 34(2)(a) ... 1200
s 34(2)(d) ... 1212
s 34(2A) ... 1212–15, 1241, 1242
s 36–37 ... 1189, 1205, 1212, 1213, 1235, 1242
s 38(3) ... 1238, 1241
s 60 ... 758, 1104, 1122, 1124, 1126, 1133, 1134

s 60(4), (5) ... 1138
s 60AA ... 758, 1125
s 61 ... 748, 749
s 68 ... 672, 697, 748, 780, 1057, 1327
s 68(1) ... 744
s 68(2) ... 744, 745
s 68(3) ... 744
s 69 ... 673, 688, 697, 748, 749
s 71 ... 1327
s 80(5(b) ... 1184
s 81(1) ... 1118
s 82 ... 1369, 1409
s 84 ... 478, 556
s 90 ... 562
s 142 ... 393, 851
s 143 ... 82
s 143–148 ... 556
s 146 ... 1513, 1520
s 154 ... 780, 785
s 163 ... 1068, 1073
s 168 ... 583

Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998 ... 1250, 1365–69
s 5 ... 1367
s 20(1) ... 1367

Criminal Law Act 1967 ... 1140, 1143
s 3 ... 735, 744, 745, 1162

Criminal Law Act 1977
s 1A ... 1367
s 5(3) ... 482
s 53 ... 472
s 62 ... 1188, 1208

Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996 ... 1075
s 3(4) ... 1048
ss 37, 38 58(4) ... 852

Customs and Excise Management Act 1979
s 49 ... 479

Data Protection Act 1984 ... 139, 150, 627, 921, 922–923
s 5 ... 922
ss 10, 11, 21, 22, 24 ... 923
Sched 1 ... 922

Data Protection Act 1998 ... 624, 640, 804, 810, 812, 813, 824, 831, 847, 848, 867, 881, 888, 889, 890, 901, 911, 920–937, 1021, 1064, 1093
s 1(1) ... 927, 929
s 2 ... 928
s 3 ... 937
s 6(6) ... 936
s 7 ... 930
s 10 ... 930, 932, 933
s 13 ... 935
s 17 ... 929
s 17(1) ... 929
s 17(3) ... 929
s 21(1) ... 935
s 23(1) ... 929
s 32 ... 935
s 32(1)-(4) ... 932, 933
s 32(3) ... 834
s 40(1) ... 935
s 42 ... 935
s 43 ... 935
s 47 ... 935
s 48 ... 936
s 49 ... 936
s 49(6) ... 936
Sched 1 ... 928, 929
Sched 2 ... 929, 930, 931
Sched 3 ... 929, 931, 934
Sched 8 ... 934
Sched 9 ... 93

Disability Discrimination Act 1995 ... 1481, 1485, 1511–13, 1526, 1536, 1537, 1547–58, 1563–65, 1574, 1575, 1577, 1588, 1593, 1595, 1599
Pts 2–4 ... 1597
s 1(1) ... 1512
s 2(1) ... 1512
s 3A(1) ... 1547, 1548

s 3A(2) ... 1551
s 3A(3) ... 1548
s 3A(5) ... 1536
s 3A(6) ... 1552
s 4 ... 1563
s 4A(1) ... 1551
s 4A(3) ... 1552
s 5 ... 1550
s 5(3) ... 1549
s 5(5) ... 1550
s 5A ... 1597
s 6 ... 1550, 1551
s 6(3) ... 1551
s 17A(1)(c) ... 1537, 1548
s 17A(3) ... 1588
s 18B(1) ... 1552
s 18B(2) ... 1553
s 19 ... 1512, 1553, 1554
s 20(4) ... 1549
s 21 ... 1554
s 21B ... 1554
s 21F ... 1553
s 22 ... 1512
s 25(9) ... 1548
s 28A ... 1513
s 28A(3) ... 1513
s 28B(6), (7) ... 1549
s 28C ... 1554
s 28C(2), (3) ... 1555
s 28R ... 1513
s 28R(6)(c) ... 1513
s 28T ... 1554
s 28T(2) ... 1555
s 53A ... 1555, 1595
s 55 ... 1563
s 58 ... 1561
s 71 ... 1511

Disability Discrimination Act 2005 ... 1536
s 12 ... 1553

Drug Trafficking Offences
Act 1986 ... 67, 558

Education Act 1996 ... 75

Education (No 2) Act 1986 ... 74
s 43 ... 679, 733

Employment Act 2002 ... 1492

Employment Appeals Tribunals Act 1996
s 10 ... 1031

Employment Rights Act
1996 ... 1484, 1521
s 71 ... 1506
s 71(1) ... 1506
s 72(1) ... 1506
s 73 ... 1506
s 73(1) ... 1506
s 99 ... 1491, 1529
s 193 ... 1031

Employment Rights Act 1999
Sched 8 ... 1031

Equality Act 2006 ... 1482
Pt 2 ... 1482
Pt 3 ... 293, 1482, 1515, 1596, 1602
s 81 ... 1522

European Communities Act 1972 ... 152
s 2(4) ... 153, 154, 1479, 1486

Financial Services Act 1968
s 177 ... 1249
s 178 ... 1249

Football Spectators Act 1989
s 14A, 14B ... 791

Freedom of Information
Act 2000 ... 217, 590, 591, 627, 628, 630–658, 921, 1021, 1385
s 1(1)(b) ... 634, 639
s 1(3) ... 650
s 2 ... 637, 653
ss 3-6 ... 633
s 3 ... 632
s 3(1)(b) ... 633
s 4 ... 1040
s 4(1)-(3) ... 632, 633
s 5 ... 63
s 7(1),(3) ... 633
s 8 ... 650
s 9 ... 650
s 10(1) ... 650
s 12 ... 640

s 14 ... 640
s 16 ... 650
s 19 ... 654
s 19(1)(a) ... 654
s 20 ... 654
s 21 ... 635
s 21(2)(a) ... 639
s 22 ... 647
s 23(1) ... 639, 650
s 26 ... 648
s 27 ... 648
s 28 ... 648, 649
s 29 ... 648
s 30(1) ... 641, 643, 644, 649
s 31 ... 641, 642, 642, 649
s 31(2) ... 647, 648
s 32 ... 649
s 33 ... 648, 649
s 34 ... 639
s 35 ... 635, 641, 646, 649
s 35(1) ... 644
s 35(2) ... 645
s 36 ... 644, 649
s 37 ... 647
s 37(1)(a) ... 649
s 37(1)(b) ... 649
s 38 ... 648
s 40(1) ... 640
s 41 ... 640
s 42 ... 647, 649
s 43 ... 648, 649
s 43(1) ... 647
s 50 ... 652
s 50(1) ... 652
s 52(1) ... 652
s 52(2) ... 652
s 53(1) ... 653
s 56 ... 652
s 57(2),(3) ... 653
s 58(1) ... 653
s 59 ... 653
s 63(1) ... 649
s 64(1) ... 649
Sched 1 ... 233, 632
Sched 2 ... 652
Sched 3 ... 652

Friendly Societies Act 1992 ... 1249

Further and Higher Education Act 1992 ... 1524

Gender Recognition Act 2004 ... 836, 1569

Government of Wales Act 1988
s 107(1) ... 213
Sched2 ... 213

Highways Act 1980 ... 734, 735, 736, 798
s 137 ... 679, 734, 735, 798
s 137(1) ... 716
s 258 ... 667

Human Rights Act 1998 ... 1–4, 15, 20, 40, 77, 114, 116, 119, 122, 129, 131–34, 136, 142, 145, 148, 156, 157–298, 299, 306, 308, 312, 314, 315, 318, 319, 337, 350, 351, 352, 366, 376, 377, 380, 395, 399, 400, 415, 419, 422–24, 437, 448, 450, 452, 462, 464, 475, 480, 487, 492, 493, 501, 505, 510, 517, 531, 533, 538, 543, 545, 549, 558, 566, 567, 568, 569, 582, 588, 596, 600, 606, 615, 617, 619, 632, 661, 662, 671, 675, 678, 692, 693, 695, 696, 702, 708, 709, 712, 720, 721, 726, 728, 730, 734, 735, 743, 749, 752, 771, 774, 778, 781, 790, 795, 799, 800, 801, 804, 807, 810, 812, 813, 817, 824, 827, 828, 831, 832, 834, 846, 847, 850, 858, 860, 863, 865–67, 875, 876, 881, 893, 896, 903, 904, 909, 916, 918, 928, 935–37, 959, 980, 984, 985, 99193, 995, 1001, 1012, 1021, 1024, 1025, 1028, 1030, 1032, 1034, 1042, 1046, 1052, 1054, 1059, 1068, 1084, 1086, 1087, 1093, 1097, 1098–1100, 1102, 1104, 1105, 1126, 1129, 1130, 1134, 1141, 1150, 1152, 1155–57, 1164, 1168, 1169, 1177, 1180, 1181, 1190, 1207, 1208, 1210, 1234, 1249, 1252, 1256, 1261, 1263, 1265, 1267, 1287–90, 1292, 1293, 1302, 1303, 1307, 1309, 1310, 1316, 1325–27, 1335, 1337, 1341, 1349, 1361, 1369, 1401, 1414, 1424, 1431, 1438, 1448, 1460–65, 1474, 1479, 1484–86, 1510, 1515, 1516, 1518–20, 1526, 1566, 1569

s 1(2)....169, 170

s 1(4)....165

s 2....165, 169, 191, 192, 193, 207, 214, 257, 264, 279, 330, 255, 356, 360, 376, 492, 501, 682, 746, 761, 762, 824, 829, 848, 959, 990, 1046, 1179, 1267, 1307, 1338, 1521

s 2(1)....193, 829, 954, 1435

s 3....2, 130, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 176, 180, 191–199, 201, 202, 208, 211, 213, 214, 216, 237, 249, 251, 255, 257, 261, 280, 281, 284, 285, 95, 296, 297, 312, 330, 337, 365, 360, 363, 400, 402, 403, 404, 408, 420, 445, 446, 501, 505, 543, 567, 596, 603, 604, 607, 608, 614, 617, 680, 702, 721, 722, 727, 730, 733, 736, 737, 741, 747, 750, 799, 804, 847, 848, 871, 872, 895, 935, 936, 037, 938, 986, 987, 1024, 1051, 1078, 1085, 1088, 1128, 1129, 1163, 1213, 1261, 1305, 1307, 1336, 1337, 1340, 1349, 1350, 1352, 1345, 1370, 1390, 1394, 1396, 1398, 1408, 1409, 1419, 1443, 1448, 1461, 1484, 1486, 1505, 1518–20, 1525, 1526, 1571, 1572

s 3(1)....171, 176, 177, 178, 206, 215, 224, 355, 360, 389, 415, 420, 440, 444, 445, 531, 537, 538, 541, 544, 545, 568, 728, 747, 748, 858, 860, 862, 864, 959, 1094, 1256, 1571, 1432, 1433

s 3(2)....164, 171, 199, 437, 1433

s 3(2)(a)....172

s 3(2)(b)....171

s 3(2)(c)....171, 296, 1254

s 4....16, 171, 175, 185 186, 187, 199–204, 214, 280, 281, 284, 296, 400, 531, 535, 537, 538, 959, 1051, 1052, 1094, 1431, 1432

s 4(1)....199

s 4(2)....199, 200, 1447

s 4(4)....199

s 4(5)....200, 202

s 4(6)....201

s 5(1)....200

s 5(2)....200, 204

s 6....164, 165, 170, 193, 198, 212, 218, 221, 222, 224, 226, 227, 231, 236, 237, 238, 239, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 264, 274, 275, 278, 281, 283, 296, 297, 330, 332, 333, 366, 378, 388, 420, 437, 438, 445, 446, 448, 480, 492, 501, 515, 516, 531, 543, 567, 584, 607, 617, 619, 622, 632, 633, 661, 680, 700, 701, 706,

720, 722, 729, 730, 736, 749, 750, 752, 760, 762, 764, 797, 799, 808, 824, 825, 836, 837, 848, 849, 850, 864, 866, 867, 871, 872, 875, 878, 905, 937, 938, 958, 981, 989, 991, 1007, 1030, 1047, 1048, 1075, 1076, 1078, 1080, 1084, 1085, 1086, 1087, 1093, 1139, 1157, 1179, 1181, 1251, 1252, 1259–61, 1263, 1265, 1270, 1277, 1294, 1302, 1305–10, 1318, 1336, 1337, 1341, 1355, 1370, 1386, 1396, 1397, 1454, 1455, 1484, 1485, 1519, 1521, 1569

ss 6–9 229

s 6(1) 15, 215, 216, 231, 237, 254, 281, 530, 567, 825, 858, 959, 963,

s 6(1)(a) 700

s 6(2) 164, 216, 296, 314, 581, 1094, 1259, 1307

s 6(2)(a) 216

s 6(2)(b) 216, 1088, 1261, 1352

s 6(3)(a) 217, 954

s 6(3)(b) 217, 227, 228, 229, 233, 248, 530

s 6(5) 216

s 6(6) 215

s 7 ..... 165, 237, 295, 867, 905, 982, 991, 1081, 1089, 1445, 1179, 1180, 1258, 1260, 1308, 1397, 1405

s 7(1) 237, 237–239, 493, 1163, 1398

s 7(1)(a) 234, 235, 236, 238, 239, 241, 531, 544, 567, 581, 700, 701, 749, 808, 825, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 876, 981, 1008, 1051, 1055, 1078, 1079, 1080, 1086, 1089, 1094, 1131, 1180, 1257, 1262, 1304, 1307–09, 1319, 1347, 1398, 1484, 1521, 1521, 1524, 1567, 1569,

s 7(1)(b) 235, 237, 238, 493, 720, 1008, 1047, 1055, 1076, 1134, 1137, 1232, 1258, 1307, 1309

s 7(2) 238

s 7(3) 236, 493

s 7(5) 236, 240

s 7(7) 235, 237, 295, 701

s 7(9) 238

s 8 ..... 165, 400, 401, 847, 849, 981, 991, 1007, 1089, 1131, 1137, 1179, 1180, 1257, 1258, 1260, 1306, 1309

s 8(1) 241, 400, 401

s 8(2) 241

s 8(3) 241, 244

s 8(4) 242, 1309

s 9(3) 59

s 10 ..... 201, 202, 204–206, 214, 296, 1438

s 10(2) 204

s 11 ..... 116, 1309

s 12 ..... 213, 237, 252, 253, 300, 475, 622, 623, 624, 674, 795, 834, 847, 865, 871, 872, 875, 890, 902, 910, 930, 938, 950, 952, 956, 958, 981, 985, 986, 987, 1096

s 12(1) 795, 895, 952, 985, 987

s 12(2) 212, 617, 795

s 12(3) 212, 378, 379, 617, 622, 938, 952, 955, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990

s 12(4) 212, 213, 252, 253, 254, 378, 567, 617, 619, 624, 795, 860, 886, 892, 895, 905, 909, 938, 952, 957, 958, 959, 985, 987

s 12(4)(a)(i) 887, 895, 928,

s 12(4)(b) 833, 834, 848, 905, 938

s 12(5) 212

s 13 ..... 207, 220

s 14 ... 1425
s 14(1)(a) ... 1168
s 15 ... 1359
s 16 ... 1425
s 19 ... 16, 171, 207, 214, 296, 505, 518, 545, 1250
s 19(1)(a) ... 206, 207, 210, 1337, 1369
s 19(1)(b) ... 206, 210, 214
s 19(a)
s 20 ... 204
s 21 ... 213
s 21(1) ... 199, 216
s 22(4)(b) ... 239
Sched 1 ... 165, 166, 169, 229, 558, 1119, 1187, 1400, 1448, 1486
Sched 2 ... 205
Sched 3 ... ???

Immigration Act 1971
ss 3–3B 1427
Sched 3 ... 1424

Indecent Displays (Control) Act 1981 ... 478, 483, 587
s 1(1), (2) ... 478
s 1(4) ... 479

Insolvency Act 1986
s 236 ... 1249
s 433 ... 1249

Intelligence Services Act 1994 ... 124, 159, 999, 1010, 1029, 1040, 1054, 1075, 1078, 1080, 1090, 1097, 1098
s 1(1), (2) ... 1013
s 3(2) ... 1013
s 5 ... 1016, 1059, 1061, 1066
s 5(2) ... 1016
s 6 ... 1016
s 9 ... 607
s 10 ... 1014

Interception of Communications Act 1985 ... 73, 114, 123, 615, 1010, 1017, 1022, 1032–1034, 1040, 1041, 1044, 1046, 1049, 1052, 1054, 1055, 1057, 1061, 1065, 1079, 1085, 1089
s 1 ... 1038, 1048, 1050
s 1(1) ... 1048, 1049
s 1(2) ... 1038
ss 2–5 ... 1042
s 2(1) ... 1034
s 2(2) ... 1034, 1049
s 2(3), (5) ... 1035
s 4(5), (6) ... 1036
s 6(3) ... 1049
s 7 ... 1040
s 7(3), (4) ... 1040
s 7(5) ... 1084
s 7(8) ... 1051
s 8 ... 1036
s 8(1)(a) ... 1039
s 8(3) ... 1039
s 9 ... 1040, 1048, 1049, 1050, 1051, 1082, 1253
s 9(1) ... 1399
s 9(1)(a) ... 1050
s 11(7) ... 1048
s 19 ... 1048

Justices of the Peace Act 1361 ... 686, 750

Justices of the Peace Act 1968 ... 750

Knives Act 1997
s 7 ... 1122

Local Government (Access to Information) Act 1985 ... 627

Local Government Act 1972 Pt VA ... 627

Local Government Act 1986
s 2A ... 1524

Local Government Act 1988
s 17 ... 1576
s 28 ... 1524

Local Government Act 2000
s 104 ... 1524

Local Government Act 2003
s 122 ... 1524

Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982 ... 469, 587

Magistrates' Courts Act 1980
s 69(2) ... 853

Medical Reports Act 1988 ... 925

Mental Health Act 1983 ... 245
s 73 ... 201, 202, 205
s 74 ... 202
Pt VII ... 391

Metropolitan Police Act 1839
s 54(13) ... 1521

Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 ... 178
s 23 ... 996, 999
s 28 ... 1349
s 33 ... 1114

National Assistance Act 1948 ... 224
s 21 ... 223
s 26 ... 226

National Heritage Act 1983 ... 687

Northern Ireland Act 1998 ... 1083, 1084
s 90 ... 1031

Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978
s 7(1) ... 1350
s 11 ... 1152

Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1987 ... 1240

Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1991
s 28 ... 1382

Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996 ... 1117, 1331, 1364

Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1998 ... 1364, 1366

Obscene Publications Act 1959 ... 94, 464, 465, 469, 479, 481, 482, 483, 485, 509, 524, 526, 550, 552, 553, 560, 563, 583, 585, 586
s 1 ... 509, 550
s 2 ... 466
s 2(1) ... 469
s 2(5) ... 1349
s 4 ... 124, 454, 674

Obscene Publications Act 1964
s 1(1),(2) ... 469
s 1(3) ... 1349

Offences Against the Person Act 1861 ... 1415
s 4 ... 1417, 1419
s 18 ... 1415
s 23 ... 1415
s 24 ... 1415
s 28 ... 1415
s 29 ... 1415

Official Secrets Act 1889 ... 522
s 1 ... 596

Official Secrets Act 1911 ... 592, 602, 614
s 1 ... 592, 602, 603, 615
s 2 ... 592–595, 613, 614

Official Secrets Act 1989 ... 595–616
s 1–4 ... 596, 603
s 1 ... 1203
s 1(1) ... 596, 597, 600, 603, 605, 606, 607, 608, 610–616
s 1(3) ... 598, 599, 600, 603, 604, 605, 613, 614
s 1(4) ... 599
s 1(4)(a) ... 599
s 1(5) ... 1349
s 1(9) ... 608
s 2 ... 600, 601, 613
s 2(1) ... 603, 604
s 2(2) ... 600, 613
s 2(2)(b), (c) ... 601

s 2(3) ... 1349, 1343
s 2(4) ... 600, 1353
s 3 ... 603, 604, 613
s 3(1) ... 601
s 3(1)(a) ... 601
s 3(1)(b) ... 601, 603, 604, 605, 613, 614
s 3(2) ... 601
s 3(2)(b) ... 601
s 3(3) ... 601, 602
s 3(5) ... 601
s 3(4) ... 1349
s 3(6) ... 601
s 4 ... 602, 603, 607, 608, 613
s 4(1) ... 603, 606, 607, 608, 611, 612
s 4(2) ... 600, 602, 606
s 4(2)(a) ... 606
s 4(2)(b) ... 606
s 4(3) ... 603, 605, 614, 615
s 4(4) ... 606, 1349
s 4(5) ... 1349
s 4(6) ... 602
s 5 ... 596, 604, 613
s 5(1) ... 596, 507
s 5(1)(a)(i), (iii) ... 602
s 5(1)(b)(ii) ... 602
s 5(6) ... 603
s 6 ... 607
s 6(1) ... 603
s 6(2) ... 604
s 6(3) ... 604
s 6(4) ... 604
s 6(5) ... 604
s 7 ... 604, 605
s 7(3) ... 607
s 12 ... 607, 608

Parks Regulation (Amendment) Act 1926 ... 68, 686, Parliament Act 1911 ... 82

s 2 ... 120

Police Act 1964
s 47 ... 100
s 48 ... 1309
s 51 ... 1108
s 51(3) ... 1109, 1117

Police Act 1976 ... 1311

Police Act 1977 ... 1324

Police Act 1996 ... 1311
Pt III ... 1056
Pt IV ... 1311
s 67(2) ... 1311
s 70 ... 1311
s 72 ... 1311
s 75(3) ... 1311
s 83 ... 1311
s 86 ... 1108
s 89 ... 1149
s 89(1) ... 1109, 1117, 1137, 1139
s 89(2) ... 1111, 1137, 1139

Police Act 1997 ... 118, 119, 120, 998, 1054
ss 17, 18 ... 998
s 91(1) ... 998, 1057, 1058
s 93(2) ... 998, 1056, 1057
s 93(4) ... 998, 1056
s 93(5) ... 1057
s 94 ... 1057
s 94(2) ... 998
s 95(1) ... 1057
s 97 ... 1058
s 97(2) ... 1057
s 97(2)(b) ... 1058
s 97(3) ... 1058
s 98 ... 1058
s 99 ... 1058
s 102 ... 1040
Sched 5 ... 1000
Sched 9 ... 1013

Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 ... 76, 119, 120, 194, 440–442, 762, 898, 996–997, 999, 1001, 1003, 1004, 1005, 1007, 1067, 1097, 1103–21, 1137–41, 1143, 1151, 1152, 1154, 1158, 1161, 1163, 1165–68, 1171, 1172, 1179, 1187, 1188–1210, 1215, 1216, 1220, 1226, 1232, 1234, 1236, 1254, 1255, 1256–58, 1262, 1263, 1265, 1267, 1268, 1279–1300, 1303, 1304, 1310, 1317, 1318, 1320, 1323–5

Pts I–IV ... 1107
Pt II ... 441
Pt IV ... 1165, 1171, 1303
Pt V ... 1166, 1171, 1188
s 1 ... 1113, 1117, 1119, 112, 1128, 1130, 1132
s 1(1) ... 1113, 1114
s 1(1)(a), (b) ... 1114
s 1(2) ... 1113, 1123
s 1(4) ... 1114
s 2 ... 1114, 1130, 1138
s 2(1) ... 1129
s 2(3) ... 1130
s 3 ... 1114, 1129, 1130, 1138
s 4 ... 1113, 1114
s 8 ... 998
s 8(1) ... 441, 1002
s 8(1)(c) ... 998
s 8(1)(d) ... 441
s 8(2) ... 1001
s 9 ... 441, 447, 1002
s 9(2) ... 441
s 10 ... 1003
s 10(2) ... 1003
s 11 ... 441, 1002
s 14 ... 441, 1002
s 15 ... 998
s 15(5A) ... 998
s 15(3),(6) ... 998
s 16 ... 998, 999
s 16(5)(b), (c) ... 998, 999
s 16(8) ... 999
s 17 ... 996, 997, 1000, 1114
s 17(1)(c) ... 676
s 17(5),(6) ... 1000
s 18 ... 996, 997, 1114, 1138
s 18(4) ... 1005
s 19 ... 999, 1001
s 22(1) ... 1001, 1002
s 22(2)(a) ... 1002
s 24 (now repealed and replaced by new s 24) ... 1256
s 24 ... 679, 1122, 1131, 1143–45, 1150, 1155, 1167, 1303
s 24(1)(a) ... 1131
s 24(1)(b) ... 1144
s 24(1)(c) ... 1131, 1144
s 24(1)(d) ... 1131, 1144
s 24(1)(e) ... 1131
s 24(2) ... 1144
s 24(3)(a) ... 1144
s 24(4)(a) ... 1155
s 24(5) ... 1144–46
s 24(5)(a) ... 1155
s 24(5)(e), (f) ... 1145
s 24(6) ... 1153
s 25(7)(a) ... 1155
s 24 ... 1217, 125
s 24A ... 1145
s 25 ... 1145, 1146
s 28 ... 1149, 1158, 1160, 1161
s 29 ... 1162
s 30 ... 1197, 1200
s 30(1) ... 1200, 1201
s 32 ... 997
s 32(1) ... 1181
s 32(2) ... 1181
s 32(2)(b) ... 997
s 36 ... 1171
s 36(1) ... 1171
s 37 ... 1165, 1166, 1172
s 37(2) ... 1187
s 37(3) ... 1165
s 38 ... 1166, 1172
s 40 ... 1166
s 40(1)(b) ... 1166, 1172
s 40A ... 1166
s 41 ... 1165
s 42(1) ... 1165
s 43(1) ... 1166
s 44 ... 1166
s 45A ... 1166, 1172
s 45A(4) ... 1166
s 51(d) ... 1167
s 54 ... 1181
s 55 ... 1179, 1181

s 56 .... 1189, 1192
s 58 .... 1189, 1218, 1255, 1282, 1286, 1309
s 58(8) 1216–18
s 58(6)(b) 1217
s 58(8A)–(8B) 1217
s 60 .... 1203, 1203
s 60A 1204
s 62 .... 1183, 1184
s 63 .... 1183, 1184
s 64 1290
s 65 1184
s 66 1103
s 67(8) 1187, 1311
s 67(10) 1107, 1304, 1308
s 67(11) 1108, 1138
s 76 .... 1199, 1206, 1275–78, 1287, 1289, 1290, 1300
s 76(2) 1271, 1275, 1276
s 76(2)(a) 1204, 1206, 1269–75, 1346, 1462
s 76(2)(b) 1272–75, 1300
s 76(4) 1253, 1293
s 76(8) 1206, 1271
s 77 .... 1300, 1301
s 78 .... 120, 1049, 1051, 1077, 1089, 1107, 1138, 1199, 1214, 1251, 1272, 1275–1300
s 82(3) 1287, 1300
s 84(4), (5) 1311
s 87(4) (repealed and replaced by new s 87(4)) ... 1311
s 94(2) 998
s 105(4) (repealed and replaced by new s 105(4)) . 1311
s 116 1165
s 117 .... 1128, 1158, 1162, 1163, 1179
Sched 1 .. 441, 44, 446, 447, 448, 1002
Sched 7 1002

Police and Magistrates' Court Act 1994
s 37(f) 1189

Police Reform Act 2002 .... 1172, 1311, 1313, 1123–1321
Pt 2 1314
Sched 3 1314
s 12 1321

Police (Scotland) Act 1967
s 1 1037

Post Office Act 1953 477
s 58 1033
s 58(1) 1033

Postal Services Act 2000
s 85 479

Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005 .... 3, 179, 205, 1099, 1100, 1329, 1332, 1335, 1354, 1362, 1374, 1422, 1438–52, 146,
ss 1–9 1438
s 1(1) 1440
s 1(3) 1441
s 1(9) 1441, 1442, 1449
s 2 1442
s 2(1)(a), (b) 1445
s 2(4) 1442
s 3 .... 1447, 1448, 1449
s 3(1) 1445
s 3(1)(a) 145
s 3(2), (3) 1445
s 3(5), (6) 1445
s 3(10) 1445, 1447, 1449, 1450, 1452
s 3(11) 1445
s 3(12) 1452, 1453
s 3(13) 1447
s 4 .... 1442, 1444
s 4(3) 1444
s 4(7) 1444
s 4(8) 1443
s 7 1442
s 8 1440
s 8(2) 1439
s 8(4) 1440
s 11(2) 179, 1445, 1448
s 13(2) 1439
s 25 1455
Sched 1451

Prevention of Terrorism (Additional Powers) Act 1996 119

Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 ... 443, 1118, 1122, 1219, 1334
s 12 ... 57
s 13A(4) ... 1118
s 13B(3) ... 1118
s 14 ... 1121, 1146, 1167
s 14(1) ... 1121
s 14(1)(b) ... 1147, 1148
s 14(4) ... 1167, 1169
s 14(5) ... 1167
s 15(3),(4) ... 1121
s 16 ... 1121
s 16A ... 272
s 16B ... 444
s 20 ... 1148, 1149
s 51(1) ... 1000
Sched 5 ... 1121, 1170
Sched 6A ... 997
Sched 7 ... 442, 999

Protection from Harassment Act 1997 ... 234, 673, 691, 780, 813, 824, 863, 866, 869, 870–872
s 1 ... 674, 870
s 1(1)(c) ... 87
s 2 ... 870
s 3 ... 871
s 7(3),(4) ... 871

Protection of Children Act 1978 ... 556, 557, 567, 568, 569, 586
s 1 ... 447, 585, 586
s 7(6) ... 556

Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998 .. 409, 591

Public Order Act 1936 ... 497, 669, 701
s 1 ... 676
s 2 ... 399
s 2(1)(a) ... 400
s 2(1)(b) ... 399, 400
s 2(6) ... 677
s 3 ... 669, 704, 707, 708
s 3(1) ... 661
s 3(3) ... 709
s 55 ... 710, 772, 783, 787

Public Order Act 1986 ... 125, 502, 503, 669, 672, 673, 674, 701, 707, 708, 709, 1417
Pt I ... 676
Pt II ... 676
Pt III ... 497, 502, 505, 573
s 1 ... 676, 677
s 2 ... 676, 677
s 3 ... 676, 677
s 3A ... 502
s 4 ... 676
s 4A ... 507, 676
s 4A(3)(c) ... 674
s 5 ... 507, 676, 1141, 1521
s 5(3)(c) ... 674
ss 11-14A ... 676
s 11 ... 674, 702, 704, 709, 764, 1149
s 11(1),(2) ... 702
s 11(4)–(6) ... 702
s 11(7) ... 765
s 11(7)–(9) ... 703
s 12 ... 673, 674, 702, 704–706, 707, 708, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 728, 729, 764, 1149
ss 12-14A ... 720, 722, 725
ss l2-14 ... 721
s 12(1) ... 723
s 12(1)(a) ... 704
s 12(1)(b) ... 705
s 12(4) ... 707
s 12(5) ... 707
s 12(6) ... 707
s 13 ... 675, 692, 700, 702, 709, 710, 720, 725, 729, 730
s 13(1) ... 708, 729
s 13(5) ... 708
s 13(7) ... 708
s 13(8) ... 708
s 13(10) ... 708

s 14 ....673, 674 679, 706–707, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 728, 729, 764, 1149
s 14(1) 706
s 14(4) 707
s 14(5) 707
s 14(6) 707
s 14(7) 707
s 14A 673, 697, 700, 709, 710–722, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729
s 14A(1) 710, 712
s 14A(4) 710
s 14A(5) 710, 711, 712, 727, 728
s 14B 727
s 14B(5) 727
s 14B(7) 727
s 14C 673, 697, 710
s 16 676
s 18 503
s 18(4) 1349
s 19 503
s 19(2) 1349
s 20 .... 503, 573
s 20(2) 1349
s 21 .... 503, 573
s 21(3) 1349
s 22 503
s 22(3)–(5) 1349
s 23 573
s 29A-29G 502–505
s 29B 505
s 29J 504, 505
s 54A 507

Public Records Act 1958 .... 303, 627, 628, 632

Race Relations Act 1965 1562
s 6 497

Race Relations Act 1968 1562

Race Relations Act 1976 .... 224, 496, 502, 1126, 1134, 1136, 1137, 1208, 1312, 1316, 1481, 1484, 1507–11, 1521, 1527, 1547, 1548, 1556, 1562, 1563, 1565, 1657, 1569, 1574, 1577, 1588, 1593, 1600
s 1(1)(a) 1535, 1558, 1562, 1565
s 1(1)(b) 1545–7, 1549
s 1(1A) 1544, 1545
s 2 1563
s 3A 1559
s 4 .... 1556, 1557
s 4A 1570, 1586
s 17 1557
s 19B 1509
s 20 1508
s 32 1561
ss 35-38 1575
s 37 1575
s 41(1) 1569
s 42 1569
ss 48-50 1594
s 53 1509
s 54(a)–54ZA 1536
s 56(1)(b) 1558
s 57(1), (3) 1586
s 69(2)(b) 1569
s 7lD 1578
s 71(2)–(4) 1597
s 75 1505

Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000 .... 1125, 1126, 1208, 1509, 1577, 1594
s 7 1569

Race Relations Remedies Act 1994 1589

Racial and Religious Hatred Act 2005 .... 502, 573

Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 .... 120, 124, 199, 207, 604, 810, 993, 995, 1010, 1012, 1034–1053, 1054, 1058, 1059, 1324, 1397, 1399
Pt I 1034, 1042, 1044, 1046, 1050, 1052, 1055, 1061, 1072, 1075

Pt II ... 1038, 1054, 1055, 1056, 1057, 1058–1065, 1066, 1067, 1068, 1069, 1071, 1072, 1074, 1075, 1076, 1078, 1079, 1082
Pt IV ... 1078
s 1 ... 1038, 1039, 1047, 1076
s 1(1),(2) ... 1044
s 1(3) ... 1039
s 1(5)(c) ... 1048
s 1(6) ... 1038
s 2 ... 598
ss 2–5 ... 1039, 1084
s 2(1) ... 1034
s 2(3) ... 1035
s 3 ... 1037, 1038, 1044, 1050
s 3(2) ... 1037, 1038
s 4 ... 1037, 1038
s 4(1) ... 1048
s 4(2) ... 1038
s 5(2)-(5) ... 1035
s 5(3) ... 1034, 1044
s 5(3)(a), (c) ... 1036
s 5(5) ... 1034
s 6(2) ... 1037
s 7(1), (2) ... 1035
s 7(1)(a) ... 1051
s 8(1) ... 1037
s 8(7) ... 1035
s 9(6) ... 1036
s 11(4), (5) ... 1037
s 11(7) ... 1037, 1052
s 11(8) ... 1052
s 15 ... 1038
s 15(4)(d) ... 1048
s 16(1) ... 1048
s 17 ... 1047, 1050, 1052, 1075, 1081, 1085
s 17(1) ... 1048, 1051
s 17(1)(b) ... 1048
s 17(2) ... 1047, 1048
s 17(4) ... 1048
s 18 ... 1048, 1050, 1051
s 18(1) ... 1048
s 18(1)(f) ... 1398
s 18(4) ... 1048, 1050
s 18(6)–(8) ... 1048
s 18(9) ... 1048, 1052
s 18(9)(b) ... 1051
s 18(10) ... 1051
s 19 ... 1052
s 19(4) ... 1081
s 19(4a) ... 1081
s 21(4) ... 1039
s 26 ... 1038
s 26(2) ... 1062
s 26(3) ... 1060
s 26(4)(b) ... 1062
s 26(5) ... 1062
s 27(2) ... 1078
s 28 ... 1063
s 28(2) ... 1063
s 28(3) ... 1073
s 30 ... 1063
s 30(2) ... 1063
s 32(2) ... 1061
s 32(3) ... 1060, 1073
s 32(3a) ... 1063
s 32(3)(c) ... 1063
s 32(6) ... 1061
s 33 ... 1061
s 34 ... 1061
s 34(4) ... 1061
s 35 ... 1061
s 36 ... 1061
s 37 ... 1061, 1064
s 41 ... 1061
s 42 ... 1061
s 43 ... 1061, 1063
s 43(3)(a) ... 1061, 1063
s 43(3)(b) ... 1063
s 43(3)(c) ... 1063
s 44(3) ... 1061
s 44(5)(a) ... 1063
s 47 ... 1062, 1064
s 47(1), (2) ... 1062
s 48(1) ... 1060
s 48(4) ... 1062
s 48(7) ... 1060
s 48(7)(b) ... 1060
s 49 ... 1039
s 57 ... 1038
s 57(2) ... 1039
s 57(2)(a) ... 1039

s 57(8) ... 1036
s 58 ... 1039
s 58(1) ... 1039
s 58(6), (7) ... 1040
s 58(7) ... 1040
s 62 ... 1063, 1065
s 65 ... 607, 1040, 1051, 1068, 1076, 1079
s 65(2) ... 238, 1051, 1079, 1080
s 65(2a) ... 1078, 1083, 1084, 1085
s 65(2)(b) ... 1085
s 65(2c) ... 1082, 1085
s 65(2d) ... 1082, 1085
s 65(3) ... 1079, 1081, 1082
s 65(4) ... 1082
s 65(5) ... 1079, 1081
s 65(6) ... 1079, 1082
s 65(7),(8) ... 1082
s 66(3) ... 1082
s 67(3)(b) ... 1082
s 67(5) ... 1081
s 67(7) ... 1084
s 67(8) ... 1051, 1085
s 67(9) ... 1085
s 68(4) ... 1083
s 68(6), (7) ... 1083
s 69 ... 1085, 1088
s 69(2)(h) ... 1084
s 70(2)(c) ... 1079
s 71 ... 1066, 1068
s 71(3)(a) ... 1062, 1077
s 72(2) ... 1067
s 78(1) ... 1037
s 81(2) ... 1060
s 81(3) ... 1034, 1044, 1060
s 81(7) ... 1035
Sched 1 ... 1063
Sched 4 ... 1065, 1081

Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 ... 889

Rent Act 1977 ... 1525
Sched1 ... 180, 282, 1525

Representation of the People Act 1983
s 76 ... 183
ss 95, 96 ... 678, 733
s 97 ... 680

Road Traffic Act 1988 ... 1122, 1163, 1252
s 163 ... 1122, 1163
s 172 ... 271, 1249, 1252

School Standards and Framework Act 1998 ... 47
s 131 ... 75

Scotland Act 1998 ... 459
s 29(2)(b) ... 213
s 29(2)(d) ... 213
s 57 ... 213
Sched 5 ... 213

Security Services Act 1989 ... 614, 1022, 1028, 1080
s 1 ... 1013
s 1(1) ... 1013
s 1(3) ... 1013
s 1(4) ... 1013
s 5 ... 607

Security Services Act 1996
s 1 ... 1013
s 134(1) ... 1013

Seditious Meetings Act 1817
s 3 ... 679

Serious and Organised Crime Act 2005 ... 3, 672, 702, 996, 1099, 1104, 1411
s 110 ... 1144, 1256
s 111 ... 1145
s 113(4) ... 998
ss 132–138 ... 673, 701, 730
Sched7 ... 1217

Sex Discrimination Act 1975 ... 982, 1481, 1484, 1488–93, 1497, 1498, 1504–06, 1508, 1510, 1511, 1514, 1515–19, 1521, 1529, 1535, 1545, 1548, 1556, 1558, 1563, 1565–67, 1569, 1574, 1575, 1588, 1589, 1593, 1600

s 1 ... 1517
s 1(1) ... 1529
s 1(1)(a) ... 1565
s 1(1)(b) ... 1538–40, 1545, 1549
s 1(1)(1)(a) ... 1565
s 1(1A) ... 1545
s 1(2) ... 1538, 1541
s 1(2)(b) ... 1540, 1541–3
s 2A ... 1504, 1505, 1534
s 2A(1) ... 1534
s 3(1)(a) ... 1534
s 3A ... 1505, 1506, 1529
s 3A(1) ... 1505
s 3A(2) ... 1506
s 4 ... 1563
s 4(1) ... 1561, 1562, 1564
s 4A ... 1559
s 5(3) ... 1518, 1529, 1534
s 6 ... 1505
s 6(6)(b) ... 1556
s 7 ... 1568
s 7(1)(a) ... 1518
s 7(2) ... 1568
s 7(2)(a), (b), (g) ... 1568
s 7A ... 1568, 1569
s 7B ... 1569
s 22 ... 1505
s 29 ... 1505
ss 41, 42 ... 1586
s 42A ... 1574
s 48 ... 1575
s 53(1) ... 1599
s 56A(10) ... 1587
s 63A ... 1528, 1586
s 65(1)(b) ... 1588
s 65(1B) ... 1589
s 66(1) ... 1588
s 66A ... 1528, 1586
s 74(2) ... 1587
s 74(2) ... 1587

Sex Disqualification (Removal) Act 1919 ... 1487

Sexual Offences Act 1956 ... 479
s 13 ... 480
s 30(2) ... 1349

Sexual Offences Act 1967
s 1 ... 82, 556
s 1(5) ... 1519
s 2 ... 1519
s 4(1)(a) ... 851

Sexual Offences Act 2003 ... 477, 555, 556
s 45(2) ... 556
s 51 ... 556

Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976
s 4(1)(a) ... 393

Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1992
s 1(1) ... 393, 851

Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 2000
s 1 ... 81, 82, 556

Special Education Needs and Disability Discrimination Act 2001 ... 1593

Special Immigration Appeals Act 1997
s 1 ... 1083

Suicide Act 1961
s 2 ... 78

Supreme Court Act 1981
s 31 ... 329
s 69 ... 1085

Terrorism Act 2000 ... 3, 120, 124, 199, 207, 208, 442–444, 446, 671, 672, 673, 698, 997, 1007, 1013, 1099, 1104, 1106, 1111, 1118, 1121, 1128, 1130–50, 1158, 1162, 1163, 1165, 1167–71, 1183, 1184, 1191, 1193, 1198, 1201, 1204, 1207, 1210, 1216, 1218–20, 1225, 1251, 1250–55, 1278, 1293–95, 1304, 1310, 1311, 1316, 1318, 1324, 1325, 1329–32, 1334, 1335–38, 1345–49, 1352–55, 1363, 1364, 1368–75, 1377–84, 1386–90, 1392, 1394, 1397, 1398–1402, 1404–15, 1420, 1422, 1426–29, 1439, 1442, 1463–65, 1467, 1468

s 1 ....671, 1117, 1148, 1149, 1204, 1334, 1347, 1357, 1370, 1377, 1378, 1381, 1382–87, 1389, 1392, 1395, 1405–8, 1411, 1414, 1420, 1439, 1442, 1465
s 1(1) 671, 698, 1011, 1426
s 1(2) 1420
s 1(3)(b) 1420
s 1(5) 1396
s 2(1)(a) 1385
s 3 ....1383, 1385, 1386, 1388, 1392, 1395, 1404
s 3(1) 1383
s 3(3) 1383
s 3(3)(b) 1397
s 3(4) 674, 1383, 1384
s 3(5) 674, 1384
s 4 1397
s 4(3) 1397
s 5 1397
s 5(3) 1397
s 5A-5C 1384
s 6 1399
s 7 1399
s 9 ....1397, 1398
s 10 1397
s 11 ....178, 1146, 1347, 1389, 1394
s 11(1), (2) 178, 1353, 1389–92
s 11(3) 178
s 12 ....1146, 1347, 1395,
s 12(1) 1427
s 12(2) 1393
s 12(2)(c) 1393
s 12(3)(a) 1393
s 12(4) 1393, 1394
s 13 .... 1347, 1393, 1394
s 13A 1118, 1123
s 13A(8) 1118
s 14 1396
ss l5–18 ....1146, 1396, 1412, 1414
s 15 1396
s 16 1396
s 16A 1353
s 17 1396
s 18 ....1347, 1396
s 19 ....444, 1347, 1396, 1412–14
s 20 1378
s 21A 1413, 1414
s 21A(5) 1413
s 21B 1413
s 28 1410
ss 33-36 997
s 38B 1412, 1413
s 40(l)(a) 1146, 1147, 1149
s 40(1)(b) 1146–48, 1149
s 41 ....1111, 1146, 1147–50, 1161, 1168–70, 1204, 1255, 1334, 1410
s 41(4)-(7) 1169
s 41(4) 1170
s 41(5) 1170
s 41(6) 1170
ss 43–47 1117
s 43 ....1115, 1124, 1117, 1121, 1133
ss 44-47 1119
ss 44-46 1118
s 44 ....1104, 1113, 1117–21, 1123–26, 1133–35, 1407
s 44(3) 1117
s 45(1)(a), (b) 1118
s 46(1)-(7) 1119
s 47 1119
s 54 .... 1411, 1146, 1411
ss 56-63 1146
s 56 ....1347, 1407, 1408, 1415
s 57 .... 1347, 1353, 1409
s 58 1347
s 58(1) 444, 1347, 1415
s 59 ....1415, 1416
s 59(1) 1415, 1428
s 59(2) 1415, 1416
s 59(3) 1415
s 60 ....1415, 1416

s 61 ... 1413, 1416
s 82 ... 1146
s 83 ... 1146
s 89 ... 1254
s 89(2) ... 1251, 1254
s 96 ... 1137
s 98 ... 1137
s 99 ... 1130
s 101 ... 1130
s 114 ... 1158, 1162, 1163
s 114(2) ... 1128
s 116(2) ... 1117
s 117 ... 1370
s 118 ... 1352–54, 1393, 1394, 1414, 1415
s 118(1) ... 1352
s 118(2) ... 1352, 1352
Sched 2 ... 1383, 1386
Sched 3 ... 1397, 1398
Sched 5 ... 442, 443, 996, 997, 1000, 1002, 1253
Sched 7 ... 1122, 1130, 1169, 1171, 1204
Sched 8 ... 1169, 1170, 1183, 1184, 1201, 1210, 1218, 1219, 1225, 1255
Sched 12 ... 1304, 1305
Sched 14 ... 1130, 1137, 1138

Terrorism Act 2006 ... 3, 672, 1099, 1104, 1168, 1327, 1329, 1331, 1332, 1335, 1338, 1354, 1355, 1364, 1384, 1392, 1393, 1406, 1407, 1410, 1416, 1465,
s 1 ... 1149, 1347, 1460
s 5 ... 1149, 1460
s 6 ... 1411
ss 8–12 ... 1411
s 34 ... 1377

Theatres Act 1968 ... 470, 503
s 3 ... 472, 554

Theft Act 1968
ss 12, ... 1114

Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974 ... 99

Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Act 1993
ss 23–25 ... 1529
Scheds 2, 3 ... 1529

Treason Act 1814 ... 592

Video Recordings Act 1984 ... 233, 469, 551, 553, 562–566
s 2(2) ... 562, 563
s 4 ... 562, 566
s 4(1) ... 490
s 4(1)(a) ... 552
s 4(3) ... 563
s 4A ... 562, 566
s 9–11 ... 563

Work and Families Act 2006 ... 1489, 1492

Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999
s 25 ... 852
s 34 ... 188
s 41 ... 260, 408
s 41(3)(c) ... 175, 189
s 44 ... 392, 854
s 48 ... 393, 851
s 58 ... 1212, 1213, 1241, 1277
Sched 2 ... 392, 854

Table of UK statutory instruments

Access to Health Records (Control of Access) Regulations 1993 (S1 1993/746) 925

Access to Personal Files (Social Services) (Amendment) Regulations 1991 (S1 1991/1587) 925

Access to Personal Files (Social Services) Regulations 1989 (SI 1989/206) 925

Civil Procedure Rules 239, 428
- Pt 24 428
- Pt 39 739

Community Charge (Administration and Enforcement) Regulations 789

Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1988 (SI 1988/ 1987/NI/20) 1235, Data Protection (Subject Access Modifications) Health Order 1987 (SI1987/1903) 921

Disability Discrimination Act 1995 (Commencement No 9) Order 2001 (SI 2001/2030)
- Art 3a 1513, 1550

Disability Discrimination Act 1995 (Commencement No 1) Order 2005 (SI 2005.2676)
- arts 3, 4 1577

Disability Discrimination Act 1995 (Commencement No 2) Order 2005 (SI 2005/2774) 1513
- Art 3 1577
- art 4 ....1554, 1577

Disability Discrimination (Guidance and Code of Practice) (SI 1996/ 1996) 1511

Disability Discrimination (Private Clubs, etc) Regulations 2005 (SI 2005/3258) 1513

Disability Discrimination (Questions and Replies) Order (SI 1996/2793) 1511

Disability Discrimination (Services and Premises) Regulations (SI 1996/1836).... 1511

Employment Equality (Sexual Orientation) Regulations 2003 (SI 2003/1660) 1522, 1597
- reg 2(1) 1522
- regs 29, 32 1588

Equality Act 2006 (Commencement No 1) Order 2006 (SI 2006/1082)....293
- Art 4 1577

Human Rights Act (Amendment) Order 2001 (SI 2001 / 1216) 111

Human Rights Act 1998 (Commencement) Order 1998 (SI 1998/2882) 208

Human Rights Act 1998 (Designated Derogation) Order 2001 (SI 2001/3644) 1425

Investigatory Powers Tribunal Rules 2000 (S1 2000/2665)......... 1083
r2 1083
r9(2)..........1083
r9(3)..........1083
r9(4)..........1083
r9(6)..........1083

Local Government for England (Community Charge and Council Tax, Administration and Enforcement) Regulations 1995 (SI 1995/247)
reg 4l 789

Magistrates' Courts (Sex Offender and Anti-Social Behaviour Orders) Rules 1998 681

Official Secrets Act 1989 (Prescription)(Amendment) Order 1993 (S11993/847).......... 607

Official Secrets Act 1989 (Prescription) Order 1990 (SI 1990/200) 607

Parental Leave and Maternity etc Regulations 1999 (SI 1999/3312) 1491

Part-Time Workers (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) Regulations 2000 (SI 2000/1551) 1490

PACE Code of Practice A 1997 (SI1997/1159) 1116

Police (Conduct) Regulations 1999 1314

Police (Conduct) Regulations 2004 (SI 2004/845) 1314

Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (Prescription of Offices, Ranks and Positions) Order 2000 (SI 2000/2417) 1063

Rules of the Supreme Court Ord 1085

Satellite Television Service Regulations 1997 (SI 1997/1682).......... 546

Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 (Designated Area) Order 2005 (SI 2005/1537) 732

Sex Discrimination (Gender Reassignment) Regulations 1999 (SI 1999/1102) 1505

Sex Discrimination (Indirect Discrimination and Burden of Proof) Regulations 2001 (SI 2001/2660).......... 1482, 1538, 1542

Sex Discrimination and Equal Pay (Remedies) Regulations 1993 (SI 1993/2798) 1589

Sexual Orientation Regulations 2003 (SI 2003/1661) 1477, 1482, 1514, 1515, 1517, 1522–24
Reg 2(1) 1522
Reg 6 1522–24
Reg 30(2) 1589

Special Immigration Appeals Commission (Procedure) Rules 1998 (SI 1998/1881) 1430

Special Immigration Appeals Commission (Procedure) (Amendment) Rules 2000 (SI 2000/1849)............................. 1430

Television Broadcasting Regulations 1998 (SI 1998/3196) 546

Terrorism Act 2000 (Proscribed Organisations) (Amendment) Order 2001 (SI 2001/1261) 1386, 1387

Terrorism Act 2000 (Proscribed Organisations) (Amendment) Order 2002 (SI 2001/2724) 1387

Terrorism Act 2000 (Proscribed Organisations) (Amendment) Order 2001 (SI 2005/2892) 1387

Trafalgar Square Regulations 1952 (S1952/776) 68,676,686

Working Time Regulations 1998 (SI 1998/1833) 1489

Table of national legislation from other jurisdictions

Austria

Austrian Criminal Code-
Arts 284, 285 679

Australia

Security Service Intelligence Organisation Amendment Act 1986 118

Canada

Access to Information Act 1982 630

Bill of Rights 1960 170

Charter of Rights and Freedoms 1982 .... 147, 190, 260, 261, 285, 320, 1438

Criminal Code 189, 260, 285, 818, 1071

Freedom of Information Act 1967 630

Protection of Privacy Act 1974 803

Security Intelligence Service Act 1984 s2 1016

Denmark

Code of Criminal Procedure 1036
Art 1261 1057
Art 126m 1063

France

Civil Code
Art 1382 803

Germany

Basic Law 153, 161
Art 1 305
Art 8 665
Art 10 803

Civil Code
s823(1) 803

Criminal Code
s184(3) 471
s24(1) 683

New Zealand

Bill of Rights 1990 .... 120, 170, 182, 192, 625
s6 173
s14 462

South Africa

Bill of Rights 168
Art 34(1) 1235

USA

Bill of Rights 148, 149, 155, 162, 167
Art V 155

First Amendment 300, 307, 309, 311, 320, 456, 462, 491, 493,

494, 511, 581, 582, 626, 660, 665, 682, 718, 874, 890, 956, 969

Fourth Amendment 995, 1071, 1135

Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act 1016, 1018

Privacy Act 1974 .... 803, 920

Table of Treaties and Conventions

EC Treaty 1957 ... 1479, 1480, 1485
Art 13 ... 1480
Art 34 ... 1480
Art 119 ... 1480
Art 141 ... 1479, 1480, 1585
Art 157 ... 514

European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment 1987 ... 45, 1360, 1458–60
Art 15 ... 1456, 1457

European Convention for the Protection of Individuals with regard to the Automatic Protection of Data 1980 ... 139, 151, 921

European Convention on the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1951 ... 1, 2, 7, 18, 19, 20, 21, 23, 24, 26, 30, 32–41, 43, 47–50, 52, 53, 55, 59–61, 68–71, 74, 75, 79, 81, 84–86, 88, 91, 97–103, 106–114, 116, 121, 122, 124–29, 132–57, 159–299, 311, 312, 314, 315, 318, 319, 322, 323, 328–30, 334, 336, 337, 352, 355, 360, 363, 372, 374, 376–78, 380, 381, 382, 383, 388, 389, 393, 400, 402, 403, 413, 419, 420, 423, 424, 426, 430, 431, 435, 438, 442, 454, 467, 486, 491–93, 500, 515, 517, 518, 531, 532, 536, 538, 5540, 541, 545, 548, 552, 567, 568, 588, 596, 601, 607, 608, 611, 619, 622, 623, 661, 678, 680, 682, 684, 688, 690–92, 694–97, 699, 701, 712, 714, 715, 718, 719, 721, 722, 726–30, 737, 744, 745–48, 750, 760, 761, 764, 7867, 770, 771, 777, 780, 784, 790, 795, 796, 801, 8893, 804, 808, 814, 815, 817, 824–31, 839, 846–50, 858, 860, 863–85, 875, 905, 906, 908, 915, 920, 936–39, 942–44, 946, 950–58, 962, 963, 970, 973, 977, 980, 981, 995, 986, 989–93, 995, 1006, 1009, 1010, 1015, 1024–27, 1029–31, 1035, 1038, 1042, 1044, 1046–48, 1052, 1054–56, 1059, 1060, 1068, 1070, 1074, 1078–82, 1085, 1086, 1090, 1096–99, 1100, 1105, 1107, 1126, 1129, 131, 1134, 1139, 1148, 1153, 1157, 1161, 1163, 1177, 1179, 1181, 1190, 1207, 1215, 1235, 1250, 1252, 1253, 1256–63, 1265, 1267, 1287,

1290, 1291, 1293,-95, 1302, 1303, 1306–10, 1316, 1319, 1322, 135, 1326, 1329, 1331, 1332, 1335–42, 1347, 1349–52, 1355–61, 1369, 1370, 1382, 1383, 1386, 1387, 1391, 1398–410, 1418, 1422, 1429, 1431, 1432, 1435, 1436, 1439, 1442, 1443, 1448, 1449, 1454–56, 1459, 1460, 1462, 1463, 145–68, 1472, 1478, 1479, 1482–47, 1511, 1514–19, 1572
Art 1....134, 135, 165, 197, 905
Arts 2–18....167
Arts 2-14....19, 29
Arts 2-12....165
Arts 2-7....18, 273
Arts 2–4....27
Art 2....27, 37, 39–45, 46, 48, 49, 77, 79, 80, 103, 110, 159, 207, 247, 253, 284, 285, 294, 295, 907, 912, 943, 952, 953, 970, 987, 989, 1163, 1175, 1302, 1307, 1322, 1424
Art 2(1)....79, 1581, 1582
Art 2(2)....1579, 1580, 1583
Art 2(3)....1579, 1580
Art 2(4)....1579, 1581–84
Art 3....37, 43, 45–50, 74, 75, 76, 77, 79, 103, 108, 110, 162, 166, 168, 187, 194, 195, 253, 267, 284, 288, 295, 300, 408, 434, 907, 912, 943, 952, 953, 970, 987, 989, 1174–80, 1206, 1207, 1256, 1269, 1293–95, 1301, 1302, 1306–09, 1322, 1339, 1341, 1345–47, 1358–63, 1422–24, 1427, 1429, 1453, 1454, 1456, 1457, 1462, 1520, 1567
Art 4....50–51, 295, 300, 943
Art 4(1)....51, 110, 1424
Art 4(2)....51
Art 5....19, 50, 51–59, 68, 111, 201, 205, 208, 211, 214, 238, 246, 269, 290, 295, 680, 748, 752, 763, 764, 768, 769, 770, 771, 1009, 1107, 1121, 1128, 1131, 1132, 1134, 1135–37, 1139, 1146, 1149, 1153, 1155, 1157, 1164, 1166, 1187, 1256, 1295, 1306–08, 1332, 1337, 1362, 1363, 1407, 1422, 1425, 1431–33, 1435, 1437–39, 1441–43, 1449, 1451, 1453, 1460, 1466, 1484
Art 5(1)....52, 55, 202, 205, 269, 763, 765, 1120, 1121, 1131, 1133, 136, 1147, 1163, 1164, 1308, 1424, 1425, 1432, 1451, 1452
Art 5(1)(a)....1131, 132
Art 5(1)(b)....759, 771, 1120, 1121, 1132, 1133
Art 5(1)(c)....54, 57, 759, 765, 766, 768, 769, 771, 1132, 1148–50, 1152, 1153, 1155, 1157, 1308
Art 5(1)(d)....54
Art 5(1)(e)....764
Art 5(1)(f)....55, 1423, 1424
Art 5(2)....1160, 1161, 1163
Art 5(2)....56
Art 5(3)....57, 58, 59, 63, 1161, 1163, 1167–70
Art 5(4)....55, 58, 59, 202, 205, 243, 244, 1163, 1341, 1342, 1454–57, 1460
Art 5(5)....59, 1309
Art 6....19, 50, 58, 59–66, 104, 166, 168, 170, 175–77, 179, 186–89, 192, 193, 196, 200, 204, 242, 244,

245, 246, 260, 261, 271, 274, 284, 316, 317, 319, 321, 322, 324, 327, 328–34, 355–57, 362, 382–84, 388, 393, 394, 400, 401, 408, 417, 475, 789–93, 795, 926, 943, 1030, 1031, 1050–52, 1077, 1085–88, 1090, 1100, 1131, 1139, 1187, 1188, 1193, 1200, 1202, 1210, 1212–15, 1219, 1221, 1225, 1232, 1235, 1239, 1240, 1243, 1244, 1246, 1248, 1249, 1251, 1252, 1256–62, 1267, 1278, 1279, 1291–95, 1298, 1302, 1303, 1307, 1309, 1318, 1319, 1321, 1337, 1339, 1340, 1344–46, 1348, 1354, 1363, 1381, 1399, 1400, 1407, 1410, 1430, 1448–51, 1455, 1457, 1461, 1462, 1484, 1486, 1521, 1567

Art 6(1)....58, 59–62, 65, 176, 190, 245, 270, 272, 295, 323, 324, 326, 328, 392, 402, 406, 789, 790, 792, 970, 971, 972, 1050, 1051, 1076, 1086, 1087, 1135, 1210, 1211, 1226, 1235, 1239–41, 1249, 1252–54, 1259–61, 1270, 1271, 1277, 1291–94, 1309, 1319–21, 1338–43, 1345, 1347, 1400, 1410, 1447, 1461, 1462, 1464

Art 6(2)....64, 65, 110, 178, 272, 273, 295, 323, 326, 327, 790, 792, 794, 1235, 1239–41, 1252, 1254, 1259, 1260, 1281, 1341, 1342, 1347–54, 1390–92, 1409, 1410, 1413, 1414, 1454

Art 6(3)....63, 64, 295, 790, 792, 1087, 1259, 1278, 1319

Art 6(3)(a), (b)....65

Art 6(3)(c)....62, 65, 1210, 1211, 1213, 1240, 1262, 1277, 1281, 1309

Art 6(3)(d)....66, 791, 794, 1320

Art7....19, 50, 66–68, 110, 202, 295, 300, 486, 493, 558, 943, 1359, 1424

Art 7(1)....66

Art 7(2)....67, 493

Arts 8-11....18, 36, 62, 68, 110, 212, 272, 286, 300, 943, 944, 956

Arts 8-12....18, 44, 295

Art8....49, 69–91, 94, 103, 107, 108, 175, 177, 179, 180, 187, 188–90, 195–97, 221, 223, 224, 227–29, 234, 241, 242, 247, 249, 250, 252–55, 260, 261, 268, 270, 277, 282, 284, 285, 294, 317, 383, 393, 394, 408, 425, 430, 431–35, 437–40, 446, 447, 449, 493, 513, 598, 697, 698, 776, 788, 795, 802, 804, 806, 808, 812–14, 816–39, 845–51, 858, 860, 861, 863–67, 871, 872, 875, 876, 878, 879, 883, 884, 892, 895, 898, 902, 907–11, 914–18, 924, 925, 930, 932, 935, 936–39, 944–54, 957–92, 995, 1007–1010, 1021, 1025–31, 1033, 1036, 1042–45, 1047, 1052, 1054, 1055, 1056, 1058, 1059, 1060, 1064, 1067–78, 1079, 1086, 1090, 1093, 1094, 1096–98, 1108, 1131, 1160, 1176, 1177, 1179–81, 1207, 1208, 1289, 1290, 1292, 1294, 1295, 1301, 1302, 1306–08, 1324, 1326, 1342, 1363, 1399, 1401, 1431, 1454, 1483, 1484, 1514, 1518–21, 1524–26, 1569, 1571, 1572

Art 8(1)........................77, 194, 248, 269, 813, 834, 864, 905, 945, 955, 962, 963, 1025, 1026, 1027, 1042, 1043, 1069, 1071, 1073, 1178, 1339, 1341
Art 8(2)........................69, 72, 75, 78, 82, 194, 248, 277, 433, 437, 905, 925, 947, 948, 958, 963, 1008, 1009, 1025, 1028, 1029, 1033, 1035, 1044, 1073, 1075, 1076, 1088, 1092, 1093, 1094, 1136, 1160, 1178, 1181, 1207, 1339, 1351, 1571
Arts 9-11........................72
Art 9........................77, 91, 94, 95, 211, 212, 220, 275, 299, 312, 328, 486, 487, 488, 490, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 505, 531, 865, 944
Art 9(1)........................78, 486
Art 9(2)........................69, 91, 275, 1351
Art 10........................14, 33, 36, 37, 70, 75, 91, 92–96, 111, 125, 126, 130, 137, 152, 179, 195, 203, 209–12, 234, 250, 252, 254, 255, 269, 274, 278, 284, 287, 288, 299, 300, 303, 310, 312, 314, 317–19, 321, 322, 324–34, 335–40, 347, 351–53, 357, 358, 360, 362, 363, 366, 368, 370, 372, 374, 377–84, 386–89, 391, 393–95, 398, 400, 402–15, 419, 420, 422–24, 427–31, 433–35, 437–40, 443, 444–48, 451, 453, 463, 464, 466, 467, 475, 476, 480, 483, 485–90, 494, 496, 497, 500, 501, 505–07, 513, 515, 531, 533, 535, 537–39, 541, 542, 544, 545, 548, 549, 564, 567–71, 581, 584, 590, 596–600, 603, 607–09, 612, 614, 617, 619–21, 623–26, 641, 661–63, 671, 677, 678, 680–750, 755, 757, 760, 761, 769, 770, 771, 775–79, 783–85, 787–89, 792, 794–801, 813, 816, 824, 830, 834, 837, 845, 851, 858–62, 864–66, 870, 872, 878, 883, 884, 890, 895, 905, 906, 909, 914, 916–18, 924, 925, 930, 932, 935–39, 942–51, 954, 957–92, 1338, 1342, 1355, 1357, 1382, 1386, 1389, 1391, 1395, 1396, 1401, 1402, 1404, 1405, 1407, 1413, 1414, 1419, 1420, 1441, 1454, 1484, 1521
Art 10(1)........................94, 269, 336, 347, 463, 464, 466, 467, 469, 500, 532, 541, 542, 907, 947, 952, 955, 958, 962, 987
Art 10(2)........................69, 72, 252, 253, 277, 309, 310, 328, 329, 336, 353, 360, 366, 377, 378, 382, 387, 400, 408, 413, 414, 415, 418, 420, 421, 425, 433, 435, 437, 443, 452, 463–66, 475–484, 485, 486, 489–500, 531, 532, 535, 541–43, 548, 549, 569, 584, 588, 609, 611, 686, 760, 775, 776, 783, 858, 859, 905, 907, 909, 944, 947, 952, 954, 955, 958, 963, 977, 987, 1339, 1351, 1363
Art 11........................94, 96–102, 111, 287, 288, 312, 661–63, 677, 678, 680–750, 753, 755, 757, 760, 761, 769, 770, 771, 775, 777, 779, 785, 788, 789, 792, 794–801, 1027, 1355–57, 1382, 1386, 1389, 1396, 1401, 1402, 1404, 1405, 1407, 1408, 1441, 1454, 1484

Art 11(2).............69, 99, 101, 102, 277, 686, 728, 760, 775, 776, 1339, 1352, 1357
Art 12..........................18, 86, 87, 102–04
Arts 13-21 25
Art 13...........30, 86, 101, 102, 106–09, 165, 197, 203, 819, 839, 936, 1007, 1029, 1031, 1087, 1088, 1089, 1090, 1094, 1134, 1179, 1180, 1319, 1320, 1343, 1400, 1451, 1486, 1520
Art 14...........................48, 68, 77, 78, 82, 86, 87, 94, 108–10, 111, 165, 166, 167, 180, 190, 203, 205, 260, 268, 282, 284, 294, 295, 487, 492, 567, 784, 958, 1028, 1099, 1134–37, 1139, 1175, 1207, 1301, 1302, 1306, 1308, 1332, 1337, 1401, 1420, 1432–34, 1436–38, 1479, 1482–86, 1514, 1519, 1521, 1524–26, 1567, 1571, 1572
Art 14(1)..1526
Art 15...................29, 110–11, 135, 190, 211, 1167, 1168, 1359, 1362, 1363, 1424, 1425, 1431–33, 1443, 1445
Art 15(1)...............1095, 1431, 1434–37
Art 15(2)..12, 40
Art 15(3)...1424
Arts 16-18...165
Art l6.......................................111–112
Art 17..................30, 91, 110, 112, 167, 500, 506, 784, 1336, 1357, 1382, 1401
Arts l9-56...23
Arts l9-51 23
Arts 19-24...24
Art 19 21
Art 20...24
Alt 21..24
Art 22...23
Art 24 (old)..26
Art 25....................................26, 1068
Art 25 (old)..26
Art 26..................................191, 254
Art 26 (old)...................... 23, 26, 27, 30, 32, 219, 234, 235, 236
Art 27...25
Art 27(b) (old).....................................29
Art 27(2)..............................191, 254
Art 27(2) (old)............................28, 31
Art 27(3) (old).....................................30
Art 28...28
Art 29(old)..32
Art 29(1)...28
Art 31 ....191, 254
Art 32 25
Art 32 (old)..25
Art 32(2)(b)..29
Art 33 26
Art 34 ....23, 26, 27, 32, 219, 234, 235, 236
Art 34 (old)..23
Art 35.......................................28, 30
Art 35(1)...28
Art 35(1)(b)..29
Art 35(3).....................................28, 31
Art 36(1)...30
Art 36 (old)..23
Art 37(1)...32
Arts 38-43 (old)....................................24
Art 38 (old)..24
Art 38(1)(a)..32
Art38(1)(b)...31
Art 40..................................25, 392
Art 4l.......................34, 242, 245, 246
Art 43 ....25, 34
Art 43 (old)..24
Art 44...34
Art 44 (old)..23
Art 45 (old)..25
Art 46...............................34, 191, 254
Art 48 (old)..................................23, 32
Art 50...59
Art 50...246
Art 52 (old)...............................34, 242
Art 55 33

Art 57 .... 110, 112, 1359
Art 58 1359
Art 59 34
Art 64 29

Protocol 1 .... 19, 27, 29, 104, 112, 167
Arts 1-3 165
Art 1 .... 104, 107, 175, 176, 200, 295, 719, 1355, 1363, 1402
Art 2 .... 75, 105, 1524
Art 3 .... 105, 106, 295

Protocol 2 21

Protocol 3 21

Protocol 4 .... 19, 104, 106, 165,
Art 2 .... 52, 1120,

Protocol 5 21

Protocol 6 .... 19, 27, 29, 43, 104, 1427
Art 1 .... 106, 165, 295
Art 2 .... 106, 165, 295

Protocol 7 .... 19, 104, 106, 165

Protocol 8 21

Protocol 9 .... 21, 23

Protocol 10 21

Protocol 11 .... 20–7, 32, 33, 35, 106

Protocol 12 .... 104, 106, 1486

Protocol 13 .... 19, 104, 165

Protocol 12 104

Protocol 14 .... 20, 21, 27, 35

European Court of Human Rights Rules of Court
r4 24
r22(1) 25
r23 25
r25(1) 25
r42(2) 32
rr49(2), (3)(b) 28
r51 33
r53(2) 28
r53(3) 31

European Social Charter 1961 .... 19, 138, 169

EU Charter of Fundamental Rights 138, 169

EU Draft Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters 1998
Art 16 1035

Hague-Visby Rules 152

ILO Freedom of Association Convention 1947 37

International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 1235, 1359, 1425

International Covenant on Economic Social and Cultural Rights 1966 .... 19, 100, 1511

International Covenant on Economic Social and Cultural Rights 1511

International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination 1511

Treaty of Amsterdam 1997 (see also EC Treaty) 138, 1486, 1585
Art 6a 1515

Treaty on European Union 1992 (Maastricht Treaty) 1992 138
Art F1 138
Art F2 138

Treaty of Nice 2000 138

Treaty of Rome (see EC Treaty)

United Nations Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 29

United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment 1984 .... 45, 1359

United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women 1979
Art 4(1) 1582

United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child 392

United Nations Convention on the Status of Refugees 1951 49
Art 32, 33 1423

Universal Declaration of Human Rights .. 17, 167
Art 10 94
Art 18 495

Table of EC legislation

Directive 75/117/EEC Equal Pay 151, 1480, 1494, 1502, 1516, 1531, 1018, 1026, 1054, 1055
Art 119 1019

Directive 76/207/ EEC Equal Treatment 139, 1480, 1482, 1486 1504, 1505, 1515, 1516, 1518, 1543, 1568, 1569, 1572, 1579, 1581, 1582, 1589
Art 1(1) 1585
Art 2(2) 1568, 1569, 1585
Art 2(4) 1585
Art 2(6) 1568
Art 2(7) 1568

Directive 86/378/EEC Social Security Schemes 1480

Directive 89/552/EEC Transfrontier Television 513, 526, 546–48
Art 2a 547
Art 2a(2)
Arts 2(1), (2), 3(2) 546
Art 22(1) 526, 547

Directive 92/85/EC Pregnancy and Maternity 1480, 1529, 1532

Directive 93/104/EC Working Time 1489

Directive 95/46/EC Data Protection 926, 936, 937, 1073
Art 6 926

Directive 96/34/EC Part-Time Workers 1490

Directive 96/97/EC Social Security Schemes (Amendment) 1480

Directive 97/80/EC Burden of Proof 1480, 1482, 1538, 1542, 1545, 1546, 1587

Directive 98/52/EC Burden of Proof (Amendment) 1480

Directive 2000/43/EC Race Discrimination 1480, 1486, 1510, 1511, 1544–47, 1559, 1570, 1583, 1589, 1599

Directive 2000/78/EC Framework Directive on Equal Opportunities 1480–82, 1486, 1505, 1514, 1522, 1526, 1536, 549, 1551, 1555, 1571, 1582, 1599

Directive 2002/73/EC
Equal Treatment
(Amendment) 1480, 1538

Directive 2002/85/EC;
Directive 2006/24/EC
Communications 1095, 1097

Directive 2004/113/EC
General Sex Equality 1480, 1538

Directive 2006/54/EC
'Equality' 1480

Directive 96/34 Parental Leave 1491

Part I

Theories of rights; legal protection for rights and liberties in the UK

In many Western democracies, the rights of citizens are enshrined in a constitutional document usually known as a Bill or Charter of Rights. As Chapters 1 and 3 will explain, the rights protected under such a constitutional document are often given a special status; in a number of countries they are entrenched. Until the inception of the Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA), the UK had no similar charter of rights. In 2000, the HRA afforded further effect to the European Convention on Human Rights. But even under the HRA, the rights are not entrenched. Traditionally, in order to discover which freedoms are protected and the extent of that protection, it has been necessary to examine the common law, statutes and the influence of treaties to which the UK is a party, especially the European Convention on Human Rights. Civil liberties have traditionally been defined as residual, not entrenched as in other countries.

Traditional judicial reasoning in civil liberties cases quite often consisted merely of a mechanical application of the law deriving from statute and common law precedents; the negative liberty was simply what was left over after the scope of the restrictions had been determined. Often there was an application of common law precedents or a mechanistic approach to statutory interpretation, which was devoid of principle in the sense of recognising that any important issues were at stake requiring a departure from that normal judicial technique. This approach was very marked in freedom of assembly cases. In the first edition of this book it was necessary to confront a mass of common law and statutory restrictions on liberties to consider the width of these restrictions in order to determine the size of the residual area left within which liberty could be exercised.[1] This did not mean that civil liberties were without protection and in the late 1990s, the immediate pre-HRA era, certain common law 'rights' found recognition, as Chapter 3 explains. Thus, it was often said that civil liberties in the UK were in a more precarious position than they were in other democracies, although this did not necessarily mean that they were inevitably less well protected: some Bills of Rights offered only a theoretical protection to freedoms which was not reflected in practice.

Certain particular characteristics of the UK constitution have determined and, under the HRA, are continuing to determine – albeit with some modification – the means of protecting fundamental freedoms in the UK. The doctrine of the supremacy of Parliament means that constitutional law can be changed in the ordinary way – by Act of Parliament. As every student of constitutional law knows, Parliament has the power to abridge freedoms that in other countries are seen as fundamental rights. It follows from this that, aside from EU law, all parts of the law are equal – there is no hierarchy of laws and therefore constitutional law cannot constrain other laws. In general there is no judicial review of Acts of Parliament. If, for example, a statute is passed containing a provision which in some way limits freedom of speech, a judge must apply it, whereas in a country with an entrenched Bill of Rights the provision might be struck down as unconstitutional. As Chapter 4 explains, s 3 HRA has placed pressure on this traditional position, but technically it still subsists. However, where fundamental rights are protected by EU law, which also reflects the principles of the European Convention on Human Rights, they take precedence over statutory provisions due to the supremacy of EU law. Thus if a domestic provision comes into conflict with an EU provision, the judge will decide to 'disapply' it, unless the conflict can be resolved. Thus, parliamentary sovereignty has suffered some limitation. Where EU law does have an impact on fundamental freedoms, it provides a protection which may broadly be said to remove certain freedoms, or aspects of them, from the reach of Parliament, at least while the UK is a member of the EU.

1 See: Gearty, C and Ewing, K Freedom under Thatcher (1990), OUP; Feldman, D Civil Liberties 1st edn, 1993, Clarendon; Gearty, C and Ewing, K The Struggle for Civil Liberties, 2000, Clarendon.

These constitutional arrangements have not been fundamentally changed by the HRA but, as Chapter 4 indicates, they have been placed under pressure. The HRA affected a difficult compromise between protecting parliamentary sovereignty and achieving effective rights protection. Under the HRA, a judge is not able to declare a statutory provision invalid because it conflicts with a Convention right protected by the Act. The Human Rights Act can be modified or repealed in the same way as any other statute.

That is the constitutional background to the HRA. It is still of great significance since it is crucial in the development of civil liberties in this country and because the HRA has been greatly influenced by the domestic constitutional traditions. This Part will seek to show that although the HRA is of immense constitutional significance, it has not brought about a fundamental constitutional transformation. It has afforded the European Convention on Human Rights further effect in domestic law; there are signs that the judiciary are prepared to give a domestic effect to the rights that affords them a broader scope than they are afforded at Strasbourg. Further, although judges cannot strike down legislation under the HRA, they can change it through interpretation, which includes implying 'missing' words into it, or declare the incompatibility. Where they take the latter course, the government, as Chapter 4 shows, normally tends to respond. Thus the HRA is on the way to becoming a Bill of Rights, despite its limitations, which were imposed on it in accordance with British constitutional traditions. This notion of transition from an instrument giving an international instrument domestic effect to something resembling a Bill of Rights forms a main theme in this Part, and indeed in this book as a whole.

Chapter 1 will offer an indication of the theoretical basis of rights and liberties and of the distinction between them, seeking to demonstrate that a shift from liberties to rights has occurred. Chapter 2 will undertake analysis of the Treaty which has been afforded further effect in domestic law and which is tending to act, in effect, as a UK Bill of Rights – the European Convention on Human Rights. Chapter 3 will consider the nature and adequacy of the traditional domestic arrangements which protected fundamental freedoms only as liberties and will consider the extent to which the Convention influenced the domestic protection of civil liberties in the pre-HRA era. Chapter 4 will consider the nature of the instrument that has, in a sense, received the Convention into domestic law – the HRA. It will examine the domestic HRA jurisprudence over the first six years of its life.

The HRA was introduced by the Labour Government in 1997 on the basis that the Convention rights were, finally, to be 'brought home'.[2] There were expectations at that time that the HRA would revive the civil liberties tradition – there was a sense of a break with the erosions of liberty of the past.[3] But in 2000 two major pieces of Labour legislation were passed that in a number of respects were in tension with the Convention rights – the Terrorism Act 2000 and the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000. Then before the HRA had had a chance to gain acceptance among politicians and the British people generally, the world was hit by the devastating 9/11 attacks. As a key aspect of the UK response to the heightened terrorist threat in 2001, only one year after the Act came into force, the Labour Government derogated from one of the most fundamental freedoms – the right to liberty. The derogation and the legislation it covered are discussed in Chapter 14. The legislation passed after the HRA, which is considered in this book, including the Terrorism Act 2000, the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, the Serious and Organised Crime Act 2005 and the Terrorism Act 2006, is in some respects more authoritarian than legislation passed in the pre-HRA years.

Thus, a key aim of this book is to consider the impact which the HRA could have in enhancing the protection for liberty in the face of a range of statutes enhancing state power very significantly. At the same time it will examine the danger that the Convention rights can be minimised and undermined in Parliament and in the courts. There is the possibility that, in Parliament, the rights might become merely empty guarantees which cast a legitimising cloak over rights-abridging legislation and executive action.[4] This book will argue that since the Convention has been received into domestic law, it should be afforded a genuine efficacy, going beyond its interpretation at Strasbourg, since the alternative would be likely to lead to a decrease in state accountability and an obscuring of political discourse as to the nature of state power and countervailing civil rights. In other words, the fact that we now have a document that looks something like a Bill of Rights, in the tradition of other democracies, should not blind us to the traditional concerns of the executive which are especially pressing at the present time. Almost ten years after the introduction of the HRA the Labour Government frequently appears to be uneasy with its own creation. This is largely attributable to the reverses the government has experienced in relation to the anti-terrorism measures it has sought to introduce, some of which have been challenged successfully through the courts, relying on the HRA, as Chapter 14 explains. The perception that the HRA stands in the way of adopting necessary security measures has been disingenuously promoted in the media. In disseminating this and other distorted views of the HRA, the media have not had to attack an instrument that is 'owned' by the British people in the way that Canadians appear to own their Charter or US citizens their Constitution. The idea that the HRA prevents the UK deporting terrorist suspects who risk torture abroad is the driving force behind the current plan of the Conservative Party to introduce a 'British Bill of Rights' – a plan that fails to confront the problem that Britain is bound by the Convention at the international level.[5] So the HRA is under immense pressure at the present time, a time when, ironically, in a number of respects it has shown its ability to change the face of rights-protection in the UK. This is an age in which counter-terrorist and organised crime concerns dominate the political agenda, and when the need for an instrument that can curb executive tendencies to introduce in response hasty, over-broad rights-abridging measures is especially pressing. These concerns are also currently encouraging the Prime Minister, Gordon Brown, to explore the idea of introducing a 'British Bill of Rights' and repealing the HRA.[6]

2 See Bringing Rights Home: Labour's plans to incorporate the ECHR into UK Law: A Consultation Paper, December 1996 (1997) and the White Paper, Rights Brought Home, Cm 3782, October 1997; see also Straw, J and Boateng, P (1997) 1 EHRR 71.

3 See Cooke, Lord, 'The British embracement of human rights' (1999) EHRLR 243; Feldman, D, 'The Human Rights Act and constitutional principles' (1999) 19(2) LS 165.

4 This danger was pointed out by Gearty, CA, in 'Terrorism and human rights: a case study in impending legal realities' (1999) 19(3) LS 367, p 379.

5 See Chap 14 pp 1358–61 for discussion of this point.

6 Gordon Brown indicated this in his inaugural speech as Prime Minister on 24 June 2007. See further below p 156.

Chapter 1

The nature of rights and liberties

This book is intended to provide an analysis of the legal protection given to civil liberties in the UK.[1] The term 'civil liberties' will be used to denote the broad class of rights often referred to as civil and political rights as they are recognised in the UK.[2] In order to provide a coherent analysis, a theoretical position will be outlined from which to mount an internally consistent critique of the state of civil liberties and human rights in the UK today. This chapter will therefore aim to outline such a position in order to provide an account of a method of deriving rights from more general political theory and criticisms of this derivation; consideration of the nature of these rights and of methods of resolving conflicts between individual rights and the claims of society; and analysis of what we may be requiring of others when we assert a right or liberty.[3] Broadly, the position adopted will tend to reflect the particular brand of political liberalism expounded by John Rawls and Ronald Dworkin, in so far as their theories converge. Perhaps it should be noted at this point that the liberal conception of rights which will be discussed differs significantly from the tradition

1 Texts referred to throughout this book: Bailey, SH, Harris, DJ and Jones, BL, Civil Liberties: Cases and Materials, 5th edn, 2002, OUP; Feldman, D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 2002, OUP; Whitty, N, Murphy, T and Livingstone, S, Civil Liberties Law, 2001, LexisNexis UK; Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G; Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act, 2006, OUP; Fenwick, H, Civil Rights: New Labour, Freedom and the Human Rights Act, 2000, Longman; Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, The Law of Human Rights, 2nd edn 2006, OUP, Chapter 16; Robertson, G, Freedom, the Individual and the Law, 7th edn, 1993, Penguin (for background); Ewing, KD and Gearty, CA, Freedom Under Thatcher, 1990; Thornton, P, Decade of Decline: Civil Liberties in the Thatcher Years, 1989, Civil Liberties Trust (for background); Klug, F, Starmer, K and Weir, S, The Three Pillars of Liberty: Political Rights and Freedoms in the UK, 1996, Routledge; Gordon, R and Wilmot-Smith, R (eds), Human Rights in the UK, 1997, OUP; Lord Lester of Herne Hill and Pannick, D, Human Rights Law and Practice, 2000, Butterworths.

2 The term 'civil and political rights' is used in contradistinction to the term 'economic and social rights' to denote first generation rights – those which have long been recognised in the Western democracies from the time of the French and American Declarations of the 'Rights of Man' in the eighteenth century.

3 The literature is immense, but the following are of particular importance. Simmonds, NE, Central Issues in Jurisprudence, 1986, Sweet and Maxwell, provides a brief but extremely lucid introduction to relevant jurisprudential issues. Substantive texts: Rawls, J, A Theory of Justice, 1972, Clarendon; Dworkin, R, Taking Rights Seriously, 1977, Duckworth, and A Matter of Principle, 1985, Clarendon; Hart, HLA, The Concept of Law, 1961, Clarendon, and Essays in Jurisprudence and Philosophy, 1983, Clarendon; Waldron, J (ed), Theories of Rights, 1984, OUP.

which views rights as naturally inherent in the human person.[4] By contrast, as will be seen, liberals start by devising a general political theory from which they then seek to derive a series of rights.

1 Where do rights derive from?

The liberal conception of rights can be seen to owe its antecedents to the school of so-called social contractarians which found perhaps its earliest advocate in the writings of John Locke.[5] Locke imagined an actual social contract between individuals and the state at the setting up of civil society in which citizens, in order to secure the protection of their property, handed over certain powers (most importantly, a monopoly of coercive force) to the government in return for the guarantee of certain rights to 'lives, liberties and estates'. Locke thus introduced the idea, which is still central to liberalism today, that the overriding purpose of the state is the securing and protection of its citizens' basic liberties. The idea of the social contract is thus clearly an immensely potent one and it is John Rawls's revival and radical revision of the idea in his A Theory of Justice (1972) which has almost single-handedly transformed the face of political theory; as HLA Hart has commented, rights-based theories have replaced utilitarianism[6] as the primary focus of attention.[7] Robert Nozick, a right-wing critic of Rawls whose work Anarchy, State and Utopia (1974) mounts a sustained attack upon Rawls's theory, has written: 'Political philosophers now must either work within Rawls's theory or explain why not'.[8]

Rawls imagines not an actual, but a hypothetical, social contract taking place in what he terms 'the original position'. The essential feature of this position is that the contractors (Rawls's men) are devising amongst themselves the outlines of 'the foundation charter of their society' whilst behind 'the veil of ignorance'. The men are ignorant not only of what will be their positions in the future social hierarchy, but also of their skills, weaknesses, preferences and conceptions of the good life – whether, for example, they will be strict Muslims or humanist academics. Since none of the contractors knows what mode of life he will wish to pursue, he is bound (if he is rational) to choose a tolerant society and one which guarantees him the rights necessary to pursue any individual goals he may in future choose. In other words, the men will wish to put in place the means whereby they will, in future, be able to pursue their goals rather than adopting structures which might in future prevent them from doing so. Thus, almost any conception of the good life will require, for example, freedom from arbitrary arrest, the right to a fair trial and freedom from inhuman treatment. In addition, the man who will become the Muslim might in future wish to restrict freedom of speech on religious matters but, at present, self-interest dictates that he consider the possibility that his conception of the good life might necessarily include the exercise

4 For a modern exposition of the Natural Law School, see Finnis, J, Natural Law and Natural Rights, 1980, Clarendon.

5 Locke, J, The Second Treatise of Government, 1698.

6 See discussion below, pp 8–9.

7 See Hart's comments on this phenomenon generally in 'Between utility and rights' in Cohen, M (ed), Ronald Dworkin and Contemporary Jurisprudence, 1984, Duckworth.

8 Nozick, R, Anarchy, State and Utopia, 1974, Blackwell, p 183.

of freedom of speech. Thus Rawls's men adopt, inter alia, 'the first principle', stating that 'each person is to have an equal right to the most extensive, total system of equal basic liberties compatible with a similar system of liberty for all'.[9] These basic liberties are identical with any familiar list of civil and political rights.

Although similar to Rawls in political outlook, Ronald Dworkin offers a theoretical construct which derives rights in a different manner, and indeed has criticised Rawls's theory, arguing that a hypothetical, unlike an actual, contract provides no grounds for binding actual people to its terms.[10] Dworkin attempts to derive rights from the premise, to which he hopes all will agree, that the state owes a duty to treat all of its citizens with equal concern and respect – a premise which he argues persuasively is the deep assumption underlying Rawls's use of the contract device. Dworkin is not concerned with defending rights from despotic and repressive governments and indeed he sees no need to protect – by designating them as rights – those individual interests which the majority would like to see protected, since these will in any case be ensured by the democratic process which he assumes as a background to his theory. Dworkin's particular concern is to justify the protection of unpopular or minority rights – or those whose exercise may on occasion threaten the overall well-being of the community – because such rights would potentially be put at risk if their validity were to be determined through a democratic vote.

Clearly, the institution of democracy and most familiar sets of political policies, such as seeking the economic betterment of the majority, seem to be satisfactorily explained by an underpinning utilitarianism.[11] Dworkin hypothesises that the great appeal of utilitarianism is owed at least in part to its appearance of egalitarianism through its promise to 'treat the wishes of each member of the community on a par with the wishes of any other',[12] taking into account only the intensity of the preference and the number of people who hold it. This appeal is evinced in the utilitarian maxim: 'everybody to count for one, nobody for more than one.' Dworkin finds, however, that raw utilitarianism betrays this promise, since it fails to distinguish between what he denotes external and personal preferences. For example, if the question of whether homosexual acts should be permitted in private between adults were to be decided by a majority vote (preference maximisation), homosexuals would express their personal preference for freedom to perform those acts. Certain heterosexuals, however, would vote against allowing this freedom, because their external preference is that homosexuals should not be free to commit such acts.

Thus, resolution of the question could be affected by the fact that certain citizens think that the homosexual way of life is not deserving of equal respect; a decision would therefore have been made at least partly on the basis that the way of life of 9 For this reference and a brief summary of the theory, see Rawls, J, A Theory of Justice, 1972, pp 11–15.

10 Dworkin, Taking Rights Seriously, 1977, Chapter 6.

11 Utilitarianism is a major political philosophy. The original conception of utilitarianism espoused by Jeremy Bentham saw the aim of government as being to promote the greatest happiness of the greatest number of people (see Burns (ed), Collected Works of Jeremy Bentham, 1970). A more recent and fashionable version states that an ideal society is one in which there is the maximum amount of preference satisfaction (see, generally, Smart, C and Williams, B, Utilitarianism: For and Against, 1973, CUP). References in the text will be to this latter version, known as 'preference utilitarianism'.

12 Dworkin, Taking Rights Seriously, 1977, p 275.

certain citizens was in some way contemptible. If the government enforced this decision through the use of coercive force (the criminal law), it would clearly have failed in its central duty to treat its citizens with equal concern and respect. In other words, utilitarianism – and therefore democracy – has an in-built means of undermining its own promise of equality. Since for Dworkin protecting this promise of equality is the central postulate of political morality, he finds that homosexuals should be granted a right to moral autonomy which cannot be overridden even by a majority decision-making process.

Opposition to the liberal conception of human rights

Utilitarianism

Utilitarianism has historically been generally hostile to the idea of rights, most famously to the notion of natural and inalienable human rights as set out, for example, in the American Declaration of Independence, which was characterised by Jeremy Bentham as merely so much 'bawling upon paper'.[13] The opposition of utilitarians to the notion of natural rights sprang mainly from their legal positivism – their belief that a legal right only exists if there is a specific 'black letter' provision guaranteeing it. But in general, since utilitarianism sets out one supreme goal of happiness or, in its more modern version, preference maximisation, it would clearly follow that rights under utilitarianism can have only a contingent justification. In other words, they are to be respected if they help bring about the goal of maximum satisfaction of preferences, but not otherwise. It may seem odd to postulate an opposition between utilitarianism and human rights, bearing in mind that JS Mill combined utilitarianism with a passionate belief in the desirability of free expression and civil rights generally. It should be noted, however, that Mill's arguments for free speech depend essentially on a belief that allowing free speech will, in the long term, have good effects – such as increasing the likelihood that the truth will be discovered – rather than on a belief that free expression is a good in itself or something to which human beings are entitled without reference to its likely effects. A utilitarian, confronted with a situation in which infringing a right would undeniably benefit society as a whole, would have no reason to support the inviolability of the right; for example, he or she would find it hard to explain why criminal suspects should not be tortured if it were proved that reliable evidence would be derived thereby, leading to increased convictions, deterrence of crime and substantial consequential benefit to society.

A further variant of the theory which has sometimes been termed 'rule utilitarianism', however, states that the goals of utilitarianism can best be reached by constructing rules which it is thought will, in general, further the goal of happiness or 'preference maximisation' and then applying these rules to situations as absolutes rather than considering in each individual situation what can best further the goal (for discussion, see Smart and Williams).[14] Such rules could, of course, consist, at least in part, of a set of human rights. In relation to the example of torture given in the text, a rule utilitarian

13 Bentham, J, 'Anarchical fallacies', in Bowring, J (ed), Collected Works of Jeremy Bentham, 1843, p 494.
14 Smart, C and Williams, B, Utilitarianism: For and Against, 1973.

could plausibly maintain that a general rule of humane treatment of citizens is likely to lead to the greatest happiness. In deciding whether to torture an individual suspect, this would mean that instead of considering whether in this case overall utility would be increased thereby, the state should apply the rule of humane treatment, even if in the particular case it would lead to a decrease in utility. It can be seen that for rule utilitarians, the good (the goal of preference maximisation or greatest happiness) is prior to the right, in opposition to Rawls's clearly expressed conviction that the right (a system of just entitlements of citizens) is prior to any conceptions of the good – the substantive moral convictions by which individuals will live their lives.

Marxism

The former socialist bloc of states – the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe – was the driving force behind the international recognition of economic, social and cultural rights. This was at least partly due to the fact that there is a measure of hostility within Marxist thought to civil and political rights.[15] Such hostility exists mainly because Marxism advocates establishing a state which, far from being neutral amongst its citizens' varying conceptions of the good and guaranteeing them the liberties necessary to pursue their private goals, instead imposes a particular conception of the good upon society. Since it regards the protection of this conception (the achievements of the revolution) as the supreme value and duty of the state, the exercise of liberties which threaten this achievement can be justifiably curtailed; hence the consistently poor record of the former Soviet bloc states and Communist China on such civil rights as freedom of speech. A theoretically related, but more moderate, critique of the Western liberal conception of human rights can be found in the writings of the so-called communitarians.[16]

Critical Legal Studies

The Critical Legal Studies movement (CLS) attacks the whole liberal conception of law as neutral, objective and rational. It seeks to expose the value judgments, internal inconsistencies and ideological conflicts which it sees as concealed under law's benevolent exterior of impartial justice.[17] Since the whole structure of legally guaranteed human rights is a creature of the liberal conception of law, the CLS attack fastens by extension onto the liberal notion of rights. Mark Tushnet, for example, has made four main criticisms of the liberal theory of rights in what he calls 'a Schumpeterian act of creative destruction'. He asserts that rights are: first, unstable – that is, meaningful only in a particular social setting; secondly, they produce 'no determinate consequences if claimed'; thirdly, 'rights talk . . . falsely converts into empty abstractions . . . real experiences that we ought to value for their own sake'; and fourthly, if conceded a dominant position in contemporary discourse, rights threaten to 'impede advances by progressive social forces'.[18] It would be inappropriate to attempt a detailed refutation 15 See, e.g., Marx, K, On the Jewish Question, 1843.

16 See, e.g., Sandel, M, Liberalism and the Limits of Justice, 1982, CUP.
17 Unger, R, The Critical Legal Studies Movement, 1986, Harvard University Press.
18 Tushnet, M, 'An essay on rights' (1984) 62(18) Texas L Rev 1363.

of the CLS position here.[19] Perhaps the most important weakness in its critique of rights is that, as many writers have pointed out,[20] it offers no guidance whatsoever as to how the interests of vulnerable minorities are to be protected without the institution of legal rights.

2 What is meant by a right?

The preceding section has set out, in a very basic manner, some of the more influential liberal theories concerning the means of deriving a system of rights from a more general moral theory. In this section, two aims will be pursued. First, an attempt will be made to shed some light on what one can be taken to mean, in general terms, when one asserts a right; secondly, a brief explanation will be given of Hohfeld's exposition of a right as an umbrella term, covering a number of more precisely delineated claims.

Distinguishing moral and legal rights

The endeavour to distinguish legal from moral rights involves a central issue in jurisprudence, namely, the relationship between law and morality, on which there is a vast literature and a number of clearly defined schools of thought. Only the barest indications of the various positions on this tendentious issue are possible here.

Legal positivism

Clearly, from a common sense point of view, if X makes a claim that she has a right to Y and there is no clear, black letter law giving her such a right, she must be taken to be asserting that she has a strong moral claim to Y and (probably) that this claim ought to be given legal force through the enactment of a specific legal right. The above point of view is – very crudely – that put forward by the school of jurisprudence known as legal positivism, whose central insistence is that there is no necessary connection between law and morality.[21]

Natural law

To a member of the natural law school in its traditional form,[22] by contrast, the question of whether X's claim to Y was moral or legal would be decided not empirically, by consulting the statute book, but rather by examining the normative claim made by her. If her claim was supported by an abstract notion of justice, then a measure purporting to deny the claim would not be accepted as a valid law since it would be unjust. The approach sounds extreme, but was employed during the Nuremberg trials as the 19 For a general critique of the CLS attitude to rights, see, e.g., Price, DA, 'Taking rights cynically' [1989] CLJ 271.

20 Ibid See also, e.g., Rhodes, DL, 'Feminist critical theories' (1990) 42(3) Stanford L Rev 634–38.

21 For a full discussion of this issue, see Hart, HLA, 'Positivism and the separation of law and morals', in Essays in Jurisprudence and Philosophy, 1983.

22 For the classical exposition of this theory, see Aquinas, T, 'Summa theologica', in d'Entreves, P (ed), Selected Political Writings, 1970, Blackwell.

underlying justification for what might otherwise have been seen as the retrospective criminalisation of those who committed their crimes under the Nazi laws thought valid at the time.

Dworkin's theory

The views of Ronald Dworkin[23] provide a middle ground between these two theories – a 'third theory of law'.[24] His theory is highly complex, but in essence is more inclusive than the positivist theory; recognising black letter legal rights,[25] it insists that the law may contain further rights which have never yet been recognised by a statute or in any judicial decision. Thus, X could correctly claim she had a right to Y, on Dworkin's account, if (a) the right would be consistent with the bulk of existing law and (b) it would figure in the best possible interpretation of the area of law concerned. By this, Dworkin means that the relevant past judicial decisions would be most satisfactorily justified by showing them all to have been concerned with protecting the right at issue, even if previous individual judgments did not explicitly recognise its existence. Such a claim might well, of course, be controversial, but it is precisely this that is at the root of Dworkin's disagreement with the positivists: finding out what the law is, he argues, will require not merely an empirical test of the law's pedigree (does it emanate from the right body?), but rather a complex inquiry which will, as he puts it, carry the lawyer 'very deep into moral and political theory'.[26]

If one is convinced by Dworkin's ingenious argument, the existence of a legal right can be adduced through interpretation (at least in common law jurisdictions). Alternatively, a right could, in any event, be given clear explicit protection so that its legal status was not a matter for controversy.

The strength of a right: conflicts with other claims

If a legal right is conceded to exist, it must next be asked what is and should be the nature and strength of the protection thereby given. The right may come into conflict with the claims of society, such as that a certain standard of morality should be upheld. Clearly, in resolving such a conflict, a judge will inevitably draw upon his or her background political theory. If, for example, a judge in the European Court of Human Rights, who is a utilitarian by conviction, has to consider a convincing demonstration by a defendant government that the particular application of the right to free speech

23 For an exposition of Dworkin's account of the relationship between law and morality, see his theory of judicial adjudication in Chapters 2–4 of Taking Rights Seriously, in which his theory is cast mainly in the form of a critique of legal positivism. For a fuller development of the theory, see Law's Empire, 1986, Fontana.

24 The term was coined by Mackie, J, 'The third theory of law', in Cohen, M (ed), Ronald Dworkin and Contemporary Jurisprudence, 1984.

25 Note that in Law's Empire Dworkin seems to discard any reliance on recognising 'black letter' law by some means reminiscent of Hart's rule of recognition and comes to a position in which law is entirely a matter of interpretation. For criticism of this position see, e.g., Simmonds, NE, 'Imperial visions and mundane practices' [1987] CLJ 465 and Cotterell, R, The Politics of Jurisprudence, 1989, pp 172–81.

26 Dworkin, Taking Rights Seriously, p 67.

claimed by the applicant will, on balance, make society worse off as a whole, he or she will be inclined to find for the government and allow the infringement of the right. Such infringement will, of course, be more readily allowable if the right is framed or has developed in such a way as to be open-ended in scope with in-built exceptions.

Both Dworkin and Rawls have argued persuasively against making rights vulnerable to utilitarian considerations in this way. The idea that '[e]ach person possesses an inviolability founded on justice that even the welfare of society as a whole cannot override'[27] lies at the centre of Rawls's political thought. The idea of such inviolable rights may seem extreme, but is in fact accepted by all civilised countries in the case, for example, of torture. It is not thought to be a sound argument for a government to assert that it is justified in torturing certain of its citizens on the grounds that it can increase the general welfare thereby. The acceptance of this principle is attested to by the non-derogability of the right to freedom from torture in all international human rights treaties, including the European Convention on Human Rights (Art 15(2)).

Dworkin has addressed the specific question as to the means of understanding a legal right in an adjudicative context in some detail. Earlier, the distinction between moral and legal rights was discussed. Here it should be noted that Dworkin also distinguishes between rights that have 'trump' status and those that do not. He gives as an example of the latter a legal right to drive either way on a two-way road: such a right is a 'weak' legal right, because it is not an important human interest which is likely to be denied to certain groups through the influence of external preferences. It follows that such a right could justifiably be overridden by the government (through making the road one-way) if it thought it in the general interest to do so. By contrast, his conception of the strength of 'trump' rights leads to his insistence that an assertion of (for example) a right to free speech held by citizens 'must imply that it would be wrong for the government to stop them from speaking, even when the government believes that what they say will cause more harm than good'.[28]

It can be seen, then, that Dworkin gives us a very clear prescription for the approach that a judge should take in weighing strong or 'trump' rights against the general welfare of society. He roundly condemns the idea that a judge, in adjudicating upon a right or a government in framing it, should carefully weigh up the right of the citizen against the possible adverse social consequences, accepting that it is sometimes preferable to err on the side of society, sometimes on the side of the individual, but on the whole getting the balance about right. 'It must be wrong', he argues, to consider that 'inflating rights is as serious as invading them'. For to invade a right is to affront human dignity or treat certain citizens as less worthy of respect than others, while to inflate a right is simply to pay 'a little more in social efficiency'[29] than the government already has to pay in allowing the right at all. Thus, for Dworkin, if one asserts a 'trump' right, ordinary counter-arguments about a decrease in the welfare of society as a whole are simply irrelevant.

27 Rawls, A Theory of Justice, 1972, p 3.
28 Dworkin, R, Taking Rights Seriously, p 191.
29 Ibid, p 199.

In what circumstances, then, may a strong individual right be overridden? Dworkin has argued[30] that there are three general justifications for infringement and these appear to be generally accepted by liberal thought.

Competing rights

First, there is the situation in which there is a clear competing individual claim, so that the exercise of the original right will directly infringe the competing right. The paradigmatic example of such a collision of individual rights arises where one individual uses his right of free speech to prejudice the fair trial of another. Another is where one incites violence against the other, thus infringing his right to security of the person. In such cases, since both rights are, as it were, from the same class of 'strong' rights, they will compete on equal terms, but it may nevertheless be possible to resolve the conflict by undertaking a balancing act between them based on proportionality.[31] In the case of prejudice to a trial, this could be done by physically removing the trial from the area affected by the speech in question. If such avoidance of conflict was impossible, a determination might be made as to the damage inflicted on each right if the other was allowed to prevail. In the case of incitement to violence, the damage inflicted if free speech was allowed to prevail might be almost irretrievable, since the group affected might be placed at great risk for a period of time. In contrast, the damage to free speech created by avoidance of the risk might be of a lesser nature, although undesirable: the speech could be uttered in another form or another forum, so that its meaning was not lost, but it was rendered less inflammatory. Alternatively, utterance of the speech could be delayed until the situation had become less volatile. The words advocating immediate violence might be perceived as outside the area of protected speech and so might be severed from the accompanying words which could be permitted.

The right is not really at stake

The second situation in which rights may be overridden is one where the values protected by the right are not at stake in this particular situation. In other words, it may be argued that most rights have a 'core', the invasion of which will constitute an actual overriding of the right, but they also have a 'penumbra' – an area in which the value the right protects is present only in a weaker form.[32] An invasion of the penumbra may be said to constitute only an infringement of the right and may therefore be more readily justified. The argument that commercial speech should not be afforded the same protection as other kinds of speech would appear to rest precisely on the argument

30 Ibid, p 200.

31 See Chapter 9, pp 962–79.

32 This view is not attributed to Dworkin, although he does accept that there will be situations in which the core value of the right will not be at stake. Dworkin has comprehensively rejected Hart's theory of statutory construction and application of the rules from past cases based around the notion of a core of certainty and a penumbra of uncertainty (for Hart's position, see The Concept of Law; for Dworkin's critique, op. cit., fn 3, Chapters 2–4). Dworkin argues that the areas of a rule which form the core and those which fall in the penumbra, can only be elucidated through a judge's interpretation, which will carry him or her far from the specific words of the statute.

that it is in the penumbra of free speech;[33] by contrast, political speech is clearly in the 'core' of free speech.[34]

A real risk to society

The third situation justifying infringement is one in which the exercise of a right may pose a real danger to society. In such instances, liberals are unwilling to take danger to mean danger to some abstract attribute to society, such as its moral health,[35] but rather insist that the danger must ultimately amount to a threat to some concrete aspect of its citizens' well-being. Thus, typically, liberals are hostile to characterising the likelihood of shocking or offending citizens as a concrete harm justifying the suppression of the right of free speech. Dworkin's own, perhaps rather unrealistically stringent, test is that the 'risk to society' justification for overriding rights is only made out if the state demonstrates 'a clear and substantial risk' that exercise of the right 'will do great damage to the person or property of others'.[36] It seems unlikely that governments would be prepared to accept such a test; the criterion laid down, for example, by the European Court of Human Rights for curtailing the right of free expression as set out in Art 10 does not even approach Dworkin's prescription in either stringency or clarity; instead, it has adopted the somewhat weak and uncertain phrase, 'a pressing social need'.[37] Dworkin's rights analysis should not, therefore, be taken as a description of the way rights and liberties are actually treated in the UK and under human rights treaties, but rather as an ideal against which the reality of such 'rights' protection can be measured.

Distinguishing rights and liberties

Having given an account of what may, in general terms, be meant by an assertion of a right in the liberal tradition, we may now turn to an analysis of the more specific claims that the assertion of a right may entail and employ this analysis to make a few general remarks about the nature of 'rights' protection in the UK.

Hohfeld's analysis

One of the more influential attempts to analyse closely the nature of a right was made by the American jurist Wesley Hohfeld.[38] Hohfeld attempted to demonstrate the way that claims of rights in everyday language can in fact be broken down into four more 33 Judgment of US Supreme Court, Bolger v Youngs Drug Products Ltd (1983) 103 Ct 2875, 2880–81.

34 The House of Lords appeared to recognise the central importance of free political speech in their pre-HRA decision that neither local nor central government could pursue an action in defamation: Derbyshire CC v Times Newspapers [1993] 1 All ER 1011.

35 Eg, see the attacks by Hart, 'Social solidarity and the enforcement of morality', in Essays in Jurisprudence and Philosophy, and Dworkin, 'Liberty and morality', in Taking Rights Seriously, on Lord Devlin's view that society may justifiably use the criminal law to enforce a shared morality.

36 Dworkin, R, Taking Rights Seriously, p 204.

37 See Handyside v UK (1976) 1 EHRR 737. For further discussion of this test, see Chapter 5, p 336–37.

38 Hohfeld, W, Fundamental Legal Concepts as Applied in Judicial Reasoning, 1920, particularly pp 35–41.

specific claims. First, if it is claimed that X has a right proper or 'claim right' to A, then this means that persons, generally or particularly, are under some specific corresponding duty to ensure that X has access to A. Secondly, X may be said to have an immunity as against a particular person or body; this means that they are disabled from interfering with the exercise by X of the interest (A) protected by the immunity. Thirdly, if X has only a liberty (what Hohfeld calls a privilege) to do A, this far weaker claim merely means that X does no wrong in exercising his liberty – the rights of others are not thereby infringed. However, no one has a duty to allow him to exercise A or to assist him to exercise it. Fourthly, X may have a power to do B, such as to sell his property. This last category is not particularly relevant to the subject of civil liberties.

Hohfeld applied to the reality of 'rights' protection

Hohfeld's explanation is a useful analytical tool; it can be seen by utilising it that Dworkin is advocating that rights be set out as a series of immunities – areas of entitlement which even democratically elected governments are disabled from interfering with. The US Constitution and its Amendments represent such a list of immunities. In applying Hohfeld's theory to 'rights' protection in the UK, it can be seen that it endows the commentator with the ability to distinguish between the different forms of protection offered towards different freedoms. The commentator must now apply these analytical tools to the Human Rights Act 1998 in order to find that a very significant break with the traditional findings as to rights protection in the UK has occurred.

If Dworkin's analysis is used, all rights in the UK are technically 'weak' since, even under the Human Rights Act 1998, all are at least theoretically subject to infringement by Parliament. Under Hohfeld's view, the picture is more mixed. It becomes clear that, traditionally, most freedoms in the UK were merely liberties; one did no wrong to exercise them, but there was no positive duty on any organ of the state to allow or facilitate them. For example, the Public Order Act 1986 nowhere placed upon chief constables a duty to ensure freedom of assembly and speech. Nevertheless, some of our entitlements clearly had and have the quality of Hohfeldian claim rights in that they are protected by a positive correlative duty. For example, arrested persons have the right of access to a solicitor while in police custody as guaranteed by S 58 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. Equal treatment in certain contexts is provided for under domestic and EU instruments. However, even when a citizen holds a right, there were – under domestic law – no legal guarantees that the legislation providing the positive protection would not be repealed. Similarly, a citizen enjoying a liberty could not be certain that legislation would not be introduced into a previously unregulated area, thus destroying or limiting that liberty.

When the Human Rights Act 1998 came fully into force, however, in October 2000, many of our Hohfeldian liberties became rights in Hohfeldian terms since, as Chapter 4 explains, public authorities were laid under a positive duty to respect them and are acting unlawfully if they do not (s 6(1)), unless the only possible reading of contrary primary legislation is that the right must be infringed. Even in that instance, once the incompatibility is declared, the government will normally respond by introducing remedial legislation. It is now much less likely that legislation will be introduced which would have the effect of limiting the rights protected under the 1998 Act, since such legislation might eventually be declared incompatible with the guarantees of those rights

(s 4). Further, when such legislation was introduced, the relevant Minister would have to declare that a statement of compatibility could not be made (s 19, HRA), which would be politically embarrassing. (It has only occurred once so far.)[39] Similarly, existing legislative protection for a right recognised under the HRA would be unlikely to be repealed, since the repealing legislation could not be accompanied by such a statement and, moreover, a citizen might bring an action at Strasbourg challenging the failure to make domestic provision to deliver the right. Thus, in Hohfeldian terms, the 1998 Act itself does not provide a set of immunities since it can be overridden by primary legislation, while in Dworkinian terms the rights remain 'weak'. As indicated, the guarantees of the rights are not absolute; the deterrents against infringing them at the parliamentary level are ultimately political ones. But the Act clearly represents a dramatic shift in rights protection in the UK, away from residual freedoms towards positive rights.

39 The Communications Act 2003 was not accompanied by a statement of compatibility; see Chapter 6, p 518.

Chapter 2

The European Convention on Human Rights

1 Introduction[1]

The European Convention on Human Rights was conceived after the Second World War as a means of preventing the kind of violation of human rights seen in Germany during and before the war. However, it has not generally been invoked in relation to large-scale violations of rights, but instead has addressed particular deficiencies in the legal systems of the Member states, who on the whole create regimes of human rights in conformity with it. Drafted in 1949 by the Council of Europe, it was based on the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights,[2] and partly for that reason and partly because it was only intended to provide basic protection for human rights, it appears today as quite a cautious document, less far reaching than the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.[3] Nevertheless, it has had far more effect on UK law than any other human rights treaty due to its machinery for enforcement, which includes the European Court of Human Rights, with the power to deliver a ruling adverse to the governments of Member states. Moreover, the Court insists upon the dynamic nature of the Convention and adopts a teleological or purpose-based approach to its interpretation which has allowed the substantive rights to develop until they may cover situations unthought of in 1949. Had it been a more radical document, the Convention might have been self-defeating because it might have failed to secure the necessary acceptance from Member states, both in terms of ratifying various parts of it, such as the right of individual petition, and in terms of responding to adverse judgments.

1 Texts referred to below: Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, The Law of Human Rights, 2nd edn, 2006; Ovey, C and White, R, Jacobs and White European Convention on Human Rights, 4th edn, 2006, OUP; Bailey, SH, Harris, DJ and Jones, BL, Civil Liberties: Cases and Materials, 5th edn, 2002; Feldman, D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 2002; Van Dijk, P and Van Hoof, F, Theory and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights, 3rd edn, 1998, Kluwer; Mowbray, A, Cases and Materials on the European Convention on Human Rights, 2001, LexisNexis UK; Janis, M, Kay, R and Bradley, A, European Human Rights Law, 2nd edn, 2000, OUP; Harris, D, O'Boyle, K and Warbrick, C, Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, Butterworths; Dickson, B (ed), and Connelly, A, Human Rights and the European Convention, 1996, Sweet and Maxwell; Farran, S, The UK Before the European Court of Human Rights, 1996, Blackstone. Background: Beddard, R, Human Rights and Europe, 3rd edn, 1980, CUP; Fawcett, JES, The Application of the European Convention on Human Rights, 2nd edn, 1987, Clarendon; Jacobs, F, The European Convention on Human Rights, 1975, OUP; Nedjati, ZM, Human Rights under the European Convention, 1978, Elsevier; Merrills, JG and Robertson, AH, Human Rights in Europe, 3rd edn, 1993, Manchester University Press.

2 The Declaration was adopted on 10 December 1948 by the General Assembly of the UN.

3 1966.

Although the European Court of Human Rights may rule against the governments of Member states, its approach – which is reflected throughout the machinery for the supervision of the Convention – is not ultimately coercive. A persuasive or consensus-based approach is evident at every stage through which an application may pass. A friendly settlement may well be reached before the case comes before the Court; even if it does not, and the case reaches the stage of a final ruling adverse to the government in question, the government is in effect free to determine the extent of the changes needed in order to respond, although the possibility of future adverse rulings at Strasbourg may exercise an influence on its decision. This approach is also reflected in the doctrine of the 'margin of appreciation' which has been developed by the Strasbourg authorities. This doctrine, to which we will return below,[4] involves allowing the domestic authorities a degree of discretion in deciding what is needed to protect various public interests in their own countries, even though such interests have an impact on protection for Convention rights. The use of this doctrine allows evasion of conflict over very sensitive issues between Strasbourg and the Member state. Clearly, its use may lead at times to an acceptance of a lower standard of human rights than some liberal critics would advocate,[5] but some commentators have suggested that it can be an appropriate influence on the dealings between Strasbourg and democracies with generally sound human rights records.[6]

When examining the substantive rights, they may be said to fall into two groups: Articles 2–7, covering the most fundamental human rights and containing, broadly, no express exceptions,[7] or narrow express exceptions; and Arts 8–12, which may be said to cover a more sophisticated or developed conception of human rights and which are subject to a broad range of express exceptions. Thus, under Arts 2–7, argument will tend to concentrate on the question of whether a particular situation falls within the compass of the right in question, whereas under Arts 8–11 it will largely concentrate on determining whether the interference with the guarantee can be justified (Art 12 contains only one exception, but of a very broad nature). There is an enormous amount of overlap between the Articles and it may be found that weaknesses or gaps in one can be remedied by another, although the Convention will be interpreted as a harmonious whole.[8] It will also be found that invocation of a substantive right in order to attack a decision in the national courts on its merits may sometimes fail, but that a challenge to the procedure may succeed under one of the Articles explicitly concerned with

4 See pp 36–39.

5 See: McDonald, RJ, 'The margin of appreciation in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights', International Law and the Time of its Codification, 1987, pp 187–208; Van Dijk and Van Hoof, op. cit., fn 1, p 82 et seq; O'Donell, 'The margin of appreciation doctrine: standards in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights' (1982) 4 Human Rights Q 474; Morrisson, C, 'Margin of appreciation in human rights law' (1973) 6 Human Rights J 263; Jones, T, 'The devaluation of human rights under the European Convention' [1995] PL 430; Mahoney, P, 'Marvellous richness or invidious cultural relativism?' (1998) 19 Human Rights LJ 1.

6 See Gearty, C, 'Democracy and human rights in the European Court of Human Rights: a critical appraisal' (2000) 51(3) NILQ 381, esp p 387.

7 Article 6 provides that trial judgments should be pronounced publicly except where, inter alia, the interest of morals, public order or national security demand otherwise but the primary right – to a fair hearing – is not subject to these exceptions.

8 Van Dijk and Van Hoof, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter II.

fairness in the adjudicative process – Arts 5, 6 and 7.[9] The rights and freedoms are largely concerned with civil and political rather than social and economic matters; the latter are governed by the 1961 European Social Charter and the 1966 International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.[10]

The Convention has grown by way of additional protocols so that it now creates a more advanced human rights regime based on Arts 2–14 with the First Protocol[11] in conjunction with the Fourth,[12] Sixth[13] and Seventh[14] Protocols. The very significant Protocol 12 was opened for ratification in November 2000.[15] The UK has not yet ratified the rights contained in the Fourth and Seventh Protocols, and at present does not intend to ratify the Twelfth Protocol, suggesting that although there is a measure of harmony between the basic Convention regime and the UK legal system, this is not the case as far as aspects of the more advanced regime is concerned. The UK has ratified Protocol 13 which abolishes the death penalty in all circumstances. The Joint Committee on Human Rights in 2005 recommended that the government should ratify the Fourth and Twelfth Protocols.[16]

In considering the operation of the Convention in practice, it should be remembered that it was not intended to mimic the working of a domestic legal system. Thus, individuals could not, until recently, take a case directly to the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg[17] and, in fact, it is a feature of the Court that it hears very few cases in comparison with the number of applications made.[18] However, its jurisprudence has had an enormous impact, not merely through the outcome of specific cases, but in a general symbolic, educative and preventive sense. Its function in raising 9 This point is developed below; see p 60. See Gearty, C, 'The European Court of Human Rights and the protection of civil liberties: an overview' [1993] CLJ 89 for argument that the Convention as a whole is largely concerned with procedural rights.

10 (1965) Cmnd 2643; see Harris, D, The European Social Charter, 1984, University of Virginia Press. The charter does not have a system of petitions. On an international level, the UK is also party to the 1966 International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, Cmnd 6702. It is not enforceable as regards the UK by individual petition.

11 Cmnd 9221. All the parties to the Convention except Switzerland are parties to this Protocol, which came into force in 1954.

12 Cmnd 2309. It came into force in 1968; the UK is not yet a party. It contains rights relating to the field of immigration law, which have raised governmental concerns regarding the nature of the obligations created and the government has indicated that it does not intend to ratify it at present: see the White Paper, Rights Brought Home: the Human Rights Bill, Cm 3782, 1997, paras 4.10–4.11. It has, however, considered the possibility of future ratification with reservations: the Home Office Review of Human Rights Instruments (amended), 26 August 1999. See below, p 165.

13 (1983) 5 EHRR 167. It came into force in 1985. The UK is now a party to it and it is included in the Human Rights Act, Sched 1. See below, Chapter 4, p 165.

14 (1984) 7 EHRR 1. It came into force in 1988. The UK is not a party but proposes to ratify imminently: see the White Paper, Rights Brought Home: the Human Rights Bill, Cm 3782, 1997, paras 4.14–4.15, and the Home Office Review of Human Rights Instruments (amended) 26 August 1999. Note that the other Protocols are concerned with the procedural machinery of the Convention.

15 See Chapter 4, p 165, and Chapter 15, p 1486 and see below, p 106.

16 Seventeenth Report of Session 2004–5 HL Paper 99, HC 264, paras 34 and 37.

17 Once the Eleventh Protocol came into force, individuals acquired the right to take a case directly to the Court; see below, pp 24 et seq.

18 Eg, in 1991, the Commission registered 1648 applications; it referred 93 cases to the Court, which gave judgment in 72. European Court of Human Rights, Survey of Activities 1959–91.

awareness of human rights was of particular significance in the UK since, until the enactment of the HRA, no equivalent domestic instrument had the role of doing so. Since the HRA has afforded the Convention further effect in UK law, its interpretation, the values it encapsulates and the development of the control machinery have become of even greater significance. An understanding of the workings of the Convention is now crucial since the jurisprudence is now being very frequently relied on in the domestic courts.

The enormous increase in the number of applications from the UK since the early days of the Convention suggests that before the HRA was enacted, it was seen as a guardian of human rights by UK citizens, although to an extent it held out a promise that it could not fulfil. The immensely slow and difficult route to Strasbourg discouraged applicants from using it. It is still a slow and cumbersome route owing to the number of applications, despite improvements in the mechanisms for considering them.[19] Further reforms were introduced under Protocol 11 intended to address the increasing backlog of cases. That aim does not appear to have been realised; Protocol 14 is also intended to speed up the process and deal with the backlog when it comes into force. The fact that an application may take, at present, five years to be heard is perhaps one of the main deficiencies of the Convention enforcement machinery.[20] This chapter therefore devotes some time to explaining that process and the highly significant part which was, until recently, played in it by the European Commission on Human Rights,[21] before going on to consider the substantive rights. This chapter provides an overview of the substantive rights; the more recent cases are referred to at relevant points in the succeeding chapters.

2 The supervisory procedure for the Convention

Introduction

The Convention's procedural machinery has been altered several times by Protocols. Reform of the procedure recently occurred, stemming from a recommendation of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe that the Commission should be abolished and its function merged with that of the Court, so that there would only be one body – the single Court. It was proposed[22] that the new Court would come into operation in 1995 and that there would be a transitional period from 1995 to 2000 during which the old Commission and Court would hear cases already referred to them while new cases would be referred to the new Court. This established a fundamental change in the machinery of the Convention. The new arrangements governing the 19 Eg, procedures were introduced under the Eighth Protocol, including a summary procedure for rejecting straightforward cases.

20 The average time is a little over four years: see e.g. 'Reform of the control systems' 15 EHRR 321, p 360, para 7. See further below, pp 23–28.

21 See further Bratza, N and O'Boyle, M, 'Opinion: the legacy of the Commission to the new Court under the 11th Protocol' (1997) EHRLR 211.

22 Recommendation 1194 adopted on 6 October 1992 by the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe.

control mechanism[23] are contained Protocol 11[24] which has had a radical effect on the Convention procedure. Its most significant reform was to set up the single, restructured, Court,[25] which now sits full-time in place of the Court and Commission (under Art 19). Now that the Court and Commission have merged, it may be argued that the authority of the Convention has increased because its jurisprudence will no longer be influenced by the decisions of an administrative body; the control system has become, in this respect, more akin to that of a domestic legal system. Protocol 11 also abolished the judicial functions of the Committee of Ministers. Protocols 2, 3, 5, 8, 9 and 10 were superseded by Protocol 11.

Below, the original arrangements for the Convention are considered and compared with the current arrangements under Protocol 11. The further changes that will occur under Protocol 14 are also discussed. Although the Commission has been abolished, it had a considerable influence on the Strasbourg jurisprudence. Moreover, the admissibility role it carried out has now, in essentials, been taken over by the Court. Therefore, for both reasons, it is still of importance to understand the role and functioning of the Commission. Originally, under Art 19, the Convention set up the European Commission on Human Rights (here-after referred to as 'the Commission') and the European Court of Human Rights (hereafter referred to as 'the Court'). Thus, the machinery for the enforcement of the Convention is impressive compared to that used in respect of other human rights treaties, particularly the 1966 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which, as far as the UK is concerned, has been enforceable only through a system of assessment of national reports.[26]

The role of the Commission evolved over time. It was conceived as an advisory body which provided assistance for the Committee of Ministers (see below), composed of the Foreign Affairs Ministers of each state, who had the key role in supervising the Convention. The idea of an independent body interfering in the use of governmental powers in relation to their own citizens gained gradual acceptance, and the Commission became less of an administrative and more of a judicial body, giving Opinions on the law, albeit without the ability to take binding decisions except in relation to inadmissibility (see below). Broadly, creation of the Commission represented a compromise: it was thought too controversial merely to allow citizens to take their governments before the Court. There was a feeling that an administrative body might be more sympathetic to Member states' cases and the Member state might feel less on trial than in the 23 See 'Reform of the control systems' (1993) 15 EHRR 321. For comment, see Mowbray, A [1993] PL 419.

24 Protocol 11 came into force on 1 November 1998 under Art 5 of the Protocol, which provides that it comes into force one year after it has been ratified by all the Member states. See (1994) 15 HRLJ 86. The merger procedure was completed in November 1998 when the Commission was abolished. For discussion see, e.g., Schermers, H, 'The Eleventh Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights' (1994) 19 EL Rev 367, at p 378 and (1995) EL Rev 3; Lord Lester of Herne Hill QC, 'The European Convention in the new architecture of Europe' [1996] PL 5.

25 See 'Reform of the control systems' (1993) 15 EHRR 321.

26 The Optional Protocol to the Covenant governs the right of individual petition; but it has not been ratified by the UK. For comment on the general efficacy of the reporting system, see (1980) HRLJ 136–70.

Court.[27] Therefore, the Commission was created as an administrative barrier between the individual and the Court and was used as a means of filtering out a very high proportion of cases, thus considering far more cases than the Court. This might seem a strange device: European Community lawyers would be horrified at the idea of creating a European Commission to keep cases out of the European Court of Justice; they would feel that for justice to be done, the individual's case must be considered by the Court itself rather than by an administrative body reaching its decisions in secret.[28] Nevertheless, in human rights matters, the Commission was until recently viewed as an acceptable and useful device. That view recently underwent a change which led to the proposal for abolition of the Commission and the takeover of the Commission's role by the Court, which was carried out in Protocol 11; we will return to this matter below.

The previous role of the European Commission on Human Rights

The main role of the Commission was to filter out cases as inadmissible, thereby reducing the workload of the Court. However, it also had another role: it tried to reach a friendly settlement between the parties and could give its Opinion on the merits of the case if it was not intended that a final judgment should be given. It could also refer the case to the Court or the Committee of Ministers[29] for the final judgment. As explained below, parts of this role have been taken over by the Court. That judicial role of the Committee was abolished under the Protocol 11 reforms.

The Commission consisted of one member for every Member state.[30] The members were elected by the Committee of Ministers[31] and their period of service was managed with a view to ensuring that the membership would change constantly.[32] The members of the Commission (who were unsalaried) were not government representatives; Art 23 provided that they served 'in their individual capacity'.[33] In the UK, members tended to come from within the Civil Service, thus raising some doubt as to their neutrality. Apart from the criterion contained in Art 23, members of the Commission were, in practice, expected to display high moral integrity, have a recognised competence in 27 See Janis, Kay and Bradley, op. cit., fn 1, p 27.

28 The Commission's sessions were held in camera (old Art 33).

29 For the composition and functioning of this body see below, pp 25–26.

30 Under (old) Art 20, no two members of the Commission could be nationals of the same state.

31 Under (old) Art 21, the members of the Commission were elected by the Committee of Ministers by an absolute majority of votes, from a list of names drawn up by the Bureau of the Consultative Assembly and this procedure was followed as far as it was applicable when a state became a party to the Convention and when vacancies had to be filled.

32 Under (old) Art 22, the members of the Commission were elected for a period of six years and could be re-elected. However, of the members elected at the first election, the terms of seven members chosen by lot expired at the end of three years. In order to ensure that, as far as possible, one half of the membership of the Commission was renewed every three years, the Committee of Ministers could decide that the term of office of a member to be elected should be for a period other than six years but not more than nine and not less than three years.

33 The members usually held other posts in their own countries as university professors, legal advisers or judges. They were aided by the lawyers on the staff of the Commission.

human rights matters and have substantial legal experience.[34] The Commission decided by a majority of votes (old Art 34) and the President had the casting vote.[35] As it was a part-time body which usually only sat for about 14 weeks a year, it tended to build up a backlog of cases, thus contributing to the long delay in dealing with applications.

The role of the Commission came under review for a number of reasons. It was barely able to deal with the number of applications it received and, as states which used to be part of the Soviet Union or Yugoslavia became signatories to the Convention, this problem was exacerbated. Such countries do not have as developed a system for protection for human rights as the old Member states, and so tend to use the Convention as a means of developing such protection. Thus, although a two-tier system involving two part-time bodies may have been an acceptable control mechanism when the Convention was drawn up, it became much less appropriate. Moreover, although the notion of the involvement of an administrative body in dealing with cases may have been acceptable in 1950, it arguably detracted from the authority of the Convention.[36]

The European Court of Human Rights[37]

The Court has increased enormously in standing and efficacy over the last 30 years, partly due to its activism and creativity in interpreting the Convention and its willingness to find that Member states have violated the rights of individuals. It has been pointed out that an explosion in the number of cases it considered occurred in the 1980s as lawyers in the different European countries realised that it held out the possibility of a remedy for their clients and also of bringing about important legal change.[38] It may be considered the European constitutional court as far as human rights matters are concerned.

As originally set up, however, the Court did not bear a great resemblance to a domestic supreme or higher court in a number of respects. In particular, individuals could not take a case directly to it and its role was restricted because of the likelihood to the European Commission on Human Rights finding a case inadmissible. When Protocol 9 came into force,[39] the individual, or a group of individuals, was added to the bodies who could refer a case to the Court, under amendments to (old) Arts 44 and 48. The UK was not one of the consenting parties. Protocol 9 was repealed by Protocol 11, which now governs the ability of individuals to refer cases to the Court (Art 34).

34 Protocol 8 required that members 'must either possess the qualifications required for appointment to judicial office or be persons of recognised competence in national or international law'.

35 The Commission drew up its own rules of procedure (old) Art 36.

36 For discussion, see (1987) HRLJ 8.

37 For discussion of the role of the Court in interpreting the Convention, see Gearty, 'The European Court of Human Rights and the protection of civil liberties' [1993] CLJ 89. The Court's constitution and jurisdiction were governed by the Convention Arts 19–56, but under Protocol 11 these Articles were replaced by a revised Section II of the Convention (Arts 19–51).

38 See Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op. cit., fn 1, p 648.

39 On 1 October 1994, for the 13 states which consented to it. Under Protocol 9, Art 48, as amended, an individual could refer a case to the Court only after it had been screened by a panel of three members of the Court. If it did not raise a 'serious question affecting the interpretation or application of the Convention' and did not for any other reason warrant consideration by the Court, the panel could decide that it should not be considered by the Court.

Under the previous arrangements, if an application was found inadmissible by the Commission, the case would not reach the Court, as explained below. If it was found admissible, but a friendly settlement was reached, the Court might not have been required to decide on the application of the Convention. Thus, the question of admissibility and the mechanism allowing for a friendly settlement were crucial within the system for enforcing the Convention. The possibility of avoiding the Court's involvement meant, it is argued, that a lower standard of human rights than that allowed by the Convention tended to be maintained, especially in the older decisions of the Commission. From November 1998, under Protocol 11, the admissibility and the examination of the merits with a view to reaching a friendly settlement were undertaken by the Court. This reform was generally seen as representing a more satisfactory arrangement, since a judicial as opposed to an administrative body is now making the key decisions. Nevertheless, since the admissibility criteria remain unchanged under Protocol 11, as indicated below, current criticism of them is still applicable.

The terms of membership of the Court, governed now by Arts 19–24 of the Convention (previously by Arts 38–43), are intended to ensure that the judges will act independently of their own governments. Under Art 20 (previously Art 38), each Member state will send to the Court[40] one judge, who must be 'of high moral character and must either possess the qualifications required for appointment to high judicial office or be jurisconsults of recognised competence' (Art 21). Rule 4 of the Rules of Court[41] provides that judges may not engage in 'any political or administrative activity or any professional activity which is incompatible with their independence or impartiality or with the demands of a full-time office'. However, this does not mean that a judge may not have served within the government and, in fact, UK judges have at times come from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's Legal Advisers department which is responsible for defending the government in Strasbourg. The judges tend to serve for substantial periods of time, but under the Protocol 11 reforms, the initial period of office has been shortened, since they are initially elected for six rather than nine years. The Court will not have the same composition for all that time, because the terms of certain members expire earlier than those of others.[42]

The form of the Court was governed by (old) Art 43 which provided that it would consist of a Chamber composed of seven judges.[43] Like the Commission, it used to sit 40 A list of persons is nominated by the Members of the Council of Europe and they are then elected by the Consultative Assembly. Under Art 22 (previously 39), each member shall nominate three candidates, of whom two at least shall be its nationals. Countries which are not yet parties to the Convention may have judges on the Court as have Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Poland and Bulgaria with representatives from Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania expected.

41 The European Court of Human Rights Rules of Court (4 November 1998).

42 Under (old) Art 40, the members of the Court were elected for a period of nine years. The period is now six under Art 23(1). They may be re-elected. However, of the members elected at the first election, the terms of four members shall expire at the end of three years and the terms of four more members shall expire at the end of six years chosen by lot. The Consultative Assembly may decide, before proceeding to any subsequent election, that the term or terms of office of one or more members to be elected shall be for a period other than six years, but not more than nine and not less than three years.

43 The names of the judges are chosen by lot by the President before the opening of the case. The judge who is a national of any state Party concerned will sit as an ex officio member of the Chamber.

temporarily.[44] Its hearings will continue to be public,[45] although the Court deliberates in private.[46] Its decisions will continue to be taken on a majority vote.[47] The Court has jurisdiction under Art 32 (previously Art 45) of the Convention to consider all cases which raise issues as to the interpretation and application of the Convention.

Under the Protocol 11 reforms, the Court sits in Committees of three judges, Chambers of seven judges and in a Grand Chamber of 17 judges (Art 27). Chambers designate Judge Rapporteurs to examine applications. The Plenary Court does not perform a judicial function; it elects its President and Vice-President for three-year terms and sets up Chambers, constituted for three years.[48] Under Art 43, a party to a case may request that it be referred to the Grand Chamber within a period of three months from the date of the judgment of the Chamber. A panel of five judges from the Grand Chamber will accept the request if it raises a serious issue regarding the interpretation of the Convention or an issue of general importance. This procedure represents a further significant improvement brought about by the Eleventh Protocol since it seemed anomalous that a human rights Convention should make no provision for appeals. In general, adoption of the Eleventh Protocol has brought about quite radical changes in the role of the Court, changes that have not been welcomed wholeheartedly by some critics.[49]

The Committee of Ministers

The Committee was not set up by the Convention; its composition and functions are regulated in the statute of the Council of Europe (Arts 13–21). The Committee consists of one representative from the government of each Member state of the Council of Europe, usually the Minister for Foreign Affairs.[50] The Committee is, therefore, a political body which, as indicated below, was nevertheless performing a judicial role prior to the Protocol 11 reforms. Like the creation of the Commission, this was the result of a compromise; it was thought when the Convention was drafted that a Court of Human Rights with full compulsory jurisdiction would be too controversial and would therefore be unacceptable to all Member states.

Pre-Protocol 11 the Committee of Ministers used to have a judicial decision-making function. The Committee received a Report from the Commission giving its Opinion on the merits of an application. If there was no move by the Commission within three months to bring the case before the Court, the Committee would take the final decision (old Art 32). Oddly, the Convention was silent as to when a case should go to the Court and when to the Committee of Ministers; the matter appeared to be in the discretion of the Commission. In practice, non-contentious cases were usually referred to the Committee. They included those cases which did not raise significant Convention issues 44 It used to sit for about 80–90 days a year (see (1993) 15 EHRR 322, at p 327).

45 Under (current) Art 40.
46 Rule 22(1).
47 Rule 23 of the Rules of the Court.
48 Rule 25(1).
49 See, e.g., Schermers, H, 'The Eleventh Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights' (1994) 19 EL Rev 367, p 378.
50 If an alternative is nominated, he or she should also be a member of the government (Art 14).

and/or those which raised issues which concerned established Convention case law. A sub-Committee would be appointed to examine the case which decided by a two-thirds majority.[51] If it decided that there had been a violation, it would make suggestions as to the measures to be taken by a certain period and if they were not taken, it published the report. This was a sanction: a degree of humiliation would be expected to flow from the declaration by all the Foreign Ministers of the other Member states that a certain state had violated international human rights norms. Also, ammunition would thereby be offered to the opposition parties in the particular state. In practice, if the Commission had given its opinion that a violation had occurred, the state in question usually took measures to address the violation and the Committee did not have to give judgment.

It may be noted that the position of the individual applicant before the Committee was very weak; he or she had no right to appear or to make representations. The individual was in an equally weak position before the Court, but the role of the Commission before the Court allowed the individual's interests to be represented in a way which did not occur before the Committee.

Like the role of the Commission, the decision-making role of the Committee was viewed with increasing dissatisfaction, and under the Protocol 11 reforms, the Committee's adjudicatory function was removed, although it continues to discharge a role, discussed below, in supervising the execution of the Court's judgments.

The right of complaint: inter-state applications

Under Art 33 (previously Art 24) any Contracting Party may refer to the Commission, through the Secretary General of the Council of Europe, any alleged breach of the provisions of the Convention by another Contracting Party. The violation in question may be against any person; it need not be a national of the complainant state. Further, it can be an abstract application: one that does not allege a violation against any specified person but concerns incompatibility of a state's legislation or administrative practices with the Convention. There have been 19 inter-state applications so far, but more than one complaint has sprung from the same situation; only six situations have, in fact, given rise to complaints.[52] Thus this right has not proved effective; generally, states prefer not to sour their relations with other states if no interest of their own is involved. Therefore, inter-state complaints have had a much less significant impact on human rights in the Member states than the individual's right of petition.

The right of complaint: individual applications

Article 25 (now Art 34), widely viewed as the most important article in the Convention since it governs the right of individual complaint, enables citizens of Member states to seek a remedy for a breach of Convention rights by petitioning the European Court. Under Art 34, the Court (previously the Commission) can receive petitions from any 51 In Huber v Austria, Report of 8 February 1973, D & R 2 (1935) and the East African Asians cases (1973) 3 EHRR 76, the Committee could not obtain a two-thirds majority as to the determination whether there had been a violation of the Convention; its resolution in both cases was to take no further action on the applications.

52 See Van Dijk and Van Hoof, op. cit., fn 1, p 43.

person, non-governmental organisation or group of individuals claiming to be the victim of a violation of one or more of the rights set forth in the Convention. Prior to the Protocol 11 reforms, the right of petition arose only if the state allegedly responsible for the violation had declared (as the UK had) that it recognised the competence of the Commission to receive such petitions (Art 25). Under the reforms, this qualification no longer appears in the relevant Article (Art 34).

The individual need not be a national of the state in question, but must be in some way subject to its jurisdiction. The Court has established that the applicant must have been personally affected by the particular violation; it is not possible to bring an abstract complaint.[53] Therefore, an application alleging that Norwegian abortion legislation conflicted with Art 2 (guaranteeing protection of life) failed because the applicant did not allege that he had been personally affected by it (X v Norway).[54] However, there are two exceptions to this principle. First, the application can have a mixed nature: it can be partly abstract so long as there has been some personal impact on the applicant. In Donnelly v UK[55] the complaint concerned the allegation that the applicants had been tortured during their detention in Northern Ireland. They also wanted a full investigation of the whole system of interrogation employed by the security forces. It was found that so long as the applicants had been affected, a more wide ranging review was possible in the public interest, and the complaint was admissible on that basis. Second, a potential victim may make a complaint if the circumstances are such that the complainant is unsure whether or not he or she is a victim of a violation of a Convention right. This was found to be the case in a complaint concerning the possibility that the applicants' telephones were being tapped (Klass v Federal Republic of Germany)[56] where, by virtue of the very nature of the action complained of, it was impossible for the applicants to be certain that they had been affected.

Individual applications – procedure

The process of making a complaint remained a long drawn out one and was extremely cumbersome despite some improvement to it undertaken in 1990 under the Eighth Protocol. At present, despite the Protocol 11 reforms, there are still a very large number of hurdles to be overcome which arise, in particular, from the question of admissibility. In essentials, the procedure remains the same, although the role of the Commission has been removed. (Under the Protocol 14 reforms, discussed below, the hurdles will be made more difficult to overcome.) A number of stages can be identified.

Pre-complaint

Before lodging the application, it must appear that:

(a) prima facie, a violation of one or more of the rights or freedoms contained in the Convention has taken place. This refers to Arts 2–14 and, as far as the UK is concerned, the First and Sixth Protocols;

53 Klass v Federal Republic of Germany (1978) 2 EHRR 214.
54 Appl 867/60, 4 YB 270, 276; see also Vijayanathan v France (1992) 15 EHRR 62.
55 Appl 5577–82/72, Yearbook XVI.
56 Judgment of 6 September 1978 A 28 (1979–80); 2 EHRR 214 (see (1980) 130 NLJ 999).

(b) the available domestic remedies have been exhausted (Art 35);
(c) the application has been made within six months of the final decision of the highest competent court or authority (Art 35(1)).

These questions will be considered at the stage of determination of admissibility, so they will not be discussed now, but chronologically, they arise before the question of admissibility and it should be borne in mind that prima facie they must be fulfilled before the complaint can be set in motion. Whether they are fulfilled will be determined by a Chamber of the Court.[57] It is worth noting that of 34,297 applications submitted to the Commission up to December 1996, only 3,458 were ultimately declared admissible.[58]

Registration of the complaint

Registration merely means that an application is pending before the Court; it has no bearing on admissibility. The Court Registry (previously the Secretary to the Commission) will open a provisional file on the complaint. The Court may indicate a preliminary view of admissibility to the complainant. This may imply that the complaint had better be withdrawn. This practice is open to criticism since it may appear to the applicant that the application is inadmissible although its admissibility has not been fully considered. It is an additional means of cutting down on the very large number of applications.

Determination of the admissibility of the complaint

Determining the question of admissibility was the Commission's main function and it is still the main method of filtering out applications. Under the current arrangements, when an application is made, it is assigned to a Chamber of the Court which designates a Judge Rapporteur to examine it.[59] Having given it consideration, the Judge refers it to a Committee or to a Chamber.[60] Under a new 'fast track' procedure the Committee can decide, by a unanimous vote only, that the application is inadmissible.[61] If so, the decision is not subject to appeal.[62] If it does not so decide, it refers the application to the Chamber for the decision on admissibility and the consideration of the merits.[63]

The complaint must satisfy the admissibility conditions as follows:

(a) The application must not constitute an abuse of the right of complaint.[64] This condition is not often used; it concerns either the aim of applicant – it may appear that the case is obviously being brought for political propaganda purposes – or his or her conduct.

57 Article 29(1).
58 Noted in Van Dijk and Van Hoof, Theory and Practice of the ECHR, 1998, p 45: figures from European Commission on HR Survey of Activities and Statistics, 1996.
59 Rule 49(2).
60 Rule 49(3)(b).
61 Article 28 and Rule 53(2).
62 Rule 53(2).
63 Article 29(1).
64 Article 35(3) (previously Art 27(2)).

(b) Under Art 35(1)(b), the matter must not be the same as a matter already examined.[65] This means that unless it contains relevant new information, the complaint must not concern a matter 'which is substantially the same as a matter which has already been examined by the Court or has already been submitted to another procedure or international investigation or settlement or contains no relevant new information'.[66] The limitation in respect of complaints submitted to another international organ has not, in practice, been of significance; no UK complaints have been rejected on this basis. This is mainly because the UK has not accepted the individual right of complaint to the UN Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. The limitation in respect of previous complaints made to the Court (previously the Commission) refers to substantially similar applications. If the same applicant makes a complaint, new facts are needed if it is not to be rejected.[67]

(c) The application must not be incompatible with the provisions of the Convention.[68] This provision encompasses a number of aspects. Incompatibility will occur if:

- the application claims violation of a right not guaranteed by the Convention. This includes the substantive rights of Section 1 (Arts 2–14) and, as far as the UK is concerned, the First and Sixth Protocols. However, it may be that the right in question does not appear in the Convention, but that if the claim is not granted, violation of one of the Convention rights might then occur; the right claimed may thereby acquire indirect protection;
- the application claims violation of a right which is the subject of a derogation (Art 15) or reservation (Art 64) by the relevant Member state.[69] Thus, the right does appear in the Convention, but the state in question is not, at present, bound to abide by it. A reservation is made when a state ratifies the Convention, while a derogation may be made if an emergency arises, thus suspending part of the state's Convention obligations. Some rights, as will be seen, are non-derogable, because they are viewed as particularly fundamental;
- the applicant or respondent are persons or states incompetent to appear before the Commission. An application from an individual can only be directed against those states which are Contracting Parties. Further, the complaint must be directed against an organ of government, not against individuals.[70] However, the violation of the Convention by an individual may involve the responsibility of the state. The state may have encouraged the acts in question or failed to prevent or remedy them. Thus, the condition will be fulfilled if the state is in some way responsible for the alleged violation. This is an aspect of the phenomenon known as Drittwirkung, which means that human rights provisions can affect the legal relations between private individuals, not only between individuals and the public authorities;[71]

65 Previously Art 27(b).
66 Article 32(2)(b).
67 X v UK (1981) 25 DR 147.
68 Article 27(2).
69 These provisions are discussed below, pp 110–12.
70 See, e.g., Nielsen v Denmark (1988) 11 EHRR 175.
71 See Van Dijk and Van Hoof, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 1, Part 6. For commentary on Drittwirkung, see Alkema, E, 'The third party applicability or Drittwirkung of the ECHR in protecting human rights', in The European Dimension, 1988, pp 33–45.

- the application is aimed at the destruction or limitation of one of the rights or freedoms guaranteed by the Convention and therefore conflicts with Art 17. The intention is to prevent an applicant claiming a right which would enable him or her to carry out activities which ultimately would lead to the destruction of the guaranteed rights. Therefore, the Commission rejected the application of the banned German Communist Party due to its aims (Kommunistische Partei Deutschland v Federal Republic of Germany).[72] This provision suggests that the Convention adopts a teleological view of freedom; in other words, freedom is valued instrumentally as something which will lead to benefit for society as a whole, rather than as being a good in itself.

(d) Domestic remedies must have been exhausted.[73] In brief, this means that the applicant must provide prima facie evidence of exhaustion of remedies. The burden then shifts to the state to show that a remedy was reasonably ascertainable by the applicant, that the remedy does exist and has not been exhausted and that the remedy is effective. The requirement that domestic remedies must have been exhausted refers to: the 'legal remedies available under the local law which are in principle capable of providing an effective and sufficient means of redressing the wrongs for which the Respondent state is said to be responsible'.[74] If there is a doubt as to whether a remedy is available, Art 35 (previously Art 26) will not be satisfied unless the applicant has taken proceedings in which that doubt can be resolved.[75] This generally means that judicial procedures must be instituted up to the highest court which can affect the decision but also, if applicable, appeal must be made to administrative bodies. However, the applicant only needs to exhaust those possibilities which offer an effective remedy, so if part of the complaint is the lack of a remedy under Art 13, then the application is not likely to be ruled inadmissible on this ground.[76] A remedy will be ineffective if, according to established case law, there appears to be no chance of success,[77] and the Court will decide whether a remedy did in fact offer the applicant the possibility of sufficient redress. If there is a doubt as to whether a given remedy is able to offer a real chance of success, that doubt must be resolved in the national court itself.[78] Until recently, the Court viewed judicial review as a sufficient remedy,[79] but this is no longer necessarily the case, as explained below.[80] If it can be said that the state practice complained of is a repetition of one that is in breach of the Convention, but tolerated by the state authorities, it may be argued that taking the proceedings available would be ineffective.[81]

The application must have been submitted within a period of six months from the date on which the final national decision was taken (Art 36(1)). Time runs from 72 Appl 250/57, Yearbook I (1955–57), Vol 6, p 222.

73 Article 35(1) (previously Arts 26 and 27(3)).
74 Nielsen v Denmark Appl No 343/57; (1958–59) 2 YB 412, p 412.
75 De Vargattirgah v France, Appl 9559/81.
76 X v UK (1981) Appl 7990/77; 24 D & R 77.
77 Appl 5874/172, Yearbook XVII (1974). See H v UK 33 D & R 247(1983) (Counsel's opinion as to inefficacy sufficient). Cf K, F and P v UK 40 D & R 298 (1984).
78 Spencer v UK (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105.
79 See Vilvarajah and Four Others v UK (1991) Judgment of 30 October 1991; Appl 12 (1991).
80 See below, p 107.
81 Akdivar v Turkey (1997) 23 EHRR 143, paras 66–67.

the decision taken by the last national authority that had to be used and after the point when the decision has been notified to the applicant; ineffective remedies will not be taken into account in assessing the point from which time runs.

(e) The application must not be manifestly ill-founded (Art 35(3), previously Art 27(2)). Previously, this admissibility condition afforded a very significant power to the Commission. Formerly, the Commission was not empowered to act judicially and therefore it was not intended that it should come to a judgment on the merits of the application. Yet, when it made a determination as to manifest ill-foundedness, it was pronouncing on the merits because it was determining whether or not a prima facie violation had taken place. Thus, this condition created an extension of the role of the Commission behind the cloak of merely determining admissibility: it was, in fact, in a number of instances taking the final decision on the merits.

Under the current procedure, the Committee or a Chamber of the Court finds this condition unfulfilled if the facts obviously fail to disclose a violation. In theory, this ground should only operate if the ill-founded character of the application is clearly manifest. It has been said that 'the task of the Commission is not to determine whether an examination of the case submitted by the applicant discloses the actual violation of one of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Convention but only to determine whether it includes any possibility of the existence of such a determination'.[82] In practice, the Commission went further: the ill-founded character of the application was not always as manifest as this would imply. This was clear from the Commission's voting procedure: it was not necessary to have unanimity on this condition; a bare majority was sufficient. Under the current arrangements it is necessary to have unanimity if a Committee declares the application inadmissible,[83] but a majority if a Chamber does so. Although it is more satisfactory that the decision is being taken judicially, it is arguable that it should have been necessary to have unanimity or a two-thirds majority as to a finding of manifest ill-foundedness by a Chamber, even though a bare majority suffices in respect of the other conditions.

The examination of the application and friendly settlements under Art 38(1)(b)

If the application is declared admissible, the Court places itself at the disposal of the parties under Art 38(1)(b) with a view to securing a friendly settlement between the parties. If both parties are willing, they can reach a friendly settlement straight after the application has been declared admissible.[84] The settlement is a compromise; its danger is that it could aid in maintaining lower standards of human rights in particular states than the Convention allows, although, under Art 38(1)(b), the settlement should be on the basis of the respect for human rights accorded by the Convention. This may mean that, if the state Party in question is prepared to pay compensation and the victim 82 Pataki, Appl 596/59, Yearbook III (1960).

83 Rule 53(3).

84 If a friendly settlement is reached, the Commission will draw up a report stating the facts and solution reached. Up to the end of 1996, 324 friendly settlements had been reached.

is willing to receive it, the Court may nevertheless continue the examination of the application if the respect for human rights under the Convention demands that it should do so (Art 37(1)). In other words, the Court should have regard to its general purpose of improving human rights protection and not just the particular interest of the victim. By this means, it could prevent further applications from the same state alleging the same violation. In fact, this power is rarely invoked.[85] If the application is declared admissible and no friendly settlement is reached, it is examined under Art 38(1)(a).

Under the old procedure, if no settlement was reached, the Commission would state its Opinion as to the alleged violation in the Report to the Committee of Ministers.[86] The Report generally only went to individual applicants if the Court considered it. After having declared the application admissible, the Commission could still, after further examination, declare it inadmissible.[87]

The judgment of the Court

Prior to the Protocol 11 reforms, the Court could not hear a case unless it had gone through all the Commission's procedure and a Report had gone to the Committee of Ministers. The fact, as mentioned above, that the individual in question could not refer the case to Court[88] did not seem odd at the inception of the Convention, when the right of individual petition in itself seemed controversial. However, it came to seem increasingly anomalous, and provided part of the impetus for reform. The Commission was likely, however, to bring the case before the Court and did bring the vast majority of cases once it had found them admissible. In exercising its discretion as to bringing a case before the Committee of Ministers or the Court, the Commission, as indicated above, was influenced by its nature. In general, a difficult question would go to the Court while, if the Commission was unanimous that no breach had occurred, it would go to the Committee. The trend was to refer far more cases to the Court in relation to the number of cases declared admissible.

The Court was not bound by the Report of the Commission. The function of the Commission was 'to present to the Court the issues in the case and all the relevant information which we ourselves have obtained concerning the case'.[89] The Court could disagree with points of the Commission's decisions; it could consider admissibility again and then reject the application as inadmissible. In other words, the Court was no more bound by the Commission on admissibility than it was on Opinion. It was 85 Tyrer v UK (1978) 2 EHRR 1.

86 (Old) Art 31 provided that if a solution was not reached, the Commission would draw up a Report on the facts and state its Opinion as to whether the facts found disclosed a breach by the state concerned of its obligations under the Convention. The Opinions of all the members of the Commission on this point could be stated in the Report.

87 (Old) Art 29. At this stage, if it was to be rejected, it had to be rejected unanimously. In such a case, the decision could be communicated to the parties.

88 Under (old) Art 48, the following could bring a case before the Court: the Commission; a High Contracting Party whose national was alleged to be a victim; a High Contracting Party which referred the case to the Commission; a High Contracting Party against which the complaint had been lodged. But Protocol 11 gave the individual the right to seize the Court under Art 34.

89 Lawless, A 1 (1960–61), p 360; (1961) 1 EHRR 15.

arguable that this procedure did not maintain equality between the parties, because a negative decision on admissibility would never come before the Court, while a positive one would.[90] However, in practice, the Court tended to agree with the Commission on admissibility. Nevertheless, this and other aspects of the proceedings before the Court and Commission did involve a duplication of function which was time consuming and so supported the argument for abolition of the Commission.

Under the current procedure, the proceedings before the Chamber of seven judges will consist of a written stage, followed by a hearing.[91] The Chamber may appoint one or more of its members to conduct the initial examination. The arrangements are characterised by their flexibility: within the Rules, the Court is free to decide on a procedure which can be tailored to the nature of a particular application[92] and this may include visiting a particular place, such as a prison. An on-the-spot inquiry can be conducted by a delegate of the Court. The Court can also order a report from an expert on any matter. After this initial stage, the Chamber will normally conduct an oral hearing if there has been no oral admissibility hearing.

The applicant used to be in a weak position in the hearing. Previously, he or she did not have any right to take part in the proceedings; after a change in the rules of procedure in 1982, an applicant could be heard as a person providing clarification. Under the current Protocol 11 procedure, each of the parties can address the Court; in practice, hearings take half a day and each party is given 45 minutes to make oral submissions. If a violation appears to be established, the state must attempt to demonstrate that the case falls within an exception to the right in question. The Court is not bound by its own judgments.[93] Nevertheless, it usually follows and applies its own precedents unless departure from them is indicated in order to ensure that interpretation of the Convention reflects social change.

The procedure before the Court may conclude before the judgment on the merits if the state settles. However, the Court does not have to discontinue the procedure; it can proceed in the interests of the Convention and may give a declaratory judgment even though the state is now willing to settle. The judgment does not state what remedial measures should be taken; it is up to the state to amend its legislation or make other changes in order to conform with the judgment. Thus, a response may well be in doubtful conformity with the Convention.[94] The Court is not ultimately a coercive body and relies for acceptance of its judgments on the willingness of states to abide by the Convention. Under Art 45, reasons must be given for the judgment of the Court and if the judgment does not represent in whole or in part the unanimous opinion of the 90 See Van Oosterwijck v Belgium, Judgment of 6 November 1980, A 40; (1980) 3 EHRR 557. The Court disagreed with the Commission's decision that the application was admissible; the Court held that local remedies had not been exhausted; thus the Court's decision was not on the merits.

91 Under Art 55, the Court shall draw up its own rules and determine its own procedure.

92 See Rule 42(2).

93 Rule 51, para 1 of the Rules of the Court. See Feldman, D, 'Precedent and the European Court of Human Rights' Law Com Consultation Paper No 157 (1999), Appl C.

94 The Contempt of Court Act 1981 may be said to represent such a response to the ruling that UK contempt law violated Art 10 in that it preserved common law contempt, which appears, especially since the decision in AG v Times Newspapers Ltd (see Chapter 5, pp 335–37), to give insufficient weight to freedom of speech.

judges, any judge shall be entitled to deliver a separate opinion. Under (old) Art 52, the judgment of the Court was final,[95] but now under Art 43 it can be referred to the Grand Chamber 'in exceptional cases' for judgment. Under Art 44, the judgment of the Grand Chamber is final, while a judgment of a Chamber will become final: when the parties declare that they will not request referral to the Grand Chamber; or, where after three months no such request has been made; or where the panel of the Grand Chamber rejects the request. Under Art 46, the judgment of the Court is binding on the state Party involved.

The Court can award compensation under Art 41. The purpose of the reparation is to place the applicant in the position he would have been in had the violation not taken place. It will include costs unless the applicant has received legal aid. It can also include loss of earnings, travel costs, fines and costs unjustly awarded against the applicant. It can also include intangible or non-pecuniary losses which may be awarded due to unjust imprisonment or stress.[96]

Supervision of the judgment by the Committee of Ministers

Under Art 46, the Committee is charged with supervising the execution of the Court's judgment. This includes both the judgment on the merits and on compensation. The Committee notes the action taken to redress the violation on the basis of information given by the state in question. If the state fails to execute the judgment, the Committee decides what measures to take: it can bring political pressure to bear, including suspension or even, as a final sanction, expulsion from the Council of Europe. Doubts have been raised over the fitness of the Committee to oversee one of the key stages in the whole Convention process, namely the implementation of national law to bring it into line with the findings of the Court.[97] It is apparent that a rigorous analysis of the changes that the offending state has made in its law would be desirable, to ensure that the judgment is fully implemented and to make future similar breaches of the Convention by that state impossible. The Committee would not prima facie appear to be capable of carrying out such a quasi-judicial role and, indeed, it appears that in practice the Committee usually merely notes the receipt of the state's explanation of the changes it has made without any attempt to conduct the kind of analysis which it is suggested should be undertaken.

The question of the full implementation of a judgment of the Court arose in Olsson v Sweden (No 2).[98] The applicants complained that despite a previous judgment of the Court to the effect that a violation of the Convention had occurred, the Swedish authorities had continued the practice, which was contrary to the Convention. However, 95 As noted above, this is no longer the case under Art 43 of the Convention.

96 Eg, in the Young, James and Webster case (1981) Judgment of 13 August 1981, Appl 44; (1981) 4 EHRR 38, pecuniary and non-pecuniary costs were awarded: the Court ordered £65,000 to be paid. See further Chapter 4, pp 242–43.

97 See Leuptracht, P, 'The protection of human rights by political bodies', in Nowak, M, Steurer, P and Tretter, H (eds) Progress in the Spirit of Human Rights, Strasbourg, 1988, pp 95–107.

98 A 250. Note that a similar issue arose in Christie v UK (No 21482/93, 78-A DR 119) which was, however, found inadmissible by the Commission.

the Court found that the fresh complaint raised a new issue and that therefore, the question as to whether the state had fulfilled its obligations under Art 53 by implementing the judgment did not arise. Thus, this judgment avoided addressing the Art 53 issue. However, it is suggested that the Court should be able to rule on the question whether measures introduced to implement its own judgment are sufficient. If it became clear that it could do so, one of the main concerns regarding the procedure for supervising its judgments would be addressed, although there seems to be a case for also requiring more of the Committee in terms of analysing the measures taken to implement the judgment. The role of the Committee in supervising judgments under (old) Art 53 was retained under Protocol 11, reflecting the view that its authority has played a part in persuading states to adopt measures implementing the judgment of the Court. Reforms under Protocol 14 will afford the Court a role in enforcing its judgments once Protocol 14 comes into force.

Protocol 14 reforms

Protocol 14 follows on from Protocol 11 in introducing changes designed to improve the efficiency of operation of the Court. The volume of cases remains a problem and the Court's case load is unacceptably high. Under Protocol 14 cases that have less chance of succeeding will be 'filtered' out, as will those that are broadly similar to cases brought previously against the same Member state. Moreover, a case will not be considered admissible where an applicant has not suffered a 'significant disadvantage'. This latter ground can only be used when an examination of the application on the merits is not considered necessary and where the subject-matter of the application had already been considered by a national court. The UK Joint Committee on Human Rights broadly welcomed the contents of Protocol 14, since it considered that it included many positive aspects which should improve the functioning of the control system of the Convention. But it found that the introduction of a new requirement that an applicant to the European Court of Human Rights must have suffered a 'significant disadvantage', was 'very controversial' because it restricts the right of individual petition.[99]

Significantly, a new mechanism is introduced with Protocol 14 to assist enforcement of judgments by the Committee of Ministers. The Committee can ask the Court for an interpretation of a judgment and can even bring a Member state before the Court for non-compliance with a previous judgment against that state. Thus although Protocol 14 could be viewed as a retrograde step in human rights terms, since a higher number of cases will be declared inadmissible under its reforms, adverse judgments against Member states that are given have a higher chance of being implemented.

Protocol 14 also amends Art 59 of the Convention, allowing for the European Union to accede to it. So far, Protocol 14 has been signed by every Council of Europe Member state. All forty five Member states have ratified the Protocol; only Russia has failed to do so. Protocol 14 will come into force only when it has been ratified by all Member states.

99 1st Report Session 2004–5.

The doctrine of the 'margin of appreciation'[100]

The European Court of Human Rights has stated that the role of the Convention in protecting human rights is subsidiary to the role of the national legal system[101] and that since the state is better placed than the international judge to balance individual rights against general societal interests, Strasbourg will operate a restrained review of the balance struck. Under this doctrine, a degree of discretion will be allowed to Member states as to legislative, administrative or judicial action in the area of a Convention right. However, Strasbourg will finally determine whether such action is reconcilable with the guarantee in question.

The doctrine of the margin of appreciation conceded to states was first adopted in respect of emergency situations,[102] but it was allowed to affect the application of all the Articles although it has a particular application with respect to para 2 of Arts 8–11. It has now reached the stage where it can be said that it permeates the Convention jurisprudence. In different instances, a wider or narrower margin of appreciation has been allowed. The width allowed depends on a number of factors including the aim of the interference in question and its necessity. If a broader margin is allowed, Strasbourg review will be highly circumscribed. For example, the minority in the Sunday Times case[103] (nine judges) wanted to confine the role of Strasbourg to asking only whether the discretion in question was exercised in good faith and carefully and whether the measure was reasonable in the circumstances. A narrow margin conceded to the state means that a rigorous or intensive review of the proportionality between the aim of an interference and the extent and nature of the interference will be undertaken. This occurred in the Sunday Times case; it was held that Strasbourg review was not limited to asking whether the state had exercised its discretion reasonably, carefully and in good faith; it was found that the state's conduct must also be examined in Strasbourg to see whether it was compatible with the Convention.

Although the doctrine is well established, it has not been applied very consistently. Therefore, it is not always easy to predict when each approach will be taken, but a number of relevant factors may be identified. The nature of the right in question may be relevant. The doctrine is particularly applicable to the Arts 8–11 group of rights since it is used in determining whether an interference with the right is justifiable on grounds of one of the exceptions contained in para 2 of these Articles. Within this group, Art 10 may be viewed as particularly fundamental.[104] Also, the particular instance will be considered: does it concern, for example, a very significant need for 100 For general discussion of the doctrine, see McDonald, RJ, 'The margin of appreciation in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights', International Law and the Time of its Codification, 1987, pp 187–208; Van Dijk and Van Hoof, op. cit., fn 1, p 82 et seq; O'Donell, 'The margin of appreciation doctrine: standards in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights' (1982) 4 Human Rights Q 474; Morrisson, 'Margin of appreciation in human rights law' (1973) 6 Human Rights J 263; Morrisson, 'Margin of appreciation in human rights law' (1973) 6 Human Rights J 263; Jones, T, 'The devaluation of human rights under the European Convention' [1995] PL 430; Mahoney, P, 'Marvellous richness or invidious cultural relativism?' (1998) 19 Human Rights LJ 1.

101 Handyside v UK A 24, para 48 (1976).

102 See the Lawless case, Publ ECHR B 1 (1960–61), p 408; (1961) 1 EHRR 15.

103 Series A 30 (1979); 2 EHRR 245.

104 See, e.g., the judgment of the Court in Autronic AG v Switzerland (1990) 12 EHRR 485.

free expression since there is a strong public interest in the subject matter? The presence of such factors may predispose the Strasbourg authorities to conduct a wide ranging review. Such review also tends to be applicable under Arts 2[105] and 3,[106] although it may be narrowed where the state claims that the demands of national security justify the measures sought to be challenged under these Articles.[107] On the other hand, in considering the imposition of positive obligations placed on the state, a broad margin will be allowed.[108]

The nature of the restriction is significant. Some restrictions are seen as more subjective than others. It is therefore thought more difficult to lay down a common European standard and the Court and Commission have, in such instances, shown a certain willingness to allow the exceptions a wide scope in curtailing the primary rights. For example, Art 10 contains an exception in respect of the protection of morals. This was invoked in the Handyside case[109] in respect of suppression of a booklet aimed at schoolchildren which was circulating freely in the rest of Europe. It was held that the UK Government was best placed to determine what was needed in its own country in order to protect morals and, therefore, it could make an initial assessment of those requirements, which would then be considered for compatibility with Art 10 by Strasbourg.

The Court and Commission consider that in certain sensitive matters, most notably national security,[110] states are best placed to determine what is needed within their own particular domestic situation. Thus, emergency situations and the invocation of threats to national security invite deference. In Council of Civil Service Unions v UK[111] the European Commission, in declaring the Unions' application inadmissible, found that national security interests should prevail over freedom of association even though the national security interest was weak while the infringement of the primary right was very clear: an absolute ban on joining a trade union had been imposed. It is worth noting that the International Labour Organisation (ILO) Committee on Freedom of Association had earlier found that the ban breached the 1947 ILO Freedom of Association Convention. However, in general, if a restriction is very far-reaching, the Strasbourg authorities may be prepared to make a determination as to the need to impose it which differs from that of the state Party in question.[112]

The high (or low) point of deference was perhaps reached in Brannigan and McBride v UK,[113] in which the European Court of Human Rights upheld a derogation entered by the UK after the decision in the case of Brogan and Others v UK.[114] The Court found 'a wide margin of appreciation [on the question] of the presence of an emergency . . . and on the nature and scope of derogations necessary to avert it [should be allowed]'.[115]

105 McCann, Farrell and Savage v UK (1995) 21 EHRR 97, A 324, Council of Europe Report.
106 Soering v UK, Judgment of 7 July 1989, A 161; (1989) 11 EHRR 439.
107 Kröcher and Möller v Switzerland No 8463/78, 34 DR 25.
108 See Plattform 'Ärzte für Das Leben' v Austria (1988) 13 EHRR 204.
109 (1976) 1 EHRR 737.
110 See Leander v Sweden Series A 116, para 67 (1987).
111 No 11603/85, 50 DR 228 (1987); 10 EHRR 269.
112 See, e.g., Golder, Judgment of 21 February 1975; A 18. Discussed p 62.
113 Series A, 258-B (1993).
114 Judgement of 29 November 1988 (1989) Series A 145-B (1988); 11 EHRR 117. See further Chapter 11, p 1168.
115 Para 207.

The Court is greatly influenced by general practice in the Member states as a body and will interpret the Convention to reflect such practice so that a state which is clearly out of conformity with the others may expect an adverse ruling. However, where practice is still in the process of changing and may be said to be at an inchoate stage as far as the Member states generally are concerned, the Court may not be prepared to place itself at the forefront of such changes, although it will weigh the lack of a consensus against the degree of detriment to the applicant.[116] Thus, the notion of common standards strongly influences the doctrine of the margin of appreciation. Where a common standard, or a trend towards such a standard, cannot be discerned among Member states, greater deference to particular state practice is shown.[117] For example, the lack of a uniform standard was the key factor in the ruling in Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria.[118] The decision concerned the seizure of film likely to offend religious feeling. The European Court of Human Rights found that the film would receive protection under Art 10, but that its seizure fell within the 'rights of others' exception. In considering whether its seizure and forfeiture was 'necessary in a democratic society' in order to protect the rights of others to respect for their religious views (under Art 9), the Court took into account the lack of a uniform conception within the Member states of the significance of religion in society and therefore considered that the national authorities should have a wide margin of appreciation in assessing what was necessary to protect religious feeling. In this instance, the national authorities had not overstepped that margin and therefore, the Court found that no breach of Art 10 had occurred. Similarly, in Wingrove v UK[119] the Court found that the English common law offence of blasphemy was sufficiently clear and precise. The Court further found: 'there is as yet not sufficient common ground in the legal and social orders of the Member states of the Council of Europe to conclude that a system whereby a state can impose restrictions on the propagation of material on the basis that it is blasphemous is in itself unnecessary in a democratic society and incompatible with the Convention.'[120]

On the other hand, where a principle has received general acceptance in the Member states and, in particular, where it is closely linked to the notion of democracy, the Court will afford a narrow margin only. For example, in Socialist Party and Others v Turkey,[121] the Court found that the dissolution of the Socialist Party of Turkey had breached Art 11 since: 'there can be no democracy without pluralism . . . It is of the essence of democracy to allow diverse political programmes to be proposed and debated . . . Taking these matters into account . . . In determining whether a necessity existed, the Contracting state was found to possess only a limited margin of appreciation.' The picture is more confused where a principle may be said to have received some general acceptance within the Contracting states and where the Court itself appears to have espoused it in the past, but where it cannot clearly be said that a common standard can be found. Such confusion appears to underlie the remarks in Cossey v

116 Rees v UK (1986) 9 EHRR 56, A 106.
117 See Rees v UK, ibid at para 37.
118 Series A 295-A; (1994) 19 EHRR 34.
119 (1996) 24 EHRR 1.
120 Paragraph 57.
121 Judgment of 25 May 1998 (Appl No 20/1997/804/1007), (1999) 27 EHRR 51, paras 41, 47 and 50.

UK[122] of Judge Martens in his dissenting Opinion: 'this caution [in allowing a wide margin of appreciation based on a strict application of the common standards doctrine] is in principle not consistent with the Court's mission to protect the individual against the collectivity[123] . . . in this context [of legal recognition of gender reassignment] there simply is no room for a margin of appreciation.' Thus, even within the Court there is disagreement as to the interferences which fall within the margin conceded to the state. In the only decision of the Court finding a violation of the freedom of assembly guarantee of Art 11, Ezelin v France,[124] two of the partly dissenting judges considered that the interference in question fell within that margin,[125] although the majority found that the state had exceeded it.

As the discussion suggests, the margin of appreciation doctrine may tend to undermine the Convention and its growth has therefore attracted criticism. Van Dijk and Van Hoof have written of it as: 'a spreading disease. Not only has the scope of its application been broadened to the point where in principle none of the Convention rights or freedoms are excluded, but also has the illness been intensified in that wider versions of the doctrine have been added to the original concept'.[126] As mentioned at the beginning of this chapter, the doctrine may sometimes be appropriate as part of a general consensus-based approach to the supervision of the Convention. However, an arbitrariness is evident in its application, a theme which is pursued below and at a number of points in this book.

3 The substantive rights and freedoms

In what follows, an outline will be given of the scope of the Articles covering the substantive rights and freedoms. In the case of Arts 3, 5, 6 and 8–11, much more detailed treatment of decisions which are relevant to particular areas of UK law will be undertaken when those areas of domestic law are considered.

Article 2: Protection of life

(1) Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law. No one shall be deprived of his life intentionally save in the execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law.

(2) Deprivation of life shall not be regarded as inflicted in contravention of this article when it results from the use of force which is no more than absolutely necessary:

122 A 184 (1990).

123 Paragraph 5.6.3.

124 A 202-A (1991).

125 Judges Ryssdal and Pettiti, at pp 26 and 28–30.

126 Van Dijk, P and Van Hoof, F, The Theory and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1990, p 604. For further discussion of the doctrine see O'Donell, 'The margin of appreciation doctrine: standards in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights' (1982) 4 Human Rights Q 474; Morrisson, 'Margin of appreciation in human rights law' (1973) 6 Human Rights J 263; Jones, T, 'The devaluation of human rights under the European Convention' [1995] PL 430; Mahoney, P, 'Marvellous richness or invidious cultural relativism?' (1998) 19 Human Rights LJ 1.

(a) in defence of any person from unlawful violence;
(b) in order to effect a lawful arrest or to prevent the escape of a person lawfully detained;
(c) in action lawfully taken for the purpose of quelling a riot or insurrection.

The right to life can be viewed as the most fundamental of all human rights. Its significance receives recognition under all human rights' instruments[127] and its vital importance is recognised under UK common law.[128]

Scope of the right

Article 2 provides non-derogable protection of the right to life.[129] This might seem straightforward – governments are enjoined to refrain from the wanton killing of their subjects – but aside from that instance, it is not a straightforward matter to determine what the guarantee under Art 2 encompasses. The Court has said: 'the first sentence of Art 2 enjoins the state not only to refrain from the intentional and unlawful taking of life, but also to take appropriate steps to safeguard the lives of those within its jurisdiction'.[130] Thus, while the state must not order or empower its agents to kill its subjects, except within the specified exceptions, it also has further responsibilities under Art 2 to protect the right to life by law. But clearly, it is difficult to pinpoint the stage at which it may be said that the responsibility of a state for a person's death is so clear, the causal potency between the state's action or omission and the death so strong, that it is possible to find that the right to life has been violated.[131]

Decisions under Art 2 have not yet entirely clarified this issue, but they do suggest that two, usually distinct duties are placed on the national authorities, although their scope is unclear. First, as indicated, Art 2 places the public authorities under a duty not to take life except in certain specified circumstances. This duty covers intentional, officially-sanctioned killings (executions, deliberate killing to save life) and unintentional killings (where the risk of killing is taken by using lethal force in a riot situation). Where state agents do take life, the obligation to protect the right to life by law requires that 'there should be some form of effective official investigation'.[132] This requirement was found to be breached in Jordan, Kelly, Arthurs, Donelly and Others v UK[133] in respect of the killing of eight IRA members by the SAS in 1987. Second, Art 2 places a positive obligation on the state authorities to protect the right to life

127 Although in, e.g., the US and India, the right is protected only on a 'due process' basis. Deprivation of life can occur, but it must be in accordance with the due process of the law.

128 It is recognised in the crimes of murder, manslaughter and infanticide. The deliberate killing of another human being is viewed as requiring to be marked out from other crimes by means of the mandatory life sentence penalty. For an early response of the UK courts to Art 2 under the HRA see below, p 77. For a full discussion, see Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 7.

129 See Art 15(2). Derogation is not allowed in times of emergency or war; derogation is only possible in respect of death resulting from acts of war themselves.

130 LCB v UK (1998) 27 EHRR 212, para 36.

131 See further Sieghart, P, The Lawful Rights of Mankind, 1986, Clarendon, Chapter 11.

132 McCann v UK (1995) 21 EHRR 97, para 161.

133 (2001) The Times, 18 May.

by law. This positive obligation may take a number of forms. It requires that reasonable steps be taken in order to enforce the law in order to protect citizens (X v UK and Ireland).[134] It was held in W v UK[135] that these measures will not be scrutinised in detail. Clearly, the state may not be able to prevent every attack on an individual without an enormous expenditure of resources.[136] Therefore, the Convention will leave a wide margin of discretion to the national authorities in this regard, although the state will be under some duty to maintain reasonable public security.[137] Where state agents' actions are very closely linked to the preservation of a known individual's life as, for example, the actions of police officers are during a hostage situation, the state will be under a positive obligation not only to seek to preserve life, but also to act reasonably in so doing. The need to preserve life in the immediate situation would appear to override the general duty to maintain state security and prevent crime. These notions seem to underlie the findings of the Commission in Andronicou and Constantinou v Cyprus.[138] Article 2 was found to have been violated by Cypriot police when, in attempting to deal with a siege situation in which a hostage had been taken, they fired a number of times at the hostage taker, killing the hostage. The number of bullets fired reflected, it was found, a response which lacked caution.

Similarly, situations may arise in which, while state agents do not directly take life, the state is responsible for creating a life-threatening situation. Where the state has directly created such a situation, its responsibility will arguably be greater. In LCB v UK,[139] the applicant had contracted leukaemia; her father had been present during British nuclear tests on Christmas Island. She complained of a breach of Art 2 since the state had not advised her parents to monitor her health. In deciding that no breach had occurred, the Court found, taking into account the information that was available at the time, that the state had done all it was required to do to prevent an avoidable risk to her life. Had the information regarding the risk been available at the time, the decision might well have gone the other way, implying that the Court is prepared in principle to hold the state responsible in such instances.

Such an instance may be distinguished from a situation created by others, or by natural causes but in which it may be said that the state still has some responsibility. The positive obligation may entail the taking of appropriate steps to safeguard life[140] where state agents do not themselves unintentionally take life and/or the state itself has not created the life-threatening situation, but the breadth of this duty is unclear. It seems that it will include the provision of adequate medical care in prisons[141] since, 134 Appl 9829/82 (not published).

135 Appl 9348/81, 32 D & R (1983), p 190.

136 It was accepted in Osman v UK (1998) 29 EHRR 245 that the obligation to protect the right to life had to be interpreted 'in a way that does not impose an impossible or disproportionate burden on the authorities' (para 116). In that instance, the police had failed to take measures to prevent a murder taking place despite very strong indications that the victim was in imminent danger. See further below, on the Art 6 issue in the case, p 62.

137 Appl 7145/75, Association X v UK (1978) Appl 7154/75; 14 DR 31.

138 (1996) 22 EHRR CD 18.

139 (1998) 27 EHRR 212.

140 X v UK, No 7154/75, 14 D & R 31 (1978), p 32.

141 Simon-Herald v Austria, Appl 430/69 CD 38 (the application was declared admissible and a friendly settlement was later reached).

in this instance, the state is directly responsible for the welfare of citizens during their imprisonment. However, it is unclear how far the individual should have a right to secure the expenditure of resources so that the state can save or preserve his or her life. The state may bear some responsibility in a number of instances. For example, a person might die due to poor housing conditions after repeated pleas for re-housing, or due to deficiencies in health care such as a lack of a vaccination programme or poor implementation of the programme,[142] or to exposure to bacteria in certain parts of a hospital while suffering from a condition weakening the immune system. Road traffic regulations and their implementation engage the state's responsibility; life might be put at risk, for example, due to a failure to impose a particular speed limit in poor driving conditions.

The Court is proceeding cautiously in relation to the state's positive obligations under Art 2. It has shown some reluctance to read Art 2 so widely as to cover such situations, although there are indications that this stance may be changing. In Guerra v Italy,[143] it was said that the time may be ripe for 'the court's case law on Article 2 . . . to start evolving, to develop the respective implied rights, articulate situations of real and serious risk to life or different aspects of the right to life'.

In LCB v UK, the Christmas Island case mentioned above,[144] the state had a direct responsibility for the lives in question and the expenditure of resources to meet it would not have been burdensome, whereas in relation to the provision of housing of a certain standard, the responsibility is less direct and immediate, and the impact on resource allocation much greater. The issue of imposing a speed limit in particular conditions raises questions of the directness of the responsibility. Drivers would be expected to drive in accordance with the road conditions. Moreover, there would be no direct relationship between those state agents involved in traffic control and those affected. The obligation to provide health care in order to save life and to regulate hospitals in such a way as to protect life has, however, been recognised.[145]

It is unclear how far Art 2 places states under an obligation to seek to ensure the continuance of life where the individual involved, or those acting on his or her behalf, wish it to end. The Commission has found that passively allowing a person to die need not attract criminal liability in order to satisfy Art 2.[146] This might apply to allowing a handicapped baby or a patient in a persistent vegetative state to die.[147] However, a breach of Art 2 would probably be found where a positive act had occurred in order to end life.

The question has arisen in the context of national legislation on abortion whether the foetus can fall within the interpretation of 'everyone', but it has been determined that even if the foetus is protected, its right to life will be weighed against the mother's life

142 See Association X v UK (1978) Appl 7154/75; 14 DR 31.

143 (1998) 26 EHRR 357, p 387.

144 LCB v UK (1998) 27 EHRR 212, para 36.

145 Scialacqua v Italy (1998) 26 EHRR CD 164 and Erikson v Italy, Appl 37900/97, 26 October 1999.

146 Widmer v Switzerland, No 20527/92 (1993) unreported.

147 The position under British law seems to be that failing to intervene to save the life of a handicapped baby may be acceptable in some circumstances: see Arthur (unreported), discussed by Gunn, M, and Smith, JC [1985] Crim LR 705; Re B (A Minor) [1981] 1 WLR 1421, CA. Allowing a patient in a persistent vegetative state to die will be acceptable if it can be said, objectively, to be in his or her best interests because no improvement can be expected (Airedale NHS Trust v Bland [1993] AC 789, HL).

and physical and mental health.[148] In Paton v UK[149] it was found by the Commission that Art 2 applies only to persons who have been born. Had the Commission found otherwise, all national legislation in the Member states permitting abortion would have been in breach of Art 2, since abortion even to save the mother's life would not appear to be covered by any of the exceptions. H v Norway[150] clarified the position. The Commission found that the lawful abortion of a 14-week foetus on social grounds did not breach Art 2. It took this stance on the basis that since the state Parties' laws on abortion differ considerably from each other, a wide margin of discretion should be allowed. It appears that the abortion laws within the Member states probably comply with Art 2, although in Open Door Counselling v Ireland the Court left open the possibility that Art 2 might place some restrictions on abortion.[151]

Exceptions

A very significant express exception to Art 2, limiting the scope of para 1, is in respect of the death penalty, which also includes extradition to a country where the death penalty is in force.[152] Protocol 6 has now removed the death penalty exception and it was ratified by the UK on 27 January 1999. It may be possible to challenge use of the death penalty in countries which have not ratified Protocol 6 under other Convention rights, such as Art 3.[153]

Generally, the para 2 exceptions are reasonably straightforward and are aimed mainly at unintentional deprivation of life. This was explained in Stewart v UK,[154] which concerned the use of plastic bullets in a riot. It was found that para 2 is concerned with situations where the use of violence is allowed as necessary force and may, as an unintended consequence, result in loss of life. On this basis, the use of plastic bullets was found to fall within its terms. However, paras 2(a), (b) and (c) also cover instances where the force used was bound to endanger life and was intended to do so, but was necessary in the circumstances. Thus, national laws recognising the right to use self-defence are, in principle, in harmony with para 2(a). Clearly, the state can use lethal force where absolutely necessary in order to quell a riot. But, the necessity will be carefully scrutinised: state agents must act with caution in resorting to lethal force.[155]

Also, in certain circumstances, the state can sanction the use of force with the intention of killing. It can do so, however, only when such force is absolutely necessary

148 X v UK, Appl 8416/78; 19 D & R (1980), p 244.

149 (1981) 3 EHRR 408. It has been argued that a woman's right to an abortion must therefore have been impliedly accepted: Rendel, M (1991) 141 NLJ 1270.

150 No 17004/90 (1992) 73 DR 155.

151 Eur Ct HR, Judgment of 29 October 1992; (1992) 15 EHRR 244. For comment, see (1992) 142 NLJ 1696.

152 Appl 10227/82, X v Spain D & R 37 (1984), p 93.

153 See Soering, below, pp 46–47 (59–60) in relation to Art 3.

154 Appl 10044/82; D & R 39 (1985); (1985) 7 EHRR 453; see also Kelly v UK (1993) 16 EHRR 20, in which the European Commission found that the use of force to prevent future terrorist acts was allowable. For criticism of the decision in Kelly, see (1994) 144 NLJ 354.

155 A breach of Art 2 was found in Gulec v Turkey (1999) 28 EHRR 121: gendarmes had fired into a crowd to disperse it; less forceful means could have been used.

for the fulfilment of one of the para 2 purposes. This issue was considered by the Commission in Kelly v UK,[156] in which a young joyrider was shot dead by soldiers in Northern Ireland when he tried to evade an army checkpoint. It was found that the application was manifestly ill-founded, since the use of force was justified. However, it can be argued that this finding does not represent a strict application of a strict proportionality test. Kelly was apparently shot in order to prevent him escaping, but it would not appear that it was 'absolutely necessary' to shoot to kill in the circumstances, since it might well have been possible to arrest him later.

The Court addressed the question of the strictness of the 'absolutely necessary' test in McCann, Farrell and Savage v UK,[157] the first judgment of the Court to find a breach of Art 2. The case concerned the shooting by SAS soldiers of three IRA members on the street in Gibraltar. The UK argued that this was justified on the basis that they apparently had with them a remote control device which they might have used to detonate a bomb. The Court found that para 2 primarily describes situations 'where it is permitted to use force which may result, as an unintended outcome in the deprivation of life', but that para 2 would also cover the intentional deprivation of life. However, the use of force must be no more than absolutely necessary for the achievement of one of the para 2 purposes and the test of necessity to be used was stricter than that used in respect of the test under paragraph 2 of Arts 8–11. The main question for the Court was the extent to which the state's response to the perceived threat posed by the IRA members was proportionate to that threat. The Court found that the use of force could be justified where 'it is based on an honest belief which is perceived for good reason to be valid at the time but which subsequently turns out to be mistaken. To hold otherwise would be to impose an unrealistic burden on the state and its law enforcement personnel.' Following this finding, the Court found that the actions of the soldiers who carried out the shooting did not amount to a violation of Art 2.

However, the organisation and planning of the whole operation had to be considered in order to discover whether the requirements of Art 2 had been respected. The Court focused on the decision not to arrest the suspects when they entered Gibraltar. This decision was taken because it was thought that there might have been insufficient evidence against them to warrant their charge and trial. However, this decision subjected the population of Gibraltar to possible danger. The Court considered that taking this factor into account and bearing in mind that they had been shadowed by the SAS soldiers for some time, the suspects could have been arrested at that point. Further, there was quite a high probability that the suspects were on a reconnaissance mission at the time of the shootings and not a bombing mission. This possibility, the possibility that there was no car bomb or that the suspects had no detonator, was not conveyed to the soldiers and since they were trained to shoot to kill, the killings were rendered almost inevitable. All these factors were taken into account in finding that the killing of the three constituted a use of force which was more than absolutely necessary in defence of persons from unlawful violence within the meaning of para 2(a) of Art 2. The state had sanctioned killing by state agents in circumstances which gave rise to a breach of Art 2.

156 Appl 17579/90; (1993) 16 EHRR CD 20; 74 D & R 139 (1993).
157 (1995) 21 EHRR 97, A 324, Council of Europe Report.

This was a bold decision which departs from the stance taken in Kelly. It emphasises that a strict proportionality test must be used in determining issues under para 2 of Art 2. Applying this test, it would appear that where an alternative to the deliberate use of deadly force exists, it should always be taken. It would therefore seem that the use of such force to effect an arrest would never be justified except where, in the circumstances, there was near-certainty that the suspect would kill if allowed to escape. This might apply, for example, in situations where hostages had been taken and threats against them issued. It would also apply in circumstances similar to those arising in McCann, but where no opportunity for apprehension had previously arisen and where there was a stronger likelihood that a bomb might be about to be detonated. In such instances, of course, both sub-paras (a) and (b) of Art 2(2) would be in question and it therefore appears that the McCann judgment leaves little room for the operation of sub-para (b) independently of sub-para (a) McCann and Kelly make clear the partially subjective nature of the judgment as to when the use of deadly force is 'absolutely necessary'. Article 2 itself does not make it clear whether the phrase 'absolutely necessary' is to be treated objectively or subjectively. On its face it is unclear whether Art 2 would be breached where the person using such force honestly believed, due to a mistake, that it was necessary, although in actuality it was not. In such a case, Art 2 would not be breached if there were also reasonable grounds for believing that such force was necessary. It may be noted that this stance is not in accord with UK law, which allows the use of force, including deadly force, so long as an honest (not necessarily reasonable) belief is formed that force is required,[158] and the force used is in proportion to the circumstances as the defendant believed them to be.[159] Thus, an objective test is only used in relation to the question of the proportionality between the apparent circumstances and the force used.[160]

Article 3: Freedom from inhuman treatment

> No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

The right to freedom from torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment is recognised in international human rights Treaties[161] and in many, although not all, domestic human rights instruments.[162] The right is also protected by specific Conventions, the United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment 1984[163] and the European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment 1987.[164] Torture is a 158 Williams [1987] 3 All ER 411.

159 Owino [1995] Crim LR 743.

160 This seems to have been the basis of the decision of the House of Lords in Clegg [1995] 2 WLR 80, which concerned a killing of a joyrider by a soldier in Northern Ireland.

161 Article 5 of the Universal Declaration and Art 7 of the ICCPR.

162 For discussion of this right as recognised in other jurisdictions, see Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 8, esp pp 412–29.

163 Cmnd 9593, 1985; it came into force in 1987 and it was ratified by the UK in December 1988.

164 Cm 1634, 1991; it was ratified by the UK in June 1988. For discussion, see Evans, M, and Morgan, R, Preventing Torture: A Study of the European Convention for the Prevention of Torture, 1998, OUP.

crime under international law.[165] Thus, there is strong international recognition of the fundamental values enshrined in this right.

Article 3 contains no exceptions and it is also non-derogable. Thus, on the face of it, once a state has been found to have fallen within its terms, no justification is possible.[166] However, it has been suggested that the exceptions to Art 2 must be taken as applying also to Art 3 since, if the state in certain circumstances may justifiably take life, it must be justifiable a fortiori to inflict lesser harm on citizens in the same circumstances.[167] This may be correct, but clearly it is not intended to be taken to mean that all the exceptions to Art 2 apply to all forms of Art 3 treatment. The Art 2 exceptions suggest elements of immediacy which would be applicable to severe wounding but not usually to, for example, the form of torture, severe beating of all parts of the body to extract information, which occurred in the Greek case.[168] Similarly, state laws allowing wounding by private individuals in self-defence would not appear to be in breach of Art 3 so long as they were in accord with para 2 of Art 2. The Court has made it clear that the use of forms of Art 3 treatment in order to extract information, even in order to combat terrorism, is unjustifiable.[169] However, it might be argued that if life can be taken in order to save life (for example, in a hostage situation where no other course is available), or as a punishment in the form of execution, Art 3 treatment used in extreme circumstances in order to obtain information to save life (the classic ticking bomb in one of a large number of crowded shopping centres, or an atomic device placed somewhere in Central London) might be viewed as justifiable if effective where no other course was available and where it was otherwise inevitable that large numbers of people would be killed.

The responsibility of the state extends beyond prohibiting the use of Art 3 treatment by state agents. It includes a duty to ensure that individuals within their jurisdiction are not subjected to Art 3 treatment by other individuals.[170] It also includes an obligation not to deport a person who needs medical treatment to a country where he will not receive it.[171] The state also has a positive obligation to carry out an effective investigation into allegations of breaches of Art 3.[172]

In determining the standard of treatment applicable below which a state will be in breach of Art 3, a common European standard is applied, but also all the factors in the situation are taken into account.[173] The Court has found that such factors include: 'the nature and context of the treatment, its duration, its mental and physical effects and, in some instances, the sex, age and state of health of the victim.'[174] Thus, it does not connote an absolute standard and, in its application, it allows for a measure of discretion. It 165 See R v Bow Street Stipendiary Magistrate ex p Pinochet Ugarte (No 3) [1999] 2 WLR 827.

166 Ireland v UK (1978) 2 EHRR 25.

167 See Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op. cit., fn 1, p 56.

168 (1969) Yearbook XII 1, p 504, Com Rep; CM Res DH (70) 1.

169 Tomasi v France (1992) 15 EHRR 1.

170 In A v UK (1999) 27 EHRR 611, a violation of Art 3 was found since the law had failed to protect a child from excessive chastisement by his stepfather.

171 In D v UK (1998) 24 EHRR 423, a violation of Art 3 was found since the UK proposed sending D back to the West Indies after he had contracted AIDS, where he would not receive appropriate treatment for his condition.

172 Aksoy v Turkey (1996) 23 EHRR 533; Selmouni v France (2000) 29 EHRR 403.

173 The Greek case (1969), Yearbook XII 186–510.

174 A v UK (1998) 27 EHRR 611, para 20.

is clear that, in order to determine this issue, present views must be considered rather than the views at the time when the Convention was drawn up. The three forms of treatment mentioned represent three different levels of seriousness. Thus, torture, unlike degrading treatment, has been quite narrowly defined to include 'deliberate inhuman treatment causing very serious and cruel suffering'.[175] In a number of cases, there has been a finding of torture against Turkey. In Aksoy v Turkey,[176] the applicant had been stripped naked, his arms had been tied behind his back and he had then been hung from his arms. In Aydin v Turkey,[177] the rape of a young girl by a military official was found to amount to torture; the other forms of ill treatment to which she was subjected, including beating for an hour, also amounted to torture. In Selmouni v France,[178] the Court found that beatings and humiliation in custody amounted to torture rather than inhuman or degrading treatment, bearing in mind the fact that 'the increasingly high standard being required in the area of protection of human rights and fundamental liberties correspondingly and inevitably requires greater firmness in assessing breaches of the fundamental values of democratic societies'.[179]

Clearly, treatment which could not come within the restricted definition of torture could still fall within one of the other two heads, especially the broad head – 'degrading treatment'. In order to characterise treatment as inhuman, it must reach a minimum level of severity.[180] Physical assault,[181] the immediate threat of torture,[182] and interrogation techniques causing psychological disorientation[183] have all been found to amount to inhuman treatment.

Treatment may be both inhuman and degrading, but degrading treatment may not also amount to inhuman treatment.[184] Degrading treatment is treatment that is grossly humiliating.[185] Degrading punishment does not inevitably include all forms of physical punishment, although it can include certain forms of corporal punishment, including caning,[186] which have been found not to amount to torture or inhuman punishment. Corporal punishment which could be said to be of a 'normal' type may be distinguished, it seems, from degrading corporal punishment.[187] Thus, the mere fact that physical punishment is administered will not, without more, necessarily involve a breach of Art 3 and nor will the mere threat of such punishment.[188]

175 Ireland v UK (1978) 2 EHRR 25.
176 (1996) 23 EHRR 553.
177 (1997) 25 EHRR 251. See also Salman v Turkey, Judgment of 27 June 2000 (beatings in custody with rifle butts and sticks amounted to torture).
178 (2000) 29 EHRR 403.
179 Ibid, para 101.
180 A v UK (1998) 27 EHRR 611, para 20.
181 Ireland v UK (1978) 2 EHRR 25.
182 Campbell and Cosans v UK (1982) 4 EHRR 293.
183 Ireland v UK (1978) 2 EHRR 25.
184 Tyrer, Judgment of 25 April 1978, A 26; (1978) 2 EHRR 1.
185 Greek case (1969) 12 YB 1.
186 Tyrer, Judgment of 25 April 1978, A 26; (1978) 2 EHRR 1. In Warwick v UK, Eur Comm HR Report of 15 June 1986, the Commission considered that corporal punishment in schools amounted to degrading treatment.
187 Costello-Roberts v UK, Judgment of 25 March 1993; A 247-C (1993). It may be noted that the School Standards and Framework Act 1998 has abolished corporal punishment in the independent sector; it had already been abolished in the state sector.
188 Campbell and Cosans, Judgment of 25 February 1982, A 48; (1982) 4 EHRR 293.

A number of cases have arisen concerning the position of detainees. It is now clear that if a person enters police custody in a sound physical condition but, on release, is found to have sustained injuries such as bruising, the state must provide a plausible explanation.[189] In determining whether a particular treatment, such as solitary confinement, amounts to a violation of Art 3, a number of factors must be taken into account. These will include the stringency and duration of the measure,[190] the objective pursued – such as the need for special security measures for the prisoner in question[191] or the fear of stirring up discontent among other prisoners[192] – and the effect on the person concerned. The applicant will need to submit medical evidence showing the causal relationship between the prison conditions complained of and his or her deterioration in mental and physical health. If the adverse treatment has been adopted as a result of the claimant's own unco-operative behaviour, it is probable that no breach will be found.[193]

Article 3 has been interpreted widely as to the forms of treatment it covers, which include some not readily associated with the terms it uses. It could probably be used, for example, in relation to involuntary medical intervention such as sterilisation or Caesarean section,[194] and, as indicated below, racial discrimination can amount to degrading treatment. Article 3 has been used to bring rights within the scope of the Convention which are not expressly included. Thus, Art 3 could be invoked in relation to discriminatory treatment on the basis of race and possibly on the basis of sex or sexual orientation, because such treatment can be termed degrading according to the Commission in the East African Asians cases.[195] This possibility could help to compensate for the weakness of the Art 14 guarantee against discrimination which does not create an independent right.[196]

Other rights which otherwise would not be recognised under the Convention include the right to remain in a certain country. Violation of Art 3 may occur because of the treatment a person may receive when returning to his or her own country having been expelled or refused admission. It will have to be clearly established that the danger of such treatment is really present. The question arose in Soering v UK[197] whether expulsion to a country (the US) where the applicant risked the death penalty would be compatible with Art 3 because it would subject him to conditions on Death Row likely to cause him acute mental anguish. Of course, since Art 2 specifically excludes the death penalty from its guarantee, the possibility of its use cannot in itself create a violation 189 Tomasi v France (1992) 15 EHRR 1; Ribbitsch v Austria (1992) 21 EHRR 573.

190 Complete sensory isolation is likely to amount to Art 3 treatment: Ensslin, Bader and Raspe v Germany (1978) 14 DR 64, p 109.

191 In Kröcher and Möller v Switzerland D & R 34 (1983); (1984) 6 EHRR 345 it was found that harsh conditions imposed to ensure security may not constitute a violation of Art 3.

192 Appl 8324/78, X v UK (not published) (the ability to encourage other prisoners to acts of indiscipline was taken into account).

193 Appl 9907/82, M v UK D & R 130 (1983) (dangerous behaviour of detainee taken into account in considering conditions).

194 See X v Denmark (1983) 32 DR 282.

195 (1973) 3 EHRR 76.

196 See below, pp 108–9.

197 Judgment of 7 July 1989, A 161; (1989) 11 EHRR 439. For discussion, see Schabas, W (1994) 43 ICLQ 913.

of Art 3 because that would render those words of Art 2 otiose (assuming that the state in question had not ratified Protocol 6). The Convention must be read as a whole. However, the Court found that the manner and circumstances of the implementation of the death penalty could give rise to an issue under Art 3. The Court held that it had to consider the length of detention prior to the execution, the conditions on Death Row, the applicant's age and his mental state. Bearing these factors in mind, especially the very long period of time spent on Death Row and the mounting anguish as execution was awaited, it was found that expulsion would constitute a breach of Art 3. (In response to this ruling, the UK and the US agreed to drop the charges to non-capital murder and then extradite the applicant.)

The principle laid down in Soering was followed in Chahal v UK.[198] Originally an illegal immigrant, Mr Chahal obtained leave to remain in Britain indefinitely in 1974. In 1984, he visited the Punjab for a family wedding and met the chief advocate of creating an independent Sikh state. Later, he was arrested by Indian police and allegedly tortured. He escaped from India and became the founder of the International Sikh Youth Federation in the UK. In 1990, he was arrested after a meeting at a Southall temple. The Home Office accused him of involvement in Sikh terrorism and decided to deport him on national security grounds. He sought asylum on the ground that he would be tortured if sent back to India and applied to the European Commission, alleging, inter alia, a breach of Art 3. The Court found that since there were strong grounds for believing that Mr Chahal would indeed have been tortured had he been returned to India, a breach of Art 3 had occurred.[199]

For a breach of Art 3 to be established in the context of deportation or extradition cases, there must be a clear risk of ill treatment; a 'mere possibility' will be insufficient. In Vilvarajah and Four Others v UK,[200] the applicants, Sri Lankan Tamils, arrived in the UK in 1987 and applied for political asylum under the UN Convention of 1951 Relating to the Status of Refugees, contending that they had a well-founded fear of persecution if returned to Sri Lanka. The Home Secretary rejected the applications and the applicants sought unsuccessfully to challenge the rejection by means of judicial review. The applicants were then returned to Sri Lanka where, they alleged, four of them were arrested and ill-treated. They claimed that their deportation constituted breaches of Arts 3 and 13 of the European Convention. The Court considered whether the situation in Sri Lanka at the time the applicants were deported provided substantial support for the view that they would be at risk of Art 3 treatment. The Court determined that the general unsettled situation in Sri Lanka at the time did not establish that they were at greater risk than other young male Tamils who were returning there; it established only a possibility rather than a clear risk of ill treatment. No breach of Art 3 could therefore be established.[201] Arguably, this decision suggests that although an Art 3 issue may arise in asylum cases, the Convention cannot be viewed as a substitute for an effective domestic means of determining refugee claims. (It should be noted that Art 8 issues may also arise in some immigration claims; this possibility will be discussed below.)

198 (1997) 23 EHRR 413.

199 The Art 5 issue is considered below, p 58.

200 (1991) 14 EHRR 248, A 215.

201 See further for comment on this case, Warbrick, C, Yearbook of European Law, 1991, OPU, pp 545–53.

Soering is a very broad decision. The approach taken in the judgment may mean that a state would infringe the Convention whenever it facilitated the breach of a Convention Article by another state. However, in general, liability arises under the Convention only where a breach has already occurred, not where it is merely probable. An exception was made to that rule in Soering in view of 'the serious and irreparable nature of the alleged suffering risked'.[202] Thus, the Soering facilitation principle may apply only where the state receiving the individual in question is likely to subject him or her to treatment amounting to serious and irreparable suffering. This would include treatment in breach of Arts 3 and 2 (such as state execution without trial) and probably 5 and 6 (imprisonment without trial). Possibly, it might also include deportation leading to the probability of treatment in breach of Arts 6[203] or 7 in the receiving state which would then be likely to result in the execution or imprisonment of the individual. For example, if an individual committed an act in his or her own state before leaving for another state – a Party to the Convention – and the act committed was then criminalised with retrospective effect, the second state might act in breach of Art 7 if it extradited the individual in order to face charges and the possibility of imprisonment under the new law.

Article 3 is considered further in relation to police powers and anti-terrorism law.[204] Relevant issues are also raised in Chapter 15, dealing with aspects of discrimination.

Article 4: Freedom from slavery, servitude and forced or compulsory labour

(1) No one shall be held in slavery or servitude.
(2) No one shall be required to perform forced or compulsory labour.
(3) For the purpose of this article the term 'forced or compulsory labour' shall not include:

   (a) any work required to be done in the ordinary course of detention imposed according to the provisions of Article 5 of this Convention or during conditional release from such detention;
   (b) any service of a military character or, in case of conscientious objectors in countries where they are recognised, service exacted instead of compulsory military service;
   (c) any service exacted in case of any emergency or calamity threatening the life or well-being of the community;
   (d) any work or service which forms part of normal civic obligations.

Article 4 provides a guarantee which is largely irrelevant in modern European democracies, although it is conceivable that as states with less developed human rights regimes become signatories to the Convention, it might prove to be of value. Owing to its restrictive wording, it has not proved possible to interpret Art 4 in such a way as to allow it to cover rights unthought of when it was conceived.

202 Judgment of 7 July 1989, A 161, para 90.
203 See Soering, A 161, para 113.
204 See Chapter 11, p 1174–77 and 1180–1 and Chapter 14, p 1358 and 1363.

It is necessary to distinguish between slavery and servitude under Art 4(1) and forced or compulsory labour under Art 4(2). Slavery denotes total ownership, whereas servitude denotes less far reaching restraints; it is concerned with the labour conditions and the inescapable nature of the service. Article 4(1) contains no express exceptions and is also non-derogable.

Article 4(1) has not generated much case law and the few cases which have been brought have failed. Article 4(2) is not concerned with the total situation of the claimant concerned; it covers the compulsory character of services which will usually be temporary and incidental to the claimant's main job or total situation. Forced or compulsory labour has been held to denote the following: 'first that the work or service is performed by the worker against his will and, secondly, that the requirement that the work or service be performed is unjust or oppressive or the work or service itself involves avoidable hardship.'[205] Most of the case law arises in the area of professional obligations arising from certain jobs. For example, a German lawyer complained of having to act as unpaid or poorly paid defence counsel. The Commission rejected the complaint on the basis that if a person voluntarily chooses the profession of lawyer, aware of this obligation, then he can be taken to have impliedly consented to fulfil the obligation.[206] This argument will apply if the obligations are a normal part of the profession. Less emphasis was placed on the implied consent of the applicant in Van der Mussele,[207] which also concerned compulsory legal aid work. The Court took the view that the mere fact that the applicant had impliedly consented to the obligation was only a factor to be considered; it was not decisive. It decided that looking at all the factors, including the small amount of time devoted to such work – only 18 hours – and the fact that such work enabled the obligation under Art 6(3)(c) (if necessary to have free legal advice) to be fulfilled, no breach had occurred.

Article 5: Right to liberty and security of person

(1) Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person. No one shall be deprived of his liberty save in the following cases and in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law:

(a) the lawful detention of a person after conviction by a competent court;
(b) the lawful arrest or detention of a person for non-compliance with the lawful order of a court or in order to secure the fulfilment of any obligation prescribed by law;
(c) the lawful arrest or detention of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence or when it is reasonably considered necessary to prevent his committing an offence or fleeing after having done so;
(d) the detention of a minor by lawful order for the purpose of educational supervision or his lawful detention for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority;

205 X v Federal Republic of Germany Appl 8410/78 (1980); D & R 216, p 219.
206 X v FRG, Appl 4653/70; (1974) 46 CD 22.
207 Judgment of 23 November 1983, A 70.

(e) the lawful detention of persons for the prevention of the spreading of infectious diseases, of persons of unsound mind, alcoholics or drug addicts or vagrants;

(f) the lawful arrest or detention of a person to prevent his effecting an unauthorised entry into the country or of a person against whom action is being taken with a view to deportation or extradition.

(2) Everyone who is arrested shall be informed promptly, in a language which he understands, of the reasons for his arrest and of any charge against him.

(3) Everyone arrested or detained in accordance with the provisions of para 1(c) of this article shall be brought promptly before a judge or other officer authorised by law to exercise judicial power and shall be entitled to trial within a reasonable time or to release pending trial. Release may be conditioned by guarantees to appear for trial.

(4) Everyone who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful.

(5) Everyone who has been the victim of arrest or detention in contravention of the provisions of this article shall have an enforceable right to compensation.

Although Art 5 speaks of liberty and security as though they could be distinguished, they are not treated in the case law as though there is any significant distinction between them. The use of the term 'security' does not appear to add anything to the term 'liberty'. The guarantee refers to protection from deprivation of physical liberty, not to protection for physical safety.[208] The presumption embodied in the Article is that liberty and security must be maintained. However, it then sets out the two tests which must be satisfied if it is to be removed. First, exceptions are set out where liberty can be taken away; second, under paras 2–4, the procedure is set out which must be followed when a person is deprived of liberty. Thus, if the correct procedure is followed, but an exception does not apply, Art 5 will be breached, as, conversely, it will if an individual falls within an exception but, in detaining him or her, the correct procedure is not followed. It will be found that a number of successful applications have been brought under Art 5 with the result that the position of detainees in Europe has undergone improvement. It should be noted that Art 5 is concerned with total deprivation of liberty, not restriction of movement, which is covered by Art 2 of Protocol 4 (at the time of writing, the UK is not yet a party to Protocol 4).

In general, the case law of the Court discussed below suggests that the circumstances in which liberty can be taken away under para 5(1)(a)–(f) will be restrictively interpreted, although the instances included are potentially wide. Article 5(1) not only provides that deprivation of liberty is only permitted within these exceptions, it also requires that it should be 'in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law'. In Winterwerp v Netherlands,[209] the Court found that this meant that the procedure in question must be in accordance with national and Convention law, taking into account the general principles on which the Convention is based, and it must not be arbitrary. In Chahal v

208 X v Ireland (1973) 16 YB 388.
209 Judgment of 24 October 1979, A 33; (1979) 2 EHRR 387.

UK,[210] the applicant complained, inter alia, that he had been detained although there had been no court hearing. The Home Office decided to deport him on national security grounds, but he applied for asylum. He was then imprisoned for over six years. He applied to the European Commission on Human Rights, alleging, inter alia, a breach of Art 5, which guarantees judicial control over loss of liberty. The Court found that a breach of Art 5 had occurred, since his detention should have been subject to scrutiny in court. It had been considered by an advisory panel, but that did not provide sufficient procedural safeguards to qualify as a court.

5(1)(a): Detention after conviction

This exception covers lawful detention after conviction by a competent court. Thus, the detention must flow from the conviction. This calls into question the revocation of life licences because, in such instances, a person is being deprived of liberty without a fresh conviction. In Weeks[211] the Court considered the causal connection with the original sentence when a life licence was revoked after the applicant was released. The Court accepted a very loose link between the original sentence and the revocation of the life licence on the basis that the sentencing judge must be taken to have known and intended that it was inherent in the life sentence that the claimant's liberty would hereafter be at the mercy of the executive. The Court declined to review the appropriateness of the original sentence.

5(1)(b): Detention to fulfil an obligation

This exception refers to deprivation of liberty in order to 'secure fulfilment of an obligation prescribed by law'. This phrase raises difficulties of interpretation and is clearly not so straightforward as the first form of such deprivation permitted under para 5(1)(a). It is very wide and appears to allow deprivation of liberty in many instances without intervention by a court. It might even allow preventive action before violation of a legal obligation. However, it has been narrowed down; in Lawless[212] it was found that a specific and concrete obligation must be identified. Once it has been identified, detention can in principle be used to secure its fulfilment.

The obligation includes a requirement that specific circumstances, such as the possibility of danger to the public, must be present in order to warrant the use of detention. A requirement to submit to an examination on entering the UK has been found to be specific enough.[213] Moreover, it must be apparent why detention rather than some lesser measure is needed to secure compliance with the obligation. Thus, the width of Art 5(1)(b) has been narrowed down by the use of restrictive interpretation in line with furthering the aims of the Convention.

210 (1997) 23 EHRR 413.

211 Judgment of 5 October 1988, A 114; (1987) 10 EHRR 293.

212 Report of 19 December 1959, B 1 (1960–61) p 64; Judgment of 1 July 1961, A 3 (1960–61); (1961) 1 EHRR 15.

213 McVeigh, O'Neill and Evans v UK (1981) Report of 18 March 1981, D & R 25; (1981) 5 EHRR 71.

5(1)(c): Detention after arrest but before conviction

This provision refers to persons held on remand or detained after arrest. Article 5(3) requires that in such an instance, a person should be brought 'promptly' to trial; in other words, the trial should occur in reasonable time. The part of 5(1)(c) which causes concern is the ground – 'arrest or detention to prevent him committing an offence'. This is an alternative to the holding of the detainee under reasonable suspicion of committing an offence; arguably, the two should have been cumulative. This ground would permit internment of persons even if the facts which showed the intention to commit a crime did not, in themselves, constitute a criminal offence. In Lawless[214] the Court narrowed this ground down on the basis that internment in such circumstances might well not fulfil the other requirement in Art 5(1)(c) that the arrest or detention would be effected for the purpose of bringing the person before a competent legal authority. This interpretation was warranted because all of Art 5 must be read together.

A level of suspicion below 'reasonable suspicion' will not be sufficient; in Fox, Campbell and Hartley,[215] the Court found that Art 5(1)(c) had been violated on the basis that no reasonable suspicion of committing an offence had arisen, only an honest belief (which was all that was needed under s 11 of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978). The only evidence put forward by the government for the presence of reasonable suspicion was that the applicants had convictions for terrorist offences and that when arrested, they were asked about particular terrorist acts. The government said that further evidence could not be disclosed for fear of endangering life. The Court said that reasonable suspicion arises from 'facts or information which would satisfy an objective observer that the person concerned may have committed the offence'. It went on to find that the government had not established that reasonable suspicion was present in justifying the arrests in question. The Court took into account the exigencies of the situation and the need to prevent terrorism; however, it found that the state Party in question must be able to provide some information which an objective observer would consider justified the arrest. It was found that the information provided was insufficient and therefore a breach of Art 5 had occurred. This ruling suggests that in terrorist cases, a low level of reasonable suspicion is required and this test was applied in Murray v UK.[216] The Court found that no breach of Art 5(1)(c) had occurred, even though the relevant legislation (s 14 of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1987) required only suspicion, not reasonable suspicion, since there was some evidence which provided a basis for the suspicion in question.

5(1)(d): Detention of minors

This provision confers far-reaching powers on national authorities with regard to those under 18 years of age. This has led the Court to interpret the term 'educational purpose' restrictively. In Bouamar v Belgium[217] it was found that mere detention without educational facilities would not fulfil Art 5(1)(d)); there had to be educational facilities in the institution, and trained staff.

214 (1961) 1 EHRR 15.
215 Judgment of 30 August 1990, A 178; (1990) 13 EHRR 157.
216 (1994) 19 EHRR 193.
217 Judgment of 29 February 1988, A 129; (1988) 11 EHRR 1.

5(1)(e): Detention of non-criminals for the protection of society

This sub-paragraph must, of course, be read in conjunction with para 5(4) – all the persons mentioned have the right to have the lawfulness of their detention determined by a Court. The width of para 5(1)(e) was narrowed down in the Vagrancy cases, in which the question arose of the current application of the term 'vagrant'.[218] The term had been applied to the applicants who had, therefore, been detained. The Court considered whether the applicant was correctly brought within the ambit of the term in the relevant Belgian legislation, but it refused to conduct a more than marginal review of municipal law; the question of the interpretation of national law was separated from the application of the Convention. However the Court did then turn to the Convention and conduct a far reaching review of the meaning of 'vagrant' in accordance with the Convention on the basis of a common European standard; it then found that the applicants had not been correctly brought within that term. Thus, ultimately, the margin of appreciation allowed was narrow. This stance prevents too wide an interpretation of the application of the categories of para 5(1)(e).

In Winterwerp v Netherlands[219] the Court found that the detention of the mentally disordered or handicapped could be justified only where there was reliable medical evidence of the mental disorder; it must be of a type justifying compulsory detention; and the condition in question must persist throughout the period of detention. In Kay v UK[220] a breach of Art 5(1)(e) was found since the first of these conditions had not been complied with; current medical information had not been considered.

5(1)(f): Detention of aliens and deportees

The importance of this provision is that the Convention does not grant aliens a right of admission or residence in contracting states, but para 5(1)(f) ensures that an alien who is detained pending deportation or admission has certain guarantees; there must be review of the detention by an independent body[221] and the arrest must be in accordance with national law.[222] The nature of the measures taken, including the period of detention before review, must ensure that the detention is not arbitrary.[223] Also, because the lawfulness of the detention may depend on the lawfulness of the deportation itself, the lawfulness of the deportation may often be in issue.[224]

Safeguards of paras 2–4: general

Paragraphs 2–4 reiterate the principle that the liberty of the person is the overriding concern; if one of the exceptions mentioned in para 5(1) applies, the safeguards of 218 Vagrancy cases, Judgment of 18 June 1971, A 14.

219 (1979) 2 EHRR 387.

220 (1998) 40 BMLR 20.

221 In Chahal v UK (1996) 23 EHRR 413 review by the immigration advisory panel procedure was found to be sufficient to guard against arbitrariness.

222 In Bozano v France (1986) 9 EHRR 297, a French deportation order was found to be invalid under national law since it was – in effect – a disguised extradition order. A violation of Art 5(1)(f) was found.

223 Guzzardi v Italy (1980) 3 EHRR 333; Amuur v France (1996) 22 EHRR 533.

224 Zamir v UK, Report of 11 October 1983; 40 D & R 42 (1983).

sub-paras 2–4 must still be complied with. If they are not, the deprivation of liberty will be unlawful even if it comes within the exceptions. Paragraphs 2–4 provide a minimum standard for arrest and detention.

Promptly informing of the reason for arrest

Paragraph 5(2) provides that a detainee or arrestee must be informed promptly of the reason for arrest. This information is needed so that it is possible to judge from the moment of its inception whether the arrest is in accordance with the law so that the detainee could theoretically take action straight away to be released. All the necessary information – the factual and legal grounds for the arrest – need not be given at the point of arrest; it can be conveyed over a period of time, depending on the circumstances. A period of two days between the arrest and the conveying of the information has been found not to breach Art 5(2).[225] The Commission's view is that this information need not be as detailed and specific as that guaranteed by para 6(3) in connection with the right to a fair trial.[226]

In Fox, Campbell and Hartley v UK[227] the applicants, who were arrested on suspicion of terrorist offences, were not informed of the reason for the arrest at the time of it, but were told that they were being arrested under a particular statutory provision. Clearly, this could not convey the reason to them at that time. At a later point, during interrogation, they were asked about specific criminal offences. The European Court of Human Rights found that Art 5(2) was not satisfied at the time of the arrest, but that this breach was healed by the later indications made during interrogation of the offences for which they had been arrested. Clayton and Tomlinson comment that this finding was 'an unacceptable dilution of a basic guarantee'.[228]

In Murray v UK[229] soldiers had occupied the applicant's house, thus clearly taking her into detention, but she was not informed of the fact of arrest for half an hour. The question arose whether she was falsely imprisoned during that half hour. The Court found that no breach of Art 5(2) had occurred in those circumstances. Mrs Murray was eventually informed during interrogation of the reason for the arrest and although an interval of a few hours had elapsed between the arrest and informing her of the reason for it, this could still be termed prompt.

Both these decisions were influenced by the terrorist context in which they occurred and provide examples of the Court's tenderness to claims of a threat to national security made by governments of Member states. In both, a very wide margin of appreciation was allowed. It would appear that both were influenced by the crime control consideration of allowing leeway to the police to resort to doubtful practices in relation to terrorist suspects and both exhibit, it is suggested, a lack of rigour in relation to due process. Such lack of rigour might be acceptable if there was a real connection between a failure to give information to suspects and an advantage to be gained in an emergency 225 Skoogstrom v Sweden (1981) 1 Dig Supp para 5.2.2.1.

226 It was determined in Appl 8828/79, X v Denmark D & R 30 (1983), p 93 that para 5(2) does not include a right to contact a lawyer.

227 Judgment of 30 August 1990, A 182; (1990) 13 EHRR 157.

228 Ibid, p 498.

229 (1994) 19 EHRR 193.

situation, since the principle of proportionality would then be satisfied. However, in Mrs Murray's case, for example, once she was in detention and her house in effect sealed off from the outside world, it is not clear that telling her of the fact of the arrest could have created or exacerbated the unsettled situation. Thus, the Court has allowed some departure from the principle that there should be a clear demarcation between the point at which the citizen is at liberty and the point at which her liberty is restrained.

Promptness of judicial hearing

Article 5(3) confers a right to be brought promptly before the judicial authorities; in other words, not to be held in detention for long periods without an independent hearing. It refers to persons detained in accordance with Art 5(1)(c) and therefore covers both arrest and detention, and detainees held on remand. The significance of Art 5(3) rests on its strong link to the purpose of Art 5 itself.[230] There will be some allowable delay in both situations; the question is, therefore, what is meant by 'promptly'. Its meaning was considered in Brogan v UK[231] in relation to an arrest and detention arising by virtue of the special powers under s 12 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989. The UK had entered a derogation under Art 15 against the applicability of Art 5 to Northern Ireland, but withdrew that derogation in August 1984. Two months later, the Brogan case was filed. The applicants complained, inter alia, of the length of time they were held in detention without coming before a judge, on the basis that it could not be termed prompt. The Court took into account the need for special measures to combat terrorism; such measures had to be balanced against individual rights. However, it found that detention for four days and six hours was too long. The Court did not specify how long was acceptable; previously, the Commission had seen four days (in ordinary criminal cases) as the limit.[232] Following this decision, the UK Government ultimately chose to derogate from Art 5 and this decision was eventually found to be lawful by the European Court of Human Rights.[233]

The question whether detainees on remand have been brought to trial or released in a reasonable time has also been considered. The word 'reasonable' is not associated with the processing of the prosecution and trial, but with the detention itself. Obviously, if the trial takes a long time to prepare for, there will be a longer delay, but it does not follow that detention for all that time will be reasonable. In the Neumeister case,[234] the Court rejected an interpretation of 'reasonable' which associated it only with the preparation of the trial. Thus, continued detention on remand will be reasonable only so long as the reasonable suspicion of para 5(1)(c) continues to exist. But, grounds for continued detention other than those expressly mentioned in para 5(1)(c) could be considered, such as suppression of evidence or the possibility that the detainee will abscond. However, it is clear from Letellier v France[235] that such dangers must persist throughout the period

230 See Bozano v France (1986) 9 EHRR 297; Assenov v Belgium (1999) 28 EHRR 652; T v Malta (1999) 29 EHRR 185.
231 Judgment of 29 November 1988; (1989) 11 EHRR 117; A 145.
232 X v Netherlands (1966) 9 YB 564.
233 Brannigan and McBride v UK (1993) 17 EHRR 594.
234 Judgment of 27 June 1968; (1979–80) 1 EHRR 91.
235 A 207 (1991).

of detention; when they cease, specific reasons for continued detention which have been properly scrutinised must be apparent. Once the accused has been released on bail, Art 5(3) does not apply, but Art 6(1) does, as will be seen later. The question of a reasonable time for preparing for the trial can also be considered under Art 6(1).

There is no absolute right to bail under Art 5(3), but the authorities must consider whether bail can achieve the same purpose as detention on remand.[236] It is also clear that detention after demand of an excessively large sum for bail will be unreasonable if a lesser sum would have achieved the same objective.[237]

Review of detention

Article 5(4) provides a right to review of detention, whatever the basis of the detention. The detainee must be able to take court proceedings in order to determine whether a detention is unlawful. This is an independent provision: even if it is determined in a particular case by the Commission that the detention was lawful, there could still be a breach of Art 5(4) if no possibility of review of the lawfulness of the detention by the domestic courts arose. The review must be by a court and it must be adequate to test the lawfulness of the detention. This requirement was found not to have been satisfied by judicial review proceedings or by habeas corpus in Chahal v UK:[238] neither procedure provided a sufficient basis for challenging a deportation decision.

Article 5(4) was in issue in the a number of cases against the UK regarding discretionary life sentences, and it was found that there had to be an element in the sentence which, of its nature, was reviewable.[239] Thus, a mandatory life sentence arguably consisting wholly of a punitive element would be unreviewable since no relevant circumstance could have changed.[240] In the Weeks case,[241] the sentence contained a security element and therefore allowed review of the applicant's progress. In Thynne, Wilson and Gunnel v UK,[242] the sentence consisted of both a punitive and a security element. When the punitive element expired, a judicial procedure for review of the sentence should have been available because there was then something to review; if it had been purely punitive, there would not have been. Thus, in both cases, a breach of Art 5(4) was found. Section 34 of the Criminal Justice Act 1991 clarified the position of discretionary lifers,[243] but the secretive procedure for tariff fixing still raised issues under Art 5(4) and Art 6.[244] This is also the case in respect of the power of the Home Secretary to detain young offenders at her Majesty's pleasure.[245]

236 Wemhoff, Judgment of 27 June 1968; (1968) 1 EHRR 55.
237 Neumeister, Judgment of 27 June 1968; (1979–80) 1 EHRR 91.
238 (1997) 23 EHRR 413.
239 Wynne v UK (1994) 19 EHRR 333.
240 Ibid.
241 (1987) 10 EHRR 293.
242 Judgment of 25 October 1990, A 190; (1990) 13 EHRR 666. For comment, see Richardson, G, 'Discretionary life-sentences and the ECHR' [1991] PL 34.
243 On the UK response in the Criminal Justice Act 1991, s 34 (see Crime (Sentences) Act 1997, s 28) see: Fitzgerald, E, 'The Criminal Justice Act 1991: preventive detention of the dangerous offender' [1995] EHRLR 39.
244 See Watson v UK [1997] EHRLR 181.
245 Hussain and Singh v UK (1996) 21 EHRR 1.

Article 5(4) also applies to remand prisoners. It was found in De Jong, Baljet and Van de Brink[246] that it grants to a person on remand a right of access to a court after the decision (in accordance with Art 5(3)) to detain him or prolong detention has been taken. It also allows access to the files used in coming to the decision on remand.[247]

Compensation

Paragraph 5(5) provides for compensation if the arrest or detention contravenes the other provisions of Art 5.[248] This provision differs from the general right to compensation under Art 50[249] because it exists as an independent right: if a person is found to have been unlawfully arrested under domestic law in the domestic court, but no compensation is available, he or she can apply to the European Court of Human Rights on the basis of the lack of compensation. As far as other Convention rights are concerned, if a violation of a right occurs which is found unlawful by the national courts, but no compensation is granted, the applicant cannot allege breach of the right. Article 5(5) is considered at a number of points in this book, but most extensively in Chapter 12.

Article 6: Right to a fair and public hearing

(1) In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. Judgment shall be pronounced publicly but the press and public may be excluded from all or part of the trial in the interest of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, where the interest of juveniles or the protection of the private life of the parties so require, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice.

(2) Everyone charged with a criminal offence shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law.

(3) Everyone charged with a criminal offence has the following minimum rights:

   (a) to be informed promptly, in a language which he understands and in detail, of the nature and cause of the accusation against him;
   (b) to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his defence;
   (c) to defend himself in person or through legal assistance of his own choosing or, if he has not sufficient means to pay for legal assistance, to be given it free when the interests of justice so require;
   (d) to examine or have examined witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him;

246 Judgment of 22 May 1984, A 77, pp 25–26; (1984) 8 EHRR 20.
247 Lamy v Belgium (1989) 11 EHRR 529.
248 See the reference to Art 5(5) in HRA, s 9(3).
249 Appl No 6821/74, Huber v Austria 6 D & R 65 (1977), p 65.

(e) to have the free assistance of an interpreter if he cannot understand or speak the language used in court.

Article 6 is one of the most significant Convention Articles and the one which is most frequently found to have been violated. This is partly due to the width of Art 6(1), which may cover numerous circumstances in which rights are affected in the absence of a judicial hearing. This may mean that even where a substantive claim under another Article fails, the Art 6(1) claim succeeds because the procedure used in making the determination affecting the applicant was defective.[250] In order to appreciate the way it operates, it is crucial to understand the relationship between paras 1 and 3. Paragraph 1 imports a general requirement of a fair hearing applying to criminal and civil hearings which covers all aspects of a fair hearing. Paragraph 3 lists minimum guarantees of a fair hearing in the criminal context only. If para 3 had been omitted, the guarantees contained in it could have arisen from para 1, but it was included on the basis that it is important to declare a minimum standard for a fair hearing. In practice, then, paras 1 and 3 may often both be in question in respect of a criminal charge.

Since para 3 contains minimum guarantees, the para 1 protection of a fair hearing goes beyond para 3. In investigating a fair hearing, the Commission is not confined to the para 3 guarantees; it can consider further requirements of fairness. Thus, if para 1 is not violated, it will be superfluous to consider para 3 and if one of the para 3 guarantees is violated, there will be no need to look at para 1. However, if para 3 is not violated, it will still be worth considering para 1. It follows that although civil hearings are expressly affected only by para 1, the minimum guarantees may also apply to such hearings too.

Article 6(1): Fair hearing

Field of application

The term 'criminal charge' has an autonomous Convention meaning. The question of what is meant by 'a criminal charge' has generated quite a lot of case law. 'Charge' has been described as 'the official notification given to an individual by the competent authority of an allegation that he has committed a criminal offence'.[251] The proceedings in question must be determinative of the charge. Therefore, proceedings ancillary to the determination of the charge do not fall within Art 6.[252]

Offences under criminal law must be distinguished from those arising only under disciplinary law. In order to determine whether, whatever the classification of an 'offence' in national law, it should be viewed as criminal in nature, the Court will consider the nature of the offence and the nature and severity of the penalty the person 250 Eg, in Mats Jacobson v Sweden (1990) 13 EHRR 79, the applicant was prevented from making changes to his property. His substantive claim under Art 1 of Protocol 1 failed, but his Art 6(1) claim succeeded, since he was allowed no adequate access to a court to challenge the prohibition.

251 Judgment of 15 July 1982, Eckle A 51; (1982) 5 EHRR 1, p 33.

252 See, e.g., X v UK (1982) 5 EHRR 273 (appointment of a legal aid lawyer was found to fall outside Art 6).

is threatened with.[253] In Campbell and Fell v UK,[254] the Court had to consider whether prison discipline could fall within Art 6(1) as the determination of a criminal charge. The applicants, prisoners, were sentenced to a substantial loss of remission. This was such a serious consequence that the procedure in question could be considered as of a criminal character, but the Court considered that not all disciplinary offences in prison which in fact had an equivalent in the ordinary criminal law would be treated as of a criminal character. In general, disciplinary offences will not be viewed as criminal since they are a matter of concern to the particular profession, not a matter regulated by the law in general.[255]

'Regulatory' offences are also, in general, viewed as matters that relate to a specific group rather than to persons in general.[256] But, classification of a petty offence as 'regulatory' rather than criminal will not be decisive for Art 6(1) purposes; Strasbourg may yet determine that the offence is of a criminal character.[257] Otherwise, by reclassifying offences, the state in question could minimise the application of the Convention.

The term 'civil rights and obligations' also has an autonomous Convention meaning and therefore cannot merely be assigned the meaning of 'private' as understood in UK administrative law. Thus, the meaning of 'civil rights and obligations' does not depend upon the legal classification afforded the right or obligation in question by the national legislator; the question is whether the content and effect of the right or obligation (taking into account the legal systems of all the contracting states) allows the meaning 'civil right' or 'civil obligation' to be assigned to it.[258] This wide provision allows challenge to decisions taken in the absence of legal procedures in a disparate range of circumstances.[259] The civil right must have some legal basis as established in the state in question, but assuming that there is such a basis, Art 6 may apply to immunities or procedural constraints preventing the bringing of claims to court.[260]

In Tinnelly v UK[261] the Court found that a clearly defined statutory right aimed at freedom from discrimination should be viewed as a civil right. Strasbourg may be moving towards a position in which 'all those rights which are individual rights under the national legal system and fall into the sphere of general freedom . . . must be seen as civil rights'.[262] Clearly, this question remains a problematic one. It is clear that there must be a dispute between the parties, but the extent to which this is the case is not entirely settled. In Fayed v UK[263] it was found that although, strictly, there was no legal basis for the action and so no dispute to trigger Art 6, Art 6 applied to blanket immunities preventing access to a court.

253 Campbell and Fell, Judgment of 28 June 1984, A 80; (1985) 7 EHRR 165; Garyfallou AEBE v Greece (1999) 28 EHRR 344, para 33; Lauko v Slovakia [1999] EHRLR 105, para 56.
254 Ibid.
255 Wickramsinghe v UK [1998] EHRLR 338.
256 See X v UK (1998) 25 EHRR CD 88.
257 Özturk, Judgment of 21 February 1983, A 73; (1984) 6 EHRR 409.
258 Judgment of 16 July 1971, Ringeisen v Austria, A 13, p 39; (1971) 1 EHRR 455.
259 Eg, O v UK (1987) 10 EHRR 82 concerned a decision to terminate access to a child in care although no legal procedure was in place allowing consideration of its merits.
260 See Osman v UK (1998) 5 BHRC 293; Fayed v UK (1994) 18 EHRR 393.
261 (1998) 27 EHRR 249.
262 Bentham v UK, B 80, para 10 (1983), dissenting opinions of Mr Melchior and Mr Frowen.
263 (1994) 18 EHRR 393.

A right of access to a court

Besides the procedural guarantees, Art 6(1) has been found to provide, impliedly, a right of access to a court whether the domestic legal system allows access to a court in a particular case or not. The right is not absolute, but restrictions must not impair the essence of the right.[264] Restrictions must have a legitimate aim and be proportionate to the aim pursued. The test is, therefore, the same as that used in respect of that under para 2 of Arts 8–11.[265] In Osman v UK[266] the Court found, controversially, that the immunity of the police from actions in negligence breached this right of access to a court.[267] Other public policy based immunities have subsequently been found not to breach this right,[268] in pursuit of what may arguably be termed a retreat from Osman, and not all other constraints will do so.[269]

Once it has been determined that a particular instance falls within Art 6(1), it must be determined whether the claim in question is covered by the right of access to a court. It seems that, for example, Art 6(1) does not confer a right of appeal to a higher court.[270] It may include access to legal advice and, by implication, legal aid. These issues arise in relation both to access to a court hearing and the fairness of the hearing. In the very significant decision in Golder,[271] it was found that a refusal to allow a detainee to correspond with his legal advisor would be contrary to Art 6(1), since in preventing him even initiating proceedings, it hindered his right of access to a court. In other words, the right of access to a court must be an effective one.

Access to legal advice in order to obtain access to a court may not always imply a right to legal aid. The circumstances in which it will do so were considered in Granger v UK.[272] The applicant had been refused legal aid and so did not have counsel at appeal; he only had notes from his solicitor which he read out, but clearly did not understand. In particular, there was one especially complex ground of appeal which he was unable to deal with. In view of the complexity of the appeal and his inability to deal with it, legal aid should have been granted. It was found that paras 6(1) and 6(3)(c) should be read together and, if it would be apparent to an objective observer that a fair hearing could not take place without legal advice, then both would be violated. Granger was concerned with the fairness of the hearing rather than with the ability to obtain access to a court at all. However, in some instances, a person unable to obtain legal aid would 264 Tinnelly and McElduff v UK (1998) 27 EHRR 249; Fayed v UK (1994) 18 EHRR 393.

265 See Fayed v UK (1994) 18 EHRR 393, para 67. See also above, pp 61–62.

266 (1998) 5 BHRC 293.

267 The decision was severely criticised by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Barrett v Enfield London LBC [1999] 3 All ER 193 on the ground that there was no immunity, but in fact no right to make a claim at all. See also the criticisms of Lord Hoffmann in 'Human rights and the House of Lords' (1999) 62 MLR 159.

268 See Z and Others v UK, App 28945/95 (2001) The Times, 31 May; the case resulted from a decision of the House of Lords in X v Bedfordshire CC [1995] 2 AC 633 that P could not bring an action in negligence against the local authority.

269 In Fayed v UK (1994) 18 EHRR 393, the Court found that a limitation on the ability of the applicants to take legal proceedings to challenge the findings of a governmental inquiry into the applicants' business affairs did not constitute an unjustified denial of access to a court.

270 Belgian Linguistics cases, Judgment of 23 July 1968, A 6; (1968) 1 EHRR 252.

271 Judgment of 21 February 1975, A 18.

272 Judgment of 28 March 1990, A 174.

be unable to obtain legal advice and therefore might be unable to initiate proceedings. In such instances, access to a court would be the main issue.[273] But, in civil proceedings, legal aid is not fully guaranteed, as it is in Art 6(3); circumstances have been accepted in which legal aid can be denied.[274]

An independent and impartial tribunal established by law

All courts and tribunals falling within Art 6 must meet this requirement. The tribunal must be established by law[275] and be independent of the executive.[276] Factors to be taken into account will include the appointment of its members, their terms of office, and guarantees against outside influence.[277] Impartiality is judged both subjectively and objectively.[278] In other words, actual bias must be shown, but also the existence of guarantees against bias.[279] The decision in McGonnell v UK[280] left open the question whether a judge having both legislative and executive functions could be viewed as independent and impartial. In a number of cases against the UK, military discipline as exercised by way of courts-martial has not been found to satisfy the requirement of impartiality.[281]

Hearing within a reasonable time

The hearing must take place within a reasonable time. These are the same words as are used in Art 5(3), but here, the point is to put an end to the insecurity of the applicant who is uncertain of the outcome of the civil action or charge against him or her rather than with the deprivation of liberty.[282] Thus, the ending point comes when the uncertainty is resolved either at the court of highest instance or by expiry of the time limit for appeal. In determining what is meant by 'reasonable', fairly wide time limits have been applied so that in some circumstances, as much as seven or eight[283] years may be reasonable. The Court has approved a period of nearly five years[284] and the Commission a period of seven and a half.[285] It will take into account the conduct of the accused (which may have contributed to the delay) and the need for proper 273 See Airey v Ireland (1979) 2 EHRR 305; Aerts v Belgium [1998] EHRLR 777.

274 In Andronicou and Constantinou v Cyprus (1998) 25 EHRR 491 it was found that ex gratia assistance was sufficient.

275 Zand v Austria (1978) 15 DR 70 (this means law emanating from Parliament, although aspects of the judicial organisation may be delegated to the executive).

276 Benthem v Netherlands (1985) 8 EHRR 1.

277 Bryan v UK (1995) 21 EHRR 342.

278 Fey v Austria (1993) 16 EHRR 387; Pullar v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 391.

279 Remli v France (1996) 22 EHRR 253.

280 (2000) 8 BHRC 56.

281 See Findlay v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 221; Hood v UK (2000) 29 EHRR 365, Judgment of 25.2.97; see also Coyne v UK, Judgment of 24.10.97, RJD 1997-V 1842; Cable and Others v UK, Appl. no 24436/94 (1999) The Times, 11 March.

282 See, generally, Van Dijk and Van Hoof, op. cit., fn 1, pp 446–47.

283 In Vernillo v France 12 HRLJ 199, seven and a half years in respect of civil proceedings was not found too long owing to the special responsibilities of the parties.

284 Buchholz, Judgment of 6 May 1981, A 42.

285 Report, 12 July 1977, in Haase D & R 11 (1978), p 78.

preparation of the case, bearing in mind any special circumstances such as those which might arise in child care cases. In order to determine how long the delay has been, the point from which time will run must be identified. In criminal cases, it will be 'the stage at which the situation of the person concerned has been substantially affected as a result of a suspicion against him'.[286] In civil cases, it will be the moment when the proceedings concerned are initiated, not including pre-trial negotiations.[287]

Other aspects of fairness

Apart from access to legal advice and the other minimal guarantees of Art 6(3), what other rights are implied by the term a 'fair hearing'? It has been found to connote equality between the parties,[288] and in principle, entails the right of the parties to be present in person,[289] although criminal trial in absentia does not automatically violate Art 6: the right can be waived[290] and does not normally extend to appeals.[291] The hearing should be adversarial[292] in the sense that both parties are given an opportunity to comment on all the evidence that is adduced.[293] A refusal to summon a witness may constitute unfairness,[294] as may a failure to disclose evidence.[295] The court must give a reasoned judgment.[296] These and further significant aspects of fairness are discussed further at relevant points in the following chapters, especially Chapter 13.[297]

Article 6(2): The presumption of innocence in criminal cases

Paragraph 2:

> requires inter alia that when carrying out their duties, members of a court should not start with the preconceived idea that the accused has committed the offence charged; the burden of proof is on the prosecution and any doubt should benefit the accused. It also follows that it is for the prosecution to inform the accused of the case that will be made against him so that he may prepare and present his defence accordingly and to adduce evidence sufficient to convict him.[298]

286 Neumeister, Judgment of 27 June 1968; (1979–80) 1 EHRR 91.
287 Report of 7 March 1984, Lithgow v UK, A 102 (1986) p 120; (1986) 8 EHRR 335.
288 Neumeister, Judgment of 27 June 1968; (1979–80) 1 EHRR 91; De Haes and Gijsels v Belgium (1997) 25 EHRR 1.
289 Colloza v Italy, Judgment of 12 February 1985, A 89 (1985); Zana v Turkey (1998) 4 BHRC 242.
290 Colloza v Italy, Judgment of 12 February 1985, A 89 (1985).
291 Ekbatani v Sweden (1988) 13 EHRR 504, cf Monnell and Morris v UK (1987) 10 EHRR 205.
292 Ruiz-Mateos v Spain (1993) 16 EHRR 505.
293 Mantovanelli v France (1997) 24 EHRR 370.
294 X v Austria Appl No 5362/72, Coll 42 (1973), p 145.
295 Edwards v UK (1992) 15 EHRR 417 (it was found that the hearing in the Court of Appeal remedied this failure). In Rowe and Davis v UK (2000) 30 EHRR 1, the failure of the prosecution to make an application to the trial judge to withhold material caused a breach of Art 6. Review of the material later by the Court of Appeal could not remedy the breach.
296 Hadjianastassiou v Greece (1992) 16 EHRR 219, para 33.
297 See pp 1259–62. Also, for further discussion, see Ashworth, A, 'Article 6 and the fairness of trials' [1999] Crim LR 261.
298 Judgment of 6 December 1988, Barbéra, Messegué and Jabardo, A 14 6(2) (1989) p 33. See also Salabiaku v France (1988) 13 EHRR 379.

It follows from the presumption of innocence that the court must base its conviction exclusively on evidence put forward at trial.[299] Thus, a conviction based on written statements which were inadmissible breached para 6(2).[300] This provision is very closely related to the impartiality provision of para 6(1).

The expectation that the state bears the burden of establishing guilt requires that the accused should not be expected to provide involuntary assistance by way of a confession. Thus, the presumption of innocence under para 6(2) is closely linked to the right to freedom from self-incrimination which the Court has found to be covered by the right to a fair hearing under para 6(1) (Funke v France).[301] In Murray (John) v UK,[302] on the other hand, the Commission did not find that para 6(1) had been breached where inferences had been drawn at trial from the applicant's refusal to give evidence. The Court also found no breach of Art 6 due to such drawing of inferences in the particular circumstances of the case, taking into account the fact that 'the right to silence' could not be treated as absolute, the degree of compulsion exerted on the applicant and the weight of the evidence against him.[303] However, the Court did find that Art 6(1) had been breached by the denial of access to a lawyer since such access was essential where there was a likelihood that adverse inferences would be drawn from silence. In Saunders v UK[304] the Commission found that the applicant's right to freedom from self-incrimination had been infringed in that he had been forced to answer questions put to him by inspectors investigating a company takeover or risk the imposition of a criminal sanction. The ruling of the Court was to the same effect, taking into account the special compulsive regime in question for Department of Trade and Industry inspections.[305]

Sub-paragraphs 6(3)(a), (b) and (c): time, facilities and legal representation in criminal cases

These sub-paragraphs are closely related due to the word 'facilities' used in sub-para (b). Sub-paragraphs (b) and (c) may often be invoked together: (c) in respect of the assignment of a lawyer, and (b) in respect of the time allowed for such assignment. It is not enough that a lawyer should be assigned; he or she should be appointed in good time in order to give time to prepare the defence and familiarise herself or himself with the case.[306] Both sub-paragraphs also arise in relation to notification of the right of access to legal advice and it has been held that an oral translation of the requisite information is insufficient.[307] As has already been noted in relation to Granger, the legal advice provisions must be read in conjunction with the right to a fair trial. A lawyer must be assigned if, otherwise, an objective observer would consider that a fair hearing

299 X v Federal Republic of Germany D & R 17 (1980), p 231.
300 Barbéra [1987] 3 All ER 411.
301 (1993) 16 EHRR 297.
302 (1996) 22 EHRR 29. For comment, see Munday, R [1996] Crim LR 370.
303 Murray (John) v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 29. See also Averill v UK (2001) 31 EHRR 36.
304 No 19187/91 Com Rep paras 69–75.
305 Saunders v UK (1997) 23 EHRR 313. See further Chapter 12, p 1239.
306 X and Y v Austria Appl 7909/74; 15 D & R 160 (1979).
307 Kamasinski, Report of 5 May 1988, para 138; (1991) 13 EHRR 36.

would not occur. In Poitrimol v France[308] the Court stated: 'Although not absolute, the right . . . to be effectively defended by a lawyer, assigned officially if need be, is one of the fundamental features of a fair trial.' In furtherance of the notion of providing effective legal representation, it has been found that para 6(3)(c) does not merely import a right to have legal assistance, but rather it includes three rights:[309]

(a) to have recourse, if desired, to legal assistance;
(b) to choose that assistance;
(c) if the defendant has insufficient means to pay, for that assistance to be given it free if the interest of justice so require.[310]

6(3)(d): Cross-examination in criminal cases

The Strasbourg case law has left a wide discretion to the national court[311] as to the interpretation of the first limb of para 6(3)(d) – the right to cross-examine witnesses – and so has deprived this right of some of its effect. This right would seem to be specific and unambiguous in its guarantee that witnesses against the defendant must be at the public hearing if their evidence is to be relied on. It would therefore seem to outlaw hearsay evidence. The Court has, however, shrunk at times from a straightforward assertion that this is the case.[312] The second limb – the right to call witnesses and have them examined under the same conditions as witnesses for the other side – obviously allows for a wide discretion as it only requires that the prosecution and defence should be treated equally as regards summoning witnesses.[313] So, conditions and restrictions can be set so long as they apply equally to both sides. This provision relates to the concept of creating equality between parties; it is closely related to the fair hearing principle and therefore, will apply in civil cases too.

Art 6 is considered at various points in this book, and extensively in Chapters 11–14, especially in relation to its impact on pre-trial procedures.

Article 7: Freedom from retrospective effect of penal legislation

(1) No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence under national or international law at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the criminal offence was committed.

308 (1993) A 277-A; (1993) 18 EHRR 130.
309 From Golder, Judgment of 21 February 1975, A 18; see also Silver v UK, Judgment of 25 March 1983, A 61, (1983) 5 EHRR 347.
310 Pakelli, Judgment of 25 April 1983, A 64.
311 See, e.g., Asch v Austria (1991) 15 EHRR 597.
312 Such an assertion was made in Kostovski v Netherlands (1989) 12 EHRR 434 and Windisch v Austria (1990) 13 EHRR 281. However, these decisions were not followed in Isgro v Italy (1991) Case 1/1990/192/252. For further discussion of this right, see [1993] Crim LR 261–67.
313 Appl 4428/70, X v Austria (1972) Yearbook XV, p 264.

(2) This article shall not prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for any act or omission which, at the time when it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations.

Article 7 contains an important principle and it is, therefore, non-derogable, although it is subject to the single exception contained in para 2. It divides into two separate principles:

(a) the law in question must have existed at the time of the act in question for the conviction to be based on it;
(b) no heavier penalty for the infringement of the law may be imposed than was in force at the time the act was committed.

As far as the first principle is concerned, this also means that an existing part of the criminal law cannot be applied by analogy to acts it was not intended for.[314] Allowing such extension would fall foul of the general principle that the law must be unambiguous, which is part of the principle that someone should not be convicted if he or she could not have known beforehand that the act in question was criminal. In order to determine whether these requirements have been met, the Strasbourg authorities are prepared to interpret domestic law,[315] although normally they would not be prepared to do so. Although it will be cautious in this respect, the Commission must take note of an allegedly false interpretation of domestic law. Harman v UK[316] concerned unforeseeable liability for contempt of court. It had not previously been considered to be contempt if confidential documents were shown to a journalist after being read out in court. The Commission declared the application admissible, but meanwhile a friendly settlement was reached.

Article 7 was found to have been breached in Welch v UK.[317] Before the trial of the applicant for drug offences, a new provision came into force under the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986, making provision for confiscation orders. This was imposed on the applicant, although the legislation was not in force at the time when he committed the offences in question. It clearly had retrospective effect and was found to constitute a 'penalty' within Art 7(1). In SW v UK and C v UK[318] the applicants claimed that marital rape had been retrospectively outlawed and that therefore, their criminalisation for forced sexual intercourse with their wives created a breach of Art 7. Their convictions were based on the ruling of the House of Lords in R,[319] which removed the marital exemption. The Court found that the anticipated reform of the law undertaken in R was almost inevitable and that therefore, the applicants should have foreseen that their conduct would be found to be criminal. Thus, no breach of Art 7 was found.

Paragraph 7(2) provides an exception which appears to arise if a person is convicted retrospectively for an offence recognised in other countries, but not the one in question at the material time. This exception is potentially quite wide; it is not restricted to war 314 Appl 1852/63, X v Austria (1965) Yearbook VIII.

315 This was determined in X v Austria, above, fn 314.
316 Appl 10038/82; Decision of 11 May 1984; 38 D & R 53 (1984).
317 A 307-A; (1995) 20 EHRR 247.
318 (1995) 21 EHRR 404. For comment on the ruling, see Osborne, C (1996) 4 EHRR 406.
319 [1991] 4 All ER 481; [1991] 3 WLR 767; [1992] Fam Law 108; [1992] Crim LR 207, HL.

crimes and could cover any deeply immoral conduct generally recognised as criminal in national laws.[320] The law in civilised countries which are not Member states can be taken into account in determining the applicability of the exception.

General restrictions on the rights and freedoms contained in Arts 8–11

These Articles have a second paragraph enumerating certain restrictions on the primary right. The interests covered by the restrictions are largely the same: national security, protection of morals, the rights of others, public safety. As indicated above, the state is allowed a 'margin of appreciation' – a degree of discretion – as to the measures needed to protect the particular interest.[321]

To be justified, state interference with Arts 8–11 guarantees must be prescribed by law, have a legitimate aim, be necessary in a democratic society and be applied in a non-discriminatory fashion. In most cases under these Articles, Strasbourg's main concern has been with the 'necessary in a democratic society' requirement; the notion of 'prescribed by law' has been focused upon to some extent, but always with the result that it has been found to be satisfied. The 'legitimate aim' requirement will normally be readily satisfied; as Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick point out, the grounds for interference are so wide that 'the state can usually make a plausible case that it did have a good reason for interfering with the right'.[322] The provision against non-discrimination arises under Art 14 and it is potentially very significant.[323]

The 'prescribed by law' requirement means that the restriction must be in accordance with a rule of national law which satisfies the Convention meaning of 'law'. Also, the law on which the restriction is based is aimed at protecting one of the interests listed in para 2; in other words, the restriction falls within one of the exceptions. Interpreting 'prescribed by law' in Sunday Times v UK,[324] the European Court of Human Rights found that 'the law must be adequately accessible' and 'a norm cannot be regarded as a "law" unless it is formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen to regulate his conduct'. This finding has been flexibly applied; for example, in Rai, Allmond and 'Negotiate Now' v UK,[325] the Commission had to consider the ban on public demonstrations or meetings concerning Northern Ireland in Trafalgar Square. The ban was the subject of a statement in the House of Commons and many refusals of demonstrations had been made subsequent to it. The Commission found that the ban was sufficiently prescribed by law: 'It is compatible with the requirements of foreseeability that terms which are on their face general and unlimited are explained by executive or administrative statements, since it is the provision of sufficiently precise guidance to individuals . . . rather than the source of that guidance which is of relevance.'[326] In 320 See, generally, Beddard, R, 'The rights of the criminal under Article 7 ECHR' (1996) ELR 3.

321 See above, pp 36–39.
322 Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, p 290.
323 See below, pp 108–9.
324 A 30, para 49 (1979).
325 81-A D & R 46 (1995).
326 Ibid, p 152. The power in question arose from the Trafalgar Square Regulations 1952 SI 1952/776 para 3 made under the Parks Regulation (Amendment) Act 1926. The Act allowed the Secretary of State to 'make any regulations considered necessary . . . for the preservation of order . . .' in the parks.

Steel and Others v UK[327] the Commission introduced a very significant qualification: 'The level of precision required depends to a considerable degree on the content of the instrument, the field it is designed to cover, and the number and status of those to whom it is addressed.'[328] Although the term 'margin of appreciation' was not used, this finding appears to allow the Member state a certain leeway in relation to the 'prescribed by law' requirement.

The Court has interpreted 'necessary in a democratic society' as meaning that: 'an interference corresponds to a pressing social need and, in particular, that it is proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued'.[329] Thus, in the particular instance, it can be said that the interference is necessary in the sense that it is concerned with a particular restriction such as the protection of morals, and in the particular case, there is a real need to protect morals – a pressing social need – as opposed to an unclear or weak danger to morals. Further, the interference is in proportion to the aim pursued; in other words, it does not go further than is needed, bearing in mind the objective in question.

But, the doctrine of proportionality is strongly linked to the principle of the margin of appreciation: the Court has stated that the role of the Convention in protecting human rights is subsidiary to the role of the national legal system[330] and that since the state is better placed than the international judge to balance individual rights against general societal interests, Strasbourg will operate a restrained review of the balance struck. The notion of a margin of appreciation conceded to states permeates the Art 8(2), 9(2), 10(2) and 11(2) jurisprudence, although it has not influenced the interpretation of the substantive rights.

Art 8: Right to respect for 'privacy'

(1) Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.

(2) There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.

Article 8 seems to cover four different areas, suggesting that, for example, private life can be distinguished from family life. However, the case law suggests that these rights usually need not be clearly distinguished from each other.[331] There will tend to be a clear overlap between them; for example, it is often unnecessary to define 'family',

327 (1998) 28 EHRR 603.

328 Paragraph 145. The Commission based these findings on the judgments of the Court in Chorherr v Austria Series A 266-B, para 23 (1993) and in Cantoni v France, para 35 (1996) 96 ECHR 52.

329 Olsson v Sweden, A 130, para 67 (1988).

330 Handyside v UK, A 24, para 48 (1976).

331 In Mialhe v France (1993) 16 EHRR 332 it was made clear that the four aspects of private life tend to constitute overlapping concepts.

because the factual situation might so obviously fall within the term 'private'. The inclusion of the wide (and undefined) term 'private' means that rights other than those arising from the home, family life and correspondence may fall within Art 8.

It should be noted that Art 8 only provides right to respect for private life, etc. Thus, the extent of the respect required can vary to an extent in view of the various practices in the different states. In contrast to Art 10, finding that a claim is covered by para 1 is not a simple matter: attention cannot merely focus on the exceptions. The negative obligation – to refrain from interference – is central,[332] but a number of requirements to take positive action have been accommodated within Art 8. Clayton and Tomlinson posit a number of different forms of such positive action.[333] The first arises where the applicant suffers from state inaction.[334] In McGinley and Egan v UK[335] the government was engaging in activities inherently dangerous to the health of the applicant. It was found that Art 8 requires that effective procedures should be in place to ensure that all the relevant information was made available.

A wide range of issues may be accommodated within the right to respect for private life. Other Convention guarantees, particularly those of Art 3, may also be relevant. The right to respect for family life, as the discussion below indicates, is a narrower concept, with which the right to respect for private life overlaps. The European Court of Human Rights has clearly recognised that private life covers individual, personal choices: Dudgeon v UK.[336] Equally, respect for family life covers freedom of parental choice,[337] within limits created by the opposing interests of the child.[338] Thus, the interest of individuals in exercising freedom of choice in decisions as to the disposal of or control over the body may be protected. Usually the individual is, in effect, asking the state to leave him or her alone to make such decisions in order to preserve autonomy. This is a negative obligation which is clearly within the scope of Art 8 where the interference can be viewed as arbitrary.[339]

In some instances, however, the individual will be requiring the assistance of the authorities in ensuring that he or she is able to exercise autonomy. The scope for the acceptance of positive obligations as an aspect of respect for private or family life is less wide. But the European Court has characterised claims that the state is under an obligation to provide such assistance as necessary in order to demonstrate respect for private or family life.[340] In other words, the state may be obliged to provide 332 See, e.g., Gul v Switzerland (1996) 22 EHRR 93, para 38.

333 The Law of Human Rights, 2000, pp 822–24.

334 The transsexual cases in which applicants have argued that they should be allowed to have their birth certificates changed to indicate their current gender (discussed in Chapter 15, p 1515) provide an example; those against the UK failed until Goodwin v UK in 2002, discussed below. The finding of a breach in B v France (1992) 16 EHRR 1 occurred since the Court took into account the fact that the applicant was likely to be asked to reveal her birth certificate more often than in the UK.

335 (1998) 27 EHRR 1.

336 (1982) 4 EHRR 149.

337 See Hoffman v Austria (1993) 17 EHRR 293; X v Netherlands (1974) 2 DR 118.

338 See Rieme v Sweden (1992) 16 EHRR 155.

339 See Belgian Linguistics (No 2) (1968) 1 EHRR 252, para 7; X and Y v Netherlands (1985) 8 EHRR 235; Hokkanen v Finland (1994) 19 EHRR 139.

340 X v UK Appl No 7154/75; 14 D & R 31, p 32 (1978); Marckx v Belgium (1979) 2 EHRR 330, para 31. See also Chapter 9, pp 813 et seq.

legal protection for the individual even when the public authorities are not themselves responsible for an interference with the Art 8 right, although given that the state merely has to show 'respect', its discretion in determining the means of so doing tends to be increased.[341]

Where a positive obligation is claimed, Strasbourg will afford a wide margin of appreciation. The margin can widen or narrow depending on the circumstances of the case, resulting in a variation of the intensity of the Court's review of the state's actions. Two further factors may also be present in this context and may influence Strasbourg in conceding a particularly wide margin of appreciation where a complainant seeks to lay a positive obligation on the state. First, where the harm complained of flows from the action of a private party, rather than the state itself, so that the so-called 'horizontal effect' of the Convention is in issue and, second, where there is a potential conflict with another Convention right. Clearly, these factors may arise independently of each other. In a number of key decisions under Art 8 discussed in Chapter 9, all three were present,[342] which may explain the somewhat unsatisfactory and misleading nature of some of the judgments given, although as Chapter 9 makes clear, a change of stance is now evident.[343] These factors may also arise in this context and may explain the cautious nature of certain of the decisions.

Thus the state may be found to be under a duty to act positively to prevent an interference with the Art 8 guarantees by another private individual. The pollution cases mentioned below[344] provide examples in which it was found that the state had a duty to act to prevent or curb the pollution and to ensure that information regarding the dangers was available. Further, the positive obligation may require a positive act by private persons.[345]

The question of the extent to which positive obligations are recognised under Art 8 is pursued further in this book, especially in Chapter 9.[346] But clearly, there will be limitations. In Botta v Italy[347] it was found that although a positive obligation might arise in the circumstances, a fair balance had to be struck: the obligations did not extend to providing a disabled person with access to the beach and sea distant from a holiday residence. In Barreto v Portugal[348] no breach was found where each family was not provided with its own home or where a landlord could not recover the possession of rented accommodation.

341 See JS v UK Appl No 191173/91, 3 January 1993. The Commission rejected an application in which it was alleged that an insurance company had carried out a clandestine surveillance in investigating a claim.

342 All three were present in: Winer v UK (1986) 48 IR 154; Spencer v UK (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105, and N v Portugal Appl No 20683/92, 20 February 1995; however, the third was influential only in Winer.

343 See Von Hannover, pp 818–24.

344 See the cases of Guerra v Italy (1998) 26 EHRR 375 and Lopez Ostra, (1994) 20 EHRR.

345 In Hokkanen v Finland (1994) 19 EHRLR 139 it was found that a private data collection firm must grant access to its records.

346 See pp 814–18.

347 (1998) 26 EHRR 241.

348 (1996) 26 EHRLR 214.

Exceptions and justification under Art 8(2)

There must be an 'interference' by the public authorities. But, as the discussion above indicates, this can include the failure to carry out a positive obligation. In the absence of a positive obligation, however, a failure to act would not constitute an interference.[349] Where an interference occurs, proper safeguards must be in place to protect individuals from arbitrary interference; there must be a legal framework which satisfies the 'in accordance with the law' test and strict limits must be placed on the power conferred.[350] Where very intimate aspects of private life are involved, very particular reasons for the interference must be adduced.[351]

If the exception in respect of national security is invoked, the state may find that is relatively easy to justify the interference.[352] But where interferences, such as searches or surveillance, occur in respect of criminal activity, a higher standard will be required. Thus, judicial authorisation of searches or surveillance may be required.[353] Where a grave invasion of privacy has occurred, judicial authorisation and a warrant may not be enough.[354] This matter is pursued in Chapter 11.[355]

The head 'the economic well-being of the country' is unusual; it does not appear in para 2 of Art 8's companion Articles, Arts 9–11. A number of interferences have been found to be justified under this head.[356] In MS v Sweden[357] the obtaining of access to medical records in order to assess a social security claim was found to be justified.

Justification under the heads 'for the prevention of disorder or crime' depends on the seriousness of the crime or threat to disorder, the nature and extent of the interference and the question whether a judicial warrant has been obtained. In Camenzind[358] the limited scope of the search and the procedures in place meant that the search was proportionate to the aim of preventing crime. In Murray v UK[359] the entry and search of Mrs Murray's home was not disproportionate to that aim, bearing in mind her links to terrorism.

In contrast to the stance taken under Art 10(2),[360] the exception for the protection of morals has received a restrictive interpretation. The Court has required an especially significant justification in order to be satisfied as to proportionality.[361] This exception is sometimes also raised where the exception in respect of the rights of others is invoked especially in relation to family life, where the protection of health may also be in issue. For example, in Olsson v Sweden,[362] the decision to take three children into care was an interference with family life. However, it could be justified as being for the protection of the health and the rights of the child.

349 Airey v Ireland (1979) 2 EHRR 305.
350 Camenzind v Switzerland, RJD 1997-III 2880.
351 Lustig-Prean v UK (1999) 7 BHRC 65; Smith and Grady v UK (2000) 29 EHRLR 493.
352 See Leander v Sweden (1987) 9 EHRR 433.
353 Funke v France (1993) 16 EHRR 297.
354 Niemietz v Germany (1992) 16 EHRR 97.
355 See pp 1042–46.
356 Eg Powell v UK (1990) 12 EHRR 355.
357 RJD 1997-IV 1437.
358 See above, fn 350.
359 (1994) 19 EHRR 193.
360 See Chapter 6, pp 463–67.
361 See Norris v Ireland (1988) 13 EHRR 186 and Dudgeon v UK (1981) 4 EHRR 149.
362 (1988) 11 EHRR 259.

The concept of respect for private life

In Niemietz v Germany,[363] the Court said:

> 'It would be too restrictive to limit the notion [of private life] to an "inner circle" in which the individual may live his own personal life as he chooses and to exclude therefrom entirely the outside world not encompassed within that circle. Respect for private life must also comprise to a certain degree the right to establish and develop relationships with other human beings.'

As Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick observe: 'this extends the concept of private life beyond the narrower confines of the Anglo-American idea of privacy, with its emphasis on the secrecy of personal information and seclusion.'[364] Thus, 'private life' appears to encompass a widening range of protected interests, but this development has been accompanied by a reluctance of the Court to insist on a narrow margin of appreciation when considering what is demanded of states by the notions of 'respect' for private life and by the necessity of interferences with privacy.

Privacy of personal information

Respect for the privacy of personal information clearly falls within the notion of private life, but the Court has approached this aspect cautiously, tending to be satisfied if a procedure is in place allowing the interest in such control to be weighed up against a competing interest. Thus, in Gaskin v UK,[365] the interest of the applicant in obtaining access to the files relating to his childhood in care had to be weighed up against the interest of the contributors to it in maintaining confidentiality, because this interference with privacy had a legitimate aim under the 'rights of others' exception. It was held that the responsible authority did not have a procedure available for weighing the two. Consequently, the procedure automatically preferred the contributors and that was disproportionate to the aim of protecting confidentiality and therefore could not be 'necessary in a democratic society'.

The opposite result was reached, but by a similar route, in Klass v Federal Republic of Germany,[366] brought in respect of telephone tapping. It was found that although telephone tapping constituted an interference with a person's private life, it could be justified as being in the interests of national security and there were sufficient controls in place (permission had to be given by a minister applying certain criteria including that of 'reasonable suspicion') to ensure that the power was not abused. In the similar Malone case,[367] however, there were no such controls in place and a breach of Art 8 was therefore found, which led to the introduction of the Interception of Communications Act 1985. A similar path was followed in Leander v Sweden[368] in respect of a complaint

363 (1992) 16 EHRR 97, A 251-B, para 29 (1992).
364 Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, p 304.
365 (1990) 12 EHRR 36.
366 (1978) 2 EHRR 214; see also Ludi v Switzerland (1993) 15 EHRR 173.
367 Report of 17 December 1982, A 82; (1984) 7 EHRR 14. See below, p 1033.
368 Judgment of 26 March 1987, A 116; (1987) 9 EHRR 443. See also to similar effect Ebchester v UK (1993) 18 EHRR CD 72.

that information about the applicant had been stored on a secret police register for national security purposes and released to the navy so that it could vet persons who might be subversive. The applicant complained that he had had no opportunity of challenging the information, but the Court found that as there were remedies in place, albeit of a limited nature, to address such grievances, Art 8 had not been breached because the national security exception could apply. Again, in Harman and Hewitt v UK[369] a breach of Art 8 was found as there was no means of challenging the secret directive which had allowed the storage of information on the applicants. In Murray v UK,[370] the taking of a photo of the applicant after arrest at an army centre was found to constitute an interference with her Art 8 right to respect for her private life. The notion that personal information should remain private even outside obviously private spaces was strongly indicated in Niemietz v Germany.[371]

Bodily integrity and automomy

Under Art 8, bodily privacy has a number of aspects. The European Court of Human Rights adopted a broad definition of privacy in X and Y v Netherlands:[372]

> [the concept of] private life . . . covers the physical integrity . . . of the person . . . Art 8 does not merely compel the State to abstain from . . . interference [with the individual]: in addition to this primarily negative undertaking, there may be positive obligations inherent in effective respect for private . . . life.[373]

Thus, Art 8 recognises that individuals have an interest in preventing or controlling physical intrusions on the body and they may therefore lay claim to a negative right to be 'left alone' in a physical sense. Such a right might also encompass positive claims on the state to ensure that bodily integrity is not infringed. Thus, the state may fail to respect privacy if it fails to prevent infringement of it by others or if in itself it allows such infringement.

Interference with bodily integrity may breach the guarantee of freedom from degrading punishment under Art 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights and the guarantee of respect for privacy under Art 8. In general, any compulsory physical treatment of an individual will constitute an interference with respect for private life.[374] We will return below to the question as to the level of consensual bodily harm which will be forbidden.

Certain forms of physical punishment may be seen as an unjustified intrusion into bodily integrity. Corporal punishment was outlawed in UK state schools[375] after the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Campbell and Cosans v UK,[376]

369 (1992) 14 EHRR 657.
370 (1994) 19 EHRR 193; cf Friedl v Austria (1995) 21 EHRR 83.
371 (1992) 16 EHRR 97. The case concerned a search of a lawyer's office.
372 (1985) 8 EHRR 235.
373 Ibid, paras 22 and 23.
374 X v Austria 18 D & R 154 (1979).
375 Under the Education (No 2) Act 1986.
376 (1984) 2 EHRR 293.

which was determined not on the basis of Arts 3 or 8 but under Art 2 of the First Protocol, which protects the right of parents to have their children educated according to their own philosophical convictions. However, corporal punishment in private schools was not outlawed, and in Costello-Roberts v UK[377] the European Court of Human Rights found that the UK had a responsibility to ensure that school discipline was compatible with the Convention even though the treatment in question was administered in an institution independent of the state. However, although the Court considered that there might be circumstances in which Art 8 could be regarded as affording protection to physical integrity, which would be broader than that afforded by Art 3, in the particular circumstances the adverse effect on the complainant was insufficient to amount to an invasion of privacy. The Court took into account the 'public' context in which the punishment had occurred and its relatively trivial nature. Corporal punishment in both private and public sector schools was abolished in the UK.[378]

Parents or persons with parental responsibility may also use force to discipline a child. In A v UK[379] the applicant was a nine year old who had been beaten by his stepfather with a garden cane. The stepfather was acquitted of assault causing bodily harm after the jury were instructed that the crime did not include reasonable chastisement by a parent. It was found that the beating fell within Art 3 and that it was incumbent on states to take measures to ensure that individuals within their jurisdiction are not subject to Art 3 treatment. Had the beating been less severe, a breach of Art 8 rather than Art 3 might have been found. It is clear that, by definition, beating amounting to Art 3 treatment cannot be viewed as reasonable and therefore, in future, the defence of reasonable chastisement could not cover the degree of force used in A.

Under Art 8, physical intrusions on the bodily integrity of individuals by state agents may be justified if the requirements of Art 8(2) are satisfied. Equally, UK law also recognises a need to create a balance between the interest of the state in allowing physical interference with individuals for various purposes, including the prevention of crime and the interest of the individual in preserving his or her bodily integrity. UK law determines that in certain circumstances, bodily privacy may give way to other interests. Articles 3 and 8 together provide substantive guarantees against certain types of custodial ill-treatment. But, clearly, Art 3 will cover only the grossest instances of ill-treatment. It is notable that the Convention contains no provision equivalent to that under Art 10 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights which provides 'persons deprived of their liberty shall be treated with humanity and with respect for the inherent dignity of the human person'.

In the Greek case,[380] the conditions of detention were found to amount to inhuman treatment due to overcrowding, inadequate food, sleeping arrangements, heating, toilets and provision for external contacts. Failure to obtain medical treatment after a forcible arrest was found to infringe Art 3 in Hurtado v Switzerland.[381] Conduct which grossly 377 (1993) 19 EHRR 112; A 247-C.

378 Education Act 1996, s 548, as substituted by School Standards and Framework Act 1998, s 131.
379 (1999) 27 EHRR 611.
380 12 YB 1 (1969) Com Rep.
381 A 280-A (1994) Com Rep.

humiliates is degrading treatment contrary to Art 3.[382] Article 8 may be viewed as overlapping, to an extent, with Art 3, but it also covers some matters which would not be serious enough to amount to Art 3 treatment.[383] In order to bring Art 8 into play, it must be found that its protection extends to the matter in question – in this context, it would probably be that 'private or family life' is affected. [384] Certain conditions or incidents of detention may fall outside Art 8, such as a failure to provide an interpreter. But a failure to allow a juvenile or a mentally disturbed person to consult privately with a member of his or her family, acting as an appropriate adult, might be viewed as an interference with either private or family life.

Personal autonomy has been recognised for some time in the USA as strongly linked to privacy. In Doe v Bolton,[385] Douglas J said that 'the right to privacy means freedom of choice in the basic decisions of one's life respecting marriage, divorce, procreation, contraception, education and upbringing of children'. At Strasbourg, the value of personal autonomy has also received quite clear recognition.[386] Personal autonomy connotes an interest not only in preventing physical intrusion by others, but also with the extent to which the law allows an individual a degree of control over his or her own body.

But the choice of adults as to the disposal of their own bodies is highly circumscribed. In the Member states, although in general suicide is no longer a crime, in the vast majority of Member states aiding and abetting suicide has not been de-criminalised. Thus, for example, a relative of a person who is unable to commit suicide because she is incapacitated through illness cannot help her to die in order to avoid severe pain and suffering without risking prosecution for murder or manslaughter. Euthanasia is legal in Holland[387] and in Belgium. It is not recognised in UK law,[388] except in the very narrow sense that allowing a patient in a persistent vegetative state to die will be acceptable if it can be said, objectively speaking, to be in his or her best interests 382 The Greek case, 12 YB 1 (1969) Com Rep.

383 See the findings in the corporal punishment case of Costello-Roberts v UK (1993) 19 EHRR 112 (above). The Court found that the treatment was not severe enough to fall within Art 3; in the particular circumstances it did not fall within Art 8, but the Court considered that there might be circumstances in which Art 8 could be viewed as affording a wider protection to physical integrity than that which is afforded by Art 3.

384 Code of Practice A (2006) made under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE), provides safeguards for a search by police officers of more than outer clothing which appear to be coterminous with the right to respect for privacy under Art 8. There are also Code provisions protecting persons during intimate and strip searches. The domestic relationship between Code provisions and Art 8 is discussed in Chapter 11, pp 1107, 1131, 1176–80

385 (1973) 410 US 179; (1973) 35 L E 2d 201.

386 Dudgeon v UK (1982) 4 EHRR 149; Lustig-Prean v UK (1999) 7 BHRC 65. For discussion, see Feldman, op. cit., fn 1.

387 The law in The Netherlands has been severely criticised: see Keown, J, 'The law and practice of euthanasia in the Netherlands' [1992] 108 LQR 51–78. In 30 years Holland has moved from assisted suicide to euthanasia, from euthanasia of people who are terminally ill to euthanasia of those who are chronically ill, from euthanasia for physical illness to euthanasia for mental illness, from euthanasia for mental illness to euthanasia for psychological distress or mental suffering, and from voluntary euthanasia to involuntary euthanasia, termed in Holland 'termination of the patient without explicit request'. For discussion of the moral issues see Dworkin, R, Life's Dominion, 1993, HarperCollins.

388 For discussion, see Orst, S, 'Conceptions of the euthanasia phenomenon' [2000] JCIVLIB 155.

because no improvement can be expected.[389] Also, under the so called 'double effect' doctrine, a doctor will not be guilty of murder if he or she administers a very high level of a pain-killing drug which he or she knows is likely to cause death so long as the primary intention is to relieve pain.[390] A conflict with Art 2 might arise[391] if euthanasia was allowed in other situations; it has merely been found at Strasbourg that passively allowing a person to die need not attract criminal liability in order to satisfy Art 2.[392] The consent of the victim would be irrelevant; euthanasia is not covered by any of the Art 2 exceptions.

In 2001, an action was brought in the UK under the HRA against the Director of Public Prosecutions (DPP) in relation to his decision that a husband who wishes to help his wife to die once her terminal Motor Neurone Disease reaches a certain stage would be liable to the risk of prosecution.[393] The woman wanted a declaration that her husband would not be prosecuted and argued that the state has a responsibility to make such a declaration since otherwise Arts 3 and 8 would be breached. The claim was backed by the UK group Liberty. The claim was rejected by the House of Lords and Diane Pretty took the case to Strasbourg.[394] She complained under a number of Articles, including Art 8. She relied on Art 8 in arguing that the Article explicitly recognises the right to self-determination, and on Art 9, complaining that the failure to give the undertaking and provide a lawful scheme for allowing assisted suicide violated her right to manifest her beliefs. Under Art 14, she argued that the blanket prohibition on assisted suicide discriminates against those who are unable to commit suicide without assistance, whereas the able-bodied are able to exercise the right to die, under domestic law. She also complained, under Art 2 of the Convention, that it is for the individual to choose whether to live and that the right to die is the corollary of the right to live and also protected. Accordingly, she argued that there is a positive obligation on the state to provide a scheme in domestic law to enable her to exercise that right. She also complained under Art 3 that the UK Government is obliged not only to refrain from inflicting inhuman and degrading treatment itself, but also to take positive steps to protect persons within its jurisdiction from being subjected to such treatment. The only effective step available to protect her would be an undertaking not to prosecute her husband if he assisted her to commit suicide.

The Court found that the case fell within the ambit of para 1 of Art 8. The applicant was prevented by law from exercising her choice to avoid what she considered would be an undignified and distressing end to her life. The Court was not prepared to exclude that this constituted an interference with her right to respect for private life as guaranteed under Art 8(1), but reiterated that an interference with the exercise of 389 Airedale NHS Trust v Bland [1993] AC 789, HL.

390 Cox [1992] BMLR 38. In Moor (see [2000] J CIV LIB 155), a doctor who had administered a very high dose of diamorphine to an elderly patient who had pleaded with him for a speedy death was charged with murder. He was acquitted on the basis of evidence showing that the double effect doctrine applied, not on the basis of any right to be assisted to die.

391 See pp 42–43.

392 Widmer v Switzerland, No 20527/92 (1993), unreported. See also pp 42–43.

393 The claim was rejected on appeal to the HL: R (on the application of Diane Pretty) v DPP and Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2001] UKHL 61.

394 Pretty v UK (2002), 23 HRLJ 194.

an Art 8 right would not be compatible with Art 8(2) unless it was 'in accordance with the law'; had an aim or aims that was or were legitimate under that paragraph; and was 'necessary in a democratic society' to attain such aim or aims. The only issue arising from the arguments of the parties was the necessity of any interference and those arguments had focused on its proportionality. In this connection the applicant had attacked the blanket nature of the ban on assisted suicide. The Court found, in agreement with the House of Lords, that states were entitled to regulate through the operation of the general criminal law activities which were detrimental to the life and safety of other individuals. The law in issue in this case, S 2 of the Suicide Act 1961, was designed, it found, to safeguard life by protecting the weak and vulnerable and especially those who were not in a condition to take informed decisions against acts intended to end life or to assist in ending life.

The Court did not consider that the blanket nature of the ban on assisted suicide was disproportionate. The government had stated that flexibility was provided for in individual cases by the fact that consent was needed from the DPP to bring a prosecution and by the fact that a maximum sentence was provided, allowing lesser penalties to be imposed as appropriate. It did not, the Court found, appear to be arbitrary for the law to reflect the importance of the right to life by prohibiting assisted suicide while providing for a system of enforcement and adjudication which allowed due regard to be given in each particular case to the public interest in bringing a prosecution, as well as to the fair and proper requirements of retribution and deterrence. Further, in the circumstances the Court did not find anything disproportionate in the refusal of the DPP to give an advance undertaking that no prosecution would be brought against the applicant's husband. Strong arguments based on the rule of law could be raised against any claim by the executive to exempt individuals or classes of individuals from the operation of the law. In any event, the seriousness of the act for which immunity was claimed was such that the decision of the DPP to refuse the undertaking sought could not be said to be arbitrary or unreasonable. The Court concluded that the interference could be justified as 'necessary in a democratic society' for the protection of the rights of others, and that there had therefore been no violation of Art 8.

The Court observed that not all opinions or convictions constituted beliefs as protected by Art 9(1). The applicant's claims did not involve a form of manifestation of a religion or belief, through worship, teaching, practice or observance as described in the second sentence of the first paragraph. The term 'practice' did not cover each act which was motivated or influenced by a religion or belief. To the extent that the applicant's views reflected her commitment to the principle of personal autonomy, her claim was a restatement of the complaint raised under Art 8. The Court concluded that there had been no violation of Art 9 since the claim was not covered by para 1.

For the purposes of Art 14 the Court reiterated that a difference in treatment between persons in analogous or relevantly similar positions was discriminatory if it had no objective and reasonable justification, that is if it did not pursue a legitimate aim or if there was not a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised. Discrimination could also arise where states, without an objective and reasonable justification, failed to treat differently persons whose situations were significantly different. There was, in the Court's view, objective and reasonable justification for not distinguishing in law between those who were and those who were not physically capable of committing suicide. Cogent reasons existed for not seeking to distinguish between those who were able and those who were unable to commit suicide unaided. The borderline between the two categories would often be a very fine one and to seek to build into the law an exemption for those judged to be incapable of committing suicide would seriously undermine the protection of life which the 1961 Act was intended to safeguard and greatly increase the risk of abuse. Thus it was found that there had been no violation of Art 14.

As regards Art 2 the Court reiterated that it safeguarded the right to life, without which enjoyment of any of the other rights and freedoms in the Convention was rendered nugatory. It covered not only intentional killing, but also the situations where it was permitted to use force which resulted, as an unintended outcome, in the deprivation of life. The Court stated that it had held that the first sentence of Art 2(1) enjoined states not only to refrain from the intentional and unlawful taking of life, but also to take appropriate steps to safeguard the lives of those within its jurisdiction. This obligation might also imply in certain well-defined circumstances a positive obligation on the authorities to take preventive operational measures to protect an individual whose life was at risk from the criminal acts of another individual.

In its case law in this area the Court stated that it had placed consistent emphasis on the obligation of the state to protect life. In these circumstances it was not persuaded that 'the right to life' guaranteed in Art 2 could be interpreted as involving a negative aspect. Article 2 could not, without a distortion of language, be interpreted as conferring the diametrically opposite right, namely a right to die; nor could it create a right to self-determination in the sense of conferring on an individual the entitlement to choose death rather than life. The Court accordingly found that no right to die, whether at the hands of a third person or with the assistance of a public authority, could be derived from Art 2. There had therefore been no violation of that provision.

As regards Art 3, it was, the Court noted, beyond dispute that the respondent government had not, themselves, inflicted any ill-treatment on the applicant. Nor was there any complaint that the applicant was not receiving adequate care from the state medical authorities. The applicant had claimed rather that the refusal of the DPP to give an undertaking not to prosecute her husband if he assisted her to commit suicide and the criminal law prohibition on assisted suicide disclosed inhuman and degrading treatment for which the state was responsible. This claim however placed a new and extended construction on the concept of treatment. While the Court reiterated that it had to take a dynamic and flexible approach to the interpretation of the Convention, any interpretation had also to accord with the fundamental objectives of the Convention and its coherence as a system of human rights protection. Article 3 had to be construed in harmony with Art 2. Article 2 was first and foremost a prohibition on the use of lethal force or other conduct which might lead to the death of a human being and did not confer any claim on an individual to require a state to permit or facilitate his or her death. The Court sympathised with the applicant's apprehension that without the possibility of ending her life she faced the prospect of a distressing death. Nonetheless, the positive obligation on the part of the state which had been invoked would require that the state sanction actions intended to terminate life, an obligation that could not be derived from Art 3. The Court therefore concluded that no positive obligation arose under Art 3 in this context and that there had, accordingly, been no violation of that provision.

It may be noted that a parallel action was brought in a Canadian case, Rodriguez v British Columbia.[395] A similar argument was received sympathetically; it was found that the Criminal Code prohibition on aiding and abetting suicide did infringe her right to security of the person. However, the application failed on the basis that it did not do so in breach of the principles of fundamental justice, the exception clause.

The European Court of Human Rights has so far avoided the question whether the foetus is protected by Art 2 – in other words, whether it would come within the term 'everyone'. In Open Door Counselling v Ireland the Court deliberately left open the possibility that Art 2 might place some restrictions on abortion.[396] If it was to find that the foetus is protected, the result, in terms of changes to almost all the state parties' laws on abortion, would be immense, since only abortion falling within the exceptions to Art 2 would be permitted. There would be an immense increase in dangerous illegal abortions and women would travel outside the Member states for abortions, leading to an increase in later terminations. It has been found in the context of national legislation on abortion that the woman seeking abortion can rely on Arts 2 and 8, since her life and physical and mental health are in question.[397]

The Commission has, however, committed itself to the view that the foetus is not protected under Art 2. In H v Norway[398] the Commission found that the lawful abortion of a 14-week foetus on social grounds did not breach Art 2. It took this stance partly on the basis that otherwise, a conflict with the mother's Art 8 rights might arise, and partly because, since the state Parties' laws on abortion differ considerably from each other, a wide margin of discretion should be allowed. There are strong reasons for considering that a question concerning an irreconcilable conflict of moral views should be left to the national legislatures.[399] The stance taken in a number of other jurisdictions suggests that where this human rights issue comes before the highest national courts, the woman's right to security of the person and to freedom of choice is viewed as paramount[400] and it has been found that the right to life does not extend to the foetus.[401]

Sexual autonomy

Protection for personal information may be regarded as part of the 'core' of the concept of respect for private life, but as the Court has made clear in a number of decisions, aspects of relations with others will also fall within the concept. The Court has made it clear that the choice to have sexual relations with others falls within Art 8. In this sphere, it is suggested that the Court has gradually abandoned its initially cautious approach.

395 (1993) 85 CCC (3d) 15.

396 ECtHR, Judgment of 29 October 1992; (1992) 15 EHRR 244. For comment, see (1992) 142 NLJ 1696.

397 X v UK, Appl No 8416/78; 19 D & R 244 (1980).

398 Appl No 17004/90 (1992) 73 DR 155.

399 See pp 280–85. For discussion, see Dworkin, R, Life's Dominion, 1993.

400 See the decision of the Canadian Supreme Court in Morgentaler v R [1988] 1 SCR 60; the decision of the US Supreme Court in Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v Casey (1992) 505 US 833.

401 Christian Lawyers Assoc of South Africa v The Minister of Health 1998 (11) BCLR 1434; Borowski v AG of Canada (1987) 39 DLR (4th) 731.

In Dudgeon,[402] the Northern Ireland prohibition of homosexual intercourse was found to breach Art 8: however, this case concerned a gross interference with privacy since it allowed the applicant no means at all of expressing his sexual preference without committing a criminal offence. In 1984,[403] the Commission declared inadmissible an application challenging s 66 of the Army Act 1955, which governs conviction for homosexual practices in the armed forces, on the basis that it could be justified under the prevention of disorder or protection of morals clauses.[404] That stance has now been abandoned, and the Court has taken a much more interventionist stance in relation to the sexual autonomy of homosexuals.[405]

Dudgeon v UK[406] concerned the law in Northern Ireland (Offences Against the Person Act 1861), which made buggery between consenting males of any age a crime. Dudgeon, who was suspected of homosexual activities, was arrested on that basis and questioned, but the police decided not to prosecute. He applied to the European Commission on the grounds of a breach of the right of respect for private life under Art 8. The European Court of Human Rights held that the legislation in question constituted a continuing interference with his private life, which included his sexual life. He was forced either to abstain from sexual relations completely, or to commit a crime. Clearly, there had been an interference with his private life; the question was whether the interference was necessary in order to protect morals. The Court considered that some regulation of homosexual activity was acceptable; the question was what was necessary in a democratic society. The Court took into account the doctrine of the margin of appreciation, as considered in the Handyside case,[407] where it was held that state authorities were in the best position to judge the requirements of morals. However, the Court found that the instant case concerned a very intimate aspect of private life. A restriction on a Convention right cannot be regarded as necessary unless it is proportionate to the aim pursued. In the instant case, there was a grave detrimental interference with the applicant's private life while, on the other hand, there was little evidence of damage to morals. The law had not been enforced and no evidence had been adduced to show that this had been harmful to moral standards. So the aim of the restriction was not proportional to the damage done to the applicant's privacy and, therefore, the invasion of privacy went beyond what was needed. It was found unnecessary since the prohibition had not in fact been used in recent times and no detriment to morals had apparently resulted. Northern Ireland amended the relevant

402 Judgment of 22 October 1981, A 45; (1982) 4 EHRR 149.

403 B v UK 34 D & R 68 (1983); (1983) 6 EHRR 354; A 9237/81.

404 The charges had involved a soldier under 21. Note that the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill 1990–91 recommended that s 66 should be replaced (para 41, p xiv). See, now, Smith and Grady v UK (2000) 29 EHRR 493 in which it was found that the ban breached Art 8. The ban is no longer being applied; see Chapter 15, pp 1520.

405 See Chapter 15, p 1520 for discussion of Lustig-Prean v UK (1999) 29 EHRR 548 in which it was found that the army ban breached Art 8; see also Chapter 12, pp 1207–8, and Sutherland v UK, Appl. no 25186/94 [1997] EHRLR 117, in which an application regarding the age of consent for homosexual relations (8.9.1999) was postponed since the government assured the Commission that the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Bill would proceed equalising the age of consent (see, now, Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 2000 s 1).

406 (1982) 4 EHRR 149.

407 (1976) 1 EHRR 737.

legislation in consequence,[408] allowing intercourse between consenting males over 21. Dudgeon demonstrates that the European Court of Human Rights is prepared to uphold the right of the individual to choose to indulge in homosexual practices[409] and suggests that the term 'private life' in Art 8 may be used to cover a wide range of situations where bodily or sexual privacy is in question.

In the UK s 143 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 amended s 1 of the Sexual Offences Act 1967 to lower the age of consent for homosexual intercourse to 18. The differential ages of consent under s 143 continued to allow discrimination between homosexuals and heterosexuals and between male and female homosexuals. In Sutherland v UK[410] s 143 of the 1994 Act was successfully challenged under Art 8 in conjunction with Art 14 on the basis that it allowed discrimination between male and female homosexuals, since the age of consent for female homosexual intercourse is 16 under the criminal law as it stands at present, as indicated above. The Commission found by 14 votes to four that the fixing of a minimum age of consent at 18 as opposed to 16 was a violation of Art 8 and was discriminatory treatment under Art 14. It took into account the fact that many other states have equalised the ages of consent for homosexual and heterosexual acts and further found that the interference could not be justified on the grounds, including that of protecting public morality, put forward under Art 8(2). It appeared that the European Court of Human Rights was prepared to reconsider its remarks on the point in Dudgeon since, as indicated above, it tends to take the view that in sensitive matters of this nature, it should hold back until a clear European standard seems to be emerging; at the stage when a trend is clear, but no such standard has emerged, it will tend to invoke the margin of appreciation.[411] Given the changes in the law on this matter in the different Member states, it seemed that such a standard was emerging regarding equalisation of the ages of consent. The decision was postponed when the government assured the Commission that the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Bill would proceed with equalising the age of consent.[412] This was eventually achieved under s 1 of the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 2000; the government had to use the Parliament Act 1911 (as amended) procedure in order to pass the Bill against the opposition of the House of Lords.

Despite these changes, the law governing the sexual freedom of homosexuals was still not in accord with Art 8 due to the restrictions on homosexual intercourse which did not apply to heterosexuals.[413] In particular, the law had to be changed so as to allow consenting homosexual intercourse in private between more than two men as a result of the 'Bolton Seven' case brought against the UK.[414] The applicants were prosecuted in 1998 on the basis of a video which showed them engaging in consensual group sex. They were convicted of gross indecency. One of the men, Williams, and another, 408 Homosexual Offences (Northern Ireland) Order 1982. See also Norris v Ireland (1991) 13 EHRR 186 which followed Dudgeon.

409 Cf the stance of the US Supreme Court in Bowers v Hardwick (1986) 478 US 186; for comment see (1988) 138 NLJ 831.

410 Appl No 25186/94; [1997] EHRLR 117.

411 See discussion on this point in relation to transsexuals, below, pp 85–87

412 On 8 September 1999.

413 See further Chapter 6, pp 556–58. For discussion, see Wintemute, R, S*exual Orientation and Human Rights*, 1995, Clarendon, Chapter 4.

414 ADT v UK (2000) 2 FLR 697; see the Guardian, 27 July 2001.

Connell, admitted to having had sex with one of the other five who was, at the time, six months under 18, the then age of consent. Williams was convicted of buggery, although his suspended sentence was later revoked by the Court of Appeal. At the time of the convictions, the Court was warned that the prosecutions breached Art 8. Five of the men applied to the European Court of Human Rights and, in July 2001, in order to avoid defeat in the Court, the government offered each of them compensation in an out-of-court settlement. The Sexual Offence Act 2003 brought about equalisation of the position. By these incremental steps, legal acceptance of the sexual autonomy of homosexuals was brought about, in the sense of achieving equality with heterosexuals.

In the case of Brown,[415] the House of Lords found that a person cannot consent to the infliction of harm amounting to actual bodily harm. However, consent to such harm may negate liability if there is good reason for the harm to be caused. There are a number of activities involving the causing of, or the risk of, consensual harm which have been found to be justified as in the public interest. In Brown, a group of sado-masochistic homosexuals had regularly over a period of ten years willingly participated in acts of violence against each other for the sexual pleasure engendered in the giving and receiving of pain. They were charged with causing actual bodily harm contrary to s 47 and with wounding contrary to s 20 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861 and were convicted. The convictions were upheld by the Court of Appeal which certified the following point of law of general public importance:

> Where A wounds or assaults B occasioning him actual bodily harm in the course of a sado-masochistic encounter, does the prosecution have to prove lack of consent on the part of B before they can establish A's guilt under s 20 and s 47 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861.

The House of Lords, by a majority of three to two, answered this question in the negative, finding, therefore, that consent could operate only as a defence and would be allowed so to operate only where the public interest would thereby be served. It was found that in a sado-masochistic context, the inflicting of injuries amounting to actual bodily harm could not fall within the category of 'good reason' and therefore, despite the consent of all the participants, the convictions of the defendants were upheld.

The judgments of the majority in the House of Lords are couched in terms which suggest that distaste for the activities in question was a significant influencing factor. Lord Mustill, in the minority in the House of Lords, considered each of the grounds considered by the majority to be in favour of criminalising the activities in question and discounted each of them. These included fear of the spread of AIDS and the possibility that things might get out of hand if activities such as these were allowed. AIDS, as Lord Mustill pointed out, may be spread by consensual buggery, which is legal, rather than by the activities in question. If a person consents to a lesser harm than that which is actually inflicted, the existing law could be used to punish the perpetrator.

It is unclear that any public interest was served by bringing the prosecution: the activities in question were carried on privately, and there was no suggestion that any of the 'victims' were coerced into consenting to them: all had apparently chosen freely to participate. No hospital treatment was needed and the police only discovered what had been occurring by chance. Thus, this decision may be criticised for its subjectivity; it is unclear why it is acceptable that boxing contests may be carried out which can result in serious permanent injury or even death, while activities such as those in Brown are criminalised although they may result in a lesser degree of harm.[416] An inference which may be drawn is that while boxing, rough horseplay or private heterosexual activities are regarded by some members of the judiciary as acceptable and perhaps 'manly', they have little or no sympathy with, or understanding of, the value of some aspects of sexual expression, especially the sexual expression of homosexuals. The majority in the House of Lords in Brown did not appear to regard the decision as allowing an interference with private sexual activity between adults, but rather as an application of the criminal law to offences of violence which had a sexual motive.

415 [1993] 2 WLR 556; [1993] 2 All ER 75; for comment, see (1993) 109 LQR 540; (1994) 20(3) JLS 356.

Three of the men who were convicted in Brown applied to the European Commission on Human Rights, arguing that their convictions were in breach of Art 8 of the Convention,[417] since they constituted an interference with their private life. The Commission found that no violation of Art 8 had occurred and referred the case to the Court, which came to the same conclusion: Laskey, Jaggard and Brown v UK.[418] The Court considered that the activities in question could be seen as occurring outside the private sphere: many persons were involved and videos had been taken. However, as the issue of privacy was not in dispute, the Court accepted that an interference with respect for the applicants' private life had occurred.

The question was whether the interference was necessary in a democratic society. It found that the harm was serious, since it concerned genital torture. The state is entitled to regulate the infliction of physical harm, and the level of harm to be tolerated by the state where the victim consents is in the first instance a matter for the state concerned. The activities had the potential to cause harm in the sense that if encouraged, harm, including the spread of AIDS, might occur in future. Was the interference proportionate to the aim pursued? Numerous charges could have been preferred, but only a few were selected. The level of sentencing reflected the perception that the activities were rendered less serious by the consent of the 'victims'. The Court, therefore, found that the state had not overstepped its margin of appreciation, taking into account the need for regulation of such harm and the proportionate response of the authorities. Thus, no violation of Art 8 was found. The partly dissenting judgment of Judge Pettiti is of interest. He reasoned that the case did not fall within Art 8 at all, since Art 8 provides protection for a person's intimacy and dignity, not for a person's baseness or criminal immorality. The wording of this judgment echoes the wording of parts of the majority judgments of the House of Lords in allowing distaste and lack of sympathy for the activities in question to have some bearing.

The judgment of the Court reflects, it is suggested, the tendency of the operation of the margin of appreciation to dilute the Convention standards. As suggested elsewhere 416 See further on this point Roberts's discussion of the Law Commission, Consultative Paper No 139, Consent in the Criminal Law, 1995; (1997) 17(3) OJLS 389.

417 Laskey, Jaggard and Brown v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 39 Appl No 21974/93. The case of V, W, X, Y and Z v UK Appl No 21627/93 raises the same issues.

418 (1997) 24 EHRR 39.

in this book,[419] a strong justification for trusting human rights and freedoms to the judicial as opposed to the democratic process is that the interests of minorities (including sexual minorities) may thereby be safeguarded, whereas, if they were at the mercy of majoritarianism, they might be at risk. However, this judgment lends credibility to the arguments of those who view the Convention as ineffective as a protector of minorities who stray too far from conventional forms of sexual expression, even where all involved are consenting adults. Clearly, if a similar prosecution is brought in future, Art 8 arguments might be raised with more success, bearing in mind the fact that the margin of appreciation doctrine has no application in domestic law.

Sexual identity

UK law did not give full expression to the fundamental interest of individuals in determining their own identity. This significant aspect of private life arose in a number of cases brought under the European Convention on Human Rights against the UK by transsexuals. In Rees v UK[420] the applicant, who was born a woman but had had a gender re-assignment operation, complained that he could not have his birth certificate altered to record his new sex, thereby causing him difficulty in applying for employment. However, the Court refused to find a breach of Art 8, because it was reluctant to accept the claim that the UK was under a positive obligation to change its procedures in order to recognise the applicant's identity for social purposes. It followed a similar route in Cossey v UK,[421] although it did consider whether it should depart from its judgment in Rees in order to ensure that the Convention might reflect societal changes. However, it decided not to do so because developments in this area in the Member states were not consistent and still reflected a diversity of practices. In B v France[422] it was found that although there had been development in the area, no broad consensus among Member states had emerged. Nevertheless, the civil position of the applicant in terms of her sexual identity was worse than that of transsexuals in the UK and on that basis, a breach of Art 8 could be found.

These decisions accepted that sexual identity is an aspect of private life, although they did not afford full recognition to a right of individuals to determine both their own identity and the public expression of it. However, the Court appears to be coming closer to recognising a breach of Art 8 in such circumstances.[423] In his dissenting Opinion in Sheffield and Horsham v UK, Judge Van Dijk said: 'there has been a steady development in the direction of fuller legal recognition [of the status of transsexuals] and there is no sign of any retreat in this respect.'[424] In Goodwin v UK[425] the Court finally took the step of affording that full recognition to the status of transsexuals under Article 8.

419 See Chapter 4, pp 263–65, 266, 270–77.
420 (1986) 9 EHRR 56.
421 A 184; (1990) 13 EHRR 622. A similar application also failed in Sheffield and Horsham v UK (1999) 27 EHRR 163.
422 (1992) 13 HRLJ 358; for comment, see [1992] PL 559.
423 Sheffield and Horsham v UK (1999) 27 EHRR 163, para 60.
424 Ibid, para 3.
425 [2002] ECHR 583.

In Goodwin the applicant complained about the lack of legal recognition of her post-operative sex and about the legal status of transsexuals in the United Kingdom. She complained, in particular, about her treatment in relation to employment, social security and pensions and her inability to marry. She relied on Arts 8, 12, 13 and 14 of the Convention. The Court found under Art 8 that although the applicant had undergone gender re-assignment surgery provided by the national health service and lived in society as a female, she remained for legal purposes a male. This had effects on her life where sex was of legal relevance, such as in the area of pensions, retirement age etc. A serious interference with private life also arose, it was found, from the conflict between social reality and law which placed the transsexuals in an anomalous position in which they could experience feelings of vulnerability, humiliation and anxiety. The Court noted that there was clear and uncontested evidence of a continuing international trend in favour of not only increased social acceptance of transsexuals but also of legal recognition of the new sexual identity of post-operative transsexuals. It was also noted that the UK Government were currently discussing proposals for reform of the registration system in order to allow ongoing amendment of civil status data.

The Court found that although the difficulties and anomalies of the applicant's situation as a post-operative transsexual did not attain the level of daily interference suffered by the applicant in B v France[426] the Court emphasised that the very essence of the Convention was respect for human dignity and human freedom. Under Art 8 of the Convention in particular, where the notion of personal autonomy was an important principle underlying the interpretation of its guarantees, protection was given to the personal sphere of each individual, including the right to establish details of their identity as individual human beings. In the twenty-first century, the Court found, the right of transsexuals to personal development and to physical and moral security in the full sense enjoyed by others in society could no longer be regarded as a matter of controversy requiring the lapse of time to cast clearer light on the issues involved.[427] Although the Court did not underestimate the important repercussions which any major change in the system would inevitably have, not only in the field of birth registration, but also for example in the areas of access to records, family law, affiliation, inheritance, social security and insurance, these problems were far from insuperable. The Court also considered that society might reasonably be expected to tolerate a certain inconvenience to enable individuals to live in dignity and worth in accordance with the sexual identity chosen by them at great personal cost.

The Court also noted that despite it's reiteration since 1986 and most recently in 1998 of the importance of keeping the need for appropriate legal measures under review having regard to scientific and societal developments, nothing had effectively been done by the respondent government. Having regard to the above considerations, the Court found that the respondent government could no longer claim that the matter fell within their margin of appreciation, save as regards the appropriate means of achieving recognition of the right protected under the Convention. It concluded that the fair balance that was inherent in the Convention now tilted decisively in favour of 426 (1992) 13 HRLJ 358.

427 Domestic recognition of this evaluation could be found, the Court noted, in the report of the Interdepartmental Working Group on Transsexual People and the Court of Appeal's judgment in Bellinger v Bellinger (EWCA Civ 1140 [2001]).

the applicant. There had, it found, accordingly, been a failure to respect her right to private life in breach of Art 8.

As regards Art 14 the Court considered that the lack of legal recognition of the change of gender of a post-operative transsexual lay at the heart of the applicant's complaints under Art 14 of the Convention. These issues had been examined under Art 8 and resulted in the finding of a violation of that provision. In the circumstances, the Court found that no separate issue arose under Art 14 and made no separate finding.

The Court found that while it was true that Art 12 referred in express terms to the right of a man and woman to marry, the Court was not persuaded that at the date of this case these terms restricted the determination of gender to purely biological criteria. The Court went on to consider whether the allocation of sex in national law to that registered at birth was a limitation impairing the very essence of the right to marry in this case. In that regard, it found that it was artificial to assert that post-operative transsexuals had not been deprived of the right to marry as, according to law, they remained able to marry a person of their former opposite sex. The applicant in this case lived as a woman and would only wish to marry a man. As she had no possibility of doing so, she could therefore claim that the very essence of her right to marry had been infringed. Though fewer countries permitted the marriage of transsexuals in their assigned gender than recognised the change of gender itself, the Court did not find that this supported an argument for leaving the matter entirely within the Contracting states' margin of appreciation. This would be tantamount to finding that the range of options open to a Contracting state included an effective bar on any exercise of the right to marry. The margin of appreciation could not extend so far. While it was for the Contracting state to determine, inter alia, the conditions under which a person claiming legal recognition as a transsexual established that gender re-assignment has been properly effected and the formalities applicable to future marriages (including, for example, the information to be furnished to intended spouses), the Court found no justification for barring the transsexual from enjoying the right to marry under any circumstances. It concluded that there had been a breach of Art 12.

Respect for family life

The concept of 'family life'

This concept under Art 8 may encompass many types of 'family' – formal or informal – but if the 'family' in question might not fall within the term as, for example, a foster parent might not do, there might still be an interference with private life.[428] Generally, a close relationship falling within the term will be presumed where close ties such as those between parent and child exist; for other relations, the presumption will be the other way. In X, Y and Z v UK[429] the Court considered that no breach of Art 8 had arisen where the UK refused to recognise a female to male transsexual as the father of a child born after artificial insemination by a donor. The father had lived with the mother in a stable relationship for ten years and acted as the child's father after the 428 See generally Liddy, J, 'The concept of family life under the ECHR' [1998] EHRLR 15; Kilkelly, U, The Child and the ECHR, 1999, Chapter 9.

429 (1997) 24 EHRR 143.

birth. Nevertheless, the Court did find that a family relationship existed between the 'father' and the child, taking into account his involvement with the child before and after the birth.

There are signs that Art 8 jurisprudence has rejected the notion that respect for family life, and perhaps for privacy generally, entails failure to interfere in the family when other rights or freedoms are in danger of abuse. In Marckx v Belgium,[430] the applicant complained under Art 8 in conjunction with Art 14 that an illegitimate child was not recognised as the child of his or her mother until the latter had formally recognised the child as such. Also, the child was treated under Belgian law as, in principle, a stranger to the parents' families. In finding that the state was under an obligation to ensure the child's integration in the family and therefore, that Art 8 applied, the Court impliedly rejected the view put forward by the UK judge, Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice:

> It is abundantly clear that the main if not indeed the sole object and intended sphere of application of Art 8 was that of what I will call the 'domiciliary protection' of the individual. He (sic) and his family were no longer to be subjected to domestic law. Such and not the internal regulation of family relationships was the object of Art 8.

It is reasonably clear that this notion of the meaning of respect for family life represents an impoverished view of the Convention requirements. Respect for family life means, negatively, that the state should abstain from interference except where to do so would mean failing to adhere to the requirements of respect for the private life of the child or to the requirements of another Convention Article.[431] The requirement of respect for family life also places positive obligations on the authorities to 'allow those concerned to lead a normal family life'.[432]

Various aspects of family life have been in issue in cases brought against the UK.[433] W, B v UK[434] concerned a claim that access should be allowed to children in the care of the local authority. The Court noted that Art 8 does not contain any explicit procedural requirements, but found that, in itself, that fact could not be conclusive. When the local authority made decisions on children in its care, the views and interests of parents should be taken into account and the decision-making process should allow for this. If parents' views were not taken into account, then family life was not being respected. Therefore, a breach of Art 8 was found on the basis that there was insufficient involvement of the applicants in the process. This decision thus avoided a judgment on the substantive merits of denying parents a right of access to children in care. Had the parents been involved in the decision-making process which had then led to the same conclusion, it would seem that no breach of Art 8 would have occurred.

Although the term 'family' may receive a broad interpretation, this has not consistently been the case with respect to the requirements arising from the need to respect family

430 (1979) 2 EHRR 330.

431 See Riem v Sweden (1992) 16 EHRR 155.

432 See Ovey, C and White Jacobs, R, The European Convention on Human Rights, 4th edn, 2006, Chapter 11; Bainham, A, 'Can we protect children and protect their rights?' [2002] Fam Law 279.

433 Z and E v Austria (1986) 49 DR 67.

434 Judgment of 8 July 1987, A 121; (1987) 10 EHRR 29.

life. In X v UK,[435] which was found inadmissible by the Commission, it was determined that 'family life' cannot be interpreted so broadly as to encompass a father's right to be consulted in respect of an abortion. The Commission could have rested the decision on para 2 – the 'rights of others' exception – by taking the rights of the woman in question into account, but it preferred to interpret the primary right restrictively. Had it not adopted such an interpretation, 'family life' might have come into conflict with 'private life' since pregnancy and its management has been accepted as an aspect of a mother's private life, although not to be divorced entirely from consideration of the life of the foetus.[436] Family life has also received a narrow interpretation in immigration cases in respect of a right to enter a country. In Abdulaziz, Cabales and Balkandali v UK[437] it was found that:

> The duty imposed by Art 8 cannot be considered as extending to a general obligation . . . to respect the choice by married couples of the country of their matrimonial residence and to accept the non-national spouses for settlement in that country.

However, in contrast, where an alien is faced with expulsion from a country in which he or she has lived for some time and where members of the family are established, the Court has recently shown itself willing to uphold the right to maintain family ties if satisfied that the ties are clearly in existence.[438]

Respect for the home

In this area, the Strasbourg authorities have adopted a cautious attitude and tend to practise only marginal review of the justification of restrictions. At the core of the right to respect for the home is the right to occupy the home and a right not to be expelled from it. Thus, a violation of Art 8 was established in Cyprus v Turkey[439] which concerned occupying forces expelling citizens and making their return to their homes impossible. This was a very clear violation of the right. A contrasting result was reached in Buckley v UK.[440] A gipsy, who had lived in her home for five years without planning permission, was still entitled to respect for her home – the concept was not found only to cover homes lawfully established. However, no violation of this right was found where planning permission for retaining the applicant's caravan on her own land was refused. The refusal was partly based on the planning authority's policy in controlling the sites on which gipsies could live. The Court found that a wide margin of appreciation should be allowed to the Member state and that such margin

435 Appl No 8416/78; 19 D & R 244 (1980).

436 Brüggemann and Scheuten v Federal Republic of Germany Appl No 6959/75, 10 D & R 100 (1975), Eur Comm HR, Report of 12 July 1977. See above, p 43 for possible conflict between Art 8 and Art 2 in respect of abortions. See above, p 88 for further discussion of the possible conflict between family life and private life.

437 Judgment of 28 May 1985, A 94; (1985) 7 EHRR 471. A breach of the Convention was found when Art 8 was read in conjunction with Art 14 (see above, p 109).

438 See Moustaquim v Belgium, A 193 (1991); (1991) 13 EHRR 802 and Djeroud v France, A 191-B, 1991; for comment, see (1991) YBEL 554–56.

439 (1976) 3 EHRR 482.

440 (1997) 23 EHRR 101.

had not been exceeded since procedural safeguards were in place which allowed for the weighing up of the interests involved: the interest of the applicant in her traditional lifestyle in a caravan and the interest of the planning authority in regulating the use of the land in the area for the benefit of the local community.

So, the concept of the home is quite broad, although it does not cover a future home which is not yet built.[441] Further, the right to respect for the home does not include a right to a home; nor does it extend to providing a decent home,[442] nor to providing alternative accommodation.[443] Interference can arise due to a direct interference such as a seizure order,[444] or to the use of a Compulsory Purchase Order threatening the actual home.[445]

The concept does not cover merely proprietorial rights; it includes the ability to live freely in the home and enjoy the home.[446] The peaceful enjoyment of the home is established as an aspect of respect of the home,[447] and this notion has been extended to cover various forms of interference with the enjoyment of the home, such as pollution by traffic fumes on the basis that the right implies that the home is private space to be enjoyed free from the covert or overt blight of pollution. A number of cases have concerned noise pollution. In Powell v UK,[448] a claim in respect of airport noise was rejected on the basis that a fair balance had to be struck between the interests of the individual and of the community. In Lopez Ostra v Spain,[449] a breach of Art 8 was found after considering the fair balance to be struck, in respect of a failure to prevent a waste treatment plant releasing fumes and smells. Failure to prevent the risk of serious pollution was also found to breach Art 8 in Guerra v Italy.[450] Where applications in such instances fail under Art 8 owing to the caution evinced in Strasbourg when dealing with this substantive right, they may succeed under Art 6(1) if the procedure allowing challenge to such interference is non-existent or defective.[451]

Correspondence

The case law in this area has concerned the right of a detainee to correspond with the outside world and, in the UK, has led to a steady relaxation of the rules relating to preventing, stopping and censoring of prisoners' correspondence.[452] In general, the supervision per se of prisoners' letters is not in breach of Art 8, but particular instances, such as stopping a purely personal letter, may be.[453] It does not have to be personal:

441 Loizidou v Turkey (1996) 23 EHRR 513.
442 X v Germany (1956) 1 YB 202.
443 Burton v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 135 CD.
444 Chappel v UK (1989) 12 EHRR 1.
445 Howard v UK (1987) 52 DR 198.
446 Howard v UK (1987) 52 DR 198.
447 Arrondelle v UK, No 7889/77; 26 D & R 5 (1982).
448 (1990) 12 EHRR 355. See also Baggs v UK (1987) 52 DR 29.
449 (1994) 20 EHRR; for comment, see Sands, P, 'Human rights, environment and the Lopez Ostra case' [1996] EHRLR 597.
450 (1998) 26 EHRR 375.
451 See, e.g., Zimmermann and Steiner v Switzerland (1983) 6 EHRR 17.
452 See, e.g., Silver v UK, Judgment of 25 March 1983, A 61; (1983) 5 EHRR 347.
453 Boyle and Rice, Judgment of 27 April 1988, A 131.

in Campbell v UK,[454] correspondence with the applicant's solicitor was read; that was a restriction on correspondence that amounted to a breach of Art 8. Supervision of correspondence during detention has also, to an extent, been found to breach Art 8.[455] It should be noted that an Art 10 issue may also arise in such circumstances since the detainee's right to receive or impart information is affected.[456] Searches and seizures fall within the head of 'correspondence' and, indeed, within all the rights except the right to respect for family life.[457]

Article 9: Freedom of thought, conscience and religion

(1) Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief, worship, teaching, practice and observance.

(2) Freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs shall be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of public safety, for the protection of public order, health or morals or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.

The right under Art 9 of possessing certain convictions is unrestricted. Restrictions are only placed on the expression of thought under Art 10, and the manifestation of religious belief in Art 9(2). Of course, in general, unless thoughts can be expressed, they cannot have much impact. However, Art 9 provides a valuable guarantee against using compulsion to change an opinion[458] or prohibiting someone from entering a profession due to their convictions. In the latter instance, Art 17 (which allows restrictions where a person's ultimate aim is the destruction of Convention rights)[459] might, however, come into play if someone of fascist or perhaps communist sympathies was debarred from a profession.

Freedom of religion will include the freedom not to take part in religious services, thus particularly affecting persons such as prisoners, but it may also include the opposite obligation – to provide prisoners with a means of practising their religion. However, in such instances, Strasbourg has been very ready to assume that restrictions are inherent in the detention of prisoners or are justified under para 2. For example, in Huber v Austria,[460] broad 'inherent limitations' on a prisoner's right to practise religion were accepted. Similarly, in X v Austria,[461] the Commission found no violation in respect of a refusal to allow a Buddhist prisoner to grow a beard. It is arguable, however, that inherent limitations should not be assumed in relation to a right which admits express exceptions.

454 (1992) 15 EHRR 137.
455 De Wilde Ooms (1971) 1 EHRR 373.
456 See Herczegfalvy v Austria (1992) 14 HRLJ 84; (1993) 15 EHRR 437.
457 Funke v France (1993) 16 EHRR 297; Mialhe v France (1993) 16 EHRR 332; Crémieux v France (1993) 16 EHRR 357. For further discussion, see Chapter 11.
458 Such action would normally also involve a violation of Art 3.
459 See below, p 112.
460 (1971) Yearbook XIV, p 548.
461 Appl No 1753/63 (1965) Yearbook VIII, p 174.

Article 10: Freedom of expression

(1) Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers. This article shall not prevent states from requiring the licensing of broadcasting, television or cinema enterprises.

(2) The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary.

Article 10 obviously overlaps with Art 9, but it is broader, since it protects the means of ensuring freedom of expression; even if the person who provides such means is not the holder of the opinion in question, she or he will be protected. The words 'freedom to hold opinion' used in Art 10 cannot be distinguished from the phrase 'freedom of thought' used in Art 9. There is also an obvious overlap with Art 11 which protects freedom of association and assembly.

Scope of the primary right

The stance taken under Art 10 is that while almost all forms of expression will fall within the primary right, all expression is not equally valuable. It was found in X and Church of Scientology v Sweden[462] that commercial speech is protected by Art 10, but that the level of protection should be less than that accorded to the expression of political ideas, thereby implying that political speech should receive special protection. In Markt Intern Verlag v Federal Republic of Germany,[463] the Court found: 'the European Court of Human Rights should not substitute its own evaluation for that of the national courts in the instant case, where those courts, on reasonable grounds, had considered the restrictions to be necessary,' an extreme statement of the extent to which Strasbourg should defer to the national decision. It appears to have been affected by the fact that the Court was dealing with commercial speech which it views as of much less significance than political speech.[464] As Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick put it in Law of the European Convention on Human Rights:[465] 'The privileged position of political speech derives from the Court's conception of it as a central feature of a democratic society . . .'

462 Appl No 7805/77 (1979); YB XXII.

463 In Markt Intern Verlag v FRG, Series A 165, para 47 (1989).

464 See the statements regarding the significance of political speech in Lingens v Austria (1986) 8 EHRR 103; Jersild v Denmark (1994) 19 EHRR 1; Oberschlick v Austria (1997) 25 EHRR 357.

465 1995, p 397.

The motive of the speaker may be significant; if it is to stimulate debate on a particular subject, Art 10 will be more readily applicable.[466] The Court has stressed that Art 10 applies not only to speech which is favourably received, but also to speech which shocks and offends. In Jersild v Denmark,[467] the Commission accepted that this may include aiding in the dissemination of racist ideas. In this instance, the applicant had not himself expressed such views; his conviction had arisen due to his responsibility as a television interviewer for their dissemination. This factor was also taken into account by the Court in finding that the conviction constituted an interference with freedom of expression in breach of Art 10.[468] The television programme in question had included an interview with an extreme racist group, the Greenjackets; such interviews were found to constitute an important means whereby 'the press is able to play its vital role as public watchdog' and therefore strong reasons would have to be adduced for punishing a journalist who had assisted in the dissemination of racist statements by conducting the interview, bearing in mind that the feature taken as a whole was not found by the Court to have as its object the propagation of racist views. The Court pointed out that the racist remarks which led to the convictions of members of the Greenjackets did not have the protection of Art 10.

There is some evidence that the Court is reluctant to intervene in instances which may not be perceived as constituting a direct interference with freedom of expression by the domestic authorities. If, as in Glasenapp v Federal Republic of Germany,[469] the interference can be seen as in some way indirect or as largely concerned with another interest, it may find that the Art 10 guarantee is inapplicable. The case concerned a German schoolteacher who had written a letter to a newspaper indicating her sympathy with the German Communist Party. This was found to be contrary to legislation controlling the employment of people with extreme political views and her appointment as a teacher was revoked. Her claim that this constituted an interference with her freedom of expression failed since the Court characterised the claim as largely concerned with a right of access to the civil service rather than with freedom of speech. In Bowman v UK,[470] restrictions imposed on persons spending money in support of parliamentary candidates was found to be a disproportionate interference with freedom of expression. In Ahmed v UK,[471] the Court upheld restrictions preventing certain local government officers holding political office. The Court took into account the need to protect the rights of others to effective political democracy which was answered by seeking to ensure the neutrality of local government officers.

Article 10 includes an additional guarantee of the freedom to receive and impart information. However, the seeking of information does not appear to connote an obligation on the part of the government to make information available; the words 'without restriction by public authority' do not imply a positive obligation on the part of the authority to ensure that information can be received. So, the right is restricted in 466 See Thorgeir Thorgeirson v Iceland (1992) 14 EHRR 843.

467 (1992) 14 HRLJ 74; see also the Open Door Counselling and Dublin Well Woman Centre Ltd case (1992) 15 EHRR 244 (below, pp 95–96).
468 (1994) 19 EHRR 1.
469 (1986) 9 EHRR 25. See, to the same effect, Kosiek v FRG (1987) 9 EHRR 328.
470 (1998) 25 EHRR 1.
471 (1998) 5 BHRC 111.

situations where there is no willing speaker. Article 10 is not, therefore, a full freedom of information measure.[472] In fact, the freedom to seek information was deliberately omitted from Art 10 – although it appears in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights – in order to avoid placing a clear positive obligation on the Member states to communicate information.

A number of aspects of Art 10 and its impact on domestic law are discussed extensively in Part II.

Restrictions and exceptions

Mediums other than written publications can be subjected to a licensing system under Art 10(1) and because this restriction is mentioned in para 1, it appears that a licensing system can be imposed on grounds other than those outlined in para 2, thereby broadening the possible exceptions. This is discussed further in Chapter 6.[473] Any such exceptions must, of course, be considered in conjunction with the safeguard against discrimination under Art 14: for example, if the state has a monopoly on a medium, it must not discriminate in granting air time to different groups.

The restrictions of Art 10(2) are wide and two, 'maintaining the authority of the judiciary' and 'preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence', are not mentioned in Art 10's companion Articles, Arts 8, 9 and 11. The first of these exceptions was included bearing in mind the contempt law of the UK, but it was made clear, in the well known Sunday Times case,[474] that in relation to such law, the margin of appreciation should be narrow due to its 'objective' nature. In other words, what was needed to maintain the authority of the judiciary could be more readily evaluated by an objective observer than could measures needed to protect morals. The case in question concerned reporting on a matter of great public interest – the Thalidomide tragedy – and therefore, only very compelling reasons for preventing the information being imparted could be justified. It was held that because Art 10 is a particularly important right and the particular instance touched on its essence, a breach could be found; in response, the Contempt of Court Act 1981 was passed. The 'rights of others' exception may also receive a narrow interpretation – at least in cases of defamation against a public body or person where the applicant was acting in good faith and was attempting to stimulate debate on a matter of serious public concern.[475]

A very different approach was taken in the Handyside case[476] arising from a conviction under the Obscene Publications Act 1959 and concerning the more subjective nature of the 'protection of morals' exception. The applicant put forward certain special circumstances – that the prohibited material in question was circulating in most other countries and so suppression could not be very evidently necessary in a democratic society – but such circumstances were barely discussed. A wide margin of appreciation 472 This was supported in the Gaskin case (1990) 12 EHRR 36 (see above, p 73): the Art 10 claim failed on this basis.

473 See p 463.

474 Judgment of 26 April 1979, A 30; (1979) 2 EHRR 245 (discussed in full in Chapter 5, pp 336–37).

475 See Thorgeir Thorgeirson v Iceland (1992) 14 EHRR 843; Castells v Spain (1992) 14 EHRR 445; Schwabe v Austria (1992) 14 HRLJ 26.

476 Judgment of 7 December 1976, A 24; (1976) 1 EHRR 737. See further Chapter 6, pp 464–65.

was left to the national authorities as to what was 'necessary'. One possible reason for this was that the authority of the judiciary is a more objective notion than the protection of morals and this may have led to a variation of the necessity test. A similar approach was taken in Müller v Switzerland,[477] the Court stating:

> [I]t is not possible to find in the legal and social orders of the Contracting states a uniform European conception of morals. By reason of their direct and continuous contact with the vital forces of their countries state authorities are in a better position than the international judge to give an opinion on the exact content of these requirements.

The lack of a uniform standard was also the key factor in the ruling in Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria.[478] The decision concerned the showing of a satirical film depicting God as a senile old man and Jesus as a mental defective erotically attracted to the Virgin Mary. Criminal proceedings for the offence of disparaging religious doctrines were brought against the manager of the Institute which had scheduled the showings of the film. The film was seized by the Austrian authorities while criminal proceedings were pending. The European Court of Human Rights found that the seizure of the film could be seen as furthering the aims of Art 9 of the Convention and therefore it fell within the 'rights of others' exception. In considering whether the seizure and forfeiture of the film was 'necessary in a democratic society' in order to protect the rights of others to respect for their religious views, the Court took into account the lack of a discernible common conception within the Member states of the significance of religion, and therefore considered that the national authorities should have a wide margin of appreciation in assessing what was necessary to protect religious feeling. In ordering the seizure of the film, the Austrian authorities had taken its artistic value into account, but had not found that it outweighed its offensive features. The Court found that the national authorities had not overstepped their margin of appreciation and therefore decided that no breach of Art 10 had occurred. This decision left a very wide discretion to the Member state, a discretion which the dissenting judges considered to be too wide.

The stance taken in Otto-Preminger and in Müller echoes the view expressed in Cossey v UK[479] that where a clear European view does emerge, the Court may well be influenced by it, but it also suggests a particularly strong reluctance to intervene in this very contentious area. The margin of appreciation in respect of the protection of morals will not be unlimited, however, even in the absence of a broad consensus. The Court so held in Open Door Counselling and Dublin Well Woman v Ireland,[480] ruling that an injunction which prevented the dissemination of any information at all about abortion amounted to a breach of Art 10. This accords with the view expressed in B v France[481] that what can be termed the common standards principle is only one factor to be taken into account and must be weighed against the severity of the infringement of rights in question.

477 (1991) 13 EHRR 212.
478 (1994) 19 EHRR 34.
479 (1990) 13 EHRR 622.
480 (1992) 15 EHRR 244.
481 (1992) 13 HRLJ 358.

The exception in respect of confidential information overlaps with others, including national security and the rights of others, but a situation could be envisaged in which a disclosure of information did not fall within those categories and could therefore be caught only by this extra exception. This might arise in respect of a disclosure by a civil servant which did not threaten national security or any person's individual rights, such as that made in the Tisdall case.[482]

Actions in respect of both prior and subsequent restraints on freedom of expression may be brought under Art 10, but pre-publication sanctions will be regarded as more pernicious and thus harder to justify as necessary (Observer and Guardian v UK).[483] In relation to post-publication sanctions, criminal actions will be regarded as having a grave impact on freedom of expression, but civil actions which have severe consequences for the individual may also be hard to justify. In Tolstoy Miloslavsky v UK,[484] the European Court of Human Rights considered the level of libel damages which can be awarded in UK courts. Libel damages of £1.5 million had been awarded against Count Tolstoy Miloslavsky in the UK in respect of a pamphlet he had written which alleged that Lord Aldington, a high-ranking British army officer, had been responsible for handing over 70,000 people to the Soviet authorities without authorisation, knowing that they would meet a cruel fate. The Count argued that this very large award constituted a breach of Art 10. Was the award necessary in a democratic society as required by Art 10? The Court found that it was not, having regard to the fact that the scope of judicial control at the trial could not offer an adequate safeguard against a disproportionately large award. Thus, a violation of the applicant's rights under Art 10 was found.

Article 11: Freedom of association and assembly

(1) Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and to freedom of association with others, including the right to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.

(2) No restrictions shall be placed on the exercise of these rights other than such as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others. This article shall not prevent the imposition of lawful restrictions on the exercise of these rights by members of the armed forces, of the police or of the administration of the state.

Assembly

The addition of the word 'peaceful' has restricted the scope of para 1: there will be no need to invoke the para 2 exceptions if the authorities concerned could reasonably believe that a planned assembly would not be peaceful. Thus, assemblies can be subject to permits so long as the permits relate to the peacefulness of the assembly and not to the right of assembly itself. However, a restriction of a very wide character relating to peacefulness might affect the right to assemble itself and might therefore constitute a violation of Art 11 if it did not fall within one of the exceptions.

482 See Chapter 7, p 593.
483 (1991) 14 EHRR 153.
484 (1995) 20 EHRR 422.

It should be noted that freedom of assembly may not merely be secured by a lack of interference by the public authorities; they may have positive obligations to intervene in order to prevent an interference with freedom of assembly by private individuals, although they will have a very wide margin of appreciation in this regard.[485] It has been held in respect of the guarantees of other Articles that states must secure to individuals the rights and freedoms of the Convention by preventing or remedying any breach thereof. If no duty was placed on the authorities to provide such protection, then some assemblies could not take place.

It will be argued in Chapter 8 that the freedom of assembly jurisprudence under Art 11 is cautious. In finding that applications are manifestly ill-founded, the Commission has been readily satisfied that decisions of the national authorities to adopt quite far reaching measures, including complete bans, in order to prevent disorder are within their margin of appreciation.[486] The Court has also found 'the margin of appreciation extends in particular to the choice of the reasonable and appropriate means to be used by the authority to ensure that lawful manifestations can take place peacefully'.[487]

Association

'Association' need not be assigned its national meaning. Even if a group such as a trade union is not an 'association' according to the definition of national law, it may fall within Art 11. The term connotes a voluntary association, not a professional organisation established by the government. It should be noted that it is only with respect to trade unions that the right to form an association is expressly mentioned, albeit non-exhaustively. Such a right in respect of other types of association is clearly implicit – a necessary part of freedom of association. The key rights protected by Art 11 include the basic right to form associations[488] and the right to autonomy of an association.[489] An association itself can exercise Convention rights, including freedom of expression (Socialist Party and Others v Turkey).[490]

Non-union associations

The earlier Strasbourg jurisprudence tended to be protective of state interests,[491] but the recent 'association' jurisprudence of the Court is more interventionist. In Socialist Party 485 Appl 1012/82, Plattform 'Ärzte für das Leben' v Austria D & R 44 (1985); (1988) 13 EHRR 204 (it was not arguable that Austria had failed in its obligation to prevent counter-demonstrators interfering with an anti-abortion demonstration).

486 See Christians against Racism and Fascism v UK No 8440/78, 21 DR 138; Friedl v Austria No 15225/89 (1995) 21 EHRR 83.

487 Chorherr v Austria Series A 266-B, para 31 (1993).

488 X v Belgium (1961) 4 YB 324.

489 Cheall v UK (1985) 8 EHRR 74.

490 Judgment of 25 May 1998, Appl No 20/1997/804/1007; (1999) 27 EHRR 51, paras 41, 47 and 50.

491 See Glasenapp v FRG A 104 (1986); Kosiek v FRG A 105 (1986); CCSU v UK (1988) 10 EHRR 269.

and Others v Turkey,[492] the Court allowed only a very narrow margin of appreciation in finding that the dissolution of the Socialist Party of Turkey had breached Art 11. The Court linked the three freedoms of expression, association and assembly together in finding that democracy demands that diverse political programmes should be debated, 'even those that call into question the way a state is currently organised'. The Court did not accept that the message of the group that a federal system should be put in place which would ensure that Kurds would be put on an equal footing with Turkish citizens generally, amounted to incitement to violence. The dissolution of the party was disproportionate to the aim in view – the preservation of national security. This stance is in accordance with the Convention jurisprudence, which has quite consistently recognised the need to protect the interests of minority and excluded groups.[493]

Similar findings were made in Sidiropoulos v Greece[494] in respect of an association formed to promote the interests of the Macedonian minority in Greece. The Court said that one of the most important aspects of freedom of association was that citizens should be able to form a legal group with the aim of acting collectively in their mutual interest. In Vogt v Germany[495] the Court held that a woman who was dismissed from her teaching post because of her membership of an extreme left wing group had suffered a violation of both Arts 10 and 11. These decisions suggest that where political associations are in question, the Court will take a strict stance, in accordance with its stance on political expression.[496] But these decisions may be contrasted with that in Ahmed v UK.[497] The applicants were local government officers who were active in local politics. Regulations were introduced with a view to ensuring local government impartiality; they restricted the political activities of certain categories of local government officers; thereupon the applicants had to resign from their political parties and cease canvassing for elections. The Court found that the interference with their Art 10 and 11 rights was proportionate to the aims in view since it was intended to ensure that the traditional political neutrality of council officers was maintained. Thus, unless a countervailing Convention value is also in issue, it may be assumed that political associations will receive particular protection.

Trade Unions[498]

Trade unions are expressly protected under para 1. But a wider margin may be conceded to the Member state in respect of interference with trade union membership, where the interest at issue cannot be viewed as political.[499] Apart from political associations and 492 Judgment of 25 May 1998 (Appl. no 20/1997/804/1007); (1999) 27 EHRR 51, paras 41, 47, and 50.

493 Such groups have included criminals: Soering v UK A 161 (1989); prisoners: Ireland v UK A 25 (1978), Golder v UK A 18 (1975); racial minorities: East African Asians cases (1973) 3 EHRR 76, Hilton v UK Appl No 5613/72, 4 DR 177 (1976) (no breach found on facts); sexual minorities: Dudgeon v UK A 45 (1982), B v France A 232-C (1992); political minorities: Arrowsmith v UK Appl No 7050/75, 19 DR 5 (1978); religious minorities: Kokkinakis v Greece A 260-A (1993).

494 (Chamber) (1998) available from the Court's website, www.dhcour.coe.fr.

495 (1995) 21 EHRR 205.

496 See the Introduction to Part II, pp 303–5, 309–11.

497 (1998) 5 BHRC 111; [1999] IRLR 188.

498 For general discussion, see Lightman, G and Bowers, J, 'Incorporation of the ECHR and its impact on employment law' [1998] EHRLR 560.

499 See Gustaffson v Sweden (1996) 22 EHRR 409.

trade unions, Art 11 protects, in general, groups set up in order to further the common interests of the members. But Strasbourg has taken a fairly narrow view of association; it excludes merely social groupings.[500] The question whether freedom of association implies protection against compulsory membership of an association was considered in Young, James and Webster.[501] In 1975, British Rail entered a closed shop agreement that made membership of a certain trade union a condition of employment. The three applicants, who were already employed by British Rail, disagreed with the political activities of trade unions; they therefore refused to join the union and were dismissed. They claimed that their dismissal on this ground constituted an infringement of Art 11 of the European Convention. The European Court of Human Rights found that the agreement between British Rail and the unions was lawful under the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974, which allowed for dismissal for refusing to join a trade union unless the refusal was on grounds of religious belief.

In determining whether that provision infringed Art 11, the Court considered the 'negative aspect' of freedom of association, in other words, the right not to join a group. It was found that the negative aspect was not on the same footing as the positive aspects, but that when an individual's freedom of choice in association was so abridged – where there was only one ground on which it was possible to refuse to join a union – then an interference with freedom of association had occurred since it must necessarily include freedom of choice. This did not mean that all closed shop agreements would infringe Art 11; the Court was careful to confine its argument to the facts of the specific case. (The drafters of the Convention were aware of closed shop agreements operating in certain of the Member states in 1949 and therefore deliberately omitted a clause protecting an individual's right not to be compelled to join an association.) The Court did not find that the agreement was necessary under Art 11(2) but decided the case solely under para 1. It was found that a measure of freedom of choice is implicit in Art 11; this amounts to a negative aspect of the right to join a trade union and is not therefore on the same footing as the positive aspect, but it is still a part of freedom of association. The Court left open the question whether a closed shop agreement would always amount to a breach of Art 11; in this instance, the possibility of dismissal due to refusal to join the union was such a serious form of coercion that it affected the essence of the Art 11 guarantee. It seems that the closed shop practice may be a violation of Art 11 where there is legislation allowing it, even if the body enforcing it is not an emanation of the state (an example of Drittwirkung). It may be noted that the degree of freedom of choice under Art 11 is limited; it does not appear to include as a necessary component the freedom to choose between unions.[502]

The need to show a very clear curtailment of choice where the negative aspect of freedom of association is in question was affirmed by the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Sibson v UK,[503] which concerned a choice between unions rather than a choice as to whether to join one at all. The applicant had resigned from his union, the TGWU, due to dissatisfaction with its decision in respect of a complaint he had made; he had then been ostracised by his workmates, who threatened to go 500 Anderson v UK [1998] EHRLR 218. For discussion, see Chapter 8, p 749.

501 Judgment of 13 August 1981, A 44; (1981) 4 EHRR 38.
502 Sibson v UK, A 258; (1993) 17 EHRR 193.
503 A 258; (1993) The Times, 17 May.

on strike unless he rejoined the union or was employed elsewhere. He joined another union and his employer then sought to employ him at a depot some distance away; he refused this offer, resigned and claimed constructive dismissal. When this claim failed in the domestic courts, he applied to the European Commission on Human Rights, alleging a breach of Art 11. The Court found that no breach had occurred: his treatment did not infringe the very substance of his freedom of association; he had not been subject to a closed shop agreement and had had the offer of continuing to work for the company without joining the union. Moreover, he had had no objection to union membership as such.

It may be argued that this decision should not be characterised as one entirely concerned with the negative aspect of freedom of association since, in order to rejoin the TGWU, the applicant would have had to resign from the second union. Therefore, the claim could be characterised as concerning the right of an employee to choose which particular union to join free from pressure from workmates or the employer. The applicant had been faced with the choice of working elsewhere or resigning from one union and joining another. It might appear that such a situation concerns a highly significant interest – the freedom to choose between associations – and that therefore, this decision is unfortunate in leaving such freedom unprotected so long as the employee retains the basic freedom not to join a union. It is instructive to note that the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, unlike the European Convention, includes 'the right to join the trade union of his choice' (emphasis added).

In the UK, during the Conservative Government's period of office from 1979–97, no move was made to outlaw union membership per se or to prevent the formation of unions in general. Such a move would, of course, have constituted a clear breach of Art 11. However, certain measures were taken which curtailed choice of unions or which had the effect of reducing the size of the group that retains the right to union membership. Certain bodies, such as the army under the Army Act 1955, the police under s 47 of the Police Act 1964 and certain public officials have traditionally been debarred from union membership, but this group was enlarged when civil servants working at Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ) were de-unionised. Their challenge to the ban on trade unions was considered in Council of Civil Service Unions v Minister for the Civil Service[504] (the GCHQ case). The Minister for the Civil Service, the Prime Minister, Margaret Thatcher, gave an instruction issued under Art 4 of the Civil Service Order in Council to vary the terms of service of the staff at GCHQ with the effect that staff would no longer be permitted to join national trade unions. Six members of staff and the union involved applied for judicial review of the minister's instruction on the ground that she had been under a duty to act fairly by consulting those concerned before issuing it. In the House of Lords it had first to be determined whether the decision was open to judicial review. In this instance, the Prime Minister was exercising powers under the royal prerogative, traditionally seen as unsusceptible to judicial review as they derive from the common law and not from statute. However, Lord Denning in Laker Airways v Department of Trade[505] seemed to have effected some erosion of that principle and, following his lead, the House of Lords determined that the mere fact of the power deriving from the prerogative as opposed to statute was not a sufficient reason why it should not be open to review.

504 [1985] AC 374; [1985] 3 WLR 1174; [1985] 3 All ER 935; for comment, see [1985] PL 177, p 186.
505 [1977] QB 643.

Having made this determination, the House of Lords then found that the decision-making process had in fact been conducted unfairly. Usual practice had created a legitimate expectation that there would be prior consultation before the terms of service were altered; therefore, there was a legitimate expectation that that practice would be followed which had not been fulfilled. However, the Prime Minister argued that national security considerations had outweighed the duty to act fairly; had there been prior consultation, this would have led to strikes which would have affected operations at GCHQ – the very reason why union membership had been withdrawn. In her assessment, the requirements of national security outweighed those of fairness. The appellants argued, first, that this argument was an afterthought, and secondly, that national security had not been and would not be affected, in part because the unions were offering a no-strike agreement. However, the House of Lords held that the Prime Minister was better placed than the courts to determine what was needed by national security, although it was held that there must be some evidence of danger to national security; a mere assertion that such danger existed would be insufficient. As some evidence of such a danger had been put forward, the challenge to the union ban failed.

A group from GCHQ applied to the European Commission alleging a breach of both Art 11 and of the Art 13 provision that there must be an effective remedy for violation of a Convention right.[506] They were claiming that judicial review did not afford such a remedy. Accepting that the ban infringed the applicants' freedom of association, the government argued that it fell within Art 11(2) because it was adopted in furtherance of the interests of national security and that the margin of appreciation allowed to Member states in that respect should be wider than in respect of the other exceptions,[507] since it should be assumed that only the domestic authorities were competent to make a determination as to the needs of national security. Therefore, once it had made a determination that national security would be affected by industrial disruption and that a no-strike agreement would be inadequate, its decision could not be questioned by an outside body. It followed that the blanket ban imposed was not disproportionate to the end in view, which was to protect national security.

The applicants argued, on the other hand, that the exception under Art 11(2) in respect of the needs of national security could not apply because the ban was out of proportion to the aim pursued; there was no sufficiently pressing need to impose it. Only if such a need could be shown could such a grave infringement of freedom be justified. No such pressing need could be shown because there had been no recent action at GCHQ and when there had been such action, the government had not reacted to it for three years, thereby suggesting that it was not over-concerned about the effect on national security. Further, the government had stated in 1981 in Parliament that action at GCHQ had not affected national security. A no-strike agreement, it was argued, would be in proportion to the requirements of national security.

The government's second argument was that the applicants fell within the second sentence of Art 11(2) which allowed restrictions to be imposed on the police, armed forces or the members of the administration of the state. It was argued that 'restriction' could include a total ban. The applicants, however, argued that the sentence should be narrowly construed; the word 'lawful' should mean that it should be interpreted in accordance with Convention limits and that, accordingly, it could not authorise a complete denial of trade union membership.

506 Council of Civil Service Unions v UK (1987) 20 DRE Com HR 228; (1988) 10 EHRR 269.
507 This had been accepted in other decisions including the Klass case (1978) A 28; 2 EHRR 214.

The Commission found that the ban amounted to a clear prima facie breach of Art 11; the question was whether it could be justified. The word 'lawful' was interpreted as meaning 'in accordance with national law'. The Civil Service Order in Council that had been made fulfilled that requirement. Could the term 'restriction' mean 'destruction'? It was found that the fact that the ban was complete did not mean that it would not be proportionate to the aim pursued, which was to protect national security, one of the exceptions contained in Art 11(2). The second sentence of Art 11 was considered. It was found that it allowed for restrictions which could not be justified under the first sentence; it was also applicable to the ban. The application was found to be manifestly ill-founded as far as Art 11 was concerned. The Commission further accepted the government's argument in relation to the alleged breach of Art 13 that judicial review afforded a sufficient remedy. Thus, the application was found to be inadmissible. Those who refused to give up their trade union membership were eventually sacked. The right to join a union was only reinstated at GCHQ in 1997 after the Labour Government came to power.

The right to join a trade union involves allowing members to have a union that can properly 'protect the interests of the members'. So, a union must have sufficient scope for this, although this need not mean a right to strike; this right can be subject to the restrictions of the national legislature.[508] Moreover, extra restrictions may be placed on certain groups of employees under the second sentence of para 2 and these do not expressly need to be 'necessary'. However, the purposes of the Convention imply that they should, indeed, be necessary.

Article 12: The right to marry and to found a family

> Men and women of marriageable age have the right to marry and to found a family, according to the national laws governing the exercise of this right.

Article 12 contains no second paragraph setting out restrictions, but it obviously does not confer an absolute right due to the words 'according to the national laws' which imply the reverse of an absolute right – that Art 12 may be subject to far reaching limitations in domestic law. The reference to national laws also accepts the possibility that legal systems may vary among Contracting states as to, for example, the legally marriageable age. However, this does not mean that the Convention has no role at all; it may not interfere with national law governing the exercise of the right, but may do so where it attacks or erodes its essence. If a person was denied the right to marry due to limited mental faculties or health or poverty, the essence of the right would be eroded assuming that he or she was capable of genuine consent. However, where erosion of the essence of the right arises from the national rule that only persons of the opposite sex can marry, it may be acceptable. In Rees,[509] a woman who had had a gender re-assignment operation complained that she was unable to marry. It was held that there was no violation of Art 12 because the state can impose restrictions on certain men and women due to the social purpose of Art 12 which is concerned with the ability to procreate; marriages which cannot result in procreation may, therefore, fall outside its ambit. This interpretation was supported on the ground that the wording of the Article suggests that marriage is protected as the basis of the family; thus, Art 12 is aimed at protecting the traditional biological marriage. In other words, what appeared to be a clear interference with the essence of the right could be found not to be so under this restricted interpretation. Therefore, preventing the marriage of persons not of the opposite biological sex was not found to breach Art 12. This ruling was followed in Cossey[510] on the ground that changes in social values did not indicate a need to depart from the decision in Rees.

508 Judgment of 6 February 1976, Schmidt and Dahlström v Sweden, A 21 (1976); 1 EHRR 632.

The principle that the Convention will not interfere with national laws which only regulate the exercise of the right to marry is also subject to exceptions. If a person is, in general, free to marry, but in particular circumstances will suffer detriment flowing solely from the fact of being married, Art 12 may be breached. Thus, the right to marry may include placing no sanction on marriage, such as sacking a person when he or she marries. But if a priest is sacked when he ceases to be celibate, that would not seem to constitute a breach since he has, in a sense, chosen freely not to marry.

The right to divorce or dissolution of marriage is not included under Art 12[511] so that the state need not provide the means of dissolving a marriage although, in some circumstances, Art 8 may be relevant. It seems that the state need not provide such means as the right has been deliberately left out of the Convention, and although the Convention is subject to an evolutive interpretation (in other words, changes in social conditions can be taken into account), that will not apply to a right which has been totally omitted.

In accordance with the general Convention policy of reluctance to impose positive obligations on states, the right to found a family does not include an economic right to sufficient living accommodation for the family: it denotes an interference with the ability to found a family and thus prevents the non-voluntary use of sterilisation or abortion. Article 3 (and conceivably Art 2)[512] would probably also apply. The national laws are again allowed to regulate the enjoyment of this right, but they must not erode its essence. However, it might be argued that inherent limitations on the right in certain situations may be allowed because restrictions are not enumerated under Art 12, and therefore such limitations would not create a conflict with the general Convention doctrine governing inherent limitations which tends to reject such limitations where the restrictions are enumerated. However, it was found in Hamer[513] that prisoners do have the right to marry under Art 12; inherent restrictions are possible, but they must not affect the essence of the right. The applicant had two years to wait; that did affect the essence of the right and therefore led to a breach of Art 12. In contrast, in X v

509 Judgment of 17 October 1986, A 106; (1986) 9 EHRR 56.
510 Judgment of 27 September 1990, A 184; (1990) 13 EHRR 622.
511 Johnstone, Judgment of 18 December 1986, A 112; (1987) 9 EHRR 203.
512 See above, pp 43–45.
513 Report of 13 December 1979; D & R 24 (1981).

UK,[514] it was found that denial of conjugal visits to a detainee was not a violation of Art 12 since the Article grants the general right to found a family; it does not grant that that possibility should be available at any given moment.

The Protocols to the Convention

The First, Fourth, Sixth, Seventh, Thirteenth and Twelfth Protocols to the Convention add to it a number of substantive rights. Only the First, Sixth and Thirteenth Protocols have so far been ratified by the UK.

First Protocol

Article 1

> Every natural or legal person is entitled to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions. No one shall be deprived of his possessions except in the public interest and subject to the conditions provided for by law and by the general principles of international law.
>
> The preceding provisions shall not, however, in any way impair the right of a state to enforce such laws as it deems necessary to control the use of property in accordance with the general interest or to secure the payment of taxes or other contributions or penalties.

The property Article of the First Protocol echoes Art 12 in allowing the national authorities considerable freedom to regulate the exercise of the primary right. The case law has supported this; it was determined in James and Others[515] that the margin of appreciation open to the legislature in implementing social and economic policies should be a wide one.[516] Thus, in this area, the Strasbourg authorities have adopted a cautious attitude to this right and tend to practise only marginal review of the justification of restrictions. As mentioned above, claims of interference with property may fail under Protocol 1, Art 1, but succeed under Art 6, where a defective procedure has authorised the interference.[517]

In Sporrong and Lonroth v Sweden,[518] the Court found that while a wide margin of appreciation should be allowed to the Member state in respect of prohibitions affecting the applicants' properties due to planning regulations, that margin had been exceeded since procedural safeguards were not in place which allowed the applicants to seek a reduction of the time limits on the prohibitions. A fair balance between their interests and that of the community in general had not been struck. The fair balance is the key matter under Art 1. It must be clear that there has been a weighing up of the interests 514 Appl 6564/74; D & R 2 (1975).

515 A 98; (1986) 8 EHRR 123.

516 See further Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op. cit., fn 1, p 516; Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, pp 1301–20.

517 Mats Jacobson v Sweden (1990) 13 EHRR 79. See above, p 60.

518 (1982) 5 EHRR 35.

involved: the interest of the applicant in the peaceful enjoyment of possessions, and the interest of the community in regulating the use of the land or possessions for the benefit of the local community.

Article 2

> No person shall be denied the right to education. In the exercise of any functions which it assumes in relation to education and to teaching, the state shall respect the right of parents to ensure such education and teaching in conformity with their own religious and philosophical convictions.

The UK is a party to the First Protocol, but has made the following reservation to Art 2:

> [I]in view of certain provisions of the Education Acts in force in the United Kingdom, the principle affirmed in the second sentence of Article 2 is accepted by the United Kingdom only so far it is compatible with the provision of efficient instruction and training and the avoidance of unreasonable public expenditure.'

The right guaranteed under the first sentence of Art 2 can be exercised by the child or the parent;[519] if one parent loses custody to the other, that parent ceases to be able to exercise the right.[520] The right in question is expressed negatively; therefore, it guarantees an equal right of access to the educational facilities that are already available. However, this implies that some facilities should be available but leaves the state a wide margin of appreciation in respect of the provision.[521] In the Belgian Linguistic cases,[522] it was held that Art 2 does not require the Contracting states to provide a particular type of education: it implies the right of persons to 'avail themselves of the means of instruction existing at a given time'.

Article 3

> The High Contracting Parties undertake to hold free elections at reasonable intervals by secret ballot, under conditions which will ensure the free expression of the opinion of the people in the choice of the legislature.

Article 3 provides an undertaking (not formally expressed as a right) which is clearly central to a democratic society.[523] However, it does refer to a right that individuals can 519 Campbell and Cosans v UK (1982) 4 EHRR 293, para 40.

520 X v Sweden (1977) 12 DR 192.

521 See further Wildhaber 'Right to education and parental rights', in Macdonald, R, Matscher, F, and Petzold, H (eds), The European System for the Protection of Human Rights, 1993, Kluwer; Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., 1st edn, fn 1, pp 1357–66.

522 Judgment of 23 July 1968, A 6; (1968) 1 EHRR 252.

523 For discussion, see Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 20.

invoke.[524] Article 3 does not imply an absolute right to vote, but that elections should be held at regular intervals, should be secret, free from pressure on the electorate and the choice between candidates should be genuine. It does not confer a right to a particular form of electoral system.[525]

Further Protocols

Articles 1 and 2 of the Sixth Protocol abolish the death penalty except in time of war or the threat of war. Protocol 13 abolishes it in all circumstances, including in war time. The Fourth and Seventh Protocols cover, broadly: freedom of movement (Protocol 4), the right of an alien lawfully resident in a state to full review of his or her case before expulsion, rights of appeal, compensation for miscarriages of justice, the right not to be subjected to double jeopardy and sexual equality between spouses as regards private law rights and responsibilities (Protocol 7). They are discussed in Chapter 4, as are the plans for their implementation in national law.[526] A Protocol on Minority Rights was recommended to the Committee of Ministers in 1993, but it has not been adopted.[527] Protocol 12 provides, very significantly, a free-standing right to equality which is discussed further in Chapter 15.[528] The Joint Committee on Human Rights in its review of International Human Rights legislation in 2005 recommended that the government should ratify the Fourth and Twelfth Protocols with appropriate reservations where necessary.[529]

The other Protocols, including Protocol 11, are concerned with the procedural machinery of the Convention. These other procedural Protocols were abolished when Protocol 11, discussed above,[530] came into force.

4 Additional guarantees to the primary rights

Article 13: The right to an effective remedy before a national authority

> Everyone whose rights and freedoms as set forth in this Convention are violated shall have an effective remedy before a national authority notwithstanding that the violation has been committed by persons acting in an official capacity.

In Leander v Sweden[531] it was found that 'the requirements of Art 13 will be satisfied if there exists domestic machinery whereby, subject to the inherent limitations of the 524 Mathieu-Mohin v Belgium (1987) 10 EHRR 1, para 50.

525 Liberal Party v UK (1980) 21 DR 211 (it could not be read with Art 14 to confer a right to a system of proportional representation on the basis that the lack of such a system discriminated against the Liberal Party).
526 See further p 165.
527 See 14 HRLJ 140.
528 See p 1486.
529 17th Report of Session 2004–5 HL Paper 99, HC 264, paras 34 and 37.
530 See pp 21 and 33.
531 Judgment of 26 March 1987, A 116; (1987) 9 EHRR 443. Note that if such machinery exists, but is of doubtful efficacy, a challenge under Art 6(1) may be most likely to succeed (de Geouffre de la Pradelle v France (1993) HRLJ 276).

context, the individual can secure compliance with the relevant laws'. This machinery may include a number of possible remedies. It has been held that judicial review proceedings will be sufficient. In Vilvarajah and Four Others v UK,[532] the applicants maintained that judicial review did not satisfy Art 13 since the English courts could not consider the merits of the Home Secretary's decision in this instance, merely the manner in which it was taken. In holding that the power of judicial review satisfied the Art 13 test, the Court took into account the power of the UK courts to quash an administrative decision for unreasonableness, and the fact that these powers were exercisable by the highest tribunal in the UK. Thus, no violation of Art 13 was found. However, more recently, in Smith and Grady v UK,[533] the Court said of the concept of Wednesbury unreasonableness: 'the threshold at which the . . . Court of Appeal could find the Ministry of Defence policy irrational was placed so high that it effectively excluded any consideration by the domestic courts of the question whether the interference with the applicants' rights answered a pressing social need or was proportionate to the national security and public order aims pursued, principles which lie at the heart of the Court's analysis of complaints under Art 8 of the Convention.[534] This is not the last word on the matter. It is arguable that judicial review may provide a sufficient remedy in respect of breaches of Art 1, Protocol 1 especially where a large element of policy-making concerning social and economic matters is at issue.[535] This matter is pursued further at various points in this book.[536]

Article 13 does not contain a general guarantee that anyone who considers that his or her rights have been violated by the authorities should have an effective remedy; it can only be considered if one of the substantive rights or freedoms is in question. The words do not and cannot connote a requirement that there should be domestic machinery in place to address any possible grievance. The words 'are violated' of Art 13 do not mean that the violation must have been established before the national courts because clearly it could not have been – if it could, that would suggest that an effective remedy did exist. They mean that a person should have an arguable claim; there will be no breach of Art 13 if the complaint is unmeritorious – in other words, if it is clearly apparent that no violation of the Convention has taken place. Even if no violation of the other Article is eventually found, it can still be argued that the national courts should have provided an effective means of considering the possible violation. Moreover, a claim may eventually be held to be manifestly ill-founded and yet arguable. This is an odd result but, in principle, it is what the case law appears to disclose. In Klass[537] it was found that 'Art 13 must be interpreted as guaranteeing an effective remedy before a national authority to everyone who claims that his rights and freedoms under the Convention have been violated'. In Plattform 'Ärzte für das Leben'[538] it was found that 532 Judgment of 30 October 1991, A 215.

533 (2000) 29 EHRR 493.
534 Ibid, para 138.
535 See the decision of the House of Lords in Alconbury [2001] 2 All ER 929; (2001) 151 NLJ 135 (apart from the Art 1 issues, the matter concerned the application of Art 6 under the Human Rights Act).
536 See in particular Chapter 4, p 193.
537 Judgment of 6 September 1978 A 28; 2 EHRR 214.
538 (1988) 13 EHRR 204.

the claim must be arguable. Thus, Art 13 can be invoked only if no procedure is available which can begin to determine whether a violation has occurred. In theory, then, there could be a breach of Art 13 alone and in that sense, it protects an independent right. In practice, case law tends not to follow this purist approach, and if no violation of the substantive right is found, it is likely that no violation of Art 13 will be found either (as it may be argued occurred in the Ärzte für das Leben case).

In the Klass case, it was determined that phone tapping did not breach Art 8 since it was found to be in the interests of national security. The applicants claimed that Art 13 could be considered on the basis of their assertion that no effective domestic remedy existed for challenging the decision to tap. The Court accepted that the existing remedy was of limited efficacy: it consisted only of the possibility of review of the case by a parliamentary committee. Nevertheless, it found that in all the circumstances, no more effective remedy was possible. Thus, the Court allowed the doctrine of the margin of appreciation to resolve the difficulty which arose from the fact that the tapping was done in order to combat terrorism in its attack on democracy but the means employed, which included the suspension of judicial remedies, might well be termed undemocratic.

Article 14: Prohibition of discrimination

> The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status.

Article 14 does not provide a general right to freedom from discrimination, only that the rights and freedoms of the Convention must be secured without discrimination. Thus, if discrimination occurs in an area which is not covered by the Convention, such as most contractual aspects of employment, Art 14 will be irrelevant. Thus, Art 14 remains of limited value since it is not free standing and does not cover social and economic matters lying outside the protected rights. But, these weaknesses will eventually be addressed by Protocol 12, which will provide a free-standing right to freedom from discrimination in relation to rights protected by law.[539] The protection from discrimination under Protocol 12 will render Art 14 redundant. However, at present, the UK Government has not ratified it and, strangely for a Labour Government committed to anti-discrimination policies, it does not currently intend to do so.[540]

However, Art 14 is not the only Convention vehicle which may be used to challenge discriminatory practices. Not only may discrimination be attacked though the medium of one of the other Articles, most particularly Art 3,[541] but the Convention may be of particular value as a source of general principles in sex discrimination cases before the European Court of Justice.[542] An applicant may allege violation of a substantive 539 For further discussion of the draft Discrimination Protocol, see Moon, G (2000) 1 EHRLR 49.

540 See further Chapter 15, p 1486.

541 East African Asians cases (1973) 3 EHRR 76.

542 See, e.g., Johnstone v Chief Constable of the RUC [1986] ECR 1651.

right taken alone and also that he or she has been discriminated against in respect of that right. However, even if no violation of the substantive right taken alone is found and even if that claim is manifestly ill-founded, there could still be a violation of that Article and Art 14 taken together so long as the matter at issue is covered by the other Article. This was found in X v Federal Republic of Germany:[543] 'Article 14 of the Convention has no independent existence; nevertheless a measure which in itself is in conformity with the requirement of the Article enshrining the right or freedom in question, may however infringe this Article when read in conjunction with Article 14 for the reason that it is of a discriminatory nature.' In this sense, the Court has granted more autonomy to Art 14 than appeared to be intended originally.[544]

This ruling allowed more claims to be considered than the 'arguability' principle applying under Art 13. For example, in Abdulaziz, Cabales and Balkandali,[545] the female claimants wanted their non-national spouses to enter the UK and alleged a breach of Art 8, which protects family life. That claim was rejected. But a violation of Art 14 was found because the way the rule was applied made it easier for men to bring in their spouses. It was held that: 'Although the application of Art 14 does not necessarily presuppose a breach [of the substantive provisions of the Convention and the Protocols] – and to this extent it is autonomous – there can be no room for its application unless the facts at issue fall within the ambit of one or more of the rights and freedoms.' In response to this ruling, the UK Government 'equalised down', placing men and women in an equally disadvantageous position as regards their non-national spouses.

Under Art 14, discrimination connotes differential treatment which is unjustifiable. The differential treatment may be unjustifiable either in the sense that it relates to no objective and reasonable aim, or in the sense that there is no reasonable proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised.[546] In Abdulaziz, the aim was to protect the domestic labour market. It was held that this was not enough to justify the differential treatment because the difference in treatment was out of proportion to that aim. The outcome in this case illustrated the limitations of Art 14 which it shares with all anti-discrimination measures: it is concerned only with procedural fairness and can only ensure equal treatment which may be unjustifiable. Unjustifiable equal treatment is, however, unlikely to occur when the group in question is comparing itself with the dominant group since the dominant group will ensure, through the democratic process, that it does not experience a lower standard of treatment. However, where, as in Abdulaziz, the differentiation is occurring within a non-dominant group, the way is opened for equally poor treatment. This can be averted only by comparing the group as a whole with the dominant group. However, this argument was rejected by the European Court of Human Rights, which found that the treatment was not racially discriminatory.

543 Appl 4045/69 (1970) Yearbook XIII.

544 For comment on the increasing autonomy of Art 14, see Livingstone, S, 'Article 14 and the prevention of discrimination in the ECHR' (1997) 1 EHRR 25.

545 A 94; (1985) 7 EHRR 471.

546 Geïllustreerde Pers NV v Netherlands D & R 8 (1977).

5 Restriction of the rights and freedoms

The system of restrictions

As the discussion of the substantive rights demonstrated, all the Articles except Arts 3, 4(1) and 6(2) are subject to certain restrictions, either because certain limitations are inherent in the formulation of the right itself,[547] or because it is expressly stated that particular cases are not covered by the right in question, or because general restrictions on the primary right contained in the first paragraph are enumerated in a second paragraph (Arts 8–11). Certain further general restrictions are allowed under Arts 17, 15 and 57 (previously 64). In considering the restrictions, Art 18 must also be borne in mind. It provides that the motives of the national authority in creating the restrictions must be the same as the aims appearing behind the restrictions when the Convention was drafted.

Article 15: Derogation from the rights and freedoms in case of public emergency

(1) In time of war or other public emergency threatening the life of the nation any High Contracting Party may take measures derogating from its obligations under this Convention to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation, provided that such measures are not inconsistent with its other obligations under international law.
(2) No derogation from Article 2, except in respect of deaths resulting from lawful acts of war or from Articles 3, 4 (para 1) and 7 shall be made under this provision.
(3) Any High Contracting Party availing itself of this right of derogation shall keep the Secretary General of the Council of Europe fully informed of the measures which it has taken and the reasons therefore. It shall also inform the Secretary General of the Council of Europe when such measures have ceased to operate and the provisions of the Convention are again being fully executed.

Article 15 allows derogation in respect of most, but not all of the Arts. Derogation from Art 2 is not allowed except in respect of death resulting from lawful acts of war, while Arts 3, 4(1) and 7 are entirely non-derogable. Apart from these exceptions, a valid derogation requires the state in question to show that there is a state of war or public emergency and, in order to determine the validity of this claim, two questions should be asked. First, is there an actual or imminent exceptional crisis threatening the organised life of the state? Second, is it really necessary to adopt measures requiring derogation from the Articles in question? A margin of discretion is allowed in answering these questions because it is thought that the state in question is best placed to determine the facts, but it is not unlimited; Strasbourg will review it if the state has acted unreasonably. However, the Court has not been very consistent as regards the margin allowed to the state.[548] In general, if a derogation is entered, it must first be investigated and if found invalid, the claims in question will then be examined.

547 Eg, Art 14, which prohibits discrimination, is inherently limited because it operates only in the context of the other Convention rights and freedoms.

The UK entered a derogation in the case of Brogan[549] after the European Court of Human Rights had found that a violation of Art 5, which protects liberty, had occurred. At the time of the violation, there was no derogation in force in respect of Art 5 because the UK had withdrawn its derogation. This might suggest either that there was no need for it or that the UK had chosen not to derogate despite the gravity of the situation which would have justified derogation.[550]

However, after the decision in the European Court, the UK entered the derogation, stating that there was an emergency at the time. This was challenged as an invalid derogation,[551] but the claim failed on the basis that the exigencies of the situation did amount to a public emergency and the derogation could not be called into question merely because the government had decided to keep open the possibility of finding a means in the future of ensuring greater conformity with Convention obligations.[552] The fact that the emergency measures had been in place since 1974 did not mean that the emergency was not still in being. However, it may be argued that a state's failure to enter a derogation need not preclude the claim that a state of emergency did exist. If, whenever a state perceived the possibility that an emergency situation might exist, it felt it had to enter a derogation as an 'insurance measure' this would encourage a wider use of derogation, which would clearly be undesirable.

In the Greek case,[553] the Commission was prepared to hold an Art 15 derogation invalid. Greece had alleged that the derogation was necessary due to the exigencies of the situation: it was necessary to constrain the activities of communist agitators due to the disruption they were likely to cause. There had been past disruption which had verged on anarchy. Greece, therefore, claimed that it could not abide by the Articles in question: Arts 10 and 11. Apart from violations of those Articles, violations of Art 3, which is non-derogable, were also alleged. The Commission found that the derogation was not needed; the situation at the decisive moment did not contain all the elements necessary under Art 15.

Article 16: Restriction on the political activity of aliens

> Nothing in Articles 10, 11 and 14 shall be regarded as preventing the High Contracting Parties from imposing restrictions on the political activity of aliens.

Since Art 16 applies to Arts 10 and 11, it implies that restrictions over and above those already imposed due to the second paragraphs of those Articles can be imposed on

548 See pp 36–39.

549 Judgment of 29 November 1988; (1989) 11 EHRR 117; A 145 (1989).

550 See Chapter 11, pp 1167–69.

551 Brannigan and McBride v UK (1993) 17 EHRR 539.

552 It may be noted that the derogation has now been withdrawn due to the inception of the Terrorism Act 2000, s 41 and an amendment was made to the Human Rights Act, Sched 3, Part 1, by order, accordingly: Human Rights Act (Amendment) Order (2001) SI 2001/1216; in force from 1 April 2001.

553 Report of 5 November 1969, Yearbook XII.

aliens in respect of their enjoyment of the freedoms guaranteed, as far as their political activity is concerned. This does not mean that aliens have no safeguard of freedom of expression, association or assembly; restrictions can be imposed only if they relate to political activities. Through its effect on Art 14, Art 16 affects all the rights in the Convention, since it means that the national authorities can discriminate in relation to aliens as far as any of the Convention rights are concerned. Article 16 has, therefore, been greatly criticised as creating consequences which 'hardly fit into the system of the Convention'.[554] The fact that discrimination as regards the protection afforded to Convention rights is allowable, would not, however, preclude claims that the substantive rights – other than those arising under Arts 10 and 11 – had been violated.

Article 17: Destruction of Convention rights

> Nothing in this Convention may be interpreted as implying for any State, group or person any right to engage in any activity or perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms set forth herein or at their limitation to a greater extent than is provided for in the Convention.

Article 17 prevents a person relying on a Convention right where his or her ultimate aim is the destruction or limitation of Convention rights. Article 17 is dealt with on the issue of admissibility, but it can be looked at a later stage too. Its 'restriction' applies to all the rights and freedoms. In general, if Art 17 is violated, this may well mean that one of the other restrictions on the freedom in question applies too; thus, Art 17 is of importance only when it appears that some measure allows evasion of a Convention guarantee in a manner not covered by the other restrictions. Thus, Art 17 must be read in conjunction with all the articles as allowing for a new exception. This is of particular importance where the guarantee in question is subject to few or no restrictions.

Making a reservation: Art 57

Article 57 provides that a state can declare when signing the Convention that it cannot abide by a particular provision because domestic law then in force is not in conformity with it. This may be done when the Convention or Protocol is ratified. The Court will review the reservation in order to see whether it is specific enough: it should not be of too general a nature.[555] The UK has only entered a reservation in respect of Protocol 1.[556]

6 Conclusions

It is clear that in one sense, the Convention has been astoundingly successful in creating a standard of human rights which is perceived by so many Europeans as relevant and 554 See Van Dijk and Van Hoof, op. cit., fn 1, p 410.

555 In Belilos v Switzerland (1988) EHRR 466 it was found that the reservation did not comply with Art 64 because it was too general.

556 See above, p 105.

valuable despite the fact that almost half a century has passed since it was created. The enormous and continuing increase in the number of petitions in the late 1980s, during the 1990s and post-2000 suggest that its potential has only recently been understood. Its influence is likely to increase now that a number of Eastern European states have become signatories to it. Although it was only intended to create a minimum standard of human rights, it has succeeded in revealing basic flaws in UK law in relation to, for example, the decision to maintain or renew the detention of life prisoners.[557]

At the same time, its ability to bring about change in the laws and practices of Member states must not be exaggerated. Arguably, the Convention may be termed a largely procedural charter in the sense that a challenge to a flawed procedure is more likely to succeed under it than a claim that a substantive right has been violated.[558] Further, it may be argued that the machinery for the enforcement of the Convention is wholly inadequate, particularly in the face of a government unashamedly prepared to breach it for long periods of time.[559] This chapter spent some time dwelling on the stages through which an application will pass if it is pursued all the way through the system. The process means that if an application which is ultimately successful takes five years before the final decision, the individual affected may have to suffer a violation of his or her rights for all that time, although an interim remedy may be available under Rule 39 where the Chamber or its President considers that it should be adopted in the interest of the parties or of the proper conduct of the proceedings. Usually, such a remedy would be granted where there is an immediate risk to life or health, in death penalty cases[560] or in deportation or extradition cases.[561] There is no formal mechanism available, such as an interim injunction, to prevent the continuing violation, but a Rule 39 request is normally complied with. Now that the Court and Commission have merged, some of the overlapping stages, such as the dual consideration of admissibility, have disappeared, although the question of admissibility itself still arises. If the admissibility stage were eliminated, the workload of the single Court would increase enormously, although the quality of decision making in some individual cases might be improved. The process is still likely to be lengthy, especially as it is expected that the number of petitions will increase enormously due to the accession of Eastern European Member states.

If a petition comes before the European Court of Human Rights, it may decide that no violation has occurred due to its invocation of the margin of appreciation. If, however, it declares that a breach has indeed occurred, the violation may well subsist for some years while the Member state concerned considers the extent to which it will respond. Eventually, a measure may be adopted which may still represent a violation 557 See, e.g., Thynne, Wilson and Gunnel v UK, Judgment of 25 October 1990; (1990) 13 EHRR 666, discussed above, p 58.

558 See, e.g., Mats Jacobson v Sweden (1990) 13 EHRR 79, above, p 60.

559 The UK Government is quite frequently slow to respond to an adverse ruling, and when the response comes, it may be inadequate. See Chapter 11, pp 1033–34.

560 Ocalan v Turkey, 30.11.99.

561 Soering v UK (1989) 11 EHRR 439.

of rights, but of a less pernicious nature.[562] A challenge to such a measure would have to go through the same lengthy process in order to bring about any improvement in the protection afforded in the Member state to the right in question.

Thus, it may be concluded that reliance on the Convention has tended to produce only erratic, flawed and weak protection of freedoms in the UK. However, as argued at the beginning of this chapter, the solution does not appear to be adoption of a more coercive process since that might lead to open conflict with Strasbourg and perhaps, ultimately, withdrawal of some state Parties from the Convention. It was intended that the twin problems of the slow procedure and inadequate enforcement would be addressed by the reception of the Convention into UK law under the HRA. The framework of the HRA, as the means of affording the needed further effect to the Convention in domestic law, is considered in Chapter 4. It will be asked whether, in terms of efficacy, it can fairly be said that the rights have now been 'brought home'.

562 The response of the UK Government to the ruling in Malone v UK (1984) 7 EHRR 14, which was to place telephone tapping on a statutory footing (under the Interception of Communications Act 1985), may be an example of an inadequate implementation of a ruling since the Act did not require independent authorisation of intercept warrants even in cases unconcerned with national security. The position under the legislation which replaced the 1985 Act – the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, Part 1 – is, in essentials, the same. (See further Chapter 10, pp 1032–38.)

Chapter 3

Methods of protecting civil liberties in the UK; The Bill of Rights debate foreshadowing the Human Rights Act

1 Introduction

The premise behind the adoption of Bills of Rights all over the world is that citizens can never be fully assured of the safety of their fundamental civil and political rights unless those rights are afforded protection from state interference. It is thought that such protection can be achieved by enshrining a number of rights in a Bill of Rights, affording it some constitutional protection and entrusting it – in effect – to the judiciary on the basis that a government cannot be expected to keep a satisfactory check on itself; only a source of power independent of it can do so. Democracies across the world that have adopted a Bill or Charter of Rights have entrusted its application largely to the judiciary on the basis that among such sources of power, they are best placed to ensure the delivery of the rights to citizens. Dworkin has argued that under a Bill of Rights, a government is not free to treat liberty as a commodity of convenience or to ignore rights that the nation is under a moral duty to respect.[1]

In the UK, however, it was thought until relatively recently that the unwritten constitution recognising residual liberties, as maintained by Parliament and the judiciary, provided a sufficiently effective means of ensuring that power was not abused.[2] Residual liberties were, however, vulnerable to invasion: the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty meant that Parliament could legislate in an area of fundamental rights, thereby restricting or even destroying them.[3] The judiciary could also invade liberties in developing the common law, while unless a right could be said to be recognised by the common law, public authorities could invade it without relying on statute, the prerogative or common law rules.[4]

The argument that residual liberties were ineffective and that the change to a rights-based approach should be brought about gathered momentum during the 1970s and 1980s and gained ascendancy in the 1990s. This change of view was clearly traceable to the development and influence of international human rights law,[5] especially the impact of the European Convention on Human Rights. The argument was further fuelled by the invasions of liberty that occurred under the Conservative Governments

1 Dworkin, R, A Bill of Rights for Britain, 1990, p 23, Chatto and Windus.

2 See Jennings, WI, The Approach to Self-Governance, 1958, CUP.

3 Thus, freedom of assembly was severely restricted in the 1990s and beyond; see Chapter 8, pp 710–12, 738–43.

4 See Malone v MPC [1979] Ch 344, p 372.

5 See further Hunt, M, Using Human Rights Law in English Courts, 1997, Hart.

from 1979 to 97. It was argued that the traditional checks on government power could now be seen as insufficiently effective. These two developments were, it is suggested, interlinked; as Hunt argues: ‘no single factor has been more significant in exposing this gap between theory [the traditional account of domestic constitutional arrangements] and practice than the international dimension which [over the last 25 to 30 years] domestic constitutional practice has been forced to accommodate’.[6]

This view of the record of those Conservative Governments, viewed from the perspective offered by international human rights law, was used to support the introduction of the Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA),[7] which came fully into force on 2 October 2000. The HRA received the European Convention on Human Rights into UK law, thereby providing the UK with an instrument that, while arguably not amounting to a ‘Bill of Rights’ in the modern sense,[8] provided a new and very significant protection for human rights and freedoms. The HRA comes as close to creating a Bill of Rights as the UK has ever come.

This chapter begins by considering the traditional methods of protecting civil liberties in the UK: the changes that are being brought about under the Human Rights Act must be placed in that context. Clearly, while the inception of the Human Rights Act is intended to provide a new and effective means of protecting certain fundamental rights, it does not entail an abandonment of the traditional methods of protecting liberties; it may provide a means of strengthening them. Moreover, existing established rights and existing rights to bring proceedings are preserved by s 11 of the HRA; therefore, all the existing methods of protecting civil liberties already developed under the law are still highly relevant. Indeed, as explained below, they provide the usual forum in which arguments relating to civil liberties are being put forward in the post-HRA era, based either on the Convention and/or on established common law principle. The chapter goes on to consider some of the arguments that were put forward, especially in the 1990s, as to the need to enact a Bill of Rights, and as to the disadvantages of taking that step. Finally, it indicates the choices that had to be taken when the HRA was enacted, against the background of the preceding debate. Chapter 4 goes on to consider the HRA itself. The Bill of Rights issue remains pertinent, despite the inception of the HRA, since at the present time the Conservative Party plans, if it comes to power in 2009 or 2010, to introduce a Bill of Rights in order to replace the HRA. Gordon Brown is also interested in this possibility.

2 Methods of protecting civil liberties in the UK

The democratic process as the guardian of civil liberties

It has traditionally been thought that Parliament provides a means of allowing the will of the people to influence the government towards the maintenance of liberty[9] through free elections and secret ballots and aided by the operation of a free press. It can react to the needs of civil liberties by providing specific legislative safeguards and, in so

6 Ibid, p 1.

7 The HRA received Royal Assent on 9 November 1998.

8 See below, pp 147–51.

9 See, e.g., Dicey, AV, The Law of the Constitution, 1959, Macmillan, pp 189–90; Hume, D, Political Discourses, 1906, Walter Scott (first published 1752), p 203.

doing, can take into account the views and expertise of a range of groups. Moreover, it will govern according to the rule of law, which will include the notion that it will accept certain limits on its powers based on normative ideals.[10]

However, commentators such as Ewing and Gearty, evaluating governments in the 1980s, argued that these traditional checks were insufficiently effective as methods of curbing the power of a determined and illiberal governing party: 'Mrs Thatcher has merely utilised to the full the scope for untrammeled power latent in the British Constitution but obscured by the hesitancy and scruples of previous consensus-based political leaders.'[11] In particular, it is clear that when the government in power has a large majority, as the Thatcher Government had, it may more readily depart from traditional constitutional principles if it is minded to do so, because Parliament is likely to be ineffective as a check on its activities. Even where the governing party does not have a large majority, it can still introduce legislation abridging basic freedoms, especially where the main opposition party sympathises with its stance. As this book indicates at a number of points, the Major Government exemplified this tendency. The Thatcher and Major Governments introduced very little legislation protective of civil liberties except where they were forced to do so by a ruling of the European Court of Human Rights, an EC Directive or a ruling of the European Court of Justice. In short, the dangers of the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty in terms of threatening fundamental liberties became more apparent during the Conservative years of 1979–97. While it is important not to allow the record of those Conservative Governments to distort debate as to the efficacy of the democratic process in protecting civil liberties, it is also important to bear in mind the lessons which have been learnt as to the constitutional weaknesses which those governments exposed.

Government secrecy and executive discretion

Parliament's ability to create a check on government has, as Birkinshaw points out,[12] been hampered by the lack of a Freedom of Information (FoI) Act in scrutinising the actions of Ministers. This lack meant that the government could choose what and how much to reveal in response to opposition questions and therefore – as the Ponting case[13] made clear – was able to present a selective picture of events. Until 2000, Britain did not have an FoI Act, unlike other democracies, and, following the tradition of secrecy, Parliament until recently saw no need to enact one.[14] Although FoI legislation is now in place, there are grounds for arguing that its impact in terms of enabling Parliament to play an effective role may be limited, as Chapter 7 argues.[15]

Moreover, as this book will indicate at a number of points,[16] decisions affecting civil liberties are frequently taken not under Parliamentary scrutiny, but by ministers and officials exercising discretionary powers. The exercise of such powers may receive more

10 See, e.g., Wade, W and Bradley, A, Constitutional and Administrative Law, 1985, Longman, pp 99–100.
11 Ewing, KD and Gearty, CA, Freedom under Thatcher, 1989, p 7.
12 See Birkinshaw, P, Freedom of Information, 1996, Butterworths, Chapter 3.
13 Ponting [1985] Crim LR 318. See further Chapter 7, pp 593–94.
14 See Chapter 7, p 630 et seq.
15 See p 645 et seq. for discussion of recent developments in this area.
16 See, in particular, Chapter 10.

scrutiny in other jurisdictions. For example, the Australian Government has accepted that there should be a parliamentary committee charged with scrutiny of the Australian Security Service.[17] In the UK, in contrast, when the Security Services Bill 1989 was debated, the government refused an amendment which would have subjected MI5 to scrutiny by a Select Committee.[18] It continues to be the case that questions about the operation of MI5 and MI6 will not be answered in Parliament. Clearly, matters which are hidden from the public and from opposition MPs may tend to evade the checks arising from the democratic process, such as they are.

Opposition complicity in curtailing liberties

Aside from these issues, which have become particularly pressing over the last two decades, it may also be questioned whether the Westminster Parliament by its nature provides an effective forum for taking the protection of civil liberties into account in passing legislation. A number of writers[19] have noted that Parliament at times displays a readiness to pass emergency legislation which may go further than necessary in curtailing civil liberties and which is apt to remain on the statute book long after the emergency is over. MPs, whether in government or out of it, tend to respond in an unconsidered fashion to emergencies, apparent or real. Governments wish to be perceived as acting quickly and decisively, while members of the opposition parties, mindful of their popularity, may not wish to oppose measures adopted in the face of scares whipped up by some sections of the media. Such reactions were seen in relation to the original Official Secrets Act 1911, passed in one day with all-party support in response to a spy scare. The far reaching s 2, which was never debated at all, remained on the statute book for 78 years. Similarly, the Birmingham pub bombings on 21 November 1974 led, four days later, to the announcement of the Prevention of Terrorism Bill,[20] which was passed by 29 November virtually without amendment or dissent.

In the 1990s, Parliament quite frequently showed a marked readiness to accept claims that a number of proposed statutory measures would lead to the curbing of terrorist or criminal activity. Although such measures were likely to represent an infringement of civil liberties, they did not in general encounter determined criticism from the opposition. During the last Conservative years, Labour in opposition under Blair took a stance that could hardly be viewed as civil liberties-oriented. A number of political scientists have observed that in the 1990s, there was a general policy convergence, with the front-benchers of the Labour and Conservative Parties closer on many issues than at any point since the 1970s.[21] In the civil liberties context, two key examples were provided by the opposition impact on the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 and the Police Act 1997. Many pressure groups protested against the 1994 Bill: it probably attracted more public opposition than any other measure during the Conservative 17 See the Australian Security Service Intelligence Organisation Amendment Act 1986.

18 That position remained unchanged despite the enactment of subsequent legislation relating to the accountability of the intelligence Services: see Chapter 10, pp 1014–15.

19 Eg, Robertson, G, Freedom, the Individual and the Law, 1993, p 506; Walker, C, The Prevention of Terrorism in British Law, 2nd edn, 1992, Manchester University Press, Chapter 4, p 32.

20 HC Debs Vol 882 Col 35.

21 Seldon, A, 'The consensus debate' (1994) 14 Parliamentary Affairs 512.

years in government from 1979 to 1997, apart from the 'Poll tax'. But, despite protests against the Bill and the far-reaching nature of many of the new provisions, it went through Parliament relatively intact. As ATH Smith observes: 'Presumably for fear of being seen to be soft on crime . . . the Labour Party declined to oppose the Bill on Second Reading, leaving the serious opposition to the Bill to the Peers. Given the target of [the public order aspects] of the Act and the social make-up of their Lordships' House . . . the prospects of serious opposition were negligible.'[22]

As Chapter 10 explains, the Liberal Democrats took the lead in proposing the more far-reaching amendments to the 1997 Police Bill.[23] The Labour Party initially supported the proposals in the Bill to allow the police self-authorising powers to place bugging devices on property. Their stance was modified only after a government defeat on this matter in the Lords and severe criticism from various quarters. Jack Straw, then Shadow Home Secretary, finally agreed with Michael Howard on a compromise which would ensure that in certain serious cases the police had to seek authorisation from a judicial committee.[24] This compromise was criticised in many quarters as providing only marginally more protection for civil liberties.

The debate in the House of Commons on the Prevention of Terrorism (Additional Powers) Act 1996, which was guillotined, failed to consider in depth either the efficacy of the measure in terms of curbing terrorist activity or its likely impact on civil liberties. The debate provided, in microcosm, a good instance of the debasement and impoverishment of Parliamentary criminal justice debate in the mid-1990s. The Labour Party supported the proposals partly on the narrow ground that they represented only a small increase on the extended police powers which were included in the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 and which were not challenged on grounds of principle at the Committee stage of that Bill.[25] Thus, issues as to the real value of these powers fell to be asked only by Labour backbenchers and, owing to pressure of time and the stance of the leadership, they could not be pressed home.

Examples can be found to support the other side in this debate. It is generally agreed that the democratic process worked well in creating the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984,[26] and it is fair to say that it had at least some impact, as suggested above, on the Police Act 1997. It might be argued that the 1994 Act was a product of special Parliamentary conditions which are unlikely to recur: a particularly illiberal Home Secretary piloted it through Parliament and the Shadow Home Secretary supported its key provisions. However, subsequent developments suggest that similar conditions continued throughout and beyond the late 1990s.

The change of government in 1997, when Labour came to power after 18 years of Conservative rule, heralded the introduction of two key pieces of liberal legislation – the HRA 1998 and the FoI Act 2000. Nevertheless, the prevailing stance on both government and opposition benches remained a largely anti-liberal one during the following ten years of Labour rule. For example, the first significant counter-terrorist measure passed under the 22 Smith, ATH [1995] Crim LR 19, p 27.

23 See p 1057.
24 See, now, s 91(1) of the Act.
25 Straw, J, HC Deb 2 April 1996 Col 221.
26 See Zander, M, The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, 1995, Sweet and Maxwell, p xi: '. . . there can be no denying that the whole exercise was an example of the democratic process working.'

Labour Government, the Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Bill 1998, strongly resembled the 1996 Act in terms both of its content and of the Parliamentary process it underwent. The Bill was rushed through both Houses in two days in the wake of the Omagh bombing on the basis that the powers were needed immediately for operational reasons. In fact, no immediate action occurred in reliance on the new powers. The two central measures enhancing state power introduced in the first term of the Blair Government – the Terrorism Act 2000 and the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, showed, it is argued in this book, even less respect for human rights than measures such as the Police Act 1997. The stance of the Labour Government is indicated at various points in the following chapters. It will be contended that the consensus which some commentators viewed as 'shaping the politics of the 1990s'[27] continued post-2000. As Chapters 14 and 8 in particular point out, post 9/11, Labour criminal justice, anti-terrorism and public order legislation became markedly authoritarian. The Conservative opposition under Duncan-Smith adopted a stance which was arguably more authoritarian and even less civil rights-minded than that of the Labour Government. It seems clear that the Conservative approach has remained essentially unchanged after the General Elections in 2001 and 2005. It may be argued, then, that there has been little effective opposition in the Commons on human rights matters from the mid-1990s onwards and, at present, little prospect of any.

The House of Lords

The fact that the UK possesses a second chamber was sometimes used as an argument against the introduction of a Bill of Rights. The argument ran on these lines: other countries adopted Bills of Rights for a variety of reasons – either because they were at a stage in their development when human rights were particularly at risk, or because of a particular feature of their constitution, such as the lack of a second legislative chamber[28] to keep a check on the lower House;[29] their experience is not, therefore, analogous to that in the UK. But it must be questioned how far a second chamber can protect civil liberties. The House of Lords has had some successes, notably its influence on the incorporation into the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 of a provision with clear potential to safeguard the liberty of the citizen – s 78.[30] As mentioned above, the Lords also passed amendments to Michael Howard's Police Bill in 1997 allowing for judicial authorisation of bugging warrants. Crucial amendments to the Terrorism Act 2000, which narrowed the definition of 'terrorism' in cl 1, were passed in the Lords.[31] However, the powers of the Lords to thwart the wishes of the Commons are limited. Section 2 of the Parliament Act 1911 makes various provisions for presenting a Bill for the royal assent against the opposition of the Lords. When a Bill has been passed by the Commons in two successive sessions and it is rejected for a second time by the Lords, it can be presented on its second rejection for the Royal Assent. The very existence of this power means that the need to invoke it is unlikely to arise because the Lords will wish to avoid the need for the Commons to use it.[32]

27 Dutton, D, British Politics since 1945, 2nd edn, 1997, Blackwell, p 155.
28 New Zealand, which adopted a Bill of Rights in 1990, has no second chamber.
29 This view was put forward by Lord McCluskey in his 1986 Reith Lectures.
30 House of Lords, Hansard, 31 July 1984, Cols 635–75. See Chapter 13, p 1277 et seq.
31 See Chapter 14, p 1378.
32 The House of Lords will, however, on occasion use its powers of suspension fully as it did in relation to the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Amendment) Bill 1974–75.

Prior to the reform of the House of Lords, begun in 1999, the Lords were generally circumspect in using their powers; when they opposed a Bill sent up by the Commons, they tended to propose amendments at the Committee stage rather than vote against the second reading, and they followed the convention that amendments at the Committee stage should not re-open matters of principle already accepted by the Commons. The Lords rarely insisted on their amendments to a government Bill. O Hood Phillips has observed[33] that there was almost a convention that the Lords would not return a government Bill to the Commons for reconsideration more than once.[34] Hereditary peers (over 750 of them) formed the majority of those entitled to sit in the Lords and ensured the continuance of a Conservative majority. Although many of them were not regular attenders, they were occasionally brought in to secure the passage of Conservative legislation which the regular attenders might be inclined to reject.[35] Their voting rights were abolished in 1999 as the first part of the Labour reform of the Lords.[36] The partially reformed House of Lords currently sees itself as having greater credibility than its predecessor and, as a result, is more interventionist.[37] Clearly, the fully reformed House may take the same or a more radical view.[38] The Lords may, therefore, become more effective in civil liberties terms. Their activism may be enhanced by the HRA since, as explained below, when Bills are introduced into the Lords, they are accompanied by a statement of compatibility with the Convention rights.[39] Thus, the Lords now have a set of standards by which to measure the impact of the legislation in question on human rights.

Conclusions

It may be concluded that Parliament has demonstrated that it is willing to move quickly to cut down freedoms, but it is, at the same time, slow to bring in measures to protect them, because civil liberties issues tend to be perceived as difficult to handle and as doubtful vote-winners. It may even be the case that the governing party would like 33 See Hood Phillips, O, Constitutional and Administrative Law, 7th edn, 1987, Sweet and Maxwell, p 148.

34 Lord Hailsham said in March 1976 in relation to the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Amendment) Bill that opposition had exhausted their powers in sending the Bill back once to the Commons and so had discharged their duty.

35 This occurred in May 1988 in relation to the introduction of the Community Charge (Poll tax).

36 The House of Lords Act 1999 removed the automatic right of hereditary Peers to sit in the House of Lords. An 'interim' House of Lords of 90 members, elected by the Peers, is currently sitting, until the reform is completed.

37 See Lord Cranborne, HL Deb 22 February 2000 Cols 151–52 and Cols 163–64. The Lord Privy Seal stated in the House Magazine on 27.9.99 that the new House of Lords will 'be more legitimate because its members have earned their places and therefore more effective . . .'. In the Committee stage of the Criminal Justice (Mode of Trial) Bill in the Lords, the first amendment put down was a 'wrecking' amendment which was carried by the Lords and resulted in the immediate withdrawal of the Bill (HL Deb 20 Jan 2000 Col 1246 et seq).

38 See the Wakeham Report of the Royal Commission published in January 2000, A House for the Future, Cm 3534 (available on the web: http://www.official-documents.co.uk/document/ cm45/4534/4534.htm). The report suggested a mainly appointed House of 550 with a minority of elected representatives; the Government is pledged to act on the proposals: HL Deb 7 March 2000 Col 912.

39 Human Rights Act, s 19; see Chapter 4, pp 206–11.

to bring forward legislation on a civil liberties issue, such as introducing legislation making discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation unlawful, but be hesitant to do so because of its controversial nature.[40] This received Parliamentary wisdom has meant that measures protecting civil liberties are vulnerable to under-funding,[41] and, this book will argue, in the case of the HRA, to the undermining impact of later legislation.

Under the HRA, the Westminster Parliament is still dominated by the executive and, aside from the impact of EU law, still has in theory an untrammelled power to introduce rights-abridging legislation throughout the UK.[42] In this context, it cannot yet be said that radical constitutional reform which would genuinely constrain the power of the Westminster executive has occurred. Thus, in so far as it can be said that Parliament has shown itself to be ineffective in protecting civil liberties, it may be argued that a need for a further means of protection has been demonstrated. But such protection, under the HRA, need not be sought wholly or mainly outside Parliament. The HRA creates mechanisms which would allow Parliament to be more proactive in protecting civil rights, as explained in Chapter 4. But, as indicated at a number of points in this book, an optimistic or complacent attitude towards the impact of the HRA, in terms of enhancing the traditional protection offered to such rights by Parliament, is misplaced. In the early years of the HRA, Parliament appeared to accept quite readily that when Bills were presented to it and were declared to be compatible with the Convention rights under s 19 of the HRA,[43] that meant that a process of human rights auditing had already occurred and that, therefore, concerns about the effect on human rights of the provisions in question could be allayed.[44]

It is clearly pertinent to ask whether the democratic process can be trusted to safeguard civil liberties in the context of the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty. The further question that this book will address is whether the HRA is providing or could be expected to provide the effective protection for fundamental rights that has not been achieved through the operation of the democratic process, bearing in mind the fact that parliamentary sovereignty remains intact. As indicated, the influence of the HRA on that process in a direct sense is a significant theme.

Rules and judicial interpretation: current relevance of the traditional constitutional position

Residual liberties

The influential constitutional writer AV Dicey expressed the traditional view of rights as follows:

40 See for the current position, Chapter 15, p 1513 et seq.

41 Bodies such as the Equal Opportunities Commission may be under-funded, provision of legal aid may be cut without much (or any) public outcry.

42 See pp 170–73. The government can, of course, use the Parliament Act procedure in order to get its legislation through the Lords, as it did in respect of the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Bill 2000. The Lords have recently shown signs that they are tending to refuse to accept the conventional restraints in which they previously acquiesced.

43 See below, pp 207–8.

44 See further Chapter 14, p 1335 et seq.

> [Most] foreign constitutions have begun by declarations of rights . . . On the other hand, there remains through the English constitution that inseparable connection between the means of enforcing a right and the right to be enforced which is the strength of judicial legislation . . . Englishmen whose labours . . . framed the completed set of laws and institutions we call the constitution, fixed their minds more intently on providing remedies for the enforcement of rights . . . than upon any declaration of the rights of man. . . .[45]

The Diceyan tradition holds that the absence of a written constitution in the UK is not a weakness, but a source of strength. This is because the protection of the citizen's liberties is not dependent on vaguely-worded constitutional documents but, rather, flows from specific judicial decisions which give the citizen specific remedies for infringement of his or her liberties. It follows from the Diceyan thesis that judges will be concerned to construe legislation strictly against the executive if it conflicts with fundamental liberties arising from the common law.[46]

Dicey regarded one of the great strengths of the British Constitution as lying in the lack of broad discretionary powers vested in the executive. Citizens could only be criminalised for clear breaches of clearly established laws and such laws also governed the extent to which individual freedoms could be infringed. Where there was no relevant law, citizens could know with absolute confidence that they could exercise their liberty as they pleased without fear of incurring any sanction.

Parliamentary sovereignty is central to the Diceyan thesis. One of its significant aspects is the position whereby, unless international treaties are incorporated into domestic law, they cannot have legal effect, domestically. This aspect derived from the supremacy of Parliament over the executive: since the making of a treaty is an executive act, any attempt by the courts to afford domestic effect to its provisions would mean undermining that supremacy. Thus, traditionally, the judiciary adopted a 'dualist' approach to such treaties; they represented a system of law external to the domestic one and not part of it. This approach entailed a resistance to any use of unincorporated international law before domestic courts.

Central aspects of Dicey's thesis are, however, unconvincing as an analysis of UK contemporary legal culture, for a number of reasons. The Diceyan view of the law as imposing only narrow and tightly defined areas of liability is no longer representative, given the prevalence of broadly drawn offences such as those arising under counter-terrorist legislation post-2000 or under the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994. The view that the judges will construe rules strictly against the executive is also problematic, especially in relation to the use of quasi- and non-legislation authorising interference with civil liberties. Many such rules, including the Home Office Guidelines relied on by the police until 1997 in using surveillance devices, remain on a non-statutory basis for many years; they therefore receive no Parliamentary scrutiny and little or no judicial scrutiny either. When such rules are placed on a statutory basis, as they were under the Interception of Communications Act 1985, the Security Services 45 Dicey, AV, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution, 10th edn, 1987, Macmillan, p 198; see also p 190.

46 See, e.g., Waddington v Miah [1974] 2 All ER 377, HL.

Act 1989 and the Intelligence Services Act 1994, judicial scrutiny of their operation is, typically, largely ousted. This tradition was continued by the New Labour Government under the Terrorism Act 2000 and the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, as this book will point out, and significant aspects of these schemes are found in Codes of Practice and statutory instruments. The result is that there have been and will continue to be a number of significant areas of executive action which are largely closed to judicial scrutiny.

The following discussion indicates the inadequacies of Dicey's account in a number of further respects. In particular, it indicates the extent to which the European Convention on Human Rights was used as an interpretative tool and became a source of values relied upon in the development of the common law in the 1990s.

Judicial protection for liberties outside administrative law

Under the traditional view of the constitution, the judges will interpret common law doctrines so that fundamental freedoms are protected.[47] Street, in Freedom, the Individual and the Law, argues: 'our judges may be relied on to defend strenuously some kinds of freedom. Their emotions will be aroused where personal freedom is menaced by some politically unimportant area of the executive.'[48] Ewing and Gearty have argued, however, that the first half of the twentieth century saw a marked judicial reluctance to protect such freedoms.[49] Consideration of key decisions in the latter half of the twentieth century also suggests that there did not seem to be a clear conception, shared by most members of the judiciary, of their role as protecting liberties. For example, during the miners' strike in 1984–85, striking miners shouted abuse at miners going in to work guarded by police; the working miners claimed that such action was unlawful, and it was found that although no obvious legal pigeon-hole, such as assault, could be found for it owing to the circumstances, it could be termed 'a species of private nuisance' and injunctions against the striking miners were, therefore, granted.[50] The use of common law contempt in the Spycatcher litigation provides a further example.[51]

On a number of occasions, the judiciary interpreted uncertain areas of the common law, such as breach of the peace, very broadly, to some extent undermining the safeguards for liberties provided by statutes covering equivalent areas. Where an attempt has been made in a statute to seek to ensure that a particular freedom is protected, as is the case in s 4 of the Obscene Publications Act 1959 and s 5 of the Contempt of Court Act 1981, it may be found that the common law begins to take on a role which undermines the statutory provisions. This can be said of the common law doctrines of breach of the peace, contempt, and conspiracy to corrupt public morals.[52] It is noticeable that when the judges are enjoined in a statute to take account of a value such as freedom of expression – as they are under s 5 of the Contempt of Court Act 1981 – they are 47 See Entinck v Carrington [1765] 19 state Tr 1029.

48 Street, H, Freedom, the Individual and the Law, 1982, Penguin, p 318.
49 See Ewing, KD and Gearty, CA, The Struggle for Civil Liberties, 1999.
50 Thomas v NUM [1985] 2 All ER 1.
51 AG v Newspaper Publishing plc [1988] Ch 333; [1987] 3 All ER 276; [1988] 3 WLR 942, CA. See further Chapter 5, pp 368–70.
52 See further Chapter 5, p 363 et seq, Chapter 6, pp 482–84, Chapter 8 p 750 et seq.

more likely to adopt a rigorous approach than when dealing with a wide and uncertain power arising at common law.[53] Ewing and Gearty have argued that, for this reason, a Bill of Rights would be undesirable since the people need Parliament to protect them from the judges, not merely the judges to protect them from Parliament.[54]

From the perspective of the 1980s, it can be said that when a commentator in the common law tradition, such as TRS Allan, sought to defend the record of the common law in protecting fundamental rights,[55] a rather ironic pattern emerged. Allan contended that the case law showed support for civil liberties; he quoted from cases which purportedly supported his contention – and then found himself apologising for the inadequacies of the Lords' approach. Having cited Wheeler v Leicester CC[56] as an instance of the sturdy defence of free speech, he conceded that Lord Roskill did not use free speech grounds at all, while Lord Templeman did, in general terms, but unfortunately 'failed to address the level of principle demanded by the freedoms at issue'.[57] When he turned to the Spycatcher litigation, he was forced to concede from the outset that the speeches are 'disappointing'. Having praised Lord Keith for affirming the general freedom to speak, he then went on to admit that his Lordship failed to injunct only because 'all possible damage to the interests of the Crown had already been done' and that he was 'unwilling to . . . base his decision on any considerations of freedom of the press'.[58]

As this book will indicate, a number of twentieth-century decisions showed similar characteristics. Judicial activism in the 1990s, however, led to a number of significant decisions protective of liberty. They were influenced by International Human Rights law, and more specifically by the European Convention on Human Rights, in the sense that the judiciary began to demonstrate a strong inclination to show that the common law had long recognised the values encapsulated in the Convention. By so doing, they avoided the difficulties, discussed below, of determining the precise status of the European Convention in domestic law, while allowing for the infusion of such values into the common law.

The decision of Derbyshire v Times Newspapers,[59] which has been acclaimed as 'a legal landmark',[60] provides an important example of this tendency. The House of Lords found, without referring to Art 10 of the European Convention, that the importance the common law attached to free speech was such that defamation could 53 Contrast the approach to freedom of speech taken in AG v English [1983] 1 AC 116 in relation to s 5 of the 1981 Act, with that taken in AG v Newspaper Publishing plc [1988] Ch 333 in relation to common law contempt; also the approach to the Public Order Act 1986 taken in Reid [1987] Crim LR 702 with that taken to breach of the peace in Moss v McLachan [1985] IRLR 76 and Austin and Saxby [2005] EWHC 480. See Chapter 5, pp 357–58 and 369 and Chapter 8, pp 705 and 756, 763–71 respectively.

54 Ewing and Gearty, Freedom under Thatcher, 1989, pp 270–71.

55 Allan, TRS, 'Constitutional rights and common law' (1991) OJLS 453–60.

56 [1985] AC 1054; [1985] 2 All ER 1106, HL.

57 Allan, ibid, p 459.

58 Allan, ibid, p 460.

59 [1993] AC 534; [1993] 1 All ER 1011; [1992] 3 WLR 28, HL.

60 See Laws, J (Sir), 'Is the High Court the guardian of fundamental constitutional rights?' [1993] PL 67.

not be available as an action to local (or central) government.[61] In the House of Lords, Lord Keith said: 'I find it satisfactory to be able to conclude that the common law of England is consistent with the [freedom of expression] obligations assumed under [the Convention].'[62] Butler-Sloss LJ said in the Court of Appeal: 'I can see no inconsistency between English law upon this subject and Article 10 . . . This is scarcely surprising, since we may pride ourselves on the fact that freedom of speech has existed in this country perhaps as long, if not longer than . . . in any other country in the world.'[63]

While it might be argued that the decision appears to support the Diceyan thesis, it could also be said, more convincingly, that this explanation does not account for the recognition of Convention values in the common law. Hunt argues that: 'the supposed identity of common law and ECHR is surely a modern manifestation of the ancient myth that judges are not law-makers . . . [it is hard to deny that the courts are] developing the common law, extending it to cover rights and interests not previously valued by a conservative common law which privileged above all property-based or personal liberty interests.'[64] In the later seminal decision in Reynolds v Times Newspapers Ltd,[65] also in the field of defamation, the influence of the Convention was more overt. The House of Lords found that qualified privilege could apply to a publication where the media could establish that the information promulgated was matter that the public had a right to know. Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead found that this conclusion was firmly based on established common law principle. Lord Steyn gave more weight to Convention-based arguments in finding that: 'it is necessary to recognise the "vital public watchdog role of the press" as a practical matter'. In support of this argument, he relied on Goodwin v UK.[66]

But, while an attachment to free speech values that is arguably consonant with the value it is accorded at Strasbourg, is clearly evident in these decisions, this book discusses a number of decisions taken in the mid- to late-1990s affecting equally fundamental rights, in the fields of public protest,[67] police powers and fair trial rights,[68] which took a very ungenerous approach to rights and liberties. The reasons for the adoption of such an approach are discussed further in the relevant chapters. But, it is suggested here that while the decisions on fair trial rights do reflect Convention values, to varying degrees, they also assert an allegiance to the dualist approach, which was not evident in Derbyshire. The public protest decisions, it is argued, go even further in that direction.

61 Derbyshire was followed and its principle extended in Goldsmith and Another v Bhoyrul and Others [1997] 4 All ER 268; (1997) The Times, 20 June. It was found that a political party cannot sue in libel, although individual candidates would be able to.

62 [1993] AC 534, p 551.

63 [1992] 3 WLR 28, p 60.

64 Hunt, M, Using Human Rights Law in English Courts, 1997, p 186.

65 [1999] 4 All ER 609.

66 (1996) 22 EHRR 123, p 143, para 39.

67 Examples of such decisions discussed in this book include: the Divisional Court and House of Lords decisions in DPP v Jones and Lloyd v DPP [1999] 2 AC 240; [1997] 2 All ER 119 (for comment, see Fenwick and Phillipson, 'Public protest, the Human Rights Act and judicial responses to political expression' [2000] PL 627) DPP v Moseley, Woodling and Selvanayagam, Judgment of 9 June 1999; reported [1999] J Civ Lib 390, (Chapter 9, p 711 et seq. and p 793, respectively).

68 Khan [1996] 3 WLR 162; Chalkley [1998] 2 Cr App R 79.

Thus, it can be said that over the last three decades, prior to the introduction of the HRA, the judiciary did not develop a coherent approach to the protection of civil rights and liberties, although the influence of the European Convention on Human Rights became very marked, especially in the field of freedom of expression, in the 1990s. The dualist approach became 'in reality a matter of degree'.[69] But the difference of degree was sometimes quite remarkable.

Judicial review

It may be said that, before the 1990s, when fundamental human rights became an increasingly significant factor in judicial review, the judiciary maintained the classic dualist position in judicial review despite the acceptance of Convention values in other areas of the law. This was on the basis that to do otherwise would be to break down the traditional divide between review and appeal. And even within a strict review jurisdiction, strong deference was shown to executive decision-making in the politically important areas of executive action. The reluctance of judges to intervene in such areas, including those of public security or deportation, was evident in a number of decisions. Those in Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Northumbria Police Authority[70] and Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Hosenball[71] showed this tendency to a particularly marked degree. Thus, traditionally, the doctrine remained fundamentally limited in that as long as a minister appeared to have followed a correct and fair procedure, to have acted within his or her powers and to have made a decision which was not clearly unreasonable under the traditional Wednesbury test, the decision had to stand regardless of its potentially harmful impact on civil liberties. The fact that basic liberties were curtailed in, for example, the GCHQ[72] case did not, in itself, provide a ground for review. In other words, the courts were confined to looking back at the method of arriving at the decision rather than forward to its likely effects. In cases which touched directly on national security, so sensitive were the judges to the executive's duty to uphold the safety of the realm, that they tended to define their powers even to look back on the decision as almost non-existent.[73]

A development in the stance the judiciary was prepared to take when an administrative decision infringed human rights was evident in Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Brind.[74] The change was explained by Lord Bridge. He rejected the argument that state officials must take the European Convention on Human Rights into account in exercising discretionary power, and thus the possibility of extending the role of the Convention in domestic law by importing it into administrative law was rejected. He made it clear that although the courts would presume that ambiguity in domestic legislation should be resolved by arriving at an interpretation in conformity with the

69 Hunt, M, Using Human Rights Law in English Courts, 1997, p 41.

70 [1989] QB 26; [1988] 2 WLR 590; [1988] 1 All ER 556, CA.

71 [1977] 1 WLR 766.

72 Council of Civil Service Unions v Minister for Civil Service [1985] AC 374; [1985] 3 WLR 1174; [1984] 3 All ER 935, HL (the Prime Minister's decision struck directly at freedom of association).

73 See Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Stitt (1987) The Times, 3 February.

74 [1991] 1 AC 696; [1991] 1 All ER 720; [1991] 2 WLR 588, HL (political speech was directly curtailed); [1990] 1 All ER 469, CA.

Convention, it did not follow that where Parliament had conferred an administrative discretion on the executive without indicating the precise limits within which it had to be exercised, it could be presumed that it had to be exercised within Convention limits. It had been argued that to import such a principle must have been the legislature's intention, but the House of Lords considered that this would be an unwarranted step to take, bearing in mind that Parliament had chosen not to incorporate the Convention. Thus, the decision in Brind reaffirmed the accepted principle that the Convention should be taken into account where domestic legislation was ambiguous. It also determined that state officials were not bound by the Convention in exercising discretionary power.[75] Lord Bridge, reflecting the view of the majority, accepted nevertheless that where fundamental rights are in issue, they will affect the review of the exercise of such power. He said:

> we are entitled to start from the premise that any restriction of the right of freedom of expression requires to be justified and nothing less than an important competing public interest will be sufficient to justify it. The primary judgment as to whether the particular competing public interest justifies the particular restriction . . . falls to be exercised by the Secretary of State . . . But we are entitled to exercise a secondary judgment by asking whether a reasonable Secretary of State on the material before him could reasonably make that primary judgment.[76]

Thus, where fundamental human rights were in question, the Wednesbury test had to be refined. This argument was applied and taken further in Ministry for Defence ex p Smith and Others.[77] The case concerned the legality of the policy of the Ministry of Defence in maintaining a ban on homosexuals in the armed forces. The applicants, homosexuals who had been dismissed due to the existence of the ban, applied for review of the policy. Their application was dismissed at first instance in the Divisional Court and the applicants appealed. Rejecting the argument of the Ministry of Defence that it had no jurisdiction to review the legality of the policy in question, the court applied the usual Wednesbury principles. This meant that it could not interfere with the exercise of an administrative discretion on substantive grounds save where it was satisfied that the decision was unreasonable in the sense that it was beyond the range of responses open to a reasonable decision maker. But, in judging whether the decision maker had exceeded that margin of appreciation, the human rights context was important: 'the more substantial the interference with human rights, the more the court will require by way of justification before it will be satisfied that the decision 75 It may be noted that the then Conservative Government subsequently accepted that state officials exercising such powers should comply with the Convention: HL Deb 559 WA 7 December 1994 Col 84 and WA 9 January 1995 Vol 560 Col 1.

76 [1991] 1 All ER 720, p 723.

77 [1996] 1 All ER 257; [1996] ICR 740. See also Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p McQuillan [1995] 3 All ER 400; (1994) Independent, 23 September, in which Laws J's approach was expressly followed. Sedley J was unable to find for the applicant due to the particular statutory framework in question.

was reasonable.'[78] The Court rejected the argument of the Ministry of Defence that a less exacting test than applying Wednesbury principles of reasonableness was required. Applying such principles and taking into account the support of the policy in both Houses of Parliament, it could not be said that the policy crossed the threshold of irrationality. The concept of proportionality, as considered by the Master of the Rolls in this instance, was not viewed as a separate head of challenge, but merely as an aspect of Wednesbury unreasonableness.[79]

The significance of this decision lay in the meaning attributed to the word 'reasonable'; it denoted only a decision which was 'within the range of responses open to a reasonable decision-maker'.[80] But, the decision maker was required to take account of human rights in appropriate cases and she had to have a more convincing justification the more her decision was likely to trespass on those rights. That decision, however, remained primarily one for the decision maker. The courts would only intervene if the decider had come up with a justification which no reasonable person could consider trumped the human rights considerations – a position which was akin to classic GCHQ irrationality.[81] However, Smith did require a variable standard of review, depending on the human rights context.

A further, linked, factor of significance in Smith was the determination as to which policy considerations were to be allowed to override rights and which were not. It appeared that in making this determination, easily satisfied criteria were adopted. The policy factors were not required to satisfy the test of meeting a 'pressing social need',[82] since satisfying a lesser test nevertheless brought the decision within the range of responses open to a reasonable decision maker. This decision echoed that of Lord Bridge in Brind in relation to determinations as to overriding individual rights as guaranteed in the European Convention on Human Rights.[83]

In 1993, Sir John Laws, in an important article,[84] suggested a method of developing judicial review so that it could afford greater protection to liberties. His persuasive thesis is still of relevance in the post-HRA era since it can be used as a tool in order to measure the change brought about in judicial review in the pre-HRA era and by the HRA. He – in effect – anticipated the effect of the HRA, but, as indicated below, it appeared that, initially at least, most of his fellow judges were not prepared to do so. The main thrust of the thesis was, briefly, as follows. He proposed that review could develop such that in a case in which the exercise of discretion could have an adverse impact on fundamental rights, a two-stage test would be imposed by the courts. With respect to the first stage, the thesis noted that the courts have imposed an insistence 78 [1996] 1 All ER 257, p 263. See also Bugdaycay v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [1987] AC 514, p 531. For comment, see Fordham, M, 'What is anxious scrutiny?' [1996] JR 81.

79 For further argument as to the notion of proportionality, see Himsworth, C [1996] PL 46; his argument that the notion of proportionality as a separate head of review remains a possibility rests on an examination of Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food ex p Hamble [1995] 2 All ER 714.

80 Ibid.

81 Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, Sourcebook on Public Law, 1997, Cavendish, (2nd edn, 2002), p 803.

82 See Chapter 2, pp 68–69.

83 See Brind case [1991] 1 AC 696.

84 Laws [1993] PL 59–79.

on decision makers that their power may be used only for the purpose for which it was granted to them, the courts being the final arbiter of the nature of that purpose. As part of this attribution of purpose, the courts have consistently imposed on decision makers the presumption that power is granted to be exercised in a rational, not a capricious manner. It was proposed that a rather more stringent presumption could be imposed – namely, that no statute's purpose could include interference with fundamental rights embedded in the common law and that such interference would only be allowed if it was demonstrated that reading the statute to permit such interference was the only interpretation possible.[85] This was the first stage of the test. This approach was uncontroversial in assuming that power is only granted on the understanding that it will be exercised rationally – indeed, this could be said to be a basic requirement of formal justice. By contrast, to assume that power is never granted to infringe basic liberties is to make a substantive claim – and until the late 1990s, the courts were not prepared to make it. Preparedness to impose such a presumption in all cases implied the kind of unified, purposeful determination to protect civil liberties which most commentators failed to perceive in the judiciary during most of the 1980s and 1990s.[86]

This aspect of the thesis, concerning statutory interpretation in relation to fundamental human rights, found expression in a number of decisions in the immediate pre-HRA era. In this sense, s 3 of the HRA (see Chapter 4 below) was prefigured in certain decisions that recognised common law rights which cannot be abrogated except by express words or necessary implication – where there is only one way of reading the legislation in question. They included the rights of access to the courts,[87] to free speech,[88] and to basic subsistence,[89] and these decisions are discussed further below.[90] The rule of construction in these instances was described in one of the most significant of these decisions, Ex p Simms,[91] by Lord Hoffmann, as follows:

85 Laws adverts to the fact that an argument very similar to his was rejected in the Brind case. However, he considers that this was because the submission made in that case was that their Lordships should make such a presumption (in this case that free speech would not be infringed) under Art 10 of the ECHR. He argues that this is a mistaken approach as it amounts to an attempt to incorporate the ECHR through the back door, which the courts rightly resist since it offends against constitutional principles. Instead, he urges that the correct approach would be to argue that the norms implicit in the ECHR are already reflected in the common law – an approach which gains some support from the House of Lords decision in the Derbyshire case [1993] AC 534; [1993] 1 All ER 1011; [1992] 3 WLR 28, HL – and that it is the importance consequently attached by the common law to fundamental rights which provides a justification for the presumption that statutes do not intend to override them.

86 See, e.g., Oliver, D, 'A Bill of Rights for the United Kingdom', pp 151, 163; Ewing and Gearty, Freedom under Thatcher, 1989, generally and pp 64, 111, 157–60, 270–71 for particular criticisms of anti-libertarian judicial decisions and attitudes; Lester, A, 'Fundamental rights: the United Kingdom isolated?' [1984] PL 46.

87 R v Lord Chancellor ex p Witham [1998] QB 575. But cf R v Lord Chancellor ex p Lightfoot [2000] 2 WLR 318. For comment on the first instance decision [1998] 4 All ER 764, see Elliott, M, 'Lightfoot: tracing the perimeter of constitutional rights' [1998] JR 217.

88 R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Simms [1999] 3 All ER 400, CA; [1999] 3 WLR 328, HL.

89 89 R v Secretary of State for Social Security ex p Joint Council of Welfare of Immigrants [1996] 4 All ER 835; Lord Saville ex p A [1999] 4 All ER 860.

90 See Part II, pp 310–11.

91 R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Simms [1999] 3 All ER 400, CA; [1999] 3 WLR 328, HL.

> Parliamentary sovereignty means that Parliament can if it chooses legislate contrary to fundamental principles of human rights . . . But the principle of legality means that Parliament must squarely confront what it is doing and count the political cost. Fundamental rights cannot be overridden by general or ambiguous words . . . because there is too great a risk that the full implications of their unqualified meaning may have passed unnoticed in the democratic process . . . In this way the courts of the UK, though acknowledging the sovereignty of Parliament, apply principles of constitutionality little different from those which exist in countries where the power of the legislature is expressly limited by a constitutional document.[92]

In Ex p Witham,[93] Laws J found that the power of the Lord Chancellor to prescribe court fees was not based on sufficiently precise words to allow him to deny the right of access to a court by preventing an applicant on income support from issuing proceedings for defamation.

The second aspect of Sir John Laws' proposed thesis was as follows: in the pre-HRA era, the courts insisted that relevant considerations should be taken into account when making a decision, but held that the weight to be given to those considerations was entirely for the decision maker to determine. Laws argued that, on principle, while this might be a reasonable approach when the matter under consideration involved such issues as economic policy, this was far from the case where fundamental rights were at stake, since it meant that the decision maker would be free 'to accord a high or low importance to the right in question, as he chooses' which 'cannot be right'. He argued that the courts should therefore insist that the right could only be overridden if an 'objective, sufficient justification'[94] existed so that the infringement was limited to what was strictly required by the situation. While such a development would undoubtedly have been welcome, in terms of the protection afforded by judicial review to liberties in the pre-HRA era, two objections were inescapable. The first was simply that there appeared to be no compelling reason to suppose that such a concept of proportionality (as a separate head of challenge rather than as merely an aspect of Wednesbury unreasonableness)[95] would not remain waiting in the wings as merely a theoretical possibility prior to the introduction of the HRA.[96] The possibility of its development as a separate head of review was first floated in the GCHQ case. Variable enthusiasm by the judiciary to develop it was evident after that decision. The decision in Smith clearly failed to reflect Laws' thesis, although it gave an appearance of doing so. The Laws approach was applied in order to reach an outcome protective of individual rights in Cambridge HA ex p B[97] in which Laws J himself was presiding; his decision was immediately overturned by the Court of Appeal.[98] In contrast to that decision, 92 [1999] 3 All ER 400, p 412.

93 [1998] QB 575.
94 Laws [1993] PL 59–79, p 14.
95 See, e.g., the remarks of Taylor LJ in Ex p United States Tobacco [1992] 1 QB 353, p 366, to which Laws adverts.
96 For discussion of other proposals for the development of judicial review, see Jowell, J and Lester, A, 'Beyond Wednesbury: substantive principles of judicial review' [1987] PL 369.
97 [1995] TLR 159; [1995] WLR 898, CA.
98 [1995] 1 WLR 898.

the decision in R v Lord Saville ex p A[99] arguably prefigured the introduction of the proportionality test under the HRA and was consistent with that of Laws in Ex p B. The Court of Appeal subjected the decision not to afford anonymity to witnesses in the 'Bloody Sunday' inquiry to anxious scrutiny and went on to find that the inquiry had acted irrationally in so doing since it had failed to attach sufficient importance to the right to life.

It was a notable feature of the Ex p B case that the Court of Appeal took a wholly different approach from Laws J, a fact which led one commentator, Mallender, to question whether judicial review, which is of course supposed to represent the practical application of the rule of law, was in fact offending against the doctrine by virtue of its increasing uncertainty.[100] Mallender went on to find that in fact, on a more general jurisprudential level, both approaches 'reveal an intention to give effect to recognisably legal values' which restrain the discretion of both of them. Nevertheless, it was clear that since the two courts differed so markedly as to which (legal) matters were (a) relevant and (b) determinative of the matter in hand, it was apparent that the rapid development of this area of law was likely to entail a period of considerable uncertainty as to the content and scope of its core principles.

The second objection to Laws' thesis was that, even if such a head of challenge had been developed prior to the introduction of the HRA, the really crucial factor would have been the criteria the courts had decided to use to determine which policy considerations were to be allowed to override rights and which were not. If easily satisfied criteria had been adopted – a contingency which appeared likely – then the increased judicial protection offered to basic liberties might have turned out to consist rather more of theory than of substance. As indicated below, this will be a crucial issue under the HRA.

This discussion of judicial review in the immediate pre-HRA era indicates that it is possible to identify a common law tradition of upholding fundamental rights in certain limited, but central areas. That development is very clearly continuing in the HRA era[101] since the common law is being affected by the values of the Convention rights. The decisions considered, together with a number of others of a similar nature,[102] reaffirm, it is suggested, the value of judicial review as a means of ensuring that some harmony between UK executive practice and the standards laid down by the European Convention on Human Rights is achieved, and this was the case even in the pre-HRA era. Murray Hunt has argued that a common law tradition of developing human rights that reflected those enshrined in international human rights treaties was

99 [1999] 4 All ER 860.

100 Mallender, R, 'Judicial review and the rule of law' (1996) 112 LQR 182–86.

101 See Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Daly [2001] 3 All ER 433; [2001] UKHL 26, HL. The case concerned the examination of legal correspondence between a prisoner and his solicitor. The applicant claimed that he should be able to be present while his correspondence was being read. The House of Lords upheld his claim on the basis that the policy was disproportionate to the aim in view. Lord Steyn said: 'it is of great importance . . . that the common law itself is recognised as a sufficient source of the confidential right to confidential communication with a legal advisor for the purpose of obtaining legal advice' (para 30).

102 See, e.g., Secretary of State for Social Security ex p Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants [1996] 4 All ER 385; Secretary of State for the Home Dept and Another ex p Norney and Others (1995) The Times, 6 October.

well established.[103] Where, however, a statute uses specific words abrogating human rights,[104] and therefore it is necessary to argue that the decision was unreasonable, the limitations of the Wednesbury doctrine, albeit refined by reference to the human rights context, persisted. The decision in Smith may be said to demonstrate the limitations of judicial review in this respect. The reception of the European Convention on Human Rights into UK law under the HRA means that proportionality has been established as a separate head of review where the Convention guarantees are in issue, since the need for the administrative decision or measure in question has to be considered in relation to its impact in terms of the those guarantees.

Judicial review had already shown its potential to play a much greater part in the protection of human rights in the UK in the areas of activity affected by EU law.[105] In such areas, the merits of the decision were relevant and express words used in a statute could not overcome EU provisions.[106]

Conclusions

Two points seem to emerge from the above discussion. First, in the pre-HRA era, the judiciary did not seem to be united around a clear conception of their role. No compelling evidence emerged of a common understanding that they should form a bulwark to protect the citizens' liberties against the burgeoning power of the executive. While decisions in the field of free speech suggested an acceptance that Convention values were recognised as common law principles, decisions in the areas in which the common law had traditionally taken a non-rights-based stance, such as public order and exclusion of physical evidence unlawfully obtained, showed a persistence of that tradition. Second, even in the area in which a clear acceptance of the role of the common law in protecting fundamental human rights was present – judicial review – the courts seemed to lack the determination to continue pushing the limits of the doctrine outwards in order to ensure greater protection. They stopped short of introducing a full proportionality test.

It may be persuasively argued that since the judiciary had no 'textual anchor for their decisions' and had to 'rely on an appeal to normative ideals that lack any mooring in the common law',[107] it is unsurprising that common practice as regards fundamental freedoms did not emerge. Dawn Oliver points out that what has been termed the 'ethical aimlessness' of the common law – its lack of a sense of clear direction – means that because the judiciary as a body has no clear conception of the way the law should develop, they have not framed any set of 'guiding principles or priorities where civil and political rights clash with public interests'.[108] Thus, the judges in general showed,

103 Hunt, M, Using Human Rights Law in English Courts, 1997, p 5.

104 See Lord Chancellor ex p Lightfoot [2000] 2 WLR 318.

105 See Secretary of State for Employment ex p EOC [1994] 2 WLR 409, HL.

106 For the view that the direct influence of the Convention in the UK due to its significance as a source of general principles of EU law is not confined only to those areas of activity affected by EU law: see Beyleveld, D, 'The concept of a human right and incorporation of the ECHR' [1995] PL 577.

107 Justice William Brennan of the US Supreme Court in Hart, Lectures on Jurisprudence and Moral Philosophy, p 12, 24 May 1989.

108 Oliver, D, 'A Bill of Rights for the United Kingdom', p 151.

at times, uncertainty as to the weight to afford to a particular liberty, while the more executive-minded amongst them could take advantage of this uncertainty to grant it little or no weight. These tendencies meant that debate as to the principles underlying civil liberties was stifled and only the most obvious instances of their infringement received attention – where very basic rights were in question.

In the years immediately preceding the coming fully into force of the HRA, there was, as indicated, an emergence of common law rights going well beyond those rights, particularly to property, that the common law had traditionally recognised. However, it is arguable that without a constitutional document such as the ECHR, with its accumulated jurisprudence, to give them substance and depth, they might have remained at an uncertain and early stage of development, especially as there was some reluctance on the part of the judiciary to import ECHR principles and a preference for relying on a coincidence between such principles and those apparently already embedded in the common law.

Now that the judges have a 'textual anchor' in the form of the European Convention on Human Rights, applied domestically under the HRA, it is nevertheless unlikely that common practice among them will become rapidly evident; as this book will indicate, clear differences of approach were already emerging in the early years after the HRA came fully into force. This is unsurprising: judges in the US Supreme Court and in the European Court of Human Rights differ very widely as to their conceptions of liberty. However, it seems unarguable that the introduction of the Convention is achieving an increase in unity amongst domestic judges; while different judges will give different weights to rights and freedoms, at the very least all are certain about when they have to be taken into account. In particular, it is clear that the structure of judicial reasoning is changing under the HRA.[109]

In relation to both the key points indicated, it may plausibly be argued that in the last century, the judiciary as a body were not able to construct for themselves a clear justification for increasing their powers over government, although signs of judicial activism in the 1990s suggested that some of them considered that they should do so. The reception of the European Convention on Human Rights into domestic law, which may be viewed as a public statement from the nation as a whole of the importance that they attach to human rights, has given the judges a clearer mandate to develop a domestic human rights jurisprudence.

The influence of the European Convention on Human Rights in the pre-HRA era

Under Art 1 of the European Convention on Human Rights, the member states[110] must secure the rights and freedoms to their subjects, but they are free to decide 109 See Chapter 4, esp pp 267–91.

110 Currently, the Western European members include: Albania, Andorra, Austria, Belgium, Cyprus, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Malta, The Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, San Marino, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, UK. Eastern European members include: Bulgaria, Croatia, the Czech Republic, Estonia, Georgia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Macedonia, Moldova, Poland, Romania, Russia, Slovakia and Slovenia and Ukraine. The numbers increased owing to the disintegration of the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia.

how this should be done.[111] Each state decides on the status the Convention enjoys in national law; there is no obligation under Art 1 to allow individuals to rely on it in national courts. In some states, it has the status of constitutional law;[112] in others, of ordinary law.[113]

In the pre-HRA era, rulings of the European Court of Human Rights led to better protection of human rights in such areas as prisoners' rights,[114] freedom of expression[115] and privacy.[116] But, as an external force, the influence of the Convention was limited. In contrast to the influence of European Union law, discussed below, the influence of the European Convention was, and is, procedurally rather than substantively limited. As pointed out in Chapter 2, the effect at the international level of a ruling of the European Court of Human Rights is dependent on the government in question making a change in the law. The UK government has been able to minimise the impact of an adverse judgment by interpreting defeat narrowly,[117] by avoiding implementation of a ruling,[118] or by obeying the letter of the Article in question, but ignoring its spirit.[119] The impact of the Convention at the international level was, and is, diminished since the process of invoking it, considered in Chapter 2, is extremely cumbersome, lengthy[120] and expensive.[121] It may not become less so despite the change which occurred under the Eleventh Protocol, including merger of the European Court and Commission of Human Rights[122] and the more recent changes discussed in Chapter 2.[123] Under the HRA, litigants may still take cases to Strasbourg as a last resort, but, as Chapter 2 demonstrated, while the system of the long trek to Strasbourg (starting with the exhaustion of domestic remedies) remains substantially, as at present, only the most exceptionally determined and resourceful litigants are likely to pursue it.[124]

In the UK, prior to the introduction of the HRA, the Convention had no domestic binding force. Until 1997, successive UK governments considered that it was not 111 This was affirmed by the Irish Supreme Court in The State (Lawless) v O'Sullivan and the Minister for Justice; see Yearbook of the Convention on Human Rights Vol II (1958–59), pp 608–22.

112 E.g., Austria.

113 This includes Belgium, France, Italy, Luxembourg and Germany.

114 E.g., Golder, Eur Court HR, A 18, Judgment of 21 February 1975.

115 Sunday Times, Judgment of 26 April 1979; (1979) 2 EHRR 245. See further Chapter 5, pp 336–37.

116 E.g., Gaskin v UK (1990) 12 EHRR 36. See further Chapter 9, p 924. See further Farren, S, The UK before the European Court of Human Rights, 1996.

117 As in Golder, Eur Court HR, A 18, Judgment of 21 February 1975.

118 Brogan, Coyle, McFadden and Tracey v UK (1988) 11 EHRR 117 (Case No 10/1987/133/184–7). The government refused to implement the ruling, entering a derogation under Art 15. See further Chapter 2, p 111.

119 Abdulaziz, Cabales and Balkandali v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 471. To implement the ruling, the UK 'equalised down'. See further Chapter 2, p 109.

120 The Commission used to make over 3,000 provisional files a year. The average petition took five years and nine months between 1982 and 1987 if it went all the way through the system – four years before the Commission, nearly two before the Court (15 EHRR 321, p 327). Petitions can take nine years. When the Commission was abolished admissibility was then determined by a Chamber of the Court, as Chapter 2 explains. The average time is around four years; for some years the Court has had 5,000 cases pending. See further Chapter 2, pp 23–29.

121 Legal aid is not available until after the complaint has been held admissible.

122 See Chapter 2, pp 25–29.

123 See pp 27–29.

124 See Chapter 2, pp 28–31.

necessary for the Convention to be part of UK law; they always maintained that the UK's unwritten constitution was in conformity with it. Thus, until 2000, a UK citizen could not go before a UK court and simply argue that a Convention right had been violated by a public authority. Nevertheless, before the HRA came fully into force, the influence of the Convention was rapidly becoming more significant in domestic law through rulings in UK courts and in the European Court of Human Rights. As indicated below, the Convention also had an increasing significance in human rights-related rulings of the European Court of Justice. It may be said that the Convention was encroaching steadily on UK law from every direction,[125] and that its direct domestic reception under the HRA was merely the culmination of that process.[126]

The discussion above regarding the influence of human rights values in the common law pre-HRA demonstrated that the courts in a number of significant decisions tended to prefer to refer to common law principle rather than explicitly to the Convention in respect both of statutory interpretation and the development of the common law. However, in both respects, a strand of thinking became very evident to the effect that the Convention itself should be explicitly relied upon. It had an impact through domestic courts in the pre-HRA era in the following ways.

The domestic impact of the ECHR in the pre-HRA era: statutory construction

It became a general principle of construction that statutes would be interpreted if possible so as to conform with international human rights treaties to which the UK is a party, on the basis that the government is aware of its international obligations and would not intend to legislate contrary to them.[127] A legal presumption developed that 'Parliament does not intend to act in breach of international law' (per Diplock LJ in Saloman v Commissioners of Custom and Excise),[128] so that a reading of the relevant legislation that did not create a breach of rights would be adopted by the courts if such a reading was possible. However, as Lord Brandon of Oakbrook made clear in re M and H (Minors),[129] the English courts were under no duty to apply the Convention's provisions directly: 'While English courts may strive where they can to interpret statutes as conforming with the obligations of the UK under the Convention, they are nevertheless bound to give effect to statutes which are free from ambiguity even if those statutes may be in conflict with the Convention'. Thus, quite a strong protection against legislative encroachment on civil and political rights, especially those arising under the Convention, became increasingly available. Other international human rights treaties to which the UK is a party, including the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, had much less influence, as indicated below.[130]

125 For the argument that the extent of such encroachment has been exaggerated, see Klug, F and Starmer, K [1997] PL 223.

126 See esp pp 114 and 210.

127 See the judgment of Lord Brandon of Oakbrook in re M and H (Minors) [1990] 1 AC 686; [1988] 3 WLR 485, HL, p 498; [1990] 1 AC 686.

128 [1967] 2 QB 116, p 143.

129 [1988] 3 WLR 485, p 498; [1990] 1 AC 686, HL.

130 See also p 17. See further Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, The Law of Human Rights, 2000, pp 89–103.

The interpretation of ambiguous provisions in conformity with the Convention thus left it great scope to influence domestic law even before the introduction of the HRA.

The domestic impact of the ECHR in the pre-HRA era: influence on the common law

Lord Scarman, in AG v BBC,[131] considered that the Convention could also influence the common law. He said that where there was some leeway to do so, a court which must adjudicate on the relative weight to be given to different public interests under the common law should try to strike a balance in a manner consistent with the treaty obligations accepted by the government: 'If the issue should ultimately be . . . a question of legal policy, we must have regard to the country's international obligation to observe the Convention as interpreted by the Court of Human Rights.' This approach was endorsed by the House of Lords in AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2),[132] Lord Goff stating that he considered it to be his duty, where free to do so, to interpret the law in accordance with Convention obligations. Similarly, in Chief Metropolitan Magistrates' Court ex p Choudhury,[133] Art 10 was taken into account in reviewing the decision of the magistrates' court not to grant summonses against Salman Rushdie and his publishers for the common law offence of blasphemous libel.

The need to take the Convention into account was emphasised even more strongly by the Court of Appeal in Derbyshire CC v Times Newspapers Ltd,[134] Ralph Gibson LJ ruling that where a matter 'was not clear [by reference to] established principles of our law . . . the court must . . . have regard to the principles stated in the Convention'. Butler-Sloss LJ put the matter even more strongly: 'where there is an ambiguity or the law is otherwise unclear or so far undeclared by an appellate court, the English court is not only entitled but . . . obliged to consider the implications of Article 10.' As indicated above, the House of Lords considered that in the particular instance, the common law could determine the issues in favour of freedom of speech[135] and that therefore, recourse to the Convention was unnecessary, but the guidance offered by the Court of Appeal was still of value where the common law was uncertain. That guidance suggested that judges had no choice as to whether to consider the Convention where the law was ambiguous[136] or – and this did appear to be a new development – where it was not yet settled in an appellate court. It may, therefore, have been the case that all areas of the common law which were not clearly settled in the House of Lords and which affected Convention rights, were expected to reflect Convention principles even before the HRA came into force. Thus, some disregard for the classic dualist stance became apparent in the common law.

131 [1981] AC 303, 354; [1980] 3 WLR 109, p 130, HL.
132 [1990] 1 AC 109, p 283.
133 [1991] 1 QB 429; [1991] 1 All ER 306.
134 [1993] AC 534; [1993] 1 All ER 1011; [1992] 3 WLR 28, HL.
135 [1993] 1 All ER 1011. For comment, see Barendt, E, 'Libel and freedom of speech in English law' [1993] PL 449.
136 See further on this point (1992) MLR 721.

The influence of European Union law

It is clear that membership of the European Community has had a dramatic impact on civil liberties in the UK in the last three decades. This is despite the fact that, clearly, EU law is concerned more with social and economic than civil rights. Where EU law protects civil rights, this may not be its primary purpose. Although Community law is intended to create social benefits in addition to economic benefits, social benefits may be conceived of as a by-product of, or adjunct to, economic integration.[137] Even without the HRA, the European Convention on Human Rights would have an impact via the EU, although the two systems of law are technically separate. EU provisions themselves also influence the protection of fundamental rights in the UK.

The influence of the Convention in EU law became increasingly important due to acceptance of the principle enunciated in Amministrazione delle Finanze dello Stato v Simmenthal[138] and Nold v Commission,[139] namely, that respect for fundamental rights should be ensured within the context of the EU. The Convention has come into a closer relationship with EU law as the process of European integration has continued. The influence of EU human rights law is increasing, especially after the Amsterdam Treaty came into force.[140] The doctrine of respect for fundamental rights, as guaranteed by the European Convention and as resulting from the constitutional traditions common to member states, is now embodied in Art F(2)(6)(2) of the Treaty on European Union.[141] But although Art F2 states that the EU will respect fundamental rights as recognised by the Convention, the European Court of Justice (ECJ), in Opinion 2/94 (28 March 1996),[142] held that the EU cannot accede to the Convention, on the ground that an amendment to the Treaty of Rome would be required in order to bring about this change, since it would go beyond the scope of Art 235. Under the Treaty of Amsterdam, Art F1, voting rights of member states who fail to observe the principle embodied by Art F(2)(6)(2) can be suspended. The EU Charter of Fundamental Rights, although not yet of binding force, aids in the interpretation of EU law.[143]

137 This is exemplified in the case of harmonisation of a minimal level of employment protection provisions in order to create a 'level playing field' of competition for employers in the Single Market. See, e.g., Nielsen and Szyszczak, The Social Dimension of the European Community, 2nd edn, 1993, Copenhagen Business School Press, pp 15–18; Hoskyns, 'Women, European law and transnational politics' (1986) 14 Int J Soc Law 299–315.

138 Case 106/77 [1978] ECR 629.

139 [1974] ECR 481.

140 The Treaty came into force in 1999. It extends a number of existing rights under EU law and amends the Social Charter, which lays down minimum rights for workers in the Community countries. The Conservative Government failed to ratify it, but in the Agreement annexed to the Protocol on Social Policy in the Treaty of Maastricht the other member states recorded their agreement to 'continue along the path' laid down in it. The Labour Government has withdrawn the opt-out.

141 For enforcement of the Convention by this means, see Craig, P and De Burca, G, European Law: Text and Materials, 2nd edn, 1998, OUP.

142 (1996) The Times, 16 April.

143 The Charter, published in May 2000 (available from the European Commission website and from the website of the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Parliament) contains those rights recognised under the European Convention on Human Rights together with a number of new social rights, including the right to strike, guarantees of maximum working hours, worker consultation and trade union membership. The rights could, potentially, bind the EU institutions. Certain member states and the European Commission proposed that the Charter should be included in the Treaty of

EU law has already had an important impact, as this book will demonstrate, in the areas of sex discrimination,[144] data protection[145] and race discrimination.[146] Where national measures come within the scope of Community law, they must comply with the human rights standards it maintains.[147] As this book indicates at a number of points, EU human rights law is increasingly becoming a powerful force both in terms of the protection offered by the ECJ, and of its domestic implications.[148]

The result of these developments is that, in all the member states, implementation of EU measures in national law is clearly subject to respect for the Convention rights, although an individual cannot make an application to Strasbourg against the Union alleging that the Union has violated the Convention. Even though formal accession of the Union to the Convention has not yet occurred, the Convention will control Union conduct. Thus, the decision of the ECHR in Rees[149] was relied upon by the ECJ in deciding, in P v S and Cornwall CC,[150] that transsexuals fall within the Equal Treatment Directive. This was found on the basis that the Directive is simply the expression of the principle of equality, which is one of the fundamental principles of European law.

It is therefore probable that, as the influence of the Convention on EU law becomes more significant and the impact of EU law becomes greater in the UK, the Convention may also have more influence, indirectly, aside from the HRA. If the HRA was repealed this influence would continue. EU law can, of course, have direct effect in UK courts and can even override a UK statute.[151] The ability of Parliament to infringe rights under the HRA, as discussed below, is therefore subject to the ability of the judiciary to disapply domestic law which is incompatible with EC law. The position is as set out in the leading case Elliniki Rasdio Phonia Tiles Rassi AE v Dimotiki Etaria:[152] 'as soon as any [national] legislation enters the field of application of Community law, the [ECJ] as the sole arbiter in this matter, must provide the national court with all the elements of interpretation which are necessary in order to enable it to assess the compatibility of that legislation with the fundamental rights – as laid down particularly in the European Convention on Human Rights – the observance of which the Court ensures.' Thus, any national law within the field of application of EU law can be assessed as to its compliance with the Convention rights. In particular, where a member state is seeking to carve out an exception to the general principles of EU law, the review of the European Court of Justice is most intensive. But, as a matter of EU

Nice in December 2000. Britain considers that the Charter should not become part of the Treaty, and therefore have binding effect, but should have a merely declaratory status. At present, in July 2007, this is still the position. See for discussion, Wicks, E [2001] PL 527.

144 See, e.g., Marshall (No 2) [1993] 4 All ER 586. See further Chapter 15, p 1589.

145 For example the Data Protection Act 1984 (now 1988) derived from the European Convention for the Protection of Individuals with regard to the Automatic Protection of Data, 17 September 1980. See further Chapter 9, p 921 et seq.

146 See Chapter 15, p 1480.

147 See, e.g., R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Adams [1995] All ER (EC) 177.

148 See further Betten, L and Grief, N, EU Law and Human Rights, 1998, Longman; Neuwahl, N and Rosas, A, The EU and Human Rights, 1995, Martinus Nijhoff; Jacobs, F, 'Human rights in the EU: the role of the ECJ' [2001] 26(4) ELR 331.

149 (1986) 9 EHRR 56.

150 [1996] ECR I-2143; [1996] 2 CMLR 247; [1996] All ER(EC) 397. See further Chapter 16, pp 988–89.

151 See Factortame Ltd v Secretary of State for Transport [1991] 1 All ER 70, HL.

152 [1991] ECR I-2925.

law, the Convention rights are not directly justifiable since they are not free standing rights. The position under Elliniki was not, therefore, changed by Art F(2)(6)(2). The domestic courts can disapply legislative provisions which appear to conflict with EU law as interpreted in reliance on those rights. Certain Convention principles may therefore come to be of limited binding force in the UK as forming part of EU law. However, the potential impact of the Convention in the UK by this means has not as yet been fully realised.[153]

3 The 'Bill of Rights' Debate

Introduction[154]

The question, canvassed over the last 30 years, whether the UK should incorporate the European Convention on Human Rights into domestic law in order to act – in effect – as a substitute for a Bill of Rights, initially gained impetus due to the UK's acceptance of the right of individual petition under the European Convention on Human Rights. It rapidly came to seem anomalous to some that the Strasbourg judges should have the power to rule on the compatibility of UK law with Convention rights, while domestic judges had no such power. The idea that a dissatisfied litigant could leave the House of Lords to seek 'better' justice abroad was obviously distasteful to many domestic judges.

In 1968, Anthony Lester QC proposed the incorporation of the European Convention on Human Rights into national law[155] and the Charter '88 Group,[156] among others, 153 See further on this issue, Van Dijk and Van Hoof, Theory and Practice of the ECHR, 3rd edn, 1998, Chapter 8; Clapham, Human Rights and the European Community: A Critical Overview, 1991, Clarendon; Schermers, HG (1990) 27 CMLR 249; Grief [1991] PL 555; Coppel, J and O'Neill, A [1992] 29 CMLR 669; Foster, N (1987) 8 HRLJ 245; Lenaerts (1991) 16 ELR 367; O'Leary, S, 'Accession by the EC to the ECHR' (1996) 4 EHRR 362.

154 Texts referred to below and background reading: Lord Scarman, English Law – The New Dimension, 1974, Scarman; Wallington, P and McBride, J, Civil Liberties and a Bill of Rights, 1976, Blackwell; Bailey, SH, Harris, DJ and Jones, BL, Civil Liberties: Cases and Materials, 5th edn, 2002, Chapter 1; Feldman, D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 2002, Chapter 2; Waddington, PAJ, Liberty and Order, 1994, Routledge; Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, The Law of Human Rights, 2nd edn, 2006, Chapter 1; Jaconelli, J, Enacting a Bill of Rights, 1980, Clarendon; Zander, M, A Bill of Rights, 4th edn, 1997, Sweet and Maxwell; Dworkin, R, A Bill of Rights for Britain, 1990; Ewing, KD, A Bill of Rights for Britain, 1990; 'Do we need a Bill of Rights?' (1976) 39 MLR 121; 'Should we have a Bill of Rights?' (1977) 40 MLR 389; 'Britain's Bill of Rights' (1978) 94 LQR 512; 'Legislative supremacy and the rule of law' [1985] CLJ 111; 'Incorporating the Convention' (1990) 25 LAG, April; 'Fundamental rights: the UK isolated?' [1984] PL 46; Craig, PP, Public Law and Democracy in the United Kingdom and the United States of America, 1990, Clarendon; Waldron, J, 'A rights-based critique of constitutional rights' (1993) 13 OJLS 18; Adjei, C, 'Human rights theory and the Bill of Rights debate' (1995) 58 MLR 17; Oliver, D, 'A Bill of Rights for the United Kingdom', in Government in the United Kingdom, 1991, Open University Press; Lester, A, 'The judges as law-makers' [1993] PL 269.

155 Lester, A, Democracy and Individual Rights, 1968, Fabian Society, pp 13–15. For the view that the Convention did not need to be formally adopted into UK law since it was already part of it and could be directly relied upon in domestic courts, see Beyleveld, D, 'The concept of a human right and incorporation of the ECHR' [1995] PL 577.

156 Charter '88 advocated enshrining civil liberties by means of a Bill of Rights, but it did not put forward a text. See Stanger, N (1990) 8 Index on Censorship 14.

brought the issue into prominence during the late 1980s and the 1990s. But some judges[157] and academic writers remained opposed to the reception of the Convention into domestic law or unconvinced[158] of the value of so doing, as did a number of politicians, including most Conservative MPs and right-wing commentators generally.[159] Nevertheless, support for the adoption of a 'Bill of Rights' grew among lawyers, academics and politicians[160] during the 1980s and 1990s prior to the introduction of the Human Rights Act 1998 under the Labour Government.

The political history of the debate

Britain was the first member state to ratify the European Convention,[161] despite some strong feeling against it in Cabinet, particularly from Lord Chancellor Jowitt. The government at the time recognised that it was politically necessary to accept the Convention, but Jowitt described it as 'so vague and woolly that it may mean almost anything. Any student of our legal institutions must recoil from this document with a feeling of horror.'[162] However, the government did not, at that time, accept the right of individual petition or the jurisdiction of the European Court and there was no question of incorporation of the Convention into domestic law. When the government[163] eventually accepted the right of individual petition in 1966, there appears to have been little realisation of the significance of this move, but it was unsurprising that it should be followed by a call for enactment of the Convention into domestic law – though without being directly enforceable.[164] The call for a 'Bill of Rights' was taken up by Lord Lambton (Conservative) in 1969, who sought leave to introduce a 'ten-minute rule' Bill to preserve the rights of the individual – in other words, to curb the power of the Labour Government in such areas as freedom of speech and education. There was little support for the Bill and it was rejected.

From the 1970s onwards, growth of support for a UK Bill of Rights became apparent pre-HRA outside the ranks of the Conservative Party, although certain senior Conservatives displayed some such support when in opposition. Labour, which toyed with the notion in 1975, opposed it before and during the 1992 General Election, eventually decided to espouse it as official policy in 1993, while there was a long history

157 Eg, Lord McCluskey in his 1986 Reith Lectures.

158 See, e.g., Ewing, KD and Gearty, CA, Freedom under Thatcher, 1989, p 273 et seq; Waldron, J (1993) 13 OJLS 18, pp 49–51; Loughlin, M, Public Law and Political Theory, 1992, Clarendon, esp pp 220–27.

159 The official policy of the Conservative Party was opposed to a Bill of Rights before and at the time of the introduction of the HRA: see Conservative Research Department Brief, Civil Liberties, 1990. See below for full discussion, pp 142–43.

160 See Zander, M, A Bill of Rights?, 1997, Chapter 1; Lord Scarman, English Law – The New Dimension, 1974, Parts II and VII; see also Robertson, G, Freedom, the Individual and the Law, 1993, Chapter 12; Lester, A, 'Fundamental rights: the United Kingdom isolated?' [1984] PL 46; Lord Lester [1995] PL 198, fn 1; Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 1987, pp 329–32.

161 In March 1951.

162 CAB 130/64 xcA034022; for comment, see Lester, A, 'Fundamental rights: the United Kingdom isolated?' [1984] PL 46, pp 50–55.

163 The Labour Government headed by Harold Wilson.

164 In 1968, from Mr Anthony Lester QC. His suggestion was that a Constitutional Council should be set up with powers to preview legislation and advise Parliament of potential conflict with the Bill of Rights.

of Liberal and Liberal Democrat support for it. It is notable that the years of Thatcherism eventually led the main party of opposition to accept the need to receive the Convention into domestic law. The chequered history of the debate which follows suggests two things: first, that there was a general and increasing consensus for some time that the European Convention on Human Rights should be incorporated into domestic law, and that this course should be taken as opposed to enacting a UK Bill of Rights; second, that although support for 'a Bill of Rights' was concentrated in the centrist and centre-left parties, it was not confined to them. The first point is one that should, it is argued, give the Conservative and Labour parties pause in the years from 2007 onwards in the run up to the next General Election: there were cogent reasons why the HRA, incorporating the ECHR, rather than a British Bill of Rights, was introduced.

Conservative opposition to incorporation of the Convention

In 1969, Mr Quintin Hogg MP published a pamphlet, New Charter,[165] in which he stated: 'Parliament has become virtually an elective dictatorship. The party system makes the supremacy of a government like the present, automatic and almost unquestioned.' The solution, he thought, was to make the European Convention on Human Rights enforceable in domestic courts. Mr Hogg was opposition Front Bench Spokesman on Home Affairs and the pamphlet was published by the Conservative Political Centre, but the views were stated to be the author's own and not the Party's. However, in 1970, as Lord Chancellor, he spoke against a Bill of Rights proposed by Lord Arran,[166] although he did not state that he was against all Bills of Rights. In 1975, when Labour was in power, he wrote four letters to The Times advocating a written constitution entrenching individual rights.[167] Also in 1975, Sir Keith Joseph published a pamphlet entitled Freedom under the Law[168] giving his view that a Bill of Rights was needed to curb the power of Parliament.

In August 1976, Sir Michael Havers (Shadow Attorney General) gave an indication that the official view of the Conservative Party was tending towards incorporation of the European Convention when he advocated such a move in a letter to the Daily Mail, and, in a report entitled 'Another Bill of Rights?', the Society of Conservative Lawyers supported this proposition. In 1978, Mr Leon Brittan, opposition Front Bench Spokesman on Devolution, moved an amendment to the Scotland Bill at Committee stage which would have made the European Convention effective in Scotland. The move was opposed by the government on the ground that the question was too important to be decided in such a context, and the amendment was defeated by 251 votes to 227.[169]

When the Conservative Party came to power in 1979, it made no move to incorporate the Convention, despite some backbench interest.[170] In 1980, the government opposed Lord Wade's Bill of Rights Bill in the Commons, as it did Lord Scarman's Bill in 1988, 165 Conservative Political Centre, No 430.

166 House of Lords, Hansard, Vol 313 Col 243, 26 November 1970. Lord Arran had moved the Second Reading of his Bill.

167 In May 1975.

168 Published by Conservative Political Centre.

169 House of Commons, Hansard, Vol 943 Col 580.

170 107 Conservative MPs signed a motion in June 1984 calling for incorporation of the Convention.

which was passed in the Lords, and Sir Edward Gardner's 1989 Bill incorporating the European Convention. An indication of future official Conservative policy was given by Margaret Thatcher in a letter to Bernard Crick[171] on 26 May 1988:

> The government considers that our present Constitutional arrangements continue to serve us well and that the citizen in this country enjoys the greatest degree of liberty that is compatible with the rights of others and the vital interests of the State.

This view was reiterated in 1990[172] and remained the official view of the Conservative Party in the 1997 General Election. In debate on the Human Rights Bill in 1997, however, the Conservative opposition abstained on Second Reading. The Conservative Party website[173] greeted the coming into force of the Human Rights Act by attacking it; William Hague (then the leader of the Conservative Party) stated: 'I believe that to influence our law through our elected representatives is itself a right. It is threatened by this bad law.' The Conservative manifesto for the 2001 General Election did not, however, state that, if elected, a Bill would be introduced to repeal or amend the Human Rights Act. Therefore, although it is clear that if the Conservatives under Major had taken office in 1997 they would not have introduced a measure similar to the Human Rights Bill, they appeared to have accepted, reluctantly, that repeal of the HRA would be controversial and perhaps politically damaging. At the 2005 election, however, amendation of the HRA was a manifesto pledge. Under Duncan-Smith, and then under Cameron, however, they came to favour repeal, and that remains the current stance in the years leading up to the 2009 or 2010 General Election. As indicated above, the plan is to replace the HRA with a 'British Bill of Rights'. As Cameron said in an article in 2007: ". . . under my leadership, we have opposed ID cards and will replace the Human Rights Act with a British Bill of Rights that better protects both our security and our freedom."[174] However, this plan is problematic since Britain would remain bound at the international level by the European Convention.

The Liberals and the Liberal Democrats

The Liberal Party was strongly associated with the movement to introduce a Bill of Rights. The Liberal Peer, Lord Wade, who had in 1969 initiated a four-hour debate in the House of Lords on the question of the protection of human rights, moved a further debate in 1976 in the Lords on a new Bill designed to incorporate the European Convention into UK law. It provided that the Convention would prevail over subsequent legislation unless the legislation specifically provided otherwise. Lord Harris, the Secretary of State at the Home Office, said that the government could not form a view until there had been wide public discussion of the issue. The House gave the Bill an unopposed second reading. When Lord Wade's Bill was debated again in 1977[175] and referred to a Select 171 Founder member of Charter '88.

172 Conservative Research Department Brief, Civil Liberties, 1990.
173 www.conservatives.com.
174 Daily Telegraph, 15 January 2007.
175 House of Lords, Hansard, Vol 379 Col 973.

Committee, the Committee recommended that if a Bill of Rights were enacted, it should be the European Convention, but said that they had not reached agreement on the desirability of enacting such a Bill. Lord Wade moved an amendment, which was carried, to introduce a Bill of Rights to incorporate the Convention. He introduced his Bill again in 1978 and in 1981; each time it passed the Lords and was eventually debated in the Commons in 1981, although no second reading was secured. Lord Scarman, who has been one of the most influential supporters of adoption of a Bill of Rights, made a very significant contribution to the debate in his Hamlyn lecture in 1974 in which he concluded that certain human rights should be rendered inviolate by entrenched laws protected by a Bill of Rights. In 1988, he failed to get a Bill through the Commons – although it passed the Lords – which provided that no Minister, bureaucrat or public body should do any act which infringed the rights set out in the European Convention. In accordance with his long-standing support for the reception of the Convention into domestic law, Lord Scarman spoke in favour of the Human Rights Bill on Second Reading in the House of Lords in 1997.[176] The Liberal Democrats continued to favour adoption of the Convention before, during and after the 1992 and 1997 General Elections.[177]

The change in the Labour position

In a House of Commons Debate on the Bill of Rights question in 1975,[178] Dr Shirley Summerskill, Labour Minister of State at the Home Office, said that the government was not 'committed against a Bill of Rights', but that the question required further consideration. In 1976, the Labour Government published a discussion document which had been prepared by the Human Rights sub-Committee chaired by Mrs Shirley Williams, recommending the adoption of the European Convention on Human Rights into national law. Just before its publication, the Home Secretary, Mr Roy Jenkins, indicated that he was moving in the direction of favouring incorporation,[179] and in 1976, the Attorney General, Mr Sam Silkin, also gave such an indication.[180] That the government was taking this question very seriously was apparent from the composition of the Working Party which drew up the Discussion Document 'Legislation on Human Rights', published by the Home Office in 1976. Senior civil servants from a large number of different departments were involved. The document was intended only to be descriptive and explanatory: no firm conclusion on the issue was reached and official Labour Party policy did not change as a result.

In 1991 and 1992, however, Labour officially opposed adoption of a Bill of Rights on the ground that government reforms would be endangered if power were transferred from government to the judiciary. The then Shadow Home Secretary, Mr Roy Hattersley, disassociated his party from Charter '88. He wrote: 'the only method of restraining the excesses of a bad government is to replace it with a good one.'[181] However, in a speech to the Fabian Society Conference on 6 January 1990, he explained more fully 176 House of Lords, Hansard, Col 1256, 3 November 1997.

177 Partners for Freedom and Justice, Liberal Democrat Federal White Paper No 2 (1989).

178 The motion was put forward by Mr James Kilfedder (Ulster Unionist) House of Commons, Hansard, Vol 894 Col 32, 7 July 1975.

179 In a speech to the Birmingham Law Society on 12 February 1975. In 1976, at a conference organised by the British Institute of Human Rights, he left no doubt that he was in favour of incorporation.

180 In the MacDermott lecture at Queen's University, Belfast.

181 See the Guardian, 12 December 1988.

Labour's proposed alternative method of protecting civil rights: 'The commitment to a series of detailed and specific Acts of Parliament – each one of which establishes rights in a specific area – is a much more practical way of ensuring the freedoms we propose.' This view was encapsulated in the Labour Party Charter of Rights 1990.[182]

However, after Labour lost the General Election of 1992 and Mr Hattersley resigned as Shadow Home Secretary, John Smith, the new leader of the party, announced a change in policy in March 1993 after the Labour Party Conference and committed the party to incorporation of the European Convention using the device of a 'notwithstanding' clause for protection and with a view to the eventual adoption of a home-grown Bill of Rights. When Tony Blair took over the leadership of the party after John Smith's death, he supported the policy of incorporation, as did the new Shadow Home Secretary, Jack Straw.

On 11 January 1994, the Labour MP Mr Graham Allen introduced a Private Members' Bill, the Human Rights No 3 Bill, which proposed incorporation of the European Convention on Human Rights with the First Protocol and the creation of a Human Rights Commission. It embodied many of the previous Labour Party proposals. It received a first reading in the Commons but did not progress to a second reading. In December 1996, the Labour Party issued a Consultation Paper on the matter entitled Bringing Rights Home: Labour's Plans to Incorporate the European Convention on Human Rights into UK Law.[183] The paper proposed incorporation of the Convention with the First Protocol and the creation of a Human Rights Commission; it also promised review of the possibility of ratifying later Protocols. It left it unclear whether such ratification would also imply that later Protocols would subsequently be incorporated into UK domestic law. It also promised that, in future, consideration would be given to the possibility of introducing a tailor made UK Bill of Rights. After the 1997 General Election, the Labour Government committed itself in the Queen's Speech to introducing a Bill incorporating the 'main provisions' of the Convention. The Human Rights Bill, receiving the 'main provisions' of the Convention into domestic law, was introduced into Parliament in October 1997. During the ten years of Labour rule between 1997 and 2007, the Labour Government made no move to amend the HRA in any significant fashion (except in respect of derogations).[184] But as this book demonstrates at various points, the Labour Government does not always seem entirely happy with the HRA that it itself introduced. That was entirely predictable, which is why it was laudable to introduce it. At the present time, Gordon Brown, the current Prime Minister, is showing some interest in introducing a 'British Bill of Rights', which presumably would be based on the HRA.

Central arguments in the debate

Introduction

Broadly, rightists and leftists among academics and politicians tend to be opposed to Bills of Rights. As indicated in Chapter 1, certain groups on the left, in the UK and abroad, tend to view civil rights with hostility. Under the theory put forward by a number 182 The Charter of Rights: Guaranteeing Individual Liberty in a Free Society, Labour Party document, 1990.

183 Straw, J and Boateng, P, A Consultation Paper, 1997.

184 Chapter 14, p 1424 et seq.

of writers on the left, such instruments merely focus progressive attention on 'negative rights' which foster only formal equality since in practice, they may be used by the powerful to consolidate their power over the weak.[185] At the same time, this theory finds that such attention is directed away from 'positive rights' which would lead to substantive equality through the redistribution of economic resources.[186] The liberal view has been indicated in Chapter 1; it is generally sympathetic to the notion of civil rights,[187] and is now supportive of the HRA. The remarkable increase pre-HRA in liberal and centre-left support prior to 1997 for adoption of a UK 'Bill of Rights'[188] was – at least in part – attributable to the fact that one party was in power for 18 years and, in particular, to the effect on civil liberties of the Thatcher and Major Governments.

The 'Bill of Rights' debate will be considered here as a background to the discussion of the HRA itself, which follows. Clearly, the debate has now moved on; it is concerned less with the merits of receiving the Convention into domestic law, than with the response of public authorities, particularly the judiciary, to it. However, consideration of a key argument against reception of the Convention – the argument from democracy – is illustrative of the choices that were made when framing the HRA. The further questions as to the role of the HRA in providing improved protection for civil liberties and human rights concern the nature, status and enforcement of the Convention, and these questions are addressed in Chapter 4.

In the mid-1990s, there was a consensus among most academic commentators that the traditional methods of providing protection for civil liberties were insufficiently effective, but no clear agreement as to the means which should be adopted in order to provide further protection. A degree of suspicion and distrust was often aroused at the notion of effecting such protection by means of a Bill of Rights which may have found its roots in the traditional view that Bills of Rights are high-sounding documents which are ineffective in practice, but dangerous because they create complacency as to liberty and that, moreover, they are the marks of a primitive, undeveloped legal system. In 1776, Bentham described declarations of rights as merely so much 'bawling upon paper'. Dicey wrote that there is 'in the English constitution an absence of those declarations or definitions of rights so dear to foreign constitutionalists', but that this was a strength rather than a weakness because such rights may be constantly suspended, whereas the suspension of the English Constitution 'would mean with us nothing less than a revolution'. Lord Hailsham has said: 'show me a nation with a Bill of Rights and I will show you a nation with fewer actual human rights than Britain because the escape clauses are used, often quite ruthlessly.'[189] It has also been suggested that the notion of liberty and of the need to protect it must emanate from a source outside the Bill of Rights; Judge Learned Hand has written: 'Liberty lies in the hearts and minds of men and women; when it dies there no constitution, no law, no court can save it.'

185 See further McColgan, A, Women under the Law: The False Promise of Human Rights, 2000, Pearson.

186 See Tushnet, M, 'An essay on rights' (1984) 62 Texas L Rev 1363; Herman, D, 'Beyond the rights debate' (1993) 2 Social and Legal Studies 25.

187 This is not intended to imply that all liberals support the adoption of a Bill of Rights in the UK; as discussed below, a number of liberals are reluctant to trust the judges to give full weight to its provisions. For an attack on such adoption from a liberal point of view see Allan, J, 'Bills of Rights and judicial power – a Liberal's quandary' 16(2) OJLS 337–52.

188 For a full account, see Zander, M, A Bill of Rights?, 1997, Chapter 1.

189 House of Lords, Hansard, Vol 369 Cols 784–85.

Pre-HRA, the argument that Bills of Rights per se are ineffective or actually inimical to the protection of liberty, tended to give way to the argument that although some independent restraint on the excess or abuse of power was needed, it would be dangerous or pointless to enact a Bill of Rights because it would not be wise to trust UK judges with such a significant power:[190] they would invoke the exceptions in order to interpret it in an executive-minded manner, thus perhaps emasculating the freedoms it was supposed to protect. Commentators such as Lee, Ewing and Gearty argued that it would be dangerous to trust to a Bill of Rights and that there was too great a tendency to regard one as a panacea for all that was wrong with civil liberties in the UK.[191] Ewing and Gearty considered that genuine constraints on the power of the Prime Minister were needed and that a Bill of Rights would merely amount to a cosmetic change. It was further argued that whether or not UK judges could be trusted with a Bill of Rights, the whole notion of endowing an unelected group with a considerable area of power removed from the reach of the legislature is incompatible with democratic theory.[192] Allan, for example, argued that '[entrenched] Bills of Rights are singularly undemocratic'.[193]

Ceding power to unelected judges

Whether or not it is acceptable in a democracy that unelected judges should wield the power of a Bill of Rights partly depends on its authority and the availability of review of legislation. The most contentious possibility arises when, as in the US, judges are empowered to strike down legislation in conflict with the Bill of Rights, which is also given a higher authority than other statutes by being entrenched, so that no possibility of correction of judicial decisions by subsequent legislation arises, except in so far as provided for by the method of entrenchment. The argument from democracy has the greatest force only if a Bill of Rights can prevail over subsequent inconsistent legislation. It obviously has much less force if a form of Parliamentary override clause prevents it from so doing. This is the case in Canada where the Charter of Rights is protected by a so called 'notwithstanding clause' – subsequent legislation can only override it if the intention to do so is clearly stated in the legislation. The perpetrators of the argument against trusting the judges did not always make clear whether they opposed both of these possibilities or only the first. It is obviously a crucial distinction as, in the second, Parliament clearly still retains ultimate power over the law. Introduction of a notwithstanding clause merely requires candour if rights are to be interfered with, which, as Dworkin has commented, 'is hardly incompatible with democracy'.[194]

However, the argument that a fully entrenched Bill of Rights would be incompatible with democracy should not be too readily conceded. Such an argument seems to proceed from the premise that any restriction upon the freedom of legislative bodies

190 Eg, Ewing, KD and Gearty, CA, Freedom under Thatcher, 1989, pp 262–75; Lord McCluskey (the Solicitor General for Scotland under the Wilson Labour government) in his 1986 Reith Lectures, Lecture 5.

191 Lee, Judging Judges, p 166; Ewing and Gearty, ibid p 275.

192 Waldron, J, 'A rights-based critique of constitutional rights' (1993) 13 OJLS 18.

193 'Bills of rights and judicial power – a Liberal's quandary' [1996] 16(2) OJLS 337–52.

194 Dworkin, R, op. cit., fn 1.

– even those designed to protect fundamental rights – is undemocratic. A true partisan of democracy ought also to be opposed to UK membership of all international human rights treaties, since the basic premise of all of these is that certain rights of citizens should be placed beyond the power of the majority to infringe them. The contrary notion, that there should be no limits on the power of the majority, can be defended only by reference to a rather crude form of preference utilitarianism[195] and arguably amounts to an impoverished conception of democracy. Such a conception could provide no reason why, for example, the majority should not authorise the internment, torture and summary execution of all terrorist suspects if it was clear that this would end terrorist attacks and thus immeasurably benefit the mass of the people. Those who insist that Parliament's power should be untrammeled presumably do not think that it should use its powers in this way and their conviction that it should not do so can only be justified by a belief that there must be limits on what the majority can inflict on even profoundly anti-social individuals and minorities. Thus, it may be assumed that there is general acceptance of this fundamental conviction which lies behind every Bill of Rights. Those who remain opposed to entrenched rights usually profess not to be hostile to the idea of human rights per se, but to be concerned with other issues.

Thus, one respected commentator, Jeremy Waldron, in setting out what could be termed the 'argument from controversy',[196] was concerned not so much that the majority should have unlimited power, but that any particular formulation of rights would inevitably be controversial and that entrenching it would amount to a permanent disabling of those who hold a contrary view about which rights should be protected. Thus, he asked rhetorically: 'Are the formulations of one generation to be cast in stone and given precedence over all subsequent revisions?' Three objections to this position are apparent. First, to characterise a Bill of Rights as setting formulations 'in stone' seems to exhibit a failure to take cognizance of the immense diversity of interpretations which can be extracted from a broadly worded document such as the European Convention,[197] and the way in which such interpretations can develop to reflect changes in popular attitudes.[198] The fact that one document – the American Constitution – has been found 195 See Chapter 1, pp 8–9 for discussion of utilitarianism.

196 This term is used because the fact of controversy as to the favoured list of rights lies at the heart of Waldron's argument against entrenched rights. 'A rights-based critique of constitutional rights' (1993) 13 OJLS 18.

197 Waldron's objections seem all the more strange in that prima facie they do not seem to take account of those adjudicatory theories which explain the vital part that both the judges' moral and political convictions and the mass of shared assumptions and understanding in a particular society play in the interpretation of texts. (For an extremely lucid and accessible exposition of the above point, see Simmonds, N, 'Between positivism and idealism' [1991] CLJ 308.) However, Waldron does mention such theories in several places (e.g. pp 41–43) where he states that his objection is not so much that judges should be able to interpret and modify citizens' rights, but that democratic institutions should be disabled from doing so. But once Waldron has conceded the point that judges can radically amend the meaning of texts, his point about setting rights in stone is lost. The reason why democratic institutions should be disabled from interference with some fundamental rights is discussed in the text below: pp 149–51.

198 It is indeed arguable that judges can more readily respond to marked changes in the moral climate than politicians. e.g., the judiciary, in response to a growing consensus that the marital rape exemption was indefensible, abolished the immunity of husbands at a time when there were no indications that Parliament was prepared to make time for legislation (R [1991] 4 All ER 481).

at different times to support both black slavery and positive discrimination in favour of black people provides clear evidence to support this argument.

The second objection is that the 'controversy' thesis determinedly ignores the reasonable degree of consensus that exists around many basic rights. For example, when discussing the possibility of protecting the right to participate in democracy, Waldron argues that democratic procedures themselves cannot be entrenched, because 'People disagree about how participatory rights should be understood . . .'. Noticeably, however, he fails to mention the near-complete agreement on the fundamental right of universal adult suffrage. This point leads on to the third objection to the 'controversy' thesis, namely that, paradoxically enough, its own implications are contrary to democracy.[199] The refusal to disable the majority by entrenchment of rights includes, as just noted, a refusal to entrench democracy itself. This refusal in effect means that Waldron will not deny the right of the majority of the day to destroy democracy by disenfranchising a group such as all non-whites or even voting democracy itself out of existence, thereby denying it to future generations. Since, by contrast, a Bill of Rights is ultimately concerned with preserving a worthwhile democracy for the future, it can be persuasively argued that entrenched basic rights show more respect for democratic principles than do the advocates of retaining the untrammeled power of the majority of the day.[200] Entrenchment of the Convention under the HRA was not contemplated by the Labour Government and would probably be possible in the UK system only by means of a written constitution. Such a task would almost certainly not be undertaken without a referendum; if the people considered such a settlement desirable, they would in effect be expressing their will to be ruled by an unelected body within certain defined areas as the price of curbing elected power.

The argument against endowing the judges with power under an entrenched Bill of Rights should also be considered in the light of the experience of America. The most striking feature of the American system is the power of the Supreme Court to render inoperative acts of the elected representatives of the people (first asserted in Marbury v Madison).[201] This power seems alien to UK jurists, but the justification offered for it is that the legitimacy of judicial review of legislation derives not from electoral accountability, but from the particular positions of the judges within the constitution. The classic statement of this theory is that of Alexander Hamilton in Federalist #78:

> The executive not only dispenses the honours but holds the sword of the community. The legislature not only commands the purse but prescribes the rules by which the 199 A further paradox in Waldron's argument, the existence of which he concedes (p 46), is that if the majority vote in a referendum for an entrenched Bill of Rights they must, on his argument, be allowed to have one. Clearly, the only way to prevent the majority from entrenching a Bill of Rights would be to have an entrenched law forbidding the entrenchment of laws. This would obviously be impossible on its own terms. Since, as Dworkin notes (op. cit., fn 1, pp 36–37), opinion polls reveal that more than 71% of the population favour an entrenched Bill of Rights, Waldron's argument appears to be self-defeating.

200 Such a view is of course endorsed by a number of legal philosophers and civil libertarians. See Dworkin, op. cit., fn 1; the view also clearly underpins his general political philosophy: see, e.g., 'Liberalism', in A Matter of Principle, 1985. See also Hart, HLA, Law, Liberty and Morality, 1963 and Lester, Democracy and Individual Rights 1968.

201 (1803) 5 US (1 Cranch) 137.

> duties and rights of every citizen are to be regulated. The judiciary, on the contrary, has no influence over either the sword or the purse; no direction either of the strength or of the wealth of society. [Thus it will be] the least dangerous to the political rights of the Constitution.[202]

It could also be noted in this context that the UK has a constitutional precedent in the shape of the House of Lords for allowing an unelected body to influence legislation. The notion was not therefore entirely foreign to the UK system. Of course, this is not a complete analogy: the House of Lords has a much more limited role in this respect than judges under an entrenched Bill of Rights would have had.

If a Bill of Rights is unentrenched, as in Canada, the argument from democracy loses some of its cogency but fastens instead on the question of policy making under the Bill of Rights. A Bill of Rights would inevitably contain open-textured provisions which would have to be interpreted and that interpretation would often involve political choices. An obvious example is the choice before the European Court in the Young, James and Webster case[203] concerning the question of the closed shop. Ought judges – although finally subject to Parliament under an unentrenched Bill of Rights – be given a much broader policy-making role or ought politicians to be the sole arbiters of such questions? Clearly, many questions which would have to be determined by the judges in applying the provisions of a Bill of Rights would lie rather in the moral than the political arena because civil rights are rights claimed against public authorities,[204] not against particular political parties. Nevertheless, it has been argued by such opponents of a Bill of Rights as Lord McCluskey that an Act of Parliament, arrived at after full consideration of the issues involved and the likely effects and covering specific areas, is a better way to protect, for example, the right to privacy than a Bill of Rights containing a provision such as 'Everyone has the right to privacy' followed by certain exceptions.

It was argued by the Labour Party in 1990[205] that rather than introducing a Bill of Rights, more certain protection would be assured by creating a number of statutes, each of which would cover one area of civil liberties. However, the introduction of such protection by this means would have been time-consuming and might therefore have been unlikely to find a place in a legislative programme mainly concerned with social and economic issues. The lack of legislation passed over the 18 years of the Conservative Governments from 1989 to 1997 with the sole or main intention of protecting a particular liberty supported this argument. The legislation that was passed – the Contempt of Court Act 1981; the Equal Pay (Amendment) Regulations; the Data Protection Act 1984 – was Europe-driven.[206] There was clearly a lack of legislation 202 Mentor (ed), The Federalist Papers, 1961, Muller, pp 464, 465. See also Bickel, AM, The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics, 1962, Irvington.

203 Eur Court HR, A 44, Judgment of 13 August 1981; (1981) 4 EHRR 38.

204 Or against private individuals where a public authority bears some responsibility for failure to protect a right. See the discussion of Drittwirkung in Chapter 2, p 29.

205 See The Charter of Rights: Guaranteeing Individual Liberty in a Free Society, Labour Party document, 1990.

206 The Contempt of Court Act 1981 was passed in response to the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in Sunday Times, Judgment of 26 April 1979, A 30; (1979) 2 EHRR 245. The Data Protection Act derived from the Convention for the Protection of Individuals with regard to the passed to protect civil liberties which was enacted without such coercion; in particular, the UK, unlike other jurisdictions, has failed so far to enact a Privacy Act. If the party of government tends to abjure its policy-making role in these areas, it may be argued that the only alternative is enactment of a Bill of Rights which largely hands such a role to the judges. Even assuming that Parliament is prepared to legislate in these areas, it can still be argued that a Bill of Rights is of value as providing a remedy which is more flexible and comprehensive than a statute and which can adapt to changing social conditions more readily. Moreover, specific pieces of legislation can have the protection they offer to liberties eroded by subsequent legislation through the operation of the doctrine of implied repeal; the protection gained is therefore more precarious than that offered by a Bill of Rights enjoying greater constitutional protection, even if only due to a convention of respect for it.

Readiness of the domestic judiciary to use rights-based reasoning

It was also argued that the judges had already shown how they would acquit themselves under a Bill of Rights and that the results were not promising.[207] For example, the Privy Council, in considering questions arising from Commonwealth Bills of Rights, sometimes gave certain guarantees of rights a very restrictive interpretation. In AG v Antigua Times Ltd,[208] the Privy Council found that a constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech was not infringed by Antiguan legislation requiring a licence from the Cabinet and a large deposit as a surety against libel in order to publish a newspaper. However, in later decisions the Privy Council appeared to adopt a more liberal approach. In Guerra v Baptiste,[209] the Privy Council had to consider delay in carrying out an execution. Guerra was convicted of murder in the Republic of Trinidad and Tobago and sentenced to death. In 1989, he appealed against his sentence, but the appeal was not heard until October 1993. The Privy Council took into account the decision in Pratt v AG for Jamaica[210] in which it was found that where a state wishes to retain capital punishment, it must accept the responsibility of ensuring that execution follows as swiftly as possible after sentence, allowing a reasonable time for appeal and consideration of reprieve. If the appeal procedure allows the prisoner to prolong appellate proceedings over a period of years, the fault lies with the appeal procedure, not with the prisoner. In Pratt, it was found that a reasonable target would be to complete the hearings within approximately one year and to carry out the sentence of death within two years. In the present instance there had been substantial delay amounting to nearly five years between sentence and the point at which the sentence was to be carried out. The fact that problems were created by the shortage of court resources did not justify the delay. Such problems had also been a factor in the Pratt case. It was, therefore, found that the sentence must be commuted to one of life imprisonment. This decision and that in Automatic Processing of Data (17 September 1980) and the Equal Pay (Amendment) Regulations from the Council Directive (75/117/EEC) of 10 February 1975.

207 Ewing, KD and Gearty, CA, Freedom under Thatcher, 1989, p 274.

208 [1976] AC 16.

209 (1995) The Times, 8 November.

210 [1993] 3 WLR 995. Bailey, SH, Harris, DJ and Jones, BL, (Civil Liberties: Cases and Materials, 4th edn, 1995) comment that this decision would not be open to the usual criticism that traditional methods of interpretation would be used in determinations under a Bill of Rights (p 18).

Pratt suggested that UK judges were quite capable of adopting a generous approach to a Bill of Rights.[211] Thus, there was some basis for the argument that the judges would take decisions applying the Convention under the HRA which would not emasculate it owing to adoption of a narrow and technical approach.

As indicated above, however, certain decisions of UK judges applying the Convention could be criticised as adopting traditional, limiting methods of interpretation. In Brind (in the Court of Appeal) and in AG v Guardian Newspapers,[212] judges applied the principles of the European Convention and then proceeded to uphold the restrictions in question. On the other hand, as discussed above, in Derbyshire CC[213] the Court of Appeal relied on Art 10 to produce a result protective of freedom of expression. The decisions in Ex p Witham[214] and Ex p Simms,[215] considered above, relied on fundamental human rights standards in, it is suggested, a creative and dynamic fashion.

Moreover, where an international treaty has been incorporated into domestic law, the English courts showed a willingness to adopt a broad teleological approach. In The Hollandia (concerning provisions of the Hague-Visby Rules, which have been incorporated into UK law) Lord Diplock said that such provisions 'should be given a purposive rather than a narrow literalistic construction, particularly wherever the adoption of a literalistic construction would enable the stated purpose of the international Convention . . . to be evaded . . .'[216] It should also be noted that UK judges adapted remarkably quickly to the demands of EU law as it affected fundamental rights and were prepared to take decisions and make pronouncements upholding such rights which were probably unthinkable when the European Communities Act 1972 was passed.[217] Lester made a forceful point in support of this proposition in his comments on the way that the courts dealt with the task of applying broadly worded EU directives on sex discrimination, provisions which a legal traditionalist would term 'so vague and woolly that they might mean almost anything'. He considered that: 'English judges have interpreted and applied these general principles in a manner which recognises their fundamental nature and which gives full effect to their underlying aims,' and from this he concluded that: 'Those sceptics who doubt the ability of British judges to protect the fundamental rights of the [European] Convention should consider their impressive record in translating the fundamental rights of Community law into practical reality.'[218]

Possible models for the protection of the Convention

As indicated above, the constitutional status of Bills or Charters of Rights varies from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. Such instruments may have no special status or they may be afforded (or may acquire) some special protection from express or implied repeal 211 Roberts considers that a purposive approach has continued to be evident in interpretations of Bills of Rights from Commonwealth jurisdictions: 'The Law Lords and human rights: the experience of the Privy Council in interpreting Bills of Rights' [2000] EHRLR 147.

212 [1987] 3 All ER 316. See also the Brind case [1991] 1 AC 696.

213 [1992] 3 WLR 28; see further above, p 114; HL ruling: [1993] 1 All ER 1011.

214 [1998] QB 575.

215 [1999] 3 All ER 400.

216 [1983] 1 AC 565, p 572.

217 Eg, Secretary of State for Employment ex p EOC [1994] 2 WLR 409, HL.

218 Lester, 'Fundamental rights' [1984] PL 70–71.

which may, at its highest, involve their entrenchment.[219] Thus, a variety of models was available to choose from in considering the model to be used in order to protect the Convention. The choice arrived at, which is discussed in Chapter 4, was extremely significant, in terms of the allocation of power between the judiciary, Parliament and the government.

The terms 'entrenchment' and 'protection' which will be used below require explanation because both may encompass a number of possibilities. 'Protection' will be used to refer to any means of giving a statute a special status without seeking to entrench it in any sense of that word. 'Entrenchment' refers to requirements of form or manner or restrictions as to substance. A requirement of form denotes the need to use a particular form of words if a subsequent enactment is to repeal a former one, rather than simply allowing the normal rules of implied repeal to operate. A requirement of manner refers to the manner in which legislation is passed if it is to repeal a previous enactment. Examples of such a requirement would include the use of a two-thirds majority in the Parliamentary body if a particular piece of legislation is to be repealed or amended. A restriction as to substance refers to the most stringent form of entrenchment: no method of repealing the legislation in question is provided in it. Parts of the German Basic Law are entrenched in this manner and, therefore, they can never be amended or repealed unless a break with the existing legal order occurs in Germany.

Thus, a requirement of 'form' may be termed weak entrenchment since it is the weakest possible form of entrenchment available. A requirement of manner may be referred to as semi or partial entrenchment, while a restriction as to substance may be referred to as full entrenchment. Bearing this in mind, it may be found that s 2(4) of the European Communities Act 1972 has been treated as imposing a requirement of form and possibly of manner. Unless Parliament declares in an Act of Parliament that it intends to override Community law, such law will prevail over subsequent inconsistent domestic legislation. However, since no means of overriding Community law is provided for in the 1972 Act, it may even be the case that if Parliament made such a declaration, the courts would not give effect to it. In that case, there would be no means of escaping from the impact of Community law except by withdrawing from the EU.

The most common requirements of manner – such as, that legislation repealing the Bill of Rights will not be valid unless passed by a 75 per cent majority – are incompatible with democracy if that concept is understood to connote simple majoritarianism. A Bill of Rights protected in this manner could be preserved against the wishes of the majority of the elected representatives in the legislature, so long as that majority was less than 75 per cent. A restriction as to substance is most obviously incompatible with democracy, unless one takes the view, which is based on a different argument,[220] that full entrenchment of Bills of Rights, or at least certain fundamental provisions in them, is essential in order to maintain a healthy democracy.

In many jurisdictions, Bills of Rights are afforded a higher status than other legislation. Owing to the operation of the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty, this possibility would be constitutionally controversial in the UK. However, the status of 219 See Jaconelli, J, Enacting a Bill of Rights, 1980, for a full discussion of this issue.

220 See above, p 148.

EU law in the UK provided a precedent for adopting the course of partially entrenching the Convention. Section 2(4) of the European Communities Act 1972 provides: 'any enactment passed or to be passed . . . shall be construed and have effect subject to the foregoing provisions of this section . . .'. 'The foregoing' are those provisions referred to in s 2(1) giving the force of law to 'the enforceable Community rights' there defined. The words 'subject to' suggest that the courts must allow Community law to prevail over a subsequent Act of Parliament. This does not, of course, mean that the European Communities Act itself cannot be repealed. It may follow that Parliament has partially entrenched s 2(1) of the European Communities Act by means of s 2(4) imposing a requirement of form (express words) on future legislation designed to override Community law. In Secretary of State for Transport ex p Factortame[221] in the Court of Appeal, Bingham LJ said that where the law of the Community is clear:

> . . . whether as a result of a ruling given on an Article 177 reference or as a result of previous jurisprudence or on a straightforward interpretation of Community instruments, the duty of the national court is to give effect to it in all circumstances . . . To that extent a UK statute is not as inviolable as it once was.

This finding was confirmed in the House of Lords.[222]

There was also the possibility of using a so-called 'notwithstanding' clause. The Human Rights No 3 Bill introduced by the Labour MP Mr Graham Allen in January 1994 would have adopted this method of protection for the Bill of Rights. The civil rights group Liberty gave support to this possibility,[223] as did some other commentators at the time.[224] Based on the model of the Canadian Charter, the clause would state that subsequent legislation would only override the Convention if the intention of doing so were expressly stated in such legislation. Under a 'notwithstanding' clause, the judiciary would not be required to strike down legislation without a mandate from the democratically elected government. If that government did not include the clause in any legislative provision which subsequently was found to infringe the Convention, the government could impliedly be taken to be mandating the judiciary, by its omission, to strike down the offending legislation. Thus, although under such a model the judiciary are required to disapply provisions in Acts of Parliament, a role which the domestic judiciary might find constitutionally problematic, they are not required to act against the wishes of the democratically elected government. Dworkin has observed, in relation to such a clause, that: 'In practice this technically weaker version of incorporation would probably provide almost as much protection as [formal entrenchment].'[225] However, this model accepts the possibility which clearly arises that future governments might come to use the clause more frequently. A government might be uncertain whether a 221 [1989] 2 CMLR 353.

222 [1989] 2 WLR 997.

223 See Klug, F and Wadham, J [1993] PL 579.

224 See, e.g., Dworkin, A Bill of Rights for Britain, pp 24–29. The Labour Party supported this position at its conference in 1993, but had changed its position by 1996, as its 1996 consultative document reveals.

225 Dworkin, R, op. cit., fn 1.

particular measure would be in breach of the rights, but decide that a 'notwithstanding' clause should be used on insurance grounds. It is possible that use of such a clause might prove ultimately to be quite an ineffective protective device.

More effective protection for constitutional rights can be achieved by full entrenchment. Constitutions throughout the world adopt a number of different forms of entrenchment of codes of rights. The constitution of the US can be amended only by a proposal which has been agreed by two-thirds of each House of Congress or by a convention summoned by Congress at the request of two-thirds of the states. The proposed amendment must then be ratified by three-quarters of the states' legislatures. The amendment procedure itself – Art V of the Constitution – can be amended only by the same method. It was generally thought that if a Bill of Rights had been introduced containing a provision that it could not be repealed except in accordance with some such procedure, the courts would not have given effect to it. Parliament might have legislated expressly contrary to it and the possibility of unwitting implied repeal would have remained. If it had been found that a later provision would not admit of a construction in accordance with its guarantees, it was thought that judges would probably apply the later provision, thereby repealing the right in question to the extent of its inconsistency. Authority for this can be found in the dicta of Maughan LJ in Ellen Street Estates Ltd v Minister of Health[226] to the effect that Parliament cannot bind itself as to the form of future enactments.

However, De Smith suggests that Parliament could redefine itself so as to preclude itself as ordinarily constituted from legislating on a certain matter. The argument is based on the redefinition of Parliament under the Parliament Acts: if Parliament can make it easier for itself to legislate on certain matters, it could equally make it harder, thereby entrenching certain legislation. This analogy has, however, come under attack from Munro[227] on the ground that the Parliament Act procedure introduces no limitation on parliamentary sovereignty. The analogy of EC law would arguably support De Smith's proposition and authority is also available from other constitutions; in AG for New South Wales v Trethowan,[228] the Privy Council upheld the requirement of a referendum before a Bill to abolish the upper House could be presented for the royal assent. Although, as De Smith argues, this decision may be of limited application as involving a non-sovereign legislature, it does suggest that a class of legislation exists for which it may be appropriate to delineate the manner and form of any subsequent amendment or repeal. The South African case of Harris v Minister of the Interior[229] is to similar effect. Dicey has argued that the Bill of Rights could be entrenched within a written constitution since it would be untenable to espouse 'the strange dogma, sometimes put forward, that a sovereign power such as the Parliament of the United Kingdom, can never by its own act divest itself of authority'.[230] The point cannot be regarded as settled.

226 [1934] 1 KB 590, p 597.
227 Munro, C, Studies in Constitutional Law, 1999, Butterworths.
228 [1932] AC 526.
229 (1952) (2) SA 428.
230 Dicey, AV, An Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution, 10th edn, 1987, p 68.

Thus, a proposal of the Labour Government that the Convention should be fully entrenched would have been constitutionally controversial and – possibly – impossible without a written constitution. However, the government did not put forward such a proposal and there was by no means agreement between supporters of the domestic incorporation of the Convention that it would have been desirable.

4 Conclusions

At the present time, it is Conservative party policy to repeal the Human Rights Act and replace it with a 'British Bill of Rights' It is possible that the Labour party, as part of its change of direction under Gordon Brown, may also espouse the idea of a 'British Bill of Rights'[231] as opposed to the HRA. The discussion in this chapter as to entrenchment of a Bill of Rights and the options before Parliament in introducing the HRA currently have pertinence, not only in relation to the background to the HRA, but also to the current Bill of Rights possibility. The problem that the HRA faces in terms of its image in the popular consciousness is two-fold. It was never really 'sold' to the people of the UK in 1998. Further, it is perceived as a European instrument, as something imposed from outside, and as associated with the EU and over-regulation. A 'British Bill of Rights' could fulfil the role played currently by the HRA, and could be based on it and on the European Convention, but could be sold to the British public as an instrument based more firmly on core British values. So long as the Bill of Rights did not deliver less than the Convention in terms of rights, it would still satisfy the goal of allowing British people to rely on the Convention rights in domestic courts. But it might also hold out the possibility of dealing with some of the gaps and inadequacies inherent in the HRA, which are explored in Chapter 2. They include the narrow definition of 'public function' that has been adopted[232] under s6HRA, the problems created by the doctrine of indirect horizontal effect and the inadequacies of the Convention itself.

Chapter 4 considers the model of protection that was chosen for the Convention, in the Human Rights Act.

231 Gordon Brown said in his inaugural speech as Prime Minister (on 24.6.07): "I want a new constitutional settlement for Britain. And the principles of my reforms are these . . . civil liberties safeguarded and enhanced . . .".

232 See Chapter 4, pp 223–29. This approach was confirmed by the House of Lords in YL v Birmingham City Council [2007] UKHL 27.

Chapter 4

The Human Rights Act

1 Introduction[1]

The Labour Government came to power in 1997 with a manifesto that promised a radical programme of constitutional change and, most significantly, the introduction of the Human Rights Act 1998 as the means of receiving the European Convention on Human Rights into domestic law, nearly 50 years after it was signed. Finally, rights were, in the government's words, to be 'brought home'.[2] It would not be too much of an exaggeration to say that the advent of the HRA appeared at the time to herald a new dawn for civil liberties. Relief seemed to be at hand, after many years of seeing the country condemned at Strasbourg and elsewhere, during the Conservative years, for its human rights' record. Ronald Dworkin said, famously, of the Thatcher years,

1 Texts referred to below and background: Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, The Law of Human Rights, 2nd edn, 2006; Singh and Hunt, Assessing the Impact of the Human Rights Act, (2003), Hart; Jowell and Cooper (eds), Delivering Rights? How the HRA is working and for whom, 2003, Hart; Fenwick, Masterman, Phillipson (eds), Judicial Reasoning under the HRA, 2007, CUP; Hoffman and Rowe, Human Rights in the UK, 2006, Longman; Pannick, D and Lester of Herne Hill QC, Lord, Human Rights Law and Practice, 2nd edn, 2004, Butterworths; Gearty, C, Principles of Human Rights Adjudication, 2004, OUP; Wadham, J and Mountfield, H, The Human Rights Act, 1999, Blackstone (useful guide); Smith, R, Textbook on International Human Rights, 2nd edn, 2005, OUP; Steiner & Alston, International Human Rights in Context: Law, Politics, Morals, 2nd edn, 2000, OUP; Hunt, M, Using Human Rights Law in English Courts, 1997; Singh, R and Hunt, M, A Practitioner's Guide to the Impact of the Human Rights Act, 1999; Grosz, Beatson and Duffy, Human Rights: The 1998 Act and the European Convention, 2000, Sweet and Maxwell; Fenwick, H, Civil Rights: New Labour, Freedom and the Human Rights Act, 2000, Chapter 2; Clements and Thomas (eds), The HRA: A Success Story? 2005, Blackwell; Irvine, Lord, 'The impact of The Human Rights Act: Parliament, The Courts and The Executive' (2003) Public Law, Sum, 308–25; Klug, F, 'Judicial Deference Under the Human Rights Act 1998' (2003) EHRLR 2, 125–33; Klug F, 'Standing Back From The Human Rights Act: How Effective is it Five Years On' (2005) Public Law, Win, 716–28; Lester of Herne Hill, Lord 'The Human Rights Act – five years on' [2004] EHLR 259; Steyn, Lord, 'Deference: A Tangled Story' (2005) Public Law 346; Kavanagh, A, 'Statutory interpretation and human rights after Anderson: a more contextual approach' [2004] PL 537; Steyn, Lord, '2000–2005: Laying The Foundations Of Human Rights Law In The United Kingdom (2005) EHRLR, 4, 349–62; Sunkin, M, 'Pushing Forward the Frontiers of Human Rights Protection: the meaning of public authority under the HRA' [2004] PL 643; Leigh, I, 'Taking Rights Proportionately, Judicial Review, the HRA and Strasbourg' [2002] PL 265; Klug, F and Starmer, K [2001] PL 654; McGoldrick, D, 'The HRA in theory and practice' (2001) 50(4) ICLQ 901.

2 See: Bringing Rights Home: Labour's plans to incorporate the ECHR into UK Law: A consultation Paper, December 1996 (1997) and the White Paper: Rights Brought Home, October 1997 Cm 3782; see also Straw, J and Boateng, P (1997) 1 EHRR 71.

'Liberty is ill in Britain'.[3] Ewing and Gearty wrote in 1989: 'It should now be clear that civil liberties in Britain are in a state of crisis'.[4] There were expectations that the HRA would prove to be something akin to a panacea for all that was wrong with fundamental freedoms in Britain or, at the least, commentators perceived that civil liberties had been re-energised. With the creation of positive rights, there was a sense of a break with the erosions of liberty of the Conservative years.[5]

Under the Diceyan model of the constitution, discussed in Chapter 3, civil liberties are protected by individual judicial decisions; a document termed a Bill or Charter of Rights is both unnecessary and undesirable as a means of protecting them.[6] Under this model, citizens in a state in which everyone is free to do all which the law does not forbid, enjoy, Dicey argued, greater liberty than those whose liberty is protected by such a document because, by being delineated, rights would be more limited. The Diceyan model underpinned the view expressed in the post-war years that a constitution embodying a presumption of liberty provided a protection for rights that could not be achieved by basing them on a constitutional document such as a Bill of Rights. From the perspective of the post-war, pre-1979 era, there appeared to be some basis for that view. Although it would be problematic to argue that there was ever a 'golden age' of civil liberties in Britain,[7] the post-war years appeared to a number of commentators to come closer to one than the Thatcher and Major years,[8] in comparison with the records in other European countries.

It has been argued that there was a post-war understanding as to the use of Parliamentary power in British politics until the Thatcher Government 'dismantled much of the consensus'.[9] 'Old Tory statecraft based on patriotism, social cohesion, Union and Empire disintegrated in the face of . . . alternative visions of post-Imperial Conservative nationhood . . . . Enoch Powell's free economy . . . prevailed as the basis of Thatcherite strategy'.[10] Under this view of the consensus, high Tory values underpinned respect for political freedoms, but under Conservative rule since 1979 liberty suffered and Britain began to lag behind many other democracies in respect of her human rights' record. The Thatcher Government was said to have demonstrated a 'mundane

3 Dworkin, R, Index on Censorship, 1988, pp 7–8.

4 Freedom under Thatcher, 1989, p 255.

5 See Cooke 'The British Embracement of Human Rights' [1999] EHRLR 243; Feldman, D, 'The Human Rights Act and Constitutional Principles' 1999) 19 (2) LS 165.

6 Dicey, AV, The Law of the Constitution, 8th edn, 1959.

7 Ewing and Gearty argue that there is a misconception that the first half of the twentieth century constituted such an age in The Struggle for Civil Liberties: Political Freedom and the Rule of Law in Britain 1914–1945, 1999.

8 See Thornton, P, Decade of Decline: Civil Liberties in the Thatcher Years (1989). Ewing and Gearty, writing in 1989 found: 'In recent years there has been a marked decline in the level of political freedom enjoyed in Britain'. They found that the turning point and beginning of the decline might be said to have occurred in the 1970s but that 'the process of erosion became more pronounced' after the Conservative election victory in 1979 (Preface to Freedom under Thatcher 1989, OUP).

9 Fraser, D, 'Post-War Consensus: A debate not long enough' [2000] 53(2) Parliamentary Affairs 347.

10 Baker, D, in [2000] 6(2) Party Politics 250, commenting on Lynch, D, The Politics of Nationhood, Sovereignty, Britishness and Conservative Politics (1999).

and corrupting insensitivity to liberty'.[11] Although the Major Government showed in certain respects a greater awareness of the value of individual rights,[12] in its central criminal justice Act, the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, it demonstrated, as Chapter 8 argues, a similar insensitivity. The Conservative years from 1979–97 were marked by the attempts of outside bodies – the European Court of Justice and the European Court of Human Rights – to protect liberties in the UK, attempts that were met, increasingly, by hostility among sections of the Conservative party.[13]

Contrary to the Diceyan thesis, liberty was receiving a significant measure of protection as a result of the impact of the European Convention on Human Rights at the international level, rather than being the result of decisions of the judiciary applying the common law. In Freedom under Thatcher[14] Ewing and Gearty pointed out that Thatcher had exposed the precarious nature of the constitutional means of protecting liberty. Their central criticism was not that she had changed the constitutional structures to her advantage, but that she 'merely utilised to the full the scope for untrammelled power latent in the British constitution but obscured by the hesitancy and scruples of previous, consensus-based political leaders'.[15] In other words, she exposed and exploited the weaknesses of the British constitution. As David Feldman puts it:

> few of the values of our society find expression in constitutional form . . . This was not too serious a problem when politics was dominated by a high Tory willingness to restrain individualism in order to further communal goods . . . the belief that noblesse oblige. However that belief has been eroded. Thatcherite belief in the market as the supreme arbiter of human worth marginalised the values of traditional Toryism.[16]

In the context of fundamental rights, then, Thatcherism exposed the flawed nature of the Diceyan constitutional model.[17] Since under that model the Constitution provides no effective check to untrammelled parliamentary sovereignty, a government determined to push through a legislative programme extending the reach of state power which, perhaps almost incidentally, erodes the residual areas of liberty, is able to do so. Despite strong common law traditions of upholding certain fundamental rights, constitutional inadequacy became, inevitably, apparent. The civil liberties record of the Conservative Governments of 1979–97 revealed the difficulties of relying on the democratic process to protect civil liberties within the traditional British constitutional arrangements. A 11 Dworkin, R, Index on Censorship, 1988, pp 7–8. See also Thornton, P, Decade of Decline: Civil Liberties in the Thatcher Years, 1989.

12 The 'Open government' initiatives were introduced under the Major Government: see The White Paper: Open Government, Cm 2290 and the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. The Intelligence Service was placed on a statutory basis under the Intelligence Services Act 1994 (see Chapter 10 pp 1010–13).

13 The reaction of Senior Cabinet members at the time, particularly Michael Heseltine, to the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in McCann v UK (1995) 21 EHRR 97 that the UK had breached Art 2 (right to life) was particularly hostile.

14 1989.

15 Ibid at p 7.

16 'The Human Rights Act 1998 and Constitutional Principles' [1999] 2 LS 165 at p 166.

17 Dicey, The Law of the Constitution, 8th edn.

constitution based on the twin notions of Parliamentary supremacy and negative liberties provides no reliable protection against the erosion of a liberty to the point where it exists largely as an exercise of police discretion.[18]

Thatcherism therefore influenced the long-running debate between those commentators and policy-makers who had always wanted to leave liberties to the protection of that process[19] and those in the liberal tradition who had wished to entrust them, for the most part, to the judiciary.[20] The Labour opposition of the time, now the Labour government, changed sides in that debate,[21] apparently in the main as a response to Thatcherism. The Labour Green Paper: Bringing Rights Home,[22] published in 1997, concluded: 'We aim to change the relationship between the state and the citizen, and to redress the dilution of individual rights by an over-centralising government that has taken place over the past two decades.' This aim was to be achieved through the introduction of the European Convention on Human Rights into domestic law. Once Labour came to power in 1997 the White Paper: Rights Brought Home was published[23] and the Human Rights Bill was introduced into Parliament. The Act came fully into force on 2 October 2000. The Labour Government deserves credit for accepting that check on its own power to introduce rights-abridging legislation into Parliament. Given its Parliamentary majority, the HRA provided a significant and self-imposed curb. The Convention thus received into domestic law created a constitutional transformation, not only in terms of rights-protection, but also in terms of judicial reasoning.[24] Since, traditionally, the constitution recognised only negative liberties as opposed to positive rights, the judicial focus of concern always tended to be on the content and nature of the restrictions in question rather than on the value and extent of the right.

While the Diceyan tradition demanded a basis in law for interference with liberties by public authorities, under the HRA this demand was clarified and confirmed in respect of interferences with the guarantees.[25] The Act obliges public authorities, in particular the police, not only to discharge duties such as the duty to keep the peace, but to uphold human rights. It asks the judiciary to consider matters such as the 'quality' of law, not merely its formal existence.[26] Most importantly it asks them to examine the necessity in a democracy of interfering with a right, the proportionality of the means used with the aim in question, and, if necessary, it asks them to inform Parliament that on one or more of these matters it has breached the Convention. Placing the judges in a position

18 Chapter 8 argues that freedom of expression by means of public protest provided an example of such a liberty pre-HRA: pp 661–63.

19 See, e.g., Griffith, JAG, 'The Political Constitution' [1979] MLR 1; Loughlin, Martin, Public Law and Political Theory, 1992.

20 Leading exponents of this position included: Zander, M, A Bill of Rights? 1996; Robertson, G, Freedom, the Individual and the Law, 1993; Lord Lester of Herne Hill QC, 'Fundamental Rights: the UK Isolated?' [1994] PL 70; Lord Scarman, English Law. The New Dimension, 1974.

21 See Chapter 3, pp 144–45.

22 Straw, J and Boateng, P, Bringing Rights Home: Labour's Plans to Incorporate the ECHR into UK Law: A Consultation Paper, 1997.

23 October 1997 CM 3782.

24 See Sir Stephen Sedley on this point (2005) 32 JLS 3, p 9.

25 See Chapter 2, esp p 68.

26 See Chapter 10, pp 1043–44.

where they need to consider the proportionality of a restriction on a Convention right with its aim changed the role of the judges; it brought them into the constitutional sphere previously occupied only by Parliament and covered by the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty. For the first time the judges were invited to consider the compatibility of primary legislation with the Convention rights, and to take the responsibility for determining how far into the contracted-out sector the Convention rights should reach, and on what basis. The previous divergence of constitutional role between Parliament and the judiciary was narrowed down, and that doctrine itself came under very strong pressure. These were bold, imaginative constitutional changes. However, such boldness had apparent limits, which are reflected in the HRA.

A seminal constitutional decision involving a choice between judicial and Parliamentary checks on executive power, and therefore as to the allocation of power, had to be taken regarding the choice of model for the enforcement of the Convention. The choice made was to afford the HRA no special constitutional protection and to leave the ultimate task of curbing executive power to Parliament; so judicial rulings remain (at least as a matter of constitutional theory) subject to primary legislation. The HRA therefore sought to reconcile rights protection placed to a significant extent in the hands of the courts with parliamentary sovereignty. Although the Convention contains the familiar list of rights usually found in a number of Bills or Charters of Rights, the HRA was not intended to be a Bill of Rights in the way that the US Amendments to the Constitution or the Canadian Charter are Bills of Rights, in the sense that those rights have a higher status than other laws: laws that conflict with the rights can be struck down. Further, unlike the German Basic Law or the US Amendments, the HRA can simply be repealed or amended like any ordinary statute and it is, therefore, in a far more precarious position.

So although there was a significant transfer of power to the judiciary, the HRA imposed limitations on its use. On a face-value reading of the HRA, legislation incompatible with the Convention can be passed and legislation declared incompatible remains valid. It is readily apparent, then, that there is a contradiction between the liberal aim of affording the Convention rights efficacy in domestic law in order to aid in reversing the effects of the over-centralisation of power, and the aim of preserving the key feature of the constitution which gave rein to that power. The factors underlying this contradiction form one of the central themes explored throughout this book – the search for a means of giving efficacy to the rights in the face of hostile legislation, including Labour legislation.

But this chapter will argue that while the tension between government criminal justice and counter-terrorist policy and the Convention rights in 2000–7 is indeed a key theme of this book, the particular resolution of the contradiction created by the HRA has not been the determining factor in settling the rules of engagement. As explored in this chapter, and in the following ones, the particular constitutional choices reflected in the HRA have on the whole not been exploited to allow the government, as dominant within Parliament, to disregard or limit the Convention rights to an extent that the Convention itself does not allow. As Keith Ewing wrote in 1999, ‘we should be careful about distinguishing form from substance, principle from practice. As a matter of constitutional legality, Parliament may well be sovereign, but as a matter of constitutional practice, it has transferred significant power to the judiciary [under the HRA]'.[27] The nuclear option of repeal of the HRA is available and is the one favoured by the Conservative opposition at the present time; it would allow the doctrine of Parliamentary sovereignty to re-emerge as a source of power untrammeled except by EU law. But the lesser means of recognising that doctrine introduced in the HRA have not been the most significant factors in balancing governmental power and rights, as this chapter sets out to demonstrate. In other words, a doctrinal analysis of the status of the Convention in domestic law is inadequate to explain its impact, since such an analysis has been superceded by the political stance that the government has taken.

This chapter thus attempts a doctrinal analysis of the HRA mechanisms that takes account of a political reality in which overt disregard of the Convention has largely been avoided. But it also takes account of the status of the Convention in the popular consciousness since it poses a continuing problem for human rights advocates in the UK. The inception of the HRA was not accompanied by the kind of popular debate that preceded the US Bill of Rights in 1789, or that accompanied the adoption of the Canadian Charter of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms as part of the patriation of the Canadian constitution in 1982. Thus, although at the time the new Labour Government commanded widespread popular support, and the HRA was passed during its honeymoon period, it did not seek to make the case for the HRA to the British people. That proved eventually to create problems, when the HRA came under pressure in relation to counter-terrorist strategy, and the war in Iraq led to a rapid diminution of the Labour Government's popularity. It was possible for popular ignorance of and lack of adherence to the HRA to be exploited and manipulated by the Conservative Party and a hostile media. The then Prime Minister, Tony Blair, also criticized the ECHR and HRA in relation to control orders and to the problem of deporting terrorists where they could face Art 3 treatment in the receiving country;[28] for example, he attacked the judicial review decision concerning the deportation of Afghan refugees.[29]

Concern about the need to improve public confidence in the HRA and in its operation was one of the reasons given by the government for setting up the Review of the Implementation of the Human Rights Act conducted in 2006 by the Department of Constitutional Affairs.[30] As regards myths spread by the media it found:

> So far as the wider public are concerned . . . different types of myth [are] in play . . . there are those which derive from the reporting (and often partial reporting) of the launch of cases but not their ultimate outcomes. This leaves the impression in the public mind that a wide range of claims are successful when in fact they are not – and have often been effectively laughed out of court. The most notable example in this category is the application made by Denis Nilsen in 2001 to challenge a decision of the Prison Governor to deny him access to pornographic material. The case is now often cited as a leading example of a bad decision made as a result of the Human Rights Act. In fact it failed at the very first hurdle.[31]

27 'The HRA and Parliamentary Democracy' [1999] 62(1) MLR 79, p 92.
28 Daily Telegraph, 6 August 2005.
29 [2006] EWCA Civ 1157, affirming Sullivan J at [2006] EWHC 1111 (Admin); see also Chapter 14 pp 1451–54 for decisions adverse to the control orders regime. For Tony Blair's comments, see the Observer, 14 May 2006.
30 Published, DCA, July 2006. Available from DCA website.
31 DCA Review, Myths and Misconceptions, p 4.

The key question that the Review set out to answer was whether the HRA had impeded the achievement of the government's objectives on crime and terrorism and so led to the public being exposed to additional and unnecessary risk. The Review answered this question in the negative, finding that while the security agencies had stated that significant resource implications are involved in servicing the structures set up to deal with dangerous terrorist suspects, these result not from the HRA, but from the decisions of the Strasbourg Court in cases such as Chahal.[32] But the perception created by the media that the HRA is hindering counter-terrorist and crime control measures remains, and the appeal to the fear of terrorism, has been effective in creating a false image of the HRA. Perhaps this is a classic example of an argumentum ad metum or argumentum in terrorem as a logical fallacy in which parts of the media attempt to create support for opposition to the HRA by increasing fear and prejudice towards it. The appeal to emotion is being used to exploit existing fear of terrorism to create support for the speaker's proposal, namely that the HRA should be repealed. A false dilemma fallacy is involved, suggesting that the only alternatives are rights protection or security, so such repeal would destroy the main barrier to introducing effective counter-terrorist measures.[33]

There are other reasons why a narrow doctrinal legal analysis is at best incomplete and at worst, positively misleading. Critical analysis of, for example, the theoretical protection for individuals under the HRA is of little value without an awareness of the influence of wider societal factors. There should be an awareness of how much that theoretical protection is in reality available to the underprivileged individuals who are often in most need of asserting their rights (in particular, working class black men, the most likely target of police harassment or misuse of police powers, such as stop and search).

The main concern of this book is with the years 2000–7: the Human Rights Act years. It seeks to evaluate the impact the HRA has actually had in various areas of fundamental rights and asks how far the expectations it aroused in 1998 have been answered. It will be argued that at times the Convention rights have been minimised and undermined in Parliament and in the courts.[34] In Parliament, the rights have at times been treated as almost empty guarantees which cast a legitimising cloak over rights-abridging legislation and executive action.[35] Under the model termed 'minimalist', judges have at times been able to duck the hard issues, purporting to review government actions under the Convention standards, but adopting a deferential stance which fails to create any real accountability.[36] An appearance of human rights auditing has sometimes been created which is belied by the reality. But it will be argued throughout this book that there are signs that the HRA in 2007 is beginning to bed down; the senior judges are taking their role as the guardians of human rights seriously; a fusion between Strasbourg principles and common law ones is now successfully occurring.[37] It will 32 Ibid, p 34.

33 See further Chapter 14, pp 1462–68 on this point. Tony Blair has been quoted as 'demanding to know "why the fuck" it was so impossible to rewrite human rights legislation to allow decisive action against a terrorist threat' (Observer 7 August 2005).

34 See, e.g., Chapter 6 at pp 370 et seq. and Chapter 7, pp 606 et seq.

35 This danger was pointed out by Conor Gearty in 'Terrorism and human rights: a case study in impending legal realities' (1999) 19(3) LS 367, p 379.

36 See below pp 192–96.

37 See, e.g., Chapter 9 pp 829–30, 911 et seq.

further be argued that the HRA has indeed had an impact on executive power, and has had an effect in protecting the rights of vulnerable and minority groups. Possibly it is a victim of its own success in the sense that the Labour Government has found that its own creation has been used against it, and to an extent the government has either colluded with or acquiesced in the idea that the HRA stands in the way of the introduction of initiatives designed to tackle terrorism and organised crime.

The HRA has proved to be a more controversial piece of legislation than its sponsors can have predicted. After it had been in force only a year, terrorists flew planes into the Twin Towers in New York, triggering a global 'war on terrorism' that has placed the HRA under pressure during almost the whole of its existence. The years 2001 to 2007 saw increasing attempts by the right-wing press and by the Conservative Party to discredit the HRA on the basis that it is a bar to the use of effective counter-terrorist measures. In March 2005, for example, a Daily Star leader stated bluntly: 'Rights law is wrong'.[38] The HRA remains in a very precarious position. As Chapter 14 argues, the idea that the HRA bars the way to effective counter-terrorist action is misconceived. But it is obscuring, at least in the popular consciousness, the more general 'endeavour' of the HRA – to provide UK citizens with a guarantee of a range of fundamental rights, enforceable in their own courts, rather than at Strasbourg. The terrorist attacks of 9/11 and of 7/7 in London immediately placed the Labour Government's commitment to the HRA under pressure. It appeared probable that as an aspect of counter-terrorist policy they would exploit the leeway created by the HRA for introducing legislation incompatible with the Convention. That leeway is discussed below but, as Chapter 14 argues, the Labour Government did not take that route in introducing counter-terrorist measures.[39] In general the government has not sought to use the avenues the HRA itself provided which would have allowed Labour policies in relation to organised crime and terrorism a freer reign.

This chapter, which considers and analyses the HRA and certain very significant decisions taken under it in the first seven years of its life, is intended to provide a framework for the discussion of the impact of the Act, which pervades the whole book. The discussion embarks on a doctrinal analysis of the central aspects of the Act, but also argues that such an analysis is inadequate to explain the operation of the Act in practice. In certain respects, explored below, the deliberate choice was made in a number of the areas, especially the question of indirect horizontal effect in s 6, to leave options open, requiring political and moral choices to be made by the judiciary in adjudicating on the HRA. It will also be argued that certain choices were made in settling on the wording of the key sections of the Act, in particular ss 3(2) and 6(2), creating exceptions to Convention-adherence, which did not reflect the political reality of the involvement of Britain in the Convention system, or the acceptance of the implications of transferring power to the judiciary. That reality then became apparent over the early HRA years. The preference shown by the government and the judiciary for accepting the limitations on the rights afforded by the Convention, not those provided by the HRA, forms a key theme of this chapter, and of the book as a whole.

38 4 March 2005.
39 See in particular pp 1424–26, 1438–44.

2 The choice of rights

The rights protected under the HRA

As Chapter 2 demonstrated, the Convention continues to grow by means of additional Protocols, reflecting more developed conceptions of human rights. However the UK has not ratified all of them. Ratification decisions have affected the choice of rights received into domestic law under the HRA. But also the decision was taken to omit Art 13, requiring that an effective remedy should be available in national law for breach of the Convention rights,[40] and Art 1 which provides for the state to secure to everyone within its jurisdiction the Convention rights and freedoms. The rights received into domestic law are, under s 1(1) HRA, Arts 2–12 and 14 of the Convention, Arts 1–3 of the First Protocol and Arts 1 and 2 of the Sixth Protocol[41] as read with Arts 16–18 of the Convention. The rights are set out in Sched 1 of the HRA; further Protocols could be added by the Secretary of State, by order, under s 1(4). Equally, rights could be removed and any other amendments to the Act could be made, by the same route in order to 'reflect the effect, in relation to the UK, of a Protocol'. The UK has ratified Protocol 13, which abolishes the death penalty in all circumstances, but it is not included in Sched 1.

The omission of Art 13 is particularly significant. The idea behind it is that the function of that Article will be carried out by s 8 of the HRA (see below) and that its inclusion might have encouraged the judiciary to provide new remedies, going beyond those that could be provided under s 8. Possibly, Art 13 could have been utilised in an attempt to create new free-standing causes of action between private parties – direct horizontal effect. As indicated below, ss 6 and 7 seek to ensure that the creation of a new cause of action under the HRA confines it to use against public authorities. Arguably, the Art 13 jurisprudence can, however, be taken into account by the judiciary under s 2 of the HRA.[42]

This choice of rights in Sched 1 is significant and obviously in part reflects UK decisions as to ratification. It is clearly a deficiency of the international record of the UK in human rights matters that it has not ratified all the Protocols. The most satisfactory course would have been their ratification and then inclusion in the list of rights in Sched 1. As Chapter 2 indicated, the government has considered the question of ratifying the Fourth[43] and Seventh Protocols. It has declared an intention to ratify the Seventh Protocol,[44] but has not yet decided to ratify the Fourth, which would require changes to immigration legislation or the entry of a reservation.[45] The very significant

40 See Chapter 2, pp 106–7.

41 (1983) 5 EHRR 167. It came into force in 1985.

42 See Grosz, Beatson and Duffy, op. cit., fn 1, para 1–6; see also Feldman, D, 'Remedies for violation of Convention Rights under the HRA' [1998] EHRLR 691.

43 Cmnd 2309. It came into force in 1968; the UK is not yet a party.

44 (1984) 7 EHRR 1. It came into force in 1988. The UK is not a party but has proposed ratification: see the White Paper: Rights Brought Home: the Human Rights Bill, Cm 3782, 1997, paras 4.14–4.15, and the Home Office Review of Human Rights Instruments (amended) 26 August 1999.

45 It contains rights relating to the field of immigration law, which have raised governmental concerns regarding the nature of the obligations created and the government indicated in 1997 that it did not intend to ratify it at that time: see the White Paper: Rights Brought Home: the Human Rights Bill,

Anti-Discrimination Protocol, Protocol 12, was opened for ratification in November 2000.[46] As explained in Chapter 2 it provides a guarantee of freedom from discrimination extending beyond the civil rights' arena since, unlike Art 14, it does not depend on the engagement of another Convention right.[47] The UK at present does not intend to ratify the Twelfth Protocol. Clearly there are concerns that while there is reasonable harmony between the basic Convention regime and the UK legal system, that is not fully the case as far as aspects of the more advanced Protocol-based regime is concerned. The Joint Committee on Human Rights in 2005 recommended that the government should ratify the Fourth and Twelfth Protocols.[48] The question of extending the scope of the Convention in this way is of particular significance in relation to Protocol 12, but at the present time, the government has not yet ratified it[49] and clearly is not therefore at present minded to include it in Sched 1.

Deficiencies and limitations of the Convention

At the present time the Conservative Party has declared its intention, if it is elected in 2008, 9 or 10, to repeal the HRA and introduce a 'Modern Bill of Rights' for Britain.[50] It is possible that if repeal of the HRA occurred, there might be a reluctance to follow it by the introduction of a Bill of Rights. At present the seriousness with which the Bill of Rights plan is taken is not apparent. But the plan affords the following discussion a particular pertinence at the present time.

It must be asked why the decision was made in the HRA to provide protection for parts of the European Convention on Human Rights, as opposed to introducing a tailor-made UK Bill of Rights or incorporating the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. In taking this course, the Labour Government followed a long Cm 3782, 1997, paras 4.10–4.11. It has, however, considered the possibility of future ratification with reservations: the Home Office Review of Human Rights Instruments (amended), 26 August 1999. In a written answer to the Commons 10 June 2002 it was stated that there were no plans to ratify it: 'To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce legislation to enable the UK to ratify the Fourth Protocol to the ECHR. [58371]. Beverley Hughes: None at the present time'. See further Chapter 2, p 106.

46 See Chapter 2, p 108.

47 See Chapter 2, p 106 and Chapter 15, pp 1482–86.

48 Seventeenth Report of Session 2004–5 HL Paper 99, HC 264, paras 34 and 37.

49 It was opened for signature in November 2000.

50 David Cameron in a speech to the Centre for Policy Studies, London, 26 June 2006: Balancing freedom and security – A modern British Bill of Rights, stated that the HRA should be repealed . . . 'The Human Rights Act has a damaging impact on our ability to protect our society against terrorism . . . I am today committing my Party to work towards the production of a Modern Bill of Rights'. He also stated that the new Bill of Rights should be entrenched. He accepted that the UK would remain bound by the decision in Chahal v UK (the decision preventing deportation of terrorist suspects if they would be at risk of Art 3 treatment in the receiving country – see Chapter 14, p 1359) but considered that repeal of the HRA would curb delays and cost in the criminal justice system. He did not explain what would occur if a person sought to rely on their Convention rights under the new Bill of Rights' fair trial article or what would occur if there was a successful application to Strasbourg under Art 6 which would also have succeeded domestically under the HRA but which failed under the new Bill of Rights due to the modifications to the fair trial right that Cameron presumably has in mind in speaking of the hindrance created by the HRA in terms of using criminal justice measures.

UK tradition of proposals for a Bill of Rights that favoured the Convention over other instruments. The overwhelming majority of human rights Bills considered by Parliament over the years have simply advocated incorporation of the European Convention on Human Rights[51] into UK law. The House of Lords Select Committee on a Bill of Rights was unanimous on the question of creating a tailor-made Bill of Rights: 'To attempt to formulate de novo a set of fundamental rights which would command the necessary general assent would be a fruitless exercise.'[52] Starting from scratch and developing a Bill of Rights for the UK would have been a burdensome task because the political parties (and the various pressure groups) would have had great difficulty in reaching agreement on it, while the process of hearing and considering all the representations made by interested parties would have been extremely lengthy.

Zander has argued that it was politically and psychologically easier to incorporate the Convention,[53] since it was already binding on the UK internationally, and both major parties when in power have accepted the jurisdiction of the European Court of Human Rights and the right of individual petition.[54] A key argument put forward by supporters of the Convention was that the advantage to be gained by adopting the course of creating a home-grown Bill of Rights would have had to be weighed up against the possible detriment caused if the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights had been seen as less directly applicable. The British judiciary might have felt that they had lost the 'anchor' of the authority of the Court and the constraint of the need to apply a reasonably uniform European standard of human rights.

Arguments against relying on the Convention were based partly on its defects of both form and content, which have often been criticised.[55] It is a cautious document: it is not as open textured as the American Bill of Rights, and contains long lists of exceptions to the primary rights – exceptions which suggest a strong respect for the institutions of the state. Perhaps the most outstanding example of inadequacy is the limited scope of Art 14.[56] There is also the dangerous potential of Art 17.[57] From today's perspective, the nearly 60-year-old Convention looks very much like a creature of its period,[58] with its provision against slavery[59] and its long lists of exceptions to certain fundamental rights. Its out-of-date feel has led a number of commentators to echo the 51 This reference to incorporation of the Convention refers to Arts 2–18 and the First Protocol – the course advocated by the House of Lords Select Committee on Human Rights in 1978.

52 Report of Select Committee, HL Paper 176, June 1978.

53 Zander, M, A Bill of Rights?, p 83.

54 It may be noted that under the changes made by Protocol 11, the right of individual petition can no longer be withdrawn; see Chapter 2, p 27.

55 See, e.g., Hewitt, P, The Abuse of Power, 1982, Martin Robertson, pp 232–40; Gearty, C [1993] CLJ 89.

56 Article 14 provides a guarantee of freedom from discrimination, but only in the context of the substantive rights. See further Chapter 2, pp 108–9.

57 It was used by the Commission to allow the banning of the German Communist party: Kommunistische Partei Deutschland v Federal Republic of Germany, Application 250/57 Yearbook I (1955–57), Vol 6, p 222.

58 The Convention was drafted in 1949 and based on the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights. The Declaration was adopted on December 10 1948 by the General Assembly of the UN.

59 Although slavery in the sense of human trafficking is still a live issue in Europe. See 26th Report of the JCHR on human trafficking 2005–6, HL Paper 245–1, HC Paper 1127–1, published 13 October 2006. See also Guardian, March 23 2007.

plea put forward some years ago by Tomkins and Rix for ‘a document of principle for the 1990s and not a document of exceptions from the 1950s’.[60]

It could be argued that at first glance in its present manifestation the Convention is simply not adequate to the task of bringing about far-reaching reforms, and thereby fulfilling the constitutional role which a number of commentators had enthusiastically mapped out for it pre-HRA.[61] As Feldman puts it, the Convention rights are ‘by no means a comprehensive basis for a modern system of protection for [individualistic and public] values’.[62] The far more thorough South African Bill of Rights, which covers certain social, economic and environmental rights, provides an example of such a system. The pressure group Liberty’s Manifesto for Human Rights proposed that a domestic Bill of Rights could be drawn up, based on the Convention, but using more up-to-date language and addressing certain of the inadequacies indicated in Chapter 2.[63] In particular, Liberty criticised the lack of minimum conditions for detention outside Art 3, and the lack of a right to jury trial. It has also often been pointed out that the Convention contains no specific rights for children.[64] The HRA can also be criticised on the basis that the opportunity was lost to include certain social and economic rights,[65] including some of those protected under the International Covenant on Social, Economic and Cultural Rights. The dynamic approach of the Strasbourg Court can only marginally address the failure to provide second or third generation rights under the HRA, although, as Chapter 2 pointed out, there are signs of a change of approach in this respect.[66]

The decisions of the European Court of Human Rights documented in this book make it clear, however, that the Convention is sufficiently open-textured to be able to cover circumstances not envisaged when it was created[67] and to adapt to changing social values. For example, although a right of access to legal advice in police custody is not expressly included, the Court has – in effect – read one into Art 6, arising in a number of circumstances.[68] The Convention, with its associated jurisprudence, comes close to comprising a modern ‘document of principles’ thanks largely to the enterprise of the Court, which has insisted upon the dynamic nature of the Convention and has adopted a teleological or purpose-based approach to interpretation which has allowed the substantive rights to develop.[69] Those principles cannot always be sought in the 60 ‘Unconventional use of the Convention’ (1992) 55(5) MLR 721, p 725. See also Ashworth, A, ‘The European Convention on Human Rights and English criminal justice: ships which pass in the night?’, in Andenas, M (ed), English Public Law and the Common Law of Europe, 1998, Key Haven, p 215.

61 See, e.g., Feldman, D, ‘The Human Rights Act 1998 and constitutional principles’ (1999) 19(2) LS 165; Lord Lester of Herne Hill QC, ‘First steps towards a Constitutional Bill of Rights’ (1997) 2 EHRLR 124.

62 Op. cit., Feldman, (1999) p 170.

63 National Council for Civil Liberties 1997 (now Liberty). See also the Bill drawn up by the Institute for Public Policy Research: Constitution Paper No 1, ‘A British Bill of Rights’, 1990.

64 Fortin, J, ‘Rights brought home for children’ (1999) 62 MLR 350.

65 See Ewing, KD and Gearty, CA, ‘Rocky foundations for Labour’s new rights’ (1997) 2 EHRLR 149.

66 See Chapter 2, p 42.

67 See, e.g., Soering v UK, Judgment of 7 July 1989, A 161; (1989) 11 EHRR 439.

68 See Chapter 12, p 1210.

69 See: Van Dijk, P and Van Hoof, F, Theory and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights, 3rd edn, 1998.

outcomes of applications, especially in older Commission admissibility decisions.[70] But Strasbourg decisions are not binding on domestic courts. The traditional approach of the doctrine of precedent in UK courts has not been applied to Strasbourg decisions under s 2 HRA, giving the courts some leeway, as discussed below, in developing the domestic Convention jurisprudence.[71]

But it remains legitimate to attack the HRA as an instrument which has selected and elevated 'first generation' civil rights, ignoring the social and economic ones which would have aided in giving those civil rights some substantive rather than formal value.[72] That argument could possibly, however, be utilised in future to press for introducing second generation rights to future Protocols to the Convention,[73] for including Protocol 12 in Sched 1 and for giving consideration to the reception of other unincorporated treaties into domestic law. As Ewing has put it: 'the HRA provides a valuable template for other international treaties . . .'.[74] The inadequacies of the HRA also provide an argument for giving further effect to the European Social Charter 1961 in domestic law,[75] and for affording binding effect to elements of the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights, which includes a number of social and economic rights.[76] The Charter contains those rights recognised under the European Convention on Human Rights, together with a number of new social rights, including the right to strike, guarantees of maximum working hours, worker consultation and trade union membership, but, as Chapter 15 notes, the Charter is merely waiting in the wings at the moment and can only have an indirect influence on EU law.[77] At the present time, however, when the very existence of the HRA is under threat, there is little likelihood of persuading the government that further rights should be included in the list of those protected.

3 The interpretative obligation under s 3; the remedial process and pre-legislative scrutiny

Introduction

Once the decision had been taken that the European Convention should be given further status in domestic law, as opposed to seeking to create an entirely new Bill of Rights or incorporating the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the question

70 See Chapter 2, p 22.
71 See pp 197–98.
72 See further Ewing, KD, 'Social rights and constitutional law' [1999] PL 104.
73 With a view to adding such Protocols to Sched 1 to the HRA 1998.
74 Ewing, 'Social rights and constitutional law' [1999] PL 104, p 110.
75 Liberty campaigned for this possibility at the time when the Human Rights Bill was proposed but at the present time, the Labour Government has shown no interest in it. See further Ewing, KD, 'Social rights and human rights: Britain and the Social Charter – the Conservative legacy' (2000) 2 EHRLR 91.
76 The Charter was published in May 2000 (available from the European Commission website and from the website of the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Parliament). The rights could, potentially, bind the EU institutions. Britain considers that the Charter should not become part of the Treaty, and therefore have binding effect, but should have a merely declaratory status and, at the present time, it merely has such a status.
77 See Chapter 15, p 1481.

arose as to the constitutional protection the Convention should be given under the HRA. One possible form of entrenchment for the Convention would have been by means of a so called 'notwithstanding clause', on the model employed by the Canadian Charter. That would have meant allowing Parliament to legislate contrary to the Convention, but only if the legislation contained a provision stating, for example, 'X provision is to be given effect notwithstanding Art 6 of the Convention'. As indicated in Chapter 3, this means entrenchment by means of a requirement of form.[78] In considering the constitutional model chosen for the protection of the Convention, it is worth bearing in mind that the need to introduce further forms of protection might become apparent in future, at least for key Convention rights. Pre-HRA, the pressure group Liberty suggested that certain rights may be viewed as more fundamental than others and, therefore, might be entrenched while others might be afforded less protection.[79] At the present time, when the HRA has been in force for nearly seven years, there is, however, no evidence of governmental interest in this possibility.

The Charter 'notwithstanding clause' model was not used for the HRA, although the constitutional protection it has received bears some similarities to the use of a 'notwithstanding clause'. The HRA is modelled to an extent on the New Zealand Bill of Rights which uses a rule of construction under s 6 to the effect that a court is obliged, wherever an enactment can be given a meaning that is consistent with the rights and freedoms contained in the Bill of Rights, to prefer that meaning to any other meaning.[80] In so far as one expects a Bill of Rights to demonstrate a strong commitment to human rights, demanding, if necessary, constitutional changes to provide such protection, the HRA, like the New Zealand Bill of Rights, does not have the characteristics of a Bill of Rights. The HRA does not 'incorporate' the Convention rights into substantive domestic law, since it does not provide that they are to have the 'force of law', the usual form of words used when international treaties are incorporated into domestic law.[81] Instead, under s 1(2) of the HRA, certain of the rights discussed in Chapter 2 are to 'have effect for the purposes of this Act'.[82] The rights are not directly enforceable between private parties. But the rights are in a sense incorporated into domestic law when asserted against public authorities.

The key mechanism affording the Convention under the HRA a higher status than other laws is s 3, which requires the judiciary to interpret legislative provisions compatibly with the Convention rights if at all possible. This means that although the judges cannot strike down a provision as incompatible with the rights, s 3 can be

78 See pp 153–55.

79 See Klug, F and Wadham, J, 'The democratic entrenchment of a Bill of Rights: Liberty's proposals' [1993] PL 579.

80 For discussion as to the use of this model, see Taggart, M., 'Tugging on Superman's cape: lessons from the experience with the New Zealand Bill of Rights' [1998] PL 266; Butler, A, 'Why the New Zealand Bill of Rights is a bad model for Britain' [1997] OJLS 332; Schwartz, H, 'The short and happy life and tragic death of the New Zealand Bill of Rights' [1998] NZLR 259. The New Zealand Bill of Rights 1990 was disabled from overriding pre-existing legislation and was subject to express or implied repeal by future enactments. This model was also adopted for the Canadian Bill of Rights 1960 which was replaced by the Charter.

81 See, e.g., the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1971, s 1(2).

82 According to the then Lord Chancellor, the rights are a form of common law and, in that sense, they are part of domestic law: HL, Third Reading, Col 840, 5 February 1998.

relied upon to bring the provision into conformity with them if possible. The judges, as will be seen below, have adopted a robust stance under s 3, coming very close to, or even crossing, the boundary between legislating and interpreting in so doing. If a provision cannot be rendered compatible with the Convention, the incompatibility can be declared, under s 4, leaving the government to introduce remedial legislation. In this way a delicate compromise was struck between creating greater rights protection and preserving Parliamentary sovereignty. The HRA also preserved the possibility that Parliament might deliberately introduce legislation that was incompatible with the Convention. This is implicit in s 19, as discussed below. If this occurred, and the legislation could not be rendered compatible through the use of s 3, it would remain valid and could be applied, under s 3(2). There is nothing in the HRA to prevent Parliament from including a 'notwithstanding' clause in legislation,[83] but so far the government has shown no inclination to do so. Indeed, as will become apparent, although Parliament could legislate contrary to the Convention rights, the government in introducing new Bills has not made a statement that this has occurred.[84] A derogation was adopted to protect Part 4 of the Anti-Terrorism Crime and Security Act 2001, but that allowed a s 19 statement of compatibility to be made.[85] So in practice the Convention under the HRA is not readily distinguishable from a Bill of Rights.

The interpretative obligation under s 3[86]

Introduction

Thus, under the Human Rights Act 1998, which largely reflects the proposals in Labour's Consultation paper on the matter,[87] the Convention[88] receives a subtle form of constitutional protection. The key provision in creating this form of protection for the Convention under the HRA is s 3(1), which reads: 'So far as it is possible to do so, primary and subordinate legislation must be read and given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights . . .'. Section 3(2)(b) reads: 'this section does not affect the validity, continuing operation or enforcement of any incompatible primary legislation; and (c) does not affect the validity, continuing operation or enforcement of any incompatible subordinate legislation if . . . primary legislation prevents the removal 83 This possibility is considered further below, at p 190.

84 As discussed below, the Communications Bill 2003 was not accompanied by a statement of its compatibility with the Convention, under s 19(1)(1), but the government's stated position is that it is compatible – see pp 206, 210 below.

85 See Chapter 14, pp 1424–26.

86 For discussion in the very early post-HRA years see Elliott, MC, 'Fundamental rights as interpretative constructs: the constitutional logic of the HRA', in Forsyth, C (ed), Judicial Review and the Constitution, 2001, Hart; A. Lester, 'The Art of the Possible – Interpreting Statutes under the Human Rights Act' [2000] EHRLR 665; Bennion, 'What Interpretation is 'Possible' under Section 3(1) of the Human Rights Act' [2000] PL 77; Edwards,'Reading down Legislation under the Human Rights Act' (2000) 20 LS 353;

87 Bringing Rights Home: Labour's Plans to Incorporate the ECHR into UK Law. See Straw and Boateng (1997) 1 EHRR 71. For discussion, see Lyell, N (Sir) (1997) 2 EHRR 132; Wadham, J (1997) 2 EHRLR 141; Ewing, op. cit., fn 72.

88 The term 'the Convention' will be used to refer to the Convention rights currently included in Sched 1 to the HRA 1998.

of the incompatibility'. Significantly, s 3(2)(a) makes it clear that the obligation imposed by s 3 arises in relation to both previous and subsequent enactments.

It is clear from s 3 that the Convention has, in one sense, a lower status than ordinary statutes in that it cannot automatically override pre-existing law. But, more significantly, s 3 demands that all statutory provisions should be rendered, if possible, compatible with the Convention rights. Therefore, by imposing this interpretative obligation on the courts, the rights become capable of affecting subsequent legislation in a way that is not normally possible.[89] If legislation cannot be rendered compatible with the rights, a declaration of incompatibility can be made under s 4;[90] remedial legislation can then be introduced into Parliament to modify or repeal the offending provisions under s 10.[91] This subtle form of protection avoids entrenchment and therefore creates a compromise between leaving the protection of rights to the democratic process and entrusting them fully to the judiciary.

When the HRA was introduced it was apparent that some existing provisions were likely to be found to be prima facie incompatible with one or more of the Convention rights. Under s 3, the possibility of impliedly repealing such provisions was ruled out, but it was clear that unless they would admit of no interpretation compatible with the Convention right(s) in question they could be made to conform with it. So it was clear that the outcome would normally be the same as that which would have been achieved had implied repeal occurred. But the intention under the HRA was that if the courts could not achieve compatibility in relation to such a provision, the Convention right itself would cease to have effect to the extent of its incompatibility with that particular statutory provision, at least until and if amending legislation was passed, under s 10 (see below) – in effect, a reversal of the normal rules of implied repeal.

Use of this model for the Convention obviously places protection for human rights very much at the mercy of judicial interpretation of statutes. It means that a more liberal-minded judge can find that most, if not almost all statutory provisions, even if unambiguous, can be modified through interpretative techniques in order to achieve harmony with the Convention. The requirement to construe legislation 'so far as it is possible to do so' consistently with the Convention (emphasis added) makes it clear that such a stance best reflects the intention of Parliament, although it may also be pointed out that since Parliament has enacted s 4, it clearly contemplated some limits on what could be achieved by means of s 3. Lord Lester observed, on this point pre-HRA: 'Would [the courts use the incorporating measures] to go much further than the traditional position in which the courts seek to interpret ambiguous legislation so as to be in accordance with rather than breach treaty obligations undertaken by the UK? I hope and believe that they would indeed do so . . .'.[92] At the Committee stage of the Human Rights Bill Lord Irvine said:

> We want the courts to strive to find an interpretation of legislation which is consistent with Convention rights so far as the language of the legislation allows, 89 For extensive consideration of this point, see Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 4.

90 See below, pp 199–204.
91 See below, pp 204–6.
92 'First steps towards a constitutional Bill of Rights' (1997) 2 EHRR 124, p 127.

> and only in the last resort to conclude that the legislation is so clearly incompatible with the Convention that it is impossible to do so.[93]

Clearly, however, a very bold approach to s 3, going well beyond use of an interpretative technique, would not have democratic legitimacy and would encroach on the role of Parliament. The question that faced the judges at the inception of the HRA was as to the line that should be drawn under s 3 between interpreting and legislating.

It was clear from the outset that the courts would not receive much assistance in deploying s 3 from the interpretation of the somewhat similar rule of construction in New Zealand – s 6 of the Bill of Rights, which provides that wherever an enactment can be given a meaning that is consistent with the rights and freedoms contained in the Bill of Rights, that meaning should be preferred. It was found as to s 6:

> a consistent meaning is to be preferred to any other meaning. The preference will come into play only when the enactment can be [given such a meaning]. This must mean, I think, 'can reasonably' be given such a meaning. A strained interpretation will not be enough.[94]

A similar approach was taken in subsequent cases,[95] prompting criticism from commentators.[96] This somewhat timid and uncreative approach arguably overlooked the fact that s 6 must apply to itself. Therefore, if a meaning of s 6 was adopted which curbed the impact of the right or freedom in question, there was an argument that there had been a failure to use the rule of construction correctly. The meaning could have been adopted which would have allowed s 6 to give the right full scope, which would have meant in the above instance, refusing to read the word 'reasonably' into the section.

In any event, it was always clear that the courts should not imply the word 'reasonably' into s 3.[97] They are expected to find a possible, not a reasonable, interpretation, according to its wording. An opposition amendment, which would have imported the word 'reasonably' into the section, was opposed by the government.[98] That was a clear starting point, which was opposed to the New Zealand approach. It allowed straining or distorting the meanings of words or 'reading down' statutory provisions in order to afford them a narrow construction, compatible with the right in question, since all those techniques were possible ones. At the outset it was also arguable that it would include reading certain words into the statute. As Lord Lester observed, 'the courts will need where possible to read provisions into ambiguous or incomplete legislation'.[99]

93 Hansard, HL Deb Col 535, 18 November 1997. The Lord Chancellor further observed that 'in 99 per cent of the cases that will arise, there will be no need for judicial declarations of incompatibility' and the Home Secretary said 'We expect that, in almost all cases, the courts will be able to interpret the legislation compatibly with the Convention': Hansard (HL Debates,) 5 February 1998, col 840 (3rd reading) and Hansard (HC Debates,) 16 February 1998, col 778 (2nd reading).

94 Ministry of Transport v Noort [1992] 3 NZLR 260, p 272.

95 See, e.g., Quilter v AG of New Zealand [1998] 1 NZLR 523.

96 See Taggart, M, 'Tugging on Superman's cape: lessons from the experience with the New Zealand Bill of Rights' [1998] PL 266; Butler, op. cit., fn 80; Schwartz, H, 'The short and happy life and tragic death of the New Zealand Bill of Rights' [1998] NZLR 259.

97 This was confirmed by the House of Lords in R v A [2001] 2 WLR 1546 by Lord Steyn, para 44.

98 Vol 313, HC Deb Col 421, 3 June 1998.

99 'Interpreting statutes under the HRA' 20(3) Statute L Rev 218, p 225.

In 2000 Clayton and Tomlinson suggested that the domestic courts would be able to obtain assistance in dealing with the new rule of construction by taking into account four interpretative techniques: the rule of construction;[100] the rules used to construe statutes in relation to EC law; the doctrines of reading in and reading down and the rule of construction in New Zealand.[101] Thus the response of the House of Lords in Pickstone v Freemans[102] to EU law provided a model to be used under s 3. The House of Lords had found that domestic legislation – the Equal Pay Amendment Regulations – made under s 2(2) of the European Communities Act appeared to be inconsistent with Art 119 of the Treaty of Rome. The Lords held that despite this apparent conflict, a purposive interpretation of the domestic legislation would be adopted; in other words, the plain meaning of the provision in question would be ignored and an interpretation would be imposed upon it which was not in conflict with Art 119. This was done on the basis that Parliament must have intended to fulfil its EU obligations in passing the amendment regulations once it had been forced to do so by the European Court of Justice. The House of Lords followed a similar approach in Litster v Forth Dry Dock Engineering.[103]

A 'purposive' approach in this context means, it is argued, first adopting the interpretation of the Convention right which gives effect to its core values as interpreted at Strasbourg. This point was considered in Chapter 2[104] and is returned to below. Then, second, it means using the relevant interpretative technique in relation to the statutory provision in question in order, if possible, to impose on it a meaning that achieves the purpose revealed by a consideration of those values, so long as they are in harmony with the underlying purpose of the statute.[105]

Interpretative techniques adopted under s 3[106]

The early signs were that the judiciary were prepared to take an extremely vigorous stance when interpreting existing law in the light of Convention provisions under s 3 since they took the view from the outset that their s 3 obligation allowed them to write words into statutes. The findings of the House of Lords in R v A[107] suggested that they were prepared to ensure that the outcome which allowed the Convention to prevail was achieved even if this involved a significant disregard for statutory language. Lord Steyn used an extremely bold interpretative technique – that of reading words 100 E.g., Clarke v General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corp plc [1998] 1 WLR 1647.

101 Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, p 156.
102 [1988] 3 WLR 265.
103 [1989] 1 All ER 1194.
104 At pp 38–39.
105 See Ghaidan [2004] 3 WLR 113 at para 35. Ghaidan is discussed below at pp 180–81.
106 For comment on s 3(1) generally in the first three years of the HRA, see further: Lester, A, 'The Art of the Possible – Interpreting Statutes under the Human Rights Act' [1999] EHRLR 665; Bennion, F, 'What Interpretation is 'Possible' under Section 3(1) of the Human Rights Act' [2000] PL 77; Edwards, R, 'Reading down Legislation under the Human Rights Act' (2000) 20 LS 353; Gearty, C, 'Reconciling Parliamentary Democracy and Human Rights' (2002) 118 LQR 248; Phillipson, G, '(Mis)Reading Section 3(1) of the Human Rights Act' (2003) LQR 183.
107 R v A (Complainant's Sexual History); [2002] 1 AC 45 (HL); [2001] 2 WLR 1546; [2001] 2 Cr App R 21.

into the legislative provision in question – in order to render it compatible with Art 6. The case concerned a form of 'rape shield' law, under s 41(3)(c) of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999, that prevented a woman being questioned as to an alleged previous sexual relationship with the defendant, although evidence as to the existence of such a relationship could be adduced by the defence in relation to his belief in her consent. Thus, arguably, s 41(3)(c) protected the woman's Art 8 Rights. Lord Steyn said:

> Under ordinary methods of interpretation a court may depart from the language of the statute in order to avoid absurd consequences: section 3 goes much further. Undoubtedly, a court must always look for a contextual and purposive interpretation: section 3 is more radical in its effect. It is a general principle of the interpretation of legal instruments that the text is the primary source of interpretation: other sources are subordinate to it . . . Section 3 qualifies this general principle because it requires a court to find an interpretation compatible with the Convention rights if it is possible to do so . . . . In accordance with the will of Parliament . . . it will sometimes be necessary to adopt an interpretation which linguistically will appear strained. The techniques to be used will not only involve the reading down of express language in a statute but also the implication of provisions. A declaration of incompatibility is a measure of last resort . . .
>
> It is therefore possible under s 3 to read . . . s 41(3)(c) [of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999] . . . as subject to the implied provisions that evidence or questioning which is required to ensure a fair trial under Article 6(1) . . . should not be treated as inadmissible [emphasis added].[108]

In taking this stance Lord Steyn arguably went beyond using interpretative techniques and – in effect – rewrote a sub-section of the legislation. In R v A, Lord Steyn very clearly accepted that a declaration under s 4 was indeed a last resort and that s 3 could be used in an extremely creative fashion in order to avoid having to make one. A somewhat more cautionary note was sounded regarding the application of s 3 in Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Limited v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions.[109] Lord Woolf said that s 3 'does not entitle the court to legislate; its task is still one of interpretation but interpretation in accordance with the direction contained in s 3'.[110] He went on to say that the most difficult task of the courts is that of distinguishing between interpretation and legislation.

Similarly, in Wilson v the First County Trust Ltd[111] the Court of Appeal found that s 127(3) of the Consumer Credit Act 1974 was incompatible with Art 6 and with Art 1 of the First Protocol to the Convention since it imposed an inflexible prohibition against the making of an enforcement order in an instance where a loan agreement did not contain the terms prescribed for the purposes of s 61(1) of the Act. The effect of s 127(3) was therefore to prevent the creditor from obtaining a judicial remedy where the loan agreement did not contain all the prescribed terms. The Court considered the possibility 108 Ibid, paras 44 and 45.

109 [2001] 3 WLR 183; [2001] 4 All ER 604; [2002] QB 48.
110 At paras 75 and 76.
111 [2001] 3 All ER 229.

of finding ‘some other legitimate interpretation’ of the words of the section which would avoid the finding of incompatibility.[112] It said that a court is ‘required [by s 3] to go as far as but not beyond what is legally possible . . . the court is not required or entitled to give to words a meaning which they cannot bear’.[113] In the instance in question, the court did not think that the words would bear a Convention-compliant interpretation and so a declaration of the incompatibility was issued. Clearly, the Court of Appeal considered that there are limits to what can be achieved even under s 3, although their finding is hardly consonant with that of the House of Lords in R v A. That declaration was reversed in the House of Lords on the basis that applying the ‘retrospectivity provisions’ discussed below, the HRA was inapplicable to the factual situation. Clearly, it would not have appeared possible for the Lords to accept the interpretation of Art 6 and Art 1 of Protocol 1 adopted by the Court of Appeal, but then go on to find that the words of s 127(3) could be forced to take a Convention-compliant meaning.

The approach in R v A can also be contrasted with the decision of the Privy Council in Brown v Stott,[114] the first decision of the Law Lords under the HRA. The decision illustrated, it is suggested, the problems that may arise due to the adoption of a form of ‘purposive’ approach and of ‘reading down’ Convention rights by reference to the purpose in question. The decision is discussed fully below, but a number of central findings in it illustrate the approach adopted. Lord Steyn found: ‘national courts may accord to the decisions of national legislatures some deference where the context justifies it . . . the subject [road safety] invites special regulation . . . some infringements [of Art 6] may be justified.’ Lord Hope said:

> the jurisprudence of the Court of Human Rights tells us . . . that [in the case of a non-absolute right] the . . . restriction contended for has to have a legitimate aim in the public interest. If so is there a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised?

He found that, in relation to s 172 of the Road Traffic Act, which requires that drivers identify themselves, on pain of a fine, as driving a car at the material time, the answer to both questions, in terms of limiting the right not to incriminate oneself under Art 6(1), was in the affirmative. This decision exemplifies, it is suggested, the possibilities of undermining the Convention rights by taking a particular view as to the general purposes of the Convention and then by ‘reading down’ a particular right in order to do so. This approach is considered further below in relation to the notions of judicial activism and minimalism.

In re W and B[115] the Lords accepted that, following R v A, words could be read into a statute, but took a more cautious stance in relation to s 3(1). The Lords refused to use s 3 to bring about the radical changes to the Children Act 1989 put in place by the Court of Appeal, and a restrained reading of section 3 was advocated. As Kavanagh observes, ‘The Court of Appeal had read into the Children Act 1989 a range of new 112 Ibid, para 41.

113 Ibid, para 42.

114 [2001] 2 WLR 817; [2001] 2 All ER 97, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. See, for the Scottish decision, Stott v Brown 2000 SLT 379.

115 Re W and B (Children) (Care Plan) [2002] 2 WLR 720.

powers and procedures by which courts could supervise and monitor the implementation of care orders by local authorities, so as to protect children against violations of their rights under Art.8 ECHR'.[116] Lord Nicholls found that s 3(1) is 'a powerful tool whose use is obligatory. It is not an optional canon of construction. Nor is its use dependent on the existence of ambiguity. Further, the section applies retrospectively'.[117] But he found as to a reading of legislation under section 3(1):

> [I]t is sufficient to say that a meaning which departs substantially from a fundamental feature of an Act of Parliament is likely to have crossed the boundary between interpretation and amendment. This is especially so where the departure has important practical repercussions which the court is not equipped to evaluate.[118]

This decision is broadly consistent with R v A on the assumption that the change made in R v A did not depart substantially from a fundamental feature of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act. But Lord Nicholls showed a concern to identify the point at which reading in words would be inappropriate.

The factor of departure from a fundamental feature of the statute was of relevance in Anderson.[119] The incompatibility lay in the involvement of the Secretary of State in sentencing adult life prisoners. The Secretary of State's role in the legislation was a pervasive feature of it. The Secretary of State's role in sentencing was found to be incompatible with Art 6 since he could not be viewed as an independent and impartial tribunal. A declaration of incompatibility was made rather than seeking to use s 3(1) since the Secretary of State's role was such a fundamental feature of the statute as a whole – any other approach would have been against the grain of the statute. Since the use of s 3 was therefore rejected, the House of Lords instead issued a declaration of incompatibility on the ground that a power conferred on the Home Secretary by s 29 of the Crime (Sentencing) Act 1997 to control the release of mandatory life sentence prisoners was inconsistent with the right to have a sentence imposed by 'an independent and impartial tribunal', under Art 6 ECHR.

Lord Hope took a similar stance in R v Lambert.[120] He said as to section 3 that:

> Resort to it will not be possible if the legislation contains provisions, either in the words or phrases which are under scrutiny or elsewhere, which expressly contradict the meaning which the enactment would have to be given to make it compatible. The same consequence will follow if legislation contains provisions which have this effect by necessary implication . . . It does not give power to the judges to overrule decisions which the language of the statute shows have been taken on the very point at issue by the 'legislator'.[121]

116 Kavanagh, A, 'Statutory interpretation and human rights after Anderson: a more contextual approach' [2004] PL 537 at p 538.

117 At para 37.

118 At para 40.

119 R (on the application of Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2003] 1 AC 837.

120 R v Lambert [2001] 3 All ER 577.

121 At para 79.

The legislation at issue in Lambert was the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971; the Lords found that a reverse onus clause in the statute appeared to violate Art 6(2), ECHR. It placed a legal burden on the accused: he had to prove that he was ignorant of the fact that the substance that he had in his possession was a controlled drug; if he did not prove his ignorance of the fact he would be convicted. Their Lordships re-interpreted this provision, relying on s 3(1), so that it imposed an evidential burden only on the accused. The Lords read the words, 'proves that he neither believed or suspected that the substance in question was a controlled drug' as meaning, 'leads evidence such as to raise an issue as to whether he knew that the substance in question was a controlled drug'.[122] Thus although Lord Hope stated that the courts should not change a Parliamentary decision which it is clear has been taken on the very point at issue by the legislator, it appears that that is in fact what the Lords managed to do.

Lambert was one of a group of decisions taken in the context of a governmental demand for the use of reverse onus provisions in response to global concerns about terrorism and organised crime, especially drug trafficking, people trafficking and serious fraud.[123] In this context the lawbreaking in question tends to be systematically planned by professional criminals, providing encouragement to a policy of imposing a greater burden on the defendant despite the accompanying impact on the presumption of innocence. The 'reading down' under s 3 HRA of reverse burdens to evidential ones, has provided something of a check to this governmental tendency[124] and a reassertion of the fundamental right encapsulated in Art 6(2),[125] and long recognised under common law principle.[126] This tendency was also evident in Sheldrake v DPP.[127] Sheldrake concerned the offence of belonging to a proscribed terrorist organisation contrary to s 11, Terrorism Act 2000.[128] The defendant argued that at the time when he became a member or professed to become a member of the organisation it had not yet been proscribed (the defence provided by s 11(2)). The Court of Appeal found that s 11(2) did not relate to an element of the offence, but that in any event if it did it was compatible with Art 6(2). The House of Lords, by a three to two majority, reversed this decision, 122 See, e.g., Lord Hope at para 94. See further Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act 2006, pp 160–61.

123 In R v DPP ex p Kebilene [2000] 2 AC 326 (HL) (see pp 1347–52); R v Lambert (Steven) [2001] UKLH 37, discussed above; R v Johnstone (Robert Alexander) [2003] UKHL 28; Attorney-General's Reference (No 1 of 2004) [2004] 1 WLR 211; Sheldrake v DPP [2004] UKHL 43 (two conjoined appeals, one of which is discussed below).

124 Williams in 'The Logic of Exceptions' [1988] Cambridge Law Journal 261 argues that the word 'prove' in an English statute can legitimately be interpreted as imposing only an 'evidential burden' on the defendant. See further, Tadros, V and Tierney, S, 'The Presumption of Innocence and the Human Rights Act', (2004) 67 MLR 402, at 403; Simester, AP and Sullivan, GR, Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 2nd edn, 2004, esp p 69; Dennis, I, 'Reverse Onuses and the Presumption of Innocence: In Search of Principle' [2005] CLR 901; Dingwall, G, 'Statutory Exceptions, Burdens of Proof and the Human Rights Act 1998' (2002) 65 MLR 40; Ashworth, A, 'Four Threats to the Presumption of Innocence' (2006) 10 International Journal of Evidence and Proof 241; Ashworth, A, 'Criminal Justice Reform: Principles, Human Rights and Public Protection' [2004] Crim LR 516.

125 See Chapter 2, pp 64–65.

126 See Woolmington [1935] AC 462, 481–82. See further Ashworth, A and Blake, M, 'The Presumption of Innocence in English Criminal Law' [1996] CLR 306.

127 Sheldrake v DPP [2004] UKHL 43; [2005] 1 AC 264; [2005] 1 All ER 237.

128 See further Chapter 14, pp 1391–92.

Lord Bingham finding that a person who had not engaged in any blameworthy conduct could come within s 11(1) and that the presumption of innocence was infringed by requiring him or her to disprove involvement in the organisation at the time in question. Thus the Lords found that s 11(2) imposes an evidential burden only. A majority of the House of Lords relied on s 3 to read the word 'prove' as though it meant 'adduce sufficient evidence to raise an issue in the case'.

In a further decision in the terrorism context, R(MB) v Secretary of State for the Home Department,[129] the Court of Appeal reversed the judgment of Sullivan J who had made a declaration of incompatibility, in holding that the procedure available under the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005 to challenge a non-derogating control order breached Art 6. The Court of Appeal reversed his decision on the basis that s 3 of the HRA could be applied to read down s 11(2) of the 2005 Act; the Court found: 'we consider that section 3(10) can and should be 'read down' [under s 3 HRA] so as to require the court to consider whether the decisions of the Secretary of State in relation to the control order are flawed as at the time of the court's determination'.[130]

As fully discussed in Chapter 6, radically differing views of the effect of s 3 were expressed in the Court of Appeal[131] and in the House of Lords[132] in R (on the application of Pro-Life Alliance) v BBC.[133] The Court of Appeal's approach resembled that taken in R v A; Laws LJ, having concluded that both common law and Art 10 protection for freedom of expression forbade censorship of the Pro-Life Alliance video, did not seek to explain what should be done in relation to the statutory provision at issue – s 6(1)(a) of the Broadcasting Act 1990 – in order to render it compatible with Art 10. Laws LJ did not rely expressly on s 3 HRA; he merely found, 'the Broadcasting Act 1990 . . . must be read conformably with this principle'.[134] As Chapter 6 points out, the House of Lords also virtually ignored s 3 but on the basis of a very different stance taken towards Art 10; as discussed in that chapter, the House was determined to defer to the views of the broadcasters; in so doing it appeared to overlook the duty placed on it by s 3 to interpret the legislation in issue – the Broadcasting Act – compatibly with the Convention rights if possible. The provision at issue could in fact readily have been re-interpreted in order to achieve Art 10 compliance.[135]

In Bellinger v Bellinger,[136] W, a post-operative transsexual, appealed against a decision under the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 that she was not lawfully married to her husband, H, because she, W, was not female. Section 11 of the 1973 Act states: 'A marriage . . . shall be void on the following grounds only, that is to say . . . that the parties are not respectively male and female . . .'. W argued that the word 'female' should be interpreted as including her and other post-operative transsexuals, relying on her right to private and family life under Art 8 ECHR. As Phillipson has argued, 'All that was required was the re-interpretation of the single word "female",

129 [2006] EWCA Civ 1140.
130 At para 46.
131 [2002] 2 All ER 756.
132 [2004] 1 AC 185.
133 See Chapter 6, pp 534–43.
134 Ibid at para 44.
135 See Chapter 6, p 543.
136 [2003] 2 AC 467 (HL).

to reflect modern understandings of the protean nature of gender, so that it included post-operative male to female transsexuals.'[137] However, the House of Lords refused to reinterpret the word 'female' to include transsexuals as had been argued for. They were influenced by the fact that the government had already accepted that the area of law in question had become incompatible with Art 8 and had stated that it intended to bring legislation before Parliament to remedy the matter. In those circumstances, it appeared that the Lords preferred to leave reform of the law to Parliament which would be able to take a far more comprehensive and systematic view of the issue. A range of policy matters were involved; as Kavanagh observes: 'the resulting change in the law would have [had] far-reaching practical ramifications, raising issues whose solution calls for extensive inquiry and the widest public consultation and discussion which was more appropriate for Parliament than the courts'.[138]

In Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza,[139] discussed fully in Chapter 15,[140] the Court of Appeal found that Sched 1, para 2 of the Rent Act 1977 was incompatible with Art 14 read with Art 8. But it found that the potential incompatibility could be remedied under s 3 HRA by construing the words 'as his or her wife or husband' in Sched 1, para 2 as if they meant 'as if they were his or her wife or husband'. The House of Lords in Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza agreed with the Court of Appeal, and used s 3 HRA to interpret the statute to avoid the discrimination against homosexuals so that they had the same rights to succeed to tenancies upon the death of their partner as were enjoyed by heterosexual couples. This meant not merely changing the meaning given to certain words, but the addition of (a few) words that were not included in the provision.

Lord Nicholls made a number of very significant points on s 3 which are worth quoting in full since Ghaidan is now the leading decision on s 3:[141]

> [T]he first point to be considered is how far, when enacting section 3, Parliament intended that the actual language of a statute, as distinct from the concept expressed in that language, should be determinative. Since section 3 relates to the "interpretation" of legislation, it is natural to focus attention initially on the language used in the legislative provision being considered. But once it is accepted that section 3 may require legislation to bear a meaning which departs from the unambiguous meaning the legislation would otherwise bear, it becomes impossible to suppose Parliament intended that the operation of section 3 should depend critically upon the particular form of words adopted by the parliamentary draftsman in the statutory provision under consideration. That would make the application of section 3 something of a semantic lottery. If the draftsman chose to express the concept being enacted in one form of words, section 3 would be available to achieve Convention-compliance. If he chose a different form of words, section 3 would be impotent (emphasis added).

137 Phillipson, G, 'Deference, Discretion and Democracy in the Human Rights Act Era' (2007) CLP 40 at p 65.

138 'Statutory interpretation and human rights after Anderson: a more contextual approach' [2004] PL 537 at 541.

139 [2003] 2 WLR 478; [2002] 4 All ER 1162; [2004] 2 AC 557 (HL).

140 See pp 1525–26.

141 At paras 31–34.

> From this the conclusion which seems inescapable is that the mere fact the language under consideration is inconsistent with a Convention-compliant meaning does not of itself make a Convention-compliant interpretation under section 3 impossible. Section 3 enables language to be interpreted restrictively or expansively. But section 3 goes further than this. It is also apt to require a court to read in words which change the meaning of the enacted legislation, so as to make it Convention-compliant. In other words, the intention of Parliament in enacting section 3 was that, to an extent bounded only by what is "possible", a court can modify the meaning, and hence the effect, of primary and secondary legislation.
>
> Parliament, however, cannot have intended that in the discharge of this extended interpretative function the courts should adopt a meaning inconsistent with a fundamental feature of legislation. That would be to cross the constitutional boundary section 3 seeks to demarcate and preserve. Parliament has retained the right to enact legislation in terms which are not Convention-compliant. The meaning imported by application of section 3 must be compatible with the underlying thrust of the legislation being construed. Words implied must, in the phrase of my noble and learned friend Lord Rodger of Earlsferry, "go with the grain of the legislation". Nor can Parliament have intended that section 3 should require courts to make decisions for which they are not equipped. There may be several ways of making a provision Convention-compliant, and the choice may involve issues calling for legislative deliberation (emphasis added).
>
> Both these features were present in In re S (Minors)(Care Order: Implementation of Care Plan) [2002] 2 AC 291. There the proposed "starring system" was inconsistent in an important respect with the scheme of the Children Act 1989, and the proposed system had far-reaching practical ramifications for local authorities. Again, in R (Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2003] 1 AC 837 section 29 of the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 could not be read in a Convention-compliant way without giving the section a meaning inconsistent with an important feature expressed clearly in the legislation. In Bellinger v Bellinger [2003] 2 AC 467 recognition of Mrs Bellinger as female for the purposes of section 11(c) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 would have had exceedingly wide ramifications, raising issues ill-suited for determination by the courts or court procedures.

The majority in the Lords took a broadly similar view.[142] Thus, it is now accepted, as Lord Nicholls stated, that section 3 may require legislation to bear a meaning which departs from the unambiguous meaning the legislation would otherwise bear, since the particular form of words used by the draftsman to express the concept of the statute – its underlying policy – should not be allowed to prevent the courts from achieving Convention-compliance. But in using s 3 to modify the meaning of the statute a meaning cannot be adopted, he said, that goes against a fundamental feature of the legislation or requires legislative deliberation.

142 For discussion of the other judgments, including the dissenting judgment of Lord Millett, see Kavanagh, A, in Judicial Reasoning under the HRA (2007) fn 1 above, Chapter 5.

The House of Lords thus went on to adopt the course taken in the Court of Appeal, and found that the words ‘living with the tenant as his or her wife or husband’ could be read as: ‘living with the tenant, as if they were his or her wife or husband’. This change was much more radical than the change argued for in Bellinger. The Lords appeared to be prepared to take this stance since, unlike the position in Bellinger v Bellinger, the change in meaning to the law was a straightforward one and affected only one provision of the statute; also it did not appear to have the wide-ranging policy ramifications that the change argued for in Bellinger might have had. It provided, as Lord Steyn pointed out, a remedy that would not otherwise have been available for the claimant:

> It is necessary to state what section 3(1), and in particular the word ‘possible’, does not mean. First, section 3(1) applies even if there is no ambiguity in the language in the sense of it being capable of bearing two possible meanings. The word ‘possible’ in section 3(1) is used in a different and much stronger sense. Secondly, section 3(1) imposes a stronger and more radical obligation than to adopt a purposive interpretation in the light of the ECHR. Thirdly, the draftsman of the Act had before him the model of the New Zealand Bill of Rights Act which imposes a requirement that the interpretation to be adopted must be reasonable. Parliament specifically rejected the legislative model of requiring a reasonable interpretation.
>
> Instead the draftsman had resort to the analogy of the obligation under the EEC Treaty on national courts, as far as possible, to interpret national legislation in the light of the wording and purpose of Directives.[143] . . . Given the undoubted strength of this interpretative obligation under EEC law, this is a significant signpost to the meaning of section 3(1) in the 1998 Act.
>
> Parliament had before it the mischief and objective sought to be addressed, viz the need ‘to bring rights home’. The linch-pin of the legislative scheme to achieve this purpose was section 3(1). Rights could only be effectively brought home if section 3(1) was the prime remedial measure, and section 4 a measure of last resort. How the system modelled on the EEC interpretative obligation would work was graphically illustrated for Parliament during the progress of the Bill through both Houses . . . It was envisaged that the duty of the court would be to strive to find (if possible) a meaning which would best accord with Convention rights. This is the remedial scheme which Parliament adopted.[144]

Furthermore, the change did not go against the grain of the statute; as Klug and Starmer put it,[145] the re-interpretation was ‘fairly viewed as compatible with the thrust of the statute, which was intended to include cohabiting as well as married couples, but on its face discriminated against homosexuals'. Nevetheless, Ghaidan obviously takes a radical approach which appears at first glance to take a stance towards s 3 very similar to that taken in R v A. Kavanagh argues that the Lords went too far in Ghaidan in appearing to take the stance that there are no textual limits to the operation of s 3(1).[146] This point is returned to below.

143 He noted that in Marleasing SA v La Comercial Internacional de Alimentación SA (Case C-106/89) [1990] ECR I-4135, 4159 the European Court of Justice defined this obligation as follows: ‘It follows that, in applying national law, whether the provisions in questions were adopted before or after the directive, the national court called upon to interpret it is required to do so, as far as possible, in light of the wording and the purpose of the directive in order to achieve the result pursued by the latter and thereby comply with the third paragraph of Article 189 of the Treaty’

144 At paras 44–46.

145 ‘Standing Back from the Human Rights Act: How Effective is it Five Years On?’ (2005) PL 716, p 720.

A further possibility arises. This point has not yet been relied upon, but it could be put forward in relation to post-HRA statutes, or statutes enacted in order to achieve Convention-compliance after an adverse ruling in the ECHR, such as the Contempt of Court Act 1981. If in such an instance the judges were prepared to accept that Parliament had partially failed to achieve its aim in enacting the provisions in question, then reading words into the statute to achieve Convention-compliance even where it was arguable that they came close to going against the grain of the statute, could be seen, not as defeating Parliament's intention, but as perfecting it. This could be argued in relation to post-HRA statutes on the basis that a declaration of the compatibility of the statute with the Convention had been made under s 19 and that therefore Parliament must have intended to enact provisions that did achieve compatibility. However, that would only be the case where it was clear that the Convention under the HRA demanded the change, which had been overlooked by Parliament.

Summing-up the current approach to s 3[147]

Clearly, 'the precise limits of the s 3 rule of construction remain controversial'.[148] But, as indicated, those limits are becoming apparent. Following the lead of the House of Lords in the key decisions mentioned, in particular R v A, Donoghue, Alconbury,[149] Bellinger, Ghaidan, it is apparent that a number of steps are being taken when the argument is put that a legislative provision is incompatible with a Convention right. First, whether or not a declaration of incompatibility has already been made in a lower court (or, if in a court unable to make a formal declaration, an informal finding of incompatibility), the Strasbourg jurisprudence and the provision itself are considered

146 See Judicial Reasoning under the HRA (2007) fn 1 above, Chapter 5.

147 See further: Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, (2006) Part II; Phillipson, G, '(Mis)Reading Section 3(1) of the Human Rights Act' [2003] LQR 183; Young, A, 'Judicial Sovereignty and the Human Rights Act 1998' [2002] CLJ 53; Kavanagh, A, 'Statutory interpretation and human rights after Anderson: a more contextual approach' [2004] PL 537; Kavanagh, A, 'Unlocking the Human Rights Act: the 'radical approach' to section 3(1) revisited' (2005) 3 EHRLR 259; Kavanagh, A, in Judicial Reasoning under the HRA (2007) fn 1 above, Chapter 5. For two recent decisions on the effect of s 3 which relied on the Ghaidan approach, see R v Holding [2006] 1 WLR 1040 in which the Court of Appeal read down s 75 of the Representation of the People Act 1983 and Culnane v Morris [2006] 2 All ER 149 in which s 10 of the Defamation Act 1952 was re-construed under s 3 HRA.

148 Gearty, C, 'Reconciling Parliamentary Democracy and Human Rights' (2002) 118 LQR 248; Phillipson, G, '(Mis)Reading Section 3(1) of the Human Rights Act' (2003) LQR 183 (a response to C Gearty); Young, A, 'Judicial Sovereignty and the Human Rights Act 1998' [2002] CLJ 53; Kavanagh, 'Statutory interpretation and human rights after Anderson: a more contextual approach' [2004] PL 537, which responds to Nicol, D 'Statutory interpretation and human rights after Anderson' [2004] PL 273.

149 R (on the application of Alconbury Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] 2 All ER 929; (2001) NLJ 135.

afresh in order to determine whether there is, on close scrutiny, a problem regarding compatibility. That may be the end of the matter, as in Alconbury.

Second, if there does appear to be potential incompatibility, it may be resolvable using accepted interpretative techniques as in Brown v Stott,[150] without relying on s 3.[151] Third, if the use of such techniques alone would almost certainly mean that a declaration of incompatibility has to be made, the court will consider the use of s 3. Section 3 may be used in a very creative fashion, as indicated by Lord Steyn in the majority in R v A, and by Lord Nicholls in Ghaidan, in order to avoid a finding of incompatibility unless, according to Donoghue, so doing would mean crossing the boundary between interpreting and legislating. Bellinger and Ghaidan indicate that the word 'possible' in s 3(1) relates to matters ranging well beyond linguistic possibility. Clearly, they appear to view it as denoting something that is possible linguistically but that may be undesirable, for a range of reasons. So when will the courts be prepared to read words into a statute, or to reinterpret an existing word, in order to avoid incompatibility? In other words, which factors will persuade them to the more radical approach adopted in R v A and in Ghaidan? Their approach appears to be that they will adopt that more radical approach where it appears to them to be proper and desirable to do so. What factors will strike them as bringing a particular instance into that category of desirableness? The word 'desirable' is used deliberately in preference to the more neutral 'appropriate' used by Kavanagh. She points out that the courts will take a more radical approach to compatibility under s 3, not where it is 'possible' to do so, but where they think it is appropriate, taking various matters into account, to do so.[152]

The following discussion is based on Dr Kavanagh's analysis of the s 3(1) cases[153] which the author finds compelling in the sense that it is the most accurate analysis of the wide range of factors that the courts are relying on in determining how radical their approach should be in particular instances under s 3. Clearly, the courts are concerned that they should not cross the line between interpretation and legislation. Kavanagh argues that the decision in re S and re W,[154] shows that, while the courts are prepared to read words into statutes, as in R v A, or Ghaidan, they will not do so, 'as a way of radically reforming a whole statute or writing a quasi-legislative code granting new

150 This approach receives support from Donoghue v Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd and the Secretary of State for the Environment [2001] 3 WLR 183; [2001] 4 All ER 604. The Lord Chief Justice said that, 'unless legislation would otherwise be in breach of the Convention s 3 can be ignored; so courts should always ascertain whether, absent s 3, there would be any breach of the Convention (at para 75).'

151 See Ghaidan at para 24; see also International Transport Roth GmbH v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] 3 WLR 344.

152 'Statutory interpretation and human rights after Anderson: a more contextual approach' [2004] PL 537 at pp 544–45.

153 See Kavanagh, A, 'Unlocking the Human Rights Act: the 'radical approach' to section 3(1) revisited' (2005) 3 EHRLR 259; see in particular 'The elusive divide between interpretation and legislation under the HRA' (2004) 24(2) OJLS 259; and 'Statutory interpretation and human rights after Anderson: a more contextual approach' [2004] P.L. 537, which is a response, in part, to Nicol, D, 'Statutory interpretation and human rights after Anderson' [2004] PL 273. The analysis below (pp 184–85) partially follows my co-author's in Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act, pp 161–62.

154 [2002] 2 AC 291. This decision was reversed unanimously by the House of Lords.

powers and setting out new procedures to replace that statute'.[155] As discussed, the Court of Appeal had written a number of provisions into the statute in re S under s 3 – an approach that was rejected by the House of Lords.

Another aspect of this stance is to find that the change proposed, to ensure compatibility, will probably be rejected where it would run counter to a pervasive feature of the statute – where the objectionable provisions permeate the statute. This factor was decisive in Anderson.[156] In R v A, or Lambert or Ghaidan the objected-to provision was not viewed as fundamental to the statute as a whole or a substantial part of it. Where the change is viewed as fundamental it would probably require extensive statutory modification to achieve compatibility. Clearly, different views could be taken as to the fundamental nature or otherwise of a provision.

The subject-matter of the provision at issue is relevant. If it relates to matters peculiarly within the judicial domain, including the ordering of the criminal or civil justice system, in matters of sentencing, or admissibility of evidence, the judges are more likely to be prepared to take a radical approach, as they did in R v A and in R v Offen.[157] In taking such a stance in that context they would not view themselves as stepping outside their own area of constitutional responsibility.

If, however, a case involves issues of social policy or resource allocation, the courts are much less likely to be bold. This factor was of relevance in re S: the proposed 'interpretation' of the statute that had been accepted in the Court of Appeal would also have had, 'far-reaching practical ramifications for local authorities and their care of children, including the authority's allocation of scarce financial and other resources'.[158] Those policy and resource factors were also of relevance, as indicated above, in Bellinger v Bellinger and persuaded the court to take a cautious approach to s 3.[159] As discussed, the change brought about in Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza[160] did not engage significant countervailing policy or resource-based factors. In both Lambert and Sheldrake the judges were arguably therefore pulled in opposing directions; in confronting reverse onus clauses aimed at combating organised crime or terrorism, both decisions concerned matters that could be viewed as within the judicial area of particular competence, but they also related to resource allocation in terms of the costs and difficulties of combating organised crime and bringing those allegedly involved to trial, as the culmination of a resource-intensive process.

Kavanagh further argues, referring to Lord Steyn's judgment in Ghaidan, that the key to understanding the various uses of s 3 is to see it as a remedial provision.[161] In other words, where the use of s 3 rather than s 4 is the only means of providing a remedy in the particular situation, the judges will tend to employ s 3. As she notes, in 155 'Statutory interpretation and human rights after Anderson: a more contextual approach' [2004] PL 537 at p 540.

156 R (on the application of Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2003] 1 AC 837.

157 [2001] 1 WLR 253. The case concerned the 'reading down' of provisions governing mandatory sentences for repeat offenders.

158 Kavanagh, 'Statutory interpretation and human rights after Anderson: a more contextual approach' [2004] PL 537 at p 540.

159 [2003] 2 AC 467 (HL).

160 [2004] 2 AC 557 (HL).

161 See Judicial Reasoning under the HRA (2007) fn 1 above, Chapter 5.

Bellinger, a remedy was about to be provided for the applicant by planned legislation, whereas in Ghaidan Mr Mendoza would have had no means of succeeding to a statutory tenancy had s 3 not been employed as it was.

So it appears that the courts are prepared to depart from the literal meaning of the section and to read words into it where the new interpretation does not go against a pervasive feature of the statute.[162] At the same time the court will feel most comfortable with this stance where the reform proposed is largely a matter of interpretation rather than one of implying into the statute an entirely new provision that was absent from it.[163] If the area in question is one that is clearly within the judicial domain in terms of constitutional competence and role they are also more inclined to boldness.[164] The argument will be aided if Parliament is not otherwise addressing this issue – there are no plans to reform the objected-to provision – and no issues of resource allocation arise. In such circumstances there will be positive reasons for activism and none for deference.

As a final step, if one or more of the other countervailing factors discussed are present, so that the use of s 3 is viewed as inappropriate in order to find compatibility, a declaration of the incompatibility will have to be made, when and if the matter reaches a court able to make such a declaration, under s 4.[165] It now appears that the courts tend to view s 3, not s 4, as the main remedial mechanism of the HRA, only turning to s 4 exceptionally as a last resort, so normally this fourth step will not be needed.[166] If no remedy is available or in prospect, except by way of s 3, it appears that the courts may be strongly inclined towards the more radical use of s 3.

Conclusions

It is argued that the approach being taken to s 3, especially the stance taken in R v A, is not one that it is entirely easy to feel comfortable with in terms of the doctrine of Parliamentary sovereignty. Space precludes extended analysis of R v A here,[167] but some differences between it and Ghaidan – the other most radical s 3 case – can be identified which could be viewed as building in further indicators as to when the radical s 3 approach is appropriate and when it is not. R v A is singled out since it is argued that Art 6 did not clearly demand the change that Lord Steyn imposed on the statute,[168]

162 Cf R (on the application of Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] 1 AC 837.

163 As in the Court of Appeal in re S and re W (Care Orders); HL: [2002] 2 AC 291.

164 The context is relevant in terms of both expertise and constitutional role: R v A [2002] 1 AC 45; R v Offen [2001] 1 WLR 253.

165 As in Wilson v First County Trust Ltd [2001] 3 All ER 229; [2001] EWCA Civ 633, although arguably, it is unclear that the Convention absolutely demanded this result.

166 See Lord Steyn's remarks on this point in Ghaidan [2004] 2 AC 557 (HL) at para 50.

167 See for debate on R v A, Kavanagh, A, 'Unlocking the Human Rights Act: the radical approach to section 3(1) revisited' (2005) 3 EHRLR 259 (she defends the decision in terms of the use of s 3). See also Young, A, 'Judicial Sovereignty and the Human Rights Act 1998' [2002] CLJ 53.

168 See Chapter 13, p 1292. It is pointed out that the Convention leaves a wide margin of appreciation to member states as to evidential matters. Lord Steyn's analysis was less rooted in the Art 6 jurisprudence than was that of the House of Lords in Ghaidan; no decision at Strasbourg under Art 6 directly supports Lord Steyn's stance.

whereas it is argued that Art 8 did demand the change imposed in Ghaidan.[169] Therefore R v A sits uneasily with the leading s 2 cases, discussed below,[170] in which it has been found that courts should 'interpret the Convention rights in a way which keeps pace with rather than leaps ahead of the Convention jurisprudence as it evolves over time.'[171] Even if, as argued below, the view is taken that the courts are free to broaden the ambit of a Convention right, unless that jurisprudence imposes a clear limit on its ambit, it may be argued that where there are countervailing constitutional and Convention-based considerations, that course should not be taken. In Ghaidan an individual right was at stake and opposed only by a societal concern – an interest in entering into an agreement on a certain contractual basis even if in a discriminatory fashion. In such instances, as documented throughout this book, the starting-point is always the primacy of the right and the exception to it is to be narrowly construed.[172]

In R v A, on the other hand, it is arguable that a clash of two Convention rights occurred – between Arts 6 and 8,[173] and possibly between Arts 6 and 3 – although the Lords did not recognise this. The Lords were bound by all the rights under s 6 HRA and, it is contended, should have respected the balance that Parliament had very recently struck between them in the statute at issue. In terms of separation of powers, arguably, a very difficult moral clash occurred which Parliament, not the courts, had already resolved, taking full account of the issues involved, and Parliament's solution should have remained undisturbed. The change did have policy and resource-based implications since it affected the use of police and CPS resources in rape cases as the decision may have had some impact in hindering a rise in the rape conviction rate.[174] In terms of the remedial role of s 3, it should be noted that the change imposed by Lord Steyn could be said to have removed a remedy for a harm suffered by victims – that of the humiliation endured if sexual behaviour evidence is admitted. The psychological harm suffered by the victim whose rapist is acquitted, either because she withdraws in the face of the threat that such evidence will be admitted,[175] or because the evidence undermines her credibility, arguably could be viewed as Art 3 treatment.[176]

169 See Chapter 15, pp 1525–26.

170 See pp 191–97.

171 R (on the application of Marper) v Chief Constable of South Yorkshire [2004] 1 WLR 2196 at para 78, per Baroness Hale.

172 See, e.g., Chapter 9, p 951, fn 669 and associated text.

173 In part, on the basis that Art 8 gives protection to information pertaining to sexual behaviour: see Chapter 9, pp 927–28. There is also the question of humiliation; see Chapter 12, p 1207. Clearly, the clash might be resolved in favour of Art 6 since Art 8 is materially qualified, but the fact that the victim's Art 8 right was arguably at stake should have been recognised.

174 See Temkin, J, Section 41: An Evaluation Of New Legislation Limiting Sexual History Evidence In Rape Trials, Home Office Online Report 20/2006, with Kelly, L and Griffiths, S. She found that judges tend to interpret R v A broadly and to admit sexual behaviour evidence on the ground that otherwise a fair trial could be jeopardised. She found that this did have an impact on conviction rates (Conclusions section).

175 See Temkin, J, Section 41: An Evaluation Of New Legislation Limiting Sexual History Evidence In Rape Trials, Home Office Online Report 20/2006, with Kelly and Griffiths on this point: she notes that victims did withdraw once an application to admit sexual behaviour evidence was made, and this appeared to be because they did not want to face a humiliating cross examination.

176 It may be noted that a complaint under Art 3 in respect of degrading treatment of a woman in a UK rape trial was declared admissible at Strasbourg: JM v UK (2001) 2 EHRLR 215. The woman was Moreover, the change imposed by Lord Steyn on the statute did go against the grain of the provision in question, whereas in Ghaidan the provision appeared to be intended to protect co-habiting couples, which in 2003 were much more likely to be homosexual couples than would have been contemplated in 1977, when the Rent Act was passed. The Rent Act may have been intended to create discrimination against homosexual couples, but it was passed at a time when homosexual acts had only been legal for a short period of time, and therefore the social and human rights implications of importing discrimination were not thoroughly investigated and debated in the way that they would have been had the statute been passed post-HRA. Parliament may have intended that discrimination should occur, but it did not and could not contemplate all the consequences of its decision at the time.

On the other hand, s 41 of the 1999 Act was deliberately intended by Parliament, after weighing the evidence, to improve the position of the victim of rape and to increase the number of rape convictions. The argument against the change in Ghaidan was unmeritorious: it was that private landlords should be able to discriminate on grounds of sexual orientation in housing provision although they are forbidden by law to do so on grounds of race or gender. That argument opposed fundamental values enshrined in the European Convention and strongly recognized in EU law, as Chapter 15 demonstrates.[177] Perhaps most crucially, it should be noted that had R v A been decided the other way, and the defendant had taken the case to Strasbourg arguing for a breach of Art 6, the success of the application could not have been assured, whereas it is argued that Ghaidan would have succeeded under Art 8 at Strasbourg.[178] That test – the chances of success of the 'losing' party at Strasbourg if the case were to go the other way – should, it is contended, be pivotal in determining whether a radical interpretation should be imposed on statutory provisions, since the intention of Parliament expressed in the HRA, and accepted in post-HRA judgments, was that citizens should be able to claim their rights in the domestic courts against public authorities where they would be able to claim them at Strasbourg. As the House of Lords has found, the HRA should not offer less than Strasbourg would offer.[179] Where the Strasbourg standard is in accord with that maintained in other comparable jurisdictions and under international human rights standards, this argument would be even stronger. It is argued then that Ghaidan can be seen as entirely in accordance with the spirit of the Convention, which Parliament wished to see fully received into UK law, while R v A was an exercise in illegitimate judicial legislation in the sense that it was very doubtfully in accordance with that spirit.

These two decisions, both on the borderline between legislating and interpreting, arguably illustrate the factors that, it is contended, should legitimately be taken into subjected to prolonged cross-examination – over a period of days – by the rapist himself, who was deliberately wearing the clothes in which he had raped her. The experience, which was extremely humiliating and distressing, could no longer recur thanks to the provision of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999, s 34, introduced as a result of that case.

177 See pp 1525–26.

178 See Chapter 15, pp 1519–21.

179 See R (on the application of Ullah) v Special Adjudicator [2004] UKHL 26; in the context of s 2 Lord Bingham said: 'The duty of domestic courts is to keep pace with the Strasbourg jurisprudence as it evolves over time: no more but certainly no less' at para 20.

account in determining whether to adopt a radical approach. It is argued that a hierarchy of factors should be identified, founded strongly on the differing constitutional roles and competences of the courts and Parliament, and that the two most significant are the demands of the Convention, taking the jurisprudence into account, and the difficulty of bringing about the change in question in the sense that it opposes a fundamental feature of the statute. In terms of weighing up what is to count as a 'fundamental feature', it is argued that a number of factors might be relevant. Where a provision in a Bill is the product of wide-ranging consultation with interested parties, and Parliament, after weighing up the issues fully, clearly intended the provision in question to have the effect that it has – as in R v A, as opposed to an instance in which the effect is merely incidental – as arguably was the case in Ghaidan, the courts should be more inclined to accept that interference goes against the grain of the statute. Where the converse is the case, interference is more readily justifiable.

The use of the range of factors identified clearly allows the senior judiciary a great deal of leeway to allow their own values to have an influence on legislation, under the cloak of deploying neutral factors and using interpretative techniques. Reliance mainly on s 3 tends to marginalise the democratic process: if s 3 is used, even if it emasculates a legislative provision, as in R v A, Parliament will not have been asked – under the s 4 procedure – to amend the provision. The whole process remains in the hands of the judiciary. In this sense, R v A has, it is contended, placed the whole carefully crafted scheme of the HRA in jeopardy. The tensions inherent in the scheme have been explored and heightened, since it appears that s 3 will almost always be used to outflank s 4 and s 10. The idea, which seemed to be inherent in s 4, that declarations of incompatibility would be made, even in criminal cases, seems to have been shown to be misconceived. Clearly, it is hard to see that they could be where Art 6 is concerned: if a conviction is obtained in breach of Art 6, it is unsafe;[180] therefore, if a conviction is obtained after a declaration of the incompatibility of a relevant legislative provision with Art 6, it is likely to be viewed as unsafe, unless it could be argued that the provision had had in its effects, ultimately, no or virtually no impact on the conviction.[181] The possibility of convictions obtained in breach of the Convention was inherent in the compromise effected under s 3. But in general it is argued that the judges should show a greater preparedness to use the s 4 route, bearing in mind that the government has been receptive to declarations of incompatibility, as discussed below.

In response to R v A, in which arguably the Art 8 rights of the victim were disregarded, it would have seemed on the face of it possible for Parliament merely to reinstate the offending provision, using words that left no leeway at all for the bold interpretation placed upon s 41(3)(c) of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999,[182] although the findings in Ghaidan did not give much encouragement to that possibility. It should be noted that the House of Lords considered that the provision had provided a 'gateway' for the very creative interpretation adopted.[183] But it would not have been realistic to reinstate the provision using a notwithstanding clause to protect it, such as 'this provision is to be applied notwithstanding the provisions of Art 6(1)', since its use in practice would have appeared to render convictions obtained unsafe, while the government would have suffered the international embarrassment attendant on appearing to legislate deliberately in breach of the Convention.

180 Condron v UK (2001) 31 EHRR 1. See also Forbes [2001] 2 WLR 1, p 13, para 24.

181 Bearing in mind the fact that jurors do not give reasons for conviction and cannot be asked about them, it would be difficult in some instances to be sure that this was the case. But if, as in R v A itself, the allegedly incompatible provision concerned the admission of evidence, and ultimately the evidence was not admitted, it would be possible to say that the conviction was not unsafe.

182 In similar circumstances in Canada, noted below at p 260, the reinstated rape shield law (Criminal Code as amended, s 276) survived a human rights challenge in 2000: R v Darrach (2000) 191 DLR (4th) 539.

Again, under the HRA there is nothing theoretically to prevent the over-turning of Ghaidan by a statute with one single, overriding purpose – to discriminate against homosexual couples in provision of housing.[184] Not only could a government commanding a majority in Parliament probably ensure that such legislation was passed (it certainly could as far as the HRA itself is concerned), but the judges would have to apply it so long as the provisions incompatible with Arts 8 and 14 were pervasive enough to be viewed as a fundamental feature of the statute. It is perhaps somewhat ironic that the more pervasive and clear the incompatibility, the less that can be done in response to it in remedial terms under s 3. But as a matter of constitutional practice a government would be very unlikely to be seek to reinstate provisions found authoritatively by the House of Lords to be in breach of the Convention. Seeking to do so would not only breach the UK's obligations at the international level (although possibly not in the R v A instance), it would also undermine the judges' constitutional role as the guardian of human rights. Further, although this is a less significant point, the HRA as currently conceived is quite a blunt instrument to be used for the purpose of passing legislative provisions already found at the domestic level to have breached the Convention (although of course on a face value reading it appeared to be intended that it could be used for that purpose). It itself contains no safeguards against passing such legislation – such as a demand that if such legislation is passed it must be in response to a particular pressing social need (a requirement that would not be as demanding as the requirements of Art 15,[185] but which would at least place an express burden on government to justify the introduction of apparently incompatible legislation into Parliament). These points illustrate not only the constitutional realities of the HRA, but also the obvious difference between the position in Canada and that in the UK – Canada is dealing with its own Charter, while the UK is adhering domestically to an international human rights instrument which also binds it at the international level.

The conclusion must be, then, that s 3 provides the judges with more power – in terms of adopting what is in essence a legislative role – than the notwithstanding clause used in Canada does. Clearly, the other side of the coin is that they can read down the Convention right in question – as in Brown – in order to avoid using s 3 or s 4. It is arguable that a factor determining their choice of approach may be their view of the desirableness of the outcome, in social policy rather than legal terms.[186] The strength of the obligation under s 3 is not, it is suggested, without its dangers. The strong 183 R v A, per Lord Steyn, para 42.

184 Clearly, this is in practice highly improbable at present, given that the government intends to introduce Regulations in response to EU law making such discrimination unlawful; see Chapter 15, p 1526.

185 See Chapter 2, pp 110–11.

186 They may favour a legislative regime that aids in the maintenance of road safety, whereas their 'common sense' may inform them that a woman who has allegedly had sex with a man on one occasion may interpretative obligation on the judiciary can be viewed as a double-edged sword. They are enjoined to strive to find a Convention-friendly interpretation, but in certain instances the Convention standards are diluted as courts adopt the least liberal interpretation of the Convention right in order to make it harmonise with UK legislation (as in Brown). An interpretative approach which leads to the dilution of Convention standards can be avoided only if a vigorous, activist approach is taken, not only to foisting Convention-based interpretations onto statutory language, but also to ensuring that Convention standards are fully upheld by means of that interpretation. But as discussed in relation to R v A, there is a strong argument for using the declaration of incompatibility procedure where a clash of rights concerning an arguably incommensurable moral issue is in question, one that has been consciously and systematically addressed by Parliament after full and wide-ranging consultation with the groups representing those directly affected by the provision in question.[187]

The effect of s 2

Introduction

In seeking to interpret statutory provisions compatibly with the Convention rights under the HRA, the domestic judiciary 'must take into account' any relevant Strasbourg jurisprudence,[188] under s 2. Thus, they are not bound by it. Section 2 creates on its face quite a weak obligation, since it is open to the judiciary to consider but disapply a particular decision. It may be noted that only the Convention rights themselves are binding on public authorities, under s 6. As Chapter 2 indicated, the rights appear, in certain respects, quite out of date today. But since 1950, they have been subject to a rich and extensive jurisprudence which has extended and clarified their ambit. On the other hand, adoption of the Strasbourg jurisprudence may sometimes have the effect of 'reading down' the right due to the effect of the margin of appreciation doctrine.[189] In such instances it may be that departure from such decisions would give a 'successful lead to Strasbourg'.[190] The Lord Chancellor explained the role of s 2 at the Committee stage in Parliament: '[s 2] would permit UK courts to depart from Strasbourg decisions where there has been no precise ruling on the matter and a Commission opinion which does so has not taken into account subsequent Strasbourg case law . . .'.[191] At the Report stage, the Lord Chancellor further explained: 'Courts will often be faced with be likely to consent to have sex with him on another. This implications of this latter issue are pursued below, pp 260–61.

187 This very difficult issue is discussed further below in relation to judicial activism; see pp 266–67.

188 The term exhaustively covers any 'judgment, decision, declaration or advisory opinion of the Court', any 'opinion of the Commission given in a report adopted under Article 31', any 'decision of the Commission in connection with Article 26 or 27(2)' or any 'decision of the Committee of Ministers taken under Article 46'. The words 'in connection with' appear to mean that all findings which may be said to be linked to the admissibility procedure, including reports prepared during the preliminary examination of a case, could be taken into account.

189 See Salabiaku v France (A 141-A) (1988) and see further pp 270–73, below. See also the discussion of the margin of appreciation doctrine in Chapter 2, pp 36–39.

190 583 HL 514, 515, 8 November 1997.

191 583 HL 514, 515, 8 November 1997.

cases that involve factors perhaps specific to the UK which distinguish them from cases considered by the European Court . . . it is important that our courts have scope to apply that discretion so as to aid in the development of human rights law . . .'.[192]

In the course of such development, it was always clear that the courts could also consider jurisprudence from other jurisdictions; s 2 clearly leaves open the possibility of so doing. It is important for the judiciary to consider other international human rights treaties to which the UK is a signatory, as well as human rights jurisprudence from other jurisdictions, since it is often found that the same issues have arisen elsewhere. The Canadian and New Zealand jurisprudence is of relevance, since their Bills of Rights are of relatively recent origin and show strong similarities with the HRA. Post-HRA the House of Lords has shown itself willing to consider jurisprudence from other jurisdictions.[193] While such jurisprudence cannot merely be transplanted wholesale into the UK situation,[194] it can aid both in using the under-theorised Strasbourg jurisprudence, with its dependence on the margin of appreciation doctrine, and in encouraging the domestic judiciary to adopt a more theorised approach to human rights.[195]

Legal status of the jurisprudence and the role of the judges under the HRA?

Although the Strasbourg jurisprudence is not technically binding, it has been treated in a fashion that comes close to giving it binding force.[196] Clearly, it is a well-established international law principle that when treaty obligations are incorporated into domestic law, the obligation will be construed by reference to the principles of international law governing its interpretation.[197] On the other hand, it is a recognised constitutional principle that constitutional instruments, unlike statutes, should be applied in a flexible manner.[198] The Lords' acceptance that they should rely heavily on Strasbourg decisions was made apparent in the early post-HRA decision of R (on the application of Alconbury) v Secretary of State for the Environment.[199] The Divisional Court made a declaration of incompatibility in relation to planning law provisions, finding them incompatible with Art 6 since the Secretary of State for the Environment, in determining a planning appeal, is acting in a dual capacity in both hearing the appeal and applying his or her own policy guidelines. Under Art 6, as Chapter 2 explained,[200] a person's civil rights and obligations must be determined by an independent and impartial tribunal. The Minister, the Divisional Court found, could not be viewed as independent and impartial owing to his dual role.

192 484 HL 1270, 1271, 9 January 1998.
193 See R v A [2001] 2 WLR 1546. See, e.g., below, pp 288–91.
194 See for discussion Watson, A, Legal Transplants in Comparative Law, 1993.
195 See the criticisms of their traditional approach advanced in Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, 'Public protest, the HRA and judicial responses to political expression' [2000] PL 627–50.
196 See further Masterman, R, 'Aspiration or Foundation? The Status of the Strasbourg Jurisprudence and 'the Convention Rights' in Domestic Law' in Fenwick, H, Masterman, R and Phillipson, G (eds), Judicial Reasoning under the UK Human Rights Act, 2007
197 See, for example, In re H [1998] AC 72 at para 87, per Lord Browne-Wilkinson.
198 See, e.g., Minister of Home Affairs v Fisher [1980] AC 319.
199 [2001] 2 All ER 929; (2001) The Times, 24 January.
200 See pp 59–61.

On appeal to the House of Lords the declaration was overturned;[201] reliance on the Strasbourg jurisprudence was crucial to this decision. The House of Lords found that the requirements of Art 6 can be satisfied by the possibility of judicial review. If the Minister does not act impartially, his or her decision can be judicially reviewed. Therefore, it was found, a remedy was available. The House considered the question whether judicial review could be viewed as providing a sufficient remedy, bearing in mind the findings that it could not in Lustig-Prean v UK[202] and Kingsley v UK.[203] It came to the view, after extensively reviewing the Strasbourg jurisprudence in planning cases, that judicial review could now be viewed as providing a sufficient remedy, owing to the need to consider proportionality under the HRA. But it also considered that even without considering proportionality, judicial review could provide a sufficient remedy in the context in question, bearing in mind findings of that jurisprudence which suggested that a light touch review would be appropriate, taking into account the complex and wide ranging policy issues involved in what was essentially a socio-economic matter. Lord Slynn found that the domestic courts should follow any 'clear and constant' Strasbourg jurisprudence, except in special circumstances.[204] As indicated throughout this book this is, in general, the course that the courts are following.[205] Thus, the obligation under s 2 as interpreted by the House of Lords comes close to affording binding force to the jurisprudence.

This stance appears to indicate that the domestic courts cannot provide greater Convention protection for citizens than is available at Strasbourg – that they are inhibited in developing a more expansive domestic Convention jurisprudence. On this point in R (on the application of Ullah) v Special Adjudicator,[206] in the context of s 2, Lord Bingham said: 'In determining the present question, the House is required by section 2(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998 to take into account any relevant Strasbourg case law. While such case law is not strictly binding, it has been held that courts should, in the absence of some special circumstances, follow any clear and constant jurisprudence of the Strasbourg court.[207] This reflects the fact that the Convention is an international instrument, the correct interpretation of which can be authoritatively expounded only by the Strasbourg court. From this it follows that a national court subject to a duty such as that imposed by section 2 should not without strong reason dilute or weaken the effect of the Strasbourg case law. It is indeed unlawful under section 6 of the 1998 Act for a public authority, including a court, to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right. It is of course open to member states to provide for rights more generous than those guaranteed by the Convention, but such provision should not be

201 R (on the application of Alconbury Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions and other cases [2001] 2 All ER 929; (2001) NLJ 135.

202 (1999) 29 EHRR 548.

203 (2001) The Times, 9 January.

204 At para 26.

205 See, e.g., Chapter 9, p 914. See further: Masterman, R, 'Taking the Strasbourg Jurisprudence into Account: developing a 'municipal law of human rights' under the Human Rights Act 1998' (2005) 54 International and Comparative Law Quarterly 907–32; Masterman, R, 'Section 2(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998: Binding Domestic Courts to Strasbourg?' [2004] Public Law 725–37

206 [2004] UKHL 26.

207 He relied on R (Alconbury Developments Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] UKHL 23, [2003] 2 AC 295, at para 26.

the product of interpretation of the Convention by national courts, since the meaning of the Convention should be uniform throughout the states party to it. The duty of national courts is to keep pace with the Strasbourg jurisprudence as it evolves over time: no more, but certainly no less. The duty of domestic courts is to keep pace with the Strasbourg jurisprudence as it evolves over time: no more but certainly no less.'[208]

Similar findings were made in a decision on the retention of fingerprints and samples under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 by the House of Lords in Marper.[209] Lord Steyn followed Ullah in rejecting the idea, which had been put forward by Lord Woolf in the Court of Appeal, that domestic cultural traditions should determine the ambit of the Convention rights.[210] However, he considered that such traditions would be relevant in determining whether the infringement of the right was justified:

> While I would not wish to subscribe to all the generalisations in the Court of Appeal about cultural traditions in the United Kingdom, in comparison with other European states, I do accept that when one moves on to consider the question of objective justification under article 8(2) the cultural traditions in the United Kingdom are material. With great respect to Lord Woolf CJ the same is not true under article 8(1) . . . The question whether the retention of fingerprints and samples engages article 8(1) should receive a uniform interpretation throughout member states, unaffected by different cultural traditions. And the current Strasbourg view, as reflected in decisions of the Commission, ought to be taken into account.

Similarly, in N v Secretary of State for the Home Department,[211] which concerned the deportation of an AIDS sufferer to a country that would not have the medical facilities of the UK, the House of Lords, having criticised the reasoning of the Strasbourg court,[212] accepted that the case law had to be applied. The Strasbourg Court had found that such deportation could create a breach of Art 3 in D v United Kingdom.[213] The Lords considered that it would be inequitable to single out the appellant for treatment on humanitarian grounds since many immigrants suffering from AIDS would have 208 At para 20.

209 R (on the application of Marper) v Chief Constable of South Yorkshire [2004] 1 WLR 2196 e.g. at para 78, per Baroness Hale.

210 At para 27. Lord Woolf CJ in the Court of Appeal expressed this view at [2002] 1 WLR 3223, para 34.

211 [2005] 2 WLR 1124.

212 Lord Steyn said [at paras 11–13]: 'the Strasbourg jurisprudence, it has to be said, is not in an altogether satisfactory state. The difficulty derives from the decision in D v United Kingdom (1997) 24 EHRR 425, concerning the expulsion of an AIDS sufferer to St Kitts, and the basis on which the Strasbourg court has subsequently sought to distinguish that case. In the case of D the court extended the reach of article 3. The court noted, at paragraph 46, that contracting states have the right, as a matter of well-established international law and subject to their treaty obligations including the European Convention, to control the entry, residence and expulsion of aliens. Having noted the Chahal type of case, the court said it must reserve to itself sufficient flexibility to consider the application of article 3 in other contexts: paragraph 49. The court then applied Art 3 in what it described as the "very exceptional circumstances"'of that case. The difficulty posed by this decision is that, with variations in degree, the humanitarian considerations existing in the case of D are not 'very exceptional' in the case of AIDS sufferers.

213 (1997) 24 EHRR 425.

their lives shortened if returned to their home countries due to the higher level of medical expertise and resource available in the UK. However, the Lords found that a careful and fact-sensitive consideration of the Strasbourg cases meant that an over-broad interpretation of Art 3 could be avoided, allowing for the deportation of the appellant, even though deporting her was viewed as the equivalent of switching off her life support machine. Lord Steyn said 'on this subject the Strasbourg jurisprudence lacks its customary clarity'.[214] Lord Hope in N considered that:[215]

> It is not for us to search for a solution to [the appellant's] problem which is not to be found in the Strasbourg case law. It is for the Strasbourg court, not for us, to decide whether its case law is out of touch with modern conditions and to determine what extensions, if any, are needed to the rights guaranteed by the Convention. We must take its case law as we find it, not as we would like it to be.

The view that the purpose of the HRA is not to enlarge the rights or remedies offered at Strasbourg, but only to ensure that those rights and remedies can be enforced by the domestic courts, also finds a basis in Aston Cantlow and Wilmcote with Billesley Parochial Church Council v Wallbank;[216] R (Greenfield) v Secretary of State for the Home Department;[217] and R (Quark Fishing Ltd) v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.[218] That view was also reiterated and afforded further explanation in R(SB) v Denbigh High School.[219] In Kay v Lambeth London Borough Council; Leeds City Council v Price,[220] discussed below, Lord Bingham, with whom the other Law Lords agreed on this issue, said that domestic courts are not strictly required to follow rulings of the Strasbourg court, but that they must give practical recognition to the principles it expounds. On the other hand, Lord Nicholls said in Campbell, a case that did not involve re-writing statutory provisions:

> The values embodied in articles 8 and 10 are as much applicable in disputes between individuals or between an individual and a non-governmental body such as a newspaper as they are in disputes between individuals and a public authority. In reaching this conclusion it is not necessary to pursue the controversial question whether the European Convention itself has this wider effect (emphasis added).[221]

(Obviously in relation to a statute this approach has limits as indicated above, dictated by the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty.) Lord Nicholls' finding could be interpreted as meaning that if the jurisprudence is not on its face 'clear and constant'

214 At para 14.
215 [2005] 2 WLR 1124, para 25.
216 [2004] 1 AC 546, paras 6–7, 44.
217 [2005] 1 WLR 673, paras 18–19.
218 [2005] 3 WLR 837, paras 25, 33, 34, 88 and 92.
219 [2006] 2 WLR 719, para 29.
220 [2006] UKHL 10.
221 [2004] 2 WLR 1232 at paras 17 and 18. (But see now the post-Campbell decision in Von Hannover v Germany (2006) 43 EHRR 7 (App no. 59320/00), discussed in Chapter 9, pp 819–23).

it can be disregarded completely and the case decided on the basis of what could arguably be called a constitutional human rights jurisdiction.[222] This approach is, it is contended, appropriate, bearing in mind the stance of Strasbourg that states have the primary responsibility for affording protection for the Convention rights,[223] and the whole constitutional enterprise of the HRA which demands a generous interpretation of the rights.

As Masterman argues, the minimalist approach taken in Ullah towards the jurisprudence, which does not allow domestic courts to expand the ambit of a Convention right where clear and constant Strasbourg jurisprudence stands in the way, creates a tension with the status of the HRA as a constitutional instrument.[224] Clayton similarly finds that there is a tension between 'established perceptions of the judicial role' and the constitutional status of the HRA.[225] The over-generous and over-expansive approach of Lord Steyn to Art 6 in R v A was criticised above, but that was on the basis that there were strong countervailing Convention-based and constitutional objections to the course taken on the particular facts at issue. That approach, absent those objections, is in keeping with the redefined role of the judges now mapped out for them under the HRA, but it is clearly in tension with the approach in Ullah since it did much more than keep pace with the Strasbourg jurisprudence.

If the judges are to realise the role that the HRA appears to give them, and which was contemplated in Parliament during the passage of the Human Rights Bill, there are a number of avenues that can be explored in the interests of maximizing judicial discretion under s 2. If the jurisprudence in question is not clear and constant it can be disregarded, as Lord Nicholls indicated in Campbell. In fact, as Chapter 9 argues, the relevant Art 8 jurisprudence came very close to determining the question at issue before the House of Lords.[226] Therefore, impliedly, Lord Nicholls could be viewed as demanding quite a high degree of constancy and clarity in the jurisprudence before he was prepared to apply it. His disregard for the relevant jurisprudence could be viewed as indicating that even if it is approaching the requisite level of clarity it need not be applied. Further, if the jurisprudence itself conflicts with Strasbourg principles it need not be applied; Lord Bingham made it clear in Price that the principles, not necessarily the jurisprudence, are to be given effect domestically. As Chapter 8 argues, this is particularly the case in relation to certain Strasbourg decisions in the context of public protest which conflict with underlying Convention principles.[227] If the jurisprudence is heavily affected by the influence of the margin of appreciation doctrine it can be marginalized on the basis that that doctrine is not applicable in domestic law, and to rely on Strasbourg cases influenced by it is to import the doctrine impermissibly into domestic law by the back door.[228]

222 See the comments of Lord Justice Laws in Pro-Life Alliance [2002] 3 WLR 1080 at 6 para 36.

223 See Chapter 2, pp 17–20.

224 See further Masterman, R, 'Aspiration or Foundation? The Status of the Strasbourg Jurisprudence and 'the Convention Rights' in Domestic Law' in Fenwick, H, Masterman, R and Phillipson, G, (eds), Judicial Reasoning under the UK Human Rights Act, (2007).

225 See Clayton, R, 'Judicial Deference and Democratic Dialogue' : the legitimacy of judicial intervention under the HRA' [2004] PL 33,34.

226 See pp 911–13.

227 See pp 686–88.

228 See below pp 270–72.

Conflict with domestic precedents

If clear and constant jurisprudence is apparent it must be followed, although not strictly binding, except where a domestic precedent stands in the way. This was made clear by the House of Lords in Kay v London Borough of Lambeth; Leeds City Council v Price.[229] The case concerned rights to possession of property in domestic law which appeared to violate Art 8. The Court of Appeal in the Leeds case had concluded that the decision in Connors v United Kingdom,[230] which was relied upon by the applicants in resisting possession proceedings, was inconsistent with the earlier House of Lords decision in Harrow London Borough Council v Qazi,[231] and that they were bound to apply the House of Lords decision.[232] The later Strasbourg case suggested that the earlier House of Lords' decision had not correctly reflected the Convention position. As indicated above, Lord Bingham, with whom the other Law Lords agreed on this issue, said that domestic courts must give effect to the principles expounded by the Strasbourg court. He pointed out that that court is the highest judicial authority to interpret Convention rights as they are to be understood uniformly by all member states, and domestic courts have to determine initially how the principles it lays down are to be applied in the domestic context. Adherence to precedent, he said, is a cornerstone of the domestic legal system whereby some degree of certainty in legal matters is most effectively achieved. He found that therefore where judges consider that a binding domestic precedent is inconsistent with a Strasbourg decision, they should follow the ordinary rules of precedent, except in an extreme case where the pre-HRA decision of a superior court could not survive the introduction of the HRA 1998.

Lord Hope agreed on the precedent issue. He found that Connors was not incompatible with Qazi, but that Qazi should not in any event be departed from; however, in the light of subsequent Strasbourg cases he found that greater emphasis should be placed on the need for the court to provide a remedy in those special cases not considered in Qazi where it was seriously arguable that the right to possession afforded by domestic law violated the Convention right.

The rule from Price means that citizens might have to seek the vindication of their Art 8 rights at Strasbourg. This position is in tension, not only with the UK's obligations at Strasbourg under Arts 1, 8 and 13 of the Convention, but with the constitutional status of the Convention in domestic law and with Lord Bingham's finding in Ullah that the duty of domestic courts is to keep pace with the Strasbourg jurisprudence as it evolves over time. Therefore, it is argued, the courts should explore methods of marginalising the rule from Price in any affected areas of law while technically adhering to domestic precedent. For example, where a statute has been interpreted domestically in a superior court in a post-HRA decision in a manner that conflicts with Strasbourg jurisprudence, the court should strive to find an interpretation of the domestic precedent that avoids the conflict, but if this is impossible it should issue a declaration of the incompatibility, leaving Parliament to over-turn the precedent. That course would be preferable to minimising the interpretation of the right in order to avoid the conflict.

229 [2006] UKHL 10.
230 [2006] 40 EHRR 189.
231 [2004] 1 AC 983.
232 See Price v Leeds CC [2005] 1 WLR 1825.

Section 2 and the common law

The HRA does not expressly mention the interpretation of the common law. But it is clear that s 2 makes the rights relevant to its interpretation since its application is not confined to statutory interpretation, but to the determination of any question, in a court or tribunal, that has arisen in connection with a Convention right. Further, since the courts themselves are public authorities under s 6, they are expected to ensure, through their interpretation of the common law, that the Convention rights are not breached. As discussed below, the precise duty placed on the courts in this respect is a matter of debate. But it is clear that, where a legislative provision is not in question, but one party in the case before a court is a public authority, or in any event in reliance on the court's own s 6 duty, the court should apply s 2. Section 2 contains no words which limit its application to an instance in which one party before the court is a public authority. The limitation would arise if it was argued in such an instance that a private body does not possess Convention rights as against another private person and therefore that no question has arisen in connection with a Convention right, but that argument was rejected, impliedly, by the courts in early decisions under the HRA.[233]

It is now clear, as Chapter 9 in particular points out,[234] that the Convention rights are as much at issue in private common law disputes as in public law ones, assuming that a cause of action is applicable. In such an instance ss 2 and 6 in combination might be viewed at first glance as placing an interpretative obligation on courts which is, in one sense, stronger than that created by s 3, since no provision allowing incompatible common law doctrines to override Convention rights appears in the Act. However, this is not the case, for two reasons. As discussed further below, the precise duty placed on the court by s 6 in relation to the development of the common law in private common law adjudication has not yet been fully resolved, and it certainly cannot yet be said that s 6 places a s 3-like interpretative obligation on courts in common law adjudication.[235] Moreover, the decision in Price is of particular relevance in common law adjudication since, obviously, such adjudication is reliant on the doctrine of precedent unaffected by statutory intervention. Following Price, the odd position has been reached whereby a decision of a superior court inconsistent with Convention principle must be followed, whereas a statutory provision apparently inconsistent with a Convention right can be rendered compatible with it, if possible, even if that means reading words into the statute, under s 3. Therefore, while s 2 is of relevance in common law adjudication as discussed in this section, the Strasbourg jurisprudence may perhaps have a more limited effect in this context in practice. In the key context of privacy, however, in which ss 6 and 2 have had a very significant impact in transforming the common law doctrine of confidence, the problem of incompatibility between common law precedent and Convention principle has not arisen since the key precedents were pre-HRA ones.[236]

233 It is clear under s 3 that legislation should be construed compatibly with the Convention rights regardless of the fact that both parties are private bodies. In Wilson v First County Trust [2001] 3 All ER 229, the Court of Appeal accepted that s 3 does indeed apply in such instances.

234 See pp 825–28, 911–15.

235 See pp 252–55.

236 It may be noted that the key decision of Campbell was taken before Price. See further Chapter 9, pp 911–15.

Conclusions

The pursuit of the s 2 endeavour is witnessing the attempt to interweave into a mass of existing statutory and common law provisions, the uneven and often flawed jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights. In so doing the judges are adopting a more theorised approach to fundamental rights.[237] It is often pointed out that the inception of Bills of Rights tends to have the effect, as in Canada, of requiring courts to grapple with justification for limitation of fundamental rights, taking a more philosophical approach to legal reasoning as they attempt to resolve conflicts between rights and competing societal and individual interests. However, the limitations placed on the judicial role under the HRA by both Price and Ullah, create a clear tension, as discussed, with the HRA's constitutional status and with the development of a domestic doctrine of constitutional rights.

Meaning of primary and secondary legislation

Which measures then can override the Convention even if incompatible with it under s3(2)? Section 21(1) defines 'primary legislation' as used in s 3(2) to include Measures of the General Synod of the Church of England and, most significantly, Orders in Council made under the royal prerogative. Thus, executive power as well as parliamentary sovereignty are preserved under the HRA.[238] This is clearly an anomalous provision, since it renders individual rights subordinate to powers which may be used to infringe them and which cannot claim legitimacy derived from the democratic process.

Subordinate legislation covers Orders in Council not made under the royal prerogative, orders, rules, regulations, bylaws or other instruments made under primary legislation unless 'it operates to bring one or more provisions of that legislation into force or amends any primary legislation'. The last provision is significant, since it means that where provision is made under primary legislation for amendment by executive order, subject to the negative, or even the affirmative resolution procedure, the amendment, which will almost certainly have received virtually no Parliamentary attention, will still be able to override Convention provisions. This is of particular importance in relation to, for example, the Terrorism Act 2000 and the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, since a number of gaps were left in the provisions, to be filled in this manner.[239]

The 'declaration of incompatibility' under s 4

Section 4(2) applies under s 4(1) when a court is determining in any proceedings whether a provision of primary legislation is incompatible with a Convention right. If a court is satisfied that the provision is incompatible with the right, 'it may make a declaration of that incompatibility' – a declaration that it is not possible to construe the legislation in question to harmonise with the Convention. Section 4(4) applies to 237 See, e.g., Chapter 9, pp 911–15 and below, pp 289–91.

238 For discussion of the effect of treating this exercise of prerogative powers as primary legislation, see Squires, N, 'Judicial review of the prerogative after the HRA' [2000] 116 LQR 572–75.

239 See, e.g., Chapter 10, p 1064 and Chapter 14, p 1398.

incompatible secondary legislation where incompatible primary legislation prevents the removal of the incompatibility. Again, the incompatibility can be declared. Thus, s 4 may seem to come close to allowing an infringement of parliamentary sovereignty since, as Feldman observes, 'For the first time Parliament has invited the judges to tell it that it has acted wrongly by legislating incompatibly with a Convention right'.[240] But, as Feldman also notes, the court is not informing Parliament that it has acted unlawfully, since, as explained below, Parliament is not bound by the Convention (s 6(3)). Nevertheless, the House of Lords has made it clear, in R v A, as indicated above, that it views the making of a declaration as a last resort to be avoided if at all possible, and this was reaffirmed in Ghaidan.[241]

But only certain courts can make the declaration. Section 4(5) provides that this applies to the House of Lords, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the Courts-Martial Appeal Court; in Scotland, the High Court of Justiciary sitting otherwise than a trial court, or the Court of Session; in England and Wales, the High Court or the Court of Appeal. Under s 5(1), when a court is considering making a declaration, the Crown must be given notice so that it can, under s 5(2), intervene by being joined as a party to the proceedings.

A court falling within s 4(5) has a discretion to make a declaration of incompatibility. Section 4(2) clearly leaves open the possibility that such a court, having found an incompatibility, might nevertheless decide not to make a declaration of it. As indicated above, in Wilson v First County Trust Ltd,[242] the Court of Appeal found that s 127(3) of the Consumer Credit Act 1974 was incompatible with Art 6 and with Art 1 of the First Protocol to the Convention. The Court considered that, having found an incompatibility, it should make a declaration of it for three reasons.[243] First, the question of the incompatibility had been fully argued at a hearing appointed for that purpose. Second, the order required by s 127(3) could not lawfully be made on the appeal unless the court was satisfied that the section could not be read in such a way as to give effect to the Convention rights, and that fact should be formally recorded by a declaration that 'gives legitimacy to that order'. Third, a declaration provides a basis for a Minister to consider whether the section should be amended under s 10(1) (see below). The Court duly went on to make the declaration. The second reason given is of particular interest, since it suggests that a court would not feel that it could make an order required by an incompatible legislative provision without making a declaration, since the order would lack legitimacy. It may be noted that lower courts, which cannot make a declaration, are being asked under the HRA to do precisely that. This finding indicates the reluctance such courts are likely to feel in this situation. It further suggests, as do the other reasons, that courts within s 4(5) are unlikely to find incompatibility without declaring it. In other words, the discretion under s 4(2) appears to be narrow. It is hard to imagine circumstances in which a higher court would find an incompatibility without declaring it.

240 Feldman, D, 'The Human Rights Act 1998 and constitutional principles' (1999) 19(2) LS 165, p 187.
241 See Ghaidan [2004] 2 AC 557 (HL) at para 50.
242 [2001] 3 All ER 229.
243 Ibid, para 47.

A further early declaration was made by the Court of Appeal in relation to the system of appeals for prisoners detained on mental health grounds in R (H) v Mental Health Tribunal, North and East London Region and Another.[244] The Court found that s 73 of the Mental Health Act was incompatible with Art 5 since it in effect reversed the burden of proof against the detained person. The declaration was surprising in the sense that s 3 could have been used more strenuously to find that the system of appeals in such mental health cases could be viewed as compliant with the Convention.[245]

In the early months of the HRA, the lower courts took an approach to s 3 which differed considerably from that taken in R v A, in the sense that there was a preparedness to make declarations of incompatibility, rather than using s 3 in order to impose compatibility on the legislation. A declaration of incompatibility was made by the Divisional Court in respect of four planning cases, in Alconbury, but the declaration was then reversed by the House of Lords,[246] on the basis that a close reading of the Convention jurisprudence revealed that no incompatibility arose.[247]

When a declaration of incompatibility has been made, the legislative provision in question remains valid (s 4(6)). Section 3 provides that the interpretative obligation does not affect the validity, continuing operation or enforcement of any incompatible primary legislation, and this is equally the case under s 4(6) if a declaration of incompatibility is made. The Convention guarantee in question is disapplied by the court in relation to that incompatible provision. Once a declaration has been made, there will be a period of time during which the Convention right can still be utilised in respect of other relevant non-incompatible provisions until and if compatibility is achieved by amendment via the s 10 procedure considered below. The Convention provision does not appear to suffer a diminution of status except, to an extent, in relation to the incompatible legislative provision itself. In other words, it is not impliedly repealed in domestic law.

During the period after the declaration, while amendment of the legislative provision is awaited as a possibility, other courts might have to consider the same issue. Owing to the doctrine of precedent, the lower courts are bound by the declaration. The HRA leaves open the possibility – in a higher court than the one which made the declaration – of eventually finding compatibility in respect of the incompatible legislative provision itself once it is revisited in a subsequent suitable case (assuming that the original declaration has not already been overturned on appeal). In other words, a different court can take a different view on incompatibility. Possibly, in so doing, it might be aided by jurisprudential developments occurring at Strasbourg, after the initial finding of incompatibility. But following the decision of the House of Lords in Price,[248] a court in a similar case, raising a similar issue of compatibility, would be bound by a declaration already made in a superior court, despite such development.

244 (2001) The Times, 2 April.

245 This is not a comment on the merits of the judgment; it is unfortunate that the system of appeals in such mental health cases was not rendered compliant with the Convention prior to the coming into force of the HRA.

246 R (on the application of Alconbury Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions and other cases [2001] 2 All ER 929; (2001) NLJ 135.

247 This point is considered further below; see p 276.

248 See above p 197.

If legislation is found to be incompatible with a Convention guarantee in a court that cannot make a declaration of incompatibility or in one that can, but exercises its discretion not to do so, the position is broadly the same: the legislative provision remains valid and the Convention guarantee in question is disapplied in relation to the incompatible provision. There is less likelihood that it will be amended until and if a declaration of incompatibility is made, although obviously it could, theoretically, be amended without waiting for a declaration.[249] Clearly, the case might not be appealed up to a court which could make the declaration. Thus, there will probably be a longer period of time during which a Convention guarantee cannot be utilised in relation to that legislative provision, than there would be once a declaration had been made. In order to avoid this period of uncertainty, the courts are using fast track procedures to resolve the issue, as in R v A[250] and Alconbury.

Since, under s 4(5), only higher courts can make a declaration of incompatibility, the pressure on courts to find compatibility is increased since otherwise a citizen has to suffer a breach of their Convention rights without a remedy.[251] The pressure is particularly strong in criminal proceedings. However, where essential, as discussed earlier, it is preferable that a declaration of incompatibility should be made rather than 'reading down' the Convention right in question in order to find compatibility.

The declaration is likely to trigger off amending legislation by means of the s 10 so-called 'fast track' procedure. However, it need not do so – very significantly, the declaration is non-binding. Declarations of incompatibility are playing a part in ensuring that domestic law is being brought into a state of conformity with the human rights norms embodied in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights.[252] However s 4 is having less impact in this respect, as discussed above, than s 3. The government's stance appears to be that it will seek to bring forward amending legislation once a declaration has been made; it has not sought to argue that a declaration should be ignored. Since October 2000 there have been 15 declarations of incompatibility which have not been reversed on appeal. All the declarations so far made under the HRA have either been remedied or are currently under consideration with a view to being remedied.[253] The most well-known and far-reaching declaration was made by the House of Lords in A v Secretary of State for the Home Department;[254] it is discussed in full in Chapter 14.[255] The declaration was accepted by the government and the 249 Since such amendment would occur outside the s 10 procedure, the normal time constraints would apply.

250 [2001] 2 WLR 1546.

251 This was very clearly a pressing concern in R v A [2001] 2 WLR 1546; the ruling was awaited, not only in that case, but in a number of pending rape cases.

252 Apart from the declarations mentioned a number of other examples may be given: in R (H) v London North and East Region Mental Health Review Tribunal (Secretary of State for Health intervening) [2002] QB 1 the Mental Health Act 1983 s 73 was found to be incompatible with Arts 5(1) and 5(4); in R (D) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2003] 1 WLR 1315 the Mental Health Act 1983 s 74 was found to be incompatible with Art 5(4); R (Uttley) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2003] 1 WLR 2590 the Criminal Justice Act 1991 ss 33(2), 37(4)(a) and s 39 were found to be incompatible with Art 7.

253 See for examples fn 267 below.

254 [2004] QB 335.

255 See pp 1430 et seq.

offending provisions in the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 were repealed. A recent significant declaration was made by the Court of Appeal in Westminster City Council v Morris.[256] The Court of Appeal held that the Housing Act 1996 s 185(4) was incompatible with Art 14. Section 185(4) permitted a difference in treatment based on national origin or on a combination of nationality, immigration control, settled residence and social welfare which, the Court found, could not be justified.

Use of s 4 may eventually mean that a certain amount of non-Convention-compliant legislation is amended. A future, less liberal, government, wishing to restore the provisions thus removed, although not formally constrained in any way (assuming that it could command a majority in Parliament), would do so in the face of public knowledge that it was resurrecting provisions which the courts had authoritatively determined to be in breach of Britain's obligations under the ECHR.[257] In this sense, both the 'adverse publicity' and the 'manifest breach' types of protection for the Convention discussed below[258] bestowed by a 'notwithstanding clause' have been given – albeit to a lesser degree[259] – to the rights protected by the Convention.

A declaration is clearly an empty remedy as far as the majority of litigants are concerned. Clearly, it cannot be viewed as an effective remedy in Convention terms;[260] this was reaffirmed in the Chamber judgment in Burden v United Kingdom.[261] It was found that the applicants had not needed to exhaust that remedy. The Court stated that it did not consider that the applicants could have been expected to have brought a claim for a declaration of incompatibility under s 4 of the 1998 Human Rights Act before bringing their application to the European Court of Human Rights, since it was a remedy that was dependent on the discretion of the executive and so ineffective on that ground. The Court expressed the view, however, that it was possible that at some future date, evidence of a long-standing and established practice of Ministers giving effect to the courts' declarations of incompatibility might be sufficient to persuade it of the effectiveness of the procedure. Since the government has so far accepted that declarations should be responded to and has not resisted a declaration it is possible that the Court may find eventually that a declaration amounts to an effective remedy.

Since the ability to make the declaration is confined to certain higher courts, a litigant in a lower court or tribunal, who is affected by incompatible legislation, appears to be

256 [2006] 1 WLR 505.

257 And, quite possibly, also of common law principle; see, e.g., the statements in the House of Lords in Derbyshire CC v Times Newspapers [1993] 1 All ER 1011 to the effect that Art 10 of the ECHR and the English common law are substantively similar.

258 See p 206.

259 Lesser, because even where no statement of compatibility had been made, the courts would not be empowered to strike down the legislation in question.

260 The applicant only needs to exhaust those possibilities which offer an effective remedy, so if part of the complaint is the lack of a remedy under Art 13, then the application is not likely to be ruled inadmissible on this ground: X v UK (1981) (Appl 7990/77); 24 D & R 57. A remedy will be ineffective if according to established case law there appears to be no chance of success: Appl 5874 172, Yearbook XVII (1974). Until recently (see below) Strasbourg had not had the opportunity to rule on the question whether a Declaration of Incompatibility could amount to an effective remedy, since no analogous procedure exists in the contracting states. Since it offers nothing which has previously been recognised as a remedy to the individual in question, it was clear that there were strong grounds for considering that the system would not be viewed as offering an effective remedy.

261 (2006) App no 93378/05.

completely remediless, since even the empty remedy of a declaration is unavailable. The forum at the next level might be equally powerless. In the circumstances covered by this book, the picture is mixed as regards the ability of litigants to get into a court which can issue a declaration.[262] The litigant has little incentive to appeal in the hope of eventually reaching a court able to make a declaration, especially as there is no provision requiring the Crown to bear its own costs where it intervenes in accordance with s 5(2) of the HRA. In criminal proceedings, however, the courts appear to be taking the view that to convict a defendant in breach of Art 6 of the Convention would be an abuse of process.[263]

It is impossible not to conclude that this aspect of the system of remedial action is inadequate to the task of providing a domestic remedy for violation of Convention rights.[264] If, at the least, legislation is not forthcoming within the next few years to amend s 4 of the HRA with a view to allowing lower courts to make declarations, the pressure on the judiciary to find compatibility, already very high, will become increasingly severe.

The remedial process under s 10

Section 10 provides the remedial process to be followed if a declaration of incompatibility is made. Under s 10(2) if a Minister of the Crown considers 'that there are compelling reasons for proceeding under this section, he may by order make such amendments to the legislation as he considers necessary to remove the incompatibility'.[265] In a departure 262 E.g., an appeal from a magistrates' court to the Crown Court would require a further appeal in order to obtain a declaration. A declaration could be obtained using only one level of appeal if an appeal was by way of case stated to the Divisional Court. Appeals from the Proscribed Organisations Appeal Commission are, by leave, to the Court of Appeal in England and Wales, and to the equivalent courts in Scotland and Northern Ireland (see further Chapter 14, pp 1399–1400).

263 See the views of Lord Steyn in R v DPP ex p Kebilene [1999] 4 All ER 801.

264 See Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, 'Making rights real: the courts, remedies and the Human Rights Act' (1999) 58(3) CLJ 509, p 543. They conclude that rights may be less well protected than previously as a result of the HRA.

265 Section 10(1): This section applies if:
  (a) a provision of legislation has been declared under section 4 to be incompatible with a Convention right and, if an appeal lies-
    (i) all persons who may appeal have stated in writing that they do not intend to do so;
    (ii) the time for bringing an appeal has expired and no appeal has been brought within that time; or
    (iii) an appeal brought within that time has been determined or abandoned; or
  (b) it appears to a Minister of the Crown or Her Majesty in Council that, having regard to a finding of the European Court of Human Rights made after the coming into force of this section in proceedings against the United Kingdom, a provision of legislation is incompatible with an obligation of the United Kingdom arising from the Convention.

(2) If a Minister of the Crown considers that there are compelling reasons for proceeding under this section, he may by order make such amendments to the legislation as he considers necessary to remove the incompatibility.

(3) If, in the case of subordinate legislation, a Minister of the Crown considers:
  (a) that it is necessary to amend the primary legislation under which the subordinate legislation in question was made, in order to enable the incompatibility to be removed, and from the New Zealand scheme, s 10 allows a Minister to make amendments to the offending legislation by means of a 'fast track' procedure. Section 10 may also be used where a decision of the European Court of Human Rights suggests that a provision of legislation has become incompatible with the Convention. Therefore, campaigning groups could lobby the government to make amendments under s 10 following any such decision. However, as indicated above, the Minister is under no obligation to make the amendment(s), either after any such decision or after a declaration of incompatibility under s 4, and may only do so if he or she considers that there are 'compelling reasons for proceeding under this section'. In other words, the fact that a declaration of incompatibility has been made will not necessarily in itself provide a compelling reason, although the circumstances in which it is made may do so.
  (b) that there are compelling reasons for proceeding under this section, he may by order make such amendments to the primary legislation as he considers necessary.

Schedule 2 provides two procedures for making a 'remedial order' which must, under s 20, be in the form of a statutory instrument. Sched 2, para 2(a) and para 3 provide for a standard procedure whereby the Minister must lay a draft of the Order before Parliament, together with the required information – an explanation of the incompatibility and a statement of the reasons for proceeding under s 10 – for at least 60 days, during which time representations can be made to the Minister. It must then be laid before Parliament again and does not come into effect until it is approved by a resolution of each House within 60 days after it has been laid for the second time. The emergency procedure under Sched 2, para 2(b) and para 4 follows the same route, apart from the very significant provision for allowing the Minister to make the order before laying it before Parliament. Thus, the amendment can be made outside the full Parliamentary process, which would be required for primary legislation, but otherwise the responsibility for amending primary legislation remains firmly in Parliamentary hands, retaining 'Parliament's authority in the legislative process'.[266] In fact, so far the government has shown a clear preference for using the standard procedure.

Clearly, it is preferable in human rights terms to follow the Convention exception system rather than the HRA one. The response of the Labour Government to the declarations of incompatibility made so far indicates that it accepts this argument. It has moved to address all of them and in no instance has it stated that it merely intends to maintain the incompatibility – although the HRA clearly allows it to do so.[267] So although the HRA theoretically leaves the last word to Parliament in terms of creating

(4) This section also applies where the provision in question is in subordinate legislation and has been quashed, or declared invalid, by reason of incompatibility with a Convention right and the Minister proposes to proceed under paragraph 2(b) of Sched 2.

(5) If the legislation is an Order in Council, the power conferred by subsection (2) or (3) is exercisable by Her Majesty in Council.

(6) In this section 'legislation' does not include a Measure of the Church Assembly or of the General Synod of the Church of England.

(7) Schedule 2 makes further provision about remedial orders.

266 Ewing, K, 'The Human Rights Act and parliamentary democracy' (1999) 62(1) MLR 79, p 93.

267 E.g. in R (H) v London North and East Region Mental Health Review Tribunal (Secretary of State for Health intervening) [2002] QB 1 the Mental Health Act 1983 s 73 was found to be incompatible with Arts 5(1) and 5(4); the Mental Health Act 1983 (Remedial Order) 2001 was introduced to address the incompatibility by way of the fast track procedure. In A and Others [2004] QB 335 the House of Lords declared Part 4 ACTSA 2001 incompatible with Art 5 and 14 ECHR; Part 4 was repealed by the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005, as discussed further in Chapter 14 pp 1438 et seq.

compatibility, thereby preserving Parliamentary sovereignty, in practice the government accepts the ECHR constraints, rather than the more lax HRA ones.

Declarations as to the compatibility of new Bills with the Convention rights Under s 19(1)(a) HRA, in introducing legislation into Parliament, a Minister, before Second Reading of the Bill, must state that the Bill is compatible with the Convention or that while unable to make such a declaration, the government nevertheless wishes to proceed with the Bill (s 19(b)). When the relevant Minister has made a declaration of compatibility under s 19(a), its effects may be viewed as additional to the duty the courts are already under, arising from s 3(1), to ensure that the legislation is rendered compatible with the guarantees if at all possible. The Lord Chancellor has said: 'Ministerial statements of compatibility will inevitably be a strong spur to the courts to find the means of construing statutes compatibly with the Convention.'[268] The guidance given to Ministers is to the effect that for a s 19(1)(a) statement to be made it must be 'more likely than not that the provisions . . . will stand up to challenge on Convention grounds'.[269] But if a s 19(1)(b) statement is made this does not have to be taken to mean that 'the provisions of the Bill are incompatible . . . but that the Minister is unable to make a statement of compatibility'. There is no procedure within the HRA allowing the government or Parliament to declare that the judiciary should not strive to achieve compatibility even when dealing with almost certainly incompatible provisions.

The idea behind s 19 is that governments will not be willing, in general, to introduce incompatible Bills, although it does open the door to that possibility. In relation to Bills of Rights in general, Dawn Oliver has offered two reasons why a government would be unwilling to state openly that it was legislating in breach of a Bill of Rights.[270] First, there would be the general political embarrassment which would be caused to the government (this may be termed the 'adverse publicity' type of protection). Second, a declaration of intent to infringe constitutional rights would be tantamount to a declaration of the government's intention to breach its obligations under international law; this would undoubtedly provoke widespread international condemnation which would be highly embarrassing (this may be termed the 'manifest breach' type of protection). The stance taken towards the Communications Act 2003, which was not accompanied by a statement of compatibility, as discussed below, bears out this prediction.

It may be said that in one respect, s 19 bears comparison with a 'notwithstanding clause', but there is the very significant difference that, as discussed above, the judiciary are not empowered to strike down legislation which contains no such clause, but which is inconsistent with the Convention. Further, s 19 does not expressly provide for the possibility that the government deliberately wishes to achieve incompatibility with the Convention. It merely leaves open the possibility or – in practice – the strong 268 Lord Irvine [1998] PL 221.

269 Department of Constitutional Affairs, Human Rights Act 1998 Guidance for Ministers (2nd edn), para.36, www.dca.gov/hract/guidance.htm#how, para.36. See further Feldman, D, 'The Impact of Human Rights on the UK Legislative Process' (2004) 25(2) Stat.LR 91.

270 'A Bill of Rights for the UK', in Government and the UK, 1991.

probability that the legislation, or at least certain of its provisions, are incompatible. But s 19 resembles a 'notwithstanding clause' in the sense that a government that intends to introduce measures which are probably or certainly rights-abridging must be open about the fact – at least in the sense that the relevant Minister has to state that a declaration is not being made. The government can nevertheless take the position that while a statement is not being made, it considers the legislation in question to be compatible with the Convention.

The statement of compatibility does not necessarily indicate that compatibility has been achieved once the legislation comes into force. A declaration under s 19(1)(a) might be made and challenged in Parliament. The opposition parties might argue that the legislation had not achieved compatibility, but their amendments intended to achieve compatibility might be defeated due to the large majority of the government. It could hardly be said of such legislation that Parliament was genuinely satisfied that compatibility had been achieved. Further, Parliament might be misled into believing that the legislation was compatible. The legal advice behind the declaration might be flawed. It is arguable that legislation has been passed which gives an appearance of achieving compatibility only because a minimalist interpretation of the Convention was adopted in drafting it. It is suggested in Chapters 10 and 14 that certain provisions of the Terrorism Act 2000 and the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 arguably provide examples of such a tendency.[271] Further, legislation, which was arguably compatible with the Convention when passed, might become incompatible due to the effect of subsequent decisions of the European Court of Human Rights taken before the legislation comes into force. Section 2 HRA requires a court to take such decisions into account 'whenever made or given'.

At the time of the inception of the HRA, it was not necessarily apparent that Bills would almost always be accompanied in future by a declaration of their compatibility with the Convention rights, or that a derogation would be sought where otherwise a declaration could not be made. The response of the Conservative Government in the 1990s to certain decisions of the European Court of Human Rights, in particular to its decision in McCann, Farrell and Savage v UK,[272] the first judgment of the Court to find a breach of Art 2, did not suggest that future governments would necessarily be deterred on 'manifest breach' or 'adverse publicity' grounds from passing legislation clearly in breach of the Convention without seeking a derogation. The same can be said of the reaction to the findings of the Strasbourg Court in Jordan, Kelly, Arthurs, Donelly and Others v UK[273] in 2001. A breach of Art 2 was found in respect of the killing of eight IRA members by the SAS in 1987. The Conservative and Unionist Parties were outraged by the verdict.

After the decision in McCann, Michael Heseltine, the then Deputy Prime Minister, declared that the then Conservative Government would not change the administrative policies or rules which had led to the deaths in question in that case; members of the government also voiced strong disapproval of the decision, and their stance was welcomed in the right wing sections of the UK press. A future government might 271 See pp 1391–92 and p 1042.

272 (1995) 21 EHRR 97, A 324, Council of Europe Report.
273 (2001) The Times, 18 May; see further Chapter 2, p 40.

take the view that passing a certain measure in overt breach of the Convention was necessary on crime control and/or anti-terrorist grounds, but this stance has not been taken by the current Labour Government, as Chapter 14 indicates.[274]

As discussed below, the Communications Act 2003 is the only Act so far since the Human Rights Act came into force in 2000 not to be accompanied by a statement of compatibility. Apart from the Communications Act, all legislation passed since the obligation to make a statement of compatibility came into force[275] has been accompanied by a declaration of its compatibility with the Convention rights, under s 19. But this need not mean that all such legislation is in fact compatible: the mere fact that a declaration is made does not mean that it can be assumed that compatibility was in fact achieved.[276] As indicated, a statement of compatibility is far from conclusive of the matter.

Thus, the s 19 procedure should be viewed as the expression of an executive opinion based on legal advice, nothing more. As far as s 3 is concerned, the courts are expected to satisfy their obligation under s 3 in respect of legislation passed prior to the inception of the HRA in 1998, but are under an even stronger obligation, as indicated above, in respect of legislation accompanied by a statement of compatibility since it can be assumed that Parliament intended that the legislation should be compatible with the Convention. Where no declaration is made, it can be said that the courts are placed in a dilemma. Section 3 still applies, but Parliament's intention can be viewed as being that the legislation in question should not be compatible with the Convention. However, if no derogation from the Convention right is sought, the dilemma could be resolved by adopting the view that Parliament could be presumed not to wish to legislate compatibly with the Convention except where it had expressly stated that such was its intention. A court could then apply s 3 as it would to legislation passed after 1950, but before 1998. This point is returned to below, in relation to the Communications Act 2003.

As Chapter 11 indicates, in order to ensure that a declaration could be made, and more significantly, to ensure full compliance with the Convention in a more general sense, the Terrorism Act 2000 contained provisions that allowed the government to abandon the embarrassing derogation from Art 5.[277] Thereafter, the Labour Government, which introduced the HRA, has not sought to introduce Bills, with the one exception mentioned, that could not be accompanied by a declaration under s 19.

The view taken by the government in introducing the Communications Bill containing a statutory prohibition on political advertising in broadcasting was that the 2003 Act could not be declared to be compatible with the ECHR. The government had taken the decision, in introducing the 2003 reforms, not to relax or modify the ban, despite the fact that this meant that it considered that it could not issue a statement of the compatibility of the Act with the European Convention on Human Rights, under s 19(a) HRA. The government was not prepared to modify the section by creating exceptions in order to seek to ensure compatibility. The government was supported in 274 See, e.g., p 1438.

275 The obligation to make a statement of compatibility came into force on 24 November 1998, not on 2 October 2000, under the HRA 1998 (Commencement) Order 1998 (SI 1998/2882).

276 See Feldman, D, 'Institutional Roles and meanings of 'compatibility' under the HRA' in Fenwick, Masterman and Phillipson (eds) (2007), fn 1 above.

277 See pp 1168–69.

this decision by the Parliamentary Committees that considered the matter prior to the introduction of the new Act.[278] Sections 319 and 321, it was considered, could not be declared to be compatible with Art 10 and so, in accordance with s 19(1)(b) HRA, no statement of compatibility was issued accompanying the Bill, but the point was made in Parliament that the provisions need not be viewed as incompatible and that they would be defended if necessary.[279]

Thus the use of the broadcast media for paid political advertising is prohibited by ss 319 and 321 of the Communications Act 2003. Section 319(2)(g) imposes a duty on Ofcom, the broadcast regulator, to ensure that political advertising is not included in television or radio services. Section 321(2) provides that for the purposes of section 319(2)(g) an advertisement will contravene the prohibition on political advertising if it is:

> (a) an advertisement which is inserted by or on behalf of a body whose objects are wholly or mainly of a political nature; (b) an advertisement which is directed towards a political end; or (c) an advertisement which has a connection with an industrial dispute.

The ban appears to be even wider then these rules would warrant.[280] Section 321(3) provides a non-exhaustive definition of 'objects wholly or mainly of a political nature', which covers: influencing the outcome of elections, bringing about changes in the law, influencing political policy and influencing persons with public functions, including functions conferred via international agreements. These provisions make it clear that this is an extremely broad and comprehensive prohibition. It may be noted that the objectives mentioned are not confined to the UK, but include influencing foreign governments and policy. This statutory definition of 'political advertising', for the purposes of the ban, is more detailed and explicit than in any previous legislation.

Since this is an absolute ban it probably contravenes Art 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights.[281] An interest group, such as Make Poverty History, might decide to mount a challenge to the ban under the HRA, relying on Art 10. The action would be likely to be brought in the form of judicial review of a decision of 278 See Joint Committee on the Draft Communications Bill, the Draft Communications Bill HL 169-I/HC876-I (2001–2) para 301; Committee on Standards in Public Life Fifth Report: the Funding of Political Parties in the UK Cm 4057 (1998) recommendation 94.

279 See Hansard, HC Vol.395, col 789 (Dec 3, 2002); Hansard, HL Vol. 646, cols 658–59 (March 25, 2003).

280 Rule 4 of the Television Advertising Standards Code of the Broadcast Committee of Advertising Practice (BCAP) reflects the ban; it prohibits commercials that: (a) may be inserted by or on behalf of any body whose objects are wholly or mainly of a political nature; (b) may be directed towards any political end; (c) may have any relation to any industrial dispute (with limited exceptions); or (d) may show partiality as respects matters of political or industrial controversy or relating to current public policy. It may be noted that the statute does not contain an equivalent to Rule 4(d) of the Television Advertising Standards Code; the Code is therefore wider than the statute and so creates a broader restriction.

281 In VGT v Switzerland (2002) 34 EHRR 159 the Strasbourg Court had found that a similar refusal to broadcast an advertisement had amounted to an interference by a public authority in the exercise of the rights guaranteed by Art 10 (at para 48).

Ofcom's upholding a ban on Make Poverty History broadcast advertising.[282] It could first be asked whether the ban based on ss 319(2)(g) and 321 Communications Act 2003 combined is in fact incompatible with Art 10. The fact that the 2003 Act was not declared compatible with the Convention due to the prohibition in s 321 indicates that the finding of such a breach, while not inevitable, would be probable. Parliament did make a deliberate decision in relation to a post-HRA statute to pass provisions that were arguably in breach of Art 10, having been given notice under s 19(1)(b) HRA that this was possibly the case. Clearly, the courts do not have to accept that the provisions did in fact create such a breach,[283] but it may be argued at first glance that they should show some deference to Parliament's decision to pass them, a different issue.

But the question is what does showing deference entail in this highly exceptional context? The courts have not so far tackled the question of deference in relation to provisions that Parliament itself has accepted are probably incompatible with a Convention Article. In this context deference appears to mean taking account of the probability that the provisions are indeed incompatible with Art 10 as the s 19(1)(b) HRA statement signalled. This is objectively evidenced on the face of the Bill in the statement – there is no difficulty in determining Parliament's intention. A finding by a court that the provisions are in fact incompatible would not therefore be out of line with the intention of Parliament – which on one rational reading of the debates, intended to pass incompatible provisions. The government's own position in the debates was, it is suggested, contradictory. It used the s 19(1)(b) HRA statement procedure but stated that it did not accept that the provisions were incompatible. Had it thought that the provisions could be viewed as compatible on a 'more likely than not' test then presumably it would have issued a statement under s 19(1)(a) HRA to that effect. Therefore Parliament must have considered that it was passing provisions that were probably incompatible with Art 10. Paying deference to that decision of Parliament does not appear to be incompatible with bringing an intense form of scrutiny to bear on the question of proportionality since Parliament has in a sense invited the courts to do just that.

Lewis argues that s 321 could be seen as 'merely an opening gambit' in a conversation between the organs of governance about the essence of rights whose content is 'essentially contestable'.[284] He cites in support Jack Straw's speech made during the passage of the Human Rights Bill to the effect that 'Parliament and the judiciary must engage in a serious dialogue about the operation and development of the rights in the Bill . . . this dialogue is the only way in which we can ensure the legislation is a living development that assists our citizens'.[285] This comment of Jack Straw's supports the argument that the government were opening a dialogue with the courts in making the s 19(1)(b) statement in the passage of the Communications Bill regarding the standard of scrutiny to be used. In general, courts may be prepared to defer to Parliament's view 282 See further Fenwick and Phillipson (2006) fn 1 above, Chapter 20.

283 In R v A [2002] 1 AC 45 Lord Hope said, obiter, that s 19 statements are merely expressions of opinion by the Minister. He found that they are not binding on courts and do not have even persuasive authority (at para 69).

284 Lewis, T, 'Political Advertising and the Communications Act 2003' [2005] 3 EHRLR 290–300 at p 299.

285 Hansard, HC Vol. 314, col 1141 (June 24, 1998).

that provisions are compatible with the Convention rights. Thus, in this instance, the use of deference might conceivably be more likely to lead to a finding that the ban is compatible with Art 10.

As discussed in Chapter 14, when the Anti-Terrorism Crime and Security Act 2001 was passed the government sought a derogation from Art 5 in respect of the detention without trial provisions of Part 4, rather than seeking to pass them through Parliament unaccompanied by a statement of compatibility.[286] In general it is argued, for obvious reasons, that seeking a derogation from the relevant Article in question in order to achieve compatibility is preferable to merely pushing incompatible legislation through Parliament, even though the HRA allows for that latter possibility. A derogation under Art 15, as discussed in Chapters 2 and 14, can only be sought under very limited circumstances that can then be subject to judicial scrutiny.[287] In contrast, the HRA allows for exceptions to the Convention to be made in any circumstances – no limitations at all are contained in the HRA itself, except the limitation that can be implied from the wording of s 3. No requirement of proportionality is imported into the HRA itself in relation to the introduction of incompatible Bills. A requirement could have been imposed in the HRA that a detailed explanation for the reasons behind seeking to legislate in breach of the Convention must be given to Parliament and that only in certain circumstances, including emergency ones, should Parliament accept them. But, clearly, such a requirement would have been overtly incompatible with the doctrine of Parliamentary sovereignty.

Clearly, legislating in deliberate and overt breach of the Convention would eventually invite a successful challenge to the measure in the European Court of Human Rights, but the government in its legislative programme has not sought to take advantage even of the time lapse that would have occurred.

Special protection for the media and religious freedom?

Protecting religious organisations

The Church of England lobbied fiercely during the passage of the Human Rights Bill to be given special protection for religious freedom. The amendments to the Bill adopted in the House of Lords, which would have provided a defence where religious organisations breached human rights in the pursuance of religious belief, suggested that the Church wished to be allowed to disregard human rights values in the name of respect for religious belief, and that while protecting its own Art 9 rights, it was prepared to use them to invade the Convention rights of others.[288] The Church appeared to hope that it would be able to discriminate against persons on the ground, for example, of gender or sexual orientation in respect, inter alia, of employment in Church schools. Those amendments were removed in the Commons and s 13 was substituted, on the basis that Church concerns could be met without compromising the integrity of the Bill.[289] Section 13 does not allow the Church, and other religious organisations, to 286 See Chapter 14, pp 1422 et seq.

287 See p 110 and pp 1431–38.
288 See 585 HL Official Report Cols 747–60, 770–90, 805, 812–13, 5 February 1998.
289 The Home Secretary, 312 HC Official Report, Col 1019 (1998).

disregard human rights, but on its face it appears to give special protection to their Art 9 rights. It provides: 'If a court's determination of any question arising under this Act might affect the exercise by a religious organisation . . . of [its Art 9 rights] the right to freedom of . . . religion, it must have particular regard to the importance of that right.' Arguably, s 13 impliedly accepts, therefore, what some commentators regard as a regrettable dislocation between human rights values and religious ones which could present judges with problems of interpretation.[290] Ian Loveland has dubbed the amendment 'a substantive obscenity'.[291] However, since, as Chapter 9 indicates, s 12 has not been found to enhance the weight to be given to Art 10 on the basis that Arts 8–11 must be viewed as standing on an equal footing,[292] it is probable that this would also be found to be the case in respect of s 13 in relation to Art 9.

Protecting the media

The press also lobbied for special protection. Press lobbying focused overwhelmingly upon the fear that the Act would introduce a right to privacy against the media 'through the back door', due either to judicial development of the common law in the post-HRA era, or to the probable status of the Press Complaints Commission as a public authority, itself bound to act compatibly with the Convention under s 6 HRA.[293] Sometimes the basic point was missed that the Convention rights would not directly bind newspapers, since they are not public authorities.[294] The amendment became s 12, which applies 'if a court is considering whether to grant any relief [which could] affect the exercise of the Convention right to freedom of expression'.

Section 12(2)–(3) provides special provision against the grant of ex parte injunctions, which is discussed further in Chapters 8[295] and 9.[296] Under s 12(3), no relief which, if granted, might affect the exercise of the Convention right to freedom of expression is to be granted so as to restrain publication before trial 'unless the court is satisfied that the applicant is likely to establish that publication should not be allowed.' Section 12(3) therefore affects the grant of interim injunctions generally. The use of injunctions is discussed in Chapter 9 in the context of restraining misuse of private information. The discussion considers in particular the use of s 12 HRA where interim injunctions are sought in civil proceedings against newspapers.[297]

Under s 12(5), the term 'relief' includes 'any remedy or order other than in criminal proceedings'. Section 12(4) provides that the court must have special regard to the Convention right to freedom of expression and, in particular, to the extent to which it is about to become or has become available to the public, the public interest in its 290 See further Cumper, P, 'The protection of religious rights under s 13 of the HRA' [2000] PL 254.

291 Loveland, I, Constitutional Law, 2000, p 603.
292 See pp 950 et seq.
293 See Chapter 9, pp 848–49 on this point.
294 The definition of 'public authority' appears in ss 6(1), 6(3)(b) and 6(5)) of the Act, discussed in HL Deb Vol 582 Cols 1277, 1293–94 and 1309–10, 3 November 1997, and ibid, Vol 583, Cols 771–811, 24 November 1997.
295 See p 795.
296 See pp 985–90.
297 See pp 988–89.

publication and 'any relevant privacy code'.[298] Section 12(4) is therefore highly relevant in actions originating under the breach of confidence doctrine. Section 12 has not protected the media from the impact of a privacy law. Media fears that a 'privacy law' would develop under the HRA were not misplaced and are currently in the process of being realised. But there was an enjoyable irony in the fact that it was s 12(4) that was used, at least initially, to provide such a law with impetus, ensnaring the group that lobbied for its inclusion. Clearly, from a human rights perspective, this can be viewed as a welcome development, since it means that a group – media proprietors – with the ability and the evident desire to infringe the rights of others, while protecting its own, can be curbed in its ability to do so.

The position of the Scottish Parliament, the Northern Ireland Assembly and the Welsh Assembly

The devolution legislation places the Scottish Parliament, the Northern Ireland Assembly and the Welsh Assembly in a different position from that of the Westminster Parliament as regards the legal status of the Convention rights. The Welsh Assembly is not able to pass primary legislation and it is bound by the Convention under s 107(1) of the Government of Wales Act 1988. The Scottish Parliament cannot act incompatibly with the Convention under s 29(2)(d) of the Scotland Act 1998. The Executive and law officers in Scotland are also bound.[299] Under s 21 HRA, legislation passed by the Scottish Parliament and by the Northern Ireland Assembly is regarded as secondary legislation. Under s 3 HRA, any primary legislation[300] passed by the Westminster Parliament and applicable to Scotland, Northern Ireland and Wales will be binding, even if it is not compatible with the Convention. These arrangements mean that Scotland has, in effect, a Bill of Rights in the traditional sense since the Parliament is bound by the Convention and therefore cannot pass primary legislation which conflicts with it.[301] The references to 'legislation' so far, and below, are to legislation emanating from the Westminster Parliament.

Conclusions

It can now be said that the rules of interpretation relating to legislation affecting Convention rights differ, depending on when it was passed. Prior legislation passed before 1950 is subject to a compatible construction rule only, arising under s 3. Prior legislation passed after 1950 is subject to a 'legislative intention plus compatible construction rule'[302] since, as indicated above, Parliament can be presumed not to 298 See further on s 12(4): Griffiths, J and Lewis, T, 'The HRA s 12 – press freedom over privacy' (1999) 10(2) Ent LR 36–41. They argue that s 12(4) did not in fact provide the protection the media had hoped for, although their spokespersons believed that it had.

299 See Scotland Act 1998, s 57. Thus, in Scotland and Wales, the Convention became binding from 1 July 1999, when the devolution legislation came into force, over a year before the HRA came fully into force.

300 Scotland Act 1998, s 29(2)(b) and Sched 5, and Government of Wales Act 1988, Sched 2.

301 See further Tierney, S, 'Devolution issues and s 2(1) of the HRA' (2000) 4 EHRLR 380–92.

302 See Bennion, F, 'What interpretation is possible under s 3(1) of the HRA?' [2000] PL 77.

have intended to legislate incompatibly with the Convention. Subsequent legislation – passed after the inception of the HRA – is subject to the general legislative intention rule, the presumption which may be said to be embodied in the s 19 procedure and to the compatible construction rule under s 3. If no declaration of compatibility is made, subsequent legislation is subject to the compatible construction rule and probably to the legislative intention rule too.

In so far as the possibility of incompatibility arises in either prior or subsequent legislation, the stance taken by the House of Lords in Ghaidan is that it should be dealt with under s 3, without resorting to a declaration of incompatibility under s 4, except as a last resort. After R v A and Ghaidan Parliament's theoretical ability under the HRA to pass incompatible legislation has been undermined. It may be concluded, therefore, that s 3 places the Convention in a strong position when compared with ordinary legislation, although, in a very technical sense, as a matter of constitutional theory, parliamentary sovereignty is preserved.

But at the same time the HRA is in a weak position compared to, for example, the US Bill of Rights, since it is subject to express repeal or amendment by subsequent enactments. This is a significant weakness, bearing in mind the continuing hostility of the Conservative Party to the HRA,[303] and indeed the lack of support for its values exhibited by members of the Labour Government. As already indicated, the intention of the Conservative Party is to repeal the HRA if it is elected at the next General Election, expected to be in 2009 or 2010. Although in terms of express repeal, the doctrine of Parliamentary sovereignty is preserved, the other HRA mechanisms apparently intended to show adherence to that doctrine now look tokenistic. The possibilities of passing incompatible legislation, or of disregarding declarations of incompatibility, have not been exploited over the last seven years of the HRA's existence. Aside from certain provisions of the Communications Act 2003, Parliament has shown little evidence of an intent to employ the leeway allowed for under the HRA to pass incompatible legislation in the years 2000–7.

Instead, the Convention exceptions system has been deployed domestically so that at the least parity with Strasbourg is maintained. When Part 4 Anti-Terrorism Crime and Security Act 2001 was passed, a derogation from Art 5 accompanied it.[304] Otherwise, Parliament and the courts have relied on the doctrine of proportionality in finding that exceptions to the Convention rights can be justified. The stance taken under s 3 appears to be, as discussed, a remedial one. In other words, the courts have shown a determination to take measures to avoid a breach of a Convention right at the domestic level, largely disregarding the possibility of dealing with Convention restraints offered by s 3(2) and s 4 HRA. The government and Parliament have largely followed suit, as the discussion of the use of ss 4, 10 and s 19(1)(a) and (b) over the last seven years indicates. The stance of the senior judges in the leading s 3 cases is in accordance with the redefinition of their role that the HRA has brought about, and with the status of the HRA as a constitutional instrument. However, as the discussion of the leading s 2 decisions reveals, the traditional constraints of the doctrine of precedent are creating a 303 Such hostility became ever more evident once the Conservatives had lost the 2001 General Election, owing to the change of leadership. At the 2005 General Election it was stated that the HRA would be modified if the Conservatives were elected.

304 See Chapter 14, pp 1422 et seq.

countervailing pressure that is holding back the development of a British constitutional rights jurisprudence.[305]

4 The Position of Public Authorities under the HRA

The binding effect of Convention rights

Section 6 is the central provision of the HRA. Section 6(1) provides: 'It is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right.' This is the main provision giving effect to the Convention rights: rather than incorporation of the Convention, it is made binding against public authorities. Under s 6(6), an 'act' includes an omission, but does not include a failure to introduce in or lay before Parliament a proposal for legislation or a failure to make any primary legislation or remedial order. Section 6(6) was included in order to preserve Parliamentary sovereignty and prerogative power: in this case, the power of the executive to introduce legislation.

Thus, apart from its impact on legislation, the HRA also creates obligations under s 6 which bear upon 'public authorities'. Such obligations have a number of implications. Independently of litigation, public authorities have had to put procedures in place in order to ensure that they do not breach their duty under s 6. Guidance was issued prior to the coming in to force of the HRA[306] to a number of central government departments by the Human Rights Unit (HRU), now the Human Rights Division of the Department for Constitutional Affairs, and a number of the departments undertook a human rights audit, reporting back to the HRU.[307] However, beyond central government departments, practice was very variable,[308] although certain bodies, including the police, undertook quite extensive preparation before the HRA came fully into force.[309] The Human Rights Task Force was set up by the Home Office to aid in the preparations, and it has received reports from certain public authorities regarding completion of internal human rights reviews. It is clear that internal human rights reviewing and auditing in public authorities is an ongoing process, one that intensified once the HRA was fully in force. The level of awareness of the implications of the HRA in the various public authorities has been and will remain extremely variable for some considerable period.

Clearly, an exception had to be made under s 6 in order to bring it into harmony with s 3 and to realise the objective of preserving Parliamentary sovereignty. Section 305 See further Masterman, Chapter 3, in Fenwick, Masterman, Phillipson (eds)) (2007) fn 1 above.

306 A number of documents have been issued by the HRU, including Putting Rights into Public Services, July 1999; Core Guidance for Public Authorities: A New Era of Rights and Responsibilities; The Human Rights Act 1998: Guidance for Departments, now A Guide to the Human Rights Act 1998, 3rd edn, 2006.

307 See further the Department for Constitutional Affairs website: www.dca.gov.uk; the DCA Human Rights Division website: www.dca.gov.uk/peoples-rights/human-rights/index.htm.

308 See for comment at that time Pleming, 'Assessing the act: a firm foundation or a false start' (2000) 6 EHRLR 560–79. See further Clements and Thomas (eds) The HRA: A Success Story? (2005).

309 The Association of Chief Police Officers set up a Human Rights Working Group in November 1998; it appointed a Human Rights Programme Team in 1999. Twelve areas of police work were selected as especially significant in HRA terms, including covert policing, discipline, hate crimes, domestic violence and public order. An audit of those areas was undertaken in order to determine whether procedures and policies required modification.

6(2) provides: 'sub-section (1) does not apply to an act if, (a) as the result of one or more provisions of primary legislation, the authority could not have acted differently; or (b) in the case of one or more provisions of, or made under, primary legislation which cannot be read or given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights, the authority was acting so as to give effect to or enforce those provisions'. Thus, s 6(2)(a) creates a strong obligation requiring public authorities to do their utmost to act compatibly.

It may be noted that s 6(2)(a) applies to primary legislation only, whereas s 6(2)(b) applies also to subordinate legislation made under incompatible primary legislation. This is implicit in the use of the words 'or made under' used in the latter sub-section, but not the former. The exception under s 6 applies to legislation only (which, as indicated above, includes Orders in Council made under the royal prerogative, under s 21(1)). If a common law provision conflicts with a Convention right binding on a public body under s 6, it appears that the right will prevail. No provision was included in the Act allowing the common law to override the Convention or creating restrictions as to those courts that can find incompatibility between the two.

Relationship between ss 3 and 6

Where legislation is applicable to a public authority, a court, as itself a public authority must, in addition to its duty under s 3, seek to ensure that the Convention is adhered to. It must bear in mind that it is considering the obligations of another public authority which is bound by the rights. But its duty under s 3 relates to its interpretation of the legislation itself, its duty under s 6 to the application of the legislation by the public authority and by itself in relation to the Convention rights. The courts in the post-HRA cases do not always advert expressly to their use of either ss 3 or 6 in applying legislation.[310] A court can first apply s 6 and ask whether the public authority has, by its action or omission, breached the Convention guarantee(s) in question. If it appears that it has, the court should look to the relevant legislation to determine whether, even when the attempt is made to construe it compatibly with the Convention, it remains incompatible and therefore provides the public authority with a loophole under s 6(2). An alternative method is to consider the legislation first in relation to the public authority, affording it a Convention-friendly interpretation, and then asking whether, under such an interpretation, it appeared that the body had the power to do what it had done. If it appeared that it had not, it could be found to have acted ultra vires.

Distinguishing between public authorities and private bodies

'Standard' and 'functional' public authorities

Under s 6, Convention guarantees are binding only against 'public authorities'. The terms 'public authority' and 'public function' were left deliberately undefined in the HRA. Nor was an exhaustive list of public authorities attempted, on the model provided by the Freedom of Information Act 2000.[311] Under s 6(3)(b) the term covers 'any person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature'. So the crucial question in relation to many bodies concerns the meaning of the term 'functions of a public nature' – if the body is not self-evidently a public authority, as explained below. Only two bodies are categorised under the HRA itself – the courts and Parliament. Under s 6(3)(a), the term 'public authority' includes a court or under sub-section (b) a tribunal. Parliament 'or a person exercising functions in connection with proceedings in Parliament' is expressly excluded from the definition. This refers to the Westminster Parliament; the Scottish Parliament, the Northern Ireland Assembly and the Welsh Assembly.

310 See, e.g., Chapter 8, p 797. In the cases discussed it was not clear whether ss 6 or 3 were being relied upon in applying the Convention.

Not only is the definition under s 6(3) non-exhaustive, it also leaves open room for much debate on the meaning of 'functions of a public nature'. The definition was explained in the Notes on Clauses accompanying the Bill as indicating that where a body is clearly recognisable as a public authority, there is no need to look at the detailed provisions of s 6(3)(a)–(b). Thus, the term 'public authority' includes firstly bodies which are self-evidently of a public nature, such as the police, government departments, the Probation Service, local authorities, the Security and Intelligence Services, and the BBC. They are usually referred to as 'standard public authorities'.

Second, certain bodies, which have both public and private functions, are quasi-public or hybrid bodies. They are generally referred to as 'functional public authorities', the terminology used in the Notes on Clauses accompanying the Bill. Under s 6(5), 'in relation to a particular act, a person is not a public authority by virtue only of s 6(3)(b) if the nature of the act is private'. Since, in relation to standard public authorities, there is no need to consider s 6(3)(b), this provision refers to functional public authorities and has the effect of excluding the private acts of functional public authorities from the scope of the HRA (but see the discussion of 'horizontal effect', below). This is a very significant matter, since the private acts of standard public authorities are not excluded. So under s 6(5), functional public authorities are bound by the Convention rights in respect of their public functions only. Therefore, for example, assuming that acts relating to employment are private acts, an employee of a standard public authority could use the HRA directly against the authority, as explained below, while the employee of a functional public authority could not. A hospital, for example, might be viewed as exercising a public function in relation to NHS patients, a private one in relation to private patients. But some room was clearly created for debate as to those bodies that should be classified as standard rather than functional.[312] Classic functional bodies include privatised fuel or water companies and other contracted-out services.

Thus, under the generally accepted view of s 6(3) and (5), the provisions create three categories of body in relation to the Convention rights. First, there are standard ('pure') public authorities which can never act privately, even in respect of matters governed by private law, such as employment relations. Such bodies are obliged under s 6 to act in accordance with Convention rights in relation to all of their activities, whether they can be accounted public or private functions. Secondly, there are functional (quasi-public) authorities which have a dual function and which can act privately; these are

311 See Chapter 7, pp 632–34.

312 See Grosz, Beatson and Duffy, op. cit., fn 1, on this point: para 4–10 et seq.

bodies having several functions, some public and some private; they are caught by the Convention in respect of the former functions but not the latter. In other words, they are not bound by the Act to adhere to the Convention rights when engaged in private acts. It is possible, it is suggested, that they could operate privately in respect of aspects of carrying out their public functions, while they would always act privately respect of their private functions. Thirdly, there are purely private bodies which have no public function at all. It was accepted in Parliament in debate on the Human Rights Bill that this was the correct reading of s 6.[313]

It follows from the three categorisations that, for example, the prison service has a mainly public function in respect of managing prisons and providing services in relation to prisoners, but a private function in relation to the employment of prison officers. Nevertheless, as a core public authority it is bound by the Convention in respect of both functions. An example of a body in the second category arose in respect of Railtrack (now abolished and re-nationalised), which had a public function in respect of rail safety (see Cameron v Network Rail),[314] but might also have dealt with ancillary matters linked to safety, including employment, which could have been viewed as private. The other, private, function of such bodies (British Telecom and British Gas may provide examples) would relate, inter alia, to their dealings with shareholders and property development, and in respect of those functions it is probable that such bodies could never act publicly.[315] A further example was given by the Lord Chancellor; he stated in debate on the Human Rights Bill that 'doctors in general practice would be [functional] public authorities in relation to their National Health Service functions, but not in relation to their private patients'.[316] Similarly, a private security company that has a contract with the government to transport prisoners to and from court, and especially if it has a statutory duty in so doing, is probably a functional public authority for the purposes of the HRA when it is transporting prisoners, but not when it is guarding private property under a contract with a private organisation since that is a private function. Therefore, when performing that latter function, it is not under a direct duty to respect Convention rights. It would only be affected by the rights – assuming that no statute was applicable – if an incident occurred in which another cause of action was applicable. If a cause of action, such as trespass to the person, applied and an action was brought, the court in adjudicating on that action, would have to take the Convention rights into account since the court is itself a public authority under s 6. This difficult point is pursued below, in relation to the duties of private bodies under the HRA.

The discussion below, and in this book in general, proceeds on the basis, therefore, that s 6 creates three categories of bodies – standard, functional and private – and that the private acts of functional bodies are excluded from the scope of the s 6 obligation, while standard public authorities are bound in respect of all their functions. They are not excluded from the effects of the HRA entirely, owing to its creation of indirect horizontal effects (discussed below).

313 See Straw, HC Official Report, Cols 409–10 (1998).

314 [2006] EWHC 1133 QB.

315 See HL Deb Col 811, 24 November 1997.

316 Hansard, HL Deb, Vol 583, Col 811 (24 November 2001). See further Clayton and Tomlinson, The Law of Human Rights, 1st edn, 2000, para 5–3.

Tests determining core and functional public authority status

The relevant test determining that a public authority is a 'core' authority was considered in detail in the leading decision of the House of Lords in Aston Cantlow PCC v Wallbank.[317] The question facing the Lords was whether the action of a parochial church council (PCC) seeking to enforce liability to repair a church was taken as an aspect of a public function. Lord Nicholls first considered whether the PCC should be viewed as a core public authority, finding that there no single test was available to determine whether a public body carried out a public function. He said:[318]

> The expression 'public authority' is not defined in the Act, nor is it a recognised term of art in English law, that is, an expression with a specific recognised meaning. The word 'public' is a term of uncertain import, used with many different shades of meaning: public policy, public rights of way, public property, public authority (in the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893), public nuisance, public house, public school, public company. So in the present case the statutory context is all important. As to that, the broad purpose sought to be achieved by section 6(1) is not in doubt. The purpose is that those bodies for whose acts the state is answerable before the European Court of Human Rights shall in future be subject to a domestic law obligation not to act incompatibly with Convention rights. If they act in breach of this legal obligation victims may henceforth obtain redress from the courts of this country. In future victims should not need to travel to Strasbourg.
>
> Conformably with this purpose, the phrase 'a public authority' in section 6(1) is essentially a reference to a body whose nature is governmental in a broad sense of that expression . . . under the Human Rights Act a body of this nature is required to act compatibly with Convention rights in everything it does. The most obvious examples are government departments, local authorities, the police and the armed forces. Behind the instinctive classification of these organisations as bodies whose nature is governmental lie factors such as the possession of special powers, democratic accountability, public funding in whole or in part, an obligation to act only in the public interest, and a statutory constitution . . . . One consequence of being a 'core' public authority, namely, an authority falling within section 6 without reference to section 6(3), is that the body in question does not itself enjoy Convention rights . . . . A core public authority seems inherently incapable of satisfying the Convention description of a victim: "any person, non-governmental organisation or group of individuals" (Article 34, with emphasis added). Only victims of an unlawful act may bring proceedings under section 7 of the Human Rights Act, and the Convention description of a victim has been incorporated into the Act, by section 7(7) . . . It must always be relevant to consider whether Parliament can have been intended that the body in question should have no Convention rights.

317 [2004] 1 AC 546. For discussion, see Meisel, F, 'The Aston Cantlow case: blots on English jurisprudence and the public/private law divide' [2004] PL 2–10.

318 At paras 6–8.

Applying these tests, the House of Lords found that parochial church councils (PCCs) are not 'core' public authorities. Lord Nicholls noted that as the established church the Church of England has special links with central government, but he considered that it remains essentially a religious organisation. He found that the constitution and functions of PCCs do not support the view that they should be characterised as core public authorities. Lord Nicholls said that the essential role of a PCC is to provide a formal means, prescribed by the Church of England, whereby ex officio and elected members of the local church promote the mission of the Church and discharge financial responsibilities in respect of their own parish church; he viewed these as acts of self-governance and PCCs as far removed from the type of body whose acts engage the responsibility of the state under the European Convention. As indicated, he further noted that if PCCs could be characterised as core public authorities that would mean that they would not be capable of being victims within the meaning of the HRA and, inter alia, would not be able take advantage of s 13, which gives express mention to the exercise by religious organisations of the Art 9 right of freedom of thought, conscience and religion.[319] Lord Hope noted that the Strasbourg jurisprudence supports this approach.[320] He also considered that the case law on judicial review might not provide much assistance as to functions of a public nature because the cases were not decided for the purposes of identifying the liability of the state in international law.[321]

The question of categorising core public bodies has not proved unduly problematic[322] since, as Lord Nicholls stated, such bodies are normally self-evidently governmental. But the tests for determining 'hybrid' public authority status are still less than clear. A clear definition of a 'public' function has proved elusive.[323] The precise distinction to draw between standard and functional bodies, and between functional and private bodies, has already given rise to quite a lot of litigation. This latter issue has proven to be a complex and difficult area for the courts, and the cases have not yet succeeded in establishing a clear, coherent and workable test as to the nature of the function that will cross the threshold between private and public. The tests that are currently emerging, as discussed below, do not, it will be argued, accord with the spirit of the Convention or with the government's intention in deciding on the wording of s 6.

One of the leading decisions, which was also discussed above, is Poplar Housing & Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue.[324] A local authority, Tower Hamlets, was under a statutory duty under s 188 of the Housing Act 1996 to provide or secure the provision of housing to certain homeless people. Donoghue was provided with interim accommodation in Council property – a flat – by Tower Hamlets pending the Council's decision in relation to her application as a homeless person under the Housing Act. The local council set up a housing association, Poplar Housing and 319 See paras 13–15.

320 At para 62. Holy Monasteries v Greece (1995) 20 EHRR 1 and Hautanemi v Sweden (1996) 22 EHRR CD 156.

321 Ibid, para 52.

322 See further for early comment Oliver, D, 'The Frontiers of the State: Public Authorities and Public Functions under the Human Rights Act', [2000] PL 476; Clayton and Tomlinson, The Law of Human Rights, 1st edn 2000 para 5.08.

323 See Oliver, D, 'Functions of a public nature under the Human Rights Act' [2004] PL 329.

324 [2002] QB 48; [2001] EWCA Civ 595.

Regeneration Community Association Ltd, as a registered social landlord, with the specific purpose of receiving its housing stock; it then transferred a lot of its property, including the applicant's flat, to the Association. By the transfer, the applicant's tenancy became an assured short-hold tenancy. Poplar Housing began possession proceedings; Donoghue claimed that this would violate her right to a home under Art 8 ECHR and that Poplar Housing was bound under s 6 HRA to respect this right because it was a public authority under the Act. Poplar claimed, inter alia, that it was not a standard public authority, and the Court of Appeal accepted this. It further claimed that it was not a body performing a function of a public nature. On this point, Lord Woolf said:

> What can make an act, which would otherwise be private, public, is a feature or a combination of features which impose a public character or stamp on the act. Statutory authority for what is done can at least help to mark the act as being public; so can the extent of control over the function exercised by another body which is a public authority. The more closely the acts that could be of a private nature are enmeshed in the activities of a public body, the more likely they are to be public. However, the fact that the acts are supervised by a public regulatory body does not necessarily indicate that they are of a public nature. This is analogous to the position in judicial review, where a regulatory body may be deemed public but the activities of the body which is regulated may be categorised private.[325]

The Court concluded that the role of the housing association was so closely intertwined with that of the Council that it was to be considered as discharging a public function in relation to the management of the social housing it had taken over from Tower Hamlets: '. . . in providing accommodation for the defendant and then seeking possession, the association's role was so closely assimilated to that of the authority that it was acting as a public authority.'[326] On the other hand, the Court considered that the raising of finance by Poplar was probably a private function. Also, the fact of providing accommodation for rent was not viewed 'without more, a public function',[327] even where the accommodation being provided had been previously the responsibility of a local authority.

So the finding of a public function in the particular case was not based on whether the function should be viewed as inherently 'public' in nature – using the wording of the statutory test. Instead, the Court of Appeal stressed a number of factors other than that of taking over the role of a public authority providing a public service, the provision of accommodation, although that factor was obviously of great significance. It stressed that the definition of what is a public authority should be given a generous interpretation, but the approach, it said, 'is clearly inspired by the approach developed by the courts in identifying the bodies and activities subject to judicial review'. It took into account the fact that the tenant had been a tenant of the council at the time of the transfer and should not be disadvantaged.

325 Ibid at p 69.
326 Ibid at p 70.
327 Ibid at p 69.

The Court thus identified a number of factors which would suggest that a function was public. If the function was carried out under statutory authority and there was control over the function by another body which was a public authority that would be of significance. If there were acts which could be of a private nature – providing accommodation for rent – which were enmeshed in the activities of a public body that would also aid in finding that the function was public, as would the closeness of the relationship with the public body, and that a transfer of responsibilities between the public and private sectors had occurred. The relationship between the two bodies in this instance was close: five members of Tower Hamlets were on the board of Poplar and it was subject to the guidance of the Council as to the manner in which it acted towards its tenants. So the fact that Poplar was carrying out a function of public interest value that the Council would otherwise have had to carry out was not in itself enough to determine that the function should be accounted public. The Court also identified considerations that it viewed as either neutral or irrelevant in making the determination as to the 'public' nature of a function. They included supervision by a regulatory body and the carrying out of functions which would be public if they were carried out by a public bodies.

The problem with this decision is that it demands that a number of criteria should be satisfied other than the inherently 'public' nature of the role in question. The provision of social housing is a public service that serves the public interest since it addresses the problem of homelessness. On the face of it the function appears to be 'public'. The demand that other criteria should be satisfied obviously limits the potential generosity of the statutory term which, it is argued, invites, and was intended to invite, an expansive interpretation. The government's intervention in R (on the application of Johnson) v Havering London Borough Council/YL v Birmingham City Council,[328] discussed below, confirms that this was the intention.

The purpose behind s 6 was obviously to impose Convention obligations on those carrying out public functions and to disallow the avoidance of those obligations simply because functions had been transferred from the public to the private sector. But in making 'public function' the central criterion under the HRA, the intention was to single out only those functions that should be accounted public – and which therefore should be discharged in a Convention-compliant fashion. So the function in question, not the nature of institution discharging it, should be the crucial factor. This decision however concentrates on institutional factors – in particular the closeness of the relationship between the private and the public body. Dawn Oliver argues:

> The problem here is that not all of the considerations and criteria identified by Lord Woolf relate to the nature of the functions or acts in question, which is what s 6 is about, but are institutional (the institutional arrangements of the housing association) and relational (the relationship of the local authority with the housing association and the prior relationship between the local authority and the tenant).[329]

328 [2007] All ER 271.

329 Oliver, D, 'Functions of a Public Nature under the Human Rights Act [2004] PL, pp 329–51.

It is suggested that the first factor that Oliver terms 'relational' can in fact be assimilated to the other institutional factors since the relationship between the two bodies relates to the institutional nature of Poplar. The factor of the prior relationship between Tower Hamlets and the tenant is, it is argued, relevant to the inherently public function in question; in other words it is suggested that it is a factor that the court could properly take into account as a functional factor. The Court of Appeal did identify a number of functional factors, of which that was one, but failed to confine its findings to them.

The same tendency was evident in R (on the application of Heather) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation[330] in which it was found that the body in question was not carrying out a public function. The Foundation (hereafter LCF; it should be noted that LCF is the UK's leading voluntary sector provider of care and support services for the disabled) was a large charitable trust providing residential care homes for those with disabilities. The claimants, who had been placed in the home run by LCF by social services under s 26 National Assistance Act 1948, were long-stay residents in it. Their fees were partly paid from their benefits and partly by the local authority. The claimants had been promised that it would be their home for life. The LCF decided to close the home, and the claimants sought to challenge this decision by way of judicial review as a breach of their rights under Art 8.

Lord Woolf said:[331]

> (i) It is not in issue that it is possible for LCF to perform some public functions and some private functions. In this case it is contended that this was what has been happening in regard to those residents who are privately funded and those residents who are publicly funded. But in this case except for the resources needed to fund the residents of the different occupants of [the home], there is no material distinction between the nature of the services LCF has provided for residents funded by a local authority and those provided to residents funded privately. While the degree of public funding of the activities of an otherwise private body is certainly relevant as to the nature of the functions performed, by itself it is not determinative of whether the functions are public or private.[332] . . . (ii) There is no other evidence of there being a public flavour to the functions of LCF or LCF itself. LCF is not standing in the shoes of the local authorities. Section 26 of the [National Assistance Act 1948] provides statutory authority for the actions of the local authorities but it provides LCF with no powers. LCF is not exercising statutory powers in performing functions for the appellants. (iii) In truth, all that [counsel on behalf of the applicants] can rely upon is the fact that if LCF is not performing a public function the appellants would not be able to rely upon art 8 as against LCF. However, this is a circular argument. If LCF was performing 330 [2002] 2 All ER 936; [2002] EWCA Civ 366. For discussion see Sachdeva, V [2002] JR Law 249. See for the first instance decision: [2001] EWHC Admin 429 [2001] ACD 75. For discussion see Johnston [2001] JR 250. See also Carss-Frisk QC, M, 'Public Authorities: The Developing Definition' [2002] EHRLR 319.

331 At para 35.

332 He relied on the case of R v HM Treasury ex parte Cambridge University [2000] 1WLR 2514 (ECJ) at pp 2523 2534/5, argued as relevant on behalf of LCF, as an interesting illustration in relation to European Union legislation in different terms to s 6.

> a public function, that would mean that the appellants could rely in relation to that function on art 8, but, if the situation is otherwise, art 8 cannot change the appropriate classification of the function. On the approach adopted in Donoghue, it can be said that LCF is clearly not performing any public function.

The court thus held that this was not a case where the local authority was trying to divest itself of its obligations under Art 8 by contracting out its obligations under the National Assistance Act 1948. The local authority still retained its obligations under Art 8. The court noted that if the placements in the home had begun after the HRA came into force it would have been possible for the residents to require the local authority to ensure that their rights under Art 8 were protected by contract. The Court identified three decisive factors which led it to the conclusion that LCF's functions were not public. The home was publicly funded, but there was no other evidence of a 'public flavour' to the activities of LCF. It was not, it was found, standing in the shoes of the local authority. It was noted that the nature of the service provided by LCF did not differ between those residents of the Home who were publicly funded and those who were privately funded. The fact that the claimants would lose the protection of Art 8 against LCF if it was not viewed as performing a public function was viewed as a circular argument. It was observed that the need to secure the protection of Art 8 could not in itself change the classification of a function.

It is argued that this decision is also out of accord with the purpose behind s 6. In a number of respects this appeared to be a case tailor-made for the use of s 6 to impose Convention obligations on a particular body. The function in question – the provision of accommodation to a particularly vulnerable group in society – had been placed on a statutory basis in order to address a social need. The local authority's function in addressing that need was taken over by LCF in the sense that persons in the home in the position of the claimants were there due to the discharge by the local authority of its statutory obligations. In that sense LCF was standing in the shoes of the local authority. The fact that in such circumstances, depending on timing in relation to the HRA, residents could protect their rights through a contract with the public body misses the point of s 6 – it should not be necessary to impose contractual obligations on a body due to its institutional status to adhere to the Convention since under s 6 those obligations should be imposed due to the nature of the function in question. As McDermont observes, this decision 'reject[ed] by implication any 'public interest' arguments'.[333]

In R (A) v Partnerships in Care Ltd,[334] however, the High Court took a stance that did accept public interest arguments and which, it is argued, was more in accord with the spirit of s 6. This decision was handed down before the decision of the Court of Appeal in Cheshire. The managers of a private psychiatric hospital decided to alter the nature of care provided in one of its wards. A detained patient brought a challenge to the hospital's decision to change the nature of a ward's activities with the result that there would be less treatment available for those who were mentally ill. The issue was as to the legality of that decision. A preliminary issue arose as to whether in taking that decision the hospital was acting as a functional public authority under s 6. In other words, was the provision of the treatment for the mentally ill a public function? It was found that the reason for the hospital's decision, which was that staff had left, should not be viewed as having an effect on the nature of the function at issue. There was also a public interest in the provision of adequate facilities, since the detention of the patients might otherwise be prolonged. It was found to be decisive that the hospital was under a statutory duty to provide adequate professional staff and adequate treatment facilities. The Court also thought it significant that the patients' Health Authority had probably discharged its statutory obligations, but those placed on the hospital were freestanding. The functions at issue, the provision of staff and facilities, had a 'statutory underpinning'. Further, detained patients had no choice about receiving the service; their position was therefore analogous to that of those detained in private prisons. Keith J held that the decision was an act of a public nature, and was also amenable to judicial review. The two issues, it was found, would stand together. So the Court found that such a hospital would be a public authority as far as the functions of making the arrangements for the level of care to be provided were concerned.

333 McDermont, M, 'The Elusive Nature of the 'Public Function': Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue' (2003) 66(1) MLR 113, at 121.

334 [2002] EWHC 529.

Public interest factors were also found to be relevant in the decision of the House of Lords in Aston Cantlow v Wallbank.[335] Having decided that a PCC was not a core public authority, as discussed above, the question still remained whether the action of the parochial church council in seeking to enforce liability to repair the church should be characterised as an aspect of a public function. In other words, was the parish council to be viewed as a functional public authority acting in a public function? Lord Nicholls said on the general test for 'public authority' under the HRA:

> What, then, is the touchstone to be used in deciding whether a function is public [for the purpose of s 6(3)]? Clearly there is no single test of universal application. There cannot be, given the diverse nature of governmental functions and the variety of means by which these functions are discharged today. Factors to be taken into account include the extent to which in carrying out the relevant function the body is publicly funded, or is exercising statutory powers, or is taking the place of central government or local authorities, or is providing a public service.[336]

In considering the 'public' nature of functions he took account, as noted above, of factors such as 'the possession of special powers, democratic accountability, public funding in whole or in part, an obligation to act only in the public interest, and a statutory constitution'.[337]

The majority of the House of Lords found that the PCC was a functional authority; but went on to decide that the PCC was not carrying out a public function in this particular instance. Lord Hope found that:

335 [2004] 1 AC 546 [2003] 3 WLR 283.
336 Ibid at para 12.
337 Ibid at para 8.

> [I]t may be said that, as the church is a historic building which is open to the public, it is in the public interest that these repairs should be carried out. [But] the nature of the act is to be found in the nature of the obligation which the PCC is seeking to enforce. It is seeking to enforce a civil debt. The function which it is performing has nothing to do with the responsibilities which are owed to the public by the state. The nature of the act is to be found in the nature of the obligation which the PCC is seeking to enforce . . . [namely] a civil debt. The function it is performing has nothing to do with the responsibilities which are owed to the public by the state.[338]

The Court of Appeal had seen the liability as a tax and therefore as pertaining to a public function because it was enforced on people who were not necessarily church members and, using circular reasoning, because it was imposed by a public authority. The House of Lords saw it as a civil liability that arose from occupation of a particular type of land. It was stressed in particular that the liability was taken on with notice – and therefore voluntarily – when purchasing the land. This, it was found, distinguished it from a tax,[339] which would apply generally.

The Lords appeared to focus more on a generous functional approach than the Court of Appeal had been doing. But in R v Hampshire Farmers Market ex parte Beer,[340] the Court of Appeal returned to its largely institutional approach. It noted that neither Poplar nor Leonard Cheshire had been overruled or expressly disapproved by the House of Lords.[341] Having done so, it went on to apply an approach in which institutional factors played an important part. It held that the question under the HRA would remain the same as that under judicial review unless the Strasbourg case law required otherwise. The Court of Appeal concluded that the farmers' market was a public authority. This was first because the power of access to a public market had a public element or flavour.[342] Second, it was because the market owed its existence to the local authority and had stepped into its shoes, in the sense that it performed functions which had previously been performed by the local authority.[343] Further, the company exercised public functions so as to be amenable to judicial review, and therefore it was also a public authority under the HRA.

In the recent case of R (on the application of Johnson) v Havering London Borough Council;[344] YL v Birmingham City Council[345] the Court of Appeal again returned to the question of defining a public function under s 6. The claimants in both sets of appeals in Johnson v Havering and in YL v Birmingham City Council were residents in a care home maintained by the defendant local authority under the provisions of s 21 of the National Assistance Act 1948. The local authorities decided to transfer their accommodation into private sector control. The claimants sought to prevent the 338 Ibid at para 64.

339 Ibid at para 66, per Lord Hobhouse.
340 [2003] EWCA Civ 1056.
341 Hampshire, op. cit., at para 15.
342 Leonard Cheshire, op. cit., at para 30.
343 Hampshire, op. cit., at paras 35–36.
344 [2007] EWCA Civ 26.
345 [2007] EWCA Civ 27. The approach of the Court of Appeal was confirmed when the case reached the House of Lords: [2007] UKHL 27, although, arguably, the Lords relied on functional rather than institutional factors in finding that the care home was not a functional public authority.

transfer, arguing that it would amount to a breach of the residents' rights under the European Convention on Human Rights, principally under Art 8. The two appeals were heard together since they raised similar issues of public importance.

In Johnson the key point of the appellants' complaint was that as a result of the transfer they would lose a remedy that they would have been able to deploy to assert Art 8 protection against the local authority directly. The Council, it was argued, would be removing or diminishing the human rights that they formerly guaranteed to the claimants. Therefore in discharging its statutory obligations to the claimants under ss 21 and 26, the Council would be failing to ensure real and effective protection of their rights and so it would be acting incompatibly with the Convention and unlawfully under s 6 HRA. The Court of Appeal dismissed this argument on various grounds. It followed the previous decision of the Court of Appeal in R (on the application of Heather) v Leonard Cheshire Foundation[346] to the effect that in the event of a transfer of obligations by a public authority to a private care home, the home would not be viewed as 'exercising functions of a public nature' under s 6. (As will be seen below, the argument that that decision was inconsistent with that of the House of Lords in Aston Cantlow was not accepted.) The Court of Appeal considered in any event that it was doubtful whether Art 8 placed on a member state an obligation to make welfare provision of the type and extent required by s 21 of the 1948 Act. It also noted that the public authority would continue to have Art 8 obligations towards a resident, as well as its s 21 obligations, notwithstanding the transfer.

In YL it also had to be determined whether a private care home was a 'public authority.' In YL's case the court was concerned only with the preliminary issue whether the private care home, when accommodating the claimant under arrangements made with the Council under the 1948 Act, was exercising a public function for the purposes of s 6(3)(b). The Court of Appeal again noted its earlier decision in Cheshire, where the status of the care home in that case was not materially different from that of the home at issue on the facts in YL. The Secretary of State however intervened, submitting that Cheshire was wrongly decided, on the basis that it was inconsistent with Strasbourg authority, and that it could not stand with the subsequent decision of the House of Lords in Aston Cantlow.

As indicated above, the judgment in Aston Cantlow dealt primarily with the issue of what is a 'core' public authority. But the House did deal briefly with the issue of what qualified as a 'hybrid' public authority. It found that the courts should have regard to the Strasbourg jurisprudence. It also said that domestic cases addressing amenability to judicial review do not provide the 'touchstone', although they can provide useful guidance. The Lords also said, as considered above, that if the body in question is 'taking the place of Central Government or the local authority' and is providing 'a public service' those factors are relevant to determining whether that body is exercising functions of a public nature under s 6(3)(b) HRA. The Court of Appeal rejected the Secretary of State's submission that Aston Cantlow had overruled the decision in Cheshire. The Court said that it was bound to follow both the reasoning and the decision in the factually similar Leonard Cheshire Foundation. The Court of Appeal further noted that in its previous decision in R (on the application of Beer)

346 [2002] 2 All ER 936.

v Hampshire Farmers Market Ltd,[347] the Court of Appeal on that occasion did not accept that Aston Cantlow had necessarily disturbed the judgment in Cheshire, which it considered to remain good law.

The stance of the Court indicated that it took the same view as had been taken in the previous Court of Appeal decisions. It found that a state may be found to have breached a Convention right if it arranges its legislative system in such a way as to fail to enable or facilitate conduct consistent with the Convention by a private party. Further it found that the state, in its administrative rather than its legislative capacity, cannot avoid one of its own Convention responsibilities by delegating that responsibility to a private body. It also noted in relation to the facts of the instant case that the state could be impleaded for the European Court of Human Rights in a care home case because of the inadequacy of its judicial provision. This, it said, arose from a positive obligation of the state, under Art 8, to respect, and therefore to promote, the interests of private and family life. The effect of all the European Court of Human Rights authorities, it found, is that there are various ways in which complaints about the conduct or policy of a private care home might be brought before that Court, but none of them would involve or require any finding or assumption that the care home was itself a 'public authority'.

The Court had the opportunity of providing some detailed guidance as to what it considered the test of general application to be, taking into account the observations of the House of Lords in Aston Cantlow, and the role of Strasbourg case law. However, the Court declined to provide such guidance, and indicated some general principles only. It will be argued below that these comments failed to clarify the test for determining that bodies are hybrid public authorities, and indeed that they muddy the waters still further. Buxton, LJ said:[348]

> I therefore venture to suggest that the approach to the issue of whether a particular body is a (hybrid) 'public authority' should respect the instrumental nature of section 6 of the 1998 Act, and its purpose in promoting access to the Convention jurisprudence. That does not exclude the conclusion that a hybrid body may be directly impleaded in the protection of some Convention rights but not of others. Nor does it exclude consideration of the necessity of imposing liability on a body even where that significantly distorts the balance required by some articles of the Convention. What is not likely to be helpful is to ask whether in performing a particular function a hybrid body falls under the Convention for all purposes and at all times, in the same way as the status of a core public authority is fixed without reference to the instant context.

Thus the Court concluded that the private care home in accommodating the appellants was not performing the functions of a public authority under s 6(3)(b) of the 1998 Act. In so finding it reaffirmed its own approach to the public function issue rather than that of the House of Lords, despite the attempt by the Secretary of State of Constitutional Affairs, intervening in the case, to persuade it that its approach was out of kilter with that of the Lords in Aston Cantlow. It had been hoped in the Johnson case, given the intervention of several key parties, including the Secretary of State of Constitutional Affairs, that the confusion surrounding the 'public function' test might be resolved and a clear test might emerge. The case however failed to produce such a test, which must wait until and if the House of Lords considers the matter on appeal.

347 [2003] All ER 356.
348 [2007] EWCA Civ 26 at para 78.

The Court of Appeal's conclusion that it was bound by its previous decision in Cheshire, was unsurprising. Its general observations as to the scope of s 6(3)(b) re-emphasise the uncertainty in this area, and make it more imperative that a clear test is laid down. The observation that 'a hybrid body may be directly impleaded in the protection of some Convention rights but not of others' runs counter to s 6(3)(b) HRA. If a body is exercising a public function it must be bound in respect of that function by all the Convention rights in Sched 1 HRA.

It is argued that the observation that the Strasbourg authorities do not require that care homes should be deemed public authorities in order for states to satisfy their Art 8 obligations completely misses the point of the HRA. The European Court of Human Rights and the domestic courts are placed in very different situations in relation to applicants. At Strasbourg, the state would be the respondent where it was argued that the legislative arrangements in the state meant that residents in private care homes were not receiving their Art 8 rights. Domestically, either remedies can be claimed against the care home itself, or no remedy can be made available, via court action. The purpose of ss 6–9 HRA was to provide for the delivery of effective remedies in the domestic courts. If the term 'public function' is defined too narrowly, that creates a situation where claimants could obtain a remedy at Strasbourg, by claiming against the state, but could not obtain it directly, under the HRA. It is suggested that the Court did not take fully into account the purpose behind ss 6–9 HRA, as stressed by Lord Hope in Aston Cantlow:[349]

> There is one vital step that is missing from the Court of Appeal's analysis. It is not mentioned expressly in the Human Rights Act 1998, but it is crucial to a proper understanding of the balance which sections 6 to 9 of the Act seek to strike between the position of public authorities on the one hand and private persons on the other. The purpose of these sections is to provide a remedial structure in domestic law for the rights guaranteed by the Convention. It is the obligation of states which have ratified the Convention to secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms which it protects . . . The source of this obligation is article 13. It was omitted from the articles mentioned in section 1(1) which defines the meaning of the expression 'the Convention rights', as the purpose of sections 6 to 9 was to fulfil the obligation which it sets out. But it provides the background against which one must examine the scheme which these sections provide.'

Critiquing the tests for 'public function'

Dawn Oliver has pointed out that a corollary of drawing as many bodies as possible into the category of standard public authorities is that they cannot also be 'victims' and therefore cannot assert rights against other public authorities, possibly resulting,

349 At para 44.

if the 'state pigeon-hole becomes too full' in 'the imposition by the body politic of regulations and checks which could inhibit the development of institutions of civil society'.[350] But this point does not apply to functional public authorities, and there are a number of arguments in favour of drawing bodies within that category.

It is clear that the House of Lords' approach in Aston-Cantlow to the public function test in s 6 (3)(b) focuses more upon whether the function in question should be seen as public, and less upon the institutional factors relied upon in the Court of Appeal, most notably by Lord Woolf in Poplar and in Leonard Cheshire. The Joint Committee on Human Rights noted in its Fourth Report[351] that Lord Nicholls said that the definition of 'public function' in the HRA should be given a 'generously wide' interpretation,[352] while Lord Hope found that: 'It is the function that the person is performing that is determinative of the question whether it is, for the purposes of the case, a 'hybrid' public authority.'[353]

From the case law discussed it is apparent that a variety of factors are currently being taken into account in order to determine whether a body has a public function, but the most significant one is, in the Court of Appeal decisions, consideration of the principles deriving from judicial review case law on the question whether the decision-maker is a public body.[354] Commentators agree that this is the case,[355] and it was contemplated that it would be from the debates on the Human Rights Bill.[356] Most commentators considered at the inception of the HRA that this would be the primary, or at least a very significant method, of answering the question[357] whether a body was discharging a public function.

However, the House of Lords indicated in Aston Cantlow that the judicial review cases should not be definitive, partly because the Strasbourg jurisprudence takes an autonomous approach to the nature of public bodies that differs from the judicial review approach. This was also pointed out by a number of commentators pre-HRA.[358] The question of amenability to judicial review is a matter that is irrelevant in most contexts 350 'The frontiers of the State: public authorities and public functions under the HRA' [2000] Autumn PL 476, p 477.

351 'The Meaning of Public Authority under the Human Rights Act' HC 382, HL 39 (2003–4) 12.

352 Aston Cantlow at para 11. See Sunkin, M, 'Pushing Forward the Frontiers of Human Rights Protection: the meaning of public authority under the HRA' [2004] PL 643.

353 Ibid at para 41.

354 See generally on this point Oliver, D, 'The frontiers of the State: public authorities and public functions under the HRA' [2000] PL 476.

355 See McDermont, M, 'The Elusive Nature of the 'Public Function': Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd v Donoghue' (2003) 66(1) MLR 113; Morgan, J, 'The Alchemist's Search for the Philosopher's Stone: the Status of Registered Social Landlords under the Human Rights Act (2003) 66(5) MLR 700; Cane, P, 'Church, state and human rights: are parish councils public authorities?' (2004) 120 (Jan) LQR, 41–48.

356 See Straw, J, HC Deb Cols 408, 409, 17 June 1998.

357 See Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, p 194, Lester and Pannick, op. cit., fn 1, para 2.6.3.

358 See Grosz, Beatson and Duffy, op. cit., fn 1, para 4–4; they rely on the decision in Chassagnou v France (1999) 7 BHRC 151, Judgment of 29 April 1999, para 100, in which it was found that the classification of a body as public or private in national law is only a starting point. See further Bamforth, N, 'The application of the HRA to public authorities and private bodies' [1999] 58 CLJ 159. Bamforth argues that the definition under s 6(1) is out of kilter with the criteria used in judicial review for determining whether a body is a public one.

covered by this book since most relevant bodies are obviously subject to judicial review, and it will, therefore, be considered briefly.[359] The starting-point used in judicial review cases is the finding that the body is statutory or is acting under prerogative powers. But the source of a body's power is now viewed as far less significant than the public element in its functions.[360] However, in the cases considered so far the question whether there is statutory authority for or underpinning the function in question has been viewed as near-decisive or as significant (Poplar, R (A) v Partnerships in Care, Aston Cantlow). Clearly, the Aston Cantlow approach, in which amenability to review is taken into account but is not conclusive, is the more authoritative and also the more appropriate one.

Where a body is non-statutory, a further determining factor in terms of amenability to judicial review concerns the question whether there is evidence of government support or control for the body,[361] while a relevant, although not a conclusive factor, is whether it has monopoly power.[362] A further factor concerns the question whether, had the body not existed, the government would have set up an equivalent body.[363] Similarly, the cases considered on s 6 HRA have taken account of whether the body is publicly funded and whether it is controlled by a public authority (Aston Cantlow, Poplar). The strength of the link between the two bodies is relevant; in Poplar it was relevant that board members were also members of the public authority. It can also be asked whether the function is being exercised over public land and whether there is a difference between the way a service is provided when it is publicly funded and when it is privately funded, as in Johnson. The Joint Committee has concluded that, absent a situation in which the body in question is exercising coercive powers or powers of a public nature directly assigned to it by statute, its institutional connection with government is likely to remain a significant factor in determining whether any of its functions are public.[364]

But in Aston Cantlow the House of Lords focused on the inherently public nature of the function, taking account of functional as opposed to institutional factors, such as whether there is a public interest in the function. It is argued that this approach should prevail – a point that is pursued below.

The House of Lords now has the task, after Johnson, of determining how far the tests developed so far should be influential, and how far the test of public function under s 6(1) should be allowed to denote a different, more generous ambit. A proper understanding of the demands of the Strasbourg jurisprudence and of the institutional 359 An administrative law textbook obviously provides far fuller consideration. See, e.g., Bradley, A and Ewing, K, Constitutional and Administrative Law, 14th edn, 2006, Part IV); Halliday, S, Judicial Review (2004), CUP; DeSmith, Woolf (Lord) and Jowell, J, Judicial Review of Administrative Action, 6th edn, 1999, Sweet and Maxwell; Pannick, 'Who is subject to judicial review and in respect of what?' [1992] PL 1.

360 This can now be said due to the influence of the finding to this effect in R v Panel of Take-Overs and Mergers ex p Datafin [1987] QB 815, p 838. See further Bamforth, N, 'The scope of judicial review: still uncertain' [1993] PL 239.

361 R v Disciplinary Committee of the Jockey Club ex p Aga Khan [1993] 1 WLR 909.

362 R v Football Assoc ex p Football League [1993] 2 All ER 833.

363 R v Disciplinary Committee of the Jockey Club ex p Aga Khan [1993] 1 WLR 909. Even if this is case, if the source of the body's power is contractual, this will be a strong indication that it is a private body: Aga Khan.

364 Seventh Report 2003–4, at para 16.

difference between the position of the domestic courts and the Strasbourg one is necessary, one that does not fall into the error found in Johnson.

It is argued that, in principle, the more generous House of Lords interpretation should prevail; the courts should be prepared to take a generous stance towards the public function test in order avoid excluding bodies from the direct scope of the HRA. So doing seems to reflect the intention underlying the Act[365] and would be consonant with the general approach taken to human rights instruments. It would also mean that the contracting out of public services to the private sector would not result in a failure of that sector to observe Convention standards in respect of such services. This is a very significant matter due to the diminution of the public sector that has occurred over the last 20 years and is still occurring.

Many commentators have criticised the failure of the Court of Appeal in the cases described above to take the more generous approach to the interpretation of 'public function'.[366] The Joint Committee on Human Rights concluded in 2003 that: 'A serious gap has opened in the protection which the Human Rights Act was intended to offer, and a more vigorous approach to re-establishing the proper ambit of the Act needs to be pursued.'[367] The group Liberty argued in 2006:

> [G]aps in human rights protection have arisen because some courts have sought to identify Functional Public Authorities by looking at the character of the institutional arrangements of the body, i.e. the extent to which the body is controlled or funded by a core public body, rather than the character of the function that it is performing. . . . The appropriate question for the courts to ask is, however, whether the function in question is one for which the state has taken responsibility in the public interest . . . the best response to ill-informed and misleading claims that the HRA is no more than a charter for terrorists and criminals . . . [is that] the Act [while offering traditional protection in those contexts against state abuse of power] must be shown also to provide visible and accessible protection for children, disabled people and older people at the most vulnerable times in their lives.[368]

The Johnson case, which was expected to provide a more workable test and to accept the more generous approach of the House of Lords, failed, as discussed above, to do so. This matter remains problematic and may demand an amendment to the HRA, defining 'public function' in a manner that overturns the Leonard Cheshire decision.

365 The Lord Chancellor said at Second Reading of the Bill in the House of Lords: 'We . . . decided that we should apply the Bill to a wide rather than a narrow range of public authorities so as to provide as much protection as possible for those who claim that their rights have been infringed'. HL Official Report Cols 1231–32, 3 November 1997.

366 See the Seventh Report of the Joint Committee on Human Rights, 2003–4, HL Paper 39/HC 382, in particular at paras 41–44 and paras 45–74; JCHR, Thirty-Second Report, The Human Rights Act: the DCA and Home Office Reviews, esp para 92. See also Kate Markus in 'What is Public Power?: the Courts' Approach to the Public Authority definition under the Human Rights Act', in Delivering Rights, Jowell and Cooper, eds (Hart, 2003), at pp 106–14.

367 Seventh Report of JCHR for 2003–4 at para 43.

368 Evidence from Liberty to the JCHR, December 2006.

Categorising specific bodies

At present, the point at which it is possible to draw a line between functional and private bodies is unclear.[369] If a body is subject to judicial review, it is clear that it is almost certainly a functional public authority. Standard public authorities are clearly subject to judicial review,[370] although not necessarily in relation to all their functions.[371] This book is centrally concerned with the relationship between the citizen and the state, and so most of the bodies covered by it are standard public authorities, such as the police. But some bodies are in a slightly more uncertain position.[372] A number of regulators or watch-dog bodies are considered in this book, including the Equal Opportunities Commission (EOC), the Commission for Racial Equality (CRE), the new Commission for Equality and Human Rights (CEHR),[373] and Ofcom, the broadcast media regulator. As Chapter 6 finds, Ofcom is clearly a public authority for the purposes of the HRA. All these regulators are set up under statute and have been given coercive powers and duties that are clearly governmental in nature. They are probably standard public authorities since they are statutory government regulators/administrative bodies. In any event they are functional public bodies since in their regulatory functions they are clearly bound by the Convention due to s 6(3)(b). As Chapters 9 and 6 argue, the regulators of the press and the film industry, the Press Complaints Commission,[374] the British Board of Film Classification (BBFC) and the Video Appeals Commission are probably functional public bodies.[375] These bodies are not set up under statute but they have a footing in statutory provisions, as the relevant chapters point out. The BBFC's functions are recognised, for example, in the Video Recordings Act 1984, as amended.

As Chapters 6 and 9 note, the private media bodies, including newspaper companies and broadcasters, such as ITV, Channel 5 and Sky are clearly not public authorities since they have no public functions. As Chapters 9 and 6 point out, the BBC, and possibly Channel 4, may be considered to be functional public authorities.[376] If so, they are bound to adhere to the Convention rights in their public functions, but not their private ones. The BBC is a 'state broadcaster'; it was created under a Royal Charter – in other words, by a direct act of government. It is also fully funded through state funds – the licence fee. As Chapter 6 notes, as a 'public service' broadcaster it has various duties relating to the contents of its programmes that are designed to ensure that it serves the public interest.[377]

369 See further Oliver, D, 'The frontiers of the State: public authorities and public functions under the HRA' [2000] PL 476. See also for extensive discussion of the definition of public authorities, Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, pp 186–204.

370 See Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, pp 197–98, for an extensive list.

371 R v Jockey Club ex p RAM Racecourses Ltd [1993] 2 All ER 225, p 246.

372 It is possible that many – although not all – of those bodies that are listed in Sched 1 to the Freedom of Information Act 2000, as public authorities (see Chapter 7, pp 632–33) can probably be assumed to be public authorities for HRA purposes. But at present that list can only be viewed as a starting-point.

373 See Chapter 15, p 1595.

374 As Chapter 9 notes, this point appears to have been impliedly accepted in R (on the application of Ford) v Press Complaints Commission [2002] EMLR 5; see at pp 846–47.

375 See Chapter 6, p 567.

376 See Chapter 6, pp 530–31 and Chapter 9, pp 848–49.

377 See Chapter 6, at pp 519, 521.

As Chapter 9 will discuss, the BBC is probably not a standard public authority; if it was so deemed it could not also be a victim, a definition that includes: 'any person, non-governmental organisation or group of individuals' a 'non-governmental organisation' within the terms of Art 34 ECHR.[378] As discussed below, those terms are also used to determine who can be a 'victim' for the purposes of s 7(1)(a) HRA.[379] Clearly, it would be strange if the BBC was unable to resist governmental attempts to curb its freedom of expression on the ground that it is a standard public authority. So, although the point has not finally been settled, that is probably the better view. Channel 4 is set up under statute,[380] but it is funded in the same way as the private broadcasters, through the normal commercial means. However, it receives free spectrum in return for fulfilling its statutory public service obligations. As Chapter 6 notes, it has a particular remit in relation to broadcasting innovative, diverse, creative or educational programmes.[381]

In this book the question whether either body has public functions arises in two areas, discussed in Chapters 6 and 9. First, it is relevant in the kind of context that arose in the Pro-Life Alliance[382] case, which is discussed in full in Chapter 6.[383] As that discussion will make clear, the BBC in that instance acted in its regulatory role; it refused to broadcast a video in the form that Pro-Life had submitted it (Pro-Life's party election broadcast) since it considered that the video offended against good taste and decency. In that instance Art 10 was pleaded directly against the BBC on judicial review of the decision; the House of Lords did not state explicitly that the BBC was acting in its public function when it acted as a regulator, but clearly that was implicit in the decision.

The other situation in which functional public authority status could be of some pertinence would arise where it was alleged that either of these broadcasters had breached the right of privacy of a person in a broadcast, for example by showing him or her engaged in some private activity.[384] This issue is no longer of great significance since, as Chapter 9 points out, there is now quite a comprehensive privacy law in this country, albeit arising from a range of sources. So there would not be many situations in which one of the laws in question – especially the new tort of misuse of private information – would not apply where Art 8 would. Assuming that the new tort would apply, there would probably be no advantage to a litigant to argue as an alternative possibility that, for example, Channel 4 was acting in its public function when it breached the claimant's privacy, since the parameters of Arts 8 and 10 would determine the outcome in any event. The litigant would obviously prefer to pursue the tort measure of damages rather than the Strasbourg measure.[385] It is conceivable, however, that the broadcaster might have harassed a person in a manner not covered by either the new tort or by the Protection from Harassment Act 1997. In that instance it 378 In BBC Scotland v UK, no 34324/96 (1997) (discussed Chapter 5, pp 325–26); BBC v UK, no 25798/94 (1996). In both instances, the cases were found to be inadmissible on other grounds; therefore it was not found necessary to decide the point.

379 See Leonard Cheshire Foundation [2002] 2 All ER 936 on this point.

380 By the Broadcasting Act 1990.

381 See s 265(3) of the 2003 Act. See further p 519.

382 [2002] 2 All ER 756 CA; [2004] 1 AC 185, HL.

383 See p 534 et seq.

384 See Chapter 9, at pp 848–50, 883–86.

385 See pp 241–47.

would be worth trying to demonstrate that Channel 4 was a functional public authority and acting in a public function at the time in question.

Phillipson argues that the BBC is probably a functional public authority:

> . . . insofar as institutional factors are still taken into account . . . the fact that the BBC is a creature of the state, rather than having a private status, will increase the chances of its being found to have some public functions, as will its public funding. Channel 4, a private and commercial broadcaster, is much less likely, under these criteria, to be found to have such functions. Although it was created by statute, it is entirely privately funded.

Having noted that it is implicit in Pro-Life that the BBC was carrying out a public function in deciding not to broadcast the video, Phillipson goes on to find:

> . . . the least unsatisfactory resolution is to accept the apparent anomaly [of differentiating in this respect between broadcasters] and hold that whenever the BBC decides to broadcast a programme, it is performing a public function, whilst the commercial broadcasters are not . . . Further, it could be argued that since the BBC is a state broadcaster, and benefits from full public funding, it is fair for it to accept obligations that lie upon other organs of the state.[386]

This author agrees, but considers for the reasons given that there are very few situations in which anything would turn on this issue. At the points in this book at which this question does arise, it will be considered further.

Invoking the Convention rights against public authorities

This is a detailed and complex area; extended discussion of the procedural issues involved would not be appropriate in a book of this nature; full discussion is available in Clayton and Tomlinson, The Law of Human Rights.[387]

'Victims'

Section 7(1)(a) HRA allows a person who claims that a public authority has acted or proposes to act in breach of a Convention right to bring proceedings against the public authority. Section 7(1)(b) allows a person to rely on the Convention in any legal proceedings against a public authority. Section 7(1)(b) means that Convention points can be raised in judicial review proceedings. But in either case, the person relying on the Convention must be (or would be) a 'victim' of the unlawful act. Section 7(7) provides: 'a person is a victim of an unlawful act only if he would be a victim for the purposes of Art 34 of the Convention if proceedings were brought in the European Court of Human Rights in respect of that act'. It was accepted in Parliament that the Strasbourg interpretation of 'victim' would be used, rather than the wider test for standing which, under the UK judicial review doctrine, allows pressure groups to bring actions so long as they satisfy the 'sufficient interest' test.[388] The UK group Liberty had argued for adoption of the latter as the test, since it is broader. But the idea behind s 7(5) is that the HRA should create symmetry with the protection for human rights provided by Strasbourg.[389] In order to obviate the possibility of circumvention of the victim test by use of judicial review outside the HRA but raising Convention points, s 7(3) provides: 'if the proceedings are brought on an application for judicial review, the applicant is taken to have sufficient interest in relation to the unlawful act only if he or she is a victim.'

386 See Fenwick and Phillipson, Media Freedom under the HRA, 2006, pp 121–22.
387 2nd edn, 2006.

The Strasbourg test was discussed further in Chapter 2.[390] It is now contained in Art 34 (formerly 25): a person (or group or non-governmental organisation) may not bring an application unless he or she has been personally affected by the alleged violation.[391] However, as Miles points out, it cannot be said that the concept of 'victim' has been interpreted consistently at Strasbourg, although it is clear that those indirectly affected may be covered.[392] There will, therefore, be substantial room for domestic litigation on this issue. But s 7(3) means that pressure groups cannot in general bring actions claiming breach of Convention rights in reliance on s 7(1)(a), although such groups are able to challenge public bodies by way of judicial review, on the test of 'sufficient interest'.[393] They can use the s 7(1)(a) route if they can demonstrate that although part of a pressure group, they have been directly affected by the violation or intended violation of the right in question.[394]

Thus, although the definition of the bodies covered under s 6 is potentially wide and brings quite a large number of them within its scope, the application of the Convention by using the s 7(1)(a) route is narrowed by adopting quite a limited definition of a 'victim'. But for s 7(3), a non-victim body – normally a pressure group – could challenge executive action relying on judicial review and raising Convention points.[395] Had s 7(3) not been included, a pressure group might have been able to bring an action relying on the wider judicial review standing provisions, but then obtained the stricter scrutiny available when it is argued that a public authority has breached s 6.

Due to s 7(3) non-victim groups with sufficient interest must rely on judicial review only. Thus in a very few instances a dual system of judicial review arises, with more generous standing rules but weaker scrutiny, outside the HRA, while the reverse applies 388 See the ruling of Rose LJ in Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs ex p World Development Movement [1995] 1 All ER 611, pp 618–20.

389 See HC Official Report Col 1083, 24 June 1998.

390 For extensive discussion, see Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, pp 1484–98.

391 X v Austria No 7045/75, 7 DR 87 (1976); Knudsen v Norway No 11045/84, 42 DR 247 (1985).

392 Miles, 'Standing under the Human Rights Act: theories of rights enforcement and the nature of public law adjudication' (2000) 59(1) CLJ 133–67, p 137. She further points out that while pressure groups cannot bring actions in their own name, there are other public interest enforcement mechanisms at Strasbourg including the possibility, exceptionally, of third party intervention which can be used to seek to ensure that the rights are secured.

393 It may be noted that s 11 HRA would bar the way to any narrowing of those rules.

394 See Cane [1995] PL 276.

395 Section 11 provides: 'A person's reliance on a Convention right does not restrict . . . (b) his right to make any claim or bring any proceedings which he could make or bring apart from ss 7–9.'

under s 7(1).[396] A court, although bound by s 6, confronted by a Convention issue in such an application, would have to apply traditional review principles only;[397] the Strasbourg proportionality doctrine would not appear to be applicable. There would be very few instances, however, in which this limitation would be of significance since members of a pressure group might also be able to show that they were victims, and moreover public interest groups can support victims, acting as third party intervenors in cases brought under s 7.[398] But this limitation does apply to the new Commission for Equality and Human Rights, as discussed below.[399]

When administrative action is purportedly taken under statutory powers, non-victim groups with sufficient interest who wish to challenge it by way of judicial review can rely on s 3 and argue that the action is ultra vires on the basis that the statute does not give powers to the executive to act incompatibly with the Convention rights, unless the statute is irretrievably incompatible with them. This is possible because s 3, as indicated above, applies to all statutes and is not limited by the s 7(7) test regarding victims. This is a significant matter since it broadens the reach of the Convention rights, possibly in an unintended fashion.[400] If freedom of expression was in issue, in an instance similar to those of Brind[401] or Simms,[402] s 12, providing special protection for freedom of expression would apply, as well as s 3. In respect of non-statutory actions or decisions s 12 alone would apply if freedom of expression was in issue. If so, the fact that the applicant was a non-victim would be irrelevant.

Relying on s 7(1)

Section 7(1) provides: 'A person who claims that a public authority has acted or proposes to act in a way which is made unlawful by s 6(1) may (a) bring proceedings against the authority under this Act in the appropriate court or tribunal . . .' or (b) rely on the Convention right or rights concerned in any legal proceedings . . .'. Section 7(1)(b) allows for Convention points to be raised once an action has begun under an existing cause of action, where the other party is a public authority. Under s 7(1)(b), there are a number of possible instances in which a victim can raise Convention arguments in proceedings in which a public authority is involved. In the contexts covered by this book, the Convention is frequently invoked in criminal proceedings. Questions of exclusion of evidence or abuse of process could be raised in relation to breaches of Convention rights, and these possibilities are pursued in Chapter 13.

The Convention guarantees can also afford a defence in criminal proceedings. They can also be used to afford a defence in common law civil proceedings where the 396 See Steyn, K and Wolfe, D, 'Judicial review and the Human Rights Act: some practical considerations' (1999) EHRLR 614.

397 As stated obiter in Alconbury [2001] 2 All ER 929; (2001) NLJ 135, para 53.

398 See Hannett [2003] PL 128. There is no express right on intervention under the HRA, but it has been allowed by the House of Lords and Court of Appeal. See, e.g., Sepet v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] UKHL 15.

399 See pp 293–94.

400 See further on this point Elliott, M, 'The HRA and the standard of substantive review' (2001) 60 CLJ 301.

401 R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Brind [1991] 1 AC 696.

402 R v Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Simms [1999] 3 WLR 328.

plaintiff is a public authority. Other existing tort actions, such as false imprisonment, which are coterminous with Convention rights (in that instance, Art 5) can be brought against public authorities under s 7(1)(b) with a view to expanding the scope of the action by reference to the right.[403] The possibilities presented by the use of tort actions are discussed at various points in this book, but most extensively in Chapter 13.[404] A litigant would be best advised to rely on an existing action, but seek to persuade the court as a public authority, if necessary, that regard should be had to the Convention principles in determining its scope.

Section 7(1)(a) does not demand reliance on an existing cause of action or claim. It allows a victim of a breach or threatened breach of a Convention right to bring an action against a standard public authority or a functional body acting in its public capacity.[405] It was said in the Parliamentary debates on the Bill: '[Persons who believe that their Convention rights have been infringed] will also be able to bring proceedings against public authorities on Convention grounds even if no other cause of action is open to them.'[406] The action must be brought in 'the appropriate court or tribunal' which will be determined 'by rules' (s 7(2)). As was said in debate on the Bill: 'They may [rely on the Convention rights by . . . bringing proceedings under the [Act] in an appropriate court or tribunal; seeking judicial review; as part of a defence . . . or in the course of an appeal.'[407] Proceedings can be brought in the High Court for breach of statutory duty – the duty under s 6. Under s 7(9), the term 'rules' in s 7(2) means: 'in relation to proceedings in a court or tribunal outside Scotland rules made by the Lord Chancellor or the Secretary of State for the purpose of this section or rules of court . . .'. Claims go to the appropriate court or the tribunal dealing with claims closest in nature to the particular situation in which it is alleged that Convention rights were breached. Claims, relying on Convention rights, not existing causes of action or defences, might take the form of private law claims or counter-claims, or defences in civil or criminal law proceedings. A number of post-HRA statutes have designated certain fora as 'appropriate tribunals'. The most significant of these is the Tribunal set up by s 65(2) of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000.[408]

The possibility of creating what has been termed a 'constitutional tort' of breach of Convention rights was left open by the HRA and by the Lord Chancellor in parliamentary debate.[409] Section 7(1)(a) is able to encourage the growth of new tort actions. Litigation concerning the private functions of standard public authorities, in relation to matters not tortious under existing tort law, could occur under s 7(1)(a), and could be relevant in, for example, the context of discrimination.[410] In an important article, Dawn Oliver argues that the creation of such new areas of tortious liability operating against public authorities can also tend to lend an impetus to the 403 Such actions are, of course, also available against purely private bodies; see discussion below of horizontal effects and Chapter 9, pp 825–28. For early comment on this matter see Phillipson, G, 'The Human Rights Act and the common law' [1999] 62 MLR 824, esp pp 834–40. See also Bamforth, N, 'The true 'horizontal effect' of the HRA' (2001) 117 LQR 34.

404 See pp 1306–9.

405 The term 'public authority' will be used to encompass both types of body for the purposes of the rest of the discussion.

406 Lord Chancellor, 582 HL 1232, 3 November 1997.

407 The Home Secretary, 306 HC Official Report Col 780, 16 February 1998.

408 See Chapter 10, pp 1080 et seq.

409 HL Deb Vol 585 Cols 853–56, 24 November 1997.

410 See Chapter 15, pp 1483–85.

creation of tortious liability against private bodies, arising out of existing tort actions.[411] As indicated below and considered fully in Chapter 9, a right to privacy has already arisen from the doctrine of confidence. However, the House of Lords is not receptive to the argument that new causes of action against public authorities should be created outwith the s 7(1)(a) action. In Watkins (Respondent) v Home Office (Appellants)[412] Lord Rodger held: 'In general, at least, where the matter is not already covered by the common law but falls within the scope of a Convention right, a claimant can be expected to invoke his remedy under the Human Rights Act rather than to seek to fashion a new common law right'. In finding this, he relied on Wainwright v Home Office.[413]

Where actions are brought as judicial review applications, they are brought in the High Court and are subject to the Civil Procedure Rules. Actions can also be brought in the county court where a claim for damages is made.[414] The majority of actions brought under s 6 via s 7(1)(a) against public authorities contemplated in this book raise purely public law issues.

Leigh and Lustgarten have pointed out, however, that the judicial review procedure may not be adequate as a means of determining the crucial issue of proportionality.[415] It is far less likely in judicial review proceedings, as opposed to private law actions, that discovery would be ordered or cross-examination allowed. Therefore, there are inadequacies in its fact-finding role. These limitations of judicial review in human rights matters are significant. But it could also be pointed out that, in practice, some persons are virtually precluded from taking this course owing to its inaccessibility, the fact that judicial review may only be initiated in the High Court in London and the extent to which most solicitors/law centres or advisers on legal helplines have awareness of the availability or appropriateness of such review in any particular instance.[416]

Retrospectivity

Under s 22(4)(b): 'para (b) [of s 7(1)] applies to proceedings brought by or at the instigation of a public authority whenever the act in question took place; but otherwise that sub-section does not apply to an act taking place before the coming into force of that section'. Where the Convention is used as a 'shield' against public authorities, therefore, pre-commencement action is covered if, following R v Lambert[417] the proceedings are brought 'by or at the instigation of a public authority'. Thus, before the Act came fully into force, public authorities were seeking to abide by it in bringing proceedings, including prosecutions, against citizens. But it was found in Lambert that a decision of a trial judge taken before the HRA came into force was not found to amount to such proceedings. [418]

411 'The HRA and public law/private law divides' (2000) 4 EHRLR 343.

412 [2006] UKHL 17.

413 [2004] 2 AC 406, 423, para 33, per Lord Hoffmann.

414 HRA 1998: Rules CP5/00, March 2000, para 12.

415 Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, 'Making rights real: the courts, remedies and the Human Rights Act' (1999) 58(3) CLJ 509.

416 See Le Sueur, AP and Sunkin, M, Public Law, 1997, Chapters 21–28, esp Chapter 21, 'Access to judicial review'.

417 [2001] 3 All ER 577.

418 Following the decision of the House of Lords in R v Lambert [2001] 3 All ER 577, appeals against pre-commencement convictions are not within s 22(4)(b).

Lord Woolf CJ observed in Wainwright v Home Office[419] that there has been considerable uncertainty as to whether the HRA can apply retrospectively in situations where the conduct complained of occurred before the Act came into force. Lord Hope in Aston Cantlow[420] considered that the position could be summarised as follows:

> The only provision in the Act which gives retrospective effect to any of its provisions is section 22(4). It directs attention exclusively to that part of the Act which deals with the acts of public authorities – sections 6 to 9. It has been said that its effect is to enable the Act to be used defensively against public authorities with retrospective effect but not offensively . . .[421] Section 22(4) states that section 7(1)(b) applies to proceedings brought by or at the instigation of a public authority whenever the act in question took place, but that otherwise subsection (1)(b) does not apply to an act taking place before the coming into force of section 7. Section 7(1)(b) enables a person who claims that a public authority has acted in a way which is made unlawful by section 6(1) to rely on his Convention rights in proceedings brought by or at the instigation of the public authority. Section 6(2)(a) provides that section 6(1) does not apply if as a result of one or more provisions of primary legislation the authority could not have acted differently.

He went on to find that, therefore, acts of courts or tribunals which took place before 2 October 2000 which they were required to make by primary legislation and were made according to the meaning which was to be given to the legislation at that time are not affected by s 22(4) (R v Kansal).[422] He said that the interpretative obligation in s 3(1) cannot be applied to invalidate a decision which was good at the time when it was made by changing retrospectively the meaning which the court or tribunal previously gave to that legislation. He noted that the same view has been taken where the claim relates to acts of public authorities other than courts or tribunals. It has been held that the Act cannot be relied upon retrospectively by introducing a right of privacy to make unlawful conduct which was lawful at the time when it took place: Wainwright v Home Office.[423]

Time limits

If proceedings are brought against a public authority alleging breach of a Convention right, they must be brought, under s 7(5), within one year 'beginning with the date on which the act complained of took place' or 'such longer period as the court or tribunal considers equitable having regard to all the circumstances', but that is subject to any rule imposing a stricter time limit in relation to the procedure in question'.

419 [2001] EWCA Civ 208, [2002] QB 1334, p 1344G para 22.
420 [2004] 1 AC 546, at paras 27 and 28.
421 He noted the annotations to the Act by the late Peter Duffy QC in Current Law Statutes, vol 3 (1999).
422 [2002] 2 AC 69, 112, para 84; Wainwright v Home Office [2002] QB 1334, 1346A-1347C, paras 29–36.
423 [2002] QB 1334, 1347G–H, para 40.

Judicial review proceedings are subject to a stricter rule, since the limitation period of three months for judicial review is applicable.[424] But in certain circumstances, the longer period might apply; a Pepper v Hart statement suggests that the one year period could, exceptionally, apply: 'someone with a genuine grievance will be able to pursue it under s 7(1)(a) whether or not within the judicial review time limit.'[425] In R (Burkett) v Hammersmith and Fulham LBC[426] the House of Lords said that the time limit for judicial review proceedings could be extended only for good reason.

Remedies

Under s 8(1) a court which has found that an act or proposed act of a public authority is unlawful, is authorised to grant 'such relief or remedy or . . . order within its powers as [the court] considers just and appropriate'. Assuming that a breach of the Convention is found, all the familiar remedies, including damages, certiorari (now a quashing order), a declaration or mandamus (a mandatory order), a prohibiting order (now a prohibition) are available so long as they are within the jurisdiction of the relevant court or tribunal. The remedies include all those available in criminal or civil proceedings. The various remedies are considered at the relevant points in the following chapters. Under s 8(2), damages cannot be awarded in criminal proceedings. Traditionally, the courts have been reluctant to award damages in public law cases and s 8(3) of the HRA encourages the continuance of this tradition in requiring consideration to be given first to any 'other relief or remedy granted or order made', the consequences of the court's decisions and the necessity of making the award. If damages are awarded it is on the basis of 'just satisfaction' (s 8(3)).

A line of authorities seeks to emphasise that a declaration of a breach of human rights should be considered 'just satisfaction' and no more should be required by way of redress. In Anufrijeva and Another v Southwark London Borough Council; R (Mambakasa) v Secretary of State for the Home Office; R (N) v Secretary of State for the Home Office[427] it was held that: 'Where an infringement of an individual's human rights has occurred, the concern will usually be to bring the infringement to an end and any question of compensation will be of secondary, if any, importance.' Anufrijeva involved three Art 8 claims for damages for maladministration in the handling of housing and asylum applications. The Court of Appeal found that there was a wide discretion as to whether damages should be awarded, and that an award should be made only when it was 'necessary' (s 8(3) HRA) so to do in order to afford just satisfaction. The finding of a violation would often itself be just satisfaction, it found, and damages are to be viewed as a 'remedy of last resort'.[428] The Court further found that the exercise of the discretion as to damages should include consideration of the balance between the interests of the victim and of the public as a whole.[429]

424 CPR Sched 1 r 53.4(1). See further on a number of these matters, Supperstone and Coppel, 'Judicial review after the Human Rights Act' (1999) 3 EHRLR 301–29; Nicol, D, 'Limitation periods under the HRA and judicial review' [1999] LQR 216.

425 HC Deb Vol 314 Col 1099, 20 May 1998.

426 [2002] UKHL 23.

427 [2004] QB 1124; [2004] 2 WLR 603.

428 At para 56.

429 At para 56.

It was reaffirmed in R (Greenfield) v Home Office[430] that damages need not be awarded. A prisoner who failed a mandatory drugs test was charged and convicted under the Prison Rules 1999 and ordered to serve an additional 21 days' imprisonment. The prisoner alleged that in being denied legal representation at the hearing before the deputy controller of the prison his right to a fair trial had been infringed. The Divisional Court and Court of Appeal dismissed the prisoner's appeal on the grounds that the offence was a prison disciplinary offence and not a criminal offence for the purposes of Art 6. Following a decision of the ECHR it was conceded that the proceedings did involve a criminal charge; the deputy controller was not an independent tribunal and the prisoner was wrongly denied legal representation. On the prisoner's claim for damages, the Lords held that the approach of the ECHR, that a finding that Art 6 had been violated was, in itself, just satisfaction, should be followed and that there should be no award of damages to the prisoner.

A somewhat similar approach was taken in re P.[431] The Court of Appeal considered whether the judge at first instance had been correct in considering that a declaration of a breach of Art 8 amounted to 'just satisfaction' where a breach of Art 8 had been found on the basis that a mother had been insufficiently involved in the decision by the local authority to abandon a care plan for her rehabilitation with her child. The mother had appealed on the basis of a number of Strasbourg authorities which she claimed entitled her to damages in addition to the declaration. The appeal was ultimately unsuccessful, but their Lordships did indicate that such loss of opportunity cases could attract a damages award.

Under s 8(4), the court in deciding to award damages must take into account the principles applied by the European Court of Human Rights. The Court can award compensation under what is now Art 41.[432] The purpose of the reparation is to place the applicant in the position he would have been in had the violation not taken place. Compensation will include costs unless the applicant has received legal aid, although where only part of a claim is upheld, the costs may be diminished accordingly.[433] It can also include loss of earnings, travel costs, fines and costs unjustly awarded against the applicant.[434] Compensation is also available for intangible or non-pecuniary losses such as loss of future earnings[435] or opportunities,[436] unjust imprisonment,[437] stress or loss of personal integrity.[438]

430 [2005] 2 WLR 240.

431 [2007] EWCA Civ 2.

432 Previously Art 50 under the old numbering of the Articles.

433 Steel v UK (1999) 28 EHRR 603, para 125.

434 See as to heads of loss Burns, N (2001) NLJ 164.

435 E.g., in Young, James and Webster v UK, Judgment of 13 August 1981, A 44 (1981), pecuniary and non-pecuniary costs, taking such loss into account, were awarded: the Court ordered £65,000 to be paid.

436 Weekes v UK, A 114-A (1988).

437 In Steel v UK (1999) 28 EHRR 603, para 122, the three successful applicants were each imprisoned for seven hours. The Court, without giving reasons, awarded them £500 each in compensation for non-pecuniary damage.

438 See further Mowbray, A, 'The European Court of Human Rights' approach to just satisfaction' [1997] PL 647; Feldman, D, 'Remedies for violation of Convention Rights under the HRA' [1998] EHRLR 691; Amos, M, 'Damages for breach of the Human Rights Act' [1999] EHRLR 178; Fairgrieve, D, 'The Human Rights Act 1998, damages and tort law', PL 2001, pp 695–716; Sir Robert Carnwath,

But there are difficulties in following the principles of the European Court. One is, as Mowbray has pointed out, that the method of determining the award in any particular judgment is frequently unclear.[439] Also, the Court, prior to the changes introduced under Protocol 11, had no independent fact finding role[440] and therefore, where it was unclear that the breach had occasioned the effect in question, it has at times refused to award compensation. The October 2000 Law Commission report 'Damages Under The Human Rights Act 1998'[441] noted that the Strasbourg Court normally applies a strict causation test which bars the majority of claims for pecuniary loss; it argued that the tort measure should be employed under the HRA. Awards at Strasbourg have tended to be modest and its practice is not to award exemplary damages.[442] This is a clear instance in which domestic courts could create higher standards than those maintained at Strasbourg, both in terms of dealing with this issue of causality and in creating a clearer rationale for awards, although they will be able to derive guidance from post-1998 decisions taken under the Protocol 11 reforms.

The decision of the Court in R (on the application of KB and Others) v Mental Health Review Tribunal and Another[443] set out a number of guidelines in relation to awards of damages by the courts under the HRA. The claimants were patients detained under powers conferred by the Mental Health Act 1983. They made applications to the Mental Health Review Tribunal for the review of their respective detentions. There were delays in the hearings of the applications. In two earlier judgments, R (on the application of KB and others) v Mental Health Review Tribunal[444] and R (on the application of B) v Mental Health Review Tribunal,[445] the Court had held that the claimants' rights under Art 5(4) (to the speedy determination by a court on the lawfulness of their detention) of the Convention had been infringed. In this judgment, Burnton J considered whether the claimants were entitled to awards of damages, and if so in what sum. All of the damages claims raised issues of principle concerning awards of damages under the HRA. None of the claimants' claims were for pecuniary loss: their claims were for the frustration and distress they allegedly suffered by reason of the delay in the hearings of their applications. In addition, four of the claimants claimed that the breaches of Art 5(4) had resulted in deprivation of their liberty and/or damage to their mental health.

Burnton J first considered the extent to which the High Court must follow the rules applied by the European Court of Human Rights in awarding damages. He noted that the Strasbourg Court tended to award damages on an 'equitable' basis, and its judgments did not analyse the basis of calculation nor give a breakdown between different items of damages. These characteristics rendered it difficult to identify more than very general principles. Burnton J considered it to be understandable that a Court composed of many members from different legal backgrounds should express its conclusions on damages in 'ECHR Remedies from a Common Law Perspective' (2000) 49 ICLQ 517. The question of the level of damages is addressed further in Chapter 2, p 34.

439 Mowbray, ibid, p 650.

440 As Leigh and Lustgarten point out in 'Making rights real: the courts, remedies and the Human Rights Act' (1999) 58(3) CLJ 509, p 529.

441 Report No 266, 2000.

442 BB v United Kingdom (2004) 39 EHRR 635, para 36.

443 [2003] 2 All ER 209.

444 [2002] EWHC 639.

445 [2002] EWHC 1553.

such general terms, but concluded that the domestic courts' own jurisprudence and legal culture required a more analytical approach. Burnton J next considered whether an award of damages was compulsory in cases where a breach of the HRA had been established. He took account of the wording of section 8(3) HRA, and concluded that there could be findings of infringement of ECHR rights without a consequential award of damages.

The judge went on to consider whether a European measure of damages or a UK measure should be applied to breaches of the HRA by domestic courts. He concluded that the measure of damages should be the national measure. This was on the basis that it was understandable that the Strasbourg Court should apply a constant scale of damages to all cases that came before it, but the UK courts should take account of the scale of damages awarded by the Strasbourg Court and should be free to depart from it in order to award adequate, but not excessive, compensation in UK terms. He considered whether damages awards should be modest and lower than in comparable English tort cases. He concluded that there was no justification for awarding a lower level of damages under the HRA than would be awarded in a comparable tort claim. Applying those principles, the damages awarded to the claimants by the court ranged from a determination that a finding of a breach of Art 5(4) ECHR amounted to 'just satisfaction' in respect of sums of up to £4,000.

Thus the court followed the approach of the Strasbourg Court in holding that an award of damages may in certain circumstances not be necessary, on the basis that a finding of violation may itself constitute 'just satisfaction'. But in holding that damages awards for breaches of the HRA should be comparable with and in line with damages for tort claims, the judgment indicated that a successful claim under the HRA could potentially be of considerably more value to a claimant than the traditionally modest awards of damages usually offered by the Strasbourg Court.

But in a departure from this stance, in the House of Lords in R (Greenfield) v Home Office,[446] these findings were overruled; it was held that at least in cases involving a breach of Art 6, damages should not be assessed on the same basis as in tort cases. There was no need, it was found, to go beyond the level of damages that would be awarded at Strasbourg.

Lord Bingham found[447] that 'the routine treatment of a finding of violation as, in itself, just satisfaction for the violation found reflects the point already made that the focus of the Convention is on the protection of human rights and not the award of compensation'.[448] He noted that where Art 6 is found to have been breached, the outcome will often be that a decision is quashed and a retrial ordered, which will vindicate the

446 [2005] 1 WLR 673.

447 At paras 9–12.

448 He said: 'Thus the Court of Appeal (Lord Woolf CJ, Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers MR and Auld LJ) were in my opinion right to say in Anufrijeva v Southwark London Borough Council [2003] EWCA Civ 1406, [2004] QB 1124, paras 52–53:

> 52. . . . The remedy of damages generally plays a less prominent role in actions based on breaches of the articles of the Convention, than in actions based on breaches of private law obligations where, more often than not, the only remedy claimed is damages.
>
> 53. Where an infringement of an individual's human rights has occurred, the concern will usually be to bring the infringement to an end and any question of compensation will be of secondary, if any, importance.

victim's Convention right. He noted that the Court has 'acknowledged the principle of restitutio in integrum'.[449] As he found, the Court has:

> ... ordinarily been willing to depart from its practice of finding a violation of Art 6 to be, in itself, just satisfaction under Art 41 only where the Court finds a causal connection between the violation found and the loss for which an applicant claims to be compensated. Such claim may be for specific heads of loss, such as loss of earnings or profits, said to be attributable to the violation. The Court has described this as pecuniary loss, which appears to represent what English lawyers call special damage. This head does not call for consideration here. It is enough to say that the Court has looked for a causal connection, and has on the whole been slow to award such compensation.

He considered the question of general damages, that the Strasbourg Court tends to call non-pecuniary damage. He found that:

> A claim under this head may be put on the straightforward basis that but for the Convention violation found the outcome of the proceedings would probably have been different and more favourable to the applicant, or on the more problematical basis that the violation deprived the applicant of an opportunity to achieve a different result which was not in all the circumstances of the case a valueless opportunity. While in the ordinary way the Court has not been easily persuaded on this last basis, it has in some cases accepted it.[450]

449 He referred to: Piersack v Belgium (1984) 7 EHRR 251, para 11; De Cubber v Belgium (1987) 13 EHRR 422, para 21). He also referred to Bönisch v Austria (1985) 13 EHRR 409, para 11, where the Court noted

> . . . that in the present case an award of just satisfaction can only be based on the fact that the applicant did not have, before the Austrian courts, the benefit of the guarantees of Article 6(1).'

He said that similar statements could be found in Delta v France (1990) 16 EHRR 574, para 43; Vidal v Belgium (Appn No. 14/1991/266/337, 28 October 1992, unreported), para 8; Pelissier and Sassi v France (1999) 30 EHRR 715, para 80; Zielinski and Others v France (1999) 31 EHRR 532, para 79; Davies v United Kingdom (2002) 35 EHRR 720, para 34; Polskiego v Poland (Appn No. 42049/98, 21 September 2004, unreported), para 47; Edwards and Lewis v United Kingdom (Appn Nos. 39647/98 and 40461/98, 27 October 2004, unreported), para 49, in which the Grand Chamber endorsed the earlier finding of a Chamber. He also noted that a recent statement of particular authority, was recently given by a Grand Chamber on a reference specifically directed to the issue of just satisfaction under article 41: Kingsley v United Kingdom (2002) 35 EHRR 177, para 40:

> 'The Court recalls that it is well established that the principle underlying the provision of just satisfaction for a breach of Article 6 is that the applicant should as far as possible be put in the position he would have enjoyed had the proceedings complied with the Convention's requirements. The Court will award monetary compensation under Article 41 only where it is satisfied that the loss or damage complained of was actually caused by the violation it has found, since the state cannot be required to pay damages in respect of losses for which it is not responsible.'

450 He referred to: Goddi v Italy (1984) 6 EHRR 457, para 35 ('a loss of real opportunities'); Colozza v Italy (1985) 7 EHRR 516, para 38 ('a loss of real opportunities'); Lechner and Hess v Austria (1987) 9 EHRR 490, para 64 ('some loss of real opportunities'); Weeks v United Kingdom (1988) 13 EHRR 435, para 13 ('a loss of opportunities'); O v United Kingdom (1988) 13 EHRR 578, para 12 ('some loss of real opportunities'); Delta v France (1990) 16 EHRR 574, para 43 ('a loss of real opportunities').

In other words it has made an award if it considers that the applicant had been deprived of a real chance of a better outcome. He further found[451] that where, 'having found a violation of article 6, the Court has made an award of monetary compensation under article 41, under either of the heads of general damages considered in this opinion, whether for loss of procedural opportunity or anxiety and frustration, the sums awarded have been noteworthy for their modesty'.[452]

On the question whether reliance should be placed on the tort measure of damages or the Strasbourg standard, he said:

> First, the 1998 Act is not a tort statute. Its objects are different and broader. Even in a case where a finding of violation is not judged to afford the applicant just satisfaction, such a finding will be an important part of his remedy and an important vindication of the right he has asserted. Damages need not ordinarily be awarded to encourage high standards of compliance by member states, since they are already bound in international law to perform their duties under the Convention in good faith, although it may be different if there is felt to be a need to encourage compliance by individual officials or classes of official. Secondly, the purpose of incorporating the Convention in domestic law through the 1998 Act was not to give victims better remedies at home than they could recover in Strasbourg but to give them the same remedies without the delay and expense of resort to Strasbourg. Thirdly, section 8(4) requires a domestic court to take into account the principles applied by the European Court under article 41 not only in determining whether to award damages but also in determining the amount of an award. There could be no clearer indication that courts in this country should look to Strasbourg and not to domestic precedents . . . The Court routinely describes its awards as equitable, which I take to mean that they are not precisely calculated but are judged by the Court to be fair in the individual case. Judges in England and Wales must also make a similar judgment in the case before them. They are not inflexibly bound by Strasbourg awards in what may be different cases. But they should not aim to be significantly more or less generous than the Court might be expected to be, in a case where it was willing to make an award at all'.[453]

According to the Department of Constitutional Affairs, 2006 Review of the Implementation of the Human Rights Act,[454] there are only three reported cases where HRA damages

451 At para 17.

452 He relied on Nikolova v Bulgaria (2001) 31 EHRR 64, para 76, an Art 5 case, where the Court referred to to the award of 'relatively small amounts', and in Migon v Poland (Appn No 24244/94, 25 September 2002, unreported, para 91), another Art 5 case, where it referred to 'modest awards'. He said that it made this plain in Osman v United Kingdom (1998) 29 EHRR 245, para 164: 'The Court notes that it conducts its assessment of what an applicant is entitled to by way of just satisfaction in accordance with the principles laid down in its case law under Art 50 [now Art 41] and not by reference to the principles or scales of assessment used by domestic courts'. He noted that it made the same point in an Art 5 case, Curley v United Kingdom (2000) 31 EHRR 401, para 46: 'It does not, however, consider that the domestic scales of compensation applicable to unlawful detention apply in the present case where there has been no equivalent finding of unlawfulness.'

453 At para 19.

454 At p 17.

have been awarded: R (Bernard) v Enfield LBC[455] where £10,000 was awarded to two claimants to reflect the impact on the profoundly disabled wife of living in unsuitable accommodation; R (KB) v Mental Health Review Tribunal[456] where damages of £750 to £4,000 were awarded for delays in tribunal hearings and Van Colle v Chief Constable of Hertfordshire[457] in which substantial HRA damages were awarded for breaches of Arts 2 and 8. The award was to parents of a witness murdered due to inadequate police protection and despite pleas to the police for greater protection. In assessing HRA damages Cox J took account of the character and conduct of the parties and the extent and seriousness of the breach; this included: the failure of the police to appreciate the escalating pattern of intimidation or to consider the need to protect the witness; the failure to implement the witness protection protocol. Also relevant was the minor disciplinary sanction imposed on the police officer concerned (a fine of five days' pay); the enormous distress and grief of the parents, and the failure of the police to make a suitable apology. Cox J therefore awarded HRA damages of £15,000 for the son's distress in the weeks leading up to his death and £35,000 for the claimants' own grief and suffering.

The cautious approach of the House of Lords in R (Greenfield) v Home Office is clearly of concern, in terms of upholding the Convention rights, given the Strasbourg approach to damages. Further, if applied in relation to other Convention rights, it potentially creates anomalies. In particular, if a public authority breached a claimant's Art 8 right within the context now covered by the new tort of misuse of private information, the claimant could obtain the tort measure of damages. But if the claim fell outside that context, but was still within the ambit of Art 8, and no existing cause of action appeared to be applicable, the claimant would only be entitled to the more meagre Strasbourg measure.

Conclusions – possible reform?

It now appears that the failure to define the terms 'public authority' and 'public function' created a significant flaw in the HRA. As indicated above, commentators and the Joint Committee on Human Rights (JCHR) have criticised the ungenerous approach taken in the Court of Appeal to determining which bodies are to be accounted public authorities for the purposes of the HRA. As discussed, in a number of cases relating to the delivery of public services by private suppliers, in particular the Leonard Cheshire case, the UK courts have adopted a restrictive interpretation of the meaning of 'public function'. The effect has been to exclude large numbers of very vulnerable people, including disabled or elderly people in long term private care, from the protection offered by the Convention rights under the HRA. Since the trend towards the contracting out of public functions is continuing, the problem is becoming more acute.

In an attempt to address this problem, in 2007 the Chairman, of the JCHR, Mr Andrew Dismore MP, introduced a Private Member's Bill in the House of Commons on the meaning of 'public authority' for HRA purposes.[458] In 2007 the Joint Committee on 455 (2003) HRLR 111.

456 [2004] QB 836.
457 [2006] EWHC 360 QB.
458 HC Deb, 9 January 2007, col 152. The Bill is listed for Second Reading on Friday 15 June 2007.

Human Rights also published its Ninth Report of Session 2006–7 on The Meaning of Public Authority under the Human Rights Act.[459] The Committee noted that interventions by the government in cases in order to seek to persuade the courts to adopt 'a more functional interpretation of the meaning of public authority' had proved an unsuccessful strategy and found that the approach taken by the Court of Appeal in the Leonard Cheshire case was still dominant.[460] It found that a solution had become a matter of some urgency. The Committee put forward a range of possible legislative solutions. It recommended that urgent consideration should be given to the amendment of existing statutes to ensure that the sectors most seriously affected by the narrow interpretation of public authority were made subject to the HRA.[461] As an alternative, the Committee proposed that Bills providing for the contracting-out or delegation of public functions to private bodies should provide that the body performing the functions will be a public authority for the purposes of the HRA.[462] The Committee did not recommend direct amendment of the HRA itself 'because of its status as a significant and important constitutional measure', but made the case for 'a separate, supplementary and interpretative statute, specifically directed to clarifying the interpretation of "functions of a public nature" in s 6(3)(b) HRA.'[463] The new provision could state, it suggested: 'For the purposes of s 6(3)(b) of the Human Rights Act 1998, a function of a public nature includes a function performed pursuant to a contract or other arrangement with a public authority which is under a duty to perform the function.'

This reform if implemented would make it clear that s 6 relates to the function that has been contracted out and not to the institution that is performing the function, However, there are a number of signs, which are documented in the JCHR's Report, that the government is not very receptive to this reform or is ambivalent. In particular, it appears to take the view that service providers in the private sector might be less prepared to take over the services or facilities in question if they had to accept human rights obligations.[464] From the government's perspective, in contemplating the Dismore Private Member's Bill or the JCHR's proposals, a straightforward moral choice has to be made between denying certain vulnerable members of society the protection, not only of the public sector generally but also of the Convention, or of ensuring that in divesting the state of expensive obligations at the least a basic level of Convention protection is retained for those affected. The protection would clearly be materially qualified. In the context of tenancies in Kay v Lambeth London Borough Council; Leeds City Council v Price[465] the House of Lords found that a public authority landlord's unqualified right to possession under domestic law would automatically supply the justification under Art 8(2) of the Convention for interference with an occupier's right to respect for his home under Art 8(1) except in an exceptional case where it was seriously arguable that domestic law was not compatible with the Convention. A claim based on the defendant's personal circumstances was not found to be permissible.

459 HL Paper 77, HC 410, published on 28 March 2007.
460 Paragraph 22.
461 Paragraph 142.
462 Paragraph 143.
463 Paragraph 150.
464 Section 3 of the Report, esp para 62.
465 [2006] UKHL 10.

Possibly the acceptance of Art 8 obligations would create some disincentive to private sector providers since their ability to maximise profits could be affected if they could not obtain vacant possession of property or oust persons from private homes. But the fact that private sector providers might want to infringe the Art 8 rights of certain persons – persons who are not viewed as desirable tenants or care home residents – provides an argument either for retaining the resource in the public sector or imposing Art 8 obligations on the provider. Otherwise, the base level protection of the Convention, and in particular Art 8, is denied to some of those persons who most need it. As far as private sector providers are concerned financial incentives to take over public sector resource are high and would have to be balanced, if the definition of 'public function' was broadened, against the effect of the acceptance of Art 8 obligations.

5 Private bodies and indirect horizontal effect

Private bodies

Private bodies are defined as such by virtue of the fact that they have no public function at all. This category covers, for example, individual citizens, newspapers, and other private companies, so long as they have no public function, such as discharging contracted-out governmental services. Therefore, they are not directly bound by the Convention guarantees under the HRA. This does not mean, however, that they are entirely unaffected by them; apart from the creation of indirect effects under the HRA, discussed below, any legislation that affects them has to be interpreted compatibly with the Convention under s 3. Functional public bodies acting in their private function are in the same position as purely private bodies, and therefore where the discussion below refers to 'private bodies' it should also be taken to be referring to such bodies but only in relation to their private functions.

The division between public and private bodies under the HRA is immensely significant and s 6 can be said to create an arbitrary division between the two. Bodies such as nursery schools, which have little power or desire to infringe human rights, are covered, while corporate bodies, such as Shell or media oligopolies, which may well have the ability, the will and the means to do so, are not. From this perspective, it may be said that the definition of 'public' authorities does not allow the HRA to have an impact that correlates fully with the location of power in the UK. Where power exists, it may be used in a manner which infringes human rights. But the HRA may be unable to address a number of instances of abuse of rights, while allowing certain powerful bodies to use it to enhance their power. For example, corporate media bodies can use the Act and can continue to rely on rights-based arguments for the enhancement of their power. The Act does not directly limit what has been termed 'the ability of corporate media giants to further their own commercial ends while acting in ways that run counter to maximising the provision of information upon which the claim is premised'.[466] In other words, certain powerful bodies are able to use the Act for rights-abridging ends, or in order to curb the expression of the values that underlie the Convention guarantees. For example, powerful media bodies can rely on their right to freedom of expression under Art 10 as a means of defending their invasion of the privacy of private citizens, protected under Art 8.[467]

466 See Feintuck, M, Media Regulation, Public Interest and the Law, 1999, Edinburgh University Press, Part 1, Chapter 3.

Under a purposive approach, a court confronted with a large supranational company as a 'victim' of a breach of a Convention right (for example, a corporate press body invoking Art 10 against a media regulator which is itself a public authority), should take into account the values underlying Art 10 in adjudicating on the claim. This was what, it is suggested, the Supreme Court of Canada failed to do when finding that a ban on tobacco advertising infringed the free expression guarantee,[468] since the arguments underlying freedom of expression were hardly engaged by such advertising.

These criticisms could be and are levelled at Bills of Rights in general on the basis that they identify the elected government as the enemy, not recognising that the elected government can be the protector of the people, who need protection not from it, but from powerful multinational corporations. While, clearly, the elected government does sometimes act as the enemy, through the agency of the police or intelligence services, there is also a need for the HRA to play a very significant role in protecting rights threatened not by the state, but by powerful rights-holders. This point raises the vexed issue of 'horizontal effect'. The horizontal effect of the HRA means that private bodies also to have to respect the Convention rights in certain circumstances, as discussed below.

'Horizontal effect'

As indicated above, s 6 HRA seeks to prevent the creation of full direct 'horizontal' effect. 'Direct horizontal' effect arises if private bodies are directly bound by the Convention in their legal relations with each other. If direct horizontal effect was available under the HRA, it would mean that a private body or person claiming that her Convention rights had been breached by another private body could bring proceedings on that basis directly against that other body. The term 'indirect horizontal' effect is used to refer to effects on the legal relations between private parties arising indirectly – by relying on another cause of action as the vehicle by which the rights can have an impact on the legal relations between the two parties. The term 'vertical effect' is used to refer to the binding effect of the Convention on public authorities.

Thus, legal effects between private parties (for example, citizens, newspapers) are limited to the creation of indirect horizontal effect, that is, the use of the Convention in relation to existing causes of action. In other words, it is argued that the Act affects the legal relations between private persons and bodies although, since they are outside the scope of s 6, they are not bound by it directly. A key concern of this book is with vertical liability – the relations between citizen and state – but the question of horizontal effect arises in certain contexts, most notably that of the assertion of privacy rights against the media; this is considered fully in Chapter 9 on the privacy of personal information.

467 See Chapter 9, pp 950 et seq.
468 RJR MacDonald Inc v Canada (1995) 127 DLR (4th) 1.

Statutes which affect the legal relations between private parties are affected by s 3 of the HRA and therefore, in this sense, the Act clearly creates indirect horizontal effects.[469] The position was initially much less clear in relation to the common law. Even before the HRA was fully in force there was a strong consensus that the courts' inclusion under s 6 within the definition of those bodies bound not to infringe Convention rights was the key to the horizontal effect of the Act upon the common law.[470]As regards the precise effect of the courts' status as a public authority under s 6, this created the area of greatest uncertainty under the Act and it therefore proved to be a focus for academic debate.[471] The academic debate was initially polarised, Professor Wade perceiving no distinction between the obligations of private and public bodies (direct horizontal effect)[472] and Buxton LJ taking the stance that no horizontal effects are created.[473] Wade argued that a citizen claiming that a private body had breached her Convention rights could claim that the court as a public authority under s 6 must afford a remedy itself for the breach once she had found a cause of action in order to get into court.[474] But the problem was that even if this were possible (for example, a very weak claim in reliance on an uncertain area of the common law), it was always unlikely that the courts would accept that Parliament could have intended to allow the distinction between private and public bodies under s 6 to be destroyed by this means.[475]

The third edition of this book took the middle ground in perceiving the creation of indirect horizontal effect under s 6. This position was endorsed in certain early decisions

469 It could have been argued that as private individuals do not have Convention rights against each other, there is no need to construe the statute in question compatibly with the rights. However, since s 3 applies to itself, it is suggested that it would not have been appropriate to construe it in a fashion which would have led to the denial of such rights where they would have been afforded to the individual at Strasbourg, bearing in mind the purpose of the HRA, to 'bring rights home'. On this point see Bamforth, N, 'The true 'horizontal effect' of the HRA' (2001) 117 LQR 34. See further Chapter 9, esp p 824. It is clear in any event that the courts have not adopted this stance (see pp 179–80 above) so that statutes affecting private parties create horizontal effect for the rights.

470 See Hunt, M, 'The "horizontal" effect of the Human Rights Act' [1998] PL 423; Phillipson, G, 'The Human Rights Act, "horizontal effect" and the common law: a bang or a whimper' (1999) 62 MLR 824.

471 For earlier comment, see Hunt, M, 'The 'horizontal' effect of the Human Rights Act' [1998] PL 423; Graber, CB and Teubner, G, 'Art and money: constitutional rights in the private sphere?' (1998) 18(1) OJLS 61; Leigh, I, 'Horizontal rights, the Human Rights Act and privacy: lessons from the Commonwealth' (1999) 48 ICLQ 57; Wade, 'The United Kingdom's Bill of Rights', 1998, pp 62–64. See on the horizontal effect of the Convention generally: Clapham, A, Human Rights in the Private Sphere, 1993, Clarendon; Clapham, A, The Privatisation of Human Rights [1995] EHRLR 20; Phillipson, G, 'The Human Rights Act, "horizontal effect" and the common law: a bang or a whimper?' (1999) 62 MLR 824; Buxton LJ, 'The Human Rights Act and private law' [2000] LQR 48. Clayton and Tomlinson (2006) (op. cit., fn 1) provide a very full discussion of the various aspects of 'horizontal effect' that also considers the position in a variety of jurisdictions – Part II. See also Hare, I (2001) 5 EHRLR 526.

472 The United Kingdom's Bill of Rights, 1998, pp 62–63.

473 'The Human Rights Act and private law' (2000) 116 LQR 48. Wade, having set out his position in favour of full direct horizontal effect, 'The United Kingdom's Bill of Rights', 1998, pp 62–64 as indicated above, then returned to the attack, replying to Buxton in 'Horizons of horizontality' (2000) 116 LQR 217.

474 Phillipson, ibid, pp 828–29.

475 See Hunt, 'The 'horizontal' effect of the Human Rights Act' [1998] PL 423. Further, s 9(3) HRA precludes an award of damages in respect of a judicial act done in good faith.

under the HRA[476] and by the majority of commentators at that time.[477] Pre-HRA, courts were already under a duty to take account of the Convention where the common law was unclear.[478] The majority of commentators considered, pre-HRA and in the first post-HRA years, that the inclusion of courts as public authorities under s 6 would at the least heighten the impact of the Convention on the common law,[479] but the nature of that impact remained uncertain for some time.

So under the HRA the courts had to answer two questions in relation to private common law disputes. First, did the Convention have indirect horizontal effect under the HRA? In other words, did the courts, as an aspect of their s6 duty, have to give effect to the Convention in relation to adjudications between two private parties? Second, if so, did they have an absolute duty to render the common law Convention-compliant or were they merely under a duty to have regard to it? Their duty was viewed as a qualified one by Phillipson[480] and an absolute one by Hunt.[481] Phillipson suggested that the obligation would only be to have regard to the Convention rights as guiding principles, having a variable weight depending on the context. Leigh considered that the HRA 'does not formally change the approach to Convention questions in the common law, although there may be a change of atmosphere post-incorporation'.[482]

Sedley LJ made it clear in the important early post-HRA decision in Douglas and Others v Hello! Ltd,[483] that once a plaintiff is in court presenting an arguable case, based on the existing doctrine of breach of confidence, for an injunction, which would affect freedom of expression, the court clearly has a duty to take account of s 12(4) since s 12 is applicable in all instances in which freedom of expression is in issue, not merely those in which the other party is a public authority. Section 12(4) requires the Court to have particular regard to Art 10 – the right to freedom of expression. So Art 10 must be applicable as between one private party to litigation and another; in other words, it has indirect horizontal effect. However, Art 10(2) is qualified in respect of the reputation and rights of others and the protection of information received in confidence. Therefore, in having particular regard to Art 10, it is also necessary to have such regard to the other Convention rights, including Art 8. Section 12(4) does 476 Michael Douglas, Catherine Zeta-Jones, Northern and Shell plc v Hello! Ltd [2001] 2 WLR 992, CA; Thompson and Venables v Associated Newspapers and Others [2001] 1 All ER 908.

477 Hunt 'The 'horizontal' effect of the Human Rights Act' [1998] PL 423; Phillipson, G, 'The Human Rights Act, 'horizontal effect' and the common law: a bang or a whimper?' (1999) 62 MLR 824. Hunt's and Phillipson's positions differ as to the scope of the duty under s 6, but the concept of indirect horizontal effect as argued for by both has been accepted by Lord Lester and Pannick in op. cit., fn 1, p 32 and by Clayton and Tomlinson, 1st edn, op. cit., fn 1, pp 236–38.

478 See above, Chapter 3, p 137.

479 See Hunt 'The "horizontal" effect of the Human Rights Act' [1998] PL 423; Phillipson, G, 'The Human Rights Act, "horizontal effect" and the common law: a bang or a whimper?' (1999) 62 MLR 824; Lord Lester and Pannick in op. cit., fn 1, p 32 and by Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, pp 236–38. This was precisely the basis of the findings in the early post-HRA decision in Thompson and Venables v Associated Newspapers [2001] 1 All ER 908 (discussed Chapter 9, pp 906, 909).

480 Phillipson, G, 'The Human Rights Act, "horizontal effect" and the common law: a bang or a whimper' (1999) 62 MLR 824.

481 'The "horizontal" effect of the Human Rights Act [1998] PL 423.

482 See Leigh, I, 'Horizontal rights, the Human Rights Act and privacy: lessons from the Commonwealth' (1999) 48 ICLQ 57 pp 82–83.

483 Douglas, Zeta-Jones, Northern and Shell plc v Hello! Ltd [2001] 2 WLR 992, CA.

not, therefore, merely give freedom of expression priority over the other rights; equal weight must also be given to Art 8 as a right recognised under Art 10(2). In other words, Sedley LJ found that in so far as there is doubt as to the scope of the duty of the court under s 6 of the HRA, s 12(4) makes the matter crystal clear where interference with the right to freedom of expression is in issue.

This technique was also adopted in Jon Venables, Robert Thompson v News Group Newspapers Ltd, Associated Newspapers Ltd, MGN Ltd,[484] but as well as Art 8, the Arts 2 and 3 rights of the applicants were taken into account and were determinative of the issue. In taking Arts 10 and 8 (and other Convention rights) into account under s 12, as Chapter 9 explains further,[485] the domestic courts clearly accepted in early post-HRA decisions that, as interpreted at Strasbourg, the guarantees affect the relations between private parties.

So from early post-HRA decisions it appeared that once adjudication on an existing cause of action was occurring, and freedom of expression was in question, s 12(4) would apply, thus creating indirect horizontal effect. Section 12 made it clear that the Convention rights indirectly affected the legal relations between private parties. However, it was apparent that anomalies would be created if other Convention rights, such as Art 8, protecting privacy, could be considered in private common law adjudication when freedom of expression was in question, but could not be considered when it was not. So, as discussed in Chapter 9, the courts began more overtly to rely on s 6 in taking all the rights into account in relation to the common law.

The seminal decision in Campbell[486] in the House of Lords, discussed fully in Chapter 9,[487] rejected the Buxton and Wade positions, and gave some endorsement to Hunt's argument. Naomi Campbell complained of the publication of details of her treatment at Narcotics Anonymous for drug addiction, including a photograph of her taken outside the clinic. She relied upon an existing cause of action – breach of confidence; however, to provide her with a remedy since the body infringing her privacy was clearly not a public authority; it was a purely private body – a newspaper company. The question to be determined was the duty of the court under s 6 in private common law adjudication. Lady Hale took an unambiguous and clearly stated position on this matter:[488]

> Neither party to this appeal has challenged the basic principles which have emerged from the Court of Appeal in the wake of the Human Rights Act 1998. The 1998 Act does not create any new cause of action between private persons. But if there is a relevant cause of action applicable, the court as a public authority must act compatibly with both parties' Convention rights. In a case such as this, the relevant vehicle will usually be the action for breach of confidence, as Lord Woolf CJ held in A v B plc, para 4.[489]

484 [2001] 1 All ER 908, HC, 8 January 2001.

485 See pp 902–5, 950 et seq.

486 [2004] 2 WLR 1232. See for discussion Phillipson, G, 'Clarity postponed? Horizontal Effect after Campbell and re S' in Fenwick, Masterman and Phillipson (eds) (2007), see fn 1 above.

487 At pp 911–13.

488 Op. cit., at para 132

489 That paragraph reads: 'Under section 6 of the 1998 Act, the court, as a public authority, is required not to "act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right". The court is able to achieve this

Lord Hope found:

> In the present case it is convenient to begin by looking at the matter from the standpoint of the respondents' assertion of the article 10 right and the court's duty as a public authority under section 6(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998, which section 12(4) reinforces, not to act in a way which is incompatible with that Convention right.[490]

Having considered also Ms Campbell's Art 8 right, and balanced the two against each other as discussed in Chapter 9, Lord Hope concluded:

> Despite the weight that must be given to the right to freedom of expression that the press needs if it is to play its role effectively, I would hold that there was here an infringement of Miss Campbell's right to privacy that cannot be justified.[491]

Lord Carswell agreed with Lords Hope and Hale. Phillipson observes on this:

> ... both Lord Hope and Lady Hale appear to engage in what can be termed strong indirect horizontal effect reasoning. The difference between the two is that while Lady Hale expressly accepted the application of strong horizontal effect as a duty that must be carried out in each case involving common law actions that are in the sphere of Convention rights, Lord Hope did not.[492]

Thus, it now appears that the courts accept a duty to abide by the Convention rights in private common law adjudication, in the context of misuse of personal information.[493] It cannot yet be said that they have accepted such a duty in other contexts.

In the Court of Appeal in McKennitt v Ash[494] Buxton LJ appeared to accept something akin to an absolute duty under s 6 HRA to develop the common law consistently with the Convention rights, at least in the context of Arts 8 and 10. He found:

> . . . difficulty has been experienced in explaining how that state obligation is articulated and enforced in actions between private individuals. However, judges of the highest authority have concluded that that follows from section 6(1) and (3) of the Human Rights Act, placing on the courts the obligations appropriate to a public authority: see Baroness Hale of Richmond in Campbell at 132; Lord Phillips of Worth Maltravers in Douglas v Hello! at 53; and in particular Lord Woolf in A v B plc:[495] Under section 6 of the 1998 Act the court, as a public authority, is required not to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right. The court is able by absorbing the rights which articles 8 and 10 protect into the long-established action for breach of confidence.'

490 Ibid at para 114.
491 At para 125.
492 See Fenwick and Phillipson (2006) fn 1 above, Chapter 3 at 136–37.
493 See Chapter 9, pp 826–28, 911–15.
494 [2006] EWCA Civ 1714 at paras 10 and 11.
495 [2003] QB 195[4].

> to achieve this by absorbing the rights which articles 8 and 10 protect into the long-established action for breach of confidence. This involves giving a new strength and breadth to the action so that it accommodates the requirements of those articles. The effect of this guidance is, therefore, that in order to find the rules of the English law of breach of confidence we now have to look in the jurisprudence of articles 8 and 10 . . . '.

As Chapter 9 argues, although the courts are very reluctant to take an explicit position on this matter, it is implicit in Campbell that a form of indirect horizontal effect has been accepted, which appears from McKennitt to impose something close to an absolute duty to develop the common law compatibly with the rights rather than a requirement merely to have regard to them.[496] The courts do not appear to have reached this position purely by reference to the extent to which the Convention itself accepts horizontal effect. The House of Lords in Campbell[497] considered that it could go beyond the demands of the Convention at Strasbourg in determining that indirect horizontal effect arises under the HRA.[498] But that stance is in harmony with the approach of the Convention since it demands that remedies should be available which can be used against private bodies,[499] not merely against the state. The dramatic alteration, documented in Chapter 9, that has been effected to the domestic doctrine of confidence in order to transform it into a remedy for misuse of private information, suggests that the courts accept implicitly that the s 6 duty is an absolute one – at least in the context of privacy. The demands that the duty imposes appear to be determined by the scope of the Convention rights, at least in the context of Arts 8 and 10, following McKennitt.

This clearly does not mean that direct horizontal effect is created – that citizens can simply take another private person or body to court in reliance solely on a claim of breach of a Convention right. But under the HRA litigants can rely on an obligation of the court in respect of the common law under s 6 that is beginning to resemble that under s 3 in respect of legislation. There is still not a complete consensus on this matter, either among academics[500] or the judiciary. But this appears to be the stance that the courts are taking as the HRA beds in. As Chapter 9 argues, the extent to which a duty to develop the common law under the doctrine of indirect horizontal effect has been accepted places pressure on the courts to go further towards accepting direct horizontal effect in that context since the gaps and anomalies appear more obvious.[501]

So while the eventual impact of s 6 is not a matter that can be regarded as settled, it is possible that eventually, through the development of the common law, we will arrive

496 See pp 827–28, 913–15.

497 [2004] 2 WLR 1232.

498 See Chapter 9, p 826.

499 See the discussion of Spencer v UK (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105; [1998] EHRLR 348 in Chapter 9, pp 816–17. See further Von Hannover, discussed Chapter 9 pp 818–23.

500 See: Beatson, J and Grosz, S, 'Horizontality: A Footnote' (2000) 116 LQR 385; Morgan, J, 'Questioning the True Effect of the HRA' (2002) Legal Studies 259; see also Morgan, J, 'Privacy, Confidence and Horizontal Effect: "Hello" Trouble' (2003) CLJ 443. Professor Beyleveld and Shaun Pattinson have put forward a sophisticated argument in favour of direct horizontal effect: 'Horizontality applicability and horizontal effect' (2002) 118 LQR, 623. See Fenwick and Phillipson (2006) op. cit. fn 1, Chapter 14 which broadly takes the stance that indirect horizontal effect is being created.

501 See pp 828, 991.

at a position that in its effects is equivalent to the creation of direct horizontal effects for the rights. In other words, it is possible that, in the long term, citizens will not be deprived of a remedy in respect of a breach of their Convention rights, although the body infringing them is a private one. This point is explored further in Chapter 9.[502] But at present reliance must be placed on an existing cause of action in order to be able to invoke the court's s 6 duty in private common law adjudication. Although it would seem hard for a court to resist the argument that indirect horizontal effect cannot be confined to the context of privacy, the question of the courts' duty in relation to the other Convention rights has not yet been settled.[503] Clearly, either statutory provisions or common law doctrines provide citizens with protection in most of the areas now covered by the Convention rights. The context in which it appeared that indirect horizontal effect might be relevant, apart from privacy, was that of discrimination: in particular, since the Convention offered protection against discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation at Strasbourg,[504] there was a strong case for arguing that such protection should be available under the HRA. The problem was that no existing cause of action was available to rely on since the common law was markedly inadequate in protecting persons from discrimination.[505] The problem is currently being addressed by means of EU-driven legislation; had it not been, that area would have highlighted very clearly one of the deficiencies of the HRA, as Chapter 15 explains.[506]

6 The stance of the judiciary in adjudicating on the Human Rights Act

Introduction

Clearly, the response of the judiciary to the interpretation and application of the Convention rights and HRA provisions is crucial to the success of the human rights project. Lord Hope of Craighead, for example, found: 'everything will depend on the ability of the judges to give effect to its provisions in a clear and consistent manner in a way which matches the intentions of the legislature.'[507] Lord Lester and David Pannick have written: 'The challenge and the opportunities for the judiciary are probably going to be the most dramatic.'[508] Clearly, judicial training is a significant factor in relation to the performance of the judiciary.[509] As indicated above, in the whole discussion of the HRA, a number of areas of uncertainty were created and left for the judges to deal with when the HRA was passed through Parliament. This is clearly true in particular

502 See pp 826–28, 991.
503 See Chapter 9, pp 824 et seq. on this point.
504 See Chapter 15, pp 1519–21.
505 See p 1485.
506 See pp 1479–81, 1519–21.
507 'The HRA 1998: the task of the judges' (1999) 20(3) Statute L Rev pp 185–97, p 185.
508 Preface to Human Rights Law and Practice, 1999. See also Martens, S, 'Incorporating the Convention: the role of the judiciary' [1998] EHRLR 5.
509 The Judicial Studies Board (JSB) held a series of 60 one-day training seminars for all full- and part-time members of the judiciary. Magistrates' training was undertaken by Magistrates' Courts Committees. The JSB also provided training for Chairs of Tribunals and provided a training pack for Chairs and members of Tribunals.

of the interpretation of s 3, the definition of 'public' function' and the issue of indirect horizontal effect.

The interpretation of the Convention rights demands that the judges consider both the competing claims of individual rights and societal interests and conflicts between individual rights. Under s 2 HRA they have some leeway in using imported principles and relevant doctrines in interpreting and developing the HRA provisions and the rights themselves. The often untheorised Strasbourg jurisprudence and the impact of the margin of appreciation doctrine leaves them quite a lot of room for the interpretation of the rights in applying them to new contexts. Thus both the Convention and the HRA create wide scope for the exercise of judicial discretion and for the development of the law. The extent to which they have discretion in human rights claims raises, it is suggested, a number of issues which are indicated below and considered further at relevant points in the following chapters.

The composition and independence of the judiciary – reform

At the time of the inception of the HRA, a number of commentators criticised the judicial appointments system,[510] and in particular the role of the Lord Chancellor in relation to it,[511] thereby making the case for its reform in order to create a more objective and impartial system, with a view to changing the composition of the judiciary. In response to such criticisms, the Labour Government accepted that some reform was necessary.[512] The Judicial Appointments and Training Commission was set up in 2000; it oversaw all stages of the appointments process, but had an advisory role only. In February 2001 the Lord Chancellor was criticised for soliciting funds for the Labour Party at an event held for barristers who would thereafter be candidates for judicial appointment. Subsequently, in his statement to Parliament regarding the matter, he said that the possibility of an independent Appointments Commission – which would have an active role in the appointments process – was under consideration. In 2003 the government announced its intention to change the system for making appointments to judicial offices in England and Wales. The reform was a central part of a reform of the judiciary intended to enshrine judicial independence in law and to enhance accountability, public confidence in the judges and effectiveness.

Following extensive consultation, the Constitutional Reform Act (CRA) received Royal Assent in March 2005. The Judicial Appointments Commission (JAC) was set up by the Constitutional Reform Act 2005 and launched in 2006.[513] It is an independent Non Departmental Public Body (NDPB) established to select judicial office holders. Its remit is to do so on merit, through fair and open competition, from the widest range of eligible candidates. The intention in setting it up was to maintain and strengthen 510 See, e.g., Fredman, S, 'Bringing rights home' (1998) 114 LQR 538.

511 See Bradley, AW and Ewing, K, Constitutional Law, 12th edn, 1997, p 419.

512 See the Peach Report, December 1999, www.open.gov.uk/lcd/judicial/Peach/reportfr.htm. The Judicial Appointments and Training Commission was proposed: see Access to Justice Labour Party, 1995. See further Brazier, 'The judiciary', in Blackburn and Plant (eds), Constitutional Reform: The Labour Government's Constitutional Reform Agenda, 1999, Longman, p 329. See also The Rt Hon B Hale [2001] PL 489.

513 The JAC was officially launched on 3 April 2006.

judicial independence by taking responsibility for selecting candidates for judicial office out of the hands of the Lord Chancellor and making the appointments process clearer and more accountable. Therefore for the first time in 900 years, the Lord Chancellor no longer has the sole power to select the judges to appoint. Instead, the JAC selects the candidates, and makes a recommendation to the Lord Chancellor. He can reject that recommendation but he is required to provide his reasons for doing so to the JAC. The 2005 Act also set up a new Judicial Appointments and Conduct Ombudsman (JACO) responsible for investigating and making recommendations concerning complaints about the judicial appointments process and the handling of judicial conduct complaints

The Act brought about other relevant and fundamental changes. It reformed the post of Lord Chancellor, transferring his judicial functions to the President of the Courts of England and Wales (the new title given to the Lord Chief Justice). It will launch a new independent Supreme Court in 2008, distinct from the House of Lords. It establishes the Directorate of Judicial Offices for England and Wales (DJO) comprising the Judicial Office, the Judicial Studies Board and the Judicial Communications Office. The Act also imposes a duty on government Ministers to uphold the independence of the judiciary.

The argument for the more radical reform of the appointments system that has occurred has a number of aspects, but centrally it concerns the unrepresentative nature of the judiciary. Apart from the likelihood that the judges' backgrounds and experiences may differ radically from those whose rights they are considering, a matter that can have relevance in a number of circumstances, a system that – in effect – tends to exclude women from the highest office also excludes some of the most meritorious candidates, while arguably overestimating the merits of others. It may be noted that in the first 20 months of the Labour Government from 1997, the Lord Chancellor made 17 exclusively male appointments to higher judicial office.[514] At the present time, the House of Lords, which is often the ultimate arbiter in the most controversial human rights cases, is, with one exception – Baroness Hale – all-male, with no ethnic minority representation. So far, only one woman has ever been appointed to the House of Lords. The over-representation of men offends against the merit principle since under normal competitive conditions the representation would be unlikely to be so heavily weighted towards one gender.

The primary rationale, as Malleson argues, for promoting gender equality on the bench should be based on principles of equity and legitimacy.[515] She rejects as strategically dangerous and empirically doubtful the argument that women will bring a unique contribution to the bench as a result of their different life experiences, values and attitudes.

Judges are still largely drawn from a tiny minority group: upper-middle-class, rich, white, elderly males who were public school and Oxbridge educated. As positions 514 See (1999) 5 Legal Action, February.

515 Malleson, K, 'Justifying Gender Equality on the Bench: Why Difference Won't Do' (2003) 11(1) Feminist Legal Studies 1–24. She finds that arguments, derived from difference theory, have had a strong appeal since they appear to give legitimacy to the undervalued attributes traditionally associated with the feminine while also promoting the merit principle by claiming to improve the quality of justice. However, the article argues that difference theory arguments are theoretically weak and empirically questionable.

of power in Britain are often filled by persons drawn from this group, it appears incongruous to afford them – in effect – the responsibility under the HRA of protecting the rights of minority groups, who by definition tend to be weak or unpopular. John Griffiths, in The Politics of the Judiciary,[516] argues that the senior judges:

> . . . define the public interest, inevitably, from the viewpoint of their own class. And the public interest, so defined, is . . . the interest of others in authority. It includes the maintenance of order, the protection of private property, the containment of the trade union movement.

The Griffiths' argument, which is echoed by other leftist commentators, has led the left to view the domestic reception of the Convention as likely to lead to a diminution in the protection of civil liberties in the UK.[517] In particular, it is thought that the judiciary, in the UK and abroad, cannot be trusted to protect the interests of minorities and/or unpopular groups, but tends to protect commercial interests[518] and the interests of those in authority.[519] Therefore, Convention rights may be enforced by powerful bodies, including rich individuals and large corporations. Such enforcement can be to the detriment of civil liberties or to the detriment of general public interests of a social welfare nature. This is a powerful argument even to those who do not accept the conclusion which the left draws from it – that the HRA should never have been introduced.

However, the causal link between the judges' backgrounds and their decisions may not be as clear as Griffiths suggests. Other variables may be present influencing particular decisions, and judges, despite similar backgrounds, sometimes display markedly differing degrees of liberalism. As Lee points out,[520] a number of House of Lords' decisions on human rights issues have been reached on a three–two majority,[521] while in others, a unanimous Court of Appeal has been overturned by a unanimous House of Lords.[522] Clearly, judges aspire to objectivity and impartiality, but it is obvious that sometimes they will be influenced, unconsciously or otherwise, by the interests of their class and by their experiences in general, including their sexual experiences.

It is apparent, however, that despite the fact that they largely belong to a particular societal group, they do not always display attitudes which tend to be associated with that group. At the least, it is fair to say that during the Conservative years 1979–97, the judges demonstrated on the whole a greater eagerness to protect the rights of 'weak' or minority groups than did their counterparts in government. A number of highly significant decisions taken in the 1980s and 1990s relating to the rights of, for example, poorly paid women, asylum seekers or of suspects in police custody are documented 516 4th edn, 1991, p 327.

517 See Ewing and Gearty, (1997) 2 EHRLR 149, on Labour's plans to incorporate the Convention.
518 The Supreme Court of Canada struck down as an unjustifiable restriction on freedom of expression a Canadian statute prohibiting advertising: RJR MacDonald Inc v Canada (AG), SCC, 21 September 1995, a decision that could support the leftist thesis.
519 See Ewing, K, 'The Futility of the Human Rights Act', Public Law (2004), 829–52.
520 Judging Judges, 1989, p 36.
521 E.g. Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech AHA [1986] AC 112; [1985] 3 WLR 830, HL.
522 Mandla v Dowell Lee [1983] 2 AC 548; [1983] 1 All ER 1062, HL.

in this book in which judges may be said to have acted against the interests of their class.[523] The 'judicial supremacism' controversy discussed by Loveland illustrates this tendency.[524] As he points out, a number of decisions on immigration policies taken during the second Major Government in the early-mid 1990s inflamed Conservative MPs as well as right wing commentators.[525] Certain decisions under the HRA, in particular A and Others,[526] have had a similar impact. The argument that the judges will almost inevitably be influenced by the interests of those in authority is not, it is suggested, fully supported by the evidence.

How far can it be said that male judges are able to overcome a lack of experience or understanding, or straightforward prejudice, based on gender and particular sexual experiences? Given the current dominance of male judges at the higher levels of the judiciary, this is a very pertinent question. Rights of especial relevance to women may often come before all-male courts under the HRA, raising fears of a lack of impartiality and understanding. In particular, Art 6 has been used to diminish the value of special protections for rape victims within the criminal justice system.[527] In Canada, the so called 'rape shield', which prevented the defence asking questions about a complainant's sexual history or reputation, was struck down by the Supreme Court under the Canadian Charter on the ground of fairness to the accused (R v Seaboyer),[528] although the rape shield law was reinstated.[529]

In 2001, as discussed above, a challenge to a law similar in certain respects to the one in Canada was considered by the House of Lords in R v A.[530] It may be noted that the change in the law had been campaigned for by women's groups over a long period of time, and that one of the most persuasive arguments for its introduction concerned the strong tendency of Crown Court judges to allow humiliating questions regarding the complainant's sexual history even where irrelevant to the issue of consent. Women's groups were allowed to intervene in the appeal by making written representations that the law should be retained. Further, an application was made on behalf of the Fawcett Society, a group campaigning for women's rights, to intervene on the basis that the House of Lords is insufficiently impartial to decide the case. The argument was that an all-male court might be influenced, unconsciously, by their attitudes towards sexuality and therefore would not be able to decide impartially where the balance should lie between the rights of the female complainant and the Art 6 fair trial rights of the male defendant.

523 E.g. Hayward v Cammell Laird [1988] 2 All ER 257; Pickstone v Freemans [1988] 3 WLR 265. See Chapter 15, p 1496. Chapter 13, pp 1281–82.

524 Constitutional Law, 2000, pp 587–95.

525 See, e.g., Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Leech (No 2) [1993] 4 All ER 539.

526 See Chapter 14, pp 1430 et seq.

527 R v A, discussed above at pp 176–91. It is also possible that the current anonymity of rape complainants in the UK might be challenged on similar grounds under Art 6 or possibly under Art 8 in conjunction with Art 14 (on grounds of equal rights to privacy).

528 [1991] 2 SCR 577; 83 DLR (4th) 193.

529 The reinstated rape shield law (Criminal Code as amended, s 276), however, survived a human rights challenge in 2000: R v Darrach (2000) 191 DLR (4th) 539.

530 [2001] 2 WLR 1546. The Court of Appeal considered the possibility of incompatibility between the rape shield provision and Art 6: R v Y (Sexual Offence: Complainant's Sexual History) (2001) The Times, 13 February 2001; the House of Lords may issue a declaration of incompatibility: R v A (Joinder of Appropriate Minister) (2001) The Times, 7 March. For comment, see the Guardian, 19 March 2001. The provision in question is the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999, s 41.

The House of Lords refused to accept the case made by the group and went on to find that the provision in question could be rendered compatible with Art 6, since s 3 of the HRA could be used in order to allow for the reading of words into the section, allowing the possibility of the admission of relevant evidence relating to a previous (alleged) sexual relationship between defendant and complainant. This was, as indicated above, an extremely activist interpretation of what s 3 requires. In reaching its decision as to the requirements of s 3, the Lords did not rehearse the relevant Strasbourg jurisprudence in any detail. Therefore, it is arguable that the legislative role being adopted was almost overt. The Art 8 rights of the complainant were not mentioned, although Art 8 concerns were considered. It is suggested that this was an instance in which the House of Lords read up the Convention right in question – and read down the domestic legislative provision – the reverse of the position the Law Lords adopted in Brown v Stott.[531] This approach may be termed a selectively activist one.

This example indicates the nature of the problem: it is hard to acquit the male judiciary of lacking understanding of women's experiences and of making decisions that at times appear to be tinged by sexism. Possibly, the practice of accepting interventions from women's campaigning groups in human rights cases is an interesting development that has the potential, to address this problem, to a limited extent.[532] Part of a broader solution to the problem is to appoint more women to higher judicial office, especially to the House of Lords. In the case of the 'rape shield' law, the solution, put forward on behalf of the Fawcett Society, was to appoint two female Law Lords in order to ensure that the decision was not taken by an all-male court. It was not expected that this would occur in this instance, but intervention aided in making the general case for reform. Reform of the appointments system may eventually change the gender make-up of the higher courts.

Learning lessons from the Canadian experience

In adjudication on the HRA, domestic judges at times refer to decisions of courts from other jurisdictions, and Canadian cases have been considered with some frequency,[533] although it cannot be assumed that the judiciary will invariably welcome the use of Canadian precedents.[534] Canadian judges share a similar constitutional background with UK judges and Canada has adopted the Charter of Rights and Freedoms relatively recently.

As indicated below, opinions differ as to the success of the Supreme Court of Canada, as compared to that of other equivalent courts throughout the world, in upholding human rights. As well as taking the Court's jurisprudence into account in human rights cases, lessons can be drawn from the Canadian experience that are relevant to UK judges. It should be pointed out, however, that there had been judicial review of legislation in Canada since before Confederation in 1867. It has been argued that they 531 See above, p 176.

532 See Samuels, H, 'Feminist Activism, Third Party Interventions and the Courts' (2005) 13(1) Feminist Legal Studies 15–42.

533 See R v A [2001] 2 WLR 1546; [2001] UKHL 25, esp paras 76, 77, 100, 101. See also Montgomery v Lord Advocate [2001] 2 WLR 779, p 810.

534 See Brown v Stott [2001] 2 WLR 817, pp 853–55, per Lord Hope of Craighead.

have adjusted successfully to applying the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms 1982. Professor Russell of the University of Toronto wrote in 1988 (six years after the Charter was adopted): 'In Skapinker[535] [the first Charter decision of the Canadian Supreme Court] the Court made it clear that it was prepared to take the Charter seriously, to give its terms a liberal interpretation and to strike down laws and practices of government found to be in conflict with it.'[536] Writing on two decisions in which freedom of expression was upheld under the Charter, Judge Strayer of the Federal Court of Canada has said:

> Such vague paternalistic laws had long been recognised as posing a threat to freedom of expression and they could not survive long in a country which had so recently dedicated itself to guaranteeing that freedom. One can only speculate that such laws would long since have been amended and particularised had inertia not been the line of least political resistance.[537]

In passing, it is worth noting that one of the laws in question was a provincial law dealing with film censorship which did not prescribe standards for such censorship; its counterpart can be found at present in the UK in the power of local authorities to license films, which derives from legislation passed in 1909.[538]

Decisions under the Charter have not, however, gone uncriticised from the political left: it has been said that 'the Charter is being used to benefit vested interests in society and to weaken the relative power of the disadvantaged and under-privileged',[539] referring to a decision condoning restriction of the collective bargaining power of unions in Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union.[540] On the other hand, Russell has contended that the Supreme Court 'is sensitive to the left's concerns and is struggling to avoid an approach to the Charter which will give credence to them'.[541] These relatively early favourable evaluations of the impact of the Charter have received mixed support in later analysis. It has been suggested that the Charter 'has transformed the rights' agenda in Canada positively and creatively – sometimes even inspirationally'.[542] There have been, however, a number of suggestions that the record of the Supreme Court of Canada must be viewed as timorous and unflattering since it has failed to take a bold and innovative approach, one which could be viewed as showing the way forward for other such courts throughout the world.[543]

Clearly, any assessment of the record of the Supreme Court must be subject to later revision. A number of decisions of the Supreme Court are considered at various points in this book, since it will be suggested that despite the reservations expressed, they will provide a very valuable source of jurisprudence. Techniques developed by 535 [1984] 1 SCR 357.

536 Russell, P [1988] PL 385, p 388.
537 [1988] PL 347, p 359.
538 The Cinematograph Act 1909, which was concerned with the fire risk posed by films at that time.
539 (1988) 38 UTLJ 278, p 279.
540 (1986) 33 DLR (4th) 174; [1986] 1 SCR 460; for comment, see also (1987) 37 UTLJ 183.
541 Op. cit., p 388.
542 Penner, R, 'The Canadian experience with the Charter of Rights' [1996] PL 125. See further Hogg, PW, Constitutional Law of Canada, 1996, Carswell.
543 See Beatty, D, 'The Canadian Charter of Rights: lessons and laments' [1997] 60(4) MLR 487.

the Supreme Court in relation to the Charter will also be of relevance. The Court adopts a purposive approach: 'the purpose of the right or freedom is to be sought by reference to the . . . larger objects of the Charter itself, to the historical origins of the concept enshrined and, where applicable, to the meaning and purpose of [other associated rights and freedoms] . . .'.[544]

The Court has also shown a strong tendency to draw upon international human rights law and to consider decisions from other jurisdictions.[545] It is, it is suggested, valuable to adopt a similar approach to the Convention rights under the HRA, bearing in mind the meagre, under-theorised nature of much of the Strasbourg jurisprudence and the fact that it is not binding. By considering Canadian human rights jurisprudence and jurisprudence from other jurisdictions, it is arguable that the judiciary will be able to settle human rights issues in a manner that will not depend on their own personal moral outlook. As Raz puts it, the judges have available 'distancing devices . . . devices the judges can rely on to settle [such issues] in a way that is independent of the personal tastes of the judges'.[546]

Many commentators have remarked on the growing tendency of courts to refer to the human rights jurisprudence of other jurisdictions.[547] However, the legitimacy of relying on such jurisprudence has been doubted. For example, if a Canadian decision is relied upon which has itself been especially heavily influenced by jurisprudence from other jurisdictions (as has that other jurisprudence itself), could that decision be viewed as having a particular legitimacy because it reflects an accepted multinational standard of human rights? Or should it be viewed with suspicion on the basis that without looking more closely at the possible decisions that could have influenced it, it might merely reflect a selective use of jurisprudence in order to reach a desired end? It has been suggested that the invocation of foreign jurisprudence may merely obscure rather than guard against moral arbitrariness.[548] However, it is unlikely that such criticisms will lead to a reversal of such an established trend. What is needed is a deeper understanding of the use of foreign jurisprudence in domestic courts with a view to answering a number of questions, especially regarding its effect on the legitimacy of decisions. As McCrudden argues in an important article, a systematic examination of this complex phenomenon is required so that we could 'at least understand it better'.[549]

Domestic approaches to the margin of appreciation doctrine

The part to be played by the margin of appreciation doctrine, discussed in Chapter 2,[550] in some form in the domestic courts is not fully resolved. A central issue under the HRA

544 R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd (1985) 18 DLR (4th) 321, pp 395–96.

545 See Schabas, W, International Human Rights Law and the Canadian Charter, 1991, Carswell; Hogg, PW, Constitutional Law of Canada, 1996.

546 Raz, J, 'On the authority and interpretation of constitutions: some preliminaries', in Constitutionalism: Philosophical Foundations, 1998, p 190.

547 See Nelken, D, 'Disclosing/invoking legal culture: an introduction' (1995) 4 SLS 435.

548 See Ghai, Y, 'Sentinels of liberty or sheep in Woolf's clothing? Judicial politics and the Hong Kong Bill of Rights' [1997] 60 MLR 459.

549 'A common law of human rights? Transnational judicial conversations on constitutional rights' (2000) 20(4) OJLS 499–532.

550 See pp 36–39.

from its inception concerned the domestic reception of the doctrine. Since it has probably been the key dilutant of Convention standards, as Chapter 2 indicated,[551] it was clearly essential that UK judges should reject it as a relevant factor in their own decision-making under the Convention, although it became clear that there would be instances, as indicated below, when it would be appropriate to recognise a 'discretionary area of judgment'. This is a domestic doctrine with some similarities to the margin of appreciation doctrine, but the two doctrines are distinct, although their effects may not always be. As indicated in Chapter 2, the margin of appreciation doctrine is a distinctively international law doctrine, based on the need to respect the decision making of Nation states within defined limits. Therefore, it would not appear to have any application in national law.[552] However, under s 2 of the HRA, the domestic judiciary 'must take into account' any relevant Strasbourg jurisprudence, although they are not bound by it.[553] A central concern is, therefore, the reconciliation of the requirement under s 2 of the HRA with the domestic rejection of the margin of appreciation doctrine, taking into account its international character.

As indicated above, s 2 in its face creates quite a weak obligation, since it is open to the judiciary to consider, but disapply a particular decision. Only the Convention rights themselves are binding under s 6. As pointed out above, the rights appear, in many respects, quite out of date today. But since 1950 they have been subject to a rich and extensive jurisprudence. The domestic judiciary would view a number of the Articles as far too bald and imprecise unless their interpretation at Strasbourg was taken into account.[554] But in so doing it was also open to them to consider whether it was possible and desirable to avoid applying the margin of appreciation aspects of the jurisprudence.[555] While it was clear at the time of the inception of the HRA that the doctrine itself had no application in national law,[556] the obligation to disapply it can be viewed as going much further than merely refusing to import it into domestic decision-making. The judiciary have accepted that they should not import the doctrine wholesale into domestic law, but they have shown that they are prepared to rely on decisions at Strasbourg which have been influenced by it. To an extent, this was the approach adopted in the leading pre-HRA case of R v DPP

551 See p 36–39.

552 As Sir John Laws put it in 1998: 'The margin of appreciation doctrine as it has been developed at Strasbourg will necessarily be inapt to the administration of the Convention in the domestic courts for the very reason that they are domestic; they will not be subject to an objective inhibition generated by any cultural distance between themselves and the state organs whose decisions are impleaded before them.' 'The limitations of human rights' [1998] PL 254, p 258.

553 The term exhaustively covers any 'judgment, decision, declaration or advisory opinion of the Court', any 'opinion of the Commission given in a report adopted under Article 31', any 'decision of the Commission in connection with Article 26 or 27(2)' or any 'decision of the Committee of Ministers taken under Article 46'. The words 'in connection with' appear to mean that all findings which may be said to be linked to the admissibility procedure, including reports prepared during the preliminary examination of a case, could be taken into account.

554 It may be noted that this is not necessarily the case; the Strasbourg jurisprudence may have the effect of 'reading down' the right; see the discussion of Khan v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 310 in Chapter 13, pp 1291–92; see also Salabiaku v France, A 141-A (1988).

555 See Hunt, M, Singh, R and Demetriou, M, 'Is there a role for the margin of appreciation in national law after the Human Rights Act?' [1999] EHRLR 15.

556 In R v Stratford JJ ex p Imbert (1999) The Times, 21 February, Buxton LJ confirmed obiter that the doctrine had no such application. This was also the advice given by the Judicial Studies Board.

ex p Kebilene:[557] although the doctrine itself was rejected, the outcomes of applications at Strasbourg were taken into account without adverting to the influence the doctrine had had on them.[558] As discussed below, it was also open to the judiciary at the inception of the HRA to develop their own version of the doctrine of the margin of appreciation (under a different name) based upon common law acceptance of judicial deference to Parliament and to aspects of executive power.

Discretionary areas of judgment, deference and proportionality[559]

Lord Woolf recently said this on the post-HRA approach to deference:

> Where a court is applying . . . human rights, such as those contained in the European Convention, the court is given an additional responsibility in the case of most of the rights. The right to life and the right not to be subjected to cruel and unusual punishment are absolute rights, but the majority are qualified so as to preserve the needs of a democratic society . . . A balance has therefore to be drawn between the state and the individual and a judge is responsible for determining where the balance lies. This is a task new to the English judiciary . . . How the balancing act is done is extremely important. To be too favourable to the citizen can frustrate the ability of the government to govern and to be too favourable to the government can devalue the rights. To assist the English judges to strike the balance correctly, we have developed a doctrine of deference which they extend both to the legislature and the Executive when appropriate. On matters of national security, for example, a high degree of deference is shown. Similarly, in relation to matters of economic policy. There will be situations, however, in which that the public body whose actions are being challenged is no better qualified to determine the issue than a judge. The position of the individual making the challenge also has to be taken into account. Such is the scale of the change involved in moving from a jurisdiction where the courts enforce public duties to one where the courts are required to enforce public rights, that a degree of conservatism is a virtue. Insofar as this is possible, the objective should be to convince the legislative and the Executive that the supervision of the courts is wholly constructive. It results in better administration, better government and better legislation.[560]

557 [1999] 3 WLR 372.

558 Such applications included H v UK, Appl No 15023/89 and Bates v UK, Appl No 26280/95.

559 For the notion of respect for a ‘discretionary area of judgment’ see Pannick, D, ‘Principles of interpretation of Convention rights under the Human Rights Act and the discretionary area of judgement’ (1998) PL 545. See further also: Craig, P, ‘The Courts, the Human Rights Act and Judicial Review’ (2001) 117 L.Q.R. 589; Edwards, R, ‘Judicial Review under the Human Rights Act’ (2002) 65 CLJ. See further Edwards, R, ‘Judicial Deference under the Human Rights Act’ 65(6) MLR 859; Klug, F, ‘Judicial Deference under the Human Rights Act’ (2003) 2 EHRLR 125; Jowell, J and Lord Steyn, Deference: A Tangled Story’ [2005] PL 346; Hickman, T, ‘Constitutional Dialogue, Constitutional Theories and the Human Rights Act 1998’ [2005] PL 306; O’Cinneide, C, ‘Democracy and Rights: New Directions in the Human Rights Era’ [2004] 57 Current Legal Problems.

560 ‘Current Challenges in Judging’ Speech to the 5th Worldwide Common Law Judiciary Conference 2003, Sydney, Australia.

It should now be clear – and it is readily evident from Lord Woolf's speech – that the Human Rights Act and the Convention itself leave open a great deal of leeway for diverse judicial approaches. This chapter has sought to indicate that the judges are hesitating between accepting a role in developing an autonomous constitutional rights jurisprudence and merely applying Strasbourg standards, often in a traditional deferential fashion – adding in what Phillipson has termed a 'double dose of deference'.[561] The complexity of the position described below is the result of the reliance on an international instrument and thus on a body of jurisprudence affected by the influence of the margin of appreciation doctrine. In public law cases a number of stages can be discerned in judicial decision-making, and what occurs at each one can be characterised as minimalist or activist, using those terms as shorthand for a 'constitutional rights' or a 'minimal compliance with Convention standards' approach. Although the discussion is largely concerned with public law cases, some of the points, in particular the use of the Strasbourg jurisprudence, are also applicable in private law and criminal cases, and reference is made to case law outside the public law sphere.

Before moving on and accepting that activism is necessary in order to realise the full benefits of the Convention, it is essential to pause briefly to consider both what activism means and what its effects may be. The main concern of this book is with vertical effects in the classic arenas of state power and therefore it avoids the most problematic issues since activism is usually welcomed by most commentators in such arenas.[562] Indeed, as indicated above, some, although by no means all, commentators looked to the HRA in 1998 as a means of undoing the effects in such contexts of years of untrammelled parliamentary sovereignty.[563] As this book indicates, especially in relation to state surveillance in Chapter 10, counter-terrorist and public order measures in Chapters 14 and 8, the Security and Intelligence Services in Chapter 10, such effects are readily evident.

But unbridled judicial activism can also have the effect, in certain contexts, of imposing particular moral views on individuals and thereby infringing their Convention rights. The proper role of activism is to uphold individual rights in the face of state interference or state neglect of the right, not to substitute judicial for state interference, in intruding on rights, even in the name of upholding competing rights. Judicial activism is justified where it results in an enhancement of the fairness and justice of public policy making, rendering public authorities accountable by reference to constitutional principle.[564] The most obvious example of such a stance is that taken by the House of Lords in A v Secretary of State for the Home Department,[565] discussed in full in Chapter 14.[566] Activism is unjustified as a means of imposing particular judicial views of morality on individuals. As Sir John Laws puts it, that is a matter 'upon which the 561 See Fenwick and Phillipson (2006) fn 1 above, Chapter 3 p149 .

562 See, e.g., Ewing, KD and Gearty, CA, Freedom under Thatcher, 1989.

563 See Chapter 3, pp 116–19. Some commentators, however, have continued to view the allocation of any further power to the judiciary as a dangerous step and therefore consider that the protection of civil liberties should be left to Parliament; see Griffiths, 'The brave new world of Sir John Laws' [2000] March MLR 159; Ewing, K, 'The Futility of the Human Rights Act', Public Law (2004), 829–52.

564 See Feldman, D, 'The Human Rights Act 1998 and constitutional principles' (1999) 19(2) LS 165; Laws LJ, 'The limitations of human rights' [1998] PL 254.

565 [2004] QB 335.

566 See pp 1430 et seq.

judges have no special voice'.[567] This point was canvassed above,[568] and is returned to below.

Three stages in judicial reasoning in public law cases can be identified for the sake of clarity, while readily acknowledging that judicial reasoning in these contexts cannot frequently be so easily pigeon-holed, and that aspects of activist or minimalist reasoning are often unconsciously adopted. In some instances of judicial reasoning, two or all of the three stages may collapse into each other. Below, examples are given of minimalist or activist reasoning, using this somewhat artificial staged approach as a deliberate means of seeking to pin down elusive ideas of deference, proportionality and the domestic reception of the margin of appreciation doctrine; these points are then developed in the various human rights contexts covered in this book.

The first stage is to find that the case falls within the ambit of a right and to determine the Strasbourg case law to be applied. In fact, under the post-HRA case law this is not necessarily the first step in the reasoning, but there is normally a point in the judgment at which the relevant Strasbourg jurisprudence is assessed. As discussed above, in R (on the application of Marper) v Chief Constable of South Yorkshire[569] Lord Steyn, following R (on the application of Ullah) v Special Adjudicator,[570] found that where Strasbourg had determined the ambit of a Convention right, the domestic court would not be free to determine it by reference to domestic cultural traditions. In N v Secretary of State for the Home Department[571] Lord Nicholls similarly stated: 'We are dealing here with a decision of the Strasbourg court which created what the Court of Appeal rightly accepted was an "extension of an extension" to the article 3 obligation[572] . . . Our task is determine the limits of that extension, not to enlarge it beyond the limits which the Strasbourg Court has set for it'. However, those findings still leave some leeway for the courts to interpret the Strasbourg jurisprudence as to the ambit of the rights, especially where it is meagre or heavily affected by the influence of the margin of appreciation doctrine. Also, instances may arise which are not covered, or not unambiguously covered by the relevant jurisprudence, creating leeway for the domestic court to adopt a more or a less generous view of the ambit. There may be compelling and exceptional reasons to depart from the Convention jurisprudence; this was recognised in the House of Lords in Kay v Lambeth LBC[573] by Lord Bingham. In R v Spear,[574] for example, the domestic court challenged the application by the Strasbourg court of Convention principles to the detailed facts of a particular class of case which it viewed as peculiarly within the knowledge of national authorities. The determination as to ambit can itself be viewed as activist or minimalist – and arguably 567 Laws, ibid For the view that the judiciary, and Sir John Laws in particular, are, in effect, claiming the power to determine moral and political matters, see Griffiths, 'The brave new world of Sir John Laws' [2000] 63(2) MLR 159.

568 See pp 190–91.

569 [2004] 1 WLR 2196. See p 194 above.

570 [2004] UKHL 26.

571 [2005] 2 WLR 1124

572 [2003] EWCA Civ 1369, per Laws LJ, para 37; Dyson LJ, para 46.

573 [2006] 2 WLR 570 para 28

574 [2003] 1 AC 734, paras 12 and 92

autonomous, activist domestic concepts of the ambit are already being developed.[575] But so are minimal ones, as will be seen below. In many instances, clearly, there will be no assessment of the ambit since it will be self-evident that the right is engaged. The key, but not the only, difference between an activist and a minimalist approach at this stage lies in the stance taken towards the margin of appreciation aspects of the Convention jurisprudence that is to be applied domestically.

The second stage is to determine whether and how far deference should be paid to the decision-maker in the context in question. Under a minimalist approach it may readily be found that the decision-maker should be afforded a 'discretionary area of judgment', meaning that the court is minded to adopt a deferential, non-rigorous standard of review. Under an activist approach a court will not readily adopt a deferential stance; it will tease out the factors more properly making for deference – this point is returned to below. The key point is that once the court has made a determination as to deference or no, and degree of deference, the standard of review it wishes to adopt is then apparent.

At the third stage, the court, having settled on the standard of review it views as appropriate, chooses the proportionality test that will most effectively deliver that standard. In other words, it settles on the test that best reflects the standard of review it deems appropriate. Thus, adopting a soft-edged standard of review, a court might take the stance that the decision-maker had not acted unreasonably in interfering with the guarantee in question. At the other extreme – under a very hard-edged standard – it could be asked whether the interference was entirely necessary in the sense that a less intrusive means was available – one that would have invaded the right more minimally. As Chapter 2 indicated, and as discussed at various points in this book,[576] Strasbourg has employed a range of proportionality tests, some of them allowing for a far from hard-edged scrutiny.

In describing judicial reasoning in this way it is accepted that, clearly, a judge does not necessarily consciously decide that deference is appropriate, and then go on to select a proportionality test that will deliver the desired result; moreover, every stage of the reasoning process may be redolent of deference. In Brown v Stott,[577] for example, considered below, the reason for adopting a restrained approach to the Strasbourg jurisprudence was that the judges were minded to accord deference to the decision-maker. In some instances the second and third stages collapse into each other in the sense that having decided that a decision is outwith the area of judicial competence, a court may proceed to refuse to conduct a proportionality exercise at all; it is suggested that this occurred in Pro-Life Alliance, discussed below.[578] But unpacking the stages of the reasoning in this fashion has its uses in seeking to tease out the processes that are in reality occurring.

575 See Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza [2003] 2 WLR 478; [2002] 4 All ER 1162; [2004] 2 A.C. 557 (HL) in relation to the need for a connection between Arts 8 and 14; the determination that a tenuous connection was sufficient could be viewed as extending the ambit of Art 14. See further Baker, A, The Enjoyment of Rights and Freedoms: a New Conception of the Ambit under Article 14 ECHR, (2006) 69 MLR 714, and see further Chapter 15, pp 1525–26.

576 See Chapter 5, p 414 and Chapter 6, pp 539–41.

577 [2001] 2 WLR 817, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. See, for the Scottish decision, Stott v Brown 2000 SLT 379; see also, for discussion, Kerrigan [2000] J Civ Lib 193.

578 See pp 274–75.

A minimalist approach

At the first stage, a restrained approach to the ambit of a right may be adopted. For example, in Pro-Life Alliance,[579] in relation to the banning of the party's election video from broadcasting, Lord Hoffmann said:

> First, the primary right protected by article 10 is the right of every citizen not to be prevented from expressing his opinions. He has the right to "receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority". In the present case, that primary right was not engaged. There was nothing that the Alliance was prevented from doing (emphasis in original).

This narrow view of Art 10(1) is critiqued in Chapter 6.[580]

Similarly, in R (on the application of Gillan) v Commissioner of Metropolitan Police,[581] a case concerning a blanket stop and search power introduced as a counter-terrorist measure, Lord Bingham found on the application of Art 5(1) to a stop and search conducted without reasonable suspicion: 'there is no deprivation of liberty. That was regarded by the Court of Appeal as "the better view",[582] and I agree'. In other words, a restrained view of the ambit of Art 5 was adopted which meant, it appeared, that stops and searches would be unlikely to fall within it. Article 8(1) was similarly viewed in a restrictive manner:

> I am, however, doubtful whether an ordinary superficial search of the person can be said to show a lack of respect for private life. It is true that "private life" has been generously construed to embrace wide rights to personal autonomy. But it is clear Convention jurisprudence that intrusions must reach a certain level of seriousness to engage the operation of the Convention, which is, after all, concerned with human rights and fundamental freedoms, and I incline to the view that an ordinary superficial search of the person . . . can scarcely be said to reach that level.[583]

Under this approach, it is not stated bluntly that the primary right is inapplicable; rather, its applicability is doubted, leading to an extremely superficial proportionality review when justification for the interference is considered – for which, in Gillan, see below.

If the ambit of the right is not defined in such a way as to exclude, or virtually exclude, the case in question from falling within it, and the justification for interfering with the right is considered, the jurisprudence tends to be applied in an unselective fashion. As Phillipson observes:[584]

579 [2004] 1 AC 185 at paras 55 and 56.
580 pp 533–44.
581 See [2006] UKHL 12. For full discussion see Chapter 11, pp 1119–21.
582 At para 46 of the Court of Appeal judgment.
583 At para 28.
584 Fenwick and Phillipson (2006) op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 2, p 147.

> when judges are minded to carry out a minimalist audit of UK law against Convention law, they merely examine the outcomes of particular cases – even when those decisions were heavily influenced by the doctrine and, comparing the two, declare that because UK law cannot be seen clearly to breach findings of law made in the Strasbourg jurisprudence, there is no breach of the Convention'.

A minimalist judicial approach to the HRA tends to include a full reliance on the margin of appreciation aspects of the Strasbourg jurisprudence, resulting at the third stage, below, in the operation of a restrained review jurisdiction only, in determining issues covered by any 'relevant' jurisprudence. This does not mean openly importing the margin of appreciation doctrine into domestic decision-making; rather, it means applying such aspects regardless of the influence it had had on them. In a sense, it means importing the doctrine by the back door.

An example of adoption of this model in the pre-HRA era was arguably provided by R v Khan.[585] The House of Lords relied on an exclusion of evidence decision at Strasbourg, Schenk v Switzerland,[586] where a very wide margin of appreciation had been allowed, without acknowledging that this was the case. For example, it was said in the Lords in Khan: 'the discretionary powers of the trial judge to exclude evidence march hand in hand with Article 6(1) of the Convention . . . the decision of the Court in Schenk . . . confirms that the use at a criminal trial of material obtained in breach of privacy enshrined in Article 8 does not of itself mean that the trial is unfair.'[587] The House of Lords, therefore, appeared impliedly to reassure itself that sufficiently high standards would be maintained by following Schenk. But the decision in Schenk in fact confirms that admitting evidence obtained due to such a breach is within the margin of appreciation conceded to the national courts; it does not therefore confirm that a domestic practice of so doing meets nationally recognised standards of procedural justice.[588]

In various contexts covered by this book the balance struck in the common law between civil liberties and societal concerns, such as public order, has already been found to accord with the Convention at Strasbourg.[589] Thus the judges are able to find, without adverting to the influence at Strasbourg of the margin of appreciation doctrine, that the national legal system has already achieved the requisite balance within the margin it is allowed at Strasbourg. Under this approach it can be argued that having reviewed aspects of the balance struck in the national law of one or more of the signatory states, Strasbourg is satisfied with it and therefore it is necessary only to ensure that that standard is maintained in any particular instance. A number of examples of this approach in the early post-HRA period are documented in this book.[590] An obvious example in which this stance was taken arose in respect of the exclusion of improperly or illegally obtained non-confession evidence, where the Khan approach was continued;

585 [1997] AC 558.
586 (1988) 13 EHRR 242.
587 [1997] AC 558, p 583, per Lord Nicholls.
588 See, e.g., the decision of the Canadian Supreme Court in R v Burlingham [1995] 2 SCR 206.
589 E.g., in the public order and freedom of assembly context: see Chapter 8, p 691.
590 See, e.g., Chapter 6, pp 534–44.

the common law tradition could be viewed as 'amoral',[591] but it was not out of accord with the Strasbourg one – since Strasbourg had declined to take an interventionist stance to matters of evidence in the member states.[592] Under this approach, a court might ostensibly refuse to apply the margin of appreciation doctrine and yet adopt a restrained stance in some circumstances.

The minimalist approach is most problematic when it is confronted by a much more robust and clearly analogous decision at Strasbourg, adopting a stance opposed to the previous general trend of UK law.[593] This may not arise very frequently, as this book indicates, but it arose in the significant Privy Council decision in Brown v Stott,[594] a decision which, it is suggested, exemplified the minimalist approach in the sense that it required a 'reading down' of the Convention right in question. Brown is discussed more fully in Chapter 12,[595] but it is used as an example of this approach here. In Saunders v UK[596] it was found that, if a penalty formally attaches to silence in questioning by state agents, and the coerced statements are then used in evidence, a breach of Art 6 is almost bound to occur. Section 172 of the Road Traffic Act (RTA) 1988 makes it an offence for motorists not to tell police who was driving their vehicle at the time of an alleged offence. The coerced statement can then be used in evidence at trial for the RTA offence in question.

In Brown, the Law Lords found a way of distinguishing the instant case in the particular circumstances, from Saunders. It was pointed out that s 172 could be distinguished from s 437 of the Companies Act 1985, the provision at issue in Saunders, on a number of grounds, including the degree of coercion and the length of questioning. The Lords did not find that s 172 was incompatible with Art 6 and therefore it was not necessary to rely on s 6(2)(b). The Lords also used an equivalent doctrine, that of according a discretionary area of discretion to the legislature, in coming to its decision. Bearing that doctrine in mind, it was further argued that Art 6 itself does not expressly require that coerced statements should be excluded from evidence and that although a right to freedom from self-incrimination could be implied into it, the right had not been treated at Strasbourg as an absolute right. Following Ex p Kebilene, the Lords relied on decisions to that effect at Strasbourg that had been influenced by the margin of appreciation doctrine. Lord Bingham found: 'Limited qualification of [Art 6] rights is acceptable if reasonably directed by national authorities towards a clear and proper public objective and if representing no greater qualification than the situation calls for'. The objective in question was the laudable one of curbing traffic accidents. On that basis, by importing a form of balancing test into Art 6, it was found that answers given under s 172 could be adduced in evidence at trial.

While it is understandable that the Lords wished to find a method of preserving the effect of s 172, with the aim of serving an important societal interest, it is suggested 591 Zander, M, The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, 1995, p 236. See further Chapter 13, pp 1289–91.

592 See Chapter 13, pp 1291–92.

593 This occurred in Osman v UK (2000) 29 EHRR 245. In criticising the Strasbourg decision, at the time, Lord Hoffman made it clear that he viewed the House of Lords as having a limited role in adjudicating on human rights' issues: 'Human rights and the House of Lords' (1999) 62(2) MLR 159, p 161.

594 [2001] 2 WLR 817, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

595 See pp 1252–53.

596 (1997) 23 EHRR 313; No 19187/91.

that their decision has the effect of undermining the right not to incriminate oneself in Art 6(1), in a range of circumstances. The combination of the uses of the doctrine of deference to the legislature, combined with the use of Strasbourg decisions affected by the margin of appreciation doctrine, led, it is argued, to a decision that affords the right a lesser significance than Strasbourg has accorded it. If the intention had been to balance the rights in Art 6 against a range of societal interests, a paragraph could have been included, as in Arts 8–11, setting out the exceptions and the tests to be applied in using them. Alternatively, a general exception could have been included, as in section 1 of the Canadian Charter. The decision not to adopt either of these courses implies that there is little or no room for the use of implied exceptions. In so far as Strasbourg has suggested that the Art 6 rights are qualified, the Lords should have considered whether adoption of that stance was due to the use of the doctrine of the margin of appreciation.

Thus, in approaching decisions at Strasbourg not heavily influenced by the doctrine, a court, following notions of common law restraint expressed in a manner similar to the Kebilene 'area of discretionary judgment' doctrine, might find that it could adopt a cautious interpretation to Strasbourg decisions if to do so appeared to be in accordance with common law tradition. As Chapter 5 argues, an example is provided by Camelot Group Ltd v Centaur Communications[597] in the Court of Appeal in which a restrained approach to the Strasbourg decision in Goodwin v United Kingdom[598] – a decision in which the margin of appreciation conceded was very narrow – was taken.

At the second stage, the court tends to identify reasons for restraint in the particular context. Signs of judicial adherence to a minimalist approach to the Convention by way of a domestic doctrine of deference were found in Ex p Kebilene.[599] Lord Hope said:

> This technique [the margin of appreciation] is not available to the national courts when they are considering Convention issues arising within their own countries [but] . . . In some circumstances it will be appropriate for the courts to recognise that there is an area of judgment within which the judiciary will defer, on democratic grounds, to the considered opinion of [the democratic body or person] whose act or decision is said to be incompatible with the Convention.

In the context of the case, which concerned the compatibility of primary terrorist legislation with the Convention, these findings were used to justify a deferential approach. Indeed, they sought to introduce qualifications into a guarantee which on its face was unqualified. The term used by Lord Hope to describe the area in which choices between individual rights and societal interests might arise was 'the discretionary area of judgment';[600] he found that it would be easier for such an area of judgment to be recognised:

597 [1998] EMLR 1; [1999] QB 124.

598 (1966) 22 EHRR 123.

599 [1999] 3 WLR 172; [2000] AC 326. The Lord Chief Justice, Lord Bingham, had found that the provisions in question undermined the presumption of innocence under Art 6(2) 'in a blatant and obvious way' due to the use of presumptions and the possibility of conviction on reasonable suspicion falling short of proof under the PTA, s 16A, as amended. See further Chapter 14, pp 1347–51.

600 First coined by Pannick, D, 'Principles of interpretation of Convention rights under the Human Rights Act and the discretionary area of judgement' [1998] PL 545, pp 549–51.

> where the Convention itself requires a balance to be struck, much less so where the right [as in Art 6(2)] is stated in terms which are unqualified . . . But even where the right is stated in [such] terms . . . the courts will need to bear in mind the jurisprudence of the European Court which recognises that due account should be taken of the special nature of terrorist crime and the threat which it poses to a democratic society.[601]

In support of his balancing approach, Lord Hope referred to Lord Woolf's findings in AG of Hong Kong v Lee Kwong-kut.[602] Lord Woolf considered the Canadian approach when applying the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s 1 of which states that the rights and freedoms which it guarantees are: 'subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.' He said: 'In a case where there is real difficulty, where the case is close to the borderline, regard can be had to the approach now developed by the Canadian courts in respect of section 1 of their Charter.'

The approach of Lord Hope towards the development of a broad domestic doctrine of deference was therefore based on a watering down of the Convention rights since a provision equivalent to s 1 of the Charter was omitted from the basic Convention rights under Arts 2–7. A somewhat similar approach was taken in R v Chief Constable of Sussex ex p International Ferry Traders Ltd.[603] The decision was taken in the context of EC, not Convention, law but the principles referred to were the familiar ones. Lord Slynn, in a speech with which the other Law Lords agreed, found: 'the courts have long made it clear that . . . they will respect the margin of appreciation or discretion which a Chief Constable has', and, in this instance, that margin had not been exceeded. Lord Hoffmann found:

> on the particular facts of this case the European concepts of proportionality and margin of appreciation produce the same result as what are commonly called Wednesbury principles . . . in this case I think that the Chief Constable must enjoy a margin of discretion that cannot differ according to whether its source be found in purely domestic principles or superimposed European principles.

In other words, it is possible to discover, as in Khan and Kebilene,[604] a judicial approach under which traditional notions of deference on expertise grounds to executive bodies or to Parliament may be coterminous with the expression of the margin of appreciation doctrine, or that Strasbourg principles happen to yield the same result as Wednesbury ones. Thus, a court may find that, having relied on Strasbourg case law, affected by the margin of appreciation doctrine, in order to determine what the law is that is to be applied, still further deference can then be built into the decision at the second stage of reasoning, since it is found to be possible, following Strasbourg principle, to afford the decision-maker a 'margin of appreciation'. In the early post-HRA period, it 601 He gave the example of the ruling of the Court in Murray v UK (1994) 19 EHRR 193, p 222, para 47.

602 [1993] AC 951, p 966.

603 [1999] 1 All ER 129; [1999] 2 AC 418.

604 [1999] 3 WLR 172; discussed in Chapter 14.

became apparent that the judiciary were continuing to find that certain matters, most obviously those relating to national security, were peculiarly matters for Parliament and the institutional body in question to determine. Gillan provides an obvious example of that tendency, in relation to the decision of the police officers on the ground[605] as, it is argued, does Pro-Life Alliance[606] in relation to both Parliament and the BBC acting as regulator. In Pro-Life the House of Lords had to consider rules on taste and decency contained in the Broadcasting Act 1990 and the BBC's decision, taking account of those rules and acting in its self-regulatory capacity, not to broadcast the video showing graphic pictures of abortion.

In Pro-Life Lord Hoffmann began by expounding the legal principles on which, he said, decision-making powers are allocated to different branches of government:

> The courts are the independent branch of government and the legislature and executive are, directly and indirectly respectively, the elected branches of government. Independence makes the courts more suited to deciding some kinds of questions and being elected makes the legislature or executive more suited to deciding others. The allocation of these decision-making responsibilities is based upon recognised principles. The principle that the independence of the courts is necessary for a proper decision of disputed legal rights or claims of violation of human rights is a legal principle. It is reflected in Article 6 of the Convention. On the other hand, the principle that majority approval is necessary for a proper decision on policy or allocation of resources is also a legal principle. Likewise, when a court decides that a decision is within the proper competence of the legislature or executive, it is not showing deference. It is deciding the law.[607]

He went on to find that the decision made by Parliament in imposing standards of taste and decency was an entirely proper decision for it as representative of the people to make. He further found that the decision of the broadcasters was one that they were entitled to make; he said: 'Once one accepts that [they] were entitled to apply generally accepted standards, I do not see how it is possible for a court to say that they were wrong.'[608] Thus Lord Hoffmann insisted that as a matter of law the decision was not within the competence of a court but within that of Parliament. He further appeared to view it as outwith the courts' competence, as a legal principle, to interfere with the decision of the BBC as a regulator. This stance did not, it is argued, take account of the courts' own role under s 6 HRA to ensure that the Convention rights – in this case Art 10 – are not infringed. It also avoided the question whether, assuming that the BBC is a functional public function authority and acting in its public function when it took the decision not to broadcast the video,[609] the BBC had fully adhered to Art 10. It was not enough to note that the BBC had taken account of the value of political expression in deciding to ban the video; the question whether they had adhered to Art 10 was for the court to decide. The decision was so determinedly deferential that the basic

605 See pp 1119–21.
606 [2004] 1 AC 185 at paras 55 and 56.
607 At para 76.
608 At para 79.
609 See above pp 216–18, 233–35.

point as to the legal effect of s 6 HRA was missed and the courts' role as guardian of the Convention rights was, it is argued, not discharged. Lord Hoffmann's point that a court, in allocating competencies to different spheres of government, 'is deciding the law' ignores the fact that that determination has already been made by s 6.

A somewhat similar approach was taken in R (SB) v Denbigh High School.[610] While, under the activist stance discussed below, the courts are adopting a nuanced approach to the notion of deference to Parliament or the executive, they are prepared to show deference where the decision-maker appears to have weighed up the competing considerations in an effective fashion due to its special expertise. In that instance the House of Lords had to consider whether a school had breached Art 9 in refusing to allow the 16-year-old Muslim schoolgirl-claimant to wear the stricter jilbab form of dress which contravened its uniform policy. The Lords concluded that the school was fully justified in maintaining its policy. Lord Bingham found:[611]

> [T]he school . . . had taken immense pains to devise a uniform policy which respected Muslim beliefs but did so in an inclusive, unthreatening and uncompetitive way. The rules laid down were as far from being mindless as uniform rules could ever be. The school had enjoyed a period of harmony and success to which the uniform policy was thought to contribute. On further enquiry it still appeared that the rules were acceptable to mainstream Muslim opinion. It was feared that acceding to the respondent's request would or might have significant adverse repercussions. It would in my opinion be irresponsible of any court, lacking the experience, background and detailed knowledge of the head teacher, staff and governors, to overrule their judgment on a matter as sensitive as this. The power of decision has been given to them for the compelling reason that they are best placed to exercise it, and I see no reason to disturb their decision.

Although it is argued that the House of Lords was right to reject the over-formalistic approach of the Court of Appeal which had demanded that the school follow a Convention-based procedure in reaching its decision, it is argued that the House of Lords itself still had to decide, under s 6, whether the decision of the school was correct in terms of proportionality under Art 9(2). Lord Bingham's approach, it is suggested, comes too close to abdicating responsibility for making that decision.

At the third stage of the reasoning process, where the Strasbourg jurisprudence applies a weak proportionality review, close to ensuring only that the view taken of the need for a particular restriction was not unreasonable, a domestic court fully applying it, including its margin of appreciation aspects, will find itself able to defer to the judgment of the executive. Clearly, this approach is distinguishable from that 610 [2006] 2 WLR 719 para 30. For discussion of the Court of Appeal decision see: Poole, 'Of headscarves and heresies: The Denbigh High School case and public authority decision making under the Human Rights Act' [2005] PL 685; Linden and Hetherington, 'Schools and Human Rights' [2005] Educational Law Journal 229; Davies, 'Banning the Jilbab: Reflections on Restricting Religious Clothing in the Light of the Court of Appeal in SB v Denbigh High School (2005) 1.3 European Constitutional Law Review 511.

611 At para 34.

of heightened Wednesbury unreasonableness,[612] but it may tend to lead to the same outcome.[613] This, it is suggested, was the approach taken, for example, in Alconbury[614] in which it was found that the Wednesbury unreasonableness test satisfies the Strasbourg demand for an effective remedy. As discussed above, the House of Lords came to the view that judicial review could now be viewed as providing a sufficient remedy, owing to the need to consider proportionality under the HRA. But it also considered that even without considering proportionality, judicial review could provide a sufficient remedy in the socio-economic context in question.

The 'third' stage of reasoning in Pro-Life followed logically from the second one. Having decided that 'deference' was appropriate, although he did not use that term, Lord Hoffmann went on to find that the weaker version of 'proportionality' that is sometimes used by Strasbourg, and is closer to Wednesbury or 'heightened' Wednesbury review,[615] may be viewed as appropriate in some contexts. He made this clear in Pro-Life Alliance in stating:

> The test applied in the letter from the Registrar, namely, whether the restriction on the content of the PEB was 'arbitrary or unreasonable', seems to me precisely the test which ought to be applied. It is more in accordance with the jurisprudence of the ECHR and a proper analysis of the nature of the right in question than the fundamentalist approach of the Court of Appeal (emphasis added).[616]

Similarly, Moses J in Ismet Ala v Secretary of State for the Home Department[617] said:

> It is the Convention itself and, in particular, the concept of proportionality which confers upon the decision maker a margin of discretion in deciding where the balance should be struck between the interests of an individual and the interests of the community. A decision-maker may fairly reach one of two opposite conclusions, one in favour of a claimant, the other [against him]. Of neither could it be said that the balance had been struck unfairly. In such circumstances, the mere fact that an alternative but favourable decision could reasonably have been reached will not lead to the conclusion that the decision- maker has acted in breach of the claimant's human rights. Such a breach will only occur where the decision is outwith the range of reasonable responses to the question as to where a fair balance lies between the conflicting interests.

612 See Ministry of Defence ex p Smith and Others [1996] 1 All ER 257, p 263.

613 It could collapse into it if in some instances a test of 'reasonableness' rather than of necessity and proportionality was adopted under the cloak of using the terminology of proportionality. Gillan arguably provides an example of this tendency. Beatty suggests that this has occurred in Canada under the Charter: see Beatty, D, 'The Canadian Charter of Rights: lessons and laments' [1997] 60(4) MLR 487, p 493.

614 R v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions ex p Holding & Barnes Plc (Alconbury) [2001] 2 WLR 1389, HL.

615 See Chapter 3, pp 128–30.

616 At para 72.

617 [2003] EWHC 521 at para 44.

As Chapters 8, 11 and 14 point out, courts have traditionally shown deference to decisions of the police regarding public order and national security.[618] At this third stage the proportionality test chosen by Lord Bingham in Gillan in considering the interference with the Art 8 guarantee was strongly reflective of that traditional stance:

> If, again, the lawfulness of the search is assumed at this stage, there can be little question that it is directed to objects recognised by article 8(2). The search must still be necessary in a democratic society, and so proportionate. But if the exercise of the power is duly authorised and confirmed, and if the power is exercised for the only purpose for which it may permissibly be exercised (i.e. to search for articles of a kind which could be used in connection with terrorism: section 45(1)(a)), it would in my opinion be impossible to regard a proper exercise of the power, in accordance with Code A, as other than proportionate when seeking to counter the great danger of terrorism.[619]

Clearly, there is no real proportionality review here.

In Gillan Arts 10(2) and 11(2) received an even more cursory treatment, bearing in mind that the stop and search affected persons reporting on or going to a protest at an arms fair. In this instance, even in terms of lip-service, proportionality vanished from the analysis completely:

> The power to stop and search under sections 44–45 may, if misused, infringe the Convention rights to free expression and free assembly protected by articles 10 and 11 . . . I find it hard to conceive of circumstances in which the power, properly exercised in accordance with the statute . . . could be held to restrict those rights in a way which infringed either of those articles. But if it did . . . I would expect the restriction to fall within the heads of justification provided in articles 10(2) and 11(2).[620]

As Chapter 11 argues, Lord Bingham was unwilling to constrain the exercise of the police discretion to stop persons, even where there was nothing to suggest a connection with terrorism, in any way.[621] Jeffrey Jowell has described certain dicta of Lord Hoffman as 'heavy with deference'.[622] The findings of Lord Bingham in Gillan, at every stage in the reasoning, could equally be described as redolent of deference.

It might appear that a minimalist approach would provide a little more protection for human rights than was provided under pre-HRA judicial review principles, since the domestic courts in theory have to consider proportionality, not merely Wednesbury reasonableness. The court might be expected to ask whether an interference goes beyond the aim in question, or whether evidence of the need for it has been advanced by the state. But Lord Bingham's approach in Gillan demonstrates that proportionality review

618 See, e.g., pp 1337, 1347–51, 1425–26.
619 At para 29.
620 At para 30.
621 See pp 1119–21; see also p 726.
622 'Judicial Deference: servility, civility or institutional capacity?' [2004] PL 592, 600.

can readily be rendered an empty exercise. Minimalist approaches under the HRA are discussed further in Chapters 5 and 14.[623]

Activism

An approach that takes a more expansive stance towards the Convention rights may be termed activist. Such an approach might be viewed as continuing the activism shown in developing a common law of human rights in the pre-HRA era, as discussed in Chapter 3.[624] Such an approach assumes that the common law recognises and upholds fundamental human rights[625] and that therefore, an approach which takes an activist stance towards such rights under the HRA is in accordance with UK legal tradition. But it recognises that a constitutional shift has occurred since the HRA has placed the courts under a legal duty, in s 6, to uphold the Convention rights, even in circumstances in which deference has been accorded.

At the first stage of reasoning, under an activist approach, a court is wary of applying decisions at Strasbourg that are heavily influenced by the margin of appreciation doctrine, looking instead to fundamental Convention principles. Strasbourg has found that the purpose of the Convention is to 'maintain and promote the ideals and values of a democratic society',[626] which include tolerance of views offensive to the majority,[627] and to provide 'rights that are practical and effective' rather than 'rights that are theoretical or illusory'.[628] These concepts have not always found expression in practice, partly due to the diluting effect of the margin of appreciation doctrine. But in support of the 'activist' approach, it can be pointed out that much of the more deferential Strasbourg jurisprudence is very heavily influenced by decisions of the Commission, which, as indicated in Chapter 2, is not a fully judicial body[629] and therefore has less authority than the Court. It is in accordance with the Strasbourg principles to have regard to the balance struck between individual rights and societal interests in other European courts, and perhaps also to that struck by the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and in other jurisdictions, including the US or Canada. By so doing, it may be possible to determine what the outcome of a decision at Strasbourg would have been had a lesser or no margin been conceded to the state. Human rights jurisprudence from other jurisdictions can clearly prove valuable where the Strasbourg

623 See, e.g., Chapter 5, pp 373–79.

624 See pp 127–33.

625 It may be noted that s 11 HRA affords recognition to the protection for fundamental rights already achieved under the common law, in providing that reliance on a Convention right does not restrict existing rights or freedoms, or a person's right to make any claim 'which he could make or bring apart from ss 7–9'.

626 Kjeldsen v Denmark (1976) 1 EHRR 711, p 731; see also the comments of the Court in Socialist Party v Turkey (1998) 27 EHRR 51 as to the need for pluralism in a democracy.

627 In Handyside v UK (1976) 1 EHRR 737, para 49 the Court said: '[Article 10] . . . is applicable not only to "information" or "ideas" that are favourably received or regarded as inoffensive . . . but also to those which offend, shock or disturb the state or any sector of the population. Such are the demands of that pluralism, tolerance and broadmindedness without which there is no "democratic society".'

628 Airey v Ireland (1979) 2 EHRR 305, p 314.

629 Chapter 2, pp 22–23.

jurisprudence is exiguous, which is frequently the case. Indeed, the domestic courts showed a willingness pre-HRA to take such jurisprudence into account.[630]

A national court which afforded greater protection to the substantive rights than accorded at Strasbourg could not exceed the margin conceded to the state, unless two fundamental Convention rights came into conflict. The rejection in the Lords during debate on the Human Rights Bill of a Conservative amendment which would have required that the Strasbourg jurisprudence should be binding on the UK courts also lends support to this argument. In rejecting the amendment the government spokesperson, the Lord Chancellor, implied, as discussed above in relation to s 2 HRA,[631] that the possibility would thereby be left open of applying higher standards than those applied at Strasbourg.[632] A further Conservative amendment to the Bill, which was also rejected, sought to ensure that the domestic judiciary would be obliged to adhere to the margin of appreciation doctrine in interpreting and applying the Convention. Any domestic judge uncertain whether to disregard a Commission decision on admissibility or a deferential decision of the Court can therefore find some justification under the Pepper v Hart[633] doctrine for so doing. The rejection of these two amendments suggests that the judiciary have a discretion under the HRA to afford greater weight to the Convention rights than Strasbourg affords, although they are not placed under an obligation to do so. It follows, it may be argued, that this approach allows the HRA to recognise the difference between the roles of a national and an international court, and in particular the need for the latter, but not the former, to take a sensitive approach to varying cultural standards and practices in the member states.

Clearly, the leading decisions on s 2, Ullah[634] and Price,[635] place, as discussed above, a very significant constraint on this possibility. But where no clear and constant Strasbourg jurisprudence stands in the way, the courts have some leeway to give a lead to Strasbourg. Under this approach, judges could regard themselves, where such leeway applies, as able to go somewhat beyond the minimal standards applied in the Strasbourg jurisprudence,[636] given that Strasbourg's view of itself as a system of protection firmly subsidiary to that afforded by national courts has led it in certain contexts to intervene only where clear and unequivocal transgressions have occurred. Such a stance recognises that the national authorities have not always been required to demonstrate convincingly that the test of 'pressing social need' has been met, or conducted any meaningful analysis of the proportionality of the particular measures taken to restrict the expression in question.[637]

630 In Albert Reynolds v Times Newspapers [1999] 4 All ER 609, the House of Lords took into account authorities from Canada, Australia and New Zealand, although they found that the Strasbourg jurisprudence was more influential.

631 See pp 193–96.

632 'The Bill would of course permit UK courts to depart from existing Strasbourg decisions and upon occasion it might well be appropriate to do so and it is possible they might give a successful lead to Strasbourg.' HL Deb Col 514, 18 November 1997.

633 [1993] AC 593; [1993] 1 All ER 42.

634 See p 193 above.

635 See p 197 above.

636 In the words of Judge Martens, '[the task of domestic courts] goes further than seeing that the minimum standards laid down in the ECHR are maintained' ('Opinion: Incorporating the Convention: The Role of the Judiciary' [1998] 1 EHRLR 3).

637 See Chapter 2, e.g. at pp 84–85.

It tends to require consideration to be given primarily to the core principles developed at Strasbourg as underlying the Convention rights, rather than following specific decisions, whether as to admissibility or otherwise. But, in contrast to Lord Hope's approach in Ex p Kebilene, it would use such principles to enhance rather than constrain the utilisation of the rights. As Laws LJ observed in Runa Begum v Tower Hamlets London Borough Council:[638]

> the court's task under the HRA . . . is not simply to add on the Strasbourg learning to the corpus of English law, as if it were a compulsory adjunct taken from an alien source, but to develop a municipal law of human rights by the incremental method of the common law, case by case, taking account of the Strasbourg jurisprudence as HRA s 2 enjoins us to do.

As far as the second stage of reasoning under this approach is concerned, it is argued that the courts are developing a nuanced stance towards the notion of deference that, in contrast to the minimalist approach at this stage, allows them to satisfy their role under s 6 HRA, even in relation to matters traditionally viewed as particularly within the purview of the government or Parliament, including matters of national security or social policy. The stance taken in Pro-Life by Lord Hoffmann – that certain matters are allocated to different branches of government on the basis of legal principle – has been rejected, although Pro-Life has not been expressly overruled. The courts have taken the stance that the democratic quality of the rights-infringing rule can be considered: legislation should be treated with greater deference than executive decisions,[639] but in very recent decisions, as discussed below, they have refined that stance. Precisely what deference might require under this nuanced approach is considered below.

At this point the argument that the HRA itself represents a choice as to the division of responsibility between Parliament and the judiciary for resolving moral and political issues should be considered. Under it, it can be argued, judicial activism is inherently limited as a result of the attempt to reconcile conflicting constitutional aims that lies at the heart of the HRA. Lord Steyn has said, 'It is crystal clear that the carefully and subtly drafted [HRA] preserves the principle of parliamentary sovereignty.'[640] Klug concludes:[641] 'The issue of judicial deference to the legislature was settled through the intersection of [ss 3 and 4]. If they are applied as intended, no further doctrine of judicial deference to the legislature . . . is required.'[642] However, the arguments put forward in this chapter have sought to problematise Lord Steyn's stance, to an extent. If, as argued here, the constitutional reality of the HRA is that in practice the carefully and subtly drafted HRA mechanisms are on the whole not being used in a manner that fully preserves the principle of parliamentary sovereignty, then a degree of deference to the legislature does retain a role under it. As already noted, s 3, not s 4, is now accepted as the prime remedial mechanism of the HRA.[643] This point must 638 [2002] 2 All ER 668 at para 17.

639 See International Transport Roth Gmbh v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] 3 WLR 344.

640 R v DPP ex p Kebilene [2000] 2 AC 326, 327.

641 'Judicial Deference under the Human Rights Act' (2003) 2 EHRLR 125.

642 Ibid, p 128.

643 See pp 184–86 above.

not be over-stated since the power under s 3 does have limits, as described above, but this argument would support the stance that the judges appear to be taking in certain very recent decisions under the activist approach.

Lord Steyn's argument would support a refusal to accord any deference at all to the legislature. The senior judges are not currently taking that stance. Instead, a more subtle and differentiated version of deference is being developed, which builds in safeguards against the excessive servility seen in pre-HRA decisions. Section 6 HRA itself guards against the stance taken in Pro-Life, and, as discussed below, Lord Bingham has recently expressly given a reminder of the straightforward effect of s 6 – to examine whether the executive in its decision-making has adhered to the Convention rights. Sections 3 and 4 go some way towards delineating constitutional roles, but the HRA failed to create in s 6(1) itself any nuanced method of addressing the issue of deference. The current version of deference seen in the decisions below avoids the extremes of excessive activism, based on the argument that the HRA itself has already allocated institutional competencies, or excessive deference, flowing from a disregard for the straightforward, face-value meaning of s 6 (perhaps on the basis that taken literally it was initially too radical a change for the judges to accept).[644]

Simon Brown LJ in International Transport Roth GmbH v Secretary of State for the Home Department[645] made a clear statement as to the effect of s 6 in finding that: '. . . the court's role under the 1998 Act is as the guardian of human rights. It cannot abdicate this responsibility.' He further observed:

> But judges nowadays have no alternative but to apply the Human Rights Act 1998. Constitutional dangers exist no less in too little judicial activism as in too much. There are limits to the legitimacy of executive or legislative decision-making, just as there are to decision-making by the courts.[646]

Lord Nicholls' findings in Ghaidan are to similar effect in relation to a claim based firmly on core Convention values but within the social policy area in which pre-HRA a deferential stance would probably have been adopted:

> arguments based on the extent of the discretionary area of judgment accorded to the legislature lead nowhere in this case . . . Parliament is charged with the primary responsibility for deciding the best way of dealing with social problems. The court's role is one of review. The court will reach a different conclusion from the legislature only when it is apparent that the legislature has attached insufficient importance to a person's Convention rights. The readiness of the court to depart from the view of the legislature depends upon the subject matter of the legislation and of the complaint. National housing policy is a field where the court will be less ready to intervene. Parliament has to hold a fair balance between the competing interests of tenants and landlords, taking into account broad issues of social and economic policy. But, even in such a field, where the alleged violation comprises 644 See the analysis of Leigh, I.,, 'Taking Rights Proportionality: Judicial Review, the Human Rights Act and Strasbourg' [1997] PL 265.

645 [2003] QB 728, para 27.

646 At para 54.

> differential treatment based on grounds such as race or sex or sexual orientation the court will scrutinise with intensity any reasons said to constitute justification. The reasons must be cogent if such differential treatment is to be justified.
>
> In the present case the only suggested ground for according different treatment to the survivor of same sex couples and opposite sex couples cannot withstand scrutiny. Rather, the present state of the law as set out in paragraph 2 of Schedule 1 of the Rent Act 1977 may properly be described as continuing adherence to the traditional regard for the position of surviving spouses, adapted in 1988 to take account of the widespread contemporary trend for men and women to cohabit outside marriage but not adapted to recognise the comparable position of cohabiting same sex couples. I appreciate that the primary object of introducing the regime of assured tenancies and assured shorthold tenancies in 1988 was to increase the number of properties available for renting in the private sector. But this policy objective of the Housing Act 1988 can afford no justification for amending paragraph 2 so as to include cohabiting heterosexual partners but not cohabiting homosexual partners. This policy objective of the Act provides no reason for, on the one hand, extending to unmarried cohabiting heterosexual partners the right to succeed to a statutory tenancy but, on the other hand, withholding that right from cohabiting homosexual partners. Paragraph 2 fails to attach sufficient importance to the Convention rights of cohabiting homosexual couples.[647]

This was not a case in which there was a doubt as to the Convention protection available since Strasbourg has clearly found that discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation falls within Art 14 read with Art 8.[648] Although the decision was taken in an area of social and economic policy, the underlying thrust of the legislation did not provide a reason, under strict scrutiny, for up-holding the discriminatory rule in question. Close scrutiny was required since the fundamental right to freedom from discrimination was at stake. Lord Nicholls referred to the context and stated that the readiness of the court to depart from the view of the legislature is affected by the particular context in question. But in fact it is difficult to see that the context had any impact on the level of scrutiny to which the provisions and the policy underlying them were subjected. It is argued below that Lord Nicholls' approach, in refusing to accord deference, was appropriate in this context.

A somewhat similar stance was taken by Lord Bingham in A and Others v Secretary of State for the Home Department.[649] But in that instance, in the very sensitive context of national security – one in certain respects more within the area of competence of the executive rather than that of the judiciary – he gave indications as to the circumstances in which a degree of deference would be appropriate. Rather than accept that deference should be paid to the legislature or executive in a general sense, he considered that different institutional competences might make degrees of deference appropriate. He considered that the Home Secretary was entitled to take the view that an emergency situation was in being, on the basis that a degree of deference should be paid on the grounds of 'institutional competence,' in the sense that the Home Secretary had to make an essentially political judgment. Nevertheless, he went on to find that the measures taken to meet it were disproportionate to the aims pursued. As indicated below, he refused to accept the full claim made for deference:

647 At paras 20 and 21.
648 See Chapter 15, pp 1519–21.
649 [2005] 2 WLR 87; [2005] 3 All ER 169.

> . . . I would accept that great weight should be given to the judgment of the Home Secretary, his colleagues and Parliament on this question, because they were called on to exercise a pre-eminently political judgment. It involved making a factual prediction of what various people around the world might or might not do . . . It would have been irresponsible not to err, if at all, on the side of safety. As will become apparent, I do not accept the full breadth of the Attorney General's argument on what is generally called the deference owed by the courts to the political authorities. It is perhaps preferable to approach this question as one of demarcation of functions or what Liberty in its written case called "relative institutional competence". The more purely political (in a broad or narrow sense) a question is, the more appropriate it will be for political resolution and the less likely it is to be an appropriate matter for judicial decision. The smaller, therefore, will be the potential role of the court . . . The present question seems to me to be very much at the political end of the spectrum:[650] . . . the appellants have shown no ground strong enough to warrant displacing the Secretary of State's decision on this important threshold question.[651]

The findings in these three decisions suggest that the courts are taking their role as guardians of the Convention rights under s 6 HRA seriously. Taking account also of his findings below, Lord Bingham, while accepting that deference may be accorded, is, to an extent, seeking to unpack the reasons for it, the areas to which it extends, and its extent within those areas. His findings indicate that where deference is demanded due to the very political nature of a security-based decision, that does not mean that deference should be extended equally to all aspects of that decision. He therefore created differentiation in terms of the deference to be accorded to the threshold decision as to the existence of an emergency and to the decision as to the measures required to be adopted to meet it.

These decisions indicate that the discretionary area of judgment accorded to the executive or legislature is narrowing considerably, in some contexts almost to vanishing point, which is in accordance with s 6 HRA. Clearly, if a court accepts that a decision-maker is acting within a discretionary area of judgment, and then proceeds as a result to choose a weak proportionality test, then it is deliberately disabling itself from being able to discover whether the rights-infringing decision was genuinely necessary. Since the Convention itself allows for exceptions to the rights, the building in of further deference is unnecessary, except where there are compelling reasons to do so, such as that, in the national security context, the decision-maker is in possession of sensitive information not available to the judiciary. Even then, as Lord Bingham indicated, aspects of the 650 In this finding he relied on Secretary of State for the Home Department v Rehman [2001] UKHL 47, [2003] 1 AC 153, para 62, per Lord Hoffmann.

651 At para 29.

decision can still be subjected to a more rigorous proportionality test. It should be noted, however, that Lord Bingham was referring, in somewhat more delphic fashion, to the intensely political nature of certain decisions rather than to the possession of sensitive information. Clearly, considerations relating to the political nature of decisions relating to national security or the possession of sensitive information were not applicable in Ghaidan, and therefore the stance taken was in accordance with the role accorded to the judges under the HRA.

At this point the problem of unbridled judicial activism should be addressed. If the judges are putting their s 6 duty fully into practice, and in reality they are relatively unconstrained by the HRA scheme under ss 3 and 4, over-activism could become apparent. It has already been argued that R v A[652] may provide an example. It could have the effect, in certain contexts, of imposing particular moral views on individuals and thereby infringing their Convention rights. The example of abortion was used by the Lord Chancellor in Parliamentary debate on the Human Rights Bill in order to illustrate the possibilities which might arise. In that scenario, if activism was simply taken to mean a requirement to 'read up' the Convention rights, and if necessary to 'read down' the domestic statute, the ideological views of particular judges could be given expression by means of the HRA. Under the Lord Chancellor's example, that could mean affording the Abortion Act 1967, as amended, a very restrictive interpretation (which would not be difficult, given its potentially limited application) and reading up the right to life under Art 2. The government would probably subsequently bring forward legislation to restore the broader application of the Act,[653] but there might be a period of time during which the social effects of the judgment were strongly apparent.

However, at Strasbourg, Art 2, the right to life guarantee, does not prevent abortion, since the Commission has declined to find that the foetus is protected,[654] and the Court has avoided confronting the issue so far.[655] Strasbourg is clearly taking account of the varying abortion laws in the member states which would be severely affected if the foetus was brought within Art 2. Further, the stance so far adopted avoids the conflict of rights, between Arts 8 and 2, that could potentially arise. So at present the abortion issue does not involve a clash of Convention rights. Clearly where the underlying principles at stake can be viewed as entirely opposed, and largely incommensurable, as in this instance, so that a moral choice would have to be taken in an area of irreconcilable

652 [2001] 2 WLR 1546.

653 It may be noted that if the government brought forward such legislation, it would not need to state that it could not issue a declaration of compatibility under s 19 HRA since it would be overruling a precedent of the House of Lords, not the Convention guarantees themselves. As already argued, it is not clear that Art 6 demanded the result in R v A – see above pp 174–77, 187–90.

654 Paton v UK (1981) 3 EHRR 408; H v Norway, No 17004/90 (1992) 73 DR 155.

655 See Vo v France [GC], judgment of 8 July 2004, No 53924/00 in which on unusual facts, the Grand Chamber avoided the question of a foetal right to life within Art 2. D v Ireland No 26499/02, oral hearing on admissibility and merits, 6 September 2005, concerned access to abortion for foetal anomaly, an application made under Arts 3, 8, 10 and 14 of the European Convention. If the case of D had been declared admissible, the Court would then have had to consider whether a denial of access to abortion for foetal anomaly constitutes inhuman and degrading treatment contrary to Art 3, or an interference with a pregnant woman's right to respect for private life under Art 8. D was declared inadmissible on procedural grounds on 13 June 2006. For discussion see Barbara Hewson 'Dancing on the head of a pin? Foetal life and the European Convention' (2005) 13(3) Feminist Legal Studies 363–75.

conflict, Strasbourg prefers to defer to the member states.[656] Where such a difficult choice has to be taken, with such wide-ranging social implications, Strasbourg clearly prefers to leave it to the member states to take it, taking account of particular cultural or religious sensitivities in their own jurisdictions.[657]

At present then, interference with abortion law domestically is unlikely since the duty under s 6 HRA relates to the Convention rights, not to free-standing moral principles. It would be a very radical move to find that Art 2 covered the foetus domestically where Strasbourg had not taken that step. There are reasons for deference to the legislature in the sense that the judiciary is not well placed to assess the wide-ranging social and economic implications of according Art 2 rights to the foetus.[658] But such reasons are currently being rejected in somewhat similar areas of social policy. Adoption of an interventionist stance under s 3 in relation to the Abortion Act is unlikely since the judges would be entering a policy arena, something that they are reluctant to do, as discussed above. Moreover, they would be out of accord with international human rights standards if they did so.[659] However, if in future Strasbourg does find that the foetus is within the ambit of Art 2, it has to be accepted that under an activist stance interference with abortion law would be a possibility.

At the third stage of reasoning under the activist approach the stricter versions of the Strasbourg proportionality tests are adopted. In Smith and Grady v United Kingdom[660] the traditional Wednesbury approach to judicial review was held to afford inadequate protection for the Convention rights. In R (Daly) v Secretary of State for the Home Department[661] it was accepted that the 'domestic courts must themselves 656 An example is provided by Evans v United Kingdom in which the Grand Chamber gave judgment on 11 April 2007. In Evans the claimant and her then partner J commenced fertility treatment when she was told that she had pre-cancerous tumors in both ovaries. She and J signed consent forms to IVF treatment on the understanding that under the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990, either could withdraw consent at any time before the embryos were implanted in her uterus. The couple then attended a clinic, eggs were harvested and fertilised; six embryos were created and put in storage. She then had an operation to remove her ovaries. The relationship subsequently broke up and when J notified the clinic that he was withdrawing his consent, the clinic informed the claimant that it was under an obligation to destroy the embryos. Evans argued that under Art 8 there exists a positive obligation on the state to ensure that a woman who has embarked on treatment for the specific purpose of giving birth to a genetically related child should be permitted to proceed to the implantation of an embryo even though her former partner had withdrawn his consent. She failed to win her case in the domestic courts (Evans v Amicus Healthcare [2005] Fam 1) and also failed at Strasbourg. The Grand Chamber found that an irreconcilable conflict between her interests and those of her partner had arisen and declined to find a breach of Art 8 if the eggs were destroyed on the basis that there is no consensus in the member states on the question when the sperm donor's consent would become irrevocable.

657 See Chapter 2, pp 36–38 and Chapter 6, pp 463–67.

658 See Wilson v First County Trust Ltd (No 2) [2003] 3 WLR 568, 589, para 70.

659 E.g. in R v Morgentaler [1988] 1 SCR 30, the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada which found the abortion provision in the Criminal Code to be unconstitutional, since in placing restrictions on access to abortion it violated a woman's right under section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to 'security of person'. Ever since that ruling, there have been no laws regulating abortion in Canada. See 'Abortion: Ensuring Access' (2006) 175(1) CMAJ.

660 (1999) 29 EHRR 493.

661 [2001] UKHL 26; [2001] 2 WLR 1622; [2001] 2 AC 532; [2001] 3 All ER 433; HL, paras 23, 27. The decision concerned rights of privacy of prisoners in respect of correspondence. See further Steyn, Lord, 'Deference: A Tangled Story' (2005) Public Law 346.

form a judgment whether a Convention right has been breached' and that 'the intensity of review is somewhat greater under the proportionality approach'.

In R(SB) v Denbigh High School[662] Lord Bingham reiterated this principle: '. . . the court's approach to an issue of proportionality under the Convention must go beyond that traditionally adopted to judicial review in a domestic setting. The inadequacy of that approach was exposed in Smith and Grady v United Kingdom[663] and the new approach required under the 1998 Act was described by Lord Steyn in R (Daly) v Secretary of State for the Home Department,[664] in terms which have never to my knowledge been questioned'. There is no shift to a merits review, but the intensity of review is greater than was previously appropriate, and greater even than the heightened scrutiny test adopted by the Court of Appeal in R v Ministry of Defence ex p Smith.[665] The domestic court must now make a value judgment, an evaluation, by reference to the circumstances prevailing at the relevant time: Wilson v First County Trust Ltd (No 2).[666] Proportionality must be judged objectively, by the court: R (Williamson) v Secretary of State for Education and Employment.[667]

The House of Lords in Ex p Daly adopted the relatively rigorous proportionality tests from de Freitas.[668] Following de Freitas, it is first necessary to ask whether a significant and pressing interest, falling within one or more of the exceptions in para 2 of Arts 8–11 has been identified since so doing is part of the threshold test for 'necessity' under para 2. The second and third de Freitas tests cover the issue of proportionality. Under the second it is necessary to consider the suitability of the interference in question – the extent to which it is rationally connected to the aim pursued. (This was the test that Lord Nicholls appeared to have in mind in Ghaidan in finding that the policy objective of the Act did not have a rational connection with creating discrimination against homosexual couples.) The third de Freitas test concerns the need to choose the least intrusive measure – the measure that creates a minimal degree of harm to the primary right consistent with affording protection to the aim pursued. The seriousness of the interference has to be balanced against the importance of the aim sought to be pursued. This is means/end balancing – if there is another way of achieving the aim pursued that is less restrictive, it should be used. This can also be termed 'the least intrusive means' test.

A further test was utilised in Goodwin v UK.[669] In that instance Strasbourg made it clear that in the context in question – source disclosure – the strictest form of scrutiny should be afforded to the application of the tests for proportionality, and the more rigorous version of the test should be deployed due to the strong link between protection of sources and freedom of expression. Goodwin relied largely on speech/harm balancing as the proportionality test.[670] The Court found: 'Having regard to the importance of the 662 [2006] 2 WLR 719 para 30.

663 (1999) 29 EHRR 493, para 138.
664 [2001] 2 AC 532, paras 25–28.
665 [1996] QB 556.
666 [2004] 1 AC 816, paras 62–67.
667 [2005] 2 AC 246, para 51
668 de Freitas v Permanent Secretary of Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries, Lands and Housing [1999] 1 AC 69, 80. This test was also utilized by the Supreme Court of Canada in R v Oakes [1986] 1 SCR 103, paras 69–70.
669 (1996) 22 EHRR 123.
670 See Chapter 5, pp 413–14.

protection of journalistic sources for press freedom in a democratic society . . . such a measure cannot be compatible with article 10 of the Convention unless it is justified by an overriding requirement in the public interest.'[671] As discussed in Chapter 5, the seriousness of the harm caused by the disclosure of the confidential information by the source was weighed up against the weightiness of the expression interest. The Court carefully scrutinised the state's case regarding the degree of harm that the company in question had suffered, and took a view of it that differed significantly from that of the state. It found that the interference was very severe, bearing in mind the significance for free expression of protection for journalistic sources. In coming to this conclusion the Court scrutinised the balance between the two interests very strictly – had it conceded a wider margin of appreciation to the national authorities, it might have adopted a less rigorous standard of review and been satisfied that the balance struck between the two was not manifestly unreasonable. Thus the Court found that the proportionality test had not been met. This test can be termed speech/harm balancing or, more generally, rights/harm balancing. Clearly, the extent to which any balancing could occur would depend on whether the right in question was materially qualified.

In two of the more activist decisions of the House of Lords under the HRA, Laporte[672] and A and Others, the key proportionality test adopted was the relatively hard-edged De Freitas 'least intrusive means' one. In A and Others the second De Freitas test – demanding that the state demonstrate a rational connection between the means employed and the aim pursued – was also relevant, and the rights/harm balancing test used in Goodwin was also relevant, although Goodwin itself was not referred to. Laporte concerned the detention of protesters on a coach which had been turned back by the police from an anti-war demonstration. The House of Lords found, in a seminal decision for freedom of protest and assembly, that the actions of the police in preventing the protesters travelling to the site of the protest and detaining them on a coach travelling back to London, were disproportionate to the aims pursued, in terms of para 2 of Arts 10 and 11. On the question of proportionality, Lord Bingham declined to take a deferential approach to the decision of the police on the ground:

> I would acknowledge the danger of hindsight, and I would accept that the judgment of the officer on the spot, in the exigency of the moment, deserves respect. But making all allowances, I cannot accept the Chief Constable's argument.[673]

Having rejected a fully deferential approach, he went on to find that less intrusive measures could have been taken in that the detention of the protesters had been premature; arrests if necessary could have been made at a later point:

> . . . Nor was it reasonable to anticipate an outburst of disorder on arrival of these passengers in the assembly area or during the procession to the base, during which time the police would be in close attendance and well able to identify and arrest those who showed a violent propensity or breached the conditions to which the

671 At para 39.

672 [2006] UKHL 55, para 34. CA: R (on the application of Laporte) v CC of Gloucester Constabulary [2004] EWCA Civ 1639. See Chapter 8 for discussion at pp 757–71.

673 At para 55.

> assembly and procession were subject. The focus of any disorder was expected to be in the bell-mouth area outside the base, and the police could arrest trouble-makers then and there . . . There was no reason (other than her refusal to give her name, which however irritating to the police was entirely lawful) to view the claimant as other than a committed, peaceful demonstrator. It was wholly disproportionate to restrict her exercise of her rights under articles 10 and 11 because she was in the company of others some of whom might, at some time in the future, breach the peace . . . the claimant was not suspected of having personally committed or of being about to commit any crime, or any breach of the peace.[674]

This was a significantly more intrusive stance than has traditionally been taken in public protest decisions; the common law approach pre-HRA did not fully reflect the Convention since the focus of concern was, broadly, on proprietorial rather than protest rights,[675] and there was a distinct reluctance to interfere with the decisions of police officers unless they were manifestly unreasonable. In Kent v Metropolitan Police Commissioner[676] that most attenuated form of Wednesbury review was adopted. This decision was taken on the basis of affording the Commissioner a very wide margin of discretion to impose a ban leading to the prohibition of a march expected to be entirely peaceful. Similarly, Slynn J (as he was) said 'if the Commissioner took a view of the circumstances which was wholly untenable I consider that the court could intervene'.[677] Under that standard of review the decision of the police to detain the protesters in Laporte could readily have been viewed as not unreasonable.

A and Others, discussed in full in Chapter 14,[678] concerned indefinite detention of non-nationals without trial under ss 21 and 23 of Part 4, Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001, a measure adopted to avert the threat of terrorism, taking account of the fact that the suspects could not be deported due to the risk of Art 3 treatment in the receiving country. Lord Bingham, having found – at the second stage of the reasoning process – that a fully deferential approach would not be appropriate, even in relation to executive decisions taken on grounds of national security in relation to anti-terrorist measures, then went on to adopt a relatively hard-edged proportionality test. Relying on a number of Strasbourg decisions,[679] he noted:[680] 'Even in a terrorist situation the 674 At para 55.

675 See Gray and Gray, 'Civil rights, civil wrongs and quasi-public places' (1999) 1 EHRLR 46, and see further Chapter 8, esp p 719.

676 (1981) The Times, 15 May. The court found that it could not say that the Commissioner was at fault in making the order, although the reasons for it seemed meagre 677 Quoted in Brownlie's Law of Public Order and National Security, 2nd edn, 1981, Butterworths p 52.

678 See pp. 1430 et seq.

679 He relied on Brogan v United Kingdom (1989) 11EHRR 117, para 80; Fox, Campbell & Hartley v United Kingdom, (1990) 13 EHRR 157 paras 32–34. In Aksoy v Turkey (1996) 23 EHRR 553, para 76, he noted that the Court, clearly referring to national courts as well as the Convention organs, held:

> 'The Court would stress the importance of Article 5 in the Convention system: it enshrines a fundamental human right, namely the protection of the individual against arbitrary interference by the state with his or her right to liberty. Judicial control of interferences by the executive with the individual's right to liberty is an essential feature of the guarantee embodied in Article 5(3), which is intended to minimise the risk of arbitrariness and to ensure the rule of law.'

680 At para 41.

Convention organs have not been willing to relax their residual supervisory role'. He further quoted from Korematsu v United States:[681] '. . . in times of distress the shield of military necessity and national security must not be used to protect governmental actions from close scrutiny and accountability.' He therefore went on to find, at the third reasoning stage, that proportionality review was appropriate, and accepted that a relatively strict proportionality test should be used:

> It follows from this analysis that the appellants are in my opinion entitled to invite the courts to review, on proportionality grounds, the Derogation Order and the compatibility with the Convention of section 23 and the courts are not effectively precluded by any doctrine of deference from scrutinising the issues raised.[682]

The appellants founded on the proportionality principles discussed above, adopted by the Privy Council in de Freitas v Permanent Secretary of Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries, Lands and Housing.[683] As to the second test from de Freitas, the appellants argued that ss 21 and 23 of Part 4, Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 did not rationally address the threat to the security of the UK presented by Al-Qaeda terrorists and their supporters because (a) it did not address the threat presented by UK nationals, (b) it permitted foreign nationals suspected of being Al-Qaeda terrorists or their supporters to pursue their activities abroad if there was any country to which they were able to go, and (c) the sections permitted the certification and detention of persons who were not suspected of presenting any threat to the security of the UK as Al-Qaeda terrorists or supporters.

As to the third test from de Freitas – the 'less intrusive means' proportionality test – they argued that if the threat presented to the security of the United Kingdom by UK nationals suspected of being Al-Qaeda terrorists or their supporters could be addressed without infringing their right to personal liberty, it had not been shown why similar measures could not adequately address the threat presented by foreign nationals.[684] In other words, less intrusive means were available, and were being used, which could therefore also have been used against foreign nationals suspected of terrorist activity. Lord Bingham viewed these arguments as to the disproportionality of the Part 4 scheme with the aims pursued as sound.

Lord Bingham's stance in relation to indefinite detention of the appellants further recalled that of the Strasbourg Court in Goodwin in that he was not prepared to accept that the grave intrusion into liberty represented by indefinite detention could be justified by the harm sought to be averted – the terrorist threat:[685]

> In urging the fundamental importance of the right to personal freedom, as the sixth step in their proportionality argument, the appellants were able to draw on the long libertarian tradition of English law, dating back to chapter 39 of Magna 681 584 F Supp 1406 (1984) para 21, per Judge Patel in relation to the Supreme Court's earlier decision (323 US 214 (1944).

682 At para 42.
683 [1999] 1 AC 69, p 80.
684 At para 31.
685 At para 36.

> Carta 1215, given effect in the ancient remedy of habeas corpus, declared in the Petition of Right 1628, upheld in a series of landmark decisions down the centuries and embodied in the substance and procedure of the law to our own day . . . The authors of the Siracusa Principles . . . were of the opinion . . . that . . . 'no person shall be detained for an indefinite period of time, whether detained pending judicial investigation or trial or detained without charge . . .'.

He further referred to the recognition of the 'prime importance of personal freedom' in the Strasbourg jurisprudence, noting: 'the fundamental importance of the guarantees contained in Art 5 for securing the right of individuals in a democracy to be free from arbitrary detention at the hands of the authorities' and the need to interpret narrowly any exception to 'a most basic guarantee of individual freedom'.[686]

Jeffrey Jowell has found that 'the courts are charged by Parliament with delineating the boundaries of a rights-based democracy'.[687] In A and Others and in Laporte a recognition of the courts' role in relation to the core values of the Convention is evident. A purely tokenistic approach to the review of executive decisions is rejected on the basis that this would be an abrogation of the constitutional role accorded to the judges under the HRA. Lord Bingham referred in A and Others to the fact that s 6 of the 1998 Act renders unlawful any act of a public authority, including a court, that is incompatible with a Convention right.[688] Thus, as he found, courts must carry out scrutiny of executive decisions that curtail fundamental rights, even in the sensitive context of national security.

Lord Nicholls captured the role of the courts as the guardians of constitutional rights under the HRA effectively in A and Others in finding:

> I see no escape from the conclusion that Parliament must be regarded as having attached insufficient weight to the human rights of non-nationals. The subject matter of the legislation is the needs of national security. This subject matter dictates that, in the ordinary course, substantial latitude should be accorded to the legislature. But the human right in question, the right to individual liberty, is one of the most fundamental of human rights. Indefinite detention without trial wholly negates that right for an indefinite period.[689]

These two decisions make it plain that where common law tradition had diverged from Strasbourg in developing in a less rights-oriented manner, the HRA has provided the impetus for change, under an activist approach. This approach clearly leads to greater interference with executive decision-making, and departs, to an extent, from common law tradition in so doing. This approach starts from the premise that the reception of the 686 In Kurt v Turkey (1998) 27 EHRR 373, para 122. He also mentioned Garcia Alva v Germany (2001) 37 EHRR 335, para 39, where the Court referred to 'the dramatic impact of deprivation of liberty on the fundamental rights of the person concerned'.

687 See 'Judicial Deference: servility, civility or institutional capacity?' [2003] PL 592, 597'. See also Clayton, 'Judicial deference and 'democratic dialogue': the legitimacy of judicial intervention under the Human Rights Act 1998' [2004] PL 33.

688 At para 42.

689 At para 81.

Convention into UK law represents a decisive break with the past. Activism can occur in accordance with a synthesis of Strasbourg and national constitutional principles. As Beatty puts it:

> the same set of principles and analytical framework . . . are used by [the judiciary] in Washington, Tokyo, New Delhi, Strasbourg, Rome, Karlsruhe . . . [principles] which lie at the core of the concept of constitutional rights that allow judges to act out their role as guardians of the constitution in an objective, determinate and ultimately very democratic way.[690]

7 Scrutiny of the workings of the HRA

Under the Green Paper, Bringing Rights Home, a very significant aspect of the reception of the Convention into domestic law was to be the eventual setting up of a Human Rights Commission. The consultative paper suggested that such a Commission would probably have a number of roles which would include: providing guidance and support to those wishing to assert their rights, along the lines of the role of the Equal Opportunities Commission; instituting proceedings in its own name; scrutinising new legislation to ensure that it conforms with the Convention and monitoring the operation of the new Act.[691] Setting up such a Commission would therefore have been a significant step towards ensuring the efficacy of the Convention, in a number of respects. However, it was not provided for under the HRA. The Belfast Agreement 1998 promised that Northern Ireland would have such a Commission and the Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission came into existence in 1999.[692] The experiment in Northern Ireland provides a model, although the Northern Ireland Commissioner has particular concerns 690 See Beatty, D, 'The Canadian Charter of Rights: lessons and laments' [1997] 60(4) MLR 487, p 481.

691 See Bringing Rights Home: Labour's Plans to Incorporate the ECHR into UK Law: A Consultation Paper, December 1996 (1997), p 11. For discussion of the possible roles of the Commission, see Spence, S and Bynoe, I (1997) 2 EHRR 152; Spencer, S, 'A Human Rights Commission', in Blackburn, R and Plant, R (eds), Constitutional Reform: The Labour Government's Constitutional Reform Agenda, 1999, p 395.

692 It was created by s 68 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998, in compliance with the commitment made by the UK Government in the Belfast (Good Friday) Agreement. The current full-time Chief Commissioner Prof. Monica McWilliams, succeeded the first holder of the office, Prof. Brice Dickson, in 2005. It has a variable number of part-time Commissioners (currently nine). The NIHRC's role is to promote awareness of the importance of human rights in Northern Ireland, to review existing law and practice and to advise the Secretary of State and the Executive Committee of the Northern Ireland Assembly (when it is functioning) on what legislative or other measures ought to be taken to protect human rights in Northern Ireland. The Commission is also able to conduct investigations, and (subject to anticipated legislaton) will soon have new powers to enter places of detention, and to compel individuals and agencies to give oral testimony or to produce documents. The Commission also has the power to assist individuals when they are bringing court proceedings, to intervene in proceedings and to bring court proceedings itself. It receives inquiries from people who believe that their human rights have been violated, and provides training and information on human rights. It is specifically charged with advising on the scope for a Bill of Rights to supplement the European Convention on Human Rights (which is part of the law in Northern Ireland as a result of the passing of the Human Rights Act 1998). It is recognised as a member of the worldwide network of National institutions for human rights. For discussion, see Harvey, C and Livingstone, S, 'Human rights and the Northern Ireland peace process' [1999] EHRLR 162, pp 168–74.

regarding religious discrimination which are not applicable in England and Wales. The decision in the early post-HRA years not to set up a Human Rights Commission, as proposed in the Green Paper, created a clear weakness in the extra-judicial enforcement of the Act.[693]

A Joint Parliamentary Committee on Human Rights (JCHR) was set up under the chairmanship of Professor David Feldman, and now of Murray Hunt, in order, inter alia, to advise on legislation.[694] It has fulfilled a very valuable role. But the responsibility for the extra-judicial promotion and enforcement of the HRA was clearly fragmented between 2000–6. As indicated above, the Human Rights Unit (now the Human Rights Division of the Department for Constitutional Affairs) and the Human Rights Task Force, set up by the Home Office, have a role in providing guidance to public authorities as to their responsibilities under the HRA, and in monitoring their progress. Further responsibility for monitoring the compliance of the key public authorities with the Convention has tended to devolve to existing bodies, all of which are bound by s 6, such as the Police Complaints Authority (now Independent Police Complaints Commission), the Parliamentary Intelligence and Security Committee, the Interception of Communications and Surveillance Commissioners,[695] the EOC, the Commission for Racial Equality and the Disability Rights Commission. It may be argued that the proliferation of such bodies tends to lead to the maintenance of inconsistent standards of human rights.[696]

In March 2003 the JCHR published its report on The Case for a Human Rights Commission.[697] In the Report the JCHR considered that there had not been a rapid development of awareness of a culture of respect for human rights; instead ill-informed and distorted views of the HRA were apparent. The Committeee thought that awareness of human rights was ebbing, rather than developing. It found that:

> the development of a culture of respect for human rights in this country was in danger of stalling, and that there was an urgent need for the momentum to be revived and the project driven forward . . . [the Report] concluded that this task could not be undertaken by the courts alone, and that . . . an independent commission would be the most effective way of achieving the shared aim of bringing about a culture of respect for human rights.[698]

It argued that the original vision that the Human Rights Act should aid in developing a culture of human rights would not be realised through litigation alone. In October 2003 the government announced that it had decided to proceed with the single equality body, and to give it a human rights dimension as well as an equality remit. The government's 693 See Wadham 'The HRA: one year on' [2001] EHRLR 620.

694 See Blackburn, R, 'A Parliamentary Committee on Human Rights', in Blackburn and Plant, ibid

695 See Chapter 10, pp 1039, 1047 for discussion of the current position.

696 See further Beckett, S and Clyde, I, 'A Human Rights Commission for the UK: the Australian Experience' (2000) 2 EHRLR 116.

697 Sixth Report, Session 2002–3, The Case for a Human Rights Commission, HL Paper 67-I and II, HC 489-I and II; see also Twenty-second Report, Session 2001–2, The Case for a Human Rights Commission: Interim Report, HL Paper 160, HC 1142.

698 Sixth Report, Session 2002–3, op. cit., para 99.

written statement announced that the new Commission would '. . . promote a culture of respect for human rights, especially in the delivery of public services'.[699]

As the JCHR pointed out in its Eleventh Report of 2004, the most fundamental issue in relation to the powers and functions of the CEHR is the nature of its human rights remit. The Commission will have a broad human rights mandate and will have a free-standing power to promote human rights. However, it will not have enforcement powers as part of its human rights remit. In the Lords' debate on the JCHR's Sixth Report, Lord Falconer said:

> . . . human rights include but go beyond equality issues. That is to be reflected in the new body: therefore, human rights will not be a seventh strand but will inform and support the six equality strands. It will be a free-standing subject for the body to promote whether or not there is a linked equality issue.[700]

Similarly, in the House of Commons, the Deputy Minister for Women and Equality, just prior to publication of The White Paper: Fairness For All: A New Commission for Equality and Human Rights,[701] Jacqui Smith MP, said:

> . . . we are putting human rights at the heart of the new politics of equality . . . The new body will be able to work to embed a culture of respect for human rights in public services and help public bodies to understand their obligations under the Human Rights Act . . . human rights values will help the new body to balance one person's rights against another's.[702]

The Commission for Equality and Human Rights (CEHR) was set up as a Non-Departmental Public Body (NDPB) under Part 3 Equality Act 2006 and will come into operation in October 2007.[703] As Chapter 15 explains, the CEHR will bring together the work of the three existing equality Commissions discussed in that chapter,[704] as well as taking on new responsibilities in relation to the Human Rights Act. The government's intention is that the CEHR will have a promotional rather than coercive role in relation to human rights. It will have investigatory powers, but in contrast to its powers in relation to equality matters, it will not have special enforcement powers. The new Commission can launch inquiries but not investigations, in respect of human rights matters. As discussed in Chapter 15, investigations are more serious matters since they 699 HC Deb, 30 October 2003, cols 18–20WS.

700 On 16 January 2004, HL Deb, 16 January 2004, Cols 765–66.

701 May 2004, Cm 6185.

702 On 4 March 2004, HC Deb, 4 March 2004, col 1141.

703 See the Equality Act 2006 (Commencement No.1) Order 2006, SI 2006/1082. It may be noted that Scotland will also soon have a Human Rights Commission. The Justice Minister, Jim Wallace, stated in 1999 that he is in favour of a Scottish Human Rights Commission: The Scottish Executive: An Open Scotland, SE/1999/51, November 1999. There are Scottish proposals to set up a Scottish Human Rights Commission (SHRC), and a Bill to that effect was announced by First Minister Jack McConnell in his Statement on the Scottish legislative programme to 2007. As a result, a Scottish 'Commissioner for Human Rights Bill' was introduced in the Scottish Parliament on 7th October 2005.

704 See pp 1595 et seq.

can lead to legal consequences.[705] It will have to publish terms of reference before launching an inquiry, and must publish reports at the end of the process, which could include recommendations for changes to policies, practices or legislation.

The CEHR power to carry out general inquiries means that it can promote improved human rights practice in public authorities. If during an inquiry the Commission suspects that an unlawful act has been committed – a breach of a Convention right by a public authority – it must stop the inquiry, but it cannot launch an investigation. The CEHR has not been given additional enforcement powers relating to the HRA on the somewhat doubtful basis that legal aid is available.[706] If an inquiry reveals that a body appears to be engaging in non-Convention-compliant practices, but no victim is willing to bring an action, the CEHR can merely make a recommendation. It does not appear that it could challenge the practices by way of judicial review in its own name, as discussed below. Assuming that it commenced an investigation on grounds of suspected unlawful discrimination in a public authority, it might find that a suspected breach of Art 14, probably read with Art 8, was also occurring.[707] That would be of some significance if Art 14 in the particular circumstances had a wider ambit than the relevant domestic anti-discrimination instrument. The CEHR is likely to be placed in a difficult position since it appears that it would be expected to close its eyes to Convention breaches while investigating breaches of such instruments.

The CEHR will have an advisory role in relation to individuals and pressure or community groups. Under s 13 of the 2006 Act, which covers its advisory role, it will publish information; undertake research; provide education or training; give advice or guidance. Its guidance could be about the Convention implications of a proposed Bill. The CEHR will also act in an advisory capacity in relation to proposed legislation[708] under s 12. It is intended that it should give Ministers advice or make proposals on any aspect of current or proposed law that relates to any part of its remit.

While the CEHR can advise and assist, it cannot take representative actions on behalf of individuals in either equality or human rights matters. However, the EOC and CRE were able to bring about general changes in discriminatory practices by seeking a direct change in domestic law in reliance on European Union law (Secretary of State for Employment ex p EOC),[709] and the CEHR will be able to do this in much wider range of circumstances in the field of discrimination.[710] Clearly, in respect of its human rights remit the CEHR would not have the same role in relation to EU law. However, it could have sought judicial review of executive actions and decisions that arguably breach the Convention rights[711] were it not for the narrow 'victim' provisions of the HRA which seem to preclude this possibility.

705 See pp 1594–98.

706 White Paper (2004), para 4.2.

707 See Chapter 15, pp 1482–84.

708 See the White Paper Fairness for All (2004) Cm 6185, paras 3.35, 3.36.

709 [1994] All ER 910; [1994] ICR 317.

710 See Chapter 15, pp 1596, 1600.

711 See, e.g., R (Amin) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] 4 All ER 1284 in which a declaration was made that a public inquiry investigation into a death in a Young Offenders' Institution should have been held; the failure of the Home Secretary to do so had created a breach of Art 2.

The JCHR proposed that the Commission, in addition to the power to assist as a friend of the court or to intervene as a third party in significant cases raising questions of public interest relating to human rights, should have an exceptional power to seek judicial review on compliance by public authorities with their duties under the Human Rights Act.[712] The government, however, took the view that the narrow victim provisions of s 7 HRA should remain undisturbed. As argued above, however, when administrative action is purportedly taken under statutory powers, a non-victim group such as the CEHR (assuming that it was viewed as having sufficient interest), who wished to challenge it by way of judicial review could rely on s 3 and argue that the action was ultra vires since the statute did not give powers to the executive to act incompatibly with the Convention rights, unless the statute was irretrievably incompatible with them. The obligation under s 3 is not limited by the s 7(7) test regarding victims.

But as a general comment on its human rights remit, the lack of an investigative power and the inability of the CEHR to rely on the use of judicial review creates, it is argued, a weakness in its ability to ensure adherence to the HRA among public authorities. Nevertheless, it may have some impact in making the case for the HRA to the general public that was not made seven years ago.

8 Conclusions

This book examines the emerging effects of the HRA in various contexts. It argues that its impact is immensely variable, depending on the context, but that it provides a means of reversing the erosion of fundamental freedoms which occurred under the Thatcher, Major, and now Labour Governments in the contexts of public protest, state surveillance and suspects' rights, especially those of terrorist suspects. The Labour Government has in some respects carried on the illiberal traditions of the previous Conservative Governments in showing, in its 'state power' legislation, especially counter-terrorist legislation, a 'corrupting insensitivity to liberty'.[713] The HRA has taken a role in providing a basic protection for human rights in the face of ill-thought out and arguably counter-productive anti-terrorism legislation. In the completely different context of privacy rights asserted against the media, it has provided a very significant impetus to the developments that were already occurring in the pre-HRA era.

The HRA incorporates a set of moral values under the Convention into UK law; the Convention represents a series of moral choices in that some of the rights are absolute, while some have presumptive priority over competing social interests.[714] The Convention jurisprudence employs concepts recognised and developed across the world by judges who may be viewed as defending a particular set of liberal values. These may be employed in a counter-majoritarian fashion in the sense that they aid in the protection of the rights of weak and unpopular groups. But in the case of the HRA, their judicial use 712 Research Paper 05/28: The Equality Bill para 39.

713 Dworkin, R, Index on Censorship (1988) pp 7–8. See also Dworkin, R, A Bill of Rights for Britain? (1988) pp 9–10.

714 The rights fall into three groups: those which are absolute: Arts 3, 4, 6(2), 6(3), 14 and First Protocol Art 3; those which are very narrowly qualified: Arts 2, 5, 6(1), 7, Sixth Protocol Art 1 (read with Art 2) and those which are materially qualified: Arts 8–12, First Protocol Art 1. See further Chapter 2, pp 18, 68.

is subject, theoretically, to the possibility of using the parliamentary override. Under the ECHR exceptions to the rights can only be utilised if both necessary and proportionate, and a number of the rights are not qualified at all or not materially qualified. The ECHR only allows for derogation from the rights in an emergency situation, and even then not from all of the rights.[715] Under the HRA ss 3(2) and 6(2) in theory derogation is completely unconstrained, in accordance with the theory of Parliamentary sovereignty. Further, it is not required in those sections that the demands of proportionality should be satisfied before rights can be abrogated. On a face-value reading of those sections, Parliament is entirely free to pass rights-abridging legislation and the judges must give effect to it if s 3 cannot be utilized to impose compatibility since the infringement of the right is such a fundamental feature of the statute. So on the face of it the HRA represented a compromise between Parliamentary sovereignty and rights-protection that left the rights entirely at the mercy of a government that could command a majority in Parliament. As far as the courts were concerned, the s 4 declaration of incompatibility procedure left the rights to the mercy of an unfettered executive discretion. So, as argued above, a contradiction was created between Parliamentary sovereignty and rights protection: rights were not, apparently, brought home since Parliament could simply override them and the government could disregard declared incompatibility. The HRA itself on its face appeared to be incompatible with the stated aim of reversing erosions of liberty effected via legislative changes in the Thatcher years.

But although the HRA provided mechanisms supposed to allow for an overt resolution of the contradiction between enhanced rights protection and Parliamentary sovereignty – ss 3(2), 6(2), 4, 10, 19 – they have hardly been utilized by the Labour Government.[716] The battle between parliamentary sovereignty and rights protection is playing out much more subtly, in the interpretation given by the judges to s 3 and in the interpretation of 'public function' under s 6. The question whether Parliament has passed rights-abridging legislation is in essence a determination as to which measures satisfy the demands of proportionality. That decision, as a matter of constitutional practice, is now for the judges, not Parliament, to make. The question whether the government can transfer large amounts of public sector resource to the private sector, without imposing Convention obligations on private sector providers, has arguably resolved itself into an issue as to whether judges take an institutional or a functional view of s 6. The government has not passed legislation overtly denying Convention rights to persons whose lives are affected when the accommodation they are living in passes into the private sector. The government has not relied on the HRA to force legislation that is overtly rights-abridging through Parliament, preferring instead to utilise the Convention derogation system.[717] It has not refused to respond to a declaration of incompatibility even though it set up the HRA as a mechanism for so doing. In relying on the ECHR system for creating exceptions to the rights, rather than the HRA one, it has indicated its acceptance of its ECHR obligations.

Thus the moral values captured in the Convention are filtering in to domestic law, essentially without being subject to certain of the overt constraints that the HRA appeared

715 See Chapter 2, pp 110–11.

716 Except in respect of the Communications Act 2003.

717 See, e.g., Chapter 14, pp 1438–42.

to create. The constraints that are apparent are more subtle. They are arguably largely rooted in common law values that are being imposed on the HRA and Convention by the judiciary. This is apparent, as discussed above, in the post-HRA use of deference. The public function question has to an extent been addressed in a manner that reflects a reluctance to constrain market values in the private sector, relying on judicial review principles. Thus s 6 has been quite narrowly interpreted, whereas s 3 has received on the whole a wide interpretation where common law principles, such as the presumption of innocence or the admissibility of probative evidence, are at stake. A key area in which the judges have given an appearance of departing from common law values in favour of Convention ones, where the two appeared to be in conflict, is in respect of the creation of indirect horizontal effect. But even in that instance the common law was poised pre-HRA to take the leap in the direction of protecting privacy that was then taken. Perhaps a clearer departure from common law values can be seen in Laporte in which the Lords used Convention principle to curb, not the effect of rights-abridging legislation, but the effect of their own creation – the common law doctrine of breach of the peace,[718] which has had a far more significant impact in the last 20 years in limiting public protest than have the statutory public order provisions.

In the chapters that follow, then, a doctrinal analysis of the use of the HRA mechanisms in various contexts is accompanied by perspectives that take account of government reluctance to breach the Convention in an overt manner, and of the stances taken by the judiciary as they apply those mechanisms in Convention-based adjudication. These perspectives may aid in explaining, not only why certain Convention values are finding a more ready reception in domestic law than others, but also in revealing why the HRA mechanisms themselves are being deployed in Parliament and in the courts in a manner that does not entirely comport with the expectations of 2000.

The still unresolved choice before the courts is whether to treat the HRA as a domestic Bill of Rights in the sense that autonomous constitutional rights are being developed, or whether to treat it merely as a means of affording a readier access to Strasbourg principles in the domestic courts. This chapter has identified developments tugging in opposing directions; the book as a whole reveals similarly opposing stances. But certain recent decisions of the House of Lords suggest that a movement in the Bill of Rights direction is occurring, most clearly Campbell, Ghaidan, A and Others[719] and Laporte.[720]

As this chapter has argued, the HRA itself, in terms of its basis in constitutional theory, potentially stood in the way of the development of an autonomous human rights jurisprudence. Taking account of the s 3 jurisprudence, it allowed, in accordance with the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty, for completely unconstrained derogations from the Convention rights, unrelated to emergency situations and not dependent on satisfying the demands of proportionality, so long as the incompatibility in primary legislation was strong and far-reaching enough – so long as it permeated the statute or could be said to be a fundamental feature of it. Thus, Ghaidan could have been overturned by a statute with one single, overriding purpose – to distinguish between homosexual

718 See Chapter 8, p 759.
719 See Chapter 14, pp 1430–38.
720 See Chapter 8, pp 695, 757–71.

and heterosexual couples in provision of housing to the detriment of the former. That stance was hardly consonant with the idea of developing a domestic Bill of Rights. But, as discussed in this chapter, that leeway has hardly been utilised: the theoretical constraints built in to the HRA have been marginalised in favour of an assertion of judicial power in defence of the Convention rights. That position seems to open the door to the development of a domestic Bill of Rights. If as a matter of constitutional reality the true constraints on parliamentary and judicial power are Convention ones, not HRA ones, then the way is open to develop a synthesis of common law and Convention principle unconstrained by the key dilutant of the Convention standards – the margin of appreciation doctrine. On this basis it is unnecessary – leaving aside the conceptual incoherence of the Conservative position on this matter[721] – to repeal the HRA in order to introduce a 'modern' British Bill of Rights, since Britain already has one.[722]

721 See fn 50 above.

722 See on this point 'A Bill of Rights: Do we need one or do we already have one?' Francesca Klug, 2 March 2007, Irvine Human Rights Lecture 2007, University of Durham, Human Rights Centre (to be published in Public Law, Winter 2007). It may be noted that Labour is also drawn to the idea of replacing the HRA with a 'British Bill of Rights'. As Chapter 3 (p 156) pointed out, Gordon Brown in his inaugural speech as Prime Minister on 24 June 2007 indicated his interest in this possibility. The driving force appears to be a perception that a new instrument could enable a 'better' balance to be struck between human rights concerns and counter-terrorist measures. Also, as indicated above (p 163), Labour is concerned about the image that the media have created of the HRA. A 'British Bill of Rights' could possibly be 'sold' to the British people more readily as an instrument rooted in British tradition than can an instrument that incorporates a European Human Rights Treaty.

Part II

Expression

Introduction

Part II covers a number of aspects of expression including political expression, in the form of public protest, and pornographic expression. It also covers access to official information as an essential precursor to expression since, without such access, some expression will be curbed or cannot occur at all. This introduction considers the justifications underlying the legal protection offered to freedom of expression, their recognition in the Strasbourg and domestic jurisprudence and the implications of the justifications for the legal restrictions on expression. The chapters contained in Part II consider the restrictions domestic law places on expression – the traditional starting point for discussion of expression in the UK – but then they go on to consider the impact of the HRA on those restrictions. In so doing, it will take account of the discussion, in Chapter 2, of the freedom of expression guarantee under Art 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights, and of a number of the other aspects of the Strasbourg jurisprudence. The main focus of these chapters will be on the changes that are occurring in the protection for expression under the HRA as the Strasbourg jurisprudence permeates this area of law. This part is concerned with expression, since that is the term used in Art 10 – a wider term than speech: Art 10 protects expression, which could only very doubtfully be termed 'speech'. However, where the expression in question consists of speech, that term will be used.

In this Part, it will be found that the right to freedom of expression comes into conflict with the freedom to manifest racial hatred and with the right to a fair trial. It has also been viewed as conflicting with the right to freedom of religion. It is apparent from the Convention jurisprudence that, where two Convention rights come into conflict, some kind of balancing act between the two needs to be undertaken.[1] Although jurisprudence in this area is limited, it appears that the margin of appreciation tends to become particularly significant here, so that states have a fairly wide discretion in resolving the conflict.[2] Domestic courts therefore, have an appreciable degree of 1 Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria, Series A 295-A; (1994) 19 EHRR 34, para 55. The two Convention rights in conflict there were free speech itself and – so the Court found – the right to religious freedom, protected by Art 9.

2 See Chapter 9, pp 943–950. See in particular, Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria, Series A 295-A; (1994) 19 EHRR 34. The restriction on Art 10 entailed by the seizure of an allegedly blasphemous film was justified by reference to the Art 9 right to freedom of religious belief. The Court applied a wide margin of appreciation, and simply said that 'the content of the film cannot be viewed as latitude in determining where to strike the balance between the two interests involved. Section 12 HRA, which, as Chapter 4 indicated, enjoins the courts to have 'particular regard' to Art 10 when making any order which might infringe it, appears on its face to suggest a higher weighting for speech interests. Such imbalance is also prima facie suggested by the strength of the 'speech' jurisprudence at both the Strasbourg and domestic levels discussed above. In Ex p Simms,[3] Lord Steyn referred to free speech as 'the primary right . . . in a democracy' and some commentators take the view that Art 10 attracts an especially high level of protection at Strasbourg.[4]

However, save for admitting the distinction between those rights stated in absolute terms, such as Arts 3, 4 and 7 and those subject to generalised exceptions (8–11), Strasbourg has never sought to establish a hierarchy of Convention rights. Rather, where rights collide, it has advocated a careful examination of the competing claims of each in the light of all the circumstances of the case.[5] There is no indication that Parliament, in passing the HRA, intended to alter this position and create a serious imbalance between the two rights;[6] rather, it is evident that the sponsors of the amendment saw it merely as a domestic reflection of the Strasbourg approach.[7] Moreover, the un-balanced American approach is out of line with other jurisdictions and flows from factors peculiar to that jurisdiction, in particular the absolute nature of the First Amendment.[8] It is now clear that, despite the wording of s 12, the courts have rejected an approach under the HRA that gives Art 10 a higher status than the other qualified Convention rights.[9]

Free expression justifications

All countries which have a Bill of Rights protect freedom of expression because it is perceived as one of the most fundamental rights. But why should this particular freedom be viewed as so worthy of protection? Why, as Barendt puts it, should speech which offends the majority have any special immunity from government regulation 'while there would be no comparable inhibition in restraining conduct [such as public] love-making which has similar offensive characteristics?'.[10] Four main justifications for offering protection to free speech have been offered and will be considered here in turn. In each case, an indication will be given as to the kinds of expression the various justifications will support because all the theories will not be relevant to all forms of incapable of grounding' the conclusion of the national authorities that seizure was justified (para 56). Thus the test applied was reminiscent of the narrow Wednesbury standard of unreasonableness. See further Chapter 6, pp 487–491. See also Wingrove v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 1.

3 [1999] 3 All ER 400, CA; [1999] 3 WLR 328, HL

4 Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, 'Making rights real: the courts, remedies, and the Human Rights Act' (1999) 58 CLJ 509, p 524 and n 79.

5 See the views of Lord Steyn and Lord Cooke in Reynolds v Times Newspapers [1999] 4 All ER 609, pp 631 and 643.

6 An amendment providing that a court should 'normally' give precedence to Art 10 over Art 8 was rejected (HC Deb Vol 315 Cols 542–43, 2 July 1998).

7 See, e.g., the speech of Jack Straw on cl 12: HC Deb Vol 315 Cols 535–39, 2 July 1998.

8 See below, pp 311–12.

9 See Chapter 9, pp 956–58.

10 Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 1987, p 1. References will normally be to the 2nd edn, (2006) unless otherwise stated.

expression. Initially, it should be noted that three of the justifications are inherently more contingent and therefore precarious than the first. These three justifications – the arguments for the opportunity to arrive at the truth through free discussion, for the necessity of free speech to enable meaningful participation in democracy and for individual self-fulfilment – all ultimately argue that speech is to be valued not for its own sake, but because it will lead to some other outcome we think desirable; thus, they may be characterised as teleological justifications. If, therefore, when considering a particular form of speech, a persuasive argument can be made out that allowing the speech is likely to achieve a result antithetical to the desired outcome, protection will no longer be justifiable. By contrast, as will be seen below, it is inherent in the first main justification for free speech – the argument for moral autonomy – that arguments about the likely effects of allowing the particular speech are not relevant to the question whether the justification applies – although clearly, such arguments may still be relevant in deciding whether the speech should nonetheless be abrogated.

The argument from moral autonomy

This argument was outlined in Chapter 1 as one of the most powerful justifications for human rights in general and so will only briefly be rehearsed here. Ultimately, whether the particular argument used is Rawls's hypothetical social contract[11] or Dworkin's basic postulate of the state's duty to treat its citizens with equal concern and respect,[12] this justification for free expression is centred around the liberal conviction that matters of moral choice must be left to the individual. In either case, the conclusion reached is that the state offends against human dignity,[13] or treats certain citizens with contempt if the coercive power of the law is used to enforce the moral convictions of some upon others. The argument perhaps has a more common and conspicuous application with regard to sexual autonomy and so is often disregarded in arguments about free speech.[14]

The justification is less contingent than the others, as mentioned above, because any restriction on what an individual is allowed to read, see or hear, clearly amounts to an interference with her right to judge such matters for herself. Thus, the argument consistently defends virtually all kinds of speech and other forms of expression,[15] whereas the arguments from truth and democracy[16] will tend to have a somewhat less comprehensive range of application. Since the argument also sets up freedom of speech as a strong 'trump' right,[17] or as part of the individual's claim to inviolability,[18]

11 See Chapter 1, p 6.

12 See Chapter 1, pp 7–8.

13 Barendt makes the point, however, that unlimited speech may also assault human dignity (Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 1987, pp 16–17). This argument is considered in relation to pornography below: Chapter 6, pp 455–61.

14 Barendt, e.g., comments (ibid, p 16) that the 'general freedom to moral autonomy [is] perhaps without much relevance to free speech arguments'.

15 It also covers material which could only doubtfully be classified as speech, e.g., photographic pornography.

16 See below, pp 302–5.

17 Ronald Dworkin's phrase; see Chapter 1, p 12.

18 The idea is Rawls's; see Chapter 1, p 11.

the right in both cases overrides normal utilitarian arguments about the benefit or detriment to society of the particular form of speech under consideration.[19] By contrast, the justifications from democracy and truth both set out goals for society as a whole and, therefore, would seem reasonably to allow abrogation of speech in the interests of other public concerns which may be immediately and directly damaged by the exercise of speech. As Barendt puts it, in discussing the argument from truth: 'a government worried that inflammatory speech may provoke disorder is surely entitled to elevate immediate public order considerations over the long-term intellectual development of the man on the Clapham omnibus.'[20]

The argument from truth

The most famous exposition of this argument is to be found in JS Mill's On Liberty.[21] The basic thesis is that truth is most likely to emerge from free and uninhibited discussion and debate. It is worth noting that this is a proposition about a causal relationship between two phenomena – discussion and truth – which of course has never been conclusively verified. However, its general truth is taken as virtually axiomatic in the Western democracies and forms the basic assumption underpinning the whole approach of reasoned, sceptical debate which is the peculiar hallmark of Western civilisation. Nonetheless, the crude assumption that more free speech will always lead to more truth has been attacked by certain feminist writers, who consider that the free availability of pornography leads not to the revelation of truth, but to the creation of false and damaging images of women or, more controversially, that pornography actually 'constructs the [sexist] social reality of gender'[22] – a claim which will be examined in detail in Chapter 6.

It appears that Mill envisaged his argument as applicable mainly to the expression of opinion and debate, but it can equally well be used to support claims for freedom of information, since the possession of pertinent information about a subject will nearly always be a prerequisite to the formation of a well-worked-out opinion on the matter. However, prima facie, it may be thought that the theory does not immediately make it clear when we need to know the truth about a given subject. Thus, it could be argued that a delay in receiving certain information (owing, for example, to government restrictions) would not greatly matter, as long as the truth eventually emerged. In response to this, it may be argued that if truth is valued substantively – a position most would assent to[23] – then any period of time during which citizens are kept in ignorance of the truth or form erroneous opinions because of such ignorance, amounts to an evil, thus giving rise to a presumption against secrecy. If, alternatively or in addition, knowledge of the truth is valued because of its importance for political participation, then clearly it will be most important to know the information at the time that the issue it concerns is most likely to affect the political climate. This rationale would thus provide a strong 19 For a discussion of justifications allowing strong rights to be overridden, see Chapter 1, pp 12–14.

20 Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 1987, p 10.

21 Mill, JS, On Liberty, in Cowling, M (ed), Selected Writings of John Stuart Mill, Everyman, 1972.

22 MacKinnon, C, Feminism Unmodified, 1987, Harvard University Press, p 166.

23 Mill, as a utilitarian, would probably not see truth as inherently valuable, but rather as a very important means of ensuring the overall welfare of society.

argument against the propensity of UK Governments to attempt to conceal political secrets until revelation would no longer have a damaging effect on their interests.[24]

Clearly, whether truth is valued instrumentally – for example, as essential to self-development – or as a good in itself, some kinds of truths must be regarded as more important than others.[25] Thus, in the context of a collision between free speech and privacy rights, the small intrinsic value of knowing the facts about (say) a film star's sexual life juxtaposed with the implausibility of the notion that such information would enable more effective political participation or individual growth, provides reasonable grounds for favouring the privacy interest in such a case. By contrast, revelations about corruption amongst prominent politicians will arguably not only have a more important part to play in the formation and development of individuals' general opinions, they will also play a vital role in enabling informed contribution to be made to the political process. Thus, a compelling argument for favouring free speech in this situation is readily made out. We will return to this argument in Chapter 9.

The argument from participation in a democracy

Barendt describes this theory as 'probably the most attractive of the free speech theories in modern Western democracies' and concludes that 'it has been the most influential theory in the development of 20th-century free speech law'.[26] The argument, which is associated primarily with the American writer Meiklejohn,[27] is simply that citizens cannot participate fully in a democracy unless they have a reasonable understanding of political issues; therefore, open debate on such matters is essential. In so far as democracy rests upon ideas both of participation and accountability, the argument from democracy may be seen to encompass also the function which a free press performs in exposing abuses of power,[28] thereby allowing for their remedy and also providing a deterrent effect for those contemplating such wrong-doing.[29] The influence of this argument can be seen in the fact that directly political speech has a special protected status in most Western democracies.

Such speech now has a legal guarantee in the UK under Art 10, taking into account the Strasbourg political speech jurisprudence. Pre-HRA, when the British judiciary considered the claims of free speech, they seemed in general to be particularly concerned to protect the free criticism of the political authorities. Thus, in the seminal House of Lords decision in Derbyshire v Times Newspapers,[30] Lord Keith, in holding that neither local nor central government could sustain an action in defamation, said: 'It is of the highest importance that a democratically elected governmental body should be open to 24 As seen, e.g., in the so called 'Thirty-Year Rule' now contained in the Public Records Act 1958, as amended. See below, Chapter 7, p 629.

25 It is outside the scope of this work to attempt a full-scale normative inquiry into the relative value of different truths. A commonsensical consensus approach is all that is employed in the text, where it is suggested only that the mere satisfaction of curiosity without more is of a relatively low value compared to the ending of a deception.

26 Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 1987, pp 20 and 23 respectively.

27 See, e.g., his 'The First Amendment is an absolute' (1961) Sup Ct Rev 245.

28 See Blasi, V, 'The checking value in First Amendment theory' (1977) Am B Found Res J 521.

29 See Greenwalt, K, 'Free speech justifications' (1989) 89 Columbia L Rev 119, p 143.

30 [1993] AC 534; [1993] 1 All ER 1011; [1992] 3 WLR 28, HL.

uninhibited public criticism'. The fact that he based his decision on this justification for free speech and not on, for example, the individual right of journalists to express themselves freely, is evidence of judicial endorsement of the argument from democracy – and also, possibly, of their failure to give much consideration to other, rights-based justifications. The fact that the judiciary have mainly, or even only, this interest in mind when considering threats to free speech, helps to explain why they are so often prepared to allow speech to be overridden by other considerations. This is because this argument sees speech as a public interest and as justified instrumentally by reference to its beneficial effects on democracy, rather than seeing it as an individual right of inherent value. Therefore, clearly, it can render speech vulnerable to arguments that it should be overridden by competing public interests which are also claimed to be essential to the maintenance of democracy. Hence Margaret Thatcher's well-known justification for the media ban challenged unsuccessfully in the Brind case:[31] 'We do sometimes have to sacrifice a little of the freedom we cherish in order to defend ourselves from those whose aim is to destroy that freedom altogether.' Clearly, to a judge who sees the value of free speech only in terms of its contribution to the political process, an argument that allowing the speech in question will do more harm than good to the maintenance of democracy will always seem compelling. This is not to argue that this justification is fundamentally flawed – clearly its basic premise is correct and offers an important reason to protect speech – but rather that one should be wary of using it as the sole justification even for directly political speech.

There is, however, an argument which does see the justification as fundamentally flawed because it would appear to allow suppression of free speech by the democracy acting through its elected representatives. However, this objection may be answered by the argument that certain values, such as protection for minorities and fundamental freedoms generally, are implicit in any mature conception of a democracy.[32] Therefore, the term 'democracy' or the furtherance of democracy should not be narrowly defined to include only the decisions of the particular government in power, but should also encompass the general principles mentioned; by affording respect to such principles, democracy will ultimately be preserved. This argument would suggest that the justification would appear to have little direct relevance to sexually explicit forms of expression or blasphemous speech but, on the other hand, since freedom of expression is arguably one of the freedoms the suppression of which would undermine democracy, protection for these forms of speech can also be argued for by the justification. It should be borne in mind, however, that as this argument depends on a separate and somewhat controversial contention about the nature of democracy, it offers only an indirect defence of non-political speech.[33] Nevertheless, if the above contention is accepted, one may 31 Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Brind [1991] 1 AC 696; [1991] 1 All ER 720; [1991] 2 WLR 588, HL.

32 Such a view is in fact endorsed by a number of legal philosophers and civil libertarians, and amounts to the most satisfactory reply to the charge that an entrenched Bill of Rights is undemocratic. See Dworkin, A Bill of Rights for Britain, 1990; the view also clearly underpins his general political philosophy, see, e.g., 'Liberalism', in A Matter of Principle, 1985. See also Hart, HLA, Law, Liberty and Morality, 1963 and Lester, A, Democracy and Individual Rights, 1968.

33 Most commentators seem to assume that the argument from democracy has little, if any, application to pornographic material. See, e.g., Dworkin, A, 'Do we have a right to pornography?' op. cit., fn 38, p 335. Similarly, the Williams Committee did not regard the argument as pertinent to their then conclude that the argument from democracy is actually concerned to further two values: maintenance of the democracy and effective participation in it. The two values are distinct in that although effective as opposed to passive or inert participation may help to secure maintenance of the democracy, nevertheless some of its members, while wishing to see its continuance, might not wish to participate actively in it. Thus, political speech would contribute to the maintenance of both values, while other forms of speech would contribute only to the first, confirming what was suggested at the outset, namely that this justification argues for special protection of political speech.

The argument from individual self-fulfilment

Finally, we may turn to the thesis that freedom of speech is necessary in order to enable individual self-fulfilment. It is argued that individuals will not be able to develop morally and intellectually unless they are free to air views and ideas in free debate with each other. However, as Barendt notes,[34] it may be objected that free speech should not be singled out as especially necessary for individual fulfilment; the individual might also claim that, for example, foreign travel or a certain kind of education was equally necessary. On the other hand, freedom of speech represents a means of furthering individual growth which it is possible to uphold as a 'negative freedom'; other methods of furthering individual freedom would require positive action on the part of the government.

This justification is clearly rights-based and, as such, in theory at least, is less vulnerable to competing societal claims; however, it does not value speech in itself, but rather, instrumentally, as a means to individual growth. Therefore, in situations where it seems that allowing free expression of the particular material will be likely to retard or hinder the growth of others or of the 'speaker', the justification does not offer a strong defence of speech.[35] Precisely this argument has been used by feminist commentators to justify the censorship of pornography. Thus, MacKinnon asserts that far from aiding in the growth of anyone, 'Pornography strips and devastates women of credibility'[36] through the images of women it constructs in its readers' minds. The thesis which forms the basis of the UK law on obscenity – that certain kinds of pornography actually damage the moral development of those who read it by depraving and corrupting them, similarly fastens onto the argument that this kind of material achieves the opposite of the outcome which allowing freedom of expression is designed to ensure.[37] The apparent vulnerability of the argument from self-development when deliberations (Report of the Committee on Obscenity and Film Censorship, Cmnd 7772, 1979; see below, p 455).

34 Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 1987, p 15.

35 Barendt argues (ibid, pp 16–17) that justifications for suppressing some forms of speech could be advanced on the basis that human dignity (the value promoted by allowing self-development) would thereby receive protection. He cites the finding of the German Constitutional Court that there was no right to publish a novel defaming a dead person as such publication might violate the 'dignity of man' guaranteed by Art 1 of the German Basic Law (Mephisto (1971) BVerfGE 173).

36 MacKinnon, C, Feminism Unmodified, 1987, p 193.

37 It should be noted first that pro-censorship feminists deny that their arguments have anything in common with conservative objections to pornography, e.g., MacKinnon, ibid, p 175, and secondly that the feminist thesis on pornography is far more complex than this. It will be explored in more detail in Chapter 6.

used to justify the protection of material which is arguably degrading[38] leads Barendt to suggest[39] that a sounder formulation of the theory is one which frames it in terms of the individual's right to moral autonomy. It is submitted that moral autonomy does provide the most persuasive defence of sexually explicit 'speech' and this argument will be developed when obscenity law is discussed. However, it will also be argued that autonomy is conceptually distinct from the notion of self-fulfilment and that nothing is to be gained by conflating the two concepts.

Implications for restrictions on expression

It is argued that the justifications considered would support the following propositions, which will be used as analytical tools to examine the soundness of the legal responses to expression considered in this Part, including those from Strasbourg. But the complex issues raised by these propositions cannot possibly be considered in sufficient depth here; full treatment can be found in books dealing specifically with theories underlying freedom of expression,[40] and it may be noted that the literature dealing with the domestic potential for importing free expression jurisprudence from other jurisdictions,[41] which has addressed many of the hard issues, is likely to become more extensive as one of the results of the inception of the HRA.

Content and form-based interferences

As a starting point, content-based restrictions should clearly be regarded with more suspicion than those based on form, since all of the free speech justifications potentially argue against such restrictions. Content-based restrictions, other than those constraining deliberate lies, prevent certain messages from ever entering the arena of debate and therefore run counter to the arguments from truth and self-fulfilment. Such restrictions prevent persons from knowing of, let alone evaluating, a particular message, thereby infringing their autonomy and, where the message is a political one, running counter to the argument from democracy. Thus, a regime committed to free speech would strongly condemn such restrictions. On this argument, a scholarly thesis arguing that the Holocaust caused far fewer deaths than is generally accepted would fall within the area of protected expression, while the handing out of leaflets and the putting up of posters by a Nazi group in a Jewish community designed to demonstrate precisely this point, might not.[42]

38 Dworkin also concludes that the argument from self-fulfilment fails to defend pornographic speech: 'Do we have a right to pornography?' in A Matter of Principle 1985; he founds his defence on moral autonomy and, like the present writer, clearly regards this concept as offering a separate head of justification.

39 Barendt 1987, p 17.

40 See Schauer, F, Free Speech: A Philosophical Enquiry, 1982, CUP; Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 2nd edn, 2006, esp Chapter 1; Waluchow, WJ (ed), Free Expression: Essays in Law and Philosophy, 1994, Clarendon; Campbell, T and Sadurski, W (eds), Rationales for Freedom of Communication, 1994, Dartmouth.

41 A provocative and interesting forerunner of such books is Loveland, I (ed), Importing the First Amendment, Freedom of Expression in Britain, Europe and the USA, 1998, Hart. See also Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act (2006).

42 This example is, of course, reminiscent of the famous 'Nazis at Skokie' affair. A group of Nazis wished to demonstrate, wearing Nazi uniforms and displaying swastikas, in a predominantly Jewish community.

But the idea of seeking to ensure content neutrality (an inquiry into the validity of restrictions that completely ignores the content of expression) in an absolutist fashion immediately runs into some difficulties.[43] Two key problems are identified here. First, while the idea can be sustained in the example given above, it is clear that in others, the manner in which a message is conveyed may be as significant, or more significant, than the message itself.[44] The examples of symbolic protest, mime, music and art are only some of those that come to mind. The use of various techniques, such as imagery and symbolism, is not only significant, but indissociable from the message. Indeed, such techniques convey a message. In a crude sense, they are the vehicle by means of which the 'message' is conveyed, but they not only interact with it, but also convey a host of emotive and cognitive 'messages' themselves. Secondly, form-based restrictions cannot be fully divorced from content-based ones, since it is only in relation to certain contents that the issue of form is raised. Time, place and access (based on age) restrictions are less problematic, since the infringement of freedom of expression they represent may tend to be insignificant in relation to achieving the ultimate goals indicated by the free speech justifications.

Thus, while it is suggested that all four free speech justifications (depending on the message) would argue against content-based restrictions, they might all also be engaged by form-based restrictions. Moreover, when one examines the justifications themselves, it can be found that they will support restrictions on expression in the furtherance of non-expression values. The feminist argument in this respect is considered below. In relation to forms of hate speech, it can be argued that it is an invasion of moral autonomy and militates against self-fulfilment for someone to be forced to witness expression deeply offensive to her (either because it is so pervasive as to be unavoidable or because it is likely that she will encounter it unwittingly). A fortiori this is the case when the speech goes beyond offensiveness and becomes threatening.[45] Speech that is impliedly or expressly threatening or intimidatory (so-called 'fighting words') may well impair an individual's autonomy since it has such a direct impact on her in the free ordering of her life.

It is concluded, first, that while content-based restrictions should be viewed with great caution, an engagement in the nature of the content when considering restriction is necessary, especially in terms of the impact on identifiable individuals, defined by their

They relied, successfully, on their First Amendment right to do so, in a case that divided civil libertarians: Collin v Smith (1978) 578 F 2d 1197, 7th Cir; (1978) 436 US 953; (1978) 439 US 916.

43 See Feldman, D, 'Content neutrality', in Loveland, I (ed), Importing the First Amendment, Freedom of Expression in Britain, Europe and the USA, 1998, Chapter 8.

44 See Cohen v California, (1971) 403 US 15, below, p 491.

45 As in the case of attacks on religious faith or homophobic, racist or sexist expression targeted directly at specific individuals. Examples of offensive behaviour that might readily become threatening would include putting up pornographic posters of women in the work place, sexist, homophobic or racist remarks directed at an employee, displaying an offensive symbol such as a swastika at work (see Chapter 15, pp 1556–63) or targeting persons in their homes as part of a racist campaign and, e.g., putting leaflets through the door, painting racist graffiti on the house. Cf RAV v City of St Paul, Minnesota (1992) 112 S Ct 2538; 120 L Ed 2d 305 in which a group of racist youths burnt a home-made cross in the front yard of a black family. It was found in the Supreme Court that the Ordinance under which one of the youths was charged was overbroad and content-based: expressive conduct of this nature causing offence was protected speech under the First Amendment.

group status. Secondly, the argument in favour of creating simplistic distinctions between content and form is unsustainable. The extent to which the form of the expression can be said to engage the free speech justifications has to be considered. Third, while time, place and access restrictions should be rigorously scrutinised on the basis of proportionality, they are prima facie less disturbing than content or form-based ones.

Market freedom and creative freedom

The second proposition is, contrary to the US 'marketplace' model,[46] that market freedom is far from consonant with creative freedom. As Barendt puts it, in relation to US thinking: 'A market-place which few can enter does nothing for the principle that debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust and open.'[47] Promoting market freedom will tend to mean the dominance of the media by certain conglomerates.[48] It may, therefore, lead to homogenous expression which reflects unchallenged majority viewpoints. Thus, some intervention in the market, with the free speech justifications in mind, is warranted, with a view to furthering creative freedom. Such intervention would limit cross-media ownership – the concentration of ownership in different media sectors – and would seek to protect a public service element – as opposed to the reflection of purely commercial values – in, for example, the granting of licences to broadcast and in the monitoring of output. Such an element might include requirements to observe due impartiality, and to broadcast at peak times programmes reflecting minority interests, experimental and original drama, investigative documentaries ('must carry' requirements).[49] Toleration of such intervention is founded on the understanding that commercial television has a dual concern which will influence its output. It must satisfy the companies who use it to advertise their products that it can deliver a mass audience, which means that it must be able to provide programming which attracts and satisfies such an audience. Therefore, unlike books, music, art, or, to an extent, newspapers, a central concern is to satisfy the advertisers. Regulation is therefore warranted in order to prevent creative freedom from being outweighed by commercial concerns.

This is a matter that is, of course, especially pertinent in relation to media regulation, but the general proposition has implications going beyond current regulatory schemes[50] and, indeed, is relevant in relation to the HRA itself.[51] The proposition covers the use of libel laws by big business,[52] rights of access to the broadcast media,[53] interpretations 46 See Schauer, F, 'The political incidence of the free speech principle' (1993) 64 US Colorado LR 935.

47 See 'The First Amendment and the media', in Loveland, I (ed), Importing the First Amendment, Freedom of Expression in Britain, Europe and the USA, 1998, Chapter 8, pp 43–44. The quotation is from New York Times v Sullivan (1964) 376 US 254, 270. Barendt goes on to attack the market place model on a number of further grounds; he argues that the pressures of advertisers will influence mass communication and, further, that when corporate interests determine the media agenda, and do not provide access to the means of communication for dissenters, certain ideas cannot enter the 'free' market.

48 See Feintuck, M, Media Regulation, Public Interest and the Law, 1999.

49 See Chapter 6, pp 511–13.

50 See Chapter 6, pp 512–15.

51 See Chapter 4, pp 249–50.

52 See Wilmo, P and Rodgers, W (eds), Gatley on Libel and Slander, 1998, para 2.19.

53 See Chapter 6, p 539.

of contempt law,[54] access to publicity at election times, the suppression of protest (by, for example, environmental activists) in the corporate interest.[55]

Both these propositions suggest that the US freedom of expression model should be treated with caution, although this is not to say that it should not be referred to domestically, under the HRA, as providing an extensive and rich source of jurisprudence. Under the US model, all content-based restrictions on protected speech – speech protected under the First Amendment – are self-evidently unconstitutional, as indicated below.

The US model has been strongly influenced by the 'American's characteristically profound suspicion of government and the whole-hearted belief in the socially beneficial effects of unfettered economic freedom and individual endeavor . . . these traits have generated a model of the state which precludes government and courts from offering protection against significant forms of social and personal harm'.[56] The Strasbourg model, as this part will indicate, contrasts strongly with the American one in tolerating content-based restrictions that relate to the exceptions under Art 10(2).

Recognition of these justifications in Strasbourg and UK expression jurisprudence

The high regard in which freedom of expression, and particularly press freedom, is held by the Strasbourg institutions was indicated in Chapter 2. The Court has repeatedly asserted that freedom of expression 'constitutes one of the essential foundations of a democratic society',[57] and that it 'is applicable not only to "information" or "ideas" that are favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that "offend, shock or disturb" '.[58] Particular stress has been laid upon 'the pre-eminent role of the press in a state governed by the rule of law' which, 'in its vital role of "public watchdog" ' has a duty 'to impart information and ideas on matters of public interest' which the public 'has a right to receive'.[59]

However, while the rhetorical attachment to free speech is always strong, it is a marked feature of the Strasbourg jurisprudence that clearly political speech, which may be seen as directly engaging the self-government rationale, receives a much more robust degree of protection than other types of expression. Barendt's contention that this is 'the most influential theory in the development of 20th century free speech law'[60] is supported by examination of the approach of UK and Strasbourg judges. As indicated above, the basic thesis is that citizens cannot participate fully in a democracy unless they have a reasonable understanding of political issues; therefore, open debate on such

54 See Chapter 5, pp 330–34.
55 See Chapter 8, pp 793–94.
56 See Feldman, 'Content neutrality', in Loveland, I (ed), Importing the First Amendment, Freedom of Expression in Britain, Europe and the USA, 1998, Chapter 8, p 140.
57 Observer and Guardian v UK A 216 (1991), para 59.
58 See, e.g., Thorgeirson v Iceland (1992) 14 EHRR 843, para 63.
59 Castells v Spain A 236 (1992), para 43.
60 Barendt Freedom of Speech (1987), pp 20 and 23 respectively.

matters is necessary to ensure the proper working of a democracy; as Lord Steyn has put it: 'freedom of speech is the lifeblood of democracy.'[61]

Thus, the 'political' speech cases of Sunday Times,[62] Jersild,[63] Lingens[64] and Thorgeirson[65] all resulted in findings that Art 10 had been violated and all were marked by an intensive review of the restriction in question in which the margin of appreciation was narrowed almost to vanishing point.[66] By contrast, in cases involving artistic speech, supported by the values of autonomy and self-development rather than self-government, an exactly converse pattern emerges: applicants have tended to be unsuccessful and a deferential approach to the judgments of the national authorities as to its obscene or blasphemous nature has been adopted.[67]

A similar pattern may be discerned in the domestic jurisprudence: when speech supported by the arguments from self-development or autonomy rather than self-government is in question, decisions have tended to be cautious,[68] or downright draconian,[69] and accompanied by little or no recognition of these underlying values. The most lofty rhetorical assertions of the importance of free speech and the strongest determination to protect it have been evident in cases where journalistic material raises political issues, broadly defined.[70] In such cases, the courts have either overtly adopted the Strasbourg principles described above[71] or have strongly emphasised the high status freedom of 61 R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Simms [1999] 3 All ER 400, p 408.

62 Sunday Times v UK A 30 (1979). The case concerned a contempt of court action brought against the newspaper in respect of revelations it published concerning the dangers of the drug Thalidomide (for discussion, see Chapter 5, pp 336–37).

63 Jersild v Denmark (1994) 19 EHRR 1 concerned an application by a Danish journalist who had been convicted of an offence of racially offensive behaviour after preparing and broadcasting a programme about racism which included overtly racist speech by the subjects of the documentary.

64 Lingens v Austria (1986) 8 EHRR 103 concerned the defamation of a political figure.

65 Thorgeirson v Iceland (1992) 14 EHRR 843 concerned newspaper articles reporting allegations of brutality against the Reykjavik police.

66 See the discussion of the doctrine in Chapter 2, pp 36–39.

67 Müller v Switzerland (1991) 13 EHRR 212; Gibson v UK, Appl No 17634 (declared inadmissible by the Commission); Handyside v UK, A 24 (1976) (not a case involving artistic speech but where the issue was that of obscenity); Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria (1994) 19 EHRR 34; Gay News v UK (1982) 5 EHRR 123. In Wingrove v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 1, the Court remarked: 'Whereas there is little scope under Article 10(2) of the Convention for restrictions on political speech or on debate of questions of public . . . a wider margin of appreciation is generally available to the Contracting states when regulating freedom of expression in relation to matters liable to offend intimate personal convictions within the sphere of morals or, especially, religion' (para 58). These cases are discussed in Chapter 6, pp 463–66 and pp 487–91. See Harris, J, O'Boyle, M and Warbrick, C, Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, pp 397 and 414.

68 Gibson [1990] 2 QB 619. See Chapter 6, pp 482–83.

69 Knuller v DPP [1973] AC 435. In Lemon [1979] AC 617, the House of Lords held that the common law offence of blasphemy required no mental element, and that there was no defence of public interest. See further Chapter 6, p 485.

70 Reynolds v Times Newspapers [1999] 4 All ER 609; Derbyshire CC v Times Newspapers [1993] AC 534; R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Simms [1999] 3 WLR 328. However, deference to widely drafted primary legislation (Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Brind [1991] 1 AC 696) or governmental arguments from national security (Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109) has resulted in the ready upholding of restrictions on directly political speech.

71 See the approach of the Court of Appeal in Derbyshire [1993] AC 534 and in Ex p Leech [1994] QB 198, of the House of Lords in Reynolds [1999] 4 All ER 609, pp 621–22, per Lord Nicholls, pp 628 speech holds in the common law, as 'a constitutional right', or 'higher legal order foundation'.[72] Earlier pronouncements to the effect that: 'The media . . . are an essential foundation of any democracy'[73] were emphatically reinforced by pronouncements in the House of Lords' decision in Reynolds v Times Newspapers[74] which afforded an explicit recognition to their duty to inform the people on matters of legitimate public interest. Press freedom in relation to political expression has clearly been recognised as having a particularly high value in UK law and Convention jurisprudence.

The theory that freedom of speech is necessary for the discovery of truth[75] has been a strong influence in US jurisprudence,[76] but not historically at Strasbourg[77] or in the UK courts.[78] The argument from self development – that the freedom to engage in the free expression and reception of ideas and opinions in various media is essential to human development[79] – has received some recognition at Strasbourg[80] and recently in the House of Lords.[81]

Free speech protection in practice[82]

In the US, the country with perhaps the greatest commitment to freedom of speech, the First Amendment to the Constitution provides: 'Congress shall make no law abridging and esp 635, per Lord Steyn, p 643, per Lord Cooke and Ex p Simms [1999] 3 WLR 328, p 407, per Lord Steyn and pp 419–20, per Lord Hobhouse.

72 Reynolds v Times Newspapers [1999] 4 All ER 609, pp 628–29 (Lord Steyn). In Ex p Simms [1999] 3 WLR 328, p 411, Lord Steyn described the right as 'fundamental', as did Lord Hoffmann, p 412.

73 Francome v MGN [1984] 2 All ER 408, p 898, per Sir John Donaldson.

74 Per Lord Steyn [1999] 4 All ER 609, pp 633–34; Lord Nicholls: 'freedom to disseminate and receive information on political matters is essential to the proper functioning of the system of parliamentary democracy cherished in this country' (p 621).

75 See above, pp 302–3; see further Greenwalt, K, 'Free speech justifications' (1989) 89 Columbia L Rev 119, pp 130–41 generally.

76 See the famous dicta of Judge Learned Hand in United States v Associated Press 52 F Supp 362, p 372 (1943); and of Holmes J, dissenting but with the concurrence of Brandeis J, in Abrams v United States 250 US 616, p 630 (1919).

77 The repeated reference by the ECtHr to freedom of expression being one of the 'basic conditions for [society's] progress' (see, e.g., Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria (1994) 19 EHRR 34, para 49) could be seen as a reference to the justification.

78 But see Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Simms [1999] 3 All ER 400, p 408, per Lord Steyn.

79 E.g., Emerson argues that the right to free expression is justified as the right of the individual to realise his character and potentialities through forming his own beliefs and opinions ('Towards a general theory of the First Amendment' (1963) 72 Yale LJ 877, pp 879–80); see also Redish, M, Freedom of Expression, 1984, pp 20–30 and K, 'Free speech justifications' (1989) 89 Columbia L Rev 119, pp 143–45.

80 One of the stock phrases of the European Court of Human Rights in relation the value of freedom of expression asserts that it is one of the 'essential foundations for the 'development of everyone' (e.g., Otto-Preminger (1995) 19 EHRR 34, para 49).

81 Per Lord Steyn in Ex p Simms [1999] 3 All ER 400, p 498.

82 For comment, see Marshall, G, 'Freedom of speech and assembly', in Constitutional Theory, 1971, OUP, p 154; Barendt, Freedom of Speech, 2nd edn, 2006; Gibbons, Regulating the Media, 1998, Sweet and Maxwell; Robertson, G and Nichol, L, Media Law, 1999, Penguin; Boyle, A, 'Freedom of expression as a public interest in English law' [1982] PL 574; Singh, 'The indirect regulation of speech' [1988] PL 212; Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, The Law of Human Rights, 2006, Chapter 15; Lester (Lord) and Pannick, D (eds), Human Rights Law and Practice, 1st edn, 2000, Chapter 4, p 197.

the freedom of speech or of the press.' This stricture is not interpreted absolutely literally, but it does mean that US citizens can challenge a law on the sole ground that it interferes with freedom of expression. However, freedom of expression is not absolute in any jurisdiction; other interests can overcome it, including the protection of morals, of the reputation of others, the preservation of public order, national security and protecting the interest in a fair trial. In fact, freedom of expression comes into conflict with a greater variety of interests than any other liberty and is therefore in more danger of being curtailed. Most Bills of Rights list these interests as exceptions to the primary right of freedom of expression, as does Art 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights. This does not mean that the mere invocation of the other interest will lead to displacement of freedom of expression; it is necessary to show that there is a pressing social need to allow the other interest to prevail.[83]

Although, until the inception of the Human Rights Act, the UK had no Bill of Rights protecting freedom of expression, Art 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights was taken into account by the courts in construing ambiguous legislation on the basis, as Chapter 3 indicated, that as Parliament must have intended to comply with its Treaty obligations, an interpretation should be adopted which would allow it to do so.[84] It has also, on occasion, been taken into account where there is ambiguity in the common law. Combined with the effects of certain very significant decisions against the UK at Strasbourg, Art 10 had a greater impact on UK law pre-HRA than its fellow Article, Art 11. However, its impact has been variable. It has not had as much influence as might perhaps have been expected as far as the laws of obscenity and decency are concerned. As Chapter 8 explains, it has also had little effect on expression in the form of public protest. This part covers access to information which, as Chapter 7 indicates, is not covered by Art 10, although such access may be viewed as associated with expression.

Under s 3 of the HRA, the obligation to interpret legislation compatibly with Art 10, and the related Arts 9[85] and 11, is much stronger than it was in the pre-HRA era, while the courts and other public authorities, including the police, are bound by the Convention under s 6 to uphold freedom of expression. As Chapter 2 indicated, Art 10 provides a strong safeguard for freedom of expression in relation to competing interests, since it takes the primary right as its starting point. The content of speech will rarely exclude it from the protection of Art 10, although not all speech is included.[86] Article 10(2) demands that interferences with the primary right should be both necessary and proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. But the interferences with expression, considered in the following chapters, have not all been subject to the same intensity of scrutiny at Strasbourg. The reasons why this is so will be considered in those chapters.

83 See Chapter 2, pp 94–95 for discussion of this point and p 336, below.

84 See further Chapter 3, pp 134–37.

85 See Chapter 2, p 91.

86 In Jersild v Denmark (1994) 19 EHRR 1 it was assumed that the actual racist utterances of racists in a broadcast were not protected. In Janowskki v Poland (1999) 5 BHRC 672 it was found that insults to civil servants acting in their public capacity were protected, although the interference was found to be justified.

As the following chapters indicate, there are two methods of protecting the other competing interests mentioned: prior and subsequent restraints on freedom of expression. Prior restraints are generally seen as more pernicious and therefore countries with a Bill of Rights either outlaw them or keep them to a minimum. In the case of censorship, such restraints are viewed as particularly inimical to free speech, since they may operate outside the public domain and may therefore generate little or no publicity. Decisions will be taken by an administrative body, often with no possibility of challenge in the courts. On the other hand, subsequent restraints operate after publication of the article in question: the persons responsible may face civil or criminal liability. The trial may then generate publicity and the defendants may have an opportunity of demonstrating why they published the article in question. In other words, the case for allowing the speech in question is given a hearing.[87] However, the distinction between the two kinds of restraint may not be as stark as this implies. Subsequent restraints may have a chilling effect on publications; editors and others may well not wish to risk the possibility of incurring liability and may therefore themselves take the decision not to publish without reference to any outside body. In the case of prior restraints granted by the courts, usually injunctions, the case in favour of publication will normally be heard.

When one turns to consider UK law in this area, one confronts a mass of common law and statutory restrictions on freedom of expression and on expressive activities associated with it, such as marches or demonstrations. Traditionally, in order to determine how far freedom of expression was protected, it was necessary to consider the width of these restrictions in order to determine how much of an area of freedom was left within which expression could be exercised. Historically, in English law, there was no such thing as 'media freedom' as a constitutional or legal concept: as Dicey said, 'Freedom of discussion is in England little else than the right to write or say anything which a jury, consisting of twelve shopkeepers, think it expedient should be said or written.'[88] It was indeed crucial to the Diceyan paradigm that, insofar as press freedom was protected, it was a result of ordinary court judgments determining the rights of private citizens. In some areas of law affecting the media, where the media sought to make claims that could not be made by individual speakers, they were denied completely: perhaps the most notorious example is Lord Templeman's trenchant assertion at the beginning of his speech in a major case on protection of journalists' sources: 'This case is not about freedom of the press . . .'.[89] More typically, under the traditional English view, freedom of the press was simply the absence of a prior system of censorship, but other than that, simply a negative liberty. As Lord Wilberforce observed in 1981: 'Freedom of the press imports, generally, freedom to publish without pre-censorship, subject always to the laws relating to libel, official secrets, sedition and other recognised inhibitions.'[90]

As the above passage suggests, 'the law of media freedom' consisted merely of a mechanical application of the law deriving from statute and common law precedents; and media freedom, like any other negative liberty, was simply what was left over after 87 See Barendt, E, 'Prior restraints on speech' [1985] PL 253.

88 Dicey, AV, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution, 10th edn, 1959, Chapter VI .
89 British Steel Corp v Granada Television Ltd [1981] AC 1096; see further Chapter 5 at p 424.
90 [1981] 1 All ER 417, 455.

the scope of the restrictions had been determined. The HRA has altered that position in the sense that the media and citizens generally are able to rely on the Art 10 guarantee, against public authorities. Therefore, domestic freedom of expression should be determined by the scope of the Art 10 protection, bearing in mind the duty of national courts, discussed in Chapter 4, to disapply the margin of appreciation doctrine. The extent to which the judiciary are taking an activist or a minimalist approach to that doctrine in relation to expression is of particular significance, since Strasbourg has applied a review of very varying intensity in this context. The development of the domestic law, whether by way of legislation or the common law, is still highly significant, since all of it is being tested more directly against Art 10, in Parliament or in the courts.

It will be found that the law in this area has developed in an incoherent fashion. A willingness to accept the values of freedom of expression,[91] rather than relying strongly on those that traditionally attracted protection, especially proprietorial rights, became apparent in the 1990s, as Chapter 3 indicated. But where expression came into conflict with those values that had traditionally gained acceptance, such as maintaining public order, such values remained in the ascendant. The lack of a consistent pattern was arguably due to the lack of a free expression clause against which the other interests had to be measured. The emphasis of these chapters has to be on the judges' concern to strike a balance between free expression and a variety of other interests in the pre-HRA era, and the impact of Art 10 on the stance adopted. A pervasive critical theme will be the exposure of the judges' readiness to allow freedom of expression to be restricted on uncertain or flimsy grounds. It will be found in certain contexts that some of the interests identified by judges as justifying such restrictions would not qualify as sufficient grounds for outweighing the right of free expression under the liberal conception of rights outlined in Chapter 1. In such contexts, the impact of Art 10 will, therefore, be of especial significance. In others, it will become apparent that domestic law already satisfies Art 10 requirements.

In considering UK law it will be argued that outside the public order or anti-terrorist context statutes in this area give, in general, greater protection to freedom of expression than does the common law and that during the 1980s and 1990s it came particularly under threat, partly, but not exclusively, through common law developments, although, as indicated above, there were also a number of recent important judgments favouring freedom of speech. A theme which runs through this part concerns the extent to which the common law has undermined statutory safeguards for freedom of speech. This is a matter of especial significance under the HRA, since inconsistent common law provisions are not protected under s 6(2) HRA when applying the guarantee under Art 10 to a public authority. As Chapter 4 explained, incompatible common law provisions do not enjoy the protection afforded to statutory ones, although their precise legal position in relation to the Convention is complex.[92]

Clearly, this is not to argue that no English statute governing freedom of expression has to be modified by interpretation under Art 10 relying on the Human Rights Act. In examining the statutory provisions considered in this Part, it will become apparent that 91 See the House of Lords' decisions in the Derbyshire case [1993] AC 534; [1993] 1 All ER 1011; [1992] 3 WLR 28 and in Ex p Simms [1999] QB 349, considered above in Chapter 3, pp 125–26.

92 See pp 254–55.

some of them, especially in the field of public protest, provide extremely wide powers intended to protect other interests. It must, however, be remembered that they were framed by a parliament which had no domestic legal brake upon its powers, although post-1951 the UK was bound by the Convention at the international level. At times, it has been prepared to frame laws which, if fully enforced, would severely damage freedom of expression. Post-2000, as Chapter 4 argues, new legislation affecting freedom of expression has almost invariably been accompanied by a statement of its compatibility with the Convention (the exception is the Communications Act 2003), but this does not mean that incompatibility will not be found. Further, the statement may be issued on the basis of an interpretation grounded in a minimal version of the Convention. It is suggested that this is true of parts of the Terrorism Acts 2000 and 2006, discussed further in Chapter 14, in relation to its effects on freedom of expression.

But pre- and post-Human Rights Act legislation affecting freedom of expression shares the same characteristic: the laws are not – in normal circumstances - fully enforced; if they were, the consequent clash between the media and the government would bring the law into further disrepute. Thus, although by examining the provisions of these statutes, an indication of the 'balance' Parliament had in mind may be gained, other more nebulous factors, including the influence of powerful media bodies, must also be taken into account. Such factors may not apply in relation to public protest, and one of the concerns of this Part is to reveal the different emphasis placed on expression arising as protest rather than as an aspect of media freedom.

But a key concern of this Part is to evaluate whether any change in this 'balance' is occurring under the Human Rights Act and to consider the extent to which any such a change reflects the theoretical justifications underpinning various aspects of freedom of expression. The extent to which such justifications are likely to play a part in determining the resolution of the conflict between expression and a number of societal and individual interests, under the Human Rights Act, will form a central theme.

Chapter 5

Restraining Freedom of Expression under the law of contempt

1 Introduction[1]

This chapter is essentially concerned with two interests which are frequently perceived as being in conflict - the administration of justice and media freedom. The protection of the administration of justice is a general aim which is not concerned solely with protecting the right of the individual to a fair trial, although it may have that effect. Domestically, the interest in the administration of justice has been protected by the law of contempt, although obviously the main responsibility for ensuring fairness in criminal trials or civil actions remains with the judge. A number of aspects of contempt law are discussed below, including its use in curbing pre-trial discussions and publicity in the media which might influence those involved in forthcoming proceedings; threats to justice in the long-term sense, and requirements to disclose journalistic sources. It is apparent that, prima facie, contempt law creates interferences with the guarantee of freedom of expression under Art 10. The interference may be justified where it has the legitimate aim of 'maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary' under para 2. This phrase may be taken to cover the preservation of the integrity of the administration of justice, including the rights of litigants. Since contempt law has a role to play in preventing prejudice to proceedings or in deterring the media from causing such prejudice, it may be viewed as a means of protecting Art 6 rights,[2] although the main responsibility for providing such protection falls on the trial judge.[3] Viewed as exceptions to Art 10, such rights fall within the rubric 'the rights of others' in para 2, as well as that of 'maintaining the authority of the judiciary'. (Since court proceedings may bring an individual to the attention of the media, with the result that details of their personal lives are revealed, the guarantee of respect for private life under Art 8 may also be relevant; the implications of this possibility are discussed in Part III, Chapter 9). Contempt law therefore comes into conflict with free expression, either on the basis of protecting general societal interests or other individual rights. Article 6 is not engaged where the threat is to the administration of justice in a general or long-term sense. Similarly, the use of contempt law to require the disclosure of sources would not normally engage Art 6, although it clearly does create an interference with the Art 10 guarantee, and moreover one which is viewed at Strasbourg as particularly serious, as indicated below.

1 Texts referred to in this chapter: Miller, CJ, Contempt of Court, 1999, OUP; Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 1st edn, 1987, 2nd edn, 2007, Chapter 8; Sufrin, B and Lowe, N, The Law of Contempt, 1996, Butterworths; Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act, 2006; Robertson, G, Media Law, 1999, Chapter 6; Arlidge, A and Smith, ATH, Arlidge, Eady and Smith on Contempt, 2nd edn, 1999, Sweet and Maxwell; Barendt, E and Hitchens, L, Media Law: Cases and Materials, 2000, Chapters 12, 13 and 14; Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, The Law of Human Rights, 2nd edn, 2006, Chapter 15; Marshall, G, 'Press freedom and free speech theory' [1992] PL 40; Laws LJ, 'Problems in the law of contempt' (1990) CLP 99; Naylor, B [1994] CLJ 492; Laws LJ (2000) 116 LQR 157. For a historical overview, see: Fox, The History of Contempt of Court, 1927, Butterworths; Goodhart, AL, 'Newspapers and contempt of court in England' (1935) 48 Harv LR 885.

2 See Chapter 2, pp 59–66.

3 See the comments of Simon Brown LJ regarding the differing roles of the judge in contempt proceedings and at trial: Attorney General v Birmingham Post and Mail Ltd [1998] 4 All ER 49.

But the notion that free speech and the administration of justice are likely to come into conflict should be examined further. This Part began by arguing that one of the most influential justifications for free speech arises from the part it plays in furthering democratic values. Speech which, under strict scrutiny, undermines the fairness of a trial can be viewed as attacking such values rather than upholding them. Chapter 9 argues that the conflict between speech and privacy is more apparent than real since, as Emerson puts it, the rights are 'mutually supportive in that both are vital features of the basic system of individual rights'.[4] It is suggested that, to an extent, this may also be said of free speech and fair trials. In a democracy, free speech serves the ends of justice since the free debate of conceptions of justice may allow for the inclusion of a variety of views within the process of justice which will therefore enhance its moral authority.[5] Thus, if one of the justifications for speech is that it supports the fairness of trials by scrutinising justice, as an aspect of the 'open' justice principle, speech which, on careful scrutiny, creates unfairness may legitimately be restricted since it undermines that central justification. In other words, freedom of speech has a key role as an essential aspect of a fair system of justice, but speech which affects the impartiality of a hearing may undermine public confidence in the role of the courts and the administration of justice, and can therefore undermine its key role.

Further, it is a central tenet of a democracy that justice should not be arbitrary, and therefore the state has a duty to ensure that all have equal access to justice. As Chapter 1 indicated, rights are premised on the notion that the state has a duty to treat all its citizens with equal concern and respect. That notion underlies, it is argued, both free speech and fair trials. If the fair trial of an individual is arbitrarily affected by media coverage, since that individual is accused of a crime which has caught public attention, the state has failed to secure equal access to justice. Therefore, restrictions on such coverage may be justified on the basis that free speech which creates such an interference undermines an aspect of its own underlying rationale.

In many such instances, no sufficient competing aspect is available in order to found the argument that the restrictions are unjustified, since the speech in question may be trivial and sensationalist, motivated solely by profit-making concerns. The fact that newspaper coverage constitutes 'speech' should not be allowed to obscure the failure of some sensationalist coverage of certain cases to participate in almost all the justifications for affording speech primacy over competing interests. Moreover, the 4 Emerson, C, 'The right to privacy and the freedom of the press' (1979) 14(2) Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties L Rev 329, p 331.

5 See further Allan, TRS, 'Procedural fairness and the duty of respect' [1988] 18 OJLS 497, esp pp 507–10.

guarantee under Art 10 is most strongly engaged, not only when those justifications, especially the argument from democracy, are at stake, but when the promulgator of the speech is also observing the duties and responsibilities which accompany the exercise of the freedom.[6] Such responsibilities include that of avoiding the invasion of the interests protected under para 2 in a manner which is unnecessary in a democratic society and which is motivated and determined merely by market considerations. Thus, it may be concluded that careful differentiation must be maintained between speech which conflicts with the underlying aims of both free speech and justice, and speech which furthers those aims.

But the argument regarding the harmony between the furtherance of the ends of both justice and speech may break down, it is suggested, where the dominant conception of justice is itself arguably flawed and an instance arises, related to a specific trial, which is especially illustrative of that flaw. In other words, it provides a strikingly paradigmatic example, which may not soon be repeated. For example, the percentage of convictions for rape is extremely low. In a rape trial, the fact that a defendant had a number of rape convictions, or had been acquitted of rape on numerous occasions, would not normally go before the jury. If a newspaper, which was campaigning for improvement in the conviction rate for rape, disclosed such facts pre-trial, as part of its campaign, and, in particular, as part of an argument that rape convictions should be disclosed to the jury, it might seek to justify its publication on the basis that it would influence debate as to conceptions of justice in such trials and might therefore serve the ends of both free speech and justice. The interest in the efficacy of speech as well as in its justifications in a formal sense could be relied on in an effort to outweigh the argument that the use of this particular trial in order to give bite to the campaign had undermined the principle of equal access to justice.

This example illustrates the difficulty of formulating a general principle of harmony between the interests involved. But, as a general proposition, subject to exceptions, it is argued that the idea of antinomy between free speech and fair trials is misconceived. If these underlying ideas are taken into account, they provide a means of analysing domestic and Convention rules for their legitimacy in terms of the harmony between the principles underlying free speech and the administration of justice. Where they fail to promote such harmony, reforms will be suggested. It will be argued that the Convention jurisprudence has gone somewhat further than domestic jurisprudence in recognising such harmony, bearing in mind the central aim of the Convention, which is to protect and promote democratic values. However, in certain instances, it will be suggested that the influence of the margin of appreciation doctrine has led to failures in this respect.

The central concern of this chapter is the impact, actual and potential, that the European Convention on Human Rights under the Human Rights Act is having and could have on aspects of domestic contempt law. It will indicate that the domestic development of the law of contempt was quite strongly influenced by the Strasbourg jurisprudence, pre-HRA. While the common law afforded supremacy to the administration of justice, Strasbourg aided in the creation of a shift in favour in freedom of expression. Nevertheless, despite the influence of the Convention, this Chapter will contend that domestic contempt law still fails to satisfy the demands of Art 10 in certain respects. It will also be argued that, as currently administered, it fails to protect the administration of justice and, in some respects, to meet the demands of Art 6. The response of UK contempt law to findings at Strasbourg and the judicial domestic interpretations of the Convention have not shown a sufficient appreciation, it will be argued, of its key underpinning values. In particular, the extent to which the apparent conflict between Arts 10 and 6 may be resolvable at the level of principle has largely gone unrecognised. These failings are revealed, it will be contended, by testing contempt law and practice more directly against Convention standards under the Human Rights Act.

6 Article 10, para 1.

2 Publications prejudicing proceedings: the strict liability rule

A central area of contempt law is that which is concerned with publications potentially interfering with the course of justice in civil or criminal proceedings. Media bodies may incur liability for contempt due to potentially prejudicial reporting of and discussion of, or relating to, pending proceedings. This form of contempt is therefore intended to limit the freedom of the media to report on or comment on issues arising from, or related to, the administration of justice. Such restriction answers to a genuine public interest in ensuring that justice is properly administered and is unaffected by bodies who are unlikely to judge the merits of a case fairly. If, for example, a large number of tabloids, in pursuit of a newsworthy story, take the view that a defendant is guilty, they may slant stories and pictures so that they seem to give that impression and such coverage may affect the jury. If so, the conviction will have been influenced by the partial views of a certain group of people who do not have all the evidence available to them and are influenced by concerns other than the concern to ensure fairness in decision making. If a trial seems to have been prejudiced by unfair reporting, a successful appeal may be brought on that basis,[7] but this method only creates a remedy for the defendant; it does not deter the media from such behaviour in future. No one would argue that this is a desirable method of preventing prejudice to the administration of justice, since it may allow the factually guilty to be acquitted or the innocent to be convicted.

In seeking to avoid such interferences with the course of justice while also affording protection to the freedom of the press, states have chosen to adopt either a protective or a neutralising model,[8] or a mixture of both. Under the protective model, the state seeks to protect court proceedings by deterring the media from the publication of potentially prejudicial material, while allowing non-prejudicial reporting of proceedings and of discussion relating to them. This model has traditionally been used in the UK. Under the neutralising model, the emphasis is placed on dealing with the potential effects of prejudicial material, by means of procedural devices aimed at ensuring the impartiality of the jury. The aim is to ensure that the potential effect of prejudicial publicity is neutralised. Such devices include the use of strong directions to the jury, jury challenges, changing the trial venue, stays, and sequestration of the jury. If neutralising measures fail, the remedial measure of acquittal may be the last resort. Both models seek to ensure fair hearings, but the former seeks to do so by curbing media freedom to an extent, the latter by insulating the hearing from potentially prejudicial publications, while leaving media freedom largely intact.

7 See the successful appeal on this basis in Taylor (1993) 98 Cr App R 361, CA (for discussion, see below, p 345).

8 See Cram, I [1998] EHRLR 742.

Since the First Amendment provides an unqualified guarantee, the emphasis in the US has been on neutralising measures rather than on sanctions intended to deter the media from publishing potentially prejudicial material.[9] In Nebraska Press Association v Stuart[10] the Supreme Court held that adverse publicity before a trial would not necessarily have a prejudicial effect on it and that therefore, a prior restraint would not be granted. Barendt, commenting on this decision, argues that subsequent restraints might therefore also be unconstitutional; thus, a conviction might not be obtained in respect of an already published article which created a risk of prejudicial effect.[11] Therefore witnesses' statements may be obtained pre-trial, while assertions of guilt or confessions and hearings to determine the admissibility of evidence[12] may all be made public. The use of procedural devices such as delaying the trial, or changing its venue, as an alternative to restraining the media, are not always very effective, leaving open the possibility that defendants may appeal against conviction and obtain an acquittal owing to the publicity. Certain US commentators therefore favour adoption of the protective approach used in Britain.[13] A further possible model is directly preventive of prejudicial effects in the sense that certain material is barred from publication by means of prior restraint, pre-trial.

When Canada adopted the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in 1982, the Supreme Court considered that the common law stance of affording the fairness of trials priority over free speech had been changed by the Charter and that therefore, adherence to a neutralising rather than a protective or preventive model had become appropriate. The Court found that a ban on pre-trial publication should only be ordered when 'alternative measures', such as jury sequestration, could not prevent the risk of prejudice.[14] In contrast, Australia has adopted a stance more akin to that of domestic common law, although somewhat less restrictive of freedom of expression.[15]

9 See Knapp (1990) 114 L Ed 2d 763 on the detailed questioning of jury members; see Chesterman (1997) 'OJ and the dingo: how media publicity for criminal jury trials is dealt with in Australia and America' 45 Am Jo Comp Law 109 and Cram [1998] EHRLR 742 on the US neutralising approach generally. As the most extreme neutralising measure, a conviction may be quashed and a retrial ordered. In Shepherd v Maxwell (1966) 384 US 333, a re-trial was ordered because of the extensive media coverage. For comment on Shepherd v Maxwell, see Grant, A, 'Pre-trial publicity and fair trial' (1976) 14 Osgoode Hall LJ 275. The neutralising measure of sequestration of the jury was used in the trial of OJ Simpson in 1995 and attracted widespread criticism in the UK.

10 (1976) 427 US 539.

11 Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 1987, 1987, p 228.

12 United States v Brooklier (1982) 685 F 2d 1162; Re Application of Herald Co (1984) 734 F 2d.

13 See Krause (1996) 76 Boston UL Rev 357.

14 See Dagenais v Canadian Broadcasting Corpn (1995) 120 DLR (4th) 12, p 37. For comment, see Horwitz, 'Jury selection after Dagenais: prejudicial pre-trial publicity' (1996) 42 CR 220.

15 For discussion of the Australian approach, which contrasts it with that adopted in the US, see Chesterman (1997) 45 Am Jo of Comp Law 109. In Australia, contempt cannot be committed until proceedings are pending: James v Robinson (1963) 109 CLR 593.

It is argued below that, contrary to the view which some commentators have taken,[16] Strasbourg has on the whole adopted a protective or preventive rather than a neutralising approach and that therefore, the Convention under the Human Rights Act, unlike the Canadian Charter, does not demand a radical change in the stance of UK law, in this context. Moreover, bearing in mind the arguments outlined above, regarding the underlying harmony of values between free speech and the fair administration of justice, it is argued that the preventive is, in general, to be preferred to the neutralising model since much speech which, under close scrutiny, creates prejudice to trials runs counter to its own underlying justifications, while at the same time the quality of justice may be affected by using neutralising measures.[17] It must be pointed out, however, that the preventive model may become unworkable owing to current technological changes, particularly the use of the internet and the proliferation of websites, a point which will be developed further below. Bearing these points in mind, the central argument will be that while radical change is unnecessary in this area of contempt law, certain reforms are necessary in order to meet, in full, the demands both of media freedom and the administration of justice, as recognised under the Convention, but interpreted domestically under the Human Rights Act.

The Strasbourg stance

Under Art 10, an interference with the guarantee of freedom of expression can be justified if it is prescribed by law, has a legitimate aim and is necessary in a democratic society. Proceedings against a media body for contempt in respect of its coverage of a forthcoming or ongoing action, or of issues impliedly or expressly linked to it, may be justified if they have the legitimate aims of protecting the 'rights of others' and/or of 'maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary'. The 'rights of others' exception covers Art 6 rights. The 'authority' of the judiciary refers to the acceptance of the courts as the proper forums for the settlement of disputes.[18] The term 'impartiality' refers to the preservation of confidence in the courts by persons engaged in dispute settlement and the public in general.[19] This exception was apparently included in the Convention at the instigation of Britain precisely to cover contempt of court.[20] The other European signatories have no clearly comparable law, although laws regulating pre-trial publicity are common.

As indicated, this form of contempt law can be viewed as protecting the right to a fair trial, together with the societal interest in preserving the integrity of the administration of justice. It can be argued, therefore, that where this other 'strong' right is at stake, 16 Mann, FA has written: 'In a potentially wide variety of cases the European Court may assume a revising function and impose continental standards or, perhaps one should say abuses, upon this country which, in the name of freedom of the press and discussion are likely to lower English usages by the substitution of trial by media for trial by courts' (1979) 95 LQR 348, p 352.

17 This point has been made by Chesterman (1997) 45 J Comp Law 109 and by Krause (1996) 76 Boston UL Rev 357. Clearly, devices such as delaying the trial may mean that defendants will spend longer in custody; the stress of victim-witnesses may be increased; memories of the relevant events may fade.

18 Chorherr v Austria (1994) 17 EHRR 358.

19 Fey v Austria (1994) 16 EHRR 387; Worm v Austria (1998) 25 EHRR 454, p 473.

20 See the Joint Dissenting Opinion in Sunday Times v UK (1979) 2 EHRR 245, p 285, para 2.

Strasbourg would accept that free speech must be more readily compromised, unless in the particular instance the speech would in fact further the ends of justice.[21] But resolving these matters under the Convention is not entirely straightforward owing to the particular approach it adopts, which is influenced by its own structural constraints. This approach is revealed by a consideration of the stance taken at Strasbourg to claims that Art 10 has been violated by prosecutions of journalists in respect of publications bearing upon legal proceedings in the line of authority stemming from Sunday Times v UK,[22] Worm v Austria[23] and News Verlags v Austria.[24]

Clashes between the administration of justice and media freedom

The Sunday Times case is discussed in full below. The state argued that the interference with freedom of expression could be justified since it served the legitimate aim of preserving the authority and impartiality of the judiciary. The stance adopted by the Court in finding a breach of Art 10 was explicable on the basis that the interest in protecting such authority or, at a more general level, the administration of justice, was very weak: little threat could be discerned since the litigation in question was dormant. Although, as an aspect of its application of the requirements of proportionality, the Court took the view that the strong free speech interest outweighed the slight impact on the administration of justice, a more satisfactory way of viewing the case is, it is argued, to say that the speech in question engaged strongly in the debate as to the proper ends of justice, but no countervailing considerations regarding equal access to justice or the creation of unfairness genuinely arose.

In contrast, in Worm, the interference with the freedom of speech guarantee had a link with the Art 6 guarantee. Worm v Austria[25] is now the leading authority on balancing expression and fair trial values. Unlike the Sunday Times case, it addressed a real clash between the two since in the circumstances the Art 6 guarantees were clearly engaged. The article in question created a high risk of prejudice: it was published during a criminal trial, clearly imputed guilt and made specific allegations against the defendant. In all these respects, therefore, it created a strong contrast with the article at issue in Sunday Times. Thus Worm, unlike Sunday Times, is properly characterised as a clashing rights case. A political periodical had published an article by Worm, a journalist, about the criminal trial for tax evasion of Hannes Androsch, a former Minister of Finance. The article, published while the trial was ongoing, stated that it had been known for a substantial period of time that Androsch was evading taxes and that it had been proved for some time, by the investigating judge, that Androsch was lying on this key point. In general, the article was highly critical of Androsch and clearly evinced a belief in his guilt. Worm was convicted and fined under s 23 of the Austrian Media Act which provides for the punishment of those who discuss 'subsequent to the indictment and before the judgment at first instance . . . the probable outcome of those proceedings or the value of evidence in a way capable of influencing the outcome.'

21 See the discussion as to when 'strong' individual rights may be infringed in Chapter 1, pp 11–14.
22 (1979) 2 EHRR 245.
23 (1997) 25 EHRR 557; (1998) 25 EHRR 454.
24 (2001) 31 EHRR 8.
25 (1998) 25 EHRR 454.

There is no need to establish that the proceedings have in fact been influenced. The Vienna Court of Appeal considered that the article had a potential influence on the criminal proceedings since it had the capacity to affect at the least the two lay judges involved. It also found that Worm had intended to influence the proceedings.

The European Court of Human Rights accepted that Worm's conviction constituted an interference with the freedom of expression guarantee. The state argued that the prosecution had the legitimate aims of preserving the authority and impartiality of the judiciary and the 'rights of others.' The Court accepted that the conviction had a link with the Art 6(1) guarantee, although it did not pursue the question whether the article had created an interference with the rights of others by undermining the presumption of innocence which is guaranteed under Art 6(2). It found:

> In this regard, the Court has consistently held that the expression 'authority and impartiality of the judiciary' has to be understood 'within the meaning of the Convention'. For this purpose, account must be taken of the central position occupied in this context by Art 6 which reflects the fundamental principle of the rule of law. The phrase 'authority of the judiciary' includes, in particular, the notion that the courts are, and are accepted by the public at large as being, the proper forum for the settlement of legal disputes and for the determination of a person's guilt or innocence on a criminal charge; further, that the public at large have respect for and confidence in the courts' capacity to fulfil that function. 'Impartiality' normally denotes lack of prejudice or bias. However, the Court has repeatedly held that what is at stake in maintaining the impartiality of the judiciary is the confidence which the courts in a democratic society must inspire in the accused, as far as criminal proceedings are concerned, and also in the public at large . . . It follows that, in seeking to maintain the 'authority and impartiality of the judiciary', the Contracting states are entitled to take account of considerations going – beyond the concrete case – to the protection of the fundamental role of courts in a democratic society.[26]

As to the question whether the interference was necessary in a democratic society, the Court found that although the limits of acceptable comment are wider as regards politicians than as regards a private individual, public figures are still entitled to the enjoyment of the guarantee of a fair trial set out in Art 6(1), which in criminal proceedings includes the right to an impartial tribunal. It went on:

> [T]his must be borne in mind by journalists when commenting on pending criminal proceedings since the limits of permissible comment may not extend to statements which are likely to prejudice, whether intentionally or not, the chances of a person receiving a fair trial or to undermine the confidence of the public in the role of the courts in the administration of criminal justice. [27]

The Court conceded a certain margin of appreciation to the state in relation to the particular choice made by the domestic authorities in relation to what was needed to protect the administration of justice, since – as it does not adopt the role of a domestic appellate court – it did not second guess the evidence. It accepted that there was no necessity to demonstrate that prejudice to the proceedings had actually arisen. It found that it was,

26 Ibid, at para 40.
27 Ibid, at para 50.

> . . . in principle for the appellate court to evaluate the likelihood that at least the lay judges would read the article to ascertain the applicant's criminal intent in publishing it. It cannot be excluded that the public's becoming accustomed to the regular spectacle of pseudo-trials in the news media might in the long run have nefarious consequences for the acceptance of the courts as the proper forum for the determination of a person's guilt or innocence on a criminal charge.[28]

The sanction was found to be proportionate to the aim pursued since a fairly minor penalty only – a fine – was imposed and the publishing firm was ordered to be jointly and severally liable for its payment. Thus the proportionality analysis was based on means/end balancing[29] – the measures taken, it was found, did not go further than necessary to protect the right to a fair trial in the circumstances. No breach of Art 10 was therefore found.

This was an instance in which it could more readily be argued than in the Sunday Times case that the speech ran counter to the underlying speech-supporting rationales discussed above, in the sense that it was more likely to cause prejudice to the trial. The Court's approach rested on the possibility that the article had made it very difficult to ensure that the tribunal was impartial. It took the stance that the Art 10 guarantee could be justifiably infringed in order to protect Androsch's right to a fair trial under Art 6(1). But it also spoke of the general principles encapsulated under Art 6. The Court explicitly refused to look at the question whether the proceedings in question had actually been affected by the publication; it refused to consider whether the Austrian media law should have concerned itself with that issue. Therefore it explicitly denied that there was a need to show an actual interference with Art 6 rights (or at least a very strong probability that such an interference had occurred) before an interference with the Art 10 guarantee – in the context of political expression – could be justified. Thus, it seemed to adopt both a protective and a preventive approach, though laying more stress on the former. An obvious unfairness was potentially created by the article, but the Court also concentrated on the longer term harm that it might have created to the administration of justice in a broader sense. The state's case was obviously problematic in Sunday Times since the litigation in question was dormant. In contrast, in Worm, the state had acted to avert a genuine risk to the trial; the Court made it clear that Art 6 will take precedence over Art 10 where it can be said that there is a real likelihood of prejudice.

The stance adopted in Worm had been foreshadowed to an extent in the Commission's decisions in C v UK[30] and BBC Scotland v UK.[31] C v UK concerned a broadcast reproducing parts of the appeal in the Birmingham Six case. The intention of the

28 Ibid, para 54.
29 See Chapter 4, p 286.
30 (1989) 61 DR 285.
31 (1997) 25 EHRR CD 179.

broadcasters was that it should be shown before the final judgment in the appeal, but the Court of Appeal hearing the case granted an injunction preventing the broadcast of the programme until after the appeal had been heard. The Commission found no breach of Art 10 on the basis that there was a pressing social need to delay the programme; the portrayal of the hearing by actors would condition the response of the audience since the actors would be bound to communicate suggestions about the reliability of the witnesses they were portraying. Also the Commission accepted the view of the Court of Appeal that while the Courts' judgment would normally be unaffected, the appellants had the right to be assured that the Court had been unaffected by external matters.[32]

The application in BBC Scotland v UK[33] arose from the prohibition of a broadcast which featured allegations that prisoners moved to Barlinnie Prison after prison riots had been assaulted there by prison officers. The broadcast 'Beaten by the System' was an update on one previously broadcast on the same subject. An indictment had been served on three prison officers alleging that they had assaulted prisoners, about three weeks before the programme was to be broadcast. The Scottish High Court relied on its inherent equitable jurisdiction to issue an order prohibiting the broadcast until the completion of the trial of the officers, on the ground that the programme would create a risk of prejudice to the trial. The risk of prejudice arose, so the High Court found, since at least one of the jurors might have obtained from the programme the impression that the prison doctor interviewed, who was a witness for the prosecution, was a witness of considerable credit. The Court noted that the broadcast was not particularly urgent and that there was a more than minimal risk of prejudice. The applicants complained that the order of the High Court constituted a breach of Art 10.

The Commission accepted that the order constituted an interference with the freedom of expression guarantee. It went on to find that the order had the legitimate aim of protecting the right of the officers to a fair trial; therefore it was for the preservation of the authority and impartiality of the judiciary and for the protection of the 'rights of others'. In considering the question whether the order was necessary in a democratic society it might have been expected that the Commission would have subjected it to that 'most careful scrutiny' which prior restraints demand.[34] Instead the Commission largely adopted the High Court's assessment of the necessity and proportionality of the order. The Commission appeared to be assessing the reasonableness of the High Court's findings in balancing the free speech and fair trial interests, rather than considering the issues itself. In speaking of the 'balancing act' carried out by the High Court, the Commission clearly did not view itself as applying a principle of freedom of expression subject to exceptions to be narrowly construed. Thus the need for the interference was not subjected to a strict scrutiny. Had it been, it is possible that a breach of Art 10 might have been found, bearing in mind the uncertainty of the risk of prejudice and the probability that the programme would never be broadcast once it had been postponed.

32 Ibid, p 294.
33 (1997) 25 EHRR CD 179.
34 Observer and Guardian v UK (1991) 14 EHRR 153, at para 60.

The stance taken in this line of authority was confirmed in News Verlags v Austria.[35] At first sight News Verlags presents something of a contrast to Worm v Austria, C v UK and BBC Scotland v UK in terms of the intensity of the review, but ultimately the findings are consistent with the previous ones. The case concerned a somewhat weaker Art 10 claim; the 'rights of others' exception was invoked to justify the restriction on the speech in question, but the application succeeded. The case concerned the prosecution of the News Company for the publication of a photograph of a right wing extremist, B, who was accused of sending letter bombs as part of a political campaign. The text accompanying the photograph accused him of being the perpetrator of the attacks. The applicant company complained that court decisions prohibiting it from publishing the photograph in the context of reports on the criminal proceedings against it, violated its right to freedom of expression. The aims pursued were to protect the rights of others and the authority of the judiciary. The Court noted that the 'rights of others' exception was relevant since, inter alia, the injunctions were intended to protect B against violations of the presumption of innocence, protected by Art 6(2).

The case turned on the proportionality of the interference with the legitimate aims pursued. The Court subjected this question to a detailed review, conceding only a narrow margin of appreciation to the state. It took into account the possible effect on the Art 6(2) rights of B. But it also took account of the facts that he had sought publicity as a Nazi activist and that the offences in question had a political background and were 'directed against the foundations of a democratic society'.[36] Reiterating the significance of the essential function of the press in a democratic society, the Court pointed out that the duty of the press to inform the public extends to reporting and commenting on court proceedings and noted the consonance of its discharge of such a duty with the requirement under Art 6(1) that hearings should be public. The injunctions restricted the choice of the newspaper as to its presentation of reports. The Court in particular took account of the fact that, although objection was taken only to the picture in conjunction with the adverse comments, the injunction created an absolute prohibition on publishing a picture of B with or without such comments. It may be argued that the intensity of the review undertaken in this instance was due partly to the special circumstances of the case, especially the fact that, as a right wing extremist, B had himself sought publicity for his views in the past. But the key point was that the photograph alone was unlikely to cause prejudice to the proceedings and yet the effect of the injunction was to prohibit any publication of it, even if accompanying a fair and accurate factual report of the proceedings. The injunction, therefore, was manifestly overbroad since it caught harmless publications. Thus the proportionality analysis was again based on means/end balancing[37] – the measures taken, it was found, went further than needed to serve the end in question. The Court concluded on that basis that there was no reasonable relationship of proportionality between the interference and the aims pursued.

The injunction also affected the openness of the proceedings, since publication of such reports was found to be consonant with that aspect of Art 6(1). Although it might be argued that the publication of this particular photograph had little impact on 35 (2001) 31 EHRR 8; (2000) 9 BHRC 625.

36 Ibid, at paras 54 and 55.
37 See Chapter 4, p 286.

open justice, the judgment may be said to protect both the substance and the form of reporting on court proceedings. Thus, the Court made explicit, in a partial sense, the consonance between Arts 10 and 6. That line of argument could have been taken further and the broader harmony between the aims of free speech and the protection for the administration of justice could have been more clearly articulated. News Verlags differs somewhat from the previous line of authority in terms of the intensity of the review that was undertaken, but does not represent a significant departure from it since the potential impact on the trial was thought to be very slight, whereas the effect on media freedom was viewed as quite significant. Moreover, the case concerned an obviously overbroad injunction.

Given the tendency of the Court to view its approach to the interests of freedom of expression and the administration of justice as 'the balancing of competing interests'[38] where a claim raising these issues arises under Art 10, it is arguable that the stance taken would have differed had the Austrian Court refused to grant the injunction and B had brought a claim to Strasbourg, arguing for a violation of Art 6(2). In Ribemont v France[39] an application brought on the basis of a violation of the Art 6(2) guarantee owing to the effect of publicity succeeded once the violation was found since, apart from provisions allowing for the exclusion of persons from a hearing in certain circumstances (see below), Art 6 is not qualified. The Court went on to find that the comments made about Ribemont went beyond merely providing information and had created a breach of Art 6(2):

> [S]ome of the highest-ranking officers in the French police referred to Mr Allenet de Ribemont, without any qualification or reservation, as one of the instigators of a murder and thus an accomplice in that murder. This was clearly a declaration of the applicant's guilt which, firstly, encouraged the public to believe him guilty and, secondly, prejudged the assessment of the facts by the competent judicial authority.'[40]

Once the violation of Art 6(2) was found, the application succeeded since, apart from provisions allowing for the exclusion of persons from a hearing in certain circumstances, Art 6 is not qualified.

In contrast, in Wloch v Poland[41] an allegation that numerous newspaper comments shortly after the applicant's arrest had led to a violation of Art 6(2) was rejected on the basis that on the facts it was extremely unlikely that the comments could have affected the judges who were to preside over the trial. Long after the time of publication – a matter of about six years – the judges who would preside over the trial had still not been empanelled. It was clearly highly unlikely that the newspaper comments would be remembered with any clarity by the judges when they were eventually empanelled 38 Paragraph 56, relying on the judgment in Bladet Tromsø and Stensaas v Norway (2000) 29 EHRR 125; (1999) 6 BHRC 599.

39 (1995) 20 EHRR 557. The Court found that Art 6(2) had been breached by a statement made by the French Minister of the Interior and senior police officers at a press conference in which they named the applicant as involved in a murder.

40 Ibid, at para 41.

41 March 2000, Information note No 16; for the other aspects of the application see (2002) 34 EHRR 9.

and even more unlikely that they would have any influence. Thus it was found that there was no evidence that the presumption of innocence had been violated and so this aspect of Wloch's application was dismissed as manifestly ill-founded. This decision is of little value in terms of supporting the argument that the British media have some leeway to comment on the guilt or innocence of a potential defendant, since it could only be utilised where there had been a very significant time lapse between publication and trial. A lapse of around six years would not normally occur in the UK.

Balance created between Article 6 and Article 10

As a preliminary comment on the above jurisprudence, it may be found that where a matter comes before the Court in the form of an Art 10 claim, the Court's reasoning follows the contours of that Article, which require it to afford presumptive primacy to freedom of expression and to regard the administration of justice as an exception to that right. It is perhaps inevitable, then, that the two interests will be viewed, broadly, as competing. Where the same or similar issues arise, exceptionally, in the form of an Art 6 claim, it appears that there can be no balancing of competing interests,[42] except as regards the requirements of a public hearing in Art 6(1), since Art 6 is otherwise unqualified. The question is merely whether, on the facts, a breach of Art 6 could have arisen due to media comment – no question of justification arises. The choices thereby apparent, informing the moral framework of the Convention, indicate that in this context Art 6 takes precedence over Art 10. Therefore where an infringement of the guarantee under Art 6 might genuinely arise as a result of a publication, the Court is almost bound to find no breach of Art 10, despite the fact that when it is dealing with an Art 10 claim it has to treat an arguable violation of Art 6 as arising, technically, in the form of an exception under Art 10(2).

The Court's statement in Worm to the effect that 'the limits of permissible comment may not extend to statements which are likely to prejudice, whether intentionally or not, the chances of a person receiving a fair trial' bears out this finding. This comment suggests that speech (including political speech) which infringes the presumption of innocence, or is likely to infringe it, will readily be overridden by the fair trial guarantee. This is not because the speech is seen as of low value, but because the competing interest is so weighty.[43] In other words, the treatment of speech that invades another right protected by the Convention may tend to cut across the established categories of expression as 'political,' 'artistic' and 'commercial'. This is especially the case where the expression affects one of the unqualified, or not materially qualified, rights. Even where the speech is within the category occupying the highest place in the hierarchy of speech, as in Worm, that factor does not appear to play a significant role in the 42 See the discussion of the 'parallel analysis' in re S [2003] 2 FCR 577, CA; [2004] UKHL 47; the decision is discussed in Chapter 9, pp 958–79.

43 To a lesser extent this is also the case in relation to privacy-invading speech and speech offensive to religious sensibilities – breaching Art 9. See Otto-Preminger (1994) 19 EHRR 34 in relation to speech that the Court has viewed as clashing with the Art 9 guarantee of freedom of religion. Tammer v Estonia (2003) 37 EHRR 43 and N v Portugal (Appl No 20683/92, 20.2.1995) both indicated that quite draconian penalties for invasion of privacy are compatible with Art 10. See further Chapter 9, pp 945–46.

stance taken – the value of the speech does not appear to be weighed up against the effect on the other Convention right.

One difficulty with the Court's approach is that it can allow interferences with freedom of expression even where the Art 6 rights of a particular defendant are only doubtfully threatened – as BBC Scotland indicates. A further difficulty is that the Court is also prepared to draw the line at allowing comments that 'are likely to . . . undermine the confidence of the public in the role of the courts in the administration of criminal justice.'[44] On the other hand, it avoided such a stance in the Sunday Times case. The exception – the 'authority of the judiciary' – is not linked to criminal proceedings alone and many of the comments made by the Court in Worm regarding the fear of undermining public confidence in such authority could have equal validity in relation to civil actions. It considered that one aspect of the mischief to be avoided was that of a threat to the administration of justice in a general sense. It justified such a stance by reference to the rule of law principle encapsulated in Art 6 regarding the need to maintain confidence in the courts. In other words, it sought to reconcile the stance taken under Art 10(2) with that taken in relation to Art 6, partly on the basis of infringing Art 10 in order to avoid a concrete harm in Art 6 terms, but also at a broader level of principle. The difference of approach may partly be explicable on the basis that the Court is particularly concerned with the protection of the administration of justice in criminal rather than civil proceedings. Clearly, where laypersons are concerned in the justice process – which is more likely to be the case in criminal proceedings[45] – the risk of unfairness due to the influence of publications may be higher. The fear of 'trial by newspaper' that exercised the House of Lords in Attorney General v Times appeared to strike the Court as of especial significance in relation to criminal proceedings.

The Court's differences of approach to Art 10 claims in this context are therefore explicable by reference to the question whether the term 'the authority of the judiciary' can or cannot be viewed as covering interests that are quite closely linked to the concrete demands of Art 6 in that instance. The effect of the margin of appreciation doctrine is variable. Where the rhetoric of 'protection for the administration of justice' in a non-concrete sense is used in relation to a publication that in actuality relates closely to particular proceedings, especially criminal ones, and creates some risk to those proceedings, a margin of appreciation may be conceded in assessing the degree of risk. The Sunday Times case established that the interference with freedom of expression represented by curbing media freedom to comment on a forthcoming action or on issues linked to it must answer to a pressing social need.[46] Where, as in that instance, the interference is aimed – broadly – at the protection of the administration of justice, but has only a very indirect and uncertain justification in terms of protecting particular litigation, the review of the existence of such a need is likely to be intense. But where the interference appears to be fairly strongly linked to the preservation of Art 6 rights, since a particular trial is quite clearly affected, the margin of appreciation doctrine may not have a significant role, and the interference may be found to be justified, as in Worm and BBC Scotland v UK, since, where two rights are viewed as in conflict, the 44 (1998) 25 EHRR 454, at para 50.

45 In the UK juries are used in certain civil proceedings, notably libel actions and in certain civil actions against the police: see Supreme Court Act 1981 s 69.

46 (1979) 2 EHRR 245, at para 62.

Court will prefer the (almost) unqualified right under Art 6. Free expression has a role in supporting confidence in the administration of justice; this is made explicit under the Art 6 guarantee of a public hearing and by the Court; but as the Court made plain in the cases considered, speech that undermines that confidence may be fairly readily displaced by the competing administration of justice interest. Within the Strasbourg rhetoric, therefore, regarding competing interests, a recognition of the consonance between the values underlying them is evident.

Approaches to the domestic impact of the Convention under the Human Rights Act

A court, adjudicating on an action for contempt against a media organ is bound by all the Convention rights under s 6 HRA and in this context must ensure that Arts 10 and 6 – as particularly relevant – are satisfied. It must also interpret the provisions of the Contempt of Court Act 1981 compatibly with the Convention under s 3 if a potential incompatibility arises; the common law could potentially be modified in reliance on the courts' duty under s 6, although, as discussed below, significant change in the key common law contempt area is now unlikely. Section 2 HRA requires the courts to take the Convention jurisprudence into account in satisfying their duties under ss 6 or 3. But the discussion above has indicated that the impact of the Convention on this area of domestic contempt law is complex. It is not enough to argue merely that the Convention demands a shift towards freedom of expression, since such an argument fails to take account of the demands of Art 6 and the need to protect the administration of justice in a general sense.

In so far as, traditionally, domestic contempt law favoured the protection of the administration of justice over the protection of freedom of expression, it failed to strike a balance which is consistent with the Convention. The domestic inquiry pre-HRA always began by considering the law governing the interference with the negative liberty of expression. The domestic courts have traditionally been preoccupied with the administration of justice rather than with individual rights to free speech. This approach was modified in the pre-HRA era under the Contempt of Court Act 1981, which was a response to the finding at Strasbourg[47] that common law contempt had failed to afford sufficient weight to freedom of expression, as explained below. The approach adopted may now require further modification under the HRA, but the structure of domestic decision-making need not fully follow the Strasbourg model since Art 10 and, in some instances, Art 6 issues normally arise during a contempt action[48] rather than as aspects of an Art 10 claim. Article 6 issues may also be raised during a criminal trial or on appeal as part of an argument that the jury or others would be or had been affected by the publication of prejudicial journalistic material.

As argued above, although the overturning of a conviction or a stay of proceedings can be used as a remedy where there has been a violation of Art 6 rights due to media publicity, it would be more satisfactory to use preventive measures where the possibility of prejudice to proceedings genuinely arises. Strasbourg tends to favour such measures, as indicated, although where the connection between protecting the right to a fair trial and suppressing the speech in question is doubtful, it will subject them to an intense scrutiny. It will be argued that, at the present time, contempt law is not fulfilling this preventive role, but that neutralising measures have not fully taken its place. Common law contempt afforded primacy to the interest in the administration of justice, but it is suggested that statutory contempt is not engaging fully with the core values underlying either free speech or the administration of justice. In particular, it will be argued that contempt law is failing to meet Art 6 demands that the relevant legislation, and executive decisions taken in relation to it, should be efficacious in protecting the right to a fair trial.[49] This failure is partly due to the height of the bar that must be surmounted if a contempt action is to be successful – this point is considered below. The failure also relates, it is argued, to the role of the Attorney General, who has the responsibility under s 7 of the Contempt of Court Act 1981 for initiating prosecutions against media bodies.[50] Theoretically, superior courts[51] can punish contempts on their own motion. This inherent power is preserved under s 7. In practice, the courts do not exercise this power in respect of publications subject to the strict liability rule (see below). A party to proceedings in a superior court could put, through counsel, the argument that a publication is prejudicial. The judge could then refer the matter to the Attorney General. This would not necessarily mean, however, that proceedings would be brought.[52]

47 In the Sunday Times case (1979) 2 EHRR 245 (see below, pp 334–37).

48 They might also arise in judicial review proceedings; this is discussed below in relation to Taylor, p 345.

The Attorney General can also seek an injunction to restrain a planned publication and, in this respect, can be viewed as having a limited vetting role.[53] He may also issue warnings to the media regarding coverage of cases which have attracted public attention.[54] The Attorney General is a member of the Cabinet. Theoretically, he or she acts in two distinct capacities – as a member of the government and as an independent law officer. His role as law officer places him, theoretically, at a distance from the government. In practice, his impartiality may be questioned, owing to the conflict of interests inherent in his dual role. He may come under pressure to initiate prosecutions in cases in which the government itself has an interest. As Borrie and Lowe observe: ‘in cases such as these the Attorney’s role . . . does smack of partisanship’.[55] Conversely, it is possible that he may be reluctant to initiate proceedings when to do so would mean bringing the government – in effect – into conflict with powerful media proprietors.

49 Such demands are those indicated in BBC Scotland v UK (1998) 25 EHRR CD 179. See also Worm v Austria (1998) 25 EHRR 454 or News Verlags (2001) 31 EHRR 8, although the laws at issue in those instances were not contempt laws.

50 Section 7 provides: ‘Proceedings for a contempt of court under the strict liability rule shall not be instituted except by or with the consent of the Attorney General or on the motion of a court having jurisdiction to deal with it.’

51 In England and Wales, the House of Lords, the Court of Appeal, the High Court of Justice, the Crown Court, the Restrictive Practices Court, the Employment Appeals Tribunal, the Courts-Martial Appeal Court.

52 See *R v Taylor and Taylo*r (1993) 98 Cr App R 361 (discussed below, p 345).

53 This occurred in Attorney General v Times Newspapers Ltd [1974] AC 273 (see below, pp 335–36).

54 He issued such warnings in respect of the ‘Yorkshire Ripper’ case and in the case of Frederick and Rosemary West.

55 The Law of Contempt, 1996, p 485.

Clearly, there will be variable practice between the office-holders in these respects, but this inconsistency itself has a questionable effect on the quality of justice and the protection for media freedom. As certain of the decisions discussed below indicate, it cannot be said that when the massed tabloids act, effectively, in concert in their coverage of a trial-related story, they are immune from prosecutions. But it will be argued that a reluctance to prosecute a large number of media organs simultaneously, especially those with large circulations, is evident. The result is arguably that the tendency to prosecute those parts of the press which have the most central role in furthering the values underpinning political speech is not in proportion to their tendency to affect the fairness of trials.

The Attorney General is bound by s 6 HRA and, therefore, must ensure that both Arts 10 and 6 are satisfied. While it may be argued that contempt law does not directly provide a remedy where a publication has prejudiced a trial or may be about to do so, it has a link with Art 6, as indicated in the Strasbourg jurisprudence. Injunctions are infrequently granted,[56] but would be of value as a preventive measure. An injunction against one newspaper would prevent it from pursuing a story, while it would tend to deter others from running variations on the same story, since they might incur criminal liability for contempt.[57] The use of injunctions could prevent the risk of prejudice arising from a wide-ranging and relentless coverage of issues relevant in a forthcoming trial. More generally, prosecutions for contempt, where Art 6 rights were violated, might have a future deterrent effect. In other words, the link between the use of contempt law and Art 6 should be given some weight in the current situation in which the judiciary understandably do not at present use neutralising measures, such as stays, extensively to combat possibly prejudicial publicity.[58]

As indicated above, once a contempt action is in being, the national court is not in the same position as Strasbourg since the part played by the margin of appreciation at Strasbourg should not be reflected in domestic decision making. Thus, where Arts 6 and 10 rights appear to be at stake, detailed and rigorous review could determine how far this is the case. The central concern should be the need to isolate the fundamental values at stake in terms of both free speech and fair trials and to tailor domestic law in order to protect them.

In a contempt action, the court is bound by the Convention rights under s 6 of the HRA and, where the statutory provisions were in question, could seek to ensure that it discharged that obligation by interpreting them compatibly with the relevant guarantees. It is suggested that the domestic court could examine the effect of finding liability in terms of both Arts 10 and 6. In so doing, it is argued, it would not only escape the structural constraints of the Strasbourg approach, but might more readily recognise the underlying harmony between the two Articles.

56 In Attorney General v News Group Newspapers [1987] 1 QB 1, an injunction would have been granted.

57 This would normally be under the Spycatcher doctrine discussed below at pp 369–70. But, depending on timing of the third party publication, liability could arise under the 1981 Act – see p 380.

58 See the comments of Simon Brown LJ regarding the failure to use stays in certain instances in which prejudice to proceedings was found: Attorney General v Birmingham Post and Mail Ltd [1998] 4 All ER 49.

In order to illustrate this approach, two instances will be considered taken from the cases discussed below. In the first example, based on the Taylor case,[59] it is assumed that all the tabloid newspapers have reported, in sensationalist and misleading terms, on a forthcoming trial which has happened to catch the public eye. They are prosecuted for contempt. (In fact, in Taylor, no prosecution was forthcoming, a factor which may have played a part in recent tabloid excesses.) Assuming that prima facie liability could be established under the 1981 Act, it must also be asked whether the creation of such liability would be unjustified under Art 10. The first question would be whether it would constitute an interference with the freedom of expression of the tabloids. Despite the lack of value of the speech, such an interference would be found, since Strasbourg rarely denies Art 10 protection to speech on the basis of its content. The interference would clearly be found to be prescribed by law – the 1981 Act. The legitimate aims in view would be the preservation of the authority and impartiality of the judiciary and of the rights of others. Those aims would probably be established, on the facts; they have been established in all the relevant claims considered at Strasbourg.

The key question would be whether the interference represented by the creation of liability would be necessary in a democratic society. In determining necessity, the proportionality of the potential interference would require careful scrutiny. This would be the point at which the domestic court would be expected to take a somewhat different stance from that taken by Strasbourg, in relation to the 'rights of others' exception, in that its scrutiny of this question should be much more intensive. Factors to be taken into account would include the extent to which the various newspapers had in fact misled readers and the ability of jurors to disregard the coverage, on strong directions from the judge. But the central importance of fair trials in a democratic society should also be considered, as should the lack of value of the speech. The question of proportionality can encompass such matters, as the decisions in News Verlags and Sunday Times demonstrated. On the facts, it is argued that a finding of liability against the newspapers under the 1981 Act would be justified under Art 10. The same result would be likely to arise if the liability was then considered from the Art 6 perspective since, on the facts, it could readily be found that the fairness of the trial had been affected and possibly that the presumption of innocence had also been undermined. The court would have discharged its duty under s 6 of the HRA. (Had it appeared that it would fail to do so if it found against the newspapers, it would then have had to examine the statutory provisions in detail for their compatibility with the Convention under s 3 of the HRA.) If, on the above facts, the Attorney General failed to bring a prosecution, it is argued that he would have failed to discharge that duty.

The opposing result would be reached, it is argued, in a case in which certain newspapers comment on a matter of grave public importance, relating to the possibility of abuse of power in part of the executive, where no criminal trial is affected. The comment may, however, affect the ability of the Attorney General to continue a breach of confidence action with a view to suppressing debate on the matter. Publications in other jurisdictions in fact render it extremely unlikely that the rights can be preserved in any event. This example is based on Attorney General v Times Newspapers,[60] which is discussed below. In this instance, the speech in question concerns a matter of great public significance while hardly affecting Art 6 rights. The interest in question, which might conceivably be viewed as falling within Art 6, concerns the preservation of the rights of one party to a civil action. (Strasbourg, however, did not view that right as engaging the 'rights of others' exception as a distinct exception when it considered the interference with freedom of expression created by the grant of an injunction on grounds of breach of confidence.)[61] The sanction of contempt of court would be, in this instance, disproportionate to the aim of preserving the authority of the judiciary since it could not in fact be preserved by that means.[62] Thus, the action would fail, since the imposition of liability on the newspapers would be unjustified.

59 See below, p 236. For comment on the case and its implications within the Convention, see Borrie and Lowe, The Law of Contempt, 1996, Butterworths, pp 481–82.

These two examples illustrate the harmony that exists between the values underlying Arts 6 and 10. They also, it is argued, indicate the proper approach to the infusion of Convention values into this area of contempt law. Essentially, it is an approach that seeks out and protects the core values at stake in relation to both media freedom and the administration of justice. In identifying the consonance which exists between such values it differentiates sharply between speech supported by the justifications from truth, democracy or self-fulfilment, and speech which is promulgated mainly to further the ends of media conglomerates. It seeks to preserve impartiality and fairness, especially in criminal proceedings, but demands a rigorous and careful scrutiny of the possibility that unfairness may arise.

Domestic provisions: the development of the common law pre-1981

This section discusses the background to the inception of the Contempt of Court Act 1981. The reasons for introducing the Act are key to understanding its provisions. Prior to the inception of the Act, this particular area of criminal contempt at common law curtailed the freedom of the media to discuss and report on issues arising from criminal or civil proceedings on the basis that those proceedings might suffer prejudice. However, it went further than was necessary to deal with very clear risks of interference with the administration of justice. The media was restricted in its reporting of issues relevant to civil or criminal proceedings which were, or were soon to be, in being. It is important to note that civil proceedings can also be prejudiced, even though usually no jury is involved, but obviously this danger may be less likely to arise. It is apparent that more weight was given to protecting the administration of justice rather than free speech, from the ease with which it was possible to satisfy the common law tests.

The elements of common law contempt pre-1981 consisted of the creation of a real risk of prejudice (the actus reus) and an intention to publish; it was therefore a crime of strict liability. The actus reus could be fulfilled if it were shown that the publication in question had created a risk that the proceedings in question might be prejudiced; it was irrelevant whether they actually had been. This distinction was clearly illustrated by Thompson Newspapers Ltd ex p Attorney General.[63] While the defendant was awaiting 60 [1992] 1 AC 191; discussed below, p 369.

61 Observer and Guardian v UK (1991) 14 EHRR 153; discussed below, pp 620–22.
62 See pp 620–22.
63 [1968] 1 All ER 268; [1968] 1 WLR 1.

trial, The Sunday Times published his photograph and commented on his unsavoury background as a brothel keeper. This was held to amount to contempt. He was convicted and then appealed on the ground that the trial had been prejudiced by the article, but his appeal failed on the basis that jurors had not in actuality been so prejudiced. This case further illustrates the nature of the actus reus: it was not necessary to publish very damaging comments in order to create the risk in question.

At common law, there was a certain time before and a certain time after the action, known as the sub judice period, when there was a risk that any article published relevant to the action might be in contempt. The starting point of this period occurred when the proceedings were 'imminent' (Savundranayagan and Walker).[64] This test attracted much criticism because of its vagueness and width; it was obviously capable of applying a long time before the trial and it therefore had an inhibiting effect on the media out of proportion to its value. In particular, it gave rise to the restriction caused by so-called 'gagging writs'. A newspaper might be discussing corruption in a company. If a writ for libel was then issued – although there was no intention of proceeding with the case – the newspaper might find itself in contempt if it continued to discuss the issues. Thus, this method could be used to prevent further comment.

The need for reform which would, in particular, address the width of the imminence test was apparent and led to the setting up of the Phillimore Committee in 1974,[65] but it might not have come about without the influence of the European Court of Human Rights. The ruling that UK contempt law had breached Art 10 arose through the decision of the House of Lords in Attorney General v Times Newspapers Ltd.[66] The case concerned litigation arising out of the Thalidomide tragedy. The parents of the Thalidomide children wished to sue Distillers, the company which had manufactured the drug, because they believed that it was responsible for the terrible damage done to their unborn children. Distillers resisted the claims and entered into negotiation with the parents' solicitors. Thus, the litigation was dormant while the negotiations were taking place. Meanwhile, the Sunday Times wished to publish an article accusing Distillers of acting ungenerously towards the Thalidomide children. The article came close to saying that Distillers had been negligent, although it was balanced in that it did consider both sides.

The Attorney General obtained an injunction in the Divisional Court preventing publication of the article on the ground that it amounted to a contempt of court. The Court of Appeal then discharged the injunction in a ruling which weighed up the public interest in freedom of speech against the need to protect the administration of justice and found that the former value outweighed the latter: the article concerned a matter of great public interest and, since the litigation in question was dormant, it would probably be unaffected by it. The House of Lords then restored the injunction on the ground that the article dealt with the question of negligence and therefore prejudged the case pending before the court. It held that such prejudgment was particularly objectionable as coming

64 [1968] 3 All ER 439; [1968] 1 WLR 1761, CA.

65 See Report of the Committee on Contempt of Court, Cmnd 5794, 1974. For comment, see Dhavan, R, 'Contempt of court and the Phillimore Committee Report' (1976) 5 Anglo-Am L Rev 186–253.

66 [1974] AC 273; [1973] 3 All ER 54; [1973] 3 WLR 298, HL. For case notes, see Miller, CJ (1974) 37 MLR 96; O'Boyle, M (1974) 25 NILQ 57; Williams, DGT (1973) 32 CLJ 177 and Miller, CJ [1975] Crim LR 132.

close to 'trial by media' and thereby leading to an undermining of the administration of justice: a person might be adjudged negligent by parts of the media with none of the safeguards available in court. The confidence of the public in the courts might be undermined, thus creating a long-term detriment to the course of justice generally.

This ruling created a possible new test for the actus reus of contempt. Termed the 'prejudgment' test, it was wider than the test of real risk of prejudice, in that little risk to proceedings might be shown, but it might still be possible to assert that they had been prejudged. This test was heavily criticised by the Phillimore Committee; it had a potentially grave effect on freedom of speech because it was very difficult to draw the line between legitimate discussion in the media and prejudgment. Since it was easier to satisfy the prejudgment test than the old test for the actus reus of common law contempt, the Phillimore Committee considered that the Sunday Times ruling strengthened the case for reform. Meanwhile, the case was on its way to the European Court of Human Rights. The editor of the Sunday Times applied to the European Commission of Human Rights seeking a ruling that the imposition of the injunction breached Art 10 of the European Convention, and five years after the judgment of the House of Lords, the case came before the European Court of Human Rights (Sunday Times case).[67]

As indicated in the introduction to this Part, the Art 10 guarantee of freedom of expression is subject to exceptions to be narrowly construed. The Court found that the injunction clearly infringed Art 10(1) and that this was not a trivial infringement; the free speech interest involved was very strong, because the matter was one of great public concern. However, the injunction fell within Art 10(2) because it had an aim permitted by one of the exceptions – maintenance of the authority of the judiciary.

The next question was whether the injunction was 'necessary in a democratic society' in order to achieve the aim in question: it was not enough merely to show that the injunction was covered by an exception. In order to make a determination on this point, the Court considered the meaning of the term 'necessary'. It ruled that this did not mean indispensable, but connoted something stronger than 'useful', 'reasonable' or 'desirable'. It implied the existence of a 'pressing social need'. Was there such a need? The Court employed the doctrine of proportionality in determining the existence of such a 'need' in the circumstances: it weighed up the strength of the free speech interest in considering whether the injunction was disproportionate to the aim of preserving the authority of the judiciary. It found that although courts are clearly the forums for settling disputes, this does not mean that there can be no newspaper discussion before a case. The article was couched in moderate terms and explored the issues in a balanced way. Moreover, the litigation in question was dormant and therefore unlikely to be affected by the article. Nevertheless, the injunction created an absolute prohibition on discussion of the issues forming the background to the case. Thus, on the one hand, there was a strong free speech interest; on the other, there was a weak threat to the authority of the judiciary. If the free speech interest had been weaker, it might have been more easily overcome. The Court, therefore, concluded that the interference did not correspond to a social need sufficiently pressing to outweigh the public interest in freedom of expression. In reaching its conclusion that a breach of Art 10 had therefore taken place,[68] the Court also adverted briefly to the value of the Article in furthering the aim of preserving the authority of the judiciary since 'in bringing to light certain facts it might have served as a brake on speculative and unenlightened discussion'. In other words, the speech in question served the ends of justice in a general sense.

67 Judgment of 26 April 1979, A 30; (1979) 2 EHRR 245. For case notes, see Duffy, PJ, 5 H Rts Rev 17; Mann, FA (1979) 95 LQR 348; Wong, W-WM (1984) 17 NY Univ JIL and Pol 35.

The UK Government responded to this decision in the enactment of the Contempt of Court Act 1981 which was supposed to take account of the ruling of the European Court and was also influenced to an extent by the findings of the Phillimore Committee.[69]

The Contempt of Court Act 1981

The 1981 Act was designed to introduce provisions based on a modification of the common law tests without bringing about radical change. It introduced various liberalising factors, but it was intended to maintain the stance of the ultimate supremacy of the administration of justice over freedom of speech, while moving the balance further towards freedom of speech.[70] In particular, it introduced stricter time limits, a more precise test for the actus reus and – in a departure from the common law rules – allowed some articles on matters of public interest to escape liability even though prejudice to proceedings was created.

These reforms brought about under the Act will be considered below, bearing the obligation of s 3 HRA in mind, in terms of their ability to satisfy the Convention, in particular Art 10, interpreted domestically. In any particular instance, the current Strasbourg standards should be taken into account in strictly scrutinising interferences with the Art 10 guarantee. It would not be sufficient to assume that such standards will be met on the basis that the 1981 Act was introduced in order to take account of the Strasbourg ruling in the Sunday Times case. In order to determine whether liability is created, the following steps must be taken under the Act. Possible modifications of the statutory tests under the HRA will be considered taking account of the Strasbourg standards discussed.

The publication falls within s 1 of the Act

Under s 1, conduct will be contempt if it interferes with the administration of justice in particular proceedings regardless of intent to do so. Thus, not all publications which deal with issues touching on the administration of justice will fall within the 1981 Act. The starting point under s 1 is to ask whether the publication touches upon particular legal proceedings. In other words, if the article appears to have a long-term effect on the course of justice generally, without affecting any particular proceedings, it would fall outside the Act and might be considered at common law. This point will be considered below.

It is important to note that it is not necessary to show that the defendant intended to prejudice proceedings: the 'strict liability rule' under s 1 continues the position as 68 It may be noted that the Court was divided 11–9 in reaching this determination.

69 See Report of the Committee on Contempt of Court, Cmnd 5794, 1974; Green Paper, Cmnd 7145, 1978.

70 For comment on the 1981 Act, see Miller, CJ [1982] Crim LR 71; Lowe, NV [1982] PL 20; Smith, JC [1982] Crim LR 744; Zellich, GF [1982] PL 343; Redmond, M [1983] CLJ 9.

it was at common law. After establishing that the publication might affect particular proceedings, a number of other tests must be satisfied if the strict liability rule is to be established. If the publication does affect particular proceedings, but one of these tests is unsatisfied, it might still be possible to consider it at common law. It should be noted that the proceedings must be 'court' proceedings. This test includes certain tribunals in the contempt jurisdiction.[71]

The proceedings are 'active'

This test, which arises under s 2(3), is more clearly defined than the test at common law and therefore proceedings are 'active' (or sub judice) for shorter periods. Thus, the test is intended to have a liberalising effect. The starting and ending points for civil and criminal proceedings are defined in Sched 1. For criminal proceedings, the starting point (Sched 1, s 4(a)–(e)) is: the issue of a warrant for arrest, an arrest without warrant or the service of an indictment (or summons or an oral charge); the ending point is acquittal, sentence, any other verdict or discontinuance of the trial. The starting point for civil proceedings occurs when the case is set down for a hearing in the High Court or a date for the hearing is fixed (Sched 1, ss 12 and 13). This provision was clarified in Attorney General v Hislop and Pressdram:[72] it was found that s 2(3) was fulfilled because the proceedings in question (an action for defamation) had come into the 'warned' list at the time the articles in question were published. This starting point addresses the problem of gagging writs: the mere issuance of a writ would not mean that any further comment could give rise to an action for contempt because the issue of a writ is not the starting point. The end point of the active period for civil proceedings comes when the proceedings are disposed of, discontinued or withdrawn. The precision of these provisions, which allows the media to determine with reasonable certainty the point at which a risk of liability arises, means that they can be viewed as meeting the demands of Art 10.

Surprisingly, appellate proceedings are also covered by Sched 1. The starting point occurs when leave to appeal is applied for, by notice of appeal or application for review or other originating process; the end point occurs when the proceedings are disposed of or abandoned. Section 9 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1995 provides that a reference by the Criminal Cases Review Commission to the Court of Appeal is to be treated as an appeal under the Criminal Appeal Act 1968 for all purposes, and therefore, appellate proceedings become active when such a reference is made.

These provisions are less restrictive than the previous ones under the common law, which also covered the period during which notice to appeal could be given, but the key question is why appellate proceedings are covered at all. The Phillimore Committee recommended that most appellate proceedings should not be covered.[73] Given the principles at stake, discussed above, it is suggested that the ends of justice are unlikely to be served by seeking to stifle media comment that refers specifically to appeals, since the openness of the discussion supports confidence in the quality of 71 Section 19 provides that 'court' includes 'any tribunal or body exercising the judicial power of the state'. See further Borrie and Lowe, op. cit., fn 1, pp 485–91.

72 [1991] 1 QB 514; [1991] 1 All ER 911; [1991] 2 WLR 219, CA.

73 Phillimore Committee Report, para 132.

justice which is unafraid of comment. The misinformed or biased nature of aspects of such discussion would not be expected to affect the judiciary, especially the senior judiciary. Therefore, no fear of arbitrariness due to prejudice should arise. As Lord Reid said in the Sunday Times case: 'It is scarcely possible to imagine a case when comment could influence judges in the Court of Appeal or noble and leaned Lords in this House.'[74] Nevertheless, Channel 4 was enjoined from broadcasting a re-enactment, in the form of a dramatic 'reconstruction', of the appeal of the Birmingham Six, until after the decision on the appeal had been taken.[75] This was a doubtful decision, since it was highly unlikely that the judges would have been influenced by the programme. The injunction was therefore obtained on the basis that the public's view of the judgment of the court might have been affected by it. This justification is flawed, since it does not appear to be covered by s 2(2) of the Act,[76] and also because the public's view of that judgment and of the Appeal Court generally would be more greatly influenced, it is suggested, by the impression given that a ban was necessary in order to prevent the programme from influencing the judges.

It is probable that prosecutions in respect of contempt of appellate courts will not be brought in future. In re Lonhro plc and Observer Ltd,[77] the House of Lords relied on Art 10 in finding that since the possibility that a professional judge would be influenced by media coverage of a case is extremely remote, it would be extremely hard to establish a 'pressing social need', as required by Art 10, to suppress the speech in question. This stance has now been reinforced by the inception of the Human Rights Act.

The publication creates 'a substantial risk of serious prejudice or impediment to the course of justice in the proceedings in question' (s 2(2))

Introduction

The s 2(2) test can be viewed as taking a protective stance since it is intended to deter media bodies from publishing prejudicial material. Arguably, it goes further in terms of protecting the fairness of trials than neutralising or remedial measures (acquittals, abandonment of the proceedings) do. Section 2(2) can be said to punish media bodies who have created prejudice even where – from the point of view of the trial judge, as opposed to the judge in the contempt proceedings – a stay of proceedings or other measures are not viewed as necessary. Section 2(2) is an objective test; it is unconcerned with the question whether prejudice has actually been caused. The inclusion of a substantial risk of 'impediment' could be viewed as making it clear that UK law adheres more to a protective rather than a neutralising model in terms of seeking to ensure the fairness of trials. The more far-reaching neutralising measures, such as changing the 74 Attorney General v Times Newspapers, [1974] AC 273; [1973] 3 All ER 54; [1973] 3 WLR 298, HL.

75 In re Channel 4 Television Co Ltd (1988) The Times, 2 February; [1988] Crim LR 237.

76 Since it could not have been shown that a substantial risk of prejudice to the proceedings – the appeal – would arise. Section 2(2) does not refer to a substantial risk of prejudice to the course of justice in a general sense.

77 [1989] 2 All ER 1100, HL.

venue of the trial or delaying it, would clearly tend to have an impeding effect on it. On the other hand, the use of lesser neutralising measures, such as warnings to the jury to disregard media coverage, are matters which may properly be taken into account when considering the risk in question. In Attorney General v Times Newspapers[78] it was found that jurors were able to ignore possibly prejudicial comment in newspapers. That case concerned a relatively trivial incident which happened to attract publicity because of the fame of one of the persons involved, a factor which jurors might be expected to appreciate, leading them to discount the press coverage. Recently, it has become more common for consideration to be afforded to the likelihood that the jury will be strongly directed to ignore prejudicial coverage of the trial.[79] Thus, responsibility is shifting to an extent from the media and is being placed upon judges and jurors. Perhaps, as indicated above, that shift of responsibility is not fully in accordance with the notion that the 'duties and responsibilities' of Art 10 are placed upon those exercising the right to freedom of expression it protects, that is, the media.

Moreover, as Simon Brown LJ pointed out in Attorney General v Birmingham Post and Mail,[80] 's 2(2) postulates a lesser degree of prejudice than is required to make good an appeal against conviction. Similarly, it seems to me to postulate a lesser degree of prejudice than would justify an order for a stay'. He went on to conclude that where s 2(2) was satisfied, it would not follow that a conviction was imperilled or that a stay was required, but that the converse was not the case: 'I find it difficult to envisage a publication which has concerned the judge sufficiently to discharge the jury and yet is not properly to be regarded as a contempt.' Clearly, although this may be an accurate statement of the effect of s 2(2) where a particular publication creates a likelihood of prejudice to a criminal trial, the preventive or punitive effect can only occur if (a) the prejudicial effect is not the result of cumulative media coverage of issues relevant to or arising from a particular case, and (b) if contempt proceedings are actually brought. As the discussion below indicates, both these matters are problematic.

According to the Court of Appeal in Attorney General v News Group Newspapers,[81] both limbs of the test under s 2(2) must be satisfied: showing a slight risk of serious prejudice or a substantial risk of slight prejudice would not be sufficient. The question to be asked under the first limb could be broken down as follows: can it be argued that there is a substantial risk that a person involved in the case in question such as a juror would: (a) encounter the article; (b) remember it; and (c) be affected by it so that he or she could not put it out of his or her mind during the trial? Clearly, a person cannot be affected at all by something he or she has never encountered or has forgotten about. Thus, a number of factors may be identified which will be relevant to one or more of these questions. Having considered factors that are taken into account in determining whether a 'substantial risk' has arisen, the discussion will then consider the less problematic question of 'serious prejudice'.

78 (1983) The Times, 12 February, DC. See also Attorney General v MGN [1997] 1 All ER 456.
79 See, e.g., Attorney General v MGN [1997] EMLR 284.
80 [1998] 4 All ER 49, pp 57, 59. See further Mcleod (2000) The Times, 20 December.
81 [1987] 1 QB 1; [1986] 2 All ER 833; [1986] 3 WLR 365, CA.

Key factors

The circulation of a publication/viewing figures for a broadcast is a relevant factor in relation to the 'substantial risk' limb of the s 2(2) test.[82] This factor potentially has a greater impact on broadcasters than on newspapers, since the viewing figures for popular programmes tend to far exceed the circulation figures of individual newspapers: one broadcast will in general reach far more people than will one article. However, not many prosecutions have been brought against broadcasters, probably because they tend to take a more responsible stance than the press due to the strict regulatory regime to which they are subject, discussed in Chapter 6.[83] An exception arose in Attorney General v BBC, Attorney General v Hat Trick Productions Ltd.[84] During a programme on BBC2 in the irreverent, satirical series Have I Got News for You, remarks were made by celebrities which assumed that the Maxwell brothers were guilty of defrauding the Daily Mirror pensioners. The broadcast occurred six months before the trial of the Maxwells, but was viewed by an audience of several millions. An action for contempt was brought and it was found that despite the humorous context, the remarks assuming the guilt of the defendants might have been taken seriously by viewers and that therefore s 2(2) was satisfied.

Clearly, circulation figures cannot be calculated only on the basis of viewing or selling figures. The impact of newspapers depends on their readership, not just their circulation figures. Further, front-page, banner headlines may reach many more people in a range of contexts. The existence of the internet clearly increases the circulation figures of both newspapers and broadcasts. All newspapers and some broadcasts have their own website on which material is archived. Internet-users could access trial-related material on such websites, either by putting a key word into Google (or another search engine), or by choosing to search the website of a particular media organ in the expectation that some reporting would cover such material.[85]

The temporal proximity between the publication and the trial or civil action is the single most significant factor under s 2(2). However, the rapidly increasing popularity of the internet may be calling the current stance into question. The reliance on temporal proximity between publication and proceedings in relation to the 'substantial risk' limb of s 2(2) arguably favours the particular operational methods of the tabloid press. As Chapter 9 points out, the press are not restrained, as are broadcasters, by quite a strict statutory regime governing privacy and accuracy. The result is that tabloid newspapers 82 If a publication has a small circulation, this risk might be seen as too remote. This point was considered in Attorney General v Hislop and Pressdram [1991] 1 QB 514; [1991] 1 All ER 911; [1991] 2 WLR 219, CA which concerned the effect of an article in Private Eye written about Sonia Sutcliffe, wife of the Yorkshire Ripper. She began an action for defamation in respect of the article. Shortly before the hearing of the action, Private Eye published two further articles defamatory of Mrs Sutcliffe. The Attorney-General brought proceedings for contempt of court in respect of the second articles, and on appeal it was determined that as Private Eye had a large readership, many of whom might live in London, where the libel action was held, it could not be said that the risk of prejudice was insubstantial.

83 At pp 518–22.

84 [1997] EMLR 76; The Times, 26 July 1996. See also Attorney General v LWT 3 All ER 116; Attorney General v Jones and BBC (1995) (unreported).

85 See further, C Walker, 'Fundamental Rights, Fair Trials and the New Audio-Visual Sector' [1996] 59 MLR 517.

are able to rely on sensationalist and frequently misleading reporting as a marketing tool. Such reporting is very unlikely to attract liability under the strict liability rule so long as it occurs some months or even weeks before the proceedings in question. It is very clear from decisions over the last ten years that the time at which coverage is most at risk is getting closer and closer to the time at which the proceedings occur. Prosecutions would probably no longer be brought where a time lag of the order of ten months between publication and proceedings had occurred. By 2007 it became possible to say that imputations of guilt in the active period probably would not incur liability unless they occurred contemporaneously with the trial.

In 1987 the ruling in Attorney General v News Group Newspapers[86] made it clear that the proximity of the article to the trial is highly relevant to the question of risk. The Court of Appeal held that a gap of ten months between the two could not create the substantial risk in question because the jury would be likely to have forgotten the article by the time the trial came on and even if it were faintly recollected at the time of the trial, it would be likely to have little impact. Similarly, in Attorney General v Independent TV News and Others[87] one of the factors founding the ruling that s 2(2) was not satisfied was the lapse of time before the trial; the risk that any juror who had seen the offending item would remember it was not seen as substantial. ITV News and certain newspapers had published the fact that a defendant in a forthcoming murder trial was a convicted IRA terrorist who had escaped from jail where he was serving a life sentence for murder. However, the trial was not expected to take place for nine months, there had only been one offending news item, and there had been limited circulation of only one edition of the offending newspaper items. In contrast, in Attorney General v Hislop and Pressdram,[88] a gap of three months between publication of the article and the trial of the libel action was not viewed as long enough to negate the risk. A publication during the trial is clearly most likely to create a risk.

In the late 1990s judges began to show a readiness to assume that somewhat smaller time lapses in months would still diminish the risk in question to the point where it could be viewed as negligible or minimal. In Attorney General v Unger[89] the article in question, discussed further below, was published about three-and-a-half months before the trial in a tabloid with a large circulation. It was found that its impact should be looked at at the time of publication and at the time of the trial – its residual impact on jurors should be taken into account. Over that period of time its impact would have faded; taking that 'fade factor' into account, it was determined that a substantial risk of prejudice did not arise. A similar stance was taken in Attorney General v Unger.[90] The respondent newspapers, the Daily Mail and Manchester Evening News, published newspaper articles, relating how the defendant, who was a home help, had been caught red-handed on video stealing money from a pensioner in her care. In other words, they imputed guilt. Simon Brown LJ found that articles of this nature which plainly prejudged guilt could influence jurors. But when he considered the 'crucial' matter of the residual impact of the publication on a notional juror at the time of trial, he attached great significance to

86 [1987] QB 1.
87 [1995] 2 All ER 370.
88 [1991] 1 QB 514; [1991] 1 All ER 911; [1991] 2 WLR 219, CA.
89 [1997] 1 All ER 456.
90 Attorney General v Unger (1998) EMLR 280 at 319.

the 'fade' factor, the effect of the lapse of time between publication and trial. Here the time lapse was of the order of nine months. He considered that this would greatly affect the recollections of the article by any juror who had happened to read it. He noted that this factor had been stressed in a number of the cases.[91] He considered that publications are most dangerously prejudicial when they are published contemporaneously with the trial, because then jurors read them with 'particular interest rather than merely as part of an everyday media diet', or when they disclose prejudicial material which is itself inadmissible in evidence, most obviously an accused's previous convictions. Neither of those two factors were present. But in Attorney General v Newsgroup Newspapers,[92] the Sun published a serious allegation regarding a defendant in a murder trial at the point at which the jury had retired to consider its verdict. The murder charge was dropped, and the Sun was prosecuted, convicted and fined for contempt.

The existence of the internet is highly relevant to temporal proximity. Trial-related material is often placed on a newspaper's website prior to or early in the active period – at the time when the reporting occurs of a high profile investigation or of an arrest. However, that material is likely to remain on the website, whereas the newspaper itself will be discarded by its readers very rapidly, often on the day that it is obtained. Thus the material may still be on the website and accessible as the trial date approaches. Jurors might decide deliberately to search newspapers' websites with a view to discovering more about the trial and, perhaps, the background of defendants. Where publicity is potentially prejudicial, but is subject to a significant face-factor, newspapers could ensure that such material is removed from the website's archives. However, if they fail to do so they clearly place themselves at risk of a prosecution for contempt even though there has been a significant time lapse between initial publication and trial. This factor, and the accessibility of the web-based material, should be taken into account when assessing the risk created by press material that has been published some time before the trial. It may be noted that where the internet Service Provider maintaining a website on which trial-related material is stored is not a domestic newspaper or broadcaster, but is a body outside the jurisdiction, it would not be possible to bring a prosecution even if highly prejudicial material was uploaded to an easily accessible website and maintained on it before and during the trial. It might be argued that the chance of a juror accessing the website could be viewed as remote, but the rapidly increasing use of the internet is undermining that argument.[93]

On the face of it, the factor of proximity in time cannot be considered in isolation from other relevant ones: the celebrity status of defendants/plaintiffs; the subject matter of the publication; the language used. These three factors may make it more likely that a publication will be remembered even over a fairly substantial period of time. However, temporal proximity, combined with the effect of neutralising directions, is by far the most important factor. We now seem to have arrived at the point when it is almost possible to say that the active period runs de facto only from the start of the trial – from the point at which the jurors are empanelled, since from that point they are likely to take especial interest in articles relating to that particular trial. From that 91 Attorney General v NGN [1987] QB 1; ex p Telegraph plc [1993] 1 WLR 980; Attorney General v Independent TV News [1995] 1 Cr App R 204.

92 16 April 1999 (unreported).

93 See Chapter 6, p 572, fn 477.

point judges view publications or broadcasts as no longer part of an ephemeral media diet (they have not yet, it seems, taken account of the fact that the use of the internet means that it is much less ephemeral than it used to be), but as of especial significance. In other words, even where other factors founding a 'substantial risk' are quite clearly present, unless material is disclosed that would be inadmissible in evidence, prejudicial publication/broadcasts, even very close to the trial, but not during it, may not reach the s 2(2) threshold.

This reliance on proximity means that where a high profile crime, such as the Soham murders in 2002 or the attempted terrorist bombings in London in July 2005,[94] occurs, the tabloids can report on the arrestees in lurid terms, as they did in both instances, in the knowledge that although the proceedings are 'active,' there is likely to be quite a significant time lapse before the trial, and that therefore the risk of prejudice will probably be viewed as diminished to the point where it cannot be regarded as 'substantial'. Therefore newspapers that are – in contrast to broadcasters – already unrestrained in such reporting by a statutory regulatory scheme enjoining accuracy and impartiality on them, are likely to be equally unrestrained by the strict liability rule. In the instance of Soham the Attorney General did issue warnings to the tabloids reminding them of the rule, but no action was taken. Clearly, if the aim of s 2(2) is to protect the fairness of particular trials, it is inevitable that the proximity in time of a publication will be taken into account. But there may be instances, such as that of Soham, or of the terrorist incidents in 2003 and 2005, where the coverage is so extreme and so unremitting at the time of an arrest, that a fair trial, even months later, is likely to be prejudiced. The more recent rulings on temporal proximity suggest that the judges would not accept that s 2(2) was satisfied in such circumstances, especially when the findings from Attorney General v MGN regarding totality of coverage were also taken into account, since it would be difficult to ascribe responsibility for the creation of prejudice to any one newspaper. Once a substantial period of time had elapsed, it would be likely that a potential juror would merely remember an impression, rather than the specifics of the coverage of any one newspaper. But that impression – that the arrestees were guilty – might be deep-rooted and insidious.[95]

The totality of the news coverage is a relevant factor in the sense that where a large amount of arguably prejudicial publicity has occurred, it is difficult to isolate the contribution that one publication has made. Obtaining a conviction under the s 2(2) test, as currently interpreted, is especially difficult or impossible where a substantial risk of serious prejudice or impediment is created by the totality of the news coverage, rather than by the coverage of a particular article or broadcast. Attorney General v MGN[96] concerned the coverage of a case involving the notorious boyfriend of a soap opera actress, Gillian Taylforth, by five tabloid newspapers, which mentioned his previous criminal record and presented a misleading picture of the incident in question. It was found that none of the 94 See p 362, fn 168.

95 There would be the possibility of bringing an action for common law contempt in respect of such coverage, but editors would be able to show that due to the lapse of time they did not foresee the creation of a real risk of prejudice as a virtual certainty (oblique intent). So far, apart from cases relating to material covered by an injunction against another media body, it is only in cases in which a newspaper has a personal interest that a desire to prejudice proceedings (simple intent) has been shown: see discussion below pp 364–65, 368.

96 [1997] 1 All ER 456.

articles, considered separately, reached the required threshold under s 2(2). The judge, Schiemann LJ, said that where, in such an instance, the totality of the coverage had prejudiced the trial, it might be proper to stay the proceedings. This decision reveals a weakness in the use of the strict liability rule, since it means that the creation of serious prejudice to a trial by a large number of newspaper articles in combination cannot be addressed by means of contempt law where individual articles just fail to satisfy the strict test of s 2(2) as interpreted in Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers.[97] As discussed below, that decision significantly raised the s 2(2) bar. The use of a stay means that the coverage has had the effect of impeding the course of justice in the proceedings in question, but that the detriment thereby created cannot be laid at the doors of those responsible.

It is argued that the courts need to distinguish more clearly between 'threshold,' 'generic' and prejudicial publicity.[98] 'Generic' publicity can be taken to indicate coverage that is not in itself prejudicial since it does not relate specifically enough to the trial. But it may have a general and all-pervasive effect in terms of painting 'the defendant with an incriminating brush.'[99] 'Threshold' publicity is merely coverage relating to someone involved in proceedings, making his or her name memorable. The existence of threshold or generic publicity tends to mean that prejudicial publicity has more impact.[100] Therefore such publicity is more, not less, likely to satisfy the s 2(2) test. On the other hand, where a number of newspapers publish material that does relate specifically to a case and which, combined, satisfies s 2(2), it may be difficult to show that any particular publication, alone, satisfies the test.

Some of the prosecutions discussed above, and in particular that in Attorney General v BBC, Attorney General v Hat Trick Productions Ltd,[101] may be contrasted with the lack of action taken in respect of the facts of R v Taylor.[102] A large number of tabloid newspapers published a photograph which was taken of one of the defendants in a murder trial giving the husband of the victim a polite kiss on the cheek; it was distorted in such a way as to give the impression that it was a passionate mouth-to-mouth kiss and was captioned 'Cheats Kiss.' It was found that this was part of an 'unremitting, extensive, sensational, inaccurate and misleading press coverage' and had led to a real risk of prejudice to the trial. This determination was made on appeal in overturning the convictions of the two defendants. The Attorney General refused to bring an action against the newspapers for contempt, possibly because he considered that no individual publication would attract liability, and it was found that his decision not to act was non-reviewable.[103] The failure to act did not therefore have to be justified, but the uncertain nature of the s 2(2) test as applied to individual newspapers could be viewed 97 [1999] EMLR 904. See pp 347, 353 below.

98 See e.g., Doppelt, JC, 'Generic Prejudice: How Drug War Fervor Threatens the Right to a Fair Trial' (1991) 40 American University Law Review 821.

99 See Chesterman, M, Chan, J and Hampton, S, Managing Prejudicial Publicity, 2001, Justice Research Centre, Law and Justice Foundation of New South Wales, p 9.

100 Ibid, pp 111, 121, 122, 235.

101 [1997] EMLR 76.

102 (1993) 98 Cr App R 361, CA.

103 R v S-G, ex p Taylor, The Times, 14 August 1995. For comment on the case see Stephens, M and Hill, P, 'The Role and Impact of Journalism' in Walker, C and Starmer, K (eds) Miscarriages of Justice: A Review of Justice in Error, 1997, Blackstone, 263, pp 264–67. For comment and the implications of the case within the European Convention on Human Rights, see Borrie and Lowe, The Law of Contempt (1996), pp 481–82.

as providing a degree of justification for it. On the other hand, the possibility cannot entirely be ruled out, as argued above, that government reluctance to take on a large number of press proprietors played a part in the decision.

In a number of the cases discussed below judges have taken account of the potential use of neutralising measures in assessing the risk of prejudice. They have stressed the ability of jurors to disregard media comment, especially when properly directed to do so. In taking the use of such 'neutralising' directions into account, they have also stressed the need for contempt law to use the same standards as those that would determine the need for a stay or the success of an appeal. The courts have, increasingly, emphasised the unlikelihood that jurors will be unaffected by prejudicial media comment. The probability that the lesser neutralising measure of warning the jury to disregard media coverage will be employed is increasingly taken into account when a court is considering the risk of prejudice, although two schools of thought can be discerned among the judiciary on this matter – broadly speaking, those of juror susceptibility and juror invulnerability.[104]

It was pointed out in Attorney General v Times Newspapers[105] that jurors are able to ignore possibly prejudicial comment in newspapers. That case concerned a relatively trivial incident which happened to attract publicity because of the fame of one of the persons involved, a factor which jurors might be expected to appreciate, leading them to discount the press coverage. Recently, it has become more common for consideration to be afforded to the likelihood that the jury will be strongly directed to ignore prejudicial coverage of the trial.[106] In Attorney General v BBC,[107] however, Staughton LJ said that he did not have the confidence expressed by certain judges in 'the ability of jurors to disregard matters which they do remember but which they are not entitled to take into account.'

In contrast, in Attorney General v Unger[108] Simon Brown LJ found that the 'fade factor' should be coupled with the presumption that juries would decide cases solely according to the evidence put before them and the directions they were given. He considered that in the case before him, if the accused woman had elected jury trial and had been convicted, she could not have won an appeal on the basis of the published articles. A similar stance was taken in Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers.[109] The case concerned the trial of one Kelly for stealing body parts, apparently for artistic purposes; during the trial the Observer published an article suggesting in strong terms that Kelly had had no artistic purpose in stealing the parts, but was motivated merely by a morbid fascination with dead people. The writer linked Kelly's fascination to that experienced by a number of named serial killers. Since Kelly's honesty was a key issue in the trial, the article was very damaging to his case since in the jury's eyes it could have undermined his credibility. Both Collins LJ and Sedley LJ concluded that the article therefore created a risk of serious prejudice.

104 See the National Heritage Committee Second Report (1997) Press Activity Affecting Court Cases, pp 33–34.
105 The Times, 12 February 1983.
106 See e.g., Attorney General v MGN [1997] EMLR 284.
107 1 December 1995 (unreported).
108 (1998) EMLR 280 at 319.
109 [1999] EMLR 904.

Sedley LJ wrestled with the question whether the risk should be described as substantial:

> In the end, and not without anxiety, I have concluded that it is simply not possible to be sure that the risk created by the publication was a substantial risk that a jury, properly directed to disregard its own sentiments and any media comment, would nevertheless have its own thoughts or value judgments reinforced by the article to a point where they influenced the verdict. As a first cross-check, I doubt whether an appeal would have been allowed had the jury which convicted Mr Kelly read the article. As a second cross-check, it seems to me that the threat from this article, published when it was, to the course of justice in Mr Kelly's trial was not sufficient to make either prior restraint or subsequent punishment a proportionate response in a society which, as a democracy, values and protects the freedom of the press.

In other words, some degree of serious prejudice had been caused, but it was accepted that the degree of risk was likely to be diminished by the use of such directions. Collins LJ also took into account the effect of judicial directions on the jury in terms of neutralising any prejudice created by the publication, although he differed from Sedley LJ in finding that once it could be assumed that 'serious prejudice' had arisen it would be difficult to be sure that it had been dispelled by the use of neutralising directions. However, Collins LJ felt that the issue was so finely balanced that he would not dissent from Sedley LJ's conclusion on this point. It was therefore found that the test of 'serious prejudice,' but not that of 'substantial risk,' was satisfied.

Sedley LJ's approach, which appears to be the dominant one, shifts the emphasis impliedly from the protective to the neutralising stance since it makes the assumption that directions to the jury will be effective and can therefore properly undermine the need for protective measures. That approach also, to an extent, shifts the responsibility for the effect of prejudicial material from the media to judges and jurors. Arguably, that shift of responsibility is not fully in accordance with the Art 10 notion that the 'duties and responsibilities' it mentions in paragraph 1 are placed upon those exercising the right to freedom of expression it protects – that is, the media. As pointed out in Chapter 6, Strasbourg has interpreted para 1, in general, to enhance media freedom rather than to limit it.[110] So any reliance on it in the sense suggested here would probably therefore have to be a development in the domestic Art 10 jurisprudence.[111]

There has been uncertainty as to the relationship between s 2(2) and the tests used to make good an appeal against conviction or to found a stay. Simon Brown LJ found in Attorney General v Birmingham Post and Mail:[112] 's 2(2) postulates a lesser degree of prejudice than is required to make good an appeal against conviction. Similarly, it seems to me to postulate a lesser degree of prejudice than would justify an order for a stay'. He went on to conclude that where s 2(2) was satisfied, it would not follow

110 Cf its use in Otto-Preminger Institute v Austria (1995) 19 EHRR 34.

111 See p 463. A notion of protection only for responsible journalism already appears to be impliedly occurring, as discussed in Chapter 9, pp 970, 977–78, but not at present in reliance on the wording of Art 10(1).

112 [1999] 1 WLR 361, at 369H; [1998] 4 All ER 49, at 57, 59. See further McLeod, The Times, 20 December 2000.

that a conviction was imperilled or that a stay was required, but that the converse was not the case:

> I find it difficult to envisage a publication which has concerned the judge sufficiently to discharge the jury and yet is not properly to be regarded as a contempt . . . In short, s 2(2) is designed to avoid (and where necessary punish) publications even if they merely risk prejudicing proceedings, whereas a stay will generally only be granted where it is recognised that any subsequent conviction would otherwise be imperilled, and a conviction will only be set aside . . . if it is actually unsafe.

However, Sedley LJ and Collins LJ in Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers[113] considered that the tests for contempt and for the risk of actual prejudice to a trial should be harmonised. Collins LJ said:

> It seems to me that the prejudice required by s 2(2), which must be serious, is not of a lesser degree than that required to make good an appeal against conviction. To establish contempt it needs only be shown that there was a substantial risk that serious prejudice, which must in my view mean such prejudice as would justify a stay or appeal against conviction, would result from the publication. That such prejudice does not in the event result is nothing to the point. Thus uniformity of approach is achieved by requiring that the prejudice within the meaning of s 2(2) must be such as would be likely to justify at least a stay.

These words were echoed by in Attorney General v Unger[114] by Simon Brown LJ in something of a departure from his previous stance:

> It seems to me important in these cases that the Courts do not speak with two voices, one used to dismiss criminal appeals with the Court roundly rejecting any suggestion that prejudice resulted from media publications, the other holding comparable publications to be in contempt, the Courts on these occasions expressing grave doubts as to the jury's ability to forget or put aside what they have heard or read . . . generally speaking it seems to me that unless a publication materially affects the course of trial in that kind of way, or requires directions from the court well beyond those ordinarily required and routinely given to juries to focus their attention on evidence called before them rather than whatever they may have heard or read outside court, or creates at the very least a seriously arguable ground for an appeal on the basis of prejudice, it is unlikely to be vulnerable to contempt proceedings under the strict liability rule.

Thus a growing perception among the judiciary can be discerned of a need to bring contempt law into line with criminal appeals, so that in Simon Brown LJ's words, the courts do not 'speak with two voices'. This stance, it is argued, encourages newspapers to publish prejudicial material in the hope that the risk it poses to proceedings is not substantial enough. The problem with this approach is that it detracts from the role of contempt law in protecting particular proceedings. It seems to assume that unless the resulting effect might approach one that had to be dealt with by a stay or an appeal, s 2(2) would not be satisfied. This stance undermines the role s 2(2) seemed to be intended to have – that of setting the threshold before that stage would be likely to be reached, thus protecting the criminal justice system. The fact that the judges are taking this stance is not surprising, given that the division of responsibility between contempt law and trial judge has always been problematic. But arguably it poses an unacceptable level of risk to the system.

113 [1999] EMLR 904.
114 (1998) EMLR 280 at 319.

Having established a substantial risk that jurors and others will be influenced by the article, it is then necessary to ask if the influence can be characterised as of a prejudicial nature or would be likely to impede the proceedings in question. A publication which was in some way relevant to a trial might be likely to create a substantial risk that it would influence persons involved in the trial, bearing the factors identified in mind, but without leading to prejudice to it. An article published in every national newspaper in the land on the day of the trial and discussing certain issues relevant to it in a striking and interesting, but fair and impartial manner would have an influence, but not a prejudicial one. In considering whether it would be prejudicial, the two limbs of the test must be considered together: it must be shown that the language used, the facts disclosed or sentiments expressed would lead an objective observer to conclude that a substantial risk had been established that persons involved in the proceedings would be prejudiced, before going on to consider whether that effect could properly be described as serious.

Prejudice and its seriousness can be established in a number of ways: the article (or other publication) might be likely to have the effect of influencing relevant persons against or in favour of the defendant; it might be likely to affect either the outcome of the proceedings in question or their very existence – as where pressure is placed on one party to drop[115] proceedings. In re Lonhro plc,[116] Lord Bridge said:

> [Pre-trial] it is easy to see how critical public discussion of the issues and criticism of the conduct of the parties, particularly if a party is held up to public obloquy, may impede or prejudice the course of the proceedings by influencing the conduct of witnesses or parties in relation to the proceedings. If [a jury is involved] the possibility of prejudice by advance publicity directed at an issue which the jury will have to decide is obvious.

It is assumed that laypersons are more likely to be affected by media coverage than professionals; as indicated above, it would be readily assumed that a judge would be unaffected.[117] Therefore, civil proceedings are less at risk of being prejudiced than 115 See Hislop and Pressdram [1991] 1 QB 514; [1991] 1 All ER 911; [1991] 2 WLR 219, CA: this aspect of the case is discussed in relation to common law contempt, below, p 368.

116 [1990] AC 154, p 209B.

117 This is the general view expressed in the relevant jurisprudence in Britain and in other common law jurisdictions. e.g., Lord Salmon said in Attorney General v BBC [1981] AC 303, p 342: 'I am and always would be satisfied that no judge would be influenced by what may be said by the media.' Of course, it should be borne in mind that this stance is taken by the judges themselves.

criminal ones, except in those instances in which a jury is used.[118] But, as indicated, civil actions can be affected in other ways. Also, witnesses, especially lay witnesses, in both civil and criminal actions might be affected by media coverage. They might be deterred from coming forward[119] or they might be intimidated or influenced[120] by it.

As noted above, the proximity in time between the article and the proceedings can affect this limb of s 2(2), as can the extent to which it may be said that the trial concerns a person in the public eye. If the article is published some time before the trial, as in Attorney General v News Group Newspapers, its probable effect on the minds of jurors will be lessened because it may only exist there as a faint memory: any effect it has is unlikely to be of a seriously prejudicial nature. This might be the case even though the article would have been likely to have such an effect had it been fresh in their minds. In the Hislop case, however, the vitriolic nature of the article did suggest that it would be likely to have a seriously prejudicial effect. The serious allegations in question were held to blacken the plaintiff's character and might well have influenced the jurors against her. The fact that Peter Sutcliffe was well known also made it more likely that the article would have an impact. However, courts will not be quick to assume that jurors are incapable of ignoring prejudicial publications. In Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers[121] the publication of the fact that one unidentified defendant out of six in a Manchester trial was also awaiting trial elsewhere was not found to satisfy s 2(2), since it was thought that it would not cause a juror of ordinary good sense to be biased against the defendant.

The test of 'impeding' proceedings is treated in a more specific fashion. It may be satisfied where the publication can be said to have led to the delay of the proceedings owing to the risk of prejudice.[122]

Use of s 2(2) in the post-HRA era

The post-HRA prosecutions have tended to occur in the more clear-cut cases. In two of them liability was not contested. In Attorney General v BBC[123] the BBC mistakenly released details about a complainant witness during a trial relating to charges of sexual abuse in an approved school, breaching his anonymity. The police had undertaken not to allow such details to be released and his anonymity was protected by s 1(1) of the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1992. The witness was very distressed since his family had not known that he had – as he alleged – suffered sexual abuse. The BBC accepted that the publication of the details had satisfied the tests under s 2(2) and therefore the only question was as to the penalty to be imposed. It was accepted that the publication of the details had resulted from negligence and that the journalist responsible had had an exemplary record in relation to such matters. The penalty – a fine – was not excessive; it was imposed both on the BBC and on the journalist 118 In respect of defamation and in certain actions against the police.

119 See Vine Products Ltd v Green [1966] Ch 484, p 495.

120 See Re Doncaster and Retford Co-operative Societies Agreement [1960] LR 2 PC; *Hutchinson v Amalgamated Engineering Union, Re Daily Worke*r (1932) The Times, 25 August.

121 [1992] 3 All ER 38, CA.

122 See Attorney General v BBC (1992) The Independent, 3 January 1992.

123 [2001] EWHC Admin 1202.

involved. The HRA was not mentioned during the case, although Art 10 would have been relevant to the heaviness of the fine[124] and to the decision to impose a separate penalty on the journalist.

Attorney General v MGN[125] concerned a somewhat similar instance in that liability was not disputed and the articles in question were apparently published in error. The articles, in the Sunday Mirror, concerned the trial of certain Premiership footballers for affray and causing grievous bodily harm with intent. The article revived allegations that the attack was racially motivated. The article was published at the time when the jury were considering their verdicts and, as the publishers recognised, its thrust was at variance with the evidence as presented in the criminal trial. The publishers recognised that the judge had given a clear direction that there was no evidence of a racial motive. The second article concerned a co-accused, Duberry. He had been acquitted, but his credibility and his evidence were still relevant in relation to the guilt or innocence of the four remaining defendants, in respect of whom verdicts had not been returned. Liability was not disputed but the court gave some consideration to the s 2(2) tests, finding that they were satisfied due to the timing of the article and the probability that the jurors might have been influenced for or against the four defendants. The trial had been abandoned as a result of the article and a retrial ordered. It was found that: '"substantial" in that context connotes a risk which is more than remote and not merely minimal . . . and it has to be accepted that within the range of strict liability contempts, this case is towards the top end.' This indicates that a test akin to that of Lord Diplock in Attorney General v English is still influencing judges, particularly at first instance. Again the HRA was not mentioned and the fine imposed was high but not excessive.

A somewhat similar instance arose in Attorney General v Express.[126] The Daily Star published an article relating to the alleged gang rape of a 17-year-old girl at a London hotel by up to eight footballers on 27 September 2003. Between 30 September 2003 and 22 October 2003 the Attorney General and the Metropolitan Police had repeatedly issued advice and guidelines stating that identification was in issue and that suspects should not be identified by name or photograph or other likeness. There was a great deal of media interest, but the article in the Daily Star was unique in that it identified two potential defendants. The Attorney General contended that it was sufficient to establish a substantial risk that the course of justice would be prejudiced to show that there was a risk that the complainant did not know the identity of the footballers revealed in the Daily Star. It was found that at the point when the Daily Star published the article the complainant had not identified to the police either of the two footballers by name or by effective description. The Court found that the inference could be drawn therefore that the complainant did not know the identities of the accused at the time of the publication. Accordingly, the publication to millions in the Daily Star of items identifying the two individuals created a substantial risk that the course of justice would be seriously impeded or prejudiced. The HRA played no part in the judgment.

124 See Tolstoy Miloslavsky v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 442.
125 [2002] EWHC 907.
126 [2005] EMLR13.

Given the nature of these cases, no careful scrutiny of the s 2(2) tests in the light of the HRA was necessary, although it might have been expected that Art 10 would not have been entirely disregarded. The cases were clear-cut: either specific details relating to identity were released, or the prejudicial material was published during the trial.

The threshold created by the s 2(2) test

The decisions on s 2(2) have not fully clarified its meaning, but it may be concluded quite firmly that the threshold to be reached under the test can now be viewed, nearly 30 years after the inception of the 1981 Act, as quite a high one in practice. Therefore newspapers may risk publishing material concerning high-profile trials that they would not have published 25 years ago when the 1981 Act was introduced. A steady, if unacknowledged, raising of the bar denoted by the term 'substantial risk' can be discerned from the case law, which can largely be attributed to the influence of Art 10 of the European Convention, even before the HRA had come into force. It will be questioned below whether this raising of the bar is really in accord with Art 10 values, as some of the judges appear to assume.

Two years after the 1981 Act was introduced the bar was placed at a low level. In Attorney General v English[127] Lord Diplock interpreted 'substantial risk' as excluding a 'risk which is only remote,'[128] a finding which still strongly influences the formal approach to s 2(2).[129] The finding that only remote risks would be excluded allowed the House of Lords to find that the reference in the article to the mercy-killing of handicapped babies might prejudice the jury in the trial of a consultant charged with the murder of a Down's syndrome baby. The article, published in the Daily Mail after the trial had begun, made no direct reference to him, but was written in support of a pro-life candidate, Mrs Carr, who was standing in a by-election. Mrs Carr had no arms; the article referred to this fact and continued: 'today the chances of such a baby surviving are very small – someone would surely recommend letting her die of starvation. Are babies who are not up to scratch to be destroyed before or after birth'? The Lords considered that jurors would be likely to take the comments to refer to the trial; therefore, the assertion that babies were often allowed to die if handicapped might influence them against the consultant. The timing of the article predisposed the court to find that s 2(2) was satisfied. Nevertheless, on any view the risk was quite low but could be viewed as more than remote. (Incidentally, the consultant was acquitted; therefore, the article presumably did not in fact influence the jurors against him.) The finding that only remote risks are excluded appears to lessen the impact of the term 'substantial', and it is hard to see that there is a difference between this test and the old common law 'real risk' one.

127 [1983] 1 AC 116; [1982] 2 All ER 903.

128 Attorney General v English [1983] 1 AC 116; [1982] 2 All ER 903; for comment, see Zellick G, 'Fair trial and free press' [1982] PL 343 (especially on the question of the degree of risk); Ward, A, 'A Substantial Change in the Law of Contempt?' (1983) 46 MLR 85; Redmond M, 'Of Black Sheep and too much Wool' [1983] 42 CLJ 9. It may be noted that aspects of Attorney General v English were the subject of an unsuccessful application to Strasbourg: Times Newspapers Ltd and others v UK (1983) 8 EHRR 45, p 54. Bearing in mind the comments in Chapter 2 pp 22–23 as to the effect of the Commission on the Convention jurisprudence, especially in its older decisions, it is suggested that this finding of inadmissibility would be unlikely to be repeated today and that the decision is somewhat out of line with the generality of the jurisprudence relating to pre-trial publicity and the reporting of issues relating to litigation.

129 See Zellick G, ibid, on this point, p 344.

In MGN Pension Trustees Ltd[130] it was found that the term meant 'not insubstantial' or 'not minimal' rather than weighty. In Attorney General v Independent TV News and Others,[131] the same view was taken – the risk of prejudice was found to be too small to be termed substantial, although arguably it could have been viewed as more than minimal. The term 'substantial' has been afforded de facto greater weight in the instances discussed below,[132] effectively excluding fairly low but non-remote risks. Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers,[133] Attorney General v Unger[134] and Attorney General v MGN[135] marked the turning point in the approach. These cases were all decided around the time of the inception of the HRA but before it had come into force. The imminent reception of Art 10 into domestic law affected the judicial approach.

In Attorney General v MGN[136] an article creating the inference that a defendant in forthcoming proceedings was guilty was not found in itself to create a sufficiently substantial risk of serious prejudice, despite the fact that that article in combination with others had led the trial judge to stay the proceedings. A straightforward imputation of guilt was made in Attorney General v Unger, but the time lapse led to the conclusion that the risk was not substantial enough. In Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers Sedley LJ in the Court of Appeal considered that he was placing a strong reliance on the Art 10(2) tests as interpreted in Worm v Austria[137] in finding that although a risk of serious prejudice arose, it was not certain that it could be viewed as a substantial one.

The previous rulings clearly do not give as much weight to the term 'substantial' as Sedley LJ did. The facts of Guardian Newspapers, discussed above, were in some respects far more compelling than those of English as far as s 2(2) was concerned. The Observer article at issue in Guardian Newspapers was centrally about the trial, whereas the comments in the Daily Mail article in English were only obliquely or inferentially linked to it; they were ambiguous and did not necessarily impute guilt. Both the articles at issue were published contemporaneously with the trial. Yet s 2(2) was found to be satisfied in English, whereas in Guardian Newspapers the opposing result was reached, indicating the incremental, stealthy raising of the bar which has occurred. The imminent inception of the Human Rights Act, encouraging the judiciary to afford a strong weight to the relevant Art 10 jurisprudence, appears to explain the difference. In Worm, which was relied on in Guardian Newspapers, the test used was that of 'likelihood' of risk; as discussed below, this appears to mean that the risk is more likely than not to materialise. This test denotes a higher threshold than does Lord Diplock's test in English of excluding only remote risks.

130 [1995] EMLR 99.
131 [1995] 2 All ER 370.
132 See in particular Lord Lane's comments in Attorney General v Times Newspapers Ltd, The Times, 12 February 1983.
133 [1999] EMLR 904.
134 Attorney General v Unger (1998) EMLR 280 at 319. The decision is discussed above at pp 342–43.
135 [1997] 1 All ER 456. The decision is discussed above at pp 344–45.
136 [1997] 1 All ER 456.
137 (1998) 25 EHRR 454.

The only case to succeed under the strict liability rule in the late 1990s was Attorney General v BBC and Hat Trick Productions Ltd[138] where the words in question were spoken by celebrities during a popular television programme. Auld LJ said of them:

> The offending words are strikingly prejudicial and go to the heart of the case which the jury are to try, and . . . the offending publicity is great both because of its medium and repetition, and because both the speakers and the victims are already much in the public eye.

Taking account of the case law as a whole, it seems fair to conclude that although the courts continue in most instances to pay lip-service to Lord Diplock's dictum in Attorney General v English, they are not prepared to find that s 2(2) is satisfied on the basis of risks just above the 'minimal' threshold. And, clearly, a strict approach to s 2(2) seemed to be likely to prevail after the Human Rights Act came into force, on the basis that the judiciary in general were likely to accept that the Guardian Newspapers approach to the Strasbourg jurisprudence, and especially to Worm v Austria, was the correct one.

Following Simon Brown LJ's approach in Unger and Sedley LJ's in Guardian Newspapers, it seems to be clear that the s 2(2) bar is being raised. Clearly, this is a media-friendly approach. Whether it is protective of free speech values is more open to doubt. Collins LJ said, 'in applying s 2(2) due weight must be given to the protection of freedom of speech.' This assumes a complete convergence between the claims of the media and those of free speech, although it is questionable whether speech that undermines the presumption of innocence has a strong claim to protection, bearing in mind underlying free speech rationales.[139] This approach may also be under-protective of trials since it confuses the role of protective measures with that of neutralising ones. If the administration of justice is not protected from prejudicial comment on the ground that the courts should not 'speak with two voices' then the criminal justice system is potentially placed under strain. It may be exposed to prejudicial comment and have to take measures, such as stays, which may themselves cause impairment to trials,[140] in order to protect itself. If the less responsible sections of the media[141] perceive that they can cause prejudice just short of that sufficient to create a demand for a stay, then they will do so, and in pushing at that boundary they may overstep it. In particular they may do so where, amidst a mass of sensationalist, partial reporting, it is very difficult to ascribe responsibility to individual newspapers.

Reform of s 2(2) under the HRA in reliance on Worm v Austria?

The s 2(2) test appears at first glance to be in harmony with the Convention standards as indicated in Worm v Austria,[142] News Verlags[143] and BBC Scotland v UK.[144] But 138 [1997] EMLR 76; The Times, 26 July 1996.

139 See Part II, pp 300–6.
140 See Chapter 2, pp 63–64.
141 Generally, the tabloids in the lower and middle sectors of the market.
142 (1998) 25 EHRR 454.
143 (2001) 31 EHRR 8.
144 (1997) 25 EHRR CD 179.

in requiring a substantial risk of serious prejudice, it could be said to set too high a threshold: publications merely creating a risk of serious prejudice will not be covered, although it is arguable that Art 6 demands that they should be. The discussion has sought to demonstrate that the strict liability rule, based on the protective approach, sets a high threshold, is unworkably imprecise and therefore ineffective in operation. As a result, in relation to high profile cases, it allows too much strain to be placed on the criminal justice system (and on individual defendants, witnesses and victims) which has to seek to combat the effects of prejudicial publicity by taking neutralising measures. It has been suggested that the adoption of such measures can create, in itself, unfairness in the system.[145] But at the same time, since the s 1 rule is capable of going beyond what is necessary to protect fair trials, freedom of expression can be unnecessarily curtailed. (And the very uncertainty of the rule can of course have a chilling effect.) This is especially apparent in relation to those decisions on proceedings, including civil actions, which are heard by a judge or judges, not by a jury or other layperson.

The inefficacy of s 2(2) considered here – in terms of protecting fair trials – could be addressed to an extent by adopting a change of interpretation under s 3(1) HRA. The s 2(2) test, on its face, differs from that accepted at Strasbourg as in harmony with the Convention standards indicated in Worm v Austria,[146] News Verlags[147] and BBC Scotland v UK.[148] In Worm Strasbourg set the limits of permissible comment at the point at which the material creates a likelihood of prejudice to the chances of a person receiving a fair trial.[149] This is, on its face, a test that is in one respect close to the old common law one in that it requires only that prejudice, as opposed to serious prejudice, should be caused. In this respect it is less strict than the terms used in s 2(2). However, the requirement of 'likelihood' appears to denote a stricter requirement in terms of risk than the term 'substantial' in s 2(2). 'Likely' appears to mean 'more likely than not',[150] whereas substantial may be taken to mean 'not insubstantial' or not negligible. According to Lord Diplock, the term is cognate to the terms 'more than minimal' or not remote. The domestic courts, following the interpretation adopted by Lord Diplock in Attorney General v English, have, as discussed above, paid lip-service to this interpretation of the term 'substantial'.

Post-HRA, the test for the degree of risk could have relied on the test of likelihood from Worm under s 2 HRA. That test would have sounded the death knell for Lord Diplock's interpretation. An (unacknowledged) departure from Lord Diplock's interpretation has indeed occurred, but the interpretation of s 2(2) adopted in Attorney General v Guardian,[151] although influenced by Worm, created a higher threshold for the test than is denoted by the likelihood test. It appears then that the minimising interpretation adopted in Attorney General v English does not represent the current 145 See Corker D and Levi M, 'Pre-trial publicity and its Treatment in the English Courts' [1996] Crim LR 622. See also pp 328–29, above.

146 (1998) 25 EHRR 454.

147 (2001) 31 EHRR 8.

148 (1998) 25 EHRR CD179.

149 Worm v Austria (1998) 25 EHRR 454, at para 5.

150 See Cream Holdings v Bannerjee [2005] 1 AC 253; [2004] 3 WLR 918 which in a different context found that the term 'likely to succeed' meant 'more likely than not'. See Chapter 9 pp 988–89.

151 [1999] EMLR 904.

test, although the courts have not acknowledged that this is the case. The term 'serious prejudice' has not been afforded a minimising interpretation. Thus it is clear that there is a difference of emphasis between the domestic and the Strasbourg tests – at least in relation to the need for serious prejudice, and probably in relation to the need for a substantial risk, on the basis that that term as currently interpreted domestically still denotes, on the face of it, a lower risk than the term 'likelihood' does. Confusion is created since the courts, as discussed, are not relying in practice on establishing only a low level of risk.

This problem could be addressed if the domestic courts decided to rely on the Worm test to minimise the term 'serious' and to clarify the meaning of the term 'substantial' with a view to creating greater certainty as to the threshold to be reached under s 2(2). The need to show serious prejudice may go too far in protecting speech at the expense of fair trials under Art 6, even taking account of the use of neutralising measures. At the same time the high threshold that apparently needs to be reached under the term 'substantial' following Attorney General v Guardian and Attorney General v MGN may also be overprotective of speech, although Lord Diplock's non-remote risks test was under-protective. It is suggested that the test of 'likelihood' from Worm should be used under ss 2 and 3 HRA and should be used to re-interpret the term 'substantial' in s 2(2) of the Act. So doing would only involve a minimal departure from Lord Diplock's test, since remote risks would still be excluded; it would merely mean that some non-remote risks were also excluded – which has been occurring in practice in any event since the late 1990s.

The result of this change would ultimately be that the strict liability rule could have more impact in curbing prejudicial comment and therefore on the fairness of trials since a greater deterrent effect could be created. It must be acknowledged that it could exacerbate the likelihood of interfering with freedom of expression unnecessarily since this is inevitable under the protective approach based on a test with a fairly low threshold. If the threshold was clarified in this way by interpretation under s 3 HRA, relying on s 2, the courts and Attorney General would then have leeway within the broader test to target only those publications which are genuinely likely to cause prejudice. For example, it would be possible and easier to target individual newspapers even where a number of papers had engaged in prejudicial reporting. Where, amid such reporting, one newspaper had given prominence to a single, highly telling, item of prejudicial information, it would clearly fall within s 2(2), even if it could be assumed that jurors would be told to disregard it. Instead of trying to disentangle the responsibility of individual newspapers from the collective impact of the reporting, the test should be: if one article by itself would have satisfied s 2(2), had there been no other prejudicial publications, liability should be established, taking all the circumstances into account, including the effect of generic and threshold reporting in raising the profile of the defendant and in focusing the public mind on the trial. It would be as legitimate to take account of the reporting as a whole in the manner suggested – considering generic reporting but not the cumulative effect of reporting – as it is to take account of the probability that neutralising measures such as directions from the judges, would minimise the impact of the reporting. All such factors are part of the context within which the potentially prejudicial reporting should be judged.

The article amounts to 'a discussion in good faith of public affairs or other matters of general public interest' and 'the risk of impediment or prejudice to particular legal proceedings is merely incidental to the discussion' (s 5)

Introduction

Section 5 reflects the guarantee under Art 10. It affords a high value to political speech, broadly defined, and therefore reflects the value placed upon such speech at Strasbourg. If it appears that s 2(2) is fulfilled, it must next be established that s 5 does not apply. Section 5 does not, therefore, operate as a defence. If it did, it would not follow the contours of the inquiry to be conducted under Art 10. Section 5 conveys the message to the media that they can create a substantial risk of serious prejudice to a trial without incurring liability so long as they can also satisfy s 5, and they do not have the burden of proof in so doing. The existence of s 5 therefore offers further confirmation that the 1981 Act is partly based on the protective model since it accepts that a substantial risk of serious prejudice to a trial can be created but that no liability may arise. Section 5 is founded on the assumption that the prejudice would have to be dealt with by the adoption of neutralising measures in relation to trials, and it is only by taking that possibility into account that s 5 can be viewed as compatible with Art 6, as Ribemont and Worm make clear.

Interpretation of s5

Attorney General v English[152] is the leading case on s 5 and is generally considered to provide a good example of the kind of case for which s 5 was framed. After the trial had begun of a consultant who was charged with the murder of a Down's syndrome baby, an article was published in the Daily Mail which made no direct reference to him, but was written in support of a pro-life candidate, Mrs Carr, who was standing in a by-election. Mrs Carr had no arms; the article referred to this fact and continued: 'today the chances of such a baby surviving are very small – someone would surely recommend letting her die of starvation. Are babies who are not up to scratch to be destroyed before or after birth?' The trial judge referred the article to the Attorney General, who brought contempt proceedings against the Daily Mail. First, it was determined that the article did fulfil the test under s 2(2) on the basis that jurors would be likely to take the comments to refer to the trial; therefore, the assertion that babies were often allowed to die if handicapped might influence them against the consultant, Dr Arthur.

The burden then fell on the prosecution to show that s 5 did not apply. Lord Diplock adopted a two-stage approach in determining this issue. First, could the article be called a 'discussion'? The Divisional Court had held that a discussion must mean the general airing of views and debating of principles. However, Lord Diplock considered that the term 'discussion' could not be confined merely to abstract debate, but could include consideration of examples drawn from real life. Applying this test, he found that a discussion could include accusations without which the article would have been emasculated and would have lost its main point. Without the implied accusations, it would have become a contribution to a purely hypothetical issue. It was about Mrs Carr's election and also the general topic of mercy killing. The main point of her candidature was that killing of sub-standard babies did happen and should be stopped; if it had not asserted that babies were allowed to die, she would have been depicted as tilting at imaginary windmills. Thus, the term 'discussion' could include implied accusations.

152 [1983] 1 AC 116; [1982] 2 All ER 903.

Second, was the risk of prejudice to Dr Arthur's trial merely an incidental consequence of expounding the main theme of the article? Lord Diplock held that in answering this, the Divisional Court had applied the wrong test in considering whether the article could have been written without including the offending words. Instead, the Court should have looked at the actual words written. The main theme of the article was Mrs Carr's election policy; Dr Arthur was not mentioned. Therefore, this article was the antithesis of the one considered in Attorney General v Times Newspapers,[153] which was concerned entirely with the actions of Distillers. Clearly, Dr Arthur's trial could be prejudiced by the article, but that prejudice could properly be described as incidental to its main theme.

Thus, s 5 applied; the article did not, therefore, fall within the strict liability rule. This ruling was generally seen as giving a liberal interpretation to s 5.[154] Had the narrow interpretation of the Divisional Court prevailed, it would have meant that all debate in the media on the topic of mercy killing would have been prevented for almost a year – the time during which the proceedings in Arthur's case were active from charge to acquittal. (It may be noted that Dr Arthur was acquitted; therefore, the article presumably did not influence the jurors against him. That fact, however, as pointed out above, would not have precluded a finding that there was a substantial risk of serious prejudice to his trial.) Lord Diplock's test under s 5 may be summed up as follows: looking at the actual words written (as opposed to considering what could have been omitted), was the article written in good faith and concerned with a question of general legitimate public interest which created an incidental risk of prejudice to a particular case? It seems that the discussion can be triggered off by the case itself; it need not have arisen prior to it.

This ruling gave an emphasis to freedom of speech which tended to bring the strict liability rule into harmony with Art 10 as interpreted by the European Court of Human Rights' ruling in the Sunday Times case. However, despite this broad interpretation of s 5, the media obviously does not have carte blanche to discuss issues arising from or relating to any particular case during the 'active' period.

The Attorney General v English ruling did not concern a direct reference to a particular case and therefore it was uncertain until the ruling in Attorney General v Times Newspapers[155] whether s 5 would cover such references. The Sunday Times and four other newspapers commented on the background of an intruder into the Queen's bedroom, Michael Fagin, at a time when he was about to stand trial. The comments of The Mail on Sunday about Fagin, which included the allegation that he had had 153 [1974] AC 273; [1973] 3 All ER 54; [1973] 3 WLR 298, HL.

154 See, e.g., Robertson, G, Media Law, 1999, Chapter 6, p 216.
155 (1983) The Times, 12 February.

a homosexual liaison with the royal bodyguard and that he was a 'rootless penniless neurotic', satisfied the s 2(2) test as it was thought that they would affect the jury's assessment of his honesty. However, they fell within s 5 as they were part of a discussion of the Queen's safety, which was a matter of general public concern. In contrast, the Sunday Times' allegation that Fagin had stabbed his stepson could not fall within s 5, as it was irrelevant to the question of the Queen's safety, but had nevertheless been considered in detail.

It must also be shown that the article was written in good faith. In Attorney General v Hislop the articles in question did not fall within s 5 because it could not be said that they were published in good faith: the finding – relevant to the question of contempt at common law – that the editor had intended to prejudice the relevant proceedings – was held to be incompatible with a finding of good faith under s 5.

It can be concluded that the term 'a discussion in good faith of public affairs or other matters of general public interest' has received quite a broad interpretation in the courts. However, this is less clearly the case in relation to the question whether the risk is 'merely incidental' to the discussion. In this respect s 5 clearly requires some fine lines to be drawn. Where a piece merely discusses a particular case and makes no attempt to address wider issues, s 5 will not apply (Daily Express case).[156] Attorney General v TVS Television, Attorney General v HW Southey and Sons[157] concerned a TVS programme entitled 'The New Rachman' which made allegations about certain landlords in the South of England, alleging that they were obtaining money by deceiving the DHSS. The programme focused on landlords in Reading and coincided with the charging of a Reading landlord with conspiring to defraud the DHSS. It was found that the focus on Reading landlords meant that the article could not be viewed as creating a merely incidental risk of prejudice. In Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers[158] the article in question dealt with the tendency of judges in fraud trials to impose reporting restrictions, and stated that the judge in a criminal trial in Manchester had banned all reporting of the trial under s 4(2) of the 1981 Act on the ground that it could influence a separate trial involving one of the defendants. When the judge's attention was drawn to the article, he discharged the jury. It was readily found that the effect on the trial, if any, should be viewed as 'merely incidental' to the wider discussion[159] since the inclusion of examples was no more than 'an incidental consequence of expounding the main theme of the article.'[160]

Reform of s 5?

These findings indicate that there can be a difficulty in more borderline cases in drawing lines between the creation of risks in an incidental and a non-incidental fashion. Since s 5 was adopted as a response to The Sunday Times case, as a measure intended to protect media freedom, it might be expected to be capable of creating a clear demarcation between two types of prejudicial publications – those consisting of 156 (1981) The Times, 19 December.

157 The Times, 7 July 1989.
158 [1992] 3 All ER 38, CA.
159 It had already been found that s 2(2) was not satisfied.
160 [1992] 3 All ER 38, p 49.

inaccurate, misleading coverage of forthcoming proceedings and those that concern a general issue of public interest where the proceedings are used as an example – in a way that satisfies s 2(2). Section 5 does not fully succeed in creating such differentiation since, although reporting in the latter category would fall within s 5 as 'a discussion of public affairs,' following the ruling in English, it might fail the 'incidental' test, as occurred in Attorney General v TVS Television, Attorney General v HW Southey and Sons. A clearer test is needed.

One possibility would be to re-interpret s 5 in reliance on ss 3 and 2 HRA and Art 10. Section 5 was intended to afford scope to the speech/harm balancing proportionality test under Art 10(2), as a response to Sunday Times v UK. But it fails to do so, since it does not provide an effective means of weighing up the seriousness of the prejudice against the significance of the speech in question. In contrast to the previous common law position, it clearly does provide a means of affording value to political speech, broadly defined, and to that extent it reflects the value placed upon such speech at Strasbourg. However, it is not the equivalent of a proportionality test since it depends on problematic determinations as to the central focus of a publication, as opposed to its peripheral aspects. The courts are being asked to engage in literary as opposed to legal analysis. The 'incidental' test is not apt to encapsulate the notion of proportionality and it is hard to import that notion through interpretation of the term. It would, however, be possible to go some way in doing so, which could mean stretching the notion of 'incidental' under s 3(1) HRA where a publication would be viewed as of especial value at Strasbourg in terms of the justifications for free expression.[161] If, as discussed above, the threshold under s 2(2) was lowered in reliance on s 3(1), such a development would allow a counter-balancing value to be afforded to media freedom.

The problematic term 'incidental' can only be stretched so far, and if the courts were to seek to adopt a proportionality test within the terms of s 5, they would have to be prepared to depart from the literal meaning of the section and to read words into it.[162] A strong argument for so doing is that the Parliamentary intention behind the introduction of the 1981 Act was to bring English law into compliance with the Convention. If the judges were prepared to accept that Parliament had partially failed to achieve its aim, then even reading words into the statute to achieve such compliance could be seen, not as defeating Parliament's intention, but as perfecting it. The new interpretation, moreover, does not go against a pervasive feature of the statute.[163] At the same time the reform proposed is largely a matter of interpretation rather than of implying into

161 See above, pp 309–11.

162 This might be possible: see R v A [2001] 2 Cr App R 21; [2002] 1 AC 45; for discussion see Chapter 4, pp 175–83. Kavanagh's writings on s 3(1) have influenced this analysis. See in particular 'The elusive divide between interpretation and legislation under the HRA' (2004) 24(2) OJLS 259. A court could read in the words 'if the proportionality test under Article 10(2) is not satisfied, or' after the word 'if'.

163 Cf R (on the application of Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2003] 1 AC 837 in which the Secretary of State's role in sentencing was found to be incompatible with Art 6 since he could not be viewed as an independent and impartial tribunal. However, a declaration of incompatibility was made rather than seeking to use s 3(1) since the Secretary of State's role was such a fundamental feature of the statute as a whole – any other approach would have been against the grain of the statute.

the statute an entirely new provision that was absent from it.[164] Moreover, the area in question – protecting the judicial process – is one that is clearly within the judicial domain in terms of constitutional competence and role.[165] Parliament is not otherwise addressing this issue – there are no plans at present to reform the 1981 Act.[166] No issues of resource allocation arise; thus there are positive reasons for activism in this context and none for deference.

The Defence of 'ignorance' under s 3

A defendant charged with the s 1 offence can seek to use s 3 as a defence. Section 3 is a true defence, since the burden of proof lies on the defendant. The publisher or distributor will not be strictly liable if, having taken all reasonable care, he or she does not know and has no reason to suspect that the proceedings are active or that the publication contains the type of material likely to give rise to strict liability under s 2. It may be noted that since the common law (see below) does not depend on the use of the active test, liability could still arise outside the statute even where, within the statute, s 3 would have been applicable.

Conclusions: re-balancing the 1981 Act

It has been argued in this chapter that contempt law is failing as a means of protecting fair trials, but also that it is not sufficiently effective in protecting freedom of expression. A rarely enforced rule of a high but uncertain threshold such as that under s 2(2) inevitably tends to leave the ultimate responsibility for avoiding unfairness with trial judges. The current division of responsibility, almost inevitable under a largely protective model, between contempt law and trial judges, is deeply problematic. The current position may mean that freedom of expression is not fully protected since the media are uncertain at times whether or not a publication might infringe the imprecisely expressed rule under s.2(2). But at the same time the existence of the rule fails to provide protection for trials. Certain newspapers, especially the less responsible sections of the press, at times engage in reporting at the outer limits of what can be tolerated under s.2(2). They may do so in the knowledge that if a number of newspapers are involved, it may be hard to identify the responsibility of any particular one. Or they may merely take a risk, motivated by determination to maintain commercial advantage, on the basis that the uncertainty of the s.2(2) test (and of the common law test of real risk of prejudice), and the high threshold it appears to represent, make it difficult for a prosecution to succeed and quite probable, therefore, that it will not be undertaken.

164 As in the Court of Appeal in re S and Re W (Care Orders) – as discussed in Chapter 4, pp 176–77 – the decision was overturned: it was made clear by the House of Lords [2002] 2 AC 291 that the Court of Appeal had gone too far under s 3.

165 In terms of both expertise and constitutional role the context is similar to those in R v A [2002] 1 AC 45 and in R v Offen [2001] 1 WLR 253; but not that in Bellinger [2003] 2 All ER 513– where the court declined to read words into the statute in question under s 3 HRA. For discussion, see Chapter 4, pp 183–86.

166 Cf Bellinger ibid, where Parliament was about to address the situation at issue regarding the law relating to transsexuals.

The imprecision of the s 2(2) test is exacerbated precisely because the roles of contempt law and of the trial judge overlap. Judges in contempt cases must take account of the likelihood that neutralising measures will be or have been used. The use of such measures, including directions to the jury, make it hard to determine whether the risk in question at the time of publication still subsisted at the time of trial. Different judges take varying views as to the efficacy of such measures and the ability of the jury to disregard media comment. Thus contempt law is failing to delineate the boundary between the use of protective and of neutralising measures and therefore allowing too much pressure to be placed on the criminal justice system in high-profile cases. Possibly that boundary cannot be delineated effectively unless, as discussed below, a far more precise 'protective' test is adopted and preventive measures are used more extensively, accompanied by robust safeguards for media freedom. Most worryingly, parts of the media may rely, not merely on the uncertainty of s 2(2), but on some kind of complicity with the government in relation to their coverage, especially in terrorist cases. The uncertainty of s 2(2), and the high bar it appears to create in practice, clearly aid the Attorney General in justifying refusals to prosecute. As indicated above, such refusals probably do not in any event have to be justified in court.[167]

The reforms proposed could re-balance the statute by focussing it more closely on fair trial and free speech rights. Where prejudice has probably been caused and the speech in question consists of reportage with a misleading gloss,[168] s 5 could not be used, under the current interpretation of the section. But the speech might in any event escape liability since it would be probable that no prosecution would be brought for the reasons given above, founded partly on the unsatisfactory nature of s 2(2). The reform proposed under s 5 would not afford greater protection to such speech since its misleading quality would undermine its public interest value. Section 2(2), if interpreted more clearly, as discussed above, could provide an increased protection for fair trials; s 5 could only be viewed as providing a satisfactory countervailing protection for free speech if the courts were prepared to take this course. But the result might be – in something close to a reversal of the current situation – that near worthless and probably prejudicial speech would be caught by an enhanced s 2(2), while speech of the most value in Art 10 terms would be more likely to escape under the reformed s 5. Thus a re-balancing of the statute, based more firmly on both fair trial and free speech principles, could occur. This would accord more strongly with the speech/harm balancing test from Sunday Times v UK. Speech of value would be less likely to be caught but where there was a real possibility of harm to a trial, liability would be more likely to be established. This approach would echo the Strasbourg one as encapsulated in both Sunday Times and Worm more closely than is the case under the current position, but it would not replicate it. The problem would still remain that Art 10 values can overcome Art 6 ones under s 5 since the section allows speech to cause serious prejudice to a trial but escape liability due to its value. It is only possible to meet this argument by relying on the use of neutralising measures at trial, but for the reasons already discussed, this is not an entirely satisfactory position.

167 See above fn 103 and p 345.

168 E.g. the Sun headline 'Got the Bastards!' in relation to the arrests of terrorist suspects in July 2005 referred to earlier, fn 94, above.

3 Intentionally prejudicing proceedings: common law contempt

Introduction

As explained above, the common law of contempt pre-1981 created an offence of strict liability. A residual and narrow area of common law contempt was preserved under the 1981 Act, based on a mens rea requirement. Section 6(c) of the 1981 Act preserves liability for contempt at common law if intention to prejudice the administration of justice can be shown. 'Prejudice [to] the administration of justice' clearly includes (and may solely denote – see below) prejudice to particular proceedings. Once the requirement of intent is satisfied, it is easier to establish contempt at common law rather than under the Act since it is only necessary to show 'a real risk of prejudice' and proceedings need only be imminent, not 'active'. Clearly, liability can be established at common law in instances when it might also be established under the 1981 Act, as occurred in the Hislop case, and also in instances when the Act will not apply because proceedings are inactive. Possibly, it might also be established where one of the statutory tests other than the 'active' requirement was not satisfied. These preliminary observations are developed below, taking Convention standards into account under the HRA. Section 3 HRA does not apply (except to s 6(c) itself) since intentional contempt arises at common law, but the court has a duty to ensure that that the common law is compatible with the Convention under s 6. It will be suggested, in particular, that the common law requirements should be subjected to a strict scrutiny in so far as they represent the possibility of circumventing a measure adopted specifically to meet Art 10 standards. A publication will fall within the area of liability preserved by s 6(c) if three elements are present – a specific intention to prejudice the administration of justice in imminent proceedings, and the creation of a real risk of prejudice to those proceedings.

Intention to prejudice the administration of justice

The test for intention to prejudice the administration of justice was established in Attorney General v Times Newspaper[169] and Attorney General v News Group Newspapers plc.[170] It was made clear that 'intention' connotes specific intent and therefore cannot include recklessness. The test may be summed up as follows: did the defendant either wish to prejudice proceedings or ('oblique' intent) foresee that such prejudice was a virtually inevitable consequence of publishing the material in question? Thus, it is not necessary to show a desire to prejudice proceedings or that where there was such a desire, that it was the sole desire. This test is based on the meaning of intent arising from rulings on the mens rea for murder: Hancock and Shankland,[171] Nedrick[172] and Woollin.[173]

169 [1992] 7 AC 191; [1991] 2 All ER 398; for a report of the Divisional Court proceedings, see Re Attorney General v Observer and Guardian Newspapers Ltd (1989) The Times, 9 May; for comment, see [1989] PL 477. For comment on the mens rea issue, see Laws (1990) 43 CLP 99, pp 105–10.

170 [1989] QB 110; [1988] 3 WLR 163; [1988] 2 All ER 906.

171 [1986] AC 455; [1986] 1 All ER 641; [1986] 3 WLR 1014.

172 [1986] 3 All ER 1; [1986] 1 WLR 1025.

173 [1999] 1 AC 82.

This is a subjective test, but the Court of Appeal in Attorney General v Newspaper Publishing plc (the Spycatcher case)[174] appeared to be asking whether or not the consequences in question were 'foreseeable', suggesting not that the defendant should actually have foreseen them, but that an objective observer would have done so. This would, of course, be an easier test to satisfy, although since, in practice, it will be necessary to infer that the defendant foresaw the consequences, the difference between the two tests may be of only theoretical importance. This argument is put forward on the basis that in general, if an objective observer would have foreseen a risk of prejudice, it will be hard for an editor to show that he or she did not, because, unlike some defendants to whom this test is applied (in other areas of criminal law), an editor must make a decision as to publication unaffected by mental incompetence (it is assumed), emotion or the need to act in the heat of the moment. Nevertheless, a concept of 'objective intent' is insufficiently distinguishable from recklessness; as it is established that recklessness will not suffice for common law contempt, intention clearly refers to subjective intent.

A number of circumstances may allow the inference of intention to prejudice the proceedings to be drawn, although it is suggested that the relevance of the circumstances will depend on the form of intent – desire or oblique intent – which seems to be in question. In Attorney General v News Group Newspapers plc,[175] the newspaper's support for the prosecution in its columns and in funding a private prosecution allowed the inference to be made. A Dr B was questioned about an allegation of rape made against him by an eight-year-old girl, but eventually the county prosecuting solicitor decided that there was insufficient evidence to prosecute him. The Sun obtained the story and decided that it should offer the mother financial help in order to fund a private prosecution. It published various articles attacking Dr B: 'Rape Case Doc: Sun acts'; 'Beast must be named, says MP', etc. The Attorney General brought a prosecution against The Sun for contempt. The articles could not come within the strict liability rule because the proceedings in question – the private prosecution – were not active. The contempt alleged, therefore, arose at common law. It was found that intention could be established, either on the basis of a desire to prejudice the proceedings (presumably in order to vindicate the paper's stance) or because the editor must have foreseen that Dr B would almost certainly not receive a fair trial. The judgment would support either view, but probably favours the former: in his ruling, Watkins LJ said: '. . . they could only have printed articles of such a kind if they were campaigning for a conviction as they clearly were.' However, if he had the latter form of intent in mind, it may be said that although the newspaper had acted reprehensibly in using its power to attempt to influence a trial it had itself become involved in, it is arguable that intent should not have been so readily established. The fact that The Sun was personally involved was not, it is argued, relevant to oblique intent. The proceedings were clearly not going to occur for some time; therefore, although the defendants probably foresaw some risk of prejudice to them, it was not clear that such prejudice could be said to be a virtually inevitable consequence of publication. In fact, Dr B was acquitted; the jury were clearly able to put out of their minds any influence articles may have had.

174 [1988] Ch 333; [1987] 3 All ER 276; [1988] 3 WLR 942, CA.
175 [1989] QB 110; [1988] 3 WLR 163; [1988] 2 All ER 906.

The Sun case may be contrasted with Attorney General v Sport Newspapers Ltd[176] in which the test for intention was somewhat more strictly interpreted. One David Evans, who had previous convictions for rape, was suspected of abducting Anna Humphries. He was on the run when The Sport published his convictions; the proceedings were not therefore active, and so the case arose at common law. It did not appear that The Sport wished to prejudice proceedings. Was it foreseen as a virtual certainty that prejudice to Evans's trial would occur as a result of the publication? It was held that there was a risk of such prejudice of which the editor of The Sport was aware, but that such awareness of risk was not sufficient. Clearly, had the mens rea of common law contempt included recklessness, it would have been established. The requirement to prove intent was re-affirmed post-HRA in Attorney General v Punch, which is discussed below.

Imminence

At common law, the sub judice period began when proceedings could be said to be 'imminent' (Savundranayagan).[177] This test would of course be readily satisfied where proceedings were active. However, it may not always be necessary to establish imminence. In Attorney General v News Group Newspapers plc[178] it was held obiter that where it is established that the defendant intended to prejudice proceedings, it is not necessary to show that proceedings are imminent. In his judgment, Watkins LJ approved obiter of David Pannick's contention that 'no authority states that common law contempt cannot be committed where proceedings cannot be said to be imminent but where there is a specific intent to impede a fair trial, the occurrence of which is in contemplation'. It was found that even if the trial of Dr B was too far off to be said to be pending or imminent, the conduct of The Sun in publishing stories at the same time as assisting the mother in the private prosecution could still amount to contempt.

Bingham LJ concurred with this dilution of the imminence test in Attorney General v Sport,[179] although in the same case Hodgson J considered that proceedings must be 'pending'. He interpreted 'pending' as synonymous with 'active', an interpretation which would at one and the same time have curtailed the scope of common law contempt, but focused it more closely on the harm caused by deliberately creating prejudice to proceedings. This point, therefore, remains unresolved, leaving the media without a clear guide as to the period during which publication of matter relevant to proceedings will be risky. If proceedings need not even be imminent, it appears that reporting of matters which may give rise to proceedings at some point in the future could be curbed, assuming that the other tests were satisfied. The test of 'imminence' is itself too wide and uncertain, but would be preferable to the uncertainty on this point which was exacerbated by Attorney General v Sport. It is uncertain what the alternative test contemplated by Bingham LJ could be. There cannot be an intention to prejudice something which cannot even be identified as a possibility. Thus the test at its least stringent must be that proceedings can be identified as a possibility before this head of common law contempt can be in question. At the same time it would only

176 [1991] 1 WLR 1194.
177 [1968] 3 All ER 439; [1968] 1 WLR 1761, CA.
178 [1989] QB 110; [1988] 3 WLR 163; [1988] 2 All ER 906.
179 [1991] 1 WLR 1194.

be possible to rely on this diluted imminence test in relation to instances of simple rather than oblique intent. Desired consequences can never be viewed as too remote, assuming that they in fact arise, but it would be almost impossible to show that a virtually certain consequence of prejudice had been foreseen in instances of a very lengthy time lag between publication and proceedings. Obviously, even in relation to simple intent the actus reus of a real risk of prejudice still has to be established, which would also be very difficult in relation to a lengthy time lag, except possibly in exceptional instances, such as that in Attorney General v News Group Newspapers itself, where the newspaper is personally involved. This development in common law contempt is therefore of little practical significance. It may have some slight curtailing impact on media freedom, but at the same time it is unlikely to protect the fairness of proceedings. The more uncertain the test becomes, the more, it is argued, common law contempt is divorced from a focus on such fairness.

This test – that proceedings need merely be in contemplation or highly likely to occur – is also used in New Zealand.[180] If a suitable post-HRA case ever arises, it is possible that reinterpretation of this common law doctrine as an aspect of the courts' duty under s 6 HRA[181] might reintroduce certainty into the timing test. It is questionable whether the interference with freedom of expression represented by a prosecution for common law contempt could be said to be 'prescribed by law' due to the lack of precision and therefore of forseeability inherent in the current interpretations of the sub judice period. As Chapter 2 indicated, an interference must not only have a basis in law, that basis must be of sufficient quality.[182] Probably the most satisfactory method of ensuring that the requirements of quality are met would be to adopt the course suggested by Hodgson J in Attorney General v Sport. The 'active' test is laid down with reasonable precision and would, therefore, probably meet those requirements. It may be noted that, as Hodgson J pointed out, Scottish and Australian cases have held that imminent proceedings are not covered by contempt law.[183] At the least, reinterpretation might demand a return to the original requirement of imminence. Obviously, if the active test was adopted, this would confine common law contempt to instances in which the statute could also be used. It would still have a role since, where intention to prejudice was shown, a much higher fine could be imposed on the media body in question. Such a development would be, it is suggested, appropriate in the post-HRA era since it would prevent the common law, as interpreted in accordance with Art 10 under s 6, from circumventing a statute that had been adopted in order to meet a Strasbourg ruling.[184] If common law contempt could be viewed as prescribed by law, the timing test could nevertheless be narrowed down by reference to the Art 10(2) tests of necessity and proportionality. It could readily be argued that holding open the possibility of liability for such an indeterminate length of time was disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued.

This development in common law contempt could theoretically be curtailing press freedom, since it clearly does nothing to help editors who wish to determine whether 180 Television New Zealand Ltd v Solicitor-General [1989] 1 NZLR 1, at 3.

181 See Douglas v Hello! [2001] QB 967.

182 See pp 68–69.

183 See Hall v Assoc Newspapers Ltd 1978 SLT 241; Attorney General for NSW v TCN Channel Nine Pty Ltd (1990) 20 NSWLR 368.

184 In the Sunday Times case (1979–80) 2 EHRR 245.

or not a publication might attract a criminal prosecution. In practice, unless a media body can be shown to have desired to prejudice proceedings through a publication, by creating bias in the minds of those involved such as jurors, it is almost impossible to show that such prejudice is a virtually certain consequence of publication if the proceedings are merely imminent but not active. Virtual certainty of such prejudice could normally only arise where publication occurred close to the action or during it. Therefore the ‘imminence’ test is only nominally of significance in most instances – it can be assumed that it may have become virtually otiose and that currently the strict liability rule will almost always be used rather than the common law in relation to the Sun type of case. The only reason for using the common law during the active period would be to seek a higher penalty where mens rea could be shown. But this could be done in any event if reforms to the 1981 Act abolished this form of common law contempt but allowed for higher penalties to be applied where the media body was shown to have mens rea. There would be an argument for including recklessness. Intentionally or recklessly creating a substantial risk of serious prejudice during the active period could become a new offence, creating an alternative to the strict liability rule, and attracting a higher sentence. The current common law rule has however a residual relevance in relation to other forms of creating prejudice to proceedings, as discussed below.

In practice, unless a media body can be shown to have desired to prejudice proceedings through a publication, by creating bias in the minds of those involved such as jurors, it is almost impossible to show that such prejudice is a virtually certain consequence of publication if the proceedings are merely imminent but not active. Virtual certainty of such prejudice could normally only arise where publication occurred close to the action or during it. Therefore the ‘imminence’ test is only nominally of significance in most instances – it can be assumed that it may have become virtually otiose and that currently the strict liability rule will almost always be used rather than the common law in relation to the Sun type of case. The only reason for using the common law during the active period would be to seek a higher penalty where mens rea could be shown. But this could be done in any event if reforms to the 1981 Act abolished this form of common law contempt but allowed for higher penalties to be applied where the media body was shown to have mens rea. There would be an argument for including recklessness. Intentionally or recklessly creating a substantial risk of serious prejudice during the active period could become a new offence, creating an alternative to the strict liability rule, and attracting a higher sentence. The current common law rule has however a residual relevance in relation to other forms of creating prejudice to proceedings, as discussed below.

A real risk of prejudice

Methods of fulfilling this test

It must be shown that the publication amounts to conduct which creates a real risk of prejudice to the administration of justice (Thompson Newspapers).[185] There are a number of different methods of fulfilling this test. In Hislop and Pressdram[186] it was found that the defendants, who were one party in an action for defamation, had interfered with the administration of justice because they had brought improper pressure to bear on the other party, Sonia Sutcliffe, by publishing material in Private Eye intended to deter her from pursuing the action. There was a substantial risk that the articles might have succeeded in their aim; had they done so, the course of justice in Mrs Sutcliffe's action would have been seriously prejudiced, since she would have been deterred from having her claim decided in a court. Counsel for Private Eye had argued that defamatory material which the defendant seeks to justify should not be restrained, because until it is clear that the alleged libel is untrue, it is not clear that any right has been infringed (Bonnard v Perryman).[187] This argument was rejected because the question of deterrence did not depend on the truth or falsity of the allegations. The possibility of justification was thus irrelevant. In this instance, it might also be noted that the relevant tests under the 1981 Act had been satisfied; therefore, it would seem that, a fortiori, common law contempt could be established, it having already been accepted that the articles had been published with the intention of putting pressure on Mrs Sutcliffe to discontinue the defamation action, thereby satisfying the mens rea requirement at common law. In Attorney General v News Group Newspapers plc[188] it was found that there was a risk of prejudice since jurors might have been influenced by the newspaper coverage which came close to imputing guilt to the defendant. This was however a doubtful finding due to the lapse of time between publication and trial. The almost dismissive treatment of the actus reus in that case came close to implying that the Sun was being punished for acting reprehensibly in seeking to prejudice the proceedings, rather than in relation to the risk it actually created.

185 [1968] 1 All ER 268; [1968] 1 WLR 1.

The particular use of common law contempt in Hislop represents a clear and quite precisely defined area of liability targeted at a particular mischief. There is no division of responsibility between trial judge and contempt law: if contempt law did not fulfil this role, it could not be fulfilled at all, under the existing law. But the form of common law contempt based on creating bias in the minds of those involved in proceedings seems to be serving no useful purpose, since it overlaps with the use of the strict liability rule, and should be abolished. The imprecision and over-breadth of the tests for the actus reus sit uneasily with the demands of proportionality under Art 10. Since it is now hard to satisfy s 2(2) of the 1981 Act unless a publication occurs close to or during the trial, it is hard to imagine an instance in which it would be useful to invoke the test of imminence: if a publication was merely imminent as opposed to active it would not satisfy the 'real risk of prejudice' test under the more recent s 2(2) rulings on the creation of risk.[189]

A further very significant special form of common law contempt can arise if part of the media frustrates a court order (including orders made under s 4(2) of the 1981 Act)[190] against another part. Usually the order is made to restrain the publication of 186 1991] 1 QB 514; [1991] 1 All ER 911; [1991] 2 WLR 219, CA.

187 [1891] 2 Ch 269, p 289.
188 [1989] QB 110.
189 See pp 343–44, 350 above.
190 Section 4(1) provides that a fair and accurate report of proceedings held in public published contemporaneously in good faith will not be a contempt. Section 4(2) of the 1981 Act provides confidential material.[191] The three tests applicable are the same as those discussed above: proceedings must (probably) be imminent; specific intent to prejudice proceedings must be shown, and a real risk of prejudice must arise. But the last test has had to be interpreted in a very particular fashion in order to allow this particular form of contempt to arise.

Frustrating an injunction against another media body

The Spycatcher doctrine

This highly significant extension of common law contempt arose from one strand of the Spycatcher litigation. In 1985, the Attorney General commenced proceedings in Australia in an attempt to restrain the publication of Spycatcher by Peter Wright. The book included allegations of illegal activity engaged in by MI5. In 1986, after the Guardian and the Observer had published reports of the forthcoming hearing which included some Spycatcher material, the Attorney General obtained temporary ex parte injunctions preventing them from further disclosure of such material on the ground of breach of confidence.[192] While the temporary injunctions were in force, the Independent and two other papers published material covered by them. It was determined in the Court of Appeal,[193] and confirmed in the House of Lords,[194] that such publication constituted the actus reus of common law contempt on the basis that publication of confidential material, the subject-matter of a pending action, damaging its confidentiality and thereby probably rendering the action pointless, created an interference with the administration of justice. Once the material had been published it was no longer confidential; therefore the subject-matter of the action for breach of confidence in which a permanent injunction was being sort had been destroyed. The case therefore affirmed the principle that once an interlocutory injunction has been obtained restraining one organ of the media from publication of allegedly confidential material, the rest of the media may be in contempt if they publish that material, even if their intention in so doing is to bring alleged iniquity to public attention. This case thus allowed the laws of confidence and contempt to operate together as a significant prior restraint on media freedom, and in so doing created an inroad into the general principle that a court order should only affect the party to which it is directed as only that party will have a chance to argue that the making of the order would be wrong.

The decision in Attorney General v Newspaper Publishing plc and Others[195] seemed to represent an attempt to narrow down the area of liability created by the decision in Attorney General v Times Newspapers Ltd. The case arose from the reporting of that during any legal proceeding held in public, a judge may make an order postponing reporting of the proceedings if such action 'appears necessary for avoiding a substantial risk of prejudice to the administration of justice in those proceedings'. For discussion of s 4, see below 384–89.

191 See, for discussion of breach of confidence in the context of state secrecy, Chapter 7, pp 616–24.

192 For discussion of this branch of the litigation, see Chapter 7, pp 618–19.

193 Attorney General v Newspaper Publishing plc, The Times, 28 February 1990.

194 Attorney General v Times Newspapers Ltd [1992] 1 AC 191; [1991] 2 All ER 398; [1991] 2 WLR 994, HL: for comment see NLJ (1991) 141 (6516), 1115.

195 [1997] 3 All ER 159; The Times, 2 May 1997, CA.

the appeals in the Ordtech case,[196] a case which bore strong similarities to the Matrix Churchill case.[197] The appellants appealed against their convictions for exporting arms; public interest immunity certificates were issued,[198] but the Court of Appeal ordered that the material covered by them, which was crucial to the appeal, should be disclosed in summarised and edited form to the appellants and their legal advisers. The order restricted the use of the material to the appeal and requested its return on conclusion of the appeal. In Court, in directing return of the documents, the Lord Chief Justice indicated that breach of the order would result in the matter being referred to the Attorney General.

In its report of the proceedings, the Independent published a small amount of material from the documents which did not also appear in the written copy of the judgment. The Attorney General brought proceedings for contempt against the Independent, relying on the ruling in Attorney General v Times Newspapers to the effect that if a third party with the requisite intent acts in a way that frustrates the basis on which a court has determined that justice should be administered, then it will be guilty of contempt. On behalf of the Independent it was argued that the Times case represented an extension of the law as it had previously been understood and that the Court should be slow to extend the law any further since any such extension represented a further encroachment on freedom of expression and inhibited the media in its function of informing the public. The Court did not accept that any conduct by a third party inconsistent with a court order was sufficient to amount to the actus reus of contempt: it was found necessary to show that a significant and adverse effect on the administration of justice in the relevant proceedings had occurred. The Court of Appeal used the wording of Art 10 of the Convention in finding that restraints on freedom of expression should be no wider than necessary in a democratic society, and considered that conduct which is inconsistent with a court order in a trivial way should not create the risk of a conviction for contempt. The application of the Attorney General was therefore dismissed.

The principle laid down in the Times case was again reconsidered in the HRA era by the House of Lords in Attorney General v Punch.[199] The case arose from the publication by Punch magazine of an article by David Shayler. Shayler had served as an officer with MI5 and when he left MI5 he took with him copies of confidential documents containing sensitive information relating to intelligence activities of MI5. According to the Attorney General, Mr Shayler then disclosed some of this material to a newspaper publisher, Associated Newspapers Ltd. Articles written by Mr Shayler, or based on information provided by him, were published in The Mail on Sunday and the Evening Standard in August 1997. The Attorney General then intervened and brought civil proceedings against Mr Shayler and Associated Newspapers. Hooper J granted an interlocutory injunction against Mr Shayler based on breach of confidence.[200] A similar order was made against Associated Newspapers. By this order, expressed to 196 See Blackledge and Others (1996) 1 Cr App R 326, CA.

197 See The Report of the Inquiry into the Export of Defence Equipment and Dual Use Goods to Iraq and Related Prosecutions, 1995–96, HC 115. See further [1996] PL 357–527; PL [1997] pp 211–14.

198 Certificates rendering the material covered immune from scrutiny.

199 [2003] 1 AC 1046; [2003] 2 WLR 49; [2003] 1 All ER 289. For discussion of the case, see Smith, ATH ‘Third Parties and the Reach of Injunctions’ [2003] 62(2) CLJ 241.

200 On 4 September 1997.

continue until the trial of the action, Mr Shayler was restrained from disclosing to any newspaper or anyone else,

> . . . any information obtained by him in the course of or by virtue of his employment in and position as a member of the Security Service (whether presented as fact or fiction) which relates to or which may be construed as relating to the Security Service or its membership or activities or to security or intelligence activities generally.

Two provisos were attached to the order. First, the order did not apply to any information in respect of which the Attorney General stated in writing that the information was not information the publication of which the Crown was seeking to restrain. Second, the order did not preclude repetition of the information disclosed in The Mail on Sunday on 24 August 1997. Neither Mr Shayler nor Associated Newspapers objected to the making of these orders.

Mr Shayler then began writing for Punch magazine; the editor, Mr Steen, was aware of the terms of the interlocutory non-disclosure orders made against Mr Shayler. The article which became the subject of the contempt proceedings dealt with the Bishopsgate bomb in 1993 and the death of WPC Yvonne Fletcher outside the Libyan Embassy in 1984. At first instance, in the contempt proceedings, Silber J concluded[201] that the actus reus of common law contempt had been established on the basis that the defendants had published the article in breach of the terms of the injunctions, with the result that the purpose of the Court in making those injunctions was subverted and, in consequence, there had been some significant and adverse effect on the administration of justice. The judge held that the purpose of the Court in granting the injunctions was not to protect national security, but to ensure that until trial there should be no disclosure of information obtained by Mr Shayler in his employment, so that the confidentiality of the information could be kept intact until the trial of the permanent injunctions.[202] The judge also found that the necessary mens rea had been established since Mr Steen knew that publication of the article was a breach of the injunctions, and he intended to act in breach of them. Therefore it was found that he intended by the publication to impede or prejudice the administration of justice by thwarting or undermining the intended effect of the injunctions.[203]

The Court of Appeal, by a three to two majority, overturned this decision.[204] Lord Phillips MR characterised the Court's purpose in granting the injunctions differently. He found that the correct approach was to proceed on the basis that Hooper J's purpose in granting the injunctions was 'to prevent the disclosure of any matter that arguably risked harming the national interest'.[205] He noted the Attorney General's case that the effect of the injunctions was that 'no newspaper could knowingly publish any matter that fell within the wide terms of the Associated Newspapers' injunction without first obtaining clearance from himself or from the court'. Lord Phillips objected to this 201 Attorney General v Punch, 6 October 2000 (unreported), QB, at para 62.

202 Ibid, at para 52.
203 Ibid, at para 78.
204 [2001] QB 1028; [2001] 2 All ER 655.
205 Ibid, at para 100.

contention on the basis that it would subject the press to the censorship of the Attorney General. He found that it would result in an imposition of a restriction on freedom of the press that would be disproportionate to any public interest and thus in breach of Art 10 of the European Convention. He further considered that such a proposition could not be reconciled with the duty imposed on the Court by s 12(3) HRA.[206] Section 12(3) has established a higher threshold for granting injunctions against the media but it is not applicable in criminal proceedings. Lord Phillips's point appeared to be that if an injunction could be granted which then affected another media body through the threat of criminal proceedings, that would not appear to accord with the spirit of the section. However, he found that the article in question included three items of previously unpublished material which did risk harming the national interest and therefore defeated the purpose of the injunction. The actus reus of common law contempt was therefore established. Lord Phillips went on, however, to hold that in order to satisfy the test for mens rea it had to be shown that Mr Steen knew that publication would interfere with the course of justice by defeating the purpose underlying the injunctions. It was found that the Attorney General had failed to establish this; Mr Steen had contended that he thought that the purpose of the court order was to restrain publication of material dangerous to national security and that he had no intention of publishing any such information.

This decision of the Court of Appeal sought to focus closely on the values and interests at stake, and refused to allow an uncertain threat to the administration of justice to overcome freedom of expression. Although the Convention was not relied on extensively, and there was virtually no recitation of the relevant jurisprudence, the Court showed itself determined to adopt a stance which relied on close examination of the necessity of the interference in question, eventually concluding that a pressing social need to allow such an interference with freedom of political expression was not present. The Court was not impressed by the claim that it was necessary to preserve this area of liability in order to prevent impediments to the administration of justice. Thus, the Court sought to identify another interest – in this instance national security – which could genuinely support the grave interference with freedom of expression represented by the Spycatcher doctrine, and found that the alleged harm was not serious enough to justify such a grave interference with media freedom. In some rare instances it might be possible to show that the journalist or other person in question, due to his or her background and/or specialist knowledge, did recognise that publication of the material in question would be likely to damage national security. It may be noted that the Official Secrets Act 1989, s 5 presupposes that it will sometimes be possible to show that a person in the position of a journalist recognised that possibility.[207]

Nevertheless, this decision would have narrowed down and virtually destroyed the Spycatcher area of liability, since if the purpose of interim orders was accepted to be to prevent disclosure of any matter that arguably risked harming the national interest, then proof of mens rea for contempt would involve proving to the criminal standard that third parties, including editors and journalists, knew that materials published arguably risked harming that interest. This would probably have proved to be a difficult, if not 206 For the provision of s 12(3) and discussion, see Chapter 9, pp 985–90.

207 See Chapter 7, pp 602–4 for discussion of s 5.

impossible, task for the Crown in most instances. Editors would have been able to insist that they had no reason to believe that even arguable damage to national security might result from such publication. Since the mens rea required is specific intent, it would not be possible merely to show that a reasonable person in the defendant's position would have known that such a risk arose – a possible means of satisfying the test required under the Official Secrets Act 1989 s 5. Thus, the result would have been that the grant of such injunctions in most circumstances could not have lead to the imposition of criminal liability against third parties such as Mr Steen.

However, the House of Lords overturned the decision of the Court of Appeal. Lord Nicholls, in a speech with which the other Law Lords agreed, found that the underlying purpose of the Attorney General, as the plaintiff in the proceedings against Mr Shayler, in seeking the order against Mr Steen, was irrelevant. He said:

> The reason why the court grants interim protection is to protect the plaintiff's asserted right. But the manner in which this protection is afforded depends upon the terms of the interlocutory injunction. The purpose the court seeks to achieve by granting the interlocutory injunction is that, pending a decision by the court on the claims in the proceedings, the restrained acts shall not be done. Third parties are in contempt of court if they wilfully interfere with the administration of justice by thwarting the achievement of this purpose in those proceedings. This is so, even if in the particular case, the injunction is drawn in seemingly over-wide terms.[208]

In that instance, he found, the remedy of the third party whose conduct is affected by the order is to apply to the court for the order to be varied. He also pointed out that the act in question would only be contemptuous if the act done has some 'significant and adverse effect on the administration of justice in the proceedings'. Lord Hope characterised the purpose of the interim injunction in similar terms: '[i]ts purpose is to ensure that the other party to the dispute does not assume the responsibility of deciding for himself whether the material is of such a nature that the Attorney General is entitled in law to protection against its publication.'[209]

In the instant case the Lords found that the purpose of the judge in making the order was to preserve the confidentiality of the information specified in the order pending the trial so as to enable the court at trial to adjudicate effectively on the disputed issues of confidentiality arising in the action. It was to ensure that the court's decision on the claims in the proceedings should not be pre-empted by disclosure of any of the information specified in the order before the trial. The actus reus of contempt was satisfied by the thwarting of this purpose by destruction of the confidentiality of the material, through its publication in Punch, which it was the purpose of the injunction to preserve. Mr Steen had accepted that the publication of the offending magazine article had constituted the actus reus of contempt. Bearing in mind the purpose of the injunctions as already established, Lord Nicholls went on to find that the mens rea of common law contempt was also satisfied and so concluded that contempt of court was established. He said:

208 [2003] 1 AC 1046; [2003] 2 WLR 49; [2003] 1 All ER 289, at paras 43 and 44.
209 Ibid, at 114.

> The facts speak for themselves. Mr Steen . . . knew that the action against Mr Shayler raised confidentiality issues relating wholly or primarily to national security. He must, inevitably, have appreciated that by publishing the article he was doing precisely what the order was intended to prevent, namely, pre-empting the court's decision on these confidentiality. That is knowing interference with the administration of justice.[210]

Clearly, the finding of contempt represented an interference with freedom of expression as guaranteed by Art 10. However, Lord Nicholl's consideration of the impact of the HRA was brief and superficial. He noted, before coming to the argument as to the purpose of the injunction, that national security, one of the list of exceptions in Art 10(2), can justify a restraint on freedom of expression. He then went on to find, '[t]he rule of law requires that the decision on where this balance lies in any case should be made by the court as an independent and impartial tribunal established by law' and in the meantime the court must be able to prevent the information being disclosed. He went on to find that therefore:

> . . . the law must be able to prescribe appropriate penalties where a person deliberately sets the injunction at nought. Without sanctions an injunction would be a paper tiger. Sanctions are necessary to maintain the rule of law; in the language of the Convention, to maintain the authority of the judiciary.

This analysis did not address the questions of necessity and proportionality; it implied that once a court had decided that material should be kept confidential before the trial of a permanent injunction and had imposed an interim injunction with that object in mind, it would always be justifiable to restrict freedom of expression by way of common law contempt in order to provide a sanction against publication of the material by third parties where publication would have a significant and adverse effect on the administration of justice in that trial. But the need to show such an effect does not necessarily satisfy the requirements of proportionality since the adverse effect would always be caused by publication of material covered by the injunction which was not already, or not to a significant extent, in the public domain. Further, in such circumstances the mens rea requirement would virtually always be satisfied since journalists would normally be aware that the material was covered by an injunction against another body or person.

Lord Hope gave brief consideration to the question of proportionality, but without citing any Strasbourg jurisprudence, although he came to the same conclusion as Lord Nicholl. He found that there can be no objection to an interim injunction against the publication of information on the ground of proportionality if three requirements are satisfied. He considered that the general principles from which the requirements are to be derived are well established and are indicated in three leading cases: R (Daly) v Secretary of State for the Home Department,[211] R (Pretty) v Director of Public

210 Ibid, at paras 51 and 52.
211 [2001] 2 AC 532, at p 547A–B, per Lord Steyn.

Prosecutions,[212] R v Shayler.[213] He found that in the context in question the requirements are: first, that there is a genuine dispute as to whether the information is confidential because its publication might be a threat to national security; second that there are reasonable grounds for thinking that publication of the information before trial would impede or interfere with the administration of justice and third, that the interference with the right of free speech is no greater than is necessary. Lord Hope concentrated on the third requirement and found that the requirements of proportionality were satisfied since the opening words of the interim injunction were qualified by the proviso allowing newspapers to apply to the Attorney General to publish innocuous material; the extent of the injunction remained subject to the further order of the court and that court itself would have to observe the principle of proportionality when it dealt with any application before the trial for the relaxation of the scope of the injunction.[214] He insisted that in each instance the analysis of proportionality should be fact-sensitive.

However, objection can be made to his findings on the basis that all interim injunctions would satisfy the second and third of these requirements and the first is open to the objection that it places a power of censorship in the hands, not only of a member of the executive but also in those of one party to the original and forthcoming actions, creating an appearance of bias. The Attorney General is the very person (or office) whose rights are being upheld by the threat of the invocation of the contempt of court jurisdiction. To determine whether liability under that jurisdiction can be justified as an interference with freedom of expression, partly by reference to his powers to allow publication, does not appear to provide an adequate safeguard for the media. This was far from the hard look at the proportionality that one would expect of a court which took its duty under s 6(1) HRA seriously.

Critique of Punch

The requirements of both the actus reus and mens rea of common law contempt, as interpreted by the House of Lords in Punch, do little to temper the rigour of this doctrine. In particular, the demands of proportionality do not appear to be satisfied when it is borne in mind that if the party to whom the interim injunction was originally addressed published material covered by it, it would only be subject to civil sanctions, whereas third parties such as Punch who published such material would be criminally liable. It is clearly anomalous that this should be the case. In the instant case the Attorney General had fair warning that Punch was likely to publish Shayler material and could have sought a separate injunction, backed up by civil sanctions, against it.[215]

The requirements of proportionality could have been satisfied by accepting the test put forward by the Court of Appeal. That test clearly did depart from the test for common law contempt established in the Spycatcher case since it focused on the underlying as 212 [2001] 3 WLR 1598, at 1637A–B.

213 [2002] 2 WLR 754, at 783F–H, 786A–B.

214 Attorney General v Punch [2003] 1 AC 1046, at paras 114–120.

215 It is in fact arguable that if the first party violated an injunction as indicated, it could be punished under the law of criminal contempt in the sense that it had interfered with the administration of justice in the proceedings against itself, but since the civil sanction is available, this sanction is not used in such circumstances. Attorney General v Punch [2003] 1 AC 1046, at paras 114–20.

opposed to the expressed purpose of the injunctions. But it is the duty of the courts under s 6 HRA to develop the common law by reference to the Convention rights,[216] taking account of the jurisprudence (s 2 HRA). In this instance the scrutiny afforded to the proportionality review would be expected to be particularly intense since the expression to be suppressed was political expression.

The alternative is to expect the media to apply to the Attorney General to have injunctions varied, something that – it appears – they will only be able to do if the original order makes provision for such applications,[217] and an avenue that the Court of Appeal saw in any event as amounting almost to executive vetting and censorship. Where the original order made no such provision there would appear to be a strong case for asking the court in contempt proceedings to take account of the over-breadth of the original order.

In so far as the Spycatcher doctrine is of value in preserving national security, whether that is viewed as an indirect or direct effect of its application, such liability would also provide protection against disclosures that might harm national security, and of course liability could also arise under s 5 of the Official Secrets Act 1989.[218] The Attorney General could merely seek injunctions against each media body separately on grounds of breach of confidence if it seemed likely that it would publish the material in question. Thus the continuance of this form of liability overlaps in most instances with other possible remedies or sanctions.

The net result of the House of Lords' ruling in Punch is that the Spycatcher contempt principle has been re-affirmed, unchanged, in the HRA era. The cursory treatment of the HRA is perhaps the most interesting aspect of the ruling. It had little impact on the reasoning and none on the outcome. The immense implications of the Spycatcher contempt principle for media freedom went largely unrecognised in the Lords' findings. Those findings mean that the whole of the media can continue to be threatened with a criminal sanction for an indefinite period of time – a period that could well exceed one year – as a result of civil proceedings for an interim injunction within which media third parties are not represented. The contrast with other leading cases on journalistic speech, such as Reynolds,[219] is particularly striking in this regard: in that case the central point was to mark out discussion of important public affairs in the media as deserving of special protection under the common law and the European Convention because of its vital role in maintaining a democratic society.

The value of the speech in question was hardly touched upon in the rulings. The rich Strasbourg jurisprudence on political speech was not referred to: the Lords managed to decide the case without mentioning one Strasbourg precedent. A clear preference for referring to UK precedents decided post-HRA, such as R v Shayler,[220] was evinced.

216 The position is more complex where both parties are private; for discussion, see Chapter 4, pp 249–56.

217 Arguably, a third party could invoke s 7(1)(a) HRA as a route to seek variation of the original order. A third party could also seek permission to publish some of the material covered by the injunction (see Attorney General v Observer Ltd, Re An Application by Derbyshire CC [1988] 1 All ER 385), but of course this would be likely to be denied since such publication would amount to the actus reus of common law contempt unless a minimal amount of confidential material was included.

218 For discussion of s 5, see Chapter 7, pp 602–4.

219 [1999] 4 All ER 609.

220 [2003] 1 AC 247; see further Chapter 7, pp 606–12.

Free speech jurisprudence on the matter from other jurisdictions played no part in the decision. The approach of their Lordships in general was so narrow and blind to the free speech values at stake, that the judgment as a whole cannot but leave an advocate of such values with a sense of strong unease. Despite the inception of the HRA, their reasoning proceeded largely on the basis of an orthodox approach to an analysis of the common law with a brief nod in the direction of Art 10.

This is essentially not only a minimalist but a defensive approach to the HRA. Under this approach a case is decided by reference to established common law principle. The outcome is then checked briefly against HRA standards in order to ensure that incompatibility with the relevant Convention right is not clearly manifest. If a reasonable person could come to the conclusion that compatibility has been achieved, that appears to be sufficient. This approach compares strikingly with that taken in Simms[221] and Reynolds,[222] decided prior to the inception of the HRA. In those decisions, freedom of expression, both as a common law 'constitutional right' and as embodied in Art 10 of the Convention, was 'the starting point' of legal reasoning.[223] Reynolds included extensive citation and consideration of relevant Convention jurisprudence.[224] The values underpinning freedom of expression in general, and those particularly engaged by the instant case were identified; in Simms the demands of freedom of expression were treated as the touchstone by which the legality of subordinate legislation was to be assessed, and were found to demand a reading of it which ran clearly counter to its literal meaning. The explicit treatment of the free speech dimension in Punch was one which sought its marginalisation. Lord Hope made token references to it, although there was no consideration of Strasbourg jurisprudence, despite the fact that a number of relevant cases were cited to their Lordships in argument – again, a sharp contrast with the approach of the House of Lords in the leading pre-HRA free speech cases.

Lord Nicholls appeared to be uninterested in the Convention and the HRA: the latter was mentioned only once in a lengthy speech of 63 paragraphs. He claimed that his view of the law was not inconsistent with Art 10 since paragraph 2 provides exceptions to the right, but he made little attempt to apply the Art 10(2) tests; he stated that third parties 'must' respect the rule of law – i.e. the effect of an interim injunction against another party – but, as pointed out above, he did not subject this contention to a Convention-based analysis, by establishing a pressing social need to enforce such respect and by considering the demands of proportionality. Lord Hoffmann similarly showed a marked unwillingness to engage with the HRA and the Art 10(2) tests, merely remarking that 'national security is a well-established exception to the freedom conferred by Article 10.' However, the pertinent exception in question was that relating to 'maintaining the authority of the judiciary' if, as their Lordships were contending, the purpose of the injunction was to preserve the right of the Attorney General to have an effective hearing of the final injunction rather than to safeguard national security. So the wrong exception

221 [1999] 3 All ER 400.

222 [1999] 4 All ER 609.

223 See Ex p Simms [1999] 3 All ER 400, at 407, per Lord Steyn and at 412, per Lord Hoffmann (referring to 'fundamental rights' generally); Reynolds [1999] 4 All ER 609, at 629, per Lord Steyn.

224 (1999) 4 All ER 609, at 621–22, per Lord Nicholls, at 628 and esp. 635, per Lord Steyn, at 643, per Lord Cooke.

was identified and in any event, the well-established status of the exception is beside the point: since it is expressly mentioned in Art 10(2) it is clearly 'well-established'; the question was whether in the circumstances it was necessary to achieve the end of maintaining the authority of the judiciary by continuing the Spycatcher doctrine and, in the instant case, by imposing liability for contempt on Mr Steen.

This superficial approach to Art 10 was applied also to the HRA itself. Lord Hoffmann's approach echoed that of all the other Law Lords, in ignoring the question of the content of the courts' duty under s 6 HRA when developing the common law. Section 12 was also ignored by Lords Nicholls and Hoffmann and this was all the more remarkable since Lord Hoffmann did embark on some consideration of the effect of American Cyanamid, a decision which has been superseded by s 12(3) HRA.[225] Although this was a case with the gravest of implications for media freedom, consideration of the meaning and effect of s 12(4)[226] played no part in the majority of the speeches. Lord Hope merely repeated the words of the statute in noting that s 12(4) demands that particular regard should be had to freedom of expression. He did not consider whether this adds anything to the duty the court is already under due to s 6 to apply Art 10. He was content to find that s 12(4) and Art 10 had been satisfied since 'the restriction on the publication of the information before trial can be justified as being in the public interest in a democratic society'. He gave some consideration to proportionality, as discussed above, but none to necessity or to the particular 'public interest' involved. It is now reasonably clear that s 12(4) is being treated judicially either as a means of drawing other Convention rights into consideration in private law cases or – as far as the demand to have particular regard to Art 10 in its opening words are concerned – as an unnecessary and superfluous reminder of the effect of Art 10.[227] Since s 6 covers both effects in any event, the latter stance is probably the correct one. In other words, in essence s 12(4) is being found – in effect –to add nothing to the demands of Art 10 and s 6 combined. However, at the time of deciding Punch one would have expected their Lordships to consider the question whether s 12(4) could have had any significant impact in the instant case. Having marginalised s 12(4), they proceeded in effect to do the same with Art 10. Whatever s 12(4) means, this stance appears to represent the converse of the intention behind it.

Their Lordships were content with the idea that while the right of freedom of expression and the public's right to know are of great importance, their exercise can be subject – in effect – to the dictat of the Attorney General. Freedom of expression under Art 10 is subject to exceptions to be narrowly construed. It must be questioned whether the scope of the exception re-affirmed in this case can be viewed as narrow. In terms of the acceptance or non-recognition of the anomalies created and the likelihood that in may instances, once an interim injunction is obtained, the material in question will lose its newsworthiness, their Lordships showed no awareness of the practical 225 See Douglas v Hello! [2001] QB 967. It is now clear after the House of Lords decision in Cream Holdings v Bannerjee [2005] 1 AC 253; [2004] 3 WLR 918 that s 12(3) raised the bar for awarding an injunction – the test is that the injunction is more likely than not to be awarded at final trial; for further discussion, see Chapter 9, pp 988–90.

226 Section 12(4) provides that the court must have 'particular regard' to the importance of Art 10. For full citation of the sub-section and further discussion, see Chapter 9, pp 953–58.

227 See Chapter 9, pp 957–58.

realities of media freedom. Not only does this approach display a characteristically exaggerated attachment to the value of the right to bring litigation, it also exemplifies the tendency of English judicial reasoning to assume a narrow and technical basis, abstracted from any meaningful context.

Abolition of the Spycatcher doctrine?

The effect on third parties of the Spycatcher doctrine flows from findings in hearings for interim relief in which the burden on the Attorney General is not weighty, as discussed in Chapter 7.[228] Bearing in mind the relative ease with which such relief may be granted – despite the effect of s 12(3) HRA[229] – it must be questioned whether this is a satisfactory basis for the consequential far-reaching impact on the media. One unsatisfactory consequence of the continuance of this doctrine has already been pointed out – that third parties who publish information covered by an interim injunction can be subject to a harsher penalty than would be available if the first party published the same information. A further anomaly arises: the litigant who has obtained the interim injunction is thereby placed, in effect, in a more advantageous position than he or she will be in if the final injunction is obtained, since the Spycatcher doctrine has been found to cease to have effect once that injunction is granted.[230] In a sense, the litigant who has obtained the interim injunction obtains a very significant benefit, not enjoyed by the litigant who wins the final action, since the whole of the media will be deterred from publication of the confidential material during the period between the interim and the final injunction. In other words, the litigant is worse off after establishing his substantive right to confidentiality at trial. Clearly, in instances in which no final injunction is obtained since the other party – usually a newspaper – does not continue to contest the interim injunction because the information in question loses its newsworthy quality, a greater anomaly is created because the period of time during which the Spycatcher doctrine is applicable is likely to be longer. The applicability of that doctrine in relation to interim but not final injunctions follows logically from the emphasis on preserving the litigant's right to the final hearing of the action. However, if the emphasis was instead on the underlying purpose of the injunction, as the Court of Appeal in Punch advocated, it would still be possible in a narrow range of circumstances that a third party could attract liability for criminal contempt by undermining the final order in the sense of negating its purpose in protecting national security by publishing material covered by it. This would be less anomalous than the current position.

This form of common law contempt remains of very doubtful compatibility with Art 10, bearing in mind the emphasis placed upon the role of the media in Goodwin v UK[231] by the European Court of Human Rights. Although trivial or technical breaches of court orders made against other parties will not attract liability, the area of liability which remains creates a curb on media freedom which is out of accord with the crucial

228 See pp 618–23.

229 As mentioned above, fn 225, s 12(3), as interpreted in Cream Holdings and Bannerjee [2005] 1 AC 253, has raised the bar for the grant of injunctions.

230 Jockey Club v Buffham [2003] 2 WLR 178; [2003] EMLR 5.

231 Goodwin v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 123.

role of the press in a free society.[232] It is unlikely after Attorney General v Punch that reform can be expected in the domestic courts and therefore it can now only come from Strasbourg or Parliament. If a Strasbourg ruling eventually leads to abolition of this form of common law contempt, certain instances of the Spycatcher type could still fall within the statutory strict liability rule, if – which would rarely occur – the hearing of the permanent injunction had been set down at the time of publication. In such instances, however, s 5 would apply; therefore liability might be avoided, depending on a difficult application of the 'incidental' test where the information had public interest value.

For obvious reasons the political will to introduce reform to abolish this head of common law contempt is likely to be absent. From the government perspective the doctrine remains valuable as a means of creating secrecy that is in executive hands in terms of instigation – since in the Punch and Spycatcher category of case the initial temporary injunction will be sought by the Attorney General. Having obtained it on the basis of a test satisfied with relative ease, he need do nothing more to ensure that all the rest of the media are silenced on the matter at hand since criminal contempt at common law, after Punch, will do the job for him. If reform of this area of contempt eventually occurs as a result of a Strasbourg ruling, it will represent an indictment of the stance of a number of the senior judiciary in relation to a fundamental freedom in a democratic society. Attorney General v Punch is one of the most disappointing rulings there has been so far under the HRA: it represents a judicial acquiescence to the executive's predilection for secrecy, coupled with a determination to cling to anti-speech values reflected in common law doctrine even where they fly in the face of Convention principles.

The relationship between the 1981 Act and the common law

Common law contempt represents not only an alternative, but also, where proceedings are active, an additional possibility of establishing liability. It presents such an alternative in all instances in which proceedings are not active, assuming, of course, that the mens rea requirement can be satisfied, and it has proved to be of great significance in this context owing to the readiness with which it has sometimes been accepted that the common law tests have been fulfilled. The doctrine has therefore attracted criticism as circumventing the 1981 Act[233] but it may also, even more controversially, present an alternative in instances where proceedings are active, but liability under the Act cannot be established. If, as suggested above, the 'active' test replaces that of imminence in respect of common law contempt under the HRA, this would be the only significant role of common law contempt. It would open up the possibility that the Act and, in particular, the provisions of s 5, could be undermined. This is of particular significance given that s 5 was adopted to take account of the ruling in the European Court of Human Rights that UK contempt law had breached the Art 10 guarantee of freedom of speech.

232 These issues are discussed further in Chapter 7, pp 618–23, in relation to the breach of confidence issue, the other strand of the Spycatcher litigation.

233 Miller has written: 'I think it is at best messy and may also be dangerous to allow the common law to outflank the Act' ([1992] Crim LR 112).

Common law contempt was established in the Hislop case in an instance in which proceedings were active and, therefore, the relationship between the concept of good faith under s 5 and the question of intention under s 6(c) came under consideration. It appeared that a finding of intention to prejudice the administration of justice necessary to found liability for contempt at common law would probably preclude a finding of good faith under s 5. This finding seemed to obviate the possibility of proceeding at common law in appropriate instances in order to avoid the operation of s 5 – a course which would have undermined the policy of the Act as providing some safeguards for media freedom. However, the point is open to argument. It could be said that in the majority of cases, a finding of good faith under s 5 would indeed preclude a finding of intention to prejudice proceedings, but in one instance it might not. It might be shown that where a newspaper recognised a strong risk that proceedings would be prejudiced, but did not desire such prejudice (as may have been the case in Attorney General v Newspaper Publishing plc), a finding of good faith might not be precluded. A publisher might argue that his or her recognition of the risk to proceedings was outweighed (in his or her own mind) by the need to bring iniquity or other matters of public interest to public attention. The good faith requirement under s 5 might cover such a situation, thereby preventing liability under statute, although it might still arise at common law. Thus, for example, the principle arising from Attorney General v Newspaper Publishing plc might apply where proceedings were active and where publication of material covered by an injunction fell within s 5. In this sense, therefore, common law contempt may have the ability to undermine the statutory protection for freedom of speech,[234] unless requirements similar to those under s 5 can be implied into the common law in reliance on Art 10, a matter which is discussed further below.

The possibility envisaged is unlikely to arise. However, there are other circumstances in which a prosecution at common law could succeed in an instance in which proceedings are active but prosecution under the Act fails. For example, s 5 might be irrelevant because it might be clear that the article does not concern a discussion in good faith of public affairs. However, s 2(2) might not be satisfied on the basis that, although some risk of prejudice arose, it could not be termed serious enough. In such an instance, there appears to be no reason why the common law could not be used instead on the basis that the test of showing ‘a real risk of prejudice’ is less difficult to satisfy. If so, it would be possible to circumvent the more stringent s 2(2) requirement. Of course, it would be necessary to prove an intention to prejudice the administration of justice. Bearing in mind the fact that the 1981 Act was introduced in order to satisfy Art 10, it is suggested that its circumvention under the common law should be resisted.

Conclusions

This overview of this form of contempt, taking account also of the strict liability rule from the 1981 Act, gives rise, it is argued, to the conclusion that at present it is out of accord with Convention values and requirements in terms of both law and practice. Although, as discussed above, its jurisprudence in this context is open to criticism, 234 For comment on these developments in common law contempt, see Stone, ‘Common law contempt’ (1988) 138 NLJ 136; Halpin, A, ‘Child’s play in the Lords’ (1991) 141 NLJ 173; McHale, J, ‘Common law contempt’ (1991) 141 NLJ 1115.

certain thematic strands can be discerned. As Worm, Ribemont,[235] News Verlags[236] and Sunday Times indicate, Strasbourg seeks to protect fair trials where they appear to be genuinely threatened by media coverage. Where the threat is nebulous and the value of the speech in question is high, restraints on the media are not found to be justified. A comparison between the Taylor[237] and the Spycatcher or Punch cases[238] suggests that both statute and common law are insufficiently focused on the core Convention values at stake. In Taylor, the individual's right to a fair trial under Art 6 was genuinely threatened; at the same time, the speech in question was of virtually no value in Art 10 terms, since it was misleading. Yet no prosecution was forthcoming. In contrast, Spycatcher and Punch concerned political speech to which Strasbourg accords the highest value, while in both instances the Art 6 guarantee was only doubtfully engaged. A successful prosecution for contempt in Taylor on the basis that the trial in question had been severely affected by relentless and misleading publicity could almost certainly have justified under Art 10(2) as proportionate in terms of speech/harm balancing to the aim pursued – that of protecting the Art 6 rights of the defendants. The reverse is true, it is contended, of both Spycatcher and Punch.

A possible explanation for current practice in these and other similar instances is that where speech is directly critical of a part of the executive and therefore, impliedly, of government itself, the interests of the government in stifling it are most obviously engaged. Such an instance arose in both Spycatcher and Punch, arguably providing an example of the failure of Attorney Generals to ensure that an appearance of distance from the government was maintained. In contrast, as in Taylor, when the trial of an obscure personage, accused of a highly-publicised crime, is in question, there is little or no political advantage to be gained in seeking to prevent or punish interferences with it. But there may be quite severe political disadvantage in appearing to attack the massed ranks of the tabloids. As indicated above, it is not entirely possible to dismiss misgivings as to the ability of Attorney Generals to distance themselves fully from their political colleagues, who are likely to have such considerations in mind.

The problems created by the willingness of newspaper proprietors to damage the fairness of trials in pursuit of competitive advantage are likely to continue so long as they view contempt actions as improbable. Certain trials such as those of the Taylor sisters, of Harold Shipman in 2000, the trial in 2001 of the suspect charged with the murder of the television presenter Jill Dando, the arrest of the terrorist suspects in connection with the Ricin incident in 2003, the trial of Ian Huntley for the Soham murders in 2003 and the arrest of terrorist suspects in July 2005 tend to attract a misleading and sensationalist media coverage, which has, in the case of a number of newspapers, little connection with free speech values but is motivated merely by profit-making concerns. Obviously, horrifying incidents, especially terrorist ones, will be reported in extensive detail using untempered language, but the aim of some of the coverage appears to be to come closest to expressing the baser instincts of readers, however prejudicial to a fair trial such expression might be. Assuming that in the very competitive media market, one newspaper is unlikely to forego the chance of attracting

235 (1995) 20 EHRR 557.
236 (2001) 31 EHRR 8.
237 [1993] 98 Cr App R 361. See pp 345–46 above.
238 See above p 369 and pp 373–76.

readers by its coverage of such cases, further intervention by Parliament appears to be essential if the criminal justice system and certain deeply unpopular defendants are not to bear the burden created by the demands of the media market.

The protective approach, as recognised under the 1981 Act and the common law, is not achieving its objective. At the same time, a shift towards the neutralising model has occurred in a piecemeal and incoherent fashion. The most extreme method of remedying the effects of prejudicial press coverage – acquittal – is used with some readiness despite its effect upon the administration of justice, while certain lesser measures, such as the use of a voir dire in order to determine jury knowledge of the case from the media,[239] or the delay of the trial, are shunned or rarely used. As argued above, such measures place burdens on the criminal justice system, while having, in many instances, no genuinely beneficial consequences in terms of freedom of speech. The question whether the use of such measures as a safeguard is warranted where contempt law is ineffective should be addressed as part of a general review of this area of law. In the meantime, it is suggested that judicial reliance on the Convention and especially on its underlying principles under the HRA could address certain of the deficiencies indicated above.

4 Prior restraints restricting reports of court proceedings

The general principle that justice should be openly administered is well established.[240] This principle is recognised in the Art 6 requirement that everyone is entitled to a 'fair and public hearing'. This Art 6 requirement is subject to a number of exceptions contained in para 1: 'the press and public may be excluded from all or part of the trial in the interests of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, where the interests of juveniles or the protection of the private life of the parties so require or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice'. In this respect, Arts 10 and 6 are not in conflict, since Art 10 may be said to require impliedly that restrictions on allowing journalists to attend hearings should be strictly scrutinised. Conflict is more likely to arise between the interest in open justice and the Art 8 guarantee of a right to respect for privacy. This issue is considered in Chapter 9.[241]

In general, in accordance with the open justice principle, courts are open to the public and therefore a fair and accurate factual report of the proceedings, in good faith, will not amount to a contempt. This is provided for under s 4(1) of the 1981 Act. The reverse is true of private sittings, a report of which will usually prima facie amount to a contempt. Section 4(1), therefore, creates an exception from strict liability in respect of proceedings held in public, so long as the other elements mentioned are present. Another way of putting this is to say that fair and accurate reports of proceedings would be unlikely to fall within s 2(2) in any event: s 4(1) merely makes this explicit, in statutory 239 In Andrews (Tracey) [1999] Crim LR 156, the Court of Appeal re-stated its view that juries should not be questioned regarding their knowledge of the case they are to judge upon.

240 See the comments to this effect and on the need to limit use of private hearings in Preston [1993] 4 All ER 638; 143 NLJ 1601.

241 See pp 851–66.

form. However, a number of exceptions to the principle of openness have been created to allow the withholding of information, either temporarily or indefinitely. For example, at common law, a judge can order prohibition of a publication in order to prevent, for example, the disclosure of the identity of a witness. The leading authority is Attorney General v Leveller Magazine Ltd[242] in which it was accepted that departure from the principle of openness would be warranted if necessary for the due administration of justice, and that therefore if a court made an order designed to protect the administration of justice, then it would be incumbent on those who knew of it not to do anything which might frustrate its object. All these exceptions must be considered for their compatibility with Art 10, since all clearly represent interferences with freedom of expression. In relation to reporting restrictions, as opposed to restrictions on those who may attend the hearing, a conflict between Arts 10 and 6 may arise where the restrictions are aimed at avoiding prejudice to the trial.

Postponing reporting of information to avoid a risk of prejudice

Section 4 provides:

> (1) Subject to this section a person is not guilty of contempt of court under the strict liability rule in respect of a fair and accurate report of legal proceedings held in public, published contemporaneously and in good faith.
> (2) In any such proceedings the court may, where it appears to be necessary for avoiding a substantial risk of prejudice to the administration of justice in those proceedings, or in any other proceedings pending or imminent, order that the publication of any report of the proceedings, or any part of the proceedings be postponed for such period as the court thinks necessary for that purpose.
> (3) For the purposes of subsection (1) of this section . . . a report of proceedings shall be treated as published contemporaneously (a) in the case of a report of which publication is postponed pursuant to an order subsection (2) of this section, if published as soon as practicable after that order expires.

Thus s 4(1) contains an exception to the strict liability rule under s 1 of the Act. It may be noted that s 2(2) speaks of the creation of 'serious prejudice', whereas s 4(2) speaks only of 'prejudice'. So in this respect s 4(2) creates a lower threshold than s 2(2). The effect of s 4(1) is that, even where the contemporaneous publication of a fair and accurate report of court proceedings creates a substantial risk that the course of justice will be seriously impeded or prejudiced (under s 2(2)), the publisher is not to be guilty of contempt of court under the strict liability rule. Clearly, it is highly unlikely in most circumstances that such fair and accurate reporting could cause prejudice. However, this exception is intended to reassure newspaper editors in relation to trial-related reporting.

The freedom of the media to report proceedings is itself then limited, however, by the provision of s 4(2). Section 4(2) provides a discretion to be exercised during any legal proceeding held in public, allowing a judge to make an order postponing reporting of those proceedings, if such action 'appears necessary for avoiding a substantial risk of prejudice' to the proceedings or any other imminent proceedings, thus creating an exception to s 4(1).[243] In other words, despite the fairness and accuracy of such reporting – and its importance in relation to the open justice principle – there are special circumstances that mean that it should nevertheless be curbed. Section 4(2) is limited in one respect – it only covers reports of the proceedings, not reports of extraneous matters relating to the proceedings that could create the risk in question. They can be dealt with by way of subsequent sanctions, as discussed above. It is also important to note that reports of the proceedings can be postponed, not because they might affect the proceedings in question, but because other proceedings could be affected. Those other proceedings need only be 'imminent', not 'active',[244] and it is clear that the term 'imminent' denotes a longer and more imprecise period of time. Thus the period during which reporting is postponed can be very lengthy.

242 [1979] AC 440; [1979] 2 WLR 247, HL.

Lord Taylor CJ found in R v Central Criminal Court ex parte Telegraph plc[245] that s 4(2) contains two requirements for the making of an order. The first is that publication would create 'a substantial risk of prejudice to the administration of justice' and the second is that postponement of publication 'appears to be necessary for avoiding' that risk. He continued:

> It has been said that there is a third requirement, derived from the word "may" at the beginning of the sub-section, namely, that a court, in the exercise of its discretion, having regard to the competing public interests of ensuring a fair trial and of open justice, considers it appropriate to make an order.

In fact whether the element of discretion is to be regarded as part of the 'necessity' test or as a third requirement, the courts as a matter of practice have tended to merge the requirement of necessity and the exercise of discretion.[246] As regards the second element, it is important to note that the risk in question can concern 'any other proceedings pending or imminent'. This appears to mean that reports that would not satisfy the strict liability rule – since the other proceedings are merely imminent, not active – could nevertheless be the subject of a s 4(2) order. The term 'imminent' has been found to cover the possibility that those other proceedings might never in fact arise.[247] Orders under s 4(2) might typically involve the reporting of matters which the defence wished to argue should be ruled inadmissible.

Section 4(3) is not free from ambiguity, but appears to allow an order to be made relating to reports which would have been published – but for the s 4(2) order – some time after the proceedings in question had concluded.[248] A right of appeal against such orders in relation to trials on indictment was created by s 159 of the Criminal Justice

243 For comment on s 4 of the 1981 Act, see Walker, C, Cram, I and Brogarth, D, 'The Reporting of Crown Court Proceedings and the Contempt of Court Act 1981' (1992) 55 MLR 647.

244 See above, at pp 365–67.

245 [1993] 1 WLR 980, p 984 D–G.

246 See BBC, Petitioners [2002] SLT 2.

247 See R v Horsham Justices ex parte Farquharson and West Sussex County Times [1982] QB 762, p 797 E. In Galbraith v HM Advocate [2001] SLT 465, p 468 J–K opinion was reserved on this matter.

248 See Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers [2001] EWCA Crim 1351 (see below pp 388–89).

Act 1988 (CJA) in order to take account of a challenge under Art 10 at Strasbourg.[249] The position of the media when a s 4(2) order is made in respect of reporting a summary trial is less clear. However, it was established in R v Clerkenwell Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex parte The Telegraph[250] that in such circumstances, the media have a right to be heard and must be allowed to put forward the case for discharging the order. When the applicants, publishers of national newspapers, became aware of the existence of the order, they were granted a hearing before the magistrate at which they submitted that the court had power to hear representations from them as to why the order should be discharged. The magistrate held that the court had no power to hear from anyone but the parties to the proceedings. The applicants sought a declaration that the court did have the power to hear their representations, and it was determined, relying on R v Horsham Justices ex parte Farquharson,[251] that they had sufficient standing to apply for judicial review. It was found to be implicit in s 4(2) that a court contemplating use of the section should be able to hear representations from those who would be affected if an order was made. In determining whether the order should be maintained, it was found to be necessary to balance the interest in the need for a fair trial before an unprejudiced jury on the one hand and the requirements of open justice on the other. In performing this balancing exercise, the magistrate would need to hear representations from the press as being best qualified to represent the public interest in publicity.

A Practice Direction relating to the use of s 4(2) orders was issued by Lord Lane CJ on 6 December 1982:[252]

> . . . a court may, where it appears necessary for avoiding a substantial risk of prejudice to the administration of justice in the proceedings before it or in any others pending or imminent, order that publication of any report of the proceedings or part thereof be postponed for such period as the court thinks necessary for that purpose. It is necessary to keep a permanent record of such orders for later reference. For this purpose all orders made under section 4(2) must be formulated in precise terms having regard to the decision of Horsham Justices, ex parte Farquharson . . . and orders under both sections must be committed to writing either by the judge personally or the clerk of the court under the judge's directions. An order must state (a) its precise scope, (b) the time at which it shall cease to have effect, if appropriate, and (c) the specific purpose of making the order. Courts will normally give notice to the press in some form that an order has been made . . . and court staff should be prepared to answer an inquiry about a specific case, but it is, and will remain, the responsibility of those reporting cases, and their editors, to ensure that no breach of any order occurs and the onus rests with them to make inquiry in any case of doubt.

The ruling of the Court of Appeal in Horsham Magistrates ex parte Farquharson was to the effect that such orders should be made sparingly; judges should be careful not to 249 Hodgson, Woolf Productions and NUJ and Channel Four Television (1987) 10 EHRR 503.

250 [1993] 2 All ER 183; The Times, 22 October 1992.
251 [1982] 2 All ER 269, [1982] QB 762, (1982) 76 Cr App R 87, CA.
252 [1982] 76 Cr App R 78.

impose a ban on flimsy grounds where the connection between the matters in question and prejudice to the administration of justice was purely speculative. If other means of protecting the jury from possibly prejudicial reports of the trial were available, they should be used. Moreover, it must be ensured that the ban covers only the matters in question. This ruling was reinforced by the decision in Central Independent Television plc.[253] During a criminal trial, the jury had to stay overnight in a hotel and in order that they could watch television or listen to the radio, the judge made an order under s 4(2) postponing reporting of the proceedings for that night. The applicants, broadcasters, appealed against the order under s 159 CJA on the basis that there was no ground on which the judge could have concluded that there was a substantial risk of prejudice to the administration of justice. Further, they argued that the judge had incorrectly exercised his discretion under the sub-section and failed to take proper account of the public interest in freedom of expression and in the open administration of justice. The Court of Appeal found that it had not been necessary to make the order as there was little, if any, evidence of a risk to the administration of justice: the previous reporting of the case had not suggested that reporting on the day in question would be anything other than fair and accurate. Even had there been a substantial risk, it might have been possible to adopt alternative methods of insulating the jury from the media. Where such alternative methods were available, they should be used. Accordingly, the appeal was allowed.

The emphasis in this judgment on the need to restrict reporting only where clearly necessary is in accordance with Art 10 requirements: the convenience of the jury is not a sufficient reason for invoking the sub-section, since it would not fall within one of the legitimate aims of Art 10(2). Similarly, in Ex parte The Telegraph plc,[254] the Court of Appeal found that even where a substantial risk to proceedings might arise, this need not mean that an order must automatically be made. The court based this finding on the need to consider the two elements of s 4(2) separately; first, a substantial risk of prejudice to the administration of justice should be identified flowing from publication of matters relating to the trial, and, secondly, it should be asked whether it was necessary to make an order in order to avoid the risk. In making a determination as to the second limb, a judge should consider whether, in the light of the competing interest in open justice, the order should be made at all, and if so, with all or any of the restrictions sought. In the case in question, the order should not have been made, since the risk of prejudice was outweighed by the interest in open justice. In MGN Pension Trustees Ltd v Bank of America National Trust and Saving Association,[255] the Serious Fraud Office applied for an order postponing reporting of civil actions brought by trustees of the pension fund until after the criminal proceedings were concluded. Six newspapers opposed the application. The judge followed the steps indicated in Ex parte The Telegraph in determining that no order would be made.

These decisions suggests a concern on the part of the judiciary to prevent a ready use of s 4(2) orders, which would be prejudicial to the principle of open justice.[256]

253 [1991] 1 All ER 347.

254 [1993] 2 All ER 971.

255 [1995] EMLR 99.

256 See also Saunders (the Guinness trials) [1990] Crim LR 597; Barlow Clowes Gilt Managers v Clowes, The Times, 2 February 1990; R v Sherwood ex p The Telegraph Group plc, The Times, 12 June 2001.

Incidentally, it is of some interest to note that this decision followed closely on that in Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers (No 3)[257] which concerned an article written while a ban on reporting of a major fraud trial was in force, criticising the alleged propensity of judges in such trials to impose bans. It was held that the article created too remote a risk to constitute a contempt under the strict liability rule (see below), and Brooke J took the opportunity of re-emphasising the importance of the news media as the 'eyes and ears' of the general public. This approach was developed in R v Beck ex parte Daily Telegraph.[258] Beck, who had been a social worker in charge of children's homes, was charged with offences involving sexual abuse, and owing to the number of charges, the trial was split into three. At the first trial, a s 4(2) order was made, owing to the risk of prejudice to the subsequent two trials. On appeal, the Court of Appeal accepted that there was a substantial risk of prejudice, but went on to find that the public interest in the reporting of the trial outweighed the risk. In so finding, the Court emphasised the concern which the public must feel because of the particular facts of the case and the right of the public to be informed and to be able to ask questions about the opportunities created for those in public service to commit such offences.

The decisions discussed indicate that pre-HRA the domestic courts were already taking into account the demands of Arts 10 and 6 by reference to the principles underlying those two Articles. The stance taken towards the role of journalists closely parallels that taken at Strasbourg, as indicated in Chapter 3.[259] A further Practice Direction, which also appears to be intended to ensure that the use of s 4(2) is Convention-compliant, was issued in 2002:

> From 'Practice Direction (Criminal: consolidated)':[260]
>
> 3 Restrictions on reporting proceedings
>
> . . .
>
> 3.2. When considering whether to make such an order [under s 4(2) or s 11] there is nothing which precludes the court from hearing a representative of the press. Indeed it is likely that the court will wish to do so . . . . [The Order continues in the same terms as the previous order.]'

The important point is that this Direction indicates that media representatives should be heard before the order is made, thus allowing them to challenge it in general and also to raise Art 10 points. However, even where the Practice Directions are followed, courts in making s 4(2) orders are under a duty due to s 6 HRA to ensure that the tests of necessity and proportionality under Art 10 are satisfied. This duty was not explicitly adverted to in the post-HRA decision in Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers[261] in which the reach of s 4(2) was widened and the tension between s 4(2) and s 2(2)

257 [1992] 3 All ER 38.
258 [1993] 2 All ER 177.
259 See pp 125–26.
260 [2002] 3 All ER 904, at pp 906–7.
261 [2001] EWCA Crim 1351.

was exacerbated. The order in question in the case had been made in the criminal trial[262] of four Premiership footballers. During the trial the judge had given a direction that there was no evidence of a racial motive in the case. The jury retired to consider their verdicts and were eventually sent home for the weekend, still undecided.[263] That Sunday the Sunday Mirror published an interview with the father of the victim which in a double-page spread, with photographs, revived the allegations of racism.[264] The judge decided in consequence to discharge the jury. The Sunday Mirror article and the halting of the trial attracted a great deal of media publicity in a number of newspapers. The judge ordered that a retrial should take place and provisionally fixed the date for the retrial.

The judge had agreed to make an order under s 4(2) of the 1981 Act imposing stringent reporting restrictions. They covered any reference to material from the offending article and to racist motives in the case.[265] This order under s 4(2) was designed to obviate the possibility of prejudice to the future retrial. This order was the subject of the appeal by a number of newspapers under s 159 CJA. The main ground for the appeal was that the terms of the order were not limited to the publication of a report of the proceedings, or part of the proceedings, and therefore the order was made without jurisdiction. Without referring to the HRA, the Court of Appeal found that since the order concerned an article that had led to the halting of the trial: '[a]ny similar reporting or republication of [the Sunday Mirror] article or its contents, or discussion of the judge's reasons, after 10th April . . . would albeit indirectly, be a "report of part of the proceedings."' The order was able to cover reports intended to be published some time after the trial had been halted since it was found that such reporting could be treated as 'contemporaneous' due to the provision of s 4(3). It might have been expected, taking Art 10 into account, that a more media-friendly reading of s 4(3) – affording a more limited meaning to the term 'contemporaneous' – would have been adopted under s 3(1)HRA. However, this judgment exhibits the tendency, noted in other chapters of this book, to disregard the HRA even where a Convention article is clearly relevant.

262 The order in question in the case had been made in the trial of four Premiership footballers, Woodgate, Bowyer, Clifford and Caverney, for offences of affray and causing grievous bodily harm with intent to Sarfraz Najeib. The case had of course attracted a considerable amount of publicity. See, for further discussion of the trial and the effect of the Sunday Mirror reporting, p 351, above.

263 On 4 April 2001.

264 It also included comments commending the evidence of a co-accused (who had by that time been acquitted) in suggesting that some of the remaining defendants, in relation to whom the jury were still considering their verdicts, were guilty.

265 The order was in the following terms:

> 1 There should be no further publication or broadcast of any matter contained within the headlines or the body of the article which appeared on pages 8 and 9 of the Sunday Mirror on 8 April 2001. 2 There should be no further reference in any publication or broadcast to the said article or headline, save for reference to the fact that this jury was discharged as a result of an article in the Sunday Mirror. 3 No publication or broadcast should make reference to racism or racist motivation in relation to the above proceedings. 4 For the avoidance of doubt, the above Order does not preclude publication or broadcast of any material relating to, or comment upon, the Macpherson Report, or issues of racism generally, provided that no reference in such publications or broadcasts is made to these proceedings.

Prohibiting reporting of information

Section 11 of the 1981 Act allows a court which has power to do so to make an order prohibiting publication of names or other matters if this appears necessary 'for the purpose for which it was so withheld'. Thus, s 11 does not itself confer such a power and therefore refers to other statutes[266] and to the imprecise common law powers. The leading authority is the House of Lords' decision in Attorney General v Leveller Magazine Ltd.[267] The majority found that if, in the course of regulating its own proceedings, a court makes an order designed to protect the due administration of justice, it is then incumbent on those who know of the ruling to do nothing which would frustrate the object of the ruling. At present, there are signs that a robust interpretation will be given to s 11 similar to that being taken to s 4(2): the fundamental importance of open justice will be outweighed only by a very clear detriment which answers to a general public interest flowing from publication of the matters in question – economic damage to the interests of the defendant will not suffice.[268] Nor will a concern to protect the 'comfort and feelings of the defendant'.[269] The courts may be prepared to make anonymity orders to protect the privacy of those involved in proceedings,[270] but only where the failure to afford anonymity would, under strict scrutiny, render the attainment of justice very doubtful.[271] Witnesses are placed in a somewhat different position. There is a clear public interest in encouraging witnesses to come forward and to co-operate in proceedings. Therefore, courts have shown a greater willingness to ensure the anonymity of witnesses.[272] If a court takes measures to protect the anonymity of witnesses such as sitting in camera or allowing the use of screens, there may be no need to make an express s 11 order.

Section 12(1) Administration of Justice Act 1960 adheres to the open justice principle in indicating that in general the reporting of private proceedings will not amount to a contempt in itself, before going on to specify the exceptional circumstances in which it will do so. It could therefore be said that in a sense the legal scheme relating to the first aspect of the open justice principle – that court hearings should be public – is more restrictive than that relating to the third – open reporting. Clearly, in practical terms, reporting of private hearings is often likely to be problematic, although those involved or witnesses may disclose matters to journalists, and so doing will not amount to a contempt so long as none of the exceptions under the 1960 Act apply.[273] Thus the mere fact that a hearing occurs in private does not automatically mean that reporting of the proceedings is restricted. Under s 12(1) of the 1960 Act it will only be a contempt 266 A number of statutory provisions impose restrictions such as allowing certain persons concerned in a case to remain anonymous.

267 [1979] AC 440; [1979] 2 WLR 247, HL. For comment on s 11 of the 1981 Act, see Walker, C, Cram, I and Brogarth, D, 'The Reporting of Crown Court Proceedings and the Contempt of Court Act 1981' (1992) 55 MLR 647.

268 R v Dover JJ ex p Dover DC and Wells (1991) 156 JP 433; [1992] Crim LR 371.

269 R v Evesham JJ ex p McDonagh [1988] 1 QB 553, p 562.

270 See H v Ministry of Defence [1991] 2 QB 103 and Criminal Injuries Compensation Board ex p A [1992] COD 379.

271 R v Westminster CC ex p Castelli and Tristan-Garcia (1995) The Times, 14 August.

272 See R v Watford Magistrates' Court ex p Lenman [1993] Crim LR 388; Taylor [1994] TLR 484.

273 Clibbery v Allan [2001] FLR 819.

to report on proceedings held in private where they relate to: wardship, adoption, guardianship, custody upbringing of or access to an infant; where they are brought under Part VII Mental Health Act 1983 or under any provision of the 1983 Act authorising an application or reference to be made to a mental health review tribunal or county court; where the court sits in private for reasons of national security; where the information relates to a secret process or invention at issue in the proceedings; where the court, acting within its powers, expressly prohibits the publication of all information relating to the proceedings or of information of the description which is published.

A report of information relating to all such proceedings is prima facie a contempt; it is not automatically a contempt since the section preserves all defences a person accused of contempt would normally have. Thus a conviction was not obtained where a newspaper editor published material relating to wardship proceedings without being aware of the connection.[274] It has been found that the press cannot report any aspect of wardship proceedings,[275] but this is not an absolute restriction: it has been found to cover 'statements of evidence, reports, accounts of interviews' and similar information.[276] The restrictions on reporting relating to children are largely intended to protect privacy, although the open justice principle may also be relevant.

The restrictions on the use of s 11 appear to render it compatible with Art 10. In Atkinson Crook and the Independent v UK[277] a journalist, Crook, had attempted to challenge a s 11 anonymity order: Central Criminal Court ex parte Crook.[278] When the challenge failed, Crook took the case to Strasbourg, arguing a breach of Art 10. In the circumstances of the trial it had been feared that matters disclosed in open proceedings might put the defendant's family at risk. The Commission found that the interest of the media in reporting arguments about the sentencing of a convicted defendant could be outweighed if, on reasonable grounds, the prosecution, the judge, and the defendant himself, wished to hear them in private.[279]

Witnesses are placed in a somewhat different position. There is a clear public interest in encouraging witnesses to come forward and to co-operate in proceedings. Therefore, courts have shown a greater willingness to ensure the anonymity of witnesses.[280] And, clearly, if a court takes measures to protect the anonymity of witnesses, such as sitting in camera or allowing the use of screens, there may be no need to make an express s 11 order. Exceptionally, an injunction granted to protect the anonymity of a child may be extended, on grounds of the doctrine of confidence, once the child reaches 18. This was found in Venables, Thompson v News Group Newspapers Ltd, Associated Newspapers Ltd, MGM Ltd.[281] Although such a restraint relates to the administration of justice since it concerns an interference with the reporting of criminal justice matters, the object of the injunction is to protect privacy, not to protect a fair hearing, and therefore it is discussed in Chapter 9.[282]

274 Re F (A Minor) (Publication of Information) [1977] Fam 58.
275 See Re X (A Minor) (Wardship: Injunction) [1984] 1 WLR 1422 (the Mary Bell case).
276 Re F (A Minor) (Publication of Information) [1977] Fam 58, at 105.
277 (1990) 67 DR 244.
278 (1984) The Times, 8 November.
279 See further Chapter 9, p 971.
280 See R v Watford Magistrates' Court, ex parte Lenman [1993] Crim LR 388; Taylor [1994] TLR 484.
281 [2001] 1 All ER 908, Fam Div.
282 See pp 851–65.

A number of reporting restrictions are aimed at the protection of children. These reporting restrictions are discussed in Chapter 9[283] since they are mainly aimed at protecting privacy. However, it can also be argued that an aspect of the fair trial provision under Art 6(1) is to provide special protections for juveniles in the criminal justice system,[284] whether involved as witnesses or defendants. Under s 39 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 (CYPA), a court (apart from a Youth Court) could direct that details relating to a child, 'who was a witness or defendant, including his or her name', should not be reported and that 'no picture of the child should be broadcast or published'. The media could make representations to the judge, arguing that the demands of media freedom outweigh the possibility of harm to the child. Section 49 of the Act, as amended,[285] which relates to Youth Courts, now provides for an automatic ban on publishing certain identifying details relating to a juvenile offender, including his or her name and address, although the court can waive the ban. Under s 45 Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 (C(S)A), the court can lift reporting restrictions where it considers that a ban would be against the public interest.[286]

The s 39 restrictions were extended under s 44 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999, which now covers children involved in adult proceedings. The CYPA did not cover the period before proceedings begin. In contrast, the 1999 Act prohibits the publication once a criminal investigation has begun, of any matter relating

283 See pp 853–65.

284 See Thompson and Venables v UK (2000) 7 BHRC 659. It may be noted that Rule 5 of the Beijing Rules recommends that every juvenile justice system emphasise the well being of the juvenile and ensure that all reactions to such offenders are proportionate to the offence. The UN Convention on the Rights of the Child links fairness and privacy in relation to juveniles, Art 40(2)(b): every child has the right to the presumption of innocence, to informed promptly at the charges against him/her, to have the matter determined without delay by a competent and independent body, the right to silence, a right to an appeal, to understand the language used in proceedings and to have their privacy respected at each stage of the trial.

285 As amended by Sched 2 to the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999.

286 Section 45 provides:

> '(1) After subsection (4) of section 49 of the 1933 Act (restrictions on reports of proceedings in which children or young persons are concerned) there shall be inserted the following subsections-
>
> (4A) If a court is satisfied that it is in the public interest to do so, it may, in relation to a child or young person who has been convicted of an offence, by order dispense to any specified extent with the requirements of this section in relation to any proceedings before it to which this section applies by virtue of subsection (2)(a) or (b) above, being proceedings relating to-
>
> (a) the prosecution or conviction of the offender for the offence;
> (b) the manner in which he, or his parent or guardian, should be dealt with in respect of the offence;
> (c) the enforcement, amendment, variation, revocation or discharge of any order made in respect of the offence;
> (d) where an attendance centre order is made in respect of the offence, the enforcement of any rules made under section 16(3) of the Criminal Justice Act 1982; or > (e) where a secure training order is so made, the enforcement of any requirements imposed under section 3(7) of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994.
>
> (4B) A court shall not exercise its power under subsection (4A) above without-
>
> (a) affording the parties to the proceedings an opportunity to make representations; and > (b) taking into account any representations which are duly made.'

to a person involved in an offence while he is under 18 which is likely to identify him. Thus, juveniles who are witnesses are also covered. Under s 44(4), the court can dispense with the restrictions if it is satisfied that it is in the public interest to do so. Thus, s 44 brings the restrictions relating to juveniles in adult proceedings into line with those under s 49 relating to youth proceedings, placing the onus on the court to find a good reason for lifting the restriction rather than having to find a good reason for imposing it. The discretion of the court is therefore more narrowly confined.[287] This is clearly an instance in which, as between the demands of press freedom and the interest in the protection of the privacy and reputation of juveniles, the latter interest has prevailed.[288]

A number of special restrictions also apply to the victims of certain sexual offences. Under s 4(1)(a) of the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976, once an allegation of rape was made it was an offence to publish or broadcast the name, address or photograph of the woman who was the alleged victim. Once a person was accused of rape, nothing could be published by the media which could identify the woman. These restrictions were extended under s 1(1) of the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1992.[289] Section 1(1) covers a number of sexual offences as well as rape, and makes wider provision for anonymity: 'where an allegation has been made that an offence to which the Act applies has been committed against a person,[290] no matter relating to that person shall during that person's lifetime be included in any publication.' This restriction, unlike those considered above, is not subject to any exception. Therefore, in that respect, it affords less recognition to freedom of speech, although it does not prevent the reporting of the case or discussion of it once it is over, so long as details likely to identify the victim are not revealed.

Restrictions on the reporting of proceedings intended to preserve anonymity are likely to create conflict between Art 10, especially in relation to the interest in open justice, and the Art 8 guarantee of a right to respect for privacy. The main safeguard for media freedom is the possibility that the restrictions, apart from that of anonymity in relation to certain sexual offences, may be dispensed with in the public interest. In the HRA era, it would be expected that Art 10 jurisprudence would become an increasingly important influence upon the development of the public interest test. The granting of anonymity raises a number of Convention issues. From the perspective of Art 10, the imposition of anonymity clearly limits what can be reported about a case and may inhibit later reporting or discussion of any issues arising out of the case. However, such restrictions may be justifiable within the paragraph 2 exceptions which include 'for the rights of others'. The right to respect for privacy would therefore be covered, as would Art 6 rights. Therefore, the current emphasis on granting anonymity only on the basis that otherwise, the administration of justice would suffer, is questionable. Courts are bound by Art 8; therefore witnesses, plaintiffs and defendants are able to argue in certain circumstances that anonymity should be granted even where such administration does not clearly demand it. If an order preserving anonymity is lifted it would appear 287 See the discussion in Lee [1993] 1 WLR 103, pp 109–10.

288 See further Cram, I, A Virtue Less Cloistered: Courts, Speech and Constitutions, 2002, Hart, Chapter 4. See also Chapter 9, pp 854–55.

289 As amended by s 48 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 and Sched 2.

290 Male victims are also covered, under the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, s 142.

that a breach of Art 6 would arise if the subject of the order had no means of challenging the lifting of the order, whether on the basis of the potential infringement of Art 8 that might arise or on the basis of his or her welfare within the criminal justice system. This argument was put in R v Manchester Crown Court ex parte H and D[291] in relation to the lifting of a s 39 CYPA order; the lifting of the order was challenged in the Divisional Court which found that it had jurisdiction to restore it under s 29(3) S(C)A. The Court however considered that clarifying legislation as to the scope of s 29(3) and s 159 CJA was required.

While Arts 6 and 10 may come into conflict in respect of anonymity granted to the defendant, they may have similar demands in respect of anonymity granted to witnesses. Allowing witnesses to give evidence behind screens or by means of a video link clearly raises Art 6 issues, as Strasbourg has accepted,[292] but it also raises Art 10 considerations. Again, argument could be raised under both Articles to the effect that any measures affording anonymity to witnesses should be strictly scrutinised. But while arguments for anonymity might prevail under Art 10 since it is materially qualified, they would be less likely to do so under Art 6.

5 Protecting justice as a continuing process

Publications which interfere with the course of justice as a continuing process, as opposed to publications which affect particular proceedings, may occasionally attract liability. The forms which a risk to justice as a continuing process might take are considered below. A key issue to be considered concerns the mental element under this form of contempt. Such publications must fall outside the Contempt of Court Act 1981, which according to s 1 is concerned only with publications which may affect particular proceedings. They must, therefore, arise at common law; the question is whether mens rea must be shown, as s 6(c) seems to provide. It could be argued that the words ‘administration of justice’ used in s 6(c) could be interpreted to mean ‘in particular proceedings only’, in which case forms of strict liability contempt may still exist at common law. Support could be found for such an interpretation on the basis that s 6(c) is concerned to demonstrate that where intention can be shown, nothing prevents liability arising at common law. Given the context in which this statement is made (appearing to present a contrast to the strict liability rule) it might seem that the area of liability preserved by s 6(c) would cover the same ground as s 1, but only in instances in which mens rea could be shown. This point is not settled: there is no post-Act authority on it.

If, on the other hand, s 6(c) covers all interferences with the administration of justice at common law, whether in relation to particular proceedings or not, it would appear to cover the form of contempt known as ‘scandalising the court’ (considered below) which would run counter to the ruling of the Divisional Court in Editor of New Statesman[293] and to some persuasive authority from other jurisdictions.[294] Nevertheless,

291 [2000] 2 All ER 166.

292 See Doorson v Netherlands (1996) 22 EHRR 330.

293 (1928) 44 TLR 301.

294 Solicitor General v Radio Avon [1978] 1 NZLR 225; cf S v Van Niekirk (1970) 3 SA 655. See Miller, op. cit., fn 1, pp 378–79 and Borrie and Lowe, The Law of Contempt, 1996, pp 359–60.

this may be the more satisfactory approach, since it would be more likely to allow the UK to fulfil its Art 10 obligations under the HRA. Otherwise, common law contempt might have too wide a potential and the intention of the European Court of Human Rights in the Sunday Times case would not be given full effect. This would mean that liability for 'scandalising the court' would arise only where intention to interfere with the course of justice generally was shown. However, this point cannot yet be regarded as settled.[295]

It is possible to interfere with the course of justice in the long term in various ways. In Attorney General v News Group Newspapers it was found that 'the purpose of the contempt jurisdiction is to prevent interference with the course of justice'. It may be argued that these comments apply where no trial or other proceeding is in contemplation. An interference might arise where a part of the media made a prejudgment on a particular issue with legal implications, although no court had made a determination on the issue or where a court had made a contrary determination. In most instances of prejudicial comment in the media, particular proceedings are soon to occur, or at least exist as a possibility in the future. Therefore, s 6(c) would apply, as would s 1, if the proceedings were active. Thus, attention focuses on the effect of the comment upon those proceedings. However, instances may arise in which no proceedings ever occur. For example, in 1997, the Daily Mirror published pictures of five men with the caption 'Murderers!' Proceedings against three of them for the racially motivated murder of Steven Lawrence[296] had led to their acquittal. At the time of the Mirror's comment, no proceedings which could be influenced by it were in being, although there were future possibilities. It was possible that the family of the victim might bring a civil action against the men for battery; thus, the Mirror might possibly have been found to have caused prejudice to that action. (However, since the action would have been heard by a judge only, it would have been improbable that a finding of such prejudice would have been made.) Prosecutions against two of the suspects were still possible. The suspects could, of course, have sued the Mirror for defamation. That might have provided them with a remedy, but it does not address the possibility that the action of the Mirror could be viewed as undermining the authority of the judiciary since it usurped the function of the courts. The ruling of the House of Lords in Attorney General v Times Newspapers,[297] which has not been overruled, lends some support to the possibility that a sanction, other by way of a defamation action, is available in respect of 'trial by newspaper', although it may also be said that the spirit of the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in the Sunday Times case[298] might be flouted if it was found that one existed.[299] At present, domestic law does not appear to recognise 295 In the pre-HRA era, the weight of academic opinion was to the effect that mens rea was not required: Borrie and Lowe (ibid) consider, p 360, that the common law is left untouched by the 1981 Act in relation to publications interfering with the course of justice as a continuing process. This view is also taken by Walker, C (1985) 101 LQR 359, pp 369–70.

296 See Chapter 11, pp 1112–13.

297 [1974] AC 273; [1973] 3 All ER 54; [1973] 3 WLR 298, HL.

298 Judgment of 26 April 1979, A 30; (1979) 2 EHRR 245.

299 In re Lonhro plc [1990] 2 AC 154, p 208; [1989] 2 All ER 1100 and 1116, Lord Bridge said that it was 'extremely doubtful' that the Sunday Times case could still be relied upon owing to the decision at Strasbourg, although that decision was not direct authority. However, he did not entirely rule out the possibility that the prejudgment test could still be used.

liability for any form of interfering with the course of justice in the long term, apart from the form discussed below. If such a form does exist in respect of prejudgments it may, as argued above, be covered by s 6(c).

The form of contempt termed 'scandalising the court'[300] arose in order to protect the judicial system from media attacks. The idea behind it is that it would be against the public interest if the media could attack judges and cast doubt on their decisions – suggest, for example, that a judge had shown bias – because the public confidence in the administration of justice would be undermined. It has not been affected by the 1981 Act because there are normally no proceedings which could be influenced; any relevant proceedings will usually be concluded. If an attack on a judge occurred during the 'active' period, it would probably fall outside the Act, since any risk it created would tend to be to the course of justice as a continuing process rather than to the particular proceeding. Prosecutions are rare (and, in recent times, almost unheard of in the UK), but Lord Hailsham said in Baldry v DPP of Mauritius,[301] a Privy Council decision, that although it was likely that only the most serious or intolerable instances would be taken notice of by courts or Attorney Generals, nothing had happened in the intervening 80 years to invalidate the analysis of this branch of contempt put forward in Gray.[302] Thus, this branch of contempt law is probably still alive, and cannot merely be disregarded by the media.

As noted above, the weight of authority is probably to the effect that this is a form of strict liability contempt arising at common law, but this point cannot be regarded as settled. If the view taken in Editor of New Statesman[303] is correct, there would be no need to show an intention to lower the repute of the judge or court in question, merely an intention to publish. The actus reus of this form of contempt consists of the publication of material calculated to lower the reputation of a court or judge, thereby creating a real risk of undermining public confidence in the due administration of justice.

There are two main methods of fulfilling this actus reus. First, a publication which is held to be scurrilously abusive of a court or judge may provide the classic example of scandalising the court. The leading case is Gray,[304] which arose from the trial of one Wells on a charge of obscene libel in which Darling J warned the press not to publish a full account of court proceedings (because details of obscene matter might have been included). After they were over, the Birmingham Daily Argus published an article attacking him and referring to him as an 'impudent little man in horsehair' and 'a microcosm of conceit and empty-headedness [who] would do well to master the duties of his own profession before undertaking the regulation of another'. This article was held by the Divisional Court to be a grave contempt as it was 'not moderate criticism; it amounted to personal, scurrilous abuse of the judge in his capacity of judge'. On the other hand, in Ambard v Attorney General for Trinidad and Tobago,[305] reasoned criticism of certain sentences was held by the Privy Council not to constitute contempt on the 300 For general comment on this head of contempt, see Walker, C (1985) 101 LQR 359.

301 [1983] 2 AC 297; [1983] 3 All ER 973.
302 [1900] 2 QB 36; (1900) 69 LJ QB 502.
303 (1928) 44 TLR 301.
304 Above, fn 302.
305 [1936] AC 322; [1936] 1 All ER 704.

basis that 'Justice is not a cloistered virtue: she must be allowed to suffer the scrutiny and respectful, even though outspoken, comments of ordinary men'. In a more recent case, Metropolitan Police Comr ex p Blackburn,[306] the Court of Appeal reaffirmed this position.

Secondly, a publication may scandalise a court if it imputes bias to a judge – even if it does so in a moderate way – on the basis that allegations of partiality will undermine confidence in the basic function of a judge. The leading case in this area is Editor of New Statesman.[307] The pioneer of birth control, Dr Marie Stopes, lost a libel action and an article commenting on the case stated: '. . . the verdict represents a substantial miscarriage of justice (we are not in sympathy with Dr Stopes but prejudice against her aims should not be allowed to influence a Court of Justice as it appeared to influence Mr Justice Avory in his summing up. Such views as those of Dr Stopes cannot get a fair hearing in a court presided over by Mr Justice Avory.' The editor was found to be in contempt, because although the article was serious and seemingly respectful, it imputed unfairness and lack of impartiality to the judge in the discharge of his judicial duties. The most notorious instance of this variety of scandalising the court occurred in Colsey.[308] A moderate article had imputed unconscious bias to a judge because in making a determination as to the meaning of a statute, he might have been influenced by the fact that he had himself earlier, as Solicitor General, steered it through Parliament.

Until 1999, there were no further successful prosecutions for this form of contempt in the UK. Prosecutions may have been discouraged owing to the attacks on the Colsey ruling, which clearly laid itself open to the charge of amounting to an unjustified encroachment on the free speech principle.[309] In 1999, the Attorney General sought to jail a defendant, Scriven, from whom an undertaking not to scandalise the court had been obtained, but subsequently breached. The defendant had agreed not to make further accusations, including accusations of bias, against the judiciary, but in November 1999 he placed material on a website which criticised a number of judges.[310] Lawyers in the Lord Chancellor's department complained to the service provider, who closed the website down. Scriven signed an undertaking not to breach the terms of an injunction requiring him to refrain from further criticism. The material was subsequently published on a US website. Proceedings for contempt were brought against him in respect of breach of the undertaking.[311]

It will not be surprising to learn that this is an area of contempt law which has attracted particular criticism,[312] and such criticism has especial pertinence in the post-HRA era. Some critics argue that the offence of scandalising the court should be abolished altogether on the grounds that the rationale of the offence – undermining public confidence in the administration of justice – is too imprecise to justify imposing restrictions on freedom of speech. They argue that a system of justice should not be

306 [1968] 2 All ER 319, CA.
307 (1928) 44 TLR 301.
308 (1931) The Times, 9 May.
309 See, e.g., Goodhart, AL (1935) 48 Harv L Rev 885, pp 903–4; (1931) 47 LQR 315.
310 R v Hulbert (1999) unreported; see News Report, the Guardian, 8 November 1999.
311 See News Report, the Guardian, 31 January 2001.
312 See Borrie and Lowe, The Law of Contempt, 1996, p 360 et seq; Law Commission Report No 96, Offences relating to Interference with the Course of Justice, pp 67–68.

so lacking in self-confidence that it must suppress attacks on itself. Harold Laski has written: 'To argue that the expression of doubts as to judicial impartiality is an interference in the course of justice because the result is to undermine public confidence in the judiciary is to forget that public confidence is undermined not so much by the comment as by the habit which leads to the comment.'[313] It may be argued that the public will have more confidence in the judiciary if it can be freely discussed. Moreover, because no jury sits in such cases, the judicial system is in a sense prosecution and judge in the same case, thereby giving rise to a suggestion of bias. It may be asked why only judges and not, for example, politicians or members of the clergy, should receive this special protection from criticism? Why single out judges for such insulation? The position may be compared to that in America where this form of contempt is almost extinct owing to the ruling in Bridges v California;[314] it was held that the evil of displaying disrespect for the judiciary should not be averted by restricting freedom of expression, as enforced silence on a subject is more likely to engender resent, suspicion and contempt. This is, therefore, a further instance in which the ends of both justice and free speech would be served by curtailing or abolishing this area of liability.

On the other hand, it might be argued that an action for defamation is not a sufficient remedy where bias has been imputed to a judge because it would place him or her in an invidious position while the action was being held. More doubtfully, it might also be said that the singling out of judges can be justified on the basis that, unlike many other public figures, judges may be more reluctant to use available fora from which to reply to criticism. A compromise between these two positions could be effected by adopting the course advocated by the Law Commission – replacement of this form of liability with a narrowly drawn offence covering the distribution of false matter with intent that it should be taken as true, and knowing or being reckless as to its falsity when it imputes corrupt conduct to any judge.[315] Narrowing down the current offence and affording it much greater precision would be, it is suggested, much more in accordance with the demands of Art 10, including the 'prescribed by law' requirement. As currently conceived, it may allow for an interference with truthful and highly significant speech which may readily be viewed, not only as unjustifiable in a democratic society, but also as too imprecise to form a basis for criminality.

6 Disclosure of jury deliberations

This chapter now moves on to consider a specific preventive measure – the ban on media reporting of jury deliberations. Apart from the various specific restraints on reporting already discussed, there is a complete ban in the Contempt of Court Act 1981 on the reporting of jury deliberations; it is aimed not at preventing prejudice to particular proceedings, but at preserving the administration of justice by protecting the confidentiality of such deliberations. Section 8(1) of the 1981 Act bars the revelation of statements, opinions, arguments or votes of the members of the jury in the course of their 313 (1928) 41 Harv L Rev 1031, p 1036.

314 (1941) 314 US 252.
315 This was the view of the Law Commission in their report (No 96), Offences Relating to Interference with the Course of Justice.

deliberations,[316] except in very narrow circumstances, to a court, as discussed below. It is accepted that there is a mens rea element of intention: the section refers only to deliberate revelations. A similar but less absolute rule has prevailed in Commonwealth countries;[317] it does allow for research.[318]

Therefore jurors are prevented from exercising their freedom of expression, except in one narrow circumstance, and the media are barred from discussing such deliberations in two ways. First, the source of information that they would need is withheld from them since it would be an offence for a juror to disclose information about the deliberations, while it would also be an offence under s 8 for a reporter to solicit it. Second, any reporting of the deliberations would itself infringe s 8.[319] Therefore, apart from general and abstract discussions, the media cannot act in their watchdog role[320] in relation to the very significant function of the jury in society. Further, due to s 8 research into the deliberations of jurors in real trials, even if anonymised, is so highly constrained in the UK as to be impossible.

The pre-HRA stance, from the ruling in Attorney General v Associated Newspapers Ltd and Others,[321] was that s 8 should be interpreted literally. In that instance, jury deliberations were not disclosed directly to the defendant newspaper, but to researchers who made a transcript of them. The paper then used the transcript in order to gather information for the article in question. It was argued on behalf of the defendants that 316 Section 8 provides in full:

> 'Confidentiality of jury's deliberations.
>
> (1) Subject to subsection (2) below, it is a contempt of court to obtain, disclose or solicit any particulars of statements made, opinions expressed, arguments advanced or votes cast by members of a jury in the course of their deliberations in any legal proceedings.
>
> (2) This section does not apply to any disclosure of any particulars--
>
> (a) in the proceedings in question for the purpose of enabling the jury to arrive at their verdict, or in connection with the delivery of that verdict, or
>
> (b) in evidence in any subsequent proceedings for an offence alleged to have been committed in relation to the jury in the first mentioned proceedings, or to the publication of any particulars so disclosed.
>
> (3) Proceedings for a contempt of court under this section (other than Scottish proceedings) shall not be instituted except by or with the consent of the Attorney General or on the motion of a court having jurisdiction to deal with it.'

317 For Australia, see: R v Andrew Brown [1907] 7 NSWSR 290; R v Medici (Court of Criminal Appeal, Victoria, 5 June 1995); for Canada, see: R v Pan; R v Sawyer [2001] 2 SCR 344; for New Zealand, see: R v Papadopoulos [1979] 1 NZLR 621.

318 A particularly important piece of research was completed five years ago in New Zealand (Young, W, Cameron, N and Tinsley, Y, Law Juries in Criminal Trials, Part Two: A Summary of the Research Findings, Law Commission of New Zealand Prelim Paper 37, Vol 2, 1999). It relied on the experience of jurors in 48 completed criminal trials, many of them high-profile cases. 19% of the jurors recalled seeing some pre-trial publicity. The main conclusion of the report was that in only one case was there some evidence that pre-trial publicity might have influenced the deliberations of the jury. 34% per cent of jurors recalled encountering publicity during the trial but considered that it had had no influence on them. Jurors consciously made an effort to put aside the effects of any publicity, and the researchers said that it was impossible to know whether this was due to directions from the judge or because they thought that to take such publicity into account would be unfair.

319 See Attorney General v. Associated Newspapers [1994] 2 AC 538, HL.

320 See the discussion below of Goodwin v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 123 at pp 413–15.

321 [1994] 2 WLR 277; [1994] 1 All ER 556; (1994) 142 NLJ 1647, HL; [1993] 2 All ER 535; (1993) 144 NLJ 195, CA.

the word 'disclose' used in s 8 is capable of bearing two meanings; it could mean disclosure by anyone, or it could mean disclosure by a member of the jury to the defendant. As Chapter 3 indicated, it was well established in the pre-HRA era that where a statute contains an ambiguous provision, it should be construed so as to conform with the relevant Convention guarantee.[322] On that basis, the narrower meaning should have been adopted, allowing the defendants to escape liability. However, it was found that the word 'disclose' was not ambiguous: in its natural and ordinary meaning, which Parliament clearly intended it to bear, it denoted disclosure to anyone; the defendants therefore clearly fell within its provisions.

The closing up of a potential loophole in s 8 achieved by this ruling means that the important institution of the jury is largely immune from media scrutiny, at least as regards the manner in which they discharges their role.[323] The section does not prevent interviewing of jurors that does not touch upon their deliberations in the jury room, but such inquiries should only be undertaken with the leave of the trial court or after verdict and sentence, by the Court of Appeal.[324] Jury deliberations are clearly a matter of very significant public interest, and it is therefore argued that s 8 should have been framed much less widely. The only current constraint is the requirement of the Attorney General's consent to a prosecution, but even this is not necessary where proceedings are instituted on the motion of a court.

The absolute nature of s 8 means that it may be incompatible with Art 10 since jurors are denied freedom of expression, and media discussion and reporting on a matter of great public interest is so greatly curbed. Section 8 probably answers to the exceptions under Art 10(2), of preserving confidentiality and perhaps 'for maintaining the authority of the judiciary'. But assuming that one of these exceptions applies, the absolute nature of the section means that it creates an interference arguably disproportionate to the end in view. On the face of it, it might have been expected, therefore, that s 8 would be found at some point after 2000 to be prima facie incompatible with Art 10 under the Human Rights Act, and s 3 would have had to be invoked to impose a different interpretation on it. Alternatively, it might have been expected that a declaration of the incompatibility would have to be made under s 4 HRA.

The two leading post-HRA cases concerned the compatibility of s 8 with Arts 6 and 10; they indicate that the senior judges are not minded to create exceptions to the section, relying on s 3 HRA, apart from one very narrow one. It seems clear therefore that they would not be prepared to create an exception which would allow for some limited, anonymised disclosure of jury deliberations to the media. In R v Mirza; R v Connor[325] the House of Lords largely reaffirmed the accepted understandings as to the interpretation of s 8.[326] However, it was found that s 8(1) does not apply to the trial court or to the Court of Appeal. In other words, there is an exception to s 8 allowing a judge to inquire into a juror's disclosure of impropriety in the jury's deliberations during proceedings. Thus matters can be disclosed without either the juror or court

322 See pp 136–37.

323 For consideration of the effect of the restriction, see the Royal Commission on Criminal Justice Report (1993) Cm 2263, p 2.

324 McCluskey (1993) 94 Cr App R 216, CA. See also Mickleborough [1995] 1 Cr App R 297, CA.

325 [2004] 1 All ER 925; [2004] 2 WLR 201.

326 See R v Qureshi [2002] 1 WLR 518; Roylance v GMC (No 2) [2000] 1 AC 311.

facing liability under s 8. Prior to this decision the general assumption in the English courts was that the terms of s 8(1) were so broad as to apply to any court, whether the trial court or the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division), which might otherwise have wished to inquire into a matter relating to the jurors' deliberations. Section 8(1), it had been thought, in effect ruled out such inquiries by the courts.[327]

Subsequently, in R v Smith[328] the House looked further at what form the trial judge's inquiries might take when a matter was drawn to his/her attention during the trial. It was found that it would not be appropriate for a judge to question jurors about the contents of a letter received during proceedings from one of the jurors making allegations about impropriety in the jury deliberations, and a judge was not obliged to do so. In relation to the case it was said: 'If he had gone into the allegations, he would inevitably have had to question them about the subject of their deliberations and whether S were guilty of any of the offences charged.' The common law prohibition against inquiring into events in the jury room extended, it was found, to matters connected with the subject matter of the jury's deliberations. Thus, following Mirza and Smith, s 8 does not disallow inquiry into the jury's deliberations, but once an inquiry has been made the judge cannot under the common law question the jury as to allegations made. He or she would only have a choice between discharging the jury or redirecting them in terms that took account of the allegations. In Smith it was found on appeal that the redirection had not taken sufficient account of the allegations and therefore the appeal was allowed.

Mirza also concerned the admissibility into evidence of jurors' expressed concerns about the jury's deliberations – concerns that suggested that the jury had not acted fairly. The majority determined, by virtue of a long-standing common law rule,[329] that after the jury have returned their verdict, evidence directed to matters intrinsic to the jurors' deliberations is inadmissible.[330] Exceptionally, however, evidence of extraneous influences on the verdict is admissible. So jury concerns could not be admitted into evidence after the conclusion of proceedings unless the jury had been subjected to, for example, bribery. The bar thereby created was found not to be incompatible with the Art 6 guarantee of a fair trial. The residual possibility of a miscarriage of justice was, it was found, the necessary price to be paid for the preservation and protection of the jury system, although Lord Steyn, in the minority, delivered a powerful dissenting judgment. He said:

> In my view it would be an astonishing thing for the ECHR to hold, when the point directly arises before it, that a miscarriage of justice may be ignored in the 327 See R v Young [1995] QB 324, 330.

328 [2005] 1WLR 704.

329 There is a long line of decisions holding that it is never permissible to admit evidence of what happened during jury deliberations. See: Ellis v Deheer [1922] 2 KB 113, 117–18, per Bankes LJ at 121; R v Thompson [1962] 1 All ER 65, 66, per Lord Parker CJ; Attorney General v New Statesman and National Publishing Company Ltd [1981] QB 1,10, per Lord Widgery CJ; R v Miah [1997] 2 Cr App R 12, 18–19, per Kennedy LJ; Roylance v General Medical Council (No 2) [2000] 1 AC 311, 324B, per Lord Clyde; R v Qureshi [2002] 1 WLR 518, per Kennedy LJ. The position is similar in Scotland: Stewart v Fraser (1830) 5 Murray 166; Swankie v H M Advocate (1999) SCCR 1.

330 R v Hood [1968] 1 WLR 773; R v Brandon (1969) 53 Cr App R 466; R v Young (Stephen) [1995] QB 324.

> interests of the general efficiency of the jury system. The terms of Article 6(1) of the European Convention, the rights revolution, and fifty years of development of human rights law and practice, would suggest that such a view would be utterly indefensible.[331]

Clearly, the Lords were not concerned with the compatibility of s 8 with Art 10. However, the findings demonstrate that the Lords are not minded to create implied exceptions to s 8 except in relation to the courts themselves: they were prepared to find that a court itself cannot be in contempt of court on the narrow basis that to hold otherwise would be self-evidently absurd and that therefore s 8 must be read as including that exception. Otherwise, the Lords were content to continue the previously established approach.

In the key post-HRA authority, Attorney General v Scotcher,[332] the House of Lords reaffirmed the approach in Mirza and also found that s 8 is compatible with Art 10. It should be pointed out that Scotcher did not concern media free expression – at least, not directly - but the exercise of free speech rights by a juror. The facts of Scotcher were as follows. In January 2000 the appellant, Scotcher, was summoned for jury service in the Crown Court. Like all the other potential jurors, Scotcher was informed that disclosing the deliberations of the jury to anyone would be contempt of court under s 8 Contempt of Court Act 1981. The jury convicted the two defendants (brothers) by a majority verdict of ten votes to one.

The appellant then wrote to the defendants' mother, telling her that he had been the one juror who had wanted an acquittal and criticising the basis on which the other jurors had reached their decision. He said, inter alia, that they had not weighed up the evidence properly and that some of them had convicted merely because they wanted to get home. He also indicated that in his view the police had framed the defendants but that the other jurors had failed to appreciate this. He suggested that she should appeal and also asked her not to disclose the fact that he had sent the letter to the court or to the police. The defendants' mother's solicitor brought the matter to the attention of the Court of Appeal; eventually Scotcher admitted that he had written the letter, and he was convicted of the offence under s 8. He appealed, arguing that he had a defence based on the Human Rights Act, and specifically Art 10, on the basis that he had written the letter since he was seeking to prevent a miscarriage of justice. This was of relevance also in relation to Art 6, although that Article was not directly engaged. It was argued that in the particular circumstances of this case, by virtue of s 3 HRA, s 8(1) had to be interpreted as including the defence argued for so as to make it compatible with Art 10 of the European Convention. It was further argued that if this could not be done, then the House should make a declaration of incompatibility under s 4 HRA.

Both sides accepted that, in the terms of s 8, the appellant had revealed 'statements, opinions, arguments or votes' of the members of the jury in the course of their deliberations. It was also accepted that the mens rea for the offence is an intention to disclose those matters and that the appellant had deliberately disclosed these aspects of the jury's deliberations to the defendants' mother. So unless a defence was available to the appellant he was guilty of contempt of court in the terms of s 8(1). Just before the appeal in this case, the House of Lords had given judgment in R v Mirza.[333] That decision corrected the previous interpretation of s 8(1), which the Divisional Court had applied in Scotcher's case. As a result, the arguments before the House were different from those in the Divisional Court. The House had held in Mirza, however, as indicated above, that if a trial judge was informed about any misconduct during the jury's deliberations, but before they had returned their verdict, then s 8(1) did not prevent him/her from looking into the matter. Since jurors might well not appreciate that they could tell the judge about any misconduct of their fellow jurors, the House suggested that in future they should be given further guidance. This suggestion led Lord Woolf CJ to issue Practice Direction (Crown Court: Guidance to Jurors) in 2004[334] which amended Practice Direction (Criminal Proceedings: Consolidation)[335] so as to provide, inter alia: 'Trial judges should ensure that the jury is alerted to the need to bring any concerns about fellow jurors to the attention of the judge at the time, and not wait until the case is concluded.'

331 R v Mizra; R v Connor [2004] 1 All ER 925; [2004] 2 WLR 201, at para 19.
332 [2005] 1 WLR 1867.

However, this amended advice was not available at the time when Scotcher served as a juror: the advice he received was the previous, blanket advice. It was accepted that if he had written his letter to the Crown Court or to the Court of Appeal, he would not have been in contempt of court in the terms of s 8(1). Taking Art 10 and s 3 HRA into account, the defence argued that s 8 should be interpreted as being subject to a defence that it did not apply to a juror who disclosed the jury's deliberations to a third party rather than to the court, if the juror was motivated by a desire to expose a miscarriage of justice and he did not contact the court authorities because he had been told that he could not disclose the deliberations to anyone. Any other argument would, it was suggested, lead to a breach of Art 10 on the ground of the disproportionality of the penalty to the aim pursued. This argument was rejected by the House on the basis that s 3 HRA comes into play only where it is needed in order to make a legislative provision compatible with a Convention right. But when properly interpreted, according to ordinary principles of construction (as it was in Mirza), it was considered that s 8(1) is compatible with Art 10 of the Convention and that, therefore, s 3 did not apply. So the warnings to the jurors at the time were incorrect, but the statutory provision was not. In any event, the House found, any such potential defence would have been inapplicable to Scotcher since he disregarded warnings not to contact anyone and therefore the warnings could not be viewed as having affected him. Therefore he would not have contacted the court had the warnings been correct. Scotcher's conviction was therefore upheld since the defence argued for in his favour was not found to exist.

A number of comments may be made on this decision in relation to the balance it strikes between free expression and the administration of justice. Although this was not a decision about media reporting of jury deliberations, it is clear that the House had the possibility of disclosures to the media in mind. The Lords appeared to be concerned that the creation of exceptions to s 8, allowing disclosure to anybody apart from a court, might open the floodgates to such disclosures. The discussion will concentrate on the current position in relation to Art 10 and ask whether an absolute bar on disclosure to the media, taking account of the possibility of anonymising the reporting, is acceptable under Art 10. The defence Counsel conceded that, once the 2004 Practice Direction came into force, s 8(1) did not infringe a juror's Art 10 rights, since he would know that he could draw his concerns to the attention of the trial judge before the jury returned their verdict. However, this is questionable. As matters stand at present certain bodies have been exempted from the application of s 8 via interpretation. The exception arose since it appeared strange to hold that a court could itself be in contempt of court.

333 [2004] 1 AC 118.
334 [2004] 1 WLR 665.
335 [2002] 1 WLR 2870.

But, following Mirza, a juror may avoid liability for contempt if she or he discloses to the court what is said or done during the jury's deliberations with the intention of prompting an investigation. She or he is also exempt from being in contempt of court in terms of s 8(1) – a further exception and one not dependent on the anomaly of finding a court to be in contempt. Jurors can make representations to the court regarding jury deliberations both during and after the trial. Doing so after the trial is, however, of no efficacy since such evidence is inadmissible, unless the representations concern external influences. Section 8 itself does not appear to import such an exemption for jurors. Once this inroad had been made, it could be argued that in an exceptional instance a further exemption should be created, using the powerful interpretative tool of s 3 HRA. For example, after acquittal, a female juror in a rape trial might come to the conclusion on reasonable grounds that both the court and fellow-jurors were affected by highly sexist views of rape victims. For example, a juror might have expressed the view that 99 per cent of victims in rape trials are liars. Or a group of jurors might have expressed the view that since the woman was wearing a short skirt and had flirted with the alleged rapist, she must have given consent. If despite her concern about the court's stance, she exposed the sexist views of jurors to the court she would not be acting unlawfully, but her action would have no effect in averting a miscarriage of justice (the wrongful acquittal of a rapist) or in alerting the public to failings in the jury system in rape cases. Her action would be ineffective in relation to miscarriages since the verdict could not be appealed. Therefore after an acquittal tainted by sexism the female juror might consider that the only way of exposing this matter, and thus helping to address the very low conviction rate in rape cases, was to contact the media. If a newspaper published her allegations, but anonymised the case itself, it would nevertheless face liability for contempt under s 8, as would the juror.

In a similar instance, if a juror considered that fellow jurors and the court were influenced by racism in reaching a conviction, disclosure to the court would not be unlawful but would not avert a miscarriage of justice since on appeal the evidence would be inadmissible. Lord Steyn gave this example in Mirza: 'A juror reveals after verdict that during the jury deliberations it emerged that some members of the jury were associated with a Neo-Nazi group and that they urged the conviction of the accused because he was a black immigrant;' he considered that there could be no serious dispute as to the perversion of justice that would have occurred in that instance.[336] Nevertheless, the disclosure could not be admitted in evidence on appeal. The juror who realised that his/her revelation had had no effect might be tempted to write to a newspaper, revealing what had happened as a matter that the public should be informed about. If he did, he would incur liability under s 8 even if he anonymised his letter.

336 R v Mirza [2004] 1 AC 118 [1].

Under the present state of the law, disclosure by a juror during the case of the fact that a juror was evincing sexist or racist views, could be received by the court. But it is clear, following the Lords' decision in R v Smith,[337] that it could not lead to an inquiry by the judge into the matter; the judge appears only to have the options of discharging the jury or re-directing them. If a mere redirection was given, which in fact appeared to have little impact, disclosure to the court might be viewed as having been ineffective by the juror. Recourse to the media might appear to be the only way of alerting the public to the miscarriage of justice and also possibly prompting a change in the law.[338] Consideration of such instances indicates that s 8 may be incompatible with Art 10 since the free expression of jurors and of the media is severely curbed in relation to jury deliberations.

The position in England prior to the enactment of s 8 is of some interest in this context. Attorney General v New Statesman[339] was the decision that led to the introduction of s 8. Following the acquittal of a prominent politician on a charge of conspiracy to murder, the New Statesman magazine published an article, based on an interview with one of the jurors, which gave an account of significant parts of the jury's deliberations. The Attorney General applied for an order for contempt of court against the New Statesman. The Divisional Court held that a juror's disclosure of the jury's deliberations was not a contempt of court unless it 'tended, or would tend, to imperil the finality of jury verdicts, or to affect adversely the attitude of future jurors and the quality of their deliberations'. The Court held that the article in question would not have that effect and the Attorney General's application was refused. Lord Widgery CJ found:[340]

> The evidence before us shows that for a number of years the publication of jury room secrets has occurred on numerous occasions. To many of those disclosures no exception could be taken because from a study of them it would not be possible to identify the persons concerned in the trials. In these cases, jury secrets were revealed in the main for the laudable purpose of informing would-be jurors what to expect when summoned for jury service. Thus, it is not possible to contend that every case of post-trial activity of the kind with which we are concerned must necessarily amount to a contempt. Looking at this case as a whole, we have come to the conclusion that the article in the New Statesman does not justify the title of contempt of court. That does not mean that we would not wish to see restrictions on the publication of such an article because we would.

337 [2005] 1WLR 704.

338 A possible change that might be prompted by media outcries would be to allow for inquiries into jury debate to be made by a judge during trial if an allegation of jury prejudice is made by a juror (contrary to the finding in R v Smith [2005] 1WLR 704). This would have been valuable in domestic courts in relation to the domestic case (R v Gregory, Manchester Crown Court, between 26 and 28 November 1991; leave to appeal refused) resulting in Gregory v UK [1997] 25 EHRR 577, discussed below.

339 [1981] QB 1.

340 At p11.

These findings suggest that an absolute bar on publication of jury deliberations was not needed and was not being asked for by the court. They also suggest that the courts did not view anonymised publications as problematic, while even nominate ones – as in the New Statesman case – were not viewed as imperilling the jury system in a significant manner. These remarks provide a starting-point from which to examine the compatibility of s 8 in its current manifestation – post-Mirza – with Art 10. It may be noted that in Scotcher the House relied on Gregory v UK,[341] discussed below, in noting that the European Court of Human Rights had acknowledged that the rule governing the secrecy of jury deliberations is a crucial and legitimate feature of English trial law. The House took the view that this finding was relevant to the compatibility of s 8 with Art 10, Lord Rodger of Earlsferry stating:

> Therefore, in so far as section 8(1) serves to reinforce that rule by making it an offence for a juror to disclose the information which he receives in confidence from his fellow jurors, the objective is sufficiently important to justify limiting the juror's freedom of expression in this way. The provision is rationally connected to its aim and the means adopted are no more than is reasonably necessary, since the restriction does not apply to bona fide disclosures to the court authorities. The measure is accordingly reasonably justifiable in a democratic society.[342]

However, that is not necessarily the end of the matter as far as Art 10 is concerned. Gregory concerned the right to a fair trial under Art 6(1) and specifically whether, in the circumstances of the trial in question, impartiality had been achieved so as to satisfy Art 6(1). Article 10 was not in question. On the facts the Court was satisfied that no breach had occurred. The applicant in that case had been tried for robbery and on the final day of the trial the jury had retired to consider their verdict. After some time a note was passed by the jury to the judge. It read: 'Jury showing racial overtones. One member to be excused.' The trial judge consulted counsel for the prosecution and defence and decided to redirect the jury as to the need to decide the case on the evidence, although he did not mention racial prejudice specifically. He could not inquire directly into any racial bias on the part of jury members due to s 8. Eventually the jury convicted. The European Court decided that the note was ambiguous and that the judge had taken reasonable measures to ensure that impartiality had been safeguarded. Thus the decision turned on the particular circumstances of the case and did not determine that in all circumstances the application of s 8 on its current interpretation could cause no breach of Art 6 or of Art 10.

If s 8 serves a legitimate aim under Art 10(2) and satisfies the tests for necessity and proportionality in relation to that aim then there is no incompatibility. However, it is suggested that Lord Rodger in Scotcher did not take full account of all the tests for proportionality or subject s 8 in relation to them to a sufficiently high level of scrutiny, despite citing de Freitas v Permanent Secretary of Ministry Agriculture.[343] Clearly, the preservation of jury confidentiality serves a significant societal interest – it can be said that it answers to a pressing social need. It is important that there should be free debate in the jury room; jurors should be able to deliberate without fear of possible future repercussions. Does s 8 go further than is necessary to serve that need? A number of tests for proportionality should be applied (those from Goodwin v UK[344] and from de Freitas v Permanent Secretary of Ministry Agriculture).[345] It is also suggested that the level of scrutiny to be adopted should be strict, bearing in mind the significance of the speech in question and the importance of the media's role – a juror disclosing material to a newspaper about a miscarriage of justice would be in position analogous to that of a source disclosing malpractice in, for example, the police service. Thus the strict level of scrutiny determined upon in Goodwin v UK in relation to source disclosure should apply.[346]

341 (1997) 25 EHRR 577, 594, at para 44.
342 At para 29.
343 [1999] 1 AC 69, p 80.

The de Freitas tests for proportionality cover first the suitability of the interference in question. In this instance, the penalty under s 8 constitutes the interference. This test is arguably met on the basis that criminal liability for disclosing information is effective while the penalties imposed are not excessive: a custodial sentence is unlikely to be imposed, although a suspended sentence might be. The second test concerns the need to choose the least intrusive measure. It is arguable that this test is not met since a less intrusive measure – an injunction obtained on grounds of breach of confidence – is available and subject to a public interest test that meets Art 10's demands. More significantly, near-absolute bars to the exercise of expression rights invade the right almost as far as it is possible to do so. A parallel could be drawn with Open-Door Counselling and Dublin Well-Woman v Ireland[347] in which the interference with speech rights was also very serious. Pamphlets on the availability of abortions outside Ireland were – in effect – banned by an injunction granted by the Irish courts. The European Court of Human Rights was struck by the absolute nature of the interference – there were no grounds, including that of health, on which it could be waived. On that basis it was found to be a disproportionate interference with expression rights. In the instance of s 8 there is an absolute bar to the exercise of media expression rights since jurors cannot disclose matters relating to the trial to the media, however significant the public interest involved. Media reports of such matters could adopt anonymity and therefore protect the confidentiality of jury deliberations. Therefore absolute bars to media reporting may be viewed as unnecessarily restrictive. The strictness of the test for scrutiny means that it is not sufficient to find a reasonable relationship between the restrictiveness of s 8 and the aim pursued.

Third, the seriousness of the interference has to be balanced against the importance of the aim sought to be pursued. Clearly, the interference is especially severe, since it amounts to an absolute bar despite the significance of the expression in question. The aim pursued is important – the efficient working of the jury system. But is that efficiency best served by hiding the failings of the system from public scrutiny? Could it be served more effectively by allowing reports of jury deliberations, but anonymised? In coming to a conclusion on this point it would not be enough to be satisfied that 345 [1999] 1 AC 69, 80. The tests are discussed fully in Chapter 4, pp 286–90.

344 (1996) 22 EHRR 123.

346 (1992) 15 EHRR 244. See further below, pp 413–15 for discussion of the proportionality test used in this instance and for discussion of the standard of scrutiny from Goodwin (1996) 22 EHRR 123.

347 (1993) 15 EHRR 244.

the balance struck between the two interests was not manifestly unreasonable. On a stricter level of scrutiny it would appear that the balance struck between the two is not satisfactory since it is does not appear that the serious invasion of expression rights is warranted by the aim pursued. The efficacy of the jury system might ultimately be enhanced by media scrutiny accompanied by the safeguards mentioned: an absolute bar is not therefore needed. Thus it appears that two of the key tests for proportionality are unsatisfied by s 8. If its effects are disproportionate to the aim pursued, they cannot be viewed as necessary in a democratic society under Art 10(2).

Arguably it would be possible to imply an exception into s 8 via s 3 HRA on similar lines to the exception created by the House of Lords in R v A[348] to s 41 Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999: s 8 could be read subject to the need to ensure compatibility with Art 10 by allowing for a defence where a juror was genuinely motivated by a desire to expose a miscarriage of justice in the public interest and where the material was anonymised. Such a reinterpretation would not be contrary to the underlying intention behind s 8 since, as the House accepted in Scotcher, the main intention behind introduction of the section was to prevent the harassment of jurors by the media. The new exception could be made applicable only where the jury member had spontaneously contacted the media in the exceptional circumstances envisaged; thus the exception could be found not to apply where a journalist had contacted the juror or offered money. There is also a strong Art 10-based argument for creating a further exception covering anonymised research into jury trials on the basis that the confidentiality of jury deliberations is unlikely to be threatened but the material discovered is of very high public interest value. The creation of implied exceptions to s 8, which allow for serious debate as to the fairness of the jury system would be a desirable result in terms of the values enshrined not only in Art 10 but also in Art 6 and possibly Arts 8 and 3. If the creation of such exceptions using s 3 HRA was viewed as too radical, a declaration of incompatibility between Art 10 and s 8 could be made. Clearly, in order to import these exceptions into s 8 under s 3 HRA, the House of Lords would probably have to decide in a suitable case to overturn Scotcher. The only alternative in terms of creating compatibility at the domestic level, in the absence of legislative change, would be for the courts to find that Scotcher is confined to its own special facts.

7 Protection of sources[349]

Introduction

The protection of sources is clearly vital to the role of journalists. As the Strasbourg Court put it in the seminal case of Goodwin v UK: 'Protection of journalistic sources is one of the basic conditions for press freedom.'[350] If sources do not believe that their identity will be protected, they will not normally contact journalists and therefore, the most potent source of information, that of a person who is, in some sense, an 'insider', will be denied to them. If sources are afraid to come forward, the result will be that the public will not be informed on matters which are frequently of grave public interest. These may relate to crime, when the source may be a person involved in, or in some way linked to, forms of criminal activity. Or, they may relate to national security; the source may be a civil servant who is activated by conscience in seeking to disclose an abuse of power by the executive. They may relate to improper practices in large commercial organisations, in which case the source is likely to be an employee, who is prepared to 'blow the whistle'. Such an employee would now have protection from dismissal under the Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998, but nevertheless is likely to want to protect her identity.

348 [2001] 2 WLR 1546.

349 For comment on s 10, see Allan [1991] CLJ 131; Miller, CJ [1982] Crim LR 71, p 82; Palmer, S [1992] PL 61.

350 (1996) 22 EHRR 123, at para 39.

Thus, the use of and protection of sources serves a vital function in relation to the role of the media. In recognition of this, journalists view themselves as morally obliged to protect the identity of their sources, a principle which is recognised in cl 15 of the Press Commission Code.[351] Where the media exposes executive malpractice, it performs a vital constitutional role. In general, the speech generated, which relates to the matters mentioned, is of great value in a democracy and would be viewed as of the first importance within Art 10. Nevertheless, the protection it is afforded under UK law, is, it will be argued, inadequate.

Having suggested that source protection is largely in harmony with free speech values, it is necessary to look somewhat more closely at that argument. Information deriving from sources is not intrinsically of any greater value than information obtained by other means. Sources, especially those linked to government, may have their own agenda; this may also be true of corporate sources. Source-based information may consist of a slanted mixture of substance and disinformation. The government may well wish to leak information into the public domain for a range of purposes, such as that of 'smearing' political opponents, or those whose published opinions run counter to an important aspect of government policy. The well-known US Judith Miller case in 2005,[352] linked to the 'evidence' of WMD justifying the war in Iraq, may provide an example of the latter tendency of governments. In that instance it appeared that Miller's source had leaked information to her deliberately designed to discredit an insider who had challenged evidence of Saddam Hussein's possession of WMD. Clearly, the Bush administration wanted to rely on that evidence in order to justify the war in Iraq. Therefore the administration had a strong motivation to leak information to journalists that in some way aided in its attempts to justify its stance on the war. Miller was eventually found to be in contempt of court when she refused to reveal her sources. This was not an instance – it appeared – in which a journalist was acting to protect her source in order to serve the public interest, but one in which such protection led to the promulgation of misinformation and so was opposed to that interest. On the other hand, Miller went to prison rather than reveal her source, sending a general message to sources about journalists' commitment to their ethical code. As discussed below, the application of the doctrine of proportionality under a strict level of scrutiny can potentially provide a means of determining how far speech values are truly at stake in any given instance.

351 For further comment on the Code, see Chapter 9, pp 833–37.

352 Judith Miller, Petitioner v US and M Cooper and Time inc, Petitioners v US, Supreme Court (2005) No 04–1508; opinion of the court of appeals (Miller Pet. App. 1a–77a; Cooper Pet. App. 1a–85a) is reported at 397 F 3d 964.

The Norwich Pharmacal jurisdiction

Under the common law there are – imprecisely defined – circumstances in which a journalist can be ordered to disclose the identity of a source. Questions may be asked in existing legal proceedings that might lead to disclosure,[353] and orders for disclosure outside such proceedings are based on the jurisdiction established by the House of Lords in Norwich Pharmacal Co v Customs and Excise Commissioners.[354] Under the pre-HRA cases, on one view the jurisdiction was exercisable where the defendant (normally this will be the journalist) had become 'mixed up' in the tortious acts of the source so as to facilitate his/her wrongdoing, and as a result had to co-operate in righting the wrongs he had unwittingly facilitated (Norwich Pharmacal Co;[355] British Steel Corp v Granada Television).[356] The wrongdoing would normally consist of breaching confidence although, as the cases discussed below indicate, there are other possibilities. Typically, a source would divulge confidential information to a journalist, thus potentially incurring liability under the equitable doctrine of breach of confidence.[357] The journalist would become 'mixed' up in the wrong-doing if he or she published the information.

It is generally accepted that the Norwich Pharmacal jurisdiction is discretionary, and in its exercise the Court, pre-1981, was both entitled and bound to perform a balancing exercise weighing the public interest in advancing the course of justice against any countervailing feature of the public interest.[358] That balancing exercise is now conducted in accordance with s 10 Contempt of Court.

Section 10 of the Contempt of Court Act

Until the inception of the Human Rights Act, receiving Art 10 into domestic law, very little formal recognition was given in UK law to the constitutional role of the press. However, an exception to this rule was afforded by s 10 of the 1981 Act which provides:

> No court may require a person to disclose, nor is any person guilty of contempt of court for refusing to disclose, the source of information contained in a publication for which he is responsible, unless it be established to the satisfaction of the court

353 However, under the common law a court order to disclose sources would not be made in the context of the preliminary proceedings in a defamation action: see Adam v Fisher (1914) 110 LT 537; Hennessy v Wright (1888) 21 QBD 509. See further, Wilmo, P and Rogers, W (eds) Gatley on Libel and Slander, 9th edn, 1998, Sweet and Maxwell, para 30, 112.

354 [1974] AC 133. See Mathews and Malek, Discovery (1992) on the law and practice relating to this jurisdiction.

355 [1974] AC 133 at 175, per Lord Reid.

356 [1981] AC 1096.

357 See Chapter 9, pp 895–915 for discussion of the doctrine. As the chapter argues, it appears to have undergone a transformation in order to become the tort of misuse of private information. But in terms of commercial and state secrets, it appears to have retained its original form and ingredients (see pp 616–20, 877, 895, below).

358 See [1974] AC 133, 175, per Lord Reid; pp 181 and 182, per Lord Morris of Borth-y-Guest; pp 188 and 190, per Lord Dilhorne; pp 198–99, per Lord Cross of Chelsea; and p 205, per Lord Kilbrandon.

> that disclosure is necessary in the interests of justice or national security or for the prevention of disorder or crime.

The exceptions under s 10 regarding national security and the prevention of crime answer to the exceptions to Art 10. The term 'the interests of justice' is not repeated in para 2 of Art 10, although it may be covered to an extent by the term 'the preservation of the authority and impartiality of the judiciary' and, possibly, by the 'rights of others' exception. The key issue, therefore, is whether the interpretation of the term 'necessary' is compatible with the Strasbourg view of what is necessary in a democratic society in order to further those aims.

Section 10 does not provide any new power to require a journalist to disclose the identity of a source. As Lord Diplock put it in Secretary of State for Defence v Guardian Newspapers,[359] the leading case: 'Section 10 confers no powers upon a court additional to those powers, whether discretionary or not, which already existed at common law or under rules of court, to order disclosure of sources of information, its effect is restrictive only.' It was also determined in that case that s 10 will apply to the disclosure of information which might reveal the identity of the source. Thus, s 10 creates a presumption in favour of journalists who wish to protect their sources, which is, however, subject to four wide exceptions, the widest of which arises where the interests of justice require that disclosure should be made. It was found in Secretary of State for Defence v Guardian Newspapers[360] that disclosure of the identity of the source would only be ordered where this was necessary in order to identify him or her; if other means of identification were reasonably readily available, they should be used. On the other hand, this did not mean that all other means of inquiry which might reveal the identity of the source must be exhausted before disclosure would be ordered. The term 'necessary' was found in re an Inquiry under the Companies Security (Insider Dealing) Act 1985[361] to mean something less than indispensable, but something more than useful. In Guardian Newspapers a civil servant, who considered that Parliament was being misled as regards the arrival of cruise missiles in Britain, sent a photocopy of a memorandum regarding the timing to the Guardian, who published. The Secretary of state wished to discover the identity of the civil servant and sought the return of the photocopy, since it would reveal the identity. The Secretary of State, the plaintiff, claimed that the national security exception under s 10 applied on the basis that the fact of a secret document with restricted circulation relating to defence having come into the hands of a national newspaper was of great significance in relation to the maintenance of national security. The minority in the House of Lords were not convinced by this evidence, but the majority accepted it, Lord Bridge stating that any threat to national security ought to be eliminated by the speediest and most effective means possible. The identity of the source was duly discovered when the photocopy was returned and she was prosecuted.[362] The majority, therefore, took the traditional stance of failing to afford a full scrutiny to imprecise claims of a threat to national security made by the executive. However, the House of Lords did suggest that more convincing evidence would be needed in future.

359 [1984] 3 All ER 601; [1985] AC 339, 347, HL.
360 [1985] AC 339.
361 [1988] 1 All ER 203.
362 See Chapter 7, p 593.

The House of Lords clarified the nature of the balancing exercise to be carried out under s 10 in X v Morgan Grampian Publishers.[363] A confidential plan was stolen from the plaintiffs, a company named Tetra; information apparently from the plan was given by an unidentified source by phone to William Goodwin, a journalist. The plaintiffs applied for an order requiring Goodwin to disclose the source and sought discovery of his notes of the phone conversation in order to discover his or her identity. The House of Lords had to consider the application of s 10 to these facts. It found that when a journalist relies on s 10 in order to protect a source, it must be determined whether the applicant's right to take legal action against the source is outweighed by the journalist's interest in maintaining the promise of confidentiality made to him or her. The House of Lords took into account various factors in balancing these two considerations, including the threat to the plaintiffs' business and the complicity of the source in 'a gross breach of confidentiality'. Lord Bridge, with whom the other Law Lords unanimously agreed, found that the interest of the plaintiffs in identifying the source outweighed the interests of the journalist in protecting it. Goodwin refused to reveal the identity of the source and was fined £5,000 for refusing to obey the court's order.

The findings in the Lords were significant since they made it clear that a newspaper publishing information deriving from an employee of the plaintiff body in question would very frequently be ordered to disclose his or her identity, since the factors identified by Lord Bridge would almost always apply. In such instances there would almost always have been a breach of confidence (the judiciary are remarkably unwilling, in this context, to find that the public interest defence could have been made out)[364] and there would almost always be a threat, based on speculation, to the company. It would almost always be virtually impossible to rule that threat out, and the judiciary, as noted earlier, have not required any evidence to accept that the threat actually exists in any given instance: the mere fact that one disclosure has occurred is apparently sufficient. Clearly, an employee who has leaked information on one occasion might leak it again, but the likelihood of that occurring requires scrutiny, depending on the facts.

Thus, following the Morgan Grampian findings, the 'balancing' exercise appeared to be virtually a misnomer since once the factors identified were in the equation, it was unclear that they would ever be likely to be outweighed by the value of the information.[365] The term 'necessary' was being afforded very little weight: the key question was in reality whether the 'interests of justice' could be viewed as being at stake at all, and, as contended above, they inevitably would be. The Lords did find that very clear cases of exposing iniquity might mean that disclosure would not be ordered on the basis that the factors identified could be outweighed, but they made it clear that in most instances – outside such clear-cut cases – disclosure would be ordered. Lord Bridge mentioned the interest in protecting sources. However, when it came to conducting the balancing exercise, he considered that the public interest value of material would be a relevant factor, but he did not avert to the general and constant public interest in protecting sources in order to serve the interests of investigative journalism. That was the key error in the analysis. He did not set that factor against the need of the company to identify the untrustworthy employee. Since both interests would almost always be present in a source disclosure case they would always tend to need to be balanced against each other.

363 [1991] AC 1; [1991] 2 All ER 1, HL.

364 See pp 437–38 below.

365 However, in Chief Constable of Leicestershire v Gravelli [1997] EMLR 543, DC, a case concerning revelations of malpractice in the police, it was found that in the circumstances of the case in question – disciplinary proceedings – it appeared that the interests of justice would not in fact be served by requiring the journalist to name her source. In other words, there could be no necessity to make such a demand when it was of viewed as of no, or virtually no, utility in the particular context that arose.

When Goodwin took his case to Strasbourg, it was made clear, it is argued, that the House of Lords had indeed failed to give proper weight to the term 'necessary' in s 10. Goodwin applied to the European Commission on Human Rights[366] which gave its opinion that the order against Goodwin violated his right to freedom of expression under Art 10 of the Convention on Human Rights. When the case came before the Court it found that there was a vital public interest in protecting journalistic sources, since so doing was essential to the maintenance of a free press.[367] Thus, the margin of appreciation was circumscribed by that interest. It considered that limitations placed on the confidentiality of such sources would require the most careful scrutiny. Was the vital public interest in protecting sources outweighed by Tetra's interest in eliminating the threat of damage due to the dissemination of confidential material? The injunction was already effective in preventing the dissemination of such material and therefore the additional restriction on freedom of expression entailed by the disclosure order was not supported by sufficient reasons to satisfy the requirements of Art 10(2). Tetra's interest in disclosure, including its interest in unmasking a disloyal employee, was not outweighed by the public interest in the protection of journalistic sources. Taking these matters into account, it was found that the order was disproportionate to the purpose in question and therefore could not be said to be necessary. A breach of Art 10 was therefore established. The Court found:

> The court recalls that freedom of expression constitutes one of the essential foundations of a democratic society and that the safeguards to be afforded to the press are of particular importance. Protection of journalistic sources is one of the basic conditions for press freedom, as is reflected in the laws and the professional codes of conduct in a number of contracting states and is affirmed in several international instruments on journalistic freedoms. Without such protection, sources may be deterred from assisting the press in informing the public on matters of public interest. As a result the vital public watchdog role of the press may be undermined and the ability of the press to provide accurate and reliable information may be adversely affected. Having regard to the importance of the protection of journalistic sources for press freedom in a democratic society and the potentially chilling effect an order of source disclosure has on the exercise of that freedom, such a measure cannot be compatible with article 10 of the Convention unless it is justified by an overriding requirement in the public interest.[368]

366 Goodwin v UK (1994) No 17488/90 Com Rep.

367 Goodwin v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 123. See also Fressoz and Roire v France (1999) 5 BHRC 654.

368 At para 39.

Thus Goodwin made it clear that in this context the strictest form of scrutiny should be afforded to the application of the tests for proportionality. As Chapter 4 indicates, less strict forms can be seen as applicable.[369] Goodwin relied largely on speech/harm balancing as the proportionality test.[370] In other words, the seriousness of the harm caused by the disclosure of Tetra's confidential information was weighed up against the weightiness of the expression interest. The Court insisted on looking closely at the State's case regarding the degree of harm that Tetra had suffered, and took a view of it that differed significantly from that of the state. The interference was very severe, bearing in mind the significance for free expression of protection for journalistic sources. In coming to this conclusion the Court applied a strict test for scrutinising the balance between the two interests – had it conceded a wider margin of appreciation to the national authorities, it might have been satisfied that the balance struck between the two was not manifestly unreasonable. Thus the Court found that the proportionality test had not been met.

The Court did not fully refer to the tests for necessity and proportionality that answer to the de Freitas[371] three-stage test discussed in Chapter 4,[372] but it is worth placing the facts of Goodwin within that reasoning framework in order to demonstrate that the application of the key Goodwin proportionality test, as opposed to the key de Freitas tests, may well lead to a different outcome. Following de Freitas, it is first necessary to ask whether a significant and pressing interest, falling within one or more of the Art 10(2) exceptions, has been identified since so doing is part of the test for 'necessary' under para 2. That is the first test, and impliedly it was not met in Goodwin since the Court did not find that the harm caused to Tetra outweighed the value of protecting the source. The second and third de Freitas tests cover the issue of proportionality. Under the second it is necessary to consider the suitability of the interference in question – the extent to which it is rationally connected to the aim pursued. In this instance, the source disclosure order constituted the interference; the Court did not address this question directly, but in many source disclosure cases this is a relevant issue. It is relevant, for example, where an injunction would probably be effective in preventing further disclosures, or where, due to the circumstances, little likelihood of a further disclosure by the same source arose. In Goodwin an injunction had already been obtained and the Court could have adverted specifically to the question of its efficacy in the circumstances.

The third de Freitas test concerns the need to choose the least intrusive measure – the measure that creates a minimal degree of harm to the primary right consistent with affording protection to the aim pursued. The seriousness of the interference has to be balanced against the importance of the aim sought to be pursued. This is means/end balancing – if there is another way of achieving the aim pursued that is less restrictive, it should be used. This can also be termed 'the least intrusive' means test. The Court's judgment might be viewed as implying that this test had not been met since a less intrusive measure – the injunction – was available and had been used. The problem is

369 See Chapter 4, pp 276–77.

370 See Chapter 4, pp 286–89.

371 From the decision of the Privy Council in de Freitas v Permanent Secretary of Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries, Lands and Housing [1999] 1 AC 69, 80.

372 See Chapter 4, p 286.

that this test does not lend itself readily to the principled analysis of the harm caused in relation to the value of the speech that can occur under the Goodwin speech/harm balancing test.[373] It remained to be seen whether the domestic courts would apply this test under a strict level of scrutiny.

In order to comply with this ruling, it might have been thought to be necessary to amend the 'interests of justice' head of s 10. The then Conservative Government stated, however, in response to the ruling, that it had no plans to amend the 1981 Act.[374] Thus, before the HRA came fully into force it appeared that under s 3(1) HRA, when a suitable case arose, s 10 would be found to require re-interpretation: clearly, the established interpretation of the term 'necessary' did not accord with the test for necessity under Art 10(2). But in any event it was probable that the judges would react to the ruling in Goodwin, regardless of the HRA, although there was subsequently disagreement among them as to the effect of Goodwin. The argument that the UK stance on source disclosure differed from that taken at Strasbourg was far from fully accepted.[375]

Therefore it appeared to be quite possible that before the HRA was in force, the judges would already have brought about harmony between the established domestic interpretation of s 10 and the demands of Art 10 as indicated by Goodwin. However, in Camelot Group Ltd v Centaur Communications[376] the Court of Appeal allowed the 'necessary in the interests of justice' exception under s 10 a scope which was arguably as wide as that afforded to it in X v Morgan Grampian. The company, Camelot, runs the UK national lottery. An anonymous source sent Camelot's draft accounts to the newspaper, which published them. It appeared that Camelot was misleading the public regarding the dedication of the funds generated to charitable concerns. Camelot sought return of the documents in order to identify the source, and the newspaper relied on s 10.

Camelot had already obtained an injunction preventing any further dissemination of its accounts. Once the injunction had been obtained against Centaur, any other newspaper that published information covered by it would have risked liability for contempt of court as a result of the contempt ruling in the Spycatcher case, discussed in Chapter 7.[377] Therefore the disclosure order might have been viewed as disproportionate to the end in view. This was found to be the case in Goodwin in similar circumstances. The significance of the information itself might also have been taken into account in reaching this finding, since it concerned the accountability of a large and very profitable company, engaged, at least to an extent, in funding public and community services. On the Goodwin model the Court of Appeal could have balanced the weightiness of the expression interest against the degree of harm caused. In relation to the expression interest it could have taken account, not only of the significance of protecting sources, but also of the issues of public interest that are raised by the question of the proportion of lottery money that is diverted to community projects, and the like, and the proportion 373 See further Chapter 4, pp 287–90. This depends on the interpretation of the means/end balancing test. If the nature and extent of the interference is examined, it overlaps with the speech/harm balancing test.

374 Hansard (Lords) 13 April 1996 Vol 571, Col 6147, Written Answer.

375 See fn 388 above.

376 [1998] EMLR 1; [1999] QB 124.

377 See above, pp 369–79.

which is straightforward profit. There is clearly an important political dimension to Camelot's activities that might not arise to the same extent in respect of the activities of many private companies. In relation to the question of harm, it could have taken account of the effect of the injunction that was already in place.

Schiemann LJ, with whom the other judges concurred, concentrated, not on the public interest value of the information, but on the speculative harm to Camelot that might arise in future if the employee who had leaked the information, perpetrated further leaks:

> There is no threat now posed to the plaintiffs by further disclosure of the draft accounts. Such threat as there was has been dealt with by injunction or undertaking in relation to that material and the passage of time. There is however a continuing threat of damage of a type which did not feature significantly in the Goodwin case or in the X v Morgan Grampian case . . . Clearly there is unease and suspicion amongst the employees of the company which inhibits good working relationships. Clearly there is a risk that an employee who has proved untrustworthy in one regard may be untrustworthy in a different respect and reveal the name of, say, a public figure who has won a huge lottery prize.[378]

This speculative threat of damage was found to be sufficient to outweigh the interest in protecting sources. On the question of necessity the court found that the interests of Camelot in ensuring the loyalty of its employees and ex-employees should outweigh the public importance attached to the protection of sources. In the present instance, the Court considered that in any event, there was no public interest in protecting the source.[379] The Court of Appeal took the view that in reaching this finding it was applying the same test of necessity as was applied by the European Court of Human Rights in Goodwin.

Clearly, the term 'necessary in the interests of justice' used in s 10 leaves room for varying interpretations. Nevertheless, the determinations as to necessity in Camelot and in Goodwin do not, it is contended, afford equal weight to the role of the media in informing the public. In asking whether the interference in question was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued, the Strasbourg Court in Goodwin unpacked the 'harm' apparently caused, and applied a very high weight to the speech interest. In Camelot the court did not consider the question of proportionality as a distinct aspect of necessity and did not accord a high weight to source protection or look closely at the harm caused by the leak. Further, since the European Court of Human Rights allowed the domestic authorities a margin of appreciation (albeit highly circumscribed) in determining the issue of proportionality in Goodwin, one might have expected an even stricter view of the issue to be taken at the domestic level. It is argued that this threat did not provide a weighty enough basis for finding that the key Goodwin test for proportionality was satisfied, taking account of the strict scrutiny required. Bearing the use of the injunction in mind, it could also have been argued that the de Freitas means/end balancing test was not satisfied. In fact in Goodwin there was the same speculative harm.

378 At p 138.
379 See e.g. p 139 of the judgment.

Greater weight was, however, accorded to the term ‘necessary’ in two further pre-HRA decisions and the balance struck was more in accord with that endorsed in Goodwin. Both concerned apparent leaks from lawyers’ offices. In Saunders v Punch Ltd,[380] in which an injunction had been granted to restrain use of the information in question, it was found that the interests of justice were not so pressing as to require the statutory privilege against disclosure to be overridden. Saunders had been the subject of interviews by the DTI in relation to a criminal prosecution that had eventually been challenged under Art 6 at Strasbourg.[381] No report made by the inspectors to the DTI had been published, but the inspectors’ deliberations had got to that stage at which extracts of their provisional findings had been sent to those persons potentially affected by them, including Mr Saunders. He took legal advice and had a number of meetings with solicitors and leading counsel. An article appeared in Punch magazine that led Mr Saunders to think that confidential material as to communications between him and his solicitors had been leaked and he began proceedings against Punch. An injunction restraining further publication was immediately granted and its continuation until judgment was not resisted by Punch. However, Mr Saunders wanted Punch to be compelled to disclose its source for the information in the article. The article stated that Mr Saunders was expected ‘to fight tooth and nail to prevent publication of the report by DTI inspectors’ and it then raised the question why that should be the case, concluding that Saunders was trying to protect his earning power at the last stages of his career.[382]

The judge, Lindsay J, found that an issue of legal professional confidence arose, but that there was some public interest in knowing why, so many years after the relevant events, no report had been published regarding the DTI prosecutions, a matter that presumptively should be reported upon by a free press. He also took into account the more general public interest against disclosure, as summed up in Goodwin v UK. He found that there was a relatively insubstantial risk of foreseeable future damage and a relative unlikelihood of repetition. The ‘residual threat of damage through dissemination’[383] was much less weighty, he found, than it had been in X Ltd.[384] He found that the great importance of the protection of sources constituted ‘a very substantial counterweight’ and, conducting the balancing act under s 10, he found that relief going beyond that provided by the injunction already granted, in the interests of justice, was not of such preponderating importance as to override the statutory privilege against disclosure. This was a pre-HRA case, but Lindsay J conducted, without using that terminology, the speech/harm balancing act required by the proportionality test from Goodwin.

In John v Express Newspapers,[385] a similar approach was taken by the Court of Appeal. The first four claimants, who included the well-known singer, Elton John, were involved in litigation in which their solicitors, the fifth claimants, had instructed

380 [1998] 1 WLR 986.
381 Saunders v UK (1996) 23 EHRR 313.
382 The article went on: ‘The answer lies in previous unpublished records of meetings between Saunders and his then lawyers in 1996. The documents show that Saunders was worried that the DTI would choose to publish immediately after the verdict from the European Court last October and that his real fear was that this would affect his earning power in the last few years of his business career.’
383 He took the phrase from Goodwin v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 123, 145.
384 [1991] AC 1, discussed above.
385 [2000] 1 WLR 1931; [2000] 3 All ER 257.

counsel to advise them. A copy of counsel's draft advice was leaked to a journalist; the chambers did not institute an internal inquiry into the leak. A source disclosure order was made, but on appeal Lord Woolf, in giving the leading judgment, found that disclosure of a journalist's source might be necessary to protect the interests of justice pursuant to s 10 of the 1981 Act, but that, before the courts would require journalists to break what they regarded as a most important professional obligation to protect a source, the minimum requirement was that other means of identifying that source should be explored; it could not merely be assumed that it would not be possible to identify the culprit. He indicated that the failure of the plaintiffs to take other steps to find out the identity of the source (such as instituting an internal inquiry) was very significant since it affected the assessment of what was 'necessary' in the circumstances. He found that the first instance judge had attached insufficient importance to the failure of counsel's chambers to conduct an inquiry into the leak and too much significance to the threat that that single incident posed to legal confidentiality.

Therefore the claimants had not established that disclosure of the journalist's source was necessary in the interests of justice and, in any event, the judge should have exercised his discretion to refuse disclosure. Lord Woolf laid emphasis on the role of the press in exposing corruption and stressed the importance of protecting sources in order that that role should be fulfilled. These findings clearly refer to aspects of the Goodwin tests for proportionality discussed above.

Thus it may be concluded that these two decisions took some account of such tests, rather than focusing on identifying and stressing the countervailing need to order source disclosure to further the aim in question. However, the different context in these two cases, as compared to that in Camelot appeared to be of relevance. John and Saunders did not concern an employee of a company – someone who might potentially leak confidential information in future. In both instances it appeared probable that the leak would not recur. Thus in both instances the judges seemed to view themselves as free to impose a strict standard of scrutiny: they were not tramelled by the concern to protect a business from an untrustworthy employee – the 'ticking bomb' notion – that exercised the courts so much in X v Morgan-Grampian and in Camelot.

The discussion indicates that although there were signs that a different balance was being struck between the value of protecting of sources and the interests of justice in the immediate pre-HRA period, the domestic approach was still flawed. In deciding whether or not to order disclosure of sources the test of necessity demanded that the Court then had to balance the public interest in confidentiality of sources against that of advancing the cause in question. But the interpretation of the test of 'necessary in the interests of . . .' did not appear to depend sufficiently on differentiation between the concepts of necessity and proportionality, especially in Camelot. The pre-HRA test was not therefore fully in harmony with that under Art 10(2) since the factor of proportionality was not being given full weight. It was also apparent that the test for necessity appeared to differ depending on the exception being invoked, a weaker test operating under the 'national security' exception than under that concerning the 'interests of justice'. This stance has some basis in the Strasbourg jurisprudence under Art 10(2),[386] but it is nevertheless unclear that the readiness with which this weaker test has been satisfied in this context would be acceptable at Strasbourg.

386 See above, p 336, and compare with Chapter 6, p 464.

Post-Human Rights Act jurisprudence

It has been argued that a number of the leading pre-HRA cases – Secretary of State for Defence v Guardian Newspapers, British Steel and Camelot – reveal that a media-friendly stance was not adopted by the judiciary in respect of the step-by-step analytical exercise to be taken in a source disclosure case. Those steps are: first, that jurisdiction must be established; second, that the applicability of one or more of the s 10 exceptions must be determined; and third, that the necessity of ordering disclosure to serve the aim of the exception must be considered. As cases arose under the HRA, bearing in mind the importance accorded at Strasbourg to the protection of sources under Art 10 as a vital part of the media's role, it was reasonable to expect at the least that the reasoning on the question of necessity – the third step – would be affected by a determination to afford a stronger weight to the various media interests at stake[387] by applying the Goodwin test for proportionality under a strict form of scrutiny. It appeared possible that an order to disclose the identity of a source would only be obtained in the most exceptional of circumstances and that Art 10 under the Human Rights Act would satisfy the role that had been assigned by some to s 10 of the 1981 Act, but which it had not fulfilled.

Under the HRA attention was always likely to turn exclusively to the s 10 term 'necessary', which now clearly covered the Art 10 tests of necessity and proportionality. It was in this respect, after Goodwin, that Art 10 of the Convention most clearly demanded a greater protection for sources than had been provided under domestic law. This was partly due to the Strasbourg Court's insistence on the constant, unvarying interest in protecting sources, and partly to the strictness of the standard of scrutiny applicable to the use of the tests for proportionality. The argument that Goodwin established a stricter standard than Morgan Grampian was put forward in Camelot Group plc v Centaur Communications Ltd[388] and rejected by Schiemann LJ; he held that the different result merely reflected the fact that different courts can reach different conclusions while applying the same legal principles to the same facts. However, Sedley LJ commented on this point in the post-HRA decision in Interbrew SA v Financial Times Ltd:[389] 'the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights demonstrate that the freedom of the press has in the past carried greater weight in Strasbourg that it has in the courts of this country'.

But it was already apparent that the strong established domestic traditions governing the approach of the courts ran counter to the Strasbourg jurisprudence. Therefore the possibility of departure from the jurisprudence, while appearing to adhere to it in a superficial or tokenistic fashion, became apparent. The key issue, therefore, in the post-HRA era was whether the interpretation of the term 'necessary' in s 10 would become fully consonant with the Strasbourg view of what is 'necessary in a democratic society' in order to further the aims in question.

In Interbrew SA v Financial Times Ltd[390] the claimant, the company Interbrew, maker of Stella Artois lager, was contemplating a possible takeover bid for another company, S. Interbrew's advisers prepared a presentation which they submitted to the company.

387 See, for example, Feldman, D, in Civil Liberties and Human Rights, 2nd edn, 2002, p 856.
388 [1999] QB 124 (pp 415–16 above) at p 135.
389 [2002] EMLR 24 at para 97.
390 [2002] EMLR 24; [2002] EWCA Civ 274, CA.

Subsequently, an unidentified person obtained a copy of the presentation. The document referred to the intention of Interbrew to launch the bid. Most of the document was genuine, but whoever leaked it also doctored it to include a fabricated offer price and timetable. He or she then sent copies of the doctored version to various news media, including the defendants. The defendants then published articles about the takeover bid. The claimants applied for a Norwich Pharmacal order requiring the defendants to deliver up the copies of the presentation they had received so that there could be an attempt to identify the source. The defendants invoked s 10 of the Contempt of Court Act 1981, but the judge made the order sought. He took the view that the doctored leak had been perpetrated in order to affect S's share price. Since this would, on the face of it, be a criminal act, he considered that it would be in the public interest for Interbrew to be given the documents to try to trace the source. The defendants appealed.

The appeal therefore concerned the scope of the right of a newspaper to refuse to reveal its sources within the bounds of Art 10, applied under ss 3 and 6 HRA. The source had passed on information which he must have known was confidential, and therefore a breach of confidence was made out. Each defendant, by disseminating the leaked information, had innocently lent itself to the source's wrongful purpose. It was found that the jurisdiction recognised in Norwich Pharmacal Co v Customs and Excise Commissioners[391] allowed the Court to make an order requiring the yielding up of the documents. The appellants argued that even if there was jurisdiction to grant the order it should not have been granted, taking into account s 10 of the Contempt of Court Act 1981 and Art 10 ECHR, under the HRA.

The Court began by considering the effect of reading and applying s 10, so far as possible, compatibly with the Convention rights under s 3(1) HRA. Sedley LJ said, on the question of the meaning of the term 'interests of justice' in s 10 of the 1981 Act, that the Court of Appeal in Ashworth[392] (discussed below) had followed the line of authority now accepted as dominant which attributes a broader meaning to the phrase 'the interests of justice' in s 10 of the Contempt of Court Act 1981 than was initially given to it in Secretary of State for Defence v Guardian Newspapers,[393] where Lord Diplock had limited it to the technical interests of the administration of justice in court proceedings. He said: 'By common consent our approach is that of Lord Bridge in X v Morgan-Grampian:[394] the phrase is large enough to include the exercise of legal rights and self-protection from legal wrongs, whether or not by court action.' He further found that the term 'interests of justice' in s 10 means 'interests that are justiciable' and said that he could not envisage any such interest that would not fall within one or more of the catalogue of legitimate aims in Art 10(2). This approach to the first and second steps to be taken in a source disclosure case was the expected and readily predictable one.

The Court went on to consider whether the use of the disclosure order was necessary and proportionate to the aim in view – to protect the interests of justice, and one or more of the Art 10(2) aims. Lord Justice Sedley went on to find that the term 'necessary' within s 10 must mean what is 'necessary in a democratic society' within Art 10(2).

391 [1974] AC 133.
392 [2001] 1 WLR 515 1 All ER 991, CA.
393 [1985] AC 339 at p 350.
394 [1999] 1 AC 1 at p 43.

He found that this meant, ‘to be necessary within what is now the meaning of section 10, disclosure must meet a pressing social need, must be the only practical way of doing so, must be accompanied by safeguards against abuse and must not be such as to destroy the essence of the primary right. He also asked whether the importance of disclosure outweighed the public interest in protecting journalist’s sources. He went on to find that it was clear that a democratic society accepts the need to protect press sources. Therefore it must be possible to identify a strong countervailing ‘pressing social need’ to set on the other side of the scale. The need was, he found, in terms of s 10, to enable Interbrew to restrain by court action any further breach of confidence by the source and possibly to recover damages for losses already sustained. In terms of Art 10(2) it was to protect the rights of Interbrew. No less invasive alternative had to be available – which appeared to be the case. So there were two significant interests on both sides of the scale. On the one hand, then, it was found that there was ‘the legitimacy of Interbrew’s intended resort to law’. On the other there was a constant public interest in the confidentiality of media sources.

The critical factor identified by the court in determining where the balance lay between the two interests was the source’s evident purpose. Sedley LJ found that it was clearly a malevolent one. The public interest in protecting the source of such a leak was not, he considered, sufficient to withstand the countervailing public interest in letting Interbrew seek justice in the courts against the source. Therefore the order of disclosure was upheld, and the House of Lords refused leave to appeal[395] on the ground that the issues had been dealt with in the Ashworth case, below.

As will be contended in more detail below, this judgment did not fully apply the Goodwin speech/harm balancing test. It did not examine the two interests at stake in a sufficiently rigorous fashion. In particular it appeared to give less weight to the unvarying and strong interest in protecting sources than Goodwin did – in a fairly similar situation – although in Goodwin the source did not seem to be activated by malice. As part of the subsequent saga, lawyers for Interbrew immediately wrote to the organisations demanding that the document be handed over. Interbrew went on to ask the High Court to seize the Guardian’s assets for refusing to hand over a copy of the leaked document. However, after an outcry against the company in the media and in government, which might have affected its brand image, Interbrew withdrew its threat to seize the assets. It announced that it had abandoned its legal action against the Guardian and three other media organisations, the Financial Times, The Times, the Independent and Reuters, in the attempt to recover the leaked documents.[396] The newspapers stated that they intended to take the case to the European Court of Human Rights.[397]

The decision attracted adverse comment from a range of sources in the press, from civil libertarians, the House of Commons and abroad.[398] An interesting analogy might 395 On 11 July 2002.

396 On July 26 2002.

397 See the Guardian 12 July 2002.

398 Aidan White, general secretary of the Brussels-based International Federation of Journalists, said that the decision created further intolerable pressure on journalistic ethics from corporate interests. John Wadham, the (then) Director of Liberty, said that the principle of press freedom, ‘a fundamental protection for democracy’, would be substantially eroded if journalists had to disclose their sources.

be drawn between Interbrew's actions in seeking to seize the Guardian's assets and those of the Turkish Government in the Strasbourg case of Ozgur Gundem v Turkey.[399] The Court found in that instance that a search operation at the newspaper's premises, which resulted in newspaper production being disrupted for two days, constituted a serious interference with the applicants' freedom of expression under Art 10. No justification had been provided for the seizure of the newspaper's archives, documentation and library. The Turkish case was concerned with state actions, Interbrew with those of a large corporate body. But arguably media freedom was severely threatened in both instances. Judges in a mature democracy such as that in the UK already recognise the threat posed by the State to that freedom; they appear to be less ready at present to recognise the threat posed by multi-nationals.

In the ruling in Ashworth Hospital Authority v MGN Ltd[400] a somewhat stricter approach was taken, under the HRA, to the interests of the media in protecting sources, although the process of reasoning and the outcome were similar to those in Interbrew. The appeal concerned the right of a newspaper to refuse to reveal its sources. It arose from the publication of an article in the Daily Mirror which included extracts from the medical records of Ian Brady (one of the Moors murderers), a patient at Ashworth Security Hospital ('Ashworth'). He was, at the time of the publication, engaged on a hunger strike which had received a great deal of publicity.[401] In April 2000, Rougier J ordered the defendant, MGN Ltd, the publisher of the Daily Mirror, to make and serve upon the authority a witness statement aimed at identifying the source who had passed on the medical records.[402]

In the course of their appeal against that order, MGN contended that Rougier J had no jurisdiction to grant the order, but that if he did have such jurisdiction, he was not entitled to do so in the circumstances of this case. The Daily Mirror reporter stated that he did not know the identity of the initial source of the information, but that he assumed it to be an employee of Ashworth. However, he accepted that he did know the identity of the intermediary who supplied the material to him. It was also accepted Chris Mullin, chairman of the all-party Commons Home Affairs committee, commented: 'The right to protect sources is a fundamental part of a free press. I am very disappointed that the courts have not recognised this.' Tom Watson, a member of the all-party Commons Home Affairs Select Committee, said: 'This legal action is corporate bullying.' Jeremy Dear, General Secretary of the National Union of Journalists, attacked the decision: 'The idea that a brewer is prepared to send a team of accountants to sequestrate and run a newspaper is one of the biggest threats to press freedom for decades.' See the Guardian website: guardian.co.uk.

399 (2001) 31 EHRR 49. See further pp 446–47, below.

400 [2002] 1 WLR 2033; [2002] 4 All ER 193 HL; [2001] 1 WLR 515 1 All ER 991, CA.

401 On 2 February 2000, Ian Brady obtained permission to apply for judicial review, in order to challenge the continuing decision to force-feed him (see R (Brady) v Ashworth Hospital Authority [2000] Lloyd's Med R 355; (2001) 58 BMLR 173). Maurice Kay J ruled that force-feeding was lawful since it was reasonably administered as part of the medical treatment given for the mental disorder from which Ian Brady was suffering.

402 The statement, to be served within two working days, demanded of the publisher that it: (i) explain how it came to be in the possession or control of any medical records kept by the claimant in respect of Ian Brady whether that possession or control be of originals, copies or extracts; (ii) identify any employee of the claimant and the name of the person or persons (and any address, telephone and fax numbers known for such a person or persons) who were involved in the defendant acquiring possession or control of the said records.

that knowledge of the intermediary would in all probability lead to the identity of the original source. The reporter had previously dealt with the intermediary on the understanding that he would be paid for stories supplied.

It was found by the Court of Appeal (and was not later disputed in the House of Lords), that it was overwhelmingly likely that the source provided the intermediary with a print-out from Ashworth's computer database which was used to record data about patients ('PACIS'). This meant that the source was probably an employee of the authority. The importance of the confidentiality of medical records was emphasised when a new member of staff was engaged at Ashworth and the contract of employment included a confidentiality clause. It was accepted that leaks to the press have a detrimental effect on security, treatment of patients and staff morale for a number of reasons: they may inhibit proper recording of information about patients; may deter patients from providing sensitive information about themselves; may damage the patient-doctor relationship, which rests on trust; may lead to assaults by patients on a patient about whom information is disclosed; may create an atmosphere of distrust amongst staff, which is detrimental to efficient and co-operative work; and they may give rise to fear of future leaks.

The Court of Appeal found that the jurisdiction to order the disclosure of the identity of a wrongdoer did not have to be confined to cases involving tort but should be of general application. The Court considered the approach that should be taken to s 10, taking into account the requirements of the HRA. It considered that there is no difference in principle between English law and Art 10,[403] and that in interpreting s 10 the Court should, where possible, (a) equate the specific purposes for which disclosure of the source was permitted under s 10 with 'legitimate aims' under Art 10 of the Convention, and (b) apply the same test of necessity as that applied by the European Court. Applying that test to the instant case, it was found that in general the disclosure of confidential medical records to the press was misconduct which was contrary to the public interest. The exceptional circumstances making this argument more compelling were stressed: it was said that there is a very clear need to protect patient confidentiality, especially the confidentiality of medical records, which should be safeguarded in any democratic society and, further, in this case it was considered that there was a risk of further leaks. So the Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal and disclosure was ordered.

When MGN appealed, it argued in the House of Lords that the order should not have been granted, taking account of s 10 of the 1981 Act and Art 10. The House of Lords found that both s 10 and Art 10 have a common purpose in seeking to enhance the freedom of the press by protecting journalistic sources. They relied on the approach of the European Court of Human Rights as to the role of Art 10 as set out by the 403 It found that two views had been expressed in the House of Lords as to the meaning of the expression 'interests of justice'. As discussed above, in Defence Secretary v Guardian Newspapers [1985] AC 339 at 350 Lord Diplock had sought to confine the exception to the administration of justice in the course of existing court proceedings. But in X Ltd v Morgan Grampian [1991] 1 AC 1 at 43 Lord Bridge had found that this interpretation was too narrow and that the exception included facilitating the exercise of legal rights even where resort to legal proceedings was not occurring, and whether or not it would need to do so. The Court of Appeal favoured Lord Bridge's much broader approach.

Court in Goodwin v United Kingdom,[404] and in particular on these phrases from the judgment:

> Protection of journalistic sources is one of the basic conditions for press freedom. . .. source disclosure cannot be compatible with article 10 of the Convention unless it is justified by an overriding requirement in the public interest.[405]

It was accepted that the same approach should be applied equally to s 10 since Art 10 is part of domestic law under the Human Rights Act. It had to be determined whether it was a necessary precondition of the exercise of the jurisdiction to make an order of disclosure that the applicant (Ashworth) should have begun, or had an intention to begin, legal proceedings in respect of the allegedly wrongful act against the source. The Lords relied on the speeches in British Steel Corp v Granada Television Ltd[406] and in particular on the judgments of Lord Denning MR,[407] and of Templeman LJ,[408] in the Court of Appeal in finding that this was unnecessary. Lord Woolf confirmed that the approach of Lord Bridge in Morgan Grampian was the correct one.[409] In other words, it was confirmed that s 10 allows for the making of orders in the interests of justice, and such interests are widely defined – they are not confined to the administration of justice within legal proceedings and it is not necessary that such proceedings should be brought. This was, clearly, a crucial finding, demonstrating that, despite the effect of the HRA and Art 10, the Lords were determined to keep open the possibility of seeking source disclosure orders in a very wide range of circumstances.

The Lords considered whether the use of the disclosure order was necessary and proportionate to the aim in view – to protect the interests of justice, under s10 and Art 10. On the interpretation of the term 'necessary in the interests of justice', Lord Woolf said:

> Construing the phrase 'in the interests of justice' in [the sense determined upon] immediately emphasises the importance of the balancing exercise. It will not be sufficient, per se, for a party seeking disclosure of a source protected by section 10 to show merely that he will be unable without disclosure to exercise the legal right or avert the threatened legal wrong on which he bases his claim in order to establish the necessity of disclosure. The judge's task will always be to weigh in the scales the importance of enabling the ends of justice to be attained in the circumstances of the particular case on the one hand against the importance of protecting the source on the other hand. In this balancing exercise it is only if the judge is satisfied that disclosure in the interests of justice is of such preponderating importance as to override the statutory privilege against disclosure that the threshold of necessity will be reached.[410]

404 (1996) 22 EHRR 123.
405 At para 39.
406 [1981] AC 1096.
407 At p 1127.
408 At p 1132.
409 At para 39.
410 At para 39.

The hospital had to establish 'an overriding public interest, amounting to a pressing social need, to which the need to keep press sources confidential should give way' since, as Laws LJ had pointed out in the Court of Appeal,

> . . . the public interest in the non-disclosure of press sources is constant, whatever the merits of the particular publication and the particular source. It is in no way lessened and certainly not abrogated, simply because the case is one in which the information actually disclosed is of no legitimate, objective public interest.[411]

Lord Woolf found that any restriction on the otherwise unqualified right to freedom of expression must meet the requirements under Art 10(2) of answering to a 'pressing social need' and also the restriction should be proportionate to a legitimate aim which is being pursued.[412] In this instance, it was found, an overriding public interest could be identified, as Lord Woolf determined:

> The situation here is exceptional, as it was in Financial Times Ltd v Interbrew SA and as it has to be, if disclosure of sources is to be justified. The care of patients at Ashworth is fraught with difficulty and danger. The disclosure of the patients' records increases that difficulty and danger and to deter the same or similar wrongdoing in the future it was essential that the source should be identified and punished. This was what made the orders to disclose necessary and proportionate and justified. The fact that Ian Brady had himself disclosed his medical history did not detract from the need to prevent staff from revealing medical records of patients.

Lord Woolf also referred to the approach of the European Court to medical records in relation to Art 8 in Z v Finland.[413] The Court had found that:

> . . . the protection of personal data, not least medical data, is of fundamental importance to a person's enjoyment of his or her right to respect for private and family life as guaranteed by Article 8 of the Convention. Respecting the confidentiality of health data is a vital principle in the legal systems of all the contracting parties to the Convention. The domestic law must therefore afford appropriate safeguards to prevent any such communication or disclosure of personal health data as may be inconsistent with the guarantees in Article 8 of the Convention.

Taking account of the significance of preserving the confidentiality of health data, Lord Woolf went on to dismiss the appeal. He did not examine the question of proportionality in detail, but appeared to assume impliedly that since there was such a pressing need to protect medical records in the instant case, the measure in question was proportionate to the aim pursued. Thus he did not engage in a full application of the Goodwin proportionality tests under a strict level of scrutiny.

411 At para 101.
412 At para 62.
413 (1998) 25 EHRR 371 at paras 94 and 95.

The other Law Lords agreed with his findings. Therefore the order of disclosure was upheld. The test of necessity from Ashworth may be taken to have superseded the test from Interbrew in so far as the two decisions differ on this point. The Lords, however, appeared to take the view that they do not differ significantly since they refused leave to appeal in the Interbrew case. The nature of the current domestic tests for proportionality and its consonance with the Strasbourg tests is considered further below.

Ackroyd v Mersey Care NHS Trust[414] arose as a result of the findings in the Ashworth case. MGN proceeded to disclose the identity of the intermediary through whom it had obtained the notes – Ackroyd. He was an investigative journalist who had been involved in previous investigations into mismanagement at the hospital; he therefore had an established and lengthy interest in it. Some of Mr Ackroyd's revelations about failings at the hospital had previously led to the Fallon Inquiry which produced the Fallon Report.[415] The conclusion of the Report had been that Ashworth should close due to poor management. In evidence Ackroyd said that over the years he had developed contacts with a number of sources at the hospital and that in the instance in question in Ashworth he had not paid the source for the notes. The claimant, Ashworth, brought proceedings against the defendant, Ackroyd, seeking an order for disclosure of his source. He resisted, relying first on an argument that the Norwich Pharmacal jurisdiction was not applicable. He argued that the source would have had a public interest defence to a claim by the hospital for breach of confidence or contract and that therefore he was not mixed up' in wrong-doing by the source since there was no wrong-doer.

He also relied on s 10. Ashworth argued that Mr Ackroyd's position was indistinguishable from that of The Mirror in the MGN case and that the decision of the House of Lords had concluded the issue. Ackroyd argued that the facts relevant to an application for an order for disclosure against him were materially different from those advanced by The Mirror in the MGN case. The judge took the view that the issues had been settled by the MGN case, and made the order of disclosure sought. The view was taken that the expressed purpose of the order made in the MGN case would be subverted if Mr Ackroyd were to succeed in keeping his source anonymous on the basis that the judgments in that case, to which Mr Ackroyd was not a party,were determinative of his defence also.

Ackroyd appealed, contending as his ground of appeal that the judge had been wrong to find that he had no real prospect of successfully resisting the claim that he should be ordered to disclose the source of the clinical notes. He put forward an argument based on the public interest in the disclosures, which went both to establishing that there was no jurisdiction to make the disclosure order and to the s 10 contentions. In support of this argument he said in evidence that he had been approached by sources at Ashworth and provided with information, including the PACIS notes covering Brady's first month on hunger strike. He had promised not to reveal the identity of the sources.

The sources were not, Ackroyd said, motivated by monetary gain; he had made no payment to them; their purpose in providing him with information was: 'to enable the public disclosure of the way in which Mr Brady had been treated, which, consistent with the findings of the Fallon Report in other matters, had not been disclosed by

414 [2003] EMLR 820.

415 The Report of Committee of Inquiry in to the Personality Disorder Unit at Ashworth Special Hospital (1999).

Ashworth'.[416] Thus, according to Ackroyd, the sources were acting in the public interest since they were exposing various serious flaws in the running of the hospital. In particular, they had revealed that the treatment of Brady was improper. Ackroyd had relied on a number of confidential journalistic sources in order to help him expose incompetence at the hospital and to subject the institution to public scrutiny. The Fallon Report had revealed that there was a history of secrecy and non-disclosure of reports at the hospital. Therefore exposure of improper practices at the hospital might not have occurred had sources not made revelations to Mr Ackroyd. He further argued that in any event the hospital had failed to establish an overriding public interest in disclosure of the identity of the source, making it necessary for that identity to be revealed in the interests of justice under s 10, and Art 10, HRA.

The Court of Appeal found that that it was not necessary to reach any conclusion as to whether Ackroyd might be able to establish, on the facts presented, that the source who provided the clinical notes to him might have had a public interest defence to a claim by the hospital for breach of confidence or contract. The Court accepted that, if this were established, a Norwich Pharmacal claim would not have been available for want of a 'wrongdoer', but also accepted that if the defence was not established the source had clearly acted in breach of confidence and in breach of contract.[417] The Court went on to find that if its inquiry was confined to disclosure of the clinical notes alone, a public interest defence might be difficult to sustain. However, it did not decide that question since it found that the 'separate public interest defence', depending on s 10 and Art 10 encompassed the same facts and considerations and provided 'a more promising defence'. It was clearly found that a failure to establish that the source had a public interest defence would not have meant, automatically, that the hospital would be able to establish that their public interest in disclosure was sufficient to override Mr Ackroyd's public interest in maintaining the confidentiality of his source. The difference between the two arguments was indicated in the findings of the Court in relation to the effect of Art 10 on the protection of sources.

The Court relied on the statement of principle in the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in Goodwin[418] – re-stated in the Ashworth v MGN case – that protection of journalistic sources is one of the basic conditions of press freedom, and since an order of source disclosure undermines the exercise of that freedom, such a measure cannot be compatible with Art 10 unless it is justified by an overriding requirement in the public interest.[419] The Court found that it might be hard to identify a particular public interest in the disclosure of Brady's clinical notes in the context in which they were disclosed and looked at alone since Brady had himself already published the details that they contained. Further, it was found that the notes did not contain matter giving rise to legitimate criticism of the hospital. The argument had been advanced, relying on the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Fressoz and Roire v France,[420] that the notes provided 'much needed corroboration of 416 At para 36.

417 The Court noted that Lord Woolf had said, in paras 32–34 of his Opinion in the MGN case, that Lord Phillips was almost certainly correct in coming to this conclusion.

418 At p 143, para 39.

419 At para 66 of the Ackroyd judgment.

420 Fressoz and Roire v France (2001) 31 EHRR 2, para 55.

what would otherwise be Brady's own bald and unconvincing narrative'. This argument was rejected, partly on the basis that the Mirror article did not use the notes for that purpose. However, this argument was found in any event to be redundant since, relying on Goodwin, it was clear that Ackroyd did not have to establish an overriding public interest in his source's disclosure of the clinical notes. On the contrary, the hospital had to establish 'an overriding public interest, amounting to a pressing social need, to which the need to keep press sources confidential should give way', since it was clear, relying on Laws LJ's comments in the MGN case, that the public interest in the non-disclosure of press sources was established and unvarying.[421]

This was found to be the basis for accepting that Ackroyd could argue plausibly that his case differed from the MGN one. The Court went on to consider the differences between the two cases and the factors that might be capable of swinging the balance from the preservation of confidentiality in patient records, to preserving the anonymity of sources in order to further the ends of journalism. In so doing the Court did in fact identify a public interest other than that of protecting sources, despite its earlier remarks on the point. The factors identified included: the unhappy history at the hospital which did not feature prominently in the MGN case, but was very significant in Ackroyd's; Ackroyd's arguable entitlement to enlarge the ambit of his defence to encompass other sources on the basis of the chilling effect of a requirement to disclose one source that might extend to other sources whom the hospital was not seeking to have identified; the fact that Mr Ackroyd's sources received no payment. The Court also noted that Ackroyd might be entitled to argue that, in the different circumstances of his case, the finding of the need for disclosure of his source in order to deter other breaches of confidence ought to be re-considered.

The Court concluded that Mr Ackroyd had established a sufficient case to entitle him to a trial since the focus of his defence was significantly different factually from that of MGN. Therefore the decision in that case should not have been regarded as summarily determinative of his case under the Civil Procedure Rules.[422] An order for source disclosure would only be compatible with Art 10 of the Convention if justified by an overriding requirement in the public interest. There was a clear public interest in preserving the confidentiality of medical records but that alone could not be regarded as an automatically overriding requirement without examining the facts of a particular case. It would only be in exceptional circumstances that a journalist could be ordered to disclose the identity of his source without the facts of his case being fully examined. The nature of the subject-matter was therefore found to indicate that there should be a trial in most cases.

421 At para 67 of the judgment.

422 For the purposes of Pt 24 of the Civil Procedure Rules (CPR). It was also found that he was entitled to point to Pt 24.2(b) CPR to the effect that there was another compelling reason why the case should be disposed of at a trial. Part 24 CPR provides: 'The court may give summary judgment against a claimant or defendant on the whole of a claim or on a particular issue if – (a) it considers that (i) the claimant has no real prospect of succeeding on the claim or issue; or (ii) that the defendant has no real prospect of successfully defending the claim or issue; and (b) there is no other compelling reason why the case or issue should be disposed of at a trial.' This conclusion of the Court was reached without according the CPR itself a Convention-friendly interpretation under s 3(1) HRA, but that would have been a possibility.

Flaws in the post-HRA judicial reasoning

The discussion above reveals that post-HRA a stance unsympathetic to the media's watchdog role was still found in relation to the first two steps in a source disclosure case – those of finding jurisdiction and applying one or more of the s 10 exceptions. The discussion of the findings in the leading post-HRA decision in Ashworth makes this clear. The key post-HRA change occurred in the third step – the determination as to the test of necessity – due to the influence of Art 10 under the HRA, a change that was prefigured in John v Express Newspapers and in Saunders v Punch. In relation to the first two steps the judges have always taken and continue to take an approach that enhances the chances of ordering disclosure.

The decisions discussed concerned two very different interests which were opposed to the public interest in media freedom and the protection of sources. In Ashworth (and in Ackroyd) there was a risk of further leaks and the source had revealed confidential medical records. A number of reasons for preserving the confidentiality of such records, especially in a hospital treating dangerous patients, were taken into account. In Interbrew, on the other hand, the decision protected a company's interest in bringing a legal action against a person who had leaked confidential information (although the institution of the action was not essential to the obtaining of the order – a very important point, discussed further below). The decisions in Interbrew and in Ashworth took account of the effect of the HRA and the courts considered that the outcomes were consistent with the demands of Art 10 of the Convention, as interpreted in Goodwin.[423]

Nevertheless, the decisions clearly do not offer reassurance to sources who are uncertain whether to come forward. It could be argued that the source in the Interbrew case came forward for his or her own (arguably improper) motives and was hardly in the position of the source who is activated by conscience in seeking to reveal wrongdoing but is afraid of the repercussions. But potential sources are unlikely to understand the nuances of the decisions, but may merely receive the message that the protection for their anonymity is in jeopardy. It might appear in general that the courts are overzealously protecting the right of institutions or companies to bring actions against employees and others. Their tendency to envisage the potential harm that could be done to companies in clear and concrete terms remains very apparent, although they now also afford at least some degree of recognition to the interest in source protection. Although it is understandable that the courts would want to protect the right to bring an action where there is a legitimate grievance, the net result may be that companies are aided in seeking to maintain effective cover-ups.

In Ashworth, wrongdoing was not perceived as being revealed. It appears that unless it is revealed, freedom of expression may be at risk of being outweighed by varying 423 The demands of Art 10 in relation to source protection are a matter of interpretation and do not arise from the wording of para 2 itself, so they could have been departed from since under s 2 HRA the jurisprudence itself is not binding; it is the rights themselves which must be adhered to if at all possible under s 3(1), not the jurisprudence. Thus the leeway that existed to allow departure from the Strasbourg standard in the pre-HRA era, still existed post-HRA. Nevertheless, the judges, post-HRA, stated, possibly disingenuously, that they were following Goodwin rather than refusing to treat the case as binding, despite the established tendency within the pre-HRA domestic jurisprudence to afford less weight to source protection than that afforded at Strasbourg.

public interests in disclosure of the identity of the source, despite the unvarying nature of the interest in protecting sources. The findings in Ashworth and in Interbrew stand in contrast to each other, to an extent. In Ashworth, now the leading decision, the importance of protecting sources was recognised in the test laid down for determining the 'necessity' of ordering disclosure. If the protection of sources is regarded as an inherent and constant public interest, the other party is forced into the position of seeking to establish very weighty reasons for displacing that interest. Thus the judgment of the court has to focus on the particulars of that other party's claim. This was a significant departure from Interbrew, since in that instance the focus of the decision was on the source's culpability rather than on identifying a clear public interest in disclosure of his or her identity. In Ackroyd the test from Ashworth was applied, resulting in the finding that the need to preserve patient confidentiality could not represent an automatic justification for ordering disclosure: it would be necessary to consider the facts in any particular instance.

The House of Lords in Ashworth purported to do what the European Court did in Goodwin, but, it is argued, mis-weighed both the harm done to the privacy interest and the value of the speech. The Lords took the view that the protection of sources is in itself a highly significant public interest, regardless of the specifics of the case in question and the objective value of the information disclosed. That finding, relying on Goodwin, was clearly correct. But the point was not made clearly enough that the converse finding does not apply. In other words, where the information is of value in public interest terms it should weigh in the calculus as another weighty factor in favour of non-disclosure of the source, meaning that the other party would have to provide reasons of an exceptionally weighty nature pointing in the direction of disclosure. This point is of relevance to the key Goodwin proportionality test – weighing up the seriousness of the interference with speech against the importance of the aim that the plaintiff is seeking to pursue and the harm done to that interest. The seriousness can be judged in terms of its extent or its nature, or both. In this instance both aspects were at stake. In terms of nature the interference was serious for the reasons indicated: two weighty speech-based arguments went in favour of non-disclosure of the source's identity – the general interest in protecting sources, affirmed in Goodwin, and the public interest value of the information. In terms of extent, the interference was also serious (the third de Freitas test) since, unlike an injunction, which can be tailored to a particular situation, a source disclosure order is an all-or-nothing measure. The consequences for the source would have been very serious, and other sources at the hospital would have been deterred from coming forward. Thus it is arguable that, on strict scrutiny, this test would not have been found to be satisfied in Ashworth, meaning that the infringement of Art 10 would not have been viewed as justified.

This analysis is now, however, complicated where another Convention Article – usually Art 8 – can be invoked as part of the justification for source disclosure. This was the case in Ashworth, as the House of Lords impliedly indicated in its references to Z v Finland. The term 'parallel analysis' was not used, but after the House of Lords' decisions in Campbell[424] and in re S,[425] it is now clear that this is the proper means of 424 [2004] 2 WLR 1232; see Chapter 9, pp 975–76 for further discussion of the decision.

425 [2005] 1 AC 593; [2004] UKHL 47. See Chapter 9, pp 958–59 for further discussion of the decision.

weighing up two Convention Articles against each other,[426] except in certain narowly defined (and anomalous) exceptional circumstances.[427] In fact, prior to Ashworth, it had already been found in Douglas v Hello![428] that this was the proper method of proceeding where an apparent clash of rights arose. It might be thought at first sight that where another Convention right is engaged the standard of scrutiny from Goodwin is not applicable since Goodwin was not a clashing rights case, but a case in which an exception based on a societal concern had to be narrowly construed. At Strasbourg a wide margin of appreciation tends to be afforded in the case of clashing rights and therefore the standard of scrutiny is less strict.[429] However, as argued in Chapter 9, this is not and should not be the approach taken at the domestic level.[430] There are a number of reasons why the approaches at the domestic and the international levels inevitably differ. The most valuable precedent for future source disclosure cases involving a clash of rights is that of the House of Lords in Campbell in which in a different context, but where Arts 8 and 10 were both engaged, a strict standard of scrutiny was adopted.[431] The precedent of Von Hannover[432] could also be taken into account, in which, unusually, Strasbourg did not concede a wide margin of appreciation in a case of a collision between Arts 8 and 10.

Had the parallel analysis been fully conducted in Ashworth, as arguably it should have been, it would have reached the stage of balancing the underlying values of both Arts 8 and 10 against each other. It would have been necessary to examine the restriction each Article proposed to lay on the other and to ask which right would suffer the greater harm if the other prevailed. The question whether the invasion of Art 10 (via the source disclosure order) went further than necessary to protect the Art 8 right at stake should have been asked.

On the other side, the interference with the Art 8 rights of Brady as a patient was serious: the preservation of the confidentiality of medical records is itself recognised at Strasbourg as an unvarying and consistent public interest.[433] But in terms of this particular context the interference was of a less serious nature. The history of mal-management at the hospital was not viewed as relevant in Ashworth for various reasons. In fact it was highly relevant in relation to the weightiness of the patient confidentiality claim and the claim for non-disclosure of the source. It was relevant to the former claim due to the particular context in question in which the key argument for preserving patient confidentiality was put forward. It could readily be argued that where patients themselves have deliberately breached their own confidentiality in order to serve a more pressing cause – to reveal the abuses suffered by patients at the hospital – that creates a particular focus from which to view the interest in preserving confidentiality. In the 426 See Chapter 9, pp 950–81 for a full discussion of the use of the 'parallel analysis'.

427 See Chapter 9, pp 864–65, 972–74 for further discussion. It is possible that eventually the courts may decide that there are no exceptional circumstances – there are merely instances in which the speech in question is especially valuable since it relates to the open justice principle (but see pp 972–74).
428 [2001] QB 967. See Chapter 9, pp 904–5 for further discussion of the decision.
429 See Chapter 9, pp 943–48 for discussion.
430 See Chapter 9, pp 956–57 for discussion.
431 See Chapter 9, pp 975–77 for discussion.
432 (2004) Appl No 59320/00, judgment of 24 June 2004; see in particular paras 63, 64, 65, 66.
433 See Plon Société v France No. 58148/00.

instance in question two patients, including Brady himself, had breached confidentiality with that end in view. In general, in terms of the experience of being in a secure hospital and in terms of treatment, patients are likely to view the interest in confidentiality as outweighed by the interest in preventing the suffering and humiliation of patients due to maltreatment. In the hierarchy of interests relating to the hospital experience, the prevention of maltreatment – by exposing it – looms higher than the preservation of confidentiality.

It must be re-emphasised that this argument is being applied to the value of preserving patient confidentiality in a highly context-sensitive fashion, and on the basis, endorsed by Goodwin, of an intense scrutiny. It is undoubted that there is general value in enabling persons to be reassured that their medical records will remain confidential, and the Lords were clearly right to refer to that value. It has since been endorsed by the European Court of Human Rights in Plon (Société) v France[434] as an interest that can win out even when opposed by the countervailing interest in political speech. But while the Lords were right to place weight on the general value of preserving patient confidentiality, they failed to examine the very particular context in question which, it is argued, undermined that value as an individual right, or countered it. Thus, the general societal interest in preserving medical confidentiality remained of significance, but the interference with Brady's Art 8 right was of less significance than it would have been in a different context. The value of the parallel analysis and of concentration on the speech/harm balancing test from Goodwin is precisely that this method teases out the values genuinely at stake.

In the context of maltreatment, then, the preservation of patient confidentiality, generally of very high importance, may be viewed as a near-meaningless abstraction divorced from the idea of serving any worthwhile purpose. Indeed, it came close to being used in Ashworth in a perversion of its original purpose. Preservation of patient confidentiality is rooted in ideas about the intimacy of details of medical treatment – in itself linked to notions of humiliation and embarrassment. If that treatment itself directly causes humiliation – as was alleged in abundance in relation to Ashworth Hospital – then the underlying basis for maintaining confidentiality is undermined. Although it was true that the Mirror article in question did not directly concern mal-management at Ashworth, disclosure of the identity of the source was clearly likely to aid in the continuing attempt of the Ashworth management to cover up the failings there, documented in the Fallon Report. Thus the ruling preserved patient confidentiality in a technical or formal sense without succeeding in examining the real value of that confidentiality in the circumstances. Lord Woolf relied on Z v Finland in relation to the value of confidentiality of medical records encapsulated in Art 8. But he failed to take account of other competing values underlying Art 8, including the preservation of dignity and privacy of patients in hospitals such as Ashworth, or the general interest in the prevention of harm to patients, which would have pointed in the direction of protecting the source in order to aid in uncovering abuses of power in the hospital. However, there are precedents in a different context for weighing up such competing values.

434 No. 58148/00, 18 May 2004.

In a series of cases the courts have recognised that the public interest in protecting patients, or potential patients, from harm outweighs the interest in maintaining the confidentiality of medical records.[435] In re A (Disclosure of Medical Records to the GMC),[436] it was found that production of medical records could be justified on the ground of protecting persons from possible medical misconduct, even where the risk of such conduct is not established. Similarly, in A Health Authority v X,[437] at first instance, it was found that there was a public interest in the disclosure of health care records in order to aid in an investigation into a certain GP. Serious allegations had been made of misconduct and unsatisfactory standards of care, although these had not been substantiated. Further, in Woolgar v Chief Constable of Sussex[438] a patient in a nurse's care had died in suspicious circumstances. Disclosure of the medical records was authorised for disciplinary purposes to the United Kingdom Central Council for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting on the basis of the general public interest of the proper regulation of the nursing profession in the interests of those receiving nursing care.

It was essential in Ashworth to identify the relevant Art 8 values at stake, under a strict level of scrutiny, in order to determine the seriousness of the interference, weighing it against the importance of the speech, without affording either value presumptive priority. In this instance, although interference with patient confidentiality had occurred, the more significant value at stake was that of the humiliation and indignity suffered by patients at the hospital, especially Brady. Publicity aided in addressing that matter and thus affected both aspects of the speech/privacy balancing analysis. The more significant privacy interest – the humiliation suffered by patients, which sought publicity – overcame, it is argued, the interest in confidentiality. Therefore the interference with the right to respect for private life – the disclosure of the notes to the newspaper – was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued, that of preserving the Art 10 rights of the newspaper (under the Art 8(2) 'rights of others' exception). No breach of Art 8 occurred on this analysis.

In terms of the second half of the parallel analysis, conducted under Art 10(2), it is clear that under a strict scrutiny a very serious interference with speech rights occurred which was not justified by the aim pursued – the Art 8 rights of others. The discussion reveals that the unhappy history of the hospital was relevant to the claim for non-disclosure of the identity of the source in Ashworth on a basis other than that of the general interest in protecting sources: thus there was a heightened interest in non-disclosure. That interest arose in the context of a matter of grave public interest – a context that the House of Lords was aware of but chose not to place weight on. The fact that in the instance in question the revelations arguably did not add much of significance to discussions of the situation at Ashworth was not the end of the matter. Any order of disclosure was bound to have some broad stifling effect in a number of respects in relation to a matter of grave public interest. In other words, their Lordships 435 This has also been recognised legislatively: the Data Protection (Processing of Sensitive Personal Data) Order 2000 (SI 2000/417), Sched para 2, allows disclosure for regulatory purposes if in the public interest.

436 [1998] 2 FLR 641, p 644.

437 X [2001] 2 FLR 673, p 677.

438 [1999] 3 All ER 604 at p 615.

should have looked beyond the specifics of the revelations in question, to that general effect in such a significant context. Had these factors been taken into account, and then weighed up in the calculus of proportionality, under the speech/harm balancing test, it is argued that the decision would have gone the other way since the doubly strong public interest on the side of non-disclosure would have outweighed the relatively weak public interest – in the particular context – of preserving patient confidentiality. The values enshrined in Art 3 could also have been taken into account in the balancing act since the disclosures were relevant to the use of degrading treatment.[439] Revelations leading to the uncovering of Art 3 treatment should surely be afforded a high value in speech terms.

Despite purporting to take account of Art 10, and in particular of the test of necessity, the House of Lords' decision fell into the trap, typical of British judicial reasoning, of assuming a narrow and technical basis, divorced from the realities of the context in question. Further, in terms of the third limb of the de Freitas test, it may be argued that the source disclosure order went further than was needed to serve the end of preserving the value of confidentiality since an action for breach of confidence was available against the newspaper (although it might have failed on public interest grounds), and consequently the interference was disproportionate to the end pursued. Therefore it should have been found that a breach of Art 10, but not of Art 8, would occur if the source disclosure order was upheld.

In following Ashworth, Ackroyd dealt more fully with the proportionality aspects of the instance before it, although the parallel analysis was not conducted. The decision focused on the lack of payment to the source and the chilling effect on other sources at the hospital if disclosure was ordered. If the interest in protecting sources is viewed as constant, those are significant factors in terms of heightening that interest. The unhappy history of mismanagement and abuse of power at the hospital was considered in relation to the nature of the interference, but it should have been taken into account both in relation to the preservation of confidentiality and in respect of the claim for non-disclosure of the source, as argued above. In other words, it potentially affected both sides of the speech/harm equation, diminishing the importance of the aim pursued (medical confidentiality) and enhancing the significance of the interference with freedom of expression. Following this argument, Ackroyd reached the right result.

If the more complete version of the doctrine of proportionality argued for here – speech/harm balancing - had been applied to the facts of Interbrew, there is a strong argument that a breach of Art 10 would have been found. In Interbrew any weighing up of Arts 10 and 8 against each other would have had to concern the 'privacy' of a company. Although companies may have certain rights to private life and to protection for correspondence,[440] that argument has been accepted at Strasbourg only in relation to search and seizure of material from a company's premises.[441] It is unlikely that disclosure of information relating to a company could be viewed as 'private" information'. Revelations as to share prices and the like are prima facie of a public character: Article 8 would be found to be unengaged or only peripherally engaged in such an instance. In Interbrew then it may be argued that the Art 10 claim did not have to be balanced by a strong – or any – Art 8 claim. So the case was arguably correctly viewed as one in which Art 10 had presumptive priority, subject to exceptions to be narrowly construed.

439 For example, Brady was quite seriously injured in the course of subjecting him to force-feeding, and a child was allowed unsupervised visits in the hospital and was subjected to sexual abuse on a number of occasions. Article 3 provides 'No-one shall be subjected to torture or inhuman or degrading treatment.'

440 See R v Broadcasting Standards Commission ex p BBC [2000] 3 WLR 1327 (concerning the privacy of the company Dixons). The decision is discussed further in Chapter 9, pp 849–50.

Since another Convention right was not at stake, or barely at stake, the parallel analysis was not applicable and the interests of Interbrew were rightly viewed by Sedley LJ as protected only by Art 10(2) exceptions to be narrowly construed. The exception in question appeared to be that of 'the rights of others'. In this context, the case of Chassagnou v France[442] is of relevance. The Court said in that case that when dealing with 'rights of others' that are not themselves competing Convention rights, 'only indisputable imperatives can justify interference with enjoyment of a Convention right.' Chassagnou was not referred to in Interbrew, but it might be asked whether Interbrew's interest in bringing a legal action was an indisputable imperative. In any event, the public interest involved in requiring source disclosure was clearly less significant than that in Ashworth since an individual Convention right was not involved, and therefore the case for allowing it to outweigh the interest in protecting the confidentiality of media sources was less strong. Following Goodwin, that is a strong and unvarying interest; it would have had to be outweighed by a very compelling countervailing interest if it was to be overcome; on the facts that did not appear to be the case.

Clearly, aside from the interest in source protection, the speech in Interbrew was not of high value since it appeared to be intended to be misleading; therefore it ran counter to the truth-based rationale. (In making this point it must be borne in mind that although it is possible or even probable that the source had behaved reprehensibly and from reprehensible motives, his or her motives could not be known since (obviously) he or she could not come to court to answer accusations.) In this respect the speech differed from that at issue in Ashworth which was of a higher value in terms of all the speech-based rationales. But that factor did not detract from the general significance of protecting sources.

Lord Justice Sedley relied partly on a test akin to means/end balancing in conducting the proportionality analysis. But such a test does not provide a sufficiently effective or nuanced mechanism for weighing up the value of the speech in relation to the harm caused. Moreover, in applying this test he did not take account of the possibility that an injunction on grounds of breach of confidence could have been obtained against the newspapers banning publication of similar material from the same source. If other

441 In Société Colas Est v France (2002) Application no. 37971/97 at para 41 the Court found: 'the time has come to hold that in certain circumstances the rights guaranteed by Article 8 of the Convention may be construed as including the right to respect for a company's registered office, branches or other business premises . . .'. However, the protection at present extends only to physical searches of the company's premises; it would not appear to cover information relating to it or held by it (although obviously the company personnel would have individual Art 8 rights to their own private information held in the company's files).

442 (2000) 29 EHRR 615.

newspapers had then published such material they would have faced liability under the doctrine of common law contempt.[443] Clearly, an injunction would not have covered the doctored part of the document published by the newspapers, but it is argued that no source disclosure order should have been made in relation to that part in any event since the Norwich Pharmacal jurisdiction was not available in relation to it (this point is discussed further below).

Sedley LJ purported to use the Goodwin speech/harm balancing test, but when it came to weighing up the two interests against each other he allowed the apparently malevolent attitude of the source to undermine the interest in protecting sources, despite accepting at an earlier point in the judgment that that interest should be viewed as constant. If that interest had been viewed as constant it is argued that it would have outweighed the interest of Interbrew in resorting to law since source disclosure cases inevitably involve a desire to seek legal redress: thus there was no especially pressing need in this instance to aid Interbrew in seeking such redress. He said on this point: ‘the relatively modest leak of which they are entitled to complain does not diminish the prospective seriousness for them of its repetition’.[444] This point could also have been made in Goodwin; it was highly speculative, and relied only on a possibility of future harm. It is suggested that this nebulous possibility of harm should not have been allowed to outweigh the constant interest in protecting sources. Had the Goodwin test been properly applied at this crucial point in the analysis, it is argued that a different outcome would have been reached.

The Interbrew decision is likely to deter those who have, prima facie, purer motives for leaking information – to expose malpractice in a powerful corporate player. Arguably, if the Goodwin speech/harm balancing test is applied, it is clear that the impact of such deterrence was not given sufficient weight when balanced against the interest of the company in the right to pursue an action for breach of confidence. Moreover, the other possible sanctions which could be brought to bear in relation to this (arguably successful) attempt to ‘rig’ the market by the Financial Services Authority (FSA) could have been taken into account and afforded greater weight in the reasoning on proportionality in relation to the ‘least intrusive means’ inquiry. In other words, in so far as wrong-doing had occurred, another means of redress was potentially available which was likely to deter many persons from seeking to promulgate financial misinformation. The interests of Interbrew were not therefore without protection due to the existence and powers of the FSA. Therefore, not only was the speech interest more weighty than the countervailing interest of Interbrew, but the interference represented by the source disclosure order went further than necessary to pursue the aim of protecting those interests.

The argument here is not only that an intense focus on the true values at stake in any particular instance is necessary in the proportionality analysis. It is also that judges should be wary of making unfounded assumptions about sources. Although, following Ashworth, the protection of sources has been accepted as a strong and unvarying interest, it appears that particular factors in a situation can strengthen the free speech 443 See above, pp 369–82. If it had been published during the ‘active’ period under the Contempt of Court Act 1981 they could arguably also have faced liability under the strict liability rule for impeding the proceedings.

444 At para 54.

claim under the Goodwin proportionality test. In Ackroyd, for example, they did so. But in Interbrew they were viewed as weakening it, and this appears now to be an illegitimate stance to take since it takes no account of the general deterrent effect on potential sources of source disclosure in a particular instance. This point may be made about a number of the cases discussed in this chapter; it is further enhanced since the matters that have sometimes tipped the balance in relation to the test of necessity often turned out to rest on judicial 'commonsense' and assumptions. Many of the pre- and post-HRA cases discussed rested on uncertain assumptions, which then turned out to be erroneous.[445] In Ashworth the assumption was made that the source was a dishonest employee motivated by greed. Ackroyd v Mersey Care NHS Trust showed that the sources were in fact motivated by the desire to expose malpractice at the hospital. The assumption is also often made that the source, if undetected, will continue to leak confidential information. But, as argued above, Guardian Newspapers indicated that this is not necessarily the case.

The judicial reasoning in the post-HRA cases is, it is argued, also flawed in a further respect. The cases considered rested on the Norwich Pharmacal jurisdiction: in order to consider whether a journalist was mixed up in wrong-doing it was necessary to examine the claim for breach of confidence (or of contract) in relation to the source. If no justiciable claim had been found to exist there could be no wrong-doing for the journalist to be mixed up in and therefore no jurisdiction to make the disclosure order. But the courts failed to recognise that they have a duty under s 6 HRA to develop common law and equitable doctrines in order to render them compatible with Art 10.[446] Indeed, arguably, s 6 may possibly make greater demands on the common law in terms of modification, than s 3 does on statutes since there is no provision in s 6 equivalent to s 3(2) HRA[447] in relation to the common law. This duty should have affected their approach to that jurisdiction: rather than merely following the pre-HRA authorities as to its nature, they should have considered whether it itself should be modified post-HRA. In this instance this means firstly taking account of post-HRA developments in the doctrine of confidence, and secondly applying s 6 to the jurisdiction itself.

The Court of Appeal in Ackroyd considered whether the source would have a defence to an action for breach of confidence based on public interest, but did not need to come to a conclusion on the subject. The Lords in Ashworth did not consider this point. It is argued that they should have done so, taking account of the post-HRA breach of confidence jurisprudence. So doing means, where Art 8 is engaged in relation to the confidentiality claim (which would not inevitably be the case in this context), conducting a parallel analysis based on Art 8(2) and Art 10(2).[448] Since Ashworth concerned an important privacy interest the Court should have considered whether the balancing 445 For example, as mentioned earlier, the assumption was made in Guardian Newspapers that the source was a senior Civil Servant, which turned out to be not to be the case.

446 See Chapter 4, pp 253–56.

447 See Chapter 4, pp 171–72, 254–55 on this point. It may be noted that as Chapter 9, p 905 points out, s12 HRA in any event puts paid to any doubts as to the duty of the court in relation to Art 10 and the common law.

448 See Chapter 9, pp 957–59.

of Arts 10 and 8 – as in A v B[449] (and now, Campbell)[450] would have resulted in a finding that no wrong-doing had occurred. If a case such as that of Ashworth arises in future post-Campbell this is the course that should be taken. The public interest defence has been subsumed within the consideration of the Art 10 claim. The argument at this stage is not the same as at the latter, s 10, stage since the unvarying interest in protection of sources is not yet at stake – the speech case at this point depends only on the public interest dimension of the information disclosed by him or her. Therefore, as the Court correctly pointed out in Ackroyd, the failure to put forward a convincing public interest argument at this point would affect but not preclude the success of the s 10 argument later on.

The argument then is that a court in an action for source disclosure appears to be in the unfortunate position of having to take the steps that would be taken in the hypothetical breach of confidence action – where that cause of action would constitute the wrong-doing in question. Where any other claim, such as a claim for breach of contract, has a link to the preservation of privacy, those steps would also be applicable, by analogy with the confidence jurisprudence, since contract doctrine is clearly also subject to modification via s 6 HRA where a Convention right is engaged. Although Campbell concerned a breach of confidence claim, the balancing act would surely bring about the same outcome in relation to breach of contract. On the face of it, had this step been taken in Ashworth the chance of identifying a 'wrong-doer' would have been enhanced, since the parallel analysis enhances the privacy claim; as Chapter 9 argues, the analysis is based on the view that Arts 8 and 10 are presumptively equal. On the face of it this would obviously be an unwelcome argument for the defendant to pursue.

However, subjecting the privacy claim to the intense scrutiny of the parallel analysis allows its true value to be revealed. As argued above in relation to Art 10, there were compelling Arts 8 and 10-based reasons in favour of disclosure of the conditions at Ashworth, had the arguments relating to disclosures of malpractice at the hospital figured more fully in the case. On the face of it a strong Art 8 claim could have been identified, based on the significant privacy interest in preserving the confidentiality of medical records – as in fact it was, based on Z v Finland, but Z was not considered at the jurisdictional stage of the argument. However, bearing in mind the arguments above as to the true value in the circumstances of such preservation of confidentiality, it is argued that the balancing act – using the parallel analysis – would have come down on the side of Art 10 since other Art 8 values – in preventing humiliation and preserving dignity – would have spoken in favour of publicity, even without assistance from the strong argument in favour of protecting sources. Thus, having conducted the parallel analysis, it could be found in a case such as Ashworth, that no jurisdiction for making the source disclosure order could be found as the source could not be viewed as a wrong-doer.

As indicated above, not all confidentiality cases in this context engage Art 8. In Interbrew it was unnecessary to weigh up Arts 10 and 8 against each other at the jurisdictional stage on the basis that the 'private life' of a company was not engaged[451] – for the reasons already discussed. Article 10 had presumptive priority, subject to exceptions to be narrowly construed; therefore the speech argument could have prevailed at the jurisdictional stage, in relation to the potential confidentiality claim. However, that argument was not considered at that stage. It is possible that the case could have been decided merely on the basis that there was a lack of jurisdiction to make the order. The fact that there was no competing Art 8 right in question would clearly have enhanced the possibility that any potential breach of confidence action would have failed.[452]

449 [2002] 3 WLR 542.
450 [2004] 2 WLR 1232; (2004] UKHL 22. For comment see Morgan, J, 'Privacy in the House of Lords – Again' (2004) 120 LQR 563–66. See further Chapter 9 pp 975–77.

Thus the hypothetical breach of confidence action offering the restraint of an injunction represented an interference with the Art 10 rights of the newspaper that had to be necessary and proportionate to the aim pursued – that of the preservation of confidentiality, narrowly construed. It is argued that the true grievance of Interbrew was that the disinformation was promulgated and the share price went down. But, as Sedley LJ noted, the disinformation presumably emanated largely from the source itself and therefore would not qualify in itself as confidential information. Possibly Interbrew might have argued on this point that some of the information was confidential and that in order to deter persons from producing doctored information it was necessary to pursue the breach of confidence action, even though the confidential information leaked was in itself innocuous. But could it not be argued that the pursuit of such an action would have been disproportionate to the aim pursued, under a strict level of scrutiny,[453] on the basis that the remedy was not suitable for the purpose (the second limb of the De Freitas test) since the appropriate remedy answering to the true grievance of Interbrew lay with the FSA? It could also be argued that the speech/harm balancing test from Goodwin was not satisfied: since part of the information – the more significant part – was not confidential, the importance of the aim pursued was thereby undermined. If the general value in protecting sources (the speech interest) had been balanced against the harm done to the confidentiality of the information, it might have been found that the latter outweighed the former.

On this basis it could be argued that in Interbrew the source would have had an answer based on the application of Art 10 to the potential breach of confidence action and therefore should not have been viewed as a wrong-doer. With no wrong-doer the journalist could not have been viewed as mixed up in wrong-doing and so no jurisdiction to make the order would have arisen. Clearly, the reason for this arguable flaw in the reasoning is that although Art 10 was taken properly into account at the later stage in the reasoning, it was not taken fully into account at the earlier stage – when the Norwich Pharmaceutical rule was being considered. Had Art 10 been allowed to affect both the statutory and the common law rule, the outcome might have been different.

451 See fn 441 above regarding the extent to which companies can claim Art 8 rights.

452 As Chapter 4 discusses (pp 253–55), whenever a common law doctrine coincides with the area covered by a Convention right(s), it may need to be modified by reference to the demands of that right(s) (established so far in relation to Art 8). But the modification that must occur differs depending on whether the doctrine protects (a) a legitimate interest that has to be viewed as an exception to a competing interest arising in the form of a right (in Interbrew the interest was that of a company in preserving confidentiality under that exception in Art 10(2)) or (b) where a common law doctrine covers a right, not a societal interest.

453 On the strict level of scrutiny deriving, not from Goodwin since no source disclosure action is at this point in contemplation, but from the Strasbourg cases defending the media's watchdog role. See above, pp 309–10 for discussion of such cases.

Seizure of journalistic material

This section moves on to look at the seizure of journalistic material in order to aid in criminal or terrorist investigations. Clearly, journalists will quite frequently possess material in the form of documents or film obtained as a result of pursuing a particular investigative story. The next section considers a selection of the key powers allowing for the seizure of journalistic material. In each case the information obtained might include material identifying sources. Even where that is not the case, seizure of such material affects press freedom, not only because it hampers the collection of information, but also because if journalists are viewed as likely to be forced to aid police investigative efforts, contacts and others may refuse to cooperate with them. Journalists might also be put at risk when, for example, trying to film or report on demonstrations, since those involved would be likely to be concerned about the use to which the material gathered could be put.

A partial 'shield' against seizure of journalistic material is provided in the key seizure power under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act (PACE) 1984. But despite the significance of the other powers, they contain no express protection for media freedom. No common law privilege against seizure of press material exists[454] and it appears, as discussed below, that where sources might be revealed by such seizure s 10 of the 1981 Act nevertheless does not apply to any of the powers. However, some protection for press material could be imposed upon them since all these powers should of course be rendered compatible with Art 10, taking account of Goodwin, under s 3(1) HRA if at all possible. Following Goodwin some mechanism should be available within these powers to allow for the weighing up of the interest in protecting sources against the countervailing public interest in preventing crime or protecting national security that the power in question seeks to serve. Article 8 may also be applicable. As indicated above, Strasbourg has found that companies may have certain rights to private life and to protection for correspondence in the context of search and seizure of material from their premises.[455] A search and seizure of journalistic material could therefore engage both Articles. Further, since all those involved in using the powers are public authorities (the police, the courts, civil servants), they should, under s 6 HRA, comply with Art 10 and 8 in exercising them. The real possibilities of protecting the identity of sources where the varying powers are exercised are discussed below.

Search and seizure of journalistic material under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984

The main search and seizure powers are provided in PACE, Part II.[456] The orders allowed for are intended to force journalists to disclose material where so doing is likely to assist in a criminal investigation, but certain restrictive conditions have to be met. Under s 9 PACE a search warrant cannot be issued in respect of journalistic material; a production order has to be sought under Sched 1, which can be challenged in an inter partes hearing before a circuit judge on the basis that the access conditions have not been met. This position is similar to that applying in the US, where such a hearing can be held, if necessary, and investigators cannot obtain the specified material by applying only for a search warrant.[457]

454 See Senior Holdsworth ex p Independent TV News [1976] 1 QB 23.

455 In Société Colas Est v France (2002) Application no. 37971/97 at para 41 the Court found: 'the time has come to hold that in certain circumstances the rights guaranteed by Article 8 of the Convention may be construed as including the right to respect for a company's registered office, branches or other business premises . . .'.

456 For comment on these provisions see: Stone, R, The Law of Entry, Search and Seizure, 4th edn, 2005, OUP; Zander, M, The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, 4th edn, 2003, Sweet and Maxwell; Feldman, D, The Law Relating to Entry, Search and Seizure, 1986, Butterworths; Stone, R, [1988] Crim LR 498.

The protection is afforded to journalists against seizure of journalistic material by designating it as either excluded or special procedure material and then placing special conditions on obtaining access to it. Section 11 governs excluded material. Such material consists, inter alia, of documentary journalistic material[458] held in confidence[459] and can only be seized if the special restrictions under Sched 1 to PACE are satisfied. The provisions allow for production orders to be made by a judge only if there is reasonable suspicion that the material is on the premises specified and that but for s 9(2) PACE it would have been possible and appropriate for a search warrant to have been issued.[460] Under s 14 non-confidential journalistic material is termed special procedure material and can only be seized if a serious arrestable offence has been committed and the material is on the premises and is likely to be of substantial value to the investigation. It must also be in the public interest to make the order, taking account of the benefit to the investigation and the circumstances under which it is held.[461] It is clearly of significance that the public interest requirement only applies to non-confidential journalistic material. It was intended as a safeguard but it has been subverted by judicial interpretation; pre-HRA it appeared that it would always be assumed to be served where the material would be of substantial benefit to the investigation or relevant in evidence.[462] However, this interpretation renders the inclusion of the public interest requirement otiose. This point is discussed further below.

Section 8(1) PACE covers general powers of search and seizure for material other than excluded material (s 8(1)(d)). The ruling in Guildhall Magistrates' Court ex p Primlacks Holdings Co (Panama) Ltd[463] made it clear that a magistrate must satisfy him or herself that there are reasonable grounds for believing that the items covered by the warrant do not include material subject to the special protection. The Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001 (CJP) s 50 extends the power of seizure very significantly. The further new power of seizure under s 50(2) allows the person in question to seize 457 94 Stat 1879 (1980).

458 Defined in s 13 as material created or acquired for the purposes of journalism – a circular definition that obviously is unhelpful in determining the limits of the privilege. It clearly covers material gathered for such purposes even if the material itself is not eventually published. See further Feldman, D, (2002) ibid on this point at 104–6.

459 S11(1)(c). Journalistic material is not afforded as much protection as legally privileged material, covered by s 10; no access to such material is allowed at all.

460 Sched 1, para 3.

461 Sched 1, para 2.

462 See: R v Bristol Crown Court ex p Bristol Press and Picture Agency Ltd (1986) 85 Cr App R 190; Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset Police v Bristol United Press, Independent, 4 November 1986.

463 [1989] 2 WLR 841. The magistrates had issued search warrants authorising the search of two solicitors' firms. Judicial review of the magistrates' decision to issue a warrant was successfully sought; it was found that the magistrate had merely accepted the police officer's view that s 8(1)(d) was satisfied rather than independently considering the matter.

material which he has no power to seize but which is attached to an object he does have the power to seize, if it is not reasonably practicable to separate the two, and this includes the specially protected material.[464] Section 50 may serve to undermine the protection for journalistic certain material since where such material is part of other material and cannot practicably be separated, it can be seized.

Sections 50, 54 and 55 CJP taken together provide avenues to the seizure and use of journalistic material.[465] The provisions thus circumvent the limitations placed on the seizure of excluded material and, most importantly, mean that information contained in the material, identifying sources, will have been passed to the police even though the material is subsequently returned. It can be said that for the first time journalistic material has lost part of the protection it was accorded under PACE. These wide CJP powers are 'balanced' by the provisions of ss 52–61 which provide a number of safeguards.[466] Under s 60 a duty to secure the property arises which includes the obligation under s 61 to prevent, inter alia, copying of it. But despite these safeguards, it is unclear that the new powers, especially to seize and use journalistic material, are compatible with the requirements of the Convention under the HRA, as discussed below.

Production Orders under the Terrorism Act 2000; requirements to provide information under the terrorism legislation

Schedule 7, para 3(5) of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 provided for the production of material relating to terrorism if such production would be in the public interest. When inquiries relating to terrorist offences were made, Sched 7, para 3(5) allowed access to special procedure and excluded material. This provision was replaced by an equivalent provision under the Terrorism Act 2000, Sched 5. The judge only needs to be satisfied that there is a terrorist investigation in being, that the material would substantially assist it and that it is in the public interest that it should be produced. This procedure creates an exception to the PACE, Sched 1 special-access conditions[467] and so can be viewed as undermining the PACE shield provisions. A 464 The further powers of seizure it provides in s 50 apply to police powers of search under PACE and also to powers of seizure arising under a range of other statutes and applicable to bodies other than police officers, as set out in Sched 1 of the CJP. This provision is significant since, inter alia, it allows police officers to remove items from premises even where they are not certain that – apart from s 50 – they have the power to do so. Thus a number of items can now be seized from media premises although no power of seizure – apart from that now arising under s 50 – in fact arises. It can also be seized where a police officer takes the view on reasonable grounds that it is something that he has the power to seize, although it turns out later that it falls within one of the special categories.

465 Special provisions are made under the 2001 Act for, inter alia, the return of excluded material. Under s 54 such material must be returned unless it falls within s 54(2). Section 57(3) provides that ss 53–56 do not authorise the retention of property where its retention would not be authorised apart from the provisions of Part 2 of the CJP. Under s 62 inextricably linked property cannot be examined or copied, but under sub-section (4) can be used to the extent that its use facilitates the use of property in which the inextricably linked property is comprised.

466 Notice must be given to persons whose property has been seized under s 52, and under s 59 he or she can apply to the 'appropriate judicial authority' for the return of the whole or part of the seized property, on the ground that there was no power to seize, or that excluded material is not comprised in other property as provided for in ss 54 and 55.

467 This is also the case in respect of drug trafficking: see Drug Trafficking Act 1994, SS 55, 56.

police officer of the rank of superintendent or above can authorise a search if satisfied that immediate action is necessary since the case is one of great urgency.[468] It appears that once the first two requirements are satisfied, it will be rare to find that the third is not.[469]

It was assumed in Director of Public Prosecutions v Channel Four Television Co Ltd[470] that the existence of the Sched 7 provision meant that the making of an order precluded a defence under s 10 Contempt of Court Act. The potential danger of Sched 7 – now Sched 5 – in terms of media freedom was shown in that case. Channel 4 screened a programme in its Dispatches series called 'The Committee', which was based on the allegations of an anonymous source (Source A) that the RUC and Loyalist paramilitaries had colluded in the assassination of Republicans. The police successfully applied under Sched 7, para 3(5) for orders disclosing information which would probably uncover the identity of Source A. Channel 4 refused to comply with the orders on the ground that to do so would expose Source A to almost certain death and it was then committed for contempt of court. It attempted to rely on the public interest provision of Sched 7 in arguing that it was in the public interest for the identity of Source A to be protected, but this was rejected on the following grounds. Channel 4 should not have given an unqualified assurance of protection to the source even though had it not done so, the programme could probably not have been made, because so doing was likely to lead to flouting of the provisions of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989. Thus, giving such assurances could inevitably undermine the rule of law and therefore, it was held, help to achieve the very result that the terrorists in Northern Ireland were seeking to bring about. Channel 4 was therefore fined for non-compliance with the orders. In determining the amount of the fine, it was borne in mind that the defendants might not have appreciated the dangers of giving an unqualified assurance, but a warning was given that this consideration would be unlikely to influence courts in future cases of this nature. This ruling fails to accord sufficient weight to the public interest in the protection of journalistic sources in order to allow the media to fulfill its role of informing the public. The comment that the assurances given to Source A as a necessary precondition to publication of this material would undermine the rule of law, ignores the possibility that undermining of the rule of law might be most likely to flow from the behaviour alleged in the programme: it might appear that nothing would be more likely to undermine the rule of law than collusion between state security forces and terrorists. The decision not to impose a rolling fine on Channel 4 or make a sequestration order may be welcomed in the interests of press freedom, but it is clear that such indulgence may be refused in future, thereby creating a significant curb on investigative journalism. Schedule 7, para 3(5), as interpreted in that instance, arguably breached Art 10. The power under the Terrorism Act 2000 affords primacy to national security without explicitly providing a defence for journalists. It now must be interpreted compatibly with Art 10, in a manner which may impliedly provide such a defence. Some means of conducting the balancing act demanded by Art 10(2) should be imported if possible, as discussed below.

468 Para 31.
469 See above fn 462.
470 [1993] 2 All ER 517.

The current terrorism legislation, discussed fully in Chapter 14, provides a number of provisions criminalising failures to disclose information. They contain no journalistic shields at all, although they could clearly have an application to journalists. On their face, the obtaining of journalistic material is treated in precisely the same way as seizure of other material. Under s 19 Terrorism Act 2000 it is an offence to fail to report information to the police that comes to one's attention in the course of a trade, profession, business or employment and which might be of material assistance in preventing an act of terrorism or in arresting someone carrying out such an act.[471] Section 38B Anti-Terrorism Crime and Security Act 2001 broadens this provision immensely: it makes it an offence, subject to an un-explicated defence of reasonable excuse, for a person to fail to disclose to a police officer any information which he knows or believes might be of material assistance in preventing an act of terrorism or securing the apprehension or conviction of a person involved in such an act. A further wide range of people are potentially subject to criminal penalties under s 58(1) Terrorism Act 2000, the provision relating to the collection of information, which is based on section 16B Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989. Section 58(1) provides: 'A person commits an offence if (a) he collects or makes a record of information of a kind likely to be useful to a person committing or preparing an act of terrorism, or (b) he possesses a document or record containing information of that kind.' The offence lacks any requirement of knowledge regarding the nature of the information or any requirement that the person intended to use it in order to further the aims of terrorism, although a defence of 'reasonable excuse' is provided.

Powers under the Official Secrets Act 1989 s 8(4)

The Official Secrets Act 1989 s 8(4) makes it an offence for a person (this would normally be a journalist) to fail to comply with an official direction for the return or disposal of information which is the subject of s 5, and which is in their possession or control. Section 5, discussed in Chapter 7,[472] is headed 'information resulting from unauthorised disclosures or entrusted in confidence'. This is not a new category of information. Information will fall within s 5 if it falls within one or more of the previous categories (under ss 1, 2, 3, 4, discussed in Chapter 7) and it has been disclosed to the defendant by a Crown servant or falls within s 1 of the Official Secrets Act 1911. Section 5 is primarily aimed at journalists who receive information leaked to them by Crown servants, although it could of course cover anybody in that position.[473]

As s 5 is aimed at journalists and potentially represents an interference with their role in informing the public, it requires a very strict interpretation under s 3(1) HRA, in accordance with Art 10, bearing in mind the emphasis placed by Strasbourg on 471 Subsection (5) preserves an exemption in respect of legal advisers' privileged material.

472 See pp 603–4.

473 It is also aimed at the person to whom a document is entrusted by a Crown servant 'on terms requiring it to be held in confidence or in circumstances in which the Crown servant or government contractor could reasonably expect that it would be so held' (s 5(1)(ii)). The difference between entrusting and disclosing is significant in that, in the former instance, the document – but not the information it contains – will have been entrusted to the care of the person in question.

the importance of that role.[474] The fact that journalists were included at all in the net of criminal liability under s 5 has been greatly criticised on the basis that some recognition should be given to the important role of the press in informing the public about government policy and actions.[475] In arguing for a restrictive interpretation of ss 8(4) and 5 under s 3 of the HRA, a comparison could be drawn with the constitutional role of the press recognised in America by the Pentagon Papers case.[476]

Human Rights Act implications

Where journalistic material is seized, potentially revealing the identity of sources, Art 10 is engaged, as Goodwin made clear. The powers discussed, apart from the PACE power, make no express provision themselves for balancing the needs of criminal investigations against the requirements of Art 10. The powers must, however, be read and applied under the HRA compatibly with Art 10. If a source might be revealed by the exercise of the power, it would appear prima facie that s 10 of the Contempt of Court Act would apply. In Secretary of State for Defence v Guardian Newspapers,[477] it was found that on its true construction, s 10 applied to all judicial proceedings irrespective of their nature, or the claim or cause of action in respect of which they had been brought.[478] However, the later decision in Director of Public Prosecutions v Channel Four Television Co Ltd and Another found otherwise, in relation to the Terrorism Act production power. Thus by analogy it might be argued, if the question of source disclosure arose, that s10 does not apply to the other provisions, in PACE and the Official Secrets Act. One way out of this problem would be to argue that since there is ambiguity as to the question of the applicability of s 10 to all the powers discussed, it should be taken to apply, overruling the Channel Four case on that point. It is a pre-HRA case and therefore subject to over-ruling via s 3 HRA. The argument would be that s 10 should be read, in reliance on s 3(1), as applying to all provisions requiring the production of material, where that would lead to the disclosure of the identity of a source.

If this argument is not accepted in a suitable case, it could in any event be argued that Art 10 could be applied to the provisions via ss 6 and 3 HRA, and since s 10 has been rendered virtually synonymous with Art 10, as discussed in the main part of this chapter, source protection could be made available by that route. Clearly, the problem would be that these provisions do not make specific provision for source protection, so the courts would have to seek to read into them defences that do not exist. It could be argued at the least that it would be anomalous, given the protection offered to sources by both Art 10 and s 10, to consider ordering the seizure of journalistic material, revealing sources, without taking account of the free expression implications

474 See, e.g., Goodwin v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 123.

475 See, e.g., Ewing, K and Gearty, C, Freedom under Thatcher, 1990, Chapter 6, pp 196–201.

476 New York Times Co v US (1971) 403 US 713. the Supreme Court determined that no restraining order on the press could be made in order to protect the role of journalism in relation to government scrutiny.

477 [1984] 3 All ER 601; [1985] AC 339, 347, HL.

478 At pp 349B–D, 356E–F, 362D–G, 368G–369A, 372A–C.

as a specific and distinct exercise. So where the provisions offer any discretion to the court as to application or sentence, the factor of source protection should be influential via ss 3 and 6 HRA. That factor affected the sentence, as discussed, in the Channel Four case.

The special procedure under s 9 of and Sched 1 to PACE allow for production orders to be made only if the material is likely to be of substantial value to the investigation. That term could be used to limit the authorising of such orders where the identity of sources might be likely to be disclosed. A similar argument could be used in relation to the production power under the Terrorism Act 2000, Sched 5 since it can be invoked only if the material would substantially assist the investigation. Further, and more significantly, it must be in the public interest under PACE Sched 1, para 2 and under the Terrorism Act 2000 for the order to be made. That term would allow leeway to a court to impose an Art 10-based interpretation on the provisions, relying on s 3 HRA, Art 10 and Goodwin. The public interest could be read as requiring that the court should balance the needs of the investigation against the public interest in source protection. Indeed, Sched 1 para 2 lends itself to this interpretation since it requires the court to consider the benefit to the investigation and the circumstances under which the material was held.[479] In other words, a strong countervailing public interest would have to be shown in order to overcome the strong and constant interest in protecting sources.

Where journalistic material was seized without revealing the identity of a source, Art 10 would still be applicable via ss 3 and 6 HRA, but the strong interest in protecting sources would not be engaged. It must be noted that it is not a prerequisite of the engagement of Art 10 that the seizure of the material would inevitably reveal the source; it is sufficient that it would be likely to do so.[480] The provisions under the terrorism legislation requiring provision of information are subject to defences of a reasonable excuse for failing to comply. That term would allow leeway to a court to impose an Art 10-based interpretation on the provisions, relying on s 3 HRA and Art 10. Once a journalist had put forward the excuse that the material had been collected for the purposes of journalism, this would enable a court to balance the value of the information in revealing terrorist activity against the public interest in protecting journalistic material in determining its reasonableness.

As mentioned above, companies can claim Art 8 rights to private life and to protection for correspondence where search and seizure of material from their premises has occurred.[481] Where a search and seizure of journalistic material takes place on the premises of a media organisation Art 10 as well as Art 8 is relevant. Even where a production order had been properly obtained, argument could be raised regarding the effects of the search, as Ozgur Gundem v Turkey[482] demonstrates. The Court found that 479 Sched 1, para 2.

480 In Guardian Newspapers ibid. Lord Bridge said (at p 372): 'Secondly, is it sufficient to attract the protection of the section that the order of the court in dispute may, although it will not necessarily, have the effect of disclosing a "source of information" to which the section applies? In agreement with Griffiths LJ and with all your Lordships I would answer both these questions in the affirmative for the reasons given in the judgment of Griffiths LJ [1984] Ch 156, and in the speeches of my noble and learned friends, Lord Diplock and Lord Roskill, with which I fully agree.'

481 See Société Colas Est v France (2002) Application no. 37971/97 at para 41, fn 441 above.

482 (2001) 31 EHRR 49.

the search operation at the newspaper's premises, which resulted in newspaper production being disrupted for two days, constituted a serious interference with the applicants' freedom of expression. It accepted that the operation was conducted according to a procedure 'prescribed by law' for the purpose of preventing crime and disorder within the meaning of the second paragraph of Art 10. It did not, however, find that a measure of such dimension was proportionate to this aim. No justification had been provided for the seizure of the newspaper's archives, documentation and library.

It has been argued that the judiciary have not provided sufficient protection for journalistic material.[483] Both Arts 8 and 10 could be relied upon in arguing that a production order under s 9 and Sched 1 PACE should not be issued on grounds of disproportionality. This occurred in R v Central Criminal Court ex p Bright.[484] Judicial review was sought of production orders under s 9 PACE. The orders concerned material relating to David Shayler, a former employee of MI5 who had made allegations about the involvement of MI6 in a plot to assassinate Colonel Gadafy. The Guardian had published an emailed letter from Shayler; the Observer had published an article about his allegations; production orders were sought to obtain material from both newspapers regarding Shayler.

The court had to consider the principles to be applied. Lord Justice Judge found that the judge personally must be satisfied that the statutory requirements have been established. The question to be asked was not whether the decision of the constable making the application was reasonable, nor whether it would be susceptible to judicial review on Wednesbury grounds. He found that this followed from the express wording of the statute: 'if . . . a circuit judge is satisfied that one . . . of the sets of access conditions is fulfilled' and considered that, '[t]he purpose of this provision is to interpose between the opinion of the police officer seeking the order and the consequences to the individual or organisation to whom the order is addressed, the safeguard of a judgment and decision of a circuit judge.'[485] Further, the material to be produced or disclosed could not be merely general information which might be helpful to police inquiries, but relevant and admissible evidence. Once it was found that the relevant set of access conditions was fulfilled, it was made clear that the judge is empowered, but not bound, to make the order. The basis for refusing the order was found in the conditions stated to be relevant to the 'public interest' in paragraph 2(c). It was found that this provision allows the judge to take account of matters not expressly referred to in the set of relevant access conditions including fundamental principles.

In adopting this approach the judge relied on R v Bristol Crown Court ex p Bristol Press and Picture Agency Ltd[486] in which Glidewell LJ noted with approval that the judge at the Crown court had rightly taken into account both 'the importance of the impartiality and independence of the press', and 'the importance of ensuring that members of the press can photograph and report what is going on without fear of their personal safety'. In the case of journalistic material the judge considered that the potential stifling of public debate could be taken into account. He did not consider that it was necessary to take account of Art 10 of the European Convention on the basis 483 Costigan, R [1996] Crim LR 231.

484 [2001] 2 All ER 244.
485 At para 73 of the judgment.
486 (1987) 85 CAR 190.

that the principles it encapsulates are: 'bred in the bone of the common law'.[487] Taking the public interest in freedom of expression into account, the judge decided that the orders must be quashed. The findings in that case were made just before the HRA came fully into force. The comments of Mr Justice Judge as to the relationship between the ECHR jurisprudence and common law principle provide encouragement to argument that under the HRA such orders should not be made where the journalistic material is sought and there is a strong public interest in the material in question. The judge making the order would be bound by s 6 HRA and therefore he or she would have to take account of Strasbourg jurisprudence, unless it was clear that a result consistent with that required by Art 10 would be arrived at by following common law principles. Where the material revealed the identity of sources that jurisprudence should be relied on since it provides the strongest statement of principle, as discussed above, regarding the significance of protecting sources.

Conclusions

Where s 10 of the 1981 Act applies, source protection has been enhanced in the UK post-HRA. But it is clear that where it does not, journalistic material that may reveal the identity of a source may be obtained under coercion in a range of circumstances, and that little leeway for Art 10 arguments has so far been made available. The duties of the courts under ss 6 and 3 HRA make this position no longer sustainable; where scope is available under the relevant provisions for speech/harm balancing, it must be explored, and in particular the 'public interest' provision under Sched 1, para 2 PACE requires reinterpretation.

In relation to s 10, the inception of the Human Rights Act has made a difference to source protection in the sense that efforts are being made to ensure that the tests for necessity and proportionality under Art 10 are being fully applied when examining the need for ordering disclosure of the identity of a source. But no narrowing of the Norwich Pharmacal jurisdiction or re-interpretation of the s 10 exceptions has occurred, and this is due, it is argued, to the strong and well-established attachment of the judiciary to values opposed in this instance to journalistic ones. The tests devised for the determination of jurisdiction and for the applicability of the s 10 exception 'in the interests of justice' show a hollow judicial attachment to the values at stake since they are almost invariably fulfilled due to the very nature of the case. The new framework for judicial reasoning under the HRA outlined here would allow for a very different approach – one that would demand a lot more of the plaintiff.

The pre-HRA domestic decisions discussed above reveal that despite the introduction of s 10 the domestic courts were not affording the same weight to media freedom in examining the need for source disclosure as that afforded at Strasbourg, as revealed in the strong judgment in the Goodwin case. In particular, the 'interests of justice' exception was being applied in a manner that afforded greater weight to the right of institutions to take legal action than to the principle of freedom of expression. This approach has now been modified by the decision in Ashworth, which did evince a determination to apply Art 10 under the HRA correctly, since it fully recognised the constant and unvarying interest in protecting sources. The findings in Ashworth demonstrate, however, that there is still a failure to engage fully with the Strasbourg reasoning process in respect of the doctrine of proportionality. The courts' approach to this journalistic privilege still appears to depend very much on the nature of the other interest at stake. The real extent to which it might be damaged still appears to be a largely subordinate consideration. If an employee of a company appears to be the source, that fact continues to have a very significant influence on the judicial response, while the stance taken under the national security exception presumably would not differ significantly from that taken in Guardian Newspapers.

487 At para 82 of the judgment.

The judges consider that the stance they are now taking is in accordance with the Strasbourg one. This chapter has argued that this is not the case – the judges have misapplied Goodwin. Interbrew suggests that they appear to prefer the means/end balancing proportionality test from de Freitas rather than the speech/harm balancing act. Where speech/harm balancing has occurred, as in Ashworth, the level of scrutiny adopted has not been strict enough. If that level of scrutiny was used, and use was made of the parallel analysis from Campbell where Art 8 is engaged, the analytical tools made available to the judiciary would allow for a more effective teasing out of the values at stake in any particular instance. The true value of confidentiality in the circumstances could be gauged. But on the other side of the coin, where sources appeared to be motivated by a desire to 'spin' or doctor the information in question, the general interest in source protection would remain unvarying, but other speech arguments, based on the public interest value of the information, would be undermined since the speech rationale from truth would be lightly engaged at best.

The judicial reasoning in source disclosure cases is typical of that found in other common law areas covered by this book, such as common law contempt and breach of confidence. There is a strong tendency to erect apparent legal barriers that in reality can inevitably be crossed, thus giving the appearance of protection to an interest that the judges are not in sympathy with. The first barrier is normally created by the Norwich Pharmacal jurisdiction, but its demands will inevitably be satisfied since it is hard to imagine a source disclosure case in which a breach of confidence will not have occurred. The court then considers the next apparent barrier, the need to show that one of the s 10 exceptions applies. But the 'interests of justice' exception will always apply since a possible action for breach of confidence will always be available. The need to show that a serious legal wrong has occurred appears to have no inhibiting effect at this stage: it appears to be assumed that a breach of confidence is always a serious matter. Pre-Goodwin the courts would always then find that disclosure was necessary. Even in Interbrew Sedley LJ was preoccupied by the 'legitimacy' of Interbrew's intended resort to law, which of course would always be a factor for the reasons given. In the vast majority of cases considered in this chapter, including the post-HRA ones, disclosure has been ordered. So has any further protection for sources really been created due to Goodwin and the inception of the HRA?

In relation to the question of necessity a change has occurred. The difference, post-Goodwin, is that the Strasbourg Court has found that there is an unvarying interest in source protection. So there has to be a clear and strong interest to set on the other side other than the plaintiff's apparent desire to bring an action. The unvarying interest in protecting sources cannot be outweighed by the legitimacy of a resort to law alone since that would always be a factor. In Interbrew the other special feature was the malevolent purpose of the source; in Ashworth it was the interest in medical confidentiality. In both instances it is arguable that the courts did not examine the nature of that other factor closely since they were inclined towards the outcome achieved. There has been no post-HRA case yet where it would be difficult to identify a special factor but the source might perpetrate further leaks (unlike the situation in Saunders and in John). Camelot arguably provided an example pre-HRA. How would the courts react in such an instance? In reality two interests would be opposed. First, there would be the interest of the company or institution in protecting its confidential information – something that the judges take very seriously. On the other side, there would be an imported notion, from Goodwin, of the need to protect sources – a matter that has not traditionally struck the judiciary as appealing. If a Camelot type of case arose post-Ashworth it would pose an interesting dilemma for the judges.

It may be asked why the British judiciary are traditionally disinclined to protect sources. First, it seems to be for the reason given earlier, that they can readily envisage the concrete harm done to a company by a leak, the 'ticking bomb argument, but the opposing interest strikes them as much more nebulous. Second, there appears to be a suspicion of s 10. It was introduced by a Labour Government as a deliberate means of overturning a House of Lords' decision in the wake of a case with a controversial political dimension. The judges appear to view s 10 with some suspicion, partly because they may have expected the government to have been the main beneficiary of the protection s 10 offers – since leaking information is often associated with government activity.[488] No exception contained in s 10 would have covered leaked governmental information, unless there was a national security dimension, without the broad interpretation given to the interests of justice exception which would now cover it. Thus the courts have removed some of the protection government may have arrogated to itself for its own purposes.

It may be concluded that in the UK investigative journalism relying on sources has received some encouragement from legal developments and that post-HRA the judiciary have shown an enhanced determination to apply Goodwin to domestic decisions. But the protection for sources is still fairly precarious and is not embedded fully in the judicial consciousness as a common law principle to which they are strongly wedded.

488 In Interbrew fn 389 above, at para 7, Sedley LJ said: 'It should not be forgotten that in this country, then as now, the principal source of unattributable leaks to the media – in the form of off-the-record briefings – and therefore the principal beneficiary of a rule protecting the secrecy of sources, was government itself.'

Chapter 6

Offensive speech

1 Introduction[1]

> Freedom of expression constitutes one of the essential foundations of a [democratic] society, one of the basic conditions for its progress and for the development of every man. Subject to paragraph 2 of Article 10, it is applicable not only to 'information' or 'ideas' that are favourably received or regarded as inoffensive, but also to those that offend, shock or disturb the state or any sector of the population. Such are the demands of that pluralism, tolerance and broadmindedness without which there is no democratic society. – Handyside v UK (1976).

This chapter in essence asks three questions. Where is the borderline in the twenty-first century between the images or words that can and cannot be published in the UK on the ground of causing offence? How satisfactory is that borderline in free speech terms? Since the criminal law regulates expression on grounds of offence, how satisfactory is it that the important mediums of film and broadcasting are regulated beyond what the law allows?

1 Texts referred to below: Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act, 2006, Chapters 8, 9, 10, 11, 12; Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 2nd edn, 2005, Chapters 10, 12 and 13, (1st edn will also be referred to); Feldman, D, Civil Liberties in England and Wales, 2002; Robertson, G and Nichol, D, Media Law, 1999, Chapter 14; Bailey, Harris and Jones, Civil Liberties and Human Rights Cases and Materials, 5th edn, 2002, Chapter 6; Carey, P and Sanders, J, Media Law, 3rd edn, 2004, Sweet and Maxwell, Chapters 5 and 9 (basic guide); Gibbons, T, Regulating the Media, 1998; Dworkin, R, 'Do we have a right to pornography?', in A Matter of Principle, 1985; Itzen, C (ed), Pornography: Women, Violence and Civil Liberties, 1993, OUP; Feinberg, J, The Moral Limits of the Criminal Law: Offense to Others, 1985, OUP; MacKinnon, C, Feminism Unmodified, 1987; 'Feminism, Marxism, method and the state', in Bartlett and Kennedy (eds), Feminist Legal Theory, 1991, HarperCollins. See also Hare, I, 'Legislating Against Hate: the Legal Response to Bias Crimes' (1997) 17 OJLS 415; Weinstein, J, 'First Amendment challenges to hate crime legislation: where's the speech?' (1992) 11 Criminal Justice Ethics 6; Sumner, LW, The Hateful And The Obscene: Studies in the Limits of Free Expression, 2004, University of Toronto Press. Background: Marsh, J, Word Crimes: Blasphemy, Culture, and Literature in Nineteenth-century England, 1998, University of Chicago Press; O'Higgins, P, Censorship in Britain, 1972, Nelson; Robertson, G, Obscenity, 1979, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and (with Nichol, D), Media Law, 1999, Chapter 3; MacMillan, PR, Censorship and Public Morality, 1983, Ashgate; Simpson, AWB, Pornography and Politics: the Williams Committee in Retrospect, 1983, Pergamon Press; Travis, A, Bound and Gagged – A Secret History of Obscenity in Britain, 2000, Profile Books.

This chapter covers a variety of forms of expression. Much of it is primarily visual and also falls outside the category of political expression. This may be said of some films, of music, opera, mime, plays, paintings, all of which are covered by aspects of the law and regulation considered below. But aspects of political expression are also covered, since some regulation of political expression is a feature of broadcasting regulation, while hate speech almost inevitably has a political message. Under the HRA 1998, the judiciary are finding that the stance they traditionally tend to take towards the different types of expression is being reinforced by the hierarchy of expression recognised within the Strasbourg jurisprudence, as the Introduction to this Part indicated.[2] The Strasbourg stance tends to accord with their own leanings as expressed in the free expression decisions taken in the pre-HRA era that are discussed in Chapter 3,[3] although the value placed upon political speech at Strasbourg is arguably higher. However, if the justifications for freedom of expression considered in the Introduction are taken into account, particularly those from truth and self-fulfilment, it is suggested that there is no convincing basis for relegating 'artistic' expression to a lowly place in such a hierarchy, at the domestic level.

The inception of the HRA meant that the UK courts were faced with the difficult theoretical problems associated with a positive right to freedom of expression as opposed to a negative liberty. This is a matter that is especially pertinent in relation to the forms of expression considered in this chapter. Instead of merely determining whether a particular statute or a doctrine of the common law applies to a factual situation, the courts must consider the weight to be given to a particular manifestation of expression, when considering the claim that an interference with it is justified. As Chapter 3 indicated, they were already going down this path in creating a common law right to freedom of expression. But they now have to consider the ambit of such a right in a much wider range of situations, and have to grapple with the doctrinal constraints of the Art 10(2) exceptions. Restraints on explicit expression are found in a range of rules deriving from a number of common law doctrines, statutes, and the Codes or Guidelines of regulatory bodies. Some of the rules, based on concepts of obscenity, indecency or insult are far too subjective, imprecise and broad to be fully in harmony with the free speech justifications. If the propositions advanced in the Introduction to Part II are accepted, media regulation designed to intervene in the market can be defended even when it affects the content of broadcasts in terms of 'must carry' requirements designed to reflect the values of plurality and creativity. On the other hand, such regulation based on the content of broadcasts as indicated by such uncertain terms as 'taste and decency' will be in a far more doubtful position. Further, the distinctions founded on such uncertain terms that will be discussed below, based partly on the medium in question, must also be called into question.

This is a context in which it is suggested that the HRA will not have and has not had a radical impact as far as the general statutory regime governing explicit expression is concerned. It will be argued that it has some potential to have an impact as regards specific decisions taken under that statutory regime; in relation to the common law,

2 See pp 309–11.
3 See pp 124–27.

especially the law of blasphemy, and in relation to aspects of media regulation. But the relevant Strasbourg jurisprudence is not of assistance to arguments in favour of close scrutiny of decisions taken in this context. The Introduction to Part II is intended to provide a theoretical framework, based on the free speech justifications, within which to view the laws that are discussed below. As the domestic Art 10 explicit expression jurisprudence takes form, the stance taken in relation to those propositions is determining its distinctive quality.

This chapter begins by examining the free speech justifications in their application to explicit speech. It moves on to examine the stance taken towards such speech at Strasbourg, and then proceeds to examine and evaluate the key substantive criminal offences relevant in this area, including offences relating to religious and racial sensibilities. Such offences form the backdrop to the following discussion of the regulatory regimes applicable to broadcasting and film. That discussion also covers the special position of the internet.

2 Law and pornography: theoretical considerations

The question as to how far sexually explicit speech deserves the same protection as other forms of expression and if it does not, how far and for what reasons it should be suppressed, has, as Barendt notes, '. . . almost certainly elicited more academic commentary than any other [free speech] topic'.[4] As striking as the amount of writing on the subject is the failure by academics of different persuasions to reach a consensus view. Thus, for example, AWB Simpson, a former member of the Williams Committee appointed in 1977 to review obscenity law, recalls that the law certainly did not represent such a consensus: 'Before, during and after the Committee sat, the chorus of abuse against the law continued; virtually everyone claimed that it was unworkable.'[5] In a similar vein, conservatives,[6] liberals[7] and feminists[8] have all attacked the Committee's findings and all for different reasons. In addition, even to speak of 'feminist' and 'liberal' positions necessitates a conscious simplification, because these two opposing positions, at first sight monolithic, are in fact riven by internal debate; in particular,

4 Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 1987, 1st edn, p 245.

5 Simpson, AWB, Pornography and Politics: the Williams Committee in Retrospect, 1983, p 80.

6 See, e.g., the comments of Mary Whitehouse in The Sunday Times that, as a result of the Committee's report, '. . . we are going from a quicksand into . . . a very, very mucky quagmire . . .', quoted in Simpson, ibid, p 44; he also quotes (p 45) a Daily Telegraph leader which criticised the 'some would say excessively liberal principle' it endorsed.

7 See, e.g., the detailed analysis in Dworkin, R, 'Do we have a right to pornography?', in A Matter of Principle, 1985, in which he broadly endorses the Committee's conclusions, but argues that these cannot be supported by the arguments they deployed.

8 The whole approach of the feminists is hostile to the broadly liberal stance adopted by the Committee; see, e.g., Brownmiller, S, Against Our Will, 1975, where it is asserted that all previous value systems, including the liberal tradition, have worked against the interests of women. For explicit criticism of the Committee by a more moderate feminist, see Eckersley, R, 'Whither the feminist campaign? An evaluation of feminist critiques of pornography', 15 Int J Soc of Law 149. Eckersley dismisses Williams as having 'simply fail[ed] to register the feminist objection' (p 174).

the feminist camp displays a conspicuous lack of unanimity.[9] Nevertheless, an attempt will be made, in what follows, to outline briefly the 'core' of each stance and evaluate the strength of their arguments, both against each other and directly on the subject of the permissibility of censorship in this area.

The conservative position

The conservative position, which in the popular consciousness is probably most associated with Mary Whitehouse, finds its academic and somewhat more abstract exposition in Lord Devlin's work, The Enforcement of Morals, 1965. In essence, Devlin's view is that since a shared set of basic moral values is essential to society, it is as justified in protecting itself against attacks on these values (such as that mounted by pornography) as it is in protecting itself against any other phenomena which threaten its basic existence, such as violent public disorder. On this thesis, moral corruption of the individual is to be prevented in order to ensure the ultimate survival of society. By contrast, Whitehouse's concerns are presumably more with damage to individuals per se, a position which, as argued below, appears to reflect that taken by the case law in this area. Devlin's position, by contrast, is clearly not compatible with most existing UK law:[10] it could neither support nor even account for the existence of the public good defence in s 4 of the Obscene Publications Act 1959,[11] or indeed any similar defence: it would appear somewhat absurd to argue that material which threatened the very survival of society should be allowed to circulate freely on the grounds that it was somehow also in the public good.[12]

Devlin's position also appears to have been placed in doubt on the theoretical level by Hart's incisive critique.[13] Briefly, Hart's objections are as follows: on the more favourable reading of Devlin's position, he is not assuming, but trying to establish the truth of the proposition that a shared set of moral standards (going on Devlin's account far beyond simple prohibitions on violence, theft, etc) is an essential attribute of society. If this is the case, argues Hart, Devlin fails to establish the proposition for the simple reason that he offers no empirical evidence to support it. This leads one, Hart continues, to the suspicion that Devlin actually assumes the truth of the proposition and thus builds his theory on a tautology: having defined society as a system of shared beliefs he then concludes, with perfect logic but some futility, that if those shared beliefs change radically or unanimity is lost, the society has disintegrated. Devlin's position, therefore does not strike one as particularly strong.

9 For comments on the divisions in the feminist critique of pornography see Eckersley, ibid. See also Lacey, N, 93 JLS 93.

10 It may however find reflection in some of the more obscure common law offences such as conspiracy to corrupt public morals and outraging public decency. The Lords, in Knuller v DPP [1973] AC 435; [1972] 3 WLR 143; (1972) 56 Cr App R 633, HL, a much criticised decision, arguably gave some support to the Devlin thesis. For discussion of the decision, see below, p 482.

11 For discussion of the defence, see below p 472 et seq.

12 Under the 1959 Act, the defence of public good only comes into play once it has been decided that the material is likely to deprave and corrupt: Penguin Books [1961] Crim LR 176 (the Lady Chatterley's Lover trial). See below, p 473.

13 For a summary of Hart's critique, see 'Social solidarity and the enforcement of morality', in Essays in Jurisprudence and Philosophy, 1983.

The liberal position

The liberal position on pornography is broadly united around general opposition to censorship in the absence of clear evidence of a concrete harm caused by its free availability.[14] However, unanimity does not exist as to the rationales for free speech most applicable to defending a liberty to read or view pornographic material. There is general agreement that Meiklejohn's argument from participation in democracy[15] is of little relevance; as Dworkin caustically remarks, 'No one is denied an equal voice in the political process . . . when he is forbidden to circulate photographs of genitals to the public at large'.[16]

A variant of Mill's argument from truth[17] was avowedly the free speech justification adopted by the Williams Committee convened in 1979 to report on obscenity; although they expressed some scepticism at Mill's perhaps rather naive conviction that in a laissez faire market of ideas, truth would always win out,[18] they endorsed the main thrust of his theory. Interference with the free flow of ideas and artistic endeavour was unacceptable since it amounted to ruling out in advance possible modes of human development, before it was known whether or not they would be desirable or necessary. Since they also reached the conclusion that '. . . no one has invented or in our opinion could invent, an instrument that would suppress only [worthless pornography] and could not be turned against something . . . of [possibly] a more creative kind',[19] they concluded that this risk of suppressing worthwhile creative art ruled out censorship of the written word. (They regarded standard photographic pornography as not expressing anything that could be regarded as an 'idea' and so as unprotected by the argument from truth.)

Ronald Dworkin has mounted a sustained attack on this rationale;[20] it rests, he contends, on the instrumental justification that allowing the free circulation of ideas is necessary to enable individuals to make intelligent and informed choices about how they want to lead their lives and then flourish in them. He finds that such an argument is unable to support its own conclusion against censorship; for, he urges, it must be accepted that allowing the free availability of pornography will 'sharply limit' the ability of some (perhaps the majority) to shape their cultural understanding of sexuality in a way they think best – a way in which sexuality has dignity and beauty. His argument appears to conclude that the justification from self-development does not argue conclusively against censorship, because of the plausible case that forbidding some pornography will for many people greatly assist in their self-development. Dworkin is surely correct when he concludes that not self-development, but the straightforward argument from moral autonomy amounts to the strongest case against censorship in this area. This argument simply points out that judging for an individual what will and will not be beneficial for 14 See Feinberg, J, The Moral Limits of the Criminal Law: Offense to Others, 1985. For a brief discussion of the possible link between pornography and the commission of sexual offences, see below, p 565.

15 See above, pp 303–4 and fn 27, p 303.
16 Dworkin, R, op. cit., fn 1, p 336.
17 See above, pp 302–3.
18 Report of the Committee on Obscenity and Film Censorship (Williams Committee), Cmnd 7772, 1979, para 5.20.
19 Ibid, para 5.24.
20 Dworkin, R, op. cit., fn 1.

him or her to read represents a clear invasion of the strong individual right to decide moral issues concerned with one's own life for oneself.[21] Such an invasion could therefore only be justified if a serious risk of substantial damage to the concrete well being of society was shown.[22] Since the law does not posit such a risk, censorship is unacceptable. Whether this argument also provides a convincing answer to the radical feminist objections to free access to pornography will be considered below; this position must first be sketched out.

It should finally be noted that liberals are willing to support restrictions on the outlets and public display of pornography[23] on the grounds that such restrictions do not necessarily spring from contempt for those who read pornography, but may simply reflect the genuine and personal aesthetic preferences of those who would rather not have to suffer the continual and ugly spectacle of publicly displayed pornography.[24]

The pro-censorship feminist position

The views of feminist writers on the harms pornography does, on the justifications offered for allowing its free availability and on what, if anything, the law should do about it are many and varied.[25] However, the pro-censorship feminist position on the possibility of legal control of pornography is generally equated with the views of Catherine MacKinnon and Andrea Dworkin, who framed an Indianapolis Ordinance giving rise to civil liability for trafficking in pornography or forcing it upon unwilling recipients; its constitutionality was successfully challenged on the grounds of incompatibility with the First Amendment.[26] The essence of this variant of feminist thought is that while pornography is regarded as causing harm to some individual women, by causing some individual men to perpetrate rape, battery and sexual abuse,[27] pornography causes a 21 See above, Chapter 1, pp 7–8.

22 It is submitted that other possible justifications for abrogating speech (described in Chapter 1, pp 13–14) are not in most instances applicable here. But see below, p 565 for consideration of a possible link between pornography and sexual offences.

23 Such as, e.g., the recommendations of the Williams Committee; see their 'Summary of our proposals', above, fn 1.

24 See Dworkin, R, op. cit., fn 1, pp 355–58, where he broadly endorses the Williams Committee's proposals.

25 For feminist writers who take a different stance on pornography from that broadly examined here, see any of the following: the chapters on pornography in Smart, Feminism and the Power of Law, 1989, Routledge, in which the author expresses distrust of using the law to control pornography; Rhode, Justice and Gender, 1989, Harvard University Press, in which the extent to which feminism has framed a puritanical ideology of sexuality and pornography is deplored: it is argued that women who find explicit depictions of, e.g., bondage or anonymous sex don't 'need more sexual shame, guilt and hypocrisy, this time served up as feminism'. See also Jackson, 'Catherine MacKinnon and feminist jurisprudence: a critical appraisal' (1992) JLS, pp 195–13 for a moderate critique, particularly of MacKinnon's views on the impossibility of non-coercive heterosexual activity in contemporary society.

26 For the first instance decision, see American Booksellers Assoc, etc v Hudnitt III, Mayor, City of Indianapolis et al. 598 F Supp 1316. For the (unsuccessful) appeal, see 771 F 2d 323.

27 See, e.g., MacKinnon, C, Feminism Unmodified, 1987, pp 184–91; 'Pornography as Sex Discrimination.' Law and Inequality: A Journal of Theory and Practice 38 (1986): 4; In Harm's Way: The Pornography Civil Rights Hearings. edited and introduced (with Andrea Dworkin), 'The Roar on the Other Side of Silence' (introduction), 1997; Only Words, 1993, Harvard University Press.

far more subtle and all-pervasive harm to all women. It is on the latter argument that the remainder of the discussion will concentrate.

In some of their more terse, dramatic statements, such as 'Pornography is violence against women',[28] and 'We define pornography as a practice of sex discrimination',[29] it sounds as if MacKinnon and A Dworkin regard the very existence of pornography as a concrete harm to women which goes far beyond mere offence and yet is not a physical harm. However, in the more precise explanations they offer, it seems clear that the harm is caused through the effect it has on men's view of women: 'Men treat women as who they see women as being. Pornography constructs who that is.' In other words, the argument does remain, as R Dworkin claims, 'a causal one'.[30] At this point, having posited a link between pornography and the way men treat women, the explanation draws in the more general radical feminist thesis that men have near total power over women and that consequently, 'the way men see women defines who women can be'.[31] Elsewhere, MacKinnon explains that this power is generated by the fact that men have managed to establish the total 'privileging' of their interests and perceptions and the concomitant complete subordination of women and then passed this off as reality or 'just the way things are'. MacKinnon calls the resulting illusion 'metaphysically nearly perfect'.[32] Several more moderate feminists have pointed out[33] that this view places feminism in the bizarre position of having to deny the possibility of its own existence because it entails assuming that all available modes of thought and perception are male, although masquerading as neutral. If this were true, it is hard to see how women could even come to realise that they were oppressed, let alone frame proposals for affirmative action to free themselves from male dominance. MacKinnon has indeed asserted that 'Feminism affirms women's point of view by . . . explaining its impossibility',[34] but since MacKinnon herself has in fact somehow managed to construct a substantive and highly influential feminist point of view – including the analysis of pornography under consideration – this reply is not fully convincing. It might be thought at this point that since acceptance of the radical feminist thesis on pornography is apparently only possible if one also accepts a metaphysical theory which seems both to deny its own existence and to involve acceptance of the most comprehensive conspiracy theory ever devised, the thesis can be summarily dismissed.

This, however, would be premature. The most significant feminist point with respect to pornography is the effect it is said to have on men's view of women and therefore on the way they treat them. One does not have to accept the general radical feminist thesis in order to give some consideration to the proposition that pornography, through 28 The basic thesis of Dworkin, A, Pornography: Men Possessing Women, 1979, The Women's Press, quoted in Simpson, op. cit., fn 1, p 71.

29 MacKinnon, op. cit., fn 1, p 175. The quotation given refers specifically to the Indianapolis ordinance, but equally summarises MacKinnon's analysis of pornography.

30 Dworkin, R, 'Liberty and pornography', The New York Review of Books, 15 August 1991, p 12.

31 MacKinnon, op. cit., fn 1, p 172.

32 See 'Feminism, Marxism, method and the state', in Bartlett and Kennedy (eds), Feminist Legal Theory, 1991, HarperCollins, p 182, and 'Feminism, Marxism, Method and the State: An Agenda for Theory' Signs: Journal of Women in Culture and Society, 1983, University of Chicago Press, 515: 7.

33 See, e.g., Sandra Harding's introduction to MacKinnon's 'Feminism, Marxism, method and the state', in Harding, S, Feminism and Methodology, 1987, Indiana University Press.

34 Bartlett and Kennedy (eds), Feminist Legal Theory, 1991, p 181.

the effect it has on men, oppresses women. Consequently, the discussion will now turn to considering whether the feminist thesis can still provide a justification for restrictions on the freedom to consume pornography even if the notion of total female subordination is rejected.

The oppression of women caused by pornography is claimed to manifest itself in the following three distinct ways. First, women are discriminated against, sexually harassed and physically assaulted in all walks of life; this constitutes a denial of their civil right to equality. Secondly, women are denied their positive liberty, their right to equal participation in the political process because of the image in men's minds constructed by pornography which 'strips and devastates women of credibility',[35] and consequently prevents women's contributions from being taken seriously. Finally, pornography 'silences' women – even their negative ability to speak is denied because they are not seen as fully human agents, but rather as dehumanised creatures who 'desperately want to be bound, battered, tortured, humiliated and killed'.[36] The argument that the state should, therefore, seek to ban pornography on the basis of furtherance of equality, just as it seeks to outlaw discrimination in employment, is developed in Only Words.[37]

Two points may be made in response to the above. First, this thesis attributes to men a uniformly passive and receptive attitude to all pornographic images.[38] Nowhere in a long essay on pornography[39] does MacKinnon appear to advert to the possibility that many men may completely reject the 'message' of violent misogynistic pornography, even though some may be aroused by it. Her theory thus, in effect, amounts to a profound refusal to recognise the immense difference which men's backgrounds, education and life experiences will have on their responses,[40] and more generally, the enormous variety of human responses to any given phenomena which will be found even amongst those of similar backgrounds; ultimately, her theory denies (male) free will and with it men's individual voices.[41]

The second point is that if one leaves aside the extreme idea of the total control of men over women described above, it then becomes impossible to accept the immense influence that is attributed to the consumption of pornography. The idea, for example, that pornography silences women in all walks of life remains quite simply, 'strikingly

35 MacKinnon (1987), op. cit., fn 1, p 193.

36 MacKinnon, (1987) op. cit., fn 1, p 172. Cf Andrea Dworkin's description of the view that rape law evinces of women as one in which rape is not really against a woman's will, 'because what she wants underneath is to have anything done to her that violates or humiliates or hurts her': Pornography: Men Possessing Women, 1979.

37 MacKinnon, C, Only Words, 1993. For criticism of the notion that banning pornography should be viewed as an aspect of the furtherance of equality, see Sadurski, 'On 'Seeing speech through an equality lens': a critique of egalitarian arguments for suppression of hate speech and pornography' (1996) 16(4) OJLS 713.

38 Andrea Dworkin attributes a similarly monolithic character to men; consider, e.g., the following description of the male sex: 'Terror issues forth from the male; illuminates his essential nature and his basic purpose' (Pornography: Men Possessing Women, 1979, p 74).

39 MacKinnon, 1987, Chapter 14.

40 For criticism of this characteristic failing in MacKinnon's work generally, see Jackson, 'Catherine MacKinnon and feminist jurisprudence: a critical appraisal' (1992) JLS, pp 195–13.

41 An ironic point, since MacKinnon often talks of men 'silencing' women.

implausible'[42] perhaps precisely because it is so eloquently expressed and it is hard to take seriously the notion that pornography denies women the right to participate in political life. One could only accept such arguments if one regarded women as defined completely by the images of pornography; as has been seen, that argument in turn could only have force if one first accepted that men's view of women is almost wholly constructed by pornography and then could agree to the assertion that men's view of women is all that women are. The impossibility of accepting such counter-intuitive propositions means, it is submitted, that the radical feminist argument does not convincingly establish that the availability of pornography represents or causes actual infringements of the rights of women. In strict liberal theory, therefore, the argument from moral autonomy would, in the absence of competing individual rights, require that the choice as to which kinds of explicit literature to read and which to shun, remains properly with the individual. However, a number of comments may be made as to this finding. First, in contrast to many other types of speech, we have found that the only convincing argument for free speech in this area rests upon the interest in moral autonomy, unbolstered by other free speech justifications. Secondly, it seems self-evident that some invasions of autonomy – those which interfere with choices which go to the core of the individual's identity – must be more grave than invasions with respect to more peripheral areas. Interference with the individual's choice to view violent misogynistic pornographic films with no pretension to artistic expression is surely less of an infringement of his autonomy than, say, interfering with the right of the individual to have homosexual relations. If this argument is accepted, it follows that the autonomy interest here is comparatively weak.

These two points, taken together, would suggest that the total case for protecting inartistic violent pornography is not a particularly strong one. This case, such as it is, must then be balanced against the risk that there may possibly be a link between pornography and the commission of sexual offences. The argument as to this link is still ongoing and it is submitted that a proper evaluation of the evidence in this area falls within the ambit of the social sciences rather than a study of civil liberties. Some evidence has been produced of a link, although this evidence is disputed by other studies;[43] what is clear is that there may be said to be a chance of a risk that pornography contributes towards the motivation of sex offenders. It is submitted that until a consensus on the evidential question emerges, the law is entitled, given the relative weakness of the argument for protecting violent hardcore pornography, to take a pragmatic stance and allow narrow and selective censorship of at least sexual violence in films, subject to an artistic merits defence, rather than insist that pornography should be unrestricted

42 Dworkin, R, op. cit., fn 1, p 14; Rhode also asks how, if women are silenced by pornography, a small group of feminists managed to mount a challenge to some of the most cherished principles of American constitutionalism and one of its most successful entertainment industries: Rhode, D, Justice and Gender, 1989, Harvard University Press.

43 Evidence for a causal link is quoted in MacKinnon (1987), op. cit., fn 1, pp 184–91, while R Dworkin, cites a recent UK study which finds against such a link: Cumberbatch, G and Howitt, D, A Measure of Uncertainty – the Effects of the Mass Media, 1989, University of Luton Press. The findings of this latter study were published in the Daily Telegraph, 23 December 1990. Eckersley discusses the issue (Eckersley, R, 'Whither the feminist campaign? An evaluation of feminist critiques of pornography', 15 Int J Soc of Law 149, pp 161–63). See also Itzen, C (ed), Pornography: Women, Violence and Civil Liberties, 1993, which puts forward a body of evidence supporting a causal link.

until the hypothesised link with sex offences has been established beyond reasonable doubt. Further, the case for withdrawal of restrictions must also be balanced against the possibility that while a particular group of men may be influenced by pornography towards the commission of sexual offences, a further group may also be influenced by it towards psychologically damaging treatment of women falling short of any criminal offence. If the link discussed above were established, this further argument would come into play, since it would seem strange if pornography could have a highly significant influence on one group of men but none at all on any other. Thus, this point supports the pragmatic stance advocated above, although it falls well short of accepting the general pro-censorship feminist position.

A further, distinct argument concerns the harm that may be done to the participants in the making of hardcore pornographic films. This will depend on the nature of the pornographic industry in the particular jurisdiction. If such films portray a variety of actual sexual acts, including sado-masochistic ones, the participants may suffer psychological or even physical harm. This point is of especial pertinence to women since, typically, the female participants are subjected to sexual acts in which they are more victim than perpetrator. For example, a typical scenario might include one woman having sex with a large number of men and being 'roughed up' by them. In such circumstances, it is arguable that the woman's consent may be undermined owing to uncertainty as to what will occur, intimidation into accepting certain acts, such as anal sex, and, more generally, owing to the power disparity between the woman and the almost exclusively male directors of such films. The women participants are, typically, young and from economically deprived groups. If, for example, a woman is alone with a group of men in a house at which filming is taking place and has already been bullied and intimidated, the question whether she is continuing to give informed consent to a variety of sexual acts, which have been occurring for a period of time, begins to lose any reality.[44] If it was fairly clear that she was no longer giving such consent, it is hard to imagine that it would be possible, in practice, for her to seek the protection of the law, a fact of which she, and the film-makers, will be aware. The film-makers are under commercial pressures to push participants into accepting more extreme acts. If it appears from the nature of a film that participants may have been intimidated and subjected to actions verging on sexual abuse (owing to the circumstances, including the duration of one session), both feminists and liberals, on the arguments indicated, would unite in accepting regulation. On this argument, films depicting simulated sado-masochism or actual sexual acts would not necessarily be banned completely, but the conditions under which such filming could take place would be subject to rigorous controls, with the welfare of the participants in mind, and designed to be certain that full, informed consent had always been given. But where it was clear that such controls had not been in place, and that harm, such as psychological trauma, had occurred, censorship would clearly be warranted, except in exceptional cases owing to the strong artistic merits of the film. Where it could only be said that a risk of such harm was possible, it could be viewed as a further factor to be weighed in the balance, along with those identified above.

44 During the making of a documentary into the making of hard core pornographic films in Los Angeles, Hard Core (broadcast on Channel 4 on 7 April 2001), the director of the Channel 4 documentary intervened when it appeared that due to bullying and intimidation by the director of the pornographic film, the woman participant was no longer capable of giving informed consent. She had already been subjected to painful and humiliating acts to which it appeared probable that she had not given consent. In other words, consented-to acts had verged into actions going beyond the apparent boundaries of what she had consented to beforehand. Despite her distress occasioned by painful, forceful oral sex, the director wished to continue filming and she was told that she must next participate in a group orgy scene in which she would be the only woman. She appeared to acquiesce but, after the intervention, she, and the film crew, had to leave immediately. See further The Times, 9 April 2001, p 27.

As a matter of interest, it is worth considering what the position would be if radical feminist scholars could somehow establish that pornography really did construct the social reality of women's identity. How would the feminist argument fare in competition with the liberal arguments for free speech? In the case of the three instrumental justifications, the arguments from democracy, truth and self-development,[45] the feminist thesis would be able to demonstrate how, in the case of pornography, each argues for restraint on speech. They would argue that free circulation of pornography hinders, even prevents women's participation in the democratic process; it assists not in finding the truth, but in constructing false and all-pervading images of women; it does not assist in the healthy development of those who take advantage of its free availability: rather they become rapists, abusers, misogynists.

The one liberal defence of free speech not explicitly addressed by the feminist argument is the argument from moral autonomy, which it was suggested above[46] provides the only arguable defence of the right to choose to read pornography. How would this argument fare if it was shown that the basic rights to equality, political participation and speech were in reality denied to all women by the consumption of pornography? Ronald Dworkin has considered this hypothetical position, in which he does not accept that pornography causes individual men to rape and assault women, but accepts the remainder of the feminist claims. One might consider that he would conclude that the massive infringements of women's strong individual rights and the concomitant loss of their moral autonomy would clearly override the comparatively minor invasions of men's free speech and autonomy represented by restrictions on pornography. Somewhat surprisingly, however, Dworkin argues that even if it were the case that the posited harms were actually visited upon all women by pornography, still this would provide no justification for restraining its free availability.[47] Such a view places the right to consume hardcore pornography over the rights of half the population to be treated with dignity and respect, to equal participation in democratic government and to free speech itself. Such a conclusion represents, it is submitted, a complete betrayal of the premise on which Dworkin's whole theory of rights is based, namely the overriding duty of the state to treat all its citizens with equal concern and respect.

3 Legal responses to explicit expression

That the above conclusions on pornography are not in general accepted by states, is revealed by the fact that almost all Bills or Charters of Rights, apart from the US Bill of Rights, contain an exception to the free speech clause which, inter alia, allows restraint

45 See the Introduction to Part II, above, pp 305–6.
46 See pp 455–6.
47 Dworkin, R, op. cit., fn 1, p 15.

on freedom of speech on the broad ground of protection of morality. The 'absolute' nature of the First Amendment, in contrast, has led the US courts to interpret the First Amendment so as to exclude obscene speech from the category of protected speech.[48] Section 14 of the New Zealand Bill of Rights protects freedom of expression, but the protection is subject to such 'reasonable limits prescribed by law as may be justified in a free and democratic society'. Such limits include the regulation of obscenity and pornography.[49] The justification borne in mind in interpreting such exceptions is the harm to be guarded against which seems to include three possibilities: the corruption of persons, particularly children as the more vulnerable; the shock or outrage caused by public displays of certain material and the commission of sex crimes.[50] The development of UK law has been based on the avoidance of the first two possibilities mentioned, although in relation to the visual media, the third has had some influence. On the ground of causing shock, the public display of certain publications can be regulated, while others viewed as having the potential to corrupt can be prohibited entirely, either by punishment of those responsible after publication or by being suppressed or censored before publication.

The type of restraint used tends to depend on the type of publication in question because it seems to be accepted that the harm which may be caused will vary from medium to medium. The print media are subject to a far more lax regime than the visual media. Printed matter, including magazines, newspapers and books, is not subject to censorship before publication, but punishment is available afterwards if indecent or corrupting material is published. Books are less likely to be punished than magazines because it is thought that something which has a visual impact is more likely to cause harm. Thus, films and broadcasts are censored because of their visual nature and are also subject to punishment. The theatre, however, is in an odd position; it has not been censored since 1968 despite its visual impact. Possibly, this may be due to the idea that theatre audiences are more sophisticated and less likely to be affected by what they have seen than cinema audiences. As indicated below, the internet is also in an anomalous position: although it may be viewed as broadly analogous to the visual media, it is not, and, under current proposals, will not be subject to the same regime.

The likelihood that sweeping change will not occur is partly due to the Strasbourg stance in relation to explicit expression in general, indicated below. It is also due to the fact that, in practice, much of the material subject to seizure consists merely of photographs of various sexual acts and of genitals, with no conceivable artistic merit. Therefore, since the statutory regime is in most respects almost certainly within the margin of appreciation conceded to the member state, it is unlikely that the judiciary would be inclined to bring about significant change in it, through challenging interpretation, since the result would merely be to increase the trafficking in hardcore pornography. There are grounds for arguing that this change would be desirable, but decisions under the HRA hardly provide the appropriate forum for bringing it about.

48 See Roth v US (1957) 354 US 476; Memoirs v Massachusetts (1966) 383 US 413.

49 Society for Promotion of Community Standards Inc v Waverley International (1988) Ltd [1993] 2 NZLR 709.

50 These were the key notions of harm considered by the Williams Committee appointed in 1977 to review obscenity and indecency law (Williams Report, Cmnd 7772, 1979). Broadly, the Committee endorsed regulation of pornography with a view to preventing the second of the harms mentioned.

If radical change is to come about, due in part to the impact of the internet, it would have to be brought about by Parliament.

The Strasbourg stance

Article 10(1) specifically provides that the Article 'shall not prevent states from requiring the licensing of broadcasting, television or cinema enterprises'. It is significant that this provision arises in the first paragraph of Art 10, thereby providing a limitation of the primary right that on its face is not subject to the test of para 2. However, a very restrictive approach to this sentence has been adopted. It has been found to mean that a licensing system is allowed for on grounds not restricted to those enumerated in para 2; the state may determine who is to have a licence to broadcast. But in general, other decisions of the regulatory bodies who normally grant licences and oversee broadcasting, etc, are not covered by the last sentence of para 1 and must be considered within para 2.[51] Thus, content requirements must be considered under para 2. The preservation of a state monopoly on broadcasting must also be considered within para 2.[52]

As discussed in Chapter 2, under Art 10(2), an interference with the guarantee of freedom of expression under Art 10 can be justified if it is prescribed by law, has a legitimate aim and is necessary in a democratic society. As the Introduction to this Part indicated, Strasbourg affords a very high value to freedom of expression and, in particular, views the scope for interference with political expression as very limited.[53] Even in respect of artistic expression, which appears to have a lower place in the hierarchy of expression,[54] the discussion below indicates that no decisions defending restrictions on the freedom of expression of adults can be found, except in respect of hardcore pornography, or where a risk to children is also present, or in the context of offending religious sensibilities.

As the Introduction to Part II indicated, certain forms of expression which may be said to be of no value may fall outside the scope of Art 10(1) and it is arguable that, for example, material gratuitously offensive to religious sensibilities[55] or depictions of genitals in pornographic magazines intended merely for entertainment[56] may fall outside its scope. On the other hand, 'hardcore' pornography has been found by the Commission to fall within Art 10(1).[57] Given the breadth of para 2, it is unnecessary to seek to draw lines between artistic erotica and forms of pornography aimed at entertainment alone, even assuming that such line-drawing has any validity.[58] The jurisprudence under Art 10 in this context, as in others, concentrates on the para 2 tests.

Interferences with explicit expression may be justified if they have the legitimate aim of providing for the protection of morals or – in certain circumstances – the 'rights of 51 Groppera Radio AG v Switzerland (1990) 12 EHRR 321.

52 Informationsverein Lentia v Austria (1993) 17 EHRR 93.
53 See Chapter 2, pp 94–96.
54 See above, pp 309–11
55 Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria (1994) 19 EHRR 34.
56 In Groppera Radio AG v Switzerland (1990) 12 EHRR 321, it was thought that mere entertainment might not fall within Art 10(1).
57 Hoare v UK [1997] EHRLR 678.
58 See Kearns, P, 'Obscene and blasphemous libel: misunderstanding art' [2000] Crim LR 652.

others'. The use of laws on obscenity, indecency or blasphemy against explicit expression or regulation of the media with a view to upholding 'standards of taste and decency' are matters that, potentially, could be addressed under the HRA, relying on Art 10. Specific possibilities are considered below, at relevant points. Here, the Strasbourg stance on the application of Art 10 to explicit expression is considered.

The line of authority stemming from the Handyside case[59] suggests that although explicit expression, including some pornographic expression, is protected within Art 10(1), interference with it can be justified quite readily in certain circumstances. It is clear that the scope of the domestic margin of appreciation is not the same in respect of all the aims listed in Art 10(2). The protection of morals would appear to be viewed as requiring a wide margin owing to its subjective nature, in contrast with the protection of the authority of the judiciary, which is seen as a more objective notion.[60] The uncertainty of the notion of the protection of morals appears in the lack of a clearly discernible common European standard.

In the Handyside case, the European Court of Human Rights had to consider the test of 'deprave and corrupt'. A book called The Little Red Schoolbook, which contained chapters on masturbation, sexual intercourse and abortion was prosecuted under the Obscene Publications Act 1959 (which is discussed below) on the basis that it appeared to encourage early sexual intercourse. The publishers applied for a ruling under Art 10 to the European Commission and the case was referred to the Court, which determined that the book fell within Art 10(1). In a famous passage, which strongly favours freedom of artistic or creative expression (the expression of information or ideas), it found: 'Freedom of expression constitutes one of the essential foundations of a democratic society, one of the basic conditions for its progress and for the development of every man. Subject to paragraph 2 of Art 10, it is applicable not only to information or ideas that are favourably received, or regarded as inoffensive but also to those that offend, shock or disturb the state or any sector of the population. Such are the demands of that pluralism, tolerance and broadmindedness without which there is no democratic society.'[61]

However, as this passage indicates, the interference could be justified under para 2. The Court then considered the protection of morals provision under Art 10(2), in order to determine whether the interference with the expression was necessary in a democratic society. It suggested that the 'protection of morals' exception refers to the corruption of individuals rather than to an effect on the moral fabric of society.[62] The Court found that the requirements of morals vary from time to time and from place to place and that the domestic authorities were therefore best placed to judge what was needed. They must 'make the initial assessment of the reality of the pressing social need implied by the notion of necessity in this context'.[63] The judgment thus accepted that domestic authorities would be allowed a wide margin of appreciation in attempting to secure the freedoms guaranteed under the Convention in this area, although this 59 Eur Ct HR, A 24; (1976) 1 EHRR 737.

60 See the judgment of the Eur Ct HR in the Sunday Times case (1979) 2 EHRR 245, discussed in Chapter 2, p 94.

61 Ibid, para 49. The 1959 Act is discussed below, pp 468–75

62 Ibid, para 52.

63 Ibid, para 48.

was not to be taken as implying that an unlimited discretion was granted: the power of appreciation 'goes hand in hand with a European supervision' which concerns the legislation in question – the Obscene Publications Act – and the decision applying it. The Court placed particular weight on the fact that the book was aimed at children between the ages of 12 and 18 and that it might encourage them 'to indulge in precocious activities harmful for them or even to commit certain criminal offences'.[64] Thus, the English judges were entitled to find that the book would have a 'pernicious effect on the morals' of the children who would read it. In finding that the tests under para 2 were satisfied, it was said that the fact that the book was circulating freely in the rest of Europe was not determinative of the issues, owing to the application of the margin of appreciation doctrine.

A similar stance was taken in Müller v Switzerland[65] in respect of a conviction arising from the exhibition of explicit paintings: the fact that the paintings had been exhibited in other parts of Switzerland and abroad did not mean that their suppression could not amount to a pressing social need. The Court took into account the fact that the paintings were exhibited to the public at large, without a warning as to their content, and that a young girl had seen them.

It is notable that the Court in Handyside based its justification for the protection of freedom of expression on the arguments from democracy and self-fulfilment rather than on those from truth or moral autonomy.[66] As indicated above, in the Introduction to Part II, these justifications, as instrumental arguments, are open to attack in the way that the argument from moral autonomy is not. This stance of the Court is especially relevant in the context of explicit expression since the argument may provide, as indicated above, the sole justification. (It is not suggested that this was the case in Handyside itself; on the contrary, on the basis of the content of the book, three of the four justifications could have applied.) In the other contexts covered by Part II, all four justifications may be present. The Court's stance may have some bearing on the cautious nature of its jurisprudence in this area, although unlike the Supreme Court of Canada, it has not explicitly addressed this issue.[67]

These two decisions give a strong indication as to the stance taken by the Court in respect of Art 10, para 2, but may be viewed as turning on their special facts, particularly the fact that children might have been affected. The thinking behind the Handyside decision can find some parallels from the US[68] and Canada.[69] In the US, however, there has been a greater concentration on the question whether restrictions aimed at children might impinge also on the freedom of expression of adults and on the extent to which this should be tolerated,[70] a matter which was in issue in Handyside, although not afforded weight by the Court.

64 Ibid, para 52.
65 (1991) 13 EHRR 212. See Chapter 2, p 95.
66 See the Introduction to Part II.
67 See R v Butler [1992] 1 SCR 452.
68 Ginsberg v New York 390 US 629 (1968).
69 Irwin Toy Ltd v AG (Quebec) [1989] 1 SCR 927 (broad limitation on broadcast advertising aimed at children).
70 Reno v American Civil Liberties Union (1997) 521 US 844.

These decisions at Strasbourg do not determine the question of the consumption of explicit material solely or mainly by a willing adult audience. These decisions at Strasbourg do not determine the question of the consumption of explicit material solely or mainly by a willing adult audience – a matter that is especially pertinent in relation to films and videos, bearing their age classifications in mind. That question was considered in Hoare v UK,[71] which concerned the possession of 'hardcore' pornographic videos. The applicant had been convicted of possessing obscene material under s 2 of the Obscene Publications Act. The Commission found quite easily that the restriction on his freedom of expression had the legitimate aim of protecting morals and was not disproportionate to that aim. But the decision was largely based on the risk that children might view the videos since once they had left the applicant's possession he would not have been able to control their eventual audience. The Commission may have been influenced by the nature of the material: it had no artistic or political value and therefore the justifications underlying freedom of expression, referred to above, were not present, apart from the justification based on moral autonomy.

That decision is broadly in harmony with that of the Commission in Scherer v Switzerland;[72] it was found that the conviction of the proprietor of a sex shop for showing obscene and explicit videos had breached Art 10, since access was restricted to adults and no one was likely to confront them unwittingly. Scherer demonstrates that Strasbourg (or at least, the Commission) is prepared to defend adult autonomy in relation to the consumption of explicit material, so long as control is retained over the ultimate consumer of the material. The difference between Hoare and Scherer related to the question of the restrictions on access to the material; in Hoare the penalty imposed was proportionate to the aim pursued since it was viewed as capable of protecting the 'rights of others' – the rights appeared to be those of minors to be protected from harmful material; in Scherer such rights could not be protected by the imposition of the penalty since they were not threatened by the showing of the videos.[73] Thus, in contrast to the stance taken in the US,[74] Strasbourg is clearly content to restrict the expression rights of adults in order to protect children.

71 [1997] EHRLR 678.

72 A 287 (1993) Com Rep (the case was discontinued in the Court owing to the death of the applicant).

73 In Hoare the Commission, having found that the material fell within Art 10(1), went on to find under Art 10(2): 'In the present case, the sole question which arises in the context of the relationship of proportionality between the interference with the applicant's right to freedom of expression and the aim pursued is the question of whether, given that the applicant only distributed his video cassettes to people who expressed a clear interest, it can be said that the penalty imposed was capable of protecting the "rights of others" (see, in this context, Scherer v. Switzerland, Comm Report 14.1.93, Eur Court HR, Series A no 287, p 20, para 65). Where no adult is confronted unintentionally or against his will with filmed matter, there must be particularly compelling reasons to justify an interference (above-mentioned Scherer Report, p 20, para 65). The Commission considers that it cannot therefore be said with any degree of certainty that only the intended purchasers of the film would have access to it and not minors. To that extent the present case is different from the case of Scherer, where the only adults who saw the applicant's videos were those who had access to his shop (above-mentioned Scherer Report, p 19, para 62).'

74 See below, p 581.

In Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria,[75] the Court considered the question of restrictions on freedom of expression in respect of a film where the expression was aimed at a willing adult audience. A warning had been given and therefore viewers knew what to expect. Nevertheless, owing to the shock caused to particular religious sensibilities in the local region, it was found, in a much criticised decision,[76] that the interference could be justified despite the fact that the measure had the effect of preventing the showing of the film across the whole country. That decision can be contrasted with the findings of the Commission in the same case that Art 10 had been violated.[77]

Applying the Strasbourg jurisprudence under the Human Rights Act

The decisions in this line of authority confirm that where there is a chance that children might be affected or religious sensibilities offended, Strasbourg is particularly cautious. Even accepting the effect of the margin of appreciation doctrine, its stance is very significantly out of line with that taken under a number of national Bills of Rights at the end of the Twentieth century and the beginning of the Twenty-First. It is one of the weakest and most out-dated areas of its jurisprudence, which entirely fails to follow up the principles established in Handyside in relation to Art 10(1). However, Scherer provides a basis of sorts from which to attack the current censorship of films for cinematic release in the UK since age restrictions are in place and are enforced. That decision and the jurisprudence in general provide, on its face, no basis for attacking the regulation and censorship of videos and broadcasting since there is a risk that children will encounter the material. In general the Strasbourg jurisprudence in this area does not set precise standards that could be followed effectively by regulators or by the courts; the standards may readily be referred to as ‘soft-edged’. But clearly it can be argued that the Convention was never intended to set such standards since it provides a ‘floor’, not a ‘ceiling’, of rights.

The expectation deriving from the margin of appreciation doctrine is that the state, via legislation, decisions of the courts and the practice of regulators, will devise its own standards which will be higher than those maintained at Strasbourg. Only where the margin of appreciation is over-stepped – as in especially restrictive decisions – is Strasbourg expected to intervene. Thus, used at the domestic level under the HRA, the Strasbourg jurisprudence can be misleading and could be used to underpin a very restrictive stance since it could be applied without regard to the influence of the margin of appreciation doctrine on it: the outcome of decisions such as Handyside, rather than the free speech pronouncements, could be influential. (However, so far, in judicial reasoning under the HRA there has been no recognition of the need to ‘strip away’ the margin of appreciation aspects of Strasbourg decisions before applying them domestically.) Therefore, below, although the jurisprudence is referred to, it is not fully relied upon as though it provided or was intended to provide a definitive set of standards.

75 (1994) 19 EHRR 34.

76 For an incisive critique, see Pannick, D, ‘Religious feelings and the European Court’ [1995] PL 7.

77 See also Wingrove v UK (1996) 24 EHRR 1; Gay News v UK (1982) 5 EHRR 123.

Restrictions based on the idea of avoiding offence or maintaining certain standards of taste and decency tend to have a greater impact on 'artistic' rather than political expression – using the term 'artistic' very broadly. As indicated, the margin of appreciation doctrine has an especially significant impact on such expression due to the lack of consensus in Europe as to the proper extent of restrictions on it intended to prevent offence. So if the established Strasbourg hierarchy of expression is rigidly applied in relation to such restrictions they can be justified quite readily. However, if the justifications for freedom of expression considered are taken into account, particularly those from truth and self-fulfilment, it is suggested that there is no convincing basis for relegating 'artistic' expression to a lowly place in such a hierarchy. Possibly its place should be below that of political speech, but too sharp a distinction should not be drawn. Moreover, it is readily apparent that some forms of political speech are clearly less valuable than some forms of artistic speech. For example, a number of classic films that fall outside the category of political speech engage a number of the justificatory free speech arguments more strongly than do the more minor manifestations of political speech. An autonomous free speech jurisprudence in the UK under the HRA could begin to grapple with this matter more effectively than Strasbourg is able to do due to the effects of the margin of appreciation doctrine. There is little sign as yet, however, that such a development is likely to occur in relation to post-HRA regulatory decisions. But at the Strasbourg level there may be developments in the explicit expression jurisprudence. The effects of EU driven harmonisation may begin to influence the margin of appreciation doctrine: if greater consistency of standards in this context can be discerned in the EU member states, the case for conceding such a broad margin of appreciation to state authorities may come to be viewed by the Strasbourg Court as less compelling.

Statutory obscenity[78]

Obscenity law operates as a subsequent restraint and is largely used in relation to books, magazines and other printed material, material posted on web-pages or videos;[79] theoretically it could also be used against broadcasts and films. The harm sought to be 78 Texts referred to in this section: Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 2nd edn, 2005, Chapters 10, 12 and 13, (1st edn will also be referred to); Feldman, D, Civil Liberties in England and Wales, 2002; MacMillan, PR, Censorship and Public Morality, 1983; Robertson, G and Nichol, D, Media Law, 1999, Chapter 14; Bailey, Harris and Jones, Civil Liberties and Human Rights Cases and Materials, 5th edn, 2002, Chapter 6; Carey, P and Sanders, J, Media Law 3rd edn, 2004, Chapters 5 and 9 (basic guide); Gibbons, T, Regulating the Media, 1998; Dworkin, R, 'Do we have a right to pornography?', in A Matter of Principle, 1985; Itzen, C (ed), Pornography: Women, Violence and Civil Liberties, 1993; Feinberg, J, The Moral Limits of the Criminal Law: Offense to Others, 1985; MacKinnon, C, Feminism Unmodified, 1987; 'Feminism, Marxism, method and the state', in Bartlett and Kennedy (eds), Feminist Legal Theory, 1991; Baker, R, Media Law, 1995; background: O'Higgins, P, Censorship in Britain, 1972, Nelson; Robertson, G, Obscenity, 1979, and (with Nichol, D) Media Law, 1999, Chapter 3; MacMillan, PR, Censorship and Public Morality, 1983; Baker, R, Media Law, 1995, Chapter 15; Simpson, AWB, Pornography and Politics: the Williams Committee in Retrospect, 1983, Pergamon; Travis, A, Bound and Gagged – A Secret History of Obscenity in Britain, 2000.

79 In AG's Reference (No 5 of 1980) [1980] 3 All ER 816, CA, it was found that a video constituted an "article" for the purposes of the 1959 Act.

prevented is that of a corrupting effect on an individual. In other words, it is thought that an individual will undergo a change for the worse after encountering the material in question. The rationale of the law is thus overtly paternalistic. Of course, if all material which might appear capable of causing corruption were suppressed, a severe infringement of freedom of speech would occur. Thus, the statute which largely governs this area – the Obscene Publications Act 1959[80] – takes the stance that in preventing material which may deprave and corrupt, a line must be drawn between erotic literature and the truly obscene on the basis that hardcore pornography does not deserve special protection.[81] This echoes the approach in America, where this form of pornography is not defined as 'speech' because it is thought that the justification for the constitutional protection for freedom of speech does not apply.[82] In fact, oddly enough, this may mean that pornography is more likely to be prohibited in the US than in the UK. Now that the HRA is in force, it is fair to say that pornography is, in a sense, in a better position in the UK than in the US since, as indicated above, it will probably fall within the range of expression protected by Art 10(1).

The idea of preventing corruption had informed the common law long before the 1959 Act; it sprang from the ruling in Hicklin.[83] Determining whether material would 'deprave and corrupt' was problematic, especially as it was unclear to whom the test should be applied. Two cases in 1954 showed the uncertainty of the law. In Martin Secker and Warburg[84] it was determined that the test applied to persons who might encounter the material in question. But at the same time, in Hutchinson,[85] the Court held that the test should be applied to the most vulnerable person who might conceivably encounter the material and that the jury could therefore look at the effect it might have on a teenage girl. Moreover, the jury could find that something which could merely be termed 'shocking' could deprave and corrupt.

The 1959 Act was passed in an attempt to clear up some of this uncertainty, although it failed to lay down a test for the meaning of the term 'deprave and corrupt'. The actus reus of the offence involves the publication for gain (s 2(1)) or having for such publication (s 1(2) of the Obscene Publications Act 1964) an article which tends, taken as a whole, (or where it comprises two or more distinct items, the effect of one of the items) to deprave and corrupt a significant proportion of those likely to see or hear it (s 1(1)). This is a crime of strict liability: there is no need to show an intention to 80 The Obscene Publications Act 1959 does not apply in Scotland; the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 makes it an offence to publish obscene material and prosecution is the responsibility of the Procurator Fiscal Service. Under the Scotland Act 1998, Scottish criminal law generally has been devolved and this includes the law on obscenity; however, the Video Recordings Act has been reserved to the UK Parliament. The Obscene Publications Act does not extend to Northern Ireland; nor do the relevant provisions of the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982. Obscene material, including videoworks, is generally dealt with under the common law offence of publishing an obscene libel.

81 See, for argument on this point, Dworkin, R, 'Is there a right to pornography?' (1981) 1 Ox JLS 177.

82 Miller v California (1973) 413 US 15. It should be noted that under the argument from moral autonomy, it is irrelevant whether the material concerned is classified as 'speech' or not.

83 (1868) 3 QB 360.

84 [1954] 2 All ER 683; [1954] 1 WLR 1138.

85 (1954), unreported. For an account of the proceedings, see St John Stevas, N, Obscenity and the Law, 1956, p 116.

deprave and corrupt, merely an intention to publish. Once it is shown that an article is obscene within the meaning of the Act, it will be irrelevant, following the ruling of the Court of Appeal in Calder and Boyars,[86] that the defendant's motivation could be characterised as pure or noble. The Act does not cover live performances on stage which fall within the similarly worded Theatres Act 1968.

'Deprave and corrupt'

This test could be applied to any material which might corrupt; it is clear from the ruling in Calder (John) Publishing v Powell[87] that it is not confined to descriptions or representations of sexual matters and it could therefore be applied to a disturbing book on the drug-taking life of a junkie. This ruling was followed in Skirving,[88] which concerned a pamphlet on the means of taking cocaine in order to obtain maximum effect. In all instances, the test for obscenity should not be applied to the type of behaviour advocated or described in the article in question, but to the article itself. Thus, in Skirving, the question to be asked was not whether taking cocaine would deprave and corrupt, but whether the pamphlet itself would.

This test is hard to explain to a jury and uncertain of meaning, with the result that directions such as the following have been given: '. . . obscenity, members of the jury, is like an elephant; you can't define it, but you know it when you see it.'[89] However, it is clear from the ruling of the Court of Appeal in Anderson[90] that the effect in question must be more than mere shock. The trial judge had directed the jury that the test connoted that which was repulsive, loathsome or filthy. This explanation was clearly defective, since it would have merged the concepts of indecency and obscenity and it was rejected by the Court of Appeal on the basis that it would dilute the test for obscenity which, it was said, must connote the prospect of moral harm, not just shock. The conviction under the Act was therefore overturned because of the misdirection. The House of Lords in Knuller v DPP[91] considered the word 'corrupt' and found that it denoted a publication which produced 'real social evil' – going beyond immoral suggestions or persuasion.

This was quite a strict test, but it was qualified by the House of Lords in DPP v Whyte.[92] The owners of a bookshop which sold pornographic material were prosecuted. Most of the customers were old men who had encountered the material on previous occasions and this gave rise to two difficulties. First, the old men were unlikely to engage in anti-social sexual behaviour and therefore the meaning of 'corrupt' had to be modified if it was to extend to cover the effect on them of the material: it was found that it meant creating a depraved effect on the mind which need not actually issue forth in any particular sexual behaviour. Secondly, it was suggested that the old men were already corrupt and therefore would not be affected by the material. However, 86 [1969] 1 QB 151; [1968] 3 WLR 974; [1968] 3 All ER 644; (1968) 52 Cr App R 706.

87 [1965] 1 QB 159.
88 [1985] QB 819.
89 Robertson, Obscenity op. cit., fn 1, p 45.
90 [1972] 1 QB 304.
91 [1973] AC 435; [1972] 3 WLR 143; (1972) 56 Cr App R 633, HL.
92 [1972] AC 849; [1972] 3 All ER 12, HL.

it was held that corruption did not connote a once-only process: persons could be 'recorrupted' and, on this basis, a conviction was obtained. (Interestingly, this finding suggests that there is a presumption that the 'deprave and corrupt' test is of universal application: no person or group of persons can be excluded in principle from its ambit. In this sense it differs from the test as put forward in Hicklin; that test applied only to those whose minds were open to immoral influences.) The test will not be satisfied if the material in question causes feelings of revulsion from the immorality portrayed. This theory, known as the 'aversion theory', derives from Calder and Boyars, which concerned Last Exit from Brooklyn; it was found that the horrific pictures it painted of homosexuality and drug taking in New York would be more likely to discourage than encourage such behaviour.[93]

The 'deprave and corrupt' test must be applied to those likely to see or hear the material in question and, therefore, the concept of relative obscenity is imported into the Act. In other words, the obscenity or otherwise of material cannot be determined merely by its consideration or analysis but, rather, will depend on the character of the consumer and, in this sense, the test presents a contrast with German obscenity law which absolutely prohibits hard core pornography, although soft core material is quite freely available.[94] It was held in DPP v Whyte[95] that in order to make a determination as to the type of consumer in question, the Courtcould receive information as to the nature of the relevant area, the type of shop and the class of people frequenting it. The jury must consider the likely reader in order to determine whether the material would deprave and corrupt him or her rather than considering the most vulnerable conceivable reader. In Penguin Books,[96] which concerned the prosecution of Lady Chatterley's Lover, the selling price of the book was taken into account and the fact that being in paperback, it would reach a mass audience.

The jury has to consider whether the article would be likely to deprave and corrupt a significant proportion of those likely to encounter it. It was determined in Calder and Boyars[97] that the jury must determine what is meant by a 'significant proportion' and this was approved in DPP v Whyte, Lord Cross explaining that 'a significant proportion of a class means a part which is not numerically negligible, but which may be much less than half'. This formulation was adopted in order to prevent sellers of pornographic material claiming that most of their customers would be unlikely to be corrupted by it. The effect of the article as a whole on persons likely to encounter it should be considered, not merely the effect of specific passages of a particularly explicit nature. However, in Anderson[98] it was made clear that where the article consists of a number of items, each item must be considered in isolation from the others. Thus, a magazine which is, on the whole, innocuous, but contains one obscene item, can be suppressed, although a novel could not be.

93 [1969] 1 QB 151; [1968] 3 WLR 974; [1968] 3 All ER 644; (1968) 52 Cr App R 706. For comment, see Robertson, Obscenity, 1979, pp 50–53.
94 German Criminal Code, s 184(3).
95 [1972] AC 849; [1972] 3 All ER 12, HL.
96 [1961] Crim LR 176; see Rolph, CH, The Trial of Lady Chatterley, 1961, Andre Deutsch.
97 [1969] 1 QB 151.
98 [1972] 1 QB 304.

It may be reasonably straightforward to identify a group, of whom a significant proportion might encounter the material, but it is unclear how it can then be determined that they would be likely to experience depravity and corruption as a result. The ruling in Anderson was to the effect that in sexual obscenity cases and normally in other obscenity cases, the defence cannot call expert evidence as to the effect that an article may have on its likely audience. Thus, the view taken in DPP v A and BC Chewing Gum Ltd[99] that such evidence would be admissible may be regarded as arising only due to the very specific circumstances of that case. However, it was decided in Skirving[100] that in cases concerned with alleged depravity and corruption arising from factors other than the sexual nature of the material, expert evidence will, exceptionally, be admissible, although the evidence can only be as to the effects of the behaviour described in the material, not as to the likely effects of the material itself. Thus, generally, where the material deals with matters within their own experience, the jury will receive little help in applying the test. However, it seems clear that a jury will be able to take into account changing standards of morality (the 'contemporary standards' test from Calder and Boyars) in considering what will deprave and corrupt. Therefore, the concept of obscenity is, at least theoretically, able to keep up to date. The application of these tests at the present time was seen in the trial for obscenity of the book Inside Linda Lovelace[101] which suggested that a prosecution brought against a book of any conceivable literary merit would be unlikely to succeed. Thus, in December 1991, the DPP refused to prosecute the Marquis de Sade's Juliette, even though it was concerned (fictionally) with the torture, rape and murder of women and children. But – aside from forfeiture proceedings, discussed below, the use of obscenity law is currently of great significance in relation to the internet; as discussed below the decision in R v Perrin[102] sought to adapt obscenity law to explicit web-based expression. Current proposals to introduce a new offence aimed at extreme pornography are also discussed below since they are aimed mainly at the internet, although they would also apply to other media, if implemented.[103]

The defence of public good

This defence, which arises under s 4 of the 1959 Act (as amended by s 53 of the Criminal Law Act 1977) and s 3 of the Theatres Act 1968, was intended to afford recognition to artistic merit. Thus it may be seen as a highly significant step in the direction of

99 [1968] 1 QB 159.
100 [1985] QB 819.
101 For comment see (1976) NLJ 126. The prosecution failed.
102 [2002] EWCA Crim 747, CA. This case involved a French national based in the UK who was publishing from abroad (in the USA). The appellant was convicted of publishing an obscene article and appealed. The obscene article in question was a web page on the internet. It depicted people covered in faeces, coprophilia or coprophagia, and men involved in fellatio. That web page was in the form of a trailer, a preview, available free of charge to any one with access to the internet. Any one wanting more of the type of material which it displayed could click on to a link marked 'subscription to our best filthy sites' and could gain access to a further web-page by providing credit card details. The preview web-page was accessed by an officer with the Obscene Publications Unit. To reach it a viewer would have to type in the name of the site, or conduct a search for material of the kind displayed.
103 See pp 585–86 below.

freedom of speech, acknowledging the force of a variant of the free speech argument from truth which was also used by the Williams Committee.[104] Under the 1959 Act, it is a defence to a finding that a publication is obscene if it can be shown that 'the publication of the article in question is justified as for the public good in that it is in the interests of science, literature, art, learning or of other objects of general concern'. Under the 1968 Act, the similarly worded defence which covers 'the interests of drama, opera, ballet or any other art or of literature or learning' is somewhat narrower as omitting the concluding general words. Under s 53(6) of the 1977 Act, this narrower defence applies to films. Expert evidence will be admissible to prove that one of these possibilities can be established and it may include considering other works.

It was determined in Penguin Books in respect of Lady Chatterley's Lover that the jury should adopt a two-stage approach, asking first whether the article in question is obscene and if so, going on to consider whether the defendant has established the probability that its merits are so high as to outbalance its obscenity so that its publication is for the public good. The failure of the prosecution was seen as a turning point for literary freedom and the jury allowed it to be known that the second stage of the test afforded the basis on which the novel escaped suppression. In DPP v Jordan,[105] the House of Lords approved this two-stage approach and the balancing of obscenity against literary or other merit.

In DPP v Jordan, the attempt was made to widen the test. The main question was whether the articles in question – hardcore pornography – could be justified under s 4 as being of psychotherapeutic value for persons of deviant sexuality in that the material might help to relieve their sexual tensions by way of sexual fantasies. It was argued that such material might provide a safety valve for such persons, which would divert them from anti-social activities and that such benefit could fall within the words 'other objects of general concern' deriving from s 4. The House of Lords, however, held that these words must be construed ejusdem generis with the preceding words 'art, literature learning, science'. As these words were unrelated to sexual benefit, the general words which followed them could not be construed in the manner suggested. It was ruled that the jury must be satisfied that the matter in question made a contribution to a recognised field of culture or learning which could be assessed irrespective of the persons to whom it was distributed.

Although the test of public good has clearly afforded protection to freedom of expression in relation to publications of artistic merit, it has been criticised. It does not allow for consideration of the benefits of pornography and may be inapt as a means of considering 'new art at the cutting edge of art development'.[106] It requires a jury to embark on the very difficult task of weighing a predicted change for the worse in the minds of the group of persons likely to encounter the article, against literary or other merit. Thus, an effect or process must be imagined which, once established, must be measured against an intrinsic quality. Geoffrey Robertson has written: 'the balancing act is a logical nonsense [because it is not] logically possible to weigh such disparate 104 See above, p 270.

105 [1977] AC 699.
106 Kearns, P, 'Obscene and blasphemous libel: misunderstanding art' [2000] Crim LR 652, p 654.

concepts as 'corruption' and 'literary merit'.[107] The test seems to create an almost complete paradox: it assumes that an individual can be corrupted, which suggests a stultifying effect on the mind and yet can also experience an elevating effect due to the merit of an article. However, such an interpretation of the test is open to two objections. First, a person could experience corruption in the sense that her moral standards might be lowered, but she might retain a sense of literary or artistic appreciation. Secondly – and this might seem the more satisfactory interpretation – the message of the article and its general artistic impact (through, for example, its influence on other works which followed it) might be for the public good although some individuals who encountered it were corrupted. Thus the term 'publication' in s 4 must mean publication to the public at large, not only to those who encounter the article if the test is to be workable.[108]

It should be noted that, as discussed below, the defence can be avoided by bringing a charge of indecency at common law; as Gibson[109] demonstrated, the merits of an obscene object may, paradoxically, prevent its suppression while the merits of less offensive objects may not.

Forfeiture proceedings

The vast majority of actions against allegedly obscene material take the form of forfeiture proceedings. Under s 3 of the 1959 Act, magazines and other material, such as videos, can be seized by the police if it is suspected on reasonable grounds that they are obscene and have been kept for gain. No conviction is obtained; if found to be obscene, the material is merely destroyed; no other punishment is imposed and therefore s 3 may operate at a low level of visibility. Seizure may mean that the safeguards provided by the Act can be bypassed: consideration is not given to the possible literary merits of such material because the public good defence is not taken into account in issuing the seizure warrant. The merits of an article can be taken into account in the forfeiture hearing in determining whether it out-balances its obscenity, but there is not much evidence that magistrates take a very rigorous approach to making such a determination. They do not need to read every item, but need only look at samples selected by the police[110] and seem, in any event, more ready than a jury to find that an item is obscene.[111] It seems, therefore, that the protection afforded by the 1959 Act to freedom of speech may depend more on the exercise of discretion by the police as to the enforcement of s 3 or on the tolerance of magistrates, rather than on the law itself. However, s 3 can be used only in respect of material which may be obscene rather than in relation to 107 Robertson, Obscenity op. cit., fn 1, p 164.

108 The House of Lords in Jordan [1977] AC 699 appeared to take this view. See also Robertson, ibid, on the point (pp 168–69).

109 [1990] 2 QB 619; [1991] 1 All ER 439; [1990] 3 WLR 595, CA.

110 Crown Court at Snaresbrook ex p Metropolitan Police Comr (1984) 148 JP 449.

111 Bailey, Harris and Jones note (1st edn op. cit., fn 1, p 328) that comment arose when forfeiture proceedings of an edition of the magazine Men Only coincided with the jury acquittal of the editors of Nasty Tales of the offence under s 2 ((1973) 127 JPN 82). Robertson argues (Obscenity, 1979, p 96) that as the hearing is before a tribunal which has already decided that the material is – at least prima facie – obscene, it is likely to have an appearance of unfairness. The Bench may be unlikely to be convinced that in effect, it was wrong in the first place in issuing the summons.

any form of pornography; it was held in Darbo v DPP[112] that a warrant issued under s 3 allowing officers to search for 'sexually explicit material' was bad on its face, as such articles would fall within a much wider category of articles than those which could be called obscene.

Statutory obscenity, the HRA and the protection of morals exception under Art 10(2)

Clearly, any prosecutions under the Act or forfeiture actions constitute interferences with the Art 10 guarantee of freedom of expression under the HRA, although subject to justification. In relation to any particular decision, the public authorities involved are bound by s 6 of the HRA to ensure that the tests under Art 10 are satisfied, while the provisions of the 1959 Act must be interpreted consistently with Art 10, if necessary, under s 3 HRA. As Chapter 4 indicated, s 12 HRA does not apply to criminal proceedings. Forfeiture proceedings have the hallmarks of criminal proceedings in certain respects, although a conviction is not obtained, and therefore they are probably outside the ambit of s 12.

Given the wide margin of appreciation afforded to the domestic authorities in the relevant decisions, little guidance as to the requirements of Art 10 in this context is available, especially where the material is directed at a willing adult audience. The domestic judiciary are, therefore, theoretically free to take a different stance. The decisions considered above at Strasbourg on the 1959 Act indicate that the statutory regime relating to publication of an obscene article under s 2 is broadly in harmony with Art 10 of the European Convention. Nevertheless, a specific decision might not meet the proportionality requirements, scrutinised more intensively than at Strasbourg.

The UK forfeiture regime has not itself been tested at Strasbourg. The HRA requirements may be especially pertinent in relation to forfeiture: the magistrates conducting the proceedings are, of course, bound by Art 10 and therefore would be expected to approach the task with greater rigour. In particular, it is arguably necessary to examine each item, even where a large scale seizure has occurred, rather than considering a sample of items only.[113] But since, in practice, a vast amount of material is condemned as obscene in legal actions for forfeiture, the practical difficulties facing magistrates make it possible, especially initially, that the impact of the HRA will be more theoretical than real. It seems probable that, in practice, magistrates will not examine each item and will give only cursory attention, if any, to considering the application of the somewhat elusive Strasbourg case law. However, if on occasion publishers seek to contest s 3 orders before a jury, the proportionality of the measures adopted may receive more attention. Moreover, it is arguable that Art 6 might be breached by the procedure since it could be said to lack impartiality, given that the same magistrate may sign the seizure order, and determine forfeiture.[114]

112 (1992) The Times, 4 July; [1992] Crim LR 56.

113 It was found that such sampling was acceptable in Snaresbrook Crown Court ex p Comr of the Metropolis (1984) 79 Cr App R 184. For discussion, see Stone, R [1986] Crim LR 139.

114 See above, Bailey, Harris and Jones (1st edn op. cit., fn 1, p 328).

Statutory indecency[115]

The concept of indecency, as opposed to obscenity, is contained in certain statutes and also exists at common law. The idea of prohibiting indecency is, essentially, to prevent public displays of offensive material or the possibility that such material will impinge in some way on the general public, or a part of it. Such prohibition is aimed at protecting persons from the shock or offence occasioned by encountering certain material, rather than at preventing moral deterioration. Therefore, except perhaps in a very broad sense, it may be said not to be aimed at the protection of morals and so might not fall within that exception to Art 10. The general lowering of moral standards or attacks on the moral fabric of society must occur – if it is assumed that it is likely to occur at all – through the medium of individual persons who are affected by encountering obscene material;[116] it would seem, therefore, that the 'moral fabric of society' would be unaffected by material which only serves to shock. However, it might be very broadly argued on a conservative view that indecent material might have a corrupting effect if it was repeatedly encountered because it might lead at each encounter to less outrage as sensibilities became blunted. In any event, the European Court of Human Rights has found that material which was, arguably, merely shocking, fell within the protection of morals exception.[117]

If the material is not obscene and is either stored with a view to sale, or offered for sale, it will not attract liability, unless the provision of s 160 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 apply (below). Indecency is easier to prove than obscenity because there is no defence of public good, there is no need to consider the whole article and there is no need to satisfy the difficult test of deprave and corrupt. Prosecuting authorities have taken note of these distinctions and have therefore tended at times to rely on the law against indecency where, arguably, the article in question could be said to be obscene.[118] It will be seen that the existence of these two strands of law has led to some anomalies.

Meaning of indecency

The test for indecency was discussed in Knuller v DPP;[119] it was determined by Lord Reid to be satisfied by material which creates outrage or utter disgust in 'ordinary decent-minded people'. This statement, coupled with the general tenor of Lord Reid's comments, suggested that the level of shock would have to be fairly high. In GLC ex

115 Texts referred to: Robertson, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 7; Robertson, G and Nichol, AGL, Media Law, 1992, pp 115–24; Chaps 8, 9, 10, 11, 12; Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 2nd edn 2005, Chaps 10, 12 and 13 [or 8–12] (1st edn will also be referred to); Feldman, D, Civil Liberties in England and Wales, 2002; Robertson, G and Nichol, D, Media Law (Penguin, 1999) Chapter 14; Bailey, Harris and Jones, Civil Liberties and Human Rights Cases and Materials, 5th edn (2002).

116 For criticism of the view that preventing the lowering of the moral tone of society justifies censorship, see the introduction to this Chapter, p 454.

117 Müller v Switzerland (1988) 13 EHRR 212.

118 This trend is reflected in Lord Denning's comments in GLC ex p Blackburn [1976] 1 WLR 550, p 556.

119 [1973] AC 435, p 457; [1972] 3 WLR 143; (1972) 56 Cr App R 633.

p Blackburn,[120] Lord Denning approved the simple test of 'is this indecent?' since he considered that if jurors were asked the more complex question 'will it deprave and corrupt?' they would allow very offensive articles into circulation. However, Lord Bridge wondered whether asking whether something is shocking or disgusting could be a suitable test of criminality. Sir Robert Megarry has said that 'indecency' is too subjective and emotional a concept[121] to be workable as a legal test. It seems that the test is not confined to sexual material; Lord Reid in Knuller considered that 'indecency is not confined to sexual indecency'.[122] This is supported by the finding in Gibson[123] that the use of freeze-dried foetuses as earrings on a model of a head was indecent.

Uncertainty arises as to whether the term 'indecency' denotes a relative concept: a concept which, like that of relative obscenity, depends on its context or on the nature of the audience or recipient. According to the ruling of the Court of Appeal in Straker,[124] such considerations are irrelevant: indecency is an objective quality discoverable by examination in the same way that, for example, a substance might be discovered to be a certain chemical. However, Wiggins v Field[125] suggests otherwise; the ruling specifically demanded that the circumstances in which the alleged indecency occurred should be taken into account. A prosecution was brought in respect of a reading of Allen Ginsberg's poem 'America' on the basis of a charge of using indecent language in contravention of a local bylaw. The Divisional Court held that if the context was considered – this was the work of a recognised poet, read without any intention of causing offence – the charge of indecency could not be supported. This stance was taken by the Court of Appeal in AG ex rel McWhirter v IBA;[126] it was agreed that the film in question 'taken as a whole' was not offensive, although a small percentage of it depicted indecent incidents. Thus it may be that the Straker ruling, to the effect that indecency may be treated as an objective concept, is confined to cases arising under the Post Office Act 1953, but the point cannot yet be regarded as settled. However, it is clear that the notion of indecency will vary from generation to generation and that the jury will be expected to apply current standards.[127]

The variety of specific statutory offences

The word 'indecent' is contained in a number of statutes and bylaws. Therefore, only specific areas are covered, but if no statute affects a particular area, the gap may be filled by the common law. Taking an indecent photograph or film of a person under the age of 18 is prohibited under s 1 of the Protection of Children Act 1978 (as amended by the Sexual Offences Act 2003), as is possessing it with a view to sale, showing it or distributing it. The only intention needed is the intention to take a photograph;

120 [1976] 3 All ER 184.
121 A Second Miscellany at Law, 1973, p 316.
122 [1973] AC 435, p 458.
123 [1990] 2 QB 619; [1991] 1 All ER 439, CA.
124 [1965] Crim LR 239; this approach was affirmed by the Court of Appeal in Stamford [1972] 2 WLR 1055; [1972] 2 All ER 427.
125 [1968] Crim LR 50.
126 [1973] QB 629.
127 Shaw v DPP [1962] AC 220, p 292. This approach was accepted in Stamford [1972] 2 WLR 1055; [1972] 2 All ER 427.

whether the photograph is indecent depends on the view of the jury regarding recognised standards of propriety.[128] No artistic merits defence is available, although the distributor of the photographs, not the taker of them, can seek to show that he had a 'legitimate reason' for distributing or showing the photographs or for having them in his possession. Section 84 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 amended the 1978 Act to add 'pseudo-photographs' of children in order to cover digitally created photographs.[129] It also amended the Act so that the storage of data on computer disk or by other electronic means capable of conversion to a photograph is covered. Section 160 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 created an additional offence of merely possessing the indecent picture of a child without a view to sale, display or distribution. The offence under either the 1978 or the 1988 Act can be committed merely by downloading an image onto a computer;[130] automatic storage of an image on a hard disk would not amount to making a photograph or pseudo-photograph.[131] Further, it has been found that possession requires knowledge.[132] In Oliver, Hartrey and Baldwin[133] the Court of Appeal found that pornographic images were to be categorised by the a number of levels of seriousness, beginning with images depicting erotic posing with no sexual activity.

The breadth of these offences was illustrated when the Saatchi Gallery in London was threatened with prosecution in March 2001 for showing pictures of children playing naked on the beach, taken by their mother, a professional photographer, as what one commentator called 'a celebration of the wonderment and joie de vivre of her children'.[134] The prosecution did not materialise, apparently on the basis that no element of lewdness was present. Similarly, when the Mapplethorpe Exhibition was shown at the Hayward Gallery in London in Autumn 1996, the Gallery took legal advice owing to the sexually explicit nature of some of the exhibits. Prosecution under the 1959 and/or under the 1978 Act appeared to be a possibility. It decided not to show three photographs, one of which was of a child.[135]

Offensive displays fall under the Indecent Displays (Control) Act 1981.[136] The Act provides, under s 1(1): 'If any indecent matter is publicly displayed the person making the display and any person causing or permitting the display to be made shall be guilty of an offence.' The Act provides in s 1(2) that 'Any matter which is displayed in or so as to be visible from any public place shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be publicly displayed.' 'Public place' is then defined as 'any place to which the public have or are permitted to have access (whether on payment or otherwise) 128 See R v Graham-Kerr (1988) 88 Cr App R 302: this offence is discussed further at pp 556–58 below in relation to films.

129 See further Manchester, C, 'Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994: obscenity, pornography and videos' [1995] Crim LR 123, pp 123–28.

130 R v Bowden [2000] 2 All ER 418.

131 Atkins v DPP [2000] 2 All ER 425.

132 Ibid.

133 [2003] Cr App R 28. See further below at p 557.

134 See the Guardian, Report, 10 March 2001, p 9.

135 See further Warbrick, 'Federalism and free speech', in Loveland (ed), Importing the First Amendment, 1997, pp 177–79 and 190–92.

136 For discussion of the effect of the Act, see: (1982) Stat LR 31; (1981) 45 MLR 62; (1981) 132 NLJ 629.

while that matter is displayed'.[137] There are various exceptions to the definition of 'public places': the Act does not apply to the theatre, cinema, broadcasting, museums, art galleries, local authority or Crown buildings (s 1(4)). Shops which display an adequate warning notice are exempted[138] as far as adults are concerned; thus, as will be seen below, art galleries are, anomalously, more constrained in their displays than sex shops, in that they will fall within the common law on indecency and will not be able to take advantage of this exception.

Mailing of obscene or indecent items is covered by s 85 of the Postal Services Act 2000;[139] sexual literature in luggage is covered by s 49 of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979. In the 1970s, customs officials interpreted the term 'indecency' widely; in 1976, for example, they seized and destroyed 114,000 books and magazines and 4,000 films. It also appeared that the test was being used in an arbitrary and indiscriminate manner. For example, in 1985 books ordered by the bookshop 'Gay's the Word' were impounded, including books by Oscar Wilde and Gore Vidal. The trial was about to commence, but the proceedings were withdrawn because of the ruling of the European Court of Justice in Conegate Ltd v Customs and Excise Comrs.[140] It was held that under Art 36 of the Treaty of European Union[141] that Britain could not apply a more stringent test – indecency – to imported goods when the equivalent in terms of domestically produced ones could circulate freely because they were not obscene. Thus, where obscenity or indecency existed as alternatives, the easier test should not be used to favour domestic goods since that would amount to arbitrary discrimination on trade between member states contrary to Art 36. Customs officers now apply this ruling but not just to EU imports, because it would be too impracticable to apply different tests to imports from different countries. This ruling has therefore resulted in a major relaxation of censorship. 'Hard core' pornography is, however, still seized; this is justifiable under Art 36 because it would also be prohibited if disseminated internally under the Obscene Publications Act.

Anomalies have arisen from the dichotomy between the tests for indecency on the one hand and obscenity on the other in other contexts. In Straker,[142] obscenity charges which resulted in an acquittal were brought in respect of the sale of artistic nude studies. The defendant then sent the pictures by post to persons interested in photographic art and was prosecuted successfully under s 11 of the Post Office Act 1953. In other words, the mere fact that the articles happened to be transferred through the post meant that criminal liability could arise, although otherwise it could not have done so. The DPP has recognised the anomalies created by cases of this nature and therefore he indicated – in 1981 – that prosecutions under the Post Office Act would be confined to cases where the indecent material sent through the post was unsolicited.

Apart from statutes prohibiting the promulgation of indecent material in specific situations, the possibility also arises of using the Sexual Offences Act 1956 to prevent 137 Section 1(3).

138 Section 1(3)(b).
139 Formerly, the Post Office Act 1953, s 11.
140 [1987] QB 254; [1986] 2 All ER 688. Figures quoted by Robertson, Obscenity, 1979, p 193.
141 Formerly Art 30 of the Treaty of Rome.
142 [1965] Crim LR 239; this approach was affirmed by the Court of Appeal in Stamford [1972] 2 WLR 1055; [1972] 2 All ER 427.

displays of indecency in stage plays and perhaps in the context of other live performances. A play, The Romans in Britain, which was staged in 1982 by the Royal National Theatre, included a depiction of the homosexual rape of a young druid priest by three Roman soldiers. Mary Whitehouse wanted to bring an action in respect of this scene, but the Attorney General refused permission as required under s 8 of the Theatres Act. Under s 2 of the Act, liability at common law could not arise in respect of a stage performance. Therefore, Mary Whitehouse invoked s 13 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956, which proscribes the procurement by one male of an act of gross indecency on another. This was arguably fulfilled by the procurement by the male director of the commission of an act of gross indecency by one actor on another. Had a female director been in charge, no prosecution would have been possible. It was determined on a preliminary ruling that prima facie liability might be established using this method.[143] At that point the prosecution was withdrawn; Mary Whitehouse had established the point in question and did not wish to take the risk that the prosecution would fail, as it might have done on various grounds. In particular, it was uncertain whether it could be shown that any indecency took place: it was unclear whether the actor's penis or thumb was shown in the scene. The significance of this possibility should not be over-emphasised; nevertheless, it clearly subverts the purpose of the Theatres Act, which should therefore be amended to prohibit liability arising under other statutes.

Statutory indecency, the HRA and the protection of morals exception under Art 10(2)

Prosecutions under these provisions will normally constitute interferences with freedom of expression under the HRA. The public authorities involved are bound by s 6 of the HRA to ensure that the tests under Art 10 are satisfied, while the provisions of the various statutes must be interpreted consistently with Art 10 under s 3. As Chapter 2 indicated, state interference with the Art 10 guarantee must be in accordance with the law, under para 2, if it is to be justified. This requirement covers not only the existence of national law, but its quality. In Kopp v Switzerland[144] the Court clearly stated that the essential requirements of a national legal basis are those of accessibility and foreseeability. These requirements require precision so that, in this context, the citizen is sufficiently aware of the meaning of the term 'indecency'. It is suggested that, as currently interpreted, the term is so uncertain that there is at least room for argument that these statutory provisions do not meet the 'prescribed by law' requirement. In Hashman and Harrup v UK,[145] the Court found that the contra bono mores doctrine was too uncertain to meet this requirement, since it depended on a vague concept of anti-social behaviour. Arguably, the concept of indecency considered in Knuller v DPP,[146] which depends on considering whether material would disgust 'ordinary decent-minded people', is almost equally imprecise; as pointed out above, doubts have been expressed as to the suitability of such a concept as a basis for criminality.

143 The Romans in Britain: see [1982] PL 165–67.
144 (1999) 27 EHRR 91, paras 70–71.
145 (2000) 8 BHRC 104. See Chapter 9, pp 751–52.
146 [1973] AC 435, p 457; [1972] 3 WLR 143.

It would, of course, be a bold domestic court that was prepared to find such a significant flaw in a large number of statutory provisions (and in respect of common law indecency, discussed below). The Commission has had the opportunity of making such a finding but has not done so,[147] and neither did the Court in Muller,[148] although this is not conclusive of the issue. It is much more likely that certain aspects of this statutory regime will be found to be disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued, either in terms of the provisions themselves or in respect of decisions made under them. The Indecent Displays Act comports readily with the findings on adult autonomy from Scherer and Hoare since it impliedly does allow adults to choose to acquire explicit material, but does not allow it to be foisted upon an unwilling public, and makes special provision to protect children. However, it is suggested that the provisions of s 160 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988, affecting the downloading of pseudo-photographs of persons under 16 onto a computer, presumably from a website, might be viewed as disproportionate to the aim in view. The provisions criminalise a person merely for possessing a photograph, or its equivalent, which has been created without the involvement of a child. It is hard to view the use of the criminal law in this way as proportionate, since it is unclear that morals could be protected by this means. The breadth of the offences under the Protection of Children Act was indicated by the possibility of prosecution in respect of the Saatchi Exhibition. Arguments regarding proportionality could be raised in a similar instance, especially regarding the lack of an artistic merits defence or a defence of legitimate reason applicable to the creator of the photographs, so that the taking and distributing of photographs of children by paedophiles is not distinguished from the taking of them for artistic or scientific purposes.

Common law offences of indecency and obscenity

Prosecutions for conspiracy to corrupt morals can be brought at common law, as can prosecutions for outraging public decency. Thus, common law indecency creates a much wider area of liability than is created under statute because the law is not confined to specific situations such as using the mail. In Shaw v DPP,[149] the House of Lords determined that the offence of conspiring to corrupt public morals existed on the basis that the law conferred a general discretion to punish immoral (not merely criminal) conduct which could injure the public. Thus, any subject-matter which could lead others astray – although not necessarily amounting to a criminal offence – could be the subject of a prosecution if two or more persons were involved. Lord Reid, in his dissenting judgment, argued that the decision offended against the principle that the criminal law should be certain; it would be very difficult to determine beforehand what a jury would consider to fall within the area of liability created. The DPP then used this form of liability in instances where the material in question appeared to fall outside the Obscene Publications Act or added a charge of conspiracy to corrupt public morals to a charge of obscenity as an alternative in case the obscenity charge failed.

147 Gibson v UK, Application No 17634.
148 See p 465 above.
149 [1962] AC 220; [1961] 2 WLR 897, HL; for comment, see (1961) 24 MLR 626; (1964) 42 Canadian Bar Review 561.

The decision in Shaw has been especially criticised on the basis that it left it unclear whether an agreement to commit adultery could amount to a criminal conspiracy.[150]

Despite such criticism, the House of Lords confirmed the existence of the offence of conspiring to corrupt public morals and also the existence of the substantive offence of outraging public decency and conspiring to commit it in Knuller v DPP,[151] which concerned publication of homosexual contact advertisements. The conviction on the latter count was, however, overturned because the trial judge had misdirected the jury as to the ingredients of the offence. The House of Lords ruled that the necessary 'public' element would be present even if the indecency was not immediately visible, since it appeared on an inside page, so long as there was an express or implied invitation to penetrate the cover and partake of the lewd contents; therefore there must be a reference on the cover to the contents. Furthermore, the contents must be so offensive that the sense of decency of the public would be outraged by seeing them. Whether or not a member of the public would be so outraged, would be determined by reference to that section of the public likely to frequent the place where the publication in question was sold. In this respect, conspiracy to outrage public decency differs from conspiracy to corrupt public morals, which requires that the public at large must be considered. The motive in offering the article will be irrelevant, although it will be necessary to show that the defendant was aware both of the lewd nature of the material in question and that it was being placed on public sale.

Both these offences were preserved in s 5(3) of the Criminal Law Act 1977, and in Gibson[152] the Court of Appeal reaffirmed the ruling of the House of Lords in Knuller as to the ingredients of the offence of outraging public decency. The defendants were convicted of the offence after displaying in an art gallery a model of a human head with earrings made out of freeze-dried human foetuses of three to four months gestation. It may be noted that, at first instance, the jury was directed that they were entirely free to use their own standards in deciding whether the model was indecent. Argument on appeal centred on s 2(4) of the 1959 Act which provides that where a prosecution is brought in respect of an obscene article, it must be considered within the Act, not at common law, 'where it is of the essence of the offence that the matter is obscene'. 'Obscene' could denote something which disgusted the public or something which had a tendency to corrupt; if it carried the first meaning, the prosecution failed, as there was no suggestion that the exhibition of the earrings had a tendency to corrupt. Moreover, if the second, more restricted meaning were accepted, that would undermine the defence contained in s 4 of the Act which could be invoked if the material in question was, inter alia, of artistic worth. However, Lord Lane held that the words of s 1(1) were plain and clearly indicated that the restricted meaning of 'obscene' applied throughout the Act; he refused to depart from the normal canons of statutory construction.

If the defence argument on the meaning of obscene had been accepted, a greater number of publications would have fallen within the Obscene Publications Act and could have benefited from the s 4 defence, although this would also have meant extending the ambit of the Act, including the powers of seizure under s 3. As it is, the anomaly 150 See Robertson, op. cit., fn 1, p 215.

151 [1973] AC 435; [1972] 3 WLR 143; (1972) 56 Cr App R 633, HL.

152 [1990] 2 QB 619; [1991] 1 All ER 439; [1990] 3 WLR 595; for comment, see Childs [1991] PL 20–29.

has been continued that the artistic merit of objects which more seriously breach normal moral standards – objects which may corrupt – can prevent their suppression while the merits of less offensive objects cannot. This anomaly could have been addressed not by extending the meaning of obscenity, but by introducing a defence of public good which would have applied to common law indecency. A further anomaly arises due to the exclusion from the Indecent Displays (Control) Act 1981 of art galleries which, as noted above, are actually more restricted under common law. It was found in Gibson that the prosecution did not have to prove an intent to outrage public decency or recklessness as to the risk of such outrage; it was only necessary to prove that a defendant had intentionally done an act which in fact outraged public decency; he could not escape liability merely because his own standards were so base that he could not appreciate that outrage might be caused. This requirement may be contrasted with the full mens rea required for conspiracy to corrupt public morals. In Knuller, the House of Lords found that the defendant must intend to corrupt morals.

In the HRA era, the opportunity may arise to consider whether the continued existence, unmodified, of these common law doctrines is justifiable, in the light of the statutory regimes with which they overlap. A court in the discharge of its duty under s 6 HRA could curtail these offences, by reference to Art 10. These two common law offences are each aimed at a distinct mischief. Conspiracy to corrupt public morals clearly stems from the same roots as the offence under the Obscene Publications Act, rather than forming a part of the laws against indecency. Its existence is therefore perhaps even less defensible than that of conspiracy to outrage public decency, since it covers an area of liability which cannot be distinguished from that covered by the 1959 Act and is therefore most likely to allow escape from the statutory safeguards. It can exist only on the basis that its actus reus is the agreement between the parties rather than the risk of corruption of morals, whereas common law indecency can be distinguished from the offence under the 1959 Act on the more substantial basis that it is concerned in essence with indecency rather than obscenity.

On the other hand, it may be argued that the protection of morals answers to a more weighty public interest than the prevention of shock or outrage, and this contention is reflected in Art 10, which contains an exception expressed in terms of the former interest, but not the latter. However, when the defendants in Gibson applied to the European Commission alleging a breach of Art 10,[153] the application was found inadmissible, suggesting either that in the particular circumstances, the conviction might have appeared to have the effect of protecting morals, as opposed to merely preventing outrage, or that the protection of morals exception may sometimes cover material which merely shocks. It must be said that at present, the European Court has not always drawn a clear distinction between the two mischiefs: in Müller v Switzerland,[154] paintings found to offend morals under Swiss law fell within Art 10(2) as likely to 'grossly offend the sense of sexual propriety of persons of ordinary sensitivity'. This sounds like indecency rather than corruption, but the Court blurred the distinction between them in implying that the former would merge with the latter once a certain level of offensiveness was reached. That level may be reached, it is suggested, by speech which may best be termed 'very shocking'. The Court made it clear that speech which would merely be termed 'shocking' or 'disturbing' would not reach it. Thus, it seems that these common law offences may be viewed as having a legitimate aim under Art 10(2), although their curtailment is nevertheless warranted because of their uncertain ambit and the anomalies they create.

153 Gibson v UK, Appl No 17634.
154 (1991) 13 EHRR 212.

It may be noted that the development of the wide ranging and flexible doctrine of common law indecency and conspiracy to corrupt public morals bears some resemblance to that of common law contempt: both doctrines work in tandem with statutes which create a more precise area of liability and which provide a defence which may ensure compatibility with Art 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights. In both instances, therefore, the common law tends to undermine the safeguards for free speech provided by the statute. However, testing the use of common law indecency and obscenity against the para 2 requirements under the HRA would import into them an ingredient akin to a defence of public good, since giving consideration to the question whether their use in a particular instance was necessary in a democratic society would require giving some consideration to the content of the expression in question. Where it could be said to have clear artistic merit, a court would be expected to give that factor some weight in assessing the question of proportionality.

4 Blasphemy, seditious libel, religious and racial hatred

Blasphemous and seditious libel

The existence of the offence of blasphemous libel[155] stems from the seventeenth century when it was tried in the Ecclesiastical courts. It was then thought to be a form of sedition due to the close relationship between the Church and the state. Therefore, it only protected the Anglican Church; other sects of the Christian Church such as Catholicism, or other religions, received no protection. Its basis, which derives from Taylor's case,[156] was that the defendant had aspersed the Christian religion. By the middle of the nineteenth century, and in particular after the case of Ramsay and Foote,[157]

155 Texts referred to, or for further reading: see Robertson, (1979) op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 8, pp 236–43; Robertson and Nichol, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 3, pp 124–27; Bailey, Harris and Jones, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 9; Robilliard, JA, Religion and the Law, 1984, Manchester University Press, Chapter 2; Barendt, op. cit., fn 1; for historical discussion of the development of blasphemy law see Kenny, CS, 'The evolution of the law of blasphemy' [1992] CLJ 127–42 and Walter, Blasphemy Ancient and Modern, 1990, Rationalist Press; Marsh, J Word Crimes: Blasphemy, Culture, and Literature in Nineteenth-century England, 1998; Lawton, D, Blasphemy, 1993, University of Pennsylvania Press. For a discussion of the theoretical issues lying behind blasphemy law, see Feinberg, J, Offense to Others, 1985; Sumner, LW, The Hateful And The Obscene: Studies in the Limits of Free Expression, 2004; Weinstein, J, 'First Amendment challenges to hate crime legislation: where's the speech?' (1992) 11 Criminal Justice Ethics 6 and, in the context of possible reform, see Law Commission Report No 145, Offences against Religion and Public Worship, 1985. For recent comment, see: Hare, I, 'Crosses, Crescents and Sacred Cows: Criminalising Incitement to Religious Hatred' (2006) Autumn PL 2006, 521–38; Goodall, K, 'Incitement to Religious Hatred: All talk and no substance' [2007] 70(1) MLR 89–113; Hare, I, 'Legislating Against Hate: the Legal Response to Bias Crimes' (1997) 17 OJLS 415; Kearns, P, 'Obscene and blasphemous libel: misunderstanding art' [2000] Crim LR 652.

156 (1676) 1 Vent 293.

157 (1883) 15 Cox CC 231.

it became clear that the basis of blasphemy had changed: it required a scurrilous attack on Christianity rather than merely reasoned and sober arguments against it. It was thought by 1950 that the offence was a dead letter.[158] However, it was resurrected in Lemon.[159] Gay News published a poem – 'The Love that dares to speak its name' – by a Professor of English literature, James Kirkup. It expressed religious sentiment in describing a homosexual's conversion to Christianity and in developing its theme it ascribed homosexual practices with the Apostles to Jesus and made explicit references to sodomy. Mary Whitehouse obtained leave to bring a private prosecution against Gay News and the editor and publishing company were convicted of the offence of blasphemous libel.

The Court of Appeal held that the intention or motive of the defendants was irrelevant since blasphemy was a crime of strict liability. It could therefore be committed by a Christian as there was no need to show that the material had mounted a fundamental attack on Christianity (as had been thought). There was no defence of publication in the public interest; serious literature could therefore be caught. The work in question need not be considered as a whole. All that needed to be shown was that the material in question, which was published with the defendant's knowledge, had crossed the borderline between moderate criticism on the one hand and immoderate or offensive treatment of matter sacred to Christians on the other. It was only necessary to show that resentment would be likely to be aroused, not that it actually was aroused. The past requirement to show that a breach of the peace might be occasioned by publication of the material was no longer necessary. The case was considered by the House of Lords on the question of the mental element required. The judgment confirmed the Court of Appeal ruling that it was only necessary to show an intent to publish the material. This decision has been much criticised[160] as it inhibits many, if not most, juxtapositions of sexuality with aspects of the Anglican religion by writers and broadcasters. In common with other parts of the common law, it allows the Obscene Publications Act to be circumvented because it admits of no public good defence. Moreover, there are already various areas of liability, discussed above, arising at common law and under statute which could be used to prevent offence being caused to Christians.

Gay News applied to the European Commission on Human Rights on a number of grounds including that of a breach of Art 10.[161] This application was ruled inadmissible in a cautious judgment. It was found that the Art 10 guarantee of freedom of expression had been interfered with, but that the interference fell within the 'rights of others' exception of Art 10(2). Was the interference necessary in a democratic society? It was found that once it was accepted that the religious feelings of citizens may deserve protection if attacks reach a certain level of savagery, it seemed to follow that the domestic authorities were best placed to determine when that level was reached. In other words, the argument used in the Handyside case, that a very wide margin of appreciation was required, was again invoked.

158 This was Lord Denning's description of it in Freedom under the Law, 1949, p 46.
159 [1979] AC 617; [1979] 2 WLR 281; [1979] 1 All ER 898, HL.
160 See Robertson, op. cit., fn 1, p 242; Law Commission Report, 1985.
161 (1979) 5 EHRR 123.

It seemed fairly clear in the pre-HRA era that this offence was unlikely to be extended beyond Anglicanism. The Law Commission in their 1985 Report[162] concluded, rather, that it should be abolished, in finding that an offence of wounding the feelings of adherents of any religious group would be impossible to construct because the term 'religion' could not be defined with sufficient precision. The argument in favour of extension of the offence was put and rejected in Chief Metropolitan Magistrate ex p Choudhury,[163] a case which arose out of the publication of Salman Rushdie's The Satanic Verses.[164] The applicants applied for judicial review of the refusal of a magistrates' court to grant summonses against Salman Rushdie and his publishers for, inter alia, the common law offence of blasphemous libel. The Court of Appeal found that the expression of views in an artistic context would not prevent them from amounting to a blasphemous libel, a finding that has been criticised as revealing a 'lack of judicial awareness of the right to artistic expression and its theoretical basis . . . [and an ignorance of] the autonomy of art as a specific cultural category with its own symbolic methods'.[165] But it was determined after reviewing the relevant decisions that the offence of blasphemy was clearly confined only to publications offensive to Christians. Extending the offence would, it was found, create great difficulties since it would be virtually impossible to define the term 'religion' sufficiently clearly. Freedom of expression would be curtailed as authors would have to try to avoid offending members of many different sects.

The applicants did not, however, rely only on domestic law; during argument that the offence should be extended, it was said that UK law must contain a provision to give effect to the Convention guarantee of freedom of religion under Art 9.[166] In response, it was argued and accepted by the Court of Appeal that the Convention need not be considered because the common law on the point was not uncertain. However, the respondents nevertheless accepted that in this particular instance, the Convention should be considered. It was found that the UK was not in breach of the Convention because extending the offence of blasphemy would breach Arts 7 and 10; the exceptions of Art 10(2) could not be invoked, as nothing in the book would support a pressing social need for its suppression. Furthermore, Art 9(1) could not be treated as absolute; implied exceptions to it must include the lack of a right to bring criminal proceedings for blasphemy where no domestic law had been infringed. Article 9 might be infringed, it was found, where Muslims were prevented from exercising their religion, but such restrictions were not in question. It should be noted that that last finding, and probably the finding regarding Art 10(2), can now be said to be wrong, as a matter of Convention law, in the light of the findings in Otto-Preminger in the Strasbourg Court (below).

162 Report No 145, Offences Against Religion and Public Worship. This was preceded by the Law Commission Working Paper No 79 of the same title (1981). See Robertson [1981] PL 295; Spencer, JR [1981] Crim LR 810; Robilliard (1981) 44 MLR 556 for comment on the 1981 Working Paper. The direction reform might take is considered further below, pp 491–97.

163 [1991] 1 QB 429; [1991] 1 All ER 306, DC; for comment, see Tregilgas-Davey, M (1991) 54 MLR 294–99.

164 For discussion of Muslim and Western reactions to publication of The Satanic Verses, see Abel, R, Speech and Respect, 1994, Chapter 1 (iii).

165 See Kearns, P, 'Obscene and blasphemous libel: misunderstanding art' [2000] Crim LR 652, p 656.

166 For discussion of the particular question whether blasphemy law can be defended by reference to the rights of others to freedom of religion, see below, pp 494–97.

On behalf of the applicants, it was further argued that if Art 9 provided no protection for Muslims, they had suffered discrimination in the exercise of their freedom of religion and therefore a violation of Art 14 had occurred. This interpretation of Art 9, read alongside Art 14, had been rejected by the European Commission in the Gay News case.[167] In this case, it also failed on the ground that the envisaged extension of UK law to protect Islam would involve a violation of Art 10, which guarantees freedom of expression. Such an extension was not, therefore, warranted. It seems clear from this ruling and from statements made by Lord Scarman in the House of Lords in Lemon,[168] which were relied upon in the Choudhury case, that the judiciary are not minded to extend this offence, considering that only Parliament should do so.

The applicants also argued that the crime of seditious libel would extend to the image of Islam presented by The Satanic Verses. This offence at one time seemed to cover any attack on the institutions of the state, but in modern times, it has been interpreted to require an intention to incite to violence and the words used must have a tendency to incite to violence.[169] It was not, therefore, apt to cover the offence caused to Muslims by the book, which could be said to be intended to arouse general hostility and ill will between sections of the community, but not against the public authorities. This finding, which was contrary to the ruling in Caunt,[170] means that incitement to religious hatred is not covered by any part of the law, although attacks on Anglicanism would in most instances fall within blasphemy, while attacks on religious groups which are also racial groups would fall within incitement to racial hatred (discussed below).

An application was made to the European Commission on Human Rights by the applicants in Choudhury,[171] but it was declared inadmissible on the ground that Art 9 does not include a positive obligation on the part of the state to protect religious sensibilities. The discriminatory application of blasphemy law therefore remains a source of discontent among Muslims. Parliament had the opportunity of abolishing the offence of blasphemy in 1994 when a Bill was put forward by Lord Lester which would have achieved this. However, it was withdrawn after the government opposed it,[172] partly on the ground that no clear consensus as to the value of abolishing this offence could be discerned. When the government brought forward the Racial and Religious Hatred Bill 2006 it did not include provision to abolish blasphemy law.

Blasphemy law in the HRA era

The Strasbourg jurisprudence

Consideration of the Strasbourg jurisprudence suggests that the inception of the HRA is unlikely to bring about reform of UK blasphemy law since such reform is not required in order to ensure harmony with Art 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights

167 (1982) 5 EHRR 123.

168 [1979] AC 617, p 620. Lord Scarman considered that there was a case for extension, however.

169 Burns [1886] 16 Cox CC 333; Aldred (1909) 22 Cox CC 1; Caunt (1947) unreported, but see case note 64 LQR 203; for comment see Barendt, op. cit., fn 1 (1st edn), pp 152–60.

170 (1947) 64 LQR 203.

171 Choudhury v UK (1991) No 17349/1990; (1991) 12 HRLJ 172.

172 555 HL Deb Cols 1891–1909, 16 June 1994.

as interpreted at Strasbourg. This suggestion is borne out by the findings of the European Commission in the Gay News case.

But the most significant ruling is that of the European Court of Human Rights in Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria.[173] An order was made for the seizure and forfeiture of a film, Das Lieberkinzil (Council in Heaven), which caricatured aspects of Christianity, on the basis that it disparaged religious doctrines and was 'likely to arouse justified indignation'. The film was based on a satirical play by Oskar Panizza, published in 1894. The play bases itself on the assumption that syphilis was God's punishment for man's fornication and sinfulness at the time of the Renaissance. The film begins and ends with a depiction of Panizza's trial for blasphemy in 1895 in respect of the play. It shows the performance of the play, by the Teatro Belli in Rome, which portrays God as a senile old man, prostrating himself before the devil. Jesus is portrayed as a mental defective and is shown attempting to kiss and fondle his mother's breasts. God, Jesus and the Virgin Mary agree with the Devil to punish the world; the Devil suggests infecting the world with a sexually transmitted disease; as his reward, he demands freedom of thought. Apart from satirising aspects of religious belief, the film explores the idea of the limitations of artistic freedom, explicitly in relation to the trial and impliedly (in the context of the trial) in the case of the play.

In an Opinion that strongly emphasised the need to protect artistic freedom, the Commission found a breach of Art 10. In considering whether the interference was necessary in a democratic society for protecting the right to freedom of religion under Art 9, the Commission took into account the role of works of art in a democratic society and relied on the observation in Müller[174] to the effect that 'those who create, perform, distribute or exhibit works of art contribute to the exchange of ideas and opinions which is essential for a democratic society. Hence, the obligation of the state not to encroach unduly on their freedom of expression'. A warning was given to the public as to the nature of the film, and although access was not specifically restricted, the film was to be shown in a 'cinema of art' at a late hour. Therefore, it was unlikely that young children would be present. These factors affected the Commission's view. The Commission considered that recourse to certain artistic methods (satirisation and caricature) would not 'justify the imposition of a restriction on a work of art even if it deals with religion'.[175] Further, 'a complete prohibition which excludes the chance to discuss the message of the film must be seen as a disproportionate measure' (emphasis added).[176]

The Court took a strikingly different stance. The Austrian Government maintained, and the Court accepted, that the seizure and forfeiture were aimed at protecting the 'rights of others' within Art 10(2). The Court found that 'the manner in which religious doctrines are opposed or denied is a matter which may engage the responsibility of the state, notably its responsibility to ensure the peaceful enjoyment of the right under Article 9' (emphasis added).[177] The Court found that the responsibilities of those exercising the right under Art 10 include 'an obligation to avoid as far as possible expressions

173 (1994) 19 EHRR 34.
174 (1991) 13 EHRR 212.
175 (1994) 19 EHRR 34, para 72.
176 Ibid, para 77.
177 Ibid, para 47.

that are gratuitously offensive to others and thus an infringement of their rights and which therefore do not contribute to any form of debate capable of furthering progress in human affairs' (emphasis added).[178] Therefore, it might be considered necessary to prevent such expressions.

The Court took into account the lack of a uniform conception in Europe of the significance of religion in society in finding that it was not possible to arrive at a comprehensive definition of what constitutes a permissible interference. It therefore left a wide margin of appreciation to the Austrian Government in respect of assessing the extent of the interference necessary. It considered, however, that the necessity for the restriction 'must be convincingly established'. In finding that the seizure and forfeiture were necessary, the Court accepted the view of the Austrian authorities that the offensive nature of the film was not outweighed by its artistic merits and left them a wide margin of appreciation in determining the measures needed in the light of the local situation, bearing in mind the fact that the Roman Catholic religion was the dominant religion in the local region, the Tyrol. The Court did not give a specific reason for finding that the case for adopting the measures had been convincingly established, merely asserting that the Austrian authorities had not overstepped their margin of appreciation. No breach of Art 10 was therefore found.

Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick criticised the breadth of the decision in these terms: 'It is hard to know which aspect of the majority's judgment more threatens freedom of expression interests: that outrage of people based only on knowing of, not being confronted with, certain expression provides justification for interfering with the expression, or, this being the case, that the indignation of people in a discrete geographic area is sufficient to justify the interference across the entire state.'[179] Bearing in mind the completeness of the interference, and its theoretical basis, this judgment is, it is argued, entirely unsatisfactory in the light of the free speech justifications discussed in the Introduction to Part II. The Court appeared to afford little weight to the value of the speech in question in terms of providing worthwhile dissent from established thought. In finding that the film did not contribute to 'debate capable of furthering progress in human affairs' it revealed a failure to understand the principle of moral autonomy which demands that citizens should be free not only to choose to view works of art, but to decide for themselves whether they have value.[180] It also showed a misunderstanding of the nature of the argument from truth, which it appeared to be referring to, in that it excluded the possibility that the film's message might in future be viewed as winning out in the market place of ideas. In other words, it allowed an interference in that free market of ideas which sought to preclude that possibility. In attacking the manner of the dissent from established religious ideas, the Court, in contrast to the Commission, failed to understand the nature of artistic endeavour, which often uses techniques such as satire in order to make an impact on an audience. In this respect, it disregarded its own earlier statement to the effect that 'Article 10 protects not only the substance of the ideas and information but also the form in which they are conveyed'.[181] It further

178 Ibid, para 49.

179 Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, p 402.

180 See the statement to this effect in the well known free expression decision in the US: (1966) Ginzburg v US 463, p 498.

181 Oberschlick v Austria (1991) 19 EHRR 389.

failed to differentiate between taking account of the possibility that the expression in question had value, based on an understanding of the free speech justifications, and assessing that value itself.[182] Clearly, the Court possessed no special expertise allowing it to arbitrate as to the artistic worth of the film. The judgment was also unsatisfactory even in its own terms, since it failed to conduct a strict evaluation as to whether the need for such a wide ranging restriction had been convincingly established. In short, this was an unconvincing, under-theorised judgment of the Court which is unworthy of its freedom of expression jurisprudence in general. The Opinion of the Commission was, it is suggested, far more in tune with that jurisprudence.

The judgment of the Court in Wingrove v UK[183] applied the reasoning from Otto-Preminger and therefore showed very similar tendencies. Again, the decision can be contrasted with the finding of the Commission that there had been a violation of Art 10.[184] The Court had to consider whether a refusal of the BBFC to issue a certificate licensing a video, Visions of Ecstasy, constituted a breach of Art 10. The film depicts erotic visions experienced by St Theresa of Avila, a 16th-century Carmelite nun. In the short, silent film she is depicted in a white habit suspended from a cord being erotically embraced by her own psyche, represented by a half-naked woman. That scene is intercut by scenes showing St Theresa, as part of her fantasies, kissing and embracing Christ who is fastened to the cross. She kisses his wounds and sits astride him in a manner reflecting intense arousal. The BBFC took the view that if the video had been granted a classification certificate and shown in the UK, a private prosecution for blasphemy might have been brought successfully.

The Court found that the restriction was prescribed by law, taking into account the fact that the BBFC was acting within its powers under s 4(1) of the Video Recordings Act 1984 and that no general uncertainty was apparent as to the definition of blasphemy formulated in the Lemon case. The refusal of the certificate had the aim of protecting the rights of others within Art 10(2) and was consonant with the aim of the protection afforded by Art 9 to religious freedom. In considering the necessity and proportionality of the restriction, the Court went on to find that while the margin of appreciation allowed to states would be narrow in relation to political speech, it would be wide in relation to offending 'intimate personal convictions within the field of morals or, especially, religion'.[185] It also placed strong emphasis on the fact that views hostile to Christianity could be expressed under the English law of blasphemy: 'it is the manner in which the views are advocated rather than the views themselves which the law seeks to control . . . The high degree of profanation that must be attained [is] . . . itself a safeguard against arbitrariness.'[186] The Court found, having viewed the video, that the decision of the BBFC that it would outrage and insult the feelings of believing Christians could not be said to be arbitrary or excessive. The national authorities had not overstepped their margin of appreciation: the exception applied and therefore no breach of Art 10 had occurred.

182 See further Pannick, D, 'Religious Feelings and the European Court' [1995] PL 7.

183 Opinion of the Commission: (1994) 19 EHRR CD 54. Judgment of 25 November 1996, Case 19/1995/525/611; (1996) 24 EHRR 1. For further discussion, see Ghandi, S and James, J, 'The English law of blasphemy and the European Convention on Human Rights' [1998] EHRLR 430.

184 Wingrove v UK (1994) 76-A DR 26.

185 Judgment in draft form, p 22.

186 Ibid, para 60.

It is suggested that this judgment strongly resembles that in Otto-Preminger in revealing a strange failure in a court of human rights to understand or afford weight to the familiar free speech justifications. The judgment reveals an inability to appreciate that a complete ban on a film is especially difficult to defend if the principle of moral autonomy is to be given any weight. It failed to understand the value of allowing dissent, not only from established views of religious figures, but also from such views as to their proper portrayal. In placing so much emphasis on the question of the manner of the portrayal, it shows a readiness to stifle artistic initiative, thereby preventing the free debate of the ideas the film portrays and also preventing, or at least strongly curbing, the outgrowths in terms of further artistic exploration of similar ideas, that it might have fostered.

Domestic approaches to blasphemy law under the HRA

Where the European Court of Human Rights leaves a wide margin of appreciation to member states in determining the extent of the exceptions to a Convention right, this could be taken to imply that, at least until a common European conception of the width of the exception emerges, states have the main responsibility for ensuring that rigorous human rights standards are maintained. It is suggested that the ease with which publications can infringe blasphemy law in the UK does not represent a maintenance of such standards and that therefore, reform of blasphemy law should be attempted, now that the HRA is in force, by domestic judges who are not trammelled by the margin of appreciation doctrine. Moreover, given the widespread criticism of the decisions in Otto-Preminger and Wingrove, and the failure to understand basic principles of freedom of expression that they reveal, there are strong grounds for arguing that the domestic courts should not follow them, but should look for guidance to the Commission in both instances, and to courts in other jurisdictions in order to achieve a more developed understanding of those principles.

For example, in the well known judgment in Cohen v California,[187] the US Supreme Court found that a political view expressed in profane terms was protected by the First Amendment; it said: 'much linguistic expression serves a dual communicative function: it conveys not only ideas capable of relatively precise, detached explication, but otherwise inexpressible emotions as well . . . words are often chosen as much for their emotive as their cognitive force. We cannot sanction the view that the Constitution, while solicitous of the cognitive content of individual speech, has little regard for that emotive function which, practically speaking, may often be the most important element of the overall message sought to be communicated.' These words would clearly be equally applicable to a film such as Council in Heaven, which had both an emotive and a cognitive function, or to Visions of Ecstasy, which had a largely emotive function.

There are at least two clear reasons why some change is needed in the current law. First, from a pragmatic point of view, the present situation, since it is perceived 187 (1971) 403 US 15, 25–6. The decision, regarding the words 'Fuck the draft', could be viewed as affected by being taken in the context of political speech. Nevertheless, lower courts have applied the words regarding emotive communication to visual expression that cannot be regarded as political expression: Cinevision Corp v City of Burbank 7456 F 2d 560, p 569 (concerning music) and Birkenshaw v Haley (1974) 409 F Supp 13 ED Mich (concerning mime).

by Muslims as unfair, is a considerable source of racial tension: it both engenders feelings of anger and alienation in the Muslim community and, when these feelings are expressed through such activities as book burning and attacks on booksellers stocking The Satanic Verses, increased feelings of hostility towards Muslims in certain sections of the non-Muslim population. Secondly, from the liberal point of view broadly endorsed in this book, it is indefensible that the state should single out one group of citizens and protect their religious feelings while others are without such protection. In what follows, therefore, the question whether blasphemy law should be extended, abolished or replaced by an offence of incitement to religious hatred, will be considered from the point of view of the philosophical justifications which would support each alternative. The probable effect of each course of action on racial tension will also be briefly considered. This discussion is premised upon the argument outlined in Chapter 1 that free speech, as a strong individual right, should be infringed only if a similar individual right is threatened by speech, or if the values which lead us to support free speech are not at issue in the instant case, or if the speech carries a real risk of substantial damage to the well being of society.

When blasphemy law is considered in suitable instances under the HRA, the arguments for its abolition or extension are likely to be canvassed. Since blasphemy is a common law doctrine, the judges are, it is suggested, at liberty to abolish, extend or curtail it, under s 6 of the HRA. The argument to extend the blasphemy law to cover other faiths would clearly find support in principle if the present law is viewed as having a firm basis in Convention values.[188] It receives strong support, it is suggested, from the decision in Otto-Preminger which would have to be taken into account by the domestic judiciary, under s 2 of the HRA, in a suitable case. It could be argued that since the Strasbourg Court has found that Art 9 covers a right to be free from the knowledge that expression offensive to one's religious beliefs is occurring in one's locality, and that that right further covers the a ban on such speech that covers the whole country, the reach of Art 9 has been greatly extended. Muslims could readily argue that the sale of a book or showing of a film with a theme similar to that of The Satanic Verses, amounts on this argument to a violation of their Art 9 rights and that a complete ban, as opposed to a very restricted sale, confined to certain localities, would therefore be warranted. Article 14 could also be invoked in conjunction with Art 9. The argument of the European Commission on Human Rights in Choudhury,[189] to the effect that Art 9 does not include a positive obligation on the part of the state to protect religious sensibilities, may be doubted on the basis that positive obligations have been accepted 188 For general discussion of this issue, see 'Speech, religious discrimination and blasphemy' (1989: Proceedings of the American Society of International Law, p 427 et seq. and, in particular, Reisman's article, pp 435–39: he makes out an elegant thesis that attempts such as Ayatollah Khomeni's, to punish and deter unorthodox references to the Koran, amount to a 'claim of the right to exclusive control of major symbols of global culture and the prerogative of deciding how they are to be used artistically' (p 437). He expresses concern over 'the support lent by religious leaders in the West' to this claim and the criticism of Rushdie expressed by some of them. He warns that imposing censorship on artists or forcing them to internalise such censorship through insisting that free expression amounts to a form of religious intolerance will lead to the deterioration of the arts: creative endeavour will become a kind of 'communal Rubik cube in which a limited number of approved elements are moved feverishly round in an ever decreasing number of "new" combinations' (p 439).

189 Choudhury v UK (1991) No 17349/1990; (1991) 12 HRLJ 172.

under Art 8.[190] The Art 7 problem would still have to be overcome and it is suggested that, since the decision as to the reach of rights to freedom of religion in Otto-Preminger is out of line with the stance in most 'civilised nations',[191] the exception under Art 7(2) could not be invoked successfully.[192]

There are practical difficulties, based on the nature of the HRA, in seeking to rely on Art 9 in relation to a bookseller or a film producer or a broadcaster. Probably a Muslim group would not have standing (s 7(3)) under s 7(1)(a) to bring an action based on a free standing application of Art 9 and, in any event, the other party would not normally be a public authority. The 'victim' provision under s 7(3) would obviously still create a difficulty, but there would be the possibility of bringing an action based solely on Art 9 where a public authority, such as a media regulator, or the BBC, was involved. If a remedy was available, it would presumably take the form of an injunction, since the Convention cannot be used to create criminal liability. But the most obvious, and, as indicated, probably the only, vehicle existing in domestic law on which to base an Art 9 argument is blasphemy law. The result of an attempt to use the blasphemy law might end in an application for judicial review, as in Choudhury. A Muslim group would base their application on the ordinary standing rules, as in Choudhury, and then rely on s 7(1)(b) in order to argue that their Art 9 and 14 rights should be afforded recognition.

But, practical issues aside, the key issue of principle concerns the validity of the arguments that freedom of expression should give way to a right to freedom of religion that includes the right not to be offended by the promulgation of expression that offends against religious sensibilities. To evaluate the force of this argument, it is necessary first to identify which, if any, of the rationales for blasphemy law would provide support for both its continued existence and extension, and which would not. Three rationales will be considered in turn: the argument from the protection of society, the argument from preventing individual distress and the argument from the right to religious freedom. The point of view which sees blasphemy law as protecting those shared beliefs of a society which are essential to its survival[193] would not, it is submitted, support the extension of the law to cover other faiths; the law would then be protecting a whole set of conflicting beliefs and thus supporting religious pluralism, not the survival of religious conformity. It may be argued that the law should uphold religious pluralism

190 See Chapter 9, pp 816–20.

191 The fact that, as the Court noted in Wingrove, para 57, 'the application of [blasphemy laws in Europe] is becoming increasingly rare and several states . . . have recently repealed them altogether . . .' would also support this contention. In the US, the First Amendment provides expressly that 'Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, nor prohibiting the free exercise thereof' and in Joseph Burstyn Inc v Wilson (1952) 343 US 495, an attempt to stop the screening of a film on the ground that it was blasphemous failed. The decision made it clear that the offence of blasphemy could not be sustained since it was entirely opposed to First Amendment principles. See also the famous 'Nazis at Skokie' decisions: Collin v Smith (1978) 578 F 2d 1197, 7th Cir, (1978) 436 US 953, (1978) 439 US 916; Skokie v Nat Socialist Party (1978) 373 NE 2d 21; it raised issues which have parallels with those in Otto-Preminger.

192 See Chapter 2, pp 66–68.

193 Lord Devlin is usually associated with the thesis that society may justifiably protect its shared moral beliefs through the criminal law: see his The Enforcement of Morals, 1965, OUP. It is arguable that the protection of society was, historically at least, one of the purposes of blasphemy law: see, e.g., Taylor's case [1676] 1 Vent 293 in which it was said: 'For to say, Religion is a cheat is to dissolve all those obligations whereby civil societies are preserved.'

as a shared belief, but abolition of the offence of blasphemy would do this far more simply than extension.

The argument that blasphemy laws are justified because they protect individual believers from mental anguish immediately runs into a host of problems over extension of the law. For if one is concerned to protect individuals from the mental distress which can flow from attacks on deeply held beliefs,[194] it is not readily apparent that society should not also outlaw attacks upon deeply held non-religious beliefs, such as a deep belief in the equality of the sexes.[195] But one would then arrive at a position in which the criminal law would be being used to prevent people from attacking or insulting the deep beliefs of others. Arguably, such a law would be unworkable, since it would require judgments to be made about indeterminable matters such as the depth at which a belief was held. More importantly, not only would such a law represent a major infringement of the individual's freedom of speech, offering only the prevention of distress as a justification, it would be philosophically indefensible besides. If we are really committed to the notion that free discussion is the best way to arrive at the truth,[196] it seems nonsensical to abandon that position when our most important beliefs are at stake; if anything, we should be most concerned precisely to encourage free discussion of our deep beliefs since, almost axiomatically, it is our deepest beliefs which we most wish to be true.

It is submitted that the only justification for continuance of the blasphemy law which could offer it even prima facie support is the argument from the right to religious freedom, which is protected under Art 9 of the Convention. The need to provide such protection is also viewed as falling within the 'rights of others' exception to Art 10 and, therefore, as arguably justifying the banning of publications that might offend religious sensibilities, as the Court of Human Rights found in Otto-Preminger and Wingrove. It is contended that the argument accepted by the Court that such publications infringe Art 9 is deeply flawed. In order to demonstrate this, it is necessary to consider the substantive contention that, as Poulter puts it:

> Freedom of religion is . . . a valuable human right and it may be doubted whether it can be fully enjoyed in practice if the state allows religious beliefs to be vilified and insulted in a gratuitous manner.[197]

The first assertion made here, about the value of religious freedom, is of course readily conceded. However, the argument, as expressed by the Court of Human Rights, then goes on to assume that the state is under a positive duty to facilitate the full enjoyment 194 Note, e.g., the dicta of Lord Scarman in Lemon [1979] AC 617, p 620 to the effect that 'there is a case for legislation extending [blasphemy law] to protect the religious beliefs and feelings of non-Christians'. Arguably, however, he saw protection of feelings as ultimately aimed at 'the internal tranquillity of the Kingdom'.

195 Recognising this, a number of commentators have attempted to frame definitions of 'religious belief' in which the term includes both actual religious convictions and those beliefs which hold a place in people's minds analogous to that held by religious belief. See, e.g., Clements, 'Defining 'religion' in the First Amendment: a functional approach' (1989) 74 Cornell LR 532.

196 For an exposition of this theory, see above, pp 302–3.

197 Poulter, S, 'Towards legislative reform of the blasphemy and racial hatred laws' [1991] PL 371, p 376.

in practice of its citizens' right to freedom of religion, taking that term to encompass a duty to prevent attacks on religion which take a certain objected-to form. This is surely a mistaken view; rather, it is submitted, the right to religious freedom is violated if one is not free to choose, express and manifest one's religious beliefs:[198] the right is not so violated simply because one is not protected from mental suffering caused by verbal attacks upon one's religion or offensive portrayals of it. As Van Dijk and Van Hoof put it in one of the leading texts: 'this decision [in Otto-Preminger] is mistaken. The screening of the film in no way would have limited or inhibited Roman Catholics in manifesting their religion . . . a right [not to be insulted in one's religious views] is not included in Article 9 but is on the contrary inconsistent with the "pluralism indissociable from a democratic society"[199] embedded in Article 9.'[200]

Even if it were to be accepted for the purposes of argument that the religious freedom of those from Christian faiths should be protected by the blasphemy law, it is denied that this finding would be a conclusive argument for continuing or, a fortiori, extending the protection. If Poulter's contention, and that of the Court of Human Rights, are correct, then we are confronted by a situation in which two important individual rights – freedom of religion and freedom of speech – come into conflict with each other. In such a situation, it is surely reasonable not simply to assume that freedom of religion should override freedom of speech, but rather to attempt to weigh up which right would suffer most if the other was given precedence. If this is done, the argument runs as follows: if there was no offence of blasphemy, this might mean that on occasion some distress, perhaps acute, would be associated with the practice of one's religion, although those aware that they might suffer distress can normally take steps to ensure that they do not encounter the offending publication. If there is such an offence, it might mean that use of the coercive sanctions of the law would severely damage the liberty to write creatively or speak one's mind freely on religious matters.[201] Clearly, the damage done to freedom of religion if there is no blasphemy law is far less than the damage done to freedom of speech if there is one.

In any event, the argument that regards a blasphemy law as essential because the right to religious freedom demands it, immediately runs into difficulties since it is clearly necessary to define religion. One could not follow the path described above and define religion to include secular but deeply held beliefs, as one would then be placed in the absurd position of defending secular ideas from attack by reference to a right to religious freedom. Nor could one overcome this difficulty by adopting a pragmatic stance and framing a statute protecting only the five major world religions. If the individual's right to religious freedom demands protection against vilificatory

198 Thus, Art 18 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights provides that: 'Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief and freedom . . . in public or private to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.' Both the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (Art 18) and the European Convention (Art 9) contain very similar provisions.

199 Kokkinakis v Greece A 260-A, p 18.

200 Van Dijk, P and Van Hoof, F, Theory and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1998, p 551.

201 See Poulter S, 'Towards legislative reform of the blasphemy and racial hatred laws' [1991] PL 371, p 376. Poulter concedes that his proposed extension of the blasphemy law (pp 378 et seq.) might well have caught The Satanic Verses (pp 384–85).

attacks upon her religion,[202] and since presumably members of less well known religions are as entitled to religious freedom as members of the major religions, it follows that they must also be entitled to protection against such attacks. Clearly, therefore, a satisfactory definition of religion would have to be arrived at. The difficulties of framing such a definition have already been noted. In this connection, it is also worth recalling that the UN General Assembly Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and Discrimination Based on Religion and Belief, as one commentator notes, 'does not seek to define religion or belief'. He explains: 'This is because no definition could be agreed upon, as none could be agreed when the texts of Article 18 of the Universal Declaration and Article 18 of the ICCPR were drafted.'[203] Since, therefore, the impossibility of framing such a definition seems to be well attested to, it may reasonably be concluded that the project to extend blasphemy law to cover other faiths is fraught with difficulty.

On all these grounds, it is concluded that the argument that freedom of religion demands a blasphemy law, fails. It follows, if this view is accepted, that the abolition of the current law can readily be defended on Art 10 grounds without fear of offending against Art 9. Christian beliefs and doctrines could, therefore, be placed in the same position as Islamic or deeply held secular beliefs in that its adherents can choose to avert their eyes from distasteful portrayals of their beliefs, and to combat what they regard as untrue or unfair representations with – in their view – more truthful or more inspirational speech. In both Wingrove and Otto-Preminger, it was very unlikely that a religious adherent who might be offended would unwittingly view the film.

Abolition of the blasphemy law would tend to ease racial tension since at least it would be clear that Muslims and Christians were being accorded an equal lack of protection. This would be the better solution, since it is by no means clear that extending blasphemy law would ease the problem. Indeed, it is possible that if, for example, Muslims had been able to use an extended blasphemy law to suppress The Satanic Verses,[204] considerable resentment might well have been engendered in the non-Muslim community. The justified grievance felt by Muslims about the unfairness of the present law would, to a certain extent, be remedied if blasphemy was abolished altogether as an offence.

At present, however, this is not in prospect, although it is also probably fair to point out that blasphemy prosecutions have not been undertaken in recent years. The 25th anniversary of the conviction in Lemon of the publishers of Gay News and Professor Kirkup for blasphemy in relation to the poem, 'The Love that Dares to Speak its Name' was re-visited by a public reading of the poem in Trafalgar Square in 2002.[205] 11 speakers,[206] including writers, academics and MPs, each took a turn to read a verse of the poem. The event was intended as an act of civil disobedience, both to protest 202 This proposition is not conceded, as indicated. It is put forward by Poulter, 'Towards legislative reform of the blasphemy and racial hatred laws' [1991] PL 371–85.

203 Boyle, K, 'Religious intolerance and the incitement of hatred', in Coliver (ed), Striking a Balance: Hate Speech, Freedom of Expression and Non-discrimination, 1992, Article 19.

204 See Poulter S, 'Towards legislative reform of the blasphemy and racial hatred laws' [1991] PL 371.

205 See the account given at http://www.petertatchell.net/religion/blasphemy.htm.

206 Namely, Barry Duke, Shirley Dent, Jim Herrick, Jonathan Meades, George Melly, Professor Richard Norman, Sam Rimmer, Brian Sedgemore MP, Hanne Stinson, Peter Tatchell and Keith Wood.

against the infringement of free speech represented by the original prosecution, and in effect to defy the prosecuting authorities either to bring a prosecution, or declare the offence 'dead'. The police took no action against those reading the poem, but filmed the event and sent the film to the DPP, who decided not to bring a prosecution. The offence however cannot yet be dismissed as a dead letter. In 2005, in a written answer, a government spokesperson said: 'If material or conduct is gratuitously offensive to Christians, and is prosecuted as such, a finding of blasphemy may be the appropriate response by a court to ensure that the rights of others under Article 9 [of the Convention] are protected.'[207] In debate on the Religious Hatred Bill, however, the government did recognise that there was a serious issue to be considered in relation to the abolition of the law of blasphemy, but took the view that that Bill was not the right vehicle to achieve it, further consultation and consideration being necessary.[208] The offence may be viewed in Art 10 terms as deeply problematic, not least because its actus reus is so imprecise as to render it almost unusable in practice. Thus, until the introduction of the offence of incitement to religious hatred in 2006, Islamic belief and Muslims generally had no protection from speech-based attacks, while Christianity, subject to the caveats already noted, was over-protected. It is to the new religious hatred offence that this chapter now turns.

Incitement to racial and religious hatred

Hate speech: stirring up racial hatred[209]

Domestic provisions

The offence of stirring up racial hatred was introduced under s 6 of the Race Relations Act 1965, in order to meet public order concerns and protect persons from the effects on others of provocative and inflammatory racist expression. The Public Order Act 1936 was amended in order to include this offence, but Part III (ss 17–23) of the Public Order Act 1986 extends its ambit. Section 18 provides that liability will arise if threatening, abusive or insulting words or behaviour are used or written material of that nature is displayed, intended by the defendant to stir up racial hatred or which make it likely that racial hatred will be stirred up against a racial group (not a religious group) in Great Britain.[210] Where intent is not shown, it is necessary to show that the accused realised that the words used might be threatening, abusive or insulting.[211] Section 18(2) catches private or public meetings (unless held in a 'dwelling'). Section 19 makes it an offence to publish threatening, abusive or insulting material, either intended by the defendant to stir up racial hatred or which make it likely that racial hatred will be stirred up against a racial group. Section 21 extends the offence to the distributing, showing or playing of visual images or sounds. Section 20 makes it an offence to stir up racial hatred in the public performance of a play, but the likelihood that hatred will be stirred up must be judged by reference to 'all the circumstances' and 'in particular taking the performance as a whole'. Therefore, the context in which, for example, a character is racially abused must be considered: where the message of the play as a whole could not be viewed as one aimed at stirring up racial hatred, the offence will not be committed. Thus, plays that explore the theme of racism in society should escape liability.

207 Official Report, 3 March 2005; co WA 40.

208 See HL Deb, col 540 (8 Nov 2005).

209 For recent discussion and literature referred to below, see: Hare, I, 'Crosses, Crescents and Sacred Cows: Criminalising Incitement to Religious Hatred' (2006) Autumn PL 2006, 521–38; Goodall, K, 'Incitement to Religious Hatred: All talk and no substance' [2007] 70(1) MLR 89–113; Hare, I, 'Legislating Against Hate: the Legal Response to Bias Crimes' (1997) 17 OJLS 415. For general discussion of this offence and its background, see: Cotterell, R [1982] PL 378; Dickey [1968] Crim LR 489; Gordon, Incitement to Racial Hatred, 1982; Leopold, P [1977] PL 389; Wolffe [1987] PL 85; Bindman, G (1982) 132 NLJ 299; Williams, DGT [1966] Crim LR 320; Weinstein, J, 'First Amendment challenges to hate crime legislation: where's the speech?' (1992) 11 Criminal Justice Ethics 6; Law Commission Report No 145, Offences against Religion and Public Worship, 1985. See Chapter 14, pp 1416–21 for discussion of the new offence of 'glorifying' terrorism.

Section 22 makes it an offence to use threatening, abusive or insulting visual images or sounds in a programme, intended by the defendant to stir up racial hatred, or which make it likely that racial hatred will be stirred up against a racial group. Section 164(2) of the Broadcasting Act 1990 amended s 22 so that it covers 'programme services', including cable programme services. The offence under s 22 can be committed by the programme producer, director, the television company and any person 'by whom the offending words or behaviour are used'. This is a broadly worded offence which encourages caution in producing programmes about the problem of racism, since it can be committed without any intent on the part of the producer or the company. Programmes can only be shown if it is made clear, editorially, that the message of racists is disapproved of. Section 23 of the 1986 Act places further obstacles in the way of those producing programmes about racism, particularly historical programmes. Section 23, as amended by s 164(4) of the Broadcasting Act 1990, creates an offence of possessing racially inflammatory (threatening, abusive or insulting) material with a view, in the case of written material, to publication or distribution and, in the case of a recording, to its being distributed, shown, played or included in a programme service, intended by the person possessing it to stir up racial hatred or which makes it likely, having regard to all the circumstances, that racial hatred will be stirred up. Television researchers must be sure that historical material will be placed in a context which makes it clear that its message is disapproved of.

These offences have a number of elements in common. None of them requires a need to show that disorder was caused, or that there was an intent to cause disorder, and there is no need to show that racial hatred is actually stirred up. It is not an essential ingredient to show that there was an intent to stir up racial hatred. It is sufficient to show that hatred might actually be stirred up. In that circumstance, s 18 imports an element of mens 210 'Racial group' is defined using the same terms as under the Race Relations Act; see Chapter 15, pp 1507–8. The result is that, e.g., hatred may be stirred up against Muslims – so long as the offence under the 1986 Act, s 5 (see Chapter 8, pp 780–85) is not committed – but not against Sikhs.

211 Section 18(5) governs the mens rea if it is not shown that the defendant intended to stir up racial hatred. He must intend the words, etc, to be or be aware that they might be, threatening, abusive or insulting. 'Awareness' as used in the 1986 Act seems to mean subjective recklessness.

rea, but the other sections do not, a very significant difference.[212] The offence might be committed by broadcasting or using or promulgating words or material by the methods indicated above, threatening, abusive or insulting matter which, objectively speaking, is incapable of stirring up racial hatred so long as the accused intended that it should do so. It may be noted that the s 18 offence is the only public order offence which may be committed by words alone unaccompanied by the need – as an essential ingredient – to show any likelihood that they would cause distress, since the offence could be committed by uttering words which were greeted with delight by those who heard them. But of most significance is the possibility that criminal liability can arise owing to the promulgation of material likely to stir up racial hatred unintentionally. These offences represent a restriction based on manner rather than content due to their specific requirements. Reasoned argument of a racist nature would not incur liability, since the racist words or material must be threatening, abusive or insulting. Further, the term 'hatred' is a strong one: merely causing offence or bringing into ridicule is not enough and nor is racial harassment. The difficulty of showing that race hatred would be likely to be stirred up or that the defendant intended to stir up race hatred was demonstrated when jurors cleared Nick Griffin of using words or behaviour intended to stir up racial hatred in 2006. He was accused of using words or behaviour intended to stir up racial hatred, and faced two alternative counts of using words or behaviour likely to stir up racial hatred. He was charged after making a speech to British National Party (BNP) supporters at a pub in Keighley, West Yorkshire, in January 2004. In it, he described Islam as a 'wicked, vicious faith' and said that Muslims were turning Britain into a 'multiracial hellhole'. The BNP's head of publicity, Mark Collett, was cleared of similar charges. He had referred to asylum seekers as 'cockroaches' and had told the Keighley gathering: 'Let's show these ethnics the door in 2004'. Nick Griffin told the jury that his speech was not an attack on Asians in general, but on Muslims. Mark Collett said that the speeches had only been intended to motivate BNP members to take part in 'legal and democratic' campaigning.[213] The speeches had been filmed by an undercover BBC reporter and were later broadcast as part of the documentary The Secret Policeman. The verdict caused a furore amongst anti-racist campaigners since, as a number of organisations stated, had the two been convicted that would not only have indicated the point at which racist speech would not be tolerated by the law, but also it would have indicated the law's intolerance of Islamophobia in British society.[214] The acquittals led to comments from Cabinet members to the media about the possible need for a review of the race hatred law in Parliament.[215] The new religious hatred offences, discussed below, would cover attacks on Muslims, as opposed to attacks on Asians generally, but it is unclear that they would have led to convictions had they been deployed in the Griffin case since they are so narrowly drawn.

212 See above, fn 211. The other sections provide a defence – in effect, a reversed mens rea: the defendant could prove that he was not aware of the content of the recording/material/broadcast and had no reason to suspect that it was threatening, etc.

213 See the Guardian, 10 November 2006.

214 A spokesman for the Islamic Human Rights Commission said: 'I am very disappointed. I think this judgment is going to have very grave consequences indeed. It gives a very wrong message to the whole of society, both to the victims of his words and to those who are supporters of his racist and Islamophobic views and the promotion of them.' Sabby Dhalu, of Unite Against Fascism, commented in similar terms. (See the Guardian 10 November 2006.)

215 See the Guardian, 11 November 2006.

Thus, the current race hatred offences are relatively narrowly conceived; although they cover political expression, they concentrate on the manner of the expression. Further, it is hard to conceive that the manner – the form of threats – could itself be defended by reference to the free speech justifications discussed in the Introduction to Part II. The terms 'abuse, insults' are significantly broader. Where the threat, etc, is thematically appropriate since it is placed within a context, such as a play or film touching on the theme or subject of racism, it would probably fall outside the area of liability, since all the circumstances must be taken into account. The breadth of the offences relating to broadcasting are particularly problematic, since, as suggested above, they are likely to deter the production of documentaries dealing with the subject of racism. This position has been exacerbated by the addition of offences of incitement to religious hatred as discussed below.

Impact of the HRA?

Is the expression 'likely to stir up racial hatred' covered by Art 10(1)? In other words, would it be viewed as protected expression at all? In Lehideux and Isornia v France[216] it was found that if material is directed towards attacking the Convention's underlying values, it will be outside the protection of Art 10.[217] In that instance, the material supported a pro-Nazi policy. However, in Kuhnen v FRG,[218] Art 10 was found to cover the conviction of the applicant for advocating the reinstitution of the Nazi Party, although the interference was justified under Art 10(2). Similarly, Art 10 applied in Glimmerveen and Hagenbeeck v Netherlands. The applicants had been convicted of possessing leaflets which incited racial discrimination. The interference was found to be justified under Art 10(2). In that instance, Art 17 was relied upon.[219] Where racist expression is concerned, reliance on Art 17, either in addition to Art 10(2) or alone, tends to produce the same result: the interference is found to be justified and the review is not intensive.[220]

Jersild[221] concerned an application by a Danish journalist who had been convicted of an offence of racially offensive speech after preparing and broadcasting a programme about racism which included overtly racist speech by the subjects of the documentary. A breach of Art 10 was found. The interference with expression was found to be disproportionate to the aim pursued – protecting the rights of others. The Court stressed that its finding was directed to the value of enabling the media to act as a public watchdog. The news value of the programme was a matter that could be best assessed by professional journalists. The Court also considered that the mode of presenting the broadcast should be determined by journalists. Had the racists who spoke on the programme applied to Strasbourg, their own convictions would have been found to be justified under Art 10(2), if indeed Art 10(1) would have been applicable, which is doubtful.

216 (1998) 5 BHRC 540.
217 Ibid, p 558, para 53.
218 (1988) 56 DR 205.
219 (1979) 18 DR 187. See Chapter 2, p 112.
220 See X v Germany (1982) 29 DR 194; T v Belgium (1983) 34 DR 158; H, W, P and K v Austria (1989) 62 DR 216.
221 Jersild v Denmark (1994) 19 EHRR 1.

It seems to be clear that persons directly using threatening or abusive or insulting speech likely to stir up racial hatred would not obtain any benefit by invoking Art 10. But the position of those who aid in the dissemination of such speech, who do not have the purpose of stirring up racial hatred, is different. It is arguable that UK law does not draw a sufficiently clear distinction between the two groups. Jersild suggests that the restrictions on broadcasting in relation to racial hatred are open to challenge under the HRA since it would seem possible that if an equivalent situation arose in the UK, the presenter and producer of the programme could be convicted of the offence under s 22 of the 1986 Act. Possibly television researchers involved could also be convicted of the broader offence under s 23.

It is argued as a matter of principle that the prohibition of incitement to racial hatred under the Public Order Act creates an unacceptable infringement of freedom of speech since the offences as currently conceived go beyond the mischief that they are intended to prevent. There is an argument that some provision should be available to prevent some forms of racist speech owing to its special propensity to lead to disorder and that such protection should be extended to religious groups, but it is argued that the Public Order Act offences require reform to encompass a much more narrowly targeted area of liability. Such reform could be effected by narrowing them on the model now represented by the new offence of religious hatred. Possibly s 3 HRA could be relied upon, if necessary, to interpret the term 'circumstances' used in Part 3 of the 1986 Act narrowly. The term is used, as indicated above, in respect of material likely to stir up racial hatred rather than in respect of instances where the defendant intended to do so. No 'public good' defence is included in the 1986 Act. But consideration of the 'circumstances' could include consideration of the extent to which the broadcast or other material was for the public good in terms of its artistic or other merit. Since this is a strained interpretation, s 3 of the HRA might need to be relied upon, in order to achieve compatibility with the demands of Art 10 in respect of a particular provision, in particular ss 22 and 23 of the 1986 Act. Section 6 of the HRA could be relied upon, to find an application of the provision in question which would ensure compatibility with Art 10. For example, in 2007 competitors in the Channel 4 show Big Brother made allegedly racist remarks during the live show. If the presenter and producer of the programme were prosecuted under the s 22 offence of the 1986 Act Jersild would be relevant under s 2 HRA. It could be argued that s 22 should be narrowly construed in order to avoid bringing anyone other than the competitors themselves within the net of liability, on the grounds of proportionality. [222]

Incitement to religious hatred

The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, to which the UK is a signatory, requires contracting states to prohibit the advocacy of 'national, racial or religious hatred that constitutes incitement to discrimination, hostility or violence' (Art 20, emphasis added). In practical terms, it is fairly straightforward to amend ss 17–23 of Part III of the Public Order Act 1986 prohibiting incitement to racial hatred,[223] to include religious groups.[224] The first attempt to introduce an offence of inciting religious hatred was made by Lord Avebury's Bill in 2000, which was remitted to a committee for consideration; Cl 38 the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Bill 2001 provided for such amendation but was defeated by the Lords; the third attempt appeared in the Serious and Organised Crime Bill 2004; the provision was dropped in order to allow the Bill to go through Parliament in time for the 2005 General Election. The Racial and Religious Hatred Act 2005 now represents the successful conclusion of the fourth attempt to introduce the new offence.

222 A somewhat similar argument was used in Percy v DPP; [2001] EWHC 1125 (Admin).

The Racial and Religious Hatred Act 2005 outlaws incitement to religious hatred. Under s 9B, amending Part 3 of the 1986 Act, a person who uses threatening words or behaviour, or displays threatening written material is guilty of an offence if he intends thereby to stir up religious hatred, and the subsequent sections apply this offence to the media.[225] The Act leaves unchanged the five main ways in which the offence can be committed. These are:

223 For discussion of racial hatred in the context of freedom of speech, see Robertson and Nichol, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 3, pp 129–32; Barendt, op. cit., fn 1 (1st edn), pp 161–67 and generally Cotterell, R [1982] PL 378; Dickey [1968] Crim LR 489; Gordon, Incitement to Racial Hatred, 1982; Leopold, P [1977] PL 389; Wolffe [1987] PL 85. For the argument that the state should seek to ban racially motivated hate speech on the basis of furtherance of equality just as it seeks to outlaw discrimination in employment, see MacKinnon, op. cit., fn 1. For criticism of the argument, see Sadurski, W, 'On 'Seeing speech through an equality lens': a critique of egalitarian arguments for suppression of hate speech and pornography' (1996) 16(4) OJLS 713.

224 The definition under the Race Relations Act of 'racial group' which will be used under the Public Order Act 1986 does not include religious groups; see Mandla v Dowell Lee [1983] 2 AC 548; [1983] 1 All ER 1062, HL. But discrimination on grounds of religion can be viewed as indirect racial discrimination.

225 In the Public Order Act 1986 (c. 64), after Part 3 insert –
'Part 3A
Hatred against persons on religious grounds
Meaning of 'religious hatred'

29A Meaning of 'religious hatred'

In this Part 'religious hatred' means hatred against a group of persons defined by reference to religious belief or lack of religious belief.

Acts intended to stir up religious hatred

29B Use of words or behaviour or display of written material

(1) A person who uses threatening words or behaviour, or displays any written material which is threatening, is guilty of an offence if he intends thereby to stir up religious hatred.
(2) An offence under this section may be committed in a public or a private place, except that no offence is committed where the words or behaviour are used, or the written material is displayed, by a person inside a dwelling and are not heard or seen except by other persons in that or another dwelling.
(3) A constable may arrest without warrant anyone he reasonably suspects is committing an offence under this section.
(4) In proceedings for an offence under this section it is a defence for the accused to prove that he was inside a dwelling and had no reason to believe that the words or behaviour used, or the written material displayed, would be heard or seen by a person outside that or any other dwelling.

- the use of words or behaviour or display of written material (s 18, Public Order Act 1986);
- publishing or distributing written material (s 19);
- the public performance of a play (s 20);
- distributing, showing or playing a recording (s 21); and
- broadcasting or including a programme in a programme service (s 22).
- publishing or distributing written material (s 19).

The version of the Bill that received Royal Assent included a number of Lords' amendments aimed at protecting freedom of expression. Ministers had urged MPs to reject the Lords' amendments and back instead a government compromise. On 1 February the government suffered two defeats over its attempts to overturn changes

(5) This section does not apply to words or behaviour used, or written material displayed, solely for the purpose of being included in a programme service.

29C Publishing or distributing written material

(1) A person who publishes or distributes written material which is threatening is guilty of an offence if he intends thereby to stir up religious hatred.

(2) References in this Part to the publication or distribution of written material are to its publication or distribution to the public or a section of the public.

29D Public performance of play

(1) If a public performance of a play is given which involves the use of threatening words or behaviour, any person who presents or directs the performance is guilty of an offence if he intends thereby to stir up religious hatred.

(2) This section does not apply to a performance given solely or primarily for one or more of the following purposes –

(a) rehearsal,

(b) making a recording of the performance, or

(c) enabling the performance to be included in a programme service;

but if it is proved that the performance was attended by persons other than those directly connected with the giving of the performance or the doing in relation to it of the things mentioned in paragraph (b) or (c), the performance shall, unless the contrary is shown, be taken not to have been given solely or primarily for the purpose mentioned above.

(3) For the purposes of this section –

(a) a person shall not be treated as presenting a performance of a play by reason only of his taking part in it as a performer,

(b) a person taking part as a performer in a performance directed by another shall be treated as a person who directed the performance if without reasonable excuse he performs otherwise than in accordance with that person's direction,

and

(c) a person shall be taken to have directed a performance of a play given under his direction notwithstanding that he was not present during the performance;

and a person shall not be treated as aiding or abetting the commission of an offence under this section by reason only of his taking part in a performance as a performer.

(4) In this section 'play' and 'public performance' have the same meaning as in the Theatres Act 1968. (5) The following provisions of the Theatres Act 1968 apply in relation to an offence under this section as they apply to an offence under section 2 of that Act – section 9 (script as evidence of what was performed), section 10 (power to make copies of script), section 15 (powers of entry and inspection).

that the Lords had imposed on Racial and Religious Hatred Bill.[226] The votes came after large numbers of persons protested against the Bill outside Parliament. The Lords did some excellent work in free speech terms: they imposed an amendment ensuring that only 'threatening' words should be banned, not those which are only abusive or insulting. This was a very significant amendment since 'insulting' is clearly the most problematic term used in the 1986 Act, in free speech terms. They also ensured that the offence could only be committed intentionally. Under the 1986 Act, the offence can be committed either by means of specific intent – if the 'speaker' . . . 'intends thereby to stir up racial hatred' – or if, 'having regard to all the circumstances, racial hatred is likely to be stirred up thereby.'[227] This part of the Act, allowing for a conviction without intention to incite racial hatred, and indeed, in situations in which no racial hatred was in fact stirred up,[228] has been subject to criticism. The amendments introduced in the House of Lords[229] mean that it is harder to establish that the offence of incitement to religious hatred has been committed than it is to establish incitement to racial hatred since there is no alternative to proving that specific intent is present.

The Lords further imposed a saving clause for freedom of expression (now s 29J), specifying that:

> Nothing in this Part shall be read or given effect in a way which prohibits or restricts discussion, criticism or expressions of antipathy, dislike, ridicule, insult

29E Distributing, showing or playing a recording

(1) A person who distributes, or shows or plays, a recording of visual images or sounds which are threatening is guilty of an offence if he intends thereby to stir up religious hatred.

29F Broadcasting or including programme in cable programme service

(1) If a programme involving threatening visual images or sounds is included in a programme service, each of the persons mentioned in subsection (2) is guilty of an offence if he intends thereby to stir up religious hatred. (2) The persons are –

(a) the person providing the programme service,
(b) any person by whom the programme is produced or directed, and
(c) any person by whom offending words or behaviour are used.

Inflammatory material

29G Possession of inflammatory material

(1) A person who has in his possession written material which is threatening, or a recording of visual images or sounds which are threatening, with a view to –

(a) in the case of written material, its being displayed, published, distributed, or included in a programme service whether by himself or another, or
(b) in the case of a recording, its being distributed, shown, played, or included in a programme service, whether by himself or another, is guilty of an offence if he intends religious hatred to be stirred up thereby.

(2) For this purpose regard shall be had to such display, publication, distribution, showing, playing, or inclusion in a programme service.

226 In the first vote MPs voted by 288 votes to 278 to back the Lords amendments to the Bill. In the second vote, MPs voted by 283 votes to 282 to back the Lords.

227 Section 18 POA 1096; similar wording is used in all the other offences in ss 19–22.

228 Possible because the Act only requires that it be likely that hatred be stirred up, not that it actually was.

229 The measures referred to are those in the Bill as they were amended by the Lords on 15 October 2005.

> or abuse of particular religions or the beliefs or practices of their adherents, or of any other belief system or the beliefs or practices of its adherents, or proselytising or urging adherents of a different religion or belief system to cease practising their religion or belief system.

So satirising religion in films or plays or broadcasts by comedians cannot be an offence. The saving for free expression which is now s 29J makes it hard to imagine situations in which this offence could be used – since the saving is so broad. It could only be used where 'threatening' words were used intended to incite religious hatred, as opposed to being intended to express antipathy to religion. That leaves a very narrow area of liability. It is possible to imagine a situation in which a person was seeking, via such words, to arouse persons to hatred against eg Muslims, as opposed merely to expressing antipathy to Islamic beliefs, but the lines drawn are fine indeed.

However, the offences under the new Act could have been narrowed further. The new offences do not require a need to show that disorder was caused, or that there was an intent to cause disorder, and there is no need to show that religious hatred is actually stirred up, or even that in the circumstances it was likely to be stirred up. The offences might be committed by using or promulgating threatening words or material by the methods indicated above, which, objectively speaking, were incapable of stirring up religious hatred so long as the accused intended that they should do so. The various offences could be committed by uttering words or promulgating material which were greeted with delight by the audience. It may be pointed out that the cl 29B offence is noteworthy as a public order offence which may be committed by words alone unaccompanied by the need – as an essential ingredient – to show any likelihood that they would cause distress.

The fact that in all the media contexts mentioned offences of stirring up religious hatred can now also be committed, creates a serious inroad into freedom of expression. However, the impact of the provisions can be curbed. Prosecutions for the offences of stirring up racial or religious hatred can only be brought with the consent of the Attorney General, which has so far been sparingly given in respect of race hatred. Since the Attorney General is a public authority under the HRA, he or she should give careful consideration to Art 10 before giving consent. If prosecutions are brought, the courts are in the same position. They need not, as argued above, give weight to Art 9, on the ground that protection for religious freedom does not include protection against attacks on religion. The term 'hatred' should be given full weight, while the term 'insulting' should, it is argued, be interpreted as meaning – insulting to the reasonable, tolerant religious adherent rather than in relation to adherents of a particular sect (or group within a religion) which may be of an extreme nature.

Possibly s 3 HRA could be relied upon, if necessary, to narrow down relevant terms used in Part 3 of the 1986 Act, as amended by the 2005 Act. The 2005 Bill was accompanied by a statement of compatibility under s 19 of the HRA. But, as Chapter 2 argues, such a statement leaves the judges free to consider compatibility afresh. It may be argued that rather than strive to ensure compatibility, a declaration of incompatibility should be made in order to mark the dangerous potential of the new provisions and to invite Parliament to think again. The view of the Joint Committee on Human Rights on the compatibility of the Bill as originally drafted with Art 10 was as follows:

> We accept the existence of a serious, albeit limited, problem of incitement to hatred on religious grounds. We consider that the measures proposed in the Bill are unlikely to give rise to any violation of the right to freedom of expression under Article 10 of the ECHR.[230]

The recent decision in Norwood v UK,[231] indicates that this view is correct. The applicant belonged to the BNP. The facts were as follows:

> Between November 2001 and 9 January 2002 he displayed in the window of his first-floor flat a large poster . . . supplied by the BNP, with a photograph of the Twin Towers in flame, the words 'Islam out of Britain – Protect the British People' and a symbol of a crescent and star in a prohibition sign.[232]

He was convicted in a magistrates court of the offence under section 5 of the Public Order Act of displaying 'any writing, sign or other visible representation which is threatening, abusive or insulting, within the hearing or sight of a person likely to be caused harassment, alarm or distress thereby'. He was moreover convicted of having committed the offence in religiously aggravated way. He unsuccessfully appealed his conviction to the High Court,[233] which found that the restriction upon his freedom of expression right represented by the offence was proportionate to the legitimate aim of protecting the rights of others, given also the fact that the speech arguably fell within Art 17 ECHR.[234] One of the applicant's arguments was that there was no evidence that any Muslim had in fact seen the poster. The Strasbourg Court, in a brief judgment, found the application inadmissible; in doing so it referred to Art 17:

> Such a general, vehement attack against a religious group, linking the group as a whole with a grave act of terrorism, is incompatible with the values proclaimed and guaranteed by the Convention, notably tolerance, social peace and non-discrimination. The applicant's display of the poster in his window constituted an act within the meaning of Article 17, which did not, therefore, enjoy the protection of Articles 10 or 14.[235]

Given this judgment, it seems likely that prosecutions under the new law, provided they were used only in clear-cut cases, would be found to be compatible with Art 10. But ss 3 and 6 could possibly be relied upon in more doubtful cases, in which less grossly offensive statements were made than in Norwood. Dehal v Crown Prosecution Service provides an example of the application of the doctrine of proportionality under 230 Eighth Report of the Joint Committee on Human Rights at [2.59].

231 (2005) 40 EHRR SE11.

232 Ibid at [A].

233 Norwood v DPP (2003) WL21491815.

234 This provides: 'Nothing in [the] Convention may be interpreted as implying for any state, group or person any right to engage in any activity or perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms set forth herein or at their limitation to a greater extent than is provided for in the Convention.'; see Chapter 2 at p 112. For comment on Art 17 by the House of Lords see DPP v Collins [2006] UKHL 40.

235 Op. cit.

s 6 HRA in this type of context.[236] The appellant, a Sikh man, put up a notice at a Sikh Temple that he had attended for many years. It was written in Punjabi and attacked the President of the Temple and other members of the Committee. Mr Dehal intended the notice to be read by those it was aimed at and other worshippers. He was convicted of the offence under the Public Order Act 1986, s 4A (1) (it is discussed in Chapter 8 and contains elements similar to those of s 5).[237] His appeal concerned in essence the relationship between Art 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights and the s 4A offence. The Court had to examine the following questions: was the prosecution of the appellant a proportionate response to his conduct and did Art 10 provide him with a defence, therefore making the interference with the appellant's freedom of expression unnecessary? In allowing the appeal, the Court determined that although all the elements of the offence were present, the prosecution had not presented enough evidence to establish that bringing a criminal prosecution was a proportionate response to the appellant's conduct.

The problem of defining religion, of course, still remains. The Explanatory Notes to the Bill state:

> It includes, though this list is not definitive, those religions widely recognised in this country such as Christianity, Islam, Hinduism, Judaism, Buddhism, Sikhism, Rastafarianism, Baha'ism, Zoroastrianism and Jainism. Equally, branches or sects within a religion can be considered as religions or religious beliefs in their own right. The offences also cover hatred directed against a group of persons defined by reference to a lack of religious belief, such as Atheism and Humanism.[238]

Religion is also undefined in relation to discrimination on the grounds of religion and belief in the Employment Equality (Religion or Belief) Regulations 2003.[239] Further, since such incitement represents a far narrower area of liability than blasphemy, the danger that a wide interpretation of 'religion' would lead to controversy when prosecutions in relation to claims from obscure groups were refused is accordingly less great. Furthermore, prosecutions in this area can only be brought with the consent of the DPP, so the possibility of frivolous prosecutions being brought is slight. The justification sometimes put forward for abrogating free speech in this area is that prohibiting the advocacy of racial hatred does not strike at the core value of free speech because neither individual self-fulfilment, nor the opportunity to arrive at the truth through free discussion, nor the chance to participate meaningfully in democracy[240] seem to be strongly threatened by such a prohibition.

However, the gap in the law which is filled by the new offences is either tiny or non-existent since a range of existing offences, most notably s 5 Public Order Act

236 [2005] EWHC 2154.

237 See pp 785, 797.

238 Explanatory Notes to the Bill, at para 13, available: http://www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/ld200506/ldbills/015/en/06015x--.htm

239 Reg 2 (the interpretation section) offers no definition of "religion" or "belief". See Chapter 15, p 1482.

240 See above, pp 303–4.

1986, or incitement to criminal offences, would cover it in most circumstances.[241] The gap is prima facie only of significance when incitement to hatred, not to a criminal offence, occurs on grounds of religion, and such incitement would not be covered by the existing race hatred laws. But ss 5 and 4A of the 1986 Act would still be available. The obvious beneficiaries of the new law are therefore Muslims. The rationale for introducing the law was that the BNP and other groups were exploiting that gap by making pronouncements intended to stir up racial hatred, but hiding behind attacks on Isalm. As Goodall argues, 'it is not difficult to decode . . . statements, from a BNP article called "The Islamic Menace" . . . as not simply anti-Muslim but racist, and [they] will be read so by BNP supporters'. The argument used by Nick Griffin in 2006 at his trial for incitement to racial hatred was that he was only inciting hatred against Islam – so the law may have some benefit in curbing Islamophobia stirred by BNP supporters, since the BNP is seeking to stay within the law, in order to seek to make itself electable.[242] But s 5 of the 1986 Act could have been used against Griffin.

The existence of the new offences represents an interference with the individual's moral autonomy, since it amounts to judging both for him and his possible audience what is and is not fit for them to hear.[243] The state is supposed to leave such judgments to the individual because to do otherwise would be to violate the individual's basic right to equal concern and respect.[244] But there is an arguable case for the introduction of the new offence: the interference with moral autonomy involved is necessary to avoid discrimination and there is an argument that the free speech interest involved is relatively weak; in addition, there are strong utilitarian arguments that such a measure would considerably ease racial tension since Muslims now have at least some protection. Nevertheless, it may be argued that the present situation, in which the advocacy of hatred against Muslims or Christians is allowed in a range of circumstances wider than those covered by the race hatred provisions, so that Sikhs and Jews enjoy a stronger (and dual) protection from hate speech,[245] still amounts to a denial of equal respect for Muslims.[246] Christians can fall back on the doubtful, but very broad protection offered by blasphemy law. The argument that laws against religious hatred are justified because they protect individual believers from experiencing hatred directed at them because of their beliefs, and from mental anguish due to the nature of the attack, runs into further difficulty if justified on equality grounds. If one is concerned to protect individuals from the mental distress which can flow from the incitement of hatred against them

241 See on this point: Goodall, K, 'Incitement to Religious Hatred: All talk and no substance' [2007] 70(1) MLR 89–113; Hare, I, 'Legislating Against Hate: the Legal Response to Bias Crimes' (1997) 17 OJLS 415.

242 Goodall, K, 'Incitement to Religious Hatred: All talk and no substance' [2007] 70(1) MLR 89–113.

243 On this point see: Hare, I, 'Crosses, Crescents and Sacred Cows: Criminalising Incitement to Religious Hatred' (2006) Autumn PL 521–38.

244 See, e.g., Dworkin, R, 'Do we have a right to pornography?', in A Matter of Principle, 1985.

245 Muslims, unlike Sikhs and Jews, are not defined as a racial, as well as religious, group. See the definition from Mandla v Dowell Lee [1983] 2 AC 548; [1983] 1 All ER 1062, HL, discussed below, p 1508. But prejudice against Muslims can possibly be viewed as indirect racial discrimination; see Chapter 15, pp 1544–47, but that is not relevant in this context.

246 It might be argued from this that all measures prohibiting incitement to racial hatred should be repealed, but this is not a practicable possibility and would involve the UK in an even clearer breach of Art 20 of the ICCPR than is currently being committed by the lack of protection for Muslims.

due to their deeply held beliefs, it is not readily apparent that society should not also outlaw such incitement based upon deeply held non-religious beliefs, such as a deep belief in the equality of the sexes,[247] or in the evil of homophobia. Moreover, the case for introducing laws prohibiting incitement of hatred on grounds of sex or on grounds of sexual orientation could readily be made out on grounds similar to those used to justify the new offences. Certain extremist Muslim groups have made deeply homophobic pronouncements. There is a case for criminalising such pronouncements if made in threatening terms and intended to incite hatred on the grounds of sexual orientation. But ss 5, 4 and 4A Public Order Act are available to punish such conduct,[248] and it may be concluded that the damage to free speech if further incitement offences were included in the law would be too great, while the benefit it too uncertain. This argument clearly also applies to the new offence and, as argued above, to the racial hatred offences.

5 Regulating broadcasting

Introduction[249]

This section considers the regulation of broadcasting[250] and concentrates on the regulatory regime that was put in place for broadcasting in 2003. The statutory regime currently in place includes elements of licensing and content regulation by an administrative body. Broadcasting is treated differently from the print media which is subject only to the criminal law. The stricter system of controls seems to have been adopted in answer to the view that owing to their particular impact on audiences, broadcasting requires regulatory restraint, whereas it is now accepted that books and other printed material do not. Owing to such restraint, it is very unlikely that a broadcast could attract liability under the Obscene Publications Act;[251] nevertheless, it provides a further possibility of restraint and can also be used as a guide as to the standards censorship will observe. Thus, the regulatory regime in place means that broadcasting 247 On this point see, e.g., Clements, 'Defining 'religion' in the First Amendment: a functional approach' (1989) 74 Cornell LR 532.

248 In Hammond [2004] EWHC 69 the appellant took a placard with the words 'Stop Immorality', 'Stop Homosexuality', 'Stop Lesbianism', and 'Jesus is Lord' to the centre of Bournemouth and began preaching. This attracted a large group of people who were provoked by the preaching and physically attacked the appellant. He was requested by two police officers to stop preaching. Upon refusing to comply with this request the appellant was arrested and subsequently charged and convicted of a s 5 offence. Although Art 10 was taken into account on appeal, it was found that the conviction was proportionate to the harm sought to be averted. The decision is discussed further in Chapter 8, p 797.

249 Texts referred to below: Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 2nd edn, 2005, Chapters 10, 12 and 13; Robertson, G and Nichol, D, Media Law, 1999, Chapter 14; Bailey, Harris and Jones, Civil Liberties and Human Rights Cases and Materials, 5th edn, 2002, Chapter 6 at pp 650–67; Carey, P and Sanders, J Media Law, 3rd edn, 2004, Chapters 5 and 9 (basic guide); Gibbons, T, Regulating the Media, 2nd edn, 1998.

250 For a comprehensive treatment, see Gibbons, Regulating the Media, 1998.

251 The Obscene Publications Act, s 1 covers these media under s 1(2) since the Broadcasting Act 1990, s 162, has brought radio and television within its ambit.

is censored beyond what the law demands. The impact of the HRA is complicated by the fact that a number of the media bodies involved are private bodies, while the administrative body is a public authority.

Historically, in the UK the scarcity of frequencies was thought to provide part of the rationale for broadcast regulation.[252] But it is not apparent that this rationale can support content-based curbs, although it might support rights of access to a scarce resource[253] of such significance in terms of the efficacy of expression. In any event, cable and satellite television have enormously increased the number of actual and potential channels. Digital technology is continuing to increase the number of channels available. There are far more channels available at present in the UK than there are individual newspaper titles. The high level of regulation to which broadcasting continues to be subject must now therefore be attributed mainly to its status as the most influential means of communication.[254] Since it comes into the home and since so much time is spent watching television, it has been viewed as having a unique impact on people and particularly on children who form a large part of the broadcast audience, especially at certain times of the day. Further, the potential for flouting viewer expectations by inadvertently causing offence when people tune in and out of programmes is thought to provide a cogent rationale for content regulation.[255] In other words, a viewer might be unexpectedly confronted by offensive broadcast material. That is the main reason usually advanced for providing a different and stricter regime for broadcasting as opposed to videos. But as this chapter will reveal, the UK regulatory regime has incrementally moved away from the general imposition of certain standards of 'taste and decency' on broadcasting, in favour of curbs premised mainly, although not solely, on protection for children. Thus it has focused more on the use of protective devices – such as the use of the watershed or of encryption[256] – as opposed to outright bans on the showing of explicit and offensive material. Nevertheless, broadcasting is still restrained to a greater extent than other media.

Adherence to a regulatory regime aimed at the avoidance of offence has been viewed as a part of a 'contract' for the privilege of coming directly into the home which should be adhered to by responsible broadcasters. The Broadcasting Standards Commission made this point by referring in its Code on Standards to an implied contract between viewer and broadcaster about the terms of admission to the home.[257] Lord Hoffmann pointed out in Pro-Life Alliance v BBC[258] that a similar point was made by Stevens J giving the opinion of the United States Supreme Court in Federal Communications Commission v Pacifica Foundation[259] in a case about the use of obscene language on sound radio:

252 See Briggs, A, The History of Broadcasting, Vols 1 and 2, 1961 and 1965, OUP; Barendt and Hitchens, Media Law 2000, Longman.

253 See the discussion of the US Supreme Court on this point in Red Lion Broadcasting Co v FCC (1969) 395 US 367.

254 See Barendt and Hitchens, 2000, pp 5–9.

255 See pp 516–17 below.

256 The broadcasting of adult material and '18'-rated films later in the evening. The provision of warnings and of consumer advice has also become much more prevalent. See pp 525–28 below.

257 Para 2 of the Code. The Code is discussed at pp 525–29 below.

258 [2004] 1 AC 185; [2003] 2 All ER 977.

259 (1978) 438 US 726, 748–49.

> [T]he broadcast media have established a uniquely pervasive presence in the lives of all Americans. Patently offensive, indecent material presented over the airwaves confronts the citizen, not only in public, but also in the privacy of the home, where the individual's right to be left alone plainly outweighs the First Amendment rights of an intruder . . . Because the broadcast audience is constantly tuning in and out, prior warnings cannot completely protect the listener or viewer from unexpected program content. To say that one may avoid further offence by turning off the radio when he hears indecent language is like saying that the remedy for an assault is to run away after the first blow.

However, although these points may have been valid in 1978, they are clearly losing their cogency today, at least in relation to television, as it becomes more and more interactive. Viewers usually tune in and out of programmes using a menu, which also provides them with consumer advice on programmes. 'Adult material' can be Pin-protected or made available on pay-per-view channels only, decreasing the chance that children could access it and obviating the risk of coming across it inadvertently. Thus the chances of involuntary encounters with offensive material have diminished; the argument that children should be protected from material that they deliberately choose to view, continues retain some cogency.[260] As the interactivity of television broadcasting and the provision of consumer information increases, while improvements occur in the use of security devices such as encoding, its position comes closer to that of the internet which also comes into the home. Therefore there is a degree of tension in free speech terms between the lack of regulation for the internet and the high level of content-based regulation to which broadcasting is currently subject.

A very different rationale can be advanced to argue that regulation is necessary in order to preserve pluralism – in order to seek to ensure that a range of views, including a variety of political ones, are heard.[261] This can be achieved by imposing requirements to broadcast minority interest programmes, 'must carry' requirements,[262] or by imposing more general responsibilities that tend to support diversity, including impartiality requirements.[263] The unregulated press are openly partisan in the UK, and 260 See the 2005 research conducted by Ofcom on the efficacy of PIN protection systems, p 527, fn 328, below.

261 See Feintuck, M, Media Regulation, Public Interest and the Law, 1999.

262 See Communications Act 2003 ss 296 and 309. Under s 296 C4C has obligations in relation to school programming. Under s 309 10% of the air time must be allocated to a range and diversity of independent productions in digital services.

263 The due impartiality requirements are now contained in the Communications Act 2003, ss 319(c) and 320; they are reflected in s 5 of Ofcom's Broadcasting Code which came into force in 2005. There are three key statutory requirements. First, under s 319(2)(c), news included in television and radio services must be presented with due impartiality. Second, under s 320(1)(a), the opinions of persons providing a programme service on matters of industrial or political controversy or current public policy must be excluded, and third, under s 320(1)(b), all programming should preserve due impartiality on those matters, although this last requirement can be satisfied in relation to 'a series of programmes taken as a whole'. The BBC's Charter (Cm 6925) was renewed with effect from 2007 until 2016; if a complaint relates to the accuracy and impartiality of a programme, the BBC remains finally responsible and this continued to be the case when the BBC Charter was renewed at the end of 2006, although under a new body – the BBC Trust.

right wing and anti-liberal views predominate.[264] Therefore a significant threat to free expression – in terms of diversity – comes not from government, but from private corporate bodies. As Barendt puts it, referring to the free speech rationale from truth:[265] 'it is . . . reasonable to doubt whether any truth will emerge from an unregulated market-place in which a handful of media corporations draw up the agenda of political and social discourse and carefully limit the access of individuals and groups which dissent from their programme'.[266] Therefore this argument provides a rationale for broadcast regulation, even in the context of a rapidly changing technological landscape, in so far as plurality and impartiality can be ensured by this means. It does not, however, provide a necessary justification for restraints based on offence-avoidance. Indeed, such restraints tend to run counter to the enhancement of plurality and diversity since they may curb the more controversial forms of broadcast speech, including that reflective of the practice of sexual minorities. The regulatory regimes for broadcast regulation in the UK have tended at one and the same time to impose curbs based on generally accepted standards of taste and decency, while making some efforts in the direction of diversity. The contradiction between the two goals appears to have gone unrecognised both by the legislation and by the regulators.

Market-based 'deregulation' in the UK

The Broadcasting Act 1990 brought about the so-called 'deregulation' of independent television, a trend culminating at present in the Communications Act 2003. The trend represents a movement towards enhancing the influence of media regulators but exerted post-transmission in terms of content, as explained below. An underlying policy objective of deregulation was that of enhancing the ability of corporate bodies to maximise commercial success by furthering and developing concentrations of media power, especially in the sectors of the press and satellite broadcasting. The 1990 Act raised questions about the influence of the owners of broadcasting stations who might wish to use broadcasting as a means of exerting political influence. The Broadcasting Act 1996 further eased some of the restrictions on media ownership created by the 1990 Act, with a view to balancing 'proper commercial demands and the wider public interest which includes plurality, diversity of opinion'.[267] The dominant theme governing the regulatory regime is the continuance of light-touch regulation, in terms of commercial freedom, which was introduced under the Conservative Government's 1990 Act. The changes introduced by the Labour Government's Communications Act 2003 continue to represent a business-oriented scheme that recognises the convergence of the separate technological sectors. It favours corporate interests, not necessarily those of plurality and diversity. It does not address substantive media freedom issues. For example, 264 Feintuck 1999, ibid at 54–56; Gibbons, T, 'Freedom of the Press: ownership and editorial values' (1992) Summer PL 279. The Telegraph, the Mail and the Sun are the highest selling newspapers in their different sections of the market. Editorially, they tend towards the right and to anti-liberal views.

265 See Part II introduction, pp 302–3.

266 See Importing the First Amendment (1998) Loveland, I, (ed), Barendt, E, Chapter 3 at p 46.

267 Bottomley, V, Dept of National Heritage Press Release DNH 219/96. For discussion of regulation of cross-media ownership and concentrated media ownership see Feintuck Media Regulation, Public Interest and the Law 1999; Fleming, H (1997) 60(3) MLR 378; Hitchens (1994) 57 MLR 585.

while corporate advertising remains central to the commercial viability of independent television, political advertising is still disallowed. Thus, in so far as groups such as Greenpeace or Amnesty may wish, inter alia, to criticise and challenge corporate interests by means of such advertising, they are unable to do so.

The Communications Act 2003 is influenced by the 'Television Without Frontiers' ('TVWF') Directive,[268] as discussed below, and is based to a significant extent on the model of deregulation put in place by the 1990 Act.[269] This continued movement away from market regulation may have the effect of detracting from the exercise of creative freedom since small independent broadcasters may be unable to gain a foothold in the market, while investigative journalism (especially investigations into corporate matters) and alternative film-making may be marginalised and discouraged in the pursuit of commercially safe, but bland, homogenous broadcasting, in the form of game shows, soap operas, gardening and home-decorating programmes. On this view, further movement towards privatisation of the means of communication, deregulation and the freer expression of commercial values is unwelcome. Moreover, it provides a strong argument for retaining the licence fee for the BBC, and its independence, on the basis that certain programmes would not be made if BBC programming was subject to a largely or wholly market-driven regime. Further, programmes made under such a regime – and the choices underlying the selection of programmes – are likely in themselves to have an impact in influencing the public's choices. Therefore leaving BBC programming largely to market forces by removing the licence fee would tend to have a pro-corporate, anti-plural impact. The contemporary political agenda would be more likely to go unchallenged, while the anti-liberal agenda apparent in much of the press would have a greater chance of gaining ascendancy since programmes challenging it might not be made.

The thesis can be put forward that in general regulation is an essential precondition for securing the objectives inherent in the familiar free speech justifications,[270] although this argument is not applicable to the current offence-avoidance rules. As Feintuck argues, media regulators are concerned to limit 'the ability of corporate media giants to further their own commercial ends while acting in ways that run counter to maximising the provision of information upon which the claim is premised'.[271] However, the ethos underlying the regulatory regime considered below is unclear, although it could be broadly expressed as intended to be in the public interest.

The EU's role in UK broadcasting regulation reflects the various values that are being balanced. It may be argued that since economic integration is a central constitutional value for the EU, its regulatory agenda might be expected to bear more resemblance to that of the US, in terms of economic values, than to the public interest values evident in the regimes of its member states.[272] At the same time EU audio-visual policy reflects the values embodied in Arts 8 and 10 ECHR; in particular it focuses on the protection 268 Council Directive 89/552/EEC, as amended by Directive 97/36/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council, adopted in 1989. See pp 514, 526.

269 See also the proposals in the White Paper A New Future for Communications Cm 5010, published 12 December 2000.

270 See Part II, pp 300–8.

271 See Feintuck, (fn 261, above) 1999.

272 Ibid, p 170.

of minors and of human dignity. These varying – and arguably conflicting – values are reflected in the TVWF Directive,[273] which deals with the protection of minors from harmful content disseminated via broadcasting. Technological and market developments necessitated the revision of the TVWF in 1997, as discussed below. The need to ensure the effective protection of minors was also reflected in the Recommendation adopted in 1998[274] and in the Commission's proposal for an additional Recommendation in 2004.[275]

The TVWF Directive, the original and the proposed Recommendation, seek to reconcile the protection for minors and human dignity with both freedom of expression and market freedom. One aspect of such reconciliation is reflected in the focus on the protection of minors, as opposed to the imposition of 'standards of taste and decency' on programmes aimed at adults. It will be made clear below that this emphasis is reflected in the Communications Act 2003, s 319, and in the current policy of Ofcom, the broadcast regulator. This is quite a significant departure from the stance adopted under the previous UK regulatory regime. However, the Act provides no clear mechanisms for co-operation with the sectors not covered by the Act, in particular that of film. The Act leaves Ofcom to determine how far content regulation in broadcasting should be harmonised with that relating to film. No express guidance on that matter is provided, save for that which can be viewed as flowing implicitly from the provisions of s 319.[276] This is acceptable under the TVWF, but it does not appear to accord with the aims of the proposed 2004 Recommendation.

Thus the reforms that have occurred under the Communications Act 2003 may already have been shown to be inadequate since the question of harmonisation of content regulation across the various media sectors has not been addressed. The new regulatory regime created under the Act leaves the internet, films and videoworks unaffected since the decision was taken to leave such sectors outside Ofcom's remit. While this decision is readily defensible, as it means that regulation in those sectors can remain flexible and sensitive to the particular needs of consumers and the industry involved, it means that both freedom of expression and the protection of minors may not receive effective protection. On the one hand Ofcom may continue the previous practice of indicating to broadcasters (via its Code) that the broadcast of a film may not be appropriate without cuts, or at all, even though it has been released on video with an '18' classification. On the other, the availability of (arguably) harmful material on the internet may pose a danger to children[277] and may also call into question disharmony between restraints on internet and broadcast content.

The EU creates pressure for harmonisation, not only across the member states of the EU, but also between the various audio-visual sectors. The promotion of national 273 Council Directive 89/552/EEC, as amended by Directive 97/36/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council, adopted in 1989.

274 The Council Recommendation concerning the protection of minors and human dignity 24 September 1998 98/560/EC, OJL 270, 7.10.1998, p 48.

275 Proposal for a recommendation of the European Parliament and Council on the protection of minors and human dignity and the right to reply in relation to the competitiveness of the European audiovisual and information services industry, COM(2004) 341 final 2004/0117 (COD) 30.4.04, press release 04/598. The legal basis proposed for the Recommendation is Art 157 of the EC Treaty.

276 See fn 313, p 522 below.

277 See pp 575–82.

frameworks aimed at achieving an effective level of protection for minors can, clearly, come into conflict with the promotion of competitiveness within and between those sectors. Further, the extent to which public interest values can be furthered in broadcasting while promoting competition is debatable. 'Must carry' requirements[278] can be viewed as anti-competitive, as can regulation via a legislative scheme, as opposed to self- or co-regulation.[279] The Human Rights Act may have a role to play in relation to broadcast regulation in terms of providing a counter to the expression of commercial values, although that role should not be over-stated. If the public interest has so far been defined within the regulatory regime considered below in too nebulous a manner, the Strasbourg jurisprudence might provide a means of creating greater certainty, in terms of the part to be played by media regulation in a democratic society. The jurisprudence of the European Convention on Human Rights, especially that relating to Art 10, is centrally premised on the notion that the purpose of the Convention is to 'maintain and promote the ideals and values of a democratic society'.[280] Article 10 arguments, taking such jurisprudence into account, could be raised in relation to the adjudication of Ofcom, the super-regulator set up under the Communications Act 2003, since it is bound by s 6 HRA.[281] It is at least arguable that the infusion of clear substantive values into media regulation, organised around the concept of the public interest, could occur under the HRA. At the least, the HRA could play a part in allowing such an infusion to occur since it provides media regulators with a benchmarking document with its jurisprudential accretions – domestic and international[282] – which is highly relevant to the argument that a version of media freedom informed by Strasbourg principles is not necessarily coterminous with market freedom.

Content regulation on grounds of offence-avoidance

Arguments based on pluralism and autonomy do not underpin the ethos of the current broadcasting content regulatory regime, particularly the continued offensive material restrictions, now contained in the Communications Act 2003. Further, since the restrictions apply to all forms of broadcasting, including political broadcasting, a matter discussed further below, they militate against plurality since they may mean that minority forms of expression are curbed. In terms of restrictions on grounds of offence avoidance, the UK has traditionally operated one of the strictest regulatory regimes for broadcasting within Western Europe. The constraints created by the imposition of content-based responsibilities on broadcasters have inevitably meant that their creative freedom is curtailed. The government had the opportunity to overhaul the regime in 2000 when it was considering the changes to the regulatory regime that eventually came about under 278 Requirements to carry certain forms of material in broadcasting, usually imposed in the interests of ensuring impartiality (see fn 263, above) or in order to serve minority interests.

279 See further, Part II, pp 308–9.

280 Kjeldsen v Denmark (1976) 1 EHRR 711, p 731; see also the comments of the Court in Socialist Party v Turkey (1999) 27 EHRR 51 as to the need for pluralism in a democracy.

281 As a regulator of private sector broadcasting set up under statute, it can be classified as a core public authority (or at the least, a functional one) on the basis that it is acting in a governmental capacity: see below pp 530–31 and Chapter 4, pp 233–35.

282 See Sunday Times v UK A 30 (1979); Jersild v Denmark (1994) 19 EHRR 1; Lingens v Austria (1986) 8 EHRR 103; Thorgeirson v Iceland (1992) 14 EHRR 843.

the Communications Act 2003,[283] but it drew back from seeking to bring about radical change. The traditional particularly strict regime in relation to matters of taste and decency was continued with some modification and presented in more detail under Part 3 of the 2003 Act. It is a regime that would clearly appear intolerable if applied to the print media. Broadcasting has also been subject to greater restraints than have videos, and such greater restraint continued under the post-2003 regime, although the regime itself is less restrictive and the current broadcast regulator, Ofcom, is taking a relatively liberal stance under its Broadcast Code. This special regime for broadcasting can only be justified by reference to the notion of intrusion into the home, discussed above. Previously, s 6(1)(a) of the Broadcasting Act 1990 imposed on independent broadcasters an obligation to ensure that programmes contained nothing that would offend against good taste and decency or was likely to be offensive to public feeling, and the BBC Charter and Agreement 1996 (now 2007) contained equivalent provisions. The Broadcasting Act 1996 gave statutory recognition to the Broadcasting Standards Commission which was set up to monitor standards of taste and decency in public sector and independent broadcasting, and its role was then taken over by Ofcom, which under the 2003 Act now has to set standards whereby the public is protected from offensive material.

The emphasis placed on protection from offence rather than on adult autonomy was not seriously questioned in the White Paper preceding the 2003 Act, A New Future for Communications,[284] and the current statutory regime does not differ from the previous one in essentials. There are, however, certain significant differences which may, depending on their interpretation by Ofcom, tend in the direction of liberalisation. Proportionality issues must now be considered when creating standards under the 2003 Act (s 3(3)(a)); the notion of maintaining standards of 'taste and decency' has been replaced by a duty to avoid offence and harm,[285] judged by context and by generally accepted standards; Ofcom has an express duty to abide by free expression principles in relation to that duty.[286] However, this of course adds nothing to the duty it is already under, as a public authority, under s 6 HRA.

In making decisions as to offence-avoidance Ofcom is faced with choices on a spectrum of extreme liberality or extreme restraint. It can either deny all viewers the chance of watching explicit or disturbing material or it can operate a highly liberal regime, allowing broadcast audiences the freedom to view such material but expecting them to protect themselves from offence. It is clearly arguable that people have a responsibility to protect themselves from offensive material merely by accessing information via a remote control before tuning into a programme where such material might be present. As warnings, encoding, Pin-protection and consumer advice become more effective, this argument becomes more compelling. The small burden placed on viewers in expecting them to take responsibility for their own viewing could readily be viewed as proportionate to the aim of allowing others autonomy in terms of choosing for themselves what they wish to see or hear. In other words, the small chance that someone might inadvertently view something they find offensive provides a doubtful 283 See the White Paper, A New Future for Communications, published 12 December 2000; www.communicationswhitepaper.gov.uk.

284 Ibid.

285 Sections 3(2)(e) and 319.

286 Section 3(3)(g).

justification for the infringement of autonomy involved in denying all viewers the chance to watch unexpurgated disturbing or sexually explicit material, within the limits created by the criminal law. This argument would apply in particular to the showing of films on television since they would already have been subject to the possibility of cuts to achieve a particular rating.

The warning contained in the classification of videos which also come into the home is viewed as going a long way towards providing a basis for ensuring that young children will not watch explicit material: the regime for videos is founded largely on the idea of parental responsibility, although there is of course some infringement of adult autonomy since videos must not contain material that prevents them from achieving a classification.[287] Broadcasting is based on the same foundation, since 'adult' material is shown after the watershed, but the offence-avoidance regime discussed below is potentially more restrictive than that in place for videos, and therefore goes further in the direction of paternalism. This regime affecting broadcasting in the interests of preventing offence to viewers clearly curbs the freedom of broadcasters.

The pervasive notion that broadcasts, as opposed to video-based material, are aspects of an 'intrusive' medium is largely based, it is suggested, on an out-of-date model for television. The large number of channels currently available and the increased possibilities of interactivity (in particular, checking on information about a programme via a remote control) undermine the idea of intrusiveness. In the past the small number of channels made it more probable that in tuning in and out of programmes a viewer might inadvertently encounter offensive material. The possibility of encoding also offers protection to those who do not wish to view such material. At present two issues in particular arise. Under the previous regulatory regime for broadcasting '18' rated films were shown but normally long after the cinematic or video release, when the '18' rating had in general become less significant, as standards changed.[288] Since such films are viewed in the home on videos, is there any basis for refusing to show them on general television channels without cuts and not long after the video release, so long as adequate consumer advice is provided? Secondly, if videos classified 'R18' (which now do contain 'hard core' material, as discussed below)[289] can be bought from restricted outlets, are there cogent reasons for barring the showing of such material on domestic or EU-based television subscription channels, using encoding as a protection for children? There are indications that a different stance is being taken towards such issues under the current Ofcom regime. An approach based not on general restrictions intended to avoid offence, but on the protection of minors only will become more firmly established if the recommendation under the TVWF Directive is adopted.

This part of this chapter will focus on the question of how far the current model of broadcast regulation, as compared with the previous one, comports with free speech principles. It will consider what part, if any, is played by the European Convention on Human Rights under the Human Rights Act in guaranteeing media freedom and media responsibility in the context of the maintenance of broadcasting standards relating to offence-avoidance. This is a context, however, in which it will be suggested that the HRA as mediated by the judiciary has not had and will not have a radical impact as far as modifying the general statutory regime governing explicit or violent expression in broadcasting is concerned. It may, however, have an impact as regards specific decisions taken under that statutory regime by courts and regulators. Although the regime is governed by a post-HRA statute, the Communications Act 2003, the Act itself was not, it is argued, heavily influenced by the European Convention on Human Rights. The 2003 Act was not declared compatible with the Convention under s 19 HRA. However, the incompatibility is due to the continuance of the ban on political advertising under ss 321 and 319(g),[290] and it can be assumed that the rest of the provisions are intended to be compatible. Case law on the Act's provisions governing broadcast content is, however, likely to be sparse, providing few opportunities for examining its compatibility with the Convention rights.

287 See pp 563–65.

288 See pp 555–60 for discussion of the standards applied to films by the BBFC and the ratings system.

289 At pp 562–66.

The basic regulatory regime

In the 1950s, with the advent of commercial television, it was considered necessary to impose direct statutory regulation on broadcasting. Special duties were imposed on independent broadcasting to maintain standards of taste and decency and of impartiality; the responsibility for maintaining standards was given to the Independent Broadcasting Authority (IBA), established in 1954. Prior to the introduction of the Broadcasting Act 1990, the IBA was charged with the regulation of independent television. As part of the policy of deregulation of television, the 1990 Act set up the Independent Television Commission (ITC) to replace the IBA as a public body charged with licensing and regulating non-BBC television services.[291] The function of the ITC in this respect was similar to that of the Radio Authority (RA), which had the statutory function, under Part III of the 1990 Act, of licensing and monitoring the independent radio stations.

The regime established under the 1990 Act, and then taken further under the 1996 Act, represented an attempt to deregulate broadcasting, in the sense of enhancing market freedom, especially by affording further leeway to cross-media ownership, that is, ownership in more than one media sector. In contrast, in terms of creative freedom it would be misleading to speak of 'deregulation' when the system not only led to the establishment of an overlapping and strict set of controls over broadcasting, but also had a tendency to suppress diversity. As Gibbons puts it: '[the 1990 Act created the danger that cross-media ownership would] create pressure for more homogenised editorial positions or, as has occurred, cross-media promotion.'[292] Section 106 of the Broadcasting Act 1996 established the Broadcasting Standards Commission (BSC); until 2003 the Commission monitored BBC and independent programming. [293] Its role 290 The s 3(1)HRA obligation applies to s 321 of the 2003 Act as it would to any statutory provision Therefore, in a challenge to the ban, a judge would be free to re-examine the presumptive incompatibility. This would be of particular significance if relevant developments had occurred since 2003 in the Strasbourg jurisprudence. But in any event it would be open to a judge to seek to reinterpret the relevant provisions in order to determine whether exceptions to the ban could be created.

291 For discussion of the change in regime introduced under the 1990 Act, see Jones, T, 'The deregulation of broadcasting' (1989) 52 MLR 380–88.

292 'Aspiring to pluralism: the constraints of public broadcasting values on the deregulation of British media ownership' (1998) 16 Cardozo Arts and Entertainment Journal 475, p 485.

293 BSC Annual Report 1988–89 and Code of Practice 1989, p 41. For comment on the work of the BSC, see Coleman, F, 'All in the best possible taste – the Broadcasting Standards Council 1989–1992' [1992] PL 488.

was taken over in 2003 by the new regulator, Ofcom, which created legally enforceable controls over public broadcasting for the first time. Thus, until the Communications Act 2003 came into force, independent broadcasting was governed by the Broadcasting Acts 1990 and 1996.

Public broadcasting was and – to an extent – still is governed by the Royal Charter of the BBC which partly comprises a Licence Agreement. The 1996 Act drew the BBC partly into the regulatory regime, as discussed below, and the 2003 Act takes that process somewhat further, but still leaves many regulatory matters to the BBC Charter and Agreement, which were renewed at the end of 2006.[294] Thus the BBC still operates under this Agreement and also under the terms of its new Charter. Under the old Charter this included the undertaking to comply generally with the statutory duties placed on the IBA and then the ITC.[295] The current position of the BBC under the 2003 Act in relation to Ofcom is discussed below. Under the Charter and Agreement, the Board of Governors of the BBC has the responsibility for maintaining standards of taste and decency and of impartiality. The (1996) Charter and Agreement, amended in 2003, set out in more detail the obligations of the BBC as a public broadcaster operating by means of the licence fee, in particular its obligation to maintain independence. Although it is commercially funded, Channel 4 also has a public service remit governed by statute – previously s 25 of the 1990 Act – and now contained in s 265 of the 2003 Act.

Thus, under the pre-2003 regime commercial broadcasting was subject to dual, overlapping regulation from the ITC and BSC. The key difference under the pre-2003 regime, between the regulators, was in terms of sanctions: the BSC could only require a broadcaster found to be in breach of its code to broadcast its findings and an apology if appropriate; the ITC could, in addition to these sanctions, fine a broadcaster, and, in extreme cases, withdraw its licence. The BBC was still largely self-regulatory although it was regulated by the BSC in relation to taste and decency and privacy.[296] Thus the BBC was under a much 'lighter touch' scheme of regulation than the commercial broadcasters. As indicated below, the Ofcom regime has harmonised these regimes to an extent, but the BBC remains self-regulatory in terms of its public service remit.[297]

Regulation on grounds of avoiding offence under the Communications Act 2003

The BSC's and ITC's roles in relation to the maintenance of standards of taste and decency were taken over in 2003 by Ofcom, the inclusive regulator set up under powers provided for in the Office of Communications Act 2002 and with the powers and 294 The Charter (Cmnd 6925) for the continuance of the BBC came into force in 2007 (previously Cmnd 8313); 2006 Agreement: Cmnd 6872.

295 This undertaking was annexed to the Corporation's licence agreement. This includes the requirement to observe due impartiality. See Gibbons, T, 'Impartiality in the media' (1985) Archiv für Rechts- und Sozialphilosophie, Beiheft, Nr 28 pp 71–81. The requirements are similar under the current Charter – see below.

296 See Chapter 9, pp 839–51 for discussion of broadcast regulation and privacy.

297 See First Report of Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport (2004) A Public BBC HC 82-I.

duties designated under the 2003 Act.[298] They include the licensing[299] and regulation of broadcasting and of telecommunications. Thus the regime was rationalised under the 2003 Act and the dual system of control – by the ITC and BSC – was modified: during 2004-early 2005 independent television only had to refer to one Code, the ITC Programme Code monitored by Ofcom. In 2005 the ITC Code was superceded by Ofcom's own Code once it came into force.

Section 325 Communications Act 2003 covers observance of the Code in licensed TV services. Under s 325 the conditions included in Broadcasting Act licences must ensure that the s 319 standards for offence avoidance (see below) are observed in the service provision and a duty is imposed on Ofcom to establish procedures for handling and resolving complaints regarding adherence to the standards. Section 237 allows for the imposition of penalties, including financial penalties, for the contravention of licence conditions or of directions given by Ofcom. If Ofcom is satisfied that a licensee has contravened a provision of a licence or failed to comply with a direction from Ofcom, a penalty can be imposed.[300] Under its own penalty Guidelines[301] Ofcom states that the amount of any penalty must be appropriate and proportionate to the contravention in respect of which it is imposed. It states that it must have regard to any representations made by the regulated body in breach, and accepts therefore that in setting the level of penalty, it will consider all relevant circumstances. In particular it states that it will take account of the seriousness of the contravention, precedents set by previous cases, and the need to ensure that the threat of penalties will act as a sufficient incentive to comply. The penalty will be higher where there are repeated contraventions by the same regulated body, where the contravention continues after the body becomes aware of it, or after it has been notified of it by Ofcom.

The Ofcom regime and the position of the BBC

Ofcom also affects public sector broadcasting.[302] Such broadcasting was also regulated under the BSC regime, but the BSC did not have the power to impose financial penalties on the BBC. This power, introduced under the current regime, represents a highly 298 Section 2(1), (2) 2003 Act.

299 Television Licensable Content Services and the licensing regime which applies to them are described in ss 232–40 of the Communications Act 2003. They replace the separate categories of satellite television services and licensable programme services which were established under the Broadcasting Act 1990 (as amended by the Broadcasting Act 1996). A television licensable content service is a service provided in digital or analogue form broadcast from a satellite or distributed using an electronic communications network that is to be made available for reception by members of the public and consists of television programmes (which for this purpose also comprises text services) or electronic programme guides, or both. It does not constitute a service which is a television multiplex service, a restricted television service, a digital television programme service, a service provided under a Channel 3 licence, a service provided under the Channel 4 licence, a service provided under the Channel 5 licence, a service provided under the public teletext licence or an additional television service.

300 This cannot exceed a fine of £250,000. See further fn 304.

301 From its website: www.Ofcom.org.uk/codes_guidelines/penalty.

302 Section 198(1): 'It shall be a function of OFCOM, to the extent that provision for them to do so is contained in- (a) the BBC Charter and Agreement, and (b) the provisions of this Act and of Part 5 of the 1996 Act, to regulate the provision of the BBC's services and the carrying on by the BBC of other activities for purposes connected with the provision of those services.'

significant change from the previous regime. It undermines the BBC's independence and brings the BBC far more into conformity with independent television. But at the same time the current statutory regime represents a compromise between BBC editorial freedom and greater regulation by a government regulator[303] since the regime for the BBC has to operate within the parameters of its Charter and Agreement. Section 198 provides that Ofcom may impose financial penalties on the BBC within the powers conferred by the Charter and Agreement if it contravenes the provisions of Part 3 2003 Act or of its Charter and Agreement.[304] The Agreement was amended in 2003 in anticipation of the changes to be introduced under the 2006 Agreement, the amendment coming into force in 2004. Clause 13 of the amended BBC Agreement allowed Ofcom to impose penalties, including financial ones, on the BBC[305] if it contravenes a 'relevant enforceable requirement'. A 'relevant enforceable requirement' includes the current Ofcom Broadcasting Code. Thus complaints about harm and offence may be addressed by the BBC, by Ofcom, or by both.

