The leading case of Khan (Sultan)[369] on exclusion of evidence obtained by the unlawful use of a listening device applies, and at present it is clear that the stance taken still prevails in the post-HRA era since it has been re-affirmed by the House of Lords in AG's Reference (No 3 of 1999).[370] In Khan, a listening device had been secretly installed on the outside of a house which Khan was visiting. The case against him rested solely on the tape recording obtained. The defence argued, inter alia, that the recording was inadmissible as evidence because the police had no statutory authority to place listening devices on private property, that therefore such placement was a trespass, and, further, that admission of the recording would breach Art 8. The House of Lords agreed with the Court of Appeal that the evidence was admissible, relying on the decision in Sang[371] to the effect that improperly obtained evidence other than 'involuntary' confessions is admissible in a criminal trial subject to a narrow discretion under s 78 of PACE to exclude it.[372] The decision in Khan not to exclude the evidence was found to accord with Art 6 at Strasbourg.[373] A Chamber of the Court found that, at the time, the interference with the Art 8 guarantees had no basis in law and therefore a breach of Art 8 was found. This breach was not found to necessitate exclusion of the evidence obtained on the basis that the assessment of evidence is a matter for the national courts, and therefore no breach of Art 6 was found. This issue is discussed further in Chapter 13.[374]

Thus, although arguments may be raised in court that Art 8 has been breached in conducting surveillance, it is unlikely that exclusion of any evidence obtained would follow. So use of this avenue as a means of encouraging the police to respect the Art 8 guarantees has been at present almost entirely closed off.

Civil actions

Covert surveillance conducted without an authorisation is not unlawful on that basis alone. As indicated above, the Code of Practice on Covert Surveillance (2005) made under s 71(3)(a) of the RIPA makes the position explicit in para 2.2 in stating that there is no requirement on the part of a public authority to obtain an authorisation for a covert surveillance operation and makes it clear that the decision not to obtain an authorisation would not, of itself, make an action unlawful, but that liability could arise under the HRA. Intrusive surveillance involving an entry onto property and/or damage to it could be challenged in the ordinary courts since, if unauthorised, its use will amount to a crime or tort. Where directed surveillance involves an entry on to non-residential premises or damage to them such actions would also be available.

Other forms of surveillance may breach Art 8, but will not be trespassory or attract any criminal liability. In such circumstance a complainant might, theoretically, have a 369 [1996] 3 All ER 289; (1996) 146 NLJ 1024, HL; [1995] QB 27, CA.

370 [2001] 2 WLR 56.

371 [1980] AC 402; [1979] 2 All ER 1222, HL.

372 See Chapter 13, p 1290.

373 Khan v UK Appl No 35394/97 (1999) 27 EHRR CD 58, judgment of the Court (2000) 8 BHRC 310.

374 Pp 1293–95.

remedy under the doctrine of confidence, assuming that some information was obtained and was used in some manner.[375] But in such cases, the state body in question would normally be able to argue that the public interest defence applied.[376] Any court adjudicating on an action in confidence or trespass in this context would be bound by s 6 of the HRA to ensure that the Convention rights were complied with,[377] but the action would be based on the pre-existing common law, rather than on s 7(1)(a).[378] Where surveillance attracts no existing criminal or civil liability, the position is more complex. The bodies or persons authorising and undertaking covert surveillance are all public authorities under s 6 of the HRA and therefore an action for breach of Art 8 could be brought against them under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA[379] where covert surveillance occurred but was not authorised, or improperly authorised, or properly authorised, but nevertheless in breach of Art 8. A s 7(1)(a) action, however, against the bodies most likely to use surveillance, in particular the police,[380] would have to be brought in the tribunal set up under Part IV of the RIPA due to the provision of s 65(2)(a) of the RIPA, which is discussed below. Thus, in most circumstances a tort action in direct reliance on Art 8 would not be open.

It should be noted that persons engaged in all forms of surveillance under Part II are exempted from civil liability under s 27(2) in respect of conduct 'incidental' to authorised conduct and – in an opaquely worded provision – in relation to conduct to which the warrant or authorisation procedure under a 'relevant' Act[381] is inapplicable (not capable of being granted) and where it would not reasonably be expected to have been sought. This appears to cover forms of surveillance engaged in by public authorities which have no statutory basis and which, but for s 27(2), might attract liability under existing torts or under s 7 of the HRA in respect of a breach of Art 8. Since s 27(2) could, potentially, prevent a court from discharging its duty under s 6 of the HRA there is a case for suggesting that courts should restrict its ambit by using s 3 of the HRA to interpret the term 'reasonably' restrictively.

375 See Chapter 9, pp 876–920.

376 This defence succeeded in Hellewell [1995] 1 WLR 804 in respect of unauthorised police use of a photograph of the defendant, who had been convicted of theft from shops, as part of a shopwatch scheme.

377 See Chapter 4, pp 215–17.

378 The process of infusion of the rights into the common law is leading to the creation of new torts or at least a stretching of the boundaries of the old ones. See the comments of Sedley LJ in Douglas and Others v Hello! [2001] 2 WLR 992, and see generally Chapter 9, pp 902–15.

379 Under s 7(1)(a) 'a person who claims that a public authority has acted (or proposes to act) in a way that is made unlawful under s 6(1) may bring proceedings against the authority in the appropriate tribunal . . .'. Under s 6(1) 'It is unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right [unless the proviso of s 6(2) applies].

380 Section 65(6) provides: 'for the purposes only of subsection (3)', conduct to which Part II applies, an entry on or interference with property or an interference with wireless telegraphy is not conduct falling within sub-section (5) 'unless it is conduct by or on behalf of a person holding any office, rank or position with (a) any of the intelligence services; (b) any of Her Majesty's forces; (c) any police force; (d) the National Criminal Intelligence Service; (e) the National Crime Squad; or (f) the Commissioners of Customs and Excise. . . .'. (The NCIS and NCS were amalgamated into SOCA by the SOCA 2005.)

381 RIPA 2000; Intelligence Services Act 1994, s 5; Police Act 1997, Part III.

Actions under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA

The public authorities using forms of surveillance and authorising officers within the authorities are all, by definition,[382] subject to the Convention under s 6 of the HRA. The possibility of challenging decisions of such public authorities, as opposed to those of Commissioners, under s 7(1)(a), might appear to be available. However, s 65 of the RIPA stands in the way of Convention-based actions in the ordinary courts. Under s 65(2), the tribunal will be the appropriate forum for the purposes of s 7(1)(a) of the HRA in relation to certain proceedings. These proceedings are indicated in ss 65(3) and (5). In essence, these provisions mean that s 65 stands in the way of challenges to actions of the security and intelligence services, or persons acting on their behalf, based on s 6 of the HRA (since s 7(1)(a) of the HRA is intended to provide for the bringing of proceedings where a public authority has acted unlawfully under s 6). Section 65(5) and (6) also bar the way to actions in the ordinary courts under s 7(1)(a) against the police, intelligence services, Customs and Excise, NCIS and the National Crime Squad (now amalgamated in SOCA) in respect of surveillance under Part II of the RIPA or s 93 of the 1997 Act, which raises Convention issues under s 6 of the HRA. These s 7(1)(a) actions must be brought only in the tribunal.

Judicial review

Scrutiny of the Commissioners' oversight function in the ordinary courts also appears to be precluded. The 1997 Act contains an ouster clause in s 91(10) which is very similar to that contained in the Interception of Communications Act 1985. It provides: 'The decisions of the Chief Commissioner or . . . any other Commissioner (including decisions as to his jurisdiction) shall not be subject to appeal or liable to be questioned in any court'. The inclusion of 'decisions as to his jurisdiction' was, of course, intended to make the Commissioners' decisions unreviewable. This ouster clause was not repealed by the RIPA, but it now no longer relates to the Commissioners' complaints' role, which was removed under s 70(2)(c) of that Act.[383]

Section 65 does not prevent challenges by way of judicial review or civil actions against public authorities other than the police or the intelligence and security services or other bodies listed in s 65(6) relating to surveillance.[384] Also, judicial review of decisions of those bodies listed could be sought without relying on s 7(1)(a) of the HRA. Any possibilities of bringing judicial review against the police or intelligence services which existed in the pre-HRA era still exist, due to s 11 of the HRA, so long as such possibilities do not depend on using s 7(1)(a) of the HRA. The ironic possibility arises, in relation to surveillance, that the development of judicial review taking Art 8 into account, as in the pre-HRA era,[385] might be more far-reaching and of greater significance than such development in reliance on s 7(1)(a), despite the fact that the review would be less intensive.[386]

382 Section 81(1) provides that 'public authority' has the meaning given it by the HRA 1998, s 6.

383 Sections 106, 107(6) of Sched 7 to the 1997 Act were repealed under the RIPA 2000.

384 This is of significance where, e.g., a public authority not yet brought within the RIPA 2000, Part II used surveillance without falling within any existing liability, or where this occurred and the public authority, although within the Act, fell outside those listed in s 65(6).

385 See Chapter 3, pp 130–33.

386 See Chapter 4, pp 235–39.

Section 66 leaves open the possibility that the remaining jurisdiction of the ordinary courts in relation to surveillance (and, if necessary, to interception) will be partially ousted, by executive order, in providing: 'An order under section 65(2)(d) allocating proceedings to the Tribunal may (a) provide for the Tribunal to exercise jurisdiction in relation to that matter to the exclusion of the jurisdiction of any court or tribunal; but (b) if it does so provide, must contain provision conferring a power on the Tribunal, in the circumstances provided for in the order, to remit the proceedings to the court or tribunal which would have had jurisdiction apart from the order.' In other words, an avenue to court action would be left open if this course was taken in future.

Conclusions

The upshot, then, is that challenges by way of judicial review or tortious actions remain available against some public authorities, whether or not it is argued that the authority has breached s 6 of the HRA. Actions against the police or intelligence services in relation to surveillance operations, based on ss 6 and 7(1)(a) of the HRA, will have to be brought in the new tribunal only because of s 65 of the RIPA. It is notable that court action was not ruled out expressly under the Security Services Act 1989, the Intelligence Services Act 1994 or the Police Act 1997, although it was – in effect – under s 9 of the 1985 Act. In providing for complaint to be made to the old tribunal, s 5 of the 1989 Act and s 9 of the 1994 Act implied that complaint could not be made to a court. The same could be said of the Commissioner mechanism under the 1997 Act. But the provisions did not expressly exclude the jurisdiction of the courts since otherwise, the agencies would then have been placed, in effect, above the law. Section 65 does not exclude the courts' jurisdiction regarding surveillance by the police and intelligence services except in relation to breach of the Convention rights. Therefore, one purpose of the RIPA is to insulate all surveillance undertaken by the intelligence services, and much of that undertaken by the police, from the effects of the HRA, applied in the ordinary courts, except within prosecutions.

6 The single tribunal

Introduction

This tribunal, set up under s 65 of the RIPA,[387] has taken over from the Interception of Communications Tribunal and the Intelligence and Security Services Tribunals; it has also taken over the complaints role of the Commissioners set up under Part III of the 1997 Act.

387 Schedule 3 governs the membership of the single tribunal. Members, who are appointed for five years by the Lord Chancellor on behalf of the Queen, must have held 'high judicial office' or have a 10-year general qualification within the meaning of s 71 of the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990; in Scotland and Northern Ireland they must be practitioners of at least 10 years' standing. Thus, they need not be judges, although the President must be a judge. Its members are remunerated by the Secretary of State, but can be removed from office only on an address to the Queen by both Houses of Parliament under Sched 3, para 1(5). These arrangements afford the tribunal a measure of independence from the executive.

It may be noted initially that in practice, applications to the tribunal are not be frequent since, as noted above, an individual has normally no means of knowing that an interception or surveillance has occurred; in contrast to the position in Germany[388] or Denmark,[389] the police and the other state agencies have no duty to inform him or her of the interception, after it is over. This position is contrary to the recommendation of the Data Protection Working Party for the European Commission which said in May 1999 that a 'person under surveillance [should] be informed of this as soon as possible'.[390] An individual is therefore normally only able to bring complaints or proceedings to the tribunal only if she has become aware of the surveillance due to criminal proceedings. Section 17 of the RIPA will normally prevent this occurring in respect of interception and therefore complaints regarding interception are likely to be very rare. Police officers or other state agents who are aware that improperly authorised or unauthorised interception is occurring have no means of complaining to the tribunal or the Commissioners.[391] Section 4(3) of the Official Secrets Act 1989, as amended by the 2000 Act,[392] is also available to punish such disclosures.

A further limitation is placed on complaints relating to interceptions. Section 67(5) provides that unless the tribunal in the circumstances considers it 'equitable' to do so, such complaints will not be considered if made more than one year after the conduct in question took place. Otherwise, conduct under s 65(5) can be considered whenever it occurred. Thus, pre-commencement surveillance can be brought before the tribunal.

Jurisdiction

Under s 65(2), the tribunal has three main functions and a potential fourth one. First, challenges to surveillance on Convention grounds by certain bodies or to interception by all bodies must be brought within it. In the words of the sub-section, 'it will be the only appropriate tribunal for the purposes of section 7 of the HRA 1998 in relation to any proceedings under sub-section (1)(a) of that section (proceedings for actions incompatible with Convention rights) which fall within sub-section 3 of this section'. Under s 65(3), they are proceedings against any of the intelligence services '. . . or against any other person in respect of any conduct, or proposed conduct, by or on behalf of any of those services' or 'relating to the taking place in any challengeable circumstances of any conduct falling within subsection (5)'.

Section 65(5) applies to 'conduct . . . (whenever it occurred) by or on behalf of any of the intelligence services; in connection with the interception of communications in the course of their transmission by means of a postal service or telecommunication system'; conduct to which . . . Part II applies, any entry on or interference with property

388 See Klass v Federal Republic of Germany (1978) 2 EHRR 214. Germany's current bugging law contains this requirement.

389 Criminal Procedure Code, para 788.

390 See Statewatch (1999) Vol 9 Nos 3 and 4. The UK is the only member state to have entered a derogation to Principle 2(2) of the Council of Europe Recommendation on the use of data in the police sector R(87)15.

391 Under RIPA 2000, s 19(4), any such disclosure is an offence punishable on indictment by a maximum term of five years' imprisonment: s 19(4)(a).

392 Schedule 4, para 5.

or any interference with wireless telegraphy'. Section 65(6) introduces a significant limitation in providing: 'for the purposes only of subsection (3)', conduct to which Part II applies, an entry on or interference with property or an interference with wireless telegraphy is not conduct falling within sub-section (5) 'unless it is conduct by or on behalf of a person holding any office, rank or position with (a) any of the intelligence services; (b) any of Her Majesty's forces; (c) any police force; (d) the National Criminal Intelligence Service; (e) the National Crime Squad; or (f) the Commissioners of Customs and Excise . . .'. In other words, as indicated above, the intention is that surveillance by these bodies can be challenged only in the tribunal where it is argued that they have breached a Convention right.

Secondly, the tribunal is the appropriate forum for complaints if, under s 65(4), 'it is a complaint by a person who is aggrieved by any conduct falling within subsection (5) which he believes to have taken place in relation to him, to any of his property, to any communications sent by or to him, or intended for him, or to his use of any postal service, telecommunications service or telecommunication system; and to have taken place in challengeable circumstances or to have been carried out by or on behalf of any of the intelligence services'. Sections 65(7) and (8) apply in relation to both ss 65(3) and (4). Section 65(7) defines 'challengeable circumstances' as conduct which '(a) takes place with the authority, or purported authority, of anything falling within subsection (8); or (b) the circumstances are such that (whether or not there is such authority) it would not have been appropriate for the conduct to take place without it, or at least without proper consideration having been given to whether such authority should be sought'.

Thus, in its complaints and 'proceedings' jurisdiction, the tribunal can consider unauthorised interception. In relation to complaints, the term used under s 67(3)(b) is 'investigate the authority' which does not appear to confine the tribunal, bearing in mind the meaning of challengeable circumstances', to merely considering whether the authority (if it exists) was properly given. Section 65(8) covers: interception warrants under the Acts of 1985 or 2000, an authorisation under Part II of the 2000 Act, a permission of the Secretary of State under Sched 2 (relating to powers to obtain data protected by encryption), or an authorisation under s 93 of the Police Act 1997.

Thirdly, the tribunal has jurisdiction (s 65(2)(c)) to determine a reference to them by a person that he has suffered detriment as a consequence 'of any prohibition or restriction' under s 17 (the exclusion of evidence section) on his relying on any matter in, or for the purposes of, civil proceedings. It is notable that no means is provided of seeking redress for detriment arising when evidence is excluded in criminal proceedings.[393] Finally, under s 65(2)(d), the Secretary of State can also, by order, allocate other proceedings to the tribunal but a draft of the order must have been approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.[394]

393 See R v Preston [1993] 4 All ER 638 (above, p 686) in which the appellants may have suffered detriment due to the exclusion of material derived from phone tapping under the predecessor of s 17, s 9 of the 1985 Act.

394 Section 66(3).

Procedure

The tribunal is modelled on the Special Immigration Appeals Commission (SIAC)[395] which in turn provided the model for the tribunal set up under the Northern Ireland Act 1998.[396] The Investigatory Powers Tribunal Rules[397] came into force on the same date as the HRA – 2 October 2000. Under s 68, the tribunal is entitled to determine its own procedure, subject to these rules. The current rules follow the old practices in various respects. Hearings are secret.[398] The Rules envisage the possibility of an oral hearing, but there is no right to such a hearing.[399] The Rules allow for the possibility of separate oral hearings; the applicant and the representatives of the public authority will not confront each other.[400] Under s 68(6) and (7)(i) 'every person by whom or on whose application there has been granted any authorisation under Part II . . . must disclose or provide to the Tribunal all such documents and information as the tribunal may require [in the exercise inter alia of its jurisdiction under s 65(2)(a)]'. But information given at the separate hearing can be withheld from the applicant unless the person providing it consents to its disclosure.[401]

The current tribunal, like the old one, merely reports its conclusion; it cannot report the reason for the decision.[402] If it finds that no warrant or authorisation exists and that apparently no surveillance or interception is occurring, or that proper authorisation occurred, it merely informs the complainant that the complaint has not been upheld. The complainant who suspects, for example, that his or her phone or e-mails are being tapped is then left not knowing whether in fact tapping is occurring. As indicated above, on no occasion so far in the six years of its existence has the Tribunal concluded that there has been a contravention of RIPA or the Human Rights Act 1998. But if the complaint is upheld, the complainant will know that tapping/surveillance was occurring but unauthorised. This is, at least theoretically, an improvement on the old position since previously the fact that a complaint was not upheld could still mean that unauthorised tapping was occurring. For example, on 6 December 1991, Alison Halford complained to the Interception of Communications Tribunal in respect of the suspected tapping of her home and office telephones.[403] From the circumstances, it appeared that tapping was probably occurring. She was informed on 21 February 1992, without any 395 Set up under s 1 of the Special Immigration Appeals Act 1997 in response to the findings in Chahal v UK (1997) 23 EHRR 413.

396 Under s 90.

397 SI 2000/2665.

398 Rule 9(6): 'The Tribunal's proceedings, including any oral hearings, shall be conducted in private.'

399 Rule 9(2): 'The Tribunal shall be under no duty to hold oral hearings but may do so in accordance with this rule (and not otherwise).' Rule 9(3): 'The Tribunal may hold oral hearings at which the complainant may make representations, give evidence and call witnesses.'

400 Rule 9(4): 'The Tribunal may hold separate oral hearings which the person whose conduct is the subject of the complaint, the public authority against whom s 7 proceedings are brought . . . may be required to attend and at which that person or authority may make representations, give evidence and call witnesses' (emphasis added).

401 Under Rule 2, the tribunal may not disclose to the complainant or any other person any information disclosed or provided to the tribunal in the course of [an oral hearing] without the consent of the person who provided it.

402 The 2000 Act, s 68(4). This matter was covered by the 1985 Act, s 7(4)(1) and Sched 1, para 4(2).

403 See the facts of Halford v UK [1997] IRLR 471; (1997) 24 EHRR 523, p 1042 above.

reason given, that the complaint had not been upheld: no contravention of ss 2–5 of the Act had been found. It later confirmed by letter that it could not specify whether any interception had in fact taken place. She was left in ignorance as to whether an intercept had indeed been authorised, whether one was in place, although unauthorised, or whether no interception was occurring.[404] Had it been authorised it is inconceivable, bearing in mind the circumstances, for it to have been authorised properly.

In its 'proceedings' under s 65(2)(a), the tribunal uses 'the principles applicable by a court on an application for judicial review'. Under the HRA it therefore must apply the principles a court bound by s 6 of the HRA would apply on such an application. The proportionality requirements under the RIPA should be strictly scrutinised. But one problem is, as Leigh and Lustgarten have argued, that the procedure may be unsuitable as a means of conducting such scrutiny due to its inefficacy in a fact-finding role.[405] Clearly, this problem is likely to be exacerbated by the non-disclosure of relevant information.

So it appears likely that the determinations of the current tribunal will be as secretive as those of the old and the position of the complainant equally weak. Clearly, the difficulty with tribunals of this nature is that they may seek to give the appearance of adversarial proceedings, but the limitations under which they operate, which severely curtail opportunities of challenging evidence, undermine the potential benefits of such proceedings.[406]

Remedies

The remedial powers of the current tribunal are similar to those of the old.[407] Under s 67(7), 'the Tribunal . . . shall have power to make any such award of compensation or other order as they think fit; [subject to the power of the Secretary of State to make rules under section 69(2)(h)] . . . and . . . may make an order quashing or cancelling any warrant or authorisation; and an order requiring the destruction of any records of information which has been obtained in exercise of any power conferred by a warrant or authorisation; or is held by any public authority in relation to any person' (subject to s 69 orders). Thus the award of remedies continues to be discretionary; the successful complainant or applicant could be left remediless. The tribunal does not have the 404 Lord Nolan, the previous Commissioner, has defended the failure to inform complainants as to whether an intercept has occurred on this basis: 'If the tribunal were able to tell a complainant that he or she had not been the subject of legitimate interception, silence or any equivocal answer on another occasion might be interpreted as an implication that interception had taken place. Furthermore a positive answer would allow criminals or terrorists to know whether they were subject to interception or not.' (Report of the Commissioner under the Interception of Communications Act 1998, Cm 4364, published June 1999, p 2, para 13 and p 11).

405 See Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, 'Making rights real: the courts, remedies and the Human Rights Act' (1999) 158 CLJ 509.

406 See Walker, C, The Prevention of Terrorism, p 82; he advocates an inquisitorial system for such tribunals; see also White [1999] PL 413, discussing the tribunal set up under the Northern Ireland Act 1998.

407 Under the 1985 Act, s 7(5), the tribunal could order quashing of the warrant, destruction of material obtained and payment of compensation to the victim.

power to make a declaration of incompatibility.[408] If the tribunal finds in favour of an applicant, a report would not automatically go to the Prime Minister under s 68(5); it would do so only if the Secretary of State bore some responsibility in the matter.

Recourse to the courts from the tribunal

At present, the RIPA seeks to make it impossible for a member of the public who is dissatisfied with the outcome of the tribunal procedure to seek a remedy in the courts. The Act, like the 1985, 1989, 1994 and 1997 Acts, contains a post-Anisminic ouster clause. Section 67(8) provides: 'Except to such extent as the Secretary of State may by order otherwise provide, determinations, awards, orders and other decisions of the tribunal (including decisions as to whether they have jurisdiction) shall not be subject to appeal or be liable to be questioned in any court.' This leaves open the possibility that a tribunal or other body might be established to hear appeals.[409] Under s 67(9), the Secretary of State is under a duty to establish such a body to hear appeals relating to the exercise of the tribunal's jurisdiction under s 65(2)(c) or (d), but not, significantly, in relation to the broader and much more important jurisdiction under s 65(2)(a) or (b).

The upshot is, at present, that the citizen cannot challenge a finding as to interception rather than surveillance outside the tribunal since both s 17 and s 67(8) stand in the way of so doing. A citizen seeking to challenge a tribunal decision in respect of surveillance would be unaffected by s 17, but would have to seek to circumvent s 67(8).

Under s 3 of the HRA it is conceivable that s 67(8) could be interpreted in an application for leave under Order 53[410] in accordance with the Convention in such a way as to allow review. The argument for seeking to circumvent s 67(8) would depend upon the extent to which the tribunal appeared to meet Convention requirements, considered below. The courts have not so far circumvented such post-Anisminic[411] clauses. It could be argued that the wording of s 67(8) cannot be intended to be taken literally. The courts could rely on Anisminic itself in seeking to satisfy s 6 of the HRA, in that since the word 'decision' is used in relation to tribunal findings themselves, and in relation to its jurisdiction, the argument is open that any decision tainted by an error of law is a nullity; and therefore the ouster clause cannot bite on it.

Since the tribunal can determine its own jurisdiction under s 67(8), and it is bound by s 6 of the HRA, argument could also be raised before it that, at least in respect of the circumstances of certain claims, it does not provide a fair hearing under Art 6, due inter alia to orders made under s 69, and that therefore its duty under s 6 requires it to declare that its jurisdiction does not cover such claims. If the tribunal is unreceptive to such claims, which is, of course, likely, they may eventually have to be raised at Strasbourg.

408 See the HRA 1998, s 4(5), discussed in Chapter 4, p 200.

409 Section 67(8) by an Order of the Secretary of State.

410 Of the Rules of the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court Act 1981, s 31.

411 In Anisminic v Foreign Compensation Commission [1969] 2 AC 147 the House of Lords refused to accept that the jurisdiction of the courts was entirely ousted on the basis that the Commission had acted outside its powers. Therefore, it had not made a determination; it had made a purported determination – i.e., a nullity. The ouster clause under the RIPA seeks to avoid this possibility, since it provides that the jurisdiction of the tribunal cannot be questioned in any court.

The influence of the HRA

The tribunal is bound by all the rights, including Art 6, under s 6 of the HRA, but Art 6 will apply only if the tribunal hearings are within its field of application. The proceedings or determination of complaints in the tribunal could be viewed as the 'determination of civil rights and obligations' under Art 6(1). The term 'civil' has, however, been taken to mean that these are rights in private rather than public law,[412] although it has been argued that: 'Recent jurisprudence by which more and more rights and obligations have been brought within Art 6, is not easy to explain in terms of any distinction between private and public law which is found in European national law'.[413]

In its proceedings, it will be likely to inquire into breaches of Art 8, which represents a right binding on public authorities, including the agencies, under s 6 of the HRA. At Strasbourg, that in itself would not be sufficient to engage Art 6, while domestically, the guarantees may be viewed as operating in public law only, in which case Art 6 would not apply. On the other hand, certain of the rights claimed are private law rights, since where authorisation is not given, existing tortious liability may arise.[414] The term 'civil' has an autonomous Convention meaning and therefore cannot merely be assigned the meaning of 'private' as understood in UK administrative law. Whether a breach of the RIPA, which gives rise to liability only under Art 8, could be viewed as a matter of private law is debatable, although Strasbourg may be moving towards a position in which 'all those rights which are individual rights under the national legal system and fall into the sphere of general freedom . . . must be seen as civil rights'.[415] Where it could be argued that breach of the RIPA did not give rise to liability under Art 8,[416] which may be the case in relation to some use of covert human sources, this question would be even more problematic and it would appear that Art 6 would not be engaged, although arguably it would where (a) existing tortious liability and breach of a Convention right appeared to arise; and (b) where breach of a right only appeared to arise.[417] SIAC, which resembles this tribunal, has been found to fall within Art 6 on the basis that it is determining civil rights and obligations.[418]

The better view is, it is contended, that the tribunal is bound by Art 6, at least in relation to its 'proceedings' jurisdiction, in which it is acting in a more judicial manner. It has potentially a pivotal role in upholding Convention rights in the face of the most significant assertions of state power. It would therefore be contrary to its role to find that it itself was not bound by the key due process guarantee. From a domestic standpoint, it would be anomalous in the extreme if were not so bound, bearing in mind its role in satisfying s 7(1)(a) of the HRA in respect of the obligations of a wide range of bodies, including, in particular, the police, under the RIPA. Whether it is within the field of application of Art 6 will be a matter which, initially, may be raised before the tribunal

412 Ringeisen v Austria A 13 (1971), para 94.

413 Harris, O'Boyle, Warbrick, The European Convention on Human Rights 1995, pp 174–75.

414 See Golder v UK A 18 (1975).

415 Bentham v UK B 80 (1983), para 10, dissenting opinions of Mr Melchior and Mr Frowen.

416 See above, pp 1042–46, 1068–75, for discussion as to invasions of privacy which are likely to engage Art 8.

417 But see Fayed v UK (1994) 18 EHRR 393, in which it was found that although, strictly speaking, there was no legal basis for the action and so no dispute to trigger Art 6, Art 6 applied to blanket immunities preventing access to a court.

418 See A and Others, discussed Chapter 14, pp 1340–41.

itself. If it considers that it is adjudicating on a public law matter, and is therefore outside Art 6, the matter will no doubt be raised at Strasbourg eventually.

Assuming that the tribunal is covered by Art 6(1) or, under the development of the Strasbourg jurisprudence may be found to be so covered in future, it is hard to see that it meets the Art 6 fair hearing requirements, bearing in mind the procedure it may follow, indicated above, since the complainant or applicant may be in such a weak position before it. As Chapter 2 indicated, since Art 6(3) contains minimum guarantees, the para 1 protection of a fair hearing goes beyond para 3.[419] In investigating a fair hearing, the domestic authorities are not confined to the para 3 guarantees; they can consider further requirements of fairness. If consideration is given to the procedures in question, it is apparent that, apart from any of the other requirements of fairness, the minimal safeguards of Art 6(3) may not be satisfied. In particular, as indicated above, the power to limit or prevent cross-examination, or exclude the applicant[420] or her legal representative, or limit disclosure of evidence, may not comply with Art 6(1) or (3).[421]

As indicated, the tribunal will apply the principles of judicial review in its adjudications, which will include considering proportionality, since it is bound by s 6 of the HRA, and Art 8(2) requires such consideration. The problem will be, as Chapter 4 indicated, that in order to consider proportionality the tribunal may need to evaluate a number of factual matters. But it is bound, as indicated, by subordinate legislation and may have no discretion as to requiring cross-examination or disclosure of documents. Thus, the procedural limitations under which it operates may place even greater difficulties in its path in considering issues of proportionality than there would be in an ordinary court, in judicial review proceedings. It appears therefore that it operates a very 'light touch' review, based in effect on Wednesbury unreasonableness, and so it may fail to satisfy the demands of Art 13, as recently interpreted at Strasbourg;[422] therefore a fortiori there is an argument that it does not satisfy Art 6. This will depend on its interpretation of the requirements of judicial review: under the HRA the use of judicial review principles by the tribunal should now include consideration of compliance with the Convention rights and therefore a more intensive review. If, despite the constraints it is under, it operates such review, at least in instances in which national security is not in issue, Art 13 may now be satisfied.[423] Its inability to give reasons or to take a binding decision may not render it ineffective.[424]

419 See pp 60–64.

420 See, on this point, Zana v Turkey (1997) 27 EHRR 667, in which, in the context of terrorism, the applicant was not allowed to be present at the trial; a breach of Art 6 was found on this basis.

421 See further Chapter 13, pp 1259–60.

422 Smith and Grady v UK (2000) 29 EHRR 493. The domestic court found that the continuance of the ban on homosexuals in the armed forces was not beyond the range of responses which was open to a reasonable decision maker. The Strasbourg Court considered that the threshold at which the domestic court could find the policy irrational was set so high that it effectively precluded consideration of the proportionality of the ban with the aim in view. Therefore judicial review was not found to satisfy the requirements of Art 13. The findings in Smith and Grady v UK on this point marked a departure from the stance preciously taken: see Soering v UK A 161 (1989). See also Esbester v UK 18 EHRR CD 72, on this point.

423 See further Chapter 2, pp 106–8 and Chapter 4, p 165.

424 Esbester v UK 18 EHRR CD 72.

Following Tinnelly v UK,[425] if it is argued that documents or sources cannot be disclosed on grounds of national security or the prevention of crime under Art 8(2), the applicant could argue that the Art 6 requirements override such a claim. The success of such an argument would depend upon the particular circumstances of a claim and in particular the ground under the RIPA in question since, as the Court found in Tinnelly, proportionality should be found between the infringement of the rights of the claimant and the aim in question. Where the aim concerns, for example, one of the 'economic' grounds founding directed surveillance under the RIPA, the claim of the state would be less pressing and the question of proportionality should be more intensively scrutinised. If this was impossible due to the procedural constraints, the applicant could claim that the tribunal should consider whether its duty under s 6 of the HRA requires it to disapply the subordinate legislation in question, and conduct, in such circumstances, a more intensive inquiry. This possibility would be open to it since s 6(2)(b) of the HRA does not apply in respect of subordinate legislation, while it cannot be said that s 69 of the RIPA, which only provides that the Secretary of State may make the orders in question, requires the tribunal to depart from Art 6.

In respect of the national security ground under the RIPA, the tribunal probably takes the view that it cannot consider the documents in question or other relevant matters in order to make a finding as to proportionality. In Balfour v Foreign and Commonwealth Office,[426] the Court found that once an actual or potential risk to national security had been demonstrated by a public interest immunity certificate, the Court should not exercise its right to inspect the documents. This view of national security as the exclusive domain of the executive was not adhered to in the robust approach taken to the concept in the context of deportation by the Special Immigration Appeals Commission (on which the new tribunal is partially modelled) in the case of Secretary of State for the Home Dept v Rehman.[427] However, the Court of Appeal overturned their ruling, finding that the threat to national security was for the government to determine and that it should be broadly defined to include the possibility of future threats, including those to the UK's 'allies'. The House of Lords confirmed that finding.[428]

These findings are not, it is argued, fully in accordance with the findings of the Strasbourg Court in Tinnelly or in Chahal v UK.[429] Both, particularly Tinnelly, took the view that the threat to national security should be demonstrated. Where Art 13, as opposed to Art 6, was in question, as in Chahal, the requirements thereby placed on the state would be weaker, since Art 13 must be read with Art 8(2).[430] But where Art 6 is engaged, as indicated, the requirements would be stricter. The tribunal may be placed in the difficult position of choosing between the domestic and the Strasbourg jurisprudence as to the stance it should take in respect of assertions of national security considerations. If so, the way would be open, under s 3 of the HRA, to depart from the former.

425 (1998) 27 EHRR 249.
426 [1994] 2 All ER 588.
427 [1999] INLR 517.
428 [2001] 3 WLR 877, HL; [2000] 3 All ER 778, CA; for comment, see Ryder [2000] J Civ Lib 358.
429 (1998) 27 EHRR 249 (in the context of Art 13).
430 Leander v Sweden (1987) 9 EHRR 433.

As indicated above, it could also be argued before the Tribunal (or, if necessary, at Strasbourg) that it ought to provide an effective remedy under Art 13. It may be noted that in Khan v UK[431] the Court found that exclusion of evidence under s 78 of PACE would not provide such a remedy,[432] so it must be provided – in respect of the surveillance of a number of public authorities – only in the tribunal. This is clear since ss 7 and 8 of the HRA are intended to take the place of Art 13 domestically and the tribunal is the 'appropriate forum' for s 7(1)(a) purposes. In Khan v UK, which also critiqued police disciplinary procedures, it was found that the procedures failed to meet Art 13 standards due to the influence of the Home Secretary. Although the arrangements for the current tribunal differ,[433] the strong influence of the Home Secretary in determining the procedure to be followed might be said to impair the tribunal's independence.

The tribunal should play a part in providing an aggregate of remedies which, combined, would provide an effective remedy,[434] but the other potential remedies, such as raising complaints with an MP, are too ineffective to make much contribution. In Harman and Hewitt v UK,[435] a breach of Art 13 was found on the basis of the lack of an effective remedy. The 1989 Act was precisely intended to address this failure by creating the oversight mechanisms. In Christie v UK,[436] the Commission avoided the question whether the Interception of Communications Tribunal had provided an effective remedy since it found that the applicant did not have an 'arguable case' and that therefore Art 13 was inapplicable.[437] However, it found that it did provide such a remedy 'in principle'.[438]

In Govell v UK,[439] the use of a bugging device was the subject of an unsuccessful police complaint. The Commission found that the police investigative system did not meet the requisite standards of independence under Art 13 since, inter alia, the Home Secretary appointed and remunerated members of the Police Complaints Authority and the Home Secretary had a guiding role in determining the withdrawal of charges. In Chahal v UK, the Advisory Panel on deportation decisions was not found to satisfy Art 13 since it failed to offer sufficient safeguards for Art 13 purposes. The Court said that the remedy offered should be 'as effective as it can be' given the need, in the context in question, to rely on secret sources. In relation to the new tribunal, it might be argued that the Orders made by the Secretary of State may reduce its efficacy to the point where it no longer satisfies Art 13. While the tribunal's adjudications may

431 (2000) 8 BHRC 310.

432 Paragraph 44.

433 See fn 387.

434 Ibid.

435 Appl No 121175/86; (1992) 14 EHRR 657.

436 Also, in Christie v UK 78-A DR E Com HR 119 the Commission found that the Interception of Communications Act 1985, the model for the 1989 and 1994 Acts, met the 'in accordance with the law' requirement of Art 8(2).

437 Similarly, in Halford v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 523, in respect of alleged tapping of the applicant's home phone, which was within the 1985 Act, the Court avoided this question in relating to the old tribunal since it found that the applicant did not have an 'arguable case' and that therefore, Art 13 was inapplicable.

438 See also Esbester v UK (1993) 1860/91; affirmed in Matthews v UK [1997] EHRLR 187.

439 (1997) 4 EHRLR 438.

appear adversarial in a superficial sense, the position of the applicant may be so weakened by the procedural limitations under which it operates that it cannot be said to be effective.

Unless a means of appeal from the tribunal is created in relation to its jurisdiction under s 65(2)(a), there will be no clear independent domestic means of determining whether the tribunal offers an effective remedy and whether it should abide by Art 6, which does not require that a court to which to appeal should be available. But it could be argued that Art 6 itself requires that the question of its own field of application should be able to be raised before an independent body.[440] While the Strasbourg jurisprudence would probably not support such an argument at present, it could be argued – somewhat less boldly – that Art 6 requires that the question whether a particular body provides an effective remedy under Art 13 should be able to be raised before an independent body and not merely in the disputed body itself. In principle, this is a strong argument, bearing in mind the fact that the tribunal is, in most circumstances arising under the Intelligence Services Act 1994, the Police Act 1997 and the RIPA, the only forum in which citizens are able to raise the issue of violation of Art 8 rights.

The mere fact that a body termed a 'Tribunal' has been created should not obscure the possibility that it may have a merely cosmetic effect. Had a body been created which appeared to have even less credibility, such as a Panel of Advisers or Commission, or a body required to accept National Security certificates, the guarantee under Art 6 of access to a court[441] or, under Art 13, of providing an effective remedy, might have been found at Strasbourg to have been violated,[442] and the domestic expectation would have been that this would eventually be the case. But the formal appearance of the current tribunal may be belied by the nature of its proceedings which may mean that, substantively, it is as ineffective as such bodies would have been.

7 The Anti-Terrrorism, Crime and Security Act: acquisition of information

Introduction

The Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 (ACTSA) introduced certain measures that aid in state surveillance. The ACTSA contains a range of miscellaneous provisions which relate to criminal law and criminal justice matters; they have no direct connection with terrorism and still less with the 9/11 terrorist attacks, although the ACTSA represented the UK response to the attacks. Certain of the provisions introduced build on those introduced under Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001 and the Electronic Communications Act 2000. In this class there are powers to obtain disclosure of information in Part 3 ACTSA; and a voluntary Code of Practice on the retention of communications data – websites visited, mobile phone calls made and so on – was introduced by Part 11. As Walker and Akdeniz note, not 'all data of interest [to law enforcement bodies] will be 440 See Van Dijk, P and Van Hoof, F, Theory and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1998.

441 Such a guarantee has been implied into Art 6(1): see Omar v France (2000) 29 EHRR 210.

442 As in Tinnelly (1998) 27 EHRR 249 and Chahal (1997) 23 EHRR 413 respectively.

conveniently held by compliant public authorities'.[443] The Code was introduced to seek to ensure that private communications service providers would retain communications data for investigatory purposes. It was drafted by the Home Office and can be used, for example, to order mobile phone companies to retain communications' information relating to their customers for future use by the police and other law enforcement bodies. However, at present compliance with the Code is voluntary. So Parts 3 and 11 may be viewed as having similar aims.[444] If the data is retained access would then have to occur via RIPA.

Part 3: information acquisition

A number of the provisions in this category allow for the enhancement and extension of police powers and are unconnected to terrorism. The Part 3 provisions allow the police and other investigatory bodies to obtain information about citizens from a range of public authorities. In contrast Part 11, discussed below, is intended to allow for information acquisition from private bodies via the Code. Potentially the Part 3 provisions affect a very large number of British citizens because they are not confined to use against those involved in serious crime or suspected terrorists or even to those already suspected of criminal offences. There was, therefore, no justification for including them in a Bill which was presented to Parliament as a response to an emergency. It is clearly unwarranted to use the brief Parliamentary timetable adopted for emergency legislation for provisions which could have been included in ordinary criminal justice legislation. Moreover, they are not subject to sunset clauses. If they were justified after September 11, although they were not previously, one might have considered that a sunset clause was essential since such wide-ranging powers could hardly have been passed, (at least without amendment in the Commons) had they not been viewed as special powers warranted by the exigencies of the situation. They are now likely to remain on the statute book indefinitely and certainly long after the 'emergency' has subsided.

Section 17(2)(a)–(d) is the key provision in providing greatly extended powers of obtaining information from public authorities, which are used mainly by the police. Section 17(2) takes 66 existing statutory disclosure powers, listed in Sched 4, and deems each of them to include a number of further disclosure powers by providing that they:

> shall have effect in relation to the disclosure of information by or on behalf of a public authority as if the purposes for which the disclosure of information is authorised by that provision included each of the following: (a) the purposes of any criminal investigation whatever which is being or may be carried out, whether in the United Kingdom or elsewhere; (b) the purposes of any criminal investigation whatever which has been or may be initiated, whether in the United Kingdom or elsewhere; (c) the purposes of the initiation or bringing to an end of any such investigation or proceedings; (d) the purposes of facilitating a determination of whether any such investigation or proceedings should be initiated or brought to an end.

443 See Walker, C and Akdeniz, Y, 'Anti-Terrorism Laws and Data Retention' [2003] 54(2) NILQ 159–82 at p 161.

444 For further discussion see Walker, C and Akdeniz, Y, "Anti-Terrorism Laws and Data Retention" [2003] 54(2) NILQ 159–82.

Section 17(6) provides a saving power for any disclosure power not mentioned in Sched 4. Thus, any public authority in the UK must disclose information covered by the 66 statutory provisions, but for the far wider range of purposes. The term 'public authorities' in this context has the same meaning as under the HRA s 6(3).[445] Therefore it includes private bodies and companies in so far as they have a public function – 'functional' public authorities. In other words, a vast range of bodies is affected. Only 'purely' private bodies are not covered;[446] they are affected instead, as discussed below, by the Code under Part 11 applying to private communications service providers which sets out the guidelines for retaining data beyond the point where it would be needed for their own business purposes. The list of 66 statutes is not exhaustive and can be added to by statutory instrument, under s 17(3), although after amendment of the Bill this power was made subject to the affirmative resolution procedure, under s 17(4).

Section 17(2) is extraordinarily wide in a number of respects. The immense broadening of the existing disclosure powers is not confined under it to the protection of national security or to the fight against terrorism. It is not confined even to the investigation and prevention of serious crime. It extends to any offence whatever and therefore could include private prosecutions. The powers under (c) and (d) in particular are amazingly broad: s 17(2)(c) speaks of 'for the purpose of initiating any investigation', while s 17(2)(d) provides for disclosure at an even earlier stage – before it has been determined that an investigation should be initiated. Therefore the information-sharing requirements can apply even before a suspicion has arisen as to any offence. Section 17(2)(c) and (d) are not qualified by any requirement that there should be certain initial grounds for suspicion.

The Lords put forward an amendment, which was carried, to the effect that whether disclosure was voluntary or was supplied on request it could be provided only where the public authority 'believes or suspects' that the relevant information, 'may relate directly or indirectly to any risk to national security or to a terrorist'. However, this amendment was removed in the Commons and this was eventually accepted in the Lords on the basis that certain concessions, although, as indicated below, quite minor ones, had already been made. A similar amendment was carried in the Lords in relation to s 19 which gave a new, broad power relating to disclosure of information held by revenue departments for the same wide purposes as those in s 17. This amendment was also agreed to and the government again defeated. But again the amendment was removed in the Commons and was not reinstated.

Section 17(5) was included as a Lords' amendment. It demands that the use of such powers must be proportionate to the aim pursued. However, this requirement would in many cases be imposed by Art 8(2)[447] of the Convention under the Human Rights Act 445 Section 6(3) provides that 'public authority' includes 'a court or tribunal' and 'any person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature'.

446 See s 6(5) HRA.

447 Art 8 is discussed at various points in this book and in Chapter 2, pp 69–74. A reminder of its provisions may be convenient at this point; Art 8(1) provides: 'Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence.' Art 8(2) provides: 'There shall be no interference by a public authority with the exercise of this right except such as is in accordance with the law, and is necessary on a democratic society in the interests of national security, public safety or the economic well-being of the country, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, or for the protection of the rights or freedoms of others.' The requirement that in any event since Art 8 is binding on all the bodies concerned under s 6 HRA. Some disclosures, however, might not raise Art 8 issues, in which case the proportionality requirement might have some safeguarding impact. Also the legitimate aims under s 17(2)(a)–(d) might be viewed as going beyond the aims of Art 8(2). Thus s 17(5) may deter the use of general fishing expeditions, to an extent. However, given that the aims of s 17(2) are so very broad it would be hard to say whether a disclosure was disproportionate to the aim in question given the uncertainty generated by the wording 'any criminal investigation whatsoever' and the lack of a need for any existing suspicion.

Where requests are made by public authorities or individuals abroad s 18 provides a safeguard of sorts where the legal system, procedures or integrity of the relevant foreign jurisdiction are not comparable to those of the UK and do not provide comparable protection, as it allows for the Secretary of State to give a direction which specifies any overseas proceedings and prohibits the making of a disclosure for the purposes of those proceedings. The Secretary of State cannot give a direction unless 'it would be more appropriate' for the investigation to be carried out by a court or other authority of the UK or of a third country. Thus the section does not indicate the grounds on which a direction would be viewed as needed on the grounds of the appropriateness in question. This opaque section provides for the only safeguard introduced under Part 3 against disclosures abroad which could be to a wide range of regimes. Clearly, the safeguard is also dependent on its actually being exercised by the Home Secretary.[448]

In essence therefore it may be said that in a startling fashion s 17(2) destroys the balance created by a large number of existing carefully considered, and often highly detailed schemes permitting disclosure and preserving confidentiality. Together with s 19 and the associated Part 11, especially ss 102 and 103,[449] it provides a regime allowing the police, the security services and other public authorities to obtain a vast range of personal and other information. The answer of the government to concerns in the Lords and Commons regarding the breadth of the s 17 provisions was to point repeatedly to the provisions of the Human Rights Act as providing a remedy for the citizen.[450]

There is a clear tension between Art 8 and the Part 3 provisions since in a number of instances personal information, including very sensitive information,[451] could be an interference with the Art 8 guarantee should be 'necessary on a democratic society' includes the requirement that it should be proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued.

448 Such disclosures would be open to challenge by way of judicial review or under the Human Rights Act (see below).

449 Part 11 is also concerned with the collection of information and allows for a Code of Practice to be made by the Home Secretary ordering mobile phone companies to retain information for future use. Thus Parts 3 and 11 may be viewed as having similar aims.

450 See, e.g., HL Deb cols 949–72 6 Dec 2001.

451 Section 17(2) overrides certain provisions of the Data Protection Act 1998. The Security Service does not have to comply with the Data Protection Act 1998, even in its criminal function. In relation to personal information, the police do not have to comply with the fair and lawful processing provisions of the first data protection principle, subject access requests, or restrictions on disclosure of personal information, except in relation to "sensitive" data, if to do so would be likely to prejudice the prevention and detection of crime or the apprehension and prosecution of offenders. (These are not blanket exemptions; they should be considered in their application to individual cases, but see the JUSTICE report Under Surveillance: Covert Policing and Human Rights Standards (1998) Chapter 4, especially disclosed.[452] But it is disingenuous to suggest that the citizen can rely on Art 8 as a safeguard since there are both procedural and substantive problems in so doing. There is no mechanism for informing the citizen that disclosure has occurred, and therefore opportunities for raising Art 8 arguments are limited. They would normally have to be raised within a trial where the information disclosed formed part of the evidence against the defendant. However, at present the courts are unlikely to take the view that information obtained in breach of Art 8 is required to be excluded from evidence.[453] The citizen could bring a civil action against the public authority in question, or the investigatory body, under s 7(1)(a) HRA post-trial, relying on Art 8. But the s 17(2) powers are so broad that the body could normally claim that most disclosures satisfied the statutory tests. Thus the plaintiff might have to claim that s 17(2) itself breaches Art 8. Without considering this argument in detail, it clearly seems to be plausible to argue that a power to obtain personal information which is not dependent on showing any initial suspicion relating to the individual in question is disproportionate to the legitimate aim in view – that of preventing crime, under Art 8(2). But, unless a court could find a way of narrowing the provisions of s 17(2)(c) and (d), by relying on the interpretative obligation of s 3(1) HRA,[454] it would merely have to apply the provisions in reliance on its duty under s 6(2) HRA.[455] A court of sufficient authority could issue a declaration of the incompatibility between Art 8 and s 17(2)(c) and (d), under s 4 HRA, but this would not provide the aggrieved citizen with a remedy. In considering compatibility a court should take into account the lack of an effective remedy (as guaranteed under Art 13)[456] for breach of Art 8: since, as indicated, in many instances a citizen would never know that a disclosure had occurred, it is hard to argue that such a remedy is available,[457] meaning that since disclosures may often remain unchallengeable, Art 8 could to a large extent be reduced to a nullity.[458] at pp 92–95). Where sensitive data is obtained under s 17(2) the exception in respect of such data will not apply.

452 See discussion in Fenwick, H, Civil Rights: New Labour Freedom and the Human Rights Act, 2000, Chapter 8, pp 325–31; Chapter 9, pp 364–68.

453 See Khan v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 310; R v Khan [1997] AC 558; Attorney General's Reference (No 3 of 1999) [2001] 2 WLR 56.

454 Section 3 provides that 'so far as it is possible to do so' legislation 'must be read and given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights'.

455 Section 6(2) HRA provides that s 6(1) 'does not apply to an act if (a) as a result of one or more provisions of primary legislation the authority could not have acted differently or in relation to incompatible provisions "the authority was acting so as to give effect to or enforce those provisions'.

456 See further on remedies for breach of the Convention rights and the relevance of Art 13 under the HRA, Chapter 2, pp 106–8 and Chapter 4, p 165.

457 In Klass v Germany (1979–80) 2 EHRR 214, in the context of secret surveillance for the purposes of protecting national security, it was found that effective controls ensuring that Art 8 rights were guaranteed were created by means of a scheme in which a citizen could be notified subsequently of the surveillance (para 58). Article 13 was satisfied since the citizen could then seek various remedies (para 71). It may therefore be argued that Arts 8 and 13 may be breached by the use of the Part 3 scheme, albeit allowing for disclosure of personal information as opposed to surveillance and use of information, since no provision for subsequent notification is made. This argument is all the stronger, bearing in mind the use of the scheme not in the context of national security or even serious crime, but before suspicion as to criminal activity has arisen.

458 See Klass v Germany, ibid, para 38.

Part 11: retention of communications data by private companies

On 15 March 2006 the European Union formally adopted Directive 2006/24/EC, on 'the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC'. The Directive requires Member States to ensure that communications providers must retain, for a period of between six months and two years, necessary data as specified in the Directive, inter alia: to trace and identify the source of a communication; to trace and identify the destination of a communication; to identify the type of communication; and to identify the communication device. The data is required to be available to competent national authorities in specific cases, 'for the purpose of the investigation, detection and prosecution of serious crime, as defined by each member state in its national law'.

The Directive, as adopted, covers fixed telephony, mobile telephony, internet access, internet email and internet telephony. Member States are required to transpose it into national law within 18 months, and no later than September 2007. However, they may if they wish postpone the application of the Directive to internet access, internet email and internet telephony for a further 18 months after this date. Member States retain the flexibility to go substantially further than the Directive mandates. Subject to notification to the Commission, they may require data to be held longer than the two-year maximum set by the Directive. They retain the freedom under Article 15(1) of the earlier Directive 2002/58/EC to legislate official access to the retained data for purposes beyond those set out in the Data Retention Directive.

As mentioned above, the UK already has an extensive system of data retention, under the voluntary Code agreement made with the industry, but it is not yet on a statutory basis. As discussed, Part 11 of the ACTSA contains a number of sections which deal with the retention of communications data by fixed line and mobile telephone service providers and internet service providers. Communications data includes data which identifies the users of services, data which identifies which services were used and when they were used, and data which identifies who the user contacted. It does not include the content of communications. For example, in the case of a call from a mobile telephone the data to be retained would include data identifying the owner of the phone, who was called, the duration of the call and the approximate locations of both parties. Section 102 of the Act requires the Secretary of State for the Home Office to issue a voluntary code of practice on data retention. A code of practice has been issued and contains the requirements set out below.

The Home Office Voluntary Code of Practice on Data Retention requires that subscriber information has a retention period of 12 months. This covers subscriber details relating to the person such as: name, date of birth, installation and billing address, payment methods, account/credit card details. Telephony Data has a retention period of 12 months; this covers all numbers associated with calls. Email Data[459] has a retention period of six months. ISP Data has a retention period of six months. Web 459 This covers: log-on (authentication user name, date and time of log-in/log-off, IP address logged-in from); sent email (authentication user name, from/to/cc email addresses, date and time sent); received email (authentication user name, from/to email addresses, date and time received).

Activity Logs have a retention period of four days; this includes IP address used, URL's visited and services. Web browsing information is retained to the extent that only the host machine or domain name (website name) is disclosed.

There are very clear tensions between Art 8 and the Part 11 provisions since in a number of instances personal information, including very sensitive information, can be disclosed. But it is arguable that the citizen cannot rely on Art 8 under the HRA as a safeguard since the bodies in question are not public authorities and so they are not subject to the duty to act in a manner compatible with Convention rights under s 6 HRA. On the other hand, it is arguable that their regulation via a Code of Practice recognised in a statute – the ACTSA – could give them the status of functional public authorities under s 6 HRA in relation to their data retention function, using the analogy of the PCC, which is discussed in Chapter 9.[460] The PCC has a regulatory role in relation to personal data via a voluntary Code which is recognised in a statute – the HRA s 12. The PCC appears to view itself as a public authority for HRA purposes in relation to its policing of the PCC Code.[461] This analogy is uncertain: the PCC is the regulatory body, while the newspapers remain private bodies, albeit regulated indirectly by the PCC Code. In this instance the Communications Service Providers (CSPs) are the private bodies and no regulator stands between them and the Code. It could be argued that since no regulatory body exists and the CSPs are regulated on a voluntary basis directly by the Code, they are in a position more analogous to that of the PCC than that of the newspapers; thus they are private bodies with one public function – the retention of data for state use. It is submitted that this is the better view but this point cannot be determined with certainty at present. When compliance with data retention requirements for law enforcement purposes is placed on a statutory basis in order to comply with EU requirements, the CSPs might more readily be viewed as public authorities unless – which is probable – compliance is enforced via a regulator with functions similar to those of Ofcom when it acts in its privacy-protecting role, discussed in Chapter 9.[462]

The Joint Committee on Human Rights has criticised the Part 11 provision; in its Sixth Report it found: 'we were not satisfied that the arrangements in the draft code would ensure that the interference with rights under ECHR Article 8.1 would be proportionate to legitimate objectives so as to be justifiable under ECHR Article 8.2.'[463] The Newton Committee, after reviewing the Code, considered that: 'it would be beneficial for both users and subjects of the data if retention and access were based on a coherent statutory framework'. It considered that this should be part of mainstream legislation, not special terrorism legislation and that the maximum period of retention should be one year. The one-year period would it was considered, strike a balance between the justifiable need for access to the data when combating terrorism and other serious crimes and the protection of the right to privacy.[464] The Newton Committee also recommended that the whole retention and access regime should be subject to unified oversight by the Information Commissioner. It recommended that 460 See in particular pp 846–47.

461 See R (on the application of Ford) v PCC [2002] EMLR 5.

462 See pp 840–49.

463 (2004) para 56.

464 Newton Committee Report, ACTSA – Review (2003) HC 100, para 391.

a comprehensive legislative framework, going beyond that currently available in the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, should be put in place to govern both retention of and access to communications data. The Joint Committee endorsed the conclusions of the Newton Committee, as being 'likely to allow, for the first time, some confidence that rights under ECHR Article 8 would be properly safeguarded in this field'.[465]

The UK will have to introduce the requisite statutory framework in order to comply with the demands of Directive 2006/24/EC. Placing the current voluntary regime on a statutory basis with penalties for non-compliance has profound implications under Art 8. The indiscriminate mass collection of communications data offends against the core privacy principle that citizens should have notice of the circumstances in which the State may conduct surveillance, so that they can regulate their behavior to avoid unwanted intrusions. It also offends against the principle of informational autonomy discussed in Chapter 9 since citizens cannot choose to avoid disclosure of websites visited or of addresses of emails sent. Clearly, both these principles have to give way to the legitimate aims of prevention of crime and of terrorist activity but under Art 8 the means used should be proportionate to those aims. The data retention requirement could be so extensive and subject to such meagre checks that it would be arguable that it was not in proportion to the law enforcement objectives served and so could not be said to be necessary in a democratic society.[466] The arrangements for the storing and destruction of information will be crucial.

8 Conclusions

The central value which is revealed by consideration of the statutory schemes governing the operation of the intelligence services and the State surveillance arrangements generally is secrecy, in the protection of State interests. The value of individual privacy is, it is argued, consistently and readily overcome, at almost every point in the arrangements at which a choice was made. The HRA had aroused the expectation, not only that a new comprehensive statutory basis for invasion of privacy would be introduced, but that it would be underpinned by Convention principles.[467] While the introduction of such a basis in the RIPA is clearly a significant step forward in terms of protection of individual rights, there is little evidence of commitment to those principles despite the influence of the Convention on its inception. The same may be said of the Intelligence Services Act 1994 and of the Police Act 1997: both were introduced largely to meet the demands of Art 8 and both, it is argued, fail to show the respect for individual privacy which would therefore be expected. Perhaps ironically, the scheme enshrined in PACE 1984 for search and seizure does show such respect, to an extent, although it is only incidental to its traditional concern to protect the interest in property. Perhaps the contrast between PACE and the other statutory schemes considered reflects the lack of understanding of the value of individual privacy, as opposed to property, which has long influenced the common law and which, despite the reception of Art 8 into domestic law, continues to influence the regulation of secret investigatory powers.

465 Ibid para 59.

466 See, e.g., Klass v Germany (1978) 2 EHRR 214, Amann v Switzerland (2000) ECHR 87, Rotaru v Romania (2000) ECHR 192; Malone v United Kingdom (1984) 7 EHRR 14, Kruslin v France (1990) 12 EHRR 528, Kopp v Switzerland (1999) 27 EHRR 91 and Foxley v United Kingdom (2000) ECHR 224.

467 This was the expectation of the Justice report, Under Surveillance, 1998.

The ability of the ordinary citizen to rely on Art 8 under the HRA in order to protect her privacy from State intrusion is highly circumscribed in a number of respects. A breach of Art 8 in searching for and seizing confidential documents is very unlikely to lead to their exclusion from evidence in court. Where there is doubt as to the standard of scrutiny applied by a magistrate in considering an application for a search warrant, again leading to a breach of Art 8, it is unclear that any redress is likely to be available. Perhaps the most striking feature of the RIPA is the determination evinced under it to prevent citizens invoking Convention rights in the ordinary courts against State bodies in respect of the profound threat to privacy represented by interception and surveillance.[468] The development of Convention jurisprudence in the ordinary courts in relation to such techniques has largely been prevented, before it had a chance to begin. A conflict is therefore revealed, it is contended, between the values underlying the RIPA and those underlying the HRA, despite their introduction by the same government.

The democratic values enshrined in the Convention demand that citizens in the democracy should be able to feel confident that surveillance and interception by the State is undertaken for appropriate ends, by proportionate means and with respect for privacy. The RIPA, like the Security Services Act, the Intelligence Services Act and the Police Act, pays lip service to proportionality while largely emasculating methods of scrutinising it. It is apparent that statutory schemes which hide the operations they empower largely from scrutiny, and which, for the most part, place power in the hands of the executive, while shrouding the citizen's complaints' mechanisms in secrecy, fail to reflect those democratic values.

468 For further discussion, see Akdeniz, Y, Taylor, N and Walker, C, 'RIPA (1): State surveillance in the age of information and rights' [2001] Crim LR 73.

Part IV

Personal liberty

Part IV considers the extent to which agents of the state have the power to interfere with individual liberty and freedom of movement. Such interference occurs in the name of the prevention of crime, in order to counter terrorism, and to preserve national security. The driving force behind a number of the very recent measures adopted has been the perceived and actual threat of terrorism, post 9/11 and 7/7. In the case of police powers to stop, arrest and detain, and of special counter-terrorism powers, complex statutory schemes put in place under the previous Conservative governments have been built upon by the current Labour government in creating increasingly illiberal schemes. There remains the possibility that the Human Rights Act (HRA) may prove a corrective to the authoritarian tendency of the statutory schemes in this context.

But at the present time the impact of the HRA appears uncertain, inconsistent and muted. Clear tensions can be discerned between a number of the recent statutes considered in the four following chapters and the Human Rights Act. This is especially true of the Serious and Organised Crime Act 2005, the Terrorism Act 2000, the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005, the Terrorism Act 2006 and the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001. The legislation considered in these four chapters has certain hallmarks, all of which are of doubtful legitimacy in Human Rights Act terms. There is a very marked tendency to increase the discretion of the police and of other law enforcement officials, and, as was discussed in Chapter 10, to seek to curb the ability of the ordinary courts to keep a check on the use of that discretion in the interests of protecting individuals from abuse of power. The previous 'balance' struck between state powers and individual rights – often pre-HRA - has been eroded.

As will be discussed, the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 Part 4, which allowed for the detention without trial for non-British citizens suspected of terrorism, with appeal to the Special Immigration Appeals Commission (SIAC, discussed in Chapter 14) represented the culmination of the Labour government's tendency to introduce provisions in severe tension with human rights' values. The tension between Part 4 and the European Convention on Human Rights reached the point at which it was only possible to declare the 2001 Bill compatible with the Convention by derogating from Art 5 in respect of Part 4. This detention scheme was abandoned since it was found by the House of Lords to contravene the European Convention on Human Rights, Arts 5 and 14, in the seminal decision in A and Others v Secretary of State for the Home Dept.[1]

1 (2004) UKHL 56; [2005] 2 AC 68; [2005] 2 WLR 87; [2005] 3 All ER 169.

The derogation was not found to be justified since it went further than demanded by the exigencies of the situation. The Convention has also had an impact on the application of the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005, as discussed in Chapter 14. Where executive discretion is at stake in certain terrorist-related decisions, the judiciary have, as Chapter 14 suggests, shown a preparedness, at times, to rely on the Human Rights Act to do precisely what s 6 of that Act allows them to do – to find that a breach of the Convention rights by a public authority is unlawful. Thus the HRA has had the effect of curbing the use of the more extreme measures, particularly in the context of terrorism. But in terms of the less dramatic and more commonly used powers – particularly powers used in the context of street policing – it has so far had little impact.

In so far as the ordinary courts post-2000 have had the opportunity to consider executive use of coercive power in the contexts in question, in judicial review proceedings, or in the course of the criminal process, the judiciary has not shown a clear or consistent determination to use the Human Rights Act as a corrective. Thus they have not, for example, as Chapter 13 will argue, shown a willingness to rely on Art 6 to exclude evidence as a form of redress for police misuse of power which has resulted in the production of non-confession evidence. The weakness of the Strasbourg jurisprudence in this respect may have played a part in the adoption of this stance, but the far more likely explanation is that the judges have clung to their traditional common law-based fondness for retaining the maximum discretion for the judiciary.

When the HRA has been invoked to curb the more extreme measures that have been introduced in the terrorism context, the Labour government has been gravely displeased by such uses of the Act which it itself introduced – a displeasure which, it is suggested, underlies some of the provisions of the proposed new counter-Terrorism Bill 2007. Far from sympathising with activist interpretations of the Convention, or even with applications of the plain words of the HRA and the Convention, the government appears, in this crucial context, to want the judges to deliver less rights protection than Strasbourg does.

This Part begins, in Chapter 11, by considering police powers to stop and search, arrest and detain suspects. Chapter 12 examines the rules governing police questioning of suspects. In both Chapters 11 and 12 the differences between the schemes for terrorist and non-terrorist suspects are highlighted. Chapter 13 considers the means of redress available if the police breach the rules already discussed or otherwise abuse their powers in dealing with suspects. Chapter 14 goes on to consider the range of terrorist offences currently available and the use of control orders allowing for interventions to curb the activities of terrorist suspects who have not been convicted of any crime.

Chapter 11

Freedom from arbitrary search, arrest and detention; suspects' rights in criminal investigations

1 Introduction[1]

Crime control and due process

The exercise of police powers such as arrest and detention represents an invasion of personal liberty which is tolerated in the interests of the prevention and detection of crime. However, the interest in personal liberty requires that such powers should be strictly regulated. One way of putting this is to say that due process requirements inevitably place curbs on police powers. Thus, the rights-based due process model seeks to recognise the 'primacy of the individual and the complementary concept of limitation of official power'.[2] It calls for the police to be subject to tightly defined and rigorous control and for clear, legally guaranteed safeguards for suspects, with clear remedies for abuse through the courts.[3] In contrast, the crime control model

1 For current comment on PACE and the Terrorism Act 2000, and on the relevant provisions under the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, see: Ashworth, A, The Criminal Process, 3rd edn, 2005; Feldman. D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 2nd edn, 2002, Chapters 5 and 9; Sanders, A and Young, R, Criminal Justice, 3rd edn, 2007; Zander, M, The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, 2003; Clark, D, Bevan and Lidstone's The Investigation of Crime, 2004. For background reading, see: Hewitt, P, The Abuse of Power, 1982, Chapter 3; Lustgarten, L, The Governance of Police, 1986, Sweet and Maxwell; Leigh, LH, Police Powers in England and Wales, 2nd edn, 1985, Butterworths; Robilliard, J and McEwan, J, Police Powers and the Individual, 1986, Blackwell; Benyon, J and Bourn, CJ, The Police: Powers, Procedures and Proprieties, 1986, Pergamon; Newburn, T, Crime and Criminal Justice Policy, 1995, Longman, Chapter 3; Leishman, F, Loveday, B and Savage, S (eds), Core Issues in Policing, 1996, Longman; Morgan, R and Newburn, T, The Future of Policing, 1997, OUP. For early comment on the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, see [1985] PL 388; [1985] Crim LR 535. See also: Levenson, H and Fairweather, F, Police Powers; a Practitioner's Guide, 1990, Legal Action Group; McConville, M, Sanders, A and Leng, R, The Case for the Prosecution, 1991, Routledge; Bailey, SH, Harris, DJ and Jones, BL, Civil Liberties: Cases and Materials, 2002, Chapter 2; Reiner, R and Leigh, LH, 'Police powers', in McCrudden, C and Chambers, G (eds), Individual Rights and the Law in Britain, 1994, Clarendon; Klug, F, Starmer, K and Weir, S, The Three Pillars of Liberty, 1996.

2 Packer, H, The Limits of the Criminal Sanction, 1968, Stanford University Press. As Walker puts it: 'The primacy of individual autonomy and rights is central to the due process model', Miscarriages of Justice, 1999, p 39.

3 See further Baldwin, R, 'Taking rules to excess: police powers and the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill 1984' in Brenton, M and Jones, C (eds), The Year Book of Social Policy in Britain 1984–85, 1985, Routledge, pp 9–29; Jones, P, 'Police powers and political accountability: the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure'; Hillyard, P, 'From Belfast to Britain: some critical comments on the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure', both in Politics and Power, Vol 4, 1981; Jefferson, T, 'Policing the miners: law, politics and accountability', in Brenton, M and Ungerson, C (eds), The Year Book of Social Policy in Britain 1985–86, 1986, pp 265–86.

values a ‘quick, accurate and efficient administrative fact-finding role . . . over slow, inefficient, and less accurate judicial trials’ in order to achieve ‘the dominant goal of repressing crime’.[4]

Current analysis of aspects of the criminal justice system continues to rely quite heavily on the two familiar models of crime control and due process.[5] But while a rhetorical commitment to due process is still evident,[6] there is a clear perception that the law does not currently reflect this model. As Sanders and Young put it: ‘Police and Court officials need not abuse the law to subvert the principles of justice; they need only use it.’[7] Further, as many scholars have argued, the impact of externally imposed rules on actual police practice is limited and uncertain;[8] in particular, researchers have highlighted the problems of rule-evasion – the avoidance of apparent safeguards through the use of informal practices[9] – and of deterrence.[10] There is general agreement that internal police governance and culture will be highly significant in determining the extent to which suspects’ rights are delivered, but it should also be emphasised that that culture is itself likely to be influenced by enhanced possibilities of external review of internal police decisions. There appears to be academic agreement that the relationship between external rules and police culture is a complex one and that rather than tending merely towards straightforward evasion of the legal rules, the institutional culture may encourage the development of strategies intended to adapt and accommodate the rules within the practices it has already fostered.[11] But it is also suggested that enhanced external review of such practices under the Human Rights Act (HRA) may be encouraging a shift from the working rules formulated by the police towards an infusion of the legal rules into their informal counterparts. As Dixon puts it: ‘[Rule] compliance has to be sought by skilfully blending negotiation and imposition.’[12]

4 Packer (1968).

5 Packer, ibid. e.g., the two models are extensively relied on in Walker, C and Starmer, K (eds), Miscarriages of Justice, 1999. For discussion and criticism of the two models, see Sanders and Young, Criminal Justice, 2007, Chapter 1, Part 5.

6 See, e.g., Legislation Against Terrorism: A Consultation Paper, Cm 4178, 1998, esp para 8 of the Introduction.

7 Sanders and Young, op. cit., fn 1, p 20, 2nd edn, 2000.

8 See: the PSI Report’s distinction between Presentational, Inhibitory and Working Rules; Dixon, D, Law and Policing: Legal Regulation and Police Practices, 1997, Clarendon.

9 See, e.g., Goldsmith, A, ‘Taking police culture seriously: police discretion and the limits of the law’ (1990) Policing and Society Vol 1, pp 91–114.

10 There is some evidence that use of exclusion of evidence may encourage police officers to observe suspects’ rights. See Orfield, JR, ‘The exclusionary rule and deterrence: an empirical study of Chicago narcotics officers’ (1987) 54 U Chicago L Rev 1016–69. In the context of PACE, this finding receives some support from research by Sanders, Bridges, Mulvaney and Crozier entitled ‘Advice and assistance at police stations’, November 1989; it was thought that unlawful denials of legal advice had been discouraged by the ruling in R v Samuel [1988] 2 All ER 135. The research found that in 1987, before the ruling, delay was authorised in around 50% of applicable cases; in 1990–91, in only one case out of 10,000. Such evidence cannot, however, be treated as conclusive of the issue; apart from other factors, police officers will be aware that the question of exclusion of evidence is unlikely to arise since the case is unlikely to come to a full trial; even if it does arise, a conviction may still be obtained. Any deterrent effect is therefore likely to be undermined.

11 See Smith, DJ, ‘Case construction and the goals of the criminal process’ [1997] 37 Br Journal of Criminology 319; Ericson, RV, Making Crime: A Study of Detective Work, 1981, University of Toronto Press.

12 In Walker, C and Starmer, K (eds), Miscarriages of Justice, 1999, p 67.

The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984: context

Before the inception of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE), the police had no general and clear powers of arrest, stop and search or entry to premises. They wanted such powers put on a clear statutory basis so that they could exercise them where they felt it was their duty to do so without laying themselves open to the possibility of a civil action. Thus, PACE was introduced in order to provide clear and general police powers, but these were supposed to be balanced by greater safeguards for suspects which took into account the need to ensure that miscarriages of justice, such as that which occurred in the Confait case,[13] would not recur. The Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure,[14] whose report influenced PACE, was set up largely in response to the inadequacies of safeguards for suspects which were exposed in the Confait report.[15]

The result was a scheme in which the broad discretionary powers granted were to be balanced by two central structuring constraints. First, there were general precedent conditions for the exercise of such powers, the most common and significant being the requirement of reasonable suspicion or belief. Secondly, there was the provision of specific countervailing due process rights, in particular a general right of custodial access to legal advice, in most cases laid down in, or underpinned by, quasi- and non-legal rules – the Codes of Practice and Notes for Guidance made under PACE.[16] Redress for breaches of the due process safeguards was largely to be within the disciplinary rather than the judicial sphere: breach of the Codes at the inception of PACE constituted automatically a breach of the police disciplinary Code.[17] That is no longer the case, as discussed below, although breach of the Codes can be taken into account in disciplinary proceedings.

The driving force behind PACE may have been, despite concerns raised by the Confait case, much more to do with crime control than with due process, but the scheme adopted under the statute did not lose sight entirely of the reasons for adopting it. Post-PACE, the discovery of a number of miscarriages of justice – the cases of the Birmingham Six,[18] the Guildford Four,[19] Judith Ward,[20] Stefan Kiszko,[21] the Tottenham Three,[22] the Maguire Seven[23] – raised due process concerns again, although in only one of these instances was PACE applicable.[24] After the Birmingham Six were freed 13 See Report of the Inquiry by the Hon Sir Henry Fisher, HC 90 of 1977–78.

14 Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure Report, Cmnd 8092, 1981 (RCCP Report).

15 Report of the Inquiry by the Hon Sir Henry Fisher, HC 90 of 1977–78.

16 PACE 1984, s 66, Codes of Practice.

17 Ibid, s 67(8).

18 See R v McIlkenny and Others [1992] 2 All ER 417.

19 See May, J (Sir), Report of the Inquiry into the Circumstances Surrounding the Convictions Arising out of the Bomb Attacks at Guildford and Woolwich in 1974, Final Report, 1993–94 HC 449, Chapter 17.

20 R v Ward (1992) 96 Cr App R 1.

21 (1992) The Times, 18 February.

22 (1991) The Times, 9 December.

23 See R v Maguire [1992] 2 All ER 433.

24 The case of the Tottenham Three revealed flaws in the PACE scheme. It predated the introduction of PACE, but PACE was being used on a dry-run basis by the Metropolitan Police at the time. In the case of Winston Silcott, one of the Three, case notes of his confession, supposedly contemporaneous, were found under ESDA to have been tampered with, and his conviction was quashed in 1991; see (1991) The Times, 9 December.

in 1992, the Home Secretary announced the setting up of another Royal Commission under Lord Runciman[25] in order to consider further measures which could be introduced, but although there appeared to be a link between the announcement of the Royal Commission and the Birmingham Six case owing to proximity in time, the Commission interpreted its remit as not requiring an analysis of the miscarriage of justice in that case. The remit was to examine the efficacy of the criminal justice system in terms of securing the conviction of the guilty and the acquittal of the innocent.[26] Once again, a Royal Commission was seeking to reconcile potentially conflicting aims – concern to protect due process, but also to further crime control. As a number of commentators have observed, however, not only was the former part of this remit largely swallowed up in the latter,[27] it failed to articulate a principled account of investigative procedures.

After the Commission reported, the Major government passed legislation, most notably the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 (CJPOA), which increased police powers significantly while removing a number of safeguards for suspects. In particular, the 1994 Act curtailed the right of silence, although the Runciman Royal Commission had recommended that the right should be retained since its curtailment might lead to further miscarriages of justice. Thus, there were significant developments in police powers during the Major years and the balance PACE was supposed to strike between such powers and due process was, it will be argued, undermined.

Since the Labour government took office in 1997, there have been, apart from the passing of the HRA, no indications of attempts to break with the criminal justice legislative policies of the Conservative Party. In particular, the Terrorism Act 2000, as amended by the Criminal Justice Act 2003, and then by the Terrorism Act 2006, has increased the period of time for which terrorism suspects can be detained to 28 days. Amendations made to PACE by the Serious and Organised Crime Act 2005 have significantly extended the arrest power. Both before and after the general elections of 2001 and 2005, both major parties were seeking to outdo each other in encouraging and pandering to populist notions of crime control. One especially evident tendency has been the movement away from the need to show reasonable suspicion as a condition precedent for the exercise for police powers. Despite the fact that this condition appeared to offer little restraint in practice to police officers,[28] it may be said that its abandonment in the introduction of recent stop, arrest and detention powers is indicative of a formal acceptance of a less fettered police discretion, as opposed to the discretion developed de facto in police practice. Section 44 TA and s 60 CJPOA exemplify this tendency.

25 Runciman Report, Cm 2263, 1993, Chapter 1, para 5; Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure chaired by Lord Runciman; it was announced by the Home Secretary on 14 March 1991, HC Deb Vol 187 Col 1109. It reported on 6 July 1993; see (1993) 143 NLJ 933–96 for a summary of its recommendations in respect of police investigations, safeguards for suspects, the right to silence and confession evidence.

26 Effectiveness in securing 'the conviction of those guilty of criminal offences and the acquittal of those who are innocent', Runciman Report, ibid., Chapter 1, para 5.

27 See Sanders, A and Young, R,'The RCCJ' [1994] 14 OJLS 435; Walker, C and Starmer, K (eds), Miscarriages of Justice, 1999, especially p 57.

28 See 'Arrest and reasonable suspicion' (1988) 85 Law Soc Gazette, 7 September, p 22, and see below, p 1116.

However, in the HRA the UK has a benchmark by which to measure standards of procedural justice. This chapter will outline the trend away from due process post-PACE, and thus away from the balance PACE originally struck. It will consider the concomitant legislative tendency to render police powers susceptible to subjective exercise, and the de facto discretion in respect of the delivery of due process rights which has developed, due at least in part to a largely unmet need for their enforcement. The HRA may be perceived as providing an opportunity to re-infuse due process into criminal procedure. It will be argued, however, that the impact of the HRA has been diluted and unpredictable and that this is due in part to the weakness of the Strasbourg jurisprudence in certain key areas, such as the admissibility of non-confession evidence, or the use of stop and search powers, areas in which the common law traditionally failed to protect due process. Early decisions under the HRA indicate, this chapter and the next will argue, that the inception of the HRA is having little or no impact in such areas. The discussion below, and in Chapters 12 and 13, will demonstrate that there have been some significant post-HRA decisions in this context, but it is fair to say that the inception of the HRA has not had a strong impact. To some extent this is unsurprising since the European Convention on Human Rights creates a floor rather than a ceiling of rights. One would not expect it to have a radical impact in a country like the UK with strong due process traditions. But in certain contexts, particularly where the pressure to discard due process is strongest, as in the treatment of terrorist suspects, or in respect of stop and search without reasonable suspicion, change might have been expected, prompted by the HRA. Clearly, such changes might have had a muted impact in practice, bearing in mind that judicial intervention and formal rules have always had, as indicated above, an uncertain impact on the institutional culture of the criminal justice system.

In this chapter, the powers of the police and the safeguards which restrict the use of police powers to stop, search, arrest, and detain are evaluated with a view to considering how far the suspects' rights granted by PACE have had an impact on police working practice and how far, if at all, changes are occurring in the light of the HRA. A key theme of this chapter and the next concerns the extent to which the 'balance' PACE was supposed to create between suspects' rights and police powers has been eroded, partly due to measures adopted to curb organised crime, and, post-2001, in the wake of increased concern after 9/11 to combat terrorism. It will be argued that one of the problems of introducing special counter-terrorist powers is that they may be used outside the terrorist sphere. This discussion of the current 'balance' between police powers and suspects' rights is followed in Chapter 13 by a consideration of the value of the means of redress available, as affected by the inception of the HRA, if the police fail to comply with the rules.

The structure of the PACE rules

At present, the rules governing the exercise of police powers are largely contained in the scheme created under PACE, as amended, which is made up of rules deriving from the Act itself, from the Codes of Practice made under it, and the Notes for Guidance contained in the Codes. It is also influenced by Home Office circulars. The difference in status between these four levels and the significance of adopting this four-tiered approach is considered below. (It should be emphasised at this point that a number of significant police powers are not contained in PACE, as will be indicated.) The PACE pre-trial scheme must be examined in conjunction with the scheme that was created under the Terrorism Act 2000, as amended, with a view to creating at certain points a lesser level of protection for terrorist suspects.

PACE and the Codes of Practice

Until 2006 there were six Codes of Practice: Code A, covering stop and search procedures, Code B, covering searching of premises, Code C, covering interviewing and conditions of detention, Code D, covering identification methods and Code E, covering tape recording. Code F covering visual recording of interviews was introduced in 2004, a new version coming into force in 2006. Thus, each covers a particular area of PACE, although not all areas were covered: arrest, for example, was, until 2006, governed only by statutory provisions.[29] The Codes have gone through a number of revisions post-PACE, becoming steadily longer and more cumbersome in the process (Code C, for example, now runs to over 80 pages). In 2006 new, revised versions of the existing Codes came into force and the Codes were also added to. A new Code G covering arrest was introduced, as was a special new Code – Code H. It was introduced to govern the rights of terrorist suspects in police questioning and detention, meaning that the provisions of Code C relating to such suspects were removed, reappearing in a revised form in Code H. Thus 2006 saw a very dramatic revision and extension of the Codes.

If safeguards for suspects are taken seriously then why do they largely appear in the Codes rather than in PACE itself? It may be asked why all of the stop and search rules, for example, were not merely made part of the Act. The answer may partly lie in the need for some flexibility in making changes: the Codes are quicker and less cumbersome to amend than statutory provisions. However, it is also probable that the government did not want to create rules which might give rise to liability on the part of the police if they were broken; rules which could operate at a lower level of visibility than statutory ones may have appeared more attractive. It has for some time been apparent that the police powers were contained in PACE, as amended, and other statutes, while suspects' rights were largely contained in the non-statutory Codes. That tendency has only become more marked post-PACE. The proliferation of Code provisions, especially in 2006, has not been accompanied by any determination to deal with their very doubtful legal status.[30] At the same time certain safeguards of particular significance have always remained in the statute, in particular the provisions governing time limits on police detention. It is hard to escape the conclusion that the safeguards surrounding the questioning of suspects, contained mainly in Codes C and H, are viewed as of less significance.

29 Report of the Inquiry by the Hon Sir Henry Fisher, HC 90 of 1977–78.

30 In Delaney (1989) 88 Cr App R 338; (1988) The Times, 20 August, CA, the status of the Codes was considered. It was held that the mere fact that there had been a breach of the Codes of Practice did not of itself mean that evidence had to be rejected. Section 67(11) of the Act provides that '. . . if any provision of such Code appears to the court . . . to be relevant to any question arising in the proceedings, it shall be taken into account in determining that question'.

Section 67(10) of PACE makes clear the intended distinction between Act and Codes in providing that no civil or criminal liability will arise from a breach of the Codes. But the question of civil liability in respect of a breach of PACE, as opposed to the Codes, is not without difficulty. Liability will arise where a police power is needed in order to render an act non-tortious that would otherwise be tortious. For example, an arrest would give rise to liability for false imprisonment if no power to arrest arose. Certain PACE rules have been treated by the courts as mandatory and therefore adherence to them is necessary in order to render the act in question lawful, as will be discussed below. So breach of certain PACE rules will give rise to civil liability because they operate in the context of existing areas of tortious liability, whereas breach of the Codes cannot give rise to liability, even within that context.

This distinction is of significance in relation to the stop and search, arrest and detention provisions of Parts I–IV of PACE,[31] in comparison with the Code provisions in those areas, in Codes A and G. However, this distinction does not seem to have any significance as far as the interviewing provisions of Part V are concerned. The most important statutory safeguard for interviewing, the entitlement to legal advice, has not been affected by the availability of tortious remedies.[32] Thus statutory and Code provisions concerned with safeguards for suspects in police interviewing are in an equally weak position in the sense that a clear remedy is not available if they are breached. The context in which breaches of the interviewing provisions have been considered is that of exclusion of evidence.[33] In that context, the courts have not drawn a clear distinction between the provisions of the Act or of the Codes, except to require that breach of a Code provision should be of a substantial and significant nature[34] if exclusion of evidence is to be considered.

However, a new possibility of affording the Code provisions a status that they currently lack has become apparent as a result of the Strasbourg decision in Wainwright v UK,[35] which is fully discussed below. Breach of the Convention rights is a statutory tort under the HRA. If Code provisions designed in effect to prevent a breach of a right are breached, it is more likely, following that decision, that the right itself will be found to be breached, meaning that an action is available against the police, relying on s 7 HRA; damages could be awarded under s 8. This is of significance where the Article – such as Art 5 – operates in the context of an existing tort, since breach of the Code 31 In that respect, such claims are significant; e.g. in 1991, the Metropolitan Police faced an increase in claims of 40% over 1990. See HC Deb Vol 193 Col 370w. For discussion of the use of tortious claims in this context, see Chapter 13, pp 1303 et seq.

32 The question whether an unlawful denial of access to legal advice amounts to a breach of statutory duty has been considered in an unreported case, 26 October 1985, QB (Rose J), which is cited by Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H in Civil Actions Against the Police, 1st edn, 1992, p 359. It was held that the application would be refused even if jurisdiction to make the order sought existed as it would ‘cause hindrance to police inquiries’.

33 Breach of a code provision is quite frequently taken into account in determining whether or not a confession should be excluded, usually under PACE, s 78. Breach of a code provision will not lead to automatic exclusion of an interview obtained thereby, but a substantial and significant breach may be the first step on the way to its exclusion (see Walsh [1989] Crim LR 822, CA, transcript from LEXIS).

34 Keenan [1989] 3 All ER 598, CA.

35 Appl No 12350/04; 26.9.06.

provision alone would not give rise to tortious liability. It is also of particular significance where the Code provision affects matters, such as protecting the privacy and dignity of the detainee, that are designed – in effect – to ensure that Art 8 is not breached since there is no general tort of invasion of privacy. All of these points would also apply to statutory provisions which are not underpinned by a tortious remedy if breached.

Notes for Guidance

The Notes for Guidance are contained in the Codes but are not part of them.[36] They were apparently intended, as their name suggests, to be used merely as interpretative provisions and, it appears, to have no legal status at all. However, as will be seen, they contain some very significant provisions, although it is unclear what the consequences of breach of a Note are. Evidence tainted by breach of a Note for Guidance is unlikely to be excluded since, unlike Code provisions, s 67(11) of PACE does not require a court to take the Notes into account in determining any question.[37] However, in DPP v Blake,[38] the Divisional Court impliedly accepted that a Note for Guidance should be considered in relation to exclusion of evidence if it can be argued that it merely amplifies a particular Code provision and can therefore be of assistance in determining whether breach of such a provision has occurred. Moreover, certain Notes need not merely be considered in conjunction with the Code paragraph they derive from; the ruling in DPP v Rouse and DPP v Davis[39] that they can sometimes be used as an aid to the interpretation of Code C as a whole extended their potential impact. Thus, it may be said that the Notes are of a very uncertain legal status but that their importance has been recognised in certain decisions as to admission of evidence. These decisions clearly raise the question why important safeguards were placed in the Notes at all. Thus the courts have partially made up for another deficiency of the Codes.

Home Office circulars

There are a large number of such circulars dealing with disparate subjects relevant to the use of police powers; some of them are intended to work in tandem with a part of PACE as amplifying provisions and some operate in an area uncovered by the other provisions. They are in an even more equivocal legal position than the Notes. Their legal significance derives from their relevance to the obligations arising from the relationship between police forces and the Home Office and it is likely to be in that context rather than in relation to questions of admissibility that they will be considered.[40] Clearly, 36 This is provided for in the first paragraph of each Code; see, e.g., Code C, para 1.3.

37 PACE 1984, s 67(11) provides: 'In all criminal and civil proceedings any such code shall be admissible in evidence; and if any provision of such a code appears to the court or tribunal conducting the proceedings to be relevant to any question arising in the proceedings it shall be taken into account in determining that question.'

38 [1989] 1 WLR 432, CA.

39 (1992) Cr App R 185.

40 See Home Secretary ex p Westminster Press Ltd (1991) the Guardian, 12 February; Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Lancashire Police Authority (1992) The Times, 26 May. They may also be relevant to issues arising under the Police Act 1996, s 89 (formerly the Police Act 1964, s 51). In Collins and Wilcock [1984] 3 All ER 374; [1984] 1 WLR 1172, Home Office Circular 109/59 was argument that a court may be disinclined to consider a Note for Guidance applies a fortiori to the circulars.[41] It also seems clear that a decision taken in breach of a circular will not be susceptible to judicial review.[42]

Obstruction or assault on a police officer in the course of his duty

A number of the powers discussed below may be discussed within the contexts of the offences of assault on or obstruction of an officer in the course of his duty. The formal position remains unchanged – police officers have no right to detain and search or question a person in the absence of specific statutory powers allowing them to do so. Of course, society considers it desirable that the police should be able to make contact with citizens in order to make general inquiries without invoking any specific powers; on the other hand, citizens are not lawfully bound to reply to such inquiries. A police officer can ask a citizen to refrain from doing something, but in general, the citizen may refuse if the action is not in itself unlawful. If this were not the case, there would be little need for other specific powers; an officer could, for example, merely ask a person to submit to a search and if he refused, warn him that he could be charged with obstruction. However, some otherwise lawful behaviour, including failure to obey a police officer, may bring a citizen within the ambit of the offence of obstruction of a constable which arises under s 89(2) of the Police Act 1996 (formerly under s 51(3) of the Police Act 1964), and therefore, the way it has been interpreted determines the borderline between legitimate and illegitimate disobedience to police instructions or requests.[43] Section 89(2) creates an area of liability independent of any other substantive offence. Behaviour is criminalised in relation to police officers which would not give rise to criminal liability if directed at any other group of persons. Thus, some contacts between police officer and citizen may result in the creation of liability where, otherwise, none would have existed.[44]

Following Rice v Connolly,[45] three tests must be satisfied if liability for this offence is to be made out. First, it must be shown that the constable was in the execution of his or her duty. Actions outside an officer's duty would seem to include any action which is unlawful or contrary to Home Office circulars[46] or the Codes of Practice.

wrongly interpreted by a police officer; her actions in reliance on the incorrect interpretation were held to be outside the execution of her duty. However, the question whether breach of provisions contained in a circular could lead to exclusion of evidence has not yet been determined.

41 This point was made in Wolchover, D and Heaton-Armstrong, A, 'The questioning Code revamped' [1991] Crim LR 232, with reference to the revision of Code C.

42 See Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech AHA [1986] AC 112, HL (non-statutory administrative guidance by government departments to subordinate authorities is not as a general rule subject to judicial review). Applicability of this rule to circulars directed to the police was confirmed in Home Secretary ex p Westminster Press Ltd (1991) the Guardian, 12 February.

43 For discussion of the development of this offence, see [1982] PL 558; (1983) MLR 662; [1983] Crim LR 29; [1983] Crim LR 21.

44 See further on this point [1983] Crim LR 21, 36.

45 [1966] 2 QB 414; [1966] All ER 649; [1966] 3 WLR 17, DC.

46 In Collins v Wilcock [1984] 3 All ER 374; [1984] 1 WLR 1172 a police officer wrongly interpreted a Home Office circular; her actions in reliance on the incorrect interpretation were held to be outside the execution of her duty.

However, some actions which may be termed unlawful may be found too trivial to take the officer outside the execution of his or her duty. In Bentley v Brudzinski[47] an officer laid a hand on the shoulder of the defendant in order to detain him so as to ask further questions. The court found that in trying to prevent the defendant from returning home, the officer was acting outside the execution of his duty, but considered that not all instances in which an officer used some physical restraint would be treated in the same way. Reference was made to Donelly v Jackman[48] in which, on very similar facts, it was found that an officer was not outside the execution of his duty. All that can be said, then, is that all the circumstances of the case must be considered in determining whether an officer is within the execution of his duty and that the more significant the restraint used, the more likely it is that the officer will be outside it. Does it follow that any action of an officer which is not unlawful or contrary to official guidance will be within the execution of duty? It was found in Coffin v Smith[49] that any action within the officer's duty as a 'keeper of the peace' would be within his or her duty. Thus, an officer does not need to point to a specific requirement to perform a particular duty imposed by superiors, but equally, some actions which are not unlawful would seem to fall outside his duty.

Secondly, it must be shown that the defendant did an act which made it more difficult for the officer to carry out her or his duty. Physically attempting to prevent an arrest, as in Hills v Ellis,[50] will satisfy this test. This is not to imply that a physical act must occur, but that the police must actually be impeded in some way. In Lewis v Cox[51] a persistent inquiry as to where an arrested friend was being taken was held to amount to obstruction. The defendant opened the door of the police van, clearly preventing it from driving off, in order to make the inquiry after being told to desist. The ruling in Ricketts v Cox[52] that a refusal to answer questions accompanied by abuse was obstruction may delineate the lowest level of behaviour which may be termed obstructive. According to Rice v Connolly, a refusal to answer questions does not amount to obstruction; therefore, the abuse alone must have constituted the obstruction. This decision, which has been widely criticised,[53] is perhaps hard to reconcile with Bentley v Brudzinski and possibly interpreted the meaning of obstruction too widely.

It must, finally, be shown, following Lewis v Cox, that the defendant behaved wilfully in the sense that he acted deliberately with the knowledge and intention that he would obstruct the police officer. A defendant may be 'wilful' even though his purpose is to pursue some private objective of his own, rather than to obstruct the officer, so long as his act is deliberate and he realises that it will in fact impede the officer. This 47 [1982] Crim LR 825; (1982) The Times, 3 and 11 March.

48 (1970) Cr App R 229; [1970] 1 WLR 562.
49 (1980) Cr App R 221.
50 [1983] QB 680; [1983] 1 All ER 667.
51 (1985) Cr App R 1.
52 (1981) Cr App R 298; see commentary by Birch, D, 'Confessions and confusions under the 1984 Act' [1989] Crim LR 95; Smith, JC and Hogan, J, Criminal Law, 1988, p 394; Lidstone, K, [1983] Crim LR 29, pp 33–35.
53 See Williams, G Textbook of Criminal Law, 1983, Stevens and Sons, p 204; Lidstone, K [1983] Crim LR 29, pp 33–35.

will be the case, according to Hills v Ellis, even if the purpose of the defendant is to help the officer.[54]

If a person physically resists an arrest or stop in the belief that it is unlawful, he may incur liability under the offence of assault on a constable in the execution of duty which now arises under s 89(1) of the Police Act 1996. Liability may arise even though the defendant is unaware that the person he is assaulting is a police officer.[55] This is strange, since the only justification for creating an area of liability in addition to common law assault and battery would seem to be that there is greater culpability in striking an officer rather than any other individual owing to the officer's special position as keeper of the peace. However, if the defendant believes that unlawful force is being used against him, he can avail himself of the defence of self-defence, although according to Albert v Lavin,[56] the belief in the need to act in self-defence must be based on reasonable grounds. This limitation was not accepted by the Court of Appeal in Gladstone Williams:[57] it was found that an honest belief would be sufficient. However, it appears that if the honest belief is arrived at through intoxication, the facts will be considered as an objective observer would have perceived them to be.[58] Apart from the assault, the other elements will be interpreted as for obstruction.

2 Stop and search powers

Introduction[59]

The PACE stop and search powers were meant to maintain a fair balance between the interest of society, as represented by the police, in crime control and national security, and the interest of the citizen in personal liberty. Under the due process model, detention short of arrest – usually, although not invariably, exercised in the form of stop and search powers – should be based on reasonable suspicion relating to the specific actions of an individual. Under the crime control model, such detention is viewed as an investigative tool which should be based on general police experience; inhibitory rules should be kept to a minimum in order to allow police officers to act on instinct; police discretion should be the guiding principle. The use of such powers is currently viewed as a necessary part of effective modern policing. It has been argued that much policing is reactive; it is initiated by civilians[60] and therefore the nature of stop and search powers assumes 54 Cf Wilmott v Atack [1977] QB 498; [1976] 3 All ER 794.

55 Forbes (1865) 10 Cox CC 362; for criticism, see Williams, G Textbook of Criminal Law, 1983, p 200.

56 [1982] AC 546; [1981] 3 All ER 878, HL. See (1972) 88 LQR 246 on the use of self-defence in these circumstances.

57 (1983) Cr App R 276; see commentary [1984] Crim LR 164.

58 See O'Connor [1991] Crim LR 135.

59 For further comment on PACE and the Terrorism Act 2000, and on the relevant provisions under the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, see Sanders, A and Young, R, Criminal Justice, 3rd edn, 2007, Chapter 2; Ashworth, A, The Criminal Process, 3rd edn, 2005; Feldman, D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 2nd edn, 2002, Chapters 5 and 9; Zander, M, The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, 2003; Home Office Stop and Search Manual, 2005; Lustgarten, L, 'The future of stop and search' [2003] Crim LR 603.

60 See Shapland, J and Vagg, J, Policing by the Public, 1988, Routledge.

less significance, but this argument is open to question.[61] However, at the present time the growth of intelligence-led policing[62] especially in the context of terrorism, has led to a more proactive stance, which is tending to enhance the importance of stop and search powers. The powers represent less of an infringement of liberty than an arrest, but on the other hand their exercise may create a sense of grievance and of violation of personal privacy. Such feelings may contribute to the alienation of the police from the community, leading to a breakdown in law and order expressed in its most extreme form in rioting,[63] and otherwise in a general lack of co-operation with the police, affecting the acquisition of intelligence. Thus, the extensiveness of stop and search powers may tell us something about the extent to which UK society values individual liberty, but it is also clear that this is a complex issue: too great an infringement of liberty may be as likely to result ultimately in less effective crime control as in too great a restriction of police powers.

The use of these powers remains a contentious matter that continues to attract public attention, especially as it has frequently been suggested that they may be used in a discriminatory fashion. While it now appears incontrovertible that racial discrimination affects their use, the extent to which this is the case remains controversial.[64] Their recorded use has more than trebled since PACE came into force in 1986[65] and, as indicated below, a large number of further powers have been introduced in the post-PACE period. One factor influencing the rise in their use may have been the introduction of ‘zero tolerance’ policies in the mid-1990s. The efficacy of such powers is debatable. Only around 10%–14% of stops led to an arrest and only around 3% to a charge.[66] These figures do not include stops which did not lead to a search, or voluntary stops, and therefore the percentage of stops leading to a charge must be lower than this. There are, of course, other methods of measuring the crime control value of stop and search powers; in particular, they have some value in terms of information-gathering[67] and, more controversially, as a means of asserting police authority on the streets.

This proliferation of usage and of powers post-PACE was not accompanied by a full official review of their crime control value or adverse due process impact[68] until the issues were raised in relation to the Lawrence case in the MacPherson Report in 1999.[69] Owing to its remit, they did not form a central focus of the Report; in so far as powers to detain short of arrest were considered, the concern centred on the question of institutionalised racism in relation to their use. The part which such powers might play in miscarriages of justice and their general links with other aspects of policing, 61 In 1993–94, 24% of arrests resulted from proactive policing including stopping and searching: Phillips, C and Brown, D, Home Office Research Study No 185, 1998. Sanders and Young, op. cit., fn 1, 2000, p 70 argue that in future, stopping and searching may play a greater part in arrests.

62 See Chapter 10, p 1032 et seq.

63 See, on this point, Lord Scarman, The Brixton Disorders, Cmnd 8427, 1981; McConville, M, ‘Search of persons and premises’ [1983] Crim LR 604–14.

64 See Sanders, A and Young, R, Criminal Justice (2007), Chapter 2.3 and pp 1124–26 below.

65 Home Office Statistical Bulletin 21/93; Statistical Bulletin 27/97; see further Sanders and Young, Criminal Justice (2007), pp 98–101.

66 Home Office Statistical Bulletin 21/93.

67 Home Office Stop and Search Manual, 2005, 28.

68 They were outside the remit of the Runciman Royal Commission.

69 Cm 4262-I. (1999).

especially the interview, has hardly had an airing in recent official reports.[70] As discussed in Chapter 12, the possibility that informal street contacts may influence and structure the formal interview is especially significant in the post-HRA era.[71]

As this chapter will indicate, the grant of further powers post-PACE has not been accompanied by a concomitant strengthening of the protection for the due process rights affecting arrest and detention. One of the key structuring constraints identified above as intended to protect due process under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 was the requirement of reasonable suspicion. This requirement has been eroded in the post-PACE developments; it has been dropped from the more recently introduced special powers under the CJPOA, and under the Terrorism Act 2000, s 44 it continues to be unnecessary in respect of terrorist suspects. There are now a large number of stop and search powers which are divided into those based on reasonable suspicion and those requiring an authorisation, but without a reasonable suspicion requirement.[72] This distinction is explored further below. One problem has, however, been addressed: until 2003 the prevalence of voluntary searches continued to undermine the reasonable suspicion requirement, and while this problem was recognised post-PACE, no serious attempt was made to address it until revised Code A came into force in 2003.

The PACE stop and search power

There was no general power at common law to detain without the subject's consent in the absence of specific statutory authority.[73] Instead, there was a miscellany of such powers, many of which were superseded by PACE. A large number, however, such as the power to search for firearms under s 47 of the Firearms Act 1968, continued to subsist alongside the PACE power. The Phillips Royal Commission, whose report influenced PACE,[74] recommended the introduction of a new general power, but accepted the need to maintain a balance between the interest of society as represented by the police in crime control, and the interest of the citizen in personal liberty and privacy. This balance was sought to be achieved partly by introducing a reasonable suspicion element into the PACE powers.

Under s 1 of PACE for the first time a general power to stop[75] and search persons (s 1(1)) or vehicles (s 1(2))[76] was conferred on police constables. It arises if the constable 70 E.g., the Consultation Paper on Terrorism, Cm 4178, 1998, which recommended the retention of counter-terrorist stop and search powers, failed to consider these matters, and made no reference to research it might have been based on.

71 It should be noted that the use of the stop and search powers is not necessarily linked to arrest; arrests may occur for reasons unlinked to the apparent basis for the stop and search: Ayres, M and Murray, L, Arrests for Recorded Crime 2004/5, 2005.

72 A non-exhaustive list of current statutory stop and search powers to which Code A applies is given in Annex A to Code A (2006 version).

73 For a full list of the powers arising from 16 statutes, see RCCP Report 1981.

74 Cmnd 8092 (1981).

75 It should be noted that the police do not need to search the suspect once he or she has been stopped; they may decide not to. Nevertheless, reasonable suspicion that stolen goods or articles are being carried must arise before the stop can be made. Under Code A 2.11: 'There is no power to stop or detain a person in order to find grounds for a search.'

76 A power to stop vehicles which is not dependent on reasonable suspicion arises under s 163 of the Road Traffic Act 1988. PACE 1984, s 4 regulates it when it is used as the basis for a general road check.

forms the reasonable suspicion that stolen goods, or prohibited articles (including offensive weapons)[77] will be found by searching the suspect. It may be that the suspect appears to be in innocent possession of the goods or articles; this does not affect the power to stop, although it would affect the power to arrest; in this sense, the power to stop is broader than the arrest power. Section 4 of PACE enables the police to use their powers under the Road Traffic Act 1988 to set up roadblocks and to stop and search any vehicle to see whether it contains a wanted person.

Under s 1(6), if an article is found which appears to be stolen or prohibited, the officer can seize it. The s 1 power may be exercised in any place to which the public, or a section of it, have access (s 1(1)(a)) or in any other place 'to which people have ready access at the time when [the constable] proposes to exercise the power but which is not a dwelling' (s 1(1)(b)). Powers to enter a dwelling arise under ss 17 and 18, but an officer can search a suspect in a garden or yard or other land 'occupied with or used for the purposes of a dwelling' (assuming, of course, that the provision of s 1 as to reasonable suspicion are fulfilled) if it appears that the person does not reside in the dwelling or have the permission of the owner to be there (s 1(4)).

This general power to stop, search and seize is balanced in two ways. First, the concept of reasonable suspicion allows it to be exercised only when quite a high level of suspicion exists. Secondly, under s 2, the police officer must provide the person to be searched with certain information. These requirements are discussed below.

Power to search for drugs

Section 23 of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 provides a stop and search power which is very frequently invoked. Under s 23, a constable may stop and search a person whom the constable has reasonable grounds to suspect is in possession of a controlled drug. This power may be exercised anywhere, unlike the power under s 1 of PACE; thus, persons on private premises may be searched once police officers are lawfully on the premises. The provisions as to reasonable suspicion will be interpreted in accordance with Code A. Code A and ss 2 and 3 of PACE apply to this power as they do to all the other statutory stop and search powers unless specific exceptions are made (see below).

Reasonable suspicion

Reasonable suspicion is a flexible, broad and uncertain concept. Code of Practice A on Stop and Search, as revised in 2006,[78] and applying to all statutory search powers,

77 Under s 1(7), the articles are '(a) offensive weapons or (b) articles (i) made or adapted for use in the course of or in connection with an offence to which this sub-paragraph applies; or (ii) intended by the person having it with him for such use by him or by some other person'. Under s 1(8), the offences to which s 1(7)(b)(i) above applies are: '(a) burglary; (b) theft; (c) offences under s 12 of the Theft Act 1968; (d) offences under s 15 of that Act.' Section 1(8A) applies 'to [any article which falls within] s 139 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988'. Under s 1(9), offensive weapon means 'any article (a) made or adapted for use for causing injury to persons or (b) intended by the person having it with him for such use by him or by some other person.'

78 It was revised in 1991, 1995, 1997, 1999, 2003.

sets out to explain what it means. Paragraphs 2.2–2.11 Code A apply to searches dependent on reasonable suspicion. Currently, para 2.2 of Code A provides that it is not enough for a police officer to have a hunch that a person has committed or is about to commit an offence; there must be a concrete basis for this suspicion which relates to the particular person in question and could be evaluated by an objective observer. Para 2.2 provides:

> There must be an objective basis for that suspicion based on facts, information, and/or intelligence which are relevant to the likelihood of finding an article of a certain kind or, in the case of searches under section 43 of the Terrorism Act 2000, to the likelihood that the person is a terrorist.

Paragraph 2.2 not only explains the objective nature of reasonable suspicion, but forbids stereotyping in arriving at such suspicion:

> a person's race, age, appearance, or the fact that the person is known to have a previous conviction, cannot be used alone or in combination with each other as the reason for searching that person. Reasonable suspicion cannot be based on generalisations or stereotypical images of certain groups or categories of people as more likely to be involved in criminal activity . . .

In particular it provides: 'A person's religion cannot be considered as reasonable grounds for suspicion.' That provision is obviously intended to deter the police from targeting Muslims in the wake of 9/11 and 7/7. Paragraph 2.4 provides:

> . . . reasonable suspicion should normally be linked to accurate and current intelligence or information, such as information describing an article being carried, a suspected offender, or a person who has been seen carrying a type of article known to have been stolen recently from premises in the area. Searches based on accurate and current intelligence or information are more likely to be effective.

Paragraph 2.3 provides:

> Reasonable suspicion can sometimes exist without specific information or intelligence and on the basis of some level of generalisation stemming from the behaviour of a person. For example, if an officer encounters someone on the street at night who is obviously trying to hide something, the officer may (depending on the other surrounding circumstances) base such suspicion on the fact that this kind of behaviour is often linked to stolen or prohibited articles being carried.

Thus, if based on powers requiring reasonable suspicion, the decision to stop and search must – according to Code A – be based on all the facts which bear on the likelihood that an article of a certain kind will be found.

The most significant change brought about when Code A was revised in 1991 was the omission of the requirement that the suspicion should be of the same level as that necessary to effect an arrest.[79] The original intention behind including this provision was to stress the high level of suspicion required before a stop and search could take place; this change, therefore, tended to remove some of that emphasis and could be taken to imply that there are two levels of suspicion, the level required under Code A being the lower. However, although this omission may convey such a message to police officers, it may not make much difference to the way the police actually operate stop and search.

When Code A was revised in 1997,[80] some departure from the 'objective grounds for suspicion' stance was effected, and this was carried through into the current, 2006, version. Paragraph 2.6 allows an officer to take into account information that members of a particular gang habitually carry knives, other weapons or have drugs in their possession; where a person wears an item of clothing or other insignia suggesting that he belongs to such a gang, that may give rise to reasonable suspicion allowing that person to be stopped and searched.

In practice, despite the wordy strictures of Code A, there is little evidence that reasonable suspicion acts as a constraint if police officers wish to stop and search without it.[81] Research in the area suggests that there is a tendency to view reasonable suspicion as a flexible concept which may denote a very low level of suspicion.[82] In 2000 Sanders and Young concluded, having reviewed the relevant research, that 'the legal understanding of reasonable suspicion plays little part in officers' thought processes or decision-making',[83] although they also suggested that PACE may have brought about some change in 'cop culture'; young officers may now be taught to act 'according to the book', as opposed to acting instinctively. In 2006 they concluded that there was some evidence of this, but that the Code A guidance did not have a very significant impact on police behaviour, compared to the influence of established cop culture.[84] 'Reasonable' suspicion, they find, does not connect very strongly with 'police suspicion'.

The case law is extremely meagre and unhelpful, but suggests that a highly imprecise and inconsistent standard is maintained. In Slade,[85] the suspect was close to the house of a well-known drug dealer; on noticing the officer, he put his hand in his pocket and smiled. This was found to constitute reasonable suspicion. However, in Black v DPP,[86] the fact of visiting a well-known drug dealer was found to be insufficient as the basis for finding reasonable suspicion. In Francis[87] the police purported to have reasonable suspicion to stop and search on the basis that the person in question was driving in an area known for drug use, with a passenger. The person had been stopped previously and her passenger at the time had been found to be in possession of drugs. Reasonable suspicion was not found to be established. This handful of cases clearly does very little 79 Previously contained in Annex B, para 4 of Code A.

80 SI 1997/1159.
81 See Foster, J, 'Police Cultures' in Newburn, T, (ed) The Handbook of Policing, 2003, Willan.
82 See Dixon (1989) 17 Int J Soc Law 185–206.
83 Sanders and Young, op. cit., fn 1, 2nd edn, 2000, p 43.
84 Sanders and Young, op. cit., fn 1, 3rd edn, 2007, pp 71–73.
85 LEXIS CO/1678/96 (1996).
86 (1995) unreported, 11 May.
87 (1992) LEXIS CO/1434/91.

to define the concept of reasonable suspicion, although it could be taken to indicate that extremely vague and broad bases for suspicion will not be sufficient.

Counter-terrorist stop and search powers

Section 44 of the Terrorism Act 2000 (TA) provides a power to stop and search without reasonable suspicion once an authorisation has been given. Section 43 provides a power that, unlike the s 1 PACE power, is not based on reasonable suspicion that a person is carrying an item, but on reasonable suspicion of being a terrorist. These powers are not new; they are based on powers provided under the previous counter-terrorist legislation. The Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989, as amended (PTA), and the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996, as amended (EPA), contained special powers providing for the detaining, questioning and searching of pedestrians and vehicles for articles of use in carrying out acts of terrorism and to prevent terrorist attacks. The powers under ss 43–47 of the TA are based on the PTA and EPA powers and, as Chapter 14 explains, they can potentially be applied to a far wider range of people under s 1 TA owing to the very broad definition of 'terrorism' that s 1 introduced.[88] It may be noted that under s 116(2) of the TA, the powers conferred under the Act to stop persons are deemed to include powers to stop vehicles, and it is an offence to fail to stop a vehicle.

Section 44 – stop and search without reasonable suspicion

The s 44 power has a number of controversial and significant features. Not only does it arise independently of reasonable suspicion relating to objects suspected of being carried, or of reasonable grounds to believe that acts of terrorism may occur in the are covered by the authorisation, but it is an offence in itself to refuse to comply with the search. It is not an offence under PACE to refuse to comply with a s 1 search, or to obstruct it, although to do so would probably amount to the offence of obstructing a constable under s 89(2) of the Police Act 1996.[89] Authorisations apply to a specific area and are for a maximum of 28 days, but that period can be continually renewed. Authorisations can be renewed for a further period or periods of up to 28 days at a time. The authorisation has to stipulate both the area to which it applies and the period, not exceeding 28 days, for which it will remain in force. Under s 44(3) 'an authorisation under sub-section (1) or (2) may be given only if the person giving it considers it expedient for the prevention of acts of terrorism'. The word 'expedient' is obviously significant – it is not necessary to demonstrate that terrorist acts are likely to occur or more likely to occur in the area covered by the authorisation than in other areas. Since the term 'expedient' is used, there is no requirement that the officer granting the authorisation should reasonably believe that it is necessary in order to prevent the commission of acts of terrorism. The term clearly connotes a less rigorous requirement.

88 See Chapter 14, pp 1377–81.
89 Reproducing the Police Act 1964, s 51(3).

If such an authorisation is in force, an officer can stop any person or vehicle within the specified locality in order to look for articles which could be used for the commission of acts of terrorism. The area may be very large – it can include the whole of the police area in question, or part of it. The authorisation must be given by a very senior police officer; in London the officer must be of the rank of Commander or above; outside London he or she must be of the rank of Assistant Chief Constable or above. Reproducing ss 13A(4) and 13B(3) PTA, the TA provisions expressly confirm that reasonable suspicion remains irrelevant, once the authorisation is in place. Section 45(1)(a) provides that the powers under s 44 'may be exercised only for the purpose of searching for articles of a kind which could be used in connection with terrorism', but in order to ensure that this is not interpreted as a limiting requirement, s 45(1)(b) provides that the powers 'may be exercised whether or not the constable has grounds for suspecting the presence of articles of that kind'.

One difference between the TA and PTA powers is that vehicle stop and search authorisations, as well as pedestrian ones, will have to be confirmed by the Secretary of State within 48 hours of their being made, or they will cease to have effect. This appears to be a gesture in the direction of due process, since it rectifies the anomaly of the difference between the exercise of the powers in respect of pedestrians and those in respect of vehicles, and provides, at least theoretically, a level of oversight in relation to both.[90] An authorisation confirmed by the Secretary of State, can be renewed at the end of 28 days under s 46(7) which provides: 'An authorisation may be renewed in writing by the person who gave it or by a person who could have given it; and sub-sections (1) to (6) shall apply as if a new authorisation were given on each occasion on which the authorisation is renewed.' Thus, theoretically, authorisations can be continually renewed, depending on the intervention of the Secretary of State. The tendency of this provision may be in effect to leave the authorisation power largely in police hands alone.

If a person fails to stop and submit to a search[91] when asked by a constable acting under s 44 of the TA to do so, or wilfully obstructs the constable in exercising these 90 Under the Major government, additional stop and search powers were added to the PTA. Section 81(1) of the CJPOA 1994 amended the PTA by inserting into it s 13A which provided that an officer of the rank of Commander as regards the Metropolitan area or the City of London, or of the rank of Assistant Chief Constable as regards any other police area, could authorise officers to stop and search vehicles and their occupants within a particular locality if he or she considered that it was expedient to do so to prevent acts of terrorism. The PTA was further amended by the Prevention of Terrorism (Additional Powers) Act 1996 to include a number of further stop and search powers. The government considered that introduction of the powers was necessary because of the threat of IRA activity on the British mainland in spring 1996. These included a power under s 1, which inserted s 13B into the PTA, to stop and search citizens in designated areas without reasonable suspicion. The authorisation requirements were the same as those under s 13A, but for the added requirement that the authorisation must be confirmed by the Secretary of State within 48 hours. If it was not so confirmed, it ceased to have effect (s 13A(8)), but if confirmed it remained in force, and subsisted for up to 28 days. Refusing to comply with the search was an offence carrying a penalty higher than those which could be used, if necessary, under the general offence of obstructing a constable. The powers under ss 13A and B formed the basis for the powers now arising under ss 44–46 of the Terrorism Act 2000, which replaced them.

91 The search only authorises a constable to require a person to remove headgear, footwear, outer coat, jacket or gloves (Code A para 4A).

powers, he or she will be liable to a fine of £5,000 or a prison sentence of six months, or both, under s 47. Thus, if someone who is not involved in terrorism resists a search in a designated area, and is, for example, found to be carrying a small amount of cannabis, he or she might in theory face a prison sentence, although the offence committed – possession of cannabis – would not usually lead to the imposition of such a sentence and might well be dealt with by way of caution.

Section 44 is clearly a particularly controversial provision; it has been used to impose an authorisation on the whole of London ever since it came into force. It has already been suggested that the reasonable suspicion requirement of a number of powers, including s 1 PACE, does not have a strong inhibitory effect. However, s 44 provides police officers with an even broader discretion, and clearly there is a danger that it could be used in a racially discriminatory fashion. Sections 44–47 do not spell out what a police officer must have in mind before conducting a search; the power is therefore non-transparent and not based on objectively justifiable criteria. As discussed below, Code A makes certain somewhat contradictory gestures in the direction of curbing the broad discretion provided.

It appears that, at Strasbourg, the short period of detention represented by a stop and search may be sufficient to constitute a deprivation of liberty.[92] However, the decision of the House of Lords in R (on the application of Gillan) v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis[93] indicates that this has not been accepted domestically. The first appellant, Mr Gillan, came to London in September 2003 to protest peacefully against an arms fair being held at the ExCel Centre, Docklands, in east London. He was riding his bicycle near the Centre when he was stopped by two male police officers. They searched him and his rucksack and found nothing incriminating. They gave him a copy of the Stop/Search Form 5090 which recorded that he was stopped and searched under section 44 of the 2000 Act. The search was said to be for 'articles concerned in terrorism'. The whole incident lasted about twenty minutes. The second appellant, Ms Quinton, was an accredited freelance journalist and went to the Centre in September 2003 to film the protests taking place against the arms fair. She was stopped by a female police officer near the Centre and asked to explain why she had appeared out of some bushes. Ms Quinton was wearing a photographer's jacket and carrying a small bag and a video camera. She explained she was a journalist and produced her press passes. The officer searched her, found nothing incriminating, and gave her a copy of Form 5090. Ms Quinton estimated that the search lasted for thirty minutes, the police five.

The appellants argued, inter alia, that the stops and searches had constituted a breach of Article 5, Sched 1 HRA. Article 5 provides:

> 1 Everyone has the right to liberty and security of the person. No one shall be deprived of his liberty save in the following cases and in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law: . . . (b) the lawful arrest or detention of a person for non-compliance with the lawful order of a court or in order to secure the fulfilment of any obligation prescribed by law . . .

92 X v Austria (1979) 18 DR 154.
93 [2006] UKHL 12.

The other exceptions were deemed not relevant. Lord Bingham, who gave the leading judgment, sought to determine firstly whether the stops and searches were 'a deprivation of liberty' in Art 5(1) terms. He found:

> . . . the clearest exposition of principle by the Strasbourg court is to be found in Guzzardi v Italy,[94] an exposition repeatedly cited in later cases. In paragraphs 92–93 the Court observed: '92. The Court recalls that in proclaiming the "right to liberty", paragraph 1 of Article 5 is contemplating the physical liberty of the person; its aim is to ensure that no one should be dispossessed of this liberty in an arbitrary fashion. As was pointed out by those appearing before the Court, the paragraph is not concerned with mere restrictions on liberty of movement; such restrictions are governed by Article 2 of Protocol No 4 which has not been ratified by Italy. In order to determine whether someone has been "deprived of his liberty" within the meaning of Article 5, the starting point must be his concrete situation and account must be taken of a whole range of criteria such as the type, duration, effects and manner of implementation of the measure in question . . . 93. The difference between deprivation of and restriction upon liberty is nonetheless merely one of degree or intensity, and not one of nature or substance.'

Lord Bingham found (in para 25) that there was no deprivation of liberty in Art 5(1) terms:

> It is accordingly clear, as was held in HL v United Kingdom,[95] that:
>
> > 'in order to determine whether there has been a deprivation of liberty, the starting-point must be the concrete situation of the individual concerned and account must be taken of a whole range of factors arising in a particular case such as the type, duration, effects and manner of implementation of the measure in question.'
>
> I would accept that when a person is stopped and searched under sections 44–45 the procedure has the features on which the appellants rely. On the other hand, the procedure will ordinarily be relatively brief. The person stopped will not be arrested, handcuffed, confined or removed to any different place. I do not think, in the absence of special circumstances, such a person should be regarded as being detained in the sense of confined or kept in custody, but more properly of being detained in the sense of kept from proceeding or kept waiting. There is no deprivation of liberty. That was regarded by the Court of Appeal as 'the better view' (para 46), and I agree.

These findings leave some leeway, but not very much, for finding that in different circumstances Art 5(1) was engaged. Lord Bingham went on to consider the question whether, had there been a deprivation of liberty, it would have been justified as within Art 5(1)(b). He found that the statutory regime and the authorisation itself were 'prescribed by law' and that:

94 (1980) 3 EHRR 333.
95 (2004) 40 EHRR 761, at para 89.

> the respondents bring themselves within the exception, for the public are in my opinion subject to a clear obligation not to obstruct a constable exercising a lawful power to stop and search for articles which could be used for terrorism and any detention is in order to secure effective fulfilment of that obligation.

Continual renewal of the authorisation was found acceptable under Art 5 which was thus deemed inapplicable, but even if it had been found to be applicable, the stops and searches would have been justified. This judgment, therefore, found not merely that the stops and searches were justified in Art 5 terms, but gave no encouragement to the raising of Art 5 arguments in relation to stop and search, in future. It is hard to see that he left the question of the engagement of Art 5(1) by stops and searches open since he found that there was no deprivation of liberty in unambiguous terms, but it could be suggested that since the case was considered and determined under Art 5(1)(b), that question could be reraised in future.

Section 43 – stop and search on reasonable suspicion of being a terrorist Section 43 TA provides:

> A constable may stop and search a person whom he reasonably suspects to be a terrorist to discover whether he has in his possession anything which may constitute evidence that he is a terrorist.

'Being a terrorist' is not in itself an offence under the TA (unless the 'terrorist' group in question is also proscribed), although some, but not all, actions falling within the definition of terrorism in s 1 of the TA are coterminous with existing offences. Therefore, this power is not dependent on suspicion of commission of an offence or of carrying prohibited articles. As indicated above, para 2.2 Code A makes that clear.

Section 15(3) and (4) of the PTA empowered a police officer to stop and search anyone who appeared to him to be liable for arrest under s 14 of the Act and to search him for anything which might confirm the officer's suspicions as to his involvement in terrorism. Under s 14(1)(b), in order to arrest, a constable had to have reasonable grounds for suspecting that a person was 'concerned in the preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism connected with the affairs of Northern Ireland or any other act' of non-domestic terrorism.[96] The s 15 power was partially influenced by the reasonable suspicion requirement. It did not depend on the need to show reasonable suspicion that the suspect was carrying the items which might be searched for, but the officer had to have reasonable grounds for suspecting that the suspect was liable to arrest under s 14. These stop and search powers were reproduced, but broadened, under the Terrorism Act 2000.

Other powers – ports and border controls

There were also powers in s 16 of and para 4(2) of Sched 5 to the PTA, which empowered the police and others to stop, question and search people, vehicles and unaccompanied freight, which were about to enter or leave Great Britain or Northern Ireland, to determine whether they had been concerned in the commission, preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism. These powers formed part of the 'ports and border controls' contained in the PTA. They are reproduced in Sched 7 of the TA and again, they are not dependent on showing reasonable suspicion.

96 See below, p 1147.

Special powers to prevent anticipated local violence

Section 60 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, as amended by s 8 of the Knives Act 1997, provides police officers with a further stop and search power which does not depend on showing reasonable suspicion of particular wrongdoing on the part of an individual. An officer of at least the rank of inspector can authorise the stop and search of any person or vehicle within a particular locality if he or she reasonably believes that incidents involving 'serious violence' may take place in that area and that authorisation is expedient in order to prevent their occurrence. The authorisation may apply to a period not exceeding 24 hours, but it can be renewed for a further 24 hours if such an authorisation is in force. An officer may stop anyone within the specified locality in order to look for offensive weapons or dangerous instruments whether or not there any grounds for suspecting that such articles are being carried. In contrast to s 1 of PACE, failure to stop is an offence under s 60(8).

Section 60 was amended by s 25 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 to provide a power under s 60(4A)(a) to demand the removal of a face covering 'if the constable reasonably believes that person is wearing [it] wholly or mainly for the purpose of concealing his identity'. Section 25 also amended s 60 to provide a further, separate, power under s 60(4A)(b) to 'seize any item which the constable reasonably believes any person intends to wear wholly or mainly for that purpose'. This power was revised by s 94 Anti-Terrorism Crime and Security Act 2001 to add a new s 60AA allowing a constable to require a person to remove any item that he reasonably believes the person is wearing wholly or mainly to conceal his identity. The items can also be seized on that basis (s 60AA(2)). This is not, formally, a power to stop and search for face coverings or other items that could be used to conceal identity. The constable must be acting under another power or the person must be carrying the covering (or item which could be used as a covering) openly. It is an arrestable[97] offence under s 60(8)(b) to fail to remove a face covering. These provisions have clear implications for public protest, which are discussed in Chapter 8.[98] While, on their face, they do not create a new power of stop and search, they may do so in practice since, once an authorisation is in force under s 60, a constable does not require reasonable suspicion that dangerous weapons or instruments will be found in order to stop and search. However, the provisions are not covered by Code A.[99]

Section 163 of the Road Traffic Act 1988

A very broad power to stop vehicles arises under s 163 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 (RTA). Its ambit remains unclear. Section 163 provides a constable in uniform with 97 The 1998 Act, s 27(1) amends PACE 1984, s 24 for this purpose.

98 See p 673.
99 See DPP v Avery [2003] 1 Cr App R 31.

power to stop vehicles, which appears to be unqualified as to purpose[100] and does not depend upon reasonable suspicion. The only limitation is that it must not be used oppressively.[101] If s 163 is of general application, s 1(2) of PACE appears to provide a power to search a vehicle and to detain it for that purpose once it has been stopped under s 163.[102] If s 163 is concerned only with traffic offences, s 1(2) must contain an implied power to stop a vehicle in order to detain it for a search. The Police Reform Act 2002, s 49 provides for a power of arrest for failing to stop.

Use of the counter-terrorist, road traffic and special powers

It is notable that no judicial body is involved in the pre-search supervision of the counter-terrorist and special powers. All of them are subject to executive supervision only, either by the police themselves or, in the case of s 44 TA, by the Home Secretary. These powers discard a key due process safeguard and therefore might be justified only if they are likely to have real value in terms of curbing criminal or terrorist activity. In debate on the 1996 Bill, Michael Howard was asked how many arrests and convictions had followed use of the existing s 13A power to stop and search. In reply, he said that there had been 1,746 stops and 1,695 searches of vehicles, 2,373 searches of persons as occupants of vehicles in the five Metropolitan police areas and 8,142 stops and 6,854 searches of vehicles and 40 searches of persons as occupants of vehicles within the Heathrow perimeter. These had together led to two arrests under the PTA and to 66 other arrests.[103] These figures are clearly telling. They suggest that stopping and searching without reasonable suspicion leads to an extremely low level of arrests and therefore may not be the most effective use of police resources. This very low level of arrests may be compared with the general level flowing from stop and search with reasonable suspicion, which is now around 10%.[104] This figure itself is low (and may not be reliable), but nevertheless suggests that stop and search with reasonable suspicion (even though that concept may be interpreted very flexibly) is more productive on the face of it in crime control terms than stop and search without it. Howard, however, also made the point, although unsupported by specific evidence, that this does not represent the whole picture, since would-be terrorists may be diverted from their activities, information may be gathered and weapons may be found.

The figures given above also suggest that in so far as these powers do have a value, it lies partly in their (albeit low) level of apprehension of persons engaged in non-terrorist offences. If one of the objects of introducing the powers under s 44 TA was in reality to curb drug trafficking, it should have been debated in Parliament on that basis. The 1999 revision of Code A introduced the requirement under para 1.16 that the ss 13A and B powers should 'not be used for stop and search for reasons unconnected with terrorism', and this provision is now contained in para 2.24 (2006 version). Para 2.24 provides:

100 See HC Standing Committee E, Col 339, 13 December 1983.
101 See Stewart v Crowe [1999] SLT 899.
102 This would confirm Lodwick v Sanders [1985] 1 All ER 577.
103 HC Deb Col 211, 2 April 1996.
104 Wilkins, G and Addicot, C, Home Office Statistical Bulletin 2/99, 1999.

> When an authorisation under section 44 is given, a constable in uniform may exercise the powers: (a) only for the purpose of searching for articles of a kind which could be used in connection with terrorism; (b) whether or not there are any grounds for suspecting the presence of such articles.

However, as discussed below, this provision is virtually unenforceable. Para 2.26 Code A provides:

> The powers under sections 43 and 44 of the Terrorism Act 2000 allow a constable to search only for articles which could be used for terrorist purposes. However, this would not prevent a search being carried out under other powers if, in the course of exercising these powers, the officer formed reasonable grounds for suspicion.

The provision of para 2.26 means that while the police have not been given a blanket power to search for e.g. drugs without reasonable suspicion, they can in practice now do so, if an authorisation under s 44 is in force. The reasonable suspicion required could presumably be aroused by finding the drug (assuming that it could be found without requiring removal of more than outer clothing), or by efforts of the subject to conceal it.

Section 44 TA, s 60 CJPOA, which may allow near-random stopping once an authorisation is in force, may, as indicated, result not in arrests for terrorist offences or offences of serious violence, but for drug-related or other, more minor offences. It has often been observed that arrests may well be entirely unrelated to the reason for the original encounter with the police. These powers are therefore objectionable in the sense that they have been adopted apparently in response to near-crisis situations, whereas they may be used in situations which would not alone have justified their adoption. Since the wide powers under s 60 of the 1994 Act and s 44 of the Act of 2000 are not subject to limitation flowing from the concept of reasonable suspicion, they represent a departure from the principle that only an individual who has given rise to such suspicion due to his or her actions should suffer the infringement of liberty represented by a stop and search.

Discriminatory use of stop and search powers

All the stop and search powers discussed could be used in a discriminatory fashion, and this is especially true of the powers that do not depend on showing reasonable suspicion. Since all such powers, on their face, allow for stop and search on subjective grounds, they may tend to be used disproportionately against the black community. Post-PACE research has consistently suggested that stop and search powers in general are used in a discriminatory fashion[105] and in response, a rather ambiguous anti-racism

105 See Skogan, W, HO Research Study No 117, 1990 p 34; Entry into the Criminal Justice System, August 1998 and Statistics on Race and the Criminal Justice System, December 1998; MacPherson Report, 1999, Cm 4262-I. According to the report, in 1999 blacks were six times more likely than whites to be stopped; in 1998, blacks were five times more likely to be stopped than whites. See: Home Office Statistics on Race and the Criminal Justice System 2001, 2001–2; Home Office Statistics on Race and the Criminal Justice System 2003–2004, 2005. In 2000–2 stops and searches of Asians provision was introduced in the 1999 revision of Code A, and carried forward in the 2006 revision. Para 2.25 gives an initial appearance of seeking to address the problem of racist stops in stating provides:

> The selection of persons stopped under section 44 of Terrorism Act 2000 should reflect an objective assessment of the threat posed by the various terrorist groups active in Great Britain. The powers must not be used to stop and search for reasons unconnected with terrorism. Officers must take particular care not to discriminate against members of minority ethnic groups in the exercise of these powers.

But the paragraph continues:

> There may be circumstances, however, where it is appropriate for officers to take account of a person's ethnic origin in selecting persons to be stopped in response to a specific terrorist threat (for example, some international terrorist groups are associated with particular ethnic identities).

This hazily worded provision might be interpreted as legitimising racist stops and as thereby undermining the preceding words. The provision of para 2.25 indicates that in certain circumstances the police can use racial profiling as the basis for the use of the s 44 power.

In 1995, Note 1A of Code A was revised to add the requirement that 'the selection of those questioned or searched is based upon objective factors and not upon personal prejudice'. In the 2006 revision, this requirement is stated more clearly; under para 1.1:

> Powers to stop and search must be used fairly, responsibly, with respect for people being searched and without unlawful discrimination. The Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000 makes it unlawful for police officers to discriminate on the grounds of race, colour, ethnic origin, nationality or national origins when using their Powers.

Further requirements were added in subsequent revisions of Code A regarding the use of the power under s 60AA CJPOA to provide a power to demand the removal of a face covering. In the 2006 version Note 4 Code A provides:

> Many people customarily cover their heads or faces for religious reasons – for example, Muslim women, Sikh men, Sikh or Hindu women, or Rastarfarian men . . . A police officer cannot order the removal of a head or face covering except where there is reason to believe that the item is being worn by the individual wholly or mainly for the purpose of disguising identity.

increased by 40% and of black suspects by 30%; the equivalent increase for white suspects was 8%. See further Mooney, J and Young, J, 'Policing Ethnic Minorities' in Marlow and Loveday, Policing After the Stephen Lawrence Inquiry, 2000; Waddington, P et al., 'In proportion: Race and police Stop and Search' (2004) 44(6) BJ Crim 889.

It also provides that if asking such persons to remove a covering, the officer should permit this to be done out of public view.

Thus, as far as s 163 of the 1988 Act, s 60 of the CJPOA and s 44 of the TA are concerned, these requirements contained in quasi- or non-legal provisions are the only 'safeguards' against a racially or religiously stereotyped or insensitive use of these powers. As discussed below, this problem may be addressed under the HRA, while the amendments made to the Race Relations Act 1976 in 2000 by the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000 may have an impact on police practice since, as Chapter 15 explains,[106] discrimination on grounds of race in law enforcement is now covered by the 1976 Act. However, the efficacy of this provision must remain in doubt; it would seem that the plaintiff would face a near-impossible task in raising an inference that a power not based on reasonable suspicion had been used in a racially discriminatory fashion.

Apart from their human rights implications, these powers, especially those not based on reasonable suspicion, may be having a counter-productive effect. They may be aiding in the construction of certain communities as 'suspect communities'. This may tend to inhibit intelligence-gathering among such communities, and may in general promote non-co-operation with the police. The impact of stop and search sweeps on community relations has long been recognised;[107] at present it is a particular problem in the context of terrorism, given that the most effective source of information allowing for the foiling of intended bomb attacks may be the Muslim community itself.[108] The possibility of raising European Convention on Human rights arguments in respect of discriminatory searches is considered below.

Voluntary searches

Until 2003 consensual searches were permissible but the apparently voluntary basis of a large number of searches continued to be questionable.[109] Inconsistency of practice between forces was readily apparent.[110] Although such searches were apparently outlawed in Code A para 1.5 (unchanged in the 2006 version), it is possible that they are still continuing. Persons may be intimidated by police authority and may submit to a search where no power to search in fact exists. Such searches may come to light only if the suspect later raises the argument that the police had no power to search or if the suspect resists and is charged with assaulting an officer in the course of his duty.[111]

106 See pp 1508–10.

107 See: Fitzgerald, M et al., Policing for London (2002), Willan; Clark, R et al., 'Crime and Police Effectiveness', HO Research Study no 79, 1984; the study looked at the effect of broad stop and search sweeps. See further Sanders and Young, Criminal Justice, 2007, pp 107–9.

108 On 10 August 2006, 24 suspects were arrested on suspicion of plotting to blow up planes flying from Britain to the US. The original information about the plan came from the Muslim community in Britain, according to British intelligence officials (see media reports on 11 August 2006, including CNN.com) .

109 Dixon, D, Coleman, C and Bottomley, K, 'Consent and the legal regulation of policing' (1990) 17 JLS 345.

110 Certain forces, such as Bedfordshire, used a separate consent form for voluntary searches, but such practice was by no means universal. See 'Modernising the tactic: improving the use of stop and search', Policing and Reducing Crime: Briefing Note No 2, November 1999.

111 See Osman v Director of Public Prosecutions (1999) The Times, 29 September, judgment of 1 July 1999, in which Sedley LJ indicated that an initial passive response to a search would not entitle officers to assume that the subject was consenting to it.

Code A does not, in general, affect ordinary consensual contact between police officer and citizen; officers can ask members of the public to stop and can ask them questions and, at least theoretically, the citizen can refuse. Prior to 2003 'voluntary' searches were possible. However, the voluntariness of such contacts was frequently doubtful: some people might 'consent' to a search in the sense of offering no resistance to it, owing to uncertainty as to the basis or extent of the police power in question.[112] The search could then be classified as voluntary and subsequently it would be difficult, if not impossible, to determine whether such classification was justifiable. Once a search was so classified, none of the statutory or Code A safeguards had to be observed. Original Code A failed to recognise this problem, although a Home Office circular issued in December 1985[113] did recognise it. When the Codes were revised in 1991, the concerns articulated in the circular were given expression in new Notes for Guidance 1D(b) and 1E which created certain restrictions on voluntary searches. Under Note 1E, persons belonging to three of the vulnerable groups recognised throughout the Codes as requiring special treatment – juveniles, the mentally handicapped or mentally disordered[114] – could not be subject to a voluntary search at all.[115]

In 2003, and now in the 2006 revision of Code A, 'voluntary' stops and searches were forbidden, under para 1.5. This provision appears to solve the problem, but there are loop-holes in it in practice. It appears to apply only to searches and not to stops – thus voluntary stops are still possible, even if they lead to 'consensual' detention for a period of time. This appears to be implicit in para 4.12 Code A which provides:

> When an officer requests a person in a public place to account for themselves, i.e. their actions, behaviour, presence in an area or possession of anything, a record of the encounter must be completed at the time and a copy given to the person who has been questioned. The record must identify the name of the officer who has made the stop and conducted the encounter.

A stop cannot occur in order to find the grounds for a search, under Code A para 2.11, but since this provision is virtually unenforceable, as discussed below, it appears probable that the continued availability of voluntary stops significantly undermines the prohibition on voluntary searches.

112 For further discussion of this point, see Dixon et al., 'Consent and the legal regulation of policing' (1990) 17 JLS 245–362.

113 Circular no 88/1985 stated in para 1: 'The co-operation of the citizen should not be taken as implying consent . . . Whilst it is legitimate to invite co-operation from the public in circumstances where there is no power to require it, the subject of a voluntary search should not be left under the impression that a power is being exercised. Voluntary search must not be used as a device for circumventing the safeguards established in Part I of the Act.'

114 See, in particular, Code C, para 3(b), Detained Persons: Special Groups.

115 The prohibition also applied to a range of other persons who were not deemed capable of giving an informed consent to a search, such as the hearing impaired or persons not proficient in English who are also recognised in the Codes as belonging to vulnerable groups. Persons who did not fall within the above groups could be subject to a voluntary search under Note 1D(b) as revised in 1995, but the officer had to 'always make it clear that he is seeking the consent of the person concerned to the search being carried out by telling the person that he need not consent and that without his consent, he will not be searched'.

If a search occurred on an apparently consensual basis where no power arose to search, because reasonable suspicion was required and was not present, para 1.5 would be breached, but no liability could arise in respect of the Code breach. However, if the situation was viewed as one of searching without a power to do so (under e.g. s 1 PACE), which is the better view , then liability might arise, for trespass to the person or – if an item was seized – to goods. However, if a person was asked to turn out his pockets and did so voluntarily without physical contact with the police officers, no liability would arise, unless an item was seized. There would also be the practical difficulty of establishing a breach, bearing in mind the low level of suspicion required. Thus if an item was found and seized during a 'voluntary' search, it could lead to an arrest or conviction on the one hand, while on the other it is unclear that redress would be available in respect of the police action.

If, as discussed above, a 'voluntary' stop occurred, and the suspect's demeanour or behaviour during it gave rise to sufficient reasonable suspicion to allow for a search based on one of the statutory powers, para 2.11 of Code A would be breached, but a power to search under the power in question would arise. (In this context, the deterioration of police/community relations due to the over-use of stop and search against the black or Asian community discussed above should be taken into account, since it is more likely that a suspect from one of those communities might respond to a request to stop in a non-co-operative or belligerent manner, thereby providing the basis for reasonable suspicion to conduct a search.) Therefore it would appear that no civil liability could arise. It is notable that the provisions previously restricting the use of consensual stop and search against certain persons belonging to vulnerable groups – such as the mentally disordered – did not and do not apply to stops. One way of escaping from the conclusion that no liability would arise would be to argue that the reasonable suspicion requirement under the statutory power in question should be interpreted to exclude such suspicion acquired during the course of an apparently consensual stop where, in the circumstances, no true consent was given (in such circumstances an action for false imprisonment would technically speaking arise in respect of the stop itself unless the period of time in question was regarded as too minimal to found such an action, but damages would probably be derisory).[116] It could be argued that the statutory requirement should be interpreted under s 3 HRA, relying on Art 5, to exclude reasonable suspicion formed in those circumstances, since otherwise the search power could be viewed as arbitrary and oppressive. Where the stop appeared to be consensual this point would be debatable. A further possibility would be to reinterpret the tort of false imprisonment under s 6 HRA to encompass such a requirement. Clearly the analysis in Gillan creates problems for these arguments since it is not possible to rely on s 3 HRA (or on s 6) if Art 5 is not engaged in the first place. This point is returned to below.

Use of force

The use of force in order to carry out a stop and search is permitted under s 117 of PACE, which provides: 'the officer may use reasonable force, if necessary, in the exercise of the [PACE] power'. The TA provides an equivalent provision in s 114(2).

116 See Chapter 13, pp 1303 et seq. for discussion of tort damages in respect of police misuse or abuse of power.

But, under Art 3 ECHR, the use of force must be strictly in proportion to the conduct of the detainee; this is discussed further in respect of forcible arrest.[117] Under these provisions, the use of extreme force is permissible if necessitated by the conduct of the detainee, but if the use of such force causes death, it would appear to breach Art 2 which permits the use of lethal force to 'effect an arrest', not to effect a detention short of arrest. However, if the detainee sought to escape after being detained for the purposes of a stop and search, this might fall within the second limb of Art 2(2)(b): 'to prevent the escape of a person lawfully detained'. The lawfulness of the initial detention would then have to be considered, bearing in mind the arguments above.

Special seizure powers

The Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001 (CJP) introduced certain new seizure powers. Under s 51(1) and (2) of the CJP, if an officer already has a power of search he or she can seize property which may not be covered by that power if it is not practicable to ascertain what the item is at the time or if it is attached to something that the officer does have the power to seize. This new provision is significant since inter alia it allows the police officers to remove items from persons even where they are not certain that – apart from s 51 – they have the power to do so.

This power is 'balanced' by the provisions of ss 52–61 which provide a number of safeguards. Notice must be given to persons whose property has been seized under s 52, and under s 59 he or she can apply to the 'appropriate judicial authority' for the return of the whole or part of the seized property, on the ground that there was no power to seize it or that excluded or special procedure material or legally privileged material[118] is not comprised in other property as provided for in ss 54 and 55. Under s 60 a duty to secure the property arises which includes the obligation under s 61 to prevent, inter alia, copying of it. Special provisions are made for the return of excluded or special procedure material or material covered by legal privilege, which are discussed in Chapter 10.[119] The property can be retained under s 56 if it appears to have been obtained in consequence of the commission of an offence and otherwise it might be lost, damaged, altered or destroyed. The idea behind these powers is to allow the seizure of documents or computer discs which cannot readily be examined on the street. But despite the safeguards introduced, it is not clear that these powers, especially to seize and use legally privileged material, are compatible with the requirements of the Convention under the HRA. For example, arguments could be raised at trial that Art 8 was breached due to the seizure of confidential material; it could be argued that due to the nature of these provisions they should be afforded a strict construction, using s 3 of the HRA if necessary.

Procedural requirements for stop and search powers

Under s 2(1) of PACE, the procedural safeguards it sets out, together with those under s 3, apply to the PACE power and to powers under any other statutory provisions. All other statutory powers of search are also subject to the same procedural requirements under Code A as those relating to the powers under s 1 of PACE, apart – where relevant – from the Code A provisions relating to reasonable suspicion (Code A, para 2). The special counter-terrorism powers are subject to such requirements, apart from searches carried out for the purposes of examination under Sched 7 to the Terrorism Act 2000 which are covered by a TA Code of Practice.[120]

117 See p 1163.
118 See Chapter 11, pp 1002–3.
119 See pp 1004–5.

An element of due process is introduced into all these statutory stop and search powers by the information giving and recording requirements under ss 2 and 3 of PACE and Code of Practice A, paras 3 and 4. Under s 2(3) PACE, the constable must give the suspect certain information before the search begins, including 'his name and the name of the police station to which he is attached; the object of the proposed search; the constable's grounds for proposing to make it'. Under s 3, he or she must make a record of the search, either on the spot if that is practicable or as soon as it is practicable. The subject of the search can obtain a copy of the search record later on from the police station. Code A, para 3.8 also covers the information-giving requirement,[121] and para 4 covers search records. General guidance as to the conduct of the search is contained in Code A, paras 3.1–3.3; they require the officer to complete the search speedily, to minimise embarrassment and to seek co-operation.

The statutory and Code information-giving and record-keeping requirements give the impression of creating due process-based controls since they mean that the citizen can make a complaint and the police station will have a record of the number of stops being carried out. These procedural requirements are supposed to inject some accountability into stopping and searching, but in so far as they rely on Code A, they are effectively virtually unenforceable. The status of the ss 2 and 3 PACE requirements is considered below.

Redress for breaches of the stop and search rules; reliance on Convention arguments

A search would be unlawful if no reasonable suspicion arose in the circumstances – as required by the statutory provision that the police officers purported to be relying on, or if the police purported to act under an authorisation which was not in fact in force. A search would also be unlawful if one of the mandatory statutory procedural requirements was not complied with.

The lack of means of creating accountability by enforcing the due process safeguards for searches, especially in respect of CJPOA or TA authorisations, encourages the idea of resort to the HRA. In this context there were grounds for expecting that arguments

120 PACE 1984, Code A was applied to the additional PTA powers introduced in 1996. The TA, ss 99 and 101 in respect of Northern Ireland and the new Code introduced under Sched 14, para 6 in respect of the UK generally will apply the TA Codes to the TA powers. Under Sched 14, para 5, 'An officer shall perform functions conferred on him by virtue of this Act in accordance with any relevant code of practice in operation under paragraph 6'. Paragraph 6(1) provides: 'The Secretary of State shall issue codes of practice about the exercise by officers of functions conferred on them by virtue of this Act.'

121 Inter alia, the record must include the name, address, date of birth and ethnic origin of the person searched (unless he or she is not willing to disclose the name and address).

raised under the Act might lead to judicial intervention in this largely unregulated area. However, the decision of the House of Lords in Gillan[122] has put paid to such expectations in most circumstances, as explained above. But possibilities of raising Convention points in relation to searches remain. For example, as Chapter 13 will argue, Art 6 could be relied upon where it was claimed at trial that a search had not been based on any statutory power, or where breaches of Code A had occurred during the search, including breaches which might also amount to violations of Art 8.[123] Code A, para 3.5 provides safeguards against a search of more than outer clothing which appear to be coterminous with the right to respect for privacy under Art 8. However, Note 7 provides that there is nothing to prevent officers from asking a suspect to remove more than outer clothing in public, on a voluntary basis. This Note is of doubtful compatibility with Art 8, since persons who complied with such a 'request', believing that they had to, would suffer an interference with their Art 8 rights, which would arguably not be in accordance with the law. It could be argued that any evidence obtained in respect of an unlawful search, or one that breached Art 8, should be excluded in order to ensure a fair trial, although as Chapter 13 demonstrates, this argument would be very unlikely to succeed. There would however be a free-standing action in respect of a breach of Art 8 under s 7(1)(a) HRA and damages could be awarded under s 8.

Engagement of Article 5(1)

Article 5 provides a guarantee of 'liberty and security of person'. Following Gillan it does not appear to be necessary, except in exceptional circumstances (possibly where a stop and search was particularly prolonged) to show that an exception to Art 5 applies, since Art 5(1) is not, apparently, engaged. However, as discussed above, that question may still be open, especially in circumstances differing from those applicable in Gillan.

The reliance in Gillan on Guzzardi was doubtful, since the question in Guzzardi was whether restrictions on freedom of movement were sufficient to amount to deprivation of liberty. Guzzardi was detained on an island and therefore had some freedom of movement; the Court thought that his detention was somewhat akin to that experienced by someone in an open prison. In contrast, Gillan and Quinton were completely detained – i.e. they could not move appreciably from the spot on which they were stopped and searched. Had they sought to do so they would probably have been arrested for the offence encapsulated in s 47 – that of failing to stop when ordered to do so. The TA itself does not provide a power of arrest in relation to this specific offence, but that is in any event unnecessary since a power would arise under s 24 PACE, as amended (discussed below). The officer could have arrested, say, Quinton if she had made a move to leave the spot, before actually leaving it, under s 24(1)(c) PACE; if she had succeeded in moving away from the spot she could have been arrested under s 24(1)(d); s 24(5)(e) would also have had to be satisfied, and would have been, on those facts. Thus, Quinton and Gillan's situation was readily distinguishable from that of Guzzardi. The question

122 (2006) UKHL 12; [2006] 2 WLR 537.

123 E.g., regarding the requirements as to conduct of the search under Code A, para 3, including requirements as to removal of only outer clothing in public.

in their case was that of duration of time, not, on its face, of deprivation of liberty. In common parlance, they had clearly been deprived of liberty in the sense of being unable to move from one spot, whereas Guzzardi was able to move around the island; the question was whether the restraints on his movement amounted to a deprivation of liberty in Art 5 terms. Quinton and Gillan were deprived of liberty in the sense of being unable to move from one place, under threat of arrest. Had they been detained any longer, e.g. for one hour, it would have been difficult to suggest that that was not a deprivation of liberty in Art 5 terms. It is arguable that Art 5 therefore applied. X v Austria[124] arguably provided a closer analogy: a man was forcibly compelled to submit to a blood test, and the Strasbourg Court found a deprivation of liberty. Thus Lord Bingham's findings are open to question, although that it is probable that that question will now only be likely to be raised at Strasbourg.

Application of Art 5(1)(b)

Assuming that an exception had to be shown, it probably could be established in most instances. In Gillan Lord Bingham found that Art 5(1)(b) would have applied. Deprivation of liberty can occur only on a basis of law and in certain specified circumstances, including, under Art 5(1)(b), the detention of a person in order to secure the fulfilment of any obligation prescribed by law. Article 5(1)(c) provides an exception in respect of the 'lawful detention of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence' but this exception appears to apply to arrest rather than to stop and search. That was the view taken in Gillan. Section 1 PACE requires suspicion as to carriage of an article, not as to an offence; it is clearly aimed at gathering evidence of offences and its requirements are not fully coterminous with the relevant range of offences. Carrying certain of the articles which fall within s 1 of PACE is not an offence[125] even if the carrier can be said to 'possess' them, although the officer also requires suspicion as to mens rea, while carriage of prohibited articles without sufficient 'possession' will clearly not constitute an offence. Code A, para 2.7 provides that where a police officer has reasonable grounds to suspect that a person is in innocent possession of a stolen or prohibited article, or other item for which he is empowered to search, the power of stop and search exists despite the absence of a power of arrest. That Code provision clearly allows searches that could not be covered by Art 5(1)(c).

Thus Art 5(1)(b) could cover potentially temporary detention for the purposes of a search. The provision under Art 5(1)(b) raises difficulties of interpretation and is clearly not so straightforward as the form of detention permitted under Art 5(1)(c). On its face, its broad wording appears to allow arbitrary detention on a broader basis than that permitted based on the requirements of reasonable suspicion or authorisation which PACE, other statutory powers and the TA depend upon, and without intervention by a court. At first glimpse it gives the impression of representing a scheme which affords less weight to due process than the current domestic one.

124 (1979) 18 DR 154.
125 Under s 1(7)(b), such articles could include credit cards or keys.

However, Art 5(1)(b) has received a restrictive interpretation at Strasbourg. In Lawless,[126] it was found that a specific and concrete obligation must be identified; once it has been, detention can in principle be used to secure its fulfilment. It is probable that the term 'obligation' could apply to the current statutory provisions – if Art 5(1), exceptionally, was found to be engaged. The requirements are to submit to a search, and, apart from the power under s 163 of the Road Traffic Act, to remain under police detention for the period of time necessary to allow it to be carried out.[127] Following this interpretation, the PACE, CJPOA and TA stop and search provisions are probably compatible with Art 5(1)(b). In McVeigh, O'Neill and Evans[128] a requirement to submit to an examination on arrival in the UK was found not to violate Art 5(1)(b) since it was sufficiently specific and concrete, but the Commission emphasised that this was found on the basis that the obligation in question only arose in limited circumstances and had a limited purpose – to combat terrorism. The PACE powers, the Misuse of Drugs Act power and, arguably, the power arising under s 43 of the TA, which is a permanent power, not one adopted temporarily to meet an emergency as in McVeigh, could not readily be said to arise in limited circumstances but the obligation would probably be found to arise since they are founded upon a requirement of reasonable suspicion. The CJPOA and other TA powers have more limited purposes in the sense that the place in which they can be exercised is circumscribed either by its nature (as in port or border controls) or by the authorisation given, which is based on the need for special powers. Whether any particular authorisation would be viewed as rendering the obligation in question sufficiently specific would be open to question, depending on the factual situation.[129]

The exercise of the powers under s 60 CJPOA and s 44 TA appears to be compatible with Art 5(1)(b), following Gillan. The power under s 163 of the Road Traffic Act also appears to be compatible with Art 5(1)(b) since it is exercised in respect of a specific obligation, as explained in McVeigh. The obligation may be viewed as one inherent in the use of a vehicle on the roads. The power probably carries with it, impliedly, the power to detain for a short period.[130] The offence under the RTA of failing to stop would probably be committed if the response to the stop was to brake and pause for an instant before driving on. It appears, after Gillan that Art 5 is not normally engaged by the use of this power, but that if it were engaged, it would usually fall within the exception.

126 Report of 19 December 1959, B1 (1960–61) p 64; judgment of 1 July 1961, A 3 (1960–61); (1961) 1 EHRR 15.

127 See McVeigh, O'Neill and Evans (1981) 5 EHRR 71; the obligation imposed was a requirement to 'submit to examination'. In Reyntjens v France Appl No 16810/90 (1992) unreported, the obligation was to submit to an identity check.

128 (1981) 5 EHRR 71.

129 See further Reiner, R and Leigh, I, 'Police powers', in McCrudden and Chambers, op. cit., fn 1, pp 93–94; Klug, Starmer and Weir argue in op. cit., fn 1, that police stop and search powers may breach Art 5: pp 250–51.

130 This may be suggested by the findings in Lodwick v Sanders [1985] 1 WLR 382.

General requirements under Art 5

Article 5 also imposes further, general requirements. The detention must not be arbitrary; this is implicit in the requirement of lawfulness.[131] A detention with the real purpose of searching for drugs, which had been authorised under s 44 of the TA in respect of terrorism, might be viewed as arbitrary in the sense that it was not proportionate to the purpose of ensuring the fulfilment of an obligation prescribed by the relevant law[132] – the TA. If such an argument was advanced at Strasbourg, involving, as it does, review of the proportionality of decisions taken by the state authorities, a certain margin of appreciation would be afforded to those authorities in respect of their assessment of the relevant circumstances.[133] But in the domestic courts, under the HRA, this approach would be inappropriate. Applying the notion of a discretionary area of judgment[134] would also arguably be inappropriate, since a search under terrorism legislation, but for a non-terrorist purpose, does not call for deference. However, the argument that the search was arbitrary was not accepted in Gillan, even though it appeared to be for a non-terrorism related purpose, on the basis that sufficient safeguards, partly arising from Code A, surround the use of s 44.

Article 13?

If, as argued above, the House of Lords fell into error in Gillan, it is possible that an application might be made to Strasbourg, arguing for a breach of both Arts 5 and 13. Article 13 would arguably be breached in circumstances where it would be necessary to establish a breach of Art 5 in order to afford a remedy, as opposed to circumstances where a remedy would be available under trespass to the person or false imprisonment. The use of a 'voluntary' stop to fuel reasonable suspicion in order to search under a statutory power could arguably provide such an instance.

Judicial review

Article 5 arguments might also be raised under s 7(1)(b) HRA in the context of judicial review proceedings. Gillan has obviously discouraged argument that Art 5 itself has been breached, but the possibility of arguing that a breach of Art 5 read with Art 14 had occurred might prove more fruitful. In appropriate cases, bearing in mind the recent evidence noted above of a police tendency to show racial bias in decisions to stop and search,[135] violation of Art 5(1) might be found when read with the Art 14 guarantee of freedom from discrimination in the enjoyment of the Convention rights. This might particularly be the case under s 44 TA or s 60 CJPOA, given the very broad, unstructured discretion they hand to the police. The possibility of relying on the HRA is of less significance after the amendments made to the Race Relations Act 1976 in 2000, allowing claimants to bring actions against the police in respect of direct or 131 Winterwerp v Netherlands A 33 (1979), para 39.

132 Ibid; Bouamar v Belgium A 129 (1988), para 50.
133 Ibid, para 40.
134 See Chapter 4, p 265 et seq.
135 See above pp 1124–26.

indirect discrimination in policing decisions, including decisions to stop and search. However, a defendant would also have the option of raising an Art 5 and 14 argument during the criminal process. It could be argued, for example, under Art 6(1) that if Art 14, read with Art 5, had been breached through a discriminatory search (one which would otherwise be lawful as in conformity with, for example, s 60 of the 1994 Act or s 44 of the TA), any products of the search could be excluded from evidence under s 78 of PACE, and in so far as the contact had influenced the subsequent investigation, evidence deriving from it should also be excluded. Such an argument would of course require recognition to be given to possible racial stereotyping behind stop and search decisions.[136] It is argued that despite Lord Bingham's findings in Gillan, Art 5 could be engaged by a stop and search that also engaged Art 14 on the basis of extending the ambit of Art 5 where Art 14 was engaged.[137]

In Gillan Lord Bingham failed to deal with the question of the possible discriminatory use of the s 44 power, which did not – it appeared – arise in the instant cases. However, Lord Hope of Craighead and Lord Brown of Eaton-under-Heywood considered this issue. Lord Hope said (para 38):

> How does the fact that it is likely to be difficult in practice to detect discriminatory use of the power square with the principle of legal certainty that requires that the use of such powers must be in accordance with the law if they are to be compatible with the Convention rights? And how in practice is discriminatory use of the power to be prevented, given the nature of the terrorist threats that it is designed for?

He elaborated on this point at para 43: 'What then if it is found that the police are using the section 44 power more frequently to stop Asians than other racial groups in the community? Does this amount to direct discrimination contrary to domestic law . . .' He found that the issue could not be overlooked, in view of the concern that the House expressed in R (European Roma Rights Centre) v Immigration Officer at Prague Airport (United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees intervening)[138] about the fact that all Roma applicants were being routinely treated, simply because they were Roma, with more suspicion and subjected to more intensive and intrusive questioning than non- Roma. The evidence, he said, showed that the operation that was being conducted in that case was 'inherently and systematically discriminatory and unlawful'.

But Lord Hope managed to distinguish the exercise of the s 44 power from the exercise of the power in the Roma case on the following grounds:

> But a decision to use the section 44 power will in practice always be based on more than the mere fact of a person's racial or ethnic origin if it is to be used properly and effectively, especially in places where people are present in large numbers. The selection process will be more precisely targeted, even if in the end

136 In the US context, AC Thompson argues that the tendency of the judiciary is to impose neutral explanations on searches (based on the notion of police expertise in spotting criminal possibilities in neutral behaviour) on stop and 'frisk' decisions and to ignore, if possible, any racial element: 'Race and the Fourth Amendment' (1999) 74(4) New York UL Rev 956.

137 See Chapter 15, pp 1483, 1526.

138 [2005] 2 AC 1.

> it is based more on a hunch than on something that can be precisely articulated or identified. Age, behaviour and general appearance other than that relating to the person's racial or ethnic background will have a part to play in suggesting that a particular person might possibly have in his possession an article of a kind which could be used in connection with terrorism. An appearance which suggests that the person is of Asian origin may attract the constable's attention in the first place. But a further selection process will have to be undertaken . . .

Therefore he found that the power was not discriminatory, although he did think that it should be used sparingly.[139]

This is questionable. The Roma decision might be viewed as relating to behaviour at one end of the spectrum of direct discrimination, while a decision to stop and search based wholly on an Asian person's individual behaviour, such as seeking to conceal an object, might be viewed as at the other. In other words, the first instance would clearly be directly racially discriminatory, the second would not. But the use of the s 44 power under the TA could be viewed as coming somewhere between the two instances since the ethnic origin of persons stopped could be allowed – according to Lord Hope – to play a part in the decision to stop and search. Arguably, that is direct discrimination, albeit of a less overt quality than that at issue in the Roma case, since on Lord Hope's analysis, persons could be singled out for law enforcement attention on the basis of their ethnic origin. In practice it would also be very difficult, since no objective criteria are laid down to govern the other grounds – apart from discriminatory ones – for selecting persons for stops, to be able to say with certainty that direct discrimination had not occurred. Although this was not Lord Hope's point, if considered under Art 14 (read with Art 5 on the basis of an assumed extended ambit of Art 5(1)), the discriminatory treatment could potentially be justified if proportionate; if considered under the Race Relations Act 1976, as amended, it could not. The discussion in Gillan was technically obiter since the issue did not arise in the instant case; it is to be hoped that if it is revisited in future, it receives further and stricter scrutiny.

Argument based on the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Wainwright v UK[140] would be relevant in this context. In that instance the Court accepted that the search in question pursued the legitimate aim under Art 8(2) of fighting the drugs problem in the prison. On the other hand, it was not satisfied that the searches were proportionate to that aim in the manner in which they were carried out. It was found that where procedures were laid down for the proper conduct of searches the prison authorities were required to comply strictly with those safeguards and by rigorous precautions protect the dignity of those being searched as far as possible. Failure to do so had meant that the intrusion onto dignity represented by the search could not be viewed as proportionate to the aim pursued. In this context, Code A lays down detailed rules regarding the avoidance of discriminatory searches. The same or similar arguments could be applied in the context of Art 5 read with Art 14, where the Code A rules were not adhered to. Article 14 contains an implied proportionality test;[141] it could be argued that although taking account of a person's race in the manner referred to by Lord Hope might be justifiable, it would be less likely that it could be justified if the police had failed to adhere to the Code provisions in conducting searches based, in effect, on racial profiling.

139 At para 92.
140 Appl No 12350/04; 26 September 2006.
141 See Chapter 2, p 109.

Tortious remedies

A citizen who submitted to a search where no power arose to search in the circumstances would have a remedy in trespass to the person. If a search is conducted unlawfully, the citizen is entitled to resist and to sue for assault. But in many instances, and especially where a search is conducted under one of the provisions which do not require reasonable suspicion, the citizen has no means of knowing that the search is unlawful. A citizen who believed that there could be no grounds for a search and therefore resisted it would be taking a risk. Resistance to an authorised TA or CJPOA search could incur criminal liability, not only, in all probability, in respect of obstruction or assault of a constable,[142] but under the special TA or CJPOA search-related offences as well. Article 5 arguments, possibly combined with Art 14 ones, could be raised under s 7(1)(b) HRA in the context of a civil action for false imprisonment or trespass to the person. Clearly, Gillan has not encouraged such argument, but Gillan did not rule out the possibility that in certain circumstances Art 5 could be engaged by a stop and search, or that Art 5 read with Art 14 would not be breached in certain circumstances by a discriminatory use of the stop and search power. If Art 5 alone or read with Art 14 was found to be breached, the options of extending an existing tort in order to cover the instance in question would arise, or of merely affording a remedy under s 8 HRA. A racially discriminatory stop and search would also be tortious under the Race Relations Act 1976, as amended.[143] If there was a doubt as to the ambit of the tort in question, suggesting that in the particular instance it might be inapplicable, it could be argued that it should be extended to cover the breach of Art 5 in question.[144] If Code A had been breached during the stop and search that in itself would not give rise to any civil liability, but the breach could be relied upon as part of an argument that Art 5 itself had been breached.[145] The use of tort actions in this context is discussed further in Chapter 13.

There is no provision under the TA, PACE or Code A to the effect that if the procedural requirements are not complied with, the search will be unlawful. As indicated, a number of due process requirements are contained only in Codes[146] and, therefore, their breach cannot give rise to civil liability,[147] although breach of certain of the statutory procedural 142 Offences arising under the Police Act 1996, s 89(1) and (2).

143 See Chapter 15, pp 1509–10.

144 See further on this point Chapter 4, pp 252–56.

145 See further on this point, above, pp 1107–8.

146 Code A made under PACE 1984, s 66 and the TA Code made under the TA, ss 96 and 98 in respect of Northern Ireland and the new Code introduced under Sched 14 in respect of the UK. See pp 1106–7 above.

147 Under PACE 1984, s 67(10). The TA Codes will have the same status as the PACE Codes; under Sched 14, para 6(2) 'The failure by an officer to observe a provision of a code shall not of itself make him liable to criminal or civil proceedings', but under sub-para (3) 'A code (a) shall be admissible in evidence in criminal and civil proceedings, and (b) shall be taken into account by a court or tribunal in any case in which it appears to the court or tribunal to be relevant'.

requirements will render searches unlawful, as will breach of the statutory powers. It has been held that a failure to make a written record of the search in breach of s 3 will not render it unlawful,[148] whereas a failure to give the grounds for it will do so, following Fenelley[149] and Samuel v Comr of Police for the Metropolis,[150] as will a failure to comply with the duties to provide identification under s 2(3), following Osman v Director of Public Prosecutions.[151] In Osman, proper authorisation had been given for the police to search members of the public entering a park under s 60(4) and 60(5) of the CJPOA 1994. When the defendant was searched, police officers failed to comply with s 2; the search was resisted and the defendant charged with assaulting an officer in the execution of his duty. It was found on appeal that it was plain from the mandatory words of s 2 that any search initiated without prior compliance with the duties set out in s 2 would mean that no officer was actually assaulted in the execution of his duty, since any search of a person might be a trespass requiring proper justification in law; the breach of s 2(3) meant that the search was unlawful and therefore not in the execution of their duty. The facts that the officers were clearly local and that numbers could have been obtained from their uniforms were found to be insufficient to avoid the finding of unlawfulness.[152] The strict interpretation of the information-giving duties evident in Fenelley and Osman was equally apparent in Lineham v DPP[153] in the context of a search of premises.

Exclusion of the products of the search from evidence; trial remedies

The PACE and TA Codes are admissible in evidence.[154] It would be possible for a defendant who claims that a search was conducted improperly or unlawfully to seek the limited form of redress represented by exclusion of evidence which has been obtained after a breach of ss 2 or 3 PACE and/or Code A. A stop and search is most likely to produce physical evidence such as drugs or perhaps a weapon, but the courts are very reluctant to exclude such evidence unless there has been deliberate illegality because it is less likely to be unreliable than confession or identification evidence.[155] Thus, the mechanism of exclusion of evidence as a form of redress for breach of a Code provision, which has operated to underpin Codes C and D, is not as appropriate in relation to Code A, although an effective sanction is clearly needed.

148 Basher v DPP (1993) unreported, 2 March.

149 [1989] Crim LR 142.

150 (1999) unreported, 3 March.

151 (1999) The Times, 29 September, judgment of 1 July 1999.

152 The Crown Court had found that there had been a breach of the 1984 Act, s 2(3)(a), but given the fact that the officers were clearly local police officers policing a local event in broad daylight, as expeditiously as possible, and because numbers could readily be obtained from the officers' uniforms, the breach was not so serious as to render the search unlawful. These findings would clearly have undermined s 2(3).

153 (1999) unreported, judgment of 8 October. Laws LJ found that police officers who conducted a search under PACE 1984, s 18 had not been acting in the execution of their duty because they had failed to inform the appellant so far as possible as to the reason why they intended to search the premises.

154 PACE 1984, s 67(11); TA, Sched 14, para 6(3).

155 See the pre-PACE ruling of the House of Lords in Fox [1986] AC 281; see also Thomas [1990] Crim LR 269 and Khan [1996] 3 All ER 289; cf Fenelley [1989] Crim LR 142. See further Chapter 13, pp 1288 et seq.

This weakness is further exacerbated in relation to breaches of the Notes for Guidance rather than of Code A itself; and since the Notes do not have the same legal status as Code provisions, they are more likely to be ignored by officers. What would be the position if, for example, a police officer required a Muslim woman to remove a veil in public view in breach of Note for Guidance 4 Code A? A judge might well be minded to view breach of a Note for Guidance as of insufficient significance to lead to exclusion of any identification evidence obtained.

Article 6 arguments would be available where a breach of Art 5 was alleged which might affect the fairness of the trial; they could be raised in respect of admission of evidence obtained after a breach of Art 5, or in respect of an argument for abuse of process; these possibilities are considered further in Chapter 15. Again, Gillan has not encouraged such argument, but Gillan did not rule out the possibility that in certain circumstances Art 5 could be engaged by a stop and search, or that Art 5 read with Art 14 could be breached in certain circumstances by a discriminatory use of the stop and search power. These arguments could be raised at trial in respect of failing to stop, either under one of the specific offences under the relevant statute or under s 89(1) or (2) of the Police Act 1996. Further possibilities are considered in respect of arrests in breach of Art 5, below.

Disciplinary action

Disciplinary action, the other form of redress for breach of a Code provision, may be even less effective in relation to Code A than Codes C, D and E, which largely govern interrogation and identification, because stop and search powers are exercised away from the police station, at a low level of visibility. Moreover, if a police officer decides that a search can be called voluntary, he need not give his name or number and therefore it will be almost impossible to bring a complaint against him. Thus, it is fair to say that in so far as the balance between police powers and individual rights is supposed to be maintained by the Code A provisions, it is largely dependent on voluntary adherence to them. The police are bound by the Convention rights under s 6 HRA and therefore argument that a right had been breached could be raised in disciplinary proceedings, although it would not be conclusive. This is discussed further in Chapter 13.

3 Powers of arrest

Introduction[156]

Under traditional common law doctrine an arrest occurs at the point when liberty ceases. A person has been arrested when, if he tried to exercise his liberty to go where he wills, he would be prevented from doing so.[157] Some forms of detention are not deprivations of liberty, and so are not arrests, as Lord Bingham sought to indicate in Gillan. They are temporary impediments to exercising liberty. But it does not follow that a deprivation of liberty cannot occur outside the context of an arrest. The common law has long recognised that deprivations of liberty short of arrest can lawfully occur (Albert v Lavin).[158] This was recently reaffirmed by the House of Lords in R (on the application of Laporte) (FC) v Chief Constable of Gloucestershire.[159] It is suggested that, after Gillan,[160] and Laporte an arrest should no longer be viewed as a factual situation,[161] but as a legal concept.

156 See further: Home Office, Modernising Police Powers to Meet Community Needs – a consultation paper, Aug 2004. For current comment on PACE and the Terrorism Act 2000, see Ashworth, A, The Criminal Process, 3rd edn, 2005; Feldman, D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 2nd edn, 2002, Chapters 5 and 9; Sanders, A and Young, R, Criminal Justice, 3rd edn, 2007, Chapter 3; Zander, M, The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, 2003; Clark, D, Bevan and Lidstone's The Investigation of Crime, 2004; Starmer, K and Hopkins, A Human Rights in the Investigation of Crime (2007), OUP; Ayres, M, Murray, L and Fiti, R (2003) Arrests for Notifiable Offences, Home Office Paper 17/03; Healy, P, 'Investigative Detention in Canada' [2005] Crim LR 98 at p 105.

Arrest may often be the first formal stage in the criminal process. It does not need to be; the process could begin with a consensual interview with the suspect, perhaps in his or her own home, followed by a summons to appear at the magistrates' court. It appears that arrests are sometimes effected unnecessarily; this contention is supported by the pre-PACE variation in practice regarding arrest between police areas,[162] which does not seem to be explicable on the ground of necessity, but seems to be attributable to different policies in the different areas. Any arrest represents a serious curtailment of liberty; therefore, use of the arrest power requires careful regulation. An arrest, in common with the exercise of other police powers, is seen as prima facie illegal, necessitating justification under a specific legal power. If an arrest is effected where no arrest power arises, a civil action for false imprisonment will lie.

Despite the need for clarity and precision, such powers were, until relatively recently, granted piecemeal, with the result that prior to PACE, they were contained in a mass of common law and statutory provisions. No consistent rationale could be discerned for the grant or lack of powers, and there were a number of gaps and anomalies. For example, the Criminal Law Act 1967 gave a power of arrest without warrant where the offence in question arose under statute and carried a sentence of five years. Thus, no power of arrest arose in respect of common law offences carrying such a sentence. This situation was detrimental to civil liberties owing to the uncertainty of the powers, but it may also have been detrimental in crime control terms since officers may have been deterred from effecting an arrest where one was necessary. The powers are now contained largely in PACE, as amended, but common law powers remain, while a number of statutes create a specific power of arrest which often overlaps with the PACE powers. The PACE arrest power is very broad, as explained below. Aside from PACE, a number of very broad and imprecisely defined offences exist to which arrest powers attach, 157 See Shabaan Bin Hussein v Chong Fook Kam [1970] AC 942 at p 949.

158 [1982] AC 546.

159 [2006] UKHL 55, para 39 CA: R (on the application of Laporte) v CC of Gloucester Constab [2004] EWCA Civ 1639. See below for discussion pp 1142–43. The case is fully discussed in Chapter 8, pp 757–63.

160 [2006] UKHL 12.

161 In Lewis v CC of the South Wales Constab [1991] 1 All ER 206 the traditional position was re-stated – that arrest is not a legal concept, but a factual situation, at pp 209–10 .

162 E.g., in 1976 in Cleveland, 1% of persons were summonsed for an indictable offence, whereas in Derbyshire, 76% of suspects were, as were 40% of suspects in West Yorkshire and North Wales: Royal Commission Report 1981, Cmnd 8092, para 3.72. See further Bailey, SH and Gunn, MJ, Smith and Bailey on the Modern English Legal System, 1991, Sweet and Maxwell, pp 630–32.

such as s 5 Public Order Act 1986[163] or certain terrorism offences;[164] the existence of such offences affords the police a great deal of leeway as to whether or not to arrest. Thus, the clarification of the arrest power that occurred under PACE has not led to any curbing of the ability of the police to interfere with liberty, quite the reverse.

The due process and crime control views of arrest and detention are diametrically opposed. Under the due process model, arrest should be based on strong suspicion that the individual has committed a specific offence, since arrest and subsequent detention represent a severe infringement of individual rights. Under the crime control model, arrest and detention need not be sanctioned merely in relation to specific offences, but should be both an investigative tool and a means of asserting police authority over persons with a criminal record or of doubtful character, with a view to creating a general deterrent effect. Under this model, reasonable suspicion is viewed as a needless irrelevancy, an inhibitory rule standing in the way of an important police function.

The body of research into the use of arrest and detention powers is to an extent conflicting, one school of analysis suggesting that the procedural due process elements which were supposed to create restraints on the powers largely fail to do so in practice in a number of respects.[165] A partially opposed view agrees as to 'the limited effectiveness of PACE's control mechanisms, including routinisation of supervisory controls', but suggests that 'the potential exists for [the PACE reforms] to be given more (or less) substance'.[166] It will be argued below that such potential may be realised under the impact of the HRA, but that its influence will be variable, especially as between the conventional and counter-terrorist schemes. While the conventional scheme shows a formal adherence to due process, which appears to have a subtle impact in practice, especially as regards controls on detention, the counter-terrorist scheme adheres, formally, to a lower standard, thereby providing greater leeway for departure from due process without necessarily breaching the rules.

At common law – power to arrest for breach of peace

PACE has not affected the power to arrest which arises at common law for breach of the peace. Factors present in a situation in which breach of the peace occurs may also give rise to arrest powers under PACE, but may extend further than they do owing to the wide definition of breach of the peace. The leading case is Howell,[167] in which it was found that breach of the peace will arise if violence to persons or property, either actual or apprehended, occurs. Threatening words are not in themselves a breach of the peace, but they may lead a police officer to apprehend that a breach will arise. Where a breach of the peace is threatened by some members of a group, the police

163 See Chapter 8, pp 781–83.

164 See Chapter 14, pp 1406 et seq.

165 See Sanders and Young, Criminal Justice, 2007, Chapters 3 and 4; McConville, Sanders and Leng, op. cit., fn 1, esp p 189.

166 Dixon, in Walker and Starmer, Miscarriages of Justice (1999), p 67.

167 [1982] QB 416; [1981] 3 All ER 383, CA; for comment, see Williams (1982) 146 JPN 199–200, 217–19.

may be justified in detaining all of them.[168] A police officer or any other person may arrest if a breach of the peace is in being or apprehended,[169] but not when it has been terminated, unless there is reason to believe that it may be renewed.[170] In Humphries v Connor,[171] Fitzgerald J summarised a constable's duty as follows:

> With respect to a constable, I agree that his primary duty is to preserve the peace; and he may for that purpose interfere, and, in the case of an affray, arrest the wrongdoer; or, if a breach of the peace is imminent, may, if necessary, arrest those who are about to commit it, if it cannot otherwise be prevented.

A temporary detention effected in order to prevent a breach of the peace need not amount to an arrest. However, in order to effect such detention, short of arrest, a breach of the peace must be imminent in the same way as would be required to justify an arrest. In other words, the requirements are not diminished where the action that is taken falls short of an arrest. Lord Bingham so found in R (on the application of Laporte) (FC) (Original Appellant and Cross-respondent) v Chief Constable of Gloucestershire:[172]

> . . . there is a power and duty resting on constable and private citizen alike to prevent a breach of the peace which reasonably appears to be about to be committed. That is the test laid down in Albert v Lavin,[173] which means what it says. It refers to an event which is imminent, on the point of happening. The test is the same whether the intervention is by arrest or (as in Humphries v Connor, King v Hodges[174] and Albert v Lavin itself) by action short of arrest. There is nothing in domestic authority to support the proposition that action short of arrest may be taken when a breach of the peace is not so imminent as would be necessary to justify an arrest.

In Laporte, in relation to the detention of protesters on a coach which had been turned back by the police from an anti-war demonstration, the Chief Constable did not think a breach of the peace was so imminent as to justify an arrest. Therefore, the House of Lords found, it could not justify a detention short of arrest. Also action is only permitted to prevent a breach of the peace 'by the person arrested',[175] or against 'the 168 Austin v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis [2005] HRLR 20. 3,000 people were detained for 7 hours in London during a May Day demonstration; it was held that the actions of the police were lawful on the basis that a breach of the peace was apprehended on the part of some members of the group.

169 Following Foulkes [1998] 3 All ER 705, the breach must be imminent.

170 For commentary on this point and on breach of the peace generally, see Williams, G, [1954] Crim LR 578. The view that there is no power to arrest once a breach of the peace is over was put forward in the Commentary on Podger [1979] Crim LR 524 and endorsed obiter in Howell [1982] QB 416; [1981] 3 All ER 383, CA. See Chapter 8, pp 752 et seq. for full discussion of the use of breach of the peace.

171 (1864) 17 ICLR 1, 8–9.

172 [2006] UKHL 55, para 39. CA: R (on the application of Laporte) v CC of Gloucester Constab [2004] EWCA Civ 1639.

173 [1982] AC 546.

174 [1974] Crim LR 424.

175 R v Howell, above, fn 170, at p 426.

person who is . . . threatening to break the peace'.[176] That condition was also unfulfilled in the circumstances in Laporte as there was no reason to believe that all the protesters would breach the peace. Thus the detention in Laporte was unlawful. Laporte is the most recent and authoritative pronouncement on arrest or detention where breach of the peace is apprehended. The decision is discussed further in Chapter 8.[177]

Power of arrest with warrant

This power does not arise under PACE. There are a large number of statutory provisions allowing an arrest warrant to be issued, of which the most significant is that arising under s 1 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980.[178] Under this power, a warrant may be issued if a person aged at least 17 is suspected of an offence which is indictable or punishable with imprisonment or of any other offence and no satisfactory address is known allowing a summons to be served. This provision therefore limits the circumstances under which a warrant can be sought as an alternative to using the non-warrant power under PACE and as the police have such broad powers of arrest under PACE, arrest in reliance on a warrant is used even less under PACE than it was previously. The recent amendations to PACE, broadening the power of arrest under s 24, is only likely to enhance this tendency. The result is that judicial supervision of arrests is minimised.[179] This tendency leaves the operation of the arrest power to the discretion of the police and is part of a general move away from the judicial supervision of police powers.

Under PACE: power of arrest without warrant

Prior to PACE, only certain offences were arrestable without a warrant, under the Criminal Law Act 1967. PACE broadened the category of arrestable offences. Originally PACE contained two separate powers of arrest without warrant, one arising under s 24 and the other under s 25. In very broad terms, s 24 provided a power of arrest in respect of more serious offences while s 25 covered all offences, however trivial (including, for example, dropping litter) if – and this was the important point – certain conditions were satisfied apart from suspicion that the offence in question has been committed. Thus, s 25 operated to cover persons suspected of offences falling outside s 24. An 'arrestable offence' was therefore one for which a person could be arrested if the necessary reasonable suspicion was present, without the need to demonstrate that any other ingredients were present in the situation at the time of arrest. But under s 25 non-arrestable offences became arrestable if the s 25 conditions were satisfied. The difference between ss 24 and 25 was quite significant in due process terms: the scheme recognised that providing a power of arrest for all offences, however trivial, was disproportionate to the crime control aim being served. Such a power was reserved therefore for more serious offences; under s 25 it was also necessary to satisfy the arrest conditions. Further, once a person had been arrested under s 24, he or she was said to have been arrested for 'an arrestable offence' and this might have an effect on 176 Albert v Lavin, above, per Lord Diplock, p 565.

177 See pp 757 et seq.
178 See [1962] Crim LR 520, p 597 for comment on these powers.
179 See, e.g., Criminal Statistics, Cm 2680, 1993, Table 8.2, p 191.

his or her treatment later on. In certain circumstances, suspects in custody for more serious offences could experience a lesser level of safeguards.

However, s 25 was repealed in 2005 by s 110 Serious and Organised Crime Act 2005, and a new s 24 PACE was introduced, making the available arrest powers much broader. Under s 24 a person can now be arrested by a constable on reasonable suspicion of being in the act of committing (s 24)(1)(d)), having committed (s 24)(2)), or being about to commit (s 24)(1)(c)), an offence – any offence. Thus this power now allows an officer to arrest for any offence so long as reasonable suspicion can be shown. A person can also be arrested by a constable if in the act of committing (s 24)(1)(b)), having committed, (s 24)(3)(a)) or being about to commit (s 24)(1)(a)), an offence. In other words, the officer can arrest on a hunch so long as it turns out to be justified. This possibility, which was also available prior to 2005, may tend to undermine the reasonable suspicion requirement since police officers are aware that the likelihood of being called to account for the false arrest is not high. Thus, s 24 originally broadened the category of arrestable offences – those that were arrestable without a warrant. Under the current s 24 the difference between arrestable and non-arrestable offences has been abolished: all offences are arrestable so long as certain other conditions are also satisfied.

This broad power is apparently balanced by a further requirement based on the 'general arrest conditions' from the old s 25, which must also be fulfilled. Therefore, in order to arrest under s 24, two steps must be taken: first, there must be reasonable suspicion relating to the offence in question, unless s 24(1)(b), s 24(3)(a) or s 24(1)(a) applies (the 'hunch' provisions). Second, there must be reasonable grounds for thinking that one of the arrest conditions is satisfied. The need for the officer to have reasonable suspicion relating to the offence in question and as to the further requirement (previously – general arrest conditions) was emphasised on appeal in Edwards v DPP[180] in relation to s 25, but the decision is applicable to the new s 24.

The further requirements, which are alternatives, are, under s 24(5), to:

(a) to enable the name of the person in question to be ascertained (in the case where the constable does not know and cannot readily ascertain the person's name or where the constable has reasonable grounds for doubting whether a name given by the person as his name is his real name;
(b) correspondingly as regards the person's address;
(c) to prevent the person in question:

  (i) causing physical injury to himself or any other person;
  (ii) suffering physical injury;
  (iii) causing loss of or damage to property;
  (iv) committing an offence against public decency; or
  (v) causing an unlawful obstruction of the highway;
  (d) to protect a child or other vulnerable person from the person in question.

Crucially, two new alternative requirements have been added under the new s 24. The police also have the further options of showing that the arrest is needed to allow the prompt and effective investigation of the suspected offence in question, or to prevent prosecution of the offence from being hindered by the suspect's disappearance (s 24(5)(e) and(f)). These two new reasons were not available under s 25, and greatly broaden the ambit of this new power.

180 (1993) 97 Cr App R 301; (1993) The Times, 29 March.

It can be seen that the reasons based on the old conditions divide into two groups: those in which there is or appears to be a failure to furnish a satisfactory name or address, so that the service of a summons later on would be impracticable, and those which concern the immediate need to remove the suspect from the street, which would make it inappropriate to serve a summons later. The inclusion of these provisions implies that the infringement of civil liberties represented by an arrest should be resorted to only where no other alternative exists. The two new reasons, however, make it unnecessary in most instances to rely on these more limiting possibilities. It is highly probable that one of these reasons will be found to be satisfied in relation to most arrests. Thus the police now have the broad power of arrest that would have been viewed as too draconian had it been introduced in 1984. Some attempt at balancing this power with increased safeguards for arrestees was made by the introduction of Code G, the arrest Code, in 2006. For example, s 1.3 Code G demands that the arrest be proportionate to the objectives of the investigation. Section 1 also reminds police that arrest should not be resorted to readily; it should only be used if other means of achieving the objectives of the investigation are not feasible. However, breach of Code G does not give rise to civil liability, and it is probable that its safeguards will have little significant impact on street policing.

An ordinary citizen has more limited powers: he or she can arrest under s 24A[181] in the same way, in respect of indictable offences, with the omission of the possibility of arresting where the offence is about to be committed. The reasons are more limited than under s 24(5). Under s 24A they are:

> to prevent the person in question:
>
> (i) causing physical injury to himself or any other person;
> (ii) suffering physical injury;
> (iii) causing loss of or damage to property; or > (iv) making off before a constable can assume responsibility for him.

Although Code G exhorts the police to use arrest as a last resort, in practice arrest under s 24 is likely to be resorted to quite readily, following the practices already established under ss 25 and 24. A key potentially limiting requirement under s 24, as under the previous s 25, is the need to show 'reasonable grounds' for suspicion in relation to the s 24(5) requirements. The phrase suggests that a clear, objective basis for forming the view in question should exist. The decision in Edwards v DPP[182] suggests that the courts appreciate the constitutional significance of upholding the requirements under the general arrest conditions. In Edwards, an officer arrested the appellant in the course of a struggle, stating that the arrest was 'for obstruction'. Since no power of arrest arises in respect of obstruction, the arrest must have been under s 25. However, it was found to be necessary to demonstrate that the officer had the general arrest conditions in mind when arresting. This might have been inferred, but the express reference to obstruction was thought to preclude an inference that he had other matters in mind. But where it appears that one of the conditions is contemplated, the reasonable grounds for suspicion do not appear to create an exacting standard. In G v DPP[183] a belief that an address was false, based on a general assumption that people who commit offences give false details was accepted as based on reasonable grounds. On this interpretation, the s 24(5) requirements are unlikely to act as curbs on the arrest power: once an offence is suspected, it would seem that one of them would be almost automatically fulfilled. The two new requirements clearly enhance this possibility.

181 Section 24A was inserted by s 111 Serious and Organised Crime Act 2005. If reasonable suspicion exists but the offence has not been committed, the arrest will be unlawful: Self [1992] 3 All ER 476.

182 (1993) 97 Cr App R 301; (1993) The Times, 29 March.

Counter-terrorist powers

There are two powers of arrest under the Terrorism Act 2000.[184] The power of arrest under s 41 TA is first in respect of reasonable suspicion of having committed certain terrorist offences, when read in conjunction with s 40(1)(a).[185] Under s 40(1)(a): 'In this Part a "terrorist" means a person who has committed [certain TA] offences.'[186] This definition is not exclusive; its other part is dependent upon s 40(1)(b). Section 40(1)(b) defines a terrorist as 'a person who is or has been concerned in the preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism'. Thus s 41 read with s 40(1)(b) allows, second, for an arrest, not in respect of a specific offence but on suspicion of 'being a terrorist' in the sense indicated. The broader and more uncertain a power of arrest, the more it may come into tension with Art 5. In considering the exceptional circumstances in which liberty can be taken away under Art 5, the requirements connoted by the general

183 [1989] Crim LR 150. For comment, see [1993] Crim LR 567.

184 Originally, under the TA there were further powers of arrest which were repealed. Part II of the EPA contained powers of arrest which were supplementary to those in s 14 of the PTA. They were applicable only in Northern Ireland and went further than those existing in the rest of the UK. Under s 18 of the EPA, a constable could arrest without warrant anyone whom he had reasonable grounds for suspecting of committing, having committed, or being about to commit, a scheduled offence or an offence under the EPA which was not a scheduled offence. Under s 19 of the EPA, a member of the armed forces on duty could arrest and detain a person for up to four hours on suspicion that he had committed, was committing or was about to commit any offence. The soldier was not required to inform the arrested person of the grounds of the arrest; and to effect the arrest he could enter and search any premises without a warrant. These powers were reproduced in ss 82 and 83 of the TA respectively. They continued to apply only in Northern Ireland. The continued absence of the need to give the grounds for arrest clearly raised the possibility that incompatibility with Art 5 will be found. Section 83(2) provided: 'A person making an arrest under this section complies with any rule of law requiring him to state the ground of arrest if he states that he is making the arrest as a member of Her Majesty's forces'. Section 83(6) then appeared to accept that s 83(2) would lead to findings that Art 5(3) has been breached in providing: 'The reference to a rule of law . . . does not include a rule of law which has effect only by virtue of the HRA'. Sections 82 and 83 have been repealed.

185 The power of arrest under s 14 of the PTA had two limbs. The first, s 14(1)(a), empowered a constable to arrest for certain specified offences under the PTA. As these offences were arrestable offences in any event, this power overlapped with that under s 24.

186 This includes offences under any of ss 11, 12, 15–18, 54 and 56–63.

provision that they must have a basis in law under Art 5(1) are also implied into the 'prescribed by law' rubric of each sub-paragraph.[187]

Arrests can obviously be made in respect of the terrorist offences under the Terrorism Act 2000 under s 24 of PACE. But if an arrest is effected under s 41 TA, as opposed to s 24 of PACE, this has an effect on the length of detention, as discussed below. From a constable's point of view it would probably be preferable to arrest under the TA rather than s 24 PACE, since the extra requirement under s 24(5) would not apply.

The ordinary arrest powers under PACE or under the first power of s 41 of the TA, read with s 40(1)(a), would almost certainly cover many arrests which could be undertaken under the second power covered by s 41 and s 40(1)(b) since there are a range of very broad terrorism offences. Police discretion is obviously particularly wide where no reasonable suspicion of any particular offence is necessary in order to arrest. This second power is clearly aimed at allowing arrest as a stage in the investigation, not as the culmination of it, and it may therefore be said to be firmly based on the crime-control model which views the purpose of arrest as a means of furthering general investigative goals. It therefore represents a clear departure from the traditional due process view of arrest taken by Phillips in 1981 as justified only after the investigation has uncovered sufficient evidence. The power was severely criticised when its predecessor was used in the context of Irish terrorism; it has now been transplanted into a different context and afforded a far wider application.

Section 41 TA read with s 40(1)(b) largely reproduces s 14(1)(b) of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 (PTA)). The government, in its 1998 Consultation Paper on Terrorism,[188] acknowledged the criticisms which s 14(1)(b) had attracted:

> . . . if the police have proper cause to suspect that a person is actively engaged in terrorism, they must have sufficient information to justify an arrest under PACE . . . the absence of any requirement for reasonable suspicion of a specific offence effectively allows the police free rein to arrest whomsoever they wish without necessarily having good reason, including those who should not be arrested at all.[189]

However, the government took the view that although the ordinary powers of arrest are extensive, they are insufficient to deal with the sophisticated evasion techniques of terrorists.[190] This claim might have been applicable to the well-organised Irish groups which caused extensive and severe harm during 'the Troubles'. But in respect of the vast range of groups potentially covered by the current legislation, it is more doubtful, especially bearing in mind the wide range of TA offences, many based, as indicated in Chapter 14, on a minimal actus reus and requiring no proof of mens rea.

187 Winterwerp v Netherlands A 33 (1979), para 39.
188 Legislation Against Terrorism: A Consultation Paper, Cm 4178, 1998.
189 Ibid, para 7.5.
190 Since they are 'skilled in, and dedicated to, evading detection . . . terrorist crime is often quite different [from serious non-terrorist crime] both in terms of the sophistication of the techniques deployed and the (potential) harm caused': ibid, para 7.8.

The continuation of this power is thus controversial. Under s 14(1)(b), a constable had to have reasonable grounds for suspecting that a person was concerned in the preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism connected with the affairs of Northern Ireland or 'any other act of terrorism except those connected solely with the affairs of the UK or a part of the UK' in order to arrest. Under s 41 TA and s 40(1)(b), the qualifying words are omitted. In other words, the arrest power is now applicable to non-Irish UK domestic groups who can be viewed as terrorist groups, including groups such as environmental activists threatening direct action. As the author suggested in 2000 might occur,[191] there is evidence that the arrest power is being used in respect of groups such as animal rights activists[192] since they fall within the s 1 TA definition. In practice, since s 14(1)(b) did not require suspicion relating to an offence, it was used for investigation, questioning and general intelligence gathering which may be conducted, it has been said, for the purpose of 'isolating and identifying the urban guerrillas and then detaching them from the supportive or ambivalent community'.[193]

Owing to its departure from due process principle in failing to require arrest for a particular offence, the reproduction of s 14(1)(b) of the PTA in ss 41 and 40(1)(b) of the TA rendered the arrest power vulnerable to a challenge under Art 5 of the Convention, which in para 5(1)(c) encapsulates that principle. The test under Art 5(1)(c) relies on reasonable suspicion regarding an offence and therefore calls into question s 41 of the TA, in so far as it relates to suspicion that a person is a terrorist in the sense of (under s 40(1)(b)) being concerned in the commission, preparation, or instigation of an act of terrorism. Section 41 therefore allows for arrest without reasonable suspicion that a particular offence has been committed. The compatibility of s 41 and Art 5(1)(c) depends on the interpretation afforded to Brogan and Others v UK.[194] The case concerned the EPA provision which was largely reproduced in s 41, read with s 40(1)(b). The Court applied two tests to the basis for the arrests in finding that the power of arrest was justified within Art 5(1)(c). First, the definition of acts of terrorism was 'well in keeping with the idea of an offence'.[195] Secondly, after arrest, the applicants were asked about specific offences. Thus, 'the Court decided the point on the basis that involvement in "acts of terrorism" indirectly meant the commission of specific criminal offences under Northern Irish law, which would appear to be the better approach on the facts'.[196]

On either test, arrests under s 41 read with s 40(1)(b) might be in a more doubtful position. The definition of terrorism relevant in Brogan was identical to the s 20 PTA definition – the use of violence for political ends. The current definition under s 1 of the TA is far wider: it covers the use or threat, 'for the purpose of advancing a political, religious or ideological cause', of action, designed to influence the government or intimidate the public, which involves serious violence against any person or serious damage to property, or is designed to seriously disrupt an electronic system, or endangers life, or creates a serious risk to health or safety. Unlike the previous one, this definition 191 See Fenwick, H, New Labour, Freedom and the Human Rights Act, 2000, Chapter 3, pp 79–80.

192 CAMPAC, Terrorising Minority Communities: anti-terrorism powers, their use and abuse, 2003.
193 Lowry (1976–77) 8–9 col Human Rights L Rev 185, p 210.
194 Judgment of 29 November 1988 (1989) Series A 145-B (1989) 11 EHHR 117.
195 Paragraph 51.
196 Harris, D, O'Boyle, K and Warbrick, C, Law of The European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, p 116.

may cover matters, such as threatening to hack into a computer system, or to destroy genetically modified crops, which do not clearly correspond to existing offences and therefore might not be viewed so readily as ‘in keeping with the idea of an offence’. The application of the second test would partly depend in practice on the particular instance which arose before a domestic court. If a person was arrested under s 41 as part of an investigation and was not asked about specific offences on arrest, the connection with the basis of the arrest, bearing in mind the width of the s 1 TA definition, might be viewed as too tenuous to be termed an arrest on reasonable suspicion of an offence. Moreover, the purpose of such an arrest would not appear to be in accordance with the Art 5 requirement, since it would not be to ‘bring [the suspect] before the competent legal authority’.

This possibility was recognised by Lord Lloyd, whose 1996 Report, prepared for Michael Howard, the then Conservative Home Secretary, underlay the Terrorism Act 2000.[197] He suggested that, in order to circumvent Art 5, a new offence of being concerned in the commission, preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism should be created. Having considered this suggestion, the government at the time rejected it, coming to the view, which is evaluated below, that this arrest power is compatible with Art 5(1)(c).[198] However, Lord Carlile, the government’s current independent reviewer of terrorist law and policy, supports the introduction of this offence, and it was recently introduced under the Terrorism Act 2006, ss 1 and 5. Since an arrest can now occur for those offences, which replicate the wording under s 40(1)(b), it will need to be less frequently invoked. Thus arrest for preparatory offences is now possible, ss 41 and 40(1)(a) of the TA, tending to avoid incompatibility with Art 5 since it is less necessary to rely on s 40(1)(b).

Other statutory powers of arrest

If a statute creates any offence, then obviously the arrest power under s 24 is applicable so long as one or more of the requirements under s24(5) is satisfied. Section 11 of the Public Order Act 1986 and s 89 of the Police Act 1996 provide examples of such offences. However, certain statutes expressly create specific powers of arrest which are not dependent on ss 24 or 25, such as ss 12 and 14 of the Public Order Act. In such cases, the procedure under s 28 of PACE (which is discussed below) will still apply.

Reasonable suspicion

Level of suspicion

Apart from the second arrest power under s 41 TA, and the s 24 provisions relating to involvement or attempted involvement in an offence, as opposed to suspected

197 Cm 3420.

198 Ibid, para 7.14. A further aspect of s 40 may raise issues under Art 5. Between the First and Second Readings of the Bill, s 40 was subtly changed to include reference to persons concerned in terrorism ‘whether before or after the passing of this Act’. Since the definition of terrorism in s 1 is much wider than that previously used in the PTA, s 20, s 40 allows arrest of a person for activity which would not have justified arrest (either under the PTA, s 14(1)(b) or at all) at the time when it was undertaken. The coverage of pre-commencement activity is confirmed in s 40(2).

involvement, the powers discussed depend on the concept of reasonable suspicion relating to an offence. Article 5(1)(c) of the Convention sets out one of the circumstances in which an individual can be detained. It permits the lawful arrest or detention of a person effected for the purpose of bringing him before the competent legal authority on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence, or where it is reasonably considered that an arrest is necessary to prevent the person in question from committing an offence or fleeing after having done so. In requiring arrest only for specific offences, and not for general crime control purposes, Art 5(1)(c) adheres closely to the due process model of arrest indicated above. Section 24 of PACE (apart from the 'hunch' provisions) and s 41 TA (in so far as it relates to certain specific terrorist offences under s 40(1)(a)) appear prima facie to comply with Art 5(1)(c) owing to their requirements of reasonable suspicion.

The idea behind the concept of reasonable suspicion is that an arrest should take place at quite a late stage in the investigation;[199] this limits the number of arrests and makes it less likely that a person will be wrongfully arrested. It seems likely that it will be interpreted in accordance with the provisions as to reasonable suspicion under Code A although, as will be discussed below, the courts have not relied on Code A in ruling on the lawfulness of arrests. Annex B, para 4 of original Code A stated that the level of suspicion for a stop would be 'no less' than that needed for arrest. Although this provision is omitted from the current revision of Code A, it would seem that in principle, the Code A provisions should be relevant to arrests if the Codes and statute are to be treated as a harmonious whole. Moreover, it would appear strange if a more rigorous test could be applied to the reasonable suspicion necessary to effect a stop than that necessary to effect an arrest. If this is correct, it would seem that certain matters, such as an individual's racial group, could never be factors which could support a finding of reasonable suspicion. It would seem that a future revision of the Codes might usefully state that the concept of reasonable suspicion in Code A applies to arrest as well; if so, it would at least outlaw the use of such factors as the basis of reasonable suspicion.

Code G on arrest has far less to say on the concept of reasonable suspicion than Code A does; what it has to say is only contained in the Notes; under Note 2: 'There must be an objective basis for that suspicion based on facts, information, and/or intelligence which are relevant to the likelihood the offence has been committed and the person to be questioned committed it.' The opening words of this Note echo those of para 2.2 Code A on reasonable suspicion and support the supposition that the two concepts are similar. Of course, the suspicion under Code A relates to carrying an article, whereas under Code G it relates to an offence. These words used in Note 2 largely echo the approach of the European Court of Human Rights in O'Hara v UK,[200] discussed below, which represents the most recent and definitive pronouncement on the matter from Strasbourg, and therefore would be expected to determine the nature of this concept in the UK courts, under the HRA.

The objective nature of suspicion required for most arrests, and now reflected in Code G, is echoed in various decisions on the suspicion needed for an arrest. In Dallison v Caffrey[201] Lord Diplock said the test was whether 'a reasonable man assumed to know the law and possessed of the information which in fact was possessed by the defendant would believe there were [reasonable grounds]'. Thus, it is not enough for a police officer to have a hunch that a person has committed or is about to commit an offence; there must be a clear basis for this suspicion which relates to the particular person in question and which would also be apparent to an objective observer. If an officer only has a hunch – mere suspicion as opposed to reasonable suspicion – he or she might continue to observe the person in question, but could not arrest until the suspicion had increased and could be termed 'reasonable suspicion'. Clearly, the officer could, however, arrest under the relevant provisions of s 24, if prepared to take the risk that the hunch might turn out to be incorrect.

199 See the Phillips Royal Commission Report, Cmnd 8092 (1981).
200 (2002) 34 EHRR 32.

However, this concept of reasonable suspicion still leaves a great deal of leeway to officers to arrest where suspicion relating to the particular person is at a low level, but they want to further the investigation by gathering information. At present, the courts seem prepared to allow police officers such leeway and it should be noted that PACE endorses a reasonably low level of suspicion owing to the distinction it maintains between belief and suspicion, suspicion probably being the lower standard.[202] The decision in Ward v Chief Constable of Somerset and Avon Constabulary[203] suggests that a high level of suspicion is not required, and this can also be said of Castorina v Chief Constable of Surrey.[204] Detectives were investigating a burglary of a company's premises and on reasonable grounds came to the conclusion that it was an 'inside job'. The managing director told them that a certain employee had recently been dismissed and that the documents taken would be useful to someone with a grudge. However, she also said that she would not have expected the particular employee to commit a burglary. The detectives then arrested the employee, having found that she had no previous criminal record. She was detained for nearly four hours and then released without charge. She claimed damages for false imprisonment and was awarded £4,500. The judge considered that it was necessary to find that the detectives had had 'an honest belief founded on a reasonable suspicion leading an ordinary cautious man to the conclusion that the person arrested was guilty of the offence'.

However, the Court of Appeal overturned the award on the basis that the test applied by the judge had been too severe. It was held that the question of honest belief was irrelevant; the issue of reasonable suspicion had nothing to do with the officer's subjective state of mind. The question was whether there was reasonable cause to suspect the plaintiff of burglary. Given that certain factors could be identified, including inside knowledge of the company's affairs and the motive of the plaintiff, it appeared that there was sufficient basis for the detectives to have reasonable grounds for suspicion.

201 [1964] 3 WLR 385. See also Shabaan Bin Hussein v Chong Fook Kam [1970] AC 942, esp at p 948.

202 Section 17(2)(a) requires belief, not suspicion, that a suspect whom an officer is seeking is on premises; similarly, powers of seizure under s 19(2) depend on belief in certain matters. The difference between belief and suspicion and the lesser force of the word 'suspect' was accepted as an important distinction by the House of Lords in Wills v Bowley [1983] 1 AC 57, p 103, HL. See also Johnson v Whitehouse [1984] RTR 38, which was to the same effect.

203 (1986) The Times, 26 June; cf Monaghan v Corbett (1983) 147 JP 545, DC (however, although this demonstrated a different approach, the restriction it imposed may not be warranted: see DPP v Wilson [1991] Crim LR 441, DC).

204 (1988) 138 NLJ 180, transcript from LEXIS.

Clayton and Tomlinson criticised the decision in these terms: 'if the police are justified in arresting a middle-aged woman of good character on such flimsy grounds without even questioning her as to her alibi or possible motives, then the law provides very scant protection for those suspected of crimes.'[205]

Castorina may be compared with the findings of the Strasbourg Court in Fox, Campbell and Hartley v UK.[206] The applicants had been arrested in accordance with s 11 of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 which required only suspicion, not reasonable suspicion. The only evidence put forward by the government for the presence of reasonable suspicion was that the applicants had convictions for terrorist offences and that when arrested, they were asked about particular terrorist acts. The government said that further evidence could not be disclosed for fear of endangering life. The Court found that although allowance could be made for the difficulties of evidence gathering in an emergency situation, reasonable suspicion which 'arises from facts or information which would satisfy an objective observer that the person concerned may have committed the offence'[207] had not been established. Moreover, 'the exigencies of dealing with terrorist crime cannot justify stretching the notion of reasonableness to the point where the essence of the safeguard secured by Art 5(1)(c) is impaired'.[208] The arrests in question could not, therefore, be justified. In Murray v UK[209] this test was viewed as a lower standard for reasonable suspicion, applicable in terrorist cases, but it was again emphasised that an objective standard of reasonable suspicion was required,[210] although the information grounding the suspicion might acceptably remain confidential in the exigencies of a situation such as that pertaining at the time of the arrest in question, in Northern Ireland.[211] It is debatable whether the UK courts are in general applying a test of reasonable suspicion under PACE or the TA which reaches the standards which the European Court had in mind, especially where terrorism is not in question. The departure which the HRA brings about is to encourage stricter judicial scrutiny of decisions to arrest.

The European Court of Human Rights in O'Hara v UK[212] commented on the nature of the reasonable suspicion required to satisfy Art 5(1)(c). The Court found that it requires the existence of some facts or information which would satisfy an objective observer that the person concerned may have committed the offence. However, the Court also accepted that the reasonable suspicion at the time of arrest need not be of the same level as that necessary to bring a charge.[213] As mentioned above, this statement accords with the test under Code A and that under Code G. Unsurprisingly, it confirms the need for an objective test, but otherwise is generally likely to affect no radical change in the stance of the courts in relation to this concept.

However, the later decision in Cumming v Chief Constable of Northumbria Police[214] appears to be out of line with that of the European Court. The five claimants worked 205 (1988) Law Soc Gazette, 7 September, p 26.

206 A 182 (1990); 13 EHRR 157.
207 Ibid, para 32.
208 Ibid, para 32.
209 [1994] EHRR 193.
210 Paragraph 50.
211 Paragraphs 58–59.
212 (2002) 34 EHRR 32.
213 Ibid, paras 34, 36.
214 [2003] EWCA Civ 1844.

for a local authority department concerned with monitoring recordings made by the town's closed circuit television cameras. They were arrested following the discovery of tampering with tapes showing the possible commission of an offence. They had no links with the suspected offender and were all of good character. Their claims for damages for wrongful arrest and false imprisonment were dismissed[215] and they appealed against this finding. The claimants submitted that mere opportunity could not found the requirements of reasonable suspicion under s 24(6) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. However, it was found by the Court of Appeal that there was nothing in principle to prevent opportunity from amounting to reasonable grounds. It was also acceptable to arrest more than one person even if only one could have committed the offence (Hussein v Chong Fook Kam[216] was relied upon). In the instant case only a small number of people could be clearly identified as the ones with the opportunity of committing an offence. That could in principle afford reasonable grounds for suspecting each of them in the absence of any information enabling further elimination. It was noted that in Fox, Campbell and Hartley v United Kingdom[217] the European Court had held that the protection of Art 5 of the Convention was met by the requirement that there be reasonable grounds for an arrest. Therefore, it was found, the Convention did not require the Court to evaluate the exercise of police discretion in any different way from the exercise of any other executive discretion. Thus, the Court of Appeal found that where there were reasonable grounds to suspect that one out of a certain group of people had committed an offence, there could be said to be reasonable grounds for arresting all of them. This decision does not demand that the reasonable suspicion should relate to the specific person arrested, although the test laid down by the Strasbourg Court does make that demand.

Reasonable suspicion and police working rules

As Sanders and Young observe, commenting on Castorina, 'The decision gives the police considerable freedom to follow crime control norms, in that it allows them to arrest on little hard evidence'.[218] In practice, the concept of reasonable suspicion is interpreted very flexibly by the police, as it is in respect of stop and search powers. Doubtful grounds often appear to be sufficient to provide reasonable grounds to justify deprivation of liberty. Only in exceptional instances will an officer's use of this power be found to have been wrongful. As in this instance the courts tend to be reluctant to interfere with the police interpretation and use of the arrest power. Post-PACE decisions, including this one, leave a great deal of leeway to officers to arrest where suspicion relating to the particular person or persons arrested is at a low level. The conclusion drawn by the Court as to the exercise of police discretion under the Convention does not follow from its findings as regards the exception under Art 5(1)c – which was referred to.

Research into the use of arrest suggests that in practice, the concept of reasonable suspicion is interpreted very flexibly by the police, as it is in respect of stop and search 215 By Judge Hewitt, sitting in Newcastle upon Tyne County Court on 27 January 2003.

216 [1970] AC 942.
217 (1990) 13 EHRR 157.
218 Sanders and Young, 2nd edn, 2000, op. cit., fn 1, at p 86.

powers. A wealth of academic research and analysis has established that the need for reasonable suspicion provides little protection against wrongful arrest. Very doubtful grounds often appear to be sufficient to provide reasonable grounds to justify deprivation of liberty. Further, only in exceptional instances will an officer's use of this power be found to have been wrongful; the courts are quite ready to find that these somewhat hazy tests have been satisfied.[219]

Sanders and Young speak of appearing 'suspicious' as being 'a key working rule' in arrests and stops, and observe that association with other criminals is also often the basis for arrest even where the police are 'entirely without reasonable suspicion', since the object is to obtain statements against associates.[220] The courts appear to be reluctant to interfere with the police interpretation and use of the arrest power. The post-PACE decisions discussed leave a great deal of leeway to officers to arrest where suspicion relating to the particular person is at a low level, but they want to further the investigation by gathering information.[221] As a number of commentators have pointed out, arrest became under PACE avowedly no longer the culmination of the investigative process but an integral part of it.[222] The strong evidence founding the charge which used to be obtained, it has been suggested,[223] prior to arrest, thus ensuring that innocent persons were unlikely to be arrested and that the infringement of liberty of a person innocent in the eyes of the law was kept to a minimum, tended after PACE to be found in the form of a confession, after arrest. PACE also confirmed the movement away from judicial supervision of arrest, by means of the warrant procedure, which had already begun.

Arresting officer must form reasonable suspicion

If there is no evidence that the arresting officer thought that an offence had been committed, even if objectively speaking there are reasonable grounds for suspicion, the arrest will be unlawful (Chapman v DPP).[224] If the arresting officer considers that there is no possibility that a charge will be brought the arrest will be unlawful since it would not be for a proper purpose: Plange v Chief Constable of South Humberside Police.[225] The reasonable suspicion must be formed by the arresting officer himself or herself. In O'Hara v Chief Constable of the RUC,[226] a decision on s 12(1) of the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1989, the House of Lords found that a constable could form a suspicion based on what he had been informed of previously as part of a briefing by a superior 219 See McConville, Sanders and Leng, op. cit., fn 1; Sanders and Young, op. cit., fn 2, (2007), Chapter 3.4; Ryan, C and Williams, K, 'Police discretion' [1986] Public Law 285, and Clayton and Tomlinson, (1988) Law Society Gazette 7 Sept, p 22.

220 Sanders and Young, op. cit., fn 1 (2007), pp 143–48 esp at 144, based on research undertaken by Leng (Royal Commission on Criminal Justice Research Study No 10), 1993.

221 See Ward v Chief Constable of Somerset and Avon Constabulary (1986) The Times, 26 June; Castorina v Chief Constable of Surrey (1988) NLJ 180, transcript from LEXIS.

222 Sanders and Young, op. cit., fn 1, (2007) at pp 138–150; Ewing, KD and Gearty, CA, Freedom under Thatcher, 1989, p 24.

223 Ewing and Gearty, ibid., p 25.

224 (1988) 890 Cr App R 190.

225 (1992) The Times, 23 March.

226 [1997] 2 WLR 1; [1997] 1 All ER 129.

officer, or otherwise. The question to be asked was whether a reasonable man would personally have formed the suspicion after receiving the relevant information. It was not enough for the arresting officer to have been instructed by a superior officer to arrest; his own personal knowledge must provide him with the necessary reasonable suspicion. In the instant case, the arresting officer had sufficient personal knowledge of matters, which it was found provided a basis for reasonable suspicion. The House of Lords stated that these findings applied to arrest powers other than the one arising under s 12. The Court of Appeal has found, following O'Hara, that reasonable suspicion based on an entry in the police national computer is sufficient.[227] The European Court of Human Rights in O'Hara v UK[228] has found that the approach taken in O'Hara is in accordance with the demands of Art 5. The Court accepted that the reasonable suspicion must be formed personally by the arresting officer, but could be based on information from other sources.

Arresting on a 'hunch'

As indicated, under s 24 it is not always necessary to show that reasonable suspicion exists. If an offence is in fact being committed or has been committed or is about to be committed, a constable can arrest even if he or she is just acting on a hunch which luckily turns out to be justified. Of course, if an officer arrests without reasonable suspicion, he or she is taking a risk. These provisions were included because it might seem strange if a person could found an action for false imprisonment on the basis that although he was committing an offence, he should not have been arrested for it. However, if it cannot be established that the offence was committed or was about to be committed, it is not enough to show that reasonable grounds for suspicion did in fact exist although the officer did not know of them. In Siddiqui v Swain[229] the Divisional Court held that the words 'reasonable grounds to suspect' used in s 8(5) of the Road Traffic Act 1972 include the requirement that the officer should actually suspect. This approach was also adopted in Chapman v DPP.[230] Article 5(1)(c) also calls into question the provision under s 24 of PACE allowing for arrest without reasonable suspicion so long as a 'hunch' turns out to be justified (s 24(4)(a), (5)(a) and (7)(a)). Sanders and Young call this possibility a 'classic crime control norm since the ends are regarded as justifying the means'.[231] Such an arrest would appear to be unlawful under s 6 of the HRA where effected by a police constable since no exception under Art 5 appears to allow for it.

Purpose of the arrest

In Castorina Purchas LJ also ruled that once reasonable suspicion arises, officers have discretion as to whether to arrest or do something else, such as making further inquiries, 227 Hough v Chief Constable of Staffordshire, 16 January 2001, unreported.

228 (2002) 34 EHRR 32.
229 [1979] RTR 454.
230 (1988) Cr App R 190; [1988] Crim LR 843.
231 Sanders and Young, Criminal Justice, 1st edn, 1994, p 76.

but that this discretion can be attacked on Wednesbury principles.[232] In making this ruling, Purchas J relied on the ruling of the House of Lords in Holgate-Mohammed v Duke.[233] The House of Lords had confirmed that in addition to showing that the relevant statutory conditions are satisfied, the exercise of statutory powers by officers must not offend against Wednesbury principles; officers must not take irrelevant factors into account or fail to have regard to relevant ones; an exercise of discretion must not be so unreasonable that no reasonable officer could have exercised it in the manner in question. Thus, an arrest will be found to be unlawful if no reasonable person looking at the circumstances could have considered that an arrest should be effected, if the decision is based on irrelevant considerations and if it is not made in good faith and for a proper purpose.[234]

It was found in Castorina that no breach of these principles had occurred and, as reasonable grounds for making the arrest were found, the first instance judge had erred in ruling that further inquiries should have been made before arresting. The need to make further inquiries would be relevant to the first stage – arriving at reasonable suspicion – but not to the second – determining whether to make an arrest. That it must be relevant to the first is axiomatic: an investigation passes through many stages, from the first, in which a vague suspicion relating to a particular person arises, up until the point when that person's guilt is established beyond reasonable doubt. At some point in that process, reasonable suspicion giving rise to a discretion as to whether to effect an arrest arises; thus, there must be a point in the early stages at which it is possible to say that more inquiries should have been made, more evidence gathered, before the arrest could lawfully take place. The courts appear prepared to accept that arrest at quite an early stage in this process may be said to be based on reasonable grounds. The application of Wednesbury principles left little leeway for challenge to the decision to arrest, so it may be said that the interest of the citizen in his or her personal liberty was not being accorded sufficient weight under the pre-HRA tests.[235]

Auld LJ in the post-HRA case of Al Fayed v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis[236] reaffirmed that Castorina involves asking three questions and that in determining all Castorina questions the state of mind is that of the arresting officer, subjective as to the first question, the fact of his suspicion, and objective as to the second and third questions, whether he had reasonable grounds for it and whether he exercised his discretionary power of arrest Wednesbury reasonably. It is for the police to establish the first two Castorina requirements, namely that an arresting officer suspected that the claimant had committed an arrestable offence and that he had reasonable grounds for his submission.[237] If the police establish those requirements, the arrest is lawful unless the claimant can establish on Wednesbury principles that the arresting officer's exercise

232 Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corpn [1948] 1 KB 223; [1948] 2 All ER 680, CA.

233 [1984] 1 AC 437; [1984] 1 All ER 1054, HL.

234 For discussion of police discretion in this respect, see [1986] PL 285.

235 See further as to reasonable grounds for suspicion, Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, 'Arrest and reasonable suspicion' (1988) Law Soc Gazette, 7 September, p 22; Dixon, D, Bottomley, K and Coleman, C, 'Reality and rules in the construction and regulation of police suspicion' (1989) 17 Int J Soc Law, 185–206; Sanders and Young, Criminal Justice, 2007, Chapter 3.4.

236 [2004] EWCA Civ 1579, at para 83.

237 Holgate Mohammed, per Lord Diplock at p 441F–H, and Plange, per Parker LJ.

or non-exercise of his power of arrest was unreasonable, the third Castorina question.[238] The findings in Austin and Saxby v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis[239] also took account of those issues, as discussed in Chapter 8.[240]

Article 5 considerations are able to limit the application of the broad Wednesbury principle.[241] Under the HRA, courts also have to consider whether the Convention rights have been adhered to; it is not enough to ask whether the decision to arrest was reasonable. The purpose of the arrest should also be in compliance with Art 5(1)(c), even where reasonable suspicion is established, in that it should be effected in order to 'bring [the suspect] before the competent legal authority', although this does not mean that every arrest must lead to a charge.[242] In the individual circumstances of a case, a breach of Art 5(1)(c) might be found where, although reasonable suspicion was present on the facts, the arrest discretion was not exercised in accordance with Art 5(1)(c) since the purpose of the arrest was in reality for general information-gathering ends. This might occur where, although there were, objectively, reasonable grounds for suspicion, the police had no belief in the guilt of the suspect. In such an instance, the arrest would be unlawful under s 6 of the HRA, not merely Wednesbury unreasonable. A breach might also be established where the arrest was unnecessary in order to further the purpose in question. For example, if the suspect was co-operative, there would appear to be no need to arrest her since the purpose under Art 5(1)(c) could be served by interviewing her in her own home. That purpose would not appear to cover an arrest undertaken merely for the purpose of interviewing such a suspect in the police station.[243] It was found, however, in Chalkley and Jeffries,[244] that the existence of a collateral motive for an arrest would not necessarily render it unlawful. Under the HRA, a domestic court has to consider whether Art 5 is satisfied by an arrest with a 'mixed' purpose.

Procedural elements of a valid arrest[245]

Informing the arrestee

For an arrest to be made validly, not only must the power of arrest exist, whatever its source, but the procedural elements must be complied with. The fact that a power 238 Holgate-Mohammed, per Lord Diplock at p 446A–D; Plange, per Parker LJ; and Cumming, per Latham LJ at para 26.

239 [2005] EWHC 480; [2005] HRLR 20; (2005) 155 NLJ 515, (2005) The Times April 14; 23 March 2005, Queen's Bench Division of the High Court.

240 See pp 766–70.

241 See the House of Lords in R v SSHD ex p Bugdaycay [1987] AC 514; R v SSHD ex p Brind [1991] 1 AC 696, see, e.g., per Lord Bridge of Harwich, at pp 748F–747B. See Cumming, paras 43 and 44: '. . . it seems to me that it is necessary to bear in mind that the right to liberty under Article 5 was engaged and that any decision to arrest had to take into account the importance of this right even though the Human Rights Act was not in force at the time . . . The court must consider with care whether or not the decision to arrest was one which no police officer, applying his mind to the matter could reasonably take bearing in mind the effect on the appellants' right to liberty'.

242 K-F v Germany (1997) 26 EHRR 390.

243 Cf Holgate-Mohammed v Duke [1984] AC 437.

244 [1998] 2 All ER 155.

245 The term 'valid arrest' is open to attack on the ground that there can be no such thing as an invalid arrest. However, a valid arrest may be contrasted with a purported arrest and this is the sense in which it is used in this section.

of arrest arises will not alone make the arrest lawful. These elements are of crucial importance owing to the consequences which may flow from a lawful arrest which will not flow from an unlawful one.[246] Such consequences include the right of the officer to use force in effecting it under s 117 of PACE or s 114 of the TA, if necessary, and the loss of liberty inherent in an arrest. If an arrest has not occurred, the citizen is free to go wherever she will and any attempt to prevent her doing so will be unlawful.[247] It is therefore important to convey the fact of the arrest to the arrestee and to mark the point at which the arrest comes into being and general liberty ceases. At common law, there had to be a physical detention or a touching of the arrestee to convey the fact of detention, unless he or she made this unnecessary by submitting to it;[248] the fact of arrest had to be made clear[249] and the reason for it had to be made known.[250] Conveying the fact of the arrest need not involve using words.

But it appears that conveying to the person in question the fact that a deprivation of liberty has occurred need not be taken to imply, necessarily, that an arrest has occurred. This follows from the decision in Laporte.[251] An arrest is the lawful apprehension of a person in order to bring him to a police station; a temporary deprivation of liberty, short of arrest, can be for some different purpose, such as transferring the person from one area to another, in order to prevent a breach of the peace. So since it appears that the police have the power at common law to deprive a person of liberty without perpetrating an arrest, it appears that indicating to the person by words or action that a deprivation of liberty has occurred could be interpreted as indicating that either a power of arrest or of a temporary detention is being invoked. It also follows from Gillan that it can be indicated to a person that they are not lawfully free to leave the spot for a short period of time, but that they are not under arrest or deprived of liberty. Presumably, in all these instances, since the police are acting within their powers, resistance to the detention would be unlawful. Clearly, the citizen is left in an uncertain position in relation to deprivation of liberty. As discussed below, the reason for the arrest has to be conveyed to the person. So it could be argued that an arrest occurs when a deprivation of liberty occurs and the reason is given. But even that suggestion does not capture the notion of an arrest, since the reason need only be given if it is practicable to do; also a reason need not be given if the arrest is for breach of the peace rather than an offence.[252]

The common law safeguards have been modified and strengthened by s 28 of PACE, which provides that both the fact of and the reason for the arrest must be made known at the time or as soon as practicable afterwards. However, an ordinary citizen is not 246 The question as to the difference between a valid and invalid arrest has been much debated; see Lidstone, KW [1978] Crim LR 332; Clark and Feldman [1979] Crim LR 702; Zander, M (1977) NLJ 352; Smith, JC [1977] Crim LR 293.

247 Rice v Connolly [1966] 2 QB 414; Kenlin v Gardner [1967] 2 QB 510 (see above, pp 1109–11 in relation to obstruction of or assault on a police officer in the course of his duty).

248 Hart v Chief Constable of Kent [1983] RTR 484.

249 Alderson v Booth [1969] 3 QB 216.

250 Christie v Leachinsky [1947] AC 573; [1947] 1 All ER 567, HL.

251 [2006] UKHL 55.

252 See Williamson v CC of Great Midlands [2004] 1 WLR 14; the Court of Appeal stated that it would be good practice for a person in this position to be treated as if subject to the PACE provisions. See also Chapter 8, pp 752 et seq.

under this duty if the fact of the arrest and the reason for it are obvious. Conveying the reason for the arrest does not involve using a particular form of words,[253] but it appears that reasonable detail must be given so that the arrestee will be in a position to give a convincing denial and therefore be more speedily released from detention.[254] Given the infringement of liberty represented by an arrest and the need, therefore, to restore liberty as soon as possible, consistent with the needs of the investigation, it is unfortunate that s 28 did not make it clear that a reasonable degree of detail should be given. In Mullady v DPP[255] where the arrest reasons were given as 'obstruction', it was held that where the reasons given to a suspect for his arrest are invalid or are the wrong reasons, then the arrest itself is unlawful. 'Obstruction' was not deemed sufficient since it is not an arrestable offence. It was found that where a police officer has given a reason for an arrest, another reason cannot be substituted, whether that involves the substitution of another offence or the inference that s 25(3)(a) of the 1984 Act was satisfied. This finding should also be applied to the conditions now applicable under s 24(5). The reason should be correct (Wilson v Chief Constable of Lancashire Constabulary).[256] In Wilson the arrestee was not given enough information to enable him to challenge the arrest, rendering the arrest unlawful. Code G makes further provision for informing the arrestee. Under para 2.2 Code G officers need to inform the suspect of the fact of the arrest even if it is obvious. Further, significantly, information as to the relevant circumstances of the arrest relating to both elements of s 24 must be given. But if the reason for the arrest was given in terms of the offence arrested for, as appears to be required by s 28, but no reason was given relating to the requirements of s 24(5) as required by Code G, it would appear that the arrest would still be lawful.

Informing promptly

However, the reason for the arrest need only be made known as soon as practicable. The meaning and implications of this provision were considered in DPP v Hawkins.[257] A police officer took hold of the defendant to arrest him, but did not give the reason. The youth struggled and was therefore later charged with assaulting an officer in the execution of his duty. The question which arose was whether the officer was in the execution of his duty since he had failed to give the reason for the arrest. If the arrest was thereby rendered invalid, he could not be in the execution of his duty, since it could not include effecting an unlawful arrest. It was determined in the Court of Appeal that the arrest became unlawful when the time came at which it was practicable to inform the defendant of the reason but he was not so informed. This occurred at the police 253 The Court of Appeal confirmed this in Brosch [1988] Crim LR 743. In Abassey and Others v Metropolitan Police Comr [1990] 1 WLR 385, it was found that there was no need for precise or technical language in conveying the reason for the arrest; the question whether the reason had been given was a matter for the jury. See also Nicholas v Parsonage [1987] RTR 199.

254 Murphy v Oxford, 15 February 1985, unreported, CA. This is out of line with the CA decision in Abassey [1990] 1 WLR 385, in which Murphy unfortunately was not considered.

255 [1997] COD 422; WL 1103678.

256 (2000) 23 November 2000, unreported.

257 [1988] 1 WLR 1166; [1988] 3 All ER 673, DC; see also Brosch [1988] Crim LR 743, CA.

station or perhaps in the police car, but did not occur earlier because of the defendant's behaviour. However, the arrest did not become retrospectively unlawful and therefore did not affect acts done before its unlawfulness came into being, which thus remained acts done in the execution of duty. Thus, the police have a certain leeway as to informing the arrestee; the arrest will not be affected, nor will other acts arising from it, until the time when it would be practicable to inform of the reason for it has come and gone. However, if there was nothing in the behaviour of the arrestee to make informing him or her impracticable, then the arrest will be unlawful from its inception. Following the decision in Hawkins, what can be said as to the status of the suspect before the time came and passed at which the requisite words should have been spoken? Presumably he was under arrest at that time. Where the procedural elements are not complied with but no good reason for such failure arises (or if no power to arrest arose in the first place), the arrestee will have grounds for bringing an action for false imprisonment. Moreover, if a false arrest occurs and subsequently physical evidence is discovered or the defendant makes a confession, the defence may argue that the evidence should be excluded owing to the false arrest. This is discussed in Chapter 13.[258]

Some delay in informing of the arrest will not create incompatibility with Art 5(2), which provides that a person must be informed promptly of the reason for arrest, and corresponds to s 28 of PACE. In Fox, Campbell and Hartley v UK[259] the applicants, who were arrested on suspicion of terrorist offences, were not informed of the reason for the arrest at the time of it, but were told that they were being arrested under a particular statutory provision. Clearly, this could not convey the reason to them at that time. At a later point, during interrogation, they were asked about specific criminal offences. The European Court of Human Rights found that Art 5(2) was not satisfied at the time of the arrest, but that this breach was healed by the later indications made during interrogation of the offences for which they had been arrested. In Murray v UK,[260] soldiers occupied a woman's house, thus clearly taking her into detention, but did not inform her of the fact of arrest for half an hour. The House of Lords had found that the delay in giving the requisite information was acceptable because of the alarm which the fact of arrest, if known, might have aroused in the particular circumstances – the unsettled situation in Northern Ireland.[261] The European Court of Human Rights found no breach of Art 5(2); Mrs Murray was eventually informed during interrogation of the reason for the arrest and, in the circumstances, it was found acceptable to allow an interval of a few hours between the arrest and the point when she was informed of the reason for it. (The claim also made, that Art 8 had been breached, was dismissed. The violation of privacy fell within the exception under Art 8(2) in respect of the prevention of crime and was found to be necessary and proportionate to the aims of that exception.)

The decisions in both Fox and Murray were influenced by the terrorist context in which they occurred, and provide examples of the Court's tenderness to claims of a threat to national security made by governments of member states. In both, a very 258 See pp 1277 et seq.

259 (1990) A 182; 13 EHRR 157.

260 Murray v UK (1994) 19 EHRR 193.

261 Murray v Ministry of Defence [1988] All ER 521, HL; for comment, see Williams (1991) 54 MLR 408.

wide margin of appreciation was allowed. Probably as a result, both were influenced by the crime control consideration of allowing leeway to the police to resort to doubtful practices in relation to terrorist suspects and both exhibit a lack of rigorousness in relation to due process. Such lack of rigour might be acceptable if there was a real connection between a failure to give information to suspects and an advantage to be gained in an emergency situation, since proportionality might be satisfied. However, in Mrs Murray's case, once she was in detention, and her house in effect sealed off from the outside world, it is unclear that telling her of the fact of the arrest could create or exacerbate an unsettled situation. Giving the requisite information would not have raised an alarm which had not already been raised when the soldiers entered the house. Following these judgments it seems that, where special circumstances may be said to obtain, an arrest which does not comply with all the procedural requirements will still be an arrest, for a period of time, as far as all the consequences arising from it are concerned, under Art 5(2).

If the word 'practicable' in s 28 is interpreted in accordance with the interpretation of Art 5(3) in both Murray and Fox it seems that, depending on the circumstances, a certain amount of leeway is created in respect of informing the arrestee. On somewhat doubtful grounds, the Convention has allowed some departure from the principle that there should be a clear demarcation between the point at which the citizen is at liberty and the point at which her liberty is restrained. Sanders and Young observe, commenting on the House of Lords' decision in Murray, 'Even where the legislature, as in s 28 of PACE, appears to be creating strong inhibitory rules, the judiciary still manages to draw their due process sting by rendering them largely presentational'.[262] This might also be said of the decision of the European Court. A domestic court in the post-HRA era might, however, be prepared to take a more activist approach to the application of Art 5(2), especially where a s 41 TA arrest, accompanied by delay in informing of the reason owing (apparently) to the terrorist context, occurred in circumstances which could not be compared in terms of volatility to the situation in Northern Ireland when Murray was decided.

Consensual detainment

Apart from situations in which reasonable suspicion relating to an offence arises, there is nothing to prevent a police officer asking any person to come to the police station to answer questions. There is no legal power to do so, but equally, there is no power to prevent such a request being made. The citizen is entitled to ask whether he or she is being arrested and, if not, to refuse. However, if he or she consents, no action for false imprisonment can arise. This creates something of a grey area, since the citizen may not realise that he or she does not need to comply with the request.[263] The government refused to include a provision in PACE requiring the police to inform citizens of the fact that they are not under arrest. However, when a suspect is cautioned he must also be told that he is free to leave if he is not under arrest (para 3.21 Code C). This is repeated in Code G (para 3.2).

262 Sanders and Young, Criminal Justice, 1st edn, 1994, p 103.

263 See McKenzie, I, Morgan, R and Reiner, R, 'Helping the police with their enquiries' [1990] Crim LR 22.

The requirement under s 29 that volunteers at police stations – those who are not under arrest – should be able to leave at will unless placed under arrest, does not appear to have much impact on police practice since many people may not realise that they can leave. Section 29 is backed up by para 3.2 Code G. However, this provision is less protective than it appears to be at first sight. A person need only be cautioned if there are grounds to suspect her of an offence. But if there are such grounds, she could probably be arrested, depending on the nature of the offence. Thus, para 3.2 would only come into play at the point when arrest could occur. It would only protect due process (assuming that it was adhered to) if it demanded cautioning on the arrival of a volunteer at a police station. Certain provisions included in Code of Practice C (see below) were intended to ensure that volunteers were not disadvantaged in comparison with arrestees.[264] Of course, such provisions do not affect the fact that some 'volunteers' might not have gone to the police station at all had they realised at the outset that they had a choice.

Use of force[265]

The police may use reasonable force so long as they are within one of the powers allowed under the PACE scheme. This is provided for under s 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 and s 117 of PACE 1984. Section 3 is in one sense wider than s 117, since it authorises the use of force by any person, although only in relation to making an arrest or preventing crime. The prevention of crime would include resistance to an unlawful arrest. Section 117 only applies to police officers and then only in relation to provisions under PACE which do not provide that the consent of someone other than a constable is required. Section 114 TA provides an equivalent provision in respect of the TA powers. Force may include as a last resort the use of firearms; such use is governed by Home Office guidelines,[266] which provide that firearms should be issued only where there is reason to suppose that a person to be apprehended is so dangerous that he could not be safely restrained otherwise. An oral warning should normally be given unless impracticable before using a firearm.[267] Under the 1967 Act, the force can only be used if it is 'necessary' and the amount of force used must be 'reasonable'. 'Reasonable' is taken to mean 'reasonable in the circumstances'[268] and, therefore, allows extreme force if the suspect is also using or appears to be about to use extreme force.

It may be argued that further guidance as to the meaning of 'reasonable' should be provided in PACE. Section 117 provides that 'the officer may use reasonable force, if necessary, in the exercise of the [PACE] power'. This could be taken to mean that any force used which was not, objectively speaking, absolutely necessary will be unreasonable or it might suggest that any force used which appeared necessary at the 264 In particular, Code C, paras 3.15 and 3.16. See Chapter 12, pp 1199–1200 below for further discussion of the position of volunteers.

265 For consideration of the use of force, see [1982] Crim LR 475; Report of Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis for 1983, Cmnd 9268; Waddington, PAJ, The Strong Arm of the Law, Clarendon, 1991.

266 The guidelines were reviewed in 1987 and reissued: see 109 HC Deb Cols 562–63, 3 February 1987; (1987) 151 JPN 146.

267 For comment on the use of firearms, see [1990] Crim LR 695.

268 See the ruling in Farrell v Secretary of State for Defence [1980] 1 All ER 166, HL.

time will be reasonable, but it is likely that the courts will adopt the latter view. As Chapter 2 demonstrated, Art 2 of the European Convention allows the use of even lethal force which is 'absolutely necessary' in order to arrest;[269] therefore, UK law may not be in harmony with the Convention since a 'reasonableness' test is used. The Convention requirements refer to the amount of force to be used, not to the question whether to use any force at all. But the Convention jurisprudence suggests that standards may differ in terms of planning operations[270] and executing them in the immediate situation.[271] Section 117 of PACE and s 114 of the TA allow for the use of 'reasonable force', if necessary, in the exercise of the powers they provide. This wording could be taken to mean that any force used which was not, objectively speaking, necessary would be unreasonable, or it might suggest that any force used which appeared, subjectively, necessary at the time would be reasonable. Article 2 suggests that the latter test should be used.[272] Where lethal force has been used it is arguable that, under s 3 of the HRA, the term 'absolutely' should be implied into the domestic provisions.

4 Detention in police custody

Introduction

Article 5(1) of the Convention provides a right to liberty subject to certain exceptions which must have a basis in law. Not only must an exception apply, but the requirements under Art 5(2), (3) and (4) must also be met. The current domestic arrest and detention scheme for non-terrorist suspects is, as one would expect, largely coterminous, formally speaking, with these provisions, and in some respects may afford a higher – or, at least, clearer – value to due process. But the use of Art 5 as an interpretative tool may lead to a more rigorous judicial approach to the detention scheme. Breaches of Art 5 are most likely to be established in respect of the special counter-terrorist arrest and detention powers available under the Terrorism Act 2000, as amended in 2006. At present detention in police custody for nearly a month is possible.

As discussed in Chapter 13, Art 5 arguments could be raised within the trial process, by means of a civil action or under the police complaints provisions. Judicial review, on Art 5 principles, of decisions within the police complaints process, or in respect of judicial authorisations within the PACE or TA schemes, or of police decisions relating to detentions would also be available under HRA s 7(1).

A procedure prescribed by law

The first and most essential requirement of Art 5 is that a person's detention is in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law. This means that the procedure should be in accordance with national law and with recognised Convention standards, including 269 See pp 39 et seq.

270 McCann, Farrell and Savage v UK (1995) 21 EHRR 97, A 324, Council of Europe Report. For further discussion of this issue, see above, pp 44–45.

271 Andronicou and Constantinou v Cyprus (1996) 22 EHRR CD 18.84. See above, p 41.

272 See Kelly v UK (1985) 8 EHRR 45.

Convention principles, and should not be not arbitrary.[273] Thus, where one of the Art 5(1) exceptions applies to a person's detention, this requirement will also have to be satisfied. The procedure covers the arrest provisions[274] and the procedure adopted by a court in authorisations of detention.[275] The requirement that the detention should be in accordance with the law was given a robust interpretation based on due process norms in one of the first domestic decisions in the pre-HRA period to place a heavy reliance on Art 5. In Chief Constable of Kent Constabulary ex p Kent Police Federation Joint Branch Board and Another,[276] the Court had to consider an application by Kent Police Federation Joint Branch Board, representing all ranks of the Kent Constabulary, for judicial review of the proposal by the Chief Constable of Kent that the conduct of reviews of police detention under s 40(1)(b) of the 1984 Act should be, in the majority of cases, by video link.

Lord Bingham referred to Art 5 and said that, although not yet part of domestic law, it embodied important and basic rights recognised and protected by English law. If citizens were to be deprived of their liberty, such deprivation had to be in accordance with the law. He found that the Court was dealing with an area of extreme sensitivity, namely the circumstances in which, and the conditions on which, a citizen not convicted or even charged with crime might be deprived of his or her liberty. The Act and the Codes giving it effect represented, he said, a complex and careful balance between the obviously important duty of the police to investigate crime and apprehend criminals on the one hand and the rights of the private citizen on the other. Under s 37(5), a written record of the grounds of detention had to be made by the review officer 'in the presence of the person whose detention is under review'. He found that that condition was not met if the review officer was in one place and the person whose detention was under review was in another. Section 37(5) did not refer to physical presence, but 'presence' in ordinary parlance meant physical presence.

Lord Bingham concluded that Parliament had provided for a face-to-face confrontation between the review officer and the suspect and, if important rights enacted to protect the subject were to be modified, it was for Parliament after appropriate consultation so to rule and not for the courts. This decision indicated a determination to give real efficacy to Art 5, where a contrary interpretation, impliedly supported by a guiding note,[277] was readily available. Review by video link would have meant the intrusion of technology, controlled by the police, into the review process, leading arguably to a depersonalised confrontation and possibly to a further impression of tokenism. As discussed below, this decision was then reversed legislatively, but it is indicative of the more rigorous scrutiny that the HRA has instilled into criminal procedure.

273 Winterwerp v Netherlands A 33 (1979), para 39.

274 Fox, Campbell and Hartley v UK, Appl No 182; (1990) 13 EHRR 157.

275 Weston v UK 3 EHRR 402; Van der Leer v Netherlands A 170-A (1990).

276 (1999) The Times, 1 December, judgment 18 November 1999.

277 He found that the provisions of Code C do not provide conclusive support for either construction. Note for guidance 15C (of the revision of the Code at the time) permitted review by telephone so long as the requirements of s 40 were met, but Lord Bingham had difficulty in seeing how a review conducted over the telephone could ever comply with those requirements, as that Note appeared to envisage.

Time limits on detention after arrest under PACE

The position under the law prior to the 1984 Act with regard to detention before charge and committal before a magistrate was very uncertain. It was governed by s 43 of the Magistrates' Courts Act 1980, which allowed the police to detain a person in custody until such time as it was 'practicable' to bring him before a magistrate, in the case of a 'serious' offence. Since a person would be charged before being brought before the magistrate, this meant that the police had to move expeditiously in converting suspicion into evidence justifying a charge.[278] However, the common law had developed to the point when it could be said that detention for the purpose of questioning was recognised.[279] Thus, prior to PACE, the police had no clearly defined power to hold a person for questioning. The detention scheme governed by Part IV of PACE put such a power on a more certain basis in accordance with the Phillips recommendations,[280] that the purpose of the detention is to obtain a confession.[281] This was foreshadowed in the developing common law recognition that detention was for the purpose of questioning.[282]

Phillips did not, however, envisage that the decision to arrest would become, in effect, the decision to detain. This is reflected in the role of the custody officer under s 37 of PACE. Under s 37 the custody officer should decide whether there is sufficient evidence to charge the suspect with the offence at this point. If not, the suspect should be released with or without bail, unless there are reasonable grounds for believing that detention is necessary 'To secure or preserve evidence relating to an offence for which he is under arrest or to obtain such evidence by questioning him.'[283] The second ground is the most frequently used. In theory, the custody officer could refuse to accept the arrestee into detention. In practice this is extremely rare, if not unknown; the custody officer almost always simply rubber-stamps the arresting officer's decision that the suspect should be detained[284] and custody officers appear to disregard the requirement to consider whether the detainee should be charged at the 'booking in' stage.[285] Thus, although s 37(3) appears to protect due process since it provides that the custody officer must be satisfied that there are reasonable grounds for the detention,[286] in practice it does not appear to affect police working practices.

Under s 41, the detention can be for up to 24 hours, but in the case of a person in police custody for a serious arrestable offence (defined in s 116) it can extend to 96 hours. Part IV of PACE does not apply to detention under the Terrorism Act 2000, as amended, (below) or to detention by immigration officers.[287] Under s 42(1), a police

278 See Holmes [1981] 2 All ER 612; [1981] Crim LR 802.

279 Holgate-Mohammed v Duke [1984] AC 437; [1984] 1 All ER 1054, HL.

280 See Phillips Royal Commission, Cmnd 8092 (1981).

281 Part IV, s 37(2).

282 Mohammed-Holgate v Duke [1984] QB 209.

283 Section 37(2). See also the reasons for continued detention after charge under s 38.

284 See Dixon, D et al., 'Safeguarding the rights of suspects in police custody', 1 Policing and Society 115, p 130.

285 See Capes, E, 'Detention without Charge' [1999] Crim LR 874.

286 Under s 45A, PACE allows regulation to be made allowing the decision under s 37 to be taken by means of video-conference. This power is not yet in force.

287 PACE 1984, s 51.

officer of the rank of superintendent or above can sanction detention for up to 36 hours if three conditions apply: he or she has reasonable grounds for believing that either the detention is necessary to secure or preserve evidence relating to an offence for which the detainee is under arrest or to obtain such evidence by questioning him; an offence for which the detainee is under arrest is a serious arrestable offence; and the investigation is being conducted diligently and expeditiously. After 36 hours, detention can no longer be authorised by the police alone. Under s 43(1), the application for authorisation must be supported by information and brought before a magistrates' court, which can authorise detention under s 44 for up to 96 hours if the conditions are met as set out above. Detention must be reviewed periodically;[288] in the case of a person who has been arrested and charged, the review must by the custody officer; in the case of a person arrested but not yet charged, by an officer of at least the rank of inspector. The detainee or his solicitor (if available) has the right to make written or oral representations.[289]

Research suggests, however, that these reviews are not treated as genuine investigations into the grounds for continuing the detention, but as routinised procedures requiring a merely formal adherence.[290] Perhaps in recognition of the need for rigour in relation to reviews, a proposal made in 1999 by the Chief Constable of Kent Police that detention review should be by video link in the majority of cases was rejected in judicial review proceedings on the ground, discussed above, that it might undermine the protection for liberty they are intended to offer, taking Art 5 into account.[291]

However, the government then brought forward legislation – s 73 of the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001 (CJP) – to reverse the effect of this decision. Section 73 inserted ss 40A and 45A into PACE to allow for the use of telephone and video links for reviews of detention. Section 40A allows for review by an officer of at least the rank of inspector by telephone where it is not reasonably practicable for the officer to be present at the station, and where the review is not one authorised to be carried out by video link under s 45A. Section 45A is an enabling section: it allows for the Secretary of State to make regulations to allow an officer to perform functions in relation to detainees when he or she is not present in the station but has access to a video link. The functions include carrying out the function of custody officer under ss 37, 38 and 40 and the carrying out of a review under s 40(1)(b). The function of custody officer can only be carried out by a custody officer at a designated station (s 45A(4)). Clearly, these new provisions in relation to review of detention detract from the face to face confrontation that was originally envisaged by Parliament.

The powers of detention are very significant, but they are intended to embody the principle that a detained person should normally be charged within 24 hours and then either released or brought before a magistrate. They are supposed to be balanced by all the safeguards created by Part V of PACE and Codes of Practice C, E (and F, although visual recording is not a requirement). It may be noted that a person unlawfully detained 288 Under s 40(1)(b).

289 Under s 40(12) and (13).

290 Dixon, D et al., 'Safeguarding the rights of suspects in police custody', 1 Policing and Society 115, pp 130–31.

291 R v Chief Constable of Kent Constabulary ex p Kent Police Federation Joint Branch Board and Another (1999) The Times, 1 December, judgment 18 November 1999.

can apply for a writ of habeas corpus in order to secure release from detention, and this remedy is preserved in s 51(d). Its usefulness in practice is, however, very limited since the courts have developed a practice of adjourning applications for 24 hours in order to allow the police to present their case. Thus, detention can continue for that time allowing the police to carry out questioning or other procedures in the meantime.

Detention under the Terrorism Act 2000, as amended

The detention scheme adopted in respect of terrorist suspects allowed for the suspect to be detained for longer periods than for non-terrorist suspects, and for a lower level of due process safeguards to be applicable during detention.[292] The detention scheme for terrorist suspects has been through a number of revisions, as discussed below, which have been driven on the one hand by due process demands imposed in effect by the European Court of Human Rights and on the other by governmental crime control concerns; it is still under review. Essentially, the period of detention has become incrementally longer, but it is subject to judicial authorisation.

Detention with judicial authorisation

Previously, if a person was arrested under s 14 of the PTA, as opposed to s 24 of PACE, whether the arrest was for an offence or on suspicion of being a terrorist, the detention provisions under PACE did not apply. The arrestee could be detained for up to 48 hours following arrest (s 14(4)) of the PTA) but this period could be extended by the Secretary of State by further periods not exceeding five days in all (s 14(5) of the PTA). Thus, the whole detention could be for seven days and, in contrast to the PACE provisions, the courts were not involved in the authorising process; it occurred at a low level of visibility as an administrative decision.

The similar provision under the PTA 1984 was found to be in breach of Art 5(3) in Brogan v UK.[293] Article 5(3) confers a right to be brought promptly before the judicial authorities; in other words, not to be held for long periods without a hearing. It covers both arrest and detention. There will be some allowable delay in both situations; the question is therefore what is meant by 'promptly'. Its meaning was considered in Brogan in relation to the arrest and detention of the applicants considered above, arising by virtue of the special powers under s 12 of the PTA. The UK had entered a derogation under Art 15 against the applicability of Art 5(3) to Northern Ireland, but withdrew that derogation in August 1984. Two months later, the Brogan case was filed. The applicants complained, inter alia, of the length of time they were held in detention without coming before a judge, on the basis that it could not be termed prompt. The Court took into account the need for special measures to combat terrorism; such measures had to be balanced against individual rights. However, it found that detention for four days and six hours was too long on the ground that holding a person for longer than four days without judicial authorisation was a violation of the requirement that persons should be brought promptly before a judicial officer. The Court did not specify how long was acceptable; previously, the Commission had seen four days as the limit. The government made no move to comply with this decision; instead, it entered a derogation under Art 15 to Art 5(3).

292 See below, Chapter 12, pp 1191 et seq. for discussion of such safeguards.
293 Judgment of 29 November 1988; (1989) 11 EHRR 117; A 145.

This derogation was challenged unsuccessfully in Brannigan and McBride v UK[294] as invalid. The European Court of Human Rights found that it was justified since the state of public emergency in Northern Ireland warranted exceptional measures. The Court found: 'a wide margin of appreciation [on the question] of the presence of an emergency . . . and on the nature and scope of derogations necessary to avert it [should be allowed]'.[295] Among the government contentions uncritically accepted by the Court was one to the effect that in the particular situation, the judiciary should not be permitted a role in protecting the liberty of detainees. As Judge Walsh pointed out in his dissenting opinion, this was precisely a role which the public would expect a judge to have. Brannigan might appear a doubtful decision because the derogation was entered after the decision in Brogan, although it might also be said that states should not be encouraged to enter derogations too readily on 'insurance' grounds in order to pre-empt claims. Arguably, although there was a state of emergency in 1989, the UK had chosen not to enter a derogation even though one would have been warranted. Whatever the merits of this argument in the particular situation, it is questionable whether the exigencies of the situation did require detention of six days without recourse to independent review. Possibly it was assumed on insufficient grounds that such review would prejudice the legitimate purpose of the investigation.

The Brogan decision clearly presented the government with a difficulty in formulating the Terrorism Act 2000. Although the HRA continued the derogation entered in Brogan, under s 14(1)(a) HRA, for a time, it was vulnerable to challenge at Strasbourg at some future point, in the light of the new settlement in Northern Ireland. The government put forward various justifications for producing new terrorist legislation in 2000, but it recognised that it might be in difficulties in arguing that a state of emergency sufficient to support the derogation could be said to exist post-2000.[296] Its solution, in the TA, was to make provision for judicial authorisation of detention, rather than to decrease the length of time during which terrorist suspects could be detained, harmonising it with the PACE period. In deciding on these arrangements, including the retention of the possibility of up to seven days' detention, the government rejected the suggestion of Lord Lloyd that once there was a lasting peace in Northern Ireland, it ought to be possible to reduce the maximum period for which a suspect could be detained under the new legislation to a total of four days – two days on the authority of the police and two days with judicial authorisation.

The maximum period of detention, applicable to a person arrested under s 41 of the TA, was seven days; it was extended to 14 days by amendment to s 41(7) and Sched 8 TA under the Criminal Justice Act 2003, and then, after the July 2005 bombings in London, it was extended again by further amendment under the Terrorism Act 2006, to 28 days. The government sought to extend the period of time to 90 days but was defeated in the House of Commons. At the time of writing the government intends to seek to bring forward the 90-day period once again in a possible new Terrorism Bill 2007 or 2008. Thus terrorism suspects can be held in detention for almost a month, in strong contrast to non-terrorist suspects, who can only be held for 96 hours, even for the most serious offences.

294 Series A, 258-B (1993); (1993) 17 EHRR 594.
295 Paragraph 207.
296 See Legislation Against Terrorism (1988) Cm 4178, para 8.2.

After 48 hours of detention judicial approval is needed. Para 29, Sched 8 TA provides that the detention must be under a warrant issued by a 'judicial authority'.[297] Under para 32, the warrant may be issued if there are reasonable grounds for believing that 'the detention of the person to whom the application relates is necessary to obtain relevant evidence whether by questioning him or otherwise or to preserve relevant evidence'. The detainee or his solicitor has the right to make written or oral representations under para 33(1). Thus, authorisation may not be merely 'on the papers'. Such a possibility might not have satisfied the aim of achieving compliance with Art 5(3), despite the involvement of a judicial figure. Judicial authorisation meant that the derogation was no longer needed, and it was lifted on 19 March 2001.

In requiring judicial authorisation for detention for up to seven days under s 41 and Sched 7 of the TA, the government has sought to ensure that the new detention provisions comply with Art 5(3) as interpreted in Brogan and Brannigan, meaning that it became possible to withdraw the derogation and, once this was accomplished, the HRA was accordingly amended.[298] One question which will probably be raised eventually in the domestic courts or at Strasbourg will be whether allowing a detention for seven days, even with judicial authorisation, is in accordance with Art 5.

Detention authorised by police alone

The provisions provide for a twin track system of detention, one dependent on the judicial authority and one on the police themselves. The police can detain a person on their own authority for 48 hours under s 41(3) which provides:

> Subject to subsections (4) to (7), a person detained under this section shall (unless detained under any other power) be released not later than the end of the period of 48 hours beginning –
>
> (a) with the time of his arrest under this section, or > (b) if he was being detained under Schedule 7 when he was arrested under this section, with the time when his examination under that Schedule began (emphasis added).

These provisions differ quite significantly from those under the PTA. Section 14(4) of the PTA provided that the 48 hour period is subject only to sub-section 5, which allowed for extension of detention by the Secretary of State. Section 41(4)–(7) of the TA appears to provide three possibilities of continuing the detention beyond 48 hours, over and above the possibility of extension under judicial authorisation. These possibilities represent, depending on the interpretation they are afforded, quite notable departures from the previous scheme. Section 41(6) provides that if an application for an extension of detention is made, or under s 41(5), it is intended that it will be made, detention can continue while it is pending. This impliedly means that the police can continue to detain for more than 48 hours so long as an application is being made or is about to be made, even if it is subsequently refused. The application need not be made during the 48 hours; under Sched 8, Part III, para 30 it may be made within six hours of the end of that period.

297 Paragraph 29(4) provides: 'In this Part "judicial authority" means (a) in England and Wales, the Senior District Judge (Chief Magistrate) or his deputy, or a District Judge (Magistrates' Courts) who is designated for the purpose of this Part by the Lord Chancellor, (b) in Scotland, the sheriff, and (c) in Northern Ireland, a county court judge, or a resident magistrate who is designated for the purpose of this Part by the Lord Chancellor.'

298 See further Chapter 2, p 57.

If, for example, towards the end of 54 hours in detention (a possibility under the TA, as indicated above) the police decided to apply for an extension of detention, they would have the power under s 41(5) to continue the detention while the application was being made and then under s 41(6) while the hearing was occurring. This possibility does not appear to accord with Brogan and Brannigan since there is no possibility of judicial authorisation of detention. Bearing in mind the wide margin of appreciation allowed in Brannigan, a domestic court taking a more activist stance might be prepared to find a breach of Art 5(3) in respect of a s 41 detention, depending on its length, in the particular circumstances before it. One clear possibility would be to limit the application of s 41(4) in accordance with the government's intention that the detention regime should comply with Art 5(3) which allowed for the withdrawal of the derogation.

The 48-hour period is also subject to s 41(4), which provides: 'If on a review of a person's detention under Part II of Schedule 8 the review officer does not authorise continued detention, the person shall (unless detained in accordance with sub-sections (5) or (6) or under any other power) be released.' The reviews have to occur every 12 hours. This is not well expressed but is intended to mean that within the 48-hour period the review officer (this must be an officer of at least the rank of superintendent after the first 12 hours) can continue the detention periodically, at 12-hour intervals, so long as the review conditions (which are the same as the warrant conditions) continue to apply. No express time limit is placed on the total period which the review officer can authorise. Clearly, s 41(4) should be interpreted to mean that within the 48 hour period there must be periodic reviews (subject to the provisions for delaying reviews); the possibility of providing the police with a new power to extend detention beyond 48 hours under s 41(4) should be rejected, since it seems to be due to ambiguous drafting. It is unlikely that s 41(4) could be interpreted to allow leeway to continue to detain beyond 48 hours, but the provision could be viewed as detracting from the certainty of the 48-hour deadline. The stricter interpretation accords with the government's intention as expressed in the Consultation Paper.[299] If, in practice, s 41(4) was interpreted on occasion to allow some detentions on the authority of the review officer only, beyond 48 hours, such detentions would obviously be more likely than those under the previous provisions to create breaches of Art 5(3).

As part of the port and border controls regime, Sched 5 to the PTA provided a further power of detention in allowing a person to be detained for 12 hours before examination at ports of entry into Britain or Northern Ireland. The period could be extended to 24 hours if the person was suspected of involvement in the commission, preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism. These provisions are partially reproduced in Sched 7 of the TA; they are modified to take account of the abolition of the exclusion power.[300]

299 Legislation Against Terrorism (1988) Cm 4178.

Clearly, the PACE and TA detention schemes differ quite radically in due process terms, despite the fact that many of those who will be potentially subject to the new TA scheme are likely to represent a far more divergent group than the previous one which fell within the rubric of 'terrorist'. Even within that previous group, as a number of the most famous miscarriage of justice cases imply, those who were designated terrorist suspects, such as Judith Ward,[301] were often remarkably ill-suited to the draconian terrorist regime to which they were subject. The peace process presented an opportunity for the harmonisation of the PACE and counter-terrorist regimes that might have avoided the potential for future miscarriages which, it is suggested, is inherent in the TA scheme, bearing in mind the special propensity evidenced in the cases of the Birmingham Six, [302]Guildford Four,[303] Maguire Seven,[304] Ward,[305] and UDR Four,[306] of terrorist cases to miscarry.

Treatment in detention

The role of the custody officer

The general use of custody officers provided for under s 36 is a key feature of the scheme for detention, treatment and questioning created under Parts IV and V of PACE. The custody officer's role is to underpin the other safeguards by ensuring that the suspect is treated in accordance with PACE and the Codes and by generally overseeing all aspects of his or her treatment.[307] Use of custody officers was intended to ensure that somebody independent of the investigating officer could keep a check on what was occurring. The scheme was not a new idea; in certain police stations an officer was already fulfilling this role, but PACE clarifies the duties of custody officers and ensures that most stations have one. Thus, best practice was placed on a statutory basis.

However, the efficacy of the custody officer scheme may be called into question. It may not always be in operation: in non-designated police stations, there must simply be someone who can act as custody officer if the need arises and in designated police stations, there need not always be a custody officer on duty. The ruling in Vince and Another v Chief Constable of Dorset[308] made it clear that s 36 does not require that a custody officer must always be present. The plaintiffs (acting for members of the joint branch board of the Police Federation of England and Wales of the Dorset Police) sought a declaration that by virtue of s 36(1) of PACE a custody officer should normally be available in a police station. However, it was found that s 36(1) clearly provided that

300 See Chapter 14, p 1406.
301 Ward (1992) 98 Cr App R 1.
302 See McIlkenny and Others [1992] 2 All ER 417.
303 See May, J, Report of the Inquiry into the Circumstances surrounding the Convictions Arising out of the Bomb Attacks at Guildford and Woolwich in 1974, Final Report, 1993–94 HC 449, Chapter 17.
304 See Maguire [1992] 2 All ER 433.
305 Ward (1992) 98 Cr App R 1.
306 See [1988] 11 NIJB 1.
307 For discussion of judicial interpretation of the PACE provisions, see Feldman, D, [1990] Crim LR 452.
308 (1992) The Times, 7 September.

the Chief Constable had a duty to appoint one custody officer for each designated police station and a power to appoint more in his discretion which had to be reasonably exercised. It was found that there had been no breach by the Chief Constable, implying that a decision that a custody officer need not always be on duty is a reasonable one. It may be argued that this case exposes a weakness in one of the central safeguards provided under PACE. This was referred to by Steyn LJ, who commented that the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure[309] might wish to consider this loophole in the PACE provisions. As indicated above, s 45A of PACE, inserted by s 73 of the CJP 2001, allows for a custody officer at a designated police station to act as a custody officer for the purposes of ss 37, 38 and 40(1)(b) of PACE by video link. Under the Police Reform Act 2002 a number of the police powers exercised in detention may be exercised by civilian detention officers, including powers to search, to take photographs, fingerprints and samples.

The custody officer may not always be able to take a stance independent of that of the investigating officer.[310] This weakness in the scheme arises from the lowly rank of the custody officer; under s 38(3), the officer need only be of the rank of sergeant and may therefore be of a lower rank than the investigating officer, making it very difficult to take an independent line on the treatment of the suspect. If the two disagree, the custody officer must refer up the line of authority (s 39(6)); there is no provision allowing the custody officer to overrule the investigating officer. Thus, there is a danger that the custody officer will merely rubber-stamp the decisions of the investigating officer; whether this occurs in practice may largely depend on the attitude of the superior officers in a particular force to the provisions of the PACE scheme.

Vulnerable groups

Throughout the Codes, including Code H, the Code governing the treatment of terrorist suspects in detention, recognition is given to the special needs of certain vulnerable groups: juveniles, the mentally disordered or handicapped, those not proficient in English, the hearing impaired or the visually handicapped. Juveniles and the mentally handicapped or disordered should be attended by an 'appropriate adult'. The Runciman Royal Commission Report 1993 recommended a review of the role of appropriate adults with a view to considering their training and availability and the criteria employed by the police in order to determine when an adult was needed.[311] In response, the Home Office set up a review group which, in June 1995, made a number of recommendations. They included entitling appropriate adults to a confidential interview with the suspect; defining the role of appropriate adults in Code C; providing guidance for professionals and others likely to act in this role and setting up local appropriate adult panels.[312] The Codes, particularly Codes C and H, now contain more detailed provisions regarding the role of appropriate adults.

309 Set up in 1992 after the miscarriage of justice which occurred in the case of the Birmingham Six. See p 1103 above.

310 See Sanders and Young, Criminal Justice 2007, Chapter 4, pp 168–170.

311 Proposal 72. For further discussion, see Hodgson J [1997] Crim LR 785.

312 The Report is available from the Chairman of the Review Group: Mr Stephen Wells, F2 Division, Home Office.

Under para 1, Code C or Code H the 'appropriate' adult in the case of a juvenile will be the parent or guardian, a social worker or another adult who is not a police officer. The suspect should be informed by the custody officer that the appropriate adult is there to assist and advise him and can be consulted with privately (para 3.18 Code C, para 3.19 Code H). However, research suggests that this requirement is not always observed and that in any event, appropriate adults often seem unclear as to the role they are supposed to play.[313] Under the 2006 version of Code C the estranged parent of a juvenile cannot be the appropriate adult,[314] if the juvenile 'expressly and specifically objects to his presence'. Previously this was possible and, in such instances, the parent was likely to collude with the police or generally show hostility to the juvenile rather than look after his or her interests.[315] This change was originally prompted by the decision in DPP v Blake[316] that a confession obtained from a juvenile in the presence of an estranged parent acting as the appropriate adult may be excluded from evidence. Compliance with the provisions of para 11, indicating the respects in which the appropriate adult should look after the interests of the juvenile, could not be ensured if an estranged parent was present.

In the case of a mentally disordered or handicapped detainee, the appropriate adult under para 1 will be a relative, guardian, other person responsible for his or her welfare or an adult who is not a police officer.[317] The custody officer must as soon as practicable inform the appropriate adult of the grounds for the person's detention and ask the adult to come to the police station to see him or her. If a person appears physically or mentally ill, the custody officer ensures that he or she receives appropriate clinical attention, or, in urgent cases, send the person to hospital or call the nearest available medical practitioner.[318]

It will be found, in discussion in Chapter 13 of unreliable confessions, that mentally handicapped or disordered persons are very likely to make an untrue or exaggerated confession and therefore it is particularly important that all the safeguards available should be in place when such a person is interviewed. However, there is provision for urgent interviewing of such persons without the appropriate adult if an officer of the rank of superintendent or above considers that delay will involve an immediate risk of harm to persons or serious loss of or serious damage to, property.[319] The main defect in the provisions relating to the mentally handicapped or disordered is that they rely on the ability of officers who will have had little or no training in the field to make the judgment that a person is mentally disordered.[320] It would seem essential that custody officers at 313 Brown, D, Ellis, T and Larcombe, K, Changing the Code: police detention under the revised PACE Codes of Practice, 1993, HO Research Study No 129.

314 Note 1B of Codes C and H. The change to Code C was introduced in 1991.

315 See Softley, P, 'Police interrogation: an observational study in four police stations' (1985) Policing Today 119.

316 [1989] 1 WLR 432, CA; this problem also arose recently at first instance in Morse [1991] Crim LR 195.

317 Paragraph 1.7; Code H, para 1.13.

318 Code C, para 9.5; Code H, para 9.6.

319 See Codes C and H, para 11.(d).

320 Codes C and H, Annex E, para 1, provide that if an officer 'has any suspicion or is told in good faith that a person of any age, whether or not in custody, may be suffering from medical disorder or is mentally handicapped or cannot understand the significance of questions put to him or his replies, then he shall be treated as a mentally disordered or mentally handicapped person'.

least should have special training in this regard. Various provisions are also available for the protection of members of the other vulnerable groups mentioned. A blind or visually handicapped person must have independent help in reading documentation.[321]

Conditions of detention

Code H, governing the conditions of detention for terrorist suspects, is of particular significance since such suspects may be in detention for up to 28 days. Code H, as opposed to the statutory provisions, governs the physical treatment of terrorist suspects, the provision of medical care and the issue of mental illness. The mental impact of almost a month in custody on the basis of reasonable suspicion only may be very significant. Physical treatment of detainees is governed by paras 8 and 9 of Codes C and H, and it is intended that they should be provided with basic physical care. Paragraphs 8 and 9 embody the principle that the detainee's physical safety should be ensured and his basic physical needs met. Persons detained should be visited every hour but, where possible, juveniles should be visited 'more frequently';[322] those who are drunk should be visited every half hour. The paragraphs do, however, allow more than one detainee to be placed in the same cell if it is impracticable to do otherwise (para 8.1) and although a juvenile must not be placed in a cell with an adult, no clear provision for frequent checks on juveniles in police cells is made. Paragraph 8.2 provides that cells should be adequately heated, cleaned, lit and ventilated and that three meals should be offered in any 24-hour period. A juvenile will only be placed in a police cell if no other secure accommodation is available and the custody officer considers that it is not practicable to supervise him if he is not placed in a cell. No additional restraints should be used within a locked cell unless absolutely necessary and then only suitable handcuffs (para 8.2). Reasonable force may be used if necessary (para 1), by designated persons where a police officer would also have that power. Under para 9, if a person appears mentally or physically ill or injured, or does not respond normally to questions or conversation (other than through drunkenness alone) or otherwise appears to need medical attention, the custody officer must immediately call the police surgeon (or, in urgent cases, send the person to hospital or call the nearest available medical practitioner).

Code H, like Code C, makes reference to allowing outdoor exercise, but the provisions are more detailed, Code H, para 8.7); Code H, unlike Code C, provides for facilities for detainees to conduct religious observance – in para 8.8. Code H also makes some further provision for medical treatment, requiring in para 9.1 that detainees held for more than 96 hours must be visited by a healthcare professional at least once every 24 hours. This provides a further check, over and above the provisions of para 9 for clinical treatment.

Treatment of a detainee can engage Art 3, which provides a guarantee against torture or inhuman or degrading treatment.[323] Article 3 could be engaged due to the conditions of detention or where physical force is used in the course of an arrest and detention.

321 Paragraph 3.17; Code H 3.18.

322 Codes C and H, Note 9B.

323 Article 3 treatment may be justifiable where its object is to satisfy the demands of Art 2, the right to life: Herczegfalvy v Austria A 244 (1992).

In Ribbitsch v Austria[324] the Court said: 'any recourse to physical force which has not been made strictly necessary by his own conduct diminishes human dignity and is in principle an infringement of the right set forth in Article 3.'[325] Force may only be used where it is strictly required to restrain the detainee and the force used must go no further, in terms of causing injury or humiliation, than is strictly necessary to achieve the purpose of restraint. Thus, a strict proportionality test is applied and force outside the limits it sets will infringe Art 3. A fortiori, this must be the case under Art 2, where lethal force is used.[326]

Article 3 treatment may arise in respect of a number of other aspects of detention. Failure to obtain medical treatment after a forcible arrest was found to infringe Art 3 in Hurtado v Switzerland.[327] In the Greek case,[328] the conditions of detention were found to amount to inhuman treatment owing to inadequate food, sleeping arrangements, heating and sanitary facilities combined with overcrowding and inadequate provision for external contacts. It was also found that conduct which grossly humiliates may amount to degrading treatment contrary to Art 3. Such treatment may include racially discriminatory and, probably, sexually discriminatory arrests and treatment in detention;[329] it might be found to fall more readily within Art 3 in a non-terrorist context.[330] Where discrimination is a factor, Art 14 would also be engaged.

The cases of Tomasi v France,[331] Tekin v Turkey,[332] Selmouni v France,[333] and McGlinchey v UK[334] make it clear that standards change over time, so that what might be

324 (1996) 21 EHRR 573.

325 See p 26. See Selmouni v France (2000) 29 EHRR 403 for an example of treatment in police custody found to amount to torture.

326 Article 2 therefore calls into question the recent cases of death caused by restraint during arrest. In 'Deaths in police custody: learning the lessons', Police Research Series Paper 26, 1998, Leigh, Johnson and Ingram found, in section 6, 13 cases of death in which police restraint may have been a factor. They found six cases where restraint may have led to 'postural' or 'positional asphyxia', leading to death. In two others, death was due to a neck-hold; in a further two, to force applied with a baton. They viewed these cases as having implications for training. The Butler Report, 1998, also considered a number of death in custody cases. In one of these, that of O'Brien, the arrestee, after being handcuffed, was held face down on the ground by at least four officers, one of whom knelt on his back, and one on his legs. The evidence was conflicting, but his family and a bystander stated that he was saying that he could not breathe. The post mortem found that he had died due to postural asphyxia and he had bruising to his head, shoulders and right arm. See Chapter 13, p 1321 in relation to criticism of decisions of the CPS in relation to this case. It is suggested that, prima facie, the force used went well beyond that which was absolutely necessary, and therefore it was not in accord with Art 2.

327 A 280-A (1994) Com Rep.

328 12 YB 1 (1969) Com Rep.

329 East African Asians cases (1973) 3 EHRR 76. See also Lustig-Prean and Beckett v UK (1999) 29 EHRR 548, and Smith and Grady v UK (2000) 29 EHRR 493, which suggested that grossly humiliating, intrusive interrogation could, if of an extreme and prolonged nature, amount to a breach of Art 3 (discussed below, pp 1207–8).

330 In McFeeley v UK (1980) 20 DR 44, intimate body searches in a terrorist context did not give rise to a breach of Art 3, but it has been suggested (see Harris, O'Boyle and Warbrick, Harris, D, O'Boyle, K and Warbrick, C, Law of The European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, p 83) that this finding might not apply in a non-terrorist context.

331 (1993) 15 EHRR 1.

332 (2001) 31 EHRR 4.

333 (1999) 29 EHRR 403.

334 (2003) 37 EHRR 41.

viewed as degrading treatment in the past might now be viewed as torture. Ill treatment that might not have been viewed as 'degrading' 20 years ago might now fall within Art 3. The Scottish case of Napier v Scottish Ministers[335] accepted that a broader concept of Art 3 treatment should now be adopted. Assuming that the treatment arguably falls within Art 3, the burden of proof on the detainee is affected, following the decisions in Tomasi v France[336] and Aksoy v Turkey.[337] Once the detainee has shown that he was free of the injury or harm in question before arrest, the state will then bear the burden of providing a plausible explanation for it which is consistent with the evidence. If it does not do so, the domestic court should assume that the injuries in question were caused in the manner alleged by the complainant.

Where Art 3 is inapplicable, since the treatment does not reach the level of severity the Article envisages, a breach of Art 8 might be established in respect of treatment invasive of privacy in police detention. In Wainwright v Home Office[338] the House of Lords had to consider whether humiliating treatment of visitors to a prison amounted to a breach of Art 3 or 8. The findings could readily be applied by analogy to detainees in police custody. The applicants, Mary Wainwright and her son, Alan Wainwright, went to visit Ms Wainwright's son, Patrick O'Neill, in prison. Mr Wainwright has cerebral palsy and severe arrested social and intellectual development. They were informed that they would be strip-searched, as there was reason to believe that they were carrying drugs. Leeds Prison has internal rules designed to reduce the embarrassment of strip-searching as far as possible. They are modelled on the code of practice issued to the police. They provide that the search must take place in a completely private room in the presence of two officers of the same sex as the visitor. The visitor is required to expose first the upper half of his body and then the lower but not to stand completely naked. His body (apart from hair, ears and mouth) is not to be touched. Before the search begins, the visitor is asked to sign a consent form which outlines the procedure to be followed. The Wainwrights were told that, if they refused, they would not be allowed to visit Mr O'Neill. Ms Wainwright was subjected to a strip search with visual examination of her vagina and anus. Mr Wainwright was subjected to such a search but his penis was physically examined. Both were very distressed by the searches. The Court of Appeal found that the prison officers had not followed their own rules in conducting the searches. Both the Wainwrights had been asked to uncover all or virtually all of their bodies at the same time; and neither were given the consent form until after the search had been completed; the room used to search Mrs Wainwright was not private because it had an uncurtained window from which someone across the street could have seen her, and one prison officer had touched Alan's penis to lift his foreskin.

The House of Lords proceeded on the basis that the searches took place under statutory authority, and were governed by the internal prison rules in question, but that the rules had not been adhered to, although the prison officers had honestly believed that they were entitled to conduct the searches. Mr Wainwright was awarded damages for

335 (2004) UKHRR 881.

336 A 241-A (1992).

337 (1996) 23 EHRR 553. These decisions should also be taken into account where treatment in police custody results in death, engaging Art 2. See Chapter 13, p 1321.

338 (2003) 4 All ER 969.

battery. The HRA was not in force at the time when the facts of Wainwright took place, but the House was invited by counsel for the plaintiffs to consider extending the common law of battery or the doctrine in Wilkinson v Downton[339] in order to provide a remedy for the breaches of the Convention rights which, counsel argued, had occurred.

On the question of the violation of Arts 3 or 8, Lord Hoffmann, giving the leading judgment, took a restrictive view, at least of the proportionality aspect of Art 8. Article 3, it was found, was not violated by the treatment that they were subjected to. On this point Lord Hoffmann found (para 49):

> I have no doubt that there was no infringement of article 3. The conduct of the searches came nowhere near the degree of humiliation which has been held by the European Court of Human Rights to be degrading treatment in the cases on prison searches to which we were referred: see Valasinas v Lithuania[340] (applicant made to strip naked and have his sexual organs touched in front of a woman); Iwanczuk v Poland[341] (applicant ordered to strip naked and subjected to humiliating abuse by guards when he tried to exercise his right to vote in facilities provided in prison); Lorsé v The Netherlands[342] (applicant strip searched weekly over six years in high security wing without sufficient security justification).

In relation to Art 8 he found (paras 51 and 52):

> Although article 8 guarantees a right of privacy, I do not think that it treats that right as having been invaded and requiring a remedy in damages, irrespective of whether the defendant acted intentionally, negligently or accidentally . . . Article 8 may justify a monetary remedy for an intentional invasion of privacy by a public authority, even if no damage is suffered other than distress for which damages are not ordinarily recoverable. It does not follow that a merely negligent act should, contrary to general principle, give rise to a claim for damages for distress because it affects privacy rather than some other interest like bodily safety: compare Hicks v Chief Constable of the South Yorkshire Police.[343] Be that as it may, a finding that there was a breach of article 8 will only demonstrate that there was a gap in the English remedies for invasion of privacy which has since been filled by sections 6 and 7 of the 1998 Act.

Lord Hoffmann also found that there was no general tort of invasion of privacy (at para 32), and that there was no need to adopt one, either by modification of common law doctrines or by accepting a general common law principle that a privacy remedy is required in order to satisfy the demands of Art 8:

> Nor is there anything in the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights which suggests that the adoption of some high level principle of privacy is necessary

339 [1897] 2 QB 57.
340 Appl No 44558/98 (unreported) 24 July 2001.
341 Appl No 25196/94 (unreported) 15 November 2001.
342 Appl No 52750/99 (unreported) 4 February 2003.
343 [1992] 2 All ER 65.

> to comply with article 8 of the Convention. The European Court is concerned only with whether English law provides an adequate remedy in a specific case in which it considers that there has been an invasion of privacy contrary to article 8(1) and not justifiable under article 8(2).[344]

Further, there was, he found, no need to modify common law doctrines order to satisfy the demands of Art 8 (para 52):

> . . . a finding that there was a breach of article 8 will only demonstrate that there was a gap in the English remedies for invasion of privacy which has since been filled by sections 6 and 7 of the 1998 Act. It does not require that the courts should provide an alternative remedy which distorts the principles of the common law.

It is notable that Lord Hoffmann did not deal with the question of proportionality in relation to negligent acts of public authorities. The internal rules applicable were designed in effect to prevent a breach of Art 8 if adhered to, in the sense that while strip searches prima facie create a breach of Art 8, the invasion of privacy can (arguably) be justified under Art 8(2) as proportionate to the aim – of preventing drug use in prison – pursued, if the search is fully compliant with the rules. Lord Hoffmann did not take that into account. The decision left open the possibility that only deliberate invasions of privacy would require a remedy, although it also found that even in such instances no remedy would be available at common law. However, at Strasbourg it was found that the treatment of the Wainwrights did amount to a breach of Art 8, although not of Art 3, in Wainwright v UK.[345]

The European Court of Human Rights took a different view as to the ambit of Art 8 in this context, in Wainwright v UK. The treatment, it was found, undoubtedly caused the applicants distress but did not, in the Court's view, reach the minimum level of severity prohibited by Art 3. Rather, the Court found that the case fell within the scope of Art 8.[346] The Court accepted that the search pursued the legitimate aim under Art 8(2) of fighting the drugs problem in the prison. On the other hand, it was not satisfied that the searches were proportionate to that aim in the manner in which they were carried out. Where procedures were laid down for the proper conduct of searches on outsiders to the prison who might very well be innocent of any wrongdoing, the prison authorities, it was found, were required to comply strictly with those safeguards and by rigorous precautions protect the dignity of those being searched as far as possible. The Court found that they did not do so in the applicants' case. Considering that the searches 344 He went on to look at the relevant authorities: 'So in Earl Spencer v United Kingdom 25 EHRR CD 105 it was satisfied that the action for breach of confidence provided an adequate remedy for the Spencers' complaint and looked no further into the rest of the armoury of remedies available to the victims of other invasions of privacy. Likewise, in Peck v United Kingdom (2003) 36 EHRR 41 the court expressed some impatience, at paragraph 103, at being given a tour d'horizon of the remedies provided and to be provided by English law to deal with every imaginable kind of invasion of privacy. It was concerned with whether Mr Peck (who had been filmed in embarrassing circumstances by a CCTV camera) had an adequate remedy when the film was widely published by the media. It came to the conclusion that he did not.'

345 Appl No 12350/04, 26 September 2006.

346 See the discussion of Art 8 in Chapter 2, pp 69–71

carried out on the applicants could not be regarded as 'necessary in a democratic society', the Court found that there had been a breach of Art 8.

In relation to remedies for breaches of Arts 3 or 8 in police detention, the Strasbourg decision does not add very much to that of the House of Lords as the HRA ss 7 and 8 now provides a remedy since the police are a public authority under s 6 HRA. But, importantly, the Strasbourg decision takes a more expansive view of Art 8-compliant treatment than the House of Lords did. If it is accepted that the findings on Art 8 need not be viewed as part of the ratio of the case in the House of Lords, since Lord Hoffmann appeared to leave the question of a breach of Art 8 open,[347] it would seem that the domestic courts should now apply the interpretation of Art 8 from Wainwright v UK.

The Court also observed that, while it was true that the applicants took domestic proceedings seeking damages for the searches and the effects they had had on them, they were unsuccessful, save as regards the instance of battery on Mr Wainwright. As regards the other elements of the strip-searches, the Court observed that the House of Lords found that the negligent action disclosed by the prison officers did not give grounds for any civil liability, in particular as there was no general tort of invasion of privacy. In those circumstances, the Court found that the applicants did not have available to them a means of obtaining redress for the interference with their rights under Art 8. There had therefore also been a violation of Art 13.

The Convention rights only lay down very broad guarantees and only reflect minimum standards. The detailed 'guarantees' of proper conditions of detention is found in Codes C and H. Thus in so far as certain standards for the conditions of detention are expressly stated, domestic law currently reflects the Art 8 or 3 guarantees in non-statutory rules alone. For example, the conduct of intimate searches is governed by s 55 of PACE, but its provisions are fleshed out in Annex A of Codes C and H. Strip-searches, as opposed to intimate searches, are covered only by part B of Annex A to Codes C and H. The use of force to conduct them is authorised by s 117 of PACE.[348] The provisions governing the conditions of detention mentioned in the Greek case arise only in Codes C and H, paras 8 and 9. Provisions in Code C and H, para 8 regarding the use of restraints, including handcuffs, in cells can be viewed as intended to ensure that Art 3 is not infringed.

Bearing in mind the quasi-legal status of the Codes, and the lack of a remedy for their breach, their provisions might be afforded, indirectly, a higher status due to their role in upholding the standards demanded by Arts 3 and 8, under ss 2 and 6 of the HRA.[349] The Codes might readily be viewed as analogous to the prison rules, at issue in Wainwright, and also of quasi-legal status. The point made by the Strasbourg Court in Wainwright to the effect that procedures laid down for the proper conduct of searches should be strictly complied with if no breach of Art 8 was to arise could readily be applied to the Code provisions. Those provisions are there to act as safeguards – in effect – against treatment that might otherwise breach Arts 8 or 3. In other words, they are there to ensure that basic human rights standards are maintained in that detainees are not treated in a disproportionately humiliating fashion, injured or otherwise maltreated in police custody – a matter that is of particular significance in relation to terrorist suspects, bearing in mind the length of time that they may be in detention. If the Code provisions are not complied with, the Wainwright decision implies that a breach of Art 3 or 8 might more readily be found under the HRA. Strasbourg was referring to persons probably innocent of any wrong-doing – visitors to a prison. Clearly, the fact of being a suspect in police custody is inherently humiliating and distressing. Thus the status of persons as suspects in police custody would have some impact on the proportionality analysis under Art 8. But since a number of Code H, D and C provisions are clearly in place in order to guard, so far as possible in the context, against invasions of privacy while in police custody, it can be assumed that they should be adhered to if a breach of Art 8 is not to arise.

347 See Chapter 4, p 197 on the question of conflicts between House of Lords' decisions and subsequent Strasbourg rulings.

348 Clearly, criminal law applicable to indecent assault would not be applicable where the search was properly authorised.

349 See above, pp 1106–7.

Remedies under either common law or criminal law would not be applicable in certain instances of treatment non-compliant with the demands of Art 3 or Art 8. This would be the case where there was no physical contact with the detainee, as in the case of Ms Wainwright. Following the Wainwright decision, it is clear that there is no common law tortious remedy in respect of certain forms of humiliating privacy-invading treatment imposed upon persons by state agents. If they amount to a breach of Art 8 – or, if severe enough – of Art 3, the remedy will be available under ss 7 and 8 HRA. Sections 7 and 8 HRA therefore, provide guarantees against various forms of maltreatment in police detention, which are not currently duplicated in domestic statutory or common law provisions. In relation to Art 3, however, the guarantees are limited since Art 3 demands that such maltreatment should be of a high level of severity. Article 8 provides a guarantee of much more general application, covering preservation of dignity, so far as possible in this context. In general, in this context the HRA provides a remedy that was previously unavailable. Allegations of ill-treatment in police custody have frequently raised grave concerns;[350] they can now be addressed by the use of Arts 3 or 8 in actions directly against the police under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA.

The Strasbourg decision in Wainwright is arguably of great significance where no public authority is involved in perpetrating the Art 8-breaching treatment (even though it was given in the context of maltreatment by a public authority), but that is a matter outside the scope of this chapter.[351] Had Lord Hoffmann taken the path taken (arguably) by the House of Lords in Campbell,[352] in accepting an extension of the existing common law to cover the invasion of privacy at issue in Wainwright – even if denying the need for a remedy in the instant case – the UK would not have been found to have violated Art 13 as well as Art 8 at Strasbourg. The HRA was not in force at the time when the facts of Wainwright occurred. However, Lord Hoffmann could merely have relied on Art 8 as a means of influencing domestic law and extending it to cover the facts before 350 See the Report of the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, based on a visit carried out from 8 to 17 September 1999. See also the Butler Report, 1998. Inter alia, the Report covers the case of Derek Treadaway (pp 37–38). He alleged that he had suffered ill-treatment, possibly amounting to torture, in police custody, and successfully sought judicial review (31 July 1997) of the decision of the CPS not to prosecute the officers involved. For relevant Convention jurisprudence, see above, Chapter 2, pp 45–48.

351 See Chapter 9, pp 817–20.

352 See Chapter 9, pp 911–13.

him, even without the assistance of s 6 HRA. He made it clear that if the HRA had been in force he would not have contemplated the possibility of extending the common law (obviously it would have been unnecessary to do so in relation to the instant case). Clearly, when the House of Lords decided the case they were aware of the findings of Lord Justice Sedley in Douglas v Hello!,[353] which were referred to in Wainwright, as to the potential effect of the Convention on the common law, albeit under the HRA. Campbell and Douglas obviously related to deliberate invasions of privacy, Wainwright to a negligent invasion. However, Art 8, it is now clear, covers negligent invasions of privacy, according to the findings in Wainwright v UK. Lord Hoffmann's judgment missed the point that such invasions still have to satisfy the doctrine of proportionality under Art 8(2). It also missed the point that private actors could subject persons to similar invasions of privacy (e.g. a requirement to submit to a search for drugs on the premises of the company that the employee works for),[354] but that even after the HRA came into force, no remedy would be available in such circumstances.

Searches of detained persons

Detained persons may not automatically be searched, but the power to search arrestees under s 32(1) of PACE is quite wide. It arises under s 32(1) if the suspect has been arrested somewhere other than a police station and a constable has reasonable grounds to suspect that an arrestee has anything on him which might be evidence relating to an offence or might be used to help him escape from custody or that he may present a danger to himself or others. The much wider power arises under s 32(2) and allows search, again on reasonable grounds, for anything which might be evidence of an offence or could help to effect an escape from lawful custody. The nature of the search must relate to the article it is suspected may be found; if it is a large item, the search may not involve more than removal of a coat. Such searching may occur routinely, but it must be possible to point to objectively justified grounds in each case which must not go beyond those specified.[355] A power of search also arises under s 54, as amended, allowing search to ascertain property the detainee has with him or her, which will apply if someone has been arrested at the police station or brought there after being arrested elsewhere. The custody officer must determine whether it is necessary to conduct a search for this purpose.

Intimate searches, bodily samples, swabs and impressions

Under s 55 PACE, an intimate search can only be ordered if an officer of the rank of superintendent or above has reasonable grounds for believing that an article which could cause physical injury to a detained person or others at the police station has been concealed or that the person has concealed a Class A drug which he intends to supply to another or to export. Even if such suspicion arises, the search should not be carried out unless there is no other means of removing the object. Before it can be carried out, the reasons for undertaking it must be explained to the suspect and a reminder given of the entitlement to legal advice.[356] An intimate search at a police station may only be carried out by a registered medical practitioner or registered nurse unless, under Codes C and H Annex A, the authorising officer considers, in the case of a concealed object which could cause injury, that it is not practicable to wait, in which case a police officer of the same sex as the suspect can carry it out. Under Codes C and H an intimate search at a police station of a juvenile or a mentally disordered or mentally handicapped person must take place only in the presence of the appropriate adult of the same sex, unless the suspect requests otherwise.[357] Codes C and H Annex A provide that an intimate search must be conducted with proper regard to the 'sensitivity and vulnerability' of the suspect. It must take place in a completely private room in the presence of two persons of the same sex as the detainee. A juvenile has the right to have the appropriate adult present unless he or she requests otherwise in the presence of the adult.[358]

353 See Chapter 9, pp 903–5.

354 This would also be the case in respect of an invasion of privacy during the course of perpetrating criminal actions, such as rape. Obviously, redress would be available under the civil law for battery, but not for invasion of privacy.

355 Eet [1983] Crim LR 806.

Codes C and H Annex A also make provision for strip searches. They must also be conducted with proper regard to the 'sensitivity and vulnerability' of the suspect, must not be used routinely, must take place in a private room and must be conducted by two officers of the same sex as the detainee. The suspect is required to expose first the upper half of his body and then the lower but not normally to stand completely naked. Bodily orifices are not to be touched. Searches should not be carried out routinely, but only if necessary to remove an article that the officer reasonably considers the detainee might have concealed.

Evidence obtained from the suspect himself can identify the suspect as the person who committed the offence in question, or can demonstrate that he is innocent of it. Identification procedures are largely governed by the provisions of Code D which has, as its overall aim, the creation of safeguards against wrongful identification, bearing in mind that mistaken identification can be a very significant cause of wrongful convictions.[359] Code D, together with Codes C and H, Annex A, contains provisions which are intended to safeguard vulnerable groups and to ensure that the invasion of privacy represented by some methods of identification is kept to a minimum consistent with the Code's overall aim. Many of the procedures will only take place with the suspect's consent, although if consent is not forthcoming, this may be used in evidence against him or her.[360] In the case of a mentally handicapped or disordered person, consent given out of the presence of the 'appropriate adult' will not be treated as true consent while the consent of a juvenile alone will not be treated as valid if the adult does not also consent.[361]

356 See Codes C and H, para 4.1 and Annex A.

357 Under Annex A, para 5 in the case of a juvenile, the search may take place in the absence of the appropriate adult only if the juvenile signifies in the presence of the appropriate adult that he prefers the search to be done in his absence and the appropriate adult agrees.

358 Codes C and H, Annex A, para 6.

359 The Criminal Law Revision Committee 1972 considered that wrongful identification was the greatest cause of wrongful convictions (para 196).

360 Codes C and H, Annex A, para 2A.

361 Code D, para 2.12.

Bodily samples, swabs and impressions may be taken in respect of recordable offences. The relevant provisions are ss 62 and 63 PACE, as amended, and the Terrorism Act 2000, Sched 8. Intimate samples may be taken if the officer has reasonable grounds to believe that such an impression or sample will tend to confirm or disprove the suspect's involvement in the offence and with the suspect's written consent. But the suspect must be warned that if they refuse without good cause the refusal may be used against them at trial.[362] The suspect must be warned using the warning as set out in Code D, Note 6D. He must also be reminded of his entitlement to have free legal advice and the 362 For non-terrorist suspects, s 62 PACE governs the taking of intimate samples and s 63 PACE covers the taking of non-intimate samples. Terrorist suspects are governed by the Terrorism Act 2000, Sched 8, paras 10–13 in respect of intimate and non-intimate samples. See also Code D, para 6. Under s 62 PACE:

(1) Subject to section 63B below an intimate sample may be taken from a person in police detention only –

(a) if a police officer of at least the rank of inspector authorises it to be taken; and
(b) if the appropriate consent is given.

(1A) An intimate sample may be taken from a person who is not in police detention but from whom, in the course of the investigation of an offence, two or more non-intimate samples suitable for the same means of analysis have been taken which have proved insufficient –

(a) if a police officer of at least the rank of inspector authorises it to be taken; and
(b) if the appropriate consent is given.

(2) An officer may only give an authorisation under subsection (1) or (1A) above if he has reasonable grounds –

(a) for suspecting the involvement of the person from whom the sample is to be taken in a recordable offence; and
(b) for believing that the sample will tend to confirm or disprove his involvement.

(3) An officer may give an authorisation under subsection (1) or (1A) above orally or in writing but, if he gives it orally, he shall confirm it in writing as soon as is practicable.
(4) The appropriate consent must be given in writing . . .

. . .

(9A) In the case of any other form of intimate sample, except in the case of a sample of urine, the sample may be taken from a person only by –

(a) a registered medical practitioner; or
(b) a registered health care professional.

(10) Where the appropriate consent to the taking of an intimate sample from a person was refused without good cause, in any proceedings against that person for an offence –

(a) the court, in determining –
 (i) whether to commit that person for trial; or
 (ii) whether there is a case to answer; and

(aa) a judge, in deciding whether to grant an application made by the accused under paragraph 2 of Schedule 3 to the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 (applications for dismissal); and

(b) the court or jury, in determining whether that person is guilty of the offence charged, may draw such inferences from the refusal as appear proper.

. . .

(12) Nothing in this section applies to a person arrested or detained under the terrorism provisions; and subsection (1A) shall not apply where the non-intimate samples mentioned in that subsection were taken under paragraph 10 of Schedule 8 to the Terrorism Act 2000.

reminder must be noted in the custody record. Intimate samples[363] may only be taken under ss 62 PACE, as amended, or under the Terrorism Act 2000, Sched 8 para 12, by a registered medical or dental practitioner or registered nurse, whereas non-intimate samples[364] may be taken by a police officer. They may be taken without consent if an officer of the rank of inspector or above has reasonable They may be taken without consent if an officer of the rank of inspector or above has reasonable grounds for believing that the sample will tend to confirm or disprove his involvement in it.[365]

A person arrested or detained under the terrorism provisions can have intimate samples taken under the Terrorism Act 2000, Schedule para 12 under similar provisions, and a refusal to allow the sample to be taken can be used against the suspect under the Terrorism Act 2000; Schedule para 13.

363 'Blood, semen or any other tissue fluid, urine, saliva or pubic hair or a swab taken from a person's body orifice' (PACE, s 65).

364 Including hair other than pubic hair or a sample taken from a nail or from under a nail or a skin impression (PACE, s 65, as amended by CJPOA 1994, s 80(5)(b)).

365 See PACE s 63, as amended and Code D paras 6.5–6.9. The Terrorism Act 2000 Sched 8 para 10 covers non-intimate samples taken from terrorist suspects. Under s 63:

(1) Except as provided by this section, a non-intimate sample may not be taken from a person without the appropriate consent.

(2) Consent to the taking of a non-intimate sample must be given in writing.

(2A) A non-intimate sample may be taken from a person without the appropriate consent if two conditions are satisfied.

(2B) The first is that the person is in police detention in consequence of his arrest for a recordable offence.

(2C) The second is that –

(a) he has not had a non-intimate sample of the same type and from the same part of the body taken in the course of the investigation of the offence by the police, or
(b) he has had such a sample taken but it proved insufficient.

(3) A non-intimate sample may be taken from a person without the appropriate consent if –

(a) he is being held in custody by the police on the authority of a court; and
(b) an officer of at least the rank of inspector authorises it to be taken without the appropriate consent.

(3A) A non-intimate sample may be taken from a person (whether or not he is in police detention or held in custody by the police on the authority of a court) without the appropriate consent if –

(a) he has been charged with a recordable offence or informed that he will be reported for such an offence; and
(b) either he has not had a non-intimate sample taken from him in the course of the investigation of the offence by the police or he had a non-intimate sample taken from him but either it was not suitable for the same means of analysis or, though so suitable, the sample proved insufficient.

(3B) A non-intimate sample may be taken from a person without the appropriate consent if he has been convicted of a recordable offence.

(3C) A non-intimate sample may also be taken from a person without the appropriate consent if he is a person to whom section 2 of the Criminal Evidence (Amendment) Act 1997 applies (persons detained following acquittal on grounds of insanity or finding of unfitness to plead).

(4) An officer may only give an authorisation under subsection (3) above if he has reasonable grounds –

(a) for suspecting the involvement of the person from whom the sample is to be taken in a recordable offence; and
(b) for believing that the sample will tend to confirm or disprove his involvement …

(6) Where (a) an authorisation has been given; and (b) it is proposed that a non-intimate sample shall be taken in pursuance of the authorisation, an officer shall inform the person from whom the sample is to be taken – (i) of the giving of the authorisation; and (ii) of the grounds for giving it.

(7) The duty imposed by subsection (6)(ii) above includes a duty to state the nature of the offence in which it is suspected that the person from whom the sample is to be taken has been involved.

(8) If a non-intimate sample is taken from a person by virtue of subsection (3) above –

(a) the authorisation by virtue of which it was taken; and

(b) the grounds for giving the authorisation, shall be recorded as soon as is practicable after the sample is taken.

(8A) In a case where by virtue of [subsection (2A), (3A)] [FN1], (3B) or (3C) above a sample is taken from a person without the appropriate consent –

(a) he shall be told the reason before the sample is taken; and
(b) the reason shall be recorded as soon as practicable after the sample is taken.

(8B) If a non-intimate sample is taken from a person at a police station, whether with or without the appropriate consent –

(a) before the sample is taken, an officer shall inform him that it may be the subject of a speculative search; and
(b) the fact that the person has been informed of this possibility shall be recorded as soon as practicable after the sample has been taken.

(9) If a non-intimate sample is taken from a person detained at a police station, the matters required to be recorded by subsection (8) or (8A) or (8B) above shall be recorded in his custody record . . .

(10) Nothing in this section applies to a person arrested or detained under the terrorism provisions.

(11) Nothing in this section applies to a person arrested under an extradition arrest power.

A person arrested or detained under the terrorism provisions can have non-intimate samples taken under the Terrorism Act 2000, Schedule para 10 under similar provisions.

Chapter 12

Police questioning: safeguards for suspects

1 Introduction[1]

In crime control terms, the police interview occupies a central position in the criminal justice system; it represents an effective use of resources, since if a confession becomes available, the criminal process is likely to be accelerated.[2] In particular, since mens rea is a requirement of most offences, admissions provide the most readily available means of establishing the state of mind of the suspect at the relevant time. The interview may, in effect, replace the trial, since its results may play a key part in the pre-trial risk-balancing and negotiating process in which the suspect decides whether to plead guilty. Clearly, the stronger the risk of a conviction which would be unaccompanied by a sentence discount, the less likely it is that he or she will plead not guilty.[3] If the suspect has confessed or made some admissions, he may feel that there is no point in pleading not guilty even if the admissions are false, exaggerated or misleading. The interview may also frequently play a part in general criminal intelligence gathering.[4] On their face, the crime control advantages of the interview are readily apparent although, clearly, if an intimidating atmosphere and a lack of due process safeguards lead a suspect to make false admissions that cannot advance crime control ends.

From a due process perspective the police interview is largely unjustifiable, since its raison d'être is to secure admissions which probably would not otherwise be secured; it therefore undermines the privilege against self-incrimination. This due process norm traditionally underpinned criminal justice practice,[5] but it was gradually

1 For further comment, particularly on the 1984 Act and on the relevant provisions under the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, as amended, see: Sanders, A and Young, R, Criminal Justice, 3rd edn, 2007; Feldman. D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 2nd edn, 2002, Chapters 5 and 9; Clark, D Bevan and Lidstone's the Investigation of Crime, 2004; Levenson, H and Fairweather, F, Police Powers, 1990; McConville, M, Sanders, A and Leng, R, The Case for the Prosecution, 1991; Bailey, SH, Harris, DJ and Jones, BL, Civil Liberties: Cases and Materials, 2002, Chapter 2; Zander, M, The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, 2003; Reiner, R and Leigh, LH, 'Police powers', in McCrudden, C and Chambers, G (eds), Individual Rights and the Law in Britain, 1994; Klug, F, Starmer, K and Weir, S, The Three Pillars of Liberty, 1996.

2 See McConville, M (1993) RCCJ Research Study No 13, 1993; Baldwin, J, 'Police interview techniques; establishing truth of proof' (1993) 33 Br J Criminology 325.

3 See Sanders and Young, Criminal Justice, 3rd edn, 2007, Chapter 8, Part 2.

4 Maguire and Morris, RCCJ Research Study No 5, 1992.

5 The 1912 Judges' Rules did not allow police interrogation, although the police could invite and receive voluntary statements.

abandoned until it became accepted in the pre-PACE years that the purpose of the interrogation was to obtain admissions.[6] The precarious position of the interview from this perspective explains, it is suggested, why it seemed necessary, when PACE placed police interrogations on a formal basis, to infuse due process elements into them. Such elements are intended to detract from any impression that the confession is involuntary. The police, however, remain the gatekeepers to these safeguards, which seem to run counter to their crime control concerns, and therefore they may not be observed or, more subtly, the weaknesses and loopholes in the interviewing scheme will be discovered and explored.

PACE strongly reflects this uneasy compromise between crime control and due process: the detainee can be detained for the purposes of obtaining a confession under s 37(2), but a number of safeguards were created which are influenced by due process concerns to lessen the coerciveness of the interview and to ensure its integrity and reliability so that it can be used as evidence. The extensive and complex rules of Code C which appear to surround police interviews with a range of safeguards, afford the interview an appearance of due process. A number of flaws, however, in due process terms, were built into the scheme when it was first introduced. Most significantly, there are no sanctions for breach of the interviewing rules, including those arising under PACE itself, apart from the possibility of disciplinary action.[7] There is uncertainty as to when an exchange with police becomes an interview so as to attract all the safeguards. There is scope for interviewing away from the police station, thereby evading the most significant safeguards, those of access to legal advice and tape recording. Virtually no guidance is given as to the acceptable limits of 'persuasive' interviewing, so long as it is not oppressive. This is particularly a matter of concern in respect of the questioning of terrorist suspects, especially bearing in mind the length of the detention to which they can be subjected – up to 28 days at present. As discussed below, the level of protection for due process is lower at a number of points than for non-terrorist suspects. Code H, which governs their treatment in police questioning, does recognise to an extent that such lengthy detention has particular implications in terms of its mental impact,[8] but, although there are a number of provisions for obtaining medical aid in respect of such suspects, the problem of relying on admissions made after a lengthy period of detention are not, it is argued, afforded sufficient recognition.

The link between due process in the custodial period and at trial is recognised in Art 6, under HRA, Sched 1. As Chapter 13 will demonstrate, arrest and detention and, where relevant, treatment within that period may be considered under Art 6, whether or not a breach of Art 5 or any other Article is established.[9] Under Art 6, the European Court of Human Rights has developed the concept of the fairness of the trial 'as a whole', allowing for consideration of custodial treatment in a broad sense. In Saidi v France[10] the Court said that its role was to determine 'whether the

6 Holgate-Mohammed v Duke [1984] 1 AC 437; [1984] 1 All ER 1054.

7 This possibility became even more remote when PACE, s 67(8), rendering breach of the Codes automatically a breach of the police Disciplinary Code, was repealed in 1994 by the Police and Magistrates' Courts Act 1994, s 37 and Sched 9.

8 See also Chapter 11, p 1174.

9 See pp 1259–62.

10 (1994) 17 EHRR 251.

proceedings in their entirety . . . were fair'.[11] In Barbéra, Messegué and Jabardo,[12] the trial taken as a whole could not be said to be fair. This was partly due to features of the treatment of the defendants pre-trial, taken cumulatively. They were held for a substantial period of time incommunicado and when they confessed to the police they did not have legal assistance. Nevertheless, their confessions were significant in later questioning by examining judges. The unfair pre-trial treatment clearly had a tendency to render the trial unfair, although it is improbable that such a tendency would have been found without the unfairness at the hearing itself.[13] Nevertheless, the findings in Barbéra are significant, since they emphasise the need to consider the whole criminal process, including any custodial period, in determining fairness. It might be appropriate where the pre-trial custodial treatment, including the manner of questioning, had had a cumulatively harsh effect, to stay the prosecution for abuse of process; or exclusion of admissions obtained during, or as a result of, a course of harsh or adverse treatment might be appropriate in order to satisfy Art 6. Civil actions may be brought against the police, including claims for damages in respect of breaches of the rights. These possibilities are discussed further in Chapter 13.[14]

This chapter does not concentrate only on questioning of suspects inside the police station because contact between police and suspect takes place a long time before the police station is reached, and this has been recognised in the provisions of Part V of PACE and Codes of Practice C and H, which govern treatment of suspects and interviewing, but have some application outside as well as inside the police station. It should be noted that many of the key provisions relating to interviewing are contained in Codes C or H rather than in PACE itself. The most crucial events during a person's contact with police will probably be the interviews, and therefore this section will concentrate on the safeguards available which are intended to ensure that interviews are fairly conducted and are properly recorded wherever they take place. This chapter examines the key aspects of the interviewing scheme by considering the points at which the various safeguards must be in place; the conduct of the interview; the means of recording the interview. It then goes on to consider the right of access to legal advice, the curtailed right to silence and its relationship with the legal advice scheme. The effect of flaws in the pre-trial procedures discussed here on the fairness of the trial is considered in Chapter 13.

The PACE Codes and police questioning

Under the pre-PACE rules, safeguards for the interview were governed largely by the Judges' Rules and Administrative Directions to the Police[15] and s 62 of the Criminal Law Act 1977. The latter provided for access to a solicitor (although it was frequently ignored). The former provided, inter alia, for the issuing of cautions when a person was charged (not necessarily when he was arrested) and for the exclusion in evidence of statements and confessions which were not 'voluntary' (see below). Under PACE, those

11 Paragraph 43.
12 A 14 6(2) (1989).
13 There were 'unexpected changes' in the membership of the court, the hearing was brief; most importantly, there was a failure to adduce and discuss evidence orally in the accused's presence.
14 See pp 1303–10.
15 E.g., Home Office Circular 89/1978, Appendices A and B.

rules were replaced by rules contained either in the Act itself or in Code of Practice C. As discussed below, most of the safeguards related to questioning are contained only in the Codes.

It might be expected that the distribution of the provisions governing the interviewing scheme would give some recognition to theoretical differences in status between PACE, the Codes, the Notes for Guidance and Home Office circulars, the most fundamental provisions being contained in the Act and so on. In fact, this is not the case: although the Act contains the right to legal advice in s 58, and the right to have someone informed of detention in s 56, the other important features of the interviewing scheme, including the right to silence,[16] are governed by non-statutory provisions. Just as it cannot be assumed that in due process terms Code provisions are less weighty than statutory ones, equally the Notes for Guidance and even the Circulars[17] do not invariably contain less crucial provisions than the Codes. In other words, the distribution of provisions between the four tiers does not follow a consistent pattern: the source of a provision has an effect on the likelihood that it will be complied with, but does not necessarily say much about its significance.

The original interviewing scheme under Code C was revised in 1991 and improved by the introduction of tape recording under Code E. That revision, was, it is suggested, concerned wholly with improving the scheme's due process elements, albeit in a manner best described as superficial: the rules became more complex in order to deal with police evasion of them, but their fundamental flaws were hardly addressed. Despite the relationship a number of commentators had observed to exist between coerced confessions and miscarriages of justice,[18] the recommendations made by the 1993 Runciman Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure, which might, minor as they were, have continued the improvements undertaken in 1991, were largely ignored.[19] Under the Major Government, the disciplinary sanction for breaching the Codes was removed under s 37(f) of the Police and Magistrates Court Act 1994, and the right to silence was curtailed under ss 34–37 of the CJPOA 1994. Largely as a consequence of the changes introduced under the CJPOA, the PACE Codes were revised once again in 1995; this revision, unlike the previous one, appeared to have a dual aim: it seemed to be intended to have some weak due process impact in eradicating loopholes, but it also introduced various provisions in order to give effect to the curtailment of the right to silence. These changes indicated a move away from the rather ineffectual attempts previously undertaken to protect the due process elements in the interviewing process.

16 As contained in the caution: Code C, para 10.5 (Code H, para 10.4) (and, of course, recognised at common law).

17 E.g., a provision in the 1991 Circular required that where a suspect had changed his mind after requesting legal advice, a note should be made in the custody record of the reason for the change. The provision was presumably included with a view to discouraging police officers from providing misleading information which might induce the suspect to forgo legal advice.

18 See Walker, Miscarriages of Justice, 1999, p 54.

19 E.g., the Runciman Report, Chapter 4, para 23 put forward a recommendation to retain the right to silence, in the context of improved safeguards for suspects, taking into account recommendations intended to lead to improvement in the quality of custodial legal advice. The Report made other proposals for improvement of the interviewing scheme including the video taping of a waiver of legal advice (Proposal 57) and a special warning to juries regarding uncorroborated confessions (Chapter 4, paras 56–87).

Codes C and E were issued in revised versions which came into effect in 1999, but no radical change from the 1995 version was made. The opportunity presented by the 1999 revision of taking forward the improvements made in 1991 was therefore lost, as was the possibility of addressing some of the more fundamental flaws of Code C, in the light of the inception of the HRA.

The 2003 version of Code C contained the significant restriction on drawing adverse inference from silence where no opportunity to have access to legal advice had been given, reflecting amendment that had occurred to the CJPOA, as explained below. Code F governing visual recording was introduced in 2004. Code C was revised again in 2006 and Code H, covering questioning of terrorist suspects, was introduced. Codes C and H reflected the 2003 changes, but were there were some further minor changes, discussed below. The failures to provide any sanction for breach of the Codes, to address the uncertainty as to the status of the Notes, which continue to contain significant protections for due process, to reduce the scope for out of station interviews and afford such interviews greater due process protection, or to remove provisions which are arguably not fully in harmony with the Convention rights, were all continued in the 2006 revision. These flaws, and their implications, are discussed at the relevant points, below. The interviewing rules continue to form the most detailed and complex part of the whole scheme, and the tendency for the powers to appear in PACE, while the suspects' rights appear only in the Codes, or in Notes for Guidance, has only become more marked.

Vulnerable groups and police questioning

Throughout Codes C and H, recognition is given to the special needs of certain vulnerable groups in police interviews: juveniles, the mentally disordered or handicapped, those not proficient in English, the hearing impaired or the visually handicapped. Juveniles and the mentally handicapped or disordered should be attended by an 'appropriate adult'. The role of the appropriate adult has received greater recognition in the later versions of Code C. Under Note 1F of Codes C and H, the solicitor should not be the appropriate adult; this provision was included in response to some evidence that the police had been treating the solicitor as the appropriate adult, thereby producing a conflict of interests.[20] It was thought that the roles of legal adviser and appropriate adult differed; the same person could not therefore fulfil both. It should be noted that the juvenile can be interviewed without the presence of an appropriate adult if an officer of the rank of superintendent or above considers that delay will involve an immediate risk of harm to persons or serious loss of or serious damage to property.[21] At various points to be discussed, the particular vulnerability of juveniles is recognised, but although this is to be welcomed, research suggests that the treatment of juveniles, particularly during interviews, is still sometimes unsatisfactory.[22]

20 LAG Bulletin, November 1989.

21 See Codes C and H, para 11(d): urgent interviews.

22 Evans, R, 'The conduct of police interviews with juveniles' (1993) Home Office Research Study No 8. On the treatment of juveniles generally, see Dixon, D, 'Juvenile suspects and PACE', in Freestone, D (ed), Children and the Law, 1990, Hull University Press, pp 107–29.

The notification of rights must be given in the presence of the adult,[23] which may mean repeating the notification, but if the suspect wants legal advice, this should not be delayed until the adult arrives.[24] The appropriate adult who is present at an interview should be informed that he or she is not expected to act simply as an observer; and also that the purposes of being present are, first, to advise the person being interviewed and to observe whether or not the interview is being conducted properly and fairly and, second, to facilitate communication with the person being interviewed.[25]

It will be found in discussion in Chapter 13 of unreliable confessions, that mentally handicapped or disordered persons are very likely to make an untrue or exaggerated confession and therefore it is particularly important that all the safeguards available should be in place when such a person is interviewed. However, there is provision for urgent interviewing of such persons without the appropriate adult if an officer of the rank of superintendent or above considers that delay will involve an immediate risk of harm to persons or serious loss of or serious damage to, property.[26] A deaf or speech-handicapped person, or someone who has difficulty understanding English, must only be interviewed in the presence of an interpreter,[27] but this may be waived in the case of urgent interviewing under Annex C.

Terrorist suspects

The interviewing scheme had, from its inception, created a twin-track system under PACE, the counter-terrorist legislation and the Codes, that is, one in which terrorist suspects were exposed to a regime adhering to a lower level of due process than that applicable in respect of 'ordinary' suspects. This regime afforded the coercive elements of the scheme greater rein both formally and informally. Most obviously, as explained in Chapter 13, terrorist suspects could be exposed to a much longer period of detention, which allowed greater scope for prolonged pressure during interrogation. The interviewing regime for such suspects was also less protective. The counter-terrorist scheme introduced by the Labour Government under the Terrorism Act 2000 (TA), its Codes of Practice and the 1999 revision of Codes C and E not only confirmed and extended the twin track system, but applied it to a much wider and more diverse range of suspects. The twin-track system has now been placed on a more formal basis, while at the same time the detention period has been extended to 28 days – although clearly most suspects will not stay in detention for all of that period. Code H was introduced in 2006, applying only to terrorist suspects. It covers the questioning and detention of such suspects, while non-terrorist suspects continue to be covered by Code C. The only new concession to due process introduced under the TA is the extension of audio recording, already occurring on a voluntary basis, to interviews with terrorist suspects, as explained below. The acceptance of the primacy of crime control values as underpinning police interviewing, reflected in the changes undertaken in the CJPOA,

23 Paragraph 3.17 (Code H, para 3.18).
24 This used not to be the case: Note 3G and Annex E, Note E2. Now Code C, para 6.5A and Code H, para 6.6 imply that it is.
25 See Code C, para 11.17; Code H, para 11.10.
26 See Codes C and H, para 11.(d).
27 Paragraph 13.

marked a turning point in criminal justice policies which was unaffected by the change of government in 1997.

Notification of rights

When the detainee arrives at the police station, he or she will be 'booked in'. The crucial nature of this stage in the proceedings is made clear below in relation to the discussion of the legal advice provisions. Under para 3 of Codes C and H, a person must be informed orally and by written notice of four rights on arrival at the police station after arrest: the right, arising under s 56 of PACE, to have someone informed of his detention;[28] the right to consult a solicitor and the fact that independent legal advice is available free of charge; the right to consult the other Codes of Practice, and the right to silence as embodied in the caution.

2 Police interviews

Interviews may be formal or informal. They may consist of questioning in the street, before arrest. Street interviewing remains at quite a high level,[29] while the key due process safeguards of access to legal advice and audio recording continue to be reserved for formal interviews within the police station. The caution which, as suggested below, serves both crime control and due process purposes, can be, and in most instances should be, used outside as well as inside the police station, with the result that the suspect is warned of the dangers of failing to speak before the key safeguards can be in place. Due process protection outside the police station is minimal; it consists only of contemporaneous note-taking under caution if an interview is occurring or accurate non-contemporaneous note-taking if the exchange is not an interview. Relevant non-interview exchanges with juveniles and mentally disordered persons may be admissible in evidence even though no adult is present.

Not only, therefore, is due process virtually abandoned in relation to out of police station exchanges and interviews, they may also have a structural formative influence on formal interviews and ultimately on the outcome of the process,[30] thereby undermining the protection available for such interviews. Suspects may feel, rightly or wrongly, that they have already prejudiced their position too far during informal exchanges to attempt to retrieve it in a formal taped interview; therefore, any confession made in such an interview – or any ill-considered silence – may not be truly voluntary. Thus, it is extremely important to determine how far the scheme leaves scope for exchanges to occur before the police station is reached.

28 Under para 5.1, if the person cannot be contacted, the person in charge of detention or of the investigation has discretion to allow further attempts until the information has been conveyed (see Notes 5C and 5D to Codes C and H). Section 56 PACE is subject to exceptions, similar to those under s 58 in respect of access to legal advice; for those s 58 exceptions, see pp 1216–17 below.

29 See Brown, Ellis and Larcombe, Home Office Research Study No 129, 1993; the study showed that questioning or unsolicited comment occurred outside the station in 24% of cases. The Runciman Royal Commission found that around 10% of interviews took place outside the police station: RCCJ Report, Cm 2263, 1993; see also Sanders and Young, Criminal Justice, 2007, pp 259–63.

30 See James [1996] Crim LR 650.

From both a due process and a crime control perspective, it would not be appropriate to address the leeway in the scheme for informal interviewing by requiring that, where sufficient suspicion is present, suspects should always be arrested and taken to the police station before any exchange occurs. In crime control terms, this might not represent an efficient use of resources since some unnecessary arrests would be made. In due process terms, there are some disadvantages in police station interviewing: the element of detention is coercive and the fact of detention may lead suspects to make admissions in order to leave it. Rather, the due process 'deficit' in street exchanges may be addressed, to an extent, by applying stronger safeguards to such interviewing[31] and, as discussed in Chapter 13, by giving careful consideration, under Art 6, to the admission of such exchanges as evidence.

The most significant safeguards available for interviews under PACE, the TA and Codes C, E and H include contemporaneous noting down of the interview or audio-recording, the ability to verify and sign the notes of the interview as a correct record, the legal advice provisions and, where appropriate, the presence of an adult. One of the most important issues in relation to these safeguards and reflected in the current revision of Code C,[32] is the question when they come into play. There may be a number of stages in a particular investigation beginning with first contact between police and suspect and perhaps ending with the charge. At various points the safeguards mentioned have to come into play and two factors can be identified which decide which safeguards should be in place at a particular time. First, it must be asked whether an exchange between police and suspect can be termed an interview and secondly, whether it took place inside the police station or was lawfully conducted outside it.

Interviews and non-interviews[33]

Code C creates a complex scheme in relation to the difference between interviews and non-interviews, and, to add to the complexity, Code H creates a scheme which differs from it in various significant respects. The correct interpretation of the term 'interview' under the original Code C scheme was highly significant because the relevant safeguards were unavailable unless an exchange[34] between police officer and suspect was designated an interview. The term therefore tended to be given a wide interpretation[35] and eventually the definition given to it by the Court of Appeal in Matthews[36] – 'any discussion or talk between suspect and police officer' – brought within its ambit many exchanges far removed from formal interviews. It also covered many interviewees, as it spoke in terms of 'suspects', not arrestees. However, it was qualified by the 31 Using hand-held tape recorders and notifying the suspect of the right of access to legal advice as part of the caution.

32 This was also very much an issue in relation to the 1991 and, to an extent, the 1995 revisions.

33 See Fenwick, H, 'Confessions, recording rules and miscarriages of justice' [1993] Crim LR 174–84.

34 'Exchange' will be used throughout this section to denote any verbal interaction between suspect and police officer, including unsolicited admissions.

35 The Court of Appeal in Absolam (1989) 88 Cr App R 332 defined it as 'a series of questions directed by the police to a suspect with a view to obtaining admissions'. This definition was quite wide in that it obviously included informal questioning.

36 [1990] Cr App R 43; [1990] Crim LR 190, CA, transcript from LEXIS.

ruling in Scott[37] that unsolicited admissions cannot amount to 'interviews' and by the ruling in Marsh[38] to the same effect as regards 'genuine requests' from the police for information. In Marsh, police officers investigating a burglary suddenly came across wraps of papers and asked the appellant about them; the questions and answers were admissible although no caution had been given because until that point, the officers had had no reason to suspect her of any drug-related offence. The ruling in Marsh bears some resemblance to that in Maguire[39] which pre-dated Matthews. It was determined that questioning an arrestee near the scene of the crime apparently in order to elicit an innocent explanation did not constitute an interview. Thus, the original interpretation of an interview created some leeway – but not much – for gathering (or apparently gathering) admissions in informal situations before any safeguards were in place.

In one respect, distinguishing between interviews and non-interviews is not as crucial under the current scheme as it was previously: under Code C, para 11.13 as revised, any comments relevant to the offence made by a suspected person outside the context of an interview must be accurately recorded[40] and then verified and signed by the suspect. However, making such a distinction is still highly significant, because it remains the first step towards bringing the other safeguards into play. Code H does not contain an equivalent of para 11.13; it merely provides in Note 11 E that significant statements (para 11.4) outside the context of the interview must be 'recorded'.

A definition of the term 'interview' is now contained in Code C, para 11.1A which reads: 'An interview is the questioning of a person regarding his involvement or suspected involvement in a criminal offence or offences which by virtue of para 10.1 of Code C must be carried out under caution.' In contrast, Code H provides in para 11.1: 'An interview is the questioning of a person arrested on suspicion of being a terrorist, which under para 10.1 must be carried out under caution.'

Code C paragraph 10.1 reads:

> A person whom there are grounds to suspect of an offence must be cautioned before any questions about it (or further questions if it is his answers to previous questions which provide the grounds for suspicion) are put to him regarding his involvement or suspected involvement in that offence if his answers or his silence (i.e. failure or refusal to answer a question or to answer satisfactorily) may be given in evidence to a court in a prosecution. He therefore need not be cautioned if questions are put to him for other purposes, for example, solely to establish his identity or his ownership of any vehicle or to obtain any information in accordance with any relevant statutory requirement . . . or in furtherance of the proper and effective conduct of a search.

Code H, para 10.1 reads:

37 [1991] Crim LR 56, CA. See also Younis [1990] Crim LR 425, CA.

38 [1991] Crim LR 455.

39 (1990) 90 Cr App R 115; [1989] Crim LR 815, CA.

40 It may be noted that the weight actually given to this provision may depend on the question of whether its breach may be described as substantial and significant (see below, Chapter 13, p 1280); in this respect it is disturbing to note a first instance decision in which it was found that it should not be so described: Oransaye [1993] Crim LR 772.

> A person whom there are grounds to suspect of an offence must be cautioned before any questions about an offence, or further questions if the answers provide the grounds for suspicion are put to them, if either the suspect's answers or silence . . . may be given in evidence to a court in a prosecution.

The differences between the Code H and C definitions of an interview are considered below. It may be noted that the list of examples of instances under Code C, para 10.1 in which no caution would be necessary is not exhaustive. No such definition appeared in the original Code, but Note 12A read: 'The purpose of any interview is to obtain from the person concerned his explanation of the facts and not necessarily to obtain an admission.' The current definition obviously differs from this considerably and differs even more from the definition of an interview contained in Matthews.[41] It echoes the rulings of the Court of Appeal in Maguire[42] and Marsh[43] in attempting to draw a distinction between questioning a person regarding suspected involvement in an offence and questioning for other purposes. It appears that cautioning would not be required if the information obtained is in fact relevant to the offence, but the questioning was not directed towards uncovering such information. Such an interpretation would be in conformity with the ruling in Marsh that the level of suspicion excited in police officers present at the scene determines when an exchange becomes an interview. This approach is readily justifiable. However, para 11.1A combined with para 10.1 does not make it sufficiently clear that where an explanation of the facts does relate to suspected involvement in an offence and is either perceived to do so by the officer concerned or would be by the ordinary reasonable officer,[44] an interview will take place.

Thus, Code C, para 11.1A combined with para 10.1 may on occasion have acted as an invitation to police officers to play down the level of suspicion excited by the circumstances in order to demonstrate that no interview took place. Such tactics would amount to a self-fulfilling prophecy, in the sense that the officer concerned would have an interest in viewing the exchange as a non-interview requiring only accurate rather than contemporaneous recording; such recording would create more scope for giving the exchanges the character of a non-interview, and it would therefore appear for future purposes that a non-interview did indeed take place. The only person able to impede this process would be the suspect, who must be asked to verify and sign the record of the exchanges; it is unlikely, however, that he would appreciate the implications of what had occurred.

Arguably, the Code C, para 11.1A and Code H, para 11.1 tests must be qualified by the ruling of the Court of Appeal in Weekes.[45] Once an exchange becomes an interview, that fact will have a retrospective effect on earlier exchanges; if safeguards applicable to an interview are not available in respect of such exchanges, they may be excluded from evidence. It will not be possible to sever them from the 'interview'. This ruling

41 [1990] Crim LR 190.

42 (1990) 90 Cr App R 115; [1989] Crim LR 815.

43 [1991] Crim LR 455.

44 This qualification should, it is argued, be introduced to take account of the situation which arose in Sparks [1991] Crim LR 128; the officer who questioned the appellant apparently did not recognise the significance of the admissions made and therefore did not consider it necessary to caution him.

45 [1993] Crim LR 222; (1992) The Times, 15 May, CA.

seems to be in conflict with Marsh. However, as the Weekes ruling concerned a juvenile, it may be confined to such instances.

Where the level of suspicion clearly falls within para 10.1 of both Codes as, of course, it will do after arrest, the use of the term 'questioning' in Code C, para 11.1A, and in Code H, para 11.1, nevertheless impliedly excludes instances where nothing definable as questioning has taken place. This is the correct interpretation where the police have apparently merely recorded what was said, according to the Court of Appeal in Menard.[46] Both paragraphs may also exclude chats or discussions between suspect and police officer or statements or commands which happen to elicit an incriminating response.[47] This interpretation seems to lead to a conflict between the definitions of an interview and the ruling from Matthews,[48] which could possibly be resolved by arguing that rulings of the Court of Appeal will prevail over a provision contained only in a Code provision.[49] This would be the more satisfactory result, as more likely to curtail opportunities for 'verballing' (concocting admissions). However, a possible response might be that the definition from Matthews is now enshrined in para 11.13 and is not therefore inconsistent with para 11.1A. In other words, the Matthews definition applies to most exchanges between suspect and police officer, but para 11.1A applies to certain particularly important ones labelled 'interviews'. This interpretation is to an extent supported by the wording of para 11.13: 'a written record shall also be made of any comments made by a suspected person, including unsolicited comments which are outside the context of an interview but which might be relevant to the offence . . .', thus implying that comments relevant to the offence other than unsolicited comments will not invariably be part of an interview. It also receives some support from the ruling in Williams,[50] which seems to have accepted impliedly that 'social visits' by police to suspects in the cells involving conversations relevant to the offence in question do not constitute interviews, although they are to be discouraged. This interpretation would mean that a number of exchanges which would previously have been interviews will no longer be so labelled, and this is especially of concern owing to evidence that police officers tend to favour the informal chat in the police station.[51] These comments are also applicable to the scheme under Code H, which also accepts in para 11.4 and Note 11E that significant statements may be made outside the context of an interview

Thus at present certain safeguards are now triggered off only in a confined group of situations in relation to interviews of terrorist and non-terrorist suspects. In Cox,[52]

46 [1995] Cr App R 306.

47 See Absolam (1989) 88 Cr App R 332.

48 If statements or commands eliciting a response from the suspect could be said to fall outside the Matthews ([1990] Crim LR 190) definition of an interview, which is unlikely, they could still constitute an interview according to the ruling in Absolam, ibid.

49 The Codes of Practice brought in by a resolution of both Houses of Parliament do not have statutory authority. It has, however, been held by the Court of Appeal that they can prevail over rules derived from case law (McCay [1990] Crim LR 338), although commentators have thought that the Court of Appeal was mistaken in this view (Birch, D [1990] Crim LR 338 at 340).

50 (1992) *The Time*s, 6 February, CA.

51 See Holdaway, S, Inside the British Police, 1985, Blackwell; Sanders [1990] Crim LR 494, referring to his research on access to legal advice in police stations (research undertaken by Sanders, Bridges, Mulvaney and Crozier, entitled Advice and Assistance at Police Stations, November 1989) found that such practices were still continuing post-PACE.

52 [1993] Crim LR 382; see also Goddard [1994] Crim LR 46.

however, the Court of Appeal adopted what might be termed a 'purposive approach' to Note 11A (which previously contained the definition of an interview, under the 1991 revision) in finding that the intention of the 1991 revision was to increase rather than decrease protection for suspects and therefore, Note 11A should be interpreted in the light of previous decisions such as Matthews which broadened the definition of an interview. This was followed in Oransaye,[53] which suggested that the emphasis should not be placed on the form of the exchange – on whether or not questions were asked – but on whether what was said went to 'the heart of the matter'. If so, the exchange should be termed an interview.[54] But these decisions pre-dated the more recent revisions of the Codes and there is currently little evidence that the courts are taking this approach. In R v James,[55] for example, the police questioned the business partner of a man who had disappeared. Initially he was not under suspicion, but during the interview the officers formed the suspicion that James had murdered his partner. No caution was given, and the Court of Appeal held that this was not an interview – despite the fact that James was asked directly whether he had killed his partner – and that therefore it could be admitted in evidence. Had it been found to be an interview it would probably have had to be excluded since the safeguards applicable to an interview were not in place.

Interviews inside and outside the police station

Under s 30 PACE, as amended,[56] the suspect must be taken to the police station as soon as practicable after arrest. Under para 11.1 of Code C and Code H, para 11.2 the suspect should be taken to the station (or a designated place of detention in the case of terrorist suspects) once the decision to arrest has been made, unless certain exceptions apply. As discussed below, these provisions provide scope for informal interviewing outside the place where most of the due process safeguards are available.

Once an exchange could be called an interview, the safeguards applying to it under the original Code C provisions differed quite markedly depending on where it took place. Those available inside the police station included contemporaneous recording[57] or tape recording,[58] the ability to read over, verify and sign the notes of the interview as a correct record,[59] notification of legal advice,[60] the right to have advice before questioning[61] and, where appropriate, the presence of an adult.[62] If the interview took

53 [1993] Crim LR 772.

54 For discussion of the meaning of 'interview', see Field, S, 'Defining Interviews Under PACE', 1993, 13(2) LS 254.

55 [1996] Crim LR 650.

56 The Criminal Justice Act 2003 insets a new s 30A into s 30, allowing an arrested person to be released on bail at any point before the police station is reached.

57 Original para 11.3 provided that if the interview took place in the police station or at other premises, 'the record must be made during the course of the interview unless in the investigating officer's view this would not be practicable or would interfere with the conduct of the interview'.

58 Under original para 11.3.

59 Under Code E, para 3.

60 Under original para 12.12.

61 Under Codes C and H, para 3.1.

62 The Court of Appeal in Absolam (1989) 88 Cr App R 332 determined that no questioning could take place inside the police station before the suspect had been notified of the right to legal advice; answers allegedly made to questions put before such notification were thereby rendered inadmissible.

place on 'other premises', the same safeguards would apply apart from the requirements to inform[63] of the right to legal advice and to allow the suspect to verify and sign the record of the interview.

Outside the police station, however, it was only necessary to ensure that an accurate record of the interview was made[64] and, where appropriate, an adult was present.[65] Thus, originally, a minimum level of protection only was available creating scope for impropriety, including fabrication of confessions. In particular, it meant that only the experienced suspect interviewed outside the police station would be aware of the right to legal advice. Thus, however widely the term 'interview' was interpreted, it was of little use to suspects who made (or allegedly made) admissions outside the police station.

The 1991 revision reduced the significance of this factor to some extent. Provision for contemporaneous recording and for giving the suspect the record of the interview to verify and sign was moved out of para 12, applying only to interviews in the police station and into para 11,[66] which is headed 'Interviews general',[67] although this change was made less significant by the provisions of para 11.13. The verifying and signing rules were supplemented in 1995 by the requirement, imposed, however, only in a Note for Guidance, Note 11D (now 11E), that the suspect should declare in his or her own hand on the interview record that it is correct. Such a provision clearly has more value than the requirement only to obtain a signature. Under Code C, para 11.7, the interview must be recorded contemporaneously wherever it takes place, unless this would not be practicable, while it must be offered to the suspect to verify and sign, under Code C, para 11.11. These changes were continued in the 2006 revision; that revision undermines the value of contemporaneous recording to an extent since it allows for an accurate summary rather than a verbatim record. The recording of interviews with terrorism suspects is not covered by Code H; the verifying and recording provisions under the TA Code for detention of terrorist suspects will apply.

However, under the 2006 revision, the unseasoned suspect interviewed outside the police station will still be unaware of the right to legal advice[68] and it is also at present unlikely that the interview would be tape recorded: Code E does not envisage tape recording taking place anywhere but inside the police station.[69] In some circumstances

63 Under original para 13.

64 Section 58, governing the right of access to legal advice, is expressed to apply to persons in police detention and para 3.1, governing the right to be notified of the s 58 entitlement was (and is) expressed to apply only to those in the police station. However, volunteers under caution in the police station or on other premises had the right to be informed of the entitlement to legal advice under original para 10.2 – now Code H, para 3.21, Note 1A.

65 Original para 13 did not state expressly that an adult must be present during any interview whether conducted in or out of the police station when a juvenile was interviewed. However, this could be implied; the ruling in Fogah [1989] Crim LR 141 confirmed that this was the correct interpretation.

66 Paragraph 11.7; para 11.8 Code H refers to the Code for detention and questioning made under the TA.

67 The Court of Appeal determined in Brezenau and Francis [1989] Crim LR 650 that these provisions could only apply inside the police station; departure from the clear words of para 12 was not warranted.

68 This is governed by para 3.1, which is expressed to apply only to persons in the police station.

69 Code E, para 3.1 states: '. . . tape recording shall be used at police stations for any interview . . .'. Some police forces have experimented with hand held tape recorders used outside the police station, but at present this is by no means common practice.

suspects are not, however, be disadvantaged by these differences, thanks to the provisions of para 11.1, introduced by the 1991 revision, which reads: ‘Following a decision to arrest a suspect he must not be interviewed about the relevant offence except at a police station [except in certain instances specified in 11.1(a), (b) and (c) which call for urgent interviewing].’

Paragraph 11.1 could merely have read: ‘A suspect must not be interviewed about the relevant offence except at a police station . . .’. Clearly, it was designed to allow some interviewing outside the police station owing to its requirement of a higher level of suspicion than that denoted by para 11.1A and para 10.1. It implies that a police officer should categorise someone either as possibly involved in an offence or as on the verge of arrest; so long as the first category is applicable, questioning can continue. This category was presumably intended to include persons under caution, because a caution must be given ‘when there are grounds to suspect (him) of an offence’.[70] Obviously, these categories tend to merge into each other. However, it is difficult to be certain in retrospect as to which applied, although the police may find it difficult where there are very strong grounds for suspicion to support a claim that interviewing could continue because the decision to arrest had not been taken. However, there appear to be no decisions on this point, and given that para 11.1 was introduced over 15 years ago, it appears that this issue is not being raised, probably because of the ambiguity surrounding the words ‘once the decision to arrest has been taken’ and due to the breadth of the exceptions allowing for urgent interviewing outside the police station.

It is clear that the problems associated with exchanges between suspect and officer still remain, and it is evident that a significant number of suspects are still interviewed outside the police station.[71] The Runciman Royal Commission proposed that admissions made outside the police station should be seen as needing some form of corroboration such as their acceptance by the suspect on tape at the police station,[72] and this was implemented under the 1995 revision in para 11.2A. However, para 11.2A is omitted from the 2006 version of Code C; it is only necessary for there to be a written record of comments made outside the context of an interview under para 11.13 which the suspect should be shown so that he can verify it. Further, para 11.13 does not provide that admissions or silences made outside the police station will be inadmissible if not accepted by the suspect at the police station. Therefore, presumably, if no breaches of Code C have occurred, they would be admissible even though uncorroborated, subject to the possibility of excluding them under s 76 or s 78 of PACE, as discussed in Chapter 13.

Original para 10.2 provided that a volunteer who was questioned under caution on ‘other premises’ had to be told of his right to legal advice. This placed such persons in a better position than arrestees and, therefore, tended to be evaded by bringing forward the moment of arrest. The current version of Code C removes the special requirement for volunteers, but they should under a Note for Guidance – Note 1A – be allowed access to legal advice when they are in the station. Thus, volunteers under caution outside the police station are disadvantaged because they can be questioned without 70 Codes C and H, para 10.1.

71 Brown, Ellis and Larcombe, Home Office Research Study No 129. The study showed that questioning and/or unsolicited comments occurred in 24% of cases. Questioning occurred in 10% of cases.

72 Royal Commission Report 1993, Proposal 40.

notification of the right to legal advice, whereas once the decision to arrest has been made, a suspect should not normally be questioned before arrival at the police station, where he will be informed of the right. In other words, in the context of the current provision under para 11.1, the old requirement under para 10.2 would have had some value; had it been retained and extended to all volunteers under caution, it would have removed some of the incentive which now exists to delay, or apparently delay, the decision to arrest in order to interview outside the police station. Clearly, this would have been a radical move, but it might have been welcome as harmonising the position of such suspects with that of arrestees.

Most significantly, since suspects not at the police station can be interviewed, without having had an opportunity to consult a solicitor, they are not protected by the provision of s 34(2A) of the CJPOA: adverse inferences can be drawn if they remain silent. Further, s 34(2A) does not affect the position of suspects who make admissions despite not having had that opportunity. This is because they are technically free to leave and seek legal advice before being arrested. Section 34(2A) only applies inside the police station or other place of detention. But this position is flawed in two respects. First, many suspects may not realise that they could leave, and may reply to questions in the street or police car, before being arrested, without realising that they could have legal advice. Once arrested the person in question is no longer free to leave, but might reply to questions or even volunteer admissions in the police car, on the way to the station, again without realising that he is entitled to have legal advice once the police station is reached. The second situation arguably leads to an infringement of Art 6, even though s 34(2A) appears to condone it – as discussed below.[73]

Where the level of suspicion would obviously justify an arrest, a police officer who is eager to keep a suspect out of the police station for the time being might be able to invoke one of the more broadly worded exceptions allowing urgent interviewing in order to avert certain specified risks. The first exception under para 11.1(a), allowing interviewing to take place at once where delay might lead to interference with evidence, could be interpreted very broadly and could apply whenever there was some likelihood that evidence connected with any offence but not immediately obtainable was in existence. Even if there were no others involved in the offence who had not been apprehended, it could be argued that the evidence was at risk from the moment of arrest because news of the arrest might become known to persons with a motive for concealing it. This argument could also apply to the exception under (c) with the proviso that it will apply to a narrower range of offences. Once an arrest has occurred, the provision of s 30(1) PACE that the suspect must be taken to the police station by the constable as soon as practicable applies. Under s 30(1)), the police can delay doing so if the suspect is needed elsewhere to carry out investigations which it is reasonable to carry out immediately. The key words in s 30 are obviously ‘as soon as practicable’. Thus, further leeway for informal interviewing after arrest is created.

Once the suspect is inside the police station under arrest or under caution,[74] any interview[75] (using this term to connote an exchange which falls within para 11.1A)

73 See pp 1213–14.

74 Under para 3.1 of Code E, once a volunteer becomes a suspect (i.e., at the point when he should be cautioned) the rest of the interview should be tape recorded.

75 Under para 3.1(a), an interview with a person suspected of an offence triable only summarily need not be taped.

should be audio-recorded under Code E, but there is an exception in respect of terrorist suspects, which is considered below. Many of the criticisms advanced above could also be applied under Code H. Under that Code an interview only occurs after the suspect is arrested. After that point he should be taken to a place designated for detention under TA, Sched 8, para 1, following Code H, para 11.2, unless one of the urgent interviewing exceptions apply (the exceptions are the same as those under Code C para 11.1). This means that any informal exchanges prior to the point of arrest, which might well be viewed as interviews if covered by Code C, will not count as interviews and therefore will not attract the safeguards. Admissions are made before being cautioned, even if the suspect is being directly questioned about the offence, but is not under arrest, would be admissible in evidence. No contemporaneous recording of such admissions would be necessary so long as a record was made later.

Varying levels of protection for exchanges

It is now possible to identify the points at which the safeguards will be brought to bear and it is apparent not only that there are three levels of protection available, but that they vary as between terrorist and non-terrorist suspects:

(1) Inside or outside the police station, if the exchange cannot be (or at times is not) labelled an 'interview', even though it may be relevant to the offence, it seems that the level of protection provided by Code C, para 11.13 only will apply (for Code H, only the protection of Note 11E). This will be the case even where the suspect is an arrestee or a volunteer under caution.

(2) If an interview of a non-terrorist suspect takes place outside the police station and falls outside the Code C, para 11.1 prohibition and within the leeway created by s 30(1) PACE, the verifying and recording provisions under paras 11.11 and 11.7 will apply, with the proviso that contemporaneous recording is likely to be viewed as impracticable.[76] What is impracticable does not connote something that is extremely difficult, but must involve more than mere inconvenience.[77] Where appropriate, an adult must be present, which probably means that interviews requiring an appropriate adult would have to take place at the station.[78] Notification of the right of access to legal advice will not occur, although adverse inferences could be drawn if the suspect remains silent.

If an interview of a non-terrorist suspect takes place outside the police station and falls outside the Code H, para 11.2 prohibition and within the leeway created by s 30(1) PACE, the verifying and recording provisions under the TA Code for detention of terrorist suspects will apply. Otherwise everything said above as regards interviews outside the station under Code C is applicable. It should be noted in particular that notification of the right of access to legal advice will not occur, 76 The mere fact that an interview is conducted in the street may not be enough to support an assertion that it could not be contemporaneously recorded. This seems to follow from the decision in Fogah [1989] Crim LR 141.

77 Parchment [1989] Crim LR 290. Note-taking while the suspect was dressing and showing the officers round his flat was held to be impracticable.

78 Code C, para 11.15; Code H, para 11.9.

although the suspect is not free to leave since he will be under arrest, and adverse inferences could be drawn under s 34(2A) CJPOA if the suspect remains silent. It is readily arguable, as mentioned above, that this position does not accord with the demands of Art 6.

(3) As far as non-terrorist suspects are concerned, inside the police station, if the person in question is an arrestee or a volunteer under caution[79] and the exchange is an interview, all the available safeguards, including access to legal advice and tape recording, will apply.[80] As far as terrorist suspects are concerned, inside the designated place of detention, if the person in question is an arrestee the exchange will be an interview if the other aspects of para 11.1 apply; therefore all the available safeguards, including access to legal advice, will apply. The provisions as to audio-recording in Code E will not apply (Code E, para 3.2). If the suspect is a volunteer he or she appears to be entitled to have access to legal advice, under Code H, Note 1A, but the exchange will not be an interview and therefore, it appears that the other safeguards, including the presence of an appropriate adult, will not apply. Also, although the suspect can have access to legal advice (albeit only under a Note), he or she does not appear to have a right to have the adviser present when questioned.

Thus, wide but uncertain scope still remains for interviewing outside the police station and for gathering admissions outside the context of an interview. The main objection to this scheme, apart from its complexity,[81] is that the degree of protection available is too dependent on factors irrelevant to the level of suspicion in question. It may be pure chance, or something more sinister, which dictates whether a volunteer under caution is interviewed inside or outside the police station or whether or not an exchange with an arrestee can successfully be characterised or disguised as a non-interview. Bearing in mind that unreliable confessions may be most likely to emerge from informal exchanges, it is argued that the mechanisms triggering off the main safeguards – para 11.1A and para 11.1 – are deficient both in creating large areas of uncertainty as to the level of protection called for at various points and in allowing the minimal level of protection under Code C, para 11.13 to operate in too many contexts. The greater leeway within the Code H scheme for questioning suspects before arrest and therefore outside the context of an interview is a matter of particular concern, given the diversity of terrorist suspects, and the particular propensity of terrorist cases to miscarry.

79 Under para 3.21, which largely reproduces original para 3.9, volunteers under caution have the right to be told that they may obtain legal advice; see Code H, Note 1A. The other important Code C safeguards are contained in paras 11 and 12 and apply to arrestees and volunteers under caution. Under Code E, tape recording must be used for interviews with persons under caution in the police station (E 3.1(a)) – but not for persons suspected of summary offences.

80 Unless under Code E, para 3.3, it would not be reasonably practicable to tape the interview owing to failure of the recording equipment or non-availability of an interview room or recorder. Note 3B of Code E provides that if necessary, an officer must be able to justify the decision not to delay the interview.

81 The need to adopt a commonsense approach to the rules was expressed in Marsh [1991] Crim LR 455 by Bingham LJ in relation to the original scheme. However, the current scheme does not lend itself readily to a simple interpretation. See especially the comments of McCullough J in Cox [1993] Crim LR 382 regarding Note 11A.

Recording methods

Audio recording

Section 60 of PACE allowed for the issuing of a Code of Practice in connection with tape recording of interviews, and this was accomplished by means of Code of Practice E. Once the non-terrorist suspect is inside the police station under arrest or under caution,[82] any interview (that is, an exchange which falls within para 11.1A of Code C) with a person who has been cautioned in respect of an indictable or 'either way' offence[83] should be audio recorded under Code of Practice E. Initial resistance by the police gave way to a recognition of the advantages of audio recording, which seems to be generally accepted[84] as reflecting a truer picture of an interview than note-taking[85] and, thanks to recent developments, the jury are in one sense even better placed than they would have been had they been present at the interview because they may be allowed to take the tape recordings into the jury room[86] to replay as necessary.[87]

However, exchanges may occur between formal interviews, when the tape is switched off, which affect the formal interview and although they should be recorded in writing under para 11.13, the record may not cover everything that was said, and the facts recorded by the police officers may be disputed by the suspects. In other words, leeway for falsely imputing admissions to the suspect is still apparent.[88]

Audio recording was not initially used in terrorist cases, under Code E, para 3.2, or in cases of espionage under s 1 of the Official Secrets Act 1989. This provision was clarified under Note for Guidance 3G of Code E; interviews with those suspected of terrorism solely connected with the affairs of the UK or any part of the UK other than Northern Ireland should be tape-recorded. A written contemporaneous record could still be made of interviews which fell within Code E, para 3.2. This exemption was included because it was feared that the contents of tapes might become available to terrorist organisations. The Home Office reviewed it in 1990,[89] and although it did not introduce mandatory audio recording, police in Britain undertook it in terrorist cases on 82 Under para 3.4 of Code E (1999 version), once a volunteer becomes a suspect (i.e., at the point when he should be cautioned) the rest of the interview should be tape recorded.

83 Under para 3.1(a), an interview with a person suspected of an offence triable only summarily need not be audio taped, although under Note 3A it can be recorded at police discretion.

84 See Wills, McLeod and Nash, The Tape Recording of Police Interviews with Suspects, 2nd Interim Report, Home Office Research Study No 97, 1988. The study found that police officers and prosecutors generally welcomed taping, since it is a faster recording method and renders them less vulnerable to allegations of 'verballing'.

85 Research conducted by Baldwin and Bedward of the Institute of Judicial Administration, University of Birmingham, on summaries made of tape recorded interviews found that the summaries were often of a very poor quality and presented a distorted picture of what occurred during the interview. However, they also found that the police were aware of this problem and were beginning to address it. See [1991] Crim LR 671.

86 Emmerson [1991] Crim LR 194. In Riaz and Burke [1991] Crim LR 366, the Court of Appeal held (in instances where the jury had not already heard the tapes) that better practice would be to reassemble the court and play the tapes in open court.

87 This permission was expressed to extend only to those parts of the tapes which had been heard in open court; other material would have to be edited out.

88 See Dunn (1990) 91 Cr App Rep 237.

89 HC Deb Vol 168 col 273, 1 March 1990.

a voluntary basis. Since, under s 1 of the TA, terrorism is defined much more widely to include those covered by Note G, and the problem of Irish terrorism has diminished, the obvious step is to make audio recording of interviews with terrorist suspects mandatory. This was accomplished by Sched 7, para 9 to the TA, which provided for the audio recording of any interview by a constable of a person detained under s 41 and Sched 7 to the TA, once a new Code of Practice had been introduced. This step would not have changed current practice, apart from that in Northern Ireland, but it would have afforded formal recognition to this due process safeguard. The current position is that Code E is entirely inapplicable to interviews with terrorist suspects since Note 3G has been removed from the current version. Audio recording is dealt with by a Code of Practice for audio recording of suspects arrested under TA, s 41 or detained under TA, Sched 7, issued by the Secretary of State.[90]

Video recording

The recording of police interviews is one of the most rapidly developing areas of policing. The possibility that the introduction of tape recording,[91] replacing contemporaneous note-taking,[92] would eventually be overtaken by video taping has been under consideration for some time.[93] Video taping of police interviews was until recently at the experimental stage and the Home Office made it clear in 1991 that it supported its introduction[94] as a step in the direction of preventing miscarriages of justice. Section 60 of PACE was amended by s 76 of the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001 to insert s 60A, which provided the Secretary of State with the power to issue a Code of Practice for the 'visual recording of interviews'. Commentators have given video taped interviews a cautious welcome;[95] criticism has largely been directed towards the difficulty of ensuring 90 Schedule 8, para 3(1) and (7) .

91 Governed by Code of Practice E, which came into force on 29 July 1988.

92 Originally governed by Code C, para 11.3 and under revised Code C by para 11.5. Tape recording has not entirely replaced contemporaneous note-taking, first because it does not apply to all interviews (see Code E, para 3) and secondly, because contemporaneous note-taking applies to interviews outside the police station where practicable, whereas tape recording is at present only required inside it (Code E, para 3.1).

93 Video taping of interviews as opposed to audio taping was one of the possibilities considered by the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure chaired by Lord Runciman. See (1991) 141 NLJ 1512 for a brief interim report by John Baldwin of a study of video taping experiments that took place in four police stations. For some time, the police have been able to video tape a confession if they first obtained the consent of the accused: Li Shu-Ling [1989] Crim LR 58, PC. The Runciman Royal Commission proposed that further research into the use of video taping for interviews should be carried out (Proposal 70). However, the Home Office issued a circular on video recording of interviews which advised against moving quickly to introduce video recording owing to the cost of so doing (Circular 6, 1993). Video-taping is still not mandatory but is being used on a voluntary basis; it is now governed by Code F.

94 In response to a request from Sir John Farr MP for video taping of all police interviews in order to prevent miscarriages of justice, John Patten, then Secretary of State for the Home Office, indicated that this course would be considered after the results of a pilot project conducted for the Association of Chief Police Officers in conjunction with the Home Office were known. HC Deb Vol 200 col 391, 5 December 1991.

95 See, e.g., Barnes, M, 'One experience of video recorded interviews' [1993] Crim LR 444.

that they are not subverted by 'informal' contacts between police and suspect,[96] rather than at the quality of the recordings.[97] Arguably, such difficulties are endemic in the interviewing scheme as currently conceived, regardless of the recording technique used. Code F now governs visual recording, but recognises that it is not mandatory.

Interviewing techniques

There seems to be a tendency in some quarters to see developments in recording techniques as going a long way towards solving the problem of unreliable confessions.[98] However, there is a danger that other relevant issues will be obscured. It is important not to over-emphasise the value of recording techniques at the expense of provisions which may have a more direct effect on their reliability. This danger was perhaps most readily apparent in the juxtaposition in the remit of the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure of the possibility of introducing video taping with that of abolishing the right to silence,[99] and it is instructive to compare the enthusiasm for video-taping of interviews[100] with the decision to abolish the right to silence.[101] Video-taping is to be welcomed, as providing a fuller picture of an interview than audio-recording, and as a means of inhibiting the use of intimidatory tactics, at least in the formal interview, but arguably its value should not be over-stressed. Video-taping might faithfully reflect the interview during which a confession was made,[102] but fail to affect the pressure likely to make it unreliable flowing from the suspect's perception that he must speak. The fact that it was video-taped might give the confession a spurious credibility. This 96 See McConville, M, 'Video taping interrogations: police behaviour on and off camera' [1992] Crim LR 532.

97 However, quality has been questioned: see John Baldwin's interim report of experiments with video taping of interviews, which found that there were fairly serious or very serious problems with video taping in over 20% of the recordings. These included poor picture or sound quality or camera malfunction (see (1991) 141 NLJ 1512).

98 When Kenneth Baker, the then Home Secretary, announced the inception of the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure, he suggested that recent improvements in the provision for recording of police interviews would prevent miscarriages of justice in future: HC Deb Vol 187 col 1109, 14 March 1991.

99 In announcing the Royal Commission (ibid) the then Home Secretary stated that part of its remit was to consider 'the extent to which the courts might draw proper inferences from any failure (on the part of the suspect) to take advantage of opportunities to state his position', at col 1115. On 5 December 1991, John Patten, then Secretary of State for the Home Office, made it clear that the Royal Commission would be considering video taping of police interviews: HC Deb Vol 200 Col 391, 5 December 1991.

100 See fn 93 and 94, above; see also Campbell, 'Videos of interviews "would help police"' (1991) the Guardian, 9 December.

101 The Home Office set up a working group in 1989 to consider the right to silence: see fn 240, after the right had already been modified in Northern Ireland by the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1988. The group's recommendations assumed that abolition was necessary. For criticism, see Greer, S (1990) 53 MLR 709 and Zuckerman, A, 'Trial By Unfair Means – The Report of the Working Group on the Right to Silence' [1989] Crim LR 855. Kenneth Baker signalled that interest in this possibility was still very much alive when announcing the remit of the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure, ibid. The Home Secretary announced in October 1993 that the right to silence would be abolished and this was brought about under the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, ss 34, 36 and 37.

102 But see John Baldwin's findings, (1991) 141 NLJ 1512 for a study of video taping experiments that took place in four police stations.

is not an argument against video taping in general, but against its use as part of the justification for failing to reverse the modification of the right to silence. It might be argued that unreliable confessions would be almost eliminated by the use of such advanced recording techniques, thereby providing a justification for increasing the pressure on the suspect to speak.

Improvement in the recording provisions is not aimed directly at promoting the reliability of a confession, but at allowing a court to consider an accurate record of it and to assess what occurred when it was made. There is clearly a difference between the reliability of admissions and the reliability of the record of them.[103] In contrast to the success of the scheme in this direction, there has been little development in the area of provisions able to affect what occurred; PACE does not attempt to regulate the conduct of the interview except in so far as such regulation can be implied from the provision of s 76 that confessions obtained by oppression[104] or in circumstances likely to render them unreliable will be inadmissible. Code C of PACE forbids oppressive interviewing in Code C, para 11.5[105] and Code H, para 11.6; some very general guidance as to interviewing mentally disordered or handicapped suspects is given in Codes C and H, Note 11C. No such provision is duplicated in PACE itself although, as indicated in Chapter 15, oppression is defined under s 76(8) PACE as including Art 3 treatment, and under s 76(2)(a) a confession obtained by oppression is subject to an absolute exclusionary rule.

Obviously, the provisions governing detention and the physical comfort of the detainee[106] have relevance in this context; they provide the setting for the interrogation and remove from the situation some of the reasons why a suspect might make an unreliable confession. Provisions relating to medical treatment and to assessing the detainee's mental and physical condition are also relevant,[107] especially in relation to terrorist suspects, who may be detained for up to 28 days. But, once their limits have been set, they cannot influence what occurs next, and it seems that the use of intimidation, haranguing and indirect threats is still quite common, especially in interviews with juveniles.[108] The Runciman Royal Commission proposed that the role of the appropriate adult should be reviewed[109] and that officers should receive training in the role a solicitor would be expected to play,[110] but did not make general proposals

103 See the discussion of Paris (1993) 97 Cr appl R 99 in Chapter 13, p 1272–73.

104 Misleading statements made during an interview distorting the state of the evidence against the defendant or hectoring and bullying may well lead to exclusion of any confession obtained under either s 76 or s 78. See Mason [1987] Crim LR 119; [1987] 3 All ER 481, CA; Beales [1991] Crim LR 118; Blake [1991] Crim LR 119; Heron (1993) unreported, discussed in Chapter 14.

105 Code C, para 11.5 and Code H, para 11.6 provide: 'No police officer may try to obtain answers to questions or to elicit a statement by the use of oppression.'

106 Paragraphs 8 and 9 of Code C and Code H; para 12(a) regulates the physical conditions in the interview room.

107 See Chapter 11, pp 1172–75. See Code H, governing the treatment of terrorist suspects, paras 8 and 9.

108 See Evans, R, 'The Conduct of Police Interviews with Juveniles', Home Office Research Study No 8, 1993. See (1994) 144 NLJ 120 and (1994) 144 NLJ 203 for criticism of a variety of interview techniques.

109 Proposal 72.

110 Proposal 64.

as to outlawing or regulating use of certain interviewing techniques.[111] Such proposals would be particularly relevant after the evidence of use of bullying techniques in interrogations which arose from the post-PACE case of Paris, Abdullah and Miller (the Cardiff Three).[112] In fact, such techniques may be in the process of being replaced by a more subtle 'investigative approach',[113] but this is no substitute for specific guidance under Code C as to improper techniques. The very significant increase in the period for which terrorism suspects can be detained – currently up to 28 days – makes it even more imperative that consideration should be given to ensuring the reliability of admissions made, especially as terrorist suspects differ from each other so markedly: some may have been trained to withstand interrogation, while others may be completely inexperienced in criminal justice terms.

The lack of provision in PACE and the TA as regards interviewing techniques encourages resort to the HRA. On its face, the Convention does not bear upon this issue, except in so far as Art 3 covers oppressive interviewing. But, as indicated above, the general requirements of fairness under Art 6 will allow consideration of interviewing techniques as part of the fairness of the criminal process as a whole. Arguments could also be raised regarding unethical, intrusive interviewing techniques under Arts 3, 8 and 14.

Articles 3, 8 and 14 might be engaged where the interrogation itself was of an especially intrusive nature, particularly where it could also be said to be discriminatory. Grossly humiliating treatment may breach Art 3, and this might include very intrusive, prolonged questioning. Where such questioning was accompanied by racist, sexist[114] or homophobic abuse, a breach might be found of Art 3 read with Art 14. Article 8 could also be considered where the questioning dealt, for example, with sexual matters. These possibilities were considered in Lustig-Prean and Beckett v UK and Smith and Grady v UK[115] in the context of an investigation by service police concerning their homosexuality, but by analogy, the findings of the Court would appear to be applicable to police interviewing in certain circumstances. The Court considered the investigations, and in particular the interviews of the applicants, to have been exceptionally intrusive and to constitute especially grave interferences with their private lives, which could not be justified within the meaning of Art 8(2). It considered that treatment grounded upon a predisposed homophobic bias, as in the present case, could, in principle, fall within the scope of Art 3 and that the investigations were undoubtedly distressing and humiliating, but that in the circumstances of the case, the treatment did not reach the minimum level of severity which would bring it within the scope of Art 3. Having found a breach of Art 8, the Court did not go on to consider Art 14 as a separate issue.

The failure to regulate interviewing techniques is a significant gap in the PACE and TA schemes, bearing in mind the established likelihood of a link between coercive 111 See Baldwin, J, 'The Royal Commission, Power and Police Interviews' (1993) 143 NLJ 1194 for criticism of the failure of the Royal Commission in this respect. See also Reiner, R, 'The Royal Commission on Criminal Justice (1) Investigative Powers and Safeguards for Suspects' [1993] Crim LR 808.

112 (1993) 97 Cr App R 99.

113 Baldwin notes ((1993) 143 NLJ 1195 and 1197) that 1993 training manuals for police interviewers advocate this approach. It is advocated in the Interviewer's Rule Book.

114 East African Asians cases (1973) 3 EHRR 76.

115 (1999) 29 EHRR 548, and (2000) 29 EHRR 493.

questioning and unreliable confessions.[116] Although there has been a movement from such questioning towards so called ethical techniques,[117] it cannot be assumed that interviewing will not at times verge on the oppressive and abusive. Use of Art 8 as in Lustig-Prean may encourage a movement towards ethical interviewing and provide an avenue by which to challenge humiliating, discriminatory questioning under the HRA. As discussed above, the Race Relations Act 1976, after amendment in 2000, provides a means of redress in respect of racial abuse or racially discriminatory treatment by police, which will also cover interviewing. But, this possibility does not exist in respect of other forms of discriminatory treatment, including treatment which is gender-related or homophobic.[118]

3 The right of access to legal advice

Introduction

There is general agreement that the most significant protection for due process introduced for the first time by PACE[119] was that of the right of access to legal advice.[120] But this right is far from absolute. It is subject to a number of formal exceptions, which are broader in terrorist cases, and it is dependent on a formal request to exercise it. It is also limited to interviewing in police stations, and may be subverted informally in a variety of ways. Nevertheless its impact in due process terms should not be under-estimated. It has been bolstered by the domestic response to a key decision at Strasbourg, Murray v UK.[121] The legislative response to Murray, considered below, means that where suspects, including terrorist suspects, are in police detention and have been formally denied access to legal advice, adverse inferences cannot be drawn from silence.

116 See Justice, Unreliable Evidence? Confessions and the Safety of Convictions, 1994.

117 Home Office Central Planning and Training Unit, The Interviewer's Rule Book, 1992; Home Office Circular 7/1993 'Investigative interviewing'.

118 The Sex Discrimination Act 1975 has not been amended in the same way as the Race Relations Act (under the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000) and therefore will not cover the actions of public authorities except in the contexts covered by s 6 of the Act. At present, no statute forbids discriminatory treatment in the criminal justice system on grounds of sexual orientation. Bearing in mind the 'dualist' impact of international law in the UK, this means that Protocol 12 (see Chapter 2, p 106) may not provide a remedy for such treatment domestically, even if it is eventually received into domestic law under the HRA. See further Chapter 15, p 1486.

119 The Criminal Law Act 1977, s 62 declared a narrow entitlement to have one reasonably named person informed of the arrest. It did not provide that the arrestee must be informed of this right, nor did it provide any sanction for non-compliance by a police officer. That statutory form of this right gave it no greater force than the non-statutory Judges' Rules (rules of practice for the guidance of the police: see Practice Note [1984] 1 All ER 237; 1 WLR 152). The Judges' Rules upheld the right of the suspect/arrestee in the police station to communicate with/consult a solicitor, but permitted the withholding of such access 'lest unreasonable delay or hindrance is caused to the process of investigation or the administration of justice'. Any officer, in relation to a person detained for any offence, could deny access to legal advice on these broad grounds; see Lemsatef [1977] 1 WLR 812; [1977] 2 All ER 835.

120 See, e.g.,Sanders and Young, Criminal Justice, 3rd edn, 2007, Chapter 4.5; Dixon, D, Miscarriages of Justice, 1999, p 67. The research studies mentioned in this chapter do not question the value of the legal right of access per se, although they do question its quality and the responses of the police.

121 (1996) 22 EHRR 29.

Access to legal advice has an impact in upholding due process which encompasses, but goes beyond, advising on making 'no comment' answers. How far it has such an impact in practice is debatable. The impact varies, depending on the contact with the suspect. The Sanders research in 1989 found that telephone advice alone had little impact on suspects: 50% of those who received telephone advice made admissions, as opposed to 59.6% of those who received no advice.[122] The research criticised the great variation in practice between advisers, and considered that too many duty solicitors gave telephone advice only, thereby depriving the client of most of the benefits of legal advice.[123] Subsequent research suggests that in 23% of cases when advice is requested, telephone advice only continues to be given, and only around 12–14% of suspects in police interviews have an adviser present.[124]

The relationship between access to legal advice and the right to silence is complex,[125] particularly in view of the curtailment of the right to silence under ss 34, 36 and 37 of the CJPOA 1994, which is discussed below. The available research lends some support to the following propositions. The suspect will probably be aware, if he has had advice, that he can keep silent and also that this is likely to be a risky course of action. It was, however, clear, even prior to 1994, that advisers did not advise silence routinely.[126] Dixon found in 1991 that solicitors were likely to advise silence at least temporarily if the client was in a confused or emotional state[127] or had been bullied or deceived, or where the police had refused to disclose at least some of the evidence against the client to the adviser.[128]

The legal adviser may help the suspect to maintain silence where advice alone – in the absence of the adviser - might not be enough. It should be recognised, however, that the key question is not whether the presence of a legal adviser means that the detainee remains silent, but whether it means that he or she is unlikely to make an unreliable confession. Further, assuming for the moment an inverse correlation between a legal adviser's presence and an unreliable confession, what contribution to it, if any, is made by the right to silence in its current modified form? Obviously, the detainee will not make such a confession if he remains silent, but that is a highly dubious strategy

122 Sanders et al., Advice and Assistance at Police Stations, November 1989.

123 The Sanders research, ibid, found that only 50% of solicitors attended the police station: 25% gave advice over the telephone and 25% gave no advice. Even attendances at the police station were not always followed by attendance at the interview. A few solicitors merely put the police case to the suspect (p 150). It appeared that some advisers who did attend the interview disadvantaged the client by seeming to give their imprimatur to improper police behaviour.

124 Brown, PACE Ten Years On: A Review of the Research, Home Office Research Study 155, 1997, at pp 94–95.

125 The relationship is a matter of some controversy; the Home Office, Working Group on the Right to Silence (C Division, Home Office, London, 13 July 1989; see [1989] Crim LR 855 for comment) considered that there was a causal relationship between legal advice and silence, but this finding has been doubted by Dixon, D, 'Common sense, legal advice and the right to silence' [1991] PL 233, p 251. However, the Sanders research (1989) found that suspects confess less often when they have advice: 35.8% of those whose solicitor was present at the interrogation confessed, as opposed to 59.6% of those who did not receive advice (at p 136). Confirmed by Bucke et al., The Right of Silence: The Impact of the CJPOA 1994, Home Office Research Study No 199, 2000.

126 See the research undertaken by Sanders et al., ibid, p 129, which found that out of 24 suspects, only two were advised to remain silent. Dixon's findings, ibid, p 243 were to the same effect.

127 See Dixon, D, ibid, p 244.

128 Ibid, pp 246 and 247.

given that adverse inferences may be drawn against him at trial. In any event, it is an ineffective[129] way of tackling the risk of such confessions; the real concern here is with the question whether the legal adviser will enable the detainee to maintain a selective silence when under pressure from police, or refuse to depart from his version of events at key points in the interview.

Rights of access to legal advice

The right of access to legal advice is really a bundle of rights. Both PACE and the Terrorism Act 2000 entitle a suspect to consult an adviser privately.[130] The statutory entitlement is therefore both to access to legal advice and to the preservation of the confidentiality of solicitor/client consultation,[131] a matter that is also viewed as of great significance at Strasbourg.[132] The access to legal advice is available under a publicly funded scheme;[133] under Codes C and H the suspect is entitled to be informed of this right;[134] given, if necessary, the name of the duty solicitor,[135] and be permitted to have the solicitor present during questioning.[136] The right to have a solicitor present in the interview, available only under Codes C and H, rather than PACE or the TA, is arguably the most significant right.

The right of custodial access to legal advice is also protected by Art 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights, under the HRA. Article 6(3)(c) provides that everyone charged with a criminal offence has the right to defend himself through legal assistance of his own choosing.[137] Access to legal advice in pre-trial questioning, as opposed to such access for the purposes of the trial, is not expressly provided for in Art 6. However, protection for such access has been implied into Art 6(1) and 6(3)(c). Where a violation of Art 6 is claimed in respect of a lack of access to legal advice in pre-trial questioning, a breach of both paras (1) and (3) will be in question. The judgment in Imbrioscia v Switzerland[138] suggests that if either the accused or his lawyer requests that the latter should be present in pre-trial questioning, this should be allowed if the answers to questions would be likely to prejudice the defence; it is now clear, as discussed below, that the ruling is applicable to police interviews.

129 The Sanders research (1989) found that only 2.4% of suspects exercised their right to silence as against 54.1% who made admissions (the others denied the offence) (1989, p 136).

130 PACE, s 58(1): 'A person in police detention shall be entitled, if he so requests, to consult a solicitor privately at any time.' For TA suspects, this right also arises under the TA, Sched 8, para 7.

131 But see below p 1225 in relation to exceptions to the privacy requirement in relation to terrorism suspects.

132 See below p 1225.

133 See the Legal Aid Act 1988, Sched 6; the Access to Justice Act 1999. Everyone is entitled to free legal advice at the police station from a solicitor whose office is contracted with the Legal Services Commission, whatever their income and capital/savings. The Access to Justice Act provides for payment to franchised firms for most criminal legal aid work, on a fixed fee contract basis.

134 Codes C and H, para 3.1(ii).

135 Codes C and H, Note 6B. The duty solicitor arrangements are governed by the Legal Aid Board Duty Solicitor Arrangements (1994).

136 Code C, para 6.8; Code H, para 6.9.

137 See Chapter 2, pp 65–66.

138 (1993) 17 EHRR 441; A 275 (1993).

Access to legal advice where adverse inferences may be drawn from silence

The Court went further than Imbrioscia in Murray (John) v UK[139] in finding that Art 6(1) and (3)(c) had been breached by the denial of custodial access to a lawyer for 48 hours, since such access was essential where there was a likelihood that adverse inferences would be drawn from silence. It found that where such inferences could be drawn, Art 6 would normally require that the accused should be allowed to benefit from the assistance of a lawyer in the initial stages of police interrogation, although that right might be subject to restrictions for good cause.

These findings were confirmed in Averill v UK.[140] The applicant was denied access to a solicitor during the first 24 hours of interrogation; he was then allowed to consult a solicitor, but the solicitor was not allowed to be present during subsequent interviews. The provisions governing access to a solicitor were contained in s 45 of the EPA 1991. Adverse inferences were drawn from his silence at trial under Art 3 of the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1988. The Court found that no breach of Art 6(1) had occurred; he had been subject to 'indirect compulsion', due to the probability that adverse inferences would be drawn if he remained silent, but that in itself was not decisive.[141] The drawing of adverse inferences, it was found, did not render the trial unfair since the presence of incriminating fibres found on his clothing called for an explanation from him. Further, the drawing of adverse inferences was only one factor in the finding that the charges were proved. However, the Court did find a breach of Art 6(3)(c) read with Art 6(1) on the basis – which it noted in Murray – that, bearing in mind the scheme contained in the 1998 Order, it is of 'paramount importance for the rights of the defence that an accused has access to a lawyer at the initial stages of police interrogation'.[142] This was because, under the scheme, the accused is confronted with a dilemma from the outset. If he remains silent, adverse inferences may be drawn. If he breaks his silence, his defence may be prejudiced. In order to deal with this dilemma, the Court found, legal advice is needed at the initial stages of the interrogation.[143] Thus, a right of access to legal advice in custodial questioning may be implied into Art 6(3)(c) when read with Art 6(1) where the drawing of adverse inferences is a relevant issue.

It appeared from Murray and Averill that any delay in affording the suspect access to legal advice where adverse inferences could be drawn would result in a breach of Art 6, but Brennan v UK[144] suggests that the position is less straightforward than that. In Brennan the accused had been denied access to legal advice but the denial of access was then lifted, although the accused did not in fact receive legal advice. At that point he made a confession. The European Court found that no adverse inferences had in fact been drawn from his silence at trial, and that he had made the confession at a time when the formal denial of access was no longer operative. Taking those factors into

139 (1996) 22 EHRR 29.

140 (2001) 31 EHRR 36; (2000) The Times, 20 June. See also Magee v UK (2001) 31 EHRR 35; (2000) The Times, 20 June.

141 Paragraph 48.

142 Paragraph 59.

143 Paragraph 57.

144 (2002) 34 EHRR 18.

account, no breach of Art 6 was found. Brennan therefore creates quite a significant departure from the more strongly due process-based findings in Murray and Averill.

Brennan implies that a breach of Art 6 cannot be established until the trial; in other words, the question is not whether there was a possibility that adverse inferences would be drawn from silence at a point when the suspect did not have access to legal advice, but whether such inferences were in fact drawn. It is suggested that Murray and Averill are to be preferred on this point: a domestic trial court should approach the matter from the Murray point of view, rather than the Brennan one, since it is in a different position from the Strasbourg Court – it obviously cannot consider the proceedings as a whole, including the trial proceedings, in determining whether a breach of Art 6 occurred.

Further, there may be many situations in which an accused is not formally denied legal advice, but where adverse inferences could be drawn from silence – a number of such situations are discussed below. It is readily arguable that the suspect could be placed in a dilemma that would require consultation with a legal adviser in such circumstances in order to satisfy the demands of fairness under Art 6. Arguably, Murray and Averill, but not Brennan might support an argument that Art 6 would be breached where a suspect had been affected by police ploys in failing to obtain advice, although he needed advice since he was aware that adverse inferences could be drawn from silence. It should be irrelevant that the suspect himself did not demand legal advice since he did not appreciate its significance at the time. However at present the position cannot be regarded as settled. Thus if the loopholes in the legal advice scheme are explored, with the result that a suspect who wants legal advice does not obtain it, it is at present unclear whether Art 6 demands that adverse inferences should not be drawn from silence or that admissions made should be excluded. These points are explored further below.

Murray required a domestic answer, bearing in mind the curtailment of the right to silence that had occurred under ss 34–37 Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, discussed fully below. Under s 34:

> where . . . evidence is given that the accused . . . (a) on being questioned under caution by a constable trying to discover whether or by whom the offence had been committed, failed to mention any fact relied on in his defence . . . or (b) on being charged . . . or on officially being informed that he might be prosecuted . . . failed to mention any such fact, being a fact which in the circumstances existing at the time the accused could reasonably have been expected to mention when so questioned, charged or informed . . . sub-s (2) below applies.

Under s 34(2)(d), the court or jury 'in determining whether the accused is guilty of the offence charged may draw such inferences as appear proper'. The Code C, para 10.5 caution, introduced in the 2003 version of Code C, reflected this curtailment of the right to silence in warning the suspect that adverse inferences could be drawn. The response to Murray was eventually provided by s 58 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 (which came into force in 2003). Section 58 inserted s 34(2A) into the CJPOA to provide essentially that adverse inferences shall not be drawn from a suspect's silence under caution before or after charge at an authorised place of detention if he has not been allowed an opportunity to consult a solicitor before that point (emphasis added).

Codes C and H reflect s 34(2A) in the sense that they provide in Annex C that a restriction on drawing adverse inferences applies when the suspect has not had an opportunity to have access to legal advice. The restriction is reflected in the use of the Annex C para 2 caution, encapsulating the traditional right to silence, which must be used where an opportunity to have legal advice has not been given. Thus s 34(2A) CJPOA is likely to encourage the police to afford access to legal advice. To an extent, s 34(2A) and the current version of Code C reflect Murray rather than Brennan. At the point when the caution is given it is, of course, not possible to know whether or not adverse inferences will in fact be drawn at trial, and yet the suspect has the right to remain silent without risk. This position accords with Art 6, following Murray.

The scheme under ss 34, 36 and 37 of the CJPOA is similar to the scheme under the 1988 Order, so the findings in Murray and Averill appear to cover all police interviews under the Code C para 10.5 caution, since once the caution has been given, it is clear that adverse inferences may be drawn from silence. However, the limitations on access to legal advice and certain of the formal and informal loopholes in the access discussed below arguably may not fully accord with the requirements of Art 6(3)(c) in conjunction with Art 6(1) as interpreted in Murray and Averill. So if s 34(2A) allows for any departure from Murray, or fails to satisfy Murray fully, s 3 HRA could be relied upon to improve the scheme by reference to Art 6. The impact of Murray could, however, be curtailed in so far as Brennan departs from Murray. The term 'circumstances' in ss 34, 36 and 37 of the CJPOA could be strictly interpreted to include a failure to have access to legal advice. The phrase 'had not been allowed to consult a solicitor' in s 58 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 could also be construed broadly to cover informal denials or even informal encouragement to forgo advice. This would depend on the domestic interpretation of Murray, Averill and Brennan and on how flexible judges and magistrates are prepared to be in respect of their interpretative obligation under HRA, s 3.

Whether s 34(2A) will encourage adherence to the legal advice provisions in practice will depend on the interpretation of the term given to the provision. Clearly, the term 'opportunity' may be taken to mean that, formally, an opportunity had been offered, but the suspect had not availed himself of it. This would not curb the use of ploys discussed below. Section 34(2A) also excludes questioning under caution at somewhere other than an authorised place of detention. Thus it does not apply to silences occurring in out of police station interviews (which will be prior to the point of notification of the availability of legal advice). The rationale is that in such interviews the suspect who has not been arrested is free to leave and could go to seek legal advice. However, the less experienced suspect may not realise that this is the case. As explained above, Code C allows for informal interviews outside the police station, under caution. Theoretically, then, such an interview, in which a suspect had remained silent and arguably had not had a true opportunity to consult a solicitor, could be adduced in evidence and s 34(2A) would not prevent the drawing of adverse inferences. Such a possibility would not appear to accord fully with the Art 6 jurisprudence since the suspect was confronted with a dilemma once cautioned, but could not avail himself of legal advice. It is suggested that the objections, based on Murray and Averill, to the drawing of adverse inferences from such silences cannot be fully met by the provision of para 11.4 of Codes C and H to the effect that any significant silence or statement outside the police station should be put to the suspect at the beginning of an interview at the police station. In such out of station interviews, the dilemma mentioned by the Court of Human Rights arises since the suspect should be under caution and therefore formally aware of the dangers of remaining silent. Street interviews or exchanges, of necessity without advice, may have an impact on later interviews even where para 11.2A is adhered to. In the light of these comments, it arguable that the revision of Code C in 2006 or 2003 should have responded to Murray by modifying paras 11.1, 11.1A, 11.13 and 3.1 which provide leeway for interviews to occur outside the police station without notification that access to legal advice is available. Thus, at present, it may be argued that the reform effected by s 34(2A) is flawed and incomplete.

On its face, s 34(2A) can have a direct impact only on suspects who have formally been denied an opportunity to have access to legal advice, who then remain silent, are charged and plead not guilty. Nevertheless, it may be having a general effect on police adherence to the legal advice scheme, since the impact it may have in any particular instance will not be apparent at the relevant points in detention. If a suspect has not formally had an 'opportunity' to have access to legal advice he must be cautioned using the terms of the 'old' caution, under Annex C, para 2 since the restriction on drawing adverse inferences from silence applies. But everything depends on the term 'opportunity' and on whether Art 6 only covers formal denials of access to legal advice. If in a sense the suspect appears to have had an opportunity, whereas in fact it has been subverted by police ploys, the caution under Code C, para 10.5 applies, placing the suspect under pressure to speak.

Under the current domestic provisions discussed below there are instances when suspects will be interviewed in the knowledge that adverse inferences may be drawn from silence, but access to legal advice will not be available, although not formally denied. If the suspect stays silent and the case comes to trial he could argue that in accordance with Art 6 no adverse inferences should be drawn from silence. However, as discussed above, the Strasbourg case law does not clearly cover informal subversion of the opportunity to have legal advice. If it is argued that it does, following Murray and Averill, then finding a breach of Art 6 would depend on determining the genuineness of the opportunity. That would depend on seeking to unravel precisely what had occurred at the police station or earlier in order to determine whether a real opportunity to have advice had been given or not. The findings in Murray, Averill and Brennan are not confined to a circumstance where the defendant in fact stayed silent. Rather, as the Court implied in Murray, it may be that the suspect who fails to remain silent is most in need of legal advice.[145] As Chapter 13 will point out, the Court in Teixeira de Castro v Portugal[146] found that certain pre-trial procedures render a fair trial almost impossible and therefore curb the discretion of the Court in its response.[147] This finding was not made in the context of custodial legal advice but, together with the findings in Murray, and Averill could be applied to s 78 of PACE, in support of an argument that the exclusionary discretion embodied under the section should be used to exclude interviews where no access to legal advice was made available before or during the police interview which is proffered in evidence (possibly even if the lack of access was not due to a clear breach of statutory or Code provisions), although the suspect was aware that adverse inferences might be drawn from silence.[148] It would be arguable that such an interview should be excluded from evidence under s 78, following Murray and Averill, on the basis that otherwise Art 6 would not appear to be satisfied.

145 See further on this point Bucke et al., The Right of Silence: The Impact of the CJPOA 1994, Home Office Research Study No 199, 2000.

146 (1998) 28 EHHR 101.

147 See, pp 1291–94.

An argument similar to this one did not receive much encouragement in one of the early decisions on the Convention, from Scotland.[149] In Paton v Procurator Fiscal,[150] the appellant was to be interviewed about attempted theft and at the police station he indicated that he wanted a solicitor to be informed of his detention. When he was interviewed, his solicitor was not present and he was not told that the police had a discretion to allow his solicitor to be present during the interview if he so wished. After caution, the appellant admitted that he was trying to break into the premises in question. When the charges were recited,[151] the appellant said that he had been merely passing by when the police chased him. The appellant argued that Art 6(1) and 6(3)(c) of the Convention had been contravened. The Court took into account the fact that the appellant had not made a request for his solicitor to be present and that neither Scots law nor the Convention required that in all cases a detained person should be afforded the opportunity to have a solicitor present. The Court found that the question whether a fair trial could be achieved depended not simply upon what happened during the preliminary investigation, but on the whole proceedings, and a number of safeguards were accorded to the accused during the investigation and the trial process; on this basis, the appeal was refused and the case was remitted to the sheriff to proceed to trial.

These findings do not appear to encourage the notion that certain rights, such as access to custodial legal advice, are of especial constitutional significance; they encourage a broad brush approach which appears to assume that a breach of suspects' rights may be cured by affording other rights. However, these findings may be based on the lack of a right to have a solicitor present in interviews in Scotland and, it is suggested, on a doubtful, minimalist interpretation of Art 6. It was also decided prior to the changes introduced by s 34(2A). The courts have not yet had a chance to consider whether s 34(2A) should be extended to cover instances in which legal advice has not been afforded although it has not been formally denied, and the suspect has remained silent.

It should finally be noted that neither s 34(2A) nor Art 6 provide a remedy where the suspect who has requested it has not received legal advice, although adverse inferences could be drawn from silence, and the case does not come to trial because he pleads guilty or the case is dropped. This applies to informal denials and also where a suspect has been formally denied legal advice and the 'wrong' caution is used: so he is warned via the caution that adverse inferences will be drawn from silence.

148 Under PACE 1984, Code C, this would include all interviews since, as indicated above, under para 11.1.A the definition of an interview is an exchange regarding involvement in criminal activity which is required to be under caution.

149 By virtue of the Scotland Act 1998, s 57(2), a Scottish court is required, inter alia, to take into account the various rights enshrined in the Convention. At the time, the Human Rights Act itself was not fully in force in Scotland.

150 Judgment of 24 November 1999 (unreported).

151 He was charged with attempting to break into premises with intent to steal and, in the alternative, that he was found at premises without lawful authority, the inference being that he might commit theft contrary to the Civil Government (Scotland) Act 1982, s 57(1).

Formal exceptions, limitations and informal subversion

The rights of access to legal advice are limited in formal and informal fashion. The formal PACE and TA exceptions are narrowly drawn and, as indicated below, have received a narrow interpretation. This cannot, however, be said of the formal Code C and H exceptions. Further, the factor which previously motivated the police to delay (or refuse) access to legal advice remains unchanged: the suspect still has the right to remain silent and the legal adviser may advise him or her to exercise it in the particular circumstances of the case, despite the risk that adverse inferences may be drawn later at court. Even if the solicitor does not advise silence, the police may think that they are more likely to obtain incriminating admissions from detainees in the absence of a solicitor and therefore at times may deny the access to one envisaged by s 58. Quite a large body of research suggests that the police continue to prefer to interview suspects who have not had advice and without an adviser present.[152] Research confirms that the possibility of formally delaying access to legal advice is almost certainly not as significant as the more informal police influence on the notification and delivery of advice and on securing the presence of the adviser.[153] This may be due in part to the determination shown by the Court of Appeal to protect this due process right by restrictive interpretation of the formal exceptions under s 58(8) of PACE in a key decision.[154] However, there are a number of loopholes in the legal advice scheme which may allow for less formal methods of evading its provisions and it may be that the suspects who are thereby most disadvantaged are those most in need of legal advice. A number of formal and informal methods of evading the scheme are available and the key methods are identified below.

As the discussion below explains, Codes C and H provide that in respect of formal denials the restriction on drawing adverse inferences applies, and the suspect should be cautioned accordingly, under Annex C para 2 of both Codes (the traditional pre-1994 caution). But in respect of other instances in which legal advice is not afforded, the Codes provide expressly or impliedly that the restriction does not apply and therefore the suspect is warned via the caution that if he remains silent adverse inferences may be drawn.

Delaying access – harm-based exceptions

Non-terrorist suspects

The most direct method of delaying legal advice involves invoking one of the s 58(8) PACE exceptions. The exceptions come into operation if the suspect is in police 152 The research undertaken by Sanders et al., Advice and Assistance at Police Stations, November 1989; Brown, PACE Ten Years On: A Review of the Research, Home Office Research Study 155, 1997, p 77.

153 The research undertaken by Sanders et al., ibid, put the figure at around 2%. In comparison, Brown, ibid, found that approximately 35% of suspects may have been influenced against advice by the police. The government's Consultation Paper on Terrorism (1998) stated that it was not aware of any formal denial in terrorist cases over the last two years in Britain (para 8.31).

154 R v Samuel [1988] 2 All ER 135; [1988] 2 WLR 920.

detention for an indictable offence. It used to be the case that the exceptions applied in respect of 'serious arrestable offences'. The concept of an arrestable offence under s 24 was abolished in 2005 when PACE was amended, so s 58(8) has now broadened to cover indictable offences.[155] Section 58(8) allows an officer of at least the rank of superintendent to authorise delay, in respect of a suspect in detention for an indictable offence. If both these conditions are fulfilled, access, if requested, can be delayed for up to 36 hours. under s 58(8) which provides:

> An officer may only authorise delay where he has reasonable grounds for believing that the exercise of the right . . . (a) will lead to interference with or harm to evidence connected with an indictable offence or interference with or physical injury to other persons; or (b) will lead to the alerting of other persons suspected of having committed such an offence but not yet arrested for it; or (c) will hinder the recovery of any property obtained as a result of such an offence.

Under sub-section (8A), delay can also be authorised:

> where the indictable offence is a drug trafficking offence and the officer has reasonable grounds for believing (a) that the detained person has benefited from drug trafficking and (b) that the recovery of the value of that person's proceeds of drug trafficking will be hindered by the exercise of the right . . .'.

A further exception was added (s 58(8A) and (8B)) relating to confiscation orders under Part 2 of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002. Delay is permitted where the detainee has benefited from the offence, and it is considered on reasonable grounds that recovery of the benefit would be hindered if the solicitor is contacted.

In other words, the officer must believe on reasonable grounds that exercise of the right at the time when the person in police detention desires to exercise it will lead to the solicitor acting as a channel of communication between the detainee and others – alerting them or hindering the recovery of stolen property or the products of drug trafficking, or the benefits of crime. These exceptions are repeated in Annex B of Code C, which also provides that if the exception is invoked the suspect must be allowed to choose another solicitor.

The leading case determining the scope of the s 58 exceptions is Samuel.[156] The appellant was arrested on suspicion of armed robbery and, after questioning at the police station, asked to see a solicitor. The request was refused, apparently on the grounds that other suspects might be warned[157] and that recovery of the outstanding stolen money might thereby be hindered.[158] The appellant subsequently confessed to the robbery and was later convicted. On appeal, the defence argued that the refusal of access was 155 A serious arrestable offence was defined in s 116. The amendment was made to s 58(6) by the Serious and Organised Crime Act 2005 Sched 7(3), para 43 (10)(b). The Criminal Justice Act 1988, s 99 extended the exceptions to drug trafficking offences.

156 [1988] QB 615; [1988] 2 All ER 135; [1988] 2 WLR 920, CA.

157 Section 58(8)(b).

158 Section 58(8)(c).

not justifiable under s 58(8) and that therefore, the confession obtained should not have been admitted into evidence as it had been obtained through impropriety. The Court of Appeal considered the use of the word 'will' in s 58(8), which suggests that the police officer must be virtually certain that a solicitor, if contacted, will thereafter either commit a criminal offence or unwittingly pass on a coded message to criminals. It must be asked, first, whether he did believe this and second, whether he believed it on reasonable grounds. The Court considered that only in the remote contingency that evidence could be produced as to the corruption of a particular solicitor would a police officer be able to assert a reasonable belief that a solicitor would commit a criminal offence. They went on to hold that showing a reasonable belief that a solicitor would inadvertently alert other criminals would also be a formidable task; such a belief could only reasonably be held if the suspect in question was a particularly resourceful and sophisticated criminal or if there was evidence that the solicitor sought to be consulted was particularly inexperienced or naïve. It was found that as no evidence as to the naivety or corruption of the solicitor in question had been advanced it could not be accepted that the necessary reasonable belief had existed. The police had made no attempt to consider the real likelihood that the solicitor in question would be utilised in this way; in fact, it was apparent that the true motive behind the denial of access was a desire to gain a further opportunity to break down the detainee's silence. It should be noted that Code C expressly disallows denial of access to a solicitor on the ground that he or she will advise the suspect to remain silent.[159]

This interpretation of s 58(8) greatly narrowed its scope, since it means that the police are no longer able to make a general, unsubstantiated assertion that it was thought that others might be alerted if a solicitor was contacted. The authorising officer has to show, on very specific grounds, why this was thought to be the case. This has meant that the exceptions are very rarely invoked; the change to allow them to operate in respect of indictable offences is unlikely to have any significant impact in encouraging police to invoke them since the central difficulty of showing that a specific solicitor would act dishonestly or naively in the ways indicated still remains. Code C reflects the s 58 exceptions in para 6.6, and they are repeated in Annex B. If an exception is invoked the restriction on drawing adverse inferences applies under CJPOA, s 34(2)(A), and this is stated in Code C, para 6.6(b). The question of exclusion of a confession where an exception is improperly invoked is considered in Chapter 13.[160]

Terrorist suspects

Under the TA 2000, as amended, the access can be delayed for up to 48 hours (see Sched 8, para 8(2)) on the grounds for delay mentioned above, with additional ones relating to terrorism. The right can be delayed if a superintendent reasonably believes that communication with an adviser will lead to interference with the gathering of information about the commission, preparation, or instigation of acts of terrorism or make it more difficult to prevent an act of terrorism or apprehend and prosecute the perpetrators of any such act. Delay can be for 48 hours, which is also the period of time for which the suspect can be detained on police authority alone, without recourse to judicial authorisation.[161]

159 Codes C and H, Annex B, para 4.
160 See pp 1281–83.

The TA harmonises the arrangements for delay in Northern Ireland with those in England and Wales, in that once access has been granted, it will not then be withheld.[162] The arrangements in Scotland under the TA allow for delay under Sched 8, para 16(7) if, under para 17(3), delay is 'in the interests of the investigation or prevention of crime, or in recovering property criminally obtained, or in confiscating the proceeds of an offence, or of the apprehension, prosecution or conviction of offenders'. In all three jurisdictions, when a review officer authorises continued detention under Sched 8 of the TA he must remind the detainee of his rights to contact a friend or relative and to consult a solicitor[163] and, if applicable, of the fact of their being delayed. The officer must also consider whether the reason or reasons for which the delay was authorised continue to subsist, and if not, he must inform the officer who authorised the delay of his opinion. However, there is no provision allowing the review officer to override the view of the officer who originally authorised delay. The TA provisions largely continue the previous counter-terrorism regime, and therefore do not address the concerns of those who view confessions obtained after 24 hours in detention as inherently fallible,[164] particularly where the detainee has also been held without access to legal advice and incommunicado.[165]

Under this scheme, the power of delay in Scotland is wider and is less dependent than in the other jurisdictions on the interests of preventing or detecting acts of terrorism. This seems to be anomalous given that one of the aims of the TA was to harmonise the position of terrorist suspects throughout the UK. The changes under the TA also provide further grounds for delay in obtaining access to legal advice which apply to a far wider group of persons than those covered previously by the PTA and EPA since, potentially, a far larger group can now be viewed as 'terrorist' suspects.[166] Within that group are persons who signally fail to fit the stereotype of the 'terrorist', and are therefore more in need of legal advice. The wider possibilities of delaying access under the TA in relation to the terrorist, as opposed to the conventional suspect, are therefore open to question under Art 6, as discussed below. Code H reflects the TA exceptions in para 6.7(iii), and they are repeated in Annex B. If an exception is invoked the restriction on drawing adverse inferences applies under CJPOA, s 34(2)(A), and this is stated in Code H in para 6.7(b).

161 See Chapter 11, pp 1169–70.

162 Under the EPA and its Codes, the powers to delay access were broadly the same as under the PTA, but also, once the police had allowed access, further delays could be imposed and there was no right to have advisers present in interviews.

163 Under Sched 8, para 27. These rights arise under paras 6 and 7 of Sched 8.

164 See, e.g., Walker, Miscarriages of Justice, 1999, pp 18, 39.

165 See above, p 1188. The exceptions to the right to have someone informed of detention are similar to those allowing delay in providing access to legal advice.

166 See Chapter 14, pp 1377–81.

Further formal exceptions under Codes C and H[167]

Harm-based exceptions

As indicated, para 6.6(b) of both Codes C and H reflects the TA and PACE exceptions to an extent. Those exceptions are repeated word for word in Annex B of both Codes. But the wording of para 6.6 (b) (6.7(b) in Code H) is significantly different and broader. Under para 6.6(b), a power to proceed with the interview, although the suspect has not had advice, arises if an officer of superintendent rank or above has reasonable grounds for believing that delay would: lead to interference with or harm to evidence connected with an offence; lead to interference with or harm to other people or serious loss of or damage to property, or hinder the recovery of property obtained in consequence of the commission of an offence; or lead to the alerting of people suspected of having committed an offence but not yet arrested for it. The para 6.6 provisions are not dependent on the offence in question being an indictable one. These exceptions are significantly broader than those contained in PACE or the TA and repeated in Annex B of both Codes. However, the curbing effect of the Samuel argument would still 167 Code C, para 6.6 provides: A person who wants legal advice may not be interviewed or continue to be interviewed until he has received such advice unless –

(a) Annex B applies in which case the restriction on drawing adverse inferences from silence (para 10.4) will apply because the person is not allowed an opportunity to consult a solicitor; or

(b) an officer of the rank of superintendent or above has reasonable grounds for believing that–

(i) the consequent delay would be likely to lead to interference with or harm to evidence connected with an offence or physical harm to other people or serious loss of, or damage to, property; or lead to the alerting of other people suspected of having committed an offence . . . or hinder the recovery of property obtained in consequence of the commission of an offence;

(ii) where a solicitor, including a duty solicitor, has been contacted and has agreed to attend, awaiting his arrival would cause unreasonable delay to the process of investigation; and in these cases the restriction on drawing adverse inferences from silence (para 10.4) will apply . . .

(c) The solicitor nominated by the person, or selected by him from a list –

(i) cannot be contacted; or

(ii) has previously indicated that they do not wish to be contacted; or

(iii) having been contacted, has declined to attend; and the person has been advised of the Duty Solicitor Scheme but has declined to ask for the duty solicitor. In these circumstances the interview may be started or continued without further delay provided that an officer of the rank of Inspector or above has given agreement for the interview to proceed. In these circumstances the restriction on drawing adverse inferences from silence (para 10.4) will not apply because the person is allowed an opportunity to consult a solicitor.

(d) The person who wanted legal advice changes his mind, in which case the restriction on drawing adverse inferences from silence (para 10.4) will not apply because the person is allowed an opportunity to consult a solicitor. In these circumstances the interview may be started or continued without further delay provided that the person has given his agreement in writing or on tape to being interviewed without receiving legal advice and that an officer of the rank of Inspector or above, having inquired into the suspect's reasons for his change of mind, has given agreement for the interview to proceed in those circumstances. The name of the authorising officer and the reason for the suspect's change of mind should be recorded and repeated on tape at the beginning or re-commencement of interview.

apply: it would still have to be shown that a particular adviser would be likely to act as a channel of communication with others or act dishonestly in some other fashion in relation to the harm envisaged. The restriction on drawing adverse inferences from silence applies if one of these exceptions is invoked.

Unavailability of nominated solicitor or delay

Further powers to delay access and to interview the suspect without his having had legal advice arise under Codes C and H. Code C, para 6.6(b)(ii) provides that the interview can be started although the suspect has not received advice if 'a solicitor has agreed to attend, and awaiting his arrival would cause unreasonable delay to the process of the investigation'. This is repeated in Annex B. Code H contains the same exception in para 6.7. The restriction on drawing adverse inferences from silence applies. But even where the restriction on drawing adverse inferences applies, it is clear that there should be good cause for the delay in obtaining advice, following Murray. That requirement may not be satisfied by these grounds for proceeding with the interview, although advice has not been obtained, since the use of the word 'unreasonable' means that the test is broad and imprecise and could offer leeway to the police to invoke it in a wide range of circumstances

Sub-paragraph 6.6(c) Code C and 6.7 (c) Code H provides two further exceptions: that the detainee can be interviewed without legal advice if the nominated solicitor is unavailable and, first, notification of the duty solicitor scheme is given but the duty solicitor is unavailable, or second, he or she is not required. In these instances the restriction on drawing adverse inferences from silence does not apply on the basis that the suspect has an opportunity to have advice. The first exception does not, it is argued accord with Art 6 as interpreted in Murray and Averill since where both the nominated and duty solicitor are unavailable, the suspect cannot be said to have had an opportunity to have legal advice. It is argued that regardless of the provision in Codes C and H para 6 that adverse inferences can be drawn, s 34(2A) CJPOA should be invoked, taking the demands of Art 6 into account, in such circumstances, to provide that adverse inferences cannot be drawn from silence in an interview affected by that exception.

Consent to forgo advice

The detainee who has decided to have advice can nevertheless change his or her mind; this is provided for by sub-para 6.6(d) of both Codes, if the consent is given in writing or on tape and an officer of the rank of inspector or above has inquired into the reason for the change of mind and gives authority for the interview to proceed.[168] However, there is some leeway allowing police officers to engineer a change of heart.

168 This provision was originally included in the 1991 Home Office circular. It required a note to be made in the custody record of the reason for the suspect's change of heart and this circular provision, in the form of a requirement to record the reason for the change of mind and repeat it on tape, became part of para 6.5 under the 1995 revision to Code C. (When the revised PACE Codes came into force in April 1991, a Home Office circular was issued in conjunction with them by F2 Division, Home Office.)

No limitations were placed on the reasons for giving such consent, thus creating a serious flaw in the legal advice provisions. In particular, if the consent is based on a police misrepresentation, ought it to be treated as genuine? This question arises in part due to the lack of certainty as to the relationship between sub-para 6.6(d) and (c). For example of a detainee nominates a particular solicitor who turns out to be unavailable, and then consents to go ahead with the interview without advice, he or she should clearly be treated as falling within para (c) as opposed to para (d). The provisions under sub-paras 6.6(c) and (d) appear to be expressed as alternatives, but the drafter's intention must surely have been that the police should not be able to obtain the detainee's consent to be interviewed merely by failing to inform him or her of the duty solicitor scheme.

The first instance decision in Vernon[169] suggested that the consent must be genuine; in other words, it must not be based on misleading information given by the police. The defendant consented to be interviewed under the misapprehension that if her own solicitor was unavailable, there was no alternative means of obtaining advice; the confession so obtained was excluded. Andrew J held that as her consent to the interview was given under the misapprehension that otherwise, the interview would be delayed till the morning, this could not be termed true consent: had she known of the availability of the duty solicitor, she would have withheld her consent. Thus, the exception under sub-para 6.3(d) (now para 6.6(d)) was not fulfilled: para 6.3 had been breached. This ruling suggests that although the exceptions under sub-paras 6.6(c) and (d) are expressed disjunctively, they should be read together; if a detainee has fallen within sub-para 6.6(c) by nominating a solicitor and being disappointed, he or she should then be informed of the alternative. It would not seem to accord with the drafter's intention to treat the consent of such a person in the same way as that of a detainee who has decided against having a solicitor at all.

The ruling of the Court of Appeal in Hughes,[170] however, suggested that if the police misled the suspect without bad faith, a resultant consent would be treated as genuine. The appellant, disappointed of obtaining advice from his own solicitor, inquired about the duty solicitor scheme but was informed, erroneously (but in good faith), that no solicitor was available. Under this misapprehension, he gave consent to be interviewed and the Court of Appeal took the view that his consent was not thereby vitiated. Sub-paragraphs 6.3(c) and (d) (now 6.6(c) and (d)) were to be treated as alternatives and the fact that the detainee was within (c) did not vitiate his consent under (d). Thus, no breach had occurred. The Court did not advert to the difficulty that there can be no difference in principle between failing to inform a detainee of the scheme and informing him or her of it but stating wrongly that no solicitor is available.

This ruling opens the possibility that the consent given in Vernon will in future be treated as true consent. The only distinction between the cases is that in Hughes, the misrepresentation was apparently made innocently, while in Vernon, the failure to give the information was deliberate: Vernon demonstrates a willingness to interpret Code C restrictively against the police if bad faith is demonstrated. The view was taken in Hughes that if the misrepresentation had been made negligently or deliberately, a different conclusion would have been reached. This seems to confuse the para 6.3(d) issue and the issue of fairness under s 78 (which will be considered fully in Chapter 13);[171] the judgment would have been clearer if the court had considered first, whether a breach of para 6.3 had occurred and, second, whether the breach in the circumstances would have an adverse effect on the fairness of the trial. Innocence or bad faith on the part of the police has been determined to be relevant when considering s 78,[172] but there is nothing in Code C to suggest that these matters are relevant in relation to the narrow question of failure to fulfil a Code provision. Generally, consent to forgo a right should be treated with caution when the parties are on an unequal footing; and the possible unfairness is exacerbated when the party who will obtain an advantage from the consent gives false information in obtaining it. Had the Court of Appeal found itself able to hold that such consent is not true consent, the onus would have been placed on the police to ensure that administrative practice in relation to the duty solicitor scheme was tightened up. As it is, moves towards obtaining consent in similar circumstances may become more marked and it is likely to be the more suggestible detainee who suffers.

169 [1988] Crim LR 445.
170 [1988] Crim LR 519, CA, transcript from LEXIS.

As indicated, under the 2006 version of Codes C and H, once the suspect has changed his mind about having advice, the interview can proceed subject to the need to obtain the permission of an officer of the rank of inspector or above. This was the main change from the original Code and was obviously not a full safeguard against the possibility of pressure from the police considered above. The requirement that the inspector inquires into the reason for the change of mind provides, however, a partial safeguard. Inclusion of a provision that a consent based on erroneous information given by the police could not be treated as true consent might have encouraged the police to tighten up administrative practices and perhaps avoided a recurrence of the Hughes type of situation. This provision may allow a court to determine whether the consent was based on misleading information, but it leaves open the possibility of treating the consent as valid so long as such information was apparently given in good faith. The restriction on drawing adverse inferences does not apply since the suspect has apparently consented to forego advice.

Debarring solicitors' representatives

As already noted, s 58(1) entitles the detainee to consult a solicitor at any time. This provision does not extend to solicitors' clerks but, under Code C, para 6.12 (previously para 6.9), if the solicitor who has been contacted decides to send a clerk, he or she should be admitted to the police station. After the decision in Samuel,[173] access to a solicitor can be delayed only in very specific circumstances. These exceptions do not apply to clerks under both Codes C and H, but, since the decision of the Court of Appeal in Chief Constable of Avon ex p Robinson,[174] access to a clerk can be denied in a much wider range of circumstances. The Chief Constable had issued instructions that the character and antecedents of certain unqualified clerks employed by the applicant – a solicitor – were such as to make their presence at police interviews with suspects undesirable.

171 See Chapter 13, pp 1277–78.
172 See Alladice (1988) 87 Cr App R 380, CA; [1988] Crim LR 608. See Chapter 13, p 1282.
173 [1988] QB 615; [1988] 2 All ER 135; [1988] 2 WLR 920, CA.
174 [1989] All ER 15; [1989] 1 WLR 793.

The Chief Constable left the final decision on access to the officer in question, but gave his opinion that it would only rarely be appropriate to allow these particular clerks access to a suspect. The applicant sought judicial review of the instructions, contending that they were in breach of para 6.9.

The Court of Appeal considered the scope of the express exception to para 6.9: '. . . the clerk shall be admitted unless an officer of the rank of inspector or above considers that such a visit will hinder the investigation of crime'. (Similar wording is now used in para 6.12.) It was held that the investigating officers had been entitled in each instance to invoke the exception because they had known of the criminal activities of the clerks. They had been informed of such activities by the Chief Constable, but he had not imposed a blanket ban on the clerks; the discretion to debar the clerks had been left with the officers concerned. Accordingly, there had been no breach of para 6.9 and the application would therefore be refused. May LJ, in a lengthy dictum, also considered that there was an implied requirement under para 6.9 that a clerk be capable of giving advice on behalf of the solicitor and therefore a police officer would be entitled to exclude a clerk if he appeared incapable of giving advice owing to his age, appearance, mental capacity or known background.

The concern as to the possible effects of employing these untrained clerks was understandable, but the result of this decision was to confer a very wide power on the police to exclude clerks, which potentially has unfortunate consequences. If a detainee asks for legal advice and a clerk arrives but is not admitted to the police station on one of the grounds considered above, or if he or she is not allowed to remain in the interview, the police, under Code C, para 6.14, must give the original solicitor the opportunity of making other arrangements. The Code is silent as to what should happen if the solicitor is unable to do so, although under para 6.10, if a solicitor is excluded from the station, the police must give the suspect an opportunity to consult another solicitor. Paragraph 6.12 now provides that para 6.10 applies to clerks and, therefore, in the circumstances described, the police as a last resort presumably ought to inform the detainee of the duty solicitor scheme. It is probably regrettable that the Court of Appeal suggested such wide grounds on which to exclude clerks. If the police take advantage of their width to exclude clerks rather too readily, some detainees may be likely to experience substantial delay in obtaining advice. There is always the danger when advice is delayed that a detainee will succumb to pressure to get the interview over with quickly and will consent to be interviewed without advice.

The 1995 revision addressed this possibility to some extent and the changes appear in the 2006 revision of Code C, and in Code H: para 6.13 restricts the grounds for exclusion as far as clerks or other accredited representatives of solicitors are concerned, since it defines such persons as 'solicitors'. This means that the trainee, clerk or legal executive is 'an accredited or probationary representative included on the register of representatives maintained by the Legal Sevices Commission'. Therefore, the more restrictive provisions relating to exclusion from the interview of solicitors, paras 6.9, 6.10, 6.11 and 6.12, will apply. Under para 6.10, the solicitor may be excluded from the interview if his or her conduct is such that the investigating officer is unable properly to question the suspect. Under para 6.14, an accredited or probationary representative may be excluded from the police station if an officer of the rank of inspector or above considers that the visit would hinder the investigation of crime and directs otherwise. The factors influencing the discretion to exclude such advisers from the police station are set out in paras 6.15, and include taking account of 'any matters set out in any written letter of authorisation provided by the solicitor'. It is unclear that this discretion is markedly narrower than that indicated in Robinson and, therefore, it will be hard ever to challenge a decision to exclude such persons, leaving open the possibility that officers may at times exercise this power rather too readily. Once advice is delayed, a detainee may succumb to pressure to forgo it in order to speed matters up. But under para 6.16 the solicitor in question must be notified and given an opportunity to make other arrangements. Under para 6.19 a record must be made if a detainee asks for legal advice and an interview is begun without it, or the solicitor or representative has been required to leave the interview. Nothing is said about applying the restriction on drawing adverse inferences, despite the fact that the detainee may not in fact obtain an opportunity to have legal advice. Again this is an instance in which, it is argued, s 34(2A) should be applied, adopting a broad interpretation based on the Art 6 jurisprudence, so that such inferences should not be drawn.

Disallowing private consultation for terrorist suspects

There is an extra exception in Code H under para 6.5, based on TA, Sched 8, para 9. The detainee can be forbidden a private consultation with the solicitor if an officer of the rank of Commander or Assistant Chief Constable gives authority for this on the basis that otherwise the consequences set out in the TA, Sched 8, paras 8(4) or 8(5) might reasonably be expected to arise. Those are the consequences allowing for delay in access to legal advice. This provision is in doubtful conformity with Art 6 since in a number of cases the Strasbourg Court has stressed the importance of maintaining the confidentiality of solicitor/client consultation (Brennan v UK; S v Switzerland).[175] In R (La Rose) v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis the applicant was forced to obtain telephone advice using a phone on the custody officer's desk, while other officers were in the room. It appeared that confidentiality may have been impaired and he was inhibited in his consultation with the solicitor as a result. However, the Divisional Court found no breach of his Art 6 rights. Since it was unclear that there was a pressing reason to use a phone in a situation in which the applicant could be over heard, it is likely that the Strasbourg would take a different view. The exception based on TA, Sched 8, para 9 does relate to pressing reasons. But, on Samuel lines, and taking account of the Art 6 jurisprudence on confidentiality, it is argued that the police would have to demonstrate that there was some quality about the particular solicitor that would lead him or her to divulge information resulting in one of the harmful consequences envisaged in Sched 8, if the conversation was confidential.

Implied limitations and informal subversion of the rights

Suspects who are thinking of asking for legal advice straight away may still be persuaded out of doing so by various methods and the Sanders research found that such methods – termed 'ploys' – were, unsurprisingly, most successful against the least experienced 175 29 November 1991.

suspects.[176] However, there have been some attempts in the various revisions of Code C to combat the use of such ploys, as discussed below.

Out of station interviews

Interviews outside the police station continue to be unaffected by rights of access to legal advice, in the sense that notification of the right under para 3.1 of Codes C and H is reserved for the police station, thus disadvantaging the inexperienced suspect who is not already aware of it at the point when admissions may be made.[177] The very significant reform of notification of legal advice on caution was omitted from all the Code C revisions, including the 2006 one, despite the fact of curtailment of the right to silence and of the findings discussed at Strasbourg to the effect that questioning accompanied by the risk of drawing adverse inferences from silence without access to legal advice breaches Art 6(1).[178] The restriction on drawing adverse inferences from silence where no opportunity to have access to legal advice has been given (in Codes C and H, Annex C), goes only part of the way to meet those findings, it is argued, since the restriction only applies inside the police station, as considered further below. The lack of notification of legal advice outside the police station, combined with the leeway for interviewing before the police station is reached within Codes C and H, is probably one of the key flaws in the PACE scheme in due process terms.

Subverting notification

It is probably fair to assume, first, that many suspects, including those who are criminally experienced,[179] are aware of the right to legal advice and, second, that the group who are not so aware would tend to include some of the more vulnerable members of society, or first-time suspects. It has already been noted above that there is leeway in the interviewing scheme to allow admissions to be made before notification of advice during 'booking in' at the police station. At the point of notification, the suspect not already aware of the right to advice is in a very vulnerable position since he is dependent for information on the very persons who have an interest in withholding it or misleading him. Research conducted by Sanders has demonstrated that notification can be subverted by various methods, most commonly by ensuring that suspects never really take in what is on offer.[180] When Code C was revised in 1991 and in 1995, this problem was recognised and an attempt was made to address it. The reforms are carried through into the 2006 version and also appear in Code H.

176 The take-up rate for advice among suspects with no previous convictions 'declined sharply as more ploys were used'. This was contrasted with the smaller correlation between the use of ploys and take-up rate among all suspects (Sanders, 1989, pp 57 and 61).

177 Softley's research into the issue indicated that when suspects were informed of this right, requests for advice were three times as high as when they were not so informed (Softley, Police Interrogations, 1980).

178 Above, p 1211.

179 The Sanders research, above (1989), supports this suggestion; out of 60 suspects who knew that they had a right to legal advice, only 23.3% did not know this before informed of it by the police: p 46.

180 Sanders found that the most popular ploy (used in 42.9% of the instances observed) was to read the rights too quickly or incomprehensibly or incompletely: ibid, p 59.

The requirement of notification under para 3.1 was backed up by a para 6.3 (6.2 in Code H), requiring that police stations display a prominent poster (under Note 6H with ethnic translations if appropriate) advertising the right to have advice. Suspects were supposed to be given a leaflet under original Note 3E explaining the arrangements for obtaining advice, including the fact that it was free, but in practice a number of suspects did not receive it or did not understand it, thereby enabling police officers to mislead them.[181] Currently, under para 3.1(ii), of both Codes C and H the suspect must now be informed that advice is free[182] (although the posters need not carry this information). Further, general discouragement of ploys is articulated in para 6.4, which provides that no attempt should be made to dissuade the suspect from having advice.

However, it must be questioned whether the provision of posters will make much difference. The 'booking in' stage is likely to be one of the more traumatic points in the process, especially for the suspect who is inexperienced or in some other way vulnerable. Whether he is likely to notice and take in a message conveyed in this way, which is not specifically directed at him, is open to question. If he remains silent in the face of a rapid notification, his silence can be taken as a waiver of advice when in actuality it merely denotes incomprehension. The requirement (introduced in 1995) under para 6.5 (6.4 in Code H) that the suspect should be asked his reason for declining legal advice, and that this should be noted on the custody record, may go some way towards ensuring that suspects understand what is on offer and may curb police 'ploys', as may the requirement to point out that the suspect may speak on the telephone with a solicitor. Nevertheless, the possibility of manipulation of the custody record remains, since the whole process of making the record remains in the hands of the custody officer.[183] Research conducted after the 1991 revision of Code C found that a higher proportion of suspects were being informed of the right to legal advice,[184] but that the information was given in a quarter of cases in an unclear or unduly rapid fashion.

Encouragement to defer the decision

If the suspect does take in what is being offered, he may be encouraged not to exercise the right straight away. In fact, the Sanders research suggested that encouraging a suspect to defer the decision to have advice was quite popular.[185] The 1991 revision of Code C did address this problem and again the reforms are carried through into 181 This ploy was used in less than 1.5% of the instances observed: ibid, p 59.

182 The research by Brown et al. (1997) shows a dramatic improvement in the number of suspects informed that advice is free after the revision of the Codes: 73%, compared with 5%.

183 It has been suggested (by Wolchover and Heaton-Armstrong (1990) 140 NLJ 320–21) that a requirement of an own hand declaration of waiver of advice would have represented an effective means of addressing the problem because it would have forced the custody officer to ensure that the suspect understood what was being offered and would require positive action on the suspect's part to refuse it.

184 Brown, Ellis and Larcombe, Changing the Code: Police Detention under the revised PACE Codes of Practice (research conducted for the Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure), 1993, Home Office Research Study 129. It found that 73% of suspects, as opposed to 66% prior to April 1991, received notification.

185 This 'ploy' was used in 8.2% of the cases observed. In a further 1.8% of cases, it was suggested that the suspect waited until after his transfer to another station before having advice and in a further 2.7% of cases that he waited until he got out of the police station; Sanders, 1989, p 59.

the 2006 version of Code C. Paragraph 3.1 Codes C and H now provides that it is a 'continuing right which may be exercised at any stage' and under para 11.2 of both Codes, a suspect must now be reminded of the right before each interview in the police station. Although this change is to be welcomed, it should not obscure the value of having advice before any interviewing at all takes place.[186] It is therefore unfortunate that para 3.1 does not make this clear and could even be said to encourage the suspect to defer the decision. Note 3G seemed designed to dissuade some suspects from deferring it by providing that a request for advice from a mentally disordered or handicapped person or a juvenile should be pursued straight away without waiting for the appropriate adult to arrive. This provision does not appear in the 2006 version of Code C, or in Code H. It appeared to be intended to prevent police officers playing off adult against suspect by telling the suspect to defer making a decision about advice until the adult arrives,[187] and then giving the adult the impression that the juvenile has waived advice or does not need it.[188] It appeared that this provision did not have much impact,[189] which might be because it was contained in a Note and not in the Code itself. Provision aimed at preventing this ploy could have been taken further by including a requirement that even where a suspect had waived advice, suspect and adult should be left alone together for a few minutes after re-notification of the right. Instead, attempts to combat it appear to have been abandoned.

Conclusions; improving the legal advice scheme

Clearly, the curtailment of the right to silence discussed is tending to affect the nature of custodial legal advice. It has affected the role of the legal adviser in the police station; that role was already, it seemed, interpreted in a variety of ways by advisers, but in circumstances where silence would previously have been advised by most of them it seems possible that, at present, it may not be.[190] It appears that the difficulty of advising the client as to when to remain silent and when not to take the risk of so doing may mean that some inexperienced advisers tend to adopt the role of referee or counsellor rather than that of legal adviser. More experienced advisers will, however, be of great value to the client, since they will be able to advise on the risks of staying silent, which may be much greater in response to certain questions than to others.[191] The main studies in this area[192] recognised that interviews may be a means of constructing or creating truth rather 186 Sanders found that suspects had often made admissions in the absence of the solicitor and that therefore 'the potential impact of the solicitor was neutralised in advance by the police': ibid, p 143. This finding arose in the context of informal questioning, but could be equally applicable to instances where the suspect defers the decision to have advice.

187 This ploy was used in 5.4% of instances observed: ibid, p 59.

188 This ploy was used in 2.4% of instances observed: ibid, p 59.

189 Brown et al., 1997; apart from this propensity, particular problems were found with the notification of this right to juveniles, with a wide variation in the number of juveniles requesting advice in the different stations: 7% to 58%.

190 See Bucke et al., The Right of Silence: The Impact of the CJPOA 1994, Home Office Research Study No 199, 2000.

191 For further discussion, see Fenwick, H, 'Curtailing the Right to Silence, Access to Legal Advice and Section 78' [1995] Crim LR 132; Jackson, M, 'Interpreting the silence provisions: The Northern Ireland cases' [1995] Crim LR 587.

192 The Sanders research (1989), the Home Office Study by Brown (1997) and the study by Bucke et al. (2000).

than discovering it, but their concern was more with the causal relationship between the presence of a legal adviser and exercise of the right to silence than with the relationship between such presence and the making of an unreliable confession. This issue was touched on in the study by Dixon,[193] which found that legal advisers were more likely to advise silence at least temporarily if the client was in a confused or emotional state[194] or had been bullied or deceived.[195] A further study, conducted for the Royal Commission on Criminal Justice[196] found, not surprisingly, that the relationship between legal advice and the right to silence was affected by the quality of the advice given. The research found that many 'legal advisers' are clerks, secretaries and former police officers with no legal education or training in the provision of custodial legal advice. Such persons, it was found, often had little or no grasp of the case in question and little apparent understanding of the need, at times, for the client to maintain a selective silence. According to the research, 78% of the advisers counselled the client to co-operate with the police. Some recent research echoes these findings as to the quality of advice and suggests that advisers adopt a passive stance in interviews, failing to intervene where intervention is clearly called for.[197] McConville found that the presence of some legal advisers in interviews may have had a detrimental impact on suspects: 'Lacking any clear understanding of their role in the process, some advisers simply become part of the machine which confronts the suspect.'[198] The suggestions that advisers are reluctant to adopt an adversarial stance were given credence by the two post-PACE cases of oppression which arose in respect of tape recorded interviews with an adviser present.[199] The advisers must operate on police territory and may, as Dixon puts it, deal with the resultant pressures by making 'some positive adaptation'.[200] However, more recent research has pointed out that intervention is not called for in around one-quarter of interviews, that advisers usually intervene when it is called for but, in half of such cases, do not do so as often as is needed.[201]

Thus, despite the general perception that legal advice reduces the likelihood that unreliable confessions will be made, the available empirical evidence relating specifically to the issue allows only the tentative suggestion that the adviser may ensure that the client is aware of the right to silence and may sometimes advise that he exercises it, despite the risks, especially where the client does not seem able to cope with the interview.[202] In this context, it is worth bearing in mind that it tends to be a feature

193 See Dixon, D, 'Common sense, legal advice and the right to silence' [1991] PL 233.

194 Ibid, p 244.

195 Ibid, pp 246 and 247.

196 The study by Hodgson and McConville took place over an eight-month period during which the researchers followed suspects and advisers into 180 interrogations; see (1993) 143 NLJ 659.

197 The Role of Legal Representatives at Police Stations, HMSO 1992 Research Study No 3, summarised at [1993] Crim LR 161. The approach of the research has been criticised: see Roberts, D, 'Questioning the suspect: the solicitor's role' [1993] Crim LR 368, with reply by Baldwin, p 371.

198 McConville, M and Hodgson, J, Custodial Legal Advice and the Right to Silence, Royal Commission Study No 13.

199 R v Paris (1993) 97 Cr App R 99; Heron (1993) unreported, judgment of Mitchell J, 1 November 1993.

200 Dixon, D, 'Common sense, legal advice and the right to silence' [1991] PL 233 at pp 236–37.

201 Bridges, L and Choongh, S, Improving Police Station Legal Advice, 1998, The Law Society.

202 It is worth noting that the Court of Appeal has accepted as a general rule that most suspects, unless clearly experienced and independently minded, are less likely to make any confession in the presence of a solicitor (Samuel [1988] 1 QB 615; [1988] 2 All ER 135; [1988] 2 WLR 920, CA; Dunford (1990) 140 NLJ 517, CA).

of cases in which a miscarriage of justice has occurred that the confessions were uttered in the absence of a legal adviser.[203] This has not invariably been the case; the confessions gained by oppression in the case of the Cardiff Three were obtained in the presence of a solicitor.[204] Of course, if an unreliable confession is made in the presence of a legal adviser, this may say much more about the quality of the advice given than it does about the principle of having legal advice. The presence of a solicitor can affect the reliability of the confession in other ways. The suspect may feel generally reassured by the presence of a person independent of the police who is undaunted by the interview process.

Moreover, the presence of the adviser may sometimes be a potent factor discouraging use of improper tactics,[205] and may help to alter the balance of power between interviewer and interviewee, thus tending to create a climate in which an unreliable confession is less likely to be uttered. Reassurance deriving from the presence of a solicitor is not merely valuable in terms of the reliability of the confession; it may serve to make the whole experience of police detention less traumatic and daunting. In theory, the solicitor will intervene if the interview is conducted in an intimidatory fashion or if other improper tactics are used. Although it seems clear that the quality of legal advice improved over the 1990s, the availability of legal advice may not always have such effects, as indicated above. In other words, the mere fact that a person labelled a 'legal adviser' turns up at the police station and may be present at the interview may have little impact in terms of evening up the balance of power between suspect and police officer. Indeed, the presence of such a person may sometimes be to the disadvantage of the suspect, as it may offer a reassurance which it does not warrant.

The result is that the introduction of provisions aimed at curbing informal subversion are unlikely to have much impact and police working practices of subverting the new provisions themselves will tend to develop. It has been found that 'in around 28% of cases prior to the 1991 revisions but in 35% afterwards suspects may have been influenced against seeking advice by the police'.[206] The percentage of suspects who receive advice remains relatively low and the research suggests that this continues to be due in part to subversion of notification and the responses of the police to requests for advice.[207]

This discussion has suggested that the revisions of Code C in 1991 and 1995 tinkered with the problem of informal subversion of the right, but no radical change

203 E.g., the Confait case: see the Report of an Inquiry by the Hon Sir Henry Fisher (1977) HC 90; the case of the Birmingham Six (1991) The Times, 28 March; Silcott (1991) The Times, 8 December.

204 Paris (1993) 97 Cr App R 99; [1994] Crim LR 361, CA. This also occurred in Heron (1993) unreported, judgment of Mitchell J, 1 November 1993; the judge, Mitchell J, drew attention to the fact that only a legal executive was present during oppressive questioning and said that this was unacceptable.

205 One of the conclusions of the Sanders research (1989), p 150, was that suspects who did not receive advice or whose solicitors did not attend the interrogation would have been greatly assisted had the solicitor been present. Two examples are given, pp 138 and 139, of forceful or threatening questioning which produced a possibly unreliable confession from an easily intimidated suspect in the absence of a solicitor. This finding received some support from Dixon's study (Dixon, D, 'Common sense, legal advice and the right to silence' [1991] PL 233). See also Bucke et al., 2000. See also Sanders and Young, Criminal Justice, 3rd edn, 2007, Chapter 4.5 at pp 208–9.

206 Brown et al., 1997.

207 Brown, ibid, pp 94–95; Bucke, 2000.

was undertaken. The 1999 revision signalled an abandonment of attempts to improve the scheme, despite the fact that after 1995, commentators had continued to point out its defects.[208] The two revisions after the coming into force of CJPOA, s 34(2A) included the restriction on drawing adverse inferences from silence where the detainee had not had an opportunity to have access to legal advice. The 2006 revision includes the restriction and the two different cautions, reflecting it. The restriction may have some impact on the legal advice scheme in encouraging police to go further in the direction of offering an opportunity of advice to the suspect. But ploys are unlikely to be fully ruled out, partly because failing to offer such an opportunity will usually have no adverse consequences from a police perspective, as discussed below and in Chapter 15. Otherwise the 2006 revision of Code C merely continued the reforms already in place, without introducing any significant change. The fundamental problem is that the process of delivering advice remains in the hands of a body which has an interest in withholding it, while many suspects continue to need disinterested advice regarding the decision whether to have advice.[209]

Exclusion of admissions obtained after a breach of the legal advice provisions may have encouraged police officers to adhere to the scheme. However, most of the methods of evading the legal advice provisions considered here tend to consist of rule evasion as opposed to rule breaking. Courts tend to prefer the defence to point to a specific breach of a Code provision before deciding whether to invoke s 78 to exclude admissions.[210] However, the disapproval of persuading an inexperienced suspect to forgo advice expressed in Beycan[211] suggests that there may be a willingness on the part of the judiciary to consider rule evasion in this context. Where it seems that such evasion has occurred, it could be characterised as general subversion of the legal advice scheme or perhaps as a breach of the para 6.4 provision that no attempt must be made to persuade the suspect to waive advice. There would be scope for such argument where, for example, a suspect who made admissions in an interview after he had waived his entitlement to advice stated that something an officer said (such as an overstatement of the time needed to contact a solicitor) or failed to say to him, persuaded him to the decision not to have advice.

Although para 6.4 seems to be aimed at preventing such improper persuasion at the 'booking in' stage, it might also apply if it appeared that police officers had pressurised or misled a suspect into reversing the decision to have advice. For example, an untrue representation (even though made in good faith) that the duty solicitor was unavailable which had the effect of persuading the detainee to reverse the decision to have advice might be brought within para 6.4. If no reason for such a reversal was recorded, that might lend weight to the argument that the suspect was improperly persuaded to forgo advice. It is clear that although para 6.4 has not so far received much attention, it does open up a number of possibilities.

208 See Brown, ibid; Sanders, A, 'Access to justice in the police station: an elusive dream?', in Access to Justice, 1996.

209 The Sanders research found that suspects quite often asked officers whether or not they should have advice (1989), p 65.

210 See, e.g., Keenan [1989] 3 WLR 1193.

211 [1990] Crim LR 185.

Where access to legal advice has formally been delayed, and the suspect has stayed silent, s 34(2A) will not allow the drawing of adverse inferences. In such an instance, there would be no need to rely at trial or in judicial review proceedings on arguments raised under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA. But as discussed above, there are grounds for delay under Codes C and H, para 6 to which the restriction on drawing adverse inferences is not applicable; in such instances the question whether the suspect had a true opportunity to have advice should be subjected to strict scrutiny in the light of the requirements of Art 6. Equally that question would arise where access to legal advice has been informally delayed. This argument might be raised where a suspect has been influenced by police ploys in failing to obtain advice – whether due to inadequacies in the informing procedure or to direct or more subtle persuasion – and the suspect has stayed silent. This point will be returned to in Chapter 13 when exclusion of evidence as a form of redress for a breach of the Codes or PACE is considered. However, it should be noted here that even if methods of evading the legal advice scheme could be given the character of such a breach, exclusion of evidence would not necessarily follow. Thus, this 'sanction' remains extremely weak and is, of course, inapplicable to a suspect who is improperly denied advice or encouraged to forgo it, but later pleads guilty.

A further significant question is whether Art 6 might be breached where legal advice is not formally denied to the defendant for a period of time, as in Murray, although he has not in fact received advice before being interviewed and making admissions. The admission of a subsequent interview might be viewed as affecting the fairness of the trial, following Murray. This argument would be strongest where other adverse factors were also present, including a confession made after 24 hours or more in detention, or where the inexperienced, young, emotionally unstable or educationally sub-normal suspect could not be expected to make his or her own assessment as to the value of having legal advice and was therefore very vulnerable to police suggestions. This appears to be a particularly pertinent question in respect of terrorism suspects since they can be held for up to 28 days.

If Art 6 is concerned with the objective reliability of the interview in influencing the integrity and fairness of the trial, it can be argued that, unless the defendant made a clear, positive (albeit possibly misguided) decision not to have custodial advice, the admission into evidence of an interview under caution without such advice, whatever the reason for the failure, might affect the fairness of the trial. It is unclear that the fact that a vulnerable defendant (for example, on the verge of mental handicap) had waived advice or had received brief telephone advice only, would be sufficient where it could be said that the trial, objectively speaking, might be rendered unfair by the admission of the interview. Similar arguments could perhaps also be raised where the adviser attends the station to see a mentally vulnerable suspect or one with a poor command of English, but the advice obtained is clearly inadequate. When the Strasbourg Court spoke of the need for legal advice where adverse inferences were to be drawn from silence, it may be suggested that it had in mind – taking into account the general need for the rights to be genuinely efficacious, not illusory – the notion of sound, adversarial advice.

Various suggestions for reform of the legal advice scheme have already been made above which could bring about significant improvement without necessitating a radical change. There are other possibilities: ploys could be discouraged and untrue allegations by suspects of lack of notification of advice precluded if the 'booking in' stage were video or audio taped.[212] Such an innovation could be used in conjunction with the para 6.4 prohibition of attempts to dissuade the suspect to forgo advice. Inadequate notification of advice could be characterised as an attempt at persuasion to forgo it on the ground that it was intended to and did have that effect. Finally, and very importantly, notification of legal advice could take place on arrest or even on caution, thereby harmonising the position of all suspects. Clearly, such changes would not ensure that all suspects who needed it received advice.

Further, improvement in the quality and delivery of advice can be brought about only by an increase in funding for the scheme. It may be argued that only specially trained solicitors should offer advice, but until better funding is available, solicitors will delegate this function. The Royal Commission, in its 1993 report, proposed that the performance of solicitors should be monitored and that the police should receive training in the role solicitors are expected to play.[213] In a response to the available research and recommendations of the Runciman Royal Commission,[214] the Law Society undertook a programme of training with a view to ensuring that clerks or other non-solicitor advisers are accredited in accordance with the Law Society's scheme for accreditation. Thus, when non-solicitors give advice, they are normally accredited,[215] although it has been pointed out that firms can use untrained paralegals who are not trained and then replace them after six months with another untrained trainee.[216] Under Codes C and H a solicitor includes 'probationary or accredited representatives'. But the quality of advice, although improving, remains variable: around 26% of those giving custodial legal advice are non-solicitors[217] and where an 'own' as opposed to a duty solicitor gives advice, there is no requirement that he or she should have specialist training in this area.

However, it may be that more radical action is necessary to address this problem. There are various possibilities; for example, suspects could routinely be offered the chance at booking in to speak to a duty solicitor on the phone regarding the question of having legal advice. More radically, and expensively, legal advisers (who might be trainee solicitors and should at least have some legal education) could be employed on a temporary basis to attend all interviews in police stations except where the suspect requested his own solicitor or a duty solicitor or specifically required that a legal adviser should not be present. Such advisers could receive some special training concerned specifically with advising the suspect in the police station.[218] Apart from such advisers, 212 The suggestion of video taping was made by Fordham J (1991) 141 NLJ 677. He suggested that it could take place by means of a fixed camera focused on the 'booking-in' desk. The Royal Commission Report 1993 also proposed (Proposal 57) that a waiver of advice at this point should be video taped.

213 Proposals 64–69.

214 Runciman Report Recommendations 61–68. In response to the McConville study, reported at (1993) 143 NLJ 659, the Law Society and Legal Aid Board announced that from October 1993, legal aid would not be available for police station work unless advisers had been through a training course and passed a Law Society test. They now have to be accredited; see p 1224 above.

215 See further Cape, E, Defending Suspects at Police Stations, 1999, Legal Action Group.

216 Bridges, L and Choongh, S, Improving Police Station Legal Advice, 1998.

217 Brown, 1997, p 108. See, e.g., Sanders and Young, Criminal Justice, 3rd edn, 2007, Chapter 4.5 at pp 205–12.

218 E.g., the College of Law course: 'Advising the suspect at the police station'.

persons other than solicitors should not attend the suspect during interviews. Arguably, Codes C and H should be revised to allow for notification of advice on caution, to clarify the provisions allowing for delays in access and to require a positive decision to refuse advice. Further moves towards improving the quality of advice may have to be undertaken. Such a scheme would not only address most of the difficulties outlined here, but also the problems caused by the reluctance of solicitors to attend the police station[219] and the variation in the quality of the response of solicitors to the request for advice.[220]

The courts continue to have the opportunity, if they are prepared to take an activist line in giving a broad interpretation to Murray and Averill, to curb the formally allowed and informally developed police discretion in affording access to legal advice which this part of this chapter has discussed. At present, however, they show little inclination to do so: the high watermark in due process terms represented by the decision in Samuel in 1988 has not been revisited in recent decisions in this context, despite the influence of the HRA. This point is explored further below, in relation to the right to silence.

4 The right to silence

Introduction

There is general academic agreement that, as Sanders and Young have put it, 'it is over the right of silence that due process and crime control principles clash most fundamentally'.[221] The right to silence, in the sense of the immunity of an accused person from having adverse inferences drawn from failure to answer questions during police questioning, is central to the due process model. In contrast, adherence to crime control principles logically demands not only that such inferences should be drawn, but that in some or all circumstances, refusal to answer police questions should be an offence in itself, on the ground that innocent persons would not thereby be disadvantaged and the burden on the prosecution would be eased.

Within the due process camp, retention of the right to silence was advocated on the grounds of its value in protecting suspects and also on the basis that it symbolises the presumption of innocence. In the crime control camp abolition was often advocated on the ground that only the guilty have something to hide; the innocent need fear nothing from speaking.[222] But one group of abolitionists departed from a classic crime control stance in arguing for an 'exchange' or trade-off between the PACE suspects' rights and the right to silence.[223] Since the inception of PACE, which adopted the due process stance,[224] there has been a clear movement towards the crime control position, on the 219 The Sanders research found that 25.6% of solicitors gave telephone advice only, which was less valuable for the suspect (1989), p 104.

220 The Sanders research found an enormous variation in the quality of service offered in this context, ibid, pp 112–17.

221 Criminal Justice, 3rd edn, 2007, p 223.

222 See Greer, S, 'The Right of Silence: A Review of the Current Debate', (1990) 53 MLR 709.

223 See Greer, ibid.

224 The only recognition given to this right in PACE was in Code C, in the wording of the caution, para 10.4.

basis of exchanging enhanced suspects' rights for curtailment of the right to silence. Curtailment of the right was effected under the CJPOA 1994, ss 34–37, but subsequent jurisprudence under Art 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights has led, as will be discussed, to a partial return to the original due process position.

Article 6 of the Convention contrasts with Art 14(3) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and with Art 34(1) of the South African Bill of Rights in that it does not expressly forbid using compulsion to obtain confessions.[225] The expectation under Art 6(2) that the state bears the burden of establishing guilt impliedly requires that the accused should not be expected to provide involuntary assistance by way of a confession. Thus, the presumption of innocence under Art 6(2) is closely linked to the right to freedom from self-incrimination which the Court has found to be covered by the right to a fair hearing under Art 6(1).[226]

Article 6(2) further impliedly requires that when carrying out their duties, members of a court should not start with the preconceived idea that the accused has committed the offence charged; the burden of proof is on the prosecution, and any doubt should benefit the accused. These matters are at issue when silence under interrogation by law enforcement bodies is penalised by a formal penalty or by drawing adverse inferences from it. The Court has drawn a distinction between these matters, although it recognised in Murray (John) v UK[227] that they were not entirely distinct, since adverse inference-drawing is clearly a form of penalty; it was termed 'indirect compulsion'.

Curtailment of the right

The right to silence was abrogated in 1988 in Northern Ireland in terms of allowing adverse inferences to be drawn from silence at trial.[228] But, post-PACE, the right was retained for most suspects, including terrorist suspects, in England and Wales until it was curtailed or undermined, although not abolished, under ss 34, 36 and 37 of the CJPOA 1994. The right, in the sense of an immunity from criminal sanctions due to a refusal to answer questions under suspicion, still exists as far as the majority of suspects are concerned.[229]

The majority of the Runciman Royal Commission agreed with the Phillips Commission in recommending that the right to silence should be retained, although it considered that provision to deal with so called 'ambush' defences (defences sprung on the prosecution at the last minute by a defendant who has hitherto remained silent as to his or her defence) should be introduced.[230] The Commission's recommendation was based not on 225 It may be noted that the UN Human Rights Committee has already expressed concerns regarding the compatibility of the CJPOA 1994, ss 34, 36 and 37 with Art 14(3).

226 Funke v France (1993) 16 EHRR 297.

227 (1996) 22 EHRR 29. For comment, see Munday, R, 'Inferences from silence and European Human Rights Law' [1996] Crim LR 370.

228 Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order SI 1988/1987 NI 20 1988.

229 See below pp 1249 et seq. for a number of statutory provisions which penalise silence.

230 RCCJ Report p 84, para 2. The proposal found effect in the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996, which imposes a duty of defence disclosure in most Crown Court cases. Michael Zander, a member of the RCCJ, considered that such disclosure would undermine the presumption of innocence (Zander, RCCJ Report, A Note of Dissent, p 22, paras 8 and 11). It may be found that the provisions of the 1996 Act are not fully in compliance with Art 6(2) of the Convention which guarantees the presumption of innocence. See below, pp 1239–41.

a 'symbolic' but an 'instrumental retentionist' approach;[231] it arose from a concern that otherwise, a risk of miscarriages of justice might arise.[232] Given that the Commission was convened in the wake of a number of miscarriages of justice, it might have been expected that the government of the time would give these findings some weight.

The then Home Secretary, however, took what could be termed an exchange abolitionist approach[233] – suspects have greater rights than they did in pre-PACE days and therefore do not need the right to silence. In other words, the right could be curtailed in exchange for the enhanced suspects' rights available under PACE and Codes C and E. Since curtailment of the right was unlikely to have any effect at all on the crime rate, it seems most likely that it was undertaken not in order to gain genuine crime control advantage, but in order to give the impression that such advantage might be gained. The conviction rate was unaffected since the change had an impact only on the small number of criminals who are detected and who would otherwise have remained silent. While it may have had some influence on decisions to plead guilty, its main effect has probably been on that tiny percentage of cases which come to court[234] in which the defendant has remained silent and has pleaded not guilty. The academic consensus is that the advantages in terms of crime control are very doubtful, whereas the risk of miscarriages of justice has been increased.[235] At the same time it was acknowledged, prior to curtailment, that 'the reality of the right to silence is much closer [in practice] to the crime control model than it might first appear',[236] partly due to informal inference drawing by juries and magistrates.[237]

Thus, it is fair to say that prior to the CJPOA changes, the right to silence did not necessarily have a significant impact on the conduct of the interview or ensure that a suspect had a bulwark against giving in to pressure to speak. In fact, few suspects refused to answer questions[238] and, as discussed above, silence was not routinely advised by solicitors. One of the key reasons for retaining the right to silence is that the suspect may be under stress and unable to assess the situation clearly; he or she may have a number of reasons for reluctance to speak, including fear of incriminating another and uncertainty as to the legal significance of various facts. It may also be argued that the right should be reinstated in full in order to guard against the possibility that the suspect will concoct a confession in order to escape the pressure of the interrogation. A juvenile suspect in the Silcott case,[239] questioned about the murder of police officer

231 See Greer, S, 'The Right of Silence: A Review of the Current Debate' (1990) 53 MLR 709.

232 Runciman, RCCJ Report, p 55.

233 Greer, 1990, p 719.

234 Over 74% of defendants to be tried in magistrates' courts plead guilty; for Crown Court defendants the figure is 61.5%. Crown Prosecution Service Annual Report 04–05. See further Sanders and Young, Criminal Justice, 2007, Chapter 8.

235 See Zander, M, The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, 1995, pp 303–23 (current edn, 2003); Fenwick, H, 'Curtailing the Right to Silence, Access to Legal Advice and Section 78' [1995] Crim LR 132; Jackson, M, 'Interpreting the silence provisions: The Northern Ireland cases' [1995] Crim LR 587; Pattenden, R, 'Inference from Silence' [1995] Crim LR 602–11.

236 Sanders and Young, Criminal Justice, 1994, p 193 (current edn, 2007).

237 Zander and Henderson, Crown Court Study, RCCJ Research Study No 19, 1993.

238 See Leng, The Right to Silence in Police Interrogation, Home Office Research Study No 10, 1993. Only 4.5% of suspects exercised their right to silence.

239 (1991) The Times, 9 December.

Blakelock by a riotous mob, made up a detailed confession based on suggestions put to him by police officers, although it was later found that he could not have been present at the scene. This suspect made the confession despite his right to exercise silence, suggesting that the right to silence alone will not benefit such suggestible detainees. However, as argued above, the right to silence in conjunction with advice from an experienced solicitor would seem to provide a surer safeguard against false confessions than either silence or legal advice alone. In other words, the pressure on the suspect in police interviews was already high prior to curtailment of the right, and did not appear to be compensated for by other factors such as audio-recording and access to legal advice. Thus, the large body of writing on the right to silence generally came down on the side of its retention.[240]

Section 34(1) of the CJPOA 1994 curtailed the 'right to silence' in police interviews; it provides:

> where . . . evidence is given that the accused . . . (a) on being questioned under caution by a constable trying to discover whether or by whom the offence had been committed, failed to mention any fact relied on in his defence . . . or (b) on being charged . . . or on officially being informed that he might be prosecuted . . . failed to mention any such fact, being a fact which in the circumstances existing at the time the accused could reasonably have been expected to mention when so questioned, charged or informed . . . sub-ss (2) below applies.

Under s 34(2)(d), the court or jury 'in determining whether the accused is guilty of the offence charged may draw such inferences as appear proper'. The difference between sub-sections (1)(a) and (1)(b) is of interest. It is notable that sub-section(1)(b) makes no mention of questioning. It implies that an inference of guilt may be drawn from the failure of the accused to volunteer information when charged. Sections 36 and 37 of the 1994 Act provide that adverse inferences may be drawn from a failure to account for possession of substances or objects, or presence at a particular place. Under 38(4), the conviction cannot be based on silence alone; the burden of proof remains throughout on the prosecution to prove its case; in effect, a silence will be only one factor which can be used to make out the case. Under s 34 the prosecution have to identify a fact relied on in his defence which he did not mention under questioning.

Under all these provisions, there is still a right to remain silent so long as the accused is prepared to take the risk that so doing may have an adverse impact on his defence, if the case comes to trial. The caution under Code C, para 10.4 was accordingly revised in 1995 to read: 'You do not have to say anything, but it may harm your defence if you do not mention when questioned something which you later rely on in court. Anything you do say may be given in evidence.' In contrast to the old caution, this one has a dual and contradictory effect: it can no longer be seen simply as a safeguard; it must also be seen as part of the coerciveness inherent in the police interviewing and detention powers. Further special cautions were adopted under para 10.5A and B of Code C in order to take account, respectively, of the provisions of ss 36 and 37 of the 1994 Act.

240 See Report of the Home Office Working Group on the Right to Silence, 1989 (in favour of modification of the right). For criticism of the report, see Zuckerman, (1989) Crim LR 855. For review of the debate, see Greer (1990); Coldrey (1991) 20 Anglo-Am L Rev 27. In favour of modification of the right, see Williams (1987) 137 NLJ 1107; editorial (1988) Police Review, 29 April.

It is implicit in all three sections – ss 34, 36, 37 – that inferences may only be drawn if a sound explanation for the silence is not put forward. Although staying silent carries risks, it may be, depending on the circumstances, less risky than making ill-considered admissions since silence, unlike admissions, must be corroborated.[241] However, as the Runciman Commission pointed out, the caution is likely to put most pressure on vulnerable suspects.[242] The suspect most likely to be unable to evaluate the riskiness of silence is precisely the type of suspect who needs the protection originally afforded by the right. Vulnerable persons interviewed outside the police station may be confused by the caution and without the benefit of legal advice may be pressurised into making inaccurate and ill-considered admissions and perhaps into mentioning matters they have not been questioned about.[243] Thus, although it may be argued that in a number of circumstances it may not be 'proper' for a jury to be directed to draw adverse inferences from silence or that it was not reasonable in the circumstances existing at the time to expect the suspect to speak, this will not benefit the suspect who does in fact speak in response to the current caution. Ironically, it is probably the seasoned criminal who understands the operation of s 34 of the CJPOA and may be able to predict that silence may not be a more risky strategy than it was previously, who has not been disadvantaged by the change.[244]

The case law on s 34 of the CJPOA establishes, following R v Cowan,[245] that the jury should only consider drawing inferences under s 34 if a prima facie case to answer has been made out by the prosecution. It has also been made clear that where the prosecution do not seek to rely on a silence, the judge should direct the jury positively not to draw inferences.[246] Inferences may only be drawn if a sound explanation for remaining silent is not proffered;[247] it cannot be inferred that the reason for silence was the need to concoct a false explanation if the real and innocent reason for silence is put forward, so long as the reason is plausible. A number of circumstances can be taken into account. In Argent,[248] the Court of Appeal found that when considering whether, in the circumstances existing at the time, the defendant could reasonably have been expected to mention the fact he now relies on, the Court should take into account matters such as the defendant's age, health, experience, mental capacity, sobriety, tiredness, personality and legal advice. It is a matter for the jury to resolve whether, bearing these matters in mind, the defendant could have been expected to mention the fact in question, although the judge may give them guidance. Any restrictive impact of these 241 CJPOA 1994, s 38(3).

242 RCCJ Report, para 4.50.

243 It was found in Nicholson [1999] Crim LR 61 that if the police have not asked about facts, adverse inferences should not be drawn against the defendant if he does not state those facts.

244 See Moston, S and Williamson, T, 'The extent of silence in police stations', in Greer and Morgan (eds), The Right to Silence Debate, 1990, Bristol Centre for Criminal Justice.

245 [1996] 1 Cr App R 1.

246 R v McGarry [1998] 3 All ER 805.

247 This is implicit in R v Cowan [1996] 1 Cr App R 1; see also R v Argent [1997] Cr App R 27.

248 [1997] 2 Cr App R 27; (1996) The Times, 19 December. See Broome, K, 'An inference of guilt' (1997) 141 SJ 202.

findings is doubtful; in R v Friend[249] adverse inferences were drawn under s 35 against a defendant aged 14, with a mental age of nine.

The case law on s 34 CJPOA suggests that the courts are not on the whole taking a restrictive approach. In Murray v DPP,[250] which was decided on the 1988 Northern Ireland Order, but is clearly applicable to s 34, the House of Lords found that silence allows the drawing, not only of specific inferences from failure to mention particular facts, but also of the inference that the defendant is guilty. The question of what counts as a 'fact' under s 34 that the defendant did not mention in police questioning but which he could be said to be relying on in his defence has also been given a broad interpretation. The House of Lords found in Webber[251] that even if the defendant does not give evidence at trial, he can be said to be relying on a fact when counsel for the defence, acting on his client's instructions, puts a specific and positive case to prosecution witnesses.

The restriction on drawing adverse inferences

Under the Blair Government, the CJPOA provisions were retained, but it was already clear that the curtailment of the right to silence under CJPOA 1994, ss 34, 36 or 37 was in tension with the demands of Art 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights. Depending on the particular circumstances of a case, the curtailment had the potential to lead to a breach of Art 6 on the basis that it infringes the presumption of innocence under Art 6(2) and the right to freedom from self-incrimination.[252] Consideration of the judgments in Saunders v UK[253] and Murray (John) v UK reveals that it is only where a penalty formally attaches to silence, and the interview may then be used in evidence, that a breach of Art 6 is almost bound to be established, but that where adverse inferences can be drawn from the silence at trial, a breach is likely to be established if the suspect has been denied access to legal advice before being questioned under caution. Saunders v UK concerned the sanction for refusing to answer questions in serious fraud investigations under s 437 of the Companies Act 1985. Acting under s 437, Inspectors of the Department of Trade and Industry had interviewed Saunders regarding allegations of fraud. He was forced to answer the questions put to him and therefore lost his privilege against self-incrimination, which he argued was unfair and amounted to an abuse of process. The interviews were admitted in evidence under s 431(5) of the Companies Act and he was convicted.[254] The Strasbourg Court found that the applicant's right to freedom from self-incrimination under Art 6(1) had been infringed due to the threatened imposition of a penalty for remaining silent and the subsequent admission of the interviews into evidence. This finding was based on the

249 [1997] 1 WLR 1433.

250 [1994] 1 WLR 1.

251 [2004] UKHL 1.

252 See the comments of the Court of Appeal in Birchall [1999] Crim LR 311; see also the study by Bucke et al., The Right of Silence: The impact of the CJPOA 1994, Home Office Research Study No 199, 2000.

253 (1997) 23 EHRR 313; Appl No 19187/91, Com Rep, paras 69–75.

254 His appeal on grounds of abuse of process and on the basis that the interviews should not have been admitted into evidence under s 78 was rejected: R v Saunders and Others [1996] 1 Cr App R 463.

special compulsive regime applicable to Department of Trade and Industry inspections, but the key issue was the use made of the material obtained in court.

The decision in Murray (John) v UK[255] may be contrasted with that in Saunders since it made it clear that, depending on the circumstances of a case, Art 6 takes a different stance towards imposing a formal penalty on silence and drawing adverse inferences from it. Murray was arrested under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 and taken to the police station. A detective superintendent, pursuant to the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1987, decided to delay access to a solicitor for 48 hours. While being interviewed, Murray repeatedly stated that he had 'nothing to say'. After he had seen his solicitor, he stated that he had been advised not to answer the questions. As indicated above, the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1988 enables a court in any criminal trial to exercise discretion to draw adverse inferences from an accused's failure to mention a fact during police questioning. Such inferences were drawn from Murray's silence in the police interviews once the prosecution had established a prima facie case against him, and he was convicted. The subsequent decisions in Averill v UK and Brennan v UK[256] were discussed above, and confirmed the finding in Murray, although Brennan took a somewhat more restrictive view of the circumstances in which a breach of Art 6 would arise.

The Strasbourg Court emphasised that its decision in Murray was confined to the particular facts of the case in finding that no breach of Art 6(1) or (2) had occurred where adverse inferences had been drawn at trial from the applicant's refusal to give evidence, taking into account the degree of compulsion exerted on the applicant and the weight of the evidence against him. The Court placed emphasis on the fact that he had been able to remain silent; also, given the strength of the evidence against him, the matter of drawing inferences was one of common sense which could not be regarded as unfair.[257] But, crucially, the Court did find that Art 6(1) and (3)(c) had been breached by the denial of custodial access to a lawyer for 48 hours, since it found that such access was essential where there was a likelihood that adverse inferences would be drawn from silence. In effect, therefore, the Court adopted something close to an exchange abolitionist approach.[258] The distinction it drew, impliedly, between direct and indirect compulsion flowing from the risk of adverse inference drawing and criminal penalties respectively was not explicated and rests, it is suggested, on doubtful premises.

The regime under the 1988 Order is, in essentials, the same as that under s 34 of the CJPOA, which therefore became vulnerable to challenge under the HRA. The question of affording access to legal advice before questioning the suspect if adverse inferences might be drawn from silence had to be addressed; this has already been discussed above, and is considered further below. There were other aspects of Murray, relating specifically to the privilege against self-incrimination. As indicated, the findings in Murray were carefully confined to the particular facts of the case, and therefore must be treated with caution. But it is clear that the right to freedom from self-incrimination cannot be viewed as absolute under Art 6. Drawing adverse inferences from silence in police interviewing does not necessarily breach Art 6(2), but the greater the reliance

255 (1996) 22 EHRR 29.
256 (2002) 34 EHRR 18.
257 Paragraph 54.
258 See Greer, S (1990) 53 MLR 709.

placed on such inferences at the trial, the greater the likelihood that a breach will occur. The Court said that it would be incompatible with Art 6(1) and (2) 'to base a conviction solely or mainly on the accused's silence or refusal to answer questions'. As already noted, under s 38(3) of the CJPOA, a conviction cannot be based 'solely' on silence. Article 6(1) and (2) might therefore be found to be breached in circumstances differing from those applicable in Murray, including those in which the evidence against the defendant was less overwhelming. A domestic judge would not satisfy Art 6 if he directed a jury that the drawing of adverse inferences could play a major part in a conviction. Further, in Murray, there was no jury: the case was decided by a 'Diplock' court. Therefore, the evidence was weighed up by a professional who had the expertise to determine how much weight to give to aspects of it, including the 'no comment' interviews.

Murray made it clear that drawing adverse inferences from silence when the defendant had not had access to legal advice prior to the failure to reply to questioning will breach Art 6; as indicated above, s 58 of the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 addressed that finding by inserting s 34(2A) into the CJPOA.[259] The amendations provide that if the defendant was at an authorised place of detention and had not had an opportunity of consulting a solicitor at the time of the failure to mention the fact in question, inferences cannot be drawn. This is a very significant change to the interviewing scheme; a number of the implications of this change were considered above in relation to the custodial right of access to legal advice.[260] Once s 34(2A) came into force in 2003 no adverse inference could be drawn from silence unless the suspect was under caution (s 34(1)(A) of the CJPOA 1994), and he had had the opportunity of having legal advice In that instance under s 34(2A) of the CJPOA, no inferences may be drawn from silence. It is notable that s 34(2A) does not provide that such a silence will be inadmissible. Informal inference drawing, which appeared to occur prior to the introduction of ss 34, 36 and 37 of the CJPOA, could therefore still occur. Further, s 34(2A) of the CJPOA does not cover the defendant who has not had legal advice but makes admissions in response to the new caution or (prima facie) the defendant

259 The Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 (CJPOA) now contains 34(2)(A) which provides:

> Where the accused was at an authorised place of detention at the time of the failure [to mention any fact relied on in his defence when questioned under caution] subsections (1) and (2) above [allowing adverse inferences to be drawn from the failure to answer] do not apply if he had not been allowed an opportunity to consult a solicitor prior to being questioned, charged or informed as mentioned in subsection (1) above.
>
> (3) In section 36 (effect of accused's failure or refusal to account for objects, substances or marks), after subsection (4) there shall be inserted –
>
> (4A) Where the accused was at an authorised place of detention at the time of the failure or refusal, subsections (1) and (2) above do not apply if he had not been allowed an opportunity to consult a solicitor prior to the request being made.
>
> (4) In section 37 (effect of accused's failure or refusal to account for presence at a particular place), after subsection (3) there shall be inserted –
>
> (3A) Where the accused was at an authorised place of detention at the time of the failure or refusal, subsections (1) and (2) do not apply if he had not been allowed an opportunity to consult a solicitor prior to the request being made.

260 See pp 1211–14.

who fails to obtain advice, although no formal denial of an opportunity to consult a solicitor occurs. These very significant matters are discussed further below.

As a result of this development Code C was amended in 2003 to introduce the possibility of using one of two cautions, and that amendation is carried forward into the 2006 version of Code C, and into Code H. The caution originally introduced in 1995 still applies, reflecting the curtailment of the right to silence. It is used where an opportunity to have access to legal advice has been given or is about to be given, and is in the following terms: 'You do not have to say anything. But it may harm your defence if you do not mention when questioned something which you later rely on in court. Anything you do say may be given in evidence.'[261] Minor deviations do not constitute a breach of this requirement, provided that the sense of the caution is preserved. The caution must be repeated during the interview if there is any doubt as to whether the detainee realises that it still applies. If a juvenile or a person who is mentally disordered or mentally handicapped is cautioned in the absence of the appropriate adult, the caution must be repeated in the adult's presence.[262] The change to the caution which occurred to reflect s 34 of the CJPOA 1994, discussed further below, means that the suspect is warned that refusing to answer questions may lead to the drawing of adverse inferences in court. Importantly, Codes C and H restrict the circumstances in which inferences can be drawn.

Code C, para 10.11 provides:

> For an inference to be drawn when a suspect fails or refuses to answer a question about one of these matters or to answer it satisfactorily, the suspect must first be told in ordinary language:
>
> (a) what offence is being investigated;
> (b) what fact they are being asked to account for;
> (c) this fact may be due to them taking part in the commission of the offence;
> (d) a court may draw a proper inference if they fail or refuse to account for this fact;
> (e) a record is being made of the interview . . .

Code H para 10.10 is in the same terms. But Code C, and Code H (Annex C) also provide for a restriction on drawing adverse inferences from silence of the suspect. The provisions of ss 34, 36 and 37 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 are made subject to an overriding restriction, following from s 34(2A) which means that a court or jury is not allowed to draw adverse inferences from a person's silence, if the suspect:

> (a) is detained at a police station and before being interviewed . . .
> (i) has asked for legal advice, > (ii) has not been allowed an opportunity to consult a solicitor . . . and > (iii) has not changed their mind about wanting legal advice . . . .

This restriction on drawing adverse inferences from silence is reflected in the second, alternative caution in Annex C, para 2. This is the old caution reflecting the full right to silence prior to its curtailment: 'You do not have to say anything but anything you do say may be given in evidence.' The police must use it within the police station when it is clear that the suspect has had an opportunity to have access to legal advice (emphasis added).[263] These restrictions on this partial restoration of the full right of silence are significant. In particular, the term 'opportunity' should be noted – it is not necessary that the suspect should actually have obtained access to legal advice. This change clearly reflects an exchange abolitionist approach: the suspect is in effect entitled to the full right to silence or to access to legal advice, but not to both. This is objectionable in due process terms since the two entitlements, as discussed above, tend to be most valuable in conjunction with each other.

261 Code C, para 10.5; Code H, para 10.4.
262 Code H, para 10.11; Code C, para 10.12.

The position of the suspect may change; he or she may be able to be silent without risk in one interview, but pressurised to speak in a subsequent one. This is provided for in Annex C para 3 of both Codes:

> Whenever the restriction on drawing adverse inferences from silence (para 10.4) either begins to apply or ceases to apply after a caution has already been given, the person shall be re-cautioned in the appropriate terms. The changed position on drawing inferences and the fact that the previous caution no longer applies shall also be explained to him in ordinary language.

The loopholes in the provision for restricting the circumstances in which adverse inferences can be drawn were canvassed above, in relation to rights of access to legal advice. Suffice to say here that the suspect may well be cautioned that such inferences may be drawn in circumstances in which he has had no true opportunity to have access to legal advice. Given that the case is unlikely to come to court, the police are unlikely to be called to account, in any sense, in such circumstances, even assuming that what occurred in the police station could be unravelled sufficiently to demonstrate that no such opportunity in fact occurred. The restriction on drawing adverse inferences appears to adhere to the due process demands of Art 6 but, it is argued, falls short of them in practice.

Relying on legal advice in remaining silent

In applying ss 34, 36 and 37 it was noted above that if a sound explanation for remaining silent is given, the jury should be directed that if they accept the explanation they should not draw adverse inferences. (Clearly, they might informally draw them, as they almost certainly did in many instances prior to the 1994 changes.) The explanation often given for remaining silent is that the legal adviser advised silence, or at least a selective silence. This explanation has given rise to a problem that is still bedeviling the UK courts, and it is argued that they still have not dealt with it satisfactorily in Art 6 terms, despite more than one trip to Strasbourg, pre-HRA. From a crime control perspective the concern is that allowing this explanation would drive a coach and horses through the CJPOA provisions: legal advisers could merely advise silence in almost all circumstances, and so doing would normally preclude the drawing of adverse inferences.

263 Under Codes C and H, Annex C, para 2: Whenever a requirement to administer a caution arises and at the time it is given the restriction on drawing adverse inferences from silence applies, the caution shall be [in those terms].

But from a due process perspective, accepting the drawing of adverse inferences when the solicitor has advised silence is equally problematic. The solicitor is there in the police station to represent the interests of his or her client; he or she may consider that the best recourse for the client is silence, if, for example, the client has been pressurised or intimidated, or is unable to cope with the questioning. A number of studies have shown that many suspects may not realise that they are being lead by police into admitting to having the mens rea of the offence in question, since, for example, the use of the word 'reckless' might appear to mean colloquially something rather different from its technical, legal, sense.[264] The police may have disclosed only part of their case against the suspect and that part may in itself be misleading.[265] In Argent the Court of Appeal rejected the argument that it was reasonable in the circumstances for the suspect to have stayed silent, on legal advice, when the police had not disclosed an outline of their case. So the solicitor, in seeking to further the best interests of the client, is clearly placed in a dilemma: if she advises silence this may turn out to be to the client's disadvantage. So the solicitor may be forced to advise a client to talk against her better judgment, for fear of the penalty attaching to silence later on. The domestic courts have tended to adopt the crime control stance in dealing with this issue.

The decision in Condron and Another,[266] in relation to the treatment in court of legal advice to stay silent, was later found at Strasbourg to have led to a breach of Art 6. The appellants were to be questioned by police at the police station on suspicion of being involved in the supply and possession of heroin. The police surgeon found that they were fit to be interviewed, but their solicitor considered that they were unfit, since they were suffering withdrawal symptoms, and so advised them not to answer any questions. They relied on that advice during the interview and remained silent. At trial, the defence involved reliance on facts which had not been mentioned in the course of the interview and thus potentially fell within s 34 of the CJPOA. The judge held a voir dire and rejected argument under s 78 that the no comment interview should be excluded as unfair because they were unfit to be interviewed. Argument that it would be improper to allow an inference to be drawn under s 34 because in making no comment they had only followed the bona fide advice of their solicitor was also rejected. The interviews were admitted and the prosecution then argued that they could reasonably have been expected to mention at interview the facts they now relied on in their defence; they were cross-examined on their failure to mention such facts. They gave the explanation that they had relied on the solicitor's advice. In summing up, the judge directed the jury that they must determine whether any adverse inferences should be drawn from the failure of the defendants to mention the facts in question during the police interview. The judge did not explain that the inferences could only be drawn if, despite the explanation, the jury concluded that the silence could only sensibly be attributed to the defendants having no satisfactory explanation to give.

264 See McConville, M and Baldwin, J, Custodial Legal Advice and the Right to Silence, RCCJ Research Study No 16.

265 See Rosenberg (2006) EWCA Crim 6.

266 [1997] 1 Cr App R 185.

Thus, it is possible that the jury may have drawn adverse inferences despite accepting the defendants' explanations.

The appellants were convicted and argued on appeal that the jury should not have been directed that they could draw adverse inferences from the refusal to answer questions since they had followed the advice of their solicitor in so refusing. The Court of Appeal took into account an earlier case, Cowan and Others,[267] which concerned the position of defendants failing to testify in court under s 35, and applied the principles enunciated to police questioning. The principles were as follows. A jury cannot infer guilt from silence alone (s 38(3)), so that the jury should only consider drawing inferences if a prima facie case to answer has been made out by the prosecution. Also, the burden of proof remains throughout on the prosecution to prove their case; in effect, a silence will be only one factor which can be used to make out the case. Inferences can be drawn if the only sensible explanation of silence was that the suspect had no explanation, or none that would stand up to cross-examination. The judge's direction was criticised in that it did not make this clear. The Court then considered the procedure to be followed in relation to s 34, where silence is on legal advice. The jury may draw an adverse inference from the failure unless the accused gives the reason for the advice being given. The reason for the advice is legally privileged, since it is part of a communication between solicitor and client, but once the client gives evidence of the nature of the advice, that will probably amount to a waiver of privilege so that the solicitor and/or client can then be asked about the reasons for the advice in court. The Court found that if an accused gives as the reason for not answering questions in a police interview that he has been advised not to do so, this assertion without more will not amount to a sufficient reason for not mentioning relevant matters which may later be relied on in defence. The convictions were upheld on the basis of the overwhelming evidence of drug supply, despite the flaw in the summing up.

It was made clear in Bowden[268] that explaining the grounds for the advice will amount to a waiver of legal privilege. Therefore, the prosecution can cross-examine the adviser on what was said to the suspect with a view to discovering discrepancies between the grounds put forward at trial and those discussed in the police station. The effect of these two decisions is to place the defendant and adviser in an invidious position. The adviser may be reluctant to advise silence even where there seem to be good reasons for doing so.[269] If the adviser advises silence, it may well appear to the defendant that that in itself is a sound reason for remaining silent. But that reason will not be accepted by a court. The adviser can either refuse to waive legal privilege and accept that adverse inferences will be drawn from the silence, or he can waive it and hope that the reasons given for the advice will be accepted in order to discourage the drawing of inferences. There may also be other confidential matters which the adviser does not wish to be asked about. It has been pointed out that solicitors may breach their professional Code of Conduct if they act for a client when they may be a material witness in the court case.[270] But if there is an arguably sound reason for advising silence,

267 [1996] QB 373; [1995] 4 All ER 939.

268 (1999) The Times, 25 February.

269 See, as to the difficulties facing advisers, Cape, E, 'Advising on silence' (1999) LAG, 14 June.

270 Tregilgas-Davey, M, 'Adverse inferences and the no-comment interview' [1997] 141 SJ 500; The Guide to the Professional Conduct of Solicitors, 1996, para 21.12.

the jury should be directed, following the findings of the Court of Appeal in Condron, that if they view the reason as sound, they should not draw adverse inferences.

It was found at Strasbourg that the applicants in Condron v UK[271] had failed to receive a fair trial under Art 6 on the basis that the appeal court should not have found that the conviction was safe, despite the erroneous direction of the judge to the jury. Since the Court could not know what part the drawing of adverse inferences played in the jury's decision, it should have allowed the appeal. That decision impliedly confirms that juries should be directed that they should not draw adverse inferences when silence has been advised in the police interview, except in certain circumstances. The Court found that where a defendant refuses to answer questions on legal advice, the jury should not be directed to draw an adverse inference from the silence unless they were first told that they should only do so if they considered that the silence could only sensibly be attributed to the suspect having no good answer to the questions. The Court was not, however sympathetic towards the dilemma that the applicants and solicitor were placed in (para 60):

> The court would observe at this juncture that the fact that the applicants were subjected to cross-examination on the content of their solicitor's advice cannot be said to raise an issue of fairness under Article 6 of the Convention. They were under no compulsion to disclose the advice given, other than the indirect compulsion to avoid the reason for their silence remaining at the level of a bare explanation. The applicants chose to make the content of their solicitor's advice a live issue as part of their defence.

The indirect compulsion in question was in fact quite significant if they had to demonstrate in the domestic court that their reliance on the advice was reasonable. The decision affects the role of trial judges; it does not give guidance on, inter alia, the question when a no comment interview, based on legal advice, should be excluded from evidence. It still leaves advisers in a state of some uncertainty as to when to advise a suspect to remain silent. However, it makes it somewhat easier for the solicitor to advise silence and safer for the client to rely on that advice.

The European Court of Human Rights confirmed its ruling in Condron in Beckles v United Kingdom.[272] The victim had gone to a flat where he was allegedly robbed by the defendant and others, prevented from leaving, and then thrown out of the window, sustaining very severe injuries. When arrested the defendant said that the victim 'wasn't pushed, he jumped' but, after seeing his solicitor, refused to answer any questions when interviewed. The judge did not direct the jury that they should not draw adverse inferences from the defendant's silence during the interview with the police if they considered that his silence was attributable to legal advice rather than to having no sensible answer to the questions. He was convicted of two counts of robbery, one count of false imprisonment and one count of attempted murder for which he was sentenced to a total of 15 years' imprisonment. The Court found that there had been a violation of Art 6(1) of the European Convention of Human Rights as to the trial judge's directions to the jury. The misdirection concerned the instruction to the jury as to their right, under s 34 of the 1994 Act, to draw adverse inferences from the defendant's silence during an interview with police. The Court had found that the jury should have been directed that if they considered that the defendant had genuinely remained silent on legal advice they should consider refusing to draw an adverse inference from his silence.

271 [2001] 31 EHRR 1, Appl No 35718/97; [2000] Crim LR 679.
272 (2002) 36 EHRR 162.

In R v Beckles[273] the applicant appealed on the ground that there had been a misdirection to the jury as to their right, under s 34 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, to draw adverse inferences from the defendant's silence during an interview with police. Lord Woolf found that in a case where a solicitor's advice was relied upon by the defendant in the police interview, the ultimate question for the jury, under s 34, remained whether the facts relied on at the trial were facts which the defendant could reasonably have been expected to mention at interview. If the jury considered that the defendant had genuinely relied on the advice, that was not necessarily the end of the matter. If it was possible to say that the defendant had genuinely acted upon the advice, but had done so because it suited his purpose, that might mean that he had acted unreasonably in not mentioning the facts. The jury had to make a determination on his reasonableness in not mentioning the facts. If they concluded that he had been acting unreasonably they could draw an adverse inference from the failure to mention the facts. The trial judge had not directed the jury to consider the reasonableness or the genuineness of the defendant's reliance on his solicitor's advice as the reason why he did not answer questions in interview. It was found that that misdirection made the defendant's conviction unsafe. The appeal was allowed and a retrial was ordered. Thus Lord Woolf purported to take account of the Strasbourg decision in his findings. However, the emphasis on, in a sense, justifying the silence – even where it was genuinely in reliance on the legal advice – represents some departure from the ECHR decision. Beckles is indicative of a Court of Appeal tendency, after Condron v UK, to take an unsympathetic stance towards defendants who rely on legal advice in remaining silent.[274]

Since Beckles s 34 has remained a difficult and confusing area of law, and the problems are evident in the decision in R v Bresa.[275] Here the appellant was suspected of wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm; he did not have English as his first language, was unfamiliar with the British legal system and was advised to give no comment by his solicitor in the police interview. At court neither he nor the solicitor gave an explanation for the legal advice. He put forward a defence of self defence which he did not mention in the police interviews. In giving a direction to the jury on the effect of s 34 the judge failed to say that to draw adverse inferences the jury had to be sure that the defendant had remained silent, not because of the legal advice but because he had no answer to give in the interview. The judge's direction, the Court of Appeal found, tended to undermine the confidentiality of solicitor and client discussions, and did not stress enough that the jury had to consider whether it was reasonable for the defendant to rely on the advice given; the judge had said:

273 [2004] EWCA 2766.

274 See R v Inman [2002] EWCA 1950; R v Chenia [2003] 2 Cr App 6; R v Hoare and Pierce [2004] EWCA Crim 784; R v Howell [2003] Crim LR 405; R v Turner [2004] 1 All ER 1025.

275 [2005] EWCA Crim 1414.

> . . . when you are considering whether it was reasonable to expect him to mention [the relevant facts] in interview, and when he says that he didn't do so because he was advised to make no comment, you are entitled to look at that explanation in the knowledge that he has gone no further into why it was that the advice was given.

The Court of Appeal found that the direction was flawed, the conviction therefore unsafe, and ordered a retrial. The Court said the judge should have given a direction in (broadly) the following terms:

> If you accept the evidence that he was so advised [to remain silent], this is obviously an important consideration; but it does not automatically prevent you from drawing any conclusion from his silence . . . a person given legal advice has the choice whether to accept or reject it . . . You have no explanation for the advice in this case. It is the defendant's right not to reveal the contents of any advice from his solicitor . . . The question for you is whether the defendant could reasonably have been expected to mention the facts on which he now relies and saying that he had legal advice without more cannot automatically make it reasonable. If, for example, you consider that he had or may have had an answer to give, i.e. that he was acting in self-defence, but genuinely and reasonably relied on the legal advice to remain silent, you should not draw any conclusion against him. But if, for example, you were sure that the defendant remained silent, not because of the legal advice, but because he had not acted in self-defence and that was a matter which he fabricated later, and merely latched on to the legal advice as a convenient shield behind which to hide, you would be entitled to draw a conclusion against him.[276]

It is difficult to see how a jury could be sure that the defendant had genuinely and reasonably relied on the legal advice. A jury might tend to take the 'common sense' view that anyone who in fact had a genuine defence of self defence would mention it at that point, regardless of the legal advice. Jurors might fail to take account of the coerciveness and intimidatory quality of police detention, especially for more vulnerable suspects. The direction in Bresa – based on the current JSB Guidelines for such directions – is not of much value in giving a guide to solicitors advising clients in police stations. The problem in essence is that if the solicitor and client do not breach the confidentiality of their consultations, they run the risk that the jury, without an explanation for the reasons behind the legal advice, will assume that the defence was fabricated later and that the advice is merely 'a convenient shield behind which to hide'. At present, therefore, the circumstances in which adverse inference drawing will create a breach of Art 6 still remain somewhat uncertain,[277] except in the instance in which access to legal advice is also denied.

It is clear that affording a suspect an opportunity to have access to legal advice before being questioned under caution is a necessary but not sufficient condition in Art

276 At para 49.

277 See further Birch, D, 'Suffering in silence: a cost–benefit analysis of s 34 of the CJPOA' [1999] Crim LR 769; Cape, E, Defending Suspects at Police Stations, 4th edn, 2003.

6 terms, for the drawing of adverse inferences, and s 34(2A) caters for that requirement. But, equally clearly, Art 6 will not necessarily be satisfied where adverse inferences are drawn after a defendant has had such access prior to that point and has remained silent. Cases such as Condron or Bowden, where the defendants had had legal advice and had acted on it in remaining silent, will have to be considered on their particular facts, in relation to the Art 6 requirements. Such cases obviously differ from Murray on the issue of the relationship between silence and legal advice. In Condron the defendants acted on legal advice in refusing to answer questions; in Murray a breach of Art 6(1) was found on the basis of inference-drawing in the absence of legal advice (not on the basis of inference-drawing per se). In Condron, the fact of having legal advice was not to the defendants' advantage, possibly the reverse, since in a sense they may have been misled into remaining silent. When will a breach of Art 6(1) arise if adverse inferences are drawn in that context – where the apparent explanation for silence was that it was on legal advice, following the domestic decision in Beckles? It must be borne in mind that a solicitor in the police station might need to seek to make a determination as to this question, in order to decide whether or not to advise silence.

This might be appropriate if it was unclear whether or not the advice would happen to coincide with the defendant's purpose, and the defendant could not be expected – due to his or her low intelligence, youth or other vulnerability – to decide to whether to speak or remain silent without the advice. It might also be safe to advise silence where the police had disclosed little of the case against the suspect before interviewing him under caution. To hold otherwise might be viewed as undermining the value attached in Murray to granting access to legal advice where adverse inferences would be drawn from silence.[278] The principle from Murray clearly rests impliedly on the value of such advice, while the domestic decision in Beckles accords that value a lesser weight. This is an instance in which the domestic courts are failing to use the HRA in a way which ensures at least as much rights-protection as could be delivered at Strasbourg. Their consistently crime control-based stance has led them to disregard the values associated with the presumption of innocence and the privilege against self incrimination which underpinned the traditional right to silence.

Penalising silence

Prior to the inception of the CJPOA, the right to silence was abolished in certain specific circumstances under a number of provisions which made failing to answer questions an offence. The provisions included: s 172 of the Road Traffic Act 1988, as amended; s 2 of the Criminal Justice Act 1987; ss 177 and 178 of the Financial Services Act 1986; ss 236 and 433 of the Insolvency Act 1986; s 437 of the Companies Act 1985; the Banking Act 1987 and the Friendly Societies Act 1992. These provisions, apart from s 172 of the RTA, were amended in 1999, as explained below. Thus, in a number of specific instances, the right to silence in the sense of penalising silence in criminal investigations had already been eroded until it reached the point where it could be said to have virtually disappeared in those contexts.[279] If, for example, inquiries were made into a failed business, its owner could receive a 's 2 notice' from the Serious Fraud Office issued under the Criminal Justice Act 1987 which meant that a criminal offence would be committed if he or she did not attend for interview and answer questions (Director of the Serious Fraud Office ex p Smith).[280] Also, if the company was being investigated, a refusal to answer questions under s 432(2) of the Companies Act 1985 attracted criminal liability.

278 It may be noted that such a finding would involve a departure from the current position under UK law as set out in Condron [1997] 1 Cr App R 185 and confirmed in Bowden (1999) The Times, 25 February.

While the Conservative Governments of 1989–97 were responsible for the shift towards the crime control position which occurred under these provisions and under the CJPOA 1994, the Blair Government was responsible for a further marked shift in that direction. The Terrorism Act 2000 abolished the right to silence – in the sense of making it an offence to refuse to answer questions in defined circumstances – at certain points in the investigation of terrorism cases. The government raised the possibility of creating an offence of refusing to answer questions in the Consultation Paper on Terrorism in 1998. It noted that the recent Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998 'extends the provisions by allowing inferences to be drawn in connection with membership of a specified proscribed organisation; but even there that is insufficient in itself to secure a conviction'. The intention was to take this provision further by creating an additional offence of refusing to answer questions, modelled on the power currently given to investigators in a range of cases, such as serious fraud investigations, and customs and licensing inquiries. The government recognised that there were what it termed 'serious ECHR constraints on this option'[281] and that, in order to circumvent these constraints, the resulting evidence, whether answers or silence, could not be used in a subsequent case against the individual concerned. The government clearly had in mind the case of Saunders v UK,[282] which is considered below.

These considerations led to the inclusion of paras 13, 14 and 16 in Sched 5 of the 2000 Act. The provisions relate to terrorism generally, not merely to proscription, but their relatively limited nature indicates the influence the Convention has had in tempering legislation in attempts to ensure that it is compatible with the Convention. The government clearly did not wish to risk the political embarrassment which it would have incurred had it included provision allowing coerced statements to be included as evidence, provision which would have necessitated issuing with the Act a statement of incompatibility under s 19 of the HRA.

The provisions as they stand are, however, arguably of doubtful compatibility. The requirements of para 13 represent a further infringement of the rights of the suspect, albeit of a relatively limited nature and subject to judicial authorisation. Under para 13 of Sched 5: 'a constable may apply to a circuit judge for an order . . . requiring any person specified in the order to provide an explanation of any material – (a) seized in pursuance of a warrant under paragraph 1 or 11, or (b) produced or made available to a constable under paragraph 5'. This does not affect material protected by legal privilege, but under para 13(3) a lawyer may be required to provide the name and address of her 279 See Re London United Investments [1992] 2 All ER 842; Ex p Nadir (1990) The Times, 5 November; Bishopsgate Investment Management Ltd v Maxwell [1992] 2 All ER 856, CA.

280 [1993] AC 1; [1992] 3 WLR 66; see also AT & T Istel Ltd v Tulley [1992] 3 All ER 523, HL.

281 Legislation Against Terrorism: A Consultation Paper, Cm 4178, 1998, para 14.3.

282 (1997) 23 EHRR 313. See below, pp 1251–54, and above, p 1239.

client. Under para 13(5), para 10 applies to such orders: they will have effect as if they were orders of the Crown Court. Thus, a person who refused to comply could incur liability for contempt. But any statement obtained cannot be used in evidence except on a prosecution for an offence under para 14. Paragraph 14(1) provides: 'a person commits an offence if, in purported compliance with an order under paragraph 13, he makes a statement which he knows to be false or misleading in a material particular', or recklessly makes such a statement. This offence is punishable by a maximum prison sentence of two years. Paragraph 16 is even more controversial; it provides a further possibility, untrammelled by judicial intervention, of punishing persons for failing to give explanations, or giving misleading ones. Paragraph 16(1) provides: 'if a police officer of at least the rank of superintendent has reasonable grounds for believing that the case is one of great emergency he may by a written notice signed by him require any person specified in the notice to provide an explanation of any material seized in pursuance of an order under paragraph 15.' Under para 16(3), in contrast to para 13, the suspect will commit an offence carrying a maximum prison term of six months if he fails to comply with a notice under the paragraph.

Both paras 13 and 16 allow for the admissibility of coerced statements, although in respect of the para 14 offence only. Thus, courts will have to consider whether admitting such statements in respect of that offence would be compatible with Art 6. Further, the paragraphs do not refer to silences which may be admissible in respect of other offences, or to the use of evidence from the statement against another person. Also, the evidence from any statements made, while not directly available to the court, may nevertheless underpin the other prosecution evidence, thereby arguably undermining the right to freedom from self-incrimination (see above).[283]

The transitional provisions applying to Northern Ireland create a further erosion of the right to silence. Under s 89(2) of the TA it is an offence punishable by a fine not to stop when required to do so by an officer; it is also an offence to refuse to answer a question asked during the stop or to answer it inadequately, failing to answer 'to the best of his knowledge and ability'.

As Saunders v UK[284] establishes, the use of formal coercion to obtain statements from persons will clearly be incompatible with Art 6 if the statement is then used against him or her in criminal proceedings. In R v Staines; R v Morrisey[285] the Court of Appeal refused, despite the judgment in Saunders, to overturn a conviction although the trial judge had refused to exclude evidence under s 78 of PACE obtained in a similar manner to that adopted in Saunders. In the post-HRA era, such a response would not appear to satisfy the duty of the court under s 6 of the HRA or the interpretative obligation of the judiciary under s 3. As indicated above, a large number of statutes contain provisions broadly equivalent to the provisions of the Companies Act 1985 which were at issue in Saunders. The Attorney General has issued guidance to prosecutors with a view to ensuring that evidence gained under a number of those provisions should not be used in criminal proceedings. This issue may not, therefore, arise at present under certain of these statutory provisions – a significant instance in which primary legislation was rendered nugatory even before the HRA was in force. This matter was placed on a statutory basis in s 59 of and Sched 3 to the 1999 Act. Schedule 3 lists the statutory provisions mentioned above,[286] apart from s 172 of the Road Traffic Act 1988, and provides that the coerced statements will be inadmissible.

283 See pp 1239–40.
284 (1997) 23 EHRR 313; Appl No 19187/91, Com Rep, paras 69–75.
285 [1997] 2 Cr App R 426.

Nevertheless, certain very significant statutory provisions allowing for coercion, including a number arising under the Terrorism Act 2000, are used in the post-HRA era. Section 172 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 makes it an offence for motorists not to tell police who was driving their vehicle at the time of an alleged offence. The coerced statement can then be used in evidence at trial for the RTA offence in question. The provision clearly contravenes the right against self-incrimination, and this was found to be the case in Scotland in Stott v Brown[287] during the period of time when the Convention was in force in Scotland, but not in England.[288] The defendant encountered the police officers after parking her car and was suspected of driving while intoxicated; she was asked under s 172 to reveal the name of the person driving the car at the relevant time. On pain of the penalty under s 172 she did so, revealing that she had been driving, and was convicted of driving while intoxicated, after the coerced statement was admitted into evidence. Her conviction was overturned on appeal owing to the finding that s 172 contravened Art 6. The ruling of the Edinburgh High Court is of interest since the court rendered s 172, effectively, nugatory. This stance was taken on the basis of the requirements of the Scotland Act, which differ from those of s 6 of the HRA since they do not include the possibility envisaged under s 6(2)(b) that the authority was 'acting so as to give effect to or enforce those provisions [of incompatible primary legislation]'.

As Chapter 4 explained, the ruling of the Edinburgh High Court was overturned by the Privy Council: Brown v Stott.[289] The Privy Council did not find it necessary to declare that s 172 is incompatible with Art 6(1) or (2). They reached the decision that the two were compatible, despite the findings in Saunders v UK, on the basis that the requirements of Art 6 admit of implied restriction. The restriction, Lord Hope said, must have a legitimate aim in the public interest. It was found that this was the case, bearing in mind the need to promote road safety. If so, he went on to ask, 'is there a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the means employed and the aim sought to be realised?'[290] He found that the answer to the question, in terms of limiting the right not to incriminate oneself under Art 6(1), was in the affirmative since the section demands a response to a single question, and does not allow prolonged questioning, as in Saunders.

The decision in Brown rested on the finding that coercing a statement from the defendant was not a disproportionate response to the legitimate aim of seeking to address the problem of road safety. However, it is arguable that it re-opens the whole question of the compatibility of penalising silence in other contexts. If it can be argued that the requirement of s 172 is in proportion to the problem it seeks to address, it might be argued equally that where the legitimate aim in question is even more pressing,

286 See p 1249.
287 2000 SLT 379; see [2000] J CIV LIB 193.
288 The Convention rights were brought into force in Scotland under the Scotland Act 1998, s 57(2).
289 [2001] 2 WLR 817. See Chapter 4, pp 176–77.
290 See above, p 176.

as in the case of combating terrorism, a more intrusive provision, allowing for more prolonged questioning, could be viewed as a proportionate legislative response.

Therefore, it can no longer be said with certainty that the decision in Saunders v UK calls into question the provisions allowing a limited use of coerced statements in evidence in terrorist investigations under Sched 5, paras 13 and 16 to the TA. Such statements may be admitted into evidence in order to convict of the offence under para 14 of making a statement which the defendant knows to be false or misleading in a material particular, or as to which he is reckless, in purported compliance with an order under para 13. Clearly, a misleading statement might not be made but for the pressure flowing from the penalties which para 13 and, to a greater extent, para 16, carry. Nevertheless, it is now debatable whether the possibility of admitting the statement is incompatible with the right against self-incrimination.

Further, despite the evident attempt in paras 13 and 16 to achieve Convention compliance, bearing Saunders in mind, the possibility of incompatibility remains, taking into account the broader implications of fairness in the trial as a whole under Art 6(1). If someone other than the person who had made the coerced statement was on trial and the prosecution wished to admit the statement in evidence, argument could be raised as to the fairness of so doing, bearing in mind the fact that the statement could not be used against its maker.[291] The issue of the fairness of the trial as a whole[292] could also be raised where the statement had influenced the prosecution or enabled the police to obtain evidence, since it could be argued that the statement had had an indirect impact in undermining the right against self-incrimination. Admittedly, there are precedents in current UK law for basing a prosecution on evidence uncovered in reliance on information from statements which are themselves inadmissible.[293] However, each of those precedents will need to be tested against Art 6 standards, taking into account all the circumstances applicable in an individual case.

The further question is whether Art 6 might be breached in an instance in which a silence in response to the threat of penalties under the paragraphs in question was admitted in respect of one of the other offences under Sched 5, or indeed any other offence. Brown and Saunders do not expressly address the question whether the admission into evidence of a no-comment interview (as opposed to admissions) in response to formal coercion would breach Art 6. Obviously, a situation can be envisaged in which the accused might decide to risk the imposition of the penalty in question. The prosecution might then put forward the interview in evidence for the purpose of drawing adverse inferences from it. On one view, the case for drawing such inferences might be strengthened on the argument that if the accused is prepared to risk the imposition of the penalty in question, he must have something very significant to hide. But equally, it might be argued that a vulnerable defendant who did not have legal advice (as a result of factors other than its formal denial) had made no comment, perhaps due to fear of retaliation from the real perpetrator of the offence. Such situations appear to fall more within the ruling from Murray than within that from Saunders; therefore, the factors identified here as relevant to arguments based on Murray would be applicable.

291 Analogy might be drawn with Rowe and Davis v UK (2000) 30 EHRR 1, in which statements made by accomplices were used against the accused, although the statements had been extracted on the basis of promise of immunity from prosecution and financial reward. These matters, which did not come to light at the trial, owing to the use of PII certificates, led the Court to find that the accused had not had a fair trial, in breach of Art 6.

292 The concept of the fairness of the trial taken as a whole was developed in Barbéra, Messegué and Jabardo, A 14 6(2) (1989).

293 PACE 1984, s 76(4). Impliedly under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, s 17.

Section 89(2) of the TA, applicable only in Northern Ireland, raises similar issues. Section 89(2) provides that it is an offence punishable by a fine to refuse to answer a question asked during a stop or to answer it inadequately, failing to answer 'to the best of his knowledge and ability'. Evidence obtained under s 89 can be used to convict of the s 89 offence itself; further, the TA does not expressly provide that it cannot be used in respect of other TA offences, although in practice it would be unlikely that it would be so used, owing to the incompatibility of so doing with Art 6(1) and (2).

It may be noted that the PACE Code C provisions, paras 10.1 and 10.5C, which envisage the possibility of coercion under the statutory provisions mentioned, and make provision for it, may also be incompatible with Art 6. Paragraph 10.1 provides that there is no need to caution if information is to be obtained under a 'relevant statutory requirement', while para 10.5C provides that the suspect should be informed of the consequences of failing to co-operate in the interview, regardless of the caution, where a statutory requirement to provide information applies and may render him liable to conviction for an offence or arrest. These provisions should therefore have been omitted or modified in the 1999 revision of the Codes. As they stand, the relevant parts of the paragraphs appear to amount to incompatible subordinate legislation which can simply be rendered invalid, if necessary, under the HRA since, although they reflect primary legislation, it cannot be said that such legislation 'prevents the removal of the incompatibility'.[294]

294 See HRA 1998, s 3(2)(c).

Chapter 13

Redress for police malpractice

1 Introduction[1]

Chapters 11 and 12 were concerned with the question of the balance to be struck between the exercise of powers by the police in conducting an investigation on the one hand and safeguards for the suspect against abuse of power on the other. As we have seen, the statutory rules, including in particular those under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE), the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 (CJPOA), the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001 (CJP) and the Terrorism Act 2000 (TA) contain, on the one hand, provisions intended to secure suspects' rights, such as s 58 of PACE and Sched 8, para 7 to the TA, while on the other they create or extend a statutory basis for the exercise of police powers, which frequently enhances those powers.[2] Thus, the rules can be viewed as reflecting the two different models of crime control and due process, and since the approach and aims of those models is conflicting, the statutes in question and their application in practice reflect the resulting inevitable tension. This may be said even of provisions which appear to be intended, fairly obviously, to enhance police powers, such as ss 50 and 51 of the CJP. These provisions provide, as Chapters 11 and 12 indicated, new powers of seizure during searches of people or of premises. But they are 'balanced' by the provisions of ss 52–61 which, while affording the extended powers of retention of the property seized a clear statutory basis, also provide for notice to persons whose property has been seized, and safeguard its use by various provisions.[3] It is not suggested that the balance struck is satisfactory, but it is clear that, although

1 Texts referred to below: Ashworth, A, The Criminal Process, 3rd edn, 2005; Feldman, D, Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 2nd edn, 2002, Chapters 5 and 9; Sanders, A and Young, R, Criminal Justice, 3rd edn, 2007, Chapter 12; Zander, M, The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, 2003; Clark, D, Bevan and Lidstone's The Investigation of Crime, 2004; Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, The Law of Human Rights, 2nd edn, 2006, Chapter 11; See also: Maher, G, A Theory of Criminal Process, 2000, Hart; McConville, M, Sanders, A and Leng, R, The Case for the Prosecution, 1991; Bailey, SH, Harris, DJ and Jones, BL, Civil Liberties: Cases and Materials, 5th edn, 2002, Chapter 2; Reiner, R and Leigh, I, 'Police powers', in McCrudden, C and Chambers, G (eds), Individual Rights and the Law in Britain, 1994; Klug, F, Starmer, K and Weir, S, The Three Pillars of Liberty: Political Rights and Freedoms in the UK, 1996; Sharpe, S, Judicial Discretion and Criminal Investigations, 1998, Sweet and Maxwell; Nobles, R and Schiff, D, 'Due process and Dirty Harry dilemmas: criminal appeals and the Human Rights Act' [2001] 64(6) MLR pp 911–22; Ashworth, A, 'Criminal Justice Reform' [2004] Crim LR 516.

2 Such as PACE 1984, s 24 and TA, s 41.

3 Including the duty to secure the property arising under s 61 by preventing, inter alia, copying of it.

these CJP provisions are very much orientated towards crime control, they are limited by provisions reflecting due process concerns. This could also be said to an extent of s 110 of the Serious and Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, which extended the PACE arrest power: it created a safeguard for potential arrestees of a sort in requiring police officers to be satisfied as to the fulfilment of a further requirement (based on the 'arrest conditions' from old s 25 but extending them as discussed below), apart from reasonable suspicion relating to the offence in question, a requirement that was not present under the old s 24 PACE. The PACE Codes, as revised and extended in 2006, contain a wide range of safeguards for suspects.

Thus, the relevant statutory and Code provisions declare that certain standards for the conduct of criminal and terrorist investigations must be maintained; in order to create them a complex, not to say cumbersome, domestic scheme is currently in place, part of it post-dating the Human Rights Act (HRA). It is one that has become incrementally more extensive post-PACE, especially if the Code provisions are taken into account. Under the European Convention on Human Rights, another scheme setting standards for criminal justice is apparent. Clearly, the two schemes are very different. Not only is the domestic scheme far more detailed, but also they have different starting points. One – the domestic scheme – essentially sets out police powers and then provides for restrictions on them, and for safeguards for suspects during their exercise. The other – the Convention – sets out fundamental rights and then, in the case of the right to liberty under Art 5, the guarantees of a fair trial under Art 6 and the right to be free of torture, inhuman or degrading treatment under Art 3, leaves them unqualified or not materially qualified. Only Art 5 could be said to create exceptions which correspond to aspects of domestic police powers. Nevertheless, it can be said at a high level of generality that both schemes set standards for administering criminal justice. As explored in Chapters 11 and 12, the standards of the domestic scheme and those recognised under the Convention are not necessarily the same. Each scheme does two things – it sets certain standards for crime control and for suspects' rights; it then provides that there should be a means of redress if the standards are breached. The domestic scheme goes on to prescribe in more detail the forms of redress that are potentially available, especially in relation to the question of exclusion of evidence. The international scheme provides the basic safeguard that the remedies should be effective.

The HRA brings the two schemes into juxtaposition, or perhaps confrontation, and demands under s 3(1) that, in so far as the domestic scheme is statute or Code-based, it should, if interpretation will so allow, be compatible with the requirements of the other. The HRA also demands, under s 6, that each person or body administering the domestic scheme should, unless primary legislation using very clear words provides otherwise, abide by the Convention rights. The position is complex as regards the fair trial rights under Art 6. Although in practice a court may use the methods available to it to seek to ensure that despite failures to adhere to the rights in the pre-trial period, the proceedings as a whole comply with Art 6, it is arguable that a remedy should still be available in respect of the failures of the police or other public authorities. It is not enough, it is contended, if the police do not adhere to the Convention, but that there is the potential for this then to be 'rectified' in court so that in their entirety the pre-trial and trial process ultimately so adheres. Each actor in it should (since all are public authorities) adhere to Art 6 in their own actions and decisions, bearing in mind that the case may well never come to trial. The basis for the counter-argument is that since Art 6 is concerned with the fairness of the trial, it only makes sense to consider the effect of a failure of such access within the context of the trial. It will be suggested below that this argument is flawed. At present this argument is prevailing and therefore it can be said that even under the HRA there is no effective remedy domestically for breach of certain rights within the criminal justice system. The HRA should provide at least the same protection for rights as Strasbourg would, but it is not clear that Strasbourg has taken the stance that Art 6 rights are free-standing, outside the trial context. This point is pursued below.

It may be said, then, that the HRA provides mechanisms for asking, first, whether the standards expressed by the domestic scheme are in conformity with the Convention rights. This was the question addressed by Chapters 11 and 12. Second, it ensures that the question is asked whether the means of redress provided are in conformity with what the Convention demands in terms of an effective remedy. This question is addressed in this chapter. This latter question has four facets. It asks: (a) if the domestic standards themselves are not in conformity, what can be done to rectify that by reliance on the Convention and the HRA; (b) what domestic means of redress are available for breach of the standards set for the criminal justice system and described in Chapters 11 and 12, and do they provide an effective remedy in Convention terms; (c) if the police do not abide by those standards, does the Convention under the HRA add anything to what can be done under the other current domestic provisions to provide redress; (d) is reliance on the Convention rights under the HRA an effective method of providing a remedy in respect of breaches of the standards set by the domestic provisions, including the Code provisions? It will be argued that it is in respect of redress that the domestic scheme is the most lacking but that in both legal and practical terms the HRA can only make up for the deficiency to an extent.

There are a number of domestic methods of providing redress: the police complaints and disciplinary process; prosecutions of the police; civil actions; judicial review of police actions; exclusion of evidence; trial "remedies", including stays for abuse of process, other than exclusion of evidence. The use of judicial review was considered in Chapter 11.[4] The police complaints process and exclusion of evidence have been found to fail to provide an effective remedy for breaches of the Convention rights at Strasbourg[5] and the complaints and disciplinary process has since been reformed. Civil actions (outwith ss 7(1)(a) and 8 HRA) will provide such a remedy, but are not applicable to many breaches of the scheme. Stays for abuse of process are rarely used and would not be used in respect of some breaches of Convention rights – a matter that is explored below. Prosecutions of the police are very rare and can only indirectly protect Convention rights.[6]

Typically, the question of redress may arise as follows: an investigation may not, at certain points, reach the standards set by the statutory scheme and it may at the same time breach one or more of the Convention rights. The police may sometimes feel hampered by all the PACE and Code provisions; they may feel, for example, that they are close to obtaining a confession from a detainee, but that in order to obtain it, they need to bend or break the interviewing rules. Similarly, police officers may purport to act within a power, such as the power to arrest or search premises, where no power to do so arises. In such circumstances, certain remedies are available: a civil action leading to an award of damages, if successful, or a complaint leading to disciplinary action against the officers involved, if upheld. However, as already noted, civil actions are not available for breach of the Codes and will be inapplicable to some breaches of PACE itself, such as improper denial of access to legal advice. Police disciplinary action is applicable to breaches of both PACE itself and the Codes, but at present it is arguable that, despite reform, it still does not represent an effective remedy. Apart from these two remedies, a further means of redress exists, represented by the use of exclusion of evidence, and it is in this context – as well as in the context of judicial review proceedings – that many breaches of PACE and the Codes have in fact been considered. Therefore, argument raised under s 7(1)(b) of the HRA may often be put forward in respect of exclusion of evidence. But not only is such exclusion irrelevant in the vast majority of cases since the suspect will plead guilty, it cannot be viewed, even where the case does come to trial, as an effective remedy for breaches of the Convention rights, for reasons to be considered below. Possibly, it could be viewed as an effective remedy for breaches of the statutory and Code-based scheme itself.

4 See in particular pp 1134–37.
5 In Khan v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 310, paras 44–47.
6 Since no criminal liability is created under the HRA 1998.

Thus, ss 7 and 8 HRA fill a clear gap, since a remedy in damages for breach of the Convention rights in the criminal justice system pre-trial is now available. If aspects of the domestic scheme, including Code provisions, are coterminous with the Convention rights, they have now received for the first time a remedial underpinning, where breach of such provisions would not attract a tortious remedy. However, that remedy may not be available in respect of some breaches of Art 6, including failures of access to custodial legal advice, since it appears to be assumed that the remedy would be provided in the trial itself.

The key contention of this chapter is that no sufficient or effective means of redress are available in respect of police abuse of power, although the HRA has enhanced the remedial scheme to an extent. Therefore, the safeguards considered in Chapters 11 and 12 are far from fully underpinned by such a scheme. Clearly, even if such a scheme were available in the form, for example, of a fully independent police disciplinary system, police internal practices and culture would still have an impact on the delivery of the safeguards. But, as Chapters 11 and 12 argued, externally imposed rules can affect that culture.[7] If the enforcement of those rules is weak, as this chapter contends, their impact on institutional practices is bound to be diminished.

This reading of the domestic and Convention provisions addresses significant matters, and is the main concern of this chapter, but alone it would be, it is suggested, inadequate. At the end of the chapter it will be possible to discern that the Convention under the HRA has had at least some impact in terms of reviving and reaffirming a concern for due process which has gradually been eroded in the post-PACE years. In other words, a return to those values expressed quite strongly by PACE and less so in the later legislation might become apparent in the HRA era. But such an account would not be influenced by a victim-oriented or feminist perspective. By concentrating only on due process concerns, such perspectives could be ignored. The implication would be that where a choice had to be made legislatively, judicially or executively (and the latter term, of course, includes the police themselves), the demands of due process and crime control would provide the parameters of the debate. But adoption of such a gender-neutral stance would ignore the gendered impact of the decision which would then be made, as well as the impact on victims. Thus, this chapter will argue for a more developed conception of the criminal justice system, one that recognises the values of privacy and equality as well as those of due process.

7 See above, p 1116 and pp 1153–54, 1186–90.

2 The Human Rights Act and trial remedies

Requirements of Article 6

As Chapter 2 indicated, Art 6 is seen as a central Convention Article which holds a pre-eminent position in the Convention jurisprudence since the right it protects is so fundamentally important in a democratic society.[8] It expresses a 'fundamental principle of the rule of law'[9] and is to be interpreted broadly.[10] The Court has tended to take an increasingly interventionist stance towards the right to a fair trial. Such a stance was evident in Teixeira v Portugal,[11] Van Mechelen v Netherlands,[12] Saidi v France[13] and Rowe and Davis v UK[14] although the Court continues to adhere to the principle that the assessment of evidence is for the national court.[15] Apart from the right to be presumed innocent under Art 6(2), the guarantee of the access to legal advice and the other minimal guarantees of para 6(3),[16] the Court has found that a number of rights are implicit in the term a 'fair hearing'.[17] The principle of 'equality of arms' – equality between defence and prosecution – arising from Art 6(1) affects all aspects of a hearing, therefore overlapping with its expression under Art 6(3).[18]

Duties of the courts under the HRA

The domestic courts will, save for the s 6(2) HRA proviso concerning incompatible legislation, fail to satisfy s 6 of the HRA if they act incompatibly with the Convention rights, since they are themselves public authorities. The position appears to be that wherever a court has a discretion in the course of criminal procedure, a decision regarding its use of that discretion will amount to an 'act' within the meaning s 6

8 See pp 59 et seq.
9 Salabiaku v France (1988) 13 EHRR 379.
10 Delcourt v Belgium (1970) 1 EHRR 355.
11 (1998) 28 EHHR 101; [1998] Crim LR 751.
12 (1998) 25 EHRR 657.
13 (1994) 17 EHRR 251.
14 (2000) 30 EHRR 1.
15 Khan v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 310.
16 See Chapter 2, pp 65–66; Chapter 13, pp 1210–12.
17 For general discussion see Harris, D, O'Boyle, K and Warbrick, C, Law of The European Convention on Human Rights, 1995, Chapter 6; Ovey, C, 'The ECHR and the criminal lawyer: an introduction' [1998] Crim LR 4; Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 11.
18 The principle is fully established and long standing in the Art 6 jurisprudence: see X v FRG (1963) 6 YB 520, p 574. See further Chapter 2, p 64.

of the HRA.[19] If a court does violate the rights in taking decisions as to, inter alia, exclusion of evidence or abuse of process, ss 7 and 8 of the HRA will be relevant. As Chapter 4 explains, s 7 allows a victim of an alleged violation, or proposed violation, of a Convention guarantee to rely on the right in litigation, and to argue in particular that he would be a victim of an unlawful act if the act proposed is undertaken. Section 8 allows courts to grant such remedies as seem to them just and convenient for such violations.

It is not enough for breaches of Art 6 by courts to be remedied through the appeal process. The House of Lords in the leading pre-HRA decision, R v DPP ex p Kebilene and Others[20] found in considering Art 6, that the domestic court is not, of necessity, in the same position as the Strasbourg court: 'it was inevitable that the European Court would conduct a retrospective review of [whether a trial was fair or unfair in Art 6(1) terms] in the national court', but that in the domestic court, this matter could be considered before completion of a trial. In other words, the Strasbourg Court could consider the whole pre-trial and trial process and come to a determination as to its fairness under Art 6(1). The domestic court would have to consider, during pre-trial hearings, the trial process, or on appeal, not only whether an actual or potential breach had occurred, but also whether Art 6 would be breached owing to its own regulation of the process.

The defendant might, for example, raise the argument that if the court failed to exclude evidence, Art 6(1) would be breached and that therefore, ss 6,7 and 8 require that the evidence should be excluded in order to avoid the breach. Section 8, as indicated, appears to afford some discretion to a court as to awarding the remedy, but it is almost inconceivable that a court during a trial would accept the argument that it was about to act unlawfully, within s 6, but then, although it found leeway to do so and was not therefore affected by s 6(2), fail to provide a remedy by resiling from the threatened unlawfulness. A court might, of course, find, erroneously, that its particular decision during the criminal procedure would not breach Art 6, in which case the issue would have to be raised on appeal. A court adjudicating on the current grounds for allowing an appeal would itself be bound by s 6, but would theoretically also retain a discretion under s 8 as to the award of a remedy.

In accordance with the Strasbourg jurisprudence and s 6 of the HRA, the appeal court is itself bound by Art 6.[21] The test for criminal appeals from the Crown Court is simply whether the conviction is 'unsafe'.[22] In Mullen,[23] the Court of Appeal said that an abuse of process, or, equally, material irregularities at the trial would empower the court to find that a conviction was unsafe. If the Court of Appeal considered that despite a pre-trial breach of the Convention, a conviction was safe, this view could be challenged as itself – in the particular circumstances – contrary to Art 6. If Art 6 was 19 This is the stance of the Strasbourg Court: see Z v Finland (1997) 25 EHRR 371.

20 [1999] 3 WLR 972.

21 Delcourt v Belgium A 11 (1970).

22 The Criminal Appeals Act 1968, s 2(1), as amended by the Criminal Appeals Act 1995. This provision, which allows the conviction to stand despite, e.g., a misdirection of the judge, may require modification owing to the findings of the European Court in Condron v UK (2001) 31 EHRR 1; see (2000) J Civ Lib 253.

23 [1999] 2 Cr App R 143.

itself breached owing to the effect of pre-trial improprieties, which were not cured at trial, it is hard to see that the conviction could be regarded as 'safe'.

This was broadly the stance, with a narrow caveat, taken by the Court of Appeal pre-HRA. In Pearson,[24] the Court of Appeal said: 'where this court takes the view that an appellant did not receive a fair trial this court would not, save in the most exceptional circumstances, reach the view that the conviction was nevertheless safe'. Now that Art 6 is binding on the Court of Appeal, the exception mentioned ceases to apply since otherwise, that court would be declaring, in effect, its intention to breach the Convention guarantee of a fair trial, contrary to s 6 of the HRA.

Theoretically, a defendant could be convicted after an investigative, pre-trial and trial process which taken as a whole failed to meet Art 6 standards, where the unfairness was due to incompatible domestic legislation. This is allowed for under s 6(2)(b) HRA, as Chapter 4 points out.[25] If so, the conviction would have to stand and therefore, prima facie, there would appear to be no benefit in appealing to a higher court which could issue a declaration of incompatibility. But, there would be an incentive to appeal where there was leeway for the higher court to take a different view on incompatibility by finding a way of reconciling the domestic legislation with Art 6 under s 3 HRA[26] or if there were grounds for expecting the higher court, once it had made the declaration, to award a lower sentence. In practice, however the domestic courts seek to avoid convict and possibly imprisoning a defendant under legislation which breaches the Convention, by declaring an abuse of process.[27]

Pre-HRA, a key question that a number of commentators emphasised was whether the requirement of fairness under Art 6(1) would be likely to add anything to the possibilities of creating police accountability by excluding evidence or staying the proceedings that already existed pre-HRA, domestically.[28] In particular, where the police have not adhered to the statutory safeguards for suspects, it appeared that it might be more likely under the HRA that evidence thereby obtained would be excluded, possibly providing greater protection for suspects. As indicated above, Art 6(1) allows each member state to determine its own rules of evidence. Nevertheless, the admission of evidence obtained in certain ways has been found to infringe Art 6. In these situations, the duty of the court under s 6 of the HRA requires it to exclude the evidence or stay the proceedings. Thus, in certain circumstances, Art 6 may have created greater accountability. Strasbourg has not offered much general guidance as to the use exclusion of evidence or a stay where police impropriety has occurred in order to meet the requirements of Art 6. Article 6 under the HRA has not had a radical impact in terms of trial remedies. As indicated below, the domestic courts are likely to concentrate on the particular facts of each case and, in particular, on the question of the reliability of the evidence, in relation to the question of its exclusion. In contrast, a stay may occasionally be determined upon, even where the evidence may be reliable. Clearly, in the case of very serious malpractice, including breaches of Convention rights, the court would view it as impossible to sustain the view that Art 6 would not 24 (1998) The Times, 20 February.

25 See pp 215–16.
26 Brown v Stott [2001] 2 WLR 817.
27 See the judgment of Lord Steyn in Ex p Kebeline [1999] 4 All ER 801.
28 See, e.g., Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, 1st edn, p 1465.

be breached if the trial went ahead or if, depending on the circumstances, evidence was not excluded.

3 Exclusion of evidence

Introduction: conflicting values

An example may illustrate the effect of exclusion of evidence. Assume that the police have arrested a man on suspicion of theft. They are fairly certain that he is guilty and think that they have a good chance of getting him to confess. However, he asks for legal advice. The police think that a solicitor may advise him not to answer some questions or may at least help him to withstand certain questioning techniques and so they tell him (untruthfully) that the duty solicitor is unavailable and that they might as well get on with the interview rather than prolong the process. They then question him for four hours without a break. Eventually, he succumbs to the pressure and makes a full confession to theft.

The police have breached PACE and Code C (s 58, para 6.6 and – depending on circumstances and interpretation – para 12.8). Arguably, they have also breached, or potentially breached, a Convention right: Art 6(3)(c).[29] Some meagre methods of redress are potentially available. The suspect can make a complaint. He could seek to bring an action against the police under s 7(1)(a) HRA for the arguable breach of Art 6 – but this method of obtaining redress is very doubtful; no domestic authority supports its availability. But, most significantly, the flawed interrogation may affect the trial; the trial may lead to a conviction and possibly imprisonment. He may decide to plead guilty. But if he pleads not guilty, his counsel may ask the judge at the trial not to admit the confession in evidence on the basis that the interrogation which produced it was conducted unfairly. The trial judge then has the opportunity to ensure that the original abuse of power on the part of the police is unable to affect the fairness of the trial. Unfairness is arguably less likely to occur if the judge refuses to admit the confession in evidence. The judge can hold a voir dire (a trial within a trial) by sending out the jury and then hearing defence and prosecution submissions on admitting the confession. If it is not admitted, the jury will never know of its existence and will determine the case on the basis of any other available evidence. The judge is in a difficult position. On the one hand, it is apparent that the police have abused their powers; the judge does not want to condone or appear to condone such behaviour by admitting the evidence gained thereby. On the other, the prosecution case may collapse and a possibly guilty man walk free from the court if the confession is excluded. Assuming that he is guilty, that would be to the detriment of the victim of the theft and to society in general. Also, if the other evidence against the defendant is strong, it could be argued that admission of the confession would have little or no impact on the fairness of the trial since even if it was excluded the defendant would probably be convicted.

If the defendant did commit the theft, it might be said that the end in view – the conviction – justifies the means used to obtain it, but should the judge ignore the fact that the confession might not be before the court at all had the police complied with

29 See Chapter 12, pp 1210 et seq.

PACE and Code C? Should the judge merely consider the punishment of one defendant in isolation? If the confession is admitted, the judge is arguably making in effect a public declaration that the courts will not use their powers to uphold standards for police investigations. The result may be that in future, PACE due process standards are not adhered to and that, occasionally, an innocent citizen is convicted after a false confession has been coerced from him. The multiplicity of issues raised by examples of this nature have provoked a long-running debate among academics and lawyers as to the purpose of excluding evidence which has been obtained improperly, and a number of schools of thought have arisen, advocating different principles on which evidence should be excluded. Such principles, it will be argued, are affected by the inception of the HRA.

The crime control position is that evidence should be excluded only if it appears to be unreliable, that is, in the case of a confession, false or inaccurately recorded.[30] Taken to its logical conclusion, this would mean that if a true confession (able to be verified as true) has been extracted by torture, it should nevertheless be admitted. This is argued on the basis that the function of a criminal court is to determine the truth of the charges against the accused, not to inquire into alleged improprieties on the part of the police. It is not equipped to conduct such an inquiry; therefore, if evidence is excluded on the basis that impropriety occurred in the investigation, the reputation of the police officer in question will be damaged after a less than full investigation into his or her conduct. On this argument, the court in admitting evidence obtained by improper methods is not condoning them. It is acknowledging that it is not within its function to inquire into them. Further, it can be argued on principle that even if impropriety did occur in the investigation, which the court could be viewed as disregarding or even condoning, this should not allow a guilty defendant to walk freely from the court due to the impact on society and on the victim. The adverse impact on society is three-fold. First, valuable resources have been wasted since the police and other bodies have processed the defendant through the criminal justice system without having any impact on controlling crime. Second, the defendant may commit further crimes, causing distress and financial loss to the victims and a general rise in insurance premiums. Third, society may lose faith in the criminal justice system if the guilty are not convicted.

It is suggested that in so far as this position reflects the current approach of domestic courts,[31] it has been called into question by the HRA. It implies, inter alia, that despite its duty under s 6 HRA, the court could simply ignore a breach of the Convention rights which has occurred in the pre-trial or custodial procedures and which has been instrumental in obtaining evidence. In respect of non-confession evidence, this is the current approach of the domestic courts. There is in fact an argument, considered below, that this position is sustainable to an extent under the HRA, but clearly it has now been placed under pressure.

From a due process stance, it has been argued that a court cannot merely inquire into the truth of the charges against a particular defendant: it must also play a part in maintaining standards in criminal investigations.[32] The court has one particular part to play in the processing of the defendant through the criminal justice system: it should not play its brief part and ignore what has gone before. If the courts are prepared to accept evidence obtained by improper methods, the police may be encouraged to abuse their powers to the detriment of the citizen. Exclusion of evidence should be used to punish the police by depriving them of the fruits of their impropriety and to deter them from using such practices. This principle – the disciplinary principle – may encompass either a deterrent or a punitive role for exclusion of evidence, although it is recognised that no clear-cut relationship between police behaviour and rejection of evidence should be envisaged.[33] Obviously the defendant may plead guilty so that any punitive or deterrent role is undermined. Since most defendants plead guilty, it may appear to a police officer that there is more to be gained than lost by placing pressure on suspects to make admissions.

30 See Wigmore, JH, Treatise on Evidence, 3rd edn, 1940, and Andrews, JA, 'Involuntary Confessions and Illegally Obtained Evidence in Criminal Cases' [1963] Crim LR 15, p 77.

31 See Chalkley [1998] 2 Cr App R 79, discussed below, p 1290.

The use of exclusion of evidence to punish the police has come to be viewed by most commentators as an inefficient and possibly ineffective means of protecting due process, and this has led Ashworth to suggest a somewhat different principle, which he terms protective.[34] He contends that once a legal system has declared a certain standard for the conduct of investigations, the citizen obtains corresponding rights to be treated in manner that adheres to those standards. If such rights are denied and evidence gained as a result, the court can wipe out the disadvantage to the defendant flowing from the denial by rejecting the evidence in question. If, for example, it appears that the defendant would not have made the confession if the police had afforded him access to legal advice, the judge could recreate the situation for the jury's benefit as it would have been had the access been afforded, by excluding the confession. In the eyes of the jury, the position would be as if the right had never been denied; the judge would therefore have succeeded in protecting the defendant's right of access to legal advice in the interview. It must be pointed out that use of this argument in practice became more problematic when the caution became a warning that silence may be commented on adversely in court. If access to legal advice is not given, it might be argued that such a failure could not be causally related to the confession, since the adviser would have advised the defendant not to risk remaining silent in any event. This point will be returned to below.

An alternative but allied argument, also founded on due process values, may be termed the 'reputation' or 'integrity' principle. It can be argued that admitting the confession causes the trial to appear unfair because the court thereby appears to condone or lend itself to the original unfairness. The imprimatur of the court is necessary in order to allow the impropriety to bear fruit. If the trial is viewed, not as a separate entity, but as the culmination of a process in which the court and the police both play their part as emanations of the state, it can be argued that the court should refuse to lend itself to the unfairness which has gone before in order to ensure that the state does not profit from its own wrong. It cannot wipe out the unfairness, but it can wipe out its consequences, thereby ensuring that the reputation of the criminal justice system is not tarnished. But it need concern itself with the police unfairness only if that unfairness did have consequences. If it concerned itself with an inconsequential breach, the reputation of the criminal justice system would also suffer since the detriment caused to society in allowing someone who has perpetrated a serious crime to walk free from the court would be perceived as entirely outweighing the detriment to the defendant caused by the breach. Ashworth has found, after surveying the position in a number of jurisdictions, that where the police have breached a Convention right, evidence thereby obtained should be excluded partly to vindicate the right and partly to preserve the integrity of the criminal justice system.[35]

32 E.g. Cross, R (Sir), Cross on Evidence, 5th edn, 1979, Butterworths, pp 318–28.

33 Ibid, p 328.

34 See Ashworth, A, 'Excluding Evidence as Protecting Rights' [1977] Crim LR 723.

It might appear that the inception of the HRA lends force to arguments based on the protective principle since the citizen obtains rights, not merely as an extrapolation from the standards declared in the statutory scheme, including that under PACE, but also under the Convention, on the basis that is unlawful for the public authority in question – the police – to breach them, under s 6 HRA. It might also be said that by giving further effect to the Convention rights, and placing a duty on the courts to uphold them, the HRA implies that the integrity of the criminal justice system would be compromised where evidence is admitted in breach of a right. However, although there are suggestions from the case law that the approach of the courts in the early post-PACE years was consistent with this argument to an extent, that approach was hardly evident in the immediate pre- HRA period, and the inception of the HRA did not affect that position.

The position in other common law jurisdictions

The US Supreme Court has taken the disciplinary and protective principles into account in determining that evidence obtained by improper methods should be excluded. For example, in Mapp v Ohio,[36] the police conducted an illegal search of Mrs Mapp's boarding house and seized certain obscene materials. The Supreme Court held that the evidence obtained in the course of the illegal search was inadmissible. The majority opinion gave two main reasons for reaching this conclusion: first, that the police should be discouraged from conducting illegal searches, and secondly, that the defendant's entitlement to freedom from such search and seizure should be recognised by excluding the evidence obtained thereby. The Mapp rule on searches was mirrored by the Miranda rule, that improperly obtained confessions would be inadmissible in evidence.[37] However, there has been some retreat recently from Mapp and Miranda, seen in decisions such as that in Moran v Burbine,[38] which have brought America somewhat closer to the position adopted under UK common law.[39]

The argument that evidence should be excluded if obtained through impropriety consisting of a fundamental breach of a constitutionally recognised right, receives 35 See Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, 1st edn, p 1465.

36 (1961) 367 US 643.
37 Deriving from Miranda v Arizona (1966) 384 US 436.
38 (1986) 475 US 412.
39 See Stuntz, W, 'The American exclusionary rule and defendants' changing rights' [1989] Crim LR 117.

explicit recognition under the Canadian Charter.[40] This argument was accepted until recently in New Zealand.[41] However, in R v Shaheed[42] the Court of Appeal abandoned the established prima facie rule of exclusion for evidence obtained by the police in violation of the New Zealand Bill of Rights Act 1990. A court must now decide if exclusion is a proportionate remedial response to the particular breach of the Bill of Rights that is at issue in the instant case, taking account of a range of factors. In Australia, evidence may be admitted although obtained by trickery and it has been found that the trial may still be viewed as fair.[43] In other words, by making a determination that admission of such evidence does not impair fairness, the finding was avoided that evidence was being admitted in breach of a fundamental right. However, it has been found that evidence obtained by secret recording will be excluded where unfairness has been caused to the accused.[44]

Exclusion of evidence and abuse of process

If malpractice by police or prosecutors reaches a certain level of seriousness, the trial can halted on the basis that to do otherwise would be an abuse of process. The House of Lords found in Latif[45] that in considering whether to stay the proceedings for abuse of process, the judge should weigh the public interest in ensuring that those accused of serious crimes are brought to trial against the public interest in avoiding giving the impression, based on classic crime control norms, that courts are prepared to find that the end justifies the means. This balancing of interests may be termed the 'Latif test'. The stance taken in Latif may be compared with that taken in Mullen[46] in which the Court of Appeal said: 'the need to discourage [blatant and very serious malpractice] . . . is a matter of public policy to which . . . very considerable weight should be attached'. However, these remarks do not suggest that an absolute test is in contemplation and in so far as there is a difference between the approaches of Mullen and Latif it is probable that the Latif test will prevail, since it derives from a House of Lords decision and is more in harmony with the approach taken to improperly obtained evidence under s 78, as indicated above.

In Chalkley,[47] Auld LJ stated that the issue of exclusion of evidence is distinct from the question whether the prosecution should be stayed for abuse of process. He said that while the discretion to declare an abuse of process would be governed 40 Section 24(2). In Feeney [1997] 2 SCR 13, the Canadian Supreme Court said that admission of evidence obtained through a serious breach of the appellant's Charter rights would be more damaging to the reputation of the criminal justice system than would its exclusion. (See also Burlingham [1995] 2 SCR 206.) A more technical breach has not been found, however, to demand exclusion since to do so would cause greater affront to the system than its inclusion: Belnavis [1997] 3 SCR 341.

41 R v Butcher [1992] 2 NZLR 257; R v Te Kira [1993] 3 NZLR 257; Simpson v AG [1994] 3 NZLR 703.

42 [2002] 2 NZLR 377 (CA). For discussion, see Mahoney R, 'Abolition of New Zealand's Prima Facie Exclusion Rule' [2003] Crim LR 607.

43 Ridgeway v the Queen (1995) 129 ALR 41.

44 Swaffield, Pavic v R (1998) 151 ALR 98.

45 [1996] 1 All ER 353.

46 [1999] 2 Cr App R 143, p 157.

47 [1998] 2 Cr App R 79.

by the balancing test referred to above, the discretion under s 78 would be governed almost entirely by the question whether the impropriety of the police or prosecutor had affected the reliability of the evidence. In other words, in exceptional circumstances, the trial might be halted to mark the court's disapproval of pre-trial malpractice; he considered that this would virtually never occur in respect of exclusion of evidence, except in the case of confessions.

The domestic stance

As has been indicated, the question of exclusion of evidence where there has been police breach of statutory or Code standards has been left largely up to the domestic courts by Strasbourg; domestic courts seeking to apply the Strasbourg jurisprudence under s 2 HRA have been given the message, via Khan, that no breach of Art 6 will occur if evidence obtained in breach of a Convention right or domestic due process-based rule is admitted. The only exception might arise if the matter could be characterised as one falling within the ruling in Teixeira. It may therefore be argued that the domestic courts could look to other jurisdictions for guidance as to the requirements of due process in relation to exclusion of evidence. The counter-arguments are that the HRA does not require them to do so, that other jurisdictions have developed their own rules, in accordance with their own traditions, for the assessment of evidence, as has Britain, and that therefore the domestic common law tradition should prevail in the HRA era. It is suggested that the early HRA cases demonstrate that this is the approach will continue to prevail. Therefore, the discussion below will concentrate on the established domestic position.

The common law pre-PACE went some way towards endorsing the crime control 'reliability' principle. Illegally obtained evidence other than 'involuntary' confessions was admissible in a criminal trial. Involuntary confessions were inadmissible on the ground that if a defendant was in some way induced to confess during a police interrogation, his confession might be unreliable. A confession would be involuntary if it was obtained by oppression[48] or 'by fear of prejudice or hope of advantage exercised or held out by a person in authority'.[49] According to the Court of Appeal in Isequilla,[50] 'oppression' denoted some impropriety on the part of the police, but the House of Lords in Ping Lin[51] doubted whether such impropriety was necessary if the real issue was the reliability of the confession. Uncertainty as to the need for impropriety on the part of the police and as to the kind of impropriety which could amount to oppression, allowed cases such as the Confait case[52] to slip through the net. In that case, three young boys, one of them mentally handicapped, confessed to involvement in a murder they could not have committed after they had been denied both legal advice and the presence of an adult during the police interrogation. The confessions were admitted in evidence and led to the conviction of all three. They were finally exonerated seven years later.

48 Prager [1972] 1 All ER 1114, CA.
49 Ibrahim [1914] AC 599.
50 [1975] All ER 77.
51 [1976] AC 574.
52 See Price, C and Caplan, J, The Confait Confessions, 1976, Marion Boyars; Report of the Inquiry by the Hon Sir Henry Fisher, HC 90 (1977–79).

The concept of fear of prejudice or hope of advantage was at one time interpreted strictly against the police and very mild inducements were held to render a confession involuntary. In Zaveckas,[53] for example, the Court of Appeal held that a confession had been rendered involuntary because the defendant had asked the police officer whether he could have bail if he made a statement. However, in the case of Rennie,[54] Lord Lane held that a confession need not be excluded simply because it had been prompted in part by some hope of advantage. This case paved the way for the relaxation of this rule which can be found in the PACE scheme on exclusion of evidence.

Physical evidence discovered as a result of an inadmissible confession was admissible;[55] the police witness would have to state at the trial that after interviewing the defendant, the evidence in question was discovered – in the hope that the jury would see the connection. Illegally or improperly obtained non-confession evidence, such as fingerprints, was admissible at common law unless the evidence had been tricked out of the detainee,[56] in which case there would be a discretion to exclude it. However, the House of Lords in Sang[57] re-affirmed the rule that non-confession evidence, however obtained, is admissible subject to a narrow discretion to exclude it.

Exclusion of evidence was largely placed on a statutory basis under PACE.[58] PACE differentiates between confession and non-confession evidence, reflecting the previous common law stance. PACE contains four separate tests which can be applied to a confession to determine whether it is admissible in evidence. In theory, all four tests could be applied to a particular confession, although in practice it may not be necessary to consider all of them. The four are the ‘oppression’ test under s 76(2)(a), the ‘reliability’ test under s 76(2)(b), the ‘fairness’ test under s 78 and the residual common law discretion to exclude evidence, preserved by s 82(3). It will become apparent that there is a large area of overlap between all four tests. Section 78 could cover unreliable evidence and also evidence obtained by the use of improper methods, whether amounting to oppression or not. Equally, certain types of improper behaviour could be termed oppressive, thus falling within s 76(2)(a), but they could also be viewed as circumstances likely to render a confession unreliable, falling therefore within s 76(2)(b). The courts have gone some of the way towards creating a distinct role for each test, but not all the way.[59] In some circumstances, a confession will obviously fail one of the tests under s 76 and there will be no need to consider the other three. In other circumstances, it may be worth considering all four tests. The scheme in respect of non-confession evidence is less complex: only ss 78 and 82(3) are applicable. Significantly, physical evidence which is discovered as a result of an inadmissible confession will be admissible under s 76(4)(a). In practice, s78 appears to have taken over the role of s82(3), and therefore it is rare for s82(3) to receive separate consideration.

53 (1970) 54 Cr App R 202, CA.

54 [1982] 1 All ER 385, CA.

55 Sang [1980] AC 402; [1979] 2 All ER 1222, HL.

56 Callis v Gunn [1964] 1 QB 495.

57 [1980] AC 402; [1979] 2 All ER 1222, HL.

58 For general commentary, see Birch, D, ‘Confessions and confusions under the 1984 Act’ [1989] Crim LR 95; Feldman, D, ‘Regulating Treatment of Suspects in Police Stations: Judicial Interpretation of Detention Provisions in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984’ [1990] Crim LR 452.

59 See Birch, ibid.

It is important to bear in mind that even if a confession is admitted, the jury may differ from the judge in their evaluation of the circumstances in which it was obtained. The jury may decide that they should not place weight on it due to those circumstances, thereby in effect taking the view that the judge may have erred in deciding to admit it. This rule was reaffirmed in R v Mushtaq;[60] it was found:

> The law is clear that where a judge has ruled on a voir dire that a confession is admissible the jury is fully entitled to consider all the circumstances surrounding the making of the confession to decide whether they should place any weight on it, and it is the duty of the trial judge to make this plain to them.

Section 76(2)(a) of PACE: the 'oppression' test

Section 76(2)(a) provides that where:

> . . . it is represented to the court that the confession was or may have been obtained by oppression of the person who made it . . . the court shall not allow the confession to be given in evidence against him except in so far as the prosecution proves to the court beyond reasonable doubt that the confession (notwithstanding that it may be true) was not obtained as aforesaid.

This test derives from the rule as it was at common law: if it is put to the court that the confession was or may have been obtained by oppression of the person who made it and the prosecution cannot prove beyond reasonable doubt that the police did not behave oppressively, the confession is inadmissible. The judge has no discretion in the matter. The wording derives from Art 3 of the Convention,[61] but it is not necessary for torture or inhuman or degrading treatment to be present, as discussed below. The idea behind the old common law rule, and now s 76(2)(a), is that threats of violence or other oppressive behaviour are so abhorrent that no further question as to the reliability of a confession obtained by such methods should be asked. But the principle of reliability underlies the rule, as does the principle of voluntariness. In R v Mushtaq Lord Hutton said:

> It is clear that there are two principal reasons underlying the rule that a confession obtained by oppression should not be admitted in evidence. One reason, which has long been stated by the judges, is that where a confession is made as a result of oppression it may well be unreliable, because the confession may have been given, not with the intention of telling the truth, but from a desire to escape the oppression imposed on, or the harm threatened to, the suspect. A further reason, stated in more recent years, is that in a civilised society a person should not be compelled to incriminate himself, and a person in custody should not be subjected by the police to illtreatment or improper pressure in order to extract a confession.[62]

60 [2005] 1 WLR 1513 at para 3.

61 See Chapter 2 pp 45–50 for the wording of Art 3 and for Strasbourg case law on the meaning of the three terms used in it.

62 [2005] UKHL 25 at para 7. He relied on Wong Kam-ming v The Queen [1980] AC 247, 261 and Lam Chi-ming v The Queen [1991] 2 AC 212, p 220 E–G.

He found that these principles were in harmony with those accepted under Art 6(1): 'These two reasons also underlie the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Saunders v The United Kingdom.'[63] This rule has the dual function of removing any incentive to the police to behave oppressively, and of protecting the detainee from the consequences of oppressive behaviour if it has occurred.

Under this head, once the defence has advanced a reasonable argument (Liverpool Juvenile Court ex p R)[64] that the confession was obtained by oppression, it will not be admitted in evidence unless the prosecution can prove that it was not so obtained. If no reasonable doubt is raised it will be admitted. The reliability of a confession obtained by oppression is irrelevant to the issue of exclusion: it matters not whether the effect of the oppression is to frighten the detainee into telling the truth or alternatively into lying in order to get out of the situation. But it is highly relevant if the confession is admitted. In R v Mushtaq[65] the House of Lords had to consider the appropriate direction to a jury, taking account of Art 6(1), where a confession alleged to have been obtained by oppression was admitted in evidence. The question certified by the Court of Appeal was: whether 'in view of article 6 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights', a judge 'is required to direct the jury, if they conclude that the alleged confession may have been [obtained by oppression] they must disregard it'. Lord Hutton answered the question posed in the negative because he considered that the defendant's right not to incriminate himself against his will:

> . . . is protected by the judge and his right not to be convicted on the basis of a confession which may be untrue because it may have been obtained by oppression is protected both by the judge and also subsequently by the jury if the judge admits the confession.[66]

Therefore he considered that if a judge directed a jury that, even if they were satisfied that a confession was true, they must exclude it from their consideration if they concluded that it might have been obtained by oppression, then the jury would be usurping the judge's function in determining facts relevant to the question whether it could be taken into account as evidence. But the majority in the House of Lords answered this question in the affirmative. They found that both the judge and the jury are public authorities under s 6 HRA. Therefore it would be unlawful for the judge and jury to act in a way which was incompatible with a defendant's right against self-incrimination as implied into Art 6(1).

The judge had directed the jury that, if they were sure that the appellant's confession was true, they might rely on it even if they considered that it might have been made as a result of oppression.

> Such a direction was an invitation to the jury to act in a way that was incompatible with the appellant's right against self-incrimination under article 6(1). As such, the direction was itself incompatible with that right . . . It follows, both on the basis

63 [2005] UKHL 25 at para 8; (Saunders [1996] 23 EHRR 313).
64 [1987] All ER 688.
65 [2005] 1 WLR 1513.
66 [2005] UKHL 25 at para 23.

> of section 76(2) when viewed without regard to the Convention and on the basis of the appellant's article 6(1) Convention right against self-incrimination, that the judge misdirected the jury . . .[67]

The Court of Appeal had referred to the last sentence of the judge's direction: 'If, on the other hand, you are sure that it is true you may rely on it, even if it was or may have been made as a result of oppression or other improper circumstances.' The Court found, and the House of Lords agreed, that the jury would have received more assistance if the second part of the sentence had been omitted. Lord Hutton said: 'the words might to some extent deflect the jury from concentrating on the question whether, if there was a reasonable possibility of oppression, it would be safe to rely on the confession as being truthful'.

This situation is not likely to arise frequently since the judge can admit confession evidence only if satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that it was not obtained by oppression or any other improper means. If there is anything in the evidence that gives rise to a reasonable doubt, the confession must be excluded. So the direction to disregard the confession would only be relevant where, despite the judge's view that, beyond a reasonable doubt, the confession was not obtained by oppression or any other improper means, the jury decided that it was, or might have been, obtained in that way. In the instant case the trial judge had found that the evidence had not been obtained by oppression. Therefore, although the judge's direction had been at fault, the conviction was found to be safe.

The only evidence given in the Act as to the meaning of oppression is the non-exhaustive definition contained in s 76(8): 'In this section "oppression" includes torture, inhuman or degrading treatment and the use or threat of violence (whether or not amounting to torture).' The word 'includes' ought to be given its literal meaning according to the Court of Appeal in Fulling.[68] Therefore, it appeared that the concept of oppression might be fairly wide: the question was whether it encompassed the old common law rulings on its width. In Fulling, the Court of Appeal held that PACE is a codifying Act and that therefore, a court should examine the statutory language uninfluenced by pre-Act decisions. The Court then proffered its own definition of oppression: '. . . the exercise of authority or power in a burdensome, harsh or wrongful manner; unjust or cruel treatment of subjects, inferiors, etc; the imposition of unreasonable or unjust burdens'. It thought that oppression would almost invariably entail impropriety on the part of the interrogator.

However, the terms 'wrongful' and 'improper' used in this test could potentially cover any unlawful action on the part of the police. This could have been taken to mean that any breach of the Act or Codes could constitute oppression. This wide possibility was briefly pursued at first instance in the early post-PACE period,[69] but has been abandoned.[70] The Court of Appeal in Hughes[71] held that a denial of legal advice, owing not to bad faith on the part of the police, but to a misunderstanding, 67 At paras 53 and 54, per Lord Rodger of Earlsferry.

68 [1987] QB 426; [1987] 2 All ER 65, CA.
69 In Davison [1988] Crim LR 442.
70 See Parker [1995] Crim LR 233.
71 [1988] Crim LR 519.

could not amount to oppression. In Alladice[72] the Court of Appeal also took this view in suggesting, obiter, that an improper denial of legal advice, if accompanied by bad faith on the part of the police, would certainly amount to 'unfairness' under s 78 and probably also to oppression. In Beales,[73] rather heavy-handed questioning accompanied by misleading suggestions, although not on the face of it a very serious impropriety, was termed oppressive because it was obviously employed as a deliberate tactic. In Paris,[74] the case of the Cardiff Three, confessions made by one of the defendants after some 13 hours of highly pressured and hostile questioning were excluded on the ground of oppression. He was a man of limited intelligence, but the Court of Appeal thought that the questioning would have been oppressive even in relation to a suspect of normal intelligence.

This emphasis on bad faith may be criticised because, from the point of view of the detainee, it matters little if mistreatment occurs because of an administrative mix-up, an innocent misconstruction of powers or malice. Looking to the state of mind of the suspect rather than that of the oppressor would enable account to be taken of the very great difference in impact of certain conduct on a young, inexperienced suspect and on a hardened, sophisticated criminal. However, at present the courts have not shown a desire to import a subjective assessment of oppression into s 76(2)(a), although at common law such an assessment would have been warranted.[75]

On the other hand, it cannot be said that the Court of Appeal has consistently invoked s 76(2)(a) rather than s 78 when the police have deliberately misused their powers in obtaining a confession; in Mason,[76] for example, a trick played deliberately on the appellant's solicitor led to exclusion of the confession under s 78. In Blake,[77] misleading statements made to the detainee, presumably in bad faith, led to exclusion of the confession under s 76(2)(b) or s 78. Thus, apart from the requirement of bad faith, it also seems necessary to show that the improper behaviour has reached a certain level of seriousness in order to show oppression.[78] However, the case law does not yet clearly indicate the level of seriousness needed. All that can be said with some certainty is that the impropriety should be of a serious nature and that bad faith appears to be a necessary, but not sufficient condition for the operation of s 76(2)(a), whereas it will probably automatically render a confession inadmissible under s 78.[79]

So oppression will arise if, first, improper behaviour of a certain level of seriousness has occurred. The behaviour in Paris was clearly oppressive; other improper behaviour might fall only just within the category of oppressive behaviour; Second, the behaviour must be perpetrated deliberately. Improper treatment falling outside s 76(8) and of insufficient seriousness to be termed oppressive or oppressive behaviour unaccompanied by bad faith could fall within s 76(2)(b) if the confession was likely to have been

72 (1988) 87 Cr App R 380, CA.

73 [1991] Crim LR 118. See, to the same effect, Heron (1993) unreported; forceful questioning was accompanied by lies as to the identification evidence.

74 (1993) 97 Cr App R 99; [1994] Crim LR 361, CA.

75 Priestley (1966) 50 Cr App R 183, CA.

76 [1987] Crim LR 119; [1987] 3 All ER 481, CA.

77 [1991] All ER 481, CA.

78 See L [1994] Crim LR 839.

79 For discussion of the effect of bad faith under s 78, see below, pp 1286–87.

rendered unreliable thereby. The emphasis on bad faith or the lack of it at least gives an indication as to when improper behaviour on the part of the police will lead to automatic exclusion of the confession under s 76(2)(a) and when it will merely suggest the likelihood of unreliability under s 76(2)(b). But, since s 76(2)(a) only operates to exclude confessions obtained as a result of very serious impropriety on the part of the police, meaning that confessions are rarely excluded under the sub-section, its ability to protect due process is limited. However, its impact on due process should not be disregarded. It sets a basic standard for police behaviour, probably deterring police from forms of impropriety still relatively common in some jurisdictions.

Section 76(2)(b): the 'reliability' test

Section 76(2)(b) provides that where a confession was or may have been obtained:

> . . . in consequence of anything said or done which was likely in the circumstances existing at the time, to render unreliable any confession which might be made by him in consequence thereof, the court shall not allow the confession to be given in evidence against him except in so far as the prosecution proves to the court beyond reasonable doubt that the confession (notwithstanding that it may be true) was not obtained as aforesaid.

The 'reliability' test of s 76(2)(b) derives from the rule as stated in Ibrahim[80] on inducements to confess. However, as will be seen, it represents a relaxation of that rule as it was applied in Ibrahim. It also works certain changes in the emphasis of the test. The test does not reflect the full rigour of the reliability principle, which requires that a confession extracted by torture but determined to be true should be admitted in evidence.[81] Instead it is concerned with objective reliability: the judge must consider the situation at the time the confession was made and ask whether the confession would be likely to be unreliable, not whether it is unreliable.

It must be borne in mind that if an offer of some kind is made to the detainee in response to an inquiry from him, this will not render the subsequent confession unreliable,[82] thus explicitly rejecting the Zaveckas approach. It is not necessary, under this section, to show that there has been any misconduct on the part of the police. In Harvey,[83] a mentally ill woman of low intelligence may have been induced to confess to murder by hearing her lover's confession. Her confession was excluded as being likely to be unreliable. In Harvey, the 'something said or done' (the first limb of the test under s 76(2)(a)) was the confession of the lover while the 'circumstances' (the second limb) were the defendant's emotional state, low intelligence and mental illness. The 'something said or done' cannot consist of the defendant's own mental or physical state, according to Goldberg.[84] In that case, the defendant was a heroin addict who confessed because he was desperate to leave the police station and obtain a 'fix'. The 80 [1914] AC 599; see p 1267, above.

81 As advocated by Andrews, op. cit. [1963] Crim LR 15, p 77; see p 1263 above.
82 Code C, para 11.3.
83 [1988] Crim LR 241.
84 [1988] Crim LR 678.

contention of the defence counsel that the defendant's decision to confess prompted by his addiction amounted to 'something said or done' was not accepted by the court. In Wahab[85] the defendant tried to negotiate the release of his family from arrest with the police by offering to confess. The police did not make the bargain but he confessed in any event and tried later to have the confession excluded under s 76(2)(b). This was refused partly on the ground that the confession was reliable, but also on the ground that the inducement to confess did not come from the police.

In most instances, then, the 'something said or done' must consist of some impropriety on the part of the police. Having identified such a factor, a court will go on to consider whether any circumstances existed which rendered the impropriety particularly significant. The 'circumstances' could include the particularly vulnerable state of the detainee. In Mathias,[86] the defendant was particularly vulnerable because he had not been afforded legal advice although an offer of immunity from prosecution had been made to him. The Court of Appeal held that the offer had placed him in great difficulty and that this was a situation in which the police should have ensured that he had legal advice. From the judgment, it appears that if an inducement to confess is offered to the detainee, the police should ensure that he or she can discuss it with a solicitor, even if the police are entitled to deny access to legal advice, on the ground that the detainee falls within s 58(8) (see above). Thus in such instances s 76(2)(b) may be satisfied since the 'circumstances' will be the lack of legal advice and the 'something said or done', the inducement.

The vulnerability relied upon by the defence as a special circumstance may relate to a physical or mental state. In Trussler[87] the defendant, who was a drug addict and had been in custody 18 hours, had been denied legal advice and had not been afforded the rest period guaranteed by Code C, para 12. His confession was excluded as likely to be unreliable. In Delaney[88] the defendant was 17, had an IQ of 80 and, according to an educational psychologist, was subject to emotional arousal which would lead him to wish to bring a police interview to an end as quickly as possible. These were circumstances in which it was important to ensure that the interrogation was conducted with all propriety. In fact, the officers offered some inducement to the defendant to confess by playing down the gravity of the offence and by suggesting that if he confessed, he would get the psychiatric help he needed. They also failed to make an accurate, contemporaneous record of the interview in breach of Code C, para 11.3 (version of Code C in force at the time). Failing to make the proper record was of indirect relevance to the question of reliability since it meant that the court could not assess the full extent of the suggestions held out to the defendant. Thus, in the circumstances existing at the time (the mental state of the defendant), the police impropriety did have the special significance necessary under s 76(2)(b). The decision in Marshall[89] was to similar effect, although it did not identify a specific breach of Code C: the defendant was on the borderline of sub-normality and therefore, after an interview accompanied by his solicitor, he should not have been re-interviewed unaccompanied about the same matters.

85 [2003] 1 Cr App R 15.
86 (1989) The Times, 24 August.
87 [1988] Crim LR 446.
88 (1989) 8 Cr App R 338; (1988) The Times, 20 August, CA.
89 (1992) The Times, 28 December.

From the above it appears that the 'circumstances existing at the time' may be circumstances created by the police (as in Mathias) or may be inherent in the defendant (as in Delaney). Impropriety on the part of the police can go to either limb of the test, but a state inherent in the detainee (such as mental illness) can go only to the 'circumstances' limb. Thus, a single breach of the interviewing rules such as a denial of legal advice in ordinary circumstances would not appear, as far as the current interpretation of s 76(2)(b) is concerned, to satisfy both limbs of the test. On the other hand, a doubtful breach or perhaps no breach but, rather, behaviour of doubtful propriety, such as misleading the suspect as to the need to have legal advice, might satisfy the 'something said or done' test where special circumstances were also present.

So far, the courts have considered instances where something is said or done, in particularly significant circumstances, which increases the likelihood that a confession will be unreliable. However, it is arguable that s 76 might exceptionally be applicable where something is said or done which might affect a subsequent confession, but the circumstances are normal. The example was given above of a detainee who was deprived of sleep as a result of an administrative mix-up. Deprivation of sleep would be likely to render a confession unreliable, but which 'circumstances' could be pointed to as existing at the time – as required by the second limb of s 76(2)(b)? The answer could be that the ordinary police methods of interrogation, applied to a detainee who had been deprived of sleep, would amount to 'circumstances' falling within s 76(2)(b). Thus, this would be an impropriety which could go to both limbs of the test. Such instances of breaches of Code C could also fall within s 78, as will be seen below. However, defence counsel would be expected to argue the point first under s 76(2)(b) as the prosecution would then have the onus of proving beyond reasonable doubt that the deprivation of sleep did not take place.

It must now be apparent that s 76(2)(b) could be used to exclude all confessions obtained by oppression. It may then be wondered why s 76(2)(a) exists at all. The principle lying behind the two heads of s 76 appears to be that some types of impropriety on the part of the police are so unacceptable that it would be abhorrent in a court to go on to consider the reliability of a confession gained by such methods. In other words, s 76(2)(a) can speed up a process which could be carried out under s 76(2)(b).

Causation and the two heads of s 76

The words of s 76(2): ' [if] it is represented to the court that the confession was or may have been obtained' by [oppression or by behaviour in circumstances conducive to unreliability] appear to import a causal link between the police behaviour (the 'something said or done' or the oppression) and the confession. (It should be noted that the sections could also apply to persons other than police officers.) Thus, if the police threaten the suspect with violence after he has confessed, this will clearly be irrelevant to the obtaining of the confession. However, it is possible that under s 76(2)(a), the causal link will not be much scrutinised so long as the oppression precedes the confession. This receives some support from dicta in Alladice;[90] the Court of Appeal determined that the improper denial of legal advice had not caused the detainee to confess, but still found that, had it been accompanied by bad faith, exclusion of the confession under s 76 might have been undertaken. The general rule appears, then, to be that where the causal link in question clearly does not exist, s 76(2)(a) cannot be invoked, but in all other instances the fact that the confession was made subsequent to the oppression may be sufficient.

90 (1988) 87 Cr App R 380, CA.

The question of causation under s 76(2)(b) appears, on the face of it, quite complex. From the wording of the sub-section it appears to be necessary to adopt a two stage test, asking first whether something was said or done, likely in the circumstances to render any confession made unreliable – an objective test – and, second, whether that something actually caused the detainee to confess – a subjective test.

The relationship between ss 76 and 78

In general, the s 76 tests for admissibility of confessions could work to the detriment of inexperienced and more vulnerable detainees. In Canale,[91] the police breached the recording provisions and allegedly played a trick on the appellant in order to obtain the confession. Ruling that the confession should have been excluded under s 78, the Court of Appeal took into account the fact that the appellant could not be said to be vulnerable or weak-minded; it was therefore thought inappropriate to invoke s 76(2)(b).[92] Thus, the need to identify special factors in the situation in order to invoke either head of s 76 means that breaches of the interviewing rules unaccompanied by any such factor are usually considered under s 78. Furthermore, allegedly fabricated confessions cannot fall within s 76(2) owing to its requirement that something has happened to the defendant which caused him to confess; its terms are not therefore fulfilled if the defence alleges that no confession made by the defendant exists.

In practice, confessions are rarely excluded under either head of s 76; this may be in part because the judges strongly wish to retain a discretion as to admissibility. As indicated above, even where a confession is excluded, physical evidence found as a result of information given in it need not be, under s 76(4).[93] Therefore, it may be said that s 76 has had limited impact in upholding due process. This stance has not changed under the HRA – there has been no evidence post-HRA of greater judicial willingness to use the sub-sections. Thus, s 78 has operated as a catch-all section, bringing within its boundaries many confessions which pass the tests contained in either head of s 76.

91 [1990] All ER 187, CA.

92 Section 76(2)(a) was not invoked, although apparently the police deliberately breached the recording provisions. Presumably, breaches of the interviewing rules were not seen as behaviour serious enough to be termed ‘oppression’. However, if the defence makes a – contested – allegation that the police made threats or deliberately tricked the detainee into confessing, the prosecution might not be able to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the police had in fact behaved properly owing to the breach of the recording provisions. This alternative line of argument could have been considered in Canale [1990] All ER 187, CA.

93 See further Mirfield, P, Silence, Confessions and Improperly Obtained Evidence, 1997, Clarendon; Mirfield, P, ‘Successive confessions and the poisonous tree’ [1996] Crim LR 554; Sharpe, Judicial Discretion and Criminal Investigation, 1998.

Section 78: the 'fairness' test[94]

Section 78 provides:

> In any proceedings the court may refuse to allow evidence on which the prosecution proposes to rely to be given if it appears to the court that, having regard to all the circumstances, including the circumstances in which the evidence was obtained, the admission of the evidence would have such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings that the court ought not to admit it.

Section 78 can be invoked to argue for: (a) exclusion of confessions, and is of particular pertinence if they cannot be excluded under s 76 since the behaviour relied upon to argue for exclusion does not satisfy the tests discussed under s 76; (b) exclusion of non-confession evidence, including silences. Section 78 may be invoked where police questioning meets with a no comment response from a defendant. Such a response cannot be considered within s 76 due to the use of the word 'confession' within that section. It would be a very distorted use of statutory language to use the term 'confession' to cover a silence. If a silence is excluded from evidence under s 78, adverse inferences obviously cannot be drawn from it (unless the jury or magistrate becomes aware of it in the course of hearing other evidence) and therefore argument on this issue has arisen, although so far the courts have shown themselves reluctant to exclude no comment interviews.[95] It was argued in Chapter 12 that where access to legal advice has been delayed, and the accused has remained silent in interviews without having had access to legal advice, a breach of Art 6(3)(c) and possibly of Art 6(1) is likely to occur if adverse inferences are then drawn at trial.[96] One method of preventing this, which has not been catered for expressly under domestic law,[97] would be to exclude the interviews. A similar argument can also be put forward where, in the same circumstances, the accused had in fact made admissions in the interviews.

Section 78 confers an exclusionary discretion on a judge and appears to have been conceived to cover the very narrow function of the old common law discretion[98] to exclude improperly obtained non-confession evidence. Until the ruling in Mason,[99] it was uncertain whether s 78 also covered confessions. Under s 6 HRA domestic courts have a duty to exercise their discretion under s 78 in such a way as to ensure that 94 For discussion of the operation of s 78, see Allen, CJW, 'Discretion and Security: excluding evidence under section 78(1) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984' [1990] 49(1) 80; Gelowitz, M, 'Section 78 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984: Middle ground or no man's land?' (1990) 106 LQR 327; May [1988] Crim LR 722; Stone, R, 'Exclusion of Evidence under section 78 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act: Practice and Principles' (1995) 3 Web JCL 1; Sanders and Young, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 11, Part 5; Choo, AL-T and Nash, S, 'What's the matter with s 78?' [1999] Crim LR 929–40; Hunter, M, 'Judicial Discretion: s78 in practice' (1994 Crim LR 558; Ormerod, D and Birch, D, 'The evolution of the discretionary exclusion of evidence' (2004) Crim LR 767.

95 See Condron [1997] 1 WLR 827.

96 See pp 1210–15. This argument is based on Murray v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 29, Averill v UK (2001) 31 EHRR 35, and Magee v UK (2001) 31 EHRR 35.

97 Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999, s 58, only provides that in such circumstances adverse inferences may not be drawn.

98 See Sang [1980] AC 402; [1979] 2 All ER 1222, HL.

99 [1987] Crim LR 119; [1987] All ER 481, CA.

compliance with Art 6(1) is achieved, but as discussed below, that duty has added little to the approach to s 78 established pre-HRA. The domestic jurisprudence is far more extensive on this matter than that at Strasbourg regarding confessions under Art 6, and, despite the reluctance of the judiciary to lay down guiding principles for the application of s 78, academics in an extensive literature have identified some indications of adherence to such principle.[100] It might have been expected that the effect of Art 6 would be to encourage the articulation of some clearer statements of principle under s 78. But the difficulty of discerning consistency of principle in the decisions under s 78 only became more apparent in the later 1990s and post-HRA.[101]

Section 78 provides a discretion to exclude evidence if admitting it would render the trial unfair. In adopting this formula, it was clear that the government did not wish to import into this country a USA-type exclusionary rule. The Home Secretary informed the House of Commons[102] that the function of exclusion of evidence after police misconduct must not be disciplinary, but must be to safeguard the fairness of the trial. The idea behind this was that non-confession evidence obtained by improper means could still be admitted on the basis that police misconduct could be dealt with by internal disciplinary procedures. Similarly, confessions obtained improperly in circumstances falling outside s 76 could nevertheless be admissible in evidence, with the proviso that the trial should not thereby be rendered unfair. In fact, as will be seen, the courts have managed to create a role for s 78 which, as far as confessions are concerned, is probably rather far removed from the government's original intention. The approach adopted towards confessions tends to reflect to an extent the protective and integrity principles.

It may be noted that s 78 is not explicit as to who bears the burden of proof where a breach of the rules is alleged, but in Vel v Owen[103] the Divisional Court ruled that the defence should make good its objection. In Anderson,[104] however, the Court said that it was not entirely clear where the burden of proof lay.

Section 78: excluding confessions

Section 78 must be applied in accordance with the courts' duty under Art 6. Article 6(1) is silent as to the admissibility of improperly obtained evidence. The Strasbourg Court has emphasised that the assessment of evidence is for the domestic courts[105] and that Art 6 does not require any particular rules of evidence. Thus, it has allowed the national authorities a wide margin of appreciation in this respect. It was found in an early decision, Austria v Italy,[106] that maltreatment with the aim of extracting a confession created a breach of Art 6(2). This argument can be applied where 'compelled' admissions, including those obtained by treatment falling within s 76, and those obtained on pain of a penalty under the TA,[107] while not themselves used in evidence, had led to the 100 See: Allen [1990] CLJ 80; Gelowitz (1990) 106 LQR 327; May [1988] Crim LR 722; Stone (1995) 3 Web JCL 1; Sanders and Young, op. cit., fn 1, (2007) Chapter 12, Part 5.

101 See Ormerod, D and Birch, D, 'The evolution of the discretionary exclusion of evidence' (2004) Crim LR 767.

102 1983–84, HC Deb col 1012, 29 October 1984.

103 (1987) JP 510.

104 [1993] Crim LR 447.

105 Edwards v UK A 247-B (1992).

106 Appl No 788/60 4 YB 112 (1961).

107 See Chapter 12, pp 1249–54.

uncovering of other evidence. It could be argued, in furtherance of a fair procedure under Art 6, that that other evidence should be excluded under s 78. The question of pressure on the applicant in the interview was taken into account by the Court in reaching its conclusion that Art 6 had been breached in Saunders v UK[108] by the admission in evidence of the coerced admissions, and the argument could be extended to encompass other evidence uncovered as a result of such admissions. Clearly, the decision in Brown v Stott[109] has, however, weakened this argument to an extent, since the courts in future are likely to consider the legitimate aim of the compulsion and the question whether the compulsion is in proportion to the aim in creating a minimal impact on the accused's Art 6 rights.

The courts have been very reluctant to lay down general rules for the application of s 78,[110] but the attempt will be made here, albeit tentatively, to identify some of the factors which tend to be taken into account in relation to admissions. Non-confession evidence will be considered separately. If it is found that admission of an interview would render the trial unfair, then not only the interview affected, but possibly any interviews subsequent to that one[111] may be excluded from evidence under s 78.

The PACE interviewing scheme, made up to a significant extent of Code-based rules, may be breached or undermined in a variety of ways. There may be a clear failure to put in place one of the safeguards, such as access to legal advice or tape recording. However, it is not always possible to identify such a clear breach of the rules. The failure to do so may have contributed to the decision in Hughes:[112] a misrepresentation as regards unavailability of legal advice made to the appellant did not involve a clear breach of a specific Code provision and therefore, may have led to the reluctance to exclude the confession. Similarly, in Khan[113] it was found that while s 30(1) of PACE allowed officers to keep a suspect out of the police station for a time in order to make investigations, including a search, questioning during that time should be limited, since otherwise the provisions of the interviewing scheme would be subverted. Some of the questions which had in fact been asked went beyond what was needed for the search; however, it was found, they should not have been excluded, since the matter was 'a question of degree', although officers did not have carte blanche to interview suspects in such circumstances.

In contrast to this approach, there has been some willingness at first instance to consider situations where the PACE interviewing scheme seemed to have been infringed, although it was impossible to point to a clear breach.[114] The interviewing scheme lends itself to many methods of infringement, some of which may occur at a low level of visibility, but which may nevertheless be of significance. For example, there may be breach of a rule contained in a non-statutory instrument other than PACE itself or 108 (1997) 23 EHRR 313. Saunders is discussed in Chapter 12, pp 1251–54.

109 [2001] 2 WLR 817.

110 See the comments of Auld J in Katz (1990) 90 Cr App R 456, CA.

111 Ismail [1990] Crim LR 109, CA; cf Gillard and Barrett (1991) 155 JP Rep 352 and Y v DPP [1991] Crim LR 917. Later interviews may be found to have been contaminated by earlier breaches if those breaches are of a fundamental and continuing character and the accused has not had sufficient opportunity of retracting what was said earlier: Neill [1994] Crim LR 441, CA.

112 [1988] Crim LR 519. See Chapter 12, p 1222 for discussion of the decision.

113 [1993] Crim LR 54, CA.

114 See, e.g., Vernon [1988] Crim LR 445; Woodall and Others [1989] Crim LR 288.

Code C;[115] there may be evasion or bending of a rule as opposed to breaking it; there are instances where the interviewing scheme itself leaves it unclear whether or not a particular safeguard should have been in place at a given stage in the process.[116] Clearly, a court may never have an opportunity to hear such argument. Infringement of this type is difficult to detect; for example, a suspect who is persuaded to forgo legal advice at the 'booking in' stage may be unaware that something has occurred to his disadvantage, unlike the suspect who has been straightforwardly refused advice. Even assuming that the suspect pleads not guilty, defence counsel may be reluctant to argue for exclusion of a confession if unable to point to a clear breach of the rules.

In Keenan,[117] the Court of Appeal ruled that once a breach of the rules can be identified, it will be asked whether it is substantial or significant. The Court found that a combination of breaches of the recording provisions satisfied this test. In contrast, a breach of para 10.2 requiring a police officer to inform a suspect that he is not under arrest, is free to go and may obtain legal advice, has been held to be insubstantial.[118] This view of para 10.2 also seems to have been implicit in the ruling of the Court of Appeal in Joseph,[119] although a breach of para 10.5 governing contemporaneous recording (now para 10.7), in contrast was clearly found to be substantial and significant in order to merit exclusion of the confession. In Walsh,[120] the Court of Appeal held that what was significant and substantial would be determined by reference to the nature of the breach except in instances where the police had acted in bad faith: '. . . although bad faith may make substantial or significant that which might not otherwise be so, the contrary does not follow. Breaches which are themselves significant and substantial are not rendered otherwise by the good faith of the officers concerned.'

This test has so far been applied only to Code provisions. It seems likely that breach of rules contained in Notes for Guidance or Home Office circulars would fail it – assuming that a court was prepared to consider such breaches at all. The courts have been reluctant to take such rules into account in the context of exclusion of evidence or, as far as the Notes are concerned, in any other context. This was the approach taken in DPP v Billington;[121] the Court of Appeal preferred not to consider Note 6C

115 The Notes for Guidance, which are not part of the Codes (see Codes C and H, para 1.3 – the provision to the same effect is the first paragraph of each Code) and therefore may in effect be said to form part of a separate instrument; Home Office Circulars; Force Standing Orders.

116 This may be said in particular of Code C, para 11.1A and para 10.1 which determine when the safeguards surrounding interviews should be in place. See above, pp 1193–97 (discussed in Fenwick, H, 'Confessions, recording rules and miscarriages of justice' [1993] Crim LR 174).

117 [1989] 3 WLR 1193; [1989] All ER 598, CA.

118 Rajakuruna [1991] Crim LR 458.

119 [1993] Crim LR 206, CA.

120 [1989] Crim LR 822; (1989) 19 Cr App R 161.

121 (1988) Cr App R 68; [1988] 1 All ER 435. The court had to consider whether a desire to consult a solicitor first could properly found a refusal to furnish a specimen of breath under the Road Traffic Act 1972, s 8(7). Para 6 of Code C provides that a person who has requested legal advice may not be interviewed until he has received it. Note 6C (version of Code C in force at the time; the equivalent provision now appears in para 11.1A) provides that the s 8 procedure does not constitute an interview, but Lloyd LJ preferred not to take it into account while reaching a conclusion which was nevertheless in accordance with it. Thus, the issue which fell to be determined did not concern the question of exclusion of evidence, but has a bearing upon the general question whether courts are prepared to place any reliance upon the Notes.

of Code C despite its relevance to the question before it. However, there are some patchy signs that the judiciary are prepared to react to the Notes differently, perhaps owing to a perception that their legitimacy derives from their substance, as opposed to their source. In DPP v Blake[122] the Divisional Court impliedly accepted that a Note for Guidance will be considered if it can be argued that it amplifies a particular Code provision, and can therefore be of assistance in determining whether breach of such a provision has occurred. The question arose whether an estranged parent could be the appropriate adult at the interview of a juvenile under Code C, para 13.1;[123] that provision was interpreted in accordance with Note 13C, which at the time described the adult's expected role,[124] and it was then found that para 13.1 had been breached.[125] A variation on this view of the Notes, which nevertheless supports the argument that they are unlikely to be considered in their own right, was expressed by the Court of Appeal in relation to one of the most significant Notes, Note 11A. It was taken into account on the basis that it could be seen as part of para 11.1 and could thereby acquire the status of a paragraph.[126] (Note – the references to the Code provisions are to the provisions in force at the time.)

Once a court has identified a significant and substantial breach of the interviewing rules, it may then take some account of the function of the rule in question. Rules governing access to legal advice and the right to silence provide rights which are valuable in themselves in due process terms; they also tend to place the suspect on a more equal footing with police officers during the interview. These rights are also reflected in the Convention in Art 6(2) and 6(3)(c).[127] An innocent detainee who is confused and upset by the interrogation may be less likely to make false admissions if a legal adviser is present at the interview.[128] In contrast, the verifying and recording rules may be said to be concerned mainly with the evidential integrity of admissions rather than with providing rights valuable in themselves. Categorising the interviewing rules in this way – by means of their dominant function – may be useful as a means of determining the type of unfairness which may flow from their breach. However, occasionally, what may be termed the subordinate function of a rule may be relevant to the question of fair treatment, with the result that, for example, a breach of a recording rule could be treated for s 78 purposes in the same way as breach of the legal advice provisions.

In Samuel,[129] the Court of Appeal found that the confession should have been excluded under s 78 because it was causally linked to the police impropriety – a failure to allow the appellant access to legal advice. In order to establish this point, the solicitor

122 [1989] 1 WLR 432, CA.

123 Now para 11.15 under the 2006 revised Code.

124 This role is now described in para 11.17; this provision has therefore been elevated in status, indicating its importance. The decision in DPP v Blake found recognition in Note for Guidance 1B.

125 This decision was followed in the first instance decision of Morse [1991] Crim LR 195; see also DPP v Rouse and DPP v Davis (1992) 94 Cr App R 185.

126 Cox (1993) 96 Cr App R 464; [1993] Crim LR 382; (1992) The Times, 2 December.

127 See Chapter 12, pp 1210–15, 1235 and 1239–41.

128 As pointed out at a number of points in Chapter 12, the evidence as to the advantage to the detainee of having the adviser present at the interview is of a rather mixed nature; see, e.g., comment on the solicitor's role at [1993] Crim LR 368.

129 [1988] QB 615; [1988] 2 All ER 315; [1988] 2 WLR 920, CA.

in question gave evidence that had he been present, he would have advised his client to remain silent in the last interview, whereas in fact Samuel made damaging admissions in that interview which formed the basis of the case against him. It could not be said with certainty that he would have confessed in any event: he was not, it was determined, a sophisticated criminal who was capable of judging for himself when to speak and when to remain silent. Thus – although this was not made explicit – the Court of Appeal was in effect prepared to make the judgment that a trial would be rendered unfair if a court associated itself with a breach of the PACE interrogation procedure. The Court of Appeal in Alladice,[130] also faced with a breach of s 58, accepted that the key factor in exercising discretion under s 78 after a breach of the interviewing rules was the causal relationship between breach and confession (and, it appeared by implication, between breach and fairness at the trial). On the basis of this factor, it was determined that the confession had been rightly admitted despite the breach of s 58 because no causal relationship between the two could be established. This finding was based partly on the defendant's evaluation of the situation (that he only wanted the solicitor to see fair play and did not require legal advice), and partly on the fact that he had exercised his right to silence at certain points. Therefore, it was determined that he would have made the incriminating admissions in any event – even with the benefit of legal advice. Possibly this was surprising in view of the fact that the appellant, as the court itself accepted, was an unsophisticated criminal who did in fact make admissions in the absence of a solicitor which formed the basis of the case against him.[131]

In the early post-PACE years, there was a tendency for judges to move rather rapidly from a finding that the police had breached Code C to a determination that s 78 should be invoked to exclude the confession, without explicitly considering whether a causal relationship between the breach and the confession existed.[132] Such a tendency can be discerned in the case of Absolam[133] in which the Court of Appeal, in finding that 'the prosecution would not have been in receipt of these admissions if the appropriate procedures had been followed', seemed to assume that the causal relationship between the impropriety[134] and the admissions did exist. The chain of causation would have been fairly long – had the detainee been informed of his right to legal advice, he would have exercised it; had he exercised it, he would not have made the incriminating admissions – but the Court of Appeal did not make much attempt to scrutinise its links.[135] However, 130 (1988) 87 Cr App R 380. The Court of Appeal appeared to have a similar test in mind in relation to a failure to caution in Weerdesteyn (1995) 1 Cr App R 405; [1995] Crim LR 239, CA.

131 See also Dunford (1990) 91 Cr App R 150; (1990) 140 NLJ 517, CA: the Court of Appeal determined that the criminally experienced appellant had made his own assessment of the situation in deciding to make certain admissions and legal advice would not have affected his decision; the failure to allow legal advice was not therefore causally linked to the confession.

132 See Williams [1989] Crim LR 66 and Mary Quayson [1989] Crim LR 218.

133 (1989) Cr App R 332.

134 A failure to inform Absolam of his right to legal advice in breach of Code C, para 3.1(ii).

135 Possibly, this may have arisen because the defendant had denied making the admissions in question; the court was therefore placed in the position of accepting the word of the police officer against that of the defendant – precisely the problem which Code C, para 11 was designed to prevent. The Court of Appeal, while speaking in the language of causation, may simply have had a doubt as to whether the admissions were made at all.

in Walsh,[136] the Court of Appeal reaffirmed the need to identify the causal relationship between the breach in question and the confession.

Deciding that an impropriety is causally linked to the confession does not of itself explain why admission of the confession will render the trial unfair, although it is perhaps reasonable to conclude that admission of a confession which is not so linked will not render the trial unfair. The necessary unfairness must arise through admission of the confession, in other words after its admission; the unfairness in the interrogation cannot therefore without more satisfy this requirement; instead, the unfairly obtained confession must be the agent which somehow creates unfairness at the trial. It must be acknowledged that at present the courts have not addressed this question. In Samuel, for example, the Court of Appeal merely stated:

> . . . the appellant was denied improperly one of the most important and fundamental rights of the citizen . . . if [the trial judge] had found a breach of s 58 he would have determined that admission of evidence as to the final interview would have 'such an adverse effect on the fairness of the proceedings' that he ought not to admit it.[137]

Broadly, it could be argued that if the court refuses to take the opportunity afforded by s 78 to put right what has occurred earlier in the process, this will give an appearance of unfairness to the trial. This argument is based on the 'protective principle':[138] if admissions gained in consequence of denial of a right (in the broad sense of an entitlement) are excluded, the particular right is being protected in the sense that the defendant is being placed at trial – as far as the jury is concerned – in the position he or she would have been in had the right not been denied. If s 78 is, at least in part, concerned with ensuring fairness to the defence, it is arguable that the court should take the opportunity offered to it of upholding the standards of fairness declared by PACE. However, following an argument based on the reputation or integrity principles, if the police unfairness has had no consequences for the defendant, the court need not exclude the confession since to do so would place him in a more favourable position than he would have been in had the proper standard of fairness been observed.

Admittedly, both these arguments assume that the court will appear to be associating itself unfairly with the prosecution, rather than dealing even-handedly, if it admits the evidence in question and that therefore, the court should refuse to do so. They therefore seem to beg the very question to which s 78 demands an answer. If admitting the confession despite the breach could be seen as fair, the court would not be associating itself with unfairness and could not be seen as lacking even-handedness. But bearing in mind the balance PACE is supposed to create between increased police powers and safeguards for suspects, it can perhaps be argued that to accept evidence deriving from an interview in which the police were able to use their powers to the full, but the defendant was unable to take advantage of an important safeguard, would not be perceived by most reasonable people as fair. The findings of the Privy Council in Mohammed (Allie) v State[139] in respect of a denial of custodial access to legal advice adopted this stance: 'The stamp of constitutionality on a citizen's rights is not meaningless: it is clear testimony that added value is attached to the protection of the right . . . Not every breach will result in a confession being excluded. But their Lordships make clear that the fact that there has been a breach of a constitutional right is a cogent factor militating in favour of the exclusion of the confession. In this way the constitutional character of the infringed right is respected and accorded a high value . . .' This stance receives clear, albeit indirect support from Strasbourg, as will be indicated below.[140]

136 [1989] Crim LR 822.
137 [1988] 2 WLR 920, p 934.
138 See Ashworth, A [1979] Crim LR 723.

In this context, the curtailment of the right to silence under the CJPOA, discussed in Chapter 12, is particularly significant. One result of its curtailment appears to be that it is harder to argue that an improper denial of access to legal advice should lead to exclusion of admissions obtained under s 78. This is because the main basis for excluding confessions gained after denial of legal advice has been eroded. Prior to curtailment of the right to silence, the courts had been excluding them mainly on the ground that had the legal adviser been present, he or she would probably have advised the client to remain silent, but if this cannot be contended, the causal relationship between breach and confession is destroyed. How far this is happening depends on the readiness of legal advisers to advise their clients to remain silent in the face of the knowledge that such silence may be commented on in court. At present, it is unclear that legal advisers are less disposed than they were previously to advise silence.[141] However, if such a tendency did become apparent, a number of consequences might follow. The police may have been encouraged to afford access to a legal adviser, but, on the other hand, any disincentive to deny access – the result of such decisions as Samuel and Absolam – has been undermined. The balance still comes down in favour of discouraging, delaying or denying access.[142]

If, on a voir dire, a court has to consider such a denial, it is harder than it was previously to contend confidently that the legal adviser would have advised the client to remain silent; the result is that the courts are finding themselves less able to uphold this particular safeguard for the suspect. Of course it might be said, in the light of a large amount of research,[143] that it was, even prior to the inception of the CJPOA, already becoming difficult to contend confidently that a legal adviser would have advised silence, except perhaps in cases where the client was under very obvious pressure.[144] However, that problem can be addressed by means of better training in the provision of custodial legal advice. The effect of curtailment of the right to silence, however, is probably in the long run to undermine one of the props holding up the legal advice scheme.

139 [1999] 2 WLR 552 (Trinidad and Tobago); judgment delivered by Lord Steyn on 8 December 1998.

140 See also Chapter 12, pp 1210–14.

141 See Chapter 12, pp 1229–36.

142 See Chapter 12, pp 1230–33.

143 See, e.g., McConville, M and Hodgson, J, Custodial Legal Advice and the Right to Silence, 1993, Royal Commission Study No 16. See further Chapter 12, pp 1228–34.

144 See Dixon's findings in this respect: [1991] PL 233, p 244: '. . . silence may be advised . . . when the suspect is confused or highly emotional . . . several solicitors stressed that their clients are under great pressure'.

Breach of rules aimed at ensuring that the record of an interview can be relied on at trial need not be considered under s 78 in terms of their impact on the defendant during the interview. The question is not normally whether the breach of the recording rules placed the defendant at a disadvantage during the interview. Once such a breach, of a substantial nature, has been identified, a court will be likely to react by excluding the confession on the basis that it is impossible to be sure of its reliability,[145] and therefore its prejudicial quality may outweigh its probative value. In other words, a jury may place reliance on an inaccurate record or believe a fabricated confession which clearly has no evidential value at all. An obvious example of such a breach is a failure to make contemporaneous notes of the interview in breach of Code C, para 11.7, allowing a challenge to the interview record by the defence on the basis that the police have fabricated all or part of it. The court then has no means of knowing which version of what was said is true, precisely the situation which Code C was designed to prevent. In such a situation, a judge may well exclude the interview record on the basis that it would be unfair to allow evidence of doubtful reliability to go before the jury. If, however, as in Dunn,[146] the defence has an independent witness to what occurred – usually a solicitor or solicitor's clerk – the judge may admit the confession as the defence now has a proper basis from which to challenge the police evidence.

It is fairly clear that allowing a confession which may have been fabricated to go before the jury may render a trial unfair. On the one hand, the jury may rely on a confession which may be entirely untrue, while on the other, if the defendant alleges that the police fabricated the confession, the prosecution can then put his character in issue and the jury may hear of his previous convictions. The jury may then tend to rely on his convictions in deciding that his guilt is established on this occasion. In both circumstances, the defendant is placed at a clear disadvantage.

When a breach of Code C has occurred which casts doubt on the accuracy of the interview record, the defence may not necessarily submit that the police have fabricated admissions; the judge may merely have to determine whether the trial will be rendered unfair if a possibly inaccurate record of an interview is admitted in evidence. There is authority to suggest that a judge in such circumstances will exclude the record,[147] presumably owing to the risk that the jury will rely on fabricated admissions.

As noted above, identifying the dominant function of the interviewing rule in question need not circumscribe the inquiry into the unfairness caused by its breach. Although identifying the dominant function of a rule may simplify this task in most circumstances, it is suggested that a court may sometimes focus on its subordinate function. For example, a breach of the recording provisions would be directly relevant to placing the suspect in a disadvantageous position at interview where there was no dispute between defence and prosecution as to the admissions made (although the defence may be alleging that they are untrue), but there was an allegation that the breach had allowed some impropriety to occur which had pressurised the suspect into making admissions. It may now be impossible to determine whether the defence or prosecution version of events during the interview is correct because of the defective record. Equally, access to legal advice can affect the evidential integrity of a confession: the legal adviser can give evidence in court as to what occurred during the interview and, if the interview record is defective, can support the defendant's version of what was said, thus lending support to the argument that the interview should be admitted. Conversely, if in such circumstances legal advice had been improperly denied, but the defendant was able to cope without advice, the unfairness would arise out of the inability of the defence to challenge the defective interview record, rather than due to the adverse effect of lack of advice.[148] In such instances, the subordinate function of the rule should determine the test to be applied. Thus, in the first example given, the only question would be whether the causal relationship between impropriety and confession could be established, assuming that it was impossible to determine the truth or otherwise of the allegation of impropriety.

145 See, e.g., Keenan [1989] 3 WLR 1193; [1989] 3 All ER 598, CA.
146 (1990) 91 Cr App R 237; [1990] Crim LR 572, CA. See also Heslop [1996] Crim LR 730.
147 Foster [1987] Crim LR 821; Keenan [1989] 3 All ER 598.

In the cases considered above, it was not clear that the police had deliberately failed to comply with the rules; the failures in question may have arisen out of a mistake as to the application of PACE or Code C or because of an administrative error. It seems that if the police have acted deliberately, the exercise under s 78 will be far less complex. Lord Lane CJ in Alladice[149] stated that he would not have hesitated to hold that the confession should have been excluded had it been demonstrated that the police had acted in bad faith in breaching s 58. The lack of emphasis that he thought should in general be placed on the causal relationship in question, if bad faith on the part of the police could be demonstrated, was the most striking feature of this decision. His approach appears to involve asking only whether a breach was accompanied by bad faith. If so, that would appear to be the end of the matter: exclusion of the confession would follow almost automatically. If the breach occurred in good faith, however, a close scrutiny of the causal relationship should follow.

Using the questions of bad faith and causation as alternatives to keep a check on a too ready exclusion of confessions can be criticised because it is hard to see why an instance of bad faith on the part of the police which is not causally linked to the confession should be considered in relation to its admissibility. Deliberate denial of rights certainly gives a greater appearance of unfairness to the interrogation than an innocent denial, but if the detainee is unaffected by it, why should it affect the trial? It cannot be said that the court is associating itself with or condoning the bad faith displayed by the police in the interrogation because the link between the admissions arising and the denial of rights is missing. If, in future, the situation which arose in Alladice recurs, but with the added ingredient of bad faith, it is hard to see why the consequences for the future defendant should differ so greatly. The only justification appears to be that the police are 'punished' for their deliberate impropriety, but the disciplinary approach has been explicitly repudiated, in Delaney[150] and Chalkley,[151] on the basis that it is not part of the proper purpose of a criminal trial to inquire into 148 This occurred in Dunn (1990) 91 Cr App R 237; [1990] Crim LR 572, CA. Ironically, the confession was admitted into evidence owing to the fact that the defendant's legal adviser had been present and could support his assertion that it had been fabricated; the jury presumably disbelieved her and convicted on that basis.

149 (1988) 87 Cr App R 380.

150 (1989) 88 Cr App R 339; (1988) The Times, 20 August, CA.

151 [1998] 2 All ER 155.

wrongdoing on the part of the police. Nevertheless, at present, deliberate breaches of Code C will almost certainly lead to exclusion of evidence under s 78 whether the breaches were linked to the confession or not. The Court of Appeal in Walsh[152] confirmed that this was the correct approach and suggested that it would be followed even if the breach was of a trivial nature. In fact, the dearth of cases on this point suggests that courts are reluctant to accept that a breach of PACE may have been perpetrated deliberately by the police; they appear to be satisfied that breaches arise due to administrative errors or incompetence rather than bad faith.

It may be noted that a judge may exceptionally admit the confession after deciding to exclude it because some particular feature of the trial proceedings makes it necessary to do so in order to maintain the balance of fairness between prosecution and defence.[153] In other words, if it was clear that in some way the prosecution is at a disadvantage which could be seen as equal to that experienced by the defendant, the judge might allow the confession to be admitted. This flows from the concern of s 78 with the fairness of the proceedings rather than simply with fairness to the defence. On the other hand, it does not appear that reconsidering the decision to admit the confession is covered by s 78 – in the sense of telling the jury to disregard the confession – due to its focus on determining whether to admit the confession (although s 82(3) might be invoked – see below).

Section 78: exclusion of non-confession evidence[154]

The discussion has shown that the courts have continued the common law tradition within the PACE scheme of excluding confessions tainted by impropriety, but they have shown great reluctance to exclude other evidence which is equally tainted. A stay will be used only in relation to certain instances of gross malpractice. The arguments above have concentrated on exclusion of admissions, but non-confession evidence can also be excluded under s 78 (or s 82(3)), although not under s 76. Where non-confession evidence is concerned, the courts have taken a stance which differs strongly from that taken to admissions obtained in police interviews which breach PACE. The general stance taken is that improperly obtained evidence is admissible in a criminal trial subject to a discretion to exclude it. Except in one instance – that of identification evidence – the discretion is viewed as very narrow, although where the impropriety consists of some forms of trickery, it may be wider. This stance has not changed under the HRA. Pre-HRA the courts demonstrated little inclination to take a different stance where the impropriety consisted of a breach of a Convention right,[155] and, following

152 [1989] Crim LR 822.

153 See Allen [1992] Crim LR 297: having decided to exclude a conversation between police officers and the defendant because of breaches of the recording provisions, the judge reconsidered when the nature of the defence case became apparent; it placed prosecution witnesses at an unfair disadvantage if they were unable to refer to the excluded conversation. Thus, it appears that in such circumstances the original unfairness caused to the defendant may be outweighed by unfairness to the prosecution if the confession is not admitted.

154 For discussion see Gelowitz (1990) 106 LQR 327; Choo, AL-T and Nash, S, 'What's the matter with s 78?' [1999] Crim LR 929–40. Choo (1989) 9(3) LS 261; Allen [1990] CLJ 80; Choo (1993) Journal of Crim Law 195; Sharpe, op. cit., fn 1, (1998) Chapter 2.

155 See the judgment of the House of Lords in Khan [1997] AC 558.

the Strasbourg jurisprudence, it is not necessary for that approach to change under the HRA, as discussed below.

Identification evidence

Identification evidence has been seen as particularly vulnerable and may therefore be treated in the same way as a confession obtained in breach of PACE. Arguments can be raised as to the reliability of identification evidence and also as to police impropriety in conducting identification. For example, if no reminder as to the availability of legal advice were given (Code D, para 3.17(ii)) before an identification was arranged, it could be argued that the form of the identification used prejudiced the position of the defendant, who would have asked for a different form had he had advice. It could be argued that no identification would have been made had the other form been used and that therefore, the failure to remind of the right to advice was causally linked to the identification evidence obtained. If some doubt is raised as to the reliability of the identification owing to delay[156] or to a failure to hold an identification parade where one was practicable,[157] the identification evidence is likely to be excluded. However, in the leading decision on identification evidence, Forbes,[158] the House of Lords found that despite a breach of Code D, para 2.3, there had been no need to exclude the evidence.

Thus, following this decision, each case must turn on its own facts, except where bad faith is shown in conducting the identification procedure. In such an instance, it seems that the courts will react to it as they would in relation to confessions.[159] It will mean that no causal relationship between the breach and the evidence obtained need be shown and, possibly, that the breach need not be substantial and significant. It may be argued that there is a stronger case than that considered above in relation to confessions for treating bad faith shown during the identification process with particular stringency owing to the appearance of unfairness created to the defendant who may think that there has been collusion between witnesses and the police.

Other non-confession evidence

On due process grounds, the argument accepted in Samuel[160] as to the causal relationship between an impropriety and a confession (where bad faith is not shown) should be applied to non-confession evidence, such as a weapon or drugs found on the suspect or his premises during an improper or unlawful search. However, the stance taken by the courts is based on crime control principles. Where non-confession evidence is in question, the discretion under s 78 is applied very narrowly. The first instance decision in Fennelly[161] in which a failure to give the reason for a stop and search led to exclusion of the heroin found is out of line with the later decisions. Indeed, even if 156 Quinn [1990] Crim LR 581, CA; (1990) The Times, 31 March.

157 Ladlow [1989] Crim LR 219.
158 [2001] Crim LR 649.
159 Finley [1993] Crim LR 50, CA.
160 [1988] QB 615.
161 [1989] Crim LR 142.

the principles developed under s 78 with respect to confession evidence were generally applied to other evidence, Fennelly would still be a doubtful decision since, on the facts, no causal relationship could exist between the impropriety in question and the evidence obtained.

According to Thomas[162] and Quinn,[163] physical evidence will be excluded only if obtained with deliberate illegality; the pre-PACE ruling of the House of Lords in Fox[164] would also lend support to this contention. In Fox, the police made a bona fide mistake as to their powers in effecting an unlawful arrest and the House of Lords, in determining that the physical evidence obtained was admissible, considered that the unlawful arrest was merely part of the history of the case and not the concern of the court. This stance is in accord with that taken in Sang[165] and confirmed as correct in Khan (Sultan).[166] It appears to be in accord with the general PACE scheme, since evidence obtained as a result of an inadmissible confession will be admissible under s 76(4).

Zander has pointed out,[167] citing, inter alia, Sharpe v DPP,[168] that the courts have rejected the 'real' evidence of intoxication in certain drink-driving cases under s 78 owing to the way in which the evidence was obtained, even where bad faith may not have been present. Zander views the Divisional Court decision in Sharpe, along with the decisions in cases such as Samuel and Gall[169] (on identification evidence) as affirming an abandonment of 'the amoral common law tradition of receiving non-confession evidence regardless of how it was obtained'.[170] However, it may now be said with some certainty that the amoral common law tradition has continued and will continue to prevail. The inception of the HRA has not affected this position.

The position as regards unlawfully obtained evidence, which reflects a crime control stance, is as stated by the House of Lords in Khan (Sultan),[171] now the leading case on s 78. It suggests that a narrow exclusionary discretion only is available under s 78, save where a confession may be said to be involuntary (in which case it would be excluded under s 76). A bugging device had been secretly installed on the outside of a house which Khan was visiting. Khan was suspected of involvement in the importation of prohibited drugs and the tape recording obtained from the listening device clearly showed that he was so involved. The case against him rested wholly on the tape recording. The defence argued, first, that the recording was inadmissible as evidence because the police had no statutory authority to place listening devices on private property and that therefore, such placement was a trespass and, further, that admission of the recording would breach Art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights, which protects the right to privacy. Secondly, it was argued that even if the recording was 162 [1990] Crim LR 269. See, to the same effect, Wright [1994] Crim LR 55.

163 [1990] Crim LR 581, CA.
164 [1986] AC 281; see to the same effect DPP v Wilson [1991] Crim LR 441. On similar facts, in Matto v Wolverhampton Crown Court [1987] RTR 337, physical evidence was excluded since the police had acted with mala fides.
165 [1980] AC 402; [1979] 2 All ER 1222, HL.
166 [1997] AC 558; [1996] 3 All ER 289.
167 Zander, op. cit., fn 1, 2nd edn, pp 236–37.
168 (1993) JP 595.
169 (1990) 90 Cr App R 64.
170 Zander, op. cit., fn 1, 2nd edn, p 236.
171 [1996] 3 All ER 289; (1996) 146 NLJ 1024. For comment, see Carter (1997) 113 LQR 468.

admissible, it should be excluded from evidence under s 78 because of the unfairness of admitting the evidence so. It was accepted in the Court of Appeal that trespass to the building had occurred as well as some damage to it and that there had been an invasion of privacy. However, the Court of Appeal found,[172] supporting the trial judge, that these factors were of slight significance and therefore were readily outweighed by the fact that the police had largely complied with the Home Office guidelines and that the offences involved were serious. The court found that since the Convention is not part of UK law, it was of only persuasive assistance.

The House of Lords upheld the Court of Appeal. The Lords relied on the decision in Sang[173] to the effect that improperly obtained evidence other than 'involuntary' confessions is admissible in a criminal trial. Involuntary confessions were inadmissible on the ground that if a defendant was in some way induced to confess during a police interrogation, his confession might be unreliable. It was argued for the appellant that the recording fell within the category of involuntary confessions and therefore was outside the rule from Sang. The House of Lords disagreed and went on to find that Sang would be inapplicable only if there were a right to privacy in UK law and breach of such a right could be treated as a form of impropriety different in kind from that covered by Sang and so serious that it would render evidence thereby obtained inadmissible. Neither of these two new principles was accepted; therefore, the recording was admissible.

Should the recording have been excluded under s 78, taking Art 8 into account? The House of Lords found that although a judge in exercising discretion under s 78 might take Art 8 into account; or any relevant foreign law, an apparent breach of Art 8 would not necessarily lead him or her to conclude that the evidence in question should be excluded. The key question would be the effect of the breach upon the fairness of the proceedings. The House of Lords concluded that the circumstances in which the evidence was obtained, even if they involved a breach of Art 8, were not such as to require exclusion of the evidence.

This decision confirms that, apart from admissions falling within s 76 of PACE (which has partly replaced the common law concept of involuntariness), improperly obtained evidence is admissible in criminal trials subject to a discretion to exclude it. Thus, it fails to take a stance which protects due process. The House of Lords was only prepared to find that the Convention would be 'relevant' to the exercise of discretion under s 78 and further found that where a breach of the Convention was found, this would not necessarily lead a judge to conclude that evidence should be excluded. In Chalkley,[174] the same stance was taken. The evidence consisted of incriminating statements made by the accused which were secretly recorded by the police. Despite the impropriety of the police actions, it was found that the evidence was rightly admitted. This stance did not change with the inception of the HRA. In AG's Reference (No 3 of 1999),[175] a rape case, DNA evidence against the suspect should have been destroyed but had not been, in breach of s 64 of PACE. The evidence was not admitted under s 78 and the defendant was acquitted. On a reference of the Attorney General, it was found by the House of Lords, following the Sang principle, that the evidence could 172 Khan [1996] 3 All ER 289; (1996) 146 NLJ 1024, HL; [1995] QB 27, CA.

173 [1980] AC 402; [1979] 2 All ER 1222.
174 [1998] 2 Cr App R 79.
175 [2001] 2 WLR 56.

have been admitted, despite the breach of PACE. It was not found that Art 6 affected the position, since the Court has left the assessment of evidence to the national courts. This stance was affirmed in later decisions.[176]

This current narrow interpretation of s 78 of PACE[177] means that improperly obtained non-confession evidence will rarely be excluded, whether or not the impropriety also amounted to a breach of a Convention right. In other words, the admission of evidence in such circumstances need not amount to a breach of Art 6. The findings in AG's Reference (No 3 of 1999)[178] suggest that at present, there is a tendency to reject the possibility of using exclusion of evidence to uphold fundamental rights. This seems to be the case even where such rights are recognised within a statutory scheme; and possibly also where the breach is of a Convention right. In Schenk v Switzerland[179] the Strasbourg Court found no breach of Art 6(1) when an illegally obtained incriminating tape recording was admitted in evidence, and made it clear that unlawfully obtained evidence is not necessarily inadmissible. The Court found: 'While Article 6 guarantees the right to a fair trial it does not lay down any rules as to admissibility of evidence as such, which is therefore primarily a matter of regulation under national law'. The test is to ask whether the trial as a whole would be rendered unfair if the 'tainted' evidence was admitted.[180]

In the late 1990s, a change in the Court's stance occurred, although the principle deriving from Schenk remained unaffected. A much more interventionist approach was adopted in a number of judgments, in particular that in Teixeira de Castro v Portugal.[181] The applicant, who had no criminal record and was previously unknown to the police, was introduced by a third party to two undercover police officers who told him that they wished to buy 20 grams of heroin. He bought the drugs on their behalf at a price allowing him to take a profit. He was then tried and convicted on the evidence of the officers of drug dealing and sentenced to six years' imprisonment. The Court found, by 8 votes to 1, that the entrapment by the police officers in order to secure evidence had made a fair trial impossible: 'right from the outset the applicant was definitively deprived of a fair trial.'[182]

In the context of exclusion of evidence, it might have been expected that where the pre-trial impropriety consisted of a fundamental breach of another Convention right, the Teixeira approach would have been followed. However, a Chamber of the Court did not adopt this stance in its important decision on admission of non-confession evidence under Art 6 in Khan v UK,[183] despite finding a breach of Art 8. A fundamental breach 176 See Button [2005] Crim LR 571. See further Ormerod, D, 'Trial remedies for Art 8 breaches?' [2003] Crim LR 61.

177 See Chalkley [1998] 2 All ER 155; Khan [1997] AC 558 and Shannon [2001] 1 WLR 51.

178 [2001] 2 WLR 56, p 64, per Lord Steyn, and p 65, per Lord Cook of Thorndon.

179 (1988) 13 EHRR 242.

180 A 140 (1988), para 46. This test was also used in Khan v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 310.

181 (1998) 28 EHRR 101; [1998] Crim LR 751. See also Van Mechelen v Netherlands (1998) 25 EHRR 647; the findings of the Commission and Court in Rowe and Davis (2000) 30 EHRR 1; Condron v UK (2001) 31 EHRR 1.

182 Ibid, para 39.

183 (2000) 8 BHRC 310; Commission decision: (1999) 27 EHRR CD 58.

of Art 8 (secret recording which was not in accordance with the law)[184] had occurred in obtaining the only evidence against the defendant, but, following Schenk,[185] no breach of Art 6 was found, owing to the admission of the evidence. The Court said that it was not its role to determine whether unlawfully obtained evidence should be admissible. Thus, the Court appears to adhere to two, partly conflicting views. First, if the pre-trial behaviour is such that the trial is almost bound to be unfair, a breach of Art 6 will be found. The Court has not characterised this issue as one relating to exclusion of evidence; it could relate to abuse of process. Secondly, where pre-trial practices, although consisting of a breach of another Convention right, are viewed as creating less unfairness to the accused, and the question of a breach of Art 6 arises in the form of the question of admissibility, the Court leaves the matter to the national courts. Possibly, the difference between these two positions is justifiable, but the Court has made little attempt to consider such justification. The case of Khan v UK[186] therefore can be utilised by the courts to support their stance in relation to non-confession evidence, despite the inception of the HRA.[187]

An argument for exclusion of evidence, taking account of Art 6(1) could also be raised where admitting material deriving from informers, although not illegally obtained, might affect the fairness of the trial,[188] particularly where part of the evidence and/or the identity of the informer was not disclosed to the defence.[189] The rules on disclosure under the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Act 1996 create a regime which allows sensitive material to be withheld by the prosecution so that neither the court nor the defence is aware of its existence.[190] Where this has occurred, argument for exclusion of the material from evidence based on Art 6 demands could be raised at first instance or on appeal, relying on the general requirements of fairness under Art 6(1) and on the 'equality of arms' principle.[191] The domestic courts are expected to test issues of admissibility of evidence and of disclosure more directly against the requirements of Art 6 than has generally occurred at Strasbourg, owing to the effect of the margin of appreciation doctrine.

Thus, it may be said that the common law, post-HRA, continues to adhere to the crime control values implicit in the reliability principle. The domestic decision in Khan may be consistent with certain of the decisions on evidence obtained in breach of the interviewing or identification rules since, in such instances, it may be said that

184 See Chapter 10, p 1077.

185 (1988) 13 EHRR 242.

186 (2000) 8 BHRC 310.

187 See also PG v UK [2002] Crim LR 308.

188 For detailed discussion see Justice, Under Surveillance: Covert Policing and Human Rights Standards, 1998, Chapter 2, especially pp 37–51 and Chapter 3, especially pp 70–74.

189 E.g., the evidence might be tainted owing to the motivation of the informer. In Windisch v Austria [1990] 13 EHRR 281 the Court said: 'the Convention does not preclude reliance, at the investigation stage, on sources such as anonymous informants. However, the subsequent use of their statements by the trial court to found a conviction is another matter.' But see Edwards v UK (1992) 15 EHRR 417 (it was found that the hearing in the CA remedied the failure of disclosure). These issues were, however, raised successfully under Art 6 in Rowe and Davis v UK (2000) 30 EHRR 1.

190 For discussion see Archbold: Criminal Pleading, Practice and Evidence, 1999, para 12–52.

191 In Jespers v Belgium, Appl No 8403/78, 27 DR 61, the Commission found that under Art 6(3), the accused has the right 'to have at his disposal . . . all relevant elements that have been or could have been collected by the relevant authorities'.

the evidence is unreliable.[192] However, Khan is not consistent with the decisions on excluding apparently reliable but improperly obtained confession evidence.

Thus, it seems that improperly obtained non-confession evidence, apart from identification evidence, will be admissible subject to a very narrow discretion to exclude it. This stance seems to afford encouragement to police officers to disregard suspects' rights in the pursuit of such evidence and amounts to a declaration by the courts that a conviction may be based on evidence which would not be before a court had police officers not acted unlawfully. In due process terms, a principled justification for creating a distinction between improperly obtained, but probably reliable, confession evidence and improperly obtained physical evidence is not apparent. The due process argument, to the effect that certain types of impropriety should lead almost automatically to exclusion of the evidence affected by them, has so far been rejected. However, the courts have not yet been faced, post-HRA, with non-confession evidence obtained through a breach of a Convention right. There are indications in Khan that in such circumstances, it might be excluded, on the basis of the integrity principle.

It is arguable, despite Khan v UK, that the stance currently taken towards non-confession evidence, including evidence obtained from informers and from other forms of surveillance, may not fully satisfy Art 6(1). As indicated, under domestic practice, evidence gained through a very serious impropriety, including a breach of a Convention right, is admissible, as is, under s 76(4) of PACE, physical evidence uncovered through an inadmissible confession gained as a result of impropriety, not excluding Art 3 treatment. The discretion to exclude non-confession evidence is very narrow and the impact which s 78 has had in encouraging adherence to due process may be diminishing at the present time. As L-T-Choo observes: 'recent decisions of the Court of Appeal signal a movement away from focusing on the nature of the breach [of PACE or the Codes] and towards an approach which takes the nature of the evidence as its central consideration'.[193] In other words, the movement is away from due process values and towards acceptance of the crime control norm that the end – a conviction – justifies the means. Until fairly recently, there were expectations that such movement could be reversed under Art 6 following an interpretation of the Teixeira approach to the effect that some forms of evidence gathering would almost automatically render the trial unfair.

From a due process perspective, such an activist interpretation of Art 6 has been urged, and some commentators have argued for a near-absolute rule requiring exclusion of evidence where it has been obtained in breach of a fundamental constitutional right or where its admission would breach the right to a fair trial.[194] Clearly, it was tempting to argue that Art 6 requires that a court should not merely inquire into the truth of the charges against a defendant: it should also play a part in maintaining standards in criminal investigations, in discouraging police abuse of power and upholding the due process elements within the investigative process which correspond to the rights of the detainee recognised under PACE and the TA.

192 See the comments of the Court of Appeal in Bray (1998) 31 July, unreported, to the effect that where the impropriety does not affect the quality of the evidence, it should be admitted.

193 Choo, AL-T and Nash, S, 'What's the matter with s 78?' [1999] Crim LR 929–40.

194 See, e.g., Ashworth, A, 'Article 6 and the fairness of trials' [1999] Crim LR 261, p 271.

Clearly, the requirements placed on the domestic courts depend on the view taken of the meaning of fairness under Art 6. Strasbourg and the domestic courts have united in finding that a breach of another Convention right, perpetrated pre-trial, does not automatically render the trial unfair.[195] Therefore, the fact that such a breach has occurred is part of the history of the case which can be taken into account in considering the proceedings as a whole, but which, except in the case of a breach of Art 3 in order to obtain a confession,[196] is not conclusive of the issue regarding fairness. The same argument applies to findings that flaws in the custodial and investigative procedures, including breaches of the PACE or TA Codes of Practice, not amounting in themselves to breaches of Convention rights, have occurred. They could be addressed, taking account of s 6 HRA, by means of exclusion of evidence or a stay for abuse of process, in order to avoid breaching Art 6(1), but only if it was possible to argue that the trial would otherwise be rendered unfair.

It was found in Khan that the admission of evidence obtained in breach of Art 8 did not create a breach of Art 6. It could be argued on a broad view of the decision that Teixeira de Castro is apparently out of accord with Khan since, in so far as the effect of the impropriety at issue in Teixeira might have been cured by exclusion of the evidence, the Court implied that there would be virtually no judicial discretion left to exercise to admit it.

Clearly, this is not the reading of Teixeira that the courts are adopting, as indicated above. But it is a possible reading. It is unfortunate that the Court did not address the question whether excluding the evidence obtained by entrapment would have rendered the trial fair. In the particular circumstances, the trial would probably have collapsed and therefore that question was of little import. But presumably, the Court itself wished to characterise the matter as one that did not reach into the question of exclusion of evidence since otherwise, it would have had to take a stance on the question of the assessment of evidence which it prefers to leave to the national court. But since it deliberately avoided the question of exclusion of evidence, it is arguable that in some circumstances the principle from Teixeira could be utilised to argue, not for the abandonment of the trial, but for exclusion of the evidence tainted by the unfairness. Moreover, there is a readily apparent argument to the effect that Khan v UK does not in fact imply that the failure to exclude evidence obtained in breach of a fundamental right meets nationally accepted standards of procedural justice, since Strasbourg merely decided that the assessment of evidence was for the national court. In other words, it conceded a margin of appreciation to the national court, leaving it free to take a different stance as to the exclusion of improperly obtained evidence.

A robust interpretation of the Art 6 guarantee of fairness, bearing Teixeira in mind, would support a requirement that an impropriety or illegality in the custodial or investigative procedures would tend to tip the scales towards exclusion of the evidence obtained as a result, including non-confession evidence.[197] The difference between the 196 Under s 76(2)(a).

195 Khan [1997] AC 558 and Khan v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 310.

197 In this context, the decision of the Court of Appeal in R v Radak and Others [1999] 1 Cr App R 187; (1999) The Times, 7 October should be noted. The decision related to admission of a written witness statement pursuant to the Criminal Justice Act 1988, ss 23, 25 and 26, and was concerned with prosecution rather than police impropriety. But the decision is of interest since the court relied heavily positions of the Strasbourg and the national courts would support such an interpretation. In particular, it could be found that breach of the Convention guarantees in the pre-trial procedures would make it probable that the trial would be rendered unfair if evidence deriving from the breach were not excluded.

If this interpretation were to be adopted, which currently appears to be very unlikely, it would mean that in so far as certain of the due process rights enshrined in PACE, the TA and their associated Codes reflect certain of the principles enshrined in Arts 3, 5, 6 or 8, their status might be enhanced. One particular effect would be that the PACE or TA Code provisions in question, as the detailed domestic embodiment of those rights, would be accorded de facto a higher value than their legal status would appear to warrant.

Evidence obtained by entrapment or other deceptions[198]

As indicated, Sang[199] stated the general rule that improperly obtained evidence other than 'involuntary' confessions is admissible in a criminal trial subject to a very narrow discretion to exclude it. The fact that the police have acted as agents provocateurs, entrapping the defendant into a crime he would not otherwise have committed, was not found in Sang to mean that the evidence gained thereby should be excluded. The position as regards tricks or undercover work by police that still prevails was stated by the Court of Appeal in Smurthwaite.[200] The mere fact that the evidence has been obtained in the course of an undercover operation, of necessity involving deceit, does not of itself require a judge to exclude it. Everything will depend on the particular circumstances in question. For example, how active or passive was the officer's role in obtaining the evidence? What is the nature of the evidence and is it unassailable? If the officer's role is active, the evidence will be viewed as having been obtained by entrapment or by an agent provocateur and will probably be excluded. Smurthwaite suggests that the discretion to exclude 'unfair' evidence is of a somewhat wider scope than that indicated in Sang.

However, in the majority of cases, evidence obtained by a deception has been admitted,[201] but where the deception 'creates' the evidence and it is not possible to say that the defendant has applied himself to the ruse, the courts will tend to exclude it.[202] In Williams and O'Hare v DPP,[203] police officers set up a 'virtue-testing' operation in order to see who might succumb to temptation. An insecure vehicle apparently loaded on Art 6(1) and (3)(d) in finding that the judge's discretion under s 26 had been wrongly exercised, since he had failed to safeguard the defendants' rights in accordance with the Art 6 requirements.

198 For discussion, see Sharpe [1994] Crim LR 793; Robertson, Crim LR 805; Heydon [1980] Crim LR 129; Birch, D 'Excluding Evidence from Entrapment: What is a "Fair Cop"?' (1994) 47 Current Legal Problems 73; Bradley, CM, The Failure of the Criminal Procedure Revolution, 1993, University of Pennsylvania Press; Choo, A L-T, Abuse of Process and Judicial Stays of Criminal Proceedings.

199 [1980] AC 402; [1979] All ER 1222, HL.

200 [1994] All ER 898; (1994) 98 Cr App R 437, CA.

201 See, e.g., Maclean and Kosten [1993] Crim LR 687; Gill and Ranuana [1991] Crim LR 358; Edwards [1991] Crim LR 45, CA.

202 See Colin Stagg (1994) unreported, but see news items in the Guardian, 15 September 1994, and The Independent, 15 September 1994; feature in The Independent on Sunday, 18 September 1994, p 16; see recent discussion: Cohen, N, Observer, 25 June 2006; H [1987] Crim LR 47.

203 [1993] Crim LR 775.

with cigarettes was left in a high crime area in order to catch would-be thieves. The resultant evidence was not excluded, since it was not found that it had been obtained by means of entrapment. The stance taken in Smurthwaite was confirmed by the House of Lords in Shannon[204] although the Lords took, it is suggested, a narrower view of practices amounting to entrapment. Reporters rather than undercover officers carried out a 'sting' operation in which evidence of drug dealing was obtained. Although it was arguable that the accused had, to an extent, been enticed into incriminating himself, the Lords found that the evidence thereby gained could rightly be viewed as admissible. It is suggested below that this stance is not fully in accord with that taken at Strasbourg.

In Mason,[205] the defendant had been tricked into confessing to damaging his neighbour's car by the police, who had falsely informed him and his solicitor that his fingerprints had been found on incriminating evidence. The Court of Appeal held that the confession should have been excluded under s 78: the trial judge had erred in omitting to take into account the deception practised on D's solicitor. The court appeared to view the deliberate deception practised by the police as the most significant factor without making it clear why the trial would be rendered unfair by admission of the confession gained thereby. It might have been better to have shown explicitly that the confession should be excluded on the basis that the police had acted improperly in deceiving the solicitor; the deception of the solicitor had resulted in receipt of the confession and the failure to exclude it meant that the court of first instance had, in effect, condoned the impropriety involved.

However, although deliberate impropriety may lead to the exclusion of evidence, it must, of course, be determined whether certain techniques will be designated improper. This issue has arisen particularly in the context of undercover police operations and secretly taped conversations. In Bailey,[206] investigating officers and the custody officer put on a charade intended to convince the suspects who had been charged that they did not wish to place them both in the same cell, which was bugged. This fooled the suspects who made incriminating admissions. It was submitted that the admissions should not have been admissible as undermining the spirit of Code C and especially the right to silence, since the men could not have been questioned by police at that point. However, the Court of Appeal rejected this argument on the basis that the evidence was reliable and that the conversation between the suspects could not be equated with a police interview. In other words, although there was a deception, and therefore the police could be viewed as passively recording a conversation that would have occurred anyway, that fact had no influence on the decision.

In Christou,[207] undercover police set up a jeweller's shop purporting to be willing to deal in stolen property and transactions with customers were recorded by means of recording equipment hidden in the shop. The police officers engaged in conversation with the defendants who came to sell recently stolen jewellery and asked them questions.

204 [2001] 1 WLR 51.

205 [1987] Crim LR 119; [1987] 3 All ER 481, CA; see also Woodall and Others [1989] Crim LR 288 in which the 'trick' consisted of allowing the detainee to think that an off-the-record interview could take place in the police station.

206 (1993) The Times, 22 March; [1993] 3 All ER 513.

207 [1992] QB 979; [1992] 4 All ER 559, CA. See also Williams and O'Hare v DPP [1993] Crim LR 775; Smurthwaite [1994] 1 All ER 898, CA.

They also asked the defendants to sign receipts for the jewellery. The defendants were convicted of handling stolen goods and appealed on the basis that all the evidence against them gained through the undercover operation should have been excluded either at common law under the principles enunciated in Sang[208] or under s 78 as obtained by deception: they would not have entered the shop had they known its true nature. This submission was rejected on the basis that the appellants had not been tricked, but had 'voluntarily applied themselves to the trick'; although specific deception had occurred, such as the request to sign the receipts, that was to be treated as part of the general deceit concerning the dishonest jeweller's shop. Therefore, the trick had not resulted in unfairness. The test for unfairness was the same at common law and under s 78.

It was also submitted that the conversations were an interview within the purview of Code of Practice C; the provisions applying to interviews should, therefore, have been followed. This submission was rejected on the basis that the Code provisions were intended to apply only where police officer and suspect were on an unequal footing because the officer was perceived to be in a position of authority. However, this was not to be taken as encouragement to officers to use undercover operations as a method of circumventing the Code provisions. In saying this, the court clearly recognised the danger that this ruling might encourage plain clothes police officers to operate secretly using hidden tape recorders to tape admissions, in preference to arresting openly and administering a caution. However, their remarks left open the possibility that such action, if cleverly enough disguised as a genuinely necessary undercover operation, could lead to circumvention of Code C and consequent erosion of the privilege against self-incrimination.

In Bryce,[209] the Court of Appeal was clearly fully alive to this danger. An undercover police officer posed as the buyer of a stolen car and, in conversation with the appellant, asked him questions designed to show that the car in question was stolen. The appellant allegedly gave incriminating replies. He was then arrested, refused to comment during the tape recorded interview, but allegedly made further admissions after the tape recorder had been turned off. He appealed against conviction on the ground that the evidence of the conversations and the interview was inadmissible under s 78. On the issue as to the admissibility of the conversation with the undercover officer, it was determined that the case differed from that of Christou on the following grounds: first, the questions asked went directly to the issue of dishonesty and were not necessary to the undercover operation; secondly, the possibility of concoction arose, whereas in Christou the conversations were taped. As to the unrecorded interview, the possibility of concoction clearly arose, owing to the suspicious willingness of the appellant to make admissions after refusing to do so during the recorded interview. Therefore, the judge at trial should have exercised discretion to exclude both the conversation and the unrecorded interview. Difficulty will arise after these two cases where it appears possible that a purported undercover operation has been used to circumvent the provisions of Code C, especially the need to caution, but the possibility of concoction does not arise, owing to the use of a hidden tape recorder. A court may have to draw a very fine line between questions asked going directly to the issue of guilt and those touching obliquely on it.

208 [1980] AC 402; [1979] 2 All ER 1222, HL.

209 [1992] 4 All ER 567; (1992) Cr App R 230; (1992) 142 NLJ 1161, CA.

The common theme running through the cases considered is the use of a deception of one sort or another. The courts have had to draw fine lines between degrees of deception in determining whether or not admission of the evidence obtained would render the trial unfair. A rather different stance is taken, as indicated above, towards instances of secret recording in which no positive deception occurs, those in which it may be said that the role of the police is confined only to recording a conversation which would have taken place in any event. In such instances, it cannot be said that the police deception is instrumental in obtaining the evidence except in the hypothetical sense: had the defendant applied his mind to the possibility of secret recording, he might not have made the admissions in question. Passive secret recording may thus be contrasted with instances in which the police, or someone acting on their behalf, have created a situation which makes it likely that admissions will be made where otherwise they would not have been. This distinction may have led the courts to accept evidence derived from secret recordings[210] (except in the case of telephone tapping, where special rules apply)[211] more readily than evidence deriving from a 'positive' deception, since in comparison with other forms of deception, secret recording seems to be at the lower end of the scale. Moreover, although evidence obtained from secret recordings may have the same inculpatory effect as a confession made in police custody, the courts seem to view the two methods of obtaining admissions differently. The tendency, which reflects the reliability principle, is to view secretly recorded evidence as unaffected by the manner of its acquisition, unlike admissions made to the police in an interview conducted in breach of PACE. However, although secret recording may be regarded as less improper than the use of a positive deception, it may involve other forms of impropriety. Thus, in focusing only or mainly on the reliability of evidence obtained, the courts have demonstrated a clear preference for crime control over due process.

As discussed above, Teixeira de Castro v Portugal[212] laid down quite a strict test in relation to evidence obtained by entrapment. Where there had been enticement by undercover officers to supply drugs, the applicant was found to have been 'definitively deprived of a fair trial'.[213] The case could be distinguished from Ludi v Switzerland,[214] in which no breach of Art 6 was found where a police officer had posed as a buyer in a drug deal which was already under way. The Court, therefore, did not find that undercover work of this type would inevitably affect the fairness of the trial. The test was whether the defendant could be said to be 'predisposed' to commit the offence in question. If so, unfairness would not be established. This test arguably differs slightly from the current one under UK law. As indicated above, if undercover officers give the defendant an opportunity to commit the offence where it appears that he would have committed it had the opportunity been offered by someone else, that is not entrapment;

210 See, e.g., Shaukat Ali (1991) The Times, 19 February; Chief Constable of West Yorkshire Police ex p Govell (1994) transcript from LEXIS; Effick (1992) 95 Cr App R 427, CA; [1994] 3 All ER 458, HL; Roberts (1997) 1 Cr App R 217.

211 See Preston [1993] 4 All ER 638; (1994) 98 Cr App R 405, HL. See now the scheme under RIPA 2000, s 17; discussed in Chapter 10, pp 1047–52.

212 (1998) 28 EHHR 101; [1998] Crim LR 751. See also Van Mechelen v Netherlands (1998) 25 EHRR 647; the findings of the Commission and Court in Rowe and Davis (2000) 30 EHRR 1; Condron v UK (2001) 31 EHRR 1.

213 Ibid, para 39.

214 (1993) 15 EHRR 173.

but it will amount to entrapment if they impliedly persuade him into it or otherwise can be said to instigate it. It is suggested that while Smurthwaite[215] is probably in harmony with the test as laid down by the Court in Teixeira, Williams and O'Hare v DPP is not, since it was not certain that the particular offences in question would have been committed without the intervention of those conducting the 'sting'.

However, the first domestic decision to apply Teixeira, Nottingham CC v Mohammed Amin,[216] gave it a restrictive interpretation in distinguishing it on somewhat narrow grounds. The respondent, who was driving an unlicensed motor vehicle, responded to a flagging down by two constables posing as members of the public; he took them to their destination, where the fare was paid over. He contended that the constables had not confined themselves to passive investigation but had incited him to commit the offence, thereby rendering the proceedings as a whole unfair. Lord Bingham found that he had not been pressured or incited into committing an offence. The basis on which it was found that flagging him down – a positive action – was not incitement to commit the offence is, it is suggested, unclear. The respondent had turned off his light, thereby indicating that he was not for hire. Similarly, in Shannon,[217] the Court of Appeal was unwilling to characterise the behaviour of the reporters as being that of agents provocateurs. But it was also found that even if their behaviour had crossed the borderline into that of an agent provocateur, it would not have been viewed as right to disturb the discretion of the judge to admit the evidence.[218] This stance was confirmed in AG's Reference (No 3 of 2000)[219] in which, on facts bearing quite a strong resemblance to those of Teixeira, it was found that the judge should not have stayed the trial, applying Teixeira, on the basis that the defendant had been encouraged to commit the offence in question by the undercover officers. Instead, it was found that the fact of enticement to commit the offence was not enough: a number of questions should have been asked concerning the defendant's freedom of choice and the extent to which he had been pressured into supplying drugs.

Thus, the key question appears to be whether the courts are prepared to express disapproval of certain evidence gathering techniques by excluding the evidence in question, as Teixeira arguably appears to require. In Shannon, the Court of Appeal appeared to be determined to view Teixeira as an abuse of process case rather than as applicable to exclusion of evidence, on the basis that to find otherwise would create a conflict with the finding of the Court in Schenk.[220] On this basis, the courts are able to disregard possible conflicts between the domestic basis for excluding evidence obtained by agent provocateurs and the Strasbourg basis, as expressed in Teixeira. It is suggested that determination to retain and maximise judicial discretion, allowing for the pursuit of crime control aims untrammelled by due process constraints imported from Strasbourg, provides the true reason for taking this view of Teixeira.

215 [1994] 1 All ER 898.
216 [2000] 1 WLR 1071; [2000] Crim LR 174.
217 [2001] 1 WLR 51.
218 Ibid, p 73, para 50.
219 [2001] Crim LR 645.
220 (1988) 13 EHRR 242.

Section 82(3): the common law discretion

Section 82(3) provides:

> Nothing in this part of the Act shall prejudice any power of a court to exclude evidence (whether by preventing questions from being put or otherwise) at its discretion.

This provision presumably preserves the whole of the common law discretion to exclude evidence, thanks to inclusion in it of the words 'or otherwise'. In practice, its role as regards exclusion of evidence is likely to be insignificant, owing to the width of s 78. However, a distinct function for s 82(3) was suggested in Sat-Bhambra;[221] it was held that ss 76 and 78 only operate before the evidence is led before the jury, but that s 82(3) can be invoked after that point. Similarly, Zander[222] argues that the common law discretion to exclude evidence is covered by both s 78 and s 82(3). Thus at present, s 82(3) may have a significant role to play only in preserving the judicial function of the judge in protecting witnesses or asking the jury to disregard evidence. The judge can at any point direct the jury to disregard evidence which has already been admitted and which may be unreliable.

In O'Leary,[223] May CJ expressed the view that s 82(3) rather than s 78 preserves the common law discretion to exclude unreliable evidence (presumably in circumstances falling outside s 76(2)(b)). However, it is hard to see how to separate the questions of the admissibility of unreliable evidence and of unfairness at the trial. Admission of unreliable evidence will always affect the trial. In Parris,[224] evidence which may have been fabricated by the police was excluded under s 78, not s 82(3). It appears likely that s 78 will continue to be used as a means of excluding unreliable evidence if s 76(2)(b) cannot be invoked.

Mentally handicapped defendants: special rules

As noted above, the confession of a suspect who is mentally disordered or of low intelligence may be rendered inadmissible under s 76(2)(b) if the interrogation is not conducted with particular propriety.[225] However, special rules will apply in the case of some mentally handicapped defendants. The confession of a mentally retarded defendant must be treated with particular caution. Under s 77, in such an instance, if the confession was not made in the presence of an independent person and if the case depends largely on the confession, the jury must be warned to exercise particular caution before convicting. (This does not apply to the mentally ill, although the Royal Commission has recommended that it should be extended to cover all categories of mentally disordered suspects.)[226]

221 (1988) JP Rep 365; (1988) Cr App R 55.

222 Zander, op. cit., fn 1 2nd edn, p 210. Case law has not identified a distinction between the functions of the two sections (see, e.g., Christou [1992] 4 All ER 559).

223 [1988] Crim LR 827, CA.

224 (1989) 9 Cr App R 68, CA.

225 See above, p 1274.

226 Report Proposal 85.

In some such instances, s 77 need not be invoked because the judge should withdraw the case from the jury. In McKenzie[227] the appellant, who was of subnormal intelligence and had sexual problems, was arrested and questioned about arson offences and about the killing of two elderly women. He made detailed admissions as to the arson offences and the two killings in a series of interviews. He also admitted to ten other killings which he had not committed. He appealed against his conviction for manslaughter and arson and it was held on appeal that where the prosecution case depends wholly on confession evidence, the defendant is significantly mentally handicapped and the confessions are unconvincing, the judge should withdraw the case from the jury. When these three tests were applied in the instant case in respect of the confessions to the killings, it was found that they were satisfied, the third largely by the doubt cast on the appellant's credibility owing to his confessions to killings he could not have committed. However, the first test was not satisfied in respect of the convictions for arson. Those convictions could therefore stand, but those for manslaughter were quashed. These rules are clearly of value as a means of affording protection to a group of persons who are least able to withstand pressure from the police and most likely to make a false confession. However, it is suggested that the second test could usefully be broadened so that it includes all those suffering from significant mental impairment at the time when the offences took place.

Conclusions: moving beyond due process and crime control

It was argued in the Introduction to this chapter that a more developed conception of criminal justice would take into account the interests of victims in dignity and in equality as well as the requirement of fairness to the accused. The issues of exclusion of evidence and of staying the proceedings provide a forum for considering what such a more developed conception might mean. Rape cases in particular highlight the problem of concentrating only on a gender-neutral account of the requirements of fairness to the accused, although the issues they raise also have a wider application.

It could be argued that where evidence which is reliable is crucial to the case, the Convention rights of the victim should be taken into account in making a determination as to its admittance or exclusion. If the accused walks free from court, the victim's life may be profoundly disrupted owing to psychological disturbance, fear, and physical constraints, such as feeling forced to move to a different area. She is likely to be profoundly affected in the free ordering of her life by the knowledge that the rapist is at large. These experiences may occur in any event, but there is a large body of evidence to the effect that the victim's recovery is affected by the conviction of the attacker,[228] while her physical security at the point at which she is psychologically most vulnerable will be affected by the fact that he has been imprisoned. Thus, it is argued that a developed conception of criminal justice would allow such considerations to be taken into account, under the rubrics of Arts 8, 14 and 3. The issue might be put squarely before the court if, for example, a women's campaigning group was allowed to intervene in order to argue that the courts' duty under s 6 of the HRA required it to take the victims' Convention rights into account.

227 [1993] 1 WLR 453; (1992) 142 NLJ 1162, CA.

228 See, e.g., Lees, S, Ruling Passions, Sexual Violence, Reputation and the Law, 1997, Open University Press; Sexual Violence: The Reality for Women, 1999, The Women's Press.

Similar considerations apply in respect of the victims of many offences. The victim of a serious violent offence may be said to suffer a violation of his or her right to security of the person and possibly to privacy and freedom of movement if an offender is acquitted, not on the basis of doubts about his or her guilt, but as a result of police impropriety. The victim of a racial attack, or the family of the victim, may experience a similar restriction. Article 2 might also be engaged. To take an extreme example: if, in the case of a trial for attempted murder, a court excluded, owing to a serious breach of Art 8, tape recorded evidence linking a defendant with a history of domestic violence to the attempted murder of his wife, the possibility of her subsequent murder could be viewed as engaging the duty of the court under s 6 of the HRA to abide by Art 2.[229]

Such arguments clearly look like crime-control arguments and they may well lead to the same outcome. However, feminist and victim-orientated arguments should not merely be co-opted by advocates of crime control.[230] The difference is that such arguments may be viewed as based on principle, while crime control arguments are purely consequentialist. While the crime control model would not allow for a nuanced, proportionate approach to exclusion of evidence since it would merely ask whether it was reliable, the approach which takes account of the victims' interests can be more nuanced since in some instances, the victims' interests could not be said to be engaged. The question is whether to elevate the concerns of Art 6 above those of Arts 8 or 3 or 14, which are, or may be, it is argued, engaged by the issues in question. Clearly, the court has a public duty to uphold standards of criminal justice which go beyond the interests of the victim.[231] However, strands of Convention jurisprudence are emerging which may allow for those interests to be taken into account in adoption of a nuanced approach.[232] The Convention provides a growing recognition of victims' rights.[233] In particular, there is now a significant body of jurisprudence recognising rights of victims and victims' families within the criminal justice system where the state is the 'attacker'.[234] Thus, there is a case for arguing, under the HRA, that the impact of a decision to exclude evidence or stay the proceedings should be considered from a perspective which is not bounded by Art 6 concerns alone.

While due process demands that improperly obtained evidence should be excluded, that the police officers involved should be disciplined or prosecuted, and, where appropriate, that compensation should be available, it is unclear that it demands, in principle, that a person who is factually guilty of an offence should be acquitted. If evidence is excluded and, as a result, the burden of proof cannot be discharged, acquittal must clearly follow. But methods of escaping from the conflicts of interest indicated 229 See Osman v UK (2000) 29 EHRR 245, discussed in Chapter 2, pp 41 and 62.

230 For discussion, see Whitty, N, Murphy, T and Livingstone, S, Civil Liberties Law, 2000, p 194; Young, J, The Exclusive Society: Social Exclusion, Crime and Difference in Late Modernity, 1999, Sage.

231 See Fenwick, H, 'Procedural rights of victims of crime: public or private ordering of the criminal justice process?' (1997) 60 MLR 317–33.

232 See further Chapter 2, pp 41–42.

233 See X and Y v Netherlands (1985) 8 EHRR 235.

234 Kaya v Turkey (1998-I) ECtHR 297; Akdivar v Turkey (1997) 23 EHRR 143; Mentes v Turkey (1997) 27 EHRR 595; Gulec v Turkey (1999) 28 EHRR 121; Cetin v Turkey (unreported); Tekin v Turkey RJD 1998-IV 53.

inherent in such exclusion should be sought. Such acquittals uphold the integrity of the criminal justice system since they demonstrate a refusal of the courts to associate themselves with a fundamental breach of rights, but they profoundly fail to address the interests of victims, also recognised at Strasbourg, their relatives, and the general societal interest in the prevention of crime. Moreover, although exclusion of evidence may have symbolic value in terms of integrity, it has not been viewed at Strasbourg as providing an effective remedy for breach of a Convention right,[235] and it clearly can have no impact on the overwhelming majority of cases in which the defendant pleads guilty. Given that, increasingly, the police know that the case is unlikely to come to trial,[236] the deterrent effect of exclusion, such as it is, may be diminishing. Even in cases that do come to trial, exclusion of evidence can have no impact where there is other evidence which can support the conviction. Stays for abuse of process are rarely used and arguably their use is arbitrary; therefore, they are unlikely to have a significant impact on police practice.

These arguments strengthen the case for further, more radical reform of the police complaints and disciplinary system and of CPS decision-making, since so doing would tend to discourage illegality and impropriety and enhance levels of adherence to the PACE rules, including the Code provisions. Arguments for exclusion of evidence on the basis of police impropriety might be raised less frequently. There is a further pragmatic reason for adopting this approach. The judges have made it clear that despite the inception of the HRA, they are wedded to the common law tradition of admitting evidence even if it has been obtained improperly. If anything, decisions such as Forbes and Shannon suggest that their determination to adhere to this tradition has been strengthened by the inception of the HRA. Possibly, this is another example of the common law resisting or subsuming the influence of the Convention. Maintenance of judicial discretion to react to the facts of particular cases remains the overwhelming priority and, in furtherance of this aim, the requirements of Art 6 have been minimised. Given that this clear pattern is now emerging, remedies must be sought elsewhere, while at the same time failures of police accountability should be used to press for organisational reforms.[237] The efficacy of such other remedies is considered below.

4 Tortious remedies[238]

Tort actions

Tort damages will be available as a result of some breaches of PACE, the TA and other relevant statutes. For example, if a police officer arrests a citizen where no reasonable suspicion arises under s 24 PACE, an action for false imprisonment will be available. Equally, such a remedy would be available if the Part IV provisions governing time 235 Khan v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 310, paras 44–47.

236 See further Sanders and Young, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 7.

237 See Sanders and Young, op. cit., fn 1, pp 724–30.

238 See Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, Civil Actions Against the Police, 3rd edn, 2003, for examples of recent damages awards. See also Sanders and Young, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 12, Part 3.

limits on detention were breached[239] or if a detention review failed to occur for a period of time.[240] Trespass to land or to goods will occur if the statutory provisions providing powers to search premises or seize goods are not followed. Malicious prosecution will be available where police have abused their powers in recommending prosecution to the Crown Prosecution Service. Also, one of the ancient 'malicious process torts' may be available where a malicious search or arrest has occurred, although in fact these actions are extremely rare and their continued existence is in doubt.[241] Such actions may not be brought because a claim of false imprisonment is preferred, but there is a distinction between malicious process torts and false imprisonment in that in the former case, but not the latter, all the proper procedural formalities will have been carried out. Actions for malicious prosecution are quite common, but the plaintiff carries quite a heavy burden in the need to prove that there was no reasonable or probable cause for the prosecution.[242] It may be that if the prosecution is brought on competent legal advice, this action will fail, but this is unclear.[243]

Almost the whole of the interviewing scheme, which is contained mainly in Codes C, E and H rather than in PACE or the TA, is unaffected by tortious remedies. Section 67(10) of PACE provides that no civil or criminal liability arises from a breach of the Codes of Practice. The same is true of the TA Codes under Sched 12, para 6 to the TA. This lack of a remedy also extends to some statutory provisions, in particular the most significant statutory interviewing provision, the entitlement to legal advice, arising under both PACE and the TA.[244] There is no tort of denial of access to legal advice; the only possible tortious action would be for breach of statutory duty. It might have been expected that an action for false imprisonment might lie where gross breaches of the questioning provisions had taken place, such as interviewing a person unlawfully held incommunicado: a detention in itself lawful might thereby be rendered unlawful. However, although the ruling in Middleweek v Chief Constable of Merseyside[245] gave some encouragement to such argument, it now seems to be ruled out by the decision in Weldon v Home Office[246] in the context of lawful detention in a prison. It seems likely, therefore, that access to legal advice, like the rest of the safeguards for interviewing, will continue to be unaffected by the availability of the pre-HRA tortious remedies although, as discussed below, action under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA might be possible.

Where actions in tort are available against the police, they may be of particular value owing to the willingness of the courts to accept that exemplary or punitive damages may sometimes be appropriate. Such damages are awarded to punish the defendant and 239 E.g., Edwards v Chief Constable of Avon and Somerset (1992) 9 March, unreported; the plaintiff was detained for 8 hours, 47 minutes following a lawful arrest. The detention was wrongful because it was 'unnecessary'; compensation was awarded.

240 In Roberts [1999] 1 WLR 662 the review took place two hours after it should have done. The Court of Appeal found that Roberts had been falsely imprisoned during those two hours even though it was found that, had the review taken place, he would have remained in detention.

241 See Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, Civil Actions Against the Police, 1st edn, 1987, p 284. For discussion, see Winfield, History of Conspiracy and Abuse of Legal Process, 1921.

242 See Glinskie v McIver [1962] AC 726.

243 Abbott v Refuge Assurance Co Ltd [1962] 1 QB 632.

244 See Chapter 12, p 1210.

245 [1992] AC 179; [1990] 3 WLR 481.

246 [1991] WLR 340, CA.

will be available only in two instances:[247] where there has been 'oppressive, arbitrary or unconstitutional behaviour by the servants of the government' or where the profit accruing to the defendant through his conduct may be greater than the compensation awarded to the plaintiff. Only the first of these two categories will be relevant in actions against the police, and in order that such damages should be available, the term 'servant of the government' has been broadly interpreted to include police officers.[248]

If a civil action is brought against an officer on the basis that he or she has acted ultra vires and the officer shows that the statutory conditions for the exercise of power were present, the onus lies on the plaintiff to establish the relevant facts (Greene v Home Secretary).[249] In Holgate-Mohammed v Duke (1984),[250] the House of Lords confirmed that, in addition to showing that the relevant statutory conditions are satisfied, the exercise of statutory powers by officers must not offend against Wednesbury principles; officers must not take irrelevant factors into account or fail to have regard to relevant ones; an exercise of discretion must not be so unreasonable that no reasonable officer could have exercised it in the manner in question. In Ministry of Defence ex p Smith and Others,[251] the Court of Appeal affirmed that in judging whether the decision-maker had decided unreasonably, the human rights context was important; the more substantial the interference with human rights, the more the court would require by way of justification before it was satisfied that the decision was reasonable. Under s 6 HRA, the question (which arises under s 7) is whether, in the exercise of discretionary powers, whether or not statute-based, the police breached a Convention right. Section 3 HRA is also relevant. This question is returned to below.

Quantum of damages

Civil actions against the police have in the past attracted high levels of damages. One of the highest awards was made in White v Metropolitan Police Comr.[252] Police officers unlawfully entered the home of a middle-aged black couple at night and attacked the plaintiffs. The police then charged both plaintiffs with various offences in order to cover up their own conduct. The plaintiffs were awarded £20,000 exemplary damages each and, respectively, £6,500 and £4,500 aggravated damages. One of the highest awards was made in Treadaway v Chief Constable of West Midlands:[253] £50,000, which included £40,000 exemplary damages, was awarded in respect of a serious assault perpetrated in order to obtain a confession. In 1996, a number of very high awards were made against the Metropolitan Police. In Goswell v Comr of Metropolitan Police[254] the plaintiff was awarded £120,000 damages for assault, £12,000 for false imprisonment and £170,000

247 This limitation was imposed by the House of Lords in Rookes v Barnard [1964] AC 1129, p 1226. Note that the Law Commission, Consultation Paper on Punitive Damages, Consultation No 132, 1993, advocates, in its provisional conclusion, retention of such damages, but that they should be placed on a more principled basis.

248 Broome v Cassell and Co [1972] AC 1027, at 1088.

249 [1942] AC 284, HL.

250 [1984] AC 437; [1984] 1 All ER 1054, HL.

251 [1996] 1 All ER 257; [1996] ICR 740.

252 (1982) The Times, 24 April.

253 (1994) The Times, 25 October.

254 (1996) the Guardian, 27 April.

exemplary damages for arbitrary and oppressive behaviour. Mr Goswell, who is black, was waiting in his car when a police officer approached. Goswell complained about the lack of police activity over an arson attack on his home. He was handcuffed to and then struck by the officer; the blow left a permanent scar. Goswell was then arrested for assault and threatening behaviour. He was cleared of these charges and then brought the successful civil action.

In Hsu v Comr of Metropolitan Police,[255] the plaintiff won £220,000 damages for assault and wrongful arrest at his home. In Kownacki v Comr of Metropolitan Police,[256] actions for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution against the Metropolitan Police were successful; 200 police invaded the plaintiff's pub and charged him with supplying cannabis and allowing the premises to be used for drug dealing. When the case came to trial, the prosecution offered no evidence and he was acquitted. As a result, he suffered depression and paranoia, which affected his work. The jury found that the officers had failed to prove that they had seen cannabis being openly smoked and sold on the premises during the surveillance operation; £108,750, including £45,000 of punitive damages, were awarded to reflect the jury's disapproval.

However, these high awards are no longer available. The question of the appropriate level of damages was addressed by the Court of Appeal in Thompson v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis.[257] The Court laid down guidelines for the award of damages which took as a starting-point a basic award of £500 for the first hour of unlawful detention, with decreasing amounts for subsequent hours. It was found that aggravated damages could be awarded where there were special features of the case, such as oppressive or humiliating conduct at the time of arrest. Such damages would start at around £1,000 but would not normally be more than twice the level of the basic damages. Exemplary damages should only be awarded where aggravated and basic damages together would not appear to provide a sufficient punishment. Exemplary damages would be not less than £5,000, but the total figure awarded as exemplary damages would not be expected to amount to more than the basic damages multiplied by three. The overall award should not exceed £50,000. In accordance with these guidelines, the award made in Hsu was reduced to £50,000.

The HRA and tortious liability

Sections 6 and 8 of the HRA require the courts to offer a remedy where a public authority violates the Convention rights,[258] unless in so doing it is acting in accordance with incompatible legislation.[259] As Chapter 11 indicated, Arts 3, 5, 8 and 14 potentially cover certain pre-trial rights of suspects, regardless of the trial context. Tortious liability arises and damages can be awarded under s 8 of the HRA if one or more of these Articles is found to have been breached in respect of police treatment of suspects. As indicated, some custodial treatment in breach of these Articles is already tortious

255 [1997] 2 All ER 762.
256 (1996) the Guardian, 30 April.
257 [1997] 2 All ER 762.
258 Sections 6(1), 7 and 8. For discussion, see Chapter 4, pp 215 et seq., esp 241–47.
259 Section 6(2). Section 3 requires that the legislation should rendered compatible with the Convention rights 'so far as it is possible to do so'.

under domestic law, and civil actions against the police have provided an increasingly significant means of creating some police accountability,[260] but this possibility is clearly of particular significance where domestic law currently fails to provide a tortious remedy in respect of the maltreatment of detainees.

The domestic courts may eventually have to reconsider their current approach to conditions of detention in terms of tortious liability. Prior to the inception of the HRA, so long as existing torts or offences, such as assault, were not committed in detention, it followed from the findings in Weldon v Home Office[261] that no means of redress in respect of adverse conditions, other than a complaint, was available. The possible creation of liability[262] under the Convention by means of a creative interpretation of the guarantee under Art 8 not only fills a gap in domestic law, it could in effect extend the Convention rights which, as noted above, do not on their face cover most conditions of detention. Such a course would not necessarily involve departing from the findings in Weldon v Home Office, since the liability would be for breach of a Convention right under s 6, using s 7(1)(a) of the HRA, not for false imprisonment. In any event, departure from case law is clearly possible under the HRA, relying on the duty of the court under s 6 and the effect of the Strasbourg jurisprudence under s 2.[263]

The HRA affects existing tort actions in three ways in this context where a tort operates in the same area as a Convention right. First, the powers that the police are relying on in order to prevent civil liability from arising can be interpreted under ss 3 and 6 HRA and the relevant right, more narrowly. Once this has occurred, the action may be found to be tortious, whereas pre-HRA it would have been non-tortious. Thus, where an existing tort action is brought which covers the same ground as a Convention right and relates to the exercise of discretionary powers by the police, it can be argued under s 7(1)(b) that the officer had breached the Convention right in their exercise and had therefore acted unlawfully. This is in essence a question of proportionality in relation to Art 8 or a question of the content and requirements of the right in relation to Arts 2, 3, 5 and 6.[264] Unless s 6(2) HRA applies to a statutory power, the action would succeed if the breach could be established, whether or not the exercise of the power appeared to have a statutory or common law basis. Alternatively, s 3 HRA can be relied on where the power is statute-based in order to show that once the provision in question is interpreted compatibly with the relevant Convention right(s), it does not provide the power to act as the officer did.

Second, the tort action itself should be interpreted compatibly with the Convention rights under s 6 HRA (if it is statute-based, s 3 would also be relevant). It is arguable that it should be aligned with the relevant Convention right, but in any event it should not be interpreted in such a way as to be found to be incompatible with that right.

260 See the Home Affairs Committee First Report 1997–98, Police Disciplinary and Complaints Procedures printed 16.12.97, which noted (para 32) the 'striking' rise in the cost of civil settlements for the Metropolitan Police, from £0.47m in 1991 to £2.69m in 1996. (This figure may decline owing to the decision in Thompson, [1997] 2 All ER 762.) The Police Action Lawyers Group and the Commission For Racial Equality attributed the rise to disillusionment with the complaints process.

261 [1990] 3 All ER 672.

262 Under HRA 1998, ss 6 and 7. The HRA does not allow for the creation of new criminal liability.

263 See, in a different context, Douglas v Hello! [2001] 2 WLR 992.

264 See further Chapter 2, p 40 et seq.

Third, where a Convention right covers the same ground as a tort action, the plaintiff may claim a cause of action under the tort and also under the right, relying on s 7(1)(a) HRA. So the ambit of the right and the width of any exceptions to it will form part of the judgment; Strasbourg case law and domestic case law on those matters will be taken into account. So where a tort action arises within the area covered by a Convention right, the right, and ss 6 and 7 HRA, have a triple impact. This triple effect is illustrated in the discussion of the following case. It is fully discussed in Chapter 8,[265] but parts of the discussion are highly relevant here so some repetition is unavoidable.

Austin and Saxby v Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis[266] concerned a political demonstration against capitalism and globalisation that was organised in the heart of the West End of London on May Day 2001. The police detained thousands of demonstrators for about seven hours by forming a cordon around them on the grounds of the need to prevent a threatened breach of the peace. The claimants brought a claim for damages, alleging false imprisonment and also deprivation of liberty, contrary to Art 5, European Convention on Human Rights, raising the claim under s 7 HRA. The issues under the tort action and under Art 5 were dealt with separately since, as discussed in Chapter 8, the judge found that different factors were relevant in both claims. The judge accepted that the tort must not be interpreted inconsistently with Art 5, under s 6. Clearly this would mean, under s 6, that a claim could not succeed under Art 5 but fail under the tort, although the converse would be possible. Much of the judgment concerned the extent of the powers to prevent a breach of the peace that the police relied on in order to justify the detention. Those aspects answer to the first aspect of the effect of the HRA on tort actions against the police, and are considered in Chapter 8.

Having considered the ambit of Art 5(1) and the width of the exception under Art 5(1)(c) – the third matter mentioned above – the detention was found to be justified under Art 5(1)(c). So the claims of breach of Art.5 were found to fail in respect of both claimants. It was found, in relation to the claim of false imprisonment, that the claimants had been imprisoned within the cordon, but that the police had a defence of necessity in so trapping them, which defeated the false imprisonment claim. The judge sought to ensure that the tort was interpreted compatibly with Art 5 under s 6 HRA, but as argued in Chapter 8, he fell into error in allowing a broad defence of necessity to operate, which it is argued in that chapter, is not in harmony with the exception under Art 5(1)(c).[267]

As indicated in Chapter 11, a breach of the Code-based safeguards applying to the exercise of a prima facie tortious power will not deprive it of lawful authority owing to the provision against civil liability for such a breach under s 67(10) of PACE and Sched 12, para 6 to the TA. This is also the case, a fortiori, where a police action which does not require lawful authority in order to avoid such liability breaches a Code provision. But where provisions of Arts 3, 8, 5 or 14 are coterminous with Code safeguards, liability to pay damages under the HRA for breach of the Convention guarantees might provide the Code provisions with a form of indirect protection, as the more detailed embodiment of the Convention requirements. Chapter 11 identified, at the relevant points, Convention guarantees, including aspects of the Art 3 requirements, which have no domestic statutory basis, but are recognised only in certain Code provisions.[268] The creation of tortious liability indirectly protective of such provisions under the HRA is a very significant matter, since it might lead to a regulation of police interviewing practices and techniques which has been largely absent from UK law.

265 See pp 763–71.

266 [2005] EWHC 480; [2005] HRLR 20; (2005) 155 NLJ 515, (2005) The Times April 14; 23 March 2005, Queen's Bench Division of the High Court.

267 See p 768.

However, at present it is very doubtful whether Art 6 itself can be viewed as providing free-standing rights. Possible breaches of Art 6 are currently addressed within the criminal process itself. The Strasbourg jurisprudence does not cover instances in which the pre-trial procedure is flawed in a manner which might be viewed, potentially, as infringing the Art 6(1) guarantee of a fair trial, but where no court action in fact occurs. However, given that certain of the rights, and in particular the implied right of access to custodial legal advice under Art 6(3)(c), clearly have value outside the trial context, an action based on s 7(1)(a) or on a breach of the statutory duty under s 58 of PACE, but raising Art (3)(c) arguments under s 7(1)(b), might resolve this issue in favour of the complainant, domestically.

The quantum of damages must be determined in accordance with the provisions of s 8 which include the requirement, under s 8(4) of the HRA, that the court should take into account the principles applied by the European Court of Human Rights in relation to the award of compensation.[269] As indicated in Chapter 4, reliance on such principles means that the level of damages awarded is fairly low;[270] in particular, the Court has not, formally, awarded exemplary or aggravated damages[271] and it is probably the case that exemplary damages are not available under the HRA.[272] But where the applicant has a coterminous tort action, such as false imprisonment, s 8 should not be used to detract from the level of damages which would have been awarded prior to enactment of the HRA.[273] It may be noted that Art 5(5) provides an independent right to compensation if Art 5 is breached, but this does not appear to add anything to the damages already available for false imprisonment.

Conclusions: value of civil actions

The value of civil actions against the police in terms of ensuring police accountability is limited for a variety of reasons.[274] The cost factor will deter most potential plaintiffs from suing the police, especially now that legal aid is unavailable for an increasing 268 See esp pp 1171–83.

269 See further Leigh, I and Lustgarten, L, 'Making rights real: the courts, remedies and the Human Rights Act' [1999] CLJ 509; Feldman, D, 'Remedies for violations of human rights under the Human Rights Act' (1998) EHRLR 691; Amos, M, 'Damages for breach of the Human Rights Act' (1999) EHRLR 178.

270 Non-pecuniary damages are likely to be in the range of £10,000–15,000: see Johnson v UK (1997) 27 EHRR 296.

271 B v UK A 136-D (1988), paras 7–12.

272 See Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, p 1437.

273 This follows from the HRA 1998, s 11.

274 It may be noted that if a civil action against a police officer is successful, he or she will not be personally liable. The Police Act 1964, s 48, provides that a chief constable will be vicariously liable in respect of torts committed by constables under his direction or control in the performance or purported performance of their functions.

section of the population.[275] There is a strong tendency to settle actions, which means that the police do not admit liability. Even where a civil action is successful, disciplinary charges are unlikely to be brought against the officers concerned. This has been justified by the police in the past on the basis of the differing standards of proof: civil claims need only be proved on the balance of probabilities while, until recently, disciplinary charges had to be proved beyond reasonable doubt. This is no longer the case, as explained below. Therefore, disciplinary action might be expected to follow a successful civil action, although there is no statutory requirement that it must do so, even in particularly serious cases. The high jury awards of damages in 1996 may reflect a growing public perception that the police are insufficiently accountable. If nothing else, a continuing propensity to make such awards might have helped to draw public and parliamentary attention to an unsatisfactory situation. However, the decision of the Court of Appeal in Thompson will make this less likely.

The HRA has not affected the quantum of damages or the practical problems of suing the police. There is clearly something anomalous about creating a vast, complex statutory or quasi-legislative edifice (PACE, the TA, the CJP, the Codes) which governs police powers and suspects' rights, but then failing to provide a remedy if those rights are breached, except where that breach is coterminous with an existing area of tortious liability. Thus the HRA can, in theory, have a significant impact in respect of civil liability, since it has created for the first time under ss 7(1)(a) and 8 a remedy in damages where Convention rights are breached in custody by the police, whether or not existing tortious liability would arise. Moreover, the Convention rights now provide the parameters within which discretionary powers must be exercised, under s 6 of the HRA.

5 Complaints against the police and disciplinary action[276]

The current scheme[277]

Background[278]

Clearly, the police complaints and disciplinary system provides a potential method of ensuring that the police adhere to the safeguards created by PACE, as amended, and the 275 See Legal Action, April 2000, p 34; for discussion, see Hansen, O, 'A future for legal aid?' (1992) 19 JLS 85; see also Sanders and Young, op. cit., fn 1, p 680.

276 See Maguire, M, 'Complaints against the police: the British experience', in Goldsmith, A (ed), Complaints Against the Police: A Comparative Study, 1990, Clarendon; Greaves [1985] Crim LR; Khan (1984) 129 SJ 455; Williams [1985] Crim LR 115; Lustgarten, L, The Governance of Police, 1986, pp 139–40. The Runciman Commission considered that the existing arrangements probably do not command public confidence: Cm 2263, p 46; Harrison, J, Police Misconduct: Legal Remedies, 1987, Legal Action Group; Triennial Review of the PCA 1991–94, HC 396 (1994–95); Home Affairs Committee Fourth Report, HC 179 (1991–92); Sanders, A and Young, R, Criminal Justice, 3rd edn, 2007, Chapter 12, Part 4; House of Commons Home Affairs Select Committee, Police Disciplinary and Complaints Procedure, First Report, HC-258–1 (1998).

277 See further R Stone Civil Liberties and Human Rights, 6th edn, 2006, Chapter 4.6.3; Complaints Against the Police: A Framework for a New System – available from the Home Office website: www.homeoffice.gov.uk.

278 See further: Goldsmith, AJ, Complaints Against the Police: The Trend to External Review, 1991; Goldsmith, AJ, 'Necessary but Not Sufficient: The Role of Public Complaints Procedures in Police Accountability', in Stenning, P C, (ed), Accountability for Criminal Justice, 1995, University of Toronto Press,

TA. PACE set up the Police Complaints Authority (PCA) as an independent body with an involvement in the complaints and disciplinary system, replacing the Police Complaints Board (PCB), which was set up under the Police Act 1976.[279] The idea was to afford an appearance of independence to the system. The scheme set up by PACE for dealing with complaints, contained in ss 83–106, was repealed and re-enacted in the Police Act 1996.[280] A new scheme was subsequently introduced under the Police Reform Act 2002. Under s 67(2) of the Police Act 1996, a complaint went in the first instance to the Chief Officer of Police of the force in question, who had to determine by reference to the section whether or not he was the appropriate person to deal with it and whether it, in fact, constituted a complaint about 'the conduct of an officer' and not about 'the direction or control' of a police force.[281] The decision as to the side of the dividing line on which a particular complaint fell was made by the police force complained about. Therefore, at the very outset, 'an issue of independence [arose]'.[282]

A complaint had to be referred to the PCA if it concerned serious misconduct.[283] Under s 75(3) of the 1996 Act, if the Chief Officer determined that the report on the complaints investigation indicated that a criminal offence might have been committed, he had to send a copy of it to the DPP. In addition, there was a discretionary power to refer complaints to the PCA. It did not carry out the investigation itself in such cases, but supervised it and received a report at the end of it under s 72. Thus, its role in relation to complaints was very limited. Independence was lacking in other respects: the remuneration system was under the control of the Home Secretary,[284] and under s 83 of the Police Act 1996, his guiding role was retained. Under s 69(5),[285] a member of the force which was the subject of the complaint could conduct the investigation

The changes to the complaints procedure which occurred in the mid-1990s, partly in response to the Runciman Royal Commission Report, did not involve any radical reform. In particular, they did not include the introduction of a new, independent element into the process. The Police and Magistrates' Courts Act 1994, which was then consolidated in the Police Act 1996, made only limited changes to the functions and powers of the PCA. Under s 37(a) of the 1994 Act, a breach of the PACE Codes became no longer automatically a breach of the Police Discipline Code.[286] This change could be seen merely as legitimising police working practices, since it appeared that very few complaints in respect of breaches of the Codes were made; those that were rarely led to disciplinary proceedings. Unsurprisingly, this trend continued after the 1994 Act came into force.[287] Part IV of the Police Act 1996, which then created pp 110–34; Prenzler, T and Ronken, C, (2001), 'Models of Police Over sight: A Critique', Policing and Society, 11/3: pp 151–80.

279 The operation of the PCB did not create confidence in the complaints system: see Brown, Police Complaints Procedure, Home Office Research Study No 93, 1987.

280 Which came into force on 1 April 1999, replacing PACE 1984, Part IX.

281 PACE 1984, s 84(4) and (5). The requirement regarding 'the conduct of a police officer' then arose under s 65 of the 1996 Act.

282 Home Affairs Committee First Report (1997–98), para 47.

283 Police Act 1996, s 70, formerly PACE 1984, s 87(4).

284 See PCA Report 1998–99 Appendix C, para 5.

285 Which has replaced PACE 1984, s 105(4).

286 Section 37(a) repealed PACE 1984, s 67(8).

287 E.g., the PCA Report for 1998–99 showed that there were 107 complaints relating to breach of Code A, governing stop and search in the period. One led to disciplinary charges (Table 5, p 13).

the scheme governing complaints and discipline, did not affect this position; it was merely a consolidating, not a reforming, measure.

The 1997 Report of the Select Committee on Home Affairs[288] made a number of recommendations, reflecting a number of the criticisms as to lack of independence, and the Home Secretary, Jack Straw, said that he had accepted the case for speedy reform. But the initial proposals for reform[289] mirrored the moderate changes proposed by the Conservative Government in 1993.[290] Racist language and behaviour is now a breach of the police code of conduct, but it is not yet possible to determine how far reaching such change might be. It might also lead to a breach of the Race Relations Act 1976, as amended.[291]

The PCA in its 1998–99 Report noted that further, more radical changes, in particular the 'use of non-police investigators in exceptional cases', although accepted by the Home Secretary in principle, had been relegated to future legislation. The PCA concluded that there was no prospect of early legislation and mentioned its unsuccessful attempts to make the more non-controversial changes by means of Private Members' Bills.[292]

The House of Commons Home Affairs Committee[293] found 'perhaps the most telling evidence that all is not well . . . comes from the opinion of almost all the parties involved';[294] they concluded: 'there is a great deal of justified dissatisfaction with elements of the disciplinary and complaints system.'[295] These criticisms echo those which have, for a number of years, been directed against the whole police disciplinary process, including the hearings, and it is generally agreed that the present system is defective as a means of redress.[296] Maguire and Corbett conducted a review of the operation of the complaints system from 1968 to 1988[297] which found that the majority of complainants were dissatisfied and that the public did not have confidence in the system. The Runciman Commission considered that the existing arrangements probably do not command public confidence.[298]

288 HC 258-I (1997–98).
289 HC 683 (1997–98).
290 The government issued a consultation paper in April 1993 which included various proposals, including abolition of the criminal standard of proof in discipline cases and the double jeopardy rule, which meant that criminal proceedings against officers were not followed by disciplinary proceedings. See 143 NLJ 591; in its Triennial Review 1988–91, HC 352, 1991, the PCA also made this proposal. The Labour proposals also addressed the tendency of police officers who are facing disciplinary charges to take extended sick leave and/or early retirement, thereby evading the disciplinary process.
291 See Chapter 15, pp 1508–10.
292 PCA Report (1998–99), p 53.
293 Home Affairs Committee, HC 258-I (1997–98).
294 Paragraph 35.
295 Paragraph 40.
296 See Greaves [1985] Crim LR; Khan (1984) 129 SJ 455; Williams [1985] Crim LR 115; Lustgarten, L, The Governance of Police, 1986, pp 139–40; Harrison and Cragg (1993) 143 NLJ 591; Maguire, A Study of the Police Complaints System, 1991, Stationery; RCCJ Report, Cm 2263, p 46; Kennedy, H, in Walker, C and Starmer, K (eds), Miscarriages of Justice: A Review of Justice in Error, 1999, p 374; Goldsmith, A, External Review and Self Regulation: Complaints Against the Police – The Trend to External Review, 1988; Harrison, J and Cuneen, M, An Independent Police Complaints Commission, 2000.
297 A Study of the Police Complaints System, 1991.
298 RCCJ Report, Cm 2263, p 46.

Prior to the introduction of the Police Reform Act 2002 a strong consensus had emerged that the independent element in the complaints and disciplinary process was too weak and was the key factor in the inefficacy of the system.[299] Maguire and Corbett commented in their 1991 review that an independent system might lead to an improvement in public confidence in the system, although they expressed doubts about its efficacy in other respects.[300] The MacPherson Report recommended that there should be an independent tribunal for serious complaints.[301] Morgan and Newburn found: 'The fact that most complaints . . . continue to be investigated exclusively by the police themselves is almost certainly an important factor in explaining why so few complaints are made compared with the proportion of members of the public who report having felt like making a complaint.'[302] The Police Action Lawyers Group stated: 'the fundamental problem . . . is the lack of independence in the system.'[303] The House of Commons Home Affairs Committee found that the introduction of an independent element is desirable in principle.[304] Doubts were expressed, however, taking into account experience from other jurisdictions, about the efficacy of a completely independent investigatory body,[305] but prior to the issuing of the Consultation Paper in 2000, there appeared to be a degree of consensus regarding the need for a stronger element of independence which could be achieved through the co-operation of police and expert civilian investigators, drawn from the ranks of bodies such as lawyers and customs officials.

The Police Reform Act 2002

In 2000, the government commissioned a feasibility study into the practicality of using independent investigators in exceptional cases,[306] and put proposals to use such investigators to the annual Police Federation Conference in May 2000.[307] The government issued a Consultation Paper Complaints against the Police in 2000 which proposed importing greater independence into the system, by means of a new body, 299 Sanders and Young, op. cit., fn 1, p 702; Kennedy, H, in Walker, C and Starmer, K (eds), Miscarriages of Justice: A Review of Justice in Error, at 374, 1999; Bailey, SH, Harris, DJ and Ormerod, DC, Bailey, Harris and Jones: Civil Liberties: Cases and Materials, 5th edn, 2002, Chapter 2 at pp 122–39.

300 A Study of the Police Complaints System, 1991.

301 Cm 4262-I, 1999, Recommendation 58.

302 The Future of Policing, 1997, p 53; finding based on Skogan, W, Contacts between Police and Public: Findings from the 1992 British Crime Survey, HO Research Study No 134, 1994.

303 Home Affairs Committee Report, para 43.

304 Home Affairs Committee, HC 258-I (1997–98), Recommendation 11.

305 See Goldsmith, A, External Review and Self Regulation: Complaints Against the Police – The Trend to External Review, 1988; Maguire, M, 'Complaints against the police: the British experience', in Goldsmith, A (ed), Complaints Against the Police: A Comparative Study, 1990; Loveday, B, 'Police complaints in the USA' (1988) 4 Policing 172.

306 The study was conducted by the consultants KPMG. They reported on 17 May 2000; their report was accompanied by an independent report by Liberty, recommending the setting up of an independent body to hear police complaints.

307 On 17 May 2000. For comparative discussion of this possibility, see Goldsmith, A and Lewis, C (eds), Civilian Oversight of Policing, 2000, Hart.

the Independent Police Complaints Commission,[308] but made it clear that in the vast majority of cases, a full independent investigation would not occur, owing to cost. The Home Office Consultation Paper 2000[309] accepted that the system had failed to win public confidence.

The result of the consultation was the Police Reform Act 2002, Part 2 and Sched 3, which came into force April 2004 and made certain changes to the previous system, intended to increase public confidence in the police and in particular in the complaints system.[310] One of its aims was to make investigations more open, timely, proportionate and fair. Under Sched 3 Police Reform Act 2002, a complaint may be received in the first instance by the Chief Constable, the police authority or the new Independent Police Complaints Commission (IPCC). It must then be determined who is the 'appropriate authority' for the purposes of the investigation (Sched 3, para 1). This will normally be the Chief Constable of the force in question. The Chief Constable then appoints an officer to carry out a formal investigation, unless the complaint can be informally resolved. Therefore, it is still fair to say, despite the reforms, that an issue of independence arises at the beginning of the process.[311] Informal resolution can only occur if the complainant consents and the authority is satisfied that, even if the complaint is proved, no criminal or disciplinary proceedings would be appropriate (Sched 3, para 6).

A complaint must be referred to the IPCC if the alleged misconduct resulted in death or serious injury, (Sched 3, para 6) or where the Secretary of State has provided by regulations that the investigation of the complaint must be supervised by the IPCC (intended to be in the case of more serious misconduct). In addition, there is a discretionary power to refer complaints to the PCA and it can require a complaint to be referred to it. Where a complaint is referred to it the IPCC decides on the procedure (Sched 3, para 15). It can carry out the investigation itself using its own staff where a complaint is referred to it. This is the key difference from the previous scheme. It can also supervise or manage the investigation by the appropriate authority and then receive a report at the end of it. The appropriate authority can also carry out the investigation on behalf of the IPCC. If it appears once an investigation has been completed that a criminal offence may have been committed, the case must be referred to the DPP.

The procedure at the hearing is now governed by the Police (Conduct) Regulations 2004 which repealed the regulations introduced in April 1999.[312] The 1999 Regulations followed up the initial Labour proposals for reform,[313] including in particular abolition of the criminal standard of proof in disciplinary proceedings.[314] The 2004 Regulations do not create radical changes but do improve the position of the complainant to an extent. Under the procedure as governed by the 1999 Regulations, the hearing was private, 308 Complaints against the Police: A Consultation Paper, 2000. See proposals: HL Deb, Vol 620, col WA45, 19.12.00.

309 London, Home Office, 2000.

310 For criticism of the new scheme, see Sanders and Young Criminal Justice, 3rd edn, 2007, Chapter 12.4.

311 Home Affairs Committee First Report (1997–98), para 47.

312 The Police (Conduct) Regulations 1999. The procedures operated alongside the 1995 ones until March 2000, when the transitional arrangements ended; all cases were then dealt with under the 1999 procedures. The 2004 Regulations are contained in SI 845 and now govern the procedure.

313 HC 683 (1997–98).

314 Op. cit., fn 312, reg 27(3)(b) (previously reg 23(3)).

but the complainant could attend the proceedings although not before his evidence was given.[315] Now he or she can attend for the full hearing but can be excluded on public interest grounds if there are sensitivities regarding the evidence.[316] The hearing is still conducted in private, which does not aid in creating public confidence in the system, but provision is made for it to be conducted in public in exceptional circumstances,[317] and for the participation of the IPCC.[318] The complainant is allowed to cross-examine the officer concerned; cross examination of witnesses generally is not expressly covered.[319]

The key change under the reformed scheme is that the police are for the first time subject to external investigation. Nevertheless, it is probable that in the majority of cases, due to lack of resources, the IPCC's role in relation to the investigation – as opposed to the supervision – of complaints will tend to remain limited. Many complaints will never be referred to the IPCC but will remain in the hands of the police force in question. Thus despite the involvement (albeit limited) of the Independent Police Complaints Commission, introduced by the 2002 Act, with a view to creating a stronger independent element in the system, the complaints procedure is still largely administered by the police themselves. Although the system contains this independent element, a number of problems remain even in relation to those exceptional cases in which independent investigation by civilian investigators occurs. Institutional factors, including obstruction of the system by the police and the possibility that civilian investigators will be affected by police culture, may continue to hamper the system; the success rate may remain low.[320] As Sanders and Young argue, the IPCC is in the same position as the PCA since in general it relies on reports of the facts of a case, compiled by police officers. The police concerned use various techniques to discredit a complaint, constructing the case in a manner that justifies no further action.[321]

Thus, despite evidence of police malpractice from miscarriage of justice cases such as that of the Birmingham Six[322] and the subsequent indications discussed above of poor practice and deliberate wrong-doing within the police service, the system for accountability remains, in essentials, the same since the new element of independence is unlikely to have any impact in the majority of instances. As Smith argues, '. . . the complaints reform programme has been driven by the prevailing managerialist orthodoxy and the principal effect of the legislation will be to transfer some responsibilities for the management of police complaints to another public body which will report directly to 315 Ibid, reg 25(3).

316 A number of provisions, however, previously allowed for the exclusion of the complainant: under reg 25(5) the complainant could be removed if he interrupted. Now under reg 31 (previously reg 27) he can be excluded if matters arise which it would not be in the public interest to disclose to him.

317 Reg 30(5): Where a case arises from a complaint or conduct matter which has been investigated under para 19 of Sched 3 to the 2002 Act and the Commission considers that because of its gravity or other exceptional circumstances it would be in the public interest to do so, the Commission may, having consulted the appropriate authority, the officer concerned, the complainant and any witnesses, direct that the whole or part of the hearing will be held in public.

318 Reg 25.

319 Ibid, reg 25(4). Now reg 29(5) but this only covers cross examination of the officer concerned.

320 See Harrison, J and Cuneen, M, An Independent Police Complaints Commission, 2000; Goldsmith, A and Faran, S, 'Complaints against the police in Canada: a new approach' [1987] Crim LR 615.

321 See Sanders and Young, Criminal Justice, 3rd edn, 2007, at p 615.

322 See R v McIlkenny and Others [1992] 2 All ER 417.

the Home Secretary'.[323] The system still raises various serious issues under the HRA. It does not generate confidence that it will play a significant part in ensuring that police officers and forces act in compliance with the Convention. In so far as the Convention rights are reflected in the safeguards for suspects contained in PACE, the TA and their associated Codes, it is not fully apparent that it can ensure adherence to them.

Where officers are placed under investigation with a view to disciplinary charges, they may take early retirement or resign on medical grounds. After the MacPherson Report[324] into the Stephen Lawrence case, disciplinary charges were recommended against five officers involved. All, however, retired and therefore could not face charges. The Home Office has considered the possibility of disciplinary action up to five years after retirement.[325] In the wake of the MacPherson Report, and with the inception of the new complaints system, racist police behaviour may begin to lead more frequently to disciplinary charges,[326] as well as liability under the Race Relations Act 1976, as amended, although such a trend cannot yet be discerned.[327] There remains a disconnection between successful civil actions against the police and disciplinary action or prosecution.[328] For example, in the Hsu case,[329] it was found that Mr Hsu was assaulted, racially abused and falsely arrested. It was accepted that the police officers in question had lied on oath and fabricated note-book entries. Mr Hsu was awarded £200,000 damages (reduced on appeal to £35,000), but no officer was disciplined.[330]

Probability of disciplinary action after a complaint

Under the pre-2004 system, the overwhelming majority of complaints did not result in disciplinary proceedings: as many as 30 per cent of complaints were dealt with by 323 Smith, G, 'Rethinking Police Complaints' Brit J Crminol. (2004) 44, 15–33, at p 28.

324 Cm 4262-I, 1999.

325 MacPherson Report, Recommendations 55–57.

326 E.g., in February 2000 a police officer, PC Hutt, was disciplined and dismissed from the force for oppressive, racist behaviour (news report, 22 February 2000).

327 The 1998–99 Annual Report of the PCA, Table 5: 2,415 complaints concerned assaults; 81 disciplinary charges were preferred. 203 complaints concerned racially discriminatory behaviour; three charges were preferred. There is quite a lot of evidence that stop and search is still carried out in a racially discriminatory fashion: see Chapter 11, p 1125–26.

328 The Butler Report, 1998, criticised the CPS for its decision-making in the Treadaway case; Derek Treadaway was awarded £50,000 in damages in respect of a serious assault by police officers while he was in custody: R v DPP ex p Treadaway (1997) The Times, 18 November. The CPS decided not to prosecute the officers. Treadaway successfully sought judicial review of this decision and the case was remitted for re-consideration by the CPS.

329 Thompson v Comr of Police for the Metropolis, Hsu v Comr of Police for the Metropolis [1997] 2 All ER 762.

330 See further the Home Affairs Committee First Report (1998), Section B: 'The evidence from civil actions'. A further example, in which the disciplinary sanction was, in effect, rescinded, is provided by Goswell v Comr of Metropolitan Police (the Guardian, 27 April 1996). The officer who was found in that case to have perpetrated a serious assault, PC Trigg, was dismissed as a result of a complaint from Goswell. In the civil action Goswell had been awarded £120,000 for assault, £12,000 for false imprisonment and £170,000 for arbitrary and oppressive behaviour. Trigg appealed against his dismissal and was reinstated by the Home Secretary, Michael Howard. On the face of it, his reinstatement after it had been proved beyond reasonable doubt (in the disciplinary proceedings) that Trigg had perpetrated the assault in question appeared highly questionable.

informal resolution[331] and 50% of complaints were withdrawn.[332] Clayton and Tomlinson noted that the 16,712 complaints dealt with in 1990 led to 305 criminal or disciplinary charges and advice or admonishment in 573 cases; thus, less than 2% of complaints led to any disciplinary action.[333] The PCA Report of 1995 reported that out of 245 complaints of serious assault by police officers, eight led to disciplinary charges; none led to dismissal of an officer from the service. Out of 6,318 complaints of assaults, disciplinary charges were preferred in 64 cases; none led to dismissal of the officer.[334] The PCA Report of 1998 stated that 141 complaints concerned serious assaults; 8% of those fully investigated led to disciplinary action. A total of 16,550 complaints were received in 1998–99; 317 were fully investigated, a figure of approximately 2%.[335] In 1997, the Home Affairs Committee considered the figures for the outcome of complaints and found that over the previous two years, 2% of all recorded complaints were substantiated following a formal investigation and less than half of 1% of complaints led to disciplinary or criminal charges.[336] The record for 1998–99 suggests that the figures would be approximately the same. In 1999–2000, 8,048 complaints were formally investigated but only 353 officers had disciplinary charges proved against them. The figures were similar in 2000–2001. In 2003–4, 25,376 complaints were made; 961 were substantiated and 89 led to disciplinary action; 867 were deal with by 'other means'. The 'other means' included retirements, and informal admonition.[337] While the figures may be, to an extent, misleading,[338] they strongly suggested that the system was not operating fairly and effectively.

The Independent Police Complaints Commission published statistics for the number of complaints recorded by police in England and Wales, for the year ended 31 March 2005, after the IPCC had been responsible for public complaints and conduct issues since April 2004.[339] A total of 27,909 allegations were recorded in 2004–5. These were dealt with as follows: 50% were dealt with by local resolution (13,936 compared with 8,914 informal resolutions in 2003–4); 20% were dealt with by formal investigation (5,585 compared with 7,761 in 2003–4); 17% by dispensation (4,737 compared with 5,863); and 13% withdrawn (3,651 compared with 2,838). Of those allegations formally investigated, 745 (13%) were substantiated. In 2004–5 a total of 22,898 complaint cases were 331 PCA Triennial Review, HC 466 (1985–88), para 1.14, p 8.

332 See Triennial Review of the PCA 1991–94, HC 396, 1994–95; Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, Civil Actions Against the Police, 2nd edn, 1992, p 13.

333 Clayton and Tomlinson, ibid, p 13.

334 See Triennial Review of the PCA 1991–94, HC 396, 1994–95.

335 The 1998–99 Annual Report of the PCA, Table 5: 2,415 complaints concerned assaults; 81 disciplinary charges were preferred; 203 complaints concerned racially discriminatory behaviour; three charges were preferred. The Report does not give the figure for disciplinary action as a percentage of fully investigated complaints.

336 Home Affairs Committee First Report (1997–98), Police Disciplinary and Complaints Procedures, printed 16 December 1997, para 27.

337 Home Office Statistical Bulletin 21/01.

338 See Lersch and Mieczkowski (2000) 23(1) Policing. They considered arguments that the numbers of complaints may not be indicative since citizens may under-complain for various reasons, including lack of confidence in the process. They also looked at the possibility of over-complaint.

339 Police Complaints: Statistics for England and Wales 2004/05, Emily Gleeson and Tom Bucke, IPCC Research and Statistics Series: Paper 3. Published by IPCC, London ISBN 0–9552083–1-9 and ISBN 978–0-955–2083–1-7, www.ipcc.gov.uk.

recorded, marking a 44% increase on the previous year. There was a great deal of variation across police forces, with some but not all experiencing very large increases in complaints.

In 2004–5 the IPCC received 768 valid appeals from complainants. Half (49%) were against the non-recording of a complaint, one-third (35%) about the outcome of a supervised or local investigation and 17% about the local resolution process. Nearly half (46%) of the appeals against non-recording were upheld, compared to one-fifth of those against the outcome of an investigation and 13% of those against the local resolution process. In 2004–5 misconduct sanctions were imposed on 1,204 police officers. For 80 of these officers the charges related to a public complaint. A total of 324 officers received sanctions resulting from a misconduct hearing. Of these, a total of 34 officers were dismissed and 57 officers were requested to resign. Since April 1 2004 the IPCC has used its powers to begin 87 independent and 322 managed investigations into the most serious complaints against the police. The IPCC considered that the increase in complaints was due to a number of factors. The Police Reform Act 2002 (PRA Act) widened the categories of complainant and those who could be subject to complaints. More significantly, in preparation for the PRA Act, police forces made improvements in accessibility and recording procedures. Such improvements are likely to have resulted in more people being included in the complaints system who in the past would have had their complaint dealt with informally or who, while aggrieved, would not have presented their complaint.

So once the 2002 Act had been in place for a year, in 2004–5, a total of 22,898 complaints were received; of the allegations formally investigated, 13% were substantiated. Appeals to the IPCC led to misconduct charges against 80 officers. Further charges related to misconduct not the subject of a public complaint. These figures demonstrate that a rise in the number of complaints has occurred and also in the number of substantiated complaints since the inception of the IPCC. But a 13% substantiation rate remains low; a large number are still withdrawn or informally resolved. The difference between the number of complaints and the number substantiated, and between those substantiated and those leading to disciplinary charges, remains dramatic.

The HRA and the police complaints and disciplinary system

The police complaints mechanism potentially provides a means of creating police accountability, both in terms of underpinning the balance apparently struck by PACE, the TA and the Codes between police powers and suspects' rights, and in ensuring compliance with the Convention under the HRA. The bodies administering the mechanism, the Independent Police Complaints Commission (IPCC), Chief Police Officers, and police disciplinary tribunals are all bound by the Convention as public authorities under s 6 of the HRA. They are also in the position of hearing complaints regarding police officers who are themselves so bound. Both aspects should inform their work and could be raised as issues by way of judicial review. Further, the statutory provisions governing police complaints should be interpreted compatibly with the Convention under s 3 of the HRA.

It is possible, although doubtful, that police disciplinary hearings fall within the field of application of Art 6. Under Art 6, the hearing might be viewed, first and foremost, as forming the determination of a 'criminal charge' against the officer concerned, although this is uncertain. Military and prison disciplinary proceedings fall within the term, owing to the severity of the possible penalty, which includes the possibility of imprisonment. The position regarding disciplinary proceedings carrying the possibility of lesser, albeit quite severe, penalties, such as dismissal or the loss of pension rights, is not yet clearly settled, although there are indications that the Court would view proceedings carrying the possibility of lesser penalties as falling outside the meaning of criminal charge.[340] Disciplinary proceedings and hearings might also be viewed as the determination of the 'civil rights and obligations' of the complainant under Art 6(1), since they may frequently involve inquiry into breaches of such rights, including breaches of the Convention itself. The term 'civil' has, however, been taken to mean that these are rights in private rather than public law,[341] although a clear distinction between rights in private as opposed to public law is not apparent in recent Strasbourg jurisprudence. Possibly, complaints proceedings might be found to fall within this term at Strasbourg, or domestically, in future. This view might be encouraged since, as indicated above, the proceedings became more court-like after the 1999 reforms.

On the premise that disciplinary proceedings and the occasional disciplinary hearings ordered by the PCA might be found in future to fall within Art 6, it is arguable that they fail to comply with its requirements since the complainant is in such a weak position in them. They appear to fail to provide a fair hearing for the complainant, bearing in mind the procedure they follow. In investigating a fair hearing, the domestic authorities may take into account the Art 6(3) guarantees even in respect of civil determinations, since they are viewed as minimum guarantees which are covered by the wider para (1) protection of a fair hearing. If consideration is given to the procedures in question it is apparent that, apart from any of the other requirements of fairness, the minimal safeguards of Art 6(3) may not be present, depending on the application of the new regulations in any particular case.[342] The system does not allow for the complainant or her legal representative to attend the full disciplinary proceedings or hearings. The independence and impartiality of the hearing may also be questioned, particularly as the vast majority of hearings are not ordered or supervised by the PCA. No compensation can be awarded to the complainant.

There is also the possibility of considering whether the disciplinary system affords the complainant an effective remedy for breach of his or her Convention rights. This argument could be raised under Art 13 which, while omitted from the rights given further effect under the HRA, may have some effect in domestic law.[343] It is debatable whether the police complaints and discipline process should be seen as being the appropriate forum for s 7(1)(a) HRA purposes, since breach of Convention rights by police officers could be raised in the ordinary courts under that sub-section. But, in any event, the Art 13 issue could be raised in, for example, a challenge to a breach of a Convention right in judicial review proceedings, if the applicant had made an unsuccessful complaint. In Govell v UK,[344] the Commission found that the police investigative system did not meet the requisite standards of independence under Art 13 since the Chief Constable 340 See Demicoli v Malta A 210 (1991) and Ravnsborg v Sweden A 283-B (1994).

341 Ringeisen v Austria A 13 (1971), para 94.
342 See further Chapter 2, pp 65–66.
343 See Chapter 4, p 165.
344 (1997) 4 EHRLR 438. See also Khan v UK (2000) 8 BHRC 310, paras 45–47.

can appoint a member of the same force to investigate; the Home Secretary appoints and remunerates members of the Police Complaints Authority and has a guiding role in determining the withdrawal of charges. The rules considered in Govell were the PACE rules, but the new rules maintain the same system. In Khan v UK,[345] the Court also found that the police disciplinary system failed to satisfy Art 13 because of the lack of independence. It is not clear that the 2002 Act has gone far enough to meet the deficiency found in Khan.

A further issue may arise in respect of public interest immunity attaching to documents coming into existence during a police complaints investigation. The position of the parties to court actions in relation to disclosure of material relating to a complaint was placed on a more equal basis as a result of Chief Constable of West Midlands Police ex p Wiley; Chief Constable of Nottinghamshire Police ex p Sunderland.[346] All the parties concerned argued that public interest immunity did not attach, on a class basis, to documents coming into existence during a police complaints investigation. The House of Lords had to consider whether Neilson v Laugharne[347] and the decisions following it were wrongly decided. In Neilson, Lord Oliver had determined that a class immunity should attach to police complaints documents on the basis that the police complaints procedure would be placed in jeopardy if that was not the case. However, the House of Lords considered that there was insufficient evidence to support Lord Oliver's conclusion as to the need for a new class claim to public interest immunity. Thus, it was found that Neilson must be regarded as wrongly decided, but that did not mean that public interest immunity would not attach to police complaints documents: whether it did or not would depend on the nature of the particular document or documents in question. This decision emphasises that a clear case must be made out for use of a broad class claim to public interest immunity. It is in the interests of a fair hearing under Art 6(1) and 6(3)(d), since it goes some way towards ensuring that, in actions against the police, or in prosecutions where previous disciplinary findings may be relevant, both parties have access to the same information. However, it leaves open the possibility of a contents claim or of a class claim in relation to specific groups of documents, although a strong justification would be required to establish such a claim. In Taylor v Anderton,[348] the Court of Appeal found that the reports prepared by investigating officers were entitled to class immunity, but that a litigant might nevertheless obtain disclosure of part or all of a report if the judge could be persuaded that the public interest in disclosure outweighed the interest in immunity.

It is debatable whether the current position would satisfy the findings as to the duty of disclosure to the defence in Rowe and Davis v UK[349] or in Tinnelly and McElduff v UK,[350] depending on the particular circumstances of a case. In Tinnelly, the Court found that the use of a conclusive certificate preventing disclosure of the 345 Ibid, paras 44–47; [2000] Crim LR 684.

346 [1995] AC 274; [1994] 3 All ER 420; (1995) 1 Cr App R 342, HL.

347 [1981] QB 736.

348 [1995] All ER 420, CA. See also Kelly v Comr of Police of the Metropolis (1997) The Times, 20 August in which it was found that PII attaches to certain of the forms which are sent to the CPS by police forces.

349 (2000) 30 EHRR 1; (1998) 25 EHRR CD 118 (admissibility decision).

350 (1998) 27 EHRR 249.

reasons for a decision[351] breached Art 6, since it prevented the tribunal from effectively reviewing the facts. Any judge determining the imposition of a contents immunity, whether in a civil action against the police or in a prosecution, would have to take the jurisprudence regarding the equality of arms provision arising both under Art 6(1) and 6(3) into account, as well as the general requirements of a fair trial. The latter requirement is ultimately the overriding one, since merely placing both parties in an equally disadvantageous position would not necessarily satisfy it.

6 Prosecution of the police

Introduction

Police actions that are unauthorised may create criminal as well as civil liability. For example, the use of force in effecting an unlawful arrest would be an assault. The use of lethal force in such circumstances might give rise to liability for murder or manslaughter. Equally, excessive force used to effect a lawful arrest or to restrain a suspect lawfully detained might give rise to criminal liability. In practice, successful prosecutions of police officers are very rare.[352] A number of high profile cases have failed to lead, ultimately, to successful prosecutions. The Home Affairs Committee noted that no convictions of police officers had arisen from the recent miscarriage of justice cases despite strong evidence of fraud or perjury on the part of some of the officers involved.[353] The number of deaths annually in police custody remains high; between January 1990 and December 1996, 380 such deaths were reported to the Home Office,[354] and the failure of disciplinary charges or prosecutions in relation to complaints arising from such deaths has attracted quite severe criticism.[355] In 1997, the Home Affairs Committee considered evidence from the organisation Inquest which submitted 11 case studies, in certain of which no prosecution or disciplinary action had been taken against officers, despite apparently substantial evidence against them.[356] The Police Reform Act 2002 does not distinguish between complaints of criminal conduct and of unprofessional behaviour (s 12); thus it does not facilitate the use of the criminal process as distinct from the disciplinary one, where a complaint reveals that a criminal act by a police officer may have occurred.

351 This was not a PII certificate, which would not be conclusive, but a certificate provided for under the Fair Employment Act 1976 in Northern Ireland.

352 Only about 1.5% of cases concerning the police referred to the DPP are prosecuted. See Hyder, ‘Cause for complaint’ (1990) New Statesman and Society, 12 January.

353 Ibid, para 24.

354 Leigh, Johnson and Ingram, Deaths in Police Custody, Police Research Series Paper 26 (1998).

355 See The Butler Report, 1998; Kennedy, H, in Walker, C and Starmer, K (eds), Miscarriages of Justice: A Review of Justice in Error, 1999, p 374. Note the report in June (1999) LAG 21 regarding the inquest into the death of N Delahunty due to cocaine intoxication aggravated by police restraint. See also November (1999) LAG 6 regarding the acquittal of police officers for the death of a Mr O’Brien in custody after a restraint by a number of police officers. His death was considered in The Butler Report, s 6. In s 8, the report criticised the CPS system for considering prosecutions in respect of deaths in custody (including that of O’Brien) as ‘inefficient and fundamentally unsound’. See above, Chapter 11, p 1175, fn 326.

356 Ibid, para 25.

Crown Prosecution Service decision-making

The Crown Prosecution Service takes the decision as to prosecution, but their impartiality and independence have been questioned. It appears that the issue of independence arises at every stage in the decision-making process of the CPS in relation to the question whether to prosecute police officers where complaints appear to disclose criminal offences.[357] The CPS is, of course, independent of the police, but 'the issue is whether it exercises this independence properly'.[358] Evidence submitted in 1997 to the Home Affairs Committee regarding the matter indicated a 'lack of willingness' on the part of the CPS and DPP to prosecute. 'There is clearly bias which pervades both the police and the CPS preventing viable prosecutions through nonsensical analysis of evidence.'[359] The issue of the quality of CPS decision-making in this context clearly raises a number of Convention-based arguments.

The Butler Report (1998) made a number of recommendations designed to improve the quality of CPS decisions as to prosecution. They included sending every death in custody case for a decision as to whether or not to prosecute to the Assistant Chief Prosecutor and instituting a compulsory training programme for all those employed in central casework at the CPS.[360] The Report also expressed unease with the system whereby the police themselves investigate and report to the CPS on a death in custody. It also suggested that where such a death had occurred and an inquest jury returned a verdict of unlawful killing, the reason for the decision not to prosecute should be given.[361]

Impact of the HRA

No criminal liability is created under the HRA, so that a breach of, for example, Art 3 or 8, non-coterminous with existing offences, could not found a prosecution. But decisions as to prosecutions of the police raise a number of Convention issues which are likely to be addressed in proceedings for judicial review of a decision not to prosecute. The burden of proof would be affected where it was alleged that Art 3 had been breached by custodial maltreatment, or, under Art 2, where a death had occurred in custody. Once it was shown that the detainee was free of the injury in question,[362] or was not already in a life threatening condition, before arrest, the state would bear the burden of exculpating the officers involved. This test appears to differ from that currently used by the CPS, which was criticised in the Butler Report.[363] The Butler recommendations, which were largely concerned with procedural matters, including clarification of the system of decision-making in the CPS, did not, it is argued, fully address these Convention matters. Possibly it will become apparent that reforms based on a greater awareness of the demands of the Convention in this context are necessary under the HRA.

357 See further Smith, G, 'Police Complaints and Criminal Prosecutions', (2001) Modern Law Review, 64/3: 372–92.

358 See Home Affairs Committee First Report (1997–98), para 88.

359 Ibid, para 90.

360 Ibid, pp 53–54.

361 Ibid, p 55.

362 Tomasi v France A 241-A (1992). See also Chapter 2, p 48.

363 Ibid.

7 Conclusions

A recurring theme throughout this chapter and Chapters 11 and 12 has concerned the extent to which a 'balance' is struck between suspects' rights and police powers. The dual themes of the need for enhanced police powers but also for the introduction of rules to protect due process, are only clearly evident in the piece of legislation which is still central to police powers – the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. The notion of achieving in PACE what Reiner has called 'a fundamental balance'[364] has some foundation. It may be said that on the face of it, the balance struck by PACE is fairly acceptable, at least in relation to the non-terrorist suspect, despite the increased powers of arrest and stop and search which PACE confers. Concern may be expressed as to the uncertainty of the concept of reasonable suspicion on which these powers depend but, nevertheless, taking PACE and the Codes at face value, a concern to protect the rights of suspects is evident. It is, however, less clear that the later legislation, the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, the Terrorism Acts 2000 and 2006, and the Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001, reflects such a concern.

The post-PACE legislation, then, has effected continued extensions of police powers, but has brought about only minor increases in safeguards for suspects. Those increases, including the use of judicial authorisation for the lengthy detention of terrorist suspects[365] and the requirement of access to legal advice if adverse inferences are to be drawn from silence,[366] were in effect imposed on the government by decisions of the European Court of Human Rights. The later legislation made no attempt to address one of the central problems inherent in the provision for safeguarding suspects' rights in PACE, the TA and the Codes – the lack of effective sanctions for its breach.

This was a recurring theme in this chapter. It is particularly true of Codes C and H; they create a scheme which seems to make every effort to ensure fair treatment in custody and in the interview, but which operates outside the realm of general legal sanctions since breaches may be remedied (in the accepted sense of that word) only in internal disciplinary proceedings, and only very rarely then. The right to legal advice, although on a statutory basis, is in an equally weak position. The Notes for Guidance, which occupy key points in the interviewing scheme, appear to be intended to have no legal status at all. Since no other effective means is available of ensuring that the rules are adhered to, the courts have stepped into the breach and have developed complex rules for the exclusion of confessions obtained in breach of the interviewing rules. Thus, in effect, exclusion of confession evidence has become one of the main methods of upholding the rights of the suspect while in custody and in the interview.

But the use of exclusion of evidence as a means of redress clearly leads to an ineffective protection for suspects' rights. It can only operate where the case comes to court and the suspect pleads not guilty. Even then it is only likely to occur in relation to admissions and where the breach of the provision in question can be shown to have been substantial and significant. Many Code or statutory provisions relate to physical treatment or to interaction outside the police station and have no obvious linkage with the making of admissions. Where non-confession evidence is obtained in breach of the

364 Reiner, R, 'The politics of the Act' [1985] PL 394, p 395.
365 See Chapter 11, pp 1167–69.
366 See Chapter 12, pp 1211–15.

PACE or TA standards, it is highly probable, as Forbes[367] and AG's Reference (No 3 of 1999)[368] indicated, that the courts will admit it, thereby possibly encouraging laxity in relation to the rules. Thus, the police may still be inclined to break the rules in the hope of obtaining a guilty plea, or merely on the basis that the rules fail to harmonise with police culture. Further, the detrimental impact on the victim and on the criminal justice system, in terms of placing pressure on resources if a case collapses due to exclusion of crucial evidence, renders this method, it is argued, disproportionate in some instances to the aim pursued.

Therefore, since the rules are not underpinned by effective remedies for their breach, many suspects may experience a process, including interviews, that falls below standard apparently set by the TA, PACE and the Codes. If, in particular instances, this does not come to light, a doubtful guilty plea may be accepted, or a false confession may be admitted, leading to a miscarriage of justice, while on the other hand such failures may sometimes mean that reliable confession evidence cannot be accepted in court, although it would have been had the rules been observed. If confession evidence would not have been available but for oppressive questioning, it is argued on the grounds of both protection for suspects and reliability that the energies of the police should have been devoted to uncovering other evidence. Curtailment of the right to silence has merely exacerbated the situation, since it is likely in itself to increase the pressure on the suspect to speak and it has also undermined the safeguard which, it is suggested, has most real value in the interview: the provision of legal advice from an experienced solicitor.

There is the further problem that, as this chapter and Chapter 11 have shown, the Code C, H and statutory safeguards can be evaded by operating entirely outside the PACE and TA schemes, using secret surveillance techniques,[369] as occurred in Khan[370] and Chalkley,[371] or operating undercover, as in Amin.[372] Thus, the safeguards for suspects can be marginalised. While such techniques are effective in crime control terms,[373] the concern must arise that they may be used deliberately in some instances rather than arresting and interviewing a suspect, thereby triggering off all the safeguards. As Chapter 10 explained, such techniques are now regulated by the Police Act 1997 and the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (RIPA). But a breach of either statute does not in itself give rise to liability, unless the action, if unauthorised, would create existing tortious or criminal liability. As seen in Chalkley, the courts are not willing to use exclusion of evidence as a means of upholding the integrity of the criminal justice system where such liability could have been incurred in the gathering of evidence. Further, following Chalkley, they are unlikely to do so, even under the HRA, where no existing liability could have been incurred, but a breach of Art 8 has been caused. This latter instance is clearly of particular importance, not only because

367 [2001] Crim LR 649.
368 [2001] 2 WLR 56.
369 See Ormerod, D and Birch, D, 'The evolution of the discretionary exclusion of evidence' [2004] Crim LR 767.
370 [1996] 3 All ER 289; (1996) 146 NLJ 1024.
371 [1998] 2 Cr App R 79.
372 [2000] 1 WLR 1071; [2000] Crim LR 174.
373 See Chapter 10, pp 1053–54.

it would mean that the courts are prepared to receive evidence obtained in breach of a fundamental human right, but also because no other remedy would be available, apart from the possibility of mounting a challenge to the police operation in the tribunal set up under the RIPA.[374]

Thus, it is fair to conclude that while the PACE and TA schemes themselves have not been upheld where non-confession evidence is obtained, it is also apparent that when the police operate outside those schemes, and act unlawfully, the courts are not prepared to exclude the evidence thereby obtained in order to vindicate the rights violated. As argued above, the use of exclusion of evidence in this fashion can ignore the interests of victims. But to argue for a nuanced approach which would allow consideration of such interests and of due process, depending on the particular circumstances of a case, is to demand a theorised and developed approach which it is currently almost impossible to discern in decision-making processes based largely on crime control values. In other words, the trend away from due process evident in the legislative developments is echoed in the current judicial tendencies. As indicated, the other possible remedies available have had little impact in creating police accountability, either in terms of upholding suspects' rights generally, or in respect of the statutory and Code-based safeguards.

However, the same government that introduced the TA and the CJPOA also introduced the HRA. One might have expected that the HRA would prove to be to an extent a corrective to the dominance of crime control values evident in criminal justice policies and in judicial decisions. In the pre-HRA period and in the period immediately after the HRA came into force, there was a view that the Act might allow for a 'reinvigoration of fundamental values' in the criminal justice system.[375] It appeared possible that the inception of the HRA might herald a return to an emphasis on such values which has not been evident since the early 1990s. These three chapters have sought to suggest that, despite unfavourable statutory provisions, particularly those of the TA, the Convention offers some possibilities of curbing police discretion in the interests of due process values since it does allow domestic judges to look more closely and directly at standards of fairness in the criminal justice system. But this chapter has suggested that a number of the decisions on the Convention in the first seven years of the HRA, in particular AG's Reference (No 3 of 1999), Gillan, Condron, Brown v Stott[376] and Shannon,[377] do not suggest that such a return is probable, although there have been decisions in the field of stop and search and detention short of arrest that suggest otherwise.[378] Also, where conditions of detention or secret police operations do not infringe existing tortious liability, the HRA provides the only method, under s 7(1)(a), of challenging the police, although, as explained in Chapter 11 in respect of surveillance, such a challenge would have to be brought in the tribunal set up under the RIPA, not in the ordinary courts.

374 See Chapter 10, pp 1080 et seq.

375 Walker, C, in Walker, C and Starmer, K (eds), Miscarriages of Justice: A Review of Justice in Error, 1999, p 62.

376 [2001] 2 WLR 817.

377 [2001] 1 WLR 51.

378 See Chapter 11, pp 1137–38 and Chapter 8, pp 757–62.

It appears likely that the HRA will continue to have a diffuse and patchy effect; it will not have a radical impact on the use of the current repressive legislation or the further powers to be introduced under the Terrorism Act 2007. It may itself be manipulated either by the judiciary or the legislature, in the sense that in court, the Convention rights can be 'read down' in order to preserve the effect of such legislation, while the use of s 19 statements of compatibility may provide such legislation with a spurious appearance of rectitude. MPs may accept that a process of human rights auditing has occurred, allaying concerns about the provisions. A blending of the Convention values with those of the common law is becoming especially apparent in this field, but it is suggested that those of the Convention will only attain an appearance of gaining greater respect owing to the HRA, where they harmonise with values already held dear by the common law. It may be said that where the judiciary have traditionally established a firm opposition to due process values, as they have in respect of the admission of improperly obtained non-confession evidence, the HRA is likely to have little impact, although it may do so where they have traditionally been sympathetic to due process, as they have been in relation to the deprivation of liberty in police detention.[379] Possibly the difference of attitude is attributable to a traditional common law acceptance and understanding of certain basic human rights, including the right to liberty, but not of more sophisticated and nebulous ones, such as rights to be free from humiliating treatment or arbitrary invasion of privacy. Thus, both the creation of greater police accountability and the tempering of the effects of repressive legislation that could have occurred under the HRA are likely to continue to be muted and inconsistent.

Nevertheless, the Convention rights set basic standards in this context which are accessible to suspects domestically under the HRA. The possibility that a Convention right such as Art 8 is more likely to be found to be breached if the Code rules relating to it are not adhered to, arising from Wainwright v UK,[380] affords the Codes an underpinning they would otherwise lack. The impact of Code rules and the Convention rights on police culture is nebulous but evident: it is no coincidence that the courts must struggle to determine whether instances of maltreatment leading to a confession should be viewed as creating unreliability or as amounting to oppression: cases falling self-evidently within the rubric of 'torture' or 'degrading' treatment are rare.

The legislation discussed in these chapters reflects the change in the political climate that became evident in the mid-1990s. As Dixon puts it, 'The political and professional consensus about the need for criminal justice reform [in the face of discovery of a number of miscarriages of justice] had broken down . . . the new Home Secretary encouraged renewed populist obsession with law and order . . .'[381] At the time, the Conservative Party had a Home Secretary, in Michael Howard, who was perceived in many quarters as long on right-wing law and order rhetoric, and tabloid appeal, but short on measured criminal justice policies.[382] The aims of crime control were furthered, so Howard claimed, by ensuring an enormous increase in the prison population, by

379 See Roberts v Chief Constable of Cheshire [1999] 1 WLR 662.

380 See Chapter 11, pp 1178–79.

381 In Walker, C and Starmer, K (eds), Miscarriages of Justice: A Review of Justice in Error, 1999, p 73.

382 Maguire, M, 'The wrong message at the wrong time?' in Morgan, D and Stephenson, G (eds), Suspicion and Silence, 1994, Blackstone, p 48.

increasing, on pain of penal sanctions, the number of instances in which the citizen must take orders from the police,[383] and by abolishing or undermining the rights of suspects, in particular the right to silence.[384] The stance taken was well summed up in Howard's own words as seeking to redress 'the balance in our criminal justice system which has tilted much too far in favour of the criminal and away from the protection of the public'.[385]

From the mid-1990s, once Tony Blair became Shadow Prime Minister and Jack Straw Shadow Home Secretary, the Labour Party in opposition adopted a very similar crime control stance to that of the Conservative Party. Since the Labour Government took office in 1997 there have been few indications of attempts to break with the criminal justice legislative policies of the Conservative Party, apart from the very significant passing of the HRA. Post-2000, both major parties were seeking to outdo each other in encouraging and pandering to populist notions of crime control. The attack on the World Trade Centre in New York in September 2001 fostered the production of further counter-terrorist legislation in the UK which has continued the trend away from due process in terrorist investigations. The Terrorism Act 2006 introduced a further police power to detain suspects for up to a month. It is probably safe to predict that the introduction of a new Terrorism Act in 2007 or 2008 is also likely to aid in confirming the continuing devaluation of due process in criminal justice policies. The HRA, Strasbourg decisions such as Murray or Beckles,[386] and improvement in the police disciplinary system, are, as indicated, having a countering effect. But the impact of the HRA is not of the radical nature sometimes previously predicted.

383 In the CJPOA 1994, especially ss 71 and 68.

384 In the CJPOA 1994, ss 34, 36, 37; see Chapter 12, pp 1234–54.

385 HC Deb col 211, 2 April 1996.

386 See Chapter 14, pp 1211–14 and pp 1246–49 for discussion of both decisions.

Chapter 14

Anti-terrorism law and human rights

1 Introduction[1]

[This case] calls into question the very existence of an ancient liberty of which this country has until now been very proud: freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention. The power which the Home Secretary seeks to uphold is a power to detain people indefinitely without charge or trial. Nothing could be more antithetical to the instincts and traditions of the people of the United Kingdom.[2]

'It is all too easy for us to respond to terror in a way which undermines commitment to our most deeply held values and convictions, and which cheapens our right to call ourselves a civilized nation.'[3]

1 Texts referred to below and background: Fenwick, H, 'The Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001' (2002) 65 MLR 724; Feldman, D, 'Human Rights, Terrorism and Risk: the Roles of Politicians and Judges' [2006] PL 364; Dickson, B, 'Law versus terrorism: can law win?' [2005] EHRLR 11; Walker, C, 'The Treatment of Foreign terror suspects' [2007] 70(3) MLR 427; Ramraj, VV, Hor, M and Roach, K (eds) Global Anti-terrorism Law and Policy, 2005, CUP; Walker, C, 'Terrorism and criminal justice' [2004] CLR 311; Scraton, P (ed), Beyond September 11, 2002, Pluto; Alexander, Y and Brenner, EH, The UK's Legal Responses to Terrorism 2003, Transnational; Silke, A (ed), Terrorists, Victims and Society, 2003, Wiley; Strawson, J (ed), Law after Ground Zero 2002, Routledge; Michaelsen, C, 'Derogating from International Human Rights Obligations in the "War Against Terrorism"? – A British–Australian Perspective' [2005] 17 (1–2) Terrorism and Political Violence 131–55; Warbrick, C, 'The principles of the European Convention on Human Rights and the responses of states to terrorism' [2002] European Human Rights Law Review 287; Tomkins, A, 'Legislating against terror' [2002] Public Law 205; Gearty, C, 'Terrorism and Human Rights' [1999] LS 366; Thomas, PA, 'Emergency and anti-terrorist powers' (2003) 36 Fordham International Law Journal 1193; Walker, C, 'Liability For Acts Of Terrorism: United Kingdom Perspective' in European Centre for Tort and Insurance Law Liability for Acts of Terrorism, 2004; Sterba, JP, Terrorism and International Justice, 2003, OUP; Walker, C, 'Policy Options and Perspectives: British perspectives' in van Leeuwen, M, Confronting Terrorism, 2003, Brill; Walker, C, 'Political violence and commercial risk' (2004) 56 Current Legal Problems 531; Walker, C, 'Prisoners of "War all the time"' [2005] European Human Rights Law Review 50; Horgan, J and Taylor, M (eds), The Future of Terrorism, 2000, Frank Cass; Idriss, MM, 'Religion and the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001' [2002] Crim. LR 89; Horgan, J, The Psychology of Terrorism, 2005, Frank Cass; Gearty, C, Terror, 1991, Faber and Faber.

2 A and Others v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2005] 2 AC 68; [2005] 2 WLR 87; [2005] 3 All ER 169, at para 86, per Lord Hoffmann.

3 Cherie Booth, QC (26 July 2005); 19th Sultan Azlan Shah Law Lecture delivered by Cherie Booth in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, on 26 July 2005.

9/11 re-shaped the counter-terrorist response in the UK. After 9/11, war on terror was viewed, as 'not a matter of choice but a strategic imperative'.[4] Thus the response has been heavily influenced post-2001 by the government's view of the threat posed by extremist Islamic groups and the fear of suicide-bombing. The counter-terrorist measures adopted post-9/11 and again post-7/7 have tended to be of a proactive as opposed to a reactive nature. In other words, rather than charging persons with terrorist crimes and bringing them to trial, attention has turned to targeting possible terrorist suspects – persons who may in future commit terrorist acts – and curtailing their liberty in order to prevent terrorist activity before it can occur. But proactive measures are clearly more risky and pernicious in human rights terms since they are not subject to the normal due process safeguards created by the criminal justice system, and therefore miscarriages of justice are more likely to occur. This chapter documents the counter-terrorist law and policy of the Labour Government from 2000 to 2007. The following pages evaluate a very wide range of counter-terrorist provisions, including a large number of special terrorism offences and pro-active sanctions applied outside the criminal justice system, and in so doing the three key themes outlined below are explored.

Human rights and counter-terrorist sanctions

A tediously familiar aspect of the counter-terrorist scheme is that it often runs counter to British common law traditions and opposes the values of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).[5] This chapter will seek to demonstrate that the current Labour Government has introduced a new model of counter-terrorist legislation, one that has much more severe human rights implications than that of the 70s, 80s and 90s. The Terrorism Act 2000 remains the central measure within this scheme, but the later additions to its provisions in the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 (ATCSA), the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005 and the Terrorism Act 2006 have tended to increase the tension between the counter-terrorist measures and human rights. The imposition of reverse burdens and presumptions against the defendant, and the use of sanctions imposed on the civil standard of proof or on the basis of reasonable suspicion, eases the task of the prosecution or the Home Secretary in seeking to apply the sanctions, but tends to fail to adhere to Convention and common law values. The more harsh the sanction, in certain instances, the easier it is to apply it. Thus, indefinite detention could from 2001 to 2004 be imposed without trial, under ATCSA 2001, on a burden of proof below the civil standard and without a pre-detention court hearing. The complete banning (proscription) of a terrorist group – which can include an organisation supporting direct action against property abroad in opposition to a despotic regime – can also be accomplished with quite astonishing ease. When over-broad provisions are applied on the basis of a low standard of due process, the human rights traditions of the UK are undermined, possibly with a counter-productive security impact and without a rational security basis. The most obvious example was the use of indefinite detention against non-British suspected terrorists after 9/11; had that legislation still been in place prior to 7/7 it could not have been used against the suicide bombers, all of whom were British citizens.

4 Freedman, L (ed), Superterrorism, 2002, Blackwell at p 44.

5 See Warbrick, C, 'The principles of the European Convention on Human Rights and the responses of states to terrorism' [2002] European Human Rights Law Review 287; Tomkins, A, 'Legislating against terror' [2002] Public Law 205.

If a democracy appears to abandon its democratic ideals too readily, including adherence to human rights and the rule of law, in the face of terrorist activity, it lays itself open to the charge that its attachment to them was always precarious and qualified. In defending the introduction of new counter-terrorism legislation, the Terrorism Act 2000, with immense potential to extend the impact of the previous legislation, Jack Straw, the then Home Secretary, claimed in 1999 that the TA was simply intended to protect democracy, and that extensive measures were needed since 'by its nature terrorism is designed to strike at the heart of our democratic values'.[6] In justifying similar, if far less wide-ranging, extensions of such legislation in the face of high levels of IRA activity during the 1970s and 1980s, Mrs Thatcher famously said in 1988: 'We do sometimes have to sacrifice a little of the freedom we cherish in order to defend ourselves from those whose aim it is to destroy that freedom altogether . . .'

This is a powerful argument, but it must fully confront the question of the extent to which counter-terrorist measures can undermine democracy in seeking to defend it: they may themselves strike at fundamental democratic values if they appear to be disproportionate to the aim of protecting them. As Tony Blair, the then Shadow Home Secretary, observed in 1993: 'if we cravenly accept that any action by the government and entitled "prevention of terrorism" must be supported in its entirety and without question we do not strengthen the fight against terrorism, we weaken it'.[7] If democratic ideals are not to be undermined, counter-terrorist measures should be effective in improving security, have a minimal impact on human rights and avoid counter-productive effects, including alienating 'suspect communities' and thereby increasing the risk from terrorist acts. As J Wadham of Liberty has argued: 'Draconian anti-terrorist laws . . . have a far greater impact on human rights than they ever will on crime.'[8]

The counter-terrorist policy of the current Labour Government is not entirely out of kilter with previous policies, relating to IRA violence, as this chapter seeks to make clear. The key difference is that a political settlement appears not to be possible, leading to greater authoritarianism – with no end in sight – and therefore to a stronger appearance of injustice and of human rights abuse. The possibility of suicide bombing is also a relevant factor. Three standard governmental policy responses to terrorism have been identified:[9] a military one, treating the fight against terrorism as a form of warfare; a police-based one, treating it simply as a form of criminal activity, to be detected and then defeated using (perhaps some modified version of) the criminal justice system; and a political one, viewing it as a form of armed rebellion to be resolved through negotiation and the political process.[10] All three responses to terrorism may be evident in any particular instance. The UK Government's response to the Al-Qaeda

6 See the Guardian, 14 November 1999.

7 Hansard House of Commons 10 March 1993 col 975.

8 See the Guardian, 14 November 1999.

9 Whitty, Murphy and Livingstone Civil Liberties in the Human Rights Act Era, 2001, at pp 128–29.

10 See Fenwick, H and Phillipson, G, 'Legislative over-breadth, democratic failure and the judicial response: fundamental rights and the UK's anti-terrorist legal policy' in Ramraj, VV, Hor, M and Roach, K, Global Anti-terrorism Law and Policy, 2005.

threat has military aspects – the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan – but within the UK itself it is police-based: it has involved a very significant ratcheting up of the state's coercive powers in terms of surveillance, data-sharing, detention and other invasions of personal liberty. The UK Government considers that negotiation with Al-Qaeda or linked groups is not possible, and is reluctant to link the terrorist threat in the UK with the war in Iraq or other aspects of foreign policy. In its public statements it does not therefore focus on negotiations in relation to foreign policy as a means of defusing the terrorist threat in the UK, but largely concentrates instead on counter-terrorist police-based measures. This stance, which differs from that adopted by Spain after the Madrid bombings, meant continuation of a policy of adopting measures in tension with fundamental common law and Convention principles.

Thus, since the response is founded on the view that political negotiation is not possible, the resultant significant rise in the adoption of authoritarian powers has placed a concomitant strain on human rights. The implications of these points were illustrated in the House of Commons debate on the Terrorism Act 2006, which ushered in a range of new offences, including that of glorifying terrorism, an offence at the outer limits of what is acceptable in a society committed to the free speech principle. The principle of the Bill was debated in the House of Commons on October 26. In the opening speech Charles Clarke asserted that the government was not prepared to adopt a change in government policy likely to diminish the significance of the United Kingdom as an Al-Qaeda target:

> Its nihilism means that our societies would cease to be a target only if we were to renounce all the values of freedom and liberty that we have fought to extend over so many years. Our only answer to this threat must be to contest and then to defeat it, and that is why we need this legislation.

From a reactive to a proactive counter-terrorist strategy

This chapter focuses on the central and changing characteristics of the UK's current counter-terrorist response post-2000 and post-2001. Its second notable aspect has been the shift from reactive to proactive measures as an aspect of the 'war on terror' post-9/11. The current Labour Government introduced a new counter-terrorist scheme with the introduction of the Terrorism Act 2000 (TA). A change in policy was encapsulated in the Terrorism Act 2000 in that temporary, graduated measures were replaced with permanent, broadly applied ones, but the 2000 Act relied on a traditional reactive approach, that of seeking to charge terrorist suspects with offences and bring them to trial. This scheme offered quite a strong contrast to the previous one of the 70s, 80s and 90s. The previous UK counter-terrorist scheme – under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 and the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996, as amended –- revealed some acceptance of the principle that emergency measures should be adopted only in the face of immediate and severe need. The TA was introduced at a time when terrorist attacks were not of the scale that they had been previously, although the government clearly had an impending threat from extremist Islamic groups in mind. The TA applied all the special terrorism offences to a far wider range of groups than had previously been the case; it was therefore a much less graduated measure than the previous ones.

But the TA, despite its immense and unprecedented scope, was viewed in 2001 by the government as inadequate to address the terrorist threat post-9/11. Following those attacks on Washington and New York, the government introduced the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001. The ATCSA, controversially, ushered in the proactive measure of detention without trial in Part 4 aimed at suspected international terrorists as a preventive measures, as opposed to seeking to charge such persons with criminal offences under the TA provisions, or with ordinary criminal offences. When the key provisions of Part 4 were declared incompatible with Arts 5 and 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights by the House of Lords in A and Others v Secretary of State for the Home Dept,[11] the government accepted that it could no longer sustain the scheme and introduced the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005. In that Act Parliament repealed the key provisions of Part 4 and introduced a new scheme relying on the use of control orders imposed outside the criminal justice system.

The main change in UK anti-terrorist policy in recent years has been described as being 'the shift to intelligence-based and proactive methods [with] the primary aim of preventing terrorist attacks, rather than responding to events and attempting to solve crimes after they occur'.[12] The control orders scheme represents the current response to the threat to security. It is, like Part 4, proactive rather than reactive – it does not depend on reacting to a terrorist threat after it has manifested itself, but on targeting and controlling the activities of suspected terrorists.

Thus the TA provisions have been added to under the succeeding 2001 and 2005 measures which have been more controversial, since they rely on interfering proactively with the liberty of suspects before any offences have been committed, or where it appears difficult to prove that they have been committed. Broad proactive measures were introduced post-2000, but they were not applied, as they would have been under a more authoritarian regime, to a large number of persons. In a fashion typical of the UK counter-terrorist response (also evident in public order and criminal justice measures), over-broad and arguably counter-productively draconian proactive measures were introduced in 2001 and in 2005, but then they were significantly under-used. They were applied only to a tiny minority of terrorist suspects.

Part 4 ATCSA and the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005 represented the high water mark of Convention-infringing measures. The Terrorism Act 2006 saw no further introduction of proactive measures, but a return to the reactive TA model, albeit with a further racheting up of state powers. It adds to the very broad panoply of offences already in existence under the 2000 Act and reaffirms the use of a more draconian pre-trial regime for terrorist suspects. It provided for lengthier detention of terrorist suspects, discussed in Chapter 11,[13] introduced new offences of activities preparatory to terrorist acts, and a new offence of indirect encouragement of acts of terrorism, including glorification of terrorism, discussed below. The introduction of the new very broad preparatory offence and the new offence of glorification, although open to criticism in a number of respects, can be seen as expressing some acceptance of the human rights problems that arise when counter-terrorist sanctions such as semi-house arrest are applied without trial and with minimal judicial supervision under control orders.

11 (2004) UKHL 56; [2005] 2 AC 68; [2005] 2 WLR 87; [2005] 3 All ER 169.

12 Whitty, Livingstone and Murphy, at 143. As Clive Walker puts it, 'The trend [of UK anti-terrorist policy] . . . represents a part of a fundamental switch away from reactive policing of incidents to proactive policing and management of risk': Walker, C, 'Terrorism and Criminal Justice: Past, Present and Future' [2004] Crim LR, May, 311, 314. Walker further cites Ericson, RV and Haggerty, KD, Policing the Risk Society, 1997, University of Toronto Press.

13 See pp 1168–69.

Symbolic effect of counter-terrorism provisions

One of the most striking aspects of these provisions is their under-use. On their face, due to over-breadth, they apply potentially not only to groups that might be viewed in common parlance as 'freedom fighters' or protest groups rather than 'terrorists', they also apply to a very large number of persons, including ordinary citizens, such as journalists, property agents, accountants, bankers, who have some association with terrorist groups, sometimes unknowingly.[14] In practice the executive does not seek to apply the counter-terrorist sanctions to all the groups or persons that meet the statutory definitions. This is partly due, in relation to supporters of Al-Qaeda, as discussed below, to the difficulty of uncovering evidence and of transforming security and intelligence service material into evidence that could be put forward in a criminal trial. Not only may it genuinely be of a very sensitive nature, involving, inter alia, informants whose lives might be put at risk,[15] but the security services may be very reluctant for it to be put forward as evidence for reasons that may not fully relate to genuine concerns of that nature.[16] Such reasons also appear to relate to the continuing refusal to allow intercept material to be put forward as evidence in a criminal trial, discussed in Chapter 10.[17]

But those are not the only reasons for the under-use of the counter-terrorist sanctions, or alternatively for their very existence as additions to the ordinary criminal law. The counter-terrorism provisions documented in this chapter appear to be intended to have an effect that, to an extent, is more symbolic than actual.[18] They are viewed by government as playing an important role in signalling this society's rejection of the message of certain groups – to isolate and marginalise them,[19] to deny them some legitimacy on the basis that they have refused to use democratic methods, resorting instead to the anti-democratic course of creating terror by using violence targeted at civilians.

This can most obviously be said of Al-Qaeda and linked groups. The London bombings of 7/7 constituted an act of aggression opposed to the most basic values of a democracy. But the adoption of over-broad definitions in counter-terrorist law, 14 See Walker, C, 'Political violence and commercial risk' (2004) 56 Current Legal Problems 531.

15 The questions of sensitivity and disclosure in the criminal trial (including informants), graymail and prosecutorial discretion are addressed in Lustgarten, L and Leigh, I, In From the Cold: National Security and Parliamentary Democracy, 1994, Chapter 11.

16 See pp 1466–67 below.

17 See pp 1047–52.

18 See, e.g., Tushnet, M and Yackle, L, 'Symbolic Statutes and Real Laws: The Pathologies of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act and the Prison Litigation Reform Act', Duke Law Journal, Vol 47, No 1 (Oct 1997), pp 1–86; Freedman, L, 'The Coming War on Terror' in Freedman, L (ed), Superterrorism, 2002.

19 See, in particular pp 1381–82 below.

meaning that sanctions such as proscription are available to marginalise and demonise other more moderate groups, may be having an effect in constructing some national groups as 'suspect communities',[20] thereby playing into the hands of extremist elements and so encouraging the growth of terrorism. If terrorism is defined in an over-broad fashion, and then broadly drawn offences and sanctions are introduced founded on that definition, it appears that no distinction is made between Al-Qaeda and moderate groups prepared to use the democratic process to further their cause The result may be to erode that distinction in reality, arguably aiding Al-Qaeda recruitment, enhancing its support, and making the task of the police and intelligence services more difficult in obtaining information about possible terrorist activity within certain communities.

If the broad definitions and over-broad sanctions in UK counter-terrorist law are taken at face value it can be argued that democratic ideals are being abandoned and that the legitimacy of the UK in terms of the values that it stands for is being undermined. So it is made less easy to place a vision of British values against that of the extremists in terms of winning over hearts and minds. The adoption of over-broad counter-terrorist sanctions on the basis of their symbolic value, but relying on an unspoken traditional British consensus that they will never be fully used, may be a mistaken policy, not least because some religious or ethnic groups were never part of that consensus.

Route-map of this chapter

Chapters 11 and 12 considered the differences between the police powers under the Terrorism Acts 2000 and 2006 applicable to terrorist suspects and to 'ordinary' suspects. Under the PTA and EPA criminal procedure in respect of suspected terrorists differed at significant points from that applicable to 'ordinary' suspects. The provisions regarding stop and search, arrest, detention, police interviewing, which are dealt with in Chapters 11 and 12, created a pre-trial scheme which was of a significantly lower standard in terms of safeguards for suspects, than the ordinary scheme. This was also true of the trial process itself. In effect, a twin-track scheme was created in which lesser standards of criminal justice were maintained in respect of persons suspected of the special terrorist offences. This system is continued under the Terrorism Acts 2000 and 2006, and applied, potentially, to a far wider range of defendants. The special criminal justice regime for terrorists, affording them lesser rights within the criminal justice system than 'ordinary' criminals, can now be applied to members of any group falling within s 1 TA,[21] whether or not the group is proscribed, since arrest under s 41 TA need not be for a specific terrorist offence, as Chapter 11 makes clear.[22]

This chapter charts the change from a broadly reactive approach under the Terrorism Act 2000 to the post-9/11 approach, which placed a greater emphasis on proactive measures, ushered in by the detention without trial measure introduced by the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001. In the section below, this chapter begins by considering the tension between the terrorism provisions introduced from 2000 to 2007 and the guarantees of the European Convention on Human Rights, received into domestic law under the HRA. It is not possible to consider all the instances in which this legislation gives rise to potential conflicts with Convention rights; the focus will be on certain of its key aspects. The specific problems of compatibility between the various provisions and the Convention rights are considered at various points below, but a number of general themes are apparent that are applicable in a range of contexts.

20 See Ansari, F, British Anti-Terrorism: A Modern Day Witch-hunt, October 2005, Islamic Human Rights Commission, www.ihrc.org.uk.

21 See below, pp 1377–78.

22 See further, Chapter 11, 1146–47.

The third part of this chapter is concerned centrally with the provisions of the Terrorism Act 2000. It introduced a new and broad definition of terrorism and used it as the basis for applying a wide range of established terrorist offences. The sanctions it provides depend upon reacting to offences, including preparatory, incitement or 'association' offences, after they have been committed. Not only does it remain the central counter-terrorist measure, providing a definition of terrorism that all the later measures depend upon, it also introduced changes in UK counter-terrorist strategy that had very significant human rights implications. The attention that has been focused upon the controversial post-9/11 and post-7/7 measures should not be allowed to deflect attention away from such implications. Further broad offences were introduced to add to the TA measures, especially under the Terrorism Act 2006. The TA, and the additional offences introduced post-2000, provide a wide range of very broad offences relating to proscription and to terrorism that can be utilised, rather than resorting to sanctions without a criminal trial. On the other hand, as will be discussed, proscription has features not readily associated with traditional criminal justice measures. The fourth part of this chapter concentrates on the emergency detention without trial measures under ATCSA. The fifth considers the control orders regime under the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005, which replaced Part 4 but are also imposed by executive action. The tensions between the various counter-terrorist provisions, especially the proactive ones, and the European Convention on Human Rights, are explored throughout this chapter.

2 Terrorism and human rights

Introduction

The provisions of the Terrorism Act 2000, the Anti-Terrorism Crime and Security Act 2001 (ATCSA), the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005 (PTA), and the Terrorism Act 2006 come into conflict in a potentially unjustifiable fashion with a range of Convention rights.[23] Clearly, a number of the provisions under the current counter-terrorism scheme may have been of doubtful compatibility with the Convention when they were only applied in practice pre-2000 to certain Irish terrorist groups. But once they were applied far more widely, the issue of compatibility, on a domestic level under the HRA, became far more problematic. Since they tend to run counter to common law and Convention principle, the judiciary have utilised the Human Rights Act in order to seek to impose Convention-compliance upon them. This enterprise – the imposition of Convention-compliance on a scheme that Parliament had accepted as having already achieved such compliance – was not initially, this chapter will indicate, taken in the post-HRA era with the seriousness that is currently apparent. The decision of the House of Lords in A and Others v Secretary of State for the Home Dept[24] in 2004 marked the turning point. The stance taken by Lord Bingham in defence of Convention, international and common law human rights principles in that decision, and in other similarly seminal ones discussed below, has been pivotal.

23 See Warbrick, C, 'The principles of the European Convention on Human Rights and the responses of states to terrorism' [2002] European Human Rights Law Review 287.

Before moving on, it is important to bear in mind the Convention exceptions and derogation system, discussed in Chapter 2 and of particular pertinence in this context. If the aim of a terrorist organisation is the destruction of democracy, the application of the Convention rights in relation to it can be circumscribed. Al-Qaeda's aims appear to relate to foreign policy, but it could readily be described as an anti-democratic organisation, opposed to fundamental human rights values. In this context Art 17 may be relevant and has not so far had much impact in judicial decisions. As discussed in Chapter 2, Art 17 provides a general exception where an organisation's aim is the destruction of Convention rights. It provides:

> Nothing in this Convention may be interpreted as implying for any state, group or person any right to engage in any activity or perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms set forth herein or at their limitation to a greater extent than is provided for in the Convention.

Thus, Art 17 prevents a person relying on a Convention right where his or her ultimate aim is the destruction or limitation of Convention rights. Article 17, together with the demands of proportionality, may have a role to play in creating greater marginalisation of Al-Qaeda-related groups, in imposing a focus on the counter-terrorist that is not apparent from a face-value reading of its provisions. It may have a part to play in greater differentiation within the counter-terrorist scheme between those organisations that pose a serious and continuing threat to security in the UK, and those which do not, but are covered by it.

In proceedings on the application of the special terrorist provisions the courts must interpret them, under s 3 of the HRA, compatibly with the Convention rights if possible; they must also discharge their duty under s 6 HRA in terms of their application in the particular instance. The approach of the courts towards the counter-terrorist provisions has been and is crucial. Traditionally, since terrorism has been viewed as threatening national security, the courts have adopted a deferential stance.[25] While a far wider range of persons and activities have been designated 'terrorist' under the TA, and a very large number of groups have been proscribed since 2000, it is apparent that the actions of many such persons and groups do not genuinely threaten national security, either because their operations are directed at a regime in another jurisdiction – as in the case of the People's Mujahideen Organisation of Iran, or because the group in question has called a ceasefire, as in the case of the Kurdistan Workers' Party.

24 (2004) UKHL 56; [2005] 2 AC 68; [2005] 2 WLR 87; [2005] 3 All ER 169.

25 In CCSU v Minister for the Civil Service [1985] AC 374 the House of Lords accepted the government's claim that national security was at risk, without demanding that evidence should be put forward to support it. In the case of Shafir ur Rehman (judgment of 24 May 2000) the Court of Appeal accepted that it was for the government alone to determine whether a threat to national security, broadly defined, existed. Thus, pre-HRA the judiciary tended to accept government claims that such a threat is self-evident or must be taken on trust.

The approach taken by the House of Lords pre-HRA in Ex p Kebilene[26] to counter-terrorist provisions, particularly the findings of Lord Hope of Craighead, suggested that where national security is in issue the judges tend to refuse (overtly) to apply the international margin of appreciation doctrine, and yet may adopt a restrained approach. It was said in Ex p Kebilene in the context of the case, which concerned the compatibility of terrorist legislation with Art 6, that a deferential approach could be justified. Under the previous legislation, in the context of Irish terrorism, the courts tended to take an absolutist approach, readily making the assumption that considerations of national security outweighed the individual rights at stake. The post-HRA approach of the courts continues to be affected by the extent to which national security can be said to be at stake but, as discussed below, the courts are more prepared than they were pre-HRA to take a selectively deferential approach, an approach which considers how far a particular decision is genuinely within a particular area of constitutional competence. This stance, it will be argued below, was taken by the House of Lords in A and Others v Secretary of State for the Home Dept.[27]

The courts are less likely to be deferential where national security is not genuinely at stake, and in any event they appear at present to be taking their role under s 6 HRA very seriously.[28] They are currently showing a greater willingness to take a robust approach to counter-terrorist provisions that, on their face, violate Convention and common law principles. As will be found below, the HRA has been used in some instances in the courts, either to modify the provisions in question under s 3 in order to render them Convention-compliant, or to declare them incompatible with the Convention under s 4. The two key decisions in this respect so far have been those of the House of Lords in A and Others v Secretary of State for the Home Dept[29] in which a declaration of incompatibility was made between Part 4 ATCSA 2001 and Arts 5 and 14 ECHR, and Attorney General's Reference (No 4 of 2002)[30] in which s 3 HRA was employed in order to impose Art 6-compliance on the offence of belonging to a proscribed organisation under the TA 2000. Attorney General's Reference (No 4 of 2002) is of particular significance since it extends to all offences that impose a reversed burden of proof on the defendant, or require him to disprove a significant element of the offence. In R v Keogh[31] the Court of Appeal confirmed the broad application of the House of Lords' decision. Those two House of Lords decisions illustrate the impact that the HRA has had – and is still likely to have – on the counter-terrorist scheme. The courts are using the principle of proportionality to force the counter-terrorist scheme into a Convention compliancy that the executive alleged in Parliament had been achieved at the time of passing the provisions in question (s 19(1)(a) HRA), and which Parliament – as a matter of constitutional theory – accepted had been achieved.

26 Below. Divisional Court [1999] 3 WLR 175.
27 (2004) UKHL 56; [2005] 2 AC 68; [2005] 2 WLR 87; [2005] 3 All ER 169.
28 See Chapter 4, pp 280–91.
29 (2004) UKHL 56; [2005] 2 AC 68; [2005] 2 WLR 87; [2005] 3 All ER 169.
30 [2004] UKHL 43; [2005] 1 AC 264; [2005] 1 All ER 237. The House of Lords took account of R v Lambert [2002] 2 AC 545, HL(E), R v A (No 2) [2002] 1 AC 45, HL(E), R v Johnstone [2003] 1 WLR 1736, HL(E), Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza [2004] 2 AC 557, HL(E) and Attorney General's Reference (No 1 of 2004) [2004] 1 WLR 2111, CA.
31 [2007] All ER (D) 105 (Mar); [2007] EWCA Crim 528, 7 March 2007.

But Parliament has also played a significant part in imposing Convention-compliancy on provisions that were probably non-compliant as originally drafted. The Joint Committee on Human Rights has played an important advisory role in this respect. This was especially the case in relation to the offence of glorification of terrorism introduced under the Terrorism Act 2006. The Joint Committee gave significant advice on its compliance with Art 10, as originally drafted,[32] and the House of Lords introduced a number of significant amendments to the Bill which narrowed down the offence significantly.

But Parliamentary and judicial intervention have not, it will be argued below, fully succeeded in ensuring Convention compliance in respect of all aspects of the current counter-terrorist scheme, including those of proscription under the TA 2000, as amended in 2006, and of control orders under the PTA 2005. These problems of compatibility and the response of the domestic courts are considered in relation to specific provisions below. But a number of general themes cut across a range of provisions, including those introduced in the 2006 Act.

Ambit of the Convention rights interpreted domestically

It may be relevant in a particular instance to seek to rely on an expanded conception of a Convention guarantee; this is not confined to this context, but may be of particular pertinence within it, given Strasbourg's tendency to accord a wide margin of appreciation to the state in cases concerning terrorism where national security may be affected, or where the state puts forward a reasonable case that it may be.[33] It is argued that Lord Bingham relied impliedly on an expanded conception of Art 6(1) in respect of the use of evidence in terrorism cases suspected to derive from the use of torture in other jurisdictions in A and Others[34] (the 2005 'third party torture material judgment'), a point that is returned to below.[35]

As discussed in Chapter 4, para 1 of the materially qualified Articles should be interpreted domestically in a way that delivers no more than would be delivered at Strasbourg if the Strasbourg jurisprudence on the point at issue was settled and constant.[36] This was found in R (on the application of Ullah) v Special Adjudicator,[37] in the context of s 2 HRA. The domestic courts, in other words, have no mandate to expand the ambit of the qualified rights. Chapter 4 discussed methods of escaping from this stricture – for example, where the jurisprudence can reasonably be viewed as not yet settled.[38] However, while following Ullah, Lord Steyn considered in the House of Lords 33 See, e.g., the discussion of the Strasbourg derogation cases, pp 1425, 1435 below. See also Chapter 4, pp 265–69, 272–73; Chapter 2, pp 37, 110–11.

32 See p 1417 below.

34 [2005] UKHL 71.

35 See pp 1455–59.

36 See Chapter 4, pp 193–95. The decision leaves open the possibility that domestic cultural traditions could be relevant to the ambit of the absolute or semi-absolute rights since it would seem strange that such traditions could find an entry point due to the qualifications to the rights, but not in relation to the absolute ones. This point may be of pertinence in this context in relation in particular to Art 3.

37 [2004] UKHL 26.

38 See Chapter 4, p 196.

in Marper[39] that while Art 8(1) should not be expanded domestically by reference to domestic cultural traditions, including common law conceptions of human rights principle, Art 8(2) could be. Lord Steyn considered that such traditions would be relevant in determining whether the infringement of the right was justified: 'I do accept that when one moves on to consider the question of objective justification under Article 8(2) the cultural traditions in the United Kingdom are material . . . the same is not true under article 8(1) . . . .'[40]

Arguably, that dicta can equally be applied to Arts 10 and 11, para 2, and to other qualified Convention rights. This is of great significance in this context since at Strasbourg it is normally argument on para 2 that is affected by the concession of a wide margin of appreciation to the state, on national security grounds, leading to outcomes adverse to the claimant. The ratio of the decisions in Ullah and Marper concerned the ambit of Art 8(1); arguably, they leave open the possibility that domestic cultural traditions could be relevant to the ambit of the absolute or semi-absolute rights, since it would seem strange that such traditions could find an entry point due to the qualifications to the rights, but not in relation to the absolute ones. This point may be of pertinence in this context in relation in particular to Art 3.

Fair trial under Article 6(1) – Proceedings before courts outside the criminal justice system

It is convenient to quote Art 6(1), the right to a fair and public hearing, in full here. In the proceedings considered it appears at present that the rest of Art 6 is inapplicable since it only applies in criminal trials. Its application in criminal trials is considered in Chapters 11–13.[41] Article 6(1) states:

> In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. Judgment shall be pronounced publicly but the press and public may be excluded from all or part of the trial in the interest of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, where the interest of juveniles or the protection of the private life of the parties so require or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice.

Field of application of Article 6?

A number of the procedures made available to challenge the imposition of sanctions on persons suspected of terrorist activity, or those belonging to a proscribed organisation, are problematic in terms of their compliance with Art 6(1) – the 'fair trial' Article, discussed at various points in this book.[42] They tend to place the accused person in 39 R (on the application of Marper) v Chief Constable of South Yorkshire [2004] 1 WLR 2196.

40 Ibid at 27.
41 See in particular pp 1215–20 and 1259–62.
42 See Chapter 2, pp 59–66; Chapter 13, pp 1291–95.

a very weak position in the proceedings and provide a level of scrutiny far short of that available in a criminal trial, despite the fact that sanctions tantamount to those available in the criminal process are being imposed. In a number of respects the judicial supervision involved affords, it will be contended, a somewhat thin veneer of legitimacy to the process, which is arguably not fully in accord with the demands of Art 6.

Clearly, Art 6 applies to the proceedings considered below only if the hearings are within its field of application. The proceedings are those in the Special Immigration Appeals Commission (SIAC), in the Proscribed Organisations Appeals Commission (POAC) and control order proceedings. As can be seen from the opening words of Art 6(1) set out above, it applies only if those procedures are viewed as the 'determination of a criminal charge' or of 'civil rights and obligations'. It might be thought that the proceedings in question should be viewed as criminal due to the sanctions that can be imposed, that the values underlying Art 6 would argue against circumventing its fundamental safeguards by such devices as control orders, executive certification of suspects and 'preventive' executive detention, as opposed to charging suspects with offences and prosecuting them. The mere designation of detention or the use of control orders as preventive, allowing the avoidance thereby of the need for a charge or for proof of an offence beyond reasonable doubt – themselves aspects of due process – arguably should not, in accordance with those values, be allowed to obscure the true nature of the situation. In terms of their impact on liberty, the sanctions imposed in control order proceedings can be seen in essence as almost indistinguishable from detention. When obligations are imposed on a suspect under a control order they will be experienced by the controlee as the use of sanctions as punishment. This point is perhaps even clearer in relation to proscription since on their face the proscription provisions criminalise a person who is a member of a proscribed organisation at the time when the organisation is proscribed, even though he or she had no warning that this was about to occur. Thus if POAC refuses to allow de-proscription a number of persons are automatically criminalised. (As discussed below, the House of Lords in 2004 used s 3 HRA to alleviate the problem of compliance with Art 6 which arose from that position.)[43]

However, the orthodox view apparent from the cases discussed below in the context of control order proceedings appears to be that the use of sanctions tantamount to, or almost indistinguishable in their impact from criminal ones, outside the criminal process, is not the equivalent of a criminal charge.[44] Clearly, SIAC, the POAC and courts in control order proceedings are not dealing with such a charge as a matter of domestic law, although this in itself does not determine the matter since the term has an autonomous Convention meaning.[45] Their proceedings are in effect determinative of a deprivation of liberty, but it can be argued that the procedure is precisely not the determination of a charge and that if a criminal charge could have been brought it would have been, that the proceedings are in a sense a substitute for a criminal trial. The procedures in question do, however, represent a 'determination of civil rights and obligations'. This view was taken in the Court of Appeal in Secretary of State v MB[46]

43 See pp 1353, 1391–92.
44 See p 1448 below.
45 See: Campbell and Fell v UK A 80 (1984); Benham v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 293.
46 [2006] EWHC 1000, [2006] HRLR 29, [2006] 8 CL 108 at para 53.

in relation to proceedings very similar to those of SIAC – control order proceedings. The sanctions supervised by the courts in question, including SIAC, can be viewed, not as punishments in themselves, but as precautionary since no liability is necessarily imposed. In terms of Convention principle, this, it is argued, is a limited but orthodox perspective. It is the one accepted by the executive and Parliament at present. The House of Lords in A and Others in 2005 left the question open whether such proceedings should be viewed as criminal or only as civil, attracting a lower level of safeguards.[47]

What is the basis for viewing the procedures in question as representing a 'determination of civil rights and obligations'? Civil rights and obligations are normally viewed as matters – broadly speaking – of private law,[48] not aspects of public law.[49] It is well established at Strasbourg that all the Convention rights are not 'civil rights' for the purposes of Art 6(1)[50] although the 'family' rights under Art 8(1) generally are viewed as 'civil rights'.[51] In re S and Re W (Care Orders)[52] Lord Nicholls found:

> Although a right guaranteed by article 8 is not in itself a civil right within the meaning of article 6(1), the Human Rights Act has now transformed the position in this country. By virtue of the Human Rights Act article 8 rights are now part of the civil rights of parents and children for the purposes of article 6(1). This is because now, under section 6 of the Act, it is unlawful for a public authority to act inconsistently with article 8.[53]

In other words, Convention rights that would not be viewed as civil rights for Art 6 purposes at Strasbourg (due to the lack of a basis in domestic law) can now be so viewed, as a matter of domestic law, due to s 6 HRA. Clearly, Lord Nicholls was referring to Art 8 rights which might have been viewed as having such a basis anyway, but his point is that since Strasbourg requires a footing for the right in domestic law that footing has been established due to the HRA. As discussed below, the proceedings in question relate to a range of Convention rights and it has been accepted that the domestic consideration of the alleged breach of those rights in control order proceedings does amount to the determination of civil rights and obligations.[54] Since the proceedings are so viewed domestically they must therefore be Art 6 compliant. But only the guarantees of Art 6(1) apply; the other guarantees of Art 6 do not since they are applicable only in criminal matters.[55]

Further, as discussed in Chapter 2, Art 5(4) in any event provides a right to review of detention, whatever the basis of the detention.[56] The detainee must be able to take 47 See p 1455 below.

48 At Strasbourg they would be viewed as the determination of 'civil rights and obligations' since these are matters – broadly speaking – of private law: Ringeisen v Austria A 13 (1971), para 94.
49 See, e.g., Agee v UK No 7729/76, 7DR 164 (1976).
50 Golder v UK (1975) 1 EHRR 524.
51 W v UK A121 (1987).
52 [2002] UKHL 10.
53 At para 71.
54 See p 1448.
55 The guarantees of Art 6(2) and Art (3) are only applicable where the hearing is the 'determination of a criminal charge'. See Chapter 2, pp 60–61.
56 See p 58.

court proceedings in order to determine whether a detention is unlawful. This is an independent provision: even if it is determined in a particular case by the Commission that the detention was lawful, there could still be a breach of Art 5(4) if no possibility of review of the lawfulness of the detention by the domestic courts arose. It is well established that proceedings for the purposes of satisfying Art 5(4) must satisfy the basic requirements of a fair trial.[57] Art 5(4) is only applicable if the proceedings relate to 'detention'; therefore its applicability would depend on the issue being determined. If, for example, a control order proceeding concerned obligations that affected Art 8 or 10 rights, it would appear that Art 5(4) would be inapplicable, but that Art 6(1) would continue to apply as the proceedings would concern the determination of civil rights.

But it is arguable that the proceedings should be viewed as criminal rather than civil. In Benham v UK,[58] the leading case at Strasbourg on 'criminal charge', the Court found that although reg 41 of the Community Charge (Administration and Enforcement) Regulations, the legislation in question, clearly did not create a criminal offence in UK law, it should be accounted criminal for Art 6(1) purposes. The proceedings against the applicant (in respect of default on payment of the community charge or poll tax) were brought by the public authorities; the proceedings had some punitive elements and the bringing of them implied fault on the part of the applicant: the magistrates could only exercise their power of committal on a finding of wilful refusal to pay or culpable neglect.[59] Further, the penalty was severe (committal to prison for up to three months).

If Secretary of State v MB is appealed, this point is likely to be argued before the House of Lords. Clearly, if control order proceedings were viewed as the 'determination of a criminal charge' that would undermine the ability of the Home Secretary to employ the control order scheme since the greater safeguards under Art 6(2) and (3) would be applicable. However, Art 6(1) and (2) do not require proof beyond reasonable doubt: a wide margin of appreciation has been conceded to national courts in respect of the burden of proof.[60] As a matter of domestic law proceedings viewed as criminal in character would require proof beyond reasonable doubt, but these would be proceedings deemed criminal due to the autonomous Convention meaning of the term 'criminal charge'; therefore the domestic requirements of criminal proceedings would not necessarily apply.

If it appeared that greater efforts were being made to bring prosecutions against suspected Al-Qaeda supporters, as opposed to deploying control orders, the courts might possibly feel somewhat less impelled to characterise control order proceedings as criminal in nature. In this context it may be noted that in Secretary of State for the Home Dept v E,[61] discussed below, it was found that the Home Office had received judgments from Belgium against the applicant in 2006 that might have provided a basis for a prosecution, but the Court found that there had been no review of the possibility of prosecuting E in the light of them. For this reason, it was found, the decision thereafter to maintain E's control order was flawed.

57 Garcia Alva v Germany (2001) 37 EHRR 335; R (West) v Parole Board, R (Smith) v Parole Board (No 2) [2005] UKHL 1, [2005] 1 WLR 350.

58 (1996) 22 EHRR 293.

59 para 56 of the Judgment.

60 See Austria v Italy 6 YB 740 at 784 (1963) Com Rep; CM Res DH (63) 3.

61 [2007] EWHC 33 (Admin).

The procedure for the use of closed material and the use of a special advocate

The requirements of fairness, expressed or implied in Art 6(1), including those of equality of arms,[62] are applicable. In these proceedings closed material on which the grounds for the suspicion against the applicant may be wholly or partly based, is withheld from the person controlled or his legal representatives. Limitations on the disclosure of evidence in such proceedings have the potential to breach Art 6(1). In Balfour v Foreign and Commonwealth Office[63] the Court found that once an actual or potential risk to national security had been demonstrated by a public interest immunity certificate, the Court should not exercise its right to inspect the documents. This view of national security as the exclusive domain of the executive was not adhered to in the robust approach taken to the concept in the context of deportation by SIAC in the case of Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Rehman.[64] However, the House of Lords disagreed with their findings, ruling that the threat to national security is a matter for 'executive judgment' which need not be demonstrated to the civil standard of proof.[65] It is argued that these findings were not fully in accordance with the findings of the Strasbourg Court in Tinnelly v UK[66] or in Chahal v UK.[67] Both, particularly Tinnelly, took the view that the threat to national security should be demonstrated. In Chahal the Court said that the remedy offered should be 'as effective as it can be' given the need, in the context in question, to rely on secret sources. Clearly, the government in closed hearings before SIAC, the POAC, or in control order proceedings, has an opportunity to demonstrate the threat to national security and to indicate that the statutory requirements in question are satisfied. The problem is that the standard to which it must be established that they are satisfied following the findings on this point in Rehman would be viewed at Strasbourg as unacceptably low. Thus the powers to exclude the applicant[68] and his/her legal representative from the proceedings when closed material is examined would not on their face meet the Art 6(1) requirements of fairness.

However, the Special Advocates (SAs) scheme – whereby security-cleared advocates are appointed to represent the applicant – appears to mean that in that respect Art 6 compliance has been achieved, as discussed below. The role of the special advocates is to represent the interests of an organisation or other applicant, but they are not instructed by or responsible to that organisation or person. SAs are selected from advocates with special experience of administrative and public law, but do not at present receive training.

The special advocates see all the closed material. They are not permitted to disclose any part of that material to those whom they represent, so, as Lord Carlile puts it, they > have the difficult task of being asked by or on behalf of those whose interests they are instructed to serve to present facts or versions of events in relation to

62 See Chapter 2, p 64.
63 [1994] 2 All ER 588.
64 [2000] 3 WLR 1240.
65 Ibid at para 22.
66 (1998) 27 EHRR 249.
67 (1997) 23 EHRR 413 (in the context of Art 13).
68 See on this point, Zana v Turkey (1999) 27 EHRR 667, in which, in the context of terrorism, the applicant was not allowed to be present at the trial; a breach of Art 6 was found on this basis.

> which there is the strongest contradictory evidence, but evidence which they are not permitted to reveal in any form.[69]

Perhaps more pertinently, that means that although the special advocate is able to cross-examine witnesses on the applicant's behalf, he is denied the full benefit of this right; since he does not know the closed evidence against him, he cannot indicate to counsel the points upon which witnesses should be challenged. The claimants whose interests the SAs represent can, and in practice do, have their own lawyers too, but those lawyers are excluded from closed evidence and closed sessions. So the entitlement of the appellant to his own counsel throughout the proceedings is valueless since that counsel is also prohibited from attending the closed hearings and knowing the closed evidence against the claimant. Lord Steyn said of the SA system in his dissenting judgment in Roberts v Parole Board:[70]

> It is not to the point to say that the special advocate procedure is 'better than nothing'. Taken as a whole, the procedure completely lacks the essential characteristics of a fair hearing. It is important not to pussyfoot about such a fundamental matter: the special advocate procedure undermines the very essence of elementary justice. It involves a phantom hearing only.

The procedure for closed material and the use of a special advocate was designed to accord with the Canadian SA model referred to in Chahal, to which the ECtHR gave approval. In Tinnelly & McElduff v UK[71] the ECtHR referred to this procedure, as provided for in the Special Immigration Appeals Commission Bill with approval as a method of seeking comply with Art 6 while also complying with the demands of national security.[72] In R v H[73] the House of Lords considered Strasbourg jurisprudence, when considering the procedure to be adopted where public interest immunity was claimed in a criminal trial. The House approved, in exceptional circumstances, consideration of evidence by the Court without notice to a defendant and, if necessary, the appointment of special counsel to protect the interests of the defendant. It held, however, that disclosure must be ordered if the effect of non-disclosure would be to render the trial process, viewed as a whole, unfair to the defendant. Lord Bingham, giving the opinion of the House, reviewed the Strasbourg jurisprudence and began by stating:

> The problem of reconciling an individual defendant's right to a fair trial with such secrecy as is necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or the prevention or investigation of crime is inevitably difficult to resolve in a liberal society governed by the rule of law. It is not surprising that complaints of violation have been made against member states including the United Kingdom, some of which have exposed flaws in or malfunctioning of our domestic procedures. The European Court has however long accepted that some operations must be conducted secretly if they are to be conducted effectively.

69 Ibid at 51.
70 [2005] UKHL 45 at para 88.
71 (1999) 27 EHRR 249.
72 See para 52, and para 78.
73 [2004] UKHL 3; [2004] 2 AC 134.

The use of the special advocate procedure has been considered by the domestic courts. In A v Secretary of State for the Home Dept[74] Lord Woolf held:

> The proceedings before the Commission involved departures from some of the requirements of article 6. However, having regard to the issues to be inquired into, the proceedings are as fair as could reasonably be achieved. It is true that the detainees and their lawyers do not have the opportunity of examining the closed material. However, the use of separate counsel to act on their behalf in relation to the closed evidence provides a substantial degree of protection. In addition, in deciding upon whether there has been compliance with article 6 it is necessary to look at the proceedings as a whole (including the appeal before this court). When this is done and the exception in relation to national security, referred to in article 6, is given due weight, I am satisfied there is no contravention of that article.

The decision of the Court of Appeal was reversed by the House of Lords, but not in circumstances that affected Lord Woolf's decision on this point. Lord Woolf's decision was approved in A v Secretary of State for the Home Dept (No 2).[75] In Secretary of State v MB,[76] as discussed further below, the Court of Appeal also gave approval to the use of Special Advocates and the closed material procedure.[77] In his 2006 Review of the TA[78] Lord Carlile, the government reviewer of the TA, considered that the SA system works rigorously in practice, although he also argued that special training for SAs would be desirable. However, he noted that Amnesty International, Liberty and other such groups > take a very straightforward view of POAC and its sister organisation the Special Immigration Appeals Commission [SIAC], which dealt amongst other things with the detention provisions now removed from ATCSA 2001. This view is that international and European human rights law do not permit of a jurisdiction in which an individual or organisation is not told the nature of all the evidence to be deployed against them.[79]

'Public' hearing

The hearings in SIAC are not 'public' as required under Art 6(1), but this is justifiable in the interests of national security as Art 6(1) provides, so long as the restriction is proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued. However, arguably proportionality may not be satisfied since even where national security is not in issue – when, for example, the question of Art 3 treatment abroad is being considered – no provision is made for part of the proceedings to be held in public in the sense of admitting journalists to any 74 [2002] EWCA Civ 1202; [2004] QB 335 at para 57.

75 [2004] EWCA Civ 1123; [2005] 1 WLR 414 by Pill LJ at para 51 and Laws LJ at para 235. Once again this decision was reversed by the House of Lords, but not in circumstances which affected the passages in question.
76 [2006] EWHC 1000, [2006] HRLR 29, [2006] 8 CL 108 at paras 85–6; see also para 53.
77 See pp 1450–51.
78 Report on the Operation in 2005 of the Terrorism Act 2000, May 2006, at para 50.
79 Ibid at para 54.

part of them. The POAC sits in public, but is able to hear closed evidence in camera and with the applicant and their representatives excluded. Control order proceedings can be held in private as accepted in Secretary of State for the Home Dept v E[80] and in Secretary of State for the Home Dept v Rideh and J.[81]

Use of material obtained by third party Article 3 treatment (torture or inhuman or degrading treatment) under Article 6 in non-criminal proceedings?

In A and Others,[82] as discussed in detail below,[83] the House of Lords had to consider whether the court could take account of evidence that might have derived from torture perpetrated in another country. The decision is, it is argued, relevant to proceedings not only in SIAC, but also in the POAC and in control order proceedings. In criminal proceedings s 76(2)(a) PACE would apply and the evidence could not be admitted.[84] Lord Bingham, giving the leading judgment in A and Others, considered that the issue was one of constitutional principle, and found that evidence obtained by torturing another human being cannot lawfully be admitted against a party to proceedings in a British court, irrespective of where, or by whom, or on whose authority the torture was inflicted.[85] But the most important aspect of the case was that of the burden of proof placed on the Secretary of State where the question is raised whether the material relied on might have been obtained by third party torture.

The majority in the House found that SIAC should not admit the evidence if it concluded on a balance of probabilities that it was obtained by torture. In other words, where SIAC was left in doubt as to whether the evidence was obtained in this way, it should admit it. It was found that it would be unrealistic to expect SIAC to demand that each piece of information should be traced back to its ultimate source and the circumstances in which it was obtained investigated so that it could be proved piece by piece, that it was not obtained under torture. Lord Hope, in the majority, considered that the threshold should not be put that high[86] and the majority in the Lords agreed to that test.

Thus, reliance can be placed by the Secretary of State on material obtained by torture if the court cannot determine on the balance of probabilities that it was so obtained. Further, the initial decision by the Secretary of State to impose a control order under PTA 2005 or to proscribe an organisation under TA 2000, as amended in 2006, could be based on material obtained by torture. Further, if material was obtained by the use of inhuman or degrading treatment, but not torture, it could, according to this decision, be admitted and relied on. This appears to be the case even if it was proved by the applicant beyond reasonable doubt that the material was so obtained. If inhuman or degrading treatment was perpetrated by British officials to obtain the material, then

80 [2007] EWHC 33 (Admin).
81 [2007] EWHC 804 (Admin).
82 [2005] UKHL 71.
83 See pp 1454–62.
84 See Chapter 13, p 1269.
85 At para 51.
86 At para 119.

clearly the applicant could rely on Art 3 and s 7(1)(a) HRA to bring proceedings against the state. But, it appears, from A and Others, that he could not rely on Art 6(1) in arguing that the evidence should not be admitted.

Reversed burdens of proof and the presumption of innocence in Article 6(2)

The right to a fair criminal trial arises under Art 6(1), and the presumption of innocence is guaranteed in Art 6(2). That presumption is an aspect of the right to a fair trial. Article 6(2) provides: 'Everyone charged with a criminal offence shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law.' A number of the offences under the TA 2000, as amended, may be regarded as infringing the presumption of innocence at trial. This may be due to the use of presumptions against the defendant, and/or to the lack of a need to prove mens rea. A number of the special offences contain, as discussed below, a 'reversed' mens rea: the defendant has the burden of disproving knowledge or intent. Strictly speaking, the burden of proof is unchanged but, clearly, where the prosecution has merely to prove a minimal actus reus beyond reasonable doubt, its burden is significantly lowered, while the presumption of innocence is undermined. For example, under s 57 TA an accused who chooses not to give or call evidence may be convicted by virtue of presumptions against him and on reasonable suspicion falling short of proof. Section 58 TA allows an accused who chooses not to give or call evidence to be convicted without any mens rea being proved. A number of the offences under the TA, including those contained in ss 11, 12, 13, 18, 19, 56 TA have similar features: there is no need for the prosecution to show mens rea and the actus reus of these offences tends to be minimal. For example, certain offences rely on a need to prove reasonable suspicion only, regarding the main or only ingredient of the offence; under s 13 TA the actus reus can consist of doing something which gives rise to reasonable suspicion that support is being expressed for a proscribed organisation; under s 19 TA the prosecution merely has to prove that the defendant failed to report information. Unwittingly collecting funds that could eventually be used by an organisation within s 1 TA is an offence under s 18, and the main burden of proof is then placing on the defendant to disprove a key element of the offence, under s 18(2). Clearly, the interpretation of these provisions in practice will depend on the attitude of the domestic judiciary. The offences introduced under the TA 2006 of glorifying terrorism (s 1) and of engaging in preparation of terrorist acts (s 5), while very broad, place a conventional burden on the prosecution to prove mens rea.[87]

Ex p Kebilene and Others

Since presumptions against the accused and the lack of need to show mens rea are features of a number of provisions of the TA 2000;[88] they may therefore undermine the guarantee under Art 6(2). The decisions in the Divisional Court on appeal and in the House of Lords in R v DPP ex p Kebilene and Others[89] provided highly significant indications as to the stance which was likely to be taken regarding the compatibility of Art 6 with such provisions, since they concerned provisions which were then reproduced in the TA. The decision also influenced the drafting of the TA in relation to certain defences in it, as discussed below.

87 See pp 1410, 1418 below.

88 It may be noted that a means of narrowing down the use of presumptions was established in R v Killen [1974] NI 220 which held that, under the existing law, although the fact of possession constituted a prima facie case, the guilt of the accused still had to be proved beyond all reasonable doubt.

A robust interpretation of Art 6(2) was adopted in the Divisional Court. The first three defendants had been arrested and charged under s 16A of the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1989, as inserted (now encapsulated in s 57 TA). At trial the judge ruled that s 16A is incompatible with Art 6(2). The DPP, when asked to reconsider his consent to the prosecution, appeared before the judge to argue that the ruling was wrong since in his opinion, based on legal advice, the two were compatible. The fourth defendant, Rechachi, was arrested and charged under ss 16A and 16B of the 1989 Act, as inserted. Following the DPP's consent to the institution of proceedings, he was arraigned and pleaded not guilty. The defendants sought judicial review of the DPP's decisions. The Lord Chief Justice found that the crucial question concerned the impact, if any, of the Human Rights Act on the exercise of the DPP's decision to give his consent to prosecute, between its enactment and the bringing into force of its main sections. The decision to give consent was reviewed, taking into account the ruling of the judge as to the incompatibility of s 16A and Art 6(2). The public interest in prosecution was taken into account. One relevant aspect of that interest was whether, if the applicants were convicted, their convictions would be upheld on appeal. If at the time of any appeal, it was found, the main provisions of the Human Rights Act were in force, the applicants would be entitled to rely on ss 7(1)(b) and 22(4) of the Act (affording the Act a measure of retrospectivity when used as a 'shield' against a public authority).[90] The DPP had relied on legal advice to the effect that the provisions in question were not incompatible with Art 6(2). The Court could therefore, properly, consider the soundness of that advice despite the provision of s 29(3) of the Supreme Court Act 1981, which impliedly precludes such review.

The applicants submitted that the presumption of innocence under Art 6(2) was infringed if a legal burden was placed on a defendant to disprove any substantial ingredient of the offence with which he was charged. They argued that ss 16A and B placed such a burden on defendants. The Lord Chief Justice, Lord Bingham, found that both sections undermined the presumption of innocence under Art 6(2) 'in a blatant and obvious way' due to the use of presumptions and the possibility of conviction on reasonable suspicion falling short of proof under s 16A, and the lack of a need to prove mens rea under s 16B. Lord Bingham observed: 'Under section 16A a defendant could be convicted even if the jury entertained a reasonable doubt whether he knew that the items were in his premises and whether he had the items for a terrorist purpose.'[91] He pointed out that this conclusion was influenced by the absolute nature of the guarantees under Art 6. Therefore the DPP's continuing decision to proceed with the prosecution of the defendants under ss 16A and 16B was declared to be unlawful. This decision was intended to mean, in effect, that ss 16A and 16B of the 1989 Act should be rendered nugatory due to the incompatibility found. It was especially of interest for its robust interpretation of the requirements of the presumption of innocence under Art 6(2).

89 [1999] 4 All ER 801.
90 See Chapter 4, pp 239–40.
91 At p 190H.

The House of Lords, in a cautious judgment, unanimously overturned the Divisional Court decision, on the narrow ground that under s 29(3) of the Supreme Court Act the DPP's consent to a prosecution is not reviewable, or reviewable only in exceptional cases. The appeals before the House were only by Mr Kebeline and two others; the case against Rechachi had been discontinued. The focus was therefore only on s 16A. On the issue of judicial review Lord Steyn noted that the Divisional Court had accepted that once the HRA was fully in force it would not be possible to apply for judicial review on the ground that a decision to prosecute is in breach of a Convention right. The only available remedies would be in the trial process or on appeal. He found that it would be strange if in the interim period between the enactment of the HRA and the coming into force of its central provisions, defendants in criminal trials were entitled to an additional remedy by way of judicial review. He also found that since reverse legal burden provisions appeared in other legislation in force at the time,[92] the entertaining of such challenges outside the trial and appeal process might seriously disrupt the criminal justice system. In support of this point he also noted that if the Divisional Court's present ruling was correct, it would be possible in other cases, which did not involve reverse legal burden provisions, to challenge decisions to prosecute in judicial review proceedings.

Lord Hope agreed with Lord Steyn as regards the non-availability of judicial review. He went on to consider the view that might be taken of the compatibility of s 16A with Art 6(2). He said:

> I see great force in the Divisional Court's view that on the natural and ordinary interpretation there is repugnancy [in s 16A]. To introduce concepts of reasonable limits, balance or flexibility, as to none of which article 6.2 says anything, may be seen as undermining or marginalising the philosophy embodied in the straightforward provision that everyone charged with a criminal offence shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law.

But he went on to find that s 16A might be compatible with Art 6(2) bearing in mind the 'strong adjuration' of s 3 HRA. He considered that s 3 might require s 16A to be interpreted as imposing on the defendant an evidential, but not a persuasive (or ultimate), burden of proof, although he found that this was 'not the natural and ordinary meaning of section 16A'. It was, however, he found, a possible meaning. In so finding he cited Professor Glanville Williams in 'The Logic of "Exceptions"'[93] to the effect that: 'unless the contrary is proved' can be taken, in relation to a defence, to mean 'unless sufficient evidence is given to the contrary'; and that the statute may then be satisfied by 'evidence that, if believed and on the most favourable view, could be taken by a reasonable jury to support the defence'. Lord Hope took R v Killen[94] into account in support of the possibility of such an interpretation. It was held in Killen that an identical provision in s 7(1) of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1973, placing an onus on the accused to disprove his knowledge of possession, should not be used unless, having done so, the court would be left satisfied beyond reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused.

92 The Prevention of Corruption Act 1916, s 2; the Sexual Offences Act 1956, s 30(2); the Obscene Publications Act 1959, s 2(5); the Obscene Publications Act 1964, s 1(3); the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, s 28; the Public Order Act 1986, ss 18(4), 19(2), 20(2), 21(3), 22(3)–(5) and 23(3); the Criminal Justice Act 1988, s 93D(6); the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989, ss 10(2)–(3), 11(2), 16A(3), 16B(1) and 17(3)(a) and (3A)(a) (now repealed by the TA 2000); the Official Secrets Act 1989, ss 1(5), 2(3), 3(4) and 4(4)–(5); and the Drug Trafficking Act 1994, ss 53(6) and 58(2)(a). To this list there may be added the Explosive Substances Act 1883, s 4(1): see R v Fegan [1972] NI 80; R v Berry [1985] AC 246.

93 [1988] CLJ 261, p 265.

In other words, Lord Hope considered that the meaning of s 16A could be affected by reading into it an implied meaning under s 3 HRA. But in arriving at the meaning of s 16A he thought that Art 6(2) could be viewed as qualified to an extent despite the fact that the guarantee it enshrines is expressed in absolute terms.[95] He said: 'In this area difficult choices may have to be made by the executive or the legislature between the rights of the individual and the needs of society.' He considered that in interpreting s 16A in the light of Art 6(2) the interests of the individual could be balanced against those of society and that in striking that balance the Convention jurisprudence and that which is to be found from cases decided in other jurisdictions suggest that account might legitimately be taken of the problems which the legislation is designed to address. He looked at the example of Salabiaku v France[96] in which it was found that while Art 6(2) 'does not . . . regard presumptions of fact or of law provided for in the criminal law with indifference' it permits the operation of such presumptions against the accused so long as the law in question confines such presumptions 'within reasonable limits which take into account the importance of what is at stake and maintain the rights of the defence'.[97] The Court was concerned with an article in the Customs Code dealing with the smuggling of prohibited goods. Where possession of prohibited goods was established, the person was deemed liable for the offence of smuggling. The provision appeared to lay down an irrebutable presumption; the code did not provide expressly for any defence. But the Court held that there was no failure to comply with Art 6(2), because in practice the courts were careful not to resort automatically to the presumption but exercised their power of assessment in the light of all the evidence. Lord Hope noted that the guidance which was given in Salabiaku was applied by the Commission in H v United Kingdom,[98] in which the complaint was that the burden on the accused in criminal proceedings to prove insanity on the balance of probabilities

94 [1974] NI 220.

95 He recognised the difficulty that Art 6(2) is expressed in unqualified terms: 'It will be easier for such an area of judgment to be recognised where the Convention itself requires a balance to be struck, much less so where the right is stated in terms which are unqualified. It will be easier for it to be recognised where the issues involve questions of social or economic policy, much less so where the rights are of high constitutional importance or are of a kind where the courts are especially well placed to assess the need for protection. But even where the right is stated in terms which are unqualified the courts will need to bear in mind the jurisprudence of the European Court which recognises that due account should be taken of the special nature of terrorist crime and the threat which it poses to a democratic society.' He gave the example of the ruling of the Court in Murray v United Kingdom (1994) 19 EHRR 193, 222, para 47.

96 (1988) 13 EHRR 379.

97 At p 388, para 28.

98 Appl No 15023/89.

was contrary to the presumption of innocence and therefore in violation of Art 6(2). He also considered Bates v United Kingdom,[99] in which the complaint was that Art 6(2) had been violated by the presumption of fact in s 5(5) of the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991 by which it is to be presumed that the dog is one to which s 1 of that Act applies unless the contrary is shown by the accused. In the Bates case the Commission held that s 5(5) fell within reasonable limits, even in the light of what was at stake for the applicant, given the opportunity expressly provided to the defence to rebut the presumption of fact, and that s 5(5) was applied in a manner compatible with the presumption of innocence.

Lord Hope concluded that although Art 6(2) is expressed in absolute terms, it is not regarded as imposing an absolute prohibition on reverse onus clauses, whether they be evidential (presumptions of fact) or persuasive (presumptions of law). Applying an approach which balanced the interests of the individual and society[100] he found:

> It is not immediately obvious that it would be imposing an unreasonable burden on an accused who was in possession of articles from which an inference of involvement in terrorism could be drawn to provide an explanation for his possession of them which would displace that inference.

He left open the question whether s 16A did in fact strike the right balance, but he clearly reached a conclusion which differed sharply from that of Lord Bingham in the Divisional Court in finding that Art 6(2) could be interpreted in such a way as to permit the use of presumptions against the accused.

Lord Hope's approach is open to criticism in two respects. He rejected the use of the doctrine of the margin of appreciation as inapplicable in national courts. But he proceeded to take the outcomes of applications at Strasbourg into account without adverting to the influence the doctrine had had on them. He also took account of s 1 of the Canadian Charter which states that the rights and freedoms it guarantees are 'subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society' without adverting to the deliberate omission of such wording from certain Articles of the Convention, including Art 6. In contrast, such wording is clearly reflected in the exceptions of para 2 of Arts 8–11 which allow interferences with the primary rights if, inter alia, 'necessary in a democratic society'. The clear implication is that certain of the Articles, including Art 6, do not admit of an interpretation similar to that of s 1 of the Charter. Although the Court in Salabiaku accepted that some presumptions against the accused might not infringe Art 6(2), such acceptance appeared to rest partly on the application of the margin of appreciation doctrine, and partly on the finding that in practice the courts were careful not to resort automatically to the presumption, but exercised their power of assessment in the light of all the evidence. Lord Hope's approach would tend to water down the rights enshrined in the Convention, even where they were unqualified. The Lord Chief Justice's approach was more robust than that of Lord Hope and would tend to give the rights full weight and efficacy.

99 Appl No 26280/95.

100 With reference to Lord Woolf's findings in Attorney-General of Hong Kong v Lee Kwong-kut [1993] AC 951, at pp 970–71.

The post-HRA approach to the Terrorism Act offences

Kebilene is relevant to all those offences under the TA, as amended, that create presumptions against the defendant. A finding that those features are incompatible with Art 6(2) now has to be made during the trial or on appeal, rather than in judicial review proceedings. Lord Steyn's judgment suggests that a finding of an abuse of process might be made at trial even where the primary legislation allowed such an abuse and that if this occurred Parliamentary sovereignty would not be undermined even if, effectively, certain provisions of the 2000 Act were thereby rendered virtually nugatory. It was clear pre-HRA that a number of the TA provisions uncovered by s 118 might have to be reinterpreted under s 3 HRA, to read down legal burdens to evidential ones. On this basis it was apparent that the application of s 6(2)(b) HRA, allowing for the possibility of a prosecution under a provision incompatible with the Convention,[101] could be avoided.

A number of the TA offences considered below infringe the presumption of innocence encapsulated in Art 6(2) since they impose a legal burden on the accused to prove his innocence of blameworthy conduct. In a number of instances the accused may commit a criminal offence without engaging in such conduct – this is particularly true of the proscription provisions discussed below; he is then placed in the position of having to disprove a significant element of the offence. In other instances the provision imposes a reversed mens rea on the accused – this is true of a number of possession and preparatory offences. Where this occurs there are at least three different Convention-based arguments that can be employed to ease the burden on the defendant, depending on the offence involved and whether a defence is provided.

First, s 118 TA addresses compatibility with Art 6(2). It appeared that s 118 was a direct response to the views expressed by both the Divisional Court and the House of Lords in R v Director of Public Prosecutions ex p Kebilene.[102] Section 118 deals with defences provided to a person charged with certain offences under the Act, applying where it is a defence for a person charged with an offence to prove a particular matter. It provides that certain defences impose only an evidential burden, not a legal burden, on the defendant. Section 118 provides:

> (1) Sub-section (2) applies where in accordance with the provisions mentioned in sub-section (5) it is a defence for a person charged with an offence to prove a particular matter.
>
> (2) If the person adduces evidence which is sufficient to raise an issue with respect to the matter the court or jury shall assume that the defence is satisfied unless the prosecution proves beyond reasonable doubt that it is not.
>
> . . .
>
> (5) The provisions in respect of which sub-sections (2) and (4) apply are:
>
> (a) sections 12(4), 39(5)(a) 54, 57, 58, 77 and 103 of this Act . . .

101 See Chapter 4, p 216.
102 [2000] Cr App R 275; [2000] 2 AC 326.

This section was enacted in order to deal with the possibility that certain of the statutory provisions providing for such defences would probably constitute an unjustified infringement of a person's rights under Art 6(2) of the Convention in that they infringed the presumption of innocence by imposing the burden of disproving guilt on the defendant. Section 118 appears to mean that s 57 of the 2000 Act (reproducing s 16A) is rendered compatible with Art 6(2).[103] Under s 118(2) if the accused person 'adduces evidence which is sufficient to raise an issue with respect to the matter the court or jury shall assume that the defence is satisfied unless the prosecution proves beyond reasonable doubt that it is not'. But s 118 only deals with certain sections of the Act.[104]

Second, even if the offence in question is not one to which s 118 applies, the House of Lords' decision in Attorney General's Reference (No 4 of 2002),[105] discussed further below, may apply. Lord Bingham took a stance towards Art 6(2) that differed from that of Lord Hope in Kebilene since he did not take the course of implying limitations into Art 6(2). He found that a person who had not engaged in any blameworthy conduct could commit an offence under the Act (the case related to s 11(1) TA – the offence of belonging to a banned organisation) and that the presumption of innocence was infringed by requiring him or her to disprove involvement in the organisation at the time in question (s 11(2)). Since the Lords found that this burden placed on the accused impermissibly infringed the presumption of innocence, it was found appropriate, pursuant to s 3 of the 1998 Act, to read down s 11(2) so as to impose on the defendant an evidential burden only, even though that was not Parliament's intention when enacting the sub-section.[106] So Art 6(2) compliance was imposed on the offence of belonging to a proscribed organisation. Obviously this decision only related to one offence. However, as indicated above, a number of offences under the TA follow a similar pattern and are also not covered by s 118.

It was found in R v Keogh[107] in the Court of Appeal that Attorney General's Reference (No 4 of 2002) extends to other offences that impose in effect a reversed burden of proof on the defendant. In R v Keogh[108] the Court of Appeal had to consider the Official Secrets Act 1989, ss 2(3) and 3(4); the provisions, as discussed in Chapter 7,[109] impose a reverse burden according to their natural meaning, namely, that a defendant who was charged under those provisions with making a damaging disclosure had to prove that he had no knowledge or reasonable cause to believe that the disclosure would be damaging. It was found that the Act could operate effectively without the 103 Ex p Kebilene itself did not provide such guidance. When it came to trial, in February 2000, the prosecution offered no evidence and it was therefore found that there was no case to answer. The prosecution took that course, it appeared, in order to avoid the possibility of having to reveal their sources of information.

104 Sections 12(4), 39(5)(a) 54, 57, 58, 77 and 103.

105 [2004] UKHL 43; [2005] 1 AC 264; [2005] 1 All ER 237. The House of Lords took account of R v Lambert [2002] 2 AC 545, HL(E); R v A (No 2) [2002] 1 AC 45, HL(E); R v Johnstone [2003] 1 WLR 1736, HL(E); Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza [2004] 2 AC 557, HL(E); and Attorney General's Reference (No 1 of 2004) [2004] 1 WLR 2111, CA. See pp 1391–92 below.

106 At paras 48–53, 55, 56.

107 [2007] All ER (D) 105 (Mar); [2007] EWCA Crim 528, 7 March 2007.

108 See also Chapter 7, pp. 605–6.

109 See pp 600–2.

imposition of the reverse legal burdens, and that to accord them that meaning would be disproportionate and unjustifiable. If given their natural meaning, those provisions were, it was found, incompatible with art 6 of the Convention, so, following the House of Lords' decision, they should be read down by applying a similar interpretation to that achieved by s 118 of the Terrorism Act 2000, namely, that it was a defence for a defendant to prove a particular matter in that if he adduced evidence which was sufficient to raise an issue with respect to the matter, the court or jury should assume that the defence was satisfied unless the prosecution proved beyond reasonable doubt that it was not. Keogh was concerned with a reverse burden – to disprove mens rea – while technically A G's Reference was not, but with a requirement for a defendant to disprove a significant element of the offence. But it is clear that Art 6(2) applies under s 3 HRA to demand that a reversed burden requiring the defendant to disprove mens rea, or a burden placed on the defendant to disprove a significant element of the offence should be read down to an evidential burden only.

Third, if there is no defence on which the Attorney General's Reference case argument could bite, it is still arguable that it is relevant where non-blameworthy conduct, or conduct that would not normally be accounted criminal (to use Lord Bingham's words from the House of Lords' decision) is established, but no defence is overtly made available. It would arguably appear anomalous if the fact that Parliament failed to provide a defence worsened the position of the defendant. It could be argued that the offence can only be applied in a manner that satisfies the demands of Art 6 and that therefore the defendant must be able to raise Convention points, including Art 6 ones, even where there is no statutory defence. This point was considered in Chapter 8.[110] Where the defendant does raise such points it would appear, following Attorney General's Reference, that he would only bear an evidential burden in relation to them.

Freedom of expression, association and assembly under Articles 10 and 11

The Terrorism Act 2000, as amended, together with the Terrorism Act 2006, creates offences and sanctions able to stifle the expression of a range of dissenting groups and outlaw the very existence of many of them. Certain provisions potentially also prevent or curb journalistic investigation of the activities of certain of those groups. Proscription – the banning of groups deemed 'terrorist' clearly strikes at freedom of association as well as freedom of expression, taking account, inter alia, of the offences of belonging to a proscribed organisation and the offences relating to meetings where members of such organisations are speaking. The provisions discussed below under the TA making it a criminal offence for proscribed organisations to distribute literature, hold or speak at meetings. The offence of 'glorification' of terrorism under the TA 2006, clearly represents an infringement of freedom of expression, although potentially justifiable. Control orders imposed under the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005, which impose curfews on suspects and disallow communication with non-approved persons, clearly affect the freedoms of expression, association and assembly.

110 See p 783.

If Arts 10 or 11 are relevant due to the nature of the offence in question (or other Convention Articles, such as Art 1 of the First Protocol where terrorist funding or property is involved) then they can be raised under the argument that the court is under a duty due to s 6 HRA to apply the provisions compatibly with the Convention guarantees,[111] whether a defence is or is not expressly provided. They should not be raised merely as part of a defence – such as a defence of 'reasonable excuse' – since to do so turns those Articles on their heads: under para 2 of each Article it is for the state to prove that the interference with the right is necessary and proportionate, not for the defendant to prove that a Convention guarantee constitutes a defence to a state action.

The ability of the 2000 Act, and the additional offences introduced in 2001 and 2006, to threaten expression and association is in particular the case given that the aims of some of the groups likely to be affected are, broadly speaking, political ones, and so the expression in question may fall into the category of political speech.[112] The high regard in which freedom of speech and of the press, as 'essential foundations of a democratic society'[113] is held by the Strasbourg institutions was discussed in Part II and need not be rehearsed in any detail here. As discussed, it is a marked feature of the Strasbourg Art 10 jurisprudence that clearly political speech receives a particularly high degree of protection. Where national security was raised as an issue in Observer and Guardian Newspapers v UK[114] the margin of appreciation conceded was broader but a violation of Art 10 was found. Where the speech directly concerns government actions – such as the war in Iraq – the stance taken is particularly robust, even where issues of national security appear to arise. In Incal v Turkey,[115] finding a breach of Art 10, the Court said that 'the limits of permissible criticism are wider with regard to the government than in respect of private citizens', and that the dominant position the government occupies should persuade it to display restraint in resorting to criminal proceedings. The Court found that although the argument had been raised that the measures in question were counter-terrorist, the links of the applicant to terrorism were uncertain.[116] This stance reflects values endemic in the Convention: it is clearly difficult to show that an interference with democracy-supporting speech is 'necessary in a democratic society'.[117]

Determination to protect political expression is readily evident in UK courts, as the introduction to Part II indicated, particularly in cases where journalistic material raises political issues,[118] although deference to widely drafted primary legislation,[119] or

111 See Chapter 4, pp 216–17.

112 See Barendt, E, Freedom of Speech, 1st edn, 1987, pp 20 and 23 respectively. See Meiklejohn, A, 'The First Amendment is an Absolute' (1961) Sup Ct Rev 245 and Political Freedom (1960), esp pp 115–24.

113 Observer and Guardian v United Kingdom, judgment of 26 November 1991, Series A, no 216, pp 29–30, para 59.

114 (1991) 14 EHRR 153.

115 (2000) 29 EHRR 449.

116 The conviction of the applicant was found to be disproportionate to the aim of countering terrorism pursued.

117 Article 10(2).

118 Reynolds v Times Newspapers [1999] 4 All ER 609; Derbyshire County Council v Times Newspapers [1993] AC 534.

119 Secretary of State for Home Affairs ex p Brind [1991] 1 AC 696.

governmental arguments from national security,[120] has resulted in the ready upholding of restrictions on directly political speech. Earlier findings to the effect that: 'The media . . . are an essential foundation of any democracy'[121] were reinforced by pronouncements in the House of Lords' decision in Reynolds,[122] which afforded an explicit recognition to the duty to inform the people on matters of legitimate public interest.[123]

Since press freedom in relation to political expression has clearly been recognised as having a particularly high value in UK and Convention jurisprudence, and therefore the possible inclusion of journalists in the wide net of counter-terrorist liability discussed below requires a very strong justification, particularly as it potentially extends to a range of groups covering such divergent issues as animal rights, environmental matters, abortion, the national identity of groups such as the Kurds in Turkey, and also militant fundamentalist religious beliefs. It creates dilemmas for journalists that have any association with such groups – by, for example, producing specialist publications aimed at minority groups with some association with a proscribed group. This is true, for example, of publications aimed at the Kurdish minority in the UK who may have some associations with the PKK.[124] R (on the application of the Kurdistan Workers' Party and Others) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept,[125] discussed below, illustrated the problem for journalists. The case of Gillan, discussed in Chapter 11,[126] demonstrated that provisions aimed at terrorism can readily have an effect on the freedom of expression of those entirely uninvolved in terrorist activity but participating in or reporting on dissent. However, the activities and stance of certain groups, including Al-Qaeda run counter to the justifications for political speech, so the argument from democracy does not apply to them.

While earlier Strasbourg jurisprudence was more protective of state interests,[127] the recent 'association' jurisprudence of the Court is more interventionist. In Socialist Party and Others v Turkey[128] the Court allowed only a very narrow margin of appreciation in finding that the dissolution of the Socialist Party of Turkey had breached Art 11. The Court said that democracy demands that diverse political programmes should be debated, 'even those that call into question the way a state is currently organised'. The Court did not accept that the message of the group that a federal system should be put in place which would ensure that Kurds would be put on an equal footing with Turkish citizens generally, amounted to incitement to violence. The dissolution of the party was disproportionate to the aim in view – the preservation of national security. This stance 120 Attorney General v Guardian Newspapers (No 2) [1990] 1 AC 109.

121 Francome v Mirror Group Newspapers [1984] 1 WLR 892, p 898, per Sir John Donaldson.

122 Reynolds v Times Newspapers HL [1999] 4 All ER 609, judgement of 28 October available from the House of Lords website: www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/ld/ldjudinf.htm.

123 As Lord Nicholls put it: 'freedom to disseminate and receive information on political matters is essential to the proper functioning of the system of parliamentary democracy cherished in this country. This freedom enables those who elect representatives to Parliament to make an informed choice, regarding individuals as well as policies, and those elected to make informed decisions'.

124 See p 1404.

125 [2002] EWHC Admin 644.

126 See pp 1119–21.

127 See Glasenapp v FRG A 104 (1986); Kosiek v FRG A 105 (1986); CCSU v UK (1988) 10 EHRR 269.

128 Judgment of 25 May 1998 (Appl No 20/1997/804/1007); (1999) 27 EHRR 51, paras 41, 47 and 50.

was in accordance with the Convention jurisprudence which has quite consistently recognised the need to protect the interests of minority and excluded groups.[129] Similar findings were made in Sidiropoulos v Greece.[130] The Court said that one of the most important aspects of freedom of association was that citizens should be able to form a legal group with the aim of acting collectively in their mutual interest. Similarly, in Vogt v Germany[131] the Court held that a woman dismissed from her teaching post due to her membership of an extreme left wing group had suffered a violation of both Arts 10 and 11.

In United Communist Party of Turkey v Turkey[132] the United Communist Party of Turkey, TBKP, was formed in 1990. The Constitutional Court made an order dissolving the TBKP, which entailed the liquidation of the party and the transfer of its assets to the Treasury. The order was based on the inclusion in its name of the prohibited word 'communist' and the alleged encouragement of Kurdish separatism. The TBKP and its leaders applied to the Commission, complaining that the dissolution of the party infringed their right to freedom of association as guaranteed by the European Convention on Human Rights 1950, Art 11. It was found that Art 11 was applicable to the present case. It was further found that the exceptions set out in Art 11(2) had to be construed strictly in relation to political parties. In that case, a political party's choice of name was in principle not able justify dissolution in the absence of other relevant and sufficient circumstances, and there was no evidence that the TBKP represented a real threat to Turkish society or the Turkish state. A scrutiny of the TBKP's programme showed that it intended to resolve the Kurdish issue through dialogue. As such, it was penalised solely for exercising freedom of expression. In the circumstances, the drastic measure of the dissolution of the TBKP was disproportionate to the aim pursued and consequently unnecessary in a democratic society. Accordingly, it was found that the measure infringed Art 11.

In relation to certain groups the infringement of Arts 10 and 11 may be proportionate to the aims pursued, but this is not necessarily the case in relation to all such groups, especially those whose 'terrorist' activities only threaten regimes abroad. The 2000 Act also has the potential to threaten rights of assembly and expression of groups only doubtfully viewed in common parlance as 'terrorist', such as animal rights' or environmental activists. Proscription orders are not sought against all the groups that meet the definition of terrorism under s 1 TA; in effect, proportionality is built into the scheme via executive decisions as to which groups to proscribe or prosecute under the general counter-terrorist offences. The proscription or prosecution of members of Al-Qaeda or linked groups can clearly be viewed as proportionate to the aim pursued under Arts 10 and 11, para 2, and quite probably in any event Art 17, providing that the Convention is not to be interpreted so as to imply a right 'for any state, group or 129 Such groups have included criminals: Soering v UK A 161 (1989); prisoners: Ireland v UK A 25 (1978), Golder v UK A 18 (1975); racial minorities: East African Asians cases 3 EHRR 76 (1973), Hilton v UK No 5613/72, 4 DR 177 (1976) (no breach found on facts); sexual minorities: Dudgeon v UK A 45 (1981), B v France A 232-C (1992); political minorities: Arrowsmith v UK No 7050/75, 19 DR 5 (1978); religious minorities: Kokkinakis v Greece A 260-A (1993).

130 (Chamber) (1998) available from the Court's website, www.dhcour.coe.fr.

131 (1995) 21 EHRR 205.

132 1998 WL 1043934 (ECHR), 4 BHRC 1; (1998) 26 EHRR 121; [1998] HRCD 247.

person to engage in any activity . . . aimed at the destruction of any of the [Convention rights] or at their limitation to a greater extent than . . . provided for in the Convention', would apply.[133] Al-Qaeda is not seeking to use legitimate democratic means in order to persuade persons of its political agenda, and therefore the invocation on its behalf of Convention rights fundamentally based on democratic values is affected. But, as argued below, certain groups have been proscribed, such as the PKK, where it is arguable that the initial proportionality inquiry carried out in effect by the Home Secretary was defective.

Counter-terrorist provisions, therefore, which potentially extend to domestic protest groups putting forward a wide range of political messages – using that term in the broad sense which Strasbourg has endorsed – interfere with the flow of information and ideas; this can also be said of groups that do not threaten national security in the UK and which could be viewed as 'freedom fighters'. Such provisions therefore come into conflict with the expression, association, and assembly of a very wide and diverse range of groups and persons and therefore call into question their compatibility with democratic values. As discussed in Chapter 8, domestic 'protest' groups that adopt the use of direct action may create the possibilities of disorder, of harm to citizens and damage to property.[134] They may eventually, if sufficiently resourced and well organised, threaten national security. Clearly, the state has a duty to protect citizens from their attentions. The need to give weight to such interests explains the general acceptance of the freedoms of expression, assembly and association as non-absolute rights,[135] even though it may be that direct action and more forceful protest is most likely to bring about change. 'Terrorist'/protest groups that may affect national security in another country but not in the UK may want to use the legitimate outlets of expression and protest to further their cause in the UK. The ordinary criminal law exists, however, in order to punish members of all such groups for specific actions domestically, such as causing criminal damage, while public order law is available to control protests where harm to persons or property is a possibility. It will be argued below that the potentially chilling impact of the counter-terrorist legislation on the freedoms of expression and assembly, and on the right to a fair trial, is disproportionate to the aims pursued and in a number of respects is, therefore, contrary to the claims of the Home Secretary, unnecessary in a democratic society.

Article 3 treatment

Deporting suspected terrorists who could face Article 3 treatment abroad?

The government views itself as confronted by a dilemma in respect of persons who are suspected of being international terrorists but who cannot be extradited, or deported to their country of origin, because there are grounds to think that they would there be subject to torture or inhuman and degrading treatment, since to do so would violate

133 See further Chapter 2, p 112.

134 See pp 696–98.

135 See the leading US case, Hague v Committee for Industrial Organisation 307 US 496 (1938). For further discussion, see Williams, DGT [1987] Crim LR 167.

Art 3 of the Convention. The decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Soering v UK,[136] confirmed in Chahal v UK,[137] found that a breach of Art 3 will arise where a country deports a person to another country, knowing that he or she will face a substantial risk of Art 3 treatment in that other country. It should also be noted that the UK has ratified Protocol 6[138] and therefore cannot deport persons to countries where there is a real risk that the death penalty will be imposed.[139]

It is not possible for the government to enter a derogation to Art 3 under Art 15 of the Convention.[140] If this was possible it would have allowed the Home Secretary to deport persons to various countries, regardless of the fact that they might there be subjected to torture or other forms of Art 3 treatment. The Joint Committee on Human Rights at one point appeared to take the view that the government could have escaped from the demands of Art 3 by denouncing the whole Convention[141] and then re-entering it, at the same time entering a reservation to Art 3.[142] However, it is probable that such a reservation would have been viewed as invalid since as a matter of general international law it is accepted that reservations are not permitted to non-derogable Articles.[143] Had the UK sought to take this immensely controversial course, it would almost certainly have been found to be in breach of Art 3 and would also have breached the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) which does not allow for derogation from Art 7, which covers Art 3 treatment.[144] It is also a party to the United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman

136 (1989) 11 EHRR 439, paras 90–91.

137 (1996) 23 EHRR 413, para 74.

138 Protocol 6 prohibits the death penalty in time of peace: it was ratified on 27 January 1999.

139 X v Spain D R 37 (1984) p93; Aylor-Davis v France (1994) 76-A DR 164; Raidl v Austria (1995) 82-A DR 134.

140 The guarantee under Art 3 is one of the non-derogable guarantees under Art 15(2).

141 Under Art 58. See 2nd Report of the Joint Committee, para 19.

142 Section 15 HRA provides powers for the Secretary of State to make designated reservations by order. Under Art 57 of the Convention this power can only be exercised at the point of ratification.

143 There is no explicit exclusion of the right to make reservations to Art 3. The matter is one of general international law: reservations may not be made which are incompatible with the object and purpose of a treaty (Vienna Convention, Art 19(c)). There is little doubt that the ECtHR would claim the right to determine this question under the ECHR (see Van Dijk and Van Hoof, The European Convention on Human Rights: Theory and Practice, 2nd edn, 1998, pp 774–75 and cf p 776 for the non-derogable provisions). It has not yet had to do so. France has a reservation with respect to Art 15: 17 YB 4 (1974). The general opinion is that this does not give France the right to derogate from a non-derogable provision, nor would it protect France from the jurisdiction of the Court to determine the question. The UN Human Rights Committee (HRC) has taken a strong position against the power of states to make reservations with respect to the non-derogable provisions of the Covenant (General Comment 24) and, in the case of torture, an absolute one, since the HRC says torture is contrary to a peremptory norm of international law. Thus, even if the UK could avoid the Art 3 duty under the ECHR by reservation, it could not do so under the ICCPR, Art 7. Obviously the UK would not be permitted to enter a reservation to the UN Convention Against Torture. It may be noted that the UN Committee Against Torture made a statement directly communicating with the state Parties (22 November 2001, 27th session) reminding them, in the light of the September 11 atrocities, that obligations under the Convention against Torture in Arts 2, 15 and 16 are non-derogable and 'must be observed in all circumstances'.

144 Article 4(2).

or Degrading Treatment or Punishment 1984[145] and the European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment 1987.[146]

The government is currently seeking to escape from the effects of Chahal by two methods. First, it is hoping that Chahal can be – in effect – overturned at Strasbourg. The government is seeking to overturn the Chahal ruling by supporting Holland in a case being brought by Mohammad Ramzy, an Algerian accused by the Dutch authorities of involvement in Islamic terrorism. Second, it is seeking to conclude agreements with countries to which it could return the suspects in question. The idea is that under the agreement the returnee would not be exposed to Art 3 treatment in the state to which he was returned. After the London transport bombings in July 2005, the Blair Government signed a series of memorandums of understanding with North African and Middle Eastern countries that would allow terrorist suspects who cannot be tried in Britain to be deported. Memoranda have already been agreed with the governments of Jordan and Libya, and negotiations are underway with Algeria and Lebanon.[147] However, SIAC ruled in April 2007 that two alleged Libyan terrorists could not be deported because they were unlikely to get a fair trial in Libya. The decision threatened the agreement between the British and the Libyan Governments.[148] Libya had pledged that no one deported from Britain would be subjected to torture or other unfair treatment. But SIAC found that deporting the two men would violate the European Convention on Human Rights. It also found, on the basis of the closed evidence, that the two men are a danger to Britain. Neither they nor their lawyers were allowed to see the evidence. This ruling clearly jeopardised the current and potential agreements.

There seems to be no possibility of seeking to justify deporting persons at risk of Art 3 treatment abroad on the basis of implying a proportionality test into Art 3. The argument would have been based on a spectrum analysis of Art 3 treatment, allowing for implied exceptions on grounds of government policy in relation to protecting national security. That possibility – in a different context – was contemplated in the findings of the three dissenting judges in the Court of Appeal in R (Limbuella) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept.[149] The case did not arise in the context of terrorism, but in that of asylum-seeking. The respondents were all, at the time when their applications were heard in the Administrative Court, asylum seekers. The Secretary of State decided that they did not make their claims for asylum as soon as reasonably practicable after their arrival in the United Kingdom. So they were excluded from conventional support by the National Asylum Support Service under Part VI of the Immigration and Asylum 145 (1985) Cmnd 9593; it came into force in 1987 and it was ratified by the UK in December 1988.

146 (1991) Cm 1634; it was ratified by the UK in June 1988. For discussion, see Evans, M and Morgan, R, Preventing Torture: A Study of the European Convention for the Prevention of Torture, 1998. The right to freedom from torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment is also recognised in Art 5 of the Universal Declaration on Human Rights and in many jurisdictions: see Clayton and Tomlinson The Law of Human Rights, 2000, Chapter 8, esp pp 412–29. Torture is a crime under International Law: see R v Bow Street Stipendiary Magistrate ex p Pinochet Ugarte (No 3) [1999] 2 WLR 827.

147 HC 11.1.06 col GC107.

148 See (2007) The Times 27 April.

149 House of Lords: [2005] UKHL 66; Court of Appeal: [2004] QB 1440. For discussion of the case, see Warbrick, C, in Fenwick, Masterman and Phillipson (eds), Judicial Reasoning Under the Human Rights Act, 2007.

Act 1999 (the 1999 Act) by s 55(1) of the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002. The question considered by the House of Lords was whether the Secretary of State was nevertheless obliged by s 55(5)(a) of the 2002 Act to provide support for the respondents under Part VI of the 1999 Act (asylum support) for the purpose of avoiding a breach of Art 3 within the meaning of the HRA. The Court of Appeal and House of Lords dismissed the Secretary of State's appeal against the finding that he was obliged to provide the support in question.

The dissenting judges in the Court of Appeal took the view that it might be possible to justify some forms of Art 3 treatment. They took the view that Art 3 covers degrees of ill-treatment, some of which might be capable of justification. Laws LJ[150] suggested that some acts which exposed the individual to grave suffering from his point of view, might, nevertheless be justified if they arise in the administration or execution of government policy. He subjected Art 3[151] to a spectrum analysis, finding that at one end of the spectrum were acts of violence, including torture, authorised by the state, which are absolutely forbidden. At the other end of the spectrum, he found, a decision in the exercise of lawful policy might expose an individual to a marked degree of suffering due to his particular circumstances, which could be subject to justification. Laws LJ took the view that a decision in relation to policy would be lawful unless the degree of suffering for the individual was so high that the Court was bound to limit its right to implement the policy.

Lord Nicholls, however, found in the House of Lords that an exercise of judgment is required in order to determine whether in any given case the treatment or punishment has attained the necessary degree of severity. He found that at that point it would be open to a court to consider whether, taking all the facts into account, that test had been satisfied. But he found that it would be wrong to lend any encouragement to the idea that the test could be more exacting where the treatment or punishment which would otherwise be found to be inhuman or degrading was the result of what Laws LJ referred to as legitimate government policy. He said that that would be to:

> . . . introduce into the absolute prohibition, by the backdoor, considerations of proportionality. They are relevant when an obligation to do something is implied into the Convention. In that case the obligation of the state is not absolute and unqualified. But proportionality, which gives a margin of appreciation to states, has no part to play when conduct for which it is directly responsible results in inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. The obligation to refrain from such conduct is absolute.[152]

It appears therefore that the key question that arises when deportation to another country is contemplated on the basis that the potential deportee poses a risk to national security is whether the ill-treatment to which he might be exposed crosses the Art 3 threshold.

150 [2004] QB 1440, at para 68.
151 Ibid, para 70.
152 At para 55.

Indefinite detention without trial – incompatibility with Article 3?

Part 4 ATCSA allowed for indefinite detention without trial. It was repealed, but the possibility of reinstating detention without trial was retained in the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005, as discussed below. It would require a derogation from Art 5 to activate the PTA provisions. It is arguable that subjecting a person to such detention in itself breaches Art 3, as considered in R v Offen.[153] The detainee's position could remain uncertain for a very long period. It could be argued in such an instance that detention for an indefinite period of time, combined with the psychological damage caused by such uncertainty and by the inability to reach a secure position, could in itself amount to Art 3 treatment. The conditions of detention on the high security wing of Belmarsh prison have been criticised, and in particular the point was made that they were inappropriate in respect of detainees who have suffered severe psychological damage after being tortured abroad.[154]

There is also the possibility that the application of the derogating control orders scheme (if it is deployed) under PTA 2005 could in itself amount to Art 3 treatment where the only means of escape for non-British citizens from indefinite detention without trial in prison conditions[155] would be to accept the risk of Art 3 treatment abroad. Could it be said in itself to amount to Art 3 treatment to confront a person over a long period of time with such a dilemma, causing severe mental distress? In other words, having been detained without trial for, say, three years, such a detainee might feel, with mounting anguish, that she has no real choice but to take that risk, since she sees little prospect of release otherwise. If the deportation or extradition of a person to a country where she is at risk of facing Art 3 treatment is in breach of Art 3, it is arguable that one could say the same, in principle, of forcing a person to choose between indefinite detention without trial and accepting the risk of Art 3 treatment abroad, since the 'choice' is so circumscribed.

The application of Part 4 placed – and was intended to place – some detainees in the position of being forced to choose between two fundamental rights – the rights to liberty and to freedom from torture or inhuman or degrading treatment. It appeared therefore possible to argue that Part 4 was incompatible with Art 3 since it was so deeply opposed to the values it enshrines. However, that argument was not accepted in SIAC or in the Court of Appeal when Part 4 was challenged in A and Others v Secretary of State for the Home Dept;[156] as discussed below, Part 4 was repealed due to the finding in the House of Lords that it was incompatible with Arts 5 and 14. However it is possible that this argument may be raised at Strasbourg, or if detention

153 [2001] 1 WLR 253, CA.

154 The National Council for the Welfare of Muslim Prisoners visited a detainee, Mahmoud Abu Rideh; his supporters argued that after being tortured in Israel, prison could not provide the quality of care that he needed.

155 The detainees were kept in remand conditions. The National Council for the Welfare of Muslim Prisoners asked for a meeting with the Home Secretary in order to raise concerns regarding the conditions under which the s 23 detainees were kept. They were subject to prolonged periods of solitary confinement (see the Guardian 15 April 2002, p 8) in Belmarsh prison's high-security unit and in Highdown prison. It may be noted that the detainees were visited over a period of five days by the Anti-Torture Committee of the Council of Europe: Strasbourg 22 February 2002; the UK has not yet agreed to make its report available to the public.

156 (2004) UKHL 56; [2005] 2 AC 68; [2005] 2 WLR 87; [2005] 3 All ER 169.

without trial is reinstated, under the derogating control orders scheme introduced in 2005, that it might eventually be re-raised domestically.

Government Ministers might seek to counter this argument on the ground that there must come a point at which the responsibility of democratic states for the treatment by some countries of their own citizens should cease and that, moreover, the responsibility of such states for the safety of their own citizens should not be undermined due to the evil propensities of other regimes. A member of a terrorist group at risk of Art 3 treatment might be likely to have the resources and ability to leave such a regime and enter Britain. It might seem anomalous to find that the mere fact of so doing should prevent both his detention and deportation. It was argued, and accepted in the Court of Appeal in A and Others, that the possibility of detention rather than deportation to face the risk of Art 3 treatment, represents a compromise designed to avoid Art 3 treatment that falls short in itself of such treatment, taking into account the duties of democracies in respect of suspected terrorists and public safety.

Discrimination – Article 14

A number of the powers discussed below can be challenged – and have been challenged – by reading Arts 6, 5, 10, 8 and Art 1, Protocol 1 with Art 14[157] together on the basis that a number of provisions may create discrimination on the basis of race or nationality, direct or (possibly), indirect. (The question of indirect discrimination under Art 14 is examined in Chapter 15.)[158] The discrimination may be justifiable, but only if the demands of proportionality are satisfied; that would mean that there had to be a rational connection between the interference in question and the aim pursued, and that the interference went no further than necessary to achieve that end.[159] The key anti-terrorist measure adopted post-9/11 under Part IV ATCSA allowed non-British suspected international terrorists to be detained without trial. This detention scheme was abandoned since, inter alia, it was found by the House of Lords to be discriminatory on the ground of nationality and therefore it contravened the European Convention on Human Rights, Arts 5 and 14, in the seminal decision in A and Others v Secretary of State for the Home Dept,[160] discussed below.

3 The Terrorism Acts 2000 and 2006 – extending the ambit of the counter-terrorism scheme

This part of this chapter begins by focusing on the pre-2000 position. It then considers the change from the UK's counter-terrorist response of the 70s, 80s and 90s which occurred under the Labour Government with the introduction of the Terrorism Act 2000 (TA). The TA represented a break with the previous counter-terrorist policy in certain respects, although it appeared to represent merely a rationalisation of the law. The TA proscription provisions are evaluated; then, in looking at the special TA terrorism 157 See pp 1431–38. Article 14 provides a guarantee of non-discrimination in the context of the other rights. Even where the other Article would not be breached if read alone, it may be found to be breached when read with Art 14. See Chapter 2, pp 108–9; Chapter 15, pp 1482–86.

158 See p 1483.

159 See Chapter 4, pp 288–90.

160 (2004) UKHL 56; [2005] 2 AC 68; [2005] 2 WLR 87; [2005] 3 All ER 169.

offences it also considers the very important new provisions allowing extensions of the counter-terrorist scheme introduced under the Terrorism Act 2006.

The legal and political background to the Terrorism Act 2000[161]

The recent history of the UK's counter-terrorism legislation – essentially the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 (the 'PTA') and the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996 (the 'EPA'), as amended by the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1998 – revealed some acceptance of the principle that emergency measures should be adopted only in the face of immediate and severe need. When the then Home Secretary Roy Jenkins introduced the first Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act in 1974, he referred to the powers it granted as 'unprecedented in peacetime' but 'fully justified to meet the clear present danger'. The Act was introduced soon after the Birmingham pub bombings that same year, in which 21 people died and over 180 were injured.

Despite pronouncements such as that of Lord Jenkins, which are scattered across the Parliamentary debates of the 70s, 80s and 90s on extensions of the counter-terrorist legislation, it cannot be said that Parliament demonstrated a genuine commitment to the principle that such legislation must be introduced only to meet a clear and present danger. In the 1990s Parliament quite frequently showed a marked readiness to accept claims that a number of proposed statutory measures would lead to the curbing of terrorist activity. Although such measures were likely to represent an infringement of civil liberties, they did not in general encounter determined criticism from the opposition. For example, the debate in the House of Commons on the Prevention of Terrorism (Additional Powers) Act 1996, which was guillotined, failed to consider in depth either the efficacy of the measure in terms of curbing terrorist activity or its likely impact on civil liberties. The debate provided, in microcosm, a good instance of the debasement and impoverishment of Parliamentary criminal justice debate in the mid-1990s. The Labour Party supported the proposals partly on the narrow ground that they represented only a small increase in the extended police powers to combat terrorism, which were included in the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, and which were not challenged on grounds of principle at the Committee stage of that Bill.[162] Issues as to the real value of these powers were raised only by certain back benchers due to pressure of time and to the stance of the Labour leadership.

The incremental extension of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989, which was originally intended in 1974 to be a temporary measure, reluctantly adopted as an unpalatable but necessary response to an emergency, is charted below. Many of the measures discussed in this chapter clearly indicate a willingness to abandon the rule of law in the face of terrorism despite uncertainty as to the need to adopt them. The pre-2000 pattern, as this chapter indicates, was one of steady additions to those 'temporary' provisions, meaning, inevitably, that provisions originally viewed as draconian began to look normal and acceptable compared with their successors.

161 For further comment, see Brandon, B, 'Terrorism, Human Rights and the Rule of Law: 120 years of the UK's legal response to terrorism' [2004] Crim LR 981.

162 See Straw, J, HC Deb, 2 April 1996 col 221.

Thus, what may be termed the old model for counter-terrorist legislation – temporary, incrementally developed in the face of particular emergencies, with localised effect – could readily be viewed as flawed on the ground that it was deceptive. Also the legislation became more far-reaching as the terrorist activity diminished. As explained below, it was at its most extensive, as a temporary measure, in 1998, although the peace process was in being. Nevertheless, it had not entirely lost touch with the values espoused by Lord Jenkins in 1974, in the sense that additions to the original legislation were relatively minor and usually had at least an apparent justification as a response to a genuine danger. The Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998, for example, was passed in the wake of the Omagh bombing, carried out by the splinter-group, the Real IRA, which caused the deaths of some 22 people.

The pre-2000 temporary counter-terrorism legislation

Although the level of Irish terrorist violence was at its highest between 1968 when the Troubles began and the early 70s, extension of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1974 and then of the 1989 Act continued to occur over the succeeding 25 years, under Thatcher, Major and Blair. The 1974 Act was passed at time when the level of IRA violence was very high: in 1973 there were 86 explosions; before the Birmingham pub bombs 20 people had been killed in 1974 and over 150 injured. In 1972 103 soldiers and 321 civilians died. The argument in favour of adopting extreme rights-abridging measures looked reasonably plausible in the early 1970s. The Report of Lord Diplock's Commission led to the passage of the EPA. As well as providing special powers for the security forces, the 1973 Act established different arrangements, including mode of trial, for terrorist cases. It was also made subject to annual review and to renewal by Parliamentary debate. Features of the earlier pre- and post-war anti-IRA measures were found in the EPA which provided a model for the 1974 Act and was similarly extended:[163] 'One of [the EPA's] features has been a steady increase in size and scope'.[164] As noted at various points below, the more draconian measures were confined to Northern Ireland. Where the threat was perceived to be most obvious, therefore, the measures were more far-reaching. This is not to suggest that the measures were justified or effective. It has been said: '[the EPA's] real purpose is to placate the electorate, as well as some of the elected, who demand that some steps must be taken by the law to counteract terrorism, regardless of how effective these might prove in practice'.[165]

The original emergency provisions under the 1974 Act had a renewal period of six months. This was soon extended to one year under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1976. The Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 included 'international terrorism' for the first time among its provisions. It was to be regularly reviewed and was to expire in five years. It was replaced by the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989, also subject to annual renewal, but without the five-year time limit. By 2000 the PTA had been in existence 163 It was amended in 1975, consolidated in 1978, amended again in 1987 and consolidated with further amendments in 1991 and 1996.

164 Bailey, Harris and Jones Civil Liberties: Cases and Materials, 1st edn, 1995 at p 283.

165 Dickson, B, 'Northern Ireland's Emergency legislation' [1992] PL 592, at p 597.

for 11 years and was extended again throughout the 1990s. It was renewed for the last time[166] immediately after the Second Reading on the Terrorism Bill 2000.

Since 1989 additional powers were added by subsequent statutes – the Criminal Justice Act 1993, the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, the Prevention of Terrorism (Additional Powers) Act 1996 and the Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998. The Northern Irish provisions followed a similar pattern, culminating in the passing of the Northern Ireland (Temporary Provisions) Act 1998. Paradoxically, although the level of violence had dropped over the 25 years since the first Act was passed, its pre-2000 successor represented a greatly enlarged version of the first Act. Extension was not discouraged by the cease-fire in September 1994 (which broke down in 1996) or the peace process in 1998. Thus, the notion that only a severe emergency, such as the one which appeared to be in being in 1974, could justify such far-reaching provisions, was gradually abandoned. The reality behind the 'temporary' provisions appeared to be that for much of the twentieth-century UK governments kept emergency legislation on file or in suspension, ready to be brought into law at short notice under a supine Parliament.

This governmental stance persisted, despite the fact that the efficacy of the Prevention of Terrorism Acts remained in doubt. Walker found that the Act was 'largely peripheral in effect'[167] and that the ordinary criminal law was on the whole being used against terrorism. The fact that the level of violence had tended to drop over the 25 years (albeit inconsistently) since 1974 did not appear to be attributable to the operation of the 1974 Act or its successors, but to changes in policy at government level and within the Republican organisations themselves. The level of violence was in fact particularly high in the two years immediately after the 1974 Act was passed. It may therefore be said that Parliament demonstrated, not only that it was willing to move quickly to cut down freedoms in situations perceived as emergencies, but that it then showed little inclination to repeal the measures adopted, preferring instead a process of normalisation, extension and accretion.

The Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998

Once the peace process in Northern Ireland was placed on a formal basis under the British Irish Agreement reached in the multi-party negotiations[168] the fear became that splinter groups such as the Continuity IRA and the Real IRA, who, for various reasons deplored the abandonment of para-military tactics, would seek to disrupt it. This occurred in the Omagh bombing carried out by the Real IRA, in August 1998. It prompted the introduction in the 1998 Act of new draconian anti-terrorist measures to be inserted into the PTA. The Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Bill 1998 was rushed through both Houses in two days (in fact, 27 hours) in the wake of the bombing. The argument for the speed was that the powers it contained were needed immediately for operational reasons. The Bill was only published to MPs at 6 pm on the day before the debate. A two-line whip was imposed on Labour MPs and the opposition parties supported the Bill. Nevertheless, a number of MPs opposed it on the basis that even in the face of terrorism the freedom to discuss the legislative response should not be abandoned.[169]

166 Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 (Continuance) Order 2000. See HC Debs 15 March 2000 col 474.

167 Walker, C, The Prevention of Terrorism, 1986, at p 183.

168 Cm 3883 (1998).

The Act was intended to make it easier to convict members of proscribed groups; it introduced ss 2A and 2B into the PTA for that purpose (discussed below). In fact no immediate action at all was taken in reliance on the powers the Act conferred. After two months the UK Act had still not been used (the equivalent legislation in Northern Ireland had been) although persons had been arrested in respect of the bombing. It appeared that the Act was passed more as a propaganda exercise than because the powers were genuinely needed. The Act ensured 'symmetry' with Ireland since the Dail was passing a similar Act on the same day. It was suggested in Parliament that the Act had in reality been passed in order to win the approval of President Clinton who was visiting Belfast in the same week.[170] Apart from such 'political' motivation, the curtailment of Parliamentary debate and its debatable efficacy in practice, a frequent hallmark of 'emergency' legislation is that other, unrelated controversial provisions which have been awaiting an opportune moment to get onto the statute book are added,[171] and are also able to take advantage of the stifling of Parliamentary debate which occurs in apparent response to the 'emergency'. The Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998 exhibited all these characteristics.

The Act brought together two entirely separate and controversial matters – provisions related to proscribed terrorist organisations and to conspiracies. Only the first of these was clearly concerned with the threat and use of violence for political ends (terrorism as defined in the 1989 Act, s 20(1)). Section 5 of the Act added s 1A to the Criminal Law Act 1977, making it a criminal offence to conspire in any act 'or other event' which would also be an offence under the law of a foreign country so long as the offence in question would also be unlawful in the UK.[172] It was not therefore confined to terrorist offences as defined in s 20 of the 1989 Act, although it was introduced in terrorist legislation. The conspiracy can be to commit any offence, however trivial, so long as it is an offence in both Britain and the 'target' country. The s 1A offence opened up the possibility that politically active refugees discussing possible means of overcoming repressive regimes abroad might fall foul of s 5.[173] It was pointed out in Parliament that the provisions could also apply to 'an environmental pressure group organising a peaceful protest in Germany against the dispatch of some toxic material to Britain'.[174] This would be the case, assuming that the protest would be likely to infringe criminal law in both Britain and Germany.

The government considered that sufficient safeguards were introduced in providing that the offence plotted must be a crime in both countries and by requiring that, in most cases, the Attorney General must give his personal consent, having regard to the public interest, for the prosecution. The government stated its belief that:

169 See, e.g., comments of Richard Shepherd MP Hansard House of Commons 2nd September 1998 cols 714 and 715.

170 Mr J Sayeed HC Debs 2nd September 1998 col 726.

171 The Bill substantially reproduced provisions in an earlier Bill on conspiracy which the Major Government had been forced to drop in 1996.

172 It may be noted that Crown servants are exempted from these provisions, presumably on the ground that otherwise they would catch some activities of the Security and Intelligence Services.

173 It is ironic to note that plans to assassinate Hitler during World War 2 by, e.g., dissident Germans in England would have been covered by s 5.

174 By Mr Alan Beith, Deputy Leader of the Liberal Democrats, HC Debs 2 Sept 1998 col 735.

> these provisions strike the right balance between ensuring it is possible to take decisive action against those plotting terrorist and other criminal acts elsewhere from the UK while building in safeguards . . . these provisions on conspiracy will continue to play an important role in deterring international terrorists from using this country as a base for their operations.[175]

These arguments and those used in Parliament were, however, disingenuous in their indications that the new provisions were necessary in order to curb international terrorism. Section 1A of the 1977 Act made no mention of terrorism and left a disturbingly broad discretion to the Attorney General as to their use against non-terrorist groups.

This Act represented the final extension of the temporary legislation and, in terms of the proscription-related provisions, indicated the willingness of the Labour Government to depart from previously accepted criminal justice standards – a characteristic which found a much fuller expression in the Terrorism Act 2000. The 1998 Act was the fore-runner of the Act of 2000 and in some respects it foreshadowed the developments of that Act since it introduced a far-reaching and controversial change to standards of criminal evidence[176] and brought an unprecedented range of groups within its ambit.

The single, permanent anti-terrorism statute – the Terrorism Act 2000

Key themes

The permanent counter-terrorist scheme created by the TA 2000 under the current Labour Government represented a dramatic break with the values arguably adhered to in relation to the previous scheme – that as emergency legislation the provisions should be temporary and graduated to the level and location of the threat. The peace process in Northern Ireland culminating in the British Irish Agreement reached in the multi-party negotiations[177] is still in existence.[178] The process and the Agreement, which included releasing those imprisoned on terrorist charges, recognised that criminalisation of persons engaging in a struggle largely viewed in Republican communities in Northern Ireland as political, was counter-productive. It gave the impression to those communities that no real alternative other than violence was available to them. The Agreement has, to an extent, marginalised those Republican splinter groups which rejected the possibility of a peaceful solution, preferring to continue the use of para-military tactics. By the end of 1999, just before introduction of the TA, some of these groups had also declared a cease-fire, although some remained adamantly opposed to the peace process. As the 1998 Labour Government consultation paper Legislation Against Terrorism[179] put it:

175 Legislation Against Terrorism: a Consultation Paper Cm 4178, prepared 17 December 1998, at para 4.18.

176 The provisions inserting s 2A into the PTA.

177 Cm 3883 (1998).

178 It may be noted that in November 1999 after Senator Mitchell had negotiated a settlement Sinn Fein announced the beginning of de-commissioning.

179 Home Office and Northern Ireland Office Legislation against Terrorism. A consultation paper, Cm 4178, prepared 17 December 1998.

'subsequent progress including elections to the Northern Ireland Assembly mean that the outlook in Northern Ireland is changing, and suggest that the days of widespread violence and terrorism may soon be gone for good'.

Repeal of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1979 which, in its original form, was introduced after the IRA pub bombings in Birmingham in 1974, might therefore have been expected. This would probably have been the expectation in 1974. The PTA embodied the paradoxical nature of the measures adopted for use against the IRA over the last 20 years. As Ewing and Gearty have pointed out, it and its predecessors were adopted as emergency anti-terrorist measures, but were then applied as ordinary criminal legislation.[180] Since the 'criminalisation' approach had largely been abandoned, repeal of much of the legislation that accompanied it would have appeared to be appropriate. Since a threat from 'international terrorism' remained, it could have been met by powers graduated to levels of threat. In fact, the counter-terrorism provision post-2000 under the Terrorism Act 2000 is more extensive than in the worst years of Irish terrorist violence. The provisions are, on their face, graduated only in respect of the two different regimes for proscribed and other terrorist groups. This chapter argues that the Labour Government in 2000 showed little recognition of the need to repeal provisions viewed as tolerable only for a short period of time in the face of a pressing emergency, and which were accompanied by a conscious acceptance of an abandonment of democratic ideals.

Ironically, the key development able to temper the excesses of the TA was the Human Rights Act (HRA), although the UK also remained bound by the ECHR at the international level. As the findings of the Divisional Court and House of Lords in Ex parte Kebilene[181] (discussed below) indicate, the HRA had already shown its potential in this regard before the TA was introduced. Interestingly, the consultation paper which preceded the legislation[182] appeared to assume that most of its proposals would not lead to conflicts with the Convention, under the HRA. At certain points this issue was explicitly addressed; at others the relevant Convention Articles were simply not mentioned. When the Home Secretary introduced the Terrorism Bill to Parliament in December 1999 he made a declaration of its compatibility with the Convention rights under s 19(1)(a) HRA, but obviously the courts remained at liberty to find incompatibility.[183]

This was an instance in which the courts were clearly going to have the key role to play in tempering the potential of the legislation. This was apparent, bearing in mind the role played by Parliament in debating the Terrorism Bill 2000, which was circumscribed – in civil liberties' terms – due to the very large majority of the Labour Government and the stance of the main opposition party. Parliament had already shown itself willing to pass draconian legislation, the Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998, with no significant amendment, although during debate concerns were strongly 180 Freedom under Thatcher, 1989, p 213.

181 Divisional Court [1999] 3 WLR 372; HL [1999] 4 All ER 801, available from the Lords' website. It may be noted that Ex p Kebilene concerned legislation, the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, s 82, passed under the Major Government. But the provisions at issue have been reproduced in the Act of 2000 in ss 57 and 58 (see below).

182 Cm 4178, prepared 17 December 1998.

183 See further Chapter 4, pp 206–11.

expressed in certain quarters.[184] In debate on the Bill of 2000 the main proposals made by the Conservative opposition were more draconian than those of the government. They included the re-introduction of internment[185] and the extension of detention by executive, not judicial, authorisation.[186] The stance of the courts was also of indirect significance in shaping the response of the executive to the TA powers.

As discussed below, at many points the TA powers leave a very broad and thinly regulated discretion to the executive. The most significant executive decision is that of the Home Secretary in determining whether or not to seek the proscription of a particular group. A further example is provided by the power of the Attorney General to give or withhold consent to prosecutions for the offence of conspiracy in the UK to commit offences abroad. It is to be expected that where the conspirators are seeking to overthrow a dictatorship, the consent would be withheld, even though, technically the offence has been committed. Section 117 TA requires the consent of the DPP or the Attorney General to prosecutions in respect of most offences under the TA 2000. Obviously, the police always have a discretion in determining when to arrest. Lord Carlile, the government reviewer of the TA, said on this point, in his 2006 Review of the TA, having acknowledged that the TA, s 1, while, in his view, 'practical and effective', leaves a lot of discretion to the prosecuting authorities: 'we are entitled to assume that in a democratically accountable system there will be a sensible use of the discretion to prosecute'.[187] It is a hallmark of terrorist legislation that it is often marginalised in favour of the use of ordinary criminal provisions.[188] It was clear from the outset that if, when prosecutions were brought, the judiciary took a robust line as regards ECHR standards, under their ss 3 or 6 HRA duty, it would be possible to address executive failures to achieve full Convention-compliance. As discussed below, the courts have brought a number of provisions of the TA into closer compliance with the ECHR.

Introduction of the Terrorism Act 2000; relationship with the previous scheme

The government published a consultation paper on the future of anti-terrorism laws in December 1998.[189] It was intended to address the question of the rationale of retaining 'emergency' anti-terrorism laws in the face of the peace process[190] and therefore to counter the argument that the current version of the PTA with its various later accretions should be repealed and not replaced. The 1998 Paper was based on a report prepared 184 See, e.g., Mr Sayeed: 'The government are used to using their very large majority to bully through inadequate legislation,' (HC Debs 2nd Sept 1998 col 726); Mr McNamara: 'The Bill is dangerous and we have been rushed into it without any proper thought' (HC Debs 2nd Sept 1998 col 786).

185 A new Sched 2 and a new clause which would have effected this was proposed: HC Debs 15 March 2000 cols 331–37. Both were defeated, Labour and Liberal Democrat MPs voting together: HC Debs 15 March 2000 col 347.

186 HC Debs 15 March 2000 col 431.

187 Report on the Operation in 2005 of the Terrorism Act 2000, May 2006, at para 30.

188 See: Walker, C, The Prevention of Terrorism, 1986 at p 183.

189 Legislation against Terrorism. A Consultation Paper, Cm 4178.

190 See the Introduction to the Paper, and in particular para 6.

by Lord Lloyd of Berwick in 1996.[191] In 1995 Lord Lloyd had been asked by Michael Howard, the then Home Secretary, to consider the future of anti-terrorist legislation on the assumption that a lasting peace was achieved. He recommended in his report that a new permanent anti-terrorist law should replace the temporary provisions. The policy adopted in his report formed the background to the consultation paper and in turn to the Terrorism Bill 2000. Once the Act of 2000 came into force, it repealed the PTA and EPA.[192] The TA has four key hallmarks. It is far more extensive, covering a much wider range of groups; it is permanent; its main provisions apply equally across the UK, although there were special transitional provisions for Northern Ireland, and it retains almost all the draconian special powers and offences adopted under the previous 'temporary' counter-terrorist scheme, while adding new incitement offences.

The justification for the TA provisions was that they were needed post-2000 to combat the threat from three groups. The first of these comprised those Irish splinter groups opposed to the peace process.[193] The second comprised 'international terrorists'. The paper noted that across the world there had been 'a rise in terrorism motivated by religious idealism'.[194] Both these groups were already covered under the existing legislation, although not all the special provisions were applied equally to international terrorism. The threat was apparently mainly from the new, third, group, on which the case for the new legislation appeared mainly to rest. This group comprised of a wide and disparate range of domestic groups other than those connected with Irish terrorism, such as animal rights or environmental activists,[195] and, possibly, anti-abortion groups.[196]

191 Lord Lloyd of Berwick's Inquiry into legislation against terrorism (Cm 3420), published in October 1996.

192 As noted below, the PTA was renewed for the last time on 15 March 2000. The EPA was renewed for the last time on 24 August 2000. The special measures it provided for Northern Ireland will be provided in Part VII of the Act of 2000.

193 In the Paper the government found: 'there are small numbers who remain opposed to peace and wedded to violence. So, even though the context is of a general movement towards lasting peace in Northern Ireland, it is too soon to be confident that all terrorism has been abandoned' (ibid, para 2.3).

194 Lord Lloyd's Report drew attention to 'possible future changes in the terrorist threat' and to lives and property in the UK; 'changes which mirror what is happening across the world' (ibid, para 2.4). Examples were given of the rise of 'Islamic extremism' and the use of Sarin nerve gas on the Tokyo underground in 1995 by the Aum Shinrikyo religious cult, which killed 12 people and affected up to 5,500.

195 'The threat from some marginal but extreme elements of the animal rights movement continues to be of more concern to the Government [than Scottish or Welsh nationalist groups].' The Paper noted that animal rights extremists have in the past sent letter bombs to the leaders of major political parties, attacked Bristol University's Senate House with a high explosive bomb, targeted a veterinary surgeon and a psychologist with car bombs and caused millions of pounds worth of damage. 'The shape of new counter-terrorist legislation needs to reflect the possible threat from indigenous groups too' (Chapter 2 of the Paper, at para 2.5). In Chapter 3 of the Paper the concerns regarding these groups are given some further substance. It is noted that in 1997 more than 800 incidents were recorded by the Animal Rights National Index (ARNI) and 'these included attacks on abattoirs, laboratories, breeders, hunts, butchers, chemists, doctors, vets, furriers, restaurants, supermarkets and other shops' which resulted in injuries although not in deaths and in damage done in 1997 estimated at more than 1.8 million (ibid, para 3.10). See also Home Office, Animal Rights Extremism, 2001.

196 The Paper speculated as to the possibility that anti-abortion groups might adopt terrorist methods in the UK: 'In the United States, for example, there is an increasing tendency by individuals and groups to resort to terrorist methods. Some of those opposed to the USA's laws on abortion have bombed clinics and attacked, and, in a number of cases, killed doctors and nursing staff employed by them.

The paper accepted that the level of violence associated with such groups was low compared with the level of IRA violence in the early 1970s. However, it argued that those groups posed a continuing threat and that other single issue groups might be set up and might use violent methods 'to impose their will on the rest of society'.[197] Thus, the paper switched the focus of concern from the need for measures to combat a high and rising level of violence to the need to be ready to combat the possibility of violence in the future. The threat of violence from environmental, animal rights' or anti-abortion activists might have appeared to be a real possibility but it had not, pre-2000, materialised on anything like the scale previously thought of as necessary to justify draconian anti-terrorist laws. Moreover, the ordinary criminal law, including the wide range of public order provisions documented in Chapter 8, was arguably adequate as a response to the activities of such groups. The paper merely provided assertions rather than evidence as to the need for special counter-terrorist measures, as opposed to a more effective use of the existing criminal law. No effort was made to analyse the need for the extension of the special provisions to a very wide range of new groups, including protest groups. The Paper did not appear, for example, to draw on experience from other countries, including European ones, which were equally faced with extremist groups. The problems experienced in the US were mentioned, but the Paper did not examine the efficacy of the means used to combat them.

The conclusion of the government in the consultation paper was that a threat comparable to that existing in 1974 could be discerned: 'In the language of the then Home Secretary introducing the PTA legislation in 1974, the Government believes that there exists now a clear and present terrorist threat to the UK from a number of fronts.'[198] But if those examples of group violence are compared with those available in 1974, it is immediately apparent that they were far more uncertain and speculative. The keynote of the paper was the need to safeguard the UK from future threats from indigenous groups, most of which had not arisen. The unquestioned assumption was that the legislation would aid in countering any future threat before it materialised. No attention was paid in the paper to the possibility of counter-productivity – that the designation of some indigenous groups as terrorist might encourage a growth in extremism within such groups which might as a result perceive themselves as unable to use the normal channels of political campaigning. In comparison with the climate in 1974 or even, to a lesser extent, in 1998, in the wake of the Omagh bombing, the case for the TA based on the threats indicated, was not, it is argued, made out.

The intention was that the Terrorism Act 2000 would be permanent; this had the advantage, as the paper pointed out,[199] of being 'transparent', that is, no pretence was made that the legislation would be repealed. This was a strong argument, given the spurious nature, indicated above, of claims that the previous legislation was temporary and passed only in response to a current emergency. But it abandoned even the pretence that temporary and regrettable emergency measures, involving an ordinarily unacceptable infringement of civil liberties, were in contemplation. The paper noted

Although there have been no comparable attacks in the United Kingdom, the possibility remains that some new group or individual could operate in this way in the future' (ibid, para 3.12).

197 Para 3.12.

198 Ibid, at para 2.7.

199 Ibid, at para 2.8.

that the vast majority of criminal law is permanent, implying that this provided a reason for abandoning the temporary nature of the counter-terrorism legislation and thereby blurring past distinctions between criminal law and special measures adopted to meet specific emergencies.

Parliamentary scrutiny of the new legislation was also virtually abandoned, although the government did accept concerns expressed in the Second Reading of the Bill, to the extent of agreeing to an annual report to Parliament.[200] A clause supported by the Liberal Democrats making the legislation renewable was rejected by the government[201] and no provision for the full review of the legislation was included. Therefore it was intended that the permanent powers would receive even less scrutiny than the temporary ones did. The clause was withdrawn after the Home Office Minister had pointed out that the Human Rights Act would provide 'an important new safeguard'.[202] The justification offered for abandoning the review process was that it did not, 'reflect the current reality that such powers are likely to be needed for the foreseeable future'.[203] This bland statement, based on little evidence, failed to take account of the fact that these powers were adopted and extended over a long period of time (apparently) to meet the serious threat posed by a particular group of highly-organised terrorists, the IRA, commanding a range of arms. It also failed to take account of the need for Parliamentary scrutiny to oversee the workings of the powers. It left their use far more overtly in executive as opposed to Parliamentary hands.

If certain of the powers were not used in practice it should have been possible to repeal them, and in fact the powers were strikingly under-used, post-2000; an annual review would have provided a forum for arguing for such repeal. This appeared to be precisely what the government was seeking to avoid, presumably in the interests of avoiding political controversy. While the TA may have greater symbolic than real value, government spokespersons in public statements take the stance that all the powers are genuinely needed, making it difficult to explain why they are under-used. Human rights appeared to be viewed as a commodity which could be afforded value only when convenient. While it may be argued that the previous review process achieved little, it was at least possible, in the post-HRA era, that such a process could have allowed for a stricter scrutiny.

The main provisions of the Terrorism Act 2000 apply equally across the UK. This, on its face, represents a more satisfactory approach than passing more draconian legislation for Northern Ireland, which had in the past been the case, or, in effect, trying out such legislation in Northern Ireland first and then transferring it to the rest of the UK. But once again it eroded the principle that the special powers should be as narrow as possible; although counter-terrorist legislation appeared to have been adopted in Northern Ireland for reasons other than its efficacy in countering terrorism,[204] it is undeniable that the threat of terrorism was greater in Northern Ireland than in the rest of the UK. The universal application of the TA was initially only an aspiration, since under Part VII of the Act it retained for five years a number of differentials between 200 See HC Debs 15 March 2000 col 360. This provision is now s 126.

201 See HC Debs 15 March 2000 cols 352–56.

202 See HC Debs 15 March 2000 col 363.

203 Ibid, para 2.8.

204 See: Dickson, B, 'Northern Ireland's Emergency legislation' [1992] PL 592, at p 597.

the powers applicable to Northern Ireland and to Britain.[205] The TA included in Part VII a number of temporary provisions specific to Northern Ireland. The government stated that its objective was: 'progressively to transform the security environment as appropriate, and achieve complete normalisation as part of the implementation of the [Belfast] Agreement as a whole'. Once that was achieved, the government's position was that there would be no need for any temporary Northern Ireland specific powers.[206] The temporary provisions were made subject to annual review and to Parliament's approval of the Home Secretary's orders of renewal.[207]

Extending the definition of 'terrorism' under the Terrorism Act 2000

The definition of 'terrorism' under the TA provides the foundation for a very wide range of broad special terrorism offences in the TA, and for those subsequently introduced under the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 and the Terrorism Act 2006. The definition also allows, as discussed below, for the application of special terrorism sanctions under the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005, not dependent on charging a person with a specific offence and without proof of an offence.

Defining 'terrorism'

The problem of defining terrorism has spawned an extensive literature.[208] One 1988 study identified a total of 109 different definitions in use across the world[209] and the number is far higher today. Attempts to develop a generally accepted legal definition of terrorism have failed. Golder and Williams find:[210] 'Some have likened "the search for the legal definition of terrorism . . . [to] the quest for the Holy Grail". Others, such as Judge Richard Baxter, formerly of the International Court of Justice, writing in 1974, have questioned the utility of a legal definition, stating: "We have cause to regret that a legal concept of terrorism was ever inflicted upon us. The term is imprecise; it is ambiguous; and, above all it serves no operative legal purpose".'[211]

205 Under s 112(4) the additional temporary measures for Northern Ireland only were time-limited to 5 years.

206 Ibid, para 1.3.

207 This was promised in the Paper (ibid, para 1.4) and is now contained in s 123(4)(f).

208 See, e.g.: Primoritz, I, 'What is Terrorism?' in Gearty, C (ed)Terrorism, 1996, p 130; Butko, T 'Terrorism redefined' (2005) 18 Peace Review 145; Donohue, L K, 'Terrorism and the counter-terrorist discourse' in Ramraj, VV, Hor, M and Roach, K, Global Anti-terrorism Law and Policy, 2005; Claridge, D, 'State terrorism? Applying a definitional model' (1996) 8 Terrorism and Political Violence 47; Levitt, G, 'Is "Terrorism" Worth Defining?' (1986) 13 Ohio Northern University Law Review 97; Schmid, A and Jongman, A Political Terrorism, 1987, Royal Netherlands Academy of Arts and Sciences; Murphy, JF, 'Defining International Terrorism: A Way Out of the Quagmire' (1989) 19 Israel Yearbook on Human Rights 13, 14; Gearty, C, Terror, 1991. Levitt, G, 'Is "Terrorism" Worth Defining?' (1986) 13 Ohio Northern University Law Review 97.

209 Schmid, AP and Jongman, AJ, P*olitical Terrorism: A New Guide to Actors, Authors, Concepts, Databases, Theories, and Literature*, 1988, 5.

210 Golder, B and Williams, G, 'What is "Terrorism"? Problems of Legal Definition' [2004] 27(2) UNSW Law Journal, Vol 27(2) 271, at p 271.

211 Baxter, RR, 'A Skeptical Look at the Concept of Terrorism' (1974) 7 Akron Law Review 380, p 380.

Terrorism was defined in section 20(1) of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 as 'the use of violence for political ends and includes any use of violence for the purpose of putting the public, or any section of the public in fear'. But this did not mean that the PTA powers applied to all activities which fell within that definition. The special powers conferred applied only to 'terrorism connected with the affairs of Northern Ireland' or (in certain instances) to international terrorism. Non-Irish domestic terrorism, that is, terrorism having its origins in the affairs of any part of the United Kingdom other than Northern Ireland, was excluded from the scope of the Act. The s 20 definition of terrorism was in fact extraordinarily wide and imprecise since the use of the word 'includes' meant that the requirement of putting a section of the public in fear was not an essential ingredient of it. The terms 'violence' and 'political ends' were undefined. Arguably, therefore, 'the use of violence for political ends' could have included some direct action public protest. It is unclear whether s 20 was confined to violence against persons. The definition might therefore have been unworkable in practice had it not been for the qualified application of the powers. Even bearing those qualifications in mind, the definition meant that the special powers could be used against a very wide range of activities so long as a connection with Northern Irish affairs or, even more vaguely (in the case of certain powers), an 'international' aspect, could be found. The definition of terrorism in the EPA was identical to that in s 20 of the PTA. The EPA did not impose any limitations on the kinds of terrorism to which it applied. But there appeared to be official agreement that in practice the powers would only be used to combat Irish terrorism.[212]

In his report Lord Lloyd criticised the definition of terrorism in s 20, and the restrictions imposed throughout that Act limiting the use of the powers to certain terrorist groups. He suggested that there is no difference in principle between the activities of those groups and those of domestic 'terrorist' groups unconnected with Irish affairs.[213] Presumably Lord Lloyd, in using the term 'terrorist' in relation to such groups, was relying on the very wide s 20 definition. This, however, failed to address the possibility that this definition would have been unsatisfactory had it not in practice been unused in determining the application of the special powers. If that definition had been solely relied upon, many groups would have fallen within it and in principle would therefore have been subject to the special powers. This raised the question whether a much narrower definition of terrorism should have been used in the TA to justify the broader use of such powers. The government, in supporting a broad definition in the TA, agreed with Lord Lloyd, arguing that the suffering of the victims would be the same, whether caused by 'a republican or loyalist paramilitary, an international terrorist or an animal rights activist'.[214]

But the argument which seeks to extend the definition of terrorism on the basis that the experience of the victims is the same whether the group in question is officially designated 'terrorist' or not is flawed. The experience of a person who is attacked for motives of jealousy or greed is the same as that of one who is killed due to a political motive. Most grave and prolonged of all may be the suffering of the victim of the sexually motivated killer. On this argument, either all serious crimes against the person should be designated terrorist, or no crimes should be. It has been argued that it is the quality of indiscriminate public violence, causing terror, which is fundamental.[215] On the other hand, the fear experienced by many women of being randomly selected for sexual attack may be of a similar quality, and not all terrorist violence is indiscriminate. The reason for treating so-called terrorist activity differently from 'ordinary' crime is not the suffering of the victim, but the potentially profound effect on the established order which terrorism may have but which ordinary crime (unless it reaches certain levels)[216] does not. Ordinary crime is normally targeted directly at the victim; terrorism targets the victim in order to further a political end. Thus, the definition of terrorism should only encompass groups which use attacks on people in order to serve the end of seeking to overthrow or undermine the established order. There is a further issue – should attacks on property alone, or threats to attack property, fall within the definition of terrorism? It might be argued that if the attack on property is targeted deliberately at the property due to its symbolic nature – destroying a field of GM crops would provide an example – and does not carry an implied threat to life, it should fall outside the definition of terrorism since it is only threats to life, implied or actual, or the taking of life that creates terror. The ordinary criminal law could be used in relation to damaging property.

212 Ibid, para 3.2.

213 Ibid, para 3.5.

214 'the methods which ["terrorists"] employ are those in common currency amongst terrorists everywhere – bombs, incendiaries, shootings, arson and so forth. Nor is there any difference in the fear, pain or despair felt by the victims or their families . . . The injuries and the destruction of life and property are the same' (ibid, para 3.6).

Proceeding from its doubtful premise, the government found in the consultation paper that the special powers were needed to combat all forms of 'terrorism', indigenous or otherwise, and that therefore the restricting qualifications under the PTA should be abandoned.[217] But it rejected the option of simply adopting the s 20 definition, without any qualification as to the use of the powers. It agreed with Lord Lloyd in finding the definition too wide in that it could cover the use of trivial violence which should be dealt with by the ordinary criminal law, and too narrow because it might not cover adequately the activities of religiously inspired groups.[218] Lord Lloyd recommended that the definition of terrorism used by the FBI in the USA should be adopted. Its definition at the time was: 'the use of serious violence against persons or property, or the threat to use such violence, to intimidate or coerce a government, the public, or any section of the public in order to promote political, social or ideological objectives'.[219] The government, however, rejected this definition as too broad since it included the use of serious violence for 'social' objectives,[220] and too narrow in that it did not 215 Primoritz, I, 'What is Terrorism?' in Gearty, C (ed) Terrorism, 1996, p 130.

216 Once ordinary crime reaches certain levels it arguably has as de-stabilising an effect on society as terrorism has. For example, in certain parts of the UK ordinary crime has had a very localised profoundly destabilising effect in terms of the encouragement of vigilantism and the infringement and undermining of the enjoyment of the benefits of a civilised society, such as personal security, freedom of movement, privacy etc.

217 Ibid, para 3.13.

218 Ibid, para 3.14.

219 See below fn 223 for the current definition.

220 The latter could, for example, include crimes committed by criminals other than terrorists such as blackmail or extortion for gain (ibid, para 3.16).

cover forms of damage to property.[221] The government stated that its proposed new definition was: 'the use of serious violence against persons or property, or the threat to use such violence, to intimidate or coerce a government, the public, or any section of the public for political, religious or ideological ends'.[222]

The proposed definition was an extraordinarily wide interpretation of 'terrorism'. Clearly, it was intended to include forms of direct action adopted by environmental groups or animal rights' activists. This definition was in some respects wider than that under s 20, since it clearly applied to property as well as persons, and covered serious disruption as well as violence. Its application would also have been far wider than the application of the definition under the PTA. It was, however, narrower than that under s 20 in that it made it clear that intimidating or coercing a government, the public, or any section of the public, was an essential ingredient. The definition actually adopted under s 1 of the TA is significantly wider even than the proposed one or that under s 20.

The definition adopted under the Terrorism Act 2000

The very broad definition adopted under s 1 of the Terrorism Act 2000 (TA),[223] as amended by s 34 Terrorism Act 2006, has three main elements. 'Terrorism' means, first, the use or threat of action involving serious violence against any person or serious damage to property, which endangers the life of any person, or 'creates a serious risk to the health or safety of the public or a section of the public, or is designed seriously to interfere with or seriously to disrupt an electronic system'. Second, the use or threat must be for the purpose of advancing a 'political, religious or ideological' cause. Third, the use or threat must be 'designed to influence the government or an international governmental organisation[224] or to intimidate the public or a section of the public'

221 It appears not to cover the damage and serious disruption which might result from a terrorist '. . . contaminating a public utility system such as a water or sewage works [or] . . . hacking into some vital computer installation and, without using violence, altering, deleting, or disrupting the data held on it' (ibid, para 3.16).

222 Ibid, para 3.17.

223 Section 1 of the Terrorism Act, as amended, provides in full:

(1) In this Act 'terrorism' means the use or threat of action where –

(a) the action falls within sub-section (2),
(b) the use or threat is designed to influence the government or an international governmental organization or to intimidate the public or a section of the public, and
(c) the use or threat is made for the purpose of advancing a political, religious or ideological cause.

(2) Action falls within this sub-section if it –

(a) involves serious violence against a person,
(b) involves serious damage to property,
(c) endangers a person's life, other than that of the person committing the action,
(d) creates a serious risk to the health or safety of the public or a section of the public, or
(e) is designed seriously to interfere with or seriously to disrupt an electronic system.'

224 The words 'or an international governmental organisation' were added by the Terrorism Act 2006, s 34.

(s 1(1)(b)). It may be noted that the third element is not needed if firearms or explosives are used.[225] The Act applies wherever terrorist action takes place, under s 1(4), not just in the UK. The requirement of a threat to the established order contained in the words: 'to intimidate or coerce a government', the main limiting factor under the proposed definition, was watered down to 'influence'. This definition does not in itself create a criminal offence of 'being a terrorist'. But the key point is that in its potential effect the s 1(1) definition is far wider in practice than s 20 since the TA, unlike the PTA, allows the definition itself to determine the application of the special powers. The government assumes that such application will, due to the decisions of police officers, the DPP and CPS, in practice affect only the most extremist groups. But given the lack of effective, independent control over the day-to-day decision-making of such bodies, this is not, it is argued, a satisfactory position in civil liberties' terms. Moreover, government Ministers cannot necessarily be trusted to use the offences and sanctions dependent on the TA definition in a restrained fashion as the proscription decisions taken so far post-2000, and discussed below, indicate.

The definition was attacked in Parliament as creating a 'fatally flawed' Bill. It was also said: '. . . it is utterly perplexing that we should apparently be wedded to a definition that threatens to undermine so sweepingly civil liberties and the credibility of governance itself'.[226] However, the amendments put forward by the Liberal Democrats, which would have narrowed it down, were overwhelmingly defeated, Labour and Conservative MPs (with a few exceptions) voting together.[227] (The limiting words of s 1(1)(b) were added as a Lords' amendment, reluctantly accepted by the government.)

This definition of terrorism is, on its face, sweepingly broad and extraordinarily imprecise. It makes no provision that the action or threat should be criminal; it covers threats to property; it also contains no clause providing exemption for state action. The government reviewer of the terrorism legislation, Lord Carlile, has pointed out, however, that the breadth of the UK definition 'should be placed in the international context. For example, most countries in South Asia define terrorism far more broadly, as well as interpreting their own definitions widely'.[228] Some examples from other countries are illustrative. They indicate that the UK definition, while particularly wide, is not markedly out of line with definitions used in a number of other countries. In some instances this is not surprising since they are modelled on the TA definition. However, many of them were adopted in the face of the heightened threat post-9/11. In Australia, Sched 1 to the Security Legislation Amendment (Terrorism) Act 2002 (Cth) (introduced after September 11), inserted a new definition of 'terrorist act' into the Criminal Code Act 1995 (Cth)33 (Criminal Code), which was clearly modelled on the TA, s 1 defintion. The definition appears in s 100.1 of part 5.3 of the Code and provides:

225 See further: Fenwick, H, Civil Rights: New Labour, Freedom and the Human Rights Act, 2000, Chapter 3; Walker, C, A Guide to the Anti-Terrorism Legislation, 2002, Blackstone; Rowe, JJ, 'The Terrorism Act 2000' [2001] Crim LR 527.

226 Mr Simpson MP, HC Debs 15 March 2000, cols 399 and 394.

227 HC Debs 15 March 2000 col 415.

228 Report on the Operation in 2005 of the Terrorism Act 2000 by Lord Carlile of Berriew QC, at para 29. In 2001 he was appointed as Independent Reviewer of the Terrorism Act 2000. His reports can be found at www.homeoffice.gov.uk.

(1) In this Part: . . . terrorist act means an action or threat of action where:

(a) the action falls within sub-section (2) and does not fall within sub-section (3); and
(b) the action is done or the threat is made with the intention of advancing a political, religious or ideological cause; and
(c) the action is done or the threat is made with the intention of: ii) intimidating the public or a section of the public.

Under (2) the action that falls within that sub-section is defined as in the TA 2000. Israeli law does not address terrorism specifically, but the Israel Prevention of Terrorism Ordinance No 33 of 5708–1948 interprets 'terrorist organisation' as meaning a body of persons 'resorting in its activities to acts of violence calculated to cause death or injury to a person or to threats of such acts of violence'.

Shortly after 9/11, the US Congress passed the Uniting and Strengthening America by Providing Appropriate Tools Required to Intercept and Obstruct Terrorism Act of 2001 (USA Patriot Act), s 802 of which amended the definition of 'domestic terrorism' within Title 18 of the United States Code. Section 2331 of Title 18 now provides:

'(2) the term "international terrorism" means activities that –

(a) involve violent acts or acts dangerous to human life that are a violation of the criminal laws of the United States or of any state, or that would be a criminal violation if committed within the jurisdiction of the United States or of any state;
(b) appear to be intended –

 (i) to intimidate or coerce a civilian population;
 (ii) to influence the policy of a government by intimidation or coercion; or
 (iii) to affect the conduct of a government by mass destruction, assassination, or kidnapping; and

(c) occur primarily outside the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, or transcend national boundaries in terms of the means by which they are accomplished, the persons they appear intended to intimidate or coerce, or the locale in which their perpetrators operate or seek asylum.

. . .

(5) the term "domestic terrorism" means activities that –

(a) involve acts dangerous to human life that are a violation of the criminal laws of the United States or of any state;
(b) appear to be intended –

 (i) to intimidate or coerce a civilian population;
 (ii) to influence the policy of a government by intimidation or coercion; or
 (iii) to affect the conduct of a government by mass destruction, assassination, or kidnapping; and

(c) occur primarily within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States'.

All these definitions are broad in that they cover action against any foreign government, however oppressive; they do not recognise the possibility of the legitimate use of violence by civilians against an invader in an occupied country, and thus label all resistance movements terrorist groups; they potentially cover almost all liberation movements, whether or not fighting against an undemocratic regime which does not respect human rights; they do not distinguish between those aiming only at military targets and those aiming at civilian targets. Thus all of them accept impliedly the grave difficulties of seeking to distinguish between 'terrorists' and 'freedom fighters', and so rely on executive discretion in choosing the targets of the anti-terrorism provisions. Ronald Dworkin described the US definition as a 'new, breathtakingly vague and broad definition of terrorism'.[229] Nevertheless, the US definition is in one respect not as broad as the UK or Australian ones since it does not include threats of action or damage to property or threats to damage property.

The TA definition allowed the activities of a number of groups, including protest groups, previously criminal, to be re-designated – potentially – as terrorist. The response of some groups to their re-designation as terrorist may have exacerbated the threat they pose; extremism may have been encouraged as legitimate avenues of protest in a democracy appeared to close,[230] especially where such groups were also proscribed. If they are not proscribed, groups may be uncertain whether their actions might be labelled terrorist, given the imprecision and breadth of the definition. In fact, as indicated below, only a minority of the groups which potentially fall within s 1(1) have so far been proscribed; broadly speaking the special powers seem to be aimed in practice at proscribed groups only. However, the special powers (apart from those specifically linked to proscription) can potentially be used against any group falling within the broad definition of terrorism.

The definition expressly covers threats of serious disruption or damage to, for example, computer installations or public utilities. The definition is therefore potentially able to catch a number of forms of public protest. Danger to property, violence or a serious risk to safety that can be described as 'ideologically, politically, or religiously motivated' may arise in the context of many demonstrations and other forms of public protest, including some industrial disputes. The government stated in the consultation paper that it had 'no intention of suggesting that matters that can properly be dealt with under normal public order powers should in future be dealt with under counter-terrorist legislation'.[231] But once special arrest and detention powers are handed to the police they can be used, at their discretion, if a particular person or group falls, or appears to fall, within the TA definition.

Some direct action against property by anti-war, animal rights or environmental activists falls within it, on its face. As Chapter 8 points out, some 'direct action' by such groups may be viewed as forms of expression and as having, to varying extents, the same role as political speech.[232] Some direct action, such as the destruction of genetically modified 229 Dworkin, R, 'The Threat to Patriotism' (2002) 49(3) New York Review of Books 44.

230 See Ansari, F, British Anti-Terrorism: A Modern Day Witch-hunt, October 2005, Islamic Human Rights Commission, www.ihrc.org.uk.

231 Ibid, para 3.18.

232 Such action is likely to be already tortious or criminal but, as Chapter 4 argues, defendants can raise Arts 10 and 11 arguments in defence.

crops, may be intended both to disrupt and to draw attention to a cause. Direct action forms of protest going beyond persuasion may provide a substantive means of engaging in the more effective means of communicating with others (since such forms are most likely to attract media attention). To label forms of such action 'terrorist', as, in effect, s 1 TA does, is not only to devalue that term, but also to take a stance towards forms of protest more characteristic of a totalitarian state than of a democracy. It was always unlikely that the TA would be used to a significant extent against protest groups, but it is argued that they should have been expressly exempted. Direct action is already extensively covered by the public order provisions discussed in Chapter 8.

The definition also allowed the previously non-criminal actions of a number of persons to be re-designated as terrorist since the special terrorist offences, discussed below, were applied to a wide range of persons, including those who have some contact with persons designated 'terrorist'. Thus, technically speaking, the then Home Secretary was right in stating, as he did, that the definition itself did not create any new offences.[233] But it potentially led to the criminalisation of the actions or omissions of a wide range of persons, many of whom did not themselves fall within the definition.

Proscription

Introduction

The government stance is that the proscription – banning – of terrorist organisations contributes towards making the UK a hostile environment for terrorists and sends a clear message to the international community and to UK citizens that the UK absolutely rejects such organisations and any of their claims to legitimacy as opposition groups. Proscription is a strong and far-reaching power since it has the effect of outlawing previously lawful activity without recourse to a court, except retrospectively – after proscription has occurred. The use of proscription means that in effect the definition of terrorism is extended because a range of people become terrorist suspects, or suspects associated with terrorist activity, who do not necessarily fall within the s 1 definition themselves. Proscription under the TA 2000 is a reactive measure in the sense that if criminal sanctions are to be applied a trial must occur, but it is proactive in that the initial decision to proscribe is not taken by a judicial body, but by the Home Secretary with – it is argued – a thin veneer of Parliamentary oversight. As discussed below, it is a criminal offence to belong to, support, glorify or display support for a proscribed organisation; the Terrorism Act 2000 also allows the police to seize all the property of a proscribed organisation. Once a group is proscribed the freedom of speech, assembly and association of its members is severely curtailed, or abrogated entirely, in relation to the political, religious or ideological cause upon which the initial proscription was based. This is also true of supporters of the group who are not members of it. The proscription-related offences and the proceedings allowing for challenge to the proscription decision are also in doubtful compliance with Art 6.

Under s 1 of the PTA, the Secretary of State could by order proscribe any organisation which appeared to him to be concerned in Irish terrorism, or in promoting it or encouraging it. No provision was made under the PTA for proscribing international terrorist organisations active in the UK. At the time of the inception of the TA the IRA and INLA were proscribed and these powers were extended to Northern Ireland by virtue of s 28 of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1991.[234] Proscription of the IRA was taken to include splinter groups such as the Continuity IRA and the Real IRA. Equivalent provisions in Northern Ireland were set out in ss 30 and 31 of and Sched 2 to the EPA. Twelve organisations, including the IRA, the INLA, the UDA, the UVF, the UFF, the LVF and the Continuity Army Council, were proscribed. 'Organisations' was widely defined as 'any association or combination of persons' (s 1(6) of the PTA). An organisation did not need to engage in terrorism itself; it was enough if it promoted or encouraged it.

233 See the Guardian, 14 November 1999.

Proscription may be seen as providing a legitimate means of expressing outrage at certain activities, thereby tending to prevent illegitimate expressions of public anger. It has been argued that it may discourage supporters of terrorist organisations and may signal political strength.[235] But it has also been contended that these benefits are minimal and that it was 'a cosmetic part of the PTA' which was in fact 'counterproductive as it impedes criminal investigation and political discussion'.[236] Lord Jellicoe's review of the operation of the PTA doubted the value of proscription, considering that its detrimental effects in terms of constraining the free expression of views about Northern Ireland outweighed its benefits.[237] In response, a Home Office circular was issued[238] giving guidance to the police as to the proper use of ss 1 and 2, bearing in mind the possible effect on freedom of expression. There were no convictions for proscription-related offences in Britain between 1990 and 2000, although in the same period 195 convictions were obtained in Northern Ireland. Therefore the need to retain the power to proscribe in relation to Britain under the TA was not made out in relation to Irish terrorism. Clearly, the government wanted to retain it in relation to extremist Islamic groups and other international armed opposition groups.

Walker has argued, in relation to the PTA and EPA provisions, that, prima facie proscription breaches Arts 10 and 11 of the European Convention on Human Rights but that, apart from exceptions contained in those Articles, Art 17 might justify it since it limits Convention guarantees to activity in harmony with its aims, and this could not be said of IRA methods.[239] As discussed above, Art 17 provides that the Convention is not to be interpreted so as to imply a right 'for any state, group or person to engage in any activity . . . aimed at the destruction of any of the [Convention rights] or at their limitation to a greater extent than . . . provided for in the Convention'. This appears to be true of Al-Qaeda and linked groups. But a number of groups might be proscribed under the current provisions, taking s 1 TA into account, which cannot so readily be 234 For commentary on the predecessor to the 1991 Act, see Review of the Operation of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978, Cmnd 9222; Bonner, D [1984] PL 348.

235 Wilkinson, P, Terrorism and the Political State, 1986, Macmillan, p 170.

236 See Walker, C, The Prevention of Terrorism in British Law, 2nd edn, 1992, p 64. See also Bonner, D [1989] PL 440.

237 Cmnd 8803, 1983; the review did not, however, recommend deproscription, since it would create public resentment.

238 On 9 August 1983 (Current Law Statutes 1984, note to s 1(1)).

239 Walker, C, The Prevention of Terrorism in British Law (1992) pp 49–50.

viewed as out of harmony with the aims of the Convention, and therefore the exceptions under the relevant Articles would usually have to be relied on if compatibility between the proscription provisions and the Convention is to be found. But the current reliance on the executive to satisfy the demands of proportionality by showing restraint in taking decisions as to groups to be included in proscription orders put before Parliament can hardly be seen as a satisfactory safeguard.

Proscription under the TA, as amended in 2006

Under the Terrorism Act 2000 the very broad power of proscription, and all the proscription-related offences, were retained, and their impact was greatly extended. The notion of increasing the number of groups to be proscribed lay at the heart of the introduction of the TA. Clearly, it was intended that a range of extremist Islamic groups would be proscribed, some, but not all, linked with Al-Qaeda, and that occurred shortly after the TA came into force. Other international groups have been proscribed, some that do not appear to create a security risk within the UK itself. Amendation under s 22 of the 2006 Act allows the Home Secretary to list names that are used as aliases by proscribed organisations.

Section 3(1) TA provides: 'For the purposes of this Act an organisation is proscribed if it is listed in Schedule 2, or it operates under the same name as an organisation listed in that Schedule.' The power to add to or delete groups from the Schedule is exercised under s 3(3) by the Secretary of State, by order. Under s 3(4) the power may be exercised 'only if he believes that [the organisation] is concerned in terrorism'. Thus no express distinction is created by the TA between organisations falling within s 1 and those which can be proscribed; the power of seeking proscription is left entirely at the Home Secretary's discretion – it is entirely unregulated by the TA itself, though it is subject to the Parliamentary affirmative resolution procedure. This provides the Home Secretary with an extraordinarily wide power, bearing in mind that Parliament has not refused an order on the four occasions that one has been sought since 2000. The consequences of proscription are far more harsh than the consequences flowing from the possibility that a group falls within the s 1 TA definition.

The breadth of the definition of terrorism means that any armed opposition group, or any person or group that supports an armed opposition group in any part of the world, including those who oppose repressive regimes, are 'terrorists'. Section 3 permits the proscription of organisations that would normally not be proscribed in practice, > including organisations which are fighting against undemocratic and oppressive regimes and, in particular, those which have engaged in lawful armed conflict in the exercise of the internationally recognised right to self-determination of peoples (where the United Kingdom is bound in international law to recognise the right and to refrain from offering material support to states engaged in the suppression of the exercise of the right by military or other coercive means).[240]

240 See R (on the application of the Kurdistan Workers' Party and Others) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] EWHC Admin 644, at para 47.

Support has come from the West for a number of organisations that are terrorist under this definition, including UNITA in Angola and the mujahidin in Afghanistan; the West also sought, prior to the Iraq war, to persuade the Shi'a in Iraq to rise against Saddam Hussein. Some of the proscribed groups are from countries where repressive regimes prevent them from exercising democratic rights and provide them with no legitimate means of pursuing their ends. In a number of instances the proscribed organisation would have had no method open to it to seek its objectives peacefully through the political system. This can be said of the Kurds, who are not recognised as a minority in Turkey and are persecuted as terrorists there, and the People's Mujahidin of Iran (Mujahidin e Khalq). In Iran anyone questioning the supremacy of the religious leader can be criminalised; widespread executions and murders against the People's Mujahidin of Iran have been documented.

Significantly, the power of proscription is, on its face, broader even than the ambit of s 1 TA would permit. Groups which do not themselves fall within the s1 definition, but which are in any way 'concerned' in terrorism can be proscribed. The addition of the term 'concerned in terrorism' makes this provision wider than that under the PTA. Parliament's approval is required for additions to, or deletions from, the list, as it was under the PTA provisions.[241] Under s 3(5) a group is 'concerned in terrorism', and so is a candidate for proscription, if it: '(a) commits or participates in acts of terrorism, (b) prepares for terrorism, (c) promotes or encourages terrorism, or (d) is otherwise concerned in terrorism', and now (under the Terrorism Act 2006) if it glorifies it.[242] In other words, the group itself need not have issued threats or taken part in action covered by s 1 TA. Thus, for example, a group verbally supporting on a website the use of threats to property as part of opposition to a despotic regime could theoretically be proscribed.

241 Under s 123(4) of the Act of 2000: 'An order or regulations under any of the following provisions shall not be made, subject to sub-section (4), unless a draft has been laid before and approved by resolution of each House of Parliament . . .' The provisions listed include s 3(3). Section 123(5) covers cases of urgency, in which case an order may be made without approval, if so it will lapse after 40 days unless approved.

242 The 2006 Act provided that encouraging terrorism included the 'unlawful glorification' of 'acts of terrorism'. The following words were added by the 2006 Act:

(5A) The cases in which an organisation promotes or encourages terrorism for the purposes of sub-section (5)(c) include any case in which activities of the organisation–

(a) include the unlawful glorification of the commission or preparation (whether in the past, in the future or generally) of acts of terrorism; or
(b) are carried out in a manner that ensures that the organisation is associated with statements containing any such glorification.

(5B) The glorification of any conduct is unlawful for the purposes of sub-section (5A) if there are persons who may become aware of it who could reasonably be expected to infer that what is being glorified, is being glorified as –

(a) conduct that should be emulated in existing circumstances, or
(b) conduct that is illustrative of a type of conduct that should be so emulated.

(5C) In this section –

'glorification' includes any form of praise or celebration, and cognate expressions are to be construed accordingly;

'statement' includes a communication without words consisting of sounds or images or both.

But the lack of information available to Parliament as to the groups to be proscribed means that it has little chance of exercising any genuine control over the executive. Further, when Parliament is asked to approve a proscription order, it is asked to approve or disapprove it in its entirety. Thus if a group such as Al-Qaeda is included – or a similar group – along with groups that could be viewed as 'freedom fighters' and pose no threat to the UK since their concern is with an oppressive regime abroad, Parliament would have to refuse to proscribe Al-Qaeda if it wished to disapprove of proscription of the latter groups. As mentioned above, over the seven years between 2000 and 2007 four proscription orders have been laid before Parliament; none has been refused.

The main objection to proscription is that the key decisions are in executive hands: a person can become subject to a large range of criminal offences on the basis of an executive decision. In effect a person can be criminalised by executive decision alone – with a very thin veneer of Parliamentary or judicial oversight – because if an organisation is proscribed any member of it commits a criminal offence purely by virtue of their status (s 2(1)(a)). Persons receive no warning that the organisation of which they are members is about to be proscribed since the Home Office policy is not to comment on whether or not a particular organisation is being considered for proscription, or to give reasons for an organisation's absence from the list.[243] Persons in that position can only escape conviction in limited circumstances and on the basis of a reversed burden of proof, as discussed below. In effect, they are first criminalised and then the case against them can be inquired into – if they challenge the proscription order. The decision to proscribe is likely to be based on classified material from the UK and foreign intelligence services, along with police, security and legal advice. Where proscription is based on confidential information available to the Home Secretary, it is difficult for organisations to mount effective appeals against it without access to such information. If an organisation is proscribed that appears to be no longer functional in the UK, the mounting of a challenge to the proscription demonstrates that it is no longer defunct and identifies those associated with it. This has security benefits, but it also operates as a significant deterrent to challengers, although they have immunity from prosecution in certain circumstances, as discussed below.

The implicit, tacit assumption on which the legislation rests is that the Secretary of State will not proscribe certain organisations despite the fact that they meet the statutory criteria of ss 1 and 3. Thus, the relationship between the s 1 definition of terrorism and the s 3 proscription power is of interest. The very broad s 1 definition is objectionable 243 See, e.g., Parliamentary and Health Service Ombudsman, Investigations Completed July 2004–March 2005, Part Two, Home Office, A.26/05. On 17 February 2004 Ms T wrote to the Home Office and, citing the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information (now superseded by the Freedom of Information Act 2000 from 1 January 2005 onwards; see Chapter 7, pp 606 et seq), asked what steps the government had taken to proscribe the organisation known as the al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade. She also asked why the government had not listed this organisation as a proscribed terrorist group. The Home Office acknowledged the request on 30 March 2004 and replied in full on 27 April 2004. They said that the government's list of proscribed organisations was kept under constant and active review. However, they said that it was their policy not to comment on whether or not a particular organisation was being considered for proscription, or upon the reasons for an organisation's absence from the list. It was found that the Home Office had been justified in refusing to release the information sought by Ms T, under Exemption 1 of the Code – although the Ombudsman was critical of the Home Office's handling of the request.

as discussed, but it was always highly improbable that the Home Secretary would seek to proscribe all, or even the majority, of the groups falling within s 1. Sections 1 and 3 combined are convenient since it maximises executive discretion as to proscription. As political alliances change, the proscription or deproscription of relevant groups can occur, and the lack of information available to Parliament means that no real check on the exercise of that discretion is available. The proscription of a new group in order to placate an ally or cement a new international agreement clearly arises; the possibilities of arbitrariness and injustice are apparent. Clearly, it is difficult, if not impossible, to devise a definition of terrorism that differentiates between good and bad terrorists – between 'terrorists' and 'freedom-fighters'. Proscription provides a somewhat clumsy means of doing so, which in effect trusts the executive to make the differentiation.

Choosing the groups to proscribe

Clearly, the Home Secretary and other relevant members of the executive are bound by s 6 HRA to abide by the Convention. Articles 10 and 11 should therefore be taken into account in taking decisions to add groups to the list of those proscribed under the TA.

Difficult decisions had to be taken concerning the range of 'terrorist' groups (under the s 1 TA definition) chosen initially for proscription. In 2000 under Sched 2 TA the groups listed had already been proscribed under the EPA; they were then proscribed throughout the UK.[244] But a key issue under the TA was whether all or most of the other groups falling within the s 1 definition would eventually be proscribed. There appeared to be three options for the trend of proscription over a period of time – although it is suggested that in reality there were only two.

First the current proscriptions could have been retained, merely adding further Irish splinter groups if necessary. Second, the option was open of proscribing both Irish and international terrorist groups, leaving domestic groups which fell within the s 1 definition unproscribed. Third, the possibility arose of proscribing all or most groups falling within the TA definition. So far, unsurprisingly, the government has taken the second option, proscribing over the last seven years a range of international 'terrorist' groups, including a very large number of extremist Islamic groups.[245] The fact that 244 The following groups are listed in Sched 2: The Irish Republican Army, Cumann nam Ban, Fianna nah Eireann, The Red Hand Commando, Saor Eire, The Ulster Freedom Fighters, The Ulster Volunteer Force, The Irish National Liberation Army, The Irish People's Liberation Organisation, The Ulster Defence Association, The Loyalist Volunteer Force, The Continuity Army Council, The Orange Volunteers, The Red Hand Defenders.

245 Al-Qaeda itself and its associated groups are of course proscribed, along with a number of other groups not linked to it, including the PKK and various groups associated with Northern Ireland, as indicated above. Under Statutory Instrument 2001 No 1261, The Terrorism Act 2000 Proscribed Organisations (Amendment) Order 2001, the organisations added to Sched 2 to the TA were: Al-Qaeda, Egyptian Islamic Jihad, Al-Gama'at al-Islamiya, Armed Islamic Group (Groupe Islamique Armée) (GIA), Salafist Group for Call and Combat (Groupe Salafiste pour la Prédication et le Combat) (GSPC), Babbar Khalsa, International Sikh Youth Federation, Harakat Mujahideen, Jaish e Mohammed, Lashkar e Tayyaba, Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE), Hizballah External Security Organisation, Hamas-Izz al-Din al-Qassem Brigades, Palestinian Islamic Jihad – Shaqaqi, Abu Nidal Organisation, Islamic Army of Aden, Mujaheddin e Khalq, Kurdistan Workers' Party (Partiya Karkeren Kurdistan) (PKK), Revolutionary Peoples' Liberation Party-Front (Devrimci Halk Kurtulus Partisi-Cephesi) (DHKP-a group is about to be added to the list is not made known in advance; there is no consultation with the groups concerned, meaning that a person is suddenly subject to criminal sanctions by virtue of his membership of or support for a newly proscribed group. This may be a desirable stance to take in security terms if the group does pose a threat to the security of the UK, but it has significant Convention implications; this point is returned to below. This position means that groups that fall within s 1 TA but are unproscribed can be dealt with for a time under the general TA provisions, particularly under s 56, the offence of directing a terrorist organisation. But at any point, without warning, the group can be proscribed, meaning that the proscription-based offences can also be utilised.

In considering which international terrorist organisations should be subject to proscription, the Home Secretary takes the following five factors into account: (1) the nature and scale of an organisation's activities; (2) the specific threat that it poses to the UK; (3) the specific threat that it poses to British nationals overseas; (4) the extent of the organisation's presence in the UK; and (5) the need to support other members of the international community in the global fight against terrorism.[246] But despite factor (5), the fact that an organization is added to the European Union's list of recognised terrorist groups or designated by the United States as a 'Foreign Terrorist Organisation' does not necessarily mean that the group will be proscribed as a terrorist organisation by the UK Government.[247] On the other hand, a group may be proscribed in the UK but not in, for example, Germany, meaning that if a member of the group travels to Britain he or she commits a criminal offence as soon as he or she arrives in the UK (this is discussed further below). Quite a large number of groups have been added to the list since the 2000 Act was introduced, and at present 54 organisations are proscribed,[248] of which 14 have their origins in Northern Ireland and/or Ireland, while the rest are international terrorist organisations, within the ss 1 TA definition. No organisations were removed during the period 2002–7.

In terms of doubtful decisions, the example of the PKK comes to mind since it has declared a ceasefire in Turkey. Clearly the ceasefire might break down, but while it is in

C), Basque Homeland and Liberty (Euskadi ta Askatasuna) (ETA), 17 November Revolutionary Organisation (N17). The Terrorism Act 2000 Proscribed Organisations (Amendment) Order 2006 (SI 2006/2016) added Al-Ghurabaa, The Saved Sect, Baluchistan Liberation Army, Teyrebaz Azadiye Kurdistan to the list.

246 See HL Debs vol 613 col 252, 16 May 2000; Home Office Press Release, 28 February 2001; these factors have continued to be reiterated: see, e.g., Parliamentary and Health Service Ombudsman, Investigations Completed July 2004–March 2005, Part Two, Home Office, A.26/05; Home Secretary To Ban Terror Groups, Home Office Press Release 17 July 2006.

247 E.g. the al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade was added to the European Union's list of recognised terrorist groups in June 2002 but was not proscribed in the UK.

248 See fns 244 and 245 above. There have been four proscription orders laid since introduction of the Terrorism Act 2000. The first draft order to proscribe 21 international organisations under the Terrorism Act 2000 was laid before Parliament on 28 February 2001 (Home Office press notice 058/2001). The order came into force on 29 March 2001 (SI 2001/1261). This was followed by a further draft order in October 2002 that sought the proscription of four groups (Home Office press notice 283/2002). That order came into force on 1 November 2002 (SI 2002/2724). The third order, proscribing 15 international groups, was laid before Parliament on 10 October 2005 and came into force on 14 October 2005 (Home Office press notice 147/2005) (SI 2005/2892). A further four new organisations concerned in terrorism were designated to be banned in 2006 (press release 17 June 2006).

existence the case for proscription of the PKK appears not to be strong enough. Lord Carlile in his 2006 Report on the operation of the TA singled out the Iran opposition group commonly known as the PMOI:

> They claim to have disarmed in 2003 to become a political organisation dedicated to the reform of government in Iran. They certainly have significant Parliamentary support across parties at Westminster. I am sure that [the working group existing within the government service at which all the interested parties meet and scrutinise proscriptions] will give serious examination to whether the PMOI really should remain proscribed.[249]

The decision to proscribe a range of international terrorist groups, not all those that fall within the s 1 definition, means that while the members of certain domestic activist or protest groups have, in effect, been re-defined as 'terrorists', the groups remain openly able to engage in various public activities such as advertising for members, fund-raising, holding marches or possibly even putting up members to stand for elections.[250] The government had signalled from the outset that it would begin with the addition of international groups to the proscribed list.[251] Lord Lloyd recommended adoption of the third option. This option would be highly problematic in practical terms and deeply objectionable at the level of principle. The government was apparently attracted to it since it would provide 'a mechanism to signal clearly condemnation of any terrorist organisation whatever its origin and motivation'.[252] It was also clear that the government saw advantages in criminalising fund-raising activity of any kind for a particular group since that would remove the requirement to prove end use of funds. But it recognised the practical problem that the provisions could be circumvented by changing the group's name.

Between 2001 and 2007 the focus of government attention was on the threat posed by groups associated with Al-Qaeda. The proscription of a range of animal rights, anti-abortion, or environmental groups that fall within s 3 TA is not particularly high on the political agenda. If the third option of proscribing such groups was eventually adopted, it is arguable that the list, if it was to have any credibility, would have to be exhaustive: it would clearly be inequitable to proscribe one group falling within the definition while failing to proscribe another which was equally within it. Given its width, the definition potentially covers a vast range of organisations. There would clearly be insuperable practical difficulties in drawing up and then maintaining an

249 Report on the Operation in 2005 of the Terrorism Act 2000 by Lord Carlile of Berriew QC, at para 43. In 2001 he was appointed as Independent Reviewer of the Terrorism Act 2000. His reports can be found at www.homeoffice.gov.uk.

250 All these activities might in certain respects fall within the terrorist offences discussed below, but they do not in themselves either constitute offences or lead almost inevitably to liability under the proscription-related offences.

251 The explanatory notes to the Act state: 'The Government is considering which organisations involved in international terrorism might be added to the Schedule'.

252 'The current provisions, under which only Irish terrorist groups can be proscribed, could be construed by some as indicating that the Government does not take other forms of terrorism as seriously. Furthermore a wider provision could deter international groups from establishing themselves in the UK' (the 1998 consultation paper Legislation on Terrorism, at para 4.14).

up-to-date list of international and domestic groups to be proscribed. The list would be of immense scope; it would probably include hundreds of names and it would quickly become out of date. Clearly, it might come to appear ludicrously broad and simply unworkable, undermining the credibility of the proscription scheme. Apart from the severe practical problems, s 1 – if fully utilised – is so far out of kilter with Arts 10 and 11 ECHR that challenges relying on those Articles would have a strong chance of success in relation to some groups that could be proscribed. The conflicts created with Arts 10 and 11 would appear to be especially grave and would be politically unpalatable since these groups are driven by ideologies with which some in the UK sympathise, while disapproving of the methods that some of these groups adopt. Once a group is proscribed the freedom of speech, assembly of its members, or supporters, is severely curtailed: it is very difficult or impossible for any speech relating to the cause in question to be promulgated or for any meeting to occur, legally. The freedom of association of the members is completely abrogated.

The government stated in 2000 that it was unlikely to put the third option into practice for some years.[253] In fact it is suggested that the government never seriously intended that all those groups covered by s 1 TA would be proscribed, and it is unlikely that any future UK Government would seek to proscribe the majority of the groups falling within that definition, but in the traditional style of British Governments preferred to adopt very broad provisions with the intention that they would never be fully utilised. At the same time the provisions were of value since they left open the possibility that in extreme and possible future circumstances, such as the mounting of a violent campaign by an anti-abortion activist group in the UK, they could be utilised. The threat of proscription may also be of some value in deterring groups from adopting methods other than recognised democratic ones to push their political agenda.

Proscription-related offences

Belonging to a proscribed organisation

Section 11 of the 2000 Act makes it an offence to belong to a proscribed organisation.[254] Under s 11(1) a person commits an offence if he belongs or professes to belong to a proscribed organisation; a maximum penalty of 10 years' imprisonment is imposed. It is notable that there is no mens rea requirement. There is a limited defence under s 11(2):

> it is a defence for a person charged with an offence under sub-section (1) to prove that the organisation was not proscribed on the last (or only) occasion on which he became a member or began to profess to be a member, and that he has not taken part in the activities of the organisation at any time while it was proscribed.

Section 11 in effect comes close to imposing a reverse burden of proof on the defendant once the prosecution has discharged its burden in showing that he was a member 253 At the Committee stage in the House of Commons, the government said that in the immediate future it would not add domestic groups to the list; see HC Debs 15 March 2000 col 431.

254 Previously this was provided for under s 2(1)(a) of the PTA.

of a proscribed organisation, even if he was unaware that it had been proscribed (and as indicated above organisations are constantly added to the list of proscribed organisations and the members are given no warning of this beforehand). The burden of proof is then placed on him to prove that it was not proscribed when he was a member under s 11(2). This appears to infringe the presumption of innocence under Art 6(2), discussed above, and in Chapters 2 and 12,[255] since it places a burden on a defendant who has arguably not engaged in any blameworthy conduct to disprove a substantial element of the offence. However, as mentioned in Chapter 4, the UK courts have engaged in 'reading down' under s 3 HRA of legal burdens to evidential ones in order to seek to create compliance with Art 6(2).[256] Thus they have sought to give effect to the fundamental right encapsulated in Art 6(2),[257] and long recognised under common law principle.[258]

This issue was raised in the Court of Appeal in Attorney General's Reference (No 4 of 2002).[259] The Court had to consider the nature of the s 11(2) defence. The defendant, A, was charged, inter alia, with offences contrary to s 11(1) TA 2000 of being a member of, and professing to be a member of, a proscribed organisation, Hamas-Izz al-din al Qassem Brigades. The defendant argued that at the time when he became a member, or professed to become a member, of the organisation it had not yet been proscribed (the defence provided by s 11(2)). He said that he had been a member of Hamas from either 1997 or 1998, but that he had left in 1999 because he had discovered that it was involved in the killing of innocent civilians. At trial the prosecution accepted, following R v Lambert,[260] that 'A' bore only an evidential burden in relation to the defence under s 11(2). The trial judge concluded that the prosecution had failed to establish to the criminal standard of proof that 'A' had taken part in the activities of the proscribed organisation since proscription, and ruled that there was no case to answer; subsequently a verdict of not guilty was entered in respect of each of the counts. The Attorney General referred two questions for the opinion of the Court of Appeal, namely:

> (1) What are the ingredients of an offence contrary to s 11(1) of the Terrorism Act 2000; (2) Does the defence contained in s 11(2) of the Terrorism Act 2000 impose a legal, rather than an evidential burden of proof on an accused and, if so, 255 See pp 64–65 and pp 1239–40.

256 See pp 178–79. For further discussion, see: Tadros, V and Tierney, S, 'The Presumption of Innocence and the Human Rights Act' (2004) 67 MLR 402, at p 403; Simester, AP and Sullivan, GR, Criminal Law: Theory and Doctrine, 2nd edn, 2004, Hart, esp p 69; Dennis, I, 'Reverse Onuses and the Presumption of Innocence: In Search of Principle' [2005] CLR 901; Dingwall, G, 'Statutory Exceptions, Burdens of Proof and the Human Rights Act 1998' (2002) 65 MLR 40; Ashworth, A, 'Four Threats to the Presumption of Innocence' (2006) 10 International Journal of Evidence and Proof 241; Ashworth, A, 'Criminal Justice Reform: Principles, Human Rights and Public Protection' [2004] Crim LR 516.

257 See Chapter 2, pp 64–65.

258 See Woolmington [1935] AC 462, pp 481–82. See further Ashworth, A and Blake, M, 'The Presumption of Innocence in English Criminal Law', [1996] CLR 306.

259 2003] EWCA Crim 762; [2003] 3 W.L.R. 1153; [2004] 1 All E.R. 1; [2003] 2 Cr. App. R. 22; [2003] HRLR 15.

260 [2002] 2 AC 545.

is such a legal burden compatible with the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, and in particular, with Arts 6(2) and 10 of the Convention?

The Court found that the answer to question (1) was that the ingredients of the offence contrary to s 11(1) of the Terrorism Act 2000 were fully set out within that section. Thus the Court found that s 11(2) did not relate to an element of the offence. The Court went on to find that in any event if it did it was compatible with Art 6(2). The answer to question (2) was that the defence in s 11(2) imposed a legal, rather than an evidential, burden of proof on an accused to establish the matters set out in (a) and (b) on the balance of probabilities. This was not, it was found, incompatible with Art 6.2 or with Art 10 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights. Section 11(2), it was found, identified a very specific exception applicable to a limited class of defendants which did not in any way affect the criminal offence fully identified in s 11(1), which defined the elements of the offence. Parliament, it was found, had intended that a person should be guilty of an offence under s 11(1) irrespective of whether or not he had played any active part in the organisation. Section 11(2) therefore, it was determined, did not infringe the presumption of innocence so as to breach Art 6.2.

However, it was found that if that conclusion was wrong, any infringement by way of imposition of a legal burden was justified and proportionate, and that Parliament was entitled to take the view that a legal burden was appropriate. Further, the Court said that it was difficult to see how imposing the legal burden of proof on a defendant charged with an offence under s 11(1) could ever amount to an unjustified and disproportionate interference with his right to freedom of expression so as to breach Art 10, except in circumstances where, in a particular case, a statutory provision such as s 11 might involve a disproportionate infringement of an individual's rights under Art 10 to freedom of expression. Accordingly, the trial judge should not have ruled that there was no case to answer.[261]

However, the House of Lords, by a three to two majority, reversed this decision in the joined cases Sheldrake v DPP; Attorney General's Reference (No 4 of 2002).[262] In Attorney General's Reference (No 4 of 2002), Lord Bingham, giving the opinion of the House, found that a person who had not engaged in any blameworthy conduct could come within s 11(1) and that the presumption of innocence was infringed by requiring him or her to disprove involvement in the organization at the time in question. He said that there was a real risk that a person who was innocent of any blameworthy or properly criminal conduct, but who was unable to establish a defence under s 11(2) might fall within s 11(1), thereby resulting in a clear breach of the presumption of innocence and an unfair conviction. He found that, bearing in mind the difficulties a defendant would have in proving the matters contained in s 11(2), and the serious consequences for the defendant in failing to do so, the imposition of a legal burden upon the defendant was not a proportionate and justifiable legislative response to the threat of terrorism. Further, it was found that while security considerations always carried weight, they did not absolve member states from their duty to ensure that basic standards of fairness were observed; and that since s 11(2) impermissibly infringed the presumption of innocence, it was appropriate, pursuant to s 3 of the 1998 Act, to read down s 11(2) so as to impose on the defendant an evidential burden only, even though that was not Parliament's intention when enacting the sub-section.[263]

261 The decisions in Sheldrake v Director of Public Prosecutors [2003] EWHC Admin 273, [2003] 2 Cr App R 206, DC, and R v Lambert [2001] 2 Cr App R 511; [2002] 2 A C 545, HL, were distinguished.

262 [2004] UKHL 43; [2005] 1 AC 264; [2005] 1 All ER 237. The House of Lords took account of R v Lambert [2002] 2 AC 545, HL(E), R v A (No 2) [2002] 1 AC 45, HL(E), R v Johnstone [2003] 1 WLR 1736, HL(E), Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza [2004] 2 AC 557, HL(E).

Thus the Lords found that s 11(2) imposes an evidential burden only. A majority of the House of Lords relied on s 3 to read the word 'prove' as though it meant 'adduce sufficient evidence to raise an issue in the case'. Thus the Lords ameliorated the difficulty facing defendants in proving their innocence in relation to s 11 and created a compatibility with Art 6(2) that was not previously present. The decision has implications for a number of the offences in the TA and TA 2006, as discussed below.

But it is not a defence to prove that the defendant did not know that the organisation was proscribed or that it was engaged in activities covered by ss 1(1) and 3 of the Act. This was reaffirmed in R v Hundal (Avtar Singh); R v Dhaliwal (Kesar Singh).[264] The defendants appealed against convictions for belonging to a proscribed organisation contrary to TA 2000, s 11(1), and against sentences of 30 months' imprisonment. They had been stopped and searched whilst entering the UK from Germany. The first defendant had been in possession of various documents which had included an International Sikh Youth Federation (ISYF) membership card. They contended that they had been members of the ISYF in Germany but, as far as they were concerned, had not been members when they had entered the UK and had not realised it was a proscribed organisation. The ISYF had been proscribed in the UK since March 2001 under the 2000 Act, but had not been illegal in Germany. The defendants contended that the 2000 Act did not apply as they had joined the ISYF in a country outside the court's jurisdiction. It was held that the 2000 Act was applicable to the circumstances of the instant case. It required that a person in the UK, while in the UK, was a member of a proscribed organisation. Both defendants were members of a proscribed organisation while in the UK. But it was found that the sentences of 30 months' imprisonment were manifestly excessive given that the judge had sentenced on the basis that neither defendant was aware that what they were doing contravened legislation in the UK. The sentences were quashed and sentences of 12 months' imprisonment were substituted.

Symbols of allegiance to a proscribed group; meetings

If proscription is at least partly of symbolic value, as an affirmation of society's rejection of the value of associating with certain groups, then it follows that visible signs of allegiance to those groups will also be banned. Therefore there are a number of further offences relating to badges, symbols and meetings. Under s 12(1) TA it is an offence to solicit support, other than money or other property, for a proscribed organisation.[265] This offence now overlaps with the offence of indirectly (including glorifying) or directly encouraging terrorism under the Terrorism Act 2006. It is also an offence under s 12(2) for a person to arrange, manage or assist in arranging or managing a meeting which he knows is: '(a) to support a proscribed organisation, (b) to further the activities of a proscribed organisation, or (c) to be addressed by a person who belongs or professes to belong to a proscribed organisation'. It is an offence under s 12(3)(a) TA to address such a meeting in order to encourage support for a proscribed organisation or 'further its activities'. These are broadly drawn offences, although they do include a mens rea ingredient. Their impact on speech, association and assembly is clearly far-reaching, bearing in mind the wide range of meetings, including very small, informal ones, covered.

263 At paras 48–53, 55 and 56.

264 2004 WL 62035 (CA (Crim Div)), [2004] 2 Cr App R 19, [2004] 2 Cr App R (S) 64 (2004), The Times, 13 February, 62,035 [2004] EWCA Crim 389.

The fact that the majority of speakers at a meeting were opposed to the methods or aims of a proscribed group would not affect the liability of the organiser so long as s/he was aware that a speaker was a member, or professed member, of such an organisation, speaking in support of it. A meeting is defined as one at which three or more persons are present and there is no need for it to be open to the public. A narrow defence is provided under s 12(4) in relation to private meetings only if the defendant can show that he had no reasonable cause to believe that the address as mentioned in s 12(2)(c) was to support a proscribed organisation. Section 12(4) is covered by s 118, meaning that if the accused puts forward evidence sufficient to raise a doubt as to whether he or she had no cause to believe that the address would be in support of such an organisation, the court or jury must assume that the defence is satisfied unless the prosecution proves beyond reasonable doubt that it is not. The maximum punishment for this offence is ten years' imprisonment. The problem is that s 12(4) is narrowly drawn; a person who assisted in arranging a public meeting, even if of only three people, not knowing that the member of the proscribed organisation would speak in support of the organisation, would commit an offence.

Restrictions on the use of badges or uniforms as signals of support for certain organisations are intended to have the dual effect of preventing communication – by those means – of the political message associated with the organisation and of tending to minimise the impression that the organisation is supported, thereby denying reassurance to its members, lowering their morale and preventing them from arousing public support. Under s 13 TA it is an offence to 'wear any item which arouses a reasonable apprehension that a person is a member or supporter of a proscribed organisation',[266] and it is an offence to wear an item of clothing, or wear, carry or display an article, 'in such a way or in such circumstances as to arouse reasonable suspicion [that the person in question] is a member or supporter of a proscribed organisation'. Again it is notable that no element of mens rea is included. The offence can be established on the basis of proof of reasonable suspicion alone and no defence is provided.

An overlapping offence arises under s 1 of the Public Order Act 1936: it is an offence to wear a uniform signifying association with any political organisation or with the 265 Previously this was provided for under s 2(1)(a) PTA.

266 Previously this was provided for under s 3 PTA.

promotion of any political object. Section 1 was invoked in Whelan v DPP[267] against leaders of a Provisional Sinn Fein protest march against internment in Northern Ireland, all of whom wore black berets while some wore dark glasses, dark clothing and carried Irish flags. It was found that, first, something must be 'worn' as apparel and second, that it must be a uniform. Something might amount to a uniform if worn by a number of persons in order to signify their association with each other or if commonly used by a certain organisation. By this means, the third requirement that the uniform must signal the wearer's association with a particular political organisation could also be satisfied. Alternatively, it might be satisfied by consideration of the occasion on which the uniform was worn without the need to refer to the past history of the organisation. It was found that the items worn could amount to a uniform; this decision therefore greatly diminished the distinction between this offence and that under the PTA. The justification for retention of the PTA provisions in the TA is therefore doubtful due to the overlap between the two offences.

The decision of the House of Lords in Attorney General's Reference (No 4 of 2002)[268] is arguably relevant to a number of these offences since, apart from s 12(4), they are not covered by s 118. But it may be problematic to apply the House of Lords' decision where no defences are available. In that case, as discussed above, Lord Bingham found that a person who had not engaged in any blameworthy conduct could commit an offence under the Act and that the presumption of innocence was infringed by requiring him or her to disprove a significant element of the offence. Since the Lords found that this burden placed on the accused impermissibly infringed the presumption of innocence, they employed s 3 HRA to read down the relevant section so as to impose on the defendant an evidential burden only. A number of these offences allow for the criminalisation of the defendant despite the fact that arguably his or her conduct was not blameworthy.

As discussed, a person who is acc§used of being a member of a proscribed organisation under s 11 has a defence if he can raise the possibility that he was not a member of it at the time when it was proscribed. The burden then passes to the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt that he was a member of it at the relevant time. It is not a defence under s 13 to prove that at the time when the support was accorded to the organisation by the defendant, it was not proscribed, but that requirement could be read into the offence. In order to prevent anomalies arising, s 13 should be interpreted compatibly with s 11; the word 'currently' could be implied into the section before the word 'proscribed'. It is not a defence under either s 11 or s 13 that the defendant did not know that the organisation had been proscribed at the time in question. Thus the defendant under s 13 in that position must seek to disprove that the organisation was proscribed at the time, unless a court was prepared to read the word 'knowingly' into s 13.

A number of objections of principle arise in respect of the application of the proscription-related offences to a wider range of groups. The key objection is that, by making it possible to proscribe a wide range of groups, the legislation potentially curtails proscription-related activities which previously would not have been conceived of as related to terrorism. Some examples are illustrative of the broad potential of the TA, which however has not been fully exploited. It is an offence to wear a badge expressing support for the PKK or to carry a leaflet which arouses reasonable suspicion that such support was being expressed, and this would be the case even if the leaflet was in fact that of a similar but non-proscribed group. If a person who opposed the use of violence to further the cause of animal rights organised a meeting to express such views in private with two other people, one of whom was a member of a proscribed animal rights group, who spoke in its favour, she could commit an offence carrying a maximum penalty of ten years' imprisonment. A group which did not itself engage in terrorism but which, for example, expressed support during one of its assemblies for the 'serious disruption' of a computer system could be proscribed as falling within the terms of ss 1 and 3 combined. If, during a march, members of a group opposed to the introduction of GM crops wore badges expressing support for a proscribed environmental activist group, they would commit an offence. They would also attract criminal liability if they carried leaflets which aroused reasonable suspicion that such support was being expressed.

267 [1975] QB 864.
268 [2005] 1 AC 264; [2005] 1 All ER 237.

These proscription-linked offences strike directly at freedom of political expression, which, as indicated above, is viewed as one of the 'essential foundations of a democratic society', so that exceptions to it 'must be narrowly interpreted and the necessity for any restrictions . . . convincingly established'.[269] The use of these offences is prima facie an interference with the guarantee under Art 10 since all, including the wearing of an item, or organising a meeting at which a member of a proscribed organisation is speaking, involve or relate to exercises of expression. Such offences include those of wearing any item that arouses a reasonable apprehension that a person is a member or supporter of a proscribed organisation, of organising a meeting at which a member of a proscribed organisation is speaking, and that of soliciting support for such an organisation. In particular, the provision of s 12 regarding meetings affords very little recognition to the value of peaceful protest and assembly. Strasbourg, as indicated above, affords that value pre-eminence in a democracy.[270] Charging a member of an assembly with one of these offences would clearly, therefore, amount to an interference with the Art 10 guarantee. The domestic court would be expected to observe the same or higher standards than Strasbourg in scrutinising the need for the interference, bearing in mind the narrow margin of appreciation afforded to states in respect of interference with political speech, especially where it concerns criticism directed at the government itself.[271]

Obviously, the view taken of the necessity and proportionality of the interference would depend on the particular circumstances behind the charging of the offence in the instance before the court. But to take the example used above of a person making arrangements to meet privately with two others and hearing a member of a proscribed group speak: it might be problematic to find that the necessity for the interference with freedom of expression in a democratic society had been convincingly established. This offence is especially pernicious in terms of freedom of expression since the meeting in question might be entirely peaceful: liability would indirectly relate to the content of the speech of at least one of the speakers. Since no defences are provided on which s 3 HRA could bite, a declaration of incompatibility between the relevant section and Arts 10 and 11 might have to be made. However, a court could instead rely on s 6 HRA on the argument that the offence has to be applied in a manner that ensures that the demands of necessity and proportionality are satisfied, an argument that has been used post-HRA in the public protest context, as Chapter 8 notes.[272] Account could be taken of the necessity and proportionality of charging the defendant with a criminal offence in the first place. The threat posed by the prescribed group could be taken into account.

269 Observer and Guardian v United Kingdom judgment of 26 November 1991, Series A no 216, pp 29–30, para 59.

270 See Ezelin v France (1991) 14 EHRR 362. On political expression generally, see Castells v Spain A 236, p 23, para 43; judgment of 23 April 1992.

271 See Incal v Turkey (2000) 29 EHRR 449 and see above, p 1355. See also the discussion of Marper, Chapter 4, pp 193–96 in relation to taking a more generous approach than Strasbourg when dealing with para 2 of the materially qualified Articles.

Fund-raising; terrorist property; commercial risks

Further criminal offences, punishable by up to 14 years' imprisonment, exist under s 15 in relation to fund-raising for the purposes of terrorism, under s 16 in relation to the use or possession of money or other property for the purposes of terrorism, under s 17 in relation to arrangements to make money or property available for the purposes of terrorism (funding arrangements), and under s 18 in relation to arrangements facilitating the retention or control of terrorist property by concealment, removal, transfer etc, (money laundering). These offences are not limited to proscribed organisations, but s 14 defines 'terrorist property' as including any resources of a proscribed organisation and, s 1(5) provides that action 'for the purposes of terrorism' includes action taken for the benefit of a proscribed organisation. Pursuant to s 19 it is an offence to fail to disclose any belief or suspicion that another person has committed an offence under any of ss 15–18 if that belief or suspicion is based on information which comes to a person's attention in the course of a trade, profession, business or employment. These offences, affecting businesses, are discussed further below.[273]

Challenges to proscription; deproscription

Under the previous scheme if an organisation was proscribed on insufficient grounds there was little possibility of challenge to the order. There was no right of appeal against proscription, and judicial review, while theoretically available, was likely to create extremely limited scrutiny. In McEldowney v Forde[274] an order was made under statutory instrument banning republican clubs or any like organisation, thus potentially outlawing all Nationalist political parties. Nevertheless, the House of Lords preferred not to intervene, Lord Diplock stating that he would do so only if proscription were extended to bodies obviously distanced from Republican views.

272 See pp 783, 797.
273 See pp 1411–15.
274 [1971] AC 632.

The TA set up, under s 5, the Proscribed Organisations Appeal Commission (POAC). It is modelled on the Special Immigration Appeals Commission which also provided the model for the Tribunal set up under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, discussed in Chapter 10.[275] The Commission also appears to have certain parallels with the Security and Intelligence Service Tribunals, also discussed in Chapter 10, which had never upheld a complaint. Rules have been made under s 9 providing that the POAC is the forum in which proceedings under s 7 HRA can be brought.[276]

Under s 4, if an individual is affected by proscription, or an organisation considers that it should not have been proscribed, the first step is to ask the Secretary of State to deproscribe; the Secretary of State is obliged to consider such applications within a period of time specified in the Proscribed Organisations (Applications for Deproscription) Regulations 2001, made under s 4(3). The Regulations lay down the procedure for applications to the Secretary of State and provide, inter alia, that he is to determine an application within 90 days from its receipt. Such an application may be made by the organisation itself or by any person affected by the organisation's proscription.

Appeals to the POAC

If the Secretary of State refuses to deproscribe, then the organisation or individual may appeal to the POAC as set out in s 5 and Sched 3.[277] Clause 9 of the original Bill provided that the reference to those principles would allow the appellant to raise points concerning those rights under the European Convention on Human Rights which are 'Convention rights' under the HRA. After amendment this provision was removed, but the Commission in any event has to apply Convention principles as a court would in judicial review proceedings, due to s 6 HRA.[278] Under s 5(3): the Commission must allow an appeal against a refusal to deproscribe an organisation if it 'considers that the decision to refuse was flawed when considered in the light of the principles applicable on an application for judicial review'. The POAC itself, as a public authority, must apply the Convention rights in its adjudications and therefore, in relation to the 275 At pp 1080 et seq.

276 Under the Proscribed Organisations Appeal Commission (Human Rights Act Proceedings), rr 2001, POAC is the appropriate tribunal for the purposes of s 7 HRA in relation to any proceedings under s 7(1)(a) against the Secretary of State in respect of a refusal by him to exercise his power of deproscription under s 3(3)(b).

277 It may be noted that under s 10 immunity from criminal proceedings is conferred upon a person who seeks deproscription by way of application or appeal under ss 4 or 5, either on behalf of the proscribed organisation or as the person affected. Clearly, otherwise, such a person would be discouraged from pursuing either course, or from instituting proceedings under s 7 of the Human Rights Act, by the risk of prosecution for certain offences, for example the offence of membership of a proscribed organisation. Section 10 provides that evidence of anything done, and any document submitted for these proceedings, cannot be relied on in criminal proceedings for such an offence except as part of the defence case.

278 See Chapter 4, pp 238–39.

question of deproscription, it should take the relevant Convention rights into account. As indicated, the POAC is the appropriate tribunal for s 7(1) HRA purposes under s 9 TA. The rules made by the Lord Chancellor under s 9, providing that proceedings under s 7(1)(a) HRA are to be brought in the POAC, should be interpreted compatibly with the Convention under s 3 HRA.

The procedure before the POAC is far removed from that which would be applicable in an ordinary court in a criminal trial. Under Sched 3, para 5(1) the Lord Chancellor has the power to make rules regulating the exercise of the right of appeal to the Commission and prescribing practice and procedure to be followed in its proceedings. Its members are appointed by the Lord Chancellor; three of them must attend the proceedings and one must be a person who holds or has held high judicial office.[279] Under powers in Sched 3 the Lord Chancellor has the power to make rules providing that proceedings may be determined without an oral hearing in specified circumstances; provision may be made regarding the burden of proof; full particulars of the reasons for proscription or refusal to deproscribe may be withheld from the organisation or applicant concerned; the Commission may exclude persons, including legal representatives, from all or part of the proceedings and permit proceedings for leave to appeal to a court under s 6 to be determined by a single member.

The constitution and procedure of POAC are currently laid down the Proscribed Organisations Appeal Commission (Procedure) rr 2001.[280] Pursuant to TA 2000, Sched 3, para 7, special advocates are appointed by the Law Officers of the Crown 'to represent the interests of an organisation or other applicant in [the] proceedings . . .'. The current rules make provision, inter alia, for the appointment of a special advocate to represent the interests of the appellant in the proceedings, in particular in any proceedings from which the appellant and his representative are excluded (r 10). POAC sits in public in Central London, but is able to hear closed evidence in camera and with the applicant and their representatives excluded. POAC considers all the evidence upon which the Secretary of State relies in support of his grounds for opposing the appeal, including evidence that by statute or on general grounds of public interest cannot be disclosed to the appellant or his representative, with the POAC sitting in private for that purpose, and evidence that would not be admissible in a court of law (see rr 21–22). Thus, although the procedure may appear adversarial, its procedural limitations are likely to handicap one side so greatly that the Commission may be unable to discharge its fact-finding role effectively. It may therefore prove ineffective in protecting bodies from unjustified proscription.[281] This procedure is clearly designed to keep de-proscription claims, for the most part, out of the ordinary courts.

Bearing these comments in mind, a further feature of the proceedings is significant. By s 18(1)(f) of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 the normal prohibition on the receipt of evidence based on intercepted communications does not apply to the 279 Within the meaning of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act 1876.

280 Made under para 5 of Sch 3.

281 For discussion of the similar limitations in respect of the Tribunal set up under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, see Chapter 10, p 1083–84, 1086–90.

POAC.[282] Thus, the Commission may take its decision on the basis of secret intercept evidence. But such evidence cannot be disclosed to the organisation concerned, its legal representatives or the applicant under para 8(2). Therefore the applicant or the legal representatives would have no means of challenging it or of bringing forward other evidence which might be relevant to it; Art 8 or Art 6 arguments could not be made. An appeal to the RIPA Tribunal could not be mounted, unless on speculative grounds only.[283]

If the Commission finds in favour of an applicant and makes an order to that effect, this has the effect of requiring the Secretary of State either to lay a draft deproscription order before Parliament or to make a deproscription order on the basis of the urgency procedure. Such a finding is to be treated, under s 9(4)(b), as determining that 'an action of the Secretary of State is incompatible with a Convention right'. The powers of POAC and the consequences of its allowing an appeal are set out in s 5(3)–(5).[284] Under s 7, if an appeal to the POAC is successful, and an order has been made deproscribing the organisation, anyone convicted of one of the offences listed in sub-section (1)(c) in respect of the organisation, may appeal against his conviction to the Court of Appeal or Crown Court which must allow the appeal,[285] so long as the offence was committed after the date of the refusal to deproscribe. This provision covers members of the organisation itself, and persons who have been convicted of proscription-related offences at a point after a refusal to de-proscribe, who have already exhausted ordinary avenues of appeal.

If the POAC finds against the applicant, s 6 of the 2000 Act allows a further appeal from its decision to a court, on a point of law, if leave is given by the POAC or where POAC refuses permission the Court of Appeal. The Act does not contain an ouster clause.

Judicial review of POAC decisions or appeals from POAC on points of law

Judicial review can be sought of decisions taken under the TA. The courts are able to apply the Convention rights in judicial review proceedings or on an appeal on a point of law to a court against a refusal to de-proscribe. The procedural rules for appeals from POAC to the Court of Appeal require that the Court of Appeal must secure that information is not disclosed contrary to the interests of national security. This enables 282 Previously, under Sched 3, para 8, s 9(1) of the Interception of Communications Act 1985 'shall not apply in relation to (a) proceedings before the Commission, or (b) proceedings arising out of proceedings to which paragraph (a) applies'. For discussion of the equivalent provisions under the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, see Chapter 10, pp 1047–51.

283 See Chapter 10, p 1081–82.

284 (4) Where the Commission allows an appeal under this section by or in respect of an organisation, it may make an order under this sub-section. (5) Where an order is made under sub-section (4) the Secretary of State shall as soon as is reasonably practicable– (a) lay before Parliament, in accordance with section 123(4), the draft of an order under section 3(3)(b) removing the organisation from the list in Schedule 2; or (b) make an order removing the organisation from the list in Schedule 2 in pursuance of section 123(5).

285 Under s 7(2), once deproscription has occurred, if the convicted person appeals to the Court of Appeal under s 1 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968 (appeal against conviction on indictment) 'the court shall allow the appeal'.

the Court of Appeal, like POAC, to exclude any party (other than the Secretary of State) and his representative from the proceedings on the appeal.[286] If a court found in judicial review proceedings that a decision taken under one of the provisions of the TA could not be justified under the relevant Article, it could quash the decision on the basis, as argued in Chapter 4, that it can never be said to be impossible for a person who has a discretion conferred by primary legislation, such as that to proscribe an organisation, to act otherwise.[287] Various Convention points can be raised in these proceedings.

POAC procedure satisfies Arts 6 and 13?

It could be argued that the POAC does not meet the requisite standards of independence under Art 13 or under Art 6(1) since, inter alia, the Lord Chancellor appoints its members. Thus it could be considered whether the POAC provides an effective remedy for the citizen. (As regards Art 13 this argument would probably have to be raised at Strasbourg since Art 13 was not included in Sched 1 HRA.)[288] The ability of the Lord Chancellor to regulate its procedure is also relevant. This argument depends on the view taken of the role of the Lord Chancellor, and in particular whether it could be said that in appointing the POAC and regulating it he should be viewed as acting as part of the executive. It is suggested that the appointments procedure for the POAC complies with the Art 6 impartiality and independence requirements in these respects,[289] but that it is debatable whether this is the case in relation to the possibilities provided for under the Act for the determination of its procedure by the Lord Chancellor.[290]

It could also be argued that the POAC fails to comply with the fair trial provisions of Art 6(1) since the applicant may be in such a weak position before it. As discussed above, Art 6 guarantees a fair hearing in the determination of civil rights and obligations or a criminal charge.[291] The Art 6(1) requirements are discussed further in Chapters 2, 12 and 13.[292] It could be argued that the POAC's appeal function should be viewed as the 'determination of a criminal charge' since proscription of an organisation creates the possibility of imposing criminal liability on a range of persons including existing members of the newly-proscribed organisation. However, at present it is assumed that the POAC is determining civil rights and obligations only. It is arguable that the POAC

286 The Court of Appeal (Appeals from Proscribed Organisations Appeal Commission) Rules 2002.

287 See pp 215–16.

288 See Govell v UK (1997) 4 EHRLR 438, and see Chapter 2 at pp 106–8. It is, however, possible that courts could take Art 13 into account due to the Pepper v Hart statement of the Lord Chancellor in Parliament to the effect that although Art 13 was omitted from the rights protected by the HRA, the courts could view acceptance of the need to allow an effective remedy under Art 13 as an aspect of the intention behind the Act. See Hansard HL 18 November 1997 col 477, Hansard HC 20 May 1998 col 980.

289 See Campbell and Fell v UK A 80 (1984).

290 Sramek v Austria A 84 (1984). One of the central questions, which cannot yet be answered will be the practice adopted: Campbell and Fell v UK A 80 (1984). See also the findings on impartiality in the context of military discipline - Findlay v UK (1997) 24 EHRR 221; Hood v UK, judgment of 25 February 1997.

291 For further discussion as to the field of application of Art 6, see Chapter 2, pp 60–61.

292 See, in particular, pp 1210–15, 1259–61.

may not provide a fair hearing for the appellant, bearing in mind the procedure which can be followed, described above.

Proscription and the guarantees under Arts 10 and 11

Various features of decisions to proscribe and of the proscription scheme itself raise further Convention issues under Arts 10 and 11, as discussed in the human rights section of this chapter, above. Under the HRA the compatibility of the proscription of a range of groups with Arts 10 and 11 is problematic since the complete outlawing of a group constitutes prima facie a breach of those Articles. In findings as to proscription, therefore, the focus must be on the demands of para 2 of those Articles, unless Art 17 applies.[293] As discussed in Chapter 2, state interference with the Arts 10 and 11 guarantees must be prescribed by law, have a legitimate aim, be necessary in a democratic society and be applied in a non-discriminatory fashion if it is to be justified. It can almost certainly be assumed that the exercise of the proscription power can be viewed domestically as prescribed by law since it is enshrined in primary legislation, and Parliament must approve proscription orders, although the 'quality' of proscription decisions is clearly open to question.[294]

In freedom of expression cases Strasbourg's main concern has unsurprisingly been with the 'necessary in a democratic society' requirement. In Sidiropoulos v Greece[295] the Court considered the outlawing in Greece of an association called the Home of Macedonian Civilisation which had been formed in Macedonia. The authorities refused to register it, on the basis that it was viewed as intended to undermine Greece's national integrity, contrary to Greek law, since it intended to publicise the idea that there is a Macedonian minority in Greece. The Court indicated the stance it would take towards the aims of the state authorities – the preservation of national security and the prevention of disorder – in this context. They were found to be legitimate, but the means used to further them – disallowing the registration of the group and therefore outlawing it – was found to be disproportionate to them and therefore unnecessary in a democratic society. Thus, proscription of a particular group, depending on the extent to which there was evidence that it threatened national security and public order, might be found domestically to violate these two Articles. Where, for example, a group presenting no risk to national security in the UK had been proscribed on the basis of its action in seeking to combat an oppressive regime or in providing support for another group operating against such a regime, it could be found that proscription was disproportionate to the aims in view. So far this has not occurred under the TA.

R (on the application of the Kurdistan Workers' Party and others)

The Convention issues raised by proscription are conveniently encapsulated in the following decision. The claim failed, on procedural grounds, but the substantive issues raised on behalf of the three proscribed organisations in question strongly highlighted the 293 See Chapter 2, p 112.

294 See Chapter 2, pp 68–69.
295 (57/1997/841/1047) 10 July 1998; available from the Court's website.

flawed nature of the proscription scheme in human rights terms. The case represented an attempt to circumvent the POAC procedure, presumably on the basis that the claimants had doubts as to its efficacy. The claimants clearly preferred to seek judicial review of the proscription decisions instead. In R (on the application of the Kurdistan Workers' Party and Others) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (on the application of the People's Mojahedin Organisation of Iran and Others) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, R (on the application of Ahmed) v Secretary of State for the Home Dept,[296] three organisations sought to challenge the lawfulness of their proscription and the lawfulness of the regime of offences laid down by the 2000 Act. The organisations were the People's Mojahedin Organisation of Iran (the PMOI), the Kurdistan Workers' Party or Partiya Karkeren Kurdistan (the PKK), and Lashkar e Tayyabah (the LeT). Each was proscribed under the Terrorism Act 2000 (Proscribed Organisations) (Amendment) Ord 2001 (the 2001 Order). In each case the Court had to determine whether to grant or refuse permission to apply for judicial review. An application for deproscription of the PMOI was made on behalf of the PMOI and refused by the Secretary of State. The refusal was the subject of an appeal to the POAC, but before the appeal was heard the application for permission to apply for judicial review was lodged. An application for deproscription of the LeT was made and refused; an appeal to the POAC was lodged, as was an application for permission to apply for judicial review. The PKK and the individual claimants in the PKK case did not apply for deproscription but moved straight to their application for permission to apply for judicial review. But an application for deproscription of the PKK was, however, made by the Federation of Kurdish Community Associations in Great Britain and resulted in a decision by the Secretary of State not to deproscribe. There was no appeal against that decision to the POAC. So the judicial review proceedings pre-dated the appeals to the POAC.

The claimants thus sought judicial review of the decision of the Secretary of State to lay the 2001 Order before Parliament, the 2001 Order itself and the provisions of the 2000 Act. They sought declarations to the effect that the inclusion of the organisation in question in the list of proscribed organisations was unlawful; alternatively, they sought a declaration that the relevant provisions of the 2000 Act were incompatible with their Convention rights. They also sought damages pursuant to s 8 of the Human Rights Act, if successful.

The claimants argued that their proscription and the consequential criminal prohibitions under ss 11–19 of the 2000 Act gave rise to a substantial interference with their right to freedom of expression under Art 10 of the Convention, to freedom of association under Art 11 and the enjoyment of property under Art 1 of the First Protocol. The interference with Arts 10 and 11 was, it was argued, especially pernicious since it operated as a prior restraint upon the exercise of their Convention rights. The PMOI argued that its inclusion in a list containing organisations of a wholly different nature, such as Al-Qaeda, gave rise to an interference with its civil right to a good reputation under Art 8, and with the right to the enjoyment of Convention rights without discrimination under Art 14.

296 [2002] EWHC Admin 644.

In his note to Members of Parliament in support of the draft order seeking proscription of the PMOI, the Secretary of State described it as 'an Iranian dissident organisation based in Iraq which claims to be seeking the establishment of a democratic, socialist, Islamic republic in Iran'. The note referred briefly to the organisation's history, stating that the organisation undertakes cross-border attacks into Iran, including terrorist attacks, that it has assassinated senior Iranian officials and launched mortar attacks against government buildings in Tehran and elsewhere, and that in June 2000 the Iranian government claimed to have foiled a plot by the organisation to assassinate a former Iranian foreign minister. The note stated that the organisation had not attacked UK or Western interests and had no acknowledged presence in the UK. In refusing the application to deproscribe the PMOI, the Secretary of State stated:

> In the case of Mujaheddin e Khalq, the Secretary of State believes that the nature and scale of the organisation's activities and the need to support other members of the international community in the global fight against terrorism are relevant . . . the Secretary of State believes that proscription of Mujaheddin e Khalq should continue . . . The Home Secretary stated . . . that he had taken full account of the assertion that Mujaheddin e Khalq is involved in a legitimate struggle against a repressive regime and has no choice but to resort to armed resistance. But he stated that he did not accept any right to resort to acts of terrorism, whatever the motivation.

The PMOI described itself as a broad-based popular resistance movement committed to the establishment of a democratic, secular and pluralist government in Iran which would respect human rights and the internationally recognised norms of state behaviour. It stated that it had sought to achieve its aims through the political system, but it had been denied access to it through brutal suppression at the hands of the Iranian regime. It said that it had therefore been driven to resort to armed struggle in Iran. It was argued on its behalf that the Secretary of State had unfairly discriminated against it by including the PMOI in a list with organisations such as Al-Qaeda. Of the 21 organisations in the list, the PMOI was the only one recognised by the Secretary of State to be democratic in its aims. The list also, it said, excluded many groups that use or threaten violence for political ends. The list, it was argued, was therefore both over-inclusive and under-inclusive. It was argued that it is incumbent on the Secretary of State to provide an objective justification for such differences of treatment. It was also pointed out that MPs, in considering whether to approve the order, were faced with a dilemma either to proscribe Al-Qaeda and all the others in the list or to proscribe none of them.

In the case of the PKK, the Secretary of State had stated that he believed that the nature and scale of the organisation's activities, the specific threat that it posed to UK nationals overseas, the extent of the organisation's presence in the UK, meant that it should not be de-proscribed. The claimants described the PKK as a political party committed to the recognition and establishment of Kurdish identity and the rights of the Kurdish people. They laid emphasis on the PKK's formal abandonment of military action in favour of a non-violent political and democratic agenda in 1999. On behalf of the PKK it was argued that for many persons in the UK the PKK is the sole means of political expression, but that proscription had made it an offence to invite support for the PKK even if it related specifically to its commitment to a policy of non-violence.

Proscription meant that all political debate was suppressed relating to the PKK, and it was pointed out that members of the Kurdish community would commit an offence simply by displaying PKK badges or participating in demonstrations of more than three people. Further, one of the witnesses described her work for Kurdish organisations in the United Kingdom and stated that it would be impossible for those groups to remove the PKK from their contacts or discussions. She also said that proscription of the PKK had a serious effect on her journalistic work as editor of the Kurdistan Report. She stated that she faced the impossible choice of going to the police with knowledge or suspicion of fund-raising activities for the PKK, making her work in the Kurdish community impossible, or committing a crime by failing to do so.

It was argued on behalf of the PKK that although the Secretary of State had notified to Parliament that certain non-statutory factors would be taken into account (namely the nature and scale of the organisation's activities, the specific threat that it poses to the UK, the specific threat that it poses to UK nationals overseas, the extent of the organisation's presence in the UK, and the need to support other members of the international community), they did not amount to adequate or intelligible criteria for the exercise of the very wide discretion provided under s 3 TA. Those criteria provided, it was argued, no basis for determining which of the organisations meeting the statutory tests would be proscribed.[297]

LeT was described by the claimants as a movement committed to the cause of self-determination for the people of Kashmir by means of the holding of a plebiscite as required by UN resolutions. But the Secretary of State's note to Members of Parliament described it as an organisation seeking independence for Kashmir and the creation of an Islamic state using violent means. The note stated that it had a long history of mounting attacks against the Indian security forces in Kashmir, and that it had been blamed for the massacre of 35 Sikhs in Jammu and Kashmir in March 2000, and that more recently it had launched attacks in which several people were killed. On behalf of LeT it was contended that the making of the order was unlawful because it included 21 organisations and Parliament was unable to consider the individual merits of proscribing each organisation; it was unfair because no opportunity was given beforehand to make representations; the order was not 'prescribed by law' because the 2000 Act impermissibly gave complete discretion of the Secretary of State as to which organisations falling within the wide definition should in fact be proscribed. The proscription was not necessary in a democratic society, it was argued, because it amounted to a disproportionate interference with the rights under Arts 10 and 11 of the Convention; finally it was argued that the proscription was discriminatory and therefore in breach of Art 14.

The key issue that the judge had to decide was whether to give permission for judicial review of the decision to proscribe the three organisations, as opposed to insisting that they appeal to the POAC. It was argued on behalf of the Home Secretary that judicial review is a remedy of last resort, and that judicial review is not normally allowed where there is an alternative remedy by way of appeal.[298] In contrast, it was argued on behalf

297 At para 48.

298 Counsel for the Home secretary relied on R v Panel on Take-overs and Mergers, ex p Guinness plc [1990] QB 146, [1989] 1 All ER 509; R v Chief Constable of Merseyside Police ex p Calveley [1986] 1 QB 424, [1986] 1 All ER 257. He also relied, by analogy, on statements in R v DPP ex p Kebilene of the claimants that an alternative procedure should be exhausted first only if it is at least as extensive as judicial review, and that where the suggested alternative forum could not consider the entirety of a complaint which can be raised by way of judicial review, the court should entertain a claim for judicial review.[299]

For a range of reasons the judge decided that the POAC was the appropriate forum within which the claims should be raised. He found that Parliament, although not seeking to exclude the possibility of judicial review, had intended the POAC to be the forum of first resort for the determination of claims relating to the lawfulness of proscription under the 2000 Act. Also the POAC was designated as the appropriate tribunal for the purposes of s 7 of the Human Rights Act in relation to proceedings against the Secretary of State in respect of a refusal to deproscribe. He also noted that it is a specialist tribunal with procedures designed specifically to deal with the determination of claims relating to proscription; in particular he noted that the POAC is expressly excluded from the prohibition on the disclosure of intercepted communications, a very important area of evidence.

Conclusions

After this decision it is clear that the remedy provided by the POAC means that judicial review of the decision to make proscription order is unavailable unless the POAC remedy has already been exhausted. Section 9 appears to be intended as far as possible to keep proceedings based on s 7 HRA largely in the POAC, thereby tending to prevent the ordinary courts from hearing points raised under s 7 HRA. This decision did not address the substantive human rights issues. But the issues raised in the case highlight the deficiencies of the proscription provisions. Clearly, a very wide range of organisations meet the definition under s 1 TA. No check on the decision to proscribe groups falling within that definition is provided in the TA itself. The check on the Secretary of State's discretion provided by Parliament is clearly limited; Parliament in that instance was asked to proscribe all 21 organisations, including Al-Qaeda, or none of them. It therefore could not scrutinise the individual circumstances of each organisation in any detail. Further, it lacked the information to provide any meaningful scrutiny. The Secretary of State argued that the relevant decision to proscribe could be viewed as sufficiently precise and accessible to be seen as prescribed by law for the purposes of Arts 10 and 11, since it was not that of the Secretary of State under s 3 of the 2000 Act, but the decision taken by Parliament in the form of its approval of the order. However, given the limited scrutiny possible in Parliament in the circumstances, it is argued that the decision remained in effect largely in executive hands. The Parliamentary oversight is inadequate, it is contended, to ensure that proportionality is observed by the Home Secretary in taking the initial decision to proscribe a group.

The key point was that the circumstances relied on for the proscription of the claimant organisations were, it is argued, doubtfully able to justify the very serious [2000] 2 AC 326, [1999] 3 WLR 972 and R (Pretty) v DPP [2002] 1 All ER 1, [2001] 3 WLR 1598 to the broad effect that satellite litigation by way of judicial review is to be avoided in relation to issues arising in the context of criminal proceedings. He argued that the same principle should apply in relation to issues that have been or could be raised in proceedings before POAC.

299 R v IRC ex parte Mead [1993] 1 All ER 772, [1992] STC 482 was relied on.

interferences with the Convention rights of the individual claimants, in particular the chilling effect on free speech. The basis for proscription is in general, it is argued, too imprecise to satisfy the requirement that interferences with the right to freedom of expression and association be both prescribed by law and proportionate. A very wide range of terrorism offences are available in the TA, as discussed below, not dependent on proscription; it may therefore be argued that sufficient curbs are already available to use against a number of the organisations that are already proscribed or against groups that are currently candidates for proscription

Special 'terrorism' offences under the TA; additional offences introduced under the Terrorism Act 2006

Introduction

Virtually all the extensive range of special terrorist offences were retained under the TA, and most of them were applied to the vast range of groups which could, potentially, fall within the s 1 definition.[300] One controversial power, of exclusion, was, however, abolished under the TA. Section 5 of the PTA provided for exclusion from Great Britain, s 6 for exclusion from Northern Ireland and s 7 for exclusion from the whole of the United Kingdom. In effect, these powers meant that Northern Irish citizens could be forced to go back to Northern Ireland; there was little reciprocity in terms of excluding Irish citizens to Britain.[301] These provisions were reviewed by Lord Jellicoe in 1983;[302] he concluded that the exclusion power should be allowed to lapse as soon as circumstances suggested that it was not strictly necessary.[303] The powers were being used with increasing infrequency: there were 248 orders in force in 1982; by the end of 1996 there were 24. In 1997 the Home Secretary considered that they were no longer effective in combating terrorism and revoked the 12 which remained. The exclusion powers were not in force at the time of the inception of the TA. These powers were largely irrelevant in relation to the domestic groups designated as terrorist under s 1 TA and probably largely irrelevant to the small Irish splinter groups, such as the Real IRA. They would have been extremely complex to operate in respect of 'international terrorists'. Thus, even if they had been retained, these powers would probably have remained largely unused under the TA. Nevertheless, their repeal is to be welcomed on the principle that such laws should be repealed rather than left to lie on the statute book, with the possibility that they could be arbitrarily reactivated in future.

The TA provides a very extensive portfolio of counter-terrorist offences since it adopted EPA offences that had previously not been applied in the UK generally. The extensive range of offences of a preparatory nature were added to under ATCSA 2001

300 Under Part VII some offences continued to apply only to Irish rather than to international terrorist groups.

301 See Walker, The Prevention of Terrorism, 2nd edn, 1992, pp 84–85; only four persons have been excluded to Britain.

302 Report on the Operation of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1978.

303 Jellicoe (1983): para 200; however the review by Lord Colville recommended on this basis that power to make exclusion orders should be repealed (Report on the Operation in 1990 of the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1989).

and the Terrorism Act 2006. The Terrorism Act 2006 introduced in particular two new and very broadly defined offences of preparation of terrorist acts under s 5 and of glorifying terrorism under s 1. The range of offences based on failing to give information or relating to property draw ordinary citizens, including the commercial sector, into the scheme. Clearly, the groups affected by the proscription scheme can also be affected by the general terrorism offences. The very wide range of terrorist offences now available, and their far-reaching impact, highlights the potentially immensely broad scope of s 1 TA, and its partially symbolic rather than actual import. In examining the current incrementally extended range of offences, it must be remembered that they are of course additional to the provisions of the ordinary criminal law. Violent terrorist acts infringe a number of criminal law provisions, without the need for recourse to the special terrorism offences. It might be asked, looking over the vast list of provisions, whether special terrorism offences and sanctions have real value given that they are under-used. If one of the 7/7 suicide bombers in London had survived he could have been charged with a number of criminal offences, beginning with murder.

The offences discussed below, which were originally developed in the context of the PTA or EPA, could probably only have been introduced in the context of the threat from Irish terrorism, in some instances, as indicated above, at a time when the number of deaths from bomb attacks had been very high in the preceding years. At the time MP's obviously could not know that in 2000 they would be asked to apply all those offences to a wide range of groups, some of which, in terms of their ability to create a serious threat to life and their willingness to do so, cannot be compared with the IRA. Moreover, certain of these offences appeared only in the EPA, partly on the basis, as indicated above, that the threat was greatest in Northern Ireland and that without some apparently strong justification, they should not be included in the PTA. Unless the Home Secretary proscribes all the groups covered by s 1 TA, including protest groups advocating direct action, the proscription-related offences do not apply to them. But all the special terrorist offences, which have no equivalents in ordinary criminal law, can be applied. The use of the stop and search power under s 44 TA, discussed in Chapter 11, in relation to reporters and protesters, is indicative of the possibility of applying terrorism offences in the public protest context, as was its use against a peace activist attempting an anti-war protest at the Labour Party conference in 2005.[304] A number of the offences create prima facie infringements of certain of the Convention rights, albeit potentially justifiable, most notably Arts 10, 11, 6 and 5, under the HRA.

Directing a terrorist organisation

Section 56 TA 2000 makes it an offence to direct 'at any level' a terrorist organisation. Thus, the leaders, and all with some authority within the vast range of groups within the 304 Walter Wolfgang, a well-known peace activist, currently Vice President of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament (CND), Vice Chair of Labour CND and a supporter of the Stop the War Coalition, was ejected from the Labour Party conference for protesting against the Iraq war; when he attempted to re-enter the conference later the same day, his pass showed that he had been removed previously, and he was briefly held by police under s 44 of the Terrorism Act.

UK which may fall within the s 1 definition, are liable to a sentence of life imprisonment simply by virtue of their position. It does not appear to cover minor figures in the organisation.[305] The maximum sentence which can be given on conviction for the offence is life imprisonment. The PTA contained no equivalent provision; the offence was only provided in the EPA, in s 29. The term 'directing' was not defined in the EPA, but it clearly had the meaning of taking some authority for actions to be carried out, or playing some part in giving orders in relation to them.[306] The Consultation paper noted that there had only been two convictions for this offence, pointing out that its nature means that it is difficult to get evidence to support a charge; witnesses are particularly reluctant to make statements implicating people who hold positions of authority within terrorist organisations. But where a conviction was obtained, it was thought that it would be 'likely to be of some significance and to have a major impact on the terrorist organisation in question'.[307] Lord Lloyd considered that the offence had been of real value. He recommended that it should be retained in permanent legislation and it should be extended to cover the whole of the United Kingdom and all forms of terrorism. The government agreed with his recommendation,[308] which is fully reflected in s 56 of the TA. This offence has the advantage that it can be used to disrupt groups falling within s 1 TA even though they have not (yet) been proscribed. The police and prosecuting authorities have so far shown discretion in seeking to use this offence, and have not applied it to the leaders of e.g. protest groups advocating direct action, but it is unsatisfactory that the leaders of such groups should be placed in a precarious position in relation to the criminal law, one that is merely dependent on forbearance.

The offence under s 56 of the TA to direct 'at any level' a terrorist organisation is not confined to proscribed groups. If a relatively minor figure in an organisation which met the wide definition of terrorism under s 1, but was within its less serious aspects, was charged with this offence, a court which found that this interference with Art 11 was disproportionate to the aims pursued could interpret the terms used in s 56, especially 'directing' and 'at any level' under s 3 HRA so as to exclude such figures from the ambit of the section. For example, taking the terms together it could be argued that the term 'directing' qualifies 'at any level' so that only figures at the highest level within the leadership sector of the organisation are covered.

Preparatory and possession offences

A number of offences introduced under the Terrorism Acts 2000 and 2006, and in the ATCSA cover activities ancillary to terrorism and broadly of a preparatory nature; some are aimed at terrorist conspiracies and at fund-raising and other activities of 305 HC Debs vol 187 col 404, 6.3 1991. See Walker, C and Reid, K, 'The Offence of directing Terrorist Organisations' (1993) Crim LR 669 on the previous equivalent offence under the EPA.

306 In the consultation paper the government explained: 'The offence is aimed at the strategists – those who plan campaigns and order them to be carried out, but who do not normally themselves take any part in the detailed planning or execution of the individual attacks which make up the campaign.' (ibid, para 12.9).

307 Ibid, para 12.9.

308 Ibid, para 12.10.

terrorist groups ancillary to acts of terrorism; some are aimed at businesses and ordinary citizens. These offences disrupt terrorist funding activities, and are of value in relation to the threat of suicide bombing since they can allow for the arrest of terrorists at an early planning stage, but a number of them were so broadly drawn as to fail to achieve Convention-compliance.

As mentioned above, a large number of further criminal offences, not limited to proscribed organisations, and punishable by up to 14 years' imprisonment, exist under ss 14–18 in relation to fund-raising for the purposes of terrorism; the use or possession of money or other property for the purposes of terrorism; arrangements to make money or property available for the purposes of terrorism (funding arrangements), and under s 18 in relation to arrangements facilitating the retention or control of terrorist property by concealment, removal, transfer, etc (money laundering). The offences provided under ss 14–18 impose a range of significant responsibilities on members of the public; s 18 is broadly defined and could cover, for example, a property agent collecting rent from premises unaware that the ultimate beneficiary of the profits was a company operating for the benefit of a terrorist organisation. If charged, the statutory defence made available under s 18(2) would place a reverse burden upon him to show 'that he did not know and had no reasonable cause to suspect that the arrangement related to terrorist property'. However, if this occurred, following Attorney General's Reference (No 4 of 2002),[309] discussed above, the burden should be read down under s 3 HRA to an evidential burden only in order to ensure compliance with Art 6(2).

Section 16A(1) of the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1989, as inserted by s 82 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, provides that a person is guilty of an offence if he has an article in his possession in circumstances giving rise to a reasonable suspicion that the article is in his possession for a purpose linked to terrorism. Under s 16A(3) the accused could rebut this presumption of guilt by proving that the article was not in his possession for the purpose mentioned in s 16A(1). Under s 16A(4) if it is proved that the article and the accused were both present on the premises, or that the article is present on premises which he occupies or habitually uses, this may be sufficient evidence of possession, unless he proves that he did not know of its presence or had no control over it. This offence was reproduced in s 57 TA. The 'possession of an article in circumstances which give rise to a reasonable suspicion that [it] is for a purpose connected with the commission, preparation or instigation of an act of terrorism' carries a ten-year jail sentence under s 57. An amendment put forward by the Liberal Democrats, which would have removed the presumption that proof of the presence of the article on the occupier's premises is sufficient to establish the offence, was overwhelmingly defeated by a combination of Labour and Conservative MPs.[310] As discussed above, s 57 only imposes an evidential, not a legal burden, on the defendant, in order to satisfy Art 6(2): s 118 of the Act applies to s 57 and provides that if the defendant adduces evidence which is sufficient to raise an issue with respect to the matter, the court or jury shall assume that the defence is satisfied unless the prosecution proves beyond reasonable doubt that it is not.

309 [2004] UKHL 43; [2005] 1 AC 264; [2005] 1 All ER 237.
310 HC Debs 15 March 2000 col 435.

Section 28 TA 2000 provides for civil forfeiture proceedings in relation to seized cash.[311] Evidence that the cash is terrorist property is required only to the civil standard of proof. Proceedings for a criminal offence are not needed. The provisions do not therefore allow for a conviction on the civil standard.[312] The forfeiture provisions under s 28 need to satisfy the requirements of a fair hearing under Art 6.[313] As discussed above, the term 'criminal charge' has an autonomous Convention meaning: Benham v UK.[314] It was found that s 41 of the Community Charge (Administration and Enforcement) Regulations, the legislation in question, should be accounted criminal for Art 6(1) purposes. Section 28 has certain features which are comparable to those of s 41; if forfeiture is ordered the implication is that the defendant is concerned in terrorism although the possibility of imprisonment does not arise. Article 6(1) and (2) do not require proof beyond reasonable doubt: a wide margin of appreciation has been conceded to national courts in respect of the burden of proof.[315]

These offences of possession of information or objects were added to under the Terrorism Act 2006 which introduced a range of new offences of 'acts preparatory to terrorism'. The new offences are aimed at those planning acts of terrorism in a manner not already covered by the existing offences. Section 5 prohibits anyone from engaging in any conduct in preparation for an intended act of terrorism. The offence requires intention, but the actus reus is exceptionally broad. Under s 5:

> (1) A person commits an offence if, with the intention of–
>
> (a) committing acts of terrorism, or > (b) assisting another to commit such acts, he engages in any conduct in preparation for giving effect to his intention.
>
> (2) It is irrelevant for the purposes of sub-section (1) whether the intention and preparations relate to one or more particular acts of terrorism, acts of terrorism of a particular description or acts of terrorism generally.

Under s 5(3) the maximum penalty is life imprisonment. Section 5 is obviously intended to be a catch-all offence able to allow intervention in relation to would-be terrorists at a very early stage, before any conduct linked to the actual preparation of a terrorist act has occurred. For example, visiting a 'jihadist' website could be covered so long as the requisite intention could be shown. This offence overlaps to an extent with the proscription offences, but it obviates the need to show membership of Al-Qaeda or a related organisation.

Section 5 is clearly aimed at criminalising Al-Qaeda supporters largely on the basis of that support, but the person in question must have the intention of committing or 311 Raimondo v Italy A 21–4 (1994), a decision on similar provisions, suggested that they may be compatible with the Convention on the basis that the aim of such provisions is in the general interest.

312 It may be noted that these provisions reverse the principle put forward in Webb v Chief Constable of Merseyside Police [2000] 1 All ER 209 to the effect that the seizure of cash linked, on the civil standard of proof, to drug dealing, was unlawful.

313 Rules were made, under s 31 TA, governing the procedure to be followed.

314 (1996) 22 EHRR 293. See further above, p 1342.

315 See Austria v Italy 6 YB 740 at 784 (1963) Com Rep; CM Res DH (63) 3.

assisting in the commission of a 'terrorist' act, although that need not be a specific act. Presumably that term would be defined by reference to s 1 TA. The addition of 'acts of terrorism generally' brings this offence very close to 'thoughtcrime'. Lord Carlile, the government reviewer of the TA, supported the introduction of this offence, allowing for very early intervention in preparatory activity, on the basis that: 'there is clear evidence that such an offence would provide for some cases a way of dealing with suspects more acceptable in perceptual terms than control orders. It is better that sanctions should follow conviction of crime rather than mere administrative decisions'.[316] This is clearly laudable in principle, especially as the control orders scheme, as discussed below, is over-broad in human rights terms but under-inclusive in security terms – since the orders do not at the moment include detention. But as the widest offence introduced so far in the counter-terrorist scheme, it again relies heavily on executive discretion in deploying it.

A number of new offences relating to materials that could be used in an attack were also introduced in the 2006 Act.[317] Section 12 TA 2006 extends the ban on trespassing in specified locations imposed by the Serious and Organised Crime and Police Act 2005, to cover any nuclear site. Section 6 prohibits anyone from training others in terrorist activities, or from receiving training and carries a maximum penalty of ten years' imprisonment. A further new offence of 'terrorist training' was introduced under the 2006 Act to be added to the existing offence under s 54 Terrorism Act 2000; under s 54 those who give or receive training in the making or use of weapons or explosives, or recruit persons for this purpose, are liable to ten years in prison. Section 8 prohibits anyone from being at a place where training is going on (whether in the United Kingdom or abroad), provided the person knew or reasonably believed that training was happening. The offence carries a maximum penalty of ten years' imprisonment. The new offence is much broader in that s 8 makes it an offence merely to be in attendance at any place in the world where such instruction is taking place. Lord Carlile has pointed out that this would leave open the possibility of prosecuting journalists reporting in the public interest from camps of fighting groups revolting against despotic regimes.[318]

Positive obligations to report information[319]

A very wide range of other people, including ordinary citizens, banks and businesses, who are not part of any of the groups covered by s 1 TA, are potentially criminalised under various offences relating to the reporting of information. Section 18 of the PTA controversially made it an offence to fail to report information to the police which might be of material assistance in preventing an act of terrorism or in arresting someone 316 Report on the Operation in 2005 of the Terrorism Act 2000, May 2006, at para 33.

317 Section 9 prohibits the making or possession of any radioactive device (i.e. a 'dirty' bomb). The maximum penalty is life imprisonment. Section 10 prohibits using radioactive materials or a radioactive device in a terrorist attack, and the sabotage of nuclear facilities which causes a radioactive leak. The maximum penalty is life imprisonment. Section 11 covers terrorist threats relating to devices, materials or facilities; it prohibits anyone from making threats to demand that they be given radioactive materials. The maximum penalty is life imprisonment.

318 Ibid (2006).

319 See further Walker, C, The Anti-Terrorism Legislation (2002), Chapter 3.

carrying out such an act. It applied only to acts of terrorism in Northern Ireland. Lord Lloyd questioned the practical value of this offence and recommended that an offence of this sort should not be included in any permanent legislation.[320] However, the government considered that its existence gave a 'clear signal' to citizens regarding the abhorrence of terrorism, and included it in the Act, in s 19, in a somewhat modified and narrowed form. Suspicions arising in home life are no longer covered, but the offence is nevertheless of extremely wide application.[321] Section 19 goes well beyond requiring banks and other businesses to report any suspicion they might have that someone is laundering terrorist money or committing any of the other terrorist offences in ss 15–18. It applies to all employees or employers and means that if, during the course of their work, a person comes across information about, or becomes suspicious of, someone whom she suspects may be using money or property to contribute to the causes of terrorism, she will commit a criminal offence carrying a maximum penalty of five years' imprisonment if she does not report them.

Section 38B, inserted by s 117 ATCSA, creates a much broader provision: it is based on s 18 PTA and so negates the reform that s 19 TA brought about. It is also broader in application than s 18 PTA since it relies on s 1 TA and therefore is applied universally across the UK, rather than only to Northern Ireland. Section 38B makes it an offence, subject to an unexplicated defence of reasonable excuse, for any person to fail to disclose to a police officer any information which he knows or believes might be of material assistance in preventing an act of terrorism or securing the apprehension or conviction of a person involved in such an act.[322]

320 Ibid, para 12.7.

321 Section19(1) provides:

this section applies where a person –

(a) believes or suspects that another person has committed an offence under any of sections 15 to 18, and

(b) bases his belief or suspicion on information which comes to his attention in the course of a trade, profession, business or employment.

(2) The person commits an offence if he does not disclose to a constable as soon as is reasonably practicable –

(a) his belief or suspicion, and

(b) the information on which it is based'.

Sub-section (5) preserves the exemption in respect of legal advisers' privileged material.

322 Section 38B provides: Information about acts of terrorism

(1) This section applies where a person has information which he knows or believes might be of material assistance –

(a) in preventing the commission by another person of an act of terrorism, or

(b) in securing the apprehension, prosecution or conviction of another person, in the United Kingdom, for an offence involving the commission, preparation or instigation of an act of terrorism.

(2) The person commits an offence if he does not disclose the information as soon as reasonably practicable in accordance with sub-section (3) . . .

(4) It is a defence for a person charged with an offence under sub-section (2) to prove that he had a reasonable excuse for not making the disclosure.

ATCSA 2001 also inserted new ss 21A and 21B into TA 2000, placing new responsibilities on the regulated financial sector.[323] This is a stricter duty, applied instead of, rather than in addition to, the duty under s 19. Section 21A provides that if a person believes or suspects or has reasonable grounds for knowing or suspecting that another person has committed an offence under any of ss 15–18, and the basis for the belief or suspicion came to him in the course of a business in the regulated sector, he will commit an offence if he does not disclose the information in question to a constable or nominated officer as soon as is reasonably practicable. Under s 21A(5) he has a defence of reasonable excuse for not disclosing the information or other matter, or he can raise legal professional privilege.

Journalists are among the groups of ordinary citizens affected by these duties of disclosure of information. Sections 19 and 38B potentially curb journalistic investigation into the activities of a very wide range of groups, since journalists are unlikely to be prepared to incur the risk of a lengthy prison sentence. The offence also potentially places journalists investigating, or in some way associated with, the activities of certain groups, such as the PKK or Teyrebaz Azadiye Kurdistan, in a very difficult position, especially where they have contacts within the group. It would appear almost impossible for any investigative journalism to occur in such circumstances, without risk of incurring a five-year prison sentence. The provision requiring the surrender of information might mean that the identity of sources could not be protected. But it is clear that the two offences may be having a strong deterrent effect on investigative journalism in relation to extremist groups. This might have the counter-productive effect of helping to keep the activities of the more secretive of such groups out of the public eye.

These provisions afford very little recognition to the role of the media in investigating matters of public interest and informing the public. Strasbourg, as indicated in Part 2 to this chapter, and in the Introduction to Part II of this book, gives pre-eminence to the role of the press in a democracy.[324] Restrictions placed on the press in performing this vital role have been subjected to the strictest scrutiny.[325] Charging a journalist with these offences would clearly, therefore, amount to an interference with the Art 10 guarantee. The domestic court would be expected to observe the same or (arguably) higher standards than Strasbourg in scrutinising the need for the interference, bearing in mind the narrow margin of appreciation afforded to states in respect of interference with political speech, especially where it concerns criticism directed at the government itself.[326] The Divisional Court in Ex p Kebilene[327] (as discussed above) indicated the strictness of the standards which domestic courts are capable of applying, albeit in relation to Art 6(2) rather than Art 10.

323 As defined in new Sched 3A. Supervisory authorities include: the Bank of England; the Financial Services Authority; the Council of Lloyd's; the Director General of Fair Trading; a body which is a designated professional body for the purposes of Part 20 of the Financial Services and Markets Act 2000; The Secretary of State; The Treasury. There are increasing concerns in banks and businesses in the regulated sector about the difficulties of compliance.

324 Castells v Spain, judgment of 23 April 1992, Series A no 236, p 23, para 43.

325 Goodwin v UK (1996) 22 EHRR 123.

326 Incal v Turkey (2000) 29 EHRR 449 (above, p 1355).

327 [1999] 4 All ER 801.

The offence that is now s 38B was one of the most controversial in the PTA, but while it is justifiable in relation to the knowledge of an imminent bomb attack, it clearly appears needlessly draconian when applied – via the s 1 definition of terrorism – to a much greater range of people. Anyone working with someone, such as an anti-Ghadaffi activist who is active abroad in the manner designated terrorist under the TA, or someone whose work happens to bring them into contact in some way with information related to activities linked to terrorism, has been placed in an invidious position. Such people may suffer a conflict of loyalties, especially if they have sympathy with the activities of the group in question, while not wishing to become a member of it. They may also fear reprisal and may therefore be forced to face the dilemma of the choice between risking violence or committing an offence. Section 19, it may be noted, does not necessarily exempt family members from the duty since many small businesses employ other members of the family, including teenagers.

Defences are provided in relation to these offences which – apart from that of s 21A – appear to be aimed, inter alia, at journalists. The s 21A defence would be relevant in relation to the presumption of innocence. All three offences provide: 'it is a defence for a person charged with an offence under [the relevant sub-section] to prove that he had a reasonable excuse for not making the disclosure'. Under ss 19 and 38B this defence would allow a journalist to raise Art 10 points under the HRA. The defence of 'reasonable excuse' under ss 19 and 38B could be afforded a wide interpretation in order to protect investigative journalism. Section 21A and ss 19 and 38B all have to be interpreted compatibly with Art 6(2), as discussed above. Section 118 eases the burden of proof on defendants, in accordance with the presumption of innocence under Art 6(2), as discussed above, but it does not cover s 19, or s 38B or s 21A. However, the decision of the House of Lords in Sheldrake v DPP; Attorney General's Reference (No 4 of 2002)[328] is relevant. First, it may be noted that requiring a journalist to prove reasonable excuse stands Art 10 on its head since freedom of expression is not viewed as a defence under Art 10; the justification for the interference operates in a sense as a defence negating the potential breach. Second, following the House of Lords' decision the defences in question could be read down so as to impose on the defendant an evidential burden only. The Court of Appeal in R v Keogh[329] accepted that the principle from Attorney General's Reference must be applied in a wide range of situations. Given the burden that is being placed on groups of citizens, including those working in the financial sector, by these offences, it is arguable that requiring a defendant to prove a defence of reasonable excuse, could be viewed as requiring him to disprove a substantial element of the offence, so as to engage the principle from Attorney General's Reference.

A further wide range of citizens and businesses can be criminalised under the provision relating to the collection of information, which is based on s 16B of the PTA. Section 16B made it an offence in England, Wales and Scotland to collect, record or possess any information which might be useful to terrorists; it applied to both Irish and international terrorism. Equivalent provision was made for Northern Ireland in s 33 of the EPA. This offence was designed principally to catch those compiling or possessing targeting information. Lord Lloyd found that the police considered the offence to have been particularly useful in Northern Ireland. He recommended its retention, and it is included in s 58(1) which provides: 'A person commits an offence if (a) he collects or makes a record of information of a kind likely to be useful to a person committing or preparing an act of terrorism, or (b) he possesses a document or record containing information of that kind.'

328 [2005] 1 AC 264; [2005] 1 All ER 237.
329 [2007] All ER (D) 105 (Mar); [2007] EWCA Crim 528, 7 March 2007.

This is another extremely wide offence, particularly since, in common with the one arising under s 56, it lacks any requirement of knowledge regarding the nature of the information, or any requirement that the person intended to use it in order to further the aims of terrorism. It could catch, for example, a journalist, or an accountant who had records of information relating to funding activities of terrorist groups abroad that could be useful to a group within s 1. A defence of proving that 'he had a reasonable excuse for his action or possession' is provided. As discussed above, it was apparent from R (on the application of the Kurdistan Workers' Party and Others) v Secretary of State for the Home Department[330] that persons, including journalists, were placed in a difficult position in working for Kurdish organisations in the UK since it was very difficult to ensure that the PKK was excluded from their networks, and journalists who were in possession of information relating to the PKK were placed in an impossible position. The deterrent effect on journalism in such circumstances is clearly severe, especially as the maximum penalty is imprisonment for ten years. Section 58, however only imposes an evidential, not a legal burden, on the defendant, in order to satisfy Art 6(2): s 118 of the Act, as discussed above, applies to s 58 and provides that if the defendant adduces evidence which is sufficient to raise an issue with respect to the matter the court or jury shall assume that the defence is satisfied unless the prosecution proves beyond reasonable doubt that it is not.

Inciting terrorism abroad and encouraging/glorifying terrorism

The TA not only applies the old PTA and EPA offences to a much wider range of groups; it also created new offences of inciting terrorism abroad, which apply under ss 59, 60 and 61 to England and Wales, Northern Ireland and Scotland, respectively. In the consultation paper the government expressed concerns as to the effect on free speech: 'the incitement offence could be difficult in practice to prove and . . . the effect of [its creation] could be to constrain freedom of expression. On the other hand . . . considerable concern can be caused by . . . statements . . . encouraging and glorifying acts of terrorism'.[331] The government came down on the side of inclusion of the offence. Under s 59(1) 'A person commits an offence if (a) he incites another person to commit an act of terrorism wholly or partly outside the United Kingdom, and (b) the act would, if committed in England and Wales, constitute one of the offences listed in sub-section (2)'. Under s 59(2) the offences are the more serious offences against the person: murder, an offence under ss 18, 23, 24, 28 or 29 of the Offences against the Person Act 1861 (OAPA) and an offence under s 1(2) of the Criminal Damage Act 1971. Under s 59(3), the penalty for conviction under this section will be the penalty

330 [2002] EWHC Admin 644.
331 Ibid, para 4.19.

'to which he would be liable on conviction of the offence listed in sub-section (2) which corresponds to the act which he incites'. Sections 60 and 61 create equivalent provisions relating to Scotland and Northern Ireland.

In defending the introduction of the incitement offence Jack Straw pointed out that existing legislation, which had implemented various international covenants, meant that it was already an offence to incite anyone abroad to hijack an aircraft or to invite someone in Turkey or India to commit murder. Therefore, extending the offence to other countries, such as Japan or Australia, was logical: 'Every terrorist attack represents a violation of our democratic values . . . our response must be sufficiently robust to challenge and defeat these . . . activities. I think we have got the balance right'.[332] This claim was presumably based on the restriction of the offence to incitement to commit the serious offences listed. Nevertheless, it is open to question. It means that a person who encouraged another to assassinate a dictator of an oppressive regime would commit an offence punishable with a mandatory sentence of life imprisonment. The offence might also be committed during a demonstration at which words spoken denouncing such a dictator could be construed as amounting to incitement to assassinate him. Section 59 also creates doubtful distinctions between offences. Sometimes very little separates the person who commits grievous bodily harm (s 18 of the OAPA) from the person who commits serious bodily harm (s 20 OAPA), and this is more clearly the case where the attack need not in fact have been committed. But the s 20 offence is not listed in s 59(2). Therefore, determination that a person is subject to a penalty of a maximum of life imprisonment or to no penalty at all may rest on a very fine distinction.

The incitement provisions under ss 59, 60 and 61 afford very little recognition to the value of protest and assembly. They are unconfined to members of proscribed groups. Taking the example used above of charging the offence in respect of persons at a public meeting denouncing a terrorist dictator, a court which viewed the interference with freedom of expression as, in the circumstances, disproportionate to the aims in view, could take the opportunity of construing the wording of the provisions very strictly. In particular, where there was leeway to do so, on a very strict interpretation of the application of certain of the offences listed in s 59(2), it might be found that incitement merely of lesser, similar, but unlisted offences had occurred.

This incitement offence is aimed at incitement of specific and serious acts of violence. The offence of indirect encouragement of acts of terrorism which includes the glorification of such acts – a much broader offence – was introduced in the Terrorism Act 2006. It is not confined to glorifying acts of terrorist violence that also amount to serious criminal offences, and it does not require incitement since it includes the condoning of acts that have already occurred. The Act was drafted in the aftermath of the 7 July 2005 London bombings. On August 5, the Prime Minister made a statement at his regular monthly news conference in relation to the proposed legislation. He said:

> . . . there will be new anti-terrorism legislation in the Autumn. This will include an offence of condoning or glorifying terrorism. The sort of remarks made in recent days should be covered by such laws. But this will also be applied to justifying or glorifying terrorism anywhere, not just in the United Kingdom.

332 J Straw in an article in the Guardian, 14 December 1999.

The reference to 'the sort of remarks made in recent days' was generally taken as a reference to Omar Bakri Muhammad who had received a great deal of publicity for his reaction to the London bombing. There had been other statements, made by a number of controversial figures, including Muslim clerics such as Abu Qutada and Abu Hamza al-Masri about the September 11, 2001 attacks and attacks on US and UK forces in Iraq.

The concept of 'glorification' is imprecise; apparently modelled on the Spanish law of 'apologia de terrorismo', it is based on the principle, already established as acceptable in UK law, but not in such a broad fashion, of criminalising persons for what they say rather than what they do. As the Joint Committee on Human Rights put it in its Report on the Terrorism Bill 2006[333] in relation to the two offences – the existing offence of incitement and the new offence of glorification: 'In his view, the law already outlaws incitement to commit a particular terrorist act, such as the statement "Please will you go and blow up a tube train on 7 July in London?" but not a generalised incitement to terrorist acts such as "We encourage everybody to go and blow up tube trains".'[334] The Committee also noted that the offence overlapped with existing criminal offences which had been used in this context,[335] including the very broad offence of soliciting to murder. They noted that in R v El-Faisal,[336] for example, in 2004 the Court of Appeal had upheld the convictions of a minister of Islam for soliciting murder under s 4 Offences Against the Person Act 1861 and incitement to racial hatred under the Public Order Act 1986, for having made audio tapes urging Muslims to fight and kill, among others, Jews, Christians, Americans, Hindus and other 'unbelievers'.[337] They also noted that the Muslim cleric Abu Hamza Al-Masri was charged in 2004, with solicitation to murder for soliciting or encouraging others at a public meeting to kill non-believers in the Muslim faith, and with incitement to racial hatred. The Committee considered therefore that the strict necessity for a new offence might be thought to be questionable, but accepted that there was some uncertainty about the scope of the existing offences.

333 Report on the Prevention of Terrorism Bill (2005–6) HL Paper 75–1, HC 561–1.

334 Report on the Prevention of Terrorism Bill (2005–6) at para 21.

335 Ibid at paras 23 and 24.

336 [2004] EWCA Crim 456.

337 They noted that in the course of its judgment the Court of Appeal explained the very great width of the offence of soliciting to murder:

> 26 The offence of soliciting to murder is contained in s 4 of the 1861 Act which states:
>
> > 'Whosoever shall solicit, encourage, persuade or endeavour to persuade, or shall propose to any person, to murder any other person, whether he be a subject of her Majesty or not, and whether he be within the Queen's dominions or not, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and being convicted thereof shall be liable to imprisonment for life.'
>
> 27 The scope of the behaviour sufficient to constitute the offence was classically identified as follows in R v Most (1881) 7 QBD 244, per Huddleston B at 258:
>
> > 'The largest words possible have been used, "solicit" that is defined to be, to importune, to entreat, to implore, to ask, to attempt to try to obtain; "encourage", which is to intimate, to incite to anything, to give courage to, to inspirit, to embolden, to raise confidence, to make confident; "persuade" which is to bring any particular opinion, to influence by argument or expostulation, to inculcate by argument; "endeavour" and then, as if there might be some class of cases that would not come within those words, the remarkable words are used, "or shall propose to", that is say, make merely a bare proposition, an offer for consideration.'

In its report on the Terrorism Bill 2006 the Joint Committee on Human Rights also expressed strong reservations about both the breadth and vagueness of the provisions as originally drafted.[338] It pointed out that there was no requirement that the maker of the statement had to intend or even be reckless as to whether his statement was likely to be taken as encouragement of inducement to commit acts of terrorism: it sufficed if he had 'reasonable grounds' for so believing. In other words, the offence could be committed, in effect, by negligence. But amendments introduced in the House of Lords curtailed the scope of the offence as originally drafted, so that it could no longer be committed negligently, although it remains a very broad offence.

Section 1(1) prohibits the publishing of:

> a statement that is likely to be understood by some or all of the members of the public to whom it is published as a direct or indirect encouragement or other inducement to them to the commission, preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism or Convention offences.

Statements of indirect encouragement include every statement which glorifies the commission or preparation (whether in the past, in the future or generally) of such acts or offences. But this very broad provision of s 1 is qualified in a number of respects by s 1(2). A person commits an offence under s 1(2)(a) if:

> he publishes a statement to which this section applies or causes another to publish such a statement on his behalf; and
>
> (b) at the time he does so, he intends the statement to be understood as mentioned in sub-section (1) or is reckless as to whether or not it is likely to be so understood.
>
> (3) For the purposes of this section the statements that are likely to be understood by members of the public as indirectly encouraging the commission or preparation of acts of terrorism or Convention offences include every statement which –
>
> (a) glorifies the commission or preparation (whether in the past, in the future or generally) of such acts or offences; and
> (b) is a statement from which those members of the public could reasonably be expected to infer that what is being glorified is being glorified as conduct that should be emulated by them in existing circumstances.

The statement indirectly or directly encouraging terrorism is to be taken as a whole and looked at in the all the circumstances in which it was made (sub-section (4)). It is not necessary to show that anyone was actually 'encouraged or induced' to commit any relevant offence by the statement (sub-section (5)). The words 'by them in existing circumstances'[339] do narrow the scope of the offence since they require that members of the audience themselves might commit the acts of terrorism. Also they indicate that it would not suffice to show that the acts being glorified are acts that might be committed many years in the future by an audience member. Equally, it must be possible for the audience to emulate such acts in the present context; it is not enough for the speaker to glorify past acts, such as the Crusades. But those limiting words appear only to be intended to apply to indirect encouragement by means of glorification; they do not appear to apply to other forms of encouragement, although possibly s 3 HRA could be used to apply them to the offence generally. There is a defence of innocent publication, where the statement is published electronically, a defence intended to benefit those who run websites, on which such statements might be published without their knowledge or consent (sub-section (6)). Section 2 prohibits the dissemination of a publication which is either (a) likely to be understood as directly or indirectly encouraging terrorism, or (b) includes information which is likely to be understood as being useful in the commission or preparation of an act of terrorism. The maximum penalty for both offences is seven years' imprisonment.

338 Report on the Prevention of Terrorism Bill (2005–6) HL Paper 75–1, HC 561–1.

339 The words 'by them' were added by the government by amendment at report stage in the Commons to cl 1(4)(b).

The Joint Committee on Human Rights considered that the offence might be compatible with Art 10, under the existing Strasbourg case law. It found that restrictions on indirect incitement to commit violent terrorist offences are capable in principle of being compatible with Art 10,[340] provided that they are necessary, defined with sufficient precision to satisfy the requirements of legal certainty, and proportionate to the legitimate aims of national security, public safety, the prevention of crime and the protection of the rights of others.[341] In terms of necessity, whilst the Committee thought that general statements encouraging terrorism might well fall within the existing law on soliciting murder,[342] it accepted that 'there is some uncertainty about the scope of the existing offences'. It found that:

> A clarification of the law is therefore in principle justifiable, even if it overlaps to some extent with other existing offences. We therefore accept, on balance, that the case has been made out by the Government that there is a need for a new, narrowly defined criminal offence of indirect incitement to terrorist acts.[343]

A very significant concern of the Committee was as to the imprecision of the new offence: 'The legal certainty concern is that terms such as glorification, praise and celebration are too vague to form part of a criminal offence which can be committed by speaking.' The Committee pointed out that the Home Secretary rested upon a distinction between: 'encouraging and glorifying on the one hand and explaining or understanding on the other. The last two, he says would not be caught by the new offence, because they do not amount to encouraging, glorifying, praising or celebrating'.[344] The Committee was unconvinced by this reasoning on the basis that no 'bright line' distinction can be drawn consonant with legal certainty, between glorifying and explaining in this context:

340 It gave the example of Hogefeld v Germany, Appl No 35402/97 (20 January 2000).
341 Report on the Prevention of Terrorism Bill (2005–6) at para 20.
342 Under the Offences Against the Person Act 1861, s 4.
343 Report on the Prevention of Terrorism Bill (2005–6) HL Paper 75–1, HC 561–1, at para 25.
344 Ibid at para 27.

> In our view, the difficulty with the Home Secretary's response is that his distinction is not self-executing: the content of comments and remarks will have to be carefully analysed in each case, including the context in which they were spoken, and there will be enormous scope for disagreement between reasonable people as to whether a particular comment is merely an explanation or an expression of understanding or goes further and amounts to encouragement, praise or glorification. The point is made by the vast range of reaction to the comments of both Cherie Booth QC and Jenny Tonge MP about suicide bombers. Some reasonable people thought they fell on one side of the Home Secretary's line, other reasonable people thought they fell on the other.[345]

The Committee also considered that the offence was over-broad. The offence relies on the very broad definition of 'terrorism' in the 2000 Terrorism Act, which is discussed above. As indicated above, the definition under s 1 TA covers the use or threat, 'for the purpose of advancing a political, religious or ideological cause', of action anywhere in the world 'designed to influence a government or to intimidate the public or a section of the public', which involves serious damage to property. Thus the new offence, on its face, covers those who express support for armed resistance in Palestine or Iraq, for example. The new offence makes it criminal to vocalise support for armed opposition to regimes viewed by the speaker and by others in the international community as tyrannous and illegitimate. Since 'terrorist' acts are defined so broadly under s 1 TA, it is not necessary that the acts glorified could threaten life. It includes, on its face, the glorification of threats to damage property abroad in furtherance of the cause of a group fighting to establish a democratic regime in an oppressive state, since that action is covered by s 1 TA. The law is also drafted very broadly to include the 'glorification' of 'acts of terrorism' in the past. It is reasonably clear, however, that although the offence covers such speech, it was not intended for use against those speaking to condone or in defence of actions of groups operating only abroad, such as the PMOI in Iran who are 'terrorists' within s 1 TA, but could probably be regarded as 'freedom fighters'. But obviously it hands a very broad discretion to the executive as to its application.

Intent or recklessness as to the statement being understood by the audience as mentioned in s 1(2) is required for an offence to be committed. Thus, the offence can be committed by means of subjective recklessness or oblique intent. So even if the defendant has no intention of inciting people to support or condone terrorist actions, he/she could still be committing an offence so long as members of the public might reasonably regard it as direct or indirect encouragement, if he adverts to that possibility. It is also possible that the new offence could prove to be discriminatory in its application, raising questions as to its impact under Arts 10 and 14 combined. Arguably, certain statements made by Muslims could be regarded as 'glorification' if addressed to a Muslim audience, but not if addressed to a non-Muslim audience, due to the requirement under s 1(3)(b) that the audience 'could reasonably be expected to infer that what is being glorified is conduct that should be emulated by them in existing circumstances'. It is also possible that prosecutions will be discriminatory in terms of selecting those to be rendered accountable under the new offence. For example, the Egyptian cleric Sheykh Yusuf al-Qaradawi and Cherie Booth have both publicly stated that they can understand why oppressed Palestinians become human bombers.[346] But it is more probable that Sheykh Qaradawi might be subject to arrest for glorification of terrorism. The over-breadth of this offence opens the door to its use in a discriminatory fashion.

345 Ibid at para 28.

The incitement offence, together with the new offence of indirect encouragement of terrorism, were employed in 2007 as part of a long-term proactive investigation into alleged incitement and radicalisation of Muslims. A number of persons allegedly associated with the extremist Islamic group al-Ghurabaa, including Abu Izadeen, were arrested on grounds of incitement in April 2007. A further three persons stood trial on incitement charges in April 2007.[347]

4 The Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001, Part IV – the detention without trial scheme

Introduction

As part of its legislative response to the attacks on New York and Washington on 11 September 2001 the UK Government took the decision to seek to introduce detention without trial for foreign nationals suspected of being 'international terrorists' who could not be deported. In general, non-British citizens who present a risk to national security can be deported.[348] The government achieved its aim when Parliament passed the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 (ATCSA). Part 4 of the Act contained the detention without trial provisions. The claim was made that the controversial measures were necessary to protect our human rights and the democratic way of life: Mr David Blunkett, the Home Secretary, said of the Bill – 'strengthening our democracy and reinforcing our values is as important as the passage of new laws . . . the legislative measures which I have outlined today will protect and enhance our rights, not diminish them . . .'.[349] However, Part 4 of ATCSA created, as the discussion below reveals, an impact on human rights which went well beyond providing a response to September 11.

The detention without trial measure was the subject of stringent criticism before its introduction from various bodies, including the Joint Committee on Human Rights, and that criticism was reiterated in 2003 by the bodies charged with reviewing the scheme.[350] The failure of the government to respond to rights-based criticism of the 346 See Islamic Human Rights Commission, United to Protect our Rights (Sept 2005), p 5.

347 See the Guardian report, 25 April 2007, p 4.

348 See now the Immigration, Asylum and National Security Act 2006 and the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002. For comment, see Walker, C, 'The Treatment of Foreign Terror Suspects' (2007) 70(3) MLR 427. The 2006 Act builds in part on the government's proposals in 'Confident Communities in a Secure Britain', the Home Office Strategic Plan, 2004–2008, published in July 2004.

349 HC Debs 15 Oct 2001 col 925.

350 See: the Newton Report 2003 (Privy Council Review Committee) and the Carlile Report 2003 (ATCSA 2001, Part 4, Review by Lord Carlile of Berriew QC Feb 2003) and the Joint Committee on Human Rights (ATCSA Statutory Review and Continuance of Part 4, 6th Report of Session 20034, February 2004).

ATCSA was a continuing theme.[351] Part 4 created conflicts with a number of the guarantees of the European Convention on Human Rights received into domestic law under the Human Rights Act 1998. The Part 4 scheme could not be reconciled with the fundamental guarantee of liberty of the person under Art 5, so the government was forced to derogate from Art 5.

Part 4 was eventually repealed in 2005, as discussed below, after the House of Lords found that it was a disproportionate response to the emergency and conflicted with Arts 5 and 14 of the Convention read together. However, Part 4 is discussed in detail below, partly in order to provide the context and background for the control orders scheme under the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005, which succeeded it, and partly because it forms part of a very significant chapter in the UK's human rights history.

Introduction of Part 4 ATCSA, and the Derogation Order

The ATCSA builds upon the Terrorism Act 2000 (TA), which as indicated above already provided an extremely extensive range of coercive and investigatory powers. A number of measures were introduced in the ATCSA,[352] some of which were not counter-terrorist measures, but this part of this chapter will focus on Part 4 as the most controversial aspect of the Act. The TA is itself, as discussed, an immensely controversial piece of legislation which was apparently intended, at the time of its inception, to provide a complete package of counter-terrorist measures. The focus of counter-terrorist measures was changing and the TA was intended to provide recognition of the change. In particular, it was intended to broaden the focus of such measures, allowing, inter alia, for the effective targeting of terrorist groups motivated by fundamentalist religious ideals. In introducing the ATCSA, however, the government claimed that, despite the range of offences it offered, the TA did not provide it with sufficient powers. It stated that as a response to September 11 it needed a power to detain non-British citizens suspected of international terrorism, without trial. Thus, before the TA had been in force for one year, it came to be viewed as inadequate.

The problem faced by the government after September 11 was presented to Parliament and a number of Parliamentary committees[353] in the following terms: a dilemma had arisen in respect of persons suspected of being international terrorists but who could not be placed on trial due to the sensitivity of the evidence and the high standard of proof, and could not be extradited, or deported to their country of origin, or another country, because there were grounds to think that they would there be subject to torture or inhuman and degrading treatment, in breach of Art 3 of the European Convention. However, characterising the problem in this fashion ignored the fact that the security

351 See: Counter-Terrorism Powers: Reconciling Security and Liberty in an Open Society, A Discussion Paper, Cm 6147, presented to Parliament by the Secretary of State for the Home Department (25 February 2004), David Blunkett. The government refused to accept the validity of the criticisms: 'The Government believes that these powers continue to be an essential part of our defences against attack.'

352 See: Fenwick, H, 'The Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001: A proportionate response to September 11' [2002] 65 MLR 724–62; Walker, C and Akdeniz, Y, 'Anti-Terrorism laws and data retention: war is over?' (2003) 54 Northern Ireland Legal Quarterly 159.

353 Home Affairs Select Committee, The Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Bill (HC (2001–2) 351, 10 November 2001), First Report.

problem was created by British extremist Muslims linked to Al-Qaeda, as well as non-British citizens.

The dilemma arose due to the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Chahal v UK,[354] in which it found that a breach of Art 3 will arise where a country deports a person to another country, knowing that he or she will face a substantial risk of Art 3 treatment in that other country.[355] Mr Chahal was an Indian citizen who had been granted indefinite leave to remain in the UK but his activities as a Sikh separatist brought him to the notice of the authorities; the Home Secretary at the time decided that he should be deported because his continued presence was not conducive to the public good for reasons of a political nature, namely the international fight against terrorism. He resisted deportation on the ground (among others) that, if returned to India, he faced a real risk of death, or of torture in custody contrary to Art 3 of the European Convention which provides that 'No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.'

Before the European Court the United Kingdom contended that the effect of Art 3 should be qualified in a case where a state sought to deport a non-national on grounds of national security. The Court, affirming a unanimous decision of the Commission, rejected that argument. It said:[356]

> Article 3 enshrines one of the most fundamental values of democratic society. The Court is well aware of the immense difficulties faced by states in modern times in protecting their communities from terrorist violence. However, even in these circumstances, the Convention prohibits in absolute terms torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, irrespective of the victim's conduct. Unlike most of the substantive clauses of the convention and of Protocols Nos. 1 and 4, Article 3 makes no provision for exceptions and no derogation from it is permissible under Article 15 even in the event of a public emergency threatening the life of the nation.
>
> The prohibition provided by Article 3 against ill-treatment is equally absolute in expulsion cases. Thus, whenever substantial grounds have been shown for believing that an individual would face a real risk of being subjected to treatment contrary to Article 3 if removed to another state, the responsibility of the Contracting state to safeguard him or her against such treatment is engaged in the event of expulsion. In these circumstances, the activities of the individual in question, however undesirable or dangerous, cannot be a material consideration. The protection afforded by Article 3 is thus wider than that provided by Articles 32 and 33 of the United Nations 1951 Convention on the Status of Refugees.

The Court went on to consider whether Mr Chahal's detention, which had lasted for a number of years, had exceeded the period permissible under Art 5(1)(f). The Court, differing from the unanimous decision of the Commission, held that it had not. But it reasserted[357] that 'any deprivation of liberty under Article 5(1)(f) is justified only

354 (1996) 23 EHRR 413.
355 Ibid at para 74.
356 Ibid, in paras 79–80 of its judgment.
357 At para 113.

for as long as deportation proceedings are in progress'. In a case like Mr Chahal's, where deportation proceedings were precluded by Art 3, Art 5(1)(f) would not sanction detention because the non-national would not be 'a person against whom action is being taken with a view to deportation'. A person who commits a serious crime under the criminal law of this country may of course, whether a national or a non-national, be charged, tried and, if convicted, imprisoned. But a non-national who faces the prospect of torture or inhuman treatment if returned to his own country, and who cannot be deported to any third country, and is not charged with any crime, may not under Art 5(1)(f) of the Convention and Sched 3 to the Immigration Act 1971 be detained here even if judged to be a threat to national security.

Thus Art 3 imposes an absolute obligation on signatory states not to deport persons where they are at risk of Art 3 treatment in the receiving country[358] As a matter of domestic law, it is clear that the power to detain persons prior to deportation under the Immigration Act 1971, Sched 3, para 1 is limited to such time as is reasonable to allow the process of deportation to be carried out, and that deportation should follow promptly after the making of the order: R v Governor of Durham prison ex p Singh.[359] Thus the available powers of detention prior to deportation did not provide the government with a solution since the suspected terrorists in question could not be deported within a reasonable time, or, in some instances, at all.

The government's preferred solution to the dilemma was to introduce detention without trial for suspected terrorists even where they could not be deported. But it considered that the new provisions would be incompatible with Art 5(1) of the European Convention on Human Rights, which protects the right to liberty and security of the person, afforded further effect in domestic law under the HRA. Although there is an exception under Art 5(1)(f) allowing for detention of 'a person against whom action is being taken with a view to deportation or extradition', it was clear, following Chahal, that it would not cover the lengthy detentions envisaged during which deportation proceedings would not be in being.[360]

Therefore, in order to introduce the new provisions it was necessary to derogate from Art 5(1). The derogation was made by giving notice to the Secretary-General of the Council of Europe under Art 15(3) of the Convention. As discussed in Chapter 2, Art 15 provides that 'in time of war or other public emergency threatening the life of the nation' any of the contracting parties may take measures derogating from its obligations under the Convention, 'provided that such measures are not inconsistent with its other obligations under international law'. No derogation from Arts 3, 4(1), 7 or 2 (except in respect of deaths resulting from lawful acts of war) can be made under Art 15.[361] Before giving notice to the Secretary-General the government made an 358 Further, the UK has ratified Protocol 6 of the Convention and therefore cannot deport persons to countries where there is a real risk that the death penalty will be imposed. See X v Spain, DR 37 (1984) p 93; Aylor-Davis v France (1994) 76-A DR 164; Raidl v Austria (1995) 82-A DR 134. Protocol 6 prohibits the death penalty in time of peace: it was ratified by the UK on 27 January 1999.

359 [1984] 1 WLR 704.

360 At para 113. In order to detain, deportation proceedings should be in being and it should be clear that they are being prosecuted with due diligence.

361 See Chapter 2, pp 110–11.

order under s 14 HRA, the Human Rights Act (Designated Derogation) Order 2001[362] setting out the derogation from Art 5(1). The derogation itself was expressed to subsist until it was withdrawn, but for HRA purposes it was to cease to have effect after five years unless its extension was approved by the positive resolution procedure in both Houses of Parliament.[363] The schedule to the Derogation Order, which took the form of a draft letter to the Secretary-General, pointed out that the UN Security Council recognised the September 11 attacks as a threat to international security and required states in Resolution 1373 to take measures to prevent terrorist attacks, which would include denying a safe haven to those who plan, support or commit such acts. The schedule argued that on this basis there was a domestic public emergency, which was especially present since there were foreign nationals in the UK who threatened its national security. Therefore, it argued, the measures in Part 4 of ATCSA were clearly and strictly required by the very grave nature of the situation. The government also derogated from Art 9 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights as a further method of safeguarding the new measures from challenge.[364]

The European Court of Human Rights has never found that a claim for a derogation is unjustified on the basis that such a state of emergency does not exist. In Lawless v Ireland[365] the Court considered whether Ireland was justified in entering a derogation under Art 15 to Art 5. It found that any terrorist threat must affect the whole population, must be in being or be imminent, and must have produced a situation in which the usual law enforcement mechanisms are unable to function. It found that these conditions were satisfied in 1957 due to the existence of a 'secret army' operating in Ireland and in the UK and because of the alarming rise in terrorist activities in the previous year.[366] The introduction of special powers in Ireland, including internment, in 1971 was found to be justified by an upsurge in terrorist activity together with serious and prolonged rioting.[367]

It may be noted that, as discussed above,[368] a broad view was taken by the House of Lords in Secretary of State for the Home Dept v Rehman[369] of the meaning of a threat to national security; it was found that such a threat should be broadly defined to include the possibility of future threats, including those to the UK's allies. In introducing the ATCSA the Home Secretary said that the government held secret information suggesting that members of some international terrorist groups are currently in Britain.[370] The government took the view that, taking into account the September 11 atrocities and 362 SI 2001/3644. It was laid before Parliament on 12 November 2001, coming into effect on the following day. It designated the proposed derogation as one that was to have immediate effect.

363 Section 16 HRA.

364 Under Art 4(1) of the Covenant: see UK Derogation under the ICCPR, 18 Dec 2001. See further, Michaelsen, C, 'Derogating from International Human Rights Obligations in the "War Against Terrorism"? – A British–Australian Perspective' [2005] 17 (1–2) Terrorism and Political Violence 131–55.

365 A 3 (1961).

366 Ibid, para 28.

367 Ireland v UK A 25 (1978), para 23.

368 See above p 1343.

369 [1999] INLR 517 (SIAC); [2000] 3 All ER 778, CA; [2001] 3 WLR 877, HL.

370 See HC Debs 15 Oct 2001 col 924; evidence of the Home Secretary given to the Joint Committee on Human Rights, Second Report, Questions 3–7 and 9.

Britain's support for America, a state of public emergency affecting the life of the nation could be said to exist. The Joint Committee on Human Rights, however, expressed concern in its second report about the lack of specificity in the reasons given for taking this view.[371] It examined the Home Secretary in oral evidence on the reasons for thinking that a state of emergency existed differing from that facing the country when the TA 2000 was enacted; he replied that the current threat was greater than that posed by the IRA since the 1970s because the terrorists in question were thought to have access to weapons of mass destruction.[372] The Committee found that there might be evidence of a state of public emergency but that no evidence of it had been disclosed by the Home Secretary.

The Part 4 detention provisions

Detention under Part 4 ATCSA depended on certification by the Home Secretary as – in effect – a substitute for a trial. Under s 21(1) the Home Secretary could issue a certificate in respect of a person on the basis of (a) a reasonable belief that the person's presence in the UK was a 'risk to national security' and (b) reasonable suspicion that he or she was a terrorist. It may be noted that as a result of the decision in Rehman v Secretary of State for the Home Dept[373] the Home Secretary was accorded, as discussed below, a broad latitude in determining when a risk to national security arises.

Under s 21(2) ATCSA a 'terrorist' was a person who was or had been 'concerned in the commission, preparation or instigation of acts of international terrorism' or was (b) a member of or belonged to an international terrorist group or (c) had 'links' with such a group. Under s 21(4) such links would exist only if the person supported or assisted the international terrorist group. 'Terrorism' was afforded the meaning given to it in s 1(1) of the TA.[374] Thus the TA and ATCSA had to be read together. The detention provisions in the 2001 Act clearly did not apply to all those persons who fell within the definition in s 1(1) TA; the power to detain only applied to 'suspected international terrorists' who were non-British citizens. Under s 21(5) ATCSA a 'suspected international terrorist' was a person who fell within the definition of terrorism in s 1 of the TA 2000 and who had been certified under s 21(1).

It was crucial that the definition of a 'suspected international terrorist' should be precise since such a person could be subject to lengthy – perhaps indefinite – detention without trial. But, as indicated above, the definition of 'terrorism' under s 1 TA, on which it was centrally based, is itself immensely broad and imprecise. No full definition of an 'international' terrorist was contained in the Act, but s 21(3) provided that an international terrorist group 'is a group subject to the control or influence of persons outside the UK' and 'the Home Secretary suspects' (not qualified by 'reasonably') 'that it is concerned in the commission, preparation and instigation of acts of terrorism'. Further, a person could be termed a 'suspected international terrorist' on the basis that he or she had 'links' with an international terrorist group.

371 Ibid, at para 29.
372 Second report and oral evidence appended to the report, Questions 3–7 and 9 (para 29).
373 [2001] 3 WLR 877.
374 Section 21(5).

The power of certification could be exercised in respect of persons who, under s 22, could be subject to various immigration controls,[375] thus excluding British citizens from the scheme, however far they posed a risk to national security. Under s 23(1) persons falling within s 21 could be:

> detained under a provision specified in sub-section (2) despite the fact that his removal or departure from the UK is prevented (whether temporarily or indefinitely) by (a) a point of law which wholly or partly relates to an international agreement or (b) a practical consideration.

Section 23(2) referred to Sched 2, para 16 of the 1971 Act (detention of persons liable to examination or removal) and Sched 3 para 2 of that Act (detention pending deportation). No definition or explanation of the terms used in s 23(1) was offered. Provision under (a) had to be taken to relate to Art 3 and Protocol 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights, while the 'practical consideration' covered, inter alia, a failure to identify a country which would take the person.

As the Joint Committee on Human Rights pointed out, the Part 4 provisions went beyond answering to the dilemma the government claimed to be addressing.[376] The scheme covered, on its face, a range of persons unconnected with Al-Qaeda – the terrorist group which was almost certainly responsible for the September 11 attacks. It appeared to cover those who posed a threat only to other countries, such as Tamil Tigers, and also those who merely had 'links' with such groups. In theory, the scheme could have covered a Kurd who supported the PKK and had come to Britain to hand out leaflets about them, or a non-British citizen fund-raising in support of a non-proscribed activist environmental group advocating direct action abroad. In fact the first of these persons could have been arrested and charged with one of the proscription-linked offences under the TA.[377] The second arguably would not have committed any existing offence. Therefore, disturbingly enough, ss 21 and 23 not only allowed for the detention of those who – apparently – could not be brought to trial due to the sensitivity of the evidence, but also of those who could not have been brought to trial in any event.

Even accepting the necessity of introducing detention without trial, the separate question arose of the proportionality between the emergency situation and the detention scheme in Part 4 remains.[378] Bearing in mind the doubts that have been expressed as to the existence of a public emergency, it is fair to argue that if one existed it appeared to be one that only marginally fell within that term. Therefore, it is suggested, the government should have viewed itself as circumscribed in its choice of the measures 375 In terms of: a refusal of leave to enter or remain, or a variation of a limited leave to enter or remain in the UK under ss 3–3B Immigration Act 1971 or to a recommendation to deport under s 3(6) of that Act, or a decision to deport or an order to deport under s 5(1), refusal to revoke a deportation order, a cancellation of leave to remain, a direction of removal under paras 8–10 or 12–14 of that Act or a direction of removal under s 10 of the Immigration and Asylum Act 1999 or the giving of a notice of a decision to deport under the 1999 Act.

376 Fifth Report of the Joint Committee on Human Rights (2001), para 6.

377 Section 12(1) TA would provide the obvious one.

378 The tests of both necessity and proportionality must be satisfied: Lawless v Ireland A 3 (1961); De Becker v Belgium B4 (1962), at para 271.

to be taken. Among the possible measures which could have been adopted the less repressive ones should have been chosen. The choice in fact made failed, it is argued, to satisfy the requirements of proportionality due to the use of extraordinarily broad definitions, of 'terrorism', and of national security, on which the power of certification depended. As indicated above, the scheme was over-inclusive since it covered persons who were suspected of being part of or linked to international terrorist organisations but who had no links with Al-Qaeda. The 'emergency' was apparently imminent due to the September 11 attacks. Therefore a measure allowing for the detention without trial of those who were unconnected in any way to those involved in the attacks appeared to be disproportionate to the demands of the post-September 11 situation. But it was also under-inclusive: it could not have covered the 7/7 London suicide bombers since they were British citizens.

A number of qualifying provisions that would have improved this scheme in human rights terms were notable by their absence. For example, it was not necessary prior to certification[379] for the Home Secretary to receive an assessment from legal advisers regarding the feasibility of bringing any of the potential detainees to trial rather than relying on this scheme. Nor was it necessary for an interim assessment to be made on the basis that fresh evidence had been obtained while the detainee was in detention, rendering a prosecution feasible. The significance of this omission was highlighted in the case of Abu Qatada and Secretary of State for the Home Dept:[380] SIAC found that the evidence against Qatada was very strong[381] and the extensive evidence against him was reviewed. Clearly, the question why Qatada could not be prosecuted under one of the TA offences arose. The offence under s 59(1) TA, for example, might well have been applicable. Obviously some of the evidence would have been difficult to present in court, but Special Immigration Appeals Commission (SIAC)'s judgment gave the impression that sufficient evidence existed that could have been presented in a trial, probably with safeguards such as anonymity for certain witnesses.

There was no express provision allowing for the release of the detainee if, for example, the group to which he allegedly belonged, or had links to, renounced terrorist activity. No particular conditions of detention were prescribed, and bearing in mind that it was in effect indefinite, the detainees were under a particular mental stress. It may be noted that in April 2004 SIAC ordered the release to house arrest of one of the detainees on the basis of the grave deterioration of his mental condition. Another detainee who was released[382] told the press that a number of the detainees became mentally ill as a result of their detention. The detainees were subject to the same conditions as remand prisoners in general – albeit in high security detention applicable to category A prisoners – although the mental stress that they were under differed greatly from that of a remand prisoner who could expect to be detained for a relatively short period of time. There was no express provision placing an obligation on the Home

379 If this procedure had been instituted the person in question could have been detained under the Part 4 power or remanded in custody while the necessity of certification as opposed to trial was being assessed.

380 File No SC15/2002.

381 Ibid, at para 9.

382 See M v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2004] EWCA Civ 324.

Secretary to receive independent and continuing assessments of the degree to which a particular detainee was at risk of Art 3 treatment if deported.[383]

Sections 21–23, on their face, discriminated against non-nationals since only such persons were targeted for detention – and detention that could be very lengthy. Further, they lost, in effect, the right to a trial before the possibility of being detained could arise. British citizens who fell within the definition of 'suspected international terrorists' still had to be brought to trial (probably under one of the TA offences) before the possibility of detention could arise. Due process was entirely discarded by allowing for the detention without trial of such persons. The level of suspicion was – of necessity – well below the 'beyond reasonable doubt' standard, and since the necessary 'evidence' for the formation of the suspicion was not subjected to the check of a trial process, the risk that miscarriages of justice could occur was very high: had the scheme not been abandoned, some persons might have been wrongfully detained for a number of years. Since a power of indefinite detention was in effect provided, the need for such a check was especially apparent. It should be noted that possible limits on a power providing for 'indefinite detention' were apparent, but there was little reason to expect that they would lead to the ending of the detention. The detention powers in Part 4 were to expire on 10 November 2006.[384] Detention was therefore limited initially to a little less than five years for those arrested immediately after the Act was passed in December 2001. However, it appeared that the government's intention was to introduce legislation to Parliament in order to retain these powers, once they lapsed, assuming that the current 'emergency' was considered to be ongoing at that point.[385] Part 4 also had to be renewed by order, subject to Parliamentary approval, every 15 months.[386] In human rights terms this scheme was objectionable in a number of respects, and those objections were considered by the House of Lords in 2004, as discussed below, in the context of the European Convention on Human Rights.

The role of the Special Immigration Appeals Commission

The Special Immigration Appeals Commission (SIAC), established under s 1 of the Special Immigration Appeals Commission Act 1997 (SIACA), played a crucial role in this scheme since in most instances it represented the only means of challenging the decision to detain. Under s 21(8) ATCSA the Secretary of State's decision in connection with certification could only be questioned under ss 25 or 26, which dealt with challenges to the certificate or reviews of it by SIAC. There were two methods of judicial control enshrined in Part 4. Under s 25 a detainee could appeal to SIAC which had the power to cancel the certificate of the Home Secretary if it found that there were no reasonable grounds for a belief or suspicion of the kind referred to in 383 There was no express provision allowing persons at risk of Art 3 treatment abroad to leave if they were prepared to take the risk of that treatment. There was no express provision requiring that detainees must be deported or removed, if they wished to be, when and if a safe third country could be found, or indeed imposing any duty at all regarding the possibility of finding a safe third country.

384 Section 29(7). However, new legislation would probably have been introduced giving the same powers.

385 See: Counter-Terrorism Powers: Reconciling Security and Liberty in an Open Society, A Discussion Paper, Cm 6147.

386 Sub-section 29(1)–(6), s 21(1)(a) or (b), or that for 'some other reason' the certificate should not have been issued. The Commission could allow the appeal and cancel the certificate, but the Home Secretary could then issue a further certificate under s 27(9). There was also a distinct power of review of the certificate, which was not instigated by the applicant and which had to occur in SIAC.

The procedure in SIAC is governed by SIAC's Rules of Procedure, as amended.[387] The rules allow for hearings in the absence of the person bringing the proceedings and his or her legal representative. In such instances a special advocate (SA) will be appointed who has had security clearance. The procedure is divided between closed and open sessions. Under s 5(3)(b) SIACA and Rules of Procedure, r 19, the appellant and his or her advocate are excluded from the closed sessions. The SA can attend the closed sessions; the benefit of these closed sessions is that the government can put forward the facts on which it bases its case. However, it means that the applicant cannot know all or much of the basis of the case against him and therefore cannot challenge it. He may not even be allowed to see a summary of the case. He cannot instruct the SA. Clearly, the position of the applicant is weak before SIAC. The extent to which the evidence can genuinely be tested is questionable. As C White put it in relation to this type of tribunal: it 'attempts to create an adversarial forum where one of the parties is severely hampered in presenting his or her case'.[388] This was of particular concern in relation to Part 4 since it allowed for a power of indefinite detention, demanding greater judicial scrutiny of the basis for the suspicion.

However, in the case of M v Secretary of State for the Home Dept[389] the SAs were able to mount an effective challenge in the closed sessions to the evidence that M had links to Al-Qaeda. As a result, SIAC decided that reasonable suspicion was not established, and the Court of Appeal upheld this ruling. This instance indicated that the SIAC procedure had some efficacy as a means of testing the basis of the certification. Nevertheless, the SIAC procedure was defective in human rights terms since the detainee was in such a vulnerable position before it, compared to the position of a defendant in a criminal trial. The question of the compliance of such proceedings with Art 6 is considered below in relation to control order proceedings. But control orders obligations do not at present include detention, so the SIAC proceedings in relation to Part 4 raised greater concerns.

The challenge to the derogation and the Part 4 scheme in A and Others[390]

The detention powers were used immediately to detain 11 persons in Belmarsh Prison in London. Two of them stated that they were prepared to leave the country and did 387 SI 1998/1881, amended by SI 2000/1849.

388 For discussion, see White, C, 'Security Vetting, Discrimination and the Right to a Fair Trial' [1999] PL 406–18, at p 413. See also Walker, C, The Prevention of Terrorism (1986) p 82; he advocated an inquisitorial system for such tribunals.

389 See M v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, SIAC – SC/15/2002; CA 2004 EWCA Civ 324.

390 For comment on A and Others, see: 'A v Secretary of State for the Home Department Introduction' [2005] 68(4) MLR 654; Hickman, T, 'Between Human Rights and the Rule of Law: Indefinite Detention and the Derogation Model of Constitutionalism' (2005) 68(4) MLR 655–68; Hiebert, J, 'Parliamentary Review of Terrorism Measures' (2005) 68(4) MLR 676–80.

so.[391] A further five persons were later detained. In the 11 cases determined by SIAC following appeal against certification, the Home Secretary's decision to certify was upheld in all but one of them; the Court of Appeal agreed with SIAC's decision in all instances.[392] The result was therefore that one detainee was released, while the powers were still in force, on the ground that the evidence against him did not satisfy the 'reasonable suspicion' test of s 21 and he was released on bail, on strict conditions, in April 2004. One of the detainees was transferred to Broadmoor Hospital on grounds of mental illness in July 2002. The Home Secretary revoked his certification of another in September 2004, and he was released without conditions.

The decision in A and Others v Secretary of State for the Home Dept[393] eventually led to the abandonment of the scheme after it was declared incompatible with Arts 5 and 14 under s 4 HRA by the House of Lords in 2004. The detainees began their challenge to the designated derogation in SIAC, under s 30 ATCSA.[394] They also challenged the detention scheme in relation to the Convention rights scheduled in the HRA. SIAC had to consider first whether there had been compliance with the requirements for derogation, meaning that it had to examine the demands of Art 15. Article 15(1) provides:

> In time of war or other public emergency threatening the life of the nation any High Contracting Party may take measures derogating from its obligations under this Convention to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation, provided that such measures are not inconsistent with its other obligations under international law.

The government had not claimed that this was a time of war, and therefore the first question which the Commission had to consider was whether there was a public emergency threatening the life of the nation, within the meaning of Art 15.

Following Rehman, it was always likely that SIAC would accept a broad interpretation of a state of emergency. In making its assessment as to the actual existence of the state of emergency it seemed possible that SIAC might apply a somewhat stricter standard of review than that at Strasbourg since as a domestic court it does not concede a margin of appreciation to the national authorities. However, it accepted that the executive had a discretionary area of judgment[395] in determining whether a public emergency existed.[396] SIAC took the view that it was acting in accordance with the Strasbourg jurisprudence in examining the closed material on which the assertion of an emergency was based, but it also found that in the context in question – that of national security – it had to decide 'whether the decision that there was such an emergency as justified derogation was one which was reasonable on all the material or . . . one that he was entitled to 391 See the Guardian, 15 April 2002.

392 See M v Secretary of State for the Home Dept SIAC – SC/15/2002; CA 2004 EWCA Civ 324.

393 (2004) UKHL 56; [2005] 2 AC 68; [2005] 2 WLR 87; [2005] 3 All ER 169.

394 A and Others v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, determination: 30 July 2002, unreported.

395 See: R v DPP ex p Kebeline [1999] 3 WLR 372; Secretary of State for the Home Dept ex p Rehman [2001] 3 WLR 877.

396 At para 15 of the SIAC judgment.

reach'.[397] This standard of scrutiny appeared to resemble the Wednesbury approach and therefore, it is argued, was too low.[398] Having adopted this approach, SIAC accepted the existence of an emergency within the terms of Art 15 due to the fact that 'the UK is a prime target, second only to the US[399] . . . . an emergency can exist and can . . . be imminent if there is an intention and a capacity to carry out serious terrorist violence even if nothing has yet been done . . .'.[400]

In determining the issues of necessity and proportionality SIAC relied on the relevant Strasbourg jurisprudence in considering the necessity of introducing the Part 4 detention scheme, bearing in mind the other available measures which had not themselves necessitated derogation.[401] SIAC found that so long as the detention scheme fell within the range of reasonable legislative responses it should not be viewed as over-broad merely because other alternatives were available. It went on to consider the key issue of over-inclusiveness and found that account should be taken of the potential effect of s 3(1) HRA (providing that legislation should be rendered compatible with the Convention rights if at all possible) and the power of SIAC to set aside the certificate under s 25(2)(b) ATCSA. Section 3(1) could be used, it was found, to narrow down the provisions of ss 21–23 and, moreover, if the powers were exercised against a person unconnected with Al-Qaeda that would provide a basis for setting aside the certificate under s 25(2)(b). Thus the detention scheme was found to satisfy this test.

The key argument put before SIAC was that the scheme was racially discriminatory and therefore breached Art 14 which provides: 'The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race . . . . national or social origin, association with a national minority . . .' As discussed in Chapter 2, Art 14 is parasitic on another Article: it is not free-standing. But, as both SIAC and the Court of Appeal agreed, the derogation did not prevent consideration of Art 14 in relation to Art 5 since Art 14 itself had not been derogated from. It had been established in Ireland v UK that a successful derogation from another Article does not mean that it is unnecessary to consider whether unlawful discrimination has occurred in the context of that other Article. The fact that a violation of Art 5(1) itself could not be established does not affect this analysis: in Abdulaziz v UK[402] it was found that even where no violation of the other Article was established that did not preclude finding of a violation of Art 14.

In general, as discussed in Chapter 15, a breach of Art 14 can be established where other persons in an analogous position enjoy differential treatment (in relation to another Convention guarantee) and there is no objective and reasonable justification for the distinction.[403] In the domestic courts it has been found under Art 14 that there will be an objective justification for different treatment where it pursues a legitimate aim and 397 Para 21.

398 This point was raised on behalf of the applicants in the Court of Appeal; the Court considered that these words merely meant that SIAC recognised that it must afford a reasonably wide margin of discretion (para 59, CA).

399 At para 35.

400 At para 24.

401 See: Lawless v Ireland A 3 (1961), at para 36; Ireland v UK A 35 (1978), at para 212.

402 (1985) 7 EHRR 471.

403 Stubbings v UK (1996) 23 EHRR 213. See Chapter 15, p 1483.

the treatment bears a reasonable relationship or proportionality with the aim sought to be realised.[404] SIAC found that since a number of British nationals would fall within the definition of a 'suspected international terrorist' under s 21 ATCSA, but could not be subject to detention under Part 4, the detention scheme created discrimination on grounds of nationality. A breach of Art 14 was therefore established. SIAC proceeded to quash the derogation order and made a declaration of incompatibility (under s 4 HRA) between s 23 ATCSA and Art 14 read with Art 5. This was clearly a highly significant finding. It meant that a key aspect of the UK's response to September 11 was deeply flawed since it had failed to comply with the fundamental principle of non-discrimination.

SIAC's decisions were then appealed to the Court of Appeal.[405] When the Court of Appeal[406] considered the case, it also accepted the existence of an emergency in Art 15 terms. As indicated, the second question to be asked under Art 15 is whether the derogation applies 'only to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation'. The Court of Appeal agreed with SIAC in accepting that the measures taken were strictly required in the circumstances, taking into account the limited class of foreign nationals at which they were aimed. The judges found that it was well established that in some circumstances, particularly in times of emergency, states may distinguish between nationals and non-nationals.

Lord Woolf considered that s 3(1) HRA need not be used to narrow down the detention provisions: he said that they would have to be read narrowly in any event so as to ensure that they were covered by the derogation order, since otherwise they would conflict with Art 5. However, this point appeared to ignore the fact that primary legislation incompatible with a Convention right remains valid under s 3(2) HRA, and that s 3(1) is the mechanism to be used to seek to ensure that incompatibility does not arise. On the basis that the provisions would in any event have to be read narrowly, Lord Woolf accepted the government's undertaking that the detention power would only be used in relation to the emergency which was the subject of the derogation.[407] This was a very significant reading down of the statute and imposed a proportionality on the scheme which was not originally present since after the Court of Appeal findings it appeared that only members of Al-Qaeda, or those with links to Al-Qaeda, could legitimately be detained.

The Court of Appeal agreed with SIAC that the derogation did not prevent consideration of Art 14. However, the Court of Appeal disagreed with SIAC's conclusion that the scheme was discriminatory. The Court, unanimously, 'reached a different conclusion on the basis that British nationals are not in an analogous situation to foreign nationals who currently cannot be deported because of fears for their safety".[408] Lord Woolf CJ said that he reached this conclusion partly on the basis of the tension between Arts 14 and 15.[409] Article 15, as indicated above, debars the taking of action 404 Michalak v London Borough of Wandsworth [2002] EWCA Civ 271 at para 20.

405 A, X and Y and Others v Secretary of State for the Home Dept [2002] EWCA Civ 1502; [2003] 1 All ER 816. At that point 13 people were detained.

406 [2003] 1 All ER 816.

407 CA [2002] EWCA Civ 1502, at para 42.

408 See para 56.

409 At para 45.

to meet the emergency that is more than is strictly necessary. The Home Secretary had come to the conclusion that it was only necessary to take action in respect of non-national suspected terrorists and that was a conclusion, it was found, that should be treated deferentially by the courts. Action taken also against national suspected terrorists might have been more effective but could not, it was found, be viewed as strictly necessary in Art 15 terms, bearing in mind the Home Secretary's decision. The basis for singling out non-national suspected terrorists – that they, unlike nationals, are liable to be deported, even if, perforce, there is a delay before deportation can occur, was, in Lord Woolf's view, rational. Thus, the different treatment could be justified since it had a reasonable relationship or proportionality with the aim – of meeting the emergency – sought to be realised.

In any event, Lord Woolf found, and the other members of the Court of Appeal agreed, that the comparators – nationals who were suspected terrorists – were not in an analogous position to non-national suspected terrorists since they would have a right of abode, while the non-nationals merely had a contingent right not to be removed (due to the risk of Art 3 treatment abroad, or where no country could be identified that was prepared to accept them). Lord Woolf in the Court of Appeal took the view as indicated that the 'tension' between Arts 14 and 15 aided him in reaching this conclusion. He considered that targeting all 'suspected international terrorists' would have created a greater invasion of human rights than the Part 4 scheme created since the rights of nationals would also have been invaded. Thus, the appeal from SIAC's decision was allowed. The use of nationality as the determinant of the reach of the scheme was found to be non-discriminatory.

These findings missed the point that a much more narrowly targeted scheme – aimed, on its face, only at Al-Qaeda members or supporters – national and non-national – would have created a much more confined invasion. The choice to target instead the much wider group, based on the necessarily unconnected factor of nationality – since Al-Qaeda is a group defined by ideology, not nationality – was very difficult to defend in terms of rationality. The Court of Appeal succeeded in accepting the government defence only by adopting a strikingly deferential stance towards the Home Secretary's contention that an emergency created by Al-Qaeda would be most effectively addressed by targeting persons on the ground of nationality rather than on that of involvement in Al-Qaeda.[410] Clearly, a scheme that had included British citizens would have been viewed as more draconian since they could not be deported and so would not have been able to leave detention for an indefinite period. However, almost all the suspects who were detained could not in any event leave detention, for fear of Art 3 treatment abroad, and therefore that distinction was not of great significance in practice.

The House of Lords considered the scheme in December 2004. In argument before the House, Liberty made written and oral submissions in support of the appellants, as it had done in the courts below. Amnesty International also made written submissions in support of the appellants. Lord Bingham, giving the opinion of the majority of the House, noted that in Resolution 1271 adopted on 24 January 2002,[411] the Parliamentary 410 See para 40 of the judgment.

411 At para 9.

Assembly of the Council of Europe resolved that: 'In their fight against terrorism, Council of Europe members should not provide for any derogations to the European Convention on Human Rights.' Lord Bingham found that it had not been shown that SIAC or the Court of Appeal had misdirected themselves on the question whether a state of emergency was in being. He noted that SIAC had considered a body of closed material, but that in any event the view that it accepted was one that it could have reached on the open evidence in the case.

Lord Bingham went on to review the Strasbourg authorities in relation to the question whether an emergency was in being as required by Art 15.[412] He relied in particular on Lawless v Ireland (No 3)[413] in which grave loss of life caused by terrorism had not occurred, so the threat to security was implied. He noted that it had never been disavowed and that the House was required by s 2(1) HRA to take it into account. He said that the decision might be explained as showing the breadth of the margin of appreciation accorded by the Court to national authorities. But he found that if it was open to the Irish Government in Lawless to conclude that there was a public emergency threatening the life of the Irish nation, then the British Government could not be faulted for reaching that conclusion in the much more dangerous situation which arose after September 11. Thirdly, as discussed further in Chapter 4, he accepted that great weight should be given to the judgment of the Home Secretary, his colleagues and Parliament on the question of an emergency, because they were called on to exercise a pre-eminently political judgment.[414]

The majority of the Lords agreed (Lord Hoffmann dissenting on this point), and so did conclude that it was open to the government to find that there was a state of emergency within the terms of Art 15; that was viewed by the majority as a largely political judgment. Taking into account the breadth of the definition of an emergency under Art 15, and the fact that the domestic courts had to assess, on the basis of very sensitive intelligence, not an overt but a covert, implicit and speculatively imminent state of emergency, it was unsurprising that they concluded that one was in existence in the UK

The second question to be asked under Art 15 is whether the derogation applies 'only to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation'. That was a more problematic issue. The Joint Committee on Human Rights had concluded that even if the requisite state of emergency existed, it doubted whether the measures in the Bill could be said to be strictly required, bearing in mind the array of measures already available to be used against terrorism, and the fact that no other European country had derogated from Art 5.[415] Other legal opinion on this issue was quite firmly to the 412 At para 28. He said: 'The European Court decisions in Ireland v United Kingdom (1978) 2 EHRR 25; Brannigan and McBride v United Kingdom (1993) 17 EHRR 539; Aksoy v Turkey (1996) 23 EHRR 553 and Marshall v United Kingdom (10 July 2001, Appl No 41571/98) seem to me to be, with respect, clearly right. In each case the member state had actually experienced widespread loss of life caused by an armed body dedicated to destroying the territorial integrity of the state. To hold that the Art 15 test was not satisfied in such circumstances, if a response beyond that provided by the ordinary course of law was required, would have been perverse.'

413 (1961) 1 EHRR 15.

414 At para 29. See Chapter 4, pp 282–83.

415 Second Report, para 30.

effect that the detention scheme was unjustified on the basis that it went further than was required by the exigencies of the situation.[416]

The Lords were prepared to adopt a strict scrutiny of the measures taken and so accepted, as discussed in Chapter 4, that a strict proportionality test should be adopted.[417] Lord Bingham said:

> the appellants are in my opinion entitled to invite the courts to review, on proportionality grounds, the Derogation Order and the compatibility with the Convention of section 23 and the courts are not effectively precluded by any doctrine of deference from scrutinising the issues raised.[418]

On the question of proportionality under Art 15 – that the measures went no further than required by the exigencies of the situation – the Lords made the point that ss 21 and 23 ATCSA did not rationally address the threat to the security of the United Kingdom presented by Al-Qaeda terrorists and their supporters because (a) they did not address the threat presented by UK nationals, (b) they permitted foreign nationals suspected of being Al-Qaeda terrorists or their supporters to pursue their activities abroad if there was any country to which they were able to go, and (c) the sections permitted, on their face, the certification and detention of persons who were not suspected of presenting any threat to the security of the United Kingdom as Al-Qaeda terrorists or supporters.

Further, they found that if the threat presented to the security of the United Kingdom by UK nationals suspected of being Al-Qaeda terrorists, or their supporters, could be addressed without infringing their right to personal liberty, it had not been shown why similar measures could not adequately address the threat presented by foreign nationals. So the Part 4 measures allowed both for the detention of those presenting no direct threat to the United Kingdom and for the non-detention or the release of those who – allegedly – did. The House of Lords accepted that such a 'paradoxical conclusion was hard to reconcile with the strict exigencies of the situation'. The key problem, they found, was that the choice of an immigration measure to address a security problem had had the inevitable result of failing adequately to address that problem. The Lords found the conclusion that the derogation order and s 23 were, in Convention terms, disproportionate to the aims pursued, to be irresistible.

The Lords then turned to the question of discrimination under Art 14. The UK had not derogated from Art 14 of the European Convention (or from Art 26 of the ICCPR, which corresponds to it). The Attorney General did not submit in the House of Lords that there had been an implied derogation from Art 14. The appellants argued that in providing for the detention of suspected international terrorists who were not UK nationals, but not for the detention of suspected international terrorists who were 416 David Pannick wrote a legal Opinion for Liberty; David Anderson QC and Jemima Stratford wrote one for the group JUSTICE on this issue (Memorandum from Justice). Both came to the conclusion, on different grounds, that the derogation was unjustified. The Opinion for JUSTICE considered that Part 4 went beyond what was strictly required by the exigencies of the situation in covering a wide range of suspected international terrorists.

417 See pp 287–90.

418 At para 42.

UK nationals, s 23 unlawfully discriminated against them as non-UK nationals in breach of Art 14.

Lord Bingham found that the question to be asked under Art 14 was whether persons in an analogous or relevantly similar situation enjoyed preferential treatment, without reasonable or objective justification for the distinction, and whether and to what extent differences in otherwise similar situations would justify a different treatment in law.[419] He relied in particular on R (S) v Chief Constable of the South Yorkshire Police[420] from which he considered that the questions to be asked were:

> (1) Do the facts fall within the ambit of one or more of the Convention rights? (2) Was there a difference in treatment in respect of that right between the complainant and others put forward for comparison? (3) If so, was the difference in treatment on one or more of the proscribed grounds under article 14? (4) Were those others in an analogous situation? (5) Was the difference in treatment objectively justifiable in the sense that it had a legitimate aim and bore a reasonable relationship of proportionality to that aim?

The facts were found to fall within Art 5; difference of treatment had been accorded to the applicants and their comparators since the applicants had been detained; the treatment related to an impliedly proscribed ground – that of nationality. The appellants' chosen comparators were suspected international terrorists who were UK nationals. The appellants pointed out that they shared with this group the important characteristics (a) of being suspected international terrorists and (b) of being irremovable from the United Kingdom (due to the effect of Chahal). The Lords accepted this. Suspected international terrorists who are UK nationals were, it was found, in a situation analogous with the appellants because, in the present context, they shared the most relevant characteristics of the appellants.

The measure taken might have been reasonable and justified in an immigration context, but not in a security one since the threat came from both nationals and non-nationals; the Court of Appeal had erred in its findings on this point since it had accepted a differentiation based on the use of an immigration measure when the whole issue was the appropriateness of using that measure. Lord Bingham found on this point:

> Article 15 requires any derogating measures to go no further than is strictly required by the exigencies of the situation and the prohibition of discrimination on grounds of nationality or immigration status has not been the subject of derogation. Article 14 remains in full force. Any discriminatory measure inevitably affects a smaller 419 At para 50. Lord Bingham relied on: Stubbings v United Kingdom (1996) 23 EHRR 213, para 70. He said that the parties were agreed that in domestic law, seeking to give effect to the Convention, the correct approach was to pose the questions formulated by Grosz, Beatson and Duffy, Human Rights: The 1998 Act and the European Convention (2000), para C14–08, substantially adopted by Brooke LJ in Wandsworth London Borough Council v Michalak [2002] EWCA Civ 271, [2003] 1 WLR 617, para 20, and refined in the later cases of R (Carson) v Secretary of State for Work and Pensions [2002] EWHC 978 (Admin), [2002] 3 All ER 994, para 52, [2003] EWCA Civ 797, [2003] 3 All ER 577, paras 56–61, Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza [2004] UKHL 30, [2004] 3 WLR 113, paras 133–34.

420 [2004] UKHL 39, [2004] 1 WLR 2196 para 42.

> rather than a larger group, but cannot be justified on the ground that more people would be adversely affected if the measure were applied generally. What has to be justified is not the measure in issue but the difference in treatment between one person or group and another. What cannot be justified here is the decision to detain one group of suspected international terrorists, defined by nationality or immigration status, and not another. To do so was a violation of article 14. It was also a violation of article 26 of the ICCPR and so inconsistent with the United Kingdom's other obligations under international law within the meaning of article 15 of the European Convention.[421]

So since the different treatment could not be justified, the scheme was found to violate Arts 14 and 5 read together on the basis of differentiating between groups of suspected international terrorists on the basis of nationality – this was found to be the key weakness of the scheme. The derogation order was quashed and a declaration of incompatibility between Arts 14 and 5 and s 23 was made. Since, in contrast with the position in Canada,[422] under the HRA judges cannot strike down provisions that conflict with fundamental rights, the detainees remained in Belmarsh while the government decided how to respond to the decision, and the new legislation was prepared. But as discussed in Chapter 4, declarations of incompatibility place a lot of pressure on the government to respond, under s 10 HRA.[423] This is especially the case when, as in this instance, a declaration is made by a unanimous nine-member House of Lords. The government accepted that it could no longer sustain the scheme. It could theoretically have continued it in the face of an admitted violation of Art 5 (since the derogation order had been quashed) and of Art 5 and 14 read together – but it bowed to the pressure and accepted that Part 4 must be repealed. It was replaced by the control orders scheme, discussed below.

5 The Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005 – control orders

Introduction

Control orders were introduced under the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005 (PTA) as a replacement for the abandoned and repealed Part 4 ATCSA scheme. The PTA, ss 1–9

421 At para 68.

422 In a similar decision, Charkaouri v Canada, 24 February 2007, Canada's Supreme Court unanimously struck down the use of secret testimony to imprison and deport foreigners as possible terrorist suspects, ruling that the procedures violated Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The six men were detained without trail under a 'security certificate'. Two are now being held in a special prison, three are free on bond and a fourth has been ordered released on bond. The Court however suspended its ruling for a year. The ruling has been hailed as a victory for civil rights as an aspect of dismantling what has been termed 'Canada's Guantanamo North'. Thus, although the Canadian Supreme Court can strike down statutory provisions, unlike the House of Lords, the detainees in the UK reached a position of legal certainty earlier.

423 See pp 202–3.

is subject to annual renewal, by order,[424] and the sections have been renewed since 2005 on a yearly basis.[425] The scheme draws a fundamental distinction between derogating and non-derogating orders. Non-derogating orders, imposing obligations short of detention, such as curfews, semi-house arrest and tagging, were considered not to breach Art 5, and therefore no derogation order was thought to be needed. The non-derogating control orders scheme thus appeared to be less invasive of human rights than Part 4. At their most stringent, however, control orders can allow for detention without trial (either full house arrest or in prison) and would require a derogation; they are termed derogating control orders. However, the current lack of a derogation should not be viewed, as the discussion below reveals, as signalling that the current non-derogating orders applied under the 2005 Act are compatible with the European Convention on Human Rights, Art 5.

The PTA, like the ATCSA Part 4, creates a scheme operating on a low standard of proof as regards non-derogating control orders – reasonable suspicion. No criminal trial, or indeed civil action, is needed in order to subject an individual to the sanctions represented by the non-derogating orders. The subjection of persons to control orders broadens the definition of terrorism in effect since it places a number of persons in the position of being terrorist suspects and makes them subject to a range of sanctions – via control orders – despite the fact that they may not themselves fall within the s 1 TA definition since they have not themselves taken part in terrorist activity, and that only a very low level of proof is needed that they are in any way associated with terrorism. Therefore miscarriages of justice may occur. The 2005 measures thus remain controversial in human rights terms, since, like Part 4 ATCSA, they rely on interfering proactively with the liberty of suspects before any offences have been committed, or where it appears difficult to prove that they have been committed.

A control order can be viewed as a last resort measure, necessary to address the threat from an individual where prosecution is not possible and, in the case of a foreign national, where it is not possible to deport him or her due to the UK's international human rights obligations (in particular, where there is a real risk of torture in the receiving country). Before making, or applying for the making of, a control order, a duty is placed on the Secretary of State under s 8(2) PTA to consult the chief officer of the police force as to whether there is evidence available that could realistically be used for the purposes of a prosecution of the individual for an offence relating to 424 Under s 13(2) PTA The Secretary of State may, by order made by statutory instrument –

(a) repeal sections 1 to 9;
(b) at any time revive those sections for a period not exceeding one year; or
(c) provide that those–

(i) are not to expire at the time when they would otherwise expire under sub-section (1) or in accordance with an order under this sub-section; but (ii) are to continue in force after that time for a period not exceeding one year.

425 On 1 February 2007 the Home Secretary laid before both Houses the draft Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005 (Continuance in force of sections 1 to 9) Order 2007, along with an Explanatory Memorandum ('EM').

terrorism.[426] Under s 8(4) it is the duty of the chief officer to ensure that investigation of the individual's conduct with a view to his prosecution for an offence relating to terrorism is kept under review during the period that the order is in force against the individual. But, despite the provision of s 8 PTA, the possibility arises that the scheme is being used in preference to prosecuting where, especially under a proscription offence or ss 1 or 5 of the 2006 Act, a prosecution might have been feasible. The stated intention is that the police and the Control Order Review Group (CORG) keep the issue of prosecution in control order cases under continuous review. However, the judgment of the High Court in the case of E (below) demonstrated that this process of internal review is inadequate. Mr Justice Beatson said in his judgment, 'a process which simply relied on the chief officer of the Police force or the Police officer present at the relevant meeting of CORG to bring matters forward is insufficient'.[427]

In a fashion typical of the UK counter-terrorist response the scheme is over-broad in human rights terms and arguably counter-productive in security terms. But the control orders scheme has not been applied, as it would have been under a more authoritarian regime, to a large number of persons. It has been applied only to a tiny minority of terrorist suspects. Control orders were sought against the ten people who had been detained under the 2001 Act in March 2005. The orders of eight of the ten were revoked in August 2005 and they were then either detained pending deportation, on bail pending deportation, or they then left the country. There are currently 15 control orders made by the Secretary of State in operation. Nine of these are in respect of foreign nationals; the other six are in respect of British citizens.

The control orders scheme

Section 1(1) PTA defines a 'control order': 'In this Act "control order" means an order against an individual that imposes obligations on him for purposes connected with protecting members of the public from a risk of terrorism.' The orders can be applied to British and non-British suspects alike. As indicated, the PTA scheme creates derogating and non-derogating orders. The derogating orders can create sanctions that include detention without trial. A derogating obligation is an obligation placed on an individual 426 Section 8 Criminal investigations after making of control order:

(1) This section applies where it appears to the Secretary of State –

(a) that the involvement in terrorism-related activity of which an individual is suspected may have involved the commission of an offence relating to terrorism; and
(b) that the commission of that offence is being or would fall to be investigated by a police force.

(2) Before making, or applying for the making of, a control order against the individual, the Secretary of State must consult the chief officer of the police force about whether there is evidence available that could realistically be used for the purposes of a prosecution of the individual for an offence relating to terrorism.

(3) If a control order is made against the individual the Secretary of State must inform the chief officer of the police force that the control order has been made and that sub-section (4) applies.

(4) It shall then be the duty of the chief officer to secure that the investigation of the individual's conduct with a view to his prosecution for an offence relating to terrorism is kept under review throughout the period during which the control order has effect.

427 [2007] EWHC 33 (Admin) para 292.

which is incompatible with his right to liberty under Art 5 of the European Convention on Human Rights, but which falls within the ambit of an order designating a derogation from the Convention pursuant to s 14(1) of the Human Rights Act. The other type of control order – a non-derogating order – is one which is judged by the Secretary of State not to be incompatible with the suspect's rights under Art 5.

Thus, control orders theoretically fall into the categories of derogating control orders and non-derogating ones; the distinction between derogating ones and non-derogating is not made in the Act – a non-derogating order is merely defined as one made by the Secretary of State, rather than a court. This is an important distinction; it is not necessarily clear which orders would require a derogation. If on legal advice the Secretary of State made a control order, and it was found later on appeal against it that it in fact required a derogation and so should have been made by a court, the person concerned would nevertheless been subject to the order in breach of Art 5 for a period of time. This situation has arisen in the United Kingdom, as discussed below.

Under s 1(3) a control order made against an individual can impose any obligations that the Secretary of State or the court considers necessary for purposes connected with preventing or restricting involvement by that individual in terrorism-related activity. This is in itself a very broad term that is afforded a very wide definition in s 1(9) as any one or more of the following:

(a) the commission, preparation or instigation of acts of terrorism;
(b) conduct which facilitates the commission, preparation or instigation of such acts, or which is intended to do so;
(c) conduct which gives encouragement to the commission, preparation or instigation of such acts, or which is intended to do so;
(d) conduct which gives support or assistance to individuals who are known or believed to be involved in terrorism-related activity; and for the purposes of this sub-section it is immaterial whether the acts of terrorism in question are specific acts of terrorism or acts of terrorism generally.

These measures can be applied to any individual, irrespective of nationality, and whatever the nature of the terrorist activity.

Control orders are preventative. They place one or more obligations upon an individual in order to prevent, restrict or disrupt involvement in terrorism-related activity. A range of obligations can be imposed to address the risk viewed as posed by the individual concerned, including an 18-hour curfew, restrictions on the use of communication equipment; restrictions on the people that the individual can associate with; travel restrictions; electronic tagging; the suspect's house can be subject to a search at any time; communication with any person may be disallowed unless approved; prohibitions are placed on electronic communication.

The nature of the obligations imposed by the orders means that other Convention Articles apart from Art 5 are also clearly implicated, in particular Arts 8, 10 and 11 – since privacy, communication and association are affected. Obviously, para 2 of those Articles could be invoked, but the interference would only be justified if the order satisfied the demands of necessity and proportionality in those paragraphs.[428] The extent of the interference created by a number of the orders might make that difficult.

428 See discussion of Art 10 in Chapter 2, pp 92–96.

Non-derogating control orders

The crucial distinction between derogating and non-derogating orders is that the latter are made initially by the Secretary of State who obtains, as explained below, permission from the court, without notice to the controlee. The Secretary of State is also given power to revoke or modify such an order. Under s 2 PTA the Home Secretary can make a control order that imposes non-derogating obligations (obligations that apparently do not require a derogation from Art 5, guaranteeing the fundamental right to liberty, or from any other Convention guarantee)[429] if he has reasonable grounds for suspecting that an individual is or has been involved in 'terrorist-related activity' (s 1(9)). As indicated above this is a very broad concept. It means that the person in question has engaged in some activity of a facilitative or supportive nature in relation to a group that itself falls within s 1 TA. It does not demand that the individual himself or herself falls within s 1. It could include, for example, writing a letter expressing approval of the aims of a group falling within s 1 TA operating abroad. Section 2(4) provides that a non-derogating control order has effect for 12 months and may be renewed on one or more occasion. Sub-section 1(9) provides:

> It shall be immaterial, for the purposes of determining what obligations may be imposed by a control order made by the Secretary of State, whether the involvement in terrorism-related activity to be prevented or restricted by the obligations is connected with matters to which the Secretary of State's grounds for suspicion relate.

Section 7 provides that a controlled person can apply to have a non-derogating control order revoked or modified if he considers that there has been a change of circumstances affecting the order.

Derogating orders

Section 4 provides that in the case of an order imposing derogating obligations, the order must be made by the court on an application by the Secretary of State, as discussed below. Section 7 makes provision permitting the Secretary of State or the controlled person to apply to the court for the revocation or modification of a derogating control order. Section 4(8) provides that a derogating control order ceases to have effect after six months, unless renewed.

Derogating orders – in particular imposing house arrest or detention – are viewed as incompatible with the right to liberty, and possibly also with other Articles, and so would require at the least a derogation from Art 5. A derogation has not yet been sought to allow for the reintroduction of detention without trial, but given the ruling of the House of Lords in A and Others that a state of emergency was in being in 2004, and taking account of the London bombing in 2005, the courts would probably accept that a state of emergency is still in being. Thus a derogating order, if sought, would not be struck down on that basis, but there would still be a problem in demonstrating proportionality. If house arrest, or detention in prison was imposed, the impact of the derogating control orders on liberty would still have to be proportionate to the exigencies of the security situation under Art 15 ECHR.[430] The decision of the House of Lords in A and Others, above, indicates that the courts would be unlikely to accept that such control orders could be justified since the detention imposed would presumably be, in effect, indefinite and the evidence would not have been tested to a high standard or proof.

429 See discussion of Art 5 in Chapter 2, pp 51–59.

The term 'terrorist-related activity' is even broader than the terms used in Part 4 ATCSA; therefore someone could be detained on a very flimsy basis. No mention is made of Al-Qaeda, but it can be assumed that if derogating control orders are imposed, once a derogation order has been sought, they could be applied only to Al-Qaeda members or supporters, or linked groups, since otherwise the demands of proportionality in Art 15 could not be met, as demonstrated in the Court of Appeal judgment on Part 4 ATCSA in A and Others. If they were applied only to such persons, British and non-British citizens alike, they would be afforded a rational connection with the basis for seeking the derogation. On the other hand, the PTA, like Part 4, taken at face value, is over-broad in allowing for the detention of persons who have no connection with the current emergency.

The scheme applies to British and non-British citizens alike and so does not create discrimination on grounds of nationality, but that would not necessarily mean that it was found to be proportionate to the aims pursued. The fact that at the present time, and for the past two years, control orders, not including detention, are being used could arguably be taken to imply that the more draconian measure of detention is not needed since the security situation is currently being addressed without resorting to detention without trial. Further, the 'state of emergency' assessment would clearly be open to future revision if Al-Qaeda's operational effectiveness appeared to diminish, and if that occurred it would also affect the assessment of proportionality. In this respect it should be noted that in its notification of derogation from Art 15, in relation to Part 4 ATCSA, the UK Government pledged that the derogation would be withdrawn as soon as it was no longer necessary. No derogation has now been in place for over two years.

At the present time, as discussed below, non-derogating orders are being applied that have been found by the courts to breach Art 5 due to their cumulative effect on liberty. The introduction of derogating control orders, as opposed to orders breaching Art 5, but purporting to be non-derogating, would place the obligation to ensure proportionality on a clearer legal basis under Art 15, taking s 3 HRA into account. It would also allow the order to receive a higher level of judicial scrutiny. It would therefore be preferable in one sense since the government would have to be open about its intention to breach Art 5, and would have to justify the derogation. But the objections of principle on human rights grounds discussed would still remain since the PTA derogating orders scheme has many of the hallmarks of the Part 4 scheme.

430 Art 15 provides: '(1) In time of war or other public emergency threatening the life of the nation any High Contracting Party may take measures derogating from its obligations under this Convention to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation, provided that such measures are not inconsistent with its other obligations under international law . . .'

Role of the court in making a derogating order

The role of the court in respect of a derogating control order is set out in s 4. This order is made, not by the Secretary of State, but by the court on an application by the Secretary of State. That application is made at a preliminary hearing, which may be heard in the absence of, and without notice to, the suspect. Section 4(3) provides:

> At the preliminary hearing, the court may make a control order against the individual in question if it appears to the court –
>
> (a) that there is material which (if not disproved) is capable of being relied on by the court as establishing that the individual is or has been involved in terrorism-related activity;
> (b) that there are reasonable grounds for believing that the imposition of obligations on that individual is necessary for purposes connected with protecting members of the public from a risk of terrorism;
> (c) that the risk arises out of, or is associated with, a public emergency in respect of which there is a designated derogation from the whole or a part of Article 5 of the Human Rights Convention; and
> (d) that the obligations that there are reasonable grounds for believing should be imposed on the individual are or include derogating obligations of a description set out for the purposes of the designated derogation in the designation order.

The preliminary hearing is followed by a full hearing at which the court may confirm, modify or revoke the order. Section 4(7) provides:

> At the full hearing, the court may confirm the control order (with or without modifications) only if –
>
> (a) it is satisfied, on the balance of probabilities, that the controlled person is an individual who is or has been involved in terrorism-related activity;
> (b) it considers that the imposition of obligations on the controlled person is necessary for purposes connected with protecting members of the public from a risk of terrorism;
> (c) it appears to the court that the risk is one arising out of, or is associated with, a public emergency in respect of which there is a designated derogation from the whole or a part of Article 5 of the Human Rights Convention; and
> (d) the obligations to be imposed by the order or (as the case may be) by the order as modified are or include derogating obligations of a description set out for the purposes of the designated derogation in the designation order.

Thus indefinite detention could be imposed on the civil standard, if a derogation was in place, and the derogation was in accord with the demands of Art 15. This scheme is an improvement on Part 4 since court approval of the order is needed and the standard of proof is higher. But the proceedings described below fall far short, in terms of due process, of a criminal trial. So the safeguard of the court hearing may not be sufficient to guard against miscarriages of justice.

Court supervision of non-derogating control orders

Permission is needed by a court to make a non-derogating order, under s 3(1) PTA, unless the order is urgent or the person was detained under Part 4. If an order is made without the court's permission, the Secretary of State must immediately (within seven days) apply to the court, and the function of the court on the application is to consider whether the decision of the Secretary of State to make the order that he did was obviously flawed (s 3(3)). Section 3(2) of the PTA makes provision for permission by the court when the control order made against the respondent is made with permission. Section 11(2) PTA provides that, 'The court is the appropriate tribunal for the purposes of s 7 of the Human Rights Act 1998 in relation to proceedings all or any part of which call a control order decision or derogation matter into question.'

Under s 3(2) when the Secretary of State makes an application for permission to make a non-derogating control order against an individual,

(a) the function of the court is to consider whether the Secretary of State's decision that there are grounds to make that order is obviously flawed;
(b) the court may give that permission unless it determines that the decision is obviously flawed; and
(c) if it gives permission, the court must give directions for a hearing in relation to the order as soon as reasonably practicable after it is made.

The permission proceedings can occur, under s 3(5):

(a) in the absence of the individual in question;
(b) without his having been notified of the application or reference; and
(c) without his having been given an opportunity (if he was aware of the application or reference) of making an representations to the court; but this section is not to be construed as limiting the matters about which rules of court may be made in relation to the consideration of such an application or reference.

Since the court can only refuse permission when the decision is 'obviously flawed', it is unlikely at that stage that permission will be withheld. Under s 3(6), if the court determines that the decision of the Secretary of State to make a non-derogating control order against the controlled person was obviously flawed, it must quash the order. If it determines that that decision was not obviously flawed, but that a decision of the Secretary of State to impose a particular obligation by that order was obviously flawed, it must quash that obligation but confirm the order. The use of the term 'obviously flawed' makes it unlikely that a control order would be refused at the permission stage.

Once the order is confirmed a hearing must be ordered (s 3(2)) by the court giving permission (s 3(10)). At the hearing under s 3(10) the function of the court is to determine whether any of the following decisions of the Secretary of State was flawed '(a) his decision that the requirements of section 2(1)(a) and (b) were satisfied for the making of the order; and (b) his decisions on the imposition of each of the obligations imposed by the order'.

In making these determinations the court must apply the principles applicable on an application for judicial review (s 3(11)). So s 3(10) requires the court, when performing this function, to consider two questions - whether the decision of the Secretary of State in relation to the making of the control order was flawed and whether the decision to impose particular obligations was flawed. As discussed in Part 2 of this chapter, the court is required to follow a special procedure, involving closed material and the use of a special advocate (SA),[431] that is very similar to the procedure applicable to proceedings before the Special Immigration Appeals Commission (SIAC).[432]

The special rules are contained in Part 76 of the CPR.[433] Under them, the Secretary of State must apply to the court for permission to withhold the closed material from 431 The schedule to the Act enables special rules of court to be made in respect of control order proceedings. Paragraph 4(3) states that such rules must secure –

(a) that in control order proceedings and relevant appeal proceedings the Secretary of State is required (subject to rules made under the following paragraphs) to disclose all relevant material;

(b) that the Secretary of State has the opportunity to make an application to the relevant court for permission not to disclose relevant material otherwise than to that court and persons appointed under paragraph 7;

(c) that such an application is always considered in the absence of every relevant party to the proceedings and of his legal representative (if he has one);

(d) that the relevant court is required to give permission for material not to be disclosed where it considers that the disclosure of the material would be contrary to the public interest;

(e) that, where permission is given by the relevant court not to disclose material, it must consider requiring the Secretary of State to provide the relevant party and his legal representative (if he has one) with a summary of the material;

(f) that the relevant court is required to ensure that such a summary does not contain information or other material the disclosure of which would be contrary to the public interest;

(g) that provision satisfying the requirements of sub-paragraph (4) applies where the Secretary of State does not have the relevant court's permission to withhold relevant material from a relevant party to the proceedings or his legal representative (if he has one), or is required to provide a summary of such material to that party or his legal representative.

(4) The provision that satisfies the requirements of this sub-paragraph is provision which, in a case where the Secretary of State elects not to disclose the relevant material or (as the case may be) not to provide the summary, authorises the relevant court –

(a) if it considers that the relevant material or anything that is required to be summarised might be of assistance to a relevant party in relation to a matter under consideration by that court; and

(b) in any other case, to ensure that the Secretary of State does not rely in the proceedings on the material or (as the case may be) on what is required to be summarised.

432 See pp 1429–30 above.

433 The special rules contained in Part 76 of the CPR, r 76.2 require the court to give effect to the overriding objective in such a way as to 'ensure that information is not disclosed contrary to the public interest'. For the purposes of Part 76, the public interest is defined by Rule 76.1(4): '. . . disclosure is made contrary to the public interest if it is made contrary to the interests of national security, the international relations of the United Kingdom, the detection and prevention of crime, or in any other circumstances where disclosure is likely to harm the public interest.' Rule 76.22 enables the court to conduct hearings in private and to exclude the controlee and his representatives from all or part of the hearing. Rule 76.24 describes the functions of the Special Advocate. Rule 76.26 modifies the general rules of evidence and enables the court to 'receive evidence that would not but for this rule be admissible in a court of law': see r 76.26(4). Rules 76.28 and 76.29 set out the procedure for dealing with closed material. Rule 76.29(6) states that: 'Where the court gives permission to the Secretary of State to withhold closed material, the court must – (a) consider whether to direct the the person controlled or his legal representatives, and file a statement explaining his reasons for withholding that material. The closed material is then considered by the SA. If the SA challenges the need to withhold all or any of the closed material, the court must arrange the hearing to determine the issue (r 76.29), unless the Secretary of State and SA agree that the court may decide the issue without a hearing. Evidence can be received that would not normally be admissible in a court of law.

These provisions provide, on their face, only a thin veneer of judicial supervision. The level of supervision and its compliance with Art 6(1) was considered in Secretary of State v MB.[434] The Secretary of State had applied to the court without notice to MB under s 3(1)(a) PTA for permission to make a non-derogating control order against him. Ouseley J had granted that permission under s 3(2)(b) PTA, subject to some minor amendments that he required by way of clarification. A range of obligations were imposed by the order, including restrictions on residence and movement. MB had to surrender his passport and submit to searches of his home.[435]

Judge Sullivan found, under s 3(10) PTA, in relation to a non-derogating control order made under s 2(1) of the Act, that the procedures in s 3 of the Act relating to the supervision by the court of non-derogating control orders made by the Secretary of State were incompatible with the respondents' right to a fair hearing under Art 6(1). He therefore made a declaration of the incompatibility under s 4(2) HRA 1998, but decided under section 3(13) of the Act that the control order was to continue in force.

Secretary of State to serve a summary of that material on the relevant party or his legal representative; but (b) ensure that no such summary contains information or other material the disclosure of which would be contrary to the public interest.'

434 [2006] EWHC 1000, [2006] HRLR 29, [2006] 8 CL 108.

435 The order stated:

(1) You will reside at [address given] ('the residence') and shall give the Home Office at least seven days' prior notice of any change of residence.

(2) You shall report in person to your local police station (the location of which will be notified in writing to you at the imposition of this order) each day at a time to be notified in writing by your contact officer, details to be provided in writing upon service of the order.

(3) You must surrender your passport, identity card or any other travel document to a police officer or persons authorised by the Secretary of State within 24 hours. You shall not apply for or have in your possession any passport, identity card, travel document(s) or travel ticket which would enable you to travel outside the UK.

(4) You must not leave the UK.

(5) You are prohibited from entering or being present at any of the following:-

(a) any airport or sea port;
(b) any part of a railway station that provides access to an international rail service.

(6) You must permit entry to police officers and persons authorised by the Secretary of State, on production of identification, at any time to verify your presence at the residence and/or to ensure that you can comply with and are complying with the obligations imposed by the control order. Such monitoring may include but is not limited to:

(a) a search of the residence;
(b) removal of any item to ensure compliance with the remainder of the obligations in these orders; and
(c) the taking of your photograph.

In the Court of Appeal[436] the Secretary of State appealed against the decision that the procedures in s 3 PTA, relating to the supervision by the Court of non-derogating control orders made by the Secretary of State, were incompatible with the rights of the respondent to a fair hearing under the HRA, Sched 1, Part I, Art 6(1), on the basis that the decision of the Home Secretary could only be quashed if it was obviously flawed. It was accepted by both sides that the control order interfered with MB's civil rights and that, if the PTA was to comply with the European Convention on Human Rights, it had to be possible for MB to challenge the validity of the control order by legal proceedings which satisfied the requirements of Art 6 of the Convention.

It was clear to the Court that the justification for the obligations imposed on MB lay in the closed material. The SA did not challenge the Secretary of State's application to withhold the closed material, so there was no need for a hearing under r 76.29. The SA also agreed with counsel for the Secretary of State, that it would not be possible to serve a summary of the closed material on MB or his legal advisers which would not contain information or other material the disclosure of which would be contrary to the public interest. So MB was not provided with a summary of the material disclosing the basis of the case against him. The Court said that it was arguable that, by giving a remedy in civil proceedings for infringement of the Convention rights, the HRA had converted those rights into civil rights, so that Art 6 applied to them, but in any event it was clear that the control order adversely affected MB's civil rights, and therefore that the proceedings involved the determination of his civil rights and obligations so as to engage Art 6(1).[437]

The Court found that s 11(2) had to be interpreted, so far as possible, in a manner which was compatible with the Convention rights under s 3 HRA. It was found that s 11(2) required the court, in so far as it was able, to give effect to MB's Convention rights having regard to the state of affairs that existed at the time that the court reached its decision. It was further found that s 3(10) could not be read so as to restrict the court, when addressing a human rights issue, to a consideration of whether, when he made his initial decision, the Secretary of State had reasonable grounds for doing so.

Sullivan J had considered that Art 6 required that the court should carry out a 'full merits review' of the justification for the control order and its terms. On his reading of s 3(10) that was not possible. But the Court of Appeal did not consider that the terms of s 3(10), when read in the light of s 11(2), restricted the court to a standard of review falling short of that required to satisfy Art 6. The Court found that it had all the powers it required, including the power to hear oral evidence and to order cross-examination of witnesses, to enable it to substitute its own judgment for that of the decision maker, if that was what Art 6 required. The Court noted that s 3 HRA requires that s 3(10) and s 11(2) of the PTA be interpreted, if possible, in a manner that enables the court to carry out a review of the Secretary of State's decision that complies with the requirements of Art 6. So far as the standard of review is concerned, the Court saw no difficulty in reading those sections so as to produce that result.[438]

436 [2006] EWCA Civ 1140; (2006) 156 NLJ 1288; (2006) 150 SJLB 1055.
437 See pp 1339–42 above.
438 At para 48.

It was not necessary, it was found, in order to determine the appeal, for the Court to express a view as to the standard of review required when considering the decisions of the Secretary of State when making a non-derogating control order. Nevertheless, since the matter had been debated before the Court at length, the Court decided that it should not be left unresolved. Sullivan J had held that he was bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in A v Secretary of State for the Home Department[439] to hold that proceedings under s 3 PTA did not amount to the determination of a criminal charge for the purposes of Art 6. He held, however, that they came as close to this as it was possible to be. Counsel for MB argued that the judge was right to hold that they came very close to being criminal proceedings, and reserved the right to argue that they were criminal proceedings if the case went to the House of Lords. In this approach he was supported by JUSTICE, who intervened by written submissions which 'reserved' the question of whether control order proceedings are criminal proceedings under Art 6. The Court of Appeal stated their view, however, that the proceedings under s 3 PTA did not involve the determination of a criminal charge.

The Court said that it is a pre-condition to the making of a control order under s 3 that there must be reasonable suspicion that the controlled person has been engaged in terrorism-related activity, and that the obligations that may be imposed under a non-derogating control order, while falling short of infringing Art 5 of the Convention, nonetheless could impact severely on both civil and Convention rights. It was argued on behalf of the appellant that, in the light of these factors, the Art 6 requirement of a trial before 'an independent and impartial tribunal established by law' could only be satisfied if the court made its own independent assessment of whether the requirements for imposing the control order were satisfied. This was the approach adopted by s 4 in relation to a derogating control order, and a similar approach, it was argued on behalf of MB, was required in respect of the court's role under s 3. It was argued on the other hand, on behalf of the Secretary of State that his decision was essentially an executive one governed by public law, and that Art 6 was only engaged because the decision incidentally had the effect of determining civil rights. The Secretary of State, it was argued, was the decision maker, and the role of the court was merely to review the legality of his decision, according him a substantial measure of discretion, having regard to the fact that the subject matter of the decision was national security.

The Court noted that s 3(10)(a) PTA requires the court to consider whether the decision of the Secretary of State that there were reasonable grounds for suspecting that the subject of the order was involved in terrorism-related activity was flawed. It pointed out that involvement in terrorist-related activity, as defined by s 1(9) PTA, is likely to constitute a serious criminal offence, although it will not necessarily do so. That suggested, it was found, that when reviewing a decision by the Secretary of State to make a control order, the court must make up its own mind as to whether there were reasonable grounds for the necessary suspicion. The Court found that whether there are reasonable grounds for suspicion is an objective question of fact and it was not possible to see how the court could review the decision of the Secretary of State without itself deciding whether the facts relied upon by the Secretary of State amounted to reasonable grounds for suspecting that the subject of the control order was or had been involved in terrorism-related activity.

439 [2004] EWCA Civ 324; [2004] QB 335.

However, the Court thought that somewhat different considerations would apply in respect of the second element in the Secretary of State's decision. Section 3(10) requires the court to review the decision of the Secretary of State that it was necessary, for purposes connected with protecting the public from a risk of terrorism, to make the control order. The Court noted that whether it was necessary to impose any particular obligation on an individual in order to protect the public from the risk of terrorism involved the customary test of proportionality. The Court held that a degree of deference had to be paid to the decisions taken by the Secretary of State.[440] However, the Court found that there would be scope for the court to give intense scrutiny to the necessity for each of the obligations imposed on an individual under a control order, and that it must do so; some obligations could be particularly onerous or intrusive and, in such cases, the court, it found, should explore alternative means of achieving the same result.

The Court also considered the standard of proof involved, and found that considering whether reasonable suspicion of involvement in terrorist-related activities was established would involve considering a matrix of alleged facts, some of which were clear beyond reasonable doubt, some of which could be established on the balance of probability and some that were based only on circumstances giving rise to suspicion. The task of the Court, it was found, was to consider whether that matrix amounted to reasonable grounds for suspicion, and that exercise differed from that of deciding whether a fact has been established according to a specified standard of proof. It was, the Court said, the procedure for determining whether reasonable grounds for suspicion were in existence that had to be fair if Art 6 was to be satisfied.

The Court said that the impact of the provisions in the PTA for the use of closed material was the aspect of the case that was of particular concern since to deny to a party to legal proceedings the right to know the details of the case against him was, on the face of it, fundamentally at odds with the requirements of a fair trial. However, the Court noted that both Strasbourg and domestic authorities had accepted that there were circumstances where the use of closed material was permissible.[441] The Court 440 At para 64 the Court said: 'it is appropriate to accord such deference in matters relating to state security has long been recognised, both by the courts of this country and by the Strasbourg court, see for instance: Secretary of State for the Home Dept v Rehman [2001]UKHL 47; [2003] AC 153; The Republic of Ireland v The United Kingdom (1978) 2 EHRR 25'.

441 At paras 71–73 the Court said: 'In Chahal v UK (1996) 23 EHRR 413 at para 131, in the context of Arts 5(4) and 13, the ECtHR observed: "The Court recognises that the use of confidential material may be unavoidable where national security is at stake. This does not mean, however, that the national authorities can be free from effective control by the domestic courts whenever they choose to assert that national security and terrorism are involved. The Court attaches significance to the fact that, as the intervenors pointed out in connection with Article 13, in Canada a more effective form of judicial control has been developed in cases of this type . . . The confidentiality of security material is maintained by requiring such evidence to be examined in the absence of both the applicant and his or her representative. However, in those circumstances, their place is taken by a security-cleared counsel instructed by the court, who cross-examines the witnesses and generally assists the court to test the strength of the state's case. A summary of the evidence obtained by this procedure, with necessary deletions, is given to the applicant."' The Court noted that 'the procedure for closed material and the use of a special advocate was designed to accord with the model referred to in Chahal, which the ECtHR appeared to have approved. In Tinnely & McElduff v UK (1999) 27 EHRR 249, this time when considering whether there had been compliance with Article 6, the ECtHR referred to this procedure, as provided for in the Special Immigration Appeals Commission Bill (see paragraph 52).'

found therefore that the Strasbourg court had accepted that there could be circumstances where material evidence need not be disclosed in order to satisfy the requirements of Art 6 or Art 13. The Court also accepted that it was bound by the same finding of the Court of Appeal. The Court went on to find that while reliance on closed material was permissible, this could only be on the basis that appropriate safeguards against the prejudice that this may cause to the controlled person are in place. The provisions of the PTA for the use of a special advocate, and of the rules of court made pursuant to para 4 of the Schedule to the PTA, were found to constitute appropriate safeguards.[442] Article 6 of the Convention would not, it was found, automatically require disclosure of the evidence of the grounds for suspicion. It was found that Judge Sullivan had erred in holding that the provisions for review by the court of the making of a non-derogating control order by the Secretary of State did not comply with the requirements of Art 6. Therefore the appeal was allowed so that the validity of the order could be reconsidered, adopting an approach in accordance with the judgment.

Incompatibility of the non-derogating control orders regime with Article 5?

The package of measures applied to persons subject to control under non-derogating orders is so stringent that the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights considers that the orders breach the fundamental right to liberty under Art 5 ECHR. This has now been found to be the case in the Court of Appeal. The issue was raised in Secretary of State for the Home Dept v JJ, KK, GG, HH, NN, LL.[443] Judge Sullivan found in the High Court that the restrictions were 'the antithesis of liberty and equivalent to imprisonment'. He said 'Their [the suspects'] liberty to live a normal life within their residences is so curtailed as to be non-existent for all practical purposes.' He found:

> . . . a basic distinction is to be drawn between mere restrictions on liberty of movement and the deprivation of liberty. The former are governed by Article 2 of Protocol no 4 and do not amount to a breach of Article 5. This has been repeatedly spelt out by the European Court of Human Rights in cases such as Guzzardi v Italy.[444] Secondly, the distinction is one merely of degree or intensity of restrictions, not of nature or substance. Thirdly, the court must start with the concrete or actual situation of the individual concerned and take account of a range of criteria, such as the type, duration, effects and manner of implementation of the measure in question. Fourthly, account must be taken of the cumulative effect of the various restrictions. All these principles flow from the cases cited above.[445]

Relying on Guzzardi, he found that the control orders breached Art 5(1) ECHR. The Court found as a preliminary issue that the obligations imposed by those orders were

442 At para 86.

443 [2006] EWHC 1623 (Admin), High Court of Justice Queen's Bench Division Administrative Court, 28th June, 2006.

444 [1980] 3 EHRR 333. He also cited: Ashingdane v United Kingdom [1985] 7 EHRR 528 and HM v Switzerland [26 February 2002] Appl No. 39187/98.

445 At para 35 of the judgment.

so severe that they amounted to deprivation of liberty contrary to Sched 1, Part I, Art 5 of the 1998 Act. He found that they were in effect derogating control orders, that the Secretary of State had no power to make, not non-derogating ones. Therefore the government should have sought a derogation from Art 5(1). As it had not, the orders were incompatible with Art 5. The judge quashed the orders, holding that s 3(12) of the 2005 Act gave him power to do so, as the orders were made without jurisdiction and were nullities

The Court of Appeal upheld this finding.[446] The Secretary of State appealed on the issue of whether the judge was correct to hold that the obligations imposed by the orders amounted to a deprivation of liberty contrary to Sched 1, Part I, Art 5 of the 1998 Act and, if so, whether it was appropriate to quash the orders rather than to quash or modify the obligations. The Court noted that the appellants were obliged to remain within their residences, which in each case consisted of a one-bedroom flat, at all times save for a period of six hours. Visitors had to provide their names, addresses, dates of birth, and photo identification to the Home Office. Their residences were subject to spot searches by police and, when permitted to leave their homes, they were restricted to confined urban areas. The Court found that Judge Sullivan's decision that the cumulative effect of the orders amounted to a deprivation of liberty contrary to Sched 1, Part I, Art 5 of the 1998 Act was correct.

It was found that he had properly taken as his starting point the physical restriction of confining the appellants for 18 hours a day to small flats. He had then taken into account a range of other material factors that interfered with their normal lives, including the effect of the physical restraints in the context of the restrictions that applied when they were allowed to leave their residences. After that, he had considered the extent to which those restrictions would prevent an individual from pursuing the life of his choice, taking account of Guzzardi.[447] It was found that he had been right to quash the orders rather than to modify them. It was found that it was questionable whether the provisions of s 3(10) and 3(12) of the 2005 Act were designed to deal with a challenge to a control order on the ground that it was ultra vires by virtue of infringing Sched 1, Part I, Art 5(1) of the 1998 Act. However, it was found that the judge was correct to conclude that he had jurisdiction to quash the orders.

A similar conclusion was reached in Secretary of State for the Home Dept v E[448] in which the JJ judgment was followed. In 2005 the Home Secretary made a control order against E under powers in the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005 (the PTA). The order required E to reside at a particular address and to remain within the residence between 7 pm and 7 am, prohibited unauthorised visitors to the residence or prearranged meetings elsewhere, and prohibited him from having a mobile telephone, or equipment capable of connecting to the internet.

The High Court heard evidence both in an open hearing and a closed one. It concluded that in the light of the material considered in the open hearing, in particular references to E and his activities in judgments of the Belgian courts, the Secretary of State had reasonable grounds for suspecting that E was a senior terrorist recruiter and facilitator with a wide range of contacts, and had been involved in terrorism-related activity.

446 The Court of Appeal confirmed Judge Sullivan's findings as to the breach of Art 5 on 1 August 2006, Secretary of State for the Home Dept v JJ (2006) EWCA 1141; (2006) HRLR 38; [2006] 3 WLR 866.

447 Guzzardi v Italy (A/39) (1981) 3 EHRR 333.

448 [2007] EWHC 33 (Admin).

The Court found that the cumulative effect of the curfew and the other obligations in the control order, in particular the requirement that all visitors to E's home and all pre-arranged meetings by him outside his home be approved in advance, deprived E of his liberty in breach of Art 5 of the Convention. E's 12-hour curfew was a major restriction on his liberty of movement, but did not in itself, it was found, constitute a deprivation of his liberty. In looking at the cumulative effect of the restrictions in the control order, the Court followed the approach of the Court of Appeal in Home Office v JJ and Others. On behalf of E and his family it was argued that the decisions to make and to maintain the control order were flawed on a number of other grounds. The Court found that the provisions in the PTA empowering the making of control orders did not violate the ECHR's requirement of 'legal certainty'. It was also found that in making the control order the Home Secretary had not breached his statutory duty under s 8 PTA to consult the police about the possibility of prosecuting E for terrorist offences.

The Home Office had received the Belgian judgments by January 2006 and had put them into the open evidence in September 2006, but the Court found that there had been no review of the possibility of prosecuting E in the light of them. For this reason, the decision thereafter to maintain E's control order was flawed. It was found that the Home Secretary was sufficiently informed about E's mental health and the health of his family and the impact of the obligations on them. The cumulative impact of the obligations on E's children was not found to violate or risk violating the children's rights under Art 3 ECHR. Initially there were delays in responding to requests for authorisations and variations to the control order by E and his family. However the Home Office on the whole responded to the requests without undue delay. The Home Office did not invite E and his family to make representations about the control order and the individual obligations after it was made in 2005 and before it was renewed in 2006. However, their solicitors made representations to the Home Office throughout the period of the control order. In view of the Court's decision on Art 5, and the failure to revisit the possibility of prosecuting E for terrorist offences in the light of the Belgian judgments, it was not necessary to decide whether in these circumstances the failure to invite E to make representations justified quashing the control order.

The Court found that since the PTA does not empower the Home Secretary to make a control order which has the effect of depriving a person of his liberty, the Court must quash the control order under the power given to it by s 3(12)(a) PTA. It would, Judge Beatson said, also have quashed the control order because of the failure to review the possibility of prosecuting E in the light of the Belgian judgments.

The same conclusion was reached in the High Court in Secretary of State for the Home Dept v Rideh and J.[449] It was found that Parliament, in passing the PTA, had decided that the Secretary of State should not have power to make a control order that had the effect of depriving a person of his liberty in breach of Art 5 of the 449 [2007] EWHC 804 (Admin).

Convention. It was found that the cumulative effect of the control order made against the respondent had deprived him of his liberty. Therefore the Secretary of State had had no power to make the order, and, following the findings of the Court of Appeal in JJ and Others,[450] the proper course was found therefore to be to quash the control order under the powers in s 3(12) (a) of the Act.

Use of evidence obtained by torture?

Introduction

The evidence on which the decision to impose a control order is based could arise from a number of sources. In A and Others v Secretary of State for the Home Dept (No 2)[451] (the 2005 'foreign torture material' judgment) the House of Lords had to consider whether, in deciding to impose detention under Part 4, the court could take account of evidence that might have derived from torture perpetrated in another country. Although Part 4 has been repealed, the decision is, it is argued, relevant to the decision to impose a control order, although the Lords did not expressly apply it to control order proceedings. But it can be assumed that the ruling applies in derogating and non-derogating control order proceedings since the proceedings are very similar in form to those in SIAC at issue in the Lords' judgment, and, following the Court of Appeal decision in MB, are deciding similar issues.

Clearly, SIAC, the courts in control order proceedings, and the Secretary of State are public authorities within the meaning of s 6 HRA, so they must not act incompatibly with a Convention right. The rights particularly at issue are: Art 3, which guarantees the absolute, non-derogable right not to be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment,[452] Art 6(1) and Art 5(4). Article 5(4) is relevant if infringement of Art 5 is in issue, as it is in derogating control order proceedings, and as it has been found to be in non-derogating control order proceedings. Lord Hoffmann found in Montgomery v HM Advocate, Coulter v HM Advocate:[453] > an accused who is convicted on evidence obtained from him by torture has not had a fair trial. But the breach of article 6(1) lies not in the use of torture (which is, separately, a breach of article 3) but in the reception of the evidence by the court for the purposes of determining the charge. If the evidence had been rejected, there would still have been a breach of article 3 but no breach of article 6(1).

450 [2006] 3 WLR 866 at para 27.

451 [2005] UKHL 71. For comment, see Rasiah, N, 'A v Secretary of State for the Home Department (No 2): Occupying the Moral High Ground?' (2006) 69(6) MLR 995–1005.

452 Lord Bingham noted that Soering v United Kingdom (1989) 11 EHRR 439, para 88 enshrined 'one of the fundamental values of the democratic societies making up the Council of Europe' and that the European Court had used such language on many occasions (Aydin v Turkey (1997) 25 EHRR 251, para 81).

453 [2003] 1 AC 641, p 649.

The admissibility of 'foreign torture evidence'

The specific question before the Lords was whether the Special Immigration Appeals Commission (SIAC), a superior court of record established by statute, when hearing an appeal under s 25 of the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 by a person certified and detained under ss 21 and 23 of that Act, could receive evidence which has or may have been procured by torture inflicted, in order to obtain evidence, by officials of a foreign state without the complicity of the British authorities? The Secretary of State agreed that such evidence could not be received in any case where the torture had been inflicted by or with the complicity of the British authorities. He also stated that it was not his intention to rely on, or present to SIAC or to the Administrative Court in relation to control orders, evidence which he knew or believed to have been obtained by a third country by torture.

The appellants argued that the common law forbids the admission of evidence obtained by the use of torture, and that it does so whether the product is a confession by a suspect or a defendant, and irrespective of where, by whom or on whose authority the torture was inflicted. They also argued for that conclusion under the European Convention. Lord Bingham, giving the opinion of the House, noted that different views had been expressed previously on whether, for the purposes of Art 6, the proceedings before SIAC should be regarded as civil or criminal. The parties agreed not to pursue that point since their challenge to their detention pursuant to the Secretary of State's certification fell within Art 5(4). That provision entitles anyone deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful. As the Lords noted, it is well established that such proceedings must satisfy the basic requirements of a fair trial.[454]

Lord Bingham noted that the European Court of Human Rights had consistently declined to articulate evidential rules to be applied in all member states, and had preferred to leave such rules to be governed by national law.[455] But he also noted that the Court had insisted on its responsibility to ensure that the proceedings, viewed overall on the particular facts, had been fair, and it had recognised that the way in which evidence has been obtained or used might be such as to render the proceedings unfair.[456]

The appellants also relied on the well-established principle that the words of a UK statute, passed after the date of a Treaty and dealing with the same subject-matter, must be construed, if they are reasonably capable of bearing such a meaning, as intended to carry out the Treaty obligation, and not to be inconsistent with it.[457] Further, as Lord Bingham noted, the duty of the courts under s 6 HRA is not to act incompatibly with a Convention right. He found that, to the extent that development of the common

454 Garcia Alva v Germany (2001) 37 EHRR 335; R (West) v Parole Board, R (Smith) v Parole Board (No 2) [2005] UKHL 1; [2005] 1 WLR 350.

455 Schenk v Switzerland (1988) 13 EHRR 242, para 46; Ferrantelli and Santangelo v Italy (1996) 23 EHRR 288, para 48; Khan v United Kingdom (2000) 31 EHRR 1016, para 34. This point is discussed further in Chapter 13, pp 1291–92.

456 He relied on Saunders v United Kingdom (1996) 23 EHRR 313, a case of compulsory questioning, and in Teixeira de Castro v Portugal (1998) 28 EHRR 101, para 39, a case of entrapment.

457 Garland v British Rail Engineering Ltd [1983] 2 AC 751, 771.

law is called for, such development should ordinarily be in harmony with the UK's international obligations.[458] The appellants argued that the European Convention is not to be interpreted in a vacuum, but by taking account of other international obligations to which member states are subject, as the European Court of Human Rights has in practice done.[459] They pointed out that the prohibition of torture enjoys the highest normative force recognised by international law.

The prohibition requires states not merely to refrain from authorising or conniving at torture but also to suppress and discourage the practice of torture and not to condone it. They pointed out that Art 15 of the Torture Convention[460] requires the exclusion of statements made as a result of torture as evidence in any proceedings.[461] It was pointed out that the rationale of the exclusionary rule in Art 15 lay not only in the general unreliability of evidence procured by torture, but also in its offensiveness to civilised values and its degrading effect on the administration of justice. The applicants also argued that on that basis measures directed to counter the grave dangers of international terrorism could not be permitted to undermine the international prohibition of torture. Lord Bingham accepted that the jus cogens erga omnes nature of the prohibition of torture requires member states to do more than just eschew the practice of torture.[462] He relied on Kuwait Airways Corporation v Iraqi Airways Co (Nos 4 and 5),[463] in which the House of Lords refused recognition to conduct which represented a serious breach of international law.

Lord Bingham found that Art 15 of the Torture Convention could not be read, as counsel for the Secretary of State had submitted, as intended to apply only in criminal proceedings. He also found that it did not apply only where the state in whose jurisdiction the proceedings are held had inflicted or been complicit in the torture.[464] He noted that the European Court of Human Rights had emphasised that Art 3 of the European Convention is an absolute prohibition, not derogable in any circumstances, including in 458 At para 27.

459 Lord Bingham noted that the Court had in its decisions invoked a wide range of international instruments, including the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child 1989 and the Beijing Rules (V v United Kingdom (1999) 30 EHRR 121, paras 76–77), the Council of Europe Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (S v Switzerland (1991) 14 EHRR 670, para 48) and the 1975 Declaration (Ireland v United Kingdom (1978) 2 EHRR 25, para 167). Lord Bingham said that, pertinently to the appeals, the Court had repeatedly invoked the provisions of the Torture Convention: see, for example, Aydin v Turkey (1997) 25 EHRR 251, para 103; Selmouni v France (1999) 29 EHRR 403, para 97.

460 The Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment which was adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on 10 December 1984 and entered into force on 26 June 1987. But state torture was already an international crime; Lord Browne-Wilkinson pointed this out in R v Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex p Pinochet Ugarte (No 3) [2000] 1 AC 147, p 198G.

461 It provides that any statement which is established to have been made as a result of torture or other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment may not be invoked as evidence against the person concerned or against any other person in any proceedings. Each state Party shall ensure that any statement which is established to have been made as a result of torture shall not be invoked as evidence in any proceedings, except against a person accused of torture as evidence that the statement was made.

462 At para 34.

463 [2002] UKHL 19, [2002] 2 AC 883, paras 29, 117.

464 At para 35.

the context of terrorism.[465] He pointed out that that the Torture Convention, including Art 15, enjoys the same absolute quality.

The Secretary of State based his case in essence on the statutory scheme established by Part 4 of the 2001 Act. He relied on the appellants' acceptance that he was able, when forming the reasonable belief and suspicion required for certification under s 21, and when acting on that belief in terms of ordering arrest, search or detention of a suspect, to act on information which had or might have been obtained by torture inflicted in a foreign country, without British complicity. That acceptance, he submitted, supported the important and practical need for the security services and the Secretary of State to obtain intelligence and evidence from foreign official sources, some of which (in the less progressive countries) might dry up if their means of obtaining intelligence and evidence were the subject of intrusive inquiry. But, he argued, it would create a mismatch which Parliament could not have intended if the Secretary of State were able to rely on material at the certification stage which SIAC could not later receive. He argued that that would emasculate the statutory scheme, specifically designed to enable SIAC to see all relevant material, including ordinarily inadmissible material obtained on warranted intercepts. This position, it was pointed out on his behalf, was reflected in r 44(3) of the rules applicable to proceedings in SIAC, which dispenses with all rules of evidence, including any that might otherwise preclude admission of evidence obtained by torture in the circumstances indicated.

Lord Bingham accepted that the Secretary of State would not act unlawfully in relation to certifying, arresting, searching and detaining suspects on the strength of what he termed 'foreign torture evidence'. He considered that it was questionable whether he would act unlawfully if he based similar action on intelligence obtained by officially authorised British torture. In such circumstances there would obviously have been a breach of Art 3 by the state, but there would not be a breach of Art 5(4) or 6 in accepting the evidence in non-criminal proceedings. In such a circumstance the Secretary of State had accepted that such evidence would be inadmissible before SIAC. Lord Bingham pointed out that that position indicated that there is no correspondence between the material on which the Secretary of State may act and that which is admissible in legal proceedings.[466] He noted that this position arose whenever the Secretary of State (or any other public official) relied on information which the rules of public interest immunity prevented him adducing in evidence.[467] He pointed out that that situation comes about in respect of executive action based on a warranted interception where there is no dispensation permitting evidence to be given. He said that the position could be seen as anomalous, but that it sprang from the tension between practical common sense and the need to protect the individual from unfair incrimination.

465 He noted that in Chahal v United Kingdom (1996) 23 EHRR 413, para 79, it ruled: 'Article 3 enshrines one of the most fundamental values of democratic society. The Court is well aware of the immense difficulties faced by states in modern times in protecting their communities from terrorist violence. However, even in these circumstances, the Convention prohibits in absolute terms torture or inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, irrespective of the victim's conduct. Unlike most of the substantive clauses of the Convention and of Protocols Nos. 1 and 4, Article 3 makes no provision for exceptions and no derogation from it is permissible under Article 15 even in the event of a public emergency threatening the life of the nation.'

466 See paras 47 and 48.

467 He relied on Makanjuola v Comr of Police of the Metropolis [1992] 3 All ER 617, p 623e–j; R v Chief Constable of West Midlands Police ex p Wiley [1995] 1 AC 274, pp 295F–297C.

Lord Bingham accepted that Parliament could pass a statute forcing SIAC to accept torture evidence, but he said that the English common law had regarded torture and its fruits with abhorrence for over 500 years, and that that abhorrence was now shared by over 140 countries which had acceded to the Torture Convention. He said that he was:

> startled, even a little dismayed, at the suggestion (and the acceptance by the Court of Appeal majority) that this deeply-rooted tradition and an international obligation solemnly and explicitly undertaken can be overridden by a statute [ATCSA] and a procedural rule which make no mention of torture at all.[468]

He said that the matter is governed by the principle of legality as explained by Lord Hoffmann in R v Secretary of State for the Home Dept, ex p Simms:[469]

> Parliamentary sovereignty means that Parliament can, if it chooses, legislate contrary to fundamental principles of human rights. The Human Rights Act 1998 will not detract from this power. The constraints upon its exercise by Parliament are ultimately political, not legal. But the principle of legality means that Parliament must squarely confront what it is doing and accept the political cost. Fundamental rights cannot be overridden by general or ambiguous words. This is because there is too great a risk that the full implications of their unqualified meaning may have passed unnoticed in the democratic process. In the absence of express language or necessary implication to the contrary, the courts therefore presume that even the most general words were intended to be subject to the basic rights of the individual. In this way the courts of the United Kingdom, though acknowledging the sovereignty of Parliament, apply principles of constitutionality little different from those which exist in countries where the power of the legislature is expressly limited by a constitutional document.

Lord Bingham's conclusion on the key point was that:

> It trivialises the issue before the House to treat it as an argument about the law of evidence. The issue is one of constitutional principle, whether evidence obtained by torturing another human being may lawfully be admitted against a party to proceedings in a British court, irrespective of where, or by whom, or on whose authority the torture was inflicted. To that question I would give a very clear negative answer.[470]

He accepted the broad thrust of the appellants' argument on the common law. He said that the principles of the common law, standing alone, 'compel the exclusion of third party torture evidence as unreliable, unfair, offensive to ordinary standards of humanity and decency and incompatible with the principles which should animate a

468 At para 51.
469 [2000] 2 AC 115, p 131.
470 At para 51.

tribunal seeking to administer justice'. He further found that effect must also be given to the European Convention, which itself takes account of the near-universal consensus embodied in the Torture Convention.

He went on to find that the principle he had enunciated did not apply to material obtained by means of inhuman and degrading treatment; he said that the authorities on the Torture Convention did not justify the assimilation of those two kinds of abusive conduct, since special rules were applicable to torture, and should continue to be. But he noted that the standard of what amounts to torture is not immutable. In other words, treatment regarded in the past as 'inhuman' might, as standards change, now be regarded as 'torture'.[471]

The burden of proof in relation to 'foreign torture evidence'

The other Law Lords agreed with Lord Bingham as to the non-admissibility of third party torture evidence in court proceedings. However, the majority in the Lords disagreed with Lord Bingham as to the burden of proof placed on the Secretary of State when he presented material to SIAC which could have been derived from torture. Lord Bingham said that the appellant must ordinarily, by himself or his special advocate, advance some plausible reason why evidence might have been procured by torture. That could be done, he said, by showing that evidence has, or probably has, come from one of those countries widely known or believed to practise torture. Once that plausible reason had been given, he found, or where SIAC with its knowledge and expertise in this field knows or suspects that evidence might have come from such a country, SIAC should then make such inquiry as to enable it to form a fair judgment whether the evidence had, or whether there was a real risk that it might have been, obtained by torture or not. He said that if SIAC was unable to conclude that no real risk that the evidence had been obtained by torture was apparent, it should refuse to admit the evidence.

The majority in the Lords agreed that a conventional approach to the burden of proof would be inappropriate in the context of SIAC proceedings. The detainee could not be expected to prove anything since he was denied access to so much of the information that was to be used against him. Lord Hope said that he could merely raise the issue by asking that the point be considered by SIAC; he could point to the fact that the information which was to be used against him may have come from one of the many countries around the world that are alleged to practise torture.[472] SIAC would then have to look at the facts in detail and decide whether there were reasonable grounds to suspect that torture was used in the individual case under scrutiny. He found that SIAC should not admit the evidence if it concluded on the balance of probabilities that it was obtained by torture. In other words, where SIAC was left in doubt as to whether the evidence was obtained in this way, it should admit it. He said that it would be unrealistic to expect SIAC to demand that each piece of information should be traced back to its ultimate source, and the circumstances in which it was obtained investigated so that it could be proved piece by piece, that it was not obtained under torture. He 471 He noted that this point was made by the European Court in Selmouni v France (1999) 29 EHRR 403, paras 99–101. See also Chapter 11, pp 1174–76 on this point.

472 At para 116.

considered that the threshold should not be put that high,[473] and the majority in the Lords agreed as to that test.

The minority judges in the House of Lords wanted a more stringent test – that the Home Secretary should have to prove on the balance of probabilities that the evidence was not obtained by torture. Lord Bingham said of the decision of the majority as to the burden of proof: 'I regret that the House should lend its authority to a test which will undermine the practical efficacy of the Torture Convention and deny detainees the standard of fairness to which they are entitled under article 5(4) or 6(1) of the European Convention.'[474] Lord Nicholls said that placing on the detainee a burden of proof which, for reasons beyond his control, he can seldom discharge was to pay lip-service to the principle that courts will not admit evidence procured by torture.[475]

Impact of the HRA on the control orders scheme: future directions?

The courts, in the decisions considered on the control orders scheme, have sought to impose a Convention-compliance on it that it failed to achieve when the PTA passed through Parliament, despite the fact that the PTA was declared compatible with the Convention, and no derogation was sought from Art 5. The decision in JJ made it clear to the government that the current control order regime creates an invasion of Art 5. The declaration of compatibility made under s 4 HRA in relation to Art 5 in JJ requires modification of the current obligations imposed by non-derogating control orders. The government therefore has to accept that modifications to the package of obligations imposed, affording the suspect a greater degree of liberty, have to be made. The non-derogating control orders regime can continue to be used but, unless a derogation from Art 5 is sought, a less stringent regime has to be imposed on individuals, one that imposes restraints on freedom of movement, but does not go so far in doing so that it breaches the right to liberty under Art 5. It is notable that in E the 12-hour curfew imposed was, not found in itself to constitute a deprivation of his liberty. It was the cumulative effect of the restrictions that led to a breach of Art 5. In order to answer to the decision in E the government also has to make greater efforts to seek to prosecute suspects rather than imposing control orders since if that does not occur further orders may be quashed. As discussed above, the broad offences of ss 1 and 5 TA 2006 provide a further opportunity of doing so.

Further challenges to the scheme on human rights grounds are probable. If the Secretary of State wishes to continue to impose the package of obligations so far imposed it will now require a derogation from Art 5, unless JJ is successfully appealed to the House of Lords by the Secretary of State. That would mean that the procedure to be used for the imposition of derogating control orders would have to be used. Also, as discussed above, if a derogation is sought from Art 5 in order to employ control orders allowing for the imposition of obligations that have been found to breach Art 5, the impact of the orders on liberty would still have to be proportionate to the exigencies of the security situation under Art 15 ECHR.

473 At para 119.
474 At para 62.
475 At para 80.

In MB the Court of Appeal improved the procedure for reviewing the making of a non-derogating control order to an extent, by adopting a purposive interpretation of the PTA, taking the fair trial right under Art 6[476] into account. Following this decision, it is clear that the procedure adopted in control proceedings must adhere to Art 6; the court itself must consider whether there were reasonable grounds for suspicion; that exercise must now differ from that of deciding whether a fact had been established according to a specified standard of proof. The procedure for determining whether reasonable grounds for suspicion existed must be fair if Sched 1, Part I, Art 6 to the 1998 Act is to be satisfied. This decision has built in a greater safeguard against unfair proceedings and against miscarriages of justice than was present under the PTA as interpreted without reference to s 3 HRA. However, fundamental problems remain: the court merely has to consider whether reasonable suspicion could be arrived at on the basis of the relevant material. That means that control orders can be imposed on a standard of proof below the civil standard; that is a low standard to apply, bearing in mind the impact on the controlee of control orders. Further, depending on the circumstances of the case, the control order decision can be affirmed although the applicant has not been made aware even of a summary of the case against him.

As discussed above, judicial supervision of control orders occurs by applying judicial review principles in the control order proceedings. After the decision of the Court of Appeal in Secretary of State for the Home Dept v MB[477] – which was handed down after the House of Lords judgment in the 'torture evidence' case – it was made clear that in order to comply with Art 6 the court has to consider whether there were reasonable grounds for suspicion as the basis for imposing the order. That means that the court has to inquire into the evidence relied on by the Home Secretary, and so appears to mean that if the claimant raises the possibility that the material relied upon was obtained by torture, the court should inquire into the matter. However, as the Lords determined, it appears that if the court is left in doubt as to this issue, so that if it is not satisfied on the balance of probabilities that the material was obtained by torture, it can receive the evidence in question and take account of it in finding that reasonable suspicion was arrived at.

This means that the evidence on which the decision to impose a control order is based could still include evidence obtained by torture, so long as the inquiries that the court is capable of making are unlikely to demonstrate to that standard of proof that the evidence was so obtained. The Home Secretary does not have to prove on the balance of probabilities that the evidence was not obtained by torture before relying on it. If, for example, the evidence emanated from Guantanemo Bay in which the use of various techniques amounting to torture has been documented, then it is possible that a court would take the view that there was a reasonable basis for suspecting that it might have been obtained by torture. However, it is probable that the test laid down in the Lords would not be satisfied without further inquiries which the court in control order proceedings would be very ill-equipped to make. The court could consider the evidence available in the closed sessions, but if it merely left open the possibility that torture had been used, it would not appear that the court could be satisfied on the balance of probabilities that it had been. The court would be in an even more difficult position if the material was obtained from a source which merely refused to state whether torture could have been used; it would appear in that instance that the evidence could be used.

476 See the discussion of Art 6 in Chapter 2, pp 59–66.
477 [2006] EWCA Civ 1140; (2006) 156 NLJ 1288; (2006) 150 SJLB 1055.

In other words, the prohibition on the use of material obtained by third party torture could be viewed as close to a merely paper guarantee. Inhuman or degrading treatment is not covered by the House of Lords ruling; therefore it seems that evidence obtained by those methods can be accepted. Section 76(2)(a) PACE, discussed in Chapter 13, demands that the prosecution should prove beyond reasonable doubt that the evidence was not obtained by the use of ‘oppression’, which includes Art 3 treatment but is not confined to it. However, s 76(2)(a) would not be applicable to the proceedings in question since they are not viewed at present as the determination of a criminal charge for Art 6 purposes. (Possibly, although this would create an anomalous two-tier system of criminal proceedings, s 76(2)(a) could be viewed as inapplicable even if the proceedings were characterised as criminal ones under Art 6(1) on the basis that the designation was based on the autonomous Convention meaning of ‘criminal charge’.) This also means that if evidence may have been obtained by inhuman or degrading treatment as opposed to torture and there is a doubt as to the method that was used (torture or lesser abusive treatment) the evidence can be accepted. Thus, in relation to methods of obtaining evidence, those subject to control orders are placed in a doubly invidious position in due process terms. The evidence only has to be sufficient to found reasonable suspicion, and it can be obtained by methods which would render it inadmissible in a criminal trial.

6 Conclusions

As this chapter has demonstrated, the terrorist attacks of 9/11 and of 7/7 in London immediately placed the Labour Government’s commitment to the Human Rights Act under great pressure. It appeared initially probable that as an aspect of counter-terrorist policy they would exploit the leeway created by the HRA for introducing legislation incompatible with the Convention. However, even during a ‘war on terror’ that Britain had not ‘won’ after six years, the Labour Government did not take that route in introducing counter-terrorist measures; after 9/11 they continued to rely on the Convention qualifications to the rights, based on proportionality, and on employing derogations, rather than the escape routes available under the HRA, via the use of rights-infringing primary legislation. Their stance, which reflects the international obligations that the UK is under regardless of the HRA, reveals the cynicism of Conservative plans to repeal the Human Rights Act, a measure highly likely to be passed off in parts of the media as an aid to anti-terrorist strategy. David Cameron is of course aware of the UK’s obligations under the Convention at the international level,[478] but, as the Conservative Party may recognise, the less responsible sections of the media are likely to gloss over that point. Since the case for the HRA has not fully been made to the British public, and certain sections of the media have deliberately presented the public with a partial and distorted view of the Act,[479] the difference between the obligations under HRA and those under the Convention has hardly entered the public consciousness.

478 Discussed in Chapter 2.

This chapter has charted a dramatic change from the old model for counter-terrorist laws – a reactive model used in the TA 2000 – to the new, proactive model, introduced under the Labour Government in the ATCSA Part 4 and now in the PTA 2005. The Terrorism Act 2000, despite the breadth of many of the offences that it introduced – in terms of their application to a wide range of groups – was largely a reactive measure. In other words, it relied on charging persons with offences and seeking to bring them to trial. Although in that sense it appears less pernicious in human rights terms than the measures that succeeded it, post-9/11, introduced under Part 4 ATCSA and under the PTA 2005, it must not be forgotten that its very broad definition of terrorism lies at the heart of the proactive measures introduced by its successors, and that it represented at the time one of the most significant extensions of 'emergency' legislation over the last 30 years.

The TA's introduction in the absence of any 'clear and present' danger evident in 2000 may be said to provide a signal example of a failure of democracy to protect civil liberties. The legislation is remarkable in its abandonment of all the features which sought to make the original PTA and EPA legislation appear tolerable: its limited application, its temporary nature, annual review and scrutiny of the continuing threat. Paradoxically, it affords the legislation all the hallmarks of ordinary criminal law while continuing to justify its draconian nature on the basis of the special need to combat terrorism. In this sense it is contradictory and possibly counter-productive: the more that terrorism becomes indistinguishable from ordinary criminal activity, the less the term 'terrorist' is likely to appear to justify special measures. The failure to include safeguards, such as renewal, in the legislation comes to seem even more indefensible. Such safeguards may have been weak and hypocritical, but they showed some symbolic attachment to a notion of respect for the rule of law.

The pre-2000 legislation relied on actual terrorist activity to justify the adoption of draconian laws, on incremental development and a nuanced approach. In other words, particular temporary measures were adopted for periods of time and on a localised basis, to answer to particular threats. Graduation was, in a sense, achieved since where the threat was perceived to be most severe, more severe measures were adopted to meet it. Had the TA introduced greater graduation, depending on different offences and levels of threat, together with a more specific and limited definition of terrorism, its permanent nature might have been less objectionable. But it adhered to an absolutist approach in failing to introduce express graduation while abandoning each of the features of the previous counter-terrorist scheme. It is more coherent and bold than the previous legislation; it has spurned the hypocrisy of the past which pretended that these measures were temporary. But, it is argued, its adoption showed an even greater degree of cynical opportunism than that which has such a marked pedigree in the long history of counter-terrorist measures. The government seemed to fail to understand that the reluctance to take each step reflected some adherence to democratic principle and explained why the previous legislation was piecemeal, anomalous, incremental and localised. In so far as the TA allows for greater breadth and unpredictability in the application of the terrorist offences, the Human Rights Act had to be looked to, to seek to prevent the departures from the rule of law it threatened, and which Parliament was unable or unwilling to prevent.[480]

479 See Chapter 4, pp 162–63.

The argument that proscription and the TA generally are needed since they marginalise some groups from mainstream society represents a limited perspective. It fails to consider what part the TA and other legislation plays in discouraging some dissident groups, more moderate than Al-Qaeda, from seeking to employ the democratic process to express dissent. Removing democratic rights such as free expression from certain groups on the ground that they are (a) opposed to democracy and (b) are uninterested in using democratic means, fails to ask the question as to what part removing their ability to use that process plays – what effect it has on encouraging extremism and hence terrorist activity. Trusting the executive to address the demands of proportionality – which is what the current counter-terrorist scheme does in terms of proscription decisions, and the initial step in imposing control orders, unless the decision is 'obviously flawed' – is unsatisfactory in human rights terms. At the extremes so far proportionality has been observed; for example, animal rights or environmental groups have not yet been proscribed. However, this may merely reflect a perception that to proscribe them could appear to make a mockery of the proscription process, since once proscribed their members probably would not be prosecuted for the proscription-based offences. Police resources would be stretched too thinly if serious attempts were made to apply the proscription-based offences to members of such groups. But certain groups, such as the PKK or PMOI, which do not appear to represent a threat to security in the UK, have been proscribed. Proscription of such groups is unlikely to attract any adverse attention in the mainstream media, and may indeed be welcomed in it. It means that the effect of the relevance of proscription as a negotiating weapon in diplomatic machinations is felt by vulnerable members of weak and already marginalised groups, as exemplified in the Kurdistan proscription case discussed above, and in relation to the Sikh youths coming to the UK from Germany where ISYF is not proscribed. The relevance of all this to security in the UK is tenuous at best and probably counter-productive to it.

As this chapter has demonstrated, the HRA has had a significant impact in terms of tempering the effects of the TA. Ex p Kebilene affected the drafting of the TA, and Attorney General's Reference (No 4 of 2002)[481] completed the process of imposing Art 6 compliance on the provisions. But the effect of the HRA on other aspects of the over-broad application of the TA provisions has been limited, partly because the TA offences have been under-used. Further, the substantive issue in the Kurdistan proscription case has not yet been considered in the courts. The Human Rights Act has had very little impact on curbing the use of anti-terrorism provisions in the context of public protest. This is partly because little opportunity for it to do so has arisen. When the opportunity did arise, in R (on the application of Gillan) v Comr of Metropolitan Police[482] in relation 480 At a number of points in the debate on the Second Reading of the Bill in the Commons MPs noted that it did not appear to be compatible with the Convention: 'we are continuously finding as we go through the Bill provisions that seem contrary to the spirit and precise provisions of the Convention and of the decisions of the Court' (HC Debs 15 March 2000 col 432). Nevertheless, all amendments which might have removed incompatibilities were overwhelmingly defeated due to the government's very large majority and the determination of the Conservative opposition to appear to be 'tougher on terrorism' than the Labour Party.

481 [2004] UKHL 43; [2005] 1 AC 264; [2005] 1 All ER 237.

482 [2006] UKHL 12.

to the key TA stop and search measure, it was not taken, as Chapter 8 demonstrates. The use of anti-terrorism powers against climate change protesters at Heathrow – as currenty planned by the Metropolitan police in August 2007 – may provide the courts with a further opportunity. However, the HRA has had, as discussed, a significant impact in imposing compliance with Art 6 on the TA.

The courts have also taken a firm stance in relation to the proactive measures introduced post-2000. Part 4 ATCSA was modified due to court intervention on human rights grounds, and then finally abandoned after the Lords' decision in A and others. The control orders scheme under the 2005 Act seems to be following a similar path, in the sense that the HRA is being used in order to seek to impose Convention-compliance upon it, although since it is a more nuanced scheme it can be modified rather than entirely abandoned.[483] The use of control orders, rather than charging suspects with offences actually committed, is a logical conclusion of the proactive approach: as discussed, persons may suffer interferences with their liberty, private life, association and communication, not because of what they have actually done, but for fear of what they might do, based upon suspicion of their involvement with Al-Qaeda generally.

The use of proactive rather than reactive measures appears, on its face, to represent the most effective strategy in relation to the threat of suicide bombing, and the attacks in London on 7/7 and in the US on 9/11 were of course carried out by suicide bombers. Those who plan to die in carrying out attacks self-evidently cannot be 'punished' after the event and are unlikely to be deterred by the threat of conviction and imprisonment. However, preventive measures are only of utility in relation to those likely to carry out suicide bombings if they are effective in targeting the right people; over-broad preventive measures, including the control orders discussed in this chapter, may have counter-productive effects in encouraging persons to contemplate engaging in suicide bomb attacks. It should also be noted that the imprisonment of those engaged in planning and preparation for such attacks, for example, on conviction for proscription-based offences, for conspiracy, or under the broad preparatory offences available, would assist in preventing them.

Post-2000 it became incrementally easier in the UK to fall within the legal category of a 'terrorist suspect; attention has turned to adopting broad definitions of such suspects, facilitating the application of sanctions outside the criminal process. Counter-terrorist law and policy has concentrated on widening the legal net so that greater numbers of persons can potentially be viewed as terrorist suspects, partly by adopting definitions of 'terrorist activity' that in effect broaden the basic definition of terrorism under the TA and partly by lowering the standard of proof needed in order to apply counter-terrorist sanctions to suspects. The current dramatically broad construction of the 'terrorist suspect' depends on both legal developments, taken together, in contradistinction to the broadening of the definitions of terrorist offences, which is simultaneously occurring in the TA 2006. But the range of special counter terrorist and proscription offences, as well as the proactive measures of executive detention and control orders, have been under-utilised. The attempt has not been made to apply all the terrorism offences and sanctions to the wide range of groups and persons that s 1 TA potentially covers. The counter-terrorist provisions create an appearance of extreme authoritarianism which is not in general borne out by the reality. The greatest concern is to seek to apply them to groups linked to Al-Qaeda, that do threaten national security. But only a tiny handful of persons were subjected to the detention without trial scheme under ATCSA, and less than 20 people are currently subject to control orders under PTA. In certain instances the ordinary criminal law has been employed against terrorist attacks rather than the special counter-terrorism provisions. In particular, those conspiring with the 7/7 bombers were charged in 2007 and convicted of an offence in a criminal law statute passed in 1883.[484]

483 At present the government is consulting on security with the intention of publishing a national security strategy in autumn 2007, which may include a proposal for a derogation from Art 5 (see fn 487 below). The current scheme is not effective in security terms: so far five suspects under control orders have absconded.

The government in 2005 stated that it intended to bring forward a terrorism consolidation Bill in 2007, which would create an opportunity to amend the control orders provisions. However, that Bill has not made an appearance, and as the Joint Committee on Human Rights pointed out in 2007 it now seems, from the comments of the Minister during the renewal debate in the Commons, that there is no guarantee that this consolidation bill will appear before the next annual renewal of the control orders scheme. That means that Parliament has been denied an opportunity to debate that scheme in full, taking account of the findings that a number of the orders breach Art 5.[485] The problem remains that the control order regime is being operated in practice in breach of the right to liberty in Art 5, because the control orders which are being imposed are so restrictive as to amount to a deprivation of liberty, which is unlawful in the absence of a derogation from Art 5.[486] In July 2007 Prime Minister Gordon Brown made a Commons statement on security.[487] The government intends to bring forward a new counter-terrorism bill in autumn 2007. The intention is, after consultation, that it should include plans to extend detention without charge, possibly to 56 days, to allow suspects to be questioned after they have been officially charged, and to allow for the admission in evidence of material deriving from phone intercepts. The possibility of derogating from parts of the ECHR has also been raised. The government can expect support from the Liberal Democrats and the Conservatives on questioning subjects after they have been officially charged, and on phone-tapping evidence. But the opposition has made it clear that unless they hear the evidence to support extending the limit on detention without charge, the government will be defeated again on that issue.[488] The position on control orders in future remains undetermined, but no proposal to abandon the control orders scheme was made in the Commons statement.

484 The charge against them alleged that between November 1, 2004 and June 29, 2005, they ‘unlawfully and maliciously’ conspired with the four 7/7 bombers – Mohammed Sidique Khan, Shezhad Tanweer, Jermaine Lindsay and Hasib Hussein – to cause ‘by explosive substance explosions on the transport for London system and/or tourist attractions in London in a nature likely to endanger life or cause serious injury to property’. The alleged offence is contrary to s 3(1)(a) of the Explosive Substances Act 1883. See The Telegraph, 6 April 2007. The conspirators, with two acquittals, were convicted on 1 May 2007.

485 JCHR 8th Report Session 2009–7, 28 March 2007. The JCHR pointed out in its report that the unsatisfactory nature of a debate on an affirmative order was ‘graphically illustrated in the renewal debate in the Commons when the Minister was unable to reply to an important question about whether any of the charges pending for breach of control orders related to the three individuals who had been subject to control orders for the longest time’ para 15. The debate was only for one and a half hours. See fn 494 for the current proposals for the Counter-terror Bill 2007.

486 Ibid at para 18.

487 Prime Ministers’ Commons Statement on Security 25 July 2007.

488 See news reports, including Guardian Unlimited 7 June 2007.

The question arises, and must be in the minds of judges – are control orders being used (as detention might have been under Part 4 ATCSA)[489] where a prosecution could succeed instead under the criminal law or under one of the many broad offences of the Terrorism Acts of 2000 and 2006?[490] If so, is this at least partly due to a lack of devotion of resources to the issue of bringing a prosecution and to a preference for controlling an individual's movements on the basis of a very low standard of proof because that avoids the difficulties of persuading the security services that it is possible to use some sensitive material as evidence, with appropriate safeguards, in a criminal trial? The campaigning group Justice argued in 2007 that greater effort could be devoted to seeking to bring prosecutions under the ordinary criminal law or the special terrorism offences. So doing could include relaxing the ban on the use of intercept material as evidence,[491] and making greater efforts to turn security material into evidence. While the impact of relaxing the ban on use of intercept material as evidence should not be exaggerated, it may be noted that virtually all other countries have dropped their bans, indicating that any value they had is outweighed by the value of using such material in criminal trials.

Future strands of counter-terrorism policy seem likely to continue to come into conflict with the European Convention on Human Rights, although the government seems to be adopting a more nuanced approach in response to the human rights embarrassment it suffered as a result of the House of Lords' decision in A and Others. The government continues to explore the possibility of introducing very broad anti-terrorist offences, the latest exemplars being those introduced in the 2006 Act. It continues to see the control orders scheme as a central part of its counter-terrorist strategy. As discussed above, it is seeking at the time of writing to 'overturn' the decision in Chahal in the European Court of Human Rights, meaning that it could deport persons creating a security risk abroad, despite the risk that they would there be subject to Art 3 treatment. Some attention has already turned to relying on closed evidence, in SIAC and in control order hearings, but so far such measures have not been adopted within the mainstream criminal justice system as a means of watering down criminal trials.

At present, as this chapter has shown, two parallel schemes are operating in Britain in respect of the counter-terrorist response: the use of control orders based on certification by the Home Secretary for a tiny group of suspected terrorists, and a reactive scheme based on a range of very broad special terrorism offences, but dependent on trial and conviction, for all suspected terrorists. The creation of the two schemes reveals a clear disjunction of aim between the creation of ever-broader substantive offences and the due process demands of criminal trials. Ironically, the special terrorist offences appear to be viewed by the government as ineffective in relation to some of those who pose the greatest security threat. The introduction of control orders amounts to an admission of the failure of the criminal law to deal with this threat. So far the government has not sought to introduce modifications to the criminal trial itself[492] – such as allowing 489 See p 1428 above.

490 See further on this point the Draft Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005 (Continuance in Force of Sections 1 to 9) Order 2007 JUSTICE Briefing for House of Commons Debate February 2007 at paras 5–8.

491 See Chapter 10, pp 1047–52. See also fn 494 below.

492 Apart from the introduction, in places, of reverse burdens of proof, as in s 57 TA – see pp 1353–54 above. The key proposals from the Newton Committee had that objective in mind: they were intended the use of intercept material in evidence – with a view to bringing those subject to control orders, and other suspects, to trial. There seems to be a continuing reluctance to use security material as evidence in a criminal trial – arguably evident in the E case – partly explaining the reliance on proactive measures outside the criminal justice system, currently non-derogating control orders. So, despite the introduction of new offences under the TA 2006, there seems to be little prospect of a significant increase in the use of the criminal justice process and no prospect of a political solution to the current situation. Thus the executive will probably continue to rely on the use of interventions outside that process, and the courts' deployment of the Human Rights Act, will continue to play a key role in creating a Convention-compliant balance between rights and security.

This chapter has sought to argue that there is a dissonance between the vast array of counter-terrorist provisions it has discussed, and the preservation of the security of the UK. The passing of two very broad anti-terrorism statutes – TA 2000 and ATCSA – did not prevent the worst terrorist atrocity in Britain in recent years – the London bombings in 2005. This chapter is arguing for a narrower targeting of the provisions – at Al-Qaeda and linked groups, and for greater efforts to prosecute their members and supporters employing, inter alia, the new offences under the TA 2006. The use of control orders, which at present do not include detention, not only runs counter to a number of Convention principles, it is ineffective in security terms.[493] The use of the principle of proportionality by the courts has created, and has the potential to continue to create, a narrow focus for the counter-terrorist scheme that brings it to bear on targets that genuinely threaten security. There is an argument for encapsulating that principle in a future consolidating counter-terrorist statute itself, rather than relying on the courts to impose proportionality on its provisions under s 3 HRA.[494] to allow for the use of the special terrorism and proscription offences in prosecutions against members or supporters of Al-Qaeda. But under current proposals intercept material may be made admissible in evidence (see fn 487).

493 As Justice pointed out in 2007 in its Draft Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005 (Continuance in Force of Sections 1 to 9) Order 2007 JUSTICE Briefing for House of Commons Debate February 2007, the recent abscondment of two individuals subject to control orders – one from a psychiatric hospital and one from a mosque – raises serious questions about the use of control orders.

494 However, current proposals for a 2007 Counter-terror Bill indicate that no such provision will be made. It does not appear that the new Bill will be a consolidating measure. Nor will it radically change the current scheme, including the control orders scheme. Instead, under current proposals (see Government discussion document 7 June 2007) it will introduce a package of further counter-terrorist measures, including: powers to stop and question suspects; extension of the detention period in police custody beyond 28 days, possibly to 56 days; the use of intercept material as evidence.

Part V

Equality and theories of anti-discrimination laws

One of the main themes in human rights jurisprudence concerns the duty of states to treat citizens with equal concern and respect. This does not mean that no differentiation between citizens should occur, but that inequality of treatment should not be based on factors which do not justify it. Thus, discrimination may be defined as morally unjustifiable as opposed to justifiable differentiation.[1] It may be said that the latter occurs when a difference in treatment is accorded owing to behaviour which is the result of voluntary choice, the former when it is based on an attribute over which the individual has no control, such as sex or skin colour. Thus, in a society that allows or imposes discrimination in this sense, the groups affected will be entirely frustrated in pursuing their objectives in all areas of life because the disadvantage they are under cannot be removed. These statements alone, however, are inadequate as failing to deal with behaviour which may in a sense be the result of voluntary choice, but might also be said to be determined by social conditioning. Further, they do not explain whether differentiation would be justified if based on behaviour to which a person is morally committed owing to her membership of a certain group. Thus, it should also be argued that morally unjustifiable differentiation would also occur, at least presumptively, if different treatment was based on behaviour over which the individual had little real choice, or where it would be morally unjustifiable to force the individual to choose between adherence to a particular group, and disadvantage. Finally, this argument should encompass the notion that the physical attribute or behaviour in question may, exceptionally, be objectively relevant to the differential treatment and thereby could justify it. As Chapter 15 will demonstrate, anti-discrimination schemes tend to begin by outlawing discrimination on the basis of sex, race or skin colour. They then move on to a more developed conception of equality, which understands that discrimination can also occurs on the basis of a number of other factors, including sexual orientation, transsexuality, religion or disability.

Once factors that do not justify differentiation are identified, the state can be said to be under a duty to ensure that unequal treatment on the basis of such factors does not occur, at least in spheres under its control. However, at different times, and according to different schools of thought, the scope of the duty varies. Under early classic liberal rights theory, the state came under a duty to ensure that no formal discriminatory mechanisms were in place, but once that was done, it was thought that individuals would have equal freedom to exercise their talents.[2] However, this theory came to encompass the notion of state intervention in order to ensure that some individuals did not prevent others from exercising their talents. This is the dominant theory underpinning the UK legislative policy on equality: it assumes that once people have equal freedoms, they will have equal opportunities and thus all that is needed is to ensure such freedoms. Some egalitarians would go further, insisting that persons should be placed in a similar position, even if in order to do so they are treated unequally. Some forms of liberal thought[3] would now also support treating persons unequally in order to ensure equality of opportunity. However, broadly, liberals view equality as formal, while egalitarians, including socialists or communitarians, view it as substantive. Formal equality[4] (or treating like as like) is the limitation placed upon equality legislation by liberalism; its drawback is that it puts the protection of such legislation beyond the reach of those who are differently situated.[5] For example, if women's domestic and parental roles[6] tend to differ from those of men, even though that position is changing, and those roles interfere with women's role as (cost efficient) workers, in a formal equality model, which takes the male as the norm and assumes that a woman is like a man, the employer may justifiably treat women differently. Similarly, if some persons from minority groups are educationally or socially disadvantaged, their difference of situation cannot be addressed by means of legislation based on a formal equality model.

1 See Wallman, S, 'Difference, differentiation, discrimination', 5 New Community 1.

This argument does not imply that the imposition of formal equality has no impact on the distribution of social benefits. In particular, formal equality affects the market by inducing it not to act in an arbitrary and ultimately inefficient fashion. Formal equality, if fully established, disallows the individual biases of employers to feed into the market,[7] and may therefore promote genuine competition based on individual merit, thereby preventing the unwarranted under- or over-advantaging of certain groups. Perpetuation of an unequal pay policy may not seem to lead clearly and immediately to an inefficient operation of the market. If a certain group can be treated disadvantageously in terms of pay, this may appear in some respects to benefit the market, since the availability of cheap labour may lead to increased productivity and market expansion. Nevertheless, unequal pay may eventually distort the operation of market forces, creating dysfunction in the market, since certain professions and certain specialities within professions may

2 See Mill, JS, On the Subjection of Women, 2nd edn, 1869.

3 See Raz, J, The Morality of Freedom, 1986, Clarendon; Dworkin, R, Taking Rights Seriously, 1978, p 272.

4 Under classic liberalism as expressed by Mill, op. cit., fn 2.

5 Several feminist writers have pointed out that the principal limitation of the formal equality principle is that it assumes that the male is the norm. MacKinnon puts it particularly aptly, 'Why should you have to be the same as a man to get what a man gets simply because he is one?' See MacKinnon, C, 'Difference and dominance: on sex discrimination', in Bartlett, K and Kennedy, R (eds), Feminist Legal Theory, 1991; see also MacKinnon, C, 'Reflections on sex equality under law' (1991) 100 Yale LJ 1286–93.

6 Matters belonging to the 'private' sphere, in a liberal conception. Mill's view, as expressed in op. cit., fn 2, was that formal equality operates in certain 'public' spheres, such as franchise, employment and education.

7 This argument is put forward by Weiler in 'The wages of sex: the uses and limits of comparable worth' (1986) 99 Harv L Rev 1728, p 1762: '. . . real world labour markets leave a good deal of leeway for countless managerial judgments about how to classify, value and pay certain jobs in comparison to others.'

be shunned by advantaged groups because of the low pay they offer, with the result once again that genuine competition is not fostered within them.

Thus, it may be argued that formal equality 'perfects' the market: rather than allowing bias to benefit certain individuals at the expense of others, it forces the market to treat every employee or would-be employee as an autonomous individual having made a free choice as regards position in the market. Further, it can force the market to treat each individual as an equivalent 'unit of production'.[8] Beyond that it will not go, and therefore it is not ultimately gravely disruptive of market forces. Once a formal equality regime is established and internalised by the market, market forces can have free rein.

Substantive equality, on the other hand, demands not merely that persons should be judged on individual merit, but that the real situation of many women and/or members of minority groups which may tend to place them in a weaker position in the market should be addressed by a variety of means, including anti-discrimination legislation. Proponents of this argument recognise that the achievement of substantive equality involves more than a few discrimination claims. Such claims can only have limited impact in bringing about social change; far reaching structural changes can be achieved only as a result of government policy and changed social expectations. Nevertheless, under a substantive equality model, equality legislation would attempt to reflect and further the societal movement towards equality which is taking place in the member states of the EU. Thus, legislation enshrining anti-discrimination measures may move beyond seeking to ensure formal equality and may encompass a more sophisticated notion of equality, requiring understanding of the differential impact of certain measures on certain groups, and of the value of positive action.

From inequality to neutrality, from formal to substantive equality

During the twentieth and twenty-first centuries in Western democracies, it has been possible to discern a pattern in the landscape of 'equality' law. There has been a clear movement, reflected in the law, towards acceptance of the equal treatment of persons, and towards a more developed conception of equality, and away from the acceptance of unjustifiable differentiation, which reflects to an extent the different theories considered above. In the first phase such differentiation, based on particular protected grounds expressly enshrined in the law, is gradually removed; in the second, there may be a hiatus during which the law is neutral and there is freedom to discriminate; in the third, the law may be used to try expressly to prevent discrimination, or at least certain aspects of it, on such grounds. In the fourth, a more developed conception of equality may become apparent – the aim will be to achieve equality of outcome: in this phase, the law will tend to permit discrimination – termed positive or affirmative action – on the ground that it is morally justified as a temporary measure intended to combat the effects of previous discrimination.

8 In other words, formal equality requires in general that one employee should not be perceived as more expensive than another and therefore the market need not accommodate the cost of individuals who are given unnecessary special protection such as, e.g., barring women from night work during pregnancy.

However, although this general pattern can usually be identified, it may well be that particular aspects of the 'first phase' discrimination which, for various reasons – usually associated with the most conservative bastions in society such as religion or the armed forces – are especially resistant to change, are still in existence during the third phase. Such aspects will still tend to follow the general trend, but more slowly, and will themselves almost certainly move eventually from one phase to another.[9] In other words, some specific inequalities may still be enshrined in law in the third or fourth phases. Moreover, within each phase there may be movement; in the first, legislation may enshrine gross and absolute inequality, which gradually gives place to a lesser and more pragmatic inequality. An example is afforded by the legal regulation of sexual acts between consenting males: until 1967 these were merely forbidden, on the ground that sexual satisfaction gained in this manner was seen as inimical to the moral basis of society. The removal of this barrier but the initial fixing of the age of consent for male homosexuals at 21, and then at 18, suggested a retreat from an absolutist position, but a disinclination, until the age of consent was equalised in 2003, to carry through such a retreat fully.

Since slavery was abolished at the beginning of the nineteenth century, generalised racial inequality has never been enshrined in law in the UK in the way that sexual inequality has been until relatively recently. People from certain ethnic backgrounds have not been prevented from voting, from holding civic office, from owning property or from forming contracts. The legal scheme which until quite recently governed sexual inequality in the UK would probably find parallels in terms of racial inequality only under regimes such as that in South Africa during the apartheid years.

The movement towards equality on the grounds of sexual orientation is currently poised between the second and third phases, although a very few instances of legally enshrined inequality remain. For example, same sex couples can register a civil partnership under the Civil Partnership Act 2004, but they cannot marry.[10] In the UK, it is clear that its full entry into the third phase is imminent; it seems highly probable that it will do so in 2007 or 2008. Prior to 2003, when the first dedicated measure combating sexual orientation was put in place, the signs that such a measure would be adopted were already apparent: the existence of pressure groups operating within the UK and abroad; and official recognition afforded to such groups in some other Western democracies coupled with instances in which their policies had been afforded a degree of legal recognition.[11] Moreover, instruments which are capable of affecting law and policy in the UK already enshrined guarantees of freedom from discrimination on this ground, including the European Convention on Human Rights and the International Convention on Civil and Political Rights. Recently, more far-reaching European legal 9 An example is afforded by the exclusion of women from the Anglican priesthood, an instance of 'first phase' discrimination which survived until 1994. 'First phase' discrimination in this context, although almost squeezed out of existence, will subsist: under the current arrangements, women priests cannot become bishops, although this appears to be about to change.

10 Although little turns on the legal distinction between marriage and civil partnership. The Act led to amendation of many areas of discrimination, such as property transfer on death, intestacy laws, enduring power of attorney and hospital access.

11 E.g., prior to the lifting of the ban on homosexuals serving in the armed forces in the UK, the armed forces in Belgium, Denmark, The Netherlands and Spain were all open to homosexuals. See further Homosexuality: A Community Issue, 1993, a report compiled by the European Human Rights Foundation.

instruments have been introduced, at international level, which already have and address discrimination on this ground domestically. Arguments in favour of discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation in various spheres such as housing may now be viewed as rooted only in prejudice: the social need to retain such discrimination is not apparent.[12] Prior to 2003, such prejudice was allowed relatively free rein and therefore could affect every area of life, from employment to expressions of sexuality, and since the UK until 2004 did not, in general, recognise same-sex partners, they suffered in comparison with heterosexual couples in relation to immigration, pensions and inheritance rights.[13]

Anti-assimilationism

Although this chapter concentrates on the extent to which the law has influenced equality of opportunity, it does not imply that all members of the groups in question will necessarily want the opportunity to adopt the way of life of the dominant group. Some women and some members of ethnic minorities believe that true equality means accepting and respecting different values rather than trying to extinguish them.[14] The notion of 'assimilationism' has come particularly under attack[15] in various writings on feminist legal theory, which have advocated the 'feminism of difference' and rejected the rights analysis of the liberal feminist.[16] Of course, there is a crucial difference here between the assertion of the values of groups of persons belonging to ethnic minorities and those of women, in that women will be committed to an enormous and disparate range of values and will therefore behave as differently from each other as men do.[17] However, assuming for the purposes of the argument that a body of values of a more nurturing, caring, conscience-based kind can be associated with women, just as certain values and beliefs can be associated with groups such as Sikhs or Muslims, it could be argued that such values are not necessarily opposed in their entirety to those of 12 Some Conservative opinion takes the view that homosexuality is a form of immorality which should be suppressed in order to uphold the moral bonds which keep society together. This view may derive from that expressed by Lord Devlin (The Maccabaean Lecture, The Enforcement of Morals, 1959, reprinted in 1965). It seems likely that this body of opinion would not support legislation aimed at preventing discrimination in, e.g., employment on grounds of sexual orientation. For discussion of Lord Devlin's view see Chapter 5, p 269.

13 See below, pp 1513 et seq.

14 E.g., MacKinnon, C, 'Toward feminist jurisprudence', 34 Stanford L Rev; Littleton, CA, 'Reconstructing sexual equality', in Bartlett, op. cit., fn 5.

15 See Gilligan, C, In A Different Voice: Psychological Theory and Women's Development, 1982, Harvard University Press. It should be noted that the 'feminism of difference' has itself come under attack from postmodern feminists as impoverished and limited in its assumption that there is essential commonality between all women. See Cain, P, 'Feminist jurisprudence: grounding the theories', in Bartlett and Kennedy, op. cit., fn 5, pp 265–68.

16 'Feminist rights analysis generally pretends that there are no differences between men and women and attempts to advance women by giving them the rights men have': Olsen, F, 'Statutory rape: a feminist critique of rights analysis', in Bartlett and Kennedy, op. cit., fn 5, p 312.

17 The argument that women can and should be viewed as a homogeneous group has been put by Martha Minow: 'cognitively we need simplifying categories and the unifying category of "woman" helps to organise experience even at the cost of denying some of it' (Minow, M, 'Feminist reason: getting it and losing it', 38 J Legal Educ 47, p 51).

the dominant group and, in any event, need not be rejected in seeking to overcome disadvantage. In suggesting this, the danger should be borne in mind that extreme forms of 'celebration of difference' may be merely another route to economic and political subjugation; history does not afford many examples of groups who overcame disadvantage by rejoicing in their rejection of the whole body of values which originally placed them in that position. In any event, despite a difference of emphasis, there is a measure of harmony between moderate anti-assimilationist theory and liberal rights theory as regards the need to protect people from discrimination on unjustifiable grounds by outlawing sex- and race-based disadvantages, so that women or members of ethnic minorities can choose whether or how far to accept – while perhaps working to modify – the lifestyle associated with the dominant group.

Discrimination and the law

This part begins, in the second section of Chapter 15, by considering and evaluating the domestic and European legislation aimed specifically at preventing discrimination based on certain protected grounds including those of race, sex and disability. The anti-discrimination scheme adopted in respect of disability is compared with those applicable to discrimination on grounds of sex or race. The chapter considers the means used in the legislation of distinguishing between relevant and irrelevant factors founding differentiation, since only the former provide a morally justifiable basis for different treatment. The legal means of ensuring that such distinctions can be made can then be contrasted with the failure so far to ensure that homosexuality per se is not regarded by the law as an irrelevant factor on which to base differentiation in such spheres as employment, housing and education.

Broadly, the legislation embodies two methods of challenging direct discrimination and discriminatory practices: under the first, the 'individual' method, the responsibility lies mainly with the victim of discrimination to bring an action against the discriminator, while under the second, termed the 'administrative' method, an institution or body uses various methods of seeking to ensure that discrimination is prevented. Chapter 15 moves on to consider the efficacy of the current legal model in practice.

The main emphasis of Chapter 15 will be on the tensions placed on the interpretation of the legislation, not only as claimants have sought to use it to do more than merely bring about formal equality, but also as they have sought to bring further grounds within the category of those that are protected. It will be apparent that a number of further grounds have received protection – the anti-discrimination schemes, both domestic and European, have widened their scope and are currently under pressure to widen still further. The potential of the Human Rights Act (HRA) to influence the domestic scheme in both respects is quite a significant theme, although, owing to the influence of EU law, the HRA is likely to have less influence in this context than in others considered by this book.

The anti-discrimination legislation focuses on certain specific and limited areas of activity, in particular that of employment. However, the use of anti-discrimination laws may be inefficacious in addressing specific life-style matters, such as employment detriment flowing from pregnancy. Therefore, laws other than dedicated anti-discrimination statutes are also considered subsisting alongside and providing an alternative to use of the specific anti-discrimination laws. Many aspects of discrimination on grounds of race were, in a very significant reform, brought within the race discrimination scheme by its amendment in 2000, and in 2007 the scheme relating to gender discrimination will follow suit. The extent to which the anti-discrimination schemes stand in the way of positive action designed to allow for equality of outcome will form an important theme.

Chapter 15

Anti-discrimination legislation

1 Introduction[1]

This chapter covers a vast, complex range of legislation aimed at curbing discrimination and promoting equality. But one of its key themes will be that the formal equality model on which most of this legislation is based is deeply flawed and may be standing in the way of achieving equality of outcome. Forty years ago, in the UK, protection from discrimination was only offered under the Race Relations Act 1976 and the Sex Discrimination Act 1975. Disability as a protected ground was included over ten years ago, and subsequently the grounds on which discrimination is prohibited have greatly increased: new protected grounds were added, including sexual orientation, age, religion and belief. The full list of protected grounds now includes: race, nationality, national origins, colour, gender, disability, gender reassignment, marital status, pregnancy, sexual orientation, age, religion and belief. So a range of statutes and regulations have been introduced, and amended, since 1975 when the Sex Discrimination Act was introduced, providing comprehensive protection from discrimination for the first time in UK law. In contrast to other areas of civil liberties and human rights considered in this book,

1 Texts referred to below: Clayton, R and Tomlinson, H, The Law of Human Rights, 2006, Chapter 17; Connolly, M, Discrimination Law, 2006, Sweet and Maxwell; Feldman, D, Civil Liberties 2nd edn, 2002, Chapter 3, (esp 3.4); Fredman, S, Discrimination Law, 2002, Clarendon; Connolly, M, Townshend-Smith on Discrimination Law: Text, Cases and Materials, 2nd edn, 2004, Routledge; EOC's Submission to the Discrimination Law Review, 2006; McColgan, A, Discrimination Law: Text, Cases and Materials, 2000, Hart; Ewing, K, Bradley, A and McColgan, A, Labour Law: Text and Materials, 2001, Hart; Hepple, B, Coussey, M and Choudhury, T, Equality: A New Framework – The Independent Review of the Enforcement of UK Anti-Discrimination Legislation, 2000, Hart; Fredman, S, The Future of Equality in Britain, EOC Working Paper No 5, 2002; Baker, A, The Enjoyment of Rights and Freedoms: a New Conception of the Ambit under Article 14 ECHR (2006) 69 MLR 714; Baker, A, 'Comparison Tainted by Justification: Against a "Compendious Question"' 2006 PL 476; Dine, J and Watt, B (eds), Discrimination Law, 1996, Longman; Palmer, Discrimination at Work, 3rd edn, 1996, Legal Action Group; McCrudden, C (ed), Anti-Discrimination Law, 1991, Dartmouth; Hepple, B and Szyszczak, E (eds), Discrimination and the Limits of the Law, 1992, Continuum; Collins, H, 'Discrimination, Equality and Social Inclusion' (2003) 66 MLR 16; Fredman, S, 'Equality: A New generation?' [2001] 30(2) ILJ 145–68; Johnes, G, Career Interruptions and Labour Market Outcomes (2006) EOC Paper No 45; von Prondzynski, F and Richards, W, 'Tackling indirect discrimination' [1995] PL 117; Gardner, J, 'Discrimination as injustice' (1996) 16(3) OJLS 353; Livingstone, S, 'Article 14 and the prevention of discrimination in the ECHR' (1997) EHRLR 25; Ewing, KD, 'The HRA and labour law' (1998) 27 ILJ 275; Deakin, S and Morris, J, Labour Law, 2nd edn, 1998, Butterworths, Chapter 6; Bindman, Discrimination Law, 2000; Gregory, J, Sex, Race and the Law: Legislating for Equality, 1987, Sage.

such as free speech, the common law had completely failed to provide protection in this area. The judicial culture that lay behind the failure of the common law to create tortious protection from discrimination is now, it is argued, evident in the strong judicial stance taken against affirmative action.[2]

The legislative schemes prohibiting discrimination all follow the same model. They set out the protected ground and define the forms of discrimination covered and the method of establishing discrimination. They then set out the contexts in which discrimination will be unlawful, provide defences, exclusions, procedures and remedies. Certain of the schemes, but not all, also set up an administrative body – a watchdog body that can aid aggrieved individuals and has a separate role in challenging discrimination. All the schemes concentrate heavily on the tort model – an individualistic remedial model – that is, one that relies on the aggrieved individual seeking a remedy. They are largely based on formal equality, on comparing like with like – meaning that the schemes are, apart from that relating to disability, symmetrical. In other words, they apply equally to members of the 'victim' group and the 'non-victim' group. For example, the Sexual Orientation Regulations were clearly aimed at employment disadvantage suffered by gays, but apply equally to homosexuals and heterosexuals. The Sex Discrimination Act was aimed at adverse treatment of women, but applies equally to women and men, and men have quite frequently taken advantage of it. The victim of discrimination must find an individual from a group without their regulated characteristic, and in a like situation, as a comparator. This symmetrical approach has created grave difficulties, especially in relation to pregnancy and harassment, since it is difficult to find a male equivalent of a pregnant or harassed woman, and this approach has meant that employers can argue that men and women are equally subjected to sexist taunts or adverse treatment for sickness (seeing pregnancy as an illness), and therefore women are not being discriminated against. Moreover, the formal equality model in the UK continues to bar the way to affirmative action. The use of this model in respect of the various protected grounds also means, depending on trade union involvement, or the involvement of the watchdog body, that a member of an already weak and disadvantaged group may find that their disadvantage is exacerbated by the burdensome process of bringing an action.[3]

But the similarity between the schemes must not be pressed too far – they are far from identical. It is clear that at present certain of the protected grounds are 'poor relations'. As Fredman puts it: 'a hierarchy of protection [is] established in the EU, with race given the widest reach, and disability, age, religion and sexual orientation the narrowest'.[4] There are significant differences between the current anti-discrimination schemes which highlight the weaknesses of some of them. Inequalities are created in the protection offered even in relation to the well-established grounds of race and gender. The schemes only apply arbitrarily to certain protected grounds. Protection from discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation is not covered in all the contexts in which discrimination on grounds of race or sex are covered. Previously no protection was available on this ground and so attempts were made through the courts to obtain it, using non-dedicated provisions, and may still be made, which were intended to extend the protection into contexts uncovered by the provisions. The protection on the ground of race is at present stronger, in a number of respects, than that on the ground of sex – although this is about to change. Since much of the legislation is EU-driven, the strongest protection is available in areas of EU competence. The net result is that a mass of complex and, in some respects, unsatisfactory law has gathered around certain protected grounds, while the protection offered varies between them. In respect of the newly protected grounds the protection is based, or partly based, on secondary legislation only, although bolstered by the doctrine of the supremacy of EU law, and is in many ways less extensive.

2 See below pp 1574–5.
3 See, especially, pp 1529–30, 1562–63, below.
4 Fredman, S, 'Equality: A New generation?' [2001] 30(2) ILJ 145–68 at p 145.

The current schemes are complex, tortuous and formalistic. The various anti-discrimination measures provide a protection against discrimination which has often been found to be patchy, inconsistent and ineffective.[5] At the same time it has also often been said that there is 'too much law' in this area. In the UK, there are three sources of the law in this context – domestic dedicated anti-discrimination statutes and regulations, the legislation of the European Union, and that of the European Convention on Human Rights which operates at the international level and domestically through the Human Rights Act. A further reason for the over-abundance of law is that a struggle is evident at every point in the schemes to take account of the needs of employers and others, bearing in mind that the private sector is affected, while affording recognition to the detriment that discrimination creates. Thus, measures have been carefully tempered by exception clauses, which have then in turn gathered complex legal accretions. In other words, there are strong indications, especially in the sexual orientation scheme, of reluctant and timid reform. Nowhere is such reluctance more evident, it will be argued, than in relation to the nature of the remedies and their delivery.

Nevertheless, this complex web of law acts as a symbolic affirmation of society's disapproval of discrimination, and arguably provides a focus for challenge that fuels determination to seek further change rather than distracting attention away from more fruitful avenues. It is important to remember when confronting a mass of very technical and complex legislation that it deals with the fundamental concept of equality: the technicality should not be allowed to obscure the end that is sought. But key themes of the chapter will be: that institutional change is more effective than placing the onus on the individual to seek change; that providing rights, such as flexible parental leave for both partners, may be more valuable than providing a remedy after a wrong has occurred; and that providing remedies for harms, such as the stress caused by harassment at work, may well be more valuable than asking an individual to demonstrate that unequal treatment has occurred.

This subject is vast and in a book of this length selectivity is necessary; this chapter will concentrate on anti-discrimination measures aimed at curbing discrimination on grounds of race, gender and sexual orientation. An overview only of the provisions relating to gender reassignment, pregnancy, marital status is offered. The disability provisions are looked at in somewhat more detail since there are certain significant characteristics unique to that scheme that single it out from all the others. Those protected grounds are chosen since, broadly speaking, the model used is similar in relation to the other protected grounds – age, religion and belief. They also illustrate the very significant changes that have occurred, driven by EU law. But while similarities in the legal tests and procedures are found using these examples, they also highlight the failure so far of equality legislation to provide equal protection from discrimination on the various protected grounds. This failure is highlighted with especial starkness when the strongest provisions – those available in respect of race – are compared with some of the weakest – those available in respect of discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation.

5 See the criticisms in Hepple, Coussey and Choudhury, op. cit., fn 1.

The chapter begins by indicating the sources of anti-discrimination law in the UK. It then moves on to consider the background to and ambit of the relevant statutes and regulations. It proceeds to take a closer look at certain of the protected grounds – race, gender, sexual orientation, disability, under the heads of: direct discrimination, indirect discrimination, lawful discrimination, harassment and victimisation, positive action, remedies and enforcement. Finally it turns to considering the work of the equality Commissions. The chapter ends with consideration of the future – of moving away from the formal equality model, and indeed away from anti-discrimination legislation, in favour of addressing specific problems and harms, towards a new conception of equality.

2 Sources of anti-discrimination law

In the UK there are three strands of law, deriving from the domestic schemes, the legislation of the European Union, and from the European Convention on Human Rights. The Human Rights Act (HRA) has complicated the issue since it has introduced a form of anti-discrimination law into domestic law – Article 14 – but has given it a lesser status than EU law. At the same time, at the international and domestic level, the Convention is a source of general principles for EU law.

European Union law

Anti-discrimination law in the UK cannot be studied without taking into account European Union law, which has been a highly significant influence. EU law has led to the introduction of provisions prohibiting discrimination outside the established areas of gender and race. Treaty Articles have both direct and horizontal effect and, therefore, Art 141 EC Treaty, which provides for equal pay for equal work without discrimination on grounds of sex, can be enforced in domestic courts against private and state bodies through the vehicle of the Equal Pay Act (below).[6] In other words, the provisions of the Act can be ignored or twisted out of their natural meaning in order to give effect to Art 141.[7] Directives, in contrast, only have vertical effect; they can, if sufficiently precise, clear and unconditional, be enforced against state bodies – emanations of the state.[8] Also, they can have indirect horizontal effect against private bodies through interpretation.[9] They can also by this means have indirect vertical effect (the interpretative obligation can be employed in an action in reliance on the domestic implementing legislation where the respondent is a state body).

6 See Biggs v Somerset CC [1996] IRLR 203.

7 See Worringham v Lloyds Bank plc Case C-69/80 [1981] ECR 767; for the CA decision, see [1982] IRLR 84.

8 See Francovich v Italy [1992] 21 IRLR 84; [1991] ECR I-5357; [1995] ICR 722.

9 Through s 2(4) of the European Communities Act 1972.

Sex discrimination law was until recently the only area directly affected. Article 119 of the Treaty of Rome, which was signed by Britain in 1973, governed the principle of equal pay for equal work. It is now Art 141 of the EC Treaty. It is amplified by the Equal Pay Directive 75/117, while the Equal Treatment Directive 76/207 and the Pregnancy Directive 92/85 govern other aspects of sexual discrimination. The Burden of Proof Directive affected the anti-sex discrimination scheme, as indicated below. Until 2003 domestic race discrimination provisions were influenced indirectly but they were then expressly covered by the Race Directive.[10]

There have been a number of further very significant developments, widening and deepening the protection from discrimination.[11] The Race Directive, extending beyond the employment field, which was implemented in 2003, brought race discrimination within the direct coverage of EC law for the first time. Article 39 EC Treaty covers nationality discrimination in employment. The very significant Framework Directive on equal opportunities in employment, adopted, like the Race Directive, under Art 13 of the EC Treaty,[12] allowed for the extension of anti-discrimination measures into the new areas of discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation, age, religion and belief. The Framework Directive also improved the protection offered by the Sex Discrimination Act. Development in this area continues apace. The Equal Treatment in Goods and Services Directive[13] extends Community discrimination law to the fields of supply of goods and services. Council Directive 2006/54/EC, described as a Directive 'on the implementation of the principle of equal opportunities and equal treatment of men and women in matters of employment and occupation', consolidates a number of previous Directives in this area, notably, the Directive 76/207/EEC.[14] The new Directive has to be implemented by member states by 15 August 2008.

Thus, there was clear pressure emanating from the EU to develop a broader and stronger anti-discrimination programme domestically. The largely EU-driven reforms are having two effects. First, the depth and impact of the current established domestic provisions relating to discrimination on grounds of sex, gender reassignment, race and disability, has been strengthened. Second, the anti-discrimination programme has broadened so that discrimination on new bases, in particular that of sexual orientation, but also that of transsexuality per se, is recognised within the law as unjustifiable.

10 Dir 2000/43/EC; Com 2000 328 (01), adopted in June 2000 by the Council of Ministers. The 'Race Directive' came into force on 19 July 2000 and was implemented by member states within three years of this date (for comment, see Lord Lester of Herne Hill QC, 'New European equality measures' [2000] PL 562).

11 For discussion, see Lord Lester of Herne Hill QC, ibid.

12 For discussion of Art 13, which was added by the Amsterdam Treaty, see Bell [1999] 6 Maastricht J of European and Comp Law 5.

13 Dir 2004/113/EC, due in force by 21 December 2007.

14 The consolidated Directives are: No 75/117 on equal pay for men and women; No 76/207 on equal treatment for men and women relating to access to employment; No 2002/73, amending Directive No 76/207, on equal treatment for men and women relating to employment, vocational training and promotion and working conditions; No 86/378 on equal treatment for men and women in occupational social security schemes; No 96/97, amending Directive No 86/378, on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women in occupational social security schemes; No 97/80 on the burden of proof in cases of discrimination based on sex; No 98/52 on the extension of Directive No 97/80 to the UK.

The commitment of the EU to equality currently receives its most broad and dramatic expression in The Charter of Fundamental Rights, which provides in Art 21(1):

> Any discrimination based on any ground such as sex, race, colour, ethnic or social origin, genetic features, language, religion or belief, political or any other opinion, membership of a national minority, property, birth, disability, age or sexual orientation shall be prohibited.

This is the broadest anti-discrimination measure in EU law in that it refers to a range of protected grounds and is not confined to the sphere of employment. It was to become part of the EU Constitution, but in 2005 the referenda in both France and the Netherlands rejected adoption of the Constitution. At present it is merely waiting in the wings, but it can be referred to in the European Court of Justice, so it may be viewed as having some impact on the development of EU law; it is an indication of the extent to which the concept of equality lies at the heart of the EU. Institutional change is also ongoing; in 2003, the European Council of Ministers agreed to create a new Fundamental Rights Agency (FRA) for the European Union, which will be broadly similar in remit, although by no means identical, to the new Commission for Equality and Human Rights in the UK, set up in 2007. The FRA's remit will cover all areas of equality, except gender, which is to be covered by a separate institute.

Domestic Anti-Discrimination Legislation – overview

There is a bewildering amount of dedicated domestic legislation in this area and it is rapidly, albeit incrementally, increasing, so an overview is of use. The HRA also makes an important contribution in this field which is considered below. As discussed below, the provisions were broadened in scope and new protected grounds were added under the impetus of EU law. The provisions are enumerated in the order in which they were introduced. The Sex Discrimination Act 1975 (SDA), as amended a number of times,[15] and most recently in 2005, covers discrimination on a number of protected grounds: sex, pregnancy, marital status and gender reassignment. The Equal Pay Act 1970 (EPA), as amended, covers sex discrimination in pay. The Sex Discrimination (Amendment) Regulations 2003 and the Employment (Equality) Sex Discrimination Regulations 2005 were also introduced into domestic law to implement the relevant aspects of the Framework Directive.[16] The Race Relations Act 1976, (RRA) as amended, covers discrimination on grounds of race, nationality, colour, ethnicity, national origins. The Disability Discrimination Act 1995 (DDA), as amended, covers discrimination on grounds of disability. The employment provisions in the 1995 Act were amended in 2003[17] and again in 2005 under the Disability Discrimination Act 2005. Thus, various, mainly EU driven, amendments were made to the SDA, RRA and DDA, since they were introduced 15 See SI 2001/2660, the Sex Discrimination (Indirect Discrimination and Burden of Proof) Regulations 2001, in force from 12 October 2001. For discussion, see Guild (2000) 29 ILJ 416.

16 Dir 2000/78/EC. Adopted under Art 13 of the Treaty Establishing the European Community (TEC).

17 By the Disability Discrimination Act (Amendment Regulations) 2003, passed in response to the Framework Directive.

which had the effect of both widening and strengthening the protection offered.[18] All these statutes cover discrimination in the contexts of employment, education, housing, the provision of goods and services, but not all the protected grounds are covered within all of these contexts, as explained below.

A number of new protected grounds – sexual orientation, age, religion and belief, had to be recognised in domestic law in order to implement European Council Directive 2000/78/EC (the Framework Directive). The Employment Equality (Sexual Orientation) Regulations 2003 cover discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation, but only in the context of employment. Part 3 of the Equality Act 2006 provides a power to extend the coverage of the regulations into other fields, and in January 2007 the Sexual Orientation (Goods and Services) Regulations were passed by Parliament to apply in Northern Ireland. The equivalent regulations for Britain are expected to be introduced into Parliament in 2007.[19] The Employment Equality (Religion or Belief) Regulations 2003 cover discrimination on grounds of religion or belief, but only in the context of employment. However, Part 2 of the Equality Act 2006 extended the coverage to premises, education, the provision of goods, facilities and services. The Employment Equality (Age) Regulations 2006,[20] creating protection for discrimination on grounds of age in employment, came into force in 2006.

The Equality Act 2006, as indicated, is not a comprehensive equality statute, bringing all anti-discrimination provisions together in one statute, and eliminating the gaps and anomalies in the protection. However, it improved the protection for discrimination based on religion and provided powers to improve it for discrimination based on sexual orientation. It also set up the new Commission for Equality and Human Rights (CEHR). A comprehensive, all encompassing Single Equality Act which would streamline all these equality provisions, is in contemplation at the present time.[21]

The Human Rights Act and the European Convention on Human Rights

The EU provisions are in many respects more valuable than the guarantee of freedom from discrimination under Art 14 of the European Convention, partly because they may override domestic statutory provisions in domestic courts,[22] and partly because, as Chapter 2 explained, Art 14 only covers areas falling within the scope of the other 18 Directive 97/80, the Burden of Proof Directive, implemented in the Sex Discrimination (Indirect Discrimination and Burden of Proof) Regulations 2001 (SI 2001/2660), affected the anti-sex discrimination scheme as did the Framework Directive on equal opportunities in employment.

19 In order to implement the Equal Treatment in Goods and Services Directive.

20 SI 2006/1036.

21 See www.womenandequalityunit.gov.uk/dlr.

22 In general, EU directives are enforceable in national courts only against the state or against bodies under the control of the state (Foster v British Gas plc [1990] 3 All ER 897) but not against private bodies. However, it was found in Francovich v Italy [1992] 21 IRLR 84; [1991] ECR I-5357; [1995] ICR 722 that an individual who suffers loss at the hands of a private body owing to the state's failure to undertake full implementation of a directive may have a claim against the state. See further Ellis, E, European Community Sex Equality Law, 2nd edn, 1998, Clarendon, Chapter 4. For discussion of the influence of EU equality laws, see McCrudden (1993) 13 OJLS 320; Ellis [1994] 31 CMLR 43.

Articles,[23] although the other Article may be viewed as having an extended ambit where Art 14 is also argued.[24] This limitation was highlighted in Botta v Italy.[25] The European Court of Human Rights considered a claim that the lack of disabled facilities at a seaside resort violated the applicant's right to equal enjoyment of his right to respect for private life under Art 8 read together with Art 14. The claim was rejected on the basis that 'social' rights, such as the participation of disabled people in recreational facilities, fall outside Art 8. Therefore, Art 14 did not apply. If, even on an extended view of the ambit of a Convention right, it would still be very difficult to show that any right applied, Art 14 cannot be employed.

Even where Art 14 may apply, Strasbourg has often been reluctant to afford it separate consideration, if a breach of another Convention right is established.[26] Where Art 14 has been considered, it has been afforded a narrow interpretation by the Commission. For example, in Stedman v UK[27] a requirement to work on a Sunday led to the dismissal of the applicant, who had religious objections to Sunday working. It was found by the Commission that a general requirement that has a disproportionate impact on one group is not discriminatory. This decision suggests that Art 14 does not recognise indirect discrimination, although it is not conclusive of that matter,[28] and also that, as Ewing puts it, 'the Convention rights can be qualified by contract'.[29] This is far from meaning, however, that Art 14 is of limited value in this area.

The Court tends to adhere to a more developed conception of discrimination and has departed, as it has done in some other contexts, from the stance taken by the Commission. In Schuler-Zgraggen v Switzerland[30] the Court said: 'the advancement of the equality of the sexes is today a major goal in the member states of the Council of Europe and very weighty reasons would have to be put forward before such a difference of treatment [as occurred in the instant case] could be regarded as compatible with the Convention.'[31] The Court has recognised that positive discrimination may be appropriate in some circumstances; it has said that the guarantee under Art 14 will be violated where persons in analogous situations are treated differently where there is no objective and reasonable justification, but also where states without such justification fail to treat differently persons whose situations are significantly different.[32]

Further, Art 14 covers discrimination on a wide range of bases and therefore, combined with Art 8 or, in some circumstances, a range of the Articles, in particular Arts 5, 6, 10 or 11, it can be used to address discrimination that is currently outside the

23 See Chapter 2, p 108.

24 See Baker, A, 'The Enjoyment of Rights and Freedoms: A New Conception of the "Ambit" under Article 14 ECHR' [2006] 89 MLR 714; 'Article 14 ECHR: A Protector, Not a Prosecutor' in Fenwick, H, Phillipson, G and Masterman, R (eds), Judicial Reasoning and the Human Rights Act 1998, 2007.

25 (1998) 26 EHRR 241.

26 See Dudgeon v UK (1982) 4 EHRR 149, para 69; discussed in Chapter 2, pp 81–82.

27 (1997) 23 EHRR CD 168.

28 It should be compared with Thlimmenos v Greece, Judgment of 6 April 2000 which could be viewed as opening the door to recognition of indirect discrimination.

29 Ewing, op. cit., fn 1, p 288.

30 (1993) 16 EHRR 405, para 22; see also Van Raalte v Netherlands (1997) 24 EHRR 503, para 39.

31 See further Livingstone, op. cit., fn 1; Ewing, op. cit., fn 1, p 288; Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 17.

32 Thlimmenos v Greece, judgment of 6 April 2000.

EC or domestic anti-discrimination schemes. For example, it can be used to attack discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation or of religion, in contexts that are not covered under the domestic schemes discussed below, or under the current EU schemes.[33] It can also, very significantly, fill gaps in those schemes even within the contexts they do cover. But the HRA itself curbs the effect of the Convention since it only binds public authorities under s 6. Since it currently appears that the HRA does not create direct horizontal effect,[34] its impact in this area is subject to certain limitations.

If a standard public authority, or a functional public authority acting in its public function, discriminates in a manner that could be addressed by Art 8 in conjunction with Art 14, or Art 8 alone, a free-standing action could be brought against it under s 7(1)(a) HRA, although not in an Employment Tribunal (ET) which has no jurisdiction to hear such claims. If a discriminatory measure is contained in a statute, s 3 HRA and Arts 8 (or another relevant Article) and 14 can be brought to bear upon the offending provision. Section 3 can apply to the statutory anti-discrimination measures, including the SDA and RRA, if it appears that there is a potential gap in the provisions where, under Arts 14 and 8 combined, a remedy would be available. As discussed below, this may open the possibility of bringing some forms of discrimination within the Sex Discrimination Act that are not currently covered by it. The problem is that the statutory scheme is limited to discrimination on certain grounds and it may not be possible to interpret the provisions widely enough to cover other forms of discrimination. But by this route, it is possible that gaps in the statutory schemes, including the scheme relating to disability, could be narrowed. Section 3 and Art 14 (so long as another Article is relevant) can also have an effect on any relevant statutory provision, such as the provisions affecting unfair dismissal,[35] meaning that Art 14's anti-discrimination protection has a very wide-ranging potential, on both neutral and overtly discriminatory provisions. Since this area of law is largely (although not wholly) covered by statute, Arts 8 and 14 combined can have quite a wide ranging indirect horizontal effect. A number of discrimination claims are, however, brought in Employment Tribunals, and an ET's powers to give effect to Convention rights are limited in a number of significant respects, even beyond the limitations already imposed by the HRA. Apart from its inability to hear s 7(1)(a) HRA claims, ETs and the Employment Appeal Tribunal (EAT) have no power to make a declaration of incompatibility.[36] This limitation means on occasion that an ET cannot provide a remedy to a claimant even where it has found that an individual's Convention rights have been infringed. It can merely refer the matter to the Court of Appeal, which does have the power to make a declaration of incompatibility.[37] An ET is also in the same position as are courts in general under the HRA in that if a provision in domestic legislation is found to be incompatible with Convention rights, it has no power to disapply the incompatible provision, and has to give effect to it as it stands. This contrasts with the position in cases where domestic law is incompatible with an European Directive or EC Treaty, where the ET can disapply the domestic law.

33 See Chapter 2, pp 108–9.

34 See Chapter 4, pp 250–56 and Chapter 9, pp 824–26, 902–15.

35 See X v Y [2004] IRLR 471; ICR 1634 in which the Employment Appeals Tribunal (EAT) laid out the way that Art 14 could affect unfair dismissal and other statutory claims in Tribunals. It is not possible to bring a claim for 'breach of Convention rights' in the ET under s 7(1)(a) HRA, but a claimant can argue that the HRA requires that UK legislation be interpreted in a particular way so as not to breach her Convention rights. This approach was taken in X v Y and in Pay v Lancashire Probation Service [2004] IRLR 129. In both instances claimants were dismissed due to their activities outside work. Each claimant claimed that such a dismissal was necessarily unfair under the Employment Rights Act 1996 (ERA), because it involved an infringement of their right to respect for their private life under Art 8 and their right of freedom of expression under Art 10. The dismissal in each case was found to be fair on the facts of the case, but the EAT in Pay and the Court of Appeal in X v Y agreed that when deciding whether an employer has acted reasonably in dismissing an employee, the ET should interpret the words 'reasonably or unreasonably' in s 98(4) of the ERA as meaning 'reasonably or unreasonably having regard to the applicant's Convention rights'. In X v Y the Court of Appeal said that the effect of this was that it would not normally be fair for an employer to dismiss an employee for a reason which was an unjustified interference with the employee's private life.

Where a provision in itself appears to be compatible with the relevant Convention Article(s) that of course does not exhaust the duty of the court/tribunal in relation to the Convention, due to s 6 HRA. When a court or tribunal is applying statutory provisions, including anti-discrimination statutes, in relation to, for example, an employment matter, it must abide by its duty under s 6 HRA, which means applying the provision compatibly with Art 14 (assuming that another Convention right touches on the matter at hand).

Thus, unless the courts eventually take the view that they themselves, as public bodies, must seek to ensure that an applicant obtains his or her Convention rights – which they are unlikely to do – the anti-discrimination provisions of Arts 14 and another Article (usually Art 8) combined are not directly justiciable against private bodies, except as a matter of interpretation or application where a statute applies and s 3 or s 6 HRA – or both – have an impact. It is hard to see that indirect horizontal effect could be created by seeking to develop the existing common law under the impetus of s 6 of the HRA[38] since the common law has failed so far to develop any anti-discrimination remedies. Thus, the potential of Art 14 domestically is doubly limited – first by its own inherent limitation, since it is non-free standing, and second by the lack of direct horizontal effect under the HRA. In general, therefore, it is not expected that at present the impact of the HRA in this context will be very great, although in respect of certain current areas in which discrimination can occur unchecked it may be of great value, while it may also be valuable in extending the meaning of statutory provisions, by considering the effect of Arts 8 and 14 read together. This is an instance therefore in which EU law is of far more significance than the ECHR in the private sector due to the lack of private common law on which the Convention can bite via s 6 HRA.

36 As Chapter 4 pointed out, only those courts listed in s 4(5) HRA (the High Court, Court of Appeal and House of Lords, and the High Court of Justiciary and Court of Session in Scotland) can make such a declaration.

37 In e.g. Whittaker v P&M Watson Haulage (EAT 157/01, unreported) both the ET and EAT held that the exclusion then in place in the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 for employers with less than 15 employees was incompatible with Art 6 of the ECHR because it contravened Mr Whittaker's right to have his claim regarding his civil rights heard. However, the EAT could not provide Mr Whittaker with a remedy, because it was not possible to interpret the DDA compatibly with his Convention rights, so it had to apply the DDA as drafted. It could not make a declaration of the incompatibility. All it could do was to refer the matter to the Court of Appeal, which did have the power to make a declaration of incompatibility.

38 As occurred in Douglas v Hello! [2001] 2 WLR 992; see Chapter 9, pp 903–5, and Chapter 4, p 252; Campbell – see Chapter 4, pp 253–55, and Chapter 9, pp 826, 911–13.

Where another Article and Art 14 combined cover the same area as EU provisions, they can be used as a source of general principles for the interpretation of the EU law, under Art 6 of the Treaty of Rome (now Art 13, as amended by the Amsterdam Treaty). The EU provisions can override domestic law and, therefore, by this means those Convention Articles could be given, in a sense, further effect than the HRA allows them. Thus, for example, an applicant bringing an action against a private body and seeking to rely on the Sex Discrimination Act in respect of discrimination on grounds of gender reassignment in a context excluded from the Act, could begin by arguing that s 3 of the HRA should be used to broaden the meaning of the Act in reliance on Arts 8 and 14. If this failed, on the basis that such an interpretation would amount to legislating, the applicant could rely on s 2(4) of the European Communities Act 1972[39] in arguing that the interpretation in question should be adopted in order to satisfy the demands of the Equal Treatment Directive or any other relevant Directive.[40] At that stage, in order to determine the requirements of the Directive, Strasbourg jurisprudence on Arts 8 and 14 could re-enter the argument. This possibility could be even more significant in relation to the domestic measures that have been adopted in response to the Framework and Race Directives.

As Chapter 2 explained, Protocol 12 provides a free-standing right to freedom from discrimination.[41] Protocol 12 is evidence of a clear recognition of the weakness of the anti-discrimination measure under Art 14 of the Convention, and its existence may be prompting the European Court of Human Rights to move away from its previous stance under Art 14 in favour of a more developed and determined position on anti-discrimination under that Article, even prior to the ratification of Protocol 12. If Protocol 12 is eventually ratified by the UK and then included in Sched 1 to the HRA, it will have a far reaching impact in this context, since a free-standing right to non-discrimination on a wide range of grounds, including those of sexual orientation or religion, would then be created, which would have direct effect as against public authorities. It might also have an impact on the currently protected grounds since it could be relied upon in an attempt to extend or fill gaps in the legislation. Thus, it would create new rights against public authorities and, possibly, via statute, against both public and private bodies. At present, Protocol 12 has not been ratified and the government is opposed to ratification.

3 Domestic anti-discrimination measures

Discrimination on grounds of sex[42]

At common law and under statute, women were historically subject to a number of legal disabilities, but the end of the 19th and the beginning of the twentieth century saw

39 See Chapter 3, p 152.

40 See pp 1504–5, below.

41 See p 106 for further discussion, see Khaliq, V, 'Protocol 12 to the ECHR: a step forward or a step too far?' [2001] PL 457.

42 Texts referred to: Deakin and Morris, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 6; von Prondzynski and Richards, op. cit., fn 1; Connolly, M, op. cit., fn 1; Barnard, C and Hepple, B, 'Substantive equality' (2000) 59(3) CLJ 562; Hepple, Coussey and Choudhury, op. cit., fn 1; Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 17; McColgan, op. cit., fn 1; Honeyball, Sex, Employment and the Law, 1991, Blackwell; McCrudden, op. cit., fn 1; Rhode, D, Justice and Gender: Sex Discrimination and the Law, 1989; Fenwick, H and Hervey, T, the gradual removal of such disabilities by statute. Women obtained the right to sign contracts, to own property irrespective of their marital status, to vote and to stand for Parliament. The Sex Disqualification (Removal) Act 1919 removed any disqualification by way of sex or marriage for those who wished to exercise a public function, hold a civil or judicial office, enter any civil profession or vocation or be admitted to any incorporated society. However, the marriage bar continued to operate in many jobs until the Second World War.[43] Once these disabilities had been removed there was opposition to further legislation.[44] It was thought that the barriers preventing women entering public life were down and therefore further measures were unnecessary. However, the fact that women were, for the first time, able to enter the public domain did not mean that they were accepted there. Theoretically, women had the same opportunities as men but, in practice, since there were no formal barriers to discrimination by employers and others, these practices continued. It may be assumed that this was due in part to prejudice and in part to the operation of the market which had no interest in ensuring better treatment for a group of employees who could traditionally be treated badly. Employers openly paid the 'women's' rate for the job,[45] a lower rate than that for men, and openly refused to appoint women above a certain level or to do certain jobs.[46] Under the common law, it was immaterial that the grounds for such decisions might be capricious or reprehensible.

The view taken in the 1974 White Paper on Sex Discrimination preceding the 1975 Act was that women were being held back in employment and other fields because they were not being judged on their individual merits, but on the basis of a general presumption of inferiority. It was apparent that the common law was not going to bring about change, partly because the judiciary saw the creation of a comprehensive anti-discrimination code as the province of Parliament but also because, even in the 1970s, sympathy with discriminatory practices was evident among certain judges. In Morris v Duke-Cohen,[47] for example, a judge was prepared to find a solicitor negligent

'Sex equality in the Single Market: new directions for the European Court of Justice' [1995] 32 CMLR 443–70; Hervey, T, Justifications for Sex Discrimination in Employment, 1993, Butterworths; Ellis, 'The definition of discrimination in EC sex equality law' (1994) 19 EL Rev 563; Millar and Phillips, 'Evaluating anti-discrimination legislation in the UK: some issues and approaches' (1983) 11 Int J Soc Law 417; McGinley, 'Judicial approaches to sex discrimination in US and UK – a comparative study' (1986) 59 MLR 413, p 415; on pregnancy, see Conaghan (1993) 20 JLS 71. Current reading: Fredman, S, Women and the Law, 1997, Clarendon, esp Chapters 5, 7, 9; McGlynn, C, 'Reclaiming a feminist vision: the reconciliation of paid work and family life in EU law and policy' (2001) 7 Columbia Journal of European Law 241; Atkins and Hoggett, Women and the Law, 1984, Blackwell, pp 1–63 for background; Pannick, D, Sex Discrimination Law, 1985, Clarendon; Bourne, C and Whitmore, J, Anti-discrimination Law in Britain, 3rd edn, 1996, Sweet and Maxwell; Fuller, A, Unwin, Lorna and Beck, V, (2005) Employers, young people and gender segregation. Equal Opportunities Commission Working Paper Series No 28, Manchester: EOC

43 The 1919 Act was found to mean only that the employers must lift restrictions on women; it did not prevent particular employers imposing restrictions on women and it gave rise to no right of litigation: see Price v Rhondda Urban Council [1923] 2 Ch 372.

44 Atkins and Hoggett Women and the Law, 1984 note the lack of Parliamentary concern about women at work and failure to debate the problem, p 19.

45 In 1970, women's average pay was 63.1% that of men (EOC, Annual Report 1988, p 45).

46 The study by National Segregation 1979 showed that by 1971, over half of all men were in occupations where they outnumbered women by at least 9 to 1 and 77% worked in occupations which were at least 70% male.

47 (1975) 120 SJ 826.

for taking advice from a wife when a husband was available, on the basis that a sensible wife would expect her husband to make the major decisions.

Formal and substantive equality

The Sex Discrimination Act 1975 affords recognition to two competing views as to the most effective means of securing equality: the so called formal equality approach and the substantive equality or pluralist approach.[48] The former, which, as mentioned above, is based on classic liberalism and is the dominant approach, assumes that in a just society, the sex of a person would carry no expectations with it; it would be as irrelevant as their eye colour. It takes the view that women and men are equally able to take advantage of opportunities and that therefore, if a similarly situated man would also have been treated adversely, no discrimination has occurred. Thus, once specific instances of differential treatment based on sex are prevented or addressed, under this approach women would no longer be viewed as placed at a disadvantage.

The formal equality approach has some strong advantages which should not be forgotten. It is intuitively appealing – in the sense that it is self-evidently 'fair' to treat like as like rather than favouring males. If pre-SDA women were treated on the basis of an unfounded assumption of inferiority, conversely men were treated on the basis of an unfounded assumption of superiority. Thus it appears, up to a point, to promote competition: in effect, positive action in favour of men meant that they were insulated from competition with women. In fact, positive action in favour of men took the form of reverse discrimination: however high the claims of the woman candidate for, for example, higher education, based on merit, they were irrelevant since they would always be displaced by the claims of a male, even if wholly inferior in terms of merit. In higher education, for example, during the nineteenth century and part of the 20th, men obtained places in Universities in competition only with other men. This was also the case in respect of almost all professions. In other words, men obtained preferential treatment based purely on gender and not on merit – they were protected from competition. The current situation in which men, at least in respect of education and the lower reaches of all professions – except the armed services and some religious orders – are in effect forced by the SDA to compete on equal terms with women, aids in ensuring that the better candidate is chosen rather than the male candidate. Private clubs, certain sporting associations, the armed services (in terms of restrictions relating to direct combat) and the Catholic Church enjoy the dubious distinction of continuing to discriminate.

But the formal equality approach has limitations since it only inquires into equal treatment of those in like situations. The substantive equality approach, on the other hand, which was imported from the US,[49] takes a number of factors, such as past discrimination or social conditioning, into account and asks whether policies and practices which are neutral on their face actually have an adverse impact on women owing to factors which particularly affect them. It accepts that there may be differences between the situations of men and women, but holds that penalties should not inevitably attach to the recognition of those differences. This approach derives from the Supreme Court decision in Griggs v Duke Power Company;[50] when the defendant company administered an aptitude test to all job applicants it was shown that significantly fewer blacks than whites passed the test and that the skills examined by the test were not particularly relevant to the jobs applied for. In these circumstances, it was held that the test was discriminatory.[51] This latter approach is given some recognition in the SDA within the concept of indirect discrimination.

48 See Gardner (1989) 9 OJLS 1 and Brest (1976) 90 Harv LR 1 on the different philosophies apparent in the legislation.

49 For a comparative discussion of the approaches to UK and US discrimination, see McGinley, op. cit., fn 59.

In the context of sex discrimination, the use of aptitude or other tests would be unlikely to disadvantage women. But past discriminatory practices – although their effects are becoming less apparent – might do so.[52] Most significantly, the effect of child-caring responsibilities tend to do so: for example, currently more women than men are single parents. Further, as discussed below, although this is changing rapidly, men have not fully accepted an equal share of child-care responsibilities,[53] and parental leave is still not equally available to both men and women, although the Work and Families Act 2006 will bring about some improvements in that position.[54] Discrimination based purely on gender appears to be dying out gradually; once women entered education and the professions on equal terms with men, directly discriminatory arguments that women were unsuitable for certain jobs, or could not perform at the same level as boys in certain subjects were abandoned;[55] indeed, in education the problem of under-performance of boys compared to girls is a constant feature of educational debate. As indicated below, discrimination against women now relates far more to pregnancy and childcare, and to unconscious or conscious stereotyping relating to maternity, than to gender per se.[56] But when employment detriment based on maternity arises it is more effectively addressed as a free-standing harm, rather than as discrimination. This point gives rise to consideration of the statutory protections for maternity, outside the SDA. Although indirect discrimination is an aspect of substantive equality, its recognition in the SDA relies only on addressing inequality of treatment; it does not ensure equality of outcome.

Child care responsibilities and flexible working

A number of measures emanating from the EU have had some effect on the work/life balance, including the Working Time Directive,[57] which was implemented in the Working Time Regulations 1998.[58] But it is generally accepted that while the regulations have had some impact on the long hours culture of the UK,[59] it has not been of a radical

50 (1971) 401 US 424.
51 For further discussion in the US context see Wilborn, 'The disparate impact model of discrimination: theory and limits' (1985) 34 American University L Rev 799.
52 See Steel v Post Office [1977] IRLR 288.
53 See Johnes, G, Career Interruptions and Labour Market Outcomes (2006) EOC Paper No 45.
54 See p 1492 below.
55 The discussion of indirect discrimination on grounds of sex (see pp 1539–44) indicates that current discrimination tends to relate to maternity, not to gender per se.
56 Miller, L, Neathey, F, Pollard, E and Hill, D, (2004) Occupational segregation, gender gaps and skill gaps. Equal Opportunities Commission Working Paper Series No 15, Manchester: EOC.
57 Directive 93/104/EC.
58 SI 1998/1833.
59 See the TUC Report, March 2001 'Burnout Britain' factsheet, www.tuc.org.uk.

nature, partly because of the possibilities of opting out of the provisions.[60] The Part-Time Workers Directive[61] was implemented in the Part-Time Workers (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) Regulations 2000.[62] The regulations prohibit discrimination against part-time workers. But the employee must point to a comparator under the regulations, although possibly to a hypothetical comparator under the Directive, and must show that he or she has been treated unfavourably in comparison with a comparable employee working full-time, on the ground of part-time working. The unfavourable treatment can be justified. Thus, the scheme was always likely to be limited in its effects; it was estimated that, owing to the need to find an appropriate comparator, it was likely to affect only about 7% of UK part-time workers.[63] The regulations do not provide a right to work part-time or to work flexible hours to accommodate caring responsibilities, or to job-share. In order for employees to seek to assert such rights, they must use, as indicated above, the difficult route provided by the SDA.

Thus, although social patterns are changing,[64] and men increasingly have responsibilities as carers, the current gendered divide in caring responsibilities[65] has not elicited a legislative response that fully recognises that divide, thus sometimes forcing women into a dependency on men or on the state which may result in a blighting of their lives and those of their children.[66] As Johnes has found, such dependency is linked to educational levels;[67] those already in the weaker positions in the labour market[68] tend to weaken their positions further by leaving it for periods of time. Child-rearers and other carers with relatively high levels of education are more likely to continue working full-time, and unlikely to leave labour market employment altogether. Conversely, those with 60 See further Ewing, Bradley and McColgan, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 4, pp 411–13.

61 Directive 96/34/EC.

62 SI 2000/1551.

63 Government's Regulatory Impact Assessment.

64 See Chartered Institute of Personnel and Development (2004) Flexible working and paternity leave. Available at: http://www.cipd.co.uk/NR/rdonlyres/AE77D6F3–99DA-4845-A0B6-FE027C466C01/0/paternity1004.pdf; Weiss, C.R. (2001) 'On flexibility', Journal of Economic Behavior and Organisation, 46: 347–56.

65 See Brewer, M and Paull, G, Newborns and new schools: critical times in women's employment, 2006, Research Report No 308 London: Department for Work and Pensions; Henz, U, 'The effects of informal care on paid-work participation in Great Britain: a lifecourse perspective', (2004) Ageing and Society, 24: 851–80; Henz, U, 'Informal caregiving at working age: effects of job characteristics and family configuration', (2006) Journal of Marriage and Family, forthcoming; Maher, J and Green, H, Carers 2000, 2002, Norwich: Office for National Statistics.

66 See Cabinet Office Briefing: Women's Incomes Over the Lifetime and Women and Men in the UK: Facts and Figures (www.women.unit.gov.uk/publications.htm); Darton, D and Hurrell, K, People working part-time below their potential, 2005, Equal Opportunities Commission; Free to choose: tackling gender barriers to better jobs; Greater expectations, (2005) Equal Opportunities Commission; Grant, L, Yeandle, S and Buckner, L, Working below potential: women and part-time work, 2005, Equal Opportunities Commission Working Paper Series No 19 Sigle-Rushton, W and Perrons, D, Employment transitions over the life cycle: a statistical analysis, 2006, Equal Opportunities Commission Working Paper Series No 46, Manchester: EOC. Walling, A, 'Families and work', Labour Market Trends, 2005 July: pp 275–83.

67 See Johnes, G, Career Interruptions and Labour Market Outcomes (2006) EOC Paper No 45.

68 See: (2005) Part-time is no crime - so why the penalty?, Equal Opportunities Commission; Francesconi, M and Gosling, A, Career paths of part-time workers, 2005, Equal Opportunities Commission Working Paper Series No. 19; Manning, A and Petrongolo, B, The part-time pay penalty, 2004.

relatively low levels of education are less likely to continue working full-time, and are more likely to leave labour market employment. Some 61% of women who are educated to A-level or above standard remain in full-time work a year after childbirth, but only 46% of those who are less highly educated do so.[69] At the same time the proportion of women who, following childbirth, ceased to be employed in the labour market has been steadily declining in the 1990s and post-2000. In 1992–97, 32% of such women who were previously working full-time were not working in the labour market in the following year. By 1998–2003, this proportion had fallen to 19%.[70]

Use of the indirect discrimination route under the SDA in efforts to seek flexible working in order to stay within the labour market and avert the adverse possibilities associated with leaving it, is, as discussed below, burdensome and fraught with pitfalls, but it has been eased somewhat by the importation of the more generous test considered below. Nevertheless, this avoids the question whether use of the SDA can ever be very effective in enhancing the ability of parents to avoid disadvantage in the labour market. The EOC has argued that employment laws (such as flexible working regulations, maternity and paternity leave provisions) that are currently outside the scope of the equality enactments could be brought within the currently proposed Single Equality Act.[71] That would aid in dealing with the complexity and overlap of the current laws. But more importantly it would recognise that arguing for flexible working or maternity rights through the vehicle of equality law – at least on the SDA model – is ineffective and may aid in creating disadvantage.

Pregnancy and parental rights

Rights to leave or pay based on pregnancy and maternity have developed in a manner that takes them a long way from sex discrimination law, but it is convenient to discuss them at this point. In discussing pregnancy and maternity, it must be borne in mind that the legislation relating to maternity leave enshrines straightforward direct discrimination on grounds of sex since it differentiates between women and men in a manner that may disadvantage both. Parental leave was available in most of the EU member states[72] prior to the implementation of the Parental Leave Directive, implemented by the Parental Leave and Maternity etc Regulations.[73] The regulations allowed for three months' unpaid leave for any person having responsibility for a child until it is five. This is in addition to maternity leave provision. Section 57A of the ERA also allowed for reasonable time off for carers. The take up of parental leave was clearly likely to be low since it is unpaid, while take up under s 57A was likely to be slow. As indicated above, under s 99 of the Employment Rights Act 1996 (ERA) a woman is protected from dismissal on grounds of pregnancy and under s 71 of the ERA, as amended, all 69 See Johnes, G, Career Interruptions and Labour Market Outcomes (2006) EOC Paper No 45; Gregg, P, Gutierrez-Domenech, M and Waldfogel, J The employment of married mothers in Great Britain: 1974–2000, 2003, Centre for Market and Public Organisation Working Paper 03/078, University of Bristol.

70 Ibid.

71 See EOC's Submission to the Discrimination Law Review (2006).

72 For details see McColgan, op. cit., fn 1, pp 378–79.

73 The Parental Leave and Maternity etc Regulations 1999 (SI 1999/3312).

women have automatic rights to maternity leave. If a woman has one year's continuous service, she has a right to an additional period of leave.[74] Compensation under the ERA is much lower than that available under the SDA.

The Work and Families Act 2006, which came into force in April 2007, creates new rights to more maternity and paternity leave and pay. Under the Act working parents will be entitled to: nine months statutory maternity pay, statutory adoption pay and maternity allowance (and it is intended that this be increased to a year's paid leave). There will be a new right to an additional period of paternity leave for fathers, which will be introduced alongside the extension of statutory maternity pay, adoption pay and maternity allowance to 12 months. This will enable them to benefit from leave and statutory pay if the mother returns to work after six months but before the end of her maternity leave period. 'Keeping in Touch' days will be introduced so that a woman on maternity leave can go into work for a few days, without losing her right to maternity leave or a week's statutory pay. But it is notable that the statute still determines which member of the couple will take advantage of which package, meaning that the couple cannot decide for themselves, depending on their individual employment circumstances, how they would prefer to divide up the package.

A preferable approach would be to offer a more generous parental leave entitlement to parents rather than giving preference to mothers, to be divided between the partners as they saw fit. The five-year cut-off point under s 57A is also very grudging. At present, women are doubly disadvantaged: on becoming parents they have in effect no choice but to be the partner taking the longer period of leave, whether they would prefer to be that partner or not. Employers may therefore view them as less reliable or less committed owing to this fact. Even women who do not wish to have children may experience discrimination on this ground since, at the point of appointment to a post, the possibility that they may have children and therefore take leave may be covertly, even unconsciously, held against them. At present, as indicated by the provision for parental leave, recognition, of a slow and reluctant nature, of the responsibilities of fathers is occurring.[75] When flexible working hours were introduced as a right[76] they were applicable to both parents. Employees who meet certain eligibility criteria have a right to request flexible working. The right is set out in s 80F ERA, as amended by the Employment Act 2002. It does not detract from the existing rights to work flexibly protected under the SDA, in the sense that in dealing with requests for flexible working, indirect discrimination is more likely to occur.

74 ERA, s 73 and the Parental Leave and Maternity etc. Regulations 1999, regs 5 and 7. Previously, she had a right to return to work within 29 weeks of the birth under the Employment Protection Consolidation Act 1978, s 39(1)(b). For further discussion of the current position see McColgan, A, 'Family friendly frolics' (2000) 29 ILJ 125.

75 Note: the proposals under the Green Paper on Parental Rights 2001 which proposed the introduction of paid paternity leave and 26 weeks' adoptive leave were limited to parents of disabled children and adoptive parents. The government opposed paid parental leave. But see now the Work and Families Act 2006.

76 The proposals under the Green Paper on Parental Rights 2001 included the possibility of an entitlement to reduced hours working for both parents. See below, pp 1543–44 for discussion of some of the current measures relating to the work/life balance.

Without further change in this direction the problems associated with the legally enshrined expectation that some women will damage their career for their home life,[77] while some men will conversely damage their home life to further their career, will continue. These include the likelihood that some women will forgo or delay having children, and that some of those who do have children may suffer employment detriment, including periods without work, leading to poverty and insecurity for themselves and their children, and severely affecting them after they reach pensionable age.[78] At present, some employers recognise that many employees have children and that seeking to enable them to continue at work without suffering stress is good practice that makes business sense, since skills and training are not lost to the company and productivity is enhanced.[79] A company which could only or mainly rely on those without parental responsibilities would clearly be impoverished in terms of the pool of talent it could count on. But the stance of the current government in seeking to enhance opportunities to achieve work/family balance, while showing greater imagination and far-sightedness than the previous one, has so far been hesitant and reluctant. The case for a much stronger SDA and/or for measures generally aiding parents does not rest only on enhancing opportunities for women. The economic case for making stronger and faster progress towards sex equality is clear. The Women and Work Commission has found that the pay and productivity gap costs the UK £23 billion each year. The Equalities Review Interim Report indicates that the 'employment penalty' (i.e. the difference caused by a particular characteristic), for women with children, whilst falling dramatically, is 'still by far the largest of all employment penalties recorded'.[80] The review reports that single mothers and partnered mothers with children under 11 face the largest employment penalty in the workforce, followed by Pakistani and Bangladeshi women.[81] As the review notes, women in the workforce provide a huge opportunity for Britain to improve its competitiveness and productivity, particularly given their high educational standard. The questions of flexible working and support for parents are considered further below, in relation to indirect discrimination on grounds of sex.

Equal pay and sex discrimination

The Equal Pay Act 1970 (EPA) governs the contractual aspects of a woman's employment. It is anomalous in that it is separate from the SDA; there is no good reason for having two separate instruments and it merely introduces further complexity and technicality into an already complex scheme. The Act received the royal assent in 1970, but it did not come into force until 1975; the idea was that employers would voluntarily remove sexual discrimination in pay. In fact, as the TUC warned the government would occur, 77 See, for discussion, Smeaton, D, 'Work return rates after childbirth in the UK', Women, Employment and Society, (2006) 20, 1: 5–25; Smeaton, D and Marsh, A, Maternity and paternity rights and benefits: survey of employees 2005, (2006) Employment Relations Research Series No 50, London: Department of Trade and Industry.

78 See TUC Submissions to the House of Commons Social Security Committee, June 1999 (see TUC website: www.tuc.org.uk); Jacobs, S, (1999) 'Trends in women's career patterns and in gender occupational mobility in Britain', Gender, Work and Organization, 6: pp 32–46.

79 See (2005) Britain's hidden brain drain. Manchester: Equal Opportunities Commission.

80 The Equalities Review: Interim Report for Consultation, p 55.

81 Ibid p 58.

employers moved women off the 'women's grade' on to the lowest grades with a view to minimising their statutory obligations and made sure that men and women were not working on comparable jobs.

The aim of the Act is to prevent discrimination as regards terms and conditions of employment between men and women and, to this end, it employs the device of an equality clause. If certain conditions are satisfied, the terms of the woman's contract are deemed to include such a clause. Under the original provisions, the equality clause only operated in two circumstances: that the woman was employed on like work with men in the same employment under s 1(2)(a) or on work rated by a job evaluation scheme as equivalent to that of a man in the same employment under s 1(2)(b). The latter provision was not of much value as it was voluntary and it was, therefore, left to the woman to persuade her employer to undertake such a scheme. In practice, this meant that women were left with the like work provisions. Owing to sexual segregation in the job market, women were concentrated in certain occupations, such as cleaning or cooking, and were unable to point to a man doing like work even where he was in the same employment.

Thus, the Act had little impact on women's lower pay since it could only be used against the most gross forms of pay discrimination. However, in 1982 the European Commission brought an action against the United Kingdom (Commission of European Communities v UK)[82] on the basis that the UK was in breach of its obligations under the Equal Pay Directive owing to the narrow application of the equality clause. In response, the UK Government was forced to amend the 1970 Act in order to include the possibility of making an equal value claim. It did so very reluctantly and this was reflected in the response. The amendment (s 1(2)(c)) was effected by statutory instrument, thereby curtailing debate on the new provisions, and the new regulations were intended to operate only as a last resort: the other two possibilities had to be tried first. Moreover, an attempt was made to widen the defences available to employers by using a different wording for equal value claims.

Choice of comparator

The first step under the Act is for the woman to choose a comparator. This might have caused difficulty where the woman was employed doing like work with a few men but wanted to compare herself with a man doing work of equal value; however, the issue was resolved in favour of claimants by the House of Lords in Pickstone v Freemans.[83] Mrs Pickstone and other warehouse operatives were paid less than male warehouse checkers, but a man was employed as an operative. The defendants therefore argued that the claim was barred owing to the wording of s 1(2)(c): '. . . where a woman is employed on work which, not being work to which (a) or (b) applies, is "of equal value"' (emphasis added). Paragraph (a) did apply because one man was employed doing the same work and therefore it could be argued that a like work claim arose, but not an equal value one. The House of Lords considered that allowing this argument to succeed would mean that Parliament had failed once again to implement its obligations under Art 119 and it could not have intended such a failure. In such circumstances, any interpretation should take into account the terms in which the amending regulations were presented to Parliament; in other words, a purposive approach should be adopted. Using this approach, the defendants' argument could be rejected on the basis that the claimant should be able to choose her comparator, rather than allowing the employer to impose one on her. This ruling put an end to what has been termed the 'token man loophole':[84] had it gone the other way, employers might have been encouraged to employ one man alongside a large number of women in order to bar equal value claims.

82 [1982] ICR 578; [1982] 3 CMLR 284.

83 [1988] AC 66; [1988] 2 All ER 803; for comment, see: (1988) 51 MLR 221; [1988] PL 483.

'Same employment'

Once a claimant has chosen a comparator, it must be shown that they are in the same employment. The meaning of this provision was considered by the House of Lords in Leverton v Clwyd CC.[85] A nursery nurse who wished to compare her pay with that of clerical staff was not employed in the same establishment as they were. Under s 1(6), 'the same employment' is defined as meaning at the same establishment or by the same employer and that the same conditions of employment are observed. The claimant and comparators were employed by the same employer and, although there were some differences in the individual terms of employment, it was still possible for the House of Lords to find on a broad view of the agreement governing the terms of employment of claimant and comparator that they were sufficiently similar to satisfy the s 1(6) test.

Clearly, it would be possible to frame legislation allowing equal value claims so that it would operate in one of three circumstances: it could apply to all employees who could point to any other employee, wherever employed, doing work of equal value; it could apply to employees employed by the same employer governed by roughly similar terms of service – the position taken under the UK legislation – or it could apply to employees working under the same roof as their comparators. In making it clear that a broad middle way is open to such claims, the House of Lords gave encouragement to them and followed a policy which seemed to be in tune with that underlying the legislation.

However, it is worth considering the advantages of the first and least restrictive method which was omitted from the legislation in order to minimise disruption to existing pay structures. If, in principle, a person doing work of equal value to that of another worker should be paid an equal wage, if the inequality is attributable to sex discrimination, then it ought to be immaterial that the two workers are employed by two different employers. It might be said that an employer cannot be expected to take responsibility for the wage policies of other concerns, but can only be expected to remove pay discrimination within the sphere he or she is able to affect. However, on a broader view, it might be argued that an employer has a duty to ensure that his or her own concern is not operating a discriminatory wage scheme whatever the basis of comparison. In closing off that broad possibility, the legislation leaves intact the grossest pay disparities arising from establishments with low paid all-female workforces, 84 See Napier, B, 'Julie Hayward and the continuing saga of equal value' (1998) 138 NLJ 341.

85 [1989] 2 WLR 47; [1989] 1 WLR 65, HL.

because they cannot point to a male comparator. This aspect of the legislation may even encourage sexual segregation in employment because if no male is employed (other than those prepared to work for the same low wages as the women) – at least in any post conceivably comparable with that of the majority of the workforce – equal value claims are precluded. The result in some occupations may be the encouragement of a low paid all-female workforce overseen by a few men in managerial positions.[86]

The term-by-term approach

Assuming that a claimant can point to a comparator in the same employment, the industrial tribunal will appoint an independent expert in order to determine whether the two jobs are of equal value under such heads as responsibility, skill, effort, qualifications and length of training. The expert's report is not conclusive of the issue, but the tribunal is unlikely to reject it. If the jobs are of equal value, then a term of the claimant's contract which is less favourable than a term of her comparator's will be compared. It is now clear after the ruling of the House of Lords in Hayward v Cammell Laird[87] that the term by term approach – as opposed to consideration of the contract as a whole – is correct. The defendants had resisted the plaintiff's claim on the ground that her contract and that of the male comparators must each be looked at as a whole, in which case her perks – such as free lunches and two additional days' holiday – equalled the £25 per week extra which the men received. The House of Lords found that the word 'term' in s 1(2) was to be given its natural and ordinary meaning as a distinct part of a contract and, therefore, it was necessary to look at one term of the claimant's contract; if there was a similar provision in the comparator's contract which was found after they had been compared to be less favourable to the woman than the term in the comparator's, then the equality clause would operate to make that term equally favourable to her.

Obviously, this ruling prevented employers claiming that fringe benefits equalled pay. Such a claim might have been advantageous to an employer who might be able to provide a benefit at little real cost, such as free meals for a cook. Moreover, previously, employers might have provided a 'protective package' for female employees which included less pay but more time off or more sick benefits. All women, whether desirous of such a package or not, would receive it whether or not they would have preferred to be paid more. Employers, however, feared that the Hayward ruling would lead to 'leap frogging'; women would receive the male higher pay; the men would then claim the women's old fringe benefits and all employees would level up to the detriment of the company, which would be faced with a great increase in costs. However, employers may be able to avoid this by gradually modifying practices on pay and fringe benefits. There would also be the possibility – mentioned only as dicta in Hayward – that certain fringe benefits might be used to found a defence to an equal value claim (see below).

86 Walby, S and Olsen, W, The impact of women's position in the labour market on pay and implications for UK productivity, 2002, London: Department of Trade and Industry, Women and Equality Unit.

87 [1988] WLR 265; [1988] 2 All ER 803; for comment, see Ellis (1988) 51 MLR 781; Napier, 'Julie Hayward and the continuing saga of equal pay' (1998) 138 NLJ 341.

The 'material factor' defence

Even if a woman is able to show that she is doing like work, work rated as equivalent or work of equal value to that of her comparator, the claim will fail if a s 1(3) defence operates:

> . . . an equality clause shall not operate in relation to a variation between the woman's contract and the man's contract if the employer proves that the variation is genuinely due to a material factor which is not the difference of sex and that factor:
>
> (a) in the case of an equality clause falling within subsection (2)(a) or (b) above, must be a material difference between the woman's case and the man's; and > (b) in the case of an equality clause falling within subsection (2)(c) above, may be such a material difference.

This is known as the 'material factor' defence. The difference in wording for equal value claims was intended to mean that a 'material factor' could be interpreted more widely in such claims. In fact, as will be seen, the width of the interpretation given to the defence in all three types of claim means that this possibility is of less significance than was expected. The defence will operate if a material difference between the cases of the woman and the man can be identified which is not the difference of sex – such as additional payment for the geographical difference in the location of two parts of the same concern. As the 1970 Act must be construed in harmony with the SDA, the variation in pay must be genuinely due to the factor in question; otherwise it may be discriminatory. Therefore, in Shields v E Coomes,[88] the difference in pay was apparently due to the protective function exercised by the male employees in a betting shop. However, not all the men discharged such a function, but all received the higher pay and, therefore, allowing the protective function to operate as a material factor would have been directly discriminatory because a woman who exercised no protective function would not receive the higher pay, while a man in the same position would.

In Leverton v Clwyd CC[89] the House of Lords found that different hours and holidays could amount to a material factor under s 1(3) if pay could be broken down into a notional hourly income. If, once this was done, the pay of claimant and comparator were found to be equal, the claim would fail on the basis that the difference in salaries was due to the difference in hours and not to the difference of sex. This point was touched on obiter in Hayward, but in Leverton it was made clear that a s 1(3) defence might be available where a man and a woman had different contractual packages so long as the packages did not contain any element of direct or indirect discrimination. It may be noted that more than one material factor may be identified; if so, it is not necessary for the employer to establish the proportion which each factor contributes to the difference in pay.[90]

88 [1978] WLR 1408, CA.
89 [1989] WLR 47.
90 Calder v Rowntree Macintosh Ltd [1993] IRLR 27.

The most far-reaching and controversial argument under s 1(3) has been termed the 'market forces argument',[91] since it allows the employer to argue that because the market may favour some employees more than others, they must be paid more, and that to fail to do so would be to disrupt normal market forces.[92] In other words, if a woman is willing to work for less than a man, this provides a reason for paying her less. The early cases rejected this argument;[93] in Jenkins v Kinsgate,[94] for example, a part-time worker was paid at a different hourly rate from the full-time workers. The employer tried to use the s 1(3) defence in answer to her claim for equal hourly pay in arguing that part-time workers have less bargaining power and therefore the market demanded that he should pay full-time workers more. The argument was that this was a genuine difference between the two cases which was not sex-related; any part-time worker, male or female, would have been paid less. However, the part-timers were all female and so the practice had a disparate impact on women. Construing the EPA in accordance with the SDA, the EAT concluded that a practice which had a disparate impact on women could not sustain a s 1(3) defence, as to allow it to do so would be indirectly discriminatory.

However, this approach was not followed in Rainey v Greater Glasgow Health Board,[95] which concerned a comparison between female and male prosthetists working in the NHS. The men were receiving higher pay, but the defendants argued that this was due to the need to attract them from the private sector in order to set up the prosthetist service. This argument entailed consideration not just of factors relating to the personal attributes of the claimant and comparator, such as length of experience, but also the difference in their individual positions in the market. In other words, it widened what could be considered as a material factor. The relevant circumstances were that those from the private sector had to be paid above the normal rate to attract them. However, the House of Lords held that although taking this into account as a material factor was acceptable, it must be objectively justified – no element of discrimination must have crept into the circumstances. In order to ensure this, the House of Lords used the same test as for justification under indirect discrimination – the Bilka test laid down by the European Court of Justice.[96] Here, the objective was setting up the NHS prosthetist service which entailed attracting sufficient experienced prosthetists. The means chosen involved attracting persons from the private sector which involved paying them more. It was accepted that this was both appropriate and necessary. So the material factor passed the Bilka test and further, because this was a like work case, the factor had 91 Townshend-Smith, Sex Discrimination in Employment 1989, p 175.

92 The US doctrine of 'comparable worth' has also been attacked as disruptive of market forces: see, e.g., Weiler, P, 'The wages of sex: the uses and limits of comparable worth' (1986) 99 Harv L Rev 1728.

93 Clay Cross v Fletcher [1978] 1 WLR 1429; [1979] 1 All ER 474.

94 [1981] IRLR 388, p 390.

95 [1987] AC 224; [1987] 1 All ER 65; [1986] 3 WLR 1017, HL. It may be that the reasoning in Rainey will be applied only where indirect discrimination can be identified affecting the factor in question: Strathclyde Regional Council v Wallace [1996] IRLR 672, noted (1997) 26(2) ILJ 171. If this is correct, the factor need not be objectively justified: it need only be genuinely necessary and material, i.e., relevant. One problem with this approach is that it may lead to failures to recognise the existence of indirect discrimination affecting material factors.

96 In Bilka-Kaufhaus GmbH v Weber von Hartz [1986] IRLR 317; [1986] CMLR 701. See above, pp 1540–41.

to be a difference between comparator and claimant. The difference was that she was from the public sector, while he was from the private sector.

Thus, this ruling broadened what could be termed a material factor and allowed market forces to defeat equal pay claims so long as no indirect discrimination was shown. Clearly, the danger of the market forces argument is that employers will often argue that business will suffer if a group of women are paid more. What are sometimes termed 'women's jobs' have traditionally been undervalued by the market; the equal pay legislation was specifically aimed at breaking down traditional pay hierarchies and, therefore, this argument, if allowed too wide a scope, could completely undermine it. However, the Rainey ruling does appear to an extent to be trying to keep the argument in check in finding that only in objectively justified circumstances should more be paid to a certain group; this is not the same as allowing the market generally to set the rate. The effect of this argument was further curbed in Benveniste v University of Southampton;[97] it was found that although particular constraints might affect pay and might lead to a pay differential between a man and a woman, they could do so only while the constraint was in operation. Once it had ceased to apply, the lower pay should be raised to the level it would have been at had it not been affected by the constraint.

A variation on the market forces argument was put forward in Enderby v Frenchay.[98] Speech therapists wished to compare their pay with that of clinical psychologists and pharmacists who were paid at much higher rates. The employers denied that the work of the two groups was of equal value, but argued that in any event, a material factor justified the difference: it had emerged as a result of different pay negotiations and, moreover, the pharmacists were in demand in the private sector and this had influenced pay. The employers further argued that the speech therapists could not assert that the material factor was tainted by indirect discrimination without first showing that a condition had been applied to employees which had an adverse impact on women. The employer thus had two arguments: first, no condition could be identified which had been applied; secondly, if it had been, it could be justified by the factors mentioned: the separate pay processes in conjunction with market forces.

The claimant, however, argued that the salaries of the therapists were low because the profession was predominantly female and that whether a condition could be identified or not was immaterial: in practice, one type of work was largely done by women and another largely by men and, although of equal value, the men's work attracted a higher salary. These factors, it was claimed, gave rise to a presumption of discrimination which could not be objectively justified because the reason for the difference was that the profession in question was staffed by women. This argument, if accepted, would have distinguished the claim from that in Rainey.

The EAT found for the employers, ruling that the pay was the result of different bargaining processes which, looked at separately, were not indirectly discriminatory. Therefore, a material factor could be identified which was influenced by market forces. Further, even if the factor identified did not justify all of the difference in pay, that did not matter because it was impossible to say how much was needed above normal

97 [1989] IRLR 122.
98 [1994] 1 All ER 495; [1993] ECR I-5535, ECJ; [1992] IRLR 15, CA.

rates to attract and retain certain staff. It was clear that the case raised difficult issues, and so at the Court of Appeal stage three questions were referred to the European Court of Justice:

(1) If there is a difference in pay between two jobs assumed to be of equal value, of which one is carried out almost exclusively by women and the other predominantly by men, must the difference be objectively justified by the employer? Does this mean that all the steps needed to show indirect discrimination should be taken, including identifying a particular barrier?
(2) Are separate bargaining processes a sufficient justification for a variation in pay if they are not internally discriminatory?
(3) If there is a need to pay men more to attract them, but only part of the difference in pay is for that purpose, then does that justify all of the difference?

The first question relates to the determination of a prima facie case of indirect sex discrimination; is it necessary to be able to identify a 'barrier' or 'condition' which it is more difficult for women to meet than men (or vice versa) in order to show indirect discrimination? The second and third questions relate to justifications for indirect discrimination. First, is the use of separate sex-neutral collective bargaining systems sufficient justification for indirect sex discrimination? Secondly, will the more favourable market position of certain employees justify unequal pay? In other words, can the overt operation of market forces justify indirect sex discrimination?

Assuming that the jobs compared were of equal value, the Court of Justice held,[99] reiterating the well established principle of reversal of the burden of proof in indirect sex discrimination cases (citing Case C-33/89 Kowalska v Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg[100] and Case C-184/89 Nimz v Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg[101] concerning measures distinguishing between employees on the basis of their hours of work, including equal pay cases) that '. . . it is for the employer to prove that his practice in the matter of wages is not discriminatory, if a female worker establishes, in relation to a relatively large number of employees, that the average pay for women is less than that for men'.

Applying these rulings by analogy to this equal value claim, the Court concluded that there is a prima facie case of sex discrimination, where the pay of speech therapists is significantly lower than that of clinical psychologists and pharmacists and speech therapists are almost exclusively women. The 'factual' considerations as to whether the jobs are indeed of equal value and whether the statistics adduced support the required disparities are questions for the national court. At this point, the burden of objective justification shifts to the employer.

The Court replied in the negative to the question whether separate collective bargaining processes, which are each, in themselves, non-discriminatory, constitute sufficient objective justification for the differences in pay. The fact that the different wages are reached by separate processes of collective bargaining does not of itself

99 Enderby v Frenchay [1994] 1 All ER 495; [1993] ECR I-5535, ECJ; [1992] IRLR 15, CA.
100 [1990] ECR I-2591.
101 [1991] ECR I-297.

justify the discrimination, since it is a merely descriptive explanation. It fails to explain why one process produced a more favourable result for the employees than the other. Moreover, allowing that justification would enable employers to circumvent the principle of equal pay very readily by using such separate processes.

In contrast to its answer to the second question, the Court accepted 'the state of the employment market' in its answer to the third as a possible justification for indirect discrimination. The market forces concerned here were the shortage of candidates for the more highly paid job and the consequent need to offer higher pay in that job in order to attract candidates. The Court repeated that it is the duty of the national courts to decide 'questions of fact' such as this and reiterated from its previous case law[102] some forms of 'needs of the employer' which may constitute justification for indirect sex discrimination.[103]

While the questions referred to the ECJ were unanswered, the issue raised in (2) was resolved in Barber and Others v NCR (Manufacturing) Ltd[104] using a completely different approach from that of the EAT in Enderby, and one which seems to be more in harmony with the policy of the Act and with the Bilka test. Indirect clerical workers, who were mainly women, wanted to claim equal pay with direct clerical workers who were mainly men (the women's work was 'indirect' as not directly related to shop floor production). The direct workers negotiated a new agreement regarding hours and moved to a shorter week. Thus, the hourly rates of the two groups now differed although it had been the same. The EAT considered whether the employer had established that because the difference arose from different collective bargaining agreements untainted internally by discrimination this could found a s 1(3) defence. In putting forward this argument, the employers had relied on Enderby where the EAT had held that this was possible. The EAT said that the correct question to be asked must first be identified. It could be asked whether the cause of the variation in pay was free from sex discrimination, or it could be asked whether the variation was itself genuinely due to a material factor other than the difference of sex. The second question was the right one because the cause – separate collective bargaining processes – might be free from discrimination, but the result might not be. In this instance, the evidence showed why the difference had been arrived at, but did not show any objective factor which justified it. Thus, there was a pay difference which was not based on a material factor. The equality clause therefore operated, meaning that although the claimants did not obtain the same pay as the comparators because of the difference in hours, the hourly rates were equalised. The EAT considered that it did not need to refer to the ECJ or await the decision in Enderby, since the proper result could be arrived at under domestic law.

This ruling was foreshadowed in Handels-og Kontorfunktionaerernes Forbund i Danmark v Dansk Arbejdsgiverforening (the Danfoss case),[105] which was a Danish reference to the ECJ. The Court did not need to consider the question as to the relevance 102 Case 170/84 Bilka [1986] ECR 1607, Case C-184/89 Nimz v Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg [1991] ECR I-297 and Case 109/88 Danfoss [1989] ECR 3199; [1989] IRLR 532.

103 In 1997, the government conceded the equal value issue and settled the claim: see April 1997 IRLB No 567.

104 [1993] IRLR 95. Cf the decision in British Coal Corporation v Smith [1993] IRLR 308.

105 [1989] ECR 3199; [1989] IRLR 532.

of two separate collective agreements, one for women, one for men, but when the Advocate General addressed this point he determined that the existence of such agreements would not exclude the operation of the Equal Pay Directive although it would not inevitably be unlawful to have two separate agreements; it would be the manner of the agreements which would be relevant.

This approach should prevail, it is submitted, because merely to ask whether arriving at two levels of pay was due to the operation of two different bargaining processes would be to obscure the discriminatory nature of the result.[106] It is necessary to look behind the bargaining processes and to ask why one was able to arrive at a more favourable result. This might be because unions have traditionally been more effectual in obtaining better pay for men than for women and in itself this may be due to the fact that men's work has traditionally been valued more highly by the market than women's. Thus, to use different agreements as a material factor in themselves would be to cloak the discriminatory forces which lie behind them.

The main issue in the Danfoss case arose because the Danfoss Company paid the same basic wage to all employees, but also an individual supplement based on factors such as mobility and training. The result was that a somewhat lower average wage was paid to women and it was therefore claimed that the system was discriminatory. The Court determined that because the system lacked transparency, once a woman had shown that the average wage of women and men differed, the burden of proof would shift to the employer to prove that the wage practice was not discriminatory. It would have been unfair to expect the woman to prove that the system was discriminatory since she would not have been able to work out which factors had been taken into account. The Court considered that even if the application of criteria such as the need to be mobile worked to the detriment of women, the employer could still use them in relation to specific tasks entrusted to the employee so long as the Bilka test was satisfied.

Conclusions

The Enderby approach in the European Court of Justice obviously eases the task of the claimant in showing that a material factor is tainted with indirect discrimination in order to shift the onus onto the employer and determines that asking an employee to identify a specific requirement or condition where it is alleged that a material factor is so tainted is misconceived. Sometimes, it may be possible to identify a condition such as a need to be mobile in order to attract higher pay. However, and this seems to be the basis of the decision in Enderby, in many instances it may not be possible to identify any such condition with sufficient specificity. Instead, it would seem that where two jobs are of equal value, but that held by the woman attracts lower pay, the suggestion is that the market has allowed differentiation because of the traditional expectation that a woman would not be the breadwinner and would therefore work for less.[107]

106 For comment on this issue, see 'Equal value claims and sex bias in collective bargaining' (1991) 20 ILJ 163; see, also (1989) 18 ILJ 63.

107 See Olsen, W and Walby, S, Modelling gender pay gaps, 2005, Equal Opportunities Commission Working Paper Series No 17, Manchester: EOC.

Thus, the ‘condition’ which has been applied, in a general sense, is for a woman to work in a traditionally ‘male’ occupation, such as lorry driving, rather than in one of a traditionally ‘female’ nature, such as cooking, in order to obtain the higher pay. Obviously, some women can do so, but such a requirement hits disproportionately at women since, in practice, they will be less likely to enter the ‘male’ occupation owing to tradition, discrimination against them – perceived and real – in such occupations and social conditioning. Identifying such a ‘condition’ should suffice to raise an inference of indirect discrimination which, of course, would be open theoretically to rebuttal by an objective justification. To go further as the EAT appeared to do in Enderby and require identification of some specific condition which the particular employer has imposed is to misunderstand the nature of equal pay claims and the scheme of the Act which is predicated on the assumption that it is not pure coincidence that some jobs done predominantly by women are paid less than those done predominantly by men. In other words, the ‘condition’ should be assumed to apply to a largely female profession; the question is whether the difference in pay can be justified and it may be argued that where a particular occupation is staffed predominantly by women and is of equal value to one staffed predominantly by men but there is a wide disparity in pay, it would be hard for the employer, if not impossible, to show that the difference arose from anything other than the mere fact that one occupation was female dominated. In any event, it is clear that the fact of separate bargaining processes merely amounts to a smokescreen obscuring the traditional operation of market forces founding the difference in pay and therefore clearly should not be able to justify it, given that the legislation was introduced in order to interfere with, rather than bow to, market forces.

The material factor defence could potentially be seen as operating at three different levels of generality. First, it might only arise where a difference in the ‘personal equation’ of the man and the woman, such as length of experience or qualifications, could be identified. This was the approach rejected in Rainey. Second, a factor might be identified going beyond the personal equation of the complainant, but still amounting to a non-sex-based difference between her and her comparator. At the present time this is the predominant approach. The most significant factor of this type and the one most likely to undermine the equal pay scheme is the ‘market forces’ factor, which received some endorsement from the ECJ in Enderby. This factor is, however, subject to a rigorous application of the Bilka test; it does not mean that the laws of supply and demand can simply determine the rates of pay in question. Nevertheless, adoption of this approach may tend to undermine the aim of the Act as removing pay discrimination. Third – and this defence would be available only in respect of equal value claims because of the wider wording applicable – there might be scope for a number of market-based arguments not based on a difference between the man’s and the woman’s case, such as using the leap frogging argument from Hayward as being in itself a material factor, although arising only from the general operation of the concern in question. This possibility has not yet been put forward; it would, of course, be out of harmony with the policy of the Act and arguably could not be termed an ‘objectively justified reason’ under the Bilka test. The complexities of the second approach, which the courts are currently trying to get to grips with, illustrate the difficulty adverted to at the beginning of this chapter of ensuring that only morally justifiable differentiation occurs.

The Sex Discrimination Act

Introduction

The two methods of securing equality embodied in the SDA – the individual approach and the general administrative approach under the keeping of a watchdog body – need not entirely be considered in isolation from each other. The weakness of the first is that specific instances of discrimination may be addressed only if the individual concerned is prepared to take on the burden of a legal action. Such an approach is clearly only capable of bringing about slow and piecemeal change, especially as the two parties concerned – usually the woman and her employer – are clearly not confronting each other on equal terms; the lack of legal aid exacerbates this situation. However, apart from bringing about general change by addressing itself to institutionalised discrimination, the administrative body created by the legislation can aid the individual and on occasion can undertake an investigation triggered off by an individual action.

Protected grounds

The Sex Discrimination Act 1975 (SDA), as amended, covers discrimination on a number of protected grounds: sex, pregnancy or maternity leave, marital status and gender reassignment. Section 3 covers discrimination on the grounds of marital status, but in this instance the comparison is between a single person and a married person of the same sex. The protection on grounds of sex applies equally to men. The provision against marital discrimination is more circumscribed: it is confined to the employment field only and discrimination on the grounds of divorce or of being unmarried is not covered.

Section 2A, which now prohibits discrimination on grounds of gender reassignment, is even more circumscribed; it only covers direct (not indirect) discrimination in employment and training and in relation to barristers (in Scotland, advocates). The prohibition of discrimination on grounds of gender reassignment arose from the findings of the ECJ in Case 13/14 P v S and Cornwall CC.[108] P had been dismissed from her employment on the ground that she was a transsexual. Her application under the SDA failed as it was found that transsexuals were outside the terms of the Act. It was argued in the European Court of Justice that her case fell within the Equal Treatment Directive. The decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Rees v UK[109] was relied upon by the European Court of Justice in deciding that transsexuals fall within the Directive. This was found on the basis that the Directive is simply the expression of the principle of equality, which is one of the fundamental principles of European Union law. It was found that where a person is dismissed on the basis that they have undergone or are about to undergo gender reassignment, he or she is being discriminated against in comparison with persons of the sex to which he or she was deemed to belong before undergoing gender reassignment. This ruling was given domestic effect in the Sex Discrimination (Gender Reassignment) Regulations 1999, which brought direct discrimination on grounds of gender reassignment within the SDA 1975 by introducing 108 Judgment of 30 April 1996; [1996] ECR I-2143; [1996] IRLR 347.

109 (1986) 9 EHRR 56.

s 2A.[110] However, the domestic implementation may be inadequate. In particular, the exclusion of indirect discrimination may mean that s 2A does not do enough to comply with the Equal Treatment Directive.

As indicated above, an argument that the provisions of the SDA should be extended by purposive interpretation in order to comply with the EU Directives could be strengthened by taking account both of s 3 of the HRA and of the general requirement under EC law to use the Convention as a source of general principle. Further, since Directives have vertical effect, they can, if sufficiently precise, clear and unconditional, be enforced against state bodies – emanations of the state. Thus, for example, if necessary, a claim for indirect discrimination on the ground of gender reassignment could be brought against such a body relying only on the Directive.

Contexts

Pay-related discrimination on the ground of gender reassignment is dealt with under the SDA, although such discrimination on grounds of sex is dealt with in the EPA. In other words, the SDA covers only the non-pay-related aspects of employment discrimination on grounds of sex – the pay-related aspects fall within the EPA. As will be seen, this separation has added to the complexity of the substantive law, although the two statutes are intended to work together as a complete code. The EOC has recommended that equal pay and sex discrimination provisions should be combined in one statute, but this has not been implemented.[111] The Act does not make discrimination on the protected grounds generally illegal; it only outlaws it in the contexts in which it operates. Thus, a two-stage approach has been created; first, discrimination on one of the grounds must be shown, and second, that it occurred within one of the contexts covered by the Act. The contexts are: employment (s 6), education (s 22), housing, and the provision of goods and services (s 29). Section 29 was found to have a narrow application to public bodies by the House of Lords in Amin.[112] A number of public functions, including policing decisions, were excluded.

The specific protection for pregnancy and maternity leave was introduced in 2005, in response to the Framework Directive, via Regulations, as indicated above, in a new s 3A SDA. Crucially, it does not depend on showing a comparison with a man. The comparison is with a non-pregnant woman. Section 3A(1) provides:

> In any circumstances relevant for the purposes of a provision to which this subsection applies, a person discriminates against a woman if
>
> (a) at a time in a protected period, and on the ground of the woman's pregnancy, the person treats her less favourably than he would treat her had she not become pregnant; or 110 SI 1999/1102; see the Government's Consultation Paper Legislation Regarding Discrimination on Grounds of Transsexualism in Employment; for discussion see McColgan, op. cit., fn 1, pp 382–86 and see further Griffiths, E, (1999) J Civ Lib, July, p 230.

111 See further p 1602 below.

112 [1983] 2 AC 818 HL. The decision partly relied on interpreting RRA 1976, s 75 as intended to limit the application of the Act in respect of public authorities.

(b) on the ground that the woman is exercising or seeking to exercise, or has exercised or sought to exercise, a statutory right to maternity leave, the person treats her less favourably than he would treat her if she were neither exercising nor seeking to exercise, and had neither exercised nor sought to exercise, such a right.[113]

Section 3A goes on to define the 'protected period'. It may be noted that if the special protection under s 3A does not apply, for example because discrimination appears to be related to pregnancy but is outside the protected period,[114] the provisions outlawing discrimination on grounds of sex would have to be relied on in seeking to challenge the discrimination. Section 3A is an extremely significant provision since discrimination against women often tends to be pregnancy-related and, as discussed below, women experienced difficulties in using sex discrimination legislation to combat pregnancy discrimination.

113 Section 3A further provides:

(2) In any circumstances relevant for the purposes of a provision to which this subsection applies, a person discriminates against a woman if, on the ground that section 72(1) of the Employment Rights Act 1996 (compulsory maternity leave) has to be complied with in respect of the woman, he treats her less favourably than he would treat her if that provision did not have to be complied with in respect of her.

(3) For the purposes of subsection (1) –

(a) in relation to a woman, a protected period begins each time she becomes pregnant, and the protected period associated with any particular pregnancy of hers ends in accordance with the following rules –

(i) if she is entitled to ordinary but not additional maternity leave in connection with the pregnancy, the protected period ends at the end of her period of ordinary maternity leave connected with the pregnancy or, if earlier, when she returns to work after the end of her pregnancy;

(ii) if she is entitled to ordinary and additional maternity leave in connection with the pregnancy, the protected period ends at the end of her period of additional maternity leave connected with the pregnancy or, if earlier, when she returns to work after the end of her pregnancy;

(iii) if she is not entitled to ordinary maternity leave in respect of the pregnancy, the protected period ends at the end of the 2 weeks beginning with the end of the pregnancy;

(b) where a person's treatment of a woman is on grounds of illness suffered by the woman as a consequence of a pregnancy of hers, that treatment is to be taken to be on the ground of the pregnancy;

(c) a 'statutory right to maternity leave' means a right conferred by section 71(1) or 73(1) of the Employment Rights Act 1996 (ordinary and additional maternity leave).

(4) In subsection (3) 'ordinary maternity leave' and 'additional maternity leave' shall be construed in accordance with sections 71 and 73 of the Employment Rights Act 1996.

(5) Subsections (1) and (2) apply to –

(a) any provision of Part 2,
(b) sections 35A and 35B, and
(c) any other provision of Part 3, so far as it applies to vocational training.

114 See on this: Adams, L, McAndrew, F and Winterbotham, M, Pregnancy discrimination at work: a survey of women, 2005, Equal Opportunities Commission Working Paper Series No 24, Manchester: EOC.

Discrimination on grounds of race[115]

It was apparent that the common law would not provide a sufficient remedy for racial discrimination. For example, in Constantine v Imperial Hotels[116] nominal damages only were awarded in respect of clear racial discrimination although the applicant had attempted to claim exemplary damages. However, the discriminatory effect of a contract or covenant could be taken into account by a court as a matter of public policy in reaching a decision,[117] while discriminatory words contained in a trust might, under certain circumstances, be struck out, although the courts have tended to be reluctant to do this.[118] The discriminatory nature of foreign legislation might also be considered in determining its impact,[119] and this possibility still exists, although it is not of great significance. There seemed to be a clear need for further measures and therefore the first Race Relations Act (RRA) was passed in 1965, although it was soon superseded by the 1968 Act and then by the 1976 Act. The 1976 Act is much more far-reaching than its predecessors; under the 1968 Act, an individual had to complain to the Race Relations Board rather than take the complaint to court. The 1976 Act was modelled on the SDA; it makes discrimination a statutory tort, follows the same pattern as regards direct and indirect discrimination and sets up the Commission for Racial Equality with a similar role to the Equal Opportunities Commission,[120] set up under the 1975 Act. It also operated initially in the same contexts and uses the same terms as the SDA; therefore, decisions under one of the two statutes affect the other. The Act provides a remedy for direct or indirect discrimination on the grounds of colour, race, nationality or ethnic or national origins.

Meaning of racial group

The applicant must show that the group falls within the definition of racial grounds in s 3(1) of the Act which covers 'colour, nationality, ethnic or national origins' and a racial group is defined by reference to the same. Employment of the concept of 'ethnic origins' widens the meaning of 'racial grounds' and means that some religious groups may fall within it even though discrimination on the grounds of religion is not expressly 115 Texts referred to in this section: Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 17; McColgan, op. cit., fn 1; Bailey, SH, Harris, DJ and Jones, BL, Civil Liberties: Cases and Materials, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 10; Lustgarten, L, The Legal Control of Racial Discrimination, 1980, Macmillan; Gregory, op. cit., fn 1; Bourne, C and Whitmore, J, Race and Sex Discrimination, 1993; Feldman, op. cit., fn 1, esp pp 133–78; Lustgarten, L, 'Racial inequality and the limits of law' (1986) 49 MLR 68–85; Bindman, G, 'Reforming the Race Relations Act' (1985) 135 NLJ 1136–38 and 1167–69; Deakin and Morris, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 6; von Prondzynski and Richards, op. cit., fn 1; Barnard and Hepple, 'Substantive Equality' [2000] 59(3) CLJ 562; Hepple, Coussey and Choudhury, op. cit., fn 1; Millar and Phillips, [1983] 11 Int Journal Soc Law 417.

116 [1944] KB 693.

117 On public policy at common law, see Cretney (1968) 118 NLJ 1094; Garner (1972) 35 MLR 478.

118 Re Lysaght [1966] Ch 191 (in order to qualify for a scholarship under the trust a student had to be male, British and could not be Catholic or Jewish; this was not found contrary to public policy, but as the college which was to be a trustee refused to discriminate on religious grounds, those words were struck out); for comment see (1966) 82 LQR 10.

119 See Oppenheimer v Cattermole [1975] 2 WLR 347.

120 See below, pp 1594 and 1597–1600 for consideration of the role of both bodies.

covered. The leading case on the meaning of 'racial group' is Mandla v Dowell Lee.[121] The House of Lords had to consider whether Sikhs constituted an ethnic group and defined the term 'ethnic group' as one having a long shared history and a cultural tradition of its own, often, but not necessarily, associated with religious observances. On that definition Sikhs were a racial group and fell within s 3(1). This does not mean that a purely religious group will fall within s 3(1).

Using this definition it was found in CRE v Dutton[122] that gypsies, who have a shared history going back 700 years, may be termed a racial group and the definition was considered further in Dawkins v Department of Environment[123] in relation to the claim that Rastafarians constitute a racial group. It was found that the group in question must regard itself and be regarded by others as a distinct community by virtue of certain characteristics. The two essential characteristics were: a long shared history of which the group was conscious, and a cultural tradition of its own including family and social customs. Lord Fraser considered that there could be other relevant, but not essential characteristics such as a common geographical origin, a common language, literature and religion. It was found that Rastafarians did have a strong cultural tradition which included a distinctive form of music and a distinctive hair style. However, the shared history of Rastafarians as a separate group only went back 60 years; it was not enough for them to look back to a time when they, in common with other Africans, were taken to the Caribbean. That was not sufficient to mark them out as a separate group since it was an experience shared with other Afro-Caribbeans. It appears, then, that this first step is complex and, it might seem, not entirely free from ambiguity. The exclusion of religious groups such as Muslims from the scope of the legislation was problematic, but they could now take advantage of the Employment Equality (Religion or Belief) Regulations.[124] Also religious groups may possibly fall within the indirect discrimination provisions as indicated below.

Contexts covered by the RRA

The discrimination must occur within the areas covered by the Act: employment, education, housing or the provision of goods and services. Section 20 of the RRA, which covers the provision of goods and services, was found to have a narrow application to public functions owing to the decision in Amin.[125] Thus, areas of governmental activity were excluded from the ambit of the Act. The prison service was not covered, nor were a number of police activities such as exercising stop and search powers or investigating offences. Thus the RRA, like the SDA, had an inconsistent and arbitrary application to the police. Until its amendment in 2000, the RRA could not be used to challenge allegedly discriminatory practices in the criminal justice system except in the 121 [1983] All ER 1062; [1983] 2 AC 548; for comment, see Beynon and Love (1984) 100 LQR 120; McKenna (1983) 46 MLR 759; Robilliard [1983] PL 348; Pagone (1984) 43 CLJ 218.

122 [1989] WLR 17; [1989] 1 All ER 306, CA. See also Souster v BBC Scotland [2001] IRLR 150.

123 [1993] ICR 517; for comment, see Parpworth (1993) 143 NLJ 610.

124 It should be noted that religious discrimination in employment could give rise to liability in Northern Ireland under the Fair Employment (NI) Act 1976.

125 [1983] 2 AC 818 HL. The decision partly relied on interpreting RRA 1976, s 75 as intended to limit the application of the Act in respect of public authorities.

spheres it covered, including employment. Thus, for example, racial discrimination in a prison resulting in refusal of employment would be covered,[126] but other discriminatory practices within the criminal justice system, such as racially discriminatory arrests or stops and searches, fell outside the Act.

However, the decision in Farah v Comr of Police of the Metropolis[127] made it clear that racial bias in policing decisions will fall within the Act although, importantly, it did not create vicarious liability in respect of such decisions. Farah, a Somali citizen and refugee who was 17 at the time, was attacked by a group of white teenagers who set a dog on her and injured her. She summoned police help by telephone; when the police arrived, they made no attempt to arrest her attackers, but arrested her and charged her with affray, assault and causing unnecessary suffering to a dog. No evidence was offered when she appeared to answer the charges, and she was acquitted. She brought an action for damages against the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, alleging false imprisonment, assault and battery and malicious prosecution. She included in the statement of claim an allegation that the conduct of the police officers amounted to unlawful racial discrimination. Judge Harris refused to strike out the allegation of racial discrimination. He also allowed her to amend that part of her claim, so that she alleged that the officers were acting as the Commissioner's agents and had discriminated against her on grounds of race in both failing to afford her the protection which would have been afforded to white victims of crime and in bringing the proceedings against her. The commissioner appealed against the refusal to strike out the allegation of racial discrimination.

The Court of Appeal found that two important issues fell to be determined. First, whether a police officer came within s 20 of the RRA 1976, which prohibits racial discrimination in the provision of services and, secondly, if he did, whether his Chief Officer of Police would be answerable in law for any breaches of the Act he might have committed. The court held that an officer providing protection to a citizen was providing a service within the section. Policy reasons against such a conclusion, including the possibility that the police would have to face numerous claims of race discrimination, were rejected as outweighed by the need to provide a remedy for a citizen who had suffered discrimination in a situation where she was in dire need of protection. Moreover, nothing in the Act made police officers immune from claims of racial discrimination. However, the Court found that the Commissioner was not vicariously liable for the acts of the officers. Section 53 appeared to deny vicarious liability, except in so far as provided for by the Act. Her claim against the individual officers for discrimination was out of time. The appeal was allowed and therefore her claim of discrimination had to be struck from the statement of claim. This decision was to be welcomed as making it clear that the possibility of compensation for racially discriminatory police actions and decisions was available. However, it also hedged this possibility around with restrictions, since it denied the possibility of vicarious liability.

However, after amendment by the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000 (which inserted s 19B into the 1976 Act), discrimination (direct or indirect) by a public authority 126 RRA 1976, Part II; in Alexander v Home Office [1988] 1 WLR 968, CA (the plaintiff, a prisoner, was refused work in prison kitchen owing to racial stereotyping).

127 [1997] 1 All ER 289.

in carrying out its functions is brought within the ambit of the Act. This amendment of the RRA was effected to implement Recommendation No 11 of the MacPherson Report into the death of Stephen Lawrence,[128] after the MacPherson inquiry found 'institutional racism' in the Metropolitan Police, which had resulted in significant failures in the investigation of his death at the hands of racists. The term 'public authority' is to be interpreted consistently (although not identically) with the interpretation afforded to the same term under the HRA.[129] Law enforcement by public authorities is now brought within the statutory framework for the prohibition of discrimination, thus closing the gap that was dramatically and disturbingly highlighted by the Stephen Lawrence case. Thus, the actions of the police in investigating crime are now covered by the RRA, as are other functions of public authorities. Section 4 of the 2000 Act inserts ss 76A and B into the RRA, providing that chief officers of police will be vicariously liable for the actions of their officers. However, there are still exceptions to the coverage of the Act, created by the amendments. Section 19D exempts 'any act done for the purpose of making a decision about instituting criminal proceedings'. This formulation leaves open the possibility that acts remote from that decision, including the uncovering of evidence, are covered by the RRA.

SDA and RRA – differences

The amendments to the RRA now represent one of a number of important differences between the statutory scheme covering discrimination on grounds of sex and that covering the ground of race. The RRA creates the most comprehensive domestic scheme that this chapter considers: the provisions under the RRA outlawing discrimination in private clubs of 25 members or more, segregation and 'transferred discrimination' – discrimination on the grounds of another's race – have no counterparts under the SDA. The 'functions of a public authority' head is not yet replicated in the SDA, although it will be in 2007.[130] Employment covers 'pay' in the RRA, thus ensuring a less complex scheme than that applying in respect of sex discrimination claims.

The influence of the EU has been until recently less important in the context of race discrimination, although rulings of the European Court of Justice and of the domestic courts taking EU provisions into account affected concepts under the RRA. It should be noted that even prior to the introduction of the Race Directive 2003, the EU did not ignore race discrimination and had passed a number of resolutions and declarations giving guidance to member states,[131] but its influence in this area, although beginning to develop, remained until 2003 at a much earlier stage than its influence on sex discrimination. Aside from EU provisions, the UK is a party to a number of international declarations on race discrimination and xenophobia which, although not 128 Cm 4262-I. For discussion of the amendments, see O'Cinneide, C, 'The Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000' [2001] PL 220.

129 See Chapter 4, pp 216 et seq.

130 See pp 1577–79 below.

131 See Resolutions, Reports and Declarations of the Council of the EC: Resolution of 16 July 1985 (OJ C186 26.7.85, p 3); Declaration of 11 June 1986 (OJ C158 25.6.86, p 1); Resolution of 24 May 1988 (OJ C177 6.7.88, p 5); Council Decision 88/348/EEC (OJ L158 25.6.88); Eurigenis Report 1991. For criticism of the EU stance on racism, see Bindman (1994) 144 NLJ 352; see also Lester, 'New European Equality Measures' [2000] PL 562.

part of UK law, may influence it.[132] As indicated above, the Race Directive brought race discrimination directly within the ambit of EU law. Its domestic implementation made a number of changes to the 1976 Act, as discussed below.

Discrimination on grounds of disability

Introduction[133]

The Disability Discrimination Act 1995 (DDA), as amended, is modelled to an extent on the SDA and RRA schemes; the DDA adopted the concepts of direct discrimination and victimisation used in the SDA and RRA and a body was set up to promote and monitor the scheme, although it initially had only an advisory role. But the DDA scheme differs in some important respects from the earlier schemes. In general, it is narrower in scope than the earlier legislation, in terms both of its application and of the forms of discrimination covered. Originally, the Act only applied to employers who employ more than 20 people. It is now applicable to those employing more than 15 (s 7(1)).[134] Thus, many small businesses will still fall outside its scope. Most significantly, the Act does not import the concept of indirect discrimination in its full sense, although, as indicated below, the concept of direct discrimination is broader than that used in the SDA and RRA. Also, direct discrimination can be justified; this is understandable, within limits, in this context. Unlike the provisions against race and sex discrimination, the Act is incomplete – it relies on being fleshed out by non-statutory rules.[135] Under one of the more significant SIs, tribunals are bound to take into account the Disability Discrimination Code of Practice, which came into force in December 1996.[136]

The Act does not adopt the symmetrical, formal equality approach of the other statutes or regulations: it does not take the stance that a disabled person is asking for equal treatment with an able-bodied person; she is asking for different treatment in order to put her in the same position as an able-bodied person. For example, a person who needs to use a wheel chair is asking for equal access to the work place – probably via a lift – not an equal right to use the stairs. So the formal equality approach plays a minor part in the Act. The key concepts under it are those of disability-related discrimination and the duty of reasonable adjustment.

A medical model

The Act adopts what may be termed a ‘medical’ as opposed to a ‘social’ model of discrimination. Under a medical model, the impairment is located in the person in 132 European Convention on Human Rights, Arts 3 and 14; International Labour Organisation; International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights; the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, para 2; International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination.

133 Texts referred to: McColgan, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 8; ‘Interpreting the Disability Discrimination Act (1998) 80 EOR 14; M Connolly op. cit., fn 1; Doyle, B, ‘Enabling legislation or dissembling law? The DDA 1995’ (2001) 64 MLR 7; Butterworth’s Discrimination Law Handbook, 2000; Clayton and Tomlinson, op. cit., fn 1, pp 1230–33.

134 By 2004, this figure is to be reduced to apply to employers who employ more than two employees.

135 See SI 1996/1996; SI 1996/2793; SI 1996/1836.

136 Under SI 1996/1996.

question; he or she must claim to be significantly impaired in his or her ability to perform certain tasks in order to come within the scope of the legislation. Under a social model, the impairment depends on the attitudes of others. The medical model on which the DDA is based includes the concept of reasonable adjustment – that is, of placing a duty on the employer or other party to take reasonable steps in order to allow the disabled person to perform their duties despite their disability. Under provisions based on either model the arrangements for, for example, access to buildings could create discrimination against disabled people. Under either a medical or a social model, a person who has, for example, muscular dystrophy and has as a result significant mobility difficulties might well have no difficulty in performing a managerial job which depends on skills unrelated to mobility, so long as no obstacles are placed in her way in the form, for example, of steps which make it difficult for her to enter her own workplace. If a lift or other means of access were provided, she would not be impaired in her ability to perform the job. Thus, the impact of her disability would be determined by factors such as the willingness of the management to install a lift, rather than by the inherent nature of her disability.

But provisions based on a social model of disability can cover a wider range of circumstances than provisions based on the medical model. For example, a person might suffer discrimination due to a perception that he or she is disabled. An employer might perceive, for example, that a person with a cleft lip was mentally disordered. In fact the person's ability to perform a job would not be affected by the disfigurement, but he or she might nevertheless suffer discrimination based on social attitudes. Thus the DDA cannot address all disability-linked discrimination.

The Act creates complex definitions as to those who are covered by it. Under s 1(1) the person concerned must have 'a physical or mental impairment which has a substantial and long-term adverse effect on his ability to carry out normal day-to-day activities'. The definition includes within its scope progressive diseases such as multiple sclerosis or forms of dystrophy which may not currently be of great significance in terms of impairment, but are likely to become so. The DDA also covers those who have had a disability in the past, whether or not they have recovered (s 2(1)). Thus a three-stage approach has been created; first it must be shown that the applicant is 'disabled' within the definition, then discrimination must be shown, and then that it falls within one of the contexts covered by the Act, as amended. Further, as discussed below,[137] a duty of adjustment is placed on various bodies under the Act.

Field of application

The DDA 1995, as amended, does not make discrimination on the ground of disability generally illegal; as with the sex and race legislation, it only outlaws it in the contexts in which it operates: employment (Part II), disposal of premises (s 22) and the provision of goods and services (s 19). The Act was also amended and extended by the Special Education Needs and Disability Act 2001 to place duties on schools and on the providers of post-16 education and related services. The Act applies to all employers who have 15 or more employees, but it excludes a number of occupations, including the police, firefighters, barristers, prison officers, the armed forces, and those working on ships or aircraft.[138] Unlike the provisions in respect of employment, which do not apply at present to businesses with fewer than 15 staff, the service provisions apply across the board. These provisions require traders not to refuse service to disabled people or to offer an inferior service. The Special Educational Needs and Disability Act 2001, which adds s 28A to the DDA, covering schools, and s 28R covering further and higher education, leaves the full field of application to orders made by the Secretary of State in respect of coverage of certain educational institutions under s 28R(6)(c) and in respect of the services covered within schools under s 28A(3). Further amendments were made by the DDA 2005, extending the Act's coverage in most areas.

137 See pp 1550–54.

The employment-related provisions came into force in December 1996. The first part of Part III of the Act, the provision of access to goods, facilities and services, also came into force in December 1996. The second part of Part III of the Act, the duty to make reasonable adjustments in the context of the provision of access to goods, facilities and services, did not come into force until 1 October 1999. The third stage of Part III came into force in 2004[139] and requires traders to make physical alterations to premises to facilitate equal service, typically by installing lifts or ramps. The provisions regarding education came into force in 2002.[140]

Discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation

Introduction[141]

Until 2003 a person who was refused promotion or dismissed from a job on grounds of sexual orientation, was in the same position as a woman so treated would have been before 1975, in the sense that no anti-discrimination legislation specifically covered his or her situation. Indeed, far from seeking to outlaw discrimination on this ground, certain legal provisions discussed below implied that until recently such discrimination was approved of by the law and therefore by society. However, the situation has changed, partly as a result of the election of the Labour Government in 1997, meaning that 138 See below for consideration of certain exclusions.

139 SI 2001/2030, Art 3(a).

140 See Special Educational Needs and Disability Act 2001

141 Texts referred to: M Connolly (2006), op. cit., fn 1; E Heinze, Sexual Orientation: A Human Right: An Essay on International Human Rights Law, 1995, Martinus Nijhoff; Wintemute, R, 'Recognising new kinds of direct sex discrimination: transsexualism, sexual orientation and dress codes' (1997) 60(3) MLR 334; Bamforth, Sexuality, Morals and Justice, 1997, Continuum; Skidmore (1997) 26(1) ILJ 51;. For discussion from a non-liberal standpoint, see Stychin, C, Law's Desire: Sexuality and the Limits of Justice, 1995, Routledge. See also: Rubin, G, 'Section 146 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 and the decriminalisation of homosexual acts in the armed forces' [1996] Crim LR 393; Smith, AM, New Rights Discourses on Race and Sexuality,1994, CUP; Duffy, P, 'A case for equality' (1998) EHRLR 134; Wintemute, R, 'Lesbian and gay inequality 2000: the potential of the HRA and the need for an Equality Act 2002' (2000) 6 EHRLR 603; Hewitt, P, The Abuse of Power, 1982, Chapter 9; Wintemute, R, Sexual Orientation and Human Rights: The US Constitution, the ECHR and the Canadian Charter, 1995; Hervey, T and O'Keeffe, D (eds), Sex Equality Law in the European Union, 1996, Chancery, Chapter 17; Wilkinson, B, 'Moving towards equality: homosexual law reform in Ireland' (1994) 45 NILQ 252; Wilets, The Human Rights of Sexual Minorities, 1996, Continuum; Pannick, D, 'Homosexuals, transsexuals and the law' [1983] PL 279; Crane, P, Gays and the Law, 1982, Pluto.

a greater willingness to introduce anti-sexual orientation discrimination legislation became apparent, but most importantly due to developments in EU law.

Prior to 2003 there was clearly a growing recognition in Europe that discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation amounted to a general problem which should be addressed. A report compiled for the Commission of the European Communities in May 1993[142] on discrimination against homosexuals found that the UK was one of the worst offenders and was one of only four member states which provided no legal protection against discrimination. The report also criticised the Commission, which had argued that homosexuality is a matter to be left to individual governments. The Report recommended that human rights for homosexuals should be enshrined in European Community law.

The EOC, in the wake of the Lustig-Prean case,[143] proposed that there should be a statutory provision outlawing discrimination in employment and other fields on the ground of sexual orientation. The Labour Government, however, responded only by introducing an unenforceable Code of Practice covering such discrimination.[144] A Code of Practice was clearly unlikely to have much influence. It could not outlaw discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation and was likely to be ignored by many employers. The very fact that a Code rather than a statute was introduced signalled to employers and others that this was not a significant matter.

The Employment Equality (Sexual Orientation) Regulations 2003 were inroduced in response to the Framework Directive; until that point no specific protection from discrimination on this ground was offered in UK law. At present a person who is treated detrimentally in terms of housing or in educational provision outside the educational contexts covered by the regulations, or is adversely treated on the ground of sexual orientation in terms of access to goods and services, will find that no dedicated anti-discrimination legislation specifically covers his or her situation, although this situation should change later in 2007. New regulations are to be introduced in 2007, extending the protection offered from discrimination on this ground into the field of goods and services. Thus the unprotected area is incrementally diminishing.

Thus some protection is available, but the protection is clearly inadequate when compared with that available in respect of race or sex discrimination. Owing to the current gap in the law, leaving discrimination on this ground in certain contexts to go relatively unchecked, the HRA and European Convention on Human Rights may be looked to as a method of providing some protection for the right to freedom from discrimination of homosexuals.[145] At the present time, certain legal provisions, discussed below, appear to imply that discrimination on this ground is still, in certain spheres of activity, approved of by the law and therefore by society. Articles 8 and 14 of the Convention are the Articles most likely to be utilised to fill the gaps in the current law. Indeed, the HRA and Convention offer a protection from sexual orientation discrimination that is almost certainly broader than that which they offer to persons affected by discrimination on grounds of sex, outside the contexts covered by the SDA.

142 By Peter Ashman, Director of the Independent European Human Rights Foundation.

143 See pp 1520–21 below.

144 In February 2000, the government asked the EOC to draw up a Code governing this area: Daily Telegraph, 18 February 2000.

145 See Wintemute, R, 'Recognising new kinds of direct sex discrimination: transsexualism, sexual orientation and dress codes' (1997) 60(3) MLR 334.

Comprehensive anti-discrimination legislation, reaching into the contexts uncovered by the current regulations, is still clearly needed. It would have a dual function. It would offer a remedy which is only currently available in the spheres of employment and vocational training. Secondly, it would affirm symbolically the abhorrence of society for homophobic attitudes and behaviour in the key contexts. It would be likely, eventually, to have the effect of indicating to persons inclined to homophobic views that those views are as unacceptable in society as racist or sexist ones.

EU provisions

Article 6a of the Amsterdam Treaty, signed by the member states on 19 June 1997, provided that the Council could adopt provisions intended to combat discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation. The pressure coming from Europe, within the EC and Convention systems, for the introduction of measures to combat discrimination on this ground found realistion within European Council Directive 2000/78/EC, the Framework Directive,[146] on equal opportunities in employment which, inter alia, required the extension of anti-discrimination measures to cover the ground of sexual orientation. The Employment Equality (Sexual Orientation) Regulations 2003 Regulations introduced in order to implement the Framework Directive now cover discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation, but only in the context of employment. Part 3 of the Equality Act 2006 provides a power to extend the coverage of the regulations into other fields and in January 2007 the Sexual Orientation (Goods and Services) Regulations were passed by Parliament to apply in Northern Ireland. The equivalent regulations for Britain are expected to be introduced into Parliament in 2007, so the current gap in the law is expected to be merely temporary. If the domestic implementation of the Directive is inadequate in providing full protection for persons discriminated against on grounds of sexual orientation in employment or vocational training, it could be challenged in the ECJ. Its adequacy is considered below.

The Sex Discrimination Act

There have been various attempts to bring homosexuals within the SDA. Although it is no longer necessary to seek to do this in the context of employment or vocational training, it would be worth trying to show that the SDA applied to sexual orientation discrimination in the other contexts it covers. Prior to the inception of the HRA, it became clear that a homosexual applicant could not fall within the SDA unless he or she could show that someone of the opposite sex would have been treated more favourably. In other words, where a lesbian woman or gay man would be subjected to equal and unfavourable treatment, no action would lie[147] since it was found that s 1 of the SDA is concerned with grounds of sex, not sexual orientation. In the UK courts it was also found in 1996 that applicants treated unfavourably because of their sexual orientation are not covered by the Equal Treatment Directive.

146 Adopted under the Treaty Establishing the European Community (TEC), Art 13.
147 Smith v Gardner Merchant [1996] ICR 790; [1996] IRLR 342, noted [1996] 67 EOR 48.

However, in 1997, it appeared that the weak position of homosexuals who are dismissed from employment or otherwise detrimentally treated might be about to change under the influence of EU law. In Case 13/14 P v S and Cornwall CC,[148] P was dismissed from her employment on the ground that she was a transsexual. Her application under the SDA 1975 failed as it was found that transsexuals were outside the terms of the Act. As indicated above, it was found that her case fell within the Equal Treatment Directive on the basis that the Directive is simply the expression of the principle of equality, which is one of the fundamental principles of European Union law. Once it was found that transsexuals were within the Directive, it appeared probable that it would also cover homosexuals. The words 'on grounds of sex' within the Directive could be found to relate, inter alia, to the sex of the partner. Thus, where a woman was in a partnership with a man, she would not be likely to experience adverse treatment on that ground. But where a woman was or was potentially in partnership with a woman, she might experience discrimination on that ground. In that respect, discrimination 'on grounds of sex' could include discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation. In other words, if discrimination occurs due to the fact that a person's partner is or is potentially of the 'wrong' gender, the Directive could, in principle, cover such a situation.

This argument was considered in Secretary of State for Defence ex p Perkins,[149] which concerned the ban on homosexuals in the armed services, and it was determined that, owing to the P v S decision, the case must be referred to the ECJ. In Case 249/96, Grant v South West Trains Ltd,[150] it was argued that a refusal to allow a lesbian partner the same employment perks as those which would be allowed to a heterosexual partner is discrimination contrary to the Directive and Art 119 (as it was). The Advocate General gave his Opinion that discrimination contrary to the Equal Pay Directive and Art 119 had occurred. However, the Court failed to decide in the same way, taking the view that discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation is not covered, with the result that lesbians and homosexuals were unable to claim in the domestic courts any pay or fringe benefits currently only available to heterosexuals. Thus, the Court refused to take this step forward in terms of outlawing discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation. In Grant, EU law stepped out of harmony with ECHR law, as interpreted in Lustig-Prean v UK and Smith and Grady v UK. The most pressing need at that time was then to outlaw discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation within decisions as to dismissal and appointment. When provision was made in that sphere it still meant that the argument rejected in Perkins could be raised in the contexts in which protection was not available, where they were covered by the SDA.

Smith v Gardner Merchant[151] followed Grant; the Court of Appeal found that a male homosexual could bring a claim under the SDA, but only if he could show that a female homosexual would have been treated more favourably. In other words, the claim would have to be based on grounds of gender and not on grounds of sexual orientation. However, it appeared possible, once the HRA was in force, that a different interpretation of the SDA could be adopted, and that it would be possible to find that discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation can be covered. This interpretation

148 Judgment of 30 April 1996; [1996] ECR I-2143; [1996] IRLR 347.
149 [1997] IRLR 297.
150 [1998] IRLR 206.
151 [1998] 3 All ER 852.

was adopted in MacDonald v MOD,[152] a Scottish case relying on the Convention. It was found that a creative interpretation of s 1 of the SDA on the lines indicated above, referring to the gender of a partner, would allow sexual orientation to fall within the Act. This decision was, however, overturned by the Court of Sessions, which followed Smith v Gardner Merchant.

In Secretary of State for Defence v Scotland; Pearce v Mayfield Secondary School Governing Body the House of Lords considered the joined cases of Pearce and of McDonald since they raised the same issue: could sexual orientation discrimination fall within the SDA? The House of Lords held that in these cases the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 does not protect persons from discrimination on the grounds of sexuality. They also overturned the previous decision of the EAT in Burton v De Vere Hotels Ltd,[153] discussed below, and concluded that sexual harassment is not unlawful discrimination in itself but requires a comparison with how a comparator of the opposite sex was or would have been treated. Mr Macdonald had been discharged from the RAF after having admitted to being gay. Ms Pearce was a teacher at Mayfield Secondary School. She came out as a lesbian and then suffered homophobic abuse by pupils at the school, including the use of words such as 'dyke', 'lesbian shit', 'lemon', 'lezzie' or 'lez'. Ms Pearce was driven to resign from her job as a teacher after this vicious campaign of anti-lesbian abuse from pupils. She claimed sex discrimination, arguing that the school had failed to take effective action to protect her from homophobic harassment. An employment tribunal (ET) dismissed her claim. It found that the detrimental treatment was on grounds of sexual orientation rather than sex and that there could only be discrimination if a hypothetical male homosexual teacher would have been treated differently from Ms Pearce; there was no evidence that this was the case. In other words, a homosexual male teacher would have been treated equally badly.

Both cases predated implementation of the Human Rights Act 1998, which therefore could not directly assist them in obtaining redress. The new Employment Equality (Sexual Orientation) Regulations 2003 had not come into force. As a result, both applicants had to seek to rely on the SDA to obtain a remedy. Both applicants conceded that the words 'on the grounds of sex' in the SDA do not include 'on the grounds of sexual orientation'. Both applicants broadly advanced the same argument before the House of Lords. Their case was that Mr Macdonald was discharged from the RAF for being attracted to men. A woman in the same circumstances would not be discharged for being attracted to men. A female comparator would therefore be treated more favourably because she is a woman and not a man. The fact that Mr Macdonald was gay and the comparator was a heterosexual was not it was argued a relevant factor in making the like-for-like comparison.

The House of Lords found that in the context of s 1 SDA 'sex' means gender and does not include sexual orientation. Thus harassment on the grounds of sexual orientation does not of itself amount to discrimination on the grounds of sex for the purposes of the SDA. Ms Pearce had argued that the appropriate comparator for establishing whether she had been less favourably treated under the SDA was a heterosexual man. He would also have been attracted to women, but would not have been treated in the same way as her. In other words, she was arguing that the potential partner's gender could be the determining factor; the discrimination was on grounds of gender because had Ms Pearce been male and attracted to women she would not have suffered the abuse.

152 [2001] 1 All ER 620. On appeal: 2001 SLT 819. HL decision in McDonald v MOD; Pearce v Mayfield School: [2003] IRLR 512.

153 [1996] IRLR 596.

However, the Lords disagreed. In their view this was not comparing 'like with like', as required by s 5(3) SDA. They considered that the appropriate comparison was with a homosexual man. Since Ms Pearce had accepted that the pupils would have pursued a similar campaign of harassment against a homosexual teacher, she could not establish that she had been treated 'less favourably' on the ground of her sex. Ms Pearce also argued that the use of words such as 'lezzie' amounted to 'gender-specific' harassment. This, it was submitted, was capable of amounting to less favourable treatment on the ground of her sex without the need to identify a male comparator. The Lords disagreed. The House of Lords found that, if the treatment is gender specific, it will suggest that the reason for the harassment is the woman's gender but it would not dispense with the need for the ET to be satisfied that the reason why she was being harassed was her sex. In Ms Pearce's case, it was clear that it was her sexual orientation, not her gender, which was the reason for the abuse she suffered.

The House of Lords conclusively rejected this argument. It found that the sexual orientation of the applicants was a relevant factor that had to be taken into account in making a like-for-like comparison. In the above examples, the reason for the treatment was the sexual orientation. For Mr Macdonald, therefore, his female comparator also had to be gay, otherwise the comparison would not involve comparing like with like. A gay male applicant must show that he had been treated less favourably than a lesbian comparator. That it was found was not the evidence in the instant case which was to the effect – in relation to Mr McDonald – that a gay female would also have been discharged. The situation was the same, in reverse, for Ms Pearce. The case could therefore not succeed. The House of Lords was influenced by the finding, already considered, that sexual orientation discrimination is not covered by the Equal Treatment Directive.

At present, there seems to be a possibility of bringing about change in the contexts currently uncovered by the 2003 Regulations – housing, provision of goods and services, aspects of education. A court might take the view that since the MacDonald; Pearce case was not decided under the HRA, a different approach could be adopted, using s 3 of the HRA to interpret s 1 of the SDA purposively in order to give effect to the protection for sexual orientation within Art 8, relying on Lustig-Prean v UK and Smith and Grady v UK (discussed below). In taking this radical approach, such a court could find support from the House of Lords' decision in R v A[154] in which the Lords went so far as to read words into a statute in order to achieve a result that they viewed as in compliance with Art 6 of the Convention.

Employing the HRA against sexual orientation discrimination

The HRA is significant in this field in three respects. First a free-standing action could be brought under it, relying on s 7(1(a), against a public authority – but not a private body – allegedly discriminating on this ground. Second, any body, including private bodies allegedly discriminating on this ground in reliance on legislative provisions in, for example, housing could find that the use of s 3 HRA means that the discrimination is outlawed. Third, the reach of the Sexual Orientation Regulations could be broadened by reliance on ss 3 and 6 HRA. So long as either s 3 or s 6 HRA (or both) were applicable, a person discriminated against on grounds of sexual orientation could seek to rely on Art 8, either read with Art 14 or on its own. Article 14 only operates in conjunction with another Convention Article. But even where that other Article is not itself breached, a breach might be found when it is read with Art 14.

154 See Chapter 4, pp 174–76.

But if the regulations are inapplicable, the alleged discriminator is not a public authority, and no statutory provision (other than – arguably – the SDA) covers the alleged discrimination, the Human Rights Act can be of no assistance, even though at Strasbourg a remedy would be available, relying on Arts 14 and 8 combined. The only way of finding a remedy domestically in that circumstance would be to seek to rely on the SDA, probably bolstered by use of s 3 HRA. But arguments in reliance on the SDA have met with no success so far. As Chapter 2 explained, Protocol 12 provides a free-standing right to freedom from discrimination.[155] However, as indicated above, the domestic response to Protocol 12 is at present not very favourable. As will be indicated, the HRA provides the best possibility of providing protection from discrimination on this ground in a number of these fields, where a public authority has some responsibility for the discrimination in question.[156] The discussion below considers the provisions that can be utilised to seek to provide protection from discrimination on this ground in the various fields that would normally appear in anti-discrimination legislation, other than employment and vocational training.

The guarantee of freedom from discrimination under Art 14 of the Convention, received into domestic law under the HRA, covers discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation through its use of the words 'without discrimination on any ground such as . . .'.[157] Therefore, a number of possibilities are open. As indicated above and in Chapter 2, Art 14 only operates in conjunction with another Convention Article. But even where that other Article is not itself breached, a breach may be found when it is read with Art 14.

Prior to the inception of the HRA, judicial review provided a means of challenging decisions or policies having a discriminatory effect, but until the HRA came into force, the threshold for challenge was set so high that it provided an ineffective remedy. This was made clear in the case discussed below. In the UK until recently, homosexuals were barred from the merchant navy and the armed forces, where homosexual acts were classed as 'disgraceful conduct',[158] although the armed forces in Belgium, Denmark, France, The Netherlands and Spain are all open to homosexuals. The legality of the policy of the Ministry of Defence in maintaining the ban was challenged in Ministry of 155 See Chapter 2, p 106; for further discussion on Protocol 12, see Khaliq [2001] PL 457.

156 See Wintemute, R, 'Recognising new kinds of direct sex discrimination: transsexualism, sexual orientation and dress codes' (1997) 60(3) MLR 334.

157 Salgueiro da Silva Monta v Portugal [2001] 1 FCR 653. In Dudgeon (1982) 4 EHRR 149 the Court of Human Rights was asked to consider the application of Art 14 read in conjunction with Art 8. It appeared to assume that Art 14 did cover discrimination on this ground, although it found that it did not need to consider the application of Art 14 in the instant case since a breach of Art 8 had been found.

158 See the Army Act 1955, s 66; the Sexual Offences Act 1967, ss 1(5) and 2.

Defence ex p Smith and Others.[159] The applicants, homosexuals who had been dismissed owing to the existence of the ban, applied for review of the policy. Their application was dismissed at first instance in the Divisional Court and the applicants appealed.

Rejecting the argument of the MOD that it had no jurisdiction to review the legality of the policy in question, the Court applied the usual Wednesbury principles. This meant that it could not interfere with the exercise of an administrative discretion save where it was satisfied that the decision was unreasonable in the sense that it was beyond the range of responses open to a reasonable decision maker. But, in judging whether the decision maker had exceeded that margin of appreciation, the human rights context was important: '. . . the more substantial the interference with human rights, the more the Court will require by way of justification before it will be satisfied that the decision was reasonable.'[160] Applying such principles and taking into account the support of the policy in both Houses of Parliament, it could not be said that the policy crossed the threshold of irrationality, although it was criticised.

In Lustig-Prean v UK[161] and Smith and Grady v UK[162] the European Court of Human Rights found that the applicants had been subjected to treatment in breach of Art 8 when they were dismissed from the armed services on grounds of their sexual orientation. It may be noted that previously the Commission had rejected a challenge to the provision relating to the army as inadmissible on the argument that there is a special need to prevent disorder in the armed forces.[163] However, the Court found that the ban infringed Art 8 and Art 13; its absolute nature meant that it could not be viewed as being in proportion to a legitimate aim. Not only the ban itself, but also the intrusive questioning of the applicants after their homosexuality was suspected, was found to constitute an interference with the respect for their private life under Art 8. The applicants also argued that Art 3 had been infringed but, although the Court considered that this was a possibility in respect of discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation, it did not consider that the strict Art 3 test had been met in the circumstances of the case. As a result of this ruling, discharges from the armed services on grounds of sexual orientation have now ceased.

The ruling in Lustig-Prean has further implications. It could be utilised under the HRA relying on Arts 8 and 14 within the context of employment or vocational training as an alternative to relying on the 2003 Regulations. Or it could be relied upon outside the contexts covered by the regulations. Under the HRA, a public authority which detrimentally treated a homosexual on grounds of sexual orientation outside those contexts – for example, in housing – could be challenged in the courts under ss 6 and 7(1)(a) of the Act, relying on Art 8. Where a private body was the employer, the applicant could rely on s 3 of the HRA in seeking to persuade a tribunal to afford an interpretation to statutory provisions which would prevent the discrimination from 159 [1996] 1 All ER 257; [1996] ICR 740. Noted: Skidmore, P (1995) 24 ILJ 363; (1996) 25 ILJ 63. For discussion, see Skidmore, P, 'Sex, Gender and Comparators in Employment Discrimination' (1997) 26(1) ILJ 51; see also: Rubin, G, 'Section 146 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 and the decriminalisation of homosexual acts in the armed forces' [1996] Crim LR 393.

160 Ibid, p 263.

161 (1999) 29 EHRR 548; (1999) 7 BHRC 65.

162 (2000) 29 EHRR 493.

163 B v UK 34 D & R (1983); (1983) 6 EHRR 354.

occurring. This possibility would, of course, also be available in proceedings against a public authority. But the ruling of the Court in Lustig-Prean could only be relied upon under s 2 HRA when seeking review of a decision or policy of a public authority which was discriminatory on grounds of sexual orientation. If the UK fails to introduce anti-discrimination legislation in the contexts uncovered by the regulations, s 7(1)(a) of the HRA provides an important substitute means of obtaining a remedy, at least where the other party is a public authority. This route could be not be used in respect of discriminatory actions outside the employment or vocational training context by private bodies where no statutory provision was relevant.

Despite that important limitation, the potential of the HRA in this area has not yet been realised. So long as the alleged discriminator is a public authority under s 6 of the HRA, there are a number of other possibilities, not all of which depend on using Art 8 (which has already shown its potential in this area read alone), but there might also be instances in which, although an invasion of privacy grounded on homosexuality fell within one of the exceptions, it could nevertheless be established taking Art 14 into account owing to its discriminatory nature. It could range far outside the contexts covered by the discussion above and far beyond the contexts covered by the SDA or RRA. Article 6 might be used where a homosexual was refused a hearing in, for example, a child care or adoption case where a heterosexual would not have been so refused. Article 10 read in conjunction with Art 14 might offer protection to expressions of the homosexual way of life such as the wearing of badges or even some physical gestures.[164] In Salgueiro da Silva Mouta v Portugal[165] the Court relied on Art 14 in finding that a breach had occurred where a parent was denied contact with his child on the ground of sexual orientation. The anomalies thereby created are part of the argument that the government must move to introduce the regulations covering goods and services promptly. However, that would still leave aspects of the context of education uncovered.

Sexual orientation discrimination in employment

Pre-2003 provision against unfair dismissal

Prior to 2003, if a lesbian or homosexual had been employed for at least two years before dismissal, the provisions against unfair dismissal under the Employment Rights Act 1996 (previously contained in the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978) could offer some protection, although a dismissal would be fair if it is for 'some other substantial reason of a kind to justify dismissal', provided that the employer had acted 164 In Masterson v Holden [1986] 3 All ER 39; [1986] 1 WLR 1017 the Divisional Court found that magistrates were entitled to view the behaviour of two homosexuals in kissing and cuddling as insulting for the purposes of the Metropolitan Police Act 1839, s 54(13). This approach might also be taken under the Public Order Act 1986, s 5, but such a wide interpretation of 'insulting' could allow many restrictions on the public expression of homosexuality, which might be in breach of Art 10, either read alone or in conjunction with Art 14. It appears that Art 10 does not cover homosexual intercourse per se, but may cover the physical as well as verbal expression of homosexual love: X v UK (1981) 3 EHRR 63.

165 [2001] 1 FCR 653, judgment of 21 December 1999.

reasonably. Where dismissal was on grounds of sexual orientation, a wide interpretation was given to the meaning of 'reasonable' in the older decisions. In Saunders v Scottish National Camps,[166] the applicant, who was employed as a maintenance handyman at a boys' camp, was dismissed on the grounds of homosexuality although his duties did not ordinarily bring him into contact with the boys. His dismissal was nevertheless held to be fair on the ground that many other employers would have responded in the same way. The decision is clearly open to attack on the ground that even when his duties brought him into contact with the boys, there would have been no more reason to believe that they would have been in danger from him than would girls from a male heterosexual. Similarly, it has been found that the dismissal of a homosexual from GCHQ as a threat to national security was not unreasonable, despite the fact that he had been open about his homosexuality and therefore could not be blackmailed.[167]

In the late 1990s, there was some recognition that discrimination on grounds of sex orientation was unacceptable. In O'Connor v Euromoney Publications Inc[168] the defendants admitted that O'Connor had been subjected to 'unacceptable and offensive' comments and had been discriminated against on the ground of his sexual orientation. He had also been dismissed from his job with the company. The respondents apologised and, in an out of court settlement, paid a large sum of damages in respect of the dismissal.

The Employment Equality (Sexual Orientation) Regulations 2003

There is now a new specific provision against discrimination on this ground. Discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation in employment and vocational training was covered from December 2003 by the Employment Equality (Sexual Orientation) Regulations 2003 implementing European Council Directive 2000/78/EC (the Framework Directive). The Equality Act 2006 s 81 provided the power to make the Sexual Orientation Regulations. The regulations cover discrimination against heterosexuals, bisexuals and homosexuals. Regulation 2(1) provides: 'In these Regulations, "sexual orientation" means a sexual orientation towards – (a) persons of the same sex; (b) persons of the opposite sex; or (c) persons of the same sex and of the opposite sex.'

The regulations cover discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation in employment and vocational training, and discrimination by way of victimisation or harassment on grounds of sexual orientation. A range of forms of employment detriment, including dismissal, are covered, as is adverse treatment on this ground in relation to vocational training.[169] The new Regulations are considered in more detail below.

166 (1981) EAT 7/80, judgment delivered 14 April 1980, for criticism, see quoted comments of Levin in Beer et al., Gay Workers, Trade Unions and the Law, 1981, National Council for Civil Liberties, p 27. See, to similar effect, Boychuk v Symons Holdings Ltd [1977] IRLR 395, but cf Bell v Devon and Cornwall Police Authority [1978] IRLR 283, McColgan, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 6, pp 387–97.

167 Director of GCHQ ex p Hodges (1988) COD 123; (1988) The Times, 26 July.

168 (1999) the Guardian, 6 June.

169 Regulation 6 of SI 2003 No 1661 provides :

(1) It is unlawful for an employer, in relation to employment by him at an establishment in Great Britain, to discriminate against a person –

(a) in the arrangements he makes for the purpose of determining to whom he should offer employment;

Clearly, merely offering a remedy where discrimination has occurred is only part of the answer to the problems caused where persons discriminate on this ground. Many homosexuals 'choose' discrimination-avoidance or harassment-avoidance by concealing their homosexuality. It has been found in a survey of 2,000 lesbians and gay men at work that 56% concealed their sexuality in all jobs and 33% concealed it in some.[170] A number of surveys have found evidence of widespread discrimination against persons on grounds of sexual orientation and a high incidence of harassment.[171] Offering a remedy in such instances must be a last resort and one that many persons would be unwilling to take. The discussion above as to claims based on the other protected grounds has sought to indicate that seeking to address discrimination through legal claims is fraught with difficulties and may leave a vulnerable person in a more vulnerable position.

Sexual orientation discrimination in education

The 2003 Regulations cover aspects of sexual orientation discrimination in higher and further education,[172] but do not cover schools. Discrimination against homosexuals

(b) in the terms on which he offers that person employment; or
(c) by refusing to offer, or deliberately not offering, him employment.

(2) It is unlawful for an employer, in relation to a person whom he employs at an establishment in Great Britain, to discriminate against that person –

(a) in the terms of employment which he affords him;
(b) in the opportunities which he affords him for promotion, a transfer, training, or receiving any other benefit;
(c) by refusing to afford him, or deliberately not affording him, any such opportunity; or
(d) by dismissing him, or subjecting him to any other detriment.

(3) It is unlawful for an employer, in relation to employment by him at an establishment in Great Britain, to subject to harassment a person whom he employs or who has applied to him for employment.
(4) Paragraph (2) does not apply to benefits of any description if the employer is concerned with the provision (for payment or not) of benefits of that description to the public, or to a section of the public which includes the employee in question, unless –

(a) that provision differs in a material respect from the provision of the benefits by the employer to his employees; or
(b) the provision of the benefits to the employee in question is regulated by his contract of employment; or
(c) the benefits relate to training.

(5) In paragraph (2)(d) reference to the dismissal of a person from employment includes reference –

(a) to the termination of that person's employment by the expiration of any period (including a period expiring by reference to an event or circumstance), not being a termination immediately after which the employment is renewed on the same terms; and
(b) to the termination of that person's employment by any act of his (including the giving of notice) in circumstances such that he is entitled to terminate it without notice by reason of the conduct of the employer.

170 See Palmer, A Survey of Lesbians and Gay Men at Work, 1993.

171 'Equality for lesbians and gay men in the work place' (1997) Equal Opportunities Review 20.

172 Regulation 20(1): It is unlawful, in relation to an educational establishment to which this regulation applies, for the governing body of that establishment to discriminate against a person –

(a) in the terms on which it offers to admit him to the establishment as a student;
(b) by refusing or deliberately not accepting an application for his admission to the establishment as student; or in the field of education was enshrined in s 2A of the Local Government Act 1986, inserted by s 28 of the Local Government Act 1988 and amended by s 104 of the Local Government Act 2000; it prohibited the deliberate promotion of homosexuality by local authorities or the teaching of 'the acceptability of homosexuality as a pretended family relationship'. Thus, local authorities could still fund certain groups so long as this was aimed at benefiting the group rather than at promoting homosexuality. Robertson argued that s 28 did not have a significant effect in schools, as local authorities do not directly control the curriculum[173] (and this is particularly the case under local management of schools). However, s 28 served to ratify and legitimise intolerance of homosexuals in education and outside it. In opposition, the Labour Party pledged to abolish s 28 and in government it brought forward a Bill in order to do so in 2000. The Scottish Parliament repealed 's 28' as far as Scotland is concerned under ss 25–26 of the Ethical Standards in Public Life (Scotland) Act 2000. The Labour Party's original Bill was defeated in the House of Lords, but the intention of the government continued to be to repeal s 28. This was eventually achieved by s 122 of the Local Government Act 2003. The Act repealed s 2A of the 1986 Act when it came into force.

A person discriminated against in the field of education, such as a pupil forced – in effect – to leave a school or other institution not covered by the regulations owing to homophobic bullying which appeared to be condoned by the authorities, could consider bringing an action in negligence against the institution in question or the education authority. But he or she could also bring an action under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA, relying on Arts 8 and 14, so long as the institution was a public authority. In relation to teaching Art 2 of the First Protocol might be used to argue that education in accordance with one's own philosophical convictions must include the need to allow some teaching about the homosexual way of life.

Sexual orientation discrimination in housing provision

Housing legislation tends to enshrine and rely on a limited notion of the 'family', and therefore it has led to discrimination against homosexuals living in a settled partnership.

(c) where he is a student of the establishment –
  (i) in the way it affords him access to any benefits,
  (ii) by refusing or deliberately not affording him access to them, or (iii) by excluding him from the establishment or subjecting him to any other detriment.

(2) It is unlawful, in relation to an educational establishment to which this regulation applies, for the governing body of that establishment to subject to harassment a person who is a student at the establishment, or who has applied for admission to the establishment as a student.

(3) Paragraph (1) does not apply if the discrimination only concerns training which would help fit a person for employment which, by virtue of regulation 7 (exception for genuine occupational requirement etc), the employer could lawfully refuse to offer the person in question.

(4) This regulation applies to the following educational establishments in England and Wales, namely –
  (a) an institution within the further education sector (within the meaning of section 91(3) of the Further and Higher Education Act 1992);
  (b) a university;
  (c) an institution, other than a university, within the higher education sector (within the meaning of section 91(5) of the Further and Higher Education Act 1992).

173 Robertson, G, Freedom, the Individual and the Law, 7th edn, 1993, p 382.

In Fitzpatrick v Sterling Housing Association[174] the Court of Appeal had to consider whether the homosexual partner of a deceased tenant could take over the tenancy under the Rent Act 1977, which limited such succession to persons who had lived with the original tenant 'as wife or husband' or were a member of his 'family'. The Court, by a majority, found that the term 'family' was to be construed in the conventional sense, bearing prevailing social attitudes in mind. It was found that a 'family' was an entity which consisted of 'persons of the opposite sex cohabiting as man and wife'. Ward LJ, dissenting, pointed out that a number of other European countries had begun to allow same-sex couples to enter into property agreements on the same basis as unmarried heterosexual couples and that the US Supreme Court had recently found that a family should include 'two adult lifetime partners whose relationship is long term and characterised by an emotional and financial commitment and interdependence'. He found that 'the trend is to shift the focus . . . from structure and components to function and appearance'. In other words, if a group acts as society expects a family to act, it is a family. He found that the exclusion of same-sex couples from the protection of the Rent Act which would follow from the preferred interpretation of the majority amounted to an assertion by society that their relationships are judged to be 'less worthy of respect, concern and consideration than the relationship between members of the opposite sex'.

On appeal, a bare majority of the House of Lords, in a landmark decision,[175] found that the term 'family' could be taken to include a cohabiting couple of the same sex. If it could be taken to include a cohabiting heterosexual couple, it was found that the term could be taken to include a homosexual one since, in principle, it was the bond and commitment between the two persons, not their sexual orientation, which was significant. The Lords did not consider, however, that a person could live with another of the same sex as his 'husband or wife'.

But in Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza[176] the Court of Appeal took a step further. On the death of a protected tenant of a dwelling-house his or her surviving spouse, if then living in the house, becomes a statutory tenant by succession. But a person who was living with the original tenant 'as his or her wife or husband' is treated as the spouse of the original tenant so also succeeds to the tenancy.[177] The Court of Appeal found that Sched 1, para 2 of the 1977 Act infringed Art 14. That breach could be remedied by way of s 3 HRA by construing the words 'as his or her wife or husband' in Sched 1, para 2 as if they meant 'as if they were his or her wife or husband'. In reaching this decision the Court found that Art 14 would be engaged even where there was 'the most tenuous link with another provision in the Convention' (Petrovic v Austria).[178] It considered that the positive obligation on the part of the state to promote the values that Art 8 protected was wide enough to bring legislation that affected the home within the ambit of Art 8. Marckx v Belgium[179] was applied and Michalak v Wandsworth LBC[180]

174 [1998] 2 WLR 225.
175 [1999] 3 WLR 1113.
176 [2003] 2 WLR 478; [2002] 4 All ER 1162.
177 Rent Act 1977, Sched 1, para 2(2).
178 (20458/92) (2001) 33 EHRR 14.
179 (A/31) (1979–80) 2 EHRR 330.
180 [2002] EWCA Civ 271.

was followed. The facts of the applicant's case did therefore fall within the ambit of Art 8 as that Article was understood for the purposes of Art 14(1). The House of Lords in Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza[181] used s 3 HRA to interpret the statute to avoid the discrimination against homosexuals. This meant not merely changing the meaning given to certain words, but the addition of (a few) words that were not included in the provision. The claim was that the inapplicability of this inheritance right to stable homosexual couples violated Art 8 read with Art 14.[182] The House of Lords managed to find that the words 'living with the tenant as his or her wife or husband' could be interpreted as meaning: 'living with the tenant, as if they were his or her wife or husband'.

Ghaidan is one of the most creative decisions under the HRA and demonstrates what can be done in this field – not only in relation to housing provision, but in other contexts too, if a statutory provision creates discrimination on this ground. Assuming that the protection against discrimination is extended into the housing context in 2007, as the government plans, there will be no need to rely on s 3 HRA and Arts 8 and 14 in relation to housing provision generally.[183] But in relation to specific statutory provisions such as the one at issue in Ghaidan it might appear at first sight that it would still be necessary to do so since the proposed Sexual Orientation (Goods and Services) regulations are secondary legislation. However, although they are secondary legislation, they will be enacted to give effect to an EU Directive which is directly effective – the Framework Directive – and therefore the supremacy of EU law doctrine applies and, depending on interpretation, including the possibility of employing s 3 HRA, the offending statutory provision might have to be disapplied, as in Factortame. This argument rests on the assumption that the new 2007 Regulations would cover a Ghaidan type of situation; they may not do so. If not, the Directive itself, if sufficiently precise, could be relied upon against emanations of the state or, alternatively, the new Commission for Human Rights and Equality could seek judicial review of the 2007 Regulations on the basis of inadequate implementation of the Directive.

4 Direct discrimination on grounds of sex, marital status, gender reassignment, race, disability, sexual orientation

As discussed above, the legislation, apart from the DDA, recognises two types of discrimination – direct and indirect. It is worth noting that it is important to plead the right type of discrimination at the outset or to plead both in the alternative. Ali v

181 [2004] 2 AC 557 (HL). The case concerned the re-interpretation of a statute so as to give members of homosexual couples the same rights to succeed to tenancies upon the death of their partner as were enjoyed by heterosexual couples.

182 The right to non-discrimination in the exercise of Convention rights.

183 The Regulations currently covering Northern Ireland cover disposal or management of premises; under reg 6(1) 'It is unlawful for a person with power to dispose of any premises to discriminate against another –

(a) in the terms on which he offers him those premises; or
(b) by refusing his application for those premises; or
(c) in his treatment of him in relation to any list of persons in need of premises of that description.

Office for National Statistics[184] was brought as a case of direct discrimination The Court of Appeal, in a narrow and technical interpretation of the provisions, placed a strong emphasis on pleading the right type of discrimination claimed (direct or indirect) at an early stage decision. In this case Mr Ali claimed that he was racially discriminated against when applying for two different jobs at the Office for National Statistics. In his original application, he asked the tribunal to consider whether he had been victimised or discriminated against on racial grounds contrary to the 1976 RRA. He won a claim of direct discrimination, but when this was overturned on appeal, the Employment Appeals Tribunal (EAT) sent the case back to the tribunal to be reheard. Mr Ali then tried to amend his claim to include indirect as well as direct discrimination. However, the tribunal decided that, even though his original claim referred to racial discrimination in general, this amounted to a new claim, which was being brought out of time. The tribunal noted that direct discrimination and indirect discrimination are two different types of unlawful acts and, therefore, a person who alleged in his original application to the tribunal that he had been directly discriminated against must seek permission to amend his or her claim inside the time limit, to include a claim of indirect discrimination.

Sex discrimination

The concept of direct discrimination on grounds of sex governed by s 1(1)(a) of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 embodies the formal equality approach. It involves showing that the applicant has been less favourably treated than a man has been or would be treated. There is little guidance in the Act as to the basis for comparison; s 5(3) merely provides that there must be no material difference between the situations of the man and the woman. Thus, the comparison is between a woman and a comparable man. It should be noted that it is possible for the applicant to compare herself with a hypothetical man; the issue is not whether a man or a woman receives a benefit, but whether the woman would have been better treated if she had been a man.

The test can be broken down into three stages. First, the woman must show that there has been differentiation in the treatment afforded to herself and a man (or a hypothetical man). Motive is irrelevant; the question at this stage is merely whether a woman has been treated one way and a man another. Second, she must show that her treatment has been less favourable and third, following the ruling of the House of Lords in James v Eastleigh BC,[185] that there is a causal relationship between her sex and the treatment; in other words that but for her sex, she would have been treated as favourably as a man was or would have been (see also Glasgow CC v Zafar).[186] Following Birmingham CC ex p EOC[187] it is not necessary to show that the less favourable treatment is accorded through an intention to discriminate: motive is irrelevant.

184 (2005) unreported.

185 [1990] AC 751; [1990] 2 All ER 607; [1989] IRLR 318; [1989] 3 WLR 122; the 'but for' test applied in James was put forward by Lord Goff in the House of Lords in Birmingham CC ex p EOC (1989) 18 ILJ 247; for comment, see Ellis (1989) 52 MLR 710.

186 [1998] ICR 120.

187 [1989] AC 1155; [1989] 1 All ER 769.

Proving direct discrimination

The plaintiff bore the burden of showing that the differential treatment was on grounds of sex and not for some neutral reason. She was always likely to find difficulty in discharging this burden of proof, as the ruling in Saunders v Richmond-upon-Thames LBC[188] suggests. The applicant applied for a job as a golf professional and was asked questions at the interview which were prima facie discriminatory. She was asked, for example, whether she thought she would be able to control unruly male players and whether she considered the job unglamorous. She was not appointed, although she was somewhat better qualified than the man who was. The EAT held that had her qualifications been substantially better than those of the appointee, that would have raised a prima facie inference of discrimination which the employer would have had to rebut by giving a satisfactory explanation. It was found that the nature of the questions, taking all the circumstances into account, did not of themselves raise a sufficient inference.

In Khanna v MOD[189] it was found that the evidential burden would shift only when the evidence was all on one side, but this was clarified by the finding in Dornan v Belfast CC[190] that once the woman has raised a prima facie inference of discrimination, the burden would shift to the employer to show that the differentiation occurred on non-discriminatory grounds. In other words, although the plaintiff began the case bearing the burden of proof, it might shift to the defendant once a certain stage was reached. Thus, the formal burden of proof remained on the plaintiff, but once it appeared that a minimum threshold of proof of discrimination is established, the burden shifted to the defendant. Now, under amendments to the Act introduced by the EU-driven Sex Discrimination (Indirect Discrimination and Burden of Proof) Regulations 2001 the complainant need not prove her case, merely the facts of the case, from which the court of tribunal should draw inferences of discrimination if the employer does not provide a satisfactory explanation.[191] This shift in the burden of proof only applies, however, in employment cases.[192] In Igen v Wong[193] and in Chamberlain and Emezie v Emokpae and Webster v Brunel University[194] the Court of Appeal introduced new guidelines on the burden of proof in discrimination claims, which are set out below.[195]

In order to raise a prima facie case of direct discrimination it is not enough to show that a member of a protected group was treated unfavourably. In University of Huddersfield v Wolff[196] a female lecturer was rejected for promotion in favour of a male colleague. She complained of direct sex discrimination. Those facts alone were not found to be enough to raise a prima facie case and transfer the burden of proof to the University.

188 [1978] IRLR 362.
189 [1981] ICR 653, EAT.
190 [1990] IRLR 179. See, further, [1990] IRLR 161.
191 The Regulations came into force on 12 October 2001.
192 See SDA 63A and 66A.
193 [2005] ICR 931, para 76.
194 8 February 2004, unreported.
195 See pp 1586–87.
196 [2004] ICR 828.

Discrimination on grounds of maternity and child care

As discussed above, adverse treatment on grounds of pregnancy and maternity leave is no longer treated as discrimination but as a wrong in itself under the SDA, after changes introduced in 2005. Section 3A, as indicated above, now covers certain forms of detrimental action based on pregnancy and maternity leave. However, some detrimental treatment on grounds of maternity not covered by s 3A may still need to be argued as direct sex discrimination. In other words, if the discriminatory action appears to be based on pregnancy or child birth but is not covered by s 3A, the sex discrimination provisions may need to be relied upon, so the case law below is still relevant. It also demonstrates why it was necessary to introduce s 3A.

The problem that s 3A sets out to solve is that is very difficult to conceptualise pregnancy discrimination as sex discrimination due to the need for a male comparator. Detrimental action on the ground of maternity might appear to be discriminatory on grounds of sex since only women can be pregnant, but the wording of s 1(1) does not allow such action to fall readily within the scope of direct discrimination because in making the comparison between a woman and a man it is required under s 5(3) that 'the relevant circumstances in the one case are the same or not materially different in the other'. Dismissal on grounds of pregnancy was covered by s 60 of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978, which provided that if a woman were dismissed because she was pregnant then the dismissal was automatically unfair, but in order to rely on this an employee had to have been employed for two years; where this was not the case, the employee had to seek to show that the 1975 Act applied. Pregnancy dismissals were regulated from October 1994 by ss 23–25 of and Scheds 2 and 3 to the Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Act (TURERA) 1993,[197] and then by s 99 of the Employment Rights Act 1996. Under s 99, such dismissal was unfair from the date on which employment begins. Further, under s 47C of the 1996 Act, as amended by the Employment Relations Act 1999, an employee has the right not to be subjected to a detriment done for a prescribed reason. Such reason is prescribed by regulations made by the Secretary of State and relates to pregnancy, maternity, childbirth, and maternity leave. Section 3A can also be relied on if the dismissal occurs within the protected period and is based on pregnancy or maternity leave.

Since pregnancy dismissals were therefore only recently addressed under other legislation, applicants sought to rely on the SDA.[198] The decisions discussed below could now be relied upon in an action in which it was argued that other employment discrimination based on maternity had arisen which also fell outside s 3A. Section 47 of the 1996 Act would provide a further possible argument in such circumstances. A pregnancy dismissal was at issue in Turley v Allders;[199] since the applicant did not have the requisite period of continuous employment, she sought to rely on the SDA. The EAT held that there was no male equivalent to a pregnant woman and therefore, as no comparison could be made, the action must fail. However, a method of making 197 The TURERA sections mentioned implemented the EC Pregnancy Directive 92/85.

198 See Fredman, S, 'A difference with distinction: pregnancy and parenthood re-assessed' (1994) 110 LQR 106.

199 [1980] ICR 66.

the comparison was found in a later EAT decision, Hayes v Malleable WMC;[200] it was found that it could be made between a pregnant woman and a man with a long-term health problem. Thus, it would be direct discrimination if a woman was dismissed on grounds of pregnancy where a man needing the same period of absence through illness would not have been dismissed. This analogy was not well received;[201] it has been pointed out that pregnancy is a healthy, normal state, not an illness;[202] moreover, it may be planned, unlike an unexpected illness, and in any event there will normally be far more notice before the absence takes place than there would be in a case of illness. Commentators have found the comparison between a pregnant woman and a diseased man inherently distasteful. It is also, most pertinently, highly disadvantageous to women, a very high percentage of whom may become pregnant at some time during their working life and in particular between the ages of 20 and 35 (the time when women are most likely to become pregnant), while the percentage of men likely to take around two or more months off work during those years owing to an illness or accident is clearly likely to be far lower.

The Hayes approach was abandoned after certain decisions of the European Court of Justice. In Dekker v VJV Centrum[203] the Court found that a woman who was not appointed to a post because she was pregnant at the time of the interview, although she was considered to be the best candidate, was the victim of direct discrimination. Webb v Emo Air Cargo (UK) Ltd[204] concerned the dismissal of the claimant after it was found that she was pregnant. She had been recruited to replace an employee going on maternity leave, but had then discovered herself to be pregnant and therefore (it seemed) unavailable for duties in the period required. The question was whether her dismissal constituted direct discrimination within the terms of s 1(1)(a) of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975, in the light of Community law. The Court of Appeal continued the Hayes approach in determining that if a man with a medical condition as nearly comparable as possible (with the same practical effect upon availability to do the job) with pregnancy would also have been dismissed, then the dismissal of the woman was not sex discrimination. Thus, the plaintiff who was, owing to pregnancy, unavailable for duties in the period required, could be dismissed without infringing the SDA because a diseased man who was similarly unavailable at the relevant time would also have been dismissed. The argument was therefore rejected that since only a woman can be pregnant, it followed that a woman who is dismissed for any reason related to her pregnancy is dismissed because of her sex and thus discriminated against. The House of Lords favoured the approach of the Court of Appeal, but since it considered that the relevant rulings of the European Court of Justice did not indicate clearly whether the dismissal would be regarded as based on pregnancy or on unavailability at the relevant time, it referred the following question to the Court:

200 [1985] ICR 703. See also Brown v Rentokil Ltd [1992] IRLR 302; Shomer v B and R Residential Lettings Ltd [1992] IRLR 317. It may be noted that dismissal on grounds of pregnancy seems to be increasing. The EOC cited a number of such instances in its 1991 report.

201 See Proposals of the Equal Opportunities Commission: Equal Treatment for Men and Women, 1988, Chapter 2.

202 Lacey (1987) 14 JLS 411, p 417.

203 [1991] IRLR 27; [1990] ECR I-3941.

204 [1993] 1 WLR 49, HL; [1992] 1 CMLR 793, CA.

Is it discrimination on grounds of sex contrary to the Equal Treatment Directive for an employer to dismiss a female employee:

(a) whom it engaged for the specific purpose of replacing another female employee during the latter's forthcoming maternity leave,
(b) when very shortly after appointment the employer discovers that the appellant herself will be absent on maternity leave during the maternity period of the other employee and the employer dismisses her because it needs the jobholder to be at work during that period, and
(c) had the employer known of the pregnancy of the appellant at the date of appointment she would not have been appointed, and
(d) the employer would similarly have dismissed a male employee engaged for this purpose who required leave of absence at the relevant time for medical or other reasons?

The European Court of Justice found that the plaintiff should not be compared with a man unavailable for work for medical or other reasons, since pregnancy is not in any way comparable with pathological conditions. The Court then found that, since the plaintiff had been employed permanently, her dismissal could not be justified on the ground of inability to fulfil a fundamental condition of her employment contract because her inability to perform the work was purely temporary. In other words, it could not be said that she had been taken on solely to cover a maternity leave. The Court further found that the protection of Community law for pregnant women could not be dependent on the question whether the woman's presence at work during the maternity leave period is essential to the undertaking in which she is employed. Thus, dismissal of the plaintiff clearly constituted sex discrimination, contrary to the Equal Treatment Directive. (When the House of Lords reconsidered the case in the light of these findings, it allowed the appeal and remitted the case to the IT to consider the award of compensation to the applicant (Webb (No 2)).[205]

In a similar decision, Habermann-Beltermann,[206] rather than relying directly upon unavailability, the employer sought to rely upon the statutory exclusion (with criminal sanctions)[207] of pregnant women from night work, which 'caused' Habermann-Beltermann's temporary unavailability for work. The Court's decision that the statute could not justify Habermann-Beltermann's dismissal, or the termination of her contract, reflects a refusal to focus upon a male norm or to pander to the argument that the continuation of the employment relationship in such circumstances produces undue financial burdens upon the employer.[208] However, in both Habermann-Beltermann and Webb, the Court refused to confront clearly the question whether any adverse treatment of women connected with pregnancy amounts to sex discrimination. In both judgments, the crucial fact upon which the Court relied was that the employment contracts in 205 [1994] QB 718; [1994] 4 All ER 115; [1994] 3 WLR 941. Webb was applied in O'Neill (1996) The Times, 7 June in relation to a pregnancy dismissal. Following Webb, the dismissal was found to be unlawful.

206 [1994] ECR I-1657.

207 The German Mütterschutzgesetz (MSchG), para 8(1), which prohibits the employment of pregnant or breast-feeding women on night work.

208 See the Opinion of the Advocate General, para 16.

question were of a permanent and not a fixed term nature. The decision of the Court in both cases was based upon the mismatch between the period for which the employee would be unavailable and the period for which she had been employed (indefinitely). This was a very significant development from the stark statement of principle in Dekker. The court's conclusion that the termination of Habermann-Beltermann's contract was not 'on the ground of pregnancy' but by reason of the statutory provision in the MSchG, opens the door to a narrower interpretation of the Dekker ruling than that ruling seemed at first to promise.[209] The result was that the Court, unlike the Advocate General,[210] was able to avoid making explicit the point that a justification based on availability, with reference to market cost to the employer, would be by definition excluded in a case of direct discrimination on grounds of pregnancy, thereby, by implication, leaving it open in future cases.

Likewise, the ruling in Webb is not ultimately fully supportive of substantive equality since it leaves open the possibility of an apparently neutral explanation for pregnancy dismissals: that a pregnant woman recruited on a temporary basis may justifiably be dismissed if unable through unavailability to fulfil the purpose for which she was recruited. The argument is therefore left open that if a temporarily employed man or hypothetical man would have been dismissed, if unable through unavailability to satisfy a purpose for which he was employed, a woman so unavailable through pregnancy, who has been dismissed, has not been discriminated against. Therefore, by the recruitment of temporary staff, the employer can safeguard its market position. Elements of the ruling, however, suggest a desire to go further and it is in this sense internally inconsistent: it asserts that in general, to dismiss a pregnant woman through unavailability at a time when she is essential to a purpose of the undertaking can never be justifiable, but it leaves open the possibility that the employer can do just that so long as she was recruited on a temporary basis specifically for that purpose.

Thus, both judgments impliedly accepted that adverse treatment flowing from pregnancy is susceptible to justification. Therefore, an employer may be able to contend successfully that not only market costs associated with unavailability, but also other costs arising from pregnancy,[211] not the pregnancy itself, were the 'cause' of the dismissal of a pregnant woman. It is even possible that such an argument could be used in relation to a permanently employed woman, since the Court's mismatch argument is not so readily applicable to a justification based on the other costs associated with pregnancy. This is not to contend that the Court would necessarily accept such assertions by employers, merely to note that, in principle, the judgments leave open these possibilities. The effect of the judgments may be to disadvantage women doubly: they may have to take the risk that they will have no remedy if employed on a temporary basis, but dismissed

209 This part of Habermann-Beltermann is similar to the Court's ruling in Hertz that dismissal through absences caused by illness, where those absences arise outside the protected period of maternity leave, is permissible, even where the illness is pregnancy-related. See Shaw, J, 'Pregnancy discrimination in sex discrimination' (1991) 16 EL Rev 313–20.

210 Opinion of the Advocate General, para 16.

211 E.g., adjustment of working conditions, time off for ante-natal examinations, removal of hazardous substances from the working environment or other measures of special protection for pregnant workers required, e.g., by the Pregnancy and Maternity Directive, Council Directive 92/85/EEC.

for reasons connected with pregnancy,[212] and they may tend to find that they are more likely to be offered temporary contracts, thereby undermining their bargaining power in the market still further.

In both judgments, the Court could have rejected a formal equality interpretation of the legislation in favour of completely excluding the use of unavailability through pregnancy or the cost of pregnancy as a justification,[213] thereby affording recognition to the real situation of women. In support of this, it should be pointed out that the real situation of women which may mean that they are unavailable for work for a period is only biologically determined in so far as the bearing of children is concerned; in terms of caring for children, it is legally and socially determined. The legal and social factors in question which found the perception that pregnancy, maternity leave and child care are to be viewed as one single indivisible burden to be shouldered by women alone, arise, it is submitted, from a sexually stereotyped view of the child care responsibilities of males and females. Thus, unavailability for work arising, or apparently arising,[214] from pregnancy, maternity leave and child care is not a sex-neutral justification for adverse treatment.

At the least, the Court could have achieved a compromise somewhat more satisfactory in terms of promotion of substantive equality than the one it does achieve, by framing its judgment in terms of the proportion of the period for which the woman was employed during which she would be unavailable. Thus, a woman employed, for example, on a temporary three-year contract in order to fulfill a particular purpose who would be unavailable for three months on maternity leave and therefore unable to fulfill it would be said nevertheless to be available for a substantial part of the period. Instead, the Court chose to confine its ruling to those employed for an indefinite period.

Section 3A uses the phrase ‘on the ground of pregnancy’. Detrimental action related to pregnancy but not viewed by domestic courts as on grounds of pregnancy other than dismissal (such as demotion or failure to appoint or to promote) and so not covered by s 3A will fall within the Webb approach, and it is therefore unfortunate that the European Court of Justice failed to rule clearly that such action would be direct sex discrimination. A possible approach would be to treat detrimental action on grounds of pregnancy as indirect rather than direct discrimination on the ground that a condition is being applied to all employees not to need certain periods of time off work. As argued above, this is very likely to have an adverse impact on women and arguably cannot be justified using the current tests for justification (see below). This is not to suggest that this would be a satisfactory approach: the use of equality law in relation to pregnancy is flawed since it relies on comparisons with men rather than 212 So long as the context allows the dismissal to be characterisable as owing to unavailability and therefore inability to satisfy a particular purpose.

213 The argument for so doing was put succinctly by Stevens J in a dissenting US judgment: commenting on a rule allowing adverse treatment of women for reasons connected with pregnancy, he said: ‘By definition such a rule discriminates on grounds of sex, for it is the capacity to become pregnant which primarily differentiates the female from the male.’ General Electric Co v Gilbert (1976) 429 US 126, pp 161–62.

214 It appeared that no attempt was made to ascertain the period for which the plaintiff would actually be unavailable. See Webb v EMO Air Cargo [1992] 4 All ER 929, HL, p 932, per Lord Keith. It is not mandatory that employees should be absent from work for the whole period of maternity leave or that, during maternity leave, they should be out of communication with the workplace.

simply acknowledging, as pregnancy-related legislation does, that proper provision for maternity is good employment practice. As will be seen below, there have been a number of instances in which women, especially single parents, have been forced to address the issue of flexible working – in the sense of working hours that fit in with child care – by seeking to use the concept of indirect discrimination. In many ways this attempt has highlighted the problem of using this concept in the way that the early (and, to an extent, also the later) decisions on pregnancy-as-direct-sex-discrimination did.

Discrimination on grounds of marital status

The concept of direct discrimination on grounds of marital status is governed by s 3(1)(a) of the SDA 1975. Under s 3(1)(a), the applicant must show that he or she has been less favourably treated on grounds of marital status than a single person of the same sex has been or would be treated. There is little guidance in the Act as to the method of making the comparison; s 5(3) merely provides that there must be no material difference between the situations of an unmarried and a married person. As with discrimination on grounds of sex, it is possible for the applicant to compare him or herself with a hypothetical single person. The test can be broken down into three stages. First, the married person must show that there has been differentiation in the treatment afforded to him or herself and a single person (or a hypothetical single person). Motive is irrelevant. Second, he or she must show that the treatment has been less favourable and, third, following the ruling of the House of Lords in James v Eastleigh BC,[215] that there is a causal relationship between his or her marital status and the treatment; in other words that but for her marital status, she would have been treated as favourably as a single person was or would have been. The plaintiff bears the burden of showing that the differential treatment was on grounds of marital status and not for some neutral reason.

Discrimination on grounds of gender reassignment

Under s 2A(1) of the SDA 'person A discriminates against another person B if he treats B less favourably than he treats or would treat other persons, and does so on the ground that B intends to undergo, is undergoing, or has undergone gender reassignment'. This provision is based on the models already considered relating to discrimination on grounds of sex and marital status. Thus, the same steps must be taken and the plaintiff bears the burden of showing that the differential treatment was on grounds of gender reassignment. It must be pointed out that s 2A does not prohibit discrimination on grounds of transsexuality in a general sense,[216] and that therefore there is a significant gap in the legislation which possibly could be filled by the use of purposive interpretation, as discussed above.[217]

215 [1990] AC 751; [1990] 2 All ER 607; [1989] IRLR 318; [1989] 3 WLR 122; the 'but for' test applied in James was put forward by Lord Goff in the House of Lords in Birmingham CC ex p EOC (1989) 18 ILJ 247; for comment, see Ellis, (1989) 52 MLR 710.

216 See Bavin v The NHS Trust Pensions Agency and Secretary of State for Health [1999] ICR 1192.

217 See pp 1479–86.

Race discrimination

Direct discrimination arises under s 1(1)(a) of the RRA and the test to be applied mirrors that under the SDA, except that the unfavourable treatment in question must be on 'racial grounds'. This means that discrimination on the grounds of someone else's race is covered (transferred discrimination).[218] For example, if a waitress disobeyed an instruction to serve whites only and was dismissed for serving black customers, that would be discrimination on racial grounds.[219]

A decision made on racial grounds means that the alleged discriminator made a decision influenced by racial prejudice, but according to the ruling in CRE ex p Westminster Council,[220] this does not mean that the discriminator must have a racial motive. The council wanted to employ a black man as a refuse collector, but withdrew the offer after pressure from the all-white work force. The Commission for Racial Equality (CRE) initiated a formal investigation and served a non-discrimination notice on the council. The council challenged the service of the notice by means of judicial review and sought certiorari on the basis that the CRE's findings were perverse – a finding that the CRE could not reasonably make. However, it was held that the decision was made on racial grounds, although it was found that the employer was not motivated by racial prejudice, but by the desire to avoid industrial unrest. Nevertheless, that was irrelevant; the decision was influenced by racial prejudice, although it was not the prejudice of the respondent.

Segregation

Under s 1(2) of the Act it will be direct discrimination to maintain separate facilities for members of different races, even though they are equal in quality. However, if segregation grows up because of practices in the workforce, the employer will not come under an obligation to prevent it according to the ruling in Pel Ltd v Modgill[221] although this seems to be in conflict with s 32 of the Act which provides that an employer will be liable for acts done by employees in the course of employment unless he or she has taken reasonable steps to prevent such acts. It would seem that the employer should come under some obligation to prevent segregation even if he or she did not instigate it. Moreover, even if segregation in itself is not unlawful, it may be that once a black/white divide in the workforce is established, a practice of treating the black group differently may develop, which will raise an irresistible inference of direct discrimination even though such treatment might not raise such an inference if applied to an individual black worker.[222]

218 It was confirmed in Showboat Entertainment Centre v Owens [1984] 1 WLR 384 that dismissal for refusal to obey an unlawful discriminatory instruction would fall within s 1(1)(a). See, to the same effect, Zarczynska v Levy [1979] 1 WLR 125.

219 See Zarczynska v Levy [1979] 1 WLR 125.

220 [1984] IRLR 230, QBD.

221 [1980] IRLR 142.

222 See John Haggas plc (1993) the Guardian, 29 May: different, less favourable treatment of the black group was found to be direct discrimination.

Proving direct discrimination

Often, the hardest task in a direct discrimination case, as discussed in relation to sex discrimination, will be proving that the unfavourable treatment was on grounds of race. The decision in Dornan[223] applies in race discrimination cases and means that once an inference has been raised that discrimination has occurred, the burden of proof will shift to the employer to prove that the decision in question was made on other grounds. In the areas of EU competence, as discussed above, a shifting burden of proof now applies.[224] The decision in Igen v Wong, a direct discrimination case on grounds of sex, now provides the guidelines to be applied, which are set out below.[225]

Raising the requisite inference may involve obtaining statistical material from the employer. In West Midlands Passenger Transport Executive v Jaquant Singh[226] the applicant, who believed that he had been racially discriminated against in being refused promotion, wanted an order of discovery in respect of specific material held by his employers indicating the number of whites and non-whites appointed to senior posts. He claimed that if he were able to obtain access to the material, he would be able to invite an inference of direct racial discrimination. The employers resisted discovery. The Court of Appeal held that discovery would be ordered only where it could be termed necessary, but that it could be so termed since the employee had to establish a discernible pattern of treatment towards his racial group and there was no other way of raising the necessary inference. A tribunal can draw an inference of discrimination from an employer's nonexistent or evasive reply to a race relations questionnaire (the statutory RR65 form). The decision of the EAT in Dattani v Chief Constable of West Mercia Police[227] established that the same inference can be drawn from replies made outside the statutory procedure; for example, in the employer's notice of appearance.

Disability discrimination

The concept of direct discrimination within the DDA 1995, as amended in 2004,[228] only operates within the field of employment; it involves showing, under s 3A(5), that the applicant has been less favourably treated on the ground of her disability than a person would be or has been treated 'not having that particular disability whose relevant circumstances, including his abilities, are the same as or not materially different from those of the disabled person'. The phrase 'on the ground of' rather than 'related to' makes this a narrow definition: it is aimed at facially clear discriminatory practices. The test is seeking to draw a distinction between the disability and its consequences; it is aimed in particular at stereotyping. So, for example, if an employer refused a job as a taxi driver to a person who could not drive safely due to muscular dystrophy the relevant comparator would be a person without dystrophy who could not drive safely. So the reason for refusing the job to the applicant would be that the person could 223 [1990] IRLR 179. See above, p 1528.

224 See RRA, ss 54A and 57ZA.
225 See pp 1586–87.
226 [1988] WLR 730.
227 2005, unreported.
228 By the Disability Discrimination (Amendment) Regulations 2003 passed in response to the Framework Directive. Further amendments were made to the employment provisions by the DDA 2005.

not drive safely, and not due to her disability. If on the other hand the applicant had diabetes which did not affect her driving the relevant comparator would be someone with a similar ability to drive. If the employer decided not to short-list the applicant on the ground of her diabetes without considering its lack of impact on her ability to drive, she would have suffered direct discrimination on grounds of disability, assuming that the employer would have offered the job to the comparator.

The test can be broken down into four stages. First, the applicant must show that she is disabled within the meaning of the Act. Second, she must show that there has been differentiation in the treatment afforded to herself and a non-disabled person (or a hypothetical person) with similar relevant abilities. Third, she must show that her treatment has been less favourable. Fourth, the applicant can rely on the ruling of the House of Lords in James v Eastleigh BC,[229] the sex discrimination case mentioned above, in showing that there is a causal relationship between her disability and the treatment; in other words that 'but for' her disability she would have been treated as favourably as a non-disabled person with similar abilities was or would have been. Following Birmingham CC ex p EOC,[230] it is not necessary to show that the less favourable treatment is accorded by an intention to discriminate: motive is irrelevant. There is no provision allowing the alleged discriminator to seek to justify the treatment.

The plaintiff bears the burden of showing that the differential treatment is on grounds of disability and not for some neutral reason. Discharging this burden of proof may be problematic, although it may sometimes be clearly apparent that the employment detriment was on grounds of disability, and attention will shift to considering whether the disability fell within the Act. The shifting burden of proof applies in disability discrimination cases and means that once an inference has been raised that discrimination has occurred, the burden of proof will shift to the employer to prove that the decision in question was made on other grounds[231] and the guidelines from Wong, above, will apply.

Direct discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation

The Sexual Orientation Regulations cover, under reg 6, a number of forms of employment detriment. In relation to such detriment, such as a failure to promote, the applicant must show, under reg 3, that he or she has been treated less favourably on the ground of sexual orientation than other persons. Regulation 3(1) provides: 'For the purposes of these Regulations, a person ("A") discriminates against another person ("B") if – (a) on grounds of sexual orientation, A treats B less favourably than he treats or would treat other persons . . .'

Thus, as in relation to the other protected grounds, motive is irrelevant; it is not necessary to show that the employer is motivated by homophobia. The first question to be asked is merely whether the applicant has been treated in a particular way and other persons have between treated more favourably. Then, following the ruling of 229 [1990] AC 751; [1990] 2 All ER 607; [1989] IRLR 318; [1989] 3 WLR 122; the 'but for' test applied in James was put forward by Lord Goff in the House of Lords in Birmingham CC ex p EOC [1989] 18 ILJ 247; for comment, see Ellis, (1989) 52 MLR 710.

230 [1989] AC 1155; [1989] 1 All ER 769.

231 DDA, s 17A(1C) and s 25(9).

the House of Lords in James v Eastleigh BC[232] (see also Glasgow CC v Zafar)[233] the applicant must show that there is a causal relationship between her sexual orientation and the treatment; in other words that but for her sexual orientation, she would have been treated as favourably as other persons are or would have been treated. The burden of proof will shift to the employer in the same way as for direct discrimination cases on the other protected grounds. [234]

5 Indirect discrimination on grounds of sex, race or sexual orientation; disability-related discrimination

Sex discrimination

The concept of indirect discrimination was imported into the SDA under s 1(1)(b) with a view to outlawing practices which, while neutral on their face as between men and women, have a disproportionately adverse impact on women.[235] It was intended to outlaw not only isolated acts of discrimination, but also institutionalised discrimination. This reflects the substantive equality approach; it takes account, for example, of past discrimination against women. In asking not whether a woman can, in theory, comply with a condition, but whether she can do so in practice, it broadens the area of morally unjustifiable differentiation. Indirect discrimination was defined under s 1(1)(b) which imported a somewhat opaque and tortuous test into the Act. When the SDA was amended in response to the Burden of Proof Directive, (implemented in SI 2001/2660) and again in 2005[236] a more generous version of indirect discrimination was imported into it under a new s 1(2), but only applying in the sphere of employment, although it is due to be extended into the other contexts by the end of 2007.[237] Thus the SDA now recognises two concepts of indirect discrimination, under s 1(1)(b) and under s 1(2). The case law established under s 1(1)(b) will be relevant to an extent under s 1(2).

The definition of indirect discrimination under s 1(1)(b)

There are four stages in operating this concept. The case law was developed in the employment context, but it will now be applied as far as possible to s 1(2) or to indirect discrimination in the other contexts covered by the Act – the residual areas. First, it must be shown that a condition has been applied to the applicant. It might be

232 [1990] AC 751; [1990] 2 All ER 607; [1989] IRLR 318; [1989] 3 WLR 122; the 'but for' test applied in James was put forward by Lord Goff in the House of Lords in Birmingham CC ex p EOC (1989) 18 ILJ 247; for comment, see Ellis (1989) 52 MLR 710.

233 [1998] ICR 120.

234 Regs 29 and 32.

235 See Byre, A, Indirect Discrimination, 1987, Equal Opportunities Commission; McGinley, G, 'Judicial approaches to sex discrimination in US and UK – a comparative study' (1986) 49 MLR 413, pp 427–35; Hunter, R, Indirect Discrimination in the Workplace, 1992, William Gaunt and Sons; von Prondzynski and Richards, op. cit., fn 1; Gardner, J, 'Discrimination as injustice' (1996) 16(3) OJLS 353; Townshend-Smith, R, 'Justifying indirect discrimination in English and American law: how stringent should the test be?' (1995) 1 Int Journal of Discrimination and the Law 103.

236 By Art 2 Equal Treatment (Amendment) Directive 2002/73/EC.

237 By the General Sex Equality Directive 2004/113/EC.

to be of a certain seniority, height or type of experience. Second, it must be shown that the condition is one which will have a disproportionate impact on women; in other words, considerably fewer women than men will be able to comply with it. For example, fewer women than men might have a certain type of experience owing to a now outlawed system of keeping women at a certain level and thereby preventing them gaining the experience in question. Third, once the claimant has proved these two requirements, the burden of proof shifts to the employer to show that the condition is justifiable regardless of sex. For example, there are fewer women engineering graduates than men; therefore, a requirement that applicants have a degree in engineering hits disproportionately at women. However, the employer will normally be able to show that a degree in engineering is genuinely needed for the job. Fourthly, if the employer cannot show that the requirement is genuinely needed for the job, the woman must show that it is to her detriment because she cannot comply with it. This requirement was included because it was thought necessary that the woman should be the victim rather than allowing anyone to bring a claim in respect of a discriminatory practice operating at her place of employment.

Two early decisions made clear the grounds for including this second type of discrimination in the Act and demonstrated the way in which it would operate. The case of Steel v Post Office,[238] which concerned the allocation of postal walks to postmen or women, illustrated the operation of the four stages. Certain walks were more in demand than others and the walks were allocated on the basis of the seniority of the employee. Ms Steel made a bid for a walk, but lost it to a younger man. She had worked for the Post Office much longer than he had, but she had only been accepted into the permanent grade in 1975 when the SDA came into force. Before 1975, the Post Office had directly discriminated against women by refusing to allow them to enter the permanent grade. Ms Steel's seniority had been calculated from that point. The practice in question was interpreted as a 'requirement', thereby widening the meaning of the term. It had a disparate impact on women because fewer of them could comply with it than men because of the past discrimination and the requirement as to seniority could not otherwise be justified. 'Justified' was strictly interpreted as meaning 'necessary'. Finally, the requirement was clearly to her detriment, as she could not comply with it.

The application of the phrase 'can comply' was considered in Price v Civil Service Commission.[239] The Civil Service had a rule that applicants had to be under 28. Mrs Price, who was 35, applied but was rejected and claimed sex discrimination. It was found that owing to the prevailing social conditions, more men than women could comply with the requirement because at the time, there was a general expectation that women would rear a family and so would be less likely to be available in the job market at that age than men. However, women could theoretically comply with a requirement to be 28 and available in the job market; they could choose not to have children. The words 'can comply' were interpreted to mean that in practice, fewer women could comply with the condition. The Court also considered the means of identifying a group of men and women to be looked at in order to see whether fewer women could comply with the condition. It found that the group to be considered would be the pool of men and women with the relevant qualifications; it would not include the whole population.[240] The applicant's case, therefore, passed all four tests and succeeded, with the result that the Civil Service altered the age bar.

238 [1977] IRLR 288.
239 [1977] 1 WLR 1417.

The main difficulties in the operation of indirect discrimination have arisen in three areas: the finding of a disparate impact, involving identification of the correct 'pool', the meaning of justifiability and the determination as to the meaning of 'a requirement or condition'. Cases on establishing disparate impact are discussed below since the same issues now arise under s 1(2)(b).

The meaning of 'justifiable' has undergone considerable change since the ruling in Ojutiku v Manpower Services Commission[241] in which, departing from the Steel interpretation, it was held to mean 'reasons which would appear sound to right thinking people'. This obviously widened its meaning and would have allowed a great many practices to be justified, greatly undermining s 1(1)(b). However, in Clarke v Eley IMI Kynoch Ltd,[242] its meaning was somewhat narrowed. The company had a policy of always selecting part time workers for redundancy first, regardless of their length of service, although for full time workers a 'last in, first out' system was in operation. Therefore, the requirement to work full time so as not to be made redundant hit disproportionately at women, as more women than men worked part time. The employer argued that the practice could be justified because it was long standing and the workforce liked it, but it was found that this was not sufficient to render it 'justifiable', and the claimant therefore succeeded. This was clearly in accord with the policy of including indirect discrimination in the statutory scheme in order to outlaw long-standing discriminatory practices.

The test for the meaning of justifiable[243] was more precisely defined by the European Court in Bilka-Kaufhaus GmbH v Weber von Hartz.[244] Under this test, conditions creating disparate impact will be justifiable if they amount to a means chosen for achieving an objective which correspond to a real need on the part of the undertaking, are appropriate to that end and necessary to that end. So this test would be fulfilled if, for example, an undertaking had a real need to increase its scientific expertise in a certain area. The means used to do so would have to be appropriate, such as asking that applicants have a degree in a certain science. If other means of increasing its expertise were not available, it would be seen as necessary to impose the condition that applicants have a science degree. This approach was taken in Hampson v Dept of Education and Science,[245] and means that s 1(1)(b) has been brought broadly into line with the 'material difference' defence under s 1(3) of the Equal Pay Act 1970.

240 See Jones v Manchester University (1993) The Times, 12 January, CA, which reaffirmed this approach to the 'pool', holding that the applicant could not redefine its parameters, which would be fixed by the relevant advertisement.

241 [1982] ICR 661; [1982] IRLR 418.

242 [1983] ICR 703.

243 For discussion of the test, see Leigh, I, 'Of Racial Groups and Non-Groups' (1986) 49 MLR 235.

244 [1986] IRLR 317; [1986] CMLR 701; see also Rinner-Kuhn v FWW Spezial-Gebäudereinigung [1989] IRLR 493.

245 [1991] 1 AC 171; [1990] 2 All ER 513, HL; on the Court of Appeal decision, see Bourn, C, Collins, HG and Freedland, MR, 'The Defence of Justifiability' (1989) 18 ILJ 170; Napier, B, 'Statutory Interpretation and Indirect Discrimination in the Court of Appeal' (1989) 48 CLJ 187.

The Bilka decision narrowed the defence available to employers, but the findings in Perera v Civil Service Commission[246] (a race discrimination case) mean that a number of requirements or conditions creating disparate impact will fall outside the Act and will obviously not require application of the Bilka test because they will not support an indirect discrimination claim at all. It was held in Perera that a condition must amount to an absolute bar in order to be termed a requirement or condition. If the employer has only taken the factor into account as one among others, it will not fall within s 1(1)(b). This is very restrictive, as non-absolute criteria could clearly be used and could have an adverse impact on an applicant. For example, an unjustifiable height bar might normally be operated, but the employer might be prepared on occasion to consider people under it. Nevertheless, the bar could have a significantly adverse effect on women. Thus, the development of indirect discrimination has been constrained and the EOC has therefore argued for reform of the meaning of the term 'condition'.[247] The decision in Perera may be out of accord with the ruling of the European Court of Justice in Enderby v Frenchay,[248] which is discussed below. In Falkirk Council v Whyte,[249] the decision was found to be out of accord with the purposive approach to legislation that implements a Directive, which has been adopted in a number of equal pay cases. It was found that the term 'a requirement or condition' should not be afforded a restrictive interpretation; the proper test, it was said, was to ask whether the 'factor' hindered women as opposed to men in the particular context.

The definition of indirect discrimination under s 1(2)(b)

In the field of employment only the difficulty of using s 1(1)(b) was eased slightly when the new definition of indirect discrimination was imported under s 1(2). Indirect discrimination arises if under s 1(2)(b) if:

> [the employer] applies to her a provision, criterion or practice which he applies or would apply equally to a man, but—
>
> (i) which puts or would put women at a particular disadvantage when compared with men, > (ii) which puts her at that disadvantage, and
> (iii) which he cannot show to be a proportionate means of achieving a legitimate aim.

A similar definition was also imported in relation to marital status.[250] The test under s 1(2)(b) uses the broader term 'practice' as opposed to 'requirement or condition' in

246 [1983] ICR 428; [1983] IRLR 166.

247 See Proposals of the EOC: Equal Treatment for Men and Women, p 9.

248 [1994] 1 All ER 495; [1993] ECR I-5535, ECJ; [1992] IRLR 15, CA.

249 [1997] IRLR 560.

250 Under s 3(1) (definition of indirect discrimination against married people in the field of employment) indirect discrimination arises if '(b) [the employer] applies to that person a provision, criterion or practice which he applies or would apply equally to an unmarried person, but – (i) which puts or would put married persons at a particular disadvantage when compared with unmarried persons of the same sex, (ii) which puts that person at that disadvantage, and (iii) which he cannot show to be a proportionate means of achieving a legitimate aim.'

response to the Burden of Proof Directive, (implemented in SI 2001/2660) since the terms used are 'provision, criterion or practice', which appear to cover non-absolute criteria. It also overtly imports a test of proportionality into the 'justifiability' stage. The most difficult step tends to be proving that women are more disadvantaged by the practice than men – that it creates disparate impact. The case law previously established under s 1(1)(b) remains relevant to this issue. The current position as regards disparate impact may be summed up in the following manner, which is based on the ruling of Mustill LJ in Jones v Chief Adjudication Officer:[251]

(a) identify the criterion for selection (the condition);
(b) identify the relevant population, the 'pool', comprising all those who satisfy the other criteria for selection and ignoring the allegedly discriminatory condition;
(c) divide the relevant population into groups representing, first, those who satisfy the allegedly discriminatory criterion and secondly, those who do not;
(d) ascertain what are the actual male/female balances in the two groups;
(e) if women are found to be under-represented in the first group, it is proved that the criterion creates disparate impact.

Following Jones the pool consists of a group of persons in the same situation as the applicant in terms of satisfying the requirements for the post apart from the challenged condition – which should be ignored in determining the pool. But a recent House of Lords decision has thrown this analysis into jeopardy. In Rutherford v Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (No 2)[252] the applicant, a man, was dismissed at the age of 67; under s 109 ERA 1996 those over 65 cannot claim unfair dismissal. The applicant claimed that this created indirect discrimination against men, contrary to EC law. He argued that men had a greater tendency to work beyond 65 and that therefore the condition adversely affected men. The pool he argued for consisted in effect of the entire workforce and the condition was to be under 65. On that basis there was some disparate impact on men, but the minority did not find that the impact was significant enough. But the majority in the Lords compared all men and women in the work force over 65 in finding that the disputed provision had no disparate impact on men – it affected men and women equally. Their approach was one that included the challenged condition in determining the makeup of the pool. This appears to be the wrong approach, but arguably Rutherford can be confined to its own facts: on the face of it it was difficult to equate an age limit with a condition that could be applied more generally, such as the condition considered in Seymour-Smith, below. Also Rutherford was decided under s 1(1)(b), meaning that a 'requirement or condition' had to be identified. It can probably be distinguished on that basis when considered in relation to the more generous wording of s 1(2).

Assuming that the disputed condition can be ignored, thereafter choosing the appropriate 'pool' is crucial to the plaintiff's chances of success. The tribunal may decide that she has chosen the wrong pool and that therefore, the statistical evidence 251 (1990) EOR 1991.

252 [2006] UKHL 19.

she has prepared showing disparate impact relates to the wrong groups of persons.[253] However, a more relaxed approach was evident in London Underground v Edwards (No 2)[254] (discussed further below) in which the Court of Appeal accepted that the tribunal could take into account the common knowledge that there are more female than male lone parents. Once the calculation has been completed, it will be possible to determine the proportions of women and of men affected by the disputed requirement. But it must be found that the proportion of women who can comply is 'considerably smaller' than the equivalent proportion of men.

In Secretary of State for Employment ex p Seymour-Smith and Perez[255] a challenge was mounted against the increases in the qualifying period for redundancy from one to two years in 1985. It was argued that a considerably smaller proportion of women than of men could comply with it and that therefore, it breached the Equal Treatment Directive. In 1985, 77.4% of men and 68.9% of women fulfilled the condition. On a reference to the ECJ, it was found that such figures would not reveal that a considerably smaller proportion of women than men could fulfil the requirement. However, the ECJ also pointed out that a less than considerable differential, which persisted over a long period, could satisfy the requirement of indirect discrimination. The House of Lords considered the position as at 1991, not 1985, since both parties accepted that 1991 was the relevant date. Looking at the years between 1985 and 1991, there was a constant disparity between men and women: the ratio of men to women who qualified was 10:9. Given the persistence of this disparity it could not, it was found, be brushed aside as inconsiderable, bearing in mind the context of equality of treatment.

It is clear from this decision that determining the relevant proportions of men and women who can comply with a condition is not necessarily a straightforward matter that can be resolved by a 'snap-shot' approach. Further guidance was given in Barry v Midland Bank,[256] in which it was found that since the smaller the disadvantaged group in proportionate terms, the narrower the differential, a better guide may be to consider expressing the proportions as ratios of each other. Lord Nicholls explained that therefore, in a workforce of 10,000 employers of which 10% work part time, where 90% of the part timers are women, a requirement that disadvantages part timers will disadvantage 0.2% of males and 1.8% of women. Those proportions would not appear to satisfy the 'considerably smaller' requirement. But if the proportions are expressed as ratios of each other it will be found that the ratio of women who cannot comply compared to that of men who cannot is 9:1.

Work/life balance

One of the key issues in relation to indirect discrimination on grounds of sex that has arisen over the last 15 years is that of flexible working. The term 'flexible' can be used in two senses. First, it can relate to the need of parents or other carers to work hours which do not impinge too greatly on their caring responsibilities – a matter forming one aspect of the 'work/life' balance. Second, it can refer to the preference of some 253 See Pearse v City of Bradford MC [1988] IRLR 379.

254 [1998] IRLR 364.
255 [2000] IRLR 263, HL.
256 [1999] 1 WLR 1465.

employers to demand that employees work hours which suit the changing needs of the business or concern in question. These matters are increasingly becoming the subject of indirect discrimination claims.

In London Underground v Edwards (No 2)[257] the plaintiff, a woman train driver, brought an indirect discrimination claim after the employer imposed shift changes in accordance with its new business plan. She could not comply with the changed shifts because of her responsibilities as a single parent. It was found that out of the pool of train drivers there were 2,000 men, all of whom could comply with the new shift arrangements. There was a component of only 21 women in the pool. Out of that number, one woman – the applicant – could not comply. Thus, 95.2% of women could comply and 100% of men could comply. In determining that a 'considerably' smaller proportion of women could comply, the Court of Appeal took into account the small number of women in the pool, suggesting that women already found it hard to comply with the requirements of the job. Further, if one more woman had been unable to comply, that would have had a significant effect on the proportion of women who could not comply, whereas if one man had not been able to comply, that would have had little effect on the male figures. On the issue of justification, the Court of Appeal found that employers should recognise the need to take a reasonably flexible attitude to accommodating the needs of their employees. They considered that London Underground could have quite readily accommodated the needs of a good employee (she had worked for them for 10 years and there had been no complaints about her work) which would not have been damaging to their business plan.

A different attitude was evident in Clymo v Wandsworth LBC[258] which concerned the employee's need to adopt a different pattern of working. The plaintiff had returned to work after childbirth and found she could not comply with a requirement to work full time; she wished to work part time. The EAT found that no requirement to work full time had been applied. In any event, it was found, she could comply with it – she merely had to make a choice between her childcare responsibilities and full time working. This was a very technical approach to the statute, which gave priority to the employer's autonomy in choosing to impose full time working rather than to the employee's choices. It appears to be out of accord with the approach taken in Edwards and that taken in other, later decisions,[259] although it cannot be assumed that it has been entirely discarded. Possibly it can be distinguished as decided under s 1(1)(b) and relying on the word 'requirement'.

Race discrimination

When the RRA was amended in 2003 in response to the requirements of the Race Directive a more generous version of indirect discrimination was imported into it under a new s 1(1A), but only applying in the areas of EU competence – in respect of race, ethnic or national origins, not colour or nationality. But the new definition operated in all spheres, not just that of employment. In the context of race discrimination

257 [1998] IRLR 364.
258 [1989] ICR 250.
259 See Zurich Insurance Co v Gulson [1998] IRLR 118.

the more favourable scheme is not applicable, even in the employment context, in relation to nationality or colour. Thus the RRA now recognises two concepts of indirect discrimination, under s 1(1)(b) and under s 1(1A). The case law established under s 1(1)(b) will be relevant to an extent under s 1(1A). Also if discrimination on grounds of colour or nationality is alleged, the old, less generous concept of indirect discrimination under s 1(1)(b) should be used. The discussion begins with the more generous conception of indirect discrimination, which will be used in most instances.

Indirect discrimination under s 1(1A)

A person discriminates against another if > . . . he applies to that other a provision, criterion or practice which he applies or would apply equally to persons not of the same race or ethnic or national origins as that other, but –

>
> (i) which puts or would put persons of the same race or ethnic or national origins as that other at a particular disadvantage when compared with other persons, > (ii) which puts that other at a disadvantage, and
> (iii) which he cannot show to be a proportionate means of achieving a legitimate aim.

This definition of indirect discrimination is more generous than the old one in a number of respects, which were discussed above in relation to the similar definition under the SDA. The first step in a case of indirect discrimination on racial grounds is for the applicant to define to which racial group he or she belongs. For example, an individual could be defined as non-British, non-white, Asian or a sub-group of Asian. The choice of group is important, since discrimination affects racial groups differently. For example, a requirement to be clean-shaven might discriminate against Sikhs, but might not affect West Indians. Therefore, if in such circumstances the applicant chose 'non-white' as his group, the claim would fail. However, if he chose Sikh and non-Sikh, it would be more likely to succeed. The applicant should argue all possible groups in the alternative but clearly, if possible, he or she should seek to come within s 1(1A) rather than s 1(1)(b).

The next step is to identify a provision or practice. Once the Race Directive was implemented, it became clear that indirect discrimination could be found to exist where a non-absolute requirement was applied to the applicant. The Directive used the same wording – 'a provision, criterion or practice' – as that adopted in the Burden of Proof Directive.[260] Thus informal practices and discriminatory preferences can still count as "practices". The choice of pool, the determinations as to disparate impact and as to proportionality will be made in the same way as for indirect sex discrimination.

Indirect discrimination under s 1(1)(b)

The tests to be applied in the residual areas to establish indirect discrimination under s 1(1)(b) of the 1976 Act are identical to those arising under the Sex Discrimination

260 See above, pp 1541–42.

Act, apart from the need to show that the requirement or condition which has been applied adversely affects persons of a particular racial group.

The next step under s 1(1)(b), according to Perera v Civil Service Commission,[261] is for the applicant to show that an absolute condition has been applied to him or her. In Perera this concerned a requirement that a candidate for the Civil Service had a good command of English. This requirement was sometimes waived; it was determined that it could not, therefore, amount to a 'requirement or condition' for indirect discrimination purposes. As noted above in relation to indirect sexual discrimination, this decision placed a brake on claims of indirect discrimination[262] although that approach was being criticised even prior to implementation of the Burden of Proof Directive. It was pointed out in Meer v Tower Hamlets[263] by Balcombe LJ in the Court of Appeal that it allows discriminatory preferences free rein, as long as they are not expressed as absolute requirements. In that case, a candidate who had previous experience working in the local authority was preferred although such experience was not absolutely required, and this had a tendency to debar non-British applicants. The Commission for Racial Equality recommended that this interpretation should be abandoned so that non-absolute criteria can be considered[264] and under the changes introduced in response to the Race Directive indirect discrimination can be found to exist where a non-absolute requirement is applied to the applicant. However, this problem still subsists where s 1(1)(b) applies.

If a condition can be identified, the applicant must show that a 'considerably smaller proportion of his or her group can comply with it', and the approach adopted in sex discrimination cases, discussed above, will be used, although where indirect discrimination is based on nationality and affects an EC national it will be sufficient to establish a risk that the group of workers in question is unable to comply with the requirement.[265] This approach would obviate the need to produce statistical evidence proving the effect of the requirement in practice. This approach would not apply in other instances of indirect discrimination, but it may be introduced under the Race Discrimination Directive, which requires the applicant to show that the provision or practice in issue 'would put persons of a racial or ethnic group at a particular disadvantage compared with other persons' (emphasis added). That approach may appear to allow for consideration of a risk of inability to comply, although the use of the word 'would' as opposed to 'could' does not make this interpretation certain.

Once the applicant has established a prima facie case of indirect discrimination, the burden of proof shifts to the employer to show that the requirement or condition is justifiable.[266] In Ojutiku v Manpower Services Commission[267] two African students obtained places on a polytechnic management course, but were refused grants by the Manpower Services Commission since they lacked industrial experience. They claimed that this requirement was indirectly discriminatory as it was more difficult for African

261 [1983] ICR 428; [1983] IRLR 166.

262 For criticism of the decision, see Mead, G, 'Intentions, Conditions and Pools of Comparison' (1989) 18 ILJ 59.

263 [1988] IRLR 399, p 403.

264 CRE, Second Review of the Race Relations Act, 1991.

265 O'Flynn v Adjudication Officer Case C-237/94 [1996] All ER (EC) 541.

266 For discussion of the justification defence, see Lustgarten, L (1983) 133 NLJ 1057 and (1984) 134 NLJ 9.

267 [1982] IRLR 418.

applicants to show that they had previous management experience. However, the claim failed on the basis that the requirement could be justified. The test for justification was determined to be somewhat short of 'necessary', connoting a belief which would be justifiable if held on reasonable grounds, and this was reiterated in Singh v British Railway Engineers.[268] The applicant, who wore a turban in accordance with his religious beliefs, could not comply with a requirement to wear protective headgear and therefore had to take a less well-paid job. It was found that while the requirement did have an adverse impact it was justifiable, partly because the other employees would resent exceptions being made. However, the term 'justifiable' is now to be interpreted in accordance with the Bilka test,[269] which is applicable in sex discrimination cases and should therefore, by extension, apply to the equivalent provision under the RRA according to Hampson v DES.[270] This accords with the ruling in Rainey v Greater Glasgow Health Board[271] that the Bilka test would be applicable in sex discrimination and equal pay cases in respect of the grounds on which differential treatment could be justified. At the time this was an important instance of the indirect influence of EU law on national provisions against racial discrimination.

The Commission for Racial Equality had, for a number of years, criticised the interpretation of indirect discrimination and proposed a new definition: any practice or policy which is continued or allowed should be unlawful if it has a significant adverse impact on a particular racial group and is not necessary. It has further proposed that significant adverse impact should mean a 20% difference in impact between groups.[272] These proposals were, broadly, encapsulated in the Race Directive, which, as discussed, was implemented in 2003. However, the less generous elements of indirect discrimination on grounds of race are still relevant in the residual area that s 1(1)(b) continues to affect.

Discrimination relating to disability

As indicated above, the DDA does not cover indirect discrimination; apart from direct discrimination, discrimination relating to disability can occur if unfavourable treatment is imposed which relates to the disabled person's disability or if the duty to make reasonable adjustment is not complied with by the provider of services or education, or the employer. These two possibilities are considered in turn below. The majority of cases are brought under the disability-related discrimination head, and the duty of reasonable adjustment is then of relevance as explained below in relation to the justification defence, although it is also, as indicated, a separate cause of action.

Disability-related discrimination

The requirements regarding unfavourable treatment which relate to the disabled person's disability under s 3A(1) DDA bear some resemblance to the indirect discrimination

268 [1986] ICR 22.
269 Above, p 1540.
270 [1991] 1 AC 171; [1990] 2 All ER 513, HL.
271 [1986] 3 WLR 1017, HL.
272 See the CRE Consultative Paper, Second Review of the Race Relations Act 1976, 1991. The 20% notion derives from US civil rights law.

provisions relating to the other protected grounds discussed. Section 3A(1) provides that a person discriminates against a disabled person if '(a) for a reason which relates to the disabled person's disability he treats him less favourably than he treats or would treat others to whom that reason does not or would not apply; and (b) he cannot show that the treatment in question is justified'. The idea is to outlaw practices which, while appearing neutral on their face as between disabled and non-disabled people, place some disabled people at a substantial disadvantage for a reason related to their disability. The test under the DDA is similar to that of the RRA or SDA in that the less favourable treatment can be justified. This is inevitable, since otherwise a mentally handicapped person with severe learning difficulties could win an action under the DDA in respect of failure to appoint her to, for example, a post as a teacher on the basis that a requirement to have certain educational qualifications placed her at a disadvantage. Under s 3A(3) of the DDA, the adverse treatment is justified only if the reason for it is material to the circumstances of the case and is substantial.

No guidance is given in the Act as to the basis for making a comparison between the two persons. It should be noted that it is possible for the applicant to compare herself with a hypothetical person; the issue is not whether a disabled or non-disabled person receives a benefit, but whether the disabled person would have been treated more favourably if she had not been disabled. The test can be broken down into five stages. First, the applicant must show that she is disabled within the meaning of the Act. Then she must show that treatment has been applied that relates to her disability. Third, she must show that the treatment has had a less favourable impact. The treatment must create differentiation between the disabled person and a non-disabled person (or a hypothetical person). Fourth, the applicant can rely on the ruling of the House of Lords in James v Eastleigh BC,[273] the sex discrimination case mentioned above, in showing that there is a causal relationship between her disability and the treatment; in other words that but for her disability she would have been treated as favourably as the comparator, a non-disabled person, was or would have been. Following Birmingham CC ex p EOC[274] it is not necessary to show that the less favourable treatment is accorded by an intention to discriminate: motive is irrelevant. Fifth, the alleged discriminator can seek to justify the treatment.

It is important for the tribunal to choose the right comparator. The correct test was set out in Cosgrove v Caesar and Howie.[275] Ms Cosgrove was dismissed after she had been off work for one year with depression. The employer argued that it would have dismissed any worker who had been absent for one year and therefore it had not treated the applicant less favourably. However, the dismissal was related to her disability; the correct comparator was, the EAT held, a person who had not been off work for one year. The plaintiff bears the burden of proving facts from which the tribunal could conclude in the absence of an adequate explanation that the respondent committed an act of discrimination against the complainant.[276] It may sometimes be clearly apparent

273 [1990] AC 751; [1990] 2 All ER 607; [1989] IRLR 318; [1989] 3 WLR 122; the 'but for' test applied in James was put forward by Lord Goff in the House of Lords in Birmingham CC ex p EOC [1989] 18 ILJ 247; for comment, see Ellis (1989) 52 MLR 710.

274 [1989] AC 1155; [1989] 1 All ER 769.

275 [2001] IRLR 653. This finding followed Clark [1999] ICR 951.

276 DDA s17A(1)(c), s 25(9). This is the same formula as is used in the other statutes or Regulations.

that the employment detriment was on grounds of disability, in which case attention will shift to considering whether the disability fell within the Act and whether the detriment can be justified.

In relation to educational provision post-16, wording similar to that used in respect of employment is used in order to comply with the Framework Directive; the changes came into force in 2006. Wording similar to that of s 5(3) is used in s 28B(7) in relation to schools, but less favourable treatment can also be justified if it is the result of a 'permitted form of selection' as defined in s 28B(6). Essentially, this means that where a school operates a form of selection, either as a private school or under the relevant legislation (on grounds of ability or special aptitude), that may justifiably preclude the admission of a disabled pupil.

The test for justification in respect of the provision of goods and services differs from the key test in relation to employment or education. It consists of a list of instances in which the unfavourable treatment will be justified, under s 20(4). They include two specified conditions for all services. The first is that the treatment is necessary in order not to endanger health or safety; the second is capacity to contract. There are three additional specified conditions for services to the public only: that the treatment is necessary since otherwise the service could not be provided to members of the public generally; that the inferior treatment is necessary in order to provide the service at all; third that it may be acceptable for there to be a difference in the cost of providing the service to the disabled person and to members of the public.

The test under s 5(3) (and the equivalent tests in relation to education) bears at first glimpse some similarity to the need to show justification for an indirectly discriminatory requirement under s 1(1)(b) of the SDA or RRA. But it is not as strict a test as that of objective justification laid down in Bilka-Kaufhaus GmbH v Weber von Hartz,[277] which is discussed below. Under the Bilka test, conditions creating disparate impact will be justifiable if they amount to a means chosen for achieving an objective which correspond to a real need on the part of the undertaking, are appropriate to that end and are necessary to that end. It was found that the DDA test differed from that in Bilka, and the difference between the tests was made clear, by the EAT in Baynton v Saurus.[278] It was determined that the individual circumstances in question must relate to both employer and employee and that a balancing of those circumstances can be carried out. In Heinz v Kendrick,[279] the EAT followed Baynton, but made it clear that once the test was satisfied, the disadvantage must be justified, even though this meant that justification could readily be found. It criticised the lowness of the threshold, but considered that Parliament alone could remedy it.

In Jones v Post Office[280] Arden LJ said obiter that the term 'substantial' in s 5(3) of the DDA means that the reason given by the employer (or educational institution) must carry real weight, but this does not mean that the employer must take into account all the latest research on the subject. The Court of Appeal in that case gave further elucidation. It was found that the reason given by the employer (or other) must 277 [1986] IRLR 317; [1986] CMLR 701.

278 [1999] IRLR 604.
279 [2000] IRLR 141.
280 [2001] IRLR 384; [2001] ICR 805.

fall within the band of reasonable responses of a reasonable employer.[281] Thus, the burden placed by the justification test on the employer in this context is lighter than in respect of the other protected grounds in relation to indirect discrimination. So long as the employer has made a properly conducted risk assessment and then acts within the band of responses open to the reasonable employer, the unfavourable treatment can be justified. If no attempt at reasonable adjustment – discussed below – has been made, the treatment cannot be justified. But it could be justified if reasonable adjustment has been attempted and has failed.

The duty to make reasonable adjustment

Employment

The duty will be discussed mainly within the employment context, although it also applies with some modifications within the other contexts covered by the DDA, as amended.[282] The duty is placed on employers, on providers of services and on providers of education at all levels. As indicated, the DDA does not cover indirect discrimination, but the duty of reasonable adjustment bears some resemblance to the indirect discrimination provisions discussed. It also represents a form of positive action, since the duty creates obligations to take positive steps to seek to remedy certain disadvantages that disabled persons might be under. The idea is to outlaw practices which, while neutral on their face as between disabled and non-disabled people, place some disabled people at a substantial disadvantage.

Previously, under s 5, the DDA would be breached if the employer failed to comply with a duty of reasonable adjustment and could not show that the failure to comply was justified. Section 5(5) of the DDA previously provided that if an employer was under a duty to make reasonable adjustment under s 6, but failed without justification to make any such adjustment, his treatment of that person could not be justified, unless it would have been justified even if he had complied with the duty. This requirement was reiterated, with examples in the applicable Code.[283] This meant, for example, that a requirement to drive on a daily basis in a job description or advertisement might be subject to the duty; it would not affect some disabled people, but would probably discourage a candidate with epilepsy. Assuming that the employer had failed to make any such adjustment, the question would then be first whether that failure was justified and, secondly, whether, once it was justified, or even if it was unjustified, the requirement to drive would have been justifiable even after the adjustment was made. In the circumstances, it might be possible to make adjustment by organising another person to drive the disabled person or by enabling her to use public transport. If such adjustment was not possible, or would have placed an unreasonable burden on the employer, it would be justifiable not to make it. Alternatively, it might be possible to make some such adjustment which the employer refused to make, such as employing a person to drive the disabled person part of the week. In either circumstance, if the 281 That test was also accepted as the proper one in Foley v Post Office [2000] ICR 1283.

282 See s 21; SI 2001/2030, Art 3(a); SI 2005/3258; SI 2005 No 2774, Art 4; ss 24A–24L; ss 28A–28Q.

283 Paragraph 4.7.

requirement to drive a car on a daily basis was found to be essential to the job, the less favourable treatment – not offering the job – would not breach the Act.

Section 6 provided that if arrangements made by the employer or physical features of the employer's premises 'place the disabled person at a substantial disadvantage in comparison with persons who are not disabled, it is the duty of the employer to take such steps as it is reasonable in the circumstances of the case for him to take to prevent the arrangements or feature having that effect'. Under s 6(3), a non-exhaustive list of examples of adjustments was given. Such adjustment could include, for example, making adjustments to premises, making alterations to working procedures or hours, allowing absence for rehabilitation, assessment or treatment. In practice, such adjustments might mean providing Braille keyboards, installing ramps or lifts, or sanitary facilities with disabled access. In Morse v Wiltshire CC[284] it was made clear that the duty of the employer involves the taking of a number of sequential steps. It must first be asked whether there is a duty to adjust. Secondly, it must be considered whether the employer has taken reasonable steps to make the adjustment, and thirdly, whether any failure to take the steps can be justified.

However, under changes introduced in 2004, the employer is under an enhanced duty to make reasonable adjustment. The scope of the duty was widened as of 1 October 2004 by the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 (Amendment) Regulations 2003. These changes were introduced to give effect to the disability provisions of the 'Framework Directive' (Directive 2000/78/EC Establishing a General Framework for Equal Treatment in Employment and Occupation). The basic duty to make adjustments is now set out in s 4A(1) of the DDA which provides:

> Where –
>
> (a) a provision, criterion or practice applied by or on behalf of an employer, or > (b) any physical feature of premises occupied by the employer,
>
> places the disabled person concerned at a substantial disadvantage in comparison with persons who are not disabled, it is the duty of the employer to take such steps as it is reasonable, in all the circumstances of the case, for him to have to take in order to prevent the provision, criterion or practice, or feature, having that effect.

Thus, the duty now applies to any 'provision, criterion or practice' applied by or on behalf of an employer; the previous confusing justification defence has been removed, and the burden of proof has been altered to make it more favourable to the applicant. A failure to comply with the duty to make reasonable adjustments is a separate act of discrimination under s 3A(2) of the Act; it is actionable without the need to show discrimination due to less favourable treatment for a reason related to disability. The Court of Appeal has found that where there are claims of both discrimination for a reason relating to disability and discrimination by failure to comply with the duty to make reasonable adjustments, the latter claim should be considered first.[285] This is because, under s 3A(6), less favourable treatment for a reason related to disability cannot be justified if there has been a failure to comply with the duty to make reasonable adjustments unless it would have been justified even if the employer had complied with that duty. So s 3A(6) bars any defence of justification which depends directly or indirectly on a breach of the duty to make reasonable adjustments.

284 [1998] ICR 1023; [1998] IRLR 352.

285 Collins v Royal National Theatre Board Ltd [2004] IRLR 395, para 24; Murphy v Slough BC [2005] ICR 721, paras 38–9; the decision approved Paul v National Probation Service [2004] IRLR 190 EAT para 20, and Smith v Churchills Stairlifts plc [2006] IRLR para 15.

The duty only arises if the employer has knowledge of the disability of the complainant. Under s 4A(3) no duty is imposed on an employer who does not know, and could not reasonably be expected to know that the person concerned has a disability and is likely to be placed at a substantial disadvantage. In relation to job applicants or potential applicants, the employer must also know that the person concerned is, or may be, an applicant.

The proper approach to the duty once it arises was set out in Nottinghamshire CC v Meikle[286] by the Court of Appeal. The applicant was a teacher whose sight had deteriorated. She requested various adjustments, including the enlargement of documents, an increase in non-contact time during the day so that she could do her teaching preparation in daylight, and adjustments to her timetable to give her more time to move between classrooms. None of these adjustments were made. She was absent from work with eye strain. Her sick pay was halved under the employer's policy, which was to reduce sick pay after an absence of over 100 days. An employment tribunal held that there had been a failure to make reasonable adjustments, but the halving of the sick pay was justified. The Court of Appeal held that the proper approach was to ask whether the employer had shown that, if all reasonable adjustments had been made, she would still have been absent for over 100 days. The employer had not argued this, and the medical evidence suggested that if they had done so, such an argument would have failed.

Once the duty arises, the employer must take 'such steps as it is reasonable, in all the circumstances of the case, for him to have to take' in order to prevent the substantial disadvantage. Section 18B(1) gives a non-exhaustive list of factors to which regard should be had in determining whether it is reasonable for a person to take a particular measure of adjustment:

(a) the extent to which taking the step would prevent the effect in relation to which the duty is imposed;
(b) the extent to which it is practicable for him to take the step;
(c) the financial and other costs which would be incurred by him in taking the step and the extent to which it would disrupt any of his activities;
(d) the extent of his financial or other resources;
(e) the availability to him of financial or other assistance with respect to taking the step;
(f) the nature of his activities and the size of his undertaking;
(g) where the step would be taken in relation to a private household, the extent to which taking it would– i disrupt that household, or ii disturb any person residing there.

286 [2004] IRLR 703, at paras 40–53.

Section 18B(2) gives examples of steps an employer may need to take in order to comply with a duty to make reasonable adjustments:

(a) making adjustments to premises;
(b) allocating some of the disabled person's duties to another person;
(c) transferring him to fill another vacancy;
(d) altering his hours of working or training;
(e) assigning him to a different place of work or training;
(f) allowing him to be absent during working or training hours for rehabilitation, assessment or treatment;
(g) giving, or arranging for, training or mentoring (whether for the disabled person or any other person);
(h) acquiring or modifying equipment;
(i) modifying instructions or reference manuals;
(j) modifying procedures for testing or assessment;
(k) providing a reader or interpreter;
(l) providing supervision or other support.

In Archibald v Fife Council[287] the House of Lords gave an indication of the extent of the duty. The applicant was employed by the Council as a road-sweeper. A complication during minor surgery left her almost unable to walk; so she was unable to fulfill the duties of her job. The Council arranged for her to attend computer and administration skills, and automatically short-listed her for office-based jobs. She applied for over 100 of these, but, because they were at a slightly higher grade than her manual worker's job as a road-sweeper, the Council's policy required her to undertake competitive interviews. She was unsuccessful in all her applications, and put this down to her industrial background. Having exhausted all possibilities, the Council dismissed her. In an appeal brought by the Disability Rights Commission (DRC) the House of Lords held that the duty to take reasonable steps could potentially encompass transferring the applicant to a slightly higher grade without a competitive interview; while it was accepted that the Council's policy in asking for an interview, was relevant, it might also be reasonable for an employer to have to take the difficulties faced by an employee transferring from an industrial background into office work into account.

Provision of goods and services

In comparison with employment claims, those in respect of goods and services got off to a slow start after the inception of the DDA.[288] A duty of adjustment also arises under s 19 in relation to the provision of goods and services. The reach of s 19 was widened when private clubs were included under s 21F, inserted by s 12 DDA 2005.

287 [2004] IRLR 651.

288 In 1998, the Institute of Employment Studies (IES) carried out a major survey looking at how the DDA was working and its effectiveness. This report entitled 'Monitoring the Disability Discrimination Act 1995' was published in 1999 and revealed that, between 2 December 1996 and 9 July 1998, only nine DDA goods, facilities, services and premises cases were lodged in the county court. This was compared to 2,456 cases which had been lodged in employment tribunals.

Section 21B outlaws discrimination in a class of public authority functions not already covered.[289] Under s 19, a service provider discriminates under the Act if he refuses to provide to the disabled person a service he provides to other members of the public. Section 21 provides that if the service provider has a practice that makes it impossible or unreasonably difficult for disabled persons to make use of a service which he provides to other members of the public, it is the duty of the provider to take such steps as it is reasonable in the circumstances of the case for him to take to prevent the practice having that effect. This means adjustment to current means of service provision, including provision of auxiliary aids and availability of alternative means of delivering a service. Unlike the provisions in respect of employment, which do not apply to businesses with fewer than 15 staff, the service provisions apply across the board. However, this requirement is qualified by the need to make only 'reasonable' adaptation. Thus, for example, a large restaurant chain might be expected to provide menus in Braille, but a small high-street café might satisfy this requirement by having a waiter read out the menu.

Thus, the DDA will also be breached if the provider of services fails to comply with the duty of reasonable adjustment, depending on what is reasonable in the circumstances. A shop owner who refused to allow guide dogs on the premises would breach the DDA, although she could refuse to allow all other animals to enter. The duty might also mean that a café should display a price list in large type, an estate agent or bank might need to install an induction loop for those with impaired hearing. It might mean merely ensuring that a member of staff was available to open a door to a disabled person or to retrieve articles from high shelves.

There is quite a lot of evidence suggesting that these requirements have not been brought to the attention of service providers. The Chairman of the National Disability Council, the official advisory body on disability (now replaced by the Disability Rights Commission),[290] has expressed concern that many businesses, especially small ones, were not aware of the requirements of the Act.[291] For example, a survey commissioned by the Guide Dogs for the Blind Association found in October 2001 that thousands of pubs and restaurants continue to refuse to accept guide dogs; only two respondents to the survey of 500 publicans and restaurateurs said that they were aware of the law.[292] Companies such as large supermarket operators are aware of the law, but tend to under-enforce it. For example, supermarkets provide disabled parking, but clearly prefer to use persuasive ('talking' spaces) rather than coercive means (wheel clamps) to prevent non-disabled drivers using the disabled spaces.

Education

Sections 28C and 28T the DDA, as amended by the 2001 Act, are breached if the provider of education in question fails to comply with a duty of reasonable adjustment and he cannot show that the failure to comply is justified. Sections 28C and T provide that if arrangements made by the provider for admission to the institution in question

289 SI 2005/2774, Art 4.
290 See below, p 1593.
291 See the Guardian, 29 September 1999.
292 See the Guardian, 3 October 2001.

and in relation to the services provided 'place the disabled person at a substantial disadvantage in comparison with persons who are not disabled', it is the duty of the provider to take such steps as it is reasonable for it to have to take to prevent that effect from occurring. The steps that should be taken do not require schools, under s 28C(2), to alter or remove a physical feature or provide auxiliary aids or services; the precise steps to be taken in schools are determined by regulations made under s 28C(3). Examples of adjustments that can be made in schools include timetabling lessons on the ground floor if there is no lift and bringing library books to a disabled pupil if the library is inaccessible.[293] The duties placed on higher and further educational institutions by the 2001 Act, while closing a significant gap in the DDA provision, were of quite a qualified and indeterminate kind. In this respect the 2001 Act continued the stance adopted by the DDA itself. But the provision for Higher or Further education must accord with the Framework Directive since it covers vocational training as well as employment, so the current, post-2006, provision is very similar to the existing employment provision. The provision for further educational institutions resembles that for schools. Their duty of reasonable adjustment includes a duty to provide auxiliary aids.[294] In determining the steps to be taken the institution must, under s 28T(2), have regard to the code of practice issued under s 53A of the DDA.

Discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation

The Sexual Orientation Regulations 2003 import the concept of indirect discrimination in employment (under reg 3(1)(b)), which provides that such discrimination arises if:

> A applies to B a provision, criterion or practice which he applies or would apply equally to persons not of the same sexual orientation as B, but –
>
> (i) which puts or would put persons of the same sexual orientation as B at a particular disadvantage when compared with other persons, > (ii) which puts B at that disadvantage, and > (iii) which A cannot show to be a proportionate means of achieving a legitimate aim.
>
> (2) A comparison of B's case with that of another person under paragraph (1) must be such that the relevant circumstances in the one case are the same, or not materially different, in the other.

Thus reg 3(1)(b) outlaws practices which, while neutral on their face, have a disproportionately adverse impact on persons due to their sexual orientation. Making allowance for indirect discrimination means that the regulations cover not only isolated acts of discrimination, but also institutionalised discrimination. This reflects the pluralist approach; it takes account, for example, of endemic practices of discriminating on this ground in, for example, certain police forces. In asking not whether a person can, in theory, comply with a condition, but whether he or she can do so in practice, it broadens the area of morally unjustifiable differentiation.

293 Standing Committee B Fourth Sitting col 151, 29 March 2001.
294 Section 28S.

There are four stages in operating this concept. First, it must be shown that a condition has been applied to the applicant. Second, it must be shown that the condition is one which puts or would put persons of the same sexual orientation as the applicant 'at a particular disadvantage when compared with other persons'. The term 'particular disadvantage' will now have to be interpreted as cases arise. It may be taken to mean that considerably fewer persons of a particular sexual orientation are able to comply with the condition than other persons. Third, the claimant must show that the condition puts him or her at a particular disadvantage; in other words the claimant must be a 'victim' due to the application of the condition: test cases cannot therefore be brought by pressure groups such as Stonewall. Once the claimant has proved these three requirements, the burden of proof shifts to the employer to show if possible that the condition is a 'proportionate means of achieving a legitimate aim'. The decisions under the race and sex provisions as to indirect discrimination can be applied in this context since the key tests are the same.

6 Victimisation and harassment: sex, race, disability, sexual orientation

Harassment

Introduction

Under the SDA and RRA as originally introduced victims of harassment had to fashion their claims as discrimination claims. This meant that claims might well fail on technicalities. Now as a result of European Directives, free-standing harassment claims can be brought without the need to prove discrimination. This is now the case in respect of all the protected grounds discussed in this section. Under the amendations to the SDA, the RRA, the DDA and under the Sexual Orientation Regulations, it is clear that behaviour that can reasonably be viewed as humiliating or degrading will not necessarily also amount to discrimination: all will depend on the specific circumstances.

Harassment as discrimination[295]

Prior to reforms introduced as a result of the European Directives, it was clear under the SDA and RRA that if the employer subjected the applicant to employment detriment arising from harassment, such as a transfer from one establishment to another, this would be direct discrimination.[296] Moreover, sexual or racial harassment appeared arguably to be a detriment in itself[297] if it was discriminatory under s 6(6)(b) SDA or s 4 RRA which speak of 'or subjecting [the employee] to any other detriment', even though it did not lead to other unfavourable action, so long as some employment disadvantage

295 See generally Hadjifotiou, H, Women and Harassment at Work, 1983, Pluto; MacKinnon, C, Sexual Harassment of Working Women, 1979, Yale University Press; Mullender, R, 'Racial harassment, sexual harassment and the expressive function of law (1998) 61 MLR 236.

296 Porcelli v Strathclyde Regional Council [1986] ICR 564.

297 Although see (1985) 101 LQR 471 on this point.

arises. In De Souza v Automobile Association[298] the Court of Appeal found that racial abuse in itself is not enough to cause an employee detriment within the meaning of s 4 of the RRA. The Court had to find that by reason of the act complained of, a reasonable worker would or might take the view that he had thereby been disadvantaged in the circumstances in which he had thereafter to work. Such disadvantage was interpreted quite broadly. In Hereford and Worcester CC v Clayton,[299] firefighters were informed of the 'bad news: the new firefighter is a woman'. This was found to be a sexist insult capable of detrimental consequences. It sent the wrong signal to the firefighters and might have been likely to cause victimisation. This was less favourable treatment on the grounds of sex and amounted to unlawful sex discrimination. The decisions as to what amounted to humiliating behaviour were made in the employment field, but were applicable to the fields of education and housing. For example, under s 17 of the RRA, which provided that discrimination by bodies in charge of educational establishments may occur if a person is subjected 'to any other detriment', an action could have been successful against school administrators who failed to prevent racial harassment of a pupil.

The problem inherent in viewing harassment as discrimination is that the judicial inquiry necessarily focuses on the question of equal treatment rather than on the nature of the treatment. In other words, where a man or other comparator was or would also have been subjected to the behaviour in question, experienced by the applicant as humiliating or degrading, the claim may fail.[300] This problem was illustrated by the findings in Stewart v Cleveland Guest Ltd.[301] The claim was brought by a woman who had been subjected to a display of sexually explicit pictures of women in the workplace. She had also been subjected to sexual assault and to sexual harassment at work, although these incidents were not included in her claim. She had eventually got the pictures removed, when her union intervened, but the management had allowed the workers to know who was to blame for their removal, and she had felt unable to return to the workplace. The tribunal found that the display was sexually neutral (despite the fact that the pictures were only of women and women were in the minority in the workplace), although it also found that her objections to the pictures were reasonable. It reached the decision to dismiss her claim on the basis that other women in the workplace did not object and, therefore, it could be said that, objectively, the pictures were not offensive or created humiliating conditions of work. However, taking into account all the circumstances of the case, it could be argued that there was sufficient evidence that the pictures were, objectively, offensive and degrading and that the other women had been, as was argued, desensitised by the male-oriented general ethos. The EAT upheld the tribunal, but left open the possibility that apparently neutral general treatment which had a particular impact on women could be viewed as discrimination.

298 [1986] ICR 514.

299 (1996) The Times, 8 October.

300 For criticism of this approach, which compares it with the evolving stance in US law away from the requirement to prove differential treatment and towards emphasis on the question whether there had been creation of a hostile working environment, see Dine, J and Watt, B, 'Sexual harassment: moving away from discrimination' (1995) 58 MLR 343.

301 [1996] ICR 535.

However, in a later decision, Sidhu v Aerospace Composite Technology Ltd,[302] a different approach was taken. The plaintiff had been subject to racial abuse and an assault. He and the racist workmates were dismissed because of his violent reaction to the assault. The racist element in it was disregarded by the employers in taking the decision to dismiss him. It was found in the EAT that to disregard this element was a 'race-specific' decision having a 'race-specific' effect. The nature and effect of the decision was found to amount to treatment on racial grounds amounting in itself to racial discrimination under s 1(1)(a) of the RRA, and it was not found necessary to consider whether a person of a different racial group or a white person would have been treated differently. Clearly, the claim might have failed had the employer been allowed to rely on the argument that a white person who had reacted to a racist assault in the same way would have been treated in the same way. Thus, it appeared that two different approaches were emerging.

However, in Secretary of State for Defence v Scotland; Pearce v Mayfield Secondary School Governing Body, which is discussed above, the House of Lords considered the joined cases of Pearce and of McDonald since they raised the question whether sexual orientation discrimination fall within the SDA. The House of Lords overturned the previous decision of the EAT in Burton v De Vere Hotels Ltd,[303] discussed further below, and concluded that sexual harassment is not unlawful discrimination in itself but requires a comparison with how a comparator of the opposite sex was or would have been treated. In Pearce a male homosexual, it was found, would have been treated equally badly and therefore the SDA could not be employed since it is based on formal equality – equal treatment for persons in a like position. The decision illustrates the limitations of the formal equality position.

Free standing harassment claims on the protected grounds

Prior to the reforms considered below the European Commission had defined sexual harassment as 'conduct of a sexual nature or other conduct based on sex affecting the dignity of men and women at work'.[304] In other words, it was not defined as discrimination but as a discrete wrong. The definition proffered clearly covered verbal or physical conduct. The Commission published a Code of Practice[305] on sexual harassment based on the definition above, which was supported by the Council of Ministers,[306] giving guidance to employees and employers and stating that harassment 'pollutes the working environment and can have a devastating effect upon the health, confidence, morale and performance of those affected by it'.[307] The Commission recommended that

302 [1999] IRLR 683.

303 [1996] IRLR 596.

304 OJ C157/2. See Employment Law Review for 1992, below.

305 Commission Recommendation of 27 November 1991 on the Protection of the Dignity of Men and Women at Work OJ L49 3, 1992. This followed a report by Rubenstein, M, The Dignity of Women at Work: A Report on the Problem of Sexual Harassment in the Member States of the European Communities, 1987. See above, fn 322. For criticism of the Code, see (1993) 143 NLJ 1473.

306 In a Declaration (see (1992) 217 European Industrial Relations Review 21; see also Rubenstein, M (1992) 21 ILJ 70).

307 See OJ 4.2.1992.

the Code should be adopted by member states,[308] which should also take other action to address this problem, but the UK Government did not show any inclination to respond. However, industrial tribunals faced with an allegation of sexual harassment as a form of direct discrimination had regard to the guidance offered by the Code.[309]

In response to the relevant EU Directives, harassment on all the main protected grounds is no longer treated as discrimination. The Race Discrimination Directive[310] defined harassment as behaviour that creates an 'intimidating, hostile, degrading or offensive, humiliating or offensive environment' and has the purpose or the effect of violating a person's dignity. This definition of harassment was imported into the RRA via s 3A and is included in the SDA under s 4A.[311] It is also adopted under the DDA[312] and the Sexual Orientation Regulations.

The definition of 'harassment' on grounds of sexual orientation is echoed in the other provisions. Under reg 5(1) of the regulations:

> For the purposes of these Regulations, a person ('A') subjects another person ('B') to harassment where, on grounds of sexual orientation, A engages in unwanted conduct which has the purpose or effect of
>
> (a) violating B's dignity; or > (b) creating an intimidating, hostile, degrading, humiliating or offensive environment for B.
>
> (2) Conduct shall be regarded as having the effect specified in paragraph (1)(a) or (b) only if, having regard to all the circumstances, including in particular the perception of B, it should reasonably be considered as having that effect.

The issues considered below arise in respect of all the key protected grounds.

It is clear that the harasser need not appreciate the effect of his or her behaviour and need not have intended it to cause humiliation. Under the previous case law there was some uncertainty as to whether 'detriment' should be interpreted subjectively or objectively and a tendency to adopt the latter approach where the applicant was perceived as particularly sensitive[313] and the former where he or she was thought to be more robust.[314] This approach arguably rendered the previous test for harassment under-inclusive. The current harassment provisions seem to encapsulate a mixed approach; a mainly objective test is used, involving asking whether the offending behaviour had reached a level at which reasonable people would term it humiliating. This stems from Driskel[315] in which, however, it was also said that the tribunal should consider the victim's subjective perception of the conduct. The explanatory memoranda

308 Commission Recommendation of 27 November 1991.
309 Wadman v Carpenter Farrer Partnership (1993) The Times, 31 May, EAT.
310 Directive 2000/43/EC.
311 In force from October 2005.
312 Section 16A.
313 Wileman v Minilec Engineering Ltd [1988] ICR 318; for criticism see Gay (1990) 19 ILJ 35, who considered this ruling to be an 'example of judicial insensitivity'.
314 Snowball v Gardner Merchant [1987] ICR 719.
315 [2000] IRLR 151.

accompanying the new amendments and regulations stated that the Driskel approach was encapsulated in the new provisions.[316]

A range of forms of behaviour can amount to harassment. The harassment does not have to be direct and it can emanate from employees, and not from the employer. Certain recent cases are considered below in which, apart from one, it was not necessary to prove discrimination. The first case to be brought under the Sexual Orientation Regulations for discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation was a harassment case, Whitfield v Cleanaway UK.[317] Mr Whitfield, a gay office manager, stated that he had been subject to homophobic abuse. This abuse included name-calling and taunting. He resigned from his job and brought a claim for constructive dismissal and harassment due to his sexual orientation. He was successful in his claim and the ET awarded him £35,000.

In Whitfield the employee was the direct recipient of homophobic abuse. In the case of Whitehead v Brighton Marine Palace and Pier Company Ltd[318] Mr Whitehead raised a grievance at work regarding his manager's attitude towards him. Mr Whitehead was absent from work due to sickness shortly after raising the grievance. On returning from his sick leave he was informed by a colleague that his manager had referred to him in a particularly offensive and homophobic manner. He had not heard his manager make this comment, but he resigned and successfully brought a claim in the ET for harassment due to his sexual orientation.

In a sex discrimination case (under the previous provisions), Moonsar v Fiveways Express Transport Ltd,[319] the EAT held that it was sex discrimination, in these circumstances, for a man to download porn at work. Ms Moonsar brought a claim for sex discrimination on the grounds that male members of staff downloaded pornographic images onto screens in a room where she was working, on three different occasions. The material was not circulated directly to her, but she knew what was going on; she made no complaint at the time because she wanted to keep her job. The tribunal decided that this could not amount to sex discrimination because she had not been shown the images and had not made any complaint about the men viewing them. Ms Moonsar argued that in claims of sex discrimination the tribunal was legally obliged (under s 63 of the Sex Discrimination Act and the decision in Barton v Investec)[320] to look for any evidence from which it could conclude that there had been sex discrimination. If they decided there was, then the burden of proof passed to the employer to prove that he or she did not discriminate.

Ms Moonsar argued that the facts of the case could easily have amounted to sexual harassment, whether or not the images were circulated to her. It was clear that the men's behaviour amounted to an affront to her dignity. The tribunal had even made a finding that she found their behaviour unacceptable. The logic of that finding meant that she had suffered a 'detriment' or disadvantage. She also argued that her failure to complain was not relevant in assessing whether she had suffered a detriment. She 316 See, e.g., the pre-consultation Explanatory Notes to the Regulations on Sexual Orientation.

317 4 February 2005, unreported.
318 Case 3102595/04 on 18th April 2005.
319 27 September 2004.
320 [2003] ICR 1205.

relied on the EAT's decision in Driskel v Peninsula Business Services Ltd[321] to support her point that the men's behaviour was so obviously detrimental to her that it was 'of no significance' that she had not complained. The EAT accepted this argument. It said that, viewed objectively, the men's behaviour could be regarded as degrading or offensive to a woman. It was, therefore, potentially less favourable treatment. The burden should then have shifted to the employers to show that there was not less favourable treatment – they had not done so. The EAT said it had to substitute a finding that there was sexual discrimination in this case. Under the current free-standing provisions provisions it would not be necessary to show that there was less favourable treatment. The findings are still of value as giving an indication as to the type of behaviour that would be viewed as an affront to dignity.

In Empower Scotland Ltd v Khan[322] the links between racial and religious discrimination, especially in relation to Muslims, were illustrated. The EAT upheld a claim of harassment brought by an employee of Ethnic Minorities Participating On Wider Economic Responsibilities (Empower) Scotland against a colleague. Mr Khan, a Muslim of Pakistani origin, claimed that Mr Singh, an Indian Sikh, had made sweeping statements, such as, 'you Pakistanis are all the same', and 'you Muslims are all troublemakers'. The judge said that, 'given that 90 per cent of Pakistanis are Muslim, and given that the maker of the statement considers that all Muslims are troublemakers, it follows that a Pakistani who is a Muslim is a troublemaker'. The EAT dismissed the employers' appeal, saying that there was 'a sound basis' for the tribunal's finding that the claimant was abused on grounds of his Pakistani national origin.

An issue may arise as to the employer's responsibility for the harassment. Section 41(1) of the SDA states that an act done by an employee in the course of employment shall be treated as done by the employer as well as by him or her, whether or not it was done with the employer's knowledge or approval. There are equivalent provisions in s 32 of the RRA and s 58 of the DDA. In respect of the previous position a harassment claim on the protected grounds could be brought where the employer had made little or no effort to curb the harassment.[323] These decisions appear now to be applicable to free-standing harassment claims. In Tower Boot Co v Jones,[324] the Court of Appeal adopted a purposive approach to the legislation in finding that employers must take steps to make themselves aware of harassment in the workplace and must take further steps to prevent it. It was not sufficient for employers simply to argue that the harassment did not take place in the course of employment:[325] this would create an obvious anomaly, since gross harassment (which occurred in Jones) could never be said to take place in the course of employment.

The decision reaffirmed a broad liability of employers for racial abuse, and in Burton and Another v De Vere Hotels[326] it was found that the employer will be liable if it allows employees to be subject to racial abuse where it could have been prevented, even if the abuser is not an employee. The case of Burton v De Vere Hotels Ltd was

321 [2000] IRLR 151.
322 2005, unreported, noted in the CRE's 2005 Annual Report.
323 See Enterprise Glass Co Ltd v Miles [1990] Ind Relations Review and Report 412–15C.
324 [1997] ICR 254; [1997] IRLR 168.
325 This had been accepted by the EAT: see [1995] IRLR 529.
326 (1996) The Times, 3 October.

often relied upon by applicants in harassment cases, such as Ms Pearce, where the harasser was not an employee of the applicant's employer. Instead, for example, they may be an external third party. The usual vicarious liability provisions of the Sex Discrimination and Race Relations Acts do not apply because the applicant and harasser are not employed by the same employer. Thus, unless the applicant's employer could be fixed with liability, the applicant would be without a remedy. In the Burton case, the hotel owner, who employed the black female applicant waitresses, was held liable for the racist offence caused by the jokes of Bernard Manning who had been engaged to entertain the guests in the hotel restaurant. In adopting a purposive interpretation that emphasised the need to protect employees in these circumstances, the EAT in Burton concluded that the issue that had to be determined was whether the incidents were 'sufficiently under the control of the employer so that he could, by the application of good employment practice, have prevented the harassment'. By this route, applicants harassed by third parties could normally obtain redress against their own employers where they argued that the employer could have controlled the situation but failed to do so. On this principle, an action might be brought successfully where the employer did not know of the harassment but should have known, thus placing a duty upon employers to be aware of what is occurring in the workplace.[327]

However, in Secretary of State for Defence v Scotland; Pearce v Mayfield Secondary School Governing Body,[328] which is discussed above, the House of Lords overturned the previous decision of the EAT in Burton v De Vere Hotels Ltd. In Pearce the homophobic abuse had come from pupils, not from employees. Ms Pearce had argued that the school, although not the employer of the pupils, was liable for failing to control their conduct. Her claim was against the school as her employer. But the campaign of abuse mounted against her was a campaign by pupils of the school, not by members of the school staff. So the Lords found that Ms Pearce was not assisted by s 41(1) SDA. It was argued that nevertheless the school could and should have taken steps to shield Ms Pearce, and its failure to do so constituted sex discrimination.

The Lords found that the Burton decision had treated an employer's inadvertent failure to take such steps as discrimination even though the failure had nothing to do with the sex or race of the employees. It was found that in this crucially important respect the decision had given insufficient heed to the statutory discrimination provisions. An essential element of 'direct' sex discrimination by an employer is that, on the grounds of sex, the employer treats the employee less favourably than he treats or would treat an employee of the opposite sex. Similarly with 'direct' racial discrimination: the 'less favourable treatment' comparison is an essential ingredient of the statutory wrong: see s 1(1)(a) RRA. Unless the employer's conduct satisfies this 'less favourable treatment' test, the employer is not guilty of direct sex or racial discrimination. In making this comparison acts of persons for whose conduct an employer is vicariously responsible are to be attributed to the employer. It is otherwise in respect of acts of third parties for whose conduct the employer is not vicariously liable. It was found that the harassment in Burton was committed by third parties for whose conduct the employer was not vicariously responsible. The Lords concluded that racial discrimination on the part of the employer had not arisen.[329] This decision turned on the need to show discrimination, which is no longer necessary under the free-standing harassment provisions. However, it does not determine whether harassment by third parties in the work place could be viewed in similar circumstances as sufficiently under the employer's control so as to render the employer liable in respect of it.

327 This has been accepted in the US: Continental Can Co v Minn 297 NW 2d 241.
328 [2003] IRLR 512.

Victimisation

Protection against discrimination is insufficient; the legislation needs to protect persons from recrimination if they take action under it. Under the relevant statutes, victimisation occurs when a discriminator treats a person less favourably for taking action or aiding in an action under the RRA, SDA, EPA, DDA or Sexual Orientation Regulations – for doing a 'protected act'.[330] The provisions under s 2 of the RRA and s 55 of the DDA are almost identical to the equivalent 'victimisation' provisions under s 4 of the SDA and similar to those under reg 4 of the Sexual Orientation Regulations, and have the same aim – to deter employers and others from dismissing or treating adversely someone who undertakes a 'protected act' or aids another in doing so.

In order to determine whether the unfavourable treatment is linked to the protected act, it is necessary to ask whether the claimant would have been subjected to the treatment but for performing the protected act. In order to decide this question, it must be asked how a comparable person would have been treated. According to the findings in Aziz v Trinity St Taxis[331] the comparison must be between a person who has done the act and a person who has not, not between a person who has done the act and a person who has taken action under other legislation. This stance was confirmed by the Court of Appeal in Brown v TNT Express Worldwide (UK) Ltd[332] and by the House of Lords in Chief Constable of West Yorkshire Police v Khan.[333]

Following Aziz v Trinity St Taxis[334] there has to be a clear causal relationship between the action brought and the unfavourable treatment. Aziz, a taxi driver and a member of Trinity Street Taxis (TST), thought that TST were unfairly treating him and made a tape recording of a conversation to prove it. He took his claim of race discrimination to an industrial tribunal, but it failed. He was then expelled from TST and claimed victimisation. The Court of Appeal considered the question of causation: had TST treated him less favourably by reason of what he had done in making the tapes with a view to bringing a race discrimination case, or had it expelled him because of the breach of trust involved in making the tapes? It was found that the necessary causal relationship was not established; it was not apparent that TST were influenced in their decision to expel him by the fact that the tapes were made in order to bring a race relations case; they would have expelled him anyway because of the breach of trust.

329 The similar case of Go Kidz Go Ltd v Bourdouane, unreported, Employment Appeal Tribunal, 10 September 1996, was also stated to be wrongly decided. Burton is reported: [1996] IRLR 596.

330 For discussion of the victimisation provisions, see Ellis, E and Miller, CJ, 'The victimisation of anti-discrimination complainants' [1992] PL 80.

331 [1988] WLR 79; [1988] 2 All ER 860.

332 [2001] ICR 182.

333 (2001) The Times, 16 October, HL; [2000] IRLR 324; [2000] ICR 1169, CA.

334 [1988] WLR 79; [1988] 2 All ER 860.

This was a fine distinction to make and it is arguable that once a plaintiff has shown that unfavourable treatment has prima facie some causal relationship with a protected act, some causal potency, the burden of proof should shift to the employer to show that it was entirely unrelated to that act.

Under s 4(1) of the SDA, less favourable treatment of someone because she has done a 'protected act' – brought an action or intends to do so or has assisted in such action under the 1975 Act or the EPA – amounts to victimisation. The usefulness of this provision has been diminished owing to the need to show that the unfavourable treatment is solely due to the protected act and not in part for some other reason.[335] It may often be hard to prove that this is the case and this is particularly unfortunate owing to evidence which is beginning to emerge in both race and sex discrimination cases that in respect of certain professions, including in particular the police, those in authority are becoming more likely to respond to a protected act by bringing disciplinary proceedings which might not otherwise have been undertaken. This occurred when Alison Halford brought discrimination proceedings against, inter alia, Merseyside Police Authority and was probably a factor in her decision to settle the discrimination claim rather than pursue it to a conclusion.[336] A further barrier to victimisation claims was identified in Wales v Comr of Police for the Metropolis;[337] it was found that unless the first action complained of amounts to actionable discrimination (the action would have succeeded had it been brought), further unfavourable acts occurring owing to the complaint do not fall within s 4(1). This decision may be incorrect and the decision of the Court of Appeal in Tower Boot Co v Jones[338] may ameliorate its impact (since many victimisation claims could be brought as harassment claims), but it does narrow down one avenue leading to possible redress.

Under the DDA, victimisation occurs when a discriminator treats a person, disabled or non-disabled, less favourably for complaining that the DDA has been breached or aiding in that complaint. Following Aziz v Trinity St Taxis,[339] there has to be a clear causal relationship between the action brought and the unfavourable treatment. In relation to sexual orientation, victimisation, defined in reg 4, occurs where a person receives less favourable treatment than others by reason of the fact that he has brought (or given evidence in) proceedings, made an allegation or otherwise done anything under or by reference to the regulations.

The approach in victimisation cases may, however, change somewhat as a result of the findings of the House of Lords in Nagarajan v London Regional Transport.[340] The Lords found that the alleged discriminator need not have the protected act consciously in mind; all it is necessary to show is that an important or significant cause of the less favourable treatment is the fact that he or she had knowledge of the fact 335 Aziz v Trinity St Taxis [1988] 2 All ER 860, CA.

336 A similar conclusion was reached in a race discrimination case which was settled in May 1993. Joginder Singh Prem claimed that Nottinghamshire Police had discriminated against him in failing to promote him. They responded by bringing disciplinary charges which were later dismissed. He was awarded a payment of £20,000 in respect of the discrimination and an ex gratia payment of £5,000 in respect of the victimisation, although it was denied. See (1993) the Guardian, 5 May.

337 [1995] IRLR 531. For discussion, see (1997) 26(2) ILJ 158.

338 [1997] ICR 254; [1997] IRLR 168. See above, p 1561.

339 [1988] WLR 79; [1988] 2 All ER 860.

340 [1999] 4 All ER 65; [1999] 3 WLR 425.

that the applicant had done a protected act. Such a formulation of the test, which echoes the test under s 1(1)(1)(a) of the RRA and SDA, might have led to a different result in Aziz since it could have been argued that the employer had the protected act subconsciously in mind. At the least, it makes it clear that the alleged discriminator need not have a conscious motive connected with the relevant legislation and that there may be more than one cause of the unfavourable treatment. Thus, this decision and that in Aziz regarding the choice of comparator afforded greater force to the anti-victimisation provisions of the RRA, which also extends to the equivalent provisions of the SDA and DDA. The question to be asked, following Nagarajan, was: can a causal connection between the protected act and the unfavourable treatment be established?

However, the decision of the House of Lords in Chief Constable of West Yorkshire Police v Khan[341] signalled, to an extent, a change of direction which may detract from the impact of Nagarajan. The Lords found that where a person who has made a claim to a tribunal alleging discrimination subsequently applies for another job, it is not victimisation for the current employer to refuse to provide a reference, citing the claim as the reason. The Chief Constable of Khan's force had stated in response to the reference request that he could not comment as to the reference for fear of prejudicing his own case before the tribunal. The Lords reached their conclusion on the ground that although Khan had been unfavourably treated by comparison with other employees who had not done a protected act (in respect of such persons, the reference would have been sent), the treatment was not by reason of his having done the protected act; it was due to the existence of the proceedings which made it reasonable for the Chief Constable to seek to preserve his position. The proper question to be asked was not merely 'But for the protected act would the adverse treatment have occurred?', but to inquire into the motivation of the alleged discriminator. In this instance, the motive concerned the need to preserve his position in relation to the legal claim; he did not, according to the House of Lords, act as he did in refusing to give the reference for the reason that Khan had done a protected act. So the simple 'but for' test established in Nagarajan was rejected.

The problem with this approach is that it means that initiating a protected act is likely or bound to set in motion a chain of events, allowing an alleged discriminator to claim that it was one of those events, not the act itself, which led to the unfavourable treatment. If the focus of the inquiry is on the motivation of the alleged discriminator and not on the causal relationship between the unfavourable treatment and the protected act, the claim of victimisation may fail where the alleged discriminator can plausibly (and even with factual correctness) argue that he or she was motivated by one of the events set in motion by the doing of the protected act, not the act itself. In relation to this point it can be argued that two persons may be placed in a very difficult position by reason of the doing of the protected act – the alleged discriminator and the alleged victim. In the instant case, the Chief Constable might have prejudiced his position by writing the reference. Equally, Khan may have been adversely affected by the fact that it was not written. He did have an interview for the other post, but was eventually rejected. It is impossible to say whether the rejection was due at least in part to the lack of a reference and to the fact that he was known to be bringing a discrimination claim. Therefore, there is a choice in such instances before the courts. Should the position of the alleged discriminator or that of the alleged victim be protected? If a test of a straightforward causal relationship is used, the latter is likely to be protected. If a subjective test is used, the position of the former will be protected. The policy of the legislation appears to be to protect the position of the latter and, therefore, a causal relationship test should have been used.

341 (2001) The Times, 16 October, HL; [2000] IRLR 324; [2000] ICR 1169, CA.

But in future a person who has brought a discrimination claim will have to suffer the detriment of knowing that while the claim is pending, he or she is in difficulties in applying for another post, thus possibly missing significant opportunities and also being forced to stay in the same workplace in which he has made the claim, which may well be very unpleasant. Thus, the decision of the House of Lords allows a person who has done a protected act to suffer some detriment which is causally linked to the doing of the act. The decision may deter some claimants, precisely the outcome that the legislation appeared to be designed to prevent. In the instant case, it would not have seemed too onerous to expect the police force in question to have put a procedure in place designed to cope with this very situation, such as devolving the writing of the reference to a person not directly implicated in the discrimination claim. If that had any effect on the position of the Chief Constable in relation to the claim, that might be viewed as an inevitable consequence of seeking to protect the position of persons who undertake protected acts. In any event, it is hard to see that it would have such an effect since the person writing the reference would presumably rely on personnel records in order to do so which presumably would be disclosed in any event to the tribunal hearing the claim.

Derbyshire v St Helen's Met BC[342] followed Khan in finding that although the treatment of persons who had brought an equal pay claim was less favourable, and the less favourable treatment was causally linked to the claim, the employer had acted 'honestly and reasonably' in trying to settle the proceedings. The net result of the decision in Khan is to allow some detrimental action against persons who have done protected acts.

Flawed as the provisions protecting from victimisation are, it should be pointed out that they do not appear to cover the employee who is victimised for taking any form of legal action against a colleague; nor do they apply to post-employment victimisation.[343] Thus, where a police officer brought an allegation of rape and buggery against a colleague in respect of an alleged off-duty attack, her subsequent vicious and prolonged victimisation at work could not, it was found, be addressed under the anti-victimisation provisions of the SDA,[344] although it might be said that a clearer example of gross discrimination on grounds of sex could hardly be found. She was, for example, threatened with violence by her chief superintendent, forced to undergo psychological analysis, advised to leave the force, harassed, and denied time off work.

This might be an instance in which action under the HRA would provide an alternative possibility. Indeed, the HRA may provide the possibility of curbing victimisation in relation to the taking of legal action in situations ranging far outside the employment

342 [2006] ICR 90.

343 Adekeye v Post Office (No 2) [1997] IRLR 105.

344 Waters v Comr of Police of the Metropolis [1997] IRLR 589. Arguably, she could now rely on s 7(1)(a) HRA and Art 8 (or 3) as an alternative possibility.

context, although, due to s 6, not where the responsibility lies with a private body. Where an applicant has been victimised in a work-related situation, or indeed in any situation for which a public authority has responsibility, such as in an educational institution, as a result of instigating legal action, whether against a colleague or the employer, or perhaps against any person or body, it would be arguable that Art 6 has been breached on the basis that the victimisation is intended to force her to drop the action, thus impairing her exercise of her Art 6 rights.[345]

It could also be argued that where a person has been victimised post-employment on the basis of taking action under the RRA, SDA, DDA, or Sexual Orientation Regulations, or any protected ground, on the basis of alleged employment detriment under other legislation or on other unprotected grounds, Arts 6 and 14 could be engaged.[346] The same argument could be made on any protected ground within Art 14, including on the grounds of race, sex or disability, outside the contexts and/or grounds covered by the anti-discrimination legislation. Where victimisation reaches the level of viciousness found in the instance given above, an action based on Art 3 or Art 8[347] could be brought. In all these instances, assuming that the body responsible, directly or indirectly, for the victimisation, was a public authority, the action could be brought directly against it under s 7(1)(a) of the HRA. This is clearly a very significant possibility, and since one might have expected the courts, under the impetus of the HRA, to seek to prevent victimisation by private bodies with a view to punishing persons for or preventing them from taking legal action, it is at least possible that eventually a right to take legal action free from victimisation will be discovered to exist arising from common law principle.[348]

7 Lawful discrimination

Exclusions from the Sex Discrimination Act

A large number of exclusions were embodied in the Sex Discrimination Act and therefore discrimination in such circumstances was lawful under domestic legislation.[349] Certain occupations were excluded under s 19, which covers employment for the purpose of organised religion, and s 21, which covers mine workers. The armed forces were also 345 See the general discussion of Art 6 in Chapter 2, pp 63–64.

346 On the basis that Art 14 encompasses a number of protected grounds in a non-exhaustive list; see Chapter 2, p 108.

347 Arguably, the treatment to which the woman police officer was subjected could be viewed as analogous to that suffered by the applicants in Lustig-Prean v UK (1999) 7 BHRC 65; Smith and Grady v UK (2000) 29 EHRR 493. Indeed, it is suggested that it might, unlike the treatment in those instances, fall within the boundaries of Art 3.

348 There are recent indications that the common law is showing a robustness in providing for protection against discrimination which was not previously evident: see Matadeen and Another v Pointu and Others, Minister of Education and Science and Another [1999] 1 AC 98, but there would be the grave problem of finding an existing cause of action. The alternative is that direct horizontal effect will at some future point be found to arise under the HRA on the basis that a court is a public authority under s 6; see Chapter 4, pp 216, 255–56.

349 See further, for discussion of the original provisions: Pannick, D, Sexual Discrimination Law 1985, pp 255–70; McColgan, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 6, pp 346–54.

excluded under s 85(4), but this exclusion was abolished under ss 21–28 of the Armed Forces Act 1996. Acts safeguarding national security were exempted (s 52), as were acts done under statutory authority (s 7 and s 51) for the protection of women. This last provision means that the 1975 Act is of lower status than other statutes, since it is unable to prevail over other statutory provisions relating to the protection of women even though they were passed before it. Thus, statutes intended to enshrine discrimination in their provisions for such protection are not affected by the 1975 Act;[350] this exception is permitted under Art 2(7) Equal Treatment Directive. These exceptions have tended to be narrowed down owing to the impact of the Equal Treatment Directive (ETD). For discussion of lawful discrimination under EU law, see below.[351]

A general exception to provisions against discrimination in the employment field also arises where sex can be said to be a genuine occupational qualification (GOQ) under one of the s 7 provisions.[352] Until 2005 Art 2(2) of the ETD provided a general exception where the employment activities 'by reason of their nature or the context in which they are carried out, the sex of the worker constitutes a determining factor'. After amendment, Art 2(6) operates only where sex constitutes 'a genuine and determining occupational requirement provided that the objective is legitimate and the requirement is proportionate'.[353] All exceptions in domestic law must comply with these requirements; so the GOQs under s 7 SDA must be read subject to them. The s 7 GOQs arise in a number of contexts, including those where the job appears to call for a man for reasons of physiology (excluding physical strength or stamina)[354] under s 7(2)(a), or for reasons of authenticity in respect of plays or other entertainment, or to preserve decency or privacy under s 7(2)(b), or where the job involves dealings with other countries where women are less likely to be able to carry them out effectively because of the customs of that other country, under s 7(2)(g). MacKinnon has argued that these exceptions are too broad as extending some way beyond biological differences and accepting differential treatment based solely on social categorisation.[355] On this basis, it is arguable that they are due to be overhauled and narrowed down, particularly the last-mentioned, on the ground that the UK should not bow to discriminatory practices in other countries. The new limiting provisions under the ETD, as amended, mean that significant narrowing down could occur, in accordance with the demands of proportionality.

The existing GOQs under s 7 of the SDA are also applied under s 7A in respect of discrimination on grounds of gender reassignment. Further GOQs are applied under s 7B where (a) the job involves the likelihood of performing intimate physical searches pursuant to statutory powers, or (b) living in a private home where objection might reasonably be taken to allowing the person in question 'the degree of physical or social contact with a person living in the home' or 'knowledge of intimate details of 350 Section 51 was substituted by the Employment Act 1989, s 3, which is of narrower scope. For discussion of provisions intended to protect women, especially in relation to reproductive risks, see Kennedy (1986) 14 IJSL 393.

351 See pp 1579–86. See, particularly, the discussion of Johnston v Chief Constable of the RUC [1986] ECR 1651.

352 For analysis of s 7, see Pannick, D (1984) OJLS 198.

353 Equal Treatment (Amendment) Dir 2002/73/EC.

354 For criticism of this provision see Pannick, Sex Discrimination Law 1985, p 238.

355 MacKinnon, C, Sexual Harassment of Working Women, 1979, pp 121 and 180.

the person's life'; or (c) it is necessary to live on premises provided by the employer since it is impracticable for the holder of the job to live elsewhere and objection could be taken to the job holder sharing accommodation with persons of either sex while undergoing gender reassignment; or (d) the job holder provides personal services to vulnerable individuals and the employer reasonably believes that they cannot be effectively provided by a person while undergoing gender reassignment. The GOQs under ss 7A and 7B do not apply to persons whose gender reassignment is complete and who have obtained a gender recognition certificate under the Gender Recognition Act 2004. It is arguable that the width of these GOQs means that the SDA is not in compliance with the Equal Treatment Directive, in which case, as argued above, the Directive itself could be relied upon or a purposive approach could be adopted to the SDA. As a last resort, the HRA could be relied upon if the action was against a public authority, using ss 6, 7(1)(a) and relying on Art 8.[356]

Exclusions from the Race Relations Act

The RRA cannot affect discrimination which falls outside its scope. Previously it could not affect discrimination enshrined in other statutes, even those which predated it (s 41(1))[357] but this exception now only applies to the residual areas.[358] The RRA cannot affect discrimination occurring within the scope of a specific exception.[359] In respect of discrimination outside its scope this includes not only racist behaviour falling outside the contexts covered by the Act, but also such behaviour occurring within those contexts but unable to find a legal niche within them owing to the particular wording of the Act. For example, it was found in De Souza v AA[360] that racial insults, as such, do not amount to 'unfavourable treatment' within employment.

Alternatively, one of the exceptions may apply. Exceptions in respect of small premises or partnerships with less than six partners are provided by s 10 and s 32, but now only apply in the residual areas. Under s 75, restrictions on employment in Crown Service are permissible, although the government has accepted that this provision should be narrowed down.[361] Section 42 provides that nothing in the RRA 'shall render unlawful an act done for the purpose of safeguarding national security'. Prior to the passing of the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000, s 69(2)(b) provided for the use of ministerial certificates as conclusive evidence that acts or arrangements specified were done for that purpose. Section 7 of the 2000 Act amends s 42 to add the words 'if the doing of the act was justified for that purpose', and repeals s 69(2)(b).

356 See further on this point above, in relation to discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation; pp 1483–86.

357 The scope of s 41 was narrowed by the House of Lords in Hampson v DES [1990] 2 All ER 513 to cover only acts done in necessary performance of an express statutory obligation, not acts done in the exercise of a discretion conferred by the statute.

358 Section 41(1A).

359 For discussion, see McColgan, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 7, pp 433–45.

360 [1986] ICR 514; for comment, see Carty (1986) 49 MLR 653; see also Khan v GMC (1993) The Times, 29 March.

361 Government Response to the CRE's Reform of the RRA 1976 (1998); available at http://195.44.11.137/coi/coipress.nsf.

The Act employs the concept of a genuine occupational qualification (GOQ) under s 5, but the GOQs are of much narrower scope than those arising under the 1975 Act. They come down to two. First, that for reasons of authenticity, a person of a particular racial group must be employed. This might cover plays and restaurants or clubs with a particular national theme. Second, the services being provided are aimed at persons of a specific racial group and can most effectively be provided by persons of that same racial group. In Lambeth BC v CRE[362] it was determined that this requirement would be interpreted restrictively: a managerial position which involved little contact with the public would not fulfil it. A new s 4A RRA was included in 2003 in response to the Race Directive, providing that a difference of treatment related to racial or ethnic origin is not discrimination where by reason of the particular occupational activities carried out, or the context in which they are carried out, such a characteristic constitutes a genuine and determining occupational requirement, provided that the objective is legitimate and the requirement is proportionate. Section 4A operates in the areas of EU competence, so it appears that s 5 operates in the residual areas.

Exceptions to the Sexual Orientation Regulations

The regulations are qualified since being of a particular sexual orientation can be 'a genuine and determining occupational requirement', although it must also be 'proportionate to apply that requirement in the particular case'.[363] There is a general exception in reg 7(2):

> This paragraph applies where, having regard to the nature of the employment or the context in which it is carried out –
>
> (a) being of a particular sexual orientation is a genuine and determining occupational requirement;
> (b) it is proportionate to apply that requirement in the particular case; and
> (c) either –
>   (i) the person to whom that requirement is applied does not meet it, or >   (ii) the employer is not satisfied, and in all the circumstances it is reasonable for him not to be satisfied, that that person meets it, and this paragraph applies whether or not the employment is for purposes of an organised religion.

The organised religion exception applies under reg 7(3):

> This paragraph applies where –
>
> (a) the employment is for purposes of an organised religion;

362 [1990] IRLR 231, CA.

363 Section 7(1) provides: 'In relation to discrimination falling within regulation 3 (discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation) (a) regulation 6(1)(a) or (c) does not apply to any employment; (b) regulation 6(2)(b) or (c) does not apply to promotion or transfer to, or training for, any employment; and (c) regulation 6(2)(d) does not apply to dismissal from any employment, where paragraph (2) or (3) applies.'

(b) the employer applies a requirement related to sexual orientation –
  (i) so as to comply with the doctrines of the religion, or
  (ii) because of the nature of the employment and the context in which it is carried out, so as to avoid conflicting with the strongly held religious convictions of a significant number of the religion's followers; and
(c) either –
  (i) the person to whom that requirement is applied does not meet it, or
  (ii) the employer is not satisfied, and in all the circumstances it is reasonable for him not to be satisfied, that that person meets it.

The wording of reg 7(3)(c)(ii) means that discrimination can occur, not only on the basis of the applicant's sexual orientation, but on the basis of his or her reasonably perceived orientation. It was found in AMICUS v Secretary of State for Trade and Industry[364] that this phrase is compatible with the Framework Directive.

Religious organisations, such as Church of England or Catholic schools, might seek to rely on reg 7(3), which, if broadly interpreted, could allow many such organisations to discriminate openly on this ground. Such organisations can discriminate if, inter alia, the employer is on reasonable grounds not satisfied that the applicant meets a requirement to be of a particular sexual orientation. This creates, on its face, a number of possible avenues to discrimination; under one of them it means that if the employer considers on reasonable grounds that an applicant is gay, although he or she has not stated that this is the case, and that employing a gay person will conflict with religious convictions of a number of followers of the religion, the employer can openly discriminate. It is not necessary from the wording of the regulation for the requirements of proportionality to be satisfied.

However, in applying this exception an interpretation of it could arguably be adopted under s 3(1) HRA which affords it a narrow scope. The key phrase 'for purposes of an organised religion' could be afforded a narrow interpretation so that the exception only covered employment, such as the employment of priests, which is clearly for the purposes of organised religion. It could be argued that, for example, the employment of a gay teacher in a Catholic school was not linked strongly to 'that purpose'. Or it could be argued that the sexual orientation of a teacher was irrelevant to teaching or leading children in prayer in assemblies, and that nothing in the 'doctrines of the religion' demanded a particular sexual orientation when conducting assemblies or teaching, even if the religion could be viewed as condemning sexual relations between same-sex couples.

It is notable that there is no requirement of proportionality in reg 7(3), although one is included in reg 7(2). It can be argued that one must be read into it in order to comply with the Directive which does not include the exception under reg 7(3) and only allows for a 'genuine occupational requirement' (GOR) defence if the requirements of proportionality are satisfied. As a further possible argument Art 8(2) imports a requirement of proportionality. Thus it may be argued that such a requirement should be read into reg 7(3) via Art 8 (probably read with Art 14) and s 3 HRA. The employment context is not one to which Art 8 is obviously applicable. But a Dudgeon and Smith and Grady argument could be employed in order to bring sexual orientation discrimination in this context within Art 8, read with Art 14. The argument would be that unless reg 7(3) is read generously, teachers and others working in or for religious organisations might be forced to hide their sexuality in order to avoid employment detriment. They could be faced with a choice of concealing their sexuality, even living a celibate life, or facing such detriment. The measures they might have to adopt could be viewed as a continuing invasion of their private lives.

364 [2004] EWHC 860.

The exceptions under reg 7(2) and (3) were challenged by a group of unions in AMICUS v Secretary of State for Trade and Industry,[365] arguing that due to the exceptions the new rules outlawing discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation were defective. The unions argued that various exemptions in the Employment Equality (Sexual Orientation) Regulations 2003 were incompatible with the obligations imposed on the UK by the EC Equal Treatment Framework Directive 2000, and conflicted with provisions of the European Convention on Human Rights. The High Court rejected the challenge but found that the scope of the 'organised religion' exception is very limited. It was also found that the GOR in reg 7(3) for 'organised religion' should be given a narrow interpretation. The judge considered that, for example, it was unlikely to apply to a teacher in a faith school. This narrow approach is likely to be persuasive for tribunals interpreting the application of the exemption. The High Court found that although reg 7(2) does not state explicitly that a GOR must pursue a 'legitimate objective' as required by the Directive, that concept is implicit and tribunals should interpret the regulation accordingly. The unions were given leave to appeal.

Regulation 24 provides an exception in respect of national security. In the public authority context this raises a number of possibilities. For example, a large number of posts in the Home Civil Service[366] are subject to positive vetting (PV). In 1982, the Security Commission recommended[367] that male homosexuality should be dealt with on a case-by-case basis in relation to PV clearance, but that it should be refused if the individual's practice of his homosexuality placed any doubt upon his discretion or reliability. PV clearance for the Diplomatic Service or armed forces was automatically refused. If security clearance for any governmental post was refused on the ground of sexual orientation, a challenge could be mounted relying on the regulations and arguing for a narrow interpretation of reg 24 in reliance on the Directive or on s 3 HRA. The question would be whether national security was genuinely at stake in such an instance

8 Positive action: sex, race, disability, sexual orientation

Theoretical basis[368]

A significant divergence within equality theory lies between belief in equality of outcome and belief in equal treatment. The two views diverge in the sense that achieving an 365 [2004] EWHC 860.

366 In 1982, PV covered 68,000 posts (Cmnd 8540, p 5).

367 Cmnd 8540, 1982.

368 For general discussion, see Edwards, J, Positive Discrimination: Social Justice, and Social Policy, 1987, Routledge; Sacks, V, 'Tackling discrimination positively in Britain', and Parekh, B, 'The case for positive discrimination', in Hepple and Szyszczak, op. cit., fn 1.

equal outcome may mean treating persons unequally for a time, as opposed to treating them equally even if that produces unequal results. Nevertheless, it may be argued that such divergence is to an extent more apparent than real, since the underlying aim of providing equal treatment may be to ensure, ultimately, an equal outcome. The conflict between ensuring equality of treatment and furthering equality of outcome by means of positive action is essentially founded on the perception that such action means treating two likes unalike and thereby creating a denial of formal equality. In espousing a very significant principle, equal treatment of two likes or formal equality has a clear, simple and, to an extent, warranted appeal. But positive action cannot be accommodated within a formal equality model, since such a model only permits unlike (and, presumptively, unfavourable) treatment if difference is identified. In terms of pure theory, positive action has no place within a formal equality model, either as an aspect of the equality principle or as an exception to it. In practice, an unsatisfactory compromise may be reached whereby positive action is viewed as an exception to the equality principle. Once that principle has been abandoned, unequal treatment may be meted out.

But, apart from the conceptual incoherence of this position, it is suggested that it is unsatisfactory in that it does not readily provide a means of recognising the convergence between equality of outcome and of treatment which is not apparent within the other exceptions to the equality principle. However, it is possible to escape from the constraints of formal equality by adopting a substantive as opposed to a formal equality model. Substantive equality recognises that men and women, whites and blacks, straights and gays may be differently situated, but seeks to prevent both perpetuation of such difference and disadvantage flowing from it. In particular, substantive equality recognises that merely treating like as like, while ignoring the context within which such treatment is meted out, fails to understand the disadvantages certain groups may be under because of past discrimination, social attitudes and unequal distribution of social benefits. One factor both springing from and underpinning such a situation appears to be a lack of women or blacks in more advantageous and influential employment. Thus, use of positive action may be accommodated within a substantive equality model, since an outcome which both countered prior disadvantage and tended to change the context within which women or members of ethnic minorities take part in employment would be in accordance with such a model.

Forms of positive action and their recognition in national law

Four types of positive action may be identified:[369]

(1) reverse discrimination, which in its most absolute form would mean favourable treatment of a woman or a member of an ethnic minority on the ground of gender or race despite inferior qualification for a job or an inferior claim (in terms of criteria other than race or gender) to a facility such as housing;
(2) affirmative action – adopting a presumption in favour of appointing a candidate from the under-represented group if his or her qualifications are equal to those of a person from the non-disadvantaged group; once threshold equality is established, 369 For discussion of forms of positive action, see McCrudden (1986) 15 ILJ 219.

the member of the under-represented group is appointed; often takes the form of a quota system which is abandoned when proportionate representation is reached;
(3) preferential training opportunities – action to promote opportunities for members of the disadvantaged group in order to ensure that its members are in a strong position to compete for employment;
(4) inclusionary employment policies: adoption of equal opportunities policies particularly affecting advertising and recruiting – outreach programmes; regular reviews of employment policies.

All the provisions against discrimination on the protected grounds are based on the formal equality model. The dominance of this model in UK anti-discrimination law, in the established and the most recently introduced provisions, means that the first two forms of positive action are unlawful since they amount to direct discrimination. The symmetrical approach favoured in all the legislation, apart from the DDA, whereby straights and gays, men and women, blacks and whites can equally take advantage of the relevant legislation, means that it is not possible to favour the 'victim' group at which the relevant legislation was in reality aimed.

At present, there is virtually no scope for positive action in the first two forms under the SDA, RRA or Sexual Orientation Regulations, while scope for the third and fourth forms is extremely limited. Apart from one exception, the first two forms of positive action, above, are unlawful under the wording of s 1(1) of both statutes. Even guidance reminding selectors of equal opportunities policies but requiring them to select candidates on merit appears to be outlawed. In ACAS v Taylor[370] a majority of females were selected for interview for senior ACAS posts. Guidance had been given to the effect that more needed to be done to 'ensure the reality of the claim that ACAS is an equal opportunities employer . . . All staff should be considered on their merits . . .'. Mr Taylor, one of the candidates, was found to have suffered direct discrimination on the basis that the guidance could have influenced selectors in favour of positive action. The limits of the RRA were illustrated in Lambeth LBC v CRE[371] in which it was found that positive action to benefit racial groups was forbidden by the RRA.[372]

The limitations of the SDA in this respect due to its adherence to the formal equality model were tellingly illustrated in one context – the crucial one of Parliamentary representation. The current Labour Government wanted to create all-women short-lists in order to address the gross under-representation of women in Parliament; it wanted to go further than merely setting non-statutory, voluntary goals. When it did so the policy was challenged successfully by two male candidates as direct discrimination under the SDA in Jepson and Dyas-Elliott v Labour Party.[373] It was found that the use of all-women short-lists created unlawful discrimination against men. The government had to bring forward legislation in order to reverse this decision – the Sex Discrimination (Election Candidates) Act 2001. The legislation amended the SDA by including s 42A to allow for all-women short lists in order to increase the representation of women in 370 EAT/788/97.

371 [1990] ICR 768.
372 See also Riyat v London Borough of Brent (1983) (cited in IDS Employment Law Handbook 28, 1984, p 57); it was held that discrimination in favour of black job applicants was unlawful.
373 [1996] IRLR 116.

Parliament to a ratio of 50:50 women MPs. So a small exception to the formal equality model has been created under the SDA – but only in the context of elections. This was especially necessary due to past historical discrimination against women in terms of being able to stand for Parliament which means that the preponderance of men in Parliament – which creates a male-dominated environment – is based not on merit but on that historical legacy. The exception to the SDA would allow for the creation of all-women short-lists by the other two main parties. The Conservative Party, although very concerned at the gross under-representation of women in its group of MPs, has made no proposal likely to have any significant impact in changing the representation, while the Liberal Democrats voted against introducing all-women short-lists in their Autumn 2001 conference. They are therefore likely to remain in the same position as the Conservative Party in this respect.

The EOC argued in 2006 that some employers want to take positive action but find themselves prevented by the law from doing so. It considered that the Discrimination Law Review[374] should look at the case for extending the current positive action provisions so that 'employers are empowered, and in certain circumstances, might even be required, to take positive action to redress disadvantages faced by certain groups where it would be proportionate to do so'. In certain sectors there is 'a real desire to redress gender imbalance in the workforce, such as in the uniformed services, and there is concern that the SDA does not allow them to go far enough in their efforts to recruit and retain under-represented groups'.[375] The EOC considers that the positive action provisions in the SDA are little known and little understood. Since the provisions are narrowly drawn and complex they tend to act as a disincentive to employers since they fear that they may incur liability in putting them into practice.

The DDA does not take a symmetrical approach – those without disabilities cannot invoke it. So positive action is possible under the DDA and the duty of reasonable adjustment discussed above can be viewed as a form of positive action. However, s 7 Local Government Act requires that candidates be appointed on merit, so posts it covers cannot be offered only to disabled people on a quota basis.

Training and outreach policies

Acts done to meet the special needs of certain racial groups (such as by the provision of English language classes) in regard to education, welfare and training are permissible under the RRA, but such provision can only be made available where there are no, or very few, members of the group in question doing that work in the UK at the time.[376] Also, under s 37 of the RRA, employers can encourage applications from members of particular racial groups which are under-represented in the workforce. Similarly, s 48 SDA covers giving training to existing workers in order to take up particular work where they are under-represented in those jobs. Section 47(3) of the SDA permits the restriction of access to training facilities to those 'in special need of training by reason of the period for which they have been discharging domestic 374 The consultation process behind the Single Equality Act.

375 EOC (2006) op. cit., fn 1, paras 42, 43.
376 RRA 1976, ss 35–38.

or family responsibilities'. It should be noted that employers and others are under no duty to make such provision.

Thus, employers can pursue equal opportunities policies such as stating in job advertisements that applications from certain groups will be welcomed, but in general cannot appoint an equally well-qualified member of an ethnic minority or woman on a quota basis in preference to a white male in order to address under-representation of black people or women caused by past discrimination. Nor can they import a general presumption, subject to exceptions, that a woman or member of an ethnic minority with equal qualifications to those of other candidates should be appointed.

The position is the same under the Sexual Orientation Regulations which provide in reg 26(1):

> Nothing in Part II or III shall render unlawful any act done in or in connection with –
>
> (a) affording persons of a particular sexual orientation access to facilities for training which would help fit them for particular work; or
> (b) encouraging persons of a particular sexual orientation to take advantage of opportunities for doing particular work, where it reasonably appears to the person doing the act that it prevents or compensates for disadvantages linked to sexual orientation suffered by persons of that sexual orientation doing that work or likely to take up that work.

A particular type of positive action known as 'contract compliance', which fell within the third and fourth forms of action identified above and had the potential to produce quite far reaching beneficial effects, was outlawed by the then Conservative Government.[377] Under this method, organs of the state such as local authorities produced a 'check list' of equal opportunities policies and asked the companies with which it was thinking of dealing to show evidence of compliance with such policies. If the company could not show in response that certain procedures were in place intended to combat racism or sexism, it lost business.[378]

Duties of Public Bodies – inclusionary employment policies and promotion of equality

The government has not committed itself to the establishment of quotas on the lines of that considered in Marschall, below; it has instead preferred an approach relying on 'goals and timetables'. In July 1998, a target of a 50:50 male/female appointment ratio for men and women in public life, based on merit, was established.[379] In its White Paper Modernising Government it committed itself to a pro rata representation of ethnic minority groups in public appointments and to targets of 35% women in the 377 Under the Local Government Act 1988, s 17; for criticism, see Townshend-Smith, R, Sex Discrimination in Employment, 1989, pp 237–38.

378 The 1988 Act, s 18. Parliament, however, left intact a limited power to vet potential contractors as regards their race relations record.

379 Press release of a speech by Joan Ruddock, Minister for Women, at a TUC Conference, 9 July 1999 – www.dss.gov.uk/hq/press/1998/july98/186.htm.

top 3,000 Civil Service posts and 25% in the top 600. It also committed itself to a target of 3.2% of ethnic minority post-holders in the top 3,000 posts and stated that an equivalent target would be set for disabled persons. In 2005 it launched Improving Opportunity, Strengthening Society (IOSS), the government's strategy to increase racial equality and community cohesion.[380]

The RRA, after amendment by the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000 (which inserted s 71 into the 1976 Act), places a general duty on public authorities to 'eliminate unlawful racial discrimination' and to 'promote equality of opportunity and good relations between persons of different racial groups',[381] also referred to as the race equality duty. The aim was to help them to provide fair and accessible services, and to improve equal opportunities in employment. The race equality duty requires public authorities to pay 'due regard' to the need to eliminate unlawful racial discrimination and to promote equality of opportunity and good race relations. A similar duty is being introduced in 2007 relating to gender[382] and was introduced for disability in 2006.[383] As part of the race equality duty, most public authorities have to carry out race equality impact assessments (REIAs), to consider the likely effects a policy or legislative proposal might have on people from different racial groups and to aid in helping public authorities to develop sound policies promoting racial equality. In 2005 the CRE monitored the performance of Whitehall departments in carrying out REIAs on new policies, and requested copies of their REIAs for specific policies. As a result of intervention by the CRE, the Department of Health announced in 2005 that it was delaying the passage of the Mental Health Bill, partly so that a full REIA could be carried out.

This general duty under the RRA is supported by specific duties set out in subordinate legislation and those specific duties are enforceable by the CRE. The specific duties allow for positive action of types (3) and (4), indicated above. Guidance is offered by Codes of Practice promulgated by the CRE under s 71C. Thus some authorities are also bound by specific duties; for example, they must publish a race equality scheme (or race equality policy, in the case of schools and further and higher education institutions), listing the functions they have identified as being relevant to race equality, and describing their arrangements for meeting the duty. The CRE can seek to enforce the specific duties by issuing a compliance notice under s 71D. It can require the person in question to comply with the specific duty and can also require the person to furnish 380 Home Office, 2005. See also: Race Equality in Public Services; it brings together race equality performance data for key public service areas and provides the statistical background to the IOSS strategy, and covers Public Service Agreement targets to tackle inequalities in public services; Summary of Responses to Strength in Diversity: towards a community cohesion and race equality strategy, setting out responses to the consultation in 2004; see also Home Office documents, including: Overarching Home Office Race Equality Scheme and The Core (non-IND) Home Office Associate Race Equality Scheme, setting out how the Home Office will meet the duties set out in the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000 and associated secondary legislation; Race Equality – the Home Secretary's Employment Targets, detailing progress against the targets set in 1999 to measure the recruitment, retention and career progression of minority ethnic staff in the Department and its agencies; The Home Office Diversity & Equal Opportunities Report 2003/2004, the findings from a range of diversity monitoring processes to provide a comprehensive picture of the diversity of Home Office staff. See also CRE Annual Report for 2005 (published 2006).

381 For discussion see O'Cinneide, C [2001] PL 220.

382 SI 2006/1082, Art 4.

383 SI 2005/1676; 2005/2774, Arts 3 and 4.

the CRE with information in order to verify that the duty has been complied with. A court order can be obtained under s 71E to force the public authority to furnish the information and to comply with any requirement of the notice. The CRE has developed compliance procedures; it issues a warning letter to authorities indicating how their race equality scheme, policy, and/or employment arrangements may be non-compliant, and gives them the opportunity to rectify any deficiencies. If it receives a satisfactory response, no further action is taken. If not, a compliance notice may be served on the authority. The CRE considers that this process works well.[384]

This means that around 43,000 public authorities have a statutory duty to promote race equality. In 2005, in line with its commitments under IOSS the CRE launched Promoting Good Race Relations: A guide for public authorities in order to aid authorities in meeting this duty. Inspection, audit and guidance Inspectorates, such as the Audit Commission and the Office for Standards in Education (Ofsted), are not only bound by the race equality duty, but are also responsible for making sure that other public authorities are meeting it.[385] The CRE works closely with inspectorates, seeking to encourage them to include racial equality as part of their standards and inspection processes, to carry out reviews of racial equality, to develop comprehensive race equality schemes, and to share their information with the CRE. In 2005 public authorities in England and Wales listed under Schedule 1A of the Act had to review their list of functions, policies and proposed policies in line with the government's commitments under Improving Opportunity, Strengthening Society (IOSS), the government's strategy to increase racial equality and community cohesion.[386] The CRE works closely with public sector inspectorates and service providers to help them meet the race equality duty. During 2005, according to the 2005 CRE Report, all the key inspectorates revised or developed their methodologies, indicators or guidance.

Apart from the possibility of judicial review, the failure to comply with the s 71 duty may have legal implications if proceedings are brought for discrimination by individuals. In Elias v Secretary of State for Defence[387] it was found that a compensation scheme had resulted in indirect discrimination on grounds of national origins. The Court also found that the MoD had not carried out a race equality impact assessment. There had been no careful attempt to assess whether the scheme raised issues relevant to racial equality, although the possibility was raised; nor was any attempt made to assess the extent of any adverse impact, or to find ways of eliminating or minimising such impact. The MoD accepted the need to review the scheme. Both sides decided to appeal on the indirect discrimination element of the judgment, so the scope of any necessary review will not be clear until all legal proceedings have been concluded.

384 It notes in its 2005 Annual Report, Part 4: 'In 2005, we dealt with 13 cases under section 71D of the Race Relations Act. We sent formal warning letters to all 13 authorities and served compliance notices on two of them, both schools, when they failed to provide a satisfactory response within the required timescale. In the first case, the school produced a revised, compliant policy; the second case remained ongoing at the end of 2005. Of the remaining 11 cases, one authority responded satisfactorily and 10 cases were ongoing. In addition, as a precursor to the use of our compliance procedures, we issued 33 letters to Whitehall departments and inspectorates regarding their performance in respect of the race equality duty.'

385 CRE Annual Report for 2005 (published 2006).

386 CRE Annual Report for 2005 (published 2006).

387 2005, unreported, noted by CRE, ibid.

As indicated above, the Gender Equality Duty will also be imposed on public authorities from April 2007 onwards. It will apply to all public authorities and some public service providers from the private and voluntary sectors. It is probably the most significant change in sex equality legislation for 30 years. When it comes into force in April 2007, public authorities will have to take action to eliminate sex discrimination and harassment and to promote equality for women and men. Instead of depending on individuals making complaints about sex discrimination, the duty gives public authorities legal responsibility for demonstrating that they treat women and men fairly in policy-making, services and employment. The Equal Opportunities Commission and, in future, the Commission for Equality and Human Rights will be able to enforce the duty in the courts as the CRE does in respect of the race equality duty.

Affirmative action favouring women under EU law

The discussion below considers the position of affirmative action under the Equal Treatment Directive, concentrating on the irony of viewing such action as a derogation from the equality principle, and therefore in the same position as action taken to 'protect' women in employment – action which frequently in practice works to their detriment. Given the recent increase in the use of positive action within some member states of the Community and the acceptance of the need for such action by the European Council and Parliament (see Council Recommendation 84/635 EEC, below, and para 26 of the Advocate General's Opinion in Kalanke below) and in much of the relevant literature[388] the decision in Case 450/93 Kalanke v Freie Hansestadt Bremen[389] was highly significant in terms of its ability to affect an emerging tendency.

Within the Equal Treatment Directive positive action is viewed, under Art 2(4), as a derogation from the equal treatment principle which must, it seems, be looked at in the same light as the other derogations from that principle under Art 2(2) and (3). The exception under Art 2(2) is applicable to occupations in which the sex of the worker is a determining factor; Art 2(3) covers the provision of special protective measures for women, particularly those relating to pregnancy and maternity. The conceptual similarity between the derogations was confirmed and made explicit by the Advocate General and, to a lesser extent, by the Court of Justice in Kalanke; the decisions in Case 318/86 Commission v France[390] and Case 222/84 Johnston v Chief Constable of the RUC[391] on Art 2(3) and (4) are therefore relevant for comparative purposes.

The decision in Case 318/86 Commission v France concerned in part a quota system used to allot only 10–30% of posts to women in the French national police and prison service, regardless of their performance in the recruitment competition. The system was therefore intended to ensure that men overwhelmingly outnumbered women in these services. The French Government sought to justify this policy within Art 2(2) on the ground that appointing an 'excessive proportion of women' would 'seriously damage the credibility' of the police corps since it would have difficulty in maintaining public order. The Court of Justice found that certain activities within the police service could 388 See, e.g., Morris G and Deakin, S, Labour Law, 1995, Chapter 6, p 589.

389 [1995] IRLR 660. For discussion see Shiek, D (1996) 25 ILJ 239.
390 [1989] 3 CMLR 663; [1988] ECR 3559.
391 [1986] ECR 1651.

properly be performed by men only, but that this could not provide justification for a system of recruitment which left it unclear whether the quotas operating for each sex actually corresponded to the specific activities for which the sex of the person in question constituted a determining factor. The lack of transparency – the fact that no objective criteria determining the quotas laid down were available – made it impossible to verify such correspondence. This part of the Court's decision, therefore, left open the possibility of allocating men and women to different specific activities and thereby excluding women from certain areas of employment on grounds which, it would appear, were in themselves non-transparent, since the assumption that women police officers would be unable to carry out effectively activities intended to maintain public order was in itself untested. In effect, one non-transparent factor – the system of recruitment – cloaked another; the first such factor was rejected, but the second accepted. The other part of the decision concerned direct discrimination within the system of promotion to the post of head warder within the French prison corps. The Court found that 'having regard to the need to provide opportunities for promotion within the corps of warders' (p 3580, para 17) justification for the discrimination could be found. This finding was made despite acceptance by the Court that sex was not a determining factor for the appointment of governors owing to the administrative nature of the job.

A similar position was taken in Case 222/84 Johnston v Chief Constable of the RUC in which the Court found that Art 2(2) might in principle allow a wide derogation from the principle of equal treatment since 'in a situation characterised by serious internal disturbances the carrying of firearms by policewomen [in the Royal Ulster Constabulary (RUC)] might create additional risks of their being assassinated and might therefore be contrary to the requirements of public safety' (para 16). Thus, the sex of the worker could be a 'determining factor' in making appointments to posts which necessitated carrying arms. However, the national court might only rely on this derogation if it ensured compliance with the proportionality rule. It was for the national court to determine whether proportionality had been observed and therefore the Court did not give an opinion on the matter (para 9). In contrast to this stance, the Court took a narrow view of Art 2(3), finding that it would not allow a reduction of the rights of women on the basis of a need for protection 'whose origin is socio-cultural or even political' (p 1659, para 8). It thereby created an appearance of accepting substantive equality arguments, but abandoned them in favour of focusing on special female vulnerability in relation to Art 2(2), readily accepting the assumption that women were more at risk than men and that women police officers could therefore be confined to other duties of a narrower, family-oriented nature. In a manner recalling the position taken in Commission v France, the Court did not appear to recognise that there was a contradiction in rejecting a potential basis for derogation on the ground that it was founded on socio-cultural considerations, but opening the way to acceptance of another which appeared to be equally open to such criticism.

The decision in Kalanke v Freie Hansestadt Bremen concerned a quota system which was in a sense the converse of that in question in Commission v France in that it ensured positive action in favour of women. In the German public services, an appointing procedure had been adopted whereby women with the same qualifications as men had to be given automatic priority in sectors in which they were under-represented. In evaluating qualifications family, work, social commitment or unpaid activity could be taken into account if relevant to the performance of the duties in question.

Under-representation was deemed to exist when women did not make up at least half the staff in the individual pay brackets in the relevant personnel group or in the function levels provided for in the organisation chart. Mr Kalanke was not approved for promotion under this procedure and sought a ruling from the Bundesarbeitsgericht that the quota system was incompatible with the German basic law and the German civil code. The Bundesarbeitsgericht considered that no such incompatibility arose since the system only favoured women where candidates of both sexes were equally qualified and, further, that the quota system was interpreted in accordance with German basic law which meant that although in principle priority in promotions should be given to women, exceptions must be made in appropriate cases. However, since the national court was uncertain whether the system was in accord with the Equal Treatment Directive, it referred to the European Court of Justice questions relating to the scope of the derogations permitted to the principle of equal treatment under the Directive.

The Court found that the quota system created direct discrimination within Art 2(1) but that it might be permissible under Art 2(4), basing this finding on the ruling from Commission v France cited by the Advocate General (para 18). It approved the finding of the Council in the third recital in the preamble to Recommendation 84/635/ EEC of 13 December 1984 in relation to positive action (OJ 1984 L331, p 34) that 'existing legal provisions on equal treatment . . . are inadequate for the elimination of all existing inequalities unless parallel action is taken by government . . . and other bodies . . . to counteract the prejudicial effects on women in employment which arise from social attitudes, behaviour and structures' (para 20). It then went on to find, citing Johnston, that derogations from the equality principle must be narrowly construed and that national rules which guarantee women 'unconditional priority' go beyond promoting equal opportunities and overstep the limits of the exception in Art 2(4). Although the Court found that Art 2(4) permits 'national measures relating to access to employment, including promotion, which give a specific advantage to women with a view to improving their ability to compete on the labour market' (para 19), it did not find that the promotion scheme at issue fell within the exception. This conclusion was apparently founded on the distinction it drew between equality of opportunity and equality of outcome in finding that the quota system 'substitutes for equality of opportunity the result which is only to be arrived at by providing such equality of opportunity'. It therefore found that national rules of the type in question are precluded by Art 2(1) and (4).

As this ruling and the Opinion of the Advocate General make clear, the Equal Treatment Directive encapsulates a view of equality under Art 2(1) which impliedly finds inequality of outcome acceptable so long as equal treatment is accorded. Positive action aimed at reducing such inequality must be seen as an exception to the equal treatment principle: the relationship between the two can be viewed only in negative terms under Art 2(4). The Directive therefore creates a conceptual separation between positive action and the equality principle which necessitates characterising such action as direct discrimination that may be susceptible to justification only within the specified exception.[392] There is therefore, it seems, no room for an argument from principle in favour of equality of outcome as an aspect of the equality principle encapsulated under the Directive. (It may be noted that this stance is out of accord with the UN Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women 1979 Art 4(1), which provides that 'the adoption of temporary special measures aimed at accelerating de facto equality between men and women shall not be considered discrimination'.)

392 See Ellis, E, 'The definition of discrimination in European Community sex equality law' (1994) 19 EL Rev 563–80, pp 567–68; Hepple, B, 'Can direct discrimination be justified?' (1994) 55 EOR 48.

As the Advocate General observed, the stance of the Directive under Art 2(1) reflects a formal equality position. A formal equality model only permits unlike (and, presumptively, unfavourable) treatment if difference is identified. Nevertheless, as the Advocate General pointed out, positive action may be viewed as furthering substantive as opposed to formal equality. However, the Advocate General appeared to view substantive equality measures as confined to those which would allow individual women to compete with men on a formal equality basis. He did not appear to recognise that furtherance of substantive equality demands that the context within which such competition takes place must change. As MacKinnon has argued,[393] substantive equality recognises that the context within which women take part in employment may place them under a disadvantage owing to past discrimination, social attitudes and a gendered social situation. Positive action may be viewed not as compensating women for historical disadvantage, but as an effective means of allowing its effects to be more rapidly overcome in future. In finding that the quota system could not fall within Art 2(4), the Court and the Advocate General failed to give weight to the substantive equality argument that the social context within which women undertake employment, which is influenced by the imbalance between women and men in senior or more influential posts, tends to perpetuate inequality. Although the Court found that certain measures giving a specific advantage to women would be permissible within Art 2(4), it considered that measures used to address such an imbalance could not be seen as a means of creating a reduction in the 'actual instances of inequality which may exist in the reality of social life'. The position adopted appeared to be contradictory since it accepted that ensuring equality of 'starting points' would not lead to achieving substantive equality and yet viewed substantive equality as the ultimate objective of providing equal opportunities (para 14).

The Opinion of the Advocate General and the judgment of the Court also reveal, it is suggested, a contradiction in the application of the proportionality principle. The Court, unlike the Advocate General, did not expressly apply that principle in finding that the limits of Art 2(4) had been overstepped. However, that finding in itself involved, it is suggested, application of the proportionality principle: the quota system appeared to fall within the Court's interpretation of Art 2(4) but created, in the view of the Court, too great an offence to the equality principle owing to its unconditional nature. In Johnston, in contrast, the Court found that the national court might only rely on the derogation under Art 2(2) if it ensured compliance with the proportionality rule, but that ensuring such compliance was a matter for the national court to decide and therefore the Court did not give an opinion on the matter (para 9). However, it also found that in determining the scope of the derogation, proportionality must be observed (para 38), implying that making such a determination would not be a matter solely within the jurisdiction of the national court. Comparing the findings within these two lines of case law, it is suggested that the point at which the Court of Justice accepts that the principle of proportionality allows a derogation to apply, thereby leaving the determination as to compliance with proportionality in the particular instance to the national court, is unclear; the two exercises of jurisdiction are in danger of being unclearly demarcated, laying the Court open to the charge that the principle is being used to excuse either intervention or failure to intervene in national policies in a non-transparent and subjective fashion.

393 MacKinnon, C, Towards a Feminist Theory of the State, 1989, Harvard University Press; 'Reflections on sex equality under law' (1991) 100 Yale LJ 1281.

If the findings in Kalanke and Johnston are inconsistent as regards the demarcation between the point at which proportionality becomes a matter for the national court and the point at which it remains a matter for the Court of Justice, it is suggested that the use made of the proportionality principle in Kalanke to find that the derogation under Art 2(4) did not apply is also incompatible with the view taken in Johnston that proportionality would be sufficiently adhered to in allowing the policy in question to fall within the Art 2(2) derogation. This may also be said, it is suggested, of the ruling in Commission v France in so far as aspects of the systems at issue in that case were found to fall within Art 2(2). It is contended that it would have been open to the Court in Kalanke, basing itself on the previous line of case law, to find that proportionality would be sufficiently observed in bringing the quota system within the scope of the derogation and, further, that the case for so doing was stronger than in either of the other two instances. This is contended taking into account the extent to which the policies at issue in Johnston and Commission v France created inequality of treatment, and the extent to which they were found to be subject to justification

The German quota system was dependent on equality of qualifications and, according to the national court, would not be rigidly adhered to. In contrast, the policy considered in Johnston operated on the same basis as reverse discrimination since it was unable to take account of the fact that the qualifications of women applicants might be superior to those of male applicants. That policy created a greater affront to the equality principle than the German system in that it aimed at creating a complete imbalance between men and women in the body of police in question, thereby ensuring inequality of treatment and of outcome, whereas under the German system it seemed probable that ensuring equality of outcome would have led eventually to equality of treatment, once the imbalance in certain sectors of the German Civil Service had been corrected. Moreover, in contrast to the position in Johnston and in relation to the post of governor under the French system, the German quota rules did not preclude applications from men for the posts in question.

The justification underpinning the French public service quota system arose from the view that disorder would be less readily contained if an imbalance between men and women in the police service was not maintained, basing this view on an untested assumption regarding the possibility that the presence of a certain number of female police officers might detrimentally affect the power of the police to control disorder. This assumption was accepted by the Commission (p 3581, para 23) and the Court in relation to specific activities, but it is suggested that the means adopted were not clearly an appropriate means of achieving the end in question or necessary to that end (the test for proportionality from Johnston, para 38). The same criticism may be levelled, it is submitted, at the justification advanced to defend the UK policy for the RUC, namely that reserving posts exclusively for men would ensure that persons in those posts would be subject to a lesser risk of assassination. In contrast, it is suggested that adoption of positive action in Kalanke would have been likely to contribute to achieving the desired outcome: as the Advocate General accepted, the imposition of quotas 'is an instrument which is certainly suitable for bringing about a quantitative increase in female employment' (para 9).

It is further suggested that if one applies the 'very logic underlying the derogations', which according to the Advocate General is aimed at 'ensuring the efficacy of the principle of equal treatment' (para 17) to the German quota system, it may be found to cause less affront to that principle than the systems at issue in the other two rulings. As argued above, the German system was in accordance with substantive equality in that it sought to achieve an outcome which would counter past disadvantage and it recognised the real and gendered situation in which women take part in employment. In contrast, it is suggested that in both Johnston and Commission v France the Court allowed the national authorities some discretion as to permitted exceptions from the equality principle on grounds which failed to further either formal or substantive equality. Thus, acceptance of positive action could have been seen merely as a means of moving more speedily towards a desired outcome and therefore, in contrast to the position taken in both the previous decisions, the offence to the equality principle could have been viewed as less significant. By this means, the Court could have recognised the distinction between the exception under Art 2(4) and the other two exceptions. Once the offence to the equality principle created by the German quota system is balanced, as indicated here, against the underlying justifications for it, it is suggested that scope can be created for finding that Art 2(4) was applicable.

However, in Case C-409/95 Marschall v Land Nordrhein-Westfalen[394] the Court found that a quota system allowing affirmative action was lawful on the basis that it was conditional (para 33 of the judgment). The Court said (para 29) 'even where male and female candidates are equally qualified males tend to be promoted . . . particularly because of prejudices and stereotypes concerning the role and capacities of women in working life . . .'. So a rule can fall within Art 2(4) if it counteracts the prejudicial effect on women of those prejudices (para 31). But since it is a derogation, it must be strictly construed, and so it must contain a proviso (as did the scheme at issue) allowing men to be promoted or employed if special circumstances apply (paras 32 and 33). In taking this stance, the Court appears to have adopted the course the Court left open to it (as argued above) in Kalanke. Similarly, in Badek and Others v Landesanwalt bein Staatgerichtshof des Landes Hessen[395] the Court found that the ETD does not preclude a rule applying in public service sectors where women are under-represented which gives priority to women where male and female candidates are equally qualified, so long as an objective assessment of the candidates is carried out which takes account of their specific personal situations. A scheme established in Sweden in response to under-representation of women in the Swedish University sector at Professorial level breached this principle since it did not contain a saving clause and did open the possibility of using reverse discrimination. The ECJ found that it breached the Directive in Abrahamsson and Anderson v Fogelqvist.[396]

394 [1995] IRLR 39, Judgment of 11 November 1997.
395 Case C-158/97 [2000] All ER (EC) 289.
396 Case C-407/98 [2000] IRLR 732.

Article 141 of the Treaty, as amended by the Amsterdam Treaty, replaced Art 119, which provided for equal pay for work of equal value. Article 141 makes the same provision, but para 3 empowers the Council to adopt measures to ensure the application of the principle of equal opportunities and equal treatment including (emphasis added) the equal pay principle. Thus, measures may be adopted going beyond the provision of equal pay. Paragraph 4 provides:

> . . . the principle of equal treatment shall not prevent any member state from maintaining or adopting measures providing for specific advantages in order to make it easier for the under-represented sex to pursue a vocational activity or to prevent or compensate for disadvantages in their professional careers.

This wording differs from that used in Art 2(4) of the Equal Treatment Directive since, inter alia, the word 'opportunities' which was central to the findings in Kalanke is not used: it speaks instead of making it easier for the under-represented sex to pursue a 'vocational activity' or preventing or compensating for disadvantages in professional careers. But the term 'specific advantages' is reminiscent of the terms used by the Advocates General in Kalanke and Marschall, and may imply that covert disadvantages are outside the scope of the provisions. Indeed, the paragraph could be interpreted simply as seeking to ensure equality of starting points in the manner of para 2(4) as interpreted in these two instances. But it seems to have been adopted in response to Kalanke, and wording which is deliberately different from that used in Art 2(4) has been used. Thus, Art 141 appears to be in accordance with the findings of the Court in Marschall and may even go beyond them. The Framework Directive and Race Directive restate this formula.

Thus, forms of positive action, in the sense in which that term is usually understood, are lawful in the Community so long as provisos apply. Positive action in the form of training opportunities may also be lawful within Art 2(4), but since, in referring to the areas covered in Art 1(1), Art 2(4) covers training in apparent contradistinction to access to employment and promotion, it would appear that measures going beyond allowing special training opportunities should be covered. The Advocate General mentioned positive action in the form of the development of child care structures, but this begs the question why such measures should be viewed as positive action, as opposed to being offered to all carers of children, men and women. Offering such measures only to women reinforces the perception not only that they are more expensive employees, but also that they should shoulder the main burden of responsibility in caring for children.

The main barrier to acceptance of positive action within the Equal Treatment Directive is created by its restrictive approach, which allows such action to be scrutinised only as an exception to the equality principle. Nevertheless, adoption of a broad approach to Art 2(4), similar to that taken in relation to Art 2(2) in Johnston and Commission v France, allowed the accommodation within the Directive of forms of positive action in Marschall. Such an approach can be justified in relation to Art 2(4), although not in relation to Art 2(2), on the basis that it provides a means of recognising the limitations of the formal equality approach.

9 Remedial action: efficacy of the individual method

Remedies

The remedial aspect of the individual method under the anti-discrimination schemes has been perceived as one of its main weaknesses.[397] The various remedies available in discrimination cases (apart from an award of equal pay) have generally been perceived as inadequate, although that position has improved.[398] The means of enforcing them and of addressing their wider implications has also been criticised.[399] The EOC finds: 'Even where discrimination is proven, remedies do little to tackle the systemic problems that give rise to the case in the first place'.[400]

As discussed above, since discrimination is a civil wrong the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to prove the case on the balance of probabilities. However, the burden of proof in either employment tribunals or in county courts is eased in the areas falling within EU competence. This covers discrimination in employment on grounds of sex[401] and sexual orientation.[402] It covers discrimination in all contexts, including employment, on grounds of race or national or ethnic origins.[403] In Igen v Wong[404] and in Chamberlain and Emezie v Emokpae and Webster v Brunel University[405] the Court of Appeal introduced new guidelines on the burden of proof in discrimination claims – which are applicable to all the protected grounds in the fields of EU competence. The guidelines run as follows:

1 Pursuant to s 63A of the SDA, it is for the claimant who complains of sex discrimination to prove on the balance of probabilities facts from which the tribunal could conclude, in the absence of an adequate explanation, that the respondent has committed an act of discrimination against the claimant which is unlawful by virtue of Part II or which by virtue of s 41 or s 42 of the SDA is to be treated as having been committed against the claimant. These are referred to below as 'such facts'.
2 If the claimant does not prove such facts he or she will fail.
3 It is important to bear in mind in deciding whether the claimant has proved such facts that it is unusual to find direct evidence of sex discrimination. Few employers would be prepared to admit such discrimination, even to themselves. In some cases the discrimination will not be an intention but merely based on the assumption that 'he or she would not have fitted in'.

397 See Lustgarten, L, The Legal Control of Racial Discrimination, 1980, pp 225–28; Cotterrell, R, 'The Impact of Sex Discrimination Legislation' [1981] PL 469, p 475; McColgan, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 5, pp 280–88.

398 See Connolly, M, Discrimination Law (2006) at pp 396–7.

399 See Bourne and Whitmore op. cit., fn 1 at 263–4. 54. In the EOC's Submission to the Discrimination Law Review (2006) it urged the DLR to review current provisions for enforcement of awards where the discriminator fails to pay compensation awarded as the present system is unwieldy" (para 54).

400 EOC's Submission to the Discrimination Law Review (2006).

401 SDA s 63A and s 66A.

402 SI 2003 No 1661, regs 29 and 32.

403 RRA ss 4A and 57ZA.

404 [2005] ICR 931, para 76.

405 8 February 2004, unreported.

4 In deciding whether the claimant has proved such facts, it is important to remember that the outcome at this stage of the analysis by the tribunal will therefore usually depend on what inferences it is proper to draw from the primary facts found by the tribunal.
5 It is important to note the word 'could' in s 63A(2). At this stage the tribunal does not have to reach a definitive determination that such facts would lead it to the conclusion that there was an act of unlawful discrimination. At this stage a tribunal is looking at the primary facts before it to see what inferences of secondary fact could be drawn from them.
6 In considering what inferences or conclusions can be drawn from the primary facts, the tribunal must assume that there is no adequate explanation for those facts.
7 These inferences can include, in appropriate cases, any inferences that it is just and equitable to draw in accordance with s 74(2)(b) of the SDA from an evasive or equivocal reply to a questionnaire or any other questions that fall within s 74(2) of the SDA.
8 Likewise, the tribunal must decide whether any provision of any relevant code of practice is relevant and if so, take it into account in determining, such facts pursuant to s 56A(10) of the SDA. This means that inferences may also be drawn from any failure to comply with any relevant code of practice.
9 Where the claimant has proved facts from which conclusions could be drawn that the respondent has treated the claimant less favourably on the ground of sex, then the burden of proof moves to the respondent.
10 It is then for the respondent to prove that he did not commit, or as the case may be, is not to be treated as having committed, that act.
11 To discharge that burden it is necessary for the respondent to prove, on the balance of probabilities, that the treatment was in no sense whatsoever on the grounds of sex, since 'no discrimination whatsoever' is compatible with the Burden of Proof Directive.
12 That requires a tribunal to assess not merely whether the respondent has proved an explanation for the facts from which such inferences can be drawn, but further that it is adequate to discharge the burden of proof on the balance of probabilities that sex was not a ground for the treatment in question.
13 Since the facts necessary to prove an explanation would normally be in the possession of the respondent, a tribunal would normally expect cogent evidence to discharge that burden of proof. In particular, the tribunal will need to examine carefully explanations for failure to deal with the questionnaire procedure and/or code of practice.

To sum up, based on Igen v Wong, the claimant first has to prove, on the balance of probabilities, facts from which the tribunal could conclude, in the absence of an adequate explanation, that the respondent has committed an unlawful act of discrimination. At this stage, a tribunal should consider what inferences could be drawn from these facts. It must assume at this point that there is no adequate explanation for them. It should not take the employer's explanation into account at this stage. So it draws inferences, at this point, regardless of the explanation. Second, if the claimant has proved facts from which conclusions could be drawn that the respondent has treated the claimant less favourably, then the burden of proof moves to the respondent. Third, the respondent must prove, on the balance of probabilities, that the treatment was not on the grounds of race, sex, disability, religion or belief or sexual orientation.

Under the RRA, SDA, DDA and Sexual Orientation Regulations a tribunal can award a declaration which simply states the rights of the applicant and the respect in which the employer has breached the law. It can also award an action recommendation which will be intended to reduce the effect of the discrimination.[406] However, the EAT in British Gas plc v Sharma[407] held that this could not include a recommendation that the applicant be promoted to the next suitable vacancy since this would amount to positive discrimination. It has, however, been pointed out that this would merely be putting the person in the position he or she should have been in rather than giving them a special preference.[408]

The most important remedy is the award of compensation;[409] it is determined on the same basis as in other tort cases. In relation to damages the RRA and SDA originally provided that in the context of indirect discrimination 'no award of damages shall be made if the respondent proves that the requirement or condition was not applied with the intention of treating the claimant unfavourably'.[410] No compensation was therefore payable in respect of indirect discrimination unless it was shown that there was an intention to discriminate; this exclusion from the compensation scheme was much criticised[411] and appeared to contravene European law.[412] The EOC had recommended that the distinction between indirect and direct discrimination as regards compensation should be abolished. Thus, where a person had acted in an indirectly discriminatory fashion, although unmotivated by sexism, compensation would still be payable. This is desirable because there is some evidence that some employers have deliberately failed to conduct a review of working practices so as to be able to put forward a convincing

406 E.g. under the Sexual Orientation Regulations, reg 30(1): Where an employment tribunal finds that a complaint presented to it under regulation 28 is well-founded, the tribunal shall make such of the following as it considers just and equitable –

(a) an order declaring the rights of the complainant and the respondent in relation to the act to which the complaint relates . . .

(c) a recommendation that the respondent take within a specified period action appearing to the tribunal to be practicable for the purpose of obviating or reducing the adverse effect on the complainant of any act of discrimination or harassment to which the complaint relates.

407 [1991] ICR 19; [1991] IRLR 101.

408 See Rubenstein [1991] IRLR 99.

409 E.g. under Sexual Orientation Regulations, reg 30(1): Where an employment tribunal finds that a complaint presented to it under regulation 28 is well-founded, the tribunal shall make such of the following as it considers just and equitable . . .

(b) an order requiring the respondent to pay to the complainant compensation of an amount corresponding to any damages he could have been ordered by a county court or by a sheriff court to pay to the complainant if the complaint had fallen to be dealt with under regulation 31 (jurisdiction of county and sheriff courts);

(c) a recommendation that the respondent take within a specified period action appearing to the tribunal to be practicable for the purpose of obviating or reducing the adverse effect on the complainant of any act of discrimination or harassment to which the complaint relates. See also SDA ss 65(1)(b), 66(1); RRA ss 56(1)(b), 57(1); DDA s 17A(3).

410 SDA, s 66(3), RRA, s 57(3).

411 See, e.g., Townshend-Smith, Sex Discrimination in Employment 1989, p 206.

412 In Von Colson v Land Nordrhein-Westfalen [1984] ECR 1891 the Court held that any sanction must have a real deterrent effect. See also Marshall (No 2) [1993] QB 126.

argument that they did not appreciate the discriminatory affect of certain practices. When it became clear that this limitation was not in accordance with EU law, it was reformulated, although it still applies outside the areas of EU competence.[413]

Damages will be awarded for pecuniary loss and injury to feelings; the claimant as in other tort cases is under a duty to mitigate his or her loss. Previously it appeared that exemplary damages were not available but, as discussed below, it is now clear that that is not the case. Awards in the early years of the SDA and RRA tended to be low,[414] but they rose somewhat after the decision in Noone[415] in which a consultant who was not appointed on grounds of race was awarded £3,000 for injury to feelings. In Alexander, some guidance as to awarding compensation for injury to feelings was given by May LJ: '. . . awards should not be minimal because this would tend to trivialise or diminish respect for the public policy to which the Act gives effect. On the other hand . . . awards should be restrained'.

He considered that they should not be set at the same level as damages for defamation and awarded £500 for injured feelings owing to racial discrimination.[416] The legislation placed an upper limit on awards which was equivalent to that payable under the compensatory award for unfair dismissal. However, the upper limit on damages in respect of sex discrimination was challenged before the European Court of Justice in Marshall (No 2).[417] The ECJ found that the award of compensation in sex discrimination cases brought against organs of the state should be set at a level which would allow the loss sustained to be made good in full. Thus, the Court found that the fixing of an upper limit of this nature was contrary to the principle underlying the Equal Treatment Directive since it was not consistent with the principle of ensuring real equality of opportunity. In response to this decision, the upper limits for compensation under the SDA and RRA were abolished.[418] It seems fairly clear that awards made at the levels mentioned prior to the Marshall (No 2) decision were unlikely to deter employers from discrimination or to affect deeply rooted discriminatory ideologies in institutions.

The result has been a dramatic increase in the size of awards. For example, in Johnson v HM Prison Service and Others,[419] an award of £28,500 was upheld on appeal. It was found that the award was not excessive in the circumstances; severe victimisation on racial grounds had occurred. It may be noted that this was at the time the highest 413 SDA, s 65(1B) provides that for cases of unintentional indirect discrimination compensation would be awarded when it was 'just and equitable' to do so and the tribunal is satisfied that the power to make a declaration and a recommendation are not in themselves an adequate remedy in the circumstances. The original restriction remains for county court hearings. The formula without the second restriction is used for the Sexual Orientation Regulations in relation to indirect discrimination in reg 30(2); the RRA indirect discrimination cases in the area of competence of the Race Directive use the same formula, but for cases outside that competence – cases relating to colour or nationality – the original restriction applies.

414 Gregory notes that in 40% of cases, the award was less than £200 and in only 29% did it exceed £1,000 (Gregory, op. cit., fn 1, pp 80–81).

415 [1988] ICR 813; [1988] 83 IRLR 195.

416 [1988] 1 WLR 968, CA.

417 [1993] QB 126; [1993] 3 WLR 1054; [1993] 4 All ER 586; [1993] IRLR 445, ECJ; [1994] 1 All ER 736, HL.

418 SI 1993/2798; Race Relations Remedies Act 1994.

419 (1996) The Times, 31 December. In a race discrimination case, Virdi v MPS (see (2001) the Guardian, 14 February) Virdi received £350,000 compensation.

UK award made in a racial harassment case. The question of exemplary damages remained problematic until recently. The significance of an award of exemplary damages – which is designed to punish the respondent – is that the award is, in addition to the compensation, designed to compensate the applicant for his or her losses. The EU Directives indicate that exemplary damages should be available since they take the stance that the remedy of compensation should both effective and dissuasive.[420] Until the case of Kuddus v Chief Constable of Leicester Constabulary,[421] tribunals were bound by earlier cases that had ruled that exemplary damages could not be awarded for torts (such as sex, race and disability discrimination which are statutory torts) for which exemplary damages had not been awarded prior to 1964. As none of the anti-discrimination legislation was in force in 1964, the argument was that exemplary damages could not be awarded against discriminators. In Kuddus the House of Lords considered that the award of exemplary damages depended on the conduct of the public authority rather than on the cause of action. It appeared that the House of Lords' judgment in Kuddus had opened the door to exemplary damages in discrimination claims.

It was also finally made clear that exemplary damages are available in Julie Bower v Cheapside (SSL) Ltd (formerly Schroder Securities Ltd) ET,[422] although they were not awarded; nevertheless, a very high award was made. The case was brought by Julie Bower and funded by the EOC. She claimed sex discrimination, equal pay and unfair dismissal against her former employer – a large City institution. It was made clear that tribunals can award compensation to an applicant in order to punish the respondent in two situations. First, this would arise where there had been oppressive, arbitrary or unconstitutional actions by servants of the government (this would include, for example, local authorities and the police). Second, it would arise where the respondent's conduct had been calculated by him to make a profit for himself which might well exceed the compensation payable to the applicant. Such an award would be made in order to drive home the message to the respondent that wrongdoing does not pay. It was found that it would extend to circumstances where the respondent commits a tort deliberately in order to obtain an advantage which would outweigh any compensatory damages likely to be obtained by the victim. It would apply where it appeared that a defendant had cynically calculated that the money to be made out of his wrongdoing would probably exceed the damages to be awarded. The award was not intended to be limited to precise mathematical calculations; it was made clear that the important and necessary element in the second category is that the defendant did direct his mind to the material advantage to be gained by committing the tort and came to the conclusion that it was worth the risk of having to compensate the plaintiff if he or she should bring an action. In this instance the tribunal ultimately decided that the bank's conduct did not quite fall into the second category since it did not appear that it was calculating to make a profit by its conduct. The eventual award was the largest award made for sex discrimination compensation of close to £1.5 million. The case exposed discriminatory City employment practices via the proceedings of the ET.

The principles set out in this decision as regards exemplary damages remain unchallenged as the respondent withdrew its appeal to the EAT. There will be many other cases which will follow this one where exemplary damages are now likely to be awarded. It is argued that in accordance with EU law the dissuasive element in exemplary damages should outweigh the profit element. It is suggested that if a respondent deliberately commits a tort on the basis that advantage – not necessarily material advantage – might be gained, considering that the outcome, if the victim brought proceedings, would probably be neutral in monetary terms, that should be sufficient. Thus, even where it appeared that the concern in question had not expected to make a profit, or had not set out to make one, an award of exemplary damages should be made in order to dissuade concerns from tortious behaviour. This argument would also support the awards of such damages even where the concern expected to make a net loss in monetary terms since the perceived advantage of, for example, dismissing one person in order to replace them, might not be quantifiable in monetary terms.

420 See, e.g., 2000/78/EC, Art 17.
421 [2002] 2 AC 122.
422 2002, unreported.

It is fairly common for the defendant to fail to comply with the award[423] and, if so, the applicant must return to court in order to enforce it. If an action recommendation has not been complied with, the tribunal will award compensation, but only if compensation could have been awarded at the original hearing. Previously this was unlikely to be the case in an indirect discrimination claim, no remedy was available, except to apply to the CRE or the EOC alleging persistent discrimination. This is still the case outside the areas of EU competence.

Success rate of applications

The individual method appears to have had so far only limited success in bringing about change.[424] In an early study, Gregory noted that in 1976, only 40% of applications in respect of sex discrimination were heard and 10% were successful, while in the same year 45% of applications in respect of race discrimination were heard and 3.4% were successful.[425] The number of applications began to decline from 1976 onwards, although it rose again in the 1990s.[426] Possibly, the decline may have occurred because the success rate was so low that applicants were deterred from bringing a claim in the first place. In other words, the number of applications may have been self-limiting: only the very determined applicants would pursue cases all the way to a hearing. Of course, the decline in the rate of applications may have been partly attributable to the initial rush to attack very blatant examples of sexism and racism, which died away as employers and others began to ensure that policies enshrining such values were either abolished or made less overt.

Less than half of the applications are heard; there appears to be a strong tendency to give up a claim half way through. There may be a number of reasons why cases are not brought, why they are abandoned and why the success rate is so low. Obviously, the applicant is in a very vulnerable position; the position of the parties is usually unequal, 423 Leonard, A, Judging Inequality, 1987, Civil Liberties Trust, found that almost 50% of applicants reported delay in getting the employer to pay the compensation (pp 27–29).

424 See Hepple, B, Coussey, M and Choudhury, T, Equality: A New Framework—The Independent Review of the Enforcement of UK Anti-Discrimination Legislation, 2000.

425 Gregory, op. cit., fn 1, pp 87–88.

426 The Equality Challenge, EOC Annual Report for 1991; it showed an increase of 40% in applications in that year.

especially if an applicant is bringing the claim against his or her employer. The applicant may be afraid of being labelled a troublemaker, perhaps of being dismissed or pressured into resigning, despite the victimisation provisions of the relevant legislation, or of losing promotion prospects.[427] There may be pressure, not only on the applicant to withdraw, but also on any workmates who have consented to act as witnesses in the claim and they may withdraw their consent to act. The weakness of the remedies may have discouraged claims in the past. The extreme complexity and technicality of the substantive law may also act as a deterrent. It may do so in any event, but coupled with the lack of legal aid,[428] the task facing the applicant may appear to be overwhelming.

These two factors are exacerbated by and also contribute to the lack of experience tribunal members have of discrimination cases. The applicant may be aided by the EOC or the CRE or the DRC. In 2005, for example, the CRE dealt with over 1,000 complaints of racial discrimination. Individuals were also helped by the local racial equality organisations that the CRE funded, devoting £3.3 million to them.[429] However, the EOC and CRE have to refuse the majority of applications owing to their lack of funds.[430]

The lack of legal aid may have had an impact on the quality of decision-making in ETs, and it appears possible that employers' lawyers may have been able to manipulate the members of the tribunal because of their lack of experience in the area. Thus, a vicious circle is arguably set up. The tribunals need more experience in these cases, but do not receive it because of the factors mentioned here; when a tribunal does hear such a case, there may be flaws in its handling of it, thereby having some effect in terms of deterring future applicants and ensuring that tribunals do not gain more 427 The EOC finds (EOC, 2006, op. cit., fn 1): 'Currently, all claimants who wish to make a claim to the Employment Tribunal must pursue the proceedings in their own name. This makes some individuals feel unable to pursue a claim themselves for fear of victimisation, as has been found to be a significant problem in the EOC's general formal investigation into pregnancy discrimination. The EOC is of the view that if CEHR, trade unions, etc were permitted to take representative actions this problem would be alleviated' (para 96).

428 EOC (2006) para 55: the EOC recommends that the DLR consider extension of legal aid to employment tribunals to improve access to justice.

429 CRE Annual Report for 2005 (published 2006).

430 For example, in 2005, the CRE received 1,028 applications for assistance. This represented an increase of 85% on applications received in 2004. Almost two-thirds of applications for assistance were from men. Of the 477 applications from Black applicants, 214 came from Black Africans (up 95% on 2004), and 213 from Black Caribbean applicants (up 157% on the previous year). The number of applicants from Asians – mainly Indians (88) and Pakistanis (85) – rose from 166 (or 30% of the total) in 2004 to 196 (or 19% of the total) in 2005; however, as a proportion of the total number of applications in 2005, this represented a fall of around 38%. In 2005, 503 applicants were given full advice and assistance, while 10 were offered advice and assistance limited to conciliation (see Table 2). Three applicants (one Black African, one Black Caribbean and one White) received full CRE representation. At the end of the reporting period, two of these remained pending, awaiting a hearing, and negotiations were under way for settling the third. Just over half (52%) of the applications for assistance received in 2005 were related to employment. Most applications (53%) came from the public sector, with the largest number (158), as 2004, coming from the courts, police, prison and probation services). Three cases were settled by CRE legal affairs officers in 2005, for a total amount of £4,300. (Ibid – figures from Table 4 of the Report.)

experience.[431] In recognition of this problem the CRE has proposed that there should be a discrimination division of industrial tribunals dealing only with discrimination claims.[432] Such tribunals would be able to gather expertise in such cases and could be equipped with powers to order higher levels of compensation. It would be possible for legal aid to be made available in this specialist division even though it remained unavailable in respect of other tribunal cases. However, this proposal has not been implemented.

10 The Commission for Racial Equality; the Equal Opportunities Commission; the Disability Rights Commission; the new Commission for Equality and Human Rights

Introduction

Apart from the individual method of bringing about change, the RRA and SDA also contain an administrative method, which was included with the aim of relieving the burden on individual applicants.[433] The Disability Discrimination Commission introduced under the DDA represented a much weaker form of administrative method since the Commission had an advisory capacity only. It did not have the power to issue a non-discrimination notice in respect of discriminatory practices. However, the Disability Rights Commission Act (DRCA) 1999 brought counter-disability discrimination powers in this respect into line with those under the RRA and SDA, by creating the Disability Rights Commission (DRC) while effecting certain improvements. The Special Educational Needs and Disability Discrimination Act 2001 amended the DDA to extend the role of the DRC to discrimination in education.

The administrative method represents a more coherent and effective approach than the piecemeal method of bringing individual cases. The aim is to bring about general changes in discriminatory practices rather than waiting for an individual to take on the risk and the burden of bringing a case. Both the CRE and the EOC have three main powers. They can assist and advise claimants, they can issue Codes of Practice[434] and they can conduct formal investigations or general investigations and issue a non-discrimination notice in respect of discriminatory practices. The RRA, after amendment by the Race 431 For early comment on sex discrimination claims, see Leonard, Judging Inequality, 1987; on race claims, see Lustgarten (1986), 49 MLR 68–85. See, too, generally, Honeyball, Sex, Employment and the Law, Chapter 1 and McColgan, op. cit., fn 1, Chapter 5.

432 Review of the Race Relations Act 1976: Proposals for Change, Proposal 10.

433 For discussion of the role of these two bodies in their relatively early years, see Lustgarten, L, 'The CRE under attack' [1982] PL 229; Lacey, 'A change in the right direction? The CRE's consultative document' [1984] PL 186; Lustgarten (1983),133 NLJ 1057. For the EOC, see Sacks, V, 'The EOC – 10 years on' (1986) 49 MLR 560.

434 E.g. the current CRE statutory code of practice on racial equality in employment came into effect in 2006. The revised code gives employers, trade unions, recruitment agencies, professional organisations and individual workers in Britain practical guidance on how to avoid unlawful racial discrimination and harassment in employment. It outlines employers' legal responsibilities under the Race Relations Act, and recommends procedures and practices intended to ensure equal treatment. The revised code was launched in November 2005, giving employers enough time to adopt the policies and systems they would need before it came into effect on 6 April 2006.

Relations (Amendment) Act 2000 (which inserted s 71 into the 1976 Act), provided new powers for the CRE, as indicated above. It can seek to enforce specific duties on public authorities intended to create equality of opportunity for persons of different racial groups by means of a compliance notice backed up by a court order. Its general duty, extended to further functions by the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000, to 'eliminate unlawful racial discrimination' in public authorities was not backed up by any new powers, but is subject to the powers discussed below.

The Commissions are non-departmental public bodies established by statute. The Secretary of State for the Home Department appoints the members of the Commissions and, with the endorsement of the Prime Minister, the chairpersons. The Secretary of State is answerable to Parliament for the Commissions, and is responsible for making financial provision for their needs; received as grant-in-aid from the Home Office, the CRE received £19.100 million in 2005–6.[435] The Commissions employ permanent staff; the CRE currently has 195 staff.

Investigative and remedial powers

An investigation into apparently discriminatory practices where there may be no known victim who wants, or is prepared, to bring a claim might arise because the company or institution had effectively deterred certain people from coming forward with applications for a job. In such circumstances, if indications of discrimination became apparent – if, for example, it seemed that very few of a certain group were employed – then first a formal investigation (ss 48–50 of the RRA) would be conducted. This decision might be taken if, for example, the workforce was only 1% black although the company was in a racially mixed area in which the black group comprised about 30% of the population. It might be found that the recruiting policy was indirectly discriminatory; for example, it might largely be by word of mouth and therefore the existing workforce might tend to reproduce itself. If discriminatory practices were found, a non-discrimination notice would be issued and the CRE might apply for an injunction to enforce it under s 62(1).

However, the CRE had the use of its power to issue a non-discrimination notice curbed by the House of Lords' decision in CRE ex p Prestige Group plc.[436] It was found that the CRE was not entitled to investigate a named person or company unless it already had a strong reason to believe that discrimination had occurred. This meant that where such suspicion did not exist, the CRE could embark on a general investigation only, meaning that it could not subpoena evidence or issue a non-discrimination notice. Thus, the CRE and the EOC are now confined to a more reactive approach; they can only react to very blatant forms of discrimination rather than investigating the more subtle and insidious instances of discrimination, which may be the more pernicious.

435 The Commission received £19.100 million in grant-in-aid in the year ended 31 March 2006 (£17.361 million in 2004–5), consisting of £18.664 million for revenue expenditure and £436 thousand for capital expenditure. Net operating expenditure during the year ended 31 March 2006 amounted to £19.531 million resulting in a retained surplus in the income and expenditure account for the year of £166,000 (figures from 2005 Annual Report).

436 [1984] 1 WLR 335; [1984] ICR 473.

After this decision, the CRE had to abandon a number of investigations which it had already begun and those formal investigations that it or the EOC did undertake took much longer.[437] There has, therefore, been a tendency for subtle institutionalised racism or sexism to continue unchecked,[438] although more blatant racism, such as the phrase 'no blacks' – which used to appear in advertisements – has now disappeared.

The DRC has powers similar to those of the other two bodies, but s 3 of the DRCA appears to have been included with a view to curbing or excluding a Prestige interpretation of the provisions. Nevertheless, it is unclear that the wording will prevent emasculation of the provisions by the judiciary.[439] Under s 53A of the DDA, as amended by s 36 of the 2001 Act, the DRC can issue Codes of Practice giving guidance to employers, service providers, educational bodies and others as to the avoidance of discrimination on grounds of disability.

The new Commission for Equality and Human Rights

Introduction

Both the CRE and EOC, over the 40 years of their existence, have put forward various proposals for reform which would strengthen the individual method of challenging discriminatory practices by allowing it to a greater extent to work in tandem with the general, administrative method. They have also made proposals for reform which would strengthen the administrative method[440] and allow it to work more closely in harmony with the individual method. The CRE wants to try to narrow the gap between individual cases and what can be achieved by a formal investigation and has proposed that in order to do this, it should be able to join in the individual's case as a party to the action so as to draw attention to the likelihood of further discrimination occurring. Thus, the individual would receive the remedy, but the general effect of discrimination in the defendant body would be addressed by issuing a non-discrimination notice at the same time. This might be supported on the ground that if one individual brings a successful case against an employer, it is probable that discrimination in that concern is quite widespread. In particular, both the EOC and the CRE have proposed that legislation should be passed to reverse the Prestige decision as they consider that they need to be able to launch investigations into a named person or company even when there is no initial strong evidence of discrimination.[441] A process of reform is currently under way, but questions must be raised as to the extent that it addresses the concerns expressed over the last 40 years in the annual reports of both the EOC and CRE.

437 See Sacks, [1986] 49 MLR 560.

438 For criticism of Prestige, see Ellis and Appleby (1984) 100 LQR 349; [1984] PL 236.

439 For discussion, see McColgan, op. cit., fn 1, pp 307–9.

440 See the two CRE reviews of the 1976 Act, 1985 and 1991. See the EOC document, Equal Treatment for Men and Women: Strengthening the Acts, 1988.

441 See the reviews of the Race Relations Act by the CRE – reform proposals of 1992 and 1998 and the EOC 1988 proposals.

A single Commission

In 2003 Patricia Hewitt and Lord Falconer announced the inception of a new Commission for Equality and Human Rights (CEHR) to combat discrimination. The White Paper on the Commission was published in 2004.[442] The CEHR was set up under Part 3 Equality Act 2006. It will take responsibility for the new laws on discrimination on a range of grounds including the established ones. Thus for the first time there will be an institution which has as part of its remit the responsibility for aiding the combating of discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation and promoting non-discriminatory policies on this ground. The inception of the Commission also has of course enormous implications for human rights and equality generally. The CEHR will bring together the work of the three existing equality Commissions as well as taking on new responsibilities in relation to the Human Rights Act and new grounds of discrimination.

At present no administrative 'watchdog' body such as the EOC has the responsibility for overseeing the use of the new Sexual Orientation Regulations and supporting persons bringing actions. The CEHR will absorb the Equal Opportunities Commission and the Disability Rights Commission by the end of 2007, while it will absorb the Commission for Racial Equality in 2009. The inception of the Commission thus has significant implications for the protection of human rights and the promotion of equality. The Commission will not have the distinctive remit that the separate Commissions currently have. The CRE is concerned that there is no obligation for the CEHR to consider every application for assistance from individuals who think that they might have been discriminated against, and that race might be diluted in a single equality organisation. During 2005 racial equality councils and national ethnic minority networks made the case for a statutory race committee, similar to the disability committee that had been agreed, with powers to dispense grants for local racial equality work. The CEHR also stressed that it was vital that local expertise, built up over the past 30 years through a network of racial equality councils, should not be lost when setting up the CEHR.[443] In 2005 the CRE took the view that a new organisation should be set up, in addition to the CEHR, to continue the CRE's work building good community relations, following closure of the CRE in 2009.[444]

The government's intention is that the CEHR will build on the work of the existing equality commissions, and will 'promote equality, human rights and cohesion as core values for a fair Society'. It will inherit the Commission for Racial Equality's responsibilities for promoting good race relations between different communities. The government has stated that the CEHR's powers will 'fully match those of the existing Commissions but with increased breadth and flexibility where needed, for example in updated inquiry and investigation powers'.[445] It is intended that it will monitor and to seek to improve compliance with the Race Relations (Amendment) Act public authority duty.

442 See the White Paper Fairness for All (2004) Cm 6185, paras 3.35 and 3.36.
443 CRE Annual Report for 2005 (published 2006), Introduction.
444 Ibid.
445 See IOSS 2005, para 50.

Like the CRE and the EOC, the CEHR will have three main powers. It will be able to assist and advise claimants, issue Codes of Practice[446] and conduct formal investigations or general investigations and issue a non-discrimination notice in respect of discriminatory practices. In each of these instances its remit will cover all the protected grounds. So it will issue Codes of Practice covering new protected grounds under s 14.[447]

This does not however give any information as to the probable budget of the new body; for example will it be at least as great, eventually, as the budgets of the three current Commissions combined? It should be much greater since the new Commission will have to accept a range of new responsibilities.

Investigatory powers

The new Commission has two investigatory powers under the 2006 Act. It can launch 'Inquiries' and 'Investigations'. Investigations are more serious matters since they can have legal consequences. Inquiries can be conducted in the general pursuit of its duties but if during the Inquiry the Commission suspects that an unlawful act has been committed it must stop the Inquiry and launch an Investigation. Under s 20 of the 2006 Act the formal investigative power is in essentials the same as the powers previously afforded to the EOC and CRE, discussed above. The suspicion triggering the investigation can arise during the course of an Inquiry.

The CEHR power to carry out general inquiries is intended to mean that it can promote improved practice in response to particular areas of concern and can focus on specific sectors. Its power to conduct general inquiries will extend to the discrimination, equal opportunities, good relations and human rights parts of its remit. The CEHR will not have additional enforcement powers relating to human rights legislation on the (doubtful) basis that legal aid is available.[448]

446 E.g. the current CRE statutory Code of Practice on racial equality in employment came into effect in 2006. The revised code gives employers, trade unions, recruitment agencies, professional organisations and individual workers in Britain practical guidance on how to avoid unlawful racial discrimination and harassment in employment. It outlines employers' legal responsibilities under the Race Relations Act, and recommends procedures and practices intended to ensure equal treatment. The revised code was launched in November 2005, giving employers enough time to adopt the policies and systems they would need before it came into effect on 6 April 2006.

447 Section 14(1): The Commission may issue a code of practice in connection with a matter addressed by any of the following –

(a) the Equal Pay Act 1970 (c 41),
(b) Parts 2 to 4 and section 76A of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 (c 65) or an order under section 76B or 76C of that Act,
(c) Parts 2 to 4 and section 71 of the Race Relations Act 1976 (c 74),
(d) Parts 2 to 4 and 5A of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 (c 50) except for sections 28D and 28E (accessibility in schools),
(e) Part 2 of this Act,
(f) regulations under Part 3 of this Act,
(g) Parts 2 and 3 of the Employment Equality (Sexual Orientation) Regulations 2003 (SI 2003/1661), and
(h) Parts 2 and 3 of the Employment Equality (Religion or Belief) Regulations 2003 (SI 2003/1660).

448 White Paper (2004), para 4.2.

This general inquiries model has been developed to build on the model established for the existing Commissions. There are many examples of inquiries, including those given in the White Paper: the CRE's 2003 investigation into race equality in prisons, and into police forces in 2005, the DRC's 2002 investigation into the accessibility of websites for disabled people, and the EOC's 2003 inquiries into pregnancy dismissal and occupational segregation in apprenticeships. The CEHR's powers will have a much broader base, allowing it to look at issues that might affect two or more protected groups, as well as focusing on one equality strand when appropriate. In order to ensure that it can obtain sufficient information to conduct a thorough and useful investigation, the CEHR will be able as a last resort to apply to the Secretary of State for permission to compel third parties to provide certain information relevant to the inquiry.[449]

It will be able to initiate these inquiries either independently or at the request of the Secretary of State. It will have to publish terms of reference before launching an inquiry, and will publish reports at the end of the process, which could include recommendations for changes to policies, practices or legislation. General inquiries will not be able to target individual bodies. This last limitation indicates that the Prestige limitation still applies.

Aiding claimants

The CEHR's powers to aid individuals are similar to those of the existing Commissions, described above. The EOC takes the view that its powers should be extended further. It argues that the law would be more effective for all involved if the CEHR (and other representative groups) was able to take representative actions on behalf of individuals. It considers that CEHR should be empowered to institute proceedings in its own name in relation to discriminatory practices.[450] It has been argued, on the other hand, that that the CEHR should provide support for smaller claims as a separate service from the championing of landmark causes.[451]

Judicial review

The EOC and CRE were able to bring about general changes in discriminatory practices by seeking a direct change in domestic law in reliance on European Union law. In Secretary of State for Employment ex p EOC[452] it was found that the EOC can seek a declaration in judicial review proceedings to the effect that primary UK legislation is not in accord with EU equality legislation. Certain provisions of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 governed the right not to be unfairly dismissed, compensation for unfair dismissal and the right to statutory redundancy pay. These rights did not apply to workers who worked less than the specified number of hours 449 White Paper, paras 4.4–4.6.

450 EOC's Submission to the Discrimination Law Review (2006), paras 48, 49.

451 Baker, A, 'A Tale of Two Projects: Emerging Tension between Public and Private Aspects of Employment Discrimination Law' 21 International Journal of Comparative Labour Law and Industrial Relations 591 (2005).

452 [1994] All ER 910; [1994] ICR 317.

a week. The Equal Opportunities Commission considered that since the majority of those working for less than the specified number of hours were women, the provisions operated to the disadvantage or women and were therefore discriminatory. The EOC accordingly wrote to the Secretary of State for Employment expressing this view and arguing that since the provisions in question were indirectly discriminatory, they were in breach of EU law.

The Secretary of State replied by letter that the conditions excluding part-timers from the rights in question were justifiable and therefore not indirectly discriminatory. The EOC applied for judicial review of the Secretary of State's refusal to accept that the UK was in breach of its obligations under EC law. The application was amended to bring in an individual, Mrs Day, who worked part-time and who had been made redundant by her employers. It was found that Mrs Day's claim was a private law claim which could not be advanced against the Secretary of State, who was not her employer and was not liable to meet the claim if it was successful.

The Secretary of State further argued that the EOC had no locus standi to bring the proceedings. However, the House of Lords found that since the EOC had a duty under s 53(1) SDA to work for the elimination of discrimination, it was within its remit to try to secure a change in the provisions under consideration and therefore the EOC had a sufficient interest to bring the proceedings and hence locus standi. The Secretary of State also argued that no decision or justiciable issue susceptible of judicial review existed. However, the House of Lords found that although the letter itself was not a decision, the provisions themselves could be challenged in judicial review proceedings. In other words, the real question was whether judicial review was available for the purpose of securing a declaration that certain UK primary legislation was incompatible with EU law and, following Secretary of State for Transport ex p Factortame, it would appear that judicial review was so available.

As regards the substantive issue – whether the provisions in question, while admittedly discriminatory, could be justified – the House of Lords thought that in certain special circumstances an employer might be justified in differentiating between full and part-time workers to the disadvantage of the latter, but that such differentiation, employed nationwide, could not be justified. Thus the EOC, but not an individual applicant, was entitled to bring judicial review proceedings in order to secure a declaration that UK law was incompatible with EU law. Declarations were made that the conditions set out in the provisions in question were indeed incompatible with EU law.

This was a very far-reaching decision: it means that where UK legislation is incompatible with EU law, a declaration can be obtained to that effect far more rapidly than if it was necessary to wait for an individual affected to bring a case against the particular person or body who was acting within the terms of the UK legislation in question. The decision itself did not directly have an effect on race discrimination, but it opened the possibility that the CEHR will be able to challenge other provisions of UK law in relation to the various EU Directives, including in particular the Framework and Race Directives. As discussed above, the Sexual Orientation Regulations have already been challenged by way of judicial review by a group of unions. Even where challenges fail, the resulting judgments provide useful guidance to tribunals and courts on the interpretation of provisions introduced into UK law in order to implement EU law. But, as discussed in Chapter 4, the CEHR will not be able to use judicial review in relation to the human rights part of its remit, unless EU law applies.

Advisory role

The CEHR will have an advisory role in relation to individuals and pressure or community groups. Under s 13 of the 2006 Act, which covers its advisory role, it will:

(a) publish or otherwise disseminate ideas or information;
(b) undertake research;
(c) provide education or training;
(d) give advice or guidance (whether about the effect or operation of an enactment or otherwise) . . .

The CEHR will also act in an advisory capacity in relation to proposed legislation[453] under s 12. It is intended that it should give Ministers advice or make proposals on any aspect of current or proposed law that relates to any part of its remit. This would enable the CEHR, for example, to advise that a particular feature of a proposed piece of employment legislation could result in indirect discrimination against women, or would cause particular difficulties for disabled people. Its role in this respect will not be confined simply to discrimination legislation and related good practice. It is intended that it should give advice on good practice in relation to the protected groups including the practical application of any law that impacts on their equal opportunities or on the treatment of disabled people.

11 Conclusions

This chapter has charted a period of immense change in anti-discrimination provision. The provisions have both broadened and strengthened, although many areas of weakness remain. There is a lot of government rhetoric, but there has been a very clear reluctance to do anything that was not forced through by EU law. IOSS, for example, appears to be merely descriptive and rhetorical.

This chapter has noted a number of instances of delayed and reluctant implementation of EU law; it was unclear why, for example, exemplary damages were apparently unavailable in discrimination cases, until recently. The recent changes made only in the areas of EU competence, such as the importation of a more generous concept of indirect discrimination, have made the law extremely complex and difficult to use, as well as creating a number of indefensible anomalies.

The reluctance to introduce legislative change is matched by the failure to increase funding. Again there has been a lot of rhetoric, but no acceptance that legal aid should be available for discrimination cases, and compensation for unintentional indirect discrimination had to be forced into domestic legislation; obviously the RRA or SDA could have been amended at any time to effect this change. Owing to their levels of funding, both the CRE and EOC have had to refuse many applications from individuals asking for help in bringing cases; such under-funding suggests that there is at present a lack of genuine commitment in the government to ending discriminatory practices. There has also been no acceptance of anything but the most limited forms of positive action. No advantage has been taken – except in relation to elections – of the possibility of using positive action presented by EU law. The advantage of positive action is that it can drive change in even the most resistant areas of public and private life. It can create opportunities in itself; for example, if a person is promoted to one post via a positive action scheme that person then acquires an opportunity to apply for posts at the next level up which might not otherwise have been open to them. Women and members of ethnic minorities can provide a role model for younger colleagues in terms of demonstrating what can be achieved and in creating critical mass.

453 See the White Paper Fairness for All (2004) Cm 6185, paras 3.35 and 3.36.

It seems reasonably clear from the discussion above that institutional change is more effective than placing the onus on individuals to seek redress once they have already been wronged. Therefore it is unfortunate that this chapter has had to focus mainly on the individual method. Where trade unions or the EOC, CRE or DRC have aided the individual applicant victories through the courts have been valuable in bringing about change. But there is still a mismatch between what the CRE, EOC and DRC (and, in future, the CEHR) can do and the use of the individual method. If an individual does win a case, indicating that discriminatory practices in a particular institution may be occurring, there is no clear means by which the relevant watchdog body can take follow-up action. The EOC has said of the 'institutional change' approach: 'It achieves that change in approach in the public sector, placing responsibility with organisations rather than individuals. We believe that this approach should form an intrinsic part of the vision for the future of equality law.' However, this argument is not suggesting that the individual method has become redundant. It is important that it exists, as a potential avenue of legal challenge, deterring employers and others from discrimination, especially if exemplary damages are sought, but also it represents the main means of forcing change in the private sector. Public authorities have little choice but to comply with initiatives such as that represented by the public authority duty to abide by gender and race principles. It is clear that private sector change has mainly come about via the impact of EU law, and even then change has been slow and reluctant.

The chapter is entitled 'anti-discrimination law', but in fact it is about a lot of law that is not based on the concept of discrimination; the concept of having to demonstrate disadvantage under a formal equality model is becoming out of date. Ironically it can disadvantage the disadvantaged groups in trying to demonstrate it, and in many circumstances demonstrating lack of equal treatment does not aid the disadvantaged person; the most obvious example is harassment, and the law has now recognised the limitation of basing anti-harassment laws on discrimination. Current discrimination laws also create a barrier to the use of affirmative action.

The EOC argued in 2006:

> Although the Sex Discrimination Act and Equal Pay Act have been vitally important, they are now 30 years old and their limitations are clear. The EOC's work – such as our recent investigation into pregnancy discrimination – shows that our existing laws with their onus for action by individuals are not working well for either individuals or employers. Employees are frequently unable to take action or suffer from doing so. The current laws were framed when the world of work was very different from today. At the present time women form nearly half the workforce and the norm is to combine a parenting role with work. Part-time working is now common. New fathers are today much more likely to be active carers of their children. Now that fathers are taking on greater childcare roles, and the gender > balance between carers is more evenly split, sex discrimination law needs to catch up with the changes to women's and men's daily lives.[454]

These social changes have meant that the concept of indirect discrimination is becoming out of date; as fathers take on caring roles it is more difficult to show that women are placed at a particular disadvantage if flexible working is denied to them or child care responsibilities ignored. Ironically, successful social change, partly driven by anti-discrimination law, is meaning that specifically anti-discrimination law is becoming redundant. This is evident in relation to disability, where the formal equality model is clearly inappropriate, and in relation to harassment and positive action, across all the protected grounds.

Forty years on from the time when the first major pieces of anti-discrimination legislation were introduced, at a time when the reach of equality law is about to become wider than ever before, it is pertinent to look towards a new concept of equality. Fredman argues:

> . . . the new concept of equality cannot function solely within the traditional structure of anti-discrimination law, which assumes that discrimination consists of individual acts of prejudice, perpetrated against individual victims, to be remedied by litigation in court to produce compensation for the victim. Societal discrimination extends well beyond the individual acts of prejudice. This means that the duty should not be confined to compensating identified victims. It should extend to the restructuring of institutions. Integral to the new vision therefore is the positive duty to promote equality, through such strategies as mainstreaming and positive action.[455]

In a similar spirit the EOC has agreed a set of principles that its Commissioners believe should underpin a new unified Single Equality Act.[456] Although developed in the context of sex discrimination law, they can be applied to all the protected grounds. These are that the legislation should be outcome-focused: the purpose of the unified Equality Act is to promote substantive equality and to eliminate systemic as well as individualised discrimination. There should be equality amongst the different strands of discrimination law affecting the different protected grounds; the anti-discrimination provisions should be harmonised up to the highest standard to give all protected persons equally comprehensive rights. The SEA should promote respect for equal dignity and worth for each individual, recognising that substantive equality is fundamental to personal development, to economic growth and to a successful, cohesive society, and set standards which are clear, intelligible and consistent. The law should place the onus for achieving equality and eliminating discrimination primarily with political, economic and social institutions: it should require them to act and facilitate efforts to do so effectively. The law should be capable of being effectively and efficiently enforced when necessary, with accessible, effective and timely means of securing redress for individuals and, where appropriate, groups of individuals. The law should also be 454 EOC's Submission to the Discrimination Law Review (2006).

455 Paragraph 2.3, The Future of Equality in Britain, Fredman, S, EOC Working Paper No 5, 2002.

456 EOC's Submission to the Discrimination Law Review (2006).

inclusive; it should provide opportunities for individuals and communities to engage in the process of change and participate in decisions that affect their own lives.

Anti-discrimination law is about to enter a new era from 2007 onwards with the advent of the CEHR, protection for persons on a much wider range of protected grounds and in a wider range of contexts. The Single Equality Act is in the offing. But the extent of real change will partly depend on the extent to which the principles put forward receive recognition in the new legislation, and on acceptance of the need in some contexts to move beyond anti-discrimination law.

Index

Abortion, and right to life, 80, 285
Abuse of process, 1266–67
Access to a court, under ECHR, 62–63
Access to information see Freedom of Information Act
Access to information, prior to Freedom of Information Act 2000, 626–28
Access to legal advice, 1208–34
  Codes C and H, formal exceptions under, 1220–25 consent to forgo advice, 1221–23
  debarring solicitors' representatives, 1223–25
  delaying access, 1216–19 encouragement to defer decision, 1227–28
  formal exceptions, limitations and informal subversion, 1216 harm-based exemptions, 1220–21 implied limitations and informal subversion of rights, 1225–28 improving legal advice scheme, 1228–34
  non-terrorist suspects, 1216–18
  out of station interviews, 1226
  rights of access, 1210 silence, adverse inferences drawn from, 1211–15 solicitors, unavailability or delay, 1221
  subverting notification, 1226–28
  terrorist suspects, 1218–19
    disallowing private consultation, 1225
Accountability, of police, 1007–10, 1261–65, 1303–27 see also Evidence, exclusion of Activism
  domestic application of Arts 10 and 11, 695–96
  Human Rights Act, under, 278–91
Actus reus contempt see Actus reus, contempt offences under Official Secrets Act see Official secrecy offences under Terrorism Act 2000 see counter-terrorism Actus reus, contempt common law, 334, 335, 337
  prejudgment test, 336 protection of justice as continuing process, 396
  Spycatcher litigation, 372, 373, 375
  statutory test for, 339–56
Admissibility of applications to European Court of Human Rights, 27–31
  complaints, 28–35
  European Commission of Human Rights, 23, 24
Admissibility of evidence see exclusion of evidence torture, evidence obtained by, 1269–73, 1455–59 Adverse inferences, drawn from silence, 1211–15 restriction on drawing, 1239–43
Advertising, political, 209
Advertising Standards Authority (ASA), 574, 576, 577
Affirmative action see Positive discrimination
Affray, 799–800
Age of consent, homosexuals, 82, 1472
AIDS/HIV, fear of, 83, 84
Aliens, 55, 111–12
Allen, Graham, 145
Al-Qaeda, 289, 1330–34
  see also Counter-terrorism
  ATCSA (Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act) 2001 (Part 4), 1434, 1436 derogating orders, and, 1443
  human rights and counter-terrorist sanctions, 1330–31 proscription, and, 1388 related groups, 1336 terrorism offences, and, 1410–11
American Cyanamid case, implications for media freedom, 378
American Declaration of Independence, 8
Anarchy, State and Utopia (Nozick), 6

Anti-assimilationism and discrimination law, 1473–74
Anti-discrimination law, 1474–75, 1476–1576
  see also Discrimination
  administrative method of combatting, 1593–94
  harassment see Harassment individual applications, efficacy, 1586–93 success rate of applications, 1591–93 investigative and remedial powers, of "watchdog" bodies, 1594–95
  remedies, 1586–91
  sources of domestic legislation, 1481–82
    EU law, 1479–81
    HRA and ECHR, 1482–86
Anti-social behaviour and public protest, 480, 870–73
  see also Public disorder and anti-social behaviour, criminalising Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act (ATCSA) 2001, 1090–97, 1421–38
  see also Counter-terrorism
  communications data, retention of by private companies, 1095–97 declarations of compatibility, and, 211 detention without trial scheme (Part 4), 288, 1421–38 challenges to derogation, case law, 1430–38 derogation orders, 1424–26 introduction of Part 4, 1422–26 provisions, 1426–29
  information acquisition, 1091–94
Anti-terrorism law see Counter-terrorism Appeals, under FoI - time limits on applying for information, 653 Arrest
  arrestee, informing, 1157–61 reason for arrest, 56–57, 1159–61 breach of the peace, common law, 1141–43
  consensual detainment, 1161–62
  counter-terrorism, 1146–49
  detention following arrest time limits, 1165–67
  force, use of, 1162–63
  'hunch', relying on, 1155 informing promptly of, 56–57, 1159–61 powers of, 1139–63 public protest and, 676
    statutory, 1149
  purpose of, 1155–57
  reasonable suspicion, 1149–57 arresting officer, formed by, 1154–55 level of, 1149–53
    police working rules, and, 1153–54 reason for, promptly informing of, 56–57, 1159–61 valid, procedural elements, 1157–61 without warrants, 1143–46
  with warrants, 1143
ASA (Advertising Standards Authority), 574, 576, 577
Assembly see Freedom of protest and assembly Association see Freedom of association
Australia, Security Service, 118 Autonomy of individual bodily integrity, and, 74–80 informational autonomy 804–7
  moral, 301–2, 455
  sexual, 80–85

Bad faith, and exclusion of evidence, 1272, 1286 Bail breach of the peace, 774
  no absolute right to, 58
Banning orders and public protest assemblies, 709–20
    Jones & Lloyd v DPP, 711–20
  marches, 707–9
BBC see British Broadcasting Corporation
BBFC (British Board of Film Classification), 551–71
BCC (Broadcasting Complaints Commission), 839
Bentham, Jeremy, 7, 8, 146
Bias independent and impartial tribunal, need for, 63, 1090 racial, 1509
Bill of Rights debate, 140–52, 156, 298
  adoption of Bills of Rights worldwide, 115 American Bill of Rights, 167 central arguments, 145–52
  Conservative Governments, and, 116, 298
  'controversy' thesis, 149
  domestic judiciary, readiness to use rights-based reasoning, 151–52
  ECHR, possible models for protection of, 152–56
  "modern British Bill of Rights", replacing HRA?, 156, 298 morality, and, 461–62
  New Zealand Bill of Rights, 170, 173 notwithstanding clause, 147, 154, 170 political history, of Bill of Rights debate, pre-HRA, 116, 141–45

Conservative Party, 116, 142–43
Labour position, 119, 144–45, 150
Liberals and Liberal Democrats, 119, 143–44
UK, and, 115, 140–151
unelected judges, ceding power to, 147–51
Binding over, 750, 751
see also Breach of the peace Blasphemy law
domestic approaches to, 491–97
margin of appreciation doctrine, and, 38
Strasbourg stance on, 487–91
Visions of Ecstasy video, 490, 491
BNP (British National Party), 499 Bodily integrity, 74–80
parental rights, 75
physical punishment, 74–75
privacy rights, 76
sexual autonomy, 80–85
state agents, intrusion by, 75
Border controls, 1121–22
Breach of confidence, 876–910, 915–20
see also Confidentiality official secrecy, and, 616–17
personal information, protection, 877, 878
Breach of "privacy", 911–15
Breach of the peace, 751, 752–80 see also Binding over arrest, powers of, 1141–43
bail conditions, 774
contra bono mores power, 751–52
Human Rights Act, impact of, 774–80 immediacy, 754–71
provoking, 771–74
Bringing Rights Home (Green Paper), 291
British Board of Film Classification (BBFC), 551–71
British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC)
see also Television Ofcom regime, and, 520–30
privacy, and, 841–43
Programme Content standards, 521 public authority status, 233, 234, 235, 530
Royal Charter, 519, 521
British National Party (BNP), 499 Broadcasting Complaints Commission (BCC), 839
Broadcasting regulation, 509–50, 839–46
see also Films, Internet, Television
Communications Act 2003, 512–50, 839–46
Ofcom regime, and BBC, 520–30, 841–43 statutory regime, 519–20
Television Without Frontiers Directive, and, 513 content regulation, offence avoidance, 515–19 basic regulatory regime, 518–19
Human Rights Act and the Pro-Life Alliance decision, 268, 276, 280, 530–45 market-based 'deregulation', in UK, 512–15 OFCOM, and see OFCOM political advertising, 209
Pro-Life Alliance decision, 268, 276, 280, 530–45 public authority/private body distinction, 233–35, 530–33 satellite broadcasting, EU-based, 545–49 successful challenges to current regime, 544–45
Buggery, 81–82, 83
Bugging devices, 1056–63
Burden of proof
anti-terrorism legislation, and, 1352–54, 1443
'foreign torture evidence', 1459
official secrecy, and, 605–6 reversed, and presumption of innocence, 1347–54 sex discrimination, indirect, in, 1500
Butler Report (1998), and CPS decision making, 1322

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms 1982, 147, 261, 262, 320, 1266
Canadian Security Intelligence Service, 1018
CAP (British Code of Advertising, Sales Promotion and Direct Marketing) Code, 576, 577
Capital punishment see Death penalty
Care homes, as public authorities, 223–27, 228
Cash for Honours inquiry 2007, 915
Causation
evidence, exclusion of, (PACE), 1275–76
CEHR see Commission for Equality and Human Rights
Censorship
British Board of Film Classification (BBFC), 552–53
films, 262, 550–71
pornography, 305, 456–61
Charges see Criminal charges
Charter '88 Group, 140
Children and young persons child care responsibilities, and sex discrimination, 1489–91 detention of minors, 54, 58
ECHR court jurisdiction case law, 861–65
effect of Human Rights Act, 858–60
pre-HRA inherent jurisdiction, 855–58
juveniles, in criminal proceedings, 854–55
pornographic material, protection from, 548 private hearings, statutory restrictions on identification, 853 reporting restrictions, 392–93 wardship proceedings, 391

Church of England
Parochial Church Councils, and, 220 protection of religious organisations, and, 211–12, 846–47
Civil actions
police malpractice, and, 1303–10
state surveillance, and, 1077–78
Civil liberties, pre-HRA, 124–27 administrative law, outside case law, 125–26 and civil and political rights, 5 civil rights distinguished from, 14–16 democratic process, as guardian of, 116–22
ECHR, influence prior to HRA 1998, 134–37 government secrecy and executive discretion, 117–18 judicial review, pre-HRA, and, 127–33 opposition complicity in curtailing, 118–20 protection, methods of democratic process, 116–22 rules and judicial interpretation, 122–34
residual, 122–24
rules and judicial interpretation, 122–34
Civil rights
civil liberties distinguished from, 14–16 Convention meaning, 61 family rights as, 1341
CJPOA see Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994
Closed circuit television, 1068
CLS (Critical Legal Studies), 9–10
Codes of Practice see PACE codes and Freedom of Information Commission for Equality and Human Rights, 293–95, 1595–1600
advisory role, 1600
aiding claimants, 1598
establishment, 293 judicial review, and, 1598–99 powers, 294
investigatory, 1597–98
as single Commission, 1596–97
Commission for Racial Equality, 1507, 1577–78, 1593–95
Commission of Human Rights see European Commission of Human Rights Committee of Ministers complaints, 32
European Commission, and, 21, 22
Protocol 14 reforms, and, 35
Reports to, 32
role, 25, 26
supervision of Court judgments by, 34–35
Common law
breach of the peace, powers of arrest, and, 1141–43 contempt, pre -1981 domestic provision, 334–37
ECHR, domestic impact on, pre-HRA, 137
Human Rights Act 1998 (s 2), and, 198
Human Rights Act 1998, impact of, 252–56
see also Private life, right to respect for powers of entry and search, 1000
Communications, interception of, 1032–52
in accordance with law, 1043–44
Commissioner, role, 1039–40
court proceedings, raising ECHR issues in, 1047–52
Human Rights Act, impact of, 1042–52
lawful interception, without warrant, 1037–38 legitimate aims, and necessity in democratic society, 1044–46 obligations of oversight bodies, 1047
parliamentary oversight, 1041
primary rights, interference with, 1042
Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (Part I), 1034–41
tribunal system, reform, 1040–41
unauthorised interceptions, 1038–39
use of intercepted material, 1038 warrants for, 1034–37, 1047
Communitarians, 9
Community, concept of, 728
Compensation
liberty and security of person, right to, 59 public authorities, remedies against, 242–47
Competing rights, 13, 943–81
Complaints and security and intelligence services, powers, 1022–24 Complaints, police (against), 1310–21
background, 1310–13
Complaints against the Police (Consultation Paper), 1313
current scheme, 1310–16
disciplinary action, probability of, 1316–18
HRA, and, 1318–21
Police Reform Act 2002, 1313–16
Complaints to European Court of Human Rights fast track procedure, 28 individual applications, 26–27
procedure, 27–35
inter-State applications, 26
Complaints to Ombudsman, 628
Computer misuse and personal information, 923–24

Confessions
evidence, exclusion of, 1278–87
non-confession evidence, 1287–1300
Confidentiality, 876–910, 915–20 see also Breach of confidence breach of privacy, 911–15
confidential official information, emanating from other state, 601 discarding need for confidential relationship, 896–902
Human Rights Act, and, 902–15
surveillance, and, 1064–65
Conservative Party
Bill of Rights debate, and, 116, 142–43, 298
Contempt of court, 316–450 see also Contempt of Court Act 1981; Prejudicing proceedings actus reus see Actus reus, contempt administration of justice, and media freedom, 322–28
European Convention on Human Rights
balance between Arts 6 and 10, 328–30 domestic impact, and HRA, 330–34
'ignorance' defence, 361
impediment or prejudice to legal proceedings, 339–57 journalistic material, seizure of, 440–50
HRA implications, 445–48
Official Secrets Act 1989, 444–45
PACE, 440–42
requirements to provide information, 442–44 jury deliberations, disclosure, 398–408 justice, protection as continuing process, 394–98 media, and see Media: contempt, liability for mens rea, 372, 373, 374, 380, 394
neutralising model, 319 penal legislation, and, freedom from retrospective effect, 67
Phillimore Committee, 337
prior restraints, restricting reports of court proceedings, 383–94 protection of sources, 408–50
Contempt of Court Act 1981, 410–18
Norwich Pharmacol jurisdiction, 410 post-HRA jurisprudence, 419–39 protective model, and, 319 public affairs/public interest, 357–61
publicity, types, 345
real risk of prejudice, 368
'rights of others' exception, 333, 334 scandalising the court, 394, 396 serious prejudice/impediment to justice, publication creating substantial risk, 339–56
Human Rights Act, 350–52, 354–56
Strasbourg stance, 321–30
strict liability, and publications prejudicing proceedings, 319–62, 381 common law, pre -1981, 334–37
Strasbourg stance, on, 321–30
sub judice period, 335, 338
Contempt of Court Act 1981
see also Contempt
'active' proceedings, 338–39
common law, and, 380–81
evaluation of, 381–82
Human Rights Act 1998, and, 330, 331
'ignorance' defence (s 3), 361
public affairs/public interest, 357–61
publications falling within Section 1, 337–38 rebalancing of, 361–62 reform of s 5, 359–61
Section 5 (public affairs discussion prejudicing legal proceedings) interpretation of, 357–61 reform, 359–61
serious prejudice/impediment to justice, publication creating substantial risk, 339–56
HRA reform, case law, 354–56 key factors, in determining, 341–50 post-HRA era, use of s 2(2), 350–52 threshold created by s 2(2) test, 352–54 sources, protection of (s 10), 410–18
Contra bono mores power
freedom of protest and assembly, 751–52
statutory indecency, 480
Control orders, 1438–68
derogating, 1441–42
Human Rights Act, impact of, 1460–62
non-derogating, 1442 court supervision, 1445–51 incompatibility with Art 5, 1451–54 scheme, 1440–43
Convention rights, 45–50
see also European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) anti-terrorism law, and, domestic interpretation of, 1338–39 compatibility of new Bills with, 206–11 destruction of (Art 17), 112 discrimination, prohibition of (Art 14), 108–9 see also Anti-discrimination law; Discrimination fair hearing, right to (Art 6) see Fair trials family life, right to respect for, 87–89
see also Private life, right to respect for freedom of assembly (Art 11) see Freedom of protest and assembly freedom of association (Art 11) see Freedom of protest and assembly freedom of expression (Art 10) see Freedom of expression freedom of thought, conscience and religion (Art 9), 91 groups, claiming, 18–19 inhuman or degrading treatment, freedom from (Art 3), 45–50 liberty and security of person, right to (Art 5), 51–59 life, right to (Art 2), 39–45 marriage and founding of families, right to (Art 12), 102–4 privacy, right to respect for (Art 8) see Private life, right to respect for retrospective penal legislation, freedom from (Art 7), 66–69 Corporal punishment bodily integrity, interference with, 74–75

Correspondence
prisoners', 90–91
Council of Europe
Committee of Ministers, and, 25
European Convention drafted by, 17
Parliamentary Assembly, 20
Counter-terrorism
see also Terrorism; Terrorism Act 2000; Terrorist suspects arrest, powers of, 1146–49
Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998, 1366–68
human rights and counter-terrorist sanctions, 1329–31
pre-2000 temporary counter-terrorism legislation, 1365–66 reactive to proactive strategy, 1331–33
stop and search, 1117–22
symbolic effect of counter-terrorism provision, 1333–34 Terrorism Acts, 1363–1421
Court of Human Rights see European Court of Human Rights
CPS (Crown Prosecution Service)
police, prosecution of, 1322
CRA (Constitutional Reform Act) 2005 judiciary, reform, 257
Crime control
due process, and, 1101–2
evidence, exclusion of, 1301–3
'reliability' principle, 1267 Criminal cases and the ECHR cross-examination, 66
innocence, presumption of, 64–65
'regulatory' offences, 61 time, facilities and legal representation, 65–66
Criminal charge, Convention meaning of, 60, 1339–42
Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 (CJPOA) Human Rights Act, impact on, 743–50
trespass
s 69 directions, and, 741–43
Criminal proceedings
see also Criminal charge, Due process juveniles in, reporting restrictions, 854–55
surveillance, and, 1075–77
web-based pornography, and, 582–87
Critical Legal Studies (CLS), 9–10
Cross-examination, and right to a fair hearing under ECHR, 66
see also Fair trials/hearings
Crown Prosecution Service (CPS)
police, prosecution of, 1322
Custody see Detention

Damages
Court of Human Rights on, 242, 243, 246
non-pecuniary damage, 245
Human Rights Act, under, 242–47
police malpractice, and, 1305–6
"privacy" breach - sanctions, 982–83
Data protection
Computer Misuse Act 1990, 923–24 control over personal information, 921–22, 927–30 data controllers, obligations, 929–30
Data Protection Act 1998 (DPA), 926–37
background/context, 921–24
Human Rights Act 1998, and, 936–37
manually held personal information prior to, 924–26 media, use against, 933–35
regime created by, 922–23
Data Protection Commissioner, 935–36
Data Protection Principles, 928–29 data subjects, 922
data users, 922, 923
manually held personal information, prior to DPA 1998, 924–26 media, impact on, 930–35
conditions, 931–32
DPA, use against media, 933–35
enforcement, 935–36
HRA and DPA, 936–37
media exemptions, 932–33
obligations of data controllers, 929–30 personal data, defined, 927 regime created by DPA 1984, 922–33

Data Protection Act 1998 (DPA), 926–29
see also Data protection
background/context, 921–24
Human Rights Act 1998, and, 936–37
manually held personal information prior to, 924–26
media, use against, 933–35
regime created by, 922–23
Data Protection Registry, 923
D (Defence) notice system, 624
Deception
evidence, exclusion, and, 1295–99
Declarations of incompatibility
under Human Rights Act 1998 (s 4), 199–204, 214 Defamation malicious falsehood, 873–74
Deference
Human Rights Act, under, 265–91
media regulation, and, 849–51 Democracy civil liberties, democratic process as guardian of, 116–22 justice, non-arbitrary nature, and, 317 margin of appreciation, and, 38
"necessity in democratic society", 72, 94, 1044–46 origins of rights, and, 7 participation in, and freedom of expression, 303–5 peaceful assemblies, and, 666
Demonstrations in vicinity of Parliament, 730–33
see also Public protest
Department of Constitutional Affairs
Human Rights Division, 215
Review of the Implementation of the Human Rights Act, 162 Deportation detention of deportees, 55
terrorist suspects, 1358–61
Derogating control orders, 1442–43 detention without trial (anti-terrorism), and, 1424–26 role of court in making, 1444
Derogations, 1424–26
Detention aliens, of, 55 conditions of, 75–76
consensual detainment, 1161–62 conviction, following, 53
deportees, of, 55 discretionary life sentences, and, 58 following arrest under ECHR, 54 to fulfil an obligation, 53 indefinite, without trial anti-terrorism legislation, 1362–63 minors, 54, 58
non-criminals, for protection of society, 55 policy custody, in see Police custody, detention in position of detainees, 48 review of, 58–59
Dicey, AV, on civil liberties, 122–23, 124, 158
freedom of expression, and, 313
Human Rights Act 1998, and, 160
Direct action and domestic application of Arts 10 and 11, 696–98
Direct discrimination, 1526–38
disability discrimination, 1536–37
racial discrimination, 1535–36
sex discrimination, 1527–34
gender reassignment, 1534
marital status, 1534
maternity/child care grounds, 1529–34
proving direct discrimination, 1528
sexual orientation, 1537–38
Directorate of Judicial Offices for England and Wales (DJO), 258 Disability discrimination
direct, 1536–37
Disability Discrimination Commission, 1593 disability-related, 1547–50 duty to make reasonable adjustment employment, 1550–53
goods and services provision, 1553–54
education, 1554–55
field of application, 1512–13
indirect, 1547–55
medical model, 1511–12
Disciplinary action criminal law, and, 60
police malpractice, and, 1310–21
HRA, and, 1318–21
probability of action following complaint, 1316–18 stop and search powers, and, 1139
Discrimination
see also Anti-discrimination law; Disability discrimination; Equal pay; Positive discrimination; Racial discrimination; Sex discrimination; Sexual orientation discrimination
direct, 1526–38
maternity/child care grounds, 1529–34
proving, 1528
racial discrimination, 1535–36
sex discrimination, 1527–34
disability see Disability discrimination harassment as, 1556–58

indirect
disability discrimination, 1547–55
racial discrimination, 1544–47
sex discrimination, 1538–44
sexual orientation, 1555–56
lawful, 1567–72
positive action see Positive discrimination prohibition of, as primary right, 108–9 racial see Racial discrimination religious, 507
remedies for, 1588–90
sex see Sex discrimination sexual orientation see Sexual orientation: discrimination on grounds of stop and search powers, and, 1124–26 suicide, and, 78
terrorism, and, 1363
unjustifiable, 109
victimisation, 1563–67
DJO (Directorate of Judicial Offices for England and Wales), 258
Double effect doctrine, and murder, 77
DPA (Data Protection Act) 1998 see Data Protection Act 1998 (DPA)
Drittwirkung phenomenon, 29
Due process, 51–56, 1083–90, 1339–54; see also fair trials/hearings crime control, and, 1101–2
evidence, exclusion of, 1301–3
Dworkin, Ronald nature of rights, 5, 7, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15 on pornography, 455, 457

Ecclesiastical courts, and blasphemous libel, 484
ECHR (European Convention of Human Rights) see European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) Education discrimination see also Racial discrimination; Sex discrimination disability, 1554–55
sexual orientation, 1523–24
Effective remedies, right to, 106–8
Egalitarianism, and utilitarianism, 7
Emergencies
see also Derogations anti-terrorist laws, 1370
arrest, promptly informing of reason for, 56–57
margin of appreciation doctrine, and, 36, 37
restriction of rights and freedoms, 110–11
Employment discrimination, 1553–54 see also Equal pay
disability, 1550–53
sex discrimination, 1495–96
sexual orientation
Employment Equality (Sexual Orientation) Regulations 2003, 1522–23
unfair dismissal, pre-2003 provision, 1521–22
Enforcement of FoI legislation applying for information, and time limits, 651–53 appeals, 653
basic mechanism, 651–53
Entrapment/deception
evidence, exclusion of, 1295–99
Equal Opportunities Commission, 1507, 1593–1600
Equal pay
Bilka test, 1498, 1503, 1549
comparator, choice of, 1494–95
Equal Pay Amendment Regulations, 174 market forces argument, 1498, 1499
'material factor' defence, 1497–1502
'same employment', 1495–96
sex discrimination, 1493–1503
term by term approach, 1496
Equalities Review Interim Report, 1493 Equality
see also Discrimination
anti-discrimination laws, and, 1469–75 formal and substantive, sex discrimination, 1488–89 phases, of, 1471–73
Equal treatment see Discrimination; Equal Pay Equal Treatment Directive, and Sex Discrimination Act, 1515
EU (European Union)
see also Council of Europe; ECHR (European Commission of Human Rights); Social Charter 1961 discrimination law, 1479–81 Fundamental Rights Agency, 1481 influence of law, 138–40 satellite television, 545–49
sexual orientation discrimination, provisions against, 1515 women, affirmative action favouring, 1579–85 European Commission of Human Rights admissibility, role in, 23, 24
European Court compared, 24–25 see also European Court of Human Rights origins of, 21–22
previous role, 22–23
European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment 1987, 45, 1360

European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), 17–114
- see also Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA)
- anti-discrimination law, 1482–86
- Bill of Rights debate, 140
- binding nature of rights, 215–16
- breach of rights, as 'constitutional tort', 238
- children and young persons, reporting restrictions
  - case law, 861–65
  - effect of Human Rights Act, 858–60
  - pre-HRA inherent jurisdiction, 855–58
- choice of rights, under HRA, 165–66
- communications, interception, and, 1047–52
- compatibility of new Bills with, 206–11
- complaints, individual applications, 27
- contempt, publications prejudicing proceedings
  - balance between Arts 6 and 10, 328–30
  - domestic impact of Convention, on, 330–34
- criticisms of, 167–68
- declarations as to compatibility of new Bills with, 206–11
- declarations of incompatibility, 199–204, 214
- deficiencies and limitations, 166–69
- destruction of Convention rights, 112
- domestic impact
  - HRA, and, 330–34
  - prior to HRA, 136–37
- enforcement machinery, 21
- evaluation, 112–14
- freedom of expression and information, 625–26
  - see also Freedom of information
  - domestic application of Art 10, 690–701
- freedom of protest and assembly
  - domestic application of Art 11, 690–701
  - public protest, right to make, 681–83
- international level, impact at, 159
- margin of appreciation doctrine, 36–39
- Member States, change in laws and practices, 113
- origins of, 17
- possible models for protection of, 152–56
- primary rights, additional guarantees, 106–9
- Protocols, 19, 104–6
  - Art 2, 105
  - Art 3, 105–6
  - Protocol 14 reforms, 35
- public authorities
  - and binding effect of rights against, 215–16
  - invoking rights against, 235–37
- Public Order Act 1986 (ss 12–14A), and, 724–26
- public protest, right to make
  - freedom of assembly (Art 11), 681–83
  - protest as expression (Art 10), 684–85
- security and intelligence services, powers, 1025–30
- statements of compatibility, 207
- stop and search powers
  - Article 13, and, 1134
  - Article 5, and, 1131–34
- substantive rights and freedoms see Convention rights
- supervisory procedure, 20–39
- and torture, freedom from (Art 3) see Torture

European Court of Human Rights, 23–25
- abortion, and, 80
- blasphemy, stance on, 487–91
- case load, 35
- Chambers, 25, 28, 33
- complaints see Complaints
- Court Registry, 28
- damages awards, 242, 243, 246
  - non-pecuniary damage, 245
- explicit expression, stance on, 462
- friendly settlements, 18, 24
  - examination of complaint applications, 31–32
- impact of jurisprudence, 19–20
- individual applications see Individual applications
- judgments, 32–34
  - supervision by Committee of Ministers, 34–35
- legal status of jurisprudence, 192–96
- margin of appreciation doctrine, 36–39, 113, 332
- membership terms, 24
- obscene publications and protection of morals, stance on, 467–68, 475
- origins of, 21
- personal information, protection, stance on, 813–24
- persuasive/consensus-based approach, 18
- purpose of Convention, 278
- restitutio in integrum principle, 245
- speech and privacy claims, balancing (HRA), stance on, 943–50
- supervisory procedure of Convention, 23–25
- on 'victims', stance, 235, 236

European Social Charter 1961, 19

Euthanasia, and right to life, 76–77

Evidence
- confessions, excluding, 1278–87
- exclusion see Evidence, exclusion
- identification, 1288
- torture, obtained by, 1454–62

admissibility of, 1455–59
burden of proof, 1459–60
Evidence, exclusion of abuse of process, 1266–67
causation, 1275–76
common law discretion, 1300 common law jurisdictions, other, 1265–66
confessions, 1278–87
conflicting values, 1262–65
crime control, 1301–3
domestic stance, 1267–69
due process, and, 1301–3
entrapment/deception, 1295–99
'fairness' test, 1277–99
identification evidence, 1288
Latif test, 1266
mentally handicapped defendants, 1300–1301
non-confession evidence, 1287–1300
'oppression' test (PACE), 1269–73
Police and Criminal Evidence Act (PACE) 1984
causation, 1275–76
'fairness' test, 1277–99
'oppression' test, 1269–73
'reliability' test, 1267, 1269, 1273–75
police malpractice, and, 1262–1303
'reliability' test (PACE), 1267, 1269, 1273–75 search products, and, 1138–39
Exhaustion of remedies, complaints under ECHR, 30–31
Expulsion see Deportation

Fair trials/hearings access to a court, 62–63
Convention rights, 59–66
criminal justice system, proceedings outside closed material, procedure for use, 1343–45 field of application of Art 6, 1339–42
'public' hearing, 1345–46
special advocate, use, 1343–45
third party, material obtained by Art 3 treatment, 1346–47
cross-examination, 66
field of application of Art 6, 60–61, 1339–42
freedom of expression, and, 362 hearing within reasonable time, 63–64 implied rights under Art 6, 64 independent and impartial tribunal, 63, 323 innocence, presumption of in criminal cases, 64–65
see also Burden of proof meaning of 'fair hearing' under Art 6, 64 police malpractice, and, 1259
public hearings, 383
reporting restrictions, and, 852 time, facilities and legal representation, in criminal cases under Art 6, 65–66 Family life, right to respect for see also Private life, right to respect for concept of family life, 87–89 home, respect for, 89–90
Fast track procedure under s 10 HRA amendments to legislation, 205
complaints, 28
declarations of incompatibility, 202
Fawcett Society, 260
Feminism, and pornography, 456–61
Films, 550–87
age restrictions, 553–60
British Board of Film Classification (BBFC), 551–71
censorship, 262, 550–71
classification and censorship systems, 552–53
Human Rights Act, impact, 566–70 pornographic see Pornography theatrical release, 560–62
Videoworks, statutory regulation, 562–66
Flexible working, 1489–91
Force, use of arrest, powers of, 1162–63
life, right to, 43–44
stop and search, 1128–29
Forced labour, freedom from, 50–51
Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Legal Advisers Department, 24
Forfeiture, obscene material, 474–75
Franks Committee, official secrecy, 595
Freedom of assembly see Freedom of protest and assembly Freedom of association
see also Freedom of protest and assembly
anti-terrorism legislation, and, 1354–58
Convention rights, and, 97–102
ILO Committee, 37
non-union associations, 97–98
trade unions, 98–102
Freedom of expression, 92–96, 299–315
anti-terrorism law, and, 1354–58 democracy, participation in, 303–5 domestic application of Art 10, 690–701
activism, 695–96
direct action, 696–98
minimalism, 690–95
positive obligations, 699–700
procedural problems, 700–701
efficacy of speech, 318 fair trial rights, and, 362

free speech protection, practical implications, 311–15 information, receiving/imparting, 93 justifications for, 300–311 recognition in Strasbourg and UK jurisprudence, 309–11 market freedom, and, 308–9 moral autonomy, and, 301–2 neutrality of content, 307 primary right, scope of, 92–94 protest as expression, 684–85 restrictions on blasphemy see Blasphemy broadcasting see Broadcasting regulation contempt, and restraining freedom of expression see Contempt content and form-based interferences, 306–8 defamation see Defamation exceptions under Art 10, 94–96 market freedom and creative freedom, 308–9
offensiveness see Offensive material
US model, 308, 309
self-fulfilment, and, 305–6
speech and privacy claims, balancing (HRA)
developing jurisprudence on clashing rights, 943–50
domestic approaches, 950–81
examples of outcomes, 970–81
factors weighing on either side of balance, 968–70
free speech theories, and privacy, 939–43
mutually supporting guarantees, Articles 8 and 10 as, 960–62
parallel analysis or 'ultimate balancing act', 958–59 underlying rationales of Articles, values, 965–68 truth, and, 302–3 utilitarianism, and, 8
Freedom of information
see also Official secrecy
applying for information, and time limits, 650–53 enforcement mechanism, 651–53
Commissioner's decision, ministerial veto, 654–54
Freedom of Information Act 2000, 630–57 exemptions under, 634–50
fundamentals of freedom of information, 631–50 proposals to restrict use of, 655–57 rights granted by, 634 rights prior to, 626–28 scope of, 632–33
government secrecy and executive discretion, 117 principles, and ECHR Art 10, 625–26 publication schemes, 654
Public Records Acts, 629
Freedom of protest and assembly, 659–802
see also Freedom of association
affray, 799–800
anti-terrorism law, and, 1354–58
assemblies
banning orders, 709–20
Convention rights, and, 96–97 banning orders
assemblies, 709–20
Jones & Lloyd v DPP, 711–20
marches, 707–9
binding over, 750, 751
breach of the peace see Breach of the peace Convention rights, and, 96–102
demonstrations in vicinity of Parliament, 730–33
direct action, 666, 667
domestic application of Art 11
activism, 695–96
direct action, 696–98
minimalism, 690–95
positive obligations, 699–700
procedural problems, 700–701
forms of protest, 666–67 highway obstruction see Highway obstruction justifications for interferences with primary rights, 685–89 legal responses to protest, 668–80 meetings and marches, legal regulation see Marches; Meetings physical obstruction or interference, 667 private premises, meetings on, 675–77 public disorder see Public disorder and anti-social behaviour, criminalising public order law development of, 668–72 nature, of, 672–75
public protest, rights to make under ECHR, 680–90
freedom of assembly (Art 11), 681–83
protest as expression (Art 10), 684–85 rights to assemble and to protest, 678–701 riots, 667–68, 799–800 traditional legal recognition of freedom of assembly, 678–80 trespass see Trespass underlying justifications, 663–68
violent disorder, 799–800
Freedom of religion see Religion

Gagging injunctions and writs, 335, 619
Gender reassignment see Transsexuals
Glorification of terrorism, 1415–21
Griffiths, John, 259 Guarantees of:
 fair trials, 60
 mutually supporting, Arts 8 and 10 as, 960–62
Gypsies, and respect for home, 89–90

Hague, William, 143
Harassment
 civil liability, and, 870–71 discrimination, as, 1556–58
 free standing claims, on protected grounds, 1558–63 new privacy tort, and, 870–73 offences and civil liability, 870–71
 press intrusion, 871
  press intrusion, use against, 871 Protection from Harassment Act 1997 publication of information causing distress, 871–72
  similar offences, 872 publication of information causing distress, as, 871–72 public disorder and anti-social behaviour, criminalising, 787–95
Hate speech see Racial hatred, incitement to; Religious hatred Hattersley, Roy, 144, 145
Hearings
 see also Fair trials/hearings fair see Fair trials promptness, 57–58
 within reasonable time, 63–64
Her Majesty's pleasure, detention of young offenders at, 58
Highway obstruction, 734–37
 Human Rights Act, impact, on, 735–37
 interpretation prior to Human Rights Act, 734–35
Hohfield, Wesley,14–16
Holocaust, 306
Home, respect for, 89–90
Home Office Affairs Committee, police prosecution, 1321
Home Office circulars (PACE), 1108–9
Homosexuals see Sexual orientation
Horizontal effect
 see also Private life, right to respect for
 direct, 255
 Human Rights Act 1998, 250–56, 911–15
 indirect, 251–56, 911–15
 private life, right to respect for, 815, 824–28
House of Lords civil liberties, and, protection of, 120–21
Housing, sexual orientation discrimination in, 190, 1524–26
Howard, Michael, 119, 120
HRA (Human Rights Act) 1998 see Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA)
HRU (Human Rights Unit), 215
Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA), 157–298, 1062 activism, under, 278–91 anti-discrimination law, and, 1482–86 blasphemy, domestic approach, 491–97 breach of the peace, and, 774–80 choice of rights, under, 165–69 common law, and s 2, 198
 common law, and, 251–56, 911–15
 communications, interception, and, 1042–52
 contempt
  ECHR, and, 330–34
  post-HRA jurisprudence on, 419–39 control orders, and, 1448–54, 1460–62
 Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, impact on, 743–50 data protection, and, 936–37 discretionary areas of judgment, deference and proportionality, 265–91 domestic precedents, ECHR conflict with, 197
 European Convention on Human Rights see also European Convention of Human Rights contempt, and, 330–34
  deficiencies and limitations of, 166–69 influence prior to HRA 1998, 134–37 film regulation, and, 566–70 flaws in post-HRA judicial reasoning, 429–39
 horizontal effect, 250–56, 911–15
 incompatibility, declarations of (s 4), 199–204, 214 interpretative obligation (section 3), 169, 171–91 compatibility issues, 185, 186 current approach, 183–86 effect of s 2, 191–99 resource allocation issues, 185 social policy issues, 185 subject-matter of provision, 185 techniques adopted, 174–83 journalistic material, seizure, and, 445–48 judges, role under, 192–96 jurisprudence, legal status, and role of judges, 192–96

media
  protecting, 212–13
  regulation, and, 846–51
minimalist approach, 196, 269–78
new Bills, declarations as to compatibility with Convention rights, 206–11 Northern Ireland Assembly, and, 213 obscene publications, and protection of morals, and, 475–76 offensive material, and protection of morals exceptions indecency, 480–84
  obscene publications, 475–76
personal information, 813–30, 911–15
  'horizontal effect' of Art 8, 824–28
  Strasbourg jurisprudence, 813–24, 829–30
police malpractice, and complaints and disciplinary action, 1318–21 prosecution of police, 1322
  tortious liability, 1306–9 powers of entry and search, and, 1007–10 prejudicing proceedings, and serious prejudice/impediment to justice, publication creating substantial risk, 350–52, 354–56 primary and secondary legislation, meaning, 199
private bodies, 249–50
Pro-Life Alliance decision, and broadcasting regulation, 268, 276, 280, 530–45
public authorities, 215–49
  Convention rights against, invoking, 235–37 private bodies, and, 216–18
Public Order Act 1986 (ss 12–14A), and
  ECHR jurisprudence, 724–26
  HRA mechanisms, 720–24
  radical approach, 726–30
racial hatred, incitement to, and, 500–501 religious organisations, protecting, 211–12 remedial process (s 10), 204–6
reporting restrictions, and, 865–66
Review of the Implementation of the Human Rights Act (Department of Constitutional Affairs), 162 rights protected under, 165–66 riots, violent disorder and affray, 800 Scottish Parliament, and, 213 scrutiny of workings of, 291–95 security and intelligence services, powers, and, 1024–32 sexual orientation, discrimination on grounds of, and, 1518–21 single tribunal under RIPA, and, 1086–90 speech and privacy claims, balancing, under developing jurisprudence on clashing rights, 943–50
    domestic approaches, 950–81
    examples of outcomes, 970–81
    factors weighing on either side of balance, 968–70
    free speech theories, and privacy, 939–43
    mutually supporting guarantees, Articles 8 and 10 as, 960–62
    parallel analysis or 'ultimate balancing act', 958–59
    underlying rationales of Articles, values, 965–68 surveillance by state, and see Surveillance Welsh Assembly, and, 213
Human Rights Commission see European Commission of Human Rights
Human Rights Convention see European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR)
Human Rights Unit (HRU), 215
Hunt, Murray, 292
Hurd, Douglas, 595–96
Hutton Report, and BBC Charter, 521

ICRA (Internet Content Rating Association), 581
Identification evidence, 1288
ILO (International Labour Organisation)
  Committee on Freedom of Association, 37
Immunities, as rights, 15
  see also Public interest immunity Impartiality
  see also Bias defined, 321
  independent and impartial tribunal, need for, 63
Incompatibility, declarations of Human Rights Act 1998 (s 4), 199–204, 214
Indecency
  common law offences, 481–84
  meaning of, 476–77
  sexual behaviour, 82–83
  statutory, 476
    HRA and protection of morals exception, 480–84
Independent and impartial tribunal, fair trials, 63, 323
  see also Fair trials/hearings
Independent Police Complaints Commission (IPCC), 1314, 1315, 1317, 1318
Indirect discrimination, 1490, 1538–56 definition, statutory, 1538–43
  disability discrimination, 1547–55
  racial discrimination, 1544–47

sex discrimination, 1538–44
work/life balance, 1543–44
sexual orientation, 1555–56
Individual applications to ECHR see also Complaints
admissibility of, determination, 28–35
Court, judgment of, 19, 32–34 examination of, and friendly settlement, 31–32 increase in numbers of, 20 pre-complaints procedure, 27–28
procedure, 27–35
registration of, 28
Informational autonomy moral, 301–2, 455
sexual, 80–85
Inhuman or degrading treatment, freedom from, 45–50, 1174–81
see also Torture anti-terrorism legislation, and Article 3 treatment deporting suspects facing potential Art 3 treatment abroad, 1358–61
indefinite detention without trial, 1362–63
third party material, obtained by, 1346–47
bodily integrity, interference with, 75
Convention rights, and, 45–50
'degrading treatment', 47 exceptions, lack of, 46
Soering principle, 49, 50
State responsibility for, 46 violation of Art 3, 48, 49
Injunctions
ex parte and inter partes, 618
gagging, 619
interim, 374, 375, 983–90
media, impact on, 212–13
privacy sanctions, 983–90
Innocence, presumption of see Presumption of innocence
Integrity see Bodily integrity and autonomy Intelligence and Security Committee, 1011, 1014–15
Intelligence services see Security and intelligence services Interception of communications, 1032–52 see also Telephone tapping in accordance with law, 1043–44
Commissioner, role, 1039–40
court proceedings, raising ECHR issues in, 1047–52
Human Rights Act, impact of, 1042–52
lawful interception, without warrant, 1037–38
legitimate aims, and necessity in democratic society, 1044–46 obligations of oversight bodies, 1047
parliamentary oversight, 1041
primary rights, interference with, 1042
Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (Part I), 1034–41
tribunal system, reform, 1040–41
unauthorised interceptions, 1038–39
use of intercepted material, 1038
warrants for, 1034–37, 1047
International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights
Article 3, 1359
European Convention, and, 17, 21
religious hatred, 501
International Convenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 19 International Labour Organisation see ILO (International Labour Organisation) Internet, 571–87
criminal law, applying to web-based material, 582–87 regulation, 574–78
voluntary, 578–82
Internet Content Rating Association (ICRA), 581
Internet Service Provider Associations (ISPAs), 578
Interpretation see Statutory interpretation
Inter-State applications, complaints, 26
Interviews see Police questioning
IPCC (Independent Police Complaints Commission), 1314, 1315, 1317, 1318
IRA (Irish Republican Army), 1366
Iraq war, Britain's entry into, 672 Islam
blasphemy, 487
racial hatred, 499
religious hatred, 506, 508
ISPAs (Internet Service Provider Associations), 578

JAC (Judicial Appointments Commission)
judiciary, reform, 257, 258
JACO (Judicial Appointments and Conduct Ombudsman), 258
JCHR (Joint Parliamentary Committee on Human Rights), 292, 293 see also Joint Committee on Human Rights
Jenkins, Roy, 144
Joint Committee on Human Rights
Article 3, stance on, 1359
Protocol 14 reforms, 35
Protocols, ratification, 19 public authorities, stance on, 232 terrorist offences, stance on, 1419
Journalistic material, seizure of, 440–50

HRA implications, and, 445–48
Official Secrets Act 1989, 444–45
PACE (Police and Criminal Evidence Act) 1984, 440–42
Production Orders, terrorism legislation, 442–44
Judges
see also Judiciary
judcial supremacism controversy, 260 male, 260
power of, 190
role, 192–96
under HRA, 265–91
unelected, 147–51
Judgments of European Court of Human Rights Committee of Ministers, supervision by, 34–35 discretionary areas of judgment, HRA, and, 265–91 individual applications, complaints, 32–34
Judicial Appointments and Conduct Ombudsman (JACO), 258 Judicial Appointments Commission (JAC) judiciary, reform, 257, 258
Judicial review
civil liberties, protection, and, 127–33
Commission for Equality and Human Rights, and, 1598–99
POAC decisions, 1399–1405 stop and search, and, 1134–37 surveillance, and, 1079–80
Judiciary
see also Judges; Statutory interpretation Canada, lessons from, 261–63 composition and independence, reform, 257–61 free speech, threats to, stance, 303–4
Human Rights Act, stance in adjudicating, 256–91 interpretative obligation, 191 margin of appreciation, domestic approaches to, 263–65 rights-based reasoning, readiness to use, 151–52 sex discrimination, and, 261
unelected judges, and Bill of Rights debate, 147–51
Juries, disclosure of deliberations, 398–408
Jurisdiction
Norwich Pharmacol, 410 reporting restrictions, children, 855–65 single tribunal, and, 1081–82

Kurdistan Workers' Party, 1336, 1402

Labour Party
Bill of Rights debate, and, 119, 144–45, 150
Lashkar e Tayabah (LeT), 1402
Law Commission on blasphemous and seditious libel, 486 on privacy invasions, 809
Laws, Sir John, 129–32, 267
Legal advice
access to see Access to legal advice improving scheme, 1228–34
relying on, in remaining silent, 1243–54
Legal positivism, 8, 10
Legal privilege, material covered by, 1002–3
Legal representation
see also Access to legal advice; Solicitors Legislation Against Terrorism, see terrorism Libel
see also Defamation; Seditious libel blasphemous and seditious, 484–87 writ for, 335
Liberals and Liberal Democrats
Bill of Rights debate, and, 119, 143–44
Liberty and security of person, right to, 51–59
see also Arrest arrest, promptly informing reason for, 56–57 compensation, and, 59 detention see Detention; Police custody, detention in judicial hearing, promptness, 57–58 safeguards, 55–56
Liberty (pressure group), 168, 232
Life, right to, 39–45
abortion, 80, 285
'absolutely necessary' test, 44, 45 euthanasia, 76–77
exceptions, 43–45 scope of right, 40–43 suicide, 76, 78–79, 80
Locke, John, 6

MacPherson Report
police malpractice, 1316
public interest, 641
racial discrimination, 1510
stop and search, 1112
Make Poverty History (pressure group), 209
Malicious falsehood, 873–74
Manifesto for Human Rights (manifesto), 168
Marches, 701–33
see also Meetings and marches, legal regulation assemblies, 709–20
banning orders, 707–9 conditions, imposing on, 704–7
Public Order Act 1986, 704–7
Human Rights Act, impact, and, 720–30

processions, advance notice of, 702–4 triggers for imposing conditions on, 704
Margin of appreciation doctrine, 36–39, 262 arrest, promptly informing of reason for, and, 56 blasphemy, and, 491 common standards, notion, 38
domestic approaches to, 263–65
emergencies, 36, 37
European Convention on Human Rights, and, 36–39, 113
European Court of Human Rights, and, 36, 113, 332 judiciary, stance on, 257
minimalist approach under HRA, 270 penal legislation, freedom from retrospective effect, and, 68 proportionality, and, 69 proscription orders, and, 548
protests, and, 686
Protocols to Convention, and, 104 sexual autonomy, and, 82, 84
Marital status, sex discrimination, 1534
Market freedom and freedom of expression, 308–9
Marriage and founding of families, right to (Art 12), 102–4
transsexuals, 87
Marxism, 9
'Material factor' defence, equal pay, 1497–1502
Media
see also Broadcasting; Journalists; Prejudicing proceedings; Press; Reporting restrictions American Cyanamid case, implications, 378 contempt, liability for, 319 see also Contempt; Contempt of Court Act 1981; Prejudicing proceedings court order, frustrating, 368–69 data protection, impact on, 930–35 conditions, 931–32
enforcement, 935–36
HRA and DPA, 936–37
legislation, 933–35
media exemptions, 932–33
freedom of, and administration of justice, 322–28
'balancing of competing interests', 327
protecting, 212–13
regulation, and HRA
deference, 849–51
ECHR rights, impact, 847–49
PCC, marginalisation, 846–47
Meetings
see also Assemblies conditions, imposed on, 704–7
Human Rights Act, impact of, 720–30
legal regulation, 701–33
offences, proscription-related, 1392–96
on private premises, 675–77 processions, advance notice, 702–4 triggers for imposing conditions on, 704
Mens rea
see also Burden of proof burden of proof, reversed presumption of innocence, 1347
contempt, 372, 373, 374, 380, 394
official secrecy, 603, 604, 614
public disorder and anti-social behaviour, relevance, 787 Mentally handicapped defendants evidence, exclusion of, 1300–1301 medical evidence, 55
MI5, MI6, 118
see also Security and Intelligence services functions, 1013
Mill, John Stuart, 8, 302
Minimalism in judicial reasoning
domestic application of Arts 10 and 11, 690–95
Human Rights Act, under, 269–78
Minority rights, 7
Moral autonomy, and freedom of expression, 301–2
Moral rights, legal rights distinguished, 10–11 Morals, protection of statutory indecency, 480–84
statutory obscenity, 475–76

National security
see also Counter-terrorism; Security and intelligence services detention of non-criminals for protection of society, 55
margin of appreciation, and, 37
Natural law, 10–11
Natural rights, 8
New Charter (pamphlet), 142
Newspapers see Press
New Zealand
Bill of Rights, 170, 173
rule of construction, under, 174
Nilsen, Denis, 162
9/11 Attacks see September 11 attacks
Non Departmental Public Body (NDPB), 257
Northern Ireland
Art 5, applicability to, 57
Assembly, and Human Rights Act, 213
British Irish Agreement reached in the multi-party negotiations 1998, 1366, 1368 Continuity IRA, 1366 homosexual activity, in, 81–82

Omagh bombing 1998, 1366
Orange Parades in, 663
Real IRA, 1366
Norwich Pharmacol jurisdiction
sources, protection of, 410
Notes for Guidance (PACE), 1108
Notwithstanding clause, Bill of Rights debate, 147, 154, 170
Nozick, Robert, 6
Nuremberg trials, and natural law, 10

Obscene publications
common law offence, 481–84
forfeiture proceedings, 474–75 freedom of expression, restrictions/exceptions under Art 10, 94–95, 464–68 mailing of, 479
public good defence, 472–74
statutory obscenity, 468–72
'deprave and corrupt' test, 470–73, 526
HRA and protection of morals exception, 464–68, 475–76
OFCOM, 519–30, 831, 840–49
BBC, and, 520–30, 840–43
Broadcasting Code, 521, 524–30 privacy regime, 840–44
Code, 844–46
Offensive material
broadcasting regulation, 522–24 forfeiture proceedings, for obscence material, 474–75
indecency
common law offence, 481–84
meaning of, 476–77
statutory, 476, 480–84
legal responses to explicit expression, 461–84
obscene publications, 468–72
common law offence, 481–84
'deprave and corrupt' test, 470–73, 526
pornography, 453–61
conservative position, 454 liberal position, 455–56
pro-censorship feminist position, 456–61
public displays of, 476
public good defence, 472–74
specific offences, variety of, 477–80
statutory obscenity
HRA and protection of morals exception, 475–76
Strasbourg stance on, 463–67
applying Strasbourg jurisprudence under HRA, 467–68
Official secrecy, 590–658, 637
see also Freedom of information; Public interest immunity breach of confidence, 616–17
Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, 645 confidential information, emanating from other State, 601 exemptions from FoI, statutory categories, 637
class, 639–41
expiry of certain, 649–50
harm-based, 647–50
public interest test, not subject to, 647–48
Franks Committee, 595 harm-based exemptions under FoI not subject to public interest test, 647–48 subject to public interest test, 648–49 harm test under FoI, 603, 605, 610, 613, 637
'interests of State', 594 international relations, 601 journalistic material, seizure, 444–45
Katharine Gunn affair 2003, 615–16
MacPherson Report, 641
Official Secrets Act 1911, 592–95
Official Secrets Act 1989, 595–616 criminal liability for disclosing information, 596–605 defences, 605–12
journalistic material, seizure, 444–45
Shayler litigation, 597, 606–16
public interest under FoI, 638 class exemptions not subject to, 638–41, 639–41 class exemptions subject to, 641–47
definitions, 638
harm-based exemptions not subject to, 647–48
harm-based exemptions subject to, 648–49
Scott Report, 593
Shayler litigation, 597, 606–16
Spycatcher litigation, 618–24
see also Spycatcher litigation case law subsequent to, 623–24
telephone tapping, 594–95
Ombudsman see Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration
On Liberty (J S Mill), 302
Open justice principle, 316–30 prohibiting reporting of information, 390–94
public hearings, 383
Oppression test
evidence, exclusion of, 1269–73

PACE (Police and Criminal Evidence Act) 1984 see Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE)
Paramountcy principle, reporting restrictions, and, 855–61

Parental Leave Directive, and sex discrimination, 1491
Parental rights, 1491–93
Parliament, demonstrations in vicinity of, 730–33
Parliamentary sovereignty see Sovereignty of Parliament Parochial church councils see PCCs (parochial church councils)
Partiya Karkeren Kurdistan (PKK), 1402, 1403, 1404
Part-time workers, discrimination against, 1490
Party Election Broadcasts (PEBs), 533, 539, 544
Party Political Broadcasts (PPBs), 533
PCCs (parochial church councils) marginalisation, 846–47
  as public authorities, 220, 225
Peace, breach of see Breach of the peace
PEBs (Party Election Broadcasts), 533, 539, 544
Penal legislation, freedom from retrospective effect, 66–69
  general restriction on rights and freedoms, 68–69
People's Mujahideen Organisation (PMOI), Iran, 1336, 1402, 1403
Persistent vegetative state, 76–77
Personal files, security and intelligence services, 1020–21
Personal information, 809–992 see also Broadcasting regulation; Data protection; Private life, right to respect for definition of 'private' information, 879–86
  Human Rights Act, protection under, 813–30
    'horizontal effect' of Art 8, 252–56, 815, 824–28
  intimate, 928
  new privacy doctrine, liability for disclosing information under, 876–920 privacy of, 73–74, 805–7, 809–30, 876–920 public domain, 886–95
    information already known to some, 887–91 information obtained in public places, 891–94 sensitive, 928
  Strasbourg jurisprudence, 813–24
    judicial responses to, 829–30
PHA (Protection from Harassment Act) 1997 civil liability, 870–71
  press intrusion, 871
  publication of information causing distress, 871–72
  similar offences, 872
Phillimore Committee, on contempt, 337
Physical punishment
  bodily integrity, interference with, 74–75
PKK (Partiya Karkeren Kurdistan), 1402, 1403, 1404
PMOI (People's Mujahideen Organisation), 1336, 1402, 1403
POAC (Proscribed Organisations Appeal Commission), 1340, 1397–99, 1400–1 appeals from, 1399–1405 appeals to, 1397–99 judicial review of decisions, 1399–1405 procedure, and Arts 6 and 13, 1400–1401
  Special Immigration Appeals Commission, and, 1397 Police
  see also Arrest; Detention; Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE); Police custody, detention in; Police malpractice, redress for; Police questioning; Powers of entry and search; Searches; Seizure accountability, 1007–10, 1261–65, 1303–7 consensual detainment, 1161–62
  entry, powers of see Powers of entry and search obstructing or assaulting in course of duty, 1109–11
Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (PACE) arrest, powers of (without warrant), 1143–46 Codes of Practice, 1106–8 access to legal advice, exceptions (Codes C and H), 1220–25 breaches (Code B), 1007–8 breaches (Code C), 1285
    police questioning (Codes C and H), 1188–90 procedural safeguards (Code B), 1005–7 context of, 1103–5
  democratic process, and, 119 detention after arrest, time limits, 1165–67 entry without warrant, 996–97
  evidence, exclusion of, 1267–1300
    causation, 1275–76
    'fairness' test, 1277–99
    'oppression' test, 1269–73
    'reliability' test, 1267, 1269, 1273–75
  Home Office circulars, 1108–9 interviewing scheme, 1186–1254, 1279
    see also Police interviews
  journalistic material, seizure of, 440–42
  Notes for Guidance, 1108
  Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure, 1103 rules structure, 1105–9
  stop and search powers, 1113–14
Police custody, detention in, 1163–84 authorised by police alone, 1169–71 conditions of detention, 1174–81 custody officer, role, 1171–72 judicial authorisation, 1167–69 law, procedure prescribed by, 1163–64 samples, swabs and impressions, taken during, 1183–84 searches of detained persons intimate, 1181–82

strip, 1182
Terrorism Act 2000, 1167
time limits on, following arrest, 1165–67 treatment, 1171–84
vulnerable groups, 1172–74
Police interviews, 1192–1208
see also Police questioning inside and outside police station, 1197–1201 non-interviews, 1193–97 outside station, 1226 techniques, 1205–8
varying levels of protection for exchanges, 1201–2
Police malpractice, 1255–1327
background, 1310–13
complaints against police
current scheme, 1310–16
disciplinary action, probability, 1316–18
HRA, and, 1318–21
Police Reform Act 2002, 1313–16
court duties under s 6 HRA, and, 1259–62
Crown Prosecution Service decision making, 1322 evidence, exclusion of see Evidence, exclusion
Human Rights Act
Article 6 requirements, 1259
impact of, 1322
trial remedies, 1259–62
miscarriage of justice cases, 1315
prosecution of police, 1321–22
Select Committee on Home Affairs, Report, 1312
tortious remedies
civil actions, value of, 1309–10
HRA and tortious liability, 1306–9
quantum of damages, 1305–6
tort actions, 1303–5
Police questioning, 1186–1254
see also Police interviews
notification of rights, 1192
PACE Codes, 1188–90
recording methods, 1203–8
audio recording, 1203–4
video recording, 1204–5
terrorist suspects, 1191–92
vulnerable groups, 1190–91
Political liberalism, 5
The Politics of the Judiciary (Griffiths), 259
Pornography
censorship, 305, 456–61
conservative position, 454 hardcore, 460, 463, 479, 524
satellite television, 546
law, and, 453–61
liberal position on, 455–56
pro-censorship feminist position, 456–61
violent, 459
Ports and border controls, 1121–22
Positive discrimination forms, 1573–74 recognition in national law, 1574–75 public bodies, duties, 1576–79
theoretical basis, 1572–73
training and outreach policies, 1575–76
women, affirmative action favouring (EU law), 1579–85 Positive obligations
domestic application of Arts 8, 10 and 11, 70–71, 699–700, 814–28
Powers of entry and search, 995–1010
Article 8, reliance on, 1008–10
common law, 1000
entry without warrant, 996–98
freedom assembly, and, 676–77
Human Rights Act, impact of, 1007–10
Police Act 1997, 998
search warrants, 998–1000
Terrorism Act 2000, 997
Preference maximisation, 7
Preference utilitarianism, 148
Pregnancy and parental rights, 1491–93, 1532
Prejudgment test, contempt, 336
Prejudicing proceedings
see also Contempt
'active' proceedings, 338–39
administration of justice, and media freedom, 322–28
common law, 363–81
Contempt of Court Act 1981, and, 380–81
imminence, 365–67
intention to prejudice administration of justice, 363–65 pre-1981, 334–37
Contempt of Court Act 1981, 337–62
common law, and, 380–81
'ignorance' defence, 361
prejudice or impediment, 357–61 public affairs, discussion of (s 5), 357–61

rebalancing, 361–62
serious prejudice/impediment to justice, publication creating substantial risk, 339–56
European Convention on Human Rights Articles 6 and 10, 328–30
domestic impact, 330–34
impediment or prejudice to legal proceedings and s 5, 357–61 intentional prejudice, 363–83 intention and imminence, 365–67
postponing reporting to avoid risk of prejudice, 384–89
public affairs/public interest, 357–61
Punch, critique of, 375–79
real risk of prejudice, 368 frustrating action against media body, 369–80 methods of fulfilling test, 367–69
Spycatcher litigation, 369–75
abolition of doctrine?, 379–80
Strasbourg stance, 321–30
strict liability, 319–62, 381 substantial risk of serious prejudice or impediment to justice, publications creating, 339–56
HRA reform, case law, 354–56
key factors, 341–50
post-HRA era, 350–52
threshold created by s 2(2) test, 352–54
Press freedom of, 319
Press Complaints Commission see Press Complaints Commission Press Council, 832
Protection from Harassment Act 1997, and, 871 self-regulation, 832–39
Press Commission Code
sources, protection of, and, 409
Press Complaints Commission, 831
Code of Practice policing, 833–38 privacy provisions, interpretation, 836–37 provisions, 834–36
sanctions, 837–38
marginalisation of, 846–47
status as public authority, 212, 836, 848–51
Pressure groups, and declarations of compatibility under HRA, 209
Presumption of innocence
burden of proof
post-HRA approach, terrorism offences, 1352–54 reversed, case law, 605–6, 1347–51 fair hearing, right to, 64–65 Primary rights under ECHR see also European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR); Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA) additional guarantees, 106–8 interference with communications, interception, and, 1042
public protest, and, 685–89
Prior restraints see also Censorship; Injunctions court reports, restricting, 383–94 Prisoners' rights
see also Detention
compensation, 59
correspondence, 90–91
discretionary life sentences, and review of detention, 58 prison service,and, 218
Secretary of State, role in sentencing, 177 Privacy see Horizontal effect; Private life, right to respect for Private bodies, 249–50
public authorities, and, 216–18
Private life, right to respect for, 69–91
see also Surveillance; Personal information; Powers of entry and search; Security and intelligence services bodily integrity and autonomy, 74–80
breach of privacy, 911–15
confidentiality obligation see Confidentiality defamation and malicious falsehood, 873–74 disclosure of personal information see Personal information domestic protection, 807–8, 824–30, 863–64 entry and search powers, reliance on Art 8, 1008–10 exceptions and justification under Art 8, 72
harassment see Harassment mutually supporting guarantees, Arts 8 and 10 as, 960–62 new "privacy" tort civil and criminal liability, invasion of privacy, 866–70, 911–15 harassment, alarm or distress and anti-social behaviour, 863, 870–73 proposals for, 867–70
personal autonomy, 76
private life, concept of respect for, under Art 8, 73–87 public interest defence, 915–20 reasoning process, parallel analysis, structure, 962–81
remedies, 981–90
damages and accounts of profit, 982–83 interim injunctions, 983–90

reporting restrictions see Reporting restrictions
sexual autonomy, 80–85
sexual identity, 85–87
speech and privacy claims, balancing (HRA), 937–81
developing jurisprudence on clashing rights, 943–50
domestic approaches, 950–81
examples of outcomes, 970–81
factors weighing on either side of balance, 968–70
free speech theories, and privacy, 939–43
parallel analysis or 'ultimate balancing act', 958–59
reasonableness test, 937
underlying rationales of Articles, values, 965–68
telephone tapping, 73, 1032–52
theoretical considerations, 804–7 unauthorised use of information, detriment arising from, 920 waiver in confidence cases, 918–20
Processions, advance notice of, 702–4
Pro-Life Alliance decision, and broadcasting regulation, 268, 276, 280, 530–45
Proportionality, 265–91, 964 activism, and, 285, 287, 289 anti-discrimination legislation, and, 1459 anti-terrorism measures, and, 1436 arrest, promptly informing of reason for, 57 civil liberties, protection of, and, 129
contempt, and, 374
discretionary areas of judgment, Human Rights Act and, 268, 269–91 life, right to, and, 45
margin of appreciation, and, 69, 265–66, 271–74
media and administration of justice, 324 interference with legitimate aims, 326
privacy, and, 964–68
protests, and, 686, 688
Proscription, 1381–1406
see also Counter-terrorism; POAC (Proscribed Organisations Appeal Commission); Terrorism; Terrorism Act 2000; Terrorist suspects Articles 10 and 11, relevance of guarantees under, 1354–58, 1389–96, 1401 challenges to, 1396–97 choice of groups to proscribe, 1386–89 commercial risks, 1396
deproscription, 1397
fund-raising, 1396
margin of appreciation, and, 548
offences, proscription-related, 1389–96 belonging to proscribed organisation, 1389–92
meetings, 1392–96
symbols of allegiance to proscribed group, 1392–96 Terrorism Act 2000, as amended in 2006, and, 1383–86 terrorist property, 1396
Protection from Harassment Act 1997 see PHA (Protection from Harassment Act) 1997 Protests see Freedom of protest and assembly
Public authorities
BBC as, 530
broadcasting regulation, 530–33
categories, 217–18
core and functional status, tests determining, 219–29 European Convention on Human Rights, and, binding effect of rights under, 215–16 invoking rights against public authorities, 235–37 function, and SDA, 1510 housing associations, 221
Human Rights Act 1998
position under, 215–49
Section 7(1), relying on, 237–39
Sections 3 and 6, relationship between, 216
'hybrid' status, 220 private care homes, 223–27, 228 public function tests, critiquing, 229–32 reforms possible, 247–49
remedies, 241–47
retrospectivity, 239–40
specific bodies, categorising, 233–35 standard and functional, 216–29
time limits, 240–41
victims, 235–37
Public disorder and anti-social behaviour, criminalising see also Public protest and the Public Order Act 1986 (POA)
harassment, 787–95
private common law remedies, 798–99
public nuisance, 798
reasonableness defences, 796–97
threats, abuse and insults, 781–87
Public good defence, obscene material, 472–74
Public interest defence in confidence, 915–20
Public interest in FoI
see also Public interest immunity categories of exemptions in FoI, 637
class, 639–47
harm-based, 647–50
class exemptions not subject to, 639–41

class exemptions subject to, 641–47
harm-based exemptions not subject to, 647–48
harm-based exemptions subject to, 648–49
official secrecy, and, 641–50
definitions of 'public interest', 638
Publicity
'generic', 'threshold' or prejudicial, 345
Public nuisance, 798
Public Order Act 1986 see Public protest and the Public Order Act 1986 (POA)
Public order law
see also Freedom of protest and assembly; Public protest and the Public Order Act 1986 (POA) development, 668–72 nature, 672–75
Public/private divide
see also Private life, right to respect for broadcasting regulation, 530–33
Human Rights Act 1998
private bodies, 249–50
public authorities, 216–18
Public processions advance notice of, 702–4
Public protest and the Public Order Act 1986 (POA), 1340
Human Rights Act, impact on Sections 12–14A, 720–30
ECHR jurisprudence, 724–26
radical approach, 726–30
Section 11 - notification, 702–4
Section 12 power, 704–6
liability under, 707
Section 14 power, 706–7
liability under, 707 serious offences, 799–800
Public protest under ECHR see also Freedom of protest and assembly; Public protest and the Public Order Act 1986
freedom of assembly (Art 11), 681–83
justifications for interferences with primary rights, 685–89
protest as expression (Art 10), 684–85

Questioning of suspects see Police questioning

Race discrimination and the Race Relations Act 1976 (RRA), 1507–11 see also Commision for Racial Equality; Discrimination Commission for Equality and Human Rights, 1595–1600
Commission for Racial Equality, 1593–95 common law right to non-discrimination, lack of, 1507 contexts covered by RRA, 1508–10
direct, 1535–36
equal pay, 1510
exclusions from RRA, 1569–70
formal and substantive equality, 1489
indirect, 1544–47
positive action, 1575–79
protected grounds, 1507–8
remedies for, 1588–90
SDA compared with, 1510–11
success rate of applications, 1591–93
Race Relations Board, 1507
Racial discrimination, 1507–11
direct, 1535–36
proving, 1536
indirect, 1544–47
Race Relations Act 1976, 1507 contexts covered, 1508–10
SDA compared with, 1510–11
racial group, meaning of, 1507–8
segregation, 1535
Racial hatred, incitement to, 497–500 see also Religious hatred domestic provisions, 497–500
Human Rights Act, impact on, 500–501
Rape, within marriage, 67
Rawls, John
nature of rights, and, 5, 6, 7, 8, 12
Reasonableness
see also Reasonable suspicion; Wednesbury reasonableness detention on remand, and, 57
public disorder and anti-social behaviour, criminalising, 796–97
Reasonable suspicion
see also Detention; Stop and search arrest, powers of see Arrest: reasonable suspicion detention following arrest, 54 stop and search with, 1114–17 stop and search without, 1117–21 telephone tapping, and, 73
terrorism, and, 54, 1121–22
Refugees see Asylum *see*kers
Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 see RIPA (Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act) 2000 Religion
see also Blasphemy
discrimination, 507
freedom of thought, conscience and religion (Art 9), 91
margin of appreciation, and, 38
religous organisations, protecting, 211–12

Religious hatred see also Racial hatred, incitement to incitement to, 501–9
Remand, continued detention on, 57–58, 59
Remedies
  see also Compensation; Effective remedies, right to; Exhaustion of local remedies damages and accounts of profit in "privacy" cases, 982–83 domestic, exhaustion of, 30–31
  Human Rights Act, under, 241–47
  interim injunctions, 983–90
  private common law, 798–99 public authorities, against, 241–47 right to, before national authority, 106–8
  Single Tribunal under RIPA, and, 1084–85
  tortious see Tortious remedies Reporting restrictions, 390, 851–66
  see also Contempt; Injunctions anonymity preservation, 391, 393
  children and young persons ECHR jurisdiction, 855–65
    juveniles, in criminal proceedings, 854–55
    private hearings, 853
  Human Rights Act, impact on, 865–66
  postponing reporting to avoid risk of prejudice, 384–89
  prior restraints, and contempt, 383–94 prohibiting reporting of information, 390–94
  sexual offences, victims, 393, 851–52
  trial-related (adults), 852 Reputation principle
  police malpractice, and, 1264
Restitutio in integrum principle
  European Court of Human Rights, 245
Restriction of rights and freedoms
  see also European Convention on Human Rights aliens, political activities, 111–12 freedom of expression
    blasphemy, 487
    broadcasting, 509–50
    content and form-based interferences, 306–8
    market freedom and creative freedom, 308–9 offensive material see Offensive material; Pornography racial hatred, 497–501
    religious hatred, 501–9 restriction and exceptions, 94–96
    US model, 308, 309
  general, freedom from retrospective penal legislation, 68–69
  margin of appreciation, and, 37–39
  public emergency, and, 110–11
  reporting restrictions see Reporting restrictions reservation, making (Art 57), 112 system of restrictions, under ECHR, general, 110
Retrospectivity
  criminalisation of Nazi crimes, 11 penal legislation, 66–69
    general restriction on rights and freedoms, 68–69
  public authorities, and, 239–40
Review of the Implementation of the Human Rights Act (Department of Constitutional Affairs), 162
Rights
  see also European Convention on Human Rights; International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights competing, 13, 943–81
  immunities as, 15
  implied, right to fair trial, 64 infringement of, 13, 15 liberal conception of, opposition to, 8–10
  meaning of, 10–16
  moral and legal distinguished, 10–11 natural, 8
  origins of, 6–10
  overriding, 12, 13
  penumbra, 13
  risk to society, and, 14
  'trump' status, 12
  US Constitution, 15
  weak, in UK, 15
Right to life see Life, right to Right to silence see Silence, right to Riots, 667–68, 799–800
  see also Public order
RIPA (Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act) 2000, 1034–68
  Code of Practice on Covert Surveillance, 1066–68 communications, interception, 1034–41
  surveillance, 1058–68
Road traffic accidents, stop and search powers, 1122–24
Royal Commission on Criminal Procedure, 1103, 1205
RRA (Race Relations Act) 1976 see Race discrimination and the Race Relations Act 1976 (RRA)
Rule utilitarianism, 8

Samples, swabs and impressions
  detention in police custody, 1183–84
Satanic Verses, and blasphemy, 487
Satellite television, EU-based, 545–49

Scandalising the court, contempt, 394–98
Schools, physical punishment in, 74–75
Scottish Parliament, and Human Rights Act 1998, 213
Scott Report, official secrecy, 593
SDA (Sex Discrimination Act) 1975 see Sex Discrimination Act 1975 (SDA) Searches
  see also Stop and search detained persons, of, 1181–84 entry and search powers, 995–1010
  intimate, 1181–82
  samples, swabs and impressions, 1183–84
  strip, 1182
  Terrorism Act 2000, and, 997
  voluntary, 1000–1, 1126–28
  warrants, 998–1000
Secret Intelligence Service, 1010
Security see Liberty and security of person, right to; National security; Security and intelligence services
Security and intelligence services, powers, 1010–32 agencies, framework for, 1013–14 complaints against, 1022–24
  European Convention requirements, 1025–30
  Human Rights Act, impact of, 1024–32
    using HRA, in practice, 1030–32
  Intelligence and Security Committee, 1011, 1014–15
  personal files, 1020–21 warrant procedure, 1016–19
Segregation, racial discrimination, 1535
Seizure
  Criminal Justice and Police Act 2001, power under, 1003–5 excluded/special procedure material, 1002–3 journalistic material
    HRA implications, 445–48
    Official Secrets Act 1989, 444–45
    PACE (Police and Criminal Evidence Act) 1984, 440–42
    Production Orders, terrorism legislation, 442–44
  legal privilege, material covered by, 1002–3
  power of, 1001–3
  special powers, 1129
September 11 attacks
  see also Counter-terrorism; Terrorism freedom of protest and assembly, and, 672
  Human Rights Act 1998, and, 164
Serious and Organised Crime Agency (SOCA), 1013
Servitude, freedom from, 50–51
Sex discrimination, 1486–1506
  child care responsibilities, 1489–91 Convention rights, 108–9
  direct, 1527–34
  equal pay see Equal pay
  flexible working, 1489–91
  formal and substantive equality, 1488–89
  gender reassignment, 1534
  indirect, 1538–44
  judiciary, and, 261
  marital status, 1534
  maternity/child care grounds, 1529–34
  part-time workers, 1490
  pregnancy and parental rights, 1491–93
  Sex Discrimination Act 1975
    see also Sex discrimination contexts, 1505–6
    protected grounds, 1504–5
  White Paper 1974, 1487
  Work and Families Act 2006, 1492
  work/life balance, 1543–44
Sex Discrimination Act 1975 (SDA) contexts, 1505–6
  exclusions from, 1567–69
  protected grounds, 1504–5
  RRA compared with, 1510–11
  sexual orientation, 1515–18
Sexual autonomy
  private life, right to respect for, 80–85
Sexual identity
  private life, right to respect for, 85–87
Sexual offences, victims, 393, 839, 851–52
  see also Rape, within marriage
Sexual orientation, 1569–70
  discrimination on grounds of, 1513–26 direct discrimination, 1537–38
    education, 1523–24
    employment, 1521–23
    EU provisions, 1515
    housing provision, 190, 1524–26
    Human Rights Act 1998, and, 1518–21
    Sex Discrimination Act 1975, 1515–18
  Employment Equality (Sexual Orientation) Regulations 2003, 1522–23 exceptions to, 1570–72 equality on grounds of, 1472–73 homosexuals, 81–82
    age of consent, 82, 1472
    AIDS/HIV, fear of, 83, 84
    concealing of sexual orientation, 1523 interference with private life, 81–82 Rent Act, and, 188
    sado-masochism, and, 83
  nature of rights, and, 7–8
Shayler litigation
  official secrecy, 597, 606–16

SIAC (Special Immigration Appeals Commission) see Special Immigration Appeals Commission Silence adverse inferences drawn from, 1211–15 restriction on drawing, 1239–43
  penalising, 1249–54
  relying on legal advice in remaining silent, 1243–54
  right to, 1234–54
    curtailment of right, 1235–39 Slavery abolition, 1472 freedom from, 50–51
Smith, John, 145
SOCA (Serious and Organised Crime Agency), 1013
Social Charter 1961, 19
Social contract, hypothetical vs actual, 7 Society, risk to strength of rights, and, 14
Soham murders 2002, 344
Solicitors
  see also Access to legal advice debarring representatives, 1223–25 unavailability or delay, 1221
Sovereignty of Parliament, 186, 280
Sovereignty of Parliament and Human Rights Act, 171, 186, 280
Special Advocates (SA) scheme, 1343, 1344
Special Immigration Appeals Commission
  anti-terrorism law, and, 1340, 1429–30 burden of proof, 'foreign torture evidence', 1459 POAC, and, 1397
  role, 1429–30
  Single Tribunal, and, 1083
Speech see Freedom of expression
Spycatcher litigation, 369–75
  abolition of doctrine?, 379–80
  case law subsequent to, 623–24
  official secrecy, 618–24
  Punch, critique, 375–79
Statements of compatibility under HRA, 206–11
  see also Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA)
State security see National security Statutory interpretation arrest, powers of, and, 1149
  ECHR, domestic impact pre-HRA, and, 136–37
  indecency, 476
    HRA and protection of morals exception, 480–84
  obscenity, 468–72
    'deprave and corrupt' test, 470–73, 526
    HRA and protection of morals exception, 475–76
  offensive material
    indecency, 476, 480–84
    obscene publications, 468–72, 475–76
    specific offences, variety of, 477–80
Stop and search, 1111–39
  see also Arrest; Searches breaches of rules, redress, 1130–31 counter-terrorism, 1117, 1123–24
  disciplinary action, 1139
  discriminatory use of powers, 1124–26 drugs, searching for, 1114
  European Convention on Human Rights, and
    Article 5, 1131–34
    Article 13, 1134
  exclusion of products of search from evidence, 1138–39
  force, use of, 1128–29
  judicial review, 1134–37
  PACE powers, 1113–14
  ports and border controls, 1121–22
  procedural requirements, 1129–30
  reasonable suspicion, 1114–17
    of being terrorist, 1121–22 without, 1117–21
  remedies
    tortious, 1137–38
    trial, 1139 road traffic accident powers, 1122–24 seizure powers, special, 1129
  special powers, 1123–24
  tortious remedies, 1137–38
  violence, anticipated special powers to prevent, 1122
Straw, Jack, 119, 145, 210
Strict liability
  see also Contempt
  prejudicing proceedings, and, 319–62, 381
Sub judice period, contempt, 335, 338
Suicide assisted, 78–79, 80
  bodily integrity, and, 76
Surveillance, 1053–80
  see also Interception of communications; Telephone tapping in accordance with law, 1071–73
  Article 8, interference with guarantees, 1068–71 authorisation procedure, Police Act 1997, 1056–58 civil actions, and, 1077–78 closed circuit television, 1068
  Commissioners duties, 1075
    oversight role, 1065

confidential information, 1064–65
criminal proceedings, 1075–77
directed, 1017, 1062–63
Human Rights Act 1998, and, 1068–75 actions under s 7(1)(a), 1079 using, 1075–80
intrusive, 1017, 1060–62
judicial review, and, 1079–80
legitimate aims, 1073
necessity in democratic society, 1074–75
Police Act 1997, and, 1056–58 public telecommunications system, meaning, 1034
Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000 (Part II), 1058–68
RIPA Code of Practice on Covert Surveillance, 1066–68

TA (Terrorism Act) 2000 see Terrorism Act 2000 (TA)
Telephone tapping, 1032–52
evidence, exclusion of, 1298
official secrecy, 594–95
privacy rights, 73
surveillance, 1061
Television
see also Broadcasting regulation; Films BBC and Ofcom regime, 520–30 closed circuit, 1068 ITC Code, 524, 525, 527
public authorities, and, 233
satellite, 545–49
Television Without Frontiers Directive, 513, 514, 517 Terrorism
see also Al-Qaeda terrorists; Counter-terrorism; September 11 attacks; Terrorist suspects Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act see Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act (ATCSA) 2001
Article 3 treatment (ECHR)
deporting suspects facing potential treatment abroad, 1358–61
indefinite detention without trial, 1362–63
third party material, obtained by, 1346–47
Birmingham pub bombings 1974, 118
Control orders, 1438–62
see also Control orders Convention rights, domestic interpretation, and, 1338–39 counter-terrorism see Counter-terrorism court proceedings outside criminal justice system, and see also Fair trials/hearings
closed material, procedure for use, 1343–45
field of application, 1339–42
'public' hearing, 1345–46
special advocate, use, 1343–45
third party, material obtained by Article 3 treatment, 1346–47
definitions, 1148
extending under 2000 Act, 1374–81
directing a terrorist organisation, 1407–8
'domestic', meaning, 1379 encouraging/glorifying, 1415–21 intent or recklessness, 1420 freedom of expression, association and assembly, 1354–58 human rights, and, 1335–63
Article 3 treatment (ECHR), 1346–47, 1358–63
burdens of proof (reversed) and presumption of innocence, 1347–54 Convention rights, interpreted domestically, 1338–39 discrimination (Art 14), 1363
fair trials, 1339–47
inciting abroad, 1415–21
'international', meaning, 1379
London bombings 2005, 344, 672, 1360, 1416
positive obligations to report information, 1411–15
preparatory and possession offences, 1408–11
presumption of innocence, and burdens of proof (reversed)
case law, 1347–51
post-HRA approach, terrorism offences, 1352–54
Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005, and control orders, 1438–62
Proscribed Organisation Appeal Commission see POAC (Proscribed Organisations Appeal Commission)
reasonable suspicion, 54, 1121–22
special offences, 1406–21
Terrorism Act 2000 (TA) see also Terrorism; Terrorist suspects definition of terrorism, extending, 1374–81 detention in police custody, 1167
key themes, 1368–70
legal and political background, 1364–68
pre-2000 temporary counter-terrorism legislation, 1365–66 previous measures, 1370–74 proscription see Proscription search powers, 997

stop and search, without reasonable suspicion, 1117–21
Terrorism Act 2006
additional offences introduced by, 1407, 1408, 1411
'war on' terrorism, 164 weapons of mass destruction (WMD), 409 Terrorist suspects
see also Terrorism
access to legal advice
delaying, 1218–19
disallowing private consultation, 1225
deporting, facing potential Art 3 treatment abroad, 1358–61
police questioning, 1191–92
reasonable suspicion of being terrorist, 1121–22
Thatcherism, and civil liberties, 117, 158, 159, 160
A Theory of Justice (Rawls), 6
Threats, criminalising use of, 781–87
Time limits
detention following arrest, 1165–67
information, applying for under FoI, 650–53
enforcement, 651–53
public authorities, Convention rights against, 240–41
Tomlinson, Richard, 1012
Tortious remedies
civil actions, value, 1309–10
Human Rights Act, and tortious liability, 1306–9
police malpractice, and, 1303–10
quantum of damages, 1305–6
stop and search, 1137–38
tort actions, 1303–5
Torture
see also Inhuman or degrading treatment, freedom from anti-terrorism legislation, and Art 3 treatment
deporting suspects facing potential treatment abroad, 1358–61
indefinite detention without trial, 1362–63
third party material, 1346–47 as crime under international law, 45–46 freedom from, as Convention right (Art 3), 45–50 non-derogability of right to freedom from, 12
Trade unions
freedom of association, 98–102
Transsexuals
privacy rights, 85–87
sex discrimination, 1504, 1534
Trespass
aggravated, 738–41
criminalising, 733, 737–50
Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 s 69 directions, 741–43
mass, 737–38 privacy, right to respect for, 874–75 simple, 737
Trials see Fair trials/hearings Tribunals
see also Independent and impartial tribunal communications, interception, 1040–41
single, under RIPA, 1080–90 HRA, influence on, 1086–90
jurisdiction, 1081–82
procedure, 1083–85
recourse to courts from, 1085

Unfair dismissal, pre-2003 provision, 1521–22
United Nations Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment 1984, 45, 1359–60 United Nations Covenant on Civil and Political Rights complaints, and, 29
United Nations Declaration of Human Rights
European Convention based on, 17
United States
Constitution, 15
First Amendment, 311–12, 320, 456 freedom of expression, restrictions on, 308, 309 quasi-public forums, 749
Use of force see Force, use of Utilitarianism
nature of rights, and, 7, 8–9
preference, 148

VAC (Video Appeals Committee), 552
Vagrants, 55
Victimisation, 1563–67
Victims, under HRA, 235–37
Video Appeals Committee (VAC), 552
Videoworks, statutory regulation of, 550–60, 562–66 Violence
see also Public order anticipated, special powers to prevent, 1122 freedom of protest and assembly, 666, 667 group, 667
violent disorder, 799–800
Visions of Ecstasy video, and blasphemy, 490, 491 Void dire (trial within a trial) evidence, exclusion, 1262, 1284

Vulnerable groups
  detention in police custody, 1172–74
  police questioning, 1190–91

Warrants
  arrest, powers of see under Arrest communications, interception, 1034–37
    without warrants, 1037–38
  entry without, 996–98
  procedure, 1016–19
  search, 998–1000
Wednesbury reasonableness
  activism, and, 285, 288
  Human Rights Act 1998, and, 276
  judicial review, 128–29
  limitations, 133
Welsh Assembly, and Human Rights Act, 213
Whitehouse, Mary, 454
Williams Committee on Obscenity and Film Censorship, 455, 570 Witnesses anonymity of, 391
  cross-examination, 66
Women and Work Commission, 1493 Working Time Directive/Regulations
  sex discrimination, 1489
World Administrative Radio Conference 1977, 546 World Trade Centre attacks see September 11 attacks
Writs, 335, 619

Young persons see Children and young people