When the BBC's Charter was renewed at the end of 2006 this system changed, but not radically. Under the current Royal Charter[306] the government has created a new body called the BBC Trust to take on the oversight role previously discharged by the Governors.[307] Thus the responsibility previously shared between Ofcom and the Governors for ensuring offence-avoidance was from January 2007 shared between the BBC Trust and Ofcom. This is also true of complaints about fairness and privacy, as discussed in Chapter 9. But if a complaint relates to the accuracy and impartiality of a programme, the BBC will remain finally responsible.[308] The BBC Trust will now deal with such complaints from 2007 onwards – for the 10 years of the new Charter's life. The Hutton Report formed a significant background to the renewal of the Charter.[309]

So the BBC is now subject to a dual and overlapping system for complaints regarding offence, and this will continue to be the case from 2007. Under s 46 of the BBC's 2006 Agreement the Programme Content standards that must be observed are set by s 319 of the 2003 Act, which is discussed below. This system hardly makes for clarity

303 See further First Report of Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport (2004) A Public BBC HC 82-I.

304 Section 198 (2): 'For the purposes of the carrying out of that function OFCOM- (a) are to have such powers and duties as may be conferred on them by or under the BBC Charter and Agreement; and (b) are entitled, to the extent that they are authorised to do so by the Secretary of State or under the terms of that Charter and Agreement, to act on his behalf in relation to that Charter and Agreement.'
The maximum penalty that can be imposed is £250,000 (s 198(5)), although the 2003 Act also confers power on the Secretary of State to substitute a different sum (s 198(6)).

305 See Chapter 9, pp 842–43 for further discussion of the position of the BBC in relation to Ofcom.

306 The Green Paper that reviewed the BBC's Royal Charter stated that the government intended to create a new body called the BBC Trust (Review of BBC's Royal Charter A strong BBC, independent of government, published May 2005). The White Paper was published in 2006, and the Charter came into force in January 2007. It may be noted that parts of the Green Paper are to be treated as 'White', including the part on governance and accountability. See HL Paper 50-I, 15.3.05 at para 47.

307 Ibid at p 10, para 3.1.

308 For discussion see Fenwick and Phillipson, fn 1 above, Chapter 20.

309 Lord Hutton, Report of the Inquiry into the Circumstances Surrounding the Death of Dr David Kelly CMG (hereafter 'the Hutton Report'). For comment on the Report, see Smith, G and Sandelson, D, 'The Future Shape of the BBC – the Hutton Inquiry, Charter Review and the Challenges Facing the BBC and the Government' [2004] Ent LR 15(5) 137–46.

in terms of content-based control and could lead to a confused and even conflicting application of standards. In its response to the Green Paper Ofcom proposed that the government should move towards greater clarity and consistency in content; it argued that the current arrangement, dividing regulation between Ofcom and the BBC, 'risks implying to the public that there are no common standards of acceptability and quality . . .'.[310] The effect of this change on the BBC's traditional independence depends to quite a significant extent on the stance that Ofcom takes under its Code. The possibilities open to Ofcom are discussed below.

Protection from offensive material under s 319 Communications Act

The key provision under the 2003 Act in terms of curbing the broadcasting of offensive material is s 319.[311] Section 319(1) of the 2003 Act requires Ofcom to set standards whereby the public is protected from offensive material.[312] The standards objectives for the Code are set out in s 319(2)[313] and include protection for children and a warning that responsibility must be exercised in relation to the content of religious programmes.[314] The specific obligation set out in s 319(2)(a), to protect persons under the age of eighteen, is new; the 1990 Act contained no such obligation.

The most general restriction is contained in s 319(2)(f) which provides that 'generally accepted standards are applied to the contents of television and radio services so as to provide adequate protection for members of the public from the inclusion in such services of offensive and harmful material'. The term 'generally accepted standards' can be assumed to refer to changing contemporary ideas of what is offensive material.

Section 319(4) gives further guidance as to the matters to be taken into account by Ofcom in securing the standards objectives;[315] they are particularly pertinent in relation 310 House of Lords Select Committee on BBC Charter Renewal, HL Paper 50-I, 15.3.05 at para 104.

311 See also s 3(2)(e), concerning the general duty of Ofcom to secure the application of standards to television and radio services, 'that provide adequate protection for members of the public from the inclusion of offensive and harmful material in such services'. That duty is then encapsulated in more detail in s 319.

312 (1) It shall be the duty of OFCOM to set, and from time to time to review and revise, such standards for the content of programmes to be included in television and radio services as appear to them best calculated to secure the standards objectives.

313 (2) The standards objectives are-

> (a) that persons under the age of eighteen are protected;
>
> (b) that material likely to encourage or to incite the commission of crime or to lead to disorder is not included in television and radio services . . .
>
> (e) that the proper degree of responsibility is exercised with respect to the content of programmes which are religious programmes
>
> (f) that generally accepted standards are applied to the contents of television and radio services so as to provide adequate protection for members of the public from the inclusion in such services of offensive and harmful material;

314 In relation to the statutory obligation regarding religious sensibilities, see Ofcom's ruling on the BBC's broadcast of Jerry Springer – the Opera in 2005, fn 332 below.

315 Section 319(4) provides: 'In setting or revising any standards under this section, OFCOM must have regard, in particular and to such extent as appears to them to be relevant to the securing of the standards objectives, to each of the following matters – the degree of harm or offence likely to be caused by the inclusion of any particular sort of material in programmes generally, or in programmes of a particular to the objective of s 319(2)(f). Section 319(4) does not contain an exhaustive list of the matters that Ofcom must take into account in setting or revising the standards referred to, and, while minimum standards must be apparent under s 319(5)(a) which impliedly reflect the matters listed, Ofcom can take the listed matters into account to the extent that it deems them to be relevant to the securing of the standards objectives. Ofcom is warned not to be too interventionist since it must bear in mind the desirability of maintaining the independence of editorial control over programme content. At the same time it has to consider the extent to which harm or offence may be caused by the inclusion of certain forms of material in programmes.

A distinction is drawn in s 319(4) between material which could give offence in programmes generally, or where it is included in programmes of a particular description. Clearly, this is a crucial distinction: some forms of material may be viewed by Ofcom as too offensive or harmful to be broadcast at all, whereas in most instances the context is the determining factor. The issues most often encountered are likely to concern the suitability of showing particular forms of material before the watershed, or at what point after it, or in the context of a particular type of programme. Context clearly strongly influences audience expectations, and Ofcom is enjoined to take those expectations into account. In coming to such decisions as to contextual suitability, Ofcom must take into account the probable size and composition of the potential audience for particular radio and television programmes. But Ofcom also has to consider the nature of the audience for television and radio services generally. This appears to mean that Ofcom must look beyond the audience that might be attracted to, for example, a sexually explicit film shown late at night and take account of the expectations and wishes of the more general audience who might happen to tune in to it. Clearly, this provision might encourage Ofcom to take a more restrictive approach. The possibility that persons might be unintentionally exposed to the content of a programme, and the extent to which the nature of a programme's content can be brought to the attention of potential members of the audience, are specifically identified as relevant factors, but it is clearly implicit in this approach that even where a person could take steps to ascertain the content of a programme beforehand (ie outside the context of trailers or adverts which come upon the audience without warning), the programme makers must take their susceptibility to offence into account.

Section 319 has nothing to say about the responsibility of audience members to seek to avoid shock or offence by looking up the guidance given as to the nature of the programme beforehand or using interactive features to do so. The nod in the direction of editorial freedom in s 319(4)(f) does not amount to the far more comprehensive guidance which could have been given as to the showing of material at the boundaries of acceptability, such as material from films with an '18' rating which are towards the further end description; the likely size and composition of the potential audience for programmes included in television and radio services generally, or in television and radio services of a particular description; the likely expectation of the audience as to the nature of a programme's content and the extent to which the nature of a programme's content can be brought to the attention of potential members of the audience; the likelihood of persons who are unaware of the nature of a programme's content being unintentionally exposed, by their own actions, to that content; the desirability of securing that the content of services identifies when there is a change affecting the nature of a service that is being watched or listened to and, in particular, a change that is relevant to the application of the standards set under this section; and the desirability of maintaining the independence of editorial control over programme content.'

of the '18' classification band.[316] For example, specific guidance could have been given as to the conditions under which such material could be broadcast. The use of the term 'offensive' clearly implies that the material covered falls well outside the boundaries of criminal liability created by the common law, statutory indecency provisions, or the Obscene Publications Act 1959,[317] taking account of the 'public good' defence under s 4, which was discussed above. As discussed in Chapter 8, those provisions set variable but higher bars in terms of establishing the impact of the material in order to attract liability than is inherent in the term 'offensive'. Section 319 therefore indicates that there is a body of material that cannot be broadcast, although it lies well outside the boundaries created by the criminal law relating to explicit expression. At present, the statutory emphasis on the possibility that persons might view such material unawares appears to outweigh the emphasis on seeking to ensure that willing adult audiences can view such material. It is arguable that a full plurality of standards is not being maintained.

As indicated, it is extremely unlikely that a broadcast could fall foul of the Obscene Publications Act 1959. However, given the 'likely audience' test used in obscenity law, as discussed above, an argument could conceivably be made that the transmission of a film on television changes the analysis of that audience since individuals, including children or teenagers, switching between channels at random, could be confronted by explicit images without warning. Since obscenity is a relative concept, judged to its effect on a significant proportion of the likely audience, a televised film could be adjudged obscene where that would not be the case if it was made available only by hiring a DVD, since the publicity material on the DVD case, together with the age rating for the film, would give the individual some warning of its likely content. It would be even less likely that the same film could be viewed as obscene when shown in the cinema, since entrance to the cinema would be age-restricted; further, the advertisements for the film would provide a warning. Given therefore, that when a film is broadcast on television, there is the likelihood of a number of younger people stumbling upon it unawares, it is possible to conceive of a particular broadcast being deemed obscene, though the film itself obviously had not been – by the film regulator, the British Board of Film Classification (BBFC).[318] Since 'hard core' pornography – film material rated R18 – is not broadcast on television under the current regulatory regime,[319] this is highly improbable but the possibility cannot be completely ruled out.

Ofcom's Broadcast Code[320]

Until 2005 Ofcom relied on the ITC Code and on the BSC Standards Code, although it was in the process of developing its own Code. The 2005 Code now applies[321] to 316 The nature of the '18' rating is discussed below in relation to the current stance of the British Board of Film Classification (BBFC). See pp 553–61.

317 Under Broadcasting Act 1990 s 162 the 1959 Act is applied to broadcasting; s 162 was not repealed by the Communications Act 2003.

318 For the standards the BBFC currently uses in classifying films, see pp 555–61 below. Clearly, it would not classify a film that might be obscene within the meaning of the OPA 1959.

319 See p 528 below.

320 See s 324(1).

321 It came into force on July 25 2005.

programmes, advertisements[322] and text broadcast on all forms of television services and radio, including satellite and cable channels. Ofcom made a deliberate decision to discard the ITC and BSC Codes on offence-avoidance and to make a fresh start with its own Code. Clearly, one option would have been merely to adopt the ITC Programme Code as it stood, with some modifications due to Ofcom's broader remit. The ITC Code would have had the advantage of familiarity as far as the independent broadcasters were concerned, and also it had evolved over a number of years, taking into account the ITC's experience in monitoring it. It had also undergone an incremental process of liberalisation. However, Ofcom decided instead to make a clean break and to introduce a new Code which, while it retains certain basic features of the ITC Code, differs from it significantly in a number of respects.

Ofcom's current Code places the emphasis more strongly than the ITC Code did on the avoidance of harm, rather than on the imprecise and subjective idea of avoidance of offence and the maintenance of standards of 'good taste'. It also places greater emphasis on the use of warnings rather than on restricting the broadcast of certain forms of material. Thus it assumes up to a point that the audience can exercise choice and protect itself from shock. It further assumes that people are entitled to view a wide and diverse range of programmes. It is less prescriptive, comprehensive and detailed than the last (2003) version of the ITC Code. Ofcom's Code places quite a strong emphasis on free expression principles and on editorial responsibility since it is less extensive and prescriptive than the ITC and BSC Codes. Nevertheless, in a number of specific instances it is very precise and provides clear and unequivocal rules.[323] The prescriptive terms used indicate that a number of the rules are mandatory rather than advisory or discretionary. In those instances, then, broadcasters clearly lay themselves open to the possibility of an adverse adjudication for breach of the Code if they do not follow the rules. However, the use of clear and precise rules, so long as their restraining effect is kept to a minimum, does obviate the potentially chilling effect of imprecision.

The Code is more firmly based on the principle of allowing for creative freedom than the two previous Codes were. To this end, Ofcom's Code creates a clear dividing line between provisions applicable to children and to adults, whereas the ITC Code provisions applied, on their face, to both. The ITC Programme Code, s 1.2 was headed 'Family Viewing Policy, Offence to Good Taste and Decency, Portrayal of Violence and Respect for Human Dignity'. However, it did not seek to ensure that unsuitable material would never be viewed by a few children. The rules assumed a 'progressive decline throughout the evening in the proportion of children present in the audience'. Section 1 of Ofcom's Code is headed 'Protecting the under-18s', while s 2 relates to protection from harmful or offensive material generally. It can be assumed therefore that s 2 relates mainly, although not exclusively, to adults. Ofcom's stance is welcome since it allows for a greater focus on the need for restrictions applicable largely to adult programming. Under the ITC Code there appeared to be a greater possibility that adult viewing would be restricted in order to protect children. Ofcom's Code also lays greater emphasis – depending on Ofom's interpretation of it in practice – on protecting persons from the inadvertent viewing of offensive material, not by barring it from broadcasts, but by requiring that it is accompanied by extensive warnings.

322 Broadcast advertisements are under the remit of the Advertising Standards Authority, working in partnership with Ofcom.

323 See eg ss 1.1, 1.2 and 1.5 of the Code.

Ofcom's Code places a strong emphasis on protecting children, not by restricting or banning the showing of explicit material completely, but by showing it at certain times, either after the watershed or by avoiding times when 'children are particularly likely to be listening'. Ofcom's Code is also more specific than the ITC one in relation to what should not be shown when children are likely to be viewers. Only 'material that might seriously impair the moral, mental or physical development of children (emphasis added)' must not be broadcast.[324] (The wording is taken from the Television Without Frontiers Directive, 1997, Art 22.1.)[325] Ofcom's Code begins with the Directive's wording, indicating that it is focusing on the avoidance of serious harms, whereas the ITC Code began with the wording from s 6(1)(a) of the 1990 Act concerning the avoidance of material that is offensive to good taste and decency. In other words, the Code is focused on the avoidance of serious and specific harms to children (defined as those under 15). But under s 1.2 material that might merely impair their development in the ways specified can be shown so long as 'appropriate scheduling or technical devices' are used. The reference to scheduling means, following ss 1.3 and 1.4, that the material must be shown after the watershed and the probable number and age of the children present in the audience must be taken into account. If encoding is not used, 'a clear verbal warning' must be given prior to the programme. Encoding may provide an effective means of protecting children while allowing adults to view a range of material, including explicit or potentially disturbing material.

The use of the term 'seriously impair' creates, on its face, a standard that appears similar to that employed in the Obscene Publications Act 1959 with its use of the terms 'deprave and corrupt'. In fact the test under the OPA is not currently interpreted in this fashion,[326] but the apparent closeness of the boundaries between the two tests is of interest since, taking the previous regime into account, one would expect a broadcast regulatory body to impose standards lying well within the borders of the basic OPA test. In general, the emphasis of Ofcom's Code as regards children is on the use of various devices to protect them (the use of the watershed, detailed warnings, PIN-protection and encoding of material), rather than on bans or on making cuts in the material. '18' rated films can be shown at any time while 'adult-sex' material can be shown between 2200 and 0530 so long as protections are in place to ensure that children cannot view the material.[327] A very clear distinction is drawn between pay-per-view and ordinary

324 Section 1.1.

325 Dir 89/552, as amended by Directive 97/36.

326 See pp 00; see also Edwards, S, 'On the Contemporary Application of the Obscene Publications Act' (1998) Crim LR 843.

327 1.23 Pay per view services may broadcast up to BBFC 18-rated films or their equivalent, at any time of day provided: there is a protection system pre 2100 and post 0530 (a mandatory PIN or other equivalent protection), that seeks satisfactorily to restrict access solely to those authorised to view when material other than BBFC U-rated or PG-rated or their equivalents is shown; information is provided about programme content that will assist adults to assess its suitability for children; there is a detailed billing system for subscribers which clearly itemises all viewing including viewing times and dates; and those security systems which are in place to protect children are clearly explained to all subscribers.

broadcasting, although 'R18' material still cannot be broadcast.[328] The convergence that appears to be occurring between video and pay per view broadcasting suggests that the current distinction between what can be shown on the two media may eventually disappear. In fact, ironically, it may now be less likely that children would view R18 material in Pin-protected broadcasts than on video, once videos are brought into the home by adults.

Section 2 of the Code, focusing more on adult viewing, is aimed at ensuring that broadcasters provide 'adequate protection for viewers and listeners from the inclusion of harmful or offensive material', judged against 'generally accepted standards'. It is noticeable that the 'protection' to be provided in s 2 centres more on the provision of information, than on making cuts in the material. This is made clear in s 2.3. At the same time s 2.3 makes it clear that if the use of potentially offensive language and material, in particular, the inclusion of scenes of violence or sex, sexual violence, or scenes of humiliation, distress or the use of discriminatory treatment or language must be justified by the context, implying that otherwise they should not be broadcast or should be cut. The term 'context' refers, inter alia, to a number of the factors outlined in s 319(4)(a), (b), (c) and (d) of the Communications Act.[329] But s 2.3 also accepts that if information is included, presumably in the form of consumer advice and detailed warnings as to content, it can assist in preventing offence.

Section 2, in contrast to the provisions of the ITC Code, is far more specific. After the general provisions regarding the broadcasting of explicit material in ss 2.1 and 2.3, it focuses, in the following sections on a range of specific harms to be avoided.[330]

1.24 Premium subscription services and pay per view/night services may broadcast 'adult-sex' material between 2200 and 0530 provided that in addition to other protections mentioned above: there is a mandatory PIN protected encryption system, or other equivalent protection, that seeks satisfactorily to restrict access solely to those authorised to view; and there are measures in place that ensure that the subscriber is an adult.

1.25 BBFC R18-rated films or their equivalent must not be broadcast.

328 In May 2005 Ofcom conducted a research study, Research into the Effectiveness of PIN Protection Systems in the UK. It found that a high percentage of children (about 50% of those in the relevant houses surveyed) knew that a PIN number was needed to access blocked channels and of those children about 50% knew of their parents' PIN number; of those just under half had used the number to access pay-per-view programmes without their parents' permission. Ofcom concluded that security methods in the current PIN environment are not likely to prevent children from accessing 'R18' material.

329 See above fn 315.

330 2.4 Programmes must avoid anything that individually, and/or taken as a whole and in context, is likely to encourage violent, dangerous or seriously antisocial behaviour.

2.5 The means or methods of suicide and self harm must not be included in programmes except where the context, scheduling and likely audience can justify them.

2.6 Demonstrations of exorcism, the occult, the paranormal, divination and related practices must be treated with due objectivity. Entertainment programmes that contain such demonstrations must be clearly labelled as such for the audience. No potentially life changing advice may be given. (Religious programmes are exempted from the rule about life-changing advice but must, in any event, comply with the provisions in the section regarding religious programmes in this Code.) (Please also note the scheduling restrictions contained in section 1 of this Code.) Films, dramas and fiction generally are not bound by this rule. Meaning of 'life-changing': Life-changing advice includes advice about health, finances, employment, relationships etc.

2.7 Broadcasters must prevent hypnosis being induced in susceptible viewers and listeners . . .

Beginning with the opening words about taste and decency in s 1.1, the ITC Code was more general and much more extensive.[331] In relation to films, Ofcom's Code provides, in s 1.20: 'No version of a film or programme refused certification by the British Board of Film Classification (BBFC) may be broadcast.' Material rated 'R18' cannot be shown; '18' rated films can be shown after 9.00 pm, but even after that point they may be viewed as 'unsuitable' (s 1.21). As to suitability, Ofcom presumably takes the view that the provisions relating to the portrayal of sex and violence and the showing of disturbing material in general in s 1 regarding children and in s 2 cover the scheduling of films. But it is clear that Ofcom's Code is somewhat less prescriptive in this respect and leaves greater discretion to the broadcasters. But the BBFC standards are regarded as minimum ones; the mere fact that a film has an '18' certificate is not to be taken as implying that it is clearly proper to broadcast it.

It can be said that Ofcom's Code accords with the liberal free speech account of restrictions on broadcasting discussed above in so far as it concentrates on the avoidance of specific harms, and largely avoids the use of broad statements about ensuring the promotion of 'good taste and decency'. It strikes a balance between offence avoidance and the right of adult television audiences to receive a diverse range of broadcast expression, which differs somewhat from the balance struck under the superceded Codes. The ability of people to take responsibility for protecting themselves from offence is more strongly emphasised. The restrictions placed on films shown

2.9 Programmes must not use techniques which exploit the possibility of conveying a message to viewers or listeners, or of otherwise influencing their minds, without their being aware, or fully aware, of what has occurred.

2.10 Television broadcasters must minimise the risk to viewers who have photosensitive epilepsy . . .

3.1 Material likely to encourage or incite crime, or likely to lead to disorder must not be included in television or radio services.

3.2 Material that enables viewers or listeners to commit crime must not be included in television or radio services . . .

3.6 Material must not be broadcast that could endanger lives or prejudice the success of attempts to deal with a hijack or kidnapping.

331 1.6 Sex and Nudity. Similar considerations apply. Much great fiction and drama have been concerned with love and passion which can shock and disturb. Popular entertainment and comedy have always relied to some extent on sexual innuendo and suggestive behaviour but gratuitous offence should be avoided. Careful consideration should be given to nudity before the watershed but some nudity may be justifiable in a non-sexual and relevant context. Representations of sexual intercourse should not occur before the watershed unless there is a serious educational purpose. Any portrayal of sexual behaviour must be defensible in context. If included before the watershed it must be appropriately limited and inexplicit. Sex scenes of a more adult nature, which are more graphic and prolonged, should be limited to much later in the schedule. (See also Section 1.3(i))

1.7 Violence. The real world contains violence in many forms. It is reasonable for television to reflect this but it is clear that the portrayal of violence, whether physical, verbal or psychological, can upset, disturb and offend and can be accused of desensitising viewers, of making them unduly fearful or of encouraging imitation. These are legitimate public concerns requiring careful consideration whenever violence, real or simulated, is to be shown. The treatment of violence must always be appropriate to the context, scheduling, channel and audience expectations.

a) Offensive violence. At the simplest level, some portrayed acts of violence may go beyond the bounds of what is tolerable in that they could be classified as material which, in the words of the Broadcasting Act, is 'likely to be offensive to public feeling'.

on television appear to be more in line with those placed on videos, as discussed in Chapter 00, although it remains the case that 'hardcore' pornography cannot be broadcast. Since videos and the internet also come into the home this relaxation of the rules is readily defensible.

An indication of the stance Ofcom is currently taking was given when, in 2005, Ofcom cleared the BBC of flouting the BSC Code in relation to Jerry Springer – the Opera. The programme, which satirised features of Christianity, received 16,801 complaints.[332] Ofcom considered in particular the question of offence against religious sensibilities and balanced the possibility of offence against the need to protect freedom of expression. In coming to this finding, Ofcom took into account the significance of the work. This was a very important and telling decision, bearing in mind the subject-matter 332 The BBC's Governors Programme Complaints Committee had also considered the complaints; it found: ' in all the circumstances, the outstanding artistic significance of the programme outweighed the offence which it caused to some viewers and so the broadcasting of the programme was justified'.

Extracts from Ofcom's adjudication: Sections 26 and 27 – Respect and Dignity. The Code states that 'challenging and deliberately flouting the boundaries of taste in drama and comedy is a time-honoured tradition. Although these programmes have a special freedom, this does not give them unlimited licence to be cruel or to humiliate individuals or groups gratuitously'. Ofcom recognises that a great number of complainants felt that the Opera denigrated the Christian religion. The show was created as a caricature of modern television. Importantly, in Ofcom's view the Opera did not gratuitously humiliate individuals or any groups and in particular the Christian community. Its target was television and fame. Conclusion: The programme did not contravene these sections of the Code. Sections 43–45 – Offences against Religious Sensibilities. The Code states that: 'Although religions should not be exempt from (the) critical scrutiny . . . particular care should be taken when referring to religion in entertainment.' Many complainants accused the BBC of committing the crime of blasphemy. However, criminal law is not a matter for Ofcom but for the courts. Ofcom is not required to determine whether the BBC committed blasphemy, but whether, in this case, the provisions of the Code had been contravened . . . Ofcom has sought to achieve the appropriate balance between, on the one hand the standards set in the Code (ex-BSC Code on Standards) and the need to apply those standards to give adequate protection from harmful and offensive material, and on the other hand the need, as appropriate, to guarantee freedom of expression. Freedom of expression is particularly important in the context of artistic works, beliefs, philosophy and argument . . . Their main concern arose from the depictions of figures at the heart of the complainants' religious beliefs. In considering offence against religious sensibilities, Ofcom took into account the clear context of the Opera. The fictional Jerry Springer lay dying in a delusional state. As he hallucinated, this character was asked to pitch Jesus against the Devil in his own confessional talk show. This 'dream' sequence was emphasised by the fact that the same actors, who played guests on his show in the first act, played the characters in the second act. What resulted was a cartoon, full of grotesque images, which challenged the audience's views about morality and the human condition. The production made clear that all the characters in the second act were the product of the fictional Springer's imagination: his concepts of Satan, God, Jesus and the others and modelled on the guests in his show . . . In light of this, Ofcom did not believe that the characters represented were, in the context of this piece, conveyed as faithful or accurate representations of religious figures, but were characterisations of the show's participants . . . It is not within Ofcom's remit to record a contravention of the Code on the basis that Christianity, as opposed to another faith, was the subject of Jerry Springer: The Opera. In considering freedom of expression, Ofcom recognises the UK's long-standing tradition of satirising political and religious figures and celebrities. Ofcom must consider each programme on its merits. No contravention was found. Ofcom broadcast bulletin 34, 9 May 2005. See Ofcom's web-site 10 May 2005. An application to seek judicial review of the BBC's decision to screen the film, by the Christian Institute and other groups was refused by the Honourable Mr Justice Crane, judgment dated 27 May 2005.

of the programme and the extremely large number of complaints; it may be taken to indicate that Ofcom is taking a robust stance in relation to creative freedom.[333]

It may be concluded that in so far as the ITC Code in its various manifestations was gradually becoming more liberal, Ofcom's Code takes this process further. But although the Code is, on its face, a liberalising measure when compared with the ITC and BSC's Codes, a number of open-ended terms are used and the level of detail of those Codes is missing. Thus Ofcom has a great deal of leeway to take a range of approaches in terms of liberality and the preservation of creative freedom when it adjudicates on alleged breaches of the Code. It also has a lot of room for manouevre in drafting future manifestations of the Code. Since it is unlikely that there will be much or any court intervention in Ofcom's regulatory scheme, after the Pro-Life decision, the provisions of the Code and Ofcom's stance towards them provide the key mechanisms for protecting free speech in broadcasting. Nevertheless, it is to the possibilities of court intervention under the HRA that this chapter now turns.

The potential effects of the Human Rights Act and the implications of the Pro-Life Alliance decision for the current regime

The public authority/private body distinction

Ofcom and the public sector broadcasters are susceptible to challenge under the Human Rights Act. Ofcom is probably a core public authority under s 6(1) HRA; it has clear governmental functions since it is a regulator set up by government. In any event, it is clearly a functional public authority as is reasonably clear from the discussion of the meaning of 'public function' under s 6(3)(b) HRA in Chapter 4.[334] It can be viewed as a governmental body in being set up under a Royal Charter. Acceptance of its status as a functional public authority appeared to be implicit in the decision in the case of Pro-Life Alliance,[335] although, as discussed, the judges were reluctant to engage in argument as to the mechanisms of the HRA.

Assuming that the BBC is a functional public authority, there is then immense room for argument as to those functions it has that are 'public'. There is nothing inherently public about broadcasting, and if the BBC were to be viewed as acting publicly in relation to all aspects of programme-making, this would set up a clear anomaly in relation 333 The stance it took in relation to Jerry Springer may be contrasted with its stance in relation to the timing of the broadcast of Pulp Fiction by the BBC Report: Pulp Fiction BBC 2, 7 August 2004, 21:10 Nine viewers complained about the transmission of this film. The majority were concerned that its transmission shortly after the 21:00 watershed, when young people watch television, could encourage anti-social behaviour. Overall, viewers felt that the strong content, including graphic violence, seriously offensive swearing and scenes of drug abuse, made the film unsuitable at a time in the evening when young people and children were still part of the audience. It was found that such intense material is not normally expected so soon after the watershed and that the scheduling of this film at 21:10 was too early, given the strong, adult content from the start. The scheduling of this film was found to be in contravention of the Code. It may be noted that the case was appealed three times by the BBC. This decision was made by the Content Board following the BBC's third and final appeal.

334 See pp 216–35.

335 [2003] 2 WLR 1403, see pp 534–43.

to the private broadcasters since they would be performing the same function but would not bound by the HRA. A distinction could be drawn between the BBC's function as a broadcaster and as a regulator, finding that it is providing a public function in the latter role but not the former. This would be a sensible line to draw, although it is not without its difficulties. This stance could be viewed as implicit in Pro-Life. This would mean that when the BBC regulates its own programmes it is performing a public function. Thus, decisions as to filming techniques and the making of programmes might not be viewed as 'public' while decisions to allow a programme to be broadcast taken at senior level would be. Decisions taken in relation to offence-avoidance could be viewed as public as so closely associated with the BBC's core role in providing programming for public consumption. Clearly, s 6 HRA inevitably creates difficult decisions and anomalies in relation to the public/private divide. The BBC provides an especially difficult example. But it must be noted for the purposes of this chapter that assuming it is a public authority in relation to decisions to broadcast, it is hard to imagine a situation in which a Convention right could be invoked against it in response to a positive decision to broadcast a programme that then caused offence. There is no Convention right not to be offended – the only possible candidate would be Art 9 in relation to offending against religious sensibilities.[336] The public/private function divide is far more significant in relation to invasion of privacy, discussed in Chapter 9.

Channel 4 may possibly have the status of a functional public authority since it has public service functions, but the independent broadcasting companies are almost certainly private bodies for HRA purposes. Thus the independent broadcasters cannot be challenged directly under the HRA. However, in any court action against Ofcom or the BBC concerning relevant sections of the 2003 Act, an interpretation of the provisions should of course be adopted, under s 3(1) HRA, which accords with the demands of Art 10. Any resultant modification of the Act by interpretation, or as a result of a declaration of incompatibility under s 4 HRA, would then affect the independent broadcasters. If s 319 itself were affected in this way the effect would be indirect, as a result of a change in Ofcom's stance. Also, as public authorities, Ofcom and the BBC must take the demands of Art 10 into account in coming to any decisions relating to content restrictions.

The Pro-Life Alliance decision, discussed below, with its strong emphasis on deference to the regulatory scheme and the regulator, gave little encouragement to the use of the HRA as a means of challenging restrictive decisions relating to broadcast material or the restrictions themselves. However, using a different approach, or on other, more compelling, facts a successful challenge remains a possibility. Overly restrictive decisions of public sector broadcasters and of Ofcom under the 'offensive material' provisions of s 319 of the 2003 Act and the current Code could theoretically be challenged by a programme-maker under s 7(1)(a) HRA, relying on Art 10. A challenge to Ofcom's use of its powers would normally have to occur after the event since Ofcom does not have censorship powers.

There are some grounds for thinking that the inception of the Human Rights Act might have called the previous regime into question and that it might still do so as regards the current one. In this context the restraints on broadcast expression relate to offence-avoidance. Such restraints can be justified only where they meet the Art 10(2) tests.[337] In particular they have to be proportionate to the aims of protecting morality or the rights of others. On the face of it, one might not expect the restrictions on the basis of avoiding offence – essentially of a similar nature under the previous and the current regimes – to meet those tests since the term 'offence' is so broad and imprecise. However, as discussed above, the Convention jurisprudence interpreting Art 10(2) notoriously does not uphold freedom of expression very strongly where restrictions protecting children from offence in respect of non-political speech are concerned. Thus the possibility of mounting challenges to the decisions of regulators or broadcasters in court was always likely to be problematic since the regulatory regime tends to have its greatest impact on artistic rather than political speech. The message of political expression can frequently, although not invariably, be conveyed without the use of potentially offensive words or images. As discussed, a strong pronouncement was made in Handyside[338] to the effect that Art 10(1) covers speech which some might find offensive, but the Court went on to find that in the instance before it such speech (albeit of ideological significance) could justifiably be suppressed, and it reached this decision on the basis of conceding a wide margin of appreciation to the state since there is no uniform European conception of moral standards.[339] It can therefore readily be said in this context that the Art 10 standard is 'soft-edged': applied domestically, it very clearly leaves room for the adoption of either an activist or a minimalist approach, and Pro-Life adopted the latter approach. It might well support quite far-reaching restrictions on broadcasting owing to the possibility that children might be affected.

336 See Otto-Preminger (1994) 19 EHRR 34, discussed at pp 488–90, above.

But, as discussed above, in the line of authority stemming from Handyside[340] a broad margin of appreciation was conceded to the state in finding against the applicant, especially where offensive 'artistic' speech was concerned – using that term loosely.[341] The pronouncement in Handyside to the effect that Art 10(1) covers offensive speech runs presumptively directly counter to the previous provision against such speech in broadcasting in s 6(1)(a) 1990 Act, aspects of the BBC's Agreement, s 108 1996 Act and now s 319 of the 2003 Act. As the domestic courts are not required to concede a margin of appreciation to the state, there is a case for expecting them to take a stricter stance in relation to restraints on broadcast speech. The use of the Convention jurisprudence on both political and, if afforded a creative interpretation, artistic expression,[342] has in principle the potential, applied domestically, to challenge accepted conceptions of offence-avoidance in broadcasting. This argument is reasonably strong in relation to restrictions on all forms of broadcasting on the ground of offence-avoidance, including soap operas, 'reality' TV programmes, and films. It is even stronger in relation to forms of political broadcasting, such as Party Political Broadcasts, Election Broadcasts, news programmes and documentaries since the Strasbourg jurisprudence defends political expression in the media very strongly – as decisions such as that in Jersild,[343] discussed in Chapter 2, demonstrate. Handyside, as discussed above, concerned expression that 337 Discussed in Chapter 2, pp 92–96.

338 See pp 464–65.
339 See p 464.
340 See pp 465–67.
341 As discussed, the effect of the doctrine should be irrelevant in the domestic courts since the margin of appreciation doctrine is an international one with no application domestically. See Chapter 2, pp 36–39.
342 See above, pp 467–68.
343 (1994) 19 EHRR 1. See further Chapter 2, p 93.

could be viewed only as a very marginal form of political speech. Mainstream, 'core', political expression, even accompanied by explicit images, could in principle be treated as far more analogous with the expression in Jersild, which concerned the broadcast of a programme containing grossly racist language. If this argument were to be accepted, restraints based on offence-avoidance, particularly if applied to such speech, would be found to breach Art 10 as impermissibly over-broad.

Pro-Life Alliance v BBC

This chapter goes on to discuss R. (on the application of) Pro-Life Alliance v BBC,[344] in which the taste and decency provisions of the pre-2003 regime were considered against Art 10 standards. The decision is considered at length since it is one of the most significant (and disappointing) post-HRA free speech decisions and has very important implications for the current Ofcom regime. The divergent approaches towards political expression, the effect of the HRA and the stance as to the impact of the taste and decency rules in the House of Lords as compared to that taken by the Court of Appeal make this decision remarkable.

Restraints created by regulation based on maintaining standards of 'taste and decency' are especially problematic in relation to political broadcasting. Many types of political expression in the form of documentaries, discussions, interviews with politicians are broadcast, but the opportunities for political groups to speak directly to television audiences by producing their own programmes for broadcasting are very constrained. Political advertising is prohibited in independent broadcasting[345] and the BBC is prohibited from accepting payment in return for broadcasting. Party Political Broadcasts (PPBs) and Party Election Broadcasts (PEBs), transmitted free, are an exception to this rule. These PPBs and PEBs provide the only opportunity for political parties to have access to television to obtain broadcast time for programmes they produce in order to promote their party and their political agenda. But this narrow opportunity for this particular form of political communication is on its face restricted by the taste and decency requirements, which in this instance operate as a prior restraint since the broadcasters have the opportunity to reject material or insist on cuts to the proposed broadcast beforehand.

The taste and decency provisions of the BSC Standards Code, the ITC Code and the BBC Agreement applied to all forms of broadcasting expression, including political expression. Therefore PPBs and PEBs were covered (and are still covered under the current regime, as discussed below). This position was endorsed by a document produced jointly by the BBC and the independent broadcasters entitled 'Guidelines for the Production of Party Election Broadcasts' which indicated that PEBs had to comply with the ITC Programme Code and the BBC Producers' Guidelines, 'having regard to the political context of the broadcast'. Paragraph 4 of the BBC Producers' Guidelines 'Impartiality and Accuracy', states:

> The content of party political broadcasts, party election broadcasts, and Ministerial broadcasts (together with Opposition replies) is primarily a matter for the originating party or the Government and therefore it is not required to achieve impartiality. The

344 [2003] 2 WLR 1403; [2003] 2 All ER 977.
345 Communications Act 2003, ss 319 and 321.

> BBC remains responsible for the broadcasts as publisher, however, and requires the parties to observe proper standards of legality, taste and decency.

Paragraph 4.2 of the ITC Programme Code stated:

> Editorial control of the contents of [PPBs and PEBs] normally rests with the originating political party. However, licensees are responsible to the ITC for ensuring that nothing transmitted breaches the Programme Code, notably the requirements on matters of offence to good taste and decency set out in section 1 . . . Licensees should issue parties with general guidelines on the acceptability of content . . . These guidelines, which are agreed between all relevant broadcasters, are designed to reconcile the editorial standards of the broadcaster, and audience expectations, with the freedom of political parties to convey their political messages.

The Guidelines for the Production of Party Election Broadcasts issued by the broadcasters for the 2001 election stated that PEBs had to comply with the ITC Programme Code and the BBC Producers' Guidelines relating to taste and decency and the codes concerning fairness and privacy, 'having regard to the political context of the broadcast'.

The application of these constraints to political broadcasting was challenged in R (on the application of Pro-Life Alliance) v BBC.[346] The case arose from a refusal of a PEB by the BBC and independent broadcasters; eventually the House of Lords had to consider the application of the taste and decency provisions to a PEB – the first time that such restraints had been looked at by the senior judiciary. The Pro-Life Alliance is a registered political party which opposes abortion. At the 1997 General Election the applicant put up enough parliamentary candidates to qualify for a party election broadcast. The applicant submitted a video showing, inter alia, an abortion being carried out. The broadcasters refused to broadcast the video on the grounds that it offended against good taste and decency and would cause widespread offence. The applicant's application for permission to seek judicial review was refused by Dyson J and by the Court of Appeal, and its application to the European Court of Human Rights was declared inadmissible by the Commission.[347] At the 2001 General Election the applicant put up enough parliamentary candidates to qualify for a PEB[348] in

346 [2003] 2 WLR 1403; [2003] 2 All ER 977.

347 See: R v British Broadcasting Corpn, ex p Pro-Life Alliance Party (unreported) 24 March 1997; R v BBC ex p Quintavalle (1997) 10 Admin LR 425; Pro-Life Alliance v United Kingdom (Application No 41869/98) 24 October 2000.

348 Section 36 of the 1990 Act provides that licences for certain descriptions of broadcasters must include 'conditions requiring the licence holder to include party political broadcasts in the licensed service' (subsection (1)(a)) and to observe 'such rules with respect to party political broadcasts as the [ITC] may determine' (subsection (1)(b)). The BBC is not under a formal obligation to offer PPBs or PEBs but has agreed to the same rules of allocation. Section 4 of the ITC Programme Code contains the rules for PPBs and PEBs. PPBs are offered to the major parties in Great Britain (the Labour, Conservative and Liberal Democrat parties and, in Scotland and Wales respectively, the Scottish National Party and Plaid Cymru) at the time of significant events in the political calendar. PEBs are offered at election times. In the 2001 General Election, the major parties were each offered a separate series of PEBs in each of the four nations of the United Kingdom. A smaller party could qualify for a PEB for transmission in the territory of any nation if it fielded candidates in at least one-sixth of its seats. Thus a party could qualify if it put up 88 candidates in England, 12 in Scotland, 6 in Wales,

Wales.[349] The applicant submitted a modified form of the video it had submitted in 1997; it had been edited to remove the most graphic images but still showed aborted foetuses in a mutilated state. The video described the processes involved in different forms of abortion, and included, as Simon Brown LJ put it: 'prolonged and graphic images of the product of suction abortion'. Again, representatives of the broadcasters refused to screen the images as part of the proposed broadcast. They did not raise any objection, however, to the soundtrack proposed. Therefore the Pro-Life Alliance was able to make various anti-abortion points verbally. Eventually a version of the video was submitted by the Alliance and unanimously approved by the broadcasters. It replaced the offending images with a blank screen on which the word 'censored' appeared, and which was accompanied by a sound track describing the images shown in the banned pictures. This version was then broadcast in Wales before the General Election.[350]

The Pro-Life Alliance then applied for permission to seek judicial review of the broadcasters' refusal to broadcast the original version of the video, showing the offending images. The application was dismissed by Scott-Baker J. Like Dyson J, Scott-Baker J held that the broadcasters' decision was not irrational, and the applicant appealed. The challenge was not to s 6(1)(a) of the Broadcasting Act 1990, imposing the requirement to adhere to the taste and decency standards, itself, or the equivalent standards of the BBC's Licencing Agreement, as inconsistent with Art 10 under the HRA; so a declaration of the incompatibility of s 6(1)(a) with Art 10 was not sought under s 4 HRA. (Given that the case was brought against the BBC which was not subject to s 6(1)(a) it is hard to see that a declaration could have been made, in any event. This point was avoided by the judges in the proceedings.) The applicant argued rather that the broadcasters had not properly applied those standards, on the basis that they had failed to attach sufficient significance to the electoral context – a context in which freedom of expression was especially crucial.

The Court of Appeal found that under the HRA it itself had to decide whether the censorship (as it put it) in question was justifiable under Art 10(2) of the European Convention. The prohibition of the claimant's PEB was found to be 'prescribed by law' since the broadcasters' obligations arose under the Agreement between the BBC and the Secretary of State and under s 6(1) Broadcasting Act 1990. It was further found that they did not offend against the required standard of legal certainty. The factors of taste, decency and offence were found to be capable of justifying a prohibition upon free expression under Art 10(2) since they could be viewed as aspects of the 'rights of others' – a term that required, it was found, a broad interpretation: the 3 in Northern Ireland. These rules and the fact that abortion is not at present available in Northern Ireland obviously dictated the tactical choice of Wales for the Pro-Life Alliance.

349 The rules governing PEBs, and the fact that abortion is not at present available in Northern Ireland, obviously dictated the tactical choice of Wales for the Pro-Life Alliance since the cost would be far less when the candidates lost their deposits than it would have been had candidates been put up in England. The loss of deposits was almost certainly inevitable in the case of an extremist single-issue party, and in the event all the deposits were duly lost. The six Alliance candidates in Wales received a total of 1,609 votes, or 0.117% of the total votes cast.

350 It may be noted that had the Alliance succeeded in the application discussed below, and put the offending version of the same video forward for broadcasting in the 2005 election campaign, the broadcasters would have had to broadcast it if the Alliance had put up enough candidates to qualify for a PEB.

'rights' were not limited to the Convention rights.[351] In considering the necessity and proportionality of the interference with the freedom of expression of the Alliance and the potential audience, Laws LJ, for the majority, examined the question of deference, considering that 'the degree of deference which the Court would pay to the view of the legislature in imposing requirements of taste and decency, and to the expertise of the broadcasters, depended on the context'. In the context of broadcast entertainment, he found, a very high degree of respect to the broadcasters' judgment would be accorded, while the broadcasters' margin of discretion would be only slightly diminished in the context of day-to-day news reporting. However, in the context of a general election the broadcasters' margin, it was found, would be very constrained since the court's duty to protect political speech would be viewed as 'over- arching'.[352]

Citing the Bowman case,[353] Laws LJ went on to find that under the Strasbourg jurisprudence the state in principle possesses very little discretion to interfere with free political speech, especially at election time. But he acknowledged that a wide margin of appreciation is conceded to states in the context of speech liable to offend against personal moral or religious convictions, on the basis that the signatory states are in such instances at greater liberty to choose between more restrictive or more liberal regimes. Therefore, he went on to find, the national authorities in question can make choices as to the approach to be taken to restrictions on political speech, where such convictions may also be at stake.

He considered that in extreme cases concerns regarding taste and decency might prevail even over political speech, but found that this was not the case in the instance before him. Such an instance might, he found, involve factors of gratuitous sensationalism and dishonesty, rather than the mere promulgation of graphic and disturbing images. Having decided that gratuitous sensationalism was not present, Laws LJ found that considerations of taste and decency could not prevail over freedom of speech by a political party at election time, except wholly exceptionally – and this instance did not, he found, require an exception to be made. Very little deference to the broadcasters' expertise and experience was accorded by the court.[354] A declaration was made that the BBC's refusal to broadcast the Pro-Life Alliance's party election broadcast was unlawful.

But this was a seminal free speech ruling. It was entirely consistent with the argument expressed at the beginning of this chapter, that content-based regulatory schemes tend to run counter to free speech rationales. It was a principled ruling that looked closely at the importance of the type of speech in question and found that flexibility had to be imposed on the regulatory scheme in order to accommodate it. Taking account of the high value of the speech, it found that it could not be treated in a monolithic fashion, despite the fact that the regulatory scheme implied that it could. It rejected the idea of deference to a regulator where speech of this nature was in question.

351 Muller v Switzerland (1988) 13 EHRR 212; VGT v Switzerland (2002) 34 EHRR 159 and Chapman v UK (2001) 33 EHRR 399 applied.

352 Para H7 4.

353 Bowman v UK (1998) 26 EHRR 1.

354 For discussion and criticism of this decision, see: Geddis, A, 'What Future For Political Advertising on The United Kingdom's Television Screens?' [2002] PL 615. See also Rowbottom, J, 'Freedom of Expression in Election Campaigns' (2002) 152 New Law Journal 679.

When the BBC appealed to the House of Lords[355] the majority in the Lords considered that the Court of Appeal decision amounted to a finding that the taste and decency standards should not be applied to Party Election Broadcasts. However, they found that Parliament had decided that such broadcasts should not be exempt from those standards – despite the importance of free speech at such times – and that decision of Parliament as encapsulated in the Broadcasting Acts 1990 and 1996 (in respect of both the ITC and BSC)[356] had not itself been challenged – although it could have been, under ss 3(1) and 4 HRA. Thus, according to the majority in the Lords, once it was accepted that those standards should be applied to PEBs, the question was whether the broadcasters had applied them wrongly. That did not appear to be the case on the facts, bearing in mind the clear findings of expert broadcasters; and in giving weight to their views the Lords made it clear that a degree of deference should be accorded to the broadcasters on the basis that, due to their audience research, they were likely to be thoroughly in touch with audience expectations.

Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead and Lord Hoffmann, who gave the leading speeches, considered the scope of the application of Art 10 in the context in question. Whereas the Court of Appeal had treated the BBC's findings as censorship, both agreed that Art 10 does not provide an entitlement to make television broadcasts: it provides, they found, a right to expression, but not a right to have access to a particular medium – broadcasting – in order to exercise that right.[357] However, a right to broadcast a PEB had already been provided by the relevant legislation to those who qualified. Therefore, Lord Nicholls found:

> the principle underlying article 10 requires that access to an important public medium of communication should not be refused on discriminatory, arbitrary or unreasonable grounds . . . or . . . granted subject to discriminatory, arbitrary or unreasonable conditions.[358]

Both accepted that a restriction on the content of a PEB had to be justified under Art 10(2). They also accepted that this was a particularly pressing matter in relation to political communication at election time, especially where, as in the instant case, the restriction operated as a prior restraint.[359]

In relation to the question of justification Lord Nicholls considered that two questions appeared, at first glance, to arise. First, he asked whether the content of party broadcasts should be subject to the same restriction on offensive material as other programmes. He said that, clearly, this was the case since the statutory and non-statutory regimes in question demanded that they should be. (In fact, it is suggested that questions could

355 [2004] 1 AC 185; [2003] 2 All ER 977.

356 Section 108 of the 1996 Act relating to the standards Code of the Broadcasting Standards Commission was relevant, but the discussion as to the effect of s 3(1) HRA focused on s 6(1)(a) of the 1990 Act.

357 See para 8 of the judgment. See also the decisions of the European Commission of Human Rights in X and the Association of Z v United Kingdom (1971) 38 CD 86; Haider v Austria 83-A DR 66; Huggett v United Kingdom 82-A DR 98.

358 Para 8 of the judgment.

359 The BSC and ITC operated, as explained above, by way of subsequent restraint only in relation to matters of taste and decency, arising in contexts outside the PEB one, and this continues to be the case under the 2003 Ofcom regime.

be raised about the legal status of the non-statutory BBC regime in relation to the HRA – a matter that all the judges decided not to consider, making the assumption that nothing turned on the distinction between the two regimes. This matter is returned to below.) He found that in considering this question at all, the Court of Appeal had fallen into error:

> The flaw in this broad approach is that it amounts to rewriting, in the context of party broadcasts, the content of the offensive material restriction imposed by Parliament on broadcasters. It means that an avowed challenge to the broadcasters' decisions became a challenge to the appropriateness of imposing the offensive material restriction on party broadcasts . . . this was not an issue in these proceedings.[360]

He said that the Court of Appeal had 'carried out its own balancing exercise between the requirements of freedom of political speech and the protection of the public from being unduly distressed in their own homes', but that the Court had done so illegitimately since Parliament had already decided where the balance should be struck. The second question was whether, on the basis that the restrictions applied, the broadcasters had applied the right standards in the instant case.

So the only pertinent question to consider, in Lord Nicholls' view, was the second one. In viewing the matter in this way, however, he ignored the effect of s 3(1) HRA. The judges themselves are under an obligation to render legislative provisions compatible with the Convention; whether the applicant had challenged the provision itself or not should therefore have been viewed as irrelevant. It is argued that there were in fact three questions to be answered; the second one should have concerned the proper interpretation, in the light of Art 10, of the taste and decency provisions when applied to political communication. It could have been argued that they should have been given a narrow interpretation in that context, under s 3(1) HRA in relation to the demands of Art 10, and then the third question would have been whether the broadcasters had correctly applied those standards once they had been subjected to that more narrow interpretation.

Lord Nicholls assumed impliedly that there was no need to consider the effect of s 3(1) since the Pro-Life Alliance had accepted that the taste and decency regimes were not incompatible with its Art 10 right. Therefore he considered that the Court of Appeal had been wrong to find that the regimes could only rarely and exceptionally be relied upon in censoring a PEB. Lord Hoffmann, however, did examine the question of the interpretation of the statutory (and, by implication, the non-statutory) rules. He considered that the thrust of the applicant's submissions, which the Court of Appeal had been receptive to, was that the statute should be 'disregarded' or taken lightly. However, it must be pointed out that the application of s 3(1) HRA to a statute, narrowing, if necessary, the meaning of a provision in order to achieve compliance with the Convention, does not amount to disregarding it. Lord Hoffmann was the only judge who considered the compatibility of Art 10 with the taste and decency rules; he considered that despite its apparent stance on compatibility in relation to s 4 HRA, this was really the gravemen of the Pro-Life Alliance argument. He agreed with Lord

360 Para 15.

Nicholls in finding that Art 10 does not provide a right of access to the broadcast media, relying on Haider v Austria.[361] In that instance the Commission had found:

> The Commission recalls that article 10 of the Convention cannot be taken to include a general and unfettered right for any private citizen or organisation to have access to broadcasting time on radio or television in order to forward his opinion, save under exceptional circumstances, for instance if one political party is excluded from broadcasting facilities at election time while other parties are given broadcasting time.

Lord Hoffmann found that under Art 10, 'The emphasis, therefore, is on the right not to be denied access on discriminatory grounds,'[362] not on a right to broadcast. He considered whether the Strasbourg jurisprudence would require the taste and decency requirement to be regarded as unreasonable or discriminatory. Pro-Life Alliance was claiming that the requirements did not operate as 'neutral' or non-discriminatory restrictions. They applied, on their face, to all PEBs of any party, but the Pro-Life Alliance wished to express a particular message which, it claimed, had to be presented visually in order to depict the reality of abortion and therefore to arouse people against it. It inevitably breached the rules which therefore, it claimed, bore unfairly upon it alone since it was unable to present its political message in its chosen manner. On this basis it may be noted that the taste and decency rules could be viewed as discriminatory in relation not only to the Alliance PEB, but potentially in relation to any PEB dependent on visual material likely to cause offence.

Lord Hoffmann accepted that the rules had a prima facie discriminatory effect. So the next question was whether they could be objectively justified. In considering this matter, Lord Hoffmann analysed the proportionality of the restrictions in relation to the political value of the Alliance PEB. He noted that the broadcast time allocation for PEBs had been introduced in order to further informed choice in general elections. However, he found that the Pro-Life Alliance message was not related to making such a choice since abortion is not a party political issue in the UK. In his view the message was significant only in relation to the six Welsh constituencies in which the party's candidates were standing since, having seen the broadcast, the electorate in those constituencies could have chosen to vote for those candidates. Therefore the value and significance of the PEB was limited if considered in the context of the purpose behind providing for PEBs in general. That limited value then had to be weighed up, he said, against the right of viewers of broadcasts not to be shocked and offended in the privacy of their homes. It was, he considered, legitimate for Parliament to lay down certain conditions governing PEBs to protect those viewers' rights.

He noted that in VGT Verein gegen Tierfabriken v Switzerland,[363] in which a ban on political advertising was found to be discriminatory, the European Court had made it clear that it was not considering a case in which the objection to an advertisement was that its content was offensive. He also considered the response of the Court to the complaint of the Alliance about the previous rejection of its PEB in the 1997 election. The Registrar of the Court had written to the Alliance, stating: ‘in accordance with the general instructions received from the court’ he drew their attention to ‘certain shortcomings’ in the application. The indication given by the Registrar was that the Court might consider that the taste and decency requirements were not an ‘arbitrary or unreasonable’ interference with the access of the Alliance to television. The Court then rejected the application as inadmissible as not disclosing ‘any appearance of a violation of the rights and freedoms set out in the Convention . . .’. Lord Hoffmann concluded therefore that there ‘is no public interest in exempting PEBs from the taste and decency requirements on the ground that their message requires them to broadcast offensive material.’[364]

361 (1995) 83-A DR 66.
362 At para 61.
363 34 EHRR 159, at para 76, p 177.

Thus Lords Nicholl and Hoffmann came to the same conclusion – that the only significant question was whether the broadcasters had applied the ‘taste and decency’ rules correctly. Having arrived at that finding, with which Lords Millett and Walker agreed, the outcome of the case became virtually inevitable. Once Lord Nicholls had configured the issue as indicated he found that it resolved itself into one question only: ‘should the court, in the exercise of its supervisory role, interfere with the broadcasters’ decisions that the offensive material restriction precluded them from transmitting the programme proposed by Pro-Life Alliance?’ He answered this question by considering the broadcasters’ decision and went on to find that the broadcasters’ application of the statutory criteria was not at fault. He noted that the broadcasters would have accepted that some images of abortion could be included to convey the message, but that the images put forward were too graphic and prolonged. The BBC representative had stated: ‘What is unacceptable in your client’s broadcast is the cumulative effect of several minutes primarily devoted to such images.’ The broadcasters had, Lord Nicholls found, applied an appropriate standard in assessing the question whether transmission of the images in question would be likely to cause offence to viewers. In other words, if the only matter at issue was the application by the broadcasters of the statutory criteria, not the interpretation of those criteria, then it appeared that the broadcasters had taken the correct stance.

Lord Hoffmann arrived at the same conclusion. Having found that Parliament was entitled to impose standards of taste and decency which were ‘meant to be taken seriously’, he went on to consider the application of those standards by the broadcasters. In considering the standards applied he rejected the idea that they could be ‘a matter of intuition on the part of elderly male judges’ and took into account the expertise of the broadcasters and the audience research they had conducted.[365] He also took account of the feelings of women who had had abortions who might have viewed the PEB inadvertently. He found that the broadcasters were well placed to determine whether members of the public would be likely to find the images offensive, and that they had found that the images did not fall at the margin of acceptability, but well below it. He therefore accepted that the broadcasters’ decision should not be interfered with. So the appeal of the BBC was allowed.

364 At para 73.
365 Paras 78–80.

It is argued that the majority judges in the House of Lords failed to apply the Art 10 correctly because the effect of s 3(1) HRA was misunderstood. The striking thing about their ruling was the extraordinarily contorted reasoning; the Lords assumed that Pro-Life was challenging the statute itself – seeking to set it aside. Section 3(1)'s very function is to create compatibility with the Convention rights and, as discussed, this would not have involved damaging the statute, let alone setting it aside.

The outcome would also have been the same had the House of Lords accepted that s 3(1) could be used to narrow down the rules, but come to the conclusion that the Strasbourg jurisprudence did not require that the broadcasters' decision should be declared unlawful. It could have been argued that the effect of s 3(1) HRA would depend on the application of the tests of proportionality and necessity under Art 10(2) in relation to the conditions applied to the Alliance's PEB. (The argument that there is no right to broadcast air-time under Art 10(1) is irrelevant since the Alliance had already qualified for a PEB.) Lord Hoffmann appeared to be of the view that the jurisprudence gave little support to the Alliance's claim, although he did not make it clear that his argument was linked to the potential effect of s 3(1). He made two points in relation to his proportionality argument. The first was that the value of political expression in this instance was limited.[366] This argument has been roundly condemned by two of the academics who have commented on the House of Lords' decision[367] and, although it was argued that the Court of Appeal decision makes more 'appeal to rhetoric than to reason',[368] its findings on the matter were preferred. The applicant's video was a form of political communication and therefore still of particular significance in Art 10 terms. Where Lord Hoffmann fell into error, it is argued, was in his dismissal of the speech in question as of limited value. It remained a form of highly significant political expression, partly due to its very nature, and partly due to the less central election-related values underlying it. Therefore there was a strong case for narrowing down the taste and decency rules where they led to a restriction on such expression. This was the case that the majority in the House of Lords failed to acknowledge,[369] while at the same time Laws LJ in the Court of Appeal arguably over-stated it.

366 Note that this concern was raised in a report published in 2003: Party Political Broadcasting: Report and Recommendations, by the Electoral Commission. It considered that there was a case for deterring organisations from fielding candidates so as to qualify for a PEB for their own publicity purposes rather than for genuine electoral purposes. Lord Hoffmann also noted this concern in Pro-Life Alliance v BBC [2004] 1 AC 185, at para 35.

367 See: Barendt, E, 'Free Speech and Abortion' 2003] PL 580–91 and Hare, I, 'Debating Abortion – the Right to offend Gratuitously' [2003] 62(3) CLJ 525–28. Rowbottom, J, 'Article 10 and Election Broadcasts' [2003] 119 LQR 553–57 favours the House of Lords' approach. MacDonald, A's analysis appears to favour the stance of the House of Lords, but concentrates on the general issue of 'the role, if any, of judicial "deference" in a democratic constitution': R (on the application of Pro-Life Alliance v BBC 6 EHRLR 651–57. Geddis, A, 'If Thy Right Eye Offend Thee, Pluck it Out' [2003] 66 MLR 885–93 strongly favours the House of Lords' approach and attacked that of the Court of Appeal in 'What future for political advertising on the UK's television screens?' [2002] PL 615.

368 Hare, I, ibid at p 527.

369 Lord Hoffmann touched on this point, but did not, it is argued, give enough weight to political speech. He appeared to take the stance that even political speech of the highest value could be restricted or banned in response to the application of taste and decency rules: 'Even assuming that the Alliance broadcast had been an ordinary PEB, relevant to the general election, I do not think it would have been unreasonable to require it to comply with standards of taste and decency' (para 70).

Lord Hoffmann's second point was linked to his first. He found that Strasbourg endorsed his view that the form of political expression in question was of low value, meaning that interferences with it could readily be justified. In coming to this conclusion he relied most strongly on the adverse Strasbourg admissibility decision against the Alliance in respect of their 1997 video.[370] (In strong contrast, the Court of Appeal made little attempt to engage with the relevant jurisprudence, deciding the case largely on the basis of common law free speech principles.) Lord Hoffmann did not take account of the less offensive nature of the 2001 video and, more importantly, ignored the impact of the margin of appreciation doctrine on the jurisprudence, and the fact that under s 2 HRA it is non-binding. The failure to deal with the impact of the margin of appreciation doctrine was most significant. As argued elsewhere in this book, the stance of the UK judiciary in relation to the implications of the effects of this doctrine amounts to one of their most significant failures in confronting the application of the HRA.[371] The line of cases stemming from Handyside[372] is deeply affected by this doctrine, which is not applicable at the national level. Therefore the admissibility decision relied upon by Lord Hoffmann should have been applied – as far as that is possible – after stripping away the effects of the doctrine upon it. Since it was a decision upon admissibility alone, the decision would have been rendered almost an empty one once that process had been undertaken. It may be noted that the Court of Appeal accepted – correctly – that this admissibility decision was non-determinative of the issue before it. Had the Lords taken that stance that would have left the judges with little guidance as to the Strasbourg stance on the matter, except from the Handyside line of authority and from general Strasbourg free speech principles.

Lord Hoffmann noted that VGT Verein gegen Tierfabriken v Switzerland,[373] in which a breach of Art 10 was found in relation to discrimination in allocation of broadcast time, did not deal with an instance in which the objection to an advertisement was that its content was offensive. However, that left the point at issue open. Therefore the general principle from Handyside should have been applied, bearing in mind that Handyside was itself to an extent in point in relation to the instant case. It dealt with speech that could be termed political, if that term is broadly interpreted, including information about abortion, taking impliedly a pro-abortion stance. The book in question in Handyside informed children and teenagers about matters related to sexuality, and its implicit message could be viewed as a liberal one. As discussed above, the Court took a strong stance in favour of offensive speech under Art 10(1) but then applied the tests of necessity and proportionality under Art 10(2) in a manner that was heavily influenced by the margin of appreciation doctrine. If the influence of that doctrine on the decision was to be disapplied at the domestic level, the decision could be taken to endorse a very restricted role for rules aimed at avoidance of offence in relation to semi-political speech. A fortiori the decision would endorse such a role in relation to political speech of higher value – as in the Pro-Life Alliance case.[374]

370 Pro-Life Alliance v United Kingdom (Application No 41869/98) 24 October 2000.
371 See Chapter 4 pp 263–65, 270–72.
372 Eur Ct HR, A 24; (1976) 1 EHRR 737. See pp 465–67.
373 34 EHRR 159, at para 76, p 177.
374 See further on these points Part II, pp 309–10.

Therefore, if the effects on the findings of the margin of appreciation doctrine could have been disapplied, Handyside would arguably favour a stance closer to that of the Court of Appeal than that of the House of Lords, although whether, bearing in mind the view taken by the BBC of the gravity of the offence that would be caused by the video, it could have supported the findings of the Court of Appeal as to the outcome, is debatable. It is concluded that the treatment of the Strasbourg jurisprudence in both the House of Lords and Court of Appeal was flawed: Lord Hoffmann did not take account of the effects of the margin of appreciation doctrine and severely under-stated the value placed by Strasbourg on speech in general and political speech in particular, while the Court of Appeal failed to analyse the implications of the jurisprudence relating to such speech, choosing instead to rely on more familiar common law principles.

The House of Lords' judgment does nothing to mitigate the dangers of content-based regulatory schemes in free speech terms, discussed at the beginning of this chapter. In this instance all the free rationales were engaged in relation to Pro-Life itself as a speaker and in relation to the audience. Lord Hoffmann's key point was that deference should be paid to the expertise of the regulator, as well as to Parliament. Presumably, therefore, even if he had explicitly rejected the effects of the margin of appreciation doctrine on Strasbourg jurisprudence, he would still have been wedded to a domestic doctrine of deference. But it is argued that the notion of deferring to a regulator needs to be unpacked. Regulators have expertise as to matters of fact and can also give expert opinions. In this instance the regulator – the BBC – had expertise as to accepted standards of taste and decency in broadcasting and therefore as to audience expectations. Therefore it was entitled to take the stance that the Pro-Life video infringed those standards and it was reasonable for the Court to defer to those findings. But the regulator did not have expertise in balancing the concerns relating to taste and decency against free speech. That was a normative exercise for the court, basing itself on Strasbourg principles. It is precisely the role of the courts to conduct that balancing exercise under Art 10(2) between the right to freedom of expression and societal concerns. Lord Hoffmann fudged the issue – he elided the issue of deference on the basis of expert findings with the question of balancing those findings against free speech demands. Lord Hoffmann made much also of deference to Parliament, but Parliament had enacted not only s 6(1)(a) of the 1990 Act, but also the HRA and had placed a responsibility on the judges to abide by the Convention rights, under s 6. Lord Hoffmann appeared almost to abrogate his responsibility as a judge to conduct the necessary balancing exercise. His motivation appeared to be a determination to avoid subjecting a regulator's decision to a real, systematic Strasbourg scrutiny.[375]

Leaving aside the Pro-Life Alliance decision, it would have appeared to follow from the Strasbourg free speech principles, and ss 3 and 6 HRA, that the Ofcom regulatory regime upholding offence-avoidance standards might have been found to conflict with the standards maintained by Art 10 in the realm of political speech. However, the decision now appears to render improbable a successful challenge to the current regime governing offence-avoidance.

375 For further criticism of Lord Hoffmann's findings on deference in this instance, see Lord Steyn, 'Deference is a tangled web' (2005) PL 346–59.

The appeal of the BBC in the Pro-Life Alliance case was allowed on the basis that there was no ground for interfering with the decision reached by the BBC as regulator and the broadcasters, taking account of their special expertise. The outcome means that the broadcasters' freedom within that particular statutory framework - which in essence is now encapsulated in s 319 of the 2003 Act – was re-affirmed. The HRA did not operate as a mechanism enabling the courts to wield (or claim) significantly greater powers of interference in broadcasters' decisions as to their responsibilities in respect of maintaining standards of taste and decency – even in respect of political speech. The same stance is now likely to be taken in respect of the current statutory framework if a similar case arises.

If, for example, an independent broadcaster wished to broadcast a documentary which relied on very disturbing, explicit images from a war or disaster zone, but it was clear from Ofcom's Code that so doing would be likely to attract a financial penalty, the broadcaster could, as a last resort, mount a challenge under Art 10 against Ofcom, relying on s 7(1)(a) HRA. The Pro-Life Alliance decision, however, suggests that such a challenge would be unlikely to succeed due to the high level of deference conceded to the expert regulator, and therefore indirectly to Parliament.

Successful challenges to the current regulatory regime?

Nevertheless, successful HRA challenges to the current regime under the 2003 Act are conceivable, despite the Pro-Life decision. A claim could occur in relation to any form of broadcasting affected by the offence-avoidance Ofcom Code rules, but clearly it would be most likely to succeed in the context of political broadcasting. It is nevertheless important to point out that the following remarks could also apply to, for example, films of strong artistic merit if the relevant Art 10 jurisprudence was applied, but the effects of the margin of appreciation doctrine were disapplied,[376] when applied at the domestic level. Thus while the strongest impetus for change could come in the realm of political expression, it is not ruled out in relation to other forms.

A departure from the Pro-Life Alliance decision could come about if a case on a similar factual basis arose but the challenge was to the new statutory framework itself – specifically on s 319 – as requiring re-interpretation under s 3(1) HRA in order to achieve compatibility with the demands of Art 10. The decision in Pro-Life Alliance does not stand in the way of such a reinterpretation since the House of Lords deliberately considered only the application of the statutory provisions and not the provisions themselves.[377] The 2003 Act does not exempt PEBs from the s 319 requirements or the Ofcom Code, which applies to all forms of broadcasting. Thus, post-HRA Parliament did make the deliberate decision to continue to subject PEBs to the offence-avoidance requirements. Courts will inevitably consider that they should pay some deference to that decision, following Pro-Life. Nevertheless, the majority in the House of Lords left open the possibility that a challenge to the equivalent provisions under the previous regime might have succeeded. It may be noted that, as discussed above, the 2003 Act was not 376 As discussed above, a case can be made for arguing that comments of the Strasbourg Court support forms of artistic expression quite strongly. See pp 465–68.

377 If a challenge was mounted to the application of the rules themselves the outcome would probably be the same as in Pro-Life unless the decision to ban an election video was a far more marginal one.

declared compatible with the Convention rights under s 19 HRA.[378] However, it can be assumed that the rest of the Act was viewed by Parliament as compatible with Art 10 and therefore it should be treated in the same way as any other Act of Parliament.[379]

Section 3(1) HRA could be used to impose a different interpretation on s 319, reducing its impact quite dramatically in relation to PEBs or other forms of political broadcasting. As a result, where such forms were concerned, quite a radical modification of ss 1 and 2 of Ofcom's Code could be brought about by interpretation. The demands of offence-avoidance as a standards objective could be minimised in the context of political broadcasting. Such a modification may be possible since, although s 319 does cover PEBs, it is more nuanced and goes into more detail regarding context and audience expectations than s 6(1)(a) of the 1990 Act or s 108 of the 1996 Act did. Such matters were only taken into account previously by the ITC Programme Code and the BSC Standards Code. Section 319(4)(a) – (d) could be viewed as a gateway to allowing the radical re-interpretation suggested. For example, the term 'generally accepted standards' used in s 319(f) in relation to the protection of the public from 'offensive material' could be interpreted to mean that greater leeway should be accorded to PEBs since such standards can be assumed to accord particular weight to the nontramelling of political expression. The comments of the Court of Appeal in Pro-Life as to the greater public tolerance of controversial and explicit images in the context of serious political speech should be borne in mind. There is a case for limited deference to Parliament here since the re-interpretation argued for would not go against the grain of the statute or necessitate reading words into it, and the question of balancing the societal interest in maintaining standards of decency in broadcasting against the demands of free speech is very much one within the Courts' constitutional sphere under the HRA.[380]

Such a re-intepretation of s 319(f), and the resultant effect on ss 1 and 2 of the Code, could also affect other forms of political broadcasting. Such a result would in one sense enhance the freedom of broadcasters since it would widen choice as to what could be shown in documentaries, discussion programmes, etc. In relation to PEBs it would tend to remove some control from their hands in relation to their interpretation of their responsibilities and place it in the hands of the courts. Challenging and explicit images could be shown, if justified by context. A more effective representation of a plurality of views, including the views of minority groups, in broadcasting might occur.[381]

EU-based satellite broadcasting

In the 1990s, the regulatory regime controlling broadcasting was confronted with the dissemination of material by methods which seemed to fall outside its compass since 378 As noted earlier, the lack of a declaration was due to the view taken that s 321(2) (the ban on political advertising) was incompatible with Art 10. This decision was based on the decision of the ECHR in VGT v Switzerland [2001] ECHR 408.

379 Indeed, it is argued that the lack of a statement of compatibility under s 19(1)(b) HRA has no effect on the ability of judges to seek to achieve compatibility under s 3(1) in relation to s 321(2)).

380 See for discussion of the use of s 3, Chapter 4, pp 174–91.

381 As a further resort, there would also be the possibility of issuing a declaration of the incompatibility under s 4 HRA between Art 10 and s 319. Amendment in relation to PEBs might then come about in reliance on the s 10 procedure.

the material originated from outside the UK, but could be accessed from within it. The concern was that obscene or indecent material would be disseminated by non-terrestrial broadcasters outside the jurisdiction of the UK. The difficulties of attempting to regulate material when it is transmitted by these means, since it is outside the regulatory regime for broadcasting, are discussed below. EU-based satellite broadcasting created particular difficulties, in the view of the government, difficulties that, it will be argued, are currently being evaded rather than resolved.

The ITC Code did not apply to broadcasters who were not licence holders of the ITC. Under s 43 of the 1990 Act, a satellite service was required to hold an ITC licence if it was a 'domestic satellite service' or a 'non-domestic satellite service'. A domestic service was defined as one that used direct broadcasting by satellite on one of the five frequencies allocated to the UK at the World Administrative Radio Conference in 1977. A non-domestic satellite service was one which either used a lower powered satellite to transmit programmes from the UK or transmitted from outside the territory of prescribed countries, but a UK supplier dictated the service. 'Non-domestic' satellite services were not subject to the same regime as domestic services in the sense that they had to transmit on allocated frequencies and had public service responsibilities.

If a service is licensed from within an EU member state, it must receive freedom of reception within other member states under the EU Directive on Transfrontier Television, Television without Frontiers (89/552/EEC). In Commission of EC v UK[382] it was found that s 43 of the Broadcasting Act 1990 applied different regimes to domestic and non-domestic satellite services and that in exercising control over certain broadcasters falling under the jurisdiction of other member states, the UK had failed to fulfil its obligations under Arts 2(1), (2) and 3(2) of the Directive. Thus, in 1997, the distinction between domestic and non-domestic services was abolished: only one category was created – satellite television services.[383] Section 89 of the Broadcasting Act 1996 amended s 45 of the 1990 Act to allow for the immediate revocation of the licence of a satellite television service which breached s 6(1)(a) of the 1990 Act. These sections in both statutes were repealed by the Communications Act 2003. Under ss 232–40 of the 2003 Act satellite services are 'television licensable content services'. That term replaces the separate categories of satellite television services and licensable programme services which were established under the Broadcasting Act 1990, as amended.

But satellite services licensed from within another EU member state are not licensable services and are not therefore covered by Ofcom's broadcast Code. Therefore material that might infringe the Code, particularly 'hardcore' pornography, could be received in the UK via EU satellite broadcasting. The solution adopted in the Broadcasting Act 1990 was to allow for the proscription of such material. The government took the view in the 1990s that although such material was available in other EU countries, it should not be available in the UK. It appeared at the time that the use of proscription would not infringe EU law. Directive 89/552 was amended by Directive 97/36 to provide that member states must not restrict retransmissions on their territory of broadcasts from other member states for reasons within the fields co-ordinated by the Directive, but it allowed them to derogate provisionally from the obligation to allow the free movement of broadcasts where a broadcast 'manifestly, seriously and gravely' infringes Art 22 and/or Art 22a. Article 22 allows for restrictions where programmes might 'seriously impair the physical, mental or moral development of minors'. This is not confined to their violent or sexual content, and individual nations have a wide margin of discretion in relation to such matters.

382 Case 222/94 [1996] ECR-I 4025.

383 Satellite Television Service Regulations 1997 SI 1997/1682. Further amendment was made under the Television Broadcasting Regulations 1998 SI 1998/3196.

Proscription orders are made under ss 177 and 178 of the 1990 Act.[384] Proscribing a channel is not, formally speaking, a means of banning it. When a channel is proscribed it becomes an offence for it to advertise in the UK or to supply (or offer to supply) any decoding equipment primarily for the purpose of enabling the reception of the proscribed service within the UK. Proscription therefore does not prevent the channel from broadcasting, but in practical terms it means that UK citizens are unable to access it. Once the television service in question has been drawn to the attention of the Secretary of State he or she can only make an order if satisfied that it is in the public interest and compatible with any international obligations of the UK (s 177(3)). Section 177 was not repealed by the 2003 Act and the ITC's role in this respect has now been taken over by Ofcom. Under s 177 of the 1990 Act; the ITC could draw 'unacceptable' foreign satellite services to the attention of the Secretary of State if satisfied that 'there is repeatedly contained on programmes included in the service matter which offends against good taste and decency or is likely to . . . be offensive to public feeling'. This procedure was thought to be allowed for by Art 2a of the Television without Frontiers Directive. Under s 177 the National Heritage Secretary has issued a number of proscription orders against satellite channels from EU member states which beam 'hard core' pornography into Britain. Channels proscribed have included Eurotic Rendez-vous in 1999 and Eros TV in 1998.[385] But proscription orders have not been issued since 2000, and this is probably due to their doubtful compatibility with EU law.

So far, the question whether proscription orders breach EU law has not been addressed by the European Court of Justice. Article 22 presupposes that there is a reasonable likelihood that minors would be affected, and it is arguable that the likelihood is minimal. Thus it seems possible that a breach would be found, taking account of the wording of Art 2a, since children would be highly unlikely to be exposed to the broadcast of hard core pornography due to recent advances in technology. Channels can be digitally encrypted and scrambled so that non-subscribers are unable to view any signal. It is possible to PIN-protect channels to prevent unauthorised access.[386] Adult supervision of the equipment provides a further level of protection. Where the service is transmitted very late at night and accessible only by using a smart card 384 Note that ss 329–32 of the 2003 Act allow for the use of proscription orders by the Secretary of State at the instigation of Ofcom, but not against satellite broadcasts.

385 See R v Secretary of State for Culture Media and Sport ex p Danish Satellite TV 9.7.99 (CD) in which the Court of Appeal held that the Secretary of State was entitled to proscribe the service Eurotic Rendez-vous; it was found that the order was based on the protection of minors and not on wider grounds. Some of the images shown on the service were so explicit that if shown in the cinematic or video release of a film, an R18 certificate would not have been granted (see below pp 553–54). Eros TV was proscribed under SI 1998 No 1865.

386 The most recent Sky systems have PIN-protection by default on adult channels, as does Telewest; the PIN can be automatically disabled after three failed attempts at access.

– as was the case in respect of Eurotic Rendez-vous – it seems to be improbable that children would be affected. The provisions relating to the protection for children under the Directive are likely in themselves to be amended in 2005 in the light of such technological developments.[387]

At present the evidence that children would be harmed to any significant extent if they were exposed to hardcore material is inconclusive.[388] This was high-lighted by the High Court ruling in 2000 in R v Video Appeals Committee of the BBFC ex p BBFC,[389] discussed below; the BBFC lost their judicial review in relation to the promulgation of hard core material on videos largely because they had not provided cogent evidence of any harm to children caused by such material. That decision led to the relaxation of BBFC Guidelines in relation to videos. Since hard core material is now legally on sale under the 'R18' classification, DVDs and videos from more than 120 licensed sex shops in the UK, the claim by the government that such material would seriously impair the development of children would probably fail in the European Court of Justice. Its availability from UK shops means that the risk that children might view hard core videos cannot be entirely ruled out. It is also hard to sustain the argument that greater protection should be available for children in the UK than in other parts of the EU. The Italian hard core channel Satisfaction TV was recommended for proscription by the ITC in December 2000. However, no proscription order has yet been raised. In itself this is telling since if harm to children was genuinely likely it would not appear to be acceptable to delay the order. It is also notable that the old notion of maintaining 'taste and decency' is applied as the basis for raising proscription orders, while domestic services are subject to the current apparently less stringent offence-avoidance standard, under the 2003 Act, as discussed above. Since the legalisation of hard core material on the BBFC 'R18' video classification in 2000 the government appears to have abandoned proscription of foreign satellite channels. The government presumably has concerns that using an order would breach EU law, in the light of the factors identified.

The possibility that some proscription orders may be incompatible with Art 10 under the HRA should be considered. The protection of children is a significant theme running through the Convention explicit expression cases discussed in this chapter,[390] and restrictions on such expression tend to be readily justified under Art 10(2) at the Strasbourg level. It is theoretically possible for the domestic courts to apply a strict proportionality analysis in this context, which Strasbourg has never done due to the effects of the margin of appreciation doctrine. This is possible since the domestic courts are not bound by that doctrine. However, as discussed above, this need not be the case at the domestic level if the requirements of proportionality are applied absent the effects on them of the margin of appreciation doctrine. It could be argued that the restriction created by a proscription order was disproportionate to the harm to be avoided since the risk to children appeared to be minimal. It would arguably be 387 Commission: Second Evaluation Report on the application of Council Recommendation of 24 Sept 1998 concerning the protection of minors and human dignity. COM (2003) 776 final (12.12.2003).

388 See BBFC News Release 26 Oct 2000, Abused children most at risk from pornography, below, p 565 fn 439.

389 (2000) EMLR 850. See pp 564–65 below.

390 See eg Müller v Switzerland (1991) 13 EHRR 212; Scherer A 287 (1993) Com Rep; for discussion, see above pp 465–66.

acceptable under Art 10 to distinguish between modern satellite subscription services under which viewing is very restricted, and open to air broadcasts where any viewer can access any programme. The rights of others to be protected from offence under Art 10(2) would be only minimally at stake due to the impact of such restrictions.

Conclusions

The discussion above suggests that a number of matters should have been addressed with greater clarity under the 2003 reforms. Over the last 15 years' broadcasting content regulation has moved from a system based on censorship under the IBA, to one based on post-transmission sanctions reflecting standards of taste and decency under the ITC and BSC, to the use of such sanctions to ensure offence avoidance and to protect minors, under Ofcom. The vexed question as to the basic standard to be used in relation to material aimed at adults was left open by the 2003 Act and, as discussed, it is still largely unanswered, despite the promulgation of the new Code. The current controls over broadcasting appear to be aimed more at preserving market rather than creative freedom. Their tendency is to make for cautious rather than explorative and challenging broadcasting.

When the power of the owners of the television companies to influence the nature of broadcasting is compared with that of the media regulators or of the public service broadcasters, a human rights scheme in which the exercise of the powers of the latter, but not the former, can be challenged on free expression grounds looks fundamentally flawed. There is clearly a mismatch between the areas in which the HRA can intervene and the location of the main influences over the medium of most significance in terms of its cultural and opinion-forming impact. But the impact of the HRA on broadcasting is unlikely to be radical. This is in part because the regulatory regime already adheres to free expression principles in a reasonably comprehensive and advanced fashion. Nevertheless, this chapter has described quite significant restraints to avoid causing offence contained in Ofcom's Code and the 2003 Act. Currently broadcast material is subject both to special regulation in terms of a regime based on warnings, and use of the 'watershed', and also to restraint which in effect amounts to a form of censorship since the broadcasters must exercise self-censorship in order to adhere to the offence-avoidance aspects of Ofcom's Code. Despite quite significant liberalisation relative to the old ITC and BSC Codes, the new Code is potentially quite restrictive in certain respects, depending on Ofcom's interpretation of it. Ofcom retains significant leeway in adopting a range of free expression standards.

This regime is not applied to any other medium and since, as discussed below, the BBFC appears to be operating a regime in respect of films and videos that has recently become much more liberal, the differences between the regimes for films and for broadcasting are becoming more marked. As technology advances, the range of channels widens and a wider range of information about programmes becomes more readily available to viewing audiences, these differences are arguably becoming less defensible. Although it might appear that Art 10 under the HRA could play a part in bringing about a greater liberalisation of the current offence-avoidance decency regime, it is probable, for the reasons discussed above, that its effect will continue to be marginal, especially after the Pro-Life decision. Regulation of UK broadcasting is in effect insulated from free speech principles applied by means of the HRA due to the excessive deference to the regulators enjoined upon the courts by Pro-Life.

6 The internet, films and videos

Introduction[391]

This section considers the regulation of the internet, films and videos.[392] The regimes in place at present for each of these media differ from each other quite considerably. But they also contrast strongly with the regime in respect of books, newspapers, magazines and other printed matter. Broadcasting, films and videos are subject to regulatory schemes, which (as discussed) are wholly statute-based in the case of broadcasting and videos, and partly statute-based in respect of films. At present, there is no state regulation of the internet, apart from the application of the ordinary law. The new regulatory regime put in place for broadcasting in 2003 does not cover use of the internet.

The statutory regimes currently in place include elements of licensing, regulation by administrative bodies and censorship. The reasons behind treating broadcasting and films differently from the print media differ in a number of respects, but have a common historical basis. The stricter system of controls seems to have been adopted in answer to the view that owing to their particular impact on audiences, films, videos and broadcasting require a system of prior restraints, whereas it is now accepted that books and other printed material do not. These media are viewed as beneficial to the public in a number of respects, but are also seen as possible sources of harm. Owing to the availability of censorship, it is very unlikely that a film or broadcast could attract liability under the Obscene Publications Act;[393] nevertheless, it provides a further possibility of restraint and can also be used as a guide as to the standards censorship will observe. Thus, the regulatory regimes in place mean that the visual media are censored beyond what the law demands. The impact of the HRA in these areas is variable and its effects are complicated by the fact that a number of the media bodies involved are private bodies, while the administrative 'watchdog' bodies are public authorities.

Regulation of films, videos and the internet differs sharply from the 'command and control' model of regulation provided by the Ofcom system. Regulation of films for cinematic release has some features in common with the self-regulation of the internet since it was originally entered into voluntarily by the film-makers themselves. However, the regulation of films is far less fragmentary and has achieved far greater recognition than the system for the internet. In relation to videoworks, the film regulatory scheme does bear quite a strong resemblance to the Ofcom one. Generally, film regulation does not have a full statutory under-pinning, but is strongly associated with a number of statutes. As discussed below, a range of bodies set up by Internet Service Providers, such as the Internet Watch Foundation, provide a self-censoring service for the internet. None of these bodies has a statutory underpinning or have so far received any statutory recognition. Nor can they be viewed as affecting the internet in a comprehensive fashion since, unlike the system for films, they do not apply controls at source but are consumer-driven. In other words, they rely on a voluntary engagement with their services by the public or by institutions, whereas films and videos are affected by regulation prior to release. The remit of the Advertising Standards Authority now not only covers broadcasting, but runs across all these different media; it is most significant in relation to the internet, so it will be discussed in the different contexts, below.

391 Texts referred to below: Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 2nd edn, 2005, Chapters 10, 12 and 13; Robertson, G and Nichol, D, Media Law, 1999, Chapter 14; Bailey, Harris and Jones Civil Liberties and Human Rights Cases and Materials, 5th edn, 2002, Chapter 6 at pp 650–67; Carey, P and Sanders, J, Media Law. 3rd edn, 2004, Chapters 5 and 9 (basic guide); Gibbons, T, Regulating the Media, 2nd edn, 1998; Akdeniz, Y, Walker, C and Wall, D, (eds), The Internet, Law and Society, 2000, Longman; for background, see Hunnings, N, Film Censors and the Law, 1967, Allen and Unwin.

392 For a comprehensive treatment, see Gibbons, Regulating the Media, 1998.

393 The Obscene Publications Act, s 1 covers these media under s 1(2) since the Broadcasting Act 1990, s 162, has brought radio and television within its ambit.

The British Board of Film Classification

Classification and censorship of films and videoworks is undertaken by the British Board of Film Classification (BBFC), a self-censoring body set up by the film industry itself in 1912. It is an independent, non-governmental body which is funded by the fees it charges to those who submit films, videos, DVDs for classification. The video release of films has a firmer statutory under-pinning deriving from the Video Recordings Act 1984, and so the regulation of videos has a greater resemblance in that respect to the system for broadcasting.

The BBFC provides an interesting example of a body that does not possess statutory powers, in relation to the cinematic release of films, and yet whose decisions as to film classification are adhered to as though they had statutory force. It was originally set up in response to the Cinematograph Act 1909 (now Cinemas Act 1985), which allowed local authorities to grant licences in respect of the films to be shown in their particular area; the idea was that the film industry would achieve a uniformity of decision-making by local councils by providing authoritative guidance to them. So when the BBFC classifies films it does so, formally speaking, on behalf of the local authorities who license cinemas under the Cinemas Act 1985. The idea behind this system, from the point of view of the film-makers and distributors, was that they would have a guide as to whether a film would be shown and as to where to make cuts in order to achieve a wider audience.

Statutory powers to control what is shown at cinemas still remain with local councils who may over-rule any of the Board's decisions. Thus, films – not videos – can be classified on two levels: first, the BBFC may insist on cuts before issuing a certificate allowing the film to be screened or may refuse to issue a certificate at all. Second, the local authority may on occasion decide to depart from the BBFC classification or may refuse to allow a film to be shown despite the fact that it has received an '18' classification. Clearly, this is an anomalous system since it means that films are the only medium subject to censorship on a local level. But although the BBFC originates from an arbitrary and now out-dated system, it performs a function that would otherwise be performed by a regulator such as Ofcom with statutory powers. The BBFC is not a creation of statute although, as discussed below, it does have statutory powers in relation to videos. Arguably, a regulator that has worked closely with the industry for a substantial period of time and which is not a governmental creation, or subject to government appointments, may be able to take a more effective, sensitive and nuanced stance in relation to classification and censorship than a government body, a point that is returned to below. The matter of self-censorship by film companies prior to submission to the BBFC must not be disregarded, but over the last 10 years the BBFC has adopted an increasingly liberal attitude to censorship: in 1995 27 films were censored; in 2005 the figure was four.[394] However, at present, as the BBFC itself accepts, films and videos are still more likely to be subject to censorship in the UK. The reasons for this and the current pressure for change form a central focus of the discussion below. Below, the general classification and censorship system operated by the BBFC is considered, before turning to the differences between the way films are treated for cinematic release and for release on video-works.

The classification and censorship system

In relation to the theatrical release of films the BBFC operates within a broad statutory framework, but unlike Ofcom its decisions on classification are not driven by that statutory basis. This is also broadly true in relation to videoworks, although the statutory basis in question is more prescriptive. The BBFC classifies and censors films and videos against the background of the relevant criminal law,[395] including the Obscene Publications Act 1959. Section 4(1)(a) Video Recordings Act 1984, as amended,[396] requires the BBFC to apply an additional test with regard to the classification of videos, that of suitability for viewing in the home. This requirement reflects the fact that, in the BBFC's words, > unlike cinema films where age restrictions may be 'policed' by box office staff, videos in the home are more likely to be viewed by younger age groups and could be replayed many times with individual scenes taken out of context and repeated in slow motion or even frame by frame.[397]

In relation to videos there is a right of appeal from the decisions of the BBFC to the Video Appeals Committee (VAC). No such right exists in relation to films.

The BBFC makes its decisions on the basis of published Guidelines.[398] As it acknowledges, the application of the Guidelines goes further in terms of creating restraints than the relevant law itself does. It states in the Guidelines that it is complying with the requirements of the European Convention on Human Rights to make the classification criteria clear. It considers that it has fulfilled this duty by the publication of the Guidelines and their availability on the BBFC website or directly from the Board. However, the mere fact that the Guidelines can be readily accessed clearly does not mean 394 Source – the Guardian 13.9.05. The figure of four in 2005 is based on decisions from Jan–Sept 05. However, the figure is unlikely to rise significantly: only five films were censored in 2004.

395 The relevant criminal law is discussed above. Note also that the Cinematograph Films (Animals) Act 1937 makes it illegal to show any scene if animals were treated cruelly in the making of that scene.

396 Discussed below at p 562.

397 See the 2000 BBFC Response to the Home Office Consultation Paper on the Regulation of R18 Videos at para 2.1.

398 Available from the BBFC website: http://www.bbfc.co.uk.

that the criteria are sufficiently clear, and it is arguable that in a number of respects sufficient clarity has not been achieved. This is an especially significant matter since the BBFC is the only UK media regulator which operates by means of prior restraint: it can order cuts in films before they can be seen by the public. Adherence to the Guidelines is intended to mean – and so far has meant – that the producers or distributors of a film are very unlikely to be prosecuted under the Obscene Publications Act 1959 (OPA) or other provisions imposing criminal liability in respect of explicit expression. Thus, as is the case in relation to broadcasting, it is probable that films do not fully explore the boundaries of the criminal law, but stop instead somewhere short of them.

Age restrictions

Films and videos are classified by age, creating a number of categories that restrict viewing. The age restrictions are more significant, for obvious reasons, in relation to films as opposed to videos. Clearly, children and teenagers under 15 or 18 may well be able to view videos privately that have the higher age rating; they are able to do so much more readily than in the cinema. This is a matter that the BBFC takes into account in its classification. There are seven classification categories. 'U' and 'Uc' films are open to anybody as, in effect, are 'PG' (parental guidance) classified films; these categories are advisory only. After that are '12'/'12A', '15' and '18' certificate films; '12A' is a new, recently introduced, category, which allows children under 12 to see '12'-rated films at their parents' discretion; it requires such children to be accompanied into the cinema by an adult. Children over 12 will be able to see the film unaccompanied, as previously. Thus the '12A' rating recognises that parents have a better understanding of the particular sensitivities of their individual children than a regulator can have. The introduction of the '12A' rating is a step in the direction of recognising the applicability of the free speech autonomy rationale to children as well as to adults.

The advice at the '18' rating is obviously crucial since it represents the outer limits of acceptability for mainstream films and sets the boundaries for most adult viewing. The '18' rating does not fully perform that function in relation to videos since the BBFC takes into account the possibility that people under 18 may see the film, although that is far from meaning that only material suitable for, say, 15-year-olds is promulgated. The majority of classifications issued by the BBFC are not 18; at the '18' classification cuts are usually minor. 'R [restricted viewing] 18' films are intended for viewing only on segregated premises. The 'R18' classification certificate was introduced by the BBFC following the introduction of the 1982 Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act which required the licensing of all cinema exhibitions operated for private gain, including those clubs which showed films containing more explicit sexual depictions than would be acceptable in the public adult – '18' – category. This classification is also used in the context of classifying sexually explicit videoworks following the implementation of the Video Recordings Act 1984. There are strict controls on the sale of videoworks which are given an 'R18' classification. Under s 12 of the 1984 Act, such videos can only be sold in a licensed sex shop to adults aged 18 and over. They cannot be legally sold by mail order, supplied through ordinary video outlets or shown on television. Their supply other than in a licensed sex shop is a criminal offence.[399]

399 The offence is subject to a fine of up to £5,000, 6 months' imprisonment, or both.

The issue of an ‘R18’ certificate means that the BBFC considers that the film or video would survive an OPA prosecution; it will refuse a certificate if a film is thought to be obscene within the meaning of the Act. Thus BBFC decisions as to the borderline between what can be shown in an ‘R18’ film and what would fall foul of the OPA are probably the best guide to the meaning and application of the problematic term ‘obscenity’ available in the UK. The BBFC may of course err on the side of caution: it may not wish to patrol very closely to that borderline, and the very uncertainty of the term ‘obscenity’ is likely to engender caution.

R v Video Appeals Committee of the BBFC ex p BBFC,[400] discussed further below, marked a very significant change in the use of the ‘R18’ certificate for videos. The decision resulted in the promulgation of new, more relaxed Guidelines for ‘R18’ videos by the BBFC. The BBFC nevertheless takes the view that despite this relaxation the UK ‘still probably has the strictest Guidelines of any European or Western nation’.[401] As film-makers outside the pornography industry obviously do not want to receive an ‘R18’ rating for their work, the vast majority of films aimed at adults must respect the BBFC Guidelines in order to secure the UK adult market, as far as the UK cinema release of films is concerned. The BBFC states that it ‘respects the right of adults to chose their own entertainment, within the law. It will therefore expect to intervene only rarely in relation to ‘18’-rated cinema films’ (emphasis added).[402]

In coming to its decision, the BBFC will take the ‘public good’ defence under s 4(1A) of the 1959 Act, as amended, into account.[403] This defence is the more restricted defence under s 3 of the Theatres Act 1968; s 4(1A) provides that a film or soundtrack can be justified as being for the public good ‘on the ground that it is in the interests of drama, opera, ballet or any other art or of literature or learning’. Therefore, the BBFC may grant a certificate on the grounds of artistic merit to a film which contains some obscene matter.

The ‘12A’ to ‘R18’ classifications are mandatory, not recommendatory. In most of Europe and in the US the age classifications are intended to provide guidance to parents and to children, but children under the age in question can enter the cinema and view films in the ‘older’ category. For example, in the US the ‘PG13’ rating is roughly the equivalent of the ‘12A’ rating in the UK; younger children in the US can view ‘PG13’-rated films, but in the UK they can only view an equivalent rated film if accompanied by an adult. Thus in this respect the autonomy of children and teenagers is more fully acknowledged than it is in the UK. This restriction is not – in effect – applicable to videos and, as discussed further below, influences the BBFC in relation to determining the classification of videos and in deciding on cuts.

Most film distributors have no interest in achieving only a restricted publication for a film and are therefore prepared to make cuts to achieve a wider circulation. This 400 (2000) EMLR 850. The appeal to the VAC was brought by Sheptonhurst Ltd and Prime Time Promotions (Shifnal) Ltd and involved seven titles: Horny Catbabe, Nympho Nurse Nancy, TV Sex, Office Tart, Carnival International Version (Trailer), Wet Nurses 2 Continental Version and Miss Nude International Continental Version.

401 See the 2000 BBFC Response to the Home Office Consultation Paper on the Regulation of R18 Videos 28.7.00.

402 BBFC Guidelines, ‘18’ ratings.

403 See above pp 472–74.

is especially the case in relation to the '18' and 'R18' certificates. But profitability is also highly significant and determinative of pre-censorship: the system of control may be driven largely by commercial motives: studios may make relatively stringent cuts in order to ensure that, for example, a film receives a 'PG' or '15' certificate and so reaches a wider audience. The BBFC normally avoids having to impose cuts because film directors effectively pre-censor films in order to fall within a particular classification.

Explicit depictions of sex and violence in films and videoworks

The BBFC states in its Guidelines that the acceptability of a particular theme at levels of classification is determined by 'the context and sensitivity of its presentation'. The Guidelines state that the very problematic themes such as drug abuse or paedophilia are almost bound to be unacceptable below the '15' level of classification. Therefore it is accepted that in principle any theme could be viewed as acceptable if properly handled at '18' or even at '15'. But this must now be read subject to new restrictions, discussed below, on the depiction of teenage sexuality created by the inception of the Sexual Offences Act 2003. The Guidelines state that the portrayal of human sexual activity is not permitted at 'U', 'Uc' or 'PG'; it may be implied in '12'-rated video works and in '12A' cinema works. Thereafter, 'progressively more graphic portrayal' may be included at the '15' and '18' classifications,[404] but the extent of the portrayal is context-dependent, and the emphasis given to 'responsible, loving and developing' relationships will be relevant. In taking this stance the BBFC lays itself open to the charge that it is engaging in ideological censorship – in other words, only an authorised view of sexuality is acceptable. Again, the effect of the 2003 Act is to create a further age-based constraint even within the depiction of such relationships. Certain forms of simulated consenting heterosexual or homosexual sexual behaviour can no longer be shown involving 16- or 17-year-old actors, or older actors portraying younger people. The 'R18' category is primarily reserved for explicit videos of consenting sex between adults. In contrast, nudity, providing there is 'no sexual context or sub-text', is stated to be acceptable at all classification levels. Films rarely depict actual as opposed to simulated, sexual acts, including intercourse. The film 9 Songs, however, achieved an '18'-rating in 2004 for the cinematic release despite frequent and graphic portrayals of non-simulated sexual intercourse. Previously, Ai No Corrida was classified '18' in 1991, as were Romance (1999) and Intimacy (2001) – all three films contain images of non-simulated intercourse. No '18'-rated film has yet depicted actual homosexual intercourse (the term is used here to include oral sex as well as anal intercourse).

404 At '12A'/'12': 'sexual activity may be implied. Sexual references may reflect the familiarity of most adolescents today with sex education through school'. At '15': 'sexual activity and nudity may be portrayed but without strong detail. The depiction of casual sex should be handled responsibly.' At '18': the Board may cut or reject the 'more explicit images' of sexual conduct unless, exceptionally, they are justified by context. The following are not acceptable, even at 'R18': 'any material which is in breach of the criminal law; material (including dialogue) likely to encourage an interest in abusive sexual activity (e.g., paedophilia, incest) which may include depictions involving adults role-playing as non-adults; the portrayal of any sexual activity, whether real or simulated, which involves lack of consent; the infliction of pain or physical harm, real or (in a sexual context) simulated. Some allowance may be made for mild consensual activity. Any sexual threats or humiliation which do not form part of a clearly consenting role-playing game are disallowed, as are the use of any form of physical restraint which prevents participants from withdrawing consent, for example, ball gags, penetration by any object likely to cause actual harm or associated with violence, activity which is degrading or dehumanising (examples include the portrayal of bestiality, necrophilia, defecation, urolagnia)'.

Significantly, the Guidelines state that the standards set for legal heterosexual and homosexual behaviour are equal (emphasis added). The use of the term 'legal' is important: in the past there has been legal differentiation between homosexual and heterosexual behaviour. For example, the age of consent for heterosexual intercourse is 16, whereas until 1994 it was 21 for homosexual intercourse; until quite recently it was 18.[405] However, under recent legislative changes the two forms of behaviour are now equal under the law. Under the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 2000, s 1, the age of consent was equalised at 16. When the Sexual Offences Act 2003 came into force,[406] a range of forms of heterosexual and homosexual sexual behaviour were placed on an equal footing. These changes could potentially have some impact on depictions of homosexual behaviour on film, and some liberalisation in terms of what can be shown may occur, due indirectly to changes in the criminal law.

The 2003 Act also made a very important change in this context, which has further implications for the distribution of films and videos made prior to 2003. The change concerns the definition of a 'child' under the terms of the Protection of Children Act 1978 (PCA), discussed above in relation to offences of indecency.[407] Previously the PCA s 7(6) defined a 'child' as a person under 16 years of age and made illegal the manufacture, possession and distribution of indecent photographs of children under 16. Section 45(2) of the new Sexual Offences Act amended the PCA by raising the age of a 'child' for the purposes of this Act to 18. The effect of this is retrospective, applying to all such images, regardless of when they first came into circulation. The Act in effect bans from the screen all depictions of sexual activity involving someone under 18 that could fall within the term 'indecent'. It is uncertain whether older actors whose features have been digitally manipulated to make them appear to be under 18 could be used since this might amount to the use of a 'psuedo-image' of a child.[408] Section 51 of the 2003 Act introduced a new offence of 'facilitating' child pornography. The new restraints are mainly aimed at internet pornography, but place film-makers exploring depictions of teenage sexuality in a very difficult position, and mean that 16- and 17-year-olds are constrained in relation to viewing people of the same age involved in sexual activity.

Sexual intercourse between over-16s is legal, and other forms of sexual activity short of intercourse were legal even before the age of consent was raised to 16, but although the acts themselves are legal, depictions of them may not be. It is anomalous, 405 Under the Sexual Offences Act 1967, s 1, the age of consent was 21; this was amended by the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 s143 to 18. Until recently, when the Sexual Offences Act 2003 came into force, there were a number of legal differentiations between illegal heterosexual and homosexual acts/behaviour, apart from that stemming from the age of consent; the more restrictive laws applied to homosexual behaviour.

406 On 1 May 2004.

407 See pp 477–79.

408 Section 84 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 amended the 1978 Act to add 'pseudo-photographs' of children in order to cover digitally created photographs. This would of course depend on whether in the context the image would be seen as 'indecent'.

to say the least, that heterosexual or homosexual intercourse between 16-year-olds or with adults, is lawful, whereas depictions of forms of sexual activity involving 16- or 17-year-old actors, falling far short of intercourse, might not be. Clearly, depictions of some forms of sexual activity involving 16- and 17-year-old actors would not attract criminal liability, but the 2003 Act has created a number of grey areas in relation to such depictions which did not previously exist. The BBFC may find itself seeking to classify films that could fall foul of the PCA 1978.

Clearly, the key question is whether the depiction of the 'child' could be viewed as 'indecent'. Whether a photograph is indecent depends on the view of the jury regarding recognised standards of propriety.[409] In Oliver, Hartrey and Baldwin[410] the Court of Appeal found that pornographic images were to be categorised by the following levels of seriousness: (1) images depicting erotic posing with no sexual activity; (2) sexual activity between children, or solo masturbation by a child; (3) non-penetrative sexual activity between adults and children; (4) penetrative sexual activity between children and adults, and (5) sadism or bestiality. Thus level (1), covering a very wide range of images,[411] represents the 'lowest' level at which an image of a child could be termed 'indecent'. A number of films have depicted teenage actors, most frequently those aged between 16 and 18, in the situations described in (1)–(3).[412] The definition of indecency is obviously context-dependent. Where Gillick-competent child or teenage actors above the age of 13 engage in depictions of fairly restrained, non-nude, consensual heterosexual activity with each other it may perhaps be assumed that this would not violate recognised standards of propriety. Clearly, the older the teenager, the more this would be the case. The fact that a teenage actor of 17 had been made up or (perhaps) digitally altered to look, say, 13 would also be taken into account in relation to a determination as to indecency. But the uncertainty of the definition of indecency hardly favours erotic creativity, and places film-makers and the BBFC in a difficult position. The Court of Appeal may have to revisit and clarify its definition of indecency under the PCA due to the effect of the 2003 Act. The retrospective effect of the current definition of a 'child' is also highly problematic since certain cinematic depictions of sexuality, using 16- or 17-year-old actors, would not have fallen foul of the constraints

409 R v Graham-Kerr (1988) 88 Cr App R 302. See further: Manchester, C, 'Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994: obscenity, pornography and videos' [1995] Crim LR 123, pp 123–28; Cram, I, 'Criminalising Child Pornography – a Canadian Study' [2002] 66 J Crim L 359.

410 [2003] Cr App R 28.

411 As discussed above (p 478), recent developments involving art galleries showing pictures of naked children have illustrated the breadth of the definition of indecency in this context. See further Warbrick, 'Federalism and free speech', in Loveland, I (ed), Importing the First Amendment, 1997, pp 177–79 and 190–92.

412 A number of examples could be given; in The Ice Storm a sequence depicted actors Elijah Wood and Christina Ricci 'dry-humping'; another scene depicted Christina Ricci and Adam Hann-Byrd half-naked and kissing in bed together. All three actors were very young teenagers at the time. Both scenes appear to fall within level (2) from Oliver, Hartrey and Baldwin. In The Name of the Rose Christian Slater, who was 17 at the time and depicting a teenager, had simulated sex with an adult woman. The film Kids depicted a number of teenagers engaging in sexual activity. In Trainspotting Kelly McDonald, 17 at the time, engaged in simulated intercourse with an adult male actor, Ewan McGregor. The key question, of course, would be whether such scenes in the context of acting, and taking account of the fact that the actors were teenagers and Gillick-competent, would violate accepted standards of propriety and so be viewed as 'indecent'.

of the 1978 Act at the time.[413] In 2007 the film Hounddog was released in America and caused some controversy since it concerned the rape of a 12-year-old girl, played by an actress of that age, Dakota Fanning. The actress did not have to participate in the scene in a physical fashion since the rape sequence was created by a mélange of shots of her face or hand when alone in a studio – so it was suggested, not simulated. On its face, the scene would appear to fall well within the Oliver boundaries of indecency – at level 4. But presumably the context would mean that the images would not violate accepted standards of propriety.

Theoretically, homosexual acts (including simulated or actual intercourse) between 16- or 17-year-old actors or between such actors and an adult could be shown on screen. But if viewed as indecent such acts cannot be seen on screen regardless of the equalisation of the age of consent. This is now also true of heterosexual acts, and in this sense the effect of the 2003 Act was to 'level down' in terms of equalising cinematic depictions of sexuality involving teenagers or apparent (digitally manipulated images of adults or CGI) teenagers. But it is probable that homosexual acts might be more likely to be seen as indecent, and in this sense BBFC decisions might – in effect – indirectly discriminate against depictions of homosexuality. This point is pursued below in relation to the HRA.

This might also be true even outside the purview of the 1978 Act, where other criminal law provisions are or might be applicable, including the anomalous common law doctrine of outraging public decency.[414] Such other provisions create differentiation in the legal position, thereby creating difficulties affecting depictions of homosexual behaviour short of intercourse, and simulated sexual acts, even between actors on screen, since such acts might be more likely to be viewed as indecent. Therefore depictions of homosexual behaviour on films have been, and still are, subject to greater restriction.

The classification system also addresses the degree and nature of violence depicted in films,[415] while accepting that violence is an inevitable aspect of entertainment at all 413 The change might not be compatible with the demands of Art 7(1) in HRA, Sched 1. Article 7 provides: '(1) No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence under national or international law at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the criminal offence was committed. (2) This Article shall not prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for any act or omission which, at the time when it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations. Article 7 was found to have been breached in Welch v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 247. Before the trial of the applicant for drug offences, a new provision came into force under the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986, making provision for confiscation orders. This was imposed on the applicant, although the legislation was not in force at the time when he committed the offences in question. It clearly had retrospective effect and was found to constitute a 'penalty' within Art 7(1). The 2003 Act was not declared compatible with the Convention under HRA, s 19(1)(a), but only in respect of ss 319 and 321 (the ban on political advertising), so the government legal advice must have been to the effect that Art 7 had been complied with, probably on the basis that the exception under Art 7(2) applied. In any event compatibility remains a matter for the judiciary to determine.

414 See pp 481–84 above.

415 At '12A'/'12': 'Violence must not dwell on detail. There should be no emphasis on injuries or blood. Sexual violence may only be implied or briefly indicated and without physical detail.' At '15': 'Violence may be strong but may not dwell on the infliction of pain, and of injuries. Scenes of sexual violence ages, 'an element in many serious representations of the human condition'. But the Guidelines advise against the portrayal of violence as 'a normal solution to problems' and against callousness to victims or the encouragement of aggression. The Guidelines state that works which 'glorify or glamorise violence' will receive a more restrictive classification and may be cut. Sexual violence is of particular concern. The BBFC states that it has a strict policy on rape and sexual violence. Cuts may be made in material that associates sex with non-consensual restraint, pain or humiliation. If a portrayal eroticises or endorses sexual assault, the Board is likely to require cuts at any classification level. Cuts are more likely in video rather than film portrayals due to the possibility of repeat viewing of video scenes. The Guidelines indicate that portrayals of the use of weapons easily accessible to young people will be restricted, and imitable combat techniques may be cut, as may imitable detail of criminal techniques. Works that promote or encourage or glamorise the use of illegal drugs will not in general receive even an '18' classification. Clear instructive detail as to drug use is only acceptable at the '18' classification 'if there are exceptional considerations of context'.

The Guidelines highlight the use of expletives in films, a matter that is more problematic in relation to UK film audiences than it is in the rest of Europe. The BBFC finds that the degree of offence caused by the use of expletives varies according to age, background and beliefs; ethnicity may also be relevant. The context will also be significant. In the light of these variables it offers only general guidance rather than providing a comprehensive listing of unacceptable words. Specific terms are advised against at different classification levels only where there is a reasonable consensus of opinion.[416]

The 1984 Act does not make reference specifically to avoiding offence to religious sensibilities. In general videos are more restricted than films in respect of the depiction of sex and violence, but this does not appear to be the case in relation to filmic portrayals of religion. Under the BBFC Guidelines for both films and videos:

> The acceptability of a theme depends significantly on its treatment, i.e. the context and sensitivity of its presentation. However, the most problematic themes (for example . . . incitement to racial hatred) are unlikely to be appropriate at the most junior levels of classification. Correspondingly, there is no reason in principle why most themes, however difficult, could not be satisfactorily handled at "18" or even "15".

The BBFC will have to up-date its Guidelines in 2007 to add the words 'or religious' to them after the word 'incitement' in the light of the introduction of the new offence of inciting to religious hatred, discussed above. The Guidelines also state: 'Many people are offended, some of them deeply, by bad language, including the use of expletives with a religious or racial association.' Thus, the BBFC makes very little specific provision must be discreet and brief.' There should be no 'detailed portrayal of violent or dangerous acts which is likely to promote the activity'.

416 The Guidelines state, at '12'/'12A': 'The use of strong language (eg 'fuck') should be rare'. At '15': 'there may be frequent use of strong language; the strongest terms (eg 'cunt') are only rarely acceptable. Continued aggressive use of strong language and sexual abuse is unacceptable.' At '18' there are no constraints on language.

in relation to the portrayal of religion. However, it does state that it takes account of the criminal law, which includes the laws relating to blasphemy and religious hatred.

The theatrical release of films

This section looks at the different considerations that apply to the theatrical, as opposed to the video, release of films. The BBFC Guidelines discussed are applied somewhat differently to films in relation to the cinematic and the video release. Since cinema films are viewed by an adult, willing audience who has access to information about the nature of the film, it might have been expected that '18'-rated films would fall just outside the boundaries of criminal liability as determined by the Obscene Publications Act, as amended, and common law offences. There is a greater risk in relation to videos that children might view adult films. The difficulty with the availability of the 'R18' classification in relation to the cinematic release is that it may mean that the BBFC are not exploring the boundaries of the legal definition of obscenity in adult films in general, those that receive the '18' classification. The 'R18'-classification may, in effect, drive a wedge between such films and the outer limits of acceptability under the criminal law.

Consideration of recent decisions by the BBFC suggests that there is some basis for these concerns. However, at the 'PG' to '15' levels the BBFC has shown a willingness in some instances to place films within a non-restrictive category, even where they fall at the outer limits of that category. For example, the BBFC took a creative approach in 2001 to the classification of The Lord of the Rings – the Fellowship of the Ring. The Board found that the battle violence and fantasy horror in the film were a matter for concern since children under the age of eight might be frightened or disturbed. However, it decided to give the film a 'PG' rating, on the basis that the film's distributor had agreed that all advertising and publicity for the film would carry the consumer advice that the film contained scenes which might not be suitable for children under eight years of age. Most films do not carry such advice, over and beyond the classification rating; the only other films to carry consumer advice on all publicity and advertising were Jurassic Park and The Lost World – Jurassic Park, both of which were rated 'PG'.[417] The BBFC was presented with greater difficulties in relation to the film Spiderman. It was aimed at a young audience by the film-makers, and Hollywood had marketed it with that audience in mind. But the BBFC considered it 'possibly the most violent film . . . aimed at a young audience that the BBFC has classified.' Therefore the Board considered that it was clearly unsuitable for a 'PG' rating since very young children would then be able to view the film. Classifying it as '12', the BBFC found that the film '[carries] . . . a clear message that the use of violence is the normal and appropriate response when challenged'.[418] The '12A' rating was not available at the time.

At the '18' level the BBFC has to deal with the even more problematic issue of censorship of material aimed at adults, as opposed to the issues raised by restrictive age classifications. In 2002 the BBFC decided to classify the French film Irreversible as '18' uncut for the cinema release. The film centres around a graphically depicted rape and its consequences. The Board found, in line with its current classification guidelines and having taken advice from a clinical forensic psychiatrist, that the depiction of the rape did not eroticise or appear to endorse sexual violence. The Board considered that the rape scene was a harrowing and vivid portrayal of the brutality of rape which was not designed to titillate.[419] In contrast, in the same year the BBFC passed the French language cinema film, The Pornographer, as '18' but required a cut to a graphic unsimulated sex scene in which a woman was seen with semen on her face following oral sex.[420] This cut was in line with the BBFC's Guidelines at '18' which state that the Board may cut or reject 'the more explicit images of sexual activity – unless they can be exceptionally justified by context'. The Board did not find that the context justified the scene. As mentioned above, the film 9 Songs obtained an '18' rating in 2004 for the cinematic release, although it depicted actual as opposed to simulated sexual intercourse. The Board decided that the film's sensitive exploration of the relationship between the two people provided sufficient contextual justification. The consumer advice provided a warning of the content.

417 See BBFC press release, 22 November 2001.
418 See BBFC press release, 13 June 2002.

The emphasis on context as providing a justification for portrayals of sexual activity or violence is questionable since it depends on value judgments made by the Board members as to 'acceptable' contexts. Films are a very significant medium for the exploration of controversial themes and such themes may depend on the use of images from outside the boundaries of those contexts. There is a case for arguing that the 'R18' classification should be abolished for the theatrical release of films and that mainstream films should therefore be able to explore the boundaries created by the criminal law more vigorously and closely. If a film viewed only by adults is to be cut, the starting-point should be the demands of the criminal law. Clear justification based on the avoidance of specific harms, as opposed merely to offence-avoidance, should be available for cuts made reaching beyond those demands. The possibility of more extensive use of detailed consumer guidance should be pursued in order to avoid the causing of offence.

The second level of classification is operated, as discussed above, by local authorities under the Cinemas Act 1985 which continues the old power arising under the Cinematograph Act 1909. The local authority will usually follow the Board's advice; authorities are reluctant to devote resources to viewing films and will tend to rely on the BBFC's judgment.[421] But authorities may, on occasion, choose not to grant a licence to a film regardless of its decision. Films which have been licensed but which nevertheless have been banned in some areas include A Clockwork Orange, The Life of Brian, The Last Temptation of Christ and Crash. Conversely, local authorities may come under pressure to change the classification of a film in order to make it less restrictive. Two local authorities downgraded Spiderman to a 'PG' rating for that reason, since some parents had been disappointed by the '12' rating.[422] There is no requirement of consistency between authorities and thus discrepancies have arisen between different local authority areas. It is notable that the cinema is the only art form subject to moral judgment on a local level and clearly it may be asked why it should be so singled

419 See BBFC press release, 21 October 2002.
420 See BBFC press release, 2 April 2002.
421 See Holbrook (1973) 123 NLJ 701.
422 See BBFC press release, 13 June 2002.

out. This dual system of censorship was criticised unavailingly over 25 years ago by the Williams Committee in 1979,[423] partly on the ground of the anomalies caused by having two overlapping levels of restraint and partly due to the inconsistency between local authorities. It considered that a unified system should be adopted. In particular, it criticised a system which allowed adult films to be censored beyond the requirements of the OPA.

Statutory regulation of video works

The Video Recordings Act 1984 was introduced after a campaign about the dangers posed by 'video nasties' to children. The campaign, by the Daily Mail and a group called the Festival of Light, managed to convince Parliament that legislation was necessary in order to address the problem.[424] Under the Video Recordings Act 1984, the BBFC was established as the authority charged with classifying videos for viewing in the home.[425] It currently classifies videos, DVDs and some digital works under the 1984 Act. Videoworks[426] are classified and therefore censored in almost the same way as films, and under s 9 of the 1984 Act, it is an offence to supply a video without a classification certificate, unless it is exempt on grounds of its concern with education, sport, music or religion. Under s 2(2) the exemption will not apply if the video portrays human sexual activity or gross violence or is designed to stimulate or encourage this. Section 4 of the 1984 Act requires that the BBFC should have 'special regard to the likelihood of videoworks being viewed in the home'. Thus, makers of videos may find that videos are censored well beyond the requirements of the OPA.

The regime in respect of videos was made potentially more restrictive in 1994. Fears that children might be more likely to commit violence after watching violent videos[427] led the government to include a number of provisions in the Criminal Justice and Public Order Bill 1994, which was then before the Commons. Under s 90 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, inserting s 4A into the 1984 Act, the BBFC must have 'special regard' to harm which may be caused to 'potential viewers or through their behaviour to society' by the manner in which the film deals with criminal behaviour, illegal drugs, violent behaviour or incidents, horrific incidents or behaviour or human sexual activity. These criteria are non-exhaustive. The BBFC can consider any other relevant factor. 'Potential viewers' include children, but it is not necessary to show that children had in fact viewed the video. The kind of harm envisaged, to a child or to society, is not specified and nor is the degree of seriousness envisaged although the use of the word 'may' implies that there must be some likelihood of harm. Section 4A does not prescribe the Board's response once it has taken the above factors 'into

423 See Williams Committee on Obscenity and Film Censorship, which conducted a review of the area, Cmnd 7772, 1979.

424 See Petley, J, Screen, Vol 25 No 2, p 68.

425 After the introduction of the Video Recordings Act 1984, the President and Vice-Presidents of the Board were designated by the Home Secretary under s 4(1) as the authority responsible for applying the statutory classification system for videoworks set out in the Act.

426 When the term 'videowork' or 'video' is used it will be used to cover video material presented on DVDs and digital games.

427 See further, Home Affairs Committee, Video Violence and Young Offenders, Fourth Report (1994) HC 514.

account'.[428] Section 89 of the 1994 Act also amended s 2(2) in respect of the scope of the exemptions mentioned above. These exemptions will not apply if a video 'depicts techniques likely to be useful in the commission of offences' or 'criminal activity likely to any significant extent to stimulate or encourage the commission of offences'. It is not necessary to show that the video is designed to stimulate or encourage the activity mentioned above, but only that it is likely to do so. If the BBFC considers that a particular work is unacceptable for viewing, it can, and does, refuse to issue a classification certificate altogether. This has the effect of banning the videowork concerned since under the 1984 Act, ss 9–11 it is a criminal offence to supply, offer or possess for supply an unclassified video. It is also an offence to supply a video in breach of the classification certificate issued by the BBFC.[429]

A right of appeal from the decisions of the BBFC to the Video Appeals Committee (VAC), which operates as a Tribunal, was created under the provisions of s 4(3) of the 1984 Act.[430] No other party has the right of appeal under the Act. The Home Secretary has sought to intervene in this classification and appeals scheme, with the result that in the 1990's the BBFC and the VAC came into conflict in respect of a number of explicit videos which depicted actual, rather than simulated, sexual scenes. The Board relaxed their Guidelines in 1997 and classified a number of videos containing more explicit material than had been classified before, including scenes of actual penetration and oral sex. The Home Secretary was apparently concerned that this action would create a potential conflict with the enforcement policies of both Customs and Excise and the police who may seize material of similar explicitness for forfeiture proceedings via Magistrates' Courts under the Customs Consolidation Act 1876 and the Obscene Publications Act 1959 respectively. He instructed the Board to rescind their policy change. The Board set up an Enforcement sub-group which was established to consider the issue of consistency of standards between the Board and the prosecuting authorities.[431]

In 1998 the Board refused to classify an explicit sex video, Makin' Whoopee, to which they had given, but subsequently withdrawn, an interim classification certificate under their revised Guidelines. The publishers appealed to the VAC who found in their favour, rejecting arguments that the video might be obscene within the meaning of the 1959 Obscene Publications Act. The Board classified the video in the 'R18' category

428 See on this issue, Manchester, C, 'Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994: obscenity, pornography and videos' (1995) Crim LR 123, pp 129–30.

429 It may be noted that it is a defence under the Video Recordings Act 1993 to a charge of any offence under the 1984 Act to prove that the offence was due to the act or default of another person or that the accused took all reasonable precautions to avoid the commission of the offence 'by any person under his control'.

430 Under s 4(3) of the 1984 Act the Home Secretary must be satisfied that the designated authority (in practice this meant the principal officers at the BBFC) have adequate arrangements for appeals against classification determinations which producers or distributors feel are too restrictive. This may be because the video works in question have been given too high a classification or because they have been refused a classification altogether. The 1984 Act itself is silent as to the nature of the appeals body but the BBFC itself set up the VAC. The BBFC was responsible for the mechanics of recruitment and appointment of its members.

431 See BBFC Response to the Home Office Consultation Paper on The Regulation of R18 Videos, paras 2.3 and 1.4.

but did not accept that the judgment, which was limited to the issue of obscenity, set a precedent for consideration of similar videos.[432] A further seven videos were subsequently refused classification certificates and the Board then faced appeals against their decisions in respect of the videos. The VAC found in favour of the appellants and the Board subsequently sought leave to apply for judicial review of the VAC's judgement: R v Video Appeals Committee of the BBFC ex p BBFC.[433] The Board was unsuccessful on the basis that the VAC had taken all the relevant factors into account, including any risk to children. It was thought that since the videos were to be sold in adult sex shops, the risk that they would come into the hands of children and the risk that they would cause harm to them was very slight. In the proceedings, Mr Justice Hooper concluded 'I have no doubt that the conclusion "that the risk of [the videos in question] being viewed by and causing harm to children or young persons is, on present evidence, insignificant" is one that a reasonable decision maker could reach . . .'. He found that the VAC had acted reasonably in reaching the decision they did on the basis of the arguments put before them, and dismissed the Board's application. In other words, it could not be said that this was a decision that no reasonable regulator could have come to – the familiar low threshold. Thus the judgment was based on the Wednesbury unreasonableness standard only, not on Art 10 demands, and indicated quite a high degree of deference, common in this context, to the expert decision-maker – the VAC.[434] It was consistent with the view that the access of adults to explicit material should not be prevented on the basis that there was an unquantifiable risk of harm to children if it happened to come into their hands. However, it would be overstating the matter to find that the judgment laid down a statement of principle of this nature.

The then Labour Home Secretary, Jack Straw, attacked the decision of the VAC, and the Home Office published a Consultation Paper indicating that new legislation on the VAC and the use of the 'R18' classification might be necessary.[435] The possibility that the VAC could be newly set up under statute, with government-appointed officers, was raised.[436] In response the BBFC did not accept the government's criticisms of the VAC, but recommended that its jurisdiction should be confined to deciding whether the Board, as the Designated Authority under the Video Recordings Act, had been 'fair, consistent and legally correct in the application of its published policy and Guidelines'.[437] It may be noted that the VAC has not always been so bold: it did not reverse the decision of the BBFC in relation to the video Visions of Ecstasy, on the basis that it was possibly blasphemous. This decision turned, however, on the problematic nature of the law of blasphemy.[438]

The decision in R v Video Appeals Committee of the BBFC ex p BBFC highlighted one of the problems inherent in the 1984 Act, a flaw that became especially apparent in relation to 'R18'-rated videos, under the more relaxed Guidelines. Section 4A of

432 Ibid.

433 (2000) EMLR 850.

434 See further Chapter 4, pp 273–78 on deference in this context.

435 Home Office Consultation Paper on The Regulation of R18 Videos 28.7.00; see also the Guardian, 17 May 2000.

436 Home Office Consultation Paper on The Regulation of R18 Videos, paras 3.16–3.21.

437 BBFC Response to the Home Office Consultation Paper on The Regulation of R18 Videos.

438 See pp 490–91.

the Act operates on the assumption that children may be harmed if they view sexually explicit or very violent videos. However, there is no firm evidence that this is the case in relation to explicit depictions of sexuality,[439] as the government itself accepts,[440] and therefore it is very difficult to establish that harm is likely. Also, the connection between violence on film and violent behaviour in children has not been firmly established. It appears to be possible that there is a greater likelihood, not that children may perpetrate violence as an immediate reaction to exposure to violent films, but that they may be de-sensitised to violence in a long-term sense if they watch a great deal of it.[441] However, psychologists disagree as to the creation of this effect and there is no clear consensus among them as to the general proposition that watching violent films harms children.[442]

Likelihood of harm should arguably be established on the balance of probabilities,[443] and on the basis of the current research it is unclear that it can be. If a greater risk of harm could be established it would at the least support the continuance of the restrictions on the sale of 'R18' videos. There are clearly two separate issues – that of the likelihood of harm and that of the likelihood that children might view the video. The small chance that they might do so in respect of videos with the 'R18' classification due to the restrictions on sale makes it difficult to give effect to s 4A in relation to such videos, as the High Court accepted in R v Video Appeals Committee of the BBFC ex p BBFC. It could also be argued that it is difficult to give legal effect to s 4A, even in relation to videos classified '15' or '18', since although there is a higher probability that children may view them, it is even harder to establish that they might be harmed

439 BBFC News Release, 26 October 2000, Abused children most at risk from pornography: 'The BBFC commissioned the research in response to the Video Appeals Committee's ruling that the Board had failed to provide sufficient evidence of harm to children from viewing pornography in an appeal to the VAC by two porn distributors in 1999. The research was focused on finding out whether pornography by itself harmed children . . . The majority of those interviewed [child psychologists] believed that viewing pornography would be harmful to any child, and that they should be protected from it. They were, however, able to quote very little in the way of evidence to support this belief, either from their own case loads or those of their colleagues. Some felt that viewing pornography depicting consensual sex would not be harmful to children who were well cared for and not being harmed in other ways. Determining the harm pornography does is not easy because it is difficult to disentangle it from other features of a child's situation, especially as the majority of children who are exposed to pornography are usually being harmed in other ways. Several of the experts argued that pornography was less regulated and more readily available in Europe and the USA. Yet they were not aware of any evidence that a higher proportion of children in those countries needed professional help because seeing pornography had upset them. Nor were related outcomes like teenage pregnancies or marital breakdowns higher in countries where pornography circulated more freely . . . Robin Duval, Director of the BBFC, said: ". . . this research shows that there is in fact little clear evidence to support the natural view that 'accidental' viewing will have seriously harmful effects. It is reasonable to assume that a sample of 38 leading professionals would have been able to cite more anecdotal evidence from their case loads if harm to children, outside abusive or negligent situations, were significant or common".'

440 Home Office Consultation Paper on The Regulation of R18 Videos, para 1: 'There is little conclusive evidence of harmful effects'.

441 See further, Home Affairs Committee, Video Violence and Young Offenders, Fourth Report (1994) HC 514.

442 See M Barker and J Petley Ill Effects: The Media Violence Debate (London: Routledge, 1997).

443 See further above, pp 459–60 on this point.

if they do. Possibly s 4A has become legally ineffectual. Therefore it is unclear that there is a sound legal basis for creating distinctions between videos and films in terms of cuts at those classification levels .

The 1984 Act places the BBFC in the position of official censors and in that role their work has in the past been criticised as over-strict and arbitrary.[444] Taking account of s 4 of the 1984 Act, the BBFC uses cuts and restrictive classification more stringently with videos than with films partly because of the greater possibility that younger children will view them, despite the age classification, and also because – as it states – certain techniques, such as the use of weapons or of drugs, can be watched repeatedly 'until the lesson is learned'. The possibility of repeat viewings may also, in the Board's view, be a matter of concern in relation to sexually explicit and violent scenes. So the age classifications may be used more restrictively in relation to videos and cuts are more likely to be made to videos before being rated '18'. For example, after taking specialist advice, the BBFC required a cut of one minute 28 seconds to the video version of A Ma Soeur!, a film about the rape of a young girl, to achieve an '18' rating. The Board had previously passed the film version '18' uncut, but took the advice of a leading consultant clinical psychologist who considered that the rape scene was similar to material which paedophiles use to groom their victims.[445] This was perceived as more of a problem in relation to the video, as opposed to the cinematic, release due to the possibility that the scene in question could be played repeatedly and in a private context.

The impact and influence of the Human Rights Act

The stance of the BBFC is obviously influenced by the composition of the Board. Its effect on film-makers has been criticised as militating against creativity. It has been suggested that a cosy relationship has developed with film-makers that is insufficiently challenging – the acceptable boundaries are not fully explored in the name of artistic integrity and creative freedom.[446] Although there has been liberalisation, it is still arguable that commercial judgments rather than artistic considerations tend to dominate. The most pressing consideration for distributors is to find the widest possible audience, which may mean instituting cuts in order to obtain a '15' or '12A' certificate. The fact that the classifications are mandatory is also relevant, since distribution in the UK is therefore more restricted by age restraints than in countries in which it is recommendatory. Children under the age in question are still part of the targeted market in such countries. The relationship between 'artistic' and 'commercial' considerations is, clearly, a complex one. There is clear commercial mileage in obtaining the widest possible release of a film by way of the 'PG' certificate. But there may also be commercial advantage in producing sexually explicit and controversial films. In both instances, in a very competitive market where backers and distributors are unwilling to take commercial risks, directors and producers may be forced to institute cuts for the UK release of a film where clearly they would prefer to release it uncut. The BBFC accepts that its application of its Guidelines leads to a more restrictive censorship and classification of films in the UK than in almost all of Europe or the US.

444 See Hunnings, N, 'Video censorship' [1985] PL 214; Robertson, G, Freedom, the Individual and the Law, 7th edn, 1993, Penguin, pp 263–72.

445 See BBFC press release, 25 June 2002.

446 See Robertson and Nichol, op. cit., fn 1, p 593.

It seems possible that the inception of the HRA could have some impact on this situation, although ultimately by far the most significant matter is the stance of the BBFC. For example, a film-maker whose film was refused a classification without certain cuts, could refuse to institute the cuts and seek to challenge the decision of the BBFC or, in the case of a video, that of the VAC, if it upheld the BBFC's decision. The VAC is a body set up under statute with a public function in the sense of hearing appeals regarding the classification of material to be promulgated to the public; it is also subject to judicial review. It is therefore almost certainly a functional public authority under s 6 HRA. The BBFC has a public function which is also statutory in respect of providing classification certificates for videos. Its function in relation to films is not statutory, but can clearly be termed public. Had it not undertaken the classification of films, the government would have been likely to set up a statutory body.[447] It is suggested therefore that it too is also almost certainly a functional public authority under s 6.[448] If this is correct, private bodies or persons could bring an action against either body under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA, or by way of judicial review, relying on Art 10. In such an action, a court would have to give effect to s 12(4) HRA.[449]

Assuming that the VAC and BBFC are public authorities and so bound by the Convention rights under s 6, they should also ensure that their decisions do not breach Art 10, or any other relevant Article. For example, a film-maker whose film portraying actual homosexual intercourse or other explicit homosexual activity did not receive a certificate, could put forward the argument that Art 10 read with Art 14 (the freedom from discrimination Article)[450] should affect the interpretation, under s 3 HRA of the term 'indecency' in the PCA (if one of the actors was 17) or 'obscene' in the OPA. The argument would be that the same standards should be applied as would be applied to films showing explicit heterosexual activity. Importantly, as a public authority, the VAC cannot be confined to considering only whether the BBFC's decisions are 'fair, consistent and legally correct'; it also has to consider whether its own decisions on appeals might breach Art 10. It can of course be argued that 'legally correct' includes consideration of the BBFC's own duty under s 6(1) HRA not to breach Art 10 in its decisions, 447 See Chapter 4, pp 220–24, 233–35, on functional public authorities.

448 The BBFC takes the view that because of its public functions in respect of the statutory classification of videoworks, it is a 'public authority' under the HRA. In taking this view it has not distinguished between its function in relation to videos and that in relation to films. Clearly, it would be anomalous if such a distinction was drawn given the similarity of the two functions. (See the 2000 BBFC Response to the Home Office Consultation Paper on The Regulation of R18 Videos at para 1.16.) See also Chapter 4, pp 233–35.

449 See further Chapter 4, pp 215–37, on the provisions of s 12(4), and see Chapter 9 pp 938, 953–58 on the stance that the courts have taken towards it.

450 Article 14 provides: 'The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status.' Thus, Art 14 does not provide a general right to freedom from discrimination, only that the rights and freedoms of the Convention must be secured without discrimination. In the context under discussion Art 14 could be employed in order to argue that the right under Art 10 should be secured without discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation. This ground of discrimination is clearly covered by Art 14 (Salgueiro da Silva Mouta v Portugal, judgment of 21 December 1999); the question that would arise in this context would be whether differentiation between film-makers' output on the grounds of the nature of the output would be covered.

and therefore the VAC must decide whether the BBFC has acted compatibly with the demands of Art 10. Nevertheless, the VAC has a duty in relation to Art 10 under the HRA distinct from that of the BBFC itself. The 1984 Act, as amended, must be interpreted compatibly with the Convention rights under s 3(1) HRA. Given that a number of its terms are very open-ended, there is room for a range of interpretations.

However, in the case of a sexually explicit or violent film, the problem would be, as indicated above, that the Strasbourg jurisprudence appears to support quite far-reaching restrictions. It might be argued that where the risk of children viewing the cinema release of a film is very slight due to the use of age restrictions, and the question of offending religious sensibilities does not arise, the jurisprudence could be viewed as supporting the availability of even very explicit films.[451] This contention would be based on the unavailability of the margin of appreciation doctrine at the domestic level, and also derives from the principles underlying the jurisprudence, which, as indicated above, relate to the familiar free speech justifications, including that of self-fulfilment.[452]

But it must be acknowledged that this argument is not situated firmly in the Strasbourg jurisprudence at present. It rests mainly on one decision of the Commission – that of Scherer.[453] The decisions of the Court, in particular those of Handyside[454] and Otto-Preminger,[455] lend it only speculative support. The Court may have found it easier, in those decisions, to rest its argument on risks to children or to religious sensibilities, rather than enter the extremely difficult debate as to the proper limits of adult autonomy in relation to controversial, offensive and explicit speech. The argument that decisions at Strasbourg heavily influenced by the margin of appreciation doctrine should be applied domestically 'stripped' of its effects, is an appealing and compelling one that has been canvassed elsewhere in this book.[456] But the judges have shown little receptivity to it under the HRA so far.[457]

If a suitable case in this context arose domestically – which in itself is unlikely – a judge who wanted to impose a liberalising interpretation on the domestic law would have to have a pre-existing determination to take a liberal stance in relation to the PCA 1978 or the OPA 1959. If so, he or she would be able to find some, admittedly meagre, support in the jurisprudence for that stance. But equally the opposing, conservative stance could be taken and could find support in the jurisprudence, particularly from Gibson v UK.[458] The OPA itself clearly takes an overtly paternalistic stance since it assumes that judgments can be made and imposed on others as to what might deprave

451 See p 466, above.
452 See above, pp 305–6.
453 A 287 (1993). See, for discussion, pp 466–68.
454 (1976) 1 EHRR 737. See, for discussion, p 464.
455 (1994) 19 EHRR 34. See further pp 488–89.
456 See Chapter 4, pp 262–63, 270–73.
457 For example, in R v Perrin [2002] EWCA Crim 747, a recent case on the OPA 1959 (discussed at pp 584–85 below) in relation to the internet, Handyside and other relevant Strasbourg decisions were fully considered. The Court noted that the margin of appreciation doctrine was relevant in them, especially Handyside. But it did not appear to appreciate that by applying Handyside without seeking to disregard as far as possible the parts of the decision affected by the doctrine, it was in effect allowing the doctrine to have an impact on domestic law.
458 See p 483. For discussion of the domestic case, see Childs, M, 'Outraging Public Decency' (1991) PL 20.

and corrupt them. The HRA could be viewed as legitimising this existing position since the Strasbourg jurisprudence, especially the decisions of the Court on explicit expression, is itself paternalistic. Recent case law on the OPA and PCA in the context of internet pornography indicates that the courts are taking the latter stance. On the other hand, in this context, courts are likely to defer to the expertise of the regulators,[459] rather than rely on the Strasbourg jurisprudence, however it could be interpreted. So if the BBFC adopts a liberal stance – and it appears, increasingly, to be doing so[460] – the courts are unlikely to interfere with its decisions.

On the assumption that the relevant Strasbourg freedom of expression jurisprudence lends a degree of support to adult autonomy in this context, it can be argued that there is fairly limited scope under Art 10(2) for interferences with the freedom of expression of film-makers in respect of the theatrical release of films targeted at adults. It would be expected that they would be afforded an '18' certificate and appropriate warnings should be posted at cinemas and on the internet so that an unwitting viewer would not be offended. Article 10 might be viewed as underpinning the policy of awarding 'R18' certificates to films not viewed as obscene since there is virtually no chance of children viewing them due to the restrictions.

Taking account of Scherer[461] and Hoare,[462] different considerations might appear to apply to videos, owing to the possibility that, despite the restrictions on sale they might be viewed by children in the home, but this argument should be considered carefully, in terms of its impact on adults. The effect of the margin of appreciation doctrine on those decisions should be taken into account, following the argument discussed above.[463] The question of the harm that might be caused should also be considered, bearing in mind the lack of evidence mentioned above regarding a connection between behaviour seen on film and actual behaviour. The mere invocation of the possibility that children might view a video might not appear to be enough to satisfy the demands of proportionality, although it was found to be enough in Hoare. Theoretically, a domestic court could take a harder look at those demands than the Commission did in Hoare, since the margin of appreciation doctrine would be inapplicable. In practice, as discussed, the court would probably defer to the BBFC or VAC decision as in R v Video Appeals Committee of the BBFC ex p BBFC; possibly the HRA would add little in this context to the reasonableness standard applied in that instance although a nod in the direction of proportionality would be expected. In respect of videos, the small chance that children might view a video with an 'R18' certificate (bearing in mind the controls on buying such videos), and the unquantifiability of the risk that a child might be harmed by it, could be taken to mean that refusing to classify a video at 'R18', even where it is not obscene, would be disproportionate, under Art 10(2), to the aim pursued. Guidance on this matter might also usefully be sought from other jurisdictions,[464] since it is not a matter that Strasbourg has inquired into in any depth.

459 This is strongly indicated by the House of Lords' decision in Pro-Life Alliance v BBC [2004] 1 AC 185; [2003] 2 All ER 977 (for discussion, see pp 533–44) and by the R v Video Appeals Committee of the BBFC ex p BBFC decision [2000] EMLR 850.

460 See pp 555–62 above.

461 A 287 (1993) Com Rep.

462 [1997] EHRLR 678.

463 At pp 466–68.

464 See above, p 465.

The stance taken by Strasbourg in relation to films likely to offend religious sensibilities was indicated in the leading decision, Otto-Preminger,[465] discussed above.[466] The film in question was not likely to be viewed by children, but was found to be offensive to religious sensibilities. The seizure and forfeiture of the film was not found to breach Art 10. Further guidance derives from the decision of the Court of Human Rights in Wingrove v UK.[467] It concerned a decision of the BBFC, upheld by the VAC, to refuse a certificate to the short, explicit film, Visions of Ecstasy. The Court found that the decision to refuse a certificate was within the national authorities' margin of appreciation. But the film, which was to be promulgated as a short video, was viewed as offensive to religious sensibilities and as quite likely to come to the attention of children, since it could be viewed in the home.[468] No breach of Art 10 was found.

Conclusions

The view of the Williams Committee on Obscenity and Film Censorship, which conducted a review of the area in 1979,[469] was that the censorship of films should continue. The Committee considered that in the light of some psychiatric evidence to the effect that violent films might induce violent behaviour, a policy based on caution was justified.[470] The point has often been made, however, that the evidence that films have a very different impact from books or magazines is not strong: the difference in treatment may be due to historical reasons: new forms of expression take time to gain the acceptance accorded to traditional mediums and are viewed with some suspicion.[471] Many of the BBFC Guidelines are aimed at preventing specific forms of harm which might come about as a result of the viewing of films. Clearly, the causal relationship between the viewing and the harm in many instances may be debatable, but the BBFC does have the prevention of particular harms – over and above the causing of offence – in mind. For example, rejecting or cutting the depiction of imitable combat techniques in films aimed at children is defensible on that basis. Glamorisation of images of sexual violence, including rape, may have some effect on the incidence of male aggression towards women, or other men. However, the avoidance of specific harms cannot be said to be the sole aim of cutting explicit sexual images in films aimed at adults, where they are not linked to non-consensual acts or violence. If such images are not obscene, although, admittedly, as pointed out above, that concept creates its own grave difficulties of interpretation, the basis for cutting them is unclear.

Although the BBFC clearly has in mind the invasion of adult autonomy created by imposing constraints on films beyond those demanded by the criminal law, it continues to accept that such constraints are necessary, even though they create a stricter censorship regime in the UK than in the rest of Europe. Such constraints are partly based on 467 (1996) 24 EHRR 1. The question of the validity of taking the stance adopted in Wingrove and Otto-Preminger is considered above, at pp 491–97.

465 (1994) 19 EHRR 34.

466 See pp 488–89.

468 See paras 61 and 63 of the judgment.

469 Cmnd 7772, 1979. See Simpson, AWB, Pornography and Politics: The Williams Committee in Retrospect, 1983, pp 35–37.

470 See Simpson, AWB, ibid p 37.

471 See eg Barendt, Freedom of Speech, op. cit., fn 1, 1st edn, p 125.

necessarily subjective interpretations of the contextual validation of explicit images. In taking its particular stance towards the censorship and classification of films the BBFC appears to an extent to be bowing to government pressure, as the story behind R v Video Appeals Committee of the BBFC ex p BBFC reveals. The possibility of mounting successful challenges to restrictive BBFC decisions in reliance on Art 10, as discussed above, remains open and would provide a counter to the paternalistic stance sometimes taken by the government.

But it is not suggested that the only consideration that should inform BBFC decisions is that of moral autonomy. In dealing with the portrayal of sexuality the BBFC is in a position to shift the focus from traditional concerns as to offence and the undermining of traditional moral values, to the protection of what may be termed 'constitutional morality'.[472] Indeed there are some signs in the stance it takes to the classification of films portraying sexual violence that it is already beginning to do so. In other words, on the model provided by the Supreme Court of Canada which reconceptualised the concern of obscenity law as focused on the protection of foundational values such as equality and dignity,[473] the BBFC could increasingly bring such factors into its deliberations into the portrayal of sexual activity in film.

The internet[474]

Introduction

The question of the regulation of the internet is immensely complex.[475] The issues raised can only be touched on here, but one of the most significant concerns its regulation in the converged environment, which is considered below. The obvious problem which arises if one considers the regulatory regime applied to broadcasting under the 1990 Act, is that the internet provides a complex global communications network which cannot be fully subject to regulation applied within the boundaries of one state. The application of criminal and civil law to the internet is also challenging.

The internet is already a highly significant medium in terms of the provision of both information and entertainment. Its current and future significance as a medium cannot be over-stated – it is probably overtaking broadcasting as the culturally supreme medium. Its role in providing information has been recognised for some time; its role in relation to entertainment has perhaps been less emphasised. Many websites seek to provide both information and entertainment by the provision of video clips, photographs, narrative. The association between the use of the internet and the other media considered here is very strong; for example, a number of websites, official and unofficial, are dedicated to a range of films and broadcasts and show trailers, advertisements and clips.

472 See Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, (2006), op. cit., fn 1 at Chapter 9, pp 450–62.

473 See R v Butler [1992] 1 SCR 452. See also Harel, A, 'Bigotry, Pornography and the First Amendment' 65 (1992) S Cal L Rev 1887, 1897.

474 See generally: Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 2nd edn, 2005, Chapter 13; Akdeniz, Y, Walker, C and Wall, D (eds), The Internet, Law and Society, 2000; Graham, G, The Internet: A Philosophical Inquiry, 1999, Routledge.

475 For detailed treatment, see Akdeniz, Y, Walker, C and Wall, D (eds), The Internet, Law and Society, 2000.

But the internet is also a strongly participatory medium;[476] it not only enables ideas to be expressed by individuals in their live journals or on websites and discussion forums, it also affords – more significantly – efficacy to such expression in terms of audience access.[477] The internet is taking on a new and important role as a platform for the mass expression and exchange of ideas, globally. Individuals in general are largely excluded from mainstream discourse in the media. Journalists may claim to speak for them, and also their views find a very limited opportunity for expression in 'Letters' pages or audience-participation broadcasts, but such expression hardly overcomes the dominance of the media by professionals, meaning that it is unrepresentative, especially of the views of women and minority groups, since journalism in general, and the higher positions in the media hierarchy, still tend to be a white male domain. In this sense the internet can be compared to public protest since protest also provides a means of affording efficacy to the speech of individuals, and particularly of minority or excluded groups.[478] The German Supreme Court, in the Brokdorf case, viewed participation in protest as a form of 'active engagement in the life of the community'.[479] But the internet provides opportunities for the mass exchange of ideas that far transcend the role of protest since it allows for such engagement with the global community, providing a means of exchanging views across national boundaries that has never existed before with such efficacy. Further, such ideas include, but are not confined to, the political arena. As Barendt notes:

> The Net certainly affords much more equal opportunities for communication than the traditional press and broadcasting media, where the entry costs are high and which are in practice for the most part available only to professional journalists and to the political and social elite.[480]

It may be said therefore that it engages with the broadly based speech justifications, engaging values of autonomy[481] and self-development.[482]

There might appear then to be a strong case for viewing regulation of the internet with suspicion in free speech terms. The US Supreme Court has found that it should not be equated with broadcasting in relation to regulation, but, impliedly, with the 476 See Barendt (2005), op. cit., fn 1, at p 451.

477 According to a major research study published in April 2005 (UK Children Go Online, Sonia Livingstone and Magdalena Bober, April 2005: www.children-go-online.net), 75% of 9–19-year-olds surveyed had accessed the internet from a computer at home. The Guardian reported in October 2005 that one third of UK teenagers had their own website or live journal.

478 See: Chapter 8, pp 663–65; Barnum, DG, 'The Constitutional Status of Public Protest Activity in Britain and the US' [1977] PL 310; Barendt, op. cit., at pp 9, 14–15; Williams, D, Keeping the Peace: the Police and Public Order 1967, Hutchinson, pp 10 and 130–31; see also Sherr, Freedom of Protest, Public Order and the Law 1989, Blackwell, at pp 10–12.

479 69 Bverfge 315, 343–47 (1985).

480 See Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 2nd edn, 2005, Chapter 13, p 452.

481 See generally, Dworkin, R, 'Do We Have a Right to Pornography?' Chapter 17, in A Matter of Principle, 1985; Scanlon, T, 'A Theory of Freedom of Expression' (1972) 1 Phil & Pub Aff. 216.

482 See generally, Emerson, C, 'Towards a General Theory of the First Amendment' (1963) 72 Yale LJ 877, at pp 879–80; Redish, M, Freedom of Expression, 1984, Lexis, pp 20–30 and Greenwalt, K, (1989) 89 Columbia Law Review 119, at pp 143–45.

print media.[483] The argument that the choice that can be exercised over encountering online expression differentiates it from broadcasting is reasonably persuasive, although as argued above, it is becoming increasingly possible to exercise greater choice over broadcast expression as it becomes more interactive. In other words, it is becoming less of an intruder into the home and more of a deliberately invited visitor. Thus there is an argument for relaxing the regulation of broadcasting – which Ofcom appears to accept – but not for extending that model of regulation to the internet.

But the strength of the internet – its ready accessibility and susceptibility to choice – can also be viewed as its weakness. Its use by groups excluded from the mainstream media is not necessarily benign. For example, a range of racial hatred offences can be committed by broadcasters, film-makers or playwrights under the Public Order Act 1986 ss 20, 21, 22 and 23. As discussed above, Part 3 of the 1986 Act was amended to include religious hatred under the Racial and Religious Hatred Act 2005. The Public Order Act offences have not been specifically amended to apply to the internet, although s 21 probably covers it, but in any event the general difficulty of prosecuting ISPs, discussed below, would apply. Hate speech can be available from websites which would not appear in UK newspapers and could not appear in broadcasting due to Ofcom's regulation, and it can also be much more rapidly disseminated throughout the world. The ready dissemination of hate speech (and possibly of extreme depictions of sexual violence) arguably cannot be supported by the free speech argument from self-fulfilment.[484] Thus, as Barendt puts it:

> it is surely wise at least to retain those controls on Internet speech which are justifiable in the case of speech disseminated by other means. The mere facts that the Internet is easy and cheap for most people to use, and that they enjoy equal access as speakers and receivers on it, does not constitute an argument for a bonfire of controls.[485]

The discussion below of law and regulation of the internet is not therefore premised on the desirability of a complete relaxation of control over the internet.

This concern as to the 'weakness' of the internet particularly exercises the authorities in relation to the availability of pornography and the protection of children. This is the case at EU level and in relation to the UK Government, as discussed below. As a UK Government Consultation Paper put it in 2005:

> [The Internet is a] spectacular communications development . . . transforming our lives, offering unparalleled opportunities to communicate, to discover and to learn. Alongside these benefits, the Internet also brings challenges for, amongst other things, the regulation of potentially illegal pornographic material which is readily accessible . . . In pre-Internet days, individuals who wished to view this kind of material would need to seek it out, bring it into their home or have it delivered in physical form as magazines, videos, photographs etc, risking discovery and 483 Reno v ACLU 521 US 844. For further discussion of this point, see Barendt (2005), Chapter 13, p 455.

484 For discussion, see above, pp 305–6.

485 See Barendt, Freedom of Speech, 2nd edn, 2005, Chapter 13, p 454.

> embarrassment at every stage. Now they are able to access it from their computers at home . . .[486]

Concern about the use of the internet is not confined to the availability of extreme or child pornography. It expresses itself in the UK partly through prompting developments in the criminal law, but also in supporting other initiatives aimed at regulation. Below, issues relating to UK law and regulation of the internet are considered, followed by consideration of the current efforts at regulation and the application of the current and proposed criminal law, taking account of free speech arguments.

Regulation of the internet

Internet advertising is regulated in the UK by the Advertising Standards Authority (ASA), but otherwise the internet is not at present regulated in accordance with any of the models considered above. In the White Paper, A New Future for Communications,[487] the government did not propose a means of drawing the internet within the Ofcom regime in relation to the regulation of programme services on the internet, or otherwise. Visual images available on a service provided by the internet prima facie fall within the definition, in the 2003 Act, of a 'licensable programme service', but such services also appear to fall within the exception provided for 'two-way' services, depending on the interpretation given to that exception. It is clearly intended to cover internet services. However, even on the very doubtful assumption that it could do, Ofcom, like the ITC,[488] has not sought so far to apply its powers to the internet. There would be severe practical difficulties in doing so, although it could in relation to broadcast material placed on websites by licensed broadcast services already under its purview. The result is that material is shown on various websites that clearly could not be shown in a broadcast.[489]

The internet provides a complex global communications network which cannot be fully subject to regulation applied within the boundaries of one state. The government has recognized the problems of seeking to applying regulation on the Ofcom model to the internet.[490] It has been contended that: 'By creating a seamless global-economic zone, borderless and unregulatable, the internet calls into question the very idea of a nation-state.'[491] But in considering controls over the internet, as over the other media considered here, it is necessary to distinguish between the application of the ordinary law and the use of a general regulatory regime monitored and policed by a regulatory body. In relation to the use of the law, a range of views have been expressed. It has been argued that the internet is not inherently unregulatable, even at the national level, on the ground that 'the Internet creates new contexts for old problems rather than new 486 Consultation Paper on The Possession of Extreme Pornographic Material: Home Office 30.8.05 – URL: news.bbc.co.uk/1 shared/bsp/hi/pdfs/30 08 05 porn doc.pdf.

487 Published 12 December 2000: www.communicationswhitepaper.gov.uk.

488 See the ITC website: http://www.itc.co.uk.

489 For example, Channel 4 has shown material on its website that has been excluded from films broadcast on television. See e.g. Guardian Unlimited Special Report 27.4.04.

490 See Regulating Communications: The Way Ahead June 1999, www.dti.gov.uk/convergence-statement.htm at para 3.20.

491 Barlow, JP, 'Thinking locally, acting globally' (1996) Cyber-Rights Electronic List 15 January.

problems per se'.[492] Robin Duval, President of the BBFC from 1999-2004, has also argued that the internet can be regulated, pointing out that corporations have successfully brought actions against ISPs on commercial grounds.[493] This is also the stance of the EU Commission, which is discussed further below. But as the UK Government pointed out in a recent Consultation Paper,[494] the general application of the criminal law in one jurisdiction to ISPs based abroad faces almost insuperable problems, as discussed below. The solutions being canvassed at present include reaching international agreements, particularly on the availability of pornography, and adapting or developing offences aimed at consumers and only indirectly at ISPs.

The availability of explicit and pornographic material on the internet has prompted significant changes in EU audio-visual policy. The Council Recommendation concerning the protection of minors and human dignity[495] was the first legal instrument at EU-level that was concerned with the content of material on the internet. The European Parliament and the Council had already taken measures in 1999 with a view to protecting minors from harmful material on the internet.[496] But in 2002 the Commission found that the development of the internet was continuing to create difficulties in relation to the policy of protecting children.[497] It noted that the volume of material on the internet is immense in comparison to broadcasting and also that in traditional broadcasting (analogue or digital) it is not difficult to identify the individual broadcaster, while it may be impossible to identify the source of content on the internet. At the same time access to harmful and illegal content is very easy and may even be unintentional. As a result the Commission proceeded in 2004 to propose an additional Recommendation[498] which calls on the member states, the industry and other interested parties to:

492 Akdeniz, Y, Walker, C and Wall, D (eds), The Internet, Law and Society, 2000, Chapter 1, p 17.

493 See RSA lecture 21.2.01, available from the BBFC website, www.bbfc.co.uk.

494 Consultation Paper on The Possession of Extreme Pornographic Material, Home Office 30.8.05 – URL: news.bbc.co.uk/1 shared/bsp/hi/pdfs/30 08 05 porn doc.pdf.

495 24 September 1998 98/560/EC, OJ L 270, 7.10.1998, p 48.

496 In order to promote a safer internet, the European Parliament and the Council adopted on 25 January 1999 a multi-annual Community Action plan on promoting safer use of the internet by combating illegal and harmful content on global networks Decision No 276/1999/EC, OJ L33, 6/2/1999 p 1 (the 'Safer Internet Action Plan'). On 16 June 2003, the European Parliament and the Council adopted a two-year extension to the Safer Internet Action Plan Decision No. 1151/2003/EC amending Decision No 276/1999/EC, OJ L 162, 1.7.2003, p 1.

497 In accordance with section III of the Recommendation, para 4. The implementation of the Recommendation was evaluated for the first time in 2000, and the first report was published in 2001: Evaluation Report to the Council and the European Parliament on the application of Council Recommendation of 24 September 1998 on protection of minors and human dignity COM(2001) 106 final, 27.2.2001. Parliament adopted a resolution on the report on 11 April 2002: C5-0191/2001 – 2001/2087(COS), in which it called on the Commission to draw up a further report preferably before 31 December 2002. This was produced in 2003: SECOND EVALUATION REPORT FROM THE COMMISSION TO THE COUNCIL AND THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT on the application of Council Recommendation of 24 September 1998 concerning the protection of minors and human dignity, Brussels, 12.12.2003, COM(2003) 776 final.

498 Proposal for a recommendation of the European Parliament and Council on the protection of minors and human dignity and the right to reply in relation to the competitiveness of the European audiovisual and information services industry, COM(2004) 341 final 2004/0117 (COD) 30.4.04, press release 04/598.

> take steps to enhance the protection of minors and human dignity in the . . . Internet sector . . . Illegal, harmful and undesirable content and conduct on the Internet continues to be a concern for law-makers, industry and parents. There will be new challenges both in quantitative (more 'illegal' content) and qualitative terms (new platforms, new products) . . . . [states should take] into account the ever-increasing processing power and storage capacity of computers . . .[499]

The original and the proposed Recommendations favour the development of co-regulatory and self-regulatory mechanisms for the internet rather than regulation based on the imposition of an external regulatory regime via legislation. Such approaches, especially the co-regulatory one, are viewed by the Commission as more likely to be 'flexible, adaptable and effective . . . with regard to the protection of minors'.[500] At present the approach in the UK is largely self- rather than co-regulatory. At the same time it may be said that self-regulation is giving way to an extent to co-regulation at present since a loose co-operative framework covering public authorities, the industry and the other interested parties, including consumers, is becoming apparent, as indicated below.

So in accordance with the EU stance, which is reflected in current government policy as indicated below, Ofcom is likely to continue to take the approach that the ITC took – that it will support and contribute to the voluntary regulation of the internet in relation to television programme material and advertisements on web-sites.[501] It will be argued below, however, that current policy may not result in the creation of the level of protection for minors envisaged in the proposed 2004 Recommendation. A more overt and formal movement towards co-regulation may be necessary.

The remit of the Advertising Standards Authority covers standards of taste and decency in internet advertising. But the ASA does not seek to apply the British Code of Advertising, Sales Promotion and Direct Marketing (the CAP Code) to all internet advertising. It only applies it to online advertisements in 'paid for' space, such as banner and pop-up advertisements;[502] advertisements in commercial e-mails and sales promotions wherever they appear online (including in organisation's websites or in e-mails). It does not apply the CAP Code, which includes requirements of offence-avoidance and 'decency' in advertising,[503] to organisations' claims on their own websites.

499 Para 2 of the proposal for a recommendation.

500 Fn 495 above, Introduction.

501 See further: Ballard, T, 'Main Developments in Broadcasting Law' Yearbook of Copyright and Media Law, 2001–2, 329 at pp 334–35; Ballard, T, 'Survey of the Main Developments in the Field of Broadcasting Law in 1999' Yearbook of Copyright and Media Law, 2000, p 367 at pp 373–74.

502 In relation to these forms of internet advertising, the ASA states: 'There are a number of different online advertising formats (or Interactive Marketing Units (IMUs) as they are sometimes called) that are available to marketers. Banner advertisements are probably the best known, but other forms of IMUs include interstitials, superstitials, buttons, pop-ups, skyscapers, floating ads, advertorials and text links. A banner is an advertisement found on a website page. Banners appear on a rotating basis in windows, usually at the top, bottom or side of web pages, and are used by marketers to make consumers aware of their products and services and to drive consumers directly to a particular website.'

503 The Code states: 'Decency (ie avoiding serious or widespread offence) 5.1 Marketing communications should contain nothing that is likely to cause serious or widespread offence. Particular care should be taken to avoid causing offence on the grounds of race, religion, sex, sexual orientation or disability.

This is mainly because it would be almost impossible to apply sanctions effectively for breach of the Code in such advertising. When the ASA and CAP apply sanctions against companies that do not co-operate with their requests, they usually rely on third parties, such as the owners of newspapers, magazines and poster sites, to enforce decisions by refusing to accept advertising by the company in question. As the ASA acknowledges on its website: 'the direct relationship between the internet user and the organisation bypasses any middleman and makes the medium almost impossible to regulate effectively'.[504] The ASA also views the relationships between consumers who visit an organisation's own website as direct rather than involuntary: 'the information is therefore "pulled to" rather than "pushed at" them unlike traditional forms of advertising'. In relation to the forms of online advertising that it does seek to regulate, it appears to have a very high compliance rate.[505] It reacts to consumer complaints, if upheld, by contacting the organisations in question and requesting changes to internet adverts.[506] The advertisers appear to perceive commercial advantage in complying with the CAP Code – on the 'tit-for-tat' principle. If one advertiser defaults by refusing to comply, others are also likely to do so, thus damaging the level-playing field for marketers within each sector. Also the ASA could seek to apply sanctions against that company's advertising in other media sectors where middle-men can be utilised.

Thus the ASA has informal, commercial sanctions that can be brought to bear in relation to online advertising. They are aimed more at misleading adverts rather than at offensive ones. A general UK internet regulator would not have such sanctions at its command. Nor could it have the licensing power that Ofcom possesses or the classification power of the BBFC since ISPs may well be based outside the jurisdiction. The internet is clearly not as susceptible to control on the basis of offence-avoidance as the other visual media are. In relation to explicit and pornographic speech in films and photographs on websites, the internet has the potential in a sense to undermine the regulatory regimes applied to the other media, precisely because no regulatory body stands between it and the criminal law, creating a regulated 'no-go' area beyond the requirements of the law. In other words, there is no one regulator monitoring explicit internet material via a code with sanctions attached – a code that would, on the Ofcom model, impose standards for offence-avoidance going beyond those demanded by the relevant criminal law. This is not an argument for seeking to impose regulation on that model on the internet, even assuming that that could be done. The argument is that Compliance with the Code will be judged on the context, medium, audience, product and prevailing standards of decency. 5.2 Marketing communications may be distasteful without necessarily conflicting with 5.1 above. Marketers are urged to consider public sensitivities before using potentially offensive material. 5.3 The fact that a particular product is offensive to some people is not sufficient grounds for objecting to a marketing communication for it.'

504 See asa.org.uk.

505 See Compliance Report: Internet banner and pop-up adverts Survey (2002), available from the ASA website: asa.org.uk.

506 The ASA upheld its first complaint against a banner advertisement in May 2000. The advertisement, by an internet service provider, appeared on a financial web page and a complaint was upheld on the ground that the advertiser did not make it sufficiently clear that the banner was an advertisement, not editorial content. Since that time, complaints against a further six banner advertisements have been upheld by the ASA.

the availability of legal, explicit material on the internet that at present could not be broadcast, places Ofcom's regulation under pressure.

Since there is no regulatory regime on the broadcasting model, material posted on the internet is more likely to come directly into conflict with the criminal law in relation to explicit expression. The internet is subject to the criminal law just as the other media considered here are, although the law has required adaptation in order to bring websites within its ambit. Procedurally and substantively speaking, there are problems in securing convictions in respect of web-based material which do not arise in relation to broadcasts or films. The use of the criminal law to strike directly at the consumer of pornography rather than at the supplier immediately engages speech-based autonomy arguments balanced against weaker countervailing justifications, as discussed below.

Voluntary Regulation

The UK, in accordance with EU policy, has followed the path of self-regulation of the internet, against the backdrop of the relevant criminal law. Thus, in the UK there has been so far no general attempt to draw the internet within the system of restraints used for broadcasting, or the system used for films. Instead the internet is restrained, as discussed above, by the general criminal law relating to expression, and also by self-regulation. The White Paper, A New Future for Communications,[507] and the Communications Act itself endorse this self-regulatory approach.

Section I(1) of the EU Council Recommendation[508] provides that the member states should encourage the establishment of national frameworks for self-regulation by operators of online services. A number of UK Internet Service Provider Associations (ISPAs) are established in the UK, and in a number of member and accession states.[509] The ISPAs from eight member states, including those from the UK are members of the European Internet Service Providers Association organisation (EuroISPA). Section II(2) of the Recommendation proposes that the industries and the parties concerned should draw up codes of conduct for, inter alia, the protection of minors and human dignity, in order to create an environment favourable to the development of new services.[510]

507 White Paper, para 6.10: 'OFCOM should ensure continuing and effective mechanisms for tackling illegal material on the internet, such as those being pursued under the auspices of the internet Watch Foundation. It will also promote rating and filtering systems that help internet users control the content they and their children will see. 6.10.1: The Government sees enormous benefits in promoting new media, especially the internet. But it is important that there are effective ways of tackling illegal material on the internet and that users are aware of the tools available, such as rating and filtering systems, that help them control what they and their children will see on the internet. Research suggests that this is what people want in relation to the internet, rather than third party regulation.'

508 Fn 495 above.

509 The member states are: Belgium, Germany, Spain, France, Ireland, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Austria, Sweden. Hungary, Estonia, Slovenia, Turkey, Iceland and Norway have also established ISPAs. In Denmark, Greece, Portugal and Finland, the ISPs are represented through other trade organisations (Commission Report, see fn 495 above).

510 The Commission has given guidance as to the content of such Codes. In particular, the Codes should cover the complaints mechanisms, with a view to facilitating the making and handling of complaints. They should also facilitate a co-regulatory approach by covering the procedures for ensuring cooperation between the operators and the public authorities. These should address the issues of basic rules (i)

The UK has stated that codes of conduct have been established and has also proposed to the Commission that such codes should be drawn up by the industry representatives, rather than within a cooperative venture, involving public authorities. In a number of the member states, in contrast, including Germany and France, public authorities have been involved in drawing up the codes.

A number of the member states also have in place additional specific legal requirements dealing with the operators' obligations in relation to any illegal content on the internet. This includes, for example, the imposition of positive obligations to prevent the further distribution of information clearly covered by the provisions of the country's penal code or obligations to preserve data in order to assist in investigations and prosecutions. This is not the case at present in the UK. The Commission has also encouraged the development of 'notice and take down' procedures in relation to illegal content on the internet.[511]

The development of rating systems is encouraged by the Commission. They allow the carers of children to decide for themselves whether particular websites are suitable for children to access. The systems can be voluntary or mandatory. The UK relies on a voluntary system established by the Internet Content Rating Association (ICRA); under it website managers can apply for a rating on a voluntary basis. Once this rating is available, parents and others, such as teachers, can use it to restrict access to websites with the most suitable rating. ICRA receives funding under the Safer Internet Action Plan and has produced a content rating system that is viewed as suitable for the EU. Rating systems can also be accompanied by filtering systems – systems that block access to certain websites, in the interests of protecting minors.[512] Once a quality charter of websites has been drawn up filter programmes can ensure that users in a particular forum, such as a library or school, are restricted to the websites on the list and such programmes are used in a number of the member states.

The above discussion indicates that the UK favours a regime that is towards the 'lighter touch' end of the spectrum, in comparison with the regimes established in a number of the other member states. The regime relies on a number of voluntary bodies and the involvement of public authorities in the UK has so far been very low-key. While this regime creates flexibility and avoids an overly restrictive approach to website access where controlled by public authorities, it also opens the way to misuse on the nature of the information to be made available to users, its timing and the form in which it is communicated, (ii) for the businesses providing the online services concerned and for users and suppliers of content, (iii) on the conditions under which, wherever possible, additional tools or services are supplied to users to facilitate parental control, (iv) on the handling of complaints, encouraging operators to provide the management tools and structures needed so that complaints can be sent and received without difficulty and introducing procedures for dealing with complaints and (v) on cooperation procedures between operators and the competent public authorities (op. cit., fn 495 above, para 3.1.1).

511 See fn 495 above. These are methods of receiving complaints from members of the public via hot-lines, which can then be screened and passed on to the police or to an internet service-provider. One of the key aims of the Safer Internet Action Plan 1999–2004 (ibid, para 3.1.2, 9) was the creation of a European network of hotlines to span the EU. The Commission found that although hotlines had been established in a number of states, no respondents appeared to have made provision for assessing the efficiency of the hotlines in practice.

512 A particular filtering system utilises 'walled gardens', consisting of special portals allowing access only to sites of guaranteed quality.

of power by the voluntary bodies in question. In the UK a self-regulatory system for the internet is being established by a number of voluntary bodies, including in particular the Internet Watch Foundation with a remit to reduce the availability of illegal material on the internet.[513] The Internet Watch Foundation (IWF) was founded by the UK Internet Industry in 1996. It is funded by the EU and the UK internet industry;[514] it also has the support of the DTI and the Home Office.[515] In its own words the IWF:

> is the only authorised organisation in the UK which provides an Internet 'hotline' for the public to report their exposure to illegal content online. We aim to minimise the availability of Internet content that contains: child abuse images originating anywhere in the world; criminally obscene content hosted in the UK; criminally racist content hosted in the UK.[516]

The IWF has produced a Consultation Paper on developing the use of rating systems in the UK to block undesirable internet content.[517] Thus its activities appear to be extending beyond the enforcement of the criminal law; they may have a hidden ideological basis and may in particular invade the expression of sexual minorities. It is argued that government backing should be withdrawn from the IWF unless its activities, and any apparent ideological predilections, are subject to some form of accountability.

Rating, or vetting,[518] and filtering systems[519] can be used as an aspect of the self regulation of the internet. Filtering systems are commonly used in the US by state bodies such as schools or universities and also by parents. Such systems are supported by the government in the UK[520] and also by the EU.[521] Rating or filtering systems are problematic in free speech terms since they limit consumer choice and are frequently over-inclusive. They may also be under-inclusive in the sense that they do not affect a 513 For further information, see: www.iwf.org.uk.

514 This includes Internet Service Providers (ISPs), Mobile Operators and manufacturers, Content Service Providers (CSPs) and telecommunications and software companies.

515 See the DTI statement Secure Electronic Commerce Statement (London 1998 at www.dti.gov.uk/CII/ana27p.html) para iv; Memorandum by John Battle MP, Minister for Science, Energy and Industry, House of Commons Adjournment Debate 'HMG Strategy for the Internet' 18.3.98, www.dti.gov.uk/Minspeech/btkspch3.htm.

516 It claims on its website that the use of its hotline reporting system has reduced the amount of illegal content hosted in the UK from 18% in 1997 to less than 1% in 2003. Under this system ISPs can combat abuse of their services by operating a 'notice and take down' service which alerts them to any illegal content found on their system; they can report material to the IWF which then passes on any relevant details to the law enforcement agencies.

517 'Rating and Filtering Internet Content – A UK Perspective' March 1998, at www.Internetwatch.org.uk/rating.html.

518 The Platform for internet Content Selections is a vetting system that prevents the display on the computer of certain material. It can cover a range of specified material and is added by an independent vetting body, the publisher of the material, or an ISP.

519 Filtering software, such as Cyberpatrol, can also be used to block or limit access to certain websites.

520 See notes 515 and 495 above.

521 See European Commission Communication, Illegal and Harmful Content on the Internet (COM(96) 487, Brussels,1996); but cf the Opinion of the Economic and Social Committee of the European Commission – OJEC, 98/C 214/08, 1998 at 29–32. See also Akdeniz, Y, 'The EU and illegal and harmful content on the Internet' (1998) 3(1) Journal of Civil Liberties 31.

number of aspects of internet-related communication, such as the use of chat-rooms. Thus, the objective of protecting children by the use of rating or filtering systems may not in fact be met, while at the same time adults may be prevented from accessing material posted on the internet. The free speech implications of the use of filtering software by state bodies was considered in the US in Mainstream Loudoun v Board of Trustees.[522] The Loudoun County public libraries provided internet access to their patrons subject to a number of restrictions; in particular, library computers were equipped with site-blocking software to block all sites displaying child pornography and obscene material and material deemed harmful to juveniles. The plaintiffs and the intervenors alleged that this policy violated their First Amendment rights since it 'impermissibly discriminates against protected speech on the basis of content and constitutes an unconstitutional prior restraint'. It was found that the policy should be subject to strict scrutiny; having examined it it was found that the policy was not necessary to prevent sexual harassment or access to obscenity or child pornography since other, less intrusive measures could have been adopted. Further, it was found that it was not narrowly tailored to meet the objectives asserted since less restrictive means were available to further the defendant's interests.[523]

The decision in Loudoun indicates that the pursuit of self-regulation by the use of rating or filtering systems by public authorities, such as schools, libraries or universities could be viewed as incompatible with rights of expression under Art 10. Clearly, as discussed above, the standards demanded under Art 10 at Strasbourg where children might be affected by explicit speech, are not as high as those maintained under the First Amendment. However, if, rather than use a filtering system, less restrictive measures were available in order to protect children, while leaving adults unaffected, state bodies might be expected to adopt them, although it must be noted that the European Court of Human Rights has not yet used the 'less restrictive measures' test in the context of explicit material.[524] This is in an instance in which, if a successful challenge to the policy of a particular public authority, such as a library, was mounted under Art 10, using s 7(1)(a) HRA, the body would merely have to change its policy; it would not be able to rely on s 6(2) HRA since no legislation mandates the use of filtering systems or provides public authorities with a discretion as to their use. However, as discussed in relation to films, it is unlikely that a challenge would be successful since the relevant Art 10 jurisprudence is so weak in its defence of explicit speech.

A less restrictive approach might involve relying on the Internet Content Rating Association (ICRA). The ICRA is an international, non-profit organisation of internet leaders. It states that its objective is to make the internet safer for children, by warning parents and others of the content of websites. It believes in an approach it terms: 'user empowerment - giving families the tools to control their online experience. When used voluntarily, tools like ICRA's empower families to match their online experience with their values, without compromising free expression or undermining other users' access to information and while respecting the rights of content providers'. The ICRA claims to make no ideological judgment about various sites. This labelling system would be less restrictive than a general filtering system such as the one used in Loudoun since the questionnaire used is specific.[525] However, it would still create the problem of blocking adult access to sites in pursuit of the objective of protecting children.[526]

522 2 FSupp 2d 783 (EDVa 1998) 24 FSupp 2d 552 (1998).

523 Sable Communications of California, Inc v FCC, 492 US 115 (1989) was relied upon.

524 See further Chapter 4, pp 276, 287–90.

It is perhaps understandable that the UK Government has not sought so far to follow the example of the US Government in terms of seeking to impose cyber-censorship. But concerns may be raised as to the regulation by the IWF. It is a private, not a public, body although it could be viewed as having a public role of sorts, since it has government backing. But its role as an essentially private self-regulatory body means that it is not formally accountable to the public. In particular, any infringement of free speech principles by its activities would probably be outside the HRA since it may not be a functional public authority[527] and no statute governs its activities.

Applying criminal law to web-based material

The US has sought to suppress and restrict sexually explicit expression on the internet; initially by means of the Communications Decency Act 1996; but its main provisions were struck down as unconstitutional on the basis of over-breadth.[528] In so doing, the Supreme Court found, following a number of precedents relating to other media, that if restraints aimed at protecting children also affect adults disproportionately, they may not be used as the means of denying children access to sexually explicit material. In other words, traditional free speech principles were applied to the internet. So a more narrowly targeted provision in terms of cyber-censorship was needed, if it was to survive challenges. The 1996 Act was followed by the more narrowly drafted Child Online Protection Act 1998.

In contrast, no statute with special application has so far been introduced in the UK. Instead, amendments have been made to existing statutes creating criminal liability in 525 It employs ‘the ICRA questionnaire’. This asks content providers to check which of the 45 elements in the questionnaire are present or absent from their websites. This then generates a short piece of computer code known as an ICRA label that the webmaster then adds to his/her site. Users can then use filtering software to allow or disallow access to websites, based on the information declared in the label. The ICRA does not itself rate internet content; the content providers do that, using the ICRA labelling system.

526 See further Lessig, L and Resnick, P, ‘Zoning Speech on the Internet: A Legal and Technical Model’ (1999) 98 Michigan Law Rev 395, discussing methods of seeking to ensure that ISPs can recognise that the recipient of a communication is a child.

527 In particular, it is not strongly linked to a core public authority, although as indicated it does have the support of government Departments. It is the weakest regulator discussed in this book, but it is similar in some respects to the Press Complaints Commission which probably is a public authority. For example they both have no statutory underpinning or association with statutes, apart from the recognition of the PCC in the HRA, s 12. See further Chapter 4, pp 216–35 on the emerging legal explanations of the functional public authority concept.

528 Reno v ACLU 521 US 844. For further information on the struggle between the American Civil liberties Union (ACLU) and official attempts to curb expression on the internet, see the ACLU site: www.aclu.org/issues/cyber/hmcl.html, 2000. The CDA made it a crime, punishable by up to two years in jail and/or a $250,000 fine, for anyone to engage in speech that is ‘indecent’ or ‘patently offensive’ on computer networks, if the speech can be viewed by a minor. The ACLU argued that the censorship provisions are unconstitutional because they would criminalize expression that is protected by the First Amendment and because the terms ‘indecency’ and ‘patently offensive’ are unconstitutionally overbroad and imprecise. See Vick, D [1998] 61 MLR 414 on the Supreme Court decision.

relation to explicit expression in order to apply them to web-based material. The situation is similar in Australia where the Broadcasting Services Amendment (Online Services) Act 1999 (Cth) drew the internet within the generally applicable prior restrictions on sexually explicit expression.[529] As discussed above, explicit web-based material can be considered within the Obscene Publications Act 1959, as amended (OPA). Section 168 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 added the transmission of electronically stored data to the Obscene Publication Act's definition of 'publication'. Creating a link from a UK-based web-page to another in another jurisdiction on which obscene material is posted arguably amounts to 'publication'.[530] In Graham Waddon,[531] the defendant was convicted of the offence under s 2(1) of the 1959 Act on the basis that he had maintained a website in the USA onto which he had uploaded obscene material from the UK. Thus the fact that the material was placed on a US-based website did not prevent the defendant from being charged and convicted of the s 2(1) offence in England.

But in general there are, in practice, particular problems in applying the Obscene Publications Act (and its equivalent in Scotland – the Civil Government (Scotland) Act 1982) to web-based material. For example, the definition of obscenity is a relative one, dependent on the susceptibilities of those who are likely to encounter the material.[532] Web-based erotic and pornographic material, including material from '18'- or 'R18'-rated films, is available on a range of websites to any user who possesses a computer of the correct specification, although a credit card would often have to be used to gain access to it. Children can therefore gain access to such material and images, and the question of the obscenity of the material might therefore have to be determined by reference to that likely audience, depending on the circumstances, including the nature of the website and the likelihood that children would be able to access it. It would be harder to establish the extent of the likelihood that children might access the information than it is to make the same calculation in relation to print material, although probably it would be as hard as it is in relation to videos. But videos are of course regulated by the BBFC and it is an offence in itself to publish an unclassified video, without reference to its obscenity or indecency. Further, the BBFC has already taken the decision to continue to censor video films beyond the demands of the criminal law, thereby obviating the possibility of a prosecution under the 1959 Act, a decision which is, in effect, as discussed above, a compromise between defending adult autonomy and risking the promulgation of pornography to children. Since the internet is not subject to the policing of an equivalent regulator, this problem is more significant in that context.

Although the thrust of UK policy in relation to web-based pornography is against individual consumers under the OPA, where the manager of the ISP happens to be in this jurisdiction successful prosecution can occur. At least one successful prosecution

529 For discussion and criticism of the Act, see Chen, P 6(1) UNSWLJ.

530 See Akdeniz, Y, 'To link or not to link?' (1997) 11(2) International Review of Law, Computers and Technology 281.

531 (1999) Southwark Crown Court, 30 June; appeal dismissed 6 April 2000.

532 See pp 470–72 above.

has been brought against a web page provider – R v Perrin.[533] In that judgment a number of findings were made that were intended to adapt obscenity law so as to catch web-based pornography, addressing some of the issues discussed above. The defence argued that the only relevant publication of the web page was to the police officer who had downloaded it, and therefore it was wrong to test obscenity by reference to others who might have gained access to the preview page, and it was very unlikely that it would be visited by accident. However, the Court of Appeal accepted that there was publication whenever anyone accessed the preview page. No evidence that children would be likely to access it or had accessed it was put forward, but the Court appeared to assume that this was a possibility and that therefore the obscenity of the material could be judged against that likely audience. The lack of interest in the evidence in relation to children could be viewed as creating an appearance of departure from the basic principle of relative obscenity. The Court also rejected the suggestion that a prosecution should only be brought against a publisher where the prosecutor could show that the major steps in relation to publication were taken within the jurisdiction of the court. The possibility that the main steps towards publication might have occurred in another jurisdiction with less restrictive laws (the US) was not accepted as relevant. In relation to Art 10 the Court found: ‘In the result we are satisfied that the statutory provision relied upon does fall within the scope of Article 10:2. For a legitimate purpose the offence was prescribed by law. Parliament was entitled to conclude that the prescription was necessary in a democratic society.’ In other words, the Court refused to look beyond the balance that Parliament had struck in amending the OPA in 1994 order to include the internet. This was a highly restrictive interpretation of Art 10 since the Court refused to accept that it itself had a responsibility, under s 6 HRA, to examine the application of the law, taking the requirements of proportionality into account, in the instant case.

In general the gravest problem facing the UK authorities is the practical one of seeking to bring prosecutions against ISPs operating abroad. Clearly, jurisdictions differ greatly as to the speech that they criminalise. This potentially places both the national authorities and the Internet Service Providers in a difficult, almost impossible, position. If national laws could be enforced against ISPs regardless of jurisdiction, they would be forced to limit the provision of material on websites very severely since they would have to obey the most draconian and restrictive of the speech laws available.[534]

533 [2002] EWCA Crim 747, CA. This case involved a French national based in the UK who was publishing from abroad (in the USA). The appellant was convicted of publishing an obscene article and appealed. The obscene article in question was a webpage on the internet. It depicted people covered in faeces, coprophilia or coprophagia, and men involved in fellatio. That webpage was in the form of a trailer, a preview, available free of charge to any one with access to the internet. Any one wanting more of the type of material which it displayed could click on to a link marked ‘subscription to our best filthy sites’ and could gain access to a further webpage by providing credit card details. The preview webpage was accessed by an officer with the Obscene Publications Unit. To reach it a viewer would have to type in the name of the site, or conduct a search for material of the kind displayed.

534 This was pointed out on behalf of the defence in R v Perrin [2002] EWCA Crim 747, CA, referring to ‘the world wide accessibility of the Internet’ and the opinion of the United States Court of Appeal was relied on to the effect that (Third Circuit) in ACLU v Reno (No 3) [2000] 217 F.3d 162 at 168–69 any court or jury asked to consider whether there has been publication by a defendant of a webpage which is obscene should be instructed to consider first where the major steps in relation to publication took place, and only to convict if satisfied that those steps took place within the jurisdiction of the court. As discussed, this argument was not accepted by the Court of Appeal.

As Barendt points out:

> Website operators and other senders may have no idea who picks up their messages and which jurisdiction they live in, so the law imposes a great burden of them if they can be prosecuted whenever, say, a sexually explicit communication is accessed by a child, or extremist speech is accessed by anyone living in a country with strict hate speech laws.[535]

On the other hand, the national authorities are placed in an impossible position since they may well be unable to enforce sanctions against ISPs who are in another jurisdiction that is unlikely to aid in the enforcement of stricter national laws than it itself recognises. Such countries would be likely to have little interest in prosecuting. Publishers might take the main steps towards internet publication in countries with the most relaxed laws. According to the UK Government, very little potentially illegal pornographic material found on the internet originates from within the UK.[536] It appears probable that the lack of UK-hosted material is the result of the deterrent effect of the OPA and the Civil Government (Scotland) Act 1982.

Thus the UK is a more restrictive jurisdiction which the government views as in an especially difficult position in terms of holding the line against internet material hosted on websites outside the jurisdiction. The UK is addressing these problems, as discussed below, partly by enforcing laws against explicit expression against the ultimate consumer rather than against the ISP, and partly through voluntary regulation of the internet. In relation to extreme adult pornography the government stated recently in its Consultation Paper on The Possession of Extreme Pornographic Material:[537] ‘the global nature of the internet means that it is very difficult to prosecute those responsible for publication who are mostly operating from abroad’. The paper is consulting on the introduction of a new offence of mere possession of ‘extreme pornographic’ material – an offence that has not existed previously in UK law. In its Consultation Paper the government noted that it is already illegal to publish such material under the Obscene Publications Act 1959 and, in Scotland, under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. However, it pointed out that the global nature of the internet means that it is very difficult to prosecute those responsible for publication who tend to operate from abroad.

So the proposal is to make illegal the possession of a limited range of extreme pornographic material featuring adults. The intention is that the new legislation would introduce provisions to operate alongside the OPA that would mirror the provisions already in place in respect of indecent photographs of children.[538] A new offence would be created of ‘simple possession of extreme pornographic material which is graphic and sexually explicit and which contains actual scenes or realistic depictions of serious violence, bestiality or necrophilia.’ The intention is not to add an offence of possession to the OPA but to create a new freestanding offence to operate alongside the OPA

535 See Barendt Freedom of Speech 2nd edn (2005) Chapter 13 p 452.

536 It notes in its 2005 Consultation paper (fn 537 below) that the Internet Watch Foundation (IWF) received no reports of UK-hosted material in 2003 or 2004.

537 Home Office 30.8.05 – URL: news.bbc.co.uk/1 shared/bsp/hi/pdfs/30 08 05 porn doc.pdf.

538 The offence of possession of child pornography under the Protection of Children Act 1978 s1, discussed below.

1959 and the Civic Government Act and to increase the sentence for publishing under those other two statutes in order to emphasise the difference between possession and publication. The Consultation paper states: 'We believe the material which is under consideration would be abhorrent to most people and has no place in our society. Our intention in proposing a possession offence is to try to break the demand/supply cycle.' The offence would be limited to explicit actual scenes or realistic depictions of the specified types of material. The term 'explicit' indicates that the offence would cover activity which can be clearly seen and is not hidden, disguised or implied. The intention is also only to cover actual images or realistic depictions of the activities listed. It is not intended therefore to cover text or cartoons. This follows the precedent of the Protection of Children Act (PCA) 1978, s 1 of which covers pseudo-photographs.

The similar child pornography offence under the PCA s 1 requires possession for gain. However, as far as the internet is concerned, possession has been criminalised since downloading child pornography from the internet is covered by the PCA; it has been found to constitute the 'making' of a photograph or pseudo-photograph.[539] It is not intended that the new offence will depend on bringing the material within the definition of 'obscenity'. The aim is to close a gap in the OPA: at present it only covers possession for gain. Thus, downloading adult pornography is not covered by the OPA since making a photograph not for gain is not covered. The new offence would close that gap and bring the OPA into line with the PCA. It would also possibly criminalise the possession of some material that might not be deemed obscene. The obscenity of material is judged by reference to its likely audience; the current proposal appears to proceed on the basis that some material should not be possessed, regardless of the likelihood that it would be encountered by anyone other than members of a willing audience. The new offence is aimed at the internet, but would not be confined to it. It would represent an extremely significant extension of the law relating to explicit speech. The justifications for its introduction are weak: it is unlikely that it would break the demand/supply link since the ISPs involved would still have an audience in a range of countries with less restrictive laws. The evidence that the availability of such material causes harm is inconclusive, as the government admits in the Paper.

The experience in the US indicates that forms of self-regulation of the internet provide a more sensitive, nuanced and, arguably, more effective form of restraint than creating broad criminal sanctions relating to explicit material on websites. However, the restraints on the internet described above indicate that the situation in the UK is a confused and anomalous one. The criminal law has been applied in an arguably over-inclusive fashion. An imprecise and archaic law – the Obscene Publications Act – has been afforded a very broad interpretation in R v Perrin[540] that applies it to a relatively new medium. The same could be said of the interpretation of the PCA in R v Bowden.[541] The OPA creates restrictions in the UK that are not duplicated in a number of other jurisdictions; if the new possession offence is introduced, that position will be exacerbated. At the same time public authorities, such as libraries and schools, are drifting into a situation similar to that appertaining in the US, whereby rating and filtering systems are used to block access to a number of websites, without full inquiry into the over-inclusiveness of such systems or the value judgments underlying them. The decision so far of the UK Government not to follow the dubious US example in seeking to introduce general legislation to protect children in this context is a readily defensible one, but the lack of government intervention or – it appears – of recognition of the potential problems could lead to an overly restrictive stance. The analogy of book-burning has been used quite frequently[542] to describe the scenario that might arise in the UK, whereby cyber-censorship creates the same effect, but in a hidden fashion, in relation to controversial and explicit expression in cyberspace.

539 [2000] 2 All ER 418. See further p 478 above.
540 [2002] EWCA Crim 747, CA.
541 [2000] 2 All ER 418.

7 Conclusions

The Williams Committee recommended in 1979 that the printed word should not be subject to any restraint and that other material should be restrained on the basis of two specific tests: first, material which might shock should be available only through restricted outlets; second, material should not be prohibited unless it could be shown to cause specific harm.[543] Clearly, these proposals would give greater weight to freedom of expression than is currently given, in that they would allow greater differentiation between the kinds of harm which might be caused by different forms of material, an emphasis on inquiring into whether harm is or could be caused by the promulgation of pornography to a willing adult audience, and in particular they could have led to the abolition of the uncertain and almost unworkable 'deprave and corrupt' test. The Committee emphasised a fundamental difference between the prohibition and the restriction of the sale of pornography and other explicit material.

These proposals found partial expression in the Indecent Displays (Control) Act 1981, the provisions under the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1982 for regulating 'sex establishments' and the Cinematograph (Amendment) Act 1982, which changed the classification of films and in particular introduced the 'R18' rating. The proposal as to removing the prohibition as opposed to restriction from the written word and from much other pornographic material has not been implemented[544] and various far-reaching restraints remain, including the use of forfeiture proceedings and the uncertain offence of outraging public decency, both tending to undermine the safeguards for artistic freedom contained in the 1959 Act.

It seems that, if there is to be radical reform of the law relating to obscenity, indecency, regulation and censorship, the government will have to take the initiative. As indicated, the inception of the HRA has not brought about sweeping change, and is very unlikely to do so. The UK position in respect of restraints on freedom of speech in the name of the protection of morality does not appear to breach Art 10. In any event, the preoccupation of the domestic judiciary with the value of political expression and decisions such as those in Knuller and Gibson do not suggest that there is a determination on the part of the judiciary to import greater certainty and liberality into the restriction and regulation of explicit expression. Similarly, after the decisions in the Handyside case and in Müller v Switzerland,[545] it seems unlikely that there will be any UK move towards greater protection of freedom of speech in this area by recourse to the European Convention on Human Rights at Strasbourg. It may be assumed that the exception contained in Art 10(2) in respect of the protection of morals will continue to be widely interpreted because the European Court of Human Rights will continue to allow a wide margin of appreciation to member states in this very sensitive area. However, as indicated above, there are strong grounds for expecting the domestic judiciary to take a stance under the HRA towards expression offensive to religious sensibilities which differs from that taken at Strasbourg. In so far as political expression is affected, especially by aspects of media regulation, the domestic judiciary now have the opportunity to take a more intrusive stance towards furthering the protection of such expression, under the HRA. This may be a very important development in the domestic political expression jurisprudence.

542 See the ACLU Report www.aclu.org/issues/cyber/burning.html, 1997.

543 See the recommendations of the Williams Committee (Report of the Committee on Obscenity and Film Censorship Cmnd 7772, 1979); Simpson, op. cit., fn 1; for commentary, see McKean, WA [1980] CLJ 10; Coldham, S (1980) 43 MLR 306; Dworkin, op. cit., fn 1.

544 For further discussion of the Committee's position, see above, p 455.

The most significant decisions about what it is acceptable for people to see or hear are taken by media regulators, not by courts. The discussion demonstrated that regulation is subject to rapid change which to an extent reflects the rapidly changing technological environment in the visual as opposed to the print sector. But it is suggested that regulation has not kept pace with such technological change, and in particular with the impact of the internet and with developments in Western broadcasting. Developments in broadcasting and in internet access have lead to a globalisation of outlook in the current younger generation – an expectation that standards relating to explicit expression in the more progressive Western countries will be broadly in harmony with each other, while strongly differing standards will not be apparent across the different audio-visual sectors. The discussion reveals that such expectations are not being met, while justifications for maintaining anomalous differences between the sectors or for taking a specifically UK-based stance on offence-avoidance have not been forthcoming. At present, it will be suggested, the government is tending to avoid the difficult questions that harmonisation in both respects would create, in particular the question of the anomaly of non-regulation of the internet alongside regulation of broadcasting by Ofcom. The judiciary continues to prefer to defer to the decisions of regulators rather than accepting that it has a duty under the HRA to call them to account in terms of maintaining free expression standards.

The position of the visual media is particularly difficult in relation to such forms of expression. From a liberal standpoint, cuts in film or broadcast material on the basis of avoiding offence may be condemned as an infringement of autonomy, especially where they go beyond what is demanded by the criminal law.[546] There is general opposition to such censorship in other mediums in the absence of clear evidence of the concrete harm caused by the material.[547] However, explicit images conveyed in the print as opposed to the visual media may not only have less impact on people, but the encounter with them may represent more of a genuine choice. Liberals are willing to support restrictions on the outlets and public display of explicit material[548] on the ground that such restrictions do not necessarily spring from contempt for those who wish to view such material, but may simply reflect the genuine and personal aesthetic preferences of those who would rather not be confronted unexpectedly with offensive images.[549] The position of the broadcast media, film, the internet is more problematic since adults can normally protect themselves from offence. Following the liberal argument from autonomy, the provision of information and advice in order to warn persons of the content of particular films or broadcasts is clearly acceptable. Provision of such information, far from infringing personal autonomy, upholds it. But cuts or outright bans of visual material aimed at adult audiences, beyond the requirements of the criminal law, represent a failure to respect the right of adults to choose their own diverse forms of entertainment, within the law.

545 See further Feingold, C, 'The Little Red Schoolbook and the European Court of Human Rights' (1978) Revue des Droits de l'Homme 21.

546 See Schauer, F, Free Speech: A Philosophical Enquiry, 1982, Chapters 5 and 6; Feldman, D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights, 2nd edn, 2002, 13.2; Tucker, DFB, Law, Liberalism and Free Speech, 1985, 11–56; Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 2nd edn, 2005, Chapter 1; see also above, pp 301–2.

547 See Feinberg, J, The Moral Limits of the Criminal Law: Offense to Others, 1985. For a brief discussion of the possible link between pornography and the commission of sexual offences, see above, pp 456–60.

548 Such as, e.g., the recommendations of the Williams Committee (Report of the Committee on Obscenity and Film Censorship Cmnd 7772, 1979); see their 'Summary of our proposals'.

549 See Dworkin, R, 'Do we have a right to Pornography?' in A Matter of Principle (1985) pp 355–58, where he broadly endorses the Williams Committee's proposals.

Chapter 7

Official secrecy; access to state information

1 Introduction[1]

This chapter is concerned with restraints upon access to information created directly or indirectly by the law governing the release of sensitive government information, of 'official secrets'. It also considers the corollary – the positive rights to access to information held by public authorities now granted by the Freedom of Information Act 2000 (FoI), which came into force on 1 January 2005. This Act is not, strictly speaking, an aspect of the law of freedom of expression; since it gives positive rights to information, it does not, strictly, affect media free expression: it does not place restraints upon what the media may publish; rather it assists media bodies in their attempts to extract information from public authorities.[2] This is the stance taken at Strasbourg: Article 10 does not, as discussed below, offer rights of access to information. The Act is of concern in free expression terms in that it is very likely that journalists, along with opposition politicians and campaigners, as well as concerned individuals, will make particular use of it, in order to obtain information. This Chapter offers a brief treatment, taking account of developments since the Act came into force, because the Act is relevant to the overall position of the media as it seeks to hold government to account. For example, the law on disclosure of journalistic sources is difficult to assess without some knowledge of the means by which information about bodies such as hospitals, the police, and local authorities may be freely obtainable.

In contrast, the law on official secrecy has some direct application in free expression terms: there are indeed particular provisions of the Official Secrets Act that are aimed specifically at journalists,[3] while the restrictions the Act lays upon, for example, members of the security services, directly affects their ability to tell their stories through the media, as in the notorious David Shayler affair,[4] considered in detail below.

1 General reading, see: Birkinshaw, P, Freedom of Information: The Law, the Practice and the Ideal, 4th edn, 2005; Vincent, D, The Culture of Secrecy, Britain 1832–1998, 1998, OUP; Feldman, D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 2nd edn, 2002, Chapter 14; Bailey, SH, Harris, DJ and Jones, BL, Civil Liberties: Cases and Materials, 5th edn, 2001, Chapter 7; Baxter, JD, State Security, Privacy and Information, 1990, Macmillan; Shetreet, S (ed), Free Speech and National Security, 1991, Dordrecht; Gill, P, Policing Politics: Security, Intelligence and the Liberal Democratic State, 1994, Frank Cass; Lustgarten, L and Leigh, I, In From the Cold: National Security and Parliamentary Democracy, 1994, Clarendon; Whitty, N, Murphy, T and Livingstone, S, Civil Liberties Law, 2001, Chapter 7.

2 See for example Austin, R, 'Freedom of information: – a Sheep in Wolf's Clothing?', in Jowell, J and Oliver, D, The Changing Constitution, 5th edn, 2004, OUP.

3 See below at pp 602–5.

The overall concern of this chapter is with the degree to which a proper balance has been and is currently being struck between the interest of the individual in acquiring information and the interest of the state and public authorities in withholding it. Clearly, there are genuine public interests, including that of protecting national security, in keeping some information out of the public domain; the question is whether other interests that do not correspond with and may even be opposed to the interests of the public are also at work. Initially, it may be said that in the UK, the area of control over government information is one in which the state's supposed interest in keeping information secret has in general prevailed very readily over the individual interest in question. It has often been said that the UK is more obsessed with keeping government information secret than any other Western democracy.[5] It is clearly advantageous for the party in power to be able to control the flow of information in order to prevent public scrutiny of certain official decisions and in order to be able to release information selectively at convenient moments. The British Government has available a number of methods of keeping official information secret, including the deterrent effect of criminal sanctions under the Official Secrets Act 1989, the Civil Service Conduct Code,[6] around 80 statutory provisions engendering secrecy in various areas and the civil action for breach of confidence. The situation of the civil servant in the UK who believes that disclosure as to a certain state of affairs is necessary in order to serve the public interest may therefore be contrasted with the situation of his or her counterpart in the US, where he or she would receive protection from detrimental action flowing from whistle-blowing[7] under the Civil Service Reform Act 1978. A weak form of a public interest defence might have been adopted under proposals in the then government's White Paper on freedom of information, published in July 1993.[8] It was proposed that the disclosure of information would not be penalised if the information was not 'genuinely confidential'. But when the Labour Government introduced the Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998, crown servants involved in security and intelligence activities, or those whose 'whistle-blowing' breaches the 1989 Act, were expressly excluded from its ambit, leaving them unprotected from employment detriment.

The UK has traditionally resisted freedom of information legislation and, until 1989, criminalised the unauthorised disclosure of any official information at all, however trivial, under s 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911, thereby creating a climate of secrecy in the Civil Service which greatly hampered the efforts of those who wished to obtain and publish information about the workings of government. The Freedom of Information Act 2000 (FoI) signalled a break with the traditional culture of secrecy: 'the principle

4 For an overall look at the implications of that episode, see Best, K 'The Control of Official Information: Implications of the Shayler Affair' (2000) 5(6) Journal of Civil Liberties 18.

5 E.g., Robertson, G, Freedom, the Individual and the Law, 1989, pp 129–31.

6 See Drewry, G and Butcher, T, The Civil Service Today, 1991, Blackwell. It should be pointed out that the Civil Service Code, which came into force on 1 January 1996, contains a partial 'whistle-blowing' provision in paras 11–12.

7 For discussion of the situation of UK and US civil servants and developments in the area, see Cripps, Y, 'Disclosure in the public interest: the predicament of the public sector employee' [1983] PL 600; Zellick, 'Whistle-blowing in US law' [1987] PL 311–13; Starke (1989) 63 ALJ 592–94.

8 Open Government, 1993, HMSO.

that communication was the privilege of the state rather than of the citizen was at last . . . reversed.'[9]

2 Official secrets

Section 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911[10]

During the nineteenth century, as government departments grew larger and handled more official information, the problem of confidentiality grew more acute. Internal circulars such as the 1873 Treasury minute entitled The Premature Disclosure of Official Information urged secrecy on all members of government departments and threatened the dismissal of civil servants who disclosed any information; a Treasury minute issued in 1875 warned civil servants of the dangers of close links with the press.[11] The need for a further safeguard was emphasised in 1878 when one Marvin, who worked in the Foreign Office, gave details of a secret treaty negotiated between England and Russia to a particular newspaper. His motive appeared to be dissatisfaction with his job. He was prosecuted, but it was then discovered that no part of the criminal law covered the situation. He had memorised the information and thus had not stolen any document. He was not a spy and could not, therefore, be brought within the provisions of the Treason Act 1814. No conviction could be obtained and the Official Secrets Act 1889 was passed largely as a means of plugging the gap which had been discovered.

The 1889 Act made it an offence for a person wrongfully to communicate information obtained owing to his employment as a civil servant. However, the government grew dissatisfied with this measure; under its terms, the state had the burden of proving both mens rea and that the disclosure was not in the interests of the state. It was thought that a stronger measure was needed, and this led eventually to the passing of the Official Secrets Act 1911. It has often been suggested that the manner of its introduction into Parliament was disingenuous and misleading.[12] It was introduced apparently in response to fears of espionage and by the Secretary of State for War, not by the Home Secretary, giving the impression that it was largely an anti-espionage measure. Section 1 did deal largely with espionage, but s 2 was aimed not at enemy agents, but at English civil servants and other Crown employees. It was called, innocuously, 'an Act to re-enact the 1889 Act with amendments'. These disarming measures seem to have succeeded; it was passed in one afternoon and s 2 received no debate at all.

Section 2, which appeared to create a crime of strict liability, imposed a complete prohibition on the unauthorised dissemination of official information, however trivial. It is thought that the government clearly intended s 2 to have such a wide scope and had wanted such a provision for some time in order to prevent leaks of any kind of official information, whether or not connected with defence or national security.[13] It lacked any provision regarding the substance of the information disclosed so that technically it criminalised, for example, disclosure of the colour of the carpet in a minister's office.

9 Vincent, The Culture of Secrecy, Britain 1832–1998, 1998, p 321.
10 See Hooper, D, Official Secrets, 1987, Coronet, for history of the use of s 2.
11 See Robertson, op. cit., fn 5, at 53.
12 See The Franks Report, Cmnd 5104, 1972, para 50; Birkinshaw, op. cit., fn 1 at 76.
13 See ibid, at para 50.

It criminalised the receiver of information as well as the communicator, although there did appear to be a requirement of mens rea as far as the receiver was concerned; he or she had to know that the disclosure had occurred in contravention of the Act. Thus, it afforded no recognition to the role of the press in informing the public.

There were surprisingly few prosecutions under s 2; it seems likely that it created an acceptance of secrecy in the civil service which tended to preclude disclosure. In one of the few cases which did come to court, Fell,[14] the Court of Appeal confirmed that liability was not dependent on the contents of the document in question or on whether the disclosure would have an effect prejudicial to the interests of the state. The eventual demise of s 2 came about owing to a number of factors, of which one appears to have been the realisation that its draconian nature was perceived as unacceptable in a modern democracy and that therefore, convictions under it could not be assured. Such a realisation probably developed in response to the following three decisions.

Aitken and Others[15] arose from the disclosure by a reporter, Aitken, that the UK Government had misled the British people as to the amount of aid the UK was giving Nigeria in its war against Biafra. The government had suggested that it was supplying about 15% of Nigeria's arms, whereas the figure should have been about 70%. This figure derived from a government document called the Scott Report, which Aitken disclosed to the press. Aitken was then prosecuted under s 2 for receiving and passing on information, but the judge at trial, Caulfield J, clearly had little sympathy with a case seemingly brought merely to assuage government embarrassment and which disclosed no national security interest. Furthermore, the facts obtained from the Scott Report were obtainable from other sources. The judge found that a requirement of mens rea was needed and, moreover, effectively directed the jury to acquit in a speech which placed weight on the freedom of the press and suggested that it should prevail given the lack of a significant competing interest. He considered that s 2 should be 'pensioned off'.

Tisdall[16] also created some adverse publicity for the government owing to what was perceived as a very heavy handed use of s 2. Sarah Tisdall worked in the Foreign Secretary's private office, and in the course of her duties she came across documents relating to the delivery of cruise missiles to the RAF base at Greenham Common. She discovered proposals to delay the announcement of their delivery until after it had occurred and to make the announcement in Parliament at the end of question time in order to avoid answering questions. She took the view that this political subterfuge was morally wrong and therefore leaked the documents to the Guardian. However, they were eventually traced back to her. She pleaded guilty to an offence under s 2 and received a prison sentence of six months – an outcome which was generally seen as harsh.[17]

A similar situation arose in Ponting,[18] the case which is usually credited with sounding the death knell of s 2. Clive Ponting, a senior civil servant in the Ministry of Defence, was responsible for policy on the operational activities of the Royal Navy at a time when 14 [1963] Crim LR 207.

15 Unreported. See Aitken, J, Officially Secret, 1971, Weidenfeld and Nicolson.
16 (1984) The Times, 26 March.
17 See Cripps, op. cit., fn 7.
18 [1985] Crim LR 318; for comment, see Brewry, G, 'The Ponting case' [1985] PL 203, 212 and [1986] Crim LR 491.

opposition MPs, particularly Tam Dalyell, were pressing the government for information relating to the sinking of the Belgrano in the Falklands conflict. Michael Heseltine, then Secretary of State for Defence, decided to withhold such information from Parliament and therefore did not use a reply to Parliamentary questions drafted by Ponting. He used instead a much briefer version of it and circulated a confidential minute indicating that answers on the rules of engagement in the Falklands conflict should not be given to questions put by the Parliamentary Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. Feeling that opposition MPs were being prevented from undertaking effective scrutiny of the workings of government, Ponting sent the unused reply and the minute anonymously to the Labour MP, Tam Dalyell, who disclosed the documents to the press.

Ponting was charged with the offence of communicating information under s 2. The relevant sub-section reads:

> . . . it is an offence for a person holding Crown office to communicate official information to any person other than a person he is authorised to communicate it to or a person to whom it is in the interests of the state his duty to communicate it. [Emphasis added.]

The defence relied on the phrase the 'interests of the state', arguing that the term 'the state' should be interpreted as 'the organised community' rather than the government. This interpretation seemed to be warranted by part of Lord Reid's judgment in Chandler v DPP.[19] Thus, it could be argued that it was in the interests of the nation as a whole that Parliament should not be misled and that there was a moral duty to prevent this. The word 'duty' in s 2, it was claimed, therefore connoted a moral or public duty. However, the Crown relied upon other comments of Lord Reid in Chandler to the effect that where national security was a factor, the government would be the final arbiter of the state's interests. The judge, McCowan J, accepted this argument, finding that the 'interests of the state' were synonymous with those of the government of the day, and he therefore effectively directed the jury to convict. Despite this direction, they acquitted, presumably feeling that Ponting should have a defence if he was acting in the public interest in trying to prevent government suppression of matters of public interest. The prosecution and its outcome provoked a large amount of adverse publicity, the public perceiving it as an attempt at a cover up which had failed, not because the judge showed integrity, but because the jury did.[20]

The decision in Ponting suggested that the very width of s 2 was undermining its credibility; its usefulness in instilling a culture of secrecy owing to its catch-all quality was seen as working against it. The outcome of the case may have influenced the decision not to prosecute Cathy Massiter, a former officer in the Security Service, in respect of her claims in a Channel 4 programme screened in March 1985 (MI5's Official Secrets) that MI5 had tapped the phones of trade union members and placed leading CND members under surveillance.[21] Section 2's lack of credibility may also have been a factor in the

19 [1964] AC 763; [1962] 3 All ER 142, HL.

20 For comment on the decision, see Ponting, C, The Right to Know, 1985, Sphere; Brewry, G, op. cit., fn 18.

21 The Independent Broadcasting Association banned the programme pending the decision as to whether Massiter and the producers would be prosecuted. The decision not to prosecute was announced by decision to bring civil as opposed to criminal proceedings against the Guardian and The Observer in respect of their disclosure of Peter Wright's allegations in Spycatcher: civil proceedings for breach of confidence were, in many ways, more convenient and certainly less risky than a s 2 prosecution. No jury would be involved and a temporary injunction could be obtained quickly in ex parte proceedings. However, the government did consider that the criminal rather than the civil law was, in general, a more appropriate weapon to use against people such as Ponting, and therefore thought it desirable that an effective criminal sanction should be available. When the government was eventually defeated in the Spycatcher litigation, the need for such a sanction became clearer.[22]

There had already been a long history of proposals for the reform of s 2. The Franks Committee, which was set up in response to Caulfield J's comments in Aitken, recommended[23] that s 2 should be replaced by narrower provisions which took into account the nature of the information disclosed. The Franks proposals formed the basis of the government's White Paper on which the Official Secrets Act 1989 was based. There had been various other attempts at reform; those put forward as Private Members' Bills were the more liberal. For example, Clement Freud MP put forward an Official Information Bill[24] which would have created a public right of access to official information, while the Protection of Official Information Bill,[25] put forward by Richard Shepherd MP in 1987, would have provided a public interest defence and a defence of prior disclosure.

The Official Secrets Act 1989[26]

Once the decision to reform the area of official secrecy had been taken, an opportunity was created for radical change, which could have included freedom of information legislation along the lines of the instruments in America and Canada. However, it was made clear from the outset that the legislation was unconcerned with freedom of information.[27] It decriminalises disclosure of some official information, although an official who makes such disclosure may, of course, face an action for breach of confidence as well as disciplinary proceedings, but it makes no provision for allowing the release of any official documents into the public domain. Thus, claims made, for example, by Douglas Hurd (the then Home Secretary) that it is 'a great liberalising

Sir Michael Havers on 5 March 1985. An inquiry into telephone tapping by Lord Bridge reported on 6 March that all authorised taps had been properly authorised. This, of course, did not address the allegation that some tapping had been carried out although unauthorised.

22 AG v Guardian (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109 (see below, at 618–22).

23 Report of the Committee on s 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911, Cmnd 5104, 1972; see Birtles, W, 'Big brother knows best: the Franks Report on section 2 of the Official Secrets Act' [1973] PL 100.

24 1978–79, Bill 96.

25 1987–88, Bill 20.

26 For comment on the 1989 Act see Palmer, S, 'The Government proposals for reforming s 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911' [1988] PL 523; Hanbury, W, 'Illiberal reform of s 2' (1989) 133 Sol Jo 587; Palmer, S, 'Tightening secrecy law' [1990] PL 243; Griffith, J, 'The Official Secrets Act 1989' (1989) 16 JLS 273; Feldman, D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights, 1st edn, 1993, Chapter 14.3.

27 See the White Paper on s 2, Cmnd 7285, 1978; the Green Paper on Freedom of Information, Cmnd 7520, 1979; White Paper: Reform of the Official Secrets Act 1911, Cmnd 408, 1988.

measure' clearly rest on other aspects of the Act. Aspects which are usually viewed as liberalising features include the categorisation of information covered which makes relevant the substance of the information, the introduction of tests for harm, the mens rea requirement of ss 5 and 6, the defences available and decriminalisation of the receiver of information. In all these respects, the Act differs from its predecessor, but the nature of the changes led commentators to question whether they would bring about any real liberalisation.[28] Other aspects of the Act have also attracted criticism: it applies to persons other than Crown servants, including journalists; it contains no defences of public interest or of prior disclosure and no general requirement to prove mens rea. Thus, what is omitted from its provisions, including the failure to provide any right of access to information falling outside the protected categories, is arguably as significant as what is included. The Human Rights Act may provide a means of tempering the effects of the 1989 Act. There is obviously a tension between the two statutes, since the one binds public authorities – which includes government departments – under s 6 to observe the Convention rights, including the right to freedom of expression, while the other creates criminal liability for disclosure of information whether or not the disclosure is in the public interest. Further, the 1989 Act must be interpreted under s 3 of the HRA so as to render it compatible with the Convention rights. The tension between the two was explored in the preliminary hearing in the Shayler[29] case (discussed below) in which it was argued unsuccessfully that s 1 of the 1989 Act is incompatible with Art 10. Below, the possible effects of Art 10 on the Official Secrets Act are indicated.

Criminal liability for disclosing information

The general prohibition on disclosing information under the Official Secrets Act 1911 was replaced by the more specific prohibitions under the Official Secrets Act 1989. Sections 1–4 of the 1989 Act (excepting the provisions of s 1(1)), which also determine the categorisation of the information, all concern unauthorised disclosures by any present or former Crown servant or government contractor of information which has been acquired in the course of his or her employment. If a civil servant happens to acquire by other means information falling within one of the categories which he or she then disclosed, the provisions of s 5 apply. Section 7 (below) governs the meaning of 'authorisation', while ss 5 and 6 apply when any person – not only a Crown servant – discloses information falling within the protected categories.

Security and intelligence information is covered by s 1. The category covers 'the work of or in support of, the security and intelligence services' and includes 'references to information held or transmitted by those services or by persons in support of . . . those services'.[30] It is, therefore, a wide category and is not confined only to work done by members of the security and intelligence services. Section 1(1) is intended to prevent members or former members of the security services (and any person notified that he is subject to the provisions of the sub-section) disclosing anything at all relating or appearing to relate to[31] the operation of those services. All such members thus come under a lifelong duty to keep silent even though their information might reveal a serious abuse of power in the security services or some operational weakness. There is no need to show that any harm will or may flow from the disclosure, and so all information, however trivial, is covered. On its face, this blanket ban raises one of the most serious prima facie incompatibilities with Art 10. It is therefore worth examining briefly the government arguments for such a ban. Essentially, four main reasons are put forward.[32]

28 E.g., Ewing and Gearty, Freedom under Thatcher (1989), at 200.
29 Preparatory hearing: (2001) The Times, 10 October, 98(40) LSG 40; CA.
30 Section 1(9).

First, it is argued that disclosures by agents or former agents carry particular credibility; however this is presumably only relevant if the disclosure is in fact harmful. If the disclosure itself is anodyne, then its extra authority makes no difference. This therefore does not provide an argument for a blanket ban.

Second, it is said that such disclosures reduce confidence of the public in the security services' ability and loyalty. This is (a) speculative and (b) not very convincing. If non-harmful revelations were made, it is unlikely that they would affect the publics' view. Moreover, it begs the question why the public should have an exaggeratedly positive view of the ability of the security services. Why is it especially important that the public at large have a positive view of the abilities of the security services, any more than, say, the armed forces or the Cabinet?

Third, it is said that disclosures by agents or former agents ought to be criminal because of the special duty of secrecy that the members of the security service accept. This is a circular argument: that special duty of secrecy is imposed by the law – of the OSA, and the law of confidence. This cannot be an argument for determining what the law should in fact be.

Fourth, it is said that because governments do not traditionally comment on assertions about the security services, a false report made by a former agent could be as damaging as a true one, because it would go un-denied. Against this, it may be said that governments could simply make an exception to this general rule when a former agent is involved. Moreover, this argument again posits only a possible harm, that might come about in particular cases, not an invariable one. In fact, the government did deny aspects of the claims made by former agent David Shayler: in particular his assertion that the SIS had planned for the assassination of Colonel Gadaffi was vigorously rebutted.[33]

A further point to be noted about s 1(1) is that there is no defence that the material released was already in the public domain. This runs clearly counter to the finding both in Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers Ltd (No 2)[34] and in Observer and Guardian v UK[35] that the maintenance of a ban on the publication of information when it has entered the public domain is contrary to both common law and Art 10.[36]

Similar in nature to the blanket prohibition in section 1(1), and therefore considered here, is s 4(3), which covers information obtained by the use of intercept and security 31 Under s 1(2), misinformation falls within the information covered by s 1(1) as it includes 'making any statement which purports to be a disclosure of such information or which is intended to be taken as being such a disclosure'.

32 They are summarised in the White Paper, op. cit., fn 27 at para 40.

33 See Best, op. cit. fn 4, at 20.

34 [1990] 1 AC 109.

35 (1991) 14 EHRR 153; for comment see Leigh, I, 'Spycatcher in Strasbourg' [1992] PL 200–8.

36 As was argued in the Shayler case: see fn 52 below.

service warrants.[37] There is no harm test under this category. Thus, in so far as it covers the work of the security services, it creates a wide exception to the general need to show harm under s 1(3) when a Crown servant who is not a member of the security services makes a disclosure about the work of those services.

The government's defence of this blanket ban is as follows: 'no information obtained by means of interception can be disclosed without assisting terrorism or crime, damaging national security or seriously breaching the privacy of private citizens.'[38] This is simply implausible. As for the privacy point, the nature of the information gained through phone tapping (e.g., details of a large drug transaction) may barely engage private life, although the mode of interception does, and there may be very strong public interest arguments on the other side sufficient to make the interference with private life proportionate. The fact that privacy is in question does not begin to justify a blanket ban on disclosure: to have such a ban does not allow for a balancing between Arts 10 and 8 but simply creates an abrogation of one at the expense of the other. It is not clear that the first part of the statement can be taken seriously: whether any damage would be caused by such revelations would plainly depend upon what was disclosed, and what information revealed thereby about the techniques of the security services.

The White Paper also addressed the argument that there should be a general public interest to which all the offences in the Act would be subject. It first of all deliberately mis-characterises this argument – that there should be a defence of making revelations that were in the public interest, judged objectively – as being an argument that a defendant's good motivation should be a defence. The White Paper correctly states that the general rule is that motive is not relevant and that there are good grounds for sticking to this general rule.[39] This is true, but simply irrelevant: the argument about the public interest test does not revolve around motivation. The White Paper adds to this:

> the proposals in this White Paper are designed to concentrate the protection of the criminal law on information which demonstrably requires its protection in the public interest. It cannot be acceptable that a person can lawfully disclose information which he knows may, for example, lead to loss of life simply because he conceives that he has a general reason of a public character for doing so.[40]

This is extraordinarily poor reasoning. The first sentence is simply question-begging: by including a blanket ban on all disclosures by members and former members of the security services, it clearly covers information that is not required to be protected in the 37 This applies to (a) any information obtained by reason of the interception of any communication in obedience to a warrant issued under s 2 of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, any information relating to the obtaining of information by reason of any such interception and any document or other article which is or has been used or held for use in or has been obtained by reason of any such interception; and (b) any information obtained by reason of action authorised by a warrant issued under s 3 of the Security Service Act 1989, any information relating to the obtaining of information by reason of any such action and any document or other article which is or has been used or held for use in or has been obtained by reason of any such action.

38 The White Paper, op. cit., fn 27 at para 53.

39 Ibid at paras 59–60.

40 Ibid at para 60.

public interest. The example given is simply a gross exaggeration. No one is arguing for a defence for those who release information risking life; second, the wording 'because he conceives' implies that what is being argued for is a subjective test, rather than, of course, the actual objective public interest that is being proposed.

A more general, final concern about the White Paper is that it nowhere mentions Art 10 ECHR. As Lord Hope commented in Shayler, this 'leaves one with the uneasy feeling that . . . the problems which it raises were overlooked'.[41] The point is returned to below.

Section 1(3), which criminalises disclosure of information relating to the security services by a former or present Crown servant as opposed to a member of the security services, does include a test for harm under s 1(4) which provides that:

> a disclosure is damaging if:
>
> (a) it causes damage to the work of or any part of, the security and intelligence services; or
>
> (b) it is of information or a document or other article which is such that its unauthorised disclosure would be likely to cause such damage or which falls within a class or description of information, documents or articles the unauthorised disclosure of which would be likely to have that effect.

Taken at its lowest level, it is clear that this test may be very readily satisfied: it is not necessary to show that disclosure of the actual document in question has caused harm or would be likely to cause harm, merely that it belongs to a class of documents, disclosure of which would be likely to have that effect. Disclosure of a document containing insignificant information and incapable itself of causing the harm described under s 1(4)(a) can, therefore, be criminalised, suggesting that the importation of a harm test for Crown servants as opposed to members of the security services may not inevitably in practice create a very significant distinction between them. However, at the next level, harm must be likely to flow from disclosure of a specific document where, owing to its unique nature, it cannot be said to be one of a class of documents.

In such an instance, the ruling of the House of Lords in Lord Advocate v Scotsman Publications Ltd[42] suggests that the test for harm may be quite restrictively interpreted: it will be necessary to show quite a strong likelihood that harm will arise and the nature of the harm must be specified. The ruling was given in the context of civil proceedings for breach of confidence, but the House of Lords decided the case on the basis of the principles under the 1989 Act even though it was not then in force. The ruling concerned publication by a journalist of material relating to the work of the intelligence services. Thus, the test for harm had to be interpreted, according to s 5, in accordance with the test under s 1(3) as though the disclosure had been by a Crown servant. The Crown conceded that the information in question was innocuous, but argued that harm would be done because the publication would undermine confidence in the security services. The House of Lords, noting that there had already been a degree of prior publication, rejected this argument as unable alone to satisfy the test for harm. The case therefore gives some indication as to the interpretation the harm tests may receive. This ruling affords some protection for journalistic expression concerning the intelligence services which, under the HRA, would be in accordance with the high value Strasbourg has placed on expression critical of the workings of the state and state agents.[43]

41 [2003] 1AC 247, at para 41.

42 [1990] 1 AC 812; [1989] 2 All ER 852, HL; for criticism of the ruling, see Walker [1990] PL 354.

Even taken at its highest level, the harm test is potentially very wide because of its open-textured wording. It states, in effect, that a disclosure of information in this category is damaging if it causes damage to the area of government operation covered by the category. No clue is given as to what is meant by 'damage'; in many cases it would, therefore, be impossible for a Crown servant to determine beforehand whether or not a particular disclosure would be criminal. The only safe approach would be non-disclosure of almost all relevant information; the position of Crown servants under the 1989 Act in relation to information in this category is therefore only with some difficulty to be distinguished from that under the 1911 Act. However, the fact that there is a test for harm at all under s 1(3), however weak, affirms a distinction of perhaps symbolic importance between two groups of Crown servants because the first step in determining whether a disclosure may be criminalised is taken by reference to the status of the person making the disclosure rather than by the nature of the information, suggesting that s 1(1) is aimed at underpinning a culture of secrecy in the security services rather than at ensuring that no damaging disclosure is likely to be made.

Section 2 covers information relating to defence. What is meant by 'defence' is set out in s 2(4):

(a) the size, shape, organisation, logistics, order of battle, deployment, operations, state of readiness and training of the armed forces of the Crown;
(b) the weapons, stores or other equipment of those forces and the invention, development, production and operation of such equipment and research relating to it;
(c) defence policy and strategy and military planning and intelligence;
(d) plans and measures for the maintenance of essential supplies and services that are or would be needed in time of war.

It must be shown that the disclosure in question is or would be likely to be damaging as defined under s 2(2):

(a) it damages the capability of, or of any part of, the armed forces of the Crown to carry out their tasks or leads to loss of life or injury to members of those forces or serious damage to the equipment or installations of those forces; or
(b) otherwise than as mentioned in para (a) above, it endangers the interests of the United Kingdom abroad, seriously obstructs the promotion or protection by the United Kingdom of those interests or endangers the safety of British citizens abroad; or
(c) it is of information or of a document or article which is such that its unauthorised disclosure would be likely to have any of those effects.

43 See Thorgeirson v Iceland (1992) 14 EHRR 843; The Observer and the Guardian v UK (1991) 14 EHRR 153.

The first part of this test under (a), which is fairly specific and deals with quite serious harm, may be contrasted with (b), which is much wider. The opening words of (b) may mean that although the subject of the harm may fall within (a), the level of harm can be considered within (b) since it does not fall within terms denoting harm used in (a). This could occur where, for example, there had been damage as opposed to 'serious damage' to installations abroad. Clearly, this interpretation would allow the harm test to be satisfied in a wider range of situations. On this interpretation, as far as disclosures concerning UK armed forces operating abroad are concerned, it would seem that (b) renders (a) largely redundant, so that (a) would tend to play a role only where the disclosure concerned operations within the UK. It may be noted that parts of this test are mere verbiage; it would be hard to draw a significant distinction between 'endangering' and 'seriously obstructing' the interests of the UK abroad. In fact, the overlapping of the harm tests within the categories and across the categories is a feature of this statute; the reasons why this may be so are considered below.

Information relating to international relations falls within s 3(1)(a). This category covers disclosure of 'any information, document or other article relating to international relations'. Clarification of this provision is undertaken by s 3(5), which creates a test to be used in order to determine whether information falls within it. First, it must concern the relations between states, between international organisations or between an international organisation and a state; second, it is said that this includes matter which is capable of affecting the relation between the UK and another state or between the UK and an international organisation. The harm test arises under s 3(2) and is identical to that arising under s 2(2)(b) and (c).

Section 3(1)(b) refers to confidential information emanating from other states or international organisations. This category covers 'any confidential information, document or other article which was obtained from a state other than the United Kingdom or an international organisation'. Clearly, the substance of this information might differ from that covered under s 3(1)(a), although some documents might fall within both categories. Under s 3(6), the information will be confidential if it is expressed to be so treated due to the terms under which it was obtained or if the circumstances in which it was obtained impute an obligation of confidence. The harm test under this category contained in s 3(3) is somewhat curious: the mere fact that the information is confidential or its nature or contents 'may' be sufficient to establish the likelihood that its disclosure would cause harm within the terms of s 3(2)(b) (which uses the terms of s 2(2)(b)). In other words, once the information is identified as falling within this category, a fiction is created that harm may automatically flow from its disclosure. This implies that there are circumstances (such as a particularly strong quality of confidentiality?) in which the only ingredient which the prosecution must prove is that the information falls within the category.

Given that s 3(3) uses the word 'may', thereby introducing uncertainty into the section, there is greater leeway for imposing a Convention-friendly interpretation on it. If the word 'may' is interpreted strictly, the circumstances in which it would be unnecessary to show harm would be greatly curtailed. It could then be argued that since harm or its likelihood must be shown, the harm test itself must be interpreted compatibly with Art 10. It would have to be shown that the interference in question answered to a pressing social need.[44] Depending on the circumstances, it could be argued that if, ultimately, the 'interests of the UK abroad' would be benefited by the disclosure, or on balance little affected, no pressing social need to interfere with the expression in question could be shown.

Section 4 is headed 'crime and special investigation powers'. Section 4(2) covers any information the disclosure of which:

(a) . . . results in the commission of an offence; or facilitates an escape from legal custody or the doing of any other act prejudicial to the safekeeping of persons in legal custody; or impedes the prevention or detection of offences or the apprehension or prosecution of suspected offenders; or
(b) which is such that its unauthorised disclosure would be likely to have any of those effects.

'Legal custody' includes detention in pursuance of any enactment or any instrument made under an enactment (s 4(6)). In contrast to s 3(3), in which the test for harm may be satisfied once the information is identified as falling within the category, in s 4(2), once the test for harm has been satisfied, the information will necessarily be so identified. As with s 2, parts of this test could have been omitted, such as 'facilitates an escape', which would have been covered by the succeeding general words.

Section 5 is headed, 'information resulting from unauthorised disclosures or entrusted in confidence'. This is not a new category. Information will fall within s 5 if it falls within one or more of the previous categories and it has been disclosed to the defendant by a Crown servant or falls within s 1 of the Official Secrets Act 1911. Section 5 is primarily aimed at journalists who receive information leaked to them by Crown servants, although it could of course cover anybody in that position. It is also aimed at the person to whom a document is entrusted by a Crown servant 'on terms requiring it to be held in confidence or in circumstances in which the Crown servant or government contractor could reasonably expect that it would be so held'.[45] The difference between entrusting and disclosing is significant in that, in the former instance, the document – but not the information it contains – will have been entrusted to the care of the person in question.[46]

These provisions are presumably aimed mainly at the journalist or other non-Crown servant who receives the information from another journalist who received it from the civil servant in question. However, this does not apply where the information has been entrusted to the defendant, but has never been disclosed to him or her; in that case, it must come directly from the civil servant, not from another person who had it entrusted to him or her.[47] The disclosure of the information or document by the person into whose possession it has come must not already be an offence under any of the six categories.

44 Sunday Times v UK (1979) 2 EHRR 737.
45 Section 5(1)(ii)).
46 If the Crown servant has disclosed or entrusted it to another who discloses it to the defendant, this will suffice (s 5(1)(a)(i) and (iii)).
47 Section 5(1)(b)(ii)).

Since s 5 is aimed at journalists and potentially represents an interference with their role of informing the public, it requires a very strict interpretation under s 3 of the HRA, in accordance with Art 10, bearing in mind the emphasis placed by Strasbourg on the importance of that role.[48] In contrast to disclosure of information by a Crown servant under ss 1–4, s 5 does import a requirement of mens rea under s 5(2) which, as far as information falling within ss 1, 2 and 3 is concerned, consists of three elements. The defendant must disclose the information knowing or having reasonable cause to believe that it falls within one or more of the categories, that it has come into his possession as mentioned in sub-section (1) above and that it will be damaging (s 5(3)(b)). As far as information falling within s 4 and probably s 3(1)(b) is concerned, only the first two of these elements will be relevant. Under s 5(6), only the first of these elements need be proved if the information came into the defendant's possession as a result of a contravention of s 1 of the Official Secrets Act 1911. Thus, as far as disclosure of such information is concerned, the mens rea requirement will be fulfilled even though the defendant believed that the disclosure would not be damaging and intended that it should not be. Indeed, since the mens rea includes an objective element, it may be satisfied under all the categories where the defendant did not in fact possess the belief in question, but had reasonable cause to possess it.

The requirement of mens rea, although not as strict as may at first appear, represents the only means of differentiating between journalists and Crown servants. The test for damage will be determined as it would be if the information was disclosed by a Crown servant in contravention of ss 1(3), 2(1) or 3(1) above. A court could afford recognition to the significance of the journalistic role, as required by Art 10, by placing a strong emphasis on the mens rea requirement. Where a journalist appeared to be acting in the public interest in making the disclosure, it would be possible for a court to interpret the mens rea requirement as disproved on the basis that it would be impossible to show that the defendant knew or should have known that the disclosure was damaging to the interest in question if on one view (even if mistaken) it could be seen as beneficial to it, and that was the view that the journalist took.

Section 4 is not mentioned, because the information will not be capable of falling within s 4(1) unless the harm test is satisfied. As already mentioned, there is no harm test under s 4(3). Thus, an interesting anomaly arises: if, for example, information relating to the work of MI5 is disclosed to a journalist by a security service agent, a distinction is drawn between disclosure by the agent and by the journalist: in general, it will not be assumed in the case of the latter that the disclosure will cause harm, but if the information relates to (say) telephone tapping, no such distinction is drawn. If the journalist is then charged with an offence falling within s 5 due to the disclosure of information under s (3), both he or she and the agent will be in an equally disadvantageous position as far as the harm test is concerned. The apparent recognition of journalistic duty effected by importing the harm test under s 1(3) into the situation where a security service member discloses information to a journalist, may therefore be circumvented where such information also falls within s 4(3).

Another apparent improvement which might tend to affect journalists more than others is the decriminalisation of the receiver of information. If he or she refrains from publishing it, no liability will be incurred. Of course, this improvement might be said to be more theoretical than real in that it was perhaps unlikely that the mere receiver would be prosecuted under the 1911 Act even though that possibility did exist. The fact that journalists were included at all in the net of criminal liability under s 5 has been greatly criticised on the basis that some recognition should be given to the important role of the press in informing the public about government policy and actions.[49] In arguing for a restrictive interpretation of s 5 under s 3 of the HRA, a comparison could be drawn with the constitutional role of the press recognised in America by the Pentagon Papers case:[50] the Supreme Court determined that no restraining order on the press could be made so that the press would remain free to censure the government.

48 See, e.g., Goodwin v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 123.

Section 6 covers the unauthorised publication abroad of information which falls into one of the other substantive categories apart from crime and special investigation powers. It covers the disclosure to a UK citizen of information which has been received in confidence from the UK by another state or international organisation. Typically, the section might cover a leak of such information to a foreign journalist who then passed it on to a UK journalist. However, liability will not be incurred if the state or organisation (or a member of the organisation) authorises the disclosure of the information to the public (s 6(3)). Again, since this section is aimed at journalists, a requirement of mens rea is imported: it must be shown under s 6(2) that the defendant made 'a damaging disclosure of [the information] knowing or having reasonable cause to believe that it is such as is mentioned in subsection (1) above and that its disclosure would be damaging'. However, it is important to note that under s 6(4), the test for harm under this section is to be determined 'as it would be in relation to a disclosure of the information, document or article in question by a Crown servant in contravention of s 1(3), 2(1) and 3(1) above'. Thus, although it appears that two tests must be satisfied in order to fulfil the mens rea requirement, the tests may in fact be conflated as far as s 3(1)(b) is concerned because proof that the defendant knew that the information fell within the relevant category may satisfy the requirement that he or she knew that the disclosure would be damaging. The requirement that mens rea be established is not, therefore, as favourable to the defendant as it appears to be because – as noted in respect of s 5 – it may be satisfied even where the defendant believes that no damage will result. Once again, aside from this particular instance, this applies in all the categories due to the objective element in the mens rea arising from the words 'reasonable cause to believe'.

The requirement that the information, document or article is communicated in confidence will be satisfied as under s 3 if it is communicated in 'circumstances in which the person communicating it could reasonably expect that it would be so held' (s 6(5)). In other words, it need not be expressly designated 'confidential'.

A disclosure will not lead to liability under the Act if it is authorised and so it is necessary to determine whether or not authorisation has taken place. The meaning of 'authorised disclosures' is determined by s 7. A disclosure will be authorised if it is made in accordance with the official duty of the Crown servant or a person in whose case a notification for the purposes of s 1(1) is in force. As far as a government contractor is concerned, a disclosure will be authorised if made 'in accordance with an official authorisation' or 'for the purposes of the functions by virtue of which he is a government contractor and without contravening an official restriction'. A disclosure made by any other person will be authorised if it is made to a Crown servant for the purposes of his functions as such; or in accordance with an official authorisation.

49 See, e.g., Ewing and Gearty, op. cit., fn 28, at 196–201.
50 New York Times Co v US (1971) 403 US 713.

Defences; disproving mens rea – a reversed burden

The defence available to Crown servants arises in each of the different categories and reads:

> . . . it is a defence to prove that at the time of the alleged offence he did not know and had no reasonable cause to believe that the information, document or article in question was such as is mentioned (in the relevant subsection) or that its disclosure would be damaging within the meaning of that subsection.

Belief in authorisation will also provide a defence under s 7. Thus, the Act appears to provide three defences for Crown servants: first, that the defendant did not know and had no reasonable cause to believe that the information fell into the category in question; secondly, that he or she did not know and had no reasonable cause to believe that the information would cause harm, and thirdly, that he or she believed that he had lawful authorisation to make the disclosure and had no reasonable cause to believe otherwise. However, very significantly, in R v Keogh[51] it was found that the imposition of reverse legal burdens is incompatible with the demands of Art 6(2), so they should be read down under s 3 HRA to an evidential burden only. So it is a defence for a defendant to prove lack of knowledge in the different categories if he adduces evidence sufficient to raise an issue with respect to it; the court or jury should then assume that the defence is satisfied, unless the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that it is not.

The first two defences may be conflated in certain categories, largely because the second defence is intimately tied up with the harm tests and therefore, like them, operates on a number of levels. Where the harm test operates at its lowest level, only the first defence is available. Thus, a person falling under ss 1(1) or 4(3) has no opportunity at all of arguing that, for example, the triviality of the information or the fact that it was already in the public domain had given rise to an expectation that its disclosure would cause no harm at all. At the next level, under s 3(1)(b), because the test for harm may be satisfied merely by showing that the information falls within the sub-section, the second defence could be viewed as more apparent than real and could therefore be categorised along with the defence under s 1 as non-existent. However, following the argument regarding the interpretation of the harm test under this section above, this defence could be afforded some substance, under s 3 of the HRA. Under s 1(3), the second defence is extremely circumscribed. It would not necessarily avail the defendant to prove that for various reasons, it was believed on reasonable grounds before the disclosure took place that it would not cause harm. So long as the prosecution could prove a likelihood that harm would be caused from disclosure of documents falling into the same class, the harm test under the section would be satisfied and the defendant would be forced to prove that he or she had no reasonable cause to believe that disclosure of documents of that class would cause harm – a more difficult task than showing this in relation to the particular disclosure in question.

51 [2007] All ER (D) 105 (Mar). For further discussion see Chapter 14 pp 1347–54.

Generally, under all the other categories the harm test allows for argument under both the first and second defences, assuming that they are expressed disjunctively. However, under s 4(4), the second defence alone applies to information falling within the category under s 4(2)(a), while the first alone applies to information likely to have those effects under s 4(2)(b). This is anomalous, as it means that the disclosure of information which had had the effect of preventing an arrest could be met by the defence that it was not expected to have that effect, while information which had not yet had such an effect, but might have in future, would not necessarily be susceptible to such a defence. So long as the disclosure of the document was in fact likely to have the effect mentioned, it would be irrelevant that the defendant, while appreciating that it might in general have such effects, considered that they would not arise in the particular instance. Thus, a broader defence would be available in respect of the more significant disclosure, but not in respect of the less significant. This effect arises because, under s 4(2), the first defence is contained in the second owing to the use of the harm test as the means of identifying the information falling within the section.

Thus, it is clear that the Act is even less generous towards the defendant in terms of the defences it makes available than it appears to be at first glance. Moreover, it is important to note that, although it is a general principle of criminal law that a defendant need have only an honest belief in the existence of facts which give rise to a defence, under the Act a defendant must have an honest and reasonable belief in such facts. However, as indicated, s 3 of the HRA could be used to broaden the defences in certain respects.

The Act contains no explicit public interest defence and it follows from the nature of the harm tests that one cannot be implied into it; on the face of it, any good flowing from disclosure of the information in question cannot be considered, merely any harm that might be caused. Thus, while it may be accepted that the Act at least allows argument as to a defendant's state of knowledge (albeit of very limited scope in certain instances) in making a disclosure to be led before a jury, it does not allow for argument as to the good intentions of the persons concerned, who may believe with reason that no other effective means of exposing iniquity exists. In particular, the information may concern corruption at such a high level that internal methods of addressing the problem would be ineffective. Clearly, good intentions are normally irrelevant in criminal trials: not many would argue that a robber should be able to adduce evidence that he intended to use the proceeds of his robbery to help the poor. However, it is arguable that an exception to this rule should be made in respect of the Official Secrets Act. A statute aimed specifically at those best placed to know of corruption or malpractice in government should, in a democracy, allow such a defence. The fact that it does not argues strongly against the likelihood that it will have a liberalising impact. However, s 3 of the HRA could be used creatively, as indicated, to seek to introduce such a defence – in effect – through the back door.

The Shayler litigation

Whether or not such a use of the HRA is possible in respect of categories of information covered by a harm test, it appears that it is not possible in respect of s 1(1) and s 4(1).

David Shayler, a former member of MI6, was charged with an offence under s 1(1) and s 4(1) in respect of his allegations that MI6 had been involved in a plot to assassinate Colonel Gadaffi; further allegations exposed, Shayler claimed, serious illegality on the part of MI6, and were necessary to avert threats to life and limb and to personal property.[52] A preliminary hearing was held regarding the effect of the Human Rights Act on s 1(1). It was argued that since s 1(1) and s 4(1) are of an absolute nature, they are incompatible with Art 10 of the Convention, under the Human Rights Act, owing to the requirement that interference with expression should be proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. In other words it was not possible, using s 3 of the HRA to harmonise these provisions of the 1989 Act with the requirements of the Convention would not be possible, since the two were plainly incompatible. Therefore a declaration of incompatibility should be granted, under section 4 of the Act. This argument was rejected in Shayler;[53] Judge Moses at first instance found that there was no need to rely on s 3 HRA since no incompatibility between Art 10 and s 1(1) arose.[54] He reached the conclusion that s 3 could be ignored in reliance on the finding of the Lord Chief Justice in Donoghue v Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Assoc Ltd and the Secretary of State for the Environment;[55] he said that 'unless legislation would otherwise be in breach of the Convention s 3 can be ignored; so courts should always first ascertain whether, absent s 3, there would be any breach of the Convention'.[56] The conclusion that ss 1(1) and 4(1) were not in breach of Art 10 was reached on the basis that Mr Shayler did have an avenue by which he could seek to make the disclosures in question. There were various persons to whom the disclosure could be made, including those identified in s 12. Further, significantly, under s 7(3) of the 1989 Act a disclosure can be made to others if authorised; those empowered to afford authorisation are identified in s 12. Shayler could have sought authorisation to make his disclosures from those identified under s 21 or from those prescribed as persons who can give authorisations. Such persons or bodies now include the Tribunal established under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 s 65[57] and a Minister of the Crown. Such persons could have authorised disclosure to other persons not identified in s 12 or prescribed.

Also, Mr Justice Moses found, a refusal of authorisation would be subject, the Crown accepted in the instant case, to judicial review. The refusal to grant authority would have to comply with Art 10 due to s 6 HRA; if it did not, the court in the judicial review proceedings would be expected to say so.[58] Mr Justice Moses went on to say:

> It is not correct . . . to say that a restriction [under s 1(12) and 4(1)] is imposed irrespective of the public interest in disclosure. If there is a public interest it is . . . not unreasonable to expect at least one of the very large number of persons

52 R v Shayler [2003] 1 A.C. 247.
53 (2001) 28 September, CA.
54 Paragraph 78 of the transcript.
55 [2001] 3 WLR 183.
56 Ibid para 75.
57 The old tribunals set up under s 7 of the Interception of Communications Act, s 5 of the Security Services Act 1989 and s 9 of the Intelligence Services Act 1994 were prescribed for this purpose under the Official Secrets Act 1989 (Prescription) Order 1990 SI 1990/200, as amended by SI 1993/847. That prescription now applies to the single Tribunal.
58 Paragraphs 25 and 26 of the Transcript.

> identified [by reference to s 12 and to the bodies prescribed] to recognise the public interest and to act upon it.[59]

He went on to call the suggestion that all those so identified would not authorise the disclosure in such circumstances far fetched. But he thought that even if that possibility might arise,

> . . . it is a step too far to say that the proportionality of this legislation must be judged in the light of the possibility that the courts themselves [in judicial review proceedings in respect of a refusal of authorisation] would countenance suppression of a disclosure which they considered necessary to avert injury to life, limb or serious damage to property even before October 2000.

Therefore he found that no absolute ban on disclosure was imposed.

The Court of Appeal agreed that the interference with freedom of expression was in proportion to the legitimate aim pursued – that of protecting national security on the basis that the members of the security services, and those who pass information to them, must be able to be sure that the information will remain secret. The Court of Appeal also agreed that for the reasons given the absence of a 'public interest' defence in the 1989 Act does not breach the Convention. Mr Justice Moses had stated that had he found otherwise he would have considered the use of s 3 of the HRA, but would have rejected the possibility put forward on behalf of Shayler, of inserting the word 'lawful' into s 1(9) so that s 1(1) would only cover the lawful work of the secret services. He also rejected the similar argument in respect of s 4. In so finding he again relied on Donoghue v Poplar Housing and Regeneration Community Association Ltd and the Secretary of State for the Environment[60] in which Lord Woolf said that s 3 does not entitle the court to legislate.[61] This decision means that s 3 need not be used in relation to s 1(1) and s 4(1) and it is probable that the same arguments would apply if, in respect of disclosure of information falling within other categories, the defence sought to introduce a public interest defence.

The House of Lords' judgment in the case contains some encouraging signs, in terms of the influence of Art 10 ECHR upon the judgment, but is ultimately open to the same criticisms as the earlier judgments. Essentially, the House found that the OSA 1989 did need to be read compatibly with the requirements of proportionality under Art 10, but that the method of seeking permission to reveal information provided in the Act rendered the relevant provisions proportionate. The encouraging point that was stressed by their Lordships, especially Lord Hope, was that, upon any judicial review of a refusal to authorise release of information, a full Art 10 analysis would apply and be used. However, as argued below, this is likely to be a moot point. Looking at the decision more closely, the problem with it appears to lie, not in the assessment of what Strasbourg case law on Art 10 demands, but upon the conclusions drawn from that case law as applied to the OSA. Thus Lord Bingham states:

59 Ibid para 54.
60 Ibid See fn 55.
61 Ibid paras 75 and 76.

> The acid test is whether, in all the circumstances, the interference with the individual's Convention right prescribed by national law is greater than is required to meet the legitimate object which the state seeks to achieve.[62]

It was accepted generally that a truly blanket ban could not, by its nature, be proportionate. Lord Bingham conceded that such a ban 'permitting of no exception' would be inconsistent with 'the rigorous and particular scrutiny required to give effect to article 10(2).'[63] Differences of approach were apparent between Lords Bingham and Hutton on the one hand, who were quite readily convinced of the compatibility of the challenged provisions with Art 10, and the analysis of Lord Hope, which was both more sceptical on this point and gave more detailed consideration to the Strasbourg requirements. Thus, Lord Bingham did not consider the proportionality test in any detail, or give much consideration to the type of expression in issue. Indeed, his Lordship appeared to assume that once it was shown that the ban was not technically a blanket one, proportionality was automatically satisfied.

There was no detailed examination as to whether such routes were likely to prove effective – indeed, his Lordship's view on this matter appeared positively naïve – a point returned to below. Lord Hutton found that in the absence of any attempt by the applicant to lay his case before the authorities under the relevant provisions of the Act,[64] there was no evidence to show that these procedures would have been ineffective. This essentially turns the proportionality exercise on its head. Under Art 10(2) the state has the burden of showing that the restrictions placed upon the right in question are justifiable; Lord Hutton's approach essentially asks the applicant to prove that the state's alternative means of protecting expression are *in*effective, rather than requiring the state, by adducing 'relevant and sufficient reasons',[65] to show their effectiveness.

In contrast, Lord Hope did look at proportionality closely: identifying the second and third parts of the proportionality test from the Daly case he said;

> The problem is that, if they are to be compatible with the Convention right, the nature of the restrictions [placed upon the right] must be sensitive to the facts of each case if they are to satisfy the second and third requirements of proportionality. The restrictions must be rational, fair and not arbitrary, and they must impair the fundamental right no more than is necessary. As I see it, the scheme of the Act is vulnerable to criticism on the ground that it lacks the necessary degree of sensitivity.[66]

But he then examined the fact that the authorisation system would be subject to judicial review, which would provide the necessary safeguard. Lord Hope did address the point that technically it would be impossible for an agent or former agent to bring judicial review, since the disclosure by him to his lawyer for the purposes of preparing the case of the information he wished to disclose would itself breach s 1 OSA. Therefore an

62 Ibid at para 26.
63 Ibid at p 275.
64 Under sections 7(3)(a) or (b),
65 The standard often referred to under Art 10: see Sunday Times v UK (1979) 2 EHRR 245.
66 Ibid at paras 69–70. The case referred to is R (on the application of Daly) v SSHD [2001] 2 AC 532.

implied right to legal advice was read into the scheme – a right, that is, to disclose the substance of the information covered by s 1(1) to a legal adviser, in order to prepare for a judicial review to challenge the refusal of the authoriser to give permission to disclose. As Lord Hope said:

> I think that it follows that he has an implied right to legal assistance of his own choosing, especially if his dispute is with the state. Access to legal advice is one of the fundamental rights enjoyed by every citizen under the common law.[67]

Having granted this point, Lord Hope went on to hold that where permission to reveal information was sought and refused, the appropriate test on judicial review challenging that refusal would be as follows:

> (1) What, with respect to that information, was the justification for the interference with the Convention right? (2) If the justification was that this was in the interests of national security, was there a pressing social need for that information not to be disclosed? And (3) if there was such a need, was the interference with the Convention right which was involved in withholding authorisation for the disclosure of that information no more than was necessary. This structured approach to judicial control of the question whether official authorisation should or should not be given will enable the court to give proper weight to the public interest considerations in favour of disclosure, while taking into account at the same time the informed view of the primary decision maker. By adopting this approach the court will be giving effect to its duty under [s 6(1) HRA] to act in a way that is compatible with the Convention rights . . .[68]

Essentially therefore the broad choice is between a legislative scheme in which the applicant makes disclosure and the court judges directly whether the disclosure should be permitted (whether under the OSA or under the breach of confidence doctrine) and the actual scheme of the Act, which rests on 'judicial review of decisions taken beforehand by administrators'[69] as to whether disclosure should be permitted. The first choice of course would require an Act which, unlike the OSA, subjects all the offences to a 'harm' test. Lord Hope came down in favour of the second system (judicial review) on the basis of a number of factors. First, the would-be discloser may not be in a position to appreciate all the harm that his disclosures might do; second, gathering evidence of harm to bring a criminal prosecution could do more damage than the original disclosure.[70] This argument was constantly floated but no examples given; moreover, this argument ignores the point that on judicial review, the government would have to put forward evidence of harm to justify its prior refusal to authorise disclosure. Therefore this argument, although possibly true, does not help us to choose between the two choices of system, since it applies equally to each. Finally, Lord Hope makes the point that a successful prosecution would not in fact remedy the harm done by the original disclosure.[71]

67 Ibid at para 73.
68 Ibid at para 79.
69 Ibid at para 83.
70 Ibid at para 84.
71 Ibid at para 85.

The basic problem with the reliance placed by all the judges who heard this case upon the internal complaint route and judicial review is that the means they viewed as available to members or former members of the security services to expose iniquity are so unlikely to be used. It seems, to say the least, highly improbable that such a member would risk the employment detriment that might be likely to arise, especially if he then proceeded to seek judicial review of the decision. It would appear that it would place him in an impossible position in relation to colleagues and superiors. Of course, simply making the disclosure directly and then being prosecuted for it would also risk such detriment, even if the person was acquitted. However, the obvious route in such circumstances would be to make the disclosure anonymously. Former members of the services would not be subject to the same constraints in terms of employment detriment, but might be deterred from using this route for the simple reason that they would probably view it as inefficacious. Lord Bingham cannot but sound naïve when he says:

> If . . . the document or information revealed matters which, however, scandalous or embarrassing, would not damage any security or intelligence interest or impede the effective discharge by the service of its very important public functions, [a] decision [in favour of disclosure] might be appropriate.[72]

The Act has been in force for 18 years at the time of writing and no such member has ever availed themselves of this route, although persons other than Shayler have made or sought to make disclosures to the public at large, as this chapter reveals. Moreover, one point that Lord Hope and the others wholly fail to recognise is that requiring a person wishing to speak to the media to take legal action before he can do so (judicial review of the refusal to allow disclosure) is to place a very weighty fetter upon his freedom of expression. Effectively, such a system reverses the principle under Art 10(2) that the state must justify interference with freedom of expression. It places upon the would-be speaker the burden of forcing the state, through legal action, to allow him to speak. One would not normally think of human rights as being those which cannot be exercised without prior legal action. Moreover, one of the most important principles recognised at Strasbourg is that rights must be real, not tokenistic or illusory. It is argued that the right to freedom of expression – one of the central rights of the Convention – is rendered illusory by ss 1(1) and 4(1) of the OSA in relation to allegedly unlawful activities of the security services – a matter of great significance in a democracy.

One of the specific arguments heavily relied upon by their Lordships was one previously cited by the courts. Lord Hutton cited dicta of Lord Nicholls in Attorney General v Blake:[73]

> It is of paramount importance that members of the service should have complete confidence in all their dealings with each other, and that those recruited as informers should have the like confidence. Undermining the willingness of prospective informers to co-operate with the services, or undermining the morale and trust > between members of the services when engaged on secret and dangerous operations, would jeopardise the effectiveness of the service. An absolute rule against disclosure, visible to all, makes good sense.

72 Ibid at para 30.
73 [2001] 1 AC 268, 287.

The obvious rejoinder to this argument that members of the service and others must be able to trust each other to keep information secret is that such trust would surely be expected to extend only to information which did not reveal illegality. Otherwise the policy of ss 1(1) and 4(1) of the OSA seems to be to promote criminal conspiracies among members of the services or between members and informants to conceal information revealing unlawful activities. Moreover, whilst it is common sense to believe that the willingness of informants to give information to the security services would be undermined if they feared that their identities might be later unmasked, this argument cannot support a blanket ban on any disclosures by members or former members of the services. It is highly doubtful that those considering giving information to the services are aware of the precise legal position under the OSA: a simple guarantee by the agent cultivating the source that their identity would always be kept secret would suffice.

As noted above, the impact of the OSA in terms of freedom of expression is further exacerbated since no general defence of prior publication is provided; the only means of putting forward such argument would arise in one of the categories in which it was necessary to prove the likelihood that harm would flow from the disclosure; the prosecution might find it hard to establish such a likelihood where there had been a great deal of prior publication because no further harm could be caused. Obviously, once again, this will depend on the level at which the harm test operates. Where it operates at its lowest level, prior publication would be irrelevant. Thus, where a member of the security services repeated information falling within s 1 which had been published all over the world and in the UK, a conviction could still be obtained. This position is out of accord with Art 10: in such an instance, the imposition of criminal liability would be unable to preserve national security and therefore, it would be disproportionate to the aim of so doing.

If such publication had occurred, but the information fell within s 1(3), the test for harm might be satisfied on the basis that although no further harm could be caused by disclosure of the particular document, it nevertheless belonged to a class of documents the disclosure of which was likely to cause harm. However, where harm flowing from publication of a specific document is relied on, Lord Advocate v Scotsman Publications Ltd suggests that a degree of prior publication may tend to defeat the argument that further publication can still cause harm. However, this suggestion must be treated with care, since the ruling was not given under the 1989 Act and the link between the Act and the civil law of confidence may not form part of its ratio.[74] It should also be noted that s 6 provides that information which has already been leaked abroad can still cause harm if disclosed in the UK. The only exception to this arises under s 6(3), which provides that no liability will arise if the disclosure was authorised by the state or international organisation in question.

74 [1990] 1 AC 812; [1989] 2 All ER 852, HL. Only Lord Templeman clearly adverted to such a link.

Conclusions

The claim that the Act is an improvement on its predecessor rests partly on the substance or significance of the information it covers. Such substance is made relevant first by the use of categorisation; impliedly, trivial information relating to cups of tea or colours of carpets in government buildings is not covered (except in security services buildings) and second, because even where information does fall within the category in question, its disclosure will not incur liability unless harm will or may flow from it. Thus, on the face of it, liability will not be incurred merely because the information disclosed covers a topic of significance such as defence. In other words, it does not seem to be assumed that because there is a public interest in keeping information of the particular type secret, it inevitably relates to any particular piece of information. However, in relation to many disclosures it is, in fact, misleading to speak of using a second method to narrow down further the amount of information covered because, as noted above, establishing that the information falls within the category in question is in fact (or may be; no guidance is given as to when this will be the case) synonymous with establishing that harm will occur in a number of instances.

Clearly, if only to avoid bringing the criminal law into disrepute, 'harm tests' which allow the substance of the information to be taken into account are to be preferred to the width of s 2 of the 1911 Act. However, although the 1989 Act embodies and emphasises the notion of a test for harm in its reiteration of the term 'damaging', it is not necessary to show that harm has actually occurred. Bearing this important point in mind, it can be seen that the test for harm actually operates on four different levels:

(a) The lowest level arises in two categories, s 1(1) and s 4(3), where there is no explicit test for harm at all – impliedly, a disclosure is of its very nature harmful.
(b) In one category, s 3(1)(b), the test for harm is more apparent than real in that it may be identical to the test determining whether the information falls within the category at all.
(c) In s 1(3), there is a harm test, but the harm need not flow from or be likely to flow from disclosure of the specific document in question.
(d) In three categories, ss 2, 3 and 4, there is a harm test, but it is only necessary to prove that harm would be likely to occur due to the disclosure in question, whether it has occurred or not.

Even at the highest level, where it is necessary to show that the actual document in question would be likely to cause harm, the task of doing so is made easy due to the width of the tests themselves. Under s 2(2), for example, a disclosure of information relating to defence will be damaging if it is likely to seriously obstruct the interests of the UK abroad. Thus, the harm tests may be said to be concerned less with preventing damaging disclosures than with creating the impression that liability is confined to such disclosures.

These tests for harm are not made any more stringent in instances where a non-Crown servant – usually a journalist – discloses information since, under s 5, if anyone discloses information which falls into one of the categories covered, the test for harm will be determined by reference to that category. The journalist who publishes information and the Crown servant who discloses it to him or her are treated differently in terms of the test for harm only where the latter is a member of the security services disclosing information relating to those services.

One of the objections to the old s 2 of the 1911 Act was the failure to include a requirement to prove mens rea. The 1989 Act includes such a requirement only as regards the leaking of information by non-Crown servants; in all other instances, it creates a 'reversed mens rea': the defence can attempt to prove that the defendant did not know (or have reasonable cause to know) of the nature of the information or that its disclosure would be damaging. However, under ss 5 and 6 the prosecution must prove mens rea, which includes a requirement to show that the disclosure was made in the knowledge that it would be damaging. This is a step in the right direction and a clear improvement on the 1911 Act; nevertheless, the burden of proof on the prosecution is very easy to discharge where the low level harm tests of ss 1(3) and 3(1)(b) apply once it was shown that the defendant knew that the information fell within the category in question.

Under s 3 of the HRA it is strongly arguable that the Act needs to afford greater recognition to the important constitutional role of the journalist in order to bring it into line with the recognition afforded to that role at Strasbourg under Art 10. But unless s 3 is used creatively in order to create such recognition, a journalist who repeated allegations made by a future Peter Wright as to corruption or treachery in MI5 could be convicted if it could be shown first, that he or she knew that the information related to the security services and, secondly, that disclosure of that type of information would be likely to cause damage to the work of the security services, regardless of whether the particular allegations would cause such damage. In the case of a journalist who repeated allegations made by a future Cathy Massiter, it would only be necessary to show that the allegations related to telephone tapping and that the journalist knew that they did. Clearly, this would be a burden which would be readily discharged.

It may be argued – bearing in mind the scarcity of prosecutions under the 1911 Act – that the Official Secrets Acts were put in place mainly in order to create a deterrent effect and as a centrepiece in the general legal scheme engendering government secrecy, rather than with a view to their invocation. The 1989 Act may be effective as a means of creating greater government credibility in relation to official secrecy than its predecessor. It allows the claim of liberalisation to be made and gives the impression that the anomalies in existence under the 1911 Act have been dealt with. It appears complex and wide ranging partly due to overlapping between and within the categories and, therefore, is likely to have a chilling effect because civil servants and others will not be certain as to the information covered except in very clear cut cases. It may, therefore, be proving more effective than the 1911 Act in deterring the press from publishing the revelations of a future Peter Wright in respect of the workings of the security services. Thus, it may rarely need to be invoked and, in fact, may have much greater symbolic than practical value.

In considering the impact of the Act, it must be borne in mind that many other criminal sanctions for the unauthorised disclosure of information exist and some of these clearly overlap with its provisions. Sections 1 and 4(3) work in conjunction with the provisions of the Security Services Act 1989 to prevent almost all scrutiny of the operation of the security services. Even where a member of the public has a grievance concerning the operation of the services it will probably not be possible to use a court action as a means of bringing such operations to the notice of the public: under s 5 of the Security Services Act, complaint can only be made to a tribunal and under s 5(4), the decisions of the tribunal are not questionable in any court of law. In a similar manner s 4(3) of the Official Secrets Act, which prevents disclosure of information about telephone tapping, works in tandem with the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000. Under the 2000 Act, complaints can be made only to a tribunal whose decisions are not published, with no possibility of scrutiny by a court. Moreover, around 80 other statutory provisions provide sanctions to enforce secrecy on civil servants in the particular areas they cover. For example, s 11 of the Atomic Energy Act 1946 makes it an offence to communicate to an unauthorised person information relating to atomic energy plant. Further, s 1 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 is still available to punish spies. Thus, it is arguable that s 2 of the 1911 Act could merely have been repealed without being replaced.

A number of the provisions of the 1989 Act look increasingly anomalous in the Human Rights Act era. Although repeal of the Act is unlikely, the pressure to amend s 1(1), as the most pernicious section – in terms of its impact on state accountability – may eventually become irresistible, although the decision in Shayler now makes it clear that it will not come from the judiciary.

Prosecutions under the Act are rare, and, where they attempt to punish a member of the security services for revealing illegality or abuse of power by the security services, are likely to expose the government to a huge amount of negative publicity, particularly if the matter to which the revelation relates is a sensitive one. The Katharine Gunn affair in 2003 illustrated these points powerfully. Ms Gunn was an employee at GCHQ, the government's listening installation. She discovered, through correspondence that crossed her desk, that the UK Government had been requested by the US Government to give assistance in spying on the diplomats of states who were temporary members of the UN Security Council, at UN Headquarters in New York, in order to gain information making it easier to convince such states to vote for the US–UK resolution in favour of military action. Such action would plainly have violated the Vienna Convention on diplomatic relations[75] and Gunn disclosed the request to the Observer newspaper, which, not surprisingly, splashed the story on its front cover on 2 March 2003. Gunn was arrested and a prosecution commenced for breach of s 1(1) of the OSA. However, the prosecution was abandoned in February 2004, when it emerged that the CPS would offer no evidence.[76] Gunn had stated her intention to plead a defence of necessity – the revelation of illegal conduct by the security services, and the avoidance of an illegal war, and thus the saving of lives; specifically, she had intimated that her lawyers would seek disclosure, as part of her defence, of the Attorney General's advice on the legality or otherwise of the Iraq war, before its inception, a matter of enormous political sensitivity to the government. The case not only illustrated the undesirability from a government's point of view of using the Act against a seemingly honest and concerned whistleblower, but raised questions as to the real independence of the decision to drop the prosecution, given the intense embarrassment the case looked likely to cause the government. The indefensible nature of s 1(1), leaving Gunn no ability to raise a public interest defence, even in an instance of such enormous public importance, was once more vividly illustrated.

75 As well, seemingly, as the 1946 General Convention, Article 2(3), which provides the premises of the UN shall be immune from any form of search or interference.

76 See the statement by Harriet Harman QC to the House of Commons: HC Deb, col 427 (26 Feb 2004).

3 Breach of confidence

Introduction[77]

Breach of confidence is a civil remedy affording protection against the disclosure or use of information which is not generally known and which has been entrusted in circumstances imposing an obligation not to disclose it without authorisation from the person who originally imparted it. This area of law developed as a means of protecting secret information belonging to individuals and organisations.[78] However, it can also be used by the government to prevent disclosure of sensitive information and is, in that sense, a back-up to the other measures available, including the Official Secrets Act 1989.[79] It is clear that governments are prepared to use actions for breach of confidence against civil servants and others in instances falling outside the protected categories – or within them. In some respects, breach of confidence actions may be more valuable than the criminal sanction provided by the 1989 Act. Their use may attract less publicity than a criminal trial, no jury will be involved and they offer the possibility of quickly obtaining an interim injunction. The latter possibility is very valuable because, in many instances, the other party (usually a newspaper) will not pursue the case to a trial of the permanent injunction since the secret will probably be stale news by that time. However, where the government, as opposed to a private individual, is concerned, the courts will not merely accept that it is in the public interest that the information should be kept confidential. It will also have to be shown that the public interest in keeping the information confidential due to the harm its disclosure would cause is not outweighed by the public interest in disclosure.

Thus, in AG v Jonathan Cape,[80] when the Attorney General invoked the law of confidence to try to stop publication of Richard Crossman's memoirs on the ground that they concerned Cabinet discussions, the Lord Chief Justice accepted that such public secrets could be restrained, but only on the basis that the balance of the public interest came down in favour of suppression. As the discussions had taken place ten years previously, it was not possible to show that harm would flow from their disclosure; the public interest in publication therefore prevailed.

The nature of the public interest defence – the interest in disclosure – was clarified in Lion Laboratories v Evans and Express Newspapers.[81] The Court of Appeal held that 77 General reading: Gurry, F, Breach of Confidence, 1985, Clarendon; Bailey, Harris and Jones, op. cit., fn 1 at 435–52; Robertson, G and Nichol, AGL, Media Law, Chapter 4; Wacks, R, Personal Information, 1989, Clarendon, Chapter 3; Feldman, op. cit., fn 1 at 648–68; the general development of the doctrine is discussed in Chapter 9 at p 876 et seq.

78 See Chapter 9, at p 877.

79 For comment on its role in this respect see Bryan, MW, 'The Crossman Diaries: developments in the law of breach of confidence' (1976) 92 LQR 180; Williams, DGT, 'The Crossman Diaries' (1976) CLJ 1; Lowe and Willmore, 'Secrets, media and the law' (1985) 48 MLR 592.

80 [1976] QB 752.

81 [1985] QB 526; [1984] 2 All ER 417, CA.

the defence extended beyond situations in which there had been serious wrongdoing by the plaintiff. Even where the plaintiff was blameless, publication would be excusable where it was possible to show a serious and legitimate interest in the revelation. Thus, the Daily Express was allowed to publish information extracted from the manufacturer of the intoximeter (a method of conducting breathalyser tests) even though it did not reveal iniquity on the part of the manufacturer. It did, however, reveal a matter of genuine public interest: that wrongful convictions might have been obtained in drink driving cases owing to possible deficiencies of the intoximeter.

Just as the Official Secrets Act creates a direct interference with political speech, the doctrine of confidence as employed by the government can do so too. Therefore, the use of the doctrine in such instances requires careful scrutiny, with Art 10 in mind. Since this is a common law doctrine, s 3 will not apply. But the courts have a duty under s 6 of the HRA to develop the doctrine compatibly with Art 10. Thus a court, as itself a public authority under s 6, is obliged to give effect to Art 10, among other provisions of the Convention, when considering the application of this doctrine. In so doing, the courts arguably have nearly as much leeway as they do under s 3 of the HRA, and it must be remembered that no provision was included in the HRA allowing the common law to override the Convention rights. Since, in an action between the individual and the state, the vexed issue of horizontal effect does not arise,[82] this matter can be regarded as settled, since the state as employer is also presumably a public authority under s 6. Section 12(4) is also applicable where interference with the right to freedom of expression is in issue, as it inevitably will be in this context. Section 12(4) requires the Court to have particular regard to the right to freedom of expression under Art 10. Thus, s 12(4) provides added weight to the argument that in the instance in which the state seeks to suppress the expression of an individual using this doctrine, the court must consider the pressing social need to do so and the requirements of proportionality very carefully, interpreting those requirements strictly. In considering Art 10, the court should, under s 12(4)(a), take into account the extent to which the material is or is about to become available to the public and the public interest in publication. These two matters are central in breach of confidence actions. They imply that the state's task in obtaining an injunction where a small amount of prior publication has taken place – or is about to – has been made harder.

In breach of confidence actions the state, as indicated below, typically seeks an interim injunction and then, if it has obtained it, may proceed to the trial of the permanent injunction. However, s 12(3) of the HRA provides that prior restraint on expression should not be granted except where the court considers that the claimant is 'likely' to establish at trial that publication should not be allowed, which the House of Lords has found will generally mean 'more likely than not'.[83] Moreover, ex parte injunctions cannot be granted under s 12(2) unless there are compelling reasons why the respondent should not be notified or the applicant has taken all reasonable steps to notify the respondent. All these requirements under the HRA must now be taken into account in applying the doctrine of confidence. The result is likely to be that the doctrine will undergo quite a radical change from the interpretation afforded to it in the Spycatcher litigation, which is considered below.

82 See Chapter 4, pp 249–57.
83 See Chapter 9 at pp 988–90.

The Spycatcher litigation

The leading case in this area is the House of Lords' decision in AG v Guardian Newspapers Ltd (No 2),[84] which confirmed that the Lion Laboratories Ltd v Evans approach to the public interest defence is the correct one and also clarified certain other aspects of this area of the law. In 1985, the Attorney General commenced proceedings in New South Wales[85] in an attempt (which was ultimately unsuccessful)[86] to restrain publication of Spycatcher by Peter Wright. The book included allegations of illegal activity engaged in by MI5. In the UK on 22 and 23 June 1986, the Guardian and The Observer published reports of the forthcoming hearing which included some Spycatcher material and on 27 June the Attorney General obtained temporary ex parte injunctions preventing them from further disclosure of such material. Inter partes injunctions were granted against the newspapers on 11 July 1986. On 12 July 1987, The Sunday Times began publishing extracts from Spycatcher and the Attorney General obtained an injunction restraining publication on 16 July.

On 14 July 1987, the book was published in the US, and many copies were brought into the UK. On 30 July 1987, the House of Lords decided[87] (relying on American Cyanamid Co v Ethicon Ltd)[88] to continue the injunctions against the newspapers on the basis that the Attorney General still had an arguable case for permanent injunctions. In making this decision, the House of Lords were obviously influenced by the fact that publication of the information was an irreversible step. This is the usual approach at the interim stage: the court considers the balance of convenience between the two parties and will tend to come down on the side of the plaintiff because of the irrevocable nature of publication. However, since an interim injunction represents a prior restraint and is often the most crucial and, indeed, sometimes the only stage in the whole action, it may be argued that a presumption in favour of freedom of expression should be more readily allowed to tip the balance in favour of the defendant. This may especially be argued where publication from other sources has already occurred which will be likely to increase, and where the public interest in the information is very strong.

It is arguable that the House of Lords should have been able in July 1986 to break through the argument that once the confidentiality claim was set up, the only possible course was to transfix matters as at that point. The argument could have been broken through in the following way: the public interest in limiting the use of prior restraints could have been weighed against the interest in ensuring that everyone who sets up a legal claim has a right to have it heard free from interference. A prior restraint might be allowed even in respect of a matter of great public concern if the interest it protected was clearly made out, it did not go beyond what was needed to provide such protection and it was foreseeable that the restraint would achieve its objective. If it seemed probable that the restraint would not achieve its objective, it would cause an erosion of freedom of speech to no purpose. In the instant case, although the first

84 [1990] 1 AC 109; [1990] 3 WLR 776; [1988] 3 All ER 545, HL.

85 [1987] 8 NSWLR 341.

86 HC of Australia (1988) 165 CLR 30; for comment see Mann, FA (1988) 104 LQR 497; Turnbull, M (1989) 105 LQR 382.

87 AG v Guardian Newspapers Ltd [1987] 3 All ER 316; for comment, see Lee, S (1987) 103 LQR 506.

88 [1975] AC 396; [1975] 1 All ER 504, HL.

of these conditions may have been satisfied, the other two, it is submitted, were not; the restraint should not, therefore, have been granted. Such reasoning would bring the law of confidence closer to adopting the principles used in defamation cases as regards the grant of interim injunctions.[89] When cases of this nature recur under the HRA, such reasoning would be taken into account under s 12(4) and s 6; since relying on either section the demands of Art 10 must be met, so an injunction should not be granted where it is probable that it will not be able to serve the legitimate aim in question, owing to the probability that further publication abroad, or on the internet, will occur.

The judgment of the House of Lords did nothing to curb the use of 'gagging injunctions' in actions for breach of confidence where there had not been prior publication of the material. In any such action, even where the claim was of little merit, and the public interest in publication strong, it was possible to argue that its subject matter should be preserved intact until the merits of the claim could be considered. Even in an instance where the plaintiff (the state) then decided to drop the action before that point, publication of the material in question could be prevented for some substantial period of time. The House of Lords' decision was found to be in breach of Art 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights, as discussed below, but on the ground of prior publication, rather than public interest in the material.

In the trial of the permanent injunctions, AG v Guardian (No 2),[90] the Crown argued that confidential information disclosed to third parties does not thereby lose its confidential character if the third parties know that the disclosure has been made in breach of a duty of confidence. A further reason for maintaining confidentiality in the particular instance was that the unauthorised disclosure of the information was thought likely to damage the trust which members of MI5 have in each other and might encourage others to follow suit. These factors, it was argued, established the public interest in keeping the information confidential.

On the other hand, it was argued on behalf of the newspapers that some of the information in Spycatcher, if true, disclosed that members of MI5 in their operations in England had committed serious breaches of domestic law in, for example, bugging foreign embassies or effecting unlawful entry into private premises. Most seriously, the book included the allegations that members of MI5 attempted to destabilise the administration of Mr Harold Wilson and that the Director General or Deputy Director General of MI5 was a spy. The defendants contended that the duty of non-disclosure to which newspapers coming into the unauthorised possession of confidential state secrets may be subject, does not extend to allegations of serious iniquity of this character.

It was determined at first instance and in the Court of Appeal that whether or not the newspapers would have had a duty to refrain from publishing Spycatcher material in June 1986 before its publication elsewhere, any such duty had now lapsed. The mere making of allegations of iniquity was insufficient, of itself, to justify overriding the duty of confidentiality, but the articles in question published in June 1986 had not contained information going beyond what the public was reasonably entitled to know and in so far as they went beyond what had been previously published, no detriment to national security had been shown which could outweigh the public interest in free speech, given the publication of Spycatcher that had already taken place. Thus, balancing the public interest in freedom of speech and the right to receive information against the countervailing interest of the Crown in national security, continuation of the injunctions was not necessary. The injunctions, however, continued until the House of Lords rejected the Attorney General's claim (AG v Guardian Newspapers Ltd (No 2))[91] on the basis that the interest in maintaining confidentiality was outweighed by the public interest in knowing of the allegations in Spycatcher. It was further determined that an injunction to restrain future publication of matters connected with the operations of the security services would amount to a comprehensive ban on publication and would undermine the operation of determining the balance of public interest in deciding whether such publication was to be prevented; accordingly, an injunction to prevent future publication which had not yet been threatened was not granted.

89 See Bonnard v Perryman [1891] 2 Ch 269; Herbage v The Times Newspapers and Others (1981) The Times, 1 May.

90 [1990] 1 AC 109; [1990] 3 WLR 776; [1988] 3 All ER 545, HL; in the Court of Appeal [1990] 1 AC 109; [1988] 3 All ER 545, p 594.

It appears likely that the permanent injunctions would have been granted but for the massive publication of Spycatcher abroad. That factor seems to have tipped the balance in favour of the newspapers. It is arguable that the operation of the public interest defence in this instance came too close to allowing for judicial value judgments rather than application of a clear legal rule. Without a Bill of Rights to protect freedom of speech, the Law Lords, it is suggested, showed a tendency to be swayed by establishment arguments. The judgment also made it clear that once the information has become available from other sources, even though the plaintiff played no part in its dissemination and indeed tried to prevent it, an injunction would be unlikely to be granted. This principle was affirmed in Lord Advocate v Scotsman Publications Ltd,[92] which concerned the publication of extracts from Inside Intelligence by Antony Cavendish. The interlocutory injunction sought by the Crown was refused by the House of Lords on the ground that there had been a small amount of prior publication and the possible damage to national security was very nebulous. The decision suggests that the degree of prior publication may be weighed against the significance of the disclosures in question: if less innocuous material had been in issue, an injunction might have been granted.

The Observer and the Guardian applied to the European Commission on Human Rights claiming, inter alia, that the grant of the temporary injunctions had breached Art 10 of the Convention, which guarantees freedom of expression. Having given its opinion that the temporary injunctions constituted such a breach, the Commission referred the case to the court. In Observer and Guardian v UK,[93] the Court found that the injunctions clearly constituted an interference with the newspapers' freedom of expression; the question was whether the interference fell within one of the exceptions provided for by para 2 of Art 10. The injunctions fell within two of the para 2 exceptions: maintaining the authority of the judiciary and protecting national security. However, those exceptions could be invoked only if the injunctions were necessary in a democratic society in the sense that they corresponded to a pressing social need and were proportionate to the aims pursued.

91 [1990] 1 AC 109; [1990] 3 WLR 776; [1988] 3 All ER 545, p 638; for comment, see Williams (1989) 48 CLJ 1; Cripps, Y, 'Breach of copyright and confidence: the Spycatcher effect' [1989] PL 13; Barendt, E, 'Spycatcher and freedom of speech' [1989] PL 204; Michael, J, 'Spycatcher's end?' (1989) 52 MLR 389; Narain, BJ (1988) 39 NILQ 73 and (1987) 137 NLJ 723 and 724; Burnett, D and Thomas, R (1989) 16 JLS 210; Jones, G, 'Breach of confidence – after Spycatcher' (1989) 42 CLP 49; Kingsford-Smith, D and Oliver, D (eds), Economical With the Truth, 1990, ESC, chapters by Pannick and Austin; Ewing and Gearty, op. cit., fn 28 at 152–69; Turnbull, M, The Spycatcher Trial, 1988; Bailey, Harris and Jones, op. cit., fn 1 at 435–50.

92 [1990] 1 AC 812; [1989] 2 All ER 852, CA.

93 (1991) 14 EHRR 153; for comment see Leigh, I, 'Spycatcher in Strasbourg' [1992] PL 200–8.

The Court considered these questions with regard first to the period from 11 July 1986 to 30 July 1987. The injunctions had the aim of preventing publication of material which, according to evidence presented by the Attorney General, might have created a risk of detriment to MI5. The nature of the risk was uncertain as the exact contents of the book were not known at that time because it was still only available in manuscript form. Further, they ensured the preservation of the Attorney General's right to be granted a permanent injunction; if Spycatcher material had been published before that claim could be heard, the subject matter of the action would have been damaged or destroyed. In the court's view, these factors established the existence of a pressing social need. Were the actual restraints imposed proportionate to these aims? The injunctions did not prevent the papers pursuing a campaign for an inquiry into the operation of the security services and, though preventing publication for a long time – over a year – the material in question could not be classified as urgent news. Thus, it was found that the interference complained of was proportionate to the ends in view.

The court then considered the period from 30 July 1987 to 30 October 1988, after publication of Spycatcher had taken place in the US. That event changed the situation: in the court's view, the aim of the injunctions was no longer to keep secret information secret; it was to attempt to preserve the reputation of MI5 and to deter others who might be tempted to follow Peter Wright's example. It was uncertain whether the injunctions could achieve those aims and it was not clear that the newspapers who had not been concerned with the publication of Spycatcher should be enjoined as an example to others. Further, after 30 July it was not possible to maintain the Attorney General's rights as a litigant because the substance of his claim had already been destroyed; had permanent injunctions been obtained against the newspapers, that would not have preserved the confidentiality of the material in question. Thus, the injunctions could no longer be said to be necessary either to protect national security or to maintain the authority of the judiciary. Maintenance of the injunctions after publication of the book in the US therefore constituted a violation of Art 10.

This was a cautious judgment. It suggests that had the book been published in the US after the House of Lords' decision to uphold the temporary injunctions, no breach of Art 10 would have occurred, despite the fact that publication of extracts from the book had already occurred in the US[94] and the UK. The Court seems to have been readily persuaded by the Attorney General's argument that a widely framed injunction was needed in July 1986, but it is arguable that it was wider than it needed to be to prevent a risk to national security. It could have required the newspapers to refrain from publishing Wright material which had not been previously published by others until (if) the action to prevent publication of the book was lost. Such wording would have taken care of any national security interest; therefore, wording going beyond that was disproportionate to that aim.

94 The Washington Post published certain extracts in the US on 3 May 1987.

Thus, although the newspapers 'won', the judgment is unlikely to have a significant liberalising influence on the principles governing the grant of temporary injunctions on the grounds of breach of confidence. The minority judges in the court set themselves against the narrow view that the authority of the judiciary is best preserved by allowing a claim of confidentiality set up in the face of a strong competing public interest to found an infringement of freedom of speech for over a year. Judge Morenilla argued that prior restraint should be imposed in such circumstances only where disclosure would result in immediate, serious and irreparable damage to the public interest.[95] It might be said that such a test would impair the authority of the judiciary in the sense that the rights of litigants would not be sufficiently protected. However, following the judgment of the Lords, the test at the interlocutory stage allowed a case based on a weak argument to prevail on the basis that the court could not weigh the evidence at that stage and therefore had to grant an injunction in order to preserve confidentiality until the case could be fully looked into. As noted above, this stance can mean that the other party does not pursue the case to the permanent stage and, therefore, freedom of speech is suppressed on very flimsy grounds. Thus, a greater burden to show the well founded nature of the claim of danger to the public interest – even if not as heavy as that under the test proposed by Judge Morenilla – should be placed on the plaintiff, and such a burden would be, it is argued, more in accord with the duties of the court under ss 6 and 12 of the HRA.

The result of the ruling in the European Court of Human Rights appears to be that where there has been an enormous amount of prior publication, an interim injunction should not be granted, but that it can be when there is at least some evidence of a threat to national security posed by publication coupled with a lesser degree of prior publication. It meant that the action for breach of confidence was still of great value as part of the legal scheme bolstering government secrecy.

The position, however, has now been affected by the decision of the House of Lords in Cream Holdings Ltd v Banerjee.[96] This decision gives the definitive interpretation of the meaning of s 12(3) HRA, which provides, inter alia, that no relief affecting the Convention right to freedom of expression '. . . is to be granted so as to restrain publication before trial unless the court is satisfied that the applicant is likely to establish that publication should not be allowed'. It is discussed in detail in Chapter 9 and it is not proposed to repeat that discussion here. The key point is that the effect of the decision of the House of Lords, in nearly all cases – absent the claim of immediate and serious danger to life, limb, or presumably national security – is that the party seeking the injunction, that is the government in these kinds of cases, must show not only an arguable case, as previously, but that it is 'more likely than not' that they will succeed at final trial.[97] This approach, assuming it is applied consistently to Spycatcher-type cases, should make it significantly harder for future governments to obtain gagging injunctions against the media. The post-HRA decision discussed below, although made before Cream Holdings, was taken under s 12(3) and appears to confirm this.

95 He relied on the ruling to this effect of the US Supreme Court in Nebraska Press Association v Stuart (1976) 427 US 539.
96 [2004] 3 WLR 918. For comment see Smith ATH, [2005] 64(1) CLJ 4.
97 See further Chapter 9 at pp 988–90.

Case law subsequent to Spycatcher and conclusions

The decision in AG v Times[98] suggest that Art 10 is having a greater impact in breach of confidence actions than it had at Strasbourg. Tomlinson, a former MI6 officer, wrote a book, The Big Breach, about his experiences in MI6[99] which The Sunday Times intended to serialise. There had been a small amount of publication of the material in Russia. The Attorney General sought an injunction to restrain publication. The key issue concerned the degree of prior publication required before it could be said that the material had lost its quality of confidentiality. The Attorney General proposed the formula: 'publication has come to the widespread attention of the public at large.'[100] This formula would have meant that injunctions could be obtained even after a high degree of prior publication and therefore it was unacceptable to The Sunday Times. However, the two parties agreed on a formula: that the material had already been published in any other newspaper, magazine or other publication whether within or outside the jurisdiction of the court, to such an extent that the information is in the public domain (other than in a case where the only such publication was made by or caused by the defendants). The Attorney General, however, contended that the defendants had to demonstrate that this was the case, which meant that they had to obtain clearance from the Attorney General before publishing.

In arguing against this contention at first instance, the newspaper invoked Art 10 and also relied on sub-sections 12(3) and (4) of the HRA.[101] It was argued that the restriction proposed by the Attorney General would be disproportionate to the aim pursued and therefore could not be justified in a democratic society. The decision in Bladet-Tromsø v Norway[102] was referred to, in which the Court said that it is incumbent on the media 'to impart information and ideas concerning matters of public interest. Not only does the press have the task of imparting such information and ideas, the public has the right to receive them'.[103] Taking these arguments into account, it was found at first instance that the Attorney General had to demonstrate why there was a public interest in restricting publication. No injunction was granted since it was found that he had not done so. On appeal, the same stance was taken. It was found that the requirement to seek clearance should not be imposed: the editor had to form his own judgment as to whether the material could be said to be already in the public domain. That position was, the Court found, most consonant with the requirements of Art 10 and s 12.

This decision suggests that, bearing in mind the requirements of the HRA, an injunction is unlikely to be granted where a small amount of prior publication has already taken place. It does not, however, decide the question of publication where no prior publication has taken place, but the material is of public interest (which could clearly have been said of the Wright material). Following Bladet-Tromsø v Norway it is suggested that an injunction should not be granted where such material is likely, imminently, to come into the public domain, a position consistent with the demands

98 [2001] EMLR 19.

99 Tomlinson was charged with an offence under the Official Secrets Act, s 1, pleaded guilty and was imprisoned for six months.

100 Ibid para 2.

101 For discussion of s 12(4) HRA, see Chapter 9, pp 950–54.

102 (1999) 6 BHRC 599.

103 Ibid at para 62.

of s 12(4), which refers to such a likelihood. Even where this cannot be said to be the case, it would be consonant with the requirements of Art 10 and s 12 to refuse to grant an injunction on the basis of the duty of newspapers to report on such material. The burden would be placed on the state to seek to establish that a countervailing pressing social need was present and that the injunction did not go further than necessary in order to serve the end in view.[104]

4 Defence Advisory notices[105]

The government and the media may avoid the head-on confrontation which occurred in the Spycatcher litigation by means of a curious institution known until 1992 as the 'D' (Defence) notice system. This system, which effectively means that the media censor themselves in respect of publication of official information, can obviate the need to seek injunctions to prevent publication. The 'D' Notice Committee was set up with the object of letting the Press know which information could be printed and at what point: it was intended that if sensitive political information was covered by a 'D' notice, an editor would decide against printing it. The system is entirely voluntary and in theory the fact that a 'D' notice has not been issued does not mean that a prosecution under the Official Secrets Act 1989 is precluded, although in practice it is very unlikely. Further, guidance obtained from the Secretary to the Committee does not amount to a straightforward 'clearance'. Press representatives sit on the committee as well as civil servants and officers of the armed forces.

The value and purpose of the system was called into question due to the injunction obtained against the BBC in respect of My Country Right or Wrong, a programme that concerned issues raised by the Spycatcher litigation; the BBC consulted the 'D' Notice Committee before broadcasting and were told that the programme did not affect national security. However, the Attorney General then obtained an injunction preventing transmission on the ground of breach of confidence, thereby disregarding the 'D' Notice Committee.

Some criticism has been levelled at the system: in the Third Report from the Defence Committee,[106] the 'D' notice system was examined and it was concluded that it was failing to fulfil its role. It was found that major newspapers did not consult their 'D' notices to see what was covered by them and that the wording of 'D' notices was so wide as to render them meaningless. The system conveyed an appearance of censorship which had provoked strong criticism. It was determined that the machinery for the administration of 'D' notices and the 'D' notices themselves needed revision. The review which followed this reduced the number of notices and confined them to specific areas. The system was reviewed again in 1992 (The Defence Advisory Notices: A Review of the D Notice System, MOD Open Government Document No 93/06) leading to a reduction in the number of notices to six. They were renamed Defence Advisory notices to reflect their voluntary nature.

104 The manner in which the law of common law contempt may allow for the imposition of widespread restrictions upon the media on the back of an initial breach of confidence injunction is considered in detail in Chapter 5 at pp 363 et seq.

105 On the system generally, see Jaconelli, J, 'The 'D' Notice system' [1982] PL 39; Fairley, D (1990) 10 OJLS 430.

106 (1979–80) HC 773, 640 i–v, The 'D' Notice System.

5 Freedom of information: general principles and the position prior to the 2000 Act

Principles of freedom of information and Article 10 ECHR

The citizen's 'right to know' is recognised in most democracies including the USA, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Denmark, Sweden, Holland, Norway, Greece and France. In such countries, the general principle of freedom of information is subject to exceptions where information falls into specific categories. In terms of principle, and in particular, as seen through the lens of Art 10 ECHR, an assertion of a right to access to information can be distinguished from an assertion of a free speech right,[107] although the two are clearly linked. This distinction receives support from the wording of Art 10 itself, which speaks in terms of the freedom to 'receive and impart information', thus appearing to exclude from its provisions the right to demand information from the unwilling speaker. Moreover, the phrase 'without interference from public authorities' does not suggest that governments should come under any duty to act in order to ensure that information is received.

There are at least three reasons why access to information is often treated as a distinct interest by commentators and constitutional courts. First, freedom of information can be justified by reference to values that go beyond those underlying freedom of speech. It is generally accepted that the quality of decision-making will improve if access to official information allows citizens to scrutinise the workings of the government and public authorities generally. Moreover, the accountability of the government to the public is increased, since pressure can more readily be brought to bear on the government regarding the effects of its policies and citizens are able to make a more informed choice at election times, in accordance with the argument from democracy.

Second, information may be sought even though it is not intended that it should be communicated to others. It is not clear that the free speech justifications considered in the Introduction to Part II would apply to such a situation, and therefore it would tend to be considered purely as an access to information or privacy issue. Indeed, in such instances, the seeker of information might well be asserting a right not merely to gain access to the information, but also to have its confidential quality maintained. Access rights under the Data Protection Act 1998[108] often take account of both interests, and therefore may be said to be opposed to free speech interests. Thus, it is clear that many demands for access to information are not based on an assertion of free speech interests. Rights of access to information overlap with certain privacy interests since they may cover many situations in which a person might wish to receive information, apart from that of the individual who wishes to obtain and publicise government information. However, freedom of information is most readily associated with the demand for the receipt of information with a view to placing it in the public domain.

Third, information intended to be placed in the public domain may be sought when there is no speaker willing to disclose it, or where the body which 'owns' the information is unwilling that it should be disclosed. Whether such communication of confidential information should be regarded as 'speech' or not,[109] it is clearly a necessary precondition for the production of speech and therefore can be treated as deserving of the same protection as 'speech' in that the result will be that the public will be informed and debate on issues of public interest will not be stifled. The argument that such dissemination of information will render the government more readily accountable is strongly related to the justification for free speech discussed in the Introduction to Part II,[110] which argues that it is indispensable to democracy, since it enables informed participation by the citizenry.

107 Leander v Sweden (1987) A 116; Guerra v Italy (1998) 26 EHRR 357, esp. at para 53.
108 For discussion, see Chapter 9 at pp 926 et seq.

However, freedom of speech guarantees, including Art 10, do not tend to encompass the imposition of positive obligations and therefore, in general, are violated when a willing speaker is prevented from speaking rather than in the situation where information deriving ultimately from an unwilling speaker – usually the government – is sought, entailing the assertion of a positive right. Thus, a distinction should be drawn between gaining access to the information and then placing it in the public domain – the second situation giving rise to a free speech interest. However, these issues have tended to arise together within the legal scheme in the UK, which has traditionally protected a 'closed' system of government; it is therefore convenient to consider both within the same chapter.

As these remarks indicate, Art 10 of the ECHR cannot be expected to have much impact on access to information, in the sense of using Art 10 to create an access right. The Freedom of Information (FoI) Act, introduced in 2000, provides for the first time a statutory right of access to official information. However, it is suggested that the basic values underlying Art 10, in particular the argument from democracy,[111] may be able to be relied upon in as a means of interpreting the provisions of the new FoI Act.

Probably the most important value associated with freedom of information is the need for the citizen to understand as fully as possible the working of government, in order to render it accountable. The following discussion therefore places a strong emphasis on the choices that were made as to the release of information relating to public authorities – not only to central government – in the FoI Act 2000.

Rights of access to information prior to the Freedom of Information Act[112]

The UK has traditionally resisted freedom of information legislation and, until 1989, criminalised the unauthorised disclosure of any official information at all, however trivial, under s 2 of the Official Secrets Act 1911, thereby creating a climate of secrecy in the Civil Service which greatly hampered the efforts of those who wished 109 The European Court of Human Rights takes the view that it should not. In the Gaskin case (1990) 12 EHRR 36 it viewed a demand for access to information which the body holding it did not wish to disclose as giving rise only to an Art 8 issue, not an Art 10 issue. The US Supreme Court has held that the First Amendment does not impose an affirmative duty on government to make information not in the public domain available to journalists (417 US 817). For discussion of this issue generally, see Barendt, Freedom of Speech (2005), at 108 et seq.

110 See pp 303–5.

111 For discussion of the Court's 'privileging' of political speech, see Part II introduction, pp 309–10.

112 See, generally, Birkinshaw, op. cit., fn 1; Reforming the Secret State, 1990; 'The White Paper on open government' [1993] PL 557.

to obtain and publish information about the workings of government. The attitude to secrecy exemplified by US freedom of information legislation, which is founded on the presumption that information must be disclosed unless specifically exempted, may be contrasted with this traditional position in the UK. American freedom of information provision can, in particular, be contrasted with provision under the UK Public Records Act 1958, which is considered below. It provides a measure of access to official information, but only after 30 years or more have passed. Considering all the various and overlapping methods of preventing disclosure of official information in the UK, and bearing in mind the contrasting attitude to this issue evinced in other democracies, it is fair to say that that until 2000, the UK was being increasingly isolated in its stance as a resister of freedom of information legislation. Since virtually all other democracies had introduced such legislation, that stance was indefensible in a mature democracy. It was finally abandoned when the Freedom of Information Act 2000 was introduced.

However, even before that point, and before the Labour Government came to power in 1997, there had been certain developments under the Conservative Governments of 1989–97, especially under the Major Government, which suggested that a gradual movement towards more open government was taking place in the UK. The Data Protection Act 1984 allowed access to personal information held on computerised files. A very limited right to disclosure of information in the field of local government was created.[113] The Campaign for Freedom of Information had, from 1985 onwards, brought about acceptance of the principle of access rights in some areas of official action. It supported Private Members' Bills, which allowed for rights of access to information in certain limited areas. Disclosure of a range of information was decriminalised under the Official Secrets Act 1989, as indicated above.

After the 1992 general election, the Prime Minister promised a review of secrecy in Whitehall to be conducted by William Waldegrave, the minister with responsibility for the Citizen's Charter, which would concentrate on the large number of statutory instruments which prevent public disclosure of government information in various areas, with a view to removing those which did not appear to fulfil a pressing need. It was also promised that a list of secret Cabinet committees with their terms of reference and their ministerial membership would be published. It was proposed that reform of the Official Secrets Act 1989 would be undertaken, so that disclosure of a specific document would be criminalised as opposed to disclosure of a document belonging to a class of documents which might cause harm. In fact, this reform did not take place. A White Paper on Open Government (Cm 2290) was published in July 1993 and a Code of Practice on Access to Government Information was introduced in 1994. The Code has now been replaced by the Freedom of Information Act when the latter came into force on 1 January 2005. However, it is important to have a basic understanding of how the Code worked, and the scope of its exemptions, in order to decide how much of an advance the 2000 Act really was.

113 Part VA of the Local Government Act 1972 (introduced by the Local Government (Access to Information) Act 1985. The right allowed members of the public to inspect local authority minutes, reports and background papers and to take copies of them. However, a number of significant areas were exempt from the access right; also, council 'working parties' are exempt.

The Code provided that non-exempted government departments should publish 'facts and analysis of the facts which the government considers relevant and important in framing major policy proposals and decisions',[114] 'explanatory material on departments' dealings with the public', and 'reasons for administrative decisions to those affected', and information in accordance with the Citizen's Charter on the operation of public services.[115] Such departments would also provide information on receipt of specific requests. A key limitation of the Code was that it afforded access only to information, as opposed to documents. As the Campaign for Freedom of Information has pointed out, this was: 'a potentially overwhelming defect: the opportunities for selective editing are obvious.'[116]

The Code was of course subject to exemptions. Particular exemptions are compared with those under the 2000 Act below, but it is useful to give a general indication of the scope and number of exemptions which existed under the Code. The exemptions could be divided into two groups: those subject to a harm test and those which were not. The key exemptions within the former group covered information relating to: defence, security and international relations, internal discussion and advice, law enforcement and legal proceedings, effective management of the economy and collection of tax, effective management and operations of the public service, third parties' commercial confidence, immigration and nationality information, medical information given in confidence, information which is soon to be published or where disclosure would be premature, and research, statistics and analysis where disclosure could be misleading. The latter group included information within the following categories: communications with the royal household, public employment, public appointments and honours, privacy of an individual, information given in confidence, information covered by statutory and other restrictions. Unreasonable, voluminous and vexatious requests, or requests requiring an 'unreasonable diversion of resources', were also exempt.

The Act was 'enforced' by means of complaint to the Ombudsman. There were two main issues in relation to this method. First, members of the public could not complain directly to the Ombudsman, but had to complain initially to an MP, who was then supposed to pass on the complaint to the Ombudsman. This was a widely criticised system.[117] Second, the Ombudsman, in keeping with the nature of his role, had no power to enforce his findings. His office worked by persuasion and there had been instances of refusals by government departments to comply with recommendations for disclosure,[118] although these were rare instances. The Ombudsman's lack of powers to compel release of information merely highlighted the fact that the Code was ultimately a 'grace and favour' system, which gave no right to government information. The Freedom of Information Act 2000 thus signalled a break with the traditional culture of secrecy: 'the principle that communication was the privilege of the state rather than of the citizen was at last . . . reversed.'[119]

114 Paragraph 3(i).
115 Paragraph 3(ii) and (iii).
116 Appendices to the Minutes of Evidence taken before the Select Committee on the PCA, session 1993–94, HC 33 (1993–94), Vol II, p 258.
117 See, e.g., the Public Service Committee First Special Report, HC 67 (1996–97), para 9.
118 See below, fn 179.
119 Vincent, The Culture of Secrecy, Britain 1832–1998, 1998, p 321.

The Public Records Acts

The UK Public Records Act 1958, as amended by the Public Records Act 1967, provides that public records will not be transferred to the Public Records Office in order to be made available for inspection until the expiration of 30 years, and longer periods can be prescribed for 'sensitive information'. Such information will include personal details about persons who are still living and papers affecting the security of the state. Some such information can be withheld for 100 years or for ever, and there is no means of challenging such decisions. For example, at the end of 1987, a great deal of information about the Windscale fire in 1957 was disclosed, although some items are still held back. Robertson argues that information is withheld to prevent embarrassment to bodies such as the police or civil servants rather than to descendants of persons mentioned in it; and in support of this he cites examples such as police reports on the NCCL (1935–41), flogging of vagrants (1919), and decisions against prosecuting James Joyce's Ulysses (1924) as instances of material which in January 1989 was listed as closed for a century.[120]

However, a somewhat less restrictive approach to the release of archives became apparent in 1994. In 1992–93, a review was conducted of methods of ensuring further openness in government and its results were published in a White Paper entitled Open Government (Cm 2290).[121] The White Paper, as well as proposing the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information already discussed, promised that there would be a reduction in the number of public records withheld from release beyond 30 years. A review group established by Lord Mackay in 1992 suggested that records should only be closed for more than 30 years where their disclosure would cause harm to defence, national security, international relations and economic interests of the UK; information supplied in confidence; personal information which would cause substantial distress if disclosed. Under s 3(4) of the 1958 Act, records may still be retained within departments for 'administrative' reasons or for any other special reason.

The FoI, Part VI and Sched 8 amends the 1958 Act. Part VI amends the exemptions of Part II of the 1958 Act in respect of historical records, with a view to enhancing the ease of access to them. Section 63(1) of the FoI Act reduces the number of exemptions that apply to such records. This is done in three tranches. First, exemptions are removed after 30 years in respect of a number of categories of information, including information prejudicial to the economic interests of the UK, information obtained with a view to prosecution, court records, information prejudicial to public affairs and commercial interests. Second, one exemption is removed after 60 years – in respect of information concerning the conferring of honours. Third, a large number of exemptions under s 31 relating to various investigations and the maintenance of law and order are removed after 100 years. These modest provisions are to be welcomed, as easing the task of historians, but their limited nature should be questioned; especially, it must be asked why any absolute exemptions, in particular those relating to intelligence information, remain.[122]

120 See Robertson, G, Media Law, 1999, Chapter 10 'Public Records'.

121 The White Paper proposals in relation to public records are considered by Birkinshaw, P, 'I only ask for information – the White Paper on open government' [1993] PL 557.

122 Cf the provision in respect of intelligence information held in the Public Record Office of Northern Ireland, which will no longer be subject to an absolute exemption, under FoI Act, s 64(2).

6 The Freedom of Information Act 2000

Introduction

The position of the UK prior to the 2000 Act may be contrasted with the position in other democracies which have introduced freedom of information legislation[123] within the last 30 years. Canada introduced its Access to Information Act in 1982, while America has had such legislation since 1967. Its Freedom of Information Act 1967 applies to all parts of the Federal Government unless an exemption applies. Exempted categories include information concerning defence, law enforcement and foreign policy. The exemptions can be challenged in court and the onus of proof will be on the agency withholding the information to prove that disclosure could bring about the harm the exemption was intended to prevent. However, although the principle of freedom of information in America has attracted praise, its application in practice has often been criticised.[124] In particular, the American business community considers that the system is being abused by persons who have a particular financial interest in uncovering commercial information. A number of reforms have been suggested since 1980 and, in 1986, a major FoI Act reform was passed which extended the exemption available to law enforcement practices.

With the example set by other democracies in mind, commentators have been arguing for a number of years that the voluntary Code should be replaced by a broad statutory right of access to information, enforceable by another independent body or through the courts.[125] In particular, many commentators considered that one of the messages of the Scott Report published in February 1996 was that the UK needed an FoI Act, although it is impossible to know whether FoI could have prevented the Matrix Churchill affair.[126] The report tellingly revealed the lack of 'openness' in government: the system appeared to accept unquestioningly the need to tell Parliament and the public as little as possible about subjects which were seen as politically sensitive. It was apparent that the voluntary Code could not provide a sufficient response to the concerns which the report aroused. The Matrix Churchill affair, which led to the Scott Inquiry, would not, it seems, have come to the attention of the public but for the refusal of the judge in the Matrix Churchill trial to accept that the information covered by the PII certificates, relating to the change in the policy of selling arms to Iraq, could not be revealed. As the Select Committee on the PCA pointed out in its Second Report, an FoI Act would tend to change the culture of secrecy in government departments.

Nevertheless, the Conservative Governments of 1979–97 had no plans to enact FoI legislation. The Select Committee on the PCA recommended the introduction of an FoI Act,[127] but this proposal was rejected by the then Conservative Government.[128] The Labour Government which came into office in 1997 had made a manifesto commitment 123 See McBride, T, 'The Official Information Act 1982' (1984) 11 NZULR 82; Curtis, LJ, 'Freedom of information in Australia' (1983) 14 Fed LR 5; Janisch, HN, 'The Canadian Access to Information Act' [1982] PL 534; for America, see Supperstone, M, Brownlie's Law of Public Order and National Security, 1982, pp 270–87; Birkinshaw, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 2.

124 For discussion of criticism in the US see Birkinshaw, op. cit., fn 1 at 39–40.

125 See Birkinshaw, op. cit., fn 1; Tomkins, A, The Constitution after Scott: Government Unwrapped, 1998, Clarendon, Chapter 3, at 124–26.

126 See Birkinshaw, P, 'Freedom of information' (1997) 50 Parliamentary Affairs, at 166; Tomkins, op. cit., at 93, Chapter 3, at 123–26.

127 Paragraph 126.

128 HC 75, HC 67 (1996–97).

to introduce an FoI Act. The White Paper, Your Right to Know,[129] was published on 11 December 1997. The White Paper stated: 'Unnecessary secrecy in government leads to arrogance in governance and defective decision-making . . . the climate of public opinion has changed: people expect much greater openness and accountability from government than they used to.'[130] A comprehensive statutory right of access to information was finally introduced with the inception of the Freedom of Information Act 2000.

The Act is the latest of the Labour Government's major measures of constitutional reform, receiving Royal Assent on 30 November 2000.[131] As will be indicated below, the White Paper proposed an FoI regime that would have had a radical impact.[132] Had it been implemented, not only would it have brought the UK into line with other democracies as regards its freedom of information provision, but also in a number of respects the legislation would have been more bold and radical than that in place in other countries. When the Bill appeared, it was a grave disappointment,[133] but a number of improvements were made to it during the Parliamentary process. The Act that has emerged cannot be termed radical – far from it – but it shows an adherence to the principle of openness which was absent in the Bill.

In what follows, the aim is to provide an overview of the key provisions of the Act and an indication of some of the main criticisms made of it during its passage through Parliament. It should be noted that initially the Act does not extend to Scotland, which has introduced its own, somewhat tougher legislation, via the Scottish Parliament.[134]

Fundamentals of FoI and the 2000 Act[135]

Rodney Austin identifies a number of common features of FoI regimes, which, together, indicate in essence how FoI legislation differs from the approach taken by the UK up until the 2000 Act.[136] As indicated above, the historical approach of the UK has been to make no comprehensive statutory provision for disclosure of official information,

129 Cm 3818.
130 White Paper, Your Right to Know, Cm 3818, 1997.
131 The best source of detailed critical analysis of the Bill may be found on the website of the Campaign for Freedom of Information (http://www.cfoi.org.uk), which contains numerous briefing notes and press releases. None of these is on the final text of the Act, but those prepared for the House of Lords' Committee, Report and Third Reading stages are extremely useful, provided they are read alongside the Act itself, and the following analysis has relied on those notes.
132 See Birkinshaw, P, 'An "All singin' and all dancin'" affair: New Labour's proposals for FoI' (1998) PL 176.
133 See Birkinshaw, P and Parry, N, 'Every trick in the book: the Freedom of Information Bill 1999' (1999) 4 EHRLR 373.
134 The Freedom of Information (Scotland) Act 2002, ASP 13.
135 It should be noted that environmental information is covered separately by the Environment Information Regulations, which also came into force on 1 January 2005 and which cover '. . . information about pollution, energy, noise and radiation . . . GMOs, air and water borne disease agents, food contamination, planning, road building and transport schemes'. The basic scheme of the Regulations is that of the 2000 Act, but 'The exemptions are fewer, all are subject to a public interest test and there is no upper cost limit for requests.' See 'Freedom of Information for Journalists' – CFOI website.
136 'Freedom of information: a Sheep in Wolf's Clothing?', in Jowell, J and Oliver, D (eds), The Changing Constitution, 5th edn, 2004, p 362.

except under the very limited provisions of the Public Records Act 1958; the starting point instead was the criminalisation of disclosure in certain categories under the Official Secrets Acts and by virtue of numerous other statutory provisions. By contrast, the essence of FoI regimes, identified by Austin, are: the creation of public rights of access to official information; placing the determination and enforcement of those rights in the hands of 'an authority independent of government', whether the courts or an information commissioner; the extension of the basic right to information to cover 'all official information other than that specified to be exempt'.[137] The assumption lying behind FoI legislation is that the release of information is something which is desirable in general terms, the burden lying upon government to justify refusal to release in particular cases.

The 2000 Act may be said partially to share the bases of FoI legislation identified above; as will be explained below, it will give UK citizens, for the first time, a statutory right to official information, which will extend to all such information except that which the Act defines as exempt. In terms of enforcement, there is a mixed picture: as will also appear below, the right to information given by the Act is enforceable by an independent Information Commissioner, who, in the final resort, can enforce her orders through invoking the courts' power to punish for contempt of court. However, the Commissioner's power to force government to disclose information will not apply to some of the information that may be released under the Act: her disclosure orders can in some cases be quashed by Ministerial veto. This is perhaps the first major concern about the Act. The second is the great number and width of the exemptions it contains and the fact that many of these amount to 'class exemptions' where, in order to refuse release of the information, it is not necessary to satisfy a 'harm test', that is, show that release of the particular information requested would prejudice a particular interest, but merely that the information falls into a specified class and is, for that reason alone, exempt.

The scope of the Act

The Act covers 'public authorities'. Section 3 sets out the various ways in which a body can be a public authority. Instead of using the method adopted in the HRA, which, similarly, covers only 'public authorities' and which defines them by means of a very broad and general, non-exhaustive definition, the FoI Act takes the different route of listing a number of public authorities in Sched 1. The list is divided into two halves. First, Parts I–V list those bodies that are clearly public authorities; under s 6 of the HRA they would be standard public authorities.[138] Second, Parts VI–VII list those bodies that are only public authorities so long as they continue to meet the conditions set out in s 4(2) and (3) – that they have been set up by government and their members appointed by central government. Such bodies would probably also be viewed as standard public authorities under the HRA. But the list is not exhaustive, since s 4(1) gives the Secretary of State the power to add bodies to the list in Parts VI–VII if they meet the conditions set out in s 4(2) and (3), by Order. Further, s 5 provides the Secretary of State with a power to designate a body as a public authority even though it is not listed in Sched 1, and does not meet the conditions set out in s 4(2) and (3), but which appears to him to be exercising public functions. These bodies would probably be viewed as functional public authorities under s 6 of the HRA.[139] Under s 3(1)(b), a publicly owned company as defined in s 6 is automatically a public body; no formal designation is needed. Section 6 defines such bodies as those wholly owned by the Crown or any public authority listed in Sched 1, other than government departments.

137 Ibid.
138 See Chapter 4 at pp 216–20.

Some public authorities are covered only in respect of certain information they hold, in which case the Act only applies to that class of information (s 7(1)). Rather disturbingly, under s 7(3), the Secretary of State can amend Sched 1 so that a particular public authority becomes one which is subject only to such limited coverage by the Act – in effect potentially drastically limiting the range of information which can be sought from that authority.

It is suggested that although the FoI follows the model of the HRA in differentiating between public authorities as indicated, and between private and public bodies, Sched 1 read with ss 3–6 does not provide an exhaustive list of those bodies that are public authorities for the purposes of s 6 of the HRA, although these provisions provide a useful guide. The security and intelligence services, which are presumably standard public authorities under s 6 of the HRA, are omitted from Sched 1 and therefore they are completely excluded from the Act. They meet the conditions set out in s 4(2) and (3), but are – it is readily apparent – unlikely to be added to Sched 1, Parts VI–VII. The difference of approach between the two statutes is defensible; there may be cogent reasons why a body, such as the security service, should not provide information (although a complete exclusion is hard to defend), although it would be expected to observe the Convention rights in its operations.

Thus, the Act covers, in Sched 1, all government departments, the House of Commons, the House of Lords, quangos, the NHS, administrative functions of courts and tribunals, police authorities and chief officers of police, the armed forces, local authorities, local public bodies, schools and other public educational institutions, public service broadcasters. Under s 5, private organisations may be designated as public authorities in so far as they carry out statutory functions, as may the privatised utilities and private bodies working on contracted-out functions. The coverage of the Act is therefore far greater than under the Code and it is notable that some private sector bodies may be covered, although the government made it clear in debate on the Bill that a distinction between private and public bodies in terms of their obligations under the FoI Act should be strictly maintained and that s 5 should be used only to designate bodies discharging public functions.[140] The FoI is clearly not to be extended into the realm of business. The Act has been praised for the very wide range of bodies which it covers; in comparison with FoI regimes abroad, the coverage is very generous. But it should be noted that in fact, its coverage of private bodies discharging public functions is subject to the exercise of a discretion by the Secretary of State.

139 See Chapter 4 at pp 219–35.
140 HC Standing Committee B, 11 January 2000, Col 67.

The basic rights granted by the Act

The Act begins with an apparently broad and generous statement of the rights it confers. The Act grants two basic rights. Section 1(1) states:

> Any person making a request for information to a public authority is entitled –
>
> (a) to be informed in writing by the public authority whether it holds information of the description specified in the request [this is referred to in the Act as 'the duty to confirm or deny']; and
> (b) if that is the case, to have that information communicated to him.

It may be noted that the right conferred under s 1(1)(b) can cover original documents as well as 'information',[141] and in this respect the Act is clearly an improvement on the Code.

Both these fundamental rights are subject to the numerous exemptions that the Act contains. In other words, broadly, where an authority is exempt from providing information under the Act, it is also entitled to refuse even to state whether it holds the information or not, although in some cases, it may only do this where stating whether it holds the information would have the effect of causing the prejudice that the exemption in question is designed to prevent. Such cases will be considered below.

Exemptions under the Act

Under the White Paper, certain public bodies were to be completely excluded from the Act. One was Parliament, on the ground that, as stated in the White Paper, its deliberations are already open and on the public record. The security services, including GCHQ, were also excluded on the ground that they would not be able to carry out their duties effectively if subject to the legislation. Thus, the security services were to be subject to a blanket agency exemption. Apart from these exemptions, there were no exempt categories of information at all held by bodies which are subject to the Act. But seven specified interests were indicated in the White Paper, which took the place of the exemptions under the Code. The test for disclosure was based on an assessment of the harm that disclosure might cause and the need to safeguard the public interest. The test was: will this disclosure cause substantial harm to one of these interests? The first of these interests covered national security, defence and international relations. Obviously, this interest covered a very wide range of information. A further five interests were: law enforcement, personal privacy, commercial confidentiality, the safety of the individual, the public and the environment, and information supplied in confidence. Finally, there was an interest termed 'the integrity of decision-making and policy advice processes in government'. In this category, a different test was used: it was not necessary to show that disclosure of the information would cause substantial harm; a test of simple harm only was used. The reason for placing this information in a special category was, in the words of the White Paper: 'now more than ever, government needs space and time in which to assess arguments and conduct its own debates with a degree of privacy . . . [decision making in government] can be damaged by random and premature disclosure of its deliberations under Freedom of Information legislation.' This exemption was possibly the most controversial, since it meant that the full background to a decision could remain undisclosed, tending to restrict debate and challenge to it.

141 Section 84 defines information broadly to cover information 'recorded in any form', and in relation to matters covered by s 51(8) this includes unrecorded information.

Thus, the exemptions under the White Paper were relatively narrow and were subject to quite a strict harm test. They may be sharply contrasted with those that emerged under the Act which include a number of 'class'-based exemptions. Nevertheless, the exceptions under the Act will be, on the whole, less wide ranging than those under the Code, taking into account the limitations of the PCA's remit. In certain respects, however, the Code was, on its face, more generous, as indicated at various points below. In particular, the total exemption under s 21 did not appear in the Code in as broad a form,[142] and the exemption under s 35 is broader than the equivalent exemption was under the Code – in para 2.

The exemptions under the Act rely on the key distinction between 'class-' and 'harm-based' exemptions mentioned above. The harm-based exemptions under the Act are similar to those indicated in the White Paper: they require the public authority to show that the release of the information requested would, or would be likely to, cause prejudice to the interest specified in the exemption. However, it should be noted that even in relation to the 'harm-based' exemptions, the test used has been substantially watered down from that proposed in the White Paper. That document, as noted above, had used a 'substantial harm' test; the Act itself refers simply to 'prejudice' – a test that is evidently easier to satisfy. It may be noted that the equivalent Scottish Act uses the tougher test of 'substantial prejudice'. The Commissioner has issued a series of guidance notes on the interpretation and operation of the Act,[143] one of which deals with the 'prejudice' test.[144] Firstly, as to the meaning of prejudice, the Commissioner indicates how the term is to be interpreted, in general terms:

> In legal terminology, prejudice is commonly understood to mean harm and the Information Commissioner regards them as being equivalent. So, when considering how disclosure of information would prejudice the subject of the exemption being claimed, the public authority may find it more helpful to consider issues of harm or damage. Although prejudice need not be substantial, the Commissioner expects that it be more than trivial. Strictly, the degree of prejudice is not specified, so any level of prejudice might be argued. However, public authorities should bear in mind that the less significant the prejudice is shown to be, the higher the chance of the public interest falling in favour of disclosure.

This indicates that, at the least, the Commissioner is not minded to countenance trivial claims of prejudice.

As noted above, the prejudice-based exemptions can be pleaded on the basis that prejudice would be 'likely' to be caused by the release of information; it is not necessary to show that it would definitely occur. As to this, the Commissioner has said:

142 Paragraph 8 of the Code refers to information obtainable under existing statutory rights.
143 Available on the Commissioner's website: see www.foi.gov.uk.
144 Freedom of Information Act Awareness Guidance No 20.

> The phrase 'likely to prejudice' has been considered by the courts in the case of R (on the application of Alan Lord) and The Secretary of State for the Home Department. Although this case concerns the Data Protection Act, the Commissioner regards this interpretation as persuasive. The judgment reads:
>
> > " 'Likely' connotes a degree of probability where there is a very significant and weighty chance of prejudice to the identified public interests. The degree of risk must be such that there 'may very well' be prejudice to those interests, even if the risk falls short of being more probable than not."
>
> In other words, the probability of prejudice occurring need not be 'more likely than not', but there should certainly be substantially more than a remote possibility.

Once again, this approach will help to rule out flimsy or implausible claims of prejudice.

A number of exemptions are in any event class-based, meaning that in order to refuse the request, the authority only has to show that the information falls into the class of information covered by the exemption, not that its release would cause or be likely to cause harm or prejudice. It may be noted that the class exemptions can be further divided into two groups: those that are content-based, in the sense that no access to the information under the FoI or any other interest is available; and others, which relate not to the content of the information, but to the process of acquiring it. These distinctions are made clear below, in the first group of exemptions considered.

The Act complicates matters further by providing that, in relation to some, but not all, of the class exemptions, and almost all the 'harm exemptions', the authority, having decided that the information is prima facie exempt (either because the information falls into the requisite class exemption, or because the relevant harm test is satisfied, as the case may be), must still then go on to consider whether it should be released under the public interest test set out in s 2. This requires the authority to release the information unless 'in all the circumstances of the case, the public interest in maintaining the exemption outweighs the public interest in disclosing the information'. It should be noted that this provision was amended in the Lords so as to require release unless the interest in maintaining secrecy 'outweighs' the interest in disclosure. This was thought to provide greater protection for freedom of information, since it must be demonstrated that the need for secrecy is the more compelling interest in the particular case.

The strengthening of the public interest test which took place in the Lords led some Liberal Democrat peers to claim that its application to class exemptions in effect transformed them into 'harm-'based exemptions. However, it should be noted that the Campaign for Freedom of Information (CFOI) emphatically rejected this view, on cogent grounds. While the application of a public interest test to the class exemptions does provide for the opportunity to balance the interest in disclosure against that in secrecy, the test is not the same as it would be if considering a harm test. As the CFOI notes, where information falls into a class exemption, and an authority objects to disclosure even under the public interest test, it will be able not only to argue that the specific disclosure would have harmful effects, but also that the public interest would be harmed by any disclosure from within the relevant class of documents, regardless of the consequences of releasing the actual information in question.[145] By contrast, under a prejudice test, the authority must be able first to identify that harm would be caused by releasing the specific information requested, and then go on to show that that specific harm outweighs the public interest in disclosure.

In the result, the exemptions under the Act can actually be broken down into four different categories, starting with the most absolute exemptions and moving to the least. It is helpful to consider them in the order suggested by this categorisation, because the Act does not set out the exemptions in any systematic way, but rather randomly, so that class exemptions are mixed in with 'harm-based' exemptions, and 'absolute exemptions' with both. It should be noted that the following categorisation relates to categories of exemptions not necessarily to categories of information, although the two may be synonymous. The four suggested categories are as follows, and are described in order of their illiberality.

(a) 'Total' exemptions: that is, class exemptions to which the public interest test in s 2 does not apply. Thus, the public authority concerned only has to show that information sought falls into the exempt class, not that its disclosure would cause any harm or prejudice; and, there is no duty to consider whether the public interest in maintaining the exemption outweighs the public interest in disclosing the information.
(b) Class exemptions to which the s 2 public interest test does apply. This is self-explanatory.
(c) Harm-based exemptions to which the s 2 public interest test does not apply. In these exemptions, the authority has to show that the release of the particular information concerned would cause or be likely to cause the relevant prejudice, but then need not go on to consider whether this prejudice outweighs the public interest in disclosure: once prejudice is established, that is the end of the matter.
(d) Harm-based exemptions to which the s 2 public interest test does apply. These are the exemptions under which it is hardest for the public authority concerned to resist the release of information. To do so, it must first demonstrate prejudice or likely prejudice from the release of the particular information request and then, even if prejudice is shown, go on to consider whether the public interest in forestalling that prejudice outweighs the public interest in disclosing the information under s 2.

These categories are important, not only in terms of the substantive legal tests which must be satisfied before information may be withheld: they also have crucial practical consequences in terms of time limits and enforcement. As explained below, the 20-day deadline for releasing information does not apply to information released only on public interest grounds. More importantly, the Commissioner's decision to order release on such grounds can, in relation to information held by certain governmental bodies, be vetoed by Ministers (a matter discussed further below).

145 Freedom of Information Bill, House of Lords Third Reading, 21 November 2000 briefing notes, p 10.

As to what 'the public interest' in the Act means, the Commissioner has again given guidance.[146] Defining 'the public interest' as 'simply something which serves the interests of the public', the Commissioner guidance asserts that therefore when applying the public interest test to a request for disclosure 'the public authority is simply deciding whether in any particular case it serves the interests of the public better to withhold or to disclose information'. This, it has to be said, is not particularly helpful. However, the guidance goes on to make a number of rather more detailed points.

> It is also important to bear in mind that the competing interests to be considered are the public interest favouring disclosure against the public (rather than private) interest favouring the withholding of information. There will often be a private interest in withholding information which would reveal incompetence on the part of or corruption within the public authority or which would simply cause embarrassment to the authority. However, the public interest will favour accountability and good administration and it is this interest that must be weighed against the public interest in not disclosing the information.[147]

This should be self-evident, but it is worth stating. More usefully perhaps, the Commissioner takes the view that 'There is a presumption running through the Act that openness is, in itself, to beregarded as something which is in the public interest.' The Guidance goes on to enumerate, non-exhaustively some of the specific public-interest arguments in favour of disclosure generally:

- furthering the understanding of and participation in the public debate of issues of the day. This factor would come into play if disclosure would allow a more informed debate of issues under consideration by the government or a local authority;
- promoting accountability and transparency by public authorities for decisions taken by them. Placing an obligation on authorities and officials to provide reasoned explanations for decisions made will improve the quality of decisions and administration;
- promoting accountability and transparency in the spending of public money. The public interest is likely to be served, for instance in the context of private sector delivery of public services, if the disclosure of information ensures greater competition and better value for money that is public. Disclosure of information as to gifts and expenses may also assure the public of the personal probity of elected leaders and officials;
- allowing individuals and companies to understand decisions made by public authorities affecting their lives and, in some cases, assisting individuals in challenging those decisions;
- bringing to light information affecting public health and public safety. The prompt disclosure of information by scientific and other experts may contribute not only to the prevention of accidents or outbreaks of disease but may also increase public confidence in official scientific advice.[148]

146 Freedom of Information Act Awareness Guidance No 3.
147 Ibid at para C.
148 Ibid at para D.

This is an encouraging statement of general principles. In particular, bearing in mind the sweeping exemptions relating to health and safety matters which might lead to an investigation, the last point made above is of great interest, as is the general weight placed upon the desirability of transparent decision-making and accountability.

We now turn to enumerating and commenting upon the numerous exemptions the Act contains, classifying them in accordance with the scheme outlined above.

Class exemptions not subject to the public interest test

First, there are the total exemptions – class exemptions that are not subject to the public interest test. Most of these exemptions are fairly self-explanatory; therefore, explanation is given where necessary. Section 21 covers information that is reasonably accessible to the applicant from other sources. It should be noted that this exemption applies even if the applicant would have to pay a higher fee than that provided by the Act to obtain the information (s 21(2)(a)) so long as the information can still be viewed as reasonably accessible. If the fee is excessive, this may no longer be the case. But, in order to be reasonably accessible, the information must be provided as of right. The duty to confirm or deny does apply, so an applicant would at least have to be told whether the authority to which he applied was holding the information. This is not an exemption in the usual sense of the word – as applied to freedom of information schemes – since it is not content-based and does not deprive the applicant of access to the information in general; it merely prevents her from obtaining it under the Act itself.

Section 23(1) covers information supplied by or which relates to the intelligence and security services, GCHQ, the special forces and the various tribunals to which complaints may be made about their activities and about phone tapping. It should be noted that, as indicated above, the bodies mentioned in this exemption are not themselves covered by the Act at all. This exemption therefore applies to information which is held by another public authority, but which has been supplied by one of these bodies. Since it is a class exemption, it could apply to information which had no conceivable security implications, such as evidence of a massive overspend on MI5 or MI6's headquarters. The duty to confirm or deny does not apply to information in this category where complying with it would itself involve disclosure of information covered by this exemption. Bearing in mind the complete exclusion of the security and intelligence services from the Act, the use of this exemption unaccompanied by a harm test, and not subject to the public interest test, is likely to mean that sensitive matters of great political significance remain undisclosed, even if their disclosure would ultimately benefit those services or national security.

Section 32 covers information which is only held by virtue of being contained in a document or record served on a public authority in proceedings or made by a court or tribunal or party in any proceedings or contained in a document lodged with or created by a person conducting an inquiry or arbitration, for the purposes of the inquiry or arbitration. The duty to confirm or deny does not apply. Section 34 covers information where exemption from s 1(1)(b) is required for the purpose of avoiding an infringement of the privileges of either House of Parliament. The duty to confirm or deny does not apply to information in this category where compliance with it would entail a breach of Parliamentary privilege.

The exemption under s 40(1) is a complex one, but essentially it covers two classes of data. The first is information which the inquirer would be able to obtain under the Data Protection Act (DPA) 1998 because it is personal information which relates to himself; the second covers personal information which relates to others, the disclosure of which would contravene one or more of the data protection principles or the right under the Act to prevent processing likely to cause damage or distress. The first part of this exemption is designed to ensure that the FoI Act does not give rights which overlap with those granted by the DPA; the second, to ensure that the FoI Act does not give rights which contravene the DPA.

There are a number of further total exemptions. Vexatious requests (s 14) and unduly costly requests (those where compliance would cost more than a reasonable amount, to be specified (s 12)), are exempt, but the duty to confirm or deny applies. Information the disclosure of which would contravene any other Act of Parliament (for example, the Official Secrets Act 1989), or would be incompatible with any EU obligation, or constitute a contempt of court, is exempt[149] and the duty to confirm or deny does not apply to the extent that compliance with it would itself amount to a contravention of any of these provisions. This exemption ensures that the FoI Act cannot be seen impliedly to repeal the numerous provisions that criminalise the release of information, but rather preserves them all.

Information the disclosure of which would be an actionable breach of confidence (s 41) is exempt and the duty to confirm or deny does not apply if compliance with it would itself amount to a breach of confidence. This exemption requires some comment. While it is expressed as an absolute exemption, with no need to show that prejudice would be caused by release of the information, and no requirement to consider the public interest in disclosure, in fact the doctrine of confidence may contain the first of these requirements (that is, a need to show detriment – there are conflicting dicta on the matter)[150] and certainly contains the second – a need to consider any countervailing public interest in disclosure. This is clearly recognised by the relevant guidance.[151] The CFOI expressed concern at the time of the passage of the Act that while there is clearly some need to protect genuine confidences, governments could seek to protect all information supplied by third parties simply by agreeing with the third party at the time of the communication of the information that it would be treated in confidence. The information would then become confidential, provided that it was not already in the public domain, and subject to the public interest test and, possibly, to the need to show detriment. This potential problem – of 'contracting out' of the obligations under the Act – has however been recognised. The Access Code issued by the Lord Chancellor[152] takes a clear stance on this issue:

> When entering into contracts public authorities should refuse to include contractual terms which purport to restrict the disclosure of information held by the authority and relating to the contract beyond the restrictions permitted by the Act. Public authorities cannot 'contract out' of their obligations under the Act. Unless an

149 Section 44.
150 See Chapter 9, p 877.
151 Freedom of Information Act Awareness Guidance No 2.
152 Under s 45 of the Act.

> exemption provided for under the Act is applicable in relation to any particular information, a public authority will be obliged to disclose that information in response to a request, regardless of the terms of any contract.'[153]

What however remains of concern is that when adjudicating upon this exemption under the Act, the Commissioner reproduces as faithfully as possible the common law doctrine of confidence, which is now, of course, heavily influenced by Art 10 ECHR, meaning that the duty of confidence must also be tested against the requirements of that Article. In that respect, it is unfortunate that the Guidance published on this exemption does not mention this.

Class exemptions subject to the public interest test

The second category covers class exemptions subject to the public interest test. It will be recalled in relation to these exemptions that in practice, while the Commissioner will always have the last word on whether the information falls into the class in question, she will not always be able to enforce a finding that it should nevertheless be released on public interest grounds if the information is held by certain governmental bodies, since the Ministerial veto may be used.

It is most convenient to quote the Act itself for the first of these exemptions. Under s 30(1):

> Information held by a public authority is exempt information if it has at any time been held by the authority for the purposes of –
>
> (a) any investigation which the public authority has a duty to conduct with a view to it being ascertained –
> (i) whether a person should be charged with an offence, or
> (ii) whether a person charged with an offence is guilty of it,
> (b) any investigation which is conducted by the authority and in the circumstances may lead to a decision by the authority to institute criminal proceedings which the authority has power to conduct, or
> (c) any criminal proceedings which the authority has power to conduct.

This exemption, together with that contained in s 35, is one of the most widely criticised provisions in the Act. It is a sweeping exemption, covering all information, whenever obtained, which relates to investigations that may lead to criminal proceedings. It represents a specific rejection of the recommendation of the MacPherson Report[154] that there should be no class exemption for information relating to police investigations. It overlaps with the law enforcement of s 31, which does include a harm test. The exclusion of police operational matters and decisions echoes the approach under s 4 of the Official Secrets Act, but unlike s 4, no harm test is included. There are certain aspects of information relating to investigations which would appear to require disclosure in order to be in accord with the principle of openness enshrined in the Act. For example, a citizen might suspect that his or her telephone had been tapped without authorisation or that he or she had been unlawfully placed under surveillance by other means. Under the Act, no satisfactory method of discovering information relating to such a possibility will exist. It is therefore unfortunate that telephone tapping and electronic surveillance were not subjected to a 'substantial harm' or even a 'simple harm test'.

153 Quoted in Freedom of Information Act Awareness Guidance No 2.

154 The MacPherson Report on the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry, Cm 4262, 1999, proposed that all such matters should be covered by the FoI Act, subject only to a substantial harm test.

This exemption extends beyond protecting the police and the CPS. Other bodies will also be protected: it will cover all information obtained by safety agencies investigating accidents. Thus, it will cover bodies such as the Health and Safety Executive, the Railway Inspectorate, Nuclear Installations Inspectorate, Civil Aviation Authority, Marine and Coastguard Agency, environmental health officers, trading standards officers and the Drinking Water Inspectorate. It will cover routine inspections as well as specific investigations, since both can lead to criminal prosecution. Thus, anything from an inspection of a section of railway track by the Railway Inspectorate, to a check upon hygiene in a restaurant by the Health and Safety Executive could be covered. The duty to confirm or deny does not apply (s 30(3)). As the CFOI commented:

> Reports into accidents involving dangerous cars, train crashes, unsafe domestic appliances, air disasters, chemical fires or nuclear incidents will go into a permanently secret filing cabinet. The same goes for reports into risks faced by workers or the public from industrial hazards. The results of safety inspections of the railways, nuclear plants and dangerous factories would be permanently exempt. This is the information that most people assume FoI legislation exists to provide.[155]

It is particularly hard to understand the need for such a sweeping class exemption when s 31 specifically exempts information which could prejudice the prevention or detection of crime, or legal proceedings brought by a public authority arising from various forms of investigation. That exemption will ensure that no information is released which could damage law enforcement and crime detection, while we have noted above that information which could amount to a contempt of court is also exempted. The CFOI noted that the recently retired director general of the Health and Safety Executive has said publicly that the work of the HSE does not require such sweeping protection.[156] It should be noted that, where it has been decided that the information falls into the protected class, the authority must then go on to consider whether it should be released under the public interest test. Since most of the information above will not be held by a government department (see below), the Commissioner will be able to order disclosure if she thinks the information should be released under this provision, with no possibility of a Ministerial veto. The Commissioner's own views on this exemption are therefore of particular importance.[157] One point the Commissioner makes in the relevant published guidance relates to timing and is of considerable importance:

155 Freedom of Information Bill, House of Lords Committee Stage, 19 October 2000, briefing, notes. Under the Act as passed, information under this exemption would not go into a 'permanently sealed filing cabinet': after 30 years it would become a historical record; the s 30 exemption would no longer apply.

156 Ibid.

157 See generally Freedom of Information Act Awareness Guidance No. 16.

> As a general rule, the Commissioner recognises that the public interest in the disclosure of information is likely to be weaker whilst an investigation is being carried out. However once an investigation is completed, the public interest in understanding why an investigation reached a particular conclusion or in seeing that the investigation had been properly carried out is more likely to outweigh the public interest in maintaining the exemption. By the same token, there is likely to be a weaker public interest in disclosure of information about investigations which have been suspended but which may be reopened, than about those which have been concluded or abandoned.

If applied in a thorough-going way, this approach would lay to rest some of the more negative views as to the effect of this exemption, such as those of the CFOI, quoted above. The reports and safety records will be made public, under the public interest test, once completed or abandoned; the exemption will be seen as one designed to provide time-limited protection for sensitive on-going investigations, rather than the very sweeping one that it first appears to be. Moreover, the Commissioner adds:

> It should be noted that the presumption that information relating to ongoing investigations will not be released is not invariable. Much will depend upon the effect of disclosure with a stronger case for maintaining the exemption where the confidentiality of the information is critical to the success of the investigation.

This very strongly suggests that the exemption, although a class one, will be tested strongly against the public interest test: once into the balancing act, the public authority, to maintain the exemption, will have to produce real evidence of harm in the particular case to outweigh the public interest in disclosure.

One of the few decisions made by the Commissioner under the Act so far is of relevance here. It was made under s 31, not s 30, but, since the two categories cover such similar ground, it is a useful indicator in relation to both. The facts are scarcely dramatic:[158] an individual requested from Bridgend County Borough Council 'A copy of the last hygiene inspection report of the Heronston Hotel'; the Council refused the request,[159] arguing that to reveal it would prejudice the exercise of its function of 'ascertaining whether circumstances which would justify regulatory action in pursuance of any enactment exist or may arise.'[160] The enactment in question was the Food Safety Act 1990. The Council's argument was that:

> . . . the release of inspection reports would undermine the way it carries out food hygiene inspections. It promotes an informal approach to the inspection of premises, where advice and practical assistance is given to businesses . . . If information was publicly available, businesses would no longer be willing to have open discussions with inspectors. The Council would then be forced to adopt a formal inspection regime without the ability to protect the public by what it believes to be more > effective means. This, it argues, would be prejudicial to the purpose at section 31(2)(c) of the Act.

158 Decision Notice dated 9 December 2005; ref: FS50073296.

159 Citing section 31(1)(g).

160 A function listed in s 31(2)(c).

The Commissioner rejected the Council's view. It is important that she did so without having to rely on the public interest test: she decided that the exemption itself was not fulfilled. This was because she took the view that 'that the release of this information would bring greater clarity to, and reinforce public confidence in, the inspection system.'[161] She also found that whilst release of the information might, as the Council argued, prejudice its informal inspections system, it would not affect the specific duties the Council had under the Food Safety Act, because it would still be obliged to carry out inspections and, if necessary, 'pursue formal regulatory action'. These points indicate a robust upholding of transparency as a good in itself and a sceptical attitude to the arguments of public authorities against it. More strikingly still, whilst the Commissioner did not formally have to consider the argument based on the public interest, since she did not find the exemption to apply at all, she did 'note that there is an overwhelming public interest in the disclosure of this category of information'. This is a significant statement, and indicates that robust policing by the Commissioner, who will not in this area be subject to the Ministerial veto, may lay to rest some of the fears generated by s 30, as to the transmission of information to the public about issues affecting health and safety.

The other major class exemption in this category, under s 35, has been just as criticised. It amounts to a sweeping exemption for virtually all information relating to the formation of government policy. Under s 35(1):

> Information held by a government department or by the National Assembly for Wales is exempt information if it relates to –
>
> (a) the formulation or development of government policy,
> (b) Ministerial communications,
> (c) the provision of advice by any of the Law Officers or any request for the provision of such advice, or > (d) the operation of any Ministerial private office.
>
> The duty to confirm or deny does not apply.

This exemption is presumably intended to prevent government from having to decide policy in a goldfish bowl – to protect the freeness and frankness of Civil Service advice and of internal debate within government – but, once again, it appears to go far beyond what would sensibly be required to achieve this aim. Section 36 contains a harm-based exemption which covers almost exactly the same ground: it exempts government information which would, or would be likely to, inhibit (a) the free and frank provision of advice, or (b) the free and frank exchange of views for the purposes of deliberation, or (c) would otherwise prejudice, or would be likely otherwise to prejudice, the effective conduct of public affairs. Since this covers all information whose release might cause damage to the working of government – and is framed in very broad terms – it appears to be unnecessary to have a sweeping class exemption covering the same ground. Moreover, this exemption is not restricted to Civil Service advice; it covers also the background information used in preparing policy, including the underlying facts and their analysis. As the CFOI commented:

161 Statement of Reasons, op. cit.

> There would be no right to know about purely descriptive reports of existing practice, research reports, evidence on health hazards, assumptions about wage or inflation levels used in calculating costs, studies of overseas practice, consultants' findings or supporting data showing whether official assertions are realistic or not.[162]

The sole, and very limited exception to this exemption appears in s 35(2); it applies only 'once a decision as to government policy has been taken', and covers 'any statistical information used to provide an informed background to the taking of the decision'. This was a concession made by the government fairly late in the Bill's passage through Parliament and it is very limited. First, unlike most other FoI regimes, by excluding only statistical information from the exemption, it allows the analysis of facts to be withheld. Second, it only applies once a decision has been taken. Thus, where the government gave consideration to introducing a new policy but then shelved the matter without a decision, statistics used during the consideration process would, bizarrely, remain exempt. However, the Commissioner's interpretation of the Act is again somewhat encouraging. As to the statistical exception, the published guidance firmly states:

> Statistical information incorporates analyses, projections and meta-data, as well as the statistics themselves; numerical data which may take the form of a table or graph or simply be a sum total. Statistics must be derived from a recorded or repeatable methodology, and commentary on this is also statistical information.[163]

This suggests a somewhat broader reading of the phrase 'statistical information' than that given in the Act itself.

The Act is much more restrictive in this respect than the previous voluntary Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. The latter required both facts and the analysis of facts underlying policy decisions, including scientific analysis and expert appraisal, to be made available, once decisions were announced. Material relating to policy formation could only be withheld under a harm test – if disclosure would 'harm the frankness and candour of internal discussion'. The White Paper preceding the Bill proposed that there should be no class exemption for material in this area, but rather that, as under the Code, a harm test would have to be satisfied to prevent disclosure. However, the Commissioner has issued important guidance on this provision which all but changes it into a 'harm-based' test. In one of the strongest pronouncements made on the interpretation of the Act, the guidance states:

162 Freedom of Information Bill, House of Lords Committee Stage, 19 October 2000 briefing notes, p 1.

163 Freedom of Information Act Awareness Guidance No 24.

> The Information Commissioner's view is that there must be some clear, specific and credible evidence that the formulation or development of policy would be materially altered for the worse by the threat of disclosure under the Act.[164]

It will be immediately seen that this approach, by requiring 'specific . . . evidence' of a change 'for the worse', means that the Commissioner is in effect requiring prejudice to be shown: the whole point about a class exemption, in theory at least, is that it is unnecessary to show any such evidence; it is required only to show that the information in question falls within the exemption as defined. If carried through – and subject of course to use of the Ministerial veto, this requirement would greatly ameliorate the negative effects of the s 35 exemption. The Commissioner adds specific factors to be taken into account in deciding whether the exemption is made out:

- In this particular case, would release of this information make civil servants less likely to provide full and frank advice or opinions on policy proposals? Would it, for example, prejudice working relationships by exposing dissenting views?
- Would the prospect of future release inhibit the debate and exploration of the full range of policy options that ought to be considered, even if on reflection some of them are seen as extreme?
- Would the prospect of release place civil servants in the position of having to defend everything that has been raised (and possibly later discounted) during deliberation?
- On the other hand, would the possibility of future release act as a deterrent against advice which is ill-considered, vague, poorly prepared or written in unnecessarily brusque or defamatory language? Would the prospect of release in fact enhance the quality of future advice?
- Is the main reason for exempting the information to spare a civil servant or a Minister embarrassment? If so, then it is not appropriate to use this exemption.[165]

Two things are noteworthy about the above guidance: first of all, the whole thrust of it is that the effect of the release of the particular information under consideration is what is crucial: as just discussed, this comes very close to re-working this exemption into one based on harm or prejudice. Second, the guidance adverts to reasons why disclosure may actually improve the quality of advice and of policy deliberation. This runs directly against the notion of a class-based exemption, which of course is a legislative presumption that release will be harmful: by instructing public authorities, and being prepared itself to consider reasons why release may in fact be beneficial, this presumptive quality of the exemption is radically undermined.

The guidance on the application of the public interest test to this exemption is also positive. It emphasises two distinct interests in disclosure in this area – participation and accountability. In terms of the former, the Guidance notes that 'A key driver for FOI legislation is allowing people access to information that will allow informed participation in the development of government proposals or decisions which are of concern to them',[166] and that participation 'cannot be meaningful' without access to information about how decisions are reached, including rejected policy options. These are powerful statements of principle in favour of disclosure. In terms of accountability, the Guidance specifically recognises the role of FOI legislation in counterbalancing government control over the release of information by 'spin doctors', seeking to put the most favourable gloss upon it: release of information under the Act would, it asserts: 'better enable the public to make objective judgments on the facts.'[167] It also sets out two situations in which there will generally be a 'strong public interest in disclosure'. One is where the policy decision 'is going to lead to large amounts of public expenditure on a particular project'; the other is where there is a departure from 'routine procedures' or 'standard practices'. In other words, in cases where Ministers appear to be bending or breaking the rules, the public interest in finding out why will be heightened. Overall, the guidance given in relation to this section, if followed by government departments, or enforced upon them by the Commissioner, will have a notably liberalising effect upon one of the most critical exemptions in the Act. It should however be recalled that, because, by definition, it will generally be information held by a government department, if the Commissioner orders disclosure on public interest grounds, the Ministerial veto will be available to override her. It is too soon to tell what the governmental view on use of the veto will be.

164 Ibid at para e.
165 Ibid.

Information intended for future publication where it is reasonable that it should be withheld until that future date is exempt (s 22), and the duty to confirm or deny does not apply to the extent that complying with it would itself entail disclosing such information. The problem with the class exemption under s 22 is its imprecision: it does not specify a period within which the information has to be intended for publication for this exemption to apply. The government repeatedly rejected amendments that would have provided that this exemption could only be relied upon if a date for publication within a short, specified period had already been fixed.

There are a number of further class exemptions. Information subject to legal privilege (s 42) is exempt. The duty to confirm or deny does not apply if compliance with it would itself breach legal privilege. Trade secrets (s 43(1)) are exempt, but the duty does apply. 'Communications with Her Majesty, with other members of the Royal Family or with the Royal Household' are exempt, as is information relating to 'the conferring by the Crown of any honour or dignity' (s 37), and the duty to confirm or deny does not apply. It is unclear why it is necessary to bestow a class exemption relating to the royal household and honours and dignities, although this follows the practice under the previous voluntary Code. A separate class exemption covers information obtained for the purposes of conducting criminal proceedings and a very wide variety of investigations (specified in s 31(2)) carried out under statute or the prerogative, and which relate to the obtaining of information from confidential sources.

Harm-based exemptions not subject to the public interest test

This third category of exemptions has only one member. There is a general, harm-based exemption under s 36 for information the disclosure of which would be likely to prejudice the effective conduct of public affairs or inhibit free and frank discussion and advice. This exemption is subject to the general public interest test with one exception: for a reason that is not readily apparent; where the information in question is held by the Commons or Lords, the public interest test cannot be considered.

166 Ibid.
167 Ibid at para f.

Harm-based exemptions which are subject to the public interest test

As harm-based exemptions, these are in one respect the least controversial aspect of the Act. But it should be noted that the Act departed from one of the most liberal and widely praised aspects of the White Paper, namely, the requirement that in order to make out such exemptions, the authority concerned would have to demonstrate 'substantial' harm. This has been changed to a test of simple prejudice, although government spokespersons attempted to deny that the change would make any difference in practice. In each case, the duty to confirm or deny does not apply if, or to the extent that, compliance with it would itself cause the prejudice which the exemption seeks to prevent.

These exemptions cover information the disclosure of which would prejudice or would be likely to prejudice: defence and the armed forces (s 26); international relations (s 27); the economy (s 29); the mental or physical health or safety of any individual (s 38); auditing functions of other public authorities (s 33); the prevention, detection of crime, legal proceedings brought by a public authority arising from an investigation conducted for any of the purposes specified in s 31(2) (above) and carried out under statute or prerogative; collection of tax; immigration controls; good order in prisons; the exercise by any public authority of its functions for any of the purposes specified in s 31(2) (above); relations between administrations in the UK (for example, between the government and the Scottish Executive) (s 28). These exemptions are relatively straightforward, although they go beyond the information covered by the Official Secrets Act.

A number of these exemptions are more contentious. Section 24 covers information the disclosure of which would prejudice or would be likely to prejudice national security. The use of the national security exemption, albeit accompanied by the harm test, may mean that sensitive matters of great political significance remain undisclosed. In particular, the breadth and uncertainty of the term 'national security' may allow matters which fall only doubtfully within it to remain secret. Had the Act been in place at the time of the change in policy regarding arms sales to Iraq, the subject of the Scott Report, it is likely that information relating to it would not have been disclosed since it could have fallen within the exception clauses. The whole subject of arms sales will probably fall within the national security exception and possibly within other exceptions as well.[168]

Under s 43, information the disclosure of which would prejudice or would be likely to prejudice the commercial interests of any person (including the public authority holding it) is exempt. The CFOI commented that under this exemption, the prejudice referred to could be caused by consumers refusing to buy a dangerous product. Thus they noted that the fact that a company had sold dangerous products, or behaved in some other improper manner, could be suppressed if disclosure would lead customers to buy alternative products or shareholders to sell their shares.[169] This is clearly correct; however, in the case of unsafe products, the public interest test would surely require disclosure. The Commissioner has indeed said specifically that:

168 See further the Minutes of Evidence before the Public Service Committee HC 313-1 of 1995–96 QQ 66 et seq.

> There would be strong public interest arguments in allowing access to information which would help protect the public from unsafe products or unscrupulous practices even though this might involve revealing a trade secret or other information whose disclosure might harm the commercial interests of a company.[170]

Section 36 covers information which, in the reasonable opinion of a qualified person, would prejudice or be likely to prejudice collective Ministerial responsibility, or the work of the Executives of Northern Ireland and Wales, or which would be likely to inhibit the free and frank provision of advice, or the free and frank exchange of views for the purposes of deliberation, or would otherwise prejudice, or would be likely otherwise to prejudice, the effective conduct of public affairs. Two main criticisms of this exemption can be made. First, the test is not a wholly objective one, but is dependent upon 'the reasonable opinion of a qualified person'. The intention behind this provision is apparently to allow a person representing the department or body in question to make the primary determination of prejudice, with the Commissioner only being able to take issue with such a finding if it is irrational in the Wednesbury sense. The second main objection to this section is the 'catch-all' provision covering information the release of which could 'prejudice the effective conduct of public affairs', a phrase which is so vague and broad that it could mean almost anything.

Expiry of certain exemptions

As indicated above, the Act, through amendments to the Public Records Act, provides that some of the exemptions will cease to apply after a certain number of years, although these limitations are hardly generous. The following exemptions will cease to apply at all after 30 years (s 63(1)): s 28 (inter-UK relations); s 30(1) (information obtained during an investigation); s 32 (documents generated in litigation); s 33 (audit functions); s 35 (information relating to internal government discussion and advice); s 36 (information which could prejudice effective conduct of public affairs); s 37(1)(a) (communications with royal household); s 42 (legal professional privilege) and s 43 (trade secrets and information which could damage commercial interests). The exemptions under s 21 (information accessible by other means) and s 22 (information intended for future publication) will cease to apply after 30 years where the relevant document is held in a public record office (s 64(1)). Still less generously, information relating to the bestowing of honours and dignities (s 37(1)(b)) only ceases to be exempt after 60 years, while we will have to wait 100 years before the expiry of the exemption for information falling within s 31, that is, information which might prejudice law enforcement, the administration of justice, etc.

169 Freedom of Information Bill, House of Lords Committee Stage, 19 October 2000 briefing notes, p 1.
170 Freedom of Information Act Awareness Guidance No 5, at para 2.

Additionally, one of the absolute exemptions – information provided by the security, intelligence, etc services (s 23(1)) – will cease to be absolute after 30 years, that is, the public interest in disclosure must be considered once 30 years has expired.

Applying for information and time limits

Requests for information must be in writing (s 8) and, under s 9, a small fee may be charged. Information requested must generally be supplied within 20 days of the request (s 10(1)). However, there is an important exception to this: where an authority finds that information is prima facie exempt, either because it falls within a class exemption, or the requisite prejudice is thought to be present, but then goes on to consider whether the information should nevertheless be released under the public interest test, it does not have to make a decision within the normal 20-day deadline. Instead, it must release the information only within an unspecified 'reasonable period'.

Clearly, there are practical problems in using the Act. The citizen may have difficulty in obtaining the document he or she requires. He or she may not be able to frame the request for information specifically enough in order to obtain the particular documents needed. The request may be met with the response that several hundred documents are available touching on the matter in question; the citizen may lack the expert knowledge needed to identify the particular document required. If so, under s 1(3), the authority arguably need not comply with the request and can continue to postpone its compliance until and if the requester succeeds in formulating the request more specifically. Section 1(3) does not allow the authority to postpone the request until it has had a chance to obtain further information, enabling it to deal with the request. However, the duty to provide advice and assistance so far as reasonable, provided for in section 16 of the Act,[171] would apply to an instance in which the authority was itself able to identify the requisite documents and did not genuinely require further information to do so. It would then come under a duty to assist the applicant in choosing the relevant documents. The Code of Practice published by the Department for Constitutional Affairs[172] deals with the section 16 duty. In relation to the instant point, it states:

> 8. Authorities should, as far as reasonably practicable, provide assistance to the applicant to enable him or her to describe more clearly the information requested.
>
> 10. Appropriate assistance in this instance might include:
>
>   - providing an outline of the different kinds of information which might meet the terms of the request;
>   - providing access to detailed catalogues and indexes, where these are available, to help the applicant ascertain the nature and extent of the information held by the authority;

171 (1) It shall be the duty of a public authority to provide advice and assistance, so far as it would be reasonable to expect the authority to do so, to persons who propose to make, or have made, requests for information to it.

172 Under s 45 of the Act. The Code is available at: http://www.dca.gov.uk/foi/reference/statCodesOfPractice.htm.

- providing a general response to the request setting out options for further information which could be provided on request.[173]

This is a helpful clarification that authorities cannot rely upon the applicant's ignorance as to the documents available, without seeking to provide a reasonable level of assistance in identifying the relevant documents. Early indications are that central government has a very mixed record on compliance with the Act's requirements within the time limits set down.[174] In a press release, the Campaign for Freedom of Information said 'the government's figures showed that a "disturbing" level of requests were not being dealt with within the Act's time limits'.[175] Overall, more than a third (36 per cent) of government departments failed to meet the deadline of 20 working days. 25 per cent failed even to tell the applicant that they needed extra time, as required by the Act. The Home Office had by far the worst record amongst government departments. In 60 per cent of all requests it failed either to respond to the request within 20 days, or even to inform the applicant that it needed more time within that period. The Campaign said this represented 'routine disregard for the Act's requirements'.[176] Other important Ministries did much better:

> the Department for Transport and the Department for Constitutional Affairs both answered 83% of their requests within the basic 20 working day period. The Department for Work and Pensions met this time limit in 81% of cases and the Ministry of Defence, which received far more requests than any other department, met the 20 day limit for 71% of its requests.[177]

There was also a disturbing variation in the extent to which the department concerned answered the requests put to it in full. The Department of Transport provided full answers in 76 per cent of cases, followed by the MOD which managed 67 per cent. However, 'at the other end of the scale the Department of Trade and Industry provided full answers in only 21 per cent of cases, the Home Office in 28 per cent and the Cabinet Office in 29 per cent of cases.' The Campaign said 'it's . . . clear that some parts of Whitehall are more committed to freedom of information than others'.

The enforcement mechanism

The basic mechanism

The enforcement review mechanism under the Act is far stronger than the mechanism established under the Code. The internal review of a decision to withhold information, established under the Code, was formalised under the Act and the role of the Ombudsman was taken over by that of the Information Commissioner. The Commissioner's powers

173 Op. cit. at paras 8–10.
174 See 'Freedom of Information Act 2000. Statistics on Implementation in Central Government. Q1. January-March 2005; published on the website of the Department for Constitutional Affairs.
175 Press Release, dated 23 June 2005, available on the Campaign's website: http://www.cfoi.org.uk.
176 Ibid.
177 Ibid.

are also much more extensive than those of the Ombudsman. As indicated below, she has the power to order disclosure of the information and can report a failure to disclose information to the courts who can treat it in the same way as contempt of court. Under the White Paper, it was to be a criminal offence to destroy, alter or withhold records relevant to an investigation of the Information Commissioner. It was also to become a criminal offence to shred documents requested by outsiders, including the media and the public. However, the two offences are omitted from the Act. No civil liability is incurred if a public authority does not comply with any duty imposed by the Act (s 56).

The rights granted under the Act are enforceable by the Data Protection Commissioner, now known as 'The Information Commissioner'. Importantly, the Commissioner has security of tenure, being dismissible only by the Crown following an address by both Houses of Parliament. An appeal lies from decisions of the Commissioner to the Information Tribunal, which is made up of experienced lawyers and 'persons to represent the interests' of those seeking information and of public authorities (Sched 2, Part II).

Under s 50: 'Any person (in this section referred to as "the complainant") may apply to the Commissioner for a decision whether, in any specified respect, a request for information made by the complainant to a public authority has been dealt with in accordance with [the Act].' The Commissioner must then make a decision unless the application has been made with 'undue delay', is frivolous or vexatious or the complainant has not exhausted any complaints procedure provided by the public authority (s 50(1)). If the Commissioner decides that the authority concerned has failed to communicate information or confirm or deny when required to do so by the Act, she must serve a 'decision notice' on the authority stating what it must do to satisfy the Act. She may also serve 'Information Notices' upon authorities, requiring the authority concerned to provide her with information about a particular application or its compliance with the Act generally.

The Commissioner may ultimately force a recalcitrant authority to act by serving upon it an enforcement notice, which (per s 52(1)) 'requir[es] the authority to take, within such time as may be specified in the notice, such steps as may be so specified for complying with those requirements'. If a public authority fails to comply with a Decision, Enforcement or Information Notice, the Commissioner can certify the failure in writing to the High Court, which, the Act provides (s 52(2)):

> may inquire into the matter and, after hearing any witness who may be produced against or on behalf of the public authority, and after hearing any statement that may be offered in defence, deal with the authority as if it had committed a contempt of court.

In other words, the Commissioner's decisions can, in the final analysis, be enforced just as can orders of the court. These powers are buttressed by powers of entry, search and seizure to gain evidence of a failure by the authority to carry out its obligations under the Act, or comply with a Notice issued by the Commissioner (detailed in Sched 3).

There does, however, appear to be a developing problem of overload. The Campaign for Freedom of Information reports that, as at November 2005, only 11 months after the Act came into force, there was a backlog of over 1,300 cases, and that some complaints had been with the Commissioner's office for more than six months without even being allocated to an investigating officer. This is of particular concern to the media, given that news stories may have a temporary shelf life. Where a response is made to a public authority for documents that would reveal some embarrassing failure or scandal, and media interest in the matter is temporarily intense, the authority may well be tempted just to refuse the request, in the knowledge that even though the Information Commissioner will almost certainly overturn its decision, by the time that is done, media interest in the story will have died down, and the interest generated by the eventual release of the documents will be minimal.

Appeals

The Commissioner's decisions are themselves subject to appeal to the Tribunal, and this power of appeal is exercisable upon the broadest possible grounds. The Act provides that either party may appeal to the Tribunal against a decision notice, and a public authority may appeal against an enforcement or information notice (s 57(2) and (3)), either on the basis that the notice is 'not in accordance with the law', or 'to the extent that the notice involved an exercise of discretion by the Commissioner, that he ought to have exercised his discretion differently' (s 58(1)). The Tribunal is also empowered to review 'any finding of fact on which the notice in question was based' and, as well as being empowered to quash decisions of the Commissioner, may 'substitute such other notice as could have been served by the Commissioner'. There is a further appeal from the Tribunal to the High Court, but on a 'point of law' only (s 59). In practice, this will probably be interpreted so as to allow review of the Tribunal's decisions, not just for error of law, but also on the other accepted heads of judicial review. Early indications are however that the Tribunal is in fact taking a more robust, pro-FOI stance than the Commissioner, which is a welcome development.[178]

The ministerial veto of the Commissioner's decisions

The ministerial veto is another highly controversial aspect of the Act. The White Paper made no provision for such a power of veto, on the basis that to do so would undermine confidence in the regime. Such a veto clearly dilutes the basic FoI principle that a body independent from government should enforce the rights to information and since, in cases where the release of information could embarrass ministers, it constitutes them judge in their own cause, it is objectionable in principle.

For the veto to be exercisable, two conditions must be satisfied under s 53(1). First, the Notice which the veto will operate to quash must have been served on a government department, the Welsh Assembly or 'any public authority designated for the purposes of this section by an order made by the Secretary of State.' Second, the Notice must order the release of information which is prima facie exempt but which the Commissioner has decided should nevertheless be released under the public interest test in s 2. (By prima facie exempt, it will be recalled, is meant information that either falls into a class exemption or, where prejudice is required to render it exempt, the Commissioner has adjudged the prejudice to be present).

178 For details see 'Information Tribuanl's Early Decisions Lead to Greater Open-ness' – 20 Dec 2005; available http://www.cfoi.org.uk/pdf/tribunalnote.pdf.

The veto is exercised by means of a certificate signed by the Minister concerned, stating that he has 'on reasonable grounds formed the opinion that, in respect of the request or requests concerned, there was no failure' to comply with the Act. The decision must be made at a relatively senior level. If the information is sought from a department of the Northern Irish Executive or any NI public authority, it must be exercised by the First and Deputy Minister acting together; if sought from a Welsh department or any Welsh public authority, the Assembly First Secretary makes the decision; if it is sought from a UK government department or any other public authority, the person responsible is a Cabinet Minister. The reasons for the veto must be given to the complainant (s 56), unless doing so would reveal exempt information (s 57), and the certificate must be laid before Parliament or the Welsh/NI assembly as applicable. How much resort will be made to the veto, only time will tell. However, as the Campaign for FOI pointed out, a worrying precedent exists in that the government has on several occasions refused to comply with rulings by the Ombudsman (PCA) under the previous Code of Practice on Access to Information. Examples include:[179] refusals to comply fully with a recommendation by the PCA as to the release information on Ministerial gifts; preventing the PCA from seeing papers of Cabinet committees which were dealing with the Human Rights Act; and the issuance of a certificate blocking disclosure of information about Ministerial conflicts of interest on the grounds that it would be contrary to the public interest. These precedents are far from encouraging: it may be doubted that the additional safeguards built into the use of the veto in the Act will be enough to dissuade or deter Ministers from making use of it, although one may confidently predict an outcry in the media if and when the veto is first used. The Phillis Committee on Government Communications, amongst other matters, called on the government to publicly renounce the use of the veto.[180]

Publication schemes

Under ss 19 and 20, public authorities must adopt 'publication schemes' relating to the publication of information by that authority, that is, schemes by which information is made generally available to the public, without a specific request having to be made. This is a significant aspect of the Act, since more citizens will thereby gain access to a wider range of information. The difficulty and expense of making a request will be avoided. The scheme can be devised by the authority or, under s 20, a model scheme devised by the Information Commissioner can be used. If a tailor-made scheme is used, it must be approved by the Commissioner (s 19(1)(a)). Therefore, authorities are likely to use the model schemes, thereby avoiding the need to submit the scheme for approval. Consistency between authorities is probably desirable as promoting transparency and thereby enhancing access to information. For early indications as to the schemes prepared by central government departments, see a report by the CFOI.[181]

179 For the full report ((HC 951 (2002–3), see http://www.ombudsman.org.uk/pca/document/aoi03nj/index.htm.

180 See http://foi.missouri.edu/internatfoinews/FinalReport.pdf.

181 'Central Government Publication Schemes: Good Practice' http://www.cfoi.org.uk/pdf/ps_report.pdf.

Proposals to restrict the use of the Act

One year after the Act came fully into force, the Department of Constitutional Affairs published a Report on the Act, Freedom of Information – one year on, to which the government responded in[182] The Report found that implementation of the FOI Act had already brought about significant and new releases of information and that this information was being used in a constructive and positive way by a range of different individuals and organisations. The report stated: '. . . This is a significant success.' A number of examples of releases of information were noted in the Report; they included the disclosure of information relating to: the heart surgery survival rates for different hospitals in England and Wales; the safety of Britain's nuclear plants; the best and worst performing schools in each county; information on restaurant hygiene. The government in its response also noted that public authorities had continued to make substantial efforts to comply with the FOI Act. Public authorities were proactively publishing information; an example of this was the Rural Payments Agency's release of figures relating to Common Agricultural Policy payments. However, it also became apparent in 2006 that the government had reservations about the impact of the Act.

In 2006 the Department for Constitutional Affairs ordered an independent review of the economic cost of the Act.[183] Implementation of FoI is estimated to cost roughly £35m a year. Under the current financial regime, public bodies do not make a charge for considering requests if the work involved does not exceed £600's worth of a civil servant's time. The independent Report looking at the economic impact of the legislation found that journalists make up 10 per cent of the volume of central government requests and 21 per cent of the cost. In response the government took the view that implementing the Act has become too expensive, and in December 2006 the Department for Constitutional Affairs published draft Regulations intended to restrict use of the Act.[184]

The existing Regulations are the Freedom of Information and Data Protection (Appropriate Limit and Fees) Regulations 2004, which came into force in January 2005. Their key provisions are: the 'appropriate limit', above which public authorities may decline to comply with a request for information, is set at £600 for central government and Parliament, and £450 for the wider public sector; when estimating whether the costs of complying with a request for information would exceed the appropriate limit, public authorities may only include the costs of determining whether the information is held, and then locating, retrieving and extracting it; where those costs relate to the time spent by officials or other people carrying out the relevant activities on behalf of the authority, they must be calculated at a standard rate of £25 per hour; and when estimating whether the costs of complying with a request for information would exceed the appropriate limit, public authorities may aggregate the costs of two or more requests received from the same person, or persons who appear to be acting in concert or in pursuance of a campaign, provided the requests relate to the same or similar information and are received within a period of 60 working days.

182 Select Committee's Report – Freedom of Information – one year on, October 2006, Cm 6937.

183 An Independent Review of the Impact of FoI, A Report for the Dept of Constitutional Affairs, October 2006.

184 Draft FoI and Data Protection (Appropriate Limit and Fees) Regulations 2007, Consultation Paper 28/06, 14.12.06.

Under the new draft Regulations restrictions can be placed on the type of information requested: it must not be too frivolous; and restrictions can be placed on the cost of collecting it; officials' reading time, consideration time and consultation time must be included in the estimate of the charge to be made. Public authorities can refuse an application if the cost of dealing with the request exceeds £450 or, in the case of government departments, £600. Only the cost of searching for the information can be included in this calculation at the moment. Under draft regulation 7 a public authority, when calculating the appropriate cost limit, could aggregate the costs of requests for information received from the same person (or persons who appear to be acting in concert or in pursuance of a campaign) where they were made within a period of 60 working days and where:

> . . . (as under the 2004 Regulations) the requests related to the same or similar information (draft regulation 7(2)(b)(i); or b) the requests did not relate to the same or similar information, but it was reasonable in all the circumstances to aggregate the requests (draft regulation 7(2)(b)(ii)).

Thus, restrictions could be placed on the frequency of requests from any one individual or body (the aggregation proposal). Under that proposal any one organisation would be limited in the number of requests that could be made when the aggregated costs of dealing with requests from that organisation exceeded the cost limits. Thus, if a very large media organisation made a request, that would mean that further requests from a member of that organisation, even working in a completely separate sector of the organisation and pursuing a very different story, could be refused once the cost limit had been reached. Clearly, under the proposed regulations, not only can aggregation of requests occur much more readily, but the costs that can be included in the calculation have increased. The regulations could put the ability of such an organisation to submit FOI requests on a par with those of an individual wanting to obtain access to his or her personal records. The government considers that the number of requests made by individual pressure groups and media outlets add disproportionately to the costs of the legislation.

The restrictions also create leeway for delay and for the creation of bureaucratic obstacles to obtaining access to the information while, for example, costs of obtaining it were worked out. The proposed restrictions indicate that the government, in the very early life of the Act, is already becoming concerned about its use. Arguably, the Act is being used more successfully than the government predicted that it would be.

If the proposals were implemented they would create approximately a 10 per cent saving, meaning that about £5m-£12m would be saved.[185] The proposals would lead to a significant dilution of the freedom of information regime. For example, the BBC would be caught by the aggregation proposal. It could mean that if one BBC journalist were to submit a request that took the organisation to the limit of the number of requests it could make, the BBC could not make further further requests for three months.

185 Estimation from an article in the New Statesman 5.3.2007. The figure of £12 million was mentioned in Parliament in debate on the regulations. It was also argued that the Act was working reasonably well, despite the flaws (7 Feb 2007: Column 315 WH).

In Parliamentary debate on the proposals Mark Fisher MP made some pertinent criticisms:

> Money is not the explanation of what is proposed . . . in a really participatory democracy the legislation would be used much more, which is perhaps what the Government fear . . . In the present generation, Parliament is getting weaker and weaker in relation to Governments who are growing more and more mighty . . . The imbalance between the Executive and the legislature has reached a critical point. If we pass the regulations it will be only a small drop of water into the balance, but it will tip it in the wrong direction for Parliament and the public realm, and the investigative press . . .[186]

Maurice Frankel, director of the Campaign for Freedom of Information, has argued: 'These proposals would make it harder for requesters to ask penetrating questions and easier for authorities to avoid scrutiny.' One of the biggest costs in considering requests is when it triggers a referral to a Minister. Mr Frankel considers that the new rules, if implemented, would mean more interventions by Ministers and therefore more requests declined for reasons of costs. 'It means Ministers will be deciding requests on whether the release makes headlines or not – and that's not what the legislation is about. Ministers should leave these decisions to the experienced FOI officers.'[187]

Conclusions

Despite its weaknesses, this is a constitutional development whose significance can hardly be over-stated. The FoI Act, enforceable by the Information Commissioner, will be a clear improvement on the Code introduced by the Major Government. Rodney Austin described the draft Bill as 'a denial of democracy'.[188] It is suggested that the improvements made to the Bill during its passage through Parliament, while still leaving it a far weaker and more illiberal measure than the scheme proposed by the widely praised White Paper which preceded it, render this view no longer accurate. In particular, the public interest test has been strengthened, and applies to most of the exemptions in the Act, including, crucially, the key class exemptions relating to investigations and to the formation of government policy; however, as the CFOI points out, it is misleading to view this as converting class exemptions into 'harm-based' ones, since the very existence of a class exemption is based upon a presumption, built into the Act, that such information is, as a class, of a type which generally should not be released. Nevertheless, although it is still too early to tell, the attitude of the Information Commissioner as expressed in the published guidance indicates that, in reality, evidence of individual damage that would be done by publication will be required where a public authority seeks to resist the argument that publication should take place on public interest grounds.[189]

186 Hansard 7 Feb 2007 : Column 310WH.

187 See CFOI web-site.

188 Austin, R, 'Freedom of information: a Sheep in Wolf's Clothing?', in Jowell, J and Oliver, D (eds), The Changing Constitution, 5th edn, 2004, at 237.

189 See above at 645–46.

The Act does represent a turning point in British democracy in, for the first time in its history, removing the decision to release many classes of information from government and placing it in the hands of an independent agency, the Information Commissioner, and in giving a statutory 'right' to information, enforceable if necessary through the courts, to citizens. However, as seen, the Act fences this basic right around with so many restrictions that, depending upon its interpretation, much information of any conceivable interest could still be withheld. Whether this turns out to be the case in practice will depend primarily upon the robustness of the stance taken by the Commissioner, particularly in applying the public interest test to the class exemptions under the Act, where it will provide the only means of obtaining disclosure. Early signs in this respect are hopeful, but only the experience of several years will make clear what the Act has achieved. The current 2007 proposals to limit access to information on grounds of costs would, if implemented, have a significantly restrictive effect on the operation of the Act. There have been a number of suggestions, from the media, from MPs and from the CFOI that the proposals are less about curbing the cost of the use of the Act, since the savings would be relatively minor, and more about retreating from the principle of openness enshrined in the Act.

Chapter 8

Freedom of protest and assembly

1 Introduction[1]

In the UK in the twenty-first century the legal response to protest is changing. The terrorist acts of 9/11, the rise of terrorism thereafter and of awareness of terrorism, the Iraq war, have all had an impact. The deployment of criminal sanctions in 2006 to seek to rid Parliament Square of a lone, peaceful anti-war protester is only the most obvious manifestation of this change. Since the main statutory framework governing protest was put in place in 1986 and extended in 1994 under the Conservative government, there has been, this chapter will argue, a continued creeping criminalisation, and even terrorisation, of many forms of dissent over the ten years of Labour rule since 1997. The over-broad provisions introduced in 1986 and 1994 have been extended incrementally in a range of statutes that, on their face, are not concerned mainly with public order, such as the Anti-Social Behaviour Act 2003. Accompanying incrementally increasing criminalisation of forms of dissent, there has recently been a more worrying trend – to use sanctions based on the civil standard of proof against protesters. For most of those ten years the Human Rights Act has also been in force – an intriguing contradiction that forms one of the main themes of this chapter. But in exploring the contradictions in recent UK civil rights statutory policy, it must be remembered that the common law doctrine of breach of the peace overshadows all the statutory changes over the last ten years. Breathtakingly broad, bewilderingly imprecise in scope, it provides the police with such wide powers to use against protesters as to render the statutory frameworks almost redundant.

1 For texts referred to below and further reading, see: Bailey, SH, Harris, DJ and Jones, BL, Civil Liberties: Cases and Materials, 5th edn, 2002, Chapter 3; Whitty, N, Murphy, T and Livingstone, S, Civil Liberties Law, 2001, Part V; Feldman, D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 2002, Chapter 17; Fenwick, H, Civil Rights: New Labour, Freedom and the Human Rights Act, 2000, Chapter 4; Waddington, PAJ, Liberty and Order, 1994; Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, The Law of Human Rights, 2nd edn, 2006, Chapter 16; Mead, D, The New Law of Peaceful Protest – Rights and Regulation in the Human Rights Act Era, forthcoming 2007. For discussion and criticism of the Public Order Act 1986, see Bonner, D and Stone, R, 'The Public Order Act 1986: steps in the wrong direction?' [1987] PL 202; Card, R, Public Order: the New Law, 1987, Butterworths; Smith, ATH, 'The Public Order Act 1986 Part I' [1987] Crim LR 156; Gearty, CA, 'Freedom of assembly and public order', in Individual Rights and the Law in Britain, 1994, p 55; Harris, J, O'Boyle, M and Warbrick, C, Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1995. For discussion and criticism of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1986, see Allen, MJ and Cooper, S, 'Howard's way: a farewell to freedom?' 58(3) MLR 364, p 378; Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, 'Public protest, the Human Rights Act and judicial responses to political expression' (2000) PL 627–50. For post-HRA criticism of the provisions of the two statutes, see: Geddis, A, 'Free Speech Martyrs or Unreasonable Threats to Social Peace? – "Insulting" Expression and Section 5 of the Public Order Act 1986' (2004) Public Law 853; Newman, C, (2006) 'Divisional Court: Public Order Act 1986, s 4A: Proportionality and Freedom of Expression' 70 Journal of Criminal Law 191; Ormerod, D, Smith and Hogan Criminal Law, 11th edn, 2005, OUP; Ward, R and Wragg, A, Walker and Walker's English Legal System, 9th edn, 2005, OUP. For background, see: Williams, DGT, Keeping the Peace, 1967 (excellent historical account); Brownlie, I and Supperstone, M, Law Relating to Public Order and National Security, 1981; Marshall, G, 'Freedom of speech and assembly', in Constitutional Theory, 1971, p 154; Bevan, VT, 'Protest and public disorder' [1979] PL 163; Uglow, S, Policing Liberal Society, 1988, OUP; Smith, ATH, Offences Against Public Order, 1997, Sweet and Maxwell; Sherr, A, Freedom of Protest, Public Order and the Law, 1989; Ewing, KD and Gearty, CA, The Struggle for Civil Liberties, 1999; Ewing, KD and Gearty, CA, Freedom under Thatcher, 1990, Chapter 4.

It is often said that toleration of public protest is a hallmark of a democratic, free society. The logic of such a society is that it is prepared to take at least some account of the wishes of its citizens and will not wish to stray too far from the path of majority acceptance in decision making. Further, it does not impose one vision of the good life on its citizens; therefore, it tolerates and even encourages the public expression of various political visions. Public protest as a form of expression is therefore tolerated in free societies.[2] However, the public interests which may be threatened by public protest – the maintenance of order, the preservation of property, freedom of movement, respect for personal autonomy – may also be viewed as essential to democracy.[3] Thus, a tension clearly exists between the legitimate interest of the state in maintaining order on the one hand and, on the other, the protection of the freedoms of protest and assembly.

Therefore, in seeking to discover the limits of the legal acceptance of freedom of protest and assembly, and the value that the law places upon it, this chapter focuses on those provisions of the criminal and civil law most applicable in the context of demonstrations, marches, meetings, direct action. The legal regime relies on the use of both prior and subsequent restraints. Prior restraint on assemblies may mean that an assembly cannot take place at all or that it can take place only under various limitations. Subsequent restraints, usually arrests and prosecutions for public order offences, may be used after the assembly is in being. Although the availability of subsequent restraints may have a 'chilling' effect, they are used publicly and may receive publicity. If an assembly takes place and, subsequently, some of its members are prosecuted for public order offences, it will have achieved its end in gaining publicity and may in fact have gained greater publicity due to the prosecutions. If the assembly never takes place, its object will probably be completely defeated.

Prior and subsequent restraints arise from a large number of wide ranging and sometimes archaic powers which spring partly from a mix of statutory provisions, partly from the common law and partly from the royal prerogative.[4] To an extent, the number of restraints available is unsurprising because the range of state interests involved is wider than any other expressive activity would warrant: they include the possibilities of disorder, of violence to citizens and damage to property. Clearly, the state has a duty to protect citizens from the attentions of the mob. The need to give weight to these interests explains the general acceptance of freedom of assembly as a non-absolute right,[5] even though it may be that violent protest is most likely to bring about change.

2 See, e.g., Nimmer, MB, 'The meaning of symbolic speech under the First Amendment' (1973) 21 UCLA L Rev 29, 61–62; Kalven, H, 'The concept of the public forum' (1965) Sup Ct Rev 1, p 23.

3 See Bailey, Harris, and Jones, op. cit., fn 1, 4th edn, p 167.

4 For discussion of the various offences, see Ormerod, D, Smith and Hogan Criminal Law 11th edn, 2005 (standard criminal law text), Chapter 21; Thornton, P, Public Order Law, 1987; Smith, ATH, Offences Against Public Order, 1987, Blackstone.

Most of these restraints are not aimed specifically at assemblies and protesters, but generally at keeping the peace. Nevertheless, they severely affect the freedoms of protest and of assembly. Therefore, those seeking to exercise the freedoms of protest and assembly have historically been in a vulnerable position[6] and currently they are in an especially precarious legal position since such a web of overlapping and imprecise public order provisions now exists and is constantly increasing. But they can now rely on an express recognition in domestic law of rights to protest and assemble within Arts 10 and 11 of the European Convention on Human Rights as received into UK law under the Human Rights Act (HRA) 1998. This constitutes a potentially climactic break with the traditional UK constitutional position. That position was that citizens might do anything which the law did not forbid, whereas, under the HRA, they are able to exercise rights to protest and assembly, circumscribed, as Chapters 2 and 4 explain, only in a manner compatible with specified Convention exceptions or, exceptionally, by incompatible domestic legislation.[7]

As Sedley LJ put it in Redmond-Bate v DPP:[8]

> A liberty, as AP Herbert repeatedly pointed out, is only as real as the laws and bylaws which negate or limit it. A right, by contrast, may be asserted in the face of such restrictions and must be respected, subject to lawful and proper reservations, by the courts.[9]

Since, as indicated, the extent of such reservations, which may undermine the right, will largely be determined by police officers and magistrates, it is important to bear in mind their obligations to abide by the Convention rights under s 6 of the HRA. Most significantly, this means that, for the first time, the constitutional duty placed personally on individual police officers[10] and magistrates to keep the Queen's Peace is coupled with a corresponding duty to uphold public freedom of expression under s 6 HRA.

The focus of this chapter is on the mass of common law and statutory public order provisions, in the light of the rights to freedom of assembly and protest given further effect in domestic law under the Human Rights Act. Having considered the justifications underpinning such rights, it will evaluate the potential and actual responses of the judiciary to the acceptance of the substantive values underlying public expression under Arts 10 and 11 in UK public order law. It will be argued that the common

5 See the leading US case, Hague v Committee for Industrial Organisation (1938) 307 US 496. For further discussion, see Williams, DGT [1987] Crim LR 167.
6 See Ewing and Gearty (1990), op. cit., fn 1.
7 HRA 1998, s 3(2). The government has not sought to rely on this exception post-HRA.
8 [1999] All ER (D) 864; (1999) The Times, 28 July; see below, pp 778–79 for discussion.
9 Transcript, para 15.
10 See Humphries v Connor (1864) 17 ICLR 1.

law had signally failed to provide the recognition for the value of public protest as a form of political expression which is evident in respect of media expression. Such failings are due, it will be contended, to the desire to protect countervailing interests, particularly proprietorial rights, but the judiciary in general did not make this explicit: the express balancing act which may be carried out at Strasbourg between political expression and other societal interests has not occurred until very recently – post-HRA – in the judgments of domestic courts, often because the former value is merely afforded no recognition at all. Parliament also failed, it will be argued, to provide that recognition while incrementally adding to the public order legislation. Moreover, prior to the inception of the HRA, the guarantees of freedom of expression and peaceful assembly under Arts 10 and 11 of the Convention were hardly adverted to in the domestic courts as aids to statutory interpretation, or to resolve common law policy issues in public protest cases, as the decisions discussed below reveal. The close nexus between assembly and expression failed to receive recognition when low level public order offences, committed in the course of, or directly through, the exercise of political protest, were adjudicated upon. But that nexus has been recognised at Strasbourg for some time.[11] But this chapter will demonstrate that the HRA is encouraging a change in the judicial response, and the central theme of this chapter will concern the impact the Act has had and is likely to have within the established context of the existing and increasing web of prohibitory rules.

Lord Bingham tellingly described the impact that the HRA is having in this context in the House of Lords decision in R (on the application of Laporte) (FC) v Chief Constable of Gloucestershire:[12]

> The approach of the English common law to freedom of expression and assembly was hesitant and negative, permitting that which was not prohibited. Thus although Dicey in An Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution[13] in Part II on the 'Rule of Law', included chapters VI and VII entitled 'The Right to Freedom of Discussion' and 'The Right of Public Meeting', he wrote of the first[14] that 'At no time has there in England been any proclamation of the right to liberty of thought 11 See, for example, Ezelin v France (1991) 14 EHRR 362, paras 37, 51; Plattform "Ärzte für das Leben" v Austria (1988) 13 EHRR 204; Djavit An v Turkey (2003) Reports of Judgments and Decisions, 2003-III, p 233, para 39; Christian Democratic People's Party v Moldova (Appl No 28793/02, 14 May 2006, unreported) para 62; Öllinger v Austria (Appl No 76900/01, 29 June 2006, unreported), para 38. In the protest case of Steel and Others v United Kingdom (1998) 28 EHRR 603, para 101, freedom of expression was said to constitute 'an essential foundation of democratic society and one of the basic conditions for its progress and for each individual's self-fulfilment'. In Ezelin v France at para 53, the Court found that the 'freedom to take part in a peaceful assembly – in this instance a demonstration that had not been prohibited – is of such importance that it cannot be restricted in any way, even for an avocat, so long as the person concerned does not himself commit any reprehensible act on such an occasion'. In Ziliberberg v Moldova (Appl No 61821/00, 4 May 2004, unreported), para 2, the Court made the association between assembly and expression explicit: 'the right to freedom of assembly is a fundamental right in a democratic society and, like the right to freedom of expression, is one of the foundations of such a society'.

12 [2006] UKHL 55, para 34. CA: R (on the application of Laporte) v CC of Gloucester Constab [2004] EWCA Civ 1639. See below for discussion pp 757–62.

13 10th edn, 1959.

14 At pp 239–40.

or to freedom of speech' and of the second[15] that 'it can hardly be said that our constitution knows of such a thing as any specific right of public meeting'. Lord Hewart CJ reflected the then current orthodoxy when he observed in Duncan v Jones[16] that 'English law does not recognize any special right of public meeting for political or other purposes'. The Human Rights Act 1998, giving domestic effect to articles 10 and 11 of the European Convention, represented what Sedley LJ in Redmond-Bate v Director of Public Prosecutions,[17] aptly called a 'constitutional shift'.

Underlying justifications

In considering the justifications underlying rights of protest and assembly it should be pointed out that the two rights are distinguishable, although they will often be exercised together. Some protest of the symbolically or actually obstructive type, such as standing in front of grouse shooters or lying down in front of earth moving machinery, is primarily expression-based: the assembly element may not be significant. A lone anti-war protester reading out names of those killed in the Iraq war in a symbolically significant location is not relying on group impact to make the point. Equally, while persons may assemble in a group in order to make a more effective protest, not all groups come together in order to protest: the assembly may be of a ceremonial, albeit political nature; the Orange parades in Northern Ireland fall into this category. In such instances, the fact of assembling is significant in itself and, although the assembly is expressing a message, it could not readily be characterised as a protest. In other words, in some instances the 'assembly' element is dominant; in others, it is almost absent.

The individual rights to assemble and make public protest are bolstered by the interests justifying freedom of speech – furthering the search for truth, the participation of the citizen in the democracy and the exercise of autonomy. The justification based on the argument from truth[18] is present in the sense that citizens must be able to communicate with each other if debate which may reach the truth is to occur: public protest provides one means of ensuring that speech reaches a wider audience. Political speech is justified instrumentally on the basis that it allows participation in the democracy;[19] public protest is one particular and direct means of allowing such participation to occur outside election periods. Public protest is probably one of the most effective means by which ordinary citizens can bring matters to the attention of others, including Members of Parliament. Ordinary citizens are unlikely to be able to gain access to the media to publicise their views; they may, for example, distribute leaflets or posters without assembling in order to do so, but such methods are probably less effective if they are not part of a public protest. A clear example was provided by the anti-poll tax marches in the 1990s. As the Introduction to Part II indicates, this justification for expression is the one most favoured by the European Court of Human Rights,[20] which has also given

15 At p 271.
16 [1936] 1 KB 218, 222.
17 (1999) 163 JP 789, 795; for discussion of the decision, see below at pp 778–79.
18 Mill, JS, On Liberty, 1972.
19 See Meiklejohn, 'The First Amendment is an absolute' (1961) Sup Ct Rev 245.
20 See Castells v Spain A 236 (1992), paras 42, 46; Goodwin v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 123.

a very wide meaning to the concept of political expression. Therefore, allowing forms of protest suggests that a society wishes to encourage participation in the democratic process since citizens will thereby be able to signal their response to government policies, encourage changes in policy and deter the government from repressive measures. Public protest provides a direct means of allowing democratic participation to occur outside election periods. On this argument, the acceptance of the freedom to protest poses no threat to the established authorities, but rather underpins the democratic process which placed them where they are and from which they derive their legitimacy. In particular, protesters could be viewed as exercising, through the protest, a choice as to their mode of participation in political activity, a choice, which in the case of some minority groups, may not be a real one, in the sense that they may be, in effect, excluded from mainstream politics. Its exercise may also be bolstered, therefore, by arguments in favour of equality of democratic participation.

Thus, one of the most significant justifications underpinning public protest is that it provides a means whereby the free speech rights of certain groups can be substantively rather than formally exercised. Disadvantaged and marginalised groups, including racial or sexual minorities and groups following 'alternative' lifestyles, may be unable to exercise such rights in any meaningful sense since they cannot obtain sufficient access to the media. At the same time the media, particularly the tabloid press, may tend to misrepresent them. However impoverished members of such groups may be, they are able to band together to chant slogans, display placards and banners and demonstrate by means of direct action. By these means they may be able both to gain access to methods of communication through publicity and to persuade members of their immediate audience to sympathise with their stance. As Barnum puts it: 'the public forum may be the only forum available to many groups or points of view.'[21] Thus, public protest can act both as a means of access to the media and as a substitute for fair media exposure.[22] The truism that speech in general generates speech is especially applicable to speech or expression as protest.

These methods may provide the only avenue available to such groups if they wish to participate in the democracy and it is of crucial importance that they should be able to take it since, by its very nature, the democratic process tends to exclude minorities with whom the majority may be out of sympathy. Minority interests may be safeguarded only indirectly within that process, by persuading sufficient numbers of people to sympathise with causes which do not directly affect them. There is a reasonable degree of academic consensus regarding the need to protect public protest in order to safeguard minority interests:[23] while it has frequently been suggested that state regulation of the media, far from inhibiting free expression, tends to safeguard it,[24] that argument has been applied to public protest only in respect of the regulation of counter-protest. Unsurprisingly, 21 Barnum, DG, 'The constitutional status of public protest activity in Britain and the US' (1977) PL 310, p 327. See also Williams, op. cit., fn 1, p 10.

22 As indicated below (see fn 60), public protest websites may act as one such substitute.

23 See, e.g., Allen and Cooper, op. cit., fn 1, p 378; Barnum, 'The constitutional status of public protest activity in Britain and the US' (1977) PL 310.

24 See, e.g., Abel, R, Speech and Respect, 1994, Sweet and Maxwell, pp 48–58. Abel argues, using examples of media regulation by the market, that 'state withdrawal exposes speech to powerful market forces'. See also Feintuck, M, Media Regulation, Public Interest and the Law, 1999.

the intense debate on these issues derives from the First Amendment jurisprudence; within the American academic community there appears to be agreement, not only that the state cannot deny a forum to those whose ideas it finds acceptable while denying it to those expressing unpopular views,[25] but also that 'equality of status in the field of ideas' or equality in the exercise of speech rights[26] requires substantive protection. Denial of a public forum for the exercise of expressive rights bears unequally on different groups: it may amount in effect to a denial of the free speech rights of certain minority groups since equal access to other means of exercising those rights will tend to be unavailable. This has also been recognised in the UK context; as Bevan has put it: '[public protest] assists the "unknowns", those who do not have the capability or resources to exercise expression through the conventional media'.[27]

A further justification for speech based on moral autonomy[28] counters public protest in one respect, since the right of a citizen to choose what she will see or hear would seem to include a right not to be forced to encounter protest which she finds offensive.[29] Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights protects the 'freedom of expression and the freedom . . . to receive . . . information and ideas . . .'. This includes a right not to speak, according to the Commission in K v Austria,[30] and may therefore include a right not to be forced to encounter speech. In the context of public protest, this would probably depend on the duration of the protest and its probable impact on passers-by and others. It might also depend on the extent to which the protesters could be viewed as exercising, through the protest, a choice as to their mode of participation in political activity, a choice which, in the case of some minority groups, may not be a real one, in the sense that they may be, in effect, excluded from mainstream politics. Its exercise may also be bolstered, therefore, by arguments in favour of equality of democratic participation, in addition to those reliant on the values most readily viewed as underlying expressive rights. As Barendt points out, in relation to the German Brokdorf case,[31] freedom of assembly (protected, in Germany, by Art 8 of the Basic Law) 'enables people, especially minorities, to participate in the political process. Participation rights are not exhausted by membership of political parties . . . the exercise of the right enables protesters to express their personalities by their physical presence . . .'.[32]

Thus justifications deriving from free speech values and from the choice as to the mode of participation in the democracy underpin freedom of assembly and public protest. Even an assembly which publicised anti-democratic views would fall within the justification from the argument from truth. But it is clear that these justifications are not equally present in relation to all assemblies or all forms of what may loosely be termed protest.

25 See Police Dept of the City of Chicago v Mosley (1972) 408 US 92, pp 95–96. The case concerned an anti-racist protest by a single black protester.

26 See Karst, K, 'Equality as a central principle in the First Amendment', 43 University of Chicago L Rev 20.

27 Bevan, VT, 'Protest and public disorder' [1979] PL 163, p 187.

28 See Scanlon, T, 'A theory of freedom of expression' (1972) 1 Phil and Public Affairs 204; see p 201, above.

29 Cf Dworkin's distinction between display and distribution: 'Do we have a right to pornography?' in A Matter of Principle, 1985, pp 355–58.

30 A 255-B (1993), Com Rep, paras 45, 49.

31 (1985) 69 BVerfGE 315.

32 Paper given February 2000 at the Cambridge public law conference.

Public assembly and protest occurs in various forms, admittedly overlapping, ranging from the peaceful expression of a message or views to rioting and extreme violence; it can be categorised as: peaceful persuasion,[33] offensive or insulting persuasion,[34] intimidation,[35] symbolic or persuasive physical obstruction or interference,[36] actual physical obstruction or interference,[37] forceful physical obstruction[38] and violence.[39] The argument from democracy most clearly supports peaceful assemblies or marches that use speech in some form to persuade others, including the authorities, to a particular point of view. The second and third forms, which may occur by means of both speech and conduct, may be supported by the arguments from truth and democracy so long as they are not outweighed by the threat posed by the action. Since these justifications are goal- as opposed to rights-based, they would support only public protest which did not run counter to the goals in question (such as a racist protest).[40] Further, since they set out goals for society as a whole, they would seem to allow interference with speech in the interests of other public concerns which may be immediately and directly damaged by the exercise of speech. As Barendt puts it, in discussing the argument from truth: '. . . a government worried that inflammatory speech may provoke disorder is surely entitled to elevate immediate public order considerations over the long term intellectual development of the man on the Clapham omnibus.'[41]

The last four forms, often loosely referred to as 'direct action', cannot be termed 'speech', but may be viewed as forms of expression and as having, to varying extents, the same role as political speech. If, as in the last three, a group seeks not to persuade others, but by its actions to bring about the object in question, the democratic process may be said to have been circumvented rather than underpinned. Some forms of non-violent action may well be combined with attempts at verbal persuasion, but may also be intended in themselves to bring about the object in question or at least to obstruct others in their attempts to bring about various objects. Such action would include industrial and other forms of picketing and protests such as those of hunt or fishing saboteurs who physically obstruct the activity in question, albeit usually by non-violent means. Does such action fall within the justifications for freedom of protest at all? If it is non-violent, it may be lawful in itself on the principle that everything which is not legally forbidden is allowed. Sleeping in a tree in order to prevent it being cut down or throwing twigs into water to disrupt angling is not intrinsically unlawful, but if no rights-based justification protects such activity and if it impinges on the lawful activity of others, it may appear reasonable to proscribe it. Such activity could, however, be viewed as symbolic speech – message-bearing expression – and therefore as deserving of a degree of protection on that basis. It could be viewed both as obstructing the activity in question but also as calling attention to it, fuelling debate and thereby 33 E.g., offering innocuous leaflets or chanting inoffensive slogans.

34 E.g., carrying racist banners, displaying pictures of dead foetuses.
35 E.g., shouting and gesturing at individuals crossing picket lines.
36 E.g., lying passively in front of earth moving machinery, conducting a vigil.
37 E.g., blowing horns during a hunt or chaining oneself to a tree.
38 E.g., resisting official attempts to remove members of a sit-in.
39 E.g., attacking counter demonstrators or police officers.
40 See Kuhnen v FRG No 12194/86 (1988) 56 DR 205.
41 Freedom of Speech, 1987, 1st edn, p 10.

potentially activating the democratic process. However, such action is also likely to create an invasion of personal autonomy. This argument may be countered where strong justification for the direct action is put forward. An obvious example is its use by the Suffragettes in order to persuade and to draw attention to a cause of immense importance in a democracy. It is clearly questionable whether, short of violence, such protest should be placed, in the eyes of the law, in the same category as late night high street rowdiness. The same cannot be said so readily of direct action which seeks to prevent an outcome of lesser significance – such as the building of a bypass – which has been determined upon by an application of the democratic process.[42]

The fourth form of protest, persuasive physical obstruction or interference, is in a rather different position, although the line between the fourth and fifth tiers will often be hard to draw. Such action is not intended to bring about the object in question directly, but to draw attention to a cause. Of course, some direct action may exemplify both purposes. This may be said of the actions of hunt or fishing saboteurs and motorway protesters.[43]

Direct action may include, in its most extreme form, group violence intended to force others into compliance with a certain view. This would include political riots intended to overthrow the government. This would be unjustifiable in relation to a democratically elected government following the arguments above. However, some forceful action may not be intended in itself to bring about the object in question directly, but may be used as a desperate expedient to draw attention to a cause where peaceful means have failed. It may be distinguished from violent direct action, since it is still intended to bring about its object by democratic means; it may be used to draw attention to a cause and to persuade the electors and Parliament that action is necessary. Such action may be preferred to direct action due to the nature of the object in question. The history of the Suffragette movement shows that after peaceful protest had failed, forceful or violent protest was adopted.

Political riots do not present states with the dilemmas normally associated with public protest. The difficulty usually lies in determining whether a protest, which is justified by reference to the arguments above, has the potential to threaten public order. This possibility clearly raises issues as to the scope of state duties to keep the peace and to safeguard the interests of citizens upon whom protests may impinge. Forms of direct action may infringe privacy rights and the freedom from physical attack or threats. The substance of the protest may be offensive and hurtful to others. The manner of the protest may involve intimidation, thereby potentially infringing the rights of persons to security of the person, freedom of movement and possibly to freedom of assembly. Non-violent or more vulnerable groups may require a calm public order situation in order to be enabled to make an effective protest. Protecting the freedom to protest can mean protecting powerful and well-organised groups at the expense of the weak.

42 In the case of road building, the extent to which the outcome may be said to represent an application of the democratic process is debatable, especially where the road is within the remit of the Department of Transport rather than a local council. In both instances, under the Highways Act 1980, s 258, objections may be made by those directly and indirectly affected and usually a public inquiry will be arranged and conducted by an 'independent' inspector – a civil servant in the Department of Transport – who then makes a recommendation to the Secretary of State.

43 A good example is the protest at Newbury against the A34 bypass. Between 1994 and 1998 every form of protest was used, from non-violent direct action to criminal damage; see the Newbury Bypass website: geocities.com/newburybypass/index.html.

In a mature democracy, it would be expected that the extent to which a protest was persuasive rather than simply obstructive would tend to determine the extent of its constitutional protection, although even obstructive protest may be viewed as falling within the range of expressive rights,[44] as raising issues of association and, arguably, of participation in the democracy. The direct action forms of protest might be justified, particularly when exercised by minority groups, on the grounds that they provide a substantive means of engaging in the more effective means of communicating with others (since such forms are most likely to attract media attention) and of participating freely in political activity.[45] The same arguments could be applied to persuasive protest requiring a particular forum and time for its exercise. In other words, the equality principle in terms of free expression and rights to engage in political activity might be taken to demand that minorities should be allowed access to forms and places of protest going beyond the relatively innocuous or convenient. Such an argument might allow interference with forms of direct action exercised by minority groups to be considered as interferences with the freedoms of expression, assembly and association though subject to justification, although this raises the difficult issue of the relationship between equality and freedom.[46] Constitutional protection for such freedoms might be expected to override societal interests in preventing mere inconvenience or preserving decorum but, depending on considerations of proportionality, might give way to justifications based on moral autonomy, the risk of personal harm and, perhaps, economic loss. If the value of minority political participation is at stake, a protest expressing a minority viewpoint tending to marginalise a further minority might undermine any special claim it might otherwise have had to access to a particular place.[47] These are the issues with which, on the whole, the domestic courts have not had to grapple in determining public order questions,[48] but with which they are now confronted under the HRA 1998.

The legal response

The development of public order law

Taking the justifications underpinning public protest considered above into account and weighing them against the interest of the state and its citizens in the maintenance of 44 Such protest will be viewed as an expression of opinion according to the findings of the European Court of Human Rights in Steel v UK (1999) 28 EHRR 603 and Hashman and Harrup v UK (1999) 30 EHRR 241, both discussed below. The protests at issue in those decisions might be viewed as having both persuasive and destructive elements, but it might be argued that a protest intended by the protesters to be purely obstructive could also be viewed as the expression of an opinion; it could also lead incidentally to publicity for the cause and on that basis also could be viewed as a form of expression.

45 See Barendt's argument (Barendt, Freedom of Speech, 1st edn, 1987) above, Part II, p 303.

46 See Karst, 'Equality as a central principle in the First Amendment', 43 University of Chicago L Rev 20, p 43.

47 E.g., racist groups were diverted from marching through Asian communities in Leicester in 1974 and 1979, by the imposition of conditions under the Public Order Act 1936, s 3(1). Such conditions could now be imposed under the 1986 Act, s 12.

48 As Feldman puts it: 'the central value [in UK public protest cases] is public order . . .' (Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 1993, 1st edn, p 785).

public order, it is clear that some restraint on public protest is needed and is justifiable. The difficulty is that, in furtherance of the interest in public order (which in itself protects freedom of protest and assembly), the constitutional need to allow freedom of assembly in a democracy may be obscured. Historically, the UK has had no formal constitutional or statutory provision providing rights to protest and assemble. Instead, it has seen a series of often ill-considered and needlessly broad statutory responses to disorder. Thus, the activities of the followers of Mosley underpinned the Public Order Act 1936,[49] while in the period leading up to the inception of the Public Order Act 1986 there were a series of disturbances beginning with the Brixton riots in 1981[50] and continuing with the disorder associated with the miners' strike in 1984–85, probably the most significant event in British public order history. The strike largely provided the justification for the introduction of the Public Order Act 1986, although it does not appear that further police powers to control disorder were needed. The police did not seem to have lacked powers to deal with the disturbances; on the contrary, a number of different common law and statutory powers were invoked, including powers to prevent a breach of the peace, s 3 of the Public Order Act 1936, offences of unlawful assembly, of obstruction of a constable and of watching and besetting under s 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875.[51] However, the government took the view that the available powers were confused and fragmented and that there was scope for affording the police additional powers to prevent disorder before it occurred.[52] It therefore introduced a number of low level public order offences and created a cumbersome, unwieldy framework for the policing of processions and assemblies under the 1986 Act.

The late 1980s and the early 1990s witnessed some similar protests, notably the anti-poll tax demonstrations, protests against The Satanic Verses and against the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act (CJPOA) 1994 itself ('Kill the Bill' protests). Mass protest was not a hallmark of the 1990s, but the period did see an enormous growth in the use of direct action by a variety of groups, usually protesting about environmental and animal rights issues. These included hunt saboteurs, fishing saboteurs, motorway and bypass protesters, and veal calf protesters. The protests at Newbury, Twyford Down and Oxleas Wood against bypasses[53] and at Brightlingsea and Shoreham Ferry Port against the export of veal calves were particularly notable. The growth in the use of direct action was arguably traceable to the perception of animal rights and environmental groups that the government's pursuit of free-market policies meant that it had little concern with environmental as opposed to commercial values.[54] Therefore, during its lengthy period in office, it was assumed that it would be unresponsive to a minority view, and peaceful protest as part of the democratic process would be ineffective. The 49 For an excellent account of this period, see Ewing and Gearty, op. cit., fn 1, 1999.

50 See the inquiry by Lord Scarman, The Brixton Disorders, Cmnd 8427, 1981.

51 See McCabe, S and Wallington, P, The Police, Public Order and Civil Liberties: Legacies of the Miners' Strike, 1988, Routledge, esp Appendix 1; Wallington, P, 'Policing the miners' strike' (1985) 14 ILJ 145. During the miners' strike, over 10,000 offences were charged; see Wallington, ibid.

52 See: House of Commons, Fifth Report from the Home Affairs Committee, Session 1979–80, The Law Relating to Public Order, HC 756–1; Lord Scarman, The Brixton Disorders, Part VI, Cmnd 8427, 1981; Smith, ATH, 'Public order law 1974–1983: Developments and proposals' [1984] Crim LR 643; White Paper, Review of Public Order Law, Cmnd 9510, 1985.

53 See Bryant, B, Twyford Down: Roads, Campaigning and Environmental Law, 1996, E and FN Spon; 'Roads to nowhere', Green Party Election Manifesto 1997, Transport section.

54 See Monbiot, G, 'The end of polite resistance', TLS, 8 March 1997; Bryant, ibid.

rise in direct action suggested that the traditional aim of protest – to persuade – was being abandoned. The response of the Major Government was to introduce more draconian measures under the CJPOA 1994 aimed largely at direct action in order to suppress it.[55]

The coming into power of the Labour Government in 1997 did not herald any diminution of the direct action form of protest, on the government's own analysis of its predicted prevalence.[56] The concerns of protesters against motorway development, abuse of human rights and on environmental matters, including the introduction of genetically modified crops, continued to be expressed in this form.[57] Diverse groups continued to view protest as a valuable means of drawing attention to viewpoints which tended to be excluded from what may be termed the mainstream communications market place, particularly the tabloid press. Direct action protest may indirectly generate debate and scrutiny of the issues it raises – in the media, and sometimes in the form of official inquiries. The use of direct action at Huntingdon Life Sciences against the use of animals in medical research currently provides an example of the effect of such action in terms of re-igniting serious debate on aspects of the issue.[58] Demonstrations against the impact of trading globalisation took place in London in 1999, 2000 and 2001, and human rights groups, including Amnesty, attempted to protest against the abuse of human rights in China on the occasion of the visit of the Chinese President in October 1999,[59] but were met by heavy-handed policing. Flags and banners were forced from the hands of protesters and removed from the windows of private houses. The availability of a range of other means of communication, particularly via the internet, did not appear to lead to the marginalisation of protest as a means of communicating and of participating in the democratic process. Indeed, the internet, far from providing an alternative means of communication, facilitates protest and publicises it.[60] The movement away from socialist policies under Labour, and the similarities between the criminal justice policies of the two main parties, appeared to give rise to a continued perception that radical views could find no place within mainstream politics.

55 For the background to the 1994 Act, which received the Royal Assent on 3 November 1994, see the introduction in Wasik and Taylor's Guide to the Act, 1995, p 1. For discussion of the public order offences, see Smith, ATH [1995] Crim LR 19.

56 Legislation Against Terrorism: A Consultation Paper, Cm 4178, 1998.

57 See the Newbury Bypass website: geocities.com/newburybypass/index.html; reports of protests at Newbury, Daily Telegraph, 11 January 1999 and 30 April 1999; the Greenpeace website: greenpeace.org.uk/.

58 See, e.g., the Guardian, 16 January 2001, p 7 and 22 January 2001, p 5, Radio 4's World At One, 15 January 2001 and two lengthy Channel 4 documentaries in the same week. See further www.huntingdon.com; www.vivisectioninfo.org/HLS.html;www.freezone.co.uk/liberationmag/huntingex.htm.

59 The Home Office stated that it had not placed pressure on the Metropolitan Police to prevent demonstrators disrupting the visit of the Chinese President (national news reports, 25 October 1999). A routine internal review was carried out which exonerated the police; report published on 17 March 2000. Eventually, in judicial review proceedings brought by lawyers for the Free Tibet campaign, the Metropolitan Police admitted that that the treatment of the demonstrators had been unlawful: news reports, 4 May 2000.

60 The Newbury Bypass website – geocities.com/newburybypass/index.html – for example, runs to 23 pages and has links to a mass of connected pages.

Anti-terrorism law and policy are considered in Chapter 14. But the blurring of the distinction between terrorist groups and protest groups in s 1 Terrorism Act 2000 (TA) should be mentioned at this point since the potential use of anti-terrorist law against protest groups has arisen. Terrorism and protest are the antithesis of each other and the legislation should make the distinction clear. Terrorism is about intimidating people and undermining the democratic process; protest is part of that process; it is about seeking to persuade, to change minds in a manner that may be reflected at the ballot box. Causing deaths by setting off bombs on the London Underground – as in June 2005 – is a classically terrorist activity. It could be dealt with by the ordinary criminal law since many criminal offences were committed, but if groups are to be labelled 'terrorist' then groups such as Al-Qaeda, that send suicide bombers onto crowded tube trains, clearly fall within that category. It is understandable, if misjudged, that governments might wish to use special terrorist sanctions outside the criminal justice process or the use of the substantive criminal law, against suicide bombers. But it is not understandable to apply the label 'terrorist' to groups that are in essence protest groups.

The response of the Labour Government to the likelihood that the direct action form of protest would continue in evidence during its period of office resembled that of the Major Government. It passed the Terrorism Act (TA) 2000, partly aimed, like the 1994 Act, at this form of protest, but – in a departure from previous policies – it used the technique, as Chapter 14 explains, not of introducing new, draconian offences, but of applying the established terrorism offences to the new targets. The TA allows for the application of a number of provisions developed to combat Irish terrorism to be applied to a much wider range of targets. By using the rubric 'terrorist' to denote the groups to be targeted, it sought to deflect the opposition which would have arisen had the terrorism offences merely been used overtly as a means of curbing the activities of animal rights groups, anti-war protesters, environmental activists and the like, under a new public order Act. However, the constantly reiterated plea of government ministers to the effect that the TA is aimed only at those who are likely to undermine democracy, has not prevented the perception from arising among some protest groups that they are the target of its provisions, for the straightforward reason that the definition of terrorism in s 1 is not remotely confined to combating a threat to democracy. Rather, as Chapter 14 argues, it connotes, quite clearly, the notion of stifling dissent.[61] Since it is aimed at certain groups which put forward a political or ideological message,[62] a potential conflict with Art 10 under the HRA arises. In particular, it could be asked, if a suitable case arises, whether a proportionate response to the activities of a number of groups which fall within the s 1(1) definition would not have been merely to use the ordinary criminal law against them, where necessary.

The introduction of the TA, as the government's consultation paper preceding the Act explains,[63] could only be justified in relation to non-Irish domestic groups, including groups motivated by ideological as well as political concerns; two of the key target groups expressly mentioned are animal rights or environmental activists. The offences discussed in Chapter 14 could probably only have been introduced in the context of the threat from Irish terrorism, in some instances at a time when the number of deaths from bomb attacks had been very high in the preceding years. At the time, MPs obviously could not know that in 2000 they would be asked to apply all these offences to groups which, in terms of their ability to create a serious threat to life and their willingness to do so, cannot be compared with the IRA. Moreover, certain of these offences appeared only in the Emergency Powers Act (applicable only in Northern Ireland), partly on the basis that the threat was greatest in Northern Ireland and that without some apparently strong justification, they should not be included in the Prevention of Terrorism Act (PTA). Unless and until the Home Secretary proscribes a range of domestic animal rights and environmental groups, the proscription-related offences will not apply to them. But all the special terrorist offences and the special arrest and detention powers apply,[64] meaning that although 'terrorist' groups can lawfully exist, they are potentially tramelled in exercising public freedom of expression or engaging in direct action since the terrorism offences discussed in Chapter 14, including the offence of being involved in the organisation of a terrorist group, could be invoked against them. Where 'terrorist' groups are also proscribed their rights of expression, assembly and association are almost entirely abrogated by the provisions considered in that Chapter. A member or supporter of a non-proscribed 'terrorist' group, such as a group advocating direct action against a dictatorship abroad, can still speak in public. But they run the risk of falling foul of the 'leader/organiser' TA offence or of the new offence introduced by the Terrorism Act 2006, discussed in Chapter 14, of 'glorifying' terrorism.

61 See pp 1377–81.

62 They must fulfil the other criteria of s 1(1); see Chapter 14, pp 1377–78.

63 Legislation Against Terrorism: A Consultation Paper, Cm 4178, 1998, Chapter 2.

Aside from the broader application of terrorist offences, the attacks on the World Trade Centre in 2001, the entry of Britain into the Iraq war, which sparked large-scale protests, and the London bombings in 2005, also had an impact in leading to the introduction of a range of new offences aimed at stifling anti-war dissent, a number of which are relevant in this area. The Serious and Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 ushered in severe restrictions on demonstrations in Parliament Square, which were clearly aimed mainly at anti-war demonstrators. The Anti-Social Behaviour Act 2003 was employed to broaden a number of the already broad provisions in order to deploy them in a wider range of circumstances against protesters. The Act deleted reference to activity taking place in the 'open air' in s 68 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, a broad provision aimed originally at animal rights and environmental activists. It also reduced the number of persons who can constitute a 'public assembly' for the purpose of banning it or imposing conditions on it under the 1986 Act, from twenty to two. A number of the wide range of statutory provisions already in place, as well as the ancient common law doctrine of breach of the peace, were deployed against anti-war protesters. The broadening of the definition of 'public assembly' means that two people reading out names of those killed in the Iraq war are now subject to the 'assembly' provisions of the Public Order Act 1986.

The nature of public order law

Although the method adopted by the TA 2000 differs, as indicated, from that of its predecessors, the effect is the same: it follows the tradition they established, whereby provisions likely to affect public protest and assembly are simply added to the existing and extensive ones. A number of trends inimical to public protest are discernible, carried through from the Public Order Act 1986, to the CJPOA 1994, the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, ss 1 and 25 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, the TA 2000, the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001 and, at present, they culminate in ss 132–38 of the Serious and Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 which apply to demonstrations in the vicinity of Parliament.

64 See Chapters 11, 12 and 14.

Certain features of these statutes exhibit the traditional hallmarks of UK public order law, but in the more recent legislation their illiberal tendency is more greatly marked. These statutes are littered with imprecise terms such as 'disorderly' or 'insulting' or 'disruptive', all objectionable under rule of law notions since protesters cannot predict when a protest may lead to criminal liability. Reliance on the likelihood that police, magistrates or the CPS will under-enforce the law is unsatisfactory due to the likelihood that their decisions, in any particular instance, will not be subjected to independent scrutiny. Such reliance hardly provides the firm basis for the exercise of rights to assemble and to protest which one would expect to find in a mature democracy.

The more recent statutory offences tend to have the ingredients of a minimal actus reus and an absent, minimal or reversed mens rea.[65] This tendency contributes to the conflation of substantive offences with police powers, evident in the 1986 Act, which has recently become more marked. The CJPOA 1994 continued the trend begun by the 1986 Act of introducing a number of offences which depended on taking orders from the police and which were based on the reasonable suspicion of a police officer.[66] For example, s 60 of the 1994 Act was amended by s 25 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 to provide a power under s 60(4A)(a) to demand the removal of a face covering 'if the constable reasonably believes that person is wearing [it] wholly or mainly for the purpose of concealing his identity' and to create an offence punishable by one month's imprisonment of failing to remove the covering. A reasonable, if erroneous, belief is sufficient and no mens rea need be established, so that the wearing of a covering for religious reasons could be irrelevant. No defence of reasonable excuse is provided, so that, for example, it would be unavailing for a farm worker protesting against hunting to claim to wish to conceal her identity not from the police, but from her employer. This trend was strongly continued under the TA 2000.[67]

The more recent provisions affecting public protest also exhibit a tendency not only to create restrictions at the outer limits of what might be tolerated in a democratic society, but to impose criminal penalties while marginalising the criminal process in dealing with disorder. Thus, s 69 of the 1994 Act allows for the conviction of the defendant due to disobedience to a ban on entering land imposed by a police officer, even if the original order was based on an error.[68] Section 3 of the Protection from Harassment

65 See discussion of the Public Order Act 1986, ss 14A, 14C; the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, s 69 and the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, s 1, below.

66 See the 1986 Act, ss 12 and 14. Sections 14A and C, introduced under the 1994 Act, s 70, are discussed below, as are the 1994 Act, ss 68 and 69.

67 See Chapter 14, pp 1381–1421 and see also below, p 698 for brief discussion of the relevant counter-terrorist provisions.

68 See Capon v DPP, Case CO/3496/97 judgment 4 March 1998, LEXIS transcript, discussed Mead, D, 'Will peaceful protesters be foxed by the Divisional Court decision in Capon v DPP?' [1998] Crim LR 870; considered below, pp 742–43.

Act 1997 and s 1 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 provide criminal penalties for disobedience to civil orders. Section 1 of the 1998 Act provides a penalty of a maximum of five years' imprisonment for failing to obey an order obtained on the civil standard of proof,[69] forbidding any form of 'anti-social' behaviour.[70] As Chapter 14 explains, s 3(4) of the TA 2000 empowers the Home Secretary to add a group to the list of those proscribed 'if he believes that it is concerned in terrorism'. There is no express requirement of reasonable belief; nor is it necessary for the group to fall within the definition of terrorism under s 1.[71] No criminal or other proceedings are necessary and there is initially no right of appeal to a court.[72] Not only do the proscription provisions have immense implications for the rights of the groups proscribed to association, expression and assembly, they also provide the basis for criminalising a wide range of persons who are in some way associated with such groups, including those who merely organise informal meetings at which a member of a proscribed group is speaking, regardless of the purpose of the meeting as a whole.[73]

These recently introduced statutes tend to provide a minimal recognition of a need to protect freedom of expression and assembly by including certain defences of 'reasonableness' without attempting to define the meaning of the term[74] and without making any reference to expression. Such defences stand in contrast to those provided in statutes affecting media freedom of expression, such as s 5 of the Contempt of Court Act 1981, s 4 of the Obscene Publications Act 1959, and s 12 of the HRA, all of which provide explicit and detailed defences, allowing, in effect, for a balancing act between protecting expression and the societal interest at stake.

Clearly, the nature of the statutory provisions is only one factor contributing to the real extent of rights to protest and assemble. The common law power to prevent a breach of the peace or to be of good behaviour arguably outdoes such provisions in terms of exhibiting many of the features just criticised, and, as indicated, judicial influence in developing and interpreting public order law has been significant. The key factor, however, continues to be the working practice of the police.[75] The police may already have developed a practice which renders a statutory power irrelevant, or they may consider that the use of the power would exacerbate a public order situation, rather than defusing it. The police may therefore tend to pick and choose among the available powers, tending to prefer familiar or very broad ones, particularly the power to prevent a breach of the peace. These factors appear to explain why certain of the far reaching provisions of the Public Order Act 1986, including the obligation to notify the police of a march,[76] the powers to impose conditions on marches[77] and assemblies,[78] and to ban

69 According to the 1998 Magistrates' Courts Rules applicable to these orders.
70 Section 1(10)(b).
71 See the TA 2000, s 3(5) and Chapter 14, pp 1383–84.
72 See Chapter 14, pp 1385, 1397–1401.
73 See further Chapter 14, pp 1392–96.
74 E.g. the Public Order Act 1986, ss 5(3)(c) and 4A(3)(c); the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, s 1; the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, s 3(1)(c) and s 1(10).
75 See Waddington, Liberty and Order, 1994.
76 Section 11.
77 Section 12.
78 Section 14.

assemblies on the basis of a reasonable belief in the risk of serious public disorder[79] have hardly been used.[80] In contrast, there is emerging evidence that the broader, less cumbersome provisions discussed below, including the recently introduced statutory powers, are being utilised against protesters. The accountability of the police has lain in this context largely in the hands of magistrates due to the dominance of summary offences and the use of binding over powers; therefore, the reality of freedom of protest has frequently been determined at that level. As Palmer puts it, 'prosecutions before magistrates' courts [which] may give rise to [frequently unreported] decisions of the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench . . . are the gauge by which the health of civil liberties in this country can be measured'.[81]

Methods of policing disorder are also significant. Developments in the law during the 1980s and 90s, which provided the police with new and extensive powers to control public protest, have been matched to an extent by developments in such methods. Equipment has become more effective; in 1981, the Home Secretary announced that stocks of CS gas, water cannon and plastic bullets would be held in a central store available to chief officers of police for use in situations of serious disorder, although only as a last resort.[82] However, CS gas has not been used to control disorder since 1981 and water cannon were withdrawn from availability in 1987.[83] The possibility that the use of forceful tactics may exacerbate public order situations has been recognised since Lord Scarman's report into the Brixton disorders in 1981.[84]

The conditions under which various weapons and tactics may be used are not defined in any statute and before the inception of the HRA it appeared that their use was subject to a very low standard of scrutiny by the courts. When a local police authority tried to prevent the Chief Constable applying for plastic bullets from the central store, the Court of Appeal declared that the Crown had a prerogative power to keep the peace which allowed the Home Secretary to 'do all that was reasonably necessary to preserve the peace of the realm'.[85] As the power is undefined, it appeared to render lawful any measures taken by the Home Secretary which can be termed 'reasonably necessary' in order to keep the peace. However, this position cannot be sustained under the HRA, since a court is expected to examine the proportionality of the measures taken to the aim of preventing disorder.[86]

Meetings on private premises

Although the emphasis of the discussion so far has largely been on meetings and demonstrations in public places, meetings held on private land or premises with the permission

79 Section 13.
80 See Waddington, op. cit., fn 1, 1994.
81 Palmer, S, 'Wilfully obstructing the freedom to protest?' [1987] PL 495.
82 Report of HM Chief Inspector for Constabulary for 1981, 1981–82, HC 463. For discussion of police riot control techniques and equipment, see Waddington, The Strong Arm of the Law, Chapter 6.
83 See Jason-Lloyd, L (1991) 141 NLJ 1043.
84 The Brixton Disorders, Cmnd 8427, 1981.
85 Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Northumbria Police Authority [1989] QB 26; [1988] 2 WLR 590; [1988] 1 All ER 556, CA; for criticism, see Beynon [1987] PL 146 (on the Divisional Court decision); Bradley, AW, 'Police powers and the prerogative' [1988] PL 298.
86 See further Chapter 2, pp 92–97, Chapter 4, pp 287–88.

of the owner are, nevertheless, affected by a number of public order provisions. Under the Public Order Act 1986, still the central statute governing this area, any meeting held in wholly enclosed premises will be a private meeting (s 16), including a meeting held in a town hall, although the town hall is owned by a public body. The provisions of ss 11–14A of Part II of the Public Order Act 1986, creating a statutory framework for marches and assemblies, do not cover private meetings. But the public order provisions of ss 5, 4A and 4 do apply to 'private places'. However, if the place in question is a 'dwelling', the words or behaviour must affect a person outside the dwelling. Thus, in theory, these provisions are applicable to private meetings not held in a person's home. Provisions aimed at violent disorder – ss 1, 2, 3 – apply equally to private and public places, without any qualification regarding dwellings. The counter-terrorism measures discussed below could also be used in respect of private meetings.

Aside from the powers of arrest under the provisions of Part I of the 1986 Act which, with the qualifications mentioned regarding dwellings, are available, the power of the police to enter indoor meetings is uncertain. It was generally thought that the police had no power to enter unless they were invited in. However, such a power may derive from the decision in Thomas v Sawkins.[87] A meeting was held in a hall to protest regarding the provisions of the Incitement to Disaffection Bill which was then before Parliament. The police entered the meeting and its leader, who considered that they were trespassing, removed one of the officers, who resisted the ejectment. In response, the leader brought a private prosecution in which he sought to show that the officers were trespassers and that therefore he had a right to eject them, in which case their resistance would amount to assault and battery. The court found that the officers had not been trespassing. Although the meeting had not constituted or given rise to a breach of the peace, the officers had reasonably apprehended a breach because seditious speeches and incitement to violence might have occurred. The police had therefore been entitled to enter the premises. This decision has been much criticised.[88] Nevertheless, it does not hand the police carte blanche to enter private meetings; it should mean that the police can enter the meeting only if there is a clear possibility that a breach of the peace may occur. The nature of this doctrine and the probable effect on it of the HRA is considered below. Under the Strasbourg jurisprudence, an element of immediacy is necessary.[89] Therefore the power to enter meetings indicated in Thomas v Sawkins is likely to undergo limitation.

A more narrow right to enter premises, which might be applicable in respect of some meetings, arises under s 17(1)(c) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. A police officer has the right to enter and search premises with a view to arresting a person for the offence arising under s 1 of the Public Order Act 1936 of wearing a uniform in connection with a political object. Furthermore, the police can enter premises in order to arrest a person for an offence under s 4 of the Public Order Act 1986. It should be noted that the offence under s 4 (discussed below) can be committed in a private or public place, although not in a dwelling. Presumably it could therefore be committed in a town hall. Thus, a meeting during which violence might be threatened to persons present[90] would give police officers the right to enter if they had reasonable suspicion that such could be the case. If it was thought that one of the serious public order offences under ss 1, 2 or 3 of the 1986 Act was occurring or about to occur, the police could arrest under the general arrest power of s 24 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. We will return to this arrest power and police powers of entry to premises in Chapters 10 and 11 below.

87 [1935] 2 KB 249.
88 See Goodhart, AL [1936–38] CLJ 22.
89 McLeod v UK (1998) 27 EHRR 493 RJD 1998-VII 2774. See below, p 776.

Conclusions

Thus, the domestic focus of attention has been, and still is, on the many areas of law which delimit the residual freedom to make public protest. Clearly, it is understandable that public protest suffers greater circumscription than political expression generally, since it conflicts with a large number of societal interests and may create invasions of individual autonomy,[91] damage to property and even personal injury. But the traditional marked judicial reluctance to consider the free expression claims of public protest in a democracy provides, it will be argued, too great a contrast not only with the stance taken in Strasbourg, but with that taken by the domestic judiciary, and the House of Lords in particular, in relation to the political expression of the media.[92]

In considering public protest, Strasbourg has viewed it as a form of political expression and has therefore relied on case law in other areas of expression.[93] In contrast, in the domestic courts, 'rights' to the freedoms of protest and assembly are occasionally mentioned,[94] but their content is hardly considered; far more typically, the interest of the judgment centres on the legal content of proprietorial rights. Perhaps even more significantly, the status of Arts 10 and 11 as providing claim rights subject to exceptions which are 'necessary in a democratic society', has provided Strasbourg, as Handyside v UK[95] makes clear, with the opportunity of considering the hallmarks of such a society. Strasbourg is therefore able to consider what is required in terms of the necessity of an interference with public protest, both in terms of the maintenance of the democracy and of effective participation in it. In contrast, the domestic judiciary have been confined to applying the law, whether or not its restrictions go beyond those nationally and internationally deemed necessary in democracies. The UK courts have hardly participated in the ongoing debate in democracies regarding the permissible extent of such restrictions, and to an extent this is due to their inevitable preoccupation, under a constitution based on negative liberties, with the legal content of the restriction in question. As indicated above, this position has, formally, changed under the HRA. Its possible effects in this context form the central theme of this chapter.

90 In general, the control of indoor meetings is the responsibility of the persons holding the meeting and to that end, a reasonable number of stewards should be appointed (Public Order Act 1936, s 2(6)) who may use reasonable force to control disorder and to eject members of the public whose behaviour does not constitute reasonable participation in the meeting.

91 In the sense that the protest must be experienced by those who may not wish to experience it. It may also interfere with individual choices as to activities and movement.

92 See Derbyshire CC v Times Newspapers [1993] AC 534 and Reynolds v Times Newspapers [1999] 4 All ER 609.

93 See, e.g., Steel and Others v UK (1999) 28 EHRR 603, para 101.

94 See, e.g., Lord Denning's comments in Hubbard v Pitt [1975] 3 All ER 1.

95 (1976) 1 EHRR 737.

Judicial uncertainty in applying the Convention is arising in a number of contexts, but public protest cases present them with an especially stark choice, since the HRA provides that public authorities must not infringe Arts 10 and 11; on its face, this requirement demands a break, not only with the traditional acceptance that there is no legal right to assemble or engage in public protest in the UK, but with the failure to prevent encroachment on the negative liberty. As indicated above, references to 'rights' were occasionally made, but they appeared to be, loosely, to negative liberties.[96] The HRA requires more of public authorities than a mere voluntary tolerance of public protest or a recognition of freedom of assembly that can be readily abrogated.[97] There were signs in the early post-HRA years that the judiciary, while paying lip-service to rights to freedom of protest, were maintaining something close to the previous balance between public order and freedom of assembly, thereby failing to give full effect to Arts 10 and 11. However, Laporte in the House of Lords signalled not only a change of stance and a willingness to break with previous tradition, but also an acknowledgement that the previous common law protection for protest and assembly was deeply flawed and inadequate.

2 Rights to assemble and to protest

Traditional legal recognition of freedom of assembly[98]

It is generally thought that there is a right to assemble in certain places, such as Trafalgar Square or Hyde Park, but it is a fallacy that UK law has recognised any legal right to do so.[99] Until the Convention was received into domestic law, it continued to afford virtually no recognition to rights to meet or to march. However, there are two instances in which such recognition is given. There is a very limited right to hold meetings, applying only to parliamentary candidates before a general election, which arises under ss 95 and 96 of the Representation of the People Act 1983. This right will normally be upheld even when it appears that it is being abused by a minority group: in Webster v Southwark LBC[100] the Labour council had wished to deny it to a National Front candidate, but the court upheld the statutory right of the group to meet. Once an election meeting is in being, the law will afford a limited protection: it is an offence under s 97 of the 1983 Act to use disorderly conduct in order to break up a lawful public election meeting and this will include meetings held on the highway.[101] This limited provision may be

96 It may be noted that when approval has been expressed of Lord Denning's defence of 'rights to protest', the 'right' has become a freedom: per Otton J in Hirst and Agu v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire (1987) 85 Cr App Rep 143: having quoted Lord Denning's findings with approval, he went on to say: 'the freedom of protest on matters of public concern would be given the recognition it deserves.'

97 See DPP v Jones [1999] 2 WLR 625. The decision is discussed in detail below, pp 711–20.

98 See Barnum, DG, 'The constitutional status of public protest activity in Britain and the US' (1977) PL 310, and (1981) 29 Am Jo of Comparative Law 59; see also Stein, LA [1971] PL 115 for discussion of the constitutional status of public protest.

99 In respect of Trafalgar Square, see Ex p Lewis (1888) 21 QBD 191. By statutory instrument, an application must be made to the Department of the Environment to hold a meeting in Trafalgar Square (SI 1952/776). There is no right to hold meetings in the royal parks: see Bailey v Williamson (1873) LR 8 QB 118.

100 [1983] QB 698; [1983] 2 WLR 217.

101 Burden v Rigler [1911] 1 KB 337.

compared with more general provisions from other jurisdictions making it an offence to disrupt any meeting that has not been prohibited.[102]

Further, s 43 of the Education (No 2) Act 1986 provides that university and college authorities are under a positive duty to 'ensure that freedom of speech within the law is secured for members, students and employees of the establishment and for visiting speakers'.[103] Although there may be an argument that this provision is to be welcomed as promoting free speech interests, it is somewhat anomalous, to say the least, that a right to meet arises in certain specified buildings but not in others, such as town halls, while it does not arise at all in public places such as town squares or parks. In Caesar-Gordon ex p University of Liverpool,[104] the University gave permission, under a number of limitations, allowing a South African speaker to speak at a meeting. Concerns were expressed about the possibility of disorder in the nearby area of Toxteth, an area with large ethnic population. The Divisional Court upheld the limiting conditions imposed which included the right to charge the organisers, the Conservative Association, for the cost of security, and a ban on publicity. Thus, quite severe limits can be placed on this right in practice.

But apart from these narrow rights, arising from specific provisions, a group which is prevented from holding an effective meeting due to the activities of other groups had no special protection.[105] A group which wished to assemble in a particular place had no right to do so, although a very limited freedom to assemble on the highway was recognised prior to the inception of the HRA, as discussed below.[106] On the other hand, the law affords great prominence to the freedom to pass and re-pass along the highway. Section 137 of the Highways Act 1980 provides that a person will be guilty of an offence if he 'without lawful authority or excuse wilfully obstructs the free passage of the highway'. It might appear, therefore, that the negative freedom to assemble is entirely abrogated so far as the highway is concerned since most assemblies will create some obstruction. However, according to Hirst and Agu v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire,[107] the term 'lawful excuse' refers to activities which are lawful in themselves and which are reasonable, and this was found to cover peaceful demonstrations. This decision supports the view that freedom of assembly has found some recognition as a common law principle.

Further, s 14 of the Public Order Act 1986 impliedly recognises the freedom to meet so long as the statutory requirements are complied with, and this argument may be supported by the existence of certain specific statutory prohibitions on meetings in certain places or at certain times, such as s 3 of the Seditious Meetings Act 1817 which prohibits meetings of 50 or more in the vicinity of Westminster during a Parliamentary 102 See, e.g., Arts 284 and 285 of the Austrian Criminal Code.

103 For discussion of this provision see Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 1st edn, 1987, pp 321–22; Barendt, E, 'Freedom of speech in the universities' [1987] PL 344.

104 (1990) 3 All ER 821.

105 See discussion of this point in the European Court of Human Rights in Plattform 'Ärzte für das Leben' v Austria (1988) 13 EHRR 204; it was found that freedom of assembly could not be reduced to a mere duty on the part of the state not to interfere; it did require the state to take some positive steps to be taken although the state was not expected to guarantee that a demonstration was able to proceed.

106 See pp 680, 711–20.

107 (1986) 85 Cr App R 143. See also Nagy v Weston [1966] 2 QB 561; [1965] 1 WLR 280; cf Arrowsmith v Jenkins [1963] 2 QB 561; [1963] 2 All ER 210; for comment, see [1987] PL 495.

session. Such restrictions impliedly support the existence of a general freedom to meet or march that will exist if not specifically prohibited. The decision in Burden v Rigler[108] that, for the purposes of s 97 of the Representation of the People Act 1983, the fact that the meeting is held on the highway will not of itself render it unlawful, also supports this view. However, it will be indicated throughout this chapter that common law recognition of freedom of assembly was patchy, limited and precarious. Therefore, the rights of freedom of expression and assembly recognised in domestic law under the effects of the HRA are of especial significance.

Rights to make public protest within Arts 10 and 11

Under s 6 HRA, those seeking to exercise rights of protest and assembly can rely on Arts 10 and 11 of the Convention, and any other relevant right,[109] against public authorities, in particular the police. All the legislation already mentioned and discussed below must where necessary be interpreted compatibly with those rights, under s 3, taking the Strasbourg jurisprudence into account under s 2. But, in order to evaluate the actual and potential impact of the Convention, under the HRA, it is necessary to consider the scope and content of the Art 10 and 11 rights of protest and assembly.

Existing Strasbourg jurisprudence on the right to protest is scanty,[110] and very few cases deal with direct action protest, which has been analysed under Art 11[111] and also Art 10.[112] Owing to the existence of Art 11, it is fair to say that until recently, Strasbourg had not developed a distinct Art 10 jurisprudence on expression as public protest. However, recent decisions, discussed below, suggest that such a jurisprudence is developing and that Strasbourg currently views freedom of assembly simply as an aspect of freedom of expression.[113] In Ziliberberg v Moldova[114] the Court made the association between assembly and expression explicit: 'the right to freedom of 109 Article 5 may have particular applicability. See Chapter 2, pp 51 et seq.

108 [1911] 1 KB 337.

110 There have been comparatively few decisions by the Court (Plattform 'Ärzte für das Leben' v Austria A 139 (1988); Ezelin v France A 202 (1991); Steel v UK (1998) 28 EHRR 603; Chorherr v Austria A 266-B (1993); Hashman and Harrup v UK (1999) 30 EHRR 241; (2000) 8 BHRC 104). Most of the jurisprudence consists of admissibility decisions in the Commission, finding that the application was manifestly ill founded.

111 G v FRG No 13079/87 (1980) 21 DR 138.

112 See Steel v UK (1999) 28 EHRR 603 and Hashman and Harrup v UK No 25594/94, 25 November 1999, [1999] EHRLR 342, (2000) 8 BHRC 104. Previously, the general tendency was to treat Art 11 as lex specialis in such cases, with Art 10 requiring no separate consideration per se, but nevertheless providing relevant principles to assist in the consideration of the Art 11 claim (see, e.g., Ezelin v France A 202 (1991), para 35).

113 Ezelin v France A 202-A (1991). However, it may be noted that in his partly dissenting opinion, Judge de Meyer took the view that the two Articles were inextricably linked in their bearing on the instant situation and that there had been a violation of both (p 31). Plattform 'Ärzte für das Leben' v Austria (1988) 13 EHRR 204; Djavit An v Turkey (2003) Reports of Judgments and Decisions, 2003-III, p 233, para 39; Christian Democratic People's Party v Moldova (Appl No 28793/02, 14 May 2006, unreported) para 62; Öllinger v Austria (Appl No 76900/01, 29 June 2006, unreported), para 38. In the protest case of Steel and Others v United Kingdom (1998) 28 EHRR 603, para 101, freedom of expression was said to constitute 'an essential foundation of democratic society and one of the basic conditions for its progress and for each individual's self-fulfilment'.

114 (Appl No 61821/00, 4 May 2004, unreported), para 2.

assembly is a fundamental right in a democratic society and, like the right to freedom of expression, is one of the foundations of such a society'. This stance is appropriate given the deliberate adoption of the wider term 'expression' rather than 'speech' in Art 10; it also avoids the problems experienced in the US, in distinguishing between message-bearing conduct and conduct simpliciter. The conduct element of assemblies and protests may exclude it from Art 11 protection due to the requirement that they should be 'peaceful' but it is argued that this restriction should not also be read into Art 10(1) even though that fails to ensure the consistency and coherence of the two Articles. This does not imply that the 'assembly' element within the exercise of Art 11 rights is necessarily subordinate to the 'expression' element or that it is unnecessary to distinguish between the two elements. In Chorherr v Austria[115] the expression of protesters appeared likely to offend some spectators, leading to an interference with their peaceful enjoyment of a parade. The interference of the state with the Art 10 rights of the protesters was justified since it had the aim of upholding freedom of assembly.

Freedom of assembly under Art 11

Article 11 is specifically aimed at freedom of assembly. Forms of public protest as examples of both assembly and expression will fall within Art 10 also. Some forms of protest, such as handing out leaflets or expressing an opinion through direct action – where the 'assembly' element of the protest may be insignificant – may be considered only within Art 10. The value of freedom of choice as to the manner of participation in political activity may, however, fall most readily within Art 11 which, in this instance, should not therefore be viewed simply as providing assembly rights interchangeable with expression rights under Art 10. Article 11 protects both association and assembly, and in its judgement in Socialist Party and Others v Turkey[116] the Court linked the three guarantees together in finding that the dissolution of the Socialist Party of Turkey had breached Art 11. The individuals affected by the interference in question could be viewed as exercising rights to participate in political activity, of a central nature in a democracy. As indicated above, such participation can occur by various means, including direct action, and is clearly not confined to activity associated only with general elections. The persons participating may be viewed as exercising a choice as to the particular manner of their participation. The close connection which the Court perceived between the freedoms of association and expression echoes the findings of Judge Harlan in the US Supreme Court in 1958: 'Effective advocacy of both public and private points of view, particularly controversial ones, is undeniably enhanced by group association, as this Court has more than once recognised in remarking upon the close nexus between the freedoms of speech and assembly.'[117]

If the argument in favour of rights of association and participation in political activity is applied to public protest, it may in certain circumstances provide a foundation for the claims of protesters that might not readily arise if Art 10 alone was relied on. As Barendt has pointed out,[118] the US Supreme Court has shown itself willing to protect

115 A 266-B (1993).

116 Judgment of 25 May 1998 (Appl No 20/1997/804/1007); (1999) 27 EHRR 51, paras 41, 47, 50.

117 NAACP v Alabama (1958) 357 US 449, p 460.

118 In 'Freedom of assembly', in Beatson and Cripps (eds), Freedom of Expression and Freedom of Information, 2000.

rights of access to particular public places in order to hold meetings or demonstrations, in contrast to its stance in respect of the exercise of speech rights. Although this stance flows from the wording of the First Amendment which, in contrast to Art 10, refers to speech rather than expression, the argument may be of relevance in relation to 'manner' issues and have value in carving out a distinctive, or any, role for Art 11 which is not at present apparent in the recent Strasbourg public protest jurisprudence. Thus, once domestic courts begin to develop a distinctive Convention jurisprudence on public protest, it is suggested that they should question the treatment of protest as simply a form of political expression. Although protest is thereby bolstered by the arguments outlined supporting the special position of such expression, there may be instances in which other arguments based on the exercise of autonomy in relation to political activity, deriving solely or mainly from Art 11, should be utilised. If protesters rely on both Arts 10 and 11, the argument that other means of communication, such as the internet, are available or that free expression justifications may not fully support rights to determine the place, manner and time of the protest, will carry less weight since each protester may be viewed as exercising rights to self-determination in choosing both to associate with a particular group and to participate in the political process in a particular manner, time and place.

Article 11 leaves a great deal of discretion to the judiciary. It is not a far-reaching provision since, as explained in Chapter 2, it protects only freedom of peaceful assembly and since, in common with Arts 8–10, it contains a long list of exceptions in para 2.[119] In interpreting it, the UK judiciary are obliged, under s 2 of the HRA, to take the relevant Strasbourg jurisprudence into account. That jurisprudence is not, on the whole, of a radical nature, although the Court has found that the right to organise public meetings is 'fundamental'[120] and includes the right to organise marches, demonstrations and other forms of public protest. Article 11 may impose limited positive duties on the state to ensure that an assembly or a protest can occur even though it is likely to provoke others to violence; the responsibility for any harm caused appears to remain with the counter-demonstrators.[121] The acceptance of further positive duties, including a duty to require owners of private land to allow some peaceful assemblies on their property, has not yet been accepted under the Convention but remains a possibility,[122] especially, as Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick point out,[123] in view of the growth of quasi-public places such as large, enclosed shopping centres and the privatisation of previously public places.

119 See Chapter 2, p 96.

120 Rassemblement Jurassien Unite Jurassienne v Switzerland No 819/78, (1979) 17 DR 93, 119.

121 Plattform 'Ärtze fur das Leben' v Austria A 139 (1988), para 32; Judgment of 21 June 1988; 13 EHRR 204.

122 See De Geillustreede Pers v Netherlands No 5178/71, 8 DR 5 (1976) Com Rep; the Commission accepted that states may have positive obligations to uphold freedom of expression in the context of media ownership. In the US, the 'access' issue was initially resolved in favour of the property right, but now seems to be moving towards acceptance of exceptions favouring expressive rights; see Nardell, 'The Quantock Hounds and the Trojan Horse' [1995] PL 27 on R v Somerset CCV ex p Fewings, [1995] 1 All ER 513 for discussion of the shopping mall/'constitutional fora' cases. See further below, pp 453–54. In Appleby v UK 6 May 2003 no violation of Arts 10 or 11 was found where protesters were unable to exercise rights of protest in a privately owned shopping mall. The state had not failed in its obligation to secure such rights.

123 Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, p 419.

'Direct action' used in a symbolical sense has been found to fall within Art 11.[124] The key factor in determining whether a protest counts as a peaceful assembly appears to be whether it is violent in itself or whether any violence arises incidentally.[125] G v FRG[126] concerned a sit-in that had blocked the road to a US Army barracks in a protest against nuclear weapons.[127] Under the distinction suggested above,[128] the protest would be viewed as primarily symbolic, rather than obstructive, since the demonstrators blocked the road for only 12 minutes in every hour. The applicant ignored an order to leave the road, was arrested and convicted of the offence of coercion by force or threats.[129] It was found that 'the applicant's conviction . . . interfered with his [Art 11] rights'.[130] However, the interference was again quite readily found to be justified. The Commission considered that the applicant's conviction for having participated in the sit-in could be viewed as necessary in a democratic society for the prevention of disorder and crime, since the blocking of a public road had caused more obstruction than would normally arise from the exercise of the right of peaceful assembly. The applicant and the other demonstrators had thereby intended to attract broader public attention to their political opinions concerning nuclear armament. However, 'balancing the public interest in the prevention of disorder and the interest of the applicant and the other demonstrators in choosing the particular form of a sit-in, the applicant's conviction for the criminal offence of unlawful coercion does not appear disproportionate to the aims pursued'. The application was dismissed as manifestly ill founded.

The Court found an infringement of freedom of assembly under Art 11 in the very significant judgment, Ezelin v France,[131] discussed below. In Steel v UK[132] and Hashman v UK,[133] a violation of Art 10 was found in respect of public protest and the Court therefore did not find it necessary to consider Art 11. It has been a feature of the practice that applications did not reach the Court since the Commission has readily found them to be manifestly ill founded.[134] The Commission has since been abolished but the admissibility criteria used by the Court continue to mean that many applications will not obtain a full hearing.[135] This cautious stance largely arises from the wide margin of appreciation that has been afforded to national authorities in determining what is needed to preserve public order at local level.

124 G v Federal Republic of Germany No 13079/87, (1989) 60 DR 256, 263. Currently, the Court views such protest as falling most readily within Art 10; see below, 776–78.

125 Christians against Racism and Fascism v UK No 8440/78, (1980) 21 DR 138, 148.

126 No 13079/87, (1980) 21 DR 138.

127 The protest was intended to mark the third anniversary of the NATO Twin-Track Agreement (NATO-Doppelbeschluß).

128 See pp 666–67.

129 Under the German Criminal Code, s 240.

130 It accepted that 'the applicant and the other demonstrators had not been actively violent in the course of the sit-in concerned'.

131 A 202-A (1991).

132 In Steel and Others v UK (1999) 28 EHRR 603, a violation of Art 10 was found in respect of interferences with public protest.

133 (2000) 8 BHRC 104; (1999) 30 EHRR 241. Both judgments are discussed below, pp 684–85, 776–79.

134 Friedl v Austria Appl No 15225/89 (1992) unreported; Christians Against Racism and Fascism v UK Appl No 8440/78; 21 DR 138 (1980).

135 See Chapter 2, pp 28–31.

Protest as expression under Art 10

The Art 10 jurisprudence relating specifically to public protest is meagre, as this chapter will indicate. However, the extensive jurisprudence on expression generally, especially political expression, is clearly applicable to public protest.[136] The content of speech will rarely exclude it from Art 10 protection: thus, speech as part of a protest likely to cause such low level harm as alarm or distress may be protected according to the dicta of the Court in Müller v Switzerland[137] to the effect that the protection of free speech extends equally to ideas which 'offend, shock or disturb'. The Court has repeatedly asserted that freedom of expression 'constitutes one of the essential foundations of a democratic society', that exceptions to it 'must be narrowly interpreted and the necessity for any restrictions . . . convincingly established'.[138] As the Introduction to this part indicates, it is a marked feature of the Strasbourg jurisprudence that political expression receives a high degree of protection. One of the leading works on the Convention concludes: 'It is clear that the Court ascribes a hierarchy of value' to different classes of speech, attaching 'the highest importance to the protection of political expression . . . widely understood.'[139]

Prima facie all forms of protest that can be viewed as the expression of an opinion fall within Art 10 according to the findings of the Court in Steel v UK.[140] Thus the direct action form of protest, such as symbolic or actual physical obstruction, does fall within the scope of Art 10,[141] a finding that was reiterated in Hashman v UK.[142] In Steel, protesters who were physically impeding grouse shooters and road builders were found to be engaging in 'expression' within the meaning of Art 10. These findings are clearly of the highest significance, but, unfortunately, since they were made without the slightest attempt at explanation or justification,[143] it is impossible to ascertain with any certainty either the limits of the protection thereby extended to such protests, or whether Strasbourg views such expression as having a lower status than 'purely' expressive protest activities – carrying banners, handing out leaflets, shouting slogans, and the like. Steel also concerned third, fourth and fifth applicants, who had engaged

136 Steel and Others v UK (1999) 28 EHRR 603.

137 (1991) 13 EHRR 212.

138 Observer and Guardian v UK judgment of 26 November 1991, A 216, pp 29–30, para 59; 14 EHRR 153.

139 Harris, J, O'Boyle, M and Warbrick, C, Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, pp 397 and 414. The second rank is artistic speech, the third commercial speech, e.g., advertising. They acknowledge that these terms may be too narrow (p 397, fn 14 and associated text). In particular, the term 'artistic' is too restrictive since it does not cover all speech, including some forms of protest, which may be said to be supported by the free speech arguments.

140 (1999) 28 EHRR 603.

141 See Steel v UK (1999) 28 EHRR 603, para 92: 'It is true that the protests took the form of physically impeding the activities of which the applicants disapproved, but the Court considers nonetheless that they constituted expressions of opinion with the meaning of Article 10.'

142 Hashman (2000) 8 BHRC 104; (1999) 30 EHRR 241 does not offer much guidance as to the scope of protection for direct action since, having found that a sanction applied to the applicants for blowing a horn with the intention of disrupting a hunt was a form of expression within Art 10, the Court went on to find that the interference was not 'prescribed by law': the domestic law – the contra bono mores doctrine – was found to be insufficiently precise.

143 The like finding made by the Commission in G v FRG, No 13079/87, (1980) 21 DR 138, similarly took the form of a bare assertion.

in purely peaceful protests with no element of obstruction or other ‘action’. Since no justification for the arrest of such purely peaceful protesters was apparent, a breach of Art 10 was found. As explained below, no breach was found in respect of the first two applicants and the Court did not scrutinise the question of proportionality very closely. This stance suggests that while actual obstruction falls within Art 10, it may have a lower status than protest in the form of pure speech.

In Steel, the Court drew no distinction between actual and symbolic obstruction, and has not therefore considered the means by which any such distinction might manifest itself in the assessment of the lawfulness of state interferences with these forms of obstruction. It is clear only that violent or threatening protest – which, according to the Commission, includes ‘demonstration[s] where the organisers and participants have violent intentions that result in public disorder’ – falls outside Art 11 and, possibly, Art 10.[144] In any event, interference with such protest would be likely to be found to be justified under Art 10(2).

Justifications for interferences with the primary rights

Owing to the likelihood that, as indicated, most forms of protest will fall within Art 10, and probably also Art 11, the emphasis of Strasbourg findings is on the para 2 exceptions which include ‘in the interests of national security . . . public safety . . . for the prevention of disorder or crime . . . for the protection of the . . . rights of others’. Under the familiar formula discussed in Chapter 2, in order to be justified, state interference with Art 10 and 11 guarantees must be prescribed by law, have a legitimate aim, be necessary in a democratic society and be applied in a non-discriminatory fashion (Art 14). In carrying out this assessment, the domestic courts are obliged to take the Strasbourg public protest jurisprudence into account although they are not bound by it.[145]

In freedom of expression cases, Strasbourg’s main concern has been with the ‘necessary in a democratic society’ requirement; the notion of ‘prescribed by law’ has been focused upon to some extent but almost always with the result that it has been found to be satisfied. The ‘legitimate aim’ requirement will normally be readily satisfied; as Harris, O’Boyle and Warbrick point out, the grounds for interference are so wide that ‘the state can usually make a plausible case that it did have a good reason for interfering with the right’.[146] The provision against non-discrimination arising under Art 14 is potentially very significant, especially in relation to minority public protests, but so far it has not been a significant issue in the relevant freedom of expression jurisprudence.

The requirements of precision and foreseeability connoted by the term ‘prescribed by law’[147] have been flexibly applied in this context; for example, in Rai, Allmond and ‘Negotiate Now’ v UK,[148] the Commission had to consider the ban on public demonstrations or meetings concerning Northern Ireland in Trafalgar Square. The ban was the subject of a statement in the House of Commons and many refusals of demonstrations had been made subsequent to it. The Commission found that the ban was sufficiently

144 But see above, p 681.
145 HRA 1998, s 2(1).
146 Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, p 290.
147 Sunday Times v UK A30, para 49 (1979).
148 81-A D & R 46 (1995).

prescribed by law: 'It is compatible with the requirements of foreseeability that terms which are on their face general and unlimited are explained by executive or administrative statements, since it is the provision of sufficiently precise guidance to individuals . . . rather than the source of that guidance which is of relevance'.[149] In Steel and Others v UK[150] the Commission introduced a very significant qualification to the requirement: 'The level of precision required depends to a considerable degree on the content of the instrument, the field it is designed to cover, and the number and status of those to whom it is addressed.'[151] Although the term 'margin of appreciation' was not used, this finding appears to allow the member state a certain leeway in public protest cases in relation to the 'prescribed by law' requirement. As indicated below, that leeway was overstepped by the contra bono mores (contrary to a good way of life) power arising under the Justices of the Peace Act 1361, due to its imprecision.[152]

The Court tends to afford a wide margin of appreciation when reviewing the necessity of interferences with expression in the form of protest, viewing measures taken to prevent disorder or protect the rights of others as peculiarly within the purview of the domestic authorities, in contrast to its stance in respect of 'pure' speech. Therefore, expression as protest tends to be in a precarious position. The notion of a margin of appreciation conceded to states permeates the Art 10(2) and 11(2) public protest jurisprudence, although it has not influenced the interpretation of the substantive rights.

In finding that applications are manifestly ill founded, the Commission has been readily satisfied that decisions of the national authorities to adopt quite far-reaching measures, including complete bans, in order to prevent disorder are within their margin of appreciation.[153] The Court has also found 'the margin of appreciation extends in particular to the choice of the reasonable and appropriate mean to be used by the authority to ensure that lawful manifestations can take place peacefully'.[154] Thus, states are typically not required to demonstrate that lesser measures than those actually taken would have been inadequate to deal with the threats posed by demonstrations – disorder, interferences with the rights of others and so on.

The effect of this 'light touch' review may also be seen in the tendency to deal with crucial issues – typically proportionality, but also in some cases the scope of the primary right[155] – in such a brusque and abbreviated manner that explication for the findings is 149 Ibid, p 152. The power in question arose from the Trafalgar Square Regulations 1952 SI 1952/776, para 3, made under the Parks Regulation (Amendment) Act 1926. The Act allowed the Secretary of State to 'make any regulations considered necessary . . . for the preservation of order . . .' in the parks.

150 (1998) 28 EHRR 603; [1998] Crim LR 893.

151 Paragraph 145. The Commission based these findings on the judgments of the Court in Chorherr v Austria Series A 266-B (1993), para 23 and in Cantoni v France para 35 (1996) RJD 1996-V 1614.

152 See Hashman and Harrup v UK (1999) 30 EHRR 241; Appl No 25594/94 (European Court of Human Rights); (2000) 8 BHRC 104.

153 See Christians against Racism and Fascism v UK No 8440/78, 21 DR 138; and Friedl v Austria No 15225/89 (1992) unreported.

154 Chorherr v Austria A 266-B (1993), para 31.

155 See the crucial findings in Steel v UK (1999) 28 EHRR 603, Hashman and Harrup v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 104; (1999) 30 EHRR 241 and G v FRG 21 DR 138 (1980) that direct action fell within the scope of Arts 10 and 11.

either non-existent or takes the form of mere assertion.[156] Moreover, the jurisprudence is, in general, markedly under-theorised, in notable contrast to that concerning media expression. 'It is fair to say that little recognition of the distinctive value of public protest as compared to other forms of political discussion is apparent from the case law; moreover . . . general principles have not played [a] great . . . part in cases involving public protest.'[157] In Steel,[158] for example, which, as indicated, concerned interferences with the freedom of expression of five applicants, the proportionality of the arrest and 17 hour detention of the second applicant and her subsequent imprisonment for seven days on refusing to be bound over is airily determined, in a mere two sentences. The applicant was physically impeding digging equipment by sitting on the ground. The Court's finding was that her arrest and detention was justified as necessary to prevent disorder and protect the rights of others.[159] But these grounds had scant substantiation: it was accepted that no violent incidents or damage to property had been caused by the road protesters (para 15) and the conduct of the applicant had been entirely peaceful: she had never resisted being removed from the area by security guards – so it is hard to see wherein lay the 'risk of disorder',[160] still less why it was sufficient to justify such comparatively drastic action. As for 'the rights of others', the court, rather extraordinarily, nowhere said what these 'rights' were, although presumably the judges had in mind the fact that the road builders were engaged in a lawful activity – building a road – which the protesters were disrupting. The issue of the gravity of the interference with these 'rights' was not touched upon: the road builders did have security guards, and were apparently able to carry on with their work, at the cost of some inconvenience. In neither case was the question of alternative means of protecting the road builders even adverted to, much less subjected to any analysis. In other words, one of the justificatory grounds for the interference with Art 10 rights was unsubstantiated by any real evidence; the other was subject to no analysis at all.

In Pendragon[161] and Chappell,[162] Commission cases on challenges to blanket bans[163] on assemblies at and around Stonehenge, these tendencies are even more marked. In both cases, the bans under challenge prevented Druids from holding bona fide religious ceremonies, which had been held for over 80 years during the summer solstice period. Since such bans constitute prior restraint, and in both cases resulted in the criminalisation 156 While such terse reasoning is a typical feature of the Strasbourg case law (see, e.g., Dickson, B, 'The common law and the European Convention', in Human Rights and the European Convention, 1997, pp 216–17), the tendency is particularly marked in protest cases: cf, e.g., the reasoning devoted to the proportionality issue in News Verlags v Austria (2001) 31 EHRR 8 (a case concerning media freedom discussed in Chapter 5) – six lengthy paragraphs – with that in Steel v UK ibid (one paragraph).

157 See Fenwick and Phillipson (2000) op. cit., fn 1, pp 629–30.

158 (1998) 28 EHRR 603.

159 (1998) 28 EHRR 603, para 109.

160 The first applicant, it found, 'had created a danger of serious physical injury to herself and others and had formed part of a protest which risked culminating in disorder and violence': (1998) 28 EHRR 603, para 105). Neither of these factors was present in relation to the second applicant, so the reference was not only worthless, but positively misleading (though the Court did note that the risk of disorder was 'arguably less serious than that caused by the first applicant' (para 109)).

161 No 31416/96 (1998).

162 No 12587/86 (1987).

163 In Chappell, these were made under the National Heritage Act 1983, and the Ancient Monuments and Archaeological Areas Act 1979, in Pendragon, under s 14A itself.

of those engaged in purely peaceful gatherings, it might have been expected that they would have been subjected to that 'most careful scrutiny' which prior restraints in other contexts demand.[164] In Pendragon, the ban caught a group of Druids conducting a ceremony near Stonehenge; the justification for it put forward by the Chief Constable was that in the previous year, about 40 people had tried to gain access to the monument itself, during the solstice period. The Commission cited no evidence whatever to justify the assertion that the use of a blanket order – the most serious interference possible – was the only way of protecting Stonehenge,[165] an assertion which must be seriously open to question, given the plethora of other powers available.[166] In fact, the Commission made no inquiry at all as to whether less intrusive means could have been used: it merely asserted blandly: 'it cannot be considered to be an unreasonable response to prohibit assemblies at Stonehenge for a given period.'

In Chappell, the Commission found that the decision to enforce a total ban 'was a necessary public safety measure, and that any implied interference with the applicants' rights under Article 9[167] . . . was . . . necessary . . . in the interests of public safety, for the protection of public order or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others'. It may be noted that this purported determination consists of a mere assertion that the Convention tests were fulfilled. A similar finding was made in relation to Art 11. As in Steel, part of the justification for the restrictions was asserted to be 'for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others' although there was no mention of what these rights might be, still less any analysis of why they should outweigh the primary Convention rights of freedom of religion and assembly, exercised in a wholly peaceful manner. The dismissal of both cases as 'manifestly ill founded' indicated the Commission's view that the applications raised no serious issues of law. The specific problems these characteristics raise when attempting to 'apply' the case law to particular domestic facts are considered at various points in this chapter.

But in Ezelin v France[168] the Court took a 'hard look' at the issue of proportionality. The applicant, an advocate, took part in a demonstration against the judicial system generally and against particular judges, involving the daubing of slogans attacking the judiciary on court walls, and eventual violence. Ezelin did not himself take part in any illegal acts, but did not disassociate himself from the march, even when it became violent. He was disciplined by the Bar Association and eventually given a formal reprimand, which did not impair his ability to practice. No fine was imposed. The French Government's argument was that, 'By not disavowing the unruly incidents that had occurred during the demonstration, the applicant had ipso facto approved them [and that] it was essential for judicial institutions to react to behaviour which, on the part of an 'officer of the court' . . . seriously impaired the authority of the judiciary 164 Observer and Guardian v UK (1991) 14 EHRR 153, para 60.

165 The government simply asserted that 'the other powers in the Act did not provide adequate protection'.

166 In respect of breach of the peace, attempted or actual criminal damage, breach of conditions applied to specific assemblies (i.e., to keep clear of Stonehenge), POA 1986, s 5, and possibly CJPOA, s 69, breach of an order imposed under the powers used in Chappell.

167 See Chapter 2, p 91; Art 9 guarantees the right to 'freedom of thought, conscience and religion', including the right 'either alone or in community in others and in public or private, to manifest [one's] religion . . . in worship . . . practice and observance'.

168 A 202 (1991).

and respect or court decisions'.[169] The argument was rejected; Art 11 was found to have been violated. In an emphatic judgment, the Court found: '. . . the freedom to take part in a peaceful assembly – in this instance a demonstration that had not been prohibited – is of such importance that it cannot be restricted in any way, even for an advocate, so long as the person concerned does not himself commit any reprehensible act on such an occasion.'[170]

Conclusions

The broad phrasing of Arts 10 and 11[171] inevitably leave a great deal of interpretative discretion to the UK judiciary in considering their application to existing law. But certain conclusions can be drawn: the Court will not tolerate the arrest and detention of purely peaceful protesters, even if the protest degenerates into violence, so long as the protesters in question have not themselves committed 'reprehensible acts'. The finding of the Court in Steel v UK,[172] reiterated in Hashman v UK,[173] that direct action protest, such as physical obstruction, does fall within the scope of Art 10[174] is of great significance, as is the finding of the Commission that protesters engaged in a 'sit-in' blocking a road are covered by Art 11.[175] It appears to be the case that Strasbourg views such expression as having a lower status than 'purely' expressive and speech-based protest activities, but a distinction has not been drawn between actual and symbolic obstruction,[176] although it may be inferred that actual obstruction might be viewed as reprehensible.

Thus, apart from violent or threatening protest, most forms of protest and assembly are within the scope of both Arts 10 and 11, although ceremonious processions and assemblies will probably be considered only within Art 11,[177] while the recent tendency is to consider forms of direct action within Art 10. All the forms of protest mentioned above, apart from the last two,[178] appear to be covered. Thus, forms of protest including those far removed from the classic peaceful assembly holding up banners or handing out leaflets engage these Articles, but interference with direct action protest can be readily justified, even where it is primarily of a symbolic nature.

Nevertheless, it is evident that the application of the above case law without more, would do little to structure the domestic judicial discretion, leaving the courts free to apply Arts 10 and 11 so that they constitute little or no check upon police discretion over assemblies and demonstrations on the ground. Whether this turns out to be the case depends crucially upon two factors: first, the attitude of the domestic courts towards

169 Ibid, para 49.
170 Ibid, para 53.
171 Articles 5 and 6 may also be relevant in some circumstances.
172 (1998) 28 EHRR 603.
173 (1999) 30 EHRR 241; No 25594/94 25 November 1999; (2000) 8 BHRC 104.
174 In Steel v UK (1999) 28 EHRR 603, para 92: 'It is true that the protests took the form of physically impeding the activities of which the applicants disapproved, but the Court considers nonetheless that they constituted expressions of opinion with the meaning of Article 10.'
175 G v FRG Appl No 13079/87 (1980) 21 DR 138.
176 Above, p 666.
177 See Chorherr v Austria A 266-B (1993); see above, p 681.
178 See pp 684–85.

the margin of appreciation doctrine and any domestic equivalent; secondly, whether they are prepared to make any use of the more fundamental principles underlying Convention jurisprudence on political expression generally.

The domestic application of Arts 10 and 11

In Chapter 4, two opposing judicial approaches were indicated to the application of the Convention, although it was pointed out that judicial reasoning cannot always be neatly pigeonholed. It is suggested below that the two approaches are of especial significance in this context, since the common law has failed to afford the protection to freedom of protest and assembly which has been evident at Strasbourg. This is clearly not a context in which the tendency of the common law has been to achieve high standards of human rights protection, as Lord Bingham acknowledged in Laporte. If the judges fail to abandon their traditional approach in favour of a more activist stance, under the impetus of the HRA, it will continue to be the case that the freedoms of protest and assembly receive less recognition in the UK than in other comparable democracies.

As commentators have agreed[179] and as the House of Lords has stressed,[180] the margin of appreciation doctrine, as such, should not be applied by domestic courts, since it is a distinctively international law doctrine. Applying the Convention without such reliance has two aspects. It means, first, refusing to import the doctrine into domestic decision making on the Convention where no Strasbourg decision is in point, and, secondly, where such a decision is in point, seeking to apply it but to disentangle the margin of appreciation aspects from it. This might mean giving consideration to the likely outcome of the case at Strasbourg had the doctrine been disregarded. However, as discussed above, the reasoning in much of the case law is quite sparse and tokenistic, the doctrine having had the effect, not of influencing a particular part of the judgment in a clear way, but simply of rendering the whole assessment quite rudimentary. Therefore, stripping away the effects of the doctrine might merely mean treating certain judgments as non-determinative of the points raised at the domestic level. Certainly, domestic courts minded to make an intensive inquiry into questions of proportionality will receive little aid from the cases described above in so doing. So far in the post-HRA domestic case law, there is little evidence that the judges appreciate the fact that they are in a sense importing the margin of appreciation aspects of Strasbourg decisions into domestic law by the back door.

Minimalism

This is a context in which the possible stances that the domestic judiciary might adopt when confronted with public order cases raising Art 10 and 11 issues are, it

179 See Laws, J (Sir), 'The limitations of human rights' [1999] PL 254, p 258; Feldman, D, 'The Human Rights Act and constitutional principles' (1999) 19(2) LS 165, p 192; Pannick, D, 'Principles of interpretation of Convention rights under the Human Rights Act and the discretionary area of judgment' (1998) PL 545; Hunt, M, Singh, R and Demetriou, M, 'Is there a role for the 'margin of appreciation' in national law after the Human Rights Act?' (1999) 1 EHRLR 15, esp p 17.

180 R v DPP ex p Kebilene and Others [1999] 3 WLR 972, p 1043, per Lord Hope: '[the doctrine] is not available to the national courts . . .'; see dicta to like effect in R v Stratford JJ ex p Imbert (1999) The Times, 21 February, per Buxton LJ.

is argued, quite clearly opposed. A minimalist approach might be, in this context, almost indistinguishable from what might be termed a 'traditionalist' one and might yield similar results, since this is a field in which the judiciary have, since Beatty v Gillbanks,[181] almost invariably eschewed an activist approach. A minimalist approach could be justified on the basis that a balance has always been struck in UK law between freedom of assembly and public order by reference either to common law principle or parliamentary restraint; with only two exceptions,[182] that balance has been found to accord with Arts 10 and 11 at Strasbourg[183] and therefore there is no reason to disturb it now. Under this approach, the courts, while pronouncing the margin of appreciation doctrine inapplicable, would not take the further step of recognising and making due allowance for its influence on the cases applied. Thus, judges could rely simplistically and solely on the outcomes of decisions at Strasbourg – most of which are adverse to the applicants – without adverting to its influence on those outcomes. Thus, they could import its effects – 'light touch' review and therefore a 'soft-edged' proportionality standard likely to catch only grossly unreasonable decisions – into domestic decision making. Anticipation of such an approach pre-HRA was not unduly pessimistic: arguably it was already evident in the pre-HRA era in Convention-based reasoning.[184]

The traditionalist judge would tend to take the view that common law principle has long recognised values which are coterminous with the factors taken into account at Strasbourg in evaluating the balance in question, and that, in most instances, the outcome of cases would not differ whether freedom of expression was viewed as a common law principle or as protected under the Convention. Occasional judicial pronouncements suggest that the common law recognises legal rights to assemble and protest. In Hubbard v Pitt,[185] in a well-known minority judgment, Lord Denning referred to 'the right to demonstrate and the right to protest on matters of public concern'.[186] In the immediate pre-HRA period, Eady J found, in a decision concerning animal rights' activists, that the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 'was . . . not intended by Parliament to be used to clamp down on . . . the rights of political protest and public demonstration which are so much a part of our democratic tradition'.[187] The traditionalist judge might note, however, that the two decisions at Strasbourg which have found that the UK had breached Art 10 in interfering with public protest, both concerned common law doctrines. Such a judge might perhaps also acknowledge that there has been more

181 [1882] 9 QBD 308, discussed below, p 772.

182 See the findings of the Court under Art 10 regarding the third, fourth and fifth applicants in Steel, Lush, Needham, Polden and Cole v UK Appl No 24838/94 (1999) 28 EHRR 603 above, pp 684–87, and below, pp 776–77, and Hashman and Harrup v UK (1999) 30 EHRR 241; (2000) 8 BHRC 104.

183 See, e.g., Chappell v UK (1988) 10 EHRR 510; Christians Against Racism and Fascism v UK Appl No 8440/78 (1980) 21 DR 138; the findings as regards Steel and Lush in Steel, Lush, Needham, Polden and Cole v UK Appl No 24838/94 (1999) 28 EHRR 603.

184 See the House of Lords' decision in Ex p Kebilene [1999] 3 WLR 972 and the earlier case of Khan [1997] AC 558, HL. Sedley J, in Redmond-Bates (1999) Crim LR 998; (1999) The Times, 28 July, also appeared to follow this tendency in remarking merely that the decision in Steel 'demonstrates that the common law [of breach of the peace] is in conformity with the Convention'.

185 [1975] 3 All ER 1.

186 Ibid, pp 10D and 11B.

187 Huntingdon Life Sciences Ltd and Another v Curtin and Others (1997) The Times, 11 December; (1998) 3(1) J Civ Lib 37.

reluctance to accept that the freedoms of protest and assembly, as opposed to media freedom of speech, are recognised as reflecting common law values[188] coterminous with Convention ones.[189] As mentioned above, Lord Bingham in 2006 in Laporte gave precisely this acknowledgment.

Since, under the HRA, the courts have to take account of rights to protest as opposed to negative liberties,[190] these approaches had to be modified in order to provide a little more protection for such rights than was provided previously. Under pre-HRA judicial review principles, the domestic courts had to consider proportionality: a restriction would be deemed disproportionate where there was insufficient need for it or where no evidence of such need was advanced by the state. Under the HRA the courts can no longer apply the reasonableness standard or an attenuated proportionality doctrine. But where different views might be taken of the need for a particular interference, such as a ban imposed on a march under s 13 of the Public Order Act 1986, a domestic court fully applying the Strasbourg jurisprudence, including its margin of appreciation aspects, under s 2 HRA, would tend to defer to the judgment of the executive. Clearly, this approach is distinguishable from that of heightened Wednesbury unreasonableness,[191] but it can often lead to the same outcome.

Pre-HRA, the likelihood that a domestic doctrine of judicial restraint would be developed in relation to aspects of executive decision making, including the policing of public protest, found support from the decision of the House of Lords in Chief Constable of Sussex ex p International Ferry Traders Ltd.[192] International Ferry Traders Ltd, who were engaged in exporting live cattle, had sought judicial review of the decision of the Chief Constable of Sussex to limit the policing of animal rights protesters at Shoreham ferry port. The Lords had to consider the discretion of a Chief Constable 188 Compare the following pronouncement of Lord Hewart CJ in finding that where a public meeting might lead others to breach the peace, the speaker could be arrested: 'There have been moments during the argument in this case where it appeared to be suggested that the court had to do with a grave case involving what is called the right of public meeting. I say "called" because English law does not recognise any right of public meeting for political . . . purposes . . .' (Duncan v Jones [1936] 1 KB 218, p 221), with these pronouncements from Derbyshire CC v Times Newspapers in which it was found that local (or central) government cannot sue for libel. Lord Keith said: 'I find it satisfactory to be able to conclude that the common law of England is consistent with the [freedom of expression] obligations assumed under [the Convention]' [1993] AC 534, p 551, HL. Butler-Sloss LJ said: 'I can see no inconsistency between English law upon this subject and Article 10 . . . This is scarcely surprising, since we may pride ourselves on the fact that freedom of speech has existed in this country perhaps as long, if not longer than . . . in any other country in the world' ([1992] 3 WLR 28, p 60, CA). Admittedly, in view of the dates of these findings, this comparison might be viewed as mischievous and unfair, since the later decisions might be said to have been reached in the 'shadow' of the Convention. But the decision of the House of Lords in DPP v Jones and Lloyd [1999] 2 All ER 257, discussed below, pp 711 et seq., could hardly be viewed as upholding the right to protest and assemble as strongly as Derbyshire upheld media freedom of speech.

189 The Divisional Court decision in Jones and Lloyd v DPP [1997] 2 All ER 119, discussed below, pp 711–20, found that there is no right to assemble on the highway, merely a voluntary toleration of such assemblies. No reference was made to an acceptance of Convention values within the common law except to say that Art 11 did not need to be referred to since the law was not ambiguous.

190 The Convention rights will be claim rights in the sense that they are binding on public authorities under the HRA, s 6. See Chapter 1, p 15.

191 See Ministry of Defence ex p Smith and Others [1996] 1 All ER 257, p 263.

192 [1999] 1 All ER 129.

to deploy powers to prevent a breach of the peace against protesters and the relevance of the margin of appreciation allowed to member states in respect of satisfying their Community obligations under the free movement of goods provisions of Art 34 of the Treaty of Rome. Lord Slynn, in a speech with which the other Law Lords agreed, found: 'the courts have long made it clear that . . . they will respect the margin of appreciation or discretion which a Chief Constable has,' and in this instance that margin had not been exceeded. As to the European aspects of the case, Lord Hoffmann found 'on the particular facts of this case the European concepts of proportionality and margin of appreciation produce the same result as what are commonly called Wednesbury principles . . . in this case I think that the Chief Constable must enjoy a margin of discretion that cannot differ according to whether its source be found in purely domestic principles or superimposed European principles'.

The decision illustrated the attachment of the judiciary to the doctrine of deference to policing decisions, even where the application of European law might have led to a different result. Lord Hoffmann's judgment above suggested that in the post-HRA era, the application of the Strasbourg public protest jurisprudence in order to determine questions of proportionality might lead to the same results as the application of the Wednesbury doctrine, since decisions of Chief Constables as to the needs of public order might tend to be as readily deferred to within the 'review' model as those in respect of the allocation of resources. This decision was in keeping with the only judicial review case involving a challenge to the decision of a Chief Constable to seek a ban on processions – Kent v Metropolitan Police Comr[193] – the most attenuated form of Wednesbury review was adopted, the courts affording the Commissioner a very wide margin of discretion. Courts adopting this approach could continue to apply traditional notions of deference to assessments of police officers and trial courts in respect of the possibility of disorder and the action thought necessary to avert it, interfering only if grossly disproportionate action had been taken. This would, as Lord Hoffmann's dicta make clear, entail the type of low-intensity inquiry into the existence of a 'pressing social need' to restrict rights to protest typified by the Strasbourg case law, albeit adopted for somewhat different reasons. The issue of whether less intrusive means could have been adopted would either be ignored or treated as an issue of police expertise, to which the courts should likewise defer.

Under the HRA, this approach has now become established as a domestic version of the margin of appreciation doctrine, recognising and respecting an 'area of discretionary judgment'.[194] The application of this discretionary area in this context is likely to 193 (1981) The Times, 15 May.

194 In R v DPP ex p Kebilene [1999] 3 WLR 972, Lord Hope rejected any domestic application of the margin of appreciation doctrine, but went on: 'In some circumstances it will be appropriate for the courts to recognise that there is an area of judgment within which the judiciary will defer, on democratic grounds, to the considered opinion of [the democratic body or person] whose act or decision is said to be incompatible with the Convention.' See also Lord Hoffmann, 'The Human Rights Act and the House of Lords' (1999) 62(2) MLR 159, esp p 161; Laws, 'Wednesbury', in Forsyth and Hare (eds), The Golden Metwand and the Crooked Cord: Essays in Honour of Sir William Wade QC, 1998, Clarendon, p 201; Pannick, D, 'Principles of interpretation of Convention rights under the Human Rights Act and the discretionary area of judgment' (1998) PL 545, pp 549–51; Hunt, M, Singh, R and Demetriou, M, 'Is there a role for the 'margin of appreciation' in national law after the Human Rights Act?' (1999) 1 EHRLR 15. In Brown v Stott [2001] 2 WLR 817, p 835, Lord Bingham found that a encourage the continuance of a deferential approach to the decisions of police officers and other bodies,[195] either on democratic grounds, or on the well established and familiar basis that the issue is one of expertise and on-the-spot discretionary decision making that should be interfered with only in cases of manifest injustice.[196]

It is contended that under both the 'minimalist' and 'traditionalist' approaches, the clear danger exists that the change brought about by the HRA in relation to protest is not much more than cosmetic only: while the rhetoric of legal reasoning is changing, the actual standards applied and the results obtained are not, or are only marginally enhanced. Indeed, the inception of the HRA has the ability to exacerbate the failures of the pre-HRA era as evinced in a number of the decisions discussed below;[197] executive interferences with public protest could be given an appearance of human rights auditing, but successful challenges would be as rare as ever. Thus, the executive could stifle political accountability in the form of criticisms of such interferences by asserting that the courts have found that such actions do not infringe the basic Convention rights to expression and assembly. Legal protection, therefore, would not be enhanced, while political accountability would actually be hampered. Moreover, the opportunity offered, under an activist approach, of differentiating between forms of protest, such as the physical obstruction of the fuel protest in November 2000[198] and the symbolically obstructive protests in Steel, would be lost. A domestic jurisprudence that in its development would call upon the underlying Convention values in order to create such a differentiation, would thus fail to come into existence.

It appeared pre-HRA that the domestic judiciary might find an 'activist' approach problematic, especially in determining whether a restriction is necessary in a democratic society in an instance covered by an adverse Commission decision on admissibility. It appeared inevitable, at least in the early decisions under the HRA, that in such circumstances some practitioners, magistrates or judges, lacking familiarity with the Strasbourg system, would view the finding of manifest ill-foundedness in a number of Strasbourg public protest cases as virtually conclusive of the issue since, on its face, it appears to mean that the case was almost unarguable.[199] It appeared that this problem would be exacerbated since public protest issues are usually adjudicated on in low-level discretionary area of judgment would be accorded to the legislature and the government; in the post-HRA cases of Profile Alliance [2004] 1 AC 185 and Wilson v First County Trust [2001] 3 All ER 229 the House of Lords and the Court of Appeal respectively accepted that this was the case. See further Chapter 4, pp 272–75.

195 I.e., Parliament's decision to enact the relevant legislation in the first place.

196 See Fenwick, H, Civil Rights: New Labour, Freedom and the Human Rights Act, 2000, pp 138–39, and Ewing and Gearty, op. cit., fn 1, pp 91–93.

197 In particular, Winder and Capon; see below, pp 739–43.

198 See Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, 'Direct action, convention values and the Human Rights Act' [2001] 21 (4) LS 535–568.

199 Under Art 27(2) of the Convention, the Commission shall consider inadmissible any petition submitted under Art 25 which it considers . . . manifestly ill-founded . . . The Court has said: 'rejection of a complaint as "manifestly ill-founded" amounts to a decision that there is not even a prima facie case against the respondent state . . .': Boyle and Rice v UK A 131 (1988), paras 53–54. However, Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, in Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, p 627 observe: '[the manifestly ill-founded provision] is possibly the only provision in the Convention where the Commission, in its practice, has departed from the literal and ordinary meaning of the words employed.'

courts. The early post-HRA decisions discussed in this chapter suggest that a minimalist approach was, to an extent adhered to, especially in the lower courts.

Activism

The approach under the HRA, which was adopted in 2006 by the House of Lords in Laporte, may be referred to as 'activist';[200] it starts from the premise that the reception of the Convention into UK law represents a decisive break with the past. Under this approach, judges regard themselves as required to go beyond the minimal standards applied in the Strasbourg jurisprudence,[201] given that Strasbourg's view of itself as a system of protection firmly subsidiary to that afforded by national courts has led it, particularly in public protest cases, to intervene only where clear and unequivocal transgressions have occurred. Such a stance recognises that, as a consequence, most of the cases on peaceful protest have not in fact required national authorities to demonstrate convincingly that the test of 'pressing social need' has been met. Furthermore, significantly, the courts can look for assistance to the general principles developed by Strasbourg.[202]

A foundational Strasbourg principle, repeated in a number of cases, is that 'the right to freedom of peaceful assembly . . . is a fundamental right in a democratic society, and, like the right to freedom of expression, is one of the foundations of such a society . . .'.[203] As indicated in Chapter 3 and the Introduction to Part II above, the House of Lords demonstrated that it can take such principles seriously and give them real efficacy in the field of media freedom, even prior to the coming into force of the HRA.[204] The HRA opened the way for the domestic courts to take to heart the principle – declared by Strasbourg. but not given practical effect by it – that peaceful protest has equal weight to freedom of expression generally, a freedom which is accorded 'special importance' within the Strasbourg jurisprudence,[205] and now, with the House of Lords judgment in Laporte, within the common law. That judgment clearly marked a turning point, not only in the UK public protest jurisprudence generally, but also in the post-HRA jurisprudence. It stands in marked contrast to the other relatively recent House of Lords' decision in this context – in DPP v Jones, taken immediately prior to the coming into force of the HRA, which is discussed below. Now that the freedom of expression dimension of public protest has been given domestic recognition in Laporte, following Steel, the principles developed in the Strasbourg and domestic 200 Fenwick, H, Civil Rights: New Labour, Freedom and the Human Rights Act, 2000, pp 502–5.

201 In the words of Judge Martens, '[the task of domestic courts] goes further than seeing that the minimum standards laid down in the ECHR are maintained . . . because the ECHR's injunction to further realise human rights and fundamental freedoms contained in the preamble is also addressed to domestic courts'. ('Opinion: incorporating the Convention: the role of the judiciary' (1998) 1 EHRLR 3.)

202 See Fenwick, H, Civil Rights: New Labour, Freedom and the Human Rights Act, 2000, pp 502–3. As the House of Lords recently stressed: 'in the national courts also the Convention should be seen as an expression of fundamental principles rather than as a set of mere rules' (R v DPP ex p Kebilene [1999] 3 WLR 972).

203 Rassemblement Jurassien v Switzerland (1980) 17 DR 93, p 119.

204 See Chapter 3, pp 125–26, 137, and the Introduction to Part II, pp 310–11.

205 The court referred to 'the special importance of freedom of peaceful assembly and freedom of expression, which are closely linked in this instance' (Ezelin v France A 202 (1991), para 51).

media freedom jurisprudence can be utilised in protest cases, thus underpinning and guiding judicial activism.

If a more Convention-friendly approach continues to develop post-HRA courts may begin to make a real attempt to 'strip away' or 'disapply' the effects of the margin of appreciation doctrine in applying Strasbourg jurisprudence. Thus, they may eventually apply a more rigorous approach to proportionality than has Strasbourg, making use as indicated of underlying Convention values in the attempt to flesh out the meagre Strasbourg jurisprudence, and to construct out of it a coherent set of openly stated principles. Under the 'activist' model, then, it appears to be unlikely that justifications for judicial restraint in public protest decisions, if any, will remain fully coterminous with Strasbourg restraint.

In this context, such an approach leads to much greater interference with executive decision making. It would be in accordance with this approach to have regard to the balance struck in public protest matters in other European courts within the margin of appreciation, and perhaps also to that struck by the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and in the US or Canada.[206] In support of this approach, it might also be pointed out that the Strasbourg public protest jurisprudence is very heavily influenced by decisions of the Commission, which was not a fully judicial body[207] and therefore has less authority than the Court. As Chapter 2 indicates, within the Court there is disagreement as to the interferences which fall within a state's margin of appreciation,[208] and this is particularly so in the key decision of the Court finding a violation of the freedom of assembly guarantee of Art 11, Ezelin v France.[209] Two of the partly dissenting judges considered that the interference in question fell within that margin,[210] although the majority found that the state had exceeded it.

Direct action

Direct action has been a tactic adopted by animal rights groups, environmentalists and anti-war protesters. It has been employed by anti-hunting groups, by groups opposed to the use of GM crops and protesters against the war in Iraq. A number of recent cases discussed in this chapter concern, not traditional assemblies or marches, but direct action. Under the HRA courts are required to consider the extent to which Convention rights should be abrogated in a democratic society, taking the values and hallmarks of such a society – 'pluralism, tolerance and diversity'[211] into account. Such an approach 206 See, e.g., Brandenburg v Ohio (1969) 395 US 444 in which it was found that an interference with public protest was acceptable only where incitement to unlawful action occurred. This may be compared with the decision on breach of the peace in Nicol v DPP (1996) 1 J Civ Lib 75 (discussed below, pp 773–74) in which such interference was permitted on the ground that it would not be unreasonable for others to react violently; no element of incitement was necessary.

207 See Chapter 2, pp 22–23.

208 E.g., in Cossey v UK A 184 (1990), para 3.6.5, Judge Martens, in his dissenting opinion, differed sharply from the majority in the Court in finding: '. . . I think that the Court should not have built its reasoning on the assumption that "this is an area in which the Contracting Parties enjoy a wide margin of appreciation" . . . In this context there simply is no room for a margin of appreciation.'

209 A 202-A (1991).

210 Judges Ryssdal and Pettiti, pp 26 and 28–30.

211 Handyside v UK (1976) 1 EHRR 737, para 49.

does not provide a charter for those bent on disrupting the lawful activities of others. It means that the expressive dimension of 'direct action' protest can be recognised and given due weight in legal assessment as a basic value enshrined in law. But it also requires proper analysis of the extent to which direct action, which aims to disrupt the lawful pursuits of others, can be permitted in a democracy governed by the rule of law. This is not the place to consider this debate at length, but it is certainly arguable that those who attempt directly to prevent such activities are in fact undermining both the democratic process (by attempting to marginalise its role in determining which pursuits are to remain lawful) and the rule of law (by attacking the basic liberty of the citizen to do that which the law does not forbid). Both of these are core values of the Convention. The clash of such values and the method of their resolution must now be made explicit in the legal discourse surrounding the limits of public protest: they must not be simply ignored or marginalised as at present in most domestic courts, or recognised in a purely tokenistic sense as in too many decisions at Strasbourg.

Where, as is frequently the case, various provisions discussed below[212] are used in respect of a conflict between two groups, such as hunters and hunt saboteurs, the argument might be raised in court that those provisions should be interpreted in such a way as to protect freedom of assembly in the sense of allowing persons to engage in group activities, such as hunting, shooting or fishing, free from interference by others.[213] The provisions might appear to allow the state to discharge a positive obligation to ensure that such groups are able to assemble. This argument finds some support from the ruling in Chorherr v Austria.[214] The expression of protesters appeared likely to offend some spectators, leading to an interference with their peaceful enjoyment of a parade. The interference of the state with the Art 10 rights of the protesters was justified since it had the aim of upholding freedom of assembly. This argument would place the law in the position of choosing between the Art 11 rights of opposing groups or between the Art 10 rights of one group and the Art 11 rights of another. This would be the case, of course, only if the activities of hunters, fishers and the like were able to take advantage of the Art 11 guarantee. As noted above, the Commission has found that Art 11 does not cover peaceful assembly for purely social purposes[215] and it is therefore probable that it does not cover the activities in question. However, this decision is not directly in point and, in any event, the domestic courts would not be bound by it.

The group activities in question might also, or alternatively, find protection under Art 8 since, depending on the circumstances, the activities of the protesters in coming onto private land in order to protest against activities taking place there could be viewed as interfering with the right to respect for private life, the home and the family.[216] The

212 In particular, the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, ss 68 and 69 and the Public Order Act 1986, ss 14A and 14C.

213 See Plattform 'Ärtze fur das Leben' v Austria A 139 (1988), para 32; 13 EHRR 204.

214 A 266-B (1993).

215 Anderson v UK Case No 33689/96, (1998) 25 EHRR CD 172. This application arose from CIN Properties Ltd v Rawlins [1995] 2 EGLR 130.

216 See, e.g., Spencer (Earl) v UK (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105. The applicants complained that English law provided no remedy for the invasion of their privacy through the publication in the press of various (truthful) stories relating to the bulimia and mental health problems of Countess Spencer, including photographs taken of her walking in the grounds of the clinic. The Commission dismissed the claim as manifestly ill-founded, not on the basis that the Convention did not require a remedy in such interference with the Art 10 and 11 rights of protesters under the domestic provisions could then be justified on the basis that it allowed discharge of the state obligation under Art 8 to ensure that the exercise of the rights it guarantees is not threatened by the interference of private persons.[217] The court itself would have to ensure that it did not fail to protect the Art 11 or 8 rights of the hunters or shooters,[218] if it was prepared to countenance the argument that those rights were at stake. It would then have to perform a balancing act between the exercise of two conflicting rights with very little guidance from Strasbourg, because where such a conflict arises, Strasbourg allows a very wide margin of appreciation.[219]

Some groups advocating or perpetrating direct action fall within the current definition of 'terrorism', in s1 TA, discussed in Chapter 14. The definition potentially allows many protest-based activities, to be re-designated as terrorist. The definition now expressly covers threats of serious disruption or damage to, for example, computer installations or public utilities. The definition is therefore able to catch a number of forms of public protest. Danger to property, violence or a serious risk to safety that can be described as 'ideologically, politically, or religiously motivated' may arise in the context of many demonstrations and other forms of public protest, including some industrial disputes. The government stated in the Consultation paper preceding the TA, paper that it had 'no intention of suggesting that matters that can properly be dealt with under normal public order powers should in future be dealt with under counter-terrorist legislation'.[220] But once special arrest and detention powers are handed to the police, they can be used, at their discretion, if a particular person or group falls, or appears to fall, within the current TA definition. Some direct action against property by animal rights or environmental activists may well fall within it. As pointed out, some 'direct action' by such groups may be viewed as forms of expression and as having, to varying extents, the same role as political speech.[221] Some direct action, such as the destruction of genetically modified crops, may be intended both to disrupt and to draw attention to a cause. Direct action forms of protest going beyond persuasion may provide a substantive means of engaging in the more effective means of communicating with others (since such forms are most likely to attract media attention). To label forms of such action 'terrorist', as the current legislation does, is not only to devalue that term, but to take a stance towards forms of protest more characteristic of a totalitarian state than of a democracy. Chapter 14 returns to these points.

circumstances, but on the basis that such a remedy – breach of confidence – did exist in UK law, but had not been exhausted.

217 In X and Y v Netherlands (1985) 8 EHRR 235 the Court stated: 'these [Article 8] obligations may require the adoption of measures even in the sphere of relations between individuals.' In other words, the term 'interference by a public authority' used in Art 8 can mean 'unjustified failure to prevent interference by others'.

218 Since, as Chapter 4 points out, the court is itself a public authority under the HRA, s 6, and is itself bound to respect the Convention rights.

219 See Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria (1994) 19 EHRR 34. The conflict in the case between Arts 10 and 9 played a part in the concession of a very wide margin of appreciation to the state.

220 Ibid, para 3.18.

221 Such action is likely to be already tortious or criminal but, as Chapter 4 notes, defendants can raise Art 10 and 11 arguments in defence.

Positive obligations

The particularly thorny question of affording positive rights of access to land is likely to arise in the post-HRA case law. It is now established that the right of access to the highway may include holding an assembly on it.[222] But prima facie assemblies on other quasi-public or private land will virtually always be trespassory, unless in the circumstances it is found that permission to hold some peaceful protests was given. Strasbourg has not yet accepted that there is a positive obligation on the public authorities to require private individuals to allow the exercise of protest and assembly rights on their land. But an activist domestic court might be prepared to uphold such a claim, thereby anticipating the stance on this matter which some commentators view Strasbourg as not unlikely to adopt.[223]

When the issue of exclusion of persons from a quasi-public place, a shopping mall, was raised before the Commission, it declared the application inadmissible, on the basis that Art 11 was not applicable, since the applicants were gathering there for a purely social purpose.[224] Clearly, had Art 11 been engaged, a different outcome might have been achieved. However, Appleby v UK[225] does not afford encouragement to this proposition. The applicants were stopped from setting up a stand and distributing leaflets in a privately owned shopping centre. The Court found that in determining whether or not a positive obligation exists, regard must be had to the fair balance that has to be struck between the general interest of the community and the interests of the individual, the search for which is inherent throughout the Convention. The scope of this obligation will inevitably vary and it must not, the Court found, be interpreted in such a way as to impose an impossible or disproportionate burden on the authorities.[226] The Court said that while freedom of expression is an important right, it is not unlimited. Regard, it was found, must also be had to the property rights of the owner of the shopping centre under Art 1 of Protocol No 1. The Court found that Art 10 does not bestow any 'freedom of forum' for the exercise of that right. Where the bar on access to property has the effect of preventing any effective exercise of freedom of expression or it can be said that the essence of the right has been destroyed, the Court stated that it might be prepared to find that a positive obligation could arise for the state to protect the enjoyment of the Convention rights by regulating property rights.[227] But in this instance the restriction on the applicants' ability to communicate their views was limited only to certain areas. They were able to campaign in the old town centre and to employ other alternative means of making their protest. The Court therefore found no breach of Art 10 and stated that as the same issues arose under Art 11 it did not require separate consideration.

In the US, the courts are moving away to an extent from a position of upholding proprietorial rights and towards providing protection for expressive activity in quasi-

222 DPP v Jones [1999] 2 WLR 625.

223 Harris, J, O'Boyle, M and Warbrick, C, Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, p 419.

224 Anderson v UK [1998] EHRLR 218. As the Commission implied, the outcome would probably have been different had the UK ratified Protocol 4, Art 2, which guarantees freedom of movement.

225 6 May 2003; see for discussion J Morgan [2003] J Civ Lib 98–112.

226 Ibid para 40.

227 Ibid para 48.

public forums.[228] This can also be said of the Canadian and Australian courts.[229] In contrast, the traditional stance of the UK judiciary is to favour the property right when it conflicts with rights of protest. In general, they tend to uphold proprietorial rights in an abstract fashion, regardless of any real harm that may occur due to their infringement.[230] But Art 10 and 11 arguments might persuade them in future to consider the possibility of recognising broader access rights to quasi-public land. DPP v Jones[231] has already found that this can be the case as far as the highway is concerned, in respect of non-obstructive assemblies, but a large number of quasi-public places exist to which the public has limited rights of access, such as unenclosed shopping malls, parks, the grounds and forecourts of town halls or civic centres, monuments and their surrounding land or rights of way across private land.[232] At present, such rights of access would not include assemblies for the purpose of protests and demonstrations. In other words, it is clear from DPP v Jones that an assembly on the highway will not necessarily be unlawful. However, there is no right to trespass: orders affecting private land, or assemblies on the highway which are unlawful – because they are obstructive, or disorderly – based on the concept of trespass are valid and enforceable.

The issue of access to private land might arise in two ways. A group seeking access to a forum for the holding of an assembly or demonstration might seek to bring an action against the relevant land-owning body if it was a public authority under ss 6 and 7(1)(a) of the HRA, claiming that a refusal to allow an assembly in a particular place had constituted an interference with its Art 10 and 11 rights. For example, it might seek judicial review of the decision of a local authority refusing it access to a park in order to hold a meeting. Where a group was charged with infringing a ban on assemblies under ss 13 or 14A of the Public Order Act 1986 (discussed below), it could raise the issue under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA.

Procedural problems

A key factor affecting the reception of Arts 10 and 11 into UK law is, as indicated, the model favoured by the senior UK judiciary. But there are also procedural difficulties in bringing about statutory change. Relying on Arts 10 and 11, protesters are able to challenge public order provisions in criminal proceedings under s 6(1)(b) and s 7(1)(b) of the HRA, or they can seek judicial review of public order decisions made by police or local authorities under s 6(1)(a) and s 7(1)(a). However, as Chapter 4 explains, s 6 of the HRA provides that it is lawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with Convention rights if it is authorised to do so by primary legislation. If the legislation is thought to be incompatible, the court must nevertheless apply it; the higher courts can make a declaration of incompatibility which will have no impact on the instant decision but which will probably trigger off a legislative change by ministerial

228 See Shad Alliance v Smith Haven Mall 484 NYS 2d 849, esp p 857.

229 See Harrison v Carswell (1975) 62 DLR (3d) 68 Supreme Court of Canada; Gerhardy v Brown (1985) 159 CLR 70.

230 See on this point Gray and Gray, 'Civil rights, civil wrongs and quasi-public places' [1999] EHRLR 46.

231 [1999] 2 WLR 625; [1999] 2 All ER 257 HL

232 See further below, pp 719–20, 749–50.

amendment.[233] Public order questions are rarely adjudicated on in those courts which are able to make a declaration,[234] and some defendants would have little interest in appealing to a higher court in order to obtain the declaration since it would be of no personal benefit. However, members of some protest groups are likely to wish to appeal test cases to the higher courts in order to obtain changes in the law. But unless they do so as defendants in criminal proceedings, this will be possible under s 7(1)(a) HRA only if they themselves have been 'victims' or are likely to become victims in future, within the meaning of s 7(7) of the HRA.[235] Owing to the effect of s11 of the HRA they could, however, have raised Convention points in judicial review proceedings based on the old standing rules but for s 7(3) HRA.[236] This course would have been an attractive one since executive action under statutory powers which breaches Convention rights is unlawful unless the statute cannot be rendered compatible with the rights.[237]

Reform of common law powers under s 6, or the curbing of such powers is already occurring and can occur quite readily. As Sedley LJ said in Redmond-Bate v DPP,[238] before the HRA was fully in force, 'it is now accepted that the common law should seek compatibility with the values of the Convention'. This finding was reinforced, in a different context, in the post-HRA decisions in Douglas and Others v Hello![239] and in the House of Lords in Campbell.[240] If incompatibility is found, it is arguable that the Convention guarantee should prevail, since no provision was included in the Act allowing the common law to override the Convention or creating restrictions as to those courts which can find incompatibility between the two. However, the stance taken by the judiciary on this issue is complex: they have avoided fully clarifying the matter at the level of principle.[241]

3 Legal regulation of meetings and marches: the statutory framework

The Public Order Act 1986, as amended by the CJPOA 1994, put in place a cumbersome statutory framework for the policing of marches and assemblies which was much more extensive than that put in place by the predecessor of the 1986 Act, the Public Order Act 1936. The scope of the 1986 Act was widened when the Anti-Social Behaviour Act 2003 was employed to reduce the number of persons who can constitute a 'public assembly', for the purpose of banning it or imposing conditions on it under the 1986 Act, from twenty to two. The scheme was also added to when ss 132–38 of the Serious

233 See Chapter 4, pp 204–6; the HRA, s 10(2), provides: 'If a Minister of the Crown considers that there are compelling reasons for proceeding under this section, he may by order make such amendments to the legislation as he considers necessary to remove the incompatibility.'

234 See s 4(4) and (5) of the Act which provide that no court lower than the High Court or Court of Appeal may make a declaration of incompatibility.

235 See Chapter 4, pp 235–36.

236 See Chapter 4, p 236.

237 See Chapter 4, pp 171–72.

238 (1999) The Times, 28 July; [1999] All ER (D) 864.

239 [2001] 2 WLR 992, CA.

240 See Chapter 4, pp 252–55.

241 See for further discussion Chapter 9, pp 911–15.

and Organised Crime Act 2005 were introduced, specifically applying to demonstrations in the vicinity of Parliament. The interaction between this statutory framework and the HRA forms the central focus of the following discussion.

Advance notice of public processions

Sections 12 and 13 of the Public Order Act 1986, which allow banning or limitation of a march, are underpinned by s 11, which provides that the organisers of a march (not a meeting) must give advance notice of it to the police in the relevant police area[242] six clear days before the date when it is intended to be held.[243] This national requirement was at the time an entirely new measure, although in some districts a notice requirement was already imposed under local regulations. It represents the first step to involving the police so that they have an opportunity to impose conditions. It should be remembered, of course, that organisers of a sizeable march would probably have to involve the police in any event, as they might need traffic to be held up while crossing busy roads. As the main purpose of s 11 is to allow conditions to be imposed on marches that might disrupt the community, but as those are the very marches that the police would tend to know of in any event, the need for a national provision of this nature is questionable.

However, the notice requirement does not apply under s 11(1) if it was not reasonably practicable to give any advance notice. This provision was intended to exempt spontaneous demonstrations from the notice requirement, but is defective because of the use of the word 'any'. Strictly interpreted, this word would suggest that a telephone call made five minutes before the march set off would fulfil the requirements, thereby exempting very few marches. In most circumstances, even though a march sets off suddenly, it might well be reasonably practicable to make such a telephone call. However, it can be argued that the word 'any' should not be interpreted so strictly as to exclude spontaneous processions where a few minutes was available to give notice, because to do so would defeat the intention behind including the provision. If read in combination with the requirements as to giving notice by hand or in writing, it should be interpreted to mean 'any written notice' under s 3 of the HRA. If it were not so interpreted, it might be argued that s 11 breaches the guarantees of freedom of assembly under Art 11 and of expression under Art 10, since it could criminalise the organiser of a peaceful spontaneous march. Punishing the organisers of such a march by way of criminal sanctions could be viewed as disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued – to obviate the risk of disorder – since other measures, such as limiting the numbers of persons taking part in the march or a careful choice of route could achieve the same result. In any event, giving very short notice of a spontaneous march would not give the police enough time to impose conditions and therefore the aim in question could not, in fact, be attained by that means.

Advance notice must be given if the procession is held 'to demonstrate support or opposition to the views or actions of any person or body of persons, to publicise a cause or campaign or to mark or commemorate an event'. This provision was included in order to exempt innocuous crocodiles of children from the requirement. Processions customarily held are expressly exempted.[244] The notice must specify the date, time and proposed route of the procession and give the name and address of the person proposing to organise it. Under s 11(7), the organisers may be guilty of an offence if the notice requirement has not been satisfied or if the march deviates from the date, time or route specified. If it does, an organiser may have a defence under s 11(8) or (9) that he or she either had no reason to suspect that it had occurred or that it arose due to circumstances outside his or her control.

242 Section 11(4).
243 Section 11(5) and (6).

Section 11 criminalises what may be trivial administrative errors and, although police officers will use a discretion in bringing prosecutions under it, this leaves the power open to abuse and means that potentially, at least, it could be more rigidly enforced against marchers espousing unpopular causes. At present, prosecutions under s 11 are very rarely being brought and therefore its deterrence value to organisers may be diminishing.[245] For example, the organisers of a large peace march, held on the date the UN Security Council ultimatum against Iraq[246] expired, failed to comply with the notice requirements under s 11 but no prosecution was brought. However, organisers of the 'veal calves' protest at Brightlingsea in April 1995 were threatened with prosecution under s 11. On the other hand, the fact that the notice requirement has not been fully adhered to may provide the police with a basis for taking very harsh measures against a protest when it is in being, or beforehand, and may predispose a judge, if a case comes to court, to take a stance that is very sympathetic to the police action, even though no prosecution for the breach of s 11 itself is brought.

In Austin and Saxby v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis[247] it was found that the organisers of a large Mayday protest in London in 2001 had complied with the notice requirement under s 11, but had stated that the march would start at 4.00 whereas in fact it began at 2.00. The police stated in court that this was a deliberate move designed to impede the difficult policing operation. The march was ordered to cease and the protesters were trapped inside a police cordon in Oxford Square for seven hours. In effect, all the protesters – about 3,000 – were detained for seven hours. It was found that this detention was lawful in order to prevent a breach of the peace, and the judgment made some references to the deliberate decision of protesters to take part in an 'unlawful' assembly. The assumption appeared to be that it was unlawful partly because the notice requirement had not been fully complied with. However, the failure to comply with it could only give rise to liability on the part of the organisers, under s 11(7), not the participants. Also it is a notice requirement; it is not an application for authorisation of the march. So Austin and Saxby indicates that s 11 is of significance in terms of the control of the protest, although it is unlikely that a breach of s 11 itself would lead to a prosecution. So s 11 probably does have a significant impact on organisers and on policing, but indirectly. Austin and Saxby is discussed fully below.[248]

244 Section 11(2). Funeral processions are also covered by this exemption.

245 Waddington, Liberty and Order, 1994, pp 37–40.

246 Contained in SC resolution 678, 15 January.

247 [2005] HRLR. 20; 2005 WL 699571 (QBD), (2005) 155 NLJ 515, 2005) The Times 14 April, 699,571, [2005] EWHC 480; 23 March 2005, Queen's Bench Division of the High Court.

248 At pp 763–71.

The notice requirement in itself may have some inhibiting effect on organisers of marches, but except in that sense, it cannot readily be characterised 'an interference' with freedom of expression or assembly under the HRA since it is not a request for permission to hold the march. Once notice is correctly given, the march can take place, although conditions may be imposed on it, the matter considered in the next section. As indicated above, prior restraints on marches, including complete bans, have been upheld at Strasbourg, although the margin of appreciation doctrine was influential.[249] Owing to its relatively minimal impact on marches, which means that it is probably – depending on the circumstances of a particular case – proportionate to the aims pursued, the notice requirement, assuming that it exempts spontaneous marches, appears to be compatible with Arts 10 and 11. But if tendencies are evinced by the police to treat a march more restrictively when the notice given is defective, and judges then accept that those tendencies are lawful, the case for adopting a restrictive approach to s 11 and for emphasising that non-compliance does not render a march 'unlawful', becomes stronger. From a public order perspective it can clearly be said that a march which does not comply with the notice requirement may be more difficult to police since the organisers are non-cooperative or less cooperative. But the extent to which lack of cooperation regarding the notice legitimises very restrictive policing tactics still requires very strict scrutiny under s 6 HRA from the freedom of protest perspective.

Imposing conditions on meetings or marches

The s 12 power

Section 12 of the 1986 Act reproduces in part the power under s 3 of the Public Order Act 1936 allowing the Chief Officer of Police to impose conditions on a procession if he apprehended serious public disorder. However, the power to impose conditions under s 12 may be exercised in a much wider range of situations than the old power. It arises in one of four situations that may be known as 'triggers'. In making a determination as to the existence of one of these 'triggers', the senior police officer in question should 'have regard to the time or place at which and the circumstances in which, any public procession is being held or is intended to be held and to its route or proposed route'. Bearing these factors in mind, he or she must reasonably believe that 'serious public disorder, serious damage to property or serious disruption to the life of the community' may be caused by the procession (s 12(1)(a)).

The third phrase used is a very wide one which clearly offers police officers some scope for interpretation and may be said to render the other two 'triggers' redundant. This 'trigger' has attracted particular criticism from commentators. It has been said that 'some inconvenience is the inevitable consequence of a successful procession. 'The Act threatens to permit only those demonstrations that are so convenient that they become invisible.'[250] Bonner and Stone have warned of 'the dangers that lie in the vague line between serious disruption and a measure of inconvenience'.[251] Further, it has been noted that the term 'the community' is ambiguous. In the case of London, it is unclear whether the term could be applied to Oxford Street or central London or the whole Metropolitan area.[252] The more narrowly the term is defined, the more readily a given march could be said to cause serious disruption. Serious obstruction of traffic might arguably amount to some disruption of the life of a small area which might be said to constitute a 'community'.

249 E.g., Christians Against Racism and Fascism v UK (1980) 21 DR 138.
250 Ewing and Gearty, Freedom under Thatcher, 1990, p 121.
251 'The Public Order Act 1986: steps in the wrong direction?' [1987] PL 202, p 226.

Imposition of conditions allows police officers to cut down the cost of the policing requirement for an assembly and therefore may encourage them to interpret 'the community' or 'disruption' in the manner most likely to bring the 'trigger' into being, since the conditions then imposed, such as requiring a limit on the numbers participating, might lead to a reduction in the number of officers who had to be present. However, in answer to some of these fears, it can be noted that in Reid[253] it was determined that the 'triggers' should be strictly interpreted: the words used should not be diluted. This third 'trigger' causes particular concern under Arts 10 and 11 since it does not readily equate to any of the legitimate aims under the second paragraph of those Articles. Probably, it could cover the prevention of disorder, as opposed to 'serious disorder' (the first 'trigger'); it would probably also also cover protecting 'the rights of others', an aim which has received a broad and imprecise interpretation at Strasbourg.[254] But in a suitable case the police and courts would have to consider whether either of those aims applied, bearing in mind the need for a stricter approach at the domestic level.

The fourth 'trigger', arising under s 12(1)(b), consists of an evaluation of the purpose of the assembly rather than an apprehension that a particular state of affairs may arise. The senior police officer must reasonably believe that the purpose of the assembly is 'the intimidation of others with a view to compelling them not to do an act they have a right to do or to do an act they have a right not to do'. This requires a police officer to make a political judgment as to the purpose of the group in question because it must be determined whether the purpose is coercive or merely persuasive. Asking police officers to make such a judgment clearly lays them open to claims of partiality in instances where they are perceived as out of sympathy with the aims of the group in question. It should be noted that the fourth 'trigger' requires a reasonable belief in the presence of two elements – intimidation and coercion. Therefore, a racist march through an Asian area would probably fall outside its terms since the element of coercion would probably be absent. It might, however, fall within the terms of the third 'trigger'. On the other hand, a march might be coercive without being intimidatory. In Reid, the defendants shouted and raised their arms; it was determined that such behaviour might cause discomfort, but not intimidation, and that the two concepts could not be equated. In News Group Newspapers Ltd v SOGAT[255] it was held that mere abuse and shouting did not amount to a threat of violence for the purposes of intimidation under s 7 of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act 1875. Thus, behaviour of a fairly threatening nature would have to be present in order to cross the boundary between discomfort and intimidation.

252 Ewing and Gearty, Freedom under Thatcher, 1990, p 121.
253 [1987] Crim LR 702.
254 See the discussion in Steel v UK (1999) 28 EHRR 603 relating to the first and second applicants.
255 [1986] ICR 716.

The conditions that can be imposed under s 12 if one of the above 'triggers' is thought to be present are very wide, in contrast to those that can be imposed on static assemblies: any condition may be imposed which appears necessary to the senior police officer in order to prevent the envisaged mischief occurring. The conditions imposed may include changes to the route of the procession or a prohibition on it entering a particular public place. If the march is already assembling, the conditions may be imposed by the senior police officer present at the scene who may be a constable; if the conditions are being considered some time before this point, the Chief Officer of Police must determine them.

The very wide discretion allowing a range of conditions to be imposed is now subject to the proportionality requirement of Arts 10 and 11, para 2. Such a requirement should now be read into the term 'necessary' under s 12 under s 3 of the HRA. The duty of the police under s 6 of the HRA means that they must seek to ensure that conditions are not imposed which go beyond the legitimate aim pursued. The interpretation of s 12 which is compatible with Arts 10 and 11 under the HRA is considered below. The post-HRA case law so far is meagre and the key case, R (Brehony) v Chief Constable of Greater Manchester,[256] does not suggest that the courts are eager to take a restrictive approach to the use of this power in reliance on Arts 10 and 11.

The s 14 power

Section 14 of the 1986 Act allows the police to impose conditions on assemblies.[257] It was introduced in the 1986 Act as an entirely new power. Conditions may be imposed only if one of four 'triggers' under s 14(1) – identical to those arising under s 12 – is present. However, once it is clear that one of the 'triggers' is present, the conditions that may be imposed are much more limited than those that may be imposed on marches. They are confined to such 'directions . . . as to the place at which the assembly may be (or continue to be) held, its maximum duration or the maximum number of persons who may constitute it' as appear to the senior police officer 'necessary to prevent the disorder, damage, disruption or intimidation'. It must be clear that the condition was communicated to the members of the march. In Brickley and Kitson v Police,[258] anti-apartheid demonstrators outside the South African embassy were asked to move away from the front of the embassy to a nearby street, Duncannon Street. The pickets in Duncannon Street increased and four of the demonstrators moved back in front of the embassy. The Chief Officer of Police feared that further disorder might be caused and imposed a condition under s 14 requiring the pickets to stay in Duncannon Street. This was conveyed to them over a megaphone. However, it was uncertain whether this information was actually communicated to the pickets and therefore their convictions in respect of failure to abide by the condition were quashed. The defences available if there is a failure to comply with the conditions are identical to those under s 12, as is the power of arrest arising under s 14(7).

256 [2005] EWHC 640.

257 Under s 16, as amended by the Anti-Social Behaviour Act 2003, an assembly consists of 2 or more people in a public place; a public place is defined as one which is wholly or partly open to the air. Section 16 defines a public procession as one in a place to which the public have access. No further guidance is given. Presumably the procession must be moving and will become an assembly if it stops and if it consists of 2 or more people, in which case different rules will apply.

258 Legal Action, July 1988, p 21 (Knightsbridge Crown Court).

Liability under ss 12 and 14

A member of the march or assembly will incur liability under s 12(5) or 14(5) if he or she knowingly fails to comply with a condition. An organiser[259] will incur liability under ss 12(4) or 14(4) if he or she knowingly fails to comply with the conditions imposed, although he or she will have a defence if it can be shown that the failure arose from circumstances beyond his or her control. Thus, the organiser must actually breach the condition in question; he or she would not incur liability merely because some members of the march or assembly did so and therefore, where a march contains an unruly element which deliberately breaches conditions imposed, the persons involved will incur liability, but the organiser may escape it. An organiser may also incur liability if he or she incites another knowingly to breach a condition that has been imposed (ss 12(6) and 14(6)). According to the Court of Appeal in Hendrickson and Tichner,[260] incitement requires an element of persuasion or encouragement; moreover, following Krause,[261] the solicitation must actually come to the notice of the person intended to act on it. Therefore, merely assuming the position of leader of a march or assembly which is in breach of a condition would not seem to be sufficient of itself to amount to incitement. However, express or implied encouragement to bring about or continue a breach, such as leading the group in a certain forbidden direction, would amount to incitement if the leader was aware of the breach of the condition.

Imposing banning orders on marches

As indicated above, the 1986 Act for the first time gave the police the power to impose very wide ranging conditions[262] if they were thought necessary for the prevention of serious public disorder, serious damage to property or (the least grave trigger condition) 'serious disruption to the life of the community'.[263] This latter trigger attracted widespread criticism for its imprecision[264] and for decisively lowering the level and nature of risk that must be shown before conditions can be imposed. However, the 1986 Act did make some attempt to strike a balance between speech and public order 259 The 1986 Act does not define the term 'organiser' and there is no post-Act case law on the issue. It is submitted that on the dictionary definition of the term, stewards and others who have some role as marshals will be organisers. This contention is supported by the ruling from Flockhart v Robinson [1950] 2 KB 498 that a person who indicated the route to be followed should be designated an organiser as well as the person who planned the route. Thus, it appears probable that the term includes stewards as well as leaders of the assembly or march.

260 [1977] Crim LR 356.

261 (1902) 18 TLR 238.

262 Directions may be given as to the number of persons who may attend an assembly, its duration and location.

263 These conditions were considerably broader than the single one of anticipated 'serious public disorder' which alone could trigger the power to impose conditions upon processions under the Public Order Act 1936, s 3.

264 See, e.g., Bonner and Stone, op. cit., fn 1, p 226; Ewing and Gearty, op. cit., fn 1, p 121.

interests. It provided, as did its predecessor, for the possibility of an outright ban on public processions,[265] but only if the Chief Constable reasonably believed that his powers to impose conditions on processions under s 12 (based on the same 'trigger' conditions as for assemblies)[266] would be inadequate to prevent 'serious public disorder'.

Under s 13(1) of the 1986 Act, a ban must be imposed on a march if it is thought that it may result in serious public disorder. This power is exercised as follows. If, at any time, the Chief Officer of Police reasonably believes that, because of particular circumstances existing in any district or part of a district, the powers under s 12 will not be sufficient to prevent the holding of public processions in that district or part from resulting in serious public disorder, he shall apply to the council of the district for an order prohibiting for such period not exceeding three months as may be specified in the application the holding of all public processions (or of any class of public procession so specified) in the district or part concerned.

In response, the council may make the order as requested or modify it with the approval of the Secretary of State. It should be noted that once the Chief Officer of Police has come to the conclusion in question he or she must, not may, apply for a banning order. This power is exercised in respect of London by the Commissioner of Police for the City of London or the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis. A member of the march or a person who organises it knowing of the ban will commit an offence under s 13(7) and (8) and can be arrested under s 13(10).

This reproduces the old power under s 3 of the Public Order Act 1936. Assuming that a power was needed to ban marches expected to be violent, this power was nevertheless open to criticism in that once a banning order had been imposed, it prevented all marches in the area it covered for its duration. Thus, a projected march likely to be of an entirely peaceful character could be caught by a ban aimed at a violent march. The Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament attempted to challenge such a ban after it had had to cancel a number of its marches (Kent v Metropolitan Police Comr),[267] but failed because of the finding that an order quashing the ban could be made only if there were no reasons for imposing it at all. The court found that the Commissioner had considered the relevant matters and, further, that CND had a remedy under s 9(3) (now s 13(5) of the 1986 Act) as they could apply to have the order relaxed.

It is arguable that the 1986 Act should have limited the banning power to the particular marches giving rise to fear of serious public disorder, but this possibility was rejected by the government on the ground that it could be subverted by organisers of marches who might attempt to march under another name. It would therefore, it was thought, have placed too great a burden on the police, who would have had to determine whether or not this had occurred. However, in making this decision, it is arguable that too great a weight was given to the possible administrative burden placed on the police and too little to the need to uphold freedom of assembly. A compromise solution – banning all marches putting forward a political message similar to that of the offending march – could have been adopted and this possibility is considered further below in relation to the effects of the HRA.

265 Section 13.

266 I.e., serious public disorder, serious damage to property or serious disruption to the life of the community.

267 (1981) The Times, 15 May.

This power was being used with increased frequency up to the mid-1980s: there were 11 banning orders in the period 1970–80 and 75 in the period 1981–84[268] (39 in 1981, 13 in 1982, nine in 1983 and 11 in 1984). Interestingly, however, as Waddington has noted, there have been few bans of marches in London since the passing of the 1986 Act.[269] The power may have been used sparingly because police officers preferred to police a march known about for some time as opposed to an assembly formed hastily in response to a ban or a hostile, unpredictable and disorganised march. As Waddington has argued, such considerations may account for the police refusal to ban the third anti-poll tax march to Trafalgar Square, although such a march had previously led to a riot, and in the face of fierce pressure to ban from Westminster City Council, local MPs and the Home Secretary.[270] However, the power to ban and to impose conditions gives the police bargaining power to use in negotiating with marchers and enables them to adopt a policy of strategic under-enforcement as part of the price of avoiding trouble when a march occurs. Moreover in some circumstances there may appear to be no alternative but to ban a march.[271]

It might seem that the s 13 banning power would be in breach of Arts 10 and 11, in that the banning of a march expected to be peaceful would not appear to be justified under para 2 of those Articles in respect of the need to prevent disorder. In Christians Against Racism and Fascism v UK,[272] however, the applicants' argument that a ban imposed under s 3(3) of the Public Order Act 1936 infringed inter alia Art 11 was rejected by the Commission as manifestly ill founded, on the ground that the ban was justified under the exceptions to Art 11 contained in para 2, since there was a real danger of disorder which it was thought could not be 'prevented by other less stringent measures'. However, this is a relatively elderly decision of the Commission alone that was strongly affected by the margin of appreciation doctrine. Therefore, the domestic judiciary would be free to scrutinise the extent of the risk and the proportionality of a particular ban, bearing in mind the possibility that a particular march affected by the ban was unlikely in itself to give rise to disorder. While a ban is allowable under the Convention, it is a prior restraint and therefore should be scrutinised with especial rigour.[273] The approach that might be taken is considered further below, in conjunction with the impact of the HRA on s 14A of the 1986 Act.

Imposing banning orders on assemblies

Prior to the Public Order Act 1986, there was no statutory power at all to place prior restraints, still less a ban, upon assemblies as opposed to marches. The police had therefore dealt with outbreaks of disorder at such assemblies using their powers to 268 White Paper, (1985) Cmnd 9510, para 4.7.

269 Waddington, op. cit., fn 1, pp 58–61.
270 Waddington, op. cit., fn 1.
271 E.g., in August 2001 a march of a far-right group against asylum-seekers, intended to go through Sunderland town centre to coincide with the gathering of football match supporters for an important match, was banned.
272 (1984) 24 YB ECHR 178.
273 Since the ban would affect freedom of expression, the jurisprudence under Art 10 on prior restraints could be considered. This point was stressed in Wingrove v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 1 by the Commission, in pointing out that scrutiny of such restraints should be especially strict.

arrest for breach of the peace and for specific common law[274] and statutory public order offences.[275] When s 13 of the 1986 Act was passed, no parallel power to ban assemblies was included, on the grounds, apparently, that the then Thatcher Government considered that it would represent too serious an inroad upon freedom of speech.[276]

Only eight years later, the power to ban assemblies was introduced in the CJPOA 1994 by inserting s 14A into the 1986 Act.[277] Although the power is only to ban assemblies taking place on private land, the widespread 'privatisation' of previously common land means that there is in fact little land on which demonstrations may take place without the landowner's consent which are non-trespassory.[278] The introduction of a banning power, deemed unnecessary and too draconian less than 10 years previously and not even requested by the police,[279] itself represented a decisive movement towards authoritarianism. However, the Act compounded this trend by basing the power to ban not, as in the case of processions, upon the most grave risk – a belief in otherwise uncontrollable serious public disorder – but the least and most ill defined: anticipation of 'serious disruption to the life of the community'. In this respect, it is a much wider power than that arising under s 13.

Section 14A provides that a Chief Officer of Police may apply for a banning order if he reasonably believes that an assembly is likely to be trespassory and may result in serious disruption to the life of the community or damage to certain types of buildings and structures. Section 14A(1) provides that a Chief Officer of Police may apply for a banning order[280] if he reasonably believes (a) that an assembly is likely to be trespassory and (b) may result in serious disruption to the life of the community or damage to certain types of buildings and structures, in particular, historical monuments. The requirement of trespass is made out where the Chief Constable believes that an assembly is intended to be held on land (a) to which the public has no right of access and is likely to be held without the permission of the occupier of the land or (b) on land to which the public has only a limited right of access and the assembly is likely to exceed the limits of any permission of the landowner or the public's right of access. If an order is made, it will subsist for four days, operate within a radius of five miles around the area in question, and prohibit any trespassory assembly held within its temporal and geographical scope.[281]

Just as s 13 catches peaceful processions, the provisions of s 14A mean that assemblies that are not likely in themselves to cause the prohibited harm under s 14A(1) or 14A(4) may nevertheless be banned once the ban is in place, triggered by trepassory assemblies expected to cause that harm. Section 14A is backed up by s 14C (inserted into the 1986 Act by s 71 of the 1994 Act). Section 14C provides a very broad power to stop persons within a radius of five miles from the assembly if a police officer reasonably 274 Namely the offences of riot, rout, unlawful assembly and affray.

275 E.g., Public Order Act 1936, s 5: using threatening, abusive or insulting words or behaviour likely to cause, or with intent to provoke a breach of the peace.

276 'Meetings and assemblies are a more important means of exercising freedom of speech than are marches.' Review of Public Order Law, Cmnd 9510, 1985, pp 31–32).

277 Under s 70.

278 See further below, pp 749–50.

279 See Marston, J and Tain, P, Public Order Offences, 1996, p 124.

280 Orders are granted by the local authority, with the approval of the Secretary of State.

281 Section 14A(5).

believes that they were on their way to it and that it is subject to a s 14A order. If the direction is not complied with and if the person to whom it has been given is aware of it, he or she may be arrested and may be subject to a fine if convicted. Thus, this power operates before any offence has been committed and hands the police a very wide discretion.[282]

Jones and Lloyd v DPP

This decision is considered in detail since it is the currently the leading decision on public protest and because it indicates, tellingly, that the assimilation of Art 10 and 11 values into domestic law will be especially problematic in the field of protest.

Section 14A was considered in Jones and Lloyd v DPP.[283] The case concerned an assembly on the route leading to Stonehenge, at a time when a s 14A order was in force. The order prohibited the holding of trespassory assemblies within a four-mile radius of Stonehenge and covered the period from 29 May to 1 June 1995. While the ban was still in force, a protest was held against it, in the form of an assembly on a road near Stonehenge, within the five-mile radius covered by the ban. It was found as a fact at trial that the assembly was non-obstructive, orderly and wholly peaceful.[284] Nevertheless, the protesters were asked by the police to move on; some did, but others refused and were arrested and charged with the offence under s 14A. The main question that arose was whether the assembly in question was subject to the s 14A order. This depended on s 14A(5) of the 1994 Act which provides that once an order is in being, it operates to prohibit any assembly which is held on land to which the public has no or only a limited right of access and which takes place without the permission of the owner of the land or exceeds the limits of the permission or of the public's right of access. In this instance, the assembly was simply present on the highway, but within the relevant four-mile radius. Section 14A(9) provides that 'limited' in relation to a right of access by the public to land means that their use of it is restricted to a particular purpose.

The key question was, therefore, whether the category of legitimate purposes for which the highway might be used included use of it by peaceful assemblies. Thus, the main issue that arose was whether the assembly was 'trespassory', so as to fall within the s 14A order. The question, therefore, was whether the category of legitimate purposes for which the public might lawfully use the highway included peaceful, non-obstructive assembly. The Divisional Court,[285] disagreeing with the Crown Court on the point, found that it did not.[286] The Divisional Court found that the highway was to be used for passing and repassing only and that assembling on it was outside the purpose for which the implied licence to use it was granted. In so finding, the court relied on Hickman v Maisey.[287] The decision concerned the defendant's use of the highway in

282 See further below, pp 719–20.
283 [1997] 2 All ER 119.
284 See p 15 of the Crown Court's judgment, cited at [1999] 2 WLR 625, p 627, per Lord Irvine.
285 For the Crown Court's reasoning on the point, see the speech of Lord Hutton ([1999] 2 WLR 625, p 657); the DPP appealed the point by way of case stated to the Divisional Court.
286 [1997] 2 All ER 119.
287 [1900] 1 QB 752, CA.

order to gain information by looking over the plaintiff's land. The defendant was on the highway watching the plaintiff's land. It was found that the plaintiff owned the sub-soil under the highway and that the defendant was entitled to make ordinary and reasonable use of it. Such watching was held not to be reasonable; the defendant had gone outside the accepted use and therefore had trespassed.

On behalf of the respondents it was argued that any assembly on the highway is lawful so long as it is peaceful and non-obstructive, since such an assembly is making a reasonable use of the highway. The Divisional Court, however, took the view that s 14A(5) operates to prohibit any assembly which exceeds the public's limited right of access. The right of access was found to be limited to the right to pass along the highway, not to hold a meeting or demonstration on it. Such activities might be tolerated, but there could be no legal right to engage in them. Section 14A(5) was found to operate to prevent assemblies which would otherwise be permitted. Thus, since the assembly had exceeded the limited rights of access to the highway, it fell within s 14A(5) and the fact that, but for the s 14A order, it would probably have been permitted, could not affect this argument. It was also argued on behalf of the respondents that unless there was a right to hold an assembly as opposed merely to a toleration, Art 11 of the European Convention on Human Rights would be breached. However, the court found that recourse to the Convention was unnecessary since the law in question was not ambiguous and, further, that since peaceful assemblies are normally permitted, the law was in any event in conformity with the Convention. The case was remitted to the Crown Court for a rehearing.

John Wadham of Liberty said of this decision: 'A peaceful non-obstructive gathering is a reasonable use of a public highway. To say that it is a form of trespass seems extraordinary.'[288] Nevertheless, this decision represented a reasonable interpretation of the very restrictive provisions of s 14A. No authority clearly suggests that there is a legal right to assemble on the highway since it is difficult to support an argument that assembling on the highway and remaining there for a substantial period of time is incidental to passage along it. Therefore, if the term 'right' within s 14A(1) means 'legal right', then any activity on the highway, other than passing along it, involving 20 or more people, is illegal if a s 14A order is in force. The limits of the rights to use the highway was the main question before the House of Lords when it considered the case.[289]

Despite the advent of the HRA (although it was not fully in force at the time), the Lords declined the opportunity to move beyond the traditional limited judicial perspective adopted in protest cases and to consider instead the political expression dimension of public protest. By a three to two majority, the Lords upheld the defendants' appeal. Since all those in the majority delivered substantial and quite different speeches, it is a matter of some difficulty to identify the ratio, but the key finding in common was that since the particular assembly in question had been found by the tribunal of fact to be a reasonable user of the highway, it was therefore not trespassory and so not caught by the s 14A order. The conduct of the protesters, according to the majority, thus had the classic character of an English negative liberty: since it was not unlawful, it was permitted, and the police had 'no right' to remove the protesters. This was the basis of the judgment, not any finding that the protesters had a positive right to peaceful protest which the police were under a corresponding duty to respect.[290] The majority, therefore, apparently found a liberty to peaceful assembly on the highway. A liberty generally is precarious for two reasons: there is no duty upon the state (or anyone else) to respect it or facilitate its exercise, and the legislature (or the judiciary through the common law) may encroach upon it at any time. The liberty identified by their Lordships shares both these enervating characteristics; what is remarkable, however, is the exceptionally precarious footing upon which its status even as a currently lawful activity rests. Not one of their Lordships was prepared to find that assemblies on the highway which were both peaceful and non-obstructive were invariably lawful. Lord Irvine stipulated that in addition, they would also have to be 'reasonable' in the eyes of the tribunal of fact,[291] without defining what was meant by 'reasonable' in this context.[292] Lord Clyde agreed, explicitly limiting his finding to the statement that a peaceful, non-obstructive assembly on the highway 'does not necessarily constitute a trespassory assembly'.[293] Similarly, Lord Hutton said: '. . . I desire to emphasise that my opinion that this appeal should be allowed is based on the finding of the Crown Court that the assembly on this particular highway . . . at this particular time, constituted a reasonable use of the highway. I would not hold that a peaceful and non-obstructive public assembly on a highway is always a reasonable user and is therefore not a trespass.'[294]

288 (1997) The Times, 24 January.

289 Jones and Lloyd v DPP [1999] 2 WLR 625. The following discussion is drawn in part from Fenwick and Phillipson, 'Public protest, the Human Rights Act and judicial responses to political expression' (2000) PL 627–50.

Since, therefore, their Lordships explicitly contemplated that a peaceful (and non-obstructive) assembly could nevertheless be found to be unreasonable and therefore unlawful, it is in fact correct to say that they declared no liberty to hold such assemblies on the highway.[295] Rather, what the judgment upholds is a liberty to use the highway in a way which a trial court as the tribunal of fact finds to be reasonable, nothing more.[296] The lawfulness of such assemblies is thus placed in the hands of magistrates' courts.[297] The legal reasoning by which the majority reached their conclusion is no more reassuring. Clayton notes that Lord Clyde, with the minority, 'considered that 290 Lord Hutton did appear to assert this ([1999] 2 WLR 625, p 660), but his conclusion (p 666), upholds only the narrow and precarious liberty formulated by Lords Irvine and Clyde.

291 '[A] public highway [may be used] for any reasonable purpose provided the activity in question does not amount to a public or private nuisance and does not obstruct the highway by unreasonably impeding the primary right of the public to pass and re-pass: within these qualifications there is a public right of peaceful assembly on the highway': [1999] 2 WLR 625, pp 632–33.

292 [1999] 2 WLR 625, p 633. He added the words 'in the sense defined' after the word 'reasonable' (p 633B), but it is not clear what this refers to. It cannot mean 'reasonable' in the sense of 'not unreasonably impeding the right to pass and re-pass' since this would render otiose the separate stipulation that an assembly must be 'non-obstructive'; in any event, at an earlier point, his Lordship explicitly stated that the test of 'reasonable user' was additional to that of not impeding the public's right to pass and re-pass (ibid, pp 632H–633A).

293 Ibid, p 655.

294 Ibid, p 666 (emphasis added).

295 Still less did they uphold any right to assembly on the highway, as one commentator has erroneously declared: Foster (1999) 33(3) L Teach 329–36, p 330.

296 [1999] 2 WLR 625, p 667, per Lord Hutton.

297 The offence under s 14A is triable summarily, subject to the normal right of appeal to the Crown Court.

the law of trespass defined the issue',[298] but it is apparent that this was also the case for Lord Irvine. Neither of their Lordships thought that they were liberalising the law in order to facilitate public protests. Their reasoning proceeded on the basis of an orthodox approach to analysis of the common law; from this, Lord Irvine deduced and stated explicitly that he was merely declaring what the law was already and had been probably since Harrison v Duke of Rutland[299] and certainly since Hickman v Maisey[300] in 1900: namely, that reasonable users of the highway include not only activities strictly related to passing and re-passing, but also those which are customary and reasonable, such as taking a sketch, stopping to talk to a friend, carol singing, and so on. He strictly based his judgment on prior authority[301] and stated explicitly that he found it unnecessary to have regard to the Convention.[302] He made no mention of any common law right to peaceful assembly and, indeed, the only principle which went to his decision[303] was that the Divisional Court's judgment would have rendered many activities commonly carried on in the street unlawful, and 'the law should not make unlawful what is commonplace and well accepted'.[304] Lord Clyde's approach was to like effect.[305] While one commentator describes this approach as 'refreshing and positive',[306] it gives a higher place to the uncertain value of preserving accepted custom than to the supposedly fundamental human right declared in Art 11. Lord Clyde's approach differed only in that he expressly disclaimed any human rights dimension to the case at all, remarking: 'I am not persuaded that the . . . case has to be decided by reference to public rights of assembly.'[307] To both of their Lordships it appeared to make no difference whether a given group of people were meeting to engage in political protest or to look at an interesting shop window; neither indicated that a magistrates' court should take into account any expressive dimension of a given assembly of people in arriving at the determination of reasonableness.

It was, therefore, only Lord Hutton who based his findings at least partly upon the broad right at stake: 'the common law recognises that there is a right for members of the public to assemble together to express views on matters of public concern and I consider that the common law should now recognise that this right, which is one of the fundamental rights of citizens in a democracy, is unduly restricted unless it can be exercised in some circumstances on the public highway.'[308] However, it is apparent from

298 Clayton, G, 'Reclaiming public ground: the right to peaceful assembly' (2000) 63(2) MLR 252, p 257.
299 [1893] 1 QB 142.
300 [1900] 1 QB 752, CA.
301 'I conclude that the judgments of Lord Esher MR and Collins LJ are authority for the proposition that the public have the right to use the public highway for such reasonable and usual activities as are consistent with the general public's primary right to use the highway for purposes of passage and repassage': [1999] 2 WLR 625, p 631D.
302 Ibid, p 635.
303 His references to the Convention are expressly obiter only: ibid, p 635B.
304 Ibid, p 631.
305 Ibid, pp 654–55.
306 Clayton, G, 'Reclaiming public ground: the right to peaceful assembly' (2000) 63(2) MLR 252, p 254.
307 [1999] 2 WLR 625, p 654.
308 [1999] 2 WLR 625, p 660.

this conclusion that in his view, as in Lord Irvine's,[309] the demands of this 'right' are satisfied provided merely that an assembly on the highway is not invariably tortious. Moreover, this consideration was only one of his three reasons for his conclusion.[310]

Thus, Lord Irvine considered compatibility with Art 11[311] (strictly, obiter),[312] but recognised no equivalent common law right. Lord Hutton ignored the Convention, thought that there was a common law right to peaceful assembly, but gave it minimal recognition. Aside from a brief citation by Lord Hutton,[313] human rights jurisprudence on the matter from other jurisdictions played no part in the decision. By no stretch of the imagination, therefore, could human rights considerations be said to have played a leading role in the decision. Furthermore, there was no awareness of the background to the case – the unprecedented legislative attack upon the right to peaceful assembly of which s 14A was the culmination.[314] For two out of three of their Lordships, the issues raised were to be resolved by reference to the interpretation of nineteenth-century case law on real property.

This approach compares strikingly with that taken in the media freedom cases of Simms[315] and Reynolds,[316] decided within a few months of Jones. In those decisions, freedom of expression, both as a common law 'constitutional right' and as embodied in Art 10 of the Convention, was 'the starting point' of legal reasoning.[317] Reynolds included extensive citation and consideration of relevant Convention jurisprudence.[318] The values underpinning freedom of expression in general, and those particularly engaged by the instant case were identified; in Simms the demands of freedom of expression were treated as the touchstone by which the legality of subordinate legislation was to be assessed, and were found to demand a reading of it which ran clearly counter to its literal meaning.

It was common ground between all their Lordships that any users of the highway other than passage must not be incompatible with that primary use; they must therefore be peaceful and non-obstructive. The very narrow distinction which divided their Lordships was whether such other users had to be 'reasonable and usual'[319] (as the majority thought) or 'reasonable and associated with passage' (the view of the minority – Lords 309 '. . . in my judgment our law will not comply with the Convention unless its starting point is that assembly on the highway will not necessarily be unlawful': [1999] 2 WLR 625, pp 634H–635A.

310 The second was the need to harmonise the civil law of trespass with the criminal law on obstruction of the highway ([1999] 2 WLR 625, p 664); his third was that the authorities themselves indicated that extensions to the lawful uses of the highway might be necessary and desirable in response to changing circumstances ([1999] 2 WLR 625, pp 660 and 664–66).

311 Lord Clyde made a glancing reference to it, but only to the fact that Art 11 laid down 'express limitations' to the right it declared! ([1999] 2 WLR 625, p 654).

312 Above, fn 303.

313 He cited The Queen in Right of Canada v Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada (1991) 77 DLR (4th) 385, p 394) ([1999] 2 WLR 625, pp 661–62).

314 See above, pp 709–10.

315 [1999] 3 All ER 400.

316 [1999] 4 All ER 609. See Chapter 3, p 126.

317 See Simms [1999] 3 All ER 400, p 407, per Lord Steyn and p 412, per Lord Hoffmann (referring to 'fundamental rights' generally); Reynolds [1999] 4 All ER 609, p 629, per Lord Steyn.

318 (1999) 4 All ER 609, pp 621–22 (per Lord Nicholls), p 628 and esp p 635 (per Lord Steyn), p 643 (per Lord Cooke).

319 See, e.g., Lord Irvine: [1999] 2 WLR 625, p 631C.

Slynn and Hope). The case law was clearly capable of supporting both interpretations,[320] as the ability of the majority to base their judgment on prior authority indicates.[321] In any event, regardless of the interpretation adopted of the cases, no recognition was shown of the fact that those upon which the minority principally relied – Hickman v Maisey[322] and Harrison v Duke of Rutland[323] – were nineteenth-century authorities, not decided in the House of Lords. Nevertheless, these hundred year old findings from inferior courts were treated almost as if they were binding. Remarkably, in fact, their Lordships clearly preferred to rely on these dated authorities, even though, as the appellants pointed out, this involved rendering the civil law inconsistent with the criminal law of obstruction of the highway,[324] as interpreted in a more recent Court of Appeal decision.[325] The fact that their approach would logically have entailed the implied repeal of that authority[326] and a consequent considerable broadening in scope of the related criminal offence did not appear to be a matter of concern. So reluctant, indeed, were the minority to depart from the nineteenth-century view of the law that they formulated a series of extremely questionable arguments against adopting the majority's view of the case law. Lord Slynn clearly misstated the possible adverse impacts which would flow from it.[327] Lord Hope made the novel proposition that where Parliament

320 For the wider view see, e.g., Hickman v Maisey [1900] 1 QB 752, pp 757–58, per Collins LJ: 'in modern times a reasonable extension has been given to the use of the highway as such . . . the right of the public to pass and repass . . . is subject to all those reasonable extensions which may from time to time be recognised as necessary to its exercise in accordance with the enlarged notions of people in a country becoming more populous and highly civilised but they must be such as are not inconsistent with the maintenance of the paramount idea that the right of the public is that of passage'. For the narrower view see, e.g., Harrison v Duke of Rutland [1893] 1 QB 142, p 154, per Lopes LJ: 'If a person uses the soil of the highway for any purpose other than that [of passage and repassage] he is a trespasser'; and Kay LJ, p 158: 'the right of the public upon a highway is that of passing and repassing over land the soil of which may be owned by a private person . . . any other purpose is a trespass.'

321 See [1999] 2 WLR 625, p 665, per Lord Hutton. The leading text (Clerk and Lindsell, The Law of Torts, 17th edn, 1995, p 861) cited by Lord Slynn ([1999] 2 WLR 625, p 638) appeared to favour the majority view, although his Lordship did not take it so.

322 [1900] 1 QB 752.

323 [1893] 1 QB 142.

324 The Highways Act 1980, s 137(1), provides: 'If a person, without lawful authority or excuse, in any way wilfully obstructs the free passage along a highway he is guilty of an offence . . .'

325 Hirst and Agu v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire (1987) 85 Cr App R 143. See below, pp 734–35.

326 In Hirst, the crucial issue was whether peaceful protest on the highway constituted a reasonable user, thus amounting to a 'lawful excuse' for obstruction. Glidewell LJ pointed out that, logically, 'for there to be a lawful excuse . . . the activity in which the person causing the obstruction is engaged must itself be inherently lawful. If it is not, the question whether it is reasonable does not arise': (1987) 85 Cr App R 143, p 151. The court then went on to find that peaceful assembly was a reasonable user and thus constituted a lawful excuse. The minority in Jones simply dismissed the comparison ([1999] 2 WLR 625, pp 640 and 651). However, on the interpretation of the case law which they upheld, the activities in question in Hirst – protesters holding a banner and giving out leaflets – would clearly have been unlawful, as a trespass; therefore, on the logic of Glidewell LJ's argument, the decision in Hirst that such activities were reasonable and thus a lawful excuse would have been wrong.

327 Lord Slynn contended: 'the defendants' argument in effect involves giving to members of the public the right to wander over or to stay on land for such a period and in such numbers as they choose so long as they are peaceable, not obstructive, and not committing a nuisance': [1999] 2 WLR 625, p 639. This is clearly inaccurate: the judgment concerned the highway, not 'land' generally, and it is only reasonable and customary users that are to be allowed.

has legislated by reference to common law principles,[328] the effect of that reference is to forbid any subsequent judicial development of the common law in that area;[329] at another point, his Lordship resorted to virtual tautology, arguing that the proposed development of the law would be incompatible with the previous law.[330]

It is when the concrete, practical distinction between users which are 'reasonable and associated with passage' and 'reasonable and usual' is grasped that this dogged refusal to contemplate a modest development of the law from one formulation to another appears all the more remarkable. The narrower view apparently permits activities such as stopping to consult a map or tie a shoelace, since these are directly connected to the activity of travelling along a highway, but not activities such as carol singing, leafleting, assembly, all of which become acts of trespass. However, since all agreed that no use could be lawful which impeded the primary right of passage, even the majority view would not have allowed activities which caused any obstruction to passage or were otherwise unreasonable. It therefore entailed no actual detriment to the highway owner or anyone else. The minority were not then protecting a property owner from detrimental interference with his property. They invoked as the sole justification for the criminalisation of entirely peaceful protesters an entirely technical, abstract right: the entitlement of a highway owner to have the highway used only for activities which, as well as being peaceful, non-obstructive, customary and reasonable, were also 'associated with passage'.[331]

This tendency to rely upon artificial legal reasoning may also be seen in the lack of any appreciation of the fact that the normative context of the decisions relied upon differed markedly from that in Jones, a tendency present equally in the majority judgments. In both Hickman[332] and Harrison,[333] the plaintiffs owned the highway in question and had brought legal action to stop activities taking place on them which were actually detrimental to them. Moreover, neither defendant was engaging in peaceful protest. By contrast, the peaceful protest which took place in Jones was presumably a matter of complete indifference to the highway authority and amounted to a political expression. At no point were these significant differences adverted to.[334] Lord Hope 328 By relying on the notion of civil trespass, as s 14A does.

329 '. . . the intention of Parliament as disclosed by the language of that section was to rely upon the existing state of the law relating to trespass . . . this . . . makes the . . . [a]symmetry [between civil and criminal law] inevitable.' ([1999] 2 WLR 625, p 651).

330 'I do not think that this broad argument can be reconciled with Lord Esher MR's statement of the law.' ([1999] 2 WLR 625, p 648).

331 The idea of a highway owner actually taking legal action to protect this right, by, for example, suing a group of carol singers for 'trespass' to the highway is evidently absurd; the authors are aware of no recorded case of a highway authority suing persons who have committed such a technical trespass: see Bailey, Harris and Jones, op. cit., fn 1, 4th edn, p 182.

332 [1900] 1 QB 752. The defendant, a racing tout, was using the highway to observe the plaintiff's race horses being trained.

333 [1893] 1 QB 142. The defendant was using the highway to disrupt grouse shooting on the plaintiff's land.

334 This tendency is a marked feature of English law on public order: Glidewell LJ in Hirst and Agu (1987) 85 Cr App R 143, a case concerning peaceful protest, applied Nagy v Weston [1965] 1 WLR 280, where the facts concerned a hot-dog stall and expressly compared the case with 'persons distributing advertising material . . . outside stations'. See Bailey, Harris and Jones, op. cit., fn 1, p 167.

indeed made a point of 'stress[ing] that the purpose for which the appellants were seeking to remain where they had gathered is not material in this context'.[335] As noted above, the majority, particularly Lords Irvine and Clyde, found in favour of the defendants on the basis that their activity was no more harmful than other inoffensive activities customarily carried out on the highway, such as carol singing and queuing, which they were reluctant to stigmatise as unlawful. The contrast with leading cases on journalistic speech, such as Reynolds, discussed above, is particularly striking in this regard: in that case, the central point was to mark out discussion of important public affairs in the media, as deserving of special protection under common law and the European Convention because of its vital role in maintaining democratic society.[336]

Not only does this approach display a characteristically exaggerated attachment to the value of property rights,[337] it also exemplifies the tendency of English judicial reasoning to assume a narrow and technical basis, abstracted from any meaningful context. The property right at stake in Jones was treated, in Sunstein's phrase, as a 'purposeless abstraction',[338] unrelated to any human interests or values. As Professor Gray puts it, 'property' exists in the law as 'an abstract "bundle of rights" – an artificial construct – interposed between the possessor of land and the land itself . . .'[339] There was no recognition of the fact that, as the Supreme Court of New Jersey has put it: 'property rights serve human values. They are recognised to that end, and are limited by it,'[340] a proposition explicitly recognised also by the German Constitution.[341]

The explicit treatment of the human rights dimension by the minority was – like Lord Clyde's – one which sought its marginalisation. Both of their Lordships claimed that there was no need to advert to the Convention because there was no ambiguity in the common law[342] – this despite the fact that the House had split 3:2 on its interpretation. Both, nonetheless, made token references to it, although, as with the majority, there was no consideration of Strasbourg jurisprudence, despite the fact that a number of relevant cases were cited to their Lordships in argument – again, a sharp contrast with the approach of the House of Lords in the recent cases relating to media freedom, discussed in Chapter 3, above. Lord Slynn was plainly uninterested in the Convention: he claimed that his view of the law was not inconsistent with Arts 10 and 11 because both 'provide for exceptions to the rights created', but made no attempt even to specify those exceptions which might be relevant.[343] Lord Hope was clearly also disposed to ignore the Convention altogether,[344] preferring to take the relevant principles on

335 [1999] 2 WLR 625, p 650.
336 Albeit that the Lords did not find that 'political speech' should automatically attract privilege as a generic class.
337 See below, fn 338 and fn 349 and associated text.
338 The phrase is taken from Sunstein, who uses it to describe the approach of the US Supreme Court to the First Amendment: Sunstein, C, Democracy and the Problem of Free Speech, 1993, The Free Press.
339 Author of the leading text, Elements of Land Law, 1993.
340 State v Shack (1971) 277 A 2d 369, p 372.
341 Article 14(2) of the German Grundgesetz provides: 'Property imposes duties. Its use should also serve the welfare of the community.'
342 [1999] 2 WLR 625, p 640, per Lord Slynn and, p 651, per Lord Hope.
343 [1999] 2 WLR 625, p 640.
344 See the opening words of his speech: [1999] 2 WLR 625, p 641.

free speech from a case some 90 years old.[345] Their Lordships were content with the idea that while the right to demonstrate was 'of great importance' it could simply be exercised somewhere else. Klug, Starmer and Wier,[346] noting Forbes J's similar attitude in Hubbard v Pitt,[347] describe this as the 'working assumption of most judges when restricting the activity of protesters' and as 'simply wrong'. As Clayton puts it: 'There is not some other place where the public have a better right. If freedom of assembly cannot be exercised in the streets, it is in effect denied.'[348] Once again, their Lordships showed no awareness of the practical realities of human rights.

The one substantive Convention argument which Lord Hope did consider was, characteristically, related to the defence of property rights. His view was that any possible restrictions on Art 11 entailed by s 14A could be justified as necessary to protect the rights of property holders to peaceful enjoyment of their possessions under Protocol 1 of the Convention.[349] Indeed, he said that a construction of Art 11 which gave a right to peaceful assembly on the highway could 'deprive' owners of 'their right to the quiet enjoyment of their possessions contrary to Art 1 of the First Protocol'.[350] Since his Lordship expressly drew no distinction as to the position between publicly owned highways and private ones,[351] his view entailed the novel proposition of attributing to emanations of the state (highway authorities) 'rights' under the Convention.

The decision of the police in this case to arrest and seek the prosecution of an entirely peaceful protest group lends credence to the civil libertarian and leftist thesis that enormous discretion has been placed in the hands of the police which may be used to harass marginal groups.[352] The response of the House of Lords suggests very little preparedness to restrict that discretion and indicates how far judicial attitudes currently are from a real appreciation of the importance and practical realities of the right to peaceful protest. The decision of the House of Lords has attracted favourable reviews: Barendt considers that Lords Irvine and Hutton 'formulated a broad common law right of public assembly'.[353] Another commentator describes the decision as 'the endorsement of the right to peaceful assembly . . . an important vindication of a fundamental civil

345 McAra v Magistrates of Edinburgh 1913 SC 1059, p 1073: '. . . there is no such thing as a right in the public to hold meetings as such in the streets . . . the right of free speech is a perfectly separate thing from the question of the place where that right is to be exercised.'

346 The Three Pillars of Liberty, 1996, p 193.

347 [1976] QB 142: 'They are free at some other place and by legitimate means, to bring their dislike . . . before the public.'

348 'Reclaiming public ground: the right to peaceful assembly' [2000] MLR 252, p 257. Similarly, Sherr notes: 'Highways are the most probable places for outdoor protests to be held . . .', Freedom of Protest, Public Order and the Law, 1989, p 61.

349 'Every natural and legal person is entitled to the peaceful enjoyment of his possessions . . .' See Chapter 2, pp 104–5.

350 [1999] 2 WLR 625, p 652.

351 Ibid, pp 643 and 650–51, rejecting counsel's suggestion that statutory highway authorities should be treated differently from private owners.

352 For a general survey of repressive police tactics against leftist working class demonstrations, see Bowes, The Police and Civil Liberties, 1966, Lawrence and Wishart; Sherr, A, Freedom of Protest, Public Order and the Law, 1989, pp 30 et seq.; Ewing and Gearty, Freedom under Thatcher, 1990, Chapter 4.

353 Freedom of assembly', in Beatson and Cripps (eds), Freedom of Expression and Freedom of Information, 2000, OUP, p 3.

liberty'.[354] It is suggested, reluctantly, that such assessments are overly generous. It is contended that the concession granted by the majority was so limited and precarious, and the approach of their Lordships in general[355] so narrow and blind to the human rights values at stake, that the judgment as a whole cannot but leave a civil libertarian with a sense of strong unease, despite the fact that the outcome could have been so much worse. Gray and Gray have spoken of the manner in which, in other jurisdictions, 'the operation of the private law of trespass is inevitably and increasingly qualified by the paramountcy of human rights considerations'.[356] Such qualification was, it is suggested, barely present in the decision of the majority and stoutly resisted by the minority.

Impact of the HRA on ss 12–14A of the 1986 Act

Section 13 catches all marches once a ban is in place, not merely trespassory ones. Sections 12 and 14 can affect peaceful marches and assemblies which, in the judgment of a police officer, could disrupt the life of the community. The disruption could be caused by the size of the group or the particular circumstances applicable: it is not necessary for the group to be disorderly. The decision in Jones makes it clear that peaceful non-obstructive assemblies are not inevitably non-trespassory and therefore they can fall foul of s 14A, if a ban is already in place. Thus, those assemblies recognised at Strasbourg as most worthy of protection can attract liability under the statutory framework created by the 1986 Act. It would appear that this position is incompatible with Arts 10 and 11. There is not much post-HRA case law on this statutory framework but, as will be argued below, the stance taken by the courts so far has been far from activist. It does not suggest that the HRA will have much impact on it. This section will consider whether there are any grounds for nevertheless expecting a radical change in approach under the HRA.

Human Rights Act mechanisms

In criminal proceedings brought in reliance on these provisions, defendants can rely on s 7(1)(b) of the HRA, using the argument that in the circumstances, the interference with the freedoms of expression and assembly was disproportionate to the aims pursued. Since ss 12 and 14 confer a discretion on the police, it could be argued that the imposition of the particular conditions in question was disproportionate to the aims pursued – aims which would have to fall within Arts 10 or 11 para 2. In other words, it could be argued that although the statutory language was compatible with those Articles, the police had not applied the power in question compatibly, thereby failing in their duty under s 6 HRA. Alternatively, argument could be raised that the current interpretation of the relevant section creates incompatibility; it could then be argued that ss 12 and 14, due to their broad wording, should be read or given effect in a way which rendered them compatible with the Convention rights (for example, by adopting a strict interpretation of the meaning of the third 'trigger' or by reading s 14 as allowing only the imposition of conditions of a narrow ambit).

354 Clayton, G, 'Reclaiming public ground: the right to peaceful assembly' (2000) 63(2) MLR 252.
355 The approach of the Divisional Court was in line with that taken by the minority; thus, of the seven judges who adjudicated upon this case in the two courts, a majority found against the applicants.
356 'Civil rights, civil wrongs and quasi-public places' [1999] EHRLR 46, p 100.

Decisions under these provisions can also be challenged in judicial review proceedings. Prior to the inception of the HRA, the scope for challenging the conditions was very limited: there was no method of appealing from them and it was only possible to have them reviewed for procedural errors or unreasonableness in the High Court. The power to impose any condition thought necessary under s 12 is so subjective that until Arts 10 and 11 were given further effect in domestic law under the HRA, the courts had little scope for assessing the human rights-compatibility of the decision made.[357] The condition had to relate to the mischief it was designed to avert but that still left the police with a very broad discretion. In dealing with police action to maintain public order, the courts have been very unwilling to find police decisions to have been unlawful.[358] Applying the rule from Kent v Metropolitan Police Comr[359] one could infer pre-HRA that a challenge to a condition would almost certainly fail. It would only have been where a challenge mounted where an officer had evinced a belief in the existence of a 'trigger' which no reasonable officer could entertain, that it could succeed due to the need to show a reasonable belief in relation to the 'triggers'. No presumption in favour of freedom of assembly was imported.

A very 'light touch' review is now no longer appropriate under the HRA, since the courts have to consider proportionality. The extent to which this can have any real impact in practice will depend on the approach adopted, as indicated above, and on the willingness of judges to examine the evidence available to the police at the time as to the likelihood that, for example, a particular group would be likely to cause disruption or disorder. The findings of the House of Lords in Jones strongly suggest that the traditionally blinkered and deferential judicial approach to public protest prevails, although Laporte may signal a change of stance. Therefore challenges to ss 12–14A present the judiciary with an opportunity to step away from that approach in construing existing law so that it complies with the Convention, 'in so far as it is possible' under s 3 of the HRA, or in relation to the application of the law in any particular instance under s6. The demands of proportionality are the key issue. There are at least two entry points in ss 12 and 14 enabling Art 10 or 11 considerations to be taken into account. 'Serious disruption to the life of the community' is a very wide phrase and clearly offers wide scope for interpretation. It could be argued that since the determination as to the meaning of the phrase allows for conditions to be imposed on protesters, a strict interpretation of it is required since otherwise interference with protests could occur too readily, thereby failing to satisfy the demands of proportionality under para 2 of the two Articles. Such demands could also be taken into account in relation to the degree of interference represented by the conditions imposed. If lesser measures were available which would still achieve the end in view, it can be argued that they should have been imposed.

In an instance such as Jones, or in respect of ss 12–14, the courts' approach has changed, at least in methodology. Rather than focusing primarily upon the limitations upon otherwise lawful conduct that these sections create, the Convention rights in issue must be taken into account. The court is bound to find that a protest which is wholly peaceful falls within Art 11 and, following Steel, it may also find Art 10 applicable.[360] Prima facie interference with the right(s) would clearly have occurred, including the arrests of the defendants and any convictions sustained.[361] Having made this determination, the court then has to consider the exceptions within para 2 of those Articles. It is bound under s 3 of the HRA to find an interpretation of ss 12–14A which is compatible with the Convention if at all possible, but the question of what is required in order to achieve compatibility is open to interpretation, depending on the view of the Strasbourg jurisprudence adopted. Under s 6 a court must ensure that the application of the provisions complies with Arts 10 and 11.

357 See, e.g., Secretary of State for Education and Science v Tameside [1977] AC 1014.

358 See, e.g., Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Northumbria Police Authority [1989] QB 26; [1988] 2 WLR 590; [1988] 1 All ER 556, CA.

359 (1981) The Times, 15 May.

However, although the methodology has changed, under the HRA, the courts have as yet made little attempt to curb ss 12 and 14 as they impact upon protesters. In R (Brehony) v Chief Constable of Greater Manchester[362] a very light touch approach was taken to the demands of proportionality in the circumstances. A regular demonstration had occurred outside a Marks and Spencers, protesting about the firm's support for the government of Israel; a counter-demonstration had also occurred, supporting the government. The Chief Constable had issued a notice under s 14 requiring the demonstration to move to a different location due to the disruption it would be likely to cause to shoppers over the Christmas period when the number of shoppers was likely to treble in number. The demonstrators sought judicial review of this decision; the judge refused the application on the basis that, in Art 10 and 11 terms, the restraint was proportionate to the aim, of maintaining public order, pursued. This decision confirms that 'serious disruption to the life of the community' can mean mere anticipated inconvenience to shoppers. The decision indicates that ss 12 and 14 provide the police with extremely wide scope for interfering in demonstrations and marches, depite the inception of the HRA.

The conditions that can be imposed if one of the above 'triggers' is thought to be present are very wide in the case of processions: prima facie, any condition may be imposed which appears necessary to the senior police officer in order to prevent the mischief envisaged occurring. Obviously, they are not completely unlimited; if the condition imposed bears no relationship to the mischief it was intended to avert, it may be open to challenge. Feldman argues 'Conditions which are so demanding that they amount in effect to a ban are an improper use of the power and so are unlawful on ordinary public law principles.'[363] In Austin and Saxby v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis[364] it was found that both ss 12 and 14 allow for the imposition of extremely broad and restrictive conditions. It was found that s 12 gives a power to bring a procession that is in progress to an end. The section refers to 'the circumstances in which any public procession is being held . . .' and specifically states that directions may be 'as to the route of the procession or prohibiting it from entering any public 360 See above, text to fn 112.

361 Where an arrest and police detention took place but no charges were laid, or no conviction sustained, there would still be a prima facie violation of Arts 10 and 11, following Steel (1999) 28 EHRR 603: violations were found in relation to the third, fourth and fifth applicants who were arrested and detained but not tried (the prosecution adduced no evidence).

362 [2005] EWHC 640.

363 Feldman, D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 2nd edn, 2002, at p 1063.

364 [2005] HRLR 20; 2005 WL 699571 (QBD); (2005) 155 NLJ 515;(2005) The Times 14 April 2005, 699, 571; [2005] EWHC 480.

place specified in the directions'. So, it was found, if a procession is intended to go to a certain destination, a direction prohibiting that falls within s 12(1). The judge did find in that instance that a condition imposed could not amount to a ban, but could be imposed – even if amounting to a ban on the continuance of the march – where the march had already taken place to an extent. It was found that if the conditions do no more than is necessary and proportionate in the circumstances of the case to achieve the statutory public order objectives, then bringing the procession to an end will not be unlawful. That point clearly raises the question of strict scrutiny of the police action in order to be certain that bringing the march to an end was proportionate, or whether a post facto justification is being put forward.[365] Section 12 also, it was found, includes a power to detain persons who are part of a protest if that is necessary in order to achieve the objectives of preventing disorder or disruption of the life of the community. This is discussed below under s 14; a fortiori it must be possible under s 12 if it was found to be possible under s 14 since a much broader range of conditions can be imposed under s 12 than under s 14.

It was further found in Austin and Saxby that the police do not need to have either ss 12 or 14 in mind when imposing conditions. So if police give directions to protesters to limit or disperse the protest, thinking that they are doing so under other powers, the conditions can be retrospectively justified by reference to ss 12 or 14 even if the police did not advert specifically to the trigger conditions under ss 12 and 14 at the time. It was also confirmed in that decision that a protest could have conditions applied to it, including far-reaching ones even where the protest itself was not the source of the disruption. In other words, if counter-protesters were causing a disruption the police would be justified in imposing conditions on the original protest, not the counter-protest. This is technically correct; the wording of ss 12(1)(a) and 14(1)(a) does not refer to any need for the protest in question to be the source of the disruption, disorder etc. However, it is contrary to the principle enunciated in Beatty v Gillbanks[366] to the effect that the responsibility for causing disruption should be placed on those who are disruptive, not on those who are peaceful but whose protest has provoked a disorderly counter-protest a principle that was also enunciated in Redmond-Bate[367] by Sedley LJ. It is also, it is argued, contrary to the pronouncements in Ezelin[368] on Art 11 of the Convention.

The conditions which may be imposed under s 14 are, on their face, much more limited in scope. In DPP v Jones[369] conditions as to the movement of the assembly had been imposed; and were found to be ultra vires on the basis that they could only have been imposed under s 12; they could not be imposed under s 14 since the demonstration in question was clearly a static assembly, not a march. The decision in Austin and Saxby v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis[370] concerned a protest 365 See the discussion of this case below in which it is suggested that since the police did not have s 12 in mind at the time of the march it is arguable that they were seeking to find justifications for their very controversial actions after the event.

366 (1882) 15 Cox CC 138.

367 See pp 778–79 below.

368 See pp 688–89 above.

369 [2002] EWHC 110.

370 [2005] HRLR 20; 2005 WL 699571 (QBD); (2005) 155 NLJ 515; The Times 14 April 2005, 699, 571; [2005] EWHC 480.

against globalisation in 2001, discussed in full below, which the police controlled by trapping all the protesters behind a police cordon in Oxford Square, London for seven hours. The decision gave an interpretation to the conditions that can be imposed under s 14 that gave them a much broader scope than their face value wording warrants.

It was found that s 14 gives a power to detain people for a very substantial period of time to prevent them leaving an assembly, even when they specifically ask to do so. The judge noted that, on its face, the section is aimed at limiting the numbers who may attend, or continue to attend, but that the purpose of the power is to prevent public disorder, damage, disruption and intimidation. He considered that if the only direction apt to achieve those ends in the particular circumstances is a controlled dispersal, which in turn involves a period of preliminary detention, then s 14 would allow for that condition also. In coming to this conclusion he relied on DPP v Meaden.[371] In that instance, in finding that the search warrant in that case carried with it a power to detain the occupants of the premises, the judge found: 'The authority [to search premises and person], to be meaningful, had . . . to enable the search to be effective. It could not be effective . . . if the occupiers were permitted to move about freely within the premises while the search was going on.' Relying on this observation, the judge found that there may be a greater implied power to detain when the police act pursuant to ss 12 and 14 of the 1986 Act than there would be if they acted pursuant to their common law powers. The judge concluded that a direction under s 14 that some or all members of an assembly disperse, can include a direction that they disperse by a specified route, and that they stay in a specified place for as long as is necessary for the dispersal to be effected, consistently with the objective of preventing disorder, damage, disruption or intimidation, and of taking reasonable care for the safety of themselves and others. This was, it is argued, a very doubtful extension of the law. Had Parliament wished to allow for the imposition of a broad range of conditions in s 14, as in s 12, the two sections could have been framed in the same terms. It was also found, somewhat less controversially, that a direction under s 14 may bring an existing assembly to an end. The judge said that this would be allowable since the section refers to 'the circumstances in which any public assembly is being held . . .' and authorises a direction imposing the 'maximum duration'.

European Convention on Human Rights jurisprudence

A much more radical approach could be taken to ss 12 and 14. It is suggested that there are, in fact, two contrasting lines of authority in ECHR jurisprudence relevant to these issues. In Steel v UK,[372] the Court found that the interference with an entirely peaceful protest which had occurred was disproportionate to the aim of preventing disorder, and in Ezelin v France[373] the Court made a significant statement of basic principle:[374]

371 [2003] EWHC 3005 (Admin); [2004] 1 WLR 945.

372 (1999) 28 EHRR 603. The applicants had been holding a banner and giving out leaflets outside an arms exhibition.

373 A 202 (1991).

374 Note that within the Convention system, there is no difference in weight between 'obiter comments' and those which, in common law terms, form part of the 'ratio' of the case: see Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op. cit., fn 1, pp 18–19.

'The Court considers . . . that the freedom to take part in a peaceful assembly . . . is of such importance that it cannot be restricted in any way . . . so long as the person concerned d*oes not himself* commit any reprehensible act on such an occasion.'[375] On its face,[376] this finding would prohibit the application of criminal sanctions to peaceful protesters[377] as a result of the use of blanket bans, a possibility which, as noted above, is left open by Jones. This possibility is also supported to an extent by the jurisprudence of the Court on prior restraint outside the context of public protest.[378] It would also prohibit the imposition of conditions which can, depending on the circumstances, have an effect on an assembly almost as severe as that created by a ban. As indicated above, conditions can be imposed on peaceful assemblies where it is thought that a risk of disruption to the life of the community may arise.

On the other hand, there is a consistent line of case law from the Commission which indicates that bans – therefore, a fortiori the imposition of conditions – on assemblies and marches are in principle compatible with Art 11 even where they criminalise wholly peaceful protests[379] or prevent what would have been peaceful demonstrations from taking place at all.[380] The cases, particularly Pendragon and Chappell, also exhibit an unwillingness to examine the proportionality of bans to the threatened risks with any rigour.

It is therefore open to a court inclined to a minimalist response to the HRA to follow the Commission case law on the basis that it is more directly applicable to ss 12–14A, since it deals directly with prior restraints, unlike Steel and Ezelin. On such an approach the imposition of conditions under ss 12 or 14, or of bans under s 13, can be substantively unaffected by the HRA since the police assessment of the need to impose the condition or seek the ban can be deferred to. This approach also leave Jones substantially untouched, although it probably requires the court to engage in an inquiry not relevant to Jones,[381] namely to satisfy itself that there was some risk of disorder or property damage to justify the making of the original s 14A order. However, provided some evidence to this effect was produced, such a court could take the view that its sufficiency to justify the ban was a matter within the 'area of discretion' of police decision making. Such courts could thus continue to find such assemblies lawful or unlawful, depending on the view of the trial court as to their 'reasonableness' in the circumstances.

375 A 202 (1991), para 53.

376 The Crown might argue that it is inapplicable beyond its particular facts: it concerned professional disciplinary sanctions applied to a lawyer who took part in a march that became violent and disorderly, but who conducted himself peacefully.

377 It might be argued that a distinction should be drawn between protesters who take part in a peaceful demonstration which they know to be banned, arguably thereby committing a 'reprehensible act', and those who obey the ban by abandoning their proposed demonstrations, but bring proceedings to test its legality.

378 See Chapter 7, pp 620–21.

379 Pendragon v UK Appl No 31416/96 (1998); Chappell v UK Appl No 12587/86 (1987) (both discussed above, p 444).

380 Christians Against Racism and Fascism v UK (1980) 21 DR 138 is a particularly clear example. See also Rassemblement Jurassien v Switzerland Appl No 8191/78 (1980) 17 DR 93; Rai, Allmond and 'Negotiate Now v UK' 81-A D & R 146 (1995).

381 The point of law certified for consideration by the Lords in Jones related to whether the particular assembly fell within the s 14A order; they were not asked to consider the adequacy of the grounds for granting of the original order.

Under this approach these provisions probably do not require reinterpretation under s 3 HRA; they can be viewed as compatible with Arts 10 and 11 of the Convention since they allow only for limited intervention. Sections 12 and 14 only allow for intervention necessary to avert the risk in question; they do not provide for the ban of the assembly. Section 13 bans are only available to avert the risk of serious disorder. The prohibitory powers provided under s 14A apply only in a limited area, for a limited period. Orders under s 14A can only be made if the police, the local authority (outside London) and the Secretary of State are all satisfied that the order is necessary. Only those organising or knowingly taking part in a prohibited assembly commit an offence. The powers under s 14C can only be exercised within the area covered by the order. The orders are aimed at preventing crime or disorder or the protection of the rights of landowners and others (the right, for example, to free passage) in accordance with Arts 10(2) and 11(2). The limited interference with Convention rights can therefore be seen as prescribed by law in order to serve legitimate aims. The prohibitory orders available can be viewed as both necessary in a democratic society and proportionate to the aims pursued following Pendragon v UK[382] in which the Commission found an order under s 14A POA 1986 compatible with Convention, even though the assembly in question was peaceful. The interference with Art 11 rights was viewed as justified and the application was declared inadmissible. At present DPP v Jones and Brehony indicate that this is the approach that the courts are continuing take to these orders. R (on the application of Gillan) v Commissioner of Metropolitan Police[383] also encourages a pessimistic view: the House of Lords found that, assuming that Art 10 was applicable in an instance in which a protester had been stopped and searched – arguably an interference that had occurred in order to impede him in joining the protest,[384] the exception for the prevention of crime under para 2 was satisfied, without engaging in any proportionality analysis.

A more radical approach?

A court inclined to take a more rigorous approach to its duties under the HRA than was taken in Brehony could go into the matter a little more deeply. In relation to ss 13 or 14A, it could start by noting that the effect of a blanket ban under either of those provisions is that those organising or taking part in demonstrations caught by it can be subject to criminal penalties and hence to an interference with their Art 10 and 11 rights even though they themselves were behaving wholly peacefully. This is apparently contrary to the statement of principle set out in Ezelin, above, since the arrest and conviction of such demonstrators cannot be seen to be directly serving one of the legitimate aims of preventing public disorder or ensuring public safety. Prima facie it is therefore arguable that such bans always constitute breaches of Arts 10 and 11, when they catch entirely peaceful protesters, since the 'legitimate aim' test is unsatisfied. At the least it may be argued that since such bans are so repugnant to the Convention in principle, the burden should be on the authorities to show that a ban was, genuinely, the only way of dealing with the threatened disorder. The court could attribute the Commission's failure to take this approach in the Strasbourg cases to the effects of the margin of appreciation.[385] It could also note the fact that the cases on blanket bans are merely admissibility decisions of the Commission, which clearly have a lower status in the Convention case law than decisions of the Court[386] especially where, prima facie, they run counter to its decisions. Thus, s 3 HRA could be used to limit and structure the tests allowing for the use of these curbs on protests.

382 (1999) EHRLR 223.

383 [2006] UKHL 12. See also Chapter 11, pp 1119–21, 1131–36.

384 It is arguable that Arts 10 and 11 were not engaged: in McBride v UK (Case 27786/95) the applicant was arrested, detained but released without charge to prevent a breach of the peace. She was bound for an arms fair about 15 minutes away from an anti-arms demonstration that she had attended when she was arrested. The application was deemed inadmissible.

There are therefore, strong grounds of principle to justify a departure from DPP v Jones,[387] on the basis that it affords too precarious a level of protection to a fundamental right in allowing peaceful, non-obstructive protests to be interfered with, not after satisfying the rigorous standard suggested above, but merely because a magistrates' court has found the assembly to be 'unreasonable'. The question is then, how far a court might wish to go in establishing a new approach to s 14A. The civil trespass finding could be modified: a court could find that if an assembly is peaceful and non-obstructive, it must always be termed reasonable, therefore non-trespassory, and so outside the terms of any s 14A order in force. A court could go further, and find that even obstructive assemblies are not necessarily trespassory: as noted above, the criminal law on obstruction of the highway provides for peaceful protest to constitute a lawful excuse to such conduct.

A further, more contentious possibility, might arise where a group was charged with infringing a ban imposed under s 14A POA in respect of land owned by a public authority. A possible recourse (apart from a challenge to the ban itself, discussed above), since prima facie the assembly would appear to be trespassory, would be to argue that in the circumstances it had a constructive licence to enter the land on the basis of the demands of the guarantees under Arts 10 and 11. A failure to accept such an argument could lead, potentially, to a serious interference with those guarantees.[388] A successful claim of such access rights would mean reinterpreting s 14A(5) in order to find that rights of access to certain areas, going beyond the highway, exist for the purpose of holding peaceful assemblies. If such a claim was upheld, it would also preclude the imposition of tortious liability.

However, such an approach would still leave untouched the more fundamental objection to s 14A, that it allows for the criminalisation of purely peaceful protests

385 In one case, the Commission argued that such bans were justified since they were 'based on considerations designed to ensure an even application of the law in that it aims at the exclusion of any possibility for the taking of arbitrary measures against a particular demonstration' (Christians against Racism and Fascism v UK (1980) 21 DR 138, p 150).

386 See Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op. cit., fn 1, p 18: 'If the Court interprets the Convention differently from the Commission, the Court's view prevails,' as, they note, the Commission has accepted.

387 The break with precedent could be justified on the basis that the new interpretative approach under s 3 rendered the decision non-binding; the opinion of Lord Irvine on the decision's compatibility with the Convention was obiter only and made without the benefit of full argument on the point.

388 The members of the assembly would be convicted of various offences arising under s 14B, however peaceful or non-obstructive the assembly was. Its organiser could be imprisoned (s 14B(5)), as could anyone who could be proved to have incited a member of the assembly to come onto the land (s 14B(7)).

through prior restraint, on the basis only of a risk of 'serious disruption to the life of the community' and civil trespass. There are two aspects to this objection: the first is to blanket bans per se; the second is to the use of 'serious disruption to the life of the community'[389] as the test for their imposition. A court which formed the view that blanket bans per se were essentially incompatible with Arts 10 and 11 could enforce this view through a radical reinterpretation of s 14A under s 3(1) of the HRA. It would entail reading into s 14A(5)[390] the requirement that a given assembly, as well as being trespassory and within the geographical and temporal scope of a subsisting s 14A order, also must itself pose a threat of disorder, or otherwise satisfy one of the exceptions to Art 11. Since such an interpretation would mean that s 14A effectively ceased to bestow a power to impose blanket bans, and as only doubtfully necessary under the Convention, it is very unlikely to be adopted.

Under s 14A, if a suitable post-HRA arises, which has not yet occurred, attention may therefore focus upon scrutiny of the risk of 'serious disruption to the life of the community'. This method could also be used to bring ss 12 and 14 into line with the Convention. Courts might be required to determine that the nature of the risk anticipated is one which would constitute one of the legitimate aims for limiting the primary rights under Arts 11 and 10. It has been pointed out that this vague and ambiguous phrase,[391] 'would appear to subsume, and indeed go beyond, the criteria for restricting public protest laid down in Art 11(2)'[392] of the Convention. Given the terms of these criteria, the grounds for the ban would have to be justified, either on the basis of protecting 'the rights of others' (discussed above),[393] or because the 'serious disruption' feared amounted to 'disorder' for the purposes of Art 11(2). But if it was feared merely that serious traffic congestion might occur, which could be seen as disrupting the 'life of the community', by making it more difficult for activities such as shopping and commuting from work to carry on, this would not appear to amount to 'disorder' under para 2.

Under a more subtle approach, consideration could be given to the question of the compatibility with general Convention principles of the concept of 'community' used in s 14A. As Fitzpatrick and Taylor comment, the use of the term:

> begs the question of how the 'community' in question is actually constituted . . . [under] the Act . . . the community . . . is defined implicitly by a notionally uniform way of life of those who inhabit the . . . area in question . . . one result of the Act is that certain groups become socially and politically authorised to undertake practices of exclusion on the basis that it is they who represent 'the community'.[394]

389 Such a claim could be raised collaterally as a defence to criminal proceedings (Boddington v British Transport Police [1998] 2 WLR 639, and see HRA 1998, s 7(1)(b)). Those aggrieved by the making of a s 14A order could also challenge it directly by relying on HRA 1998, s 7(1)(a).

390 Above, p 711.

391 The alternative ground is reasonable anticipation of 'significant' damage to historical, etc, buildings (s 14A(1)(b)(ii)).

392 Fitzpatrick, P and Taylor, N, 'Trespassers might be prosecuted: the European Convention and restrictions on the right to assemble' [1998] EHRLR 292, p 297.

393 See pp 687–88.

394 Fitzpatrick and Taylor, ibid, p 298.

Under ss 12, 14, 14A those engaging in protest – which could be seen as an 'intrinsically communal' activity – 'are constructed by [it] as being inherently in opposition to the exercise of the day-to-day rights of members of the community within which the assembly takes place'.[395]

There is a compelling argument to the effect that this aspect of the 1986 Act is in opposition to one of the most basic values underlying the Convention, insisted upon by the Court in a number of freedom of expression judgments, although not in the context of public protest: that the key characteristics of that 'democratic society', the values of which are the touchstone by which the legality of restrictions on individual rights must be determined, are 'pluralism, tolerance and broadmindedness'.[396] An activist approach to the HRA would lead a court to recognise the concrete relevance and applicability of such constitutive values underlying the Convention, rather than the 1986 Act's 'monolithic'[397] conception of the community: the Court would thus view its duty under s 6 of the HRA as including a duty to respect and uphold pluralism and diversity within communities, and in determining whether the life of a given community will be 'seriously disrupted' by a given protest, to ascribe to that community the qualities of tolerance and broadmindedness towards the values and activities of others. Such an attitude would raise decisively the value of peaceful protest and place quite a heavy burden upon those arguing that serious disruption to the community justified prior restraint of such assemblies.

Section 13 is not open to amelioration in order to achieve compatibility with Arts 10 and 11, by way of reinterpretation of the meaning of trespass, since it provides a power to ban all marches for a period, not merely trespassory ones. However, a court confronted with the kind of situation that arose in Christians Against Racism and Fascism[398] under the HRA could take a hard look at the question of proportionality. The court could take the view that the geographical or temporal scope of the ban had been greater than was needed to obviate the risk of serious disorder. Or it could find that the ban need not have been imposed at all since the imposition of conditions under s 12 would have been sufficient. More controversially, it could find that the banning order applied for could have excluded the peaceful march caught by the ban. It could do this in one of two ways. Either it could be found that the duty of the Chief Officer of Police under s 6 of the HRA required him to exclude the march from the ban, where it was reasonable to expect him to know that it was imminent. It could be argued that a power to seek an order to ban all marches could be interpreted as a power to ban all marches espousing a particular message, using s 3 of the HRA creatively as the House of Lords did in R v A[399] and Ghaidan v Mendoza.[400]Alternatively, the words 'or any class of public procession' used in s 13(1) could be utilised to afford leeway to include 395 Fitzpatrick and Taylor, ibid They further point out that protests, such as that at Newbury, attracted both support and opposition from the local communities: 'thus . . . the intra-community factions could be simultaneously causing each other "serious disruption".' See also Gray and Gray, 'Civil rights, civil wrongs and quasi-public places' [1999] EHRLR 46, p 51.

396 Handyside v UK (1976) 1 EHRR 737, para 49.

397 Fitzpatrick and Taylor, ibid.

398 See above, p 709.

399 See Chapter 4, pp 174–75.

400 See Chapter 4, pp 180–83 respectively.

potentially disruptive marches (using 'disruptiveness' as the method of defining their membership of the class) and therefore to exclude marches expected to be entirely peaceful. As indicated above, this interpretation does not reflect Parliament's intention in passing s 13. However, s 3 HRA allows Parliament's intention to be disregarded, since it imposes a later requirement of achieving compatibility with the Convention rights.

Conclusions

It is predicted that the courts will continue to take a non-activist line in relation to this statutory framework; the HRA will continue to have little impact on it, except in terms of judicial methodology. Remarks from Lord Bingham in Laporte, which is discussed below, suggest that when the judges confront statutory provisions that have a relatively limited impact on Convention rights, either because they regulate the enjoyment of the right rather than removing it, or because they may only be invoked in relatively narrow circumstances, they are happy to assume that the task of satisfying the demands of proportionality has already been undertaken satisfactorily by Parliament. However, it has been argued above that in fact these provisions provide powers that are over-broad and that it should not be assumed that those demands have already been met. These suggestions indicate the impact that the HRA could have on the legal framework within which marches and assemblies operate. They indicate opposing lines of thought within the Convention jurisprudence, but also demonstrate that the Ezelin and Steel line is more in tune with the Convention stance on prior restraint generally. Clearly, the stance of the House of Lords in Jones gives little cause for expecting a rigorous approach to the Convention jurisprudence or an understanding of Convention values. However, as Chapter 4 indicated, and as Laporte confirmed, there are signs that recent decisions taken under the HRA, rather than in the period immediately before it came fully into force, show a much greater understanding and appreciation of those values.[401]

The far-reaching nature of the prohibitory orders under discussion argues strongly for establishing further protection for freedom of assembly under the HRA, by re-interpretation of a number of the provisions under s 3. Or, and this is the more probable course, a more rigorous examination of the application of the provisions could be undertaken, under s 6. To say this is not to argue that the scheme is completely out of harmony with Arts 10 and 11. The scheme is to an extent pursuing legitimate aims—the protection of the rights of others and prevention of disorder and crime—under those Articles, but in so far as certain of its provisions allow for interference with peaceful assemblies, it appears, as indicated, that in certain respects it goes further than is necessary in a democratic society. Ironically, the very fact that the scheme employs imprecise phrases such as 'serious disruption of the life of the community', possibly in an attempt to afford maximum discretion to the police, works against it in favour of freedom of protest, since it provides entry points for Arts 10 and 11 that render the task of re-interpretation under s 3 HRA, or rigorous scrutiny under s 6, relatively straightforward.

Demonstrations in the vicinity of Parliament

The Serious and Organised Crime Act 2005 ss 132–38 provides controversial new powers which were introduced partly as a response to the presence near Parliament of a peace protester, Brian Haw, against the war in Iraq; he set up a peace protest site outside Parliament in 2001 which he maintained until it was largely dismantled under the new powers in 2005. The new provisions restrict the right to demonstrate within an exclusion zone of up to one kilometre from any point in Parliament Square. Demonstrators have to apply to the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police for an authorisation for the protest six days in advance, or if this is not reasonably practicable, then no less than 24 hours in advance (s 133). No equivalent provision is made for any other Parliament in the UK. Under s 132(1) any person who

401 See, in particular, pp 278–90.

(a) organises a demonstration in a public place in the designated area, or
(b) takes part in a demonstration in a public place in the designated area, or
(c) carries on a demonstration by himself in a public place in the designated area, is guilty of an offence if, when the demonstration starts, authorisation for the demonstration has not been given under section 134(2).

It is a defence under s 132(2) for a person accused to show that he reasonably believed that authorisation had been given. Under s 133 the person seeking the authorisation must give written notice to that effect to the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis. Under s 132(4) the notice must state: the date, time and duration of the demonstration; the place where it is to be carried on; whether it is to be carried on by a person by himself or not. Section 132(1) does not apply if the demonstration is a public procession for which notice must given under s 11(1) of the POA, or for which (under s 11(2)) notice is not required to be given. Section 134 allows for the imposition of an extensive range of conditions on the demonstration. Under s 134 the Commissioner may impose conditions that are:

> in the Commissioner's reasonable opinion . . . necessary for the purpose of preventing any of the following:
>
> (a) hindrance to any person wishing to enter or leave the Palace of Westminster,
> (b) hindrance to the proper operation of Parliament,
> (c) serious public disorder,
> (d) serious damage to property,
> (e) disruption to the life of the community,
> (f) a security risk in any part of the designated area,
> (g) risk to the safety of members of the public (including any taking part in the demonstration).

The conditions that can be imposed are not exhaustively enumerated. Under s 132(4):

> The conditions may, in particular, impose requirements as to:
>
> (a) the place where the demonstration may, or may not, be carried on,
> (b) the times at which it may be carried on,
> (c) the period during which it may be carried on,
> (d) the number of persons who may take part in it,
> (e) the number and size of banners or placards used, (f) maximum permissible noise levels.

The area itself that is covered is defined by Statutory Instrument[402] rather than by the Act. It specifically excludes Trafalgar Square, traditionally a site of protest, on the northern boundary of the area. Apart from Parliament, it also includes Whitehall, Downing Street, Westminster Abbey, the Middlesex Guildhall, New Scotland Yard, and the Home Office. It also covers a sliver of land on the other bank of the River Thames, including County Hall, the Jubilee Gardens, St Thomas' Hospital and the London Eye.

These provisions were invoked against Brian Haw and he challenged the decision to use them by way of judicial review (R (Haw) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept).[403] It was argued on his behalf that the provisions could not be applied retrospectively; and that as his demonstration had begun before the provisions came into force, he was not caught by them. The Court of Appeal found, however, in construing the Act that it was clearly Parliament's intention that such demonstrations should be deemed to have started on the date that they came in to force. The Court found that the statutory purpose of ss 132–38 was to regulate all demonstrations in the vicinity of Parliament and no rational basis had been suggested as to why Parliament should have intended entirely to exclude demonstrations which had begun before the commencement date of the relevant provisions. The Court concluded that the Parliamentary intention was clear. It was to regulate all demonstrations within the designated area, whenever they began. The Court considered that s 132(1) had clearly been intended to include demonstrations actually starting before the commencement of the Act. Those starting before commencement, like the claimant's, were therefore, it was found, deemed to start at commencement. In such instances, the Court held, the words 'when the demonstration starts' referred to the time of commencement.[404]

402 The Serious Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 (Designated Area) Order 2005 (SI 2005 No 1537), which came into force on 1 July 2005.

403 [2006] EWCA Civ 352.

404 Brian Haw was arrested and his site dismantled under these powers but he was eventually granted permission to maintain a greatly reduced site. His whole site is now part of an exhibition entitled 'State Britain' at Tate Britain, on the very edge of the zone delineated by the SOCA powers. On 30 June 2006 Westminster City Council granted Brian Haw the right to use his megaphone at certain times. All use of megaphones (with particular exemptions) is banned but the Council can grant permission. Brian initially sought permission in September 2005; the Council refused. A High Court judge quashed the refusal after Westminster lawyers conceded that the decision could not stand and that a legal challenge should be allowed, and agreed to pay Brian Haw's legal costs. It was also agreed that a differently-constituted licensing sub-committee should consider his application again in 21 days. The Committee agreed to Brian's limited use of the megaphone subject to noise level tests and various other criteria. He can use it for half an hour in the morning, half an hour in the early evening, and for a short while as Tony Blair drives past to face prime minister's question time. This Early Day Motion 2146 in support of Brian Haw may be noted: 25 May 2006: That this House notes the verdict of Monday 9th May in the case of Brian Haw, peace protestor in Parliament Square for over four and a half years, which overturned the original High Court ruling allowing him to continue his peace vigil; notes with concern that Mr Haw may now be forced to end his protest should the Police Commissioner fail to grant him permission to remain; further notes that Mr Haw's silent protest causes no hindrance to the proper operation of Parliament, nor does it create a public disorder; further notes that this House owes Mr Haw a debt of gratitude for his long-term active engagement in democracy; believes that Mr Haw should be allowed to remain in Parliament Square; and calls upon the Government to nurture engagement by the public with politicians and to support the democratic right of all to protest where they can be seen by hon. Members.

It is debatable whether this decision is in accord with Art 7 ECHR.[405] It is also possible that if a suitable case arises the provisions could be narrowed down or applied narrowly in reliance on ss 3 and 6 HRA and Arts 10 and 11. No defence of 'reasonableness' is provided – or any other equivalent defence – and therefore Art 10 and 11 considerations must employ the statutory language and the application of the statute in particular instances as their entry points. If a suitable case arises in which an authorisation is sought, a court will be able to consider first, whether the statutory language should be narrowed down by reference to s 3 HRA and second, whether, under s 6 HRA, the choice of conditions in question was proportionate to the aims pursued. These questions were discussed above in relation to the conditions that can be imposed on demonstrations under ss 12 and 14 of the 1986 Act. Proportionality considerations could also be applied to the evaluation of the triggers undergone by the Commissioner before imposing conditions. The 'trigger situations' are wider than those available under ss 12 and 14 of the 1986 Act, but one of them must be established, and can be subject to a strict scrutiny, before conditions can be imposed. The 'triggers' appear to go well beyond the 'legitimate aims' enumerated in Arts 10 and 11 para 2. However, Strasbourg generally finds very readily that one or more of the aims has been satisfied;[406] so argument is much more likely to centre on the question of proportionality. The trigger relating to 'hindrance' to persons entering Parliament is particularly broad since any large demonstration would be likely to cause some hindrance. On its face, it is hard to see that the use of this trigger complies with proportionality requirements under Arts 10 and 11 para 2, and is therefore a clear candidate for narrowing down under s 3 HRA. The restrictions as to noise and size of demonstrations clearly have the potential to destroy their impact almost completely. The robust approach taken to the right to freedom of assembly in Laporte[407] by the House of Lords, discussed below, indicates that if a suitable case arises, the courts may be prepared to use ss 3 or 6 HRA to limit the application of these broad provisions.

4 Criminalisation of trespass and obstruction of the highway

In order to assemble or demonstrate, protesters require access to land. But in order to create an impact, persons normally assemble in large groups. If they are on the highway, they are very likely to cause some obstruction to free passage and therefore may fall foul of the offence of obstructing the highway. Further, the tendency for public spaces to be privatised has been reinforced by the direction of UK law. Not only are there virtually no positive rights of access to forums for the holding of meetings,[408] but under the provisions discussed below, a 'creeping criminalisation of trespass'[409]

405 See Chapter 2, pp 66–67.

406 See Chapter 2, p 68.

407 [2006] UKHL 55. See also pp 757–62, below.

408 See the Representation of the People Act 1983, ss 95 and 96 (providing a right for Parliamentary candidates to hold meetings at election times) and the Education (No 2) Act 1986, s 43 (providing that university and college authorities must secure freedom of speech for persons, including visiting speakers, within their establishments).

409 See Wasik and Taylor, The Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, 1995, Blackstone, p 81.

has occurred, denying protesters access to private or quasi-public land on pain of the risk of arrest and conviction, not merely of incurring tortious liability. There are now a number of circumstances in which a person who merely walks onto land may incur criminal liability. A central issue, therefore, is the impact of the HRA on the creation of such liability, and on the offence of obstructing the highway when used against assemblies.

Obstructing the highway

The pre-HRA interpretation

Section 137 of the Highways Act 1980 provides that a person will be guilty of an offence if he 'without lawful authority or excuse in any way wilfully obstructs the free passage of the highway'. The only right in using the highway is to pass and re-pass along it – to make an ordinary reasonable use of it as a highway. Since obstruction of the highway is a criminal offence, it might therefore appear that all assemblies on the highway are prima facie unlawful since they are bound to cause some impediment to those passing by and therefore they can only take place if the police refrain from prosecuting. However, the courts seem to take the stance that not every such assembly will be unlawful; the main issue will be what was reasonable in the circumstances.

In Arrowsmith v Jenkins[410] it was determined that minor obstruction of traffic can lead to liability under the 1980 Act. A pacifist meeting was held in a certain street which linked up two main roads. The meeting blocked the street and the organiser co-operated with the police in unblocking it. It was completely blocked for five minutes and partly blocked for 15 minutes. The police had advance notice of the meeting and the organiser was under the impression that the proceedings were lawful, especially since other meetings had been held there on a number of occasions without attracting prosecutions. Nevertheless, the organiser was convicted. This use of the Highways Act is open to criticism; it places such meetings in a very precarious position since it seems to hand a power to the police to license them, thereby seriously undermining freedom of assembly. However, in Nagy v Weston[411] it was held that a reasonable user of the highway will constitute a lawful excuse and that in order to determine its reasonableness or otherwise, the length of the obstruction must be considered, its purpose, the place where it occurred and whether an actual or potential obstruction took place.

The purpose of the obstruction, mentioned in Nagy, was given greater prominence in the significant decision in Hirst and Agu v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire:[412] it was said that courts should have regard to the freedom to demonstrate. This was found in relation to the behaviour of a group of animal rights supporters who had conducted a demonstration in a busy street. The crucial issue was whether peaceful protest on the highway constituted a reasonable user, thus amounting to a 'lawful excuse' for obstruction. Glidewell LJ pointed out that, logically: 'for there to be a lawful excuse . . . the activity in which the person causing the obstruction is engaged must itself be inherently lawful. If it is not, the question whether it is reasonable does not arise.'[413] The Court then went on to find that peaceful assembly was a reasonable user and thus constituted a lawful excuse.

410 [1963] 2 QB 561; [1963] 2 All ER 210; for comment, see [1987] PL 495.
411 [1966] 2 QB 561; [1965] 1 WLR 280.
412 (1987) 85 Cr App R 143.

However, doubt was cast on the notion that there is a right to demonstrate on the highway by the decision in Birch v DPP.[414] The defendant was arrested under s 137 for lying down in the road in front of a vehicle destined for the premises of a chemical wastage plant, SARP UK. The defendant alleged that the company was engaging in unsafe and illegal practices, putting residents in the area at risk.[415] Both this vehicle and other (public) vehicles were obstructed. On appeal against his conviction he argued that the activity of lying down in the road was a reasonable one, that gave rise to a defence of 'lawful authority or excuse' under the Highways Act 1980. He relied on this defence as used in the cases of Hirst and Agu v Chief Constable of West Yorkshire and Nagy v Weston. His second argument was that the activity was undertaken in order to prevent crime, in accordance with s 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967. Therefore, he argued, the magistrate should have allowed him to lead evidence about the alleged unlawful activities of SARP before he could dismiss this defence. The first ground of defence was dismissed by distinguishing Hirst and Agu on the basis that the question which arose in that instance was whether the lawful activity of handing out leaflets was a reasonable activity providing lawful excuse. In the present case, deliberately lying down in the road so as to obstruct the highway and traffic flowing along it was not, it was found, a lawful activity; the appellant's actions gave rise to trespass, public nuisance and private nuisance, so they were not within any category of lawful excuse, aside from the question of prevention of crime. The prevention of crime argument failed on a number of grounds. It was found that the test of whether something is a 'crime' is an objective not a subjective test: it is not a matter of 'belief' but of proving that an action actually is criminal. The crime being prevented must be an imminent breach of the peace or other serious offence. There has to be an actual (or imminent) crime on or near the highway itself: you cannot obstruct a vehicle that could merely be contributing to crime elsewhere. The activity would have to actually prevent (or be capable of preventing) the crime, not merely draw attention to it. The decision in Birch clearly makes it very hard to defend any action as part of a protest or demonstration that is clearly deliberately obstructive in terms of the 'lawful authority or excuse' part of the defence.

The impact of the HRA

Following the interpretation accorded to s 137 in Hirst and Agu, the purpose of an assembly as a means of legitimate protest may suggest that it can amount to a reasonable user of the highway. If an assembly is a reasonable user then it is a lawful use of the highway. It may be noted that this finding is consonant with the finding of two of the Law Lords in DPP v Jones in the context of s 14A of the 1986 Act to the effect that there is a right of peaceful assembly on the highway providing right of passage is not obstructed. This finding was not conclusive of the issue, however, as the third Law Lord in the majority did not endorse it. Hirst meant that the use of s 137 against protesters was less likely or less likely to succeed unless the obstruction becomes unreasonable. Therefore, the stance taken in Hirst under s 137 may be in accord with the values of Arts 10 and 11. But the decision in Birch is not fully in accordance with those values since it means that any peaceful protest or demonstration that is obstructive cannot rely on the 'lawful authority or excuse' part of the s 137 defence. It means that most, perhaps all, direct action forms of protest on the highway are unlawful, however peaceful they are, and regardless of the significance of the protest.

413 Ibid, p 151.
414 [2000] Crim LR 301.
415 On May 30 1988 SARP leaked a cloud of nitric-dioxide gas over the village of Killamarsh in north Derbyshire and surrounding areas.

However, it could be argued that the argument in the Birch judgment is somewhat circular since blocking the highway is only 'patently unlawful' under the Highways Act 1980 itself. Aside from the Act (and the actions for nuisance and trespass), lying in the road is no more unlawful than handing out leaflets; it is arguably circular to find that it is the Act itself that prevents you from raising a defence under it. Following Birch, the defence appears to apply only to non-obstructive activities on the highway. However, if the activity is non-obstructive no charge could be brought in any event. The better argument is that the defence applies to (otherwise) lawful obstructive activities that are also reasonable. Birch could be reconciled with Hirst on the basis that the one instance concerned a reasonable activity on the highway – handing out leaflets – and the other concerned an unreasonable activity. Therefore the protesters in Hirst had a lawful excuse on the basis that the defence renders reasonable obstructions lawful. Since two possible arguments are available under s 137, s 3 HRA could be utilised to employ the Convention-friendly one.

If this argument is accepted in the post-HRA era, the question of the reasonableness of an obstruction would provide a key entry point for Art 10 and 11 arguments. It could also be argued that the use of a criminal charge against peaceful protesters who had caused some obstruction cannot be defended on proportionality grounds, utilizing the argument from the post-HRA case of Dehal in a different context, which is discussed below. The courts' approach to this issue should undergo a change, when protesters are charged with the offence under s 137, at least in terms of methodology in suitable post-HRA cases: the impact of the Convention rights in issue now have to be considered. An assembly that is obstructive (due to numbers or circumstances), but wholly peaceful, falls within Art 11 and, following Steel, Art 10 is also applicable.[416] Prima facie interference with the right(s) would clearly have occurred; the court would therefore have to consider the exceptions within para 2 of those Articles. It could use s 3 HRA to find an interpretation of s 137 which was compatible with those rights, if it viewed compatibility as in issue, or it could apply s 137 compatibly with those rights under s 6.

It is suggested that compatibility is in issue. Pendragon in which the convictions of peaceful protesters were not found to create a breach of Art 11 could be disregarded as a decision of the Commission only and one heavily influenced by the use of the margin of appreciation doctrine. Most significantly, in Pendragon a ban on the use of the highway under s 14A of the 1986 Act was in force at the time in question. In this instance, Steel and Ezelin are most clearly applicable since s 137 does not amount to a prior restraint. The finding in Ezelin v France[417] that freedom of peaceful assembly cannot be restricted in any way so long as the person in question has not committed any reprehensible act[418] would be applicable, since the obstructiveness of an assembly may frequently have nothing reprehensible about it – as appeared to be the case in Arrowsmith and Jenkins. Further, the conviction of persons taking part in a peaceful assembly does not appear to serve one of the legitimate aims of preventing public disorder or ensuring public safety. Obstruction is not necessarily equivalent to disorder. It is therefore arguable that the use of s 137 in such an instance would constitute a breach of Arts 10 and 11 since, in relation to disorder or public safety, the 'legitimate aim' test would be unsatisfied. The rights of others would, however, be in question, depending on the circumstances, in which case the issue would be one of proportionality. (It should be noted that since the right of free passage on the highway is not a Convention right, it should amount to an 'indisputable imperative'[419] in order to qualify as a legitimate aim; however, the Strasbourg Court has not consistently adopted such a strict stance.) Since s 137 uses the imprecise term 'excuse', which, as indicated, has been found to mean a reasonable user, a Convention-friendly interpretation could be adopted quite readily, possibly without needing to rely on s 3 HRA. It could be found that a peaceful, albeit obstructive, assembly would normally amount to a reasonable user of the highway, but that where the obstruction created a risk to safety or impinged disproportionately on the right of others to free movement,[420] due to its length, it could no longer be viewed as reasonable. Such an interpretation would impose a proportionality on s 137 that it currently lacks, after Birch.

416 See above, pp 684–85.

Criminalising trespass

Wasik and Taylor note that 'The criminalisation of various forms of trespass in the 1994 Act . . . has been vigorously opposed by those who fear that it will provide an inappropriate disincentive to group protest'.[421] As argued in the Introduction to this chapter, forms of direct action are less justifiable under rights-based arguments than other forms of protest. But the concern generated by the provisions discussed below is that over-reaction to the activities of hunt saboteurs has led to an unnecessary distortion of this area of the criminal law, to the detriment of freedom of protest.

The statutory scheme: mass trespass

Simple trespass – walking onto someone's land without permission or refusing to leave when asked to do so – has never been a crime under UK law. However, the 1986 Act created a special form of criminal trespass under s 39[422] which involved the application

417 A 202 (1991).

418 Ibid, para 53.

419 See Chassagnou v France (2000) 29 EHRR 615.

420 It may be noted that, as indicated above, Strasbourg has not indicated with any precision which 'rights' are in question. See above, p 688.

421 The Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, 1995, p 81.

422 For comment on this offence, see Vincent-Jones (1986) 13 JLS 343; Stonehenge (1986) NCCL; Ewing and Gearty, op. cit., fn 1, 1990, pp 125–28.

of a two-limb test. Under the first limb (s 39(1)), it had to be shown that two or more persons had come onto the land as trespassers with the common purpose of residing there for some period of time and that reasonable steps had been taken to ask them to leave on behalf of the occupier. Further, they must have brought 12 or more vehicles onto the land or threatened or abused the occupier or his agents or family or damaged property on the land. If the senior police officer believed that these conditions were satisfied, he could direct the persons to leave.

Under the second limb (s 39(2)), if they then failed to comply with the direction or came back onto the land within three months, they committed a criminal offence punishable with three months imprisonment. Section 39 was aimed at certain forms of assemblies, including animal rights activists and the 'peace convoys' which gather for the summer solstice festival at Stonehenge. As a number of commentators pointed out, it was probably unnecessary to enact this offence given the availability of civil remedies and the possibility of using powers to prevent a breach of the peace against mass trespassers or of charging them with low level public order offences.[423] It has also been suggested that the provision failed to confine itself to preventing the mischief it was created to prevent.[424] It could also be criticised as adding to the number of offences which can occur due to disobedience of police orders; it has been argued that a person should be obliged to take orders from the police only in the narrowest of circumstances.[425]

Section 39 was repealed by the CJPOA 1994 and its provisions replaced by s 61. Section 61, however, closely resembles s 39 and the changes it makes tend to have the effect of widening the offence. Under s 61, the persons in question need not have entered the land originally as trespassers; the question is whether they are trespassing, whether or not they originally entered the land as trespassers. If they did not enter as trespassers, the power to eject them only arises if there is a reasonable belief that the other conditions under s 61(1) are satisfied. The conditions under s 61(1) are similar to those under s 39(1), but the number of vehicles has been reduced from 12 to six and damage to the land itself has been included as well as damage to property on the land.

Aggravated trespass

The CJPOA 1994 also created the offence of aggravated trespass under s 68, which is aimed at certain groups, such as hunt saboteurs or motorway protesters.[426] In its original manifestation s 68 created a two-stage test; first, it had to be shown that the defendant trespassed on land in the open air and second, in relation to lawful activity which persons are engaging in or are about to engage in, that he did there anything intended by him to have the effect of either intimidating those persons so as to deter them from the activity or of obstructing or disrupting that activity.[427] No defence is provided and, crucially, it is not necessary to show that the activity was actually affected.

423 Smith, ATH, Offences Against Public Order, 1987, paras 14–18.
424 Card, R, Public Order: The New Law, 1987, takes this view: see pp 146–48.
425 See [1987] PL 211.
426 See HC Deb Col 29, 11 January 1994.
427 Section 69(1)(a).

The corollary of this requirement, which potentially narrows the application of the section, is that if persons engaging in a lawful activity are in fact impeded in carrying it out by the protest, but the protesters did not intend to impede or intimidate those persons since the intention was to engage in a protest of a purely symbolic nature it would appear that s 68 would not apply. Reckless, negligent or accidental intimidation or obstruction would not be enough.

This is a broadly worded provision; its impact in practice depends in part on the meaning attached to the imprecise terms 'disrupt' and 'obstruct'. A great many peaceful but vociferous demonstrations may have some impact of an obstructive nature on lawful activities. It is, however, limited in its application in that it does not apply to demonstrations on a metalled highway, although it does include public paths such as bridleways, and it excludes most, but not all buildings.[428] The original object of the section was to penalise the activities of trespassing hunt saboteurs and animal rights activists hence the inclusion of the limiting requirement that the activity must occur in the open air, but the section was later widened by deleting the reference to the open air under s 57 Anti-Social Behaviour Act 2003. By virtue of s 172(10) the section applies throughout the UK.

Section 68 has been used against hunt saboteurs and other protesters on a number of occasions and some of the decisions on the section have had the effect of widening the area of liability created still further. In Winder v DPP[429] the appellants had been running after the hunt. It was accepted that they did not intend to disrupt it by running but it was found that running after it was a more than a preparatory act and that it was close enough to the contemplated action to incur liability. The defendants could not have been charged with attempting to commit the offence[430] but, rather remarkably, the courts used the statutory test for attempts – whether the actions were 'something more than merely preparatory to the commission of the offence' – in support of their finding that the defendants had committed the actual offence,[431] thus appearing to conflate attempts to commit offences with the offences themselves. The willingness of the court to extend the boundaries of s 68 to catch such activities was all the more disturbing given that s 69 allows a direction to be given where it is suspected that the s 68 offence will be committed, a provision surely intended to cover precisely this set of circumstances. Thus, it was found that the offence under s 68 could be established if the appellants were trespassing on land in open air with the general intention of disrupting the hunt and were intending when in range to commit the acts in question with the required intention. This decision comes very close to punishing persons for their thoughts rather than for their actions.

428 'Land' is defined in s 61(9); it does not include metalled highway or buildings apart from certain agricultural buildings and scheduled monuments; common land and non-metalled roads are included.

429 (1996) The Times, 14 August.

430 There is no offence of attempting to commit summary offences unless specifically provided for in the statute creating the offence: Criminal Attempts Act 1981, s 1(4).

431 'The running after the hunt was, in the undisputed circumstances of the present case, sufficiently closely connected to the intended disruption as to be, in the words of the Criminal Attempts Act 1981, 'more than merely preparatory'.

Laws LJ's findings in DPP v Barnard and Others,[432] a decision that also concerned the breadth of s 68 when applied to direct action protest, showed similar tendencies, which are also found in Lord Bingham's willingness in DPP v Capon[433] (discussed below) to entertain the notion that mere presence on land per se might constitute 'doing there anything' intended to be intimidatory, obstructive or disruptive under s 68(1), a construction of the offence which could effectively remove the need to prove one if its constituent elements.[434] The decision concerned protesters against open cast mining who came onto land at an open cast site. The information against them alleged that having trespassed on land in the open air, they then, in relation to a lawful activity of open cast mining which persons were about to be engaged in on that land, did an act of unlawfully entering on that land, intended by them to have the effect of intimidating those persons so as to deter them from engaging in that activity, or obstructing or disrupting that activity, contrary to s 68(1). The magistrate, relying on Winder, found that three elements were required to establish the offence of aggravated trespass: namely, trespass, an intention to disrupt a lawful activity and an act done towards that end. The magistrate found that the allegation in the informations that the respondents 'unlawfully entered on land' alleged no more than that they had trespassed, and therefore was not capable of amounting to the second aggravating act required by the words in s 68(1): '. . . does there anything which is intended by him to have the effect . . .'. The magistrate refused an application by the prosecution to amend the informations to allege the act of 'unlawfully occupying the site in company with numerous other people' on the ground that it still would not have disclosed an offence, as occupation of the site was the act of trespass, and not an additional act aggravating that trespass. Reference to the number of people was no more than an indication that some were trespassing.

Laws LJ found that the magistrate was clearly correct in finding the original information to be defective. Proof was required of trespassing on land in the open air and of doing a distinct and overt act other than the act of trespassing which was intended to have the effects specified under sub-sections (a)–(c) of s 68(1). Unlawful occupation could equate to no more than the original trespass, but there might, he found, be circumstances where it could constitute the second act, other than trespass, required under the offence. However, a bare allegation of occupation was insufficient. It had to be supported by particulars of what the defendant was actually doing, and the occupation had to be distinct and overt from the original trespass. The proposed amendment would, he found, have disclosed an offence under s 68(1) of the 1994 Act, but it would not have been appropriate to allow the amendments; accordingly, the appeal was dismissed.

This decision suggests at first sight that when a group of protesters merely come onto land to protest about something taking place there, they do not thereby commit a criminal offence. It reiterates that the offence under s 68 consists of distinct elements, all of which must be shown to be present. But the potential blurring of the distinction between the first two to the effect that for the purposes of the offence of aggravated trespass, the occupation of land could constitute an act intended to intimidate, obstruct or disrupt, if it was distinct from a mere act of trespass, might lead to confusion as to the difference between simple and aggravated trespass. The circumstances in which an occupation of land will be viewed as distinct from a trespass on it are left unclear. The mere fact that the defendants unlawfully (that is, committing the tort of trespass) occupied the site in company with numerous other people does not necessarily mean that the offence under s 68 is made out unless the group do there anything which, in relation to others engaging in a lawful activity, is intended to have the effects mentioned in sub-sections (a)–(c) of s 68(1). If, for example, a large group walked onto land and engaged in a peaceful sit-in without making any effort to approach the persons the protest was aimed at, it is unclear that any of the effects mentioned above could be said to have occurred. The terms are ambiguous, but bearing Arts 10 and 11 in mind, they should now be interpreted more strictly under s 3 HRA, or applied more restrictively under s6. On the facts, the protesters' behaviour was quite closely analogous to that of the successful applicants in Steel in that the protest clearly constituted an expression of opinion, albeit occurring by means of action rather than speech, which was peaceful and unlikely to lead to disorder. As discussed below, the post-HRA case of Tilly[435] has in fact adopted the argument suggested above.

432 Before Laws LJ and Potts J (judgment of 15 October 1999); (1999) The Times, 9 November.

433 Below, fn 440.

434 'If the Police Sergeant had been found to have based his reasonable belief [that the s 68 offence was being committed] simply on the fact that [they] were present at the scene then . . . it would be necessary . . . to consider whether presence alone might be intimidatory . . . obstructive . . . or disruptive.' (Lord Bingham LCJ, obiter.)

Directions under s 69

Far-reaching provisions under s 69 underpin s 68. Section 69(1)(a) provides that if the senior officer present at the scene reasonably believes that a person is committing, has committed or intends to commit the offence under s 68, or (b) that two or more persons are trespassing and have the common purpose of intimidating persons so as to deter them from engaging in a lawful activity or of obstructing or disrupting that activity, he can direct any or all of those persons to leave the land. Under s 69(3), if the person in question, knowing that the s 69 direction has been given that applies to him, fails to leave the land[436] or re-enters it as a trespasser within three months,[437] he commits an imprisonable offence. It is a defence for the person to show that he or she was not trespassing on the land[438] or that he or she had a reasonable excuse[439] for failing to leave the land or for returning as a trespasser.

It may be noted that s 69 is the equivalent of s 14C of the Public Order Act 1986, which was discussed above. Section 14C allows a constable to stop a person whom he reasonably believes is on her way to an assembly in an area to which a s 14A order applies, and to direct her not to proceed in that direction. The power can only be used within the area to which the order applies. Failure to comply is an offence and renders the person liable to arrest. The similarities between s 14C and s 69 mean that much of the discussion below would apply also to s 14C.

435 (2001) The Times November 27.
436 Section 69(3)(a).
437 Section 69(3)(b).
438 Section 69(4)(a).
439 Section 69(4)(b).

Although s 68 may not lead to the criminalisation of persons who simply walk on to land as trespassers, s 69 has the potential to do so, depending on the interpretation given by the courts to the 'reasonable excuse' defence. For example, where a person is in receipt of the direction under s 69, even though it was erroneously given (since in fact, although she was trespassing, she did not have the purpose of committing the s 68 offence), she may still commit an offence if thereafter she re-enters the land in question during the specified time. The fact that on the second occasion she was merely walking peacefully on to land in order to engage in a non-obstructive public protest would be irrelevant unless she could also produce an excuse which could be termed reasonable. Whether the erroneousness of the senior police officer's original 'reasonable belief' would amount to a reasonable excuse is left unclear.

Capon v DPP[440] made it clear that the offence under s 69 could be committed even though the offence under s 68 was not established. The defendants were videoing the digging out of a fox when they were threatened with arrest under s 68 by a police officer if they did not leave and were asked whether they were leaving the land. This exchange and question was found to be sufficient, in the circumstances, to constitute the direction necessary under s 69. Their intention in undertaking the videoing was not found to be to disrupt, intimidate or interfere with the activity in question. Despite the fact that the protesters had been peaceful and non-obstructive throughout,[441] and it was very doubtful whether the officer had directed his mind towards all the elements of the offence, including the mens rea,[442] it was found that there was sufficient evidence. It was further found that there was no defence of 'reasonable excuse' in the circumstances,[443] even though the protesters were still in the process of trying to find out what offence they were being arrested for[444] when they were, in fact, arrested, and genuinely believed that no direction under s 69(1) had been made against them.

The judgment consisted of a fairly orthodox exercise in statutory interpretation, coupled with a generous approach to the reasonableness of the officer's belief.[445] Since criminalisation of what will often, in Convention terms, be an act of political expression,[446] rests primarily upon the state of belief of a single officer, perhaps formed in a few moments, a court with any appreciation of the enormous discretion that this statute affords the police to interfere with political protest would have been expected to conclude both that it should construe the statute as strictly as possibly against

440 Case CO/3496/97 Judgment of 4 March 1998 LEXIS; considered: Mead [1998] Crim LR 870.

441 In the exchange with the officer, one said, 'I have no intention of disrupting [the hunt] . . .'; another, 'We're here quite peacefully . . . simply videoing what is going on' (Mead [1998] Crim LR 870, p 871).

442 As Mead notes, ibid, p 875.

443 'The fact that the appellants were not . . . committing an offence under s 68 plainly . . . does not provide a reasonable excuse for not leaving the land. So to hold would emasculate the obvious intention of the section' (per Lord Bingham, Case CO/3496/97 (1998), transcript).

444 The first protester said, immediately before he was arrested, 'I'm not prepared to leave the land because I don't believe I'm committing any offence'; the second, 'I don't understand' (Mead [1998] Crim LR 870, p 871).

445 In particular, as Mead points out, no inquiry was made as to whether he had directed his mind towards all the elements of the offence, including the mens rea (ibid, pp 874–75).

446 The ECHR had not delivered judgment in Steel at this point (judgment was delivered on 23 September 1998) and Capon was decided on 4 March 1998; however, the decision of the Commission, which made a like finding as to the applicability of Art 10, was delivered on 9 April 1997.

the executive, and, further, that it should scrutinise the actions of the police officer, especially the clarity of his instructions,[447] and the findings of the trial court with particularly anxious care. Further or alternatively, the court could have found that where the defendants were in fact engaged in peaceful protest, they could plead 'reasonable excuse'; the very broad phrasing of that defence provides the most obvious means by which to import human rights values into s 69. The court, unfortunately, showed no awareness of any of these factors, engaging instead in a purely mechanistic interpretation of the law; indeed, there was no (explicit) normativity in its approach at all.

Under this approach, the outcome in instances similar to Winder or Capon might not differ in the post-HRA era, although the reasoning process by which it was reached would, since the value of political expression – taking that term to encompass an animal rights' protest – receive some consideration. It is suggested that the decisions reveal a judicial approach that, far from engaging with the thorny issues raised by the direct action form of protest, shows a continuance of traditional, formalist reasoning, coupled with marked executive-friendly tendencies: a willingness to widen the scope of already widely drafted offences and a reluctance to interfere with the exercise of broad police discretion. Such tendencies proceeded directly, it appeared, from the evident lack of judicial recognition of the issues of principle at stake.

The impact of the HRA on ss 61, 68 and 69

In Tilly v DPP[448] the defendant was charged on two occasions with aggravated trespass. The case in question involved the damaging of genetically modified crops, where the farmer was not present at the time. It was argued on behalf of the defendant that aggravated trespass could not be established since no one was engaging in a lawful activity at the time in question. The question that was asked on appeal was whether the element of 'engaging in a lawful activity' in s 68(1) required the physical presence of a person engaged in such activity. It was found, significantly, that a person cannot be convicted of aggravated trespass if no one is physically engaged in lawful activity on the land at the time of the disruption. It was found that aggravated trespass was designed to deal with situations where people were intimidated or prevented from carrying out activity as they wished. It therefore followed that it could not be applied to situations where there was no one actually present. Tilly is of significance in relation to a number of forms of direct action protest, occurring before the lawful activity – the subject of the protest – gets underway, such as disabling traps or 'prebeating' a hunt, in order to rid an area of foxes before the hunt arrives. Tilly appears to establish, not only that persons engaging in a lawful activity must be present, but that the defendants must intend to intimidate them or impede them in engaging in it. If persons engaging in such an activity were present, but a protest was aimed at a different activity, s 68 would not apply. If such persons were present and engaging in the protested-about activity, but the protest was not intended to impede the activity, being only of a symbolic nature, it would also appear that s 68 would not apply.

447 As Mead remarks: '. . . it must be very difficult to "know" within section 69(3) that a direction has been given if the police are permitted such wide and uncertain language as this' (Mead, op. cit., fn 440, p 872).

448 (2001) The Times 27 November.

The situation in DPP v Bayer[449] differed from that in Tilly since disruption to a lawful activity had clearly occurred. The defendants went on to private land which was being drilled with genetically modified (GM) maize. The crop had been granted a marketing consent and could be grown legally anywhere in the UK. The defendants attached themselves to tractors engaged in the drilling process, thereby disrupting that activity. They were charged with aggravated trespass contrary to s 68(1) and (3) of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994. At trial the defendants submitted that their actions were justified to protect damage to the environment since GM crops could cause damage to surrounding property. The district judge dismissed the charges, finding that the defendants' actions were reasonable in the circumstances and came within the common law private defence of property. The question for the opinion of the High Court on appeal was whether the finding that the actions of all four defendants was reasonable in the defence of property was a finding properly open to the district judge, judging the issue of reasonableness objectively. The appeal was allowed. It was found that where the common law private defence of property was raised the court had first to ask itself whether the defendants were contending that they had used reasonable force in order to defend property from actual or imminent damage, which constituted or would constitute an unlawful or criminal act. If the answer to that was 'no' then the defence was not available. If the answer was 'yes' then the court had to go on to consider the facts as the defendants honestly believed them to be and then had to determine objectively whether the force that had been used was reasonable in all the circumstances. In the instant case, it was found that it was clear that the defendants were well aware that there was nothing unlawful about the drilling of GM maize on the land, whether or not the seed might be transferred by one means or another to the neighbouring land. They had acted as they had because they considered that the seed represented a danger to neighbouring property, not to prevent an activity that was unlawful or criminal. It followed that the district judge should have directed himself as a matter of law that the private defence of property was not available to the defendants on the facts. These findings were unsurprising.

In R v Jones; R v Milling; R v Olditch; R v Pritchard; R v Richards; Ayliffe v Director of Public Prosecutions; Swain v Director of Public Prosecutions[450] a further argument was put forward in an attempt to escape from the rigours of s 68. Again the argument centred on the 'lawful activity' that was being disrupted, the argument being that it was not lawful. The appellants had all been charged with or convicted of aggravated trespass or criminal damage arising out of their separate, independent actions taken at military bases by way of protest against the war in Iraq. It was claimed on their behalf that they were entitled to rely upon s 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967, on the basis that they were using reasonable force to prevent the commission of a crime, or that their acts of disruption were not aggravated trespass because the activities of the Crown at the military bases were not lawful within the meaning of s 68(2) of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, since they were being carried out in pursuance of a crime of aggression under customary international law. The questions certified were whether the crime of aggression was capable of being a 'crime' within the meaning of s 3 of the 1967 Act and, if so, whether the issue was justiciable in a criminal trial, and whether the crime of aggression was capable of being an 'offence' within s 68(2) of the 1994 Act and, if so, whether the issue was justiciable in a criminal trial. It was contended that: (1) customary international law was, without the need for any domestic statute or judicial decision, part of the domestic law of England and Wales; (2) at all times relevant to the instant appeals customary international law recognised a crime of aggression; (3) crimes recognised in international customary law were, without the need for any domestic statute or judicial decision, recognised and enforced by the domestic law of England and Wales; (4) 'crime' in s 3 covered a crime established in customary international law, such as the crime of aggression; (5) alternatively, 'crime' in s 3 meant a crime in the domestic law of England and Wales, and the crime of aggression was such; (6) 'offence' in s 68(2) covered an offence established in customary international law, such as the crime of aggression; (7) alternatively, 'offence' in s 68(2) meant a crime in the domestic law of England and Wales, and the crime of aggression was such.

449 [2003] EWHC 2567 (Admin), 167 JP 666, [2003] All ER (D) 28 (Nov), High Court.

450 [2006] UKHL 16. For the previous decisions in the cases, see: [2004] EWCA Crim 1981; [2005] QB 529 and [2005] EWHC 684; [2005] 3 WLR 628.

The House of Lords found that it was very unlikely that Parliament had understood 'crime' in s 3 as covering crimes recognised in customary international law but not assimilated into domestic law by any statute or judicial decision. Therefore, 'crime' in s 3 did not cover a crime established in customary international law, such as the crime of aggression.[451] The House concluded that the crime of aggression was neither capable of being a 'crime' within the meaning of s 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967, nor an 'offence' within s 68(2) of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994. Therefore, individuals facing charges for criminal damage and aggravated trespass arising out of their actions in protesting against the war in Iraq could not argue that they were using reasonable force to prevent the commission of a crime, or that the activities of the Crown at the military bases were unlawful. The appeals were therefore dismissed.

In Jones and in Bayer it was not very surprising that these arguments failed. The lack of a defence in s 68 clearly prompts defendants in protest cases to seek to persuade the courts to establish one that would enable account to be taken of the significance of the protest. But the defendants could have sought instead to rely on the Steel case which established that Art 10 was engaged by their activity. R v Jones was argued before the House of Lords in 2006 but Art 10 arguments were not relied on. Following the findings in Dehal, discussed below,[452] it could then have been argued that the bringing of the prosecution was disproportionate to the aim pursued, and/or that s 68 should be applied restrictively, narrowing down its application. The effect of the Convention on prosecutions brought under ss 61, 68 and 69 could be, at least superficially, quite dramatic, whether a minimalist or an activist approach is followed. As indicated above, judicial consideration of these provisions pre-HRA gave no recognition to the Convention rights at stake. By contrast, as discussed above,[453] the European Court made a clear finding in Steel,[454] confirmed in Hashman,[455] that protest which takes the form of physical obstruction nevertheless falls within the protection of Art 10 – and probably Art 11.[456] Unless the courts simply refuse to follow this aspect of the Steel and Hashman judgments – as they arguably could do under s 2 HRA[457]– they are bound to find that the actions of similar protesters engage Arts 10 and 11.[458] Acceptance of such engagement, at least in formal terms, could entirely change the approach to the determination of such cases. Instead of merely undertaking a standard exercise in statutory interpretation, the courts could decide whether the interference with the protesters' Convention rights is justifiable under the second paragraphs of those Articles.

451 R (Rottman) v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis (2002) UKHL 20 , (2002) 2 WLR 1315 was applied.

452 See p 797.

453 See pp 683–85 above. The findings in Steel were to the effect that protesters who were arrested and detained after, respectively, obstructing a grouse shoot and sitting in the path of road making equipment had suffered a prima facie violation of Art 10.

In the absence of further direct guidance from Strasbourg apart from Steel, it is necessary both to resort to inference from the outcomes of direct action and other cases, and to attempt to draw conclusions from the more general Convention principles enunciated at Strasbourg. As indicated above, it appears that while there is no express statement to the effect that 'expression' in the form of direct action has a lower status than 'pure' expression, such a finding can be inferred from the case law. In Steel itself, the Court appeared to be readily convinced of the necessity and proportionality of the interferences with the two direct action protests complained of by the first two applicants.[459] In contrast, as discussed above, the Court in Ezelin[460] found that it was impossible to justify interferences with the freedom of peaceful assembly unless the person exercising the freedom himself committed a 'reprehensible act'. The first two applicants in Steel were both acting 'peacefully' in the sense that they were not themselves offering violence. In order to reconcile the two decisions, therefore, it must be assumed either that obstructive protest, while it does fall within at least Art 10, does not constitute that class of purely 'peaceful' protest which, according to Ezelin, 'cannot be restricted in any way' or that any restriction is more readily justifiable.

454 (1999) 28 EHRR 603.

455 (2000) 8 BHRC 104; (1999) 30 EHRR 241.

456 The Court in Steel found that there was no need to consider the applications under Art 11, implying that since the matter had been resolved under Art 10, consideration of Art 11 would be otiose, as raising the same issues. It may be noted that Art 11 protects only freedom of 'peaceful' assembly. On the face of it, there is no need to read this restriction should also be read into Art 10; the words were not expressly included and reading them in potentially reduces the scope of the primary right.

457 The domestic courts generally follow ECHR judgments where they are viewed as reflecting settled jurisprudence (see Chapter 4, pp 193–94); however, a court might take the view that the jurisprudence is not sufficiently 'settled'.

458 Even where an arrest and detention had occurred, but no further action had been taken, an interference might be viewed as subsisting on the basis that protesters would not be able to exercise their Convention rights free from the fear of arrest and charges: see Dudgeon v UK (1982) 4 EHRR 149.

459 The case also concerned third, fourth and fifth applicants, who had engaged in purely peaceful protests with no element of obstruction or other 'action'. The first applicant, who had been impeding grouse shooters, was detained for 44 hours and sentenced to 28 days' imprisonment upon refusing to be bound over; the second, who had been lying down in front of digging equipment, suffered a 17-hour detention and seven-days' imprisonment. The Court found that these were 'serious interference[s]' with the applicants' Art 10 rights. However, it had little difficulty in going on to find them to be both necessary and proportionate.

460 (1991) 14 EHRR 362.

It seems clear from the findings in Steel as to the first and second applicants, and from the Commission decision in G v FRG,[461] that where a protester is engaged in obstructive, albeit non-violent activity, arrest and imprisonment are in principle justifiable under the Convention. Such an acceptance does not, however, entail a finding that s 68 is Convention-compliant. Section 68 is aimed only at disruptive protesters, not at those engaged purely in verbal persuasion, and therefore the powers it provides may, depending on their interpretation, be compatible with Art 10 as interpreted in Steel. However, it must be recalled that in Steel, actual disruption had been caused by the protesters: by contrast, s 68 makes clear on its face that it is necessary only that 'acts' additional to trespass, committed with the intention of causing disruption, obstruction or intimidation are required to make out the offence. Thus, in cases where the protesters have engaged in action intended to be disruptive, etc, but no such disruption has actually been caused, it is doubtful whether the imposition of criminal liability could be seen as 'necessary' under the Convention. Its imposition would arguably be incompatible with Steel and would amount to a clear departure from the principle set out in Ezelin, that peaceful protest cannot be interfered with, unless the particular protesters arrested commit 'reprehensible acts'.[462]

If this argument is accepted, a significant narrowing of the area of liability generated by s 68 will be required: the offence would have to be re-interpreted under s 3(1) of the HRA so that it catches only 'acts' that actually have some disruptive, etc, effect. This would entail a clear departure from the literal meaning of the section, but it is presumably a 'possible' interpretation under s 3. On this basis, Winder, which allows the criminalisation of protest at a stage even further away from actual obstruction, would also have to be reconsidered and, it is suggested, overruled.

Section 69, as interpreted by Capon, is similarly problematic. As Capon made clear, s 69 allows peaceful protesters to be arrested even though in fact there was no obstruction, intimidation or disruption of others and no risk of disorder, as long as a police officer reasonably believed that such factors were present. This belief is supposed to be 'reasonable',[463] but as Capon vividly demonstrates, the inhibiting effect of this requirement in practice can all but disappear due to the courts' marked disinclination to take issue with the judgments of police officers on the spot.[464] Therefore, it may be argued, depending on the particular circumstances, that certain s 69 'bans' may be unjustifiable under para 2 of Arts 10 and 11, bearing in mind the extent of the discretion to interfere with peaceful protest which this section vests in the police without any independent check, and the extent of the interference – in effect, a complete ban on entering the land in question, potentially lasting for three months. Since s 69 can operate as a prior restraint, Art 10 would demand that any direction given should be strictly scrutinised.[465]

461 (1980) 21 DR 138.

462 Reading Steel and Ezelin together, it must be assumed that the 'reprehensible acts' mentioned in Ezelin included obstructive behaviour.

463 Section 69(1).

464 (1999) 28 EHRR 603, pp 609–10, 638–39 and 647: the arrest of purely peaceful protesters (the third, fourth and fifth applicants) was found to create breaches of Arts 5(1) and 10.

465 See pp 687–89.

Peaceful protesters – like the two defendants in Capon – have clearly committed no 'reprehensible' acts, as Ezelin requires. One possible response, therefore, would be to reinterpret s 69 under s 3(1) of the HRA so as to allow for a lawful direction to be given only where in fact one of the above elements is actually present. Reasonable belief would have to be taken to mean reasonable and true belief.[466] While such a reading renders s 69 largely otiose (since s 68 would cover such a situation) it is again, a 'possible' reading under s 3(1). A further, more likely, possibility would be to find by reference to Arts 10 and 11 that the erroneousness of the senior police officer's original 'reasonable belief' should amount to a reasonable excuse. It would also be possible to find that purely peaceful protesters have a 'reasonable excuse' for not obeying a s 69 direction under s 69(4)(b). Moreover, under this view, courts could surely find that the Convention requires officers to use the clearest possible words when ordering persons to leave the land, precisely what the court failed to do in Capon.

That decision also raises the possibility that a direction under s 69, if it can be given in such an imprecise form, might be found in a future post-HRA case to fail to satisfy the test denoted by the term 'prescribed by law' under Arts 10 and 11, assuming that the activity in question could be viewed as constituting the expression of an opinion so as to engage those Articles. It might well be argued that if a direction can be given in the form of a question, as in Capon, the term is too imprecise to satisfy that test. But, equally, the domestic court would be free to apply a doctrine of deference to the executive, whereby the nature of the direction should not be scrutinised too closely since the circumstances could be best assessed by the police officer on the ground. In the words of Lord Slynn, in the International Ferry Traders case,[467] the courts might show respect to 'the margin of appreciation or discretion' of the police officers in question in refusing to undertake a rigorous review of the wording of a direction. But since the courts should recognise that they are dealing with the exercise of a fundamental right under the Convention, it would be problematic to allow for its abrogation on the exceptionally flimsy grounds upheld in that case.

The discussion so far has not centred on the question of rights of access to land, except in relation to the highway, under s 14A of the 1986 Act.[468] It is now established that the 'right' of access to the highway may include holding an assembly on it. But prima facie assemblies on other quasi-public or private land will virtually always be trespassory, and therefore could attract liability under ss 68, 69 or 61 of the CJPOA unless, in the circumstances, it is found that express or implied permission to hold some peaceful protests was given. A large number of quasi-public places exist to which the public has limited rights of access, such as unenclosed shopping malls, parks, the grounds and forecourts of town halls or civic centres, monuments and their surrounding land or rights of way across private land. At present, such rights of access would not include assemblies for the purpose of protests and demonstrations. Strasbourg has not yet accepted that there is a positive obligation on the state to require public authorities or private individuals to allow the exercise of protest and assembly rights on their land. But an activist domestic court might be prepared to uphold such a claim in respect of a public authority, thereby anticipating the stance on this matter which some commentators view Strasbourg as not unlikely to adopt.[469] When the issue of exclusion of persons from a quasi-public place, a shopping mall, was raised before the Commission, it declared the application inadmissible, on the basis that Art 11 was not applicable, since the applicants were gathering there for a purely social purpose.[470] Clearly, had Art 11 been engaged, a different outcome might have been achieved.

466 It should be noted that s 69 raises an issue distinct from that of arresting under s 68(4) on the basis of reasonable suspicion of committing the offence under s 68. Since s 68(4) requires reasonable suspicion as to the commission of an offence, it is in principle compatible with Art 5 under the exception of para (1)(c).

467 [1999] 1 All ER 129; see above, pp 692–93.

468 See above, pp 711–19.

In the US, the courts are moving away from a position of upholding proprietorial rights and towards providing protection for expressive activity in quasi-public forums.[471] This can also be said of the Canadian and Australian courts.[472] In contrast, the traditional stance of the UK judiciary, as indicated above, is to favour the property right when it conflicts with rights of protest. In general, they tend to uphold proprietorial rights in an abstract fashion, regardless of any real harm which may occur due to their infringement.[473] But Art 10 and 11 arguments might persuade them in future to consider the possibility of recognising broader access rights to quasi-public land.

The issue might arise in two ways. A group seeking access to a forum for the holding of an assembly or demonstration might seek to bring an action against the relevant landowning body, if it was a public authority, under ss 6 and 7(1)(a) of the HRA, claiming that a refusal to allow an assembly in a particular place had constituted an interference with its Art 10 and 11 rights. Where a group was charged with infringing s 61 of the CJPOA in respect of private or quasi-public land, its main recourse, since prima facie it would appear to be trespassory, would be to argue under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA that in the circumstances it had an implied licence to enter the land on the basis of the demands of the guarantees under Arts 10 and 11. A failure to accept such an argument could lead, potentially, to a serious interference with those guarantees.[474] A successful claim of such access rights would mean reinterpreting s 61 in order to find that rights of access to certain areas, going beyond the highway, exist for the purpose of holding peaceful assemblies. If such a claim was upheld, it would also preclude the imposition of tortious liability.

Similar arguments could be raised under ss 68 or 69 of the CJPOA; a group charged with aggravated trespass could argue, as a preliminary issue, that they had not trespassed since they were within the limited rights of access to the land. Upholding such a claim would mean, in effect, deeming under s 68 that an implied or constructive licence to enter the land existed, imposed by the HRA. Any such implied licence would no doubt be highly circumscribed. For example, it would have to avoid allowing any infringement

469 Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op. cit., fn 1, p 419.

470 Anderson v UK [1998] EHRLR 218.

471 See Shad Alliance v Smith Haven Mall 484 NYS 2d 849, esp p 857.

472 See Harrison v Carswell (1975) 62 DLR (3d) 68 Supreme Court of Canada; Gerhardy v Brown (1985) 159 CLR 70.

473 See, on this point, Gray and Gray, 'Civil rights, civil wrongs and quasi-public places' [1999] EHRLR 46.

474 The members of the assembly would be convicted of various offences arising under s 14B, however peaceful or non-obstructive the assembly was. Its organiser could be imprisoned (s 14B(5)), as could anyone who could be proved to have incited a member of the assembly to come onto the land (s 14B(7)).

of Art 8 rights, including respect for the home. It would probably apply for a limited period and possibly only to peaceful protests, such as sit-ins.

The status of the landowning body under s 6 of the HRA would be relevant. Further, since the offences in question are statutory, the court would have to satisfy its obligation under s 3. If the landowning body was itself a standard public authority, it would clearly be bound by the Convention rights. If it was a functional body,[475] it would depend whether its public function could be said to be engaged by the claims of the protesters. As Chapter 4 indicated, s 6 of the HRA has brought a number of bodies which manage or own land within its ambit, including bodies such as Network Rail, which are classic hybrid bodies. If, for example, Network Rail bought land, perhaps by means of a Compulsory Purchase Order, in order to place railway lines across it, it would then own the land for the purpose of satisfying its public function as the manager of rail infrastructure, but such ownership is nevertheless probably part of its private function.[476] But if it acted in order to secure the lines by, for example, placing fences round them, it would be doing so in pursuance of its statutory duty in respect of rail safety and therefore might be viewed as acting in that respect as a public authority.[477] A body exercising a private function, or a fully private body, would not be bound by s 6, but would still be affected by s 3 of the HRA. If, for example, an assembly took place, in the period to which a s 14A ban applied, on land owned by a privatised body which could not be viewed as related to the public function of that body, a court would still have to interpret s 14A(5) in order to ensure compatibility with Arts 10 and 11. If, alternatively, a person was charged with an offence under ss 61, 68 or 69 in respect of such an assembly, the court would have to ensure compatibility with those Articles in respect of the term 'trespass' in ss 61, 68(1) or 69(1).

5 Breach of the peace, binding over and bail conditions[478]

Justices and any court of record having criminal jurisdiction have a power at common law[479] to bind over persons to keep the peace. Under the Justices of the Peace Act 1361, there is also a power – the contra bono mores (contrary to a good way of life) power – to bind over persons to be of good behaviour. If a person refuses a binding over order, he or she can be imprisoned for up to six months. These ancient powers are of great significance in relation to direct action, demonstrations and public protest generally due to the wide discretion they hand to police and magistrates. Academic writers agree that the notion of maintaining the Queen's peace continues to be the central one in public

475 See Chapter 4, pp 216–35.

476 There was a Pepper v Hart statement in Parliament to this effect: 583 HL 796, 811 (24 November 1997).

477 Clearly, it does not necessarily follow in any particular circumstance that Arts 10 and 11 would require that access to the land should be allowed for protesters. Both Articles contain exceptions in the interests of public safety.

478 For discussion of this power, see Grunis, A [1976] PL 16; Law Commission Paper, Binding Over: The Issues, 1987, Paper 103: for comment, see [1988] Crim LR 355; 'The roots and early development of binding over powers' [1988] CLJ 101–28; Kerrigan, K, 'Breach of the peace and binding over – continuing confusion' (1997) 2(1) J Civ Lib 30.

479 See the Justices of the Peace Act 1968, s 1(7) and the Administration of Justice Act 1973, Sched 5.

order law.[480] It has been said to express the idea that 'people should be free to act as they choose so long as they do not cause violence'.[481] This simple concept appears to be unobjectionable in civil libertarian terms, since it would not sanction interference with the freedom to protest peacefully. However, it will be argued below that this concept no longer expresses the central value underlying the doctrine of breach of the peace. In many respects, it has been replaced by a notion of freedom of action so long as serious inconvenience is not caused. The concept itself has also changed and grown in a way that has taken it some distance from the values it may originally have expressed. Since the breach of the peace doctrine has the potential to curb all forms of protest – not excluding peaceful persuasion – it has come into domestic conflict with Arts 10 and 11 of the Convention. Where a balance has been struck between the rights of protesters and the control of disorder by the statutory schemes discussed in this chapter, the use of the common law by police in preference leads to a failure to accord proper weight to such rights. The extraordinary width of this common law doctrine has been somewhat narrowed by the seminal House of Lords' decision in Laporte in 2006. Nevertheless, it still retains the capacity to undermine the statutory schemes discussed. This doctrine provides the most significant power for use against protesters discussed in this chapter; it provides the police with almost limitless powers unless the protest remains anodyne. Protests containing protesters with a history of causing disorder, protests including a few who are disorderly or who may become so, all become subject to an array of restraints, including the ending of the march or detention for several hours with or without arrest, under this doctrine.

The contra bono mores power

The contra bono mores power under the 1361 Act allows the binding over of persons whose behaviour is deemed by a bench of magistrates to be anti-social although not necessarily unlawful. This vague and broad power hands an unacceptably wide discretion to magistrates to determine the standards of good behaviour; it has been severely criticised as a grave breach of rule of law standards.[482] The power has been used in this century against those engaging in political public protest and against groups such as animal rights activists. In Hughes v Holley,[483] the Court of Appeal confirmed the existence of the power and its availability regardless of the lawfulness of the behaviour in question.

However, following the decision in Hashman v UK[484] it is probable that the doctrine will become a dead letter. The case concerned the behaviour of hunt saboteurs. One of the applicants had blown a horn with the intention of disrupting a hunt. There was no threat of violence and no breach of the peace. Blowing a horn is not unlawful. However, it was probable that he would have repeated the behaviour in question, which 480 See, e.g., Feldman, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 1993 1st edn, p 786; 'Breaching the peace and disturbing the quiet' (1982) PL 212; Williams, op. cit., fn 1.

481 Feldman, ibid, p 787.

482 Williams, G, 'Preventive justice and the rule of law' (1953) 16 MLR 417. See also Hewitt, P, The Abuse of Power, 1984, p 125.

483 (1988) 86 Cr App R 130.

484 (2000) 8 BHRC 104; (1999) 30 EHRR 241.

was found to be anti-social by the magistrates. He was therefore bound over to be of good behaviour and the binding over order was upheld on appeal. The case led to an application to the European Commission on Human Rights under Arts 10, 11 and 5; it was declared admissible under Arts 10 and 11.[485] The Court went on to find that the power was too vague and unpredictable in its operation to satisfy the 'prescribed by law' requirement under Arts 10 and 11.[486] The finding of the court in Sunday Times v UK,[487] that 'a norm cannot be regarded as a "law" unless it is formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen to regulate his conduct', was not satisfied. Thus, it may be assumed that, although this decision is not binding, the contra bono mores power is unlikely to be used now that the HRA is in force.

Breach of the peace

Introduction

The notion of breaching the peace is less vague and uncertain than the contra bono mores doctrine, but it has quite frequently been interpreted very broadly. If a police officer suspects that a breach of the peace is likely to be committed – for example, a march is expected to be disorderly – a person or persons can be arrested without a warrant under common law powers to prevent a breach of the peace and can be bound over to keep the peace, in other words not to continue the behaviour thought likely to lead to the breach of the peace. Thus, the march could be prevented from occurring. If the person refuses the binding over order, he or she can be imprisoned. Under s 6 HRA, this power is being re-evaluated when applied to protesters, as discussed below. The tendency of the judiciary – as shown, for example, in Piddington v Bates[488] – to accept the finding of the police officer on the ground, is undergoing a change.

This flexible common law power[489] overlaps with a number of the powers arising under the 1986 and 1994 Acts and is in general more useful to the police than they are, since its definition is so imprecise and the powers that can be exercised to prevent a breach are so broad. This imprecision means that it can readily be used in such a way as to undermine attempts in the statutory provisions to carve out more clearly defined areas of liability. The leading case is Howell,[490] in which it was determined that a breach of the peace will arise if an act is done or threatened to be done which either: harms a person or in his presence his property or is likely to cause such harm or which puts a person in fear of such harm. Under this definition, threatening words might not in themselves amount to a breach of the peace, but they might lead a police officer to apprehend a breach. Another and rather different definition of the offence was offered

485 Hashman and Harrup v UK (1996) 22 EHRR CD 184.

486 Article 8 uses the formulation 'in accordance with the law', but it was established in Silver v UK, judgment of 25 March 1983, A 61; (1983) 5 EHRR 347 that both formulations are to be read in the same way.

487 Judgment of 26 April 1979, A 30, para 49.

488 [1961] 1 WLR 162.

489 For comment, see 'Breaching the peace and disturbing the quiet' [1982] PL 212; Williams, op. cit., fn 1.

490 [1981] 3 All ER 383.

in Chief Constable for Devon and Cornwall ex p CEGB[491] by Lord Denning. His view was that violence, or the threat of it, was unnecessary; he considered that 'if anyone unlawfully and physically obstructs a worker – by lying down or chaining himself to a rig or the like – he is guilty of a breach of the peace'. On this view, peaceful protest could be severely curtailed. It is generally considered that the view taken in Howell is the correct one,[492] but the fact that as eminent an authority as Lord Denning could offer such a radically different definition of the offence[493] from that put forward in Howell only a year earlier, epitomises the disturbingly vague parameters of breach of the peace. The Howell definition in itself is extremely wide, largely because it does not confine itself to violence or threats of violence. Nor does it require that the behaviour amounting to a breach of the peace, or giving rise to fear of a breach of the peace, should be unlawful under civil or criminal law. Further, it has been recognised for some time by the courts that a person may be bound over for conduct which is not itself a breach of the peace and which does not suggest that the individual concerned is about to breach the peace, but which may cause another to breach the peace.[494] This third possibility is arguably implicit in the Howell definition itself and indeed is not sufficiently distinguished, within that definition, from conduct which in itself amounts to a breach of the peace. This additional possibility is of great significance in the context of public protest since it means that in certain circumstances peaceful, lawful protest can lead to the arrest and binding over of the protesters.

The width of powers to prevent a breach of the peace means that they can be used to curtail freedom of assembly in situations in which statutory powers might be inapplicable. For example, Piddington v Bates[495] suggested that the courts could be, at times, very unwilling to disagree with the finding of the police officer on the ground. In that case, the defendant wished to join other pickets at a printer's works but was told by police officers that only two men were to be allowed to picket each of the main entrances. The defendant then tried to push 'gently' past the police officer and was arrested for obstructing a police officer in the course of his duty. On appeal, it was held that the officer had reasonably apprehended that a breach of the peace might occur and the limiting of the number of the pickets was designed to prevent it; however, the main reason for fearing trouble was apparently merely that there were 18 pickets at the works. In effect, therefore, a condition was imposed on a static assembly, reducing its numbers to four. It is interesting to note that if that situation were to occur today, with the 1986 Act in force, the powers under s 14 allowing control of assemblies could not be used, since less than 20 people were present and even had more than 20 pickets been there, it seems probable that none of the 'trigger' conditions would have been satisfied. The case illustrates the readiness of the common law to sanction police interference with free assembly on production of what can only be described as minimal evidence of a risk of disorder.

491 [1982] QB 458.

492 See, e.g., Thornton, P, Public Order Law 1987, p 74. In Percy v DPP [1995] 3 All ER 124, DC, the Howell definition as opposed to that of Lord Denning, was preferred. Lord Denning's definition was rejected as erroneous.

493 It should be noted that breach of the peace, though arrestable, is not a criminal offence.

494 Wise v Dunning [1902] 1 KB 167; Lansbury v Riley [1914] 3 KB 229.

495 [1961] 1 WLR 162.

Immediacy

A constable or citizen has the power and duty to seek to prevent, by arrest or other action short of arrest, any breach of the peace occurring in his presence, or any breach of the peace which (having occurred) is likely to be renewed, or any breach of the peace which is about to occur. Three key issues arise in relation to the question of immediacy. First, it is necessary to determine the degree of imminence. In other words, does it indicate that the officer predicts that the breach will occur in the very near future? At what point could it be said that the point at which it was expected to arise was too distant to justify intervening action, including arrest? Second, assuming that a breach can be said to be imminent, who can be arrested or otherwise affected by police intervention? If, as may frequently occur in relation to protests, an innocent party is in the company of those who are, in the view of the police officers, about to commit the breach, can the police arrest or take other interventionary action against the innocent party? In the interests of maintaining public order this might be argued for on the basis that it was difficult for the police to distinguish between those about to breach the peace and others.[496] Or it might be argued for on the basis that those remaining present while others, part of the same protest, become more confrontational, condoned or even encouraged the breach by their very presence or by their verbal support for the protest. This issue is a difficult one since police consider that some activist groups use protests as a cover for acts of violence and aggression.[497] Third, if a breach can not be said to be imminent, can the police take action short of arrest, such as directing protesters away from the protest, or detaining them without arresting them, on the basis that otherwise the breach will become imminent? In other words, is the degree of intervention linked to the degree of immediacy?

The last two issues tend to arise in the context of protests rather than in the context of other activities that could lead to a breach of the peace. Their resolution is of great significance in that context since it determines whether and how far the police have extremely broad and ill-defined powers to prevent or curb freedom of protest or deter persons from taking part in it. The statutory framework contained in the Public Order Act 1986, discussed above, provides a range of far-reaching powers intended to allow the police to control protests. The 1986 Act also provides (s 40(2)) that nothing in it 'affects the common law powers . . . to deal with or prevent a breach of the peace'. At present the statutory framework is marginalised since the police prefer to rely on the much less precisely defined common law powers. In fact, at first glimpse the statutory powers might appear to offer the police more than the common law powers do. The statutory powers rely on a lower threshold of harm as protests can be controlled on the basis only of an apprehended serious disruption to the life of the community rather than on an apprehension of violence to persons or property. Also the powers make it clear, on their face, that a range of actions short of arrest can be taken against individual members of protests, whether or not they themselves are creating or are expected to create the disruption. Arrest powers are available on the same basis, providing that reasonable suspicion as regards the mens rea elements of the offences in question under ss 11, 12, 14 is present. But the statutory framework is more precise, more detailed and more complex; it appears to present the police with a greater challenge in terms of defending their actions at a later point. For example, if an assembly is static it cannot be subject to the same range of conditions as a march can, so if the police purport to apply the wrong set of conditions their actions may be found later on to have been unlawful.[498] Until the House of Lords' decision in Laporte, discussed below, the police had good grounds for thinking that the invocation of powers to prevent a breach of the peace offered them far more scope for intervention in a protest than the statutory powers did. This was especially the case in relation to an assembly rather than a march. But even in relation to a march the statutory powers were far more precise and complex to operate than the common law ones. The three issues identified are taken in turn in the following discussion in relation to pre and post-HRA case law in order to determine how far the common law powers have been kept in check by the courts in relation to protests, especially in the HRA era.

496 This was the case in both Laporte and Austin and Saxby, which are considered below.
497 Ibid.

The leading authority on the question of what is an imminent breach of the peace (which was accepted in the House of Lords in Laporte, discussed below) is Albert v Lavin.[499] That case reflected the trend of existing authority. In Humphries v Connor[500] Fitzgerald J summarised a constable's duty:

> With respect to a constable, I agree that his primary duty is to preserve the peace; and he may for that purpose interfere, and, in the case of an affray, arrest the wrongdoer; or, if a breach of the peace is imminent, may, if necessary, arrest those who are about to commit it, if it cannot otherwise be prevented.

Once it is accepted that an arrest may be made in respect of an apprehended breach of the peace, the question of the necessary degree of immediacy (the first issue identified) arises. A number of authorities establish that the duty to arrest for breach of the peace arises only when the police officer apprehends that a breach of the peace is 'imminent' (O'Kelly v Harvey;[501] Foulkes v Chief Constable of the Merseyside Police)[502] or is 'about to take place' or is 'about to be committed' (Albert v Lavin) or will take place 'in the immediate future' (R v Howell).[503] His apprehension 'must relate to the near future' (McLeod v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis).[504] If the officer reasonably apprehends that a breach of the peace is likely to occur in the near future, the officer's duty is to take reasonable steps to prevent it.

When this power, in conjunction with the offence of obstruction of an officer in the execution of his duty, was used extensively during the miners' strike,[505] it was made clear that an arrest can occur well before the point is reached at which a breach of the peace is apprehended. The most notorious[506] instance of its use occurred in Moss

498 DPP v Jones [2002] EWHC 110. See above p 723.
499 [1982] AC 546.
500 (1864) 17 ICLR 1, 8–9.
501 (1883) 14 LR Ir 105, 109.
502 [1998] 3 All ER 705, 711b–c.
503 [1982] QB 416, 426.
504 [1994] 4 All ER 553, 560F.
505 March 1984 to March 1985.
506 The case has attracted widespread criticism; see Ewing and Gearty, op. cit., fn 1, pp 111–12; Newbold [1985] PL 30.

v McLachlan.[507] A group of striking miners in a convoy of cars were stopped by the police a few miles away from a number of collieries and prevented from travelling on to pits a few miles away where non-striking miners were working. The police officers had reason to believe that violent clashes would break out, not at the motorway exit where their cordon was positioned, but at the pits. The police told them that they feared a breach of the peace if the miners reached the pits and that they would arrest the miners for obstruction if they tried to continue. After some time, a group of miners tried to push past the police, were arrested and convicted of obstruction of a police officer in the course of his duty. Their appeal on the ground that the officers had not been acting in the course of their duty was dismissed. It was said that there was no need to show that individual miners would cause a breach of the peace, nor even to specify at which pit disorder was expected. A reasonable belief that there was a real risk that a breach would occur in close proximity to the point of arrest (the pits were between two and four miles away) was all that was necessary. (A case in Kent in which striking miners were held up over 200 miles away from their destination suggested that this requirement of close proximity might become otiose.)[508] In assessing whether a real risk existed, news about disorder at previous pickets could be taken into account; in other words, there did not appear to be a requirement that there was anything about these particular miners to suggest they might cause a breach of the peace.[509] Thus, a number of individuals were lawfully denied their freedom of both movement and assembly apparently on no more substantial grounds than that other striking miners had caused trouble in the past, without having themselves provided grounds on which violence could be foreseen. Skinner J, giving the judgment of the Divisional Court, also introduced a significant modification to the doctrine. Dealing with the requirement of imminence, Skinner J said,[510] 'The imminence or immediacy of the threat to the peace determines what action is reasonable.' In Minto v Police[511] Cooke P said that 'the degree of immediacy is plainly highly relevant to the reasonableness or otherwise of the action taken by the police officer'. On this approach, a police officer has the power – and duty – to take action short of arrest (such as stopping cars or directing protesters away from a protest) at an earlier stage than that at which he would have the power and duty to arrest persons on the grounds of breach of the peace.

The decision in Peterkin v Chief Constable of Cheshire,[512] taken one year before the HRA came fully into force, took a strongly differing stance. Peterkin, a hunt protester, had access to intelligence that told him when and where the Cheshire Hunt was to meet. He was making his way to the hunt in a convoy of vehicles carrying other protesters

507 [1985] IRLR 76.

508 Foy v Chief Constable of Kent (1984) unreported, 20 March. It has also been noted by Thornton, P Public Order Law, 1987, pp 97–98 that the Attorney General, in a written answer to a parliamentary question tabled during the miners' strike, omitted the requirement of an imminent threat to public order.

509 The miners apparently gave a hostile reception to passing NCB coaches but this, it appears, occurred after the police had stopped them and informed them that they could not proceed. It does not appear, therefore, that it could have formed part of the basis for the police decision that a breach of the peace was to be expected.

510 At p 79, para 24.

511 [1987] 1 NZLR 374, 377.

512 (1999) The Times, 16 November.

when he was arrested for conduct likely to cause a breach of the peace. The arresting officer said that he anticipated that Peterkin and the other protesters would enter private land, causing a serious breach of the peace. Peterkin argued that he was arrested merely for walking on a country lane, half a mile from where the hunt was taking place, and was not in sight of it at the time. He claimed unlawful arrest, false imprisonment and assault and battery against the Cheshire police on the basis that they had no legal grounds for the arrest and therefore any actions used to effect it were unlawful. In awarding damages, Manchester County Court found that there were no such grounds, since there was no apprehension or imminent threat of any breach of the peace.

The highly significant decision of the House of Lords in Laporte did not add much to the established understanding of the meaning of immediacy. However, it did address the question of action that can be taken when a breach is not imminent (the second issue identified above). The stance taken in Moss to the effect that action short of arrest can be taken if a breach of the peace is not imminent was decisively rejected by the House of Lords in Laporte.[513] The case arose in relation to the detention of protesters on a coach which had been turned back by the police from an anti-war demonstration. The House of Lords found, in a seminal decision for freedom of protest and assembly, that the actions of the police in preventing the protesters travelling to the site of the protest and detaining them on a coach travelling back to London, were disproportionate to the aims pursued, in terms of para 2 of Arts 10 and 11. The case arose because the claimant, a peace protester, wanted to protest against the policy and conduct of the UK and US Governments in relation to the Iraq war, and wished to join a protest at RAF Fairford in order to do so. RAF Fairford was used for hostile operations against Iraq, and the base became a focus for protest against the war. A protest group calling themselves Gloucestershire Weapons Inspectors, in conjunction with other anti-war groups, organised a protest demonstration to take place at RAF Fairford in March 2003. As required by s 11 of the 1986 Act, the Gloucestershire Weapons Inspectors gave the Chief Constable the proper written notification of their proposed demonstration. There was to be a rally at the main gate of the base which would last from 1.30–4.0 pm. There were to be several speakers and the numbers attending were estimated at 1,000–5,000.

It was not suggested that Laporte was anything other than entirely peaceful in her conduct. The Chief Constable, as head of the Gloucestershire Constabulary, had overall responsibility for policing the demonstration at Fairford. Various demonstrations had already occurred and on one occasion an otherwise peaceful protest was attended by a hardcore activist anarchist group known as the Wombles (White Overalls Movement Building Libertarian Effective Struggles). This led to serious disorder. Three coaches set off from London to Fairford on the relevant day; the claimant was on one of them. It appeared from the contents of websites advertising the protest that members of the Wombles might be on one of them.

The Chief Constable's plan for the demonstration was to allow it take place peacefully and to minimise the risk of serious public disorder. The Chief Constable decided not to invoke the power and duty under s 13 of the Public Order Act 1986 to seek an order prohibiting all processions in the Fairford area for a period of time.[514] The Chief Constable took a number of other measures as part of a policing operation which was the largest ever undertaken by the Gloucestershire Constabulary. The Chief Constable issued a direction under s 12 of the Act, prescribing (in accordance with the notification) the time, place of assembly and procession route, prescribing where the procession route should end and drawing attention to the criminal offence of failing to comply with the conditions laid down. The Chief Constable promulgated several thousand leaflets, provided to websites advertising the event and (in due course) to protesters, describing the arrangements and warning that those who deviated from the conditions (as by leaving the prescribed route) were liable to arrest. Attention was drawn to the danger of entering military premises. There were to be designated drop-off points, policed by officers, where protesters would get out of their vehicles. The Chief Constable formulated a detailed plan:

513 [2006] UKHL 55, para 34. CA: R (on the application of Laporte) v CC of Gloucester Constab [2004] EWCA Civ 1639. See below for further discussion p 770.

> . . . to control the march and protest from the initial assembly area directing march along the prescribed route as per the attached plan (highlighted) and allowing the protest to take place in the bell-mouth area of the gate, thereby giving them a point of focus. The protest will be allowed until a predetermined time when they will be encouraged to disperse. In order to ensure the protesters keep to the prescribed route, certain minor roads will be closed as per attached plan.

Protesters were to be escorted along the procession route by officers. The Chief Constable considered in his assessment of the protest that the protesters would include hard-line activists intent on violence and entry to the base. Police officers were mustered in large numbers, supported by anti-climbing teams, patrols on both sides of the perimeter fence, dog teams, a member of the Metropolitan Police Public Order Intelligence Unit (to recognise those known to be extreme protestors), a facial recognition team, Forward Intelligence Teams, three Police Support Units ('PSUs') and helicopters. A statutory stop and search authorisation under s 60 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 was issued.[515] It applied to an area around Fairford, and was extended on the following day. An authority under s 60AA of the 1994 Act, giving power to require the removal of disguises, was also issued.

On the day in question the claimant joined a group of about 120 passengers who boarded three coaches at Euston bound for Fairford. Eight members of the Wombles were also on the coaches. The three coaches were stopped by the police at Lechlade near Fairford. The police searched the coaches and found a few items that could possibly have been used in a non-peaceful protest, such as face masks, spray paint, two pairs of scissors and a safety flare, home-made shields. All these articles were seized. It appeared that all or some of the passengers were not questioned about their intentions or affiliations. After the search the coaches and passengers were directed by the officer in charge to be escorted by the police back to London. The officer took the view that had the coaches been permitted to continue to RAF Fairford the protesters on the coaches would have been arrested upon arrival at RAF Fairford, as a breach of the peace would then have been 'imminent'. He stated that he had concluded that he had a choice of either allowing the coaches to proceed and managing a breach of the peace at RAF Fairford, arresting the occupants of the coaches in order to prevent a breach of the peace, or turning the coaches around and escorting them back away from the area in order to avert a breach of the peace. Officers stood by the doors as the coaches moved off, holding them shut to prevent passengers from disembarking, as some had tried to do on learning that they were to be returned to London. The coaches were driven to the motorway, where police motorcycle outriders prevented them from stopping on the hard shoulder or turning off to motorway services, even to allow passengers to relieve themselves.

514 See above, pp 708–9.
515 See Chapter 11, p 1122.

The claimant issued an application for judicial review, seeking to challenge the actions of the Chief Constable in (1) preventing her travelling to the demonstration in Fairford, and forcing her to leave the area, and (2) forcibly returning her to London, keeping her on the coach and preventing her from leaving it until she had reached London. At first instance her first complaint was rejected but her second was upheld.[516] In upholding the claimant's second claim, May LJ concluded that the claimant had been detained on the coach back to London and that such detention could not be held to be covered by Art 5(1)(b) or 5(1)(c) of the Convention. The Court of Appeal (Lords Woolf CJ, Clarke and Rix LJJ) upheld the Divisional Court's decision, dismissing an appeal by the Chief Constable and a cross-appeal by the claimant.[517]

Relying on Sunday Times v United Kingdom (No 2)[518] and Hashman and Harrup v United Kingdom,[519] Lord Bingham found that:

> . . . any prior restraint on freedom of expression calls for the most careful scrutiny . . . . The Strasbourg Court will wish to be satisfied not merely that a state exercised its discretion reasonably, carefully and in good faith, but also that it applied standards in conformity with Convention standards and based its decisions on an acceptable assessment of the relevant facts.[520]

He noted that the protection of the Articles may be denied 'if the demonstration is unauthorised and unlawful' (as in the case of Ziliberberg),[521] or if conduct is such as actually to disturb public order (as in Chorherr v Austria).[522] But he noted this finding in Ziliberberg:

> . . . an individual does not cease to enjoy the right to peaceful assembly as a result of sporadic violence or other punishable acts committed by others in the course of the demonstration, if the individual in question remains peaceful in his or her own intentions or behaviour.[523]

516 The case came before the Queen's Bench Divisional Court (May LJ and Harrison J) [2004] EWHC 253 (Admin), [2004] 2 All ER 874.
517 [2004] EWCA Civ 1639; [2005] QB 678.
518 (1991) 14 EHRR 229, at para 51.
519 (1999) 30 EHRR 241, at para 32.
520 Lord Bingham took this phrase from Christian Democratic People's Party v Moldova, unreported Appl No 28793/02, 14 May 2006, at para 70.
521 Appl No 61821/00, 4 May 2004, unreported.
522 (1993) 17 EHRR 358.
523 At para 2.

The key argument on behalf of Laporte was that subject to Arts 10(2) and 11(2) of the Convention, the claimant had a right to attend the lawful assembly at RAF Fairford in order to express her strong opposition to the war against Iraq. The conduct of the police, in stopping the coach on which the claimant was travelling at Lechdale, and not allowing it to continue its intended journey to Fairford, was an interference by a public authority (s 6 HRA) with the claimant's exercise of her rights under Arts 10 and 11. The burden of justifying an interference with the exercise of a Convention right such as those protected by Arts 10 and 11 was on the public authority which has interfered with such exercise, in this case the Chief Constable. The interference by the Chief Constable in this case was for a legitimate purpose – the interests of national security, for the prevention of disorder or crime or for the protection of the rights of others – but (a) was not prescribed by law, because it was not warranted under domestic law, and (b) was not necessary in a democratic society, because it was (i) premature and (ii) indiscriminate and was accordingly disproportionate. As regards the argument, which is discussed further in Chapter 11,[524] that the Chief Constable's interference was not prescribed by law because it was not warranted by domestic legal authority, it was argued that there is a power and duty resting on constables to prevent a breach of the peace which reasonably appears to be about to be committed. The test is the same whether the intervention is by arrest or (as in Humphries v Connor, King v Hodges and Albert v Lavin itself) by action short of arrest. But it was argued that there is nothing in domestic authority to support the proposition that action short of arrest may be taken when a breach of the peace is not so imminent as would be necessary to justify an arrest. Here, the officer in charge did not think that a breach of the peace was so imminent as to justify an arrest. Counsel for the police relied on Moss v McLachlan,[525] discussed above, in support of an argument that it is not necessary to show that the breach of the peace was so imminent as to justify an arrest. But the House of Lords rejected this argument and accepted that there is nothing in domestic authority to support the proposition that action short of arrest may be taken when a breach of the peace is not so imminent as would be necessary to justify an arrest. Lord Bingham took this view partly on the basis that otherwise the common law doctrine would undermine the 1986 Act:

> Parliament conferred carefully defined powers and imposed carefully defined duties on chief officers of police and the senior police officer. Offences were created and defences provided. Parliament plainly appreciated the need for appropriate police powers to control disorderly demonstrations but was also sensitive to the democratic values inherent in recognition of a right to demonstrate. It would, I think, be surprising if, alongside these closely defined powers and duties, there existed a common law power and duty, exercisable and imposed not only by and on any constable but by and on every member of the public, bounded only by an uncertain and undefined condition of reasonableness.[526]

524 See pp 1142–43.
525 [1985] IRLR 76.
526 Ibid at para 46.

He found that Albert v Lavin had laid down a simple and workable test readily applicable to constable and private citizen alike which recognised the power and duty to act in an emergency to prevent a breach of the peace, and that there would in almost all circumstances be little doubt as to whom to take action against. He further found little support in the authorities for the proposition that action short of arrest may be taken to prevent a breach of the peace which is not sufficiently imminent to justify arrest. Since the police officer in charge did not consider that the claimant could properly be arrested when the coaches were stopped before reaching Fairford, it followed that action short of arrest could not be taken as an alternative. He also did not accept the finding of the Court of Appeal that the present case is 'very much on all fours with the decision in Moss v McLachlan'.[527] He found that Moss carried the notion of imminence to extreme limits, but that it was not unreasonable to view the apprehended breach as imminent. But he considered that the situation in Moss differed greatly from that in the instant case in which 120 passengers, by no means all of whom were or were thought to be Wombles' members, had been prevented from proceeding to an assembly point which was some distance away from the scene of a lawful demonstration. So he concluded that the actions of the police in turning away the passengers on the coach and then detaining them on the coach were not prescribed by law.

Counsel for the claimant also contended that the police action at Lechlade failed the Convention test of proportionality because it was premature and indiscriminate. It was argued that the action was premature because there was no hint of disorder at Lechlade and no reason to apprehend an immediate outburst of disorder by the claimant and her fellow passengers when they left their coaches at the designated drop-off points in Fairford. Since the action was premature it was necessarily indiscriminate because the police could not at that stage identify those (if any) of the passengers who appeared to be about to commit a breach of the peace. Lord Bingham found that it was not reasonable to suppose that the passengers, apart from the Womble members, wanted a violent confrontation with the police. It was also unreasonable, he found, to anticipate that disorder would immediately occur on arrival of the passengers at the protest site. He noted that during that time the police would be in close attendance and able to identify and arrest those who showed a violent propensity or breached the conditions to which the assembly and procession were subject. He found therefore that it was wholly disproportionate to restrict the claimant's exercise of her rights under Arts 10 and 11 because she was in the company of others, some of whom might, at some time in the future, breach the peace.

This decision is broadly in accordance with the stance taken in McLeod v UK,[528] in which it was found that it is insufficient to find that a breach may occur at some future point, but is not immediately probable. In the third edition of this book it was predicted that McLeod would be taken into account in findings as to the application of the breach of the peace doctrine under s 2 HRA and that therefore the stance taken in Peterkin would be likely to prevail. As discussed above, much of the case law is in accordance with McLeod in establishing that (a) an arrest for breach of the peace can only occur when the breach is imminent, meaning – to occur in the near future – and (b) that if it is not imminent action short of arrest cannot be taken. However, in Laporte[529] the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal both adopted the approach in Moss, which allowed for preventive action short of arrest in relation to apprehended breaches of the peace that were not imminent. The House of Lords has now rejected that possibility as representing an illegitimate broadening of the breach of the peace doctrine. In requiring a clear element of immediacy, this decision has created a strong inhibitory rule, not as to the powers that can be invoked under this doctrine, but as to the point at which it can be invoked. However, the Lords could have made a clearer pronouncement on the requirements of immediacy. They accepted that Moss took a somewhat lax view of what could be termed imminent, but did not reject that view. The Lords also accepted that preventive action short of arrest can be used under this doctrine where an arrest could be made for an imminent breach of the peace. Thus the police still retain wide powers under this doctrine to interfere with the actions of protesters so long as the element of immediacy is present. That element has to be judged by the officer on the ground who may well take a very broad view of what constitutes an imminent breach of the peace. When such a view is taken it is unlikely in practice that decisions to, for example, disperse protesters or impede them in travelling to the site of the protest will ever be challenged in court, and the impact of the protest will merely be diminished. Nevertheless, this decision is likely to have some impact in protest situations in which it would be very difficult to argue that a breach of the peace was imminent.

527 At para 45 of the judgment.
528 (1998) 27 EHRR 493, RJD 19998-VII 2774, Judgment of the Court, 23 September 1998.

This judgment took ss 2 and 6 HRA seriously. The Strasbourg jurisprudence was quite closely analysed and the facts in question were subjected to close scrutiny under the doctrine of proportionality. The very real possibility that the common law could undermine a carefully crafted statutory scheme was recognised and, at least to an extent, avoided. Interestingly, the actions of the police were found not only to be disproportionate to the aim pursued, they were also found not to be prescribed by law. The starting-point was the significance of upholding rights to protest. Laporte has offered a check to further development of the doctrine of breach of the peace and has recognised the 'constitutional shift' that the HRA has brought about in this context. Had the judgment gone the other way, it would have left intact a position whereby the police had carte blanche to order peaceful protesters away from the scene of a protest, stop cars proceeding to it, and detain persons, without arresting them, whenever a few of the protesters appeared likely to cause disorder or were causing it. That would have continued to render much of the Public Order Act 1986, as amended, effectively redundant, since it would continue to be unnecessary in most circumstances, to rely on ss 12 and 14. It would also have undermined the arrest power under s 24 PACE,[530] and the safeguards for arrest contained in PACE and in Code of Practice G, since in public order situations police could have continued to decide merely to use common law powers to detain short of arrest.

But the impact of Laporte must not be over-stated. It curbed the use of common law powers only where a breach of the peace could not be said to be imminent. A range of interventions, including arrest or action short of arrest, is still available to the police so long as it can be said that a breach of the peace is imminent. Thus the statutory scheme is still highly likely to be marginalised. If a large group of protesters appears to the police to contain some unruly, or aggressive, or potentially aggressive, elements, the police appear, post-Laporte, to retain very broad powers to intervene. This point brings this discussion to the third issue identified above, which arose in the highly controversial case of Austin and Saxby v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.[531] The decision concerned a political demonstration against capitalism and globalisation that was organised in the heart of the West End of London on May Day 2001. Publicity material had given the police reason to believe that it would begin at 4 pm, but in fact it started two hours earlier. About 3,000 people had gathered in Oxford Circus and thousands more in the surrounding streets. The protest was made up of disparate groups, some of whom, according to police intelligence, had been involved in violent acts during protests in the past. The first claimant, Austin, took part in the demonstration and made political speeches using a megaphone. The second claimant, Saxby, had come to London on business and had inadvertently become caught up in the crowd. The police faced a difficult public order situation, and stated that they had been taken by surprise by the timing of the demonstration; in order to prevent a breakdown of law and order, they detained thousands of demonstrators for about seven hours by forming a cordon around them. The cordon was absolute, in that persons were completely trapped in the area for the whole seven-hour period in cold and uncomfortable conditions and without recourse to any facilities. The police planned to release the crowd slowly, but this was hindered, according to the police evidence, by some outbreaks of disorder or violence either from the trapped group or from persons outside the cordon. It was considered unsafe to release groups but a few individuals were released because, for example, they were suffering panic attacks. The claimants asked to be released but were refused on the ground that some protesters were threatening a breach of the peace. The claimants had not created a threat; nor had they provoked others. They remained peaceable throughout the period.

529 [2004] EWCA Civ 1639; [2005] QB 678.
530 See Chapter 11, pp 1144–45.

The claimants brought a claim for damages, alleging false imprisonment and also deprivation of liberty, contrary to Art 5, ECHR, raising the claim under s 7 HRA. Some 150 other persons trapped that day had given notice of, or commenced, legal proceedings for damages against the Commissioner. The two cases of the claimants, Austin and Saxby, were not strictly test cases, but the decisions on the issues arising in the two cases were considered by the judge to enable most, if not all, of the other claims to be settled by agreement. The issues under the tort action and under Art 5 were dealt with separately since the judge found that different factors were relevant in both claims. He found that in a claim for false imprisonment the burden of proof rested on the claimant to prove the imprisonment and on the defendant to prove the justification for it. If the detention fell within Art 5, the burden of proof, he found, lay on the defendant to bring the case within one of the exhaustive list of exceptions to Art 5(1), but if the question was whether the detention fell within Art 5(1) the burden was on the claimant.

The judge noted that in HL v United Kingdom,[532] the Strasbourg Court had explained that the meaning of imprisonment in the tort is not the same as the meaning of deprivation of liberty in Art 5. It had held that, as Chapter 2 pointed out, the distinction for the purposes of Art 5 between a deprivation of, and restriction upon, liberty is merely one of degree or intensity and not one of nature or substance.[533] The House of Lords (in R v Bournewood Community and Mental Health NHS Trust ex p L, the domestic case that was then considered at Strasbourg*)*[534] had considered the question from the point of view of the tort of false imprisonment, and considerable emphasis had been placed by the domestic courts on the fact that the applicant was compliant and had never attempted, or expressed the wish, to leave. The Court found, however, that the right to liberty is too important in a democratic society for a person to lose the benefit of Convention protection for the single reason that he may have given himself up to be taken into detention,[535] especially when it was not disputed that that person was legally incapable of consenting to, or disagreeing with, the proposed action. The Court went on to find that the applicant was of unsound mind within Art 5(1)(e), but that there had been a violation of Art 5(1)[536] due to the absence of procedural safeguards designed to protect against arbitrary deprivations of liberty on grounds of necessity. So, as the judge in the instant case noted, the position was that the tort, and the claim under s 6 HRA and Art 5, although both concerned with liberty, are using that term in different senses. He considered that a claim could fail under the tort, but succeed under Art 5, and vice versa. It may be noted that it would arguably have been open to the judge to import the Convention concept of deprivation of liberty into the tort of false imprisonment under s 6 HRA, thus – in relation to the concept of imprisonment – aligning the tort with Art 5, but that having briefly considered this, he did not do so.[537] He accepted that the tort must not be interpreted inconsistently with Art 5, under s 6. Clearly that would mean, under s 6, that a claim could not succeed under Art 5 but fail under the tort, although the converse would be possible.

531 [2005] HRLR 20; 2005 WL 699571 (QBD), (2005) 155 NLJ 515; (2005) The Times 14 April, 699, 571, [2005] EWHC 480; 23 March 2005, Queen's Bench Division of the High Court.

532 Appl No 45508/99.

There were other relevant factors, including that of the application of ss 11, 12 and 14 POA 1986; the consideration of those sections in the case is discussed further above.[538] It may be noted that the police did not state at the time in question that they were relying on ss 12 or 14; nor did they mention the sections in their written submissions on the case. The possible application of the sections was raised by the judge in the case, and it was found that the police could be viewed as imposing conditions under the sections even though they did not have them in mind at the time and appeared to consider that they were exercising common law powers only to control the protest. It was found that conditions were properly imposed under ss 12 or 14 on the march and were breached. It was also found that s 11 was breached since the organisers had not given the correct time of the march in the notice. The breach of s 11 appeared to influence the judge in relation to the breach of the peace and Art 5 issues. Neither 533 Guzzardi v Italy judgement of November 6, 1980, Series A no.39, at para 92 and Ashingdane v UK (1985) 7 EHRR 528, at para 41. See also Chapter 2 pp 52–53 for brief discussion of the concept of deprivation of liberty.

534 [1999] 1 AC 458.

535 De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp v Belgium (judgement of June 18, 1971, Series A no 12, paras 64–65.

536 At para 124.

537 See the discussion of the impact of the Convention under the HRA on the common law, Chapter 4, pp 252–56.

538 See pp 703 and 722–23.

claimant, however, was an organiser and there appeared to be no evidence that Austin, who was part of the demonstration, was aware of the breach. Saxton obviously could not have been aware of it. The judge appeared to view the march as unlawful since the notice requirement had been breached and therefore viewed Austin as deliberately taking part in an unlawful march. However, as discussed above, s 11 provides a notice requirement; it does not require that marches should be authorised by the authorities. The organisers can incur liability under s 11(7) if the requirement is breached, but the participants can not, even if they are aware of the breach, and the march in general is not rendered unlawful.

The case raised the question, if the detention of the claimants fell within Art 5(1), whether Art 5(1)(c) in particular was capable of authorising the detention of individuals whom the police neither suspected of criminality nor – it appeared – intended to bring before a court on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence or to prevent them doing so. Once the cordon was lifted and dispersal occurred, it did not appear from the evidence of both sides that any consideration at all was given to arresting Austin or Saxby. When they asked to be allowed to leave earlier they were not told by police that at some point they personally might be arrested.

The claimants argued that Art 5(1) was engaged by a deprivation of liberty short of arrest, especially one that was more than brief.[539] It was found that Art 5(1) applied to the detentions: no one in the crowd was free to leave without permission; the detention was sufficient physically to amount to a deprivation of liberty. The measure was a close confinement, with minimal liberty, in Oxford Circus; so the detention was a deprivation of liberty, rather than a restriction. If the only reason why police had detained the crowd had been to take temporary measures for the protection of members of the crowd themselves, this would not, it was found, amount to a deprivation of liberty. However, this was not found to be the case, and so there was a deprivation of liberty within Art 5(1).

The detention was imposed, the judge then found, with the conditional purpose of arresting those whom it would be lawful and practicable to arrest and bring before a judge, and to prevent such persons as might be so identified from committing offences of violence. This was found to be capable of falling within Art 5(1)(c). In order to fall within Art 5(1)(c) the police had to be exercising a lawful power. It was found that powers to prevent a breach of the peace do not depend upon the threat of violence and that there was a power of temporary detention for so long as was necessary to protect the rights of others and consistent with public safety.

The judgment is not entirely clear, but essentially it proceeded on the basis that the police actions could be justifiable under Art 5(1)(c) on the ground that the detention was effected partly in order to arrest some persons at some future point on grounds of breach of the peace. The claimants relied on the finding in Lawless v Ireland (No.3)[540] that persons detained must be brought before the court in all cases to which Art 5(1)(c) refers. Their counsel also relied on Guzzardi v Italy,[541] Fox, Campbell and Hartley v

539 Guenat v Swizerland, Appl No 24722/94 (1995) 810A DR 130; Hojemeister v Germany 9179/80 on July 6, 1981 were relied on. The domestic case of DPP v Meaden [2003] EWHC 3005 (Admin); [2004] 1 WLR 945 was also relied upon.

540 (1961) 1 EHRR 15 at paras 13–14.

541 (1980) 3 EHRR 333 at para 102.

UK,[542] and Berktay v Turkey[543] for the proposition that the suspicion has to relate to the person detained and to a concrete and specific offence. It was argued on behalf of the police that if the detainee is not taken before a court, but is released instead, then Art 5(1)(c) may be satisfied on the basis that the police had a 'conditional' purpose to arrest.[544] The test for deciding whether a measure short of arrest could lawfully be taken against a given individual was, it was found, reasonable suspicion that that individual was presenting the relevant threat. It may be noted that the two claimants were trapped within the cordon for a total of seven hours and during that time, on the evidence, committed no act that could be interpreted as meaning that they themselves were about to breach the peace. Saxby was – in effect – not in the company of the protesters voluntarily.

In assessing the preventive action that can be taken against persons who do not threaten to breach the peace, the judge relied on the Court of Appeal decision in Laporte; it was held:

> The important feature to note about the ability to take preventive action is that its justification is not derived from the person against whom the action is taken having actually committed an offence, but based upon a need to prevent the apprehended breach of the peace. In some situations, preventing a breach of the peace will only be possible if action is taken which risks affecting a wholly innocent individual.[545]

The judge found that in R v Jones and Mirrless,[546] mere voluntary presence which in fact encouraged the principal was not enough; nor was mere voluntary presence coupled with a secret intention to assist, if required. He said that none of the cases make it clear whether mere voluntary presence, which in fact encourages the principal, and which is intended to do so, is sufficient, but he found that this should be the case and that that conclusion was consistent with the leading case of R v Coney on the point.[547] He found that the voluntary presence of a defendant as part of a crowd engaged in threatening behaviour over a period of time and/or distance was sufficient to raise a prima facie case against him on a charge of threatening behaviour, notwithstanding the absence of evidence of any act done by himself.[548] The court commented that a high degree of respect should be shown towards a police officer's assessment of the risk of what a crowd might do were it not contained, whilst also bearing in mind individuals' human rights.

542 (1990) 13 EHRR 157 at para 34.

543 Appl No 22493/93 March 1, 2001 at para 199.

544 The defence relied on Brogan v UK (1988) 11 EHRR 11 in which it was found at paras 52–53 that a 'conditional' purpose can suffice to bring a case within Art 5(1)(c).

545 (Laporte) v Chief Constable of Gloucestershire Constabulary [2004] EWCA Civ 1639; [2005] All ER 473; [2005] HRLR 6 at para 48.

546 65 Cr App R 250, CA (following R v Allan [1965] 1 QB 130, 47 Cr App R 243, CCA.

547 (1882) 8 QBD 534, CCR (non-accidental presence at an unlawful prize-fight capable of being encouragement); he also found it consistent with Wilcox v Jeffrey [1951] 1 All ER 464, DC (intentional encouragement in fact by voluntary attendance at a concert performance known to be unlawful).

548 Allan v Ireland, 79 Cr App R 206, DC.

The judge further found that there was a public procession or assembly being held at Oxford Circus at 2 pm and the senior police officer reasonably believed that it might result in serious public disorder, serious damage to property, or serious disruption to the life of the community. The claimants argued that those powers could not provide a power to detain people, and could not be relied on after the event if not relied on at the time. But the judge found that directions pursuant to ss 12 and 14 POA were given, and the fact that none of the officers had the sections in mind was, the judge found, immaterial. The directions imposed conditions prohibiting the procession from entering any public place specified. Those directions, the judge found, were necessary to prevent disorder, damage, disruption or intimidation, and the police had reasonable grounds to take this view.

The judge noted that it appeared to the officers detaining each claimant that a breach of the peace was about to be committed. The judge found that whilst this inference could be properly drawn in the instant case, it was unlikely to be capable of being drawn in all crowd cases. It was found that the police also have a right, and perhaps a duty, to take measures short of arrest, sometimes called self-help, when there is unlawful conduct which does not amount to a breach of the peace. (In so far as this finding formed a part of the part of the judgment, it has now been overruled by the House of Lords' judgment in Laporte.) The limits on these common law powers, he noted in passing, are by no means clear.

The measures that the officers took – in containing the claimants in Oxford Street – were found to be reasonable steps to prevent each claimant from breaking or threatening to break the peace. In determining reasonableness the judge took account of the fact that members of the assembly were in breach of the conditions imposed under ss 12 or 14 of the 1986 Act, although there had been no advertence to the imposition of conditions under the Act by the police. The judge did not make this entirely clear, but appeared to indicate that the police detention of the assembly related to the breach of ss 12 or 14. That would have to presuppose that one of the conditions that could be imposed under ss 12 or 14 was to detain the assembly for a substantial period of time. Leaving aside the question whether the police can invoke conditions under either ss 12 or 14 without adverting to those powers, or communicating their use to the protesters, that finding is doubtful since once the march becomes a static assembly it is subject to s 14 which does not, on its face, allow for detention of the assembly, and case law has established that the condition must be imposed under the right section.[549] However, as discussed above, the judge found that s 14 could be interpreted to include a power to impose detention.[550]

In assessing whether an arrest of the applicants, if undertaken, would have been reasonable, the judge noted that it is now recognised that 'domestic courts must themselves form a judgment whether a Convention right has been breached' and that 'the intensity of review is somewhat greater under the proportionality approach' [than under the Wednesbury approach].[551] In relation to the intensity of scrutiny, the judge found that the Court should accord a high degree of respect for the police officers' appreciation of the risks of what the members of the crowd might have done if not contained. At the same time he found that the Court should subject to a very close scrutiny the practical effect which derogating measures have on individual human rights, the importance of the rights affected, and the robustness of any safeguards intended to minimise the impact of the derogating measures on individual human rights. The judge found that when each claimant came forward and asked to be released, the police did suspect that all those present within the cordon, including each claimant, were demonstrators, and that in the particular circumstances of the case, that meant that they also appeared to the police to be about to commit a breach of the peace.[552] The judge accepted the police evidence that it was not possible to differentiate between violent and non-violent demonstrators in order to determine who could in principle be subject to arrest. The judge held that the burden of proof was on the claimants to show that the exercise of the discretion to detain was unreasonable, either to the Wednesbury threshold, or to a more intense level of scrutiny.

549 See DPP v Jones (2002), above p 723.

550 See pp 722–23.

551 R (Daly) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2001] UKHL 26, [2001] 2 AC 532; [2001] HRLR 49, paras 23, 27.

So, in summary, the detention of the claimants amounted to a breach of Art 5 but, it was found, it was justified because they appeared to the police to be protesters and, as such, might commit a breach of the peace. The detention was imposed with the conditional purpose of arresting those whom it would be lawful and practicable to arrest and bring before a judge, and to prevent such persons as might be so identified from committing offences of violence. It appeared to the officers detaining each claimant that each one, as members of the demonstration, was about to commit a breach of the peace and, the judge found, it so appeared on reasonable grounds. So the detention was found to be justified under Art 5(1)(c). On the basis of the use of the breach of the peace doctrine, taking account of the breach of s 12 or s 14, the claims of breach of Art 5 were found to fail in respect of both claimants.

It was further found, in relation to the claim of false imprisonment, that the claimants had been imprisoned within the cordon, but that the police had a defence of necessity in so trapping them, which defeated the false imprisonment claim. In putting forward that defence, it was found that the police had to show that they reasonably suspected that the claimants presented a relevant threat and that it had been reasonable to use their discretion to detain them. The existence of the defence of necessity in tort had been affirmed by the House of Lords in Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Southport Corp.[553] The police, it was found, can take measures for the protection of everyone, and a reasonable measure taken in this instance, involving minimum use of force, was, it was found, to detain the crowd until dispersal could be arranged safely. The claimants argued that there were alternative and less restrictive measures open to the police and that therefore the police had acted negligently, defeating the defence of necessity. This was rejected by the judge on the basis that in the difficult circumstances the police had acted reasonably. The need to take the action of creating the cordon did not arise out of any negligence on the part of the police, it was found. The claimants, he found, as members of the crowd, would, if not subject to police control, have presented as much of an innocent threat to other members of the crowd as every other innocent member presented to them. He found that one of the reasons for which the police took the contested actions was to prevent serious injury, and possible death, to persons for whom they were responsible, including police officers, members of the crowd and third parties, as well as to protect property.

552 At para 129.
553 [1955] 3 All ER 864, [1956] AC 218.

The judge concluded by saying that no case was advanced at the trial to the effect that the police were adopting tactics designed to interfere with rights of assembly and freedom of speech. He ended by stating that the case was about the right to liberty, and public order, and not about freedom of speech or freedom of assembly.[554]

This is a very significant and very worrying judgment for public protest. It means that the police can use this doctrine against protesters in order to: arrest them; detain them for several hours, without arresting them; or to stop an assembly or march or divert it or to disperse most or all of it. The power to do all this arises if some members of the group have been involved in disorder in the past, or intelligence suggests that this is the case, or if some members are disorderly, or appear likely to become disorderly. The 'conditional purpose' to arrest some persons is sufficient to allow the power of prolonged detention to be exercised, even if in the event no attempt to arrest those detained is made or – it appears – even considered. These powers are so broad that the use of the statutory scheme under the 1986 or 1994 Acts becomes almost irrelevant. In most circumstances all the ss 12 or 14 powers can be exercised by way of the breach of the peace doctrine. The degree of deference accorded to the police in this judgment makes it very difficult to assess after the event the risk in fact posed at the time by protesters. The situation was particularly volatile, but the judgment came very close to suggesting that taking part in any protest during which a few protesters were disorderly, or showed a propensity to disorder, could render all members of the protest liable to all the powers listed, and a range of other ones as well. For example, as the protesters (and any bystanders, such as Saxby, trapped with them) were allowed to filter through the cordon, names and addresses were taken and they were filmed.

The key point, it is argued, at which this judgment fell into error was in finding that if protesters are in the company of other protesters who are disorderly or may become disorderly, even though they themselves have shown no propensity at all to disorder over a long period of time, they become liable to detention or arrest. It is argued that that finding is completely opposed to the spirit of Art 5 (and Arts 10 and 11), and that a notional, tokenistic 'conditional purpose to arrest' on that basis is not sufficient to justify the detention under Art 5(1)(c), given the strong findings in Guzzardi v Italy,[555] Fox, Campbell and Hartley v UK,[556] and Berktay v Turkey[557] as to the need for suspicion of a specific offence relating to the person in question. The specific 'offence' would have to be breaching the peace, but it is greatly stretching the definition from Howell to find that protesters such as Austin who have behaved entirely peacefully throughout the whole period of time can be said to be liable to arrest for that 'offence'. A fortiori those remarks can be applied to bystanders such as

554 At paras 607 and 608.
555 (1980) 3 EHRR 333 at para 102.
556 (1990) 13 EHRR 157 at para 34.
557 Appl No 22493/93 March 1, 2001 at para 199.

Saxby who are only in the company of the protesters because they have been forced into it by the police! Saxby could not have been said to have encouraged those breaching the peace by his presence or as intending to do so since he was not part of the protest. Clearly, he, in common with the others, was annoyed at being trapped by the police – although he remained peaceful – but that was a consequence of the actions of the police, not part of encouragement to others to engage in disorderly or violent protest. Austin's only 'offence' was to take part in a protest during which some people, not the majority, were disorderly or aggressive. It is argued that the police had ample opportunity – seven hours in total, or more – to observe the behaviour of the protesters and could have made greater efforts to allow some persons to leave, differentiating between peaceful and non-peaceful protesters in so doing. Article 5 was breached, it is argued, at some point during those seven hours in relation to both Austin and Saxby. It was, it is contended, breached at the point when an argument that they personally could be liable to arrest at some future point would have become implausible had even superficial inquiries been made. Both Austin and Saxby communicated with police about their circumstances; that could have been the point at which both should have been allowed to leave, in a carefully controlled dispersal from the Square. After that point had come and passed, the continued detention, it is argued, breached Art 5 and damages should have been awarded that reflected the length of that period.

The House of Lords' decision in Laporte differs greatly from this one in its treatment of the Convention dimension. It takes the Convention rights in question more seriously and adopts a stricter level of scrutiny in relation to the judgments of the officers at the time. The situations in the two instances were roughly comparable in certain respects, in that in each officers chose to detain protesters on grounds of apprehension of breach of the peace rather than arresting them or allowing them to proceed with the protest. In each instance completely peaceful protesters were engaged in a protest in the company of a small number of disorderly or potentially violent protesters, and in each instance this led to their detention. The House of Lords indicated that the police should have made more effort to distinguish between peaceful and non-peaceful protesters in exercising powers to prevent a breach of the peace. However, in Laporte the police, crucially, did not think that a breach of the peace was imminent, although they thought one might arise if the protesters continued, whereas in Austin and Saxby it appeared that the police did think that a breach was imminent at the point when the detention occurred. The House of Lords' decision merely limited the use of the immense panoply of powers available under the breach of the peace doctrine to situations where the imminence of the breach of the peace would warrant arrest. Since in Austin the police appeared to take the view that they could have made arrests at the entrance to Oxford Square, the outcome of the decision is not out of harmony – except on the point noted above – with that of the House of Lords. Therefore most of the findings in Austin still stand, despite the later House of Lords' decision in Laporte.

The judge considered that Arts 10 and 11 were not engaged in this instance since Saxby was not seeking to exercise rights under those Articles on that occasion and Austin had already had an opportunity to exercise them. She had used her loudspeaker to broadcast political messages before the march arrived at Oxford Square and thereafter for a period. When she was told that she could not leave and was imprisoned in the cordon she used her loudspeaker to comfort those who were trapped in the Square. It is, however, argued that the judge's conception of the exercise of Art 10 and 11 rights was a very narrow one. Austin was tramelled as to the place and time that she could exercise those rights and the situation in which she could exercise them. The messages she could broadcast were circumscribed by the situation. Austin's intentions in joining the protest would have been to exercise the rights as part of the march, when they could have been publicised more effectively to passers-by, not as part of a group of prisoners trapped by the police on one spot in very uncomfortable conditions. Further, the judgment – which confirms and extends already very broad powers – is not in harmony with the spirit of Arts 10 or 11. If protesters risk arrest or detention when joining protests they may be deterred from doing so.

Was the tort of false imprisonment interpreted consistently with Art 5 in this case? It is suggested that the application of the defence of necessity as interpreted in this case is inconsistent with Art 5 since none of the exceptions in Art 5 cover the defence. In order to align the two, the tort should be reinterpreted to exclude that defence; the position should be that a detention cannot be tortious if a lawful arrest, or a detention short of arrest, based on a clear power, and covered by Art 5(1)(c) (or (b)) has occurred. If the judge considered that apprehension of breach of the peace provided a lawful power to detain for a substantial period without arrest, it is unclear why it was thought that the defence of necessity was relevant in any event.

Austin and Saxby has confirmed that the police have a very wide range of powers to use even against entirely peaceful protesters if a few protesters are or may be disorderly. Clearly, the police are faced with serious difficulties in controlling a protest such as that which occurred on Mayday in 2001. However, trapping 3,000 people for seven hours is a highly unusual event; it has not occurred before or since. That suggests that the police do not normally need to resort to such tactics which of course could be counter-productive. It is suggested that if further powers to control protests are needed Parliament should enact them, in preference to any further distortions of an already very broad common law doctrine, in order to provide a legal underpinning for police action. This judgment gave the impression of trying to find, after the event, legal justification for the police action; in so doing it created a number of extensions to the doctrine. The decision in Laporte may signal to judges that they need to rein in this doctrine rather than extend it, so it is possible that a repeat of decisions such as this one will not occur. The police in Austin could have employed ss 12 and 14 of the 1986 Act against the protest beforehand, but chose not to. Curtailment of this common law doctrine might encourage the police to employ the statutory framework that is already in place in order to manage protests – and Lord Bingham clearly signalled in Laporte, not only that the Convention rights under the HRA had brought about a clear change in the constitutional position of rights to expression and assembly, but that the common law should not be allowed to marginalise or undermine that framework.

Provoking a breach of the peace

Cases such as Moss v McLachlan concerned the use of preventive powers against those who could be viewed as likely to breach the peace at some future point. The courts have taken an equally broad view of conduct which might provoke others to breach the peace. Beatty v Gillbanks[558] established the important principle that persons acting lawfully could not be held responsible for the actions of those who were thereby induced to act unlawfully. However, in Duncan v Jones,[559] a speaker wishing to address a public meeting opposite a training centre for the unemployed, was told to move away to a different street because the police apprehended that her speech might cause a breach of the peace. A year previously there had been some restlessness among the unemployed following a speech by the same speaker. She refused to move away from the centre and was arrested for obstructing a police officer in the course of his duty. On appeal, it was found that the police had been acting in the course of their duty because they had reasonably apprehended a breach of the peace.

The case therefore clearly undermined the Beatty v Gillbanks principle in that the freedom of the speaker was infringed, not because of her conduct, but because of police fears about the possible response of the audience. In the later case of Jordan v Burgoyne,[560] it was found that a public speaker could be guilty of breach of the peace if he spoke words which were likely to cause disorder amongst the particular audience present, even where the audience had come with the express intention of causing trouble. In Wise v Dunning[561] it was found that a breach of the peace would arise if there is an act of the defendant 'the natural consequence of which, if the act be not unlawful in itself would be to produce an unlawful act by other persons'. An extremely wide interpretation of this possibility was accepted in Holmes v Bournemouth Crown Court;[562] an anti-smoking campaigner who held up a placard and shouted anti-smoking slogans, but in no way threatened violence, was arrested on the ground that if he stayed in his position – outside the designated lobbying area at a Conservative Party Conference – a breach of the peace might arise. The finding that in arresting him, the officer had acted in the execution of his duty, was upheld on appeal.

A similar stance was taken in Kelly v Chief Constable of Hampshire[563] which concerned an altercation between a hunt saboteur and a huntsman, resulting in the arrest of the saboteur. According to the Court of Appeal, if a constable reasonably believes that a breach of the peace is about to occur due to a dispute, he may arrest one of the participants: he has complete discretion as to which participant to arrest, and this may even be the case where the evidence suggests that the one not arrested has committed an assault on the other.[564] In other words, the victim of the assault may be arrested to prevent a fight between the two from breaking out.

In Percy v DPP,[565] Collins J ruled: 'The conduct in question does not in itself have to be disorderly or a breach of the criminal law. It is sufficient if its natural consequence would, if persisted in, be to provoke others to violence.'[566] Similarly, in Morpeth Ward 558 (1882) 9 QBD 308.

559 [1936] 1 KB 218; for comment, see Daintith, T [1966] PL 248.
560 [1963] 2 QB 744; [1963] 2 All ER 225, DC. It should be noted that the case was concerned with breach of the peace under the Public Order Act 1936, s 5.
561 [1902] 1 KB 167. See also Duncan v Jones [1936] 1 KB 218.
562 (1993) unreported, 6 October 1993, DC; cited in Bailey, Harris and Jones, op. cit., fn 1, p 256.
563 (1993) The Independent, 25 March.
564 Obiter comment from Lloyd LJ. The huntsman had assaulted Kelly with his whip.
565 [1995] 3 All ER 124, DC.
566 Ibid, p 131.

JJ ex p Ward,[567] which concerned the behaviour of protesters against pheasant shooting, Brooke J stated: '. . . provocative disorderly behaviour which is likely to have the natural consequence of causing violence, even if only to the persons of the provokers, is capable of being conduct likely to cause a breach of the peace.'[568] Thus, the reasonableness of the shooters' behaviour or potential behaviour was not called into question. The court did not lay down a test to determine the point at which a violent reaction to provoking behaviour might be termed an unnatural consequence of such behaviour. It focused simply on the question whether the natural consequence of the behaviour in question was to provoke violence, thus leaving open the possibility that an extreme reaction from those provoked, although probably unreasonable, might be termed natural. The reasonableness of the shooters' behaviour or potential behaviour (one of the shooting party had threatened to kill a protester) was not called into question. The response of the shooters was viewed as the natural and probable consequence of the protest; the attribution of responsibility for the apprehended breach of the peace on the basis of proportionality between the provocation and the reaction was avoided.

This very wide finding received a more restrictive interpretation in Nicol v DPP,[569] which concerned the behaviour of fishing protesters. During an angling competition the protesters blew horns, threw twigs into the water and attempted verbally to dissuade the anglers from fishing. This provoked the anglers so that they were on the verge of using force to remove the protesters. The protesters were arrested for breach of the peace. It was found that they were guilty of conduct whereby a breach of the peace was likely to be caused since their conduct, although lawful, was unreasonable and was likely to provoke the anglers to violence. Thus, the reasonableness of the behaviour of those provoked was considered. Simon Brown LJ found that a natural consequence of lawful conduct could be violence in another only where the defendant rather than the other person could be said to be acting unreasonably, and, further, that unless the anglers' rights had been infringed, it would not be reasonable for them to react violently. It was assumed that their rights had been infringed,[570] and that as between the two groups the behaviour of the fishing protesters was clearly unreasonable. The need to show an infringement of 'rights' and the findings as to reasonableness place a limitation on the 'natural consequence' test which was not present in Wise v Dunning. This finding offers some clarification of the 'natural consequence' test although, since there is no right to fish, the rights referred to are unclear. The term 'liberties' rather than 'rights' would have been more appropriate. Possibly in referring to an infringement of rights Simon-Brown J was seeking to distinguish so called direct action from other forms of protest.

It is unclear at present whether the test from Nicol or from Ex p Ward will prevail. Clear adoption of the Nicol test would go some way towards restoration of the Beatty v Gillbanks principle since following it, behaviour which has as its natural consequence the provoking of others to violence will not amount to a breach of the peace unless it

567 (1992) 95 Cr App R 215.

568 Ibid, p 221.

569 (1996) 1 J Civ Lib 75. See further Steel v UK (1999) 28 EHRR 603.

570 The rights referred to were left unclear. There is, of course, in general no right to fish, merely a freedom to do so; fishing rights may be obtained under a contract with the landowner, but this does not appear to have been the case in this instance since the anglers were fishing in a public park.

is also unreasonable. But, of course, the test depends upon a wide and uncertain test of reasonableness; the judiciary may well be disinclined to find that the behaviour of groups espousing minority, 'alternative' viewpoints, such as hunt saboteurs or tree protesters, while lawful, was also reasonable. The decision may well be interpreted to mean that any activities as part of peaceful protest, which may provoke those whose behaviour is the subject of the protest to use force, should be accounted behaviour likely to give rise to a breach of the peace, so long as the protesters can be said to have infringed 'rights'. The judiciary may be disinclined to find that the behaviour of groups such as hunt saboteurs or tree protesters, while lawful, was reasonable.

Adoption of the Nicol test in relation to protest by speech rather than by means of direct action might allow a distinction to be drawn between forceful speech calling the attention of others to arguments, issues or events, and speech which consists of an attack upon the hearers with the intent of causing extreme provocation. The crucial difference should be the verbal attack which renders the speaker directly responsible for awakening hatred and violence. Arguably, the first type of speech should never be restrained, but it may be acceptable to restrain the second when it offers extreme provocation to its hearers.[571] Sections 4, 4A and 5 of the Public Order Act 1986 (below) appear to be aimed only at the latter, deliberately provocative form of speech, although they are not confined to instances of extreme provocation. However, as seen above, the power to prevent a breach of the peace fails to distinguish at present clearly between the two situations.

Bail conditions

Binding over to keep the peace may form part of a bail condition, but bail conditions may be more specific than this. A person charged with any offence may be bailed as long as they promise to fulfil certain conditions.[572] This aspect of criminal procedure can readily be used by the police against protesters or demonstrators; they can be charged with a low level public order offence or bound over to keep the peace, thus allowing the imposition of conditions which may prevent participation in future protest. If the conditions are broken, the bailee can be imprisoned. The Bail Act 1976 requires that applications for bail should be individually assessed in order to determine whether conditions should be imposed, thereby reflecting concern that the bailing procedure should not result in any further deprivation of liberty than is necessary. Despite this, during the miners' strike there was evidence that conditions were being routinely imposed without regard to the threat posed by the individual applicant. The Divisional Court, however, found that such practices were lawful (Mansfield JJ ex p Sharkey).[573]

Impact of the HRA

On the basis of the decisions discussed, the breach of the peace doctrine not only fails to distinguish fully between the forms of protest referred to above, but also makes 571 For comment on this issue, see Birtles, W (1973) 36 MLR 587. For discussion in the context of race hatred, see Chapter 6, pp 497–509.

572 See Feldman, op. cit., fn 1, 1st edn, pp 835–42.

573 [1985] QB 613.

no attempt to inquire into their significance in terms of free expression. The doctrine in itself provides no means of distinguishing between rowdy football supporters and protesters. There is no recognition of the particular need to protect the communicative rights of minority groups, on the basis that their views may find little expression within mainstream speech, or of the likelihood that the provision of such broad police powers, while neutral on their face as between collective and minority standpoints, will tend to bear disproportionately on the latter. The domestic decisions discussed here tend to exhibit an arbitrariness which fuels the general argument that these powers provide the police with an unacceptably wide discretion which is not fully held in check by the courts. Even where cases do not come to court, or where decisions to bind over are overturned on appeal, as in Percy v DPP,[574] the detention of the defendant will have occurred on what is often a flimsy and imprecise legal basis. Post-HRA Laporte established that preventive action short of arrest cannot be used under this doctrine where an arrest could not be made for an imminent breach of the peace. But that is the only sense in which Laporte curbed this very broad doctrine. Within the models indicated above, what further effect could Arts 10 and 11 have on the development of the doctrine of breach of the peace?

As noted above, any interference with freedom of peaceful assembly must be 'prescribed by law' according to Arts 10(2) and 11(2). These words import requirements of certainty and fair warning and therefore under the HRA, the arrest and bind over powers may be reviewed by the judiciary in order to determine whether they meet these standards. The view of the Law Commission is that '. . . binding over falls short of what ought to be two elementary principles of criminal or quasi-criminal law. These require the law to be both certain and readily ascertainable'.[575] However, as indicated above, the actual standards connoted by the words 'prescribed by law' may not be very high, particularly where public order matters are in issue. In Steel and Others v UK,[576] which concerned the arrest and detention of applicants engaged in various forms of public protest, the European Commission on Human Rights took note of the findings of the Law Commission regarding certainty, but, taking account of the notion of varying levels of precision referred to above, it found that 'the concept of "breach of the peace" is sufficiently certain to comply with the notion of "prescribed by law" under Article 10 para 2'.[577] The Court found that the breach of the peace doctrine provided sufficient guidance and was formulated with sufficient precision to satisfy the requirement of Art 5(1)(c) that arrest and detention should be in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law, and that the prescribed by law requirement of Art 10

574 [1995] 3 All ER 124. The case concerned a solitary protester who trespassed at a US military base; it was found that her conduct was likely to give rise to a breach of the peace and, when she refused to be bound over, she was imprisoned. However, on appeal, the Divisional Court found that trained military personnel were unlikely to be provoked into responding to her trespass with violence.

575 Law Commission Report No 222, para 4.16. The Law Commission relied in part on the failure of these powers to meet the standards laid down by the European Convention on Human Rights.

576 (1999) 28 EHRR 603.

577 Para 148. Usually, Strasbourg will find a violation of the 'prescribed by law' requirement only where the interference has no legal basis: Malone v UK A 82 (1984) 7 EHRR 14; Halford v UK [1997] IRLR 471. But, exceptionally, in Hashman and Harrup v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 104, a basis in law was present but did not satisfy the requirements of this test; discussed above, pp 751–52.

was also satisfied.[578] In McLeod v UK,[579] the Court found that the breach of the peace doctrine was 'in accordance with the law' under Art 8. Thus, in respect of the key elements of 'prescribed by law' – legal basis, certainty and accessibility – the breach of the peace doctrine meets Strasbourg standards. The House of Lords was not directly confronted with this question in Laporte; it merely found that the use of powers short of arrest to deal with non-imminent breaches of the peace were not prescribed by law. The Lords impliedly took the stance that the power to arrest for an imminent breach is prescribed by law. Within the 'minimalist' model it is almost inconceivable that domestic courts will seek to import higher standards under the 'prescribed by law' rubric. Within the 'activist' model, however, this might occur on the argument that the findings in question in McLeod depended on the application of relatively low standards of precision and accessibility.

Clearly, reappraisal and reform of the doctrine of breach of the peace is far more likely to occur by reference to the notion of what is 'necessary in a democratic society' within Arts 10 and 11 para 2, which includes the need to show that the action taken was proportionate to the aim pursued. This issue was extensively considered by the Court in Steel v UK, but the findings were quite strongly influenced by the doctrine of the margin of appreciation.[580] The first applicant had taken part in a protest against a grouse shoot and had stood in the way of participants to prevent them taking shots. Since this behaviour was likely to be provocative, the Court found that her arrest and detention, although constituting serious interferences with her freedom of expression, could be viewed as proportionate to the aim of preventing disorder and of maintaining the authority of the judiciary,[581] and this could also be said of her subsequent detention in the police station for 44 hours,[582] bearing in mind the findings of the police or magistrates that disorder might have occurred. The Court made little attempt to evaluate the real risk of disorder, taking into account the margin of appreciation afforded to domestic authorities in determining what is necessary to avoid disorder in the particular domestic situation.[583] It may be noted that this conclusion was reached only by a five to four majority; the partly dissenting opinions of Judges Valticos and Makarczyk termed the measures taken against the first applicant, Helen Steel, 'so manifestly extreme' in proportion to her actions during the protest that a violation of Art 10 had occurred. The second applicant had taken part in a protest against the building of a motorway, placing herself in front of the earth-moving machinery in order to impede it. The Court found unanimously that her arrest also could be viewed as proportionate to the aim of preventing disorder, even though it accepted that the risk of immediate disorder was not so high as in the case of the first applicant.[584] The Court accepted the finding of the magistrates' court that there had been such a risk.

578 Steel and Others v UK (1999) 28 EHRR 603.
579 Above, fn 528.
580 This was acknowledged by the Court, para 101.
581 Paras 104 and 107.
582 Para 105. The Commission acknowledged (para 156) 'some disquiet as to the proportionality of a detention of this length' which continued long after the grouse shoot was over.
583 Para 101.
584 Para 109.

The third, fourth and fifth applicants were peacefully holding banners and handing out leaflets outside a fighter helicopter conference when they were arrested for breach of the peace. The Court found that there was no justification for their arrests at all since there was no suggestion of any threat of disorder.[585] A violation of Art 10 was therefore found in respect of those applicants. These findings draw a distinction between the first category of protest and the fourth and fifth forms – symbolic physical action and obstructive action – suggesting that interferences with protest as direct action may frequently fall within the national authorities' margin of appreciation. But, significantly, the findings also make it clear that the fourth and fifth forms constitute expressions of opinion and therefore fall within Arts 10 and 11. This was re-affirmed in Hashman and Harrup v UK.[586]

The stance of the Court in Steel in fact implies less tolerance of peaceful direct action than the stance taken in Nicol, since the Court required only an interference with the rights of others and the possibility of disorder in order to be satisfied regarding proportionality; no added requirement to show that the defendant rather than the other party was acting unreasonably was imposed. The dissenting minority judgments in Steel made an oblique reference to such a comparison in noting that the behaviour of the first applicant, albeit 'extreme', was aimed at preserving the life of an animal.[587] The findings of the Court provide little basis for curbing interference under the breach of the peace doctrine with certain forms of public protest of the direct action type, although they do require a re-structuring of the domestic scrutiny of such interference, which takes the primary right as the starting point. Steel clearly affords the domestic judiciary a wide discretion in interpreting the requirements of the Convention in an analogous case. In evaluating the risks posed by a protest, the courts might tend to adopt notions of deference to decisions of the executive in respect of the possibility of disorder in accordance with the tradition in such cases, and take the view that the courts should be reluctant to interfere with the decision of the police officer or magistrate (as the tribunal of fact) in question. A minimalist approach to Arts 10 and 11 would lead to a similar result. If Steel was simply applied regardless of the influence of the margin of appreciation, little protection would be available for most direct action forms of protest. But following an activist approach, the domestic judiciary, faced with similar facts, but disapplying the margin of appreciation aspects of Steel, would find that the interference was unjustified since their review of the decisions of the police or of magistrates would be less restrained. Within this model, some interferences with freedom of expression would be allowed, where direct action was likely to provoke immediate disorder due to the degree of provocation offered, but the measures taken in response, such as the length of detention, would be much more strictly scrutinised for their proportionality with the aims pursued.

The decision in Steel is of most value in placing the form of protest most deserving of protection, peaceful persuasion, in a specially protected position. Therefore, it is problematic, even within the 'review' or minimalist model, to uphold arrest or bind over decisions in such instances or in cases of the Holmes v Bournemouth[588] type. This

585 Para 110.
586 (2000) 8 BHRC 104; (1999) 30 EHRR 241.
587 Partly dissenting opinions of Judges Valticos and Makarczyk.
588 6 October 1993, unreported, DC.

would be a welcome restriction and clarification of the breach of the peace doctrine but, in terms of protecting public protest, it would achieve no more than Nicol has already done. Both Steel and Nicol leave open leeway for deciding when it should be found that protest, which has some provocative effect, should nevertheless be termed peaceful. In other words, in terms of the categories of protest indicated, their application to the second form of protest – insulting or offensive persuasion – is dependent on the degree of provocation. The findings in Steel impliedly drew a distinction in terms of reasonableness between action which is directly and physically provocative and speech which might have some provocative effect, but which could nevertheless be viewed as part of a peaceful protest. It is not clear that they simply drew a distinction between physical and verbal protest. Such a distinction would fail to take account of forms of hate speech which may be far more provocative to hearers than forms of physical obstruction such as the ones at issue in Steel. Thus, a minimalist approach to Steel would be to confine it to speech which had little provocative effect. In Steel itself, in respect of the successful applicants, there was no evidence that the audience in question – those participating in the fighter helicopter conference – were provoked. A traditionalist approach would be to defer to the opinion of the officer on the ground as to the likelihood that disorder would follow the provocation.

But a more activist approach would be to afford protection to insulting or offensive persuasion or symbolic direct action, following Steel, and this approach would also receive some endorsement from Plattform 'Ärtze fur das Leben' v Austria[589] which adopted a version of the Beatty v Gillbanks[590] approach. Such an approach to the decision in Steel was, in some respects, taken by Sedley LJ in Redmond-Bate v DPP[591] in the period just before the HRA was fully in force. Ms Redmond-Bate and other women, a group of fundamentalist Christians, were preaching forcefully on the steps of Westminster Cathedral. A large crowd gathered, who were angered by their preaching. Fearing a breach of the peace, a police officer asked the women to desist; when they refused, he arrested them. The Divisional Court found that in the circumstances, two questions should be asked of the action of the police officer. First, was it reasonable to believe that a breach of the peace was about to be caused? Secondly, where was the threat coming from? These questions could have been answered by distinguishing the facts from those relating to the successful applications in Steel and bringing them, at the same time, within the rule from Nicol, on the basis that the women did in fact provoke their audience and could have been viewed as acting unreasonably since they continued to preach despite the growing restlessness of the crowd. It could have been said that the natural consequence of the lawful but arguably unreasonable conduct of the women was the provocation of others. Applying Steel, however, the Divisional Court found, in answer to both the questions posed, that there were no sufficient grounds on which to determine that a breach of the peace was about to be caused or, moreover, on which to determine that the threat was coming from Ms Redmond-Bate, bearing in mind the tolerance one would expect to be extended to offensive speech. Sedley LJ said: 'Free speech includes not only the inoffensive, but the irritating, the contentious, the eccentric, the heretical, the unwelcome and the provocative providing it does not tend to provoke violence. Freedom only to speak inoffensively is not worth having.'[592] He went on to find that the Crown Court had correctly directed itself that 'violence is not a natural consequence of what a person does unless it clearly interferes with the rights or liberties of others so as to make a violent reaction not wholly unreasonable'[593] and he emphasised that the court should make its own independent judgment of the reasonableness of the police officer's belief.

589 A 139 (1988), para 32; judgment of 21 June 1988; 13 EHRR 204.
590 (1882) 9 QBD 308, discussed above, p 772.
591 (1999) The Times, 28 July; [1999] All ER (D) 864.

This decision simplified the tests from Nicol of determining which party was acting reasonably where one was provoked to violence and as to which was exercising rights. The key test put forward was one of reasonableness: a breach of the peace will occur where violence was threatened or provoked, in the sense of infringing rights or liberties, unless the provoked party acts wholly – not partly – unreasonably. Sedley LJ then categorised certain of the decisions mentioned above into those where the provoked party was reasonable or unreasonable, in order to offer some guidance on this matter. He placed Beatty v Gillbanks and Percy v DPP in the first category, but, strangely, put Wise v Dunning and Duncan v Jones in the second. In Duncan, there was little evidence on which to base an apprehension of a breach of the peace and it was unclear that persons provoked by the speech in question could be said to have acted reasonably. Thus, although Redmond-Bate applies Steel quite broadly, it still leaves some uncertainty as to the status of provocative speech; the test of reasonableness will be, it is suggested, no more certain in its application than the tests from Nicol and will therefore have some chilling effect on protest.

Indications of a more restrictive domestic approach also come from Bibby v Chief Constable of Essex,[594] which is not a public protest case; it concerned the arrest of a bailiff who was seeking to seize goods. But various requirements were laid down in the findings of the Court of Appeal, which would be of significant applicability in a protest case. The threat to the peace must be real and present in order to justify depriving a person of his liberty when he is not himself at that point acting unlawfully. Following Redmond-Bate, the threat must come from the person under arrest, overturning Kelly. The other conditions confirmed those laid down in Nicol to the effect that the violence provoked must not be wholly unreasonable.

In the post-HRA era, a more activist approach to Steel could afford the substantive rights under Arts 10 and 11 greater weight in cases of persuasive or provocative speech by disallowing interferences with these forms of protest unless incitement to violence or to hatred of racial, religious or sexual groups had occurred. (It may be noted that in Laporte the question of provoking others was not relevant.) A presumption that it is normally unreasonable to be provoked to violence or the threat of it by speech could be imported into the doctrine, a stronger test than the one put forward by Sedley LJ. In response to the finding in Steel that breaching the peace is a criminal offence, it would appear that the courts could create a clearer distinction if a suitable case arises, between conduct likely to cause a breach, allowing for a preventive arrest, and conduct actually amounting to a breach. The former could not, it seems, if Steel is followed on this point, lead to binding over, since no offence has been committed which would allow for this punishment. Since such preventive powers are frequently, although not exclusively, used where the arrestee may cause another to breach the peace, Steel might therefore herald a return to the more minimal interpretation in Howell, leaving the possibility of causing another to breach the peace to the statutory provisions discussed below, in particular ss 5 and 4A of the Public Order Act 1986, which cover much of the same area. Admittedly, ss 5 and 4A, unlike the breach of the peace doctrine, criminalise offensive speech per se without requiring a public order rationale. The 'victim' need only be distressed rather than likely to react violently. However, the nature of the language required for both provisions curtails their ambit, in contrast to the breach of the peace doctrine. Almost all the cases concerning peaceful persuasion discussed above, in which the doctrine was successfully invoked, would fall outside ss 5 and 4A, apart, probably, from Wise v Dunning in which abusive or insulting words or behaviour were used. The peaceful direct action cases of Nicol and Percy probably would not be covered, although they would fall within s 68 of the CJPOA, as discussed above. In other words, if the use of provocative speech requires a legal response at all, such a response should be left to those provisions which lay down a more precise test for liability than the breach of the peace doctrine.

592 Transcript, para 12.
593 Transcript, para 16.
594 (2000) The Times, 24 April.

But such determinations, which would have the effect of greatly narrowing down the doctrine, would not be fully rooted in the application of Steel or other analogous decisions at Strasbourg: they would have to be based largely on an appeal to a notional 'higher' standard of human rights, articulated by the general principles informing the Strasbourg jurisprudence, which might have been adhered to but for the margin of appreciation doctrine.[595] If one of the key principles at stake is the need to protect the communicative rights of minority groups, such as pacifists, animal rights or environmental activists, reliance might be placed, by analogy, on strong pronouncements of the need to protect minority rights and plurality within democracies which, as indicated above, are scattered across the Convention jurisprudence.[596]

6 Criminalising public disorder and anti-social behaviour

Introduction

The criminalisation of low level forms of anti-social behaviour, allowing for curbs to be placed on protests has been a feature of recent public order law. The process was begun under s 5 of the Public Order Act 1986, continued under s 154 of the CJPOA 1994,[597] and was taken further under the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, s 1 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 and s 42 of the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001. These provisions target similar forms of anti-social behaviour which had previously been viewed as too trivial or too imprecise to attract criminal or, in most instances, civil liability. All are aimed at behaviour causing harassment, alarm or distress or, under the 595 E.g., the Court in Handyside v UK (1976) 1 EHRR 737, para 49 found, in a famous passage, that Art 10 is applicable 'not only to ideas that are . . . regarded as inoffensive, but also to those which offend, shock or disturb', although in the particular instance, due to the operation of the margin of appreciation doctrine, the application failed.

596 Above, pp 681–82.

597 Which inserted s 4A into the 1986 Act.

1997 Act, amounting to harassment, and all are targeted at particular social problems, largely unrelated to public protest. Section 5 of the 1986 Act was aimed at the perceived problem of disturbance from football hooligans or late night rowdies; the 1997 Act at the problem of so called 'stalkers'; s 1 of the 1998 Act at anti-social neighbours. Section 41 of the 2001 Act was, however, aimed at the direct action form of protest and, in particular, at the actions of protesters against the use of animals in experiments at Huntingdon Life Sciences. The offences under ss 5, 4A and 4 of the 1986 Act can be charged as racially or religiously aggravated as provided by ss 28 and 31 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 (as amended by s 39 of the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001). The 1998 Act, as amended, introduced a statutory aggravation to a number of offences, including s 5 of the 1986 Act, carrying with it higher maximum penalties. According to ss 28(1)(b) and 31(1)(c) of the 1998 Act, an offence under s 5 of the 1986 Act is 'racially or religiously aggravated' if it is 'motivated (wholly or partly) by hostility towards members of a racial or religious group based on their membership of that group'. Section 18 POA also covers incitement to racial hatred if expressed in threatening or abusive or insulting terms, and the Racial and Religious Hatred Act 2006 has added a new Part 3A to the Public Order Act, to cover incitement to religious hatred expressed in threatening terms. These offences are also applied in the context of a range of media and therefore they are considered in Chapter 6.[598]

Section 5 of the 1986 Act is the most problematic provision in that it catches a very wide range of relatively trivial behaviour. All these provisions, due to their breadth, have a potential application to protest within all the categories indicated above,[599] probably not in all circumstances excluding the first – peaceful persuasion. These offences can be used against various forms of anti-social behaviour, but they can also catch forms of public protest. The HRA is having a significant effect, especially on the application of ss 5 and 4A of the 1986 Act: a key distinction is being created between the application of the offences to hooliganism/rowdiness and to protesters.[600]

Criminalising use of threats, abuse, insults

The offences under ss 5 and 4A of the 1986 Act, as amended, require establishment of a minimal and imprecise actus reus. Section 5 is the lowest level public order offence contained in the 1986 Act and the most contentious, since it brings behaviour within the scope of the criminal law which was previously thought of as too trivial to justify the imposition of criminal liability.[601] It criminalises the person who 'uses threatening, abusive or insulting words or behaviour or disorderly behaviour' or 'displays any writing, sign or other visible representation which is threatening or abusive or insulting' which takes place within the 'hearing or sight of a person likely to be caused harassment,

598 See pp 497–509.

599 See pp 666–67.

600 See: Geddis, A, 'Free Speech Martyrs or Unreasonable Threats to Social Peace? – "Insulting" Expression and Section 5 of the Public Order Act 1986' (2004) Public Law 853; Newman, C, 'Divisional Court: Public Order Act 1986, s 4A: Proportionality and Freedom of Expression' (2006) 70 Journal of Criminal Law 191.

601 For background to s 5, see Law Commission Report No 123, Offences Relating to Public Order, 1983.

alarm or distress thereby'. The word 'likely' imports an objective test into the section: it is necessary to show that a person was present at the scene, but not that he or she actually experienced the feelings in question, although it must be shown that in all the circumstances, he or she would be likely to experience such feelings. In so showing, it is not necessary to call the person in question as a witness. In Swanston v DPP[602] it was found that if a bystander gives evidence to the effect that the 'victim' perceived the threatening, abusive or insulting words, then the court can draw the inference that they were so perceived. There is no need to aim the words or behaviour at a specific individual, so long as an individual can be identified and the inference can be drawn that he or she would have perceived the words or behaviour in question. It was determined in DPP v Orum[603] that a police officer may be the person caused harassment, alarm or distress, but in such instances Glidewell LJ thought it might be held that a police officer would be less likely to experience such feelings than an ordinary person. These two decisions enhance the ease with which this offence may be deployed, as does DPP v Fidler,[604] in which it was found that a person whose own behaviour would not satisfy the requirements of s 5 may be guilty of aiding and abetting this offence if he or she is part of a crowd who are committing it. In the Divisional Court ruling in R v DPP[605] on s 4, which is discussed below, it was found that an insult to a police officer, from a 12-year- old boy (he called the officer, who was arresting his sister at the time, a 'wanker') had not caused distress. The evidence did not establish that the police officer had suffered 'any real emotional disturbance'. Thus the harm caused, or likely to be caused, must be real emotional disturbance. The term 'distress' is used in both ss 5 and 4 and so will be interpreted in the same way, although under s 4 it is necessary to establish that the person concerned actually suffered distress.

Whether the words used were insulting, etc, is a question of fact for the magistrates. The terms used must be given their ordinary meaning: Brutus v Cozens.[606] Following Ambrose,[607] rude or offensive words or behaviour may not necessarily be insulting, while mere swearing may not fall within the meaning of 'abusive'. However, threatening gestures such as waving a fist might suffice. Whether or not the words are insulting is not a purely subjective test and therefore the mere fact that the recipient finds them so will not be sufficient. The House of Lords so held in Brutus v Cozens[608] in respect of disruption of a tennis match involving a South African player by an anti-apartheid demonstrator. Some of the crowd were provoked to violence, but the conduct of the demonstrator could not be described as insulting. The conviction of the defendant under the predecessor of s 4 was therefore overturned. The test appears to be whether a reasonable person sharing the characteristics of the persons at whom the words in question are directed would find them insulting. However, whether or not the speaker knows that such persons will hear the words is immaterial as far as this ingredient of

602 (1997) The Times, 23 January.
603 [1988] 3 All ER 449.
604 [1992] 1 WLR 91.
605 [2006] All ER (D) 250.
606 [1973] AC 854; [1972] 2 All ER 1297; [1972] 3 WLR 521, HL.
607 (1973) 57 Cr App R 538.
608 [1973] AC 854; [1972] All ER 1297; [1972] 3 WLR 521; (1973) 57 Cr App R 538, HL.

s 4 is concerned (Jordan v Burgoyne).[609] It was found in DPP v Fidler[610] that a person whose own behaviour would not satisfy the requirements of s 5 may be guilty as aiding and abetting this offence if he or she is part of a crowd who are committing it.

Post-HRA a key question to be asked, it is contended, is whether to label the words 'insulting', etc in order to criminalise them is a proportionate response to the aim pursued, to prevent crime or disorder or protect the rights of others, under Art 10(2). In Hammond[611] it was found that Art 10 considerations apply when determining whether something is insulting.[612] However, in determining this question it was merely asked whether it was reasonable for the lower court to take the view that the words were insulting. As Geddis argues, the Court only applied the Wednesbury test rather than one of proportionality when considering the magistrate court's conclusion on the question whether the words were 'insulting'.[613] This was the wrong approach. Article 10 should be considered in relation to the actus reus and in relation to the defences of reasonableness in these provisions, which are discussed below. In Dehal[614] the question of proportionality under Art 10 was examined as a free-standing inquiry, but it would have been more appropriate to have considered it in relation to the actus reus (in that instance of s 4A), as indicated, and in relation to the question of reasonableness. This question is returned to below.

Taken at its lowest level, s 5 criminalises a person who displays disorderly behaviour calculated to create harassment. Section 5 was included as a measure aimed at anti-social behaviour generally, but its breadth and vagueness have given rise to the criticism that the police have been handed a very broad power.[615] The criminalisation of speech which causes such low level harm as alarm or distress may be contrary to dicta of the European Court of Human Rights in Müller v Switzerland[616] to the effect that the protection of free speech extends equally to ideas which 'offend, shock or disturb'.[617] Section 5, far from being confined to restraining rowdy hooligans, has been used against political speech. In the so called Madame M case, four students were prosecuted for putting up a satirical poster depicting Margaret Thatcher as a 'sadistic dominatrix';[618] the students were acquitted, but the fact that such a case could even be brought in a democracy is highly disturbing. This was not an isolated use of s 5 against political speech: protesters outside abortion clinics have been prosecuted[619] and, in Northern

609 [1963] 2 QB 744; [1963] 2 All ER 225.

610 [1992] 1 WLR 91; for comment, see Smith, JC [1992] Crim LR 63.

611 [2004] EWHC 69.

612 At para 21.

613 Geddis, A, 'Free Speech Martyrs or Unreasonable Threats to Social Peace? – "Insulting" Expression and Section 5 of the Public Order Act 1986' (2004) Public Law 853 at 865.

614 [2005] EWHC 2154.

615 See comment on s 5 in [1987] PL 202.

616 (1991) 13 EHRR 212.

617 It should be noted that in Brutus v Cozens [1973] AC 854; [1972] 2 All ER 1297; [1972] 3 WLR 521; (1973) Cr App R 538, HL, Lord Reid said that the previous Public Order Act 1936, s 5 was 'not designed to penalise the expressions of opinion that happen to be disagreeable, distasteful or even offensive, annoying or distressing'. The current s 5 offence precisely does cover 'distressing' speech, but use could be made of Lord Reid's dicta to argue that expression of opinions per se should not be criminalised.

618 Thornton, P, Decade of Decline: Civil Liberties in the Thatcher Years, 1990, p 37.

619 DPP v Fidler [1992] 1 WLR 91; DPP v Clarke [1992] Crim LR 60.

Ireland, s 5 has been used against a poster depicting youths stoning a British Saracen with a caption proclaiming 'Ireland: 20 years of resistance'.[620] Similarly, as one commentator noted when the Act was passed: 'In the context of pickets shouting or gesturing at those crossing their picket lines, the elements of this offence will usually be established without difficulty.'[621]

However, the Strasbourg Court indicated recently that Art 10 may not be engaged where the speech in question is offensive on racial or religious grounds since Art 17 of the Convention may apply, depending on the gravity of the attack on the group in question in terms of the Convention rights. Article 17 provides:

> Nothing in [the] Convention may be interpreted as implying for any state, group or person any right to engage in any activity or perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms set forth herein or at their limitation to a greater extent than is provided for in the Convention.

The recent decision in Norwood v UK,[622] took this stance. The applicant, who belonged to the BNP, displayed in the window of his first-floor flat a large poster. . .supplied by the BNP, with a photograph of the Twin Towers in flame, and the words 'Islam out of Britain – Protect the British People' and a symbol of a crescent and star in a prohibition sign.[623] He was convicted in a magistrates' court of the offence under s 5 of displaying 'any writing, sign or other visible representation which is threatening, abusive or insulting, within the hearing or sight of a person likely to be caused harassment, alarm or distress thereby'. He was convicted of having committed the offence in religiously aggravated way. He unsuccessfully appealed his conviction to the High Court;[624] one of the applicant's arguments was that there was no evidence that any Muslim had in fact seen the poster. The High Court rejected this argument on the basis that s 5 does not require that a person should actually experience distress, and found that the restriction upon his freedom of expression right represented by the offence was proportionate to the legitimate aim of protecting the rights of others, given also the fact that the speech arguably fell within Art 17 ECHR.[625] The Strasbourg Court found his application inadmissible; referring to Art 17, the Court found that an attack of this nature against a religious group, linking them to a grave act of terrorism, was not compatible with the values proclaimed and guaranteed by the Convention, notably 'tolerance, social peace and non-discrimination'. The applicant's display of the poster in his window constituted an act within the meaning of Art 17 and therefore it did not enjoy the protection of Arts 10 or 14.

The mens rea requirements of the s 5 offence offers a degree of protection to free expression. Under s 6(4), it must be established that the defendant intended his words, etc, to be threatening, abusive or insulting or was aware that they might be. In DPP v

620 Reported in The Independent, 12 September 1988; mentioned in Ewing and Gearty, op. cit., fn 1, 1990, p 123.

621 Williams, op. cit., fn 1.

622 (2005) 40 EHRR SE11.

623 Ibid at [A].

624 Norwood v DPP (2003) WL 21491815.

625 See Chapter 2 at p 112. For comment on Art 17 in a different context by the House of Lords, see DPP v Collins [2006] UKHL 40.

Clarke[626] it was further found that to establish liability, it is insufficient to show only that the defendant intended or was aware that he might cause harassment, alarm or distress; it must also be shown that he intended his conduct to be threatening, abusive or insulting, or was aware that it might be. Both mental states have to be established independently. Thus, showing that the defendant was aware that he might cause distress was not found to be equivalent to showing that he was aware that his speech or behaviour might be insulting. Applying this subjective test, the magistrates acquitted the defendants and this decision was upheld on appeal. Using this test, it was found that anti-abortion protesters had not realised that their behaviour in shouting anti-abortion slogans, displaying plastic models of foetuses and pictures of dead foetuses would be threatening, abusive or insulting. This decision allows those who believe fervently in their cause, and therefore fail to appreciate that their protest may insult or offend others, to escape liability. It therefore places a significant curb on the ability of ss 5 and 4A to interfere with Art 10 and Art 11 rights. Persons participating in forceful demonstrations may sometimes be able to show that behaviour which could be termed disorderly and which might be capable of causing harassment to others, was intended only to make a point and that it had not been realised that others might find it threatening, abusive or insulting. Once a particular group of protesters has been prosecuted, however, and it has been found, as in Clarke, that others found their protest threatening, abusive or insulting, the subjective element of the mens rea will be in future readily made out, even if the instant prosecution fails. The burden imposed by the subjective test for intention or awareness is to be welcomed, since it means that an offence which strikes directly at freedom of expression and can only doubtfully be justified is harder to make out.

Section 154 of the CJPOA 1994 inserted s 4A into the 1986 Act, thereby providing a new and wide area of liability which to some extent overlapped with s 5. Section 4A of the 1986 Act criminalises threatening, abusive, insulting words or behaviour or disorderly behaviour which cause a person harassment, alarm or distress thereby. Thus, the actus reus under s 4A is the same as that under s 5, with the proviso that the harm in question must actually be caused as opposed to being likely to be caused. As noted above, the Divisional Court ruling in R v DPP[627] will apply – the harm caused will have to amount to real emotional distress. The mens rea differs somewhat from that under s 5, since the defendant must intend the person in question to suffer harassment, alarm or distress. Section 4A provides another possible level of liability with the result that using offensive words is now imprisonable, without any requirement (as under s 4, below) to show that violence was intended or likely to be caused. Like s5 its use against protesters or demonstrators can come into conflict with Art 10 due to its protection for forms of forceful or offensive speech.[628] As discussed in relation to s 5, the actus reus should be considered in terms of proportionality; the court failed to do this in Dehal, which is discussed below, instead examining proportionality as a free-standing enquiry. Section 4 is also subject to a defence of reasonableness, providing a further entry point for Art 10 considerations; this is discussed below.

626 [1992] Crim LR 60.

627 [2006] All ER (D) 250.

628 See Newman, C, (2006) 'Divisional Court: Public Order Act 1986, s 4A: Proportionality and Freedom of Expression' 70 Journal of Criminal Law 191.

Section 4 of the Act covers somewhat more serious behaviour than s 5. It is couched in the same terms except for the omission of 'disorderly behaviour', but instead of showing that a person present was likely to be caused harassment, etc, it is necessary to show 'intent to cause that person to believe that immediate unlawful violence will be used against him or another by any person or to provoke the immediate use of unlawful violence by that person or another or whereby that person is likely to believe that such violence will be used or it is likely that such violence will be provoked'. One or more of these four possibilities must be present. The behaviour in question must be specifically directed towards another person. If the defendant does not directly approach the person being threatened, he or she might be unlikely to apprehend immediate violence. However, there might remain the possibility that the defendant intended his or her words to provoke others to violence against the victim. Under s 6(3), it must also be established that the defendant intended his words, etc, to be threatening, abusive or insulting or was aware that they might be.

It was found in Horseferry Road Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate ex p Siadatan[629] that 'violence' in this context must mean immediate and unlawful violence. The case arose from publication and distribution of The Satanic Verses by Salman Rushdie. The applicants alleged that the book contained abusive and insulting writing whereby it was likely that unlawful violence would be provoked contrary to s 4. On appeal from the decision of the magistrates not to issue a summons against the distributors of the books, Penguin Books, Watkins LJ found:

> We find it most unlikely that Parliament could have intended to include among sections which undoubtedly deal with conduct having an immediate impact on bystanders, a section creating an offence for conduct which is likely to lead to violence at some unspecified time in the future.

The finding that the violence provoked must be immediate, although not necessarily instantaneous, led to dismissal of the appeal. This strict interpretation was confirmed in Winn v DPP[630] and it was made plain that the prosecution must ensure that all the ingredients of the particular form of the offence charged under s 4 are present. The appellant threatened and abused a Mr Duncan who was attempting to serve a summons on him. On appeal, the ingredients of the s 4 offence were considered. It was clear from the provision of s 7(2) of the Act that s 4 creates only one offence; however, it is clear that the offence can be committed in one of four ways. Common to all four are the requirements, first, that the accused must intend or be aware that his words or behaviour are or may be threatening, abusive or insulting (s 6(3), which governs the mens rea requirement) and secondly, that they must be directed to another person. The offence charged included a statement of the required intention and was based on the fourth way it could be committed: that he used threatening and abusive words and behaviour whereby it was likely that violence would be provoked. The charge, therefore, required proof of a likelihood that Mr Duncan would be provoked to immediate unlawful violence and as there was no evidence to that effect, the direction to the justices was that the charge under s 4 should have been dismissed. Had the charge related to the first form of the offence – 'intent to cause that person to believe that immediate unlawful violence will be used against him' – it might have succeeded. It should be noted that such intent must be shown in addition to the mens rea under s 6(3).

629 [1991] 1 QB 260; [1991] 1 All ER 324; [1990] 3 WLR 1006.
630 (1992) 142 NLJ 527.

The decision in Siadatan places a curb on the use of s 4A which might otherwise have occurred under the HRA. As it currently stands, it is clear that the ingredients of this offence relate to a much higher harm threshold than those of ss 4A and 5; therefore, although its use may on occasion be viewed as creating an interference with the Art 10 rights of protesters, the interference is likely to be found to be proportionate to the aim pursued.

Section 5 clearly covers quite trivial forms of harm and therefore can readily be resorted to in a wide range of situations. The sheer number of prosecutions being brought under s 5 conclusively demonstrates that the police are not showing restraint in using this area of the Act. The old s 5 offence under the Public Order Act 1936, an offence with a higher harm threshold,[631] accounted for the majority of the 8,194 charges brought in connection with the miners' strike of 1984. In a survey of 470 public order cases in 1988, conducted that year, in two police force areas, it was found that 56 per cent of the sample led to charges under s 5. Research has also shown that during the period 1986–88, the number of charges brought for public order offences doubled and this was thought to be due not to increased unrest, but to the existence of the new offences, particularly s 5 with its low level of harm.[632]

Harassment

Section 42 of the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001, as amended, allows a constable to give any direction to persons, including a direction to leave the scene where they are outside or in the vicinity of a dwelling, if the constable reasonably believes (a) that they are seeking to persuade a person living at the dwelling not to do something that he/she has a right to do or to do something she/he is not under any obligation to do, and (b) that the presence of the persons (normally protesters) is likely to cause harassment, alarm or distress to the person living at the residence. Disobedience of a direction is an arrestable offence. Section 42 was broadened by amendations introduced under the Criminal Justice Act 2003 Sched 26, para 56. It now includes a provision (s 42(4)) that if a direction is given it will be an offence to return to the vicinity for a specified period, which can be for up to three months. The penalty was increased to a maximum of 51 weeks imprisonment. Section 42 clearly draws on the ingredients of ss 5 and 4, although there are also significant differences. There are also similarities with the offences under s 14C of the 1986 Act and s 69 of the 1994 Act. Section 42 of the 2001 Act is problematic in the sense that it hits directly at peaceful protest – protest that need not be abusive, etc, but is aimed only at persuading. The protesters need have no intention of causing harassment, alarm or distress so long as a constable reasonably believes that the target of the protest might experience those feelings. In catching peaceful protest, this offence comes directly into conflict with Arts 10 and 11. Section 42 can also be viewed as protecting Art 8 rights. However, a court would be expected to consider the extent to which those rights could be said to be at stake and the proportionality of the police response, in using s 42 as opposed to a lesser measure.

631 It was similar to the offence which replaced it (the 1986 Act, s 4).

632 Newburn, T et al., 'Policing the streets' (1990) 29 HORB 10 and 'Increasing public order' (1991) 7 Policing 22; quoted in Bailey, Harris and Jones, op. cit., fn 1, pp 229–30.

Section 41 of the 2001 Act is an offence with a minimal actus reus, as is apparent when it is compared with the requirements of s 5 of the 1986 Act or ss 69 and 68 of the 1994 Act. The requirement that the words or conduct should be abusive, etc, in s 5 is missing; the requirements of ss 69 or 68 that the persons in question should be trespassing and must do something intended to be obstructive or intimidatory or disruptive are also absent. But s 41 is similar to s 69, and a number of the other recent offences discussed in this chapter, in that it conflates the exercise of police powers with the substantive offence. The key limiting requirement is that the persons must be outside or in the vicinity of a dwelling, although the term 'the vicinity' is open to quite a wide interpretation. The need for the introduction of this offence must be questioned, bearing in mind that ss 5 or 4A could be used against intimidation by protesters gathered outside the home of the person targeted. The offence of harassment under the 1997 Act would also be available.

Section 1 of the Protection from Harrassment Act 1997 is available to cover harassment in a broader sense. It defines harassment as a course of conduct which a reasonable person would consider amounted to harassment of another where the harasser knows or ought to know that this will be its effect; s 2 makes harassment an offence. An interim injunction, breach of which is an offence (s 3(6)) punishable by up to five years' imprisonment (s 3(9)), can be obtained under s 3 in civil proceedings. No definition of a course of conduct which might amount to harassment is offered.

Section 1 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 provides a penalty of a maximum of five years' imprisonment for failing to obey an order obtained on the civil standard of proof,[633] an ASBO, forbidding any form of 'anti-social' behaviour,[634] defined under s 1(1)(a) as behaving: 'in an anti-social manner, that is to say in a manner that caused or was likely to cause harassment, alarm and distress to one or more persons' other than those of the same household as the defendant. Any person over the age of nine who behaves n this manner can be the subject of an ASBO. The Police Reform Act 2002 extended the power to seek an order to persons registered under the Housing Act 1996 as 'social landlords' and to the Chief Constable of the British Transport Police. The Anti-Social Behaviour Act 2003 added housing action trusts and county council councils.

Both statutes provide a defence of reasonableness, discussed below, which assumes especial significance in relation to the 1997 and 1998 provisions, since in contrast to the earlier ones, under the 1986 Act, there is either no need to establish mens rea or its establishment is likely to have little inhibitory effect. Thus, the decision in Clarke will not have a ready application under those Acts. Sections 1 and 2 of the 1997 Act makes it a requirement of establishing the offence that the harasser knows or ought to know that the course of conduct amounts to harassment. However, since an interim injunction can be obtained under s 3 of the Act, in ex parte proceedings, the establishment of that state of mind would be aided in proceedings for its breach once it had been served on the defendant. Breach of such an injunction is punishable by five years' imprisonment. Therefore, although prima facie the 1997 Act imports a mens rea requirement, the existence of punishment on the civil standard of proof allows for its circumvention. Criminal proceedings relating to the same course of conduct, but under s 2, may also be affected, as explained below, once an injunction has been obtained.

633 According to the 1998 Magistrates' Courts Rules applicable to these orders.
634 Section 1(10)(b).

Section 1 of the 1998 Act requires no circumvention of mens rea requirements, since it merely abandons them. They could be re-introduced only in the form of a 'reversed' mens rea, under the defence of reasonableness, unless, in a public protest case, with a view to narrowing down the potential of this section to interfere with Art 6, 10 or 11 rights, a judge was prepared to import the additional mens rea element identified in Clarke.

These matters are linked to the key difference between these two recent provisions and the previous ones – their hybrid nature in allowing for criminal sanctions, including imprisonment, on the civil standard of proof for breach of an injunction or order. The 1997 Act allows for an injunction to be obtained at the instigation of the 'victim' in ex parte proceedings, merely on his or her affidavit. This probably explains why the 1997 Act is proving to offer a primary means of curbing various forms of protest. It provides a contrast to ss 5 and 4A of the 1986 Act, which are widely used, but not, research suggests, frequently in the context of political protest.[635] Unlike the 1997 Act, they appear, on the whole, to have been used to target those at whom they were originally aimed. The features of the 1997 Act which have made it attractive as a measure to be used against protesters, are, it should be noted, also present in the 1998 Act in the sense that the subject of the protest can (indirectly) instigate proceedings[636] and criminal sanctions, including imprisonment, may be imposed on the civil standard.

The relevance of the civil standard of proof in the 1997 and 1998 Acts was always likely to raise questions about the compatibility of these provisions with Art 6, under the HRA. At Strasbourg, the fact that national law classifies an act as non-criminal is relevant but not conclusive. In Benham v UK,[637] the leading case on 'criminal charge', the Court found that although the legislation in question[638] clearly did not create a criminal offence in UK law, it should be accounted criminal for Art 6(1) purposes. The proceedings against the applicant[639] had been brought by the public authorities; the proceedings 635 Waddington explains the reluctance to arrest in this context on the basis that it risks sparking off hostility among other protesters and can create trouble later, since the arrest may be scrutinised in court: see op. cit., fn 1, pp 54–55. Independent records of arrests may be available since supporters of the protest may photograph them and reporters may well also be present. Records and reports of arrests may help to lead to acquittals and may fuel public criticism of the police. This would be unlikely to be the case in relation to the arrest of, e.g., drunken football supporters.

636 The application for the order is made by the 'relevant authority' under s 1(1), but it may be triggered off by allegations made to the police or housing authority.

637 (1996) 22 EHRR 293. See also Lauko v Slovakia (1999) 1 EHRLR 105 in which it was found that a penalty for anti-social behaviour was inherently criminal in nature. Han v Customs and Excise Comrs [2001] 1 WLR 2253, 2269–2273, paras 55–64 reviewed the European case law.

638 The Local Government Changes for England (Community Charge and Council Tax, Administration and Enforcement) Regulations 1995, SI 1995/247, s 41.

639 In respect of default on payment of the community charge or poll tax.

had some punitive elements and the bringing of them implied fault on the part of the applicant. Further, the penalty was severe (committal to prison for up to three months).[640] In Engel v The Netherlands (No 1)[641] the European Court established three criteria for determining whether proceedings are 'criminal' within the meaning of the Convention: (a) the domestic classification, (b) the nature of the offence, and (c) the severity of the potential penalty which the defendant risks incurring.

Prior to the inception of the HRA it appeared that if, for example, a defendant in a magistrates' court raised the issue of the compatibility of the proceedings for an order under s 1 of the 1998 Act with Art 6, it might be necessary to stay the proceedings while the issue is dealt with on an appeal by way of case stated. Owing to the provision of s 3 of the HRA, it would appear that a national court could not merely redefine ss 1 and 2 as creating criminal offences if that involved finding that Art 6 and ss 1 and 2 were incompatible.

Once the HRA was in force the national courts had to face the difficulty directly that s 3 of the 1997 or s 1 of the 1998 Act classifies an act as non-criminal, but Art 6 could be viewed as suggesting that it is criminal. The fair trial guarantee under Art 6(1) applies to both 'the determination of a (person's) civil rights' and 'the determination of any criminal charge'. But only the determination of a criminal charge attract the additional protections under Art 6(2) and 6(3). Anti-social behaviour orders, according to the applicable 1998 Magistrates' Courts Rules, are made on the civil standard of proof, no legal aid is available and, under s 1(10)(b) of the 1998 Act, there is the possibility of five years' imprisonment if the order is breached. The consequence for the subject of an order of the making of it are serious in the sense that their reputation is damaged and if they breach it they are subject to criminal penalties. Clearly, once the order is made, in proceedings accompanied only by safeguards applicable in civil actions, a person is at greater risk of attracting criminal penalties than they would be if a criminal offence had been charged against them in the first place, since the offence would have to be proved on the criminal standard of proof and the proceedings would be accompanied by a higher level of safeguards.

In B v Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset Constabulary[642] the question arose whether proceedings for a sex offender order under s 2 of the Act are civil. Section 2 is different in conception from s 1 in as much as an order can only be made in respect of a person who has already been convicted as a sex offender. But there are similarities since its purpose is preventative 'to protect the public from serious harm from him'. Lord Bingham of Cornhill CJ held:[643]

> The rationale of section 2 was, by means of an injunctive order, to seek to avoid the contingency of any further suffering by any further victim. It would also of course be to the advantage of a defendant if he were to be saved from further offending. As in the case of a civil injunction, a breach of the court's order may attract a sanction. But, also as in the case of a civil injunction, the order, although 640 The magistrates could only exercise their power of committal on a finding of wilful refusal to pay or culpable neglect (para 56 of the judgment).

641 (1976) 1 EHRR 647, 678–79, para 82.

642 [2001] 1 WLR 340.

643 At p 352, para 25.

> restraining the defendant from doing that which is prohibited, imposes no penalty or disability upon him. I am accordingly satisfied that, as a matter of English domestic law, the application is a civil proceeding, as Parliament undoubtedly intended it to be.

Gough v Chief Constable of the Derbyshire Constabulary[644] took the same view. It was held that football banning orders under ss 14A and 14B of the Football Spectators Act 1989 do not involve criminal penalties and are therefore civil in character. The House of Lords in McCann v Manchester Crown Court[645] had to consider this issue. It was argued on behalf of the defendants that the purpose of Parliament was to cast proceedings under the first part of s 1, as opposed to proceedings for breach, in a civil mould but that in reality and in substance such proceedings are criminal in character. The House of Lords noted that in proceedings under the first part of s 1 the Crown Prosecution Service is not involved at all; there is no formal accusation of a breach of criminal law; the proceedings are initiated by the civil process of a complaint; mens rea as an ingredient of particular offences need not be proved; the making of the order results in no penalty; it cannot be entered on a defendant's record as a conviction. It was considered that the true purpose of the proceedings is preventative and therefore it was found to follow that the making of an anti-social behaviour order is not a conviction or condemnation that the person is guilty of an offence.

Counsel for the defendants argued that the procedure leading to the making of an order under s 1(4) must be considered together with the proceedings for breach under s 1(10), the latter being undoubtedly criminal in character. The House of Lords did not accept this argument since the making of the order would sometimes serve its purpose and there would be no proceedings for breach. It was considered that in principle it is necessary to consider the two stages separately. Counsel for the defendants also argued that the making of an anti-social behaviour order may have very serious consequences for a defendant since they are made in cases which satisfy the threshold of persistent and serious anti-social behaviour. So the making of such an order against a person inevitably reflects seriously on his character. However, the House of Lords noted that, for example, Mareva injunctions, may have serious consequences as may Anton Piller orders. It was concluded that proceedings to obtain an anti-social behaviour order are civil proceedings under domestic law.

The House went on to consider whether, despite its domestic classification, an anti-social behaviour order nevertheless has a criminal character in accordance with the autonomous concepts of Art 6. The minimum right under Art 6(3)(d) of everyone charged with a criminal offence to examine or have examined witnesses against him, or to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him was significant in the instant case. If the proceedings under s 1 of the Act were criminal within the meaning of Art 6, this provision was clearly applicable. If they were deemed civil, then Art 6(3)(d) would be inapplicable. The Law Lords accepted that this was not an instance where the proceedings fell outside Art 6 altogether; it was found to be clear that a defendant has the benefit of the guarantee applicable to civil proceedings under Art 6.1. The House of Lords applied the criteria from Engel v The Netherlands (No 1). Clearly the proceedings are domestically classified as civil. The order under the first part of s 1 does not constitute a finding that an offence has been committed. This was contrasted with the community charge decision in Benham v United Kingdom.[646] But the third factor was the most important. Here the position was that the order itself involved no penalty. The established criteria suggested that the proceedings were not in respect of a criminal charge.

644 [2002] QB 459; and on appeal at [2002] 3 WLR 289.
645 [2002] 4 All ER 593.

It was noted that there is, as Lord Bingham of Cornhill CJ pointed out in B v Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset Constabulary,[647] no case in which the European Court has held proceedings to be criminal even though an adverse outcome for the defendant cannot result in any penalty. The Lords considered that there was scope for the law to be developed in that direction. However, the Lords relied on the interpretation of Art 6 by the Lord President (Rodger) in S v Miller[648] in finding that the proceedings are not criminal. Section 52(2) of the Children (Scotland) Act 1995 provides that a child may have to be subjected to compulsory measures of supervision when he 'has committed an offence'. The question arose whether in such proceedings Art 6 is applicable. The Lord President said on this point:[649]

> S was arrested and charged by the police . . . He remained 'charged with a criminal offence' in terms of article 6 until the procurator fiscal decided the following day – in the language of section 43(5) of the Criminal Procedure Act – 'not to proceed with the charge'. At that point the criminal proceedings came to an end and the reporter initiated the procedures under the 1995 Act by arranging a hearing in terms of section 63(1) . . . The subsequent proceedings under the 1995 Act are not criminal for the purposes of article 6. Although the reporter does indeed intend to show that the child concerned committed an offence, this is not for the purpose of punishing him but in order to establish a basis for taking appropriate measures for his welfare . . . So the specific guarantees in article 6(2) and (3) do not apply.

The Lords accepted this reasoning as correctly reflecting the purpose of Art 6 and found that it applied a fortiori to proceedings under s 1. Therefore it was found that an application for an anti-social behaviour order does not involve the determination of a criminal charge in Art 6 terms. However, despite this finding the House adopted a curious compromise in considering that an order should be made on the criminal standard of proof. This creates the odd situation whereby the standard of proof is criminal but the evidence that can be put forward to achieve that standard is not bound by the rules applicable in criminal trials, including the rule against hearsay evidence. Also the safeguards of Art 6(2) and (3) do not apply.

These findings would seem also to apply to injunctions issued under the 1997 Act. The extent to which the hybrid nature of s 3 of the 1997 Act has the potential to allow interferences with the Art 6, 10 and 11 guarantees in protest cases was illustrated in

646 (1996) 22 EHRR 293.
647 [2001] 1 WLR 340.
648 2001 SC 977.
649 At pp 989–90.

two significant decisions. In Huntingdon Life Sciences Ltd and Another v Curtin and Others[650] the company (HLS) obtained an ex parte injunction against six groups under s 3 of the Act, which prohibited conduct amounting to harassment within the terms of the Act, or entering HLS research sites. HLS was engaged in animal experimentation and was the subject of a campaign by a number of animal rights' organisations. One of the defendants, the British Union of Anti-Vivisectionists (BUAV), a peaceful campaigning group, applied to have the injunction varied so that it was not covered. Eady J found, in the inter partes proceedings, that the plaintiff had not provided sufficient evidence to support the claim that the defendants should be covered by the injunction. He also considered it unfortunate that the provisions of the Act were couched in such wide terms that they could appear to cover 'the rights of political protest and public demonstration which are so much a part of our democratic tradition'. This judgment clearly recognised, as the legislators did not, the general need to seek to delineate forms of anti-social behaviour sufficiently clearly so as to avoid infringing the rights in question.

The BUAV was exempted from the injunction, but the case illustrates the ease of obtaining interim injunctions against a wide range of persons and groups in these circumstances. In practice, once such an injunction is obtained, the police are likely to enforce it against a number of persons who are not covered or are only doubtfully covered by it, on the basis that they appear to be acting under the authority of, or in concert with, one of groups which are enjoined. This will commonly occur in such situations.

A rather similar situation arose in DPP v Moseley, Woodling and Selvanayagam.[651] One of the defendants, Ms Selvanayagam, had been served with an ex parte interim injunction under s 3 of the 1997 Act, which she was seeking to challenge. After she had been served with the injunction, she and the other two defendants continued to demonstrate peacefully against the fur trade, at a fur farm. They were arrested and charged with the offence under s 2 of the 1997 Act. All of them relied on the defence that the conduct was reasonable in the circumstances under s 1(3)(c), and this defence was accepted by the magistrate. He further found that the injunction was obtained only on the basis of affidavit evidence and could not as a matter of law preclude the finding of reasonableness. Therefore, he acquitted all three. On appeal, the High Court found that pursuit of a course of harassment in breach of an injunction would preclude establishing the defence of reasonableness and that the magistrate had not been entitled to go behind the terms of the injunction. The other two respondents were not named in the injunction and there was no basis for considering that they were acting in concert with Ms Selvanayagam. Therefore, they were not precluded from putting forward the defence of reasonableness. Accordingly, Ms Selvanayagam was convicted under s 2.

The most striking feature of this case is the acceptance that a central issue in a criminal trial can be predetermined in civil proceedings, particularly uncontested ex parte proceedings, in which the only evidence is 'on the papers'. The Act, as indicated, provides a remedy of imprisonment for breach of an injunction; there is therefore no reason why its breach should also be determinative of separate criminal proceedings. This matter clearly raises Art 6 issues; it comes close to obtaining a conviction 'on the papers' since, if an injunction has been previously obtained, the burden on the prosecution will be considerably eased. Although Strasbourg has not dealt with the precise point regarding the usurpation of the function of the criminal court by previous civil proceedings, it has made it clear in a series of cases that the use of written statements from witnesses who are not present at the trial will contravene Art 6(3)(d) except in limited, exceptional circumstances.[652] It may be said that an injunction obtained at an uncontested hearing is analogous to such statements. The use of such an injunction to predetermine a key issue in the criminal trial might also be viewed as infringing the presumption of innocence under Art 6(2) since the defendant may be confronted with an irrebuttable presumption against her. In Salabiaku v France[653] it was found that while Art 6(2) 'does not . . . regard presumptions of fact or of law provided for in the criminal law with indifference', it permits the operation of such presumptions against the accused so long as the law in question confines such presumptions 'within reasonable limits which take into account the importance of what is at stake and maintain the rights of the defence'.[654] It is debatable whether the rights of the defence can be said to be preserved where no means at all of going behind an injunction is available. These issues will probably, after McCann, have to be raised at Strasbourg.

650 (1998) 3(1) J Civ Lib 37.
651 Judgment of 9 June 1999; reported [1999] J Civ Lib 390.

Clearly, the use of injunctions as in Huntingdon Life Sciences and Moseley represents an interference with the Art 10 and 11 rights of the protesters, which must be justified under the para 2 exceptions. The fact that the injunction operates as a prior restraint is not conclusive of the issue since, as indicated above, Strasbourg has accepted that the use of such restraint may be justified in certain circumstances in public protest cases.[655] The leading case on prior restraints is Observer and Guardian v UK,[656] in which the Court considered the compatibility with Art 10 of interim injunctions preventing those newspapers from publishing Spycatcher material. The Court laid down the basic principle that: 'while Art 10 does not in terms prohibit the imposition of prior restraints on publication . . . the dangers inherent in [them] are such that they call for the most careful scrutiny on the part of the Court . . .'.[657] These findings were based on the perishable nature of news, a relevant consideration on the facts. But there is no reason to view the stance of the Court as precluding consideration of other values which are threatened by the use of injunctions as a prior restraint on expression, bearing in mind the arguments set out at the beginning of this chapter as to the value of public protest. Injunctions may not prevent the protest completely, but they may prevent it from being effective by excluding it from the place where it will have most impact. Moreover, arguments opposed to prior restraint need not rest only on values associated with expression, but may take into account the value of rights of participation in the political process, and such arguments may be raised under Art 11. In other words, while 652 Unterpinger v Austria (1991) 13 EHRR 175; Van Mechelen v Netherlands (1998) 25 EHRR 647; Kostovski v Netherlands (1989) 12 EHRR 434; Delta v France (1993) 16 EHRR 574; Doorson v Netherlands (1996) 22 EHRR 330.

653 (1988) 13 EHRR 379.

654 See p 388, para 28.

655 See, e.g., the decision of the Commission in Christians Against Racism and Fascism v UK, Appl No 8440/78 (1980) 21 DR 138.

656 (1991) 14 EHRR 153; for comment, see Leigh, I, 'Spycatcher in Strasbourg' [1992] PL 200.

657 Ibid, para 60.

it might be argued that the terms of an injunction under s 3 of the 1997 Act preventing protesters from demonstrating, say, outside the detention centre for asylum seekers at Oakington, Cambridge on the anniversary of its opening, would not prevent them from distributing leaflets or holding a peaceful protest elsewhere, it would undermine the exercise of rights of effective expression and of participation in the political process.

Such arguments, where linked to Art 10, could be given added impact by invoking s 12 of the HRA in relation to the use of ex parte injunctions in cases analogous to Moseley.[658] Section 12(1) provides: 'this section applies if a court is considering whether to grant any relief which, if granted, might affect the exercise of the Convention right to freedom of expression . . . (2) if the person against whom the application for relief is made (the respondent) is neither present nor represented no such relief is to be granted unless the court is satisfied . . . that the applicant has taken all practical steps to notify the respondent or that there are compelling reasons why the respondent should not be notified.' Under s 12(4) 'the court must have particular regard to the importance of the convention right to freedom of expression . . .'. Section 12(2) provides a strong adjuration against the use of ex parte injunctions which, it is suggested, is as applicable in public protest cases as it is in those for which it was intended – injunctions against publications by the media. It may be noted that Art 10 only is referred to and therefore, as far as s 12 is concerned, the Art 11 argument would be irrelevant, an unfortunate effect of seeking to afford added weight to the Art 10 rights of one group – the media – while disregarding those of another – protesters. Section 12 may have been limited in its application to civil proceedings[659] with the intention, inter alia, of excluding public protest from its ambit. If so, the failure to take account of the use of injunctions and orders obtained in civil proceedings in protest cases may have led to this unintended result.

Section 12 may apply to orders made under s 1 of the 1998 Act, which potentially could also operate as prior restraints. The procedure to be followed appears to allow the grant of ex parte orders, but the defendant should be informed before the hearing that an application for an order has been made.[660] In a public protest case, the defendant would be likely to attend the hearing in order to raise the question of the interference with Art 10 and 11 rights which would occur if the order was made. Section 12(2) would not therefore normally be of relevance, but s 12(4) would be, and might tip the scales against the grant of an order in a protest case.

The arguments which can be raised under the HRA in relation to injunctions or anti-social behaviour orders when used in protest cases, are creating a clear distinction, which the architects of the 1997 Act and s 1 of the 1998 Act failed to create, between their operation in relation to those at whom they were targeted, and protesters. Under the activist model, such orders or injunctions would be subject to strict scrutiny under Arts 6, 10 and 11. The Art 8 rights, if in question, of those subject to the protest would also be relevant. Where an order or injunction was issued, the result might be that it would be carefully limited in order to answer to the strict requirements of proportionality.

658 See also the discussion of injunctions more generally in Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, 'Making rights real: the courts, remedies and the Human Rights Act' (1999) 58 CLJ 509.

659 Under s 12(5).

660 Magistrates' Courts (Sex Offender and Anti-Social Behaviour Orders) Rules 1998.

Defences of reasonableness

These statutory provisions all provide defences of reasonableness, none of which is defined or specifically aimed at protecting expression.[661] Demonstrators shouting at passers-by to support their cause, whose behaviour could readily be termed threatening or disorderly, etc, and likely to cause one of the passers-by harassment, distress or alarm,[662] will have a defence under s 5(3)(c) if they can show that their behaviour was reasonable. The Act gives no guidance as to the meaning of the term, but it was determined in DPP v Clarke[663] that the defence is to be judged objectively, and it will therefore depend on what a bench of magistrates considers reasonable. In that case, the behaviour of the protesters outside an abortion clinic was not found to be reasonable. The use of pictures and models of aborted foetuses appeared to contribute to this conclusion.

This decision, which would clearly also apply to charges under s 4A, and, where appropriate, to s 12(3) of the 1997 Act and s 1(5) of the 1998 Act as well, obviously does not give much guidance to protesters seeking to determine beforehand the limits or meaning of 'reasonable' protest. As a deliberately ambiguous term, it obviously leaves enormous discretion to the judiciary to adopt approaches to its interpretation in accordance with Arts 10 and 11 as interpreted in Steel, ranging from the minimalist to the activist. Under the former approach, it might be found that only innocuous, peaceful persuasion could be termed reasonable. Such a finding might be of value where, for example, a large number of groups were served with injunctions under s 3 of the 1997 Act since it might serve to allow differentiation between those whose peaceful persuasion had nevertheless been viewed by its target as 'harassment' and those groups which had adopted more forceful means. But a more 'activist' interpretation of this defence would have to find a basis in the general principles articulated above,[664] especially applicable in relation to protest expressing minority viewpoints. This would be a matter of significance, since such viewpoints may be unlikely to be favourably received by others. Thus, offensive words used by protesters could be found to fall within this defence on the basis that in the context of a particular demonstration which had a legitimate political aim, such behaviour was acceptable and therefore reasonable. An argument for giving such a wide interpretation to the term 'reasonable' can be supported on the basis that, as argued above, to criminalise such behaviour would arguably amount to a very far reaching curb on the freedom to protest which might be found to be in breach of Art 10 or Art 11, bearing in mind the need to interpret statutory provisions in conformity with the Convention.

661 Under s 5(3)(c) and s 4A(3)(b) of the 1986 Act, s 1(3) of the 1997 Act and s 1(5) of the 1998 Act. It may be noted that under the 1997 and 1998 provisions, the 'defence' operates as partially reversed actus reus, in the sense that if the defence is proved (the burden of so doing is on the defendant), then harassment or anti-social behaviour is not established.

662 It is not necessary to prove that anyone actually experienced harassment, merely that this was likely.

663 Above, fn 626.

664 See above, pp 681–89.

The decisions in Norwood[665] and Hammond[666] indicate that this view is correct. The facts of Norwood are discussed above. The defence of reasonableness under s 5 of the 1986 Act was employed as the entry-point for the consideration of proportionality under Art 10 and it was found that the restriction upon his freedom of expression right represented by the offence was proportionate to the legitimate aim of protecting the rights of others. In Hammond the appellant took a placard with the words 'Stop Immorality', 'Stop Homosexuality', 'Stop Lesbianism', and 'Jesus is Lord' to the centre of Bournemouth and began preaching. This attracted a large group of people who were provoked by the preaching and who physically attacked the appellant. He was requested by two police officers to stop preaching. Upon refusing to comply with this request the appellant was arrested and subsequently charged and convicted of a s 5 offence. It was found that the interference with the appellant's right to freedom of expression under s 5 was a proportionate response in view of the fact that the appellant's behaviour went beyond legitimate protest, was provoking violence and disorder and interfered with the rights of others. In those circumstances it was found that the appellant's conduct was not reasonable. The conclusion on appeal was that the lower court had embarked upon the necessary exercise and had reached a decision that was open for them to take, namely, that the defendant's conduct was not reasonable in the particular circumstances.[667] It was accepted that Art 10 considerations apply to the evaluation of a reasonableness defence.[668] Thus, although Art 10 was taken into account on appeal, it was again found that the conviction was proportionate to the harm sought to be averted.

Aside from the defence of reasonableness, the prosecution may also have to demonstrate – where Art 10 or 11 is engaged – that bringing a prosecution under ss 4 or 5 is a proportionate response to the conduct in question. This was established in Dehal v Crown Prosecution Service[669] in which an application of the doctrine of proportionality under Art 10, relying on s 6 HRA, occurred, as a free-standing exercise. The appellant, a Sikh man, had put up a notice at a Sikh Temple that he had attended for many years. It was written in Punjabi and attacked the President of the Temple and other members of the Committee. Mr Dehal intended the notice to be read by those it was aimed at and other worshippers. He was convicted of the offence under the Public Order Act 1986, s 4A (1).[670] His appeal concerned in essence the relationship between Art 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights and the s 4A offence. The Court had to examine the following questions: was the prosecution of the appellant a proportionate response to his conduct and did Art 10 provide him with a defence, therefore making the interference with the appellant's freedom of expression unnecessary? In allowing the appeal, the Court determined that although all the elements of the offence were present, the prosecution had not presented enough evidence to establish that bringing a criminal prosecution was a proportionate response to the appellant's conduct.

665 [2004] EWHC 69.
666 [2004] EWHC 69.
667 At para 33.
668 At para 22.
669 [2005] EWHC 2154.
670 The case is also discussed in Chapter 6; see pp 506–7.

Public nuisance

The statutory offences discussed bear similarities with the common law doctrine of public nuisance, which has occasionally been used against public protest. This common law offence will arise if something occurs which inflicts damage, injury or inconvenience on all members of a class who come within the sphere or neighbourhood of its operation.[671] Liability for committing a public nuisance may arise by blocking the highway; however, according to Clarke (No 2),[672] the disruption caused must amount to an unreasonable user of the highway in order to found such liability. Thus, once obstruction has been shown, the question of reasonableness arises. It would appear from News Group Newspapers Ltd v SOGAT[673] that to cause a minor disruption for a legitimate purpose such as a march does not constitute an unreasonable user of the highway and will not therefore amount to a nuisance. It might seem that an assembly could not constitute a reasonable user of the highway under the Highways Act and yet nevertheless amount to a public nuisance. However, dicta in Gillingham BC v Medway Dock Co[674] suggest that this might, exceptionally, be possible.

Public nuisance, as a common law doctrine of a broad and imprecise nature, might not meet the requirement of 'prescribed by law' under Arts 10 and 11. Moreover, given its lack of precision and the lack of any defence of reasonableness it is suggested that, in satisfying their duty to observe proportionality under Arts 10 and 11, in pursuance of their duty under s 6 of the HRA, the police and CPS should not employ a common law offence of this width when a more precisely defined statutory offence – arising under s 137 of the Highways Act – is available. There is a case therefore, for suggesting that this offence should not be used in future against assemblies on the highway.

Private common law remedies

Apart from control by the police, meetings and demonstrations can be prevented or curbed by private persons who seek injunctions to that end.[675] An interim injunction may be obtained very quickly in a hearing in which the other party is not represented. Even if a permanent injunction is not eventually granted, the aim of the demonstration may well have been destroyed by that time. In Hubbard v Pitt,[676] the defendants mounted a demonstration outside an estate agent in order to protest at what was seen as the ousting of working class tenants in order to make way for higher income buyers, thereby effecting a change in the character of the area. They therefore picketed the estate agents. The plaintiffs sought an injunction to prevent this on various grounds, including that of nuisance. At first instance, it was held that a stationary meeting would not constitute a reasonable user of the Highway and the grant of the interim injunction 671 See Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th edn, Vol 34, para 305. For discussion of the offence, see Spencer, JR [1989] CLJ 55.

672 [1964] 2 QB 315; [1963] 3 All ER 884, CA.

673 [1986] ICR 716; [1986] IRLR 337.

674 [1992] 3 All ER 931.

675 For discussion of such use of injunctions, see Wallington, P, 'Injunctions and the right to demonstrate' [1976] CLJ 82. For discussion of their use in the context of labour disputes see (1973) 2 ILJ 213; Miller, Contempt of Court, 1989, pp 412–22.

676 [1976] QB 142.

was upheld by the Court of Appeal, Lord Denning dissenting on the ground that the right to demonstrate is so closely analogous to freedom of speech that it should be protected.

Under the HRA, the use of such injunctions raise a number of issues. They resemble injunctions available under s 3 of the 1997 Act. However, since they are based on the common law, s 3 of the HRA does not apply. Section 6 of the HRA does not apply directly unless the party seeking the injunction is a public authority or a private body discharging a public function. In Hubbard, those seeking the injunctions would not have fallen within either of those categories. But, as Chapter 4 indicated, s 6 has implications even for private parties.[677] Thus, the Strasbourg protest jurisprudence should be taken into account when considering the grant of an injunction in similar circumstances, arguably even where the common law is not ambiguous.

7 Riot, violent disorder and affray

Serious offences under the 1986 Act

Section 9 of the Public Order Act 1986 abolishes the common law offences of riot, unlawful assembly and affray and replaces them with similar statutory offences of riot (s 1), violent disorder (s 2) and affray (s 3).[678] Each of these offences may be committed in a public or a private place and it is not necessary that any person should actually have feared unlawful violence. Violent disorder would be most commonly used against unruly demonstrations, since it can be committed by words alone.

In order to establish an affray, it must first be shown that the defendant used or threatened unlawful violence towards another, secondly that his conduct was such as would cause a person of reasonable firmness present at the scene to fear for his personal safety and thirdly, under s 6(2), that he intended to use or threaten violence or was aware that his conduct might be violent or threaten violence. Under s 3(3), a threat cannot be made by the use of words alone. A demonstration in which threatening gestures were used might fulfil the first limb of s 3(1), but a strong argument can be advanced that it does not fulfil the second. If the gestures are part of a demonstration, it is probable that a person of reasonable firmness would not fear unlawful violence even though such a person might feel somewhat distressed. In Taylor v DPP,[679] Lord Hailsham, speaking of the common law offence, said 'the degree of violence must be such as to be calculated to terrify a person of reasonably firm character'. The Act, of course, refers to 'fear' as opposed to terror, but this ruling suggests that 'fear' should be interpreted restrictively.

Violent disorder was introduced in the 1986 Act as a completely new offence which was aimed in part at curtailing the activities of violent pickets. It is couched in the same terms as affray, but requires that three or more persons are involved. In order to establish violent disorder, it must first be shown that the defendant was one of three or more persons who used or threatened unlawful violence; secondly, that his conduct was such as would cause a person of reasonable firmness present at the scene to fear for his personal safety and thirdly, that the defendant himself actually used or threatened violence. The mental element under s 6(2) is the same as for affray. It may be argued that in the context of a demonstration, threatening gestures would not be termed a threat of violence. 'Violence' is a strong term which should not be watered down. In one respect, however, violent disorder is wider than affray since it may be committed by the use of words alone. If no threats are used by a defendant, he could not incur liability under s 2 even if it was found that he encouraged violence by others.[680]

677 See pp 250–56.
678 For comment on the offences, see 'Public Order Act offences' (1989) December LAG.
679 [1973] AC 964.

Riot is the highest level public order offence created by the Act and is similar to the offence of violent disorder. However, it is narrower in that it requires that 12 or more persons who are present together use or threaten unlawful violence for a common purpose and that the defendant must actually use violence intending to do so or being aware that his conduct may be violent. The requirement that the conduct of them (taken together) is such as would cause a person reasonable firmness present at the scene to fear for his personal safety is common to all three offences.

Impact of the HRA

The behaviour covered by these provisions will in general fall outside Art 11, which covers only peaceful assemblies, and possibly outside Art 10 as well. Even assuming that a disorderly assembly could be viewed as expressing an opinion and therefore as within the principle from Steel, the measures used against it would readily be viewed as proportionate to the aims of preserving order and public safety. However, the HRA may allow differentiation to be created between the application of these offences to protesters and to hooligans. In respect of protesters, the proportionality of the measures adopted would be considered, although, depending on the circumstances, the court might view the choice of measures as falling within the area of discretionary judgment likely to be accorded to the police.

8 Conclusions

Before the HRA came into force, the true boundaries of public protest were drawn, not by reference to the constitutional significance in a democracy of rights of political participation or of affording expression, through the medium of forms of protest, to a variety of viewpoints, but often arbitrarily due to the imprecision of the law and the approach frequently taken to it in low level courts or by the police. In 2000 it was tempting to look forward to the use of Arts 10 and 11 in the post-HRA era in the expectation, not only that the boundaries would eventually be re-drawn more precisely, but also that legal discourse in this area would no longer focus simply on disorder, but rather would seek to engage in the ongoing debate, at Strasbourg and in other jurisdictions, as to the values underlying the constitutional significance of protest and the weight they should be afforded. The question whether that expectation would be fulfilled depended partly on the readiness of the domestic judiciary to disregard the outcomes of many of the public protest cases that Strasbourg has considered. But it was also suggested that the impact of the HRA on public protest would be principally determined, not by the Strasbourg jurisprudence it introduced, but by the prevailing and established judicial attitude to public protest, and the extent to which the judiciary might be prepared to move away from it, by giving practical effect to the core values underlying the Convention. Vital, also, was the way that the judiciary were likely to deal with the problematic issue of the margin of appreciation and its role in the Strasbourg jurisprudence. As we have seen, reliance on the outcomes of cases at Strasbourg provide no secure grounding for such protection – rather the reverse.

680 McGuigan and Cameron [1991] Crim LR 719; Fleming and Robinson [1989] Crim LR 658; cf Caird (1970) 54 Cr App R 499.

How far have those expectations been answered, nearly seven years on? This chapter has on the whole painted a dismal picture. Over-broad statutory provisions have been broadened still further by incremental extension. In post-HRA cases lip service only has tended to be paid to questions of proportionality. The breach of the peace doctrine has been used extensively by police against protesters over most of the HRA period with little attempt by the judiciary, except in Redmond-Bate, to hold it in check, the low point being Austin and Saxby. The finding that 3,000 mainly peaceful protesters could be trapped for seven hours in a London Square, and that an entirely peaceful protester and a bystander caught up in the protest had no redress for the detention must be one of the low points of the domestic public protest jurisprudence. However the House of Lords' decision in Laporte may signal a change of stance. But it is not enough to view the breach of the peace doctrine as far too broad and as needing a check. Many of the statutory provisions are also excessively broad. Far more recognition of the value of expression and assembly is still needed in this context. The judiciary are still too prone to accept police assessments of public order risks.

In future post-HRA decisions judges inclined to take a more activist or pro-free assembly stance may be prepared to find where necessary that their decision making can be rooted in the general principles upheld at Strasbourg as underpinning the Convention, rather than in its particular application. The judiciary can draw upon the general principles and values underlying the Convention – free expression, pluralism, tolerance and the maintenance of diversity as essential characteristics of a democratic society – if the HRA is to provide more than a cosmetic change in approach to the protection of the right of peaceful protest.[681] The justification for affording greater weight to communicative rights than that afforded at Strasbourg in findings under Arts 10 and 11 can be found in the need to ensure the genuine efficacy of the rights, with a view to realising the free expression and assembly objectives referred to above, especially in the case of minority groups or viewpoints. As argued, the Convention jurisprudence clearly recognises the need to protect a plurality of views in a democracy, even in the face of offence caused to the majority.[682] It would be in accordance with the Convention concept of a democratic society to refuse to place those seeking to exercise communicative rights in the same position as football hooligans and to reject a legal tradition of valuing the general societal interest in public order over the exercise of such rights. In accordance with the values of the Convention, safeguarding the interests of 681 They will also, of course, be free to draw upon the rich US and Canadian jurisprudence on public protest as a basic civil right.

682 Above, pp 681–84.

minorities in a democracy is not to circumvent the democratic process, but to uphold it by obviating the danger that those interests will be marginalised.

If the judiciary are prepared to take this stance more strongly in the coming years, the nature and structure of judicial argument in public protest cases, as well as the likely outcomes, will change significantly. Although some judges have tended post-HRA towards approaches which have been termed 'minimalist' or 'traditionalist', the rather tokenistic changes in legal reasoning which are resulting may still eventually come to influence judicial attitudes. In public order cases such judges are hearing, even if they are unreceptive to, arguments from counsel as to the value of this form of political expression. Now that the judiciary are placed in the position of considering such value and the need nevertheless to circumscribe protest within a democracy, they may eventually come to view this matter from a broader perspective[683] and to participate in the debate which has been occurring in other jurisdictions for many years. Ultimately, in this particular area of political expression, the HRA may be beginning to have a more profoundly educative effect than in others, not only on the public, but on the judiciary.

683 Comparison may be made here with the manner in which the jurisprudence of the Canadian Supreme Court changed radically following the enactment of the Charter of Fundamental Rights, from orthodox 'black letter' analysis to a far more theorised and philosophical approach: see Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, 'Making rights real: the courts, remedies and the Human Rights Act' (1999) 58 CLJ 509.

Part III

The protection of privacy

Introduction[1]

The right to respect for privacy is now accepted as part of the domestic law of a number of countries[2] and of international human rights instruments.[3] However, the limits of the right are still unclear and a generally accepted definition of privacy has not emerged. As Raymond Wacks has observed, 'the voluminous [theoretical] literature on the subject has failed to produce a lucid or consistent meaning of [the] concept'.[4] It may be said, therefore, that privacy has become a complex and very broad concept due to the variety of claims or interests which have been thought to fall within it.[5] The European Court of Human Rights has accommodated many disparate issues within the concept of privacy arising under Art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights: they range from the rights of homosexuals[6] to the right to receive information about oneself.[7] As Feldman has argued, the scope of Art 8 is continuing to widen.[8]

1 Texts referred to in this Part: Wacks, R, The Protection of Privacy, 1980, Sweet and Maxwell; Westin, AF, Privacy and Freedom, 1970, The Bodley Head; Wacks, R (ed), Privacy, 1993, New York University Press; Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act, 2006, Chapters 13–17; Tugendhat and Christie, The Law of Privacy and the Media, 2002, OUP; Feldman, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 2nd edn, 2002, Part 3; Markesinis, B (ed), Protecting Privacy, 1999, OUP; Birks, R (ed), Privacy and Loyalty, 1997, Clarendon; Clayton and Tomlinson, The Law of Human Rights (2006), Chapter 12; Eady, D, 'A statutory right to privacy' (1996) 3 EHRLR 243; Winfield, P 'Privacy' (1931) 47 LQR 23; Yang, TL 'Privacy: A Comparative Study of English and American Law' (1966) 15 ICLQ 175; Wacks, R, 'The poverty of privacy' (1980) 96 LQR 73; Seipp, D, 'English judicial recognition of the right to privacy' (1983) 3 OJLS 325; Leigh, I, 'Horizontal rights, the Human Rights Act and privacy: lessons from the Commonwealth?' (1999) 48 ICLQ 57; Grosz, S and Braithwaite, N, 'Privacy and the Human Rights Act', in Hunt and Singh (eds), A Practitioners Guide to the Impact of the Human Rights Act, 1999; Wright, J, 'How private is my private life?' in Betten, L (ed), the Human Rights Act 1998: What it Means, 1999, Brill. Whitty, N, Murphy, T and Livingstone, S, Civil Liberties Law: the Human Rights Era (2001) Chapter 6; Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, 'Breach of confidence as a privacy remedy in the Human Rights era (2000) 63 (5) MLR 660–93.

2 For example, the US Privacy Act 1974 and the tort or torts of invasion of privacy, the Canadian Protection of Privacy Act 1974, Art 1382 of the French Civil Code; German courts can protect privacy under s 823(1) of the Civil Code and a right to privacy arises under the German Basic Law Art 10 (albeit limited to posts and telecommunications).

3 It appears in the European Convention on Human Rights, Art 8 and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Art 17.

4 'Introduction', in Wacks, op. cit., fn 1, p xi.

5 See Wacks, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 1, pp 10–21.

6 Dudgeon (1982) 4EHRR 149.

7 Gaskin (1990) 12 EHRR 36.

8 (1997) 3 EHRLR 264.

The Convention does not attempt to define privacy,[9] but various definitions have been put forward which tend to be very broad: it has been termed 'a circle around every individual human being which no government . . . ought to be permitted to overstep' and 'some space in human existence thus entrenched around and sacred from authoritative[10] intrusion'. Feldman has found that the desire for a private area in life derives its justification from personal autonomy, which is linked to the idea of 'defensible space', and from the 'idea of utility' – the idea that 'people operate more effectively and happily when they are allowed to make their own arrangements about domestic and business matters without interference from the state'.[11] Such phrases suggest that some aspects of an individual's life, which can be identified as private aspects, are of particular value and therefore warrant special protection from state intrusion. At an intuitive level, the notion that boundaries can and should be placed around such aspects of an individual's life, preventing such intrusion and thereby protecting personal autonomy, seems to be accepted as the fundamental basis of the idea of privacy[12] and underlies decisions under Art 8.[13] However, as recognised at Strasbourg, the guarantee under Art 8 goes further than simply requiring that the individual should be let alone – in two respects. As indicated below, the right also encompasses positive obligations on the part of the state authorities. It also places obligations on private bodies, which can include positive obligations. In X and Y v Netherlands[14] the Court stated: 'these [Art 8] obligations may require the adoption of measures even in the sphere of relations between individuals.'

The disparate obligations created by this right are reflected in the different concerns of the two chapters in Part III. Chapter 9 deals with the protection of personal information from non-consensual use by public and private bodies. It particularly concentrates on invasion of privacy by the media and considers protection for both family and private life. Chapter 10 considers state surveillance and searches of property; it covers a variety of intrusions of state agents into private live and considers the safeguards available to the individual. It will be argued that in each of these contexts the Human Rights Act (HRA), which has imported the Strasbourg conceptions of privacy into domestic law, will be of great significance. The statues which now have a central impact in this context, the Data Protection Act 1998 and the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, have to be interpreted compatibly with the Convention rights under s 3 HRA. The HRA has provided the impetus for the development of further protection for private information by effecting a transformation of the doctrine of confidence.

Theoretical considerations

Privacy can be associated with a range of underlying values. The key values are, it is argued, informational autonomy (control over private information), self-fulfilment,

9 See further Chapter 2, pp 69–91.
10 Mill, JS, Principles of Political Economy, 1970, Penguin, p 306.
11 See Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 1st edn, 1993, pp 353–54.
12 See Seipp, op. cit., fn 1, at p 333.
13 See, e.g., Leander v Sweden (1987) 9 EHRR 433; McVeigh, O'Neill and Evans v United Kingdom (1981) 45 EHRR 71.
14 (1985) 8 EHRR 235.

dignity, substantive autonomy.[15] As will be discussed below, these values are often strongly associated with each other. It has often been argued that privacy is associated with self-fulfilment in the sense that protection for the private life of the individual tends to provide the best conditions under which he or she may flourish.[16] In other words, self-fulfilment may be fostered if the individual is able to enjoy the benefits most obviously associated with the private: the dropping of the public mask, the communion of intimates, and the expression of the deepest emotions.

If it is accepted that a key value underlying differing conceptions of privacy is that of personal autonomy,[17] it is necessary to draw a distinction between what may be termed 'substantive' and 'informational' autonomy. The former denotes the individual's interest in being able to make certain substantive choices about personal life for him or herself, such as the choice to engage in certain sexual practices, or follow certain life styles without state interference or coercion.[18] Privacy derives its value partly from its close association with personal autonomy, in the sense that freedom from interference by the authorities will foster the conditions under which autonomy can be exercised. Thus, some authoritative invasions of privacy may be said to lead to interference with individual autonomy.

The term 'informational autonomy', on the other hand, refers to the individual's interest in controlling the flow of personal information about herself, the interest referred to by the German Supreme Court as 'informational self-determination',[19] or as Beardsely has put it, the right to 'selective disclosure'.[20] In accordance with the views of a number of writers, it is suggested that this interest is one of the primary concerns of the law in this area.[21] The ability to exercise control in this manner also affords some protection to other values, as Feldman[22] has pointed out: 'If people are able to release [private] information with impunity, it might have the effect of illegitimately constraining a person's choices as to his or her private behaviour, interfering in a major way with his or her autonomy'.[23] In other words, control over information thus indirectly protects 15 See further Feldman, D, 'Secrecy, dignity or autonomy? Views of privacy as a civil liberty' (1994) 47(2) CLP 42.

16 See Feldman, fn 1 above (2002) at 512.

17 See Wacks, op. cit., fn 1, pp 10–21; Westin, op. cit., fn 1, p 7; Miller, A, Assault on Privacy, 1971, University of Michigan Press, p 40.

18 See further Chapter 2, pp 74–87, Chapter 9, p 961, Chapter 15, pp 1520–21.

19 BGH, 19 December 1995, BGHZ 131, pp 322–46.

20 'Privacy: autonomy and selective disclosure', in Nomos XIII 54.

21 Ruth Gavison's definition of privacy – 'a limitation of others' access to an individual' – has three aspects: information; attention; physical access (Privacy and the limits of law' (1980) 89(3) Yale LF 421); see also Gross's similar definition: 'The concept of privacy' (1967) 42 NYULR 34, p 36. The issue of physical access is adequately dealt with by the law of trespass; it will be argued below that the issue of 'attention' can be addressed within an 'informational' paradigm, provided that term is conceived of with sufficient sensitivity and flexibility. Cf Wacks, op. cit., fn 1, p 76 (acknowledging the point as from unpublished work by Ruth Gavison). Parent agrees ('A new definition of privacy for the law' (1932) 2 Law and Philosophy 305, p 326).

22 Feldman, D, 'Secrecy, dignity or autonomy? Views of privacy as a civil liberty' (1994) 47(2) CLP 42, p 54.

23 Ibid, p 51. Feldman's view is that privacy protects persons operating in a given sphere from interference within that sphere by those who are outside it. He argues that within each different sphere of existence, privacy operates in four dimensions: 'space (including access to and control over material goods), time: action; and information' (ibid, p 52). Chapters 9 and 10 deal mainly with 'information'; control substantive autonomy. Personal dignity, which must be diminished when information relating to intimate aspects of a person's life is widely published, giving rise to feelings of violation, shame and embarrassment, is also afforded a measure of protection. Informational control also protects what Feldman identifies as the value in forming and maintaining spheres of social interaction and intimacy – for example, work colleagues, friends, family, lovers – which may be seen as essential to human flourishing.[24] It is clear that the intimacy that such relationships entail is predicated upon an ability of the individual to ensure that information which may be circulated within one sphere is not, without her knowledge or consent, transferred to another sphere or the outside world. A privacy law gives legal force to that ability.

Since considerations of this nature involve an implied contrast between the public and the private, it may be helpful at this point to consider the division between the two spheres in order to come closer to examining what may be encompassed by the notion of privacy. A variety of referents may be used. The public includes state activity, aspects of the world of work, the pursuit of public interests, while the private includes the home, the family the expression of sexuality and of the deepest feelings and emotions. Postulating such a division need not obscure the fact that these spheres are not entirely distinct, but may interact; the distinction is not, it is argued, dependent on physical space.[25]

The strength of claims that respect for individual autonomy has not been accorded may be affected, as the following chapters explain, by the nature of the obligation sought to be imposed on public authorities on private bodies, and by their potential effect on competing interests. 'Control over personal life' is treated under Art 8 as covering areas as disparate as allowing a homosexual to choose to express his or her sexuality free from state interference,[26] and enabling an individual to enjoy his or her property free from the attentions of reporters. On the one hand, the individual's privacy is invaded through the criminalisation of certain activities, while on the other the citizen is seeking a legal remedy to prevent an invasion of privacy. Thus both negative and positive obligations are placed on the state.

In the former case, if the homosexual were to be prevented from expressing his sexual orientation, the government would be using its coercive powers to give effect to the moral conviction that the homosexual's way of life is contemptible. Thus, it would clearly be failing in its duty to treat its citizens with equal respect; to prevent this, under the liberal analysis of rights; the homosexual should be given a 'strong' right to sexual autonomy which would overcome any competing claims of society. In contrast, the state, in failing to control the activities of the reporter, is not thereby giving expression to feelings of contempt for the individual's way of life; it is erring on over 'space' is dealt with by the law of trespass and property and is considered in Chapter 9; the 'action' and 'time' categories clearly raise issues of substantive autonomy, considered in Chapter 9, pp 961, 973. As regards the attempt to bring both informational and substantive autonomy under one definition: see Parent, W ('A new definition of privacy for the law' (1932) 2 Law and Philosophy 305), at pp 309 and 316 and Wacks, op. cit., fn 1, esp p 79.

24 Ibid, pp 51–69. As Fried notes, privacy is essential for 'respect, love, friendship and trust' – 'without it they are simply inconceivable' (Privacy' (1968) 77 Yale LJ 477, p 483).

25 See E Paton-Simpson, 'Privacy and the Reasonable Paranoid: the Protection of Privacy in Public Places' (2000) 50 University of Toronto Law Journal 305.

26 See Chapter 2, pp 74–87.

the side of free expression as it collides with the interest of the individual in securing her privacy. In this case, the individual's claim has to compete with the claim to free expression which the interest in moral autonomy does not face. In the case of public figures claiming privacy rights against the press, the argument that views free speech as essential in order to ensure meaningful participation in a democracy may have particular strength, depending on the nature of the free speech claim. This would be the case in relation to public figures where the information gained was clearly related to their fitness to carry out their public functions.[27] In the case of a purely private figure, or of private facts unrelated to the public function of public figures, freedom of expression would also compete with the claim of privacy. However, two of the important justifications for free speech – the arguments from truth and from political participation – would be largely irrelevant so that the strength of the free expression claim would be appreciably diminished.

It may be concluded that privacy is in a difficult position in so far as its ability to overcome other individual rights is concerned – if the values underpinning that other right are genuinely at stake. However, as Chapter 9 argues, the strength of both claims have to be weighed up when an apparent conflict arises.[28] Where preservation of privacy may lead to upholding an individual's moral autonomy, it is more clearly evident that it should be treated as a strong individual right able to overcome various public interests.

Domestic protection for privacy

Traditionally, UK law recognised no general right to respect for privacy, although there was some evidence, as will be seen, that the judges considered this to be an evil which required a remedy.[29] It has been argued that various areas of tort or equity, such as trespass, breach of confidence, copyright and defamation are instances of a general right to privacy,[30] but it is reasonably clear from judicial pronouncements that these areas and others were treated as covering specific and distinct interests which only incidentally offered protection to privacy[31] – despite the fact that the term 'privacy' was used in a number of rulings.[32] In such instances, it can usually be found that a recognised interest such as property actually formed the basis of the ruling. Thus, prior to the inception of the HRA, UK law offered only a piecemeal protection to priv and therefore a number of privacy interests were largely unprotected. In so far as the protection for privacy broadened in the years immediately prior to the inception of the HRA, the initiative came not from the courts or the government, but from Europe – either from 27 See Markesenis, B and Nolte, N, 'Some Comparative Reflections on the Right of Privacy of Public Figures in Public Places', in Birks, R, (ed), Privacy and Loyalty, 1997, Oxford, pp 118 et seq.

28 See pp 937–62.

29 Seipp, D, 'English judicial recognition of the right to privacy' (1983) 3 OJLS 325.

30 See Warren and Brandeis, 'The right to privacy' (1890) 4 Harv L Rev 193.

31 See the comments of Glidewell LF in Kaye v Robertson [1991] FSR 62, CA: 'It is well known that in English law there is no right to privacy . . . in the absence of such a right the plaintiff's advisers have sought to base their claim on other well-established rights of action'.

32 E.g., Prince Albert v Strange (1848) 2 De Gex & Sm 652; Clowser v Chaplin (1981) 72 Cr App R 342.

European Union Directives[33] or from decisions under the European Convention on Human Rights.[34]

When Art 8 of the Convention was received into domestic law under the HRA 1998, UK citizens acquired, for the first time, a guarantee of respect for their privacy. Under ss 6 and 7(1)(a) of the HRA the right is directly enforceable against public authorities, such as the police or security services, as discussed in Chapter 10, but not against private bodies, including the press, as discussed in Chapter 9. But citizens can sue private bodies relying on an existing cause of action, breach of confidence, looking to the court itself as a public authority under s 6 of the HRA, and to its obligations under s 12, to develop the action by reference to Art 8. In other words, as Chapter 4 argued, Art 8 can have indirect horizontal effect.[35] The precise nature of this effect is a complex matter which is not yet fully settled, as explored in Chapter 9.

33 See the section on Data Protection, Chapter 9, pp 926–37.

34 For decisions against the UK, see Chapter 9, pp 813–18.

35 See pp 249–56.

Chapter 9

Protection for personal information

1 Introduction[1]

The recent creation of a tort of invasion of privacy aimed at the protection of personal information has filled one of the most serious lacunae in English law. Described by the Law Commission as 'a glaring inadequacy',[2] and condemned by the Court of

1 This chapter draws in places upon Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, 'The Doctrine of Confidence as a Privacy Remedy in the Human Rights Act Era' [2000] 63 (5) MLR 660–93. Texts and articles that will be referred to in this chapter: Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act, 2006; Tugendhat and Christie, The Law of Privacy and the Media, 2002; Tambini, D and Heyward, C (eds), Ruled by Recluses? Privacy, Journalism and the Media after the Human Rights Act, 2002, Institute for Public Policy Research; Wacks, R, Personal Information, Privacy and the Law, 1993; Wacks, R, Privacy and Press Freedom, 1996, Blackstone; Markesinis, B (ed), Protecting Privacy (a collection of essays reviewing the concept of privacy and the law relating to it, especially in the context of personal information, in a number of jurisdictions), 1999; Paul, E, Miller, F and Paul, J (eds) The Right to Privacy, 2000, CUP; Harris, D, O'Boyle, K and Warbrick, C, Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1995; Younger Committee, Report of the Committee on Privacy, Cmnd 5012, 1972 (criticised: MacCormick, DM, 'A note on privacy' (1973) 84 LQR 23); Report of the Committee on Privacy and Related Matters, Chairman David Calcutt QC (Calcutt Report), Cmnd 1102, 1990; Calcutt, Review of Press Self-regulation, Cm 2135, 1993; National Heritage Select Committee, 'Privacy and media intrusion', Fourth Report, HC 291, 1993; Lord Chancellor's Green Paper, Infringement of Privacy, 30 July 1993, CHAN J060915NJ.7/93; Privacy and Media Intrusion, White Paper (1995) Cm 2918; Phillipson, G, 'Transforming breach of confidence? Towards a common law right of privacy under the Human Rights Act', (2003) 66(5) MLR 726 and 'Judicial Reasoning in Breach of Confidence Cases under the Human Rights Act: not taking privacy seriously? [2003] EHRLR (Privacy Special) 53; Morgan, J, 'Privacy in the House of Lords – Again' (2004) 120 Law Quarterly Review 563; Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, 'The Doctrine of Confidence as a Privacy Remedy in the Human Rights Act Era' [2000] 63 (5) MLR 660–93; Feldman, D, 'Secrecy, dignity or autonomy: views of privacy as a civil liberty' (1994) 47(2) CLP 42; Phillipson, G, 'The Human Rights Act, 'horizontal effect' and the common law' (1999) 62 MLR 824; Eady, D, 'A statutory right to privacy' (1996) 3 EHRLR 243; Markesinis, B, 'The right to be let alone versus freedom of speech' [1986] PL 67; Wilson, W, 'Privacy, confidence and press freedom' (1990) 53 MLR 43; Markesenis, B, 'Privacy, freedom of expression, and the horizontal effect of the Human Rights Bill: lessons from Germany' (1999) 115 LQR 47; Leigh, I, 'Horizontal rights, the Human Rights Act and privacy: lessons from the Commonwealth?' (1999) 48 ICLQ 57; Singh, 'Privacy and the media after the Human Rights Act' (1998) EHLR 712; Grosz, S and Braithwaite, N, 'Privacy and the Human Rights Act', in Hunt, M and Singh, R (eds), A Practitioner's Guide to the Impact of the Human Rights Act, 1999; Wright, J, 'How private is my private life?', in Betten, L (ed), The Human Rights Act 1998: What it Means, 1999; Elliott, M, 'Privacy, confidentiality, horizontality: the case of the celebrity wedding photographs' [2001] CLJ 231.

2 Law Commission Report No 110, Breach of Confidence, para 5.5. The Commission was referring specifically to the fact that 'the confidentiality of information improperly obtained . . . may be unprotected'.

Appeal,[3] dicta in a pre-HRA decision of the House of Lords[4] remarked upon '. . . the continuing, widespread concern at the apparent failure of the law' in this area.[5] That failure has now been remedied under a largely HRA-driven legal development. As this chapter will describe, this development, together with the Data Protection Act 1998, has led to the provision of quite a high degree of protection for personal information in UK law, although, as the House of Lords stated in Wainwright v Home Office,[6] there is still no general, comprehensive tort of invasion of privacy.

The developments discussed below are driving forward a respect for the privacy of personal information still not fully evident in the publishing of a number of media bodies, especially the tabloid press. The acquisition and use of personal information by state agents, with the purpose of preventing or detecting crime or protecting national security, is considered in Chapter 10. While Chapter 10 considers the laws relating to interception of communications and surveillance aimed at the regulation of investigative techniques by state agents, it must be remembered that they can also be used against intrusive methods employed by the media to gather information.[7] The laws and Codes regulating the use of personal information by a range of private and public bodies considered here should be examined in tandem with those 'privacy statutes' considered in Chapter 10, since all are part of a complex web of 'privacy' law. The press is one of the worst offenders, in terms of acquiring and publishing personal information non-consensually, and therefore the use of various legal provisions against the press forms a central theme in this chapter.

This chapter gives approval to the development of a tort of misuse of personal information that is occurring. However, in doing so the danger to media freedom must not be over-looked. That danger does not arise only from the operation of the new tort. The mass of laws that this chapter and Chapter 10 cover reveal a dangerous potential for their misuse by powerful private or public figures seeking to cover up matters of genuine public interest value. Injunctions represent one of the main remedies employed to protect private information. As Chapter 5 pointed out, once an injunction has been granted, any party that has notice of it, can under the Spycatcher doctrine,[8] be found to be in contempt if they publish the information covered by it.

But the new privacy tort is genuinely needed so long as it is balanced by protection for speech, so as to allow the publication of matters of genuine public interest. Warren and Brandeis' verdict in the nineteenth century, 'The Press is overstepping in every direction the obvious bounds of propriety and decency . . . [inflicting] through invasions

3 Kaye v Robertson [1991] FSR 62, CA.

4 Khan [1997] AC 558.

5 Ibid, per Lord Nicholls.

6 [2004] 2 AC 406 paras 28–35. See for discussion of Wainwright Chapter 11, pp 1176–79.

7 Clive Goodman, the royal editor of the News of the World, pleaded guilty in November 2006 to plotting to intercept private phone messages involving the royal family. Glenn Mulcaire also admitted the same charge. Mulcaire further admitted five charges of unlawfully intercepting voicemail messages left by a number of people, including publicist Max Clifford and Elle Macpherson. The charges, under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, related to interceptions between February 16 2006 and June 16. The conspiracy charge, under the Criminal Law Act, related to conspiring to intercept voicemail messages between November 1 2005 and August 9 2006 (the Guardian 29 November 2006).

8 See Chapter 5, pp 369–70.

of privacy . . . mental pain and distress far greater than could be inflicted by mere bodily injury',[9] is still alarmingly true today, over 100 years later. Anyone familiar with the output of our print media will be wearily aware of its penchant for publishing what one journalist has described as 'toe-curlingly intimate details' about the sex lives not only of celebrities, but of 'quite obscure people'.[10] Intrusive prurience is not the only complaint: Victim Support has detailed a large number of case histories in which ordinary victims of crime and their families had had their suffering markedly exacerbated by intrusive and insensitive publications in local and national newspapers describing their plight in quite needless detail, causing in some cases diagnosable psychiatric harm, making others feel forced to move from the area where the crime had been committed; causing all intense emotional distress.[11] In contrast to the position in the US and virtually every other Western democracy, such injuries had until recently no remedy in a privacy law in this country: a toothless Press Complaints Commission could only request the offending newspaper to print its adjudication on the matter.[12] It is frequently remarked of countries which have a privacy law, such as France and Germany, that their media does not exhibit the 'gutter' quality associated with the UK tabloid press.[13] In our cut-throat media market, the tendency of debased and lurid 'news' coverage in one newspaper to drive down the standards in another is very marked. Within this pervasive 'gutter' culture, which will influence the choices of readers, a newspaper which is unwilling to debase its standards may not survive, detracting from the diversity of opinion one would expect of a free press.

While the notion of respect for individual privacy could be said to be a clear underlying common law value,[14] it failed pre-HRA to find full expression, perhaps because intermittent governmental interest in the latter half of the twentieth century in statutory protection for privacy distracted the courts with the chimera of possible

9 'The right to privacy' (1890) IV(5) Harvard L Rev 193, p 196.

10 Marr, A, The Independent, 25 April 1996. In a conference speech, the editor of the Guardian, Alan Russbridger, listed a string of recent examples in which newspapers had published intimate details about the personal lives of celebrities, in some cases surreptitiously obtained, with either no or the flimsiest of 'public interest' justifications (Human Rights, Privacy and the Media, organised by the Constitution Unit, and the Centre for Communication and Information Law, UCL, 8 January 1999).

11 See Fourth Report of the National Heritage Select Committee on Privacy and Media Intrusion Minutes of Evidence, Appendix 24 HC 294-II (1993).

12 See below, pp 833–39 for discussion of the role of the Commission.

13 As Markesinis remarks, '. . . the possible extra-marital affairs of German politicians and businessmen hold little or no appeal for most readers of German newspapers.' (Markesinis, op. cit., fn 1.) See also: J Seaton, 'Public, Private and the Media' (2003) Political Quarterly 174.

14 See dicta of Laws J in Hellewell v Chief Constable of Derbyshire [1995] 1 WLR 804, p 807; Francome v Mirror Group Newspapers [1984] 1 WLR 892, in which the Court of Appeal recognised (in effect) a right to privacy in telephone conversations; Stephens v Avery [1988] Ch 449; dicta of Lord Keith in AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109, p 255, 'The right to personal privacy is clearly one which the law [of confidence] should seek to protect'. In the decision in Dept of Health ex p Source Informatics Ltd [2001] 2 WLR 953; (2000) The Times, 21 January, Simon Brown LJ stated clearly that in cases involving personal information, 'The concern of the law [of confidence] is to protect the confider's personal privacy'. In R v Khan [1997] AC 558, Lords Browne-Wilkinson, Slynn and Nicholls left open the question whether English law already recognised a right to privacy.

legislative action.[15] Quite clearly, however, no government in the past grasped this nettle, out of a fear of press hostility.[16]

The Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA), however, introduced Art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights into UK law, providing for a right to respect for private life.[17] While the general view is that Art 8 is not directly justiciable against the press or other private bodies,[18] it will be argued that its reception into UK law nevertheless provided an impetus for the notion of respect for privacy finally to find expression through the common law. The Data Protection Act 1998 (DPA) represents a further legislative development of immense significance for the protection of personal information. The Act has a very significant impact on all bodies that process personal data, including the press, and the interaction between the DPA and the HRA is complex and intriguing. Inevitably, tension has been generated by the incursion of the HRA and DPA into an area which previously was largely unregulated, being governed partly by media codes of practice and partly by relatively narrow (albeit expanding) common law doctrines.

This chapter will examine the impact that the HRA is having on the currently available measures protecting personal information and aspects of privacy more generally. Above all, it will concentrate on the development of the doctrine of confidence into a privacy remedy. The implications of this development of protection for privacy for freedom of expression will be considered, as will jurisprudence from other jurisdictions, including the jurisprudence generated by the American 'private facts' tort.[19] The developments discussed below, under the Communications Act 2003 and the DPA, were influenced by 15 The Younger Committee, Report of the Committee on Privacy (Cmnd 5012, 1972), Calcutt Committee on Privacy and Related Matters, hereafter The Calcutt Report (Cmnd 1102, 1990), Review of Press Self Regulation (Cm 2135), Fourth Report of the National Heritage Select Committee in 1993, HC 294-II (1993), all proposed the introduction of statutory measures to protect privacy, as did the Lord Chancellor's Green Paper of the same year (CHAN J060915NJ.7/93).

16 Such fear was clearly evident during the passage of the HRA itself. In response to the press outcry over the possibility that the Act would create a right to privacy, the government introduced a specific amendment in favour of press freedom (HRA, s 12, discussed below), and repeatedly and explicitly sought to reassure the press during the Bill's debate. As Lord Ackner put it, the Lord Chancellor devoted 'a very large part of his [second reading] speech . . . to trying to pour oil on ruffled waters.' (HL Deb Col 473, 18 November 1997). In fact, bearing in mind the effect of s 12(4)(b), discussed below, the government may have deceived the press as to the impact that s 12 was actually likely to have. For an example of blanket hostility from the press' representative body – the Newspaper Society – to the possible development of any privacy law in the UK, see Rasaiah, 'Current legislation, privacy and the media in the UK' (1998) 3(5) Communications Law 183.

17 As Chapter 2 explained, pp 69–91, Art 8 of the Convention provides a person with a right to respect for four different rights: 'his private and family life, his home and his correspondence'. Paragraph 2 then specifies a number of grounds permitting interference by 'a public authority' with this right.

18 See below, pp 824–29.

19 See below, esp p 855–87 for a discussion of the tort. Some emphasis is placed on the American tort since, in comparison with other common law jurisdictions, the case law is particularly rich, having been generated over a considerable period of time; further, the American tort had its genesis in the Warren and Brandeis reading of a number of English decisions, including some breach of confidence cases (in particular, Prince Albert v Strange (1848) 2 De Gex & Sm 652; Duke of Argyll v Duchess of Argyll [1967] 1 Ch 302; Pollard v Photographic Company (1888) Ch 345), and therefore is of relevance to the development of a cause of action growing from the same roots. However, as will become apparent, this chapter takes the stance that the protection offered in the UK is more effective and is much more soundly based in principle than that offered in the US; therefore the lessons to be learnt post-HRA from the US tort are becoming less relevant.

Art 8, but the work in developing the privacy rights was done initially by Parliament and then by the Regulator in both cases – the Data Protection Registrar and Ofcom (the broadcast regulator). The difficult area, and the one which has seen dynamic and dramatic development, was the transformation of the doctrine of confidence into a privacy law, under the impetus of the HRA.

The chapter begins by examining the protection offered under the HRA and Art 8. It then considers protection for privacy under media regulation; it moves on to look at specific reporting restrictions under statute and, in relation to children, under the jurisdiction of the court. It proceeds (in section 5) to consider the protection for privacy offered by trespass and defamation and against harassment by the Protection from Harassment Act 1997. That section acts partly as an introduction to the main part of this chapter, which (in section 6) examines the transformation of the doctrine of confidence into a privacy tort. The chapter then moves on to consider the over-lapping and further protection for personal information offered by the DPA. It ends with an examination of the method of balancing the protection for privacy offered by all these measures with protection for free speech under Art 10 ECHR, followed by a look at the remedies available for privacy-invasion.

2 Protection for personal information under the Human Rights Act

Strasbourg jurisprudence on protection for personal information

As Chapter 2 explained, Art 8(1) provides a 'right to respect for private and family life, the home and correspondence'; para (2) states:

> There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law and is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.[20]

There is a substantial Strasbourg jurisprudence on the data protection obligations of public authorities. It is clear that the actions of such bodies in the gathering, storing and use of information relating to private or family life, including photographs,[21] engages Art 8.[22] Certain categories of material, such as those relating to health[23] or sexual orientation or activity[24] are regarded as 'particularly sensitive or intimate',[25] requiring especially 20 See further Chapter 2, p 72.

21 Murray and Others v United Kingdom (1994) 19 EHRR 193 (photographing of a person at a police station without her consent was found to be a prima facie violation of Art 8).

22 See, e.g., Leander v Sweden (1987) 9 EHRR 433; McVeigh, O'Neill and Evans v United Kingdom (1981) 45 EHRR 71.

23 Z v Finland (1998) 25 EHRR 371.

24 Lustig-Prean v United Kingdom (1999) 29 EHRR 548; 7 BHRC 65.

25 Feldman, D, 'Information and privacy'; conference paper, Cambridge Centre for Public Law, Freedom of Expression and Freedom of Information, 19–20 February 2000.

compelling grounds to justify interference. As Chapter 10 will indicate, surreptitious methods of obtaining information, such as telephone tapping, are seen potentially as particularly serious breaches of Art 8 at Strasbourg.[26] This identifiable general trend suggests that this is another instance in which the emphasis should be on the evolutive nature of the Convention[27] rather than on the outcome of particular applications to the Commission, such as that in X v United Kingdom.[28] The Commission found that the actions of the police in taking and filing photographs without consent of a woman arrested for taking part in a political demonstration disclosed no prima facie breach of Art 8. The reasoning was unclear, but a central factor appeared to be the public and voluntary nature of her activities. The decision has been viewed as out of line with the trend of Art 8 jurisprudence: 'In the opinion of some scholars, the . . . decision may well be an outdated aberration in the case law of the Strasbourg organs'.[29]

The collection of personal information by private bodies, including, in particular, the press, sometimes using surreptitious means, and its publication, is in reality only one, often highly objectionable manifestation of data collection and processing. The strength of the jurisprudence on interferences with personal information by public bodies indicates that the interest in being free from such intrusion is one which, in general terms, falls within the ambit of Art 8. As a leading text in the area put it over ten years ago: 'the obligation of the state to respect private life by controlling the activities of its agents [in collecting personal information] ought to extend also to similar operations by private persons such as . . . newspaper reporters'.[30]

The simple transposition of Convention obligations upon public authorities onto private agents cannot be assumed in all instances covered by Art 8. But the Court found over 20 years ago[31] that Art 8 obligations may require the adoption of measures even in the sphere of relations between individuals. In other words, 'interference by a public authority' can mean 'unjustified failure by that authority to prevent interference by others'. Thus, the state is likely to be under a positive obligation to provide legal protection for the individual, even when public authorities are not themselves responsible for an interference with the Art 8 right.

However, Strasbourg originally approached the notion of an obligation to intervene between private parties with caution. It found that, in deciding whether there is even 26 Kopp v Switzerland [1998] HRCD 6 (356), para 72.

27 The Convention must be given an 'evolutive' interpretation (Johnstone v Ireland A 112, para 53 (1986)), which takes account of current standards in European society (Tyrer v UK A 26, para 31 (1978)). These would be expected to include the presence of privacy laws across Europe.

28 Appl 5877/72; (1973) 16 YBCHE, 328.

29 Bygrave, LA, 'Data protection pursuant to the right to privacy in human rights treaties' [1999] 6(3) IJLIT 247, p 265. Bygrave notes: '. . . there are good grounds for holding that it ought to be accorded little weight in present and future interpretation of Article 8'. In spite of these comments, however, Bygrave concedes that in the later decision of Friedl v Austria (1995) A 305B (not treated by the Court on the merits due to friendly settlement), 'the Commission laid weight upon the same . . . kind of factors as those mentioned in X v United Kingdom' (ibid, p 266). See also Stewart-Brady v UK (1999) 27 EHRR 284, in which a claim of an interference with Art 8 rights due to the taking of a photograph was declared inadmissible (although these findings were made in the context of positive state obligations and there was a conflict with Art 10).

30 Harris, D, O'Boyle, K and Warbrick, C, Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, p 310.

31 X and Y v Netherlands (1985) 8 EHRR 235.

a prima facie engagement of Art 8 in such a context, 'regard must be had to the fair balance that has to be struck between the general interest of the community and the interests of the individual'.[32] Thus, it appeared over 15 years ago that the gathering and subsequent publication of personal information by private bodies, including the press, would not automatically engage Art 8, as such actions would if carried out by a public body. When one turns to the case law directly on the question of the obligations of private parties to protect private information, a brief survey reveals both that it is quite meagre, and that until recently there were no directly relevant successful applications.

In order to understand quite why the Court took until recently such a cautious stance, it is necessary to appreciate the significance which the margin of appreciation doctrine has had in this context. The essence of the doctrine,[33] as Chapter 2 explained, is that in assessing compliance with the Convention, the Court will afford states a certain latitude, principally in deciding what kinds of interferences with Convention rights are necessary. The margin can widen or narrow depending on the circumstances of the case, resulting in a variation of the intensity of the Court's review of the state's actions. Three principal factors influence Strasbourg in conceding a particularly wide margin of appreciation: first, where a complainant seeks to lay a positive obligation on the state; second, where the harm complained of flows from the action of a private party, rather than the state itself, so that the so-called 'horizontal effect' of the Convention is in issue; third, where there is a potential conflict with another Convention right. Clearly, these factors may arise independently of each other. Or they may, as in the context under discussion, arise contiguously, thereby demanding that an especially wide margin should be allowed. In a number of the earlier private life decisions to be discussed, all three were present,[34] which may explain the somewhat unsatisfactory and misleading nature of some of those judgments.

Winer v UK,[35] decided over 20 years ago, is often seen as an unsatisfactory decision in privacy terms. The applicant complained that various aspects of his private life had been publicised in a book; he had settled a defamation case in respect of some of the statements made, but argued that he had no remedy under national law in respect of those which were truthful. His application was declared inadmissible, the Commission stating briefly that it viewed the available remedies, in particular that of defamation,[36] as satisfactory, and that no positive obligation to provide further remedies in respect of the truthful statements should be imposed, bearing in mind the wide margin of appreciation to be afforded in this area, the limitation of the Convention right to freedom of expression which such remedies would entail and the availability of a remedy in defamation. The applicant's privacy 'was not wholly unprotected'. However,

32 Cossey v UK A 184, para 37 (1990).

33 For discussion, see Chapter 2, pp 36–39; see also Fenwick, H, 'The right to protest, the Human Rights Act and the margin of appreciation' (1999) 62(4) MLR 491, pp 497–500.

34 All three were present in: Winer v UK (1986) 48 DR 154; Spencer (Earl) v UK (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105 and N v Portugal Appl No 20683/92, 20 February 1995; however, the third was influential only in Winer.

35 (1986) 48 DR 154.

36 The remedy represented by the doctrine of confidence was not explicitly adverted to, presumably because at the time of the application it was still viewed as having only marginal application to privacy.

the possibility was clearly left open of imposing a positive obligation on the state in an instance in which no national remedy was available.

The obvious example at that time, impliedly envisaged, would be an instance in which truthful, personal facts about an individual were published without consent and it was apparent that a defamation action had no or virtually no hope of success. In such circumstances, then, it was clear that an individual might be viewed as holding a privacy right, which the state would come under a positive obligation to respect, a finding which received some indirect support from the decision in N v Portugal.[37]

In Barclay v United Kingdom,[38] the Court accepted that a lack of a remedy in respect of the filming of a private home by reporters could in principle constitute a breach of Art 8, although on the facts no invasion of private life had occurred.[39] The decision made it clear that there was therefore no bar in principle to the application of the Court's general approach to interferences with personal information to the actions of private bodies. A decision that can be seen as something of a turning point in this context was Spencer (Earl) v United Kingdom.[40] The Commission dismissed as inadmissible Earl Spencer's claim that the UK Government had failed to protect him from invasions of privacy by the press[41] on the basis that he had failed to exhaust domestic remedies, namely breach of confidence. This judgment accepted that an interference with the right to respect for privacy had arguably occurred, and required a remedy, but that the doctrine of confidence would have provided one and should have been used. Had the Commission considered that the pleaded facts disclosed no arguable breach of Art 8, it would simply have so held – as the Court did in Barclay – and would not have instead decided the case on non-exhaustion of domestic remedies.

It was therefore clear that Spencer, far from suggesting that Art 8 did not require the UK to develop a privacy law, was decided on the assumption that it already had one, albeit at a relatively early stage of development. As Harris et al. put it in relation to the efficacy of domestic remedies for exhaustion purposes, the key issue in Spencer: 'in a common law system it [is] incumbent on an aggrieved individual to allow the domestic courts the opportunity to develop existing rights by way of interpretation'.[42] Thus, since the Commission in both Winer and Spencer could identify a remedy which, applying a wide margin of appreciation, it could view as sufficient, it found against the applicant. Had no remedy been identifiable, there are therefore grounds for assuming that the applications would have been declared admissible.

37 N v Portugal, Appl No 20683/92, 20 February 1995. A magazine publisher's application complaining of a breach of Art 10 after being convicted of defamation and invasion of privacy in respect of the publication of photographs of a well known businessman engaged in sexual activities was rejected as manifestly ill-founded. The Commission considered that the sanction was proportionate and necessary for the protection of the rights of others, one of which was clearly the right to protection from invasion of privacy through publication of true facts by other private individuals.

38 (1999) Appl No 35712/97 (admissibility only).

39 The property filmed was the island of Brecqhou, owned by the Barclay brothers. They had no home there, and were not present when the filming occurred.

40 (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105.

41 The applicants complained of publication in the press of various (truthful) stories relating to the bulimia and mental health problems of Countess Spencer, including photographs taken of her walking in the grounds of a health clinic.

42 Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op. cit., fn 1, p 611.

Individual decisions are not the only matters of relevance here, however. As the House of Lords stressed in ex p Kebilene: 'in the national courts also the Convention should be seen as an expression of fundamental principles rather than as a set of mere rules . . .'.[43] Strasbourg has found that the purpose of the Convention is to 'promote the ideals and values of a democratic society',[44] and to provide 'rights that are practical and effective' rather than 'rights that are theoretical or illusory'.[45] The Convention must be given an 'evolutive' interpretation[46] which takes account of current standards in European countries,[47] in which legal protection for privacy is the norm.[48] In the context of Art 8 it has been said: 'The Court has not perceived the rights in Article 8 in wholly negative terms – the right to be left alone. Instead it has acknowledged that states must ensure . . . the effective enjoyment of liberty'.[49] As suggested earlier, effective enjoyment of liberty cannot occur when persons who are constantly afraid of betraying information to the media are forced to order their choices in life as a consequence,[50] and it would appear to be a hallmark of a democratic society that it seeks to protect a person from any such curtailment of liberty.

Such general principles did not until recently receive enough attention in this context; the significance of the Spencer decision took some time to achieve widespread recognition,[51] perhaps due to a failure on the part of some commentators to appreciate the considerations outlined above, coupled with a tendency to concentrate on the apparently disappointing outcomes of the individual applications. Thus, a number of commentators, writing before the HRA had come fully into force, concluded that the Art 8 jurisprudence could not be said to require the courts to develop the common law so as to provide a remedy for non-consensual use of true but personal information. One commentator bluntly concluded: '. . . Strasbourg case law . . . does not require a specific remedy between private individuals'.[52] Another commented: 'The still unanswered question is whether Article 8 also requires a member state to provide a right of action against

43 R v DPP ex p Kebilene [1999] 3 WLR 972.

44 Kjeldsen v Denmark (1976) 1 EHRR 711, p 731; Socialist Party v Turkey (1999) 27 EHRR 51.

45 Airey v Ireland (1979) 2 EHRR 305, p 314.

46 Johnstone v Ireland A 112, para 53 (1986).

47 See Chapter 2, p 38; Tyrer v UK A 26 (1978), para 31. There are also numerous resolutions of the Council of Europe on effective protection for personal information (Nos 73(22) and 74(29)).

48 For discussion of the law in Germany, see Markesenis, B and Nolte, N, 'Some comparative reflections on the right of privacy of public figures in public places', in Birks, P (ed), Privacy and Loyalty, 1997; in relation to Germany, France and Italy see Chapters 2–5 of Markesenis, B (ed), Protecting Privacy, 1999; The Calcutt Report, op. cit., fn 1, paras 5.22–5.28 also discusses privacy protection in Denmark and the Netherlands.

49 Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op. cit., fn 1, p 303.

50 See above, pp 805–7.

51 One of the leading works on the Convention has no discussion at all of the issue of intrusion by the press into private life: Van Dijk, P and Van Hoof, F, Theory and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1998, pp 489–504; similarly the discussion of Art 8 in a pre-HRA textbook on media law makes no mention of the decision (Carey, P, Media Law, 1999, pp 79–81); Leigh in a 1999 article dealing with horizontality, the HRA and privacy, cites Winer, but not Spencer (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105, p 86 (op. cit., fn 1). The decision receives some attention from Grosz and Braithwaite (op. cit., fn 1), Singh (op. cit., fn 1) and Wright (op. cit., fn 1).

52 Leigh, op. cit., fn 1.

intrusions into private life by private persons . . .'.[53] Even pre-HRA it is contended that this question was not unanswered: the cases discussed above strongly implied that it should be answered in the affirmative.

Prior to the decision in Von Hannover, discussed below, Strasbourg had been prepared to extend the notion of private space beyond obvious places such as the home; as Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick put it: 'it is not enough just for the individual to be himself: he must be able to a substantial degree to keep to himself what he is and what he does . . . the idea of private space need not be confined to those areas where the person has some exclusive rights of occupancy'.[54] In this respect, the Strasbourg approach had been developing for some time in a direction which went beyond the pre-HRA UK common law approach. It was said over 10 years ago: 'the expanding understanding of private life set out in the Niemetz case indicates that a formal public/private distinction about the nature of the location will not always be decisive'.[55] Niemetz v FRG[56] concerned office premises, making it clear that rights to respect for privacy are not dependent on an interest in property or on a domestic environment. This approach was already taking root in the UK to an extent, and in other jurisdictions. In Broadcasting Standards Commission ex p BBC[57] it was found that privacy can be retained even in a place to which the public have access, such as a shop. The Canadian Criminal Code also reflects such a stance.[58]

So when the case of Von Hannover v Germany[59] was decided, making it clear that Art 8 does require that there should be a remedy for invasions of privacy by private parties, it was already apparent that this was the course that Strasbourg was preparing to take.[60] A significant decision pre-dating Von Hannover, and arguably highly indicative of the Court's eventual stance in that case, was Peck v United Kingdom.[61] Peck was a case about the obligations of public authorities, but it made it clear that media intrusion into privacy can lead to a breach of Art 8. The applicant had been captured on Council CCTV cameras, wandering through the street carrying a knife, immediately after he had attempted to commit suicide by cutting his wrists. This footage was passed by the local authority on to a news broadcast and a popular television programme, Crime Beat, both of which showed extracts from the CCTV footage, from which the applicant was recognisable, to an audience of hundreds of thousands.

The Court said that the relevant moment was viewed to an extent which far exceeded any exposure to a passer-by or to security observation and to a degree surpassing that 53 Nicol, D, 'Media freedom after the Human Rights Act 1998', conference paper (Human Rights, Privacy and the Media, organised by the Constitution Unit, and the Centre for Communication and Information Law, UCL, 8 January 1999); see also Naismith, 'Photographs, privacy and freedom of expression' (1996) 2 EHLR 150, p 156.

54 Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op. cit., fn 1, p 309.

55 Ibid, p 309.

56 A 251-B (1992).

57 [2000] 3 WLR 1327.

58 Section 487.01(4).

59 (2005) 40 EHRR 1; [2004] EMLR 21– for a summary and comment, see (2004) 5, EHLR pp 593–96.

60 See further: Stjerna v Finland, judgment of 25 November 1994, Series A no 299-B, p 61, § 38; and Verliere v Switzerland (dec), no 41953/98, ECHR 2001-VII).

61 (2003) 36 EHRR 41. For comment, see Welch, J [2003] EHRLR (Privacy Special) 141.

which the applicant could possibly have foreseen. Therefore the Court found that the disclosure by the Council of the relevant footage constituted a serious interference with the applicant's right to respect for his private life.[62] In terms of the proportionality of the interference, the Court accepted that the state has a strong interest in detecting and preventing crime and that the CCTV system plays an important role in furthering that interest. But the Court noted that the Council had other options available to it to allow it to achieve the same objectives. It could have identified the applicant through inquiries with the police and thereby obtained his consent prior to disclosure. Alternatively, the Council could have masked the relevant images itself, thereby concealing his identity. A further alternative would have been to take the utmost care in ensuring that the media, to which the disclosure was made, masked those images. The Court noted that the Council did not explore the first and second options, and considered that the steps taken by the Council in respect of the third were inadequate. It was concluded that the disclosure constituted a disproportionate and therefore unjustified interference with his private life and a violation of Art 8 of the Convention. The Court also found that the applicant had no effective remedy in relation to the violation of his right to respect for his private life. Therefore the Court also found a breach of Art 13.

Thus Peck established that for a public authority to release footage portraying private acts without consent to the broadcast media is prima facie a breach of Art 8, albeit subject to a freedom of expression defence, as discussed below. It appeared apparent that this principle could also be transposed into a situation in which the public authority dropped out of the picture and its place was taken by a broadcaster which was itself a public authority, such as (arguably) the BBC.[63] If BBC reporters had happened to be filming at the time in question for other purposes and had caught Peck's actions on camera, it would appear that the same principles would have applied, so there would have been a breach of Art 8 in that instance too. Peck did not make it clear that Art 8 would have been breached had a private, commercial broadcaster, such as ITV or Channel 5, made and broadcast such a film, and the Court expressly declined to consider whether such bodies could be considered organs of the state. But it can be said to be clear from the judgment that in principle a breach of Art 8 should be found to arise in that instance too on the basis that the state is under an obligation to afford victims a proper remedy even against private bodies.

Von Hannover[64] finally made it clear that had the filming of Peck been undertaken by a private media body which had then published the information, a breach of Art 8 would probably have arisen if Peck had been unable to obtain a domestic remedy. The word 'probably' is used since the facts of Peck and of Von Hannover differ significantly. However, Von Hannover made it clear that Art 8 rights are applicable in the private sphere and there is a positive obligation on the state to provide a remedy in national law. The case represented the culmination of a long legal fight by Princess Caroline of Monaco in the German courts to stop pictures of herself and her children, obtained by paparazzi without consent, appearing in various newspapers and magazines across Europe. The pictures were of the Princess engaged in various everyday acts: shopping, 62 At paras 62 and 63.

63 See discussion in Chapter 6, pp 530–31 as to whether the BBC is a functional public authority and as to its functions that may be considered public functions. See also Chapter 4, pp 233–35.

64 (2005) 40 EHRR 1; no 59320/00 [2004] EMLR 21.

horse-riding, at a beach club, or a restaurant. The German courts had afforded her a privacy remedy in relation to the more intrusive photographs she had complained of. The German Supreme Court[65] had refused to follow the approach of the Appeal Court that privacy 'stopped at the doorstep' and that therefore no action lay for invasion of privacy in respect of events which had taken place outside the home or other clearly private spaces. The approach indicated was that one may still be entitled to respect for privacy in semi-public places if, as the court put it, it is clear by reference to 'objective criteria' that one wishes to 'left alone' so that one can, 'relying on the fact of seclusion, act in a way that [one] would not have done . . . in public'. In other words, the interest in privacy was clearly distinguished from property interests. But the German court's approach still left the Princess's privacy unprotected to an extent. The Court found, unanimously, that the failure of the German courts to provide her with a remedy in relation to a number of the unconsented-to paparazzi pictures amounted to a breach of Art 8:

> The Court reiterates that although the object of Art 8 is essentially that of protecting the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities, it does not merely compel the State to abstain from such interference: in addition to this primarily negative undertaking, there may be positive obligations inherent in an effective respect for private or family life. These obligations may involve the adoption of measures designed to secure respect for private life even in the sphere of the relations of individuals between themselves.[66]

The Court found in relation to the specific facts of the case:

> In the present case there is no doubt that the publication by various German magazines of photos of the applicant in her daily life either on her own or with other people falls within the scope of her private life.[67]

The Court did not articulate the underlying reasoning behind this finding in any detail. However, this finding suggests that the Court equated the idea of 'daily life' with that of 'private life'. This was made clear in the following passage: 'the photos of the applicant in the various German magazines show her in scenes from her daily life, thus engaged in activities of a purely private nature such as practising sport, out walking, leaving a restaurant or on holiday.[68] These findings are discussed further below.[69]

In other words, although the photographs were taken in places that could be viewed as 'public' in the sense of open or semi-open to the public, the activities captured on film acquired a private quality since they self-evidently related to every-day life activities with no 'public life' dimension. The Princess was obviously not acting in her public capacity at the times in question – as when taking part in a ceremonious occasion. She was not engaging in activity of a more borderline private/public nature such as, for example, visiting war graves or paying homage to local monuments or dignitaries

65 BGH, 19 December 1995 BGHZ 131, pp 322–46.
66 Ibid at para 57.
67 Op. cit. at para 53.
68 Ibid para 61.
69 See pp 892–94.

while visiting a city informally. The Court stated that it had previously 'had regard to whether the photographs related to private or public matters'. It had also found that there is 'a zone of interaction of a person with others, even in a public context, which may fall within the scope of 'private life'.[70] These findings could be taken to suggest that the place in which activities occur is of secondary importance to the nature of the activities. In other words, while activities occurring in obviously private places such as the home are normally – not always – to be viewed as private activities by virtue of that fact, the converse is not the case.

The question is whether the activity need be of particular significance in privacy terms,[71] despite occurring in public, in order to overcome the 'public' character it might thereby appear to acquire, or whether the fact that the activity has all the hallmarks of a private activity while occurring in public should be the determining factor. Many of the 'every-day' activities engaged in by the Princess could have occurred in either public or private places. Swimming or dining or playing with her children provide obvious examples. It would not appear to comport readily with the values Art 8 is seeking to protect to impose an obligation on celebrities to confine such activities to private places in order to avoid paparazzi attention. This may be inferred from the finding at Strasbourg that Art 8 is 'primarily intended to ensure the development, without outside interference, of the personality of each individual in his relations with other human beings.'[72]

It is instructive to compare the stance of the Strasbourg Court in Von Hannover with that of the Californian Supreme Court in Gill v Hearst Publishing Co.[73] A husband and wife were photographed without consent while affectionately cuddling each other at a confectionery stand in a public marketplace. The Supreme Court of California ruled that the publication of the photograph did not in itself constitute an actionable invasion of privacy, stating:

> Here plaintiffs . . . had voluntarily exposed themselves to public gaze in a pose open to the view of any persons who might then be at or near their place of business. By their own voluntary action plaintiffs waived their right of privacy . . . In short, the photograph did not disclose anything which until then had been private, but rather only extended knowledge of the particular incident to a somewhat larger public . . .'

The objection to the Californian decision is that, echoing the argument of Paton-Simpson,[74] it demands that people adopt a paranoid, defensive stance towards interactions 70 Ibid at para 50. The findings referred to are from the previous decisions in PG and JH v United Kingdom, Appl No 44787/98, (2001), at para 56, and Peck v United Kingdom (2003) 36 EHRR 41, at para 57.

71 For example, sexual activity, relating to intimate relationships, health, medical treatment.

72 Botta v Italy (1998) 26 EHRR 241, at para 33.

73 253 P2d 441 (Cal. 1953); see also De Gregorio v. CBS, Inc, 473 NYS2d 922 (Sup 1984). Obviously the comparison is somewhat unfair to the Californian Court since its decision is over 50 years old.

74 See Paton-Simpson, E, 'Privacy and the Reasonable Paranoid: the Protection of Privacy in Public Places' (2000) 50 University of Toronto Law Journal 305. See also Paton-Simpson, E, 'Private circles and public squares: invasion of privacy by the publication of "private facts"' (1998) 61 MLR 318; McClurg, AJ, 'Bringing Privacy Law Out of the Closet: A Tort Theory of Liability for Intrusions in Public Places' (1995) 73 NCL Rev 989, esp at 990.

with each other in public. Confining interactions with others to an obviously private place would clearly have a stifling impact on them; it could further be argued that being forced in effect to confine solitary activities, such as swimming or walking, to private spaces would have a general deleterious effect on personal development. Homes and other private places are now subject to surveillance due to recent developments in surveillance technology in a way that 50 years ago was not possible. Thus, merely retiring behind a front door or a garden wall is no longer any safeguard against intrusion – intrusion can still be expected. If everyday activities are occurring in a home or semi-secluded place and could be viewed by paparazzi, the only argument against allowing such intrusion is that the person in question had sought seclusion – had had a legitimate expectation of privacy. But if that expectation could be transferred into non-private spaces – and Von Hannover indicates that it can – then the argument that a distinction between the two can be created is undermined. In other words, the question of affording a remedy should now turn on a changing cultural understanding of privacy and not on a simplistic distinction between places, based on physicality.

One commentator on Von Hannover found:

> In V*on Hannover* the Court accepted almost without question that Art 8 was engaged by the publication of the photographs. This might be thought to sit rather ill with its own judgment in Peck, where it seemed to be the fact that CCTV footage of the applicant was disseminated to a much wider audience than he could 'possibly have foreseen' together with the nature of the act he was engaged in (an unsuccessful suicide attempt) that led the Court to find that Art 8 was engaged.[75]

However, another reading of Peck might be to the effect that it was of most significance that the place in which an extremely private and intimate act occurred was not taken to be the deciding factor. Further, Peck did not close the door to a finding that less dramatically intimate activities occurring in public places could also engage Art 8.

The finding as to unexpectedly wide dissemination is, it is argued, irrelevant in Von Hannover: the Princess might have guessed – where Peck did not – that her activities would attract attention and that widespread dissemination would occur, but that factor could not stand in the way of Art 8 engagement since it would amount to accepting an implied consent to the publication of personal information whenever a celebrity, due to their celebrity status, was aware that dissemination would occur. Peck, as a non-celebrity, would not have attracted any attention, nor would there have been any dissemination of his activities had it not been for their dramatic nature. (Presumably, like thousands of others, he would have been captured on the CCTV cameras walking innocuously on the street and no dissemination of the pictures would have occurred.) Thus, unless celebrities are to lose much of their Art 8 protection purely by virtue of their celebrity status, account must be taken of the reality of paparazzi concerns: persons in Peck's position must perforce engage in activities of a striking, newsworthy nature – and therefore often inherently intimate and private – in order to attract journalistic attention. Persons in the Princess's position will constantly attract attention purely by virtue of their position, so there are strong reasons for differentiating between the positions of celebrities and non-celebrities under Art 8 in order to recognise the risk to which the one is exposed while the other is not. In common parlance, being photographed and followed while engaging in daily life activities is an invasion of privacy. So is being photographed when engaging in an activity of great personal significance in public. It is not evident, it is argued, that the unwelcome feelings generated in each instance – of outrage, humiliation, resentment of intrusion and so on – are conceptually distinct from each other.

75 (2004) 5 EHRLR, 593–96 (case comment).

Some scholars have tended to define the notion of 'private facts' restrictively. WA Parent's proposed definition of personal information, for example, is 'information about a person which most individuals in a given time do not want widely known [or which] though not generally considered personal, a particular person feels acutely sensitive about.'[76] This is, it is suggested, an out-dated and impoverished view of privacy. The trend in the Strasbourg jurisprudence has been incrementally to discard the simplistic public/private space dichotomy in favour of focusing on the public/private nature of activities.[77] The mere fact that an activity occurs in public should not be strongly determinative of Art 8 engagement. If a private life activity occurs in a public space, it is likely to fall within Art 8. To argue that because a 'private life' activity happens to occur in a public space it is required that the plaintiff demonstrate that an extra dimension of privacy was present, where this would not be necessary in a private place, is to place too much emphasis on the private/public place analysis – it is to allow it to re-enter by the back-door, having discarded it as initially determinative. If the activity is one that could readily occur in a public or a private place, and it is one which is self-evidently within the daily life sphere as opposed to the formal one, the case for Art 8 engagement that the Court clearly accepted in Von Hannover is a strong one. To fail to recognise this is to fail to understand the harm caused to personal every day life choices if they must be made under threat of surveillance. The Court took account of the reality of celebrity life in which constant surveillance by paparazzi amounts to harassment and even persecution:

> [The Princess] alleged that as soon as she left her house she was constantly hounded by paparazzi who followed her every daily movement, be it crossing the road, fetching her children from school, doing her shopping, out walking, practising sport or going on holiday[78] . . . The context in which these photos were taken – without the applicant's knowledge or consent – and the harassment endured by many public figures in their daily lives cannot be fully disregarded.[79]

But the concluding words of this statement make it clear that the Court is not basing its judgment on the element of harassment that was present, although that element

76 Parent, WA, 'A New Definition of Privacy for the Law' (1983) 2 Law and Philosophy 305, pp 306–7.

77 See on this point in relation to the privacy protection available in the US, Canada and New Zealand: Paton-Simpson, E, 'Privacy and the Reasonable Paranoid: the Protection of Privacy in Public Places' (2000) 50 University of Toronto Law Journal 305. Paton-Simpson notes: 'There are signs that Canadian and New Zealand courts may be more open to developing a degree of protection for privacy in public places than their American counterparts.'

78 Von Hannover v Germany (2005) 40 EHRR 1 at para 44.

79 Ibid, para 68 (emphasis added).

was taken into account. The judgment makes it clear that every-day activities of a personal nature can find Art 8 protection from press intrusion regardless of the place in which they occur and without the need to demonstrate that an especially intimate act was occurring. It was indicated in Sciacca v Italy[80] that there is no need for press harassment in order to bring reporting of daily life details within the scope of Art 8; the Strasbourg Court applied Von Hannover to a case that was not one of press harassment, and cited the jurisprudence of Von Hannover in general terms.[81]

The German approach in its reliance on seeking seclusion was less expansive – obviously – than the one adopted in Von Hannover. The Von Hannover approach is closest to that taken in France; one commentator summarised the French position in these terms: 'As a principle, acts pertaining to private life but performed in a public place deserve the protection of the law.' [82] Clearly, this stance could appear at first sight to threaten freedom of expression. However, the activities captured by photographers and complained of by the Princess were, it is argued, devoid of public interest value. As discussed in Section 8, below, the courts are developing a means of balancing Arts 8 and 10 against each other which should offer reassurance to those parts of the media which do not rely on relaying celebrity gossip as their staple fare.

The 'horizontal effect' of Art 8 under the Human Rights Act

Most public authorities and a number of private bodies engage in the processing of personal information. They are therefore subject to the provisions of the Data Protection Act (DPA) 1998[83] and any other relevant statute, such as the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, and such statutes must be interpreted compatibly with the Convention rights under s 3 of the HRA, whether or not both parties concerned are private bodies.[84] In ensuring that such statutes are interpreted compatibly with the Convention, it is clear that Art 8 is of particular relevance. In determining whether information is to count as private, Art 8 must now be viewed as the source of interpretation under ss 3 and 2 HRA. This is made explicit in the PCC Code, cl 3, and is clearly the case in respect of all statutory provisions which mention or could relate to personal information, including the DPA 1998. By virtue of ss 2 and 6 of the HRA, it is also the case in relation to the common law.

80 (Application 50774/99), at paras 27 and 29 of the judgment.

81 It should be noted however that the facts of Sciacca differed from those of Von Hannover in a number of respects and the breach of Art 8 was found on the basis that the interference was not in accordance with the law. The applicant had submitted that the dissemination of her photograph at the press conference had infringed her right to respect for her private life, contrary to Art 8 (right to respect for private life) of the Convention. The Court noted that the photograph, taken for the purposes of drawing up an official file, had been released to the press by the tax inspectors. According to the information in its possession, there was no law governing the taking of photographs of people under suspicion or arrested and assigned to residence and the release of photos to the press. It was rather an area in which a practice had developed. As the interference with the applicant's right to respect for her private life had not been 'in accordance with the law' within the meaning of Art 8, the Court concluded that there had been a breach of that provision.

82 Picard, E, 'The Right to Privacy in French Law', in Markesenis (ed), Protecting Privacy, op. cit., fn 1 at 91.

83 Unless they are excluded from its ambit: see p 929.

84 Due to the effect of HRA, s 3(1) which, in covering all statutes, also covers those which create a number of rights binding private bodies.

Where a body processing personal information (which includes its publication) is also a public authority it can be sued directly under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA in respect of breaches of Art 8 – thus creating a statutory tort of invasion of privacy applicable only against public authorities. But it now seems fairly clear that there is no possibility under the HRA of suing private bodies for breach of Art 8 of the Convention directly under s 7(1)(a), principally because, as Chapter 4 explained, s 6 of the Act makes the Convention rights binding only upon 'public authorities'. However, since the courts, as 'public authorities'[85] themselves have a duty not to act incompatibly with the Convention rights, this creates a role for the rights even in litigation between private parties, thus giving rise to indirect 'horizontal effect'. As discussed below, it now seems clear that this does not require the courts to create new causes of action in such litigation;[86] rather, the s 6(1) duty to act compatibly with the Convention rights can bite upon their adjudication of existing common law actions. This was confirmed by the House of Lords in Wainwright.

What precisely s 6(1) requires of the courts in private common law adjudication is a vexed and much discussed issue.[87] Space precludes full rehearsal of the numerous and complex arguments here; while one commentator has argued that the courts have an absolute duty to render all private common law compatible with the Convention rights,[88] others in the early post-HRA years perceived a much more limited duty.[89] This chapter will argue, as indicated in Chapter 4,[90] that it is now apparent in the context of privacy that the courts are coming much closer to accepting the absolute duty just mentioned, but that their position has not yet been fully resolved. Their initial reluctance in this context appeared to be due to a number of factors: the decision not to make

85 Section 6(3)(a).

86 See Chapter 4, pp 249–56. It was expected that this would be the case: there are clear Pepper v Hart statements in Parliament to this effect: see HL Deb Vol 583 Col 784, 24 November 1997 and op. cit., Vol 585 Col 841, 5 February 1998; HC Deb Vol 314 Col 406, 17 June 1998. There is also virtually unanimous agreement amongst the commentators on the point: Phillipson, G, 'The Human Rights Act, 'horizontal effect' and the common law' (1999) 62 MLR 824, pp 826–28; Hunt, M, 'The horizontal effect of the Human Rights Act' [1998] PL 423, p 442; Buxton LJ, 'The Human Rights Act and private law' [2000] 116 LQR 48; Markesenis, op. cit., fn 1, pp 72–73; Leigh, op. cit., fn 1, pp 84–85; Singh, op. cit., fn 1; cf Wade, W (Sir), 'The United Kingdom's Bill of Rights', in Forsyth, C and Hare, I (eds), The Golden Metwand and the Crooked Cord: Essays in Honour of Sir William Wade QC, 1998, pp 62–63; Beyleveld, D and Pattinson, S, 'Horizontality applicability and horizontal effect' (2002) 118 LQR, 623.

87 See further Markesenis, B, 'Privacy, Freedom of Expression, and the Horizontal Effect of the Human Rights Bill: Lessons from Germany' (1999) 115 LQR 47; Leigh, I, 'Horizontal Rights, the Human Rights Act and Privacy: Lessons from the Commonwealth?' (1999) 48 ICLQ 57; Singh, R, 'Privacy and the Media after the Human Rights Act' (1998) EHRLR 712; Grosz, S and Braithwaite, N, 'Privacy and the Human Rights Act' in Hunt, M and Singh, R, (eds) A Practitioner's Guide to the Impact of the Human Rights Act, 1999, Hart (only partially concerned with media intrusion); Sir Brian Neill, 'Privacy: A Challenge for the Next Century' in Markesenis (ed) Protecting Privacy, 1999, Clarendon; Wright, J, 'How Private is my Private Life?' in Betten, L, (ed), The Human Rights Act 1998: What it Means, 1999. See further Chapter 4, pp 252–56.

88 Hunt, M, 'The horizontal effect of the Human Rights Act' [1998] PL 423, pp 439–43.

89 See, e.g., Leigh, I: the HRA 'does not formally change the approach to Convention questions in the [private] common law' (op. cit., fn 1, pp 82–83). See also Feldman, D, 'The Human Rights Act 1998 and constitutional principles' (1999) 19 LS 165, p 201.

90 See pp 255–56.

the Convention rights themselves binding upon private bodies meant that in the private sphere they could be viewed not as rights to enforce but only as legal values;[91] such a duty would have required courts to overturn settled common law rules and principles;[92] it would 'indirectly impose a very significant degree of liability on private bodies . . . contrary to the general scheme of the Act and the clear intention of its sponsors'.[93] It appeared at one point that the courts were only obliged, when engaged in common law adjudication, to develop and apply the law by reference to relevant Convention rights, treating them as legal principles having a variable weight, depending on the context.[94] But, as Chapter 4 indicates, the courts are close to accepting – in the context of privacy, but not, so far, in other contexts – that the common law must be developed compatibly with the rights. Lord Nicholls said in Campbell:

> The values embodied in articles 8 and 10 are as much applicable in disputes between individuals or between an individual and a non-governmental body such as a newspaper as they are in disputes between individuals and a public authority. In reaching this conclusion it is not necessary to pursue the controversial question whether the European Convention itself has this wider effect.[95]

In Douglas III,[96] Lord Phillips considered that the House of Lords had accepted the doctrine of indirect horizontal effect in Campbell v MGN[97] and in Re S (a child).[98] Lord Phillips summarised Lady Hale's comments on the matter:

> Baroness Hale said that the Human Rights Act did not create any new cause of action between private persons. Nor could the courts invent a new cause of action 91 Phillipson, op. cit., fn 1 (1999) pp 834–37. It now appears that this is not, however, the case so far as HRA, s 3 is concerned: see Wilson v First County Trust [2001] 3 All ER 229, discussed in Chapter 4, p 149.

92 Phillipson, ibid, pp 838–40.

93 Phillipson, ibid, p 848; see also p 840.

94 Phillipson, ibid, pp 843–44. Buxton LJ (Buxton LJ, 'The Human Rights Act and private law' [2000] 116 LQR 48) argued that the HRA would have no impact at all on private common law: the rights could not even figure as principles or values in such a context, he argued, since they 'remain, stubbornly, values whose content lives in public law' (ibid, p 59). This argument, it is suggested, could not be reconciled, even pre-HRA, with the findings of the Commission in Spencer, and the Court in Barclay (discussed above) that the actions of private agents can engage Art 8, requiring domestic courts, through the common law, to offer redress. Nor could it be reconciled with the approach of the House of Lords pre-HRA in the decision in Reynolds v Times Newspapers [1999] 4 All ER 609 where, in the context of a private defamation action, their Lordships regarded the Convention as of great importance; (see esp ibid, pp 621–22, per Lord Nicholls; ibid, pp 628, 635, per Lord Steyn). Lord Nicholls specifically stated that, following the coming into force of the HRA 1998, 'the common law is to be developed in a manner consistent with Art 10' (ibid, p 622); Lord Steyn observed that, with the coming into force of the HRA 1998, 'The constitutional dimension of freedom of expression is reinforced' (ibid, p 628). Neither of their Lordships appeared to consider the private nature of the proceedings of significance in this respect.

95 [2004] 2 WLR 1232 at paras 17 and 18. (But now, as discussed, the post-Campbell decision in Von Hannover v Germany (2004) Appl No 59320/00, affirmed that the Convention does have this effect.)

96 [2005] EWCA 595.

97 [2004] 2 WLR 1232.

98 [2005] 1 AC 593.

> to cover types of activity not previously covered. But where there is a cause of action the court, as a public authority, must act compatibly with both parties' Convention rights.[99]

It is perhaps too soon to say that the Courts have fully accepted a position in which they are bound to act compatibly with the Convention rights in developing private common law actions, but it is suggested that they are on the cusp of doing so, and this chapter will proceed on the basis that that is the position they are in the process of adopting. In HRH Prince of Wales v Associated Newspapers Ltd[100] Lord Phillips in the Court of Appeal said:

> The English court has recognised that it should also, in so far as possible, develop the common law in such a way as to give effect to Convention rights. In this way horizontal effect is given to the Convention. This would seem to accord with the view of the Strasbourg court as to the duty of the court as a pubic authority; see: Von Hannover v Germany.[101]

The caveat contained in the words 'so far as possible' may indicate that the courts are holding back from accepting the absolute duty to give effect to the rights within the common law in the sense that it might be impossible to give effect to the rights where they conflicted with clear common law rules. But Buxton LJ in the Court of Appeal in McKennit v Ash[102] summed up the post-Campbell position without any such caveat:

> . . . judges of the highest authority have concluded that that follows from section 6(1) and (3) of the Human Rights Act, placing on the courts the obligations appropriate to a public authority: see Baroness Hale of Richmond in Campbell at 132; Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers in Douglas v Hello! at 53; and in particular Lord Woolf in A v B plc [2003] QB 195[4]: under section 6 of the 1998 Act the court, as a public authority, is required not to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right. The court is able to achieve this by absorbing the rights which articles 8 and 10 protect into the long-established action for breach of confidence. This involves giving a new strength and breadth to the action so that it accommodates the requirements of those articles.

The word 'accommodate' suggests that the action in question should reflect the Convention rights, even if the Convention requirements do conflict with established common law rules.

In the area of privacy with which this chapter is concerned, the distinction between having regard to the Convention rights and having an absolute duty to act compatibly with them when applying existing common law, appeared in relation to the early post-HRA 'privacy' cases to be of little practical significance. That is because the difference between the two models would be of most practical importance when a clear imperative

99 Op. cit. at para 52.
100 [2006] EWCA Civ 1776, [2006] All ER (D) 335.
101 (2005) 40 EHRR 1 at paras 74 and 78.
102 [2006] EWCA Civ 1714.

from the Convention clashed with a well-defined pre-existing common law rule or principle. A judge accepting an absolute duty would be bound to override the common law, whereas under the weaker model, the Convention would provide only a reason for changing it. However, until the ruling in Von Hannover such a direct clash appeared to be unlikely to occur in this area. The indeterminacy and paucity of pre-Von Hannover Strasbourg jurisprudence on this aspect of Art 8 meant, as explored above, that English courts were likely to glean from it general principles and guidance, rather than clear-cut rules, which might have conflicted with the common law. Von Hannover provided the clear-cut rule which was previously lacking, and so brought the courts closer to confronting the decision to adopt either the 'absolute duty' rule or the 'giving regard to' test. But although this argument suggests that the judges may now have to extend the boundaries of the doctrine of confidence further than they have done in order to accommodate the Von Hannover rule, it is also suggested that confidence does not present them with a clear-cut common law rule that would have to give way. While the common law doctrine of trespass continues to lack flexibility, the currently very fluid and flexible boundaries of the doctrine of confidence, discussed below, made it unnecessary to override clear pre-existing rules of the action in order to achieve Convention-compliance, and this still appears to be the case in the face of the current more well defined and more radical Strasbourg privacy jurisprudence. On the other hand, the doctrine of confidence has changed out of all recognition under the impetus of the HRA, so although they may not have fully acknowledged it, the judges appear to be accepting the absolute duty to give effect to the rights.

There were, moreover, always strong arguments of principle which in the post-HRA years may have persuaded judges inclined to treat the Convention rights only as relevant principles to afford them an especially high weight when dealing with invasions of privacy by the media,[103] or other powerful conglomerates, thus minimising the difference between the stronger and weaker models of indirect horizontal effect. The power of such bodies to invade privacy is arguably equal to that of the state, rendering the drawing of a sharp, formalistic distinction between the state and the private agent, whereby rights are upheld against the one but not the other, unjustified at the level of principle. Moreover, in contrast with certain instances in the private sphere in which a plaintiff might have freely agreed to a diminution of his rights by another,[104] the invasion of individual rights by certain private bodies, particularly the press, may be as involuntary as if perpetrated by the state. Thus, for a number of reasons the course that has been taken in this context, by the incremental steps described below, was not one that required difficult decisions to be made at each stage. The favoured common law mode of reasoning, resembling the creeping in of the tide rather than the breaching of a dam, lent itself very readily to this new context.

103 For further argument on this point, see Phillipson, 1999, op. cit., fn 1, pp 846–47.

104 E.g., where a schoolteacher accepted a job at a Catholic school and signed a contract which provided that s/he would not publicly deny any of the fundamental doctrines of the Catholic Church. Strasbourg has quite readily accepted restrictions on Convention rights where these are said to have been voluntarily accepted by the applicant as a result of their employment: see, e.g., Ahmed v UK (1982) 4 EHRR 125; Stedman v UK (1997) 23 EHRR CD 168; Rommelganger v Germany (1980) 62 D&R 151 (no violation of Art 10 when employee of Catholic hospital dismissed for expressing pro-abortion views).

Judicial responses to the Strasbourg jurisprudence

Under the HRA, then, courts began by allowing Art 8 to figure as a relevant, weighty principle in considering privacy complaints raised within the common law. They have now reached a point at which they appear to accept that they must develop the common law so as to be compatible with Art 8, even where that quite fundamentally changes the nature of the law. A key factor has been the response of the courts to the Strasbourg jurisprudence on that Article examined above, since it is that case law, rather than Art 8 itself, which articulates the need for protection for personal information intrusion. When considering any issue under the Convention, s 2(1) HRA requires the domestic judiciary to take any relevant Strasbourg jurisprudence into account.[105] Since they are not bound by the case law, the courts could depart from it when so minded. However, as Chapter 4 pointed out, the courts tend to follow Strasbourg jurisprudence where it is of a settled nature.

If the courts had merely attempted to reach the same decisions as Strasbourg would have done, they would in effect have been applying the international law doctrine of the margin of appreciation in a domestic setting. As Chapter 4 pointed out, commentators have agreed,[106] and the House of Lords[107] has stressed, this would be wholly inappropriate. But a further and more difficult step is required: in applying Strasbourg jurisprudence under s 2 HRA, judges should attempt to disregard those aspects of the judgment which were attributable to the doctrine, difficult though this task clearly is.[108] Judges of a conservative bent, who wish to adopt a minimalist approach to the domestic application of the Convention,[109] might not take this further step or it might be merely overlooked: thus, while pronouncing the margin of appreciation doctrine inapplicable, judges could in fact rely fully on the outcomes of decisions at Strasbourg, without adverting to the influence of the doctrine on those outcomes.

This indeed was the approach arguably adopted in the House of Lords decision in Ex p Kebilene,[110] and the earlier case of Khan.[111] This approach would have been wholly mistaken in considering the application of Winer and Spencer to domestic law, and in fact it was not adopted: it could have lead to the mistaken assumption that the failure of both applications reflected the lack of a requirement under Art 8 to provide a remedy for non-consensual disclosures of true but personal information. As indicated below,

105 See Chapter 4, pp 191–99.

106 See Laws LJ, speaking extra-judicially ('The limitations of human rights' (1999) PL 254, p 258): 'The margin of appreciation . . . will necessarily be inapt to the administration of the Convention in the domestic courts'; Feldman, D, 'The Human Rights Act 1998 and constitutional principles' (1999) 19 LS 165, p 192: 'The doctrine will have no application in national law'; see further Chapter 4, p 263–65.

107 In DPP ex p Kebilene and Others [1999] 3 WLR 972, p 1043, Lord Hope of Craighead said: 'This technique [the doctrine] is not available to the national courts when they are considering Convention issues arising in their own countries.'

108 See Chapter 4, pp 278–79.

109 E.g., Buxton LJ, who believes that it has no place in private common law proceedings (Buxton LJ, 'The Human Rights Act and private law' [2000] 116 LQR 48).

110 [1999] 3 WLR 972. The decisions concerned included H v UK Appl No 15023/89 and Bates v UK Appl No 26280/95; see further Chapter 4, pp 270–73.

111 [1997] AC 558, HL; the Strasbourg decision in question was Schenk v Switzerland A 140 (1988).

the courts have not adopted a minimalist approach in this context.[112] Their acceptance that they should provide such a remedy in fact pre-dated Von-Hannover. But Von Hannover now confirms that the UK courts took an approach which was consistent with the developments occurring at Strasbourg in adopting an increasingly strong line in relation to privacy complaints. At Strasbourg and domestically it is possible to say that from 2004 to 2007 a clear shift occurred in fully recognising a right to privacy to be exercised against the media.

Moreover, in this area, there is no justification for the replacement of the margin of appreciation doctrine with a domestic version, whereby the courts take a restrictive approach to the protection of Convention rights, in deference to the 'area of judgment' or 'discretion' of another body,[113] in this case, to Parliament's presumed intent in not enacting a law of privacy. It is quite clear that the sponsors of the HRA explicitly contemplated the creative development of the common law to protect privacy. During the debate on the Bill, Lord Irvine said: 'it must be emphasised that the judiciary are free to develop the common law in their own independent judicial sphere', remarked that the judges were 'pen-poised' to develop a right to privacy through the common law, and contended that 'it will be a better law if [they] developed it after incorporation because they will have regard to Articles 8 and 10 [of the Convention]'.[114] The introduction of s 12 of the Act, strengthening press freedom, was clearly premised on the understanding that the Act might well drive forward the development of common law causes of action protecting privacy against the press.

Since there were, therefore, no grounds for deference to the judgment of another body in this context, and given the clear need to strip away its margin of appreciation aspects from the Strasbourg jurisprudence, the 'activist' approach to the application of such jurisprudence,[115] which led to positive development of the law in this area, was justified.

3 Broadcasting regulation and press self-regulation

Introduction

Successive governments have considered that the press should regulate itself as regards protection of privacy rather than using civil or criminal sanctions. Self-discipline has been preferred to court regulation in order to preserve press freedom. In contrast,

112 See pp 882–83, 889–90, 893–94.

113 See further Chapter 4, pp 265, 274–78, 280–84 for post-HRA discussion of decisions on the subject; it was pointed out that Lord Hope in Ex p Kebilene [1999] 3 WLR 972 said: 'In some circumstances it will be appropriate for the courts to recognise that there is an area of judgment within which the judiciary will defer, on democratic grounds, to the considered opinion of [the democratic body or person] whose act or decision is said to be incompatible with the Convention.' See also Lord Hoffmann, 'The Human Rights Act and the House of Lords' (1999) 62(2) MLR 159, esp p 161; Laws LJ, 'Wednesbury', in Forsyth and Hare (eds), The Golden Metwand and the Crooked Cord: Essays in Honour of Sir William Wade QC, 1998, p 201; Pannick, D, 'Principles of interpretation of Convention rights under the Human Rights Act and the discretionary area of judgment' [1998] PL 545, pp 549–51.

114 HL Deb Col 784, 24 November 1997.

115 For further discussion of this term, see Chapter 4, pp 278–81.

as Chapter 6 indicated, broadcasting privacy regulation has a statutory basis and the broadcast regulators are government-appointed. The model used for broadcasting has diverged in a number of respects from the press self-regulatory scheme.

Certain especially sensitive information is covered by these regulatory models, but is also the subject of specific reporting restrictions, discussed in Section 4 below. In some instances, these were adopted once it was clear that self-regulation could not be trusted to ensure that some newspapers would behave responsibly.[116] The media are also subject to the DPA 1998 in respect of their processing of personal information, although, as explained below, the Act does not provide a full protection against intrusion on privacy by the media.

There is an obvious tension between press self-regulation, broadcasting regulation and the demands of Art 8 of the Convention, introduced into UK law by the HRA. As discussed below, the Press Complaints Commission (PCC) and Ofcom (previously the Broadcasting Standards Commission (BSC)) have powers to adjudicate upon violation of their respective privacy codes. Their adjudications will be published by offending newspapers or broadcasters and Ofcom can also fine offenders; this arguably constitutes some 'respect' for private life.[117] The requirement to broadcast Ofcom adjudications is statutory in the case of the independent broadcasters; it arises under its Agreement in the case of the BBC. Thus Ofcom, which has powerful sanctions at its command, as detailed further in Chapter 6,[118] might be viewed as more likely to provide an effective remedy for breaches of Art 8. But the press is subject to no similar constraints.

When the European Commission on Human Rights considered the PCC in Spencer (Earl) v UK,[119] it made no suggestion that its activities could satisfy the requirement of respect for private life. Rather, it pointedly remarked: 'the PCC has no legal power to prevent publication of material, to enforce its rulings or to grant any legal remedy against the newspaper in favour of the victim'. Thus, it is reasonably clear that reliance on the PCC alone is inconsistent with the Convention principle that rights should be 'practical and effective', not 'theoretical or illusory'.[120] Peck v UK[121] made it clear that self-regulation cannot be considered an adequate way of protecting Art 8. In relation to the relevant regulation of the broadcast media, which are subject to a much tougher regulatory regime on privacy matters than the press, the Court found, in relation to the provision of a remedy for breach of Art 8:

> The Court finds that the lack of legal power of the Commissions to award damages to the applicant means that those bodies could not provide an effective remedy to him. It notes that the ITC's power to impose a fine on the relevant television company does not amount to an award of damages to the applicant.[122]

116 The law regarding the anonymity of rape complaints was prompted by public outrage in 1986 after the Sun published without her consent a picture of a rape victim in the 'Ealing vicarage' rape case taken as she was leaving church. The Press Council adjudication one year later censured the Sun for its unwarranted invasion of privacy: Press Council, the Press and the People 1987, p 241.

117 See further Wright, op. cit., fn 1, pp 137–38.

118 See pp 519–22.

119 (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105.

120 Airey v Ireland (1979) 2 EHRR 305, p 314.

121 (2003) 36 EHRR 41.

122 Op. cit. at para 109.

Thus, a fortiori, the PCC system cannot be viewed as providing an effective remedy. The Ofcom regime, although it is more effective, does not appear to satisfy the demands of Art 8 either: no damages for the complainant are available and the sanctions only operate post-broadcast. This question is considered further below. So it is apparent that self-regulation of the press is no longer sufficient to protect privacy. Judicial recognition of the need to provide further protection for privacy, reflecting the demands of the HRA, is now fully apparent.[123] The self-regulatory regime described below, therefore, may become increasingly marginalised by actions relying on common law privacy liability under the impetus of the HRA, which is considered in Section 6 below. The broadcasting regime is also influenced by the HRA, but less radically.

Press self-regulation

The Press Council

The Press Council was created in 1953 with a view to allowing the press to regulate itself. It issued guidelines on privacy and adjudicated on complaints. It could censure a newspaper and require its adjudication to be published. In practice, however, a number of deficiencies became apparent: the Council did not issue clear enough guidelines, its decisions were seen as inconsistent and in any event ineffective: it had no power to fine or to award an injunction.[124] Moreover, it was seen as too lenient; it would not interfere if the disclosure in question could be said to be in the public interest, and what was meant by the public interest was uncertain. Its inefficacy led the Younger Committee, convened in 1972, to recommend a number of proposals offering greater protection from intrusion by the press.[125] These proposals were not implemented but, by 1989, a perception had again begun to arise, partly influenced by Kaye v Robertson,[126] (discussed below) that further measures might be needed to control the press, although at the same time there was concern that they should not prevent legitimate investigative journalism. This perceived need led eventually to the formation of the Committee on Privacy and Related Matters chaired by Sir David Calcutt (hereafter 'Calcutt 1') in 1990[127] which considered a number of measures, some relevant to actual publication and some to the means of gathering information. The Committee decided that improved self-regulation should be given one final chance and recommended the creation of the Press Complaints Commission, which was set up in 1991 to police a Code of Practice for the press.

123 See pp 876–915 below.

124 See further Levy, HP, The Press Council, 1967.

125 The Committee considered the need for legal curbs on the press; it recommended the introduction of a tort of disclosure of information unlawfully acquired and a tort and crime of unlawful surveillance by means of a technical device. See Younger Committee, Cmnd 5012, 1972; criticised: MacCormick, op. cit., fn 1.

126 [1991] FSR 62.

127 Report of the Committee on Privacy and Related Matters, Cm 1102, 1990 (Calcutt Report); for comment see Munro, C, 'Press freedom – how the beast was tamed' (1991) 54 MLR 104.

The Press Complaints Commission

After self-regulation by the Press Complaints Commission in accordance with the revised Code of Practice had been in place for a year, Sir David Calcutt (hereafter 'Calcutt 2') reviewed its success[128] and determined that the Press Complaints Commission 'does not hold the balance fairly between the press and the individual (it is in essence a body set up by the industry (dominated by the industry'. He therefore proposed the introduction of a statutory tribunal which would draw up a revised code of practice for the press and would rule on alleged breaches of the code; its sanctions would include those already possessed by the Press Complaints Commission and in addition the imposition of fines and the award of compensation. When the matter was considered by the National Heritage Select Committee[129] in 1993, it rejected the proposal of a statutory tribunal in favour of the creation of another self-regulatory body to be known as the Press Commission, which would monitor a Press Code and which would have powers to fine and to award compensation. It also decided that a regulatory level beyond the commission was needed and recommended the setting up of a statutory Press Ombudsman.

However, the then Conservative Government did not respond to these proposals, making no move to appoint a new self-regulatory body or to give the Press Complaints Commission new powers. It responded to the National Heritage Select Committee in 1995,[130] stating that the system of voluntary self-regulation was to be preferred to statutory measures. It also noted various improvements in that system. The Commission itself had decided in January 1994 to appoint a Privacy Commissioner with the power to recommend that newspaper editors should be disciplined for breaching the Press Code. In January 1995, Lord Wakeham was appointed Chairman of the Commission and served until 2001; he was strongly in favour of continued self-regulation and pointed to a number of improvements made in the system, including the fact that the Commission by that point had a strengthened lay majority. The government did, however, make some suggestions for improvement in the system, including the establishment of a press hotline whereby the PCC could warn editors, thought likely to publish a story in breach of the Code, of the consequences of so doing. It also proposed that a fund should be set up in order to compensate members of the public whose privacy has been invaded. Neither proposal was implemented.

Policing the Code of Practice

The Press Complaints Commission agreed a Code of Practice in 1990, which the newspapers accepted. In 1997, the Code was made more restrictive; it was revised again in 2004 and 2005. The PCC Code was given added status in 2000 since it, and the Ofcom Broadcasting Code discussed below, are recognised in s 12(4)(b) of the HRA

128 Review of Press Self-regulation, Cm 2135.

129 Fourth Report of the Committee 294–91, Privacy and Media Intrusion, Fourth Report, HC 291–1 (1993).

130 Privacy and Media Intrusion, Cm 2918, 1995.

and in s 32(3)of the DPA.[131] Section 12(4)(b) requires that when a court is considering a grant of relief that could affect the exercise of Art 10 rights it should, inter alia, have regard to 'any relevant privacy code'. In this sense the HRA affords the PCC statutory recognition and s 12 provides the balancing act between free expression and privacy that should be carried out by the PCC code with a statutory basis.

The Commission can receive and pronounce on complaints of violation of the Code and can demand an apology for inaccuracy, or that there should be an opportunity for reply. It receives around 200 privacy complaints annually.[132] The current Chair is Sir Christopher Meyer; there are 17 Commission members; a majority of them have no connection with the press. There are three classes of members: the Chairman, Public Members and Press Members. The independent Chairman is appointed by the newspaper and magazine publishing industry. He must not be engaged in or, otherwise than by his office as Chairman, connected with or interested in the business of publishing newspapers, periodicals or magazines. The same constraint applies to the Public Members. Each of the Press Members must be a person experienced at senior editorial level in the press.

Code provisions

Clause 3(i) of the PCC Code incorporates part of the wording of Art 8(1) into the Code; it provides: 'Everyone is entitled to respect for his or her private or family life, home, health and correspondence,' and that publications intruding into private life without consent must be justified. When Clause 3 was amended in 2004 it added 'everyone is entitled to respect for his or her private . . . correspondence, including digital communications'. The Code makes special mention of hospitals and similar institutions in cl 8 and requires that the press must identify themselves and obtain permission before entering non-public areas of such institutions. Intrusion into grief and shock must be done with sympathy and discretion under cl 5.

Children receive special protection under cl 6: they must not be interviewed or photographed on subjects involving the welfare of the child or any other child in the absence of or without the consent of a parent or other adult who is responsible for the children. Children must not be approached or photographed at school without the permission of the school authorities. In 1999, Tony Blair complained to the PCC regarding a news story about Kathryn, his daughter.[133] The complaint was upheld. It was in fact the first complaint to be made under cl 6 regarding the privacy of the children of public figures at school. The PCC said: 'if every story about the PM's children which relates to their education is to be justified on the basis that he has made statements about education, then the Code provides no protection for his children or others in a similar position.' But the PCC also said that the press should be free to report on matters relating to children of public figures if such stories revealed hypocrisy or had an impact on policy. It said further that the child should only be identified if that child alone had to be the centre of the story.

131 The Secretary of State has power to designate the Code by order for the purposes of the sub-section, under s 32(3)(b).

132 In 2005, the Commission received 228 complaints about privacy from those directly affected by an alleged breach of the Code, a small increase on the 2004 figure. Of these, the Commission found 119 possible breaches of the Code, of which it successfully resolved 97 to the express satisfaction of the complainant. It obtained proportionate offers to resolve the matter in 17 more, which were not immediately accepted by the complainant, and adjudicated 18 (figures from PCC Annual Report for 2005).

133 Press Complaints Report (1999). Complaint upheld: 17 July 1999.

Under cl 9, the press must avoid identifying relatives and friends of persons convicted or accused of crime without their consent. Clause 3(ii) provides that it is 'unacceptable to take photographs of individuals in private places without their consent'. Thus in comparison with the previous version cl 3 was tightened to prevent all photography of people in private places, irrespective of whether a long-range lens had been used. Private places are stated to be public or private property 'where there is a reasonable expectation of privacy'. The taking of photographs in private places, persistent phoning, questioning, photographing or pursuit of individuals after being asked to desist, or failing to leave private property after being asked to do so (cl 4(ii)), harassment (cl 4(i)), and the use of listening devices or phone interception (cl 10), are also all proscribed. Clause 8 (Listening Devices) of the previous Code has now been subsumed into the previous cl 11 (misrepresentation) and its provisions expanded to prevent the interception of 'private or mobile telephone calls, messages or emails'. The clause, which became cl 10 (clandestine devices and subterfuge), reads:

> i) The press must not seek to obtain or publish material acquired by using hidden cameras or clandestine listening devices; or by intercepting private or mobile telephone calls, messages or emails; or by the unauthorised removal of documents or photographs.
> ii) Engaging in misrepresentation or subterfuge can generally be justified only in the public interest and then only when the material cannot be obtained by other means.

It is notable that editors are enjoined in cl 4, the harassment clause, not only to ensure that those working for them comply with the cl 4 requirements, but also not to publish material from other sources which do not meet those requirements. The requirement as regards other sources – usually freelance journalists – is not expressly included in the other privacy clauses, most notably cl 3.

Further provisions of the Code reflect certain of the statutory reporting restrictions mentioned below, but go further than they do. Under cl 7, the press must not, even where the law does not prohibit it, identify children under 16 who are involved in cases concerning sexual offences, whether as victims or witnesses. Equally, cl 11 provides that the press must not identify victims of sexual assault unless they are free to do so by law and there is 'adequate justification'.

All the clauses of the Code that relate to intrusion into private life, except cl 5, are subject to exceptions in the public interest; this is defined non-exhaustively as including 'detecting or exposing crime or serious impropriety (previously 'serious anti-social conduct'), protecting public health or safety or preventing the public being misled by some statement or action of an individual or organisation'. The Code also states that 'There is a public interest in freedom of expression itself.' The Code requires that 'Whenever the public interest is invoked, the PCC will require editors to demonstrate fully how the public interest was served.'

The most notable amendments to the Code made in 2004 reflected the need for it to respond to changes in technology. Other clauses were tightened in order to allow them better to respond to particular ethical issues. For example, cl 12 (Discrimination) now emphasises that pejorative, prejudicial or irrelevant reference to 'an individual's race, colour, religion, sex, sexual orientation, physical or mental illness or disability' is unacceptable. In May 2005 cl 12 of the Code was expanded to cover discriminatory press reporting of transgendered people. The Commission took the view that the discrimination clause, in its previous form, gave protection to transexuals, but it decided, following the Gender Recognition Act 2004, that more specific cover should be given. It was decided that the word 'gender' would replace 'sex' in sub-clause 12(i), thus widening its scope to include transgendered individuals. Clause 9 (Reporting of Crime) now makes the specific central point that relatives or friends of persons convicted or accused of crime should not generally be identified, 'unless they are genuinely relevant to the story'.

Interpretation of the privacy provisions of the Code

The PCC's interpretation of the very significant privacy clause, cl 3, suggests that the non-consensual publication of specific identifying personal information, including addresses, is not necessarily a breach of the Code unless the person in question may be thereby put at risk from stalkers,[134] or the person involved may be 'potentially vulnerable'.[135] If this is the case, it is suggested that it is not in accord with the principle of informational autonomy under Art 8.

Clause 3 states that it is unacceptable to photograph individuals in private places without consent, making it clear that a private place is either public or private property in which there is a reasonable expectation of privacy. The interpretation of the term 'a reasonable expectation of privacy' is clearly a significant matter. Since the PCC, which monitors the Code and its interpretation, is probably a public authority under s 6 HRA,[136] it is suggested that it should adopt the post-Von Hannover Strasbourg interpretation of a 'reasonable expectation of privacy', thus extending it well beyond obviously private places or places accessible to the public, but semi-private, such as restaurants. Von Hannover obviously takes an approach that renders privacy no longer dependent on location. As argued above, public/private distinctions based on location are too simplistic, and a test of a reasonable expectation of privacy or, more broadly still, of control of private information is more satisfactory.[137] On the basis of such a test, if, for example, one person engages in a whispered exchange with another in the street, and this exchange is recorded by a reporter using a listening device, it is contended that an invasion of privacy has occurred which falls within Art 8.

134 Complaint by a well-known entertainer, complaint dated 16 July 2000.

135 Complaint of Mrs Renate John, adjudication, 2000.

136 See Chapter 4, pp 233–35 and fn 170, below.

137 The PCC's Code of Practice defines 'private places [as] public or private property where there is a reasonable expectation of privacy'. Such a test was recommended by the Irish Law Reform Commission: Privacy, Surveillance and Interception (1996), Consultation Paper.

The PCC does appear to accept a fairly expansive interpretation of a 'reasonable expectation of privacy', but not one that is clearly in full harmony with Von Hannover as it has not been made fully clear that people have such an expectation in the street. It said in a 2006 adjudication, for example:

> The Commission has previously ruled that publicly accessible places such as restaurants, hotels and offices can be those in which a person would have a reasonable expectation of privacy. In this instance, it was clear to the Commission that the publication of a photograph of the complainant in his workplace – a high street bank – without permission was a breach of Clause 3.[138]

It has also found that publication of pictures of children in crowds on public occasions, such as sporting events, do not amount to breaches of the Code.[139]

The interpretation of the public interest test in the Code is also of crucial significance. In making a determination, the PCC takes into account the extent to which the material is already in the public domain, and the specific issues of public interest that are raised.[140] At present, despite the requirements of s 6 HRA, it is not apparent that it takes Art 8 or 10 jurisprudence into account in making its determinations.[141]

Sanctions

The Commission does not require the complainant to waive any legal right of action as the Press Council was criticised for doing. However, it has the same limited sanctions 138 Adjudication on 28 April 2006, as regards Mark Kisby. The article was a feature on millionaire 'lottery lout' Michael Carroll and included a picture of him withdrawing £15,000 from his local bank. The complainant was the cashier at the branch and was included in the picture. He had not consented to his photograph being taken or published. The complainant considered that the publication of his image intruded into his private life and could have led to security problems for him and his family. The magazine said that the complainant represented the public face of a high street bank and could not therefore have any expectation of having his identity concealed. The PCC disagreed. Nonetheless, in the circumstances – given the innocuous nature of the photograph (published in Loaded magazine in Feb 2006) – the Commission decided that the magazine's offer of an apology which acknowledged its error represented sufficient and proportionate remedial action on its part.

139 In an Adjudication issued 23 June 2006 as regards such a picture the Commission stated that it would not normally consider that a photograph of a child in a crowd at an FA Cup tie – a public event at which there would be many photographers and television cameras, as well as tens of thousands of people – was intrusive or involved the child's welfare. It said that it is not the case that any picture of a child taken and published without the consent of the parent will always breach the Code. It went on: 'The Code says that children under 16 must not be photographed on issues involving their welfare without the consent of a custodial parent. While the complainant – her custodial parent – may not have actively consented for the photograph to be used, the Commission could not ignore the context in which it was taken. The complainant was at a significant sporting occasion, where he and his daughter would have been seen by a large number of people, and where the complainant must have been aware of the possibility of being photographed by press photographers or even appearing on television'. No breach was found.

140 See PCC, Report No 43 (1998), paras 3.0–3.2.

141 See e.g., Adjudication on 28 April 2006, as regards Mark Kisby complaining in respect of a photograph taken of him in his work place. The adjudication occurred post-Von Hannover but the decision was not mentioned; nor was Art 8 referred to.

as the Press Council: it has no coercive powers at all; it can do only what newspaper proprietors have agreed to allow it to do. At present, this is limited to adjudicating upon complaints received, making a public finding as to whether the Code was violated, and requesting newspapers to publish its adjudication – a request invariably complied with, to date. The Code preamble states that any publication criticised by the PCC must publish the adjudication 'in full and with due prominence'. Editors and publishers are required by the preamble to ensure that the Code is observed. The terms of the Code are incorporated into the conditions of employment of many members of the staff of newspapers, although not all. It still has no power to award fines, damages or prevent publication of offending items. It has not established a hotline, which – if editors were prepared to accept the PCC's implicit recommendation or advice not to publish – might have an effect similar to that of obtaining an ex parte injunction to prevent publication. No fund has been set up in order to compensate members of the public whose privacy has been invaded.

Conclusions

It is suggested that various fundamental problems are still apparent. Arguably, the PCC's own policing of the Code still errs on the side of generosity towards the newspapers.[142] Most importantly, the lack of punitive remedies means that the PCC has to rely on consent to the Code and so on the self-discipline of reporters and editors. Employees of newspapers may on occasion simply ignore the Code. Or newspapers may publish material obtained by freelance journalists or others in breach of the Code. In particular, despite the Code, they have been prepared to publish pictures of individuals in obviously private places (such as holiday villas), often taken with a long-range lens, without consent, even when it is virtually impossible to argue that a public interest in publication exists. A pre-Von Hannover example of such flouting of the Code occurred in the case of Holden (Amanda) v The Star.[143] Holden, the star of a sitcom, was holidaying in a private villa in Italy when, without her consent, agency reporters took photographs of her sunbathing topless. One of the photographs was published in the Star. She obtained an ex parte injunction on grounds of breach of confidence, as interpreted in Douglas and Others v Hello![144] preventing further publication of the photographs. Although the case was clearly covered by cl 3(ii) of the PCC's Code of Practice, she did not make a complaint, preferring – for obvious reasons – to go straight to the courts to obtain the injunction. She claimed damages in respect of the publication which did occur.[145] A number of more recent examples are given below in which celebrities disregarded the PCC route.[146] The Holden case indicates that the Code alone was not proving a sufficient deterrent to newspapers which, for obvious commercial reasons, were prepared to invade privacy.

142 See further Tambini, D and Heyward, C, 'Regulating the trade in secrets: policy options', in Tambini and Heyward (2002) op. cit., fn 1. See also Rozenberg, J, Privacy and the Press, 2004, OUP.

143 Unreported; see the Guardian, 2 July 2001; (2001) The Observer, 15 July.

144 [2001] 2 WLR 992.

145 See The Observer, 15 July 2001.

146 See pp 882–83, 889–90 below.

The PCC cannot prevent publication of material obtained even in gross breach of the Code and, ultimately, the PCC cannot enforce its adjudications. Absent radical changes to its powers, which would have to be agreed by the industry, it is clear that it cannot be regarded as providing an effective remedy for violations of privacy under Art 8. This does not mean that it has no role now that effective remedies have been developed under the impetus of the HRA. It continues to provide an alternative to using the law for those who cannot or do not wish to incur legal costs. It continues, in conjunction with the National Union of Journalist's Code, to set benchmarking ethical standards for the profession. It also provides a means of appeasing and satisfying complainants, which may be less stressful and more speedy than court action. But taking the right to private life seriously obviously requires that a court remedy is available – the PCC route alone would clearly be inadequate. As discussed above, Strasbourg has made it clear that the PCC does not satisfy the Convention requirement under Art 13 of providing an effective remedy for breach of a Convention right.

Regulation of broadcasting

Introduction

The regime governing broadcasting in relation to privacy is (anomalously) much tougher than the one just described. It is set up under statute and the broadcast regulator has a number of relatively strong sanctions at its command.

Under s 142 of the Broadcasting Act 1990, the Broadcasting Complaints Commission (BCC) had a role similar to that of the PCC in adjudicating on complaints of infringement of privacy 'in or in connection with the obtaining of materials included in BBC or independent licensed television or sound broadcasts'. The term 'privacy' could receive quite a wide interpretation according to the ruling in Broadcasting Complaints Commission ex p Granada Television Limited.[147] Granada Television challenged a finding of the BCC that matters already in the public domain could, if republished, constitute an invasion of privacy. In judicial review proceedings, it was found that privacy differed from confidentiality and went well beyond it because it was not confined to secrets; the significant issue was not whether material was or was not in the public domain but whether, by being broadcast, it caused hurt and anguish. There were grounds on which it could be considered that publication of the matters in question had caused distress, and therefore the BCC had not acted unreasonably in the Wednesbury sense in taking the view that an infringement of privacy had occurred. However, the alleged infringement of privacy could be found to have occurred only when the broadcast was over, and not earlier.[148] A broad view of privacy was also taken in Broadcasting Standards Commission ex p BBC;[149] it was found that a company – in this instance, Dixons – can complain of an invasion of privacy in respect of secret filming in one of its shops. The 'public' nature of the shop and the fact that the goods which were being filmed, with a view to showing that they were second-hand, were 147 (1993) The Times, 31 May; affirmed [1995] EMLR 163; (1994) The Times, 16 December, CA.

148 Broadcasting Complaints Commission ex p Barclay and Another (1997) 9 Admin LR 265; (1996) The Times, 11 October.

149 [2000] 3 WLR 1327.

clearly on public display, did not affect this finding. Pre-2003 control was exercised by the Independent Television Commission, the Broadcasting Standards Commission and the Radio Authority; it is now exercised by one broadcast regulator – Ofcom.[150]

The role of the Independent Television Commission (ITC) was considered in Chapter 6, and it was made clear that it had a number of significant sanctions to use against broadcasters who failed to adhere to the ITC Programme Code.[151] Although, as that chapter discussed, its role was taken over by the super-regulator, Ofcom, in 2003, the model used for broadcasting regulation did not undergo radical change, either in relation to privacy or 'taste and decency'. The ITC's Programme Code had a section on privacy, also covering the gathering of information, which overlapped with the BSC Code on privacy. Clause 2.1 provided that the public interest had to be balanced against individual privacy and stated that the public interest includes detecting or exposing crime or a serious misdemeanour; protecting public health or safety; preventing the public from being misled by some statement or action of the individual or organisation concerned; exposing significant incompetence in public office. The Code echoed Art 8 in also providing that any act relying on the defence of public interest must be in proportion to the interest served.

The Broadcasting Complaints Commission was replaced by the Broadcasting Standards Commission (BSC) which was set up under s 106 of the Broadcasting Act 1996. The BSC was in a somewhat different position from that of the PCC in that it was set up under statute and had certain statutory powers. The BSC was charged with the duty of drawing up a Code in respect of programme standards under s 107, which was based on s 152 of the 1990 Act, but for the first time the Code also had to cover matters of fairness and privacy. The BSC adjudicated upon complaints received, made findings as to whether the Code had been violated, and requested broadcasters to publish its adjudications. In this respect, s 119 of the 1996 Act afforded the BSC a significant power, since it placed the requirement to publish the BSC findings and a summary of the complaint on a statutory basis.

The Ofcom privacy regime

Ofcom has now taken over the role of the BSC under the Communications Act 2003. However, it is still necessary to consider the previous Broadcasting Act 1996, and the Fairness and Privacy code published under s 107 of that Act, and now revised and policed by Ofcom. The 2003 Act may readily be seen as clarifying and streamlining the position in relation to protection for privacy in broadcasting. As Chapter 6 describes, it set up a single regulator for the broadcast media – Ofcom. Previously, the Broadcasting Standards Commission (BSC) regulated all the broadcast media, while the Independent Television Commission (ITC) regulated the independent television channels. Both the BSC and the ITC had drafted, and enforced, two codes each; one on taste and decency (covering, broadly, the portrayal of sex and violence) known as 'the standards code', which is discussed in Chapter 6, and one on fairness and privacy, covering intrusion into privacy, misrepresentation, inaccuracy.

150 See Chapter 6, pp 519–20.
151 See p 518.

Under the position before the 2003 Act, the BSC code covered all the broadcasters, including the BBC, whereas the ITC code only covered the independent broadcasters. Thus the independent broadcasters were actually subject to two codes on privacy, and two Regulators – clearly an unsatisfactory and confusing position; the Codes overlapped and yet were not identical. Certain clauses of the ITC Code were more specific and appeared to be somewhat less generous to broadcasters than similar clauses in the BSC Code. For example, cl 2.7 of the ITC Code, dealing with children, went into greater detail regarding what could be shown than did cl 32, the equivalent clause under the BSC Code.

The key difference between the two regimes for the BBC and for independent broadcasting prior to the inception of the 2003 Act arose in terms of sanctions: the BSC could only require a broadcaster found to be in breach of its code to broadcast its findings and an apology if appropriate;[152] the ITC could, in addition to these sanctions, fine a broadcaster, and, in extreme cases, withdraw its licence.[153] Thus the BBC was under a much 'lighter touch' scheme of regulation. The position under the 2003 legislation is in essentials the same as that under the old regime, except that the position of the BBC was brought into line with that of independent television. The model adopted is the one described in Chapter 6 regarding the control of potentially offensive material in broadcasting. Court sanctions are not provided under the regulatory regime; persons aggrieved by privacy-invading broadcasting can complain to the regulator, Ofcom, which can provide redress, if it finds that the Code on privacy that it polices has been breached. Ofcom's remedies do not, however, extend to the provision of injunctions or damages.

Ofcom took over the previous duties of the BSC[154] to draw up, revise, and hear complaints under the fairness and privacy code issued under s 107 of the Broadcasting Act 1996.[155] It also took over the BSC's powers under s 119 of that Act[156] to force 152 Under s 119, Broadcasting Act 1996.

153 Under the Broadcasting Act 1990; see Chapter 6, p 519.

154 Schedule 1, para 14 of the 2003 Act provides:

> 'The following functions of the Broadcasting Standards Commission under Part 5 of the 1996 Act are transferred to OFCOM –
>
> (a) the Commission's function of drawing up and from time to time revising a code of practice under section 107 of that Act (codes of practice relation to fairness and privacy); and > (b) their functions in relation to fairness complaints under that Part.

155 Section 107 provides:

> (1) It shall be the duty of the BSC to draw up, and from time to time review; a code giving guidance as to principles to be observed, and practices to be followed, in connection with the avoidance of –
>
> (a) unjust or unfair treatment in programmes to which this section applies, or > (b) unwarranted infringement of privacy in, or in connection with the obtaining of material included in, such programmes.
>
> (2) It shall be the duty of each broadcasting or regulatory body, when drawing up or revising any code relating to principles and practice in connection with programmes, or in connection with the obtaining of material to be included in programmes, to reflect the general effect of so much of the code referred to in subsection (1) (as for the time being in force) as is relevant to the programmes in question.
>
> (3) The BSC shall from time to time publish the code (as for the time being in force). Ss 4 relates to consultation and is omitted.

156 Section 119 provides:

> (1) Where the BSC have – broadcasters to carry apologies and statements of findings following complaints. The substantive provisions of that Code, and the meagre case law relating to the interpretation of its predecessors, probably still a reliable guide to the interpretation of the current Code, are considered below.

The 2003 Act opened the way for the BBC to be able, for the first time, to be fined by an independent regulator – Ofcom. Section 198 of the 2003 Act gives power to Ofcom to regulate the BBC in so far as that is provided for in the BBC's Agreement with the government.[157] In other words, it created the possibility of regulation by Ofcom on privacy matters. The amendments subsequently made in December 2003 to the BBC Agreement inserted, for the first time, the requirement to observe the fairness and privacy Code drawn up under the Broadcasting Act 1996. Previously, the BBC Agreement had no provisions relating to invasion of privacy.

The BBC's current Charter and Agreement came into force in 2007 and will expire in 2016.[158] Paragraph 45 of the Agreement provides:

(a) considered and adjudicated upon a fairness complaint, or
(b) considered and made their findings on a standards complaint, they may give directions of the kind specified in subsection (2).

(2) Those directions are –

(a) where the relevant programme was broadcast by a broadcasting body, directions requiring that body to publish the matters mentioned in subsection (3) in such manner, and within such period, as may be specified in the directions, and;
(b) where the relevant programme was included in a licensed service, directions requiring the appropriate regulatory body to direct the licence holder to publish those matters in such manner, and within such period, as may be so specified.

(3) Those matters are –

(a) a summary of the complaint;
(b) the BSC's findings on the complaint or a summary of them;
(c) in the case of a standards complaint, any observations by the BSC on the complaint or a summary of any such observations.

(5) The form and content of any such summary as is mentioned in subsection (3)(a), (b) or (c) shall be such as may be approved by the BSC.

(6) A broadcasting or regulatory body shall comply with any directions given to them under this section.

157 Section 198 provides:

(1) It shall be a function of OFCOM, to the extent that provision for them to do so is contained in-

(a) the BBC Charter and Agreement, and
(b) the provisions of this Act and of Part 5 of the 1996 Act, to regulate the provision of the BBC's services and the carrying on by the BBC of other activities for purposes connected with the provision of those services.

(2) For the purposes of the carrying out of that function OFCOM –

(a) are to have such powers and duties as may be conferred on them by or under the BBC Charter and Agreement; and
(b) are entitled, to the extent that they are authorised to do so by the Secretary of State or under the terms of that Charter and Agreement, to act on his behalf in relation to that Charter and Agreement.

158 July 2006; Cm 6872. It came into force on 1 January 2007.

(1) The BBC must comply with the Fairness Code—

(a) in connection with the provision of the UK Public Broadcasting Services, and

(b) in relation to the programmes included in those services.

(2) 'The Fairness Code' means the code for the time being in force under section 107 of the Broadcasting Act 1996.[159]

The second change was discussed in Chapter 6; it was foreshadowed by s 198(3) of the 2003 Act, which allows for the imposition of penalties upon the BBC for breach of provisions in its Agreement and Charter.[160] The 2007 Agreement provides for the imposition by Ofcom upon the BBC of financial penalties for breach of various enforceable requirements,[161] which includes the fairness Code in para 45.[162] Moreover, cl 93 provides that if Ofcom is satisfied that the BBC has breached an enforceable requirement, it may require the BBC to carry a correction or statement of Ofcom's findings upon its adjudication on any complaint.[163]

The independent broadcasters are regulated by the 2003 Act directly. Section 326 provides that they too are bound by the fairness and privacy code;[164] they may be 159 Previously contained in Clause 5A of the amended Agreement.

160 Section 198(3) provides: The BBC must pay OFCOM such penalties in respect of contraventions by the BBC of provision made by or under –

(a) this Part, or

(b) the BBC Charter and Agreement,as are imposed by OFCOM in exercise of powers conferred on them by that Charter and Agreement.

161 Clause 94 provides:

1 If OFCOM are satisfied that the Corporation has contravened a relevant enforceable requirement, they may serve on the Corporation a notice requiring it to pay them, within a specified period, a specified penalty.

2 The amount of the penalty that may be imposed on any occasion under this clause shall not exceed the maximum specified for the time being in subsection 198(5) of the Communications At 2003 [that is, £250,000].

162 By virtue of clause 95(1)(a).

163 Clause 93 provides:

1 This clause applies if OFCOM are satisfied- (a) that the Corporation has, in relation to any of its services, contravened a relevant enforceable requirement; and (b) that the contravention can be appropriately remedied by the inclusion in that service of a correction or a statement of findings (or both), OFCOM may direct the Corporation to include a correction or statement of findings (or both) in the service.

2 A direction may require the correction or statement of findings to be in such form, and to be included in programmes at such times, as OFCOM may determine. Clause 93 applies to contravention of the fairness code by virtue of clause 93(7) and clause 95.

164 Section 326 provides:

'The regulatory regime for every programme service licensed by a Broadcasting Act licence includes the conditions that OFCOM consider appropriate for securing observance-

(a) in connection with the provision of that service, and;

(b) in relation to the programmes included in that service,of the code for the time being in force under section 107 of the 1996 Act (the fairness code).'

directed by Ofcom to carry statements of findings and corrections;[165] they can be fined for breach of the Code,[166] and, in extreme cases, licences may theoretically be revoked.[167]

These provisions are bolstered by s 3(2) of the 2003 Act under which Ofcom has the duty of ensuring the application of standards that provide adequate protection to members of the public and all other persons from what the Act calls 'unwarranted infringements of privacy', balanced of course against freedom of expression. Thus the BBC is now in the same position as the other broadcasters in relation to standards of privacy protection, correcting the anomalous position that existed previously.

Ofcom's Privacy Code

Ofcom's rules on privacy, taken over from the BSC Code, are part of its 2005 Broadcasting Code, discussed in Chapter 6. Ofcom's Code, like the PCC Code, goes beyond what the law demands in a number of respects; it is binding in the sense that Ofcom can apply sanctions if it is breached. This Code is similar to that of the PCC, but in certain respects, it is more extensive and offers greater guidance on the operation of the overriding public interest test. However, since its revision in 2004 and 2005 it is arguable that, on its face, the PCC Code offers as much protection for privacy as Ofcom's current Code does, and even in certain respects takes a stricter stance. It states for example in cl 4 that journalists should leave property when asked to do so, although this is subject to the public interest defence. Ofcom's code contains no equivalent provision.

Section 8 of the Broadcasting Code contains the privacy rules. The privacy of persons suffering grief or distress must in particular be respected, under cl 8.16, but footage of accidents etc can be broadcast without consent if 'warranted'. Such persons should be approached with sensitivity, and they should not be put under pressure to provide interviews unless this is warranted. Clauses 8.13–8.15 provide that surreptitious filming, the use of hidden microphones etc must be justified by an overriding public interest. Clause 25 of the BSC Code provided that people who are currently in the news cannot object to interviewing in public places, but that persistent questioning of 165 Under section 236.

166 Section 237 provides:

> If OFCOM are satisfied that the holder of a licence to provide a television licensable content service –
>
> (a) has contravened a condition of the licence, or
> (b) has failed to comply with a direction given by OFCOM under or by virtue of a provision of this Part, Part 1 of the 1990 Act or Part 5 of the 1996 Act, they may serve on him a notice requiring him to pay them, within aspecified period, a specified penalty.
>
> (2) The amount of the penalty under this section must not exceed the maximum penalty given by ss (3).
>
> (3) The maximum penalty is whichever is the greater of—
>
> (a) £250,000 and
> (b) 5 per cent. of the qualifying revenue for the licence holder's last complete accounting period falling within the period for which his licence has been in force ('the relevant period').

167 Under s 238.

individuals after being asked to desist could constitute an unwarranted infringement of privacy. Clause 8.1 of Ofcom's Code is more nuanced and in this instance accords more readily with current Art 8 jurisprudence:

> Legitimate expectations of privacy will vary according to the place and nature of the information, activity or condition in question, the extent to which it is in the public domain (if at all) and whether the individual concerned is already in the public eye. There may be circumstances where people can reasonably expect privacy even in a public place. Some activities and conditions may be of such a private nature that filming or recording, even in a public place, could involve an infringement of privacy. People under investigation or in the public eye, and their immediate family and friends, retain the right to a private life, although private behaviour can raise issues of legitimate public interest.

But under cl 8.11 filming of people in the news can occur in public places without prior warning. Clause 8.11 does not state that this can occur only if 'warranted'. In other words, it does not, on its face, demand that broadcasters perform a balancing act between Arts 8 and 10. In light of Von-Hannover, and the developing UK privacy jurisprudence discussed below, it is argued that cl 8.11 requires amendment.

Children receive special protection under cll 8.20–8.22. If under 16 they must not be interviewed without the consent of a parent or other adult who is responsible for them. If consent is refused a decision to go ahead must be justified by an overriding public interest. Under cl 2.6 of the ITC Code children could not be interviewed regarding private, family matters. This requirement was not subject to the public interest test. But under cl 8.22 such interviewing can be warranted The Code makes special mention of agency operations in cl 8.8 (such as police investigations) and requires that the broadcasters should obtain consent to film unless it is warranted to proceed without consent. Clause 8.8 also covers filming in institutions, such as hospitals, and requires that the broadcasters must obtain consent to transmit material when persons are shown in sensitive situations, such as in psychiatric hospitals, unless exceptions can be made in the public interest. The previous ITC Code covered the filming of police operations or the investigations of similar bodies and required that the broadcasters must identify themselves and should normally leave private property if asked to do. Since a trespass could occur in such an instance, the licensee's most senior programme executive had to be consulted before transmission and had to be convinced that showing the material serves the public interest. This provision does not appear in the current Code. Broadcasters can record phone calls if they identify themselves (cl 8.12); door-stepping can occur on private property if there is an overriding public interest (cl 8.11).

Under the public interest test, an infringement of privacy can be justified (warranted) on a number of grounds. They include: revealing or detecting crime or disreputable behaviour, protecting public health or safety, exposing misleading claims made by individuals or organisations or disclosing significant incompetence in public office (cl 8.1). The Code also impliedly adopts a nuanced approach to public domain issues. The BSC Code spoke of determining whether when filming events in public places it was clear that information was sufficiently in the public domain to make it justifiable to broadcast it without consent (clause16). Ofcom's Code states in its preamble: 'Legitimate expectations of privacy will vary according to the place and nature of the information, activity or condition in question, the extent to which it is in the public domain . . .'. Clause 8.10 provides: 'Broadcasters should ensure that the re-use of material, i.e. use of material originally filmed or recorded for one purpose and then used in a programme for another purpose or used in a later or different programme, does not create an unwarranted infringement of privacy'.

The relationship between the HRA and media regulation

Marginalisation of the PCC?

The indirect effect of the HRA on the media regulatory schemes is becoming apparent and is most significant as far as the PCC is concerned since, as indicated above, the problem of invasion of privacy by the press, not the broadcast media, is more pressing and the PCC has no statutory basis or powers. The most significant effect is that the PCC has been to an extent marginalised in respect of its role in relation to privacy, because persons, particularly celebrities, whose privacy has been or is about to be invaded by the press are seeking ex parte injunctions and/or damages on grounds of breach of confidence/privacy, as discussed below, rather than complaining to the PCC, which has no such remedy at its command (and might be viewed, if it had, as reluctant to use it). As such a trend became apparent, the PCC reviewed its Code with a view to tightening it up, in 2004 and 2005. Clearly, it faces the possibility that the self-regulation system might become a dead letter – at least as far as celebrities are concerned. It may eventually have to adopt some of the proposals it has at present rejected, such as the hotline system and the award of compensation to complainants.

Clearly, ex parte injunctions can also be obtained restraining the showing of a broadcast, on grounds of breach of confidence/privacy or, in the case of any media bodies that are also public authorities, on grounds of invasion of privacy under Art 8, using s 7(1)(a) of the HRA. But it is clear that marginalisation of Ofcom as a body charged, inter alia, with protecting privacy, is less likely to occur, since the problem posed by invasion of privacy by the broadcast media is not of the proportions of that posed by the press, and the sanctions available to Ofcom create greater confidence in its ability to address it.

In debate on the Human Rights Bill, a great deal of concern was voiced in Parliament about the possibility, as regards the PCC, that it would be deemed a public authority for the purposes of the HRA. It was thought that it would be subject to judicial review for violation of the Convention in its rulings and therefore in some way in a position to threaten press freedom.[168] Although it appears that it is subject to the Convention,[169] it is unlikely in practice that this route will frequently be explored: it would be likely to provide, even if proceedings succeeded, a merely paper remedy. Those expressing that concern appeared to overlook the fact that the PCC has no coercive powers. As far as the PCC is concerned, it is also hard to see what impact a finding of breach of the Convention could have on the bodies it is regulating. If a finding was made that the PCC had violated the Convention rights, for example by finding that someone's privacy had not been invaded when, in the court's view, Art 8 required a contrary conclusion,[170] the very most that the court could do would be to quash the finding of the PCC by a quashing order (formerly certiorari) and require it to reconsider the case by a mandatory order (formerly mandamus). Damages could conceivably be awarded against it also under s 8 HRA.

168 See Hansard, HL Col 784, 24 November 1997.
169 See R (on the application of Ford) v PCC [2002] EMLR 5.

But this would not affect the newspapers themselves, in the sense that none of this would change the fact that the only 'remedies' they would be subject to would be those available at present: the publication of the PCC's adjudications although they could not be forced to do this. However, an action brought directly against Ofcom under s 7(1)(a) on grounds of failing to use sanctions in respect of an invasion of privacy in breach of its Privacy Code could lead to a mandatory order requiring it to use the sanctions it has available, including, ultimately, withdrawal of its licence, against the broadcaster concerned. This possibility could have some impact, although it would apply post-broadcast; it would not prevent the broadcast of the material. Nevertheless, it would still not provide an effective remedy for breach of Art 8, following the Peck ruling discussed above, since Ofcom cannot award damages to complainants. The effective remedy for breach of Art 8 rights is provided in most circumstances by the action for breach of confidence/privacy discussed below. The Data Protection Act 1998 could also be invoked, as will be discussed, in order to provide such a remedy in certain circumstances against data-processing by newspapers or broadcasters.

The only way in which the PCC could acquire greater powers than it has at present (for example, to levy fines against newspapers adjudged to have breached the Code) would be if the newspaper industry collectively agreed that it should have the power to demand fines, and even then, it is hard to see what the sanction for non-payment would be, other than adverse publicity. It is possible that if actions are successfully brought against it, the PCC may seek agreement from the industry that breach of the PCC Code should lead to disciplinary action, including dismissal. But again, it could not enforce such action. Or it could ask newspapers to indemnify it against possible actions under the HRA. It goes without saying that the PCC, not having any statutory basis or powers (other than the recognition of its Code in s 12 HRA), could not be given by the industry more than the power to request a newspaper not to publish a given article; it could never require non-publication. In short, therefore, the effect of the HRA on the PCC may be in the short term that a layer of judicial supervision was added onto what remains a mere self-regulatory body, with powers to do only that which the industry agrees voluntarily to submit to. In the longer term, the HRA may play a crucial part in the dismantling of the whole self-regulatory system – at least as far as privacy complaints are concerned – if it becomes marginalised due to actions based on breach of confidence/privacy. In fact it is most probable that the system will remain as it is at present – a poor man's substitute for court action.

Impact of the Convention rights

Clearly, the statutory powers affecting Ofcom must all be interpreted compatibly with the Convention under s 3 HRA. Thus, in so far as the concept of privacy at Strasbourg in this context has undergone a change post-Von Hannover, the duties placed upon Ofcom under the statute should be interpreted relying on ss 3 and 2 HRA to reflect that change.

170 Anna Ford, a BBC journalist, applied to the High Court for judicial review of the PCC's decision to reject her claim that the Daily Mail breached her right to privacy by publishing pictures of her on holiday with her partner (The Observer, 15 July 2001). The PCC's decision was vindicated.

The Convention rights of course also have a direct impact on the regulators via s 6 HRA. The BSC and ITC were subject to judicial review,[171] as is Ofcom;[172] and this is also probably the case in respect of the PCC.[173] As Chapter 6 indicated, it is clear that Ofcom is a functional public authority under s 6 HRA and it is probably a core authority.[174] The PCC is probably also a functional public authority.[175] The duties of Ofcom under s 6 HRA can be viewed as additional and complementary to those it has under the 2003 Act and the Broadcasting Act 1996. If these bodies fail to uphold complaints relating to invasion of privacy, proceedings can be brought against them under s 7(1)(a) HRA. In any such proceedings, a court now has to satisfy s 12(4)(b) HRA, which means that the privacy Codes of these bodies are admissible in evidence and can be considered. By this means, the PCC Code has acquired, it is suggested, a quasi-legal status. Ofcom's Code already has such a status since it was set up under statute, but its status can be viewed as enhanced under s 12 HRA. It may be noted that the BSC Code was taken into account in any event in the pre-HRA ruling in Broadcasting Standards Commission ex p BBC.[176]

But the private media bodies – the newspapers and non-public service broadcasters – are not bound by the Convention rights under s 6. So if they invade privacy the aggrieved individual has three options. He or she could use the complaints mechanisms represented by Ofcom or the PCC. If an adjudication occurs the individual would not receive damages, but would have the satisfaction of an acknowledgement that a breach had occurred. He or she might be appeased and would not have had to incur the cost, risk and publicity of a court action. Clearly, a court action seeking to uphold privacy runs the risk of drawing attention to the subject-matter of the original complaint. Most members of the public are not in a position to take newspapers/broadcasters to court. So the benefits of these non-court-based methods of obtaining redress should not be over-looked.

If the complaint was not upheld he or she could seek review of the Ofcom or PCC decision, relying on Art 8 and s 7(1)(a) HRA. This possibility was discussed above, and as indicated, would not provide an effective remedy for the individual whose privacy had been invaded, even assuming that the action was successful. Finally, he or she could bring an action relying on breach of confidence/privacy, possibly coupled with action under the DPA 1998. But the position would be different if the media body itself was a public authority for HRA purposes. The BBC and possibly Channel 4, as bodies 171 The bodies they replaced were so subject and this was found to be the case in respect of the BSC: see R v BCC ex p Owen [1985] QB 1153; R v BSC ex p BBC [2000] 3 WLR 1327; R v IBA ex p Whitehouse (1985) The Times, 4 April.

172 See the Pro-Life Alliance case, discussed Chapter 6, pp 533–44.

173 See PCC ex p Stewart-Brady (1997) 9 Admin LR 274; R (on the application of Ford) v PCC [2002] EMLR 5.

174 See Chapter 6, p 530; Chapter 4, p 233.

175 It is subject to judicial review and receives some recognition under statute – the HRA, s 12. See further on regulators as functional public authorities, Chapter 6, pp 530–31 and Chapter 4, pp 233–35.

176 [2000] 3 WLR 1327.

with a public service remit, are probably functional public authorities.[177] If this is the case, under s 6 HRA, these bodies are bound to comply with the Convention rights in exercising their public functions. The question then would be whether decisions as to filming are part of that function. Assuming that they are, an effective remedy would potentially be available under s 8 HRA.

Deference

If an aggrieved individual brought an action directly against the BBC or against Ofcom (assuming that Ofcom had refused to uphold a privacy complaint) in respect of an invasion of privacy, relying on s 7(1)(a) HRA and Art 8, the chances of success would be low. The courts take a markedly deferential approach to reviewing decisions of the regulator, being reluctant to interfere in the exercise of its expert judgment unless Ofcom has made a plain error of law, or abused its discretion. This stance has also been taken in respect of the BBC. In R v Broadcasting Complaints Commission ex p Granada Television Ltd,[178] in an application for judicial review of the then Commission's finding under a privacy code, Balcombe LJ found:

> It is a reasonable inference that another reason why Parliament did not provide a definition of privacy in the [Broadcasting Act 1990] is because it considered it more appropriate that the difficult questions of fact and degree and value judgment, which are raised by the concept of an infringement of privacy, are best left to a specialist body, such as the BCC, whose members have experience of broadcasting[179] . . . Unless on no interpretation of the word "privacy" could the findings of the BCC be justified . . . there is no basis for the grant of judicial review . . . Whether in such a case there is an unwarranted infringement of privacy is a matter of fact and degree and as such for the decision of the BCC with which the court cannot interfere . . .[180]

The leading decision in this area is R v BSC ex p BBC;[181] this case concerned an application by the BBC for judicial review of the BSC's findings that the privacy of a company, in this case Dixon's, had been invaded by secret recording in one of its stores by the BBC. Lord Woolf observed:

> So long as the approach which [the Regulators] adopt is one to which, in their statutory context, the words 'infringement of privacy' are capable of applying 177 This seemed to be assumed in the Pro-Life Alliance case, as discussed in Chapter 6, pp 533–44. There is a possible difficulty with this proposition which may need to be addressed by the courts. Arguably, the BBC (and Channel 4) may also, exceptionally, be viewed as both public authorities and victims for HRA purposes. They appear to satisfy the test for victims at Strasbourg, which is encapsulated under HRA 1998, s 7(7), since, although in a sense they are emanations of the state, they are editorially independent from it. It would of course be bizarre if they could not be viewed as victims since that would run contrary to the scrutinising role over the state that one would expect these bodies, especially the BBC, to exercise.

178 [1995] EMLR 163.

179 Ibid at p 167.

180 Ibid at p 168.

181 [2000] 3 WLR 1327, p 1332.

> then the courts should not interfere. It is only if an approach to 'infringement of privacy' by [them] goes beyond the area of tolerance that the courts can intervene. There will be situations which fall within the grey area where it will be very much a matter of judgment whether they fall within [their] ambit or not. In the latter situations, having regard to the role the legislation gives to [them], the answer to the scope of their remit is that it is something for [them] to determine not the courts. The nature of their work and their membership are important when considering the role of the courts in relation to adjudications by [them]. What constitutes an infringement of privacy or bad taste or a failure to conform to proper standards of decency is very much a matter of personal judgment. This is not an area on which the courts are well equipped to adjudicate.[182]

In the post-HRA Anna Ford case,[183] which concerned an application for judicial review of the decision of the PCC on a complaint under its own privacy code, the judge found:

> English courts will continue to defer to the views of bodies like the [Press Complaints] Commission even after the HRA came into force. In summary, the type of balancing operation conducted by a specialist body such as the Commission is still regarded as a field of activity to which the courts should and will defer. The Commission is a body whose membership and expertise makes it much better equipped than the courts to resolve the difficult exercise of balancing the conflicting rights of Ms Ford and Mr Scott to privacy and of the newspapers to publish[184] . . . My task is not to determine if Ms Ford's rights to privacy were infringed by the surreptitious taking of the photographs or their subsequent publication but to decide whether Ms Ford has an arguable case for exercising the limited supervisory powers of the Administrative Court.[185]

The decision of the House of Lords in R (on the application of Pro-Life Alliance) v BBC,[186] discussed in detail in Chapter 6, gives very strong endorsement to the notion that a high degree of deference should be paid to media regulators and to media bodies due to their special expertise.[187] In that instance the BBC was acting in effect in its regulatory role in deciding whether the film in question offended too greatly against taste and decency to be broadcast in its original form. Pro-Life indicates that the courts do not regard it as their task to decide what the outcome of a privacy complaint should have been. They view their role as merely demanding that they review the decisions of the regulators, or media bodies, affording them a very broad area of discretion, even where the Convention rights are in issue. They take this stance, as Chapter 6 pointed out, partly on the basis that the primary determination as to the requirements of privacy

182 Ibid at p 1332.
183 R (on the application of Ford) v Press Complaints Commission [2002] EMLR 5.
184 Ibid, at para 28 – emphasis added.
185 Ibid, at para 29.
186 [2003] 2 WLR 1403.
187 In this case to the BBC Governors, in deciding not to broadcast a PEB submitted to the BBC by the Pro-Life Alliance party. See Chapter 6, pp 537–40.

has been entrusted to the regulators by Parliament, not the courts, but perhaps mainly on the ground of institutional competence – on the basis that the courts are not well equipped to adjudicate in this context due to lack of the special expertise possessed by the media bodies in question. It might appear that the HRA should have affected this stance radically since under s 6, the courts must ensure that Convention standards are adhered to. But this was not the stance that was adopted in Pro-Life.

It can however be argued that Pro-Life concerned a matter that the courts are arguably not well equipped to inquire into – the acceptability to television audiences of disturbing material in election broadcasts. But the courts are, clearly, well equipped to consider the proper means of balancing conflicting legal rights. As discussed below, they have shown themselves readily capable of performing the balancing act between Arts 8 and 10 of the Convention in the context of breach of confidence/privacy claims and of the inherent jurisdiction of the court to protect children. Thus, it is arguable that if a privacy claim, as opposed to a claim relating to offensive broadcast material, is considered at the highest level under the HRA, the court might be prepared to take a stance that differed from that taken in Pro-Life. The degree of deference shown to the media body in that instance might, and should, be repudiated.

In the Campbell case discussed below, the House of Lords showed no inclination to defer to the newspaper's expertise in determining how far it had balanced public interest and privacy factors in taking the decision to publish the photos of Naomi Campbell. Instead, the Lords engaged in a rigorous scrutiny of that decision. It is hard to see why the mechanism by which the claimants get into court (breach of confidence or s 7(1)(a) HRA) should affect this stance. It is also difficult to see why greater deference should be paid to a broadcaster as opposed to a newspaper editor. Possibly there is an argument that Ofcom has greater expertise than a media body in this matter, but it would be hard to argue that it would have the experience or authority of a court in dealing with the quintessentially legal problem of the balancing act between Arts 8 and 10 based on proportionality.

4 Specific reporting restrictions

Victims of sexual offences

A number of special restrictions also apply to the victims of certain sexual offences. Under s 4(1)(a) of the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976, once an allegation of rape was made it was an offence to publish or broadcast the name, address or photograph of the woman who was the alleged victim. Once a person was accused of rape, nothing could be published by the media which could identify the woman. These restrictions were extended under s 1(1) of the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1992 as amended by s 48 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 and Sched 2. Section 1(1) covers a number of sexual offences as well as rape, and provides: 'where an allegation has been made that an offence to which the Act applies has been committed against a person,[188] no matter relating to that person shall during 188 Male rape victims are also covered under the CJPOA 1994, s 142, as are offences of incitement, attempt, conspiracy.

that person's lifetime be included in any publication.' So it is a specific offence to publish a picture of the alleged victim, or her name and address, once an allegation of a rape offence has been made. Once a person has been charged with a rape offence, no matter or article likely to lead members of the public to identify an individual as the complainant in relation to the offence may be published.[189] However, the courts do have powers to direct the restrictions to be removed; this may be done on the narrow ground of encouraging witnesses to come forward,[190] or on the broader ground that a refusal to lift the restrictions 'would impose a substantial and unreasonable restriction upon the reporting of proceedings at the trial and it is in the public interest to remove the restriction'. This clearly allows a judge to undertake a broad balancing act between the privacy rights of the woman – and the policy of encouraging women to bring cases to trial, given that rapes are notoriously under-prosecuted – and the media interest in reporting on trials, including, specifically the open justice principle.

Trial-related reporting restrictions – adults

There are a number of other statutory reporting restrictions,[191] including stringent limitations upon the reporting of pre-trial hearings,[192] details of vulnerable witnesses,[193] and the reporting of assertions made about others during a plea in mitigation. An order may be made prohibiting the reporting of such assertions where:

> an assertion forming part of the speech or submission is derogatory to a person's character (for instance, because it suggests that his conduct is or has been criminal, immoral or improper), and . . . that the assertion is false or that the facts asserted are irrelevant to the sentence.[194]

This provision, in catching derogatory and false allegations, is clearly intended primarily to safeguard the reputations of those caught up in the commission of criminal offences; it could cover, for example, an assertion that an individual had been unfaithful to her partner, put forward in a plea of mitigation about violent conduct towards that individual. But, where the allegation is true but irrelevant, the interest protected may be privacy, if, of course, the allegation relates to the person's private life, as in the example given. Again, the court has a discretion (it 'may make an order') rather than a binding duty to order the restriction: presumably under these provisions also, the open justice principle may be balanced against any relevant privacy or reputational interests.

This restriction, unlike those considered above, is not subject to any exception. Therefore, in that respect, it affords less recognition to freedom of speech, although it does not prevent the reporting of the case or discussion of it once it is over, so long as details likely to identify the victim are not revealed.

189 Section 4(1)(b).
190 Upon the application of the person accused of rape; the defendant must additionally show that his defence is likely to be substantially prejudiced without such a direction.
191 See for further discussion Barendt, E and Hitchens, L, Media Law: Cases and Materials, 2000, Chapter 7.
192 Sections 37 and 38, Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act, 1996.
193 Under s 25 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999.
194 Section 58(4), Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act, 1996.

Reporting restrictions relating to children

Introduction

The discussion concerns a range of restrictions on reporting, usually, although not invariably, linked to court proceedings, mainly intended to protect the identity of children. Reporting restrictions engage the 'privacy' of the child in the sense that the injunctions or orders are intended to protect the child's identity or other personal information. Thus in many instances her family life, her mental stability and her ability to form and develop relationships are also indirectly protected.[195]

Private hearings; statutory restrictions on identification

The restrictions in question could be variously categorised. A certain group of them affect the reporting of proceedings held in private and a substantial proportion of such proceedings involve cases concerning children. The common law rule is that all courts, in the exercise of their inherent power to regulate their own proceedings in order to ensure that justice is done, have a discretion to sit in private, but, due to the importance of the open justice principle, the discretion is to be exercised only in exceptional circumstances.[196] Certain statutes expressly provide for hearings to be held in private in relation to matters involving children.[197] However, the mere fact that a hearing occurs in private does not automatically mean that reporting of the proceedings is restricted. Under s 12(1)(a) of the Administration of Justice Act 1960 it will be a prima facie contempt to report on proceedings held in private[198] where they relate to: wardship, adoption, guardianship, custody, upbringing of or access to an infant.[199] It has been found that the press cannot report any aspect of wardship proceedings,[200] but this is not an absolute restriction:[201] it has been found to cover 'statements of evidence, reports, accounts of interviews' and similar information.[202] In relation to other information linked to the proceedings the test is whether the information is 'within the mischief which the cloak of privacy in relation to the substance of the proceedings is designed to guard against'.[203]

195 See Bensaid v UK [2001] 33 EHRR 10, para 47; A and Byrne and Twenty-Twenty Television v UK [1998] 25 EHRR CD 159.

196 Scott v Scott [1913] AC 417.

197 Adoption Act 1976 s 64; Magistrates' Courts Act 1980 s 69(2), as amended by the Children Act 1989 s 97. The Civil Procedure Rules 1998, Part 39 provide that a number of categories of hearing may take place in private; the decision whether to hold the hearing in private or in public is for the judge conducting it.

198 Under the 1960 Act s 12(2) it is permissible to publish the text of all or part of an order made by a court sitting in private unless the court, having power to do so, expressly prohibits its publication.

199 Re F [1977] Fam 58.

200 See Re X (A Minor) (Wardship: Injunction) [1984] 1 WLR 1422 (the Mary Bell case).

201 In Pickering v Liverpool Daily Post and Echo Newspapers plc [1991] 2 AC 370; [1991] 1 All ER 622, HL at 423 and 635 Lord Bridge observed: 'The essential privacy which is protected by each of the exemptions in paras (a)–(d) of s 12(1) attaches to the substance of the matters which the court has closed its doors to consider . . .'

202 Re F (A Minor) (Publication of Information) [1977] Fam 105.

203 Pickering v Liverpool Daily Post and Echo Newspapers plc [1991] 2 AC 370; [1991] 1 All ER 622 at 422–3 and 634.

Juveniles involved in criminal proceedings

Under s 39 of the Children and Young Persons Act (CYPA) 1933, a court (apart from a youth court) could direct that details relating to a child, who was a witness or defendant, including his or her name, should not be reported and that no picture of the child should be broadcast or published. The media could make representations to the judge, arguing that the demands of media freedom outweigh the possibility of harm to the child. In relation to any proceedings in any court the court may make an order under s 39 of the 1933 Act prohibiting publication of particulars calculated to lead to the identification of any child concerned in the proceedings.[204] Section 39 orders are especially problematic for journalists since they frequently provide insufficient guidance as to what can safely be published.[205]

Section 49 of the CYPA, as amended,[206] which relates to youth courts, places restrictions on the identification of children or young persons convicted in the youth court.[207] Section 49 provides for an automatic ban on publishing certain identifying details relating to a juvenile offender, including his or her name and address, although the court can waive the ban. Under the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997, the court can lift reporting restrictions where it considers that a ban would be against the public interest.

The s 39 restrictions were extended under s 44 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999, which now covers children involved in adult proceedings. The 1933 Act did not cover the period before proceedings begin. The 1999 Act prohibits the publication once a criminal investigation has begun, of any matter relating to a person involved in an offence while he is under 18 which is likely to identify him. Thus, juveniles who are witnesses are also covered. Under s 44(4), the court can dispense with the restrictions if it is satisfied that it is in the public interest to do so. Thus, s 44 brings the restrictions relating to juveniles in adult proceedings into line with those

204 Section 39 provides:

'In relation to any proceedings in any court the court may direct that–

(a) no newspaper report of the proceedings shall reveal the name, address, or school, or include any particulars calculated to lead to the identification, of any child concerned in the proceedings, either as being the person by or against or in respect of whom the proceedings are taken, or as being a witness therein;

(b) no picture shall be published in any newspaper as being or including a picture of any child or young person so concerned in the proceedings as aforesaid; except in so far (if at all) as may be permitted by the direction of the court.'

This section applies to sound and television broadcasts, and to cable programme services, as it applies to newspapers (Children and Young Persons Act 1963, s 57(4); Broadcasting Act 1990, Sched 20, para 3(2)).

205 See Briffett v DPP; Bradshaw v DPP [2001] EWHC 841 (Admin) and commentary: Dodd, M 'Children, the press – and a missed opportunity' [2002] 14(1) CFLQ 103–8.

206 As amended by Sched 2 to the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999.

207 Under the Crime Sentences 1997 s 45, which inserted s 49(4)(A) into the 1933 Act. The Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 s 44 creates an earlier starting point for the imposition of anonymity: protection against disclosure of identity for suspects, victims, witnesses now begins at the point of commencement of the criminal investigation. The Anti-Social Behaviour Act 2003 amended the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 s 1 to provide that s 49 does not apply to proceedings for orders under the 2003 Act, but that s 39 does apply.

under s 49 relating to youth proceedings, placing the onus on the court to find a good reason for lifting the restriction rather than having to find a good reason for imposing it. The discretion of the court is therefore more narrowly confined.[208] This is clearly an instance in which, as between the demands of press freedom and the interest in the protection of the privacy and reputation of juveniles, the latter interest has prevailed.

The ECHR (previously inherent) jurisdiction of the court

Where s 12(1)(a) or s 39 do not apply, the High Court may nevertheless grant an injunction restraining reporting that might reveal a child's identity or other matters relating to a child as an aspect of its inherent jurisdiction to protect minors.[209] After the decision in In re X (A Minor) (Wardship: Jurisdiction)[210] (the Mary Bell case), it can be seen that there was an increasing recourse to the court's asserted power to grant injunctions to restrain the publication of information about its wards or other children. The invention of this jurisdiction was described by Hoffmann LJ in R v Central Independent Television[211] in the following terms: 'the courts have, without any statutory or . . . other previous authority, assumed a power to create by injunction what is in effect a right of privacy for children'.

Instances in which the High Court is exercising its inherent jurisdiction tend to create the most wide-ranging impact on media freedom to publish since the reporting is not necessarily linked to court proceedings. The decisions discussed below suggest that the conflict between free expression and privacy is most likely to occur where the inherent jurisdiction is being exercised. It must be noted that after the House of Lords decision in In re S,[212] as discussed below, this term was replaced by the term 'the Convention jurisdiction'.

The inherent jurisdiction pre-HRA

In the pre-HRA era the courts sought to establish the boundaries between media freedom (recognised as an aspect of a common law right to freedom of expression)[213] and the privacy of the child in a series of decisions, culminating in the decision in In re Z (A Minor) (Identification: Restrictions on Publication).[214] It was accepted that there was no need to strive to create a balance between media freedom and privacy once it was 208 See the discussion in Lee [1993] 1 WLR 103, pp 109–10.

209 In In re M and N (Minors) (Wardship: Publication of Information) [1990] Fam 211 Butler-Sloss LJ found: 'The power of the courts to impose restrictions upon publication for the protection of children is derived from the inherent jurisdiction of the High Court exercising the powers of the Crown as parens patriae. It is not restricted to wardship . . .' She relied on Lord Donaldson of Lymington MR who said in In re C (A Minor) (Wardship: Medical Treatment) (No 2) [1990] Fam 39, 46 that wardship 'is the machinery for its exercise'. Ibid, 223.

210 [1975] Fam 47.

211 [1994] Fam 192, 204.

212 In re S (a child) [2004] UKHL 47; [2005] 1 AC 593.

213 See: R v Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Simms [1999] 3 WLR 328; Reynolds v Times Newspapers [1999] 4 All ER 609; Derbyshire CC v Times Newspapers [1993] AC 534.

214 [1995] 4 All ER 961 (CA).

found that the matter at issue related to ‘upbringing’, and so the paramountcy principle[215] applied: where it did so it determined the issue without any doubt in favour of the child’s ‘welfare’.[216] However, where the reporting at issue could be viewed as unrelated directly to ‘upbringing’, some sort of balancing act had to be undertaken. The tendency was to allow freedom of publication to prevail due to the perceived strength of the value of freedom of expression under the common law. Where a court viewed a case as raising a genuine public interest, it was unlikely to restrain publication, or place only minimal restraints on it. In re W (A Minor) (Wardship: Freedom of Publication),[217] for instance, it was found that the placing of a ward who had previously suffered homosexual abuse, with a male homosexual couple as foster parents, raised public interest questions about the fostering policy of the local authority in question and therefore the newspaper in question had a right to raise such questions, despite the fact that it was accepted as quite possible that the identity of the ward would be disclosed.[218]

An outcome even more favourable to media freedom was reached in R v Central Independent Television.[219] A programme was made depicting a police investigation into a man subsequently convicted of offences of indecency. His wife, the plaintiff, did not wish her daughter, aged five, who knew nothing of his convictions, to know what had occurred and therefore sought to have the programme altered so that it would not be possible to recognise her husband. The Court of Appeal refused the injunction, finding that the protection for the privacy of children under the inherent jurisdiction would not extend to covering publication of facts relating to those who were not carers of the child in question and which had occurred before the child was born. In other words, the limits of the protection for children’s privacy were indicated: no overt balancing exercise between privacy and freedom of expression was found necessary.

These decisions were clearly beginning to establish a spectrum of categories of case covering the balance to be struck between the privacy of the child and freedom of reporting. In the leading pre-HRA case, In re Z (A Minor) (Identification: Restrictions on Publication),[220] these categories were made explicit. A first category of cases was recognised in which freedom of publication would always prevail over the welfare of the child. These were cases, it was found, which would fall beyond the proper limit for the invocation of the wardship or inherent jurisdiction since upbringing was not in issue and the risk of harm to the child by invading her privacy could be viewed as 215 Following s 1(1) of the Children Act 1989 (CA), the child’s welfare is the court’s paramount consideration when it determines any question with respect to the upbringing of the child. In J v C this was explained to mean: ‘when all the relevant facts, relationships, claims and wishes of parents, risks, choices and other circumstances are taken into account and weighed, the course to be followed will be that which is most in the interests of the child’s welfare.’ [1970] AC 668, 710–11, per Lord McDermott.

216 Freedom of publication can be viewed as a ‘circumstance’ which a responsible parent would take into account; see discussion of this point in In re Z (A Minor) (Freedom of Publication) [1995] 4 All ER 961.

217 [1992] 1 All ER 794 (CA).

218 See also In re C (A Minor) (Wardship: Medical Treatment) (No 2) [1990] Fam 39, 46; In re W (A Minor) (Wardship: Restrictions on Publication) [1995] 2 FLR 466 (CA).

219 [1994] Fam 192.

220 [1995] 4 All ER 961 (CA).

incidental;[221] as Ward LJ put it: 'the freedom of the press is so fundamental that in this category it must triumph over welfare'. A further, second, category of cases was recognised – those in which the court does not have to determine an issue relating to upbringing but where the child's privacy is directly affected. In this category the child's interests would not be paramount and a balancing exercise had to be performed between the child's privacy and media freedom.[222] The third category covered instances where a question of the child's upbringing or of the exercise of parental responsibility was being determined, where the welfare of the child would be the paramount consideration, and her privacy interests would therefore trump competing free expression claims.[223]

In In re Z itself the issue before the court was found to relate to the upbringing of the child; a television company wished to make a film about Z (the daughter of Cecil Parkinson and Sarah Keays) and the treatment she was receiving for her particular educational needs at a specialised institution. It was envisaged that in demonstrating the methods and results of the institution Z would be identified and play an active part in the film. The court found that Z would be directly involved and that the proposed publicity would be harmful to her welfare. Therefore the instance was found to fall within the third category of case since the paramountcy principle applied. The court did not therefore need to perform a balancing act and refused to vary the injunction that was already in place preventing commentary on her situation.

In relation to the inherent jurisdiction, as the cases discussed from the pre-HRA era reveal, the courts had established a method of dealing with conflicts between the child's welfare and media freedom that largely excluded cases involving 'upbringing' from the battleground. It was only in respect of the second category of cases – where the child's privacy was at stake and at risk from media invasion – that the conflict had to be resolved, and in such instances, as indicated, it tended to be resolved in favour of the media, albeit with minimal restrictions on reporting. Doubtful distinctions were relied upon, as In re Z reveals, in pursuit of avoidance of the conflict. Once cases could be assigned to the 'upbringing' category on the one hand (the third grouping from In re Z) or the 'incidental' category on the other (the first grouping), conflict could be avoided. The general academic view was that adoption of these approaches had led to a failure to deal satisfactorily with the issues of both privacy and free speech at the level of principle.[224] That failure appeared to spring from the resistance of the 221 The court compared In re X (A Minor) (Wardship: Jurisdiction) [1975] Fam 47 with In re X (A Minor) (Wardship: Injunction) [1984] 1 WLR 1422. In the first case, concerning a book about X's father, the material was not a story about her or about the way she had been brought up, except indirectly since it revealed that her father was a philanderer. By contrast, the story in 1984 about X, Mary Bell's daughter, was directly about the fact that the authorities were permitting her to be brought up by a mother who was viewed by some as too evil to be entrusted with the care of a young child. See also In re M and N (Minors) (Wardship: Publication of Information) [1990] Fam 211, 231; M v British Broadcasting Corpn [1997] 1 FLR 51.

222 In re W (Freedom of Publication) [1992] 1 All ER 794 the child's upbringing was a central focus of the publicity, although at the same time the court did not consider that it was determining a question relating to upbringing.

223 This occurred in Re C (A Minor) (Wardship: Medical Treatment) (No 2) [1990] Fam 39 and in In re M and N (Minors) (Wardship: Termination of Access) [1990] Fam 211. In this category the court was seen as exercising its 'custodial' jurisdiction.

224 See: Cram, I, 'Minors' Privacy, Free Speech and the Courts' [1997] PL 410; Woods, L, 'Freedom of Expression and the protection of minors' (2001) 13(2) CFLQ 209.

courts, especially the Family Division, to the notion of individual rights as opposed to welfare.[225]

Effect of the HRA

However, the somewhat simplistic or mechanistic analysis from In re Z was thrown into jeopardy by the inception of the Human Rights Act, since where the third category was applicable the Art 10 guarantee was almost automatically abrogated, while where the first or second applied, the Art 8 rights of the child were likely to be afforded no or insufficient weight. The pre-HRA treatment of both rights appeared therefore to become inconsistent with the courts' duty under s 6(1) HRA and also with the interpretative obligation under s 3(1): it might have been expected that s 3(1) would be used to reinterpret the paramountcy principle under s 1(1) CA so that Art 10 no longer suffered automatic abrogation where restrictions on publication related to upbringing.

In what follows certain significant decisions are examined in which the In re Z categories were considered in the light of the HRA. However, by subtly manipulating the concept of 'upbringing', either under s 3(1) HRA or by using ordinary principles of interpretation, the courts have managed so far to avoid confronting the most difficult question of all – the compatibility of the paramountcy principle as currently conceived with Art 10. Instead the courts have succeeded in confining themselves to considering instances falling within the middle category from In re Z – wherein a balancing act between the two interests could be performed. But even in conducting that less difficult exercise, unsatisfactory reasoning processes were followed since there was, at least initially, a reluctance to accord Art 8 its status as a fully-fledged Convention right, once it came into conflict with Art 10.

The European Convention on Human Rights did not play a significant part in the decisions considered so far since, despite increasing reliance on the Convention in other areas of law pre-HRA,[226] the Family Division was content to balance media freedom against the child's welfare on the basis of common law understandings of those values. In Kelly v BBC,[227] however, the imminent inception of the Human Rights Act influenced the court to take Art 10 of the Convention fully into account. The case concerned a boy of 16, Kelly, who was made a ward of court after he disappeared from home to join a religious cult group. The BBC obtained an interview with him, but an order restraining publication of the detail of any report or interview with him or with members of the religious group was made, which the BBC challenged. It was accepted by both sides that the case was one in which the court did have jurisdiction to grant injunctive relief. The dispute between the parties was as to whether the case fell within the second or third of the three categories identified in In re Z. Clearly, if it was found to fall within the third, the paramountcy principle would apply and the interest in freedom of expression would be almost automatically overcome. Therefore it was crucial for counsel for the BBC to convince the Court that the case fell within the second category and then to argue that the injunction could not be justified as necessary in a democratic society, under Art 10(2).

225 See Butler Sloss LJ in Re L (A Child) (Contact: Domestic Violence) [2001] Fam 260 CA, para.294.
226 See, e.g., the Court of Appeal decision in Derbyshire CC v Times Newspapers [1993] AC 534.
227 [2001] 1 All ER 323; [2001] 2 WLR 253; [2001] Fam 59.

The Court did not find it entirely easy to decide what distinguishes cases in the second category from those in the third. Clearly, this turned on the meaning assigned to the term 'upbringing'.[228] Munby J concluded:

> Upbringing . . . involves a process in which the parent, or other person in loco parentis, is the subject and of which the child is the object . . . Section 1(1)(a) CA therefore applies only to those processes or actions of which the child is the object, and not to those in which the child is the subject.

Munby J went on to find that In re Z had created a distinction between cases such as In re W, in which four boys without their father's involvement had given interviews to journalists, and cases in which the parent actively encourages or brings about the involvement of the child with the media. In re Z, he found, fell within the latter category in which the child is the object since, as he put it, referring to the words of Ward LJ, Z's mother wished to 'bring up her child as one who will play an active part in a television film'. The In re W case was viewed as similar to the instant one since Kelly had given the interview without the involvement of his grandmother or mother. The case was therefore viewed as one not involving upbringing and as a result as within the second category; the paramountcy principle was inapplicable and therefore a 'so-called balancing exercise has to be performed.'[229]

In considering the claim of freedom of expression as compared with the need to safeguard the welfare of the child, Munby J pointed out that this exercise had in general been carried out in an unsatisfactory fashion in the Family Division due to its 'child-centred' approach.[230] He found that there was no question of 'balancing' freedom of expression against one or more of the interests identified in para 2 of Art 10: those who sought to bring themselves within the protection of para 2 had to demonstrate convincingly that the protection applied. He went on to find that the arguments in favour of suppressing the interview were not sufficiently convincing.[231] Since the arguments were fairly evenly balanced, and he had already found that Art 10(2) places the burden on those seeking to make the case for interference with freedom of expression, he determined that injunctive relief could not be justified. He further found that the grant of an injunction framed as widely as the one he was being invited to make would have been wholly disproportionate to any aim that could legitimately be pursued on Kelly's behalf.

228 See In re Z at p 29.

229 [2001] 1 All ER 323, 341.

230 'As Thorpe LJ [noted] in In re G (Celebrities: Publicity) [1999] 1 FLR 409, 418 . . . Hoffmann LJ rightly said in his judgment in R v Central Independent Television plc there is an inevitable tendency for the Family Division judge at first instance to give too much weight to welfare and too little weight to freedom of speech.'

231 It had been argued, inter alia, that Kelly would find it harder to reconcile himself with his family if the interview were broadcast. Munby J found that the argument that further publicity might be in his best interests was as plausible as the contrary argument put forward – that it would be opposed to them.

A similar instance arose in In the matter of X (a child),[232] but the significant difference was that in the few months since Kelly the HRA had come into force. It prompted the Court to go even further than Kelly had done in accepting the primacy of media freedom once it was free to do so, having once again succeeded in excluding the instance from the third 'upbringing' category.[233] The Court proceeded to make the important finding, foreshadowed in Kelly, that while the exercise of its discretion had been referred to many times before October 2000 as a balancing exercise, such an exercise was no longer appropriate after the coming into force of the HRA. The Court determined that it must rely on s 12(4) HRA and Art 10 in reaching its decision, and went on to find: '[this] is not a balancing exercise in which the scales are evenly positioned at the commencement of the exercise. On the contrary, the scales are weighted at the beginning so that Article 10 prevails unless one of the defined derogations applies when given a narrow interpretation.' The application was, however, granted on the basis that the injunction was too wide and it was varied accordingly. The same stance was taken in Medway Council v BBC[234] in an instance, which once again was not found to involve a question of upbringing, the scales were weighted so that Art 10 prevailed, subject to an application of one of the derogations, narrowly defined.[235] Interestingly, a narrow construction under s 3(1) HRA of s 1(1) CA, allowing the case to be excluded from the 'upbringing' category, was found to accord with the demands of Art 10 and s 12(4) HRA.[236]

Although the recognition of the importance of media freedom in Kelly, In the matter of X and Medway Council was arguably welcome, when compared to the possibility of an over-protective child-centred approach, the analysis in relation to Arts 8 and 10 in this line of authority was quite clearly flawed. This meant that Art 8 lost its Convention status as a fully-fledged right, and became instead merely a narrowly interpreted exception to the Art 10 right of 'freedom of expression.' But conversely it is also hard to reconcile dicta in this line of authority with the Convention under the HRA since it assumes that where the paramountcy principle is found to apply, Art 10 can be almost automatically abrogated. However, judicial recognition of a need for a proper resolution of the conflict between Arts 8 and 10 in this context under the HRA where the principle does not apply was apparent in the most authoritative decision to touch on the issues raised in Kelly and in Re X.

232 [2001] 1 FCR 541.

233 A newspaper publisher had applied for an order to vary an injunction granted to the local authority restraining foster parents from disclosing to the newspaper information concerning the local authority's policies in respect of trans-racial fostering. Relying on the analysis of Munby J in Kelly, Mrs Justice Bracewell found that in this instance the child should be viewed as the subject of the process of upbringing, not the object, since the issue before the court concerned restrictions on media reporting of issues alleged to be raised by the child's history.

234 [2002] 1 FLR 104.

235 The case concerned the inherent jurisdiction of the court to restrain a broadcast of a consented-to interview with a boy of 13 who had been made one of the first subjects of an anti-social behaviour order.

236 At para 29.

Impact of Re S

In re S (A Child)[237] the Court of Appeal had to adjudicate on an appeal against an order made by Hedley J in the Family Division of the High Court.[238] The appeal raised a short but difficult point: 'can or should the court [under the inherent jurisdiction] restrain the publication of the identity of a defendant and her victim in a murder trial to protect the privacy of her son who is the subject of care proceedings'? The victim was S's brother and there was psychiatric evidence to the effect that S, as an already vulnerable child, would suffer greater trauma and be at greater risk of later mental illness if he was subjected to bullying and harrassment at school once the identity of his mother became known. Hedley J made an interim order restraining reporting that would identify S but modified it to include in para 8 the proviso that 'Nothing in this order shall of itself prevent any person (a) publishing any particulars of or information relating to any part of the proceedings before any court other than a court sitting in private . . .' At the inter partes hearing the newspapers argued that they should be able to publish the names and photographs of both parents and of S's dead brother. In particular, they wanted to publish photographs of S's brother with his mother. Since S was the same age as his brother was when he died and they resembled each other, the photographs would indirectly identify S. The judge decided that the exception in para 8(a) should remain in the order.

On appeal by the child, the Court of Appeal found, unanimously, that the question before them did not concern a matter of upbringing since, as Lady Justice Hale found:

> In deciding whether or not to make this order, the court is not exercising its jurisdiction over how CS is to be brought up. That is being done in the care proceedings. Nor is it deciding how any aspect of parental responsibility should be met.'[239]

Therefore this was not an instance in which the paramountcy principle applied. Interestingly, the first instance judge had considered that even if the child's welfare had been the paramount consideration, he would have decided in the same way. The Court of Appeal disagreed, Lady Justice Hale finding that when the child's welfare is the paramount consideration, 'it rules on or determines the issue before the court. It is the trump card' (emphasis in the original).[240]

Despite this finding, it must be asked whether Re S was not in fact concerned with upbringing, albeit indirectly. According to the evidence of an expert psychologist S

237 [2003] 2 FCR 577; (2003) 147 SJLB 873. See also Harris v Harris [2001] 2 FLR 895 in which, while there was no detailed consideration of the balancing exercise between Art 10 (and 11) on the one hand and Art 8 on the other, Munby J accepted (at para 384) that the approach adopted by Sedley LJ in Douglas v Hello! [2001] QB 967 should be followed in which Art 10 was not given presumptive priority.

238 19 February 2003.

239 As she put it: 'Parents cannot prohibit press reporting of criminal proceedings in order to protect their children from harm, however much they might like to be able to do so' (para 22).

240 Per Lady Justice Hale, para 62. In Clayton v Clayton [2007] 1 All ER 1146 the Court of Appeal agreed that the father's Art 10 rights must be balanced against the child's Art 8 rights but still took the view that the issue was governed by s 1 CA 1989. They avoided tackling the problem posed by the paramountcy principle. See also Re Webster [2007] 1 FLR 1146.

was more likely to suffer mental illness due to the results of the publicity and the father, who was his main carer, would have to deal with those effects. If the child had to move school or home due to bullying after the publicity that would again affect his upbringing. Perhaps most pertinently of all, the placement of the child with the father was also likely to be affected by the publicity since the father was barely coping with the situation and might have failed to cope with further stress and trauma suffered by an already vulnerable child as a result of the publicity. S might have encountered it himself since he might have seen articles and pictures in the media about his dead brother and his mother. He was also likely to suffer harassment and teasing at school once the identity of his mother and further details of the crime became more widely known, during the period of the trial. That was also the period during which his own trauma and stress due to loss of his brother were likely to be at their height.

In comparison, the upbringing of the child in In re Z was unlikely to be directly affected to her detriment or as an indirect effect of the broadcasting of the documentary, although possibly she might have become aware of secondary publicity as a result of it. Thus the only way in which the documentary could have been detrimentally linked to Z's upbringing would have been via the ultimate effects of the publicity. This was also the case in In re S. The only difference between the two instances was that in the one instance the child was directly involved in the documentary, while in the other the child was not directly the subject of the press coverage. Taking account of the view of the mother in Z that the child would benefit from participation in the documentary, while all those involved in S's upbringing, and expert opinion, considered that the media coverage would be extremely detrimental to him, it is suggested that the distinction between direct and indirect effects on 'upbringing' is a spurious one.

The Re S findings also indicate that it is very unlikely that the welfare principle will ever be found to apply in these instances of indirect effects on upbringing via media reporting. This is clearly the preferred course for the courts since it avoids a problematic conflict between s 1(1) CA and Art 10. But it might also mean that the courts are likely to be reluctant to focus too strongly on the effect of reporting on the family and private life of a child, since so doing appears to draw the effects on upbringing back into the equation. It creates tension in the decision since at one stage in the reasoning upbringing is excluded, but at a later stage it potentially re-enters the reasoning process when the private and family life claim is being balanced against the speech claim. This is precisely what occurred, as discussed below, in the House of Lords decision in In re S. The better solution, considered further below, is to reinterpret the welfare principle under s 3(1) HRA in order to avoid a conflict with Art 10 and to accept a broad definition of the term 'upbringing'. So doing might encourage the courts to focus strongly on the effects of reporting on upbringing, meaning that the significant issues truly at stake under the private and family life claim manage to obtain a hearing.

Having found that the welfare principle did not apply, the Court of Appeal went on to find that the case fell within the scope of the inherent jurisdiction of the High Court.[241] But following the House of Lords decision in Re S[242] it is no longer necessary in these cases to show that the inherent jurisdiction applies. The House of Lords in Re S found unanimously that since the 1998 Act came into force, the earlier case law about the existence and scope of inherent jurisdiction did not have to be considered in the instant case or in 'similar cases'. Lord Steyn said: 'The foundation of the jurisdiction to restrain publicity in a case such as the present is now derived from convention rights under the ECHR (emphasis added).'[243] In other words, the jurisdiction is not the 'vehicle' allowing for the balancing exercise to occur – the Convention rights themselves provide the vehicle.

241 At para 40.
242 In re S (a child) [2004] UKHL 47; [2005] 1 AC 593.

At first glimpse this looks like the creation of a form of direct horizontal effect, discussed in Chapter 4, since it would appear that in relation to assertions of a need for restraint to protect the privacy of the child there would be no need for the inherent jurisdiction even to exist. Further, the rights under the HRA would not be expected to deliver less than the existing cause of action which could have acted as the vehicle for their delivery. Possibly they could deliver more and that would then represent a form of direct horizontal effect since it would mean that there would not be an infusion of the right into the existing cause of action, but a replacement of that existing cause with an extended protection based only on the rights. In other words, Lord Steyn appeared to be stating that the technicalities of the inherent jurisdiction could be discarded and its place taken by the Convention rights. That would be direct horizontal effect as normally understood – the creation of a new cause of action allowing private parties to rely on the rights against each other. There would be no need to rely on an existing cause of action, as was thought to be the case in Campbell,[244] in the context of privacy generally.

But this part of Lord Steyn's judgment was highly problematic since it was ambiguously expressed; it might appear that adults could seek to rely on it in instances in which the action for breach of confidence would not be available, but where a Convention right – normally Art 8 – arguably applied. The obvious example would be in harassment cases where there were difficulties in relying on the Protection from Harassment Act 1997.[245] However, leaving aside the question of Art 8's applicability to harassment, it is suggested that Lord Steyn did not intend that the new 'ECHR jurisdiction' could be extended to adults. The true explanation for the creation of the new jurisdiction is, it is contended, that the court is taking the place of the state in terms of protecting the child and that in this instance alone a form of direct horizontal effect has been created since there is little to be gained from seeking to distinguish the courts' duty under s 6 HRA from its former duty under the inherent jurisdiction. It is arguable that at the international level the Convention allows for vindication of the right to private life in instances (such as adopting intrusive means in order to obtain information)[246] where the Human Rights Act provides for no such vindication, due to its inherent limitations – the need to find a public authority to sue, or an existing cause of action, or an

243 At para 23.

244 [2004] 2 WLR 1232; see above pp 826–27.

245 See pp 871, 873 below.

246 See Von Hannover v Germany (2005) 40 EHRR 1; (2004) Appl No 59320/00; on one view the use of intrusive methods by reporters appeared to play a part in the decision to find that a breach of Art 8 had occurred. However, it now appears that that is not the reading of the decision that is being adopted domestically; see p 914 below.

applicable statutory provision. But Lord Steyn's remarks, ambiguous as they were, do not appear to provide a basis for affording Art 8 an ability to operate beyond those limitations, at the domestic level. The only instance in which, conceivably, a cause of action could arise outside those limitations after Re S, would be one where, had it arisen in the past, the child's welfare would have been viewed as so doubtfully at stake that the inherent jurisdiction could not have been found to apply but where, now, Art 8 could be viewed as applicable. It should also be noted that the jurisdiction of the High Court to protect juveniles caught up in the criminal justice system has been extended to cover vulnerable adults with mental health problems.[247]

The House of Lords' decision in Re S demanded abandonment of the reliance on the inherent jurisdiction in favour of reliance on the Convention rights. Therefore if a child had an Art 8(1) claim to respect for his/her private life, even if previously the inherent jurisdiction would have been inapplicable, a cause of action appears to arise and the claim has to be tested against the competing Art 10 claim of the media. The problem, however, with speaking of the application of the ECHR jurisdiction, or indeed the extension of the inherent jurisdiction in reliance on s 6 HRA, is that, as touched on earlier, tension between accepting indirect horizontal effect and creating direct effect arises. If it is assumed, in any event, that a cause of action arises, it is clear that as the Article 8 claim is weak, the Art 10 claim will probably prevail, but this should not be an automatic presumption.

Thus, Lady Justice Hale's judgment in Re S – endorsed by the House of Lords in Campbell[248] – represents the closest approach yet, not only to a proper understanding of the method of resolving conflicts between Convention rights, but also to a partial acceptance of the need for the Family Division to confront fully the changes in judicial reasoning that the Human Rights Act necessitates. It demonstrates a complete break with the mistaken approach adopted in Kelly, X and Medway Council in which freedom of speech was given automatic priority once it was found that the paramountcy principle did not apply. However, highly significantly, by excluding the case on somewhat doubtful grounds from the 'upbringing' category, the Court of Appeal in Re S backed away from a confrontation between that principle and Art 10 under the HRA. That principle, if it is to act as a 'trump card', is clearly incompatible with the Convention values. Below, the general question of the proper reconciliation of the conflict between Arts 8 and 10, even where upbringing is in issue, or where the child's privacy is only indirectly or inferentially affected, is considered in more detail in relation to all reporting restrictions designed to protect children.

The path forward does not involve, it is argued, continuing to refine the definition of upbringing almost out of existence in this context by the use of exclusionary interpretations under s 3(1)HRA so as to avoid invoking the paramountcy principle (as in Re S or Medway Council) in order to avoid the difficult questions raised in a conflict with Art 10. Instead, it involves re-defining the paramountcy principle under s 3(1) so that even where it is in play, the conflict between Arts 8 and 10 can be properly resolved. At present resolution of the conflict is merely precluded since due to the effect of the absolutist presumption of the principle, the Art 8 right to respect for family life of the child[249] will – in effect – always win out where it clashes with Art 10, thereby denying Art 10's status as an individual right. The Strasbourg approach to clashes between Arts 8 and 10 not only indicates that the paramountcy principle as currently conceived is incompatible with the demands of the HRA, but also underpins and confirms the Re S and Campbell approach[250] – that Art 10 should not be afforded presumptive priority where the principle does not apply. At present the courts have not accepted that approach, preferring instead to interpret cases of media publicity in this context as not engaging the paramountcy principle, and it is predicted that they will continue to take this course unless a case too similar to In re Z arises. Thus in these cases the key question in this context is now simply – is the child's Art 8 right engaged? If so it must be balanced against the media's Art 10 right, on the Campbell model, as discussed below, in Section 8. The In re Z categories appear to have lost their significance after Re S.

247 In re A Local Authority (Inquiry: Restraint on Publication) [2003] EWHC 2746 (Fam); [2004] 2 WLR 926 at paras 66 and 86–97.
248 [2004] 2 WLR 1232.

Impact of the HRA

The most important concern arising from the use of these reporting restrictions is the fear that they may create unacceptable curbs on the freedom of the press and broadcasters. The main safeguard for media freedom is the possibility that the restrictions, apart from that of anonymity in relation to certain sexual offences, may be dispensed with in the public interest. In the HRA era, Art 10 jurisprudence is becoming an increasingly important influence upon development of the public interest test, so that it is now the principal mechanism for a balanced resolution of rights to privacy (and, on occasion, to life) and to freedom of expression. It is apparent from the Convention jurisprudence that, where two Convention rights come into conflict, some kind of balancing act between the two needs to be undertaken.[251] Although jurisprudence in this area is still quite limited, it appears that the margin of appreciation becomes particularly significant here, so that states tend to have a fairly wide discretion in resolving the conflict.[252] Domestic courts therefore have an appreciable degree of latitude in determining where to strike the balance between the two interests. Section 12 of the HRA, which enjoins the court to have 'particular regard' to Art 10 when making any order which might infringe it, is relevant when civil matters, including wardship proceedings, or the doctrine of confidence, are in question. Since throughout this chapter the effect of s 12 and 249 It has been accepted in a number of the domestic cases that the welfare of the child can be viewed as an aspect of his or her Art 8 rights. See, e.g., Medway Council v BBC [2002] 1 FLR 104, para 29.

250 [2004] 2 WLR 1232.

251 Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria (1994) 19 EHRR 34, para 55. The two Convention rights in conflict there were free speech itself and – so the court found – the right to religious freedom, protected by Art 9.

252 Ibid The restriction on Art 10 entailed by the seizure of an allegedly blasphemous film was justified by reference to the Art 9 right to freedom of religious belief. The Court applied a wide margin of appreciation, and simply said that 'the content of the film cannot be viewed as incapable of grounding' the conclusion of the national authorities that seizure was justified (para 56). Thus, the test applied was reminiscent of the narrow Wednesbury standard of unreasonableness. See also Wingrove v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 1. Both decisions are discussed in Chapter 6, pp 488–91.

of public interest tests in relation to Art 8 rights is a central theme, the question of seeking to resolve the conflict between Arts 8 and 10 is considered fully in one section, below.[253] The courts have more leeway in the context of the ECHR jurisdiction to consider solutions to this conflict, the arguments below as to the engagement of Arts 8 and 10, and the discussion of methods of resolving the conflict between them, would apply equally to the automatic reporting restrictions and to orders made under the other current powers.

5 Trespass, defamation, harassment; proposals for a new privacy tort

This section begins by considering a range of proposals put forward pre-HRA by government-appointed bodies for providing protection for privacy, which provide the backdrop to the recent development of the doctrine of confidence into a privacy law. Although a privacy law has now emerged, it is not an all-encompassing one that could cover, for example, persistent pursuit of a person by reporters or the use of bugging devices. The Protection from Harassment Act 1997 might cover such intrusions as considered below. This section then moves on to demonstrate why other tortious remedies proved inadequate to protect personal information, leading the courts to develop the doctrine of breach of confidence, under the impetus of the HRA.

Proposals for civil and criminal liability for invasion of privacy

No general, comprehensive tort of invasion of privacy exists in the UK, as in the US,[254] to control the activity of the media or others in intruding on the privacy of individuals, using harassment or surreptitious techniques to obtain information regarding an individual's private life, and then publishing the details, perhaps in exaggerated, lurid terms. It was recently confirmed in Wainwright v Home Office[255] that there is no English common law tort of invasion of privacy. But there is, as indicated above, a statutory tort of invasion of privacy, under the HRA, applicable only against public authorities, relying on Art 8 and s 6 HRA. Also, protection for personal information is now available under the new privacy liability discussed below, and under a number of statutory provisions.

In the early 1990s, prior to these developments, comprehensive legal controls were proposed, intended to be used against the media and others when private information was published. These controls were to affect both the publication of the information and the methods used to obtain it. When information such as a photograph is obtained, there may often be some kind of intrusion on property, albeit of a nebulous kind, such as long-range surveillance. Proposals regarding legal controls relevant to the publication of information will be considered first, followed by proposals regarding the legal control of intrusions.

253 See pp 937–81.

254 US Restatement 2d Torts (1977) No 652A.

255 Lord Hoffmann's speech to this effect was agreed with in full by Lord Hope of Craighead and Lord Hutton: [2004] 2 AC 406, paras 28–35. See for discussion of Wainwright: Chapter 11, pp 1176–81.

Proposals for the enactment of a tort of invasion of privacy in the UK centred around the protection of personal information. Article 8 ECHR under the HRA, as interpreted in Douglas and Others v Hello!,[256] but more importantly now in Campbell,[257] has brought about a dramatic development of the existing doctrine of breach of confidence, with the result that greatly increased protection for control of personal information has been created. However, there is still an argument for providing further protection for privacy by means of a statutory tort balanced by wide ranging and carefully drawn specific public interest defences. Such a tort could provide a more comprehensive protection for privacy, including protection from intrusions where no publication occurs. Although such comprehensive protection may now be available, as the discussion below and in ss 6 and 7 indicates, it is provided on a piecemeal basis and is not available in dedicated statutory privacy provisions.

Support for a statutory tort was, however, far from unanimous in the relevant committees which have considered the issue. Thus, while the Younger Committee in 1972[258] recommended the introduction of a tort of disclosure of information unlawfully acquired, Calcutt 1[259] decided against recommending a new statutory tort of invasion of privacy relating to publication of personal information, although the Committee considered that it would be possible to define such a tort with sufficient precision. Calcutt 2[260] recommended only that the government should give further consideration to the introduction of such a tort, but the National Heritage Select Committee[261] recommended its introduction, as did the later Lord Chancellor's Consultation Paper, the Green Paper.[262] As indicated above, these proposals were abandoned in July 1995,[263] although they found some expression in the DPA 1998.[264] It may be noted that the Lord Chancellor's Paper did not propose an extension of legal aid to those seeking redress under the proposed new civil privacy liability.

The possible definition of the proposed tort put forward by Calcutt 1 was designed to relate only to personal information which was published without authorisation. Such information was defined as those aspects of an individual's personal life which a reasonable person would assume should remain private. The main concern of the Committee was that true information which would not cause lasting harm, was already known to some, and was obtained reputably might be caught by its provisions. The Lord Chancellor's proposals were wider: there should be a new cause of action for 'infringement of privacy causing substantial distress' (para 5.22). No definition of 257 [2004] 2 WLR 1232. See pp 911–13 below. For comment, see: Lindsay, D, 'Naomi Campbell in the House of Lords: Implications for Australia' (2004) 11 Privacy Law & Policy Reporter 4–11; Morgan, J, 'Privacy in the House of Lords – Again' (2004) 120 LQR 563–66.

256 [2001] 2 WLR 992.

258 Op. cit., fn 1.

259 Op. cit., fn 1.

260 Op. cit., fn 1.

261 Op. cit., fn 1.

262 The paper was released on 30 July 1993 – CHAN J060915NJ.7/93. See 143 NLJ 1182 for discussion of these proposals.

263 The White Paper, Privacy and Media Intrusion: The Government's Response, Cmnd 2918, July 1995, found against creation of a statutory tort.

264 See below, pp 920–37.

privacy was offered, although it was stated to include matters relating to health, personal relationships and communications, and freedom from harassment.

Legatt LJ asserted confidently in Kaye that a right to privacy exists in the US which will be enforced and suggested that such a right should be imported into UK law, but this proposition has come under attack,[265] on the basis that the scope of US privacy rights is severely limited by a general defence of 'newsworthiness'[266] which allows many stories disclosing embarrassing and painful personal facts to be published. Clearly, there is little value in looking to the US for a model if a UK statutory right to privacy is ever enacted. The Calcutt Committee did not consider that liability should be subject to a general defence of public interest on US lines, although it did favour a tightly drawn defence of justified disclosure. Under Calcutt 2 (para 12.23) it was proposed that it would be a defence to show that the defendant had reasonable grounds for believing that publication of the personal information would contribute to preventing, detecting or exposing the commission of a crime or other seriously anti-social conduct; or to preventing the public from being misled by some public statement or action of the individual concerned; or that the defendant had reasonable grounds for believing that publication would be necessary for the protection of public health or safety. The Green Paper invited comments on these defences and in particular on the question whether the public interest defence should be defined in general terms or whether it should be more specific (paras 5.62–5.67). The Green Paper proposed (para 5.45) that there should be a defence that the defendant had acted under any lawful authority. Prima facie, these defences seemed to range widely enough to prevent public figures from being able to use the tort to stifle legitimate investigative journalism. The defence of seeking to prevent the public from being misled by some public statement or action of the individual concerned would be, it is submitted, essential to draw a clear distinction between the private citizen and the public figure, and to ensure the accountability of the latter.

Further proposals for reform aimed at methods of obtaining information were also put forward. The Younger Committee proposed the introduction of a tort and crime of unlawful surveillance by means of a technical device, and both Calcutt Committees[267] recommended the creation of a specific criminal offence providing more extensive protection – a recommendation which was backed by the National Heritage Select Committee[268] when it considered the matter.

The clause creating the offence under Calcutt 2 also offered the individual whose privacy has been invaded the possibility of obtaining injunctions in the High Court to prevent publication of material gained in contravention of the clause provisions; it was also proposed that damages should be available to hold newspapers to account for any profits gained through publication of such material. Under the proposal criminal liability would have been made out if the defendant did any of the following with 265 Bedingfield, D, 'Privacy or publicity: the enduring confusion surrounding the American tort of invasion of privacy' (1992) 55 MLR 111.

266 Bedingfield ibid cites the example of Kelley v Post Publishing Co Mass [1951] 98 NE 2d 286. A father was unable to restrain publication of a picture of the severely injured body of his daughter due to the finding that the accident was newsworthy.

267 Op. cit., fn 1.

268 Op. cit., fn 1.

intent to obtain personal information or photographs, in either case with a view to their publication: entering or remaining on private property without the consent of the lawful occupant; placing a surveillance device on private property without such consent; using a surveillance device whether on private property or elsewhere in relation to an individual who is on private property without his or her consent; taking a photograph or recording the voice of an individual who is on private property without his or her consent and with intent that the individual should be identifiable. This clause seemed to specify the forbidden acts fairly clearly and to be aimed at preventing what would generally be accepted to be, on the face of it, undesirable invasions of privacy; it is worth noting that France, Germany, Denmark and the Netherlands all have similar offences on the statute books. (It should be noted that the offence would not have covered persistent telephoning,[269] or photographing, interviewing or recording the voice of a vulnerable individual such as a disaster victim or a bereaved relative in a public place.)

Calcutt 1 and the Green Paper[270] proposed defences to the proposed criminal offences which were wider than the defences suggested in relation to a tort of invasion of privacy. Calcutt 1 proposed (para 6.35) that it would be a defence to any of the actions above to show that the act was done:

(a) for the purpose of preventing, detecting or exposing the commission of a crime or other seriously anti-social conduct; or
(b) for the purpose of preventing the public from being misled by some public statement or action of the individual concerned; or
(c) for the purpose of informing the public about matters directly affecting the discharge of any public function of the individual concerned; or
(d) for the protection of public health or safety; or
(e) under any lawful authority.

Calcutt 1, 2 and the Green Paper were silent as to the mental element required with respect to the defences. There appear to be three possibilities here which, for the purposes of exposition, will be examined using the example of a claim of defence (a). First, the defence would succeed only if it was shown that the forbidden act actually could have led to the exposure of crime, so that if it turned out that in fact no criminal activity had been present – though perhaps a reasonable person would have thought that it was – the defence would fail. Secondly, the defence would succeed if the defendant could show that she honestly and reasonably believed that she was acting with the purpose of exposing crime. Thirdly, it would succeed if the defendant could show that she honestly believed that she was acting with this purpose. It is submitted that the first possibility would be undesirable for three reasons: first, it could lead to serious injustice where a reporter had a reasonable suspicion which turned out later to be untrue; secondly, it would offend against the principle of criminal law formulated in DPP v Morgan[271] that the defendant should be judged on the facts as she believed them to be, and thirdly, it could act as a serious deterrent to investigative journalism.

269 This might be covered by the Protection from Harassment Act 1997, as discussed above.
270 Op. cit., fn 1.
271 [1976] AC 182.

The second possibility is an improvement, but it again falls foul of the Morgan principle; moreover, there would be a risk that judges might demand quite a high standard of reasonable belief so that journalists would have to produce substantial evidence justifying their suspicions in order to make out the defence – a burden which would again exercise a deterrent effect.

It is suggested that the third possibility was preferable; a journalist who honestly believes that she is acting in the public interest (within the terms of one of the defences) should not be criminalised. It may be feared that such a fully subjective test would always provide an escape from liability and thus render the offence useless. However, a journalist who merely asserted that she thought she was acting within the terms of one of the specific public interests, but was unable to adduce any grounds at all for her belief, would probably not be believed by the court. The other advantage of adopting this third possibility would be that it could come into play while the journalistic investigation was still at an inchoate stage so long as some evidence could be adduced supporting the necessary belief. On this basis, the proposed offence would provide a remedy against some unjustifiable invasions of privacy, but would be unlikely to deter serious journalism. However, the Lord Chancellor's Consultation paper favoured narrowing the defences by omitting the words 'seriously anti-social conduct' from defence (a) and curtailing defences (b) and (c). If this proposal was ever implemented, the public lives of public figures such as Ministers would be protected from scrutiny, an instance of curtailment of freedom of speech which would clearly prevent the full participation of the citizen in the democratic process.

Causing harassment, alarm or distress, and anti-social behaviour

The Protection from Harassment Act 1997 (PHA), which was also discussed in Chapter 8,[272] offers a remedy in respect of some forms of repeated intrusions on privacy. It was not aimed at persons such as reporters or photographers, but at 'stalkers'; however, it could be utilised in relation to repeated intrusions by journalists or on privacy. The use of the new tort of misuse of personal information discussed above does not provide a remedy in respect of intrusions aimed at obtaining information; it can only provide a remedy if information is obtained and sought to be published. It is not a new comprehensive privacy tort, covering all forms of privacy-invasion and no such tort is recognised in UK common law.[273] The use of the PHA against reporters would have to be balanced by Art 10 arguments; this point is returned to below.

PHA offences and civil liability

Sections 1 and 2 PHA make it an offence to pursue a course of conduct that amounts to harassment of another where the harasser knows or ought to know that this will be its effect. Apart from creating criminal liability for stalking, the Act also provides a

272 See pp 788–97.

273 There is no English domestic law tort of invasion of privacy. Previous suggestions to the contrary were dismissed by Lord Hoffmann, whose speech was agreed with in full by Lord Hope of Craighead and Lord Hutton, in Wainwright v Home Office [2004] 2 AC 406, paras 28–35.

civil remedy in s 3 in the form of damages or a restraining order. 'Conduct' includes speech (s 7(4)). The harassment must occur on more than one occasion (s 7(3)) and a defence of reasonableness is available (s 1(1)(c)).[274]

Use of the PHA against press intrusion

Since the remedies provided by the Act are statutory, s 3 of the HRA applies. The PHA is not dependent on acquiring or attempting to acquire information, but it might be applicable where individual reporters had pursued a particular individual on a number of occasions. The possibility that the Act could be used in respect of the invasion of privacy that occurs when a person – often a journalist – is seeking to obtain information about an individual by, for example, watching the home, interviewing neighbours, or planting bugging devices arises since such activities fall within Art 8. Thus, if there was any doubt in the matter, the term 'harassment' could be interpreted to cover such activities. Section 6 HRA applies to the application of the Act in particular instances.

Use of the PHA in respect of publication of information causing distress

It may be argued that s 3 of the PHA could also be used in respect of the publication of information. Bearing in mind the obligation of a court to interpret the PHA compatibly with Art 8 under the HRA, it could be argued that if on more than one occasion an article was published in a newspaper which caused profound distress to its subject due to its publication of private facts creating the indirect possibility of harassment or injury from members of the public who had read it, an injunction or damages could be obtained under s 3. An argument similar to this one was used successfully against the Sun newspaper in 2001.[275] The Sun had published an article and, on a further occasion, readers' letters, attacking a black woman who was a civilian employee in a London police station. She had reported a racist incident relating to an asylum seeker, with the result that two police officers were disciplined. The Sun, in an article attacking 'political correctness gone mad' and omitting a number of key facts (including the fact that a white police officer had also reported the racist incident), identified her and the police station where she worked and invited readers to express their views as to her conduct. A number did so, in very hostile terms. She received hate mail and was also very distressed by the items; since she worked on the front desk she felt very vulnerable to attack from members of the public. She left her job as a consequence. Damages were awarded against the Sun under s 3 of the 1997 Act and the decision was affirmed on appeal.

This was an interesting and entirely novel use of s 3 of the 1997 Act; it suggests that the judiciary are determined to find a remedy for the plaintiff who has suffered a gross breach of the right to respect for privacy under Art 8 even where no obvious remedy for the particular breach in question is available, and despite the effect of s 12 of the HRA. However, had there been one item of publication only – in which identifying as well as distressing details were given – it is doubtful whether the 1997 Act could have been used, unless a particular article could be viewed as, say, being in two parts. This decision emphasises the need for specific remedies for invasion of privacy by the publication of identifying and distressing details. It is not clear that the new tort of misuse of private information discussed above, would cover all the circumstances in which publication of information might lead to harassment or threats. In this instance, for example, it was not self-evident that the information as to the location of the police station could be viewed as private.

274 See further Chapter 8, pp 796–97.

275 Thomas (Esther) v News Group Newspapers (2001) WL 753464; judgment of 18 July 2001.

A similar example would arise where a tabloid newspaper published a story in sensationalist terms about a person who had been acquitted of a serious offence, or about a person bringing an action for race discrimination, identifying the individual involved and/or their place of work. He or she might suffer distress due to the articles themselves and also severe harassment from neighbours and others, which might make it impossible to avoid abandoning their home. It is arguable that a remedy should be available in such a situation, although it would have to be balanced against the right to freedom of expression of the newspaper, since s 12 of the HRA would be applicable and Art 10 would in any event be relevant, due to the effect of s 3 HRA. The defence of reasonableness could be used as the mechanism for recognising the value of freedom of expression. Alternatively, it could merely be argued that in applying the statutory provisions, the duty of the court under s 6 HRA demanded that it should examine the effect of affording the remedy in Art 10 terms.

Similar offences

Similar arguments could also be used in respect of the offences created under the 1997 Act and of the similar offences created under the Public Order Act 1986,[276] s 1 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 and s 41 of the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001, all of which were discussed in Chapter 8,[277] although, of course, the police would have to take the initiative. All, except s 41 of the 2001 Act, contain similar defences which would allow for recognition to be given to freedom of expression under s 3 of the HRA, although s 12 of the HRA would not be applicable since the proceedings would be criminal. The court in applying the PHA is bound to adhere to both Arts 8 and 10. Methods of balancing expression and privacy rights are considered below.

Conclusions

The discussion below of the balancing act between Arts 8 and 10 could be used under the PHA when its provisions are deployed against journalists, assuming that Art 8 covers 276 See the use of the 1986 Act, s 5, in Vigon v DPP [1998] Crim LR 298; (1998) 162 JP 115. (The defendant had positioned a video camera in the changing room attached to his market stall, in which women were changing into swimming costumes. He was charged with the offence under s 5 since it was found that the switching on and use of the camera had caused the women harassment, alarm and distress, and his behaviour was insulting to them.) However, the requirement of immediacy which has been found to apply to s 4 of the 1986 Act and which therefore probably also applies to ss 5 and 4A may preclude the use of these provisions in the circumstances envisaged (see R v Horseferry Road Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate ex p Siadatan [1991] 1 All ER 324). See further Chapter 8, pp 781–87, esp 786.

277 See pp 780–97.

journalistic harassment. The PHA may not be an appropriate means of curbing press intrusion, partly because it depends on a course of conduct and so would arguably not capture a very intrusive activity occurring on one occasion only. Also it contains no obvious mechanism protecting freedom of expression. It would therefore be more desirable to enact certain very specific and narrowly defined areas of liability, relating to particularly intrusive invasions of privacy, including harassment. However, there seems to be no prospect of this at present. So the PHA remains the key mechanism that can fill the gaps left by the new privacy liability.

Defamation and malicious falsehood

The law of defamation offers some protection to an individual who has suffered from the unauthorised disclosure of private matters, but the interest protected by defamation – the interest of the individual in preserving his or her reputation – is far from coterminous with the interest in preserving privacy. A reputation may not suffer, but the fact that personal information is spread abroad may nevertheless be hurtful in itself for the individual affected. Thus, no remedy was available in Corelli v Wall[278] which arose from publication by the defendants, without the plaintiff's permission, of postcards depicting imaginary events in her life. Such publication was not found to be libellous, and no remedy lay in copyright as the copyright was in the creator of the cards.

The ruling in Kaye v Robertson and Another[279] made clear the inadequacy of defamation as a remedy for invasions of privacy. Mr Kaye, a well-known actor, was involved in a car accident and suffered severe head injuries. While he was lying in hospital two journalists from the Sunday Sport, acting on Mr Robertson's orders, got into his room, photographed him and interviewed him. Owing to his injuries, he did not object to their presence and shortly after the incident had no recollection of it. The resultant article gave the impression that Mr Kaye had consented to the interview. His advisers sought and obtained an injunction restraining the defendants from publishing the photographs and the interview. On appeal by the defendants the Court of Appeal ruled that the plaintiff's claim could not be based on a right to privacy as such a right is unknown to English law. His true grievance lay in the 'monstrous invasion of privacy' which he had suffered but he would have to look to other rights of action in order to obtain a remedy, namely libel and malicious falsehood. The basis of the defamation claim was that the article's implication that Mr Kaye had consented to a first 'exclusive' interview for a 'lurid and sensational' newspaper such as the Sunday Sport would lower him in the esteem of right thinking people. The Court of Appeal held that this claim might well succeed, but that as such a conclusion was not inevitable it could not warrant grant of an interim injunction, basing this ruling on Herbage v Times Newspapers and Others.[280]

278 (1906) 22 TLR 532 (Ch).

279 [1991] FSR 62; (1991) The Times, 21 March; for comment, see Prescott, P, 'Kaye v Robertson: a reply' (1991) 54 MLR 451; Bedingfield, D, 'Privacy or publicity: the enduring confusion surrounding the American tort of invasion of privacy' (1992) 55 MLR 111; Markesinis, BS, 'The Calcutt Report must not be forgotten' (1992) 55 MLR 118.

280 (1981) The Times, 1 May.

The court then considered malicious falsehood. First, it had to be shown that the defendant had published about the plaintiff words which were false. Their Lordships considered that any reasonable jury would find that the implication contained in the words of the article was false. As the case was, on that basis, clear cut, an interim injunction could in principle be granted. Secondly, it had to be shown that the words were published maliciously. Malice would be inferred if it was proved that the words were calculated to produce damage and that the defendant knew them to be false. The reporters clearly realised that Mr Kaye was unable to give them any informed consent. Any subsequent publication of the falsehood would therefore be malicious. Thirdly, damage must have followed as a direct result of the publication of the falsehood. The words had produced damage in that they had diminished the value of Mr Kaye's right to sell the story of his accident at some later date. That ground of action was therefore made out.

Therefore, an injunction restraining the defendants until trial from publishing anything which suggested that the plaintiff had given an informed consent to the interview or the taking of the photographs was substituted for the original order. However, this was a limited injunction which allowed publication of the story with certain of the photographs, provided that it was not claimed that the plaintiff had given consent. Thus, it seemed that no effective remedy was available for the plaintiff. Legatt LJ concluded his ruling by saying: 'We do not need a First Amendment to preserve the freedom of the Press, but the abuse of that freedom can be ensured only by the enforcement of a right to privacy.'[281] Kaye was a very telling decision: it is possible that had breach of confidence been argued in that instance it could have succeeded; but the case highlighted the need for the judges to develop a privacy remedy, if Parliament continued to refuse to do so. Confidence was not argued in Kaye because at the time it was not readily apparent that it covered situations in which there was no prior confidential relationship.

Trespass

It was suggested over 15 years ago[282] that there are sufficient remedies in the common law of trespass to cover at least the kind of situation which arose in Kaye v Robertson.[283] The physical intrusion into the hospital involved trespass on to property (because the reporters, given their purpose, could have no implied licence to be there). Kaye obviously could not have brought an action on his own account as his property had not been trespassed upon, but the solution would have been to join the hospital as co-plaintiff in the action. Once trespass had been established, the court could exercise its equitable jurisdiction to grant an injunction to prevent the defendants from profiting from their own wrong by publishing the material obtained by the trespass for gain. The case of Chappell and Co Ltd v Columbia Gramophone Co[284] was cited as support for this course of action. In that case, the defendants had wrongfully used the plaintiff's sheet music to make gramophone records. Although the making of the records themselves was not a violation of the plaintiff's legal rights, the court ordered their destruction on the grounds that the defendants should not be allowed to 'reap all the proceeds of their 281 [1991] FSR 621, p 104.

282 Prescott, P, 'Kaye v Robertson: a reply' (1991) 54 MLR 451.
283 [1991] FSR 62.
284 [1914] 2 Ch 745, pp 752, 754, 756, CA.

wrongdoing'. However, it is clear that there is no guarantee that possible co-plaintiffs (such as hotel owners) would agree to join in such actions.

Thus, the remedy available even in a case of physical intrusion onto private land would not be certain. Further, an action in trespass would be of limited application in relation to the interviewing of disaster or accident victims and their relatives generally: a person might be interviewed at or near the scene of a disaster in a public place or in a semi-private place, such as a shopping mall, which reporters could be viewed as having an implied licence to enter. Where, in such instances, victims of a disaster did not consent to be interviewed, it would not appear that interviewing them could found a cause of action in trespass. Further, it should be noted that if detailed information regarding Mr Kaye's condition had been obtained without physically entering the hospital – by photographing him with a long range lens or perhaps by interviewing him over the telephone – an action in trespass, as the cause of action is currently conceived, would not be possible. Specific remedies for invasion of privacy are clearly more appropriate, subject to a broad public interest defence.

However, although it is clear that in the HRA era the doctrine of confidence has developed into a privacy remedy, and that therefore there is no longer a need to look to trespass to provide such a remedy, it is possible that eventually trespass will also show some development, under the impetus of the HRA. The findings in Campbell[285] and in Douglas and Others v Hello!,[286] considered below, as to the effect of the Act on the common law, would be equally applicable to trespass. As discussed above, a judge has a duty, under s 6 HRA and – where freedom of expression is in issue – s 12, to ensure that the common law reflects the Convention rights. In a case similar to that of Kaye, freedom of expression would be in issue and therefore, if a judge was faced with a plaintiff who was seeking to bring an action in trespass rather than in confidence, it is arguable that she should adapt the doctrine of trespass in order to provide a remedy for the invasion of privacy. This could arise where breach of confidence was inapplicable since the complaint concerned the method used to obtain the information, not the threatened disclosure of the information. It is now clear that trespass will not be developed under the HRA to provide a remedy in relation to the processing and publication of information, but possibly it could develop in respect of the invasion of privacy which occurs due to an intrusion which is not a physical intrusion on property – for example, watching the home, using a long range lens to take photographs of persons on private property, etc.

Conclusions

As indicated above, the proposals for new forms of liability for invasion of privacy were eventually abandoned. Obviously, there is now less need to create a new tort, since the doctrine of confidence has taken over the role such a tort would have had, in relation to the misuse of person information. Nevertheless, the development of the doctrine to cover the requirements of Art 8 of the Convention under the HRA 1998 may eventually prompt Parliament to introduce a new tort since they highlight areas covered by Art 8 but not by the new formulation of the doctrine.

285 [2004] 2 WLR 1232.
286 [2001] 2 WLR 992.

6 Liability for disclosing personal information under the new privacy doctrine

Introduction

The following discussion traces the creation for the first time in UK law of common law liability for invasion of privacy by the unauthorised disclosure of personal information. Of all the areas of law covered by this book, this one has undergone the most dramatic transformation under the impetus of the HRA. The discussion documents the incremental transformation of the doctrine of confidence into a privacy remedy.[287]

It covers liability for publishing personal information outside reliance on s 7(1)(a) of the HRA. In other words, it covers a remedy for invasion of privacy that can be utilised against private and public bodies. The previous section demonstrated why other tortious remedies proved inadequate to protect personal information, leading the courts to develop the doctrine of breach of confidence, under the impetus of the HRA, into a new 'law of privacy'. The doctrine of confidence has now established itself as a cause of action able to protect personal information from disclosure in most circumstances. It is coming to be termed a 'privacy law' – more specifically, a tort of misuse of private information – with increasing frequency.[288]

The general thesis of this discussion is that the doctrine of confidence has now shown that it can afford far more protection in this area than was previously thought,[289] but that an enormous amount of judicial labour has been and still is required to flesh out and give definition to the current action in order to give it a clear legal profile. It will be argued that any law protecting a person from unwanted publication of personal information must inevitably become 'a legal porcupine, which bristles with difficulties',[290] but that workable and principled solutions to the problems associated with the legal right to respect for privacy under Art 8 are being developed. In particular, it will be strongly contended that the perception of conflict between speech and privacy is often exaggerated and simplistic, and indeed that an examination of the values underlying each reveals them to be in many respects mutually supportive, rather than invariably antagonistic. In conclusion, it will be contended that the goals in view in developing a privacy law – the protection of human dignity and autonomy, the movement away from the demeaning and debasing pursuit of certain figures and the destruction of their privacy in order to sell newspapers, the consequent enhancement of the speech of the press and enrichment of our cultural life – are proving sufficient to encourage the judiciary to grasp at the possibilities which the HRA offers to develop a privacy law.

287 This section draws on parts of Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, 'The Doctrine of Confidence as a Privacy Remedy in the Human Rights Act Era' [2000] 63(5) MLR 660–93.

288 See the comments in McKennitt v Ash [2006] EWCA Civ 1714, below, p 913.

289 The possibilities available under the doctrine were apparent pre-HRA: see the comments of Laws J in Hellewell v Chief Constable of Derbyshire [1995] 1 WLR 804, p 805 and the findings of the European Commission on Human Rights in Spencer (Earl) v United Kingdom (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105, discussed below. See also the post-HRA comments in Douglas and Others v Hello! [2001] 2 WLR 992, discussed below.

290 The phrase is borrowed from dicta in an administrative law case: Inner London Education Authority ex p Westminster CC [1986] 1 WLR 28.

Traditionally, the common law doctrine of breach of confidence protected some confidential communications,[291] and the breadth of the doctrine had for some time supported the view that it could provide a general means of protecting personal information, although this area of law had developed largely as a means of protecting commercial secrets. The Younger Committee, which was convened to report on privacy,[292] considered that confidence was the area of the law which offered the most effective protection for the privacy of personal information. For a time, however, less emphasis was placed on the ability of the doctrine to protect privacy in the discussions of both privacy and confidence which occurred following the Kaye case.[293]

The House of Lords in AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2)[294] found that the ruling in Coco v AN Clark (Engineers) Ltd[295] conveniently summarised the three traditionally accepted key elements of the law of confidence: 'First the information itself . . . must have the necessary quality of confidence about it. Secondly, that information must have been imparted in circumstances importing an obligation of confidence. Thirdly, there must be an unauthorised use of that information to the detriment of the party communicating it.' Even if these elements were made out, publication of the information was still possible if the defence of public interest applied.

To satisfy the requirements of the first element, information must, it seemed, not be in the public domain and must not be trivial. The third element, unauthorised use of information, was fairly self-explanatory; as to detriment, it appeared from the cases either that unwanted revelation of private facts per se might constitute detriment for the purposes of the law of confidence,[296] or, alternatively, that detriment might not always be necessary.[297] However, it is in the second element – the circumstances in which the courts will find an obligation of confidence to have been imposed – that the most radical development has occurred. Under the traditional model of confidence, one of two ingredients had to be satisfied for such an obligation to arise. The first was that, at least in cases involving personal, as opposed to commercial information, there had to be some identifiable pre-existing intimate or necessarily confidential relationship between confider and confidant, such as a professional relationship of trust,[298] or marriage,[299] from which the obligation of confidence could be inferred, in the absence of an express agreement on the matter.

291 See generally Dworkin, G, Confidence in the Law, 1971, University of Southampton; Gurry, F, Breach of Confidence, 1991; Jones, G (1970) 86 LQR 463.

292 See Report of the Committee on Privacy, Cmnd 5012, 1972.

293 See the Calcutt Committee on Privacy and Related Matters (Cmnd 1102, 1990, para 32) and Wacks, op. cit., fn 1, p 56); compare the earlier view of the Younger Committee (Report of the Committee on Privacy, Cmnd 5012, 1972, p 26).

294 [1990] 1 AC 109.

295 [1969] RPC 41, p 47.

296 AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109, p 265, per Lord Keith.

297 Ibid Lord Goff explicitly left the point open (ibid, pp 281–82), while Lord Griffiths (ibid, p 270) thought that it was required. The remainder of the House did not address the point. In X v Y ([1988] 2 All ER 650, pp 651 and 657) it was held per curiam that actual or possible detriment to the plaintiff was 'not a necessary precondition to injunctive relief' ([1988] 2 All ER 650, pp 651 and 657). In the recent S*ource Informatics* case [2000] 2 WLR 953, the Court of Appeal did not attempt to resolve the matter, but appeared to favour Lord Keith's view.

298 See, e.g., W v Egdell [1990] Ch 359 (doctor-patient); X v Y (ibid); AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109 (both employer-employee).

299 As in Duchess of Argyll v Duke of Argyll [1967] 1 Ch 302.

As discussed above, the courts have now accepted in this context that their duty under s 6 HRA means that they should develop the common law to reflect the Convention rights, including the right to respect for private life under Art 8. The discussion shows that each element of the traditional doctrine of confidence has undergone a remarkable change, allowing it to become a workable remedy for the unauthorised disclosure of personal information. The landmark decision was that of the House of Lords in Campbell v MGN.[300] While the new privacy law can now provide protection from the invasion of privacy that occurs when personal information is published, causing distress, it cannot directly protect persons from invasions of privacy – such as persistent telephoning or the planting of bugs – created by information-seekers. Section 8 below considers the means of balancing the new privacy remedy against speech.

The discussion below proceeds on the basis that there are now three main steps in a privacy claim: (1) the first question is whether the threshold test of a reasonable expectation of privacy has been passed on the basis that private information is involved; this includes considering whether the information should escape protection as being banal, trivial or anodyne; (2) it should be asked whether the 'limiting factor' that the information is in the public domain should be applied; (3) it should be asked whether publication of the information is in the public interest as part of the speech/privacy balancing act. These tests are drawn from Campbell v MGN, McKennit v Ash[301] and HRH Prince of Wales v MGN Newspapers Limited and Others.[302] The latter test is now best considered as part of the balancing act between Arts 10 and 8. However, it is still relevant in traditional confidence cases, so it will be considered below.

These three steps will be considered in turn. However, it must be remembered, not only that the privacy action has grown out of the confidence doctrine, but that the confidence doctrine is still relevant in non-privacy cases – and may also be pleaded within them as an alternative possibility. The fact that a traditional confidence claim would have succeeded is no longer an essential element of the new doctrine but, as discussed below, it will weigh heavily in the balance in favour of the privacy claim when it is balanced against the competing speech interest.

Confidence is also relevant in commercial cases, which are not the concern of this book, and in state cases, in which the government asserts a breach of confidence claim in respect of a leak or other use of government information, as in the well-known Spycatcher case, discussed in Chapter 7. So in order to trace the steps by which the privacy action has arisen from the confidence doctrine, while examining both the scope of the new privacy action and the nature of confidence claims, the discussion will begin by considering the transformation of the test for 'confidential' information into a test for 'private' information. If there is a reasonable expectation of privacy, the information can be viewed as private. This is not necessarily self-evident – the use of the term 'reasonable' precludes claims in which the claimant happened to be unusually sensitive about trivial or anodyne information relating to him. The discussion will move on to consider the question of the 'public domain' which is relevant in both confidence and 300 [2004] 2 WLR 1232. For further comment see: Lindsay, D, 'Naomi Campbell in the House of Lords: Implications for Australia' (2004) 11 Privacy Law & Policy Reporter 4–11; Morgan, J, 'Privacy in the House of Lords – Again' (2004) 120 LQR 563–66.

301 [2006] EWCA Civ 1714.

302 [2006] EWCA Civ 1776, [2006] All ER (D) 335.

privacy actions. It will then examine a test that is no longer needed in privacy actions – that of imposing an obligation of confidentiality. Indeed, the discarding of this test was the crucial step in the transformation of confidence into a privacy action. But it is still relevant in old-style confidence actions, and in any event an explanation of the steps by which it was discarded is crucial to an understanding of the method by which the present position has been reached. After a brief consideration of the 'public interest' test, the discussion concludes by returning to the key theme of discarding limiting factors that were aspects of the doctrine of confidence. The discarding of the so-called defence of waiver and the need to demonstrate detriment arising from the breach of confidence, have also aided in the transformation of the doctrine into a privacy remedy.

What is 'private' information?

What 'information' is protected under the new privacy law? The key factor is that the information is accounted private. In order to engage Art 8 at all, information must be viewed as private and, if already in the public domain, must be capable of causing further harm in terms of privacy-invasion by being re-publicised.[303] Therefore, the discussion below will begin by considering what constitutes personal information, and then go on to ask when it can be said to be in the public domain, two separate but linked issues. Since until recently most of the case law concerned commercial information,[304] the courts pre-HRA had not evolved any workable tests to decide what kinds of personal information should be protected, save for the requirement that the information must not be 'in the public domain' – a negative requirement considered below – and that it must not be mere trivial tittle-tattle. The traditional view was that equity would not intervene to protect trivial information.

Initially it appeared that the possibly inadequate scope of the confidence action in this area created a further potential problem. Confidence requires unauthorised use of personal 'information',[305] like many privacy torts which take as the root of the complaint the publication of 'private facts'.[306] On its face, therefore, it did not appear to encompass situations where there had clearly been some invasion of privacy, assessed intuitively, but where it was difficult to conceptualise what had occurred as concerning 'information'. An example would be a broadcast showing mourners at a funeral in acute emotional anguish.[307] The root of the complaint in such situations, it is suggested, is not that the 'fact' that a person is weeping, or that details of their appearance in mourning have been disclosed, but rather of mass intrusion through unwanted attention into a highly 303 See Mills v News Group Newspapers (2001) WL 720, below, p 889, on this point.

304 In such cases, the issue of whether the information is 'confidential' may be readily resolved by reference to its potential or actual commercial value.

305 See the definition in Coco [1969] RPC 41.

306 Privacy torts in the United states and New Zealand require the disclosure of identifiable private facts. A number of Canadian cases have also stressed this requirement, although it is not required by the strict words of the relevant section of the Canadian Charter: see Paton-Simpson, E, 'Private circles and public squares: invasion of privacy by the publication of "private facts"' (1998) 61 MLR 318.

307 Ibid, p 337.

personal situation.[308] Moreover, a requirement of identifiable 'information' could find it difficult to accommodate the importance of anonymity and context. For example, some people may be happy to appear on a public beach nude or topless when surrounded by others doing likewise, because in this situation their nudity becomes unremarkable and therefore un-remarked upon. If, however, a photograph is taken and given mass publicity through the pages of a newspaper or magazine, feelings of intrusion and violation justifiably arise.[309] The difficulty is that it might seem problematic to define such situations as involving protected information: the mere 'fact' that a person is weeping at a funeral seems too innocuous to count as 'personal information', while the normally private nature of the appearance of someone's unclothed body might appear to be lost by the voluntary public exposure of it on a beach.

Such an approach would have been, however, simplistic. Wacks has made the important point that 'any definition of "personal information" must . . . refer both to the quality of the information and to the reasonable expectation of the individual concerning its use'.[310] In other words, one cannot assess whether information is 'personal' or not, without looking at the use which the defendant has made or proposes to make of it. It now appears that the doctrine of confidence can accommodate such delicate assessments, as discussed below. It should be recalled that the doctrine protects against unauthorised use of information and so is capable of singling out particular actions of defendants as giving rise to liability. Moreover, there was never any reason why the 'reasonable man' test employed at one point to decide whether an obligation of confidentiality should be imposed, could not be pressed into service to determine what was to count as protected information in the first place. A reasonable man might be expected to understand that the activities of mourners at a funeral, or nude sunbathers on a beach, could be seen as personal in so far as such people reasonably expected that their behaviour would not be subject to unwanted mass attention. Thus, contrary to the doubts expressed on this point,[311] it is suggested that a duty of confidentiality was always able to attach in respect of particular uses of information, such as mass publicity.

It should be pointed out that the question whether information is personal can either pre-date the 'public domain' inquiry, considered below, or can be indistinguishable from it. Thus, it may be necessary to consider whether information remains viewed personal when it relates to an event occurring in a public environment. Von Hannover suggests that it can still retain that quality. If it is determined that it can be viewed as personal, a court can go on to consider whether nevertheless it has been disseminated to such an extent that it has lost the personal quality that it otherwise would have had.

308 For the argument that such matters should be included within the definition of privacy, see Gavison, R, 'Privacy and the limits of law' (1980) 89(3) Yale LJ 421; Paton-Simpson, ibid, pp 337–38; Reinman, J, 'Driving to the Panopticon: a philosophical exploration of the risks to privacy posed by the highway technology of the future' (1995) 11 Computer & High Tech LJ 27, p 30. For a contrary view, see Parent, op. cit., p 805, fn 21, above, at pp 306–7.

309 This example is used because of the propensity of press photographers to take photographs of celebrities in such situations.

310 Wacks, Personal Information: Privacy and the Law, 1980, p 24.

311 Wacks, op. cit., fn 1, p 56.

It appeared from Stephens v Avery[312] and Michael Barrymore[313] that information relating to an individual's sexual life would merit protection,[314] a decision clearly in harmony with the approach of Strasbourg[315] and the DPA 1998.[316] The US 'private facts' tort requires that 'the matter made public must be one which would be offensive and objectionable to a reasonable man of ordinary sensibilities'.[317] However, if, as has been argued, protection for informational autonomy provides the theoretical underpinning of the action to protect privacy, objective notions of offensiveness should not be the essential issue, since it is a person's ability to apply their own standards of openness which should – within limits – be protected.[318]

Well before the HRA era there were signs that the categories of information capable of being accounted sufficiently substantial were widening: information concerning an individual's sexual orientation (Stephens v Avery)[319] and physical appearance (HRH Princess of Wales) has been found to merit protection. Post-HRA in the 2005 decision in Douglas v Hello![320] the Court of Appeal found:

> It seems to us that information will be confidential if it is available to one person (or a group of persons) and not generally available to others, provided that the person (or group) who possess the information does not intend that it shall become available to others.

Dealing at paragraph 83 of the same case with the issue of privacy, the Court said:

> What is the nature of 'private information'? It seems to us that it must include information that is personal to the person who possesses it and that he does not intend shall be imparted to the general public. The nature of the information, or the form in which it is kept, may suffice to make it plain that the information satisfies these criteria.

312 [1988] Ch 449.

313 [1997] FSR 600.

314 The decision in HRH Princess of Wales Transcript, Association of Official Shorthandwriters Limited, 8 November 1993 (which concerned photographs taken of the Princess exercising while wearing a leotard) gave some weak prima facie evidence that information regarding physical appearance may attract protection in some circumstances.

315 See Lustig-Prean v UK (1999) 29 EHRR 548; discussed in Chapter 15, pp 1520–21.

316 As indicated below, p 928, such information is classified as 'sensitive personal data' along with matters such as a person's religious and political opinions, and his physical and mental health (s 2). The processing of 'sensitive personal data' attracts a higher level of safeguards than normal data under Data Protection Principle 1(b) (Sched 1) as elucidated by Sched 3.

317 Prosser, D, 'Privacy' (1960) 48 Calif L Rev 383, p 396. The tort grew out of the Warren and Brandeis article ('The right to privacy' (1890) IV(5) Harvard L Rev 193, p 196). The Restatement (Second) of the Law of Torts, 625D defines the tort as follows: 'One who gives publicity to a matter concerning the private life of another is subject to liability to the other for invasion of his privacy, if the matter publicised is of a kind that (a) would be highly offensive to a reasonable person and (b) is not of legitimate concern to the public.'

318 See above, pp 805–6.

319 [1988] Ch 449.

320 (No 3) [2005] EWCA Civ; [2006] QB 125, at para 55.

Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead in Campbell v MGN Ltd found:[321] 'Essentially the touchstone of private life is whether in respect of the disclosed facts the person in question had a reasonable expectation of privacy'. Lord Hope of Craighead advanced a similar test:[322] '. . . a duty of confidence will arise whenever the party subject to the duty is in a situation where he knows or ought to know that the other person can reasonably expect his privacy to be protected'. He further said:[323] 'The underlying question in all cases where it is alleged that there has been a breach of the duty of confidence is whether the information that was disclosed was private and not public.'[324] His Lordship also referred to 'the right to privacy, which lies at the heart of the breach of confidence action'.[325] Lady Hale advanced the same test[326] and Lord Carswell endorsed this.[327] These tests were approved of by Lord Phillips in the Court of Appeal in HRH Prince of Wales v Associated Newspapers Ltd.[328]

In Douglas v Hello!,[329] the court accepted that the basis of the action is now the notion of a 'reasonable expectation of privacy',[330] and its purpose is the protection of 'the individual's informational autonomy'.[331] The Court summed up its view of the development of this area of law:

> Megarry J in Coco v A N Clark identified two requirements for the creation of a duty of confidence. The first was that the information should be confidential in nature and the second was that it should have been imparted in circumstances importing a duty of confidence. As we have seen, it is now recognised that the second requirement is not necessary if it is plain that the information is confidential, and for the adjective 'confidential' one can substitute the word 'private'.[332]

The Court went on to find that:

> . . . the House of Lords in Campbell . . . agreed . . . that the knowledge, actual or imputed, that information is private will normally impose on anyone publishing that information the duty to justify what, in the absence of justification, will be a wrongful invasion of privacy.[333]

So all that is needed is that the information is obviously private. That appears to cover all sorts of obviously private activities such as medical treatment (Campbell); it also

321 At para 21.
322 At para 85.
323 Ibid para 88.
324 Ibid para 92.
325 Ibid para 105.
326 At para 34.
327 At para 165.
328 [2006] EWCA Civ 1776, [2006] All ER (D) 335.
329 [2005] EWCA Civ 595 (Court of Appeal judgment on appeal from final trial); hereafter Douglas III.
330 Douglas III [2005] EWCA Civ 595 at para 80.
331 Ibid para 81.
332 Ibid para 83.
333 Ibid para 82.

covers private functions such as weddings (Douglas), and, according to Von Hannover, daily life activities that happen to be carried out in public. Von Hannover has received recent endorsement in the Court of Appeal in McKennit v Ash;[334] it was found that in considering an action to prevent the publication of confidential material and looking to Arts 8 and 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights, the Court was not prevented by Court of Appeal authority to contrary effect from applying the later case of Von Hannover in the European Court of Human Rights.

The first question, it was said in a complaint of wrongful publication of private information, was to ask whether the information was private in the sense that it was in principle protected by Art 8. In considering this issue, it was found that the first instance judge[335] had been entitled to consider Von Hannover v Germany[336] when considering whether Art 8 was engaged. The defendants had submitted that the court was bound to follow A v B plc[337] by the rule of precedent in Kay v Lambeth London Borough Council.[338] Having found that the width of the rights given to the media by A v B could not be reconciled with Von Hannover, Buxton LJ rejected the submission: the court in A v B had not ruled definitively on the content and application of Art 10; and thus, where A v B was not binding on the content of Arts 8 and 10, the court, it was found, had to look for that content to Von Hannover. The terms of Von Hannover were very far away from the automatic limits placed on the privacy rights of public figures by A v B; and, applying the correct considerations, including regard to Von Hannover, no error of law was disclosed. Buxton LJ concluded by stating that in an action for misuse of private information the first question to be asked is: 'is the information private in the sense that it is in principle protected by Article 8?'[339] That is now the test for determining whether information can receive protection or not.

The form of the information can be relevant in two respects. The form in which the plaintiff recorded the information may enhance the privacy claim – making it clearer that the information should be viewed as private.[340] It is more invidious in privacy terms to breach the privacy of, for example, a private diary or an obviously confidential document, expressly marked confidential. Both factors were relevant in the Prince of Wales case.

The form in which the defendant recorded the information may be relevant – text, still photographs, video footage. A number of decisions suggest that the courts pre-HRA had for some time been adopting a flexible approach to the form of the information.[341] In HRH Princess of Wales, Drake J had no hesitation in granting interim injunctions to prevent the Daily Mirror and others from publishing photographs of the Princess exercising in a gymnasium, taken by the gymnasium owner without her knowledge or

334 [2006] EWCA Civ 1714. First instance: [2005] EWHC 3003; [2006] EMLR 10.

335 Eady J sitting in private in the Queen's Bench Division ([2005] EWHC 3003 (QB)).

336 (2005) 40 EHRR 1.

337 [2003] QB 195.

338 [2006] 2 AC 465.

339 At para 11.

340 In the Prince of Wales case the Court of Appeal said at para 36: 'we consider that its form and content would clearly have constituted it private information entitled to the protection of Article 8(1) as qualified by Article 8(2)'.

341 See Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, 'Confidence and privacy: a re-examination' (1996) 55 CLJ 447, pp 449–50.

consent. The plaintiff's case was based both on breach of contract and on confidence, but Drake J appeared to take the view that although the contractual claim was more clearly made out, either limb of the claim would have justified the injunction.[342] Similarly, in Shelley Films Ltd v Rex Features Ltd[343] the defendant was restrained by injunction from publishing photographs, which had been taken without permission on the set of the film Frankenstein.

The possibility that the taking of photographs can amount to the acquiring of confidential information was also expressly accepted by Laws J in Hellewell v Chief Constable of Derbyshire.[344] These three decisions go further, it is suggested, than simply affirming that photographs can carry information for the purposes of the law of confidence.[345] A photograph is merely a record and as such may be treated as any other means of recording information. However, in these instances, the 'information' had not been captured and contained in any particular form until the defendant brought that about. It would seem to follow that had the gymnasium owner in the HRH Princess of Wales case merely observed Princess Diana's appearance in the gymnasium without recording it, he would have been in possession of 'information', and an interim injunction to restrain publication of the observations would have been available. At that time it appeared, it is submitted, that a record in any form of any matter of substance not already in the public domain could amount to confidential information for the purposes of the doctrine of confidence. In general it is suggested that the form in which the information was captured or received for its later dissemination was becoming no longer a relevant factor.

As privacy values became dominant, the form in which the information was captured became no longer a focus of attention, except in the sense that it could enhance the privacy claim. In Campbell, Von Hannover and Peck photographs were in issue. If an eye-witness had seen Peck walking down the street and had later sent a detailed account to the press that would not, it is suggested, have affected the privacy analysis in that instance, due to the nature of the information at issue. But in terms of privacy-invasion photographs do represent a very effective way of conveying minute details, including facial expressions, in a way that cannot be replicated by reporting. So photographs appear to represent a particularly pernicious form of privacy-invasion. The fact that photographs have been taken may give weight to the argument that the invasion of privacy at stake should be accounted serious enough to allow prima facie for the grant of relief. Arguably, this factor could also be taken into account at the stage of conducting the balancing act between Arts 8 and 10, below. However, the distinction between the private information inquiry and the balancing act should not be blurred: this is currently becoming a doctrinal problem which is returned to in the discussion below.[346]

The new action thus covers information that is clearly private in character, and the Art 8 jurisprudence should be taken into account in order to determine whether information should be viewed as private or not. While the basis of the action is a reasonable expectation of privacy, that may not create a clear test to be used to determine

342 Ibid, pp 4–5.
343 [1994] EMLR 134.
344 [1995] 1 WLR 804, p 807.
345 As earlier indicated by Pollard v Photographic Company (1888) Ch 345.
346 See pp 967–81.

whether specific items of information should be viewed as private or not, since in particular circumstances the claimant – such as Princess Caroline – may have little expectation of privacy, although the information is private in the sense that it relates to her personal life. This test encapsulates the crucial distinction between breach of privacy and defamation, since the latter action is concerned with untruthful matter. The word 'private' is used in order to seek to make a distinction between information which a person wishes to keep secret because it is personal or intimate to her, and information (such as the fact that she had lied to Parliament) which raises no privacy issues, but which she wishes to conceal because it would hurt her reputation.

But the invasion of privacy must be viewed as serious. The facts that photos were taken surreptitiously and deliberately, and that it was clear that the person in question would not have consented to their being taken, are relevant factors informing the inquiry as to whether the information should be adjudged private; they might arguably also re-enter the equation at the stage of considering the balancing act. In relation to the question whether it was obvious that the person in question would not have consented to the taking of the pictures, prior contacts with the newspaper or with the PCC, asking for privacy to be respected by reporters and editors, could be taken into account, as could prior PCC adjudications.

Admittedly, there will be borderline cases in which it will not be possible to determine whether information can be said to relate to a person's private or public life. In that case, the information could be viewed as private and the question of its public nature would be relevant in determining the public interest in disclosure – in other words, at the stage of balancing speech and privacy rights. This test provides much more satisfactory protection than is provided by the US private facts tort in covering those cases where the matter disclosed, although not ordinarily considered 'offensive', is of great import to the individual concerned. In the well known case of Sidis v F-R Publishing Corporation[347] the New York Times revealed the identify and history of a former mathematical genius, who had given up his research and retired into obscurity. The article had a devastating effect on Sidis, but despite the court's finding that the article was 'merciless in its dissection of intimate details of the subject's personal life',[348] his action for breach of privacy failed on the basis that nothing was revealed which would have been offensive to the reasonable man.

The Von Hannover and Peck approach goes some way to resolving a possible objection to the use of confidence in privacy cases, namely the fear that precisely because the action – unlike the American privacy torts[349] – does not require wide publicity, but only 'unauthorised use' of information, it could in principle catch mere gossip between friends and neighbours. It has been argued that the intervention of the blunt tool of the law into the delicate area of social life and friendship which this would entail would both create intolerable legal uncertainty and also wrongly introduce the possibility of legal sanctions into an area which depends upon the unenforceable trust of one who confides for its moral integrity.[350] One solution to this problem would be to adapt the 347 113 F 2d 806 (2d Cir 1940).

348 Ibid, p 807.

349 This applies to the US 'false light' and 'private facts' torts. See Wacks, op. cit., fn 1, pp 56–59, for an extended comparison of confidence with the American torts.

350 Wilson, op. cit., fn 1, p 56.

rule from defamation for cases of personal, as opposed to commercial information and, as suggested by Warren and Brandeis,[351] to develop a rule that no cause of action would lie in respect of oral publication by private individuals in the absence of actual financial loss to the plaintiff.[352] Such a limitation is justifiable in principle, on the approach just indicated: our reasonable expectations or concerns as to the uses made of personal information probably encompass the possibility of a certain amount of social gossip, as opposed to mass circulation, as part of the price of living within a relatively free society. On a more pragmatic level, such a limitation would be necessary in the interests of legal certainty. As Zimmerman points out: '. . . most courts limit the private facts tort's scope by requiring mass or widespread communication as an element of the cause of action. American judges either tacitly or expressly recognise that they would create an impossible legal tangle if they subjected back-fence and front-parlour gossip to liability.'[353]

Public domain?

Introduction

Information could be protected by the doctrine of confidence if it retained a quality of confidentiality. But, clearly, information is not confidential if it is already in the public domain. As discussed, it is now only necessary to ask whether the information qualifies as private information. However, information will be neither confidential nor private if it is already in the public domain. A better way of putting this is to say that public information – such as photographs of the Prince of Wales at a ceremonial occasion – by its nature cannot be private. So the discussion begins by considering the point at which information can be said to have lost its quality of confidentiality or, now, of privacy. It will be found that privacy values, such as seeking to prevent humiliation, distress, indignity, and to preserve informational autonomy, have come to dominate the public domain inquiry to a very significant extent.

Information could be viewed as public, as opposed to private, either because it is already known to many people, so it has lost its private quality, or because it was made available in a public place. Obviously if the information became available in a public place it would then be known to anyone who happened to be present, but that was not the only factor viewed at one time as of relevance in relation to location. Section 12(4) HRA confirms that, when considering when to grant an injunction, the court must 'have regard to the extent to which the information has become, or is about to become, available to the public.'

351 'The right to privacy' (1890) IV(5) Harvard L Rev 193, p 196, p 217.

352 E.g., where a friend or acquaintance disclosed the secret of a person's homosexuality to an employer where it was foreseen that this would probably damage the plaintiff's career. Publication by radio or television would not be counted as 'oral', for obvious reasons.

353 Zimmerman, D, 'Requiem for a heavyweight: a farewell to Warren and Brandeis's privacy tort' (1983) 68 Cornell L Rev 291, p 337; at fn 246 she cites the decision in La Fontaine v Family Drug Stores, Inc, 33 Conn Supp 66, p 73; 360 A 2d 899, p 902 (Conn CP 1976) where the court commented that the abandonment of the mass publicity requirement 'would expand the concept of invasion of privacy beyond manageable limits'.

Information already known to a number of people

Making a determination on this first public domain matter has often been problematic. In the US prior publicity generally negatives liability.[354] For example, it might be argued that a celebrity had deliberately revealed sensitive personal information about his sexuality in the past and that therefore details regarding his current sexual partners or practices can now be published. It has been argued in the American context that celebrities may be seen to have waived their right to privacy so that a defence of implied consent may be used against any privacy actions they may bring.[355] The US courts have at times failed to draw a distinction between voluntary and involuntary publicity.[356] As Wacks has remarked: ‘It is in principle unacceptable that merely because an individual seeks favourable publicity . . . his entire private life might be laid bare with impunity’.[357]

In contrast, the English doctrine of confidence and s 12(4)(a)(i) of the HRA have adopted a more nuanced approach, whereby the existence of prior publicity is a relevant but not conclusive factor. Thus, in the leading decision, AG v Guardian Newspapers Ltd (No 2),[358] Lord Keith argued that whether information is in the public domain will often be a matter of degree and therefore prior disclosure to a limited group of people might not rob the information of its confidentiality, an approach which received general support in the case.[359] His Lordship was referring to the possibility of publication abroad, but the principle behind his comments – that the true test is whether further and more serious damage will flow from the fresh disclosure contemplated[360] – clearly applied in a case in which the relevant information had been previously disclosed in this country but in such a manner or at such a distance in the past that the information could not fairly be characterised as being currently in the public domain. Further, even 10 years ago, it was clear that where information conveys a particular message which is itself already in the public domain, the level of detail which accompanies it, which is not in the public domain, may allow the information to be termed confidential.[361]

354 See, e.g., Sidis 113 F 2d 806 (2d Cir 1940) and Forsher v Bugliosi 26 Cal 3d 792, 608 P 2d 716, 163 Cal Rptr 628 (1980); cf the earlier decision in Melvin v Reid 112 Cal App 283 (1931). See also, the decision in Ann-Margret v High Society Magazine Inc (1980) 498 F Supp 401 in which a well-known actress was denied relief in respect of the publication of a nude photograph of her 355 Elwood ‘Outing, privacy and the First Amendment’ [1992] Yale LJ 747.

356 Thus in Metter v Los Angeles Examiner (1939) 35 Cal App 2d 304, a person committed suicide by jumping from a high building and the court found that the victim had made herself a public figure ‘for a brief period’ through her own actions. However, the same result – denial of any right to privacy – was reached in Kelly v Post Publishing Co (1951) 327 Mass 275, where there was no element of voluntariness at all, the victim having died in a car accident.

357 Wacks, op. cit., fn 1, p 24.

358 [1990] 1 AC 109; [1990] 3 WLR 776; [1988] 3 All ER 545, HL.

359 Ibid, p 260. His Lordship was referring specifically to the possibility of publication abroad – Spycatcher had been published in the United States – but the principle is of general application. Sir John Donaldson in the Court of Appeal took the same approach, remarking that ‘it is a matter of degree’ (ibid, p 177), as did Scott J (ibid, p 149). See also AG v Guardian Newspapers [1987] 1 WLR 1248 (the first Spycatcher case).

360 Note the similar findings in the privacy context on this point in Broadcasting Complaints Commission ex p Granada TV Ltd (1993) The Times, 31 May; affirmed [1995] EMLR 163; (1994) The Times, 16 December, CA.

361 See Barrymore v NGN Ltd [1997] FSR 600.

The claim that prior, voluntary revelations mean that implied consent to future invasions of privacy has been given is clearly incompatible with the core privacy value: the individual's right to control over the release of personal information – the right to selective disclosure. When such selectivity is exercised in the context of disclosures to the media, and resulted in a public deception on a matter of importance, there would be an arguable public interest in correcting it by revealing the truth – the situation that arose in Campbell. But the information would not be robbed of its private quality merely because revelations had been made in the past relating to a similar area of the plaintiff's private life.

The public domain issue could be problematic where the information now disclosed had previously been recorded in a public record or given some earlier publicity. Once again, the US courts have opted for an absolutist stance in such situations: the Second Restatement of Torts states: 'there can be no [privacy] liability for giving publicity to facts about the plaintiff's life which are matters of public record.'[362] The Law Commission, in its final report on the doctrine of confidence,[363] decided not to follow its own earlier suggestion[364] that information should automatically be classified as in the public domain if it is on a register or other record required by law to be open to the public. This, it is suggested, reflected a realistic recognition of the fact that there is a world of difference between, as Ingber puts it, 'the disclosure of a personal fact in a dusty public record hidden somewhere in the bowels of a county courthouse and a similar disclosure disseminated through the mass technology of the modern press'.[365] This approach was followed in cases involving disclosure of past criminal convictions, despite the fact that such convictions are arrived at and announced in open court.[366] While such approaches have been attacked,[367] it is notable that under the DPA 1998, information relating to a person's criminal record forms one of the seven categories of 'sensitive personal data',[368] the processing of which attracts a higher level of safeguards than normal data.[369] It should also be borne in mind that the public interest would often require disclosure in such cases, as it did in the two cases just cited.

Similarly, the Law Commission has found that prior publicity some time ago in local newspapers should not preclude later legal protection for such information. Instead, their recommendation was simply that information could be said to be in the public domain only if 'having regard to its nature and the circumstances of its

362 Restatement, 625D.

363 Commission Report No 110, Breach of Confidence, para 6.74; see also para 6.68.

364 Set out in their Working Paper No 58, para 103.

365 Ingber, S, 'Rethinking intangible injuries: a focus on remedy' (1985) Cal L Rev 772, pp 848–49, cited in Paton-Simpson, E, 'Private circles and public squares: invasion of privacy by the publication of "private facts"' (1998) 61 MLR 318 p 327; see also p 890, below.

366 R v Chief Constable of North Wales Police ex p AB [1997] 3 WLR 724, CA; in Hellewell, the applicant complained that his 'mug shot', lawfully taken by the police, had been passed on to local retailers as part of their own anti-crime efforts, thus revealing the fact of his arrest. Laws J treated the fact that the complainant had been involved with the police as 'not . . . a public fact' but 'prima facie at least . . . a piece of confidential information' ([1995] 1 WLR 804, p 810).

367 See Thompson [1995] Conv 404, pp 406–7.

368 Along with matters such as a person's sexual life, religious and political opinions, and his physical and mental health (s 2).

369 Markesenis points out that the German courts have also afforded privacy protection to ex-criminals whose records are revealed, hampering their rehabilitation (op. cit., fn 1, p 123).

disclosure, it is generally available to the public'.[370] They considered that information was not in the public domain if 'it is only accessible to the public after a significant contribution of labour, skill or money'.[371] Such a flexible definition would allow courts to draw distinctions both between readily accessible public records and those buried in obscurity,[372] and between matters reported some years previously in a local newspaper and the contemporary mass reporting of the same matter.[373]

In any event, it is now clear from the recent privacy cases that information can remain 'private' or confidential even though it is known to a number of persons. In Mills v News Groups Newspapers,[374] which concerned the threatened publication of the applicant's address in the Sun, the judge said: 'The fact that information may be known to a limited number of members of the public does not of itself prevent it having and retaining the character of confidentiality, or even that it has previously been very widely available.'[375] The fact that information might be known to a limited number of members of the public did not of itself prevent it having and retaining the character of confidentiality.[376] It is also said that even if it had previously been very widely available, the restraint of further dissemination of the confidential material might be justified to prevent harm.[377]

In Campbell, there was no suggestion that the limited number of people who knew the details of the model's attendance at Narcotics Anonymous had robbed the information of its confidential quality. Similarly, in Blair v Associated Newspapers,[378] in which Cherie Blair was granted a series of injunctions against various parties to prevent the publication of details of her domestic arrangements, provided by a former nanny, the fact that one print-run of the Mail on Sunday carrying the offending article had already been distributed was held not to have robbed the information of its confidential quality. That was a significant decision since thousands of people would have read the article. In principle, it is argued, it was correct since the mere fact that a newspaper manages to put out one print run before the plaintiff can obtain an interim injunction should not preclude the grant of relief on the basis that the defendant should not be able to 370 Commission Report No 110, Breach of Confidence, para 6.74(i).

371 Ibid, para 6.74(ii). They gave the example of a reporter who combs through the back copies of a local newspaper in order to find out information about a now famous person; she would be gathering information not in the public domain, as she is expending considerable labour in the task (para 6.67).

372 It is clear that if the controller of the record is under a statutory duty not to disclose it to others, for example under the Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 or the Data Protection Act 1998, then the information should be regarded as prima facie confidential at common law also.

373 A similar approach was followed in the New Zealand case, TW3 Network Services Ltd v Broadcasting Standards Authority [1995] 2 NZLR (HC) 720, p 731: 'Although information has been made known to others, a degree of privacy, entitled to protection, may remain. In determining whether information has lost its private character it would be appropriate to look realistically at the nature, scale and timing of previous publications.'

374 [2001] EMLR 41.

375 Ibid at para 25.

376 It referred to Stephens v Avery, p 454; R v Broadcasting Complaints Commission ex p Granada Television Ltd [1995] EMLR 163, p 168; Creation Records Ltd v News Group Newspapers Ltd [1997] EMLR 444, p 456.

377 AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2), p 260, per Lord Keith of Kinkel.

378 Case no HQ0001236.

profit from his own wrong-doing. In McKennit v Ash Mr Justice Eady said at first instance: 'in matters of privacy the Courts should be slow to allow public domain as a defence, and it is permissible to allow a controlled release of private information'. In other words, the judges are strongly adhering to a key principle of informational autonomy – that persons constantly choose the forums and the persons to whom they disclose some personal information: the fact that it is disclosed in a particular setting to a particular group – as in McKennitt in respect of some of the information – does not mean that the individual condones its mass dissemination.

This approach is clearly to be preferred to the more absolutist stance. While the latter has the advantage of making it relatively easy to predict in advance what can be disclosed with impunity, it relies, as Paton-Simpson has persuasively argued, on a simplistic and misleading attitude whereby privacy is treated as an all or nothing concept, rather than as a matter of degree.[379] Nevertheless, in rejecting this approach, it is stressed that s 12 HRA and Art 10 of the Convention require the judiciary to have regard to the possible impact on press freedom in developing remedies against privacy: this must be considered in terms of the certainty or otherwise of the new privacy law. Editors and journalists must be able to foresee to a reasonable extent whether given actions will result in liability. Zimmerman notes, 'The [US Supreme] Court has stated repeatedly that vague proscriptions against speech may chill the willingness of individuals and the media to take part in those communicative activities that are clearly protected by the First Amendment.'[380] However, if it is clear – which is the position that the law is approaching – that the publication of personal information without consent, including information known to a large number of persons, may attract liability under the new privacy doctrine, that is a rule giving the press reasonably precise warning as to what can safely be published. Attention should then focus on the value of the speech, not on a mechanistic application of a public domain test – a test that fails to focus on the key issue: the distress caused by the disclosure of the information.

Bearing in mind that confidence became the key mechanism to be used to prevent non-consensual disclosures of personal information, a tension between privacy values and confidence ones may be apparent, suggesting that Sedley LJ's approach in Douglas[381] may be more satisfactory than that of Dame Butler-Sloss in Venables.[382] Where the claimant has deliberately placed her sexual life in the public domain and has profited from it (for, example, where it is part of a certain image that she wishes to project) it is suggested that in terms of privacy it has lost its personal quality and in terms of confidence it is no longer secret. This approach is, as noted above, consonant with that under the DPA since it is one of the conditions for processing sensitive personal data. But where others have previously placed her sexual life in the public domain it is suggested that in terms of privacy the information retains its personal quality in the sense that each re-revelation causes her distress, whereas in terms of confidence it is

379 See Paton-Simpson, E, 'Private circles and public squares: invasion of privacy by the publication of "private facts"' (1998) 61 MLR 318.

380 Zimmerman, D, 'Requiem for a heavyweight: a farewell to Warren and Brandeis's privacy tort' (1983) 68 Cornell L Rev 291.

381 [2001] 2 WLR 992.

382 [2001] 1 All ER 908, Fam Div (High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division).

no longer secret despite her lack of acquiescence in the disclosures.[383] But the courts have not so far made anything of this distinction in the recent privacy cases.

Information obtained in public places

As to the second public domain matter, it used to be the case that confidence would not cover instances where the information was initially obtained through observation in a public place. However, nearly 15 years ago the decision in HRH Princess of Wales v MGN Newspapers Ltd and Others[384] cast some doubt on this contention, since the information in question was obtained in a gymnasium attended by other club members and therefore, clearly, it had been disseminated to an extent, albeit in a manner limited enough to prevent it from being viewed as in the public domain. An interim injunction to protect the information was nevertheless granted. Thus, at the time it appeared to be clear that information obtained by means of observation in similar semi-public places, such as restaurants, might be found to retain the necessary quality of confidence.

A particular problem arises where information, alleged to be personal, relates to a matter occurring within a public or semi-public environment and it is consequently argued that it cannot be seen as 'personal information'. Two basic approaches to this problem and other variants of it may be discerned concerning the borderline of the public/private divide.[385] The first is the straightforward, but anti-privacy, approach adopted by the US courts, which hold, with apparent logic, that what takes place in 'public' cannot by definition be 'private'. As Prosser puts it:

> the decisions indicate that anything visible in a public place may be recorded and given circulation by means of a photograph [or] . . . written description, since this amounts to no more than giving publicity to what is already public and what any one present would be free to see.[386]

The advantages of this approach in terms of legal certainty and predictability are apparent. However, it entirely misses the point that privacy need not be an absolute state of affairs[387] to be valuable and that everyday lives are in fact a constant trade-off between human interaction and the formation of relationships on the one hand, and the maintenance of a reasonable degree – not an absolute state – of privacy on the other. The alternative legal approach is therefore far more nuanced and subtle; it focuses, as the US one does not, on core privacy values. UK law recognised some years ago that a degree of privacy might be retained in a semi-public environment, such as a 383 The difference between the two was encapsulated in Broadcasting Complaints Commission ex p Granada Television [1995] EMLR 163.

384 Transcript, Association of Official Shorthandwriters Limited, 8 November 1993. Discussed below.

385 See further below, pp 912–15.

386 Prosser, D, 'Privacy' (1960) 48 Calif L Rev 383, p 396, pp 394–95.

387 Gavison suggests that an individual 'enjoys perfect privacy when he is completely inaccessible to others' (Gavison, R, 'Privacy and the limits of law' (1980) 89(3) Yale LJ 421, p 428) without suggesting that this is anything other than an unrealistic and undesirable scenario.

restaurant,[388] or gymnasium.[389] The step towards accepting that privacy might be retained in entirely public locations was not taken until recently.

English courts initially found that the Strasbourg jurisprudence provided little specific guidance on this particular matter, although it appeared that it probably did not require the narrow approach characterised by the US jurisprudence.[390] The approach of the German Supreme Court[391] over 10 years ago provided a useful contrast to the US stance. Princess Caroline of Monaco complained of photographs taken by the press of her having an intimate dinner with her boyfriend in a garden restaurant in France. The Supreme Court refused to follow the approach of the Appeal Court that privacy 'stopped at the doorstep': they found that the Princess had clearly 'retreated to a place of seclusion where [she wished] to be left alone' and that she was entitled to respect for that wish. The approach indicated was that one may still be entitled to respect for privacy in semi-public places, recognising, as the court put it, that people may 'transfer their private sphere of life to a place outside their home'. While the presumption of the Court was that events taking place in such places do not attract privacy protection, this could be rebutted if, as the Court put it, it is clear by reference to 'objective criteria' that one wishes to be 'left alone' so that one can, 'relying on the seclusion of the place, behave in a manner which [one] would not have done if . . . in full view of the public'.[392] Thus, identifying such places of seclusion was not to be done simplistically by reference solely to locality,[393] an approach implicitly approved in a decision of the Canadian Supreme Court involving the publication, without consent, of a photograph of the plaintiff taken in public.[394]

This flexible attitude to privacy is confirmed implicitly by the Press Complaints Commission's Code of Practice drawn up by the press itself, to which, as noted above, the courts have to have regard under s 12(4) of the HRA. As indicated above, the Code defines 'private places [as] public or private property where there is a reasonable expectation of privacy'. It does not draw a simplistic locational distinction between private places such as homes and public ones such as the street. The fact that an event

388 See the decision of the German Federal Court: BGH 19 December 1995 BGHZ 131, 322–46, discussed below.

389 The location where surreptitious photographs were taken of the former Princess of Wales in HRH Princess of Wales.

390 The Commission found in X v United Kingdom ((1973) Appl 5877/72 16 YBCHE, p 328) that the actions of the police in taking and then filing photographs taken without consent of a woman arrested for taking part in a political demonstration disclosed no prima facie breach of Art 8, partly it seems because of what was described as the 'public and voluntary' nature of her activities (emphasis added). This decision has however, been described as 'an outdated aberration' in the case law of the Commission: Bygrave, 'Data protection pursuant to the right to privacy in human rights treaties' (1999) 6(3) IJLIT 247, 265; see also Niemetz v Germany (1992) 16 EHRR 97.

391 BGH 19 December 1995 BGHZ 131. See the discussion of this decision in Markesenis, B and Nolte, N, 'Some comparative reflections on the right of privacy of public figures in public places', in Birks, P (ed), Privacy and Loyalty, 1997, pp 118 et seq.

392 Ibid.

393 Feldman (1994) expresses strong support for this view: op. cit., fn 1, pp 59–62.

394 Les Editions Vice Versa Inc v Aubry [1999] 5 BHRC 437 (appeal from decision of Quebec courts under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which protects the right to privacy (s 5)). The photograph did not show the plaintiff engaged in any private act, or partially unclothed, but it was held that the right to privacy included the right to control over one's image.

takes place in a semi-public environment could, however, possibly be a factor which could be used in assessing the 'weight' of the privacy claim, when it is placed in the balance against any public interest in disclosure, including the interest in media freedom, a matter discussed below. This flexible attitude to personal information was also reflected in the pre-HRA case law on the doctrine of confidence; as indicated above, the courts had been prepared for some time to protect information already – in essence – in the public domain in the sense of being known to some people, such as the physical appearance of Princess Diana.[395] In those instances, protection for the details of an individual's personal appearance on a specific occasion was available. Even pre-HRA 'public domain' was clearly becoming a much more flexible concept.

But it became much clearer post-HRA that the courts were prepared to view information already partly in the public domain as worthy of protection on the grounds that it could still be viewed as private.[396] Campbell, in which both types of public domain issue arose – made it clear that the gathering of information in a public location did not mean that it was robbed of its confidentiality. Von Hannover confirmed that that is clearly the position adopted at Strasbourg. Baroness Hale in Campbell qualified her finding on the public domain point by demanding that where a private/daily life activity takes place in public, it must have an added privacy element in order to overcome the argument that the material was in the public domain since the activity occurred in a public location. She said: 'The activity photographed must be private.'[397] Von Hannover as discussed above, did not demand this added privacy element. But Lord Hope did not demand that the activity captured by photographers should be of an especially significant nature in terms of privacy; he said: 'But these were not just pictures of a street scene where she happened to be when the photographs were taken. They were taken deliberately, in secret and with a view to their publication in conjunction with the article'.[398] Those dicta comport quite readily with the findings of the Strasbourg Court.

In any event, depending on its interpretation, the term 'private' used by Baroness Hale could cover daily life activities, although that was not the sense she appeared to be using it in. In order to impose liability the invasion of privacy must be accounted serious. It could be said that Von Hannover turned on the state's failure to create a remedy in respect of the campaign of invasion of privacy by the press and that the decision need not be fully applied in a domestic case concerning the taking of photographs of daily life activities by one magazine photographer. But, as discussed above, in McKennitt[399] Buxton LJ rejected that explanation of Von Hannover. In fact, no liability in a Von Hannover situation (where the information was prima facie anodyne) has yet been imposed in the UK courts. Further, in the Prince of Wales case it was found that the question whether the revelation of the information was serious was to be regarded from the point of view of a person standing in the shoes of the claimant, not merely from the point of view of the reasonable person.[400] The latter test, it is argued, 396 See Mills v News Group Newspapers (2001) WL 720322, above p 889 on this point.

395 See p 891.
397 Campbell ibid at para 154.
398 Ibid, at para 123
399 [2006] EWCA Civ 1714.
400 At para 33.

would have been too limiting since it would have excluded too much information from the 'private' category.

What is the guiding principle to be derived from these findings, including those in Peck and Von Hannover? It is suggested that it is simply that of recognising the value of allowing persons control over the mass dissemination of private information, taking private information to mean information relating to a person's personal, as opposed to public, life. This principle does not depend on the specific expectation of the person 'holding' the information at issue. In other words, although that factor was taken into account in Peck, it should not be determinative of the matter since it places the moral responsibility for privacy invasion on the wrong party. If Peck had been a very high profile celebrity whose every movement in public was the subject of interest to the press, and had known, when he walked down the street after cutting his wrists, that he was probably being followed and photographed, he would therefore have expected that widespread publicity would follow. But the fact of his celebrity status should not change the privacy analysis since otherwise the moral responsibility for privacy invasion shifts to the victims of it.

Clearly, in some circumstances a person may control the dissemination of information and may expect to do so, as where a person invites guests to a wedding and takes measures to exclude unwanted persons, including the press (the Douglas situation). In other circumstances, such as that arising in Von Hannover, a person may wish to or seek to control the dissemination of information but have little expectation of doing so. In Douglas v Hello (No 3)[401] the Court of Appeal said: 'What is the nature of "private information"? It seems to us that it must include information that is personal to the person who possesses it and that he does not intend shall be imparted to the general public' (emphasis added). The Court of Appeal in the Prince of Wales case expressly endorsed those findings as sound. Obviously there will be circumstances where mass dissemination of the information has already occurred to the point where the information cannot be viewed as private. But the courts appear to be reluctant, as the Blair case indicated, to accept that a person has lost control of their private information, unless prior mass publicity forces them to that conclusion. In taking this stance it is clear that the judges have shown recognition of the underlying values of dignity and autonomy at stake.

Conclusions

So it is reasonable to conclude that the law is now seeking to protect the ability of the individual to control the mass dissemination of private information. The fact that the information is already known to some or that it was obtained in an inherently uncontrolled environment, such as the street, are not the key factors. Private life activities ranging from the everyday (walking with a friend), to the intensely intimate (attempting suicide), can occur in public. Private facts – such as a revelation that a person, thought to be straight, is in a gay relationship, or that a person is having an affair – can be revealed in public locations. The location of the activities has already been discarded as non-determinative and, as indicated, is ceasing to play even a residual role in UK privacy cases. It does not appear to be necessary that the information should be of an especially private nature: daily life activities can also be viewed as personal.

401 [2005] EWCA Civ; [2006] QB 125 at para 83.

In general, then, the role of 'public domain' as a limiting factor in terms of location is clearly diminishing in privacy claims, although arguably it can still play an important part in confidentiality ones. The first public domain issue is still of significance where the plaintiff, not the defendant, deliberately placed the information in the public domain by revealing it to reporters or others.[402] The second – location – is becoming increasingly insignificant.

It may be noted that state confidentiality claims appear to be moving in a direction entirely opposed to that indicated in Campbell and in Von Hannover. In other words, a contrary development is apparent, it is suggested, in relation to government assertions of a breach of confidence. As Chapter 7 indicated, AG v Times, the Tomlinson case,[403] suggested that a tendency to find that information is already in the public domain, even where it has been disseminated only to a small group of persons, is apparent.[404] If it can eventually be said that the interpretation of 'public domain' differs depending on whether the plaintiff is the government or a private individual, this would accord with the requirements of Strasbourg jurisprudence as recognised under s 2 HRA since in the former instance, the strong individual right under Art 8 is not also at stake.

Section 12(4)(a)(i) HRA requires a court to 'have particular regard' to 'the extent to which the material has, or is about to become available to the public' when considering the grant of relief which, if granted, might affect the exercise of the Art 10 right (s 12(1)). If the development indicated becomes a settled one, this would mean that the courts had accepted that differing approaches should be taken to the interpretation of s 12(4)(a)(i) of the HRA, depending on whether Art 8 was or was not at stake. The requirement to take into account the extent to which the material is about to become available (emphasis added) could have the effect of widening the public domain test in a manner reconcilable with the spirit of AG v Times (Tomlinson case), but not with Von Hannover or Campbell. So since s 12(4) should be interpreted compatibly with Art 8 under s 3 HRA, a differentiated use of the public domain argument in privacy cases and in state ones under the doctrine of confidence, would be justified.

The obligation of confidentiality – a discarded test; the new action for breach of privacy

The discarding of this test was the single most important step in the transformation of the doctrine of confidence into a privacy remedy. It therefore warrants lengthy discussion. Three stages of development can be discerned. First, the traditional categories of 402 It can also be argued that in a number of circumstances a person has impliedly consented to the placement of the information in the public domain; this is true of reporting of public occasions such as sporting events or ceremonies where the person in question is taking part in a public sense in the event. The position of spectators is not so clear-cut. See the comments of the Major Government in Privacy and Media Intrusion: The Government's Response, Cm 2918, para 3.14 and the rejoinder by Bingham LJ (writing extra-judicially), (1996) 5 EHRLR 450. Under the US tort, the test for consent is whether the complained of publicity differed 'materially . . . in kind or extent' from the informational material in relation to which consent was actually given (Prosser, D, 'Privacy' (1960) 48 Calif L Rev 383, p 420

403 See Chapter 7, p 623.

404 See pp 623–24.

relationship imposing obligations of confidence were broadened and it was recognised that the relationship between the parties was not the determining factor. The key factor appeared to be that the receiver of the information was bound by conscience not to disclose it. The focus on conscience transmuted into a different test: it began to be recognised that the obligation could be imposed whenever a reasonable man would recognise that the information was confidential.[405] Thus the need for some kind of prior bond of trust between the parties began to disappear. Second, these developments were consolidated under the impetus of the HRA, but in general the courts considered that they were dealing with an extension of the doctrine of confidence. Finally, the notion of imposing an obligation of confidence was discarded entirely: the only requirement was that the information was private in Art 8 terms; if that was the case the other party came under a duty not to disclose it. In other words, the action in question became that of breach of privacy (that term is used as short-hand for liability for misuse of private information). In identifying these stages of development, it must be borne in mind that the traditional relationships imposing an obligation of confidence, such as master/servant or patient/doctor are still relevant: they can figure as weighty factors tipping the balance in favour of privacy at the stage of balancing the speech and privacy interests.[406]

Discarding the need for a confidential relationship

Since Stephens v Avery,[407] the basic principle on which the doctrine of confidence was founded was that confidentiality would be enforced if the information was received 'on the basis that it is confidential'.[408] This depended on all the circumstances of the case, and the imposition of confidence was not limited (as had previously been thought) to instances in which there was a pre-existing relationship between the parties: 'The basis of equitable intervention to protect confidentiality is that it is unconscionable for a person who has received information on the basis that it is confidential, subsequently to reveal that information . . . The relationship between the parties is not the determining factor.'[409] It is suggested that this explanation of the basis of the doctrine weakened the requirement to identify the specific public interest, such as the interest in preserving the stability of the family,[410] which would be served by protecting the information in question.

The fact that the information was given in confidence could be expressly communicated to the defendant (as in Stephens v Avery), but it could also be implied from the circumstances surrounding the communication. In Fairnie (Dec'd) and Others v Reed and Another[411] the confidential information (the format of a board game which the plaintiff wished to market) was mentioned by him incidentally during conversation

405 For further discussion see: Phillipson, G, 'Transforming breach of confidence? Towards a common law right of privacy under the Human Rights Act' (2003) 66(5) MLR 726 and 'Judicial Reasoning in Breach of Confidence Cases under the Human Rights Act: not taking privacy seriously? [2003] EHRLR (Privacy Special) 53.

406 See below p 977.

407 [1988] Ch 449.

408 Ibid, p 482.

409 Ibid.

410 As in Duchess of Argyll v Duke of Argyll [1967] 1 Ch 302.

411 20 May 1994, CA, transcript from LEXIS.

with a virtual stranger about another matter; it was therefore transmitted only in passing, and the recipient was not told that it was given in confidence. The Court of Appeal found that there was an arguable case that the information had been transmitted in confidence, relying primarily on the fact that the information was of clear commercial value.[412]

It used to be thought that confidence was of limited value in protecting privacy, since it only covered those specific instances in which information was communicated in confidence. Thus, for example, it was not thought to cover situations where reporters took unauthorised photographs by means of telephoto lenses or surreptitiously recorded conversations with a view to publication. Where there was no formal relationship, the alternative ingredient traditionally required for a duty of confidence to arise was an express or implied agreement between the parties, or promise by the defendant, that the information received would be treated as confidential.[413] The notion of 'implied agreement' denoted an agreement which, although unspoken, was in fact mutually assumed between the parties. Owing to this requirement, it was thought that the action caught only those specific instances in which information was (voluntarily) communicated in confidence. Thus, it was not thought to cover the paradigm example of an invasion of privacy where reporters surreptitiously took photographs by means of telephoto lenses or recorded private conversation, with a view to publication, because in such cases there is no possibility of agreement between the parties or a promise (express or implied) of confidentiality: it would be absurd to say that the defendant journalist had 'agree[d] to treat the information as confidential'[414] when his whole purpose was to publish it, while the plaintiff 'confider' was blissfully unaware that any communication of information was taking place at all.

It appeared that an obligation of confidence could be imposed even where the information was not intentionally communicated to the defendant by the plaintiff. In AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2)[415] Lord Goff suggested obiter that the nature of the information and the fact that it was not intended that the defendant should acquire it[416] could in itself impose the duty, using the example of '. . . an obviously confidential document . . . dropped in a public place and then picked up by a passer-by . . .'. He said:[417]

412 '[Plaintiff's counsel] submits that in the context [the plaintiff] disclosed to [the defendant] a confidential idea which he believed could be commercially successful, particularly with his endorsement. In my judgment, that is an arguable inference . . . It all depends precisely on the language used, and the circumstances in which the conversation took place . . . [defendant's counsel] points out that . . . if the plaintiff simply blurted out or casually referred to the number one game . . . then the defendant could not be taken as understanding that he was being given that information in confidence. That may be so, but in my judgment it is not possible to say . . . precisely what inference should be drawn by the reasonable man who was the bystander and observer of the conversation', per Stuart Smith LJ, pp 7–8. The hearing was an appeal upon an application to strike out, so the Court did not have to decide whether an obligation of confidence was in fact imposed.

413 See the Law Commission Report No 110, Breach of Confidence, para 6.11: for an obligation to be imposed, 'any confidant must agree to treat the information as confidential'.

414 The requirement which the Law Commission thought necessary (ibid).

415 [1990] 1 AC 109.

416 Fairnie, 20 May 1994, CA, transcript from LEXIS, suggests that it will not always be essential to show that this element is present.

417 At p 281.

> I start with the broad principle (which I do not in any way intend to be definitive) that a duty of confidence arises when confidential information comes to the knowledge of a person (the confidant) in circumstances where he has notice, or is held to have agreed, that the information is confidential, with the effect that it would be just in all the circumstances that he should be precluded from disclosing the information to others . . . in the vast majority of cases . . . the duty of confidence will arise from a transaction or relationship between the parties . . . but it is well settled that a duty of confidence may arise in equity independently of such cases . . .'

Francome v Mirror Group Newspapers,[418] in which the information was obtained by means of a telephone tap, suggested that a duty of confidence could arise on the basis of such factors,[419] as did Shelley Films Ltd v Rex Features Ltd.[420]

These findings further confirmed that the duty could still be imposed (or perhaps imposed a fortiori) where the defendant set out deliberately to acquire the information without the plaintiff's knowledge, as opposed to stumbling across it inadvertently.[421] Presumably, this was also the case where the defendant acquired the information with the awareness, but without the consent of the plaintiff and where, as in Hellewell v Chief Constable of Derbyshire,[422] the defendant was acting under a legal power in acquiring the information for one specific purpose but wished to use it for another.[423] The decisions in Rex Features, HRH Princess of Wales and Hellewell also indicated that there was no need for anything recognisable as a 'communication' from the plaintiff to any other person for the duty to arise,[424] although presumably the information concerned had in some sense to emanate from the plaintiff. Thus, the obligation of confidence was able to be imposed unilaterally; it was not founded on the express or implied agreement of

418 [1984] 1 WLR 892.

419 Cf the obiter remarks in Malone v Comr of Police of the Metropolis (No 2) [1979] Ch 344, p 376, to the effect that those who spoke of confidential matters in situations in which it was foreseeable that they could be overheard (e.g., on the telephone) could not claim that any eavesdroppers were bound by a duty of confidentiality. However, in Malone v UK (1984) 7 EHRR 14, the European Court of Human Rights reaffirmed (p 38) the place of telephone conversations within Art 8 and therefore must be taken to have rejected the notion that citizens assume a lack of confidentiality in communication by telephone.

420 [1994] EMLR 134, per Mr Mann QC (sitting as a deputy judge): '. . . [the photographer] was not an invitee and assuming that he saw the signs [forbidding photography] . . . (I am not convinced that it would be fatal to Shelley's case if he did not) . . . it is impossible . . . not to conclude that what he saw and understood from his location might not have fully and sufficiently fixed him with knowledge [that the plaintiff wished to keep the appearance of "the Creature" and its costume secret] according to any of the relevant standards . . .'. The Australian case of Franklin v Giddins [1978] 1 Qd R 72 was relied upon as persuasive authority.

421 For the contrary view that a duty will only be imposed where there is unlawful action by the taker of information, see Wei, G, 'Surreptitious takings of confidential information' (1992) LS 302. For critical discussion of Wei's view, see the articles cited by him, p 309.

422 The case concerned the taking of photographs under Code of Practice D made under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 of a suspect in police custody. The police wished to allow a 'shop watch' scheme to use the photographs. An injunction was refused on the basis that the public interest was clearly served by the disclosure in question.

423 See also Marcell and Others v Comr of Police of the Metropolis [1992] Ch 224, esp pp 236–37.

424 See Thompson, Confidentiality and the Law, 1990, LLP, p 73.

the parties that the communication would be confidential.[425] In Maudsley v Palumbo and Others[426] Knox J said (obiter) that while the absence of actual belief on the part of the defendants that they were being given confidential information was 'quite capable of being significant', he '[did] not accept that . . . a person who forms no belief on the question is thereby absolved from being found to have received information in confidence'.

The developments described above significantly widened the circumstances in which the duty of confidence would be imposed, with the result that many of the activities of reporters engaged in uncovering private facts could be caught by the law of confidence. As Laws J remarked obiter in Hellewell:

> If someone with a telephoto lens were to take . . . a photograph of another engaged in some private act, his subsequent disclosure of the photograph would in my judgment . . . amount to a breach of confidence . . . In such a case the law would protect what might reasonably be called a right of privacy, although the name accorded to the cause of action would be breach of confidence.[427]

Care had to be taken in extrapolating general principles applicable at the time from some of the decisions discussed here, since a number of them concerned interim injunctions only[428] and therefore it was only necessary for the plaintiff to make out an arguable case. Others concerned appeals from applications to strike out[429] in which, as Stuart Smith LJ emphasised in Fairnie, the plaintiff must succeed unless his case is 'unarguable'.[430] Nevertheless, it is suggested that in the pre-HRA era, the courts were inclining towards a position regarding imposition of the duty to maintain confidence which may be indicated as follows. It was not necessary to establish a pre-existing relationship, an express imposition of the duty, an agreement between the parties or anything resembling a communication of the information by the plaintiff to the defendant or anyone else.[431] That ingredient could be established in a number of ways. Since Stephens v Avery,[432] it appeared that the existence of a formal relationship was 'not the determining factor'.[433] Instead, confidentiality would be enforced simply on the basis that the information was received 'on the basis that it is confidential',[434] since to allow such a recipient to reveal the information would be 'unconscionable'.

425 An approach indicated earlier in Coco v AN Clark (Engineers) Ltd [1969] RPC 41, p 48.
426 (1995) The Times, 19 December, transcript from LEXIS; the case concerned an application for an injunction to restrain the defendants from making use of an idea for a dance club disclosed to them by the plaintiff.
427 [1995] 1 WLR 804, p 807.
428 Rex Features; HRH Princess of Wales, fn 166; Francome v Mirror Group Newspapers Ltd.
429 Fairnie, 20 May 1994, CA, transcript from LEXIS, above; Stephens v Avery [1988] Ch 449.
430 Ibid, p 1.
431 Following AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109; [1990] 3 WLR 776; [1988] 3 All ER 545, HL, the defendant did not need to be the person to whom the information was originally 'communicated'.
432 [1988] Ch 449: the plaintiff brought an action against a friend to whom she had confided that she had had a lesbian affair; the friend sold the story to a newspaper.
433 [1988] Ch 449, p 482, per Browne-Wilkinson VC.
434 Ibid.

To sum up – in a number of pre-HRA cases, including Francome v Mirror Group Newspapers,[435] Shelley Films,[436] Creation Records,[437] and Hellewell,[438] no prior relationship was present. As a result of the successful actions in Shelley Films,[439] Creation Records[440] and HRH Princess of Wales[441] (all involving surreptitiously taken photographs), Francome,[442] (where information was obtained by a newspaper using a telephone tap) and Lam v Koo and Chiu[443] (involving the surreptitious obtaining of a document), any requirement for a communication between plaintiff and defendant disappeared, a development also supported by dicta of Lord Goff in AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2).[444] This was possible because the requirement of an 'implied agreement' of confidentiality was radically re-interpreted: the approach of the courts was to imply the agreement of confidentiality into the dealings between the parties, not on the basis of any mutual agreement on the matter, but instead on the basis that the reasonable man in the position of the defendant would have assumed such an obligation.[445]

The test appeared to be wholly objective.[446] What factors were assumed to lead a reasonable person to realise that the information was confidential? The authorities suggested that they would include the following: where it had clear commercial value, as in Fairnie and Rex Features, and where it was obvious that the plaintiff did not 435 [1984] 1 WLR 892. The information concerned (that the plaintiff, a well-known jockey, had breached various rules of racing) was obtained by means of tapping the plaintiff's telephone; the tapes so made were sold to the press.

436 Shelley Films v Rex Features Limited [1994] EMLR 134. An injunction was granted to prevent the use of a photograph taken surreptitiously on the film set of Frankenstein.

437 Creation Records Ltd v News Group Newspapers Ltd [1997] EMLR 444; an injunction was granted against a newspaper to prevent it from publishing a photograph of a new album cover designed for the group Oasis which had been taken surreptitiously on the set where the album cover was being shot.

438 Hellewell v Chief Constable of Derbyshire ([1995] 1 WLR 804). The 'information' here was a 'mug'-shot of the plaintiff taken by the police which was later passed by them to local shopkeepers to aid the prevention of shoplifting.

439 [1994] EMLR 134. The case was discussed extensively in the Spencer decision (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105.

440 Creation Records Ltd v News Group Newspapers Ltd [1997] EMLR 444.

441 HRH Princess of Wales v MGN Newspapers Limited and Others (1993) Transcript, Association of Official Shorthandwriters Ltd, 8 November 1993. Photographs of the plaintiff exercising in a private gymnasium taken by a hidden camera were sold to and published by a tabloid newspaper.

442 [1984] 1 WLR 892.

443 [1992] Civil Transcript No 116, CA (a Hong Kong case): a medical researcher accidentally or surreptitiously obtained a confidential research document produced by the plaintiff.

444 AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109; [1990] 3 WLR 776; [1988] 3 All ER 545, HL. Lord Goff considered obiter that confidentiality would be imposed in instances where, e.g., '. . . an obviously confidential document is wafted by an electric fan out of the window into a crowded street, or when an obviously confidential document . . . is dropped in a public place and is then picked up by a passer-by . . .' (ibid, p 281).

445 Thus, in Creation Records ([1997] EMLR 444), Lloyd J reasoned: '. . . the circumstances were such that any reasonable man in the shoes of [the photographer] would have realised on reasonable grounds that he was obtaining the information, that is to say the view of the scene, in confidence . . .'.

446 In Li Yau-wai v Genesis Films Ltd [1987] HKLR 711, a Hong Kong decision, an 'officious bystander' test was used to impose the duty of confidence (per Rhind J, p 719). An objective test was also employed in Lam v Koo and Chiu (1992) Civil Transcript No 116, see esp p 30 (Hong Kong Court of Appeal). See Wacks, Privacy and Press Freedom, op. cit., fn 1, pp 62–63; Loh, E, 'Intellectual property: breach of confidence?' (1995) 17 EIPR 405–7.

wish the information to be obtained (as in HRH Princess of Wales and Rex Features). Conversely, where the plaintiff deliberately refrained from mentioning confidentiality to the defendant, this could prevent the imposition of the duty, as in Palumbo.

This bold development, a clear departure from the view of the Law Commission on the matter,[447] radically increased the potential scope of the confidence action: it was able to cover cases where personal information was surreptitiously obtained by the media and then published without consent,[448] since in many such instances, it would be open to the court to say that the reasonable man would have assumed an obligation of confidence. This possibility – as indicated above – received further clear recognition from the European Commission in Spencer;[449] in the well-known Hellewell case,[450] Laws J said: 'If someone with a telephoto lens were to take . . . a photograph of another engaged in some private act, his subsequent disclosure of the photograph would in my judgment . . . amount to a breach of confidence.'

When used in this way, the central interest served by protecting confidences ceased to be enforcing promise-keeping, or preserving certain kinds of relationships; rather, it became simply that of preventing private or personal information entering the public domain without the plaintiff's consent. The action, therefore, while still termed 'breach of confidence',[451] became almost indistinguishable from a 'pure' privacy tort.[452] The Law Commission on breach of confidence explained the difference between confidentiality and privacy by saying that the former 'arises from the nature of the information itself: it would be based on the principle that certain kinds of information are categorised as private and for that reason alone ought not to be disclosed'.[453] The 'new' model of confidence outlined allowed a duty of confidentiality to be imposed solely on the basis of matters relating to the information: as noted above, it had to be of substance and not already in the public domain; it had to be such that the reasonable person standing in the defendant's shoes would have realised that it should be kept confidential.

447 'It would in our view, extend the idea of breach of confidence too far to cover situations where the potential defendant has not expressly or by inference accepted an obligation of confidence in respect of information which has come into his possession' (Law Commission Report No 110, Breach of Confidence, para 6.11).

448 Provided that the information 'has the necessary quality of confidence about it' (Coco [1969] RPC 41). See discussion below.

449 (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105. There is some recognition amongst the commentators as well; see, e.g., Singh, Grosz and Braithwaite, Wright (all op. cit., fn 1).

450 [1995] 1 WLR 804, p 807.

451 As Laws J remarked in Hellewell: 'In such a case the law would protect what might reasonably be called a right of privacy, although the name accorded to the cause of action would be breach of confidence' (ibid).

452 Confidence does, however have one limitation in such a guise: it cannot directly cover cases where there is intrusion but no information is gained or where information is gathered but never used (the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 might apply in cases of persistent intrusion). However, a reporter could be prevented by the terms of an injunction from passing any information gained on to anyone else in a newspaper, and presumably from processing and storing the information in the newspaper's archives (activities which might also engage the Data Protection Act 1998 (see below, pp 927–30). Moreover, the availability of a remedy in confidence against the publication of private information obtained by, e.g., a bugging device, might give rise to a perception that such use was pointless if lawful publication of the material gained was not possible; it might thus come to have a 'chilling effect' upon this form of intrusion.

453 Law Commission Report No 110, Breach of Confidence, para 2.3 (emphasis added).

When the doctrine was dealing with personal information, this realisation could come purely from the nature of the information itself, coupled sometimes with the manner in which it was acquired: the fact that the defendant had to intrude on the plaintiff in some way in order to gather the information was evidence to the defendant that the plaintiff would regard what he was doing as private.[454]

One final aspect of the utility of confidence in this area should be mentioned: in many cases, newspapers obtain private information about the plaintiff from his or her friends and acquaintances, as in Stephens v Avery[455] and Michael Barrymore v News Group Newspapers Ltd.[456] In such a case, an obligation of confidence can be imposed upon the newspaper on the orthodox basis that they knew or ought to have known that they had received the fruits of a broken confidence;[457] alternatively, under the developed model of the doctrine, applicable around ten years ago, the obligation could have been imposed upon the newspapers directly, on the basis that the reasonable man would have realised that the information received should be kept confidential, due its clearly private character.[458]

The initial effect of Art 8 and the HRA

What, then, was the role of Art 8 in the development of confidence, given that the judges already apparently had to hand a serviceable tool with which to tackle invasions of privacy? It is suggested that it performed two, linked, functions. First, it provided the normative impetus for the consolidation of the radical developments outlined above. Secondly, given the somewhat inchoate nature of the new model of confidence, Art 8, together with s 12 of the HRA, provided an organising principle around which the uncertainties inherent in the action, particularly the conflict between the demands of privacy and press freedom, could be resolved, a matter addressed below. It is suggested that Art 8, together with s 12 of the HRA, performed the first of these functions and also gave indications as to the means of resolving that conflict in the significant post-HRA decision of the Court of Appeal in Douglas and Others v Hello! Ltd.[459]

454 In AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109, Lord Goff stated that the courts should take account of 'all the circumstances, including the manner in which the information was acquired' (at p 283).

455 [1988] Ch 449.

456 [1997] FSR 600. A man with whom Mr Barrymore had allegedly had a homosexual affair passed the details to the Sun newspaper.

457 See AG v Guardian Newspapers [1987] 1 WLR 1248, esp p 1265, per Lord Browne-Wilkinson, and the Law Commission report: 'The third party is liable to be restrained from disclosing or using information which he knows or it would seem, he ought to know, was subject to an obligation of confidence' (Law Commission Report No 110, Breach of Confidence, para 4.11).

458 The view of the Law Commission (ibid, para 5.9) was that cases such as Fraser v Evans [1969] 1 QB 349 meant that the doctrine could give no remedy to the 'owner' of personal information where the promise of confidentiality is given to another, as where a newspaper promises a journalist that information he obtains on a celebrity will not be published in her lifetime, and then breaches that promise, leaving, so the Commission thought, the celebrity with no remedy. See also the doubts of Wacks on this point (Privacy and Press Freedom, 1996, p 56).

459 [2001] 2 WLR 992. See, for discussion Moreham, N [2001] 64(5) MLR 767–74; Elliott, M [2001] CLJ 231–33.

The magazine OK! secured an agreement with two celebrities, Michael Douglas and Catherine Zeta-Jones, eight days before their wedding under which it agreed to pay a very large sum of money to them in respect of rights to publish exclusive photographs of the wedding and an article about it. The couple trusted OK! to project only the images they wanted projected to the public. They also retained rights of approval in relation to anything that was to be published. Mr Douglas and Ms Zeta-Jones undertook to use their best efforts to ensure that: 'no other media (including but not limited to photographers, television crews or journalists) shall be permitted access to the wedding, and that no guests or anyone else present at it (including staff at the venues) shall be allowed to take photographs'. The rival magazine Hello! had tendered for the rights but had failed. Hello! clearly knew that exclusive rights were to be granted for coverage of the wedding, and that it had not secured them. However, the security operation at the wedding failed to prevent some unauthorised photos from being taken and Hello! obtained them. The couple were informed after the wedding that copies of Hello! were already in the UK with a photo of the wedding on the front cover and that they would be distributed very shortly. They rapidly obtained an ex parte injunction restraining publication.

The Court of Appeal had to decide whether an injunction restraining the publication should be continued in force until trial, thereby effectively 'killing' that issue of Hello!. The key issues were (a) the applicability of the law of confidence; (b) the relevance of the HRA 1998; (c) whether the injunction should be continued until the trial of the action or whether the claimants should be left to seek to obtain damages at the trial. The Court noted that the doctrine of confidence originally arose from the exercise of the equitable jurisdiction to restrain freedom of speech in circumstances in which it would be unconscionable to publish private material. It said that it was clearly established that where information was accepted on the basis that it would be kept secret, the recipient's conscience would be bound by that confidence, and it would be unconscionable for him to break his duty of confidence by publishing the information to others.[460]

Sedley LJ found that the law of confidence had developed to the point at which it could provide a right to privacy, in so far as a privacy right could be viewed as covering matters which are distinct from those which confidence has come to be viewed as capable of covering. He accepted that it might have reached that point even independently of the HRA. In particular, he found that it is arguable that confidence does not cover surreptitious takings of personal information by someone whose conscience cannot be said to be bound to maintain confidence – a 'stranger' – and that such takings are more readily covered by a right to privacy, albeit originating from confidence. His point appeared to be that although such takings could be covered by confidence, as indicated above,[461] the notion of an implied obligation to maintain confidence might be viewed as artificial, depending on the circumstances. In this instance the photographs might have been taken by a guest (who would come under an obligation of confidence since his or her conscience would be bound, in which case it would be immaterial whether the cause of action was called confidence or privacy). But even in the case of a taking by a stranger a cause of action, he found, would be available.

460 Stephens v Avery [1988] Ch 449, p 456. The court noted that in Argyll v Argyll [1967] Ch 302, 329f–330b it was said: 'It . . . seems to me that the policy of the law, so far from indicating that communication between husband and wife should be excluded from protection against breaches of confidence given by the court in accordance with Prince Albert v Strange ((1848) 2 De Gex & Sm 652; on appeal 1 Mac & G 25), strongly favours its inclusion . . .'. The court also relied on Michael Barrymore v News Group Newspapers Ltd [1997] FSR 600; Jacob J had followed those principles in a case in which a newspaper sought to publish information concerning an intimate homosexual relationship.

However, if the photos in the instant case had been taken by a 'stranger', the cause of action in his view could arguably be termed a right to privacy, and the HRA aided that conclusion since it provided a clear impetus to develop the law on the lines indicated obiter by Laws LJ in Hellewell.[462] Thus, the HRA gave a force to the above argument – that confidence had developed in such a way as to provide a right to privacy – which it might not otherwise have had. Sedley LJ made this clear: 'we have reached a point at which it can be said with confidence that the law recognises and will appropriately protect a right of personal privacy'. He based this finding in part on the coming into force of the HRA since it required the courts – as public authorities under s 6 HRA – to give effect to the right to respect for private and family life set out in Art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights. He said that the jurisprudence of the Court and the common law:

> now run in a single channel because, by virtue of s 2 and s 6 of the Act, the courts of this country must not only take into account jurisprudence of both the Commission and the European Court of Human Rights which points to a positive institutional obligation to respect privacy; they must themselves act compatibly with that and the other Convention rights. This, for reasons I now turn to, arguably gives the final impetus to the recognition of a right of privacy in English law.[463]

His key point in relation to a possible difference between confidence and privacy was:

> a concept of privacy does . . . accord recognition to the fact that the law has to protect not only those people whose trust has been abused, but those who simply find themselves subjected to an unwanted intrusion into their personal lives. The law no longer needs to construct an artificial relationship of confidentiality between intruder and victim: it can recognise privacy itself as a legal principle drawn from the fundamental value of personal autonomy.[464]

461 See Francome v MGM [1984] 1 WLR 892 and dicta in AG v Guardian Newspaper (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109, p 281, discussed above.

462 In Hellewell v Chief Constable of Derbyshire [1995] 1 WLR 804 Laws LJ said: 'I entertain no doubt that disclosure of a photograph may, in some circumstances, be actionable as a breach of confidence. If someone with a telephoto lens were to take from a distance and with no authority a picture of another engaged in some private act, his subsequent disclosure of the photograph would, in my judgment, as surely amount to a breach of confidence as if he had found or stolen a letter or diary in which the act was recounted and proceeded to publish it. In such a case the law would protect what might reasonably be called a right of privacy, although the name accorded to the cause of action would be breach of confidence.'

463 [2001] 2 WLR 992 at para 111.

464 Ibid, para 126.

He pointed out that Art 8(1) of the Convention creates a right to respect for private and family life, although Art 8(2), and ss 6, 7 and 8 of the HRA, make it clear that these rights are enforceable only against public authorities. However, he noted that, as indicated above, the European Court of Human Rights has relied on the positive duty imposed on the member states by Art 1 of the Convention,[465] and therefore found that Art 8 does recognise the applicability of its guarantee as between private parties.

Clearly, in an action between private parties – as in the instant case – it could not be said that the defendant was bound by the Convention since it was not a public authority under s 6 of the HRA. Sedley LJ found that the Court, as itself a public authority under s 6, was obliged to give some effect to Art 8, among other provisions of the Convention. Its duty, he said, appears to allow it to 'take the step from confidentiality to privacy'.[466] Significantly, he found that in so far as there was doubt as to the scope of the duty of the Court under s 6, s 12(4) made the matter crystal clear where interference with the right to freedom of expression was in issue. He noted that s 12(4) requires the Court to have particular regard to the right to freedom of expression under Art 10. Therefore, it was clear that Art 10 was applicable as between one private party to litigation and another; in other words, it has indirect horizontal effect.

However, Art 10(2) is qualified in respect of the reputation and rights of others and the protection of information received in confidence. Therefore, in having particular regard to Art 10, it was also necessary to have such regard to the other Convention rights, including Art 8. Section 12(4), it was found, does not, therefore, merely give freedom of expression priority over the other rights. In weighing up the competing claims, the Court also had to take the Code policed by the Press Complaints Commission into account under s 12(4)(b); it did not appear that the photographer had complied with the provision of cl 3 (which, as indicated above, provided at that time, in part, that, 'A publication will be expected to justify intrusions into any individual's private life without consent . . . The use of long lens photography to take pictures of people in private places without their consent is unacceptable.'). This clause is qualified by the exceptions where a public interest can be demonstrated to apply. That was not the case in this instance, since knowing of the details of the wedding could not serve a legitimate public interest. The court concluded that the claimants had an arguable case that they had suffered a breach of their privacy; this claim was based on the law of confidence, interpreted compatibly with Art 8, due to the requirements of s 12(4). Although the court was unanimous in reaching this conclusion, Sedley LJ differed from the other two judges in differentiating between confidence and privacy in respect of surreptitious takings of information.

The ultimate outcome of what was essentially a commercial case was of little interest in terms of future privacy claims; the case was of interest since it afforded confirmation to the development of confidence into a privacy remedy, a development which was accepted and relied upon in Venables, Thompson v News Group Newspapers Ltd, Associated Newspapers Ltd, MGM.[467] The case concerned the identity of the killers of Jamie Bulger; exceptionally, an injunction granted to protect the anonymity of a child may be extended, on grounds of the doctrine of confidence, once the child reaches 18. Jon Venables and Robert Johnson were claimants in proceedings for injunctions. In 1993 they had murdered a boy of two, James Bulger, when they were 10 years old. The murder was particularly shocking and distressing and the facts were widely publicised in the media. They were sentenced to be detained under s 53(1) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 (CYPA 1933), and they were placed in separate secure units. At the conclusion of their trial, the judge granted comprehensive injunctions restricting publication of further information about the two boys, with no limit of time, based both under s 39 of the CYPA 1933 (which is discussed above) and the inherent jurisdiction of the High Court to deal with children. The claimants reached 18 and wanted the injunctions to continue. The injunctions were principally designed to protect their new identities when they were released into the community. The court had to decide whether there was jurisdiction to grant an injunction under the law of confidence against the whole of the media in respect of an adult to protect his identity and other relevant information. That issue raised the question of the effect of the implementation of the HRA 1998 and, in particular, the applicability of the Convention, since the proceedings were private ones.

465 See the judgment of the court in A v United Kingdom (1999) 27 EHRR 611.
466 He noted that this argument is supported by Hunt, op. cit., fn 1.
467 [2001] 1 All ER 908 Fam Div (High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division).

A number of newspapers made representations to the court, arguing that on grounds of press freedom, an injunction should not be granted to protect the claimants' identities. The key issue in the case for the injunctions concerned the grave danger to the claimants if their new identities and whereabouts became known, since threats against them had frequently been made, including threats to their lives. They were also likely to suffer serious and relentless invasions of privacy. The court found that in the light of the judgments in the Douglas case[468] regarding the effect of s 12(4) of the HRA it was clear that Art 10 had to be applied directly. Dame Butler-Sloss P in the High Court found that,[469] taking into account the effect of the Convention on domestic law, that the law of confidence could extend to cover the injunctions sought in the instant case. She said that 'the common law continues to evolve, as it has done for centuries, and it is being given considerable impetus to do so by the implementation of the Convention into our domestic law'.

Her view was that the duty of confidence could arise in equity independently of a transaction or relationship between the parties. She said that the duty of confidence placed upon the media arises when confidential information comes to their knowledge in circumstances in which the media have notice of its confidentiality. This was a very significant finding since it relied on the nature of the information and not on other factors giving rise to an obligation of confidence. She further said that it was also recognised that it would be just in all the circumstances that information known to be confidential should not be disclosed to others, in this case by publication in the press.[470] The issue in question was whether the information leading to disclosure of the claimants' identity and location came within the confidentiality brackets. In answering that crucial question, she found that she could rely upon the European case law and the duty on the court, where necessary, to take appropriate steps to safeguard the physical safety of the claimants, including the adoption of measures even in the sphere of relations of individuals and/or private organisations between themselves. She said that under the umbrella of confidentiality there would be information which might require a special quality of protection. In the present case the reason for advancing that special quality was that, if the information was published, the publication would be likely to lead to grave and possibly fatal consequences.

468 [2001] 2 WLR 992.
469 [2001] 1 All ER 908 at pp 1064–65, paras 80–81.
470 She relied on Lord Goff in AG v Guardian Newspapers Ltd (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109.

Bearing that finding in mind, Dame Butler-Sloss found that the appropriate measures to be taken were to grant the injunctions since they would substantially reduce the risk to each of the claimants. The court therefore proceeded to grant the injunctions 'against the world'. It was not thought that this extension of the law of confidence would lead to the granting of general restrictions on the media in cases where anonymity would be desirable since, under the strict application of Art 10(2), it would only be appropriate to grant injunctions to restrain the media where it could be convincingly demonstrated, within those exceptions, that it was strictly necessary. The court left open the question whether it would be appropriate to grant injunctions to restrict the press in this case if only Art 8, as opposed to Arts 2 and 3, had been likely to be breached. Although the breach of the claimants' right to respect for family life and privacy would have been likely to be serious, it might not have been sufficient to meet the importance of the preservation of the freedom of expression in Art 10(1). This was a very significant ruling since it provided for the anonymity of adults. However, the question whether the injunction would have been issued on grounds of the threat of a very serious invasion of privacy alone was left open. It may be noted that the injunction was varied in July 2001 to absolve internet service providers (ISPs) from liability if matter identifying Venables or Thompson were to be posted on a website accessed through ISPs without their knowledge, if they had no knowledge that the material was on the site and had taken all reasonable steps to prevent publication of the banned material.[471] However, the varied injunction did not specify the steps that ISPs would be expected to take. This episode highlighted the potential inefficacy of the use of injunctions in the internet era.

The decisions in Douglas and Venables were followed in Mills (Heather) v News Group Newspapers Ltd.[472] Mills was a well-known and successful model who had, since 1999, been publicly associated with Sir Paul McCartney. She contracted to buy a property, and in view of a number of very disturbing e-mails she received, and in the light of the circumstances surrounding the death of John Lennon, and the attack on George Harrison, she was anxious to ensure that details of her address were not given public circulation, since she feared that she might be subject to physical threats or even injury. She bought the property under an alias. However, the Sun was informed by a person, who had obtained the information from a friend who lived nearby, that she had information that Mills was buying a house. The editor of the Sun decided, owing to the good relationship of the newspaper with Sir Paul McCartney, not to run the story. He was asked for confirmation that the paper would not publish the address and/or a photograph and/or a description of the property in breach of the Code of 471 See the Guardian, 11 July 2001, p 2. See further guardian.co.uk/bulger.

472 [2001] EMLR 41, 4 June, High Court No HC 0102236, WL 720322. See also A v B and C (2001) WL 1251798.

Practice of the Press Complaints Commission (PCC). He would not confirm this in writing because he thought that other newspapers would run the story, and that were others to publish, he could not guarantee that the Sun would not publish it by way of 'secondary publication'. He said, however, that he could run it within the PCC Code but had decided not to. In view of this response there seemed to be a risk of publication; Mills then sought and obtained an ex parte injunction against the publishers of the Sun newspaper to restrain publication of material which might identify her new address.
The Court noted that the case for an injunction was on the ground of breach of confidence since, in general, the rights in the Convention, as incorporated by the 1998 Act, and in particular Art 8, did not justify the creation of new causes of action to give effect to them where the common law or statute law is deficient.[473] It said that the English courts had not, unlike the American courts which applied and developed the views expressed by Warren and Brandeis in their famous article in the Harvard Law Review in 1890,[474] developed a separate right of privacy prohibiting unreasonable and offensive intrusion on the interest of a person in solitude or seclusion, or objectionable publicity of private information about a person. However, it thought that this deficiency was being remedied, as was made clear by Sedley LJ in Douglas v Hello! Ltd.[475]

Assuming that the information in question – Ms Mills' address, or information that would reveal it – was therefore confidential information, the question was whether it should be protected by an injunction. The court found that there was no evidence that the newspaper had learned of it from or through some person who learned of it through some confidential relationship or transaction. But it said that it is no longer a necessary element of the cause of action that the information arises from a confidential relationship. In so finding it relied on the findings of Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss P in Venables v News Group Newspapers Ltd[476] to the effect that the court had jurisdiction to restrain the publication of material about Venables and Thompson, to protect information about their identities and whereabouts, because the disclosure of the information would have disastrous consequences for them.

Thus, the court found that there is jurisdiction to restrain a newspaper from publishing the address of a person in certain circumstances. However, it said that the mere publication of an address may not be a breach of confidence, or an unwarranted invasion of privacy. It said that, as the Venables case shows, one of the necessary additional elements may be the risk of injury or death to the person involved. In so finding, the court noted the practice of the PCC in applying the privacy provision of its Code of Practice (cl 3) which it said indicated that the rationale for prohibiting newspapers from publishing the address of the home of a celebrity (or material which might enable people to find its whereabouts) is not simply that the address is protected information, but that a risk to the safety of the person might thereby be created.

473 In so finding it relied on Venables v News Group Newspapers Ltd [2001] 2 WLR 1038, pp 1048–49, 1075, paras 24–25, 111, and disagreed with Douglas v Hello! Ltd, p 1026, para 129, per Sedley LJ.

474 Vol 4, p 193.

475 [2001] 2 WLR 992, p 1025, paras 125–26. Sedley LJ said: the 'two first-named clients have a right of privacy which English law will today recognise and, where appropriate, protect. To say this is in my belief to say little, save by way of a label, that our courts have not said already over the years . . .'. Cf Brooke LJ, para 95; Keene LJ, paras 165–67. See further Jack J in A v B and C (2001) unreported, 30 April. (The Court of Appeal decision in A v B is discussed below, p. 911.)

476 [2001] 2 WLR 1038.

Similarly the judge in Theakston v MGN,[477] a case concerning surreptitiously taken photographs of a minor celebrity's encounter with prostitutes, was prepared to injunct any photographs of Theakston's encounter, despite the absence of any circumstances imposing the obligation save the intimate nature of the events recorded. Theakston clearly had had no pre-existing relationship with the surreptitious photographer and on the evidence he had not (obviously) made any express stipulation that the occasion was a confidential one. The decision therefore gave support to the findings in Douglas and in Venables, that there was no need to identify further circumstances imposing the obligation of confidence. The judge did not however consider what the basis of the action would be.

After these decisions it was possible to say, with a certainty that was not previously appropriate, that the law recognised and protected a right of personal privacy. That right found its roots in an existing cause of action, the doctrine of confidence. The HRA had, as commentators had predicted, given the courts the impetus to develop confidence to this point. But it is important to be clear about the method of reaching this stage. The Douglas decision did not rely on the creation of so-called direct horizontal effect in the sense of the creation of a new free-standing cause of action: the HRA precludes an action directly against newspapers based on Art 8, since newspapers are not public authorities within the meaning of s 6 of the HRA.

But once the plaintiffs were in Court presenting an arguable case for an injunction on grounds of confidence, the Court had a duty, under s 12(4) HRA (if not under s 6 as a public authority) to develop that action by reference to Art 10, which meant also giving full weight to Art 8 as a right recognised under Art 10(2). In taking Art 8 into account, the domestic courts also accepted that, as interpreted at Strasbourg, its guarantees clearly affect the relations between private parties. The most important aspect of the findings in Douglas related to the possibility of a surreptitious taking of the photographs since that was the instance in which the doctrine of confidence as traditionally conceived gives way to privacy. In other words, where surreptitious takings of information were in question, privacy values were able to determine the issue, although both Mills and Venables found that these values were reflected in an extension of the doctrine of confidence, not in a common law doctrine of privacy. As indicated above, this development was already occurring, but the reliance on privacy values gave it a grounding in case law and in principle which it had previously lacked.

These early post-HRA decisions provided a consolidation of the developments in the law of confidence described above, which was clearly needed. While, prior to the inception of the HRA, confidence had the potential to be applied in the archetypal privacy case, the developments outlined above had a relatively slight grounding in authority: there were comparatively few cases involving personal, as opposed to commercial information; moreover, in those which dealt with such information, there was only one decision, at the interlocutory stage,[478] where the obligation of confidence was imposed without there being an express or implied promise that the information would be kept secret[479] or where there had not at least been a pre-existing relationship between confider and confidant.[480] All but one of the cases[481] involving surreptitious takings of information (where there was no pre-existing relationship or agreement of confidentiality) occurred in the commercial or professional context. It had been argued that in such cases, the courts were only protecting the plaintiffs' rights to the fruits of their labour;[482] conversely, it was said that the basis of intervention in personal information cases had historically been to protect the integrity of certain kinds of relationship. Thus, where personal information was revealed in circumstances where there was no such prior relationship, it was argued that there was no clear social need to protect confidentiality[483] and in the absence of such a need, the judges should not use the law to enforce 'free-standing' moral convictions,[484] such as a belief that private information should not be disclosed without consent. Lord Bingham had said of the claim that confidence could have been used to remedy the violation of privacy which occurred in Kaye v Robertson,[485] that such use would have done 'impermissible violence to the principles upon which that cause of action is founded'.[486]

477 [2002] EMLR 22.

478 Francome [1984] 1 WLR 892.

479 As there was in Stephens v Avery [1988] Ch 449 and HRH Princess of Wales (1993) Transcript, Association of Official Shorthandwriters Ltd, 8 November 1993.

Thus, had it not been for the advent of the HRA, a conservative appellate court, determined to restore the action to the founding principles which Lord Bingham invoked, could well have found that the use of confidence to protect privacy was weakly supported by authority, an illegitimate distortion of the law and lacking any underpinning in clear legal principle.[487] But, as Douglas demonstrates, under the HRA, the right to respect for privacy declared by Art 8 has become, as discussed above, an important legal value or principle, which may properly inform the direction of the common law. The Strasbourg jurisprudence examined above indicates that unremedied invasions of privacy by the media are in principle a violation of Art 8. Thus, the consolidation of the developments described above, far from being regarded as an illegitimate exercise in judicial activism, has now been underpinned by legal principle, and justified by the need identified at Strasbourg to answer to the requirements of Art 8 in this area through the common law.

Somewhat ironically, s 12 HRA, introduced after intense media lobbying to provide greater protection for the press to counterbalance the possible effect of Art 8, in fact encouraged the courts to provide remedies against the worst excesses of intrusive journalism. In particular, it afforded further status, as the decisions emphasised, to the PCC Code, which is, as indicated above, quite extensively concerned with privacy.

480 In Duchess of Argyll v Duke of Argyll [1967] 1 Ch 302, there was a prior relationship of husband and wife, in HRH Princess of Wales (1993) Transcript, Association of Official Shorthandwriters Ltd, 8 November 1993, a commercial relationship, and in Michael Barrymore ([1997] FSR 600), a close friendship and a sexual relationship (there was also a written agreement of confidentiality).

481 Francome [1984] 1 WLR 892 is the exception.

482 Wilson, op. cit., fn 1, p 49.

483 This view ignored the argument, notably advanced by Feldman, that the right to privacy does serve a strong social function in protecting the integrity of the different spheres of business, social and personal life within which we operate as individuals ('Secrecy, dignity or autonomy: views of privacy as a civil liberty' (1994) 47(2) CLP 42, pp 51–53).

484 Wilson, op. cit., fn 1, pp 54–55.

485 [1991] FSR 62. The argument is put in Fenwick and Phillipson, 'Confidence and Privacy: a Re-examination' [1996] 55(3) CLJ 447, pp 449–50.

486 Bingham LJ, 'Should there be a law to protect rights of personal privacy?' (1996) 5 EHRLR 450, p 457.

487 See, however, the Court of Appeal judgment in Dept of Health ex p Source Informatics Ltd [2000] 2 WLR 953.

Breach of privacy

The following decisions make more explicit the shift from confidence to privacy. Most importantly, the House of Lords in Campbell afforded relief in a situation in which, very clearly, the only basis for doing so was the nature of the information itself. In the decisions considered so far this was contemplated but relief was denied (Theakston, Mills), or the engagement of Art 8 was not the determining factor (Venables), or the decision dealt with a situation in which, either the more traditional confidence analysis applied, or in any event the message that the information was not to be disclosed was made explicit (Douglas).

In A v B plc the Court of Appeal dealt with the vexed issue of the requirement of an obligation of confidentiality very straightforwardly as follows:

> The need for the existence of a confidential relationship should not give rise to problems as to the law . . . A duty of confidence will arise whenever the party subject to the duty is in a situation where he either knows or ought to know that the other person can reasonably expect his privacy to be protected.[488]

This passage created the possibility that the obviously private nature of the information itself could create the reasonable expectation of privacy. It made it clear that a duty of confidentiality could be imposed purely on the basis of such a reasonable expectation. That meant that the test of imposing an obligation of confidence had disappeared. These comments were, however, obiter since on the facts of the case a duty of confidence in the more traditional sense could arguably have arisen. The case concerned a 'kiss and tell' story: the applicant, a premiership footballer, had had a pre-existing relationship with the women who then sold the story of their relationship to the newspaper. On the other hand, there was not much reason to suppose that there was a public interest in preserving the confidentiality of a relationship based on casual sex.[489] It is argued that the finding is not to be viewed as obiter on that basis. It is obiter because it could have depended on the 'reasonable man' test already in existence.

The seminal case of Campbell[490] in the House of Lords was the turning point in the final transformation of confidence into privacy. Naomi Campbell complained in an action both in breach of confidence and under the Data Protection Act 1998 after the Mirror newspaper had published details of her treatment for drug addiction with Narcotics Anonymous, including surreptitiously-taken photographs of her leaving the clinic and hugging other clients. Importantly, this photo made the location of the NA centre that Campbell had been attending clearly identical to anyone familiar with the area.[491] In the trial the information in question was divided into five classes as follows:

> (1) the fact of Miss Campbell's drug addiction;
> (2) the fact that she was receiving treatment;

488 [2002] 3WLR 542, at 551B.

489 Lord Woolf said, in A v B at para 45: 'Relationships of the sort which A had with C and D (the women in question) are not the categories of relationships which the court should be astute to protect when the other parties to the relationships do not want them to remain confidential.'

490 [2004] 2 WLR 1232.

491 As Lord Nicholls found: ibid, at para 5.

(3) the fact that she was receiving treatment at Narcotics Anonymous;
(4) the details of the treatment – how long she had been attending meetings, how often she went, how she was treated within the sessions themselves, the extent of her commitment, and the nature of her entrance on the specific occasion; and
(5) the visual portrayal [through photographs] of her leaving a specific meeting with other addicts and being hugged before such a meeting by other members of the group receiving treatment [492]

The applicant had conceded that the Mirror was entitled to publish the information in categories (1) and (2) – the vital fact that Campbell was a drug addict and was receiving treatment for her addiction;[493] the dispute therefore centred around the question whether publishing the further details and the photographs (categories (3)–(5)) could attract liability. The Court of Appeal found that the extra details in these categories were too insignificant to warrant the intervention of the courts.

It was clear that most of the 'information' in the case – the fact of, and details of the treatment – were provided to the Mirror by another patient at Narcotics Anonymous or one of Campbell's staff, sources who would have been caught by the obligation of confidence even under the traditional doctrine of confidence.[494] But the photographs had clearly been covertly taken. Morland J at first instance found that the taking of such photographs imposed an obligation of confidentiality.[495] The Court of Appeal reversed this finding only on the basis that the photographs disclosed no fresh confidential information, not on the basis that under the circumstances no obligation of confidentiality could be imposed.

The finding that no relief should be granted in respect of the photographs was overturned in the Lords. A majority of the House of Lords found liability in confidence in respect of the publication of surreptitiously-taken photographs of the model outside Narcotics Anonymous, in the street. There were clearly no circumstances that could impose an obligation of confidentiality in the traditional sense. There was obviously no pre-existing relationship between Campbell and the photographer. Clearly, there had been no express or implied promise by the photographer of confidentiality. Those factors appeared to be no longer necessary in any event, according to the findings in Douglas and in Venables discussed above. The duty to refrain from disclosing the information arose purely from the private nature of the information itself. In Douglas there were warning signs forbidding photography which could be viewed as indicating to the reasonable person that the information was to remain confidential. In Venables, although obviously there was no pre-existing relationship or agreement between the claimants and the newspapers, it was not clear that relief would have been granted purely on the basis that the information in question was private. The engagement of Arts 2 and 3 was crucial. So this was the first time that the nature of the information

492 Ibid, at para 23.
493 This was because it was accepted that the press was entitled to expose the falsity of Campbell's previous public statements that she did not take drugs and was not a drug addict.
494 On the basis of an express or implied promise of confidentiality (with a fellow patient) or relationship of trust and confidence (with clinic staff).
495 Ibid, at para 40(2).

alone was allowed to impose a duty not to publish it. As Lord Nicholls put it: 'This cause of action has now firmly shaken off the limiting constraint of the need for an initial confidential relationship.'[496]

So if the private nature of the information in itself imposes that obligation, then the test of an obligation to maintain confidentiality becomes redundant. The photographs were found to attract liability only by the majority, but the minority rejected this finding, not on the basis that there was no obligation of confidence, but because of their finding that the photographs contained no information worthy of protection. Lord Nicholls – one of the minority – made it clear the test of an obligation to maintain confidentiality was no longer a necessary part of the action in stating: 'the law imposes a "duty of confidence" whenever a person receives information he knows or ought to know is fairly and reasonably to be regarded as confidential'.[497]

Lord Hope said: 'If the information is obviously private, the situation will be one where the person to whom it relates can reasonably expect his privacy to be respected.'[498] He further said that the only element required to give rise to the reasonable expectation of privacy is the fact that the information is obviously private. So all that is needed is that there is private information which the defendant publishes without consent, or seeks to publish. With the decision in Campbell the action therefore become one for breach of privacy. The 2005 Court of Appeal judgment in Douglas v Hello! Ltd,[499] strongly re-affirmed this development, and was prepared to discard the terminology of confidence in favour of that of privacy. Buxton LJ in McKennitt v Ash[500]also referred to 'the rechristening of the tort as misuse of private information' which had occurred in Campbell.[501]

A similar stance regarding the need to show only that the information was private was taken in McKennitt v Ash in the Court of Appeal. The case concerned the publication in 2005 of a book Travels with Loreena McKennitt: My Life as a Friend. The book was written by the defendant, Niema Ash, who was formerly a friend of Ms McKennitt, a well-known folk star with a global reputation. She had often travelled and socialised with Ms McKennitt and she entertained her while she was in England.

Ms McKennitt claimed that a substantial part of the book revealed personal and private detail about her which she was entitled to keep private. Ms McKennitt had always very carefully guarded her personal privacy. But she accepted that she had occasionally released some personal information which she felt comfortable with, and in respect

496 Campbell v MGN Ltd [2004] 2 AC 457 at paras 13–14. Part of the argument on Campbell draws on that of my co-author, Gavin Phillipson, in Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act (2006) at pp 738–39

497 [2004] 2 AC 457 at para 14. Lady Hale also summarised the essential requirement of the new-style action very clearly: 'The position we have reached is that [prima facie liability is made out] when the person publishing the information knows or ought to know that there is a reasonable expectation that the information in question will be kept confidential': ibid, para 134.

498 Ibid, para 96.

499 [2005] EWCA Civ 595. This is the decision of the Court of Appeal on the appeal from the decision to award damages at final trial made by Lindsay J: [2003] 3 All ER 996 (Douglas II), the Court of Appeal having in 2001 declined to grant an injunction in the case: [2001] QB 967.

500 [2006] EWCA Civ 1714.

501 In McKennitt at para 8. Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead had used this term in Campbell [2004] 2 AC 457 at para 14.

of which she was able to control the boundaries herself.[502] This occurred mainly in connection with a charity which she had founded and the personal information she divulged was highly relevant to the charity's key purposes. The information sought to be restrained contained in the book included: Ms McKennitt's personal and sexual relationships; her personal feelings and, in particular, in relation to her deceased fiancé and the circumstances of his death; matters relating to her health and diet; matters relating to her emotional vulnerability, and as to the specifics of the interior of her home. Buxton LJ found that all of it was obtained within a pre-existing relationship of confidence, in the traditional sense. He found that not only would a reasonable man standing in Ms Ash's shoes have realised that the information was confidential, but that Ms Ash herself clearly realised that it was, from comments that she had made in the book.

Against that background he found that the information in relation to which relief was sought could be accounted private information – the key question – because, he noted, relying on Von Hannover:

> . . . private life, in the Courts view, includes a person's physical and psychological integrity; the guarantee afforded by Article 8 of the Convention is primarily intended to ensure the development, without outside interference, of the personality of each individual in his relations with other human beings. There is therefore a zone of interaction of a person with others, even in a public context, which may fall within the scope of private life. Based on that general principle, the ECtHR held that there [was] no doubt that the publication by various German magazines of photos of the applicant in her daily life either on her own or with other people falls within the scope of her private life.[503]

The defendant had sought to suggest that the ECtHR went no further in Von Hannover than to hold that the Princess's privacy had been invaded by a campaign of media intrusion into her life, and otherwise the taking and publication of the photographs would not have been in itself an invasion of privacy. Buxton LJ rejected that contention, on the basis that the findings in Von Hannover were not confined to an instance of a campaign of media intrusion. It was concluded on that basis that the information in question was covered by Art 8. Although Von Hannover was taken into account, it was clear that the information was of a more personal nature than the information about the Princess. But the references to Von Hannover indicated that the Court of Appeal would probably have been prepared to find that less intimate information was also covered. As discussed above, the key question was whether Article 8 was engaged, as determined by reference to Von Hannover.[504]

It is clear that the findings in the appeal ranged widely, well beyond the narrow limits of the facts of the case. The Court of Appeal made it clear that it was not necessary to identify factors giving rise to an obligation of confidence – even though such factors were in fact present. It was also made clear that the determination as to whether information is private must be made by reference to Art 8, and that Von Hannover, as the leading case, should be applied without limiting its scope to an instance of media harassment. Thus, personal facts could be covered even if partly in the public domain. Some of the information at issue was partly in the public domain due to its controlled release by Ms McKennitt as part of her charity work. Clearly, the information complained of was not acquired in public in the way that the information at issue in Von Hannover was acquired, but Buxton LJ's judgment indicated that if it had been, it would have been viewed as private information.

502 At para 6.
503 At para 38.
504 See p 883.

In McKennitt and in Campbell it can be seen that the need to demonstrate that an obligation of confidentiality had been imposed was entirely discarded. Both judgments clearly accepted – as Venables and Mills did not – that the step from confidence to privacy had been taken, and that the determination as to whether the information should be accounted private, relying on Art 8, had become the only necessary step in deciding that relief could be afforded, subject to the speech/privacy balancing act. The acceptance that a key element of confidence could and should be discarded in favour of relying on Art 8 is indicative of an acceptance in this context of an absolute duty to develop the common law by reference to the Convention rights, under the s 6 HRA doctrine of indirect horizontal effect.

The public interest defence

Perhaps the most important concern relating to the development of confidence as a remedy for invasion of privacy is the fear that the action will pose an unacceptable risk to media freedom. The main insurance against this possibility pre-HRA rested with the public interest defence, whereby disclosure of admittedly private or confidential information was permitted if this would serve the public interest.[505] A recent example of the working of this defence was provided by the 2007 'Cash for Honours' inquiry. The Attorney General sought to obtain injunctions to prevent disclosure of the identity of one of the persons involved on the ground of breach of confidence.[506] The injunction was refused on the basis of the public interest value of the information.

505 While originally only allowing disclosure if it would reveal wrongdoing on the part of the plaintiff (Gartside v Outram (1856) 26 LJ Ch 113, p 114 and in relation to copyright, Glyn v Weston Feature Film Co [1916] 1 Ch 261) the strength of the public interest in question rather than the individual wrongdoing of the plaintiff is now the determining factor: see Fraser v Evans, ([1969] 1 QB 349), Schering Chemicals v Falkman [1981] 2 WLR 848, esp p 869, X v Y ([1988] 2 All ER 648) and AG v Jonathan Cape [1976] 1 QB 752; Lion Laboratories v Evans and Express Newspapers [1984] 1 QB 530, W v Egdell ([1990] Ch 359) and Hellewell [1995] 1 WLR 804; AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109, p 282, per Lord Goff, and p 268, per Lord Griffiths. Note that where disclosure has been said to be in the public interest because it exposes particular criminal or anti-social behaviour or reveals some specific risk to public health, it has been held this will not always justify disclosing the matter in the press: see Francome ([1984] 1 WLR 892); Initial Services Ltd v Putterill [1968] 1 QB 396, pp 405–6, per Lord Denning; AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109, p 269, per Lord Griffiths; ibid, p 282, per Lord Goff; ibid, p 177, per Sir John Donaldson in the Court of Appeal.

506 The Guardian revealed that a meeting between Lord Levy, the Labour Party's chief fund-raiser and Ms Turner, a Downing St aide, was central to the police inquiry into the Cash for Honours affair. Lord Levy was arrested in connection with the affair. A High Court judge refused the injunction against the Guardian sought by the Attorney General (see the Guardian 7 March 2007). An injunction against the BBC covering the same story was also lifted.

None of the cases in which the public interest defence was discussed at length pre-HRA concerned the paradigmatic privacy claim, and Art 10 of the Convention had little influence upon it prior to the inception of the HRA.[507] The traditional public interest defence is discussed at this point; its role now is to weigh in the balance when Arts 8 and 10 are weighed up against each other, as discussed below. If weighty public interest factors are present, that may tip the balance in favour of Art 10. It is discussed here in order to indicate the development that has occurred and to identify the factors that are viewed as relevant.

Traditionally, confidential information would not be protected if the public interest served by disclosing the information in question outweighed the interest in preserving confidentiality. This aspect of the doctrine was often termed the 'public interest' defence. It was traditionally said that there is no confidence in iniquity: the plaintiff could not use the law of confidence to cover up his or her own wrong-doing and therefore the public interest in disclosure would prevail. However, it appears that the 'public interest defence' was not limited to cases of iniquity. The House of Lords found obiter in British Steel Corporation v Granada Television[508] that publication of confidential information could legitimately be undertaken only where there was misconduct,[509] but in Lion Laboratories v Evans[510] Stephenson LJ said that he would reject the 'no iniquity, no public interest rule' agreeing with Lord Denning's statement in Fraser v Evans[511] to the effect that 'some things are required to be disclosed in the public interest in which case no confidence can be prayed in aid to keep them secret and [iniquity] is merely an instance of just cause and excuse for breaking confidence'. These rulings concerned confidential information held by private companies and seemed to leave open the possibility of the existence of a broad public interest defence which, it seemed from Woodward, might also sometimes apply in the case of public figures.

Where personal information relating to a private individual was in issue, the ruling in X v Y[512] suggested that the public interest defence was confined to cases of iniquity. On the other hand, Lion Laboratories v Evans and Express Newspapers,[513] W v Egdell[514] and Hellewell suggested that the defence had broadened its focus of concern with the result that the strength of the public interest in question rather than the individual wrongdoing of the plaintiff might tend to be the determining factor. In W v Egdell, no such wrongdoing was relied upon in finding that the medical report relating to the plaintiff's condition should be placed before the appropriate authorities where it was in the public interest to do so. It should be noted that this decision placed some limitations on the ability of the public interest defence to afford protection to press freedom: it was found that it might sometimes be appropriate to pass information to 507 Remarkably, Jacob J's pre-HRA judgment in Michael Barrymore [1997] FSR 600 – a case relating to the unauthorised disclosure of personal information and thus clearly raising both privacy and speech issues – did not once advert to the Convention.

508 [1981] AC 1096; [1981] 1 All ER 417, HL.

509 See Cripps (1984) 4 OJLS 184 on the public interest defence.

510 [1985] QB 526, p 537.

511 [1969] 1 QB 349, p 362.

512 [1988] 2 All ER 648.

513 [1985] QB 526; [1984] 2 All ER 417, CA.

514 [1990] Ch 359; see also X v Y [1988] 2 All ER 658 and dicta of Lord Goff in AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2), p 659.

a particular body rather than disclosing it to the public at large. On the other hand, where the public itself had previously been misled by the plaintiff, it appeared that wide disclosure might be warranted.

These points should not be taken as assuming that the public interest always required disclosure of information and would therefore invariably be in competition with the interest of the plaintiff in suppressing it. Clearly, there was a general public interest in allowing the transmission of information from one person to another without interference, and in certain circumstances such as those which arose in X v Y[515] there might be a further specific public interest in maintaining confidentiality. A newspaper wished to publish information deriving from confidential hospital records which showed that certain practising doctors were suffering from the AIDS virus. In granting an injunction preventing publication, Rose J took into account the public interest in disclosure, but weighed it against the private interest in confidentiality and the public interest in encouraging AIDS patients to seek help from hospitals, which would not be served if it was thought that confidentiality might not be maintained.

Where public bodies are in possession of personal information, their obligations in relation to disclosure may differ from those applicable in private law. In Chief Constable of the North Wales Police ex p Thorpe,[516] the police had confidential information to the effect that the occupants of a caravan on a particular site were paedophiles, with a number of convictions for sexual offences. They sought judicial review of the decision of the police to disclose their convictions to the owner of the caravan site. It was found by the Court of Appeal that the duty of the police in such a circumstance differs from that under private law. The police as a public authority were not free to publish the information despite the fact that it could be viewed as being in the public domain, but that the information could be used if that was what was required to protect the public, as in the instant case. Both Art 8 and English administrative law would accept that the police were entitled to use the information in such an instance.

The approach of the domestic courts in the pre-HRA era was becoming very similar to that of the House of Lords in the important decision on defamation in Reynolds v Times Newspapers,[517] which concerned the proper balance to be struck between the individual right to reputation on the one hand and the freedom of the press on the other. The issue for determination was whether qualified privilege[518] should attach to good-faith political speech in the media. Their Lordships, while recognising for the first time that it could, showed a marked preference for the retention of a very broad and flexible test which asked simply whether, in all the circumstances, the public interest required publication of the material in question.[519] While Lord Nicholls showed some recognition of the possible 'chilling effect' which could arise if the imprecision of the test left the media uncertain as to the boundaries of permissible speech, he thought some uncertainty

515 [1988] 2 All ER 648.

516 [1999] QB 396.

517 [1999] 3 WLR 1010; [1999] 4 All ER 609.

518 If the defendant can establish the privilege, then even though he cannot prove the truth of the defamatory allegations, the plaintiff can succeed only if he can show that the defendant had known the allegations to be false or was indifferent to their veracity.

519 This approach was thought to be in harmony with Strasbourg jurisprudence on Art 10: see p 610 (the head note) and p 625 (per Lord Nicholls), an issue discussed below.

unavoidable and regarded its likely extent as relatively small in any case.[520] It thus seemed plausible to assume that a similar approach was likely to prevail in relation to the breach of confidence action,[521] as recommended by the Law Commission.[522]

It may be concluded that there were two key developments in the defence in the pre-HRA era. First, while originally only allowing disclosure if it would reveal wrongdoing on the part of the plaintiff,[523] the strength of the public interest in question rather than the individual wrongdoing of the plaintiff became the determining factor.[524] Secondly, where disclosure was said to be in the public interest because it exposed particular criminal or anti-social behaviour, or revealed some specific risk to public health, it was clear that this would not always justify disclosing the matter in the press.[525]

The public interest defence provided a means of reconciling the demands of speech and privacy. Under the impetus of the HRA, this balancing exercise is becoming, as indicated below, more sophisticated since it is largely undertaken as a balancing act between Arts 8 and 10 with their associated jurisprudence. Section 12 HRA is relevant as discussed below and draws in the PCC Privacy Code. The Strasbourg principles of necessity and proportionality determines the balance between the conflicting demands of speech and privacy, as indicated below, but it is likely that these domestic decisions will nevertheless be drawn upon since they provide some useful guidance aiding determinations as to the resolution of that conflict. Section 8 below examines the speech/privacy conflict that the new law has had to grapple with, since the issues raised are pertinent in all speech/privacy clashes considered in this chapter.

Further redundant elements

A defence of waiver?

In Woodward v Hutchins,[526] intimate facts about Tom Jones and another pop star were revealed to the Daily Mirror by a former agent who had been their confidante. The plaintiffs sought an injunction on the ground of breach of confidence. There had been a confidential relationship and they claimed that the agent should not be able to take unfair advantage of that confidentiality. The Court of Appeal failed to uphold the claim on the basis that the plaintiffs had sought to publicise themselves in order to present a certain 520 Ibid, pp 623–24.

521 The defence will always involve somewhat different considerations: in privacy cases, matters concerning the defendant's attempts to verify the allegations and give a balanced account will be inapplicable.

522 The Commission considered that the courts should retain a 'broad power' to decide whether 'in the particular case' the public interest required disclosure (op. cit., fn 2, at para 6.77).

523 Gartside v Outram (1856) 26 LJ Ch 113, p 114 and in relation to copyright, Glyn v Weston Feature Film Co [1916] 1 Ch 261.

524 See Fraser v Evans [1969] 1 QB 349; Schering Chemicals v Falkman [1981] 2 WLR 848, esp p 869; X v Y [1988] 2 All ER 648 and AG v Jonathan Cape [1976] 1 QB 752; Lion Laboratories v Evans and Express Newspapers [1984] 1 QB 530, W v Egdell [1990] Ch 359; and Hellewell [1995] 1 WLR 804; AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109, p 282, per Lord Goff, and p 268, per Lord Griffiths.

525 See Francome [1984] 1 WLR 892; Initial Services Ltd v Putterill [1968] 1 QB 396, pp 405–6, per Lord Denning; AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109, p 269, per Lord Griffiths; ibid, p 282, per Lord Goff; ibid, p 177, per Sir John Donaldson in the Court of Appeal.

526 [1977] 1 WLR 760, CA.

'image' and therefore could not complain if the truth were later revealed. This decision has been criticised on the basis that a need to reveal the truth about the plaintiffs was irrelevant to the breach of confidence on the part of the agent,[527] but it has not been overruled. The public interest in knowing the truth about the plaintiffs seemed to rest on a refusal to use the law to protect their attempt to mislead the public.

In Campbell it was made clear that there is no general defence of waiver. The applicant herself had conceded that the Mirror was entitled to publish the fact that she was a drug addict and was receiving treatment for her addiction; it was accepted that the press was entitled to expose the falsity of her previous public statements that she did not take drugs and was not a drug addict. As Phillipson puts it, 'This, however, was on the basis that there was a public interest in preventing the public from being misled,[528] not on any notion that that publicity-seeking in itself destroys an individual's reasonable expectation of privacy'.[529] Campbell's general statements that she was not a drug addict did not defeat, it was found, her expectation of privacy in relation to the details of her treatment for drug addiction. Lord Hoffmann found, '[Campbell] is a public figure who has had a long and symbiotic relationship with the media. A person may attract or even seek publicity about some aspects of his or her life without creating any public interest in the publication of personal information about other matters.'[530] None of their Lordships accepted that Campbell's publicity-seeking in the past would destroy protection for her private life.

It is concluded that the 'defence of waiver' is being marginalised, although Woodward has not been expressly over-ruled.[531] A person who has placed details of her private life in the public domain by giving interviews to magazines etc may find that that defeats her expectation of privacy, because the matters are not accounted private. Or if a person has misled the public that may provide a public interest argument that the record should be set straight. In Campbell her denial of her drug addiction meant that the fact that she was receiving drug treatment lost protection on the basis that there was a public interest in knowing the truth which defeated her expectation of privacy. Thus the defence of waiver appears to have been swallowed up, mainly in the balancing act between speech and privacy which is discussed below. The attempt by the defendant to put such a defence forward in McKennitt on the basis of the plaintiff's alleged hypocrisy was rejected on the ground that the charge of hypocrisy had not been substantiated, but the tone adopted was not propitious: Buxton LJ implied that the courts would not be receptive to attempts to rely on the defence. He said of Woodward:

527 Wacks, R, The Protection of Privacy, 1980, p 85.

528 See, e.g., Lord Nicholls (ibid) at para 24: 'where a public figure chooses to present a false image and make untrue pronouncements about his or her life, the press will normally be entitled to put the record straight.' This approach was endorsed by Lord Hoffmann at para 58 and Lord Hope at para 82.

529 Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act (2006) at 776. For a now out-dated view, see the remarks of Lord Wakeham, former Chair of the Press Complaints Commission, to the effect that the former Princess of Wales had made herself 'fair game' for public analysis of her private life by discussing it herself on television (The Times, 2 May 1996). A similar argument was also put forward in Mills v News Group Newspapers [2001] EMLR 41, 4 June, High Court No HC 0102236, WL 720322 by the Sun.

530 [2004] 2 WLR 1232, at para 57.

531 Brooke LJ in Douglas dismissed the argument that the couple's admitted previous courting of publicity precluded protection for their privacy; he said that he 'did not obtain any assistance' by citation of Woodward v Hutchins': [2001] QB 967, 995.

> This case dates back to an era when the Convention had not invaded the consciousness of English lawyers. I bear well in mind the warning of Lord Woolf in [9] of A v B that authorities which relate to the action for breach of confidence prior to the coming into force of the 1998 Act are largely of historic interest only.[532]

Detriment arising from unauthorised use of the information

The discussion ends by briefly considering the third element identified as essential in Coco v AN Clark (Engineers) Ltd; it appeared to require two ingredients – unauthorised use of the information and detriment arising from such use. This point was addressed by the House of Lords in AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2), but the Law Lords were divided as to the need to show detriment where a private individual was claiming a breach of confidence. Lord Griffiths considered that detriment had to be shown even in such a case;[533] Lords Brightman and Jauncey were silent as to the issue, while Lord Goff considered that the question should be left open.[534] Lord Keith, however, was of the view that in this respect a private individual should not be treated in the same way as a state body:

> The right to personal privacy is clearly one which the law should in this field seek to protect . . . I would think it is sufficient detriment to the confider that information given in confidence is to be disclosed to persons who he would prefer not to know of it even though the disclosure would not be harmful to him in any positive way.[535]

Obiter dicta in Shelley Films Ltd v Rex Features Ltd appeared to favour the position taken by Lord Goff,[536] while Lord Keith's view received some support from the finding in HRH Princess of Wales v MGN Ltd and Others[537] which suggested that in relation to private individuals, the courts may be prepared to assume the presence of detriment. The recent privacy cases, including Campbell have implicitly taken the latter view. So while showing detriment is a necessary element in state or commercial cases based on the doctrine of confidence, it is now apparent that this is not the case in relation to misuse of private information.

7 The Data Protection Act 1998

Introduction

Until 1998, there was no statute in the UK equivalent to the US Privacy Act 1974 which enables persons to obtain access to information held on them in paper-based and electronic state files. In the UK, certain categories of information covered by the

532 At para 33.
533 [1990] 1 AC 109, pp 269–70.
534 Ibid, pp 281–82.
535 Ibid, pp 255–63.
536 10 December 1993, transcript from LEXIS, p 16.
537 Transcript, Association of Official Shorthandwriters Limited, 8 November 1993.

Official Secrets Act 1989 could not be disclosed, but if personal information fell outside those categories there was still no general right of access to it. Central government and public authorities in general hold a vast amount of personal information in manual and computerised files. The police, for example, use a national system which stores an immense amount of personal information, as does the Inland Revenue. But private bodies, including the media, also process personal information; until relatively recently, the citizen had no means of knowing what information was held on him or her by private or public bodies, and no control over the nature or use of such information. However, an inroad into the principle of secrecy was made in 1984 by the Data Protection Act 1984,[538] which was adopted in response to the Council of Europe Convention of 1980.[539] Once access to certain computerised files became possible, access rights to some manual files began to follow, although no general statutory rights of access to personal information or control over the processing of such information were created until the Data Protection Act 1998 (DPA) was passed, and therefore much personal information still remained inaccessible and its processing was uncontrolled. A right of such access was proposed in the 1993 White Paper on freedom of information and open government,[540] but was not implemented in the 2000 Act which came into force in 2005.[541] Prior to the passing of the 1998 Act, the access to information measures discussed below merely provided exceptions to the general denial of access. Therefore the 1998 Act is of immense significance in terms of protecting the privacy of personal information by seeking to ensure that processing is conducted in accordance with the Data Principles.

Background to and context of the Data Protection Act

Control over personal information held electronically[542]

In response to the steady computerisation of information, the government decided in 1975 that those who use computers to handle personal information cannot remain the sole judges of the extent to which their own systems adequately safeguard privacy. The Committee on Data Protection was therefore set up, and the Council of Europe promulgated the Convention on Data Protection in 1980.[543] In response, the DPA 1984, 538 The provisions of the 1984 Act were extended by the Data Protection (Subject Access Modifications) Health Order 1987, SI 1987/1903.

539 Convention for the Protection of Individuals with regard to the Automatic Processing of Personal Data, 17 September 1980.

540 Cm 2290. For further discussion of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, which was introduced in 1994 as promised in the White Paper, see Chapter 7, pp 627–28, above. The previous Code, and the Freedom of Information Act 2000, which took over its role, were not designed to protect personal information, except in the sense that it is exempted from the access.

541 Section 40(1) FoI: Any information to which a request for information relates is exempt information if it constitutes personal data of which the applicant is the data subject.

542 Texts referred to and further reading: see Lloyd, I, Information Technology and the Law, 3rd edn, 2000, LexisNexis UK; Reed, C (ed), Computer Law, 1990, Blackstone, Chapter 9; Sieghart, P, Privacy and Computers, 1977, Latimer; Tapper, C, Computer Law, 1989, Longman; Hewitt, P (ed), Computers, Records and the Right to Privacy, 1979, Input Two-Nine; Wacks, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 6.

543 Convention for the Protection of Individuals with regard to the Automatic Processing of Personal Data, 17 September 1980.

applying to personal information in both the public and private sectors, was passed.[544] It was seen as a measure to protect privacy and a first step towards freedom of information. However, clearly it was difficult to defend allowing access only to electronically held information, as opposed to access to all personal information. As indicated below, the DPA 1998 recognised that most of the arguments regarding the electronic storage of information could also be applied to manual files.

It may be argued that the electronic storage of information presents a partcular threat to privacy because computers exacerbate the problems which also exist with respect to manual files. For example, an error may creep into information held on manual files, but where information is collated from a large number of sources, as may be more likely in respect of computerised files, an error may be more likely to occur. Moreover, once it does occur, the speed with which information can be retrieved and disseminated means that an error can reach far more persons and may do more damage than a record on a manual file. It is possible to transmit data from one data bank to another much more easily than can be done using manual files. Personal information gathered for a purpose acceptable to its subject may be transferred to another data bank without the subject's knowledge or consent. It may also be linked up with other information, thus creating what may be a distorted picture.

There is a danger that the confidentiality of information may be placed at risk. Information may be given to an employer by an employee on the understanding that because there is a confidential relationship between the parties it will go no further. If it is then stored in a data bank, there is a danger that the confidentiality will be lost. An action for breach of confidence could lie, but the individual affected would have to be aware of the breach. The retention of data may also create disadvantages. Although a person's circumstances or behaviour may change, old data may not be updated, but may follow him or her around with the result that (for example) he or she is refused credit. Manually held information is less likely to follow an individual so effectively. It may therefore be said that no difference in principle between problems associated with the storage of manually held and computerised information can be discerned, but that there is a difference of degree.

The regime created by the DPA 1984

The 1984 Act attempted to address the problems of protecting personal information by placing certain obligations on persons storing personal data. Below, the key features of the regime created by the DPA 1984 are indicated; they will be compared with those of the regime created under the 1998 Act.

Any person using a computerised system in order to store data relating to people was designated the 'data user', while the person who was the subject of the data was the 'data subject'. Any data relating to a living person was termed 'personal data'.[545] The data user had to register with the Data Protection Registrar. Section 5 provided that the data user must not use the data for any purpose other than the one it was collected for and under Sched 1, it had to be kept up to date. Also, it had to be adequately protected; appropriate security measures were to be taken. Under ss 10 and 11, if the Data Registrar was satisfied that the data user was not complying with the Act, she could serve an enforcement notice, and if this measure was not adequate, she could serve a deregistration notice. It was a criminal offence for an unregistered person or body to store personal data.

544 For commentary, see 'Confidential: computers, records and the right to privacy' (NCCL); Savage, N and Edwards, C, A Guide to the Data Protection Act, 1985, Blackstone.

545 These definitions were found in ss 4 and 5 of the Act.

Section 21 provided that if the data user was asked by the data subject whether personal data was held on her or him, that information had to be given and the data subject had to be allowed access to such data. Schedule 1 also provided that if the data was found to be inaccurate, the data subject could have it corrected or erased. If the data user did not comply, the subject could apply to court under s 24 for an order erasing or rectifying the data. Under s 22, compensation could be awarded if loss or damage had resulted from inaccurate data. However, compensation was available only if the data user compiled the inaccurate information, not if the data user compiled inaccurate material supplied by a malicious or careless third party. No compensation was available for circulating the inaccurate data; nor could the data subject know the third party's name.

A number of aspects of the 1984 Act attracted criticism, especially the wide subject access exemptions which included information relating to crime, national security, and a person's physical or mental health. A broad interpretation tended to be given to these exemptions; thus, the results of the lack of protection for privacy were unchecked in those categories. Moreover, there was still the possibility of transferring data to manual files and as provisions relating to manual files were narrow in scope, especially those under the Access to Personal Files Act 1987, it appeared to be the case that the manual file did not fall within any of the provisions affording access. The transfer of data from a registered data user such as the Department of Employment to an unregistered user, such as the security services, remained secret, and national security was exempt from the principle that data users could not allow data to be used for a purpose other than the original one.

Further, the budgetary restraint on the Data Protection Registry made it impossible to keep a check on all data users. In any event, it was considered relatively straightforward to devise an information retrieval system which only provided an incomplete copy of an individual's record. In such an instance, it appeared probable that no action for breach of the Act was likely to follow due to the inability of the Data Registrar Officer to check up on what had occurred. It would have taken a specialist a long time to work out what had happened, and, given the constraints on the Data Registrar, that time was unlikely to be available. Thus, it may be said that the Act was certainly a step in the direction of control over personal information, but it contained many loop-holes.

The Computer Misuse Act 1990

Unauthorised access to information electronically held falls within the Computer Misuse Act 1990[546] which criminalises such conduct whether or not the 'hacker' has a sinister purpose. It may be wondered why it should be an offence to access files held on an office computer, but not files held in the filing cabinet. One answer is that hacking presents a more widespread and pernicious danger: it is possible to access the files from a different part of the country – there is no need for the would-be hacker to break into the office, as in the case of the unauthorised seeker of information in manual files. Thus, the possibility that persons may gain unauthorised access to personal information may now be diminished, although use of the 1990 Act in practice has proved problematic.[547] Together, the 1984 and 1990 Acts formed a code which, until the inception of the 1998 Act, provided a relatively comprehensive protection for privacy in relation to computerised files containing personal information, when compared with that available in respect of manually held files.

546 For comment, see 'The Computer Misuse Act 1990' (1990) 140 NLJ 1117.

Protection for manually held personal information prior to the inception of the DPA 1998

In the wake of the DPA 1984, access rights to manual files were gradually extended under the influence of the Campaign for Freedom of Information, although without government support. The measures that were introduced were of limited effect, as indicated below, and provided inadequate and piecemeal protection.

The Access to Personal Files Bill was put forward as a Private Members' Bill and would have allowed access to a wide range of personal information. However, the government forced its proponents to accept an eviscerated Bill covering only housing and social security files. Thus, the Bill was restricted to local government because central government was resistant to any measure allowing individuals access to personal files. The Bill became the Access to Personal Files Act 1987. It allowed access to 'accessible information' and therefore provided for the rectification of errors. However, it was acknowledged in the passage of the Bill that there was nothing to prevent the keeping of a secret file behind the accessible file. Moreover, the Act did not have retrospective effect; thus, it did not apply to information collected before it came into effect. It was eventually repealed under the DPA 1998.

The findings of the European Court of Human Rights in the Gaskin case[548] illustrated the inadequacy of the available measures. Graham Gaskin wanted to gain access to the personal files on his childhood in care kept by Liverpool City Council because he wanted to sue the council in negligence. He sought to invoke Art 8 and also Art 10. However, the files did not fall under the DPA 1984 since they were manually held; nor did they fall within the Access to Personal Files Act 1987 because they were collected before it came into force. The first question to be determined under Art 8 was whether it could apply to such a situation since it was considered that the essential object of Art 8 is to protect the individual from arbitrary interference by the authorities. However, the court found that there could also be a positive obligation on the authorities to act in certain situations. Here, the information consisted of the only coherent record of the whole of Gaskin's early childhood. It was therefore found that prima facie an obligation to protect privacy arose, because individuals should not be obstructed by the authorities from obtaining information so closely bound up with their identity as human beings. Thus, a positive obligation could arise although it was thought that Art 8 would not normally import such an obligation.

547 See Charlesworth, A, 'Between flesh and sand: rethinking the Computer Misuse Act 1990' (1995) 9 International Yearbook of Law, Computers and Technology 33.

548 Gaskin v UK (1990) 12 EHRR 36.

The Court then considered whether the exception under Art 8(2) in respect of the rights of others could apply. On the one hand, there was the need to demonstrate respect for Gaskin's privacy; on the other, the contributors of the information wanted it kept confidential. It was found that the two interests should be weighed against each other by invoking the principle of proportionality. However, the local authority had not put in place any means of independently weighing the two values; thus the preference would automatically be given to the interest in maintaining confidence. Therefore, the principle of proportionality was offended and a breach of Art 8 was found. Gaskin was awarded damages on the basis of the distress he had suffered. No breach of Art 10 was found. It was determined that the right to receive information protected by Art 10 meant that the government should not interfere if a willing speaker wished to impart information, but that there was no positive obligation on the government to impart it.

The government complied with this ruling by introducing the Access to Personal Files (Social Services) Regulations 1989, as amended,[549] which provided that social services departments must give personal information to individuals unless the contributor of the information could be identified and he or she did not consent to the access. Certain personal health information was also exempted. Thus, local authorities had to weigh against each other the two values considered by the Court of Human Rights. The Regulations were also eventually repealed by the DPA 1998. One further possible result of the Gaskin case was likely to be that test cases would be encouraged in relation to central government files if they were not covered by the DPA 1998 (see below).

A method of obtaining access to medical information relating to oneself arises under the Medical Reports Act 1988[550] which also started life as a Private Members' Bill. It provides for limited circumstances in which a person can obtain access to personal medical information: if an insurance company or prospective insurer asks for a medical report for employment purposes, the individual in question can see it beforehand to read it and check it for errors. An example was given in Parliamentary debate on the Bill of a woman who had had mistakenly included in her medical record a sheet from another record indicating that she was dying of cancer. She was refused insurance and would never have been able to obtain insurance since she had no chance of putting the mistake right. Similarly, a misdiagnosis might remain on a medical record and never be corrected. These possibilities are of particular significance because a medical record contains information on a person's sexual habits and family circumstances; it does not merely contain purely medical information.

The Act, however, creates only a limited right of access; it does not mean that a person has a general right of access to all his or her medical files. There is a view in the medical profession that patients who do not have medical knowledge will not be able to place medical notes in their context, and moreover that knowing of certain conditions may exacerbate their illness since they may worry and therefore come under greater stress. Concerns may also be raised that a general right of access might increase the likelihood of a negligence action; clearly such an action might fail, but they do not welcome the waste of time and energy which fighting an action, even successfully, would entail. The darker side to this argument is, of course, that lack of access rights might preclude a legitimate negligence action: in some instances a patient might never realise that a mistake had been made.

549 SI 1989/206, as amended by SI 1991/1587.

550 See also the Access to Health Records (Control of Access) Regulations 1993 (SI 1993/746).

The Access to Health Records Act 1990,[551] took the principle of access in this area much further.[552] Since the introduction of the DPA 1984, patients had been entitled to have access to their computerised health records, but the 1990 Act was intended to provide an equivalent right of access to information recorded in manually held health records. The access to health records allows people to examine exactly what has been recorded about them – thus satisfying personal curiosity – but, more importantly, it will allow for mistakes to be noted and rectified. The emphasis of the Act is on an individual's control of personal and private information. However, several exceptions curb the actual scope of the access. First, as in the Access to Personal Files Act, no pre-commencement material must be shown, unless it is necessary for a full understanding of something which has been shown. It is clear that no right of access to pre-commencement material arises at common law.[553] Second, if the holder of the information – the doctor – considers that disclosure of information would result in serious physical or mental harm to the patient, access can be denied. Third, patients need not be told when information is being withheld. Although the 1990 Act is a move in the direction of enabling individuals to enjoy a degree of control over personal medical information and should ensure higher standards of accuracy and objectivity on the part of doctors and other record holders, it remains the case that patients whose documents are held as computerised records enjoy greater legal protection.

In general, the anomalous situation whereby an individual had greater access to and control over his or her personal information held in computerised as opposed to manual files changed once the DPA 1998 was fully in force.

The Data Protection Act 1998[554]

The DPA 1998 was passed in response to the European Data Protection Directive on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and the free movement of such data.[555] The aim of the Directive was to ensure that the same level of data protection was established in all member states in order to facilitate the transfer of personal data across national boundaries within the European Union. The DPA 1998[556] creates a far more comprehensive protection for personal information 551 It came into force on 1 November 1991.

552 See 'Access to health records' (1990) 140 NLJ 1382.

553 Mid-Glamorgan Family Health Services and Another ex p Martin (1993) The Times, 2 June.

554 For a basic guide, see Carey, P, The Data Protection Act 1998, 1998, Blackstone; for early discussion of the impact of the Act on the media, see Tugendhat, M, 'The Data Protection Act 1998 and the Media' [2000] YBMCL 115; Rasaiah, S and Newell, D, 'Data protection and press freedom' [1997–98] YBMEL 209.

555 Directive 95/46/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 24 October 1995 (1995) OJ L281/31, mainly Art 6. Recital 10 reads: 'Whereas the object of the national laws on the processing of personal data is to protect fundamental rights and freedoms, notably the right to privacy, which is recognised both in Article 8 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms and in the general principles of Community law . . .'

556 Certain sections came into force on the date of the passing of the statute – 16 June 1998. Most of the provisions came into force in 1999. As indicated below, certain provisions came into force after the first transitional period, ending on 24 October 2001; further provisions are about to come into force than has ever previously been available. The 1998 Act is based on the 1984 Act but it is far more extensive; in particular, unlike its predecessor, it covers both manual and computerised files. This follows from s 1(1), which defines data as information processed by equipment operating automatically or recorded with the intention that it should be processed by means of such equipment or recorded as part of a relevant filing system or which forms part of an accessible record. The most significant part of this definition refers to data recorded as part of 'a relevant filing system'. Such a system is defined in s 1(1) as any set of information relating to individuals that is structured by reference to individuals or by reference to criteria relating to individuals 'in such a way that specific information relating to individuals is readily accessible'. This definition is clearly imprecise, but it seems that most, if not all, structured filing systems relating to paper-based materials containing personal information will be covered. Thus 'data' is caught by the Act either if it is held on any electronic storage system, typically a computer, or if it forms part of a filing system.[557]

The Act protects against the wrongful processing of 'personal data'. 'Personal data' means 'data which relate to a living individual who can be identified (a) either from those data', or (b) 'from those data and other information which is in the possession of, or is likely to come into the possession of, the data controller.' Any data relating to a living person is termed 'personal data'.[558] Personal data covers expressions of opinions about an individual, but now also covers indications of intentions in relation to that individual. This would include, for example, the intentions of a personnel manager regarding the promotion or demotion of an employee. Photographs of an individual clearly fall within the Act. The Court of Appeal's decision in Durant v Financial Services Authority[559] narrowed the prima facie meaning of these terms to an extent. It was held that the interpretation of personal data should be guided by the principle of respect for privacy. It means: 'information that affects his privacy, whether in his personal or family life, business or professional capacity'. Thus it was held that, to be personal, data about an individual must go beyond:

> the recording of the putative data subject's involvement in a matter or an event that has no personal connotations . . . The information should have the putative data subject as its focus rather than some other person with whom he may have been involved or some transaction or event in which he may have figured or have had an interest.[560]

after the end of the second transitional period, ending on 24 October 2007. Transitional provisions under Sched 14 provide for the transition from the regime of the 1984 Act to that of the 1998 Act while transitional relief from the full rigour of the Act is provided in Sched 8. Schedule 16 repeals the whole of the 1984 Act.

557 Under s 1(1) DPA: 'data' means information which –

(a) is being processed by means of equipment operating automatically in response to instructions given for that purpose,
(b) is recorded with the intention that it should be processed by means of such equipment,
(c) is recorded as part of a relevant filing system or with the intention that it should form part of a relevant filing system . . . .

558 The definition of 'personal data' is found in s 1(1) of the Act.

559 [2003] EWCA Civ 1746; [2004] FSR 28.

560 Ibid, at para 28.

Especially intimate private information is classified as ‘sensitive personal data’; this covers a person’s sexual life, along with matters such as a person’s religious and political opinions, and his or her physical and mental health (s 2). It also includes some other, more wide-ranging categories of information, including information relating the racial or ethnic origin of the data subject, his or her political opinions, membership of a trade union and information relating to the commission by the individual of any offence and any proceedings relating to that offence.[561]

Under the law of confidence, as discussed above, and under the American private facts tort, once it can be determined that information is in the public domain, through, for example, previous media attention or other participation in a public process, such as a trial, an individual is no longer able to protect it through legal action. This is confirmed by s 12(4)(a)(i) of the HRA under which courts must have regard to the extent to which the material has, or is about to, become available to the public. As indicated, the courts are reluctant, under the new privacy liability, to find that information is unprotected as already in the public domain. The public domain issue is addressed only in a very limited fashion by the DPA, in Sched 3, para 5, which provides that one of the conditions for the processing of sensitive personal data is that the data subject has deliberately placed the information in the public domain. This stance is not far from the one the courts are reaching under the new privacy doctrine.

The following discussion is not intended as a comprehensive guide to the 1998 Act, something that would be out of place in a book of this nature. Instead, it will focus on certain specific privacy issues, and especially on their relationship with freedom of expression.

The Data Principles

The Data Principles, contained in Sched 1 of the Act, form its central core. The rest of the Act elaborates on the system for ensuring that these principles are adhered to. Subject to the exemptions, all personal data must be processed in accordance with the Data Protection Principles. The principles set out a number of fundamental privacy rights which encapsulate the value of informational autonomy. They accept that personal information must be stored and used by others, but surround such use by safeguards intended to preserve informational autonomy so far as possible, consistent with such acceptance.

Part II of Sched 1 deals with interpretation of the principles and makes the following provision in relation to the first principle:

> 1 (1) In determining for the purposes of the first principle whether personal data are processed fairly, regard is to be had to the method by which they are obtained, including in particular whether any person from whom they are obtained is deceived or misled as to the purpose or purposes for which they are to be processed.’

561 Under s 2, the definition includes: ‘(g) the commission or alleged commission by him of any offence, or (h) any proceedings for any offence committed or alleged to have been committed by him, the disposal of such proceedings or the sentence of any court in such proceedings.’

The most important of the Principles is Data Principle 1 which states that personal data must be processed fairly and lawfully and shall only be processed if at least one of the conditions in Sched 2 is met. The conditions include the requirement that the data subject has given consent to the processing, or it is necessary for the administration of justice or for the exercise of statutory functions, of functions of a Minister or government department or for the exercise of other functions of a public nature exercised in the public interest, or for the purposes of legitimate interests pursued by the controller or a third party, except where the processing is unwarranted by reason of prejudice to the legitimate rights or freedoms of the subject. Thus, in the case of all data, one of the conditions in Sched 2 must be met while in the case of sensitive personal data, one of the conditions in Sched 3 must also be met.

Thus the processing of 'sensitive personal data' attracts a higher level of safeguards than normal data under Data Principle 1(b) (Sched 1), as elucidated by Sched 3. The conditions include the requirement that the data subject has given her explicit consent to the processing, or the information has deliberately been made public by the subject, or it is necessary for medical purposes, or for the administration of justice, or for the exercise of statutory functions, of functions of a Minister or government department, or for the purposes of legitimate interests pursued by certain non-profit-making bodies.

Data Principle 2 provides that the data may be obtained only for one or more specified purposes and shall not be processed in any manner incompatible with that purpose. Under Data Principles 4 and 5, data must be accurate and, where necessary, kept up to date; when it is kept for a specific purpose, it must not be kept for longer than is necessary for that purpose. Also, data must be processed in accordance with the rights of data subjects under Data Principle 6, and under Data Principle 7 it must be adequately protected; appropriate security measures must be taken.

A number of subject exemptions, however, allow certain activities to be exempted from a number of the new provisions. The Data Principles and most of the key provisions of the Act do not apply where the exemption is required for the purpose of safeguarding national security. Thus, the security and intelligence services are exempt. Data related to the prevention and detection of crime are exempt from the first Data Principle and the subject access provisions in s 7. As indicated below, there is a special exemption for journalistic purposes; where the media exemption operates, the media will be exempt from a number of the provisions, including all the Data Principles, except the seventh.

Obligations of data controllers

Any person using a computerised system in order to store data relating to people is now designated the 'data controller' (s 1(1)), while the person who is the subject of the data remains the 'data subject'. However, the processing of personal data no longer requires the performance of operations by reference to a data subject (s 1(1)). Under s 17, the data controller must register with the Data Protection Registrar, now renamed the Data Protection Commissioner. The data controller must notify the holding of data to the Commissioner under s 17(1), who will then make an entry in the register maintained under s 19 unless, under s 17(3), processing is unlikely to prejudice the rights or freedoms of data subjects or unless, under s 23(1), the data controller has an approved in-house supervision scheme. However, the Act requires compliance with the Data Principles and therefore such compliance is not dependent on the registration of the data holder .

Section 7 provides that if the data controller is asked by the data subject in writing whether personal data is being processed by or on behalf of the data controller, that information must be given within 40 days. If such data is being processed, the data subject is entitled to a description of the data, of the purposes for which it is being processed and of the recipients to whom it may be disclosed. Also, the data subject is entitled to have the data communicated to her and any information available to the controller as to the source of the data, in a form which is capable of being understood. Under Sched 1, Part II in relation to the fourth principle it is provided that if the data is found to be inaccurate, the data subject can notify the controller of the fact, which should then be indicated in the data. If it is so indicated, the fourth principle is not contravened. If a court is satisfied on the application of a data subject that personal data of which the applicant is the subject is inaccurate the court under s 14 can make an order erasing, blocking, destroying or rectifying the data.

Under s 10, the data subject has a new right, enforceable by court order, to prevent the processing of data likely to cause substantial damage or distress, if that damage or distress is or would be unwarranted.

Impact of the DPA on the media

The media are regarded as data controllers under the DPA 1998 and this is a very significant matter, since personal information stored manually is covered. The Act covers the 'processing' of data, which is defined extremely widely; of particular significance for the media is the fact that the definition covers both the obtaining and the publishing of data.[562] The 'data' controller – the person who has responsibilities under the Act, is the person[563] who controls the manner in which and the purposes for which the data is processed. In relation to newspapers, this will generally be the editor or editorial board.

In so far as the DPA offers remedies that can affect media freedom, s 12 HRA is relevant, whether the body against which relief is sought is a private body or a public authority under the HRA.[564] The 1998 Act has very significant implications for the media[565] and, on its face, it appears that in certain respects it has, in effect, favoured the protection of Art 8 over Art 10 rights. However, any tension therefore created between the DPA 1998 and the HRA is resolvable, as discussed below.

562 'Processing', in relation to information or data, means obtaining, recording or holding the information or data or carrying out any operation or set of operations on the information or data, including-

(a) organisation, adaptation or alteration of the information or data,
(b) retrieval, consultation or use of the information or data,
(c) disclosure of the information or data by transmission, dissemination or otherwise making available, or
(d) alignment, combination, blocking, erasure or destruction of the information or data; 'using' or 'disclosing', in relation to personal data, includes using or disclosing the information contained in the data.

563 Either alone or in company with others.

564 Since s 12 is not limited in its application to public authorities; see above p 905.

565 See further Tugendhat, M, 'The Data Protection Act 1998 and the Media' [2000] YBMCL 115; Rasiah and Newell, 'Data protection and press freedom' [1997–98] YBMEL 209.

Conditions

A key question in relation to the First Data Protection Principle is, as indicated above, that of consent, since data cannot be processed unless one of the conditions in Sched 2, in relation to all personal data, or Sched 3, in relation to sensitive personal data, is met. The obvious condition which would apply in relation to journalism would be that consent had been obtained, since in most circumstances it is unlikely that one of the other conditions could be met. But consent by the data subject would rarely be present in a privacy case. Schedule 3 refers to explicit consent. Thus, in relation to non-sensitive personal data, implied consent is sufficient. In relation to sensitive data, it is sufficient if the information has deliberately been made public by the subject. The Act does not explain what is meant by consent.

It could be claimed, as it has been successfully under the American private facts tort, that the plaintiff has sought publicity in the past and therefore has impliedly consented to a current publication of data to which he or she now objects. English judges in breach of confidence cases have in the past shown some receptivity to this claim, as discussed above, although there has often been a tendency to conflate it with the different claim that the plaintiff's private information has lost its quality of confidentiality. For example, in Woodward v Hutchins,[566] the Court of Appeal denied the plaintiffs (pop singers) an injunction against a former employee in respect of a series of newspaper articles giving detailed accounts of the singers' private lives. Bridge LJ reasoned that:

> those who seek and welcome publicity of every kind bearing upon their private lives so long as it shows them in a favourable light are in no position to complain of an invasion of their privacy by publicity which shows them in an unfavourable light.[567]

A similar approach was taken in Lennon v News Group Newspapers[568] in which one party to a marriage was denied relief in respect of personal information concerning the relationship on the grounds that both had sought publicity about it on previous occasions.

The proper approach to the question of consent under the DPA is to align it with that discussed above under the new privacy doctrine. It should be asked therefore whether the plaintiff has in fact robbed the information disclosed of its private quality through prior, voluntary publicity of the information in question or related information. It is essential that this test is applied in a nuanced fashion, basing it on the core privacy value of informational autonomy.[569] The notion of 'consent', then, should be used only

566 [1977] WLR 760.

567 Ibid, p 765. The decision is not clearly reasoned; Lord Denning also found (p 763): 'There is no doubt whatever that this pop group sought publicity . . . [relating to] their private lives also.' But this finding may also have been directed towards the idea that, having sought publicity themselves, they had effectively placed their private lives in the public domain; the decision also seems to have motivated by the idea that it was in the public interest to correct the false favourable impression that early publicity had given (ibid, p 764).

568 [1978] FSR 573.

569 Prosser suggests that consent is only impliedly given 'if the plaintiff has industriously sought publicity of the same kind' (Prosser, D, 'Privacy' (1960) 48 Calif L Rev 383, p 396, pp 420–21).

where there is an arguable claim of actual consent to the publication in question, express in respect of sensitive personal data or implied in respect of personal data. In relation to non-sensitive personal data, it is clear that implied consent is sufficient.

The only other condition that could be fulfilled by a media body is that the processing is necessary for the purposes of legitimate interests pursued by the data controller, or by the third party or parties to whom the data are disclosed, except where the processing is unwarranted in any particular case by reason of prejudice to the rights and freedoms or legitimate interests of the data subject. While this provision is imprecise, it would appear, in the context of press publication, to require the Court to examine, in the light of Arts 8 and 10, whether it was 'necessary' to publish the complained of data for the purposes of exercising the Art 10 right to freedom of expression. Thus, it might be relied upon by the press generally to argue that the data had been gathered and published in order to carry out the press's legitimate role as watchdog.[570] However it will not assist a newspaper which had obtained information surreptitiously, as will often be the case in privacy cases, and which therefore cannot claim to have obtained it 'fairly'. The Act, however, gives the media quite generous conditional exemptions from many of its provisions, and protection from the possibility of interim injunctions to restrain publication. Where data is processed for the 'special purpose' of journalism[571] under s 32(1) and (2), the key protective provisions (including Data Principles 1 and 2 and s 10) do not apply at all if the processing is undertaken with a view to publication, the data controller reasonably believes that, having regard to the special importance of the public interest in freedom of expression, publication is in the public interest, and compliance with the protective principles is incompatible with journalistic activity.[572] In considering the belief of the data controller that publication is in the public interest, regard may be had under s 32(3) to his compliance with any relevant code of practice that has been designated by the Secretary of State for the purposes of the sub-section. Journalists are not exempt from Data Principle 7, which in essence requires that care must be taken of the personal data, but this provision alone does not provide a significant protection for privacy.

Media exemptions

Although the Act gives an individual the right to apply to the Court for an order that a journalist, as a data controller, cease processing information about him which is causing or is likely to cause substantial, unwarranted distress (s 10), the mere claim that the processing is for the purposes of journalism with a view to publication stays the proceedings and the case is referred to the Data Commissioner for a determination on the point (s 32(4)). Thus, interim injunctions to prevent unfair processing by the press – a critical remedy in privacy cases – are not available. Even if a journalist was found to have breached the Act due to a failure to take such care, no interim injunction could be granted – under s 32. Where the exemption applies, it may be said then that the DPA 1998 probably has only a marginal impact on non-consensual media use of 570 This was not, however, accepted in Campbell.

571 Section 3.
572 For further discussion, see Carey, P, The Data Protection Act 1998, 1998, pp 196–98.

personal information. The remedies under the Act, discussed below, for breach of the Data Protection principles include a right to compensation[573] and a right to prevent processing likely to cause damage or distress.[574] However, there is a specific exemption designed to benefit the media in s 32 of the Act. In essence, it both prevents the media from being subject to interim injunctions preventing the publication of personal data[575] and allows them to be exempted from the Data Protection Principles[576] if the media body in question was acting for journalistic purposes and the data controller reasonably believed publication to be in the public interest and that he could not comply with the provisions of the Act, given the journalistic purposes he was carrying out. This provision has been held, controversially, to apply both before and after publication,[577] so that it provides a comprehensive media defence.

The right under s 10 to demand that the data controller ceases processing and the right if they do not to seek a remedy in court is unlikely, in any event, to bite against the media since the data subject must first notify the data controller to require that she cease processing, and the controller has 21 days to reply stating the action she intends to take. In the case of the media it seems probable that if publication of the personal data is intended, the media body in question would publish it, if possible, within the 21-day period.

However, these protections for the media do have limits. If data is being processed for the special purposes without a view to publication – which could be the case if it has already been published – the exemption does not apply. Equally, it does not apply to unpublished personal information if no reasonable belief could be demonstrated that publication of the information would be in the public interest. Clearly, there would also be cases where it was uncertain whether that belief could be demonstrated. Thus, journalists would be subject to the requirements of the Act in certain circumstances.

Use of the DPA against the media

Thus the DPA gives the public broad rights against the publication of sensitive personal data without consent by the media, and against the publication of any unfairly obtained personal data, subject however to a broad defence of public interest. Phillipson has observed that the DPA may provide one of the few ways that English law can provide a remedy for the publication of photographs of daily life activities that might not attract the protection of the law of confidence,[578] although, taking account of the expansive interpretation of Von Hannover in McKennitt, it now appears that they might be covered.

573 Section 13: it applies either where the individual suffers damage as a result of unlawful processing under the Act or suffers distress and the processing is done for the purposes of (inter alia) journalism.

574 Under s 10.

575 See s 32(4)–(5), under which the Court must stay any proceedings under the DPA relating to the publication of hitherto unpublished material, including proceedings under section 10(4) (obtaining an order preventing processing – i.e. an injunction) if the data is being processed for journalistic purposes with a view to publishing it.

576 Except for Principle 7, which, however, merely provides that the data controller shall take appropriate measures against accidental loss of or damage to data or unauthorised processing of it.

577 See the finding of the Court of Appeal in Campbell: op. cit. at paras 129–31.

578 Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act, at 767–68. See also above at p 893, for Baroness Hale's comments on the point in Campbell.

The DPA has not, however, proved popular with litigants, probably largely because interim injunctions cannot be obtained under it against the media. It was pleaded in Campbell, but it was virtually ignored in the House of Lords findings. The DPA was relied upon by Naomi Campbell alongside breach of confidence in her case against Mirror Group Newspapers,[579] discussed above, after the Mirror had published details of her treatment for drug addiction with Narcotics Anonymous, including surreptitiously taken photographs.[580] The case confirmed the application of the Act to the media. At first instance it was found:

> Under s 1(1), the claimant was termed a 'data subject', the information, including the details and photographs, that the claimant was receiving therapy at Narcotics Anonymous was 'personal data', the defendant was the 'data controller', the obtaining, preparation and publication of the claimant's personal data was 'processing'.[581]

These findings were not questioned on appeal; the Court of Appeal in fact specifically confirmed that the publication of hard copies of newspaper does fall within the definition of processing of data.[582] In relation to the media, it was found in Campbell at first instance, that the obtaining of information by surreptitious photography was unfair, and that if information is obtained in breach of confidence, it will not be obtained 'lawfully'.[583] Campbell demonstrated that the position of the media in relation to sensitive personal data, is particularly difficult. Under Sched 3, the media body has to show that the data subject has given 'explicit consent' to the processing or the data was deliberately 'made public' by the subject. Otherwise the media body must bring itself within the conditions set out in the Data Protection (Processing of Sensitive Personal Data) Order 2000, which essentially requires a very weighty 'public interest defence' involving the revelation of criminality, dishonesty, malpractice or mismanagement.[584] It would clearly be very difficult to make out such a defence in a normal case concerning the revelation of private facts; it was not made out in Campbell.[585] It is clear from Campbell that the DPA claim will normally stand or fall with the privacy claim.

579 The first instance decision: Campbell v MGN [2002] EMLR 30 (QB).
580 [2004] 2 AC 457.
581 [2002] EMLR 30, at para 85.
582 [2003] QB 633, at para 107.
583 [2002] EMLR 30, at paras 108–110.
584 The only circumstances which could normally apply to journalism under Sched 3 are:
3(1) the disclosure of personal data –

(a) is in the substantial public interest;
(b) is in connection with –

(i) the commission by any person of any unlawful act (whether alleged or established),
(ii) dishonesty, malpractice, or other seriously improper conduct by, or the unfitness or incompetence of, any person (whether alleged or established), or
(iii) mismanagement in the administration of, or failures in services provided by, any body or association (whether alleged or established);

(c) is for the special purposes [of, inter alia, journalism] as defined in section 3 of the Act; and
(d) is made with a view to the publication of those data by any person and the data controller reasonably believes that such publication would be in the public interest.'

585 As the Court of Appeal confirmed: op. cit., fn 582, above at paras 88–89.

It is concluded, therefore, that the 1998 Act does have an impact on the media[586] since, except in a narrow range of instances, they are not exempt from the requirement to obtain consent where one or more of the conditions set out in s 32 do not apply. Although, from the point of view of protecting privacy, it may be argued that this is a welcome development, it may be suggested that the Act does not properly hold the balance between Arts 10 and 8. If so, since s 3 HRA applies, the courts have to consider the scope within the Act for creating a fairer balance in accordance with the demands of both those Articles. For example, s 10 speaks of unwarranted disclosures, a terminology which creates leeway for arguments based on Art 10. Although publication or processing in the public interest is not a general defence under the Act there is, as indicated, scope for interpreting what is meant by the public interest in s 32 in order to create such a balance, a matter that is considered further below.[587] Once the stage of considering the balancing act between Arts 8 and 10 is reached, it should be conducted as for the privacy claim.

Enforcement

The enforcement mechanisms allow for the enforcement of privacy rights against a range of bodies, including private ones, thus affording greater respect for Art 8 rights than is afforded under the HRA, since under it only public authorities are directly bound. The Act creates a number of offences in relation to data processing and the Act's requirements. In particular, it is a criminal offence for an unregistered person or body to store personal data under s 21(1).

Under s 13, compensation can be awarded if damage has resulted from the contravention by a data controller of any of the requirements of the Act, including the requirement to rectify, destroy, block or erase inaccurate data. However, it is a defence for the controller to prove that he had taken such care as is reasonable in the circumstances to comply with the requirement.

The rights granted under the Act are largely enforceable by the Data Protection Commissioner. Importantly, the Commissioner has security of tenure, being dismissible only by the Crown following an address by both Houses of Parliament. Under s 47, a failure to comply with a ruling of the Commissioner is a criminal offence. But the Commissioner can only make such a ruling after serving an enforcement notice under s 40 and such a notice may only be served if one or more of the Data Principles has been breached. The enforcement mechanism under the 1998 Act is based on the serving of notices on data controllers. If a person thinks that data of which she is the subject is being processed in contravention of the Act she can apply to the Commissioner for an assessment as to whether this is the case (s 42). The Commissioner can serve an information notice under s 43 on a data controller requiring the controller to furnish information to her within certain time limits.

Where the Commissioner is satisfied that a controller is contravening the Act, she may ultimately force the controller to act by serving upon it an enforcement notice, which (under s 40(1)) requires the controller to take, within such time as may be specified in the notice, such steps as may be specified for complying with the requirements of the Act. The notice may either ask the controller to rectify, block, erase or destroy any inaccurate data or data containing an expression of opinion or take steps to check the accuracy of the data. If a controller fails to comply with an enforcement or information notice, it will commit a criminal offence.

586 See, for further discussion of the impact of the Act on the media, Tugendhat, 'The Data Protection Act 1998 and the media' [2000] YBMCL 115.

587 See pp 937 et seq.

Under s 48, an appeal lies from decisions of the Commissioner to the Tribunal which is made up of experienced lawyers and 'persons to represent the interests' of data subjects under (s 6(6)). This power of appeal is exercisable upon the broadest possible grounds. The Act provides that any person may appeal to the tribunal against an enforcement or information notice (s 48) either on the basis that the notice is not in accordance with the law, or that the Commissioner ought to have exercised her discretion (if any) differently' (s 49). The Tribunal is also empowered to substitute such other notice as could have been served by the Commissioner. There is a further appeal from the Tribunal to the High Court, but on a 'point of law' only (s 49(6)). In practice, this will probably be interpreted so as to allow review of the Tribunal's decisions, not just for error of law, but also on the other accepted heads of judicial review.

Thus, the Commissioner's decisions can, in the final analysis, be enforced, just as can orders of the Court. These powers are buttressed by powers of entry, search and seizure to gain evidence of a failure by the authority to carry out its obligations under the Act or of the commission of a criminal offence under the Act (detailed in Sched 9).

Relationship between the HRA and DPA

The DPA 1998 is precisely aimed, inter alia, at the preservation of informational autonomy in a very broad sense, going far beyond the obligations created by the HRA, under Art 8, which is directly applicable only to public authorities. The provisions of the 1998 Act must of course be interpreted compatibly with the Convention rights, including those under Arts 8 and 10, under s 3 of the HRA. But as Chapter 4 explained, s 3 is only an interpretative obligation, not a means of binding persons to abide by the rights. Thus, the 1998 Act is of immense significance as a privacy measure which reaches fully into the private sphere. In so far as they are reflected in the 1998 Act, the rights under Art 8 also bind private bodies.

A number of the bodies processing data are public authorities and therefore will be bound to observe the Convention rights in relation to such processing, under s 6 of the HRA. The bodies charged with the enforcement of the 1998 Act are also public authorities, and therefore must abide by the Convention rights in relation to any adjudications. Since the 1998 Act implements an EU Directive, the obligation to take the Convention into account in relation to processing of data, and adjudications relating to such processing, stems not only from s 3 but from the reliance on the Convention as a source of principles informing EU legislation.[588] This could be a matter of significance, as articles of the Convention, in particular Art 13, that have not been received into domestic law under the HRA, Sched 1, should be considered. Further, EU law can override domestic law and it has a greater impact than the HRA due to the possibility of bringing a Francovich action.[589] The Directive could override incompatible primary legislation; if it has been inadequately implemented, an action could be brought directly against the state, thereby extending the impact of the privacy rights it encompasses, which should reflect Art 8 principles. The 1998 Act therefore reflects an acceptance of the value and significance of privacy interests which was not previously present in domestic law. It also arguably affords those interests priority – in certain respects – over free expression interests – a priority which is further reinforced by the complex relationship between the HRA and other domestic provisions and between the HRA and EU law.

588 See Chapter 3, pp 138–40.

The Data Protection Commissioner and Tribunal operating under s 6 of the DPA 1998 are public authorities and therefore they are directly bound, under s 6 of the HRA, by the Convention rights. Both bodies are consequently subject to judicial review for violation of the Convention in their rulings. Because under s 47 a failure to comply with a ruling of the Commissioner is a criminal offence, a significant possibility of enforcing Art 8 rights might appear to arise.

The exemptions under the Act are broad; where they apply to bodies that are public authorities under s 6 of the HRA, Art 8 could be relied upon to seek to prevent the unfair processing of data where an infringement of its guarantee had occurred or appeared likely to occur. This is a matter that is considered further in Chapter 10, but it may be noted here that Art 8 clearly views the processing of personal data as prima facie falling within para 1.[590]

8 Balancing speech and privacy claims under the HRA

Introduction

This chapter has set out to demonstrate that far more protection for privacy is available in UK law now than ever before. It is no longer possible for the press to treat privacy merely as a commodity that can be used to sell newspapers. But along with enhanced protection for privacy, it is necessary to seek to ensure that media freedom is preserved, in the sense that speech of genuine public interest is not suppressed. Since two Convention rights are involved – Arts 8 and 10 – it is necessary to find a way of striking a fair balance between them.

All the privacy measures discussed above provide some mechanism allowing for a balancing of expression and privacy rights. This may be by means of some form of public interest or 'reasonableness' test. This is true, albeit to quite a limited extent, of the DPA 1998 and of the PHA 1997. The PHA leaves some leeway for taking account of Art 10, under ss 3 and 6 HRA, as discussed above, where the provisions are used against journalists. Under s 3 DPA, leeway in the data protection provisions as applied to the media can be explored, allowing consideration to be paid to Art 10, in particular the question of the public interest in s 32 and the notion of an 'unwarranted' invasion of privacy in s 10. But s 12(3) HRA, discussed below,[591] will not be applicable since, as indicated above, the DPA does not appear in most circumstances to allow for the use of injunctions against the media; it contains no general defence, although the public interest is an important factor in the media exemption under s 32. If the data controller is also a public authority it will be directly bound by the Convention rights under s 6. The Privacy Codes affecting broadcasting and the press overtly strike a balance between privacy and the public interest, and if the policing of the Codes is challenged under the HRA, a balance is again overtly struck under s 12 HRA, which, as Chapter 4 discussed,[592] provides, in s 12(4), that if restraint on freedom of expression is contemplated the Court must have regard not only to Art 10 but also to any relevant privacy code. In making determinations as to the application of Strasbourg concepts in a particular instance, a form of public interest test is arguably drawn into the equation under s 12(4)(b) since the relevant privacy codes, in particular that of the PCC, are heavily influenced by the test.

589 Francovich v Italy [1993] 2 CMLR 66 (circumstances in which national governments have a duty to compensate individuals for loss caused by failure to implement Directives and for other breaches of EC law).

590 In MS v Sweden (1997) 3 BHRC 348, the applicant complained that disclosure of her medical records in respect of a compensation claim infringed Art 8. The Court found that disclosure was an interference with private life but justified – economic wellbeing of state information relating to an individual's sexual life may merit protection, a decision clearly in harmony with the approach of Strasbourg.

Where a statute is in question the balance between Arts 8 and 10 must be struck by means of ss 3 and 6 HRA. Section 12 may also be relevant. In relation to s 6 a court must ensure in applying the statute that it strikes a proper balance between the two rights. If no statutory provision applies the court is in any event bound to strike that balance due to its own duty under s 6.

The most significant protection for privacy is provided by the new tort of misuse of private information. As indicated throughout this chapter, the notion of the public interest was pre-HRA, the key domestic mechanism allowing for the balancing of speech and privacy rights. Under the HRA, it was thought originally, as Venables[593] and Mills[594] indicated, that the balancing act would occur by reference to s 12 HRA which refers to any relevant privacy codes. Campbell now gives far more extensive guidance on the balancing act and makes it clear that it is not affected by the apparent priority given to Art 10 by s 12. Where an action for breach of Art 8 is brought directly against a media body, which is a public authority, the same balancing act occurs but is arrived at by a slightly different route. The public authority will be bound by Arts 8 and 10 under s 6 of the HRA.

In relation to all the privacy measures, then, the statutory scheme of the HRA, the Convention rights and the relevant privacy codes – usually the PCC code – provide the ground rules for determining when material should be published despite the invasion of privacy which will occur. This scheme is affected by the importation of the Strasbourg concepts of necessity and proportionality as applied under the HRA, Arts 10 and 8. The second paragraphs of Arts 8 and 10 under the HRA provide the principal mechanism by which to seek to create a balanced resolution of the two rights of privacy and speech. The privacy codes may be relevant in terms of the weight to be placed on the Art 8 side of the equation. Equally, public interest factors may go to the value to be placed on the speech. If the balancing act is to produce consistent, principled and reasonably

591 See pp 987–90.
592 See pp 212–13.
593 [2001] 1 All ER 908, Fam Div (High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division).
594 (2001) WL 720322.

foreseeable resolutions of the conflicting interests at stake, rather than amounting merely to an ad hoc exercise of judicial 'common sense', it is, it is suggested, essential that it be approached with an awareness of the values underlying both freedom of the press and privacy itself. In this section, therefore, principles are discussed which may be derived from an examination of the main free speech theories in the context of possible conflicts with privacy rights. The discussion then moves on to consider the Strasbourg jurisprudence on clashing rights, and particularly on clashes between Arts 8 and 10, before examining the way that the courts are resolving the conflict domestically. The courts have very recently developed quite a sophisticated method of resolving the conflict, relying on the Convention jurisprudence.

Free speech theories and privacy

The theory that freedom of speech is necessary for the discovery of truth, discussed in the Introduction to Part II,[595] has been a strong influence in US jurisprudence[596] but not historically at Strasbourg[597] or in the UK courts.[598] It has been persuasively argued that this rationale has little application to the paradigm privacy case, in which intimate facts about an individual are revealed. Barendt has contended that 'Mill's argument . . . applies more strongly to assertions of opinion . . . than to . . . propositions of fact'.[599] The argument is that since privacy actions attempt to prevent the publication of private facts only, and not general expressions of opinion, they will pose little threat to that free and unhindered public debate about matters of importance which Mill's argument seeks to protect. Moreover, as Schauer has argued,[600] on finding out a new fact, it may not replace a previously false belief, but merely add to what was previously 'epistemologically empty space'. Much intrusive journalism merely communicates a set of probably trivial facts about a given figure and it is very hard to maintain plausibly that the simple acquisition of such factual information has any inherent truth value. However, this is not the case in relation to some investigative journalism. For example, the revelation of the paedophile tendencies of a right wing evangelist leading a campaign against homosexual rights would contribute to various strands of public debate. Anonymity orders covering relatives of children involved in criminal proceedings may also indirectly stifle debate.

595 See pp 302–3. The most famous exposition of the 'truth' argument is to be found in Mill's On Liberty, in Cowling (ed), Selected Writings of John Stuart Mill, 1968, p 121.

596 See the famous dicta of Judge Learned Hand in United States v Associated Press (1943) 52 F Supp 362, p 372; and of Holmes J, dissenting but with the concurrence of Brandeis J, in Abrams v United States (1919) 250 US 616, p 630.

597 The repeated reference by the ECtHR to freedom of expression being one of the 'basic conditions for [society's] progress' (see, e.g., Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria (1994) 19 EHRR 34, para 49) could be seen as a reference to the justification.

598 But see R v Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Simms [1999] 3 All ER 400, p 408, per Lord Steyn.

599 Freedom of Speech, 1st edn, 1985, p 191.

600 Schauer, F, 'Reflections on the value of truth' (1991) 41 Case Western Reserve L Rev 699, p 708. His other categories are: 'one's belief may be unjustified [though possibly true]; [and] one's belief can be false.'

Similarly, the justification for speech which may be referred to as the argument from autonomy[601] arguably has minimal application in this area, and indeed the values it espouses actually point to a reasonable degree of privacy protection. The basic thesis is that matters of substantive moral choice must be left to the individual as an autonomous, rational agent (subject, of course, to his duty to respect the basic rights of others); therefore, the state offends against human dignity, or treats certain citizens with contempt, if the coercive powers of the law are used to enforce the moral convictions of some upon others by, say, banning certain kinds of pornography or extreme political discourse.[602] It is immediately apparent that much privacy-invading speech, by both directly assaulting informational autonomy and indirectly threatening the individual's freedom of choice over substantive issues,[603] far from being bolstered by the autonomy rationale, is in direct conflict with it. The state, in restricting what one citizen may be told about the private life of another, is not acting out of a paternalistic desire to impose a set of moral values thereby, but rather to assure an equal freedom to all to live by their own values.

The argument from self development – that the freedom to engage in the free expression and reception of ideas and opinions in various media is essential to human development[604] – has received some recognition at Strasbourg[605] and in the House of Lords.[606] As with the argument from autonomy, it is immediately apparent that this justification, since it seeks to facilitate human flourishing, far from inevitably opposing the right to privacy, must support it to some extent since, as argued above,[607] a reasonable degree of privacy is a requirement, not a threat, to individual self-development, particularly the human capacity to form intimate relationships, without which the capacity for individual growth would be severely curtailed.

Moreover, as Barendt has argued,[608] it is implausible to view most newspaper reporters as freely serving their own human need for self-development. The focus must therefore be on the readers of such material. Joseph Raz has proposed a theory of freedom of expression which he argues provides a reader-based justification for expression and is concerned not with 'serious' public debate, but with the type of speech which is 'often overlooked' or seen as 'trivial'.[609] He points out that much public expression in the 601 The argument has been most influentially put by writers in the revived tradition of deontological liberalism. See Chapter 1, pp 6–7.

602 The particular concern of Thomas Scanlon's influential approach set out in 'A theory of freedom of expression' (1972) 1 Phil & Pub Aff 216.

603 See pp 805–6, above.

604 See the Introduction to Part II, pp 204–5. Emerson, C, for example, argues that the right to free expression is justified as the right of the individual to realise his character and potentialities through forming his own beliefs and opinions: 'Towards a general theory of the First Amendment' (1963) 72 Yale LJ 877, pp 879–80; see also Redish, M, Freedom of Expression, 1984, pp 20–30.

605 One of the stock phrases of the European Court of Human Rights in relation the value of freedom of expression asserts that it is one of the 'essential foundations for the development of everyone' (e.g., Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria (1994) 19 EHRR 34, para 49).

606 Per Lord Steyn in R v Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Simms [2000] 2 AC 115, p 498.

607 See p 806.

608 Barendt and Hitchens, Media Law, Cases and Materials, 2000, p 68; he concedes that such arguments may have some applicability to the writers of 'fringe or underground journals'.

609 Raz, J, 'Free expression and personal identification' (1991) 11(3) OJLS 303, p 310.

media portrays and expresses aspects of forms of different lifestyles[610] which, he argues, 'validate the styles of life portrayed'. Conversely, censorship is not only an 'insult' to the persons leading the lifestyle censored – a point which sounds very like Dworkin's argument for freedom of expression based on equal respect for citizens[611] – but it also, in a more instrumental vein, denies those living the lifestyle the opportunity for reassurance, the sense that they are not alone in their lifestyles and its problems, and also the chance for the public to learn about the widest possible range of lifestyles, thus maximising their freedom of choice.[612]

Raz considers that his argument does not in general justify revelations about particular individuals, but may do so in relation to 'individuals who have become symbols of certain cultures, or ideologies, or . . . styles of life'.[613] It is clear, however, that if speech which invades the privacy of such individuals is restricted, the 'message' sent by the state thereby, far from suggesting condemnation or contempt for the lifestyle revealed, in fact displays respect for the ability of the individual to decide for himself whether he wishes to share his life-decisions with the public at large. Moreover, the reassuring knowledge that control of such information rests with the individual will surely further the core aim of the self-fulfilment justification – the ability of persons to make free choices to experience and experiment with the widest possible range of lifestyles and activities. Conversely, the inability of the individual to exercise such control would, as argued above, amount to a significant 'chilling effect' upon the willingness of individuals to make controversial choices about their personal lives. On both deontological and consequentialist arguments, then, this justification tends to support a reasonable degree of protection for informational autonomy.

As the Introduction to Part II explained, the 'self-governance' or argument from democracy is viewed as 'the most influential theory in the development of 20th century free speech law',[614] an assertion supported by examination of the approach of UK and Strasbourg judges, discussed in the Introduction to Part II. Its basic thesis is that citizens cannot participate fully in a democracy unless they have a reasonable understanding of political issues; therefore, open debate on such matters is necessary to ensure the proper working of a democracy;[615] as Lord Steyn has put it, 'freedom of speech is the lifeblood of democracy'.[616] In so far as democracy rests upon ideas both of participation and accountability, the argument from democracy may be seen to encompass also the function which a free press performs in exposing abuses of power,[617] thereby allowing for their remedy and also providing a deterrent effect for those contemplating such wrong-doing.[618]

610 Ibid: 'Views and opinions, activities, emotions etc, expressed or portrayed are an aspect of a wider net of opinions, sensibilities, habits of action or dressing, attitudes etc which taken together form a distinctive style of form of life.'

611 Dworkin, A Matter of Principle 1985, esp pp 272–74.

612 Raz, J, 'Free expression and personal identification' (1991) 11(3) OJLS 303, p 312.

613 Ibid, p 316.

614 See pp 303–5.

615 See Meiklejohn, A, 'The First Amendment is an absolute' (1961) Sup Ct Rev 245 and Political Freedom, 1960, esp pp 115–24.

616 R v Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Simms [2000] 2 AC 115, p 408.

617 See Blasi, V: 'The checking value in First Amendment theory' (1977) Am B Found Res J 521.

618 See Greenwalt, K, 'Free speech justifications' (1989) 89 Columb L Rev 119, p 143.

As has been indicated previously, it is a marked feature of the Strasbourg jurisprudence that clearly political speech receives a much more robust degree of protection than other types of expression.[619] Thus, the 'political' speech cases discussed in this book[620] all resulted in findings that Art 10 had been violated and all were marked by an intensive review of the restriction in question. In contrast, in cases involving artistic speech, supported by the values of autonomy and self-development rather than self-government, an exactly converse pattern emerges: applicants have tended to be unsuccessful and a deferential approach to the judgments of the national authorities as to its obscene or blasphemous nature has been adopted.[621] As indicated in Part II a similar pattern may be discerned in the domestic jurisprudence: the most lofty rhetorical assertions of the importance of free speech and the strongest determination to protect it have been evident in cases where journalistic material raises political issues, broadly defined.[622] In such cases, the courts have either overtly adopted the Strasbourg principles described above[623] or have strongly emphasised the high status freedom of speech holds in the common law, as 'a constitutional right'.[624] Media freedom in relation to political expression has clearly been recognised as having a particularly high value in UK law and Convention jurisprudence. In contrast, when speech supported by the arguments from self-development or autonomy rather than self-government is in question, decisions have tended to be far more cautious.[625]

Two points emerge from this discussion. Where speech is supported mainly by arguments from autonomy, truth and self-development, there will in general be little or no justification at the level of principle for allowing it to override privacy; indeed, the discussion above reveals the truth of Emerson's remark that, far from being invariably in conflict, the twin rights to freedom of speech and to privacy 'are mutually supportive, in that both are vital features of the basic system of individual rights'.[626] In more

619 See Part II, pp 309–10 above.

620 See, e.g., Jersild v Denmark (1994) 19 EHRR 1; Lingens v Austria (1986) 8 EHRR 103, discussed above, p 209.

621 See Chapter 6, pp 277–81, at which the following cases are discussed: Müller v Switzerland (1991) 13 EHRR 212; Gibson v UK, Appl No 17634 (declared inadmissible by Commission); Handyside v UK, A 24 (1976) (not a case involving artistic speech but where the issue was obscenity); Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria (1994) 19 EHRR 34; Gay News v UK (1982) 5 EHRR 123. In Wingrove v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 1, the Court remarked: 'Whereas there is little scope under Article 10(2) of the Convention for restrictions on political speech or on debate of questions of public . . . a wider margin of appreciation is generally available to the Contracting states when regulating freedom of expression in relation to matters liable to offend intimate personal convictions within the sphere of morals or, especially, religion' (para 58). See Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op. cit., fn 1, pp 397 and 414.

622 Reynolds v Times Newspapers; Derbyshire CC v Times Newspapers [1993] AC 534; R v Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Simms [2000] 2 AC 115. However, deference to widely drafted primary legislation (Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Brind [1991] 1 AC 696) or governmental arguments from national security (AG v Guardian Newspapers [1987] 1 WLR 1248) has resulted in the ready upholding of restrictions on directly political speech.

623 See the approach of the Court of Appeal in Derbyshire (ibid) and in Ex p Leech [1994] QB 198, of the House of Lords in Reynolds (ibid, pp 621–22), per Lord Nicholls, pp 628 and esp 635, per Lord Steyn, p 643, per Lord Cooke and Ex p Simms, p 407 per Lord Steyn and pp 419–20 per Lord Hobhouse.

624 Reynolds v Times Newspapers, pp 628–29 (Lord Steyn). In Ex p Simms (ibid, p 11), Lord Steyn described the right as 'fundamental', as did Lord Hoffmann (ibid, p 412).

625 Gibson [1990] 2 QB 619; Knuller v DPP [1973] AC 435; Lemon [1979] AC 617.

626 Emerson, T, 'The right of privacy and the freedom of the press' (1979) 14(2) Harvard Civil Rights – Civil Liberties L Rev 329, p 331.

practical terms, the type of speech which, as we have seen, receives the highest level of protection, namely political speech, is by its nature most unlikely to conflict with the right to privacy. In many cases it will not raise privacy issues, as where it consists of the discussion of political ideas, institutions, and policies. Where political speech does concern individuals, as where it reveals abuse of state power, the conflict is more likely to be with reputation than privacy.[627] Conversely, the paradigm cases of journalistic invasions of privacy which, by definition, involve the personal, not the public-political affairs of its subject, usually involve celebrities rather than public servants, and are driven by purely commercial considerations. Such publications simply do not engage core Art 10 values such as the furtherance of a democratic society. Thus, it will only be in a fairly narrow category of cases that any real conflict will arise – those where the publication in question relates to the personal life of a particular figure,[628] but there is a serious argument that it serves a valuable purpose in revealing a matter relevant to that person's fitness for office, or in furthering public knowledge or debate about matters of serious public concern. The remainder of this section will consider approaches to the resolution of such hard cases.

The developing Strasbourg jurisprudence on clashing rights

Save for admitting the distinction between those rights stated in absolute or near-absolute terms, such as Arts 2, 3, 4, 6 and 7 and those subject to generalised qualifications (in particular Arts 8–11), Strasbourg has never sought to establish a hierarchy of Convention rights. In this respect it is in accord with the stance in other jurisdictions, such as Germany, France and Canada which have rejected any notion of establishing an a priori ranking of rights.[629]

It is fair to say that in some extreme instances clashes can be resolved by refinements of the definition of the ambit of the right. For example, as has recently been argued, speech which 'amounts to a gross invasion of privacy . . . [is] considered [by the Commission] to have little or no informational value worth protecting (emphasis added)'.[630] But in general, as indicated below, where rights collide Strasbourg speaks of taking account of both and striking a fair balance under para 2 of the Article pleaded before the Court. While the reasoning process inevitably follows the structure demanded by the Article(s) invoked by the applicant at Strasbourg, the other Convention right is given greater weight at the stage of determining the necessity of the interference (to support that right) in a democratic society, since it is axiomatic that all the Convention rights must be afforded a high value in such a society. This contrasts with the general

627 As in the case of Reynolds v Times Newspapers [1993] AC 534, in which the former Irish Taoiseach sued newspapers which published reports accusing him of lying to the Irish Dail; see also, e.g., Lingens (1986) 8 EHRR 103 and Thorgeirson (1992) 14 EHRR 843.

628 See the conclusions of the Calcutt Report on this point (op. cit., fn 1, at paras 12.24–12.29).

629 The German Supreme Court has remarked of the right to protection of personality (including privacy) and of free expression that 'neither can claim precedence in principle over the other' (BVerfGE 35, 200). For the Canadian approach, see Hill v Church of Scientology [1995] 2 SCR 1130, 1179 and the recent decision in Les Editions Vice Versa Inc v Aubry [1999] 5 BHRC 437; for the French approach, see Picard, E, 'The Right to Privacy in French Law' in Markesinis (ed) Protecting Privacy, 1999, at 93–96.

630 Tugendhat, M, QC and Christie, I, The Law of Privacy and the Media 2002, pp 420–21.

Strasbourg approach to Arts 8-11 which is that where societal interests potentially threaten the primary guarantee, the issue is not 'a choice between two conflicting principles but . . . a principle . . . that is subject to a number of exceptions which must be narrowly interpreted'.[631] Although Strasbourg has not made this difference of approach explicit, it is clearly consistent with the Convention's foundational values to assume that a Convention right, albeit considered under the para 2 exceptions, must be viewed as a conflicting principle rather than as a narrow exception to the primary guarantee.

Otto-Preminger Institut v Austria[632] provides a striking example of this approach. The Court found that the seizure and forfeiture of a film mocking Christianity was aimed at protecting the 'rights of others' within Art 10(2). The Court found that 'the manner in which religious doctrines are opposed or denied is a matter which may engage the responsibility of the state, notably its responsibility to ensure the peaceful enjoyment of the right under Article 9' (emphasis added).[633] The Court found that the responsibilities of those exercising the right under Art 10 include > an obligation to avoid as far as possible expressions that are gratuitously offensive to others and thus an infringement of their rights and which therefore do not contribute to any form of debate capable of furthering progress in human affairs (emphasis added).[634]

The Court considered that the necessity for the restriction 'must be convincingly established' but did not give a specific reason for finding that this was the case, merely asserting that the Austrian authorities had not overstepped their margin of appreciation.[635] Although the reasoning as to the applicability of Art 9 in this judgment is viewed by a number of commentators as deeply flawed,[636] the decision demonstrates, it is argued, that the Court follows a different approach within para 2 of Arts 8–11 where the 'rights of others' exception that is engaged concerns another Convention right.

The Art 8 'family' cases on clashes of rights – where the right of the parent to family life appears to clash with that of the child – have not in general been resolved by reference to a principle of paramountcy – as that is understood domestically. Nor has it been assumed that the child's Art 8 rights can be viewed as exceptions to be narrowly construed. In Elsholz v Germany,[637] the applicant father claimed that his Art 8 rights had been breached by the refusal of the national court to allow him access to his child. The European Court of Human Rights, in finding that a violation of the 631 Sunday Times v UK (1979) 2 EHRR 245, para 65.

632 (1994) 19 EHRR 34.

633 Ibid, para 47.

634 Ibid, para 49.

635 Ibid As Chapter 6 explained, the restriction on Art 10 entailed by the seizure of an allegedly blasphemous film was justified by reference to the Art 9 right to freedom of religious belief. The Court applied a wide margin of appreciation, and simply said that 'the content of the film cannot be viewed as incapable of grounding' the conclusion of the national authorities that seizure was justified (para 56). Thus the test applied was reminiscent of the narrow Wednesbury standard of unreasonableness.

636 See, e.g., Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, p 402.

637 [2000] 2 FLR 486.

father's Art 8 rights had occurred, reiterated the principle from Johansen v Norway[638] that a fair balance must be struck between the interests of the child and those of the parent. Similarly, in Hansen v Turkey,[639] a case in which the mother argued that failure to enforce contact had breached her Art 8 right to respect for family life, the Court found, citing Hokkanen[640] and Ignaccolo-Zenide:[641] 'the rights and freedoms of all concerned must be taken into account, and more particularly the best interests of the child and his or her rights under Art 8 of the Convention. Where contacts with the parent might appear to threaten those interests or interfere with those rights, it is for the national authorities to strike a fair balance between them'. In other words, within the margin of appreciation of the member state, a fair balance must be struck between the Art 8 rights of the child and those of the parent, thereby ruling out the use of a presumption that precludes that balancing exercise, although the welfare of the child will be of especial significance.

Similar reasoning has informed the protection of Art 8 rights where there is a conflict with Art 10. Initially it seemed possible in Winer v UK[642] that the presence of such a clash might lead to a narrowing down of the ambit of 'private life' under Art 8(1) in order to avoid interfering with the guarantee of freedom of expression.[643] However, a different stance was taken in Spencer (Earl) v United Kingdom:[644] it was indicated impliedly not only that the conflict of rights should not be resolved by re-defining the ambit of the primary right to respect for private life, but also that a clash with Art 10 still leaves the privacy right with significant protection. The later decisions in Tammer v Estonia,[645] N v Portugal[646] and Barclay v United Kingdom[647] also support this stance.

638 (1996) 23 EHRR 33.

639 (2004) 1 FLR 142, Appl No 36141/97, para 98. Cf the previous decision in Yousef v Netherlands (2003) 1 FLR 210. It is argued that, bearing Hansen and the decision in Hoppe v Germany (2004) 38 EHRR 15 at para 44 in mind, Yousef is out of line with the Court's established and continuing line of reasoning on the interests of the child.

640 (1994) A 299-A, 22

641 (2000) Reports of judgments and decisions 2000-I, 265.

642 (1986) 48 DR 154.

643 The applicant complained that various aspects of his private life had been publicised in a book. His application was declared inadmissible, the Commission stating briefly that it viewed the available remedies, in particular that of defamation, as satisfactory and that no positive obligation to provide further remedies in respect of the truthful statements made should be imposed, bearing in mind the wide margin of appreciation to be afforded in this area, the limitation of the Convention right to freedom of expression which such remedies would entail and the availability of a partial remedy.

644 (1998) 25 EHRR CD 105. The applicants complained of publication in the press of various (truthful) stories relating to the bulimia and mental health problems of Countess Spencer, including photographs taken of her walking in the grounds of a health clinic.

645 (2003) 37 EHRR 43; (2001) 10 BHRC 543.

646 N v Portugal, Appl No 20683/92, 20 February 1995. A magazine publisher's application complaining of a breach of Art 10 after being convicted of defamation and invasion of privacy in respect of the publication of photographs of a well-known businessman engaged in sexual activities was rejected as manifestly ill-founded. The Commission considered that the sanction was proportionate and necessary for the protection of the rights of others, one of which was clearly the right to protection from invasion of privacy through publication of true facts by other private individuals.

647 (1999) Appl No 35712/97 (admissibility only). The Court accepted that a lack of a remedy in respect of the filming of a private home, the island of Brecqhou, owned by the Barclay brothers, by reporters could in principle constitute a breach of Art 8, although on the facts no invasion of private life had occurred.

Tammer v Estonia is an especially significant decision in this context since the process of reasoning and the outcome is highly reminiscent of those in Otto-Preminger. The journalist applicant had been subject to a criminal penalty in respect of the publication of a hard-hitting interview relating to a former political aide, alleging that she had broken up the Prime Minister's marriage by having an affair with him and had deserted her own children. His application under Art 10 failed before the Court, which found that the remarks in question related to the former aide's private life; the restriction upon the journalist's Art 10 rights, taking into account the lightness of the penalty imposed, was therefore a necessary and proportionate response to the need to uphold the privacy of the aide. In coming to this conclusion the Court afforded a very wide margin of appreciation to the national authorities since the case concerned a clash of rights: 'In considering the way the domestic authorities dealt with the case, the Court observes that the Estonian courts fully recognised that the present case involved a conflict between the right to impart ideas and the reputation and rights of others. It cannot find that they failed properly to balance the various interests involved in the case'.[648]

As discussed above, Peck v United Kingdom[649] provides further confirmation that the Court is prepared to find a breach of Art 8 rights even where significant restrictions on Art 10 rights are thereby created. The case concerned CCTV footage of an attempted suicide in the street, which was then shown on national television. The applicant was identifiable from the footage and the broadcasting of it was found to create a breach of Art 8. The decision is of significance, not only because it allowed for the suppression of freedom of expression on a matter of some significant public interest, but also because it demonstrates that freedom of expression can be curbed even where the speech suppressed is already partly in the public domain. It might have been found, taking account of Observer and Guardian Newspapers v UK,[650] that the suppression of speech in such circumstances was disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. But Guardian Newspapers was not a case that concerned a clash between two opposing individual rights. Rather, it concerned a clash between societal interests – in national security and the authority of the judiciary – and freedom of expression. The comparison between Peck and Guardian Newspapers provides a further indication that the Court is prepared to adopt a different approach – one that more readily accepts interferences with freedom of expression – where another individual Convention right is at stake.

A and Byrne and Twenty-Twenty Television v. United Kingdom[651] is of particular significance in this line of authority. Decided prior to Tammer and Peck, it is nevertheless in line with the findings in those decisions, and also reveals the stance taken at Strasbourg to the paramountcy principle where a clash with Art 10 arises. The clash of rights which occurred was resolved in favour of the Art 8 rights of the child (although the case was not argued in those terms), but it was also, most significantly, made clear that even in respect of a child's welfare, Art 8 does not take automatic priority over Art 10. The case concerned the restriction of freedom of expression represented by the refusal to vary the injunction in In re Z, discussed above.

648 At para 69. It may be noted that a civil penalty could have been imposed rather than a criminal conviction for insulting the aide.

649 Peck v United Kingdom (2003) 36 EHRR 41; (2003) Appl No 44647/98. See above pp 818–19.

650 (1991) 14 EHRR 153.

651 (1998) 25 EHRR CD 159.

The first applicant, the child (C)'s mother, argued that the Court's refusal to accept her decision that C should take part in the television programme had constituted a breach of her Art 8 right to respect for family life. The mother and the media applicants both complained of a breach of Art 10. The Commission took into account, in the context of Art 10, that the right to freedom of expression is one of the essential foundations of a democratic society and that prior restraints call for the 'most careful scrutiny'.[652] In addition, it found that, in considering the 'duties and responsibilities' of the applicants as persons exercising their freedom of expression through the making and production of a television programme, the potential impact of the programme on the public and consequently on C, had to be viewed as an important factor.[653] The Commission noted that by continuing the injunctions, the domestic courts prevented all the applicants from making a television programme featuring the education and development of C in an educational and behavioural institute; it found that the continuance of the injunction by the domestic courts constituted an interference with all three applicants' right to freedom of expression within the meaning of Art 10(1).

In relation to the question whether the interference could be considered 'necessary' under para 2 of both Arts 8 and 10, the Commission afforded a certain margin of appreciation in assessing whether the need existed. It conducted the examination of necessity under Art 8(2) but stated that the same principles and considerations would apply under Art 10(2). It took into account the purpose of the documentary programme and the acceptance of the applicants' bona fides in this respect. The applicants submitted that the programme was of significant public interest in that it would inform the educational authorities in the United Kingdom, the families of those who suffer from similar problems as C and those sufferers themselves about other educational and behavioural methods which could significantly improve the latter's potential. The first applicant (C's mother) submitted that since her decision to allow C to participate in the television programme was taken in good faith, for C's benefit and with the proper advice, the courts should have followed her decision unless they found it irrational or in bad faith.[654]

The Commission found that it was for the national authorities to strike a fair balance between the relevant competing interests: what would be decisive would be whether the national authorities had made such efforts 'as can be reasonably demanded under the special circumstances of the case' to accommodate the parents' rights.[655] The Commission took into account the fact that the applicant had jointly applied for the first of the injunctions under consideration with the express intention of protecting the privacy of C, and also the High Court's conclusion that the 'overwhelming probability' was that the transmission of the programme would attract extended secondary tabloid publicity largely because of C's parents' high profile. The High Court had taken the 652 Observer and Guardian v United Kingdom, (1991) 14 EHRR 153, paras 59–60.

653 Jersild v Denmark (1995) 19 EHRR 1, para 31.

654 She further submitted that the courts were not well placed to make the assessment they did; the judges were elderly males of an elite class unlikely to have had experience of raising children with handicaps like C and they could not possibly know how the transmission of the programme would affect C. She argued that the judges were wrong in considering that the transmission of the programme would adversely affect C.

655 Olsson v Sweden (No 2), (1994) 17 EHRR 134, para 90 and Hokkanen v Finland (1995) 19 EHRR 139, para 57.

view that any short-term benefit for C deriving from the publicity was outweighed by the 'serious consequences' which transmission of the programme would entail for her. The Commission concluded that, in the circumstances of the present case and in view of the margin of appreciation accorded to states in this area, the imposition by the courts of their view as to the best interests of C was supported by 'relevant' as well as 'sufficient' reasons. The domestic courts had made such efforts as could be reasonably demanded to accommodate the first applicant's rights and the interference was accordingly proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. The restriction was not therefore found to create a breach of Art 10 or, on the particular facts, of the Art 8 right to family life of the mother. The Commission added that the High Court considered that if it had had to carry out a balancing exercise (for the purposes of Art 10 of the Convention or otherwise) between the welfare of C and the public interest in the programme, it would have 'firmly seen the scales as coming down in favour of there being an order against the programme being made'. Importantly, the Commission did not find that where the UK courts had applied the paramountcy principle, the media's right should be narrowly interpreted to avoid an invasion of the child's interests (viewed as aspects of her Art 8 rights).

In the very significant recent case of Von Hannover v Germany,[656] concerning an Art 8 claim in respect of journalism that invaded the applicant's privacy, the Court, in an approach reminiscent of that in Otto-Preminger, balanced Arts 8 and 10 against each other without a strict application of the Art 8(2) tests. As indicated above, journalists had followed Princess Caroline, photographing and recording trivial details of her personal life, such as dining with her children or shopping. The German Constitutional court had granted her relief in respect of journalistic intrusions in instances in which she had deliberately sought solitude. But it had refused relief where it considered that there was a public interest value in certain of the photographs. The German Court had found:

> The public had a legitimate interest in knowing where the applicant was staying and how she behaved in public.'[657] Nor can mere entertainment be denied any role in the formation of opinions . . . Entertainment can also convey images of reality and propose subjects for debate that spark a process of discussion and assimilation relating to philosophies of life, values and behaviour models. In that respect it fulfils important social functions . . . The same is true of information about people. Personalization is an important journalistic means of attracting attention. Very often it is this which first arouses interest in a problem and stimulates a desire for factual information. Similarly, interest in a particular event or situation is usually stimulated by personalised accounts. Additionally, celebrities embody certain moral values and lifestyles. Many people base their choice of lifestyle on their example. They become points of crystallisation for adoption or rejection and act as examples or counter-examples. This is what explains the public interest in the various ups and downs occurring in their lives. As regards politicians this public interest has always been deemed to be legitimate from the point of view of transparency and 656 Von Hannover v Germany (2005) 40 EHRR 1; (2004) Appl No 59320/00, judgment of 24 June 2004; see in particular paras 63, 64, 65, 66, 76.

657 Quoted ibid at para 25.

> democratic control. Nor can it in principle be disputed that it exists in respect of other public figures. To that extent it is the function of the press to show people in situations that are not limited to specific functions or events and this also falls within the sphere of protection of press freedom'.[658]

The European Court did not accept this analysis of the public interest dimension:

> . . . the publication of the photos and articles in question, of which the sole purpose was to satisfy the curiosity of a particular readership regarding the details of the applicant's private life, cannot be deemed to contribute to any debate of general interest to society despite the applicant being known to the public.[659]

The Court further found:

> a fundamental distinction needs to be made between reporting facts – even controversial ones – capable of contributing to a debate in a democratic society, relating to politicians in the exercise of their functions, for example, and reporting details of the private life of an individual who, moreover, as in this case, does not exercise official functions. While in the former case the press exercises its vital role of 'watchdog' in a democracy by contributing to 'impart[ing] information and ideas on matters of public interest . . . it does not do so in the latter case[660] . . . The situation here does not come within the sphere of any political or public debate because the published photos and accompanying commentaries relate exclusively to details of the applicant's private life.[661]

Since the photographs and publications 'made no contribution' – due to their banal and anodyne nature – to a debate of general interest, the interest in press freedom under Art 10 had to give way it was found to the Princess's privacy interests. Thus, the Court found that the reporting of the private life of a public figure is not an aspect of the media's watchdog role, except in special circumstances where aspects of his or her private life relate to political or public debate. In the instant case the details related exclusively to the applicant's private life and in those circumstances, it was determined, freedom of expression had to be narrowly interpreted. That narrow interpretation appeared to mean impliedly that while the reporting was viewed as constituting expression, interferences with it would almost inevitably be justified due to its nature. The Court did appear to accept that Art 10 was engaged, but it made it clear that the type of speech in question would always, as a general rule, tend to be afforded a very low weight.[662] The Court appeared to be making the assumption that of their nature the photographs could not relate to a debate of public interest, since the Princess was not exercising official functions. This seems to miss the point that private life details might relate to social trends in a much more significant fashion,

658 Ibid, para 25.
659 Ibid, para 65.
660 Von Hannover v Germany (2005) 40 EHRR 1 at para 63.
661 Ibid, para 64.
662 See further Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act (2006) at p 695.

in different circumstances, and therefore could have some public interest value. On the other hand, material consisting merely of photographs showing daily life activities of celebrities accompanied by no reporting attempting to create links to wider issues is the staple fare of many magazines and newspapers. So the possible public interest value of such photographs should not be exaggerated. Further, it must be borne in mind that consented-to photographs of celebrities are readily available. Any desires of the audience to see their life-styles ratified, or to observe social trends embodied in the lives of celebrities, already have a ready outlet.

These decisions reveal the stance at Strasbourg in relation to clashes of rights and particularly to conflicts between Arts 10 and 8. It can now be said to be clear that neither Article can be viewed as having presumptive priority where such conflicts occur. In such instances, the matter may be resolved by something close to definitional balancing of the rights on the model offered by Von Hannover where the speech interest is very weak – consisting of mere celebrity gossip. Where a full application of the tests of necessity and proportionality occurs, Strasbourg engages within those tests in something more akin to a balancing exercise in which a broad margin of appreciation tends to be conceded to the national authorities. Since the protection of both rights is axiomatically necessary in a democratic society, the Court is prepared to leave the national authorities with a wide discretion as to the precise balance to be struck in the member state between them.

Domestic approaches to the speech–privacy balance

Thus, where two Convention rights come into conflict, some kind of balancing act between the two needs to be undertaken and the margin of appreciation tends to be particularly significant here, so that states have a fairly wide discretion in resolving the conflict. Domestic courts therefore have an appreciable degree of latitude in determining where to strike the balance between the two interests. Section 12 HRA, which enjoins the court to have 'particular regard' to Art 10 when making any order which might infringe it, appears, on its face, to suggest a higher weighting for speech interests. Such imbalance is also prima facie suggested by the strength of the 'speech' jurisprudence discussed in the Introduction to Part II.[663] Free speech is by far the more accepted and established right.[664] The contrast with the relatively meagre case law on privacy at the European level, with, until recently, its cautious approach to intervention between private individuals, and the historic failure of English judges to recognise such a right in the common law, might suggest that the twin rights to speech and privacy do not currently occupy an equal footing. At one time it was therefore feared – or hoped – that English law would come to replicate the position in the US where, as Wacks puts it, 'It is widely acknowledged that the . . . 'newsworthiness' defence has effectively demolished the private-facts tort'.[665]

663 See pp 309–11.
664 See Fenwick and Phillipson (2006), fn 1 above, Chapters 1 and 2.
665 Wacks, op. cit., fn 1, p 113.

In Reynolds, a libel case, where expression interests also function as a defence, the House of Lords took this approach. 'The starting point,' Lord Steyn stated,[666] > is now the right of freedom of expression, a right based on a constitutional or higher legal order foundation. Exceptions . . . must be justified as being necessary in a democracy. In other words, freedom of expression is the rule, and regulation of speech is the exception requiring justification.[667]

These findings were echoed in the Mills case.[668]

These findings appear at a superficial glance to be in line with the general Strasbourg approach which finds that in cases in which other interests potentially threaten free speech, the concern is not with 'a choice between two conflicting principles but with a principle of freedom of expression that is subject to a number of exceptions which must be narrowly interpreted'.[669] If this approach had been applied in domestic privacy cases, as seemed possible until recently,[670] the result would have been that privacy lost its Convention status as a fully fledged right, becoming instead merely a narrowly interpreted exception to the right of freedom of expression. A higher weighting for speech interests was suggested by the strength of the 'speech' jurisprudence at both the Strasbourg and domestic levels. In Ex p Simms[671] Lord Steyn referred to free speech as 'the primary right . . . in a democracy' and some commentators have taken the view that Art 10 attracts an especially high level of protection at Strasbourg.[672] In Central Independent Television plc[673] Hoffmann LJ in an oft-quoted statement said: freedom of speech is 'a trump card which always wins'.[674] The statement, however, should be placed in context, as discussed below.

A number of other judicial pronouncements have accepted the presumptive primacy of Art 10, in particular that of Butler-Sloss LJ in Venables. The decision has been superceded on the question of the presumptive priority for Art 10, but it is still of interest in relation to taking account of interests to be weighed against Art 10, other than Art 8 interests. A number of newspapers made representations to the Court. They pointed out that the speech of Lord Steyn in Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Simms[675] supported the presumption in favour of freedom of expression. The speech of Lord Templeman in AG v Guardian Newspapers,[676] the judgment of Hoffmann LJ in 666 An approach echoed by Lord Nicholls: 'My starting point is freedom of expression' (Reynolds [1999] 4 All ER 609, p 621).

667 Ibid, p 629.

668 [2001] EMLR 41; see pp 907–8 above.

669 Sunday Times v UK A 30 (1979), para 65.

670 There were signs of this approach in Mills v NGN [2001] EMLR 41, 4 June, High Court No HC 0102236, WL 720322.

671 [1999] 3 All ER 400, CA; [1999] 3 WLR 328, HL at p 407.

672 Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, 'Making rights real: the courts, remedies, and the Human Rights Act' (1999) 58 CLJ 509, 524 and n 79.

673 [1994] Fam 192.

674 Ibid, at pp 203 and 204.

675 [1999] 3 WLR 328, p 337.

676 [1987] 1 WLR 1248, p 1297.

Central Independent Television[677] and the judgment of Munby J in Kelly v BBC[678] also provided support. It was not, it was argued, a question of a balancing exercise by the Court, since freedom of expression had presumptive priority. The newspapers further argued that, if either of the claimants was discovered by a journalist, it should be left to the judgment of the editor whether or not to publish the information. Instances could be found, it was pointed out, where the press was asked by the Court not to publish and did not do so.[679]

It was found that the Court had to carry out a balancing operation, weighing the public interest in maintaining confidence against the interest in disclosure. However, s 12 HRA and Art 10(1) of the Convention gave, it was found, an enhanced importance to freedom of expression and so to the right of the press to publish. The Court went on to find that the freedom of the media to publish could only be restricted if the need for those restrictions could be shown to fall within the exceptions set out in Art 10(2). In considering the limits to the law of confidence, and whether a remedy is available to the claimants within those limits, it was found that the exceptions must be narrowly interpreted. The claimants' right under Art 2 (right to life), Art 3 (right to freedom from torture and inhuman and degrading treatment) and Art 8 (right to respect for private life) were in issue. The rights under Arts 2 and 3 are not capable of derogation. In Osman v United Kingdom,[680] the European Court held that the provisions of Art 2 enjoined a positive obligation upon contracting states to take measures to secure the right to life. The case, discussed in Chapter 2,[681] concerned the failure of the police to act to protect a family from criminal acts, including murder. The European Court said:[682]

> The Court notes that the first sentence of Art 2(1) enjoins the state not only to refrain from the intentional and unlawful taking of life, but also to take appropriate steps to safeguard the lives of those within its jurisdiction . . . it must be established that the authorities knew or ought to have known at the time of the existence of a real and immediate risk to life of an identified individual or individuals from the criminal acts of a third party and that they failed to take measures within the scope of their powers which, judged reasonably, might have been expected to avoid that risk.

Since in the instant case the Court found that there was a real possibility that the claimants might be the objects of vigilante or revenge attacks, the potential breaches of Arts 2, 3 and 8 had to be scrupulously evaluated. Further, since a restriction on freedom of expression was in issue, all the criteria in Art 10(2), narrowly interpreted, the judge considered, had to be met. The Court was satisfied that confidence could extend to cover the injunctions sought and that therefore, the restrictions proposed were in accordance with the law. It was found that the common law continues to evolve and was given 'considerable impetus' to do so by the implementation of the Convention

677 [1994] Fam 192, p 203E, p 204C.
678 [2000] 3 FCR 509, p 525.
679 See Broadmoor Hospital Authority and Another v R [2000] 2 All ER 727.
680 [1999] 1 FLR 193.
681 See p 41.
682 At paras 115–16.

into domestic law by the HRA. Also, it was a strong probability that on the release of the claimants there would be great efforts to find them and some of those seeking to do so would be determined upon revenge. The requirement in the Convention that there can be no derogation from the rights under Arts 2 and 3 provided strong support for the very pressing social need that their confidentiality should be protected. The provision of injunctions to achieve the object sought also had to be proportionate to the legitimate aims they pursued. The aim was to protect the claimants from serious and possibly irreparable harm. Dame Butler-Sloss noted that Lord Woolf said in Lord Saville of Newdigate ex p A:[683]

> . . . when a fundamental right such as the right to life is involved, the options open to the reasonable decision-maker are curtailed. They are curtailed because it is unreasonable to reach a decision which contravenes or could contravene human rights unless there are sufficiently significant countervailing considerations. In other words it is not open to the decision-maker to risk interfering with fundamental rights in the absence of compelling justification . . .

Dame Butler-Sloss went on:

> The onus of proving the case that freedom of expression must be restricted is firmly upon the applicant seeking relief . . . I can only restrict the freedom of the media to publish if the need for those restrictions can be shown to fall within the exceptions set out in Art 10(2) . . . I must interpret narrowly those exceptions.'[684]

The significant point is that these remarks were made in the context of countervailing Convention rights – Arts 2 and 3 – not in relation to societal interests.[685] Similarly, in Mills the High Court had to consider whether to grant an interim injunction. The judge said that the starting point was s 12 of the HRA since it applies 'if a court is considering whether to grant any relief which, if granted, might affect the exercise of the Convention right to freedom of expression' (s 12(1)) and, in particular, provides that 'no such relief is to be granted so as to restrain publication before a trial unless the court is satisfied that the applicant is likely to establish that publication should not be allowed' (s 12(3)). The court also noted the provision of s 12(4):

> The court must have particular regard to the importance of the Convention right to freedom of expression and, where the proceedings relate to material which the respondent claims, or which appears to the court, to be journalistic, literary or artistic material (or to conduct connected with such material), to
>
> (a) the extent to which –
>   (i) the material has, or is about to, become available to the public; or >   (ii) it is, or would be, in the public interest for the material to be published;
>
> (b) any relevant privacy code.

683 [2000] 1 WLR 1885, p 1857.
684 [2001] 1 All ER 908, 921 and 931.
685 See further Phillipson, G, n 1 above, (2003) 749–52.

The Court went on to refer briefly to 'frequent and authoritative expressions of the importance of a free press and freedom of speech'. It was noted that in Reynolds v Times Newspapers Ltd[686] the House of Lords stressed that there is a basic and fundamental right to freedom of expression, that freedom of expression would be buttressed by s 12 of the HRA, and that when the Act was fully in force the common law would have to be developed and applied in a manner consistent with Art 10. It was found that, to be justified,

> . . . any curtailment of freedom of expression must be convincingly established by a compelling countervailing consideration, and the means employed must be proportionate to the end sought to be achieved; and the interest of a democratic society in ensuring a free press weighs heavily in the balance in deciding whether any curtailment of this freedom bears a reasonable relationship to the purpose of the curtailment.[687]

Thus, it was found that freedom of expression 'is the rule and regulation of speech is the exception requiring justification. The existence and width of any exception can only be justified if it is underpinned by a pressing social need.'[688] Reliance was also placed in Venables on the findings of Hoffmann LJ in Central Independent Television plc:[689]

> Newspapers are sometimes irresponsible and their motives in a market economy cannot be expected to be unalloyed by considerations of commercial advantage. Publication may cause needless pain, distress and damage to individuals or harm to other aspects of the public interest. But a freedom which is restricted to what judges think to be responsible or in the public interest is no freedom. Freedom means the right to publish things which government and judges, however well motivated, think should not be published. It means the right to say things which "right-thinking people" regard as dangerous or irresponsible. This freedom is subject only to clearly defined exceptions laid down by common law or statute. . . .

The Court noted that cl 3 is plainly based on Art 8 of the Convention and that although Art 8 is not directly applicable in England in the sense of creating new causes of action, the English Court (a) must, in determining a question which has arisen in connection with a Convention right, take into account, inter alia, the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights (under s 2(1) of the HRA) and (b) because the court is a public authority (s 6(3)(a) of the HRA), must not act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right. The Court went on to consider the exception under Art 10(2) in respect of 'the protection of the reputation or rights of others', which it said must include Convention rights such as Art 8 when being given effect by such means as

686 [1999] 3 WLR 1010.

687 Referring to Lord Nicholls, p 1023.

688 Referring to Lord Steyn, pp 1029–39. The court also noted the findings in McCartan Turkington and Breen v Times Newspapers Ltd [2000] 3 WLR 1670, p 1686 (HL), where Lord Steyn said that the European Convention fulfilled the function of a Bill of Rights, and considered Secretary of State for the Home Department ex p Simms [2000] 2 AC 115, p 126.

689 [1994] Fam 192, pp 202–4.

the law of confidentiality; and also the exception 'for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence'.

In applying the Convention jurisprudence under s 12(3) of the HRA, and bearing in mind that the qualifications in Art 10(2) are as relevant as the basic right of freedom of expression in Art 10(1), the Court noted that the European Court of Human Rights has emphasised that the national court has to strike a fair and proportionate balance between the respective Convention rights, depending on such factors as the nature and seriousness of the interests at stake and the gravity of the interference. Further, one of the matters which the Court has to take into account in deciding whether prior restraint is justified is 'any relevant privacy code', and the PCC Code of Practice is clearly such a code.[690] It noted that the rules on privacy under cl 3 are 'disarmingly simple' and found that the existence of the statutory provisions, coupled with the current wording of the relevant privacy code, meant that in any case where the Court was concerned with issues of freedom of expression in a journalistic, literary or artistic context, it was bound to pay particular regard to any breach of the rules set out in cl 3 of the Code, especially where none of the public interest claims set out in the preamble to the Code was asserted.

It found that a newspaper which flouts cl 3 of the Code is likely in those circumstances to have its claim to an entitlement to freedom of expression trumped by Art 10(2) considerations of privacy, and said that unlike the court in Kaye v Robertson,[691] Parliament had recognised that it had to acknowledge the importance of the Art 8(1) respect for private life, and it was able to do so untrammelled by any concerns that the law of confidence might not stretch to protect every aspect of private life. Therefore, in making a determination in the instant case, the Court found that it was not necessary to go beyond s 12(3) of the 1998 Act and cl 3 of the Press Complaints Commission's Code to find the ground rules by which to weigh the competing considerations of freedom of expression on the one hand and privacy on the other.

However, the Court had to be satisfied, if it was to restrain publication before trial, that the claimant was likely to establish that publication should not be allowed. In deciding not to grant the injunction, the Court took into account the fact that the risk to personal safety which arose was only slight, and the fact that the Sun had repeatedly said that it would not publish the address and that it would abide by the PCC Code. It also found that whether or not the information appeared in the press, it would, at least to a limited extent, become available to the public, simply as a result of Ms Mills living in a busy and populous town. The Court said that that was not in itself a reason for denying her a remedy, but that it was relevant both in assessing the degree to which publication should be restrained, and the impact of publication on her privacy and security. The Court did not take account of the fact that Ms Mills had for several years courted publicity, and had herself stimulated public interest in her lifestyle, sex life, and her homes.

690 The judge noted that in Douglas v Hello! Ltd [2001] 2 WLR 992, Brooke LJ said (p 1018, paras 92–94): '. . . the Code of Practice ratified by the Press Complaints Commission in November 1997 states that all members of the press have a duty to maintain the highest professional and ethical standards, and that the code sets the benchmarks for those standards: it both protects the rights of the individual and upholds the public's right to know.'

691 [1991] FSR 62.

This approach – affording Art 10 priority – clearly does not accord with that of Strasbourg in the clashing rights cases discussed above: a careful examination of the competing claims of each right was undertaken on a basis of the equal value of the two rights,[692] except in exceptional instances where expression is narrowly defined. The decision in Von Hannover clearly established the presumptive equality of the two rights. There is no indication that Parliament, in passing the HRA, intended to alter this position and create a serious imbalance between the two rights;[693] rather, it is evident that the sponsors of the amendment which became s 12 saw it merely as a domestic reflection of the Strasbourg approach.[694] Moreover, the unbalanced American approach is out of line with other jurisdictions and flows from factors peculiar to that jurisdiction, namely the absolute nature of the First Amendment, and the fact that it is not balanced by any constitutional right to informational privacy.[695] Where privacy has such a status, as in Germany and Canada, courts have rejected any notion of establishing an a priori ranking of rights.[696] The Venables and Mills approach would have introduced a striking asymmetry: the protection of the right to privacy would have to be justified as necessary in a democratic society, while the claims of free speech would be simply assumed. The cases make it clear that where a restriction on a Convention right is justified not as serving one of the societal interests the Convention enumerates,[697] such as economic well being or protection of morals, but as ensuring the protection of another Convention guarantee, a different approach must be followed.

In cases where Convention rights have clashed, Strasbourg has still formally followed the standard approach, treating one right as primary, so that restrictions upon it by a competing right have to be justified as necessary in a democratic society. However, this is because when Strasbourg hears cases brought by individuals alleging a violation of a Convention right, other, competing rights, figure only as possible means of justification for the respondent state. By contrast, the position of a domestic court is fundamentally different: both sides before are claiming that their rights are equally in issue. Only one party before the Strasbourg Court is claiming to be a right-holder: competing rights figure only as possible means of justification for the respondent state and thus as an exception to the primary right whose infringement is alleged. At the same time Strasbourg does not view the other right as an exception to be interpreted narrowly but in practice conducts something more akin to a balancing act between the two, if both 692 See the views of Lord Steyn and Lord Cooke in Reynolds v Times Newspapers [1999] 4 All ER 609, at 631 and 643.

693 An amendment providing that a court should 'normally' give precedence to Art 10 over Art 8 was rejected (HC Deb Vol 315 Cols 542–43, 2 July 1998).

694 See, e.g., the speech of Jack Straw on cl 12: HC Deb Vol 315 Cols 535–39, 2 July 1998.

695 The US Supreme Court has fashioned a constitutional right to what it has termed 'privacy', but by this it signifies choice over substantive matters, such as sexual activity and abortion: see, e.g., Griswold v Connecticut (1965) 381 US 479 and Roe v Wade (1979) 410 US 113.

696 The German Supreme Court has remarked that the protection of personality [including privacy] and of free expression are both 'essential aspects of the liberal democratic order . . . with the result that neither can claim precedence in principle over the other' (BVerfGE 35, 200) – this point relies on Markesenis's translation (op. cit., fn 1, p 123). For an example of the Canadian approach, see Hill v Church of Scientology [1995] 2 SCR 1130, p 1179 and the recent decision in Les Editions Vice Versa Inc v Aubry [1999] 5 BHRC 437, which involved a careful balancing of the rights to privacy and speech.

697 See the second paragraph of Arts 8–11.

are found to be engaged. The national court is in a different position, not only because the margin of appreciation doctrine is inapplicable,[698] but also because the process by which the cases arise at Strasbourg differs from the way they arise domestically. Therefore the domestic court has to find a way of affording weight to both rights and of balancing them against each other, as opposed to reviewing the balance already struck. Thus, while the process of domestic reasoning needs to take account of the Strasbourg stance in terms of principle, it is able to differ from it in terms of structure and of depth of scrutiny.

Section 12(4) HRA, which enjoins the courts to have 'particular regard' to Art 10 when making any order which might infringe it, appears, on its face, to suggest a higher weighting for speech interests than for privacy. However, it is now evident that this is not the correct reading.[699] In the context of the law of confidence the equal weighting of the two rights has now gained clear general acceptance. Lightman J found in Campbell v Frisbee: 'The right to privacy and to freedom of expression are of equal value.'[700] The notion that Art 10 has presumptive priority in relation to other Convention rights under s 12(4) was also disapproved of by the Court of Appeal in Cream Holdings v Bannerjee.[701] This trend was reaffirmed in the Court of Appeal decision in Re S, setting out the proper approach to speech/privacy claims (in a different context and also only within cases in the second category from In re Z). That approach to such claims was then ratified by the House of Lords in their seminal decision in Campbell v MGN: Lord Hoffmann said of balancing speech/privacy claims: 'There is in my view no question of automatic priority. Nor is there a presumption in favour of one rather than the other.'[702] When the House of Lords in Re S reached the stage of considering the conflict between Arts 8 and 10 in its reasoning, it strongly endorsed the parallel analysis from Campbell in general, confirming that presumptive priority for speech where it competes with another Convention right, not a societal concern, has been decisively rejected.

It can now therefore be said with confidence that where the two rights collide, the notion of affording presumptive priority to Art 10 has been abandoned in favour of affording presumptive equality to the two rights.[703] Any other approach would probably 698 See R v DPP ex p Kebilene and Others [1999] 3 WLR 972, 1043, per Lord Hope.

699 Further, this was probably not the intention behind the government's reluctant inclusion (in the face of pressure from the press lobby) of the clause that became s 12; see, e.g., the speech of Jack Straw on cl 12: HC Deb. Vol 315 Cols 535–39, 2 July 1998.

700 [2002] EMLR 31, para 24. Lindsay J also accepted that s 12 was not intended to afford special weight to freedom of expression when Hello! was found liable to pay damages for breach of confidence: Douglas v Hello! (No 5) [2003] EMLR 31, [2003] EWHC 786, para 185(v).

701 See Simon Brown LJ, speaking for the majority: [2003] 2 All ER 318, at para 41. Rogers and Tomlinson, commenting on this finding, concluded that where free expression collides with Art 8 there will be 'presumptive equality' between the two: [2003] EHRLR (Privacy Special Issue) 38 at 41.

702 [2004] 2 WLR 1232; (2004) 154 NLJ 733; [2004] UKHL 22, at para 55. Baroness Hale of Richmond (at paras 138–41) made it clear that her own approach in Re S should be adopted in order to conduct the balancing exercise, and an exercise based on the presumptive equality of the two Articles was also adopted unanimously by the other Law Lords (see Lord Nicholls at paras 19 and 18, Lord Hope at paras 103–11 and Lord Carswell at para 167).

703 As pointed out in Campbell, ibid at para 138 this is consistent with Resolution 1165 (1998) of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, para 10, which affirms the equal value of the two rights.

have necessitated a declaration of the incompatibility of s 12(4) with Art 8. The subsection can now be viewed therefore either merely as a (superfluous) reminder of the demands of Art 10, or as a means of drawing in the conflicting right under Art 8 since s 12(4) clearly covers Art 10(2) as well as Art 10(1).[704] The former view accords more comfortably with the notion of presumptive equality. As far as the latter view is concerned, s 6 obviously renders this role for s 12 redundant.

The parallel analysis or 'ultimate balancing act'

Once the equal value of the rights has been accepted, it follows that the courts should consider the grant of a prior restraint, or other remedy, in instances similar to those mentioned, from the perspectives of both Art 10 and Art 8.[705] The notion of undertaking a parallel exercise and informing it by reference to the justificatory arguments underlying both guarantees was first put forward some years ago pre-HRA.[706] The Court of Appeal decision in Re S made it clear that this balancing act must occur, and its findings on that matter were accepted by the House of Lords in Campbell. Those findings were not disputed in the Lords in Re S.[707] Indeed, they were strongly reaffirmed. Lady Hale in the Court of Appeal in Re S found that it was not merely necessary to consider Art 8 as an exception to Art 10 under Art 10(2); it was also necessary to consider Art 10 as an exception to Art 8, under Art 8(2). Thus, the Court must ask whether Art 10 is engaged. The standard Convention tests should then be followed, under Art 10(2) asking whether the interference with the Art 10 guarantee proposed by the plaintiff would be necessary in a democratic society and proportionate to the legitimate aim of protecting private life, as a 'right of others'. The Court should then consider the issue from the opposing perspective under Art 8, with the rights reversed in position, so that the speech interest is treated as an exception to the primary right to respect for privacy under Art 8. The same inquiries as to necessity and proportionality should then be made from this opposing perspective, again under the rights of others exception which also appears in Art 8(2). Lord Steyn, in a speech with which the other members of the House concurred, deduced a number of principles from the decision of the House in Campbell v MGN:

> First, neither article has as such precedence over the other. Secondly, where the values under the two articles are in conflict, an intense focus on the comparative importance of the specific rights being claimed in the individual case is necessary.

704 See Sedley LJ in Douglas v Hello! [2001] QB 967, 1003 at para 137. Section 12(4) is not needed to perform the task of drawing Art 8 into the frame since it is performed by s 6; however, Sedley LJ's interpretation accords with the impact of s 3 (which applies to s 12(4)) and refutes the notion that s 12(4) affords presumptive priority to Art 10. Lord Hope in Campbell approved of this approach to s 12(4): ibid at para 111.

705 Other Convention rights may also be relevant. If, for example, the Re W case ([1992] 1 All ER 794) had arisen after the HRA was in force it might have been possible to argue, under Art 14 read with Art 8, that there was also a discriminatory dimension to the findings: had the child been placed with a heterosexual couple after suffering heterosexual abuse the Court of Appeal might not have concluded so readily that public interest questions arose. The principle of open justice under Art 6(1) may add weight to the Art 10 argument.

706 Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, 'The Doctrine of Confidence as a Privacy Remedy in the Human Rights Act Era' [2000] 63 (5) MLR 660–93. The following analysis draws to an extent on the ideas put forward at pp 682–87.

707 In re S (a child) [2004] UKHL 47; [2005] 1 AC 593.

> Thirdly, the justifications for interfering with or restricting each right must be taken into account. Finally, the proportionality test must be applied to each.'

This process may be termed the 'parallel analysis':[708] the steps to be taken under it are considered in more detail below.

In this way, useful insights can be gleaned as to the strength of both the speech and the privacy claim, by asking, for example, both whether the publication in question was more intrusive than was necessary to its legitimate aim of provoking discussion on matters of public interest or revealing a lack of fitness for public office, and, conversely, whether the remedy sought by the plaintiff would go further than necessary in order to protect the legitimate privacy interest. In a manner reminiscent of the approach of the German[709] and Canadian courts,[710] the claims of both parties are thus subject to a searching, but balanced examination.

In all instances in which a power to restrict or penalise publicity arises based on all the causes of action discussed above, including powers to protect children (whether based on the ECHR jurisdiction of the court or on the other restrictions discussed) the court should seek if possible to balance the two rights on the Re S and Campbell model in accordance with the demands of the HRA. In cases involving children, however, the welfare of the child would appear to determine the issue if s 1(1) CA applies. But it is highly probable that the courts will continue if possible to find ways of defining the concept of 'upbringing' so that it does not apply in most cases of media publicity relating to children. In that way, they preserve the possibility of conducting the balancing act between Arts 8 and 10 and avoid the difficult issue of the incompatibility of the paramountcy principle with Art 10. So, for example, in a case such as In re Z, arising under the HRA, the court can fulfil its duty under s 6(1) HRA, s 12(4) and s 2 by adopting an approach which weighs up the strength of both the Art 10 and Art 8 claim. Where a restriction on publicity is statutory s 3(1) could bite and could also demand that if possible a reinterpretation of it that took account of both Articles should be adopted. Where the restriction itself allowed no leeway for the parallel analysis in order to achieve compatibility with Art 10, a declaration of incompatibility should be issued under s 4.[711] Section 12(1) of the 1960 Act might be likely in future to attract such a declaration since it offers little leeway for media freedom.

The discussion below of conducting the parallel analysis begins by noting that the values underlying Arts 8 and 10 may in fact mean that both Articles come down against publicity, or at times against restraint of speech. It proceeds to identify the steps to be taken in conducting the balancing exercise. It then proceeds to consider the rationales underlying both Articles, making it possible to identify factors that have been found to weigh strongly in the balance on one side or the other – where a clash between the two Articles does appear to arise. It finally looks at the steps taken and the outcomes in certain recent seminal cases in which the parallel analysis has been conducted.

708 Tomlinson, H, QC and Rogers, H, coined the term 'parallel analysis': 'Privacy and Expression: Convention Rights and Interim Injunctions' [2003] EHRLR (Special Issue: Privacy) 37, 50.

709 See Markesenis, B and Nolte, N, 'Some comparative reflections on the right of privacy of public figures in public places', in Birks, P (ed), Privacy and Loyalty, 1997, pp 122–24.

710 See, e.g., Les Editions Vice Versa Inc v Aubry [1999] 5 BHRC 437.

711 See further, Cram, I, 'Young Persons, Criminal Proceedings and Open Justice – A Comparative Perspective' Yearbook of Copyright and Media Law, Vol V (2000) 141–65.

Articles 8 and 10 as mutually supportive guarantees

In balancing Arts 8 and 10 against each other in cases when the media wishes to reveal private facts, it becomes clear as discussed that the justificatory arguments underlying media freedom are quite frequently partially or largely inapplicable. In some instances speech that invades privacy is likely to gain little, if any, support from the arguments from autonomy and self-development, so there will often be little or no justification at the level of principle for allowing it to override privacy. It may also be found that the rationales underlying both Arts 8 and 10 come down on the side of secrecy or, conversely, publicity. The rights to freedom of speech and to privacy are in many respects, 'mutually supportive'[712] since the principles of autonomy and self-development underlie both Articles.

Millian justificatory arguments based on truth tend to have little application to the paradigmatic celebrity privacy case, in which facts relating to private and family life are revealed. Reporting restraints attempting to prevent the publication of private facts only, and not general expressions of opinion, will pose little threat to that free and unhindered public debate about matters of importance which Mill's argument seeks to protect.[713] However, in certain of the cases concerning children considered, such as In re Z, this argument would support disclosure since the matters sought to be revealed would have formed part of a wider debate about the value of certain forms of education or upbringing.

The justification for speech based on the argument from autonomy may have an application in the child privacy cases, depending on whether the child herself is seeking publicity as in In re W (Wardship: Restrictions on Publication) and Kelly v BBC. The value of autonomy underlying Art 8 could also speak in favour of publicity: where the child is Gillick-competent and seeks publicity, her informational autonomy is at stake in the sense that she is exercising a choice as to disclosure of aspects of her private life. Her informational autonomy would be invaded if disclosure was disallowed. Where a responsible and devoted parent or carer seeks publicity on behalf of the child, as in Oxfordshire CC[714] or In re Z, invocation of both Arts 8 and 10 could also point in the direction of disclosure. Indeed, in Twenty-Twenty Television v UK the mother as applicant at Strasbourg sought to invoke both Articles in support of her claim for publicity on the ground that her freedom of expression and right to respect for her family life were both at stake. The child herself could have invoked her own Art 8 and 10 rights in support of publicity.

In such instances no real conflict between Arts 8 and 10 arises, except in so far as it is arguable under Art 8 that disclosure ran counter to the child's own welfare. Where publicity would clearly not further her best interests, a court, affording weight to her welfare in accordance with the stance of the Court of Human Rights discussed in relation to the family cases at Strasbourg and, if applicable, s 1(1) CA (possibly encapsulating a new primacy principle), would uphold non-disclosure. Clearly, even a Gillick-competent child might fail to appreciate the harm that publicity could do and could be over-persuaded by reporters or by a parent/carer. In such instances the court would be expected to consider, not only the autonomy argument and the short-term benefits to the child in terms of, for example, enhanced self-esteem, but also the long-term detriment, including any impact on his development or ability to form or sustain relationships with his peers or others. However, where, as in the Mary Bell case,[715] or Re S, such arguments are not applicable, the child and her carers are opposed to publicity and there are also weighty welfare grounds for such opposition, it can be argued that disclosures could directly assault the informational autonomy of the child and those caring for her, and indirectly threaten their freedom of choice over substantive issues.[716] In such instances the speech in question, far from being bolstered by the autonomy rationale, is in direct conflict with it. But arguments based on the idea of uncertain and nebulous detriment to the child's welfare would hardly engage Art 8 and would be readily overcome where core values under both Arts 8 and 10 weighed on the other side of the balance. Where the speech was essential to inform a wider debate the justificatory arguments under Art 10 would be strengthened.

712 See: Emerson, C, 'The Right of Privacy and the Freedom of the Press' (1979) 14(2) Harvard Civil Rights – Civil Liberties Law Review 329, p 331. See also Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, Media Freedom under the Human Rights Act, 2006, Chapter 13.

713 See Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 1st edn, 1985, p 191.

714 [1997] 1 FLR 235.

It is clearly apparent that the argument for speech from self development, since it seeks to facilitate human flourishing, far from inevitably opposing the right to privacy, must support it to some extent since a reasonable degree of privacy is a requirement for individual self development, particularly the ability to form relationships, without which the capacity for individual growth would be severely curtailed. This argument applies in many of the privacy cases discussed in this chapter; referred to in Bensaid v UK, it clearly has an especially significant application in relation to the upbringing and welfare of the child. As indicated above, a version of the paramountcy principle – in which the child's welfare has primacy – is inevitably going to continue to obtain recognition on the basis of arguments based on the requirements for individual self development under Art 8. Where publicity threatens the welfare of the person in question, the argument that it should be suppressed would be readily to hand, not only under Art 8, but also under Art 10, on the basis that it would not further the fulfilment of the values underlying its free speech guarantee. This may be particularly the case in relation to children. This argument could readily have been used successfully in Re S to justify the restriction on reporting: the majority judges in the Court of Appeal and the Law Lords assumed too readily in that case, it is contended, that Arts 8 and 10 were entirely opposed in relation to the circumstances.

Conversely, where speech might further the welfare of the child, the values underlying both Articles speak in favour of publicity. Such instances arise where she might gain in self esteem through publicity (as the mother argued in In re Z) or where she desires publicity in order to reveal and express feelings of frustration or persecution (as in In re W (Wardship: Restrictions on Publication)) or, more controversially, where publication of true facts about the relationship with a parent, as a corrective to the parent's 715 Re X (A Minor) (Wardship Proceedings Injunction) [1984] 1 WLR 1422.

716 Such matters could include choice of abode or of schools. See the discussion on this issue at p 973 below.

version already successfully placed in the public domain, could vindicate and ratify the child's own stance in respect of that relationship (Harris v Harris).[717]

Finally, the argument that prior restraints intended to safeguard the privacy might inhibit journalistic debate on matters of significant public interest must be fully confronted. Clearly, political speech by its nature is unlikely in many instances to conflict with the Art 8 rights to private and family life. Such a conflict will not arise where political speech consists of the discussion of political ideas, institutions, and policies. The paradigmatic cases of journalistic invasions of privacy in this context tend to the private and family life, or children of celebrities, or sometimes relate to criminal activity involving children, and may amount to mere 'infotainment' or be driven simply by a desire for sensationalism for purely commercial purposes. Such publications hardly engage the press's right under Art 10 to impart 'information on matters of serious public concern'[718] or more general Convention values such as the furtherance of a democratic society.

The findings of principle discussed should, it is argued, inform the balancing act between Arts 8 and 10. When examining instances in which the media wish to reveal private facts it becomes clear that the justificatory arguments underlying media freedom are quite frequently partially or largely inapplicable. In some instances speech invasive of privacy is likely to gain little, if any, support from the arguments from autonomy and self-development, so there will often be little or no justification at the level of principle for allowing it to override privacy. As indicated, it may sometimes be found in child privacy cases that the rationales underlying both Arts 8 and 10 come down on the side of publicity. But in all cases they are more likely to come down in favour of secrecy. As the discussion indicates, the rights to freedom of speech and to privacy are in many respects, 'mutually supportive'[719] since the principles of autonomy and self-development underlie both Articles.

The structure of the reasoning process

In terms of the structure of the reasoning process, the court should begin as a first step by considering the issue from the perspectives of both Arts 8(1) and 10(1) in turn, on the Re S model. In exceptional instances at the extremes the matter might be resolvable largely by reference to the scope of media rights under Art 10(1). Speech that invades the privacy of a person and which relates exclusively to her private life could be viewed as a form of expression that will inevitably be overcome by the strong Art 8 claim, requiring no justification under para 2 for its suppression.[720] Alternatively, it could be 717 Munby J contended in that instance: 'Mr Harris has manipulated the press by feeding it tendentious accounts of these proceedings, enabled to do so because he has been able to . . . shelter behind the very privacy which hitherto has prevented anyone correcting his misrepresentations . . . the remedy for Mr Harris's antics . . . is publicity for the truth . . . the children's own best interests will be furthered by the public being told the truth . . . ' [2001] 2 FLR 895, paras 386–89.

718 Bladet Tromso and Stensaas v Norway (2000) 29 EHRR 125, para 59.

719 Emerson, C,'The Right of Privacy and the Freedom of the Press' (1979) 14(2) Harvard Civil Rights–Civil Liberties Law Review 329, 331.

720 See Von Hannover v Germany (2005) 40 EHRR 1, at para 66. The findings in Von Hannover would clearly cover not only celebrities but the children of celebrities or children who had attracted publicity due to their own or their parents' actions or situation, where the speech related purely to their private viewed as a form of expression that only marginally deserves to fall within that term and therefore as very vulnerable to interference.[721] There is possibly more scope for resolution of the conflict within Art 8(1). Where speech relating to an adult which has only the most incidental and tenuous connection with the private or family life of a child is concerned, on factual bases even less compelling than that in Central Television, it might be argued that Art 8(1) is not engaged at all, in which case no conflict arises requiring resolution. Under s 6(1) HRA, as argued above, the inherent jurisdiction must be exercised in accordance with the Convention rights, thereby arguably extending its ambit via the doctrine of indirect horizontal effect. Following this argument a power to restrict publication would prima facie be available where the child's claim had the potential to fall within Art 8(1); if on close examination it was found that the connection was too tenuous on the particular facts, the case could be resolved in favour of the Art 10 claim without recourse to Art 8(2).

But it is clear that 'definitional balancing' on the American model – that is, in this context, redefining the nature and content of the primary rights under either Article to create demarcations between those two rights – will only very rarely be possible, as will identifying and utilising the underlying values at stake in order to avoid the conflict within para 1. In most instances, then, the extent to which the rationales discussed are at stake will be relevant, but in relation to the exercise of proportionality under para 2 of both Articles – the second step. The structure of the reasoning process would follow the contours laid down by Baroness Hale in Re S and in Campbell, but the parallel analysis accepted as appropriate should also arguably be used in cases relating to children and involving upbringing.

The court should consider the issue of any conflict between Arts 8 and 10 from at least two parallel perspectives.[722] The court should follow the standard Convention tests under Art 10(2), asking whether the interference with the primary guarantee proposed would be prescribed by law, necessary in a democratic society and proportionate to the legitimate aim of protecting private and family life – 'the rights of others' protected under Art 8(1). The court should then consider freedom of expression as creating an exception to the right to respect for private and family life, under Art 8(2), again applying the tests of legality, necessity and proportionality.

But in each instance the application of the test of necessity would not require strict scrutiny in accordance with the findings deriving from the Strasbourg clashing rights cases such as Tammer v Estonia, since, as argued above, it is axiomatic that there is a pressing need to protect both rights in a democratic society. The test of proportionality would clearly be much more significant, as Sedley LJ indicated in a different context in London Regional Transport v Mayor of London,[723] since while it is clear that both privacy and speech must be protected, the particular restriction under consideration must be tailored towards satisfying this test under both Articles.

life. As discussed above, the term 'private life' was not found to cover especially intimate matters or secluded situations or activities, but the normal incidents of private life such as shopping expeditions (paras 49 and 61).

721 See Tugendhat, M, QC and Christie, I, The Law of Privacy and the Media, 2002, pp 420–21.

722 As pointed out above, other Convention Articles might also be relevant.

723 [2003] EMLR 4, para 49.

The Strasbourg proportionality test can be broken down into a number of stages in this context, partly relying on the analysis put forward by Paul Craig.[724]

(i) Some view must be taken as to whether certain interests can be traded off to achieve other goals at all. This is the point at which it might be argued, following Von Hannover, that the fundamental right of respect for privacy can rarely be traded off in order to allow the publication of speech of no public interest value.
(ii) The importance of the privacy aim served by restricting expression should be balanced against the importance of the expression itself, a method that may be referred to as 'speech/privacy balancing.' Equally, this question could be asked from the opposing perspective: the importance of the speech aim served by restricting privacy should be balanced against the importance of the privacy interest itself. This balancing act would become almost tokenistic if a fact-sensitive examination of the values underlying both Articles demonstrated that both point in the direction of secrecy, or conversely, publicity. Thus, a very serious invasion of privacy, in the sense of mass dissemination of a particularly private moment, as in Peck, could not be justified by reference to speech even of some public interest value.
(iii) It should finally be asked (and this test is of especial pertinence in relation to an injunction) – is the disputed measure the least restrictive which could be adopted in the circumstances to serve the aim in question; is the challenged act suitable and necessary for the achievement of its objective, and one which does not impose excessive burdens on the individual; what are the relative costs and benefits of the disputed measure? For example, in many privacy cases, the aims of privacy might be sufficiently served by concealing the identity of the person in question, while still allowing aspects of the story in question to be published.

The first test will not normally be of any significance in this context since Arts 8 and 10 clearly protect important values which, as the Strasbourg jurisprudence discussed establishes, are of equal value. But there might be instances in which either the speech or the privacy interest at stake is so weak that, although Arts 8 and 10 can both be viewed as engaged, it is clear that no trade off can occur. In fact, as pointed out above, Strasbourg tends to rely mainly on the second test when conducting the proportionality analysis.[725] The Strasbourg proportionality test tends essentially to focus on the balancing of the seriousness of the interference with the right against the importance of the aim pursued. Thus the hierarchy of values that can be discerned in relation to each Article aids the balancing act since it should be apparent whether a very weighty speech or privacy interest is at stake. The specific factors identified below, relating to those hierarchies, will strengthen either the privacy or the speech claim in relation to the exercise of proportionality at that second stage. Any harmony that can be discerned between the underlying rationales of both Articles in respect of the factors relevant in the particular instance should be identified. A greater and 724 P Craig, Administrative Law, 4th edn, 1999, Sweet and Maxwell, p 590. See further Chapter 3, pp 127–33 and Chapter 4, pp 268, 275–78. 285–90. See also Fenwick and Phillipson (2006) op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 2.

725 See pp 946–50.

more nuanced insight into privacy claims in general and, in cases related to children, into the best interests of the child might be attained; the notion that publicity might in some circumstances serve those interests might begin to take hold. At the same time the claims of the media in this context would be subjected to greater scrutiny than they have been in the past: dissonance between the values of free speech and the commercial interests of the media would tend to be revealed.[726]

Underlying rationales of both Articles; the hierarchy of values

Lord Hoffmann in Campbell made it clear that the values underlying both Articles should be utilised as a means of balancing the two interests:

> Take the example . . . of the ordinary citizen whose attendance at NA is publicised in his local newspaper. The violation of the citizen's autonomy, dignity and self-esteem is plain and obvious. Do the civil and political values which underlie press freedom make it necessary to deny the citizen the right to protect such personal information? Not at all . . . there is no public interest whatever in publishing to the world the fact that the citizen has a drug dependency. The freedom to make such a statement weighs little in the balance against the privacy of personal information.[727]

The rationales underlying both Articles make it possible to identify a number of factors that can be taken into account in conducting the parallel analysis in order to resolve clashes between the two guarantees. The identification of weighty speech or privacy factors allows the balance to be pushed one way or the other. A starting-point is to examine the extent to which the values accepted as underlying either Article are at stake in any particular instance. Where they are not fully at stake, an interference with the primary right is likely to be more readily justifiable. The significance of such arguments is already well accepted under Art 10: while the rhetorical attachment of Strasbourg to free speech has always been strong, commentators have accepted for some time that a hierarchy of speech categories has been developed, and that the place of speech within the hierarchy in a particular instance is likely to determine the outcome of a case. Thus it is clear that claims of media freedom in this context do not necessarily partake fully in the classic justificatory rationales of free speech[728] – a point that is developed below. Although the hierarchy of speech is well established this did not lead until recently to strict scrutiny of the speech claim in domestic cases concerning clashes between speech and privacy.

As Part 2 of this book made clear, it is a marked feature of the Strasbourg jurisprudence that clearly political speech, which may be seen as directly relating to the bases of 726 See further on this point Cram, I, 'Minors' Privacy, Free Speech and the Courts' [1997] PL 410. As Cram puts it in relation to minors' privacy claims: 'the courts [have failed] at times to probe free speech claims advanced by the media by reference to accepted free speech rationales' (at p 419; see also pp 411–12). See further Barendt, E, 'Press and Broadcasting freedom: Does anyone have any rights to free speech?' (1991) 44 CLP 63, 65.

727 [2004] 2 WLR 1232 para 56.

728 See further Barendt, E, 'Press and Broadcasting freedom: Does anyone have any rights to free speech?' (1991) 44 CLP 63, 65.

democracy[729] in terms of both participation and accountability,[730] receives a much more robust degree of protection than other types of expression. Thus the 'political' speech cases of Sunday Times v UK,[731] Jersild v Denmark,[732] Lingens v Austria,[733] and Thorgeir Thorgeirson v Iceland[734] all resulted in findings that Art 10 had been violated.[735] By contrast, in cases involving non-political speech supported by the values of autonomy[736] and self-development,[737] applicants have almost invariably been unsuccessful since a deferential approach to the judgment of the national authorities has been adopted.[738]

A similar pattern can be found at the domestic level. When non-political speech supported by the arguments from truth,[739] self-development or autonomy is in issue, domestic decisions have tended to be cautious.[740] In contrast, political expression has clearly been recognised as having a particularly high value in UK law,[741] partly as a response to the Strasbourg stance,[742] although the high status of political expression in the common law is also emphasised.[743]

729 See Meiklejohn, A, 'The First Amendment is an Absolute' (1961) Sup Ct Rev 245 and Political Freedom (1960) esp pp 115–24.

730 See Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 1st edn, 1985, Oxford: Clarendon at pp 20 and 23; Blasi, V, 'The Checking Value in First Amendment Theory' (1977) Am B Found Res J 521.

731 A 30 (1979).

732 (1994) 19 EHRR 1.

733 (1986) 8 EHRR 103.

734 (1992) 14 EHRR 843.

735 In Wingrove v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 1 the Court remarked: 'there is little scope under Article 10(2) of the Convention for restrictions on political speech or on debate of questions of public interest' (para 58).

736 The argument from moral autonomy – that matters of substantive moral choice must be left to the individual as an autonomous, rational agent. See Scanlon, T, 'A Theory of Freedom of Expression' (1972) 1 Phil & Pub Aff 216.

737 The argument from self development is that the freedom to engage in the free expression and reception of ideas and opinions in various media is essential to human development. See Emerson, C, 'Towards a General Theory of the First Amendment' (1963) 72 Yale LJ 877, 879–80; Redish, M, Freedom of Expression, 1984, pp 20–30 and Greenwalt, K, 'Free Speech Justifications' (1989) 89 Columbia Law Review 119, pp 143–45. The ECtHR has repeatedly asserted that freedom of expression is one of the 'essential foundations for the development of everyone' (e.g. Otto-Preminger Institute v Austria (1994) 19 EHRR 34, para 49).

738 See Handyside v UK, A 24 (1976); Müller v Switzerland (1991) 13 EHRR 212; Gibson v UK, Appl No 17634 (declared inadmissible by the Commission); Gay News v UK (1982) 5 EHRR 123. See further Harris, D, O'Boyle, M and Warbrick, C, Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, pp 397 and 414.

739 Mill's On Liberty in Cowling, M, (ed) Selected Writings of John Stuart Mill, 1968, Cambridge: CUP, p 121; for discussion see Greenwalt, K, 'Free Speech Justifications' (1989) 89 Columbia Law Review 119, pp 130–41. The ECtHr has repeatedly referred to freedom of expression as being one of the 'basic conditions for [society's] progress' (see e.g. Otto-Preminger Institute v Austria (1994) 19 EHRR 34, para 49).

740 Gibson [1990] 2 QB 619; Knuller v DPP [1973] AC 435; Lemon [1979] AC 617.

741 Reynolds v Times Newspapers [1999] 4 All ER 609; Derbyshire CC v Times Newspapers [1993] AC 534; R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Simms [1999] 3 WLR 328.

742 See the approach of the Court of Appeal in Derbyshire [1993] AC 534 and in Ex p Leech [1994] QB 198, of the House of Lords in Reynolds [1999] 4 All ER 609, 621–22, per Lord Nicholls, 628 and esp 635, per Lord Steyn, 643, per Lord Cooke and Ex p Simms [1999] 3 WLR 328, 407, per Lord Steyn and 419–20, per Lord Hobhouse.

743 Lord Steyn has referred to free expression as the 'lifeblood' of democracy (R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Simms [1999] 3 All ER 400, p 408). In Reynolds v Times Newspapers

These indications as to the established hierarchy of forms of speech at Strasbourg and domestically and of the values underlying them are of utility in seeking to identify factors that will weigh in favour or against the media claim. It is also necessary to examine the values underlying Art 8 claims in general, although it is fair to say that a hierarchy of such values is not so readily apparent. Such claims may, especially in the case of children, be viewed as relating to both their private and their family life. As argued in the Introduction to this Part, the justification of autonomy generally accepted as one of the key values underlying Art 8, can be broken down into 'substantive' and 'informational' autonomy.[744] The term 'informational autonomy', refers to the individual's interest in controlling the flow of personal information about herself. Substantive autonomy, on the other hand, denotes the individual's interest in being able to make substantive choices about personal life without interference from the state or from other bodies, including the media itself. It is not only fear of media publicity that might drive personal choices, but fear of media opprobrium that might, for example, drive Hollywood actors and other celebrities to conceal their sexual orientation. The media is far from a neutral informing mechanism; media proprietors and editors may well have their own value-laden agendas which may include disapproval of certain life-styles.

Self-fulfilment may also be associated with privacy as a free-standing value in the sense that protection for the private life of the individual – which may take many forms – may provide the best conditions under which he or she may flourish. In Bensaid v UK the Court of Human Rights recognised the value of self-development, especially mental development, as an aspect of private life.[745] It is possible to identify further categories of material, in particular those relating to health[746] or sexual orientation or activity[747] that are regarded under Art 8 and under the DPA 1998 as 'particularly sensitive or intimate',[748] requiring especially compelling grounds to justify interference. These values may be particularly pertinent in relation to the privacy of children, as the primacy of the child's welfare, considered above in relation to certain of the 'family' cases under Art 8, [1999] 4 All ER 609, the House of Lords afforded an explicit recognition to the duty of the media to inform the people on matters of legitimate public interest per Lord Steyn, 633–34 and 629–29; Lord Nicholls: 'freedom to disseminate and receive information on political matters is essential to the proper functioning of the system of parliamentary democracy cherished in this country' (621). Nevertheless, it should be noted that even political expression can be curbed when courts view other societal interests as especially pressing. This is clear from a number of significant post-HRA decisions: Pro-Life Alliance, [2003] 2 WLR 1403 (this decision is in the tradition of deference to widely drafted primary legislation (Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Brind [1991] 1 AC 696)); AG v Punch [2003] 1 AC 1946; R v Shayler (governmental arguments from national security (AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109)) have also in the past resulted in the ready upholding of restrictions on directly political speech).

744 See above, pp 804–6.

745 'Private life is a broad term not susceptible to exhaustive definition . . . Mental health must also be regarded as a crucial part of private life . . . Article 8 protects a right to identity . . . personal development, and . . . to develop relationships . . . The preservation of mental stability is in that context an indispensable precondition to effective enjoyment of the right to respect for private life.' [2001] 33 EHRR 10, para 47.

746 See Z v Finland (1998) 25 EHRR 371. See now the findings as to information relating to health matters in the House of Lords in Campbell [2004] 2 WLR 1232.

747 See Lustig-Prean v United Kingdom (1999) 29 EHRR 548; 7 BHRC 65.

748 Feldman, D, 'Information and privacy' in Beatson, J and Cripps, Y, Freedom of Expression and Freedom of Information: Essays in Honour of Sir David Williams 2000, Chapter 19.

indicates. The unauthorised disclosure of personal information relating to children is highly likely to have a greater impact on their personal development, including their ability to recover from traumatic events or sustain or develop beneficial relationships, than it would have on adults. Strasbourg recognised this possibility in the 'family cases' and in Twenty-Twenty Television; it has also been recognised domestically, as indicated above.[749]

Far more so than in the typical 'celebrity privacy' cases,[750] political speech, broadly defined, does sometimes come into conflict with the Art 8 rights of children, as where it reveals failings or good practice of state representatives or within state institutions (Re S, In re Z, Re C (A Minor), Re W(A Minor)(Restriction on Publication)), Re W (A Minor) (Freedom of Publication)), Oxfordshire Council v L and F),[751] or opposes gendered concepts of parenting (Re W (A Minor) (Restriction on Publication)), or the techniques of cult groups (Kelly), or concerns criminal activity where there is an arguable public interest dimension (Central Independent Television).

Nevertheless, it is only in a fairly narrow category of cases that any genuine and serious conflict arises – those where a publication would reveal material furthering public knowledge or debate about matters of legitimate public concern and the privacy or autonomy or family life of the child would be adversely affected. Where a real conflict appeared to arise – as in Re S – the privacy interest could frequently be protected while invading the speech interest only minimally by means of a temporary order intended to conceal identity, so long as the order provided sufficient guidance to the media as to the material that could be published.

The difference between the 'child privacy' cases and those of adult celebrities should be recognised. In the case of children, the facts revealed, as in Re S, can be of an order of intimacy, and the publicity can lead to a level of suffering, that is not normally applicable in the celebrity cases. Equally, due to the nature of the facts, the public interest in the cases of children may be much higher. This may also be the case in respect of ordinary adults who happen to be caught up in or engage in activities of a very newsworthy nature – as in Peck. In the celebrity cases, the true issue at stake is often not so much the depth of intimacy of the facts revealed – although it may be – it is more likely to concern the relentless intrusion into daily life perpetrated by the paparazzi – as in Von Hannover. But at the same time the arguments that the daily life details revealed have public interest value tend to be readily overcome. So the most difficult clashes between Arts 8 and 10 tend not to arise in the typical celebrity privacy cases. This is readily apparent if the facts of Campbell and of Re S – the two recent and most significant House of Lords' decisions – are compared.

Factors weighing on either side of the balance

Taking account of the underlying values of both Articles as discussed, it is now possible then to identify a range of factors that will weigh strongly in the balance on one side or the other at the second stage of the proportionality enquiry.[752] Clearly, that inquiry will be highly fact-sensitive. As Campbell made clear, the speech claim will be weakened if the speech fails to partake in the justificatory speech rationales discussed. The decision in Von Hannover identified a category of speech – 'infotainment' – that will in most circumstances be overridden by privacy interests since it is devoid of the speech value indicated by those rationales.[753] It has been pointed out that, '[The] media uses people's names, statements, experiences, and emotions to personalise otherwise impersonal accounts of trends or developments.'[754] Clearly, this is the case, although how far it can justify invasions of privacy depends on the facts in each instance. In many instances consented-to publicity could be equally illustrative. But in any event it is suggested that the speech at issue in Von Hannover was not illustrative of social trends; it had no wider purpose than to entertain; it was aimed at an audience motivated purely by curiosity. The photograph at issue in Campbell was also of very little value in speech terms, as Lord Hoffmann pointed out. Conversely, the speech claim will be strengthened if one of the speech-based rationales is present, even if it cannot be viewed as political expression. If the interest in open justice is at stake that will tend to strengthen it very strongly (as the House of Lords found in Re S), but it will not inevitably overcome the privacy claim. Where speech of public interest value is in issue, taking account inter alia of the public interest factors discussed above,[755] it would have a higher value than the speech at issue in Von Hannover.

749 See e.g.: In re Z [1995] 4 All ER 961; October Films [1999] 2 FLR 347; Lady Justice Hale's judgment in Re S, pp 971–72 below.

750 Such as: Douglas v Hello! [2001] QB 967; Theakston [2002] EMLR 22; Campbell [2002] EMLR 30, CA; [2004] [2004] 2 WLR 1232; [2004] 2 WLR 1232; UKHL 22, HL; A v B Plc [2002] 3 WLR 542.

751 [1997] 1 FLR 235.

The privacy claim will be strengthened if sensitive personal data as designated by the DPA 1998 is at stake. In a case concerning a child, if matters relating to upbringing are involved, that will also strengthen the claim (as in Re S, In re Z and in the recent Re W case discussed below), even if it is found, as it probably would now be in a media case, that the paramountcy principle is inapplicable. If intrusive methods such as telephone tapping are used to obtain the information, particularly those that could potentially attract criminal sanctions,[756] that will weigh in the balance in favour of privacy. In assessing the gravity of the invasion of privacy involved, further considerations might be of relevance. It could be asked whether the events reported happened in a very intimate setting (for example, the plaintiff's home) or in a more 'public' environment, such as a restaurant, a beach, or the street. On the other hand, if selective disclosure of personal information appears to be part of a deliberate, systematic attempt to manipulate the media by giving a false impression of the claimant's life to the public on a matter of some importance that might arguably weaken the privacy claim,[757] although great caution must be used in deploying this argument since selective disclosure of certain personal matters is entirely in accord with informational autonomy; the 752 For further discussion of such factors see Fenwick and Phillipson (2006) op. cit., fn 1 at Chapters 15 and 16.

753 It may be noted that the Supreme Court has found this category of speech is covered by the First Amendment in the US: 'There is no doubt that entertainment, as well as news, enjoys First Amendment protection': Zaccchini v Sciprrs-Howard Broad Co, 433 US 562, 578 (1978).

754 Anderson, D, 'The Failure of American Privacy Law' in Markesenis, B, (ed), Protecting Privacy, 1999, p 142.

755 See pp 915–18.

756 See p 810, fn 7 above, which refers to the conviction of Goodman, editor of the News of the World, in relation to phone-tapping.

757 See Tugendhat and Christie on this point (2002), op. cit., fn 1 at 344.

mere fact that a person is a celebrity does not mean that they under a duty to reveal intimate details of their sex life. The fact that the public is in ignorance as to certain aspects of it should be irrelevant.

If breaches of the PCC Code occurred, including breaches relating to the use of clandestine devices and subterfuge, it is suggested that that is a matter a court can properly take into account in terms of strengthening the privacy claim, under s 12(4) HRA. The Mills case in particular made it clear that the PCC Code provides a valuable guide to the weight to be accorded to privacy factors. If traditional duties of confidence are involved, including in particular contractual duties, that will also add strongly to the privacy claim (as in HRH Prince of Wales v Associated Newspapers Ltd).[758] The form in which the information is recorded, or the form in which it is captured by the defendant may also be relevant in enhancing the privacy claim, as discussed above. The fact that other Convention rights are also implicated may strengthen the privacy claim. Indeed, the engagement of other rights as in Venables would be the determining factor if they were absolute or near absolute (for example Arts 2 and 3). If the values underlying other rights could be viewed as engaged, as in Re S, in respect of Art 6(1), that might strengthen either claim.

In terms of the third proportionality test the appropriateness of affording relief by way of an injunction, and the ambit of the proposed injunction in terms of the information and time period covered, is relevant. The potential use of injunctions in other similar cases could also be taken into account where a novel use of an injunction is argued for. In Venables it was pointed out on behalf of the press that if injunctions were granted, they would not only bind all of the media for an indefinite period, they would also become a precedent for the future. One example put forward at the time was that similar arguments for an injunction could have been used in relation to the release of Myra Hindley. It was pointed out that the Court of Appeal in Chief Constable of the North Wales Police[759] had refused to grant injunctions to prevent the Chief Constable from revealing to the owner of a caravan site the past convictions of two paedophiles living on the site. In Douglas, in the Court of Appeal, an injunction was not granted on the basis that the plaintiffs had in effect ‘sold’ the privacy they were seeking to protect; damages alone were awarded.

The balancing act between Articles 8 and 10 – examples of outcomes

This section considers four significant cases in which the parallel analysis was conducted in order to resolve the clash between speech and privacy in each instance – Re S, Re W, Campbell and the Prince of Wales case. In these instances Re S was, it is argued, a case in which a real and especially problematic conflict between speech and privacy arose – so the balancing act was especially delicate. Prince of Wales also raised some fairly difficult issues.

In re S the Court of Appeal found that the ‘information in the case lay somewhere in between that in Re X and R v Central Television and that in Re M and N or

758 [2006] EWCA Civ 1776, [2006] All ER (D) 335 (Dec); the first instance judgment: Blackburne J’s judgment [2006] EWHC 522 (Ch).

759 [1999] QB 396.

Re W'.[760] The proposed publication indirectly identifying S did not, it was considered relate directly to S's current upbringing. But equally it did not constitute 'the sort of remote and unconnected information about a deceased or long-absent parent' at issue in Re X and R v Central Independent Television plc. The reports related to recent events in his family life and therefore could be expected to have a real bearing on his future upbringing. So there a very significant privacy interest was involved.

But there was also an important speech interest – the information related to the identity of the defendant and her alleged victim in a murder trial. It was concluded, relying on ex parte Crook,[761] that the important public interest in the identification of defendants, in particular those found guilty of serious crimes, can be outweighed in certain circumstances by the need to protect those affected by the crime from further harm. It was accepted that Art 6(1) would not be breached by the concealment of the defendant's identity: it was found that its importance lay in the relationship between the values it protects – the furtherance of the transparency of the administration of justice[762] – and the right to freedom of expression under Art 10(1). Unhampered media reports would play a part in safeguarding the public character of justice. Thus Art 6(1) provided an added dimension in the case, strengthening the speech argument, but not conclusive of the matter.

Clearly it was then necessary to conduct a dual exercise in proportionality – the parallel analysis. Lady Hale began by considering the proportionality of the proposed interference with freedom of expression, and in so doing took into account not only the importance of press freedom in principle, but also the features of the case which made its exercise of especial importance. Such enhancing features were found to include: the particular importance attached to the reporting of criminal trials; the right of the public to receive the information in question; the important issues raised regarding an unusual and controversial form of child abuse and about the conduct of the world famous children's hospital in which it was allegedly allowed to take place. Thus the public interest in allowing unrestricted reporting was found to be strong. However, that was not found to mean that it was impossible to justify any restriction, however limited, under Art 10(2). The Court had to consider what restriction, if any, was needed to meet the legitimate aim of protecting the rights of S. If prohibiting publication of the family name and photographs was needed, the Court had to consider how great an impact that would in fact have upon the freedom protected by Art 10, taking into account the greater public interest in knowing the names of persons convicted of serious crime rather than of those who are merely suspected or charged.

The important step in the judicial reasoning process, in accordance with the principle of presumptive equality of the two rights, was the next one. Lady Justice Hale then went on to consider the matter from the perspective of S's Art 8 rights, media freedom under Art 10 figuring this time as an exception to them under Art 8(2). In considering the proportionality of the proposed interference with the right of S to respect for his private and family life, she found that account had to be taken of the magnitude of the interference proposed. Factors to be taken into account included the extent to which the additional intrusion would add to the interference which had already taken place; the extent of any further harm that identifying publicity about the trial would do to the child's private and family life, in which his mental health was a 'crucial part'; the impact upon his father, other carers and his school, and the extent to which their task would be made harder by this kind of publicity, and the impact on his relationship with his mother in the short and the longer term. The nature of the publicity would be relevant in minimising the interference: prolonged identifying publicity, with photographs, during the trial, would have a far greater impact than would publicity during the rather shorter period when the family might be identified if there was a conviction. In other words, Lady Justice Hale drew a distinction between the different periods of time during which publicity would occur, if unrestrained: the strength of the free expression claim (bolstered also by the values underlying the guarantee of open justice under Art 6(1)) would be at its greatest at the point at which the argument against publicity would be at its weakest.

760 Para 37.

761 [1995] 1 WLR 139. In that instance it was found that the likely harm to the surviving children of the defendants outweighed the effect on freedom of expression created by the restrictions on publication.

762 Diennet v France [1995] 21 EHRR 554, para 33, was referred to.

Lady Justice Hale came to the conclusion that since the judge had not considered each Article independently, and so had not conducted the difficult balancing exercise required by the Convention, the appeal should be allowed, in order that the exercise could be properly carried out by the first instance Family Division court. The two judges in the majority disagreed, finding that although the balancing exercise outlined by Lady Justice Hale should have been carried out, the result reached – that the restraining order should be discharged – would have been reached even if it had been properly carried out. They considered that the first instance judge had not carried out the exercise correctly, but had had factors relevant to the question of proportionality under Art 8 sufficiently in mind.

In the House of Lords, Lord Steyn, giving the leading judgment, found that the interest in open reporting or criminal trials outweighed the privacy interest of the child. He made an ambiguous finding as to the strong general rule allowing for the reporting of criminal trials. On one possible reading of his findings, he appeared to suggest that that rule created something almost amounting to an exception to the presumptive equality of Arts 8 and 10. The rule, he found, could only be displaced by unusual or exceptional circumstances.[763] Lord Steyn's judgment is confused on this matter since at one point[764] he accepted that both Art 8(1) and 10(1) are engaged and yet then 763 Lord Steyn, at para 18: 'the ordinary rule is that the press, as the watchdog of the public, may report everything that takes place in a criminal court. I would add that in European jurisprudence and in domestic practice this is a strong rule. It can only be displaced by unusual or exceptional circumstances. It is, however, not a mechanical rule. The duty of the court is to examine with care each application for a departure from the rule by reason of rights under article 8 . . .' At para 37: 'In my view [Hedley J] analysed the case correctly under the ECHR. Given the weight traditionally given to the importance of open reporting of criminal proceedings it was in my view appropriate for him, in carrying out the balance required by the ECHR, to begin by acknowledging the force of the argument under Article 10 before considering whether the right of the child under Article 8 was sufficient to outweigh it (emphasis added). He went too far in saying that he would have come to the same conclusion even if he had been persuaded that this was a case where the child's welfare was indeed the paramount consideration under s 1(1) of the Children Act 1989. But that was not the shape of the case before him.'

764 At paras 26 and 28.

that Hedley J's analysis should be endorsed.[765] Hedley J had considered that since the speech related to the open justice principle Art 8 would figure only as an exception to Art 10 – an implicit rejection of the parallel analysis model of reasoning. Lord Steyn found that Hedley J's approach at first instance – of affording presumptive priority to Art 10 and then allowing Art 8 to figure only as an exception to it, was appropriate in this context. Clearly, as discussed above, this approach denies Art 8's status as a fully-fledged Convention right, where there is a clash between private life and the reporting of criminal proceedings. In other words the House of Lords appeared to go back in this instance to the flawed reasoning adopted in the Kelly line of authority. For the reasons given above, and rooted in the Convention clashing rights jurisprudence, it is clear that this is the wrong approach, and that even in relation to such reporting Arts 10 and 8 should have presumptive equality. The creation of this exception is not rooted in the ECHR jurisprudence as Lord Steyn appeared to think. A number of cases were cited that supported the notion of the significance accorded to the open reporting of criminal proceedings[766] but those cases were not decided in the context of a clash with Art 8 rights. Tammer v Estonia demonstrates that even where a very significant form of expression is in issue, it may have to give way where a significant privacy interest arises. This could also be applied in relation to the form of expression in question in Re S.

In re S the private and family life claim was very strong in terms of both informational and substantive autonomy. The revelation of the mother's identity was likely to affect S's ability to recover from the impact on him of his brother's death and mother's trial for the murder, and therefore it was especially crucial that her identity should not be revealed in the immediate aftermath of his brother's death. S was a victim in a very real sense of the alleged offence: he lost his mother (who was later imprisoned for the murder of his brother) and his brother and his high risk of psychiatric harm was likely to be enhanced, according to expert evidence, depending on the level of publicity.[767] The suffering he was likely to undergo as a result of the publicity in terms of bullying and teasing was thought likely to have such an impact on him, in terms of exacerbating the inevitable psychiatric harm he would suffer, that the precarious placement with his father was thought to be likely to break down. So very intimate relationships were at stake in extremely compelling circumstances. A range of Art 8 values were very strongly engaged. Nevertheless, Lord Steyn gave the privacy claim a very cursory treatment, dismissing it in two paragraphs of his speech.

In contrast to the privacy claim in Re S, the speech claim was weak; Lord Steyn was obviously right to identify the interest in open justice as a very significant matter in terms of speech values, but wrong, it is argued, to proceed to the assumption that knowledge of S's identity was necessary in order to serve that interest. The speech interest engaged in publishing photographs of the mother with the dead boy and revealing the mother's name was minimal: discussion of the circumstances surrounding the murder could have occurred in the press on a basis of anonymity, at least during the mother's trial. The mother's name would clearly mean nothing to the vast majority of the readers of the newspapers in question. Thus the public interest could have been served, since the case raised certain wider issues, while still protecting S. This judgment suggests that the courts are more comfortable with free speech than with privacy claims: as discussed above, free speech values have traditionally had far more hold on the common law than privacy values have. There are real dangers as a result that the privacy claim of the child will be minimised as – it is argued – it was in the House of Lords in Re S. Although the parallel analysis was formally conducted in Re S, it is suggested that it was undertaken in a tokenistic fashion – no real effort was made to subject the true value of the speech claim to scrutiny; conversely, the privacy claim was accorded insufficient weight.

765 At para 37.
766 At para 15.
767 Hale LJ made these points at para 39 of the CA judgment.

Thus, although the Lords in Re S endorsed Campbell, there seemed to be no recognition of the fact that the decision gave the impression of departing in spirit from the fundamental approach of Campbell, that of presumptive equality. However, the interpretation given to the Lords' ruling in the later case of Re W made it clear that the interest in open justice should figure in the parallel analysis as a weighty factor rather than as determinative of the matter in favour of Art 10. That is clearly the better interpretation. It is further contended that even on that analysis the wrong outcome was reached since the factual situation in Re S was more strongly supportive of Lady Justice Hale's minority judgment: the revelation of the mother's identity was likely to affect S's ability to recover from the impact on him of his brother's death and mother's trial for the murder, and therefore it was especially crucial that her identity should not be revealed in the immediate aftermath of his brother's death. The interest in open justice and the public interest in the issues surrounding the trial could have been served with relative efficacy at a later date, bearing in mind those compelling arguments for postponement. In this instance the balancing exercise, it is argued, reached the wrong outcome since too much weight was afforded to the open justice factor.

The more satisfactory explanation of Lord Steyn's judgment in Re S was adopted in a significant subsequent case in the High Court, Re W (Children).[768] In that instance the mother of two children (T, aged three, and R, aged six months), who was HIV positive, had pleaded guilty to knowingly infecting the father of R with HIV; she was awaiting sentence under s 20 of the Offences Against the Person Act. It was apparent that the children were likely to suffer the hostility of the community if it was thought that they might be infected by the disease and their connection with the criminal trial of their mother was fully revealed. It seemed quite possible that their long-term care placement would be jeopardised. The local council therefore sought an injunction to restrict publicity relating to the trial which might connect the children to it. As in Re S, the injunction was intended to conceal the identity of the defendant and victim in the trial in order to protect the children, indirectly. Thus the facts of the two cases were very similar.

The President of the Family Division in Re W had to determine how to reconcile Lord Steyn's findings as to the presumptive equality of Arts 8 and 10 with his finding as to the strong general rule relating to the open justice principle. As indicated above, it appeared on one reading of Lord Steyn's findings that Art 10 was to be viewed as having presumptive priority where reporting relating to criminal trials was concerned. However, the President managed to find an explanation of Lord Steyn's findings that allowed Arts 8 and 10 to be balanced against each other on a basis of equality:

768 A Local Authority v (1) W (2) L (3) W (4) T & R (By The Children's Guardian) [2005] EWHC 1564 (Fam).

> . . . the starting point is presumptive parity, in that neither article has precedence over or 'trumps' the other. The exercise of parallel analysis requires the court to examine the justification for interfering with each right and the issue of proportionality is to be considered in respect of each. It is not a mechanical exercise to be decided upon the basis of rival generalities. An intense focus on the comparative importance of the specific rights being claimed in the individual case is necessary before the ultimate balancing test in terms of proportionality is carried out. Having so stated, Lord Steyn strongly emphasised the interest in open justice as a factor to be accorded great weight in both the parallel analysis and the ultimate balancing test . . . However, nowhere did he indicate that the weight to be accorded to the right freely to report criminal proceedings would invariably be determinative of the outcome.[769]

On this basis it is argued that the factual situations in both Re S and Re W supported restraint on the media: as indicated above, in Re S the revelation of the mother's identity was likely to have a strong psychological impact on S. His risk of psychiatric harm was dependent on the level of publicity.[770] It was also quite possible that his placement with his father might break down so that he would have to go into care; thus the potential impact on his family life of he disclosure of his identity could also have been severe. In other words, the private and family life claims were very strong. The same was clearly true of the claim in Re W. But in contrast to Lord Steyn, the President of the Family Division examined the privacy claims of the children concerned in detail, finding that their Art 8 rights were very strongly engaged.

As discussed, the public interest could have been served in Re S since the case raised certain wider issues, while still protecting S by an injunction concealing his identity. This was the stance taken towards the speech claim in Re W. In granting the injunction in order to protect the children, the President found:

> . . . granting the injunction is [not] in fact likely to inhibit the press from reporting the case, nor should well-informed debate be significantly impaired simply because of the non-identification of the defendant or victim. It is said that the editor's principal wish is to be free to identify and publish a picture of the defendant so as to report and convey an adequate understanding to the public. I do not think the former is essential to the latter'.[771]

It can be concluded that Baroness Hale's balancing test is to be used in cases where the child's Art 8 right is engaged and clashes with the media's Art 10 right, including instances where the reporting relates to a criminal trial and the child would be indirectly identified.

The balancing act set out in the Court of Appeal in Re S between Arts 8 and 10 – the dual exercise in proportionality, or 'parallel analysis' – was endorsed by the House of

769 Ibid at para 53.

770 Ad indicated above, Hale LJ made these points at para 39 of the CA judgment.

771 A Local Authority v (1) W (2) L (3) W (4) T & R (By The Children's Guardian) [2005] EWHC 1564 (Fam) at para 63 (emphasis in original).

Lords in the seminal decision in Campbell.[772] Campbell was remarkable since as part of the 'parallel analysis' of proportionality, the poverty of the speech claim was made clear. Lord Nicholls found: 'The need to be free to disseminate information regarding Miss Campbell's drug addiction is of a lower order than the need for freedom to disseminate information on some other subjects such as political information.'[773] Lady Hale similarly held: 'there are undoubtedly different types of speech' and that some of those 'are more deserving of protection in a democratic society than others'; speech would be valuable where it included:

> . . . revealing information about public figures, especially those in elective office, which would otherwise be private but is relevant to their participation in public life. Intellectual and educational speech and expression are also important in a democracy, not least because they enable the development of individuals' potential to play a full part in society and in our democratic life. Artistic speech and expression is important for similar reasons, in fostering both individual originality and creativity and the free-thinking and dynamic society we so much value.[774]

Lord Hope found:

> But it should also be recognised that the right of the public to receive information about the details of her treatment was of a much lower order than the undoubted right to know that she was misleading the public when she said that she did not take drugs. In Dudgeon v United Kingdom (1981) 4 EHRR 149, para 52 the European Court said that the more intimate the aspects of private life which are being interfered with, the more serious must be the reasons for doing so before the interference can be legitimate. Clayton and Tomlinson, The Law of Human Rights (2000), para 15.162, point out that the court has distinguished three kinds of expression: political expression, artistic expression and commercial expression, and that it consistently attaches great importance to political expression and applies rather less rigorous principles to expression which is artistic and commercial. According to the court's well-established case law, freedom of expression constitutes one of the essential foundations of a democratic society and one of the basic conditions for its progress and the self-fulfilment of each individual: Tammer v Estonia (2001) 37 EHRR 857, para 59. But there were no political or democratic values at stake here, nor has any pressing social need been identified.[775]

He concluded that a person's right to privacy can be limited by 'the public's interest in knowing about certain traits of her personality and certain aspects of her private life . . .'.[776] But he found that in order to deprive Miss Campbell of her right to privacy it would not be enough to argue 'that she is a celebrity and that her private life is newsworthy'.

772 [2004] 2 WLR 1232; for further discussion of Campbell, see above pp 911–13.
773 Ibid para 29.
774 Ibid para 148.
775 Campbell v MGN Ltd [2004] 2 AC 457 at para 117.
776 He relied on L'Heureux-Dubé and Bastarache JJ in the Supreme Court of Canada recognised in Aubry v Les Editions Vice-Versa Inc [1998] 1 SCR 591, paras 57–58.

> Treating the complained-of details merely as background was to undervalue the importance that was to be attached to the need, if Miss Campbell was to be protected, to keep these details private. And it is hard to see that there was any compelling need for the public to know the name of the organisation that she was attending for the therapy, or for the other details of it to be set out.[777]

Therefore he found that in relation to the details complained of, including the picture taken of Ms Campbell outside the NA clinic, other than the fact of receiving drug treatment, a remedy should be granted, a conclusion with which the Lords in the majority agreed.

In HRH Prince of Wales v Associated Newspapers Ltd[778] the Court of Appeal had to consider a claim for breach of privacy and confidence brought by the Prince against the Mail on Sunday which had published details from his private diary. The diary in question was one of eight given to the paper by Sarah Goodall, a secretary in his private office from 1988 to 2000. The journals were handwritten accounts that Charles made following foreign visits over the past 30 years and which he circulated 'in confidence' to between 50 and 75 people, including politicians, actors, journalists and other people in the media. The employment contracts of each of those in Prince Charles' service provided that any information in relation to him that was acquired during the course of his or her employment was subject to an undertaking of confidence and was not to be disclosed to any unauthorised person.

Prince Charles alleged that the publication of the extracts from the journal interfered with his right to respect for his private life and his correspondence under Art 8 of the Convention, so that it constituted in a breach of privacy. The Mail on Sunday denied this but alleged, in the alternative, that any interference with this right was justified under Art 8(2) as necessary to protect the rights of the newspaper and the public under Art 10. Prince Charles had accepted that the relief that he claimed amounted to a restriction on the newspaper's right of freedom of expression under Art 10, but he alleged that this restriction was justified under Art 10(2) as necessary to protect his right to privacy, his copyright and to prevent the disclosure of information received in confidence.

The Court of Appeal found that the action was not concerned with a claim for breach of privacy that involved an extension of the old law of breach of confidence. It found that all the elements of a claim for breach of confidence under the old law were evident since the information was disclosed in breach of a 'well-recognised relationship of confidence, that which exists between master and servant'.[779] So a weighty element that weighed in the balance was the importance in a democratic society of upholding duties of confidence between individuals. It was argued on behalf of the newspaper that Prince Charles, as heir to the throne, was a public figure who had controversially courted public attention and used the media to publicise views, particularly in relation to the Chinese, of a similar kind to those expressed in the journal, so he could have no reasonable expectation that the journal would remain confidential.[780] The first instance judge had found, and the Court of Appeal agreed, that this factor did not go to the question of whether the content of the journal was confidential, but rather to the question whether that confidentiality would have to give way when weighed against the rights of freedom of expression enjoyed by the newspaper and its readers. It was concluded that the publication by the newspaper of extracts from the journal interfered with Prince Charles' right to respect for his private life, and it was noted that this was even more clearly made out since the right extended to protect Prince Charles' 'correspondence' under Art 8. The Court noted that the cause of action was now focused upon the protection of human autonomy and dignity, the right to control the dissemination of information about one's private life and the right to the esteem and respect of other people.[781]

777 Ibid at para 120.

778 [2006] EWCA Civ 1776, [2006] All ER (D) 335 (Dec); the first-instance judgment: Blackburne J's judgment [2006] EWHC 522 (Ch).

779 Ibid at para 28.

In relation to balancing Arts 8 and 10 the Court found that in general the Strasbourg Court views with disfavour attempts to suppress publication of information which is of genuine public interest and noted that where it relates to a matter of major public concern, even medical confidentiality may not prevail.[782] The Court noted that where no breach of a confidential relationship is involved, the balance will be between Art 8 and Art 10 rights and will usually involve weighing the nature and consequences of the breach of privacy against the public interest, if any, in the disclosure of private information. But the Court found that position would be different where the disclosure related, as it did in the instant case, to 'information received in confidence'. It found:

> . . . the test to be applied when considering whether it is necessary to restrict freedom of expression in order to prevent disclosure of information received in confidence is not simply whether the information is a matter of public interest but whether, in all the circumstances, it is in the public interest that the duty of confidence should be breached. The claimant is as much entitled to enjoy confidentiality for his private thoughts as an aspect of his own 'human autonomy and dignity' as is any other.[783]

The newspaper identified a number of matters of public interest revealed by the diary: (1) the nature of lobbying to which Prince Charles subjected this country's elected leaders; (2) the political conduct of the Heir to the Throne; (3) the conduct of Prince Charles in failing to attend the 1999 Chinese banquet; (4) Prince Charles' public statements about his non attendance at that banquet. He had termed Chinese officials 'waxworks'. However, the first instance judge concluded that the contribution that the journal or the articles in the newspaper made to providing information on any of those matters was minimal, and the Court of Appeal took the same view. The Court concluded that the first instance judge had been correct to hold that Prince Charles had an unanswerable claim for breach of privacy. When the breach of a confidential relationship was added into the balance, the Court found that his case was overwhelming. This case was of interest in that matters of some public interest were revealed – matters of much greater

780 Para 45.
781 Para 51.
782 The Court relied on Editions Plon v France (2006) 42 EHRR 36.
783 Para 68.

interest than those revealed by the reporting in Von Hannover, but the Court had little difficulty in finding that the privacy and confidentiality interest outweighed them.

Arguably, this case followed a pattern rather similar to that taken in the Lords in Re S, in the sense that one of the claims was dealt with in a somewhat cursory fashion, while still paying lip service to the balancing act. The speech claim was dismissed with rapidity, after a fairly cursory examination of its weight. If the future monarch exhibits tendencies that could be viewed as non-diplomatic in relation to Chinese officials, that is a matter of public interest which the public have a right to know about. The speech claim required far more thorough consideration. The strength of the privacy claim, the morally reprehensible methods used to obtain the information, and the public interest in protecting the Prince's ability to protect his record of his confidential thoughts seemed to obscure the competing strengths of the speech claim.

Conclusions

There are doctrinal difficulties, as this chapter has revealed, in determining whether to assign 'privacy factors' to the private information stage of the claim or to the balancing act. The trend is clearly away from accepting limiting factors at that stage, such as the defence of waiver or of public domain, although they may re-enter the equation to an extent at the balancing act stage. But factors enhancing the privacy claim are more problematic. Judicial work is still required in this respect.[784] The media might complain that the new liability therefore creates too much uncertainty, having a chilling effect on press freedom. But if the press are put on notice that publishing unconsented-to photographs of celebrities or other private information, might attract liability if the information is of little or no speech value, and where it is obvious that the celebrity would not have consented to the photograph if asked, that is not, it is argued, an invasion of freedom of speech that is worthy of concern. The recent cases discussed have revealed the 'Emperor's new clothes' aspect of press free speech claims in the context of celebrity gossip, revealing them to be in reality purely commercial ones.

Full use of the parallel analysis in all instances creates strong scrutiny of the real basis of media free speech claims, with the result, in the wake of Campbell and Von Hannover, that privacy may tend to prevail where speech in the infotainment category is at stake. In other instances, both claims should be probed with a view to considering how crucial it is to the speech value of reporting that a person's identity is revealed. Obviously, if the story concerns malpractice by a public figure, identity is crucially relevant. But, despite very recent developments, it is argued that the courts continue to be more comfortable with free speech than with privacy claims. This is probably one of the most significant points emerging from this chapter. As discussed above, the common law accorded a very high value to free speech, elevating it, pre-HRA, to the status of a common law right. In ex parte Simms[785] Lord Steyn referred to free speech as 'the primary right . . . in a democracy' (emphasis added). In contrast, the judges pre-HRA failed to create a common law tort of invasion of private life or of the non-consensual use of personal information.[786] Thus, in substantive terms, the strong common law tradition of free speech influenced the decision in Re S to the detriment of the more nebulous demands of privacy – demands that appear to have less of a hold on the judicial imagination. Where the judiciary perceive a clash between common law and Convention values, their tendency, despite the inception of the HRA, is to give preference to the former.

784 See further: Markesinis, BS, O'Cinneide, C, Fedtke, J and Hunter-Henin, M, 'Concerns and Ideas about the Developing English Law of Privacy (and how Knowledge of Foreign Law Might Be of Help)' (2004) LII(1) American Journal of Comparative Law 133 at pp 158–60.

785 [1999] 3 All ER 400, CA; [1999] 3 WLR 328, HL.

Clearly, the HRA's primary role is to protect the citizen against the arbitrary and oppressive use of state power – the main concern of the other chapter in this Part. But the ability of large media corporations to invade privacy is equal to, or even arguably surpasses, that of the state, as the state does not possess the power in itself to create widespread dissemination of private information. Therefore provision of protection for the citizen against the mass media is equally necessary. It is, it is argued, a standing embarrassment to the members of the House of Lords, and in particular Lord Steyn, that that outcome was not achieved in Re S.

The more sensitive and sophisticated reasoning of the President of the Family Division in Re W, which succeeded in examining the real weight of both the speech and the privacy claims put forward, may be indicative of the path that judicial reasoning is now likely to take in this context. Clearly, it could be viewed at first glimpse as rooted in the child-centred approach of the Family Division – as merely reflecting the values underpinning the paramountcy principle and therefore as flawed in its desire to afford primacy to privacy as Lord Steyn's approach was, it is contended, in relation to speech. Its claim to be viewed as a model of HRA judicial reasoning – as exhibiting a nuanced and sensitive approach to the clash of rights in question which outdoes the reasoning in a number of Strasbourg cases, including Twenty-Twenty TV – is based, however, precisely on its avoidance of the creation or acceptance of a presumption on the lines of those accepted in either Re S or In re Z.

The discussion above has sought to reveal the flaws in judicial reasoning in early post-HRA clashing rights cases. It has suggested that in relation to this speech/privacy clash the new privacy liability or 'ECHR jurisdiction' could develop in a distorted manner: it could fall into the trap of failing to provide privacy protection even where very strong claims for such protection arise, despite the harmony that can be found between free speech and private life values. The Lords' decision in Re S not only fails to demonstrate a strong grasp of the values at stake in difficult clashing rights cases, it also exhibits the tendency of common law judicial reasoning to prefer form over substance. In other words, the judiciary tend to be more comfortable with a fairly mechanistic approach to reasoning, as opposed to the more value-laden type of reasoning demanded by the Convention. Re S exemplifies the uneasy fusion in post-HRA judicial reasoning between Convention values and common law ones. We can find in the judgment firstly a partial abandonment of the needlessly rigid Re Z categories, but then a re-entrance of the more mechanistic approach, by way of a device allowing avoidance of an examination of the true values at stake. Clearly, this analysis is complicated by the value-laden nature of that device – a near-automatic presumption in favour of speech based on the value of the open justice principle. But in Convention terms any such presumption is flawed since it creates a barrier to the full examination of both the speech and the private life claim, taking account of both speech and privacy values in a democratic society. The presumption is flawed since, as Re S illustrated, it precludes a genuine attempt to weigh up the strength of the competing privacy claim. A converse presumption, that unauthorised publication of a private diary would tend to outweigh competing speech claims, as arguably occurred in the Prince of Wales case, is equally flawed. On the other hand, a presumption that privacy-invading speech amounting only to infotainment is unlikely to be capable of displacing the privacy claim, is easier to justify since its focus is precisely on the weakness of the speech claim. In other words, placing a presumptively strong speech or privacy factor in the balance should not be, in effect, the end of the matter. As further clashing speech/privacy cases arise before the domestic courts, this danger, that the parallel analysis might be conducted in a tokenistic fashion as unspoken presumptions begin to pervade it, is likely to continue to arise, due in part to the preference of the judges for follow established common law modes of reasoning that avoid dealing with moral conflict.

786 See Kaye v Robertson [1991] FCR 62. The caveat to the above remarks was entered by the author in 1996 in Confidence and Privacy: A Re-examination [1996] 55(3) CLJ 447 (with Phillipson, G). The article traces the somewhat uncertain steps that the judges were taking towards the creation of such a tort by utilising the action for breach of confidence, which this chapter has focused upon. However, it is highly unlikely that members of the judiciary would claim that private life had attained the same common law recognition as free speech had by the time of inception of the HRA.

9 Remedies

Introduction

The privacy measures considered in this chapter – apart from the 'powers' of the PCC in relation to the PCC Code – offer a variety of remedies. Ofcom has a number of internal remedies at its command and since it is a public authority under s 6 HRA, it must act in accordance with Arts 10 and 8 in applying them. Various criminal offences arise under the DPA 1998, while reporting restrictions can be enforced in contempt proceedings. Compensation is available under s 13 of the DPA in respect of unfair processing by data controllers. However, as indicated above, it appears that interim injunctions are not obtainable under s 32 DPA unless the claimant is seeking to prevent re-publication of the material. The PHA creates criminal offences and also provides a power to obtain an injunction to prevent harassment. If the doctrine of confidence/privacy is relied on, a number of civil remedies are available, and those remedies are also available under s 8 HRA where an action is brought directly for invasion of privacy under Art 8 under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA against a media body which is a public authority.[787]

Where an action is brought directly against a media body, either under the doctrine of confidence/privacy or, in the case of the BBC or Channel 4 under the HRA, the claimant would normally be seeking an injunction. In the case of Ofcom, the order sought by the claimant under s 8 HRA could be a declaration or a mandatory order, since he or she would be asking Ofcom to use its powers either to punish a broadcaster or to prevent a future broadcast. Orders against Ofcom would presumably take the form of mandatory orders or declarations. These remedies are considered below, together with the impact on them of s 12 HRA. The discussion below revolves round the privacy cases brought under the privacy/confidence action. But it is probable that the same principles would apply if an action was brought directly against a media body who was also a public authority under s 7 HRA.

787 See further Chapter 4, pp 241–47.

Damages and accounts of profit

An account of profits[788] is available in confidence cases. On this matter, the Court in Douglas III said:

> If, however, Hello! had made a profit on the publication, we would have had no hesitation in accepting that the Douglases would have been entitled to seek an account of that profit. Such an approach may also serve to discourage any wrongful publication, at least where it is motivated by money. [789]

Damages are also available, in addition to, or in substitution for, injunctive relief, [790] and regardless of whether or not the court could also have ordered injunctive relief in the particular circumstances.[791] Until Campbell there was no authority for the award of damages for emotional distress, but precedents exist in other areas of law.[792] It is now established that damages for emotional distress may be awarded in 'private fact' cases. In Campbell damages were assessed at a little over £14,000, including £1,000 for aggravated damages, in respect of the 'trashing' of Campbell's character in articles published after she commenced her action against the Mirror.

In Archer v Williams[793] it was accepted that damages could be awarded for emotional distress, in this case caused by publication of details of plastic surgery: they were assessed at £2,500. As discussed, damages are also available under the Data Protection Act. An account of profits may alternatively be ordered.[794] The Court of Appeal in Douglas III said as to damages in confidence/privacy cases:

788 The court will not award both, on the basis that this would compensate the plaintiff twice over. See the comments of the Law Commission in its Working Paper No 58, Cmnd 5012, 1972, para 123.

789 Ibid at para 249.

790 Under Lord Cairns' Act; see Wacks, op. cit., fn 1, pp 149, 151, and fns 28 and 44. Damages were awarded in the decisions in Douglas II (2003) EWCA Civ 139 (affirmed in Douglas III [2005] EWCA 595) and in Campbell v MGN [2004] 2 WLR 1232.

791 Provided the court has jurisdiction to grant an injunction: see Hooper v Rogers [1975] 1 Ch 43, p 48, per Russell LJ. See also Race Relations Board v Applin [1973] 1 QB 815 and the views of Capper, D ('Damages for breach of the equitable duty of confidence' (1994) 14 LS 313) and Gurry, F, Breach of Confidence 1984, Chapter 23. See Wacks, op. cit., fn 1, p 151, fn 46; cf the views of Megarry VC in Malone v Comr of Police for the Metropolis (No 2) [1979] 1 Ch 344.

792 Examples include contract (Jarvis v Swans Tours Ltd [1973] 1 QB 233), copyright and under the Sex Discrimination Act 1975, which gives the courts power to award damages on the same basis as in tort actions (see Chapter 15, pp 1586–90) and which under s 66 allows courts to award damages for injury to feelings alone. Space precludes full discussion of the point, but it was until Campbell an area free of authority; but to decide that as a blanket rule, such damages could never be available, by leaving the plaintiff potentially remediless, would be clearly have been out of line with the Convention notion of effective protection for rights; Strasbourg has recognised the need to compensate for 'moral damage', including emotional distress (see Van Dijk and Van Hoof, Theory and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1998, pp 179–82).

793 [2003] EMLR 38.

794 Op. cit., at para 123.

> The sum [of damages awarded] is also small in the sense that it could not represent any real deterrent to a newspaper or magazine, with a large circulation, contemplating the publication of photographs which infringed an individual's privacy. Accordingly, particularly in the light of the state of competition in the newspaper and magazine industry, the refusal of an interlocutory injunction in a case such as this represents a strong potential disincentive to respect for aspects of private life, which the Convention intends should be respected.[795]

In Douglas the High Court and the Court of Appeal accepted that there had been a breach of the couple's privacy by virtue of the publication of the unauthorised photographs, and awarded around £14,000 damages. The Court of Appeal in Douglas III[796] found that this interference with an exclusive contract gave no cause of action to OK! – the original beneficiaries of it. It therefore overturned the award of £1 million damages to OK!, but the award was restored by the House of Lords.

The Court of Appeal referred to the damages awarded to the Douglases as 'a very modest sum in the context of this litigation'.[797] Clearly, these meagre awards of damages provide little financial disincentive to journalists inclined to invade privacy in pursuit of profit-making photographs and stories.

Interim injunctions

Clearly, the most important issue both for privacy and for media freedom is the question of the basis on which the courts will grant an interlocutory injunction to restrain publication. The main flaw of the Data Protection Act, as indicated, as a statutory privacy remedy, is its bar on interim injunctions against the press. From the plaintiff's perspective, obtaining an injunction is vital in privacy cases, far more so than in defamation. This is because the damage done to reputation by initial publication can be subsequently restored by a public finding that the allegation was false. By contrast, if private information is made public, the law can compensate for this harm at final trial by awarding damages, but it cannot in any way cure the invasion of privacy: it cannot erase the information revealed from people's memories. From the defendant's perspective, on the other hand, if the story is topical, even an interim injunction might kill it off completely. Thus, as Robertson and Nichol put it: 'In breach of confidence . . . the critical stage is usually the application for an interim injunction . . . If the publisher is able to publish . . . the action will often evaporate . . . If the story is injuncted the publisher will often lose interest . . .'[798] Similarly, Leigh and Lustgarten comment: 'the interim stage is the critical one . . . [it is] effectively the disposition of the matter'.[799] However, while all privacy is lost if the story is published, the speech claim could be served by a limited injunction designed to protect identity – it might,

795 Op. cit. at paras 225–57.

796 Douglas II (2003) EWCA Civ 139 was affirmed in Douglas III [2005] EWCA 595. HL decision: [2007] UKHL 21.

797 Op. cit. at para 110.

798 Media Law, 1992, p 190.

799 Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, 'Making rights real: the courts, remedies, and the Human Rights Act' (1999) 58 CLJ 509 p 533 (referring to the granting of interim injunctions generally); and see also p 551.

depending on the circumstances, still be possible to publish the story itself. This point is returned to below.

Prior to the inception of the HRA it was only necessary for the plaintiff to make out an arguable case for confidentiality[800] in order to obtain an injunction; the courts then sought to maintain the status quo, on the basis that if the story was published, the material would lose its confidential character, and there would be nothing to have a final trial about.[801] However, this consideration could be outweighed by the defence of public interest at the interlocutory stage. The view of Lord Denning in Woodward v Hutchins,[802] that the mere fact that defendants intend to plead public interest at final trial should preclude interim relief, did not find wide support; instead, it appeared that, whilst a plea of public interest could defeat a claim for such relief, the defence had to be supported by evidence and have a credible chance of success at final trial.[803] Since the judges have the confidential information in question before them at that stage, they may be able to find quite readily that the defence is made out (as Laws J did in Hellewell) or will probably succeed (as in Lion Laboratories) or that it does not justify publication at large (as in Francome). Since, as suggested above, the paradigmatic privacy claim often involves speech of little or no value in public interest terms,[804] it is fairly easy, at least in some instances, to determine that the publication in question raises no serious speech or public interest issue.

However, that test was thought to be potentially unfavourable to the media because, in balancing the rights of the two parties, courts took the view that while the plaintiff's right to confidentiality would be wholly defeated by publication, the press could always still publish the story if they won at trial; they were thus inclined toward protecting the more fragile right of the plaintiff.[805]

800 E.g., HRH Princess of Wales; Shelley Films Ltd; Francome.

801 See AG v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109. Thus in Francome [1984] 1 WLR 892, p 900, Fox LJ said: 'Unless Mr Francome is given protection until the trial, I think that a trial might be largely worthless from his point of view even though he succeeded.' Similarly, in Lion Laboratories [1984] 1 QB 530, p 551, Griffiths LJ said: 'there will usually be a powerful case for maintaining the status quo by the grant of an interlocutory injunction to restrain publication until trial of the action.'

802 [1977] 1 WLR 760, CA.

803 See Lion Laboratories [1984] 1 QB 530, pp 538 and 553, per Stephenson LJ (explicitly rejecting Lord Denning's approach in Woodward); ibid, p 548 per O'Connor LJ and p 553 per Griffiths LJ; similarly in Hellewell, where the public interest argument prevented the award of an injunction.

804 E.g., Alan Russbridger, the editor of the Guardian, in a conference speech, listed a string of examples in which newspapers had published intimate details about the personal lives of celebrities, in some cases surreptitiously obtained, with either no or the flimsiest of 'public interest' justifications; he instanced a story in the News of the World in January 1999, in which a lap dancer gave full details of a recent sexual encounter with the singer Tom Jones (Human Rights, Privacy and the Media, organised by the Constitution Unit, and the Centre for Communication and Information Law, UCL, 8 January 1999).

805 This generally followed under the 'balance of convenience' test (American Cyanamid Co v Ethicon [1975] AC 396). See AG v Guardian Newspapers [1987] 3 All ER 316, which concerned an application for an interim injunction to restrain publication of confidential information (extracts from Spycatcher). Lord Brandon remarked (ibid, p 1292): 'the choice lies between one course [allowing publication] which may result in permanent and irrevocable damage to the cause of [the plaintiff] and another course which can only result in temporary and in no wary irrevocable damage to the cause of the newspapers . . . it seems to me clear that the second . . . course should . . . be preferred . . .'; see also the similar reasoning of Lord Ackner, ibid, p 1305.

The HRA addresses this issue directly. In this context, s 12 is of interest in respect of injunctions or other orders granted under its own powers, contained in s 8,[806] and at common law, where freedom of expression is affected. It will be recalled from Chapter 4 that s 12 applies (per sub-section (1)): '. . . if a court is considering whether to grant any relief which, if granted, might affect the exercise of the Convention right to freedom of expression';[807] it provides (per sub-section (3)) that: 'no such relief is to be granted so as to restrain publication before trial unless the court is satisfied that the applicant is likely to establish that publication should not be allowed'. Section 12(4) specifically instructs the courts that when they are dealing with, inter alia, journalistic material, they should consider the extent to which 'it is, or would be, in the public interest for the material to be published' and thus remove any lingering doubts as to whether the court should consider the strength of the public interest defence at the interim stage. Sub-section (3), in allowing the court to grant injunctions only where it believes that the plaintiff will succeed at trial, requires the court to undertake a substantial balancing test at the interim stage; it also makes it clear that the burden is on the plaintiff to show that the privacy interest would probably succeed at trial.[808]

Undertaking this evaluation at the interlocutory stage is not proving to be an especially difficult task, as the findings in Douglas,[809] Venables[810] and Mills[811] suggested. The position in defamation, in which the courts refuse an interim injunction if the defendants intend to plead justification, may be distinguished: justification is a factual claim, the investigation of which will often require sifting through a mountain of evidence and so cannot be resolved at the interlocutory stage; by contrast, the defence in confidence cases generally requires not an empirical, but an evaluative judgment. When undertaking this inquiry, the courts obviously have to take account of Art 10 jurisprudence on interim injunctions since s 12 instructs them to have 'particular regard' to Art 10. The leading Strasbourg case on prior restraints is Observer and Guardian v UK,[812] in which the Court considered the compatibility with Art 10 of interim injunctions preventing those newspapers from publishing Spycatcher material. The Court laid down the basic principle that:

> . . . while Art 10 does not in terms prohibit the imposition of prior restraints on publication . . . the dangers inherent in [them] are such that they call for the most careful scrutiny on the part of the Court . . . news is a perishable commodity and delay of its publication, even for a short period, may well deprive it of all its value and interest.[813]

806 See Chapter 4, p 241.
807 See pp 212–13.
808 Sub-section (2) provides some procedural protection against interim injunctions. It provides: 'If the person against whom the application for relief is made ('the respondent') is neither present nor represented, no such relief is to be granted unless the court is satisfied –

(a) that the applicant has taken all practicable steps to notify the respondent; or

(b) that there are compelling reasons why the respondent should not be notified.' This clearly limits the circumstances in which ex parte injunctions against publication can be granted.

809 [2001] 2 WLR 992.
810 [2001] 1 All ER 908, Fam Div.
811 [2001] EMLR 41, 4 June, High Court No HC 0102236, WL 720322.
812 (1991) 14 EHRR 153; for comment see Leigh, I, 'Spycatcher in Strasbourg' [1992] PL 200.
813 Ibid, para 60.

While the court's actual decision in the case seemed to suggest that the need to preserve the plaintiff's rights would in itself point strongly towards the imposition of an interim injunction,[814] the relatively cautious approach adopted may have been influenced by the fact that the very sensitive issue of national security was at stake. It is suggested that the domestic judiciary should look rather to the general principle laid down in the case that the granting of interim injunctions is a particularly significant prima facie infringement of Art 10, given the perishable qualities of news. This factor would then have to be weighed against the strength of the privacy claim, in the manner suggested earlier and, in accordance with s 12, a court should award the interim injunction only if it considers that the privacy argument is the stronger one.

In Douglas the Court of Appeal had to consider whether the injunction against Hello! should be continued. Section 12(3) HRA provides that prior restraint on expression should not be granted except where the court considers that the claimant is 'likely' to establish at trial that publication should not be allowed. Under s 3 HRA the court has a duty to construe all legislation, which must include the HRA itself, compatibly with the Convention rights 'so far as it is possible to do so'. Therefore, clearly, both sub-sections must be read in such a way as to ensure that all the rights are given full weight; s 12(3) must not accord more weight to Art 10 than to the other rights. The outcome, in any particular instance, would be determined, the Court found, principally by considerations of proportionality. Sedley LJ said that the Court has to:

> . . . look ahead to the ultimate stage and to be satisfied that the scales are likely to come down in the applicant's favour. That does not conflict with the Convention, since it is merely requiring the Court to apply its mind to how one right is to be balanced, on the merits against another right, without building in additional weight on one side.

Taking into account the fact that the claimants had in a sense already 'sold' their privacy, Sedley LJ found that their rights to privacy were outweighed by the right of publication and considered that they should be left to a claim for damages at the trial of the action.

But the Court also had to consider the effects of leaving the claimants to a damages claim. In American Cyanamid Company v Ethicon Ltd[815] it was found that a judge must weigh the respective risks that injustice may result from his deciding one way or the other at the interim stage. If an injunction is refused, but the claimant does succeed in establishing his legal right at the trial which he sought to protect by means of the injunction, he might in the meantime suffer harm which could not adequately be compensated for by an award of money. On the other hand, there was the risk that 814 It was found that the initial injunctions, which prevented publication for over a year, had the aim of maintaining the Attorney General's ability to bring a case claiming permanent injunction, a case which would have been destroyed if Spycatcher material had been published before that claim could be heard. This factor was found to establish the existence of a pressing social need justifying the restriction of Art 10. The finding that the continuation of the injunctions after the book had been published in the US could not be justified was based simply on the fact that such publication had destroyed the confidentiality of the material, making it impossible to maintain the Attorney General's rights as a litigant. See Chapter 7, pp 620–21.

815 [1975] AC 396.

if the injunction was granted, but the claimant failed at the trial, the defendant in the meantime might have suffered harm which was also irrecompensable. This weighing up is sometimes termed 'the balance of convenience'. Brooke LJ found that the balance of convenience appeared to favour leaving OK! to assert its legal rights at the trial of what he said was 'essentially a commercial dispute between two magazine enterprises'. Therefore, although the Court found that the claim might succeed at trial and result in an award of compensation, it also found that the injunction should be discharged. Thus, Hello! could publish the issue which contained the wedding photographs.

In Venables the Court was satisfied that there was a real and serious risk to the rights of the claimants under Arts 2 and 3, and it was found that, in principle, jurisdiction to grant the injunctions to protect the claimants was present. The Court went on to assess the strength of the evidence relating to those risks; finding that a real risk existed and that the protection represented by the injunctions was proportionate to the need for confidentiality, the injunctions were granted. The injunctions were intended to last for their whole lives, although, as noted above, the existence of the internet makes their efficacy in practice somewhat doubtful.[816]

The Court found in Mills in considering the grant of the injunction that the combination of Art 10 and s 12 had a number of consequences. It was clear, relying on Douglas v Hello! Ltd[817] per Sedley LJ, that Art 10 is directly applicable as between the parties to private litigation. Further, it found that an injunction should not be granted to restrain publication before trial unless the Court was satisfied that the applicant was likely to establish that publication should not be allowed. It said that s 12(3) makes it clear that the applicant must show more than the American Cyanamid threshold of a serious issue to be tried. It noted that in Douglas v Hello! Ltd Sedley LJ said, in applying the test set out in s 12(3), and taking s 3 HRA into account, that by virtue of s 12(1), (4) the qualifications set out in Art 10(2) are as relevant as the right set out in Art 10(1).[818] Therefore, the rights of others, including their Convention rights, are, it found, as material as the defendant's right of free expression and so is the prohibition on the use of one party's Convention rights to injure the Convention rights of others. He also found that the term 'likely' in s 12(3) should not be read as requiring simply an evaluation of the relative strengths of the parties' evidence. He said that a wholly unjustifiable invasion of privacy is entitled to no less regard, by virtue of Art 10(2), than is accorded to the right to publish by Art 10(1): 'neither element is a trump card. They will be articulated by the principles of legality and proportionality which, as always, constitute the mechanism by which the court reaches its conclusion on countervailing or qualified rights.' The Court also noted the findings of Keene LJ in the same case. He said that s 12(3) deals with the interlocutory stage of proceedings and requires the Court to look at the merits of the case and not merely to apply the American Cyanamid test.[819] This meant that the Court had to look ahead to the ultimate stage and be satisfied that the scales were likely to come down in the applicant's favour.

816 See above, p 907.
817 [2001] 2 WLR 992, p 1027, para 133.
818 Ibid, p 1028, para 136.
819 [1975] AC 396, p 1032, para 150.

The Court further noted in Mills that in Venables v News Group Newspapers Ltd[820] the President had held that the court has jurisdiction to grant an injunction against the world in order to protect individuals from the criminal acts of others. That jurisdiction, it said, has a wider and more direct effect than the decision in AG v Times Newspapers Ltd[821] that newspapers which know of an injunction against another newspaper would, if they were to publish the information, be guilty of contempt. The rationale of that decision was that publication of the material by other newspapers would nullify the purpose of the proceedings against the defendant by putting into the public domain material which the applicant claimed should remain confidential, and they would be in contempt by impeding or interfering with the administration of justice. In the instant case, the Court found that it would not be right to grant an injunction against the world on the Venables basis because the balancing exercise would not support so doing, especially in view of the absence of evidence of the apprehended harm and the other relevant matters.

The leading case on the interpretation of section 12(3) is now Cream Holdings Ltd and Others v Banerjee and Others.[822] Banerjee was a senior accountant for Cream Holdings. She was dismissed and took with her copies of documents that appeared to show illegal and improper financial activities by the company, which she then passed to the Echo newspaper. The Echo published articles allegedly showing corruption involving a director of Cream and a council official. Cream sought injunctions to prevent further publication. The Court had to consider the proper test to be applied in deciding whether to grant such an injunction taking account of the terms of s 12(3) HRA. The old test, as indicated above, was that the applicant as a threshold test, had to show that he or she had a 'real prospect of success' at final trial. If so, the court would consider where the 'balance of convenience' lay[823] between the case for granting an injunction and that of leaving the applicant to his or her remedy in damages. So the Court had to consider the modification of that test under the HRA. Lord Nicholls noted that press concerns under the old 'balance of convenience' test which were discussed above lay behind the enactment of s 12(3). The leading speech was delivered by Lord Nicholls, with whom all their Lordships agreed. His Lordship said:

> 'Likely' in section 12(3) cannot have been intended to mean 'more likely than not' in all situations [emphasis added] . . . [Section 12(3)] makes the likelihood of success at the trial an essential element in the court's consideration of whether to make an interim order. But . . . there can be no single, rigid standard governing all applications for interim restraint orders. Rather, on its proper construction, the effect of section 12(3) is that the court is not to make an interim restraint order unless satisfied that the applicant's prospects of success at the trial are sufficiently favourable to justify such an order being made in the particular circumstances of the case. As to what degree of likelihood makes the prospects of success 'sufficiently favourable', the general approach should be that courts will be exceedingly slow to make interim restraint orders where the applicant has not satisfied the court he 820 [2001] 2 WLR 1038, p 1071, para 100.

821 [1992] 1 AC 191; see Chapter 5, p 369.
822 [2004] 3 WLR 918. For comment, see Smith, ATH [2005] 64(1) CLJ 4.
823 American Cyanamid Co v Ethicon Ltd [1975] AC 396.

> will probably ('more likely than not') succeed at the trial. In general, that should be the threshold an applicant must cross before the court embarks on exercising its discretion, duly taking into account the relevant jurisprudence on article 10 and any countervailing Convention rights. But there will be cases where it is necessary for a court to depart from this general approach and a lesser degree of likelihood will suffice . . .[824]

Lord Nicholls said that he had in mind, as instances in which a lesser degree of likelihood would suffice, two categories of case. As to the first, he clearly had the Venables situation in mind, where the claimant would be placed in immediate danger if the injunction was not granted. It is contended that he was right to take this stance since arguably the courts' duty under s 6 HRA would not be satisfied if an injunction was not granted in such circumstances, since the court is bound to observe Arts 2 and 3. He said:

> Cases may arise where the adverse consequences of disclosure of information would be extremely serious, such as a grave risk of personal injury to a particular person. Threats may have been made against a person accused or convicted of a crime or a person who gave evidence at a trial. Disclosure of his current whereabouts might have extremely serious consequences. Despite the potential seriousness of the adverse consequences of disclosure, the applicant's claim to confidentiality may be weak. The applicant's case may depend, for instance, on a disputed question of fact on which the applicant has an arguable but distinctly poor case. It would be extraordinary if in such a case the court were compelled to apply a 'probability of success' test and therefore, regardless of the seriousness of the possible adverse consequences, refuse to restrain publication until the disputed issue of fact can be resolved at the trial.[825]

Lord Nicholls further had in mind the less contentious instance in which an injunction of short duration (days or hours) is required in order to give a judge time to consider the case properly:

> . . . an application [may be] made to the court for an interlocutory injunction to restrain publication of allegedly confidential or private information until trial. The judge needs an opportunity to read and consider the evidence and submissions of both parties. Until then the judge will often not be in a position to decide whether on balance of probability the applicant will succeed in obtaining a permanent injunction at the trial. In the nature of things this will take time, however speedily the proceedings are arranged and conducted . . . Confidentiality, once breached, is lost for ever. Parliament cannot have intended that, whatever the circumstances, section 12(3) would preclude a judge from making a restraining order for the period needed for him to form a view on whether on balance of probability the claim would succeed at trial. That would be absurd . . . Similarly, if a judge refuses to grant an interlocutory injunction preserving confidentiality until trial the court ought > not to be powerless to grant interim relief pending the hearing of an interlocutory appeal against the judge's order.[826]

824 Ibid, at para 22

825 Ibid, at para 19.

Thus, it is now clear that an injunction will be awarded only if the judge considers it more likely than not that the applicant will succeed at final trial. If the scales appear to be evenly balanced between the parties, injunctive relief will be refused, as set out in A v B.[827] It is argued that this stance does not necessarily comport readily with the establishment of the presumptive equality of Arts 8 and 10. Once privacy has been breached, it cannot be reinstated while the speech claim could be served at a later date, or could be served by a limited injunction concealing identity. In other words, there are nuanced methods of answering to the speech claim but not the privacy claim. The findings in Bannerjee, it is argued, elevate the speech claim over the privacy one in a manner which is not fully in accordance with the Strasbourg clashing rights jurisprudence. Since s 12(3) must be interpreted compatibly with the Convention rights under s 3 HRA, and the Convention jurisprudence must be taken into account under s 2, it is arguable that the test from Bannerjee should be re-visited in future by the House of Lords.

Ironically, the pre-HRA test gave a more equal weight to the two competing claims. The idea that newspapers would lose interest if the reporting was enjoined arose in a climate in which free speech had primacy and newspaper editors considered that their working practices should remain unfettered, confusing this idea quite frequently with free speech claims. Such confusion is also evident in early post-HRA decisions, such as Venables. But in the changed privacy-valuing culture that is now becoming established, the idea of maintaining relatively unfettered media working practices might need to be revisited: if the press did have to face the grant of interim injunctions quite frequently, they would have to modify their working practices accordingly. The need to show that it is more likely than not that the privacy claim would succeed at final trial can distort, it is argued, the parallel analysis, encouraging a judge inclined towards the privacy claim to over-state it in order to find it possible to award an interim injunction. Equally, and perhaps most worryingly, it might lead a judge to overstate the speech claim, in the face of a strong competing privacy interest, in order to avoid the grant of an injunction.

10 Conclusions

So what can finally be said as to the current state of legal protection for privacy in the UK, taking account also of the protections against state invasion of privacy detailed mainly in Chapter 10? As far as private actors are concerned, the main focus of this chapter, the position has changed dramatically in the post-HRA years. A comprehensive but complex and piecemeal protection against invasion of privacy can now be identified. It has a number of strands. First, misuse of private information can now give rise to liability. The new privacy liability has shaken itself free of the constraints previously imposed by the doctrine of confidence. Second, if a public authority breaches Art 8, ss 7 and 8 HRA can be relied on to obtain a remedy against it. That liability is much broader than the privacy liability that has grown out of the doctrine of confidence since it potentially reaches beyond providing protection for personal information and into a range of substantive privacy areas. Obviously the new privacy liability could also be relied upon as an alternative against a public authority. Thirdly, children and vulnerable adults can rely on the ECHR jurisdiction of the Court in seeking reporting restrictions. Since that jurisdiction is based on Art 8 it could cover invasions of privacy within the ambit of that Article other than misuse of private information. In cases of harassment, for example, a child or vulnerable adult could seek to rely on the ECHR jurisdiction; anyone could seek to rely on it against a public authority via ss 6 and 7 HRA. In all cases of harassment persons could seek to rely on the PHA. So it is apparent that although a quite comprehensive protection from invasion of privacy is now available, gaps and anomalies are still evident.

826 Ibid at paras 17–18.
827 Ibid at pp 240 ff.

Nevertheless, the existence of the new privacy liability, together with the provisions of the DPA and PHA, indicate that the available comprehensive domestic protection against invasion of privacy is almost as extensive as the protection provided by Art 8 at Strasbourg. In terms of rapidity of development, it out-stripped the Strasbourg protection at certain stages. The pronouncement in Wainwright as to the lack of a tort of invasion of privacy in UK law remains correct, but is becoming irrelevant since the protection provided by the developments under the HRA, together with that available under the various privacy statutes (including those discussed in Chapter 10), is so comprehensive.

However a note of caution must be sounded. Apart from the doubts expressed above as to the Bannerjee decision, it must also be pointed out that no appellate court has yet to deal with the Von Hannover situation in which snatched paparazzi photographs of daily life activities taken in the street or in public places, such as beaches, are published. The Campbell, Prince of Wales and McKennitt cases all dealt either with especially sensitive information, or with situations in which the old style doctrine of confidence would have applied in any event, or with both. However, the tone of the relevant decisions, especially in McKennit, suggests that the courts are now prepared to grant relief in the Von Hannover situation, so long as the invasion of privacy can be viewed as serious, since the parameters of Art 8 created by the jurisprudence are being allowed to determine whether information should or should not be viewed as private. But the seriousness of the invasion of privacy can be evaluated on the basis of a range of factors, as this chapter has indicated and not merely on the basis either of the nature of the location or of the especially intimate nature of the information. Those factors appear more likely to be relevant to the Art 8 and 10 balancing act, as opposed to being allowed to deny relief to the plaintiff at the stage of considering the private information claim.

The new ECHR jurisdiction, the new privacy liability and the liability of public authorities not to breach Art 8 are essentially the same cause of action since all are based on Art 8 and s 6 HRA. Something close to an absolute duty to bring the common law into line with the Convention rights has clearly been accepted in the transformation of confidence into privacy – the change that has been brought about to the doctrine of breach of confidence is dramatic. The pressure to accept direct horizontal effect in respect of privacy is becoming greater as an Art 8-based jurisdiction sweeps into domestic law like an incoming tide through the mechanisms of a range of separate causes of action.

The lacunae that are still apparent[828] appear less defensible and more anomalous. This is not, however, to suggest that the judges would accept this argument; indeed, for obvious reasons, they are likely to resist it, just as they have largely avoided acknowledging that an absolute duty to align domestic private common law with the Convention has now been accepted under s 6 HRA. If it can be accepted in this context, what arguments of principle are available to avoid accepting it in a number of others?

Legitimisation of the judicial enterprise in creating the new privacy liability was found in the HRA: its introduction of the Convention into UK law allowed the courts to draw upon the general principles expressed in the Strasbourg privacy jurisprudence.[829] As this chapter has sought to demonstrate, that enterprise is also grounded in universal human rights values as expressed in other jurisdictions. The achievement of the judges documented in this chapter is impressive; they have shown, it is argued, moral courage in imposing privacy values on a popular culture that pre-HRA resembled the impoverished US one in many respects.[830] The principal objection to the development of privacy rights has always been the perceived threat to media freedom. This chapter has argued that that fear is largely misplaced, and indeed that the right to free speech and to protection for privacy are 'mutually supportive',[831] because, as the German Supreme Court has put it, both are 'essential aspects of the liberal democratic order'.[832] The introduction of legal protection for privacy may be encouraging a movement away from the prurient trivia currently infesting so much of the print media, and therefore, far from threatening free speech in the press, could enhance it. As factors limiting the circumstances in which privacy claims can be raised at all, such as 'public domain' and the defence of waiver, are diminishing in importance, so the focus of attention becomes – even more clearly – the true strength of the speech claim.

828 It may be noted that in July 2007 the House of Commons Media Select Committee decided in favour of the continued self-regulation of the press, despite various lapses in journalistic standards, including breaches of the PCC Code earlier in 2007, which led to the examination of the current system operated by the PCC. The conviction of Clive Goodman, the News of the World's former Royal editor (see fn 7 above, and see for discussion of the offences in question, Chapter 10, for unlawfully intercepting voicemail left on the mobile phones of members of the Royal family and other public figures was taken into account by the Committee. Goodman's actions breached the Code as well as the criminal law.

829 A comparison may be drawn with Canada; see: Craig, JDR, 'Invasion of Privacy and Charter Values: The Common-Law Tort Awakens' (1997) 42 McGill LJ 355.

830 See further Anderson, D, 'The Failure of American Privacy Law' in Markesenis, B, (ed) Protecting Privacy op. cit., fn 1.

831 Emerson, C, 'The right of privacy and the freedom of the press' (1979) 14(2) Harvard Civil Rights–Civil Liberties Law Review 329. See also Kenyon, A and Richardson, M (eds), New Dimensions in Privacy Law (2007), CUP, Chapters 7 and 8.

832 BGH 19 December 1995 BGHZ 131, 322–46.

Chapter 10

Powers of the security and intelligence services; state surveillance; search and seizure of property

1 Introduction

The state possesses a myriad of methods of invading privacy in the course of seeking to prevent and detect crime or terrorist activity. It can place persons under surveillance, watch citizens on CCTV cameras, tap telephones, enter and search homes, or seek to build up a picture of a person's mind by examining websites visited or mobile numbers called. Agents of the state invade privacy with increasing frequency as technology allowing them to do so becomes more advanced. The method of obtaining information creates an invasion of privacy; its use creates a further invasion. These actions are undertaken by the police, other law enforcement agencies and the security and intelligence services with the aim of promoting internal security or preventing and detecting crime. Such aims are clearly legitimate; the question is whether the safeguards against unreasonable or arbitrary intrusion are adequate. Under the requirements of the Human Rights Act (HRA), such safeguards have to include a clear remedy for the citizen who has been the subject of unauthorised surveillance or other intrusion, and should create strict Convention-compliant controls over the power to effect such intrusion or issue authorisation for it. The latter safeguard is particularly crucial since the citizen may not even be aware that intrusion is taking place. This is particularly true of telephone tapping and the use of surveillance devices.

However, not only have legal developments failed to keep pace with technological ones, the principles which in a liberal democracy should inform the law governing such invasions of privacy have largely failed to find expression in it. It will be argued that the value of privacy still finds little place in it despite the fact that the central statute now governing this area, the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, was introduced specifically in order to meet the demands of the European Convention on Human Rights.

The common law has always given a high priority to preventing interference with personal property[1] and therefore, prior to the inception of the HRA, privacy received some incidental protection. Remedies for intrusion on property are found in the torts of trespass and nuisance, while seizure of goods is also prima facie tortious.[2] Trespass is defined as entering on to land in the possession of another without lawful justification. It is confined to instances in which there is some physical entry; prying with binoculars is not covered and, obviously, nor is electronic eavesdropping. The limitations of the law have been determined in certain decisions. In Hickman v Maisey[3] the defendant, who was on the highway, was watching the plaintiff's land. It was found that the plaintiff owned the land under the highway and that the defendant was entitled to make ordinary and reasonable use of it. Such watching was held not to be reasonable; the defendant had gone outside the accepted use and therefore had trespassed. Thus, it was made clear that intention in such instances is all important, but that unless behaviour could be linked to some kind of physical presence on land, trespass would not provide a remedy.

1 See McLorie v Oxford [1982] 1 QB 1290.
2 Under the torts of trespass to goods and conversion.

This decision can be contrasted with that in Bernstein v Skyviews and General Ltd[4] in order to determine the limits of trespass. The defendants flew over the plaintiff's land in an aircraft in order to take photographs of it and the question arose whether the plaintiff had a right in trespass to prevent such intrusion. It was held that either he had no rights of ownership over the air space to that height or, alternatively, if he did have such rights, s 40 of the Civil Aviation Act 1942 exempted reasonable flights from liability. The Court was not prepared to find that the taking of one photograph was unreasonable and a remedy could not be based solely on invasion of privacy as, of course, there is no such tort. The distinction between this decision and that in Hickman arises partly because the plaintiff could not show that he had an interest in what was violated – the air space – and so he fell outside the ambit of trespass.

The tort of nuisance has not provided a means of protecting privacy except in extreme instances. Liability for nuisance will arise if a person is disturbed in the enjoyment of his or her land to an extent that the law regards as unreasonable. There is a dearth of authority on the issue of straightforward surveillance but, in an Australian case, Victoria Park Racing Company v Taylor,[5] where a platform was erected in order to gain a view of a racecourse which diminished the value of the plaintiff's business, no remedy in nuisance was available. The activity was held not to affect the use and enjoyment of the land, but dicta in the case suggested that there would, in general, be no remedy in nuisance for looking over another's premises. However, dicta in Bernstein favoured the possibility that grossly invasive embarrassing surveillance would amount to a nuisance and that possibility was followed up (though not explicitly) in somewhat different circumstances in Khorasandjian v Bush.[6] An injunction was granted against the defendant restraining him from using violence to or harassing, pestering or communicating with the plaintiff, the child of the owner of the property in question. This decision, which sought to extend the tort to cover interference with rights to privacy, was criticised by the House of Lords in Hunter v Canary Wharf[7] in which it was confirmed that the tort is essentially concerned with injury to land. Thus, it is fair to conclude that trespass and nuisance offer only limited protection in this area from the crudest and most obvious forms of invasions of privacy.

3 [1900] 1 QB 752, CA.
4 [1978] QB 479; [1977] 2 All ER 902.
5 (1937) 58 CLR 479.
6 [1993] 3 All ER 669. For discussion of this decision, see (1993) 143 NLJ 926 and (1993) 143 NLJ 1685.
7 [1997] AC 655, pp 691G–692B.

Therefore, under the common law, when an invasion of privacy did not fall within these narrow areas of tortious liability, it did not require lawful authority. Thus police search and seizure of property required such authority, but the interception of communications and much state surveillance had no comprehensive legal basis. This chapter demonstrates that the European Convention on Human Rights, both before and after the inception of the HRA, has been the driving force for change. The state has been forced, incrementally, to accept that a legal basis for the invasion of privacy by state agents must be put in place. Such a basis is now in place, contained in a range of statutes of which the most comprehensive is the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000. However, the creation of a legal basis for state invasion of privacy does not necessarily mean that the requirements of Art 8 have been met. Moreover, there is now pressure to extend that legal basis to cover the imposed retention of communications data by mobile phone operators and other communications providers in order to aid in state surveillance. The main concern of this chapter is to consider how far Art 8 principles are in actuality reflected in these statutes, a concern that was given a sharper focus after the HRA came into force.

This chapter begins by considering police powers of entry and search. That section must be placed in the context of Chapters 11, 12 and 13 which consider a range of other aspects of police powers. The chapter moves on to consider the powers of the security and intelligence services and the procedures for creating accountability. The chapter concludes with consideration of a vast range of state surveillance powers, including powers to intercept communications. The provisions considered in this chapter are immensely extensive, complex and detailed, so in a book of this breadth and comprehensiveness, only an overview can be undertaken.

2 Police powers of entry and search[8]

In America, the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution guarantees freedom from unreasonable search and seizure by the police, thus recognising the invasion of privacy which a search of premises represents. A search without a warrant will normally[9] be unreasonable; therefore, an independent check is usually available on the search power.[10] In contrast, the common law in Britain, despite some rulings asserting the importance of protecting the citizen from the invasion of private property,[11] allowed 8 Texts referred to below: Feldman, D, The Law Relating to Entry, Search and Seizure, 1986; Stone, RTH, Entry, Search and Seizure, 4th edn, 2005 Chapter, 4; Lidstone, K and Bevan, V, Search and Seizure under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, 1992, University of Sheffield; Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, Civil Actions Against the Police, 2nd edn, 2005, Sweet and Maxwell, Chapter 7; Ashworth, A, The Criminal Process, 3rd edn, 2005, OUP; Feldman, D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 2nd edn, 2002, Chapters 5 and 9; Sanders, A and Young, R, Criminal Justice, 3rd edn, 2007, LexisNexis UK; Zander, M, The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, 2003; Clark, D, Bevan and Lidstone's The Investigation of Crime, 2004, LexisNexis UK.

9 Coolidge v New Hampshire (1973) 403 US 443: exception accepted where evidence might otherwise be destroyed.

10 For comment on the efficacy of this check, see Lafave, W, Search and Seizure, 1978, West.

11 See, e.g., rulings in Entinck v Carrington (1765) 19 St Tr 1029; Morris v Beardmore [1981] AC 446; [1980] 2 All ER 753.

search and seizure on wide grounds, going beyond those authorised by statute.[12] Thus, the common law did not provide full protection for the citizen and the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE) went some way to remedy this by placing powers of entry, search and seizure on a clearer basis and ensuring that the person whose premises are searched understands the basis of the search and can complain as to its conduct if necessary. Whether the procedures actually do provide sufficient protection for the privacy interests of the subject of the search is the question to be examined by this section. PACE provides for procedures to be followed where statutory applications for search warrants are made, under PACE itself or other statutes,[13] including post-PACE provisions; it also provides non-warrant-based powers of entry, search and seizure. In this respect it strongly resembles the provisions regarding stop and search in PACE, discussed in Chapter 13. On the stop and search model, the procedures to be followed in exercising entry and search powers and the safeguards for suspects and others are partly in a Code of Practice – Code B (2006 version). The Serious and Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 (SOCA) provided for significant extensions to entry and search powers, as indicated below.

Entry without warrant

Powers under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act (PACE)

The power to enter premises without warrant conferred by PACE, as amended, is balanced in a manner similar to the method employed in respect of stop and search, which is discussed in Chapter 13. A power of entry arises under s 18 if a person has been arrested for an indictable offence and the intention is to search the person's premises immediately after arrest:

> . . . a constable may enter and search any premises occupied or controlled by a person who is under arrest for an indictable offence, if he has reasonable grounds for suspecting that there is on the premises evidence, other than items subject to legal privilege, that relates:
>
> (a) to that offence; or
> (b) to some other arrestable offence which is connected with or similar to that offence.

The power can be exercised under s 17 to: execute a warrant of arrest arising out of criminal proceedings; where an officer wants to arrest a person suspected of an indictable offence; to recapture someone unlawfully at large (such as, for example, an escapee from a prison, court or mental hospital); to save life or limb or prevent serious damage to property. This provision regarding criminal proceedings allows an entry to be made to search for someone wanted under a warrant for non-payment of a fine. Apart from 12 The ruling in Ghani v Jones [1970] 1 QB 693 authorised seizure of a wide range of material once officers were lawfully on premises. Thomas v Sawkins [1935] 2 KB 249 allowed a wide power to enter premises to prevent crime (see below, p 1000).

13 For example, powers under s 23 Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 or Terrorism Act 2000, Sched 5, para 1.

the life or limb or serious damage provisions, a constable can only exercise the powers if he or she has reasonable grounds for believing that the person in question is on the premises.

Thus, the power is subject to some significant limitations; in particular it does not arise in respect of an arrest for a non-indictable offence. If a search is considered necessary in situations in which ss 17 or 18 are inapplicable after an arrest, a search warrant would have to be obtained unless the provisions of s 32 applied. Section 32(2)(b) allows a search of premises after arrest, if there are reasonable grounds for thinking that the arrestee, who has been arrested for an indictable offence, may present a danger to himself or others if the arrestee was arrested on those premises or was on them immediately before the arrest.

Search powers under the Terrorism Act 2000

The provisions for warrantless search of premises under PACE after arrest are wide enough to cover many circumstances in which police officers might wish to search for items relating to a terrorist investigation. But they are supplemented by special powers under warrant which are discussed below and also, in an emergency, by a power in the Terrorism Act 2000, Sched 5, para 3. Sections 33–36 of the Terrorism Act 2000 allow police officers of at least the rank of superintendent, engaged in a terrorism investigation, to establish in certain circumstances a police cordon around an area. Under s 33(1) ‘An area is a cordoned area for the purposes of this Act if it is designated under this section. (2) A designation may be made only if the person making it considers it expedient for the purposes of a terrorist investigation.’ Once the cordon is in place Sched 5, para 3 gives a power of search. It must be authorised in writing by an officer of at least the rank of superintendent who must have reasonable grounds for believing that material which would be of substantial value to the investigation, and which is not excluded or special material or material covered by legal privilege (see below), is on specified premises within the cordon. The power is exercised by a constable who may enter and search premises and may seize items not protected by legal privilege if he has reasonable grounds for believing that they will be of substantial value to the investigation. Under para 3(1): ‘Subject to sub-paragraph (2), a police officer of at least the rank of superintendent may by a written authority signed by him authorise a search of specified premises which are wholly or partly within a cordoned area.’ Under para 3(2) ‘A constable who is not of the rank required by sub-paragraph (1) may give an authorisation under this paragraph if he considers it necessary by reason of urgency.’ This power of search previously arose under s 16C and para 7 of Sched 6A which were added to the PTA by the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994. Para 7 of Sched 6A gave a power of search. There is evidence that the use of special search powers without the need to rely on reasonable suspicion or on a warrant have some value in terrorist investigations.[14] Nevertheless, the use of such powers represents an invasion of liberty which requires a strong and clear justification rather than a reliance on an uncertain phrase such as ‘expedient’.

14 See Walker, C, The Prevention of Terrorism, 2nd edn, 1992 p 195.

Search powers under the Police Act 1997

As discussed below, this Act places police powers of surveillance on a statutory basis. It also provides powers of entry, search and seizure. An authorisation may be issued if the search is believed to be necessary because it will be of substantial value in the prevention and detection of serious crime and the objective cannot reasonably be achieved by other means (s 93(2)). Under s 93(4)

> 'For the purposes of subsection (2), conduct which constitutes one or more offences shall be regarded as serious crime if, and only if –
>
> (a) it involves the use of violence, results in substantial financial gain or is conduct by a large number of persons in pursuit of a common purpose, or
> (b) the offence or one of the offences is an offence for which a person who has attained the age of twenty-one and has no previous convictions could reasonably be expected to be sentenced to imprisonment for a term of three years or more . . .'

As explained below,[15] the main check on these extensive powers is provided by the special commissioners appointed from the senior judiciary (s 91(1)). Where the entry and search contemplated is of a dwelling house, prior approval by the commissioner is necessary, but this requirement is waived where the authorising officer believes that the search is urgent (s 94(2)). Since the belief does not need to be based on reasonable grounds, such a safeguard may have little impact in practice. These controversial extensions of the police powers of entry under the 1997 Act are therefore subject to very limited independent oversight and, unlike the s 18 power, they may be divorced from the needs of an immediate criminal investigation.

Search warrants

Searching of premises other than under ss 17 and 18 can also occur if a search warrant is issued under s 8 of PACE, as amended, by a magistrate or if a warrant is applied for under other statutory powers, including post-PACE powers. Applications for all warrants by police officers, and the execution of the warrant must comply with the procedures set out in ss 15 and 16 of PACE. The application for the warrant must be supported, under s 15(3), by an 'Information' in writing. It must specify the enactment under which it is issued, the premises to be searched[16] and the articles or persons to be sought (s 15(6)). Section 8(1C), inserted by s 113(4) of the Serious and Organised Crime and Police Act 2005 (SOCA), provides that multiple entry can be authorised. Section 15(5A), also introduced in 2005 by SOCA, provides that if the warrant authorises multiple entry it must specify whether the multiple entries are limited to a specified maximum or unlimited. Previously, the warrant authorised entry to premises on one occasion only.

Section 16 governs the procedure to be followed in executing the warrant. The warrant must be produced to the occupier (although it seems that this need not be at the time of entry if impracticable in the circumstances)[17] under s 16(5) (b) and (c) and must identify the articles to be sought, although once the officer is on the premises, other articles may be seized under s 19 if they appear to relate to any other offence. The warrant does not necessarily allow for a general search of the premises[18] since the search can only be for the purpose for which the warrant was issued (s 16(8)). The extensiveness of the search depends upon that purpose.

15 See p 1065.
16 Southwestern Magistrates' Court ex p Cofie [1997] 1 WLR 885.
17 Longman [1988] 1 WLR 619, CA; for comment, see Stevens, R, Justice of the Peace, 1988, p 551.

Under s 16, the copy of the warrant issued to the subject of the search must identify the articles or persons sought and the offence suspected, but need not specify the grounds on which it was issued or give the name of the constable conducting the search. A warrant, like the Notice of Powers and Rights (discussed below) therefore provides the occupier with limited information. Moreover, as noted above, it need not be produced to the occupier before the search begins if the purpose of the search might be frustrated by such production.[19] However, within these limitations, the courts seem prepared to take a strict view of the importance of complying with this safeguard. In Chief Constable of Lancashire ex p Parker and McGrath[20] police officers conducted a search of the applicant's premises in the execution of a search warrant issued under s 8 of PACE. However, after the warrant had been signed by the judge, the police detached part of it and reattached it to the other original documents. In purported compliance with s 16 of PACE, the police produced all these documents to the applicants. Thus, the police did not produce the whole of the original warrant and moreover, did not supply one of the documents constituting the warrant. The applicants applied for judicial review of both the issue and the execution of the warrants. It was determined that s 16(5)(b) of PACE had been breached in that the warrant produced to the applicants was not the original warrant as seen and approved by the judge and a declaration was granted to that effect. The police had admitted that there was a breach of the requirement under s 16(5)(c) that a copy of the warrant should be supplied to the occupier of the premises.

A warrant under s 8 will only be issued if there are reasonable grounds for believing that an indictable offence has been committed and where the material is likely to be of substantial value to the investigation of the offence and which will be admissible evidence at trial. A large number of other statutes also provide for the issuing of warrants to the police and to other public officials. Special provisions arise, inter alia, under s 27 of the Drug Trafficking Act 1994, s 2(4) of the Criminal Justice Act 1987 (in relation to serious fraud) and, as discussed below, in relation to the security and intelligence services under the Intelligence Services Act 1994. Section 8 covers 'all premises' searches and under certain circumstances, and as indicated, under changes introduced by s 113 SOCA, multiple entries to the same premises are possible.

A warrant authorising the police to search premises does not of itself authorise officers to search persons on the premises. The Home Office circular on PACE stated that such persons could be searched only if a specific power to do so arose under the warrant (for example, warrants issued under s 23 of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971).

A wide power to search premises also arose under Sched 7, para 2 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989[21] which, in contrast to the warrant 18 See Chief Constable of Warwick Constabulary ex p Fitzpatrick [1999] 1 WLR 564.

19 Longman [1988] 1 WLR 619, CA.
20 (1992) 142 NLJ 635.
21 See Walker, C, The Prevention of Terrorism, 2nd edn, 1992, pp 185–97.

power under PACE, was not dependent on the need to allege a specific offence and could therefore take place at a very early stage in the investigation. This power was reproduced in the Terrorism Act 2000, Sched 5 which, as Chapter 14 indicates, applies to a wider range of groups. A justice of the peace must be satisfied that a terrorist investigation is being carried out and that there are reasonable grounds for believing that there is material which is likely to be of substantial value to the investigation. Also, it must appear that it is impracticable to gain entry to the premises with consent and that immediate entry to the premises is necessary. A warrant could also be issued under s 15(1) of the PTA in order to allow entry to premises to effect an arrest under s 14(1)(b). This power was thought necessary since the general PACE powers would not be applicable due to the broad nature of s 14(1)(b).[22] It was continued in the Terrorism Act 2000, Sched 5.

Power to enter premises at common law

Section 17(5) PACE abolished all common law powers to enter premises, subject to s 17(6), which preserves powers to enter without consent to deal with or prevent a breach of the peace. At common law, a power to enter premises in order to prevent crime arises from the much criticised case of Thomas v Sawkins.[23] Lord Hewart CJ contemplated that a police officer would have the right to enter private premises when 'he has reasonable grounds for believing that an offence is imminent or is likely to be committed'. This judgment received some endorsement from the provision of s 17(5) and (6), common law powers to enter were only preserved to deal with or prevent a breach of the peace; this narrowed down the power of entry, since it did not arise in respect of any offence. Thomas v Sawkins arose in the context of a public meeting held on private premises, but common law powers are not confined to such circumstances; in McGowan v Chief Constable of Kingston on Hull[24] it was found that police officers were entitled to enter and remain on private premises when they feared a breach of the peace arising from a private quarrel. The powers are even broader than s 17(6) would appear, on its face, to indicate: in R (on the application of Rottnam) v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis[25] the House of Lords found that s 17 was concerned with powers to enter to arrest and that it did not limit the common law power to enter premises without consent after arrest.

Voluntary searches

Code of Practice B (2006 version) made under PACE,[26] which governs powers of entry, search and seizure, makes special provision for voluntary searches. Paragraph 4 of Code B as originally drafted provided that a search of premises could take place with the consent of the occupier and provided under para 4(2) that he must be informed that he need not consent to the search; in requiring that the consent should be in 22 See below, Chapter 11, pp 1147–48.

23 [1935] 2 KB 249; for criticism, see Goodhart, ALG (1947) 6 CLJ 222; see further Chapter 9, p 433.
24 [1968] Crim LR 34. But see the ruling in McLeod v UK (1998) 27 EHRR 493.
25 [2002] 2 All ER 865.
26 See Chapter 11, pp 1106–8 for discussion of the PACE Codes of Practice.

writing, it recognised that there might sometimes be a doubt as to the reality of such consent and went some way towards resolving that doubt. After revision in 1991, para 4 went further in that direction and under the 2006 version para 5 reiterated its provisions. Under sub-para 5.1 the officer concerned must ensure that the consent is being sought from the correct person, whereas previously this problem was only addressed in a Note for Guidance (4A), and then only in respect of lodgings. Sub-para 5.3 provides that the search must cease if the consent is withdrawn during it and also contains an express provision against using duress to obtain consent.[27] However, it has been doubted whether these provisions have had much effect on ensuring that use of consensual search is not abused because it is not always made clear to occupiers that they can withhold consent.[28]

Power of seizure

At common law prior to PACE, a wide power of seizure had developed where a search was not under warrant. Articles could be seized so long as they either implicated the owner or occupier in any offence or implicated third parties in the offence for which the search was conducted.[29] However, the power of seizure under PACE is even wider than this. Under s 8(2), a constable may seize and retain anything for which a search has been authorised. Section 8(2) provides that: 'A constable may seize and retain anything for which a search has been authorised under sub-section (1) above.' The power of seizure without warrant under the power of entry and search after arrest is governed by s 18(2), which provides that: 'A constable may seize and retain anything for which he may search under sub-section (1) above.' This power is greatly widened, however, by the further power of seizure arising under s 19:

> The constable may seize anything which is on the premises if he has reasonable grounds for believing:
>
> (a) that it has been obtained in consequence of the commission of an offence; and
> (b) that it is necessary to seize it in order to prevent it being concealed, lost, damaged, altered or destroyed.
>
> The constable may seize anything which is on the premises if he has reasonable grounds for believing:
>
> (a) that it is evidence in relation to an offence which he is investigating or any other offence; and
> (b) that it is necessary to seize it in order to prevent the evidence being concealed, lost, altered or destroyed.

Under s 22(1), anything which has been so seized may be retained 'so long as is necessary in all the circumstances'. It was made clear in Chief Constable of Lancashire ex p

27 For criticism of these provisions, see Bevan, K and Palmer, C, Bevan and Lidstone's The Investigation of Crime, 1996, pp 117–21.

28 See further Dixon, D, 'Consent and the legal regulation of policing' (1990) 17 JLS 345–62.

29 Ghani v Jones [1970] 1 QB 693; Garfinkel v MPC [1972] Crim LR 44.

Parker and McGrath[30] that the above provisions assume that the search itself is lawful; in other words, material seized during an unlawful search cannot be retained and if it is, an action for trespass to goods may arise. It was accepted in this instance that the search was unlawful (see below), but the Chief Constable contended that the material seized could nevertheless be retained. This argument was put forward under the provision of s 22(2)(a), which allows the retention of 'anything seized for the purposes of a criminal investigation'. The Chief Constable maintained that these words would be superfluous unless denoting a general power to retain unlawfully seized material. However, it was held that the sub-section could not bear the weight sought to be placed upon it: it was merely intended to give examples of matters falling within the general provision of s 22(1). Therefore. the police were not entitled to retain the material seized.

Excluded or special procedure material or material covered by legal privilege

Under s 9, excluded or special procedure material or material covered by legal privilege cannot be seized during a search not under warrant and it is exempt from the s 8 search warrant procedure under s 8(1). However, the police may gain access to excluded or special procedure material by making an application to a circuit judge in accordance with Sched 1 or, in the case of special procedure material only, to a magistrate for a search warrant. Access to excluded material may only be granted where it could have been obtained under the previous law relating to such material. Excluded material is defined under s 11 to consist of material held on a confidential basis, personal records,[31] samples of human tissue or tissue fluid held in confidence and journalistic material held in confidence. Personal records include records held by schools, universities, probation officers and social workers. 'Special procedure material' defined under s 14 operates as a catch-all category which is, it seems, frequently used[32] to cover confidential material which does not qualify as personal records or journalistic material.[33] A production order will not be made unless there is reasonable suspicion that a serious arrestable offence has been committed, the material is likely to be of substantial value to the investigation and admissible at trial. It should be noted that when inquiries relating to terrorist offences are made, Sched 7, para 3 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 (PTA) allowed access to both special procedure and excluded material. This power is reproduced in Sched 5 to the Terrorism Act 2000 which allows for orders to be made in relation to obtaining access to such material.[34] The judge only 30 [1993] 2 WLR 428; [1993] 1 All ER 56; (1992) 142 NLJ 635.

31 Defined in s 12.

32 See Lidstone, K (1989) NILQ 333, p 342.

33 For comment on these provisions, see Stone, R, 'PACE: Special Procedures and Legal Privilege' [1988] Crim LR 498.

34 Sched 5, para 5:

> (1) A constable may apply to a Circuit judge for an order under this paragraph for the purposes of a terrorist investigation.
>
> (2) An application for an order shall relate to particular material, or material of a particular description, which consists of or includes excluded material or special procedure material.(3) An order under this paragraph may require a specified person – needs to be satisfied that there is a terrorist investigation in being, that the material would substantially assist it and that it is in the public interest that it should be produced. It may well be that once the first two requirements are satisfied, it will be rare to find that the third is not.

The ruling in Guildhall Magistrates' Court ex p Primlacks Holdings Co (Panama) Ltd[35] made it clear that a magistrate must satisfy him or herself that there were reasonable grounds for believing that the items covered by the warrant did not include material subject to the special protection. The magistrates had issued search warrants authorising the search of two solicitors' firms. Judicial review of the magistrates' decision to issue a warrant was successfully sought; it was found that the magistrate had merely accepted the police officer's view that s 8(1) was satisfied rather than independently considering the matter.

The strongest protection extends to items subject to legal privilege, since they cannot be searched for or seized by police officers and therefore, the meaning of 'legal privilege' is crucial. Under s 10, it will cover communications between client and solicitor connected with giving advice or with legal proceedings. However, if items are held with the intention of furthering a criminal purpose they will not, under s 10(2), attract legal privilege. It seems that this will include the situation where the solicitor unknowingly furthers the criminal purpose of the client or a third party. In Crown Court at Snaresbrook ex p DPP[36] it was found that only the solicitor's intentions regarding the criminal purpose were relevant, but the House of Lords in Central Criminal Court ex p Francis and Francis[37] rejected this interpretation in finding that material which figures in the criminal intentions of persons other than solicitor or client will not be privileged. A judge must give full consideration to the question whether particular documents have lost legal privilege.[38]

This interpretation of s 10(2) was adopted on the basis that otherwise, the efforts of the police in detecting crime might be hampered, but it may be argued that it gives insufficient weight to the need to protect the special relationship between solicitor and client and, as argued below, is arguably vulnerable to challenge under the HRA.

Powers of seizure under the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001

The Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001 (CJP) extended the power of seizure very significantly. The further powers of seizure it provides in s 50 apply to police powers of search under PACE and also to powers of seizure arising under a range of other statutes and applicable to bodies other than police officers, as set out in Sched 1 to the

(a) to produce to a constable within a specified period for seizure and retention any material which he has in his possession, custody or power and to which the application relates;

(b) to give a constable access to any material of the kind mentioned in paragraph (a) within a specified period;

(c) to state to the best of his knowledge and belief the location of material to which the application relates if it is not in, and it will not come into, his possession, custody or power within the period specified under paragraph (a) or (b).

35 [1989] 2 WLR 841.

36 [1988] QB 532; [1988] 1 All ER 315.

37 [1989] AC 346; [1988] 3 All ER 375. For comment, see Stevenson (1989) Law Soc Gazette 1 February, p 26.

38 R v Southampton Crown Court ex p J and P [1993] Crim LR 962.

CJP. The power of seizure under s 50(1) depends on three conditions. The person in question must lawfully be on the premises. Once there, if he finds something which he has reasonable grounds for thinking is something he is authorised to seize, and it is not reasonably practicable at the time to determine whether what he has found is something he is authorised to seize, he can seize as much of it as is necessary to make that determination. A further power of seizure under s 50(2) allows the person in question to seize material which he has no power to seize but which is attached to an object he does have the power to seize, if it is not reasonably practicable to separate the two.

This provision is significant since, inter alia, it allows police officers to remove items from premises even where they are not certain that – apart from s 50 – they have the power to do so. Thus a number of items can now be seized from premises although no power of seizure – apart from that arising under s 50 – in fact arises.

As indicated above, the seizure of excluded or special procedure material is restricted, while material covered by legal privilege cannot be seized. Most significantly, s 50 may serve to undermine these protections for certain material since where such material is part of other material and cannot practicably be separated, it can be seized. It can also be seized where a police officer takes the view on reasonable grounds that it is something that he has the power to seize, although it turns out later that it falls within one of the special categories.

Special provisions are made for the return of excluded or special procedure material or material covered by legal privilege. For obvious reasons, these provisions are most significant in relation to material covered by legal privilege since they could aid in undermining the privilege. Under s 54 such material must be returned unless it falls within s 54(2). Section 54(2) covers a legally privileged item comprised in other material. Such an item will fall within that sub-section if the retention of the rest of the property would be lawful and it is not reasonably practicable to separate the legally privileged item from the rest of the property without prejudicing the use of the rest of that property. Section 57(3) provides that ss 53–56 do not authorise the retention of property where its retention would not be authorised apart from the provisions of Part 2of the CJP. Under s 62 inextricably linked property cannot be examined or copied but under sub-section 4 can be used to the extent that its use facilitates the use of property in which the inextricably linked property is comprised.

The provisions of ss 57 and 62, taken together with the provisions of ss 54 and 55 appear to create two categories of property. Property within the first can be retained as it would have been but for the CJP. Property within the second is not subject to an obligation to return but cannot be treated as it would have been had it fallen within the first category. It can be used to a limited extent in accordance with s 62(4). Section 62 makes it clear that s 62(4) applies to excluded or special procedure material or material covered by legal privilege which has not been returned since it is comprised in other lawfully held property.

Thus, ss 50, 54 and 55 taken together do provide avenues to the seizure and non-return of the specially protected material. The provisions thus circumvent the limitations placed on the seizure of excluded or special procedure material and, most importantly of all, provide an avenue to the seizure and use of legally privileged material. It can be said that for the first time legally privileged material has lost part of the protection it was accorded under the common law and under PACE.

These wide powers are 'balanced' by the provisions of ss 52–61 which provide a number of safeguards. Notice must be given to persons whose property has been seized under s 52, and under s 59 he or she can apply to the 'appropriate judicial authority' for the return of the whole or part of the seized property, on the ground that there was no power to seize, or that excluded or special procedure material, or legally privileged material, is not comprised in other property as provided for in ss 54 and 55. Under s 60 a duty to secure the property arises which includes the obligation under s 61 to prevent inter alia, copying of it. But despite these safeguards, it is unclear that these powers, especially to seize and use legally privileged material, are compatible with the requirements of the Convention under the HRA.

Procedural safeguards for searches under Code of Practice B

As revised in 1991, 1995, 2005, Code of Practice B made under PACE provides for an increase in the amount of information to be conveyed to owners of property to be searched by use of a standard form, the Notice of Powers and Rights (para 6.7). It covers certain information including specification of the type of search in question, a summary of the powers of search and seizure arising under PACE and the rights of the subjects of searches. This notice must normally be given to the subject of the search before it begins, but under para 6.8 need not be if to do so would lead to frustration of the object of the search or danger to the police officers concerned or to others. These exceptions also apply under para 6.8 to leaving a copy of the warrant where the search is made under warrant. As explained above, s 18(4) provides that premises occupied or controlled by a person arrested for an arrestable offence may be searched after the arrest if an officer of the rank of inspector or above gives authority in writing. Under para 4.3, the authority should normally be given on the Notice of Powers and Rights. This clears up previous confusion[39] as to the form the authority should take.

Under original paras 4 and 5, the amount of information to be conveyed to the subject of a search depended on its status. Before any non-consensual search, an officer had to convey certain information orally to its subject: his identity, the purpose of the search and the grounds for undertaking it. In the case of a consensual search, it was only necessary to inform its subject of its purpose. Thus, the subject of an apparently consensual search dissatisfied with its conduct or intimidated by the officers concerned would have found it more difficult to make a complaint than would the subject of a non-consensual search. Under current para 6 as revised, the subjects of all searches, regardless of the status of the search, must receive a copy of the Notice of Powers and Rights and, under para 6.8 where a consensual search has taken place but the occupier is absent, the Notice should be endorsed with the name, number and station of the officer concerned. Oddly enough, it is not stated expressly that this information must be added to the Notice where the subject of a consensual search is present. Sub-paragraph 6.5 provides that officers must identify themselves except in the case of inquiries linked to terrorism or where this might endanger them (para 2.9), but this provision appears to apply only to non-consensual searches due to the heading of that section. It might be thought that a person who voluntarily allows police officers to come onto his or her premises does not need the information mentioned, but this is to ignore the possibility that such a person might wish to withdraw consent during the search but might feel too intimidated to do so.

39 In Badham [1987] Crim LR 202 it was held that merely writing down confirmation of an oral authorisation was insufficient.

The power to search and seize is balanced by the need to convey certain information to the subject of the search in question, thereby rendering officers (at least theoretically) accountable for searches carried out. However, it is arguable that the provisions are largely of a presentational nature: they ensure that a large amount of information is conveyed to the occupier and make an attempt to ensure that community relations are not adversely affected by the operation of the search power,[40] but have little to say about the way the search should be conducted. In other words, the regulation of the search power under Code B emphasises the provision of information to the owner of premises so that officers can be rendered accountable for searches made, rather than regulating circumstances relating to the nature of the search itself in order to minimise the invasion of privacy represented by such searches.

In contrast, searches made in order to gain evidence relating to civil proceedings, under orders known as Anton Piller orders,[41] must observe a number of safeguards: they must be organised on weekdays in office hours so that legal advice can be obtained before the search begins; the defendant must be allowed to check the list of items to be seized before items can be removed and in some circumstances, an independent solicitor experienced in the execution of such orders must be present, instructed and paid for by the plaintiff.[42] It may be argued that there is a greater public interest in the prevention of crime than in ensuring that evidence is obtained by a party to civil proceedings, and therefore the police need at times to make an immediate search of premises, but the power to do so without judicial intervention should, it is submitted, be narrowed down to instances where the urgency of the search was demonstrable, while Code B should, it is argued, contain clearer safeguards applicable to all searches, allowing, for instance, for a legal advisor to be present during a non-urgent search and including a clear prohibition on non-urgent searches at night. At present, searches should be conducted at 'a reasonable hour'[43] and under Note for Guidance 5A this was explained to mean at a time when the occupier or others are unlikely to be asleep. This Note has been dropped from the 2006 version of Code B, although a rather vague provision appears in para 6.10 to the effect that search must be conducted with 'due consideration' for the privacy of the occupier. A prohibition on the non-urgent entry and search of property at night by state agents – perhaps one of the most unpleasant invasions of privacy possible – requires a clearer and more certain basis. The question of the meaning of a 'reasonable hour' was raised in Pharmaceuticals Ltd v Director

40 There is provision under para 3.5 for informing the local police community relations officer before a search of premises takes place if it is thought that it might adversely affect the relationship between the police and the community, subject to the proviso that in cases of urgency it can be performed after the search has taken place.

41 From Anton Piller KG v Manufacturing Processes Ltd [1976] Ch 55; [1976] 1 All ER 779, CA.

42 These conditions, and others, were laid down in Universal Thermosensors Ltd v Hibben (1992) 142 NLJ 195. For discussion of the concern created by such orders prior to this decision, see (1990) 106 LQR 601.

43 Code B, para 6.2.

of the SFO,[44] and the Divisional Court took the view that a search of premises at 6.00 am was at a reasonable hour, partly because the members of the household would be more likely to be present, bearing in mind the time at which people normally leave for work. This view is clearly open to doubt and the application of the search powers in that instance is, it is suggested, in doubtful compliance with Art 8. Provision appears in Note 6C to the effect that the number of persons involved in the search shall be determined by what is reasonable and necessary in the circumstances. But, as discussed elsewhere,[45] the Notes for Guidance are not part of the Codes and are of very uncertain legal status. The provision that an occupier may ask a friend or neighbour to witness the search unless there are reasonable grounds for believing 'that this would seriously hinder the investigation' would usually be completely inadequate to allow the occupier to obtain legal advice or the presence of a solicitor.[46]

Impact of the HRA and police accountability

The PACE search and seizure provisions are clearly intended to make lawful actions which would otherwise amount to trespass to property and to goods only in very specific circumstances and only where a certain procedure has been followed. Invasion of a person's home has traditionally been viewed as an infringement of liberty which should be allowed only under tightly controlled conditions and in the exercise of a specific legal power. Article 8 ECHR under the HRA affords specific expression to these values.[47] But it also goes further, and under ss 6 and 8 HRA a public authority is acting unlawfully and is liable to pay compensation for a breach of Art 8 in conducting a search of premises[48] even where pre-HRA, no liability would have arisen in tort. The PACE provisions suggest some determination to strike a reasonable balance between the perceived need to confer on the police a general power to search property and the need to protect the privacy of the citizen. It is less clear that this is true of the TA and CJP provisions.

Breaches of Code of Practice B

Although Code B plays a part in creating safeguards for individual privacy, breaches of Code B will not attract tortious liability[49] and unlike Codes C, D and E (discussed in Chapters 11, 12 and 13), exclusion of evidence will rarely operate as a form of redress because the courts are very reluctant to exclude physical evidence[50] and therefore it can have little impact on Code B provisions. Such reluctance may be justifiable since the significance of Code B can be attributed to its regulation of invasive procedures

44 [2002] EWHC 3023.
45 See Chapter 11, p 1108.
46 Paragraph 5.11.
47 See Chapter 2, pp 69–70, 72–74, 75, 89–91 for discussion of relevant aspects of Art 8.
48 See, e.g., Keegan v United Kingdom (2003) App 28867/03. The decision concerned the obtaining of compensation in the European Court of Human Rights for breach of Art 8 and Art 13 following a police search.
49 PACE 1984, s 67(10).
50 See below Chapter 14, pp 1287–99.

rather than to its concern to ensure the integrity of the evidence thereby obtained. As Chapter 12 demonstrates, Codes C, D and E, on the other hand, are arguably concerned more with outcome than with rights (with the exception of access to legal advice) which are fundamental in themselves. This difference is due partly to the nature of the rights involved: privacy of the home or of the person represents an important value in itself, unlike a person's right to the contemporaneous recording of an interview. However, this does leave something of a gap as far as a means of redress for breaches of Code B is concerned in comparison with the other three Codes, since the only means available will normally be by way of a complaint. The possibility of raising arguments in criminal proceedings under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA which might lead – in effect – to an enhancement of the status of the Codes of Practice is discussed in Chapters 11 and 12.[51]

Reliance on Art 8

Article 8 values are reflected in this scheme to an extent and may be coming to influence it more strongly due to the use of arguments under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA, either raised in criminal proceedings, in civil actions against the police for trespass, trespass to goods or for conversion, or as freestanding actions under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA. The use of Art 8 arguments in the different context of police custody is considered in Chapter 11 and those arguments would arguably also have applicability here in relation to the level of intrusiveness represented by a search; the proportionality of the search to the aim of preventing crime could be raised.[52] It could be argued that whether or not a basis in law for an entry to property is established, rendering the action non-trespassory, various features of the police actions might amount to infringements of Art 8. Where it was clear that a legal basis for the entry itself was likely to be established, a freestanding action could be brought against the police as a public authority under s 7(1)(a), arguing that although the entry had such a basis, such features amounted to a breach of Art 8, as Chapter 13 considers.[53] The use of Art 8 arguments in criminal proceedings under s 7(1)(b) is discussed in Chapters 12 and 13.[54]

The European Court of Human Rights has found that entry, search and seizure can create interferences with all the Art 8 guarantees apart from that of the right to respect for family life.[55] Search for and seizure of documents is covered by the term 'correspondence' and the documents do not have to be personal in nature.[56] Such interferences can be justified only if they are in accordance with the law (Art 8(2)). This requirement covers not only the existence of national law, but its quality.[57] The statutory and common law powers probably meet this requirement[58] and have the legitimate aim of preventing crime or protecting national security.

51 See Chapters 11 and 12, pp 1174–81 and 1207–8.
52 See pp 1178–81.
53 See pp 1308–9.
54 See pp 1289–95, and also Chapter 12, pp 1207–8.
55 See Funke v France (1993) 16 EHRR 297; Mialhe v France (1993) 16 EHRR 332.
56 See Niemetz v Germany A 251-B (1992).
57 Kopp v Switzerland (1999) 27 EHRR 91, paras 70–71.
58 In McLeod v UK (1998) 27 EHRR 493 powers to enter to prevent a breach of the peace were found to meet this requirement (paras 38–45).

It must further be shown that the interference 'corresponds to a pressing social need and, in particular, that it is proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued'.[59] It was found in the context of intercept warrants in Klass v FRG[60] that judicial or administrative authority for warrants would provide a degree of independent oversight: sufficient safeguards against abuse were available. This requirement was also stressed in Kopp v Switzerland.[61] It could be argued that the arrangements whereby magistrates issue search warrants might fail to meet this requirement since, although in appearance an independent judicial check is available before the event, the 'check' may be almost a formality in reality.[62] These provisions provide a scheme which is reasonably sound in theory, but which is dependent on magistrates observing its requirements. Research suggests that in practice, some magistrates make little or no attempt to ascertain whether the information a warrant contains may be relied upon, while it seems possible that magistrates who do take a rigorous approach to the procedure and refuse to grant warrants are not approached again.[63] It might be considered, therefore, that a breach of Art 8 might be established in respect of the practice of certain magistrates. It may be noted, however, that this argument failed in the Scottish case of Birse v HM Advocate.[64]

It is also arguable that the decision of the House of Lords in Central Criminal Court ex p Francis and Francis[65] regarding material subject to legal professional privilege may require re-consideration in relation to Art 8. As indicated above, the House of Lords found that privilege is lost when the material is innocently held, but is for a third party's criminal purpose. The approach in Niemetz v Germany[66] was to the effect that a search of a lawyer's office had led to a breach of Art 8 since it was disproportionate to the aims of preventing crime and of protecting the rights of others. That decision also raises questions about the provisions of Part 2 of the CJP. Since the CJP was accompanied by a declaration of its compatibility with the Convention rights, legal advice to the government must have been to the effect that Part 2 was compatible with Art 8. Clearly, this advice could subsequently be found to be flawed; the judiciary remain entirely free (in the higher courts, as Chapter 4 explained) to make a declaration of incompatibility between one or more of the Part 2 provisions and Art 8.

Clearly it could be argued that the limitations placed on the seizure and the use of legally privileged material by Part 2 may represent a proportionate response to the aim of preventing crime under Art 8(2). In other words, an interference with the Art 8 rights represented by the existence of legislation or in any particular instance could be viewed as relatively minimal, consistent with the need to serve that aim. On the other hand, the use of Part 2 provisions in practice may undermine the relationship between client and solicitor. The attitude of the courts in this context as indicated in decisions

59 Olsson v Sweden A 130 (1988), para 67.
60 (1978) 2 EHRR 214.
61 (1999) 27 EHRR 91.
62 See the comments of Feldman, D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 1st edn, 1993, p 414 and of Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, The Law of Human Rights, 2000, p 863.
63 This point is made by Dixon, D (1991) 141 NLJ 1586.
64 Unreported, 13 April 2000.
65 [1989] AC 346; [1988] 3 All ER 375. For comment, see Stevenson (1989) Law Soc Gazette 1 February, p 26.
66 A 251-B (1992).

such as Pharmaceuticals Ltd v Director of the SFO does not at present demonstrate a clear determination to afford the Convention rights real efficacy.

3 Powers of the security and intelligence services

Introduction

Traditionally, the security and intelligence services were governed by informal non-statutory mechanisms. The Security Service (MI5) was governed by the unpublished Findlater-Stewart Memorandum and then by the Maxwell-Fyfe Directive published in 1952. The Intelligence Service (MI6) was governed by a Directive to 'C' – the title given to the Chief of the Service. Until 1994, MI6 'maintained [its] existence in legal darkness'.[67] After an existence which spanned almost all of the twentieth century, it was only in 1989 that the government admitted to the existence of the Security Service[68] and only in 1994 to the existence of the Secret Intelligence Service.[69] GCHQ, the signals intercept body, was also placed on a statutory basis in 1994.

The central impetus for change arose from the need to comply with the demands of the European Convention on Human Rights,[70] well before the introduction of the HRA. Once a model for the statutory framework of MI5 had been devised in the form of the Security Service Act 1989, based on the model used for the Interception of Communications Act 1985, also introduced to comply with the Convention, the model was extended to the Secret Intelligence Service and GCHQ in the Intelligence Services Act 1994. A complaints mechanism relying on deliberation in secret by a Commissioner and tribunals was created. At the same time, a level of parliamentary oversight of the agencies was added. Thus, in 1997, the Labour Government inherited a particular statutory framework. It largely adopted, it will be argued, the model that framework provided when it made changes to the agencies' accountability in the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000.

In the era of the Northern Irish peace process, fragile as it is, and of the HRA, with its guarantee of protection for individual privacy in Art 8, the powers of the three agencies raise a number of concerns. The government considers that current levels of terrorist activity provide a justification for increasing the funding for the services. This view of the government is reflected in the recent budgets for the three agencies and, as the government puts it, it has 'set spending plans which will enable the agencies to face up to the formidable tasks, old, new and changing, which confront them'.[71] The Security Service has had a role in countering terrorist threats since the 1960s. But 67 Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, 'The Security Service Act 1989' (1989) 52 MLR 801, p 802.

68 The Secret Service bureau was established in 1909 and became known as MI5 in January 1916.

69 See also Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, In From the Cold: National Security and Parliamentary Democracy, 1994, Coda for discussion of the statutory framework for MI6, and Wadham (1994) 57(6) MLR 916. For discussion of aspects of the changed position of MI6, see Davies, P, 'Integrating intelligence into the machinery of British central government' (2000) 78(1) Public Administration 29.

70 See Harman and Hewitt v UK, Appl No 1211 75/86; (1992) 14 EHRR 657.

71 The Government Response to the Intelligence and Security Committee's Annual Report, Cm 4089, 1998, p 3, para 1. The figure for 1999/2000 was £743.2m for all three services; in 2000/2001 it was £745.0m: The Intelligence and Security Committee Report 1997–98, Cm 4073, p 9. Individual figures for the three services were not published.

that role is undergoing some redirection in response to the redefinition of terrorism, discussed in Chapter 14,[72] which is currently contained in s 1(1) of the Terrorism Act 2000. The government and the Parliamentary committee charged with oversight of the agencies, the Intelligence and Security Committee, agree in considering that such redirection aids in justifying the maintenance of the services: 'The [Intelligence and Security] Committee acknowledges the continued need for the intelligence and security agencies in a changed but still dangerous world and believes they must be maintained and funded in a sustainable way. The government reached the same conclusions in the Comprehensive Spending Review.'[73]

In its Third Report in 1998, the Committee raises concerns regarding the continued existence of the services in the current era:

> So far from being invented to justify the agencies' continued existence [new challenges to the services] are real enough, and the country rightly expects to be protected against them . . . However, the agencies face these tasks in a new environment of greater openness and accountability. They also face them with new technologies available to bring new capacities for the collection of information in many forms, which may pose new challenges to ensuring that the privacy of law-abiding individuals is respected . . . [in times of no grave national threat] public confidence can be very fragile. That is the inevitable consequence of operating within a 'ring of secrecy' which prevents a more balanced public view of their activities. The public must therefore be confident that there is adequate independent scrutiny and democratic accountability on their behalf by people within that ring of secrecy. That is the task of this Committee.[74]

The Fourth Report, for 1998/99, also adopted a robust tone.[75] It took particular exception to the continuing refusal of the government to publish a national audit office report on the excessive spending of the agencies on refurbishment. The Chairman, Tom King, said: 'The cloak of secrecy has been used to cover up inadequacies and serious lapses in expenditure control.' The Chairman of the Commons Public Accounts Committee endorsed this view on the day the Intelligence Committee's Fourth Report was published.

The Intelligence and Security Committee, in both its Third and Fourth Reports, was clearly signalling its concern at the probable tension between the continued existence of doubtfully accountable agencies, with an increasing remit, in an age when the expectations of accountability have never been higher. The implication is that the confidence in the balance supposedly struck by the statutory mechanisms between individual rights, especially to privacy, and the demands of secrecy, has never been more fragile.

72 See pp 1377–81; see also Home Office and Northern Ireland Office, Legislation against Terrorism: A Consultation Paper, Cm 4178, 1998.

73 The Government Response to the Intelligence and Security Committee's Annual Report, Cm 4089, 1998.

74 Third Report of the Intelligence and Security Committee for 1997–1998, Cm 4073, p vii.

75 Cm 4532, published on 25 November 1999.

While making gestures in the direction of openness and accountability, the statutory mechanisms, including the most recent one, the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (RIPA), are still, it will be argued, imbued with the culture of secrecy.[76] Therefore, it is questionable whether the more extensive statutory basis for the agencies' activities which is now available can create confidence in them. It has been shaken by a number of allegations from ex-MI5 or MI6 agents. Spycatcher, written by Peter Wright, a former member of MI5, alleged that MI5 had 'bugged and burgled its way around London', that the Service had tried to destabilise the Labour Government of Harold Wilson, and that the Director General from 1956 to 1965, Roger Hollis, was a Soviet agent.[77] Richard Tomlinson, a former MI6 officer, was prosecuted in 1998, as was David Shayler, a former MI5 officer, in 2001[78] under the Official Secrets Act, in both instances for seeking to make public a number of grievances and concerns about the services. Concerns were also raised over MI5's and MI6's handling of the Vasili Mitrokhin affair in 1999[79] and regarding allegations of involvement in the attempt to assassinate Colonel Gadafy.

It will be contended below that Ministerial responsibility, Parliamentary oversight and the complaints and checking mechanisms of the relevant Commissioners and tribunals create only a limited and flawed control of the agencies. Although the changes to the tribunal system that occurred under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 represented a step in the direction of greater accountability, they are, it will be argued, unlikely to have much impact in terms of creating stricter control, since in various respects, including the role of parliamentary oversight, the current tribunal system is based on the old model.[80] Without radical structural change to these methods, which could allow for some breaching of the ring of secrecy, no real control will be achieved. The HRA may be aiding in providing some of the impetus for such change, but its direct impact on the agencies, in terms of ensuring protection for privacy, is likely to continue to be minimal, for the reasons discussed below.

76 Admittedly, the specifically operational aspects of the work of the security and intelligence services it covers would be secret anywhere in the world. But the tendency to curb the scrutinising role of the ordinary courts discussed in this chapter, especially in relation to the interception of communications, suggests that secrecy remains the dominant value.

77 See AG v Times Newspapers Ltd [1991] 2 All ER 398; [1992] 1 AC 191, discussed in Chapter 7. The last two allegations appear to be unreliable, see MI5: The Security Service, 3rd edn, 1998, pp 39–40; Mitrokhin, V and Andrew, C, The Mitrokhin Archive, 1999, confirmed that the allegation regarding Roger Hollis was untrue.

78 He was imprisoned in France pending determination of the extradition request which was so that he could face charges under the Official Secrets Act, s 1. France refused to extradite him. Once he returned to the UK, in August 2000, he was charged with an offence under s 1(1) of the Act: see Shayler, Transcript of the Preparatory hearing on 14 May 2001 and the judgment of the Court of Appeal on 28 September 2001. It was found that no defence to a charge under s 1(1) could arise by reliance on s 3 HRA, but that a defence of necessity could arise. For the House of Lords' decision see further Chapter 7, pp 606–11. For discussion of the background to the prosecution and the civil actions brought against Shayler, see Best, K, 'Implications of the Shayler affair' (2001) 6 J Civ Lib 18.

79 Mitrokhin was a KGB defector who identified Melita Norwood and others as Soviet agents in The Mitrokhin Archive, 1999 .

80 See below, pp 1080 et seq.

The framework for the agencies

The functions of MI5 are set out in s 1 of the Security Services Act 1989. Section 1(1) provides: 'the function of the Service shall be the protection of national security and, in particular, its protection against threats from espionage, terrorism and sabotage, from the activities of agents of foreign powers and from actions intended to overthrow or undermine parliamentary democracy by political, industrial or violent means.' Section 1(3) adds the function of safeguarding 'the economic well-being of the UK' but only from external threats. The Act was amended to add sub-section 1(4) by s 1 of the Security Services Act 1996 in order to add to the two existing functions of the Security Service a third function: 'to act in support of the activities of police forces, [the National Criminal Intelligence Service (NCIS), the National Crime Squad and other law enforcement agencies in the prevention and detection of serious crime].' The words in square brackets were added by s 134(1), Sched 9, para 60 of the Police Act 1997. In 2006 these bodies were amalgamated.

The Serious Organised Crime Agency (SOCA) was set up under SOCA 2005 and became officially operationally active from April 2006. The Agency is an Executive Non-Departmental Public Body sponsored by, but operationally independent from, the Home Office. The Agency has been formed from the amalgamation of the National Crime Squad (NCS), National Criminal Intelligence Service (NCIS), that part of HM Revenue and Customs (HMRC) dealing with drug trafficking and associated criminal finance and a part of UK Immigration dealing with organised immigration crime (UKIS). SOCA is an intelligence-led agency with law enforcement powers and harm reduction responsibilities. Harm in this context is stated to be the damage caused to people and communities by serious organised crime. The Home Secretary may set SOCA strategic priorities and will judge the success of its efforts. Within that framework, SOCA plans its priorities, including how it will exercise the functions given to it by statute, and what performance measures it will adopt.

As indicated above, the definition of terrorism was greatly widened under the Terrorism Act 2000. This means that the functions of the Service have been widened quite significantly since the 1989 Act was passed. Sections 1(2) and 3(2) of the Intelligence Services Act 1994 (ISA) provide that the function of MI6 and of GCHQ is exercisable only in the interests of national security with particular reference to the defence and foreign policies of HM Government and in the 'interests of the economic well-being of the UK' and 'in support of the prevention and detection of serious crime'. MI6 is empowered under s 1(1) to obtain and provide information relating to the actions or intentions of persons outside the British Isles and perform tasks relating to such actions and intentions. Thus, MI6 is geared to external rather than internal security, in accordance with its traditional role, but this does not mean that it does not carry out operations on British soil. Targeted individuals may temporarily come to Britain and information relating to them may be found here. The police have pointed out that NCIS is a more open and accountable body than MI5 and, further, that there is little point in putting resources into a police intelligence body if MI5 then removes some of its main functions.

In order to perform their functions, the agencies operate their broad powers under a secrecy and a lack of accountability which would not be acceptable in respect of the police or other law enforcement agencies. But under a model which gave a high priority to oversight and democratic accountability, it would be found that the agencies should carry out no function which could be carried out by a service, such as the police, which was more open to scrutiny. A confusion of functions between such services and MI5 is occurring due to the fact that this principle has not been followed, although given the secrecy surrounding the operations of the agencies, it is not possible to come to any conclusion as to the genuine necessity of affording them a serious crime function or of allowing them to investigate the activities of a wider range of groups by designating them 'terrorist'. MI5 is specifically empowered to function against terrorist groups. MI6 and GCHQ can operate against them, since part of their function is to further the interests of national security which terrorism is assumed to threaten. Thus, widening the definition of terrorism widens the function of all three agencies.

The Intelligence and Security Committee

The 1989 Act provided for no real form of Parliamentary oversight of the Security Service.[81] But the 1994 Act set up, under s 10, the Parliamentary Committee, the Intelligence and Security Committee, to oversee the 'expenditure, administration and policy' of MI5, MI6 and GCHQ.[82] Operational matters were omitted from their remit. The Committee has wide access to the range of Agency activities and to highly classified information. Its cross–party membership of nine from both Houses is appointed by the Prime Minister after consultation with the Leader of the opposition. The Committee is supported by a Clerk and secretariat in the Cabinet Office and can employ an investigator to pursue specific matters in greater detail.

Thus, for the first time, all three services were made, to an extent, accountable to Parliament. The Committee's annual Report is not, however, presented directly to Parliament but to the Prime Minister, who may censor it before presentation on broad grounds – it need not be damaging to national security, merely to the continued discharge of the functions of the Services. After deletions of sensitive material, the Reports are placed before Parliament by the Prime Minister. The Committee also provides ad hoc reports to the Prime Minister from time to time. Appointment to the Committee is by the Prime Minister.

As the Committee is not a Select Committee, it has no powers to compel witnesses to appear before it. But in practice it has exercised greater powers than a select committee: in its inquiry into the Vasili Mitrokhin affair it was able to obtain papers from former administrations and official advice to Ministers, both of which are forbidden to select committees. After each general election the Prime Minister appoints the nine Parliamentarians to the Committee in consultation with the Leader of the opposition. Members are mainly from the House of Commons, but at least one must be from the House of Lords. Serving Ministers are not allowed to be members, but several members have previously held Ministerial positions. Details of the membership of the most recent committee, including its final report and the government's response, are on its web page.[83] The committee ceases to exist when Parliament is dissolved; after the election the Prime Minister reforms the committee.

81 See further Leigh and Lustgarten, In from the Cold 1994.

82 For discussion of the introduction of the Committee in 1994 see Leigh and Lustgarten, ibid.

83 Cabinetoffice.gov.uk/intelligence.

The members of the Committee are notified that s 1 of the Official Secrets Act will apply to them as though they were members of the services themselves and therefore, they will commit a criminal offence if they disclose any information or document they have obtained as a result of their work. They would have no defence that the disclosure revealed a serious abuse of power which could not be otherwise addressed, or that the information was already in the public domain. 'Sensitive' information can be withheld from the Committee by agency heads[84] and non-sensitive information can be withheld by the Secretary of State.[85]

It was clear at its inception that the extent to which the work of the Committee was likely to have a real impact on the agencies depended on its appointees and on the way they interpreted their role. The 1996–97 Report of the Intelligence and Security Committee made no recommendations as to independence at all, in quite strong contrast to the 1997–98 Report, which adopted a more adversarial approach. Tom King chaired the Committee over this period of time and appears to have adopted an increasingly robust stance. The 1998 Report signalled a change of direction towards a more rigorous scrutiny, and this continued in the 1999 Report, also under his chairmanship.

The 1998 Report was completed after the system had been in place for four years. In its section on oversight, it looked especially at the oversight available in other countries, the Committee having talked in the past year to counterpart bodies. They found that other countries have 'more extensive forms of "independent" oversight'.[86] One feature of such 'more extensive' models of oversight is the Inspector General (IG), a full time appointment who has wide powers of access to operational and other information. The Commissioner for the Security Service has similar powers of access, but it is not his function to review operations and the tribunals only do so in response to a direct complaint. Clearly, many members of the public who might have grounds for complaint would not be able to bring one, since they would be unaware of the operation. An IG would be able to consider operational abuse of power without depending on a complaint. The Committee pointed out that it cannot 'investigate directly different aspects of the Agencies' activities' and it found that the Committee's reach should be extended by an additional 'investigative capacity'.[87] It considered that without this capacity, it cannot make authoritative statements and needed some reinforcement of authority. In its 'Future Programme of Work' it set forth a number of issues to be pursued in 1998 and 1999, including the question whether individuals should have rights in connection with the destruction or otherwise of any file held on them; protections against storage and use, against individuals' interests, of inaccurate information, and the implications of the European Convention. Following this Report, additional support was given to the Committee on a non-statutory basis, reflecting their interest in an 'Inspector General' model of accountability. This is a step forward in those terms, but since no powers are granted, the co-operation of the services will be on a consensual basis only.

84 Schedule 3, para 3(2).
85 Schedule 3, para 3(4).
86 See p 24, para 62.
87 See p 25, para 69.

Warrant procedure

The legal constraints on targets in the UK may be compared with those in Canada and the US. In the US, warrants are only issued if there is 'probable cause' that the target is a foreign power or agent of a foreign power and collection is for the purpose of obtaining foreign intelligence.[88] In Canada, warrants may be issued only if there are 'reasonable grounds' for believing that the warrant is required to investigate a threat to national security.[89] It is apparent that the constraints in these jurisdictions are narrower and, in particular, that serious crime work is not included. The functions of the agencies in assisting in preventing or detecting serious crime is likely to form a much smaller percentage of their work than will widening the definition of terrorism. The MI5 booklet published in 1998[90] mentions 'arrangements' governing the role of the Service in assisting in serious crime work and the need for a close working relationship with the other agencies in question.[91] The arrangements are not published. Therefore, two executive bodies are left to determine, in a barely accountable and 'invisible' manner, the key issue of principle at stake here.

The warrant procedure for all three agencies is governed partly by ss 5 and 6 of the Intelligence Services Act 1994 and partly by Part II of RIPA. Under s 5(2) of the 1994 Act, the Home Secretary can issue a warrant authorising the 'taking of any such action as is specified in the warrant in respect of any property so specified or in respect of wireless telegraphy so specified'. In other words, members of the agencies can interfere in any way with property so long as it appears that the action would be of 'substantial value' to the agency in carrying out any of its functions.

The Security Services Act 1996 added sub-ss 3, 3A and 3B to s 5 of the 1994 Act. Section 5(3) provides that warrants issued to GCHQ and MI6 in respect of their 'serious crime' function 'may not relate to property in the British Islands'. Section 5(3A) provides that in respect of the Security Service's serious crime work a warrant may not relate to property within Britain unless s 3B applies. Section 3B applies if the conduct in question appears to constitute one or more offences and either involves the use of violence, results in substantial gain or is conduct by a large number of persons in pursuit of a common purpose or is an offence for which a person of 21 or over with no previous convictions could be expected to receive a sentence of imprisonment of three years or more.

The purpose of the 1996 Act was to allow the Security Service to aid the police in preventing and detecting serious crime, by which the government stated that it meant organised crime. However, the terms of the Act do not limit its application to serious or organised crime. It could be used, for example, against persons engaging in public protest who might well (given the breadth and vagueness of some public order law), commit an offence, such as obstruction of the highway, and who can be said to be acting in pursuit of a common purpose. Thus, a distinction is created between the agencies in terms of what they may do in relation to property, and this was continued in Part II RIPA. But, clearly, all three were able to engage in other activities in relation 88 Under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

89 Under the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act 1984, s 2.

90 MI5: The Security Service, 3rd edn, 1998.

91 Ibid, p 18.

to persons in the British Islands, whether under warrant or not, so long as, formally speaking, the activities were in accordance with their functions. This position became untenable under the HRA and therefore, in anticipation of its coming into force, such activities were provided with a statutory basis under the RIPA. 'Directed surveillance' and covert 'human intelligence sources' can be used by MI6 and GCHQ, but 'intrusive surveillance', which entails an intrusion onto 'residential premises', can normally be used only by MI5 in respect of its serious crime work.[92]

It was suggested in debate in Parliament that the 1994 Act should contain a clear set of principles which would govern and structure the operations of the services in carrying out these statutory functions. It was suggested that they should include the requirements that the more intrusive the technique, the higher the authority should be to authorise its use, and that except in emergencies, less intrusive techniques should be preferred to more intrusive ones.[93] The government rejected these amendments to the 1994 Act on the ground that they were implicit in s 5 of the Act. Section 5 provides that the Secretary of State should be satisfied that 'what the action seeks to achieve cannot reasonably be achieved by other means'. This imprecise requirement is clearly no substitute for the more detailed set of principles suggested. If a member of the Service wishes to intercept communications on the public telephone system, another level of control is imposed, since the procedure under the Interception of Communications Act 1985 applies (discussed below). The RIPA addressed the anomaly that members of the services could engage in various forms of surveillance in reliance merely on the procedure under the 1994 Act, but that in respect of this particular form, an extra layer of control was added.

The result of s 5 is that a private individual can have surveillance devices placed on his or her premises or can be subject to a search of the premises even though engaged in lawful political activity which is not intended to serve any foreign interest. An amendment to the Security Services Bill was put forward that would have exempted such a person from the operation of the legislation, but it was rejected by the government.

The authorisation must be by the Home Secretary, personally, under s 6(1) of the 1994 Act, except in the case of emergency warrants which may be authorised by a senior official, with express authorisation from the Home Secretary. The arrangements for intrusive surveillance under the RIPA are similar, as explained below,[94] but no independent authorisation procedure is necessary in respect of the other two forms of surveillance. The s 6 warrant procedure begins with a letter from the agency to the Home Office. It is considered in the warrants division which may require further information in order to strengthen the application. As Leigh and Lustgarten point out, this process could be viewed as a gulling of their political master by collusion between 'the Security Service and its Whitehall counterpart', or it could be seen as 'conscientious control' over the requests, endowing stronger ones with greater credibility and rejecting weaker ones.[95] Under s 5 of the 1994 Act, the Home Secretary should then consider whether it is necessary for the action to be undertaken on the ground that 'it is likely to be of substantial value in assisting the agency in question in carrying out its function, 92 See RIPA 2000, s 42.

93 HC Standing Committee E, Col 72, 8 March 1994.
94 See pp 1060–62.
95 Leigh and Lustgarten In from the Cold, 1994, p 57.

as indicated above'. He must be satisfied that what is sought to be achieved could not be achieved by other means and as to the arrangements for disclosure of information obtained. It is not possible to ascertain how far each of these matters is subjected to serious scrutiny or how far, assuming that they were taken seriously, a Home Secretary would be able to detect weaknesses in the application. Obviously, these matters would depend partly on the particular Home Secretary in question. But applications are very rarely rejected and, as Lustgarten and Leigh point out, political considerations as well as legal ones enter into the approval.[96] The warrants are issued for six months initially by the Home Secretary and may be renewed by him for that period so long as it is thought necessary for them to continue. There is no overall maximum period and some warrants may therefore be, in effect, permanent. If issued by a senior official, the warrant ceases to have effect after two working days.

The warrant procedure has been compared unfavourably with that in other mature democracies. The Canadian Security Intelligence Service may only be granted warrants on the authorisation of a Federal Court judge, thus ensuring a measure of independent oversight. Moreover, the warrant will not be issued unless the facts relied on to justify the belief that a warrant is necessary to investigate a threat to national security are set out in a sworn statement.[97] In the US, the warrants are authorised by special Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act courts comprising selected federal judges, although in certain circumstances, the Attorney General can authorise searches or warrants by executive order only. These arrangements present a strong contrast with those in the UK, since there is no judicial involvement at all in the UK in the issuing of warrants under either the 1994 or 2000 Acts. Any judicial involvement can occur only after the warrant has been issued. Thus, the crucial stage of the procedure is entirely in executive hands – one part of the executive is authorising another to interfere with individual rights. The impact of judicial authorisation must not be overestimated; clearly, some judges may develop a tendency to rubber-stamp requests. But the fact of placing papers before a judge may foster internal scrupulousness in their preparation. Since many persons will have no means of knowing that they have been targeted and therefore will have no ability to make a complaint, judicial involvement at the complaints stage only is of marginal importance. The failure to allow such involvement in the warrant procedure may be viewed as one of the key weaknesses in the scheme.

Under s 7 ISA the Secretary of State (in practice the Foreign Secretary) can authorise SIS (MI6) to carry out acts outside the United Kingdom which are necessary for the proper discharge of one of its functions. As with s 5 warrants, before the Secretary of State gives any such authority, he must first be satisfied of a number of matters: (a) that the acts being authorised (or acts in the course of an authorised operation) will be necessary for the proper discharge of an SIS function (s 7(3)(a)); (b) that satisfactory arrangements are in force to secure that nothing will be done in reliance on the authorisation beyond what is necessary for the proper discharge of an SIS function (s 7(3)(b)(i)); (c) that satisfactory arrangements are in force to secure that the nature and likely consequences of any acts which may be done in reliance on the authorisation will be reasonable having regard to the purposes for which they are carried out (s 7(3)(b)(ii)); and (d) that satisfactory arrangements are in force to secure that SIS shall not obtain or disclose information except in so far as is necessary for the proper discharge of one of its functions (s 7(3)(c)). By virtue of s 7(4)(a) of ISA, authorisations may be given for acts of a specified description. These are known as class authorisations. They could cover, for example, the obtaining of documents which might involve theft, or payment to an agent which might involve bribery. Section 7 was amended in 2001 so as to apply also to GCHQ. The amendment was effected by s 116 of the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 and arose from a further consideration of the powers available to the intelligence services in the light of the events of 9/11. As amended, s 7 allowed GCHQ to be authorised to carry out acts outside the United Kingdom for the proper exercise of its functions in the same manner as SIS and (by a new sub-section (9)) made it clear that any question as to whether activities taking place in the UK but intended only to relate to apparatus situated outside the UK are covered by s 7 authorisations.

96 Ibid, p 58.

97 For discussion of the impact of this system in practice, see Leigh, I, 'Secret proceedings in Canada' (1996) 34 Osgoode Hall LJ 113.

The system for accountability therefore relies mainly on a level of Ministerial control, but only as regards activities of the agencies which are under warrant or require Ministerial authorisation under the RIPA. As indicated, a further, judicial level of control is then added which relates only to the warrant procedure. The Commissioner is supposed to provide oversight of the procedure, but only after the event. At present, the same Commissioner operates as Commissioner in respect of all three agencies, and can be re-appointed to continue his role as ‘the Intelligence Services Commissioner’ under s 59 RIPA. Section 59 of the Act provides for the Prime Minister to appoint the Commissioner, who must hold or have held high judicial office within the meaning of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act 1876. He or she is appointed for a period of three years with the possibility of re-appointment. His job is to keep under review the issue of warrants by the Secretary of State authorising intrusive surveillance (e.g. eavesdropping) and interference with property in order to make sure that the Secretary of State was right to issue them. Like the Interception of Communications Commissioner, the Intelligence Services Commissioner reviews warrant applications and visits the Security Service and other agencies to discuss any case he wishes to examine in more detail. He must be given access to whatever documents and information he needs and at the end of each reporting year he submits a report to the Prime Minister; it is subsequently laid before Parliament and published. The Intelligence Services Commissioner is also responsible for reviewing the internally authorised use of directed surveillance (the covert monitoring of targets’ movements, conversations and other activities) and of covert human intelligence sources (i.e. agents) to check that the agencies are acting in accordance with the requirements of the law.

The oversight is, however, limited. The Commissioner can only oversee the issuance of warrants under ss 5 and 6 of the 1994 Act; he cannot order that they should be quashed; nor can he order an operation against a particular group to cease. The Commissioner cannot address instances in which no warrant was necessary, since the procedure in question is not unlawful. The remit of the Commissioner precludes consideration of unauthorised actions since he can only consider whether a warrant was properly authorised. If an action does not require a warrant, such a question becomes irrelevant. This is also true of actions which are unlawful and unauthorised by warrant, such as burgling a property.

Personal files

The Intelligence and Security Committee has taken a particular interest in the creation and use of personal files stored by the agencies, particularly those on British citizens. A particular concern was to consider 'the protection for an individual against having information inappropriately or inaccurately gathered, stored and used against their interests.'[98] These files play a significant role in security vetting, which affects a wide range of jobs in the UK. It applies to senior staff in a range of government departments, to independent bodies such as the BBC and in the private sector.[99] Security checks will include consideration of information, if any, held on an applicant by MI5.

For example, in 1998 the Security Service was holding 250,000 hard copy files on individuals and a further 4,000 were archived on microfiche. Of these, 17,500 were coded 'green'[100] or active, and 13,000 related to British citizens. The Service is currently reviewing files for destruction by category. The Committee expressed concern that reviewing was restricted to individuals over 55. Thus, files may be retained on individuals under that age because they had 20 years ago joined an organisation then classed as subversive, whereas a file would not be opened on a person joining the same organisation today.[101] The Committee found: 'We believe . . . that some form of independent check should be built into the process . . .'[102] The government response to this recommendation suggested that secrecy remained the overriding priority. 'The government does not believe that the process of reviewing files for destruction would be assisted by independent scrutiny.'[103]

The Committee took a somewhat less robust view of the SIS and GCHQ records and data. In 1998 SIS had 86,000 records, half of which related to UK citizens. Many of them related to the staff of the Agency and its contacts. Of these, 75% were closed and some related back to 1909. Thus, it appears to have no destruction policy and of course no independent check that it was not holding files on British citizens needlessly. The argument for an independent check may not be as pressing as in respect of the Security Service, but it is clearly applicable, especially as internal procedures reveal an unawareness of the abuses which can arise if files are stored for many years without review.

Like SIS, GCHQ does not hold and create personal records in the same way that MI5 does. But its rationale is to hold personal data collected by intercepting communications. GCHQ informed the Committee that such data 'which may arise from collection under warrant or otherwise (emphasis added) is a necessary and sometimes key analytical 98 Report of the Intelligence and Security Committee for 1997/98, Cm 4073, p 16, paras 39 and 40.

99 See First Report from the Select Committee on Defence, Session 1982–83, Positive Vetting Procedures in Her Majesty's Services and the Ministry of Defence HC (182/83) 242 and the Radcliffe Report, Cmnd 1681, 1962, Chapter 7; Linn, I, Application Refused: Employment Vetting by the State, 1990, Civil Liberties Trust; Hollingsworth, M and Norton-Taylor, R, Blacklist: The Inside Story of Political Vetting, 1988, Hogarth. The vetting guidelines were set out in a statement made at HC Deb Vol 251–766w, 15 December 1994.

100 This is part of the 'traffic lighting' process for files: 'green' files are active; 'amber' ones are closed but may have papers added; 'red' ones are closed and retained for research only.

101 Ibid, p 19, para 47.

102 Ibid, p 20, para 50.

103 The Government Response to the Intelligence and Security Committee's Annual Report, Cm 4089, 1998, p 5, para 16.

tool'. GCHQ has a lawful basis for interception under s 5 of the 1994 Act and under s 3(2)(a)(i) of the 1985 Act. But these words imply that GCHQ is currently holding some personal data without a basis of legal authorisation. Since such holding of data was not a criminal offence or civil wrong, this practice of GCHQ could not be said to be unlawful until the HRA came fully into force. Assuming that it amounts to an infringement of Art 8, it is now unlawful, since it cannot be said to be in accordance with the law. As discussed below, it may well be the case that no avenue, other than the complaints mechanism, is available to an individual to challenge the holding of his or her personal information which has been obtained unlawfully. Such a matter could be brought before the tribunal set up under the RIPA; this is discussed below. The government has said that all GCHQ interception, use and retention of material is carried out only in accordance with the 1994 and, where appropriate, 1985 Acts and 'these arrangements are subject to continuing scrutiny by the Commissioners' under the two Acts.[104]

One means of allowing a check on the retention and use of personal information would be to allow some access, with use of editing, under the Freedom of Information Act 2000 to the personal data held by all three agencies. However, the three agencies are all excluded from the Act as Chapter 7 explains.[105] They are also now fully exempt from the obligation to apply the data protection principles under the Data Protection Act 1998, on the basis that the files are held for national security purposes. Under the 1984 Act, personal data held on national security grounds was not exempt from the principles, although the agencies did not register under the Act on national security grounds. The protection is therefore weaker under the 1998 Act, although a person directly affected by the exemption can appeal against the issue of a national security certificate, under s 28 of the 1998 Act. Since the agencies, and MI5 in particular, have a role in relation to serious crime, this position is anomalous. As the Data Protection Registrar (now Commissioner) has argued, MI5 should be placed in the same position as the police in relation to this role.[106] The Commissioner has no general statutory remit to obtain access to files for monitoring purposes. But individual cases referred to him or her may raise general issues of file keeping. The position may be compared to that in Canada, where the agencies are subject to privacy and access to information legislation, although individuals have no right of access to their files and are not informed that the file exists. An edited version of the file may be made available which will be limited to information already in the public domain. The key point is that the Commissioners in Canada have access to the files. In the US, records may only be established and held if they are relevant to the conduct of authorised intelligence operations and they are subject to the Freedom of Information Act. Individuals can ask to see files; they may be given an edited version and the agency can choose neither to confirm nor deny that material has been withheld. These arrangements, qualified as they are, represent an improvement on the complete exclusion of the agencies from the relevant privacy and FoI legislation, as in the UK.

104 Government Response, p 6, para 19.

105 See pp 633.

106 Our Answers: Data Protection and the EU Directive (95/46/EC), the Data Protection Registrar, July 1996. This position was also strongly criticised by Justice in its report Under Surveillance: Covert Policing and Human Rights Standards, 1998, p 90. For the position of the police under the 1998 Act, see Chapter 9, p 929.

Complaints

Taking the Interception of Communications Act as a model, the 1989 Act set up a Commissioner under s 4 and a tribunal under s 5 as a means of oversight for MI5. The procedure for complaints and composition of the tribunal are dealt with in Scheds 1 and 2. The 1994 Act adopted the same model for MI6 and GCHQ under ss 8 and 9 and Scheds 1 and 2.

No duty is imposed on the agencies to disclose the fact to an individual that an operation has occurred, after it is over. Most individuals will have no means of knowing that it has occurred and therefore will be unlikely to bring a complaint. If an individual brings a speculative complaint to the tribunal, uncertain whether surveillance or intrusion has occurred, the result may leave him or her none the wiser. The tribunals only reported that the result was unfavourable to the complainant, not whether an operation was indeed taking place, but was viewed as justified. The tribunals were not permitted to give reasons for their decisions.[107] Service personnel who felt that they had been required to act improperly in bugging or searching a person's property may not disclose the matter.

As discussed in Chapter 7, s 1 of the Official Secrets Act 1989 prevents members or former members of the security and intelligence services disclosing anything at all about the operation of those services. These provisions also apply to anyone who is notified that he or she is subject to the provisions of the section. Similarly, s 4(3) of the Act prohibits disclosure of information obtained by, or relating to, the issue of a warrant under the Interception of Communications Act 1985 or the Security Services Act 1989.

The 1989 and 1994 Acts provide no avenue for members of the agencies to complain to the Commissioner or Tribunals. Therefore, any disclosure of information to them or to the individual citizen concerned by such members would be a criminal offence under the Official Secrets Act. Thus, the persons who would be most aware of an abuse of power are denied this means of either supporting a complaint or enabling the individual concerned to instigate one. They can complain to the Security and Intelligence Services Staff Counsellor, appointed by the Prime Minister in 1987, but the office is, as Leigh and Lustgarten put it, 'a safety valve for conscience-troubled officials, rather than a form of oversight'.[108] The Reports of the Counsellor for the Prime Minister, Home Secretary and Foreign Secretary are unpublished and therefore there is no means of knowing whether his work has any benefit in terms of terminating unlawful or improper agency activities.

Under Sched 1, para 2 to the 1989 Act, the Security Service Tribunal could investigate two types of complaint: that the agency had instituted inquiries about the complainant and, if so, whether it had reasonable grounds for so doing. If the inquiries were due to a person's membership of a category of persons, the only question to be asked was whether there were reasonable grounds for believing him or her to be a member of that category, not whether the Service had reasonable grounds for investigating the group in question. Where information had been disclosed to an employer, the tribunal would investigate whether there were reasonable grounds for believing the information to be true. No inquiry is to be made into the misleadingness of the information or its factual truth. Nor can the tribunal consider the reasonableness of the categorisation of a particular group, or part of a group. The final ground for complaint was apparently wide: a person 'may complain to the tribunal if he is aggrieved by anything which he believes the Service has done in relation to him or any property of his'.[109] But the tribunal cannot investigate a complaint which relates to property and must pass it to the Commissioner who would utilise the principles applied by a court on an application for judicial review.[110]

107 Schedule 1, para 5(3) to the 1989 Act and Sched 1, para 6 to the 1994 Act.
108 Ibid, p 430.

The standard of scrutiny in the tribunals was always unlikely to be rigorous: in Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Ruddock[111] (determined prior to the coming into force of the 1985 Act) the question was whether the decision of the Home Secretary in granting the warrant was 'so outrageous in its defiance of logic or accepted moral standards that no sensible person who applied his mind to the question to be decided could have arrived at it'. Since the tribunals can merely ask whether the agency had 'reasonable grounds' for its action, they cannot consider the questions whether the action was proportionate to the invasion of privacy and whether the action could have been carried out by the police. The tribunals both sit in secret and the complainant has no right to be informed of the findings of the investigation, only whether it is favourable or unfavourable. The Commissioner is operating under severe constraints, which arguably render his office a merely tokenistic one. He sits as a full time judge, has no staff and takes roughly two weeks' leave plus his own free time to carry out his role. He has been appointed to carry out his task in respect of all three agencies, and therefore he is expected to oversee bodies with, in 1998, a combined budget of £747m and a staff of around 5,000.[112] In the US, Canada and Australia, the equivalent bodies have a full time staff. The Commissioner's Report for 2002[113] was typical. It was mainly descriptive and contained a secret annex. In relation to specific cases it stated:

> Five breaches of a particular agency's internal authorisation procedures and one separate breach of ISA have been reported to me in 2002. As it is not possible for me to explain any details of these breaches without revealing information of a sensitive nature, I have referred to them in more detail in the confidential annex. However, I can report that four of the five breaches that occurred in an agency's internal authorisation procedures were due to administrative failures to renew existing RIPA internal authorisations before they expired with the fifth reflecting their failure to obtain internal authorisation ahead of an operation commencing.[114]

The Report of the Intelligence Services Commissioner for 2004 was similarly bland; it resembled the annual report by Sir Swinton Thomas, the Interception Commissioner, in that it said little about specific cases and had a secret annex to the report.

109 1989 Act, Sched 1, para 1; 1994 Act, Sched 1, para 1.
110 1989 Act, Sched 1, para 4; 1994 Act, Sched 1, para 3(b).
111 [1987] 1 WLR 1482.
112 This is an estimate; the numbers have been censored from the Parliamentary Committee's Report 1998, pp 42 and 47.
113 9.9.03, HC 1048.
114 Para 36.

Given these limitations, it is unsurprising to find that no complaint has ever been upheld by the tribunals or Commissioner. Between the introduction of the 1989 Act and the end of 1997, the tribunal set up under s 4 of the 1989 Act investigated 275 complaints; none was upheld.[115] The Report of the Security Services Commissioner presented to Parliament in June 1999[116] reported that the tribunal received 28 complaints in 1998, of which 18 were investigated and none was upheld. The Commissioner received 16 complaints and upheld none.[117] The Prime Minister has the power to censor the report before it is presented to Parliament, a power which is clearly exercised routinely. It appeared to be almost impossible, in practice, for a member of the public who was dissatisfied with the outcome of the complaints procedure to seek a remedy in the courts. The tribunals were set up as the only avenue of complaint and, under s 5(4) of the 1989 Act and s 9(4) of the 1994 Act, the decisions of the tribunals, including decisions as to their jurisdiction, were not questionable in any court of law.

Commentators have not viewed this system for complaints as a success and the Commissioner has implied that it was flawed from the outset. He has said that the limitations of the complaints mechanism are the fault of the 'architects' of the statutory provisions.[118] It has been said: 'A major cause for concern . . . is the failure to confront adequately the need for accountability and review of the Services.'[119] John Wadham of Liberty described the Security Service Tribunal as 'useless'.[120] Gill found: 'this structure . . . has been constructed neither for elegance nor impact'.[121] Lustgarten and Leigh sum up the problem: 'in so far as the government believed that by creating these new structures it would reassure the public that all is well it seriously miscalculated.'[122] As indicated below, a different complaints system was established under the RIPA. A new tribunal replaced the previous ones and it took over the Commissioner's complaints' role. An Interception of Communications Commissioner as well as a Chief Surveillance Commissioner was appointed under the RIPA. The remit of those Commissioners overlaps with that of the Intelligence Services Commisisoner, since it includes some oversight of surveillance undertaken by the agencies.[123]

Impact of the HRA

Under the HRA, it can be said that the Convention represents a set of principles which the 1989, 1994 and 2000 Acts can be tested against. The statutes were introduced with the Convention in mind, so it may be the case that no irremediable incompatibility between the statutory provisions and the rights exists.[124] The three agencies in question, the 115 MI5: The Security Service, 3rd edn 1998, p 33.

116 Report of the Commissioner for 1998, Cm 4365.
117 Ibid, p 5.
118 Leigh and Lustgarten, In from the Cold 1994 p 438.
119 Ewing, KD and Gearty, CA, Freedom under Thatcher, 1989, p 178.
120 Leigh and Lustgarten, In from the Cold, 1994 p 439.
121 Gill, P, Policing Politics: Security Intelligence and the Liberal Democratic State, 1994, p 295.
122 Leigh and Lustgarten, In from the Cold, 1994, p 439.
123 See p 1065. For the role of the Chief Surveillance Commissioner, see the same page.
124 HRA, s 3.

relevant Ministers and the oversight bodies (apart from the Parliamentary Committee)[125] as public authorities are bound by the rights under s 6 of the HRA. Although, formally, this is the legal position, the means whereby the Convention rights can be enabled to have a real rather than a theoretical impact on the agencies are highly circumscribed. They are discussed below, but although possible methods of bringing the HRA to bear on the agencies in court are considered, it is contended that the main impact of the HRA in this context is an educative and cultural one: it provides the openness the Parliamentary Committee has favoured with a clearer basis, and it may have an eventual, incremental impact on the work of the oversight bodies, in terms of the attitude they bring to their work. Most significantly, it may help to provide the impetus for the further evolution of the oversight.

Convention requirements

The Art 8(1) guarantees of respect for private life, the home and correspondence are clearly of most relevance to the activities of the agencies. The Introduction to Part III argued for a broad view of what constitutes invasion of privacy, based on the notion of control of personal information.[126] An interference with property normally creates an interference with one or more of the guarantees, as indicated above.[127] This would include planting a 'bug' on the premises in question, or entering them in order to remove property.[128] Less obvious invasions can also engage Art 8. The provisions of the Acts themselves may constitute a continuing invasion of privacy.[129] In Harman and Hewitt v UK,[130] the European Commission of Human Rights found that secret surveillance by MI5 of two former NCCL officers, Patricia Hewitt and Harriet Harman, had infringed Art 8(1), although they had not been subjected to direct intrusion. The intrusion was termed 'indirect' since information about them obtained from the telephone or mail intercepts of others had been recorded.

The use made of personal information, including disclosure to others, can also engage Art 8(1). In MS v Sweden,[131] the applicant complained that the use of medical records in respect of a compensation claim had infringed Art 8. The Court found that the disclosure did constitute an interference with the respect for private life, although it was found to be justified under Art 8(2).[132] The findings in G, H and I v UK[133] implied that the compiling and use of personal files by the Security Service can fall within Art 8, although they also raised questions regarding the onus placed on applicants to establish that they were likely to have been the victims of surveillance – in that instance 125 Parliament itself is not a public body under s 6 and nor is a person exercising function in connection with proceedings in Parliament (s 6(3)(b)). It is probable that the Committee is not a public authority under this definition.

126 See pp 803–6.

127 See p 1008–9.

128 See below, pp 1068–72.

129 See Klass v FRG (1978) 2 EHRR 214.

130 Appl No 121175/86; (1992) 14 EHRR 657.

131 (1999) 28 EHRR 313.

132 On the grounds of being necessary in a democratic society to further the economic wellbeing of the state.

133 15 EHRR CD 41.

of positive vetting for civil service posts. Esbester v UK[134] confirmed that a security check based on personal information could fall within Art 8. It may be concluded that many, if not almost all, activities of the agencies in obtaining, collecting, using and disclosing personal information tend to engage Art 8.

Once Art 8(1) is engaged, the question is whether the interference can be justified under para 2. To be justified, state interference with the Art 8 guarantee must first be in accordance with the law. As indicated in Chapter 2, interpreting 'prescribed by law' (treated as an equivalent provision at Strasbourg), Strasbourg has asked first whether the interference has some basis in domestic law, and secondly whether it is of the right 'quality'.[135] In Huvig v France[136] and in Kruslin v France[137] the Court said that the requirement of quality means that the law 'should be accessible to the person concerned, who must moreover be able to foresee its consequences for him, and compatible with the rule of law'. The application in Harman and Hewitt v UK[138] was declared admissible since the activities of MI5 in placing the applicants under surveillance were not in accordance with the law. No sufficient basis in law existed at the time, and the successful application led to the passing of the 1989 Act. Although there is room for argument that certain of the terms used in the 1989 and 1994 Acts are too imprecise and broad to satisfy the 'in accordance with the law' requirement, it is unlikely that this would be found to be the case in respect of primary legislation in this context, unless the domestic courts are prepared to take a much stricter view of that requirement than that taken at Strasbourg. In Christie v UK,[139] the Security Service and Interception of Communications Acts were both found to meet this requirement and the Commission noted: 'the [Strasbourg] case law establishes that the requirements of forseeability in the special context of sectors affecting national security cannot be the same as in many other fields'. Nevertheless, in criticising the provisions of the 1996 Act, Peter Duffy and Murray Hunt have argued that it breaches Art 8[140] since it probably does not pass the Convention requirement that an interference with private life should comply with rule of law principles. Executive discretion is so unfettered under the Act that any interference may not be 'in accordance with the law' as interpreted in Huvig v France[141] and Kruslin v France.[142] The 'in accordance with the law' question cannot be regarded as finally settled.

In Esbester v UK,[143] which concerned the alleged supply of information by MI5 regarding the applicant's membership of the Communist Party of Britain and of CND, leading to the revocation of a job offer, the Commission found that the 1989 Act complies with the 'in accordance with the law' requirement since the grounds under s 3 were expressed sufficiently precisely. This was a cautious, narrow application of 134 18 EHRR CD 72. See also Harman v UK Appl No 20317/92 (1993) unreported.

135 See also Sunday Times v UK A 30, para 49 (1979) and Hashman v UK, discussed in Chapter 8, pp 751–52.

136 (1990) 12 EHRR 528, para 26.

137 (1990) 12 EHRR 547, para 27.

138 Appl No 121175/86; (1992) 14 EHRR 657.

139 78-A DR E Com HR 119.

140 See (1997) 1 EHRR 11.

141 (1990) 12 EHRR 547.

142 (1990) 12 EHRR 528.

143 18 EHRR CD 72. See also Harman v UK Appl No 20317/92 (1993) unreported.

the Convention requirements by the Commission. In Leander v Sweden,[144] which concerned the holding of information in a secret police register, the Court found that unpublished statements explaining the law could not meet the accessibility requirement. Since, as indicated above, vetting procedures are either unpublished or have not been placed on a statutory basis, it might have been expected that they would fail to meet this requirement. The Commission in Esbester seemed to fail to distinguish between the different invasions of privacy created by vetting, and to have failed to look for a satisfactory basis in law in relation to the interference created when the information is supplied. Possibly this is a context in which the Court will eventually allow a narrower margin of appreciation in scrutinising the quality of the domestic basis for vetting more rigorously, bearing in mind its deterrent effects which may undermine freedom of association. The Court's freedom of association jurisprudence in the context of membership of political groups has recently become somewhat more interventionist.[145] Since security vetting tends to raise issues under both Art 8 and Art 11, it is possible that such a stance may also become more evident under Art 8.

Any residual activities undertaken by the Security and Intelligence Services which at present are not covered by the procedures under the 1994 and 2000 Acts may not be in accordance with the law, assuming that the primary right under Art 8(1) is engaged. For example, at present, agents must acquire a warrant if they intend to enter property or interfere with it. They are also bound by the terms of Part I of the RIPA; under s 1, as discussed below, it is a criminal offence to tap into a public or private telecommunications system without authorisation. But certain surveillance techniques may not be covered by Parts I or II of the RIPA. Until the inception of the HRA, use of such techniques was lawful under civil or criminal law in the sense that since no law forbade them, they were assumed to be permitted. The Intelligence and Security Committee in its 1998 Report[146] spoke of 'executive and judicial checks that intelligence and security services are obeying the law, in particular on acts which would be unlawful but for express authorisation'.[147] The implied distinction is between acts which do not require such authorisation and acts which do. But under the HRA it is unlawful for a public authority to fail to abide by the Convention rights and therefore, as explained below, this distinction between acts which require express authorisation and those which do not may tend to break down. All these activities require a basis in law under the HRA since all, or almost all of them, represent an infringement of privacy. Following the principle laid down in Harman and Hewitt v UK,[148] it is clear that placing the use of certain surveillance activities on a legal basis, which includes requiring warrant applications, is insufficient if others remain unregulated.

Christie v UK[149] concerned an interference, telephone tapping, which requires a warrant if it is not to amount to a criminal offence, as the Commission pointed out. No breach of Art 8 was found. It is unclear, but possible, that had the complaint

144 (1987) 9 EHRR 443.

145 See Socialist Party and Others v Turkey Judgment of 25 May 1998 (Appl No 20/1997/804/1007); (1999) 27 EHRR 51, paras 41, 47, 50. See also p 681, above.

146 Cm 4073.

147 Ibid, p 23.

148 Appl No 121175/86; (1992) 14 EHRR 657.

149 78-A DR E Com HR 119.

concerned a procedure which did not require a warrant but which infringed Art 8, its basis in law might have been viewed as insufficient, given that no involvement of the Secretary of State in checking warrants or, under s 6 of the 1985 Act, in reviewing the use of resultant material, would have been necessary.

This contention must be put forward tentatively. It may be that activities which did not require authorisation until the inception of the HRA might be said to have a form of legal basis under the statutory provisions if they are carried out in accordance with the stated functions of the agencies in the 1989 and 1994 Acts. But it is suggested that this basis is so exiguous and leaves discretion so unfettered that it may in future be found to fail to satisfy the 'accordance with the law' requirement. The case of G, H and I v UK[150] raised questions concerning the efficacy of the 1989 Act, although the applications failed. As indicated above, the RIPA is intended to provide the necessary legal basis. Clearly, there may still be activities of the agencies which fall outside it. Further, it is questionable whether the RIPA itself provides a basis of sufficient quality, a matter that is discussed further below.

Assuming that an interference is 'in accordance with the law', under the 1989, 1994 or 2000 statutes, it must also, under Art 8(2), have a legitimate aim, be necessary in a democratic society and be applied in a non-discriminatory fashion (Art 14). In cases of invasion of privacy by the state, Strasbourg's main concerns have been with the requirements of 'in accordance with the law' and 'necessary in a democratic society'. In this context, the 'legitimate aim' requirement has always been found to be satisfied. This is unsurprising since the grounds available for interference are so broad. They are: the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well being of the country, the prevention of disorder or crime, the protection of health or morals, the protection of the rights or freedom of others. The provision against non-discrimination under Art 14 has not been so far a significant issue in the state-invasion of privacy jurisprudence. But possibly Art 14 argument could be raised domestically in conjunction with Art 8 ones on the basis that certain racial or religious groups were being were being singled out as the target for surveillance in relation to suspected terrorist activity. The question would then be one of proportionality.[151] The Court has interpreted 'necessary in a democratic society' as meaning: 'an interference corresponds to a pressing social need and, in particular, that it is proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued.'[152] As explained in Chapter 4, the doctrine of proportionality is strongly linked to the principle of the margin of appreciation. The width of that margin appears to depend partly on the aim of the interference in question and partly on its necessity. In relation to the aim of national security, the Court has allowed a very wide margin to the state.

In Klass v Federal Republic of Germany[153] the European Court of Human Rights found, bearing the margin of appreciation doctrine in mind, that German telephone tapping procedures were in conformity with Art 8 since, inter alia, they provided for compensation in proceedings in the ordinary courts for persons whose phones had been unlawfully tapped. The legality of such interceptions could be challenged in the ordinary courts. No such provision is available under the Security Services Act 1989

150 15 EHRR CD 41.
151 See Chapter 2, p 109.
152 Olsson v Sweden A 130 (1988), para 67.
153 (1978) 2 EHRR 214.

or the Intelligence Services Act 1994 in respect of analogous intrusions, although, theoretically, the old tribunals could award compensation, either of their own motion or on a reference from the Commissioner.[154] This system would appear to represent a significantly lower standard of accountability than the West German one in respect of phone tapping and it is at least possible that a breach of Art 8 would have been found in Klass had the margin allowed to Germany been narrower.

Leander v Sweden[155] concerned rather similar complaints mechanisms. Information on the applicant was stored on a secret police register for national security purposes and used for employment vetting. This created an interference with Art 8(1), but a wide margin was allowed to the state in choosing the means of protecting national security. The aggregate of remedies available, recourse to an independent Ombudsman and Chancellor of Justice, were found to be sufficient to satisfy Art 13. In Harman v UK[156] and Esbester v UK,[157] the Commission found that the 1989 Act complied with the procedural requirements of Art 8(2), at least in the national security context. In Christie v UK,[158] in respect of the almost identical mechanisms under the 1985 Act, the Commission found, 'having regard to the wide margin of appreciation in this area', the safeguards provided by the tribunal and the Commissioner were sufficient in the instant case.

These findings need not be taken to mean that the oversight mechanisms provided under the 1989 and 1994 Acts, and now under the 2000 Act, clearly meet Convention requirements. They were made in relation to the particular case, not as abstract comment on such mechanisms in general, and they were heavily influenced by the margin of appreciation, especially wide where national security is in issue. As argued in Chapter 4, that doctrine is not available at national level and this, it is contended, means that it should not influence national decision makers. An activist domestic judge considering, judicially or extra-judicially (assisting the new tribunal, or as a member of it, or on appeal) whether the domestic complaints or reference provisions meet Strasbourg standards, and untrammelled by the margin of appreciation doctrine, might conclude that the controls built into the UK system under the 1989, 1994 and 2000 Acts are insufficient to prevent abuse. The framework is largely based on scrutiny of the procedure after the event and in a manner which keeps most of its key aspects in the hands of the executive. In this respect it fails to accord with the rule of law, since a part of the executive is authorising another part to invade rights; the checking procedure which is then marginally available appears to provide a largely illusory protection and in respect of key aspects of it, the only recourse is to the executive again. Arguably, the safeguards would not appear to satisfy Art 8(2).

But it is more probable that the judiciary would find that traditional notions of deference in the national security context would yield the same result as the application of the margin of appreciation doctrine.[159] There are signs, however, that at Strasbourg, 154 Schedule 1, para 6(1) and para 7(2) to the 1989 Act; Sched 1, para 8(1)(b) and para 8(2)(b) to the 1994 Act.

155 (1987) 9 EHRR 443.

156 Appl No 121175/86; (1992) 14 EHRR 657.

157 18 EHRR CD 72.

158 78-A DR E Com HR 119.

159 See further Chapter 4, pp 264–67, 272–73, and Chapter 14, pp 1349–52. See also the Rehman case, discussed briefly in Chapter 14, pp 1426, 1431.

in quite recent decisions, the Court is becoming less deferential towards claims of national security, although admittedly they have been in the context of Art 6 rather than Art 8, a significant difference due to the qualifications under Art 8.[160] The question whether the current, single tribunal provides an effective remedy for the citizen is discussed below.[161]

Using the HRA in practice

Clearly, there have always been, theoretically, methods of seeking to curb the agencies' powers when they impinge on individual citizens. Agents could be prosecuted for burglary, for example, if the action was unauthorised or improperly authorised. Prosecution of agents is, however, highly unlikely, since no means of referring an investigation to the police is provided in the statutes; further, any risk of revealing secrets would probably be avoided simply by taking a decision not to prosecute. It would also be difficult to acquire evidence due to the provisions against providing evidence to complainants. Actions for trespass to property or other tortious liability could be brought against agents, although the secrecy of operations makes this very unlikely. Any such action brought in the post-HRA era would have to accord with the Convention. The HRA extends the theoretical protection available for the citizen since, under ss 6, 7 and 8, it creates civil liability where activities are carried out that were not previously unlawful, but which breach the Convention guarantees. However, allegations that such breaches have occurred would have to be brought in the tribunal created under s 65 of the RIPA, not in the ordinary courts, as indicated below.[162]

The single tribunal has a duty under s 6 HRA to comply with the Convention in adjudicating on complaints, and the Commissioner has such a duty in overseeing not only warrants, but also the discharge of the duties of the Home Secretary and the agencies under the RIPA. The tribunal, Commissioner and Home Secretary are bound by the Convention under s 6; they are also providing oversight of bodies which are themselves so bound.

However, reliance on court action in efforts to secure the agencies' compliance with the Convention guarantees is very unlikely, largely due to the secrecy of the operations. Action in the ordinary courts at the citizen's instigation may in any event be almost entirely ruled out. As indicated above, ouster clauses contained in s 5(4) of the 1989 Act and s 9(4) of the 1994 Act barred the way to obtaining judicial review of the decisions of the Commissioner and tribunals. Both were post-Anisminic[163] ouster clauses in that they covered decisions of the tribunals and Commissioner as to their jurisdictions. The current tribunal is also protected by such a clause, although there is also a very narrow right of appeal, as discussed below. Judicial review of Ministerial decisions in the ordinary courts appears to be ruled out since complaints should be brought to the relevant tribunal or Commissioner and now to the single tribunal. However, judicial review could be sought, it was made clear in the preparatory hearing in Shayler,[164] of 160 Tinnelly v UK (1998) 27 EHRR 249 (discussed below, p 1088); McElduff v UK Appl No 21322/92.

161 See pp 1089–90.
162 See pp 1080 et seq.
163 Anisminic Ltd v Foreign Compensation Commission [1969] 2 AC 147. See further p 1085, fn 411.
164 Transcript of the Hearing of 14 May 2001, para 25.

the refusal of a Minister or other person within s 12 of the Official Secrets Act 1989 to authorise a member of the agencies to disclose matters relating to the work of the services.[165] Any such refusal would have to comply with the Convention rights, and a court considering the matter would not merely consider whether the decision was reasonable, but whether it had so complied.

Security vetting in the UK, taking into account information held on an applicant by MI5, raises a number of Convention issues. The position of applicants who are dismissed or refused employment as regards obtaining recourse to industrial tribunals has improved due to the government response to the findings of the European Court of Human Rights in Tinnelly v UK.[166] The Court found that a Ministerial certificate, stating that the reasons for the failure to employ the applicants were national security ones, effectively blocked the applicants' claim, since the judge could not go behind its terms and consider the claim, and therefore a breach of Art 6 had occurred. As a result of the ruling, the law as regards employment hearings in which national security is a factor was changed. Section 90 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 provides for the creation of a tribunal, modelled on the Special Immigration Appeals Tribunal, to review the issue of Ministerial certificates in Northern Ireland.[167] Thus, the issue of national security will be justiciable. However, the extent to which the evidence can be tested will be questionable. As White puts it: 'the central difficulty with the type of Tribunal set up by the 1998 Act is that it attempts to create an adversarial forum where one of the parties is severely hampered in presenting his or her case.'[168] This tribunal provided a model for the tribunal set up under the RIPA; the discussion of its procedure and its compatibility with the Convention below are therefore of relevance. Section 193 of the Employment Rights Act 1996 and s 10 of the Employment Appeals Tribunals Act 1996 were amended[169] so that complaints of unfair dismissal cannot be dismissed on national security grounds unless it is demonstrated that the reason for dismissal was on those grounds. All these tribunals, including the one in Northern Ireland, are bound by s 6 of the HRA, and therefore their procedure must comply with the Convention, and the Convention points considered above could be raised before them. In industrial tribunals, under the previous position, the assertion of national security grounds would have precluded their consideration.

The possibility of further actions at Strasbourg in future cannot be ruled out, probably under Arts 8, 6 or 13, despite the fact that at the present time, as indicated below, the domestic arrangements probably satisfy the Convention requirements in a number of respects. As Chapter 2 points out, decisions of the Commission, taken some years ago and heavily influenced by the margin of appreciation, may not reflect the current stance of the Court. Given the arguments canvassed here, it might be argued that no domestic remedy which must be exhausted, other than that represented by the single tribunal 165 Under the Official Secrets Act 1989, ss 7(3)(b) and s 7(5); see further Chapter 7, p 605.

166 (1998) 27 EHRR 249. For discussion, see McEvoy, K and White, C, 'Security vetting in Northern Ireland' (1998) 61 MLR 341, pp 349–54.

167 For discussion, see White, C, 'Security vetting, discrimination and the right to a fair trial' [1999] PL 406–18.

168 Ibid, p 413.

169 By the Employment Rights Act 1999, Sched 8, Security and Intelligence service members may also have access to industrial tribunals, under Sched 8.

procedure exists; such absence would speed up the process of taking a case. In other fields, the HRA itself might offer such a remedy which would require exhaustion in the ordinary courts, but in this one that argument is much weaker owing to the provisions of ss 65 and 67(8) of the RIPA.

Conclusions

Consideration of the oversight and accountability system above indicates that no fundamental change has taken place and is unlikely to do so as a result of the inception of the HRA. There are signs of a strengthening accountability, taking into account the RIPA changes, particularly the introduction of the single tribunal, but the mechanisms are still, it is contended, too weak to live up to the expectations currently created in the new era of openness and accountability under the HRA. At the time when they were put in place, the mechanisms were viewed as a radical departure from the old order and all that could be expected of the governments in question. Now, although their inadequacies are apparent, they have provided the model for the mechanisms provided under the RIPA. In the current era, the assumptions underlying them look more questionable.

But the introduction of such mechanisms and the extension of a statutory basis for the agencies, under the RIPA, are first steps in a process. It is perhaps no longer likely, now that these first steps have been taken, that the impetus for greater accountability will come from Strasbourg, and the barriers in the way of using the HRA in the domestic courts to create more accountability look almost insurmountable, except, to an extent, in criminal proceedings. It has been suggested that the impetus is most likely to come from pressure from the current oversight mechanisms themselves, especially the Parliamentary Committee, from MPs and from commentators. It is possible that greater accountability will be achieved through the operation of the single tribunal but, as argued below, its efficacy is clearly open to question.

4 The interception of communications

Introduction

The interception of communications clearly presents a profound threat to the core value of privacy identified in the Introduction to Part III, informational autonomy. However, a state has a duty to preserve national security and to prevent and detect crime. But, as Leigh and Lustgarten put it: ‘in attempting to protect democracy from threats such as terrorism there is the ever-present risk that . . . that which was to be preserved has been lost.’[170] The approach which succeeds in preserving respect for democracy and for the value of individual privacy, as a hallmark of democracy, while affording respect to state interests, is one which is increasingly reflected in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, even taking into account the wide margin of appreciation conceded in this particular area.[171]

170 Leigh and Lustgarten, In from the Cold 1994, p 41.
171 See, e.g., the pronouncements of the Court in Klass v FRG (1978) 2 EHRR 214.

Methods of communication and, in response, methods of interception have become increasingly sophisticated. Telephonic interception was possible for much of the twentieth century, but its incidence and the interception facilities have recently increased.[172] In other words, its value in terms of combating crime and terrorism has long been recognised. But legal recognition of the harm interception causes, in terms of creating invasions of privacy, has lagged behind. Prior to 1985, there was no requirement to follow a particular legal procedure when authorising the tapping of telephones or the interception of mail. The tapping of telephones was neither a civil wrong[173] nor a criminal offence. Interference with mail was a criminal offence under s 58 of the Post Office Act 1953, but under s 58(1) such interference would not be criminal if authorised by a warrant issued by the Secretary of State. The conditions for issuing warrants for interception of postal or telephonic communications were laid down in administrative rules which had no legal force.[174] Under these rules, the interception could be authorised in order to assist in a criminal investigation only if the crime was really serious, normal methods had been tried and had failed, and there was good reason for believing that the evidence gained by the interception would lead to a conviction. If the interception related to security matters, it could be authorised only in respect of major subversion, terrorism or espionage, and the matters obtained had to be directly useful to the Security Service in compiling information allowing it to carry out its function of protecting state security.

The Interception of Communications Act 1985 was introduced as a direct result of the ruling in the European Court of Human Rights in Malone v UK[175] that the existing British warrant procedure violated the Art 8 guarantee of privacy. The Court held that UK domestic law did not regulate the circumstances in which telephone tapping could be carried out sufficiently clearly or provide any remedy against abuse of the power. This meant that it did not meet the requirement of being ‘in accordance with the law’ under Art 8(2). The decision therefore required the UK Government to introduce legislation to regulate the circumstances in which the power to tap could be used.

Thus, the driving force behind the response of the UK Government in the Interception of Communications Act 1985 was the need to provide a statutory basis for interception. Nevertheless, it was an incomplete reform. Despite its misleading name, the 1985 Act only covered certain limited means of intercepting communications. It did not cover interception by means of listening devices or all forms of telephone tapping. It covered the interception of only one means of telephonic communication – communication via the public telecommunications system. This covered telephone, fax, telex and any other data transmission on the system, such as e-mail.[176] Given the immense increase in the use of mobile phones,[177] pagers, cordless phones, the potential for e-mail transmission 172 Report of the Commissioner under the Interception of Communications Act 1998, published June 1999, Cm 4364, p 2, para 13 and p 11.

173 Malone v MPC (No 2) [1979] Ch 344.

174 See Report of the Committee of Privy Councillors, Cmnd 283, 1957.

175 (1984) 7 EHRR 14; for comment, see (1986) 49 MLR 86.

176 Prior to the inception of the RIPA 2000, the government maintained that some use of email was covered by the 1985 Act where public telephone lines were used.

177 Mobile-to-mobile communication would appear to fall outside the 1985 Act. Mobile communication which partially uses the telecommunications system (when a system such as BT Cellnet or Vodafone sends a signal to the telecommunications system) may be within it.

outside the telecommunications system, and the growth of internal telephone systems over recent years, the Act became increasingly marginalised. Marginalisation was likely to increase since e-mails are likely to be sent more frequently via mobile phones, using satellites.[178] It was therefore apparent that the statutory basis for interception provided by the 1985 Act was inadequate and would probably be shown to be so in reliance on the HRA.[179] The Labour Government responded by introducing a far more comprehensive basis under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, Part I.

The Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, Part I (RIPA)

The intention of the Labour Government was to bring all forms of interception within the RIPA, Part I so that the 1985 Act would be superseded and could be repealed.[180] Under s 2(1) of the RIPA, the term 'public telecommunications system' used in s 2(1) of the 1985 Act, covers any system 'which exists (whether wholly or partly in the UK or elsewhere) for the purpose of facilitating the transmission of communications by any means involving the use of electrical or electro-magnetic energy'. This includes all such systems which provide or offer a telecommunications service to the public or part of it. This definition would cover all the forms of communication, including e-mail, mentioned above, provided by any private company.[181] Section 2(1) of the RIPA also covers private telecommunications systems – most obviously those confined to a particular company or body – although its coverage of private systems is limited to those which are attached to the public system directly or indirectly.[182] Its wording appears to be wide enough to cover most forms of telecommunication currently available, apart from entirely self-standing private systems,[183] although not necessarily those which may arise in the near future. Ironically, the point was made in Parliamentary debate that 'the Bill does not recognise the changing technologies'.[184]

Issuance of warrants

The 1985 Act provided very wide grounds under s 2(2) on which warrants for the purposes of interception could be authorised by the Secretary of state, and the same grounds appear in the RIPA, with one addition. Under s 5(3) RIPA, a warrant may be issued if necessary '(a) in the interests of national security'; '(b) for the purpose of preventing or detecting serious crime';[185] or '(c) for the purpose of safeguarding the economic 178 Possibly without use of a 'server' computer.

179 See the Consultation Paper 'Interception of Communications in the UK' (1999) Cm 4368.

180 Part I has repealed the key sections of the 1985 Act: ss 1–10, s 11(2)–(5), Sched 1.

181 These would include, e.g., BT, Orange, Vodafone. It would also cover other providers of e-mail systems such as Freeserve or Yahoo. However, it is in fact unclear that the technology to intercept emails sent via the internet is available. Such emails are sent by so called 'split package' technology; the message is split into a number of different packages, sent by different global routes. If a hundred million messages are sent a day, split into tiny particles, interception of particular messages may be difficult.

182 Its coverage of private systems is a direct response to Halford v UK [1997] IRLR 471.

183 Such as intranet systems not connected to any public system.

184 HC Deb Col 806, 6 March 2000.

185 Defined in s 81(3).

well-being of the UK'. In relation to the third ground, the information must relate, under s 5(5), to 'the acts or intentions of persons outside the British Isles'. This wording almost exactly reproduces that used under s 2(4) of the 1985 Act. These grounds are significantly wider than those under the old Home Office guidelines previously relied upon in order to authorise warrants. The last ground falls under sub-para (d): 'in circumstances appearing to the Secretary of state to be equivalent to those in which he would issue a warrant by virtue of paragraph (b), for the purpose of giving effect to the provisions of any international mutual assistance agreement.' This ground relates to Art 16 of the EU draft Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters.[186] Its purpose is to require satellite operators based in the UK to provide technical assistance to another member state. The discussion below reveals that the safeguards relating to warrants issued on this ground are significantly weaker than those relating to the other three. This is an instance in which the EU's 'Third Pillar' policies relating to law and order and national security have allowed decisions to be taken on matters which may infringe human rights, possibly to the extent of breaching the Convention. Such decisions are taken within 'a framework where the EU's democratic deficit is most prominent'.[187]

Section 5(2) of the RIPA, however, contains a stronger proportionality requirement than that which was contained in s 2(3) of the 1985 Act. The Secretary of State 'shall not' issue an interception warrant unless he believes that the conduct it authorises 'is proportionate to what is sought to be achieved'. This includes asking, under s 5(4), whether the information which it is thought necessary to obtain under the warrant could reasonably be obtained by other means. This question also had to be asked under s 2(3). But s 5(2) implies that further matters should be considered. For example, where the information cannot reasonably be obtained by other means, the proportionality of the particular interception warrant with its objective could still be considered. This might involve considering its contents and duration. Clearly, s 5(2) was introduced in an effort to meet the proportionality requirement under Art 8(2), discussed below. Under s 7(1) of the RIPA, the warrants must be personally signed by the Secretary of State or, under s 7(2) in urgent cases, or cases under the fourth ground, by 'a senior official' with express authorisation from the Secretary of State. A 'senior official' is defined in s 81(1) as 'a member of the Senior Civil Service' and under s 81(7) the Secretary of State 'may by order make . . . amendments [to] the definition of "senior official"'. Under the 1985 Act the official had to be 'an official of his Department of or above the rank of Assistant Under Secretary of State'. In this respect, the requirements have been relaxed under the RIPA.

This procedure is based on the model previously provided by the 1985 Act in that it allows for administrative oversight, but maintains executive authorisation of interception; it may therefore be contrasted with that in the US, where prior judicial 186 The EU draft Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters (5202/98-C4–0062/98) was set out in the EU-FBI telecommunications plan adopted by the EU in January 1995. Under ENFOPOL, the information required includes e-mail addresses, credit card details, passwords, IP addresses, customer account numbers.

187 Norton-Taylor, R, in Blackburn, R, and Plant, R, (eds), Constitutional Reform: The Labour Government's Constitutional Reform Agenda, 1999, p 208. See also Enhancing Parliamentary Scrutiny of the Third Pillar, Select Committee of the European Communities, HL Session 1997–98, 31.7.97.

authorisation is required,[188] and with that in Denmark where authorisation is by an investigating magistrate.[189] A Commissioner was appointed under s 8 of the 1985 Act; the appointment is now of the Interception of Communications Commissioner under s 57(8) of the RIPA. The Commissioner has a role in overseeing the issuance of warrants, but this is a general review role, which occurs after the event. The possibility of replacing an executive with a judicial mechanism was entirely rejected by the Labour Government. In debate on the Bill, it received support only from the Liberal Democrats.[190] Judicial involvement only at the complaint stage (discussed below) is of little significance as a safeguard since many persons will have no means of knowing that tapping is occurring. Nevertheless, prior judicial involvement in authorising warrants cannot be said at present to be a requirement of Art 8.[191]

Under s 4(5) and (6) of the 1985 Act, the warrants were issued for an initial period of two months and could be renewed for one month in the case of the police and for six months in the case of the security and intelligence services. Under s 9(6) of the 2000 Act, warrants are issued for an initial period of three months if by the Secretary of State and can be renewed for six months if he states his belief that the grounds under s 5(3)(a) or (c) apply. If the other grounds apply, the renewal period is three months. If signed by a senior official, they can be issued initially for five working days but renewed for three months. In the case of all warrants, particularly those issued in respect of the prevention or detection of serious crime, to the police, these are significant increases. The period in respect of the serious crime ground may be compared with that in Denmark, which is four weeks, renewable.[192]

As was the case under the 1985 Act, there is no overall limit on renewals and so some warrants are very long standing. The number of interception warrants issued is increasing. The Commissioners' Reports only cover the warrants authorised by the Home Office and Scottish Office. These figures show that at the end of 1989, 315 warrants were in force and 522 were issued during the year.[193] By 1993, a clear upward trend in the numbers of warrants issued was evident: in 1993, 1,005 warrants for telephone tapping and 115 for mail interceptions were issued; 409 warrants were in force at the end of the year.[194] The trend continued: in 1996 1,795 telecommunications warrants were in force or were issued during the year; by 1998, the figure had risen to 2,251.[195] In 2003 2525 warrants were issued by the Home Office.[196] As the Commissioner accepts, 188 Berger v NY (1967) 388 US 41.

189 Code of Criminal Procedure, Art 126m.

190 HC Deb Col 8076, March 2000.

191 Klass v FRG (1978) 2 EHRR 214; Mersch v Luxembourg 43 D & R 34 (1985).

192 Code of Criminal Procedure, Art 126m.

193 Report of the Commissioner for 1989, Cm 1063, p 2. Similar figures are available for other years; see reports for 1986, Cm 108 and for 1987, Cm 351.

194 See Report of the Commissioner for 1993, Cm 2522.

195 For example, the figure for postal interceptions rose from 115 in 1996 to 167 in 1998. Figures from the Report of the Commissioner under the Interception of Communications Act for 1998 published June 1999, Cm 4364, p 11.

196 The full figures of Warrants (a) in force, under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act, as at 31 December 2003 and (b) issued during the period 1 January 2003 and 31 December 2003 are: Home Secretary 705 1878, the total number of RIPA modifications from 01/01/2003 to 31/12/03 = 2525; Scottish Executive 41 105, the total number of RIPA modifications from 01/01/2003 to 31/12/03 = 319. Under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 there is no longer a breakdown of the

these figures do not provide a satisfactory guide as to the number of persons subject to interception, since a single warrant can cover a large organisation. The figures do not cover all the warrants authorised, since those authorised by other departments, including the Foreign Office, are viewed as too sensitive.

Section 8(1) of RIPA suggests that the warrants should be precise; they must specify a person or an address. However, a 'person' can equal 'any organisation and any association or combination of persons'.[197] Once a warrant is obtained, all communications to or from the property or 'person' specified must be intercepted, if that is what is required in order to give effect to the warrant.[198] Failure to comply with the warrant is an offence under s 11(7) carrying a maximum sentence of two years. Under s 11(4), telephone tapping and mail interceptions are conducted by Post Office or 'public telecommunications employees' or by persons controlling or partly controlling private systems wholly or partly in the UK.[199]

Under s 6(2), the request for the warrant may be made by a number of persons from a non-exhaustive list. They include: the Director General of the Security Service, the Chief of MI6, the Director of GCHQ, the Director General of the National Criminal Intelligence Service, the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis; the Chief Constable of the RUC, Chief Constables in Scotland,[200] the Commissioners of Customs and Excise; the Chief of Defence; the relevant person for the purposes of any international mutual assistance agreement. The Bill originally provided: 'or any such other person as the Secretary of State may by order designate.' The government was eventually persuaded to omit the last provision. A number of other such powers are, however, scattered throughout the Act, meaning that this statute, comprehensive as it is, leaves open a great deal of leeway for significant and more covert extension. On Second Reading of the Bill in the Commons this list was criticised on two grounds. The Conservative opposition considered that the list was not extensive enough and that, in particular, the Benefits Agency of the DSS[201] and the Inland Revenue[202] should be added to it. The Liberal Democrats, supported by Tom King, Chair of the Intelligence and Security Committee, argued that primary legislation, not a statutory instrument, should be used in order to add bodies to the list.[203]

Lawful interception without a warrant

Sections 3 and 4 of the RIPA allow for lawful interception without a warrant. Section 3(2) covers instances where it is reasonably believed that both parties to the communication figures between Telecommunications and Letters. Figures from the Report of the Commissioner under the Interception of Communications Act for 2003.

197 RIPA 2000, s 78(1) which, with the addition of an 'association', reproduces s 10(1) of the 1985 Act.

198 Section 11(4).

199 Bearing in mind the range of companies which are affected and the difficulty of complying, especially in relation to the internet, a provision regarding practicality was necessary. Section 11(5) recognises that there may be circumstances under which it is not reasonably practicable to comply with the duty to implement the warrant. The prosecution must prove that it was practicable.

200 'Of any police force maintained under or by virtue of section 1 of the Police (Scotland) Act 1967.'

201 HC Deb Cols 778 and 831, 6 March 2000.

202 HC Deb Col 821, 6 March 2000.

203 HC Deb Cols 768 and 831, 6 March 2000.

have consented to the interception.[204] In such circumstances, the interception must also be authorised within Part II, s 26. This provision effects a compromise in relation to so called 'participant monitoring' (where one party is aware of the interception). It was pointed out in the leading Canadian authority[205] that the consent of one party does not affect the infringement of privacy suffered by the other. But s 3(2) does not demand that 'participant monitoring' should be subject to the controls necessary for other interceptions; it is subject only to the lesser controls for 'directed' surveillance, discussed below. Section 4 covers persons whose communications are intercepted who are believed to be outside the UK, instances where the Secretary of State has made regulations covering the interception for business[206] purposes (s 4(2)), and instances in psychiatric hospitals or prisons (within the relevant applicable statutes). These provisions may raise questions as to their compatibility with the Convention, which are considered below.

Use of the intercepted material

Section 15 provides safeguards regarding the use of the intercepted material. They are intended to limit the persons who can see the material and to ensure that it is destroyed once it is no longer necessary to retain it for the authorised purposes. However, the Act does not state how these objectives are to be achieved; it is left to the Secretary of State to put arrangements into place to secure them. Further, s 15 does not apply to material obtained without warrant, under ss 3 or 4. Since, as indicated below, personal criminal intelligence information obtained from interceptions and then stored and processed electronically is not subject to the stronger controls under the data protection regime of the 1998 Data Protection Act, it is clear that the controls created under s 15 are potentially crucial in protecting this aspect of privacy.

Unauthorised interceptions

Section 1 of the 1985 Act dealt with unauthorised interceptions and made it a criminal offence to intercept a postal communication or telecommunication intentionally without authorisation. It did not cover taps outside the public telecommunications system. So, for example, no criminal or even civil wrong was committed by the Chief Constable of Merseyside when a tap on the internal police phone system was used against Alison Halford in order to seek to discredit her and undermine her sex discrimination claim against the police service.[207] The RIPA, which under s 1 reproduces the old s 1 offence with extensions, also covers interception of private systems, unless they are entirely freestanding. However, it is subject to an exception under s 1(6) which might have been applicable in the Halford case.[208] Section 1(6) provides that conduct is excluded from criminal liability if the interceptor 'is a person with a right to control the operation 204 This provision is clearly more protective of privacy than its counterpart under the 1985 Act, s 1(2), which relied on the consent of one party only.

205 Duarte [1990] 53 CCC (3d) 1.

206 'Business' includes government departments.

207 See Halford v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 523.

208 Ibid.

or the use of the system; or he has the express or implied consent of the [person intercepted]'. Section 1(3) creates civil liability in relation to unauthorised interception of a private, not a public system. Possibly in future, therefore, a person in a situation similar to that of Alison Halford might be able to bring a civil action only.

The role of the Commissioner

The Commissioner is a senior judge appointed by the Prime Minister on a part time basis to monitor the warrant procedure and to consider complaints. He had a duty under s 8(1)(a) of the 1985 Act, which is now continued under s 57(2)(a) of the RIPA, to keep the warrant procedure under review. Apart from the statutory limitations of his powers, the practical constraints on them have been overwhelming. He had no staff and carried out the checking procedure personally on a part time basis. Clearly, as he accepts, these constraints precluded consideration of every warrant which is brought to his attention. His powers were very limited. He could not order that warrants should be quashed or that the material obtained should be destroyed; under s 8(9) he could merely report a contravention of ss 2–5 to the Prime Minister, which had not already been the subject of a tribunal report, or a contravention of s 6 which covered destruction of material, and he had to prepare an annual report for the Prime Minister under s 8(6). These arrangements regarding checking of warrants were largely continued under RIPA, under ss 57[209] and 58 when the office became that of the Interception of Communications Commissioner, although staff can be appointed. His complaints role was taken over by the single tribunal.

The remit of the Commissioner gave him the opportunity to note that unauthorised tapping had occurred, but only when he was informed of it by the agencies concerned. Where he was so informed, he was told at the same time that the unauthorised action had been recognised, usually 'immediately', and all resultant material destroyed. His view was that these unauthorised actions, that is, criminal offences under s 1, termed 'errors' were 'comparatively few in number when considered in the context of the volume and complexity of the operations carried out'.[210] In his 2003 Report the Commissioner stated: 'A significant number of errors and breaches have been reported to me during the course of the year – 39 in all. Although the level of errors is the same as that in 2002, the number is still unacceptably high.'[211] In 2004 45 errors were reported to him and again he commented that his was unacceptable. In his annual reports, the Commissioner found no instance in which a warrant was issued unjustifiably. Although Crown servants, telecommunications and postal workers were under a duty to provide the Commissioner with the information he required to carry out his task, under s 8(3) of the 1985 Act (continued and extended to a wider range of people under the 2000 Act),[212] he had no effective means of checking that information had not been withheld.

209 Under s 57(2), 'Subject to subsection (5), the Interception of Communications Commissioner shall keep under review the exercise and performance by the Secretary of State of the powers and duties conferred or imposed on him by or under sections 1 to 11'.

210 Report of the Commissioner under the Interception of Communications Act 1998, published June 1999, Cm 4364, p 10.

211 Report of the Interception of Communications Commissioner for 2003, para 32.

212 See s 58(1), s 21(4) and s 49.

He received a list of warrants issued, renewed, modified or cancelled since the last visit, and checked a sample of them. He had no means of knowing whether the list was in fact complete, and unauthorised interception was not, unsurprisingly, recorded on it. These basic limitations affecting his role remained unchanged under the RIPA arrangements. The key reform under the RIPA was to the tribunal system.

It may be noted that the Interception of Communications Commissioner claims not to be a public body under the FoI. Technically, the Interception of Communications Commissioner may not be designated as a public body yet, but the office certainly meets both of the conditions in the Freedom of Information Act 2000, s 4 (Amendment of Schedule 1 to be included in the list of Public Bodies by Order). The first condition is that the body or office – (a) is established by virtue of Her Majesty's prerogative or by an enactment or by subordinate legislation, or (b) is established in any other way by a Minister of the Crown in his capacity as Minister, by a government department or by the National Assembly for Wales. The second condition is (a) in the case of a body, that the body is wholly or partly constituted by appointment made by the Crown, by a Minister of the Crown, by a government department or by the National Assembly for Wales, or (b) in the case of an office, that appointments to the office are made by the Crown, by a Minister of the Crown, by a government department or by the National Assembly for Wales. It appears that both of these criteria are clearly fulfilled by Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, s 57 and by the appointment process for the Interception of Communications Commissioner.

Reform of the tribunal system

Section 7 of the 1985 Act established a Tribunal to consider complaints from people who believed that their telephone had been tapped or their mail intercepted. It should be noted that the statutory provisions had no retrospective effect. Thus, complaints could relate only to post-commencement activities. The RIPA set up a new tribunal, under s 65, which as indicated above, replaced the old one and also those set up under the Security Services Act and the Intelligence Services Act. It also took over the role of Commissioners in hearing complaints under s 102, and Sched 7 to the Police Act 1997, (discussed below) and it also acquired a role in considering surveillance undertaken by other public authorities. It is able to consider pre-commencement activity, within certain limitations. Thus, its role extends well beyond that of the old Interceptions of Communications Tribunal. It therefore has immense significance as the central mechanism protecting citizens against abuse of state surveillance powers. Apart from the President of the Tribunal and Vice-President, both of whom are senior judges, seven senior members of the legal profession serve on the Tribunal. A Registrar has also been appointed to help in the process of hearing claims alleging infringements of the Human Rights Act. The Tribunal is discussed fully below.[213]

The old tribunal set up under the 1985 Act (which consisted of five senior lawyers) had a duty under s 7(3) of that Act, on receiving a complaint, to investigate whether a warrant had been issued and if so, whether it was properly issued – whether there were adequate grounds for issuing it and whether statutory procedures were complied with. Under s 7(4), the tribunal applied 'the principles applicable by a court on an application for judicial review' to this exercise. The tribunal could only consider the matters referred to in ss 2–5 of the 1985 Act concerning the issuance of warrants; it could not consider the questions whether the action was proportionate to the invasion of privacy and whether the action could have been carried out by other means.

213 Pages 1080 et seq.

The Report of the Commissioner for 1998 stated that the tribunal received 75 complaints in 1998, of which 72 were investigated and none was upheld.[214] The 1997 Report[215] stated that since it was established in 1986, the tribunal had received 568 complaints and that none had ever been upheld. According to the Report, in only eight of these cases was interception being carried out by a government agency and in each case it was properly authorised. The possibility that in some of the other 560 cases, or in others, unauthorised interception was occurring was seen in the Report as 'very remote' since it would involve a criminal conspiracy between the agency and the Public Telecommunications Operators. It may be noted that the 1985 Act did not provide any possibility of recognising that an invasion of privacy could occur due to the possibility that a phone had been tapped. The European Court of Human Rights accepted in Klass v Federal Republic of Germany[216] that this possibility represented a continuing invasion of privacy, since conversations would be inhibited.

Parliamentary oversight

Under the 1985 Act, parliamentary oversight, such as it was, was limited to interceptions which fell within the statute. Under RIPA, the oversight is equally limited, but it covers a far wider range of interceptions. Modelled on the old arrangements, the annual report of the current Commissioner must be presented to Parliament and published as a Command Paper, under s 58(6). The Prime Minister may censor the report under s 58(7) if it appears to him that it contains matter 'prejudicial to national security, to the prevention and detection of serious crime or to the economic well-being of the UK'. These grounds are the same as the previous ones under the 1985 Act. A new, broad one was added: the matter may be excluded if it appears to be prejudicial to 'the continued discharge of the functions of any public authority whose activities include activities that are subject to review by that Commissioner'. It appears to be unnecessary, in any event, for the Prime Minister to censor the report; the practice has been for the Commissioner to designate the part to be withheld.

Thus, parliamentary oversight continues to be highly circumscribed under the current oversight system since no Committee is directly charged with monitoring state surveillance. Bearing in mind the brevity of the Commissioner's reports, the opportunity for Parliament to oversee these arrangements is very limited. The parliamentary oversight is clearly much weaker than that applicable in Germany, as considered in the Klass case[217] (below). The opportunity of enabling the comprehensive interceptions statute to reflect notions of openness and accountability to Parliament in the era of the Human Rights and Freedom of Information Acts was lost.

214 Report of the Commissioner under the Interception of Communications Act 1998, published June 1999, Cm 4364, p 10.
215 Cm 4001.
216 (1978) 2 EHRR 214.
217 Ibid.

The impact of the HRA

As indicated, Part I of the RIPA was intended to be compatible with the requirements of the Convention. Since it allows for state invasion of privacy, the Convention Article of most relevance is Art 8. The discussion below identifies some of the aspects of Part I which are arguably of doubtful compatibility with Art 8. It then goes on to consider the effect of the HRA in this context and the means available under it of seeking to ensure that the Convention rights are adhered to when interception is used.

Interference with the primary rights

As indicated above, the interception of communications is likely to represent an interference with the Art 8(1) rights to respect for private life, the home and correspondence. The Strasbourg Court found in Klass[218] that the possibility that an interception was occurring could infringe Art 8, and this was also accepted in Malone v UK.[219] In Klass, the Court said: 'in the mere existence of the legislation itself there is involved, for all those to whom the legislation could be applied, a menace of surveillance; this menace necessarily strikes at freedom of communication between users of the postal and telecommunications services . . .'[220] Thus, the provisions of the 1985 Act could be viewed as representing a continuing invasion of privacy, whether or not in any individual case an intercept had actually been used, and the same can now be said of Part I of the RIPA.

As the Strasbourg Court explained in Halford v UK,[221] under the Convention the issue would be whether, on the particular facts, the essence of the complaint concerned the actual application to her of the measures of surveillance or that her Art 8 rights were menaced by the very existence of the law and practice permitting such measures. Halford v UK concerned the tapping of the applicant's office telephone by the police at a time when she was bringing a claim of sex discrimination against the police authority in question. The government argued that in using the private internal office system, the applicant could not expect to retain her privacy and that an employer should in principle be able to monitor calls made by an employee on the internal system without prior warning or consent.[222] The Court disagreed, finding that calls made from business premises as well as the home may be covered by the notions of 'private life' and 'correspondence' within the meaning of Art 8(1). This stance was also taken in Kopp v Switzerland.[223] The Court emphasised in that case that the interception of the telephone calls constituted the interference with the right under para 1; the fact that the recordings were not subsequently used was irrelevant. Thus, the Court has taken quite a broad approach, strongly protective of informational autonomy, to the meaning of the terms used in Art 8(1), thereby widening their application beyond obviously private spheres, including the home. The use made of material obtained from intercepts, including disclosure to others, may also fall within Art 8(1).[224]

218 (1978) 2 EHRR 214.
219 (1984) 7 EHRR 14.
220 See p 21, para 41.
221 [1997] IRLR 471; (1997) 24 EHRR 523.
222 Para 43.
223 (1999) 27 EHRR 91, paras 70–71.
224 MS v Sweden (1999) 28 EHRR 313.

In accordance with the law

As indicated above, state interference with the Art 8 guarantees must be in accordance with the law, under para 2, if it is to be justified and this requirement covers not only the existence of national law, but its quality. In Halford v UK,[225] the interception of the internal office telephone was clearly not in accordance with the law since domestic law provided no regulation at all of such interception, and therefore the Court found a breach of Art 8.

Part I of the RIPA was introduced in response to the findings in Halford v UK[226] and, generally, to provide a statutory basis for interception outside the public telecommunications system. Thus, a basis in national law currently exists. Once such a basis is found, its quality must be considered; it must be asked whether it is 'compatible with the rule of law . . . there must be a measure of legal protection in domestic law against arbitrary interferences by public authorities with [the right to respect for private life under Art 8(1)]. Especially where a power of the executive is exercised in secret, the risks of arbitrariness are evident.'[227] In Kopp v Switzerland[228] the Court clearly stated that the essential requirements of a national legal basis are those of accessibility and foreseeability so that, in this context, the citizen is sufficiently aware of the circumstances allowing interception. It must be clear as to the 'circumstances in and conditions on which public authorities are empowered to resort to any such secret measures'.[229]

In Christie v UK,[230] the 1985 Act was found to meet this requirement in relation to the terms 'national security' and 'economic well being'. The Commission viewed those terms as sufficiently precise since they had been explained by 'administrative or executive statements'. The Interception of Communications Tribunal had investigated and had found no breach in relation to the warrant procedure; this could be taken to mean that no warrant had been issued, a matter outside the jurisdiction of the tribunal, or that one had been properly issued. The other issue concerned the retention of information collected through the tap by the Security Service. It is notable, however, that this was a decision of the Commission only, that it was influenced by the margin of appreciation doctrine and that it was not made in the context of the 'serious crime' provision under the Act.

In Kruslin v France,[231] a basis in law was found for interception but it was not found to be of sufficient quality owing to its imprecision, which was found to fail to satisfy the requirement of foreseeability.[232] Similarly, in Kopp v Switzerland, which was also concerned with crime, not national security, the Court said: 'interception . . . constitutes a particularly serious interference with private life and correspondence and

225 (1997) 24 EHRR 523.

226 Ibid.

227 Malone v UK A 82, para 67; 4 EHRR 330. The Court reaffirmed this in Halford v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 523 above: 'this expression . . . relates to the quality [of domestic law], requiring it to be compatible with the rule of law' (para 49).

228 (1999) 27 EHRR 91, paras 70–71.

229 Halford v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 523, para 49.

230 78-A DR E Com HR 119.

231 (1990) 12 EHRR 528.

232 Ibid, para 30. See also Huvig v France (1990) 12 EHRR 528, para 29.

must accordingly be based on a "law" that is particularly precise.'[233] In another case outside the realm of national security or economic well being, Valenzuela v Spain,[234] the Court also found that the legal basis available for interception did not satisfy the requirements of foreseeability. In particular, the conditions necessary under the Convention to satisfy that requirement, including the nature of the offences which might give rise to an intercept order, were not included in the relevant provisions.[235] A development towards greater stringency appears to be evident in the jurisprudence, at least within the 'prevention of crime' context.

It is arguable that the 1985 Act did not fully meet the 'in accordance with the law' requirement since, inter alia, the serious crime ground was not defined as Valenzuela v Spain requires. It is defined in the RIPA, albeit in broad terms.[236] The question whether Part I of the RIPA meets this requirement in all respects remains open, bearing in mind the possible future development of the Strasbourg jurisprudence on this matter. The grounds under s 5(3), including the 'mutual assistance' ground, are clearly ill defined.

The fact that the Act provides for authorisation by executive, rather than judicial warrant, is also relevant to the requirement of foreseeability. In Kopp v Switzerland, in finding a breach of Art 8 for failure to satisfy that requirement, the Court said: 'it is . . . astonishing that this task should be assigned to an official of the Post Office's legal department, who is a member of the executive, without supervision by an independent judge.'[237]

The provision under s 3 of the RIPA allowing for interception with consent on the basis of reasonable belief may be questionable under Art 8, depending on the steps which must be taken in practice to establish the consent, especially in relation to the recipient of the communication.[238] Moreover, the authorisation procedure is less demanding than that in relation to interception by warrant and might appear, therefore, to be out of accord with the requirement of quality. However, at the present time the procedure is in principle in accordance with Art 8. The Court has found that where one party to the conversation had given consent under the equivalent provision of the 1985 Act, s 1(2), Art 8 was not breached since citizens would be sufficiently aware of the risk.[239]

Legitimate aims and necessity in a democratic society

If an interference is 'in accordance with the law', it must have a legitimate aim and be necessary in a democratic society. The legitimate aims under Art 8(2), set out above,[240] are very broad and echo those used under s 5(3), apart from the fourth one. But since

233 Ibid, para 44.
234 (1998) 28 EHRR 483.
235 Ibid, para 75.
236 In s 81(3).
237 Ibid, para 46.
238 See Lambert v France (1999) 1 EHRLR 123. In Kruslin v France (1990) 12 EHRR 547, para 26, it was accepted that although the line of a third party had been tapped, an interference with the applicant's Art 8 rights had occurred, since his conversations on that line had been intercepted and recorded.
239 Nadir Choudhary v UK (1999) 1 EHRLR 522. See also Smith v UK [1997] EHRLR 277.
240 See pp 1027–28.

the aim of that ground is to prevent crime, this aim would almost certainly be viewed as legitimate. Thus, this requirement appears to be satisfied.

The Court has interpreted 'necessary in a democratic society' as meaning: 'an interference corresponds to a pressing social need and, in particular, that it is proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued.'[241] The scrutiny of proportionality in a particular instance, as Chapters 2 and 4 indicated, is strongly linked to the extent of the margin of appreciation conceded to the state. The width of that margin appears to depend partly on the aim of the interference in question. In relation to the aim of national security, the Court has allowed a very wide margin to the state.

In Klass v Federal Republic of Germany[242] the European Court of Human Rights found, bearing the margin of appreciation doctrine in mind, that German telephone tapping procedures were in conformity with Art 8 since they contained a number of safeguards. An oversight body, a Parliamentary board,[243] could consider, on an application from an aggrieved individual or ex officio, whether the interception had been authorised and its necessity. There was also quite a substantial degree of Parliamentary scrutiny: the Minister in question had to report to a parliamentary board and also to give an account of the interceptions ordered to a Commission. The possibility was available of compensation for persons whose phones had been unlawfully tapped and of challenges to interception in proceedings in the ordinary courts, and the individual warrants had to be reviewed by a Commission headed by a person qualified for judicial office.

The Court did not, however, state that these were the minimal safeguards necessary; it said:

> The Court considers that in a field where abuse is so easy in individual cases and could have such harmful consequences for democratic society as a whole, it is in principle desirable to entrust supervisory control to a judge. Nevertheless, having regard to the supervisory and other safeguards provided . . . the Court concludes that the exclusion of judicial control does not exceed the limits of what may be deemed necessary in a democratic society. The Parliamentary Board and the . . . Commission are independent of the authorities carrying out the surveillance, and are vested with sufficient powers and competence to exercise an effective and continuous control. Furthermore, the democratic character is reflected in the balanced membership of the Parliamentary Board. The Opposition is reflected on this body and is therefore able to participate in the control of the measures ordered by the . . . Minister . . .[244]

In Christie v UK,[245] the Commission found: 'having regard to the wide margin of appreciation in this area' the safeguards provided by the Interception of Communications Tribunal and the Commissioner were sufficient in the instant case where the applicant was a trade unionist with links with communist Eastern Europe and his phone was 241 Olsson v Sweden A 130 (1988), para 67.

242 (1978) 2 EHRR 214.
243 Under Law G10.
244 Ibid, p 235.
245 78-A DR E Com HR 119.

being tapped on the grounds of 'national security' and 'economic well-being'. The interception was proportionate to those legitimate aims, on the facts of the case. Similar findings were made, rather readily, by the Commission in Remmers and Hamer v The Netherlands[246]in the context of serious crime.

Bearing in mind the findings in Klass, the findings in Christie need not be taken as absolutely conclusive evidence that the oversight mechanisms provided by the 1985 Act, and maintained, with modifications, under Part I of RIPA, meet Convention requirements. They were made in relation to the particular case, not as abstract comment on the mechanisms or on the warrant procedure in general, and they were heavily influenced by the margin of appreciation. As indicated in Chapter 4, that doctrine is not available at national level and this, it is contended, means that it should not influence national decision makers, including judges acting judicially or extra-judicially, and other national bodies. The government and the Commissioner have assumed that the decision in Christie closes the question as far as the 1985 Act is concerned and as the statement of compatibility accompanying it demonstrates, the government takes this stance in respect of Part I, Chapter I of the RIPA as well. But in respect of interception under warrant, under the RIPA, the issue could be re-opened at Strasbourg in future, under developments in the Court's jurisprudence, bearing in mind the possibility of changing standards in other member states.

Domestically, a national judge (probably sitting in the single tribunal,[247] not in an ordinary court) is theoretically free under the HRA to take a more rigorous look at the safeguards provided by the RIPA and at the necessity and proportionality of an interference. The approach taken in practice would depend on the tendency of the judge to follow the traditionalist model: it might well be found that traditional notions of deference to the executive in this sensitive area would yield the same result as adherence to the margin of appreciation doctrine. But a judge might be prepared to depart from a deferential stance outside the national security context. As indicated above, it is a statutory requirement for the Secretary of State or Senior Official to consider proportionality[248] in issuing a warrant. Therefore, the single tribunal is expected to consider whether the statutory requirements have been met, taking Strasbourg guidance into account under s 2 HRA, but adopting a more rigorous scrutiny. The continued lack of judicial authorisation under the RIPA should be considered, when looking at the necessity of an interference, bearing in mind the fact that the other safeguards available, including parliamentary oversight, are weaker than those considered in Klass. Complaints to the Tribunal cannot easily be 'categorised' under the three tribunal system that existed prior to RIPA, so it is not possible to detail those complaints that relate solely to the interception of communications. The Tribunal received 109 new applications during 2003 and completed its investigation of 43 of these during the year as well as concluding its investigation of 57 of the 67 cases carried over from 2001/2002. Seventy six cases have been carried forward to 2004[249] and 90 new applications were made in 2004. On no occasion has the Tribunal concluded that there has been a contravention of RIPA or the Human Rights Act 1998.

246 (1999) 27 EHRR CD 168.
247 Note that tribunal members, apart from the President, need not be judges (see Sched 3).
248 Section 5(2).
249 Report of the Interception of Communications Commissioner for 2003, para 30.

Obligations of oversight bodies, of those applying for warrants and of those carrying them out

As a public authority under s 6 of the HRA, the Interception of Communications Commissioner has a duty to abide by the Convention rights in discharging his oversight role. The Commissioner should ensure that the agencies he oversees are themselves ensuring Convention compliance. The members of the agencies and telecommunications and postal workers are bound by s 6 not to infringe the Convention in carrying out their work. In other words, all the public authorities involved should comply with the requirements of the Convention.

Parliament is not bound by s 6, but in considering reports of the Commissioner or in debating any issues arising from the operation of the RIPA, it would be expected that the Convention requirements would be strictly borne in mind, especially as a statement of compatibility accompanied the Act.

Raising Convention issues in court proceedings

Under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA, Convention issues could be raised in prosecutions against agency members, police officers, telecommunications or postal workers or other public authorities in respect of the various offences arising from non-co-operation with state interception created under the 2000 Act. But this would not normally involve consideration of the key issue – the invasions of privacy allowed for under the RIPA. Consideration of the compatibility of intercepts with Art 8 in court proceedings appears to be almost entirely precluded by s 17 of the RIPA. Section 17 is based on s 9 of the 1985 Act which provided: 'In any proceedings before any court or tribunal, no evidence shall be adduced and no question asked in cross-examination which . . . tends to suggest that 'the offence under s 1 has been or is to be committed by postal or telecommunications workers or Crown Servants or 'that a warrant has been or is to be issued to any of those persons'.

Section 17 provides:

> subject to s 18, no evidence shall be adduced, question asked, assertion or disclosure made or other thing done in, for the purposes of or in connection with any legal proceedings which (in any manner) –
>
> (a) discloses, in circumstances from which its origin in anything falling within subsection (2) may be inferred, any of the contents of an intercepted communication or any related communications data; or
> (b) tends (apart from any such disclosure) to suggest that anything falling within subsection (2) has or may have occurred or be going to occur.

Section 17(2) covers:

> (a) conduct . . . that was or would be an offence under s 1(1) or (2) of this Act or under s 1 of the . . . 1985 Act;
> (b) a breach by the Secretary of State of his duty under section 1(4) of this Act;
> (c) the issue of an interception warrant or of a warrant under the . . . 1985 Act;

(d) the making of an application by any person for an interception warrant, or for a warrant under that Act;
(e) the imposition of any requirement on any person to provide assistance with giving effect to an interception warrant.

This is clearly a far more comprehensive clause than s 9, although it is subject to certain exceptions under s 18, which may allow Convention points to be raised, in accordance with the courts' duty under s 6 of the HRA. This rule is clearly arbitrary, since material deriving from the use of bugging and other surveillance devices can be adduced, as discussed below.

Section 18(1) provides that s 17(1) does not apply in proceedings before the tribunal, for an offence under the RIPA, s 1 of the 1985 Act, s 4(3)(a) of the Official Secrets Act, and a number of other provisions relating to the secrecy of interceptions. Section 18(4), (6), (7) and (9) provide a number of very significant exceptions not previously included. Section 18(4) applies, inter alia,[250] where the interception was by consent under s 3; s 18(6) provides that s 17(1)(b) does not prevent doing anything which discloses conduct for which a person has been convicted under ss1(1), 11(7), 19 or s 1 of the 1985 Act. Under s 18(7), s 17(1) does not prohibit disclosure of '(a) any information that continues to be available for disclosure' to the prosecution 'for the purpose only of enabling that person to determine what is required of him by his duty to secure [its] fairness' or (b) disclosure to a relevant judge[251] by order of the judge 'to be made to him alone'. Under s 18(8), a judge shall not order such a disclosure unless satisfied that 'the exceptional circumstances of the case make the disclosure essential in the interests of justice'. If disclosure is ordered, s 18(9) allows the judge, in 'exceptional circumstances', to 'direct the prosecution to make any admission of fact . . . that the judge thinks is essential in the interests of justice'. But any such direction must not, under s 18(10), contravene s 17(1). Thus, where intercept material is still available, its disclosure to the judge or to the prosecution may be ordered. It may be noted that the material may still be in existence at the time of the trial, since it is preserved, for the benefit of the prosecution, under s 15(4)(d). Communications data (details of calls made) may be adduced in evidence, since it is not an intercepted communication as defined in s 17(4), so long as it does not suggest that the offences in question have been committed.[252]

Section 9 of the 1985 Act meant that if an intercept had been used to obtain material, whether unauthorised or not, the information gained would be inadmissible in evidence. But s 9 only applied to the forms of interception which the Act covered. Section 9 was considered in two House of Lords' decisions, which led to a bizarre 250 Section 18(4) also provides that s 16(1)(a) does not apply if the interception was lawful by virtue of s 1(5)(c) (relating to stored material obtained under another statutory power), or s 4(1) (persons believed to be outside UK). For discussion of ss 17 and 18, see Mirfield, P, 'Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000: Part 2: Evidential Aspects' [2001] Crim LR 91.

251 Inter alia, a judge of the High Court or Crown Court. This provision amends the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996, s 3(4).

252 This position continues that established under the 1985 Act in Morgans v DPP [2000] 2 WLR 386, HL; [1999] 1 WLR 968, CA in which it was found that s 9 of that Act does not preclude a court from receiving evidence of printouts obtained by a logging device.

and anomalous situation. In Effick,[253] the defendants were prosecuted for conspiracy to supply controlled drugs and police officers obtained part of the evidence against them by means of intercepting and taping their telephone calls. The offence under s 1 had not been committed since the calls taped were made on a cordless telephone which was not found to be part of 'a public telecommunications system' as required under s 1. The appellants were convicted, and appealed on the ground that the evidence deriving from the intercepted telephone calls should have been ruled inadmissible under s 9 of the Interception of Communications Act 1985, or under s 78 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE), since they were made without a warrant for interception.

The House of Lords determined that argument under s 9 failed because its provisions were aimed at preventing disclosure of information which tended to suggest that the offence of unauthorised interception (under s 1(1) of the 1985 Act) had been committed by specified persons, or that a warrant had been or was to be issued to such persons. These matters were not in issue since the interception was not within the Act. Section 9 was not intended to render inadmissible evidence obtained which would not reveal such matters. Clear statutory language would have been needed to oust the principle that all logically probative evidence should be admitted. As this was not the case, and as the instance in question did not appear to fall within s 9, the evidence was admissible. The submission in respect of s 78 of PACE failed because it was not suggested that the police officers had deliberately contravened the 1985 Act. It was found that no unfairness to the defendants had occurred due to the admission of the evidence, but this begs the question whether the manner in which the evidence was obtained – on no legal basis and by means of a surreptitious act – could affect the fairness of the trial.

In Preston,[254] in contrast, a lawful intercept had occurred and the defence wanted admission of the material derived from it which, it was alleged, might have led to the acquittal of the defendants. In a decision which accepted somewhat reluctantly that the 1985 Act created a scheme designed to elevate the interests of secrecy above individual rights to privacy or to a fair trial, the House of Lords found that s 9 was designed to prevent information as to the manner of authorising and carrying out the intercepts from being uncovered at the trial. It was intended, inter alia, to prevent the defendant from seeking to uncover the source of information behind the decision to use an intercept. Thus, the defence had no right to obtain disclosure of the material deriving from the intercepts. Further, since on the proper interpretation of s 2(2) read in conjunction with s 6(3), destruction of material gained by the intercepts had to be undertaken once the criminal investigation (not the prosecution) was complete, such material would not be available.

The result of this decision was that although telephone tapping could be used as an investigative tool in the criminal process, material deriving directly from an intercept would not be admissible and the defence would not be allowed to ask any questions designed to discover whether an intercept was used. Thus, the prosecution might at times be disadvantaged, since some probative material would not be admissible,[255] but the other side of the coin was that material deriving from the intercept could not be disclosed to the defence even if (as the defence alleged in Preston) it might show the innocence of the defendants. One exception, favourable to the prosecution, to the rule deriving from s 9, as interpreted in Preston, was allowed in Rasool and Choudhary.[256] It was determined that where intercepts are consensual, material deriving from them will be admissible. The rule in s 9(1)(a) was not found to be sufficient to make consensual material inadmissible; it was found to be irrelevant to the question of admissibility that an offence had been committed in obtaining the evidence. Choudhary's appeal was dismissed while Rasool's was allowed on that ground. Similarly, in Owen,[257] the evidence deriving from an intercept was found to be admissible, on the basis that it did not suggest that the offence under s 1 had been committed. The defendant, in prison on remand, had admitted the offence with which he was charged in a phone call to his wife. He was deemed to have consented to the interception since notices warning of the likelihood of interception had been posted near telephones in the prison. The defendant claimed that he had not seen any such notice. But it was found that, on the basis that one of the parties had impliedly consented, the admission of the evidence would not suggest that the offence under s 1 of the Act had been committed.[258]

253 [1994] 3 WLR 583; (1994) 99 Cr App R 312, HL; (1992) 95 Cr App R 427, CA. For criticism of the Court of Appeal decision, see Leigh, I (1992) 142 NLJ 944–45, 976–77; Smith, JC [1992] Crim LR 580. See generally Spencer (1999) 58 CLJ 43.

254 [1993] 4 All ER 638; (1994) 98 Cr App R 405, HL. For discussion, see Tomkins, A (1994) 57 MLR 941.

The anomalous result of Effick and Preston was that in one, unlawfully obtained evidence, favourable to the prosecution, could be used as part of the prosecution evidence, while in another, lawfully obtained evidence could not be used at the behest of the defence. However, the decision in Morgans[259] addressed this anomaly. The House of Lords found that s 9 covers intercepts both with and without warrant. These decisions appear to have influenced Part I of the RIPA. Most obviously, that statute covers most forms of communication so that the argument used in Effick regarding cordless phones cannot be raised. Section 18(4), which refers inter alia to interceptions without a warrant where one party has consented to the interception (s 3), covers the findings from Rasool and Owen. Significantly, in certain imprecisely defined circumstances, disclosure relating to intercept material can be made to the prosecution and, if ordered, to the judge. But the defence may remain unaware of the source of the material. The fact that the use of the intercept led to the uncovering of other evidence, which is adduced, might be relevant to any challenge the defence could mount to the evidence. This position may not accord with the equality of arms principle under Art 6 of the Convention, since prosecution and defence may not be equally affected by the unavailability of the evidence.[260] The compatibility of ss 17 and 18 with the Art 6(1) guarantee of a 255 This factor influenced the Commission in declaring the application from Preston inadmissible: Preston v UK, 2 July 1997, Appl No 24193/94; available from the Commission's website.

256 [1997] 4 All ER 439. Choudhary applied, unsuccessfully, to Strasbourg: Choudhary v UK (1999) 1 EHRLR 522. For a further exception, see Aujla [1998] 2 Cr App R 16.

257 [1999] 1 WLR 949.

258 Since under s 1(2) of the Act, interceptions without warrant but with consent is not an offence.

259 [2000] 2 WLR 386. For an interesting application of the Morgans argument, see Sargent [2001] UKHL 54.

260 This could be argued by analogy with the decisions in Windisch v Austria (1990) 13 EHRR 281 and Kostovski v Netherlands (1989) 12 EHRR 434.

fair trial may be raised. If the use of interception is lawful, and probative evidence is obtained, it is hard to identify the legitimate purpose of refusing to adduce it directly in court. Section 18 addresses the question of proportionality to a very limited extent, but the question arises whether the requirements of equality of arms can be satisfied by a provision which allows the intercept material to be disclosed to the prosecution but not to the defence. More generally, the question of the fairness of the trial arises in relation to the exclusion of probative evidence.

In circumstances similar to those in Preston in which the defence seeks disclosure of the intercept material which has evidential value, whether or not it has been disclosed to the prosecution, the defence could make representations to the judge under s 18(9)(b), arguing that the term 'exceptional circumstances' must be rendered compatible with Art 6 under s 3 of the HRA, taking into account the requirements of fairness in the particular instance.[261] If the material is crucial to the defence, but the judge refuses to make an order, an appeal could be mounted on the basis that the judge had not complied with Art 6. Perhaps the most difficult situation would arise where, as in Malone, the defence suspected that an unauthorised intercept had been used. The defence might wish to mount an argument that evidence causally related to such use, rather than directly deriving from it, should be excluded since it would not have been obtained but for the illegality. Such exclusion could be argued for under s 78 of PACE, interpreted compatibility with Art 6.[262] But ss 18(10) and 17(1) stand in the way of obtaining an admission that an unauthorised intercept had been used. Possibly where an activist view of the exclusion of evidence requirement under Art 6 was taken, the only recourse would be to obtain a declaration of incompatibility between those provisions and Art 6(1) under s 4 of the HRA on the basis of unfairness under Art 6(1). However, if it was assumed that no appeal could succeed since those provisions would have to be applied, the defendants might view seeking such a declaration as worthless since it could not provide them individually with any redress. It appears therefore that although ss 17 and 18 show signs of seeking to escape from certain of the effects of s 9 of the 1985 Act, they nevertheless provide a scheme whose central aim is to preserve the secrecy surrounding interceptions, whether or not the interests of justice are thereby compromised.

Sections 17 and 18 are most likely to be relevant in criminal proceedings, but other proceedings are also affected. As discussed below, the route to judicial review of the decisions of the single tribunal may be barred by the ouster clause contained in s 67(8) of the RIPA[263] and based on s 7(8) of the 1985 Act. Section 65(2), which provides that the jurisdiction of the tribunal is to be 'the only appropriate tribunal' for the purposes of s 7(1)(a) of the HRA, also stands in the way of review. Section 65 is discussed further below,[264] and it is suggested that judicial review of executive decisions in the ordinary 261 See pp 1075–77. The findings in Rowe and Davis v UK (2000) 30 EHRR 1, although in a different context, which concerned unfairness arising from the non-disclosure of evidence, would be applicable.

262 See further Chapter 13, pp 1290–95.

263 Replacing s 7(8) of the 1985 Act and replacing s 91(10) of the 1997 Act in so far as complaints are concerned, and creating a new ouster clause in relation to complaints regarding surveillance by a range of other public authorities.

264 See pp 1081–82.

courts is possible in respect of some surveillance. But in respect of the interception of communications, s 17 would also have to be circumvented. Since s 18(9) applies to criminal proceedings only, the way to judicial review in the ordinary courts appears to remain barred. The only, faint, possibility seems to be that eventually, a declaration of incompatibility under s 4 of the HRA between s 17 and Art 6 might eventually be made on appeal from proceedings for permission to seek review.

The possibility of a tort action, including that of a cause of action based on breach of Art 8, is also probably ruled out on the same grounds. Where the existing law fails to cover interceptions which infringe Art 8, new tortious liability could have been created. Under the 1985 Act, the possibility would have been open of bringing an action once the HRA was fully in force in respect of forms of phone tapping outside the 1985 Act. This position was unsatisfactory and anomalous. But it did leave open the possibility, now probably closed down under Part I of RIPA, of raising such matters in the ordinary courts. At present, apart from prosecutions for the offences created by the RIPA, or enforcement of interception in the civil courts, the tribunal appears to provide the only judicial forum in which the Convention points discussed above can be raised.

Conclusions

The discussion suggests that court action as a method of seeking to ensure that the HRA is fully complied with in this context is highly circumscribed and uncertain. No clear and effective method is currently available, unless the tribunal proves to be more effective than its predecessor. Parliamentary oversight is also limited. If the Convention rights are to have any real impact domestically in this context, this may be most likely to occur through incremental internal change in procedures, rather than through the courts or the complaints mechanisms.

It is notable that the inception of proceedings in the ordinary courts in relation to interception under Part I of the RIPA is at present a privilege intended to be accorded only to the state. The role of the judiciary in the ordinary courts in protecting individual citizens, at their instigation, from abuse of state power in conducting interceptions has been almost entirely removed. Instead, the intention is that the courts should be used only to seek to further state ends – as a means of enforcing the use of intercepts. Thus, civil or criminal proceedings can be used under ss 11(7) and (8) in order to compel private companies to intercept the communications of their customers. At the same time, a citizen whose communications appear to have been unlawfully intercepted has no means of challenging the interception in the ordinary courts, even assuming that she becomes aware of it. It is a criminal offence under s 19, a classic 'reverse onus' clause, for a telecommunications worker, for example, to inform a member of the public that her phone has been tapped under an unlawfully issued warrant. The unsatisfactoriness of this regime leads to the conclusion that further safeguards against arbitrary invasion of privacy by interception, and consequent modifications of Part I of the RIPA, may eventually be introduced as a result of Strasbourg findings, or possibly as a result of relying on Art 8 under the HRA in applications to the new tribunal.

5 State surveillance[265]

Introduction

The last 25 years have seen an immense and still increasing expansion in the availability and use of a range of highly sophisticated surveillance devices, and state surveillance has become more intensive since the Labour Government came to power in 1997.[266] The recent growth in state use of such devices as part of intelligence-led policing has received encouragement from official studies.[267] The growth in such policing, which involves using covert investigative techniques proactively to target suspects, is due, as the group Justice has pointed out, to the need to respond to terrorist activity,[268] to organised crime, to the availability and efficacy of the new technology, and to the wider use of criminal intelligence following the growth of national and transnational agencies, including Europol and the National Criminal Intelligence Service[269] (amalgamated since 2006 into the Serious and Organised Crime Agency) and transnational agreements.[270] 'Bugging' equipment has become much more sophisticated in the last 25 years, with the result that it is now very powerful, readily concealable and relatively cheap.[271]

265 For texts referred to below and further discussion see: Mckay, S, Covert Policing: Law and Practice, 2007, OUP; Starmer, K, Strange, M and Whitaker, W, Criminal Justice, Police Powers and Human Rights, 2001, Blackstone; Uglow, S, Covert Surveillance and the European Convention on Human Rights [1999] Criminal Law Review, April, pp 287–99; Akdeniz, Y, Taylor, N and Walker, C, 'Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000: Bigbrother.gov.uk: State Surveillance in the Age of Information and Rights' (2001) Criminal Law Review, February: 73–90; Taylor, N, 'State Surveillance and the Right to Privacy' Surveillance & Society 1(1) 84; Davies, S, (1996) Big Brother: Britain's Web of Surveillance and the New Technological Order. London: Pan; Etzioni, A, The Limits of Privacy 1999, Basic Books Inc.; Fenwick, H, Civil Rights: New Labour, Freedom and the Human Rights Act, 2000; Fitzpatrick, B and Taylor, N, 'Human Rights and the Discretionary Exclusion of Evidence', 2001, Journal of Criminal Law, 65(4): 349–59; Feldman, D, 'Secrecy, Dignity or Autonomy? Views of Privacy as a Civil Liberty' (1994) Current Legal Problems, 47(2): 41–71; Home Office, Interception of Communications in the United Kingdom Cm.4368 (1999); JUSTICE, Under Surveillance, 1998; Leigh, I, 'A Tapper's Charter?' [1986] Public Law, Spring: 8–18' Lustgarten, L and Leigh, I, In From The Cold: National Security and Parliamentary Democracy, 1994; Lyon, D, Surveillance Society: Monitoring Everyday Life, 2001, Open University Press; Norris, C and Armstrong, G, 'Introduction: Power and Vision', in Norris, C, Moran, J and Armstrong, G, (eds) Surveillance, Closed Circuit Television and Social Control, 1998, Ashgate, pp 3–20; Norris, C and Armstrong, G, The Maximum Surveillance Society: The Rise of CCTV, 1999, Berg; Taylor, N and Walker, C, 'Bugs in the System' (1996) Journal of Civil Liberties, 1: 105–24; Leigh, I, 'The security service, the press and the courts' [1987] PL 12–21.

266 See Mckay, S, Covert Policing: Law and Practice, 2007. See also below, pp 1058–59.

267 Audit Commission, Helping with Enquiries, 1993; Home Office Review of Police Core and Ancillary Tasks, 1995. See Manwaring-White, S, The Policing Revolution, 1983; Report of the Commissioner for 1993, Cm 2522; Security Services Work Against Organised Crime, Cm 3065, 1996.

268 See also Chapter 14, p 1332.

269 Justice: Under Surveillance, 1998, p 7. Walker and Taylor have pointed out that the use of surveillance techniques by police avoids adherence to the PACE interviewing rules and makes it less likely that evidence will be excluded: 'Bugs in the system' (1996) J Civ Lib 105, pp 107–8.

270 See the Memorandum of Understandings on the Lawful Interception of Communications, EU JHA-Council, 25 October 1995.

271 See Taylor and Walker, 'Bugs in the system' (1996) J Civ Lib 105; Mckay, S, Covert Policing: Law and Practice, 2007.

The criminal intelligence information obtained can be matched and disseminated with increasing rapidity using the new technology.

Thus, surveillance devices and techniques offer an important weapon to the police and security services in the maintenance of law and order and the protection of national security. However, as the Supreme Court of Canada has said of them: '. . . one can scarcely imagine a state activity more dangerous to individual privacy than electronic surveillance.'[272] This was also the view of the Younger Committee, which considered the range of devices then in use.[273] The use by state bodies of surveillance techniques and their legal basis resembles the pattern considered above in relation to the interception of communications. Despite the development of such techniques and the increased use of them by the police and the security services, they had until quite recently no or a quasi-legal basis – a position which was possible under a constitution based on negative liberties since the state, like the ordinary citizen, was, according to a key decision, entitled to do anything which the law did not forbid.[274] They operated until quite recently outside the realms of Parliamentary, judicial or administrative control. Bearing in mind the power of the state to conduct surveillance and its intrusiveness, this was an especially anomalous position.

Prior to the inception of the Police Act 1997, under administrative guidelines,[275] the use of listening devices could be authorised by Chief Constables in order to assist in a criminal investigation, if the crime was really serious, normal methods had been tried and had failed, and there was good reason for believing that the use of such equipment would lead to a conviction. Also, the authorising officer had to weigh the seriousness of the offence against the degree of intrusion necessary. When it became apparent in 1996 that this regime was inadequate, as explained below, since it did not meet the demands of the European Convention on Human Rights, the use of certain surveillance techniques by the police was placed on a statutory basis in the Police Act 1997. Following the lead of the Interception of Communications Act 1985, it gives an impression of covering the use of surveillance devices by the police, while in fact leaving many areas of their use outside its statutory framework.

The imminence of the HRA, and the effect of Art 8 in particular, was the driving force for further change. The unsatisfactory nature of the arrangements was pointed out in 1998 by Justice in a report[276] which argued for integration of surveillance techniques with interception, in one comprehensive statute. The Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act provides that comprehensive basis. Overlapping with the 1997 Act, most of which it does not repeal, Part II of the RIPA covers a far wider range of both techniques and public authorities, including the police. It places the use of surveillance by the security and intelligence services on a clearer statutory basis, overlapping with the Intelligence Services Act 1994. By providing a comprehensive statutory basis that 272 Duarte (1990) 65 DLR (4th) 240.

273 Report of the Committee on Privacy, Cmnd 5012, 1972.

274 See Megarry VC in Malone v MPC [1979] Ch 344.

275 Guidelines on the Use of Equipment in Police Surveillance Operations, House of Commons Library, 19 December 1984.

276 Under Surveillance, 1988.

coincided (roughly) with the coming fully into force of the HRA, Part II sought to avoid the embarrassment of the findings in Malone v UK,[277] Halford v UK[278] and Khan v UK.[279] As indicated above, Malone led to the inception of the Interception of Communications Act 1985 since it was found at Strasbourg that the interference with privacy represented by telephone tapping was not in accordance with the law, as it had no satisfactory legal basis. In Halford it was found that the tapping of the applicant's internal office phone had no such basis, while the same finding was made as regards the use of 'bugging' devices in Khan. The finding in Halford was addressed in Part I of the RIPA, that in Khan in Part III of the 1997 Act.[280] Assuming that the forms of surveillance covered by Part II of the RIPA engage Art 8 in the sense that they represent an interference with the respect for private life guaranteed under that Article,[281] the Convention arguments raised in those cases would have been raised in the domestic courts under the HRA (under s 7(1)(a) or (b)), particularly in respect of forms of so called 'directed' surveillance (see below) if Part II of the RIPA had not been introduced. Part II also provides a fuller complaints mechanism, with a view to keeping most scrutiny of surveillance out of the ordinary courts, but nevertheless satisfying the demands of the Convention. In contrast with the position under Part I, it does not create a criminal offence of conducting unauthorised surveillance. Part II also seeks to deal with the problem of encryption by requiring disclosure of the key to information under s 49,[282] rendering refusal punishable under s 53, a classic 'reverse onus' clause.

Thus, for the first time a statutory basis for a number of investigative techniques was created, clearly a welcome development. But it is questionable whether Part II is any more adequate at the level of principle than the previous scheme. It is clearly not as vulnerable to challenges under the Convention at Strasbourg or under the HRA. Nevertheless, its compatibility with the Convention remains in doubt, as discussed below. The Justice Report (1998) influenced its introduction, but while the first of their key recommendations – that there should be an integrated, comprehensive statutory basis for surveillance – has largely been met, it is questionable whether this is true of the second – using a 'coherent set of principles as required by Art 8' to underpin the scheme.[283]

277 A 82 (1984); 7 EHRR 14.

278 [1997] IRLR 471.

279 (2000) 8 BHRC 310.

280 By the time that the European Court of Human Rights made this finding, Part III of the 1997 Act had already been passed. Nevertheless, at the time when the police used the bugging device to obtain evidence against Khan, no sufficient basis in law was available to meet the demands of Art 8.

281 The Strasbourg decisions, discussed pp 1068–71, strongly suggest that this would be the case.

282 A s 49 notice requires service providers to disclose encryption keys and to keep secret the fact that a key has been disclosed. This provision may lead to adoption of a 'voluntary' key escrow system – a system whereby private encryption keys are deposited with a third party. Such a system would provide protection from prosecution for those who had genuinely lost or deleted their keys. But it clearly has significant privacy implications. See further Akedeniz, Y, 'UK Government policy on encryption' [1997] WSCL 1.

283 Under Surveillance: Covert Policing and Human Rights Standards, 1998; see Recommendation 1, p 107.

The Police Act 1997, Part III

The House of Lords in Khan,[284] confronted with evidence obtained by police bugging involving trespass, recommended legislation, taking into account the fact that the regime governing the use of bugging devices was not on a statutory basis and therefore might not comply with the 'in accordance with the law' requirement under Art 8.[285] Their recommendation was one of the factors behind the passing of the Police Act 1997, which therefore represents another instance in which powers posing a grave threat to privacy and other individual rights were governed only by administrative guidelines until it became apparent that such a course could not be justified under the Convention.

The authorisation procedure

The Police Act, Part III placed the practice under the relevant Home Office guidelines[286] on a statutory basis, with certain changes. It only covers the installation of devices which could have attracted liability under trespass, criminal damage or unlawful interference with wireless telegraphy, under the Wireless Telegraphy Acts 1949 and 1967. Therefore, it does not cover 'stand off' devices. Also, it does not cover devices installed with the consent of the person able to give permission in respect of the premises in question.[287] The use of surveillance devices in a range of circumstances therefore falls outside it, as do a range of techniques, in particular the use of informants.[288] Such matters continued to be governed by the Guidelines until Part II of the RIPA (see below) came into force.

Part III of the Police Act is largely modelled on the Interception of Communications Act and therefore contains certain similar objectionable features. The basis for allowing the use of bugging is very broad. An authorisation may be issued if the action is expected to be of substantial value in the prevention and detection of serious crime and the objective cannot reasonably be achieved by other means (s 93(2)). Serious crime is defined under s 93(4) to include crimes of violence, those involving substantial financial gain, and those involving a large number of people in pursuit of a common purpose.[289] These definitions appear to be significantly wider than those under the old guidelines. The last possibility could allow bugging to be used against, for example, members of CND or anti-road protesters, if it was expected, inter alia, that their activities might 284 [1996] 3 All ER 289; [1996] 3 WLR 162; (1996) 146 NLJ 1024, HL; [1995] QB 27, CA.

285 See the comments of Lord Nolan [1996] 3 WLR 162, p 175 and Lord Slynn, p 166. See also the Home Affairs Select Committee 3rd Report for 1994–5, Organised Crime HC 18–1, which recommended a statutory basis. It may be noted that Khan v UK Appl No 35394/97 was declared admissible at Strasbourg: (1999) 27 EHRR CD 58, and the application was successful (Judgment of the Court of 12 May 2000, 8 BHRC 310) since at the time there was no sufficient basis in law for the interference with Art 8. See further Chapter 15, pp 1291–92.

286 HO Circular to Chief Constables, Guidelines on the Use of Technical Equipment in Police Surveillance Operations.

287 Under the Guidelines and the previous Code of Practice, Intrusive Surveillance. One example would be the placing of listening devices in a police station: see Bailey and Smith [1993] Crim LR 861; Musqud Ali [1966] QB 668.

288 See H [1987] Crim LR 47 and Jelen and Katz [1990] 90 Cr App R 456. The use of a wired informant may require permission under the HO Circular; Part II of the RIPA – provisions covering covert human sources – now applies.

289 Or the crime is one for which a person of 21 or over with no previous convictions could reasonably be expected to receive a prison sentence of three or more years.

infringe s 68 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994.[290] The 1999 Code of Practice, however, adopted under s 101 of the Act, emphasised that the bugging powers must only be used in cases of serious crime such as drug trafficking.

Under s 93(5), an authorisation to interfere with property may be issued by the Chief Officer of Police or, if that is not practicable, by an officer of the rank of Assistant Chief Constable of the force in question (s 94), if s 93(2) applies. The authorisation will be given in writing, except in cases of emergency, when it may be given orally by the Chief Officer in person (s 95(1)). A written authorisation will last for three months, an oral one for 72 hours. Both forms may be renewed in writing for a further three months. The commissioners appointed under s 91(1) must be notified of authorisations as soon as they are made (s 96), but this does not prevent the police acting on the authorisation. There is no administrative check under the 1997 Act, as there is under the 1985 one: no Minister is involved in the bugging authorisations. Apart from authorisations falling within s 97 (below), no other independent prior check is available, although special Information Commissioners (who became Surveillance Commissioners under the RIPA, Part II) have an oversight role. As has been pointed out in relation to the checking procedure under the 1985 Act, subsequent independent checks are clearly not as effective as prior ones. Again, these arrangements may be compared with those in Denmark, where authorisation of the use of listening devices, wherever placed, and including 'participant monitoring', must be by an investigating magistrate.[291]

As initially drafted, the Bill made no provision for any prior independent scrutiny of the bugging warrants at all, thereby adopting the model used for the 1985 Act, but without even the intervention of Home Office officials. The warrants were to be issued by the Chief Constable of the force in question, continuing the old practice. Michael Howard, the then Home Secretary, considered that exclusion of an independent authorising body was necessary since the police must be able to react instantly to prevent crime. This proposal was severely criticised from various quarters[292] and amendments requiring prior independent approval were put forward by Labour and the Liberal Democrats.[293] The Labour amendment is reflected in s 97; however, prior approval of authorisation is not required in all instances. Under s 97(2), such approval by a Commissioner is required where the specified property is believed to be a dwelling, hotel bedroom or office premises. It is also needed where the authorising officer believes that information of a more sensitive nature may be acquired – matters subject to legal privilege; confidential personal information; confidential journalistic material.

290 See Chapter 9, pp 738–41.

291 Art 126 1 and Code of Criminal Procedure.

292 The criticism came from the pressure group, Liberty, and from some sections of the press, including sections of the tabloid press. It was argued that other countries accept prior judicial authorisation for bugging warrants and the UK accepts judicial involvement in other aspects of the policing process such as the authorisation of search warrants.

293 Labour proposed that an information commissioner appointed from the judiciary should be involved in checking the warrants, while the Liberal Democrats proposed that a judge acting in his or her capacity as a judge should undertake this role. See Standing Committee F Fifth Sitting Cols 131 et seq., 11 March 1997. The House of Lords accepted both amendments and Michael Howard then reached an agreement with Jack Straw, then the Shadow Home Secretary, that an information commissioner appointed from the judiciary should be involved in checking warrants if certain authorisations were in question.

The special Commissioners are appointed by the Prime Minister from among the senior judiciary (s 91(1)). The involvement of special Commissioners, even such a limited involvement, provides a degree of independent oversight and scrutiny, although the Commissioners tend to accept and agree with police representations. Nevertheless, apart from other considerations, the involvement of Commissioners may mean that internal procedures are tightened up before representations are made. No provision is made under the Act for independent review of the authorisations in the ordinary courts. Nevertheless, under the Labour amendment, scrutiny of police practices is, arguably, somewhat more effective than scrutiny of those of the Security Service, not weaker, as Michael Howard originally proposed. Clearly, this is a more satisfactory situation, since the arguments for excluding the judiciary from the process are weaker when matters pertaining to national security are not in question. This is quite a thin veneer of judicial supervision, but at present the Court of Appeal takes the view that the Police Act arrangements satisfy Article 8 under the HRA.[294]

Various groups and bodies had put forward pleas for exemption from the provisions of the Bill. These included Catholic priests – who were afraid that the confessional would be bugged – doctors and solicitors. Section 97(2)(b) and the Code of Practice, Intrusive Surveillance, adopted under s 101 of the Act[295] reflected the concerns of these groups to an extent. Where the action authorised is likely to result in ‘any person acquiring knowledge of matters subject to legal privilege, confidential personal information or confidential journalistic material’, prior authorisation is required. Under s 98, ‘matters subject to legal privilege’ include communications between a professional legal advisor and his or her client connected with the giving of legal advice or relating to legal proceedings. Once approval for an authorisation has been given, allowing, for example, for a solicitor’s office to be bugged, all conversations between solicitors and clients would be recorded. Under s 99, ‘confidential personal information’ includes information relating to a person’s physical or mental health or to spiritual counselling.

A key weakness in the authorisation procedure is that under s 97(3), even where s 97 applies, no approval is needed if the authorising officer ‘believes that the case is one of urgency’. No requirement that the belief should be based on reasonable grounds is included. However, the Code of Practice provided that in all but exceptional cases the police must obtain prior approval of the authorisation where s 97 applies: the ‘urgency’ provision was not to be used routinely. Section 101 was repealed by RIPA and this Code was replaced by a Code issued under s 71 of that Act, Covert Surveillance (2005). Para 5.23 of the current RIPA Code repeats the provision that the urgency provision should not be used routinely and provides that the reason for the urgency must be explained to the Commissioner. The RIPA Code is discussed further below.

The Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act, Part II[296]

Part II of the RIPA 2000 covers surveillance activities of immense potential to infringe privacy that previously had no – or only a narrow – basis in law. For the first time, 294 R v Lawrence [2002] Crim LR 584.

295 It was issued on 27 October 1998.

296 It may be noted that under s 46, there are restrictions on Part II authorisations extending to Scotland.

a comprehensive statutory basis has been created for the expanding use of covert surveillance. The growth in proactive intelligence-led policing (targeting suspects using covert surveillance rather than investigating a crime after it has happened) and the proliferation of various forms of surveillance devices provided part of the impetus for reform.[297] Unlike Part III of the Police Act 1997 or s 5 of the Intelligence Services Act 1994 with which it overlaps,[298] Part II of the RIPA covers a very wide range of public authorities. It also covers a much wider range of circumstances. Prior to the introduction of Part II, invasions of privacy by means of covert surveillance falling outside the narrow scope of the 1997 or 1994 provisions were occurring, not on the basis of a legal power, but on the basis that the state is in the same position as the individual citizen in being free to do that which the law does not forbid. Since there was no legal right to privacy – in a broad, general sense – no legal power to invade it was needed.[299]

The pre-existing statutory provisions were mainly (although not exclusively) aimed at the form of surveillance termed ‘intrusive’ by Part II. Most significantly, a warrant or authorisation was required where there was a physical invasion of property by the police or security and intelligence services. So a wide area of surveillance fell outside those statutes, and the need to cover this particular form of surveillance – in anticipation of the effects of the HRA – provided the immediate impetus for the introduction of Part II. Under the HRA it is clearly necessary for surveillance to be placed on a statutory basis even where previously it would not have attracted any form of liability, if it would amount to an invasion of privacy under Art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights, since para 2 provides that an interference with individual privacy must be ‘in accordance with the law’. The key aim of Part II is therefore to meet a central requirement under the Convention – that of legality. The RIPA Code on Covert surveillance (2005) makes this clear:

> Para 2.2: Part II of the 2000 Act does not impose a requirement on public authorities to seek or obtain an authorisation where, under the 2000 Act, one is available (see s 80 of the 2000 Act). Nevertheless, where there is an interference by a public authority with the right to respect for private and family life guaranteed under Art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights, and where there is no other source of lawful authority, the consequence of not obtaining an authorisation under the 2000 Act may be that the action is unlawful by virtue of section 6 of the Human Rights Act 1998.

297 The use of covert surveillance together with other targeting methods, including the use of informers, has expanded rapidly and is seen as immensely useful by the police: see, e.g., Policing with Intelligence HMIC Thematic Inspection Report, 1997/99; Mckay, S, Covert Policing: Law and Practice, 2007.

298 Under the Police Act 1997, Part III, s 92: ‘No entry on or interference with property or with wireless telegraphy shall be unlawful if it is authorised by an authorisation having effect under this Part’. Thus, forms of directed surveillance involving an actual interference with property (see below) – on non-residential premises – were covered by the Police Act 1997, Part III. Under the 1994 Act, s 5, the Home Secretary, on an application from a member of the Intelligence Service, can issue a warrant authorising the ‘taking of any such action as is specified in the warrant in respect of any property so specified or in respect of wireless telegraphy so specified’.

299 See above, pp 807, 873–75; clearly, certain aspects of privacy received protection in the pre-HRA era, especially under the doctrine of trespass.

> 2.3 Public authorities are therefore strongly recommended to seek an authorisation where the surveillance is likely to interfere with a person's Art 8 rights to privacy by obtaining private information about that person, whether or not that person is the subject of the investigation or operation.

It is clear that Part II has gone some way towards achieving this aim in the sense that it has provided a much more comprehensive statutory underpinning for covert surveillance than the pre-existing one. A basis in national law has been created which purports to meet the requirements of legality under the Convention. Below, it will be considered whether it has succeeded in meeting those requirements and whether the further Convention requirements of necessity and proportionality have also been met. In order to do so, the provisions governing so called 'intrusive' and 'directed' surveillance will be examined with a view to contending that when the two regimes are contrasted, the inadequacies of the latter, in Convention terms, are starkly revealed. The Code provides:

> 2.5 . . . if the activities are necessary, the person granting the authorisation must believe that they are proportionate to what is sought to be achieved by carrying them out. This involves balancing the intrusiveness of the activity on the target and others who might be affected by it against the need for the activity in operational terms. The activity will not be proportionate if it is excessive in the circumstances of the case or if the information which is sought could reasonably be obtained by other less intrusive means. All such activity should be carefully managed to meet the objective in question and must not be arbitrary or unfair.

Intrusive surveillance

Under s 26(3) of the RIPA, 'intrusive' surveillance occurs when a surveillance device is used or an individual undertaking surveillance is actually present on residential premises, or in a private vehicle, or it is carried out by such a device in relation to such premises or vehicle without being present on the premises or vehicle. 'Residential' is defined in s 48(1) of the RIPA as premises used as living accommodation, while 'premises' includes movable structures and land. The definition expressly excludes common areas of residential premises and clearly does not cover office premises (s 48(7)(b)). Thus, covert surveillance of office premises falls within the term 'directed', rather than intrusive, surveillance. Section 26(3), read with s 48(7), creates confusion, since it covers all forms of covert surveillance taking place in relation to residential premises. Some forms of such surveillance can be treated as directed surveillance, as indicated below, and it is in relation to residential premises that an area of uncertainty is created as to the category into which surveillance falls.

Under s 32(3) of the RIPA authorisation of intrusive surveillance is on the grounds of 'the interests of national security, for the purpose of preventing or detecting serious crime or of preventing disorder, in the interests of the economic well-being of the UK'. 'Serious crime' is defined in s 81(3)[300] in substantially the same terms as in s 93(4)

300 Section 81(2) provides that such crime satisfies the tests of sub-section 3(a) or (b). Under s 81(3), those tests are (a) that the offence is one for which a person of 21 with no previous convictions could of the Police Act 1997. Proportionality requirements are introduced under s 32(2): the authorising person must be satisfied that the action to be taken is proportionate to what is hoped to be achieved by carrying it out. Authorisations for such surveillance are granted by the Home Secretary under s 41 or, for police or customs officers, by senior authorising officers, who are the highest-ranking police officers in Britain (see s 32(6)). There is also provision for the grant of authorisations in a case of urgency by persons of almost equally high rank, other than the senior authorising officer.[301]

The provisions for urgent and non-urgent authorisations under ss 33, 34, 35 and 36 mirror those under the Police Act, Part III in that, under s 35, notice must be given to a 'Surveillance Commissioner' and, under s 36, the authorisation will not take effect until it has been approved, except where it is urgent and the grounds for urgency are set out in the notice, in which case the authorisation will take effect from the time of its grant. Under s 38, senior authorising officers can appeal to the Chief Surveillance Commissioner against decisions of ordinary Surveillance Commissioners. The Commissioners have responsibility for the destruction of material obtained by surveillance, under s 37, but there is no requirement that material no longer needed for proceedings and no longer subject to an authorisation must be destroyed.

Under s 43, authorisations can be granted or renewed urgently orally by senior authorising officers or in writing by persons authorised to act on their behalf in urgent cases. If, under s 43(3)(a), an authorisation is granted or renewed by a person entitled to act only in urgent cases, or was renewed by such a person or orally, it ceases to take effect after 72 hours. Section 42 provides special rules for the intelligence services which overlap with those of s 5 of the Intelligence Services Act 1994. Under s 42, the security and intelligence services can undertake intrusive surveillance on grant of a warrant. The grounds are those under s 32(3). As far as intrusive surveillance is concerned, the function of the services in support of the prevention or detection of serious crime is excluded where the application is by a member of GCHQ or the SIS (under s 42(3)). Under s 44(3), a warrant authorising intrusive surveillance issued by a senior official, and not renewed under the hand of the Secretary of State, 'shall cease to have effect at the end of the second working day' after its issue. In the case of other such warrants, that point will be at the end of the period of six months from the day of issue or renewal.

This authorisation regime follows the model adopted for telephone tapping under the Interception of Communications Act 1985 and continued with minor modifications under Part I of the RIPA. That regime has been subjected to criticism on the basis that the mechanisms for creating executive accountability are so weak,[302] but it may meet Strasbourg requirements.[303] The regime for intrusive surveillance provides for independent checks and for the possibility that an authorisation will not be able to take reasonably expect a sentence of three years' imprisonment or more, or (b) that the conduct involves the use of violence, results in substantial financial gain, or is conduct by a large number of persons in pursuit of a common purpose.

301 Under s 34(4), such persons are of a rank almost as high as such officers. In the case of police forces, this means a person holding the rank of Assistant Chief Constable or, in the case of the Metropolitan or City of London forces, of Commander.

302 See: Lloyd (1986) 49 MLR 86; Leigh [1986] PL 8.

303 As discussed above, pp 1027–28, the regime created under the 1985 Act was considered in Christie v UK 78-A DR E Com HR 119; on the facts of the case no breach of Art 8 was found.

effect if it does not satisfy the requirements, including those of proportionality. Clearly, the standard of scrutiny may be variable, but the very fact that an authorisation will be checked independently may tend to foster rigour in preparing the papers.

Directed surveillance

Under s 26(2) of the RIPA, all covert surveillance is directed surveillance if it is not intrusive and it is undertaken 'otherwise than by way of an immediate response to events or circumstances, the nature of which is such that it would not be practicable for an authorisation to be sought', and for the purposes of 'a specific investigation or . . . operation', and 'in such a manner as is likely to result in the obtaining of private information about a person', even if he is not identified in relation to the investigation. If the device or person is not on the premises or in the vehicle, the surveillance is 'directed', not 'intrusive' unless 'the device is such that it consistently provides information of the same quality and detail as might be expected to be obtained from a device actually present on the premises or in the vehicle' (s 26(5)). The Code of Practice on Covert Surveillance made under s 71(3)(a) of the RIPA seeks to draw a distinction between general law enforcement functions carried out covertly as an immediate response, and the systematic targeting of an individual (para 4); only the latter may amount to directed surveillance. Anomalously enough, the term 'directed surveillance' also covers an interception of communications in the course of its transmission that is consented to by the sender or recipient and in respect of which there is no interception warrant (s 26(4)(b) and s 48(4)).

From the above, it appears that directed surveillance would occur where a 'bugging' device is placed in the hallway of a block of flats that provides information of a lesser quality than would be obtained if the device was inside one of the flats. Intrusive surveillance would occur, for example, when a 'bugging' device is placed in a car parked near a private house that normally provides information of the same quality as would be obtained if the device was inside the house. These examples make it clear that very fine lines may be drawn between the two forms of surveillance, although, as indicated below, the two regimes differ so sharply. Moreover, the distinction between directed surveillance and 'general law enforcement' functions, such as observing persons entering or leaving a house, turns on the question whether or not the observation can be viewed as an immediate response – another instance in which fine lines may be drawn. If observation of a house occurs over a period of time, it can be argued that an invasion of privacy is occurring that can no longer be viewed as an immediate response. In such an instance an authorization should be sought. It could also be argued that such surveillance requires a more specific statutory underpinning.[304]

Section 47(1) provides powers for the Secretary of state to extend or modify the authorisation provisions. He can provide for any directed surveillance 'to be treated for the purposes of this Part as intrusive surveillance'. Under s 47(2), this power is subject to the negative resolution procedure, but clearly that does not provide the same safeguards as the full Parliamentary process.

304 Such an underpinning can be created, by order of the Secretary of State, under s 47.

'Directed' surveillance may be authorised on the grounds under s 28. The grounds include 'the interests of national security, for the purpose of preventing or detecting crime or of preventing disorder, in the interests of the economic well-being of the UK, in the interests of public safety; for the purpose of protecting public health; for the purpose of assessing or collecting any tax, duty . . . or other . . . charge payable to a government department'; or for any other 'purpose specified for the purposes of this sub-section by an order made by the Secretary of State'. This order must be approved by Parliament. Proportionality requirements are introduced under s 28(2) to the effect that the authorising person must believe that the authorisation or authorised conduct is 'proportionate to what is sought to be achieved by carrying it out'.

The authorisation for directed surveillance is granted by a 'designated person' under s 28. Under s 30, such persons are 'the individuals holding such offices, ranks or positions with relevant public authorities as are prescribed for the purposes of this sub-section by an order' made by the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State can himself be a designated person under s 30(2). The 'relevant public authorities' (set out in Sched 1) include the police, the security and intelligence services, Customs and Excise, Inland Revenue, the armed forces, the Departments of Health; Social Security; Trade and Industry; Environment, Transport and the Regions. Further authorities can be designated by order of the Secretary of State. The prescribed persons in the relevant public authorities are now set out in the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (Prescription of Offices, Ranks and Positions) Order 2000.[305] In police forces, the prescribed office is that of Superintendent; in urgent cases, that of Inspector. The Code of Practice, para 4.14 recommends that authorising officers should not 'be responsible for authorising their own activities . . . however, it is recognised that this may sometimes be unavoidable . . .'

Under s 43, written authorisations cease to have effect after three months, although they may be renewed for additional three month periods (security or intelligence service authorisations may be renewed for six months). Urgent authorisations cease to have effect after 72 hours unless they are renewed either orally (if the urgency subsists) by a person whose entitlement to act is not confined to urgent cases, or in writing. Authorisations cannot be granted orally except in urgent cases and by a person whose entitlement to act is not confined to such cases. Under s 43(3)(b) 'in a case not falling within paragraph (a) in which the authorisation is for the conduct or the use of a covert human intelligence source', the period is 12 months from its grant or last renewal. In a case falling outside s 43(3)(a) or (b), it is three months under s 43(3)(c). Under s 44(5)(a), when an authorisation for the carrying out of directed surveillance is granted by a member of any of the intelligence services and renewed by an instrument 'endorsed under the hand of the person renewing [it] with a statement that the renewal is believed to be necessary on grounds falling within section 32(3)(a) or (c), the authorisation (unless renewed again) shall cease to have effect at the end of the period of six months'.

A Chief Surveillance Commissioner, who may be assisted by Assistant Commissioners, has a general oversight role in relation to this regime, under s 62. But, this independent check occurs only after the event. Therefore, its impact on accountability may be minimal.

305 SI 2000/2417.

Other surveillance

Under s 47, the Secretary of State may also by order 'apply this Part, with such modifications as he thinks fit, to any . . . surveillance that is neither directed nor intrusive'. The power is intended to afford, if necessary, a statutory basis for the use of other powers which may be found to have fallen outside this Act. The compatibility of this the legal basis for the powers with the Convention is questionable, partly because, it is suggested, it is so uncertain and so dependent on the exercise of executive power. The term 'such modifications' implies that lesser safeguards than those available for directed surveillance might be adopted, a possibility which would be likely to have Art 8 implications. These matters are considered below.

Confidential information

Certain safeguards relating to the type of information that can be gathered using directed or intrusive surveillance are created, but the relevant rules appear only in the draft Code of Practice, not in the Act itself. Paragraph 2.3 relates to certain types of confidential information: confidential personal information (relating to physical or mental health or to spiritual counselling), matters subject to legal privilege and confidential journalistic material. Under para 2.10, if it is 'possible that a substantial proportion of the material acquired could be confidential material' (emphasis added), applications should be granted 'only in exceptional and compelling circumstances, with full regard to the proportionality issues'. Paragraph 2.8 reminds those granting the authorisation that an undertaking has been given that material subject to the seal of the confessional will not be the subject of operations. General principles apply to confidential material, under para 2.11; they include the requirement to destroy the material 'as soon as it is no longer necessary to retain it for a specified purpose' and to refrain from dissemination of it unless 'an appropriate officer [having sought legal advice] is satisfied that is necessary for a specific purpose'. These rules fail to introduce any independent check into the process even where material is most clearly of a private nature. As far as directed surveillance is concerned, the question of acquiring and using confidential material is subject, in essentials, to the same regime as is available for non-confidential material.

The use and storage of information obtained by surveillance techniques is governed as far as the police are concerned by the Data Protection Act. The Surveillance Commissioners also have power, when quashing authorisations of intrusive surveillance under s 37, to order the destruction of records. Storage and retention of police information are also governed by a detailed ACPO Code[306] which instructs on the applicability of data protection principles to such information. As indicated above, concerns have been raised regarding record keeping by the Security Service, bearing in mind the fact that it does not have to comply with the Data Protection Act 1998, even in its criminal function.[307] Under the 1998 Act, in relation to personal information, the police do not have to comply with the fair and lawful processing provisions of the first data protection principle,[308] subject access requests, or restrictions on disclosure of personal information, if to do so would be likely to prejudice the prevention and detection of crime or the apprehension and prosecution of offenders. These are not blanket exemptions; they should be considered in their application to individual cases. But it is unclear that careful scrutiny on this basis occurs.[309] The ACPO Code of Practice is therefore of significance since it provides greater clarity and safeguards a significant aspect of privacy. But it is argued that such a significant task should not be undertaken by quasi-legislation.[310]

306 Code of Practice for Data Protection, 2002.
307 See pp 928–29.

The oversight role of the Commissioners

The Police Act 1997 set up a complaints system which, apart from the lack of a special tribunal, strongly resembled that under the 1985 Act, considered above. The similarity was the more striking since the system related to ordinary crime, not necessarily to terrorism or other activities, having a potential impact on national security. This model was continued under s 62 of the RIPA which added additional functions to those of the 'Chief Surveillance Commissioner', so that his role mirrors that of the Interceptions of Communications Commissioner. The office of Commissioner under s 91 of the 1997 Act is continued, but the Commissioners are re-designated 'Surveillance Commissioners' and their complaints role was removed. Assistant Surveillance Commissioners can be appointed under s 63 of the RIPA to aid the Chief Surveillance Commissioner. Such aid is clearly needed since the Commissioner provides oversight, not only of police surveillance, but also of surveillance carried out by all the persons covered by Part II of the RIPA. Thus, the oversight role of the Surveillance Commissioners is broader than their role in relation to authorisations, since the latter relates only to the police and customs, while the former covers other public authorities and the Home Secretary's authorising role under s 41. Thus, the role of the Surveillance Commissioners overlaps with that of the Intelligence Services Commissioner who has an oversight role which, as indicated above, covers, inter alia, surveillance carried out by those services.

Under s 107 of the Police Act 1997, the Chief Commissioner has reporting duties similar to those of the Intelligence Services Commissioner. (His duty under s 106, to report to the Prime Minister if an appeal is allowed and where a finding in favour of a complainant is made by a Commissioner, was repealed under Sched 4 to the 2000 Act.) He must make an annual report on the discharge of his functions. The report must be presented to Parliament and published as a Command Paper. The Prime Minister may exclude matters from the report under s 107(4) of the Act if it appears to him that it contains matter 'prejudicial to the prevention and detection of serious crime' or to the discharge of the functions of a police authority, the service authorities for the National Criminal Intelligence Service or the duties of the Commissioner for Customs and Excise.

308 Except in relation to 'sensitive' data.

309 See the 1998 Justice report (Under Surveillance) Chapter 4, esp pp 92–95.

310 See Chapter 11, pp 1105–8 for analogous discussion in relation to the PACE Codes.

The RIPA Code of Practice on Covert Surveillance

The current Code of Practice on Covert Surveillance (2005), made under s 71 RIPA and one of four RIPA Codes,[311] applies to every authorisation of covert surveillance or of entry on or interference with property or with wireless telegraphy carried out under s 5 of the Intelligence Services Act 1994, Part III of the Police Act 1997 or Part II of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 by public authorities.

The previous Code of Practice Intrusive Surveillance was revised in November 1999.[312] The revision appeared to be intended to limit further the power of intrusive surveillance in relation to the especially sensitive categories of information. Surveillance operations were banned in churches or temples where a minister of religion is giving spiritual counselling such as absolution. In order to use bugging equipment in such circumstances, it was not only necessary for the provisions of the Act have to be complied with, but the police also had to seek permission from the head of the appropriate church or faith. This provision brought the Church of England and other churches and faiths into line with the Roman Catholic Church: the sacramental confessional was given added protection under the original Code. The position differs under the current RIPA Code, Covert Surveillance.

> Under para 3.1: The 2000 Act does not provide any special protection for 'confidential information'. Nevertheless, particular care should be taken in cases where the subject of the investigation or operation might reasonably expect a high degree of privacy, or where confidential information is involved. Confidential information consists of matters subject to legal privilege, confidential personal information or confidential journalistic material. So, for example, extra care should be given where, through the use of surveillance, it would be possible to acquire knowledge of discussions between a minister of religion and an individual relating to the latter's spiritual welfare, or where matters of medical or journalistic confidentiality or legal privilege may be involved.
>
> 3.2: In cases where through the use of surveillance it is likely that knowledge of confidential information will be acquired, the use of surveillance is subject to a higher level of authorisation. Annex A lists the authorising officer for each public authority permitted to authorise such surveillance.

The relationship between the current Code of Practice and the statutes is significant. The statutes grants broad discretionary powers to conduct intrusive surveillance and interfere with property to senior law enforcement officials, but seeks to constrain and structure these powers in two main ways. First, there are general precedent conditions for the exercise of such powers, the most significant being the requirement that the action is likely to be of substantial value in preventing or detecting serious crime. Secondly, there are specific countervailing provisions intended to protect privacy and 311 The others are: the Covert Human Intelligence Sources (CHIS) Code of Practice (2005); Interception of Communications Code of Practice (2005); The Acquisition and Disclosure of Communications data draft Code (2005).

312 The revised Code was published by the Home Office on 18 November 1999. As noted, it was replaced under s 71 RIPA.

confidentiality. Part II RIPA and the other provisions mentioned above provide the key powers, but the Code of Practice, a set of quasi-legal rules, provides a due process underpinning. The statutory provisions, together with the Code provisions, could be viewed as providing a detailed domestic scheme satisfying the demands of Art 8. But this view fails to take account of the rule of law implications of placing a number of key protective provisions on a quasi-legislative basis within what Baldwin has termed 'tertiary rules', or government by circular.[313]

In common with many of the Codes accompanying 'state power' legislation discussed in this book,[314] the Code provisions are not on their face discretionary; they are in general phrased in the precise terms of mandatory instructions. Nevertheless, no formal sanction, apart from an internal disciplinary one, is provided for their breach (s 72(2) RIPA).[315] This is also true of the statutory provisions. However, they cloak otherwise tortious actions with authority, while the mere fact that they are statutory may appear to give them greater weight than the Code provisions in the eyes of those to whom they are directed, and of the judiciary. If the provisions were not followed, it would be, theoretically, an internal disciplinary matter and in practice, police officers might pay more attention to this than to the theoretical possibility of being sued. But, as Chapter 13 points out, the same sanction is used for breach of the PACE Codes and does not appear to be effective, taking into account the very few disciplinary charges laid for their breach.[316] Thus, senior law enforcement officials are in effect given at least a partial discretion as to whether to follow the Code rules and thus whether to respect the Art 8 rights which they reflect.[317] As pointed out in Chapter 1, the concept of a right precludes the idea of an open-ended discretion to infringe it in the pursuit of competing interests.[318] It is however possible that the principle from Wainwright v UK,[319] discussed in Chapter 11, might come to influence this position, under the HRA.

Unless rigorous, independent review of rule-compliance and a clear remedy for breach are available, the Code rules will remain, in effect, largely discretionary, and the rights protected by them illusory. This is a concern in respect of the statutory 313 See Baldwin, R, Rules and Government, 1995, Clarendon.

314 The Codes of Practice made under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 considered in Chapters 11, 12 and 13 were the forerunners of the similar Codes considered in this book – the Codes adopted under the Terrorism Act 2000 and the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000.

315 On the model provided by the PACE Codes (adopted for all the Codes mentioned in this book) it is admissible in evidence under s 72(3). It should be taken into account by courts, the single tribunal and relevant Commissioners under s 72(4).

316 See pp 1310–18.

317 Ronald Dworkin has argued that if an official's decision whether to comply with a given rule is final and unreviewable, he is endowed with a form of discretion (Taking Rights Seriously, 1977, p 69). In practice, decisions taken by police officers in relation to the provisions of the Codes of Practice discussed in this book (see, in particular, Chapter 11, pp 1116–17 and Chapter 13, pp 1311, 1317) are in general unlikely to be considered in courts or in police disciplinary proceedings. In a minority of instances, however, such provisions may be considered in relation to exclusion of evidence. Even then, the 'sanction' of such exclusion is unlikely to be used in respect of most forms of non-confession evidence, the form of evidence to which the provisions of the RIPA Code are most likely to relate. See, generally, Davis, KC, Discretionary Justice, 1980, Greenwood, pp 84–88.

318 See pp 12–14. Dworkin argues that it only makes sense to denote an interest as a right if it will generally win any battle with competing societal considerations: see ibid, p 191.

319 See pp 1179–81.

provisions, but it arises a fortiori in respect of the Code made under s 71 RIPA. It is suggested below that the single tribunal system is not proving ineffective, and that since no clear Parliamentary or administrative means of seeking to enhance rule compliance is available, recourse to court-based remedies under the influence of the HRA would be of especial significance in this context if, which is very doubtful, they could find expression.

Closed circuit television

The increasing use by local authorities of closed circuit television as a form of visual surveillance is not regulated by RIPA 2000, Part II. It is not either directed or intrusive surveillance since it is not undertaken for a specific purpose. Section 163 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 clarifies the power of local authorities to install closed circuit cameras for surveillance purposes.[320] The fact of capturing the image of a person on CCTV may not, in all circumstances, in itself constitute an invasion of privacy, although the mere fact that a person is in a public place should not preclude that possibility.[321] Even where it is arguable that an invasion of privacy has not occurred, the use of the information later on may create one.[322]

The HRA and state surveillance

Interference with the guarantees of Art 8

A preliminary question in terms of the Convention requirements might, in this context, concern the status of the individual in question as a victim, where he or she was uncertain whether surveillance had occurred. The Court put forward the following reason in Klass v Federal Republic of Germany[323] for regarding the applicants as 'victims' under Art 25 despite the fact that they were uncertain whether or not their phones had been tapped: '[normally an applicant cannot challenge a law in abstracto . . . the position is different [when] owing to the secrecy of the measures objected to, he cannot point to any concrete measure specifically affecting him'. Thus the existence of legislation permitting secret measures, including the RIPA and the Police Act 1997, may allow a person to claim to be the victim of a breach of Art 8 although she would also have to show a 'reasonable likelihood that surveillance had occurred'.[324] Given that the provisions in the HRA regarding the status of 'victims' rely on the Convention jurisprudence,[325] this finding would aid the claim of such a person in the ordinary courts. The remit of the single tribunal under s 65 RIPA, discussed below, might not allow it to consider such a claim, unless it interprets its jurisdiction more widely.

320 See Brentwood Council ex p Peck [1998] CMLR 697, now in the Strasbourg system. For further discussion see Norris, Moran and Armstrong (eds), Surveillance, CCTV and Social Control, 1999. See also Data Protection Commissioner (2000) CCTV Code of Practice. Available at: http://www.dataprotection.gov.uk/dpr/dpdoc.nsf.

321 See above, pp 819–20, and below, pp 1069–70.

322 See further the Justice report, Under Surveillance 1998, p 31.

323 (1978) 2 EHRR 214.

324 G, H and I v UK 15 EHRR CD 41.

325 See Chapter 4, pp 235–37.

Assuming that there is a reasonable likelihood that surveillance had occurred, a key question for the tribunal or a court is whether in the particular circumstances it fell within Art 8(1). The extent to which Art 8 provides protection from surveillance outside the home or other living accommodation such as hotel rooms might be considered. The principles at stake are similar to those discussed above in relation to interception: all these forms of surveillance interfere with informational autonomy. But while it is now clearly settled in the Strasbourg jurisprudence that in most circumstances interception (at least in the form of telephone tapping) creates an interference with Art 8 guarantees, this cannot be said with equal certainty of all the diverse forms of surveillance covered by Part II of the RIPA or Part III of the 1997 Act.

However, 'the state [has an obligation] to respect private life by controlling the activities of its agents [in collecting personal information]'.[326] It has been indicated that interference with property for surveillance purposes by the security and intelligence services has been found to fall within Art 8.[327] Collection and use of information derived from covert investigative techniques may do so unless the applicant is already involved in criminal activity.[328] The acquiring of information represents one form of invasion of informational autonomy; further invasions may occur due to the storage and dissemination of the information. In a number of cases, Strasbourg has found that the collection of information about an individual by the state without his or her consent will, in principle, interfere with the right to respect for private life[329] and it has contemplated the possibility that compiling and retaining the information will also do so.[330] The use of listening devices has been found to create an interference with the Art 8(1) guarantee.[331] Systematic or even indirect targeting of an individual is also very likely to involve such an interference.[332]

The Strasbourg case law suggests that where an interference occurs in an obviously 'private' place, an infringement of the primary right will be found. The extent to which, outside such places, an invasion of privacy might be found in respect of surveillance is a matter which is subject to a developing jurisprudence at Strasbourg and nationally. An individual may expect to retain a degree of privacy in a semi-public environment, such as a restaurant,[333] gymnasium,[334] solicitor's office,[335] pub or shop.[336] Strasbourg has been prepared to extend the notion of private space beyond obvious places such 326 Harris, D, O'Boyle, K and Warbrick, C, Law of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, p 310.

327 See pp 1025–28.

328 Ludi v Switzerland A 238 (1992).

329 See: Murray v UK A 300 (1994), paras 84, 85; McVeigh v UK (1981) 25 DR 15, p 49.

330 See G, H and I v UK 15 EHRR CD 41 (application of first and third applicants failed on the basis that they had not shown sufficient likelihood that such compiling or retention had occurred).

331 See Govell v UK (1997) 4 EHRLR 438; Khan v UK Appl No 35394/97 (declared admissible on 20 April 1999) (1999) 27 EHRR CD 58; judgment of the Court: 8 BHRC 310.

332 Harman and Hewitt v UK (1992) 14 EHRR 657.

333 A situation considered in a decision of the German Supreme Court: BGH 19 December 1995 BGHZ 131, pp 322–46.

334 The location where surreptitious photographs were taken of the former Princess of Wales, in HRH Princess of Wales v MGN Newspapers Ltd and Others (1993) Transcript, Association of Official Shorthand Writers, 8 November 1993.

335 See Niemetz v FRG A 251-B (1992).

336 See R v Broadcasting Standards Council ex p BBC [2000] 3 WLR 1327.

as the home; as Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick put it: 'it is not enough just for the individual to be himself: he must be able to a substantial degree to keep to himself what he is and what he does . . . the idea of private space need not be confined to those areas where the person has some exclusive rights of occupancy'.[337] In this respect, the Strasbourg approach may be developing in a direction which will take it away from the current UK statutory approach: 'the expanding understanding of private life set out in the Niemetz case[338] indicates that a formal public/private distinction about the nature of the location will not always be decisive.'[339]

This identifiable general trend suggests that this is another instance in which the emphasis should be on the evolutive nature of the Convention[340] rather than on the outcome of particular applications to the Commission, such as that in X v United Kingdom.[341] The Commission found that the actions of the police in taking and filing photographs without consent of a woman arrested for taking part in a political demonstration disclosed no prima facie breach of Art 8. The reasoning was unclear, but a central factor appeared to be the public and voluntary nature of her activities. The decision has been viewed as out of line with the trend of Art 8 jurisprudence: 'In the opinion of some scholars, the . . . decision may well be an outdated aberration in the case law of the Strasbourg organs.'[342] The decision in Von Hannover,[343] although taken in a different context, suggests that the 'public' nature of activities will not necessarily take them outside the ambit of Art 8. This issue is discussed in Chapter 9.[344]

The approach in other jurisdictions may also indicate the direction in which the Strasbourg jurisprudence is likely to develop. The German Supreme Court[345] has refused to follow the approach of the Appeal Court that privacy 'stopped at the doorstep' and that therefore, no action lay for invasion of privacy in respect of events which had taken place outside the home or other clearly private spaces. The approach indicated was that one may still be entitled to respect for privacy in semi-public places if, as the Court put it, it is clear by reference to 'objective criteria' that one wishes to be

337 Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op. cit., fn 326, p 309.

338 Niemetz v FRG A 251-B (1992).

339 Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, op. cit., fn 326, p 309. Niemetz v FRG A 251-B (1992) concerned office premises, making it clear that rights to respect for privacy are not dependent on an interest in property.

340 The Convention must be given an 'evolutive' interpretation (Johnstone v Ireland A 112 (1986), para 53), which takes account of current standards in European society (Tyrer v UK A 26 (1978), para 31). These would be expected to include the presence of privacy laws across Europe.

341 (1973) Appl No 5877/72 16 YBCHE, 328.

342 Bygrave, LA, 'Data protection pursuant to the right to privacy in human rights treaties' (1999) 6(3) IJLIT 247, p 265. Bygrave notes: '. . . there are good grounds for holding that it ought to be accorded little weight in present and future interpretation of Article 8'. In spite of these comments, however, Bygrave concedes that in the later decision of Friedl v Austria (1995) A 305B (not treated by the Court on the merits due to friendly settlement) 'the Commission laid weight upon the same . . . kind of factors as those mentioned in X v United Kingdom' (ibid, p 266). See also Stewart-Brady v UK (1999) 27 EHRR 284, in which a claim of an interference with Art 8 rights due to the taking of a photograph was declared inadmissible (although these findings were made in the context of positive state obligations and there was a conflict with Art 10).

343 See p 819.

344 See pp 822–24.

345 BGH 19 December 1995 BGHZ 131, pp 322–46.

'left alone' so that one can, 'relying on the fact of seclusion, act in a way that [one] would not have done . . . in public'. In other words, the interest in privacy was clearly distinguished from property interests. The Canadian Criminal Code also reflects such a stance.[346] Thus, it may be argued that public/private distinctions based on location are too simplistic and that a test of a reasonable expectation of privacy or, more broadly still, of control of private information is more satisfactory.[347] On the basis of such a test, if, for example, one person engages in a whispered exchange with another in an almost empty street, and this exchange is recorded by means of a listening device, it is contended that an invasion of privacy has occurred which may fall within Art 8(1). It may be noted that this test would bring some use of CCTV – where it captures private actions in semi-public or even public places – within Art 8(1).

As Leigh and Lustgarten observe: 'An atmosphere in which people practise self-censorship . . . is stultifying and fearful . . . Citizens should be able to assume that unless there are overwhelming reasons to the contrary, their thoughts and feelings will be communicated only to those to whom they choose to utter them.[348]' These comments clearly apply equally to conversations in the street, in a vehicle, in pubs, in hotel rooms. Obviously, there may be circumstances in which it is impossible to speak without expecting to be overheard, as in a crowded train. But in other circumstances, this expectation would depend entirely on the circumstances. In a reasonably quiet street it would be viewed as socially and probably morally unacceptable to approach two persons speaking quietly together with the obvious intention of eavesdropping on their conversation, since the two would have a reasonable expectation of enjoying a degree of privacy. It follows, therefore, that the issue as to whether the respect for private life has been infringed by the secret recording of a communication should be resolved not by reliance on fine distinctions regarding the degrees of 'privacy' to be associated with different locations, but according to the intentions and reasonable expectations of at least one of the parties to it.[349] In other words, a shift in the meaning of 'privacy' would have to occur, one which appears to be in accordance with the notion of informational autonomy as the core privacy value and with changing perception of privacy at Strasbourg. Therefore, there is a sound argument that the use of surveillance devices or techniques in most circumstances will lead to findings that an interference with the rights to respect for private life and, where appropriate, to the home and correspondence, under Art 8 has occurred.

In accordance with the law

Once it is established that such an interference has occurred, it cannot be justified if it is not in accordance with the law. Until the 1997 Act and then the RIPA 2000, Part II

346 Section 487.01(4).

347 The Press Complaints Commission's Code of Practice defines 'private places [as] public or private property where there is a reasonable expectation of privacy'. Such a test was recommended by the Irish Law Reform Commission Consultation Paper: Privacy, Surveillance and Interception, 1996.

348 In from the Cold 1994, p 40.

349 This proposition finds support from the position in the US. The US Supreme Court has found: 'the Fourth Amendment protects people not places'; the significant issue was not the location of the covert device, but the existence of a reasonable expectation that privacy would be protected (Katz v US (1967) 389 US 347, pp 351–53).

were introduced, the use of various techniques had no sufficient basis in law.[350] Such a basis is now established, but it is questionable whether it is of sufficient quality.[351] The regimes governing the forms of surveillance show dissimilarities, especially between 'intrusive' and 'directed' surveillance. The position regarding the use of intrusive surveillance is broadly the same as that discussed above, in relation to interception, under Part I of the RIPA, since the provisions are equally foreseeable and accessible.[352] The same may be said of the regime under s 97 of the 1997 Act.

Bearing in mind the strictness of these requirements in this context, discussed above,[353] it is not entirely clear that the requirement as to quality would be found to be satisfied in respect of certain of these provisions. This may be said in relation to the use of directed surveillance, and of listening devices within the 1997 Act, but outside s 97. The definition of directed surveillance is confusing and imprecise and creates an uncertain divide between directed and intrusive surveillance. Despite such uncertainty, the regime for intrusive surveillance is much stricter. This uncertainty creates, it is suggested, a fundamental flaw in RIPA 2000, Part II, which may mean that it cannot meet the requirement of quality, in that respect. As indicated above, ss 28, 29 and 30 allow the Secretary of State, by order, to make provision regarding 'designated persons', further grounds, and for allowing further bodies to engage in directed surveillance on the very broad grounds under ss 28 and 29. The extent to which, in all these instances, power is placed in executive hands so that it might be exercised in an unpredictable fashion calls into question the quality of the law, even accepting that in some, but not all, of these instances there is a lesser invasion of privacy, calling for less precision.[354] The accessibility of the law would also be questionable, bearing in mind the opportunities for its extension by executive order, albeit with the approval of Parliament. In respect of all these provisions, the means of keeping a check on their arbitrary use is in doubt due to the failure to include any independent check at all on authorisations of directed surveillance, outside the public authority in question.[355] No judicial or administrative check is necessary, in contrast to the provisions for intrusive surveillance and interception.

The 'in accordance with the law' requirement was considered for example, in Amann v Switzerland.[356] In the early 1980s the applicant, a businessman, imported depilatory appliances into Switzerland which he advertised in magazines. In 1981 a woman telephoned the applicant from the former Soviet embassy in Berne to order a depilatory appliance. That telephone call was intercepted by the Federal Public Prosecutor's Office which then requested the Intelligence Service of the police of the Canton of Zürich to 350 See above, pp 1054–56 and pp 1058–60.

351 As indicated above, it is clear that Art 8 is not necessarily satisfied merely on the ground that interferences with privacy have a basis in primary legislation. See pp 1008–9.

352 See p 1043.

353 See pp 1043–44.

354 This may be argued by analogy with the findings in Malone v UK (1984) 7 EHRR 14 regarding telephone metering as opposed to interception.

355 In Leander v Sweden (1987) 9 EHRR 433, the Court said: 'in view of the risk that a system of secret surveillance poses . . . the court must be satisfied that there exist adequate and effective guarantees against abuse' (para 60).

356 (2000) ECHR 87.

carry out an investigation into the applicant. In December 1981 the Public Prosecutor's Office filled in a card on the applicant for its national security card index on the basis of the report drawn up by the Zürich police. In particular, the card indicated that the applicant had been 'identified as a contact with the Russian embassy' and was a businessman. It was numbered (1153:0) 614, that code meaning 'communist country' (1), 'Soviet Union' (153), 'espionage established' (0) and 'various contacts with the Eastern block (614). He could not obtain an effective remedy domestically and applied to Strasbourg, alleging a breach of Art 8. The Court found that the legal provisions relied on by the government, in particular the Federal Council's Decree of 29 April 1958 on the Police Service of the Federal Public Prosecutor's Office, the Federal Criminal Procedure Act and the Federal Council's Directives of 16 March 1981 applicable to the Processing of Personal Data in the Federal Administration, did not contain specific and detailed provisions on the gathering, recording and storing of information. It also pointed out that domestic law, particularly s 66(1*ter*) FCPA, expressly provided that documents which were no longer 'necessary' or had become 'purposeless' had to be destroyed; the authorities had failed to destroy the data they had gathered on the applicant after it had become apparent, as the Federal Court had pointed out in its judgment in 1994, that no criminal offence was being prepared. The Court concluded that there had been no legal basis for the creation of the card on the applicant and its storage in the Confederation's card index. Therefore it was found that there had been a violation of Art 8 of the Convention. The case concerned interception of telephone communications but the issues of storage and destruction of data apply equally in relation to data acquired by covert surveillance.

Legitimate aims

Assuming that an interference with the Art 8(1) guarantee occurs, which is found, in the particular circumstances which confront a court or the new tribunal, to be in accordance with the law, it must be shown that it had a legitimate aim. The 'legitimate aim' requirement would probably be readily satisfied in respect of intrusive surveillance and the use of surveillance devices under the 1997 Act since the grounds justifying interference under Art 8(2) correspond with the three grounds under s 32(3) of the RIPA and with the 'serious crime' ground under the 1997 Act. This is also probably true of the power to use CCTV under s 163 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994.

There may be room for argument that certain of the grounds for the use of directed surveillance under s 28(3) are less clearly within para 2 since they cover, inter alia, the purpose of collecting any contribution due to a government department. However, they would probably fall within the 'economic well-being' exception.[357] The possibility is left open of including other grounds, by order of the Secretary of State. Any such further grounds would also have to fall within the para 2 aims. So far, under Art 8(2), the state has always satisfied the legitimate aim requirement.

357 MS v Sweden (1999) 28 EHRR 313, para 38.

Necessary in a democratic society

It must further be shown that the interference 'corresponds to a pressing social need and, in particular, that it is proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued'.[358] In assessing proportionality in relation to the aim of national security, the Court has allowed a very wide margin of appreciation to the State,[359] but it is less wide in relation to the prevention of crime and arguably also in respect of the other grounds. In any event, the margin of appreciation doctrine should be irrelevant in domestic decisions. In terms of the outcomes of applications, Strasbourg has not provided clear guidance on the question of when a pressing social need would be discerned in this context. In a number of key cases, including Khan v UK,[360] which concerned the use of a listening device, it was found that the interference had no basis in law.[361] In a further group of cases, it was found that the interference had such a basis and the safeguards available, particularly in the context of national security, were found to be sufficient, taking the margin of appreciation into account.[362] But some analogous jurisprudence is available.

As indicated above, it was found in Klass v FRG[363] that judicial or administrative authority for warrants would provide a degree of independent oversight. While the arrangements for intrusive surveillance under the RIPA 2000, Part II or under s 97 of the 1997 Act may meet this requirement, those under s 93 or for directed surveillance might fail to do so since no independent administrative or judicial check is available before the event. In this respect, the contrast with the arrangements for intrusive surveillance is very clear, bearing in mind the fact that directed surveillance is a means of acquiring large amounts of personal information; the only distinction between it and intrusive surveillance may be the quality of the sound or vision – the content of the information may be almost identical. Therefore, the strong distinction created between the two types of surveillance may be unwarranted. In particular, where a person has authorised himself to conduct surveillance, the requirement of independence could be said to be completely abrogated; it is hard to see that in such an instance, it can be said that a check on the requirements of proportionality is in place.

The key criticism of Part II is that a twin-track scheme is created under it whereby a much more rigorous regime is in place for intrusive as opposed to directed surveillance: intrusive surveillance requires authorisation at a higher level within the public authority and at an external level. Directed surveillance requires lower level internal authorisation and no external authorisation – merely review after the event by the Surveillance Commissioner. This markedly different regime leads to the suggestion that the regime for directed surveillance fails to meet Convention requirements. The general principles espoused at Strasbourg may also be indicative. If it is accepted that informational autonomy lies in the 'core' of Art 8, as a value which a democratic society should respect,[364] interferences with it by a public authority should receive the strictest scrutiny. Such scrutiny would be of the arrangements for authorisation and their application

358 Olsson v Sweden A 130 (1988), para 67.
359 Leander v Sweden (1987) 9 EHRR 433.
360 (2000) 8 BHRC 310.
361 E.g., Malone v UK (1984) 7 EHRR 14, Halford v UK [1997] IRLR 471; (1997) 24 EHRR 523.
362 E.g., Christie v UK 78-A DR E Com HR 119.
363 (1978) 2 EHRR 214.
364 See Kjeldsen v Denmark (1976) 1 EHRR 711, p 731.

in the particular instance. Even where the authorisation process itself was found to satisfy Art 8(2), a particular authorisation might be found to allow an interference disproportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. In particular, issues of proportionality might also arise where a listening device placed outside a house provided information of only a marginally lower quality than would be provided were it on the premises. The use of CCTV may be proportionate to the legitimate aim – of preventing crime – pursued, but the lack of regulation of the use of the information obtained may mean that there are insufficient safeguards available.

Using the HRA

Duties of Commissioners

All the Commissioners should comply with the Convention in relation to their reviewing functions under the 1997 Act and Part II of the RIPA. The position is very similar to that in respect of the Interception of Communications Commissioner, since all the Commissioners are bound by the Convention under s 6 of the HRA and are also providing oversight of bodies which are so bound. The Surveillance Commissioners are providing oversight of police officers and other 'public authorities' using surveillance while the Intelligence Services Commissioner is providing oversight of the Services' activities under the RIPA and the Intelligence Services Act.

Criminal proceedings

Significantly, there is no equivalent in the Police Act or Part II of the RIPA to s 17 in Part I of the RIPA, which, as indicated above, largely disallows reference to interceptions in any court or tribunal proceedings. Clearly, any such provision would be counterproductive in prosecution terms. But this does mean, depending on the extent of disclosure to the defence, that a defendant may become aware at some point during criminal proceedings that a surveillance operation has occurred, and therefore will be able to take any avenues of redress that may be open, including raising Convention arguments in the trial itself.

The issues of exclusion of evidence and of disclosure will be most significant. The duty of disclosure to the defence is restricted under the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996 and the residual common law rules on the public interest.[365] The fact that a particular surveillance technique has been used may not be disclosed on the basis that it is 'sensitive' material. Under that Act, the duty of the CPS is to disclose to the defence all material which it considers might undermine the prosecution case, except sensitive material which should not be disclosed in the public interest. The sensitivity of the material may be based on the need to use the technique in question in a future operation. If the prosecutor considers that the material is sensitive, an application to a court for a ruling to protect it on grounds of public interest immunity must be made.[366] It can be made ex parte with notice to the defence or, in an exceptional case, without notice. In any such application, a judge, bound by s 6 of the HRA, would have to consider Art 6 requirements in respect of such disclosure.[367]

365 The 1996 Act, s 21(2).
366 See ss 3(6) and 7(5).

Where it is clear in criminal proceedings that surveillance has been used in order to obtain evidence against the defendant, the defence could seek to establish in a suitable case that it was unauthorised or improperly authorised or was not covered by Part III of the 1997 Act or Part II of the RIPA. The defence could also raise the argument, under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA, that therefore a breach of Art 8 had arisen or that, although the surveillance was properly authorised, a breach had nevertheless occurred since, for example, the requirements of proportionality under Art 8(2) had not been met. Assuming that the surveillance was not authorised, it would not be unlawful unless existing tortious liability had arisen and/or the public authority in question had incurred liability under s 6 of the HRA for breaching Art 8. In other words, surveillance which incurs no tortious or criminal liability, but only leads to a breach of Art 8, is unlawful only in the sense that the public authority using it (normally, of course, the police) has failed to abide by its duty under s 6 of the HRA. It should be noted that there is no offence of conducting unauthorised surveillance, in contrast to the position as regards unauthorised interception,[368] and, as indicated in the Code on Surveillance and discussed below, surveillance will not be unlawful solely on the ground that authorisation has not been sought. The court, as itself a public authority under s 6 of the HRA, is bound to accept that a remedy must be available for a breach of Art 8. The public authority using it would have to provide such redress, but as explained below, owing to s 65 of the RIPA, this argument would usually be raised in the single tribunal where a complainant is seeking a remedy for breach of Art 8. But, in criminal proceedings, the redress sought could include exclusion of evidence. Thus, the defence could argue either that the evidence had been obtained unlawfully since, for example, the police had committed a trespass in obtaining it and had breached Art 8, or that it had been obtained unlawfully due to such a breach alone. In either instance, there might appear to be an argument, which is considered further in Chapter 13, that the evidence obtained should be excluded under s 78 of PACE. However, the courts are likely to continue to be unreceptive to this argument.

367 These guidelines were provided in Davis, Rowe and Johnson [1993] 1 WLR 613. Now that the use of public interest immunity in that case has been found to breach Art 6 by the Court (Rowe and Davis v UK Appl No 28901/95; [1999] Crim LR 410; judgment of the Court of 16/2/00 (2000) 30 EHRR 1) they will have to be re-examined. The domestic courts will have the opportunity of doing so now that Human Rights Act is fully in force. The findings in the same context in Fitt and Jasper v UK (1999) EHRLR 430 will be relevant. The Court said that in those instances, the judge had been able to consider the sensitive material in question and therefore was able to conduct a balancing act between fairness to the defence and to the prosecution. On that basis, no breach of Art 6 was found. The Davis, Rowe and Johnson guidelines may be compared with those adopted in other countries, particularly those used in Denmark after the Van Traa Inquiry Report (an inquiry which is generally viewed as an especially useful guide to the use of such methods in modern policing) into the use of covert methods, including particularly the use of informers and undercover officers. The Danish law adopted in response sought to ensure that the trial judge or defence would not be subject to complete non-disclosure of evidence and of investigative methods.

368 Under RIPA 2000, s 1, it is an offence to intercept communications intentionally and without lawful authority.

