The Bundesgerichtshof might also regard the behaviour of the individual in a certain situation as having the indicative effect that he obviously finds himself in a sphere of seclusion. It is true that protection from portrayal in this sphere does not only start when the person affected behaves in a way in which he would not when in the public eye. The spatial seclusion only fulfils its protective function for the development of the personality when it secures for the individual a place for relaxation regardless of his behaviour at the time, in which he does not have continually to expect the presence of photographers and cameramen. But it does not matter in the present case because according to the findings on which the Bundesgerichtshof based its decision, the first condition for protection of the private sphere is absent.

Finally there are no grounds for objection in constitutional law to the fact that, in the balancing exercise between the public interest in information and protection of the private sphere, importance is attached to the method of obtaining information (reference omitted). There are doubts however about whether the private sphere outside the home can only be violated by photography by secrecy or surprise. In the light of the function which this sphere should fulfil from a constitutional point of view and in the light of the fact that it often cannot be seen from a picture whether it has been taken secretly or by surprise, an impermissible invasion of the private sphere can be found even when these characteristics are not present. As the Bundesgerichtshof has however already denied that there was a sphere of seclusion for the disputed photographs, these doubts do not affect the outcome of its decision in this respect.

(cc) The constitutional law requirements are not however fulfilled insofar as the decisions challenged have paid no attention to the fact that the complainant's protected position in relation to her right of personality is strengthened by Article 6 of the Basic Law in the case of family contact with her children.

(dd) The following details result from this for the different photographs:

The decision of the Bundesgerichtshof in relation to those photographs which show the complainant on her way to the market, with a bodyguard at the market and with a companion in a well patronised café gives no cause for objection by the Constitutional Court. In the first two cases it is a question of places visited by the general public, which are not secluded. In the third case it is admittedly a question of an area which is spatially enclosed; but it is one in which the complainant is under the eyes of the members of the public who are present. For this reason the Bundesgerichtshof did not dispute the prohibition on dissemination of photos from the garden café which are admittedly a subject of the decisions challenged, but not of the constitutional complaint. The place which the complainant took there with her companion showed all the characteristics of seclusion. The fact that the photographs have obviously been taken from a great distance additionally points to the fact that the complainant might assume she was not exposed to the eyes of the public.

The decision is also not open to objection insofar as it concerns the photos in which the complainant is shown alone when riding and cycling. The Bundesgerichtshof on the basis of its view of the matter likewise attributed them not to the sphere of local seclusion but to the public sphere. That is not open to objection in constitutional law. The complainant herself counts the photographs as belonging to the secluded private sphere only because she let her wish be known to be alone. But according to the criteria which have been explained, it does not merely depend on her will.

On the other hand, the three photos in which the complainant is shown together with her children call for a renewed scrutiny from the constitutional law viewpoints which have been set out above. It cannot be ruled out that scrutiny on the basis of these standards will lead to another result in relation to individual photos or all of them. In this respect the judgment of the Bundesgerichtshof is to be quashed and the case referred back to it for a new decision.

(d) As to the judgments of the Landgericht and the Oberlandesgericht which have been challenged, a violation of the basic right follows from the fact that they have limited the private sphere protected by Article 2 para. 1 in combination with Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law—admittedly in harmony with the case law at the time—to the area of the home. But it is not necessary to quash the decisions because the violation has been cured in this respect by the Bundesgerichtshof and the matter is in other respects been referred back to it.

Case 48

BUNDESVERFASSUNGSGERICHT (FIRST DIVISION) 24 MARCH 1998

BVERFGE 97, 391 = NJW 1998, 2889 = JZ 1998, 1114

Facts

The complainant, who is now 41, is no longer capable of earning, and still bears her maiden name. She alleged first to friends in 1973, and later in 1986 to doctors who were treating her for, amongst other things, compulsive gambling, that her father had sexually abused her. She first wrote to her father about this in March 1987, claiming he had driven her to addiction. She also told the Youth Welfare Department, in order to protect her niece who was sometimes looked after by him. In 1990 she wrote to her father to say she forgave him. But she spoke about the abuse in a television broadcast in January 1991 and in a later programme. She also offered to a magazine an article about claims for compensation for psychological harm consequent on sexual abuse. Her father demanded that she should stop accusing him to others of sexual abuse, but she refused to comply. He then started a claim for an injunction alleging he had never sexually abused her; and that the real reason for the accusations was his refusal to pay for her gambling debts. The Landgericht found that he had sexually abused her regularly from the age of eight onwards; and perhaps from the age of twelve onwards by having sexual intercourse with her. It rejected his claim, on the basis that injunctions could only be used to prevent statements injurious to honour if they were untrue. When he appealed, the Oberlandesgericht ordered her not to make statements, using his name or her name, to the effect that he had sexually abused her. It held that regardless of the truth of the statements, such an order could be made under §§ 1004 and 823 para. 1 BGB because of the violation of his right of personality. He could not prevent her allegations to state or judicial authorities that he had sexually abused her where she had a justified interest in making these allegations. But he did not have to put up with being denounced by name in public.

The constitutional complaint by the complainant against this judgment was successful.

Reasons

B. The constitutional complaint is well founded. The judgment of the Oberlandesgericht violates Article 5 (1) and Article 2 (1) in combination with Article 1 (1) GG.

I. These basic rights are affected by the decision which is being challenged.

1. The use of one's own name in connection with a statement comes within the protection of freedom of opinion.

The basic right of freedom of opinion protects statements of opinion of all kinds and assertions of fact as well as other forms of statement, at any rate if they are a prerequisite for the formation of opinions [references omitted]. The use of one's own name in connection with a statement is neither a form of independent statement nor a component of the statement in the narrow sense. Its content stands alone. But this does not mean that the giving of a name falls outside the protective area of the basic right. It is of substantial importance for the statement itself as well as for the individual and public process of opinion formation to which it contributes.

Freedom to state opinions is "the most direct expression of the human personality in society" (BVerfGE 7, 198 [208]). The name of the originator gives the connection between the person and the statement is made in a recognisable way. If the person making the statement adds his own name [to his statement], he shows that he wants to make the statement known as his personal opinion or description and is ready to vouch for it; and in the case of an assertion of facts, to be answerable personally for its truth. It is precisely in relation to those statements with which the speaker very fully identifies himself or which present his own story that the use of a name is one of the prerequisites of the communication of the sense of the statement.

Besides this the name of the person making the statement can contain messages which go beyond the simple content of the statement. Thus it is possible, for instance, that the personal description of oppressive experiences will encourage others affected to break their silence. Such a message could not be communicated in the same way without the use of one's own name and the associated disclosure of personal involvement. That applies especially if communication of certain events is subject to a taboo. Personal confession to the public can help in this case to break through the attribution of guilt often associated with social taboos.

However, the purpose of a statement is not fulfilled in making known personal views or communications. Statements are directed at others and as a rule are destined to have an effect on them in forming opinions or motivating to action. Article 5 (1) sentence 1 GG therefore does not only protect statements in the dimension of their dissemination but also in the dimension of their effect (see BVerfGE 7, 198 [210]). Freedom of opinion includes the right of the person making the statement to choose for his statement those forms and circumstances which ensure the greatest possible effect for it [reference omitted]. But the effect of a statement on third parties depends substantially on whether its originator is identifiable or not. Anonymous statements frequently lack that degree of authenticity and credibility that gives them the desired influence or causes a reaction.

Finally the effect of a statement is not limited to its reception and assimilation by third parties. Just as the statement will usually be connected with preceding communications, so it will in turn trigger further communications. In striving to guarantee free formation of opinions by the individual and the public Article 5 (1) GG is therefore not limited to protecting the individual statement. It also ensures the preconditions for the establishment and maintenance of the communication process in which every statement is embedded [reference omitted]. The use of a name is important for this likewise because it is only such use that makes it possible for participants in the communication process to refer to one another or make contact with each other.

2. The use of one's own name also falls into the protective area of the general right of personality arising from Article 2 (1) in combination with Article 1 (1) GG.

The name of a human being does not only have the function of creating order and differentiation. It is also the expression of identity and individuality. Therefore the individual can require the legal order to respect and protect his name. This protection has so far only become relevant in constitutional case law in relation to change of name on marriage as prescribed by the state [references omitted]. But it is also related to the wish not to use a name (which is not as such in dispute) in certain circumstances or to replace it by a pseudonym. As a name is an expression of identity and individuality it cannot be changed at will. It accompanies the life history of the person who bears it. This is recognisable as connected with [the concept of] a name. To give up the use of one's name does not therefore leave one's personality unaffected.

This also applies to the use of a name in connection with a statement. Statements do not fulfil their purpose in the passing on of a certain communication content. They are at the same time the expression of the personality of the person making the statement. By his statements he presents himself to third parties as a person. Other people identify him with them. On the basis of the use of a name third parties can not only attribute statements to their originator but also categorise him by the type of personality that they make him out to be. At the same time they get the opportunity to assess the person who stands behind the statement alongside its contents. If someone is obliged to refrain from using his name in connection with statements which he sees as personal and which he thinks it important to attribute to himself, such an obligation is to be measured against Article 2 (1) in combination with Article 1 (1) GG.

3. On the other hand, freedom of the press is not relevant. The question of the permissibility of a particular statement is to be judged in accordance with Article 5 (1) GG, independently of whether it is made or is to be made through a medium which enjoys the protection of press freedom. This will only come into play where it is something more than individual statements of opinion—where the press is important for the formation of individual and public opinion [references omitted]. That is lacking here.

4. Freedom of opinion and the right of personality have been limited by the complainant's obligation not to use her name when she speaks in public about sexual abuse by her father. The fact that the statement may incidentally be disseminated further in public does not change anything in view of the inclusion of the use of the name in the protective area of both basic rights.

II. The decision under challenge is not reconcilable with the basic right of freedom of opinion and the general right of personality.

1. Both basic rights are certainly subject to statutory limits. Freedom of opinion is, according to Article 5 (2) GG only guaranteed within the framework of the general laws, the statutory provisions for the protection of the young and the right to personal honour. Development of the personality is according to Article 2 (1) GG confined within the boundaries of the constitutional order. This is to be understood as including all legal norms that are formally and materially in harmony with the Basic Law [reference omitted]. That is the case with the provisions of §§ 823 and 1004 of the BGB on which the Oberlandesgericht based the judgment under challenge.

2. But their application does not comply with the requirements of the basic rights.

(a) The interpretation and application of the civil law provisions are just as much a matter for the civil courts as the establishment of the facts and the assessment of the evidence. But if, during the course of the application of norms of civil law which are unobjectionable in constitutional law, positions protected by the basic rights are affected, the civil courts must take account of the importance and scope of the basic rights. This is to guarantee their importance in setting values at the level of application of the law as well (see BVerfGE 7, 198 [205 ff.; constant case law]). That requires as a rule a balancing operation, to be undertaken within the framework of the features of the statutory definition, between [two aspects of the matter]. On the one hand there is the significance in the actual case of the basic right which has been limited for the person entitled to it as well as the extent of the interference with it to which he has to submit. On the other hand there is the significance of the legal interest protected by the statute which is being applied and the severity of the interference with it by the exercise of the basic right. In this connection, the courts must have sufficient regard to both positions and bring them into a relationship that takes appropriate account of them. There will, in particular, be a violation of a basic right which the Federal Constitutional Court has to correct if the civil court has not considered the influence of the basic right at all or has evaluated it inappropriately and the decision is based on a misunderstanding of the influence of the basic right [reference omitted].

(b) In this connection, on the complainant's side it must above all be taken into account, from the point of view of freedom of opinion and the right of personality, that the statement in dispute has an accentuated relationship with the personality. The prohibition on giving of [the complainant's] name would to a large extent cause it to lose the effect hoped for in the process of communication.

This statement, which the complainant is only allowed to make in public if she does not use her name, does not relate to some subject with which she only has a distant connection, but concerns her highly personal life story. On the basis of the facts as established by the civil courts, from which the Federal Constitutional Court has to proceed, it relates to an extremely serious experience that had a decisive influence on her physical and emotional development. Every person has the freedom to decide whether he turns to others or to the public with experiences of this kind. If he decides to do so, the prohibition on describing a story of the most personal kind in a personalised form contains as a rule a drastic interference with opportunities for communication and with development of the personality.

Nothing is changed by the circumstance that the judgment under challenge does not prevent the complainant from speaking about the abuse under her own name in the context of private contacts or therapeutic treatment. This is because she is still prevented from widening the radius of those with whom she can communicate beyond the circle of her personal acquaintances or persons professionally concerned with the development of her personality. The complainant can no longer appear before the public as an identifiable person, vouch for her story with her own name and meet directly any reactions of third parties to it.

The effect of her story on persons in a similar situation or a public disturbed by the problem of sexual abuse of children is also reduced because there is a danger of the story failing to acquire the credibility and authenticity generally associated with the use of a name. The encouragement which public analysis of one's own story can have for people in a similar situation is also reduced. Likewise feedback to the complainant who wants a response is made more difficult by the prohibition on the use of her name. Furthermore she loses the opportunity to get over her past experiences with the help of third persons who have only become aware of her through the statement.

It is clear that this experience which has had a decisive effect on the complainant and which she wants to speak about publicly is indissolubly linked with the person of her father. This has to be considered; but it has to be borne in mind that the complainant is reporting about the plaintiff in the initial proceedings from the perspective of the victim of his actions. The statement cannot therefore be understood just as an exposure of the father. It must also be seen in context of overcoming her status of a victim. This victim status (which the courts have found to be a necessary starting point) would be further reinforced if the victim were to be prevented from giving an account in a personalised form. In this respect her interest in making a statement is to be rated more highly than that of third persons or of the media who want to name the persons involved when they make statements about these kinds of events.

(c) On the side of the plaintiff in the initial proceedings weight must be given to his right of personality protected under the basic rights. §§ 823 and 1004 of the BGB give expression to this in civil law. It certainly does not give to the person entitled to it a claim only to be represented to the public in a manner which corresponds to his self-image or which is pleasant for him. It does however protect him against representations which distort or falsify as well as against representations which can substantially interfere with the development of his personality [reference omitted]. Personality interests must as a rule take second place to freedom of opinion if the disputed statement has as its subject facts which are to be regarded as true.

But this principle is not without exceptions. In particular true stories can injure the right of personality of the person affected if the consequences of the representation are serious for the development of the personality and the need for protection outweighs the interest in the [making the] statement. Thus the Federal Constitutional Court in the Lebach judgment (BVerfGE 35, 202 = NJW 1973, 1226) granted personality interests priority over broadcasting freedom, because the transmission of a docudrama about a sensational crime was at a point very close in time to the release of one of the perpetrators from imprisonment. The widespread impact and suggestive power of television would also have made the reintegration of the person affected into society substantially more difficult, if it did not entirely prevent it.

It is true that things are different here to the extent that it is a question not of a report by the media but by the victim. There is therefore no need to decide what the position would be if when the victim tells her story, the media expand this by their own reports from the perpetrator's background. Unlike the Lebach case, no independent danger for the plaintiff in the initial proceedings arises here from the point in time of the statement. Nor is it a question of documentation about his conduct identifying him, but merely of the possibility of a conclusion being drawn because he has the same name as the complainant.

Nevertheless, the consequences for the plaintiff in the initial proceedings are serious. This is associated with the accusation of sexual abuse of his own child, which is regarded as an especially abhorrent crime. Reports of conduct of this kind mostly lead to stigmatisation of the perpetrator. Stigmatisations [of this kind] can lead to withdrawal of social recognition and social isolation of and fundamental loss of assurance and self-devaluation by the person affected in numerous areas of his life. This is based on assessment and behaviour mechanisms which are social and therefore not solely attributable to the responsibility of the person affected. The free development of the personality is thereby permanently impeded; and this cannot be treated as due to the usual limits to development opportunities or the unfavourable reactions of others which one has to accept as the consequence of one's own decisions or forms of behaviour.

The protection which Article 2 (1) in combination with Article 1 (1) GG gives in this respect is not dependent on the statements about a person being untrue. It also applies if the statements are true and for this reason become a cause of a social exclusion and isolation. As the protection of the personality has as its goal the maintenance of the basic conditions of social relationships between the person entitled to the basic right and his environment [reference omitted] it is also independent of whether it is the victim himself or third persons who speak about the facts.

The protective effects of the general right of personality are not ruled out simply because the use of the complainant's name cannot from the outset, in her view, affect her father's rights. The protection of the personality does not only apply to the content of an assertion, but also to the consequences which the assertion has as information for others. Therefore it is a question of the information and the chances of identification which the addressees of the statement receive. The possibility that an assertion can be related to a certain person and that this person will be exposed to consequences from which the constitutional law right of personality grants protection does not therefore only exist if his name is mentioned but also if other details facilitate his identification.

On the other hand, the weight of the infringement of the basic right depends upon the breadth of the impact of the discriminatory consequences. This can work out differently according to the extent to which the person affected is known. It must further be considered whether the effects of the statement are limited because of the commonness of the name. If it is a widely used name, the effects of the statement only occur with those persons who know the speaker and his family and therefore can deduce the identity of the perpetrator from his public appearance under his own name. With a television appearance, the interference with the personality by the mention of the name decreases further, because in this case the conclusion is possible even without the mention of the name.

(d) These points of view which are to be taken into account in the context of the basic rights did not sufficiently influence consideration of the matter in the Oberlandesgericht.

The Oberlandesgericht has, in harmony with the civil law case law, considered the complainant's statement to have the effect of "pillorying" the plaintiff in the initial proceedings. This would have serious consequences for the development of his personality and therefore must only be accepted if weighty reasons on the opposite side argue for the publication of the assertion in a form which permitted his identification. There is no objection to this from a constitutional point of view.

However, the Oberlandesgericht did not have sufficient regard to the reasons which argue in favour of publication using the complainant's name. Its decision raises doubt as to whether it was conscious of the fact that the use of the complainant's name in connection with her statement falls under the protection of freedom of opinion and the general right of personality. In any case the complainant's interests protected by these basic rights have not entered sufficiently into the balancing operation. The court merely touched on the subject with the comment that a denunciation of the plaintiff in the initial proceedings could not be justified by the argument that the complainant as a victim was looking after supposed general information interests about the abuse of children in society because the use of a name was not as a rule necessary for this.

In particular there is here no consideration (taking account of the requirements of Article 5 (1) GG) of the functions which use of one's name for one's statements can have and which mean that the name cannot simply be left out or replaced. Thus the court has not considered the question—which is relevant also from the point of view of the right of personality—of whether and to what extent the complainant wants to overcome the experiences of abuse by presenting them to the public as her own experiences and under her own name.

Further, it did not discuss to what extent the adding of a name is needed for statements about the abuse to acquire the character of an authentic communication for the complainant as well as for the recipient of the statement. It did not consider whether the use of a name is needed in the given situation to communicate the contents of the statement to the recipients in the desired fashion and so that they obtain the opportunity of establishing contact with the complainant. The point of view, relevant in the context of formation of public opinion, that personifying the experience of sexual abuse can help to counteract a social taboo and encourage others affected to speak and act themselves, was also left out of consideration.

The Oberlandesgericht did not carry out the necessary evaluation because it did not adequately concretise those interests which are important from the point of view of freedom of opinion and the right of personality. The court did not address the fact that the using of one's own name for one's own statements is the part of freedom of expression of opinion which is close to the personality and an obligation to refrain from doing so therefore represents an especially intensive interference. It also did not take into account that sexual abuse of children is a question substantially affecting the public so that the interest of society in being informed from the perspective of the victim about such acts and their consequences increases the weight to be given to freedom of opinion.

On the other hand the court did not address the question of how great the danger of identification was on the basis of the name in the actual case, to what extent the consequences of an identification would affect him and whether he would have any opportunity to avoid these. This is relevant to the severity of the interference with those interests of the plaintiff in the initial proceedings which are protected by the basic rights.

(e) The judgment under challenge is founded on these defects. The Oberlandesgericht gave priority to protecting the plaintiff in the initial proceedings from social stigmatisation because it did not make a sufficient determination of the protected interests of the complainant and therefore did not adequately consider her basic right position. It cannot therefore be excluded that the court, if it had considered the requirements of the basic rights, would have made a decision, which was more in the complainant's favour.

Case 49

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 29 JUNE 1999
NJW 1999, 2893 = VERSR 1999, 1250

Facts

The claimant, a representative of the House of Hanover and prince of Great Britain and Ireland, asks the defendant, a German publishing company, to refrain from publishing certain parts of a report about his divorce.

The marriage of the claimant was dissolved on the 10th September 1997 in public proceedings before the High Court of Justice in London. From the divorce papers which, according to English law, are usually available to the public and press, it appears that the claimant had admitted to having committed adultery with an unnamed woman. The English news agency Reuters reported on the divorce on the same day, giving the ground for the divorce. This news was published on the 11th September 1997 by the "Daily Mail" newspaper. On the 13 September 1997 a report about the divorce appeared in issue no 39/97 of the magazine "Das Neue" published by the defendant. The Article, in which several meetings by the claimant with Princess Caroline of Monaco were mentioned and which included two photographs of these, stated (making reference to a press agency) that family judge A had given as a ground for the divorce that the German prince had committed adultery with an unnamed woman.

The claimant feels that his right of personality has been violated by the publication by the defendant of the ground for the divorce. He has applied for an order that the defendant refrain from disseminating the statement, making reference to a press agency, that he has committed adultery with an unnamed woman.

The Landgericht allowed the claim. The Oberlandesgericht rejected the defendant's appeal. In the appeal in law (which is admissible) the defendant seeks the rejection of the claim.

Reasons

I.

The appeal court, applying the (German) law of the place of commission of the act, adjudges the part of the publication objected to by the claim to be unlawful and therefore, on appropriate application of §§ 823 para 1 and 1004 of the BGB, an interference by the defendant in the claimant's general right of personality from which the defendant must refrain. The mention of adultery as the ground for divorce would give the impression to the average reader that such adultery had actually taken place. This statement was highly prejudicial to the claimant. In the required balancing of the claimant's right of personality with the public's justified interest in information, the claimant's interest in the protection of his private sphere prevailed. The public's interest in the claimant, which arose in view of the fact that he was the great-grandson of the last German Kaiser (and in substance from the significance and position of his ancestors and relations) could not justify the giving of the ground for the divorce. The position did not have to be assessed differently either because of the association of the claimant with Princess Caroline of Monaco nor because the dissolution of the claimant's marriage took place at a public hearing, adultery was expressly named then as a ground for divorce, and the divorce papers could be seen by third parties under English law. (The latter point is inconsistent with the standards applying to German courts) . . .

II.

The judgment of the appeal court does not stand up to legal scrutiny.

1. The considerations which the appeal court uses with reference to the fundamentals of its decision are admittedly not open to objection.

(a) . . .

(b) . . .

(c) The appeal court further thought it necessary to decide on the claim on the basis of balancing the claimant's general right of personality (protected in constitutional law in accordance with Article 2 para. 1 in combination with Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law) against the defendant's right to freedom of speech and freedom of the press (which likewise enjoys constitutional rank in accordance with Article 5 para. 1 of the Basic Law) (on the requirement for such a balancing, see [references omitted]). There are no legal objections to this approach. Such a balancing cannot be dispensed with here on the ground that an interference by the defendant with the claimant's right of personality is lacking. It is true that, as stated above, a report had already lawfully been made by an English news agency and an English newspaper about the ground for the claimant's divorce. But this circumstance cannot remove from the publication of it by the defendant for the first time in Germany the character of an interference. A balancing of interests is therefore correctly considered by both parties to be required.

(d) The approach of the appeal court is also to be taken as a starting point in relation to the circumstances to be included in the balancing exercise.

(aa) First, the content of the statement in the defendant's news report as interpreted by the appeal court is not open to objection. Assessing the announcement that the English judge had given the claimant's adultery as the ground for the divorce as meaning that such adultery had in fact taken place, should therefore also be a basis for the appeal in law proceedings. But it is not necessary to examine the additional claim of the reply to the appeal in law that the photo accompanying the news report with the caption "Ernst August and Caroline kiss each other" had also amounted to an innuendo by the defendant that the claimant had committed adultery with Princess Caroline of Monaco. This is because the claimant does not ask the defendant to refrain from a statement to this effect.

(bb) The appeal court, without any error of law, further proceeds on the basis that the claimant is affected in his private sphere by the defendant's publication. This categorisation which means that the claimant's intimate sphere (which as such would enjoy absolute protection) is not affected (references omitted) has its legal basis in the fact that the defendant's news report only announced the fact of the adultery but not details about it (references omitted).

2. However, the appeal court cannot to be followed in how it weights the circumstances to be included in the balancing exercise and in the priority it derives from this for the claimant's right of personality.

(a) It was argued (to the defendant's disadvantage) that the announcement about the claimant's adultery had no actual interest for the public, even though he belonged to the German and British nobility and was the great-grandson of the last Kaiser. This is based on a legally incorrect view.

(aa) In the context of this qualification, the appeal court failed to pay sufficient attention to the fact that it is not only "valuable" items of information given by the press which fall within the freedom of the press in Article 5 para. 1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law. This freedom in principle also exists in favour of the tabloid and sensational press and thereby also for news which primarily satisfies the need of a more or less broad readership for superficial entertainment (references omitted).

(bb) In the case in question, there is the additional fact that the claimant attracts the attention of a broad readership not only because of his ancestry but also as companion of Princess Caroline of Monaco, who is continually in the glare of publicity (reference omitted). Even if the interest of this readership may not be described as particularly valuable, contrary to the view of the appeal court the need for its satisfaction cannot be excluded from the protected area of press freedom (which is simply constitutive for the free democratic order (reference omitted)) as unjustified. Instead, it is precisely in the case of the press that the need for limiting the freedom of news reporting must be convincingly proved (reference omitted).

(b) Further, much too little weight has, to the defendant's disadvantage, been given by the appeal court to the fact that the announcement about the claimant's adultery, even with the content which the court of appeal ascribes to it, involved the assertion of a true fact. Nor does the reply to the appeal in law question this. It is true that a balancing of the basic rights positions on both sides is still required in principle for a true statement (reference omitted); such a statement however must, even if it is disadvantageous for the person affected, be more readily accepted (references omitted). This is particularly the case when it does not represent an especially intensive interference with the right of personality, like the mere general announcement of a formal ground for divorce in the case in question.

(c) Finally the appeal court did not sufficiently consider the fact that the news about the dissolution of the claimants' marriage, with the giving of adultery as the ground for the divorce, had been published already by the news agency Reuters and the "Daily Mail" newspaper before publication by the defendant. It had thereby become known already to a large number of persons, who could then pass it on to others. This further reduces the gravity of the defendant's interference with the claimant's private sphere to a considerable extent (reference omitted).

3. Following all this, the result of the balancing of the basic rights positions of the parties by the appeal court cannot be left to stand. As the facts to be assessed are established, a further elucidation of the matter is therefore not necessary and the senate can finally decide itself on the basis of its own balancing exercise. In this connection it reaches the conclusion, in the light of the lesser weight of the interference with the claimant's right of personality stated under no. 2, as against the freedom of speech and freedom of the press claimed by the defendant, that the announcement by the defendant about the claimant's adultery as a ground for divorce does not appear to be unlawful and therefore must be accepted by the claimant. His claim must therefore be rejected.

Notes to Cases 39–49

1. The first of these cases marks a real turning point in German tort law by creating the new all-embracing right of personality and privacy (cf. Larenz/Canaris, II 2, § 80 I 3a, p. 492). Some writers have even described it as the most important case in German tort law during this century. It is derived from a somewhat strained—but in the event successful—interpretation of the Constitution of Bonn of 1949 the relevant provisions of which were reproduced towards the end of chapter one, above. The linking of the development of the civil law with the Constitution has already been noted. Here suffice it to mention two further points of interest. First, it reveals that both in Germany and in the United States the constitutional background has had a marked but different influence on the law of defamation and privacy. Thus, whereas in Germany this has often led to a greater protection of privacy, in America the emphasis on freedom of speech has often had the reverse effect. We shall return to this important point later on. Secondly, the interaction of public and private law has been maintained through these years, the Constitutional Court often being called to decide disputes which involved privacy questions. Thus, in BVerfGE 34, 269 (Case 38, above) it was called upon to consider the constitutionality of the award of monetary compensation in cases of infringement of this new right (see above, chapter 2, section A.2(e)(iv)); BVerfGE 35, 202, is reproduced above as case 42. Two further decisions of the Constitutional Court can also be found above as cases 47 and 48.) For other instances see BVerfGE 54, 129; BVerfGE 54, 148; BVerfGE 54, 208; BVerfG NJW 2001, 2957 etc.

2. At the risk of becoming repetitive one must stress that these judgments, and indeed the constitutional provisions mentioned above, can only be fully understood if one bears in mind the utter contempt shown towards human dignity by the Nazi regime. It was ironical therefore that the breakthrough decision of 1954 was indirectly connected with one of its former sympathisers. (BVerfGE 7, 198 and BVerfGE 30, 173 also involved former Nazis.) For the mysterious Dr S of that judgment was Dr H H G Schacht, an undoubtedly distinguished economist and financier who played an important role in the restoration of a stable currency after the devastating German inflation of 1923. From 1923 to 1930 he served as president of the Reichsbank and became a supporter of the Nazi party, even urging the ageing President Hindenburg to appoint Hitler as Reich Chancellor (which, eventually, happened in 1933). When Hitler came to power, Schacht played a leading role in the rearmament programme, but from 1938/9 onwards he was urging Hitler to reduce expenditure for armaments as the only way to balance the budget and reduce inflation which had begun to rise again. In July 1944 he was confined to a concentration camp until the end of the war and then he was one of the principal accused at the first Nuremberg trial. He was acquitted at the trial only to be brought subsequently before the German People's court at Stuttgart under the "denazification" laws which attempted to try "lesser" collaborators of the Nazi regime. Sentenced to eight years' detention in a labour camp, Schacht successfully appealed against his conviction and resumed a highly successful and respected career as a financier.

3. Soon after the first decision, the BGH reaffirmed its stand in an interesting case brought as a result of the publication of Cosima Wagner's private letters and diaries (BGHZ 15, 249); and, again, two years later in the Dahlke case (BGHZ 20, 345). A year later, the BGH declared its willingness to take the same stand when the interference with the plaintiff's privacy was merely negligent. There followed the landmark case of the Gentleman rider (BGHZ 26, 349, case 40). This decision, along with the case of the Professor of Canon law (BGHZ 35, 363, case 41), settled the problem of the theoretical basis of monetary compensation for violations of the new right, which had not been decreed until that moment. They also completed the judicial revolution started by the Schacht case for now the courts had given teeth to the new right. During these years litigation increased at a considerable rate and in the process a number of issues were clarified. The following are but illustrations. BGHZ 24, 72 (communication of medical reports without the patient's consent may amount to a violation of the right). BGHZ 27, 284 (recording a conversation with the speaker without his knowledge and consent may also infringe the new right). BGH NJW 1965, 685 (fictitious interview with a well-known figure of international society). BGHZ 39, 124 (statements made about a television broadcaster can be actionable under this heading even though they could also have founded an action on defamation (§ 185 StGB in conjunction with § 823 II BGB)). Vis-à-vis this last point, however, there is a view that argues that an action for violation of the right of privacy has a residual character and will, normally, be available only if there is no other specific rule that covers the point. (E.g. protection of name (§ 12 BGB); artistic creations, etc. § 97 of the Copyright Act). (BGHZ 30, 7, 11). § 823 I BGB will also be chosen instead of § 823 II BGB in conjunction with the Criminal Code as the only way of awarding "pain and suffering" damages (Schmerzensgeld; § 847 BGB) to the victim (cf. OLG Düsseldorf NJW 1980, 599). For further amusing instances see OLG Frankfurt NJW 1982, 648: defendant produced a sticker depicting two cranes, copulating, accompanied by, inter alia, the word "Lusthansa"; Lufthansa, which has a crane as an emblem, sued but failed. In OLG Frankfurt NJW 1985, 1649 a different company produced a sticker with the letters BMW accompanied by the words "Bumms Mal Wieder". In one sense this could be taken to mean "Bump [or bang] once again", but bummsen can, in colloquial German, mean "to fuck" so the famous motor car company successfully sued for an injunction. Though the decision was reversed on appeal (see BGHZ 91, 117; 98, 94), the extension of these rules to cover legal (as well as physical) persons is not in doubt: BVerfGE 21, 362; BGH NJW 1974, 1762; BGH NJW 1975, 1882; BGHZ 78, 24; BGH ZIP 1994, 648. For further casuistry, see also, the discussion in chapter two, above.)

4. If, in accordance with the above, it is established that the plaintiff's claim can proceed on the grounds that his right of privacy has been interfered with, then the court is obliged to consider the merits of the claim in the light of all the surrounding circumstances. The difficulties involved in balancing competing values are fully exposed and considered in case 42 which shows inter alia that not only celebrities but also ex-convicts have, in certain circumstances, rights of privacy. Finding the via media in such circumstances is by no means an easy task; but it is one which, overall, is performed with admirable clarity and courage of opinion by the Constitutional Court. The approach in such matters being casuistic, it is difficult to state hard and fast rules. Nevertheless, three threads of thought are discernible in the judgments. First, freedom of expression will, on the whole, prevail over the right of privacy where the publication, broadcast, etc. aim at educating and informing the public rather than pursuing mere sensationalism or trying to satisfy the public's taste for gossip. (This, incidentally, is what Lord Bingham of Cornhill thinks will happen in English law, as well, after the Human Rights Act 1998 comes to be applied. See his evidence before the House of Commons Select Committee in Home Affairs on 17 March 1998). However, when human dignity is (grossly) violated and not only incidentally affected there is no room for a balancing process; human dignity prevails. (See e.g. BVerfG NJW 2001, 2957, 2959.) Secondly, the chances of success of a privacy claim tend to decrease as the public profile of the plaintiff increases. But even public figures can seek protection of their privacy in appropriate circumstances. (See BGHZ 73, 120 case 45; BGH NJW 1996, 1128, case 46; BVerfGE 101, 361, case 47.) Finally, not every kind of speech receives the same, preferential treatment. Thus, speech that promotes the public good or is in the public interest will receive much greater protection than self-serving speech. (For instance, see the Höllenfuer decision of 21 June 1966 (BGHZ 45, 296 = NJW 1966, 1617 = JZ 1967, 174. Also important dicta in BGH 12 October 1993, NJW 1994, 124.) The above comments are noteworthy for their seriously question the accuracy of statements repeatedly made by the English Press—broad sheet as well as tabloid—about the extent of the protection given to speech rights in contemporary Germany. What is said in various parts of this book should dispel this myth. Here, however, are some notable extracts that give the lie to such assertions.

(i) “The basic right to freedom of expression, . . . is one of most precious rights of man. [This right] is absolutely essential to a free and democratic state, for it alone permits that constant spiritual interaction, the conflict of opinion, which is its vital element. In a certain sense it is the basis of freedom itself . . . freedom of expression is the matrix, the indispensable condition of nearly every other form of freedom.” Lüth judgment of the Constitutional Court, BVerfGE 7, 192.

(ii) “Especially in public debate, criticism, even in exaggerated and polemical form must be accepted if one is to avoid limiting the process by which public opinion is formed.” Stern-Strauss judgment of the Constitutional Court, BVerfGE 82, 272 (1990).

(iii) “Where the person expressing the opinion is not pursuing objectives of self-interest, but rather contributing to the public debate on a question of substantive concern to the public, then there is a presumption that the expression of opinion is permissible; an interpretation of the laws restricting freedom of opinion which makes excessively high demands as regards the permissibility of public criticism is not compatible with Art. 5 (1) GG.” BGH 12 October 1993, NJW 1994, 124 (translation N. Sims from van Gerven, Tort Law, 2nd ed. (2000), 149.)

(iv) “Contrary to the view of the complainant, Article 2 para. 1 in combination with Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law does not contain a general and comprehensive right of control over pictures of oneself. Insofar as she seeks to deduce such a right from earlier decisions of the federal Constitutional Court . . . this is an incorrect generalisation of the protective content of the basic guarantee, which is formulated in the light of actual cases. As this court has already emphasised many times, the general right of personality does not give the individual a claim only to be portrayed by others in the way in which he sees himself or wishes to be seen by others . . . A wider protection of this kind would only exceed the objective of avoiding endangering the development of the personality, but would also make deep inroads into the area of freedom of third parties.” Caroline judgment of the Constitutional Court of 15 December 1999, BVerfGE 101, 361 (case 47).

(v) “In the centre of the basic right of guarantee of freedom of the press is the right freely to determine the type, orientation, content, and form of a publication . . . Included in this right is the decision whether and how a publication should be illustrated. . . . The press must be allowed to decide according to journalistic criteria what it considers to be worthy of the public interest and what it does not.” Caroline decision of the Constitutional Court of 15.12. 1999, BVerfGE 101, 36.

(vi) “It is not only ‘valuable’ items of information given by the press that falls within the freedom of the press in Article 5 para. 1 of the basic law The freedom in principle also exists in favour of the tabloid and sensational press and thereby also for news which primarily satisfies the need of a more or less broad readership for superficial entertainment.” Prince Ernst August of Hanover judgment of Federal Court of 29 June 1999, NJW 1999, 2893 (case 49).

One does not expect much accuracy from those who write for the tabloid press; but in an age of high information technology, the broad sheets should be better informed.

5. German law on disclosure of true private facts is particularly interesting not least because its position is so diametrically different from that found in the USA. It thus offers excellent material for reflective comparisons about the basic values and attitudes of these two societies. Two points deserve particular attention. First is the Germanic tendency to distinguish the disclosed facts according to whether they belong to (a) the “intimate” (b) the “private” or (c) the “social” sphere of the plaintiff—the first receiving almost total protection, the last little or none. Though the need to make such distinctions is accepted both by academics and courts (see Münchener Kommentar-Schwerdtner, 3rd edn., I (1993), § 12 BGB no. 215; Palandt-Thomas § 823 BGB, no. 178; Ricker in NJW 1990, 2098) it will also strike Common lawyers as Germanic in its approach and unworkable in practice since the difficulty here is not so much in drawing up these categories but in slotting the facts of each case into the appropriate pigeonhole. On the other hand the German material should also prompt reflection on the merits of according—even to public figures—some degree of privacy and seclusion. Two decisions of the Federal Court, dealing with the unauthorised tapping of a telephone conversation between two prominent leaders of the Christian Democratic party, clearly illustrate these points. In the first (BGHZ 73, 120 = JZ 1979, 349, case 45, above) the Court held that even politicians are entitled to rights of privacy, and granted an injunction preventing the dissemination of the content of the conversation, whereas in the second (BGH JZ 1979, 351) which concerned the same parties, the plaintiffs were awarded DM 10,000 each in damages for the violation of their right of personality. These rights would be overridden only where there was a real and serious interest to inform the public (which was not the case in that litigation.) First Amendment admirers may cringe at such decisions; but in the light of many successes of investigative journalism directed against German public figures, any outright condemnation of German law would be unfounded.

6. Monetary compensation is often the plaintiff’s main demand. The difficulties created here by § 253 BGB—overcome by cases 40 and 41 (and approved by BVerfGE 35, 202, case 42) and not to be found in any other system—have been discussed above (chapter 2, section A.2(e)(iv)). The BGH started out to work with an analogy to § 847 BGB, but today damages for immaterial harm in this area are directly based on Art 1 I and Art 2 GG. This claim is a claim sui generis. But the intrusion into the plaintiff’s privacy must also be grave and objectively serious, otherwise the courts would be inundated with frivolous claims; the point is raised in chapter 4, section A.3(e), and is illustrated by case 145, below. Moreover, the size of the monetary compensation (whenever it is sought which is by no means always) is modest as is shown by an analysis of all published cases for the period 1980 to 2000, though growing (see below subsection 8).

7. Injunctive relief, though not specifically provided for by the tort provisions of the Code, has for a long time now (see RGZ 60, 6) also been available on the analogy of § 1004 BGB (taken from land law). Indeed, the Code of Civil Procedure (ZPO) in a number of provisions (e.g. 920 II, 935, 937 II, 940, 944 etc.) contains rules which are meant to facilitate the granting of this remedy which, however, does not resolve the merits of the dispute but only provides interim relief. Thus the procedure can be quick, entirely oral, and in very urgent cases even oral argument may be waived (§ 937 II ZPO). Again, in cases of urgency, the remedy can be granted by the Presiding judge sitting alone (§ 944 ZPO) and even the plaintiff’s burden of proof may be eased in various ways. This remedy, undoubtedly suffers from one practical drawback: it can only be claimed in those cases where the plaintiff has advance warning of an imminent publication of offending material. Nonetheless, the way it has been shaped by German law seems sufficiently interesting to warrant more attention by English specialists than it has hitherto received. (For details on this subject see: Münchener Kommentar-Schwerdtner, 3rd edn. I, (1993) § 12 BGB no. 322; Zöller, Zivilprozessordnung 22nd edn. (2001), commentary on the paragraphs mentioned above.) Douglas v. Hello Ltd. [2001] 2 WLR 992 suggests that these ideas may be transplantable to England, especially under the new regime of the Human Rights Act 1998. On the other hand, the idea of a pre-emptive injunction is unlikely to appeal to American lawyers who, in their desire to leave the Press totally unfettered can (in the eyes of a foreign observer at least) appear to be excessively worried by all notions of “prior restraint”. This may well explain the paucity of the American material which, especially if read with the history of each dispute, seems inconclusive at best. Thus, see: Julian Messner, Inc. Spahn, 393 U.S. 818 (1968); 393 U.S. 1046 (1969); Roe v. Doe, 417 U.S. 907 (1974); 420 U.S. 307 (1975); Wiseman v. Massachusetts, 398 U.S. 960 (1970); 400 U.S. 954 (1970).

8. Some seven years ago, as the third edition was about to go to print, the Lord Chancellor’s department issued a Consultation paper entitled Infringement of Privacy. It provided a full and readable account of this topic and, in its recommendations, it went beyond the Calcutt suggestions by advocating the introduction (subject to some important constraints) of a general right of privacy. Just as importantly, it contained a number of subsidiary points and assumptions that could (to some extent) be tested by applying the comparative method. Thus, first it gave a “guesstimate” of the number of cases that were likely to come before the English courts if the new right was recognised. These were estimated to be “in the hundreds rather than the thousand” (p. 52). Secondly, while not suggesting a mandatory figure of damages, the paper implied (at p. 45) that a sum in the region of $3,000 might be an appropriate guideline for judges. Finally (at p. 42) the paper boldly recommended the availability of injunctions, though it remained conscious of the “chilling effect” this remedy might have on investigative journalism. The following data, derived from all published German decisions handed down between 1980 and 1993 offers one way of testing the assumptions and predictions made in the valuable (but subsequently discarded) Report. Thus:

First, the total number of cases for this period of thirteen years is 122. Given that the German right of privacy is not “hedged” in by the kind of limitations proposed by the Lord Chancellor’s paper, the estimates of litigation contained in the latter document may, in the light of the German experience, be on the pessimistic side. Overall, however, it is unlikely that the new right of privacy will create an excessive load for the courts or an unbearable burden on the Press.

Secondly, in 25 cases “moral damages” were granted by the German courts showing, as the Lord Chancellor’s paper implicitly suggests, that damages may not, necessarily, be the remedy most sought after by affected plaintiffs. These are the following (amount—in DM—awarded is given in parenthesis after the reference): LG Stuttgart, 1983 AfP 292 (5,000); OLG Stuttgart, 1983 AfP 291 (10,500); OLG Düsseldorf, 1984 AfP 229; BGH, 1985 AfP 111 (10,500); OLG Frankfurt, 1986 AfP 140 (2,000); OLG Köln, 1987 AfP (10,000); OLG Frankfurt, 1987 AfP 526 (10,000); OLG Köln, 1986 AfP 347 (10,000); LG Hamburg, 1987, AfP 633 (5,000); LG München, 1987 AfP 634 (20,000 to two plaintiffs); OLG Köln, 1987 AfP 602 (5,000); LG Lübeck, 1987 AfP 721 (1,600); OLG Hamburg, 1987 AfP 703 (3,000); OLG Hamburg, 1988 AfP 247 (10,000); OLG Köln, 1987 NJW 2682 (10,000); BGH, 1988 AfP 30 = 1988 VersR 497 (amount to be fixed); BGH, 1988 AfP 34 (amount to be fixed); AG Kaufbeuren, 1988 AfP 277 (500); OLG Oldenburg, 1989 AfP 556 = 1989 NJW 400 (4,000); OLG Karlsruhe, 1989 VersR 1097 (3,000); LG Köln, 1991 AfP 757 (8,000); OLG Frankfurt, 1992 NJW 441 (2,000); LG Köln, 1992 AfP 83 (6,000); OLG Hamburg, 1992 AfP 376 (10,000); LG Bonn, 1992 AfP 386 (10,000). At (approximately) DM 7–7,500 the average German figure is almost identical to the amounts envisaged by the Lord Chancellor’s paper. Damages for pain and suffering and “moral damages” are discussed in more detail in ch. 4 section 3(c).

Thirdly, these sums refer to damages for “moral damages”. Where plaintiffs can prove additional, pecuniary losses they, too, may be recoverable. Thus in OLG München 1988 NJW 915, the plaintiff complained of being photographed while sunbathing in the nude in the famous Englischer Garten. It was alleged that the subsequent publication of the photograph in a local paper resulted in the plaintiff failing to obtain a wage increase which was in the pipeline. The lost “benefit” was awarded in the form of damages. No doubt, the same solution should be adopted by English law as well.

Fourthly, in some cases where the complaining plaintiff has not suffered any loss but the defendant has made a gain (at the expense of the former), the measure of damages may be restitutionary rather than compensatory, recovery being allowed on the basis of § 812 BGB. Thus see: OLG Hamburg, 1983 AfP 282 (DM 4,000); BGH 1987 GRUR 128 (5,500); LG München, 1987 AfP 634 (1360); OLG Karlsruhe, 1989 AfP 558 = 1989 VersR 259 = 1989 NJW 401 (500); BGH, 1993 VersR 66

(amount to be fixed). Sometimes, such actions for account succeed under different provisions (e.g. the Copyright Act). See: BGH, 1987 AfP 508. An equal number of courts, however, have failed to make an award under this heading. See: OLG Frankfurt, 1984 AfP 115; OLG Hamburg, 1985 AfP 120; AG Bonn, 1990 AfP 64; AG Hamburg, 1991 AfP 659; OLG Hamburg, 1992 AfP 159.

Fifthly, in 30 cases injunctions were sought and granted, sometimes initially following the expedited procedure described above. There are some lessons here for English law; and some key structural differences with American law must also be noted. The cases granting injunctions were: OLG Hamburg, 1981 AfP 356; OLG München, 1981 AfP 360; OLG München, 1982 AfP 230; LG Köln, 1983 AfP 414; OLG München, 1985 AfP 209; OLG München, 1986 NJW 1260; OLG Hamburg, 1987 AfP 518; OLG Frankfurt, 1987 AfP 528; LG Oldenburg, 1987 NJW 1419; BGH, 1987 AfP 508; OLG Hamburg, 1987 AfP 703; LG Oldenburg, 1987 AfP 537; OLG Hamburg, 1988 AfP 143; LG Berlin, 1988 AfP 168; OLG Hamm 1988 AfP 258; BVerfG, 1990 NJW 1980; OLG Hamburg, 1989 GRUR 666; OLG Hamburg, 1991 AfP 437 (partial granting of injunction); OLG München, 1991 AfP 435; OLG Frankfurt, 1991 GRUR 49; BGH, 1990 AfP 209; OLG Hamburg, 1991 AfP 626; OLG Hamburg, 1991 AfP 537; LG Köln, 1991 AfP 757; OLG München, 1992 AfP 78; OLG Hamburg, 1991 AfP 537; OLG Hamburg, 1993 AfP 576; BGH, 1993 VersR 614; BVerfG, 1993 NJW 1463; LG Hamburg, 1993 AfP 679.

Finally, an almost equal number of decisions have refused plaintiffs the injunctions they had sought, demonstrating that German courts take the balancing act they are expected to perform between the competing interests very seriously. These are: BGH, 1980 AfP 154; OLG Hamburg, 1982 AfP 177; OLG Hamburg, 1983 AfP 466; OLG Köln, 1985 AfP 293; OLG Oldenburg, 1988 AfP 82; LG Oldenburg, 1987 AfP 720; LG Oldenburg, 1988 AfP 167; OLG Frankfurt, 1989 AfP 402; OLG Karlsruhe, 1989 AfP 542; OLG Celle, 1989 AfP 575; LG Berlin, 1989 AfP 59; OLG München, 1989 AfP 570; LG Köln, 1989 AfP 766; OLG Köln, 1989 AfP 764; OLG München, 1990 AfP 214; BGH, 1990 AfP 209; BVerfG, 1990 AfP 192; OLG Frankfurt, 1990 AfP 229; OLG Hamburg, 1991 AfP 533; OLG Düsseldorf, 1991 AfP 424; OLG München, 1991 AfP 534; BGH, 1991 AfP 410; BGH, 1991 AfP 416 = 1991 VersR 433; OLG Hamburg, 1992 AfP 279; BGH, 1992 AfP 140; OLG Celle, 1992 AfP 295; KG Berlin, 1992 AfP 302; BGH, 1993 VersR 66; OLG Hamburg, 1992 AfP 267.

9. The English Report met with the fate that is reserved for all proposals that do not meet with the approval of the Press: it was binned. But in Germany the law remained on course and despite fears expressed by some that the Caroline cases may have disturbed the status quo, the famous floodgates of litigation never opened. Nor was the average level of damages increased in a way that dislocated the newspaper industry or deterred from doing its appointed task. Prophets of doom are rarely proved right that is why they are invariably forgotten. So here, once again, is this valuable data for the period 1993–2000 so that bona fide researchers can draw meaningful conclusions about the future state of English law.

I. Total number of cases reported during the years 1993–2000: 101

II. Cases where plaintiff won (55)

(a). Non-pecuniary damages were awarded in 16 cases, namely: LG Hamburg, 1994 AfP 163 (25,000); LG Berlin, 1994 AfP 324 (6,000); OLG Karlsruhe, 1994 NJW 1963 (60,000); OLG München, 1996 NJW-RR 539 (8,000); OLG Hamburg, 1995 AfP 508 (5,000); BGH, 1994 AfP 142 (10,000); OLG Bremen, 1996 NJW 1000 (30,000); LG Oldenburg, 1995 AfP 679 (15,000); AG Berlin-Mitte, 1996 AfP 188 (1,500); OLG München, 1997 AfP 811 (5,000); OLG Saarbrücken, 1997 NJW 1376 (7,000); OLG Koblenz, 1997 NJW 1375 (20,000); OLG Hamm, 1998 AfP 304 (20,000); OLG München, 1999 AfP 71 (10,000); BAG, 1999 AfP 290 (4,000); LG Berlin, 1999 AfP 381 (30,000);

(b). Damages were calculated on a quasi “restitutionary” basis in 8 cases, namely: BGH, 1995 NJW-RR 1112 (250); LG Hamburg, 1995 AfP 526 (30,000); BGH, 1996 AfP 137 (amount to be fixed); BGH, 1996 AfP 138 (amount to be fixed); OLG Karlsruhe, 1996 AfP 282 (amount to be fixed); OLG Hamburg, 1997 AfP 538 (180,000); LG Düsseldorf, 1998 AfP 238 (10,000); OLG Karlsruhe, 1998 AfP

326 (155,000); The term “restitutionary” must be viewed with caution. For the BGH (NJW 1996, 985) stressed that the claim was not simply for restitution of profits. Rather the amount of compensation under § 823 I BGB in conjunction with Art 1 I, Art 2 GG depended on various factors such as the profits made, the preventive effect of the claim for future market behaviour, intensity of the violation of the right of personality;

(c). Injunctions were granted in 26 cases, namely: OLG Naumburg, 1994 AfP 306; OLG Hamburg, 1995 AfP 665; LG Köln, 1994 AfP 165; OLG Hamburg, 1994 AfP 232; BGH, 1994 AfP 306; BGH, 1995 AfP 411 = 1995 NJW 861; BGH, 1994 VersR 1116; OLG München, 1995 AfP 658; BGH, 1996 AfP 140 (partly) = 1996 NJW 1128; OLG Hamburg, 1996 AfP 154 (partly); LG Hamburg, 1996 AfP 185; LG Lübeck, 1996 AfP 406; OLG Hamburg, 1997 AfP 535; LG München I, 1997 AfP 559; LG München I, 1997 AfP 827; LG Berlin, 1997 AfP 938; OLG Koblenz 1998 AfP 328; OLG Hamburg, 1998 AfP 643; OLG Hamburg, 1999 AfP 68; LG Berlin, 1999 AfP 191; OLG Karlsruhe, 1999 AfP 489; OLG München, 1999 AfP 507; LG Berlin, 1999 AfP 525; BGH, 1999 NJW, 2736; BGH, 2000 AfP 88; BGH, 2000 NJW 656;

(d). Finally, in five cases successful plaintiffs obtained both damages and injunctions. These were: LG Hamburg, 1994 AfP 64 (40,000); BGH, 1994 AfP 411 (§ 812, amount to be fixed); LG Hamburg, 1994 AfP 243 (15,000); BGH, 1996 AfP 144 (30,000); BGH, 1997 AfP 700 = 1997 NJW 1148 (amount to be fixed);

III. In 46 cases the plaintiffs’ claims was dismissed. These were: LG Baden-Baden, 1994 AfP 59; LG Frankfurt am Main, 1995 AfP 687; OLG Bremen, 1994 AfP 145; LG München I, 1994 AfP 162; BGH, 1995 AfP 495; OLG Hamburg, 1995 AfP 504; LG Lübeck, 1994 AfP 166; LG Hamburg, 1994 AfP 321; OLG Hamm, 1995 NJW 2859; OLG Brandenburg, 1995 AfP 520; OLG Hamburg, 1996 AfP 69; LG Köln, 1996 AfP 189; OLG München, 1996 AfP 391; OLG Köln, 1996 AfP 399; OLG Nürnberg, 1996 NJW, 530; OLG Brandenburg, 1996 NJW 1002; BGH, 1997 AfP 634; OLG München, 1997 AfP 636; OLG Karlsruhe, 1997 AfP 721; LG Berlin, 1997 AfP 732; LG Berlin, 1997 AfP 735; OLG Celle, 1997 AfP 819; KG Berlin, 1997 AfP 926; LG Paderborn, 1998 AfP 331; BGH, 1998 AfP 399; OLG München, 1998 AfP 409; LG Berlin, 1998 AfP 417; LG Berlin, 1998 AfP 418; BGH, 1998 AfP 506; LG Berlin, 1998 AfP 525; OLG Karlsruhe, 1998 AfP 639; OLG Dresden, 1998 NJW, 616; OLG Brandenburg, 1999 NJW 3339; OLG Hamburg, 1999 NJW 3343; LG Berlin, 1999 AfP 91; OLG Hamburg, 1999 AfP 175; KG Berlin, 1999 AfP 361; OLG Zweibrücken, 1999 AfP 362; KG Berlin, 1999 AfP 369; OLG München, 1999 AfP 506; LG Hamburg, 1999 AfP 523; LG Berlin, 1999 AfP 525; LG Waldshut-Tiengen, 2000 AfP 101; BGH, 2000 AfP 167; OLG München, 2000 AfP 174; OLG Frankfurt am Main, 2000 AfP 185.

10. English law, on the whole, compares unfavourably with German law (though the fear of legislation, has forced the Press Complaints Commission to move in the direction of German law. (See The Times, 28 June, 2000, reporting Lord Wakeham’s latest speech on the matter. See, also, the current set of “Guide Lines” contained in the Code of Conduct of the Press Commission—a document which is reproduced below as Appendix 6. Its text is remarkable for at least two broad reasons. First, because it shows a move towards some of the ideas long established in Germany; e.g. dislike of use of telephoto lens, a shift grudgingly made as a result of public outcry following successive incidents of Press misbehaviour. Secondly, it also reveals the main weakness of the English system of self-regulation: in the event of finding that its code of practice has been violated, the Commission’s only power is to direct the broadcaster to publicise its decision. But there is no power to order an apology (let alone to insist that it gives it the same prominence as the offending publication itself); nor can the offender be ordered to make any monetary amends.

The harsh condemnation of English law, should be mitigated by the fact that many aspects of the human personality and privacy do receive some or adequate protection through a multitude of existing torts and specific statutes (e.g. the Data Protection Acts 1984, 1998). But the way the protection is afforded is, itself, defective having emerged from accidents of history. Briefly, this means fitting the facts of each case in the pigeonhole of an existing tort, the process often involving strained constructions or, even, leaving deserving plaintiffs without a remedy. Thus, trespass or nuisance may, at times, help though they may also prove futile because of some technicality.

(See, for instance, Bernstein of Leigh v. Skyviews & General Ltd. [1978] QB 479). For these old torts have their own limitations (e.g. actions in nuisance are only available to persons having an interest in land). Other illustrations could be given. Thus, an ingenious attempt to extend the tort of passing-off met with only a cautious response (Sim v. Heinz (HJ) Co. Ltd. [1959] 1 WLR 313). Defamation will, more often, be invoked, though this again will not always work (especially when the defence of truth is available). In the celebrated case of Tolley v. Fry [1931] AC 333, an amateur golfer was depicted without his permission on a poster advertising chocolate bars while playing golf. He was not described as a bad golfer; nor was he made to advertise a cheap product. But his action succeeded because the court was able to discover an innuendo: the advertisement conveyed the impression that he had “prostituted” his amateur status for gain, something which carried (carries?) a stigma in the English way of thinking. That this was really a “privacy” case, however, can be demonstrated by asking what the position would have been if the golfer depicted on the poster had been a celebrated professional. De lege ferenda he, too, should have received some legal protection against the unauthorised use of his picture; but the way the Tolley decision was phrased suggests that this action would have failed—and if this is so the tort of defamation is clearly inadequate for this purpose. The limitations of the tort of defamation also become obvious where the defence of truth is available. If, for example, a case like Melvin v. Read, 112 Cal. App. 285, 297 P. 91 (1931) were to arise in England the plaintiff would almost certainly be left without protection. Likewise with facts similar to those in Briscoe v. Reader’s Digest Association Inc., 483 P. 2d 34 (1971). English law thus does not encourage citizens to forgive even once, let alone seventy times seven! Re X ([1984] 1 WLR 1422) is, perhaps, the case that best brings out the unforgiving and casuistic mentality of English law.

10. In 1968, Mary Bell, a juvenile, was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to detention for life. In 1984, she was released on licence and, some time later, gave birth to a daughter who was made a ward of court at the initiative of the local authority. Somehow this became known to the Press and an application was made by her mother and the local authority to the High Court for an injunction prohibiting the disclosure of the identity and present whereabouts of both child and parents. The application, made on the ground that any such disclosure would be detrimental to the family’s newly found peace and stability, was accepted by Balcombe J and an order prohibiting publication of the said information (but not of the fact of the birth) was duly granted.

In an earlier wardship case (Re X [1975] Fam. 47) the first attempt was made to use the wardship jurisdiction in this type of situation in order to prohibit the publication of a book concerning the ward’s deceased father. This was because the book contained material which, as the defendants conceded, was likely to cause X serious psychological damage if it ever came to her notice. A unanimous Court of Appeal took the view that freedom of speech should prevail. In the event, therefore, the carefully balanced judgment of the trial judge was reversed, Lord Denning MR declaring that “it would be extending the wardship jurisdiction too far and infringing too much upon the freedom of the Press for us to grant an injunction in this case” (ibid. 59). Roskill LJ echoed similar views, though he felt that in appropriate circumstances a balancing of the competing interests might have to be attempted. Sir John Pennycuik was also anxious to preserve, at least “in exceptional circumstances” (ibid. 61), the right to make such an order in favour of the ward. In his view, it was the courts’ clear duty to attempt to balance the competing interests, even though in this instance freedom of speech prevailed.

One could of course try to reconcile these decisions by reference to their particular facts, even though to the reader of the law reports a clear distinction is not all that obvious. (The preference for free speech in the earlier Re X case is even more remarkable considering that the offending parts of the book—a mere eight pages—could have been removed at a very small cost which the parents of the ward were more than willing to meet.) Could one then look at the second Re X decision, delivered almost ten years after the earlier one, as reflecting a greater sensitivity to human privacy, especially in the light of adverse reactions—national and international—to the telephone tapping case of Malone v. Metropolitan Police Commissioner (No. 2) [1979] Ch. 344? Linking these two cases may strike some people as odd; but, it is submitted, one can legitimately treat Re X as a privacy case or, more precisely, as a case dealing with that type of privacy which Judge Cooley described as “the right to be let alone” (Tort (2nd edn., 1889), 29).

Seen in this light, Re X is a remarkable decision since it protects the anonymity of the (innocent) child and, at the same time, the anonymity of the mother/ex-criminal. Remarkable and yet typical of the way that protection is afforded by pushing into existing pigeonholes certain fact situations. And where tort law cannot afford a remedy, the unusual attempt was made to extend an inherent jurisdiction which was meant for many things but was hardly devised as a substitute for a non-existent tort of violation of privacy.

Re X, however, also makes the patchy nature of the protection most obvious. Thus, the mother’s anonymity is only incidentally protected. And once the wardship ends (through the death of the child or its reaching the age of 18), the protection will disappear. The Rehabilitation of Offenders Act 1974 will in this case afford no protection (s. 5); and mother and child will run the risk of having their lives destroyed because some popular tabloid feels that the revelation of their new identity may interest its gossip-thirsty readership. The limited nature of the protection is also obvious when one considers that the nature of the infringement of the judge’s order would render liable for contempt proceedings only those who were aware of it in the first place. To put it differently, a publication of the identity of Mary Bell by another newspaper, which independently made the same discovery and published it before the delivery of the judgment would go unpunished. Are these really acceptable results? Should a young girl of 17 be entitled to protection against her mother’s distant past but lose it once she has become 18? Should an ex-criminal—par excellence of the Mary Bell type—who committed the crime just barely after attaining the age of criminal capacity (10), be haunted by it for the rest of her life?

11. Sections of the Press have shown equal insensitivity in another area where, it is submitted, the plaintiff’s right to be left alone should prevail over the public’s interest to know. This involves the identification of victims of sexual offences.

The development of the law in this area is typical of the incremental growth of the Common law. First, no anonymity whatsoever was granted to these unfortunate victims. Then section 4 of the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976 granted anonymity to victims of rape offences (as defined narrowly by s. 7(2) of the Act). Victims of “lesser” sexual offences (such as unlawful sexual intercourse, incest, or buggery), anxious to be left alone to forget their traumatic experiences, were, in fact, left unprotected as far as their privacy was concerned. The Criminal Justice Act 1987 extended anonymity to cases involving conspiracy to rape and burglary with intent to rape; but in the House of Lords the Minister from the Home Office thought that any further extension of the anonymity laws would be “the thin end of the wedge”. The Calcutt Report disagreed, but the Home Office was, mysteriously it would seem, adamant. And then, quite unexpectedly and with very little publicity, the official attitude changed. The Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1991 made it possible to extend by statutory instrument anonymity to all cases of sexual offences; and Statutory Instrument 1336/1992 brought this protection into existence in October 1992. In this branch of the law, the incremental growth of English law has, surely, not been one of its strengths; and the adverse consequences that both the media and anonymous government circles feared would follow any extension of the anonymity laws have failed to materialise. (For further details on the absurdities of the old law see the second edition of this book, pages 320–1; for comparisons with US law see below. See, also, Villa-McDowell, “Privacy and the Rape Victim: The Inconsistent Treatment of Privacy Interests in The Recent Supreme Court Cases” 2 Southern California Review of Law and Women’s Studies, 293 (1992).)

12. Telephone tapping, sophisticated eavesdropping, and data banks can also make great intrusions into human privacy. Malone v. Metropolitan Police Commissioner [1979] Chapter 344 considers the first type of intrusion and after a long, erudite, but timid judgment reaches a negative result. This unfortunate conclusion was partly the result of the maxim that anything that is not specifically made illegal should be treated as being allowable, though the main argument against recognition of a new right was that such a step could only be taken by the legislator. (A favourite posture for many of our judges in their contemporary and timid mood.) Five years later the European Court ruled that telephone tapping was contrary to Articles 8 and 13 of the European Convention ((1984) 7 EHRR 14); and the legislator had to fall into line with the passing of the Interception of Communications Act 1985. American readers of Roberson v. Rochester Folding Box Co., 171 NY 538, 64 NE 442 (1902) will find nothing novel in this. But tort students should ask themselves whether it is acceptable in the light of Parliament's inability or unwillingness to face up to the problem. Justice—a non-political pressure group for law reform—had this to say in 1970 about English law. "English law does . . . provide a remedy for some kinds of intrusion into privacy, but it is certainly not adequate to meet activities of a society which is perfecting more and more sophisticated techniques for intrusion. The present law in the field of privacy is uncoordinated and unsatisfactory, and a strong case . . . exists for the creation by means of statutory provision of comprehensive protection for the right of privacy." In 1993, despite increasing concern and an ever-growing literature, the position remains the same. (For a comparison with American law see Brittan, "The Right of Privacy in England and the USA" 37 Tul. L. Rev. 235 (1963). For a fuller account of English law see Seipp, "English Judicial Recognition of a Right of Privacy" Oxford J. L. Studies (1983) 324 ff.)

13. The patchiness of English law just described may be in keeping with its casuistic nature; but it is not to everyone's liking. More importantly, even judges are beginning to wonder whether the time has not come to synthesise this rich case law. In R v. Kahn, for instance, ([1997] AC 558 at 582–3) Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead wondered "whether the present, piecemeal protection of privacy [may] have now developed to the extent that a more comprehensive principle can be seen to exist." In the view of these writers, such an outcome is desirable. Yet it is unlikely that a new tort of privacy will emerge overnight. The tort of breach of confidence may thus prove the most pliable of existing torts in the inevitable albeit gradual expansion of the protection of human privacy in English law. (In this sense, Sir Brian Neill "Privacy: A Challenge for the Next Century" in Protecting Privacy (Basil S Markesinis ed.) 1999, pp. 1 ff.) To be sure, this tort is not without its limitations. (They were clearly set out in a leading case: Coco v. A.N. Clark Engineers Ltd [1969] R.P.C. 41 at 47). These are that the information must (a) have the "necessary quality of confidence about it"; (b) it must "have been imparted in circumstances importing an obligation of confidence" and (c) there must have been an "unauthorized use of that information to the detriment of the party communicating it". The merit of using this tort as a springboard for further expansion of protected privacy lies not only in the predilection of English judges to expand their law incrementally but also in the fact that during its long history the tort has proved itself capable of expansion. Thus, the Spycatcher (AG v. Guardian Newspaper Ltd (No. 2) [1990] 1 AC 109) litigation proved beyond doubt that confidence does not depend, as was once thought to be the case, on the commercial value of the imparted information. (See Lord Keith's words in the Spycatcher case at p. 255.) A number of cases have also shown that the confidential relationships, from which the obligation may spring, can be varied and expanded. They will thus include contract (BSC v. Granada Television [1981] 1 All ER 417), domestic relationships (Argyll v. Argyll [1967] Ch. 302) and other relationships which may give rise to a reasonable expectation of privacy such as doctor/patient, lawyer/client and homosexual or extra-marital relationships. (Stephens v. Avery [1988] 2 All ER 477.) But the criteria set out in the Coco case also demonstrate the existing limitations of the protection. This is well illustrated by the recent case of Douglas and others v. Hello! Ltd ([2001] 2 WLR 992—a case concerned with a request for an interim injunction and thus inconclusive on substance). For there the plaintiffs' case (arising from a prohibited taking of a photograph at their wedding reception) cannot stand on breach of confidence, alone, if it is established at the trial that the prohibited photographs were taken not by guests of the couple but by "intruders" at the wedding reception. If, on the other hand, a wider notion of privacy were found to exist, then it would "accord recognition to the fact that the law has to protect not only those people whose trust has been abused but [also] those who simply find themselves subjected to an unwarranted intrusion into their personal lives." (Douglas, per Lord Justice Sedley at p. 1025.) That is why the learned Judge, after a careful scrutiny of the Human Rights Act 1988, was finally prepared to accept that the plaintiffs "have a powerful prima facie claim to redress for invasion of their privacy as a qualified right recognised and protected by English law." (ibid. at p. 1029.) Other celebrated cases could also be seen as suggesting that current protection of human privacy may be unacceptably patchy and even defective. (Thus, see, R v. Secretary of State for the Home Department ex parte Amnesty International and others (un-published report of the Queen's Bench Division, 15 February 2000) where the former President's confidential medical records were revealed to his opponents who were trying to have him tried in the UK. In this case the English court, arguably, succumbed to the particular publicity and related "pressures" that arouse out of this unusual and controversial litigation. Earl Spencer and Countess Spencer v. the UK (1998) 25 EHRR CD 113, involving the photographing of the Countess of Spencer with telephoto lens while walking in the grounds a private clinic, also seems a flawed decision or, rather, one that owes its existence to successful advocacy rather than any inherent sense of justice.

14. The comparison of German and American Law is, in more ways than one, an intellectually rewarding exercise. For both systems present considerable similarities (e.g. both have a written Constitution and both can claim a prodigious literature on the subject). And both can claim even greater differences in outcome (which can, again, be traced to their Constitutions and the fact that each was attempting to address problems relevant to their particular political backgrounds). The following summary of the law in the United States is taken from an Excursus that Professor David Anderson of the University of Texas at Austin contributed to chapter seven of Markesinis and Deakin, Tort Law 4th edn. (1999). We are grateful for his permission to reproduce here.

"Invasion of privacy"

Although it has no counterpart in English law, the American tort law of invasion of privacy is related closely enough to defamation. . . . Many libel suits in the United States are combined with claims for invasion of privacy. To some extent privacy law is an outgrowth of changes in the law of defamation. At one time a truthful statement made without adequate justification might have been actionable as defamation in either the United States or England, but as truth became an absolute defence, at least in the United States, the need for some other remedy became apparent. "Invasion of privacy" is an umbrella term encompassing four distinct American torts. In addition, American law recognises other "rights of privacy" that are not torts and are beyond the scope of this discussion. For example, a constitutional "right of privacy" protects against governmental interference in such personal matters as abortion and contraception (Roe v. Wade, 410 US 113 (1973); Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 US 479 (1965).), and "privacy" statutes restrict governmental acquisition and use of certain types of personal information. (E.g. Privacy Act of 1974, 5 USC, s. 552a (1992).)

Of the four privacy torts, the one closest to the core of the privacy concept is the cause of action for public disclosure of embarrassing private facts. A person may recover damages for a disclosure that would be highly offensive to a reasonable person and is not of legitimate public concern. (Restatement (Second) of Torts, s. 652D (1977).) Sexual activities and medical abnormalities are among the kinds of disclosures that are most often litigated. The matter need not have been completely secret before the defendant's disclosure. Even the most intimate secrets usually are known to one's closest friends and family, so it is enough that the defendant has disclosed publicly a matter that previously was known only to such a limited circle. (Sipple v. Chronicle Publishing Co., 154 Cal.App.3d 1040, 201 Cal.Rptr. 665 (1984); Dias v. Oakland Tribune, Inc. 139 Cal. App.3d 118, 188 Cal.Rptr. 762 (1983); Melvin v. Reid, 112 Cal.App. 285, 297 P. 91 (1931).) On the other hand, matters of official record may be disclosed with impunity, even if they were previously unknown by the public. (Howard v. Des Moines Register & Tribune Co., 283 NW2d 289 (1979), cert. denied 445 US 904 (1980).)

The central issue is what facts are "private", and the law has defined that term so narrowly—and the concept of legitimate public concern so broadly—that very few disclosures are actionable. Courts look to contemporary mores to determine what reasonable people would find highly offensive. From that point of reference, disclosures of such matters as one's income or net worth, (Wolf v. Regardie, 553 A.2d 1213 (DC.App. 1989); Schoneweis v. Dando, 231 Neb. 180, 435 NW 2d 666 (1989).) personal idiosyncrasies, (Virgil v. Time, Inc., 527 F. 2d 1122 (9th Cir. 1975), cert. denied 425 U.S. 998 (1976); Sidis v. F.-R. Publishing Corp., 113 F.2d 806 (2nd Cir.), cert. denied 311 US 711 (1940).) illegitimacy, (Heath v. Playboy Enterprises Inc., 732 F. Supp. 1145 (1990).) or medical diagnosis (Davis v. Monsanto Co., 627 F.Supp. 418 (1986); Child Protection Group v. Cline, 350 SE 2d 541 (1986); Meetze v. Associated Press, 230 SC 330, 95 SE 2d 606 (1956).) usually are held not to be sufficiently offensive.

The concept of legitimate public concern is inspired by First Amendment values, and therefore is interpreted expansively. The public usually is held to have a legitimate interest in the identity of victims of crimes (including rape and other sex offences), The Florida Star v. BIF, 491 US 524 (1989); Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 US 469 (1975).) the sexual activities and medical problems of public officials, (Hubert v. Harte-Hanks Texas Newspapers Inc., 652 SW 2d 546 (1983); Kapellas v. Kofman, 1 Cal.3d 20, 81 Cal. Rptr. 360, 459 P.2d 912 (1969).) and the marital difficulties of celebrities. (Carlisle v. Fawcett Publications Inc., 201 Cal. App. 2d 733, 20 Cal.Rptr. 405 (1962).) Courts are reluctant to second-guess an editor's judgement that a matter is of legitimate public concern; some judges have gone so far as to say they will defer to the editor's judgement unless it is one no rational editor could have made. (Gilbert v. Medical Economics Co., 665 F.2d 305 (10th Cir. 1981).)

In a society in which free flow of information is treated, judges find it difficult to as a paramount value impose liability for disclosing truth. The tort of public disclosure of truthful but embarrassing private facts, therefore, exists more in theory than in practice; claims are numerous, but they almost never succeed.

The second American privacy tort is a cause of action for publications that depict a person in a false light. The falsehood need not be defamatory, but it must place the person in a false light that would be highly offensive to a reasonable person. For example, affixing the plaintiff's byline to a sensational "first-person" account that he did not write gave rise to a cause of action for false-light invasion of privacy. (Dempsey v. National Enquirer, 702 F.Supp. 934 (D.Me. 1989).)

The tort is a cousin to defamation, and is subject to many of the same state law restrictions. (Fellows v. National Enquirer Inc., 42 Cal.3d 234, 721 P.2d 97, 228 Cal.Rptr. 215 (1986).) Similar constitutional restrictions also apply. A plaintiff who is a public official or public figure must show that the defendant published with reckless disregard of the possible falsity. (Cantrell v. Forest City Publishing Co., 419 US 245 (1974).) Private plaintiffs probably must prove at least that the defendant was negligent with respect to the falsity, and sometimes have been required to meet the same standard as a public plaintiff. (Lovgren v. Citizens First National Bank, 126 Ill.2d 411, 534 NE 2d 987 (1989).)

Because of these restrictions and the necessity of showing a high degree of offensiveness, false-light cases rarely succeed. Some states have refused to recognise the tort at all, (Renwick v. The News and Observer Pub. Co., 310 NC 312, 312 SE 2d 405, cert. denied 469 US 858 (1984).) and there is considerable scholarly debate about its legitimacy. (See e.g. Diane Zimmerman, "False Light Invasion of Privacy: The Light that Failed", 64 NYULR 364 (1989).)

The two remaining privacy torts are of more practical significance. One is a cause of action for intentional and highly offensive intrusion into a person's private life. This tort supplements the law of trespass in two principal ways. First, it provides a remedy where the intrusion is physical but does not occur on plaintiff's premises. Thus, President Kennedy's widow was able to stop the famous "paparazzo" Ron Galella from shadowing her and her children to photograph them in public parks, restaurants, and schools. (Galella v. Onassis, 487 F.2d 986 (2d Cir. 1973).) Secondly, it provides a remedy where the intrusion is accomplished without physical invasion, for example, by electronic surveillance or telescopic lenses. (Dietemann v. Time Inc., 449 F.2d 245 (9th Cir. 1971).)

The intrusion branch of privacy provides a more effective remedy for media invasions of personal privacy than the other branches. In part, this is because the First Amendment provides less protection for newsgathering activities than for publication. An important California Supreme Court decision illustrates this. A television cameraman accompanied a helicopter rescue crew to the site of a highway accident, outfitted the flight nurse with a microphone, and filmed the rescue of a woman who was seriously and permanently injured in the wreck. The woman sued for both the intrusion and the subsequent broadcast of video showing her begging to be allowed to die. The court held that the First Amendment barred the woman's claims for public disclosure of the sounds and images because those were a matter of legitimate public concern, but did not bar her claim for the TV crew's intrusion into a situation in which she had legitimate expectations of privacy.

With two dissenting votes, the court rejected the defendants' argument that they had a First Amendment right to intrude to obtain information that was of legitimate public concern. (Shulman v. Group W. Productions, 18 Cal. 4th 200, 74 Cal. Rptr. 843, 955 P. 2d 469 (1998).)

This decision was based on common law, but the California legislature subsequently created a stronger statutory remedy. The statute makes it a tort to trespass or use a "visual or auditory enhancing device"—e.g., a telephoto lens or a directional microphone—to film or record a person engaging in personal or familial activities under circumstances in which the person had a reasonable expectation of privacy. A person violating the statute is liable for up to three times the amount of special and general damages, plus punitive damages, and also may be enjoined. (Cal.Civil Code s. 1708.8. The same remedies are available against a publisher or broadcaster who induces another person to violate the statute, and if the image or recording is published or broadcast, the plaintiff may recover the profits gained thereby.)

The final privacy tort, which generates more successful claims than the other three branches combined, provides a remedy for commercial exploitation of a person's name or likeness. It arose from the un-consented use of a person's photograph or testimonial in advertisements, (Pavesich v. New England Life Insurance Co., 122 Ga. 190, 50 SE 68 (1905).) but it now extends to unauthorized use of a person's distinctive nickname, (Hirsch v. S C Johnson & Son Inc., 90 Wis. 2d 379, 280 NW 2d (1979).) slogan, (Carson v. Here's Johnny Portable Toilets Inc., 698 F.2d 831 (6th Cir. 1983).) or costume, (Motschenbacher v. R J Reynolds Tobacco Co., 498 F.2d 821 (9th Cir. 1974).) or to the use of a model who looks like the plaintiff, (Onassis v. Christian Dior-New York Inc., 122 Misc.2d 603, 472 NYS 2d 254 (trial court 1984), aff'd., 110 AD 2d 1095, 488 NYS 2d 943 (1985).) or a singer who imitates plaintiff's vocal style. (Midler v. Ford Motor Co., 849 F.2d 460 (9th Cir. 1988), cert. denied 503 US 951 (1992).)

This branch of the tort has produced an entire industry based on the value of celebrity endorsements, and often seems to have more to do with commerce than with personal privacy. Indeed, the interest it protects is sometimes called a "right of publicity" rather than a right of privacy. Unlike the other privacy torts, which are personal to the victim and cannot be assigned or enforced after death, the right to control commercial exploitation is assignable inter vivos, (Factors Etc. Inc. v. Pro Arts Inc., 579 F 2d 215 (2d Cir. 1978), cert. denied 440 US 908 (1979).) and in most jurisdictions is held to be a descendible interest enforceable at least for a number of years after the person's death. (Martin Luther King Jnr., Centre for Social Change Inc. v. American Heritage Products Inc., 250 Ga. 135, 296 SE 2d 697 (1982).)

The tort is not conspicuously effective in protecting personal privacy because it covers only exploitation for commercial purposes, and most uses of personality for purposes even tangentially related to journalism or entertainment are not considered commercial. It is not actionable for a television station to use film of a bleeding accident victim to promote a documentary about emergency medical treatment, (Anderson v. Fisher Broadcasting Co. Inc., 300 Or. 452, 712 P.2d 803 (1986).) or for a magazine that had published photos of a sports hero to republish the photos in advertisements promoting the magazine. (Namath v. Sports Illustrated., 80 Misc. 2d 531, 363 NYS 2d 279 (Sup. Ct. 1975), aff'd., 48 AD 2d 487, 371 NYS 2d 10, 352 NE 2d 584 (1976).)

Thus, despite the existence of four rather elaborate privacy torts, American law rarely provides a remedy for persons who believe their privacy has been invaded by media or others. Many of the criticisms by Sir David Calcutt and others of England's failure to protect privacy could be made of American law as well.

Addendum 1

Cox Broadcasting Corp. v. Cohn, 420 US 469 (1975).

MR JUSTICE WHITE delivered the opinion of the court.

The issue before us in this case is whether consistently with the First and Fourteenth Amendments a State may extend a cause of action for damages for invasion of privacy caused by the publication of the name of a deceased rape victim which was publicly revealed in connection with the prosecution of the crime . . .

In August 1971, appellee's 17-year-old daughter was the victim of a rape and did not survive the incident. Six youths were soon indicted for murder and rape. Although there was substantial press coverage of the crime and of subsequent developments, the identity of the victim was not disclosed pending trial perhaps because of Ga. Code ann. § 26-9901 which makes it a misdemeanor to publish or broadcast the name or identity of a rape victim. In April 1972, some eight months later, the six defendants appeared in court. Five pleaded guilty to rape or attempted rape, the charge of murder having been dropped. The guilty pleas were accepted by the court, and the trial of the defendant pleading not guilty was set for a later date.

In the course of the proceedings that day, appellant Wassell, a reporter covering the incident for his employer, learned the name of the victim from an examination of the indictments which were made available for his inspection in the courtroom. That the name of the victim appears in the indictments and that the indictments were public records available for inspection are not disputed. Later that day, Wassell broadcast over the facilities of station WSB-TV, a television station owned by appellant Cox Broadcasting Corporation, a news report concerning the court proceedings. The report named the victim of the crime and was repeated the following day.

In May 1972, appellee brought an action for money damages against appellants, relying on § 26-9901 and claiming that his right to privacy had been invaded by the television broadcast giving the name of his deceased daughter. Appellants admitted the broadcasts but claimed that they were privileged under both state law and the First and Fourteenth Amendment. The trial court rejecting the appellants' constitutional claims and holding that the Georgia statute gave a civil remedy to those injured by its violation, granted summary judgment to appellee as to liability, with the determination of damages to await trial by jury.

On appeal, the Georgia Supreme Court, in its initial opinion, held that the trial court had erred in construing § 26-9901 to extend a civil cause of action for invasion of privacy and thus found it unnecessary to consider the constitutionality of the statute (231 Ga. 60, 200 SE 2d 127 (1973)). The court went on to rule, however, that the complaint stated a cause of action "for the invasion of appellee's right of privacy, or for the tort of public disclosure" a "common law tort exist[ing] in this jurisdiction without the help of the statute that the trial judge in this case relied on (231 Ga. 52, 200 SE 2d 130 (1973)). Although the privacy invaded was not that of the deceased victim, the father was held to have stated a claim for invasion of his own privacy by reason of the publication of his daughter's name. The court explained, however, that liability did not follow as a matter of law and that summary judgment was improper; whether the public disclosure of the name actually invaded appellee's "zone of privacy", and if so, to what extent were issues to be determined by the trier of fact. Also, "in formulating such an issue for determination by the fact-finder, it is reasonable to require the appellee to prove that the appellants invaded his privacy with wilful or negligent disregard for the fact that reasonable men would find the invasion highly offensive" 231 Ga. 64, 200 SE 2d 131. The Georgia Supreme Court did agree with the trial court, however, that the First and Fourteenth Amendments did not, as a matter of law, require judgment for appellants. The court concurred with the statement in Brisco v. Reader's Digest Association Inc. 4 Cal. 3d 529, 541 93 Cal. Rptr. 866, 874, 483 P. 2d 34, 42 (1971), that "the rights guaranteed by the First Amendment do not require total abrogation of the right to privacy. The goals sought by each may be achieved with a minimum of intrusion upon the other."

Upon motion for rehearing the Georgia court countered the argument that the victim's name was a matter of public interest and could be published with impunity by relying on § 26-9901 as an authoritative declaration of State policy that the name of a rape victim was not a matter of public concern. This time the court felt compelled to determine the constitutionality of the statute and sustained it as a "legitimate limitation on the right of freedom of expression contained in the First Amendment". The court could discern "no public interest or general concern about the identity of the victim of such a crime as will make the right to disclose the identity of the victim rise to the level of First Amendment protection" (231 Ga. 68-9, 200 SE 2d 133-4).

We postponed decision as to our jurisdiction over this appeal to the hearing on the merits (415 US 912 (1974)). We conclude that the court has jurisdiction and reverse the judgment of the Georgia Supreme Court . . .

Georgia stoutly defends both § 26–9901 and the State’s common law privacy action challenged here. Her claims are not without force, for powerful arguments can be made, and have been made, that however it may be ultimately defined, there is a zone of privacy surrounding every individual, a zone within which the State may protect him from intrusion by the press, with all its attendant publicity. Indeed, the central thesis of the root article by Warren and Brandeis, “The Right of Privacy” 4 Harv. L. Rev. 193, 196 (1890), was that the press was overstepping its prerogatives by publishing essentially private information and that there should be a remedy for the alleged abuses.

More compelling, this century has experienced a strong tide running in favour of the so-called right of privacy. In 1967, we noted that “[i]t has been said that a ‘right of privacy’ has been recognised at common law in 30 States plus the district of Columbia and by statute in four States” (Time, Inc. v. Hill 385 US 374, 383 n. 7 (1967)). We there cited the 1964 edition of Prosser’s Law of Torts. The 1971 edition of that same source states that “[i]n one form or another, the right of privacy is by this time recognised and accepted in all but a very few jurisdictions”. Prosser, id. (4th ed. 1971), at 804 [footnote omitted]. Nor is it irrelevant here that the right of privacy is of recent arrival in the jurisprudence of Georgia, which has embraced the right in some form since 1905 when the Georgia Supreme Court decided the leading case of Pavesich v. New England Life Inc. Co. 122 Ga. 190, 50 SE 68 (1905).

These are impressive credentials for a right of privacy, but we should recognize that we do not have at issue here an action for the invasion of privacy involving the appropriation of one’s name or photograph, a physical or other tangible intrusion into a private area, or a publication of otherwise private information that is also false although perhaps not defamatory. The version of the privacy tort now before us—termed in Georgia “the tort of public disclosure”, 231 Ga. 62, 200 SE 2d 130—is that in which the plaintiff claims the right to be free from unwanted publicity about his private affairs, which, although wholly true, would be offensive to a person of ordinary sensibilities. Because the gravamen of the claimed injury is the publication of information, whether true or not, the dissemination of which is embarrassing or otherwise painful to an individual, it is here that claims of privacy most directly confront the constitutional freedoms of speech and press. The face-off is apparent, and the appellants urge upon us the broad holding that the press may not be made criminally or civilly liable for publishing information that is neither false nor misleading but absolutely accurate, however damaging it may be to reputation or individual sensibilities.

It is true that in defamation actions, where the protected interest is personal reputation, the prevailing view is that truth is a defence; and the message of New York Times v. Sullivan 376 US 254 (1964); Garrison v. Louisiana 379 US 64 (1964); Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts 388 US 130 (1967), and like cases is that the defence of truth is constitutionally required where the subject of the publication is a public official or public figure. What is more, the defamed public official or public figure must prove not only that the publication is false but that it was knowingly so or was circulated with reckless disregard for its truth or falsity. Similarly, where the interest at issue is privacy rather than reputation and the right claimed is to be free from the publication of false or misleading information about one’s affairs, the target of the publication must prove knowing or reckless falsehood where the materials published, although assertedly private, are “matters of public interest” (Time Inc. v. Hill, above, 385 US 387–8).

The court has nevertheless carefully left open the question whether the First and Fourteenth Amendment require that truth be recognized as a defence in a defamation action brought by a private person as distinguished from a public official or public figure. Garrison held that where criticism is of a public official and his conduct of public business, “the interest in private reputation is overborne by the larger public interest, secured by the Constitution, in the dissemination of truth”, 379 US 72–3 [footnote omitted], but recognised that “different interest may be involved where purely private libels, totally unrelated to public affairs, are concerned: therefore, nothing we say today is to be taken as intimating any views as to the impact of the constitutional guarantees in the discrete area of purely private libels”, id., at 72 n. 8. In similar fashion, Time v. Hill, above, expressly saved the question whether truthful publication of very private matters unrelated to public affairs could be constitutionally proscribed (385 US 383 n. 7).

Those precedents, as well as other considerations, counsel similar caution here. In this sphere of collision between claims of privacy and those of the free press, the interests on both sides are plainly rooted in the traditions and significant concerns of our society. Rather than address the broader question whether truthful publication may ever be subjected to civil or criminal liability consistently with the First and Fourteenth Amendments, or to put it another way, free from unwanted publicity in the press, it is appropriate to focus on the narrower interface between press and privacy that this case presents, namely whether the State may impose sanctions on the accurate publication of the name of a rape victim obtained from public records—more specifically, from judicial records which are maintained in connection with a public prosecution and which themselves are open to public inspection. We are convinced that the State may not do so.

In the first place, in a society in which each individual has but limited time and resources with which to observe at first hand the operations of his government, he relies necessarily upon the press to bring him in convenient form the facts of those operations. Great responsibility is accordingly placed upon the news media to report fully and accurately the proceedings of government, and official records and documents open to the public are the basic data of governmental operations. Without the information provided by the press most of us and many of our representatives would be unable to vote intelligently or to register opinions on the administration of government generally. With respect to judicial proceedings in particular, the function of the press serves to guarantee the fairness of trials and to bring to bear the beneficial effects of public scrutiny upon the administration of justice. [Reference.]

Appellee has claimed in his litigation that the efforts of the press have infringed his right to privacy by broadcasting to the world the fact that his daughter was a rape victim. The commission of crime, prosecutions resulting from it, and judicial proceedings arising from the prosecutions, however, are without question events of legitimate concern to the public and consequently fall within the responsibility of the press to report the operations of government. . . .

The developing law surrounding the tort of invasion of privacy recognizes a privilege in the press to report the events of judicial proceedings. The Warren and Brandeis article, supra, noted that the proposed new right would be limited in the same manner as actions for libel and slander where such a publication was a privileged communication: “the right to privacy is not invaded by any publication made in a court of justice . . . and (at least in many jurisdictions) reports of any such proceedings would in some measure be accorded a like privilege.”

Addendum 2

The Florida Star v. B.J.F. Supreme Court of the United States, 1989. 491 US 524, 109 S.Ct. 2603, 105 L.Ed. 2d 443, 16 Med. L. Repr. 1801.

JUSTICE MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the Court.

Florida Stat. s. 794.03 (1987) makes it unlawful to “print, publish, or broadcast . . . in any instrument of mass communication” the name of the victim of a sexual offence. Pursuant to this statute, appellant The Florida Star was found civilly liable for publishing the name of a rape victim which it had obtained from a publicly released police report. The issue presented here is whether this result comports with the First Amendment. We hold that it does not.

I. The Florida Star is a weekly newspaper which serves the community of Jacksonville, Florida, and which has an average circulation of approximately 18,000 copies. A regular feature of the newspaper is its “Police Reports” section. The section, typically two to three pages in length, contains brief articles describing local criminal incidents under police investigation. On October 20, 1983, appellee B.J.F. reported to the Duval County, Florida, Sheriff’s Department (the Department) that she had been robbed and sexually assaulted by an unknown assailant. The Department prepared a report on the incident which identified BJF by her full name. The Department then placed the report in its press room. The Department does not restrict access either to the press room or to the reports made available therein.

A Florida Star reporter-trainee sent to the pressroom copied the police report verbatim, including BJF's full name, on a blank duplicate of the Department's forms. A Florida Star reporter then prepared a one-paragraph article about the crime, derived entirely from the trainee's copy of the police report. The article included BJF's full name. It appeared in the "Robberies" subsection of the "Police Reports" section on 29 October 1983, one of fifty-four police blotter stories in that day's edition. The article read: "[BJF] reported on Thursday, 20 October, she was crossing Brentwood Park, which is in the 500 block of Golfair Boulevard, enroute to her bus stop, when an unknown black man ran up behind the lady and placed a knife to her neck and told her not to yell. The suspect then undressed the lady and had sexual intercourse with her before fleeing the scene with her 60 cents, Timex watch and gold necklace. Patrol efforts have been suspended concerning this incident because of lack of evidence."

In printing BJF's full name, The Florida Star violated its internal policy of not publishing the names of sexual offence victims.

[BJF sued both the newspaper and the Sheriff's Department. The latter settled for £2,500. The Star's motion to dismiss was denied.]

At the ensuing day-long trial, BJF testified that she had suffered emotional distress from the publication of her name. She stated that she had heard about the article from fellow workers and acquaintances; that her mother had received several threatening phone calls from a man who stated that he would rape BJF again; and that these events had forced BJF to change her phone number and residence, to seek police protection, and to obtain mental health counselling. In defence, The Florida Star put forth evidence indicating that the newspaper had learned BJF's name from the incident report released by the Department, and that the newspaper's violation of its internal rule against publishing the names of sexual offence victims was inadvertent.

At the close of BJF's case, and again at the close of its defence, The Florida Star moved for a directed verdict. On both occasions, the trial judge denied these motions. He ruled from the bench that s. 794.03 was constitutional because it reflected a proper balance between the First Amendment and privacy rights, as it applied only to a narrow set of "rather sensitive . . . criminal offences." At the close of the newspaper's defence, the judge granted BJF's motion for a directed verdict on the issue of negligence, finding the newspaper per se negligent based upon its violation of s. 794.03. This ruling left the jury to consider only the questions of causation and damages. The judge instructed the jury that it could award BJF punitive damages if it found that the newspaper had "acted with reckless indifference to the rights of others." The jury awarded BJF £75,000 in compensatory damages and £25,000 in punitive damages. Against the actual damage award, the judge set off BJF's settlement with the Department.

The First District Court of Appeal affirmed in a three-paragraph per curiam opinion. . . . The Supreme Court of Florida denied discretionary review.

The Florida Star appealed to this Court. We noted probable jurisdiction, and now reverse.

II. The tension between the right which the First Amendment accords to a free press, on the one hand, and the protections which various statutes and common-law doctrines accord to personal privacy against the publication of truthful information, on the other, is a subject we have addressed several times in recent years. Our decisions in cases involving government attempts to sanction the accurate dissemination of information as invasive of privacy, have not, however, exhaustively considered this conflict. On the contrary, although our decisions have without exception upheld the press's right to publish, we have emphasized each time that we were resolving this conflict only as it arose in a discrete factual context.

The parties to this case frame their contentions in light of a trilogy of cases which have presented, in different contexts, the conflict between truthful reporting and state-protected privacy interests. [The Court briefly reviewed Cox Broadcasting, Oklahoma Publishing, and Daily Mail.]

Appellant takes the position that this case is indistinguishable from Cox Broadcasting. Alternatively, it urges that our decisions in the above trilogy, and in other cases in which we have held that the right of the press to publish truth overcame asserted interests other than personal privacy, can be distilled to yield a broader First Amendment principle that the press may never be punished, civilly or criminally, for publishing the truth. Appellee counters that the privacy trilogy is inapposite, because in each case the private information already appeared on a “public record,” and because the privacy interests at stake were far less profound than in the present case. In the alternative, appellee urges that Cox Broadcasting be overruled and replaced with a categorical rule that publication of the name of a rape victim never enjoys constitutional protection.

We conclude that imposing damages on appellant for publishing BJF’s name violates the First Amendment, although not for either of the reasons appellant urges. Despite the strong resemblance this case bears to Cox Broadcasting, that case cannot fairly be read as controlling here. The name of the rape victim in that case was obtained from courthouse records that were open to public inspection, a fact which Justice White’s opinion for the Court repeatedly noted (noting “special protected nature of accurate reports of judicial proceedings”) (emphasis added). Significantly, one of the reasons we gave in Cox Broadcasting for invalidating the challenged damages award was the important role the press plays in subjecting trials to public scrutiny and thereby helping guarantee their fairness. That role is not directly compromised where, as here, the information in question comes from a police report prepared and disseminated at a time at which not only had no adversarial criminal proceedings begun, but no suspect had been identified.

Nor need we accept appellant’s invitation to hold broadly that truthful publication may never be punished consistent with the First Amendment. Our cases have carefully eschewed reaching this ultimate question, mindful that the future may bring scenarios which prudence counsels our not resolving anticipatorily. See, e.g., Near v. Minnesota (hypothesising “publication of the sailing dates of transports or the number and location of troops”); see also Garrison v. Louisiana (endorsing absolute defence of truth “where discussion of public affairs is concerned,” but leaving unsettled the constitutional implications of truthfulness “in the discrete area of purely private libels”); Landmark Communications Inc. v. Virginia, 435 US 829, 838 (1978); Time, Inc. v. Hill, 385 US 374, 383, n. 7 (1967). Indeed, in Cox Broadcasting, we pointedly refused to answer even the less sweeping question “whether truthful publications may ever be subjected to civil or criminal liability” for invading “an area of privacy” defined by the State. Respecting the fact that press freedom and privacy rights are both “plainly rooted in the traditions and significant concerns of our society,” we instead focused on the less sweeping issue of “whether the State may impose sanctions on the accurate publication of the name of a rape victim obtained from public records—more specifically, from judicial records which are maintained in connection with a public prosecution and which themselves are open to public inspection.” We continue to believe that the sensitivity and significance of the interests presented in clashes between First Amendment and privacy rights counsel relying on limited principles that sweep no more broadly than the appropriate context of the instant case.

In our view, this case is appropriately analysed with reference to such a limited First Amendment principle. It is the one, in fact, which we articulated in Daily Mail in our synthesis of prior cases involving attempts to punish truthful publication: “[I]f a newspaper lawfully obtains truthful information about a matter of public significance then state officials may not constitutionally punish publication of the information, absent a need to further a state interest of the highest order.” According to the press the ample protection provided by that principle is supported by at least three separate considerations, in addition to, of course, the overarching “public interest, secured by the Constitution, in the dissemination of truth.” The cases on which the Daily Mail synthesis relied demonstrate these considerations.

First, because the Daily Mail formulation only protects the publication of information which a newspaper has “lawfully obtain[ed],” the government retains ample means of safeguarding significant interests upon which publication may impinge, including protecting a rape victim’s anonymity. To the extent sensitive information rests in private hands, the government may under some circumstances forbid its non consensual acquisition, thereby bringing outside of the Daily Mail principle the publication of any information so acquired. To the extent sensitive information is in the government's custody, it has even greater power to forestall or mitigate the injury caused by its release. The government may classify certain information, establish and enforce procedures ensuring its redacted release, and extend a damages remedy against the government or its officials where the government's mishandling of sensitive information leads to its dissemination. Where information is entrusted to the government, a less drastic means than punishing truthful publication almost always exists for guarding against the dissemination of private facts. See, e.g., [Landmark Communications] ("much of the risk [from disclosure of sensitive information regarding judicial disciplinary proceedings] can be eliminated through careful internal procedures to protect the confidentiality of Commission proceedings"); [Oklahoma Publishing] (noting trial judge's failure to avail himself of the opportunity, provided by a state statute, to close juvenile hearing to the public, including members of the press, who later broadcast juvenile defendant's name); [Cox Broadcasting] ("If there are privacy interests to be protected in judicial proceedings, the States must respond by means which avoid public documentation or other exposure of private information").

A second consideration undergirding the Daily Mail principle is the fact that punishing the press for its dissemination of information which is already publicly available is relatively unlikely to advance the interests in the service of which the State seeks to act. It is not, of course, always the case that information lawfully acquired by the press is known, or accessible, to others. But where the government has made certain information publicly available, it is highly anomalous to sanction persons other than the source of its release. We noted this anomaly in Cox Broadcasting: "By placing the information in the public domain on official court records, the State must be presumed to have concluded that the public interest was thereby being served." The Daily Mail formulation reflects the fact that it is a limited set of cases indeed where, despite the accessibility of the public to certain information, a meaningful public interest is served by restricting its further release by other entities, like the press. As Daily Mail observed in its summary of Oklahoma Publishing, "once the truthful information was 'publicly revealed' or 'in the public domain' the court could not constitutionally restrain its dissemination."

A third and final consideration is the "timidity and self-censorship which may result from allowing the media to be punished for publishing certain truthful information". Cox Broadcasting noted this concern with over deterrence in the context of information made public through official court records, but the fear of excessive media self-suppression is applicable as well to other information released without qualification, by the government. A contrary rule, [denying] protection to those who rely on the government's implied representations of the lawfulness of dissemination, would force upon the media the onerous obligation of sifting through government press releases, reports, and pronouncements to prune out material arguably unlawful for publication. This situation could inhere even where the newspaper's sole object was to reproduce, with no substantial change, the government's rendition of the event in question.

Applied to the instant case, the Daily Mail principle clearly commands reversal. The first inquiry is whether the newspaper "lawfully obtain[ed] truthful information about a matter of public significance." It is undisputed that the news article describing the assault on BJB was accurate. In addition, appellant lawfully obtained BJB's name. Appellee's argument to the contrary is based on the fact that under Florida law, police reports which reveal the identity of the victim of a sexual offence are not among the matters of "public record" which the public, by law, is entitled to inspect. But the fact that the state officials are not required to disclose such reports does not make it unlawful for a newspaper to receive them when furnished by the government. Nor does the fact that the Department apparently failed to fulfil its obligation under s. 794.03 not to "cause or allow to be . . . published" the name of a sexual offence victim make the newspaper's ensuing receipt of this information unlawful. Even assuming the Constitution permitted a State to proscribe receipt of information, Florida has not taken this step. It is clear, furthermore, that the news article concerned “a matter of public significance,” in the sense in which the Daily Mail synthesis of prior cases used that term. That is, the article generally, as opposed to the specific identity contained within it, involved a matter of paramount public import: the commission, and investigation, of a violent crime which had been reported to authorities. See Cox Broadcasting (article identifying victim of rape-murder); [Oklahoma Publishing] (article identifying juvenile alleged to have committed murder); [Daily Mail] (same); cf. [Landmark Communications] (article identifying judges whose conduct was being investigated).

The second inquiry is whether imposing liability on appellant pursuant to s. 794.03 serves “a need to further a state interest of the highest order.” [Daily Mail] Appellee argues that a rule punishing publication furthers three closely related interests: the privacy of victims of sexual offences; the physical safety of such victims, who may be targeted for retaliation if their names become known to their assailants; and the goal of encouraging victims of such crimes to report these offences without fear of exposure.

At a time in which we are daily reminded of the tragic reality of rape, it is undeniable that these are highly significant interests, a fact underscored by the Florida Legislature’s explicit attempt to protect these interests by enacting a criminal statute prohibiting much dissemination of victim identities. We accordingly do not rule out the possibility that, in a proper case, imposing civil sanctions for publication of the name of a rape victim might be so overwhelmingly necessary to advance these interests as to satisfy the Daily Mail standard. For three independent reasons, however, imposing liability for publication under the circumstances of this case is too precipitous a means of advancing these interests to convince us that there is a “need” within the meaning of the Daily Mail formulation for Florida to take this extreme step. Cf. Landmark Communications (invalidating penalty on publication despite State’s expressed interest in non dissemination, reflected in statute prohibiting unauthorised divulging of names of judges under investigation).

First is the manner in which appellant obtained the identifying information in question. As we have noted, where the government itself provides information to the media, it is most appropriate to assume that the government had, but failed to utilise, far more limited means of guarding against dissemination than the extreme step of punishing truthful speech. That assumption is richly borne out in this case. BJJ’s identity would never have come to light were it not for the erroneous, if inadvertent, inclusion by the Department of her full name in an accident report made available in a press room open to the public. Florida’s policy against disclosure of rape victims’ identities, reflected in s. 794.03, was undercut by the Department’s failure to abide by this policy. Where, as here, the government has failed to police itself in disseminating information, it is clear under Cox Broadcasting, Oklahoma Publishing, and Landmark Communications that the imposition of damages against the press for its subsequent publication can hardly be said to be a narrowly tailored means of safeguarding anonymity. Once the government has placed such information in the public domain, “reliance must rest upon the judgment of those who decide what to publish or broadcast,” [Cox Broadcasting] and hopes for restitution must rest upon the willingness of the government to compensate victims for their loss of privacy, and to protect them from the other consequences of its mishandling of the information which these victims provided in confidence.

That appellant gained access to the information in question through a government news release makes it especially likely that, if liability were to be imposed, self-censorship would result. Reliance on a news release is a paradigmatically “routine newspaper reporting techniqu[e].” [Daily Mail] The government’s issuance of such a release, without qualification, can only convey to recipients that the government considered dissemination lawful, and indeed expected the recipients to disseminate the information further. Had appellant merely reproduced the news release prepared and released by the Department, imposing civil damages would surely violate the First Amendment. The fact that appellant converted the police report into a news story by adding the linguistic connecting tissue necessary to transform the report’s facts into full sentences cannot change this result.

A second problem with Florida's imposition of liability for publication is the broad sweep of the negligence per se standard applied under the civil cause of action implied from s. 794.03. Unlike claims based on the common law tort of invasion of privacy, civil actions based on s. 794.03 require no case-by-case findings that the disclosure of a fact about a person's private life was one that a reasonable person would find highly offensive. On the contrary, under the per se theory of negligence adopted by the courts below, liability follows automatically from publication. This is so regardless of whether the identity of the victim is already known throughout the community; whether the victim has voluntarily called public attention to the offence; or whether the identity of the victim has otherwise become a reasonable subject of public concern—because, perhaps, questions have arisen whether the victim fabricated an assault by a particular person. Nor is there a scienter requirement of any kind under s. 794.03, engendering the perverse result that truthful publications challenged pursuant to this cause of action are less protected by the First Amendment than even the least protected defamatory falsehoods: those involving purely private figures, where liability is evaluated under a standard, usually applied by a jury, of ordinary negligence. See Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc. We have previously noted the impermissibility of categorical prohibitions upon media access where important First Amendment interests are at stake. See Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court, 457 US 596, 608 (1982) (invalidating state statute providing for the categorical exclusion of the public from trials of sexual offences involving juvenile victims.) More individualised adjudication is no less indispensable where the State, seeking to safeguard the anonymity of crime victims, sets its face against publication of their names.

Third, and finally, the facial under-inclusiveness of s. 794.03 raises serious doubts about whether Florida is, in fact, serving, with this statute, the significant interests which appellee invokes in support of affirmance. Section 794.03 prohibits the publication of identifying information only if this information appears in an “instrument of mass communication”, a term the statute does not define. Section 794.03 does not prohibit the spread by other means of the identities of victims of sexual offences. An individual who maliciously spreads word of the identity of a rape victim is thus not covered, despite the fact that the communication of such information to persons who live near, or work with, the victim may have consequences equally devastating as the exposure of her name to large numbers of strangers.

When a State attempts the extraordinary measure of punishing truthful publication in the name of privacy, it must demonstrate its commitment to advancing this interest by applying its prohibition even-handedly, to the small time disseminator as well as the media giant. Where important First Amendment interests are at stake, the mass scope of disclosure is not an acceptable surrogate for injury. A ban on disclosures effected by “instrument[s] of mass communication” simply cannot be defended on the ground that partial prohibitions may effect partial relief. See [Daily Mail] (statute is insufficiently tailored to interest in protecting anonymity where it restricted only newspapers, not the electronic media or other forms of publication, from identifying juvenile defendants); id., at 110 (Rehnquist, J., concurring in judgment) (same); cf. Arkansas Writers' Project, Inc. v. Ragland, 481 US 221, 229 (1987); Minneapolis Star & Tribune Co. v. Minnesota Comm'r of Revenue, 460 US 575, 585 (1983). Without more careful and inclusive precautions against alternative forms of dissemination, we cannot conclude that Florida's selective ban on publication by the mass media satisfactorily accomplishes its stated purpose.

III. Our holding today is limited. We do not hold that truthful publication is automatically constitutionally protected, or that there is no zone of personal privacy within which the State may protect the individual from intrusion by the press, or even that a State may never punish publication of the name of a victim of a sexual offence. We hold only that where a newspaper publishes truthful information which it has lawfully obtained, punishment may lawfully be imposed, if at all, only when narrowly tailored to a state interest of the highest order, and that no such interest is satisfactorily served by imposing liability . . . under the facts of this case. The decision below is therefore reversed.

Addendum 3

S. D. Warren and L. D. Brandeis, "The Right to Privacy" 4 Harv. L. Rev. 193 (1890).

Of the desirability—indeed of the necessity—of some such protection, there can, it is believed, be no doubt. The press is overstepping in every direction the obvious bounds of propriety and of decency. Gossip is no longer the resource of the idle and the vicious, but has become a trade, which is pursued with industry as well as effrontery. To satisfy a prurient taste the details of sexual relations are spread broadcast in the columns of the daily papers. To occupy the indolent, column upon column is filled with idle gossip, which can only be procured by intrusion upon the domestic circle. The intensity and complexity of life, attending upon advancing civilisation, have rendered necessary some retreat from the world, and man, under the refining influence of culture, has become more sensitive to publicity, so that solitude and privacy have become more essential to the individual; but modern enterprise and invention have, through invasions upon his privacy, subjected him to mental pain and distress, far greater than could be inflicted by mere bodily injury.

Nor is the harm wrought by such invasions confined to the suffering of those who may be made the subjects of journalistic or other enterprise. In this, as in other branches of commerce, the supply creates the demand. Each crop of unseemly gossip, thus harvested, becomes the seed of more, and in direct proportion to its circulation, results in a lowering of social standards and of morality. Even gossip apparently harmless, when widely and persistently circulated is potent for evil. It both belittles and perverts. It belittles by inverting the relative importance of things, thus dwarfing the thoughts and aspirations of a people. When personal gossip attains the dignity of print, and crowds the space available for matters of real interest to the community, what wonder that the ignorant and thoughtless mistake its relative importance. Easy of comprehension, appealing to that weak side of human nature which is never wholly cast down by the misfortunes and frailties of our neighbours, no one can be surprised that it usurps the place of interest in brains capable of other things. Triviality destroys at once robustness of thought and delicacy of feeling. No enthusiasm can flourish, no generous impulse can survive under the blighting influence.

Addendum 4

Gordon Kaye (by Peter Froggatt his next friend) v. Andrew Robertson and Sport Newspapers Ltd. Court of Appeal 23 February 1990

JUDGMENT

GLIDEWELL LJ

The Plaintiff, Mr Gordon Kaye, is a well-known actor, the star of a popular television comedy series. This formed the basis of a stage show in which the Plaintiff was appearing in January 1990. The show finished its run in London on 27 January 1990. Thereafter it was due to appear in Australia with the Plaintiff in the lead.

Mr Peter Froggatt is a theatrical agent and a personal friend of Mr Kaye. Since Mr Kaye is at present incapable of managing his own affairs, in this action Mr Froggatt is his next friend.

On 25 January 1990 Mr Kaye was driving his car on a road in London during a gale, when a piece of wood became detached from an advertisement hoarding, smashed through the windscreen of the Plaintiff's car and struck him on the head. The Plaintiff suffered severe injuries to his head and brain. He was taken to Charing Cross Hospital where he was on a life support machine for three days. He was then in intensive care, until on 2 February he was moved into a private room, forming part of Ward G at the hospital.

It was apparent that there was intense interest amongst Mr Kaye's fans and consequently in many newspapers and in television in Mr Kaye's progress and condition. For fear that his recovery might be hindered if he had too many visitors, and to lessen the risk of infection, the hospital authorities placed notices at the entrance to the ward asking visitors to see a member of the staff before visiting. Mr Froggatt agreed with the hospital authorities a list of people who might be permitted to visit Mr Kaye, and this was pinned up outside his room. A similar notice to that outside the ward was pinned on the door of the room itself.

The first Defendant is the editor and the second Defendant company is the publisher of Sunday Sport, a weekly publication which Mr Justice Potter, from whose decision this is an appeal, described as having “a lurid and sensational style”. A copy of a recent edition of Sunday Sport which was put in evidence before us shows that many of the advertisements contained in it are for various forms of pornographic material. This indicates the readership it seeks to attract.

Until 13 February 1990, Mr Kaye had not been interviewed since his accident by any representative of a newspaper or television programme. On that day, acting on Mr Robertson’s instructions, a journalist and a photographer from Sunday Sport went to Charing Cross Hospital and gained access to the corridor outside Ward G. They were not seen nor intercepted by any of the hospital staff. Ignoring the notices on the door to the ward and on the Plaintiff’s door, they entered the Plaintiff’s room. Mr Kaye apparently agreed to talk to them and according to a transcript that we have heard of a taped record they made of what transpired, did not object to them photographing various cards and flowers in his room. In fact a number of photographs, both in colour and monochrome, were taken of the Plaintiff himself showing the substantial scars to his head amongst other matters. The taking of the photographs involved the use of a flashlight.

After some time members of the nursing staff of the hospital learned what was happening. They attempted to persuade the journalist and the photographer to leave, but without success. Security staff were called, and the representatives of Sunday Sport were ejected.

Medical evidence exhibited by Mr Froggatt to his affidavit in this action says that Mr Kaye was in no fit condition to be interviewed or to give any informed consent to be interviewed. The accuracy of this opinion is confirmed by the fact that approximately a quarter-of-an-hour after the representatives of Sunday Sport had left his room, Mr Kaye had no recollection of the incident.

According to Mr Robertson’s affidavit, he regards what he and his staff had achieved as, “A great old-fashioned scoop”. He makes it clear in his affidavit that he realised that a number of newspapers were interested in interviewing and taking photographs of Mr Kaye, and some of them would “pay large sums of money for the privilege”. He says, disingenuously, “I do not think it unreasonable to attempt a direct approach in order to get a free interview. The Plaintiff only had to refuse”.

The Defendants made it clear that they intended to publish an article in Sunday Sport about the interview with the Plaintiff, using one or more of the photographs that had been taken. A draft of the article as originally prepared is exhibited to Mr Robertson’s affidavit. It was intended to be in two parts, a front page lead with a banner headline and a full story inside the newspaper. The wording of both parts of the article made it clear that the Defendants were saying that Mr Kaye had agreed to be interviewed and to be photographed and described the interview and pictures as exclusive to Sunday Sport.

On Friday, 16 February, 1990, upon Mr Froggatt undertaking by Counsel to issue by noon on Monday, 19 February, 1990 and serve on the Defendants the writ in this action together with an undertaking in the usual form as to damages, Mr Justice Potter on an application made on behalf of the Plaintiff by Mr Froggatt granted an injunction against the Defendants in the following terms:

“1. The Defendants and each of them whether by themselves, their servants or agents or otherwise be restrained from publishing, distributing, or causing to be published or distributed by any means howsoever or by otherwise exploiting:

(a) any photographs or part of any photographs taken of the Plaintiff at the Charing Cross Hospital on 13 February 1990;

(b) any statement made by the Plaintiff in the presence of any servant or agent of the Second Defendants at Charing Cross Hospital on 13 February 1990 or any summary or record thereof until trial or further order;

2. The Defendants and each of them be restrained whether by themselves, their servants or agents or otherwise from passing off any photograph or part of a photograph taken of the Plaintiff at Charing Cross Hospital on 13 February 1990 as a photograph consented to by the Plaintiff and from passing off any statement made by the Plaintiff in the presence of any servant or agent of the Second Defendants in Charing Cross Hospital on 13 February 1990 as a statement voluntarily given by the Plaintiff to The Sunday Sport until trial or further order;

3. The Defendants and each of them be restrained whether by themselves, their servants or agents or otherwise from publishing or causing to be published any statement to the effect that the Plaintiff had posed for a photograph for publication in The Sunday Sport and/or had given an interview to The Sunday Sport while in Charing Cross Hospital for treatment until trial or further order;"

The Judge also ordered the Defendants to deliver up "any tape-recording, notes of interview or photographs obtained or taken by any servant or agent of the second Defendants in Charing Cross Hospital on 13 February 1990 and any copies of negatives thereof".

The Defendants appealed against the Judge's order. We heard the appeal on Friday, 23 February, 1990. At the conclusion of the hearing we announced our decision which was to the effect that the appeal was allowed to the extent that we discharged the order made under heads 1 and 2 set out above, and that we substituted for the order under head 3 an order in the following terms:

"The Defendants and each of them be restrained until trial or further order whether by themselves their servants or agents from publishing, causing to be published or permitting to be published anything which could be reasonably understood or convey to any person reading or looking at the Defendants' Sunday Sport newspaper that the Plaintiff had voluntarily permitted any photographs to be taken for publication in that newspaper or had voluntarily permitted representatives of the Defendants to interview him while a patient in the Charing Cross hospital undergoing treatment".

In place of the order for delivery up, we accepted an undertaking from the Defendants' solicitors

"that the material referred to in paragraph 4 of the aforesaid order will be kept in safe custody by the Defendants' Solicitors with the proviso that they shall be entitled to release it to the 1st Defendant to be used in any way which complies with the terms of the injunction aforesaid".

I now give my reasons for arriving at this decision.

It is well-known that in English law there is no right to privacy, and accordingly there is no right of action for breach of a person's privacy. The facts of the present case are a graphic illustration of the desirability of Parliament considering whether and in what circumstances statutory provision can be made to protect the privacy of individuals. In the absence of such a right, the Plaintiff's advisers have sought to base their claim to injunctions upon other well-established rights of action. These are:

1. Libel
2. Malicious falsehood
3. Trespass to the person
4. Passing off.

The appeal canvassed all four rights of action, and it is necessary to deal with each in turn.

1. Libel The basis of the Plaintiff's case under this head is that the article as originally written clearly implied that Mr Kaye consented to give the first "exclusive" interview to Sunday Sport, and to be photographed by their photographer. This was untrue: Mr Kaye was in no fit condition to give any informed consent, and such consent as he may appear to have given was, and should have been known by Sunday Sport's representative to be, of no effect. The implication in the article would have the effect of lowering Mr Kaye in the esteem of right-thinking people, and was thus defamatory.

The Plaintiff's case is based on the well-known decision in Tolley v. JS Fry & Sons Ltd [1931] AC 333. Mr Tolley was a well-known amateur golfer. Without his consent, Fry published an advertisement which consisted of a caricature of the Plaintiff with a caddie, each with a packet of Fry's chocolate protruding from his pocket. The caricature was accompanied by doggerel verse which used Mr Tolley's name and extolled the virtues of the chocolate. The Plaintiff alleged that the advertisement implied that he had received payment for the advertisement, which would damage his reputation as an amateur player. The Judge at the trial ruled that the advertisement was capable of being defamatory, and on appeal the House of Lords upheld this ruling.

It seems that an analogy with Tolley v. Fry was the main plank of Mr Justice Potter's decision to grant injunctions in this case. Mr Milmo for the Defendants submits that, assuming that the article was capable of having the meaning alleged, this would not be a sufficient basis for interlocutory relief. In William Coulson & Sons v. James Coulson & Co [1887] 3 TLR 46 this court held that, though the High Court has jurisdiction to grant an interim injunction before the trial of a libel action, it is a jurisdiction to be exercised only sparingly. In his judgment the Master of the Rolls said:

"Therefore to justify the court granting an interim injunction it must come to a decision upon the question of libel or no libel, before the jury decided whether it was a libel or not. Therefore the jurisdiction was of a delicate nature. It ought only to be exercised in the clearest cases, where any jury would say that the matter complained of was libellous and where if the jury did not so find the court would set aside the verdict as unreasonable".

This is still the rule in actions for defamation, despite the decision of the House of Lords in American Cyanamid v. Ethicon [1975] AC 396 in relation to interim injunctions generally. This court so decided in Herbage v. Times Newspapers Limited and others, unreported but decided on 30 April 1981.

Mr Milmo submits that on the evidence we cannot be confident that any jury would inevitably decide that the implication that Mr Kaye had consented to give his first interview to Sunday Sport was libellous. Accordingly, we ought not to grant interlocutory relief on this ground.

It is in my view certainly arguable that the intended article would be libellous, on the authority of Tolley v. Fry. I think that a jury would probably find that Mr Kaye had been libelled, but I cannot say that such a conclusion is inevitable. It follows that I agree with Mr Milmo's submission and in this respect I disagree with the learned Judge. I therefore would not base an injunction on a right of action for libel.

2. Malicious Falsehood The essentials of this tort are that the Defendant has published about the Plaintiff words which are false, that they were published maliciously, and that special damage has followed as the direct and natural result of their publication. As to special damage, the effect of s. 3 (1) of the Defamation Act 1952 is that it is sufficient if the words published in writing are calculated to cause pecuniary damage to the Plaintiff. Malice will be inferred if it be proved that the words were calculated to produce damage and that the Defendant knew when he published the words that they were false or was reckless as to whether they were false or not.

The test in Coulson v. Coulson applies to interlocutory injunctions in actions for malicious falsehood as it does in actions for defamation. However, in relation to this action, the test applies only to the requirement that the Plaintiff must show that the words were false. In the present case I have no doubt that any jury which did not find that the clear implication from the words contained in the Defendant's draft article were false would be making a totally unreasonable finding. Thus the test is satisfied in relation to this cause of action.

As to malice I equally have no doubt from the evidence, including the transcript of the tape-recording of the "interview" with Mr Kaye in his hospital room which we have read, that it was quite apparent to the reporter and photographer from Sunday Sport that Mr Kaye was in no condition to give any informed consent to them interviewing or photographing him. Moreover, even if the journalists had been in any doubt about Mr Kaye's fitness to give his consent, Mr Robertson could not have entertained any such doubt after he read the affidavit sworn on behalf of Mr Kaye in these proceedings. Any subsequent publication of the falsehood would therefore inevitably be malicious.

As to damage, I have already recorded that Mr Robertson appreciated that Mr Kaye's story was one for which other newspapers would be willing to pay "large sums of money". It needs little imagination to appreciate that whichever journal secured the first interview with Mr Kaye would be willing to pay the most. Mr Kaye thus has a potentially valuable right to sell the story of his accident and his recovery when he is fit enough to tell it. If the Defendants are able to publish the article they proposed, or one anything like it, the value of this right would in my view be seriously lessened, and Mr Kaye's story thereafter be worth much less to him.

I have considered whether damages would be an adequate remedy in these circumstances. They would inevitably be difficult to calculate, would also follow some time after the event, and in my view would in no way be adequate. It thus follows that in my opinion all the preconditions to the grant of an interlocutory injunction in respect of this cause of action are made out. I will return later to what I consider to be the appropriate form of injunction.

3. Trespass to the Person It is strictly unnecessary to consider this cause of action in the light of the view I have expressed about malicious falsehood. However I will set out my view shortly. The Plaintiff's case in relation to this cause of action is that the taking of the flashlight photographs may well have caused distress to Mr Kaye and set back his recovery, and thus caused him injury. In this sense it can be said to be a battery. Mr Caldecott, for Mr Kaye, could not refer us to any authority in which the taking of a photograph or indeed the flashing of a light had been held to be a battery. Nevertheless I am prepared to accept that it may well be the case that if a bright light is deliberately shone into another person's eyes and injures his sight, or damages him in some other way, this may be in law a battery. But in my view the necessary effects are not established by the evidence in this case. Though there must have been an obvious risk that any disturbance to Mr Kaye would set back his recovery, there is no evidence that the taking of the photographs did in fact cause him any damage.

Moreover, the injunction sought in relation to this head of action would not be intended to prevent another anticipated battery, since none was anticipated. The intention here is to prevent the Defendants from profiting from the taking of the photographs, i.e. from their own trespass. Attractive though this argument may appear to be, I cannot find as a matter of law that an injunction should be granted in these circumstances. Accordingly, I would not base an injunction on this cause of action.

4. Passing off Mr Caldecott submits (though in this case not with any great vigour) that the essentials of the tort of passing off, as laid down by the speeches in the House of Lords in Warnink v. J Townsend & Sons [1979] AC 731 are satisfied here. I only need say shortly that in my view they are not. I think that the Plaintiff is not in the position of a trader in relation to his interest in his story about his accident and his recovery, and thus fails from the start to have a right of action under this head.

Forms of Injunction

Before I turn to consider the form of an interim injunction which should be granted, I must comment that apart from the initial draft of the article intended to be printed in Sunday Sport which was before the Judge, two other versions have subsequently appeared. A second was put before Mr Justice Potter, and a third before us. Both the second and third versions use words which do not imply so clearly as did the original version of the article that the Plaintiff consented to be interviewed and photographed by Sunday Sport. Nevertheless, in my view the later articles are irrelevant for present purposes. The fact that at one time the Defendants envisaged printing the original article is sufficient to entitle the Plaintiff to an injunction which prohibits the Defendants from publishing an article which contains the implication which was to be read into that original article.

In relation to the injunctions granted by Mr Justice Potter, the wording of the first injunction was in my view wider than was necessary to prevent the Defendants doing that which was objectionable, i.e. publishing material from which the objectionable implication could be drawn.

The second injunction granted by Potter J. was based upon the tort of passing off. I have already said that in my view the evidence does not prove the commission of this tort. It was for these reasons, that in common with my brethren, I took the view that the first and second injunctions should be discharged. We considered that the third injunction was in general satisfactory but needed some amendment, and basing ourselves on the Plaintiff's right of action in malicious falsehood, we granted the injunction in the terms set out above.

I therefore concluded that, to the extent I have indicated, the Defendants' appeal should be allowed, but that they should be subject to an injunction in the terms which we have already announced.

BINGHAM LJ

I have had the benefit of reading in draft the judgment prepared by Glidewell LJ. I agree with it, and with the order made.

Any reasonable and fair-minded person hearing the facts which Glidewell LJ has recited would in my judgment conclude that these Defendants had wronged the Plaintiff. I am therefore pleased to be persuaded that the Plaintiff is able to establish, with sufficient strength to justify an interlocutory order, a cause of action against the Defendants in malicious falsehood. Had he failed to establish any cause of action, we should of course have been powerless to act, however great our sympathy for the Plaintiff and however strong our distaste for the Defendants' conduct.

This case nonetheless highlights, yet again, the failure of both the Common law of England and statute to protect in an effective way the personal privacy of individual citizens. This has been the subject of much comment over the years, perhaps most recently by Professor Markesinis (The German Law of Torts, 2nd edn. 1990 page 316) where he writes:

“English law, on the whole, compares unfavourably with German law. True, many aspects of the human personality and privacy are protected by a multitude of existing torts but this means fitting the facts of each case in the pigeon-hole of an existing tort and this process may not only involve strained constructions; often it may also leave a deserving Plaintiff without a remedy.”

The Defendants' conduct towards the Plaintiff here was “a monstrous invasion of his privacy” (to adopt the language of Griffiths J in Bernstein v. Skyviews Ltd [1978] QB 479 at 489G). If ever a person has a right to be let alone by strangers with no public interest to pursue, it must surely be when he lies in hospital recovering from brain surgery and in no more than partial command of his faculties. It is this invasion of his privacy which underlies the Plaintiff's complaint. Yet it alone, however gross, does not entitle him to relief in English law.

The Plaintiff's suggested cause of action in libel is in my view arguable, for reasons which Glidewell LJ has given. We could not give interlocutory relief on that ground. Battery and assault are causes of action never developed to cover acts such as these: they could apply only if the law were substantially extended and the available facts strained to unacceptable lengths. A claim in passing off is hopeless. Fortunately, a cause of action in malicious falsehood exists, but even that obliges us to limit the relief we can grant in a way which would not bind us if the Plaintiff's cause of action arose from the invasion of privacy of which, fundamentally, he complains. We cannot give the Plaintiff the breadth of protection which I would, for my part, wish. The problems of defining and limiting a tort of privacy are formidable, but the present case strengthens my hope that the review now in progress may prove fruitful.

LEGGATT LJ

I agree with both judgments that have been delivered. In view of the importance of the topic I add a note about the way in which the Common law has developed in the United States to meet the need which in the present case we are unable to fulfil satisfactorily.

The recognition of a right to privacy seemed to be in prospect when Lord Byron obtained an injunction to restrain the false attribution to him of a bad poem: Byron v. Johnston [1816] 2 Mer. 29. But it was not until 1890 that in their article The Right to Privacy 4 Harv. L. Rev. 193 Warren and Brandeis reviewed a number of English cases on defamation and breaches of rights of property, confidence and contract, and concluded that all were based on a broader common principle. They argued that recognition of the principle would enable the courts to protect the individual against the infliction by the press of mental pain and distress through invasion of his privacy. Since then the right to privacy, or “the right to be let alone”, has gained acceptance in most jurisdictions in the United States.

It is manifested in several forms: see Dean Prosser, Torts, 4th edn., 1971. One example is such intrusion upon physical solitude as would be objectionable to a reasonable man. So when in Barber v. Time Inc. [1942] 159 S.W. 2d 291 the Plaintiff was confined to a hospital bed, the publication of her photograph taken without consent was held to be an invasion of a private right of which she was entitled to complain. Similarly, a so-called “right of publicity” has developed to protect the commercial interest of celebrities in their identities. “The theory of the right is that a celebrity’s identity can be valuable in the promotion of products, and the celebrity has an interest that may be protected from the unauthorised commercial exploitation of that identity. ‘The famous have an exclusive legal right during life to control and profit from the commercial use of their name and personality’”: Carson v. Here’s Johnny Portable Toilets Inc. [1983] 698 F. 2d 831 at page 835.

We do not need a First Amendment to preserve the freedom of the Press, but the abuse of that freedom can be ensured only by the enforcement of a right to privacy. This right has so long been disregarded here that it can be recognised now only by the Legislature. Especially since there is available in the United States a wealth of experience of the enforcement of this right both at common law and also under statute, it is to be hoped that the making good of this signal shortcoming in our law will not be long delayed.

Addendum 5

The impact of the Kaye decision on the English law of privacy

1. Used skilfully the Kaye decision offers an excellent starting point for a comparative discussion of the protection of privacy and its clash with the interest of free speech. Consider the following points. First, the argument advanced by the media that a law protecting privacy would bar them from investigating suspect conduct by politicians (The Times, 28 November 1989, leading article) is clearly inapplicable in cases such as Kaye which involved an ordinary citizen’s moral right “to be let alone by strangers with no public interest to pursue [while recovering in hospital] from brain surgery and in no more than partial command of his faculties.” (per Bingham LJ, p. 103 of the Calcutt Report). If the two situations require a different treatment (and in most respects they do though remember that German law allows even public figures a degree of privacy), it is for lawyers and the Press to try and devise rules that can distinguish between them rather than for the latter to foil all efforts by the former to regulate the problem. Secondly, the valiant attempts of the Court of Appeal to come up with some protection are notable for revealing the contortions that have to be undertaken in order to provide a remedy. This must, thirdly, lead us to consider the limitations of the traditional torts. Trespass, for example, has been advocated by one leading practitioner (see: Prescott, (1991) 54 MLR 802). But how effective would it be, especially in light of the restricted availability of punitive damages in English law? Fourthly, one must consider whether other systems (such as the German and French) are worse off for having provided a remedy in precisely this kind of situation (for illustration see Markesinis, (1990) 53 MLR 802; (1992) MLR 118). Fifthly, consider the refusal of the English courts to create a right of privacy. Does this conform with the view widely held on the Continent of Europe (and, indeed, among many Common lawyers) that our courts can create new law or adapt outdated solutions when circumstances require it? Thus, is our law any worse off for the fact that this timid approach was ignored on many occasions when there was a need for modernisation (cf., for example, the transformation of English administrative law in the sixties and seventies)? Sixthly, consider the proven ability of the Press to frustrate the six attempts (made in England between 1961 and 1989) to legislate on this matter. Is this a healthy state of affairs? The answer must surely be negative, especially when one takes note of the intemperate language used by some newspaper editors to express their distrust of our judiciary. And is not the Press adopting double standards when it asks for judicial intervention whenever it wishes to avoid high jury awards in defamation cases? Moreover, it must be the height of hypocrisy to express distrust towards both judges and jury and then to claim that the Press, itself, is the best judge of its own misconduct.

2. The timing of the Kaye litigation, arguably, had a decisive impact on the drafting of the Calcutt Report ("Report of the Committee on Privacy and Related Matters", Cm. 1102) which was published in June of 1990. The recommendations of this (first) Report, referring to the creation of new criminal and civil offences, are reproduced in paragraph 4, below (for reasons of space, its other recommendations, referring to the regulation of Press conduct and Press complaints, have been omitted). But this document, coupled with the follow-up Report prepared by Sir David Calcutt (entitled "Review of Press Self-Regulation" Cm. 2135, January of 1993, and essentially reconfirming its earlier recommendations and concluding that self-regulation is not working) and a "Consultation Paper" published by the Lord Chancellor's Department in July 1993 (entitled "Infringement of Privacy" and going a step further by recommending the establishment of a general tort of privacy) provide some of the most recent and thorough discussions of this topic and can be read with profit by lawyers from most systems that have to face these issues. The specific recommendations they make may provide the last chance (for the foreseeable future) to regulate this topic in a more balanced way. If the Press succeeds in frustrating this attempt, the ball will be back in the judges' court. If they then decide to act, history will justify their intervention; Continental European law could inspire it; and the average citizen would probably welcome it.

3. For further readings see: Bedingfield, "Privacy or Publicity? The enduring confusion surrounding the American tort of invasion of privacy" (1992) 55 MLR 111; Louciades, "Personality and privacy under the European Convention on Human Rights" (1990) B.Y.B.I.L. 175; Markesinis, "Subtle ways of legal borrowing: some reflections on the Report of the Calcutt Committee 'On Privacy and Related Matters'"; Festschrift für Werner Lorenz zum siebzigsten Geburtstag (1990) 717; idem, "Our patchy law of privacy—time to do something about it" (1990) 53 MLR 802; idem, "The Calcutt Report must not be forgotten" (1992) 55 MLR 118.

4. Calcutt Committee Report: Summary of Recommendations

Physical intrusion

1. The following acts should be criminal offences in England and Wales:
 - (a) entering private property, without the consent of the lawful occupant, with intent to obtain personal information with a view to its publication.
 - (b) placing a surveillance device on private property, without the consent of the lawful occupant, with intent to obtain personal information with a view to its publication; and
 - (c) taking a photograph, or recording the voice, of an individual who is on private property, without his consent, with a view to its publication and with intent that the individual shall be identifiable.
2. It should be a defence to any of these proposed offences that the act was done:
 - (a) for the purpose of preventing, detecting or exposing the commission of any crime, or other seriously anti-social conduct; or
 - (b) for the protection of public health or safety; or
 - (c) under any lawful authority.
3. An individual having a sufficient interest should be able to apply for an injunction against the publication of any material obtained by means of any of these criminal offences or, if the material has already been published, for damages or an account of profits.
4. Further consideration should be given to the extent to which the law in Scotland needs to be extended to cover the proposed offences and civil remedy and how this might best be done.

Legal restrictions on press reporting

5. Consideration should be given to amending the legislation on the non-identification of minors in England and Wales to eliminate any inconsistencies or uncertainties.

6. The statutory prohibition on identifying rape victims in England and Wales should be extended to cover the victims of the sexual assaults listed at Appendix H.

7. In any criminal proceedings in England and Wales, the court should have the power to make an order prohibiting the publication of the name and address of any person against whom the offence is alleged to have been committed, or of any other matters likely to lead to his or her identification. This should only be exercised if the court believes that it is necessary to protect the mental or physical health, personal security or security of the home of the victim.

8. After consulting the press and broadcasting authorities, the Press Complaints Commission (see 11 below) should issue early guidance on jigsaw identification.

Right of reply

9. A statutory right of reply should not be introduced.

Tort of infringement of privacy

10. A tort of infringement of privacy should not presently be introduced.

Press Complaints Commission

11. The press should be given one final chance to prove that voluntary self-regulation can be made to work.

12. The Press Council should be disbanded and replaced by a Press Complaints Commission.

13. The Press Complaints Commission should concentrate on providing an effective means of redress for complaints against the press.

14. The Press Complaints Commission should be given specific duties to consider complaints both of unjust or unfair treatment by newspapers or periodicals and of unwarranted infringements of privacy through published material or in connection with the obtaining of such material.

15. The Press Complaints Commission should publish, monitor and implement a comprehensive code of practice for the guidance of both press and the public.

16. The Press Complaints Commission should operate a hot line for complainants on a 24-hour basis.

17. Press Complaints Commission adjudications should, in certain cases, include a recommendation that an apology be given to the complainant. The precise form of the apology, including whether it should be given publicly or privately, could also be prescribed. Where a complaint concerns a newspaper's refusal to give an opportunity to reply to an attack made on a complainant or to correct an inaccuracy, the Press Complaints Commission should be able to recommend the nature and the form of reply or correction including, in appropriate cases, where in the paper it should be published.

18. The Press Complaints Commission should have an independent chairman and no more than 12 members, with smaller sub-committees adjudicating on complaints under delegated powers.

19. Appointments to the Press Complaints Commission should be made by an Appointments Commission with explicit freedom to appoint whoever it considers best qualified. The Appointments Commission itself should be independently appointed, possibly by the Lord Chancellor.

20. The Press Complaints Commission should have clear conciliation and adjudication procedures designed to ensure that complaints are handled with the minimum of delay. Whenever practical it should first seek conciliation. There should also be a fast track procedure for the correction of significant factual errors. The Commission should also have a specific responsibility and procedure for initiating inquiries whenever it thinks it necessary.

21. Complaints committees should have delegated power to release adjudications, subject to a right of appeal for either party to the full Press Complaints Commission before publication.

22. The Press Complaints Commission should not operate a waiver of legal rights.

23. If the industry wishes to maintain a system of non-statutory self-regulation, it must demonstrate its commitment, in particular by providing the necessary money for setting up and maintaining the Press Complaints commission.

Statutory complaints procedures

24. If the press fails to demonstrate that non-statutory self-regulation can be made to work effectively, a statutory system for handling complaints should be introduced.

25. If maverick publications persistently decline to respect the authority of the Press Complaints Commission, the Commission should be placed on a statutory footing. It should be given sufficient statutory powers to enable it to require any newspaper, periodical or magazine to respond to its enquiries about complaints and to publish its adjudications as directed. It should be able to recommend the payment of compensation.

26. The Government should set the budget for any statutory Press Complaints Commission and provide the money which it should then reclaim from the industry. The industry should set up a funding body which would apportion the cost between, and collect the money from, various industry bodies or individual publications.

Press Complaints Tribunal

27. Should the press fail to set up and support the Press Complaints Commission, or should it at any time become clear that the reformed non-statutory mechanism is failing to perform adequately, this should be replaced by a statutory tribunal with statutory powers and implementing a statutory code of practice.

28. There should be two separate triggers for the replacement of the Press Complaints Commission by a Press Complaints Tribunal.

29. A Press Complaints Tribunal should perform two distinct functions. First, it should attempt conciliation and investigate complaints. Secondly, where necessary, it should resolve disputes by ruling whether there had been a breach of the code of practice. This should be reflected in its structure and procedures.

30. The Press Complaints Tribunal should be able to award compensation. Unless the complainant can show financial loss, the amount of compensation should be limited by statute. This limit should be periodically reviewed.

31. In privacy cases, the Press Complaints Tribunal should be able to restrain publication of material in breach of the code of practice by means of injunctions. No injunction should be granted if the publisher could show that he had a good arguable defence.

32. The Tribunal chairman should be a judge or senior lawyer appointed by the Lord Chancellor. He should sit with two assessors drawn from a panel appointed by the Home Secretary.

Addendum 6

Press Complaints Commission Code of Practice

1. Accuracy

- (i) Newspapers and periodicals should take care not to publish inaccurate, misleading or distorted material including pictures.
- (ii) Whenever it is recognised that a significant inaccuracy, misleading statement or distorted report has been published, it should be corrected promptly and with due prominence.
- (iii) An apology must be published whenever appropriate.
- (iv) Newspapers, whilst free to be partisan, must distinguish clearly between comment, conjecture and fact
- (v) A newspaper or periodical must report fairly and accurately the outcome of an action for defamation to which it has been a party.

2. Opportunity to reply

A fair opportunity for reply to inaccuracies must be given to individuals or organisations when reasonably called for.

3. Privacy

- (i) Everyone is entitled to respect for his or her private and family life, home, health and correspondence. A publication will be expected to justify intrusions into any individual's private life without consent
- (ii) The use of long lens photography to take pictures of people in private places without their consent is unacceptable.

Note—Private places are public or private property where there is a reasonable expectation of privacy.

4. Harassment

- (i) Journalists and photographers must neither obtain nor seek to obtain information or pictures through intimidation, harassment or persistent pursuit
- (ii) They must not photograph individuals in private places (as defined by the note to clause 3) without their consent; must not persist in telephoning, questioning, pursuing or photographing individuals after having been asked to desist; must not remain on their property after having been asked to leave and must not follow them.
- (iii) Editors must ensure that those working for them comply with these requirements and must not publish material from other sources which does not meet these requirements.

5. Intrusion into grief or shock

In cases involving personal grief or shock, enquiries should be carried out and approaches made with sympathy and discretion. Publication must be handled sensitively at such times but this should not be interpreted as restricting the right to report judicial proceedings.

6. Children

- (i) Young people should be free to complete their time at school without unnecessary intrusion.
- (ii) Journalists must not interview or photograph a child under the age of 16 on subjects involving the welfare of the child or any other child in the absence of or without the consent of a parent or other adult who is responsible for the children.
- (iii) Pupils must not be approached or photographed while at school without the permission of the school authorities.
- (iv) There must be no payment to minors for material involving the welfare of children nor payments to parents or guardians for material about their children or wards unless it is demonstrably in the child's interest.
- (v) Where material about the private life of a child is published, there must be justification for publication other than the fame, notoriety or position of his or her parents or guardian.

7. Children in sex cases

1. The press must not, even where the law does not prohibit it, identify children under the age of 16 who are involved in cases concerning sexual offences, whether as victims or as witnesses.
2. In any press report of a case involving a sexual offence against a child—
 - (i) The child must not be identified.
 - (ii) The adult may be identified.
 - (iii) The word "incest" must not be used where a child victim might be identified.
 - (iv) Care must be taken that nothing in the report implies the relationship between the accused and the child.

8. Listening Devices

Journalists must not obtain or publish material obtained by using clandestine listening devices or by intercepting private telephone conversations.

9. Hospitals

- (i) Journalists or photographers making enquiries at hospitals or similar institutions should identify themselves to a responsible executive and obtain permission before entering non-public areas.

- (ii) The restrictions on intruding into privacy are particularly relevant to enquiries about individuals in hospitals or similar institutions.

10. Reporting of crime

- (i) The press must avoid identifying relatives or friends of persons convicted or accused of crime without their consent.
- (ii) Particular regard should be paid to the potentially vulnerable position of children who are witnesses to, or victims of, crime. This should not be interpreted as restricting the right to report judicial proceedings.

11. Misrepresentation

- (i) Journalists must not generally obtain or seek to obtain information or pictures through misrepresentation or subterfuge.
- (ii) Documents or photographs should be removed only with the consent of the owner.
- (iii) Subterfuge can be justified only in the public interest and only when material cannot be obtained by any other means.

12. Victims of sexual assault

The press must not identify victims of sexual assault or publish material likely to contribute to such identification unless there is adequate justification and, by law, they are free to do so.

13. Discrimination

- (i) The press must avoid prejudicial or pejorative reference to a person's race, colour, religion, sex or sexual orientation or to any physical or mental illness or disability.
- (ii) It must avoid publishing details of a person's race, colour, religion, sexual orientation, physical or mental illness or disability unless these are directly relevant to the story.

14. Financial journalism

- (i) Even where the law does not prohibit it, journalists must not use for their own profit financial information they receive in advance of its general publication, nor should they pass such information to others.
- (ii) They must not write about shares or securities in whose performance they know that they or their close families have a significant financial interest without disclosing the interest to the editor or financial editor.
- (iii) They must not buy or sell, either directly or through nominees or agents, shares or securities about which they have written recently or about which they intend to write in the near future.

15. Confidential sources

Journalists have a moral obligation to protect confidential sources of information.

16. Payment for articles

- (i) Payment or offers of payment for stories or information must not be made directly or through agents to witnesses or potential witnesses in current criminal proceedings except where the material concerned ought to be published in the public interest and there is an overriding need to make or promise to make a payment for this to be done. Journalists must take every possible step to ensure that no financial dealings have influence on the evidence that those witnesses may give.

(An editor authorising such a payment must be prepared to demonstrate that there is a legitimate public interest at stake involving matters that the public has a right to know. The payment or, where accepted, the offer of payment to any witness who is actually cited to give evidence should be disclosed to the prosecution and the defence and the witness should be advised of this).

- (ii) Payment or offers of payment for stories, pictures or information, must not be made directly or through agents to convicted or confessed criminals or to their associates—who may include family, friends and colleagues—except where the material concerned ought to be published in the public interest and payment is necessary for this to be done.

13. UNLAWFULNESS AND FAULT

Case 50

REICHSGERICHT (FIRST CIVIL SENATE) 14 JANUARY 1928

RGZ 119, 397 = JW 1928, 1049 with approving note by M. Pappenheim

On 23 October 1921 at noon, the German three-masted schooner Lisbeth, on a journey through the English Channel to Göteborg, ran aground on the northern tip of the Dutch island of Texel on a sandbank. On 26 October it became a total loss. The plaintiff owner of the vessel sued the defendant captain of the ship claiming damages on the ground that he negligently caused the loss of the vessel. The District Court of Altona and the Court of Appeal of Kiel rejected the claim. Upon a second appeal the judgment of the Court of Appeal was confirmed for the following

Reasons

The Court of Appeal has found as a fact that during the voyage when the accident occurred, the defendant had not handled the vessel in accordance with the practice of an experienced and able captain of a sailing-ship applying normal care. If the defendant had applied that care required in the circumstances of a normal, proper, and conscientious captain of a sailing-ship, the stranding could have been avoided. However, the defendant lacked the necessary experience and could not possess it in view of his education and previous activity. The plaintiff, himself an old and experienced captain of sailing-vessels, had been well aware of the limits of the defendant's capacity when he appointed him. In particular the plaintiff had known that the defendant was not sufficiently qualified for discharging the specialized task of commanding the sailing-vessel Lisbeth and was completely inexperienced, especially for navigating in the North Sea. It was true that the plaintiff had not believed that he would suffer damage by appointing the unsuitable defendant; he had, however, been grossly negligent in failing to perceive the danger to the ship as a result of the defendant's lack of qualification. In so far as the defendant in his written application for the post had stated that he had been in possession of a schooner and was experienced in handling vessels of this kind, the plaintiff had by no means been misled thereby. Considering that the plaintiff was fully cognisant of the extent of the nautical qualification of the defendant, the defendant's own statement was of little importance. It offended against good faith if the plaintiff, who was well aware when he appointed the defendant that the latter, a young captain without any experience in navigating sailing vessels in the North Sea, would be unable to deal with difficult situations, having regard to his training and experience, now claimed damages against him because the defendant had proved unequal to the task. This held good too if the standard of care required of the defendant was put as that of a normal, proper, and conscientious captain of a sailing-vessel, without regard to the degree of experience possessed by men such as the defendant.

These statements of the Court of Appeal are mainly factual . . . On the strength of these facts the Court of Appeal could conclude, without violating the law, that the defendant was not liable to the plaintiff. The facts as found by the Court of Appeal show that in concluding the contract appointing the defendant the plaintiff knew of the particular personal circumstances of the defendant and took them into account. This indicates a tacit agreement to the effect that in assessing the duty of care incumbent upon the defendant in relation to the plaintiff, the latter's special circumstances are of essential importance [reference]. As between the parties, the plaintiff could only demand such nautical activities of the defendant which did not exceed the degree of nautical capacity and experience which was known to the plaintiff. The defendant is not liable for any circumstances resulting in damage which arise outside these limits, having regard to the special nature of the contract between the parties. It makes no difference that the defendant . . . should have known that he was not equal to the appointment assumed by him. The findings of the fact by the Court of Appeal show clearly that the accident could not have been avoided even if the defendant, conscious of his nautical deficiencies, had acted with special precaution and care, seeing that objectively he lacked the capacity for doing so. On the other hand, the plaintiff in deciding to appoint the defendant, was fully aware of the extent of the defendant's nautical qualifications and was not influenced by the fact that he applied for the post and accepted it without reservations.

These observations suffice to support the judgment appealed against. It may be observed, however, that the additional considerations of the Court of Appeal are not free from error. The Court of Appeal states that, leaving aside the special character of the relationship of the parties in issue, according to the general principles of law the defendant had not acted culpably because he had applied all that care expected of a person with his nautical experience.

The Court of Appeal bases its opinion on the view that within the circle of the captains of sailing-ships several groups exist, graded according to their nautical experience. A person belonging to the group of nautical experience similar to that of the defendant could not have avoided the mistakes which caused the accident, even if he had applied the proper standard of care. These considerations conflict with the dominant view in practice and in the literature. This holds that the term "the care required in human relations" must be determined according to an objective standard, which is the requirement in regular and proper human relations, having regard to the individual circumstances. Thus the justified demands of human relations determine what measure of circumspection and care must be applied in order to avoid damage. It is normally to be gauged by reference to the view of a certain limited circle of persons and by the typical qualities of the group of persons who represent a specific range of human relations [references]. Accordingly § 511 of the Commercial Code requires the care of a proper "sailor". If, as in the present case, the command of a sailing-vessel is in issue, the special features of navigating a sailing-vessel and the care of a proper captain of a sailing-vessel is required. Since the just and reasonable requirements of trade form the basis, it is evident that neither the care of a particularly experienced nor that of an inexperienced captain of a sailing-vessel can serve as a standard. Instead that standard of care is decisive which a proper and conscientious captain of a sailing-ship, endowed with normal knowledge, capacity, and experience, is accustomed to apply. If the circle of captains of sailing-ships as defined above were to be divided into groups according to the degree of nautical experience of individual members, the objective standard would become distorted by the introduction of personal circumstances. A group of experienced captains of sailing-vessels, who are incapable of measuring up to serious tasks and who fail in case of need would be useless in trade . . . Although the reasoning of the Court of Appeal contains an error of law, no ground exists for questioning its decision which, as shown above, is supported by other legally valid reasons.

*Case 51BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 9 JUNE 1967
JZ 1968, 103 = VERSR 1967, 808

On 6 January 1961 early in the morning, while it was still dark and raining slightly, R, a miner aged 27 years, was cycling to his place of work on an illuminated road. Shortly before he had reached a turning, the defendant motorist ran into R from behind, catapulting him onto the side of the road where he was hit and killed by a motor car travelling in the opposite direction.

The plaintiffs, assignees by subrogation of the claims of R's widow born in 1936 and of his two children born in 1954 and 1958, sued the defendant on the ground that he was alone responsible for the accident, having driven without due care and with a dirty wind-screen. The defendant denies any responsibility. He had been blinded by an oncoming car owing to defective vision, of which he had been unaware hitherto and therefore failed to see R. Moreover, R was himself to be blamed because he was cycling without an illuminated rear light and was too far left on his side of the road.

The District Court, relying on the Road Traffic Act, gave judgment for the plaintiffs, limited to the amount payable under that Act, and granted a declaration asked for within the limits of liability set by the Road Traffic Act. On appeal by the plaintiffs the Court of Appeal of Hamm held the defendant liable to pay full damages on the ground of liability for negligence and rejected the plea of contributory negligence. A second appeal by the defendant was unsuccessful for the following

Reasons

I. 1. The Court of Appeal starts from the premise that prima facie the defendant appears to have been negligent. The defendant, driving with dimmed lights, ran into the cyclist because he did not see him. In these circumstances common experience leads to the conclusion that the defendant acted negligently inasmuch as he drove either without sufficient care or at a speed incompatible with his field of vision.

2. The defendant does not contest this prima-facie evidence. He only questions the view taken by the Court of Appeal that the defendant had not discharged the burden of proof incumbent upon him thereafter to show as a serious possibility that the events may have taken place without any negligence on his part.

(a) The Court of Appeal assumes in favour of the defendant that owing to the special light conditions at the time of the accident he was blinded due to a defect of vision of which he was ignorant. Nevertheless it held that he had not discharged his burden of proof. The Court of Appeal held correctly that the test is whether the defendant could at least realize the limits of his vision, and it is convinced that he could.

This conclusion is based on the consideration that like every motorist the defendant must at least be aware of his individual powers of vision [references]. In determining negligence it is therefore irrelevant in law what the circumstances are which affect an abnormal individual vision. Thus a motorist so affected is treated no differently from one whose vision is perfect. The latter, too, is expected to know the limits of his vision, a knowledge obtained not by means of exact figures, but through his own experience. In determining whether the defendant was negligent the question is therefore not whether he knew or ought to have known of his defect of vision . . . but whether he ought to have known the effect of this defect and therefore the limits of his individual capacity to see. The Court of Appeal has answered this in the affirmative without committing an error of law. This determination is all the more valid since according to the experts the defendant was born with this defect of vision and as he had driven a motor car since 1956.

If, however, the defendant could recognise that his personal vision was limited he could and should have so adjusted his driving, especially his speed so as to satisfy the requirements of traffic and to be able to stop, if necessary. The Court of Appeal has held correctly that the defendant has not shown that he has complied with this requirement.

II. The Court of Appeal rules out any contributory negligence on the part of the cyclist R.

1. The Court of Appeal was unable to find that the rear light of the bicycle did not show. It has also not blamed R for having ridden too far left on his side of the road. The judge of fact adopted the allegation of the plaintiffs that R wanted to turn left into the side street and had therefore moved to the middle of the road. The District Court had pointed out that R took this route daily on his way to work . . .

2. The further allegation of the defendant that R had not indicated his intention to turn left by raising his left arm was rejected as irrelevant by the Court of Appeal because on the defendant's own admission he had not seen R at all.

The defendant objects that the presumed conduct of R had been dismissed as the cause of the accident. He argues that it was not decisive that he had failed to see the cyclist but that it was decisive whether he would have seen R if he had indicated his intended change of direction by raising his left arm. Common experience supported this conclusion; moreover a presumption operated against the cyclist since the latter had violated § 11 I of the Traffic Regulations (StVO), i.e. had failed to indicate his direction.

In the result the Court of Appeal was right. The purpose of § 11 I of the Road Traffic Regulations is to eliminate the dangers which threaten—apart from the person making the turn—the traffic behind and in the opposite direction. It is intended to draw the attention of these road-users to the imminence of the traffic manoeuvre, to make them use care, and thereby to avoid the danger of accidents. This was not the case here. The collision did not occur because the defendant in his motor car overtook the cyclist on his left side without noticing the latter's intention to turn; it occurred because in proceeding straight ahead he did not see the cyclist . . . It is not, however, the purpose of the protective rule which imposes the duty to indicate a change of direction, to ensure that the person subject to this duty is noticed in the traffic irrespective of his intention to make a turn.

Case 52

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 7 FEBRUARY 1984

BGHZ 90, 96 = NJW 1984, 1395 = JZ 1984, 629

On 3 July 1979 the plaintiff was admitted to the S hospital of the defendant Regional District for unexplained pain in his right femur. The first examination was carried out by Dr K, the Duty Doctor. He also discussed with the plaintiff that in order to exclude the possibility of a tumour, a colonoscopy was indicated. Subsequently it was carried out by Dr B, the Senior Medical Officer. In the course of it, the sigmoid colon was perforated and the defendant abandoned the investigation. After an X-ray picture had confirmed the injury, the plaintiff was operated on immediately—complications subsequently occurred.

The plaintiff sued the defendants for adequate damages for pain and suffering as well as for a declaration that they were liable to compensate him for all present and future material and mental damage. He stated that he had not effectively agreed to the colonoscopy and alleged that he had not been informed sufficiently of the character of the investigation or of any possible risks nor that it might be accompanied by considerable pain. He had suffered much pain when the instrument had been inserted in the intestine and had said so at the time. The perforation of the intestine had been caused by a culpable mistake of the second defendant in carrying out the colonoscopy.

The defendant contended that before the colonoscopy the investigation had been sufficiently explained to the plaintiff. They were of the opinion that in view of the fact that complications occurred extremely rarely, it had not been necessary to inform the plaintiff of the risk of a perforation of the intestine. They denied that by this treatment they committed a medical error.

The District court held that “the claim raised in the action is justified in principle”. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal of the defendants, declared that the plaintiff’s claim for damages for pain and suffering was justified in principle and allowed the action for a declaration in respect of material damage; as regards mental injuries in the future, it referred the case back to the District court. Upon a second appeal by the defendants the case was referred back to the Court of Appeal.

Reasons

I. The Court of Appeal has interpreted the judgment of the District Court to the effect that it decided not only the claim for damages for pain and suffering by an interim judgment in principle, but also the plaintiff’s action for a declaration. Contrary to the District Court, which held the second defendant to have committed an error in his treatment, it regards the claim as well founded on the ground that the medical investigation which resulted in the injury to the plaintiff was illegal because the plaintiff had not been given sufficient information and because therefore his consent was invalid. In so holding, the Court of Appeal argued essentially as follows: It is possible to agree with the District Court that the information had to be given concerning the risk of a perforation of the intestine as a result of a colonoscopy since complications occurred seldom. However, the plaintiff should have been informed that in certain circumstances the investigation could cause the plaintiff considerable pain. This should have been done, in particular because the diagnostic measure was not of vital importance. No such information had been given. Without having to consider the question as to whether the plaintiff had risked his consent during the colonoscopy or whether the second defendant had, in treating the plaintiff, committed an error, he was liable according to §§ 823 I, 847 BGB to pay damages for pain and suffering. The defendant Regional District was liable according to § 831 BGB for the second defendant as its agent in performing his duties. It was not sufficient for the Regional District to plead as a defence that the second defendant was a specially competent doctor of long experience; nor was the fact that the medical heads of department had regularly called together the doctors working in their department, including the second defendant, for instruction and further education. A proper organisation of a hospital required also that the doctors should be given advice concerning the general principles governing the duty to provide information and to control their observation by random inspection. This had been omitted. In addition, the liability of both defendants for the material damage resulted from a violation of the contract for medical treatment. As regards future mental damage, a further investigation of a factual kind was necessary.

II. The reasoning of the decision under appeal cannot stand up to legal scrutiny.

1. The Court of Appeal has held rightly that the information given to the plaintiff about the proposed colonoscopy was incomplete because she did not also tell the plaintiff that this diagnostic investigation might have disagreeable effects, psychological as well as physical. The plaintiff was aware of this having learnt about the technique of colonoscopy. However, he should also have been told that in certain circumstances this might cause him considerable pain.

A patient who has not experienced colonoscopy previously and has not heard about it from others could not expect this or even regard this as normal. For a patient to decide whether to consent to a physical investigation, it is relevant, among other considerations, what he must accept in the course of it and what pain he will have to suffer which exceeds that to be expected in connection with a diagnostic medical examination. This knowledge must not be withheld from him merely because he might be frightened and might object to what is normally a harmless investigation or because he may stiffen and thereby make the investigation more difficult for himself and the doctor. It is for the doctor to calm a frightened patient and so to explain to him the need for a painful investigation that he can be certain of the patient's consent and co-operation. In the case of a colonoscopy this may include the information that the doctor would immediately abandon the investigation should he find the pain intolerable. Since neither the duty doctor at first examination nor the second defendant before the start of his investigation told the plaintiff what might ensue, the plaintiff's consent was invalid and the colonoscopic investigation was illegal because he was not aware of all the circumstances affecting his decision.

2. It does not necessarily follow therefrom, as the Court of Appeal assumes incorrectly, that the second defendant is vicariously liable for the injuries to the person of the plaintiff as a result of the perforation of the intestine. The facts as found by the Court of Appeal so far are insufficient for holding the second defendant liable for having provided defective information concerning the unpleasantness of a colonoscopy.

(a) In as far as the required information of the patient was held to have been incomplete because he was not told before the proposed diagnostic investigation of the possibility of considerable pain (without resulting in a serious and permanent injury to his health), it is not immediately obvious that the patient, if correctly informed, would have declined the investigation. It is even less obvious in the case of a patient who is not normally given to complain of pain. In the present case the plaintiff has described himself in the course of proceedings as a man who is not really hypersensitive; moreover, he has not argued that he had been insufficiently informed because he had not been told of the possibility of pain in the course of the investigation. In these circumstances the mere allegation by the plaintiff that he would have declined to undergo the investigation for fear of pain would be insufficient to accept this account (see the decision of this Senate of 7 February 1984, reported below, BGHZ 90, 103 and the order of this Senate of 27 October 1981—VI Z R 63/81, VersR 1982, 74, 75 = NJW 1982, 700). Since the plaintiff made no such allegation, the fact that the defendants have not pleaded expressly that the plaintiff would have consented to the investigation in any case, cannot be held against them. Instead, the plaintiff's pleadings until now are insufficient to support the conclusion that his right to decide himself whether to agree to the investigation had been violated on the legal ground relied upon by the Court of Appeal.

(b) In addition, this Court must accept that in the view of the Court of Appeal the risk of which the plaintiff should have been informed, namely that the investigation might be accompanied by considerable pain, did not materialise in his case. It is true that the plaintiff has made allegation to this effect, but to the detriment of the defendants, who denied from the outset that the investigation had been accompanied by considerable pain; the Court of Appeal did not make any findings to this effect. Evidence taken on this question was not taken into account by it. If, however, the colonoscopy did not cause the plaintiff considerable pain, the investigation also did not cause him any injury. Even if his right to determine himself whether to agree to the investigation has been violated in some respects, he did not suffer any personal injury for which compensation would have to be paid. This conclusion is not vitiated by the fact that in carrying out the colonoscopy leading to the perforation of the sigmoid colon an entirely different and remote risk materialised provided that the latter did not have to be disclosed (for details see infra III). The reason is that the damage arising therefrom falls outside the sphere of protection of the rule establishing liability which imposes a duty upon the doctor to pay damages for a physical investigation which is illegal in the absence of a valid consent by the patient.

(aa) It is unnecessary in the present case to determine the question of law as to whether no connection exists between the illegality of the physical investigation of the patient in the absence of effective information and the resulting physical injury whenever culpably the basic risks inherent in the investigation have not been set out, but another link has materialised which did not have to be explained to the plaintiff (affirmatively the Court of Appeal Karlsruhe, Med. R. 1983, 180, 192 with a concurring note by Kern; Kern-Laufs, Die ärztliche Aufklärungspflicht, 1983, p. 151 ff.; contra: Mutons in Münchener Kommentar p. 823 no. 423). Certain objections could be raised against this view because in the case of medical investigations involving risks which are not quite inconsiderable, the right of the patient to determine himself whether to agree to the investigation and who also agrees without any knowledge and without any information, always includes his freedom of decision for or against an investigation covering his body as a whole.

(bb) The objections set out here do not apply in the present case.

Admittedly, the action of the second defendant does not cease to be illegal for the reason only that the plaintiff's consent certainly covered an investigation free of pain. The consent of a patient to a medical investigation is not a declaration of intent which can be divided into one concerning the violation of personal integrity on the one hand and another, on the other hand, which involves exposing oneself voluntarily to danger by accepting certain possible risks (see however Kern-Laufs loc. cit. and Med. R. loc. cit.). It is true that in substance it covers both (see Deutsch, NJW 1982, 2585 and in Arztrecht und Arzneimittelrecht p. 42 no. 42), but this only defines the legal significance of the declaration of intent. However, it has no bearing on the question as to what is the substance of the declaration made to the doctor in consenting to the medical investigation. The substance is clear: if the consent is valid, it applies without restriction. If it is refused (or what is the same, if it is invalid for failure to receive sufficient information), the declaration of intention means, and cannot be interpreted otherwise, that the patient will not agree to the medical measures, as advised, that is to say in their entirety (similarly Mertons in Münchener Kommentar loc. cit.). The motives for his refusal are legally irrelevant as is the question whether hypothetically he would consent to all investigations without complications. If he did not give his consent, he did not consent either to an investigation which was illegal and to which he did not agree, but which was successful. At best the disregard of his right to determine himself whether to undergo the investigation did not result in any damage.

It is possible, however, that in such cases the claim for damages may not succeed for a different legal reason. The duty to supply information concerning the remote damages of considerable pain is designed to protect the patient's right to decide freely whether he will consent to the medical investigation, having regard to the advantages of a diagnostic assessment of his state of health and to the physical unpleasantness which he will experience if he undergoes the investigation.

The medical duty of contract which is to provide information concerning the potential danger of considerable pain is therefore not designed to facilitate the independent decision of the patient whether he is willing to accept possible dangers to his health. Instead it is to enable the patient to decide whether he is willing to face a potential temporary impairment of his well being as a result of sudden pain. In such cases, a connection between the illegality consisting of the doctor's neglect of his duty and that consisting of the violation of the patient's right to determine himself whether to undergo a medical investigation exists only if the risk of a painful treatment has materialised. If apart from this no risk of any damage to health exists, having regard to the fact that the investigation does not present any danger of which the patient should have to be informed, the failure to inform him of the possibility of pain cannot form the basis of liability in respect of a complication which occurred nevertheless in the course of the diagnostic investigation (see Steffen in Verhandlungen des 52. Deutschen Juristentags vol. II Part I p. 15; similarly in another connection Giesen, JZ 1982, 448, 454 with reference to the decision of this Senate of 16 June 1981, VI | R 38/40 = VersR 1981, 954—NJW 1981, 2513; for criticism of the denial of a link of illegality in general see Mertens loc. cit.).

In the present case the plaintiff cannot, therefore, base his claims for damages on the ground that he was not informed of possible pain in the course of the colonoscopy.

Case 53

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL DIVISION) 9 DECEMBER 1958

BGHZ 29, 46 = JR 1959, 418

The plaintiff was a patient in the hospital for nervous diseases in L. He claims damages against the local authority in respect of the consequences of electric-shock treatment.

The plaintiff was a chronic alcoholic. When his mental powers continued to deteriorate, he received unsuccessful treatment for alcoholism in the summer of 1954. He was then received by the hospital for nervous diseases. There medicinal treatment had no lasting effect. For this reason the assembled medical staff suggested that the plaintiff should receive a series of electric-shock treatments. Dr N, the head of the neurological psychiatric department, discussed this method of treatment in October 1954 with the plaintiff's brother and sister and with his wife. They consented to the electric-shock treatment. The parties disagree as to what was said during the remaining part of this discussion.

After receiving shock treatment on five occasions without incident, the plaintiff suffered a complicated comminuted fracture of the head of the left femur when he received his sixth and last treatment on 2 November 1954. As a result his left leg, which was already deformed since birth (club-foot and atrophy), was shortened. In addition a so-called false joint appeared in the area of the head of the femur.

The plaintiff contends as follows: he had been given shock treatment without his consent and had not been informed of the dangers of this treatment. Moreover he had not consented validly since he had lacked the capacity at the time. A guardian, who would have acted in his place, had not yet been appointed. His brother and sister and his wife had not consented validly either to the shock treatment since they, too, had not been informed of the nature and the attendant danger. The plaintiff continued, further, that the treatment had been carried out inexpertly; in particular no drugs relaxing the muscles had been administered, although this was necessary in order to prevent injuries resulting from cramp.

The plaintiff has asked that the defendant should pay DM 2,931 as compensation and an adequate sum for pain and suffering. He has asked, further, for a declaration that the defendant is obliged to compensate him for all damage which may arise in the future.

The defendant contends as follows: The plaintiff and his relatives had agreed to the shock treatment. They had been warned that this treatment carried a certain risk. No duty to provide this information existed, for the methods of shock treatment had been greatly improved since the early days when this treatment was first applied, and the danger of injurious consequences was extremely low. The treatment had been carried out correctly and with the help of the most modern appliance, . . . which caused a mild effect of the cramps. Any use of muscle relaxing drugs had been ruled out because the plaintiff's heart, his circulation, his liver, and his lungs had not functioned properly.

The District Court of Landau dismissed the claim. In the course of his appeal the plaintiff abandoned his claim for pain and suffering but maintained his claim for damages amounting to DM 2,931 and for a declaration. The Court of Appeal of Neustadt allowed the claim to the extent that it had not passed to the Social Insurance by way of subrogation and granted the declaration. On the second appeal by the defendant, the judgment of the Court of Appeal was quashed and the case referred back for the following

Reasons

I. The Court of Appeal starts from the proposition that by accepting the plaintiff in their hospital in L a contract had been concluded between the parties. By virtue of this contract the plaintiff was entitled, as against the defendant authority responsible for the hospital, to be treated expertly by the doctors employed by it. This proposition cannot be faulted, nor has the appellant done so. According to the Court of Appeal the evidence does not disclose any violation of the standards of medical care . . .

The Court of Appeal regards the doctor who administered the treatment as liable on the ground that he acted in the absence of a legally valid consent. The Court of Appeal left it undecided whether the plaintiff was legally capable of acting or physically capable of expressing his wishes and therefore able to give a valid consent. The Court of Appeal believes that the question as to whether the plaintiff consented is irrelevant, because he had not been informed of the possible danger accompanying the treatment. In considering the duty of a medical practitioner to inform the patient, the Court of Appeal relied on the principles enunciated by this Division [reference] following the practice of the Reichsgericht and held that the plaintiff or his legal representative should have been informed of the risks connected with shock treatment. It is not clear whether the plaintiff's wife and his brother and sister were given sufficient details of the danger. It seems that the Court of Appeal regarded this question as irrelevant, because none of those persons had been appointed the plaintiff's guardian at that time. As a result the Court of Appeal held that Dr N had acted negligently and in breach of contract for having administered electro-shock to the defendant without any real consent; the defendant was responsible for his according to § 278 BGB.

II. . . . Doctors and lawyers agree that the consent of the patient is required before medical treatment can take place, especially if it interferes with the body. Apart from special, exceptional cases, none of which is in issue here (e.g. where there is danger in delay), any interference with the body of a patient is only lawful if the patient consents. This follows from Article 2 II of the Constitution which guarantees integrity of the person to everybody. A right to compel treatment, as it was being discussed under National Socialism, but as always rejected by the Reichsgericht [reference], is not being called for by anybody today.

Opinions are divided as to the nature of this consent, whether and to what extent it presupposes, in particular, that the patient is aware of his condition and whether, therefore, he must be informed of the nature of his illness as well as of the character, importance, and possible deleterious consequences of the treatment. This question of the duty of a medical adviser to give information . . . can no longer be answered by relying on the advice of Hippocrates to conceal most from the patient and not to tell him anything of what awaits or threatens him. This advice cannot be reconciled with modern ideas about the calling of a medical practitioner and the right of patients to self-determination [reference]; also it no longer serves as a guideline for medical conduct . . .

It is unnecessary in the present case to decide to what extent the patient must be informed, for if it is correct . . . that the plaintiff was capable of acting, he was informed of the nature of his illness and also of the nature of the treatment, at least at the start of the sixth application of the electro-shock treatment which led to the injury and is therefore essential for the present purpose. The discussion can therefore be limited to the question which has given rise to most doubts, as to whether and to what extent the information to be given to the patient must also include the potentially dangerous consequences of the treatment.

1. In response to the demand for such information it is pointed out in medical circles, first of all, that a patient is often incapable of understanding the nature and the consequences of the treatment; that since any serious illness affects the person as a whole and causes a disturbance, not only physically but also emotionally, he is unable to assess rationally the advantages and the disadvantages of the proposed medical treatment or to force himself into reaching a decision free from uncontrollable moods, fears, and prejudices [references]. This aspect is important in assessing the legal position in as much as naturally the information is only indicated if the patient is capable of appreciating the kind, purpose, and consequences of the treatment and to come to a decision, for only a patient who is able to do this can validly consent to the proposed treatment. These problems did not arise in the case decided previously by this Division, for it was found in that case that the patient was able to consent validly to the electro-shock treatment because his state of depression did not affect his judgment or his ability to act freely . . . [reference].

The question whether a sick person can act freely in the sense set out above is primarily one to be answered by the medical profession. In most cases a court cannot decide it without medical witnesses or experts. However, even if a patient lacks the ability to act freely, the need for consent remains. This must be given by the person who, after having been given the necessary information, must decide instead of the patient himself whether the operation should take place. According to the opinion of some medical practitioners the nearest relatives of the sick and incapable person are not necessarily qualified to do so. It is true that they are the persons with the strongest and humanly closest interest in the well-being of the patient. However, as long as the law has not conferred upon them the right to decide upon the treatment of a patient who is incapable of acting himself, the practice current in many hospitals to obtain the consent of the nearest relative to the treatment of the patient cannot suffice, even if a consultation with the relatives, where danger exists in delay, may be a relevant means of ascertaining the presumed intention of the patient. In the absence of a dangerous situation which requires immediate or speedy action, it is necessary to appoint a guardian for the patient, who must decide in the place of the sick person whether the planned medical action is to take place. Such an appointment of a guardian is possible under § 1910 BGB if the sick person is unable as a result of his infirmity to handle his affairs in the particular circumstances . . .

2. . . . as regards information to be given to a patient, the position of the doctor has been compared with that of the lawyer. It is said that it is unsatisfactory to treat the relationship between medical adviser and patient as a contract of service, seeing that the relationship is distinguished by a special human characteristic and often touches the deepest and most confidential areas of human feeling. It is alleged that a legal relationship sui generis is created in which the personality of the patient plays an important role which must not be overlooked and that the personal relationship between doctor and patient is the basis of a successful treatment . . . lawyers are said to be too formalistic and do not consider sufficiently the real situation.

. . . observations to this effect cannot be accepted. It is unimportant for the purpose of the problem of a medical practitioner's duty of information whether in law the relationship between doctor and patient is regarded as a contract of service or as a relationship sui generis. For, irrespective of the legal characterisation of this relationship a court cannot and must not, in examining this question, regard the doctor and the patient merely as parties to a private law contract. If a court wishes to ascertain the nature and extent of the duty to provide information required by a doctor, all the circumstances of the individual case must be assembled and considered. The court must not overlook either that the relationship between doctor and patient presupposes profound confidence, that it is strongly based on a human relationship, in which the doctor comes to the aid of the patient, and that, therefore, it constitutes much more than a contractual relationship. . . .

The health of the patient is the doctor's principal concern. It is his duty to restore it and to preserve it. It is reasonable that a conscientious doctor often regards himself as entitled, or even as obliged, to assist by interfering physically if the life and the health of his patient is at stake. Nevertheless, these efforts must find their limit if they conflict with the right of the patient to determine the fate of his body. This situation can arise if the doctor begins a treatment without having informed the patient of its nature and consequences [reference].

It is true that a sick person, who consults a medical practitioner or visits a hospital in order to seek relief for his illness also often consents in advance to a limited extent to the administration of physical treatment which is necessary as a means of recovery. It cannot be concluded therefrom, however, that the patient is not interested in being told in broad terms about the proposed treatment, the usual development, the likely result, and possible danger to his health arising from this treatment. Not being an expert in medical matters, the patient also regards the doctor as an adviser and expects normally to be instructed by him in these matters and to be advised. Only if the patient is aware of his situation, and knows broadly what his consent to the administration of physical medical treatment implies can his consent satisfy the meaning and purpose which is to absolve the administration of physical treatment from the charge of illegality and to shift part of the doctor's responsibility to the patient.

It is true that cases will arise in which the patient wishes to be relieved of his sufferings in all circumstances and indicates clearly that he places his full confidence in the doctor. In such a case the doctor may be justified, in view of the clear wish of the patient, in omitting to provide further information. In such a case . . . the patient looks to the doctor as the authority which relieves him from considering the matter on his own and assuming responsibility himself. The patient does not really wish to know but wants to comply. This does not, however, apply normally, for in many, if not most cases the patient wants to know his situation and thus the prognosis and the risks of the intended operation or of another medical administration of physical treatment and wants to decide himself whether this treatment is to take place. If the doctor respects the patient's right to decide himself, the confidence of the latter in the doctor will be enhanced rather than diminished. A sick person may have very good reasons . . . for refusing to undergo an operation and thus possibly for accepting responsibility for a considerable shortening of his life [reference]. The freedom and dignity of human personality require that this wish of the patient is to be respected.

All this shows that in protecting the freedom of a patient to decide for himself, the courts are far from paying homage to what is a formal principle only. On the contrary, they protect a right enshrined in the Constitution, which is to be respected and applied as much as the right to health. In the present context of the decision concerning the duty of a medical adviser to provide information too, much more is at stake than purely formal matters, for in this connection, too, substantive considerations are in issue as to how the responsibility for treatment is to be decided reasonably and justly between doctor and patient [reference].

3. . . . attention has been drawn . . . to the dangers to the health and to the recovery affecting in particular those suffering from psychosis, if they are informed of their illness. It is said, inter alia, that only the medical expert and not the court can decide, having regard to the special situation in the individual case, to what extent a patient can be informed of the risks involved in the administration of physical treatment. It was the duty of the medical practitioner to calm the patient and to dispel the fear of an operation and not to produce the opposite effect by providing detailed information. Unrestricted information concerning possible complications would so deter and frighten a sufferer from a psychosis who was willing in principle to undergo the treatment that in most cases he would refuse his consent to shock treatment and would thus deprive himself of the chance of recovery [reference].

In determining the duty to provide information the above-mentioned consideration cannot be attributed the degree of importance which the medical profession ascribes to it. If the provision of information to a patient who is capable of acting is unlikely to endanger his health or his recovery, and if only the serious possibility exists of the patient refusing his consent to the treatment, contrary to his true interest, it follows that the medical adviser is not relieved of his duty to draw the patient's attention to the typical dangers connected with the treatment . . . the information serves to invite the patient to decide himself. In making up his mind he is to be given the opportunity of considering not only the chances of recovery but also the deleterious effects of the treatment which are not too remote. Only if the patient knows this too, can his consent relieve the doctor of part of his responsibility. Admittedly the doctor must seek to calm the patient and to set his mind at ease, following the information. The doctor may also seek to influence him to undergo urgently needed treatment by patient persuasion and by a discussion of his fears and objections, as well as by pointing out forcibly the disadvantages if the treatment does not take place. On the other hand, the medical adviser must not seek to influence the decision of the patient by concealing relevant facts from him [reference].

The real difficulty is presented by the problem . . . whether and to what extent the duty to provide information must give way to other duties and interests, if serious objections exist against informing the patient having regard to his personality and his mental state, especially if by providing the information his health or even his life may be endangered. The previous decision of this Division has been understood wrongly to state that the Federal Supreme Court regards this circumstance as irrelevant. Admittedly it is stated in the reasons given by the judgment, following the practice of the Reichsgericht [reference]: if, as a result of the information the mood or the general well-being of the patient should be affected adversely, this fact must be accepted as an inevitable disadvantage. The passage in question does not state, however, as has been thought erroneously, that exhaustive information is to be given even if, as a result, the life or the health of the patient is seriously endangered. The principle has been stated meanwhile by this Division in its decision of 10 February 1956 [reference] where it is stated that a doctor is not obliged to prejudice recovery by excessive information. The question as to how such a case is to be judged in law [reference] and how the doctor must act in this situation was irrelevant in the previous case. It need not be decided here either, for, then as now, neither the defendant nor the doctor in charge has pleaded that in this respect doubts existed as to whether the patient should be informed. If a medical adviser has failed to point out the typical dangers connected with the administration of physical treatment, the burden of proof is on him to show good reasons for having omitted to provide information [reference].

This court cannot agree with the claim of the medical profession to decide on their own whether and to what extent in the individual case a patient is to receive information if it is implied thereby that the courts are precluded altogether from reviewing the medical decision. The question as to whether in a particular case the patient received sufficient information touches upon the sphere of law; upon it depends the determination of the legal question, to be decided by the court, as to whether he has validly consented to the treatment. Naturally, the court in determining questions of this kind, will rely extensively on expert medical assistance. This is true . . . in particular in assessing the capacity of the patient to give his consent, but also when the question is whether complete information would have resulted in injury to the plaintiff's health or would have seriously endangered recovery. The court cannot be deprived of the power to review the question whether the doctor has complied with his duty to provide information and whether the patient has validly consented to the treatment.

4. According to the judgment of the Federal Supreme Court, information must only be provided where typical dangers exist inherent in the treatment, that is to say dangers which are normally connected with it and the occurrence of which can be expected according to medical experience and research. . . . The assumption is incorrect that the Federal Supreme Court requires a sick person to be made aware of every possible side effect of the treatment. No such requirement has ever been laid down. Instead it is acknowledged that a doctor is not obliged to draw the patient's attention to those dangers which can be avoided without difficulty, having regard to modern standards of operating techniques [reference]. Nor is he required to advise the patient that in unfavourable conditions even the smallest operation may result in some complications, despite all precautionary measures. Generally every patient knows this, and no special warning is necessary [reference].

5. In conclusion, it appears that the problem of the duty to provide a patient with information incumbent upon medical advisers as a condition for the validity of the patient's consent to the treatment continues to be governed basically by the principles which predominate in practice and in the literature.

III. In applying these principles to the facts of the present case the Court of Appeal rightly assumed that according to medical experience complications may arise in the course of electro-shock treatment. . . . Even incurable mental disease can be alleviated thereby at a stroke and sometimes cured; an electric current causes a cramp, accompanied by a sudden cramp-like contraction of all the muscles of the body and by a temporary loss of consciousness. This cramp-like tension can result in damage to joints and bones . . .

In its previous decision the Federal Supreme Court assumed on the basis of the expert evidence and of the factual findings of the Court of Appeal that at the time of the treatment then in issue, i.e. in the year 1951, complications arose in seven per cent of the cases of electro-shock treatment and that, consequently, it was normally required to inform the patient of this possibility . . . in the present case the question is only what the rate of complications appeared to be in 1954, when the plaintiff received electro-shock treatment. As regards this question the plaintiff, in agreement with statements made by some doctors, has argued as follows: like every therapeutic measure shock treatment had become less dangerous with increasing experience and with improvements in technical handling. For some time, and certainly in 1954, complications had become extremely rare and only occurred in one out of a thousand cases of shock therapy. This objection is relevant, for it is correct that the dangerous nature of the physical treatment cannot be assessed by reference to the frequency of complications during the early stages of a new therapy, when the necessary experience was still lacking. Instead the state of medical science and experience is determining which exists at the time of the particular medical treatment in issue [reference]. The Court of Appeal, too, adopted this view. It stated:

The court realises that the dangers arising from shock treatment may have been less in 1954 than in 1951. . . . In examining the question of the need to provide information it is impossible to rely on the positive experience of one medical expert which, moreover, extends to the present time. It must be considered that at the relevant time, in 1954, the Siemens-Convulsator III which was used in treating the plaintiff was . . . a new instrument, the effects of which had not yet been tested by an extensive practice. In determining a duty to provide information and the extent of the information to be provided, the state of experience at the particular time must supply the standard. Even if in 1954 fractures, injuries to the spine, and other damage had become so rare as no longer to count as typical, they still occurred to an extent which made it appear necessary to draw attention to them.

These observations of the Court of Appeal give rise to legal criticism. Even if in 1954 the application of shock methods as practised in the hospital for nervous diseases led only very seldom to complications, these complications nevertheless remain typical of shock treatment, for injuries of this kind . . . occur precisely on the occasion of this treatment, and at no other. This does not, however, assist in determining the duty of the medical adviser to inform the patient, for it is also unnecessary to draw attention to typical injuries, if they occur in extremely rare cases only and if it can be assumed that a reasonable patient would not consider such injuries seriously in deciding to give his consent. This would be the case if, as the defendant contends, in 1954 complications occurred in less than one in a thousand cases of shock treatment where the Siemens-Convulsator III was used. In such cases information must only be given if the patient enquires specifically about possible dangers. Since the Court of Appeal has found that this did not happen, it should have ascertained the rate of complications in 1954 accompanying this method of treatment. . . . The fact that the Court of Appeal came to the conclusion, without exhausting [these] sources of further evidence, that injuries still occurred at that time to an extent which made it necessary to inform the patient to this effect discloses . . . an error of law. Consequently the judgment under appeal cannot be upheld on the basis of the reasons set out therein . . .

Case 54

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 21 NOVEMBER 1995
NJW 1996, 776 = JZ 1996, 518

Facts

The claimant's big toe was fractured on 26 January 1991. He was fitted with a leg plaster, which permitted walking, at the clinic of the former co-defendant, on the orders of the second defendant (hereafter called the defendant) who was a doctor. At the same time he was given a leaflet about what to do if there were complications with the plaster cast. It mentioned the danger of interference with blood circulation. The claimant had pressure pains and called at the outpatients department on 6 February 1991. Small pressure marks on his heel were revealed on removal of the plaster, so no new plaster was put on, and he was given crutches instead. He then came to an appointment in outpatients on 20 February 1991, complaining of severe calf pains. Vein thrombosis was diagnosed, which was treated in hospital, but it could not be healed operatively or with drugs, as it was several days old. The claimant sued the defendant and the former co-defendant for compensation for defective treatment and insufficient explanation.

The claim failed at both earlier instances. The claimant lodged an appeal in law but withdrew it against the former defendant. It led to quashing and reference back.

Reasons

...

II. These statements do not stand up to legal examination in the appeal in law.

1. ...

2. The appeal in law is correct in objecting to the fact that the appeal court did not regard an explanation to the claimant about the risk of thrombosis as necessary. According to the case law of the Senate, the doctor must give an explanation to a patient about the specific risks of a treatment if they would severely cramp his lifestyle if they were realised. These dangers include those of deep leg vein thrombosis. The appeal court obviously proceeds on this basis. It considers however that here no explanation was needed at the point in time of the treatment, because “the danger of a thrombosis from immobilisation on outpatient treatment and therefore the prophylaxis in this situation” was “admittedly under discussion but was not in any way the norm”; the patient did not need an explanation about a step which was not the medical norm. The appeal in law correctly disputes this view as erroneous in law.

The assumption of the appeal court is flawed from the outset. The appeal court takes into account according to the nature of the case that the prophylaxis for thrombosis was not yet at that time the medical norm. But the duty to explain is not about the necessity of a prophylaxis to avert the risk of thrombosis nor about whether such a step was already at that time the medical norm or not. The question of the necessity for an explanation about the risk of thrombosis is only about whether the danger of a thrombosis arising on the prescribing in outpatients of a plaster permitting walking, as here, was sufficiently known in medical circles at that time.

As the Senate decided in its judgment of 12 December 1989, the medical duty of explanation presupposes that the particular risk concerned is known according to the state of medical experience at the point in time of the treatment (reference omitted). In any case, in cases in which, as here, alternative treatments were available, like the prescribing of crutches or of a special shoe, it is not necessary for this purpose that the scientific discussion about particular risks of a type of treatment is already closed and has led to generally accepted conclusions. It will then suffice that serious opinions in medical science indicate definite dangers connected with the treatment, which cannot be merely dismissed as insignificant outsider opinions, but must be regarded as important warnings (reference omitted). Thus in the case in question even an ongoing discussion in medical science about the dangers of thrombosis and the possibilities of combatting it by prophylaxis with drugs in outpatients would suffice to trigger the duty to explain. This is because in such cases the patient’s right of self-determination requires the dangers possibly associated with the chosen treatment methods to be communicated to him, and for it at the same time to be indicated to him that such dangers can be avoided or reduced by the other treatment methods which are available . . .

III. Because of all this, the disputed judgment must be quashed in so far as it concerns the defendant, in order that the appeal court can make the necessary findings about whether and to what extent the risk of thrombosis was serious and under discussion (and in a way that the defendant could recognise) at the time of the treatment.

Case 55

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 15 FEBRUARY 2000
BGHZ 144, 1 = NJW 2000, 1784 = JZ 2000, 898

Facts

The claimant, who was born on 8 February 1994, seeks compensation from the defendant paediatrician for harm caused by vaccination. The claimant was brought by her mother to the defendant on 11 May 1994 for a routine child care investigation. She gave her a primary immunisation against a number of diseases and a threefold live oral vaccine against poliomyelitis, with the agreement of her mother. The defendant's receptionist gave the mother beforehand a leaflet about the vaccinations which she looked at in the waiting room and gave back again without signing it. The side effects of the vaccination against poliomyelitis were stated in the leaflet, amongst others, to be that: "Feverish reactions seldom arise, and paralyses extremely rarely (one case in five million vaccinations)". The defendant asked her if she had read the leaflet and she said she had. After examining the claimant, the defendant said a vaccination was now possible if the mother wanted it. On 13 June 1994 the mother came to the defendant again because the child had a skin rash, and the second vaccination against poliomyelitis was then carried out. On 18 June 1994 she was found to have fever and on 25 June restraint in the use of her left leg. Investigations revealed that she was suffering from poliomyelitis. The social security office at F found harm caused by vaccination with a reduction in ability to work of 80 per cent, and awarded a vaccination benefit. The claimant claimed defective treatment and insufficient explanation resulting in no effective consent; and that there was no consent by the father either. She claimed damages for pain and suffering of at least DM 100,000 and a declaration that the defendant was under a duty to compensate for all consequential harm.

The Landgericht rejected the claim. The Oberlandesgericht allowed it in substance, awarding damages for pain and suffering of DM 80,000.

The appeal in law by the defendant was successful.

Reasons

I. . . .

II. These statements do not stand up to legal examination in the end result. The claimant is not entitled to a claim to compensation against the defendant for unlawful harm to her health. The appeal in law is right in objecting to the fact that the assumption by the appeal court that the claimant's mother did not effectively consent to the vaccination because of the lack of sufficient explanation by the defendant was based on requirements which were too strict.

1. The appeal court has admittedly correctly stated that an effective consent was not lacking simply because the claimant's father had not agreed to the vaccination. It is true that in cases in which, as here, parental care belongs to both parents jointly (§§ 1626 ff. of the BGB), the consent of both parents is needed for a medical operation, which also includes a medical vaccination. But it will in general be possible to proceed on the basis that the parent appearing at the doctors with the child has the power to give consent to the medical treatment on behalf of the absent parent as well; and the doctor may rely on this within limits, as long as no circumstances which would indicate the contrary are known to him. This applies, as the Senate has already stated in its judgment of the 28 June 1988 (reference omitted), and it adheres to this, at any rate in routine cases, which include routine injections.

The oral vaccination against poliomyelitis with live attenuated polio pathogens carried out in the first half year of 1994 is a routine vaccination, as the appeal court has stated without legal error. It was recommended a long time ago by the Standing Vaccination Committee of the Federal Health Office (references omitted) and was also publicly recommended in Baden-Württemberg by the relevant health authority in accordance with § 14 (3) of the BSeuchG, in particular in 1994 (reference omitted). It had been carried out millions of times since the introduction of oral polio vaccine in 1962. The question of undertaking of such vaccinations arises for everyone having custody of children in the first months of a child's life (reference omitted) and usually on the occasion of the routine child care investigations of babies and small children, and this was generally known. On a vaccination recommended in this way, which a large number of parents let their children receive, the defendant might therefore rely on the fact, in the absence of concrete indications to the contrary, that the claimant's mother made her decision in favour of vaccination with the father's authority, especially as the mother—as the appeal court correctly observes—always (and this included previous occasions) appeared alone with the claimant at the surgery.

2. The appeal court further correctly assumes that the consent given by the claimant's mother to the vaccination was only effective if the risks associated with it had been previously explained to her. Such an explanation of the risks is also necessary for a voluntary vaccination and even when the vaccination is publicly recommended (references omitted). The necessity for an explanation about the danger that a person who has been vaccinated might contract spinal poliomyelitis because of vaccination with living polio viruses did not—contrary to the view of the appeal in law—cease to apply simply because it was an extremely rare consequence of vaccination. The appeal court, referring to C. Braemer (reference omitted) took as a basis a frequency of harm of 1:4.4 million. In the leaflet given by the defendant to the claimant's mother a risk of 1:5 million is given. Although the reply to the appeal in law claims that these figures are incorrect, and that on first vaccinations the risk in fact rises to 1:750,000 vaccinations, no more precise clarification of the frequency of harm is necessary as statistical risk figures have a comparatively low value (references omitted). The decisive factor for determining whether there is a medical duty to advise is not a particular degree of risk, and especially not a particular statistic; it is whether the risk concerned is specifically attached to the operation and on the realisation of the risk it would be especially burdensome to the patient's lifestyle (references omitted). The Senate therefore adheres to the view that in principle even extremely uncommon risks of this kind must be explained. Contrary to the view of the appeal in law and statements to the same effect in the academic literature (reference omitted) this applies also for publicly recommended vaccinations, for which the primary immunisation of the whole population is in the public interest in order to prevent an epidemic spread of a disease. In cases of public recommendation of vaccination, it is true that the health authorities have already balanced the risks of vaccination for the individual and his environment on the one hand, and the dangers threatening the general public and the individual in the case of non-vaccination on the other hand. But that does not change the fact that the vaccination is nevertheless voluntary, and the individual person receiving the vaccination can therefore also decide against it. This person must therefore not only be aware of the voluntariness of the vaccination (reference omitted), which, in relation to the claimant's mother, is not questioned here. He must also make a decision about whether to take the risks associated with the vaccination or not. This presupposes knowledge of these risks, even if they are only realised extremely rarely; they must therefore be communicated to him by medical explanation.

3. The Senate also agrees with the appeal court that the written advice on vaccination against poliomyelitis in the leaflet which was given to the claimant's mother is not open to objection as to its content.

(b) . . .

(aa) . . . According to the case law of the Senate, the patient only needs explanation about the chances and risks of the treatment "by and large". Exact medical description of the risks coming into consideration is not necessary . . .

Although the reply to the appeal in law mentions other risks (meningo-encephalitis, convulsions etc., see (reference omitted)) which had not been explained, this does not justify any different conclusion. If, as in the present case, the precise risk which had to be explained, and actually was explained, has in fact been realised, it does not as a rule matter whether other risks needed to be mentioned as well in the explanation. The patient has given his consent in the knowledge of the risk which was realised, so for this reason no liability can arise from the operation. Considerations as to whether he would possibly have refused approval on being advised of another risk are necessarily speculative and can therefore not be the basis of a claim for compensation . . .

4. However there are serious reservations about the view of the appeal court that the explanation could not be regarded as having been given in time, having regard to the manner in which it was made . . .

(b) The appeal court is exaggerating the requirements for an explanation to be given in time in connection with a routine vaccination, as the appeal in law correctly argues. According to the established case law, an explanation on the day of the operation in principle suffices in the case of outpatient operations (references omitted). The only case when that does not apply is if the explanation only occurs so immediately before the operation that the patient is under the impression that he can no longer extricate himself from a course of events already set in motion (e.g. an explanation at the door to the operating theatre).

The multiple vaccination undertaken here did not require an explanation at some earlier point in time, separated from the vaccination. In particular, no requirement can be made (as the appeal court thought was necessary) for the leaflet to be given to the mother to take home, so that she could read and consider it there in peace, and for the vaccination then to be carried out on a separate date. This places excessive requirements on the doctor.

The oral vaccination, even if it was not completely free from risk, did not present the parents with difficult decisions which would first have needed thorough weighing up and careful consideration. It was a question, as has been observed, of a routine vaccination in connection with which the element of conflict in the decision was to a large extent removed from the parents by the balancing of the advantages and disadvantages undertaken by the health authorities and the recommendation for vaccination made by them.

The necessity for vaccination had been generally recognised for a long time amongst the population and parents everywhere saw to it that it was done to their children, in order to avoid the feared disease of poliomyelitis. In this situation the defendant could assume that the claimant's mother was familiar with the vaccination and was in the picture about the generally accepted need for it. If a person having custody of a child should in such a case exceptionally want a period for reflection, then he could be expected to state this to the doctor and to decline an immediate vaccination.

(c) The explanation which had been given to the claimant's mother was also not insufficient simply because the defendant did not make it in a personal conversation about the vaccination and its risks. According to the case law of the Senate "conversation based on trust between the doctor and the patient" is admittedly necessary for the purpose of making an explanation (reference omitted). That however does not in any way exclude the use of leaflets in which the necessary information about the operation, including its risks, is set out in writing. Written advice of this kind is normal today to a large extent and has the advantage of giving a precise and comprehensive description of the subject of the explanation, as well as providing the doctor with substantial means of proof. It is in particular appropriate for routine treatments and therefore also for publicly recommended protective vaccinations.

Such leaflets can admittedly not replace the necessary discussion with the doctor (reference omitted), in which the doctor must satisfy himself as to whether the patient has read and understood the written advice, and which gives him the opportunity to go into the individual interests of the patient and answer possible questions. But this requirement of an explanatory conversation, which must be adhered to in principle, does not require an oral explanation of the risks in every case. In certain circumstances, as with the present facts, having regard to the routine character of the publicly recommended vaccination, the doctor can by way of exception proceed on the basis that the patient does not attach any importance to an additional presentation of the risks in discussion. For such routine treatment, it can suffice if, after a written explanation, opportunity is given to the patient for further information by a conversation with the doctor . . .

Case 56

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 15 APRIL 1975
NJW 1975, 1161 = JZ 1975, 535 = VERSR 1975, 831

The defendants accuse the plaintiff of having offered indecent periodicals and picture magazines on their railway bookstalls. After the third defendant, a student of theology, had lodged a complaint with the police he went on the morning of 4 July 1971 together with the other defendants, a lawyer and two acquaintances, to the railway bookstall of the plaintiff in B and invited the sales assistant to remove from the shelves within one hour those publications which he described as indecent. When he found upon his return that they had not been removed, the third defendant took twenty-four newspapers and periodicals from the shelves and from a stand and took them in front of the railway station, where the fourth defendant defaced them with paint. In addition he wrote in paint on the display window of the kiosk "Away with filthy pornography". Meanwhile the first defendant, in the presence of the second defendant, engaged in discussion with passers-by.

On the same evening the first and third defendant went to the plaintiff's kiosk at the railway station in H and made the same demand that all the publications described by them as pornographic were to be removed within an hour. Finding upon their return that their demand had not been complied with, the third defendant began to go through the papers on the newsstand, as a result of which some periodicals fell onto the ground. Using a megaphone he invited passers-by to lodge a complaint against the plaintiff. The first defendant protested against the sale of pornographic publications by holding up a poster.

The plaintiff demands that the defendants should be prohibited from removing from their outlets publications or other objects without any intention of purchasing them, from soiling or damaging them or from affecting them physically.

The district court allowed the claim. The defendants appealed unsuccessfully to the Court of Appeal of Karlsruhe. Their further appeal was rejected for the following

Reasons

The Court of Appeal regards the claim for an order of prohibition as justified under §§ 823 I, 1004 I BGB. It holds correctly that the defendants, acting together, violated the plaintiff's property and interfered with his established and operating business. The appellants do not contest that they acted as trespassers in the meaning of § 1004 I BGB, even if they did not themselves act against the plaintiff. It is only disputed whether the defendants acted illegally and whether a danger exists of a repetition. The Court of Appeal answered both questions in the affirmative. It held that the acts of the defendants were not justified as self-defence nor as permissible defence of others, even if . . . the publications concerned were indecent in the meaning of the wording then in force of § 184 of the Criminal Code and were therefore a danger to young persons according to § 6 of the Act against the Distribution of Publications Endangering Young Persons. In the opinion of the Court of Appeal the infringements of the law committed so far and the conduct of the defendant indicated the likelihood of a repetition. In the result the appeal must fail.

I. 1. The Court of Appeal holds correctly that the defendants cannot seek to justify their acts by relying on the right of self-defence or the defence of others (§ 227 BGB) even if the plaintiff . . . should have contravened § 84 of the Criminal Code or the Act against the Distribution of Publications Endangering Young Persons by displaying and selling the publications to which the defendants took exception. This right of self-help does not enable citizens to maintain morals and order, even if the order is protected by criminal law. Their maintenance is the task of the competent organs of the State; the ordinary citizen must not assume their function. In a State governed by law it is indispensable that the maintenance and protection of orderly community life is to be entrusted primarily to the organs of the State bound to observe the Constitution and not to private initiative [references].

As a matter of principle, an individual can only confront actively a disturbance of public order, even if it involves a criminal act, by relying on his right of self-defence or of defending others . . . if the perpetrator of the disturbance attacks at the same time individual interests which are protected as such [references].

(a) Contrary to the contention of the appellants this is not necessarily the case if § 184 of the Criminal Code or §§ 3, 4, 6 of the Act against Distribution of Publications Endangering Young Persons are infringed. Certainly § 184 of the Criminal Code in the wording of 20 July 1971, which applies in the present case, punishes advertising and selling indecent publications in order to protect modesty, morals, and decency in sexual matters in the interest of the community as a whole [references]. The penal sanction sought to protect the sexual feelings current in the community, not the particular notion of morals and decency held by an individual, which may even clash with the sanction. The individual was included in the sphere of protection of the sanction indirectly only inasmuch as normally he benefits from it too. For this reason he was not accorded the right, in the case of contraventions of § 184 of the Criminal Code, to avail himself of the right under § 172 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to apply for the initiation of proceedings to force a prosecution.

Similarly, the Act against the Distribution of Publications Endangering Young Persons in providing for the protection of children and adolescents only serves the State as a guardian. It is the function of the State, not of the individual citizen, to safeguard the order which these provisions seek to protect.

(b) Naturally this does not rule out the possibilities that an infringement against these provisions may coincide with an attack against individual interests “susceptible of self-defence” with the result that the citizen concerned himself or another may intervene in order to fend off this attacker. However, this presupposes a situation in which precisely the protected individual interests are affected by the dangers connected with the “attack” and that thus the protected sphere of the individual is touched by the coincidence of “attack” and individual interest; the fact alone that the order protected by the criminal law has been disturbed is insufficient. Those relying on the right of self-defence or to defend others must prove that a conflict of the kind described above exists.

The Court of Appeal holds correctly that the pleadings of the defendants are deficient in this respect. In particular they cannot rely on the argument that merely by offering for sale in their kiosks at railway stations publications—assumed to be a criminal act—they have directly violated the right of personality of the defendants by attacking their honour or otherwise, even if the defendants may have regarded the display of such publications as a sufficient slight of their person, as a threat to their intimate feelings or to their family life.

It is unnecessary in the present case to examine the restrictions imposed by our law upon the trade in pornography by the protection of the personality of the individual and of its dignity [references]. In the present case . . . periodicals and picture magazines, the publication of which was prohibited and punishable, are said to have been offered for sale on the shelves of the premises together with the usual range of publications available at a railway bookstall. However, no customer was compelled against his will to take more than fleeting notice of these publications; his personal attention was not drawn to them, nor were they advertised obtrusively. The personality of the individual which is protected by the Constitution was only affected by this confrontation quantitatively and qualitatively as part of an anonymous public, no more than an individual member of the community is troubled by disturbances of public order. The personality of the customer is neither disregarded nor injured in an insulting manner, nor are his protected intimate feelings injured, even if it is remembered that the protection of personal integrity, both physical and mental, must be rated highly.

It is true that human personality and its free expression through self-determination and self-reliance, guaranteed by the Constitution and the legal order, also requires citizens among themselves to respect the innermost sphere of the individual [references].

This precept does not imply, however, that every citizen who is worried or disturbed by a public disregard of general morals and of criminal law by another is entitled for this reason only to proceed against the attacker by way of self-help, unless the attack is directed against himself; in the present case an individual citizen has first sought a confrontation in order to make public interests his own private affair. Such an assumption of an “office of censor” would indeed run counter to the constitutional guarantee. Instead it must remain for the State itself, which is primarily charged with adjusting such tensions, to select the place, the time, and the extent of any action against the violation of morals and of law within the community.

(bb) The same applies to the claim of the fourth defendant, the father of the child, who relies on the right of self-defence or of the defence of others, on the ground that the attack is directed against the right to educate a child (see Article 6 of the Constitution). In this respect, too, no evidence has been adduced to show that the conduct of the plaintiff constitutes a direct danger to the task of the fourth defendant to educate his child . . .

(cc) This Division does not agree with the arguments of the appellants that the courts, by decreeing the prohibition asked for by the plaintiff, would protect a criminal activity by the plaintiff. The question whether the competent public authorities can proceed against the plaintiff, having regard to his trade in the publications objected to, is not affected by a judgment in the terms applied for. This judgment is confined to preventing conduct by the defendants which is to be disapproved by law for the sake of orderly community life and against whom the plaintiff may defend himself by a claim to desist placed at his disposal by private law. Nor is it an abuse of law if the plaintiff resorts to the courts by bringing an action against the defendants.

Addendum 1

Extracts from Sidaway v. Bethlehem Royal Hospital and Maudsley Hospital [1985] AC 871 House of Lords

This was an appeal from the Court of Appeal which had dismissed an appeal from a decision of Skinner J who had dismissed the appellant’s action.

LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH: . . . The appellant underwent at the hospital for which the first respondents are the responsible authority an operation on her cervical vertebrae performed by a neurosurgeon, since deceased, whose executors are the second respondents. The nature of the operation was such that, however skilfully performed, it involved a risk of damage to the nerve root at the site of the operation or to the spinal cord. The trial judge described that risk as “best expressed to a layman as a 1 per cent or 2 per cent risk of ill-effects ranging from the mild to the catastrophic”. The appellant in fact suffered, without negligence on the surgeon’s part in the performance of the operation, a degree of damage to the spinal cord of which the effects, if not catastrophic, were certainly severe. Damages have been agreed, subject to liability, in the sum of £67,500.

The appellant denied that she had seen the surgeon at all before the operation was performed. This evidence the judge rejected. He found that, before the appellant consented to undergo the operation, the surgeon explained the nature of the operation to her in simple terms and warned her of the possibility and likely consequences of damage to the nerve root, but did not refer to the risk of damage to the spinal cord. Most unfortunately, the surgeon who performed the operation died before these proceedings were instituted. Accordingly, the trial judge, the Court of Appeal and your Lordships’ House have all been denied the advantage of what would clearly have been vital evidence on the issue of liability, not only the surgeon’s own account of precisely what he had told this appellant, but also his explanation of the reasons for his clinical judgment that, in her case, the information he gave her about the operation and its attendant risk was appropriate and sufficient. The judge was thus driven to base the finding, to which I have earlier referred, in part on inference from documents, but mainly on the evidence of other doctors as to what they knew of the deceased surgeon's customary practice when discussing with patients an operation of the kind the appellant was to undergo. The result is that liability falls to be considered, in effect, in relation to that customary practice, independently of the vitally important individual doctor/patient relationship which must play so large a part in any discussion of a proposed operation with a patient. That introduces an element of artificiality into the case which we may deplore but cannot avoid.

There was a difference of opinion between the neurosurgeons called as expert witnesses whether they themselves would, in the circumstances, have warned the appellant specifically of the risk of damage to the spinal cord. But the one expert witness called for the appellant agreed readily and without reservation that the deceased surgeon, in omitting any such warning, would have been following a practice accepted as proper by a responsible body of competent neurosurgeons.

Broadly, a doctor's professional functions may be divided into three phases: diagnosis, advice and treatment. In performing his functions of diagnosis and treatment, the standard by which English law measures the doctor's duty of care to his patient is not open to doubt. "The test is the standard of the ordinary skilled man exercising and professing to have that special skill." These are the words of McNair J in Bolam v. Friern Hospital Management Committee [1957] 1 WLR 582 at 586, approved by this House in Whitehouse v. Jordan [1981] 1 WLR 246 at 258 per Lord Edmund-Davies and in Maynard v. West Midlands Regional Health Authority [1985] 1 All ER 635 per Lord Scarman. The test is conveniently referred to as the Bolam test. In Maynard's case Lord Scarman, with whose speech the other four members of the Appellate Committee agreed, further cited with approval the words of the Lord President (Clyde) in Hunter v. Hanley 1955 SLT 213 at 217:

"In the realm of diagnosis and treatment there is ample scope for genuine difference of opinion and one man clearly is not negligent merely because his conclusion differs from that of other professional men . . . The true test for establishing negligence in diagnosis or treatment on the part of a doctor is whether he has been proved to be guilty of such failure as no doctor of ordinary skill would be guilty of if acting with ordinary care. . . ."

The language of the Bolam test clearly requires a different degree of skill from a specialist in his own special field than from a general practitioner. In the field of neuro-surgery it would be necessary to substitute for the Lord President's phrase "no doctor of ordinary skill", the phrase "no neurosurgeon of ordinary skill". All this is elementary and, in the light of the two recent decisions of this House referred to, firmly established law.

The important question which this appeal raises is whether the law imposes any, and if so what, different criterion as the measure of the medical man's duty of care to his patient when giving advice with respect to a proposed course of treatment. It is clearly right to recognise that a conscious adult patient of sound mind is entitled to decide for himself whether or not he will submit to a particular course of treatment proposed by the doctor, most significantly surgical treatment under general anaesthesia. This entitlement is the foundation of the doctrine of "informed consent" which has led in certain American jurisdictions to decisions and, in the Supreme Court of Canada, to dicta on which the appellant relies, which would oust the Bolam test and substitute an "objective" test of a doctor's duty to advise the patient of the advantages and disadvantages of undergoing the treatment proposed and more particularly to advise the patient of the risks involved.

There are, it appears to me, at least theoretically, two extreme positions which could be taken. It could be argued that, if the patient's consent is to be fully informed, the doctor must specifically warn him of all risks involved in the treatment offered, unless he has some sound clinical reason not to do so. Logically, this would seem to be the extreme to which a truly objective criterion of the doctor's duty would lead. Yet this position finds no support from any authority to which we have been referred in any jurisdiction. It seems to be generally accepted that there is no need to warn of the risks inherent in all surgery under general anaesthesia. This is variously explained on the ground that the patient may be expected to be aware of such risks or that they are relatively remote. If the law is to impose on the medical profession a duty to warn of risks to secure “informed consent” independently of accepted medical opinion of what is appropriate, neither of these explanations for confining the duty to special as opposed to general surgical risks seems to me wholly convincing.

At the other extreme it could be argued that, once the doctor has decided what treatment is, on balance of advantages and disadvantages, in a patient’s best interest, he should not alarm the patient by volunteering a warning of any risk involved, however grave and substantial, unless specifically asked by the patient. I cannot believe that contemporary medical opinion would support this view, which would effectively exclude the patient’s right to decide in the very type of case where it is most important that he should be in a position to exercise that right and, perhaps even more significantly, to seek a second opinion whether he should submit himself to the significant risk which has been drawn to his attention. I should perhaps add at this point, although the issue does not strictly arise in this appeal, that, when questioned specifically by a patient of apparently sound mind about risks involved in a particular treatment proposed, the doctor’s duty must, in my opinion, be to answer both truthfully and as fully as the questioner requires.

The decision mainly relied on to establish a criterion of the doctor’s duty to disclose the risks inherent in a proposed treatment which is prescribed by the law and can be applied independently of any medical opinion or practice is that of the District of Columbia Circuit Court of Appeals in Ganterbury v. Spence 464 F 2d 772 (1972). The Judgment of the court (Wright, Leventhal and Robinson JJ), delivered by Robinson J expounds the view that an objective criterion of what is a sufficient disclosure of risk is necessary’ to ensure that the patient is enabled to make an intelligent decision and cannot be left to be determined by the doctors. He said (at 784):

“Respect for the patient’s right of self-determination on particular therapy demands a standard set by law for physicians rather than one which physicians may or may not impose upon themselves.”

In an attempt to define the objective criterion it is said (at 787) that—“the issue on non-disclosure must be approached from the viewpoint of the reasonableness of the physician’s divulgence in terms of what he knows or should know to be the patient’s informational needs.”

A risk is required to be disclosed—“when a reasonable person, in what the physician knows or should know to be the patient’s position, would be likely to attach significance to the risk or cluster of risks in deciding whether or not to forego the proposed therapy.”

The judgment adds (at 788): “Whenever non-disclosure of particular risk information is open to debate by reasonable-minded men, the issue is for the finder of facts,”

The court naturally recognises exceptions from the duty laid down in the case of an unconscious patient, an immediate emergency or a case where the doctor can establish that disclosure would be harmful to the patient.

Expert medical evidence will be needed to indicate the nature and extent of the risks and benefits involved in the treatment (and presumably of any alternative course). But the court affirms (at 792): “Experts are unnecessary to a showing of the materiality of a risk to a patient’s decision on treatment, or to the reasonably, expectable effect of risk disclosure on the decision.” In English law, if this doctrine were adopted, expert medical opinion whether a particular risk should or should not have been disclosed would presumably be inadmissible in evidence.

I recognise the logical force of the Canterbury doctrine, proceeding from the premise that the patient’s right to make his own decision must at all costs be safeguarded against the kind of medical paternalism which assumes that “doctor knows best”. But, with all respect, I regard the doctrine as quite impractical in application for three principal reasons. First, it gives insufficient weight to the realities of the doctor/patient relationship. A very wide variety of factors must enter into a doctor’s clinical judgment not only as to what treatment is appropriate for a particular patient, but also as to how best to communicate to the patient the significant factors necessary to enable the patient to make an informed decision whether to undergo the treatment. The doctor cannot set out to educate the patient to his own standard of medical knowledge of all the relevant factors involved. He may take the view, certainly with some patients, that the very fact of his volunteering, without being asked, information of some remote risk involved in the treatment proposed, even though he describes it as remote, may lead to that risk assuming an undue significance in the patient's calculations. Second, it would seem to be quite unrealistic in any medical negligence action to confine the expert medical evidence to an explanation of the primary medical factors involved and to deny the court the benefit of evidence of medical opinion and practice on the particular issue of disclosure which is under consideration. Third, the objective test which Canterbury propounds seems to me to be so imprecise as to be almost meaningless. If it is to be left to individual judges to decide for themselves what "a reasonable person in the patient's position" would consider a risk of sufficient significance that he should be told about it, the outcome of litigation in this field is likely to be quite unpredictable.

I note with interest from a learned article entitled "Informed Consent to Medical Treatment" (1981) 97 LQR 102 at 108 by Mr Gerald Robertson . . . that only a minority of states in the United States of America have chosen to follow Canterbury and that since 1975 "there has been a growing tendency for individual states to enact legislation which severely curtails the operation of the doctrine of informed consent." I should also add that I find particularly cogent and convincing the reasons given for declining to follow Canterbury by the Supreme Court of Virginia in Bly v. Rhoads 222 SE 2d 783 (1976).

Having rejected the Canterbury doctrine as a solution to the problem of guarding the patient's right to decide whether he will undergo a particular treatment advised by his doctor, the question remains whether that right is sufficiently safeguarded by the application of the Bolam test without qualification to the determination of the question what risks inherent in a proposed treatment should be disclosed. The case against a simple application of the Bolam test is cogently stated by Laskin CJC, giving the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in Reibi v. Hughes (1980) 114 DLR (3d) I at 13:

"To allow expert medical evidence to determine what risks are material and, hence, should be disclosed and, correlatively, what risks are not material is to hand over to the medical profession the entire question of the scope of the duty of disclosure, including the question whether there has been a breach of that duty. Expert medical evidence is, of course, relevant to findings as to the risks that reside in or are a result of recommended surgery or other treatment. It will also have a bearing on their materiality but this is not a question that is to be concluded on the basis of the expert medical evidence alone. The issue under consideration is a different issue from that involved where the question is whether the doctor carried out his professional activities by applicable professional standards. What is under consideration here is the patient's right to know what risks are involved in undergoing or foregoing certain surgery or other treatment."

I fully appreciate the force of this reasoning, but can only accept it subject to the important qualification that a decision what degree of disclosure of risks is best calculated to assist a particular patient to make a rational choice whether or not to undergo a particular treatment must primarily be a matter of clinical judgment. It would follow from this that the issue whether non-disclosure in a particular case should be condemned as a breach of the doctor's duty of care is an issue to be decided primarily on the basis of expert medical evidence, applying the Bolam test. But I do not see that this approach involves the necessity "to hand over to the medical profession the entire question of the scope of the duty of disclosure, including the question whether there has been a breach of that duty". Of course, if there is a conflict of evidence whether a responsible body of medical opinion approves of non-disclosure in a particular case, the judge will have to resolve that conflict. But, even in a case where, as here, no expert witness in the relevant medical field condemns the nondisclosure as being in conflict with accepted and responsible medical practice, I am of opinion that the judge might in certain circumstances come to the conclusion that disclosure of a particular risk was so obviously necessary to an informed choice on the part of the patient that no reasonably prudent medical man would fail to make it. The kind of case I have in mind would be an operation involving a substantial risk of grave adverse consequences, as for example the 10 per cent risk of a stroke from the operation which was the subject of the Canadian case of Reibi v. Hughes (1980) 114 DLR (3d) 1. In such a case, in the absence of some cogent clinical reason why the patient should not be informed, a doctor, recognising and respecting his patient's right of decision, could hardly fail to appreciate the necessity for an appropriate warning.

In the instant case I can see no reasonable ground on which the judge could properly reject the conclusion to which the unchallenged medical evidence led in the application of the Bolam test. The trial judge's assessment of the risk at 1 per cent or 2 per cent covered both nerve root and spinal cord damage and covered a spectrum of possible ill-effects "ranging from the mild to the catastrophic". In so far as it is possible and appropriate to measure such risks in per centage terms (some of the expert medical witnesses called expressed a marked and understandable reluctance to do so), the risk of damage to the spinal cord of such severity as the appellant in fact suffered was, it would appear, certainly less than 1 per cent. But there is no yardstick either in the judge's findings or in the evidence to measure what fraction of 1 per cent that risk represented. In these circumstances, the appellant's expert witness's agreement that the non-disclosure of neuro-surgical opinion afforded the respondents a complete defence to the appellant's claim.

LORD SCARMAN: . . . The issue is whether Mr Falconer failed to exercise due care (this was not challenged) in the advice which he gave his patient when recommending an operation; I use the word "advice" to cover information as to risk and the options of alternative treatment. Whatever be the correct formulation of the applicable law, the issue cannot be settled positively for or against the doctor without knowing what advice, including any warning of inherent risk in the operation, he gave his patient before she decided to undergo it and what was his assessment of the mental, emotional and physical state of his patient. The trial judge derived no help on these two vital matters from the evidence of the appellant. Mr Falconer was not an available witness, having died before trial, and the medical records afforded no sure guide on either matter. Regrettable though a "non-proven" verdict is, it is not, therefore, surprising. Where the court lacks direct evidence as to the nature and extent of the advice and warning (if any) given by the doctor and as to his assessment of his patient the court may well have to conclude that the patient has failed to prove her case.

This lack of evidence is unsatisfactory also from a purely legal point of view. I am satisfied, for reasons which I shall develop, that the trial judge and the Court of Appeal erred in law in holding that, in a case where the alleged negligence is a failure to warn the patient of a risk inherent in the treatment proposed, the Bolam test, (see Bolam v. Friern Hospital Management Committee [1957] 1 WLR 582) . . . is to be applied. In my view the question whether or not the omission to warn constitutes a breach of the doctor's duty of care towards his patient is to be determined not exclusively by reference to the current state of responsible and competent professional opinion and practice at the time, though both are, of course, relevant consideration[s], but by the court's view whether the doctor in advising his patient gave, the consideration which the law requires him to give to the right of the patient to make up her own mind in the light of the relevant information whether or not she will accept the treatment which he proposes. This being my view of the law, I have tested the facts found by the trial judge by what I believe to be the correct legal criterion. In my view the appellant has failed to prove that Mr Falconer was in breach of the duty of care which he owed to her in omitting to disclose the risk which the trial judge found as a fact he did not disclose to her. [Was the judge in Bolam] correct in treating the "standard of competent professional opinion" as the criterion in determining whether a doctor is under a duty to warn his patient of the risk, or risks, inherent in the treatment which he recommends? Skinner J and the Court of Appeal have in the instant case held that [he] was correct. Bristow J adopted the same criterion in Chauerton v. Gerson [1981] 1 All ER 257; [1981] QB 432. The implications of this view of the law are disturbing. It leaves the determination of a legal duty to the judgment of doctors. Responsible medical judgment may, indeed, provide the law with an acceptable standard in determining whether a doctor in diagnosis or treatment has complied with his duty. But is it right that medical judgment should determine whether there exists a duty to warn of risk and its scope? It would be a strange conclusion if the courts should be led to conclude that our law, which undoubtedly recognises a right in the patient to decide whether he will accept or reject the treatment proposed, should permit the doctors to determine whether and in what circumstances a duty arises requiring the doctor to warn his patient of the risks inherent in the treatment which he proposes.

The right of “self-determination”, the description applied by some to what is no more and no less than the right of a patient to determine for himself whether he will or will not accept the doctor’s advice, is vividly illustrated where the treatment recommended is surgery. A doctor who operates without the consent of his patient is, save in cases of emergency or mental disability, guilty of the civil wrong of trespass to the person; he is also guilty of the criminal offence of assault. The existence of the patient’s right to make his own decision, which may be seen as a basic human right protected by the common law, is the reason why a doctrine embodying a right of the patient to be informed of the risks of surgical treatment has been developed in some jurisdictions in the United States of America and has found favour with the Supreme Court of Canada. Known as the “doctrine of informed consent”, it amounts to this:

where there is a “real” or a “material” risk inherent in the proposed operation (however competently and skilfully performed) the question whether and to what extent a patient should be warned before he gives his consent is to be answered not by reference to medical practice but by accepting as a matter of law that, subject to all proper exceptions (of which the court, not the profession, is the judge), a patient has a right to be informed of the risks inherent in the treatment which is proposed. The profession, it is said, should not be judge in its own cause; or, less emotively but more correctly, the courts should not allow medical opinion as to what is best for the patient to override the patient’s right to decide for himself whether he will submit to the treatment offered him.

In a medical negligence case where the issue is as to the advice and information given to the patient as to the treatment proposed, the available options and the risk, the court is concerned primarily with a patient’s right. The doctor’s duty arises from his patient’s rights. If one considers the scope of the doctor’s duty by beginning with the right of the patient to make his own decision whether he will or will not undergo the treatment proposed, the right to be informed of significant risk and the doctor’s corresponding duty are easy to understand, for the proper implementation of the right requires that the doctor be under a duty to inform his patient of the material risks inherent in the treatment. And it is plainly right that a doctor may avoid liability for failure to warn of a material risk if he can show that he reasonably believed that communication to the patient of the existence of the risk would be detrimental to the health (including, of course, the mental health) of his patient.

My conclusion as to the law is therefore this. To the extent that I have indicated, I think that English law must recognise a duty of the doctor to warn his patient of risk inherent in the treatment which he is proposing; and especially so if the treatment be surgery. The critical limitation is that the duty is confined to material risk. The test of materiality is whether in the circumstances of the particular case, the court is satisfied that a reasonable person in the patient’s position would be likely to attach significance to the risk. Even if the risk be material, the doctor will not be liable if on a reasonable assessment of his patient’s condition he takes the view that a warning would be detrimental to his patient’s health.

[Having applied the principles in his speech, LORD SCARMAN was in favour of dismissing the appeal.]

[LORD KEITH OF KINKEL agreed with LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH. LORD DIPLOCK and LORD TEMPLEMAN delivered speeches in favour of dismissing the appeal.]

Appeal dismissed.

Addendum 2

Extracts from Bolitho v. City and Hackney Health Authority House of Lords [1998] AC 232

LORD BROWNE-WILKINSON: . . . The locus classicus of the test for the standard of care required of a doctor or any other person professing some skill or competence is the direction to the jury given by McNair J in Bolam v. Friern Hospital Management Committee [1957] 1 WLR 583 at 587:

“I myself would prefer to put it this way: a doctor is not guilty of negligence if he has acted in accordance with a practice accepted as proper by a responsible body of medical men skilled in that particular art . . . Putting it the other way round, a doctor is not negligent, if he is acting in accordance with such a practice, merely because there is a body of opinion that takes a contrary view.”

My Lords, I agree with [leading counsel for the appellant’s] submissions to the extent that, in my view, the court is not bound to hold that a defendant doctor escapes liability for negligent treatment or diagnosis just because he leads evidence from a number of medical experts who are genuinely of opinion that the defendant’s treatment or diagnosis accorded with sound medical practice. In Bolam’s case [1957] 1 WLR 583 at 587 McNair J stated that the defendant had to have acted in accordance with the practice accepted as proper by a “responsible body of medical men” (my emphasis). Later he referred to “a standard of practice recognised as proper by a competent reasonable body of opinion” (see [1957] 1 WLR 583 at 588; my emphasis). Again, in Maynard v. West Midlands Regional Health Authority [1985] 1 All ER 635 at 639, Lord Scarman refers to a “respectable” body of professional opinion. The use of these adjectives—responsible, reasonable and respectable—all show that the court has to be satisfied that the exponents of the body of opinion relied on can demonstrate that such opinion has a logical basis. In particular, in cases involving, as they so often do, the weighing of risks against benefits, the judge before accepting a body of Opinion as being responsible, reasonable or respectable, will need to be satisfied that, in forming their views, the experts have directed their minds to the question of Comparative risks and benefits and have reached a defensible conclusion on the matter.

There are decisions which demonstrate that the judge is entitled to approach expert professional opinion on this basis. For example, in Hucks v. Cole (1968) (1993) 4 Med LR 393, a doctor failed to treat with penicillin a patient who was suffering from septic places on her skin though he knew them to contain organisms capable of leading to puerperal fever. A number of distinguished doctors gave evidence that they would not, in the circumstances, have treated with penicillin. The Court of Appeal found the defendant to have been negligent. Sachs U said (at 397):

“When the evidence shows that a lacuna in professional practice exists by which risks of grave danger are knowingly taken, then, however small the risks, the court must anxiously examine that lacuna—particularly if the risks can be easily and inexpensively avoided. If the court finds, on an analysis of the reasons given for not taking those precautions that, in the light of current professional knowledge, there is no proper basis for the lacuna, and that it is definitely not reasonable that those risks should have been taken, its function is to state that fact and where necessary to state that it constitutes negligence. In such a case the practice will no doubt thereafter be altered to the benefit of patients. On such occasions the fact that other practitioners would have done the same thing as the defendant practitioner is a very weighty matter to be put on the scales on his behalf; but it is not, as Mr Webster readily conceded, conclusive. The court must be vigilant to see whether the reasons given for putting a patient at risk are valid in the light of any well-known advance in medical knowledge, or whether they stem from a residual adherence to out-of-date ideas . . .”

Again, in Edward Wong Finance Co Ltd v. Johnson Stokes & Master (a firm) [1984] AC 296, [1984] 2 WLR 1, the defendant’s solicitors had conducted the completion of a mortgage transaction in “Hong Kong style” rather than in the old-fashioned English style. Completion in Hong Kong style provides for money to be paid over against an undertaking by the solicitors for the borrowers subsequently to hand over the executed documents. This practice opened the gateway through which a dishonest solicitor for the borrower absconded with the loan money without providing the security documents for such loan. The Privy Council held that even though completion in Hong Kong style was almost universally adopted in Hong Kong and was therefore in accordance with a body of professional opinion there, the defendant's solicitors were liable for negligence because there was an obvious risk which could have been guarded against. Thus, the body of professional opinion, though almost universally held, was not reasonable or responsible.

These decisions demonstrate that in cases of diagnosis and treatment there are cases where, despite a body of professional opinion sanctioning the defendant's conduct, the defendant can properly be held liable for negligence (I am not here considering questions of disclosure of risk). In my judgment that is because, in some cases, it cannot be demonstrated to the judge's satisfaction that the body of opinion relied on is reasonable or responsible. In the vast majority of cases the fact that distinguished experts in the field are of a particular opinion will demonstrate the reasonableness of that opinion. In particular, where there are questions of assessment of the relative risks and benefits of adopting a particular medical practice, a reasonable view necessarily presupposes that the relative risks and benefits have been weighed by the experts in forming their opinions. But if, in a rare case, it can be demonstrated that the professional opinion is not capable of withstanding logical analysis, the judge is entitled to hold that the body of opinion is not reasonable or responsible.

I emphasise that, in my view, it will very seldom be right for a judge to reach the conclusion that views genuinely held by a competent medical expert are unreasonable. The assessment of medical risks and benefits is a matter of clinical judgment which a judge would not normally be able to make without expert evidence. As . . . Lord Scarman makes clear [in Maynard's case] it would be wrong to allow such assessment to deteriorate into seeking to persuade the judge to prefer one of two views both of which are capable of being logically supported. It is only where a judge can be satisfied that the body of expert opinion cannot be logically supported at all that such opinion will not provide the bench mark by reference to which the defendant's conduct falls [His Lordship then concluded that this was plainly not "one of those rare cases".]

[LORD SLYNN OF HADLEY delivered a speech in which he agreed with LORD BROWNE-WILKINSON'S analysis of the question to be decided in this sort of case and of the correct approach in law to them. LORD NOLAN, LORD HOFFMANN and LORD CLYDE agreed with LORD BROWNE-WILKINSON'S speech.]

Notes to Cases 50–56

1. These cases illustrate certain problems that German law discusses under the headings of "unlawfulness" and culpa (very loosely translatable as fault). Their theoretical treatment has been sketched above (chapter 2, section A.3) but it is, again, at the level of concrete cases and specific issues that concept is concretised and the similarities become obvious and any comparison with the Common law becomes meaningful. A number of points call for special comment.

2. The standard of care expected of the defendant is discussed in cases 50 and 51. In case 50 (RGZ 119, 397) the plaintiff's claim failed because he himself knew that the defendant was not fully competent. A second reason why the claim failed can be traced in the facts as found by the lower courts: the accident would have occurred even if the defendant had been properly qualified. In other words, the defendant's negligence is not even a condition (let alone a legal cause) of the harm. (See chapter 2, section A.5 (a), and English cases cited there.) But the importance of the judgment is in its second half where (as in case 51) it is stated that the standard of care will be determined objectively by reference to the behaviour of the reasonable man. Here, the basic idea is the same in American, English, and French law, though many formulations have been proposed and the terminology is slightly different. (The Common law searches for the behaviour of the "reasonable man" who, in the context of the tort of defamation, becomes the "ordinary man" in order to accommodate a certain amount of loose thinking (note that in these days of proclaimed sex equality lawyers have still to introduce the notion of the "reasonable woman"), while the civil law systems refer to the “bonus pater familias”). In practice, however, these are merely expressions of the anthropomorphic conception of justice as perceived by judges and/or juries.

Numerous statements can be quoted showing that no legal system expects the behaviour of the model citizen who is the paragon of all true virtue. Equally, however, no system is prepared to countenance the attitudes of the most callous, timorous, or indecisive members of its society. As Harper, James Jr., and Gray put it (The Law of Torts 2nd edn. (1986) 389–90): “As everyone knows, this reasonable person [sic] is a creature of the law’s imagination. He is an abstraction. He has long been the subject of homely phrase and witty epigram.” (Equally, however, courts have applied the ordinary standards of care even to persons of exceptional skill and perception, Fredericks v. Castora, 241 Pa. Super. 211, 360 A. 2d 696, (1976).) In Hall v. Brooklands Club [1933] 1 KB 205, 224, Greer LJ stressed the need to remain in touch with the average community standards when he described the reasonable man as “‘the man in the street’ or ‘the man in the Clapham omnibus’, or, as I recently read in an American author, ‘the man who takes the magazines at home, and in the evening pushes the lawn-mower in his shirt sleeves’”. However, the reader must also take note of the clear trend discernible in all systems to raise standards in an effort to keep abreast with the quicker tempo and increased hazards of modern life. Thus, in certain areas of tort law—notably traffic accidents that account for a major part of litigation in all advanced legal systems—the presence of obligatory insurance may be the reason of an almost complete equation of negligence with near-strict liability. Case 51 (BGH JZ 1968, 103) is a good illustration of this tendency and one can find even clearer examples in French (Grenoble, 4 décembre 1978, JCP 1980, II, 19340) and English law (Roberts v. Ramsbottom [1980] 1 WLR 823). In the latter case the English court held “negligent” a 75-year-old man who had a stroke a few minutes before setting off on a drive that was to lead to a series of accidents culminating in his being taken to hospital where his brain haemorrhage (of which he had had no previous forewarning) was finally discovered. In the court’s view nothing less than a complete loss of consciousness would have sufficed to exculpate him from liability. (Cf. Breunig v. American Family Insurance Co., 173 NW 2d 619 (1970): defendant lost control of her car believing that God had taken control of the steering wheel. He had not, and the plaintiff was injured. The plea of insanity was rejected and defendant was held liable.) Other cases like Henderson v. Jenkins [1970] AC 282 (car brakes defective due to an undiscoverable hidden defect which led to an accident) and Nettleship v. Weston [1971] 2 QB 691 (learner-driver held to be “negligent” for failing to attain the standard of competence of an experienced driver; likewise with American law: Gregory et al., 152) lend credence to theories which attempt to ascribe such perversions of traditional concepts to modern insurance practice. (In this sense B S Markesinis, “La Perversion des notions de responsabilité civile délictuelle par la pratique de l’assurance” (1983) Rev. int. dr. comp. 301.) In America standards have also been dramatically raised in cases involving children causing accidents while engaged in “adult activities”. Dellwo v. Pearson, 259 Minn. 452, 107 NW 2d 859 (1961) is such a case and has proved particularly influential in automobile cases. See Prichard v. Veterans Cab. Co., 63 Cal. 2d 727, 408 P. 2d 360 (1965); also Henderson and Pearson, 363–4 with further references. Children are judged by adult standards when they are defendants. By what standards should they be judged when they are the plaintiffs and a question of contributory negligence arises? See Reiszel v. Fontana, 35 AD 2d 74, 312 NYS 2d 988 (1970).

3. For fuller discussions of American law see Franklin, 43 ff.; Henderson and Pearson, 319 ff.; Epstein, 129 ff.; Franklin and Rabin, 31 ff.; Prosser, et al., 137 ff. For England see Clerk and Lindsell on Torts, 18th edn. 4–55 ff (for children) and 7–159 ff for a more general (but detailed) discussion of the expected standard of care. The impact of modern insurance on the modern law of torts has been the subject of an excellent dissertation by Professor Viney of the University of Paris in the mid-sixties (Le déclin de la responsabilité individuelle (1965)). The theme is taken up again in her most recent treatise on the subject, Traité de droit civil (ed. J Ghestin IV), Introduction à la Responsabilité 2nd ed (1995). Finally, for an excellent comparative discussion of the notion of fault and the changed attitudes towards it see Tunc, La responsabilité civile (1981).

4. Case 53, BGHZ 29, 46, (and, indeed, case 99, BGH NJW 1959, 1106, below) touches upon one of the most troublesome aspects of medical malpractice law—a topic which has generated heated debates and lends itself for inclusion in courses on advanced torts. The early American literature can be found in such works as Wadlington, Waltz, and Dworkin, Cases and Materials on Law and Medicine (1980), and Curran and Shapiro, Law, Medicine and Forensic Science (3rd edn. 1982). Making Health Care Decisions, President's Commission for the Study of Ethical Problems in Medicine, US Government Publishing Office (1982) is a three-volume report full of useful information on the subject. Comment to Medical Care is the title of an interesting study published by the Law Reform Commission of Canada in 1980. English law, woke up to these problems later; and this belated interest was first captured by Margaret Brazier's Medicine, Patients and the Law, now in its 2nd edn. (1992) provides a most readable introduction to the whole subject. Mason and McCall-Smith's Law and Medical Ethics 5th ed. (1999) gives a good summary (at 140–59), on the whole, supportive of the current rather conservative approach of the English courts. By contrast Ian Kennedy's stimulating Note in 47 MLR 454 (1984) is critical of this attitude. (See also Kennedy's excellent essays collected under the title Treat Me Right (1988).) Well worth reading also is Robertson's "Informed Consent to Medical Treatment" 97 LQR 102 (1981) and Andrew Grubb's "A Survey of Medical Malpractice Law in England: Crisis? What Crisis?", 1 Journ. of Contemporary Health Law and Policy 75 ff. (esp. 93–111) (1985). For a comparative study of English and American law on this point see: Schwartz and Grubb, "Why Britain Can't Afford Informed Consent", 15 Hastings Center Report (1985); for Anglo-German law see Shaw, "Informed Consent: A German Lesson", 35 ICLQ 864 (1986). Kennedy and Grubb's Principles of Medical Law (1998) is now the main treatise on English law but is also replete with references to other Common law jurisdictions. The subject is also discussed in the growing books on professional negligence.

5. Lawful consent is required for otherwise the interference with the patient's body would be "unlawful" according to the view taken by German case-law (contra Laufs in NJW 1969, 529 arguing that in this case the doctor's conduct is not objectively aimed at "injuring" the body but as "curing" and that, therefore, § 823 I BGB is inapplicable). Unlike the English Common law, which expects the patient to prove non-disclosure, German law casts on to the doctor the burden of proving the patient's consent. (Deutsch, Arztrecht und Arzneimittelrecht, 2nd edn. (1991) 39.) The action will, typically, be based on § 823 I BGB. In the Common law systems on the other hand total absence of consent or fraudulently obtained consent will justify an action in battery. In practice, however, negligence actions are much more common than trespass to the person because: (i) the rules on limitation and causation in trespass are thought to be too oppressive to defendant/doctors and (ii) intentional torts are usually not covered by insurance. See Cobbs v. Grant, 8 Cal. 3d 229, 502 P. 2d 1 (1972); likewise in England, though see Freeman v. Home Office [1983] 3 All ER 589. Consent is thus crucial, but the problems it raises are far from solved. One could, perhaps, categorise the cases into three groups.

The first includes situations where the answers are reasonably clear. For example, in the case of an infant or a young child consent must come from those responsible for his care (usually the parents) §§ 1626, 1631 BGB (Germany); Zoski v. Gaines 271 Mich. 1, 260 NW 99 (1935) (USA); S v. McC; W v. W [1972] AC 29, 37 (per Lord Hodson) (England). Older children, mature enough to understand the implications of their consent, are free to give it themselves: Lacey v. Laird 166 Ohio St. 12, 139 NE 2d 25 (1956) (USA); BGHZ 29, 37 (Germany); Family Law Reform Act 1969, § 8 (16 years) (England). On this see Skegg in 36 MLR 370 (1973) and [1969] Recent Law 295 (NZ). An operation on an unconscious adult will usually be defended on the grounds of necessity.

A second group of cases are controversial (and have this in common with the next group); but they also deal with problems which are relatively new to medical science and social life in general. For example, whose consent is necessary for the prescription of a contraceptive pill: parent's or child's? In Gillick v. West Norfolk and Wisbech Area Health Authority the Court of Appeal ruled that no contraceptive, abortion advice, or treatment could be given to a girl under 16 years of age without her parents' consent save in a case of an emergency or after a court order (The Times 21 December 1984) but the decision was overruled by the House of Lords by a three to two majority: [1985] 3 All ER 402; [1986] AC 112 discussed by Professor Glanville Williams in 1985 New Law Journal pp. 1156 ff.; Kennedy, "The Doctor, the Pill, and the Fifteen-Year-Old-Girl" in Treat Me Right (1988)

52 ff. Transplant surgery can also raise nice problems. See, for example, Hart v. Brown, 29 Conn. Supp. 368, 289 A. 2d 386 (1972).

Two related issues have also occupied modern courts and received similar answers. The first is connected with abortion and the father's "rights" or "interests". Can he seek an injunction—acting in his own right or on behalf of the foetus—and prevent the mother from aborting? (If the foetus were viable, the father's action could also be seen as attempting to prevent the commission of a crime.) Two courts—in Paton v. British Pregnancy Advisory Service [1979] 276, involving an action by a husband, and in C v. S [1987] 1 All ER 1230, involving an action by the boyfriend of the mother—have shown a marked reluctance to challenge a medical decision, properly reached, about an abortion; and, in general, would prefer to leave it to the criminal law to challenge the legality of such a decision in the criminal courts where a jury would make the decision and not a judge sitting alone. The European Commission on Human Rights agreed, 3 EHRR 410 (1980).

What of a girl under age who wishes to have an abortion? Is her parents' consent necessary? The answer would appear to be negative so long as the girl is mature enough to understand what is being proposed: Re P (a Minor) (1981) 80 LGR 301. In some systems statutes have made it clear that such consent can be given after the age of sixteen. (England: Family Law Reform Act 1969, section 8; Australia: Minors (Contracts and Property) Act 1970; New Zealand: Guardianship Act 1968.) But if the law appears to be settled, the ethical controversies are unlikely to end that easily. See Kennedy, "A Husband, a Wife, and an Abortion", in Treat Me Right (1988) 42 ff.

The third group of cases deals with what is, perhaps, the thorniest aspect of the problem of consent—what exactly need be disclosed for consent to be valid? "Medicine", wrote an international expert on this subject, "is a discipline which is enriched by . . . joint international contribution. . . . The same is true of the law governing medical practice." (Giesen and Hayes, "The Patient's Right to Know—A Comparative View" (1992) 21 Anglo-American L.R. 101–22. See also, Giesen, "Zwischen Patientenwohl und Patientenwille", JZ 1987, 282). Judicial decisions from both Canada and, especially, the antipodes, confirm the accuracy of the statement and the value of the method, so the summary that follows is comparative in nature and not focused on one system in particular.

To the question of how much information must be disclosed to the patient before his consent to medical treatment can be legally valid three answers are possible. The first, basically, leaves the decision to "a responsible body of medical men skilled in that particular art." This is known as the Bolam test from the leading English case of Bolam v. Friern Hospital Management Committee [1957] 1 WLR 582 and is the most paternalistic in nature. This test was, essentially, re-affirmed by four out of five law lords in Sidaway v. Royal Bethlehem Hospital Governors [1985] 1 AC 871. (Reproduced in part as Addendum 1 above.). Lord Scarman dissented in favour of the doctrine of informed consent. Though three of the judges (Lords Bridge, Keith and Templeman) made comments which have encouraged those who believe that English law is too indifferent to the patients' interests, the tone of the judgment was set by Lord Diplock who insisted that medical opinion remained "determinative" in such matters. This can be seen by the next important case—Gold v. Haringey Area Health Authority [1988] QB 481 where the Court of Appeal overruled a more pro-plaintiff judgment by Schiemann J ([1987] 1 FLR 125) by insisting that "the Judge was not free, as he thought, to form his own view of what warning and information ought to have been given, irrespective of any body of responsible medical opinion to the contrary." (Per Lloyd LJ at p. 490.) One reason why English law takes such a conservative view was given by Lord Denning in Whitehouse v. Jordan [1980] 1 All ER 650, 658, and is connected with the fear of increased malpractice litigation. However, such statistics as do exist in America and Germany do not seem to support this fear and further empirical studies are needed before a conclusive view can be expressed. Decisions such as Bolitho would suggest that a shift of emphasis is taking place even in English law; and the new Human Rights Act (and growing "rights" culture) can only accelerate this move towards a more balanced view of the patient's rights and the doctor's obligations. (See, also, Addendum 2 containing extracts from Bolitho v. City and Hackney Health Authority [1998] AC 232.)

This English position is rejected by most Common law jurisdictions which adopt the so-called doctrine of “informed consent” taking the view that the doctor must disclose as much information as a reasonable patient would require to make an informed choice and frequently add, for good measure, that the doctor “should not lightly make the judgment that the patient does not wish to be fully informed.” This last quotation comes from the leading Australian case of F v. R (1983) 33 SASR 189, 193; and the same ideas are, essentially, found in many American jurisdictions (for example Canterbury v. Spence, 464 F 2d 772 (1972); Crain v. Allison, 443 A. d 558 (1982)) and Canada (Reibl v. Hughes [1980] 2 SCR 880; White v. Turner 120 DLR 3d 269). Both these positions have been rejected by many decisions of Continental European systems on the grounds that they violate the patient’s right of self-determination. (Rich references to French, German, and Swiss law are given by Giesen and Hayes, op. cit., above, in notes 70–72; and the whole matter is exhaustively considered by Giesen in International Medical Malpractice Law (1988). For details on French law see: Guillot, Le Consentement éclairé du patient: autodétermination ou paternalisme (1986).) This position has, as stated, been forcefully stressed by German courts which, in the light of the recent past, have been only too conscious of the dangers of ignoring human dignity and not preventing unwarranted medical interferences with the body and health of human beings. Thus, from the beginning of the post-War period, courts have stressed that “proper respect for the patient’s right of self determination will further rather than damage the patient’s trust in his doctor” and “to respect the patient’s own will is to respect his freedom and dignity as a human being.” (BGHZ 29, 46, 53–56. See, also, BGHZ 90, 96; 90, 103.) Thus, the principle of full disclosure is repeatedly stressed (see BGH VersR 1980, 428, 429; NJW 1984, 1397); and in one case, involving diagnostic treatment, the court took the view that even a 0.5 per cent chance of a particular risk occurring should be disclosed (OLG Hamm VersR 1981, 68). In the case of therapeutic operations disclosure will be geared to the patient’s individual circumstance such as his level of understanding (BGH NJW 1980, 633) and even the attending doctor’s degree of experience (OLG Köln VersR 1982, 453). The urgency of the situation is also a factor that can be taken into account (BGH VersR 1972, 153); and even the defence of “therapeutic privilege” (no revelation of risks since patient might not be able to “handle” adverse news) has been treated with caution, as a decision of the BGH of 28 November 1957 clearly shows. (BGHSt 11, 111, 114 and compare similar statements in Meyer Estate v. Rogers (1991) 6 CCLT 2d 114.) Beyond stating the above general, guiding principles, one must advise the reader to consult particular instances where the courts have applied them to different factual situations. The following are recent illustrations. (See for details Staudinger-Hager, 13th edn. (1999), § 823 section I, no. 76–133.)

- (i) A patient must, as a general rule, be warned of the possibility of stiffening of the shoulders as a result of an injection containing cortisone, even if this is a very slight risk; but he need not be informed of the remote danger of fatal sepsis: BGH NJW 1989, 1533.
- (ii) A doctor who wishes to undertake a vaginal delivery, even though the danger to mother and child dictates a caesarean operation, has a duty to warn the expecting mother of the accompanying risks. If the doctor maintains that the expecting mother refused a caesarean section, he has the burden of proving that he furnished her with the required warning: BGH NJW 1992, 741.
- (iii) If a doctor fails to provide the patient with the required information concerning the nature and the difficulty of an operation, he is not free from liability merely because the harm which actually occurs is not one against which the doctor was obliged to warn: BGH NJW 1991, 2346.
- (iv) Before performing cosmetic surgery a doctor must inform the patient especially carefully and thoroughly of the odds of the operation failing to produce the desired results (in this case removing wrinkles under the chin): BGH NJW 1991, 2349. Properly informing a patient about an operation entails explaining to him the urgency of such an operation.
- (v) The doctor has the burden of proving that he provided a thorough and accurate explanation: BGH NJW 1990, 2928. In more recent decisions the BGH has continued this trend and emphasised repeatedly the patient’s right of self-determination.

- (vi) Thus, in BGH NJW 1996, 776, case 54, the court held that where a number of alternative methods of treatment were available, it was not enough to inform the patient only about the orthodox and established methods. Even if a new method has not yet been fully worked out (in the instant case it could have avoided the risk of thrombosis) it must still be brought to the attention of the patient so long as some experts regard it as a serious and appropriate treatment. The decisive criterion in determining the scope of the duty to inform is thus giving the patient all the necessary information to make an informed choice for, in the end, it is the patient who will have to bear the consequences (see Giesen JZ 1996, 519 with further references).
- (vii) A more restrictive approach was adopted in BGH NJW 2000, 1784, case 55, (note by Deutsch JZ 2000, 902). This case, involving a routine vaccination (against polio), raised two interesting points. First the plaintiff submitted that the defendant was liable. For though the risk which materialised had been brought to the attention of the patient, other risks, which should also have been mentioned, had not been mentioned to him. The BGH denied liability on the basis that the patient gave his consent knowing about the risk that did in fact materialize. Whether or not he would have not given his consent had he been informed of the other risks was a matter for speculation and could not be taken into account in the instant case. The second aspect concerns the question whether it was sufficient that the information about the risk was in written form and the patient was given the opportunity to clarify doubts in a personal conversation with the doctor. It was held that such an (informal) procedure was adequate at least as far as routine measures were concerned. Finally, it is interesting to note that German courts are not impressed by the statistical probability of a certain risk, a point also confirmed in the decision in question. Whether the risk is regarded as material depends on the circumstances of the individual case, the nature of the treatment, the seriousness of the risk. Overall, these decisions demonstrate that German courts have succeeded in striking a workable balance between the patient's right of self-determination and the need to control in a reasonable way the extent of medical liability so that the profession is not unduly burdened by excessive costs. (For further discussion of these topics see: Deutsch, NJW 1980, 1305; idem, NJW 1984, 1802; Laufs and Kern, JZ 1984, 631. More detailed discussions can also be found in the standard treatises written by Professor Deutsch, Medizinrecht—Arztrecht, Arzneimittelrecht und Medizinprodukte-recht, 4th edn. (1999); and Professor Giesen, Arzthaftungsrecht, 4th edn. (1995).)

One further point related with informed consent which has troubled the courts of many systems is linked to the problem of causation that arises in such cases. For, once it has been decided that inadequate information has been given to the patient, the next point that arises is whether had there been proper disclosure this particular patient would have gone ahead with the proposed medical treatment. Once again, the doubt has centred as to how this question should be answered: objectively, by discovering the reaction of the hypothetical, reasonable man? Or by finding how this particular patient would have reacted. It would be impossible to deny that the question does not lend itself to an easy answer. Equally, however, it is noteworthy that despite the dangers of self-serving evidence (which arise if the test is to be subjective) many courts have adopted it as the right criterion. Thus see: New Zealand: Smith v. Auckland Hospital Board [1964] NZLR 191 CA; Australia: Ellis v. Wallsend District Hospital (1989) 17 NSWLR 553, 560; Rogers v. Whittacker (1991) 23 NSWLR 601; Germany: BGHZ 90, 103, 111, 112; BGHZ 90, 96, 101, 102. Indeed, German courts have tried to counter the argument that patients may, with hindsight, attempt to manipulate the evidence so they insist that it is for the patient to substantiate his allegation that he would not have consented to the operation even if properly informed “in those [cases] where the reasons adduced [by the patient] for refusing treatment are not altogether comprehensible in the light of the specific facts of the case.” In other words, in such cases it is for the patient to come up with plausible reasons for refusing the treatment had he known the risks in advance.

6. Non therapeutic treatments—such as sterilisation operations—have been particularly controversial. In some systems—e.g. Australia (Secretary, Dept. of Health v. JWB (1992) CLR 218—they require a court order. In other systems—e.g. Canada Re Eve [1986] 2 SCR 388—even a court order is insufficient. In England, a court order seems to be deemed desirable but not essential. In re F (Mental Patient) [1990] 2 AC 1. The legal outcome may be more controversial depending upon whether the person that is about to be sterilised is a minor, an adult, or an adult of diminished intellectual abilities. The irreversible nature of the operation makes the decision that much more sensitive.

7. German law recognises the privilege of self-defence against persons, § 227 BGB (Notwehr) and the defence of necessity, § 904 BGB (Notstand). In § 228 BGB it also recognises (in certain circumstances) the right of a person to interfere with objects which belong to another person and from which the danger emanates in order to prevent harm to his own interests or those of others. Where this is the case the “unlawfulness” of the act disappears and the actor cannot be sued under § 823 I BGB. We are here talking of situations which have exact counterparts in the Common law. See, for example, Fleming, 78–80, 90–2; and Prosser and Keaton, 124 ff.

Case 56, BGH NJW 1975, 1161, however, attempts to put the privilege of self-defence to a novel use and the dislike of the legal order for self-help is clearly shown in the judgment of the German court. Compare in this respect § 140 of the Restatement Second, Torts, which also states that there will be no privilege to use force to prevent the commission of a misdemeanour.

Problems not dissimilar to those faced by the court in the above case have arisen in the US in the context of occupations of nuclear plants by nuclear protestors, but the defence of “competing harms” raised by the intruders has met with the same fate. An interesting case with such facts is Commonwealth v. Bregman, 13 Mass. App. Ct. 373, 433 NE 2d 457 (1982).

14. DUTIES OF CARE

Case 57

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SEVENTH CIVIL SENATE) 7 DECEMBER 1961

JZ 1962, 570

Facts

The claimant, as insurer, is pursuing an alleged claim of its policy holder (“the Company”) which the claimant considers has passed to it in accordance with § 67 (1) sentence 1 of the VVG (Insurance Contracts Act). In 1957 the Company carried out installation work on the territory of the W excavation plant on their behalf and stationed there two vehicles used for carrying personnel and equipment. It transferred the surveillance of these by a contract of the 1 August 1957 to W (“the Surveillance Service”), the employer of the defendant. Its conditions of business, which were quoted on the contract document, stated, amongst other things: “The Surveillance Service is liable for harm which arises through the intentional conduct or gross negligence of its employees in the exercise of their duties . . . Harm which arises in the operation and guarding of machines, heaters, boilers and heating devices . . . is excluded from the liability . . .”. The Surveillance Service employed the 71 year old defendant to guard the vehicles. During his duties he generally stayed in one of the vehicles. A stove was burning in it at night, in order to keep the space warm for the defendant. In the evening of the 7 January 1957, the foreman of the Company informed the defendant that the Company’s workers had hung out their wet clothes to dry near the stove; he should take care that nothing caught light. At about 21 hours the defendant put some coals in the stove and went out. When he came back again at about 22 hours, the vehicle was on fire; it was destroyed with all its contents. The claimant paid for the Company's damage. The Landgericht allowed the claimant's applications and the Oberlandesgericht those of the defendant. The claimant's appeal in law was unsuccessful.

Reasons

The Oberlandesgericht rejected the claim because it assumed that the exemption from liability agreed between the Company and the Surveillance Service also extended to the defendant. This clause is contained in the "Special Terms" of the Surveillance Service. The Senate, contrary to the view held by the parties, has to interpret them freely (details are given). The appeal court's finding that the Surveillance Service has exempted itself from liability for cases of the present kind should be agreed (details are given).

The decision thus depends on whether the defendant has been included within the protected area of the exemption from liability agreed between the Surveillance Service and the Company. The Senate has, in agreement with the Oberlandesgericht, confirmed this.

Admittedly the "Special Terms" contain no express provisions about this. Further, it is correct that such clauses contained in general conditions of business are to be construed narrowly and, in case of doubt, against the person who has drawn them up and whom they benefit. But that alone is not decisive. It is not the wording of the exemption from liability but its sense and purpose, as recognisable to the other party to the contract, which are decisive. If there are no doubts in this respect, an appropriate amplification in accordance with § 157 of the BGB is not only permissible but required (reference omitted).

1. The assumption that the Surveillance Service wanted to extend the protection of the clause to its employees seems appropriate for the simple reason that the Surveillance Service could be held to this on the basis of the duty of care which it owed. It undertook the task of protecting from harm the objects which it guarded. It regarded the risk here as so significant that it thought it ought to limit its liability in relation to the guarding and operation of heaters, so that it did not have to take responsibility for gross negligence by its employees. To have shifted this risk which it recognised from its own shoulders and yet to have wished to burden its employees with it would be incomprehensible. They were weaker economically and still less in a state than their employers to bear the consequences of their failings resulting from general human weakness. In these circumstances, simply the duty of care which the Surveillance Service owed required it to include its employees in the protection which it considered necessary. It is to be assumed, in the absence of grounds indicating the contrary, that it wanted to fulfil this duty by the exemption from liability clause.

2. The same consequence follows from another consideration.

- (a) It is recognised in the case law that, in the case of so-called danger-prone activity, the employee can in certain circumstances ask his employer to release him from his duty to compensate third parties who have been harmed. That can even fall to be considered if the employee has acted with gross negligence; admittedly in that case a complete release of the employee is generally ruled out (reference omitted). These principles are applicable here. It is true that the guarding of a burning stove is in general not exactly difficult. Experience has however taught that damage here is no rarity and that it can be very extensive.

Therefore the activity assigned to the defendant is to be regarded as “danger-prone” in the normal sense.

(b) In this legal situation the Surveillance Service would not or would only imperfectly have attained the goal pursued by it if it had not extended the protection of the release to its employees as well. The reasons for this is that if claims could be made against them, they would in certain circumstances have had a claim to release against their employer. That would have contradicted the sense and purpose of the exemption from liability. Even on this ground it must be assumed that the Surveillance Service, in order to attain its goal, wanted at the same time to exempt its employees by the clause in question.

(c) The appeal in law takes the view that no release from the employee’s liability for gross negligence can be derived from the principles repeated above, because in such a case the employer does not need to release him. Here, in its view, the defendant has acted with gross negligence. The objection is unsuccessful. Even its starting point is not correct. This is because even gross negligence on the part of the employee does not, as already explained, exclude the possibility that the employer has to release him from liability at least in part. Apart from this, it must be assumed to be the self-evident will of the employer that a release agreed by it for its employees should have no smaller extent than its own. Merely the idea of the duty of care, as indicated above, leads to this conclusion.

3. The desire of the Surveillance Service to include its employees within the protection of the release is admittedly only of significance if it was sufficiently recognisable to the other party to the contract. But the Senate has no doubts in confirming recognisability. The Company is an employer itself. For it, therefore, those considerations were obvious, just as for all other clients of the Surveillance Service finding themselves in a similar position. It must also not be assumed that a contacting party which agrees to such comprehensive limitations of liability as have been agreed here, has the intention of releasing the wealthy partner to the contract and yet of holding its economically weaker employees to the stricter liability. . . .

Case 58

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 19 FEBRUARY 1991
NJW 1991, 2340 = VERSR 1991, 559

Facts

The plaintiff sues the defendant for breach of his duty of safety. On 17 May 1986, when the plaintiff was barely six years old, he was playing on an undeveloped building-plot of land belonging to the defendant and suffered serious injuries in an accident when a concrete ring on the land, about 1.2 metres broad and weighing 750 kg., fell on him. The land was readily accessible at the time. The plaintiff suffered a double fracture of the pelvis and damage to his urinary tract. The injury to his sphincter has caused incontinence. The plaintiff claimed DM 50,000 as damages for pain and suffering in addition to a further appropriate sum of at least DM 50,000. In addition, he claims DM 12,209.10 in respect of costs incurred by his parents in visiting him in hospital (travel DM 6,463.10, increased maintenance expenses DM 5,246 and overnight accommodation DM 500) as well as DM 40,800 lost earnings by the father and DM 9,768 as the value of the housework foregone by the mother while making the visits. For private medical treatment as an out-patient, not made good by the Krankenkasse, he claims DM 1,759.56, and a lump sum of DM 500 for incidental expenses. He also claims a declaration that the defendant is liable for any further harm, material or immaterial.

The Landgericht rejected the claim. The plaintiff's appeal succeeded in part: the Oberlandesgericht granted the declaration, and awarded the plaintiff DM 25,000 as damages for pain and suffering plus a lump sum DM 200 for incidental costs. His further appeal was also successful in part. The case was remanded for reconsideration of the unliquidated claim for damages for pain and suffering as well as the special damages of DM 38,968.66.

Reasons

I. 1. The court below accepted that the defendant was in breach of his duty of safety to the plaintiff (§ 823 I BGB):

The defendant's land was dangerous to children, since wedges holding the concrete ring could easily be removed and the ring set in motion. It was the dangerous insecurity of the concrete ring which injured the plaintiff. The land was readily accessible, either by a garden gate from the property leased by the plaintiff's parents, or by a lane. Furthermore, the fence dividing it from the highway was broken at this point, and cars were actually being parked on the land.

2. On the view that the defendant's fault was not very grave, the court below held that DM 25,000 was an appropriate sum for damages for pain and suffering, notwithstanding that the claim had been certified at first instance as worth DM 100,000.

3. There was no sufficient legal basis for the mother's claim for the value of the housework she had been prevented from doing, and the court below held that the plaintiff must further specify and prove the other unadmitted items of loss.

II. Some of the appellant's criticisms of the judgment of the court below are sound.

1. The grounds on which court below concluded that the defendant was liable under § 823 I BGB were quite correct. If the owner of land knows or ought to know that, notwithstanding his prohibitions, children use his land as a playground and may play with dangerous objects there and get injured by them, he must take effective steps and lasting precautions to save them from the consequences of their inexperience and fecklessness [references]. The facts found by the court below justify the conclusion that the defendant, who admitted to knowing that children often played on the land and climbed over the things on it, was in breach of this duty of safety. He should also have realised that the concrete ring which injured the plaintiff was so placed and so insecurely fixed that despite its great weight children could set it in motion, as occurred, and be exposed to great danger, and it should have been obvious that notwithstanding the danger, children would play with so inviting an object.

2. As to the material loss claimed, the court below was correct to reject the claim in respect of the father's loss of earnings and the value of the housework the mother was unable to do. However, the total rejection of the claims for travel costs, increased maintenance, and overnight accommodation was not justified.

(a) The law of tort is based on the principle that a claim may be brought only by the person whose interests are protected by the rule infringed, and then only to the extent that he personally suffers harm. Only in the exceptional cases provided by §§ 844, 845

BGB may there be compensation for economic losses resulting “indirectly” from the invasion of the interests of others. The Bundesgerichtshof has, however, regularly made an exception for the cost of visits by close relatives to the sickbed of the injured party and, because of their intimate connection with the cost of the victim’s recovery, treated them as part of the injury to his health (most recently BGHZ 106, 28 [30] = NJW 1989, 706; NJW 1990, 1037 = VersR 1989, 1308).

(b) We adhere to the principle of these decisions, especially as it has long become established in practice. It remains the case, however, apart from the exceptional cases where a third party has a statutory right to sue (§§ 844, 845 BGB), that the victim’s claim for damages in tort basically covers only compensation for harm suffered by him personally, so claims for expenditure by a visitor depend essentially on who the visitor is. The mere fact that a third party is affected economically is not enough. Clearly no claim lies in respect of visits by persons not in the near family who attend out of a sense of social or similar duty. The rule of tort is not intended to compensate for such expenditures. But even as regards the expenses of those within the class of “near family” there are limitations. It must always be borne in mind that such expenses, which do not cost the injured victim himself anything, are only exceptionally and on special factual grounds chargeable to the person causing the injury, for otherwise the door would be opened, contra legem, for the compensation of mere economic harm suffered by persons only “indirectly” affected by the tort.

Previous decisions have therefore always restricted compensation to claims by the “nearest family” in respect of visits to a patient actually hospitalised, for only such visits can properly be regarded as both necessary for the recovery of the victim and also intimately connected with the cost of his cure, and so distinguished from expenses incurred either in law or in fact by those “indirectly” affected as a result of the injury to the victim, which are not compensable under the law of tort. Indeed, the only visiting costs incurred by close relatives which can be compensated consistently with the Code are those which are medically necessary for the recovery of the patient in his existing condition, and only those which are unavoidably incurred. Where there is no such medical necessity, hospital visits even by close relatives cannot be compensated, however desirable as regards the psychic or physical condition of the patient, and the same is true of expenses which might have been avoided. Here the general rule laid down in §§ 249 ff. BGB is not the sole consideration; the limits must be more tightly drawn because the law of tort is in principle restricted to the “direct” victim. Previous decisions of this Senate which go any further than this will no longer be followed.

(c) The detailed result of this in relation to the holdings below which are criticised by the appellant is as follows:

(aa) Travel costs form an expense necessarily involved in hospital visits, provided the cheapest means of transport is used and other economies observed. The court below regarded such expenses as harm to the plaintiff only to the extent that they had been met by the Krankenkasse, but as the appellant argues, this is inconsistent with § 287 Code of Civil Procedure, as the court did not ask why the Krankenkasse limited its payments or whether its limits were in line with the criteria of tort law as explained. The vouchers tendered by the plaintiff in support of this claim seem an adequate basis for evaluation under § 287 Code of Civil Procedure, at any rate so far as the number of visits is concerned.

(bb) Exceptionally a claim may be made for overnight accommodation in connection with visits, provided it is unavoidable. The documentation of such expenses tendered by the plaintiff is sufficient to permit evaluation under § 287 Code of Civil Procedure.

(cc) The cost of meals taken by close relatives while visiting hospital out of town depends essentially on the individual needs of the visitor. These determine whether in fact the cost of meals was “greater” than those taken at home. In order to respect the non-compensability of the loss incurred by “indirect” victims, compensation here must be limited to the unavoidable increase in the cost of meals. Only such increase is intimately enough connected with expenditures for the cure of the primary victim to be brought within § 823 I BGB. From this point of view the court below must evaluate the harm under § 287 Code of Civil procedure, on further evidence supplied by the parties, if necessary.

(dd) As to the claim for DM 40,000 in respect of the father’s loss of earnings, the following applies: This Senate has repeatedly held that loss of earnings suffered by the visitor is capable of being regarded as part of the cost of cure of the injured party for which the person causing the injury must pay, subject to the general duty to mitigate damage, which requires, inter alia, that a self-employed person change his hours of work within reasonable limits (see NJW 1985, 2757 = VersR 1985, 784 [785]). Recovery for such losses is however limited to those so closely related to the cost of curing the victim that they can be seen as being truly costs of the visit; examples might be the loss by an employee of remuneration or perquisites if he can take time off work only on unpaid leave and cannot make it up later, or loss by a self-employed person directly attributable to the hospital visit and incapable of being made good in any other way. Beyond this, loss of income resulting from the fact that visiting hospital made the work more difficult cannot be treated as part of the victim’s costs of cure to be made good under the law of delict, for this would, contrary to the Code, amount to liability for harm suffered by persons only indirectly affected.

In the present case, according to the plaintiff, the father, in employment as a manager, lost income because the hospital visits hindered him in developing a parallel practice as an independent accountant and tax adviser. Such a loss cannot be treated as part of the loss to the plaintiff which has to be made good. Leaving aside the question whether it was medically necessary for the patient to have the father by his side at the very time the latter needed to devote to his practice, losses such as these which are attributable to the fact that the visits to hospital left less time for the rapid development or extension of his business cannot be regarded as costs of the visit in the sense mentioned. The same would be true of delay in advancement or preferment in office. Such economic losses are harm suffered by third parties which is not compensable by the law of delict.

(ee) Nor can interruption of housework by the mother be taken into account. The appellant refers to the decision of the Senate of 10 October 1989 (VersR 1989, 1247), but in that case the expenditure claimed was in respect of nursing the victim, an increase in his need which was compensable under § 843 BGB. Here the plaintiff claims compensation for the time his mother could not spend on housekeeping because she was visiting him in hospital. In accordance with the principles just laid down for treating lost time at work as one of the costs of the visit, compensation in tort cannot be given when work lost through the visit can be made up before or afterwards. This was obviously possible in this case, since no substitute home help was employed.

(ff) In rejecting the plaintiff's claim for damages in respect of the cost of private medical treatment the court below insisted on too stringent a proof of the expenditures and thus misapplied § 287 Code of Civil Procedure. Whether a person who has statutory health insurance may claim the cost of private medical treatment depends on the circumstances of the individual case (VersR 1970, 129; VersR 1989, 54), and the decisive point is whether a reasonable man in the position of the victim would regard such private medical treatment as necessary. The nature of the injury and the victim's standard of living are especially relevant, but the court below did not consider these points, nor did it investigate the plaintiff's assertion that doctors had advised him to go to a "special clinic" for private medical treatment.

(gg) The fact that the court below allowed the plaintiff a lump sum in respect of incidental expenses of only DM 200 discloses no errors of law in the plaintiff's disfavour, and his appeal made no further mention of it.

3. The appellant is correct in arguing that as regards the quantum of damages for pain and suffering the court below misapplied § 287 Code of Civil Procedure.

(a) It is true that the judge of fact has a good deal of discretion in determining damages for pain and suffering, and his award cannot normally be criticised simply as being too high or, as here, too low. But this judicial discretion has its limits: the judge must show that in trying to reach a figure appropriate to injuries of that kind and duration he took all the relevant circumstances into account, and he must respect rules of law, canons of logic and the teachings of experience. The judge must also state the factual basis of his evaluation so that it may be seen that he has kept within these limits (invariable holdings, most recently NJW 1989, 773 = VersR 1988, 943).

(b) The appellant is right to complain of the way the court below dealt with his claim for damages for pain and suffering. This is especially true as regards the declaration of the Landgericht on 21 August 1989 when it gave full reasons for adopting the figure of DM 100,000 as the value of his claim under this head. On the plaintiff's appeal, the court below agreed that this sum was appropriate, thereby adopting the reasons given, which thus ceased to be the mere assertions of the plaintiff, as the court below later held in the judgment under appeal. While it was not finally bound to this sum, the court should certainly have indicated in the judgment under appeal why it had come to so very different a conclusion on unchanged evidence. If in the absence of different evidence a later evaluation of the damages differs widely from an earlier one, the law of procedure as well as candour to the parties requires the court to indicate at least the critical points of difference. Only so can a court on appeal ascertain whether the court below regarded its earlier judgment as lying outside the discretion proper to the judge of fact or whether both sums lay within it (see NJW 1989, 773 = VersR 1988, 943). Since such considerations are lacking in the judgment of the court below, it must therefore be vacated as inconsistent with § 287 Code of Civil Procedure, without prejudice to the power of the court on remand, if it gives sufficient reasons, again rejecting the claim for unliquidated damages for pain and suffering.

Notes to Case 58

1. This line of cases demonstrates a degree of judicial creativity which Common lawyers do not often ascribe to civilian judges. To understand the problem let us restate the basic stance of German tort law: negligently inflicted pure economic loss is not recovered under § 823 I BGB. Relational economic loss of third parties, consequent upon injuries to one of the interests of another—the direct—victim are also not covered by § 823 I BGB. The BGH recently emphasised the importance of this general rule. (NJW 2001, 971.) The case concerned a claim for economic loss brought by the parents of a young man killed through the defendant's negligence. Because of his death, the farm run by the victim ceased to operate and this, in turn, caused pecuniary loss to the parents. Given there was no interference with the right of an “established and operating business” since the accident did not involve a direct interference (see ch. 2 A (e)(iii)), and since this was not the type of loss envisaged by §§ 843 ff. BGB, the suing parents were denied recovery. However, in some cases interfering with a person's physical integrity may cause economic loss to third parties and it would not be “fair, just and reasonable” to deny this person any recovery. This was recognised by the fathers of the BGB; and they introduced limited exceptions to the above-mentioned general rules found in §§ 843–846 BGB (wrongful death situations: see ch. 2 A 2.a.). The most important is that the tortfeasor is liable to those of the dependants of the deceased victim who were entitled to receive maintenance from him. A different and, in one sense, the reverse situation, is illustrated by case 51. The victim's injuries prompt close relatives to come to his aid in various ways such as visiting him in hospital, helping him cope with his disabilities and otherwise looking after him. As the present case demonstrates, if the recovery period of the victim is long, the relatives who provide this assistance may suffer considerable losses. However, the fathers of the BGB did not provide for this eventuality as they did for the cases envisaged by §§ 843–844 BGB (wrongful death). These exceptions, being by their very nature exceptions to a given rule, cannot be applied by analogy to a different situation. Nevertheless the BGH has got round this difficulty by pretending that the costs incurred by the relatives can be seen as being part and parcel of the injury to the victim himself.

2. English courts have experienced similar difficulties in establishing a duty of care in comparable cases. (See Markesinis and Deakin Tort Law (4th edn. 1999) pp. 754ff.) They also analyse the problem as one of the extent of the duty of care owed to the “direct” victim. It should be noted that in England these cases are usually discussed in relation to the principle of res inter alios acta. (See McGregor on Damages (16th edn. 1997) para. 9–18; Lewis, Deducting Benefits from Damages (1999) para. 1.10.) The general rule appears to be that services provided by close family members (especially nursing care) do not diminish the loss of the direct victim (here the loss is analysed as that of the victim: see Liffen v. Watson [1940] 1 KB 556.) More recently, a source of difficulties has arisen in connection with the question whether there is an obligation to account to the third party. Such an obligation (which—not surprisingly—has been found to stem from a trust) proceeds on the footing of a more realistic view and accepts that the victim is in fact recovering damages in respect of a third party's (financial) loss. (See Hunt v. Severs [1994] 2 AC 350, which makes recovery dependant on such an obligation, and, earlier, Lord Denning's approach in Cunningham v. Harrison and Others [1973] QB 942.) This latter aspect does not appear to have surfaced in the German case law, presumably because recovery is limited to losses sustained by close relatives.

3. German courts have allowed recovery of travel expenses, cost of staying at a hotel (and the like) and lost earnings, caused by the visits to the hospital. Even the cost of a babysitter has been held to be recoverable (For references to the rich case law see, Emmerich JuS 1992, 75). The present—restrictive—decision, however, shows that the BGH feels uneasy with the current state of affairs, largely because of the doubtful theoretical basis of such claims. It is thus at pains to stress the exceptional nature of the recovery. Accordingly, this tends to be limited in the following way. First, costs incurred by close relatives by visiting the victim (travel, overnight accommodation, increased maintenance costs, loss of earnings) can be included as part of the cost of the victim's treatment and claimed under § 823 I BGB provided such visits are medically necessary and the expense unavoidable. The guiding (legal) principle is that of causation. Secondly, loss of earnings and housework done for the victim is compensatable only if the work could not be done before or after the visit. Finally, further economic losses are not compensatable. Whether these restrictions introduce greater consistency into the rich case law remains open to doubt. Thus, some authors have criticised the decision for being overly restrictive and argued that we have not yet heard the last word on this matter. (See, for instance, Grunsky JuS 1991, 907).

Case 59

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 13 FEBRUARY 1990
NJW-RR 1990, 726 = JZ 1990, 1087

Facts

The plaintiff is a firm trading under the name of Margot H, its owner. Mrs H and her husband were joint owners of a detached house which was built by the defendant in 1977/78. From 1980 onwards, the plaintiff firm was running a kitchen furniture studio from the basement rooms of the house which it rented from the owners. In the time that followed there were repeated leakages of water into these rooms. On 26 July 1982 water again leaked into the basement of the house and damaged the show furniture and associated display items. The plaintiff calculated the loss which it had incurred at DM 53,385. It claimed compensation from the defendants in this amount, arguing that the defendant had defectively constructed the basement floor and basement walls which had caused the leakages. Both the Landgericht and the Oberlandesgericht rejected the claim. The plaintiff appealed to the BGH which quashed the judgment of the Court of Appeal and referred the case back to the lower court.

For the following

Reasons

I. The OLG rejected both the contractual and the tortious claims brought by the plaintiff.

It held that the plaintiff was not a party to the oral building contract concluded with the husband alone. As a commercial tenant, she was also not covered by the protective scope of this contract; for the defendant could not have foreseen that the basement rooms of a detached house which were intended to be used for leisure purposes (e.g. fitness training, hobbies or parties) would be used for the display of furniture. The OLG argued that the plaintiff had no claim in tort because, after the earlier numerous leakages of water, she had acted at her own risk when she once again displayed furniture in the basement and should have foreseen further danger of water damage. Her careless conduct amounted to such a degree of contributory negligence that the defendant was wholly exonerated from responsibility.

II. The appeal decision cannot be upheld on all counts.

1. The OLG is correct to reject the contractual claims for damages brought by the plaintiff.

(a) It is not contested that when the husband concluded the building contract with the defendant, he did not say expressly that he was acting as the plaintiff's representative. As the OLG found, it could not be implied from the circumstances (§ 164 I 2 BGB) that the contract was also intended to be concluded in the name of the plaintiff. The plaintiff's appeal did not contest this evaluation of the facts as flawed in law; rather it sought merely to contrast its own evaluation which is basically irrelevant from the perspective of this court's task as an appellate body. Contrary to the view put forward by the appellants, it was not sufficient for there to be a contract concluded in the name of the plaintiff that she was the joint owner of the land on which the house was built [references omitted], especially since it is not contested that at the time of the conclusion of the building contract the defendant did not know this fact.

(b) There are, further, no grounds in law for challenging the view of the OLG that there were no protective effects to be derived from the building contract (concluded between the husband of the plaintiff and the defendant) in favour of the plaintiff, giving her autonomous contractual claims against the defendant in respect of the damage caused to the furniture and display items brought into the basement rooms.

(aa) It may be left open for the purposes of this decision whether in the case of a building contract concluded in respect of the construction of a dwelling house, the relatives of the [builder's] client as well as any joint owners of the land to be built upon will always fall within the protective scope of the contract [references omitted]. For such protection can only be of significance in respect of the infliction of loss which results from the fact that the persons in question come into contact with the work of the building contractor precisely in their capacity as family members or joint owners. This was not the case here. The plaintiff suffered the damage to the furniture and display items in the basement for which she seeks compensation neither in her capacity as a joint owner of the house, nor in her position as the wife of the client, but as the commercial tenant of the basement.

(bb) In its judgment of 28 October 1986 (NJW 1987, 1013) [other references omitted] this Division left open the question of whether the tenant is covered by the protective scope of a contract concluded between the client and an architect for the construction of a building [references omitted]. This question should be answered in the negative in respect of a contract with a building contractor such as the one in question here. First, there is no need for such a person to be covered, because in these circumstances the tenant will normally enjoy sufficient protection through his contractual claims against the landlord [references omitted]. Second, any other conclusion would mean that the contractual obligations of the building contractor would be unreasonably extended to cover risks which were not foreseeable for the contractor, without there being the possibility of the obligations being subject to clear delimitation on the basis of standards capable of being measured objectively [references omitted].

(cc) Since in the instant case the contractual claims would fail because there was insufficient proximity between the legal interests of the plaintiff which were impaired by the leakage of water and the contractual obligations of the defendant, it is no longer decisive in this context for the court to determine whether a commercial usage of the basement rooms by the plaintiff constituted a breach of the building regulations.

2. The conclusion of the OLG that the plaintiff has no claim in tort does not withstand legal scrutiny. The BGH must assume that the defendant was negligent in constructing the basement floor and the basement walls defectively, since the OLG left this matter open, and it must also assume that this breach of duty was the cause of the leakage of water on 26 July 1982 which resulted in a flood of water several centimetres deep in the basement.

(a) The OLG correctly assumes, on the basis of the judgment of this Chamber of 28 October 1986 (NJW 1987, 1013) [other references omitted], that the defendant is in principle subject to a tortious duty of care in respect of the items of property brought into the basement by the plaintiff.

(aa) In that case this Chamber held that an architect of a house was in principle liable in tort to the tenant in circumstances where, as a result of the defective performance of his duties in respect of the house, he did not offer the type of protection which is to be expected against bad weather. As a result of damp caused by rain, damage was caused to the tenant's property. The position in law of the building contractor must be just the same. His duty of care is likewise not restricted to those risks arising directly from the house and endangering those who use the house and their property. For the building should, in normal circumstances at least, provide protection against threatening external dangers and the users of the house bring their property into the building precisely in reliance upon such protection. There may be an exception in cases of special circumstances involving, for example, the use of the cheapest method of construction (see the judgment of 28 October 1986). However, there were no factual circumstances in the present case requiring the application of this exception. On the contrary, in the application made by the plaintiff to this court, the building was described as "one of the most generously proportioned and most luxurious properties" in the area.

(bb) In these circumstances, in matters of liability one must basically apply the same principles related to the performance of the duties owed by both the architect and the building contractor under their respective contracts for work and services as those which apply to the manufacture and dissemination of products which are intended to eliminate certain dangers but which are unsuitable for this purpose [references omitted]. For just as in the case of such products, where the purchaser takes no other precautionary measures in respect of his interests in reliance upon the protective effects of the product he has bought, so the owner or tenant of a building will regard his property as adequately protected from the effects of bad weather if they have been brought indoors, and he would not think of taking additional measures. Of course, it is the case that it is only the law of contract which protects the interest of use or financial interest of the plaintiff ("Nutzungs- oder Äquivalenzinteresse"); a mere interference in this interest will not give rise to a claim in tort [references omitted]. If, however, the construction of a house is also intended to eliminate dangers threatening those interests of the plaintiff which are given absolute protection, then any impairment of these interests attributable to the defective performance of a duty will amount to an interference in the integrity of the plaintiff's property ("restitutio in integrum"), and will be actionable under § 823 I BGB.

(cc) There is no need in this case for a final decision to be made on whether the building contractor can only be exonerated from his liability in tort where he makes good the defects in the work by providing a performance which is intended to eliminate the danger in question, even where the client no longer has an effective contractual claim to the removal of the defect because the time limit for bringing such an action has expired, or whether the (additional) responsibility of the contractor also lapses where he has given unambiguous information to persons relying upon the security provided by the performance of his duties that the work in question would provide only inadequate protection [references omitted]. For it is not in dispute in this case that the defendant had not clearly informed either the plaintiff or her husband before the leakage of water on 26 July 1982 that the floor and walls were unsuitable for the purposes of eliminating the dangers resulting from water entry.

(dd) The existence of the defendant's duty of care in tort is likewise not undermined by his claim that the plaintiff had used the basement rooms for displays in contravention of the building regulations. This fact does not place the plaintiff, who was using the basement to the house on the basis of a valid tenancy agreement, outside the sphere of persons whom the defendant should have protected against water damage occurring in the vicinity of the basement by building in a workmanlike fashion [reference omitted].

(b) The plaintiff's application is right to question the view of the OLG that she had no claims for compensation in tort against the defendant because she had acted at her own risk by bringing kitchen furniture into the basement rooms and that notwithstanding the fault of the defendant, she was overwhelmingly contributorily negligent.

(aa) The fact that the OLG denied the plaintiff's claims for compensation stating that she had acted at her own risk and did not balance her fault against the (assumed) negligence of the defendant, indicates that the OLG has followed the later case law of the Reichsgericht [references omitted] which saw "acting at one's own risk" as a form of consent to the interference with the plaintiff's interests which acts as a justification. This interpretation has already been held by this Division in its judgment of 14 March 1961 (BGHZ 34, 355 at 360) [other references omitted] as appropriate for use only in exceptional cases such as dangerous sports, as a realistic and legally correct evaluation of conscious risk-taking. If there is no such exceptional situation, as in this case, then according to the established case law of the Chamber there is merely a question to be assessed under § 254 I BGB, as to what extent the victim through his conduct has contributed to the dangerous situation in which the defendant's own conduct led to the occurrence of damage [references omitted]. In contrast to the view put forward by the OLG, this makes it necessary for the court to weigh up against each other the causally relevant contributions made by each party in order to assess the degree to which the defendant is liable.

(bb) The arguments so far advanced here do not provide a justification, on the basis of the passing comments made by the OLG as regards the matter of the plaintiff's contributory negligence, for an evaluation of the respective contributions to conclude in a complete exoneration of the defendant from liability. Of course it is only the role of this court, when reviewing the decision of the judge of fact, merely to assess whether he has fully and correctly taken into account all relevant circumstances within the framework of § 254 I BGB, and has not breached any rules of logic or empirically derived principles [references omitted]. The OLG has not, however, remained within these limits as so defined.

3. (a) The OLG assumes that after the leakages of water on 18 May 1981, as well as on 7 and 10 August 1981, which preceded the occurrence of damage on 26 July 1982, in each case the defendant carried out repair work. However, even taking this as a starting point, there is insufficient basis for the conclusion that in July 1982 the plaintiff no longer relied upon the basement area being waterproofed. For the plaintiff, whom the OLG was prepared to acknowledge in its judgment of 22 July 1988 in the context of proceedings brought in respect of the water leakages of 7 and 10 August 1981 was still relying on the basement being waterproof after the leakage of 18 May 1981, argued in this case that the defendant had stated that the cause of the water leakages in August 1981 was a wall duct for pipes which was not waterproof. Since the OLG both accepted that the fact that the wall being not waterproof was the cause of that loss and also assumed that the defendant had undertaken damp-proofing work on the wall duct in order to remove the defect, there exist no sufficient grounds in fact for the view that in July after the repair work the plaintiff should have expected the basement area no longer to be watertight. The OLG was wrong to state that this point could be derived from the fact that previous renovation works undertaken by the defendant had proved to be inadequate. In the first place the repair works, as the OLG itself accepted, were carried out on other weaknesses in the damp-proofing; second, even multiple unsuccessful attempts to carry out repairs by a contractor do not as such destroy the reliance of the client that the work previously undertaken to eliminate the defect will have finally succeeded.

(b) It was in truth appropriate for the plaintiff to rely as such upon the ultimate elimination of the danger from water, since the defendant, as the plaintiff stated in her claim and as she sought to prove in her application for a hearing of witnesses, “announced to the plaintiff that the waterproofing was complete” after finishing the improvement work following the water entry of August 1981, and “guaranteed to the plaintiff that the basement was now waterproof”. It is a breach of the principle of good faith (§ 242 BGB) for the defendant to argue that the plaintiff could not rely upon such statements. The statements by the plaintiff were, despite the views of the OLG, sufficiently substantiated, all the more since it was principally the task of the defendant to demonstrate the circumstances in which the plaintiff could be said to be contributorily negligent. In any case, the OLG should not have reached the conclusion, as the plaintiff’s appeal correctly asserts, that the plaintiff should have anticipated future dangers arising from water, before it had evaluated the witness testimony offered by the plaintiff.

Case 60

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SEVENTH CIVIL SENATE) 11 OCTOBER 1990

NJW 1991, 562 = WM 1991, 202

Facts

In 1979/80, the plaintiff and his wife had a new building built on a piece of land belonging to them. The first defendant was responsible for carrying out the structural work on the building. The supervision of the building work on site was entrusted to the second defendant, an architect. Since no proper damp insulation was fitted, the basement of the building became very damp. The plaintiff had rented this and other parts of the building to a company (F Ltd), which he ran. F Ltd had stored machines in the damp rooms, and these rusted as a result of the damp. The plaintiff claimed compensation from the defendant for the loss which he suffered as a result of the defective building work. He calculated his loss to be DM 139,697.84. In so far as the plaintiff sought to claim in respect of damage, which had accrued to F Ltd, his claim rested upon a deed of assignment dated January 18, 1982 the text of which covered only the claims against the first defendant.

The Landgericht held the defendants liable for the defects and held them to be jointly and severally liable in the amount of DM 19,298.93. The plaintiff appealed claiming a further DM 91,793.22 in damages. The Oberlandesgericht accepted the appeal in part, holding the defendants liable for a further DM 31,381.03. The second defendant appealed to the Bundesgerichtshof, and the appeal was accepted to the extent that he had been held liable for damages in the amount of DM 31,022.50 in respect of the damage to the machines. His appeal against the finding of liability failed.

Reasons

I. The OLG is of the view that the defendant is liable to the plaintiff, and that he must pay 50 per cent of the compensation in respect of the damage caused to the machines.

1. The external insulation of the walls of the basement in contact with the ground was said to be defective. As the architect responsible for on-site supervision of the work, the defendant breached his duty to supervise adequately the performance of the damp-proofing work which experience had taught was particularly delicate and significant in terms of the loss which would be caused by defective work. He was, therefore, jointly responsible for the defective damp-proofing. The defendant's appeal concedes this point.

2. The OLG further held on the basis of expert reports and witness statements that the defects in the damp-proofing, taken in conjunction with certain other defects, had caused the damp in the basement and that it was to this that the rust on the machines was attributable. [Procedural point omitted].

II. The OLG also stated that the plaintiff could claim compensation from the defendant in respect of the damage caused to his property, either through the principles of Drittschadensliquidation, or on the basis of the claims duly assigned to him by F Ltd on the basis of a contract with protective effects for third parties or on tortious grounds. The plaintiff has, it is said, become the owner of the claim against the defendant as a consequence of the assignment; this was the appropriate interpretation of the deed of assignment. The final point was that assignment did not contravene the prohibition on contracting with oneself.

1. The Court leaves open the question of whether the damage to the machines may be claimed from the defendant according to the principles of Drittschadensliquidation. It may also remain open whether F Ltd may derive claims as a third party on the basis of the protective effects of the construction contract concluded between the parties.

2. It is clear in any case that the plaintiff has a tortious claim. The defendant has breached the duty of care which he owed to F Ltd in that he did not ensure, when performing the role of supervising the building work which was entrusted to him, that the first defendant installed the damp insulation in the basement free from defects.

(a) According to the case law of the BGH, an architect may be liable in tort on the basis of a breach of his supervisory obligation for the loss thereby caused. Thus, for example, the architect responsible for the building work was held liable in tort for the loss caused by the collapse of a roof or ceiling [references omitted]; the same applies to the damage caused to a person using a staircase which proved to be unsafe [references omitted]. The tortious responsibility of the architect was also accepted for loss caused by damp to the property of third parties resulting from inadequate damp-proofing or a defective roof [references omitted]. This tortious responsibility of the architect is derived from the fact that during the construction process he not only owes duties on the basis of the contract with the builder, but he also owes duties of care in tort to third parties who are expected to come into contact with the building. For, in the normal course of events, such persons may rely on the architect carrying out in the proper way those tasks which will secure their protection against loss in the future [reference omitted]. That, also, applies to the tenant of a building. The fact that such a person may be, in certain circumstances, less worthy of protection than other third parties who only occasionally come into contact with the building, is no obstacle to a finding that the architect is liable. Of course, in normal circumstances the tenant will have a claim for compensation against the landlord where loss is inflicted by events such as those at issue. That factor makes no difference, however, to the architect's duty of care. Even for the builder himself, claims in tort are not in principle excluded by the fact that there are parallel claims in contract [references omitted]. Nor, however, is the tenant prevented from pursuing claims in tort against the architect, even though he may have a contractual claim against the landlord. The contractual liability of the landlord is not intended to exclude tortious claims against other persons who inflict loss on the tenant.

The liability of the architect is not excluded by the fact that it is in the first instance the main building contractor who is responsible for the building works. The Division has rejected this argument also to the extent that the architect owes a duty of care to safeguard the building site [references omitted]. Just as the architect may be responsible for the safety of the building site within the framework of the tasks which he has undertaken to perform, so the supervisory obligations which are intended to protect the residents of the building and their property may generate a duty of care.

This line of case law is likewise not challenged in the literature [references to literature omitted]. While it is possible to find in the literature signs of a move towards restricting the duty of care [references to literature omitted], there is no need in this case to take a definitive position on this matter. It may be doubtful in individual cases how far the duty of care of the architect extends. The Sixth Division has already referred to this point [reference omitted]. In any event, there is such a duty where the supervisory obligations in respect of the building work are specifically intended to avoid the occurrence of particularly dangerous types of errors on the part of the building contractor which are likely to arise.

(b) In this case the defendant was obliged, with respect to the protection of the tenant, to ensure that the damp-proofing was properly carried out. As a type of building work which is particularly risky, the architect was under a duty to take special care [references omitted]. The fact that the damp-proofing was not carried out properly was particularly likely to cause unexpected damage which could be significant to the property of those using the building.

(c) The liability of the architect is likewise not excluded by the fact that the defendant stated in his pleadings that the use of the storage rooms in question for commercial purposes was a breach of the planning regulations. It is not necessary to decide whether and in what conditions the protective scope of the defendant's duty of care is limited by the fact that the storage of the machines was prohibited under the planning regulations and was therefore unlawful. For in these circumstances there is no justification for a restriction upon the defendant's liability because the use of the rooms for storage was provided for under planning regulations and other local bye-laws. On the facts as given, it cannot make a difference whether the damage occurred to machines used for commercial purposes, the storage of which was not permitted, or to machines stored for other purposes, which were permitted. The decisive factor is rather that the rooms in question were not fit for the purpose which they were intended—as storage space.

(d) The liability is further not excluded because F Ltd may have occupied the rooms in question before they had been inspected in accordance with either the contract or the relevant building regulations. It is possible for liability based on the breach of a duty of care to be restricted where the activity in question has occurred without the knowledge or intention of the person subject to the duty. Such is not the case here. It is not alleged that the defendant was not in agreement with the occupation of the rooms or that he warned against it.

(e) The OLG was also right to hold that the plaintiff did not have to inform the defendant of the intention to store items intended for use in his business in the basement. The defendant must have anticipated the usage of the basement for these purposes.

3. The claim for compensation brought by F Ltd is restricted to the claim for so-called restitutio in integrum [references omitted]. The plaintiff claimed no more with his request for the recovery of the costs of repair and the costs of providing an expert report. The deliberations of the OLG concerning the contributory negligence of F Ltd contain no errors of law and there is no appeal against them.

15. PRODUCT LIABILITY

Case 61

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 26 NOVEMBER 1968
BGHZ 51, 91 = NJW 1969, 269 (with approving notes by Diederichsen = JZ 1969, 387 and E Deutsch = VERSR 1969, 155)

On 19 November 1963 the plaintiff, who ran a chicken-farm, had her chickens inoculated against fowl pest by the vet, Dr H. A few days later fowl pest broke out. More than 4,000 chickens died and over 100 had to be slaughtered.

The plaintiff claimed compensation for the damage from the defendants, vaccine manufacturers, whose vaccine XY had been used by the vet. This he (the vet) acquired from the defendants in 500 cm bottles at the beginning of November 1963. The bottles came from batch ALD 210, which the defendant company had had inspected on 18 October 1963 at the public Paul-Ehrlich Institute in Frankfurt-am-Main; and the batch had been released by them for public use. The defendant had subsequently and in the course of its business poured the contents into receptacles normally used in commerce. As regards receptacles with lower than 500 cm capacity that is done by airtight closure under negative pressure; larger bottles were filled by the defendants “openly” but in a closed room under ultraviolet radiation.

When a few days later, on 22 November 1963, Dr H inoculated the chickens at R’s farm, fowl pest broke out there. At about this time fowl pest also broke out in three other poultry farms in Württemberg which had had their chickens inoculated with the defendant company’s vaccine from batch ALD 210. When the Stuttgart Veterinary Inspection Officer had several bottles of that batch inspected by the Federal Research Institute for virus diseases in animals, there were found in some bottles bacterial impurities and still active ND (Newcastle Disease) viruses, which had not been sufficiently immunised. Moreover, the Paul-Ehrlich Institute established that some of the bottles sent to it for inspection were not sterile and ND virus could be detected in them.

The defendant company disputed the claim that the outbreak of fowl pest was to be traced to the use of its vaccine; and in any case the defective sterility of the bottles was not the cause. For this it invoked the opinion supplied to it by Dr E of the Federal Research Institute for Virus Diseases. It put forward evidence exonerating it from liability for its workers in and the director of its virus section.

The Landgericht and the Oberlandesgericht declared the claim well founded. The defendant company's appeal was unsuccessful for the following

Reasons

The Court of Appeal started by finding that the vaccine supplied to Dr H was contaminated by bacteria, and that the outbreak of fowl pest was to be traced to it. Even the defendant company's expert, Professor Dr E, could not exclude the possibility that the contamination had arisen through carelessness on the part of persons employed by the defendant company in the bottling. For their fault the defendant company must be liable under § 278 BGB to the vet, the buyer of the vaccine. He, however, was entitled to be compensated for the damage done to the plaintiff. Since he had assigned his claim for compensation to the plaintiff, the action was well founded.

I. The principles governing the claims for damage suffered by a third person (Drittschadensliquidation) cannot be applied to the present case.

1. In principle, the only person who can claim compensation for damage under a contract is the one to whom the damage occurred in fact and who, in law, has to bear it. If the damage occurs to a third party, the doer of it is liable to him—apart from certain exceptions—only in delict. This distinction between the more favourable liability in contract and the more restricted liability for delict is imbedded in the existing system of liability law and is not a mere theoretical dogma. Only in special cases have the courts admitted exceptions, namely where special legal relations between the creditor under the contract and the beneficiary of the protected interest cause the interest to be “shifted” on to the third party, so that as a matter of law the damage is done to him, and not to the creditor. From it the doer can derive no benefit to the third party's detriment: he must make good to the creditor the damage to the third party. That applies—apart from the rare cases of responsibility for risks (BGHZ 40, 91, 100)—where the creditor has contracted for the third party's account (BGHZ 25, 250, 258), or where the thing that the debtor promised to take care of belonged not to the creditor but to the third party (BGHZ 15, 224).

(a) This is no such exceptional case. No “union of interests” between the vet (who made the contract) and the third party (i.e. the plaintiff) is created by indirect agency. Dr H had not bought the vaccine to the order or for the benefit of the plaintiff. When he ordered and obtained it from the defendant company he did not yet know for which farmer he would use it. A vet invariably buys his medicines for himself like a contractor in respect of his materials and not for his patients or employers, even if he requires them to perform an order already given to him.

Moreover, this is not one of the cases where the thing placed in the debtor's care belonged not to the creditor but to a third party. Of course Dr H may have had imposed on him a "duty of care" (Obhutspflicht) concerning the plaintiff's chickens. But it is a condition for claiming for damage suffered by a third party (Drittschadensliquidation) that the duty of care exists between creditor and debtor (BGHZ 40, 101). That was not the case here.

(b) The Court of Appeal also acts on these principles. It is also aware that in principle the manufacturer and supplier of a thing which has been sold again to a third party does not need, merely on the basis of the contract of sale, to make good damage occurring to a third party (BGHZ 40, 104, 105). All the same it believed that in the present case it could permit the claim in respect of the damage suffered by the third party. Here the faultless condition of the vaccine was of special interest to the plaintiff, on whose chickens it was to be used. The vet could not check the condition of the vaccine, but had to rely on careful manufacture by the defendant company. The latter must therefore have proceeded on the assumption that a duty of faultless delivery rested on it in favour not merely of the vet but also of whomever happened to keep chickens.

(c) These considerations do not justify treating this as a case for claiming damage as suffered by a third party (Drittschadensliquidation). Already in its judgment (BGHZ 40, 90) the Bundesgerichtshof has emphasised that a contract of sale cannot be interpreted in accordance with the requirement of good faith so as to afford a basis for compensation to a third party injured through defects in the thing bought. In that decision it departed from the judgment of the Reichsgericht in RGZ 170, 246. The Court of Appeal has also established no concrete basis for holding that the defendant company had been ready and willing to afford to the other party to the contract (namely the vet) claims to compensation more extensive than under the statutory law of sale. Moreover, it is a condition of claiming for damage suffered by a third party that only one damage shall have taken place, which would have been suffered by the creditor unless the protected legal interest was that of a third party. There can be no question here of "shifting" the damage. It occurred here to the plaintiff in fact as well as in law, whereas in a genuine "shifting" of damage it occurs to the creditor in fact, though not in law. It could not occur either to the vet or to the chicken-farmer, but only the latter, and not—which is the decisive point—to him instead of the vet.

The cases of claims for damage suffered by a third party (Drittschadensliquidation), so far admitted by the courts, cannot be extended to cover a case like the present. Otherwise the manufacturer and supplier of necessities and luxuries, of toiletries and medicines, etc. would have to make good damage to the ultimate user not only in delict but also on the contract of sale. For he also knows, like this buyer, the wholesaler, intermediate, and retail dealers, that any damage would show itself in the hands not of the dealer, but of the ultimate recipient. This does not lead to the conclusion, however, that the producer is liable in contract to the ultimate recipient. The question how these interests are to be protected cannot, therefore, be solved by allowing a claim for damage suffered by a third party (Drittschadensliquidation).

2. The Court of Appeal also based its opinion on the principle that a duty of care on the part of the manufacturer towards the third party arises from the meaning and purpose of the contract. This might be interpreted in the sense that the Court of Appeal is willing to allow the plaintiff a claim to compensation on a contract with protective effects for third parties. That consequence also cannot be approved.

(a) The Bundesgerichtshof has, indeed, allowed claims to compensation on this legal theory and under specified circumstances to a third person not a party to a contract (BGHZ 33, 247, 249 and 49, 350, 351 with references). Those principles, however, cannot be called in aid here.

In no way can everyone who has suffered damage through a failure of care on the part of a debtor derive his own claim to compensation from the contract between creditor and debtor (Senate judgment of 30 April 1968—VI ZR 29/67 NJW 1968, 1323). The Senate in its judgment of 18 June 1968 (VI ZR 120/67 NJW 1968, 1929) indicated afresh that the law distinguishes between persons suffering direct and indirect damage and that liability under a contract is, on principle, bound up with the bond that binds debtor to creditor (cf. also BGH judgment of 9 October 1968—VIII ZR 173/66). Otherwise there is a danger that the debtor can no longer calculate the risk that he undertakes in making a contract. Hence it would no longer accord with the principle of good faith, out of which the contract with protective effect for third parties has been developed, for the debtor to be liable for such extensive consequences of his breach of contract. That can be admitted only if the creditor shares, so to say, in the responsibility for the welfare of the third party, because damage to the latter affects him also, since he is under a duty to afford him care and protection. It is this internal relation between creditor and the third party, ordinarily marked by legal relations of a personal character, and not the relation between the parties to the contract, that is the reason for the protection of the third party. Such a relation does not, as a rule, exist in a contract of sale or a contract for doing a job.

(b) Moreover, in the present case there are no such close relations between the creditor (the vet) and his clients.

II. If therefore the judgment under attack cannot be supported by the foregoing reasoning, we must enquire whether it can be upheld on other grounds. The plaintiff not only based her action on claims derived from the contract made by Dr H with the defendant company, but also invoked §§ 823 ff. BGB. In addition, she prayed in aid the question exhaustively argued in recent times, above all at the Deutscher Juristentag of 1968, concerning the direct liability of the manufacturer of goods to the ultimate user (“product liability”).

1. Even the advocates of an extensive liability of the producer start as a rule from the proposition that it can be based neither on a claim for damage suffered by a third party (Drittschadensliquidation) nor on a contract with protective effects for third parties. They prefer to provide the user with his own claim for damages, not one dependent on the contract between the manufacturer and buyer, and not brought against the manufacturer as an “action directe”—like the claim for damages based on §§ 823 ff. BGB. But they consider this claim in delict no longer satisfactory or appropriate, because it does not, as a rule, cover purely economic damage and, above all, because it leaves open to the producer the possibility of exonerating himself, especially where there is a mere slip in the productive process.

The case to be considered here affords no occasion for examining the question whether we should adhere to the rule developed by the courts that the producer can invoke § 831 BGB when there are defects in the actual production . . . and that such defects raise no presumption of fault against the manufacturer (Senate judgment of 21 April 1956—VI ZR 36/55). For it is not established here that it was because the defendant company’s staff had made a mistake that the vaccine contained reactivated viruses. That may also be due to causes that are inherent in the company's methods of production, and in particular in the method of bottling. In the present case there is no need to adopt a comprehensive attitude to the problems of products liability. Here, only the following considerations apply.

(a) The claim in the action could be granted without further discussion if the view of Diederichsen in his Die Haftung des Warenherstellers (1967) could be followed, that the manufacturer must be liable for every kind of defects in the product without reference to fault, as in the liability for risks or results ("strict liability"). He believes that this can be derived from the existing law by "considerations of legal sociology or legal theory". It is however doubtful whether his standpoint can be supported on grounds of legal policy and, at any rate, liability without fault is incompatible with the present law of (civil) liability. To extend the liability for risks regulated in particular enactments—mostly subject to different ceilings—to products liability is forbidden to judges. It is rather for the legislator to decide whether or how far a stronger objective liability should be imposed on the manufacturer.

(b) Nor is it legally possible—apart from special cases—to afford to the ultimate recipient a direct claim for damages on the assumption that contract of warranty was concluded directly, albeit tacitly, between him and the producer. The fact that the producer allows his goods to be distributed as his invention, that is to say with his label, in original packaging, with his trade name or trademark, and so on, cannot, as a rule, be considered as a declaration that he intends to make himself responsible to users for careful manufacture (cf. RGZ 81, 1). Normally, even the advertisement of branded goods which are advertised with particular emphasis on the ultimate user, contains no indication of any willingness to be liable for any defects in the goods (BGHZ 48, 118, 122–3). Moreover, that cannot be assumed even when the appreciably wider question is asked whether the manufacturer is willing to be directly liable to the ultimate user of his product.

(c) There is also no question of a claim for damages being accorded for a breach of alleged duties of protection consequent on a "social contract". No business relations exist between manufacturer and recipient nor are they intended to be started and, eventually, to be concluded. The relations which certainly exist on the sociological plane have not enough legal weight for claims for liability to be made from a special legal relation. That applies also to Weimer's attempt to derive a producer's liability from the general rule in § 242 BGB.

2. Special consideration is merited by the idea that recognition should be given to a special quasi-contractual relation between manufacturer and user, resting on statute and developed from the notion of confidence. In fact the relations that have come into existence between the buyer of a dangerous product and its manufacturer, before the occurrence of the damage, would seem to be closer than those that bring the latter into relations with "everyman" when—and not before—he is actually injured. As regards the claims for compensation of a buyer, on the other hand, it should be considered whether they also arise from contract law if he bought the goods not directly from the manufacturer but through a dealer.

(a) Starting from the special legal relationship between manufacturer and acquirer of goods, Lorenz at the Karlsruher Forum 1963 was the first to state the opinion that the manufacturer must be liable under § 122 BGB to answer for the confidence in his product, strengthened by advertising, that he has awakened in its users. Those ideas were mentioned by the Eighth Civil Senate of the Bundesgerichtshof at the close of its judgment of 13 July 1963 (BGHZ 40, 91, 108), but without committing itself to any position. In its judgment BGHZ 48, 118, it declined to accept advertisement as a possible source of liability. In the struggles for the all-important customer (König Kunde), advertisements have become more and more extensive and more and more significant from a business point of view. This, however, does not yet mean that they have acquired the meaning of a promise of legal liability. Moreover, no reasonable user understands it to be so: and Lorenz has not followed up his idea.

(b) Lorenz's basic idea provided the foundation for the attempts to derive the manufacturer's liability from a duty to satisfy the confidence placed by the user and made the basis for a claim corresponding to the legal principles developed for culpa in contrahendo.

It is however doubtful whether these considerations can hold water, so as to afford the user a claim for damages which, like the claim in delict, cannot be excluded automatically, but on the other hand would not be threatened by exoneration under § 831 BGB. The Senate has already, in its judgment of 21 March 1967 (VI ZR 164/65) reacted against the attempts to base the liability of a third person, not a party to a supposed contract, on the fact that his confidence was sought; and it emphasized that they would break, with dire consequences, through the boundary drawn between liability based on a contractual obligation and that arising from delict. Whether the doubt there expressed against an extension of liability for "positive breach of contract" (positive Vertragsverletzung) tells also against a subjection of the producer to a liability on the analogy of contractual liability need not be finally decided in this case. Nor need the question be gone into of how such a quasi-contractual claim should be afforded to a person injured by the product if he did not buy it but damage occurred through its use by himself or another person. In the case now to be decided there is no question of a number of legally successive sale contracts in which the seller, in fact, is often the mere "distributor" of the manufacturer in which case a breaking of the veil suggests itself. Here between the plaintiff and the defendant company stood a vet, who had alone to decide which vaccine to use. The plaintiff had placed confidence in him and not in any advertisement. She was not, herself, in a position to buy the vaccine directly or in the market: the defendant company could deliver it only to the vet and only he might use it . . . That, of itself, excludes the idea that a quasi-contractual relation existed between the parties. The plaintiff was not a "consumer" of the vaccine, nor even a "user" of it, but, from a legal point of view, "only" a sufferer of damage. As such she is limited to her claim in delict.

III. According to the Court of Appeal's finding of fact the conditions of liability under § 823 BGB are fulfilled. The vaccine supplied by the defendant company was defective and the cause of the disease to the chickens. Even if, as explained above, the rules of contract law are not applicable, nevertheless the starting-point must be that the defendant company has committed a fault. If anyone when using an industrial product for its declared purpose suffers injury in one of the legal interests protected by § 823 I BGB, through the defective manufacture of the product, it is for the manufacturer to explain the antecedents that caused the defect and thereby to show that he was not to blame for it.

1. It is not in question that even in "product liability" the injured party must prove that the damage was caused by a defect in the product. The plaintiff had therefore to show that the fowl pest broke out among her chickens because the vaccine originated with the defendant company and contained active viruses when delivered.

That proof was considered by the Court of Appeal to have been furnished. [An explanation followed.]

2. The Court of Appeal, having to ascertain why the vaccine contained live viruses, started from the fact that both the Paul-Ehrlich Institute and the Federal Research Institute found bacteria in the bottles examined by them. It based its conclusions in essence on Professor Dr E's opinion. He declared it highly probable that the bacteria had found their way into the bottles at the manual pouring of the vaccine from the large containers into the bottles. It has been observed on various occasions that viruses which—as here—have been killed by the addition of formaldehyde can, under certain conditions, become reactivated. It was therefore possible that the bacteria here had reactivated the virus. On the basis of these explanations of the expert, the Court of Appeal believed it could find that the contamination of the bottles by bacteria was the cause of reactivation. It pointed out also that no damage arose from the part of the batch that was not contaminated by bacteria, whereas that was the case with the bottles used by Dr H and in the district of Heilbronn, and in which the bacteria were found. Even Dr E held it possible that the contamination of the vaccine was caused by “human error” on the part of one of the persons employed by the defendant company in bottling the vaccine.

3. The appellant attacked this conclusion of the Court of Appeal, but without success.

It is indeed correct that the Court of Appeal considered no fault of the defendant company itself as proved. It accepted that it was probably only an employee that was to blame for the damage. A liability of the defendant company, cannot, as we have seen, be established by applying the law of contract, as set out in § 278 BGB. That does not, however, necessitate sending the dispute back to the judge of fact. For it would still be for the defendant company to exonerate itself even if the plaintiff can rely on § 823 BGB.

(aa) This results from the fact that the plaintiff's claim for compensation is also based on § 823 II BGB. For the defendant company, by delivering the dangerous bottles of vaccine infringed a protective enactment. This vaccine, a medicine in the sense of the Medicines Act of 16 May 1961 (§ 3 III AMG), was capable of producing in the chickens injurious, even fatal, effects. § 6 AMG prohibits the putting of such vaccines into circulation. That provision—like § 3 LebMG (cf. RGZ 170, 155, 156 on § 4 LebMG) which applies to foods dangerous to health—constitutes an enactment for the protection of endangered human beings or animals. If, however, an infringement of a protective enactment is proved, it is presumed to be the result of fault. The infringer therefore must produce facts sufficient to disprove his fault (Senate judgment of 12 March 1968—VI ZR 178/66). The owner of the business did not produce that proof so long as a possible cause, falling within the scope of his responsibility and which might point to fault remained unelucidated (Senate judgments of 3 January 1961—VI ZR 67/60 and 4 April 1967—VI ZR 98/65).

(bb) This rule governing the burden of proof would, however, also apply if the plaintiff could here base a claim for damages only on § 823 I BGB. In that case also it would be for the defendant to exonerate itself. It is true that the injured party who relies on § 823 I BGB will have to allege and if necessary prove not only the causal connection between his damage and the conduct of the doer, but also his fault (BGHZ 24, 21, 29). However, the possibility of proving the subjective conditions depends appreciably on how far the injured party can elucidate the detailed course of events. That is however especially difficult when it relates to antecedents which played a part in the business of manufacturing the products. The courts for a long time came to the help of the injured party by contenting themselves with proof of a chain of causation, which, according to human experience, indicates an organisational fault in the manufacturer. All the same, one cannot stop at this point in considering claims for damages for “product liability”. All too often the owner of a business can show that the defect in the product might have been caused in a way that does not point to his fault—evidence which generally relies on activities in his business and which is difficult for the injured party to disprove. In consequence, when damage has arisen within the range of the manufacturer’s business risks, he cannot be regarded as exonerated merely because he points out that the defect in the product might have arisen without any organizational fault of his. This is required in the area of “product liability” in order to protect the interests of the injured party—whether ultimate acquirer, user, or third party; on the other hand, the interests of the producer allow him to demand that he may prove his lack of fault.

This rule of evidence indeed only operates as soon as the injured party has proved that his damage falls within the scope of the manufacturer’s organisation and risks, and indeed is satisfied by the existence of an objective defect or of unbusiness-like conduct. This proof is required of the injured party even when he sues the doer of damage for breach of protective and subsidiary duties arising from a contract or the negotiations for one (Senate judgments of 16 September 1961—VI ZR 92/61 and 18 January 1966—VI ZR 184/64). It is the same if he claims against the producer for breach of his duty of care. However, once he has provided this evidence, the producer is better able to explain the facts or to bear the consequences of being unable to offer an explanation. He surveys the field of production, determines and organises the manufacturing process and the control of delivering the finished products. The size of the business, its complicated, departmentalised organisation, its involved technical, chemical, or biological processes and the like make it practically impossible for the injured party to ascertain the cause of the defect. He is therefore unable to lay the facts before the judge in such a way that he can decide with certainty whether the management is to be blamed for neglect or whether it is a case of a mistake in manufacture for which a workman is at fault, or a single breakdown that may happen at any time, or defect in development that was unforeseeable in the existing state of technology or science. But if the unknown cause lies within the scope of the producer, it is also within the scope of his risks. In that case it is appropriate and expected of him that the risk of not being able to prove his innocence should lie with him.

Such rules of evidence have always been applied to contractual or quasi-contractual relations of a special legal character between injured party (creditor) and doer of damage (debtor) (BGHZ 48, 310, 313). No obvious reason can be given why they should not also apply to delict, if the reasons for them apply. In certain connections § 831 BGB already imposes on the employer the proof of exoneration—the same applies to liability cases under §§ 832, 833, 834 BGB, and above all to §§ 836 ff. Here, indeed, the law requires a person damaged through the collapse of a building to prove that the damage was “the consequence of defective erection or defective maintenance”, but lays on the possessor etc. the burden of proving that he had done everything to avoid the dangers that could attach to his building. The reversal of the burden of allegation and proof ordered in these provisions does not always proceed from a presumption of fault in the doer of damage. It rests in the main on the thought that the doer is in a better position than the injured party to throw light on the events relevant to the charge of negligence, so that it is just to impose on him the risk of being unable to do so. The Senate has already in its judgment of 1 April 1953 (VI ZR 77/52) indicated that the plaintiff cannot be required to prove—as a rule an almost impossible task—that the thing that caused the damage came into circulation through the fault of the owner of the business or his agents. Above all, the Senate has already in its judgment of 17 October 1967 (VI ZR 70/66) declared that it is for the producer to exonerate himself, if the injured party can give no detailed information about the management's blameable breaches of duty. The modern development of production, which is distributed among persons or machines that are hard to identify at a subsequent stage and rests on finishing processes capable of being inspected and controlled only by specialists, demands a development of the law of evidence in the direction already indicated in § 836 BGB . . .

In any case—as with the recognised shifting of the burden of proof for “positive breach of contract”—it always depends on the interests at stake in the groups of cases from time to time under consideration. The question whether the assumption of the risk of proof can be imputed in the case of the owner of a small business, where the manufacturing processes can be easily surveyed and examined (family and one-man businesses, agricultural producers, and the like), need not be considered here. In cases of the present kind it is in any case for the manufacturer to exonerate himself.

4. The defendant company has not furnished that proof of exoneration.

(a) According to Professor Dr E's opinion submitted by the defendant company, it is possible that carelessness on the part of someone concerned with the bottling led to the contamination of the bottles. He considered the process of filling containers over 500 ccm by manual pouring and not, as happens with the smaller containers, by means of an apparatus as an “older method” which was indeed “tolerable”, but needing improvement. For this manual pouring there must at least be constructed a correspondingly superior “clean work bench” with UV radiation. In addition the “modest apparatus outfit” of the business must be increased by installing dry sterilizers, so that the larger containers could be better sterilised, above all without long interruption. He also pointed out that in the process of autoclave without a temperature and pressure gauge no control could be exercised over whether the high temperature needed for the sterilisation under pressure was really attained. Moreover, he recommended the use of tubes showing changes of colour. He also advised that the filling-room be examined for its germ content from time to time by exposing dishes of agar or blood.

The expert then was of opinion that in spite of these suggestions for improvement, the manufacturing methods of the defendant company were “not unsatisfactory” and fulfilled the “normal requirements”. Moreover, the method of bottling guaranteed a sufficient degree of security, even though it needed to be improved. Finally, he was of opinion that the defendant company had not carelessly neglected any of the necessary precautions. The bacterial contamination could indeed have been caused by defective observance of the required precautions, but could have occurred even if they had been observed.

(b) The expert's view of the required degree of care cannot be approved. Even he starts by saying that in the manufacture of vaccines in which the effect of living viruses must be immunised “the highest possible security” must be required. For that very reason vaccine works are subjected to strict public supervision (§ 10 AMG together with the provisions of Land law still operative under § 5). The defects mentioned by him in the equipment of the defendant company's business, above all as regards manual bottling, are in conflict with a finding that the management were not guilty of careless conduct. The improvements recommended by him were not at all far-fetched and imposed on the company requirements that were neither technically nor financially excessive. The possibility cannot be excluded that those additional precautions would have averted the bottling of dangerous vaccine.

Case 62

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 11 JULY 1972

BGHZ 59, 172 = NJW 1972, 2217 = VERSR 1972, 1075

On 12 October 1961 the plaintiff, a farmer's wife born in 1920, went to a hospital for a minor gynaecological operation to be carried out by its director. Dr M, his assistant, injected the plaintiff with an anaesthetic called Estil to be employed for a short narcosis, which was produced by the defendant. Dr M injected it in the bend of the plaintiff's left arm. By accident, the anaesthetic, which was to be administered intravenously only, was injected into an artery. This led to a serious disturbance of the plaintiff's circulation and necessitated, finally, the amputation of her upper arm.

Beginning in August 1960 Estil had been subject to clinical tests, first in one and then in several hospitals. As early as 8 December 1960 an accidental injection into a patient's artery had resulted in the amputation of an arm. Estil was registered with the Senator for Health in Berlin on 23 January 1961 and was put on sale on 1 April 1961. Instructions attached to each package contained the sentence in bold type: "Intra-arterial injection must be avoided with certainty". After the accident involving the plaintiff, the warning attached to the package was increased twice. On 9 February 1962 the defendant withdrew Estil from sale.

Meanwhile a number of such accidents had occurred, most of them involving the loss of an arm, but also some affecting the kidneys, in one case with lethal effect. The plaintiff claimed damages from the defendant. The Court of First Instance rejected the claim, but the Court of Appeal of Stuttgart allowed it. A second appeal by the defendant was unsuccessful for the following.

Reasons

I. The Court of Appeal holds the defendant to be liable in tort (§ 823 I BGB) because he has caused the loss of the plaintiff's arm by having culpably violated in his capacity of producer of medicines his public duty of care. The appeal against this decision fails in the result.

1. (a) The Court of Appeal reaches this view primarily because it holds that thorough clinical tests had not been carried out before Estil was put on the market. Such tests were required in order fully to recognize the dangerous nature of Estil, i.e. its arterial intolerance and the fact that an intra-arterial injection could not be avoided with certainty. If these tests had been carried out, so the Court of Appeal believes, the incident suffered by the plaintiff would not have happened.

(b) This Division agrees with the appellant that the arguments of the Court of Appeal cannot be accepted in their entirety. It may be true that further clinical tests were indicated. It is also clear that if the tests had not yet come to an end, the medicament would not yet have been in free circulation and would not have been administered to the plaintiff. Nevertheless, it seems doubtful whether, regarded from this point of view, the incident which affected the plaintiff can be attributed in law to the defendant as a breach of duty. The incident suffered by the plaintiff was caused exclusively by the arterial intolerance of the medicament, as the Court of Appeal found without committing a mistake of law. In order to obtain further certainty further clinical tests with human beings would hardly have been the most suitable means, especially since incorrect injections are less likely to occur among medical specialists and since greater care is applied in an experimental situation than in general practice, for which the medicament was meant at least as much. However, at the time when it was put on the market, the defendant was not at all in doubt, as the Court of Appeal itself stated in another connection and, as he states, he decided for this reason to include a warning in the notice attached to the package, an unusual measure from his point of view. The general danger of intra-arterial injections by accident, especially in the arterial area, was not to form the object of experiments with human beings, least of all by a medicament which would cause necessarily most severe damage in such circumstances. Moreover, applying that degree of care which must be expected absolutely of a manufacturer of such a medicament, this danger could be gleaned already at that time from the medical literature, as the expert opinions show upon which the Court of Appeal relied in another connection.

2. It is unnecessary to enlarge on this point, since the decision of the Court of Appeal is well founded in law on the ground of insufficient information concerning the dangerous nature of the medicament.

(a) The Court of Appeal holds it against the defendant, above all, that he was content to include a general warning in a notice included in the package and in the prospectus sent to medical men without having indicated in any way the serious, possibly irreparable, consequences of a misdirection of the injection into the artery, although he was well aware of them.

In the opinion of the Court of Appeal, there was all the more reason to do so since according to the unanimous opinion expressed in specialist medical circles an accidental intra-arterial injection could not be avoided with certainty, especially if administered in the bend of the arm; the danger inherent in particular in the bend of the arm in this respect could not have escaped the attention of the research department, directed by a medically qualified person, of the defendant's enterprise. Instead the defendant had recommended for the first time only in the notices dispatched after 16 October 1961—i.e. after the incident involving the plaintiff—to make injections in the lower arm for preference and, moreover, at first only 0.5 ccm as an experimental dose; even then he had not mentioned the nature of the possible danger. He had done so only in the third version of the notice—when called upon by the authorities—from January 1962 onwards, i.e. shortly before the product was withdrawn.

The Court of Appeal found further: If the defendant had, as was his duty, drawn the attention of every medical person to the existing risk in such a forcible manner from the beginning or at least after the Congress of Anaesthetists held on 8 October 1961 (where the Estil incidents were discussed) Dr M would have avoided the bend of the arm, and if he had approached the artery nevertheless, he would have noticed it at any rate while making an experimental preliminary injection. Thus the incident would have been avoided.

(b) These arguments cannot be invalidated by the appellant. The opinion of the Court of Appeal cannot be faulted in law that the defendant had violated his public duty of care (duty to inform) as a manufacturer of medicaments [references] inasmuch as he failed to indicate openly in the notice included in the package and in the medical prospectus the absolute arterial intolerance of Estil known to him.

It has been recognised for a long time by the practice of the courts that it is the duty of a manufacturer, the violation of which may render him liable to third parties for any ensuing damages, to give an effective warning of specific dangers emanating from a product brought on the market [references].

The requirements are especially strict for providing information about possible danger connected with medicaments. The Court of Appeal is correct in holding that in the face of this principle any consideration of the interest of the manufacturer to promote sales is excluded. The Court of Appeal was therefore right in requiring as information sufficient for the practising medical profession that the consequences of intra-arterial injections (almost certain total loss of the extremity) should be set out clearly together with the advice that the well-known practice of injecting Estil in the bend of the arm must be abandoned, because in the opinion of all the expert advice at the disposal of the Court of Appeal the danger of a misdirected injection is much increased, given the special nature of the anatomical situation. The Court of Appeal, in so holding, agrees in the essential point with numerous decisions which in deciding claims for damages against medical practitioners have found as a fact that an injection of Estil in the bend of the arm is altogether inappropriate. Several of these decisions have been upheld on appeal to this Division [references].

According to the findings of the Court of Appeal, especially in so far as they are based on expert testimony called for by the court and on its foundations, the arterial intolerance to Estil—which could have been proved easily by experiments carried out on the ear of a rabbit—exceeded by far the dangers which accompany generally an accidental intra-arterial injection with other medicaments. The fact that the same may have been true for a few other medicaments which had to be injected intravenously, such as Presuren, which was no longer advertised for sale later on, makes no difference; in the present case a special source of danger existed which the doctor using the medicament did not expect unless his attention was specifically drawn to it. This is all the more valid since according to its purpose as indicated by the advertisements of the manufacturer (the defendant), the medicament was to be used above all in general practice, i.e. by doctors without special qualifications in anaesthetics. This danger was further increased because Estil, intended for brief narcosis, is subject to a quick breakdown in the body and must be injected quickly in one move by a wide-bore needle and under heavy pressure.

No legal objections can be raised if the Court of Appeal holds in the light of these considerations that medical practitioners ought to have been informed of the full extent of the risk in selecting this medicament because only thus would they have been warned particularly to use the utmost care and not to use it at all in case of doubt.

(aa) The appellant fails inasmuch as he wishes to show with reference to the statistical material, previously presented to the judge, but not so found in detail by the latter that on the average other anaesthetic methods disclose for other reasons an even higher quota of incidents. The old medical maxim above all not to create more harm (primum nil nocere) militates against the acceptance a priori of a certain quota of incidents. Instead every recognisable source of danger—especially, however, one which is already well known—must be eliminated in dealings with patients, be they diagnostic, anaesthetic, or therapeutic, if and in so far as it can be reasonably avoided; this applies even if actual danger is only to be expected to materialise in relatively few instances. The duty to avoid danger is primarily incumbent upon the doctor, for subject to agreement with the patient, he determines the treatment. However, to impose this duty upon him alone would not correspond to the peculiarities of modern pharmaceutical specialisation. Here the responsibility, and with it the duty of care, of the manufacturer increases to the extent in which the production of the medicament is based on development which cannot be repeated easily by the medical practitioner or even understood; also the manufacturer himself, through intensive advertising among the medical profession, seeks and achieves to influence a choice in favour of his medicament and no other.

This Division need not decide whether—as the Court of Appeal finds in the alternative—already at the time of the incident involving the plaintiff it was improper to put Estil on the market because it was known that the danger connected therewith was disproportionately high (see now § 6 I of the Medicaments Act which in this respect merely gives statutory authority to a previously recognised duty of care towards the public). The decision under appeal is already supported by the conclusion that the defendant has not complied sufficiently with his clear duty of care towards the public to inform freely medical practitioners who wish to use the medicament of the specific danger and to warn them against it. Especially if it were conceded in favour of the defendant that the continuing marketing of Estil could still be justified having regard to its special narcotic advantages, it was necessary to acquaint the medical profession clearly and explicitly. Only thus could a medical practitioner balance correctly the risk which is connected to a greater or lesser degree with the use of every medicament against the benefit for the patient hoped for in the individual case, and could, if necessary, give proper advice to the patient in making up his mind. The conditions required for such weighing to take place were not provided by the defendant when he drew attention in bold type for the need to avoid intra-arterial injections with certainty. This is particularly valid because, as the defendant has stressed constantly, this requirement is a matter of course where narcotic medicaments are being used. This notice did not bring home that a special danger was to be avoided or had to be accepted for special reasons.

(b) Contrary to the view of the appellant, the Court of Appeal is also not wrong in not conceding to the appellant that he could rely on the publications in medical journals to provide the medical profession with information about Estil. Leaving aside the Court of Appeal's apposite consideration that those general medical practitioners who are mainly concerned with using the medicament do not all read specialised publications regularly, the court could deduce from the files to which it referred that those publications did not justify the defendant to treat them as being of unlimited objectivity, for in accordance with an alleged custom he had inspired these reports himself and had paid for them . . .

(c) As regards the question whether the insufficient information was the cause of the damage, the Court of Appeal concluded that a warning of the kind which it regarded as indicated would have prevented the incident involving the plaintiff.

(aa) This, too, cannot be faulted in law as far as the result is concerned. It could be expected that, as a typical and intended consequence of an adequate notice, no conscientious doctor would have made an injection in the bend of the elbow, but would on finding another suitable vein, have applied the highest possible attention commensurate with the highly dangerous nature of the remedy and would, in appropriate cases have abandoned the use of the medicament altogether. The latter was particularly appropriate in the present case as the appellant emphasises since . . . the chief medical officer had expected in any case that the well-tried anaesthetic Evipan would be applied.

If this had happened, the typical increase in danger resulting from the failure to give a warning would have been excluded. It was for the defendant to prove that exceptionally, despite the application of extreme care, a misdirected injection would have taken place which according to prevailing medical opinion could never be avoided with absolute certainty . . .

(cc) Finally the appellant argues, though unsuccessfully, that a manufacturer of medicaments can only be held liable for the application of his product in accordance with its prescribed use; to inject a medicament intended for intravenous application in an artery was to apply it contrary to its prescribed use, the consequences of which could not be attributed to the manufacturer.

This is only correct in so far as an intentional misapplication (e.g. oral, instead of external as prescribed) is in issue. In such circumstances the occurrence of unforeseen acts may break the chain of causation. However, even to that extent the manufacturer is not exempt from giving appropriate warning, as the case may be, against likely wrong use, e.g. by a clear notice "for external use" (see now § 10 VI 3 of the Medicaments Act). Such a duty to give notice is precisely in issue here. It is all the more important where it is necessary to prevent not an intentional but a negligent misapplication ("missing it") if, as found in the present case, this possibility is not totally remote and must have surprisingly severe consequences. The question as to whether the medical practitioner also acted negligently remains irrelevant as long as the manufacturer is to be blamed specifically for not having forestalled such mistakes of the medical attendant which are not beyond all expectation. According to general opinion, which is also supported by the provision of § 840 I BGB, the fact that another person has also caused the illegal act does not exonerate the tortfeasor either altogether or in part. Thus in the result the Court of Appeal has rightly held that the defendant is liable in tort for the incident involving the plaintiff.

II. . . .

Case 63

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 15 DECEMBER 1978

BGHZ 75, 75 = BB 1979, 1257 = NJW 1979, 2036

In 1969 the plaintiff gave an order to the G firm to carry out the glazing of his house. Thereupon the firm inserted "I-Glass" units which had been manufactured under licence by the defendant. The delivery took place on 9 October 1969 by way of the F Company, which had ordered the material from the defendant and taken delivery on 7 October 1969. In September 1974 the plaintiff detected condensation on a part of the inserted plates. At the end of October 1974 the defendant was notified of claims by the plaintiff. The defendant, in a letter of November 1974, asserted that the limitation period affecting the warranty had already elapsed. When that letter reached the plaintiff by way of the G firm on 14 November 1974, he learnt for the first time that the defendant included in its publicity a declaration under the heading “warranty”, which read, inter alia, as follows:

The manufacturers of “I-Glass” warrant—for five years from the date of the first delivery—that under normal conditions the transparency of “I-Glass” will be vitiated neither by the formation of film nor by the deposit of dust in the space between the plates . . . This warranty creates an obligation only to replace the defective “I-Glass” units . . . The group of European “I” manufacturers . . . have established a warranty fund to insure quality and warranty. This fund serves to provide extraordinary insurance of the “I” warranty and makes it ultimately independent of local conditions and circumstances. The warranty fund therefore supports the warranty issued by each “I-Glass” licensee . . .

The plaintiff in his action begun in January sued the defendant on his producer’s warranty. He at first demanded twelve substitute glass units. In May 1977, he had the plates he objected to changed and claimed compensation for the cost of the materials. The lower courts rejected his claim. On his application for review the Bundesgerichtshof set aside the appellate judgment and sent the case back for reconsideration for these

Reasons

1. The Court of Appeal is of opinion that no direct contractual relation came into being between the defendant manufacturer and the plaintiff as ultimate acquirer of the glass plates. Whether that is correct may be left undecided: for the judgment under review cannot be upheld because by virtue of a contract between the defendant and the F Company a warranty came into existence for the benefit of the plaintiff as ultimate acquirer (contract for the benefit of their parties).

(a) . . .

(b) . . . The defendant’s warranty attached on the date of the first delivery, namely that of the glass to the F Company. Thus it is obvious that the contractual intention of the defendant also relates back to that moment. That answers to the interest of the middleman, who acquires advantages for himself as well as from the creation of the warranty in favour of the ultimate acquirer. If, that is to say, one of the defects covered by the warranty occurs, he will be free from his own liability to the other party in so far as the manufacturer is responsible for the defect by virtue of his duty to perform the warranty. Accordingly everything speaks in favour of the F Company’s intending to establish the warranty as early as possible, in order to assure itself of the indirect exemption from liability connected therewith and its independence of later contingencies (e.g. the question whether the ultimate acquirer had notice as a third party of the warranty). The fact that the warranty fund set up intended the liability assumed by the defendant to be independent of local conditions and circumstances does not stand in the way. That turn of phrase emphasizes the material security of the warranty, but says nothing about the person to whom the defendant intended to direct his offer to make good the warranty. The custom sought by the warranty is not put in doubt on the ground that it initially operated on the middlemen in their relations with the manufacturer, for the last middleman will as a rule indicate to the ultimate acquirer the advantages implied in the warranty, in order to obtain a customer.

(c) As the interests of all concerned speak in favour of creating the warranty at once by means of a contract for the benefit of third parties (§ 328 BGB), it must follow that the defendant and the F Company intended to enter into a contract of that kind . . .

That the person of that third party was not ascertained when they made the contract does not affect the result. For the contracting parties the identity of the future ultimate acquirer played (to start with) no role. The agreement that whoever should happen to be the ultimate acquirer should be the third party beneficiary was enough. That made him sufficiently ascertainable.

2. The plaintiff claimed in good time under the warranty offered by the contract for his benefit.

It is true that the defendant learnt of the occurrence to which the warranty applied only after the limitation period had run out. Since the F Company had taken delivery of the glass plates from the defendant on 7 October 1969, the five-year limitation period had already run out when the defendant obtained on 28 October 1974 knowledge of the complaint. That, however, is of no significance since according to the clear wording of the warranty, the period referred to is the period within which the material damage envisaged must occur and not the period within which the claim must be made.

The only decisive factor therefore is that the defect appeared in September 1974—and so within the warranty period. That at that moment the plaintiff's claim against the G firm was already time-barred, because it was based on VOB/B standard contract, is irrelevant. The warranty was to be valid "independent of local conditions and circumstances", and therefore irrespective of the contractual arrangements of the ultimate acquirer with the glazier.

3. If the glass plates manufactured by the defendant turn out to have the defect alleged by the plaintiff (which must be taken for granted for present purposes), it should make no difference to the plaintiff's action that he no longer demands their replacement but compensation.

The defendant's warranty is intended to give greater effect to the claims for defects that the ultimate acquirer has against the person (the glazier) employed by him to do the work. The contract of warranty is, therefore, ancillary to a warranty arising from a contract for work and labour. In the present case the plaintiff's contract with the G firm was one of sale and work concerning non-fungible goods; for the glass plates had been prepared to fit the special dimensions of the window-frames in the plaintiff's house. That the defendant's contract with the F Company is one of sale is irrelevant. The decisive factor is the economic function the warranty has to perform for the ultimate acquirer as third-party beneficiary.

The plaintiff was at liberty to remedy the defects himself—assumed to exist for the purposes of the present appeal—and to demand monetary compensation from the defendant.

4. The plaintiff's claim under the warranty is not statute-barred. As has already been explained, the warranty was intended to give greater effect to the ultimate acquirer's claim for defective delivery based on the contract of work against the builder carrying out his order. In accordance with that purpose, the claim under the warranty becomes statute-barred at the same moment as the corresponding claim of the ultimate acquirer. Here the glazing of all the windows in a house amounts to a building contract. The limitation period for a contract of work is five years. Accordingly, claims under the warranty also are subject to a five-year limitation. That the plaintiff agreed with the G firm that standard conditions of VOB/B should apply makes no difference. The warranty here for the ultimate acquirer was to be “independent of the circumstances of the particular case”. It was to give greater effect to his claims of the final acquirer under the warranty arising from the contract of work and therefore according to its sense and purpose should in no way be subject to the agreed curtailment of the limitation period applicable to a contract of work.

The defendant by his warranty agreed to be responsible for all defects appearing within the limitation period. Accordingly, that period for claims under the warranty cannot be taken to run from the delivery, fixing or acceptance of the glass. The better view is that the sense and purpose of the warranty require it to begin only with the discovery of the defect (cf. also BGH NJW 1979, 645). Otherwise defects which were first detected towards the end of the warranty limitation period could in many cases not be successfully invoked before the limitation operated. That is precisely shown in the present case.

The plaintiff here detected the defect in September 1974—within five years from the delivery of the plates—the subject of the action started in January 1977. Thereby the limitation was interrupted in good time.

5. In view of these considerations, the appellate judgment must be set aside. The case must be sent back to the Court of Appeal, which must now inquire whether and how far the plates were defective and what the substitute plates cost.

Case 64

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 7 JUNE 1988
BGHZ 104, 323 = NJW 1988, 2611 = JZ 1988, 966

Facts

The defendants manufacture carbonated soft drinks which they bottle in reusable bottles manufactured by DB and Co. and which they market inter alia under the trade mark “Fri.” The parents of the plaintiff, who, at the time of the accident was three years old, purchased a crate of lemonade produced by the defendants on September 5, 1981 from the drinks retailer F. Two days later, on 7 September 1981, when the plaintiff took one of the bottles out of the crate in the basement of his parents’ house, it exploded. The plaintiff lost his right eye and part of the sight in his left eye as a result of injuries received from glass splinters. The remains of the glass were not preserved after the accident.

The plaintiff claimed damages for part of his pain and suffering from the defendants in the amount of DM 6,000. In support of his case he claimed that as manufacturers, the defendants are responsible for an injury to his health which occurred when one of their products was being used for the purposes for which it was intended. He could not be expected to prove that the defect in the bottle occurred after it had been marketed by the defendants, since this would be impossible for him in practice. The numerous other comparable cases in which bottles containing products manufactured by the defendants or other producers of mineral water products had exploded showed that this accident did not merely involve a “stray incident”. Rather, they demonstrated that technical precautions which could have been taken in the bottling process were not in fact taken, even though the dangers must have been known.

The defendants contested the plaintiff's description of the accident. In their view the bottle of lemonade did not explode, but rather it either fell out of the plaintiff's hands or was banged against another object when it was lifted out of the crate. The bottle of lemonade was free from defects when it left the defendants' business. This was guaranteed by the technical installations and organisation of the defendants' business. The fact that the cause of the accident could not be clarified since the remains of the bottle were not preserved, was a matter for which the plaintiff must take responsibility.

The LG gave judgment for the plaintiff. The OLG rejected the claim, and allowed the defendants' appeal on the basis that the plaintiff had no claims against the defendants arising from the accident. The plaintiff's application to the BGH was successful and led to the quashing of the judgment and the remittance of the case to the lower court for decision.

For the following

Reasons

I. The OLG considers that it is not proven that the lemonade bottle was already defective when it was marketed by the defendants. In the view of the OLG, the lack of proof falls as a burden upon the plaintiff. The essential findings of that court are as follows: the reversal of the burden of proof developed by the case law for product liability did not extend either to the defective nature of the product or to the proof of a causal link between the defect and the damage which gives rise to liability, but concerns merely the question of fault. There is also no possibility of a lessening of the burden of proof using the rules governing prima facie proof. It is true that there is no question of inappropriate handling of the product by the plaintiff. According to the evidence given by the expert witness Dr Sch., what caused the accident was excessive pressure within the bottle as a result of it being insufficiently filled, or an existing crack in the glass which led to the bursting of the bottle as a result of a small increase in pressure caused by the movement of the contents as it was removed from the crate. However, it could not be excluded that the damage to the bottle such as might here be considered to be the causal factor for the explosion of the bottle could have been caused only after the bottle had been marketed by the defendant. Consequently, the plaintiff must incur the typical difficulties regarding proof which are faced by a consumer who is injured by a product which has been passed along a rather lengthy chain of manufacture and distribution. A lessening of the burden of proof can be of no assistance to the victim as regards evidence of the causal connection. That would lead to a form of strict liability for the manufacturer which is not recognised under the present law, since it would be practically impossible for the defendant to provide the necessary proof.

II. The arguments put forward by the OLG are not, as a matter of law, in all respects convincing.

1. The OLG clearly regards the liability of the defendants as being feasible where it could be said that both possible causes which the expert witness said might explain the explosion of the lemonade bottle—namely excessive pressure inside the bottle as a result of it being insufficiently filled or a crack in the glass—were already present at the time when the bottle was marketed by the defendant. In reaching that conclusion, the OLG placed limits which were too restrictive upon recovery. At the present time, it cannot be excluded that the defendants as the manufacturers might still be responsible for the explosion of the lemonade bottle, including an explosion of the violence which caused the severe injuries suffered by the plaintiff in this case, even where the direct cause of the accident was a hairline crack which only appeared in the glass after the bottle had been put into the marketing chain leading to the plaintiff by the defendant. In this case there would be no question of considering the issue which the OLG took to be central, namely the burden of proving whether the defect in question was present or absent at the time when the bottle left the defendant's business.

(a) As the manufacturers of carbonated lemonade, the defendants are subject to a duty under the principles of the law of tort to ensure, within the limits of what is technically possible and economically reasonable, that consumers do not suffer any impairment of their health as a consequence of their products. This duty covers not just the concern that the drink which they manufactured should be fit for consumption; it also makes the defendants responsible for ensuring that the containers in which their lemonade is marketed do not cause injuries, whether to the consumer or to other persons concerned with the transport of the product [references omitted]. This applies also to the danger of the bursting of the glass bottle chosen by the defendants for their product as a consequence of a defect in the material or of excessive pressure which can lead—as the present case shows—to very serious injuries. Those types of accidents may be rare, even when measured against the high turnover in drinks and the common usage of that type of lemonade bottle—even in reusable containers. Still, as the experience of the court and the evidence of the expert witness demonstrate, they do occur and have long been known to the drinks industry as a specific risk inherent in such products.

It was the task of the defendants to deal with this risk within the limits of what was technically possible and financially reasonable. The responsibility of the defendants is not undermined by the fact that in addition to used bottles which it prepared for refilling, it also used brand new reusable glass bottles manufactured by DB and Co for its lemonade. Even with regard to these new bottles, they assumed responsibility for the product when they made use of them; consequently it was for the defendants to ensure that when the bottles were delivered they would withstand the demands of being transported and of being used in the normal way by the purchaser. The defendants were also not solely a bottling concern in respect of which the responsibility for the use of the bottles might have been differently evaluated [reference omitted]. The defendants decided how the drink would be put together, specifying in particular the level of carbonation which in turn determined the degree of pressure in the interior of the bottle; they also specified the type, get up, and usage of the chosen packaging material. Consequently, the defendants are not simply responsible for ensuring that this material and the level of internal pressure to which the bottles were subject once filled were appropriate, but also for ensuring that the composition of the bottles was satisfactory bearing in mind the demands which could be expected to be placed upon them in the context of distribution and consumption. The type of defects which in the view of the expert witness were likely to be responsible for the eye injuries suffered by the plaintiff are amongst those which it is for the defendant, if possible, to eliminate using appropriate methods of production and control.

(b) In this context the defendants must take into account that even if the bottles were not damaged when they left the manufacturer's sphere of control, they may [subsequently] be damaged and left in a state in which they might explode on the way to the consumer. For the product must not only be capable of withstanding impacts arising in the context of normal and intended usage such as knocks, pressures, heat, cold, etc.; such bottles must also be capable of standing up to all types of foreseeable and normal usage [see OLG Frankfurt VersR 1985, 890; Borer, Produkthaftung: Der Fehlerbegriff nach deutschem, amerikanischem und europäischem Recht (1986) p. 26]. Of course, it cannot be expected that the manufacturer should take precautions against all types of instances in which its bottles of drink are handled carelessly. The limits of the type of care which the manufacturer would be expected to demonstrate are exceeded in circumstances where the inappropriate handling of the bottle deviates from what is normally foreseeable. However, the defendants must take into account not only the distance which the bottle must travel before it reaches the consumer and the length of time between production and consumption, all of which means that there are uncertainties as to how the bottles will be handled, but also the [possibility of a] great variety of different consumers coming into contact with the bottles. The defendants may not rely upon the fact that the bottles will be sensibly and gently handled during transport and storage.

(c) Of course, the defendants cannot be reproached for having used reusable glass bottles in the first place for bottling their lemonade, even though there remains a residual risk of injury from such bottles, in particular where they are not handled carefully by distributors or consumers. In principle, the defendants are entitled to expect the users, themselves, to take care to avoid injury from glass breakages, because these are inherent risks in the material itself. The same cannot be said of the risks of an explosive breakage of the bottle such as occurred in this case. The average consumer does not anticipate such a risk; even an appropriate warning on the bottle would not change the expectations of consumers in this respect in any lasting way. The consumer cannot in general protect himself against the bottle through acting more carefully where it has already been damaged or where it is subject to excessive internal pressure. The serious injuries which are in particular likely to occur if there is an explosive breakage of the glass are completely disproportionate to the obligations in respect of the product which the consumer can be expected to assume when handling it as an aspect of the general risks of life. It is true that there is much to be said, in the light of the information put forward so far in this case, for the fact that, having regard to the great number of reusable bottles with the same features used by manufacturers of carbonated drinks, there are extremely few accidents caused by exploding bottles which have suffered prior damage. Consequently, there are no grounds for raising legal doubts about the admissibility of using such bottles on the grounds of any general level of risk. On the other hand, the specific risks of an explosive breakage cannot for these reasons simply be ignored by the manufacturer; the consequences of such an accident are too serious for this to be the case. On the contrary, the manufacturer of drinks must be regarded as subject to an obligation within the realms of what is economically reasonable and technically possible to eliminate such specific risks leading to serious injuries in so far as is possible. The type of measures which can be expected of the manufacturer include introducing a significant reduction in the level of carbonation, as was suggested by the expert witness in this case, using a type of bottle which is not as dangerous when it breaks, making use of caps which automatically release excessive pressure, and other appropriate measures.

(d) In this case, it can be concluded from the above that the OLG must first examine the question of whether and to what extent the defendants could be reasonably expected, at the relevant time when the bottle was put on the market, to take these types of precautions against their bottles exploding where the glass was damaged, even if only when it was being transported to the consumer. In judging what it is economically reasonable to expect of the manufacturer it is necessary to take into account inter alia the customs of consumers and sales potential for a product altered to take into account these matters. However, it must [also] be taken into account that it is the basic safety needs of consumers which are being counterpoised to these economic factors. The burden of going forward with the evidence and of proving that a method of production which eliminates the risk of lemonade bottles exploding is possible and reasonable and of demonstrating that there is a breach of duty on the part of the defendants falls upon the plaintiff, who is not protected by any easing of the burden in this respect. Should the OLG come to the conclusion that the defendants could have eliminated those types of risks of exploding bottles even at the time of the accident, and that the defendants had negligently closed their minds to this possibility in spite of the risk which had long been known in this branch of industry, then it is clear that the defendants are responsible for the injuries to the plaintiff even where the bottle exploded not because of excessive pressure because it had not been filled up, but because the glass had been damaged, even during transport to the consumer.

2. It is only where it can be said that the defendants are not subject to a duty to take such precautions with a view to eliminating the risk discussed above at the time when the bottle was put into circulation that it would be relevant, for the purposes of determining whether the defendants are liable, to consider the question which the OLG placed at the centre of its analysis. This [question] was whether, alongside the possibility that it was excessive pressure caused by the bottle having been insufficiently filled (which would certainly be a defect in manufacture on the part of the defendants) the other possible cause of the damage (namely a crack in the glass) should also be regarded as occurring in the defendants' sphere of production. To put it differently, did the bottle, when it was put on the market, already have the defect which actually triggered the explosion? However, even in this context the arguments of the OLG are not sustainable.

(a) The OLG cannot, without erring in law, exclude the possibility that the lemonade bottle in question was free from defects when it was marketed by the defendants.

(aa) The applicants' submissions to this court seek to rely, without avail, upon the rules of prima facie proof in order to demonstrate that the defect which led to the breakage of the bottle was already present when the product was marketed. The plaintiff argues that it is possible to see that the occurrence of the loss is typical—a feature which it must display if there is to be an easing of the burden of proof and which is in principle necessary for the purposes of demonstrating a defect in the product [references omitted]—from the fact that there have been repeated similar accidents in the past involving lemonade bottles marketed by the defendants, as well as lemonade and mineral water bottles manufactured by others, but despite this the defendants had not taken any care to ensure that adequate controls were placed upon the bottles which it put on the market. Additionally, the plaintiff argues that it has satisfied the conditions of prima facie proof because the defendants have neither identified nor proven a serious possibility of the lemonade bottle suffering damage after it left their business premises.

As this court has repeatedly stated [references omitted], the rules on prima facie proof are of no assistance where it cannot be excluded that the condition which caused the danger only arose after the product left the manufacturer's business premises. There is nothing to counter the arguments put forward by the OLG that it could not be excluded that the damage was caused to the bottle after it had been finally marketed by the defendants. There remains the possibility that a third party for whom the manufacturer is not responsible—such as a distributor or a retailer—damaged the lemonade bottle by handling it incorrectly.

(bb) Even the arguments led by the plaintiff in his appeal whereby the damaging occurrence resulted in the product destroying itself so that the reasons for the difficulties in proving the case were the responsibility of the defendants do not justify allowing the modifications in the burden of proof sought by the plaintiff. It cannot be said that the defendants are frustrating the plaintiff's attempts to prove his case because it cannot be excluded that it was not the defendants but a third party who was responsible for the bursting of the bottle and consequent destruction of the means of proof.

(cc) The plaintiff likewise derives no assistance from the reversal of the burden of proof developed in case law of the BGH in particular for cases of medical malpractice involving gross negligence in the treatment process. This case law is based on the proposition that the difficulties experienced by the plaintiff in clarifying exactly what happened during the treatment process which result from the error in treatment can be traced back to the fact that the range of possible causes for the plaintiff's misfortune is either widened or displaced because of the particular likelihood that the error in question would cause loss and to the fact that the failure of the treatment is especially likely as a consequence of the serious medical error [references omitted]. The situation here is not comparable to such a serious error in treatment. The re-use of used lemonade bottles without adequate controls against prior damage to the glass does not in itself represent an elementary error which on these grounds alone would justify an easing of evidentiary difficulties including potentially a shifting of the burden of proof. For it was established by the OLG that the defendants screened the bottles by putting them under an initial pressure of 6.0 bar.

(b) It is crucial to determine in this case which party is burdened with the consequences of the fact that the exact cause of the defect and the point at which it arose remain unclarified, and in this context it is correct to adopt the starting point of the OLG, namely that it is in principle the task of the plaintiff not only to prove the defect in the product and the causal link between the defect and the injury to the plaintiff, but also to prove that the defect in question arose within the manufacturer's sphere of control for which the defendants are responsible. The courts have so far always refused to extend the principles of the reversal of the burden of proof regarding the issue of fault to the issue of objective attribution of the injury to the action ("objektiver Zurechnungszusammenhang") of loss [references omitted]. A generalised form of reversal of proof would turn the manufacturer's tortious liability into a form of strict liability [Erfolgseinstandshaftung] for all consequences for which it would be necessary to find some specific legitimation in the substantive law.

However, it does not follow from the above—as the OLG assumes—that modifications of the evidentiary burdens (amounting to a reversal of the burden of proof regarding the attribution of a harmful defect in the product to the manufacturer's sphere of control) are always excluded.

The objections to a presumption of a causal link working against the manufacturer will exceptionally become weaker inter alia where the defect in the product which has been established is typically one which arises within the manufacturer's sphere of control. In such cases, and precisely for this reason, the manufacturer (who is required wherever possible to eliminate such risks in order to avoid the infliction of serious loss) is under an obligation, for the sake of the consumer, to assure himself before the product is put on the market that it is free of such defects. This is so where the victim has demonstrated that the manufacturer's attempts to ensure the "safety status" of the product have been inadequate. In such a case there is no significant hardening of the substantive duties imposed upon the manufacturer if he is required to demonstrate—as it were, in order to ensure the performance of the duty to ensure the 'safety status' of the product which he has not so far fulfilled—that the defect occurred only after he had put the product on the market. The manufacturer would be acting in bad faith if, in the context of litigation and in order to exonerate himself, he were able to rely upon the absence of data regarding the state of the products when they were put on the market which should precisely be available by law in order to ensure the substantive protection of the consumer.

(aa) By opening up such a possibility of reversing the burden of proof regarding the existence of a causal link in the field of product liability, this court is building on principles which it has already developed regarding the easing of the evidentiary burden within the law of tort. In this context it is not accepted that every breach of duty which leads to the occurrence of damage remaining unexplained will necessarily lead to the imposition of a burden upon the tortfeasor. There is no general rule that the risk of non-clarification will fall upon the party which has caused it as a consequence of a breach of duty [references omitted]. If it were the case that a failure on the part of the defendants to institute adequate controls upon the re-use of bottles in order to ensure that they will not burst merely represented a breach of their general duty of care to manufacture products which can be used without harming the consumer's health, then there would be no reason to relieve the plaintiff, as the victim, of the burden of proving that the non-existent controls were responsible for the accident, simply because of this breach on the part of the defendants of a duty of care to which they were subject [reference omitted].

(bb) However, the position is different where the duty on the part of the manufacturer to eliminate the risk is precisely focused on the clarification of an ambiguous state of affairs or an unclarified feature of the product and is a duty which is imposed upon the manufacturer for the protection of the consumer precisely in order to ensure, through a timely and exact investigation and control of the status of the product, that it is free of risks typically found in such products and which can no longer be discovered once the product has been put on the market by the manufacturer. If the manufacturer is in this way required to produce and preserve data on the inquiries made into the safety of the product, because he is not permitted to burden the consumer with the unclarified status of the product and the risks inherent in that status, then this in no way changes the material duties imposed upon the manufacturers, but rather confirms them. This is so where the manufacturer has breached this duty and so carries the burden of proving that the proper provision of data at the time of the inspection of the product would have ensured that it was guaranteed free of defects. To this extent, there is a conflict of interests which is comparable to that arising in those cases in which the doctor is required, for the purposes of protecting his patient, to provide written reports in order to ensure that there is prompt clarification of the patient's state of health. This clarification serves to avoid dangerous developments and cannot be drawn up belatedly. In these cases, too, this court has imposed upon the doctor who wrongfully fails to ensure that there is such a report the burden of proof in respect of what actually occurred where as a consequence of the breach of duty the clarification of what is in any case a probable causal connection between the negligence of the doctor and the injury to the plaintiff is made more difficult or impossible and the provision of a report is required precisely because of the increased risk of the procedure undertaken in that particular case [reference omitted]. The general essence of the principle of law underlying these decisions can also be applied exceptionally in respect of the constellations of fact described above concerning product liability in order to ease the burden of proof upon the consumer in respect of the causal connection and can go so far as to shift the burden of proof upon the manufacturer.

(cc) The preconditions for the application of the principles regarding the reversal of the burden of proof are fulfilled, having regard to the facts as they are to be understood for the purposes of this appeal hearing. By selling the returnable bottles, the defendants put on the market a product which, because of its particular features (glass containers which are used several times and which are subject to considerable internal gas pressure) reveals an enhanced tendency to cause damage. In respect of such bottles, which may have been used many times over a period of many years, and which may therefore have already been damaged and are therefore likely to explode, the defendants, as the manufacturers, are subject to a duty of examination and report preservation in that they must inspect the state of the glass of every bottle before it is put on the market with a view to ensuring that it is not likely to burst and to ensure that only undamaged bottles leave the manufacturers' place of business. For if the manufacturer of soft drinks uses not only new bottles but also, as here, re-used bottles, then if there is no report preservation there will be no basis for judging the state of the glass and whether and to what extent it is capable of withstanding not only the high internal gas pressure to which it will be subjected but also the considerable demands which will be placed upon it during its journey to the consumer; these are risks which the manufacturer must take into account. It is precisely because serious injuries to the health of a victim can occur where there has been a prior impairment of the glass leading to a risk of explosion and because the risk of such impairments is greater where the previously used bottles are re-used, that the manufacturer is subject to a duty to investigate the condition of the bottles which is so far unknown to him, and thereby to provide for himself and for the consumer information regarding the resistance to explosion of the glass.

It has been established by the OLG that there was no comprehensive method of identifying the already damaged bottles within the defendant's firm; in particular, subjecting the bottles for a short period of time to pressure of 6.0 bar was not a sufficient form of control. Consequently, there appears to have been a breach by the defendants of their duty of report preservation with the resulting possibility of a reversal of the burden of proof. It is a precondition for this duty to ensure the "safety status" of the bottles that some form of reliable means of identifying already damaged bottles is both technically possible and economically reasonable for the defendants; while this can be assumed for the purposes of this appeal, it has so far not been adequately clarified. If there was such a duty of examination and report preservation, then if it was a hairline crack in the glass which caused the explosion of the bottle, it is to be assumed until the defendants have proved the contrary that the damage to the bottle existed already before it was put on the market by the defendants and could have been discovered through a proper inspection [reference omitted].

III. The judgment of the OLG must therefore be quashed and the issue returned to the OLG for a further hearing and decision. It is for the OLG to clarify—where necessary after having heard the parties once again and having taken the advice of an expert witness—whether the defendants could have prevented the explosion of the bottles in the hands of the consumer where the glass had been damaged, by taking reasonable measures in the context of the manufacture of the products (the lemonade) or, if this was neither possible nor reasonable, whether it could have ensured through appropriate and reasonable controls and report preservation that damaged bottles were not once more put on the market. In such a case the defendants, as the manufacturers, are required to prove that the absence of such controls and some means of securing the safety status of the products was irrelevant to the loss which occurred. If, however, at that time it could not be demanded of the defendants that they provide such a “safety status”, then the burden resulting from the unexplained cause of the damage will fall upon the plaintiff.

Case 65

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 19 NOVEMBER 1991

BGHZ 116, 104 = NJW 1992, 1039 = JZ 1993, 671

Facts

After the wedding breakfast held at the second defendant’s restaurant on 29 July 1989, the plaintiff and some of the 54 guests suffered from salmonella poisoning. Germs of salmonella enteritis were later found not only in the vanilla ice-cream but also in the pudding and custard prepared the previous evening by the first defendant and her daughter, who were found to be carriers of salmonella. The plaintiff claimed back the DM 3,000 she had paid the second defendant for the wedding feast; from both defendants she claimed damages for pain and suffering in the amount of DM 1,500 and a further DM 800 because the start of the honeymoon was delayed for four days by reason of the illness.

The Landgericht held both defendants jointly and severally liable for DM 1,500 as damages for pain and suffering, but rejected the rest of the claim. All parties appealed to the Oberlandesgericht, which ordered the second defendant to repay the DM 3,000 paid for the wedding feast, but rejected the rest of the claim. On the plaintiff’s appeal the decision rejecting the claim for damages for pain and suffering against the second defendant was vacated. The second defendant’s ancillary appeal was rejected.

Reasons

A. [Procedural.]

B. The court below dismissed the claim for damages for pain and suffering against both defendants.

It held that the first defendant was not liable under §§ 823 I, II BGB in conjunction with § 230 Criminal Code and/or § 8 LMBG for serving meals contaminated with salmonella, because the plaintiff could adduce no proof that the first defendant was at fault. According to the experts' reports, there were three ways the salmonella could have got into the pudding: from the hands of the salmonella-carriers, from the equipment used in making the pudding or from the ingredients used, especially the eggs. It could be neither proved nor disproved that the salmonella got into the pudding from the hands of the first defendant or her daughter. The rules regarding the burden of proof in cases of product liability did not affect the first defendant since she was not the owner of the restaurant. Nor did they affect the second defendant, since they are inapplicable to the owners of small family businesses, where proof of the subjective elements of delict is not particularly difficult: it is relatively simple to make a pudding and to understand how it is made. Furthermore, the plaintiff could sue the second defendant on the basis of the contract between them. The second defendant could not be made liable under § 831 BGB, for he had shown that he was free from fault as regards the conduct of his wife and daughter. As against this, the claim that the second defendant return the money paid for the wedding feast was allowed on the basis of § 635 BGB. The second defendant had failed to prove that neither he nor any of those who helped him perform the contract were responsible for the salmonella, for it was possible that his wife or daughter had been salmonella carriers before they started to prepare the pudding, and should therefore have washed their hands more carefully. Although there was nothing wrong with the rest of the meal and only a few of the guests were rendered ill, the entire sum paid could be reclaimed since the feast was to be regarded as a single event.

The court below rejected the claim for damages in respect of the lost honeymoon as not representing an economic loss.

II. The plaintiff's appeal.

1. The plaintiff's appeal from the dismissal of his claim for damages for pain and suffering against the second defendant is justified (a), but the court below was right to reject the similar claim against the first defendant (b).

(a) The second defendant's liability. The reasons given by the court below for denying the second defendant's liability for the immaterial harm suffered by the plaintiff are not good in law.

(aa) In providing food infected with salmonella, the second defendant as owner of the restaurant contributed to the injury to the plaintiff's health. Liability under §§ 823 I, 847 BGB must therefore be considered, as it was by the court below. It is a precondition of liability under these provisions that the defendant be chargeable with some fault. The burden of proof of fault normally lies on the victim, but in the area of product liability the Bundesgerichtshof has developed the exceptional principle that if a product is defective when he puts it into circulation the producer must establish and prove by evidence that he was not at fault as regards the defect in the product which harmed the consumer (BGHZ 51, 91 [103 ff.] = NJW 1969, 269; BGHZ 80, 186 [196 ff.] = NJW 1981, 1603). For the purposes of product liability the second defendant was unquestionably the producer of the meals prepared in his restaurant, so the application of this principle falls for consideration. This is not a case, to use Brügge-meier's words (VersR 1983, 116 ff.) of 'transferring the rules of product liability to the providers of services', for the wedding feast involved much more than the mere provision of services: services were indeed involved, but the main thing was the supply of the meals.

When the burden of proof in the area of product liability was first reversed in the so-called “chicken-pest” case (BGHZ 51, 91 = NJW 1969, 269), the Bundesgerichtshof took into account the evidentiary difficulty which a plaintiff normally faces in a suit against a manufacturer. The court based its reversal of the burden of proof on the fact that since the producer oversees the sphere of production and organises the production process and quality control, he is in much the better position (“näher dran”) to explain what actually happened and to bear the consequences of lack of proof. If the cause of the lack of explanation falls within the producer’s area of responsibility, it seems appropriate and fair under these decisions that he bear the risk of being unable to prove that he was not at fault (BGHZ 51, 91 [105] = NJW 1969, 269; for comparable conflicts of interests, see BGHZ 67, 383 [387] = NJW 1977, 501, etc.).

(bb) In the “chicken-pest” case, which certainly involved industrial production, the court deliberately left open the question whether the risk of inability to disprove fault should also be imposed on the owner of a small business—a family operation or one-man concern—where the methods of production are uncomplicated and simple to understand. In its judgment of 30 April 1991 (BGHZ 114, 284 = NJW 1991, 1948—Aids) the court again declined to decide whether the principle as to proof applies only to industrial mass production, but it did hold it applicable in a case where an infusion solution for use in a hospital became un-sterile either during or after the preparation (BGH NJW 1982, 699), and the Eighteenth Civil Senate of the Oberlandesgericht Frankfurt has applied it in a case, rather like the present, of a gypsy salad infected with salmonella in a restaurant (19 February 1979, VersR 1982, 151).

Writers are divided on the question, but by far the majority opinion is that in cases like the present, the burden of proof should be reversed [references]. This court is of the view that there is no compelling reason to exempt small businesses such as personally-run restaurants and cafés from the evidential burden.

The underlying idea which gave rise to this reversal of proof in cases of product liability, namely the consumer’s ignorance of how the producer manufactures his products or organises his business, is of general application, whether the business is big or small, the method of production industrial or personal. It is quite true that what happens in a family-run café is more easily understood than what goes on in a factory geared to mass production. It is also true, as the court below noted, that making a pudding is quite a simple operation calling for no specialist knowledge, comprehensible even by the injured customer. But that does not alter the fact that production takes place in the owner’s area of control, and that the restaurateur can monitor the process more easily than the customer. He is in the better position to discover and investigate sources of error. The consumer is an outsider who is normally in no position to know how individual dishes are prepared, what ingredients the patron uses or where he obtains them, nor can he tell what steps are taken to maintain hygiene in the kitchen. Given these considerations, it seems right and fair to put on the second defendant the burden of disproving fault.

This court is well aware that it may seem harsh to place the burden of proof on small businesses which cannot be expected to have the same facilities for control as a big industrial concern, but this difference is largely offset by the fact that it is much easier for the owner of a small business than for the manager of a large industrial concern to oversee its organisation, to discover any faults in the system of production and to adduce the necessary proof.

Another consideration is that there are no really satisfactory criteria for distinguishing sensibly between large and small and middle-sized businesses. To go by the number of employees would lead to capricious results, especially as there is often little relation between the size of the workforce and the structure of the enterprise. Indeed, in family and one-man businesses it is often immaterial whether any person outside the family is employed or not.

The Product Liability Act of 1 January 1990, based on principles applicable throughout the EC, does not draw any distinction between large and small businesses or make liability turn on whether the production is industrial or personal [references]. To draw such a distinction in claims for immaterial harm which are not covered by the Act and still fall under § 823 BGB would not be right.

(cc) The court below gave a further reason for not reversing the burden of proof in this case, namely that the plaintiff had a contractual claim against the “producer”. This is an error. The Bundesgerichtshof decided in the “Schwimmerschalter” case (BGHZ 67, 359 [362 f.] = NJW 1977, 379) that the reversal of the burden of proof is not excluded by the mere fact that consumer and producer were in contractual relations; to hold otherwise would lead to unacceptably capricious results, as it is often a matter of mere chance whether there is any contract between the victim and the producer, whether any contractual claim has prescribed (§§ 477, 638 BGB) or whether a contractual claim would be barred by an exclusion clause. Cases in the Supreme Court have consistently held that claims in contract and tort co-exist, each following its own rules (BGHZ 67, 359 [362] = NJW 1977, 379; BGHZ 86, 256 [258] = NJW 1983, 810). In the present case, the reversal of the burden of proof in tort cannot depend on whether the plaintiff or other wedding guests have contractual claims for damages against the second defendant.

The court below was therefore wrong to hold that the plaintiff had the burden of proving that the second defendant failed to show the care required by the circumstances. It should rather have inquired whether the second defendant had managed to exculpate himself.

(dd) The mere fact that the food provided for the wedding guests was infected with salmonella does not of itself demonstrate any fault on the part of the second defendant. As has been said, the court below was unable to determine how the salmonella got into the pudding and custard, in which it was undoubtedly present, whether from the eggs or some other source. In particular, it is not known whether or not the first defendant and her daughter were already carriers of salmonella when they prepared the pudding. Infection from the kitchen equipment, according to the court below, “could be ruled out”, but there is the possibility that the salmonella got into the pudding from ingredients bought in by the second defendant.

In such a case, what matters is what steps the second defendant took to ensure a properly hygienic method of preparation. On this point the court below found, in connection with another matter, that the second defendant had exculpated himself, and the appellant does not question this. But the court below did not advert to the precautions taken by the second defendant to minimise the use of tainted ingredients, or ask what checks the patron of a restaurant should make on the products he buys in. The duties imposed on the producer and retailer of food products are onerous (constant holding, see BGHSt 2, 384 etc.), but only within the limits of what is possible for the defendant. A small business cannot be treated just like a large one (references). This does not relieve the small café proprietor of responsibility towards his guests: if with the means at his disposal he cannot ensure that the food he serves is wholesome, then he may have to stop serving it. In general, however, if he obtains his supplies from a reliable source, he need go in for quality control only when on the particular facts a test is called for. This matter requires further elucidation on remand.

(b) Liability of the first defendant. The plaintiff's appeal from the dismissal of his claim for damages for pain and suffering against the first defendant must fail.

(aa) The first defendant cannot be made liable under § 823 I BGB because the plaintiff cannot prove that she was at all at fault in preparing the infected pudding. The mere fact that it was infected does not establish fault. Nor is the burden of proof reversed against the first defendant since she did not own the restaurant and therefore was not the "producer" of the noxious sweet. Only the owner is affected by such reversal: it does not apply to subordinate employees, nor even to all managers, but only to those whose role and position in the firm is such that they can be seen as its representative [references], especially those with a capital stake in the business, such as partners (see BGH NJW 1975, 1827).

(bb) Nor can the first defendant be made liable under § 823 II BGB in relation to § 21 8 no. 1 of the Food Act. Not only is it doubtful whether she can be said to have "produced" the pudding, but there was no proof of fault, as the court below was right to find. The appellant blames the defendant for not using a recipe which would have heated the pudding to over 75 degrees and thus have killed all the germs. This does not establish fault. Like the court below, we can leave aside the question whether the risk of salmonella poisoning makes it obligatory for cafés to heat puddings above 75 degrees, for in view of the possibility that the dishes in which the pudding was placed were infected by the hands of the defendant or her daughter, it was not shown that cooking the pudding as recommended by experts would have prevented the spread of the salmonella. Contrary to the view of the appellant, the fact that there was a breach of § 8 Food Act does not imply any negligence on the part of the second defendant. The decisions do hold that where a protective law has been infringed, it is usually for the defendant to assert and prove facts which repel an inference of negligence (BGHZ 51, 91 [103 ff.] = NJW 1969, 269; BGH VersR 1967, 685; BGH NJW 1985, 1774 = VersR 1985, 452, 453), but this only applies when the protective law is so detailed in its prescriptions that one can properly infer that there must have been negligence (BGH VersR 1984, 270 [271]). If the protective law merely prohibits a stated injurious result, the mere fact that such a result occurs is no indication of negligence.

That is the situation here. § 8 Food Act simply forbids the preparation and circulation of noxious food products. It contains no detailed prescriptions of conduct whose neglect might indicate fault, so one cannot infer any fault on the part of the second defendant from the mere fact of the infraction. It follows that the plaintiff must adduce full proof of the intentional or negligent failure by the first defendant to take the precautions required by the circumstances.

2. The appellant must also fail in her appeal against the rejection of her claim for damages for the delay to the honeymoon. The court below was right to deny that this constituted economic harm. As this court held in BGHZ 86, 212 = NJW 1983, 1107, the pleasure of a holiday foregone owing to personal injury is not to be commercialised, though it may be taken into account as an element of damages for pain and suffering . . .

Case 66

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 9 MAY 1995
BGHZ 129, 353 = NJW 1995, 2162 = JZ 1995, 1060

Facts

The defendant bottled and distributed carbonated mineral water in returnable glass bottles, either “standard spring-water bottles” or bottles of thicker glass and different shape. On 27 June 1990 the plaintiff, then nine years old, was fetching two bottles of the latter type from the cellar of her parents’ house. She had placed them on the floor outside the cellar in order to close the door and was about to pick them up when one of the bottles exploded. Splinters of glass entered her left eye and caused serious injuries which despite an operation reduced her sight to 60 per cent and left her with astigmatism.

When bottles were to be refilled in the defendant’s factory the following process took place. Cases of empties were put on rollers and carried to a conveyor belt, where the bottles, still in the cases, were visually inspected by two of the defendant’s operatives, whose job it was to discard any intrusive or damaged bottles. Then a grab armed with rubber bulbs picked up the bottles, three at a time, and transported them to the washing point, where they were repeatedly sprayed with water. On leaving the washing point, still on the conveyor belt, they were inspected again visually by another employee. They then passed through the bottle-inspection unit, an electronically-operated machine which passed a beam of light through the base and mouth of each bottle, and if this disclosed any damage in those parts, the bottle was discarded. There was then a further visual inspection before the conveyor belt carried the bottles to the filling station. Before entering the filling station they were subjected to yet another visual inspection, and then entered the pressure chamber, where they were subjected to a pressure of 5 bar, a pressure one-third greater than would be exerted by the contents of the bottle once filled. On leaving the pressure chamber the bottles were filled, visually checked once again, and then labelled. The conveyor belt then carried them to the packing station where rubber grips lifted them and placed them in cases for consignment. About 15,000 bottles per hour were processed in this manner.

The plaintiff, relying on the report of the national materials laboratory in D which he put in evidence, maintained that there was a fault in the glass at the site of the fracture—a chip about 4 mm. broad, which may well have existed at the time the bottle was delivered.

For her pain and suffering the plaintiff claimed an appropriate capital sum plus monthly instalments of DM 500. She also claimed a declaration that the defendant was bound to make good to her any material loss she might suffer as a result of the accident on 27 May 1990, except in so far as her claims may have vested in third parties.

Both lower courts dismissed her claim. Her appeal was now allowed.

Reasons

The court below, whose decision is published in VersR 1995, 103, accepted the evidence that explosions of glass bottles filled with carbonated water are always due to damage to the surface of the bottle, and that spontaneous explosions occur through the spread of a very fine hairline crack. The very slightest physical contact, even, under certain circumstances, that of a warm hand, may be enough to cause the bottle to break. The court below held that in this case the bottle had such a hairline crack in it and that the defendant should have withdrawn it during the production process, but that it was at fault in failing to do so and letting the bottle get into circulation. Accordingly the precondition of a claim for damages for pain and suffering, namely that the defendant have been culpably in breach of a duty of care towards the public, was not satisfied. The explosive bottle was one which unavoidably “got away” despite the exercise of all appropriate precautions. Certainly before a manufacturer puts into circulation a product which entails particular risks he must take every care to make sure that it has no defect. But the defendant’s techniques of quality control were, according to the experts, up to the state of the art, and no system of control could absolutely ensure that no bottle with a hairline crack left the factory. According to the experts there was an irreducible residual risk in refilling glass bottles, and this case was an instance of it.

The court below was also of the view that the defendant was not liable for the future material loss of the plaintiff under the Product Liability Law of 15 Dec. 1989 (BGBI. I, 2198), since it followed from the reasons given for dismissing the claim in tort that in the current state of scientific and technical knowledge the defect in the bottle could not have been detected (II no. 5).

The appellant’s criticisms of the judgment below are justified.

1. The court below was wrong to dismiss the plaintiff’s claim for damages for her material harm under 1 of the Product Liability Law.

(a) The plaintiff rightly objects on procedural grounds to the finding that there was a hairline crack in the bottle, which exploded in the plaintiffs’ hand. There was no basis for such a finding. The plaintiff’s case was that there was a 4 mm. chip off the surface of the bottle, and this was confirmed by the report from the national materials laboratory in D which was put in evidence. The report was to the effect that this fault, which could have arisen shortly before the bottle broke, was the direct cause of the explosion. Furthermore V stated in his expert testimony that the explosion could be assumed to have occurred at the place of the fault. If so, the bottle had at the time of the accident a defect, which caused the bottle to explode.

If it was by reason of the chipping that the bottle exploded, then the defendant is liable for the consequent material harm to the plaintiff under 1 I (1) of the Product Liability Law. Liability could only be avoided if the defendant could prove (1 IV (2)) that at the time the bottle was put into circulation it did not have the defect, which caused the damage (1 II (2)). No such proof was adduced by the defendant in this case. It asserted only, by reference to the expert opinion of C, its production manager, that if the bottle had been chipped when it was in the factory, it would have exploded in the pressure chamber, an assertion which does not exclude the possibility that the bottle was chipped after being filled but while it was still in the defendant’s sphere of influence and risk.

On such facts there would be no room for the defence under 1 II no. 5 of the Product Liability Law: there is no difficulty in detecting such a chip.

(b) But even if, as the court below evidently supposed, the bottle broke not in the area of the chip but elsewhere, by reason of a hairline crack, it was still no defence to a claim under 1 I (1) of the Law that the current state of science and technology did not permit the defect to be detected.

(aa) As the court below rightly held, a product is defective under 3 I of the Law if it does not afford the safety which in all the circumstances can justifiably be expected, and consumers expect soda water bottles to be free from faults such as hairline splits and microfissures which could make them explode. The consumer's expectation that the bottle be free from faults would not be diminished even if it were technically impossible to identify and remove such faults. The presence of such a hairline crack constitutes, as the court below rightly held, a manufacturing fault, even if it is one which "got away". (see BGHZ 51, 91 [105] = NJW 1969, 269—the "chicken-pest" case).

(bb) Manufacturing defects which "get away" do not, simply because they cannot be avoided by any proper precautions, constitute defects unascertainable in the current state of scientific or technical knowledge in the sense of Art. 7(e) of the Directive or of 1 II no. 5 of the Law which transposes the Directive into German law.

The purpose of the rule in both instances is merely to exclude liability for what are termed development risks [references to literature]; the term covers only cases where at the time a product was put into circulation none of the means offered by the current state of science and technology rendered it possible to detect its dangerous quality. [More references]. The strict liability of the producer is to be limited by what is objectively possible in the light of the knowledge of risks available at the time the product is put into circulation. [Reference]. The only dangers to be treated as development risks are dangers inherent in the design and construction of the product, which in the current state of technology could not be avoided, not those that were inevitable at the stage of production. When the EC Directive on product liability was being fashioned it was agreed that the defence under art. 7 (e) should apply not to manufacturing defects, but only to defects of design and construction [references], and the only dangers emanating from a product which the German legislator wished to exempt from the scope of the Product Liability Law were dangers, undetectable even with the exercise of all possible care, arising at the stage of design and construction. Liability is to be excluded "only if the potential danger of the product was unrecognisable by reason of the fact that at the time of circulation it was not yet possible to recognise it" [official explanation (Gesetzeserläuterung) of the draft Product Liability Law]. It is no longer a defence to this strict liability that the defective product "got away".

The potential danger of returnable glass bottles filled with carbonated liquids has long been recognised and has indeed frequently engaged the courts [references]. As the lower court found, the danger of such glass bottles lies in the fact that even a tiny hairline crack which spreads can cause it to explode. Such a defect may arise at the stage of filling or pre-exist unnoticed, but in neither case is it a fault of design or construction, so liability in respect of it cannot be excluded under 1 II (5) of the Product Liability Law. In such a case the liability of the producer under 1 I (1) of the Law can only be avoided if it appears that the hairline crack was not in the bottle when it had been refilled and put into circulation. No such proof has been adduced by the defendant.

(c) There is no need to refer the matter to the Court of Justice of the European Communities. It is true that the concept of “the state of science and technology” in 1 II no. 5 of the Product Liability Law comes from Art. 7 (e) of the EC Directive and must be interpreted in a similar manner in all member states [reference]. It is also true that if the interpretation of a concept of community law is in issue the court of last resort in a member state must in principle refer the matter to the Court of Justice (Art. 177 II EC). But in the present case there is no occasion to construe the concept of “the state of science”. The question is rather whether and how far the German legislator has utilised the freedom allowed by Art. 15 I (b) of the Directive to deviate from Art. 7(b) and make the producer liable, and this is a question for the national courts. Indeed, even where a concept in a Directive is in issue, a reference to the Court of Justice is required only if its interpretation is disputed in the literature or the case-law [reference] or if the court wishes on a point material to the case to deviate from the holding of the Court of Justice (see BVerfG NJW 1988, 2173). Neither of these is the case here.

2. The appellant is also right to criticise the court below for rejecting her claim in tort for damages for pain and suffering.

(a) The court below correctly held that on the question whether a particular defect, such as the chip or hairline crack in this case, arose or even remained undiscovered while it was in the producer’s sphere of responsibility the burden of proof can be reversed if the producer was in breach of his Befundsicherungspflicht, his duty to ascertain the condition of his product and correct it if defective (BGHZ 104, 323 [330]; BGH NJW 1993, 528). [See note, below.] It also rightly held that users of returnable bottles are bound to have a control system which so far as is possible and reasonable in the light of the latest technology checks the condition of every bottle and takes out of circulation any bottles which might be dangerous.

(b) The court below concluded that in this case the defendant had fulfilled its Befundsicherungspflicht, but there are procedural objections to the way in which it reached its conclusion.

(aa) Despite the appellant’s complaint, there was no need for the court below to inquire whether the defendant excluded bottles which had been in prolonged use, since even if such a duty was broken, the breach was not causative of the harm in issue. The evidence of the national materials laboratory in D was that the general condition of the bottle that exploded indicated that it had been used relatively infrequently. So the court below could properly suppose that the defendant was not in breach of its Befundsicherungspflicht for failing to remove from circulation, on the ground of its prior use, the bottle which injured the plaintiff.

(bb) But the court below failed to obtain the further expert opinion demanded by the plaintiff on the question whether the pressure of only 5 bar in the chamber through which the bottles were passed prior to being refilled was adequate. This was a procedural lapse (references) which the plaintiff is right to criticise. The particular reason for obtaining such a report in this case is that standard spring-water bottles, which are made of thinner glass than the bottle which injured the plaintiff, are exposed to a pressure of 5,5 to 6 bar, and even this is inadequate to exclude all bottles which are apt to explode (reference). In principle the extra thickness of the bottle in question may have increased the resistance of the glass (reference), as is indeed indicated by the defendant's assertion that 25 bar was needed to make their bottles explode. The court below should therefore have called for direct evidence on the question whether the pressure chosen by the defendant for its bottles of thicker glass was adequate to produce the desired effect of excluding damaged bottles. It was not bound to raise the pressure so high as to cause all bottles with hairline cracks to explode, for the precautions which a defendant must take in order to avoid a reversal of the burden of proof need not totally exclude the chance of explosion of bottles when handled by the consumer: it is enough if they would significantly reduce the risk of this happening (reference).

(cc) The court below was also wrong to ignore the plaintiff's evidence that the production methods used by the defendant and its system of control were inadequate to disclose existing defects such as the possible chipping of the bottle in question.

Having found that the defendant's electronic bottle inspection unit could recognise a blemish only if it was apparent at the base or neck of the bottle, the court should not have been satisfied by the expert opinion of V. that it would be impossible to construct a machine which could detect other faults. As this court has already held (NJW 1993, 528) a mineral water company's Befundsicherungspflicht requires it to provide a control system which reveals the condition of every single bottle and guarantees, within the limits of what is technically feasible, that dubious bottles are not reused. This does not mean that it is enough for the company to use the best possible machinery in its control procedures. If defects in bottles undetectable by machinery could be seen by human beings, the company is under a duty to arrange for a visual inspection of every single bottle. Here the defendant admittedly had the bottles inspected visually several times both before and after they were filled, but it is not clear that every bottle was so inspected, especially as during the first inspection the bottles were still in cases, and the two inspectors had to remove not only damaged bottles but also those of a different sort. Again, seeing that the throughput was 15,000 bottles per hour the subsequent inspectors had to check four bottles every second, and to check them not only for faults but also to see that they were clean, duly filled and properly labelled: it is highly unlikely that they could be expected to discover all possible faults, including a chip only a few millimetres in size.

III. This being so, the decision below must be reversed. The plaintiff's claim for material harm is ripe for final decision. The evidence shows that the explosion which damaged the plaintiff was due either to a chip or to a hairline crack, both of which are defects under 3 of the Product Liability Law so that the defendant is liable under 1 for all material harm and the declaration sought can be made. There is no case for restricting the quantum of damages since the harm suffered by the plaintiff falls below even the individual limit under 10 I of the Law.

The plaintiff's claim for damages for pain and suffering must be reheard and decided afresh.

In the further proceedings the following must be noted. Should the court accept that the bottle was chipped, as the plaintiff claims, and the question is whether the chipping occurred during carriage or within the parents' sphere of control and responsibility, this would be a matter for the defendant to prove if it emerged that it was in breach of its Befundsicherungspflicht. If the defendant cannot discharge that burden, it will be liable even if the explosion was not due to the chip but to a hairline crack elsewhere in the bottle: its failure to keep the bottle out of circulation would constitute a cause of the injury, and damage due to its exploding because of a hairline crack would fall within its area of responsibility since the exclusion of bottles with external damage helps protect consumers from injury through explosion. Should it transpire that the bottle was not chipped but that the explosion was due to a tiny hairline crack invisible to the human eye somewhere else on the bottle, then if the defendant has fulfilled its Befundsicherungspflicht by having adequate pressure in the pressure chamber and keeping the bottle exposed to it for long enough, it will not be liable for the plaintiff's pain and suffering.

Case 67

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 12 DECEMBER 2000
NJW 2001, 964 = ZIP 2001, 379 = JZ 2001, 711

Facts

The claimant, who was born on 31 August 1982, claims compensation on the ground that his milk teeth "bite" was destroyed. This was because a child tea product made by the former first defendant had been supplied to him for the first two years of his life by a plastic feeding bottle which this defendant sold with the tea without the necessary warnings.

In 1985 dentists told the claimant's mother that his tooth damage could be due to the tea. In the autumn of 1993 she was referred to the relevant local health insurance scheme about the possibility of a claim. She then took legal advice.

The claim, lodged on 4 January 1996, sought compensation from the former first defendant and from its leading employees sued as the second to the sixth defendants. The claimant considers these latter defendants are jointly responsible (partly as members of the board of directors and partly as authorised signatories, departmental managers etc) for the development, production and sale of the children's tea and for consequential breach of duties in liability law to consumers.

The Landgericht rejected the claim on the basis of a limitation defence. The claimant's appeal was unsuccessful. He withdrew his appeal in law against the first defendant, but is pursuing it against the second to sixth defendants.

Reasons

I. The appeal court considers—in agreement with the Landgericht—that the claims made in the statement of claim are time barred. The three year limitation period in § 852 of the BGB had begun to run from 1 January 1986 at the latest. The claims had therefore become time barred on 31 December 1988 as no interruption of the limitation period took place within the permitted time.

The claimant's mother—according to the relevant indications given by the dentists giving treatment—had had the necessary knowledge, at any rate by the end of 1985, of the fact that the consumption of children's tea and the manner of its administration had caused the tooth damage. Since this time it had also been possible for her to know that the first defendant as manufacturer of the tea and marketer of the feeding bottles fell to be considered as a tortfeasor. But in fact the mother was completely unaware that the claimant, as a person suffering harm, could have looked to the defendants for compensation. However, this circumstance did not prevent the running of the limitation period. This was because the running of the period would not be delayed until the time when the person suffering harm or his legal representative had legal knowledge that he had a claim to compensation. If, on the other hand, he had no knowledge at all of a possible claim to compensation and if this lack of knowledge formed the hindrance to obtaining knowledge of the tortfeasors, the running of the limitation period would begin with the knowledge of the harm. . .

2. The judgment of the appeal court (which is no longer the object of the appeal in law proceedings) that possible claims by the claimant against the first defendant as producer and seller of the children's tea and the feeding bottle were time barred has no legal effects on the claims which now still remain against the other defendants. The appeal in law correctly alludes to the fact that the prerequisites for the running of the limitation period and the expiry of the limitation period are to be tested independently for each defendant.

(a) The beginning of the running of the limitation period is dependent, according to § 852 (1) of the BGB, on the knowledge of the person suffering harm not only of the harm but also of the identity of the person obliged to compensate. If several people are to be considered as tortfeasors, the beginning of the limitation period is to be determined as against each of these persons who are possibly liable according to the point in time when the person suffering harm has obtained knowledge of the identity of the tortfeasor concerned (references omitted). Accordingly the limitation period can, in relation to several persons obliged to compensate, begin and end at different points in time, even if they are simultaneously responsible for the same harm arising out of the same event.

(b) Contrary to the view of the reply to the appeal in law, the position is no different in this respect when the several persons coming under consideration as responsible under a duty to compensate are on the one hand an undertaking (carried on in the form of a legal person) and on the other hand persons who are its organs or (managing) employees, for whom the undertaking has to assume liability under § 31 of the BGB or § 831 of the BGB. The employee liable according to § 823 (1) of the BGB and the proprietor of the business who is responsible for him according to § 831 of the BGB are joint debtors to the person suffering the harm (§ 840 of the BGB) just as much as the legal person liable under § 31 of the BGB and its directly responsible organ in tort are (reference omitted). Consequently a claim can only become time barred against the joint debtor as to whom each of the prerequisites are established (§ 425 (2) of the BGB). The personal responsibility of the person who acts directly tortiously exists not only in the case of § 831 of the BGB but also in the framework of liability for organs under § 31 of the BGB as separate and independent liability beside that of the undertaking (see for the case of the director of a company [references omitted]); here also automatic parallel treatment of the prerequisites for limitation does not come into consideration.

3. The limitation period for possible claims by the claimant against the second to sixth defendants could therefore only begin to run from the point in time from which the claimant (or his mother who was entitled to care for him) had the necessary knowledge in relation to the identity of these persons who were possibly liable to compensate. He or she would therefore have to know their names, addresses and the nature of their work in the business in each case (references omitted). Even for the organ of a legal person, responsibility in tort law for injury to the legal interests of third parties can in fact depend to a considerable extent on the division of competences and work in the business (references omitted).

The appeal court made no findings at all on the question of the date from which the claimant's mother had the knowledge about the second to sixth defendants which was necessary in this respect. There is nothing evident which indicates that this could have been the case earlier than three years before the filing of the claim.

4. It has to be admitted in favour of the reply to the appeal in law that exceptionally—following the legal concept of § 162 of the BGB—the limitation period can also begin in the sense of § 852 (1) of the BGB if the person suffering harm did not positively possess a state of knowledge which would trigger the running of the period, but certainly had the opportunity of obtaining the necessary knowledge in a reasonable way and without significant difficulty (references omitted). But this only applies when the person suffering harm effectively closes his eyes in the face of unavoidable knowledge and neglects to take advantage of a more or less obvious opportunity for knowledge so that an appeal to lack of knowledge appears to be mere formalism because any other person in the position of the person who has suffered harm would have had the knowledge under the same concrete circumstances (references omitted).

It is not possible to assume such a case, not even in relation to those defendants who at the point in time of the harm were not only managing employees but members of the board of directors of the former first defendant. No grounds at all can be deduced from the findings which have been made for saying that the claimant's mother could at any time have discovered the names, addresses and areas of competence of the members of the board of directors coming under consideration for liability in the present context in a manner so simple and obvious to everyone that reliance on the absence of knowledge could appear to be impermissible. This would apply especially in relation to those defendants who—without being members of the board of directors—were engaged in the production and sale of tea products as departmental managers or authorised signatories.

5. It is to be deduced from the judgment on appeal that the appeal court did not consider findings about the actual knowledge of the identity of the second to sixth defendants as persons under a duty to compensate to be necessary on legal grounds, because the claimant's mother simply did not know that the claimant as the person suffering harm could have looked to these defendants for compensation. The appeal court takes the view that the limitation period would begin to run immediately on knowledge of the harm when the person suffering harm had no knowledge at all of a possible claim to compensation and this absence of knowledge constituted the hindrance to obtaining knowledge of the persons causing harm. The appeal in law successfully contests these arguments.

The view of the appeal court cannot be supported by the decision of the Bundesgerichtshof of the 17th March 1966 (reference omitted) cited in the appeal judgment on this issue. That judgment takes into account the fact that in the area of § 852 of the BGB also the legal maxim that absence of knowledge of the law always and in all circumstances causes pre-judice does not apply without exception. In particular it does not apply when the absence of knowledge of legal maxims and principles forms the hindrance to knowing the identity of the person obliged to compensate. It would admittedly work to the disadvantage of the person suffering harm if the identity of the person obliged to compensate was actually known and nothing was lacking for the making of the claim to compensation other than the knowledge of the legal norm which permitted proceeding against the tortfeasor. From these principles, it follows for the present case:

If the claimant's mother had actually known the names and addresses of the second to sixth defendants and their business positions, it would not have been relevant to the running of the limitation period that she had refrained from making a claim to compensation through lack of legal knowledge. But so long as she did not know the names, addresses and positions of these defendants (and this has to be assumed here, in the absence of contrary findings for the period up to three years before the lodging of the claim), the situation is still that the limitation period did not begin to run through lack of the required knowledge of the identity of the person causing the harm. In such a state of affairs it has no legal effect whether or not the person suffering the harm had the necessary legal knowledge for the pursuit of possible claims. § 852 (1) of the BGB makes the beginning of the limitation period dependent on the required knowledge of the facts; if this is lacking, no hypothetical conclusions can be drawn as to how the person suffering the harm—on whatever grounds—would have behaved if he had had the knowledge.

Notes to Cases 61–67

1. Traffic accidents, product liability, medical malpractice: this surely must be the trilogy of tort subjects that attracts most attention these days—at any rate in terms of volume of litigation. (The trilogy would be a tetralogy but for the fact that “accidents at work” have in some systems (e.g. French, German, and to some extent in the USA) effectively been removed from the province of the law of tort. See chapter 3 section A.3., below). The practical importance of these topics is indisputable—though the first two provide some of the most often litigated. The theoretical importance of these subjects is also considerable as attested by the fact that much of the modern economic analysis of tort law has grown from the academic works dealing with these two areas of tort law. The economic point is already obvious in the pioneering judgment of Traynor J. in Escola v. Coca-Cola Bottling Co. of Fresno 150 P. 2d 436 (Cal.1944); and, nearly thirty years later, it also became a central theme in such celebrated and controversial books as Calabresi's The Costs of Accidents (1970). And as if all this were not enough, product liability sits uneasily on the boundary between contract and tort, in a way which makes the traditional strict dichotomy of these two parts of the law of obligations look more than usually questionable.

Not surprisingly the literature on the subject is enormous. In the US, in addition to the two major treatises of Hursh and Bailey, American Law of Products Liability (1974) and Furmer and Friedman's Products Liability (rev. edn., 1974) (both of which have regularly published supplements) the subject receives particular attention in all the textbooks. Thus Franklin and Rabin, 473–587 (a particularly good section of this excellent case-book); Epstein, 611–729 ff.; Henderson and Pearson, 707–841; Posner, 633 ff.; and Prosser, Wade and Schwartz, 696–852 (a most systematic and informative account). Outside the US the literature is poorer but growing. Waddams's Products Liability (Toronto, 1974) is a doctrinally interesting but now somewhat dated monograph. Fischer and Powers, Products Liability: Cases and Materials contains much material and thoughtful comments and questions. Miller and Lovell's Products Liability (Toronto, 1977) was, until recently, the only monograph in English law but Professor Stapleton's, Product Liability (1994) can now claim to contain one of the most doctrinally interesting accounts of this subject. Markesinis and Deakin, Tort Law (4th edn. 1999) gives an account of the contract and tort solutions of English law and also cites further literature, while Miller's Product Liability and Safety Encyclopedia (1979) addresses itself more to the practitioner (while also quoting many of the European proposals). The German law is discussed in chapter 2, section A.4(c), above, where one can find extensive bibliographical references to German literature. The cases reproduced here must, therefore, be read in close conjunction with the above and these notes are, for reasons of space, kept to a minimum.

2. In this area of the law more than in others, the student of German law will be irresistibly tempted to make comparisons with developments in the US. Many reasons can be adduced to explain this.

First, it is a matter of fact that German academics have used American law quite extensively in their writing in this area of tort law. The interest first manifested itself in the early 1930s when the great Ernst Rabel encouraged two of his most brilliant students—Kessler (subsequently Professor at the Yale Law School) and Wahl—to take note of the emerging American doctrines (Die Fahrlässigkeit im nordamerikanischen Deliktsrecht (1932) and Vertragsansprüche Dritter im französischen Recht (1935) published in vols. 6 and 9 of the Beiträge zum ausländischen und internationalen Privatrecht). By the 1960s this approach received further impetus—with the work of Professor Lorenz (in Festschrift Nottarp (1961), 59) leading the way—as the belief grew that the richness of American law might be of use to the emerging German law of product liability (Lorenz's many articles on the subject clearly show this influence). The American influence on current European proposals for law reform is also noticeable.

A second reason which invites comparison between German and American (but not English) law is the willingness of both systems to experiment with contractual notions and devices in an attempt to satisfy the ever-growing demands of modern consumers. Thus contractual experiments are discussed in case 43 and the concepts used are explained chapter 2, section A.4(c), above. This leading case may—to the approval of most commentators—have turned attention away from contract to tort; but contractual solutions—especially in the form of “implied warranties” are still alive as case 45 shows. This use of contract, on occasion, offered procedural and substantive advantages to plaintiffs; and it may still provide the better answer in certain cases of damage to the product (i.e. cases of purely economic loss). Cf. on this the decision of the US Supreme Court in East River SS Corp. v. Transamerica Delaval 476 US 858, 106 S. Ct. 2295, and decisions nos. 68–75. But it also has its drawbacks when physical injury or property damage is involved as the Americans discovered after Henningsen (Henningsen v. Bloomfield Motors, Inc. 161 A. 2d 69 (N.J.1960)). See Greenman v. Yuba Power Prods, Inc., 377 P. 2d 897 (Cal.1963).

3. Treating the ultimate purchaser as a third-party beneficiary—as case 63, BGHZ 75, 75, does—can also involve an obvious fiction (see Traynor's remarks in the Escola case, above). But such fictions are impossible in English law where contractual warranties in the absence of any privity and contracts in favour of third parties have been denounced (until recently at any rate) as a result of a rigid adherence to the doctrine of consideration. If such notions were known to English law they would explain in a satisfactory manner cases like Junior Books Ltd. v. Veitchi Co. Ltd. [1983] AC 520, and avoid some of the problems created by that decision (cf. Weir, A Casebook on Tort (5th edn., 1983), 33–4); but to treat the ultimate consumer as a third-party beneficiary of the contract between the manufacturer and the wholesaler or retailer would involve an impossible stretching of that notion (Weir, op. cit., 21).

On the other hand, American law, which has freed itself from the shackles of consideration, accepts the notion of warranty without privity; and section 2–318 of the UCC (reproduced below) expressly authorises such contractually flavoured actions. As we shall see, its use is considerable where the damage is to the product and the usual tort remedies are not (according to the prevailing view) appropriate or available. By means of a short digression, it is also worth noting that the French law of products liability was, for many years, based largely on the extension of the original contractual action between seller and buyer to cover even the ultimate purchaser. (On this see J Ghestin, Conformité et garanties dans la vente (1983) and the earlier contributions of Professors Ghestin and Viney in La responsabilité des fabricants et distributeurs, collection of essays published by Economica (1975).) The national legislation that has been inspired by the European Directive has now, of course, based liability in tort.

4. The comparison of German and American law also reveals some differences. Some, e.g. the use of civil juries, the contingent fee system of remuneration of attorneys, the absence of a developed welfare system, the role of the pro-plaintiff bar and judiciary (on which, inter alia, see Neely, The Product Liability Mess (1988))—may account for larger awards and increased litigation. (John Fleming's The American Tort Process (1988) admirably explains how the institutional framework in the USA has influenced the development of American tort law and made it so different from English law.) Others, concerning warning notices, for example, are on questions of emphasis in degree. Yet others may be more apparent than real. In this group one could place the discussions about the nature of liability. For, as we have seen in German law, it was, until recently, fault-based liability and not, as now provided by the American Restatement (Second), Torts § 402A (reproduced below), strict liability. In one sense it is churlish to minimise this difference between the two systems since some German writers (e.g. Kötz) have argued that the reluctance of German law to acknowledge openly a risk-based liability can only help increase costs and complicate matters in an area of the law which is in any event not known for its simplicity. On the other hand even Kötz admits that the burden of proof cast by German law is a probatio diabolica, in effect making this a strict liability subject. And in the USA there is by no means unanimity that the introduction of strict liability has led to a decrease in the complexity of product liability litigation. See Ver Steeg, "Strict Liability and Judicial Resources" 3 J. Legal Studies 217 (1974). Moreover, in practice, negligence and strict liability are almost always pleaded in the alternative in a way that would make it a mistake to assert that strict liability has completely displaced the older rules of negligence. See Rheingold, "Proof of Defect in Product Liability Cases" 38 Tenn. L. Rev. 325 (1971). (The main advantage for the plaintiff of winning the case on negligence rather than on strict liability is, of course, that he is entitled to claim huge punitive damages.)

5. Traditionally, in product liability cases the victim had to prove that the defect in the product which was the cause of the injury arose in the producer's organisational area, before the product left the defendant's factory. Case 66 (BGH NJW 1995, 2162) lowers further the hurdle for the victim. For in that case the BGH alleviated this difficult burden of proof by imposing on the defendant a Befundsicherungspflicht. This means that there is a presumption that the defect arose in the producer's organisational area unless he can prove that he took all possible and requisite measures of quality control to ensure that the product was free from defects. The term Befundsicherungspflicht has perplexed some commentators. Literally it signifies a duty to keep a record of the results of an investigation, such as a doctor's note of his diagnosis, a meaning quite appropriate to its function of reversing the burden of proof in cases where the defendant can adduce relevant evidence more easily than the claimant. But the term is here used to mean a duty not just to ascertain the condition of the product but also to correct it if faulty, i.e. effectively to operate an extremely good system of quality control. As the BGH said in another case: "The producer's duty to ascertain and assure the result of the investigation is neither a duty to "keep a record of the evidence", nor a (non-existent) duty of documentation. In this context Befundsicherung applies to all bottles being reused, not in the sense of making a list of the results of checking each bottle, but rather in the sense of establishing and operating a control procedure which permits the ascertainment of the physical condition of each bottle and ensures that, so far as technically possible, all bottles which are in any way faulty are kept out of further use." (BGH NJW 1993, 529.) Finally, one should note that the device is necessary only where a claim is brought for pain and suffering under the BGB (§ 847 BGB). The Directive, and the laws which implement it, make it clear that it is for the defendant to prove that the established defect was not present in the product when it was put into circulation. (Interesting is also the restrictive reading given to § 1 II Nr. 5 ProdHaftG—Article 7e of the Directive: the exclusion for some defects that could not be avoided according to the present state of science was limited to defects in the design of the product but did not apply to defects in its construction, Ausreißer).

6. Case 67 (BGH NJW 2001, 964) could be seen as a sequel to the "baby bottle" cases. In these cases the sugary content of the baby bottle caused tooth decay when the bottle was used regularly and for longer periods of time. The BGH (JZ 1995, 902) required that crystal clear warning notes had to be attached to the product if liability was to be avoided. It also held a company liable which, although being in fact a retailer, could nevertheless be treated as if it were the producer of the product since it was the exclusive retailer (so-called Quasi-Hersteller) of this product (Milupa AG in that case). The decision highlights a different aspect of product liability. As was explained in chapter 2, section A.4(c) the codal provisions, unlike the Directive, do not adequately reflect that the duties imposed in the context of product liability are primarily addressed to the manufacturer and not to the individual employee or manager. Thus, the process of production has to be organised in such a way as to ensure that dangerous products are not put into circulation. Clearly, it is impossible for an individual employee to comply with these requirements. Against this background the interesting question arises whether employees can, nevertheless, be held liable. For the reason already given, the BGH used to reject such a possibility. (See e.g. BGH ZIP 1987, 1260.) However, in BGH NJW 1992, 1039 (case 65) the court, arguably, established two new principles. First the rules of product liability (Produzentenhaftung) under § 823 I BGB, (namely the reversed burden of proof for a deficient organisation of the production process) apply also to minor companies—in this instance, a catering company. Secondly, and this is important in the present context, it held that an employee could also be liable if the defect occurred in his sphere of responsibility. This was a qualified liability in so far as the burden of proof for fault was not reversed for the employee (the chef of the catering company in that case). In BGH NJW 2001, 964 the court confirmed this line of reasoning in respect of an employee (who had a higher position in the company) and the management without clarifying the exact conditions of their liability. The decision, although highly legalistic in tone, is nevertheless noteworthy for two reasons that are not immediately apparent from its wording. First of all the external liability of employees of a company is not self-evident. (Cf. Brüggemeier ZIP 2001, 381, with references, who suggests that such liability should be subsidiary as is the case of civil servants under § 839 BGB). Secondly, one must note the potentially far-reaching implications of this decision. For if one accepts that both management and employees may be liable under the heading of product liability, the limitation period (§ 852 I BGB, three years; now contained in §§ 195, 199 I BGB, see ch. 1 section 10) can in practice be considerably prolonged. In the present case the Court of Appeal found that the limitation period of the action against the company had run out on 31 December 1988. But it also held that the action against the managers and the (appropriate) employee had also become time-barred as the plaintiff knew at an early stage of the injuries caused by the sugary tee in the baby bottle. The BGH quashed this decision and explained that for the limitation period to commence, it was not sufficient to know that the damage was caused by the company's product. In addition, it was necessary to show that the victim knew the identity, function in the company, and address of the potential defendant. (The rule that the limitation period may be different for each severally liable debtor is contained in § 425 II BGB.) The claimant does not even have to undertake any special effort to find this out, but can rely on channels of information open to everyone. Given that the defendant/employee may be able to claim an indemnity from his employer (under the principles contained in case 110, below), one can thus see how, in effect, the present decision undermines the limitation period of three years that affects the company itself. We are thus confronted here by yet another judicial extension of product liability in the interest of the "consumer". This is a noteworthy observation. For one can try to imagine how the CBI or some other such organisation would react to a similar decision handed down by the House of Lords. Almost certainly, there would be an outcry, condemning the effect that such a decision would have on the competitiveness of British industry. Perusing the German Press, one found no such reaction. Is this because the British industrialists are accustomed to a legal regime that is solicitous of their interests or is it because its German counterpart has found ways of coping with the economic consequences of such decisions?

7. The classifications made in German law between defect in construction (case 61, BGHZ 51, 91, and 68, BGHZ 67, 359), defect in design, defect in marketing (warnings etc.) (case 62, BGHZ 59, 172), and development risks have exact equivalents in American law. Reference must thus be made to the cases extracted and noted in the case-books quoted above, § 1, and in the early exposition of German law (above, chapter 2, section A.4(c)).

16. DAMAGE CAUSED TO THE PRODUCT

Case 68

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (EIGHTH CIVIL SENATE) 24 NOVEMBER 1976 BGHZ 67, 359 = NJW 1977, 379 = JZ 1977, 343 (with critical notes by M Lieb and B Rengier = VERSR 1977, 358)

Facts

The D firm—insured by the plaintiff company—were manufacturers among other things of tin covers for transformers. The defendant produces cleansing and degreasing apparatus for industrial products, in which through heating and evaporation perchlorhylene oil is washed out and separated from the parts to be cleansed. A ballcock connected to a switch, which the defendant alleges to have obtained from a foreign supplier, prevents the filaments, normally covered with fluid, from being exposed to the air.

After the D firm had, on 29 January 1969, ordered such cleansing apparatus for about DM 20,000, the defendant confirmed the order on 4 February 1969 with the addition: “Warranty: according to our enclosed conditions of sale and delivery.”

No. VIII of those conditions of delivery—in so far as is relevant here—runs as follows:

VIII. liability for defective delivery:

1. All those parts are to be made good or replaced without charge at our choice to be exercised fairly, which within twelve months of the delivery are proved unusable or the usefulness of which is seriously affected in consequence of circumstances existing before the passing of the risk—in particular owing to defective design, inferior materials, or defective construction . . .

9. Further claims of the buyer or the party giving the order, in particular a claim for compensation for damage caused not to the delivered object itself but by the latter indirectly will in no case be accepted by us.

After the apparatus had been set up and put into operation at the beginning of June 1969 the used oil in the apparatus ignited because a switch operated by a ballcock had not switched off the filaments in time and they had become overheated. The plaintiff company, which had paid to the D firm, its insured, a sum of DM 70,971, made a claim for compensation against the defendant on the ground that the switch had failed in consequence of a defect in manufacture or construction; the D firm had had to spend that amount for the repair of the cleansing and electrical apparatus as well as the elimination of corrosion of the metal stocks. The defendant stated that the fire had happened only through an excessive supply of petroleum, and denied that it was liable for the damage caused by the fire, and in addition points to the formal exclusion of liability for all claims for compensation and in that respect invokes the operation of prescription in that the order for payment was first made on 23 June 1972.

Both courts below rejected the claim. Upon the plaintiff company’s application for review, the judgment of the court was quashed and the case referred back to the Court of Appeal for the following

Reasons

I. . . .

II. . . .

1. The decision of the Court of Appeal must be opposed in the result to the effect that the plaintiff company's claims in contract for damages did not exist according to its pleadings, because they were time-barred under § 477 BGB. [Details follow.]

2. On the other hand, the further considerations of the Court of Appeal that also from the delictual point of view the plaintiff's action is without foundation according to its own pleadings, does not stand up to legal examination.

(a) An objective breach of duty by the defendant causing damage resulting from a fire by delivering defective cleansing apparatus has been sufficiently established by the plaintiff company and proved by experts. [Details follow.]

(b) Since to this extent the plaintiff company claims against the defendant as the producer of the apparatus, it was for the latter, regarded from the point of view of so-called "product liability", to exculpate itself by proving absence of fault, a circumstance that lay entirely within its sphere of influence and of which the plaintiff who could rely only on conjecture, could not be unaware (BGHZ 51, 91; Senate judgments of 28 September 1970—VIII ZR 166/68 = WM 1970, 1418, 1420—LM BGB § 433 no. 36 and of 24 November 1971—ZR 81/70 = WM 1972, 106 = NJW 1972, 251). In this connection, it can be assumed in favour of the defendant that the ballcock switch, the failure of which, according to the plaintiff's account, started the fire, was obtained from a third party and only incorporated in the apparatus manufactured by it. If that switch was of itself free from defect, but its performance was too weak or otherwise unsuited for the apparatus, it is a matter of a so-called defect of the construction, characteristic "product liability" (see judgment of 20 September 1970). But even if there was nothing wrong with the construction and only the switch showed a defect, the defendant would be required—without prejudice to the question which additional claims the plaintiff might perhaps have against the producer of the switch—to exculpate himself from any fault in respect of such defect of production; for after the defendant ordered and incorporated this switch which was necessary for the operational safety of the apparatus to be sold, the responsibility for a defect-free working of the switch—as between the parties—fell exclusively within the ambit of the defendant, who alone could control the workmanship and incorporation of the switch, whereas the D firm was deprived of such a possibility of examining it.

(c) The Court of Appeal's view based on that of the Landgericht, that the "legal institution of product liability" had been developed for a disposition of goods involving several stages and could not therefore be applied if—as here—direct contractual relations existed between producer and ultimate consumer, is at variance with the law. A genuine concurrence existed between a claim for damages for breach of contract and that for a tort, with the consequence that each claim follows its own legal rules and the injured party is, as a matter of principle, free to choose the basis on which to put forward his claim. In particular he is not prevented from falling back on delictual liability, if contractual claims are no longer available either because the period of limitation has run out or because an exemption clause is restricted to contractual liability (cf. the applicability of § 852 BGB alongside of § 477 BGB dealt with in the judgment of the Senate of 24 May 1976 = BGHZ 66, 315 = WM 1976, 839). If the injured party bases his claim on a tort of the producer, the mere circumstance that direct contractual relations exist between them or in any case have existed, does not exclude the application of the principles of concurring the reversal of the burden of proof of fault developed for claims against a producer (cf. also the judgment of the Senate of 28 September 1970—VIII ZR 166/68). In so far as in this connection Count von Westphalen in his criticism (BB 1976, 1097) of the judgment of the Senate of 24 May 1976 openly expresses the opinion that the Senate, on facts like the present, has retreated from the principles of evidence governing product liability, overlooks the fact that the subject of the dispute then decided was a typical case of a claim arising out of a chain of dealings against a firm which had neither manufactured the product nor had distributed it as a detached agency of the manufacturing firm, and that for this reason there was no room to introduce the principles of product liability; that was also to be deduced from the unabridged statement of facts in the judgment reported in WM 1976, 839.

(d) Contrary to the view of the Court of Appeal the plaintiff has also alleged in sufficient detail the existence of the property of the D firm and damage resulting from it. [Details follow.]

(e) The Court of Appeal declares as regards the cost of repairing the cleansing apparatus, that in any case there was no interference with property, because, according to the plaintiff's statement, the apparatus was originally delivered in a defective condition and therefore the D firm was never the possessor or owner of an object free from defects. This view is based on a mistake of law. It is indeed correct that both the Reichsgericht (RG JW 1905, 367) and the Bundesgerichtshof (BGHZ 39, 366) denied a claim of the owner of a building for damage to property based on the defective erection of a building (§ 823 I BGB) in respect of that particular building, when the materials used in the building were defective and when, with the completion of each phase, each time a further defectively produced portion passed into the landowner's ownership (cf. also OLG Karlsruhe 1956, 913; Schäfer in Staudinger, BGB, 10/11 edn. § 823, n. 49). It is essential in these cases that the defect in the object transferred was inherent beforehand to the object as such; it was therefore completely useless to the owner from the start and that the defect was identical with the damage complained of (cf. Duns/Kraus, Haftung für schädliche Ware (1969) p. 66). In such a case the damage to an object of another is in fact already excluded conceptually; only economic damage exists for which § 823 I BGB does not provide redress (BGHZ, above).

That is however not so here. Apart altogether from the fact that the above-mentioned considerations of the Court of Appeal concern only the damage to the cleansing apparatus itself, but not the damage caused by the fire to other property of the D firm, the defendant here had transferred to the D firm the ownership of an apparatus which was otherwise free from fault and only contained a regulating device which was defective as regards a limited function—the failure of which caused further damage to the whole apparatus after ownership has passed. In such a case it does not matter that from the formal point of view the purchaser only acquired property which was defective at the outset (cf. Diederichsen, VersR 1971, 1078, 1098; Schlechtriem, VersR 1973, 581, 589). Instead, it is decisive that the danger arising from the accompanying delivery of the switch resulted in damage exceeding that represented by the defect only after title had passed and thereby the property of the purchaser, otherwise from defect. (Duns and Kraus, op. cit., 66; Schmidt-Salzer, Entscheidungssammlung Produkthaftung, 30 ff.). In cases of that kind—especially when the injured party has acquired the ownership on the basis of a contract of sale—there is no reason to restrain him from having recourse to claims in tort. That is true all the more so since, if the injured party wishes to retain the apparatus (perhaps in order to maintain production) and only wants compensation for the cost of repairs, he cannot rely on a contractual claim to compensation because the law of warranties in sale (§§ 459 ff. BGB) does not provide for damages beyond the express warranties of quality (§§ 463, 480 II BGB). Moreover, claims for breach of contract by a positive act (positive Vertragsverletzung), arising out of the delivery of defective objects, are restricted to compensation for damage caused to other legally protected interests but do not cover damage to the object of the sale itself [reference]; thus, to that extent the buyer would be largely without a remedy if he could not fall back on claims in tort.

The Senate does not fail to recognize that in some cases the boundary may be difficult to draw between a defect affecting the transferred object as a whole and a limited defect which later on causes new damage to the object transferred which was otherwise free from defect, as for instance when what was to begin with a limited defect expands like a “creeping disease” and afterwards takes hold of the entire object (cf. Schlechtriem, op. cit. 589; Duns/Kraus, op. cit., 66 fn. 7). In the present case it is not necessary to set down unambiguous criteria for delimiting the two given the small value of the ballcock and the total value of the cleansing apparatus sold for some DM 20,000.

(f) Finally, the claim for compensation put forward by the plaintiff, in so far as it is based on tort, is not excluded on legal grounds. The short period of limitation of § 477 BGB is not applicable to such a claim (see judgment of this Senate of 24 May 1976—ZR 10/74). The same applies to the disclaimer of liability regulated in section VIII no. 9 of the defendant’s general conditions of delivery, which it may be assumed in the defendant’s favour, were incorporated in the contract. Whether such a disclaimer also includes claims in tort, in so far as they are connected with the defective performance, is a question of interpretation in the light of the individual case (cf. BGH judgment of 23 April 1970—VII ZR 150/68 = JZ 1970, 903). Since the Court of Appeal—consistently with its point of view—did not attempt an interpretation of the general delivery conditions, this Senate can itself interpret this clause (see Senate judgment of 25 June 1975—VIII ZR 244/73 = WM 1975, 895 = NJW 1974, 1693). For this purpose it must be taken into account not only that exemption clauses being exceptions from liability provided by dispositive law—must in principle be construed narrowly, but also in the present case that according to the so-called “obscurity rule” any remaining doubts as to the extent of the provisions contained in the general conditions of trade must be interpreted against the party who drafted them and makes use of them. In the present case the exemption clause is found in a section of the general conditions of trade which is headed “Liability for defects in delivery” and which regulated in particular the contractual warranty by the seller, and therefore by modifying §§ 450 ff. BGB and §§ 377 ff. HGB regulates the contractual claims for a warranty. It need not be decided whether the buyer’s or contracting party’s disclaimer which is mentioned only in no. 9 also includes claims for compensation for breach of contract by positive act arising from a defective delivery. In any case there is no sufficiently clear provision that claims for a blameworthy injury to the legal interests protected by § 823 I BGB are to be excluded. If this had been the defendant’s intention, it ought to have been indicated to the D firm by an unambiguously formulated clause that the latter’s legal position was being further restricted to an appreciable degree, for example as regards any claims arising from a negligent bodily injury or a destructive threatening the existence of an entire business.

In so far as this Senate stated in the decision BGHZ 64, 355 that the exclusion of liability contained in section II no. 5 of the “General Conditions for the supply of Electrical Power from the Low Tension Network (AVB)”, embraces not only contractual but also delictual claims for damage arising from the break in the supply of current, those statements relate to a state of facts and interests which is not comparable with the present case. Quite apart from the fact that the AVB are regarded as a legal enactment (BGHZ 9, 390) and that for this reason the so-called “obscurity rule” cannot be invoked for its interpretation (cf. judgment of the Senate of 21 October 1958—VIII ZR 145/57 = NJW 1959, 38), the exclusion of liability in no. II 5 AVB takes account of the circumstance that the energy undertakings can only perform the task allotted to them of providing the public with cheap current, if they are as far as possible exempt from liability; this particular task demands the widest possible exemption from liability with the consequence that—as far as admissible—claims for compensation are included in whatever legal form (judgment of this Senate of 9 June 1959—VIII ZR 61/58 = NJW 1959, 1423 = LM BGB § 138 [Cc] no. 2). On the other hand in the present case, which involves a shift from the seller to the buyer by means of general trade conditions, these considerations do not apply.

III. The decision of the dispute depends therefore on whether the plaintiff succeeds in proving that a defective or unsuitable switch caused the fire. To that extent the dispute requires a further clarification of facts.

Case 69

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (EIGHTH CIVIL SENATE) 11 JANUARY 1978
NJW 1978, 1051 = JR 1978, 240

Facts

The defendant ran a sandpit. On 1 February 1973 she delivered to the plaintiff six cubic metres of sand which was intended to be used as the outer cladding to the plaintiff’s newly constructed house. The plaintiff had the outer cladding applied in spring 1973, and subsequently damage in the cladding began to appear which were attributable to certain mineral impurities present in the sand delivered by the defendant. Alleging that the defendant had quarried the impure sand, which was unsuitable for use as an outer cladding, out of a new sandpit without first examining it to see whether it was pure, the plaintiff brought a claim for compensation against the defendant on 8 January 1974. Notice of the claim was served upon the defendant on 21 February 1974. The LG rejected the claim on the grounds that it was barred by the statute of limitations. The OLG rejected the plaintiff’s appeal. The permitted appeal to the BGH was likewise unsuccessful.

For the following

Reasons

[In Point I, the court agreed with the conclusion of the OLG that the plaintiff had no claim against the defendant in respect of the delivery of the impure and therefore defective sand based on the statutory guarantees applicable to the sale of goods, either because such a claim was not possible, or because it was no longer possible since the time limit for bringing the action had expired (§ 477 BGB).]

II. Finally, the plaintiff also has no claim based on damage to his property (§ 823 I BGB) which is not subject to brief limitation periods and which is consequently not out of time (§ 852 BGB [references omitted]). The question which has been debated in the literature and which the plaintiff's application places at the forefront of this case concerns the circumstances in which a client has claims against a building contractor for damage to his property based on defects in the construction of a building. Such a general question, however, is not at issue here because the defendant was not working as a building contractor but had only delivered the defective sand on the basis of a contract of sale, and it was the plaintiff who then used the sand, mixed with other building materials, to apply the cladding to his house which was previously unclad [references omitted]. Even the judgment of this court of 24 November 1976 (BGHZ 67, 359 [other references omitted]) and the question which arose in that case as to whether a purchaser, who had bought a technical installation from the seller which contained no defects, with the exception of a faulty safety switch, could bring a claim against the seller when the failure of the switch resulted in damage to the installation itself, concerns an entirely different set of factual circumstances which do not apply here.

What is decisive here is that according to the findings of the OLG, which are correct in law, the plaintiff's building, which previously did not have an external cladding, did not suffer a reduction in value as compared to what it was previously worth, as regards either its physical substance or use as a dwelling house. Accordingly, the present case is to be distinguished also from factual circumstances which were present in the judgment of the BGH of 6 November 1963 (BB 1964, 65). The plaintiff's application is incorrect on this point. For that case involved a finished house which already had an outer cladding, but which subsequently suffered a reduction in its value as a result of damage from smoke and soot emanating from neighbouring land. The financial burden suffered by the plaintiff, as a consequence of what he argued was the need to remove the cladding, therefore represents pure economic loss and therefore represents an interference with an interest which is not protected by § 823 I BGB. Since, moreover, the mere fact of delivering what was, from the beginning, defective sand does not in itself represent property damage to this building material, then the only remaining question is whether the plaintiff has suffered property damage as regards those building materials (chalk, cement) which originally belonged to him and which were mixed with the defective sand to form the outer cladding, and which consequently became worthless. The OLG correctly denied this claim. The plaintiff overlooks the fact that when the outer cladding was manufactured, his original property interest in the building materials which he provided lapsed as a consequence of the mingling (§ 948 BGB) and the processing (§ 950 BGB) of the materials, and that he acquired a new, albeit impaired, property interest in the cladding material. Therefore there is no loss which can be defined as property damage affecting the plaintiff in respect of which he could claim compensation under § 823 I BGB [reference omitted].

Case 70

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (EIGHTH CIVIL SENATE) 5 JULY 1978
NJW 1978, 2241 = JR 1979, 199

On 21 January 1975 the plaintiff bought a used motor car from the defendant. A so-called “Order Form” in standard form provided that the motor car was being delivered as “used, as inspected, every warranty being excluded”. A handwritten addition noted “. . . is being delivered in an unexceptionable technical condition”. On the reverse side of the form the defendant’s general conditions of trade were set out which are provided in Article VII [Warranties].

1. No warranty is given in respect of the objects sold. This does not apply if and to the extent that the seller has provided a warranty in writing by a separate letter of guarantee.
2. No right exists to demand a return of the price in return for the goods [Wandelung], a reduction of the price [Minderung] or damages.

On 28 March 1975 the plaintiff, while driving the motor car, suffered an accident due to a blow-out of a rear tyre which was not of the type required by law to be fitted to this type of car. He sued the defendant for damages. The latter pleaded inter alia that the period of limitation had run.

The Court of First Instance and the Court of Appeal of Bamberg allowed the claim. A second appeal was rejected for the following

Reasons

I. The appeal is rejected. The appellant is correct, it must be admitted, in objecting to the view of the Court of Appeal that the defendant is liable to pay damages to the plaintiff under § 463 I BGB. For that claim is caught by the period of limitation, contrary to the opinion of the Court of Appeal.

1. (a) The Court of Appeal is right in regarding the statement that the motor car was being delivered in an unexceptional technical condition as a guarantee of a quality in the meaning of § 459 II BGB, i.e. as a guarantee that at the time of delivery the vehicle is technically in order, ready to be used and safe in operation. The question as to whether such details contained in a contract of sale of the object sold only serve to describe it (§ 459 I BGB) or whether they warrant a certain quality (§ 459 II BGB) is a matter of factual appreciation in the individual case, provided that—as in the present case—the statements are not of the type which are normally made in connection with such transactions. The interpretation reached by the Court of Appeal is possible, conforms to the principles laid down by the practice of the courts concerning the assurance of the existence of certain qualities [references], and therefore binds this court. Moreover it is convincing. A purchaser from an appointed dealer of a certain manufacturer of a used car of this particular make is interested, above all, that the car should at least conform to the official rules for permitting the car to be used on the roads (§§ 18 ff. of the Decree concerning the Admission of Motor Vehicles for Use on Roads) and can be put into operation without any hesitation. If the dealer in used cars, contrary to the practice in the trade with second-hand cars, confirms in addition that the car’s condition is technically unexceptionable, it is at least likely that he undertakes thereby to be responsible for any possible damage, if those conditions are not present. The argument of the appellant is inapposite to the effect that it cannot possibly be assumed that the defendant intended to warrant the technically unexceptionable condition of all parts of the used car, seeing that thereby the plaintiff would be in a much more advantageous position than if he had bought a new car. Clearly the Court of Appeal did not wish to attribute to the contractual statements of the defendant such an extensive meaning; it interpreted them and could interpret them to warrant operational readiness and safety . . .

Since by fitting tyres which did not conform to the permit for operating the car, the permit had become invalid (§§ 18(1), 19(2), 21 of the Decree concerning the Admission of Motor Vehicles for Use on Roads) and since, moreover, the vehicle . . . fitted with tyres which did not comply with the legal requirement, was no longer operationally safe, the defendant is liable to pay to the plaintiff damages for having failed to perform the contract (§ 463 first sentence BGB).

(b) The Court of Appeal is also correct in holding that the liability of the defendant for promised qualities has not been excluded either by the standard clause “used, as inspected, every warranty being excluded” or by the exemption clause of the general conditions of trade reproduced on the reverse side of the standard contract. This Division has stated repeatedly that an exemption clause in a standard contract does not affect the liability of a seller for the absence of stipulated qualities [references]. If the seller is unwilling to remain subject to the risk of liability in accordance with the provisions of the law, he must indicate this unequivocally and in a manner intelligible to the buyer—with particular reference to the promises made—in the text of the contract or otherwise at the conclusion of the contract [reference]. This had not happened in the present case. Therefore, the defendant cannot plead either that his declaration, which amounts to a stipulation as to quality, was not made in the form prescribed by Article VII no. 1 of its general conditions of trade (“ . . . by a separate letter of guarantee”) [reference].

2. However, the claims for damages available to the plaintiff under § 463 I BGB are caught by the period of limitation. The Court of Appeal believes that the period of limitation amounting to six months according to § 477 I BGB had only begun to run when the plaintiff was able to perceive the cause of the accident with the necessary degree of certainty following the receipt on 23 September 1975 of the written information by the manufacturer of the tyre. However, this view of the law is erroneous.

(a) It is true that this Division has raised the question several times—although it was not decisive in the final resort—whether in certain circumstances in order to prevent gross injustice or a curtailment of buyers’ rights the period of limitation for claims for damages in respect of warranties arising out of a sale, instead of beginning to run from the delivery of the object sold, should not start at a later moment only, e.g. when the damage occurred, when the buyer could become aware of it, or quite generally when it becomes possible in the individual case to raise such claims so as to interrupt the period of limitation [references]. These considerations, however, concerned without exception the question of liability for damage arising out of defects of the goods sold (Mangelfolgeschäden). In typical cases this often manifests itself in other legally protected assets of the buyer only a considerable time after the object sold has been delivered, or the damage may only occur at a later time.

In the present case, however, the issue is exclusively one of damages for failure to perform. It is unnecessary to dilate on this in respect of costs of repair, reduced value, and loss of use; the same applies to the cost of expert opinions relating to the existence of defects, for these are necessarily the consequences of defects, they are directly connected with remedying the defects, and—like profits lost as a result of the defects [references]—they reduce the value of the consideration received by the buyer in return for the price [reference].

(b) It need not be decided here as to whether to this extent, despite the clear wording of § 477 I BGB, a case exists in certain circumstances for postponing to a later date the moment when the period of limitation begins to run [references]. For even if this were to be assumed in favour of the plaintiff, the time for bringing a claim would have passed . . .

II. Since the contractual claims of the plaintiff against the defendant are caught by the period of limitation, the reasons given by the Court of Appeal do not support the decision under appeal. However, the decision is right for different reasons. The claim is well founded in tort (§ 823 I BGB); in this respect the defence that the period of limitation has run is ineffective, since the claim in tort is not subject to the short period of limitation [reference].

1. The Court of Appeal expresses doubts as to whether an action in tort lies—without going into details—because the plaintiff had acquired the motor car in a defective condition. His property was threatened from the outset with the danger of further losses through an accident. The fact that this threat had materialized did not constitute a separate violation of property. This view cannot be accepted.

(a) It is true that in the decision referred to by the Court of Appeal [reference] the Bundesgerichtshof rejected the claim of the owner of a building based on the violation of his property because the building has been badly constructed (§ 823 I BGB); it rejected the claim in respect of this building in particular, if the materials used for the building were defective and if, as the building work progressed, each time another defectively constructed section became the property of the owner of land [reference]. These cases are characterised by the fact that the defect of the object delivered was inherent in it as a whole, that the latter was therefore altogether useless to the owner from the beginning and that the defect was identical with the damages claimed [reference].

(b) With reference to this case, this Division in its decision of 24 November 1976 [case 48, above] has distinguished the case where the seller transferred to the buyer title in an object which was unexceptionable in general and merely included a defective control instrument (a safety switch)—the function of which was limited—the failure of which after title has passed caused further damage to the installation as a whole. In that case this Division accepted that property had been damaged illegally. It regarded as decisive that the cause of the danger represented by the contemporaneous supply of a defective switch had only materialised in damage exceeding the defect itself after title had passed and that as a result the property of the buyer, which was in every other respect free from defects, had been damaged as a whole. Rengier [reference] and Schubert [reference] criticize this decision on the ground that even small, limited defects render the entire object sold defective from the outset, as well as useless having regard to the danger of its destruction connected therewith. Weitnauer [reference] does not deny that property has been violated—illegally on the facts—but argues that a subsequent destruction of the installation does not constitute damage; in his opinion the latter event had only laid bare damage which had occurred previously. The value of an installation, the self-destruction of which as a result of a defect could be expected, was “nil” from the beginning.

These objections—which are substantially identical—are not convincing in the opinion of this Division and do not persuade it to abandon its position in [reference]. Above all, it is not correct that in commerce a danger-ridden installation is treated as valueless. This might perhaps be so if the defect in question is absolutely incapable of detection and must lead to the destruction of the entire installation. No such case is in issue here. As Rengier and Schubert have pointed out, it may be difficult in individual cases to distinguish between a defect which affects the object transferred in its entirety from the beginning and a limited defect which only later on caused additional damage to an object which is otherwise free from defect. This Division has already stressed this in its decision of 24 November 1976 [reference], but the unequivocal facts of that case did not make it necessary to establish detailed criteria of delimitation. This Division is also not persuaded by the view of Rengier and Schubert that in allowing a claim in tort, the Bundesgerichtshof undermines the provisions of the law of sale concerning damages for non-performance (§ 463 BGB) as well as the rule concerning the limitation of this action laid down in § 477 BGB. A real concurrence of actions exists between the claim for damages for breach of contract and that in tort; in the latter case—leaving aside the special aspects of products liability—the claimant bears the burden of proof that the tortfeasor is to be blamed, unlike in the case of a claim in contract (§ 282 BGB). It follows that each of these two claims is governed by its own rules [reference]. In cases such as that which this Division had to decide [reference] no reason exists for denying the injured party recourse to claims in tort and thus for placing the party causing the damage in a better position than a third party who had incorporated a defective individual part into an object of a sale after its delivery to the buyer which led to the destruction of the latter.

(c) The case to be decided now—damage to a purchased motor vehicle arising out of an accident due to the fitting of a tyre contrary to the regulations—must in the opinion of this Division be treated similarly. On the one hand, the motor car which the plaintiff bought from the defendant was defective as far as the rear tyres were concerned. On the other hand, the car as a whole remained a valuable asset. Only after ownership had passed, a cause of danger resulting from this defect resulted in different and much higher damage compared with the original defect when an accident occurred in actual circulation. If the course of events had been different, especially if the tyres had been changed in time, this damage, which is different in substance from that of having tyres fitted which were contrary to the regulations, would have been avoided. Therefore it must be held that the defendant has violated the plaintiff’s property illegally . . . It would seem that also the Sixth Division of the Bundesgerichtshof in its decision of 30 May 1978 [reference], which is to be published, proceeded from the above-mentioned view of this Division.

2. (a) [The court considered the culpability of the defendant] . . .

(b) [The court considered the contributory negligence of the plaintiff] . . .

3. Finally, faced with a claim for damages based on tort (§ 823 I BGB) the defendant cannot rely either on the exemption clause in the standard contract form (Article VII of the defendant’s general conditions of trade) and on the fact that the plaintiff bought the vehicle “as inspected”. It is true that in all trade with second-hand cars a very wide exclusion of liability accords with the customs of this branch of business; this Division has described it as “more or less a requirement of economic reason” [reference]. On the other hand, in the present case the defendant gave an express assurance by a personal statement that the used car was in an “unexceptional technical condition”. If the defendant also intended to exclude similar claims for damages based on tort, thus rendering his assurance largely ineffective in this area of liability and therefore of no value for this buyer, he should have stated this unequivocally. The simple reference, made in standard form in connection with the arrangement concerning contractual warranties to the effect that “no right exists to demand . . . damages” is certainly insufficient to embrace such an extensive exclusion of liability, having regard to the special features of the present case. The further question can remain undecided as to whether generally, even in the absence of special assurances, exemption clauses of the kind employed here in the trade with second-hand cars also cover claims for damages in tort [reference].

Case 71

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 18 JANUARY 1983
BGHZ 86, 256 = NJW 1983, 810 = JZ 1983, 499

A motor car manufactured by the defendant was sold by the L garage to the plaintiff in February 1976. The throttle on this car was defective in that the accelerator-pedal did not always spring back after being depressed. On 12 May 1976 the plaintiff tried to repair it, but in vain. In June 1976 the gas-pedal broke off and he installed another pedal of his own devising.

On 5 July 1976 the plaintiff had an accident in B, allegedly because the car accelerated after he had removed his foot from the pedal. The front of the car was damaged. The plaintiff had the car repaired, and a new gas-pedal from the factory was installed. A few weeks later there was another accident when the car struck a fence while being reversed by the plaintiff’s wife, then his fiancée. This accident also, according to the plaintiff, was due to the fact that the vehicle accelerated unexpectedly because the gas-pedal stuck. This time it was the rear end of the car which was damaged. The cost of repairs to the plaintiff’s car on these two occasions totalled DM 3,742.

[Here follow technical details of the defect, according to the two expert reports procured by the plaintiff.]

The plaintiff argues that the damage was due to a defect in construction and that the defendant is liable therefore: in respect of the repairs to his car and the garden fence, as well as the cost of the two expert reports, he claims a total of DM 4,443. The Landgericht rejected his claim for the cost of repairing the car (in the amount of DM 3,742). The plaintiff’s appeal was dismissed. On his further appeal to this court, the decision below is reversed and the case remanded.

Reasons

The judgment of the Court of Appeal is wrong in law.

1. Certainly the Court of Appeal was right to hold that where a purchased chattel suffers damage because of the faulty construction or manufacture of a component part, its purchaser may have a claim in tort against the manufacturer on the basis of an invasion of his rights as property-owner (§ 823 I BGB).

(a) It is true that tortious duties are not imposed, like guarantees in the law of sales, in order to protect a contractor's expectations of utility and value in the acquisition of an undefective thing (see BGHZ 77, 215, 218 with references; BGHZ 80, 186, 188). They rather relate to the interest which people have in the integrity of their belongings or possessions, in not having them adversely affected by the chattel which the manufacturer puts into commerce (Integritätsinteresse). Such tortious duties to guard against damage or disturbance may be imposed on the manufacturer not only as regards other property of the acquirer which may be imperilled by faults in construction or production of the manufactured item, but also as regards that item itself. In principle, the purchaser's interest in having the purchased item undamaged and undisturbed is as much worth protection as his interest in the safety of the rest of his property; the manufacturer must therefore respect this interest as well (see Brüggemeier WM 1982, 1294, 1303). Accordingly, it is not a precondition of tortious liability that other goods or interests of the consumer or of third parties should necessarily have been affected by the thing which is put into commerce with a defective component (contra, Schlechtriem [reference omitted]). The manufacturer may be held liable to the consumer in tort if the impairment or disturbance of the manufactured item constitutes harm which it was the manufacturer's duty under the law of tort to avoid out of respect for the interest of the owner or possessor in the safety of his property.

(b) Where the loss due to the defective nature of the thing simply reflects the acquirer's interest in its utility and value, the case is different, for as we have said, duties in tort are not imposed in order to reinforce the purchaser's expectation that he will have the value and use of an object without a defect. This expectation is protected by the law of contract exclusively, save in cases under § 826 BGB where the harm is caused deliberately. It would be wrong to say that whenever a person acquires a defective thing his rights as owner are thereby invaded, and thus invoke the law of tort. Such harm cannot, as is generally acknowledged, ground a claim in tort (see RG JW 1905, 367, 368; compare BGHZ 39, 366; 55, 392; 67, 359, 364; BGH judgments of 11 Jan. 1978, NJW 1978, 1051; 5 July 1978, NJW 1978, 2241, 2242). If the only harm in issue is the undervalue due to the original defect and existing from the time of acquisition, that is simply a case of disappointed contractual expectations, and the law of tort has no role to play (so Duns/Kraus, Haftung für schädliche Waren (1969), 66). But the harm may not be substantially identical (stoffgleich) with the undervalue of the thing in that the defect impairs the owner's interest in its value and usability; it may take the form of an invasion of the consumer's interest in the integrity of his property and possessions which the manufacturer may in the circumstances be under a duty to respect. The manufacturer can then in principle be subjected to delictual products liability, and this is so even when there is a concurrent contractual claim under the law of warranty or replacement [references omitted], for it is accepted law that the rules of tort and contract apply concurrently and independently neither excluding the other (BGHZ 67, 359, 362; constant holding).

Of course liability in tort must not be permitted to unhinge the law of contract. But that will not happen in cases like the present if tort liability is carefully restricted to the integrity interest, appropriately distinguished in each case from the interest in usability and value. There is no conflict with the refusal of courts to impose liability in damages for positive breach of contract in cases of so-called consequential loss due to defects except where the purchaser has suffered damage to property other than the purchased item (BGHZ 77, 215, 217; so, too, for the contract of services, BGH 4 March 1971, NJW 1971, 1131, not reported on this point in BGHZ 55, 392). This judicial extension of warranties in sales (§§ 459 ff. BGB) was undertaken in order to reinforce, not to exclude, in cases where a special relationship existed, the protection of integrity provided by the law of tort. The tort liability of the supplier or manufacturer for damage due to defects in the purchased thing is not thereby blocked off (contra, apparently, Diederichsen, NJW 1978, 1281, 1286 [other references omitted]).

2. We realise that there will occasionally be practical difficulties in distinguishing the case where the harm in suit is substantially identical with the diminution in value of the thing due to an original defect which, as we have said, should be dealt with by the law of contract, from the case, subject to the law of tort where the damage or disturbance to the thing, defective owing to the manufacturer's negligence, goes beyond the owner or possessor's interest in the usability and value of the thing and affects his interest in the integrity of his property. Sometimes the defect will be so radical that from the very beginning the thing is really worthless and that therefore the "damage" to the thing when the defect manifests itself is "substantially identical" (see the cases in RG JW 1905, 367 and BGHZ 39, 366). Such cases will be relatively rare. Much commoner will be the case where the defect originally affects a more or less distinct part of the thing. Even so, one must find criteria of distinction which are of practical utility [reference omitted].

(a) In BGHZ 67, 359 the thermostat in a dry-cleaning machine was defective and unable to perform its safety function with the result that the machine overheated and burnt out. The Eighth Civil Senate allowed a claim in tort essentially because the defective thermostat was functionally distinct and, in relation to the machine as a whole, relatively trivial in value. These criteria may or may not be capable of extrapolation beyond the facts of that case [references omitted], but as the court below clearly recognized, they certainly cannot of themselves determine when the supplier or manufacturer of a partially defective product is liable. The manufacturer's liability cannot depend solely on the relatively accidental consideration of how the component parts are put together [references omitted]. But it is clear that the Eighth Civil Senate was dealing only with the case before it and had no intention of laying down definitive tests, as is shown by its subsequent decision of 5 July 1978. Then it allowed the purchaser of a used car to sue the seller in tort for the harm suffered in an accident due to the fact that the rear tyres were not in conformity with regulations. In both decisions the court expressly stated that it was not laying down definitive criteria.

(b) The adoption of a common-sense or economic standpoint will often enable one to say whether the harm in suit is substantially identical with the undervalue due to the original defect [reference omitted]. Thus substantial identity will be found where the defective component is so integrated into the composite or so unified with the part now damaged but originally undefective that separation is impossible without great economic loss (BGH 24 June 1981, NJW 1981, 2248, 2249). So, too, where it would make no economic sense to make the defect good (this may have been the case in the decision of the Seventh Civil Senate on 25 May 1972 (BauR 1972, 379) where the foundations underneath the whole of the extension were inadequate). Other cases where the distinction is hard to draw must be determined in accordance with the principles stated in 1(b) above, taking into account the nature and extent of the damage in suit, the nature of the defect to which it was due, the effect of the defect on the condition of the thing, and, as reflected in these factors, the extent of the manufacturer's duty in tort which here, as in other cases, is affected by the purpose of the product, the consumer's expectations of it and even, under certain circumstances, its price [reference omitted].

(c) In this case we need not ask whether the throttle was a functionally distinct component of the motor car in the sense of BGHZ 67, 359, or whether the Court of Appeal was right to suppose that it was not. For the purposes of this appeal we must take the accident to have been caused by a defect which inhibited the flow of petrol, and in such a case the common-sense observer could disregard the nature and origin of that defect and say that the harm to the car was substantially different from the undervalue which the defect caused to the owner's interest in its being worth what he paid for it. The critical feature in this case is that the vehicle remained roadworthy despite the defect in the throttle, which by no means rendered the vehicle valueless from the outset, and that the inherent risk of damage could have been allayed by prompt discovery of the defect and its repair at little cost and without damage to other parts of the car. The accident to the car was far from being a necessary manifestation of the undervalue of the car owing to the defect in the petrol supply; the harm was rather due to the concurrence of regrettable circumstances which could and would have been avoided had the plaintiff become conscious of the danger in good time.

We need not decide whether the manufacturer's liability for property damage resulting from a defect exists only if the damage or disturbance occurs in a violent manner (for example, through fire, explosion, or similar events) [reference omitted]. But certainly when the defect in a component is apt to lead to the destruction of a valuable chattel such as a motor car or damage to it in a "violent" manner such as occurred here, then this clearly speaks for the liability of the manufacturer: the duty breached by the manufacturer in putting into circulation a vehicle with such a noxious defect was imposed on him not just because people are interested in the usability and value of their chattels but also because the owner or possessor has an interest in their well-being.

Case 72

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 14 MAY 1985
NJW 1985, 2420 = VERSR 1985, 837

In April 1980 the plaintiff bought a compressor from the defendant manufacturer. In March 1982 its diesel motor suffered considerable damage, because it had run for a time without lubricant. This was because oil had leaked out owing to the fracture of the oil-conduit at the point where it joined the sump. The plaintiff maintains that it was a fault in design that the oil-conduit was fixed at only one point, namely where it entered the motor—or compressor—housing, and that it would not have broken under the vibrations set up by the prolonged running of the motor if it had been affixed to the chassis as well.

The plaintiff claimed damages of DM 5730.28 for damage to property (cost of substitute motor, expenses of experts, and rental of replacement).

Reasons

1. The Court of Appeal was of the opinion that, accepting the plaintiff's allegations as true, the damage to the compressor's motor was not damage to the plaintiff's interest in the integrity of his property such that the defendant was under a tort duty to take care to avoid it. If, as he alleged, the compressor was unfit for prolonged use as envisaged, he must bring a claim in respect of his interest in the usability and value of a merchantable compressor.

II. The judgment of the Court of Appeal is unsound in law.

1. The first points made by the Court of Appeal are correct enough.

(a) The Court of Appeal followed decisions of this Division to the effect that the manufacturer of a product can be liable under § 823 I BGB for harm to a consumer's property if the damage to or destruction of the property represents damage which it is the duty of the manufacturer to take care to avoid in the interest of the acquirer in the integrity of his property [references].

(b) The Court of Appeal correctly distinguished those cases where the damage consisted simply of the fact that the defect in the thing made it less valuable and constituted an infringement of the acquirer's interest in usability and value for money, since it is not the function of duties imposed by the law of tort to protect a purchaser's interest in having a thing to use which is free from defects.

(c) As to whether or not the damage represented an invasion of the plaintiff's interest in the integrity of his property the Court of Appeal was right to adopt the test whether the damage was identical with the loss of value of the compressor due to its initial defect, i.e. whether it was "substantially similar" to the loss in value quoad usability and value for money represented by the defect.

2. The Court of Appeal was nevertheless wrong to infer from the fact that the initial defect in the compressor only manifested itself in the loss of its value the conclusion that in this case there was no invasion of the plaintiff's interest in the integrity of his property.

(a) The Court of Appeal was wrong to suppose that the primary test as to whether the harm which later manifests itself is identical with the loss of value due to an initial defect, that is, whether they are "substantially similar", is whether the thing was fit for prolonged use. What really counts is the comparison between the damage which is in issue and the disvalue of the product at the time of transfer, namely the amount by which the defect renders it less valuable. The diminution in value due to the defect and consequently the harm to the interest in value for money can be tested by the principles applied when abatement of the price is sought for breach of warranty (§ 472 I BGB) [references]. While it is true that in making this assessment the fact that the defect will reduce the useful life of the product can materially increase the initial shortfall in value, it is only if the entire thing or component for which compensation is sought is affected from the economic point of view by the non-durability that the short life expectancy will be fully expressed in the diminution of value and thus establish complete "substantial similarity" between loss of value and damage to the thing. Where the initial defect which carries the risk of premature breakdown affects only part of the product and is quite curable, and only later destroys the product or damages other parts of it, the undefective part of the product has a value sufficiently distinct from the shortened life due to the defect that there is no complete identity between the damage and the shortfall in value.

That was the case here. Taking the material facts as found below, the component parts of the compressor which the plaintiff bought from the defendant manufacturer were individually faultless and it was initially quite functional. The only trouble was the inadequate anchorage of the oil-pipe which rendered it likely to break under the stress of operation and let the oil escape. This could have been avoided by the simple welding job of making an additional fixing to the chassis. Only the oil-pipe was non-durable, not the compressor as a whole or even the motor. As the defect, viz. the inadequate and easily curable fixing of the oil-pipe, could only damage the motor if its fracture and the consequent loss of oil remained unnoticed, the loss of value due to the defect at the critical moment, namely the transfer of ownership, was limited to the cost of occasional replacement of the pipe during the normal life of the compressor, or alternatively the cost of installing an additional fixing.

(b) Contrary to the view of the Court of Appeal, the plaintiff's claim is not simply for an invasion of his interest in the usability and value for money of a functioning compressor. This case differs from the "hydraulic jack" case, cited below, in which this Division dismissed a damages claim for damage to property where the jack was not usable (NJW 1983, 812 = VersR 1983, 346). A point sometimes overlooked by critics is that the defendant in that case had restored the jack to its original condition after the collapse of one of the supports, so that the plaintiff was in possession of a jack with just the original defect and no more, namely the design or construction fault in its undercarriage. It is true that as this defect was not remedied by the manufacturer the plaintiff did not use the jack for a long time for fear that a support might again give way under the weight of the vehicle. In such a case the purchaser suffers no harm over and above the original defect in the product, whereas in our case, as explained above, the damage is significantly greater. This demonstrates that the plaintiff here is not complaining simply of an invasion of his interest in having a functional compressor to use.

(c) This case differs in two respects (neither of which affects the outcome) from previous decisions of this Court where it was held that there had been an invasion of the plaintiff's interest in the integrity of his property (BGHZ 67, 359 = NJW 1977, 379 (thermostat); BGHZ 86, 256 = NJW 1983, 810 (accelerator pedal); NJW 1978, 2241 = BB 1978, 1491 (rear tyres)).

(aa) In the accelerator pedal case "a risk of accident arose through a combination of unfortunate circumstances". As the court below correctly held, that was not the case here.

It cannot be a precondition of a damages claim that further special circumstances be required before any damage occurs [reference]. Even in the absence of further special circumstances defect and harm lack "substantial identity" if, as explained above, a curable defect initially affects only a particular part of this product.

Furthermore, it must be irrelevant to the question of the congruence of initial defect and subsequent harm whether or not the harm occurs by means of an accident or results from a "violent" occurrence. This senate in BGHZ 86, 256 (273) = NJW 1983, 810 left it open whether it was only in such circumstances that the manufacturer's liability arose. But just as tort liability cannot depend on whether the defect in part of a product endangers other interests of the consumer or third party, that is, poses a risk to the environment and not just to the product itself (BGHZ 86, 256 (258) = NJW 1983, 810, criticized by Hager, AcP 184, 417), so it cannot be relevant to liability that the harm occurs by means of an "accident" or by "violent" damage to or destruction of other parts of the product. That would introduce into the law of tort a criterion foreign to its general principles.

The principle is that the acquirer's interest in the thing not being damaged or destroyed by reason of a fault of design or manufacture deserves as much protection as his interest that such fault not damage other property acquired elsewhere, and the manufacturer's liability cannot sensibly depend on whether the defect in manufacture damages other property of the consumer or only the product itself [references]. Likewise, the victim's interest in the integrity of his property and its protection by the law of tort cannot depend on whether the thing is damaged or destroyed "violently" or gradually over a period of time. After all, the manufacturer's liability for damage to other property of the consumer does not depend on whether the damage is sudden or gradual; nor does it where the damage is to the product itself. For damage to the product the manufacturer is liable in tort as well as in warranty unless the plaintiff never had an undamaged product and so cannot complain of any impairment in his interest in the product remaining undamaged, that is, unless the subsequent damage was so inherent in the original undervalue of the product that any damages awarded must be for his failure to acquire an undamaged thing rather than for invasion of his interest in the thing not being damaged.

(bb) Finally it is immaterial that in this case the damage to the compressor's motor occurred through the absence of an additional fixing for the oil-pipe, rather than through the presence of a defective or unsuitable component which threatened the whole. Here the damage was as much an invasion of the plaintiff's interest in the integrity of his property, which the manufacturer was under a duty to respect, as in cases where an original defect in a component affects the whole or other parts of the thing. The case is like those in which a thing is badly constructed because one of its parts is too weak to work or otherwise unsuitable (BGHZ 67, 359 (362) = NJW 1977, 379). This distinction can have no effect on tort liability.

Reversed and remanded for further findings of fact.

Case 73

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 24 MARCH 1992
 NJW 1992, 1678 = VERSR 1992, 758 = ZIP 1992, 704

Facts

The plaintiff brought an action for damages against the defendants arguing that he had suffered an interference with his property interest in a car engine which had been damaged as a consequence of a faulty mounting by the defendant. On 8 April 1989 the plaintiff purchased a car engine from Firm P which an acquaintance then installed in his motor vehicle. This engine had previously been given a general overhaul by the defendants and delivered by them as a so-called replacement engine to Firm P. After 9,500 km had been registered on the clock, serious damage to the engine occurred on January 18, 1990. The plaintiff attributes the occurrence of loss to the fact that the defendants had not put in place the fastening screw of the camshaft driving wheel, so that this slipped off the camshaft. He claimed compensation from the defendant in the amount of DM 6,870.39, covering the costs of repair and the provision of an expert report, damage resulting from loss of use, and telephone expenses.

The LG rejected the claim. The plaintiff's appeal to the OLG was unsuccessful. His further appeal to the BGH resulted in the quashing of the judgment and its remission to the lower court for reconsideration.

For the following

Reasons

The OLG found a failure of the pleadings to state a cause of action as a matter of law. In its view the defendants are to be seen as the manufacturers of the engine. However, they are not liable on the basis of § 823 I BGB because only the plaintiff's financial interest ("Äquivalenzinteresse") and not his interest in the integrity ("Integritätsinteresse") of his property were affected. There was an "identity of substance" between the damage and the alleged defect in the product. In other words, the initial loss in value corresponded to the loss which occurred.

The initial lack of value of the engine was not restricted to the costs of putting in place the missing fastening screw. Such an approach would only be appropriate where the absence of the screw was known or should have been apparent in the context of the normal usage of the motor, for example, during a service. According to the pleadings of the plaintiff, this was precisely what did not happen. The subsequent sequence of events—the slippage of the camshaft drive wheel—was inevitably going to occur. A defect which is not discoverable cannot be removed. In that case, therefore, the plaintiff's financial interest coincided in full with the subsequent (large scale) loss. In addition, it was relevant that from the beginning the plaintiff had not acquired a properly functioning engine, since the risk of the destruction of the engine existed at all times. The drive wheel, which was only secured by the cable attached to the camshaft, could have fallen off immediately after the engine was put into service, so that this was not a case of "creeping loss".

II. The judgment of the OLG is incorrect in law and must be quashed. The plaintiff has implicitly satisfied the basic conditions of an adequate plea for damages based on § 823 I BGB.

1. Any person who manufactures a product may be liable in damages in respect of loss which occurs to the product itself after it has been delivered on the grounds that the property of the purchaser has been damaged in accordance with § 823 I BGB. This is the case where the damage to or destruction of the product results in a form of damage (creeping loss) which, because of the purchaser's interest in the integrity of his property, should have been avoided by the producer who is under a duty to take care. In contrast, there is no right to compensation in tort in respect of losses which merely represent a "lack of value" of the product and which merely affect the purchaser's interest in usability and financial interest as a consequence of the defect in its condition [references omitted].

The OLG likewise based its decision on these principles. In that context it was right to hold that the defendant is subject to a tortious duty of care in respect of the engine to which it had given a "general overhaul", which it sold and delivered as a "replacement engine" and which it guaranteed as being free from defects. This is the case irrespective of whether the defendant had renewed only a limited number or all of the components of the engine in the context of the overhaul and in so doing had made use of materials supplied by third parties; for the defendant in any case took responsibility for the assembly of the components which it had prepared [references omitted].

2. However, the arguments on the basis of which the OLG reached the conclusion that there was no interference with the plaintiff's interest in the integrity of his property—namely that the ultimate damage (damage to the engine) and the defect in the product (the missing fastening screw) are "identical in substance", and that therefore the "lack of value" corresponded to the loss which occurred are not free of errors in law.

(a) In its case law, this court has described the financial destruction of the interest of the purchaser which was already disappointed when the property was acquired [reference omitted] as “identical in substance” to the initial “lack of value” [references omitted]. Consequently, there will be “identity of substance” where, viewed from an economic perspective, the initial defect affects the whole object in respect of loss for which compensation is now claimed [reference omitted] because for instance the object as a whole from the beginning is not at all or only in part usable for the purpose for which it was intended because of the defect [references omitted]. In this category are included also the cases in which the elimination of the defect (even if it only affects a part of the object) is not technically possible; the same view is gaining ground in respect of those cases where the defect cannot reasonably be eliminated without excessive expenditure [references omitted]. If, however, the defect is confined to a part of the product and is therefore capable of rectification according to the principles set out here and if it only subsequently leads to the destruction of the product or to damage to other parts of it, then that part of the object which was not initially tainted by the defect has its own value; the “lack of value” does not therefore correspond to the damage [reference omitted].

(b) The OLG correctly uses these principles as the basis for its judgment, but makes the mistake of treating the absence of the fastening screw on the camshaft driving wheel as a defect which cannot be rectified, which leads to the view that the damage is identical to the “lack of value” attributable to the defect. The conclusion of the OLG cannot be followed where it essentially focuses on whether the defect could have been discovered in the context of the normal use of the engine, for example, during a service.

It is not, in legal terms, of relevance for the question whether it is the purchaser’s interest in the integrity of his property or only his financial interest in the usability of the product which has been impaired, whether he could or could not have discovered the defect before the loss occurred in normal circumstances; the subjective ability to discover is not relevant. What is essential is that the defect—from an objective technical standpoint—could have been identified even if only when it was specifically being sought, so long as that would not have involved a disproportionately high cost in terms of time and expenditure. Only from the latter perspective can it be relevant to the economic value of a defect in what circumstances a presumed defect can be discovered. For in the case of a defect which can only be identified with difficulty, as defined here, the possibility of rectifying the defect can be challenged on technical or economic grounds [reference omitted]. The initial “lack of value” and the damage will coincide where the search for the defect and its elimination cause costs which are, for example, equal to or even greater than the cost of the whole product [reference omitted].

(c) The factual circumstances based on the plaintiff’s pleadings which the OLG uses as the basis for its decision do not justify the conclusion that the defective securing of the camshaft driving wheel could not have been eliminated on technical or economic grounds. The OLG bases the adoption of this position solely on the allegation made by the plaintiff that the absence of a screw on the camshaft would not have become apparent if the servicing of the engine had been carried out in accordance with the instructions given in the service booklet.

It is incorrect to conclude that there is a defect the elimination of which is excluded on technical or economic grounds and which consequently taints the whole product with an initial “lack of value”, simply because it is not known whether the product actually has a defect or because the defect did not become apparent in the context of normal servicing work which the manufacturer would expect to be undertaken, in other words, in the context of normal usage. As the BGH decisions on “creeping loss” have so far shown this will normally be the case [reference omitted].

There is in this case no support to be derived from the findings of the OLG or from the pleadings of the parties, which are focused purely on the foreseeable servicing work, that the absence of the fastening screw could not have been discovered without economically disproportionate expense.

3. This court is also unable to follow the arguments of the OLG to the effect that the engine delivered by the defendants was entirely unusable from the outset, because from the beginning there was an inherent danger of its destruction thus making this not a case of “creeping loss” and that it was coincidental that the initial propensity of the product to be damaged was only subsequently realised. It is true that the engine was defective in the sense that it lacked a screw which should have secured the driving wheel to the camshaft. The rest of the engine, however, was fit and had, as a whole, considerable value. The defect affected only a small portion of the product at first—namely the driving wheel which was not properly secured and which therefore ran the risk of breaking away from the camshaft—but not the product as a whole, even if—as is, in fact, always the case with “creeping loss”—there is from the outset the risk of significant damage to the whole product (which is otherwise free from defects). The question of when this risk might be realised, and in particular the question of whether the defect might be timely discovered and eliminated (for instance in the context of repair work otherwise necessitated) was uncertain. The facts of the case, on which the OLG based its decision having regard to the pleadings of the plaintiff, show that the damage to the whole product did not in fact occur immediately after it was put into operation, but the engine proved capable—for whatever technical reasons—of providing 9,500 km of usage over 19 months. In these circumstances, it cannot be said that the “lack of value” of the engine from the outset was so high that the damage which later occurred could be regarded as “identical in substance” with this “lack of value” and as merely the expression of the plaintiff’s financial interest.

III. The OLG also concluded—logically from its standpoint—that it should leave open the question disputed by the parties as to whether in fact the fastening screw for the camshaft driving wheel was in fact missing when the defendant delivered the engine. The appeal judgment must therefore be quashed and the decision sent back to the OLG so that the necessary findings of fact can be made.

Case 74

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (THIRD CIVIL DIVISION) 27 MAY 1963 BGHZ 39, 358 = NJW 1963, 1821 = JZ 63, 707 (with a critical note by H H Rupp = VERSR 1963, 973)

The plaintiff site-owner claimed damages from a local authority which had issued a building permit without adequately checking the architect’s calculations regarding the load-bearing capacity of the foundations, as marked on the plan. Because of this error, the building collapsed while in process of construction, and both the builder and the architect were insolvent.

The plaintiff's claim was dismissed by the trial court and his appeal was also dismissed for the following

Reasons

1. The trial court was correct to hold that in checking and authorising the plans for the building, the supervisory authorities are exercising a governmental function. In consequence, as the Appeal Court agrees, the plaintiff's claim against the defendant can only be based on the rules relating to the liability of officials (§ 839 BGB in connection with Art. 34 GG); it must be shown that one of the defendant local authority's officials in the exercise of the public function attributed to him was in breach of an official duty which he owed to the plaintiff . . .

2. In approaching the question whether, in giving building permission when it should not have done so, the local authority was in breach of official duties owed to the plaintiff, the trial court correctly started by considering the purpose served by the official duty [reference]. In the first instance, official duties are imposed in the interest of the State and the public. If the sole function of an official duty is to promote public order, the general interest of the commonwealth in orderly and proper government, the satisfaction of exigencies within the service, or the maintenance of a properly organised and functioning administration, then there is no question of any liability to third parties for its breach, even if its exercise has adversely affected them or their interest. Liability exists only where the official duty which was broken was owed by the official to the third parties themselves. Whether this is so and how wide the range of protected persons may be are questions which must be determined in accordance with the purpose served by the official duty. This purpose is to be inferred from the provisions on which the official duty is based and by which it is delimited, as well as from the particular nature of the official function in question. If, in addition to satisfying the general interest and public purposes, the official duty has the further purpose of safeguarding the interests of individuals, this is sufficient, even if the affected party had no legal claim that the official act in question be undertaken (BGHZ 35, 44, 46–47; BGH VersR 1961, 944).

Before a building permit is issued, the plans must be checked for conformity with all building regulations of public law (§ 2 II Provincial Building Ordinance). Such an investigation must encompass the structural safety of the building (§ 15 I e, § 61 Provincial Building Ordinance); as the Court of Appeal was right to emphasise, with reference to Pfundtner/Neubert [reference omitted], concern for safety is one of its most important aims, since unsafe buildings pose a direct threat to life and health, the value of physical property and safe conduct of business. The supervision of buildings thus permits the avoidance of dangers (BGHZ 8, 97, 104; see Baltz/Fischer, Preussisches Baupolizeirecht I ff.). The provisions requiring the verification of the calculations concerning the load-bearing capacity of buildings are directed to the dangers which threaten the public from the collapse of unsafe constructions. While these provisions and the official duties which they impose serve the protection of the public—the “public interest” (Baltz/Fischer, ibid.)—they also protect every individual member of the public who might be threatened by its unsafe condition, that is, every person who comes into contact with the building as inhabitant, user, visitor (RG Recht 1929 no. 757, SeuffArch 83 no. 134; JW 1936, 803, BGHZ 8, 97, 104), neighbour (BGH VersR 1956, 447), passer-by (LM to BGB § 839 Fe no. 1), or workman, and who relies on its being safe. The owner or developer may also be a beneficiary of this protective function if he suffers damage to his body, health, or property as a result of a collapse while he is visiting the building or inhabiting it, but only if the harm is a consequence of the danger from which it is the function of the official verification of the technical specifications to protect the public and hence the individual endangered. That is not the case here. It is true that the plaintiff has suffered damage as a result of the collapse of the building, but he is not a victim of the danger from which, as a member of the public, he was entitled to be protected by the official duties and the provisions which created them, since it was only the building itself and no other property of his which was damaged.

Case 75

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SEVENTH CIVIL SENATE) 30 MAY 1963

BGHZ 39, 366 = NJW 1963, 1827 = VERSR 1963, 933, 1024

In 1951 the plaintiff contracted with the defendant builder to have a house built on his land and with the defendant architect to have the construction supervised. Cracks appeared in the ceilings because the concrete used was well below the requisite strength. The plaintiff claimed damages for the reconstruction of the ceilings which were in danger of collapse. Because he was out of time for a contract claim the plaintiff based his claim on the delictual provisions § 823 I BGB and § 823 II BGB in connection with § 330 of the Criminal Code (StGB) or § 367 no. 15 StGB.

Reasons

The Court of Appeal was right to find that the facts disclosed no tort on which the plaintiff's claim for damages could be based.

1. There is no question of a claim for damages under § 823 I BGB on the basis that the plaintiff's property (Eigentum) has been damaged by fault. The land owned by the plaintiff, as compared with what it was, has suffered no harm through the defective method of construction. In so far as the land has been built on, as the Court of Appeal rightly stated, the plaintiff never owned it in an undefective condition. As the building proceeded, the plaintiff's ownership attached to each part of the building as it was constructed in the condition in which it was constructed, with all the qualities and defects resulting from the incorporation of the building materials. To make someone the owner of a defective building is not to invade an already existing ownership (compare RG JW 1905, 367; OLG Karlsruhe NJW 1956, 913).

The decision of the Senate in LM no. 4 to § 830 BGB was a different case; there defective concrete balconies which had been built onto the top storey caused the collapse of the whole building.

2. The Court of Appeal was also right to reject the claim for damages based on § 823 II BGB in connection with § 330 StGB. Under this last-named provision a person "who in supervising or erecting a building in breach of generally recognised rules of building practice acts in such a way as to cause danger to others" is guilty of an offence. The trial court found that a danger existed within the meaning of this provision and this finding is not subject to review. But as the Court of Appeal stated, § 330 StGB is solely designed to protect the lives and health of individuals [references]. It is only to this extent that the provision is a protective statute whose breach can give rise to a claim for damages under § 823 II BGB. Damages can only be claimed under this text if the harm takes the form of the invasion of a legal interest for whose protection the rule of law was enacted (BGHZ 19, 114, 126; 28, 359, 365 f.). The claim before us is for compensation for harm to an interest other than the legal interest protected by § 330 StGB.

Nor is the claim for those damages justified by the consideration that the replacement of ceilings which are in danger of collapse is necessary to save the users of the rooms from imminent danger. It still remains the case that the cost of rendering the ceilings represents a harm which affects only the pecuniary interests of the plaintiff. This is evident if one imagines that a ceiling collapses and injures an individual; then certainly the harm attributable to the personal injuries must be compensated under § 823 II BGB and § 330 StGB; but there would still remain the material harm requiring the replacement of the ceilings, and this would still affect only the economic interests of the plaintiff.

3. The plaintiff finally relies on § 823 II BGB in connection with § 367 I no. 15 StGB. This provision provides, inter alia, that it is an offence for a builder or building worker to construct a building in deliberate deviation from the building plan approved by the authority. According to the plaintiff, an offence was here committed because the approval of the plan was based on specific calculations, incorporated in the submission, relating to the load-bearing capacity of the construction, and these calculations were in turn based on the quality of the concrete to be used.

It is not necessary to decide whether the use of concrete inferior to that on which the stress calculations were based constitutes a deliberate deviation from the authorised plan. We agree with the Court of Appeal that § 367 I no. 15 StGB is not designed to offer protection against harm of the sort for which the plaintiff claims damages.

It is true that in its decision reported in LM no. 1 § 823 (Bb) BGB the Bundesgerichtshof recognised that § 367 I no. 15 StGB was a protective statute; that case, however, involved personal injuries suffered by a worker employed on the building site.

In the view of the Court of Appeal, § 367 I no. 15 StGB is like § 330 StGB in offering protection only to the human person.

This view is open to criticism. The final Courts of Appeal have accepted that the cognate provision of § 367 I no. 14 StGB exists for the protection of property as well and that a breach of the provision may also give rise to claims for damages in respect of property damage under § 823 II BGB (RGZ 51, 177–8, BGH, LM no. 2 to § 823 Bd BGB). Both these decisions were concerned with harm caused to neighbouring buildings adjoining the building site and vested in third parties.

Thus it may be taken that the protective purpose of § 367 I no. 15 StGB is also to be construed to guard against damage to property as well as damage to persons. In the present case, however, as has already been stated, there is no damage to property but a pecuniary loss attributable to the defective execution of the building work in breach of contract . . .

Notes to Cases 68–75

1. Cases 68–73 deal with damage to the product and not damage caused by the product and must be compared with the decision of the US Supreme Court in East River reproduced in Addendum 2 to this section. The questions here are basically two: (i) is this economic loss or physical damage and (ii) should the answer be left to the law of contract or be found in an extended law of tort? If the answer favours tort, should the tort duty be determined, both in its scope and extent, by the underlying contract? Cases 74 and 75 face an analogous problem in the context of immovables.

Case 75, BGHZ 39, 366, concerned the question whether a defective design could as such lead to damage to property in the meaning of § 823 I BGB. The court denied this: "The land owned by the plaintiff, as compared with what it was, has suffered no harm through the defective method of construction." The plaintiff never owned it in a non-defective condition. This restrictive approach must now however be approached with caution. For in BGH, 12 December 2000, NJW 2001, 1361, the BGH held that in principle the criteria developed in cases 68–73 in relation to chattels could be applied by analogy to immovables. Yet, in the case at hand it denied liability under § 823 I BGB. The (simplified) facts were these. The plaintiff bought a site from the defendant and erected buildings on it. The defendant had filled the site with slag that made the site unsuitable for building. Within a couple of years cracks appeared in the buildings. The plaintiff sought a declaratory judgment that the defendant was liable in tort for the cost of repair of the buildings. The BGH held that the plaintiff never owned the building in a non-defective condition. It was of central importance that the site was from the outset unsuitable for building. The defect "attached" to the whole property and could not be confined to one of its "components". The mere fact that the buildings were not defective when built (but became so only subsequently) did not indicate otherwise. Thus, where the building is "doomed" from the outset, whether because of a defective design (here the court relied on case 75) or unsound foundations as in the present case, § 823 I BGB cannot be relied on. In the final analysis one wonders, however, whether this new approach will substantially increase the use of tort law in this area. Purchasers of buildings or building employers will have difficulties to show that they ever owned the land in a non-defective condition. Thus, the main remedy for plaintiffs in such situations will lie in the law of contract, which is not without its pitfalls, given the shorter limitation periods which are "objective" in the sense that they do not depend on whether the plaintiff knew or could have known of the defect. (See, also p. 39)

Plaintiffs who have a cause of action against a local authority for negligently granting permission to build on a site unsuitable for building are, at least in theory, in a better starting position. (This is the situation in case 74, BGHZ 39, 358.) For here, under § 839 BGB, the plaintiff can recover damages also for pure economic loss. This is not say, however, that the plaintiff will recover easily, as case 74 illustrates. For such liability to arise the plaintiff must establish that the local authority violated a duty that specifically protected the plaintiff's interests. This was denied in case 74. In assessing whether such a duty of care was breached, as will be further explained in Ch. 4 section A 2b, there is ample room for policy considerations. Foreseeability of loss is not a sufficient condition of liability. The courts have, after much hesitation, allowed claims (also for pure economic loss) where the health of potential occupants of a licensed building was potentially affected (e.g. because the building was erected on an abandoned and temporarily forgotten waste dump). The first decision in which the BGH adopted a more generous approach, and in which it awarded damages to a purchaser of a building that was inhabitable because it was erected on polluted soil, was BGH, 26 January 1989, BGHZ 106, 323. Damages were assessed on this basis. The plaintiff's investment in the site and the building was frustrated. Accordingly, it could be recovered, minus what the land was actually worth. The case law that followed is rich and not easy to reconcile. See, BGH, 6 July 1989, BGHZ 108, 224; BGH, 21 February 1991, BGHZ 113, 367; BGH, 14 October 1993, BGHZ 123, 363; and BGH, 29 July 1999, BGHZ 142, 259. See, also, annotations by Ossenbühl, JZ 1989, 1125; JZ 1991, 922. A detailed examination of these cases at the borderline between public (building) law and the law of delict must be reserved to a specialised treatise. Here, suffice it to make three general observations. First, the factual background of this line of cases was a growing awareness of environmental issues, in particular, of the dangers posed by old waste dumps and the like. Secondly, generally speaking, the courts confined this new head of liability to cases where the planning authority (city or district councils) neglected health risks. This enabled the courts, thirdly, to limit liability for pure economic loss to a clearly identifiable, small group of victims. This is achieved by confining the protective scope of the duty of care to those persons who intend to live in a building that is not inhabitable because of the negligent planning. Occasionally, the courts departed from this bright line rule, not always consistently. For instance the BGH awarded damages to a developer who never had the intention to live in the building himself but to sell the property to third parties. (BGHZ 108, 224). In the same case however the court refused to award damages to investors or banks who are, in the court's view, not included in the protective scope of the duties that the local authority must respect in the course of planning.

2. First, as to defective premises since German law seems quite settled on this point: Dutton v. Bognor Regis UDC ([1972] 1 QB 373) held that the ultimate purchaser of a house that had been built on a rubbish tip and subsequently developed cracks had suffered material damage that could be claimed in tort. (A key extract from Lord Denning's judgment is reproduced below in Addendum 3.) The House of Lords, in those days in frequent disagreement with the Court of Appeal, approved: Anns v. Merton London Borough Council ([1978] AC 728). These cases stand in stark contrast with the German decisions whose reasoning was: (a) superior and (b) transplantable. In fact English law has, thirteen years later, moved much closer to the German approach, though it has done so gradually (some would say confusingly slowly) and in much more expansive judgments. (See: Peabody Donation Fund v. Sir Lindsay Parkinson & Co. Ltd. ([1985] AC 210); Curran v. Northern Ireland Co-Ownership Housing Ass'n Ltd. ([1987] AC 718); D & F Estates Ltd. v. Church Comm'rs ([1988] 3 WLR 368; and, most significantly, in Murphy v. Brentwood DC [1991] 1 AC 398). The basic tenets nowadays are clearly two: (a) the harm suffered by the plaintiffs in these cases is pure financial harm and not, as originally believed, property damage, and (b) the purpose behind the supervisory powers over building operations conferred by the legislature on local authorities is to protect occupiers of buildings and the public against dangers to their health and personal safety and nothing more.

3. On the Dutton, Anns, Murphy problem, American courts have not been able to come up with a uniform answer, so all one can do here is to warn of the diversity of answers. Thus, at one end of the spectrum, many state courts have allowed recovery of economic losses resulting from defects in buildings. See: Sewell v. Gregory 371 SE 2d 82, 84–5 (W.Va. 1988); Cincinnati Riverfront Coliseum v. McNulty and Co., 504 NE 2d 415, 419 (Ohio, 1986); Keel v. Titan Constr. Corp., 639 P. 2d 1228 (Okla. 1981). Probably more courts have opted for the exact opposite view, denying all recovery. See: Atherton Condo. Apartment-Owners Ass'n Bd of Dir. v. Blume Dev. Co., 799 P. 2d 250, 262 (Wash. 1990); Ellis v. Robert C. Morris, Inc., 513 A. 2d 951 (N. H. 1986). Cf., however, Lempke v. Dagenais, 547 A. 2d 290 (N.H. 1988) (allowing recovery for breach of warranty even in the absence of privity). In between these two extremes, one also finds compromise permutations—for instance recovery for remedial work for life-threatening defects. See: Council of Co-Owners Atlantis Condo., Inc. v. Whiting-Turner Constr. Co. 517 A. 2d 336, 344–5 (Nd. 1986). These problems are discussed by Jones, "Economic Loss Caused by Construction Deficiencies: the Competing Regimes of Contract and Tort", 59 U. of Cin. L. Rev. 1051 (1991); Libertucci, "Builders' Liability to New and Subsequent Purchasers", 20 SW. U. L. Rev. 219 (1991); Yuen, "Absent Privity of Contract Contractors may not Recover Economic Damages caused by an Architect's Negligence", 60 U. Cin. L. Rev. 565 (1991).

4. These cases, however, also show that accidents cannot always be neatly categorised. A television set explodes and injures my child: this is product liability and the damage is clearly personal injury (if it damages my table, it is property damage). The same television does not function when switched on. This (according to the better view) is economic loss and the remedy should best be sought in the law of sales, the UCC etc. In this sense: Spring Motors Distrib. Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 489 A. 2d 660 (N.J. 1985); Henry Heide, Inc. v. WRH Prods. Co., Inc., 766 F. 2d 105 (3rd Or.1985). For a systematic analysis see Two Rivers Co. v. Curtiss Breeding Serv., 624 F. 2d 1242 (5th cir.1980). For Germany see Hager, "Zum Schutzbereich der Produzentenhaftung", AcP 184 (1984), 413.

5. In between are cases like 68–73 where a defective component causes further damage to the product but no other damage to persons or other property. This borderline case has caused its problems; and it is here that tort is increasingly used to invade the province of contract law. This unease is reflected in the German cases reproduced in this book. (Note, for example, case 68 and, incidentally, note how superficially (by English standards) earlier case law is brushed aside. This “summary” way that earlier “precedents” are handled by German courts is a subject worthy of further study.) Thus it is said that if the defect and the damage caused by it are not “substantially the same” then recovery for the latter is possible in tort. And conversely, if there is “substantial identity” (Stoffgleichheit) between defect and subsequent harm, then no tort action will be allowed. So where asbestos tiles attached to the plaintiff’s house released in rainy weather a substance which silted up his windows, a tortious claim was successful (BGH NJW 1981, 2250). But in another case (BGH NJW 1981, 2248) insulation material built into a roof caused it to crack as temperature variations produced expansion and contraction. The defect and the damage it caused were here considered to be “substantially the same” so the tort action failed.

6. Decisions such as the above provide illustrations (see also BGH NJW 1983, 812); but the criterion of “substantial identity” has much troubled the German courts as cases 68–73 clearly show. Their study makes hard reading but, basically, one detects an unease with the whole subject evidenced by changing tests and underscored by academic doubts (see, for example, Deutsch, JZ 1984, 308, 311; Stoll, JZ 1983, 501). Thus, originally, the defective part had to be a “functionally limited unit” of the whole product in order to be classed as damage to property when it spread and “infected” the rest of the product. In the Gaszugfall case (71, BGHZ 86, 256) the court decided that one should not focus exclusively on the idea of a “functionally limited unit” but one should, instead, adopt an economic approach. The question to be asked was thus whether the defective part could be separated from the rest of the product without considerable economic loss (see section II.2(b) of case 71). The Kompressorfall case (72, BGH NJW 1985, 2420) now introduces a new test which requires the court to compare the defect of the product when acquired with the damage done when the defect has spread.

7. This German case law has proved highly controversial with academics, but their criticisms have left the judges unmoved. In the light of this, an outside observer must be cautious in expressing his views and should, perhaps, limit his observations to three points. Thus, first comes the advice to the reader to familiarise himself with as much of this literature as possible. The references given in the next paragraph (8.) are meant to assist this process; and the study of foreign laws can only enrich this understanding. Secondly, the reader will be assisted in his task by the comments that Professor Kötz volunteered (in a private letter to the author; Addendum 1) and which refer to the Schwimmerschalter case (68, BGHZ 67, 359, above). The main thrust of his objections (and further references) can also be found in his invaluable Deliktsrecht, pp. 27 et seq. Finally, despite the force of these arguments, the reader will also benefit from looking at these developments from a broader perspective. Thus, another distinguished comparatist, (Professor Fleming in (1989) 105 LQR, 508–511; Addendum 2) seems to regard this case law as a reaction (perhaps inept but, arguably, inevitable) to the restrictive regime that the Code has adopted towards the problem of pure economic loss. Seen in this light, these developments may thus also contain important lessons for Common lawyers. (See p. 39 as to the consequences of the latest BGB-reform).

8. See, more recently: BGH VersR 1989, 91 (Fischfutter); BGH NJW 1990, 908 = VersR 1980, 204 (Weinkorken); BGH VersR 1990, 1283 (with disapproving note by E. Lorenz); BGH VersR 1992, 758 (Nockenwellensteuerrad); BGH VersR 1992, 837 (Kondensator); Steffen, “Die Bedeutung der ‘Stoffgleichheit’ mit dem ‘Mangelunwert’ für die Herstellerhaftung aus Weiterfresserschäden”, VersR 1988, 977; Kullmann, “Die Rechtsprechung des BGH zum Produkthaftpflichtrecht in den Jahren 1991/92”, NJW 1992, 2669; v. Bar, “Probleme der Haftpflicht für deliktsrechtliche Eigentumsverletzungen,” Mannheimer Vorträge zur Versicherungswissenschaft (1992).

Addendum 1 (From Professor Dr Hein Kötz)

“It might shed some . . . light on the Schwimmerschalter decision if one bears in mind that the parties in that case were the buyer and the seller of the product in question and that the buyer had lost his contractual remedy only because he had failed to bring his action within the six-month period laid down in § 477 BGB. Nobody would have raised an eyebrow if the Court had said: ‘We are sorry that we cannot help the plaintiff since he failed to bring his action within the limitation period of § 477 BGB.’ Nobody would have raised an eyebrow if the Court had added: ‘This is a harsh result since in this case a reasonable man would have been unable to detect the defect before the end of the six-month period, let alone bring an action before that date. We cannot do anything about it, but we ask Parliament to look at the problem and devise a solution, perhaps along the lines of Art. 39 of the Vienna Sales Convention.’ It would have been somewhat bolder but perfectly acceptable if the Court had said: ‘We interpret § 477 BGB restrictively so as to let the six-month period start running not at the time of the delivery of the product but, in the event of a reasonably undetectable defect, at the date at which the buyer did detect it or, as a reasonable man, should have been able to detect it.’ The Federal Court, however, did not choose any of these solutions, but came up, quite unexpectedly, with a disastrous fourth solution.

In later cases, the Federal Court applied the Schwimmerschalter rule to cases in which the parties were not linked by a contract but the plaintiff was a buyer further down stream. It follows that a seller may do what he pleases in order to exempt himself from both contractual and tort liability by way of a contractual agreement with his direct customer. All this, however, will not help him at all if a downstream buyer suffers damage to the defective product itself. Let me add that the limitation period for a tort claim is of course three years after detection of the damage and the [identity of the] person responsible for it (§ 852 BGB). In my view, this makes no sense.”

Addendum 2 (Professor John Fleming)

“This line of attack [contained in the Kompressor case] is reminiscent of the equation of ‘property damage’ with structural change in the pre- D & F Estates cases, also of Justice Traynor’s view in the leading American case of Seeley v. White Motor Co. 403 P.2d 145 (Cal.1965) distinguishing between a claim by a purchaser of a defective truck for the cost of repairs in a causally related accident and a claim for loss of profit due to inability to haul the expected quantity of loads.

What is at issue here is not so much the precise formula suggested by the German court as its willingness, indeed eagerness, to extend tort protection for damage to the defective thing itself. It is the more remarkable because of the Civil Code’s categorical exclusion of tort damages for purely economic loss and the great weight reputedly given by German law to theoretical orthodoxy over pragmatism. Clearly English law would not have to go to the same pains to justify similar results: only traditionalists have to seek refuge in abstractions. The answer is found in a search not for what the law had been thought to be, but what we want it to be. There clearly are options.”

Addendum 3

1. Extract from Lord Denning MR’s judgment from Dutton v. Bognor Regis UDC (CA) [1972] 1 QB 373, 396.

Mr Tapp [attorney for the defendant local authority] submitted that the liability of the council would, in any case, be limited to those who suffered bodily harm: and did not extend to those who only suffered economic loss. He suggested, therefore, that although the council might be liable if the ceiling fell down and injured a visitor, they would not be liable simply because the house was diminished in value. He referred to the recent case of SCM (United Kingdom) Ltd. v. W. J. Whittall & Son Ltd. [1971] 1 QB 337.

I cannot accept this submission. The damage done here was not solely economic loss. It was physical damage to the house. If Mr Tapp’s submission were right, it would mean that if the inspector negligently passes the house as properly built and it collapses and injures a person, the council are liable: but if the owner discovers the defect in time to repair it—and he does repair it—the council are not liable. That is an impossible distinction. They are liable in either case.

I would say the same about the manufacturer of an Article. If he makes it negligently, with a latent defect (so that it breaks to pieces and injures someone), he is undoubtedly liable. Suppose that the defect is discovered in time to prevent the injury. Surely he is liable for the cost of repair.

2. Uniform Commercial Code, § 2–318

Third-Party Beneficiaries of Warranties Express or Implied

Alternative A

A seller's warranty whether express or implied extends to any natural person who is in the family or household of his buyer or who is a guest in his home if it is reasonable to expect that such person may use, consume, or be affected by the goods and who is injured in person by breach of the warranty. A seller may not exclude or limit the operation of this section.

Alternative B

A seller's warranty whether express or implied extends to any natural person who may reasonably be expected to use, consume, or be affected by the goods and who is injured in person by breach of the warranty. A seller may not exclude or limit the operation of this section.

Alternative C

A seller's warranty whether express or implied extends to any person who may reasonably be expected to use, consume, or be affected, by the goods and who is injured by breach of the warranty. A seller may not exclude or limit the operation of this section with respect to injury to the person of an individual to whom the warranty extends. As amended 1966.

3. Restatement Second, Tort, § 402ASpecial Liability of Seller of Product for Physical Harm to User or Consumer

(1) One who sells any product in a defective condition unreasonably dangerous to the user or consumer or to his property is subject to liability for physical harm thereby caused to the ultimate user or consumer, or to his property, if

(a) the seller is engaged in the business of selling such a product, and

(b) it is expected to and does reach the user or consumer without substantial change in the condition in which it is sold.

(2) The rule stated in subsection (1) applies although

(a) the seller has exercised all possible care in the preparation and sale of his product, and

(b) the user or consumer has not bought the product from or entered into any contractual relation with the seller.

Addendum 4

East River S.S. Corp. v. Transamerica Delaval, 476 US 858, 106 S. Ct. Rep. 2295 (1986)

JUSTICE BLACKMUN delivered the opinion of the Court.

In this admiralty case, we must decide whether a cause of action in tort is stated when a defective product purchased in a commercial transaction malfunctions, injuring only the product itself and causing purely economic loss. The case requires us to consider preliminarily whether admiralty law, which already recognises a general theory of liability for negligence, also incorporates principles of products liability, including strict liability. Then, charting a course between products liability and contract law, we must determine whether injury to a product itself is the kind of harm that should be protected by products liability or left entirely to the law of contracts.

I. In 1969, Seatrain Shipbuilding Corp. (Shipbuilding), a wholly owned subsidiary of Seatrain Lines, Inc. (Seatrain), announced it would build the four oil-transporting supertankers in issue—the TT Stuyvesant, TT Williamsburgh, TT Brooklyn, and TT Bay Ridge. Each tanker was constructed pursuant to a contract in which a separate wholly owned subsidiary of Seatrain engaged Shipbuilding. Shipbuilding in turn contracted with respondent, now known as Transamerica Delaval, Inc. (Delaval), to design, manufacture, and supervise the installation of turbines (costing $1.4 million each, see App. 163) that would be the main propulsion units for the 225,000-ton, $125 million (ibid.) supertankers. When each ship was completed, its title was transferred from the contracting subsidiary to a trust company (as trustee for an owner), which in turn chartered the ship to one of the petitioners, also subsidiaries of Seatrain. Queensway Tankers, Inc., chartered the Stuyvesant; Kingsway Tankers, Inc., chartered the Williamsburgh; East River Steamship Corp. chartered the Brooklyn; and Richmond Tankers, Inc., chartered the Bay Ridge. Each petitioner operated under a bareboat charter, by which it took full control of the ship for 20 or 22 years as though it owned it, with the obligation afterwards to return the ship to the real owner. See G Gilmore and C Black, Admiralty §§ 4-1, 4-22 (2nd edn. 1975). Each charterer assumed responsibility for the cost of any repairs to the ships. Tr. of Oral Arg. 11, 16-17, 35.

The Stuyvesant sailed on its maiden voyage in late July 1977. On 11 December of that year, as the ship was about to enter the Port of Valdez, Alaska, steam began to escape from the casing of the high-pressure turbine. That problem was temporarily resolved by repairs, but before long, while the ship was encountering a severe storm in the Gulf of Alaska, the high-pressure turbine malfunctioned. The ship, though lacking its normal power, was able to continue on its journey to Panama and then San Francisco. In January 1978, an examination of the high-pressure turbine revealed that the first-stage steam reversing ring virtually had disintegrated and had caused additional damage to other parts of the turbine. The damaged part was replaced with a part from the Bay Ridge, which was then under construction. In April 1978, the ship again was repaired, this time with a part from the Brooklyn. Finally, in August, the ship was permanently and satisfactorily repaired with a ring newly designed and manufactured by Delaval.

The Brooklyn and the Williamsburgh were put into service in late 1973 and late 1974, respectively. In 1978, as a result of the Stuyvesant's problems, they were inspected while in port. Those inspections revealed similar turbine damage. Temporary repairs were made, and newly designed parts were installed as permanent repairs that summer.

When the Bay Ridge was completed in early 1979, it contained the newly designed parts and thus never experienced the high-pressure turbine problems that plagued the other three ships. Nonetheless, the complaint appears to claim damages as a result of deterioration of the Bay Ridge's ring that was installed in the Stuyvesant while the Bay Ridge was under construction. In addition, the Bay Ridge experienced a unique problem. In 1980, when the ship was on its maiden voyage, the engine began to vibrate with a frequency that increased even after speed was reduced. It turned out that the astern guardian valve, located between the high-pressure and low-pressure turbines, had been installed backwards. Because of that error, steam entered the low-pressure turbine and damaged it. After repairs, the Bay Ridge resumed its travels.

II. The charterers' second amended complaint, filed in the United States District Court for the District of New Jersey, invokes admiralty jurisdiction. It contains five counts alleging tortious conduct on the part of respondent Delaval and seeks $3.03 million in damages, App. 73, for the cost of repairing the ships and for income lost while the ships were out of service. The first four counts, read liberally, allege that Delaval is strictly liable for the design defects in the high-pressure turbines of the Stuyvesant, the Williamsburgh, the Brooklyn, and the Bay Ridge, respectively. The fifth count alleges that Delaval, as part of the manufacturing process, negligently supervised the installation of the astern guardian valve on the Bay Ridge. The initial complaint also had listed Seatrain and Shipbuilding as plaintiffs and had alleged breach of contract and warranty as well as tort claims. But after Delaval interposed a statute of limitations defence, the complaint was amended and the charterers alone brought the suit in tort. The non-renewed claims were dismissed with prejudice by the District Court. Delaval then moved for summary judgment, contending that the charterers' actions were not cognisable in tort.

The District Court granted summary judgment for Delaval, and the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, sitting en banc, affirmed. East River SS Corp. v. Delaval Turbine, Inc., 752 F.2d 903 (1985). The Court of Appeals held that damage solely to a defective product is actionable in tort if the defect creates an unreasonable risk of harm to persons or property other than the product itself, and harm materializes. Disappointments over the product's quality, on the other hand, are protected by warranty law. Id., at 908, 909-10. The charterers were dissatisfied with product quality: the defects involved gradual and unnoticed deterioration of the turbines' component parts, and the only risk created was that the turbines would operate at a lower capacity. Id., at 909. See Pennsylvania Glass Sand Corp. v. Caterpillar Tractor Co., 652 F. 2d 1165, 1169–70 (3rd cir. 1981). Therefore, neither the negligence nor the strict liability claims were cognisable.

III. . . .

B. [2] The torts alleged in the first, second, third, and fifth counts clearly fall within the admiralty jurisdiction. . . .

C. [3] With admiralty jurisdiction comes the application of substantive admiralty law. . . . Absent a relevant statute, the general maritime law, as developed by the judiciary, applies. . . . Drawn from state and federal sources, the general maritime law is an amalgam of traditional Common-law rules, modifications of those rules, and newly created rules. . . .

[4] The Courts of Appeals sitting in admiralty overwhelmingly have adopted concepts of products liability, based both on negligence . . . and on strict liability. . . .

We join the Courts of Appeals in recognising products liability, including strict liability, as part of the general maritime law. . . . Our incorporation of products liability into maritime law, however, is only the threshold determination to the main issue in this case.

IV. Products liability grew out of a public policy judgment that people need more protection from dangerous products than is afforded by the law of warranty. See Seely v. White Motor Co., 63 Cal. 2d 9, 15, 45 Cal. Rptr. 17, 21, 403 P. 2d 145, 149 (1965). It is clear, however, that if this development were allowed to progress too far, contract law would drown in a sea of tort. See G. Gilmore, The Death of Contract, 87–94 (1974). We must determine whether a commercial product injuring itself is the kind of harm against which public policy requires manufacturers to protect, independent of any contractual obligation.

A. [5] The paradigmatic products-liability action is one where a product “reasonably certain to place life and limb in peril”, distributed without reinspection, causes bodily injury. See e.g. MacPherson v. Buick Motor Co., 217 NY 382, 389, 111 NE 1050, 1051, 1053 (1916). The manufacturer is liable whether or not it is negligent because “public policy demands that responsibility be fixed wherever it will most effectively reduce the hazards to life and health inherent in defective products that reach the market”. Escola v. Coca Cola Bottling Co. of Fresno, 24 Cal. 2d, at 462, 150 P. 2d, at 441 (concurring opinion).

For similar reasons of safety, the manufacturer’s duty of care was broadened to include protection against property damage. See Marsh Wood Products Co. v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 207 Wis. 209, 226, 240 NW 392, 399 (1932); Genesee County Patrons Fire Relief Assn. v. L. Sonneborn Sons, Inc., 263 NY 463, 469–73, 189 NE 551, 553–5 (1934). Such damage is considered so akin to personal injury that the two are treated alike. See Seely v. White Motor Co., 63 Cal. 2d, at 19, 45 Cal. Rptr., at 24, 403, P. 2d, at 152.

In the traditional “property damage” cases, the defective product damages other property. In this case, there was no damage to “other” property. Rather, the first, second, and third counts allege that each supertanker’s defectively designed turbine components damaged only the turbine itself. Since each turbine was supplied by Delaval as an integrated package, see App. 162–3, each is properly regarded as a single unit. “Since all but the very simplest of machines have component parts, [a contrary] holding would require a finding of ‘property damage’ in virtually every case where a product damages itself. Such a holding would eliminate the distinction between warranty and strict products liability.” Northern Power and Engineering Corp. v. Caterpillar Tractor Co., 623 P. 2d 324, 330 (Alaska 1981). The fifth count also alleges injury to the product itself. Before the high-pressure and low-pressure turbines could become an operational propulsion system, they were connected to piping and valves under the supervision of Delaval personnel. See App. 78, 162–3, 181. Delaval’s supervisory obligations were part of its manufacturing agreement. The fifth count thus can best be read to allege that Delaval’s negligent manufacture of the propulsion system—by allowing the installation in reverse of the astern guardian valve—damaged the propulsion system. Cf. Lewis v. Timco, Inc., 736 F. 2d 163, 165–6 (CA5 1984). Obviously, damage to a product itself has certain attributes of a products-liability claim. But the injury suffered—the failure of the product to function properly—is the essence of a warranty action, through which a contracting party can seek to recoup the benefit of its bargain.

B. The intriguing question whether injury to a product itself may be brought in tort has spawned a variety of answers.³ [Footnote omitted.] At one end of the spectrum, the case that created the majority land-based approach, Seely v. White Motor Co., 63 Cal. 2d 9, 45 Cal. Rptr. 17, 403 P. 2d 145 (1965) (defective truck), held that preserving a proper role for the law of warranty precludes imposing tort liability if a defective product causes purely monetary harm. See also Jones and Laughlin Steel Corp. v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 626 F. 2d 280, 287 and n. 13 (CA3 1980) (citing cases).

At the other end of the spectrum is the minority land-based approach, whose progenitor, Santor v. A and M Karagheusian, Inc., 44 NJ 52, 66–7, 207 A. 2d 305, 312–13 (1965) (marred carpeting), held that a manufacturer's duty to make nondefective products encompassed injury to the product itself, whether or not the defect created an unreasonable risk of harm. See also LaCrosse v. Schubert, 72 Wis. 2d 38, 44–5, 240 NW 2d 124, 127–8 (1976). The courts adopting this approach, including the majority of the Courts of Appeals sitting in admiralty that have considered the issue, e.g., Emerson GM Diesel, Inc. v. Alaskan Enterprise, 732 F. 2d 1468 (CA9 1984), find that the safety and insurance rationales behind strict liability apply equally where the losses are purely economic. These courts reject the Seely approach because they find it arbitrary that economic losses are recoverable if a plaintiff suffers bodily injury or property damage, but not if a product injures itself. They also find no inherent difference between economic loss and personal injury or property damage, because all are proximately caused by the defendant's conduct. Further, they believe recovery for economic loss would not lead to unlimited liability because they think a manufacturer can predict and insure against product failure. See Emerson GM Diesel, Inc. v. Alaskan Enterprise, 732 F. 2d, at 1474.

Between the two poles fall a number of cases that would permit a products-liability action under certain circumstances when a product injures only itself. These cases attempt to differentiate between “the disappointed users . . . and the endangered ones”, Russell v. Ford Motor Co., 281 Or. 587, 595, 575 P. 2d 1383, 1387 (1978), and permit only the latter to sue in tort. The determination has been said to turn on the nature of the defect, the type of risk, and the manner in which the injury arose. See Pennsylvania Glass Sand Corp. v. Caterpillar Tractor Co., 652 F. 2d 1165, 1173 (CA3 1981) (relied on by the Court of Appeals in this case). The Alaska Supreme Court allows a tort action if the defective product creates a situation potentially dangerous to persons or other property, and loss occurs as a proximate result of that danger and under dangerous circumstances. Northern Power and Engineering Corp. v. Caterpillar Tractor Co., 623 P. 2d 324, 329 (1981).

We find the intermediate and minority land-based positions unsatisfactory. The intermediate positions, which essentially turn on the degree of risk, are too indeterminate to enable manufacturers easily to structure their business behaviour. Nor do we find persuasive a distinction that rests on the manner in which the product is injured. We realise that the damage may be qualitative, occurring through gradual deterioration or internal breakage. Or it may be calamitous. Compare Morrow v. New Moon Homes, Inc., 548 P. 2d 279 (Alaska 1976), with Cloud v. Kit Mfg. Co., 563 P. 2d 248, 251 (Alaska 1977). But either way, since by definition no person or other property is damaged, the resulting loss is purely economic. Even when the harm to the product itself occurs through an abrupt, accident-like event, the resulting loss due to repair costs, decreased value, and lost profits is essentially the failure of the purchaser to receive the benefit of its bargain—traditionally the core concern of contract law. See E Farnsworth, Contracts § 12.8, pp. 839–40 (1982).

We also decline to adopt the minority land-based view espoused by Santor and Emerson. Such cases raise legitimate questions about the theories behind restricting products liability, but we believe that the countervailing arguments are more powerful. The minority view fails to account for the need to keep products liability and contract law in separate spheres and to maintain a realistic limitation on damages.

C. Exercising traditional discretion in admiralty, see Pope and Talbot, Inc. v. Hawk, 346 US 406, 409, 74 S. Ct. 202, 204, 98 L. Ed. 143 (1953), we adopt an approach similar to Seely and hold that a manufacturer in a commercial relationship has no duty under either a negligence or strict products-liability theory to prevent a product from injuring itself.

“The distinction that the law has drawn between tort recovery for physical injuries and warranty recovery for economic loss is not arbitrary and does not rest on the ‘luck’ of one plaintiff in having an accident causing physical injury. The distinction rests, rather, on an understanding of the nature of the responsibility a manufacturer must undertake in distributing his products.” Seely v. White Motor Co., 63

Cal. 2d, at 18, 45 Cal. Rptr., at 23, 403 P. 2d, at 151. When a product injures only itself the reasons for imposing a tort duty are weak and those for leaving the party to its contractual remedies are strong.

The tort concern with safety is reduced when an injury is only to the product itself. When a person is injured, the “cost of an injury and the loss of time or health may be an overwhelming misfortune”, and one the person is not prepared to meet. Escola v. Coca Cola Bottling Co. of Fresno, 24 Cal. 2d, at 462, 150 P. 2d, at 441 (concurring opinion). In contrast, when a product injures itself, the commercial user stands to lose the value of the product, risks the displeasure of its customers who find that the product does not meet their needs, or, as in this case, experiences increased costs in performing a service. Losses like these can be insured. See 10A Couch on Insurance §§ 42: 385–42: 401, 42: 414–17 (2nd edn. 1982); 7 Benedict on Admiralty, Form no. 1.16–7 (7th edn. 1985); 5A Appleman, Insurance Law and Practice § 3252 (1970). Society need not presume that a customer needs special protection. The increased cost to the public that would result from holding a manufacturer liable in tort for injury to the product itself is not justified. Cf. United States v. Carroll Towing Co., 159 F. 2d 169, 173 (CA2 1947).

Damage to a product itself is most naturally understood as a warranty claim. Such damage means simply that the product has not met the customer’s expectations, or, in other words, that the customer has received “insufficient product value”. See J White and R Summers, Uniform Commercial Code 406 (2nd edn. 1980). The maintenance of product value and quality is precisely the purpose of express and implied warranties. See UCC § 2–313 (express warranty), § 2–314 (implied warranty of merchantability), and § 2–315 (warranty of fitness for a particular purpose). Therefore, a claim of a non-working product can be brought as a breach-of-warranty action. Or, if the customer prefers, it can reject the product or revoke its acceptance and sue for breach of contract. See UCC §§ 2–601, 2–608, 2–612.

Contract law, and the law of warranty in particular, is well suited to commercial controversies of the sort involved in this case because the parties may set the terms of their own agreements. The manufacturer can restrict its liability, within limits, by disclaiming warranties or limiting remedies. See UCC §§ 2–316, 2–719. In exchange, the purchaser pays less for the product. Since a commercial situation generally does not involve large disparities in bargaining power, cf. Henningsen v. Bloomfield Motors, Inc., 32 NJ 358, 161 A. 2d 69 (1960), we see no reason to intrude into the parties’ allocation of the risk.

While giving recognition to the manufacturer’s bargain, warranty law sufficiently protects the purchaser by allowing it to obtain the benefit of its bargain. See J White and R Summers, supra, ch. 10. The expectation damages available in warranty for purely economic loss give a plaintiff the full benefit of its bargain by compensating for forgone business opportunities. See Fuller and Perdue, “The Reliance Interest in Contract Damages” 1, 46 Yale LJ 52, 60–3 (1936); R Posner, Economic Analysis of Law § 4.8 (3rd edn. 1986). Recovery on a warranty theory would give the charterers their repair costs and lost profits, and would place them in the position they would have been in had the turbines functioned properly. See Hawkins v. McGee, 84 NH 114, 146 A. 641 (1929). Thus, both the nature of the injury and the resulting damages indicate it is more natural to think of injury to a product itself in terms of warranty.

A warranty action also has a built-in limitation on liability, whereas a tort action could subject the manufacturer to damages of an indefinite amount. The limitation in a contract action comes from the agreement of the parties and the requirement that consequential damages, such as lost profits, be a foreseeable result of the breach. See Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Ex. 341, 156 Eng. Rep. 145 (1854). In a warranty action where the loss is purely economic, the limitation derives from the requirements of foreseeability and of privity, which is still generally enforced for such claims in a commercial setting. See UCC § 2–715; J White and R Summers, Uniform Commercial Code 389, 396, 406–10 (2nd edn. 1980).

In products-liability law, where there is a duty to the public generally, foreseeability is an inadequate brake. Cf. Petitions of Kinsman Transit Co., 388 F. 2d 821 (CA2 1968). See also Perlman, “Interference with Contract and Other Economic Expectancies: A Clash of Tort and Contract Doctrine” 49 U. Ch. L. Rev. 61, 71–2 (1982). Permitting recovery for all foreseeable claims for purely economic loss could make a manufacturer liable for vast sums. It would be difficult for a manufacturer to take into account the expectations of persons downstream who may encounter its product. In this case, for example, if the charterers—already one step removed from the transaction—were permitted to recover their economic losses, then the companies that subchartered the ships might claim their economic losses from the delays, and the charterers’ customers also might claim their economic losses, and so on. “The law does not spread its protection so far.” Robins Dry Dock and Repair Co. v. Flint, 275 US 303, 309, 48 S. Ct. 134, 135, 72 L. Ed. 290 (1927).

And to the extent that courts try to limit purely economic damages in tort, they do so by relying on a far murkier line, one that negates the charterers' contention that permitting such recovery under a products-liability theory enables admiralty courts to avoid difficult linedrawing. Cf. Ultramares Corp. v. Touche, 255 NY 170, 174 NE 441 (1931); State of Louisiana ex rel. Guste v. M/V Testbank, 752 F. 2d 1019, 1046–52 (CA5 1985) (en banc) (dissenting opinion), cert. pending, no. 84–1808.

D. For the first three counts, the defective turbine components allegedly injured only the turbines themselves. Therefore, a strict products-liability theory of recovery is unavailable to the charterers. Any warranty claims would be subject to Delaval's limitation, both in time and scope, of its warranty liability. App. 78–9. The record indicates that Seatrain and Delaval reached a settlement agreement. Deposition of Stephen Russell, p. 32. We were informed that these charterers could not have asserted the warranty claims. See Tr. of Oral Arg. 36. Even so, the charterers should be left to the terms of their bargains, which explicitly allocated the cost of repairs.

In the charterers' agreements with the owners, the charterers took the ships in "as is" condition, after inspection, and assumed full responsibility for them, including responsibility for maintenance and repairs and for obtaining certain forms of insurance. Tr. of Oral Arg. 11, 16–17, 35; App. 86, 88, 99, 101, 112, 114, 125–6, 127. In a separate agreement between each charterer and Seatrain, Seatrain agreed to guarantee certain payments and covenants by each charterer to the owner. App. 142–6. The contractual responsibilities thus were clearly laid out. There is no reason to extricate the parties from their bargain.

Similarly, in the fifth count, alleging the reverse installation of the astern guardian valve, the only harm was to the propulsion system itself rather than to persons or other property. Even assuming that Delaval's supervision was negligent, as we must on this summary judgment motion, Delaval owed no duty under a products-liability theory based on negligence to avoid causing purely economic loss. Cf. Flintkote Co. v. Dravo Corp., 678 F. 2d 942 (CA11 1982); S. M. Wilson and Co. v. Smith International, Inc. 587 F. 2d 1363 (CA9 1978). Thus, whether stated in negligence or strict liability, no products-liability claim lies in admiralty when the only injury claimed is economic loss.

While we hold that the fourth count should have been dismissed, we affirm the entry of judgment for Delaval.

17. CAUSATION

Case 76

REICHSGERICHT (THIRD CIVIL SENATE) 13 OCTOBER 1922

RGZ 105, 264

On 2 January 1920, as the plaintiff's husband was about to alight from a tram, he was shot in the arm above the elbow by a policeman aiming at an escaping criminal. He was taken to hospital, contracted influenza (then prevalent in the hospital), and died on 18 March of a suppuration which developed in the chest in connection with the influenza. The plaintiff claims from the Prussian State under the Act of 1 August 1909 compensation for the loss arising from the death of her husband, caused by the fault of the policeman. The Landgericht granted her claim in part; the Court of Appeal rejected it completely. The plaintiff's application for review succeeded for these.

Reasons

The Court of Appeal agreed with the Landgericht in finding it proved that the policeman who shot the plaintiff's husband was guilty of a negligent breach of his official duty. Unlike the Landgericht, however, it denied the causal connection between that shooting and the husband's death. It regarded the influenza, from which the victim died, as a mere “subsequent accidental illness” and continued: At a time when the influenza epidemic was so widespread throughout Germany, no particular causal significance can be attached to the fact that at that time the influenza was fiercely raging in the hospital and especially in the ward into which the plaintiff’s husband was taken. The risk of infection was the same inside the hospital as it was outside. Moreover, it is generally accepted that in hospitals the better hygienic arrangements and the continuous medical assistance if anything reduce such risks. Further, the applicant’s case was not strengthened by the argument that the weakening of the victim’s system by the shooting affected his resistance to infection or the illness that followed it.

The applicant rightly complains that in this way the Court of Appeal makes too rigorous demands for the acceptance of a causal connection. There is no doubt that between the shooting and the death of the plaintiff’s husband a causal connection in the natural, mechanical sense does exist: the plaintiff’s husband was taken into the hospital because he was shot. In the hospital he was attacked by the outbreak of influenza and succumbed to that illness. That causal connection was not excluded by the mere possibility that he could have contracted influenza elsewhere, and also without the shooting.

Moreover, according to case-law the causal connection—the so-called adequate connection—exists here. The taking of the injured person to the hospital was an unobjectionable (even though not absolutely necessary), appropriate, and normal consequence of the injury. However, once in hospital he was, contrary to the opinion of the Court of Appeal, exposed to the risk of infection by a complaint prevalent to a particularly high degree because he could not escape from the company of the sick, as he might otherwise have done. He had to stay night and day in the ward where the influenza raged. That fact involved an enhancement of the risk of infection, according to human experience, and cannot be outweighed by any hygienic arrangements in the hospital or the care of the doctors and nurses. It must also be accepted that an injury, such as here existed, even if its cure progressed favourably, is in general not without effect on the resistance of the injured person against otherwise injurious influenza and that, therefore, the risk of an infection and its consequences is much greater than if there had been no injury. Accordingly, in agreement with the Landgericht, the shooting must be in law found to have been a contributory cause of the death of the plaintiff’s husband.

Case 77

REICHSGERICHT (SIXTH CIVIL DIVISION) 22 JUNE 1931

RGZ 133, 126

Reasons

The only point in dispute in the appeal is whether the fault of the plaintiff contributed as a cause to the automobile accident of 9 November 1928 (§ 9 Automobile Act, § 254 BGB). The Court of Appeal, which decided in the plaintiff’s favour, denied this for the following reasons. Admittedly he acted carelessly, for that as a pedestrian he failed, before crossing the road, to ascertain whether an automobile was approaching. The co-defendant driver, however, was not prevented from avoiding the accident, which he could easily have done, and which was his duty. No adequate causal connection, therefore, existed between the plaintiff’s conduct and the accident.

The complaint that in these explanations the concept of adequate causal connection was misunderstood is well founded. There can be no doubt that a natural causal connection existed between the plaintiff's conduct and the accident, for if he had not crossed the street at the very moment that the defendant's automobile overtook J's cart, he could not have been struck by it. That was apparently the view of the judge of First Instance. But the facts must also be regarded as showing an adequate causal connection. Such a connection exists where an act or omission, generally, not only under especial and quite improbable circumstances which are not to be anticipated in the regular course of things, is capable of producing the result that occurred [references]. But in view of present traffic conditions, it cannot be accepted as inconceivable, that at the moment a pedestrian crosses the road, an automobile will pass over the same spot. The appellate judges seem to have been of the same mind; for they found a lack of foresight in the plaintiff's not looking round for any approaching automobiles, and therefore held him to have been at fault (§ 276 BGB).

Accordingly, the causation and fault of both parties must be balanced against each other according to § 9 of the Automobile Act and § 254 BGB. This balancing is essentially a matter for the trial judge and is reserved to the court below.

Case 78

REICHSGERICHT (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 26 APRIL 1937
RGZ 155, 37

[The facts of the case are not entirely clear but what appears to have happened is that the plaintiff suffered from morbid disturbances which impaired her earning capacity. The part of the judgment that is reproduced here discusses a causal point, namely whether her state is due to the defendant's negligence or should be attributed to her nervous disposition induced by her pregnancy.]

1. . . .

2. . . .

3. . . .

4. The plaintiff submits the opinion and report of the director of a university women's clinic and has nominated him as a witness. Although a judge of fact is entrusted with the choice of experts the Court of Appeal in the present case has rejected the request with a reasoning extracted from the factual content of the opinion, but which is legally objectionable. That reasoning is, according to the final sentence of the opinion, that the plaintiff's present state is conditioned by the pregnancy that produced twins. The expert's explanation must however be understood in its context. He says: the possibility remains open that the lady, affected mentally and bodily by the accident, was burdened by the beginning of the pregnancy, in which she was carrying twins, to quite an exceptional degree; but one can best account for the plaintiff's condition by assuming that she had received severe damage by the accident, especially to her nerves. Moreover, there were also some slight bodily changes. So the opinion says: "If the lady with her delicate constitution had not become pregnant, all consequences of the accident would probably have been made good. However, her present state is conditioned by the pregnancy, especially as she was carrying twins." It would follow from this that the accident was still one condition of the plaintiff's present state. The pregnancy would indeed have affected the course of her state of health; but her present state would not have come into existence without the accident. That the causal connection was broken by the pregnancy cannot be said: the cause of her present state can still be adequately linked to the accident.

5. The Court of Appeal further admits that the origin of nervous disturbance which really existed, is to be traced to the accident, that the plaintiff, however, had a nervous predisposition and that it combined with her fantasies to affect the extent of the disturbances. The Court of Appeal is only willing to take all these disturbances into account down to the end of July 1933, in assessing medical expenses relying for that on the opinion of the expert K. Indeed, he too admits that the accident precipitated in the susceptible patient a lively "mental reaction" with various morbid excitable states, but is of the opinion that the accident was not responsible for the plaintiff's especial mental disposition which was at the root of her nervous disturbance. This view is based on a legal error. If any accident strikes a person in a weakened state of health and the consequences have been so serious because of that state of health that his earning capacity is diminished, the law treats that diminution entirely as a consequence of the accident; in other words: anyone who commits an unlawful act against a person in weakened health has no right to be placed in the same position as if he had injured a person in perfect health.

Case 79

REICHSGERICHT (EIGHTH CIVIL SENATE) 29 APRIL 1942

RGZ 169, 117

On 20 January 1937 the plaintiff (a chimney-sweep) was struck down by a lorry owned by the second defendant and driven by the first; he suffered various injuries. The accident was caused by unlawful driving on the part of the first defendant, who was convicted of an offence under § 335 StGB. The plaintiff claims damages for this accident; he demands RM 6000 for pain and suffering and RM 1725 for loss of earnings until 30 June 1938 and monthly payments of RM 100 from 1 July. The Landgericht allowed the claim in general but fixed the damages for pain and suffering at RM 3000. On appeal by the defendants, the Oberlandesgericht reduced the damages for pain and suffering and the compensation for the period until 30 June 1938 to one-half, the monthly payments for the period from 1 July to 31 December 1938 to RM 50, from 1 January 1939 to 30 June 1940 to RM 17.50, from 1 July to 30 November to RM 10.50, and from 1 December 1940 onwards to RM 7.50.

On the plaintiff's application for review, the Landgericht's decision was restored as regards the capital payments claimed; as regards the monthly payments the case was sent back to the Oberlandesgericht for these.

Reasons

The defendants no longer object to the order obliging them to pay compensation for the damage done by the accident; nor is any doubt cast on the first defendant's conviction. The dispute between the parties is limited to whether the pain and suffering and loss of earning capacity are to be traced to the accident. While the Landgericht recognized this to the full extent, the Oberlandesgericht, on the basis of a fresh expert opinion of University Professor Dr von G, adopted a division of percentages. According to that opinion, the plaintiff suffered from a disease called arthrosis deformans (deforming arthrosis with degeneration of the joints), which is to be traced to a predisposition. But, in addition, down to the end of 1938 there were signs of so-called arthritis which arose from the accident. Moreover, sciatica on the left side, which also occurred down to the end of 1938, was produced by a predisposition but was brought into the open as an illness by the accident. According to the expert's opinion, the sick state of the plaintiff was traceable in equal shares to his predisposition and the accident. With this predisposition the plaintiff's illness was suddenly brought into the open by the accident which he suffered; besides, experience shows that those signs appeared in much greater degree, developed more quickly, and resulted as a rule in a more protracted illness than if it had developed only from the predisposition. Accordingly, the expert holds that down to the end of 1938 the illness was due about 50 per cent to the predisposition, the rest to the accident. Afterwards, when the arthritic complaints faded away, he traces the plaintiff's condition as 75 per cent to his predisposition and only 25 per cent to the accident. According to his opinion even without the accident, which brought it into the open, his illness would conceivably have broken out in the course of 1937 or 1938 from some other cause (by catching a cold or the like). In accordance with this opinion, the Oberlandesgericht awarded to the plaintiff, who had had to employ an assistant because of his illness, only half the damages for pain and suffering, assessed at RM 3000, and half of the expense of employing assistants in 1937 and 1938, and as regards the monthly payments demanded for the following period only 25 per cent of his shortfall, which it assesses at 70 per cent of the payments demanded.

The applicant for review rightly takes objection to this partition of the damage suffered by the plaintiff. The Court of Appeal misunderstands the concept of causal connection, as it has been shaped by the writers and the courts. The court has to answer the question of causal connection not only according to the view of the medical expert but independently by having regard to the relevant legal prerequisites, which may lead to deviations from the medical view (JW 1938 (no. 4), 105; SeuffArch. 95, no. 9). It is recognised that even illnesses that are brought to light by an accident, only because there was a predisposition thereto in the injured person, are treated by the law as consequences of the accident to their full extent; anyone who commits an unlawful act against a person in weak health has no right to be treated as though he had injured a completely healthy person (RGZ 151, 283; 155, 41; SeuffArch. 95, no. 9). The causal connection between the act of the person inflicting the damage and the damage is also not excluded because the particular consequence that followed from the injurious act could have occurred through another event that definitely happened later on (RGZ 141, 365; 144, 80 and 348; similarly Kommentar zum ABGE 4, n 1d to § 1294). For that other event, the occurrence of which without the injurious act of the first defendant the Court of Appeal regards as certain in agreement with the expert opinion (catching cold and the like), would not have deprived the first defendant's act of its causal responsibility for the damage; instead that act has prevented the second event from being itself the cause of the damage. The accident to the plaintiff, which induced the illness, must, therefore, be looked upon as itself causing the damage that occurred in full even if the consequences could have been produced without the accident by a cold or the like because of the plaintiff's predisposition—an occurrence which the Court of Appeal took into account without more ado. The plaintiff's predisposition is important only in so far as, like advancing old age, in course of time and without the intervention of anything particularly inducing illness, reduces earning capacity and so influences the amount of damage. Only with this limitation is it right for the appellate judge to form the opinion that, where symptoms of illness are brought to light by an accident which triggered them off, the person to blame can be made liable only for the portion of its consequences that can be traced to it but not for those that are brought about by the predisposition. A partition of the consequences of an accident by percentages, as where the injured party shares the blame, is quite impossible in such cases.

In the present case the damage to the plaintiff consists in his no longer being able to undertake the heavier work of chimney-sweeping, in particular climbing up the chimney and therefore being greatly hindered in the exercise of his craft since bent chimneys (Schiefkamine) are common. To carry on with his business he has had to employ an assistant. It is a question of how long the plaintiff would have been able to expect to carry on his business without help but for the accident, and when therefore his predisposition would, even without the accident, have made it impossible for him to attend the cleaning of Schiefkamine. According to the expert's opinion the arthritic symptoms which made him unable to work are traceable to the accident. These symptoms, which must be judged to be a development of the pre-existing arthrosis—which did not affect his ability to work—lasted until the end of 1938. Since then only the arthrosis remains to which, though its effects were exacerbated by the accident, he is substantially predisposed. Hence it can now be said that the damage sustained by the plaintiff down to 30 June 1938 is traceable to its full extent to the accident and must, therefore, be made good by the defendants. The same applies to the damages the plaintiff claims for pain and suffering. The judgment appealed against, which remains unaltered in so far as it orders payment by the defendants, must therefore be modified as regards the damages for pain and suffering and the amounts claimed for the period down to 30 June 1938. As concerns the monthly payments for the period from 1 July 1938 onwards, further elucidation is needed up to what time the plaintiff might have been expected, without the accident, to be in a position to devote himself without assistance to his occupation, and from what date the natural development of his predisposition to arthrosis would have made it impossible for him to carry on his business without assistance. Up to that moment he must be awarded the monthly payments that he claims, the Court of Appeal having fixed the cost of an assistant at over RM 100 a month; for the subsequent period (irrespective of the amounts already awarded him with final effect) he has no longer a claim.

Case 80

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (FIRST CIVIL SENATE) 23 OCTOBER 1951
BGHZ 3, 261 = VERSR 1952, 128

On 27 July 1948 six ships entered down stream the Datteln lock of the Lippe Side Canal. The first, the tug Dollart, was moored to barges Gesine and Heinrich Hirdseg (HH9), which were moored behind each other to the south wall. In the fourth place followed the MS Edelweiss, laden with 360 tonnes of wheat, on the way from Bremen to Rüdeseim. The Edelweiss lay on the starboard side of the HH9 and was moored to the north wall. Finally came the motor ships Weser I and Nixe moored behind each other to the north wall. The walls of the Datteln locks are strengthened towards the bottom so that their chambers have a conical instead of a rectangular cross-section. As the water-level then stood, with a difference of 7.46 m between high and low water, the clear distance between the wall diminished from 12.77 m above to 12.31 m below. For that reason the lock personnel were instructed to pass through ships side by side of the overall breadth of 11.75 m only.

In the absence of the lock-keeper, the lock was operated by the subordinate T. He asked the skippers of HH9 and Edelweiss beforehand about the breadth of their craft. Edelweiss gave her breadth correctly as 6.67 m, whereas the skipper S gave the breadth of HH9 incorrectly as 5 m. It was actually 5.87 m. The pump operator M received the same answers to his questions. The subordinate T accepted the declared overall breadth as satisfactory, shut the upper gate, and emptied the lock chamber. As the water dropped, Edelweiss and HH9, which originally floated freely, were pressed together and also left rubbing marks on both walls. They were disregarded and the process was continued until the lower water level was reached. It was only when the skipper of the tug Dollart tried to drag the barges Gesine and HH9 that it was noticed that the latter was stuck fast to the Edelweiss and could not be moved. So Dollart dragged only Gesine out. Thereupon T and M, in the lock-keeper's absence, decided to free the ships by raising the level of water in the lock chamber. The lower gate was shut and the sluice-boards of the upper gate raised 19 cm. The water level rose at a rate of 25 cm in a minute and a half. But the boats that were stuck together did not float up evenly. They were lifted like a roof along their common surface of contact but with their other surfaces listed, hanging on the lock walls. The Edelweiss, which had only a 15 cm freeboard, was threatened with flooding. Despite persistent danger signals the lock personnel failed to stop the rush of water in time. The Edelweiss filled with water and sank. Only the crew could be saved.

The plaintiff, who had insured the owner of the Edelweiss, indemnified him and claimed DM 103,605 as compensation from the defendant as owner of the HH9, on the ground that the damage had been caused by its skipper's incorrect statement of its breadth. The defendant rejected the claim, disputing the causality of the incorrect statement and attributed the damage exclusively to the unskilful steps taken by the lock personnel.

The Navigation Court declared the claim (originally only for a part claim amounting to DM 10,000) against the defendant and the skipper S justified in full against the latter, but limited as to the defendant to the ship and cargo or their value. Only the plaintiff and the defendant appealed. The Court of Appeal allowed in full the claim, extended in the second instance to the total damage, and now directed only against the defendant, and rejected the defendant's appeal.

The application for review resulted in the decision being quashed and the case being referred back for the following.

Reasons

The Court of Appeal holds that the master's incorrect statement of the HH9's breadth was the immediate and adequate cause, not only of the jamming together of the ships, but also of the additional damage that arose from the loosening of the ships from the jam. It went on to say that jamming on leaving a lock, though infrequent, was not extraordinary, and that the instructions to the lock personnel took account of such an occurrence. In any case, the removal of the jam by letting the water in was not an extraordinary but the only solution. Risks in operating locks are always a matter of practical experience. These risks are multiplied if one of the foreseen dangers, here the jamming, intervenes and must be removed in a usual way, in accordance with practical experience. In so doing increased account must be taken of a failure, at the same time both human and technical in character. That is not at all improbable and should, according to general human experience, have been recognized by the bargemaster. Accordingly, the failure of the lock personnel was not enough to break the causal connection between the incorrect information about the breadth and the sinking of the Edelweiss.

It must be conceded to the applicant that the statements concerning the causal connection as a presupposition of the defendant's liability are not free from legal error. To begin with, the assumption that the blameworthy conduct of the master S was the immediate cause of the damage is not correct. S did nothing to lay Edelweiss alongside HH9 and thereby provide the first condition for the subsequent jamming. The choice of the berth depended on the free decision of the master of Edelweiss. Likewise, the placing of the boat at that spot depended on the decision of the lock personnel, who alone had to determine the occupation of the lock and approved the laying side by side, so as to make better use of the space. However, S's incorrect statement of the breadth led to that decision and in that way indirectly caused the jamming. It is certain that the lock personnel would not have allowed the boats to be placed side by side, if they had known the correct breadth of the HH9. The incorrect information was therefore, in spite of its merely indirect operation, a conditio sine qua non of the further course of events.

However, this alone does not prove that S caused the damage in such a way as to incur liability. It has long been undisputed in legal literature and case-law that the scope of such natural logical causes is commonly far too wide for all their consequences to be imputed to the person causing them. Hence the jurists have elaborated the concept of adequate causation, which, according to the Reichsgericht's decision of 18 November 1932 [reference], should make it possible to exclude some conditions, which from the point of view of natural science were conditions of a certain consequence, and without whose existence the consequence would not have occurred, for the purpose of causal connection in a legal sense; and the conditions which are logically most remote from the consequence should be excluded, because a consideration of those conditions would also lead to legal results that are at variance with equity.

Adequate cause has been formulated mainly by von Kries, Rümelin, and Traeger (cf. summary in Lindenmaier, "Adequate cause and proximate cause" in Festschrift für Wüstendörfer, Zeitschrift für das gesamte Handelsrecht und Konkursrecht 113, Heft 3/4 (Stuttgart 1950)). Common to these formulations is the valuation of a concrete conditio sine qua non on the basis of its tendency to favour the consequence according to general standards. They differ according to the point of view from which the valuation is undertaken. While von Kries, the creator of the concept of adequate cause, prefers to undertake a valuation on the basis of all circumstances known or knowable individually to the originator of the condition at the time of its entry (ex ante), and also taking into account general practical knowledge (ex post) based on experience, Rümelin puts forward the theory of "objective hindsight". For the formation of a judgment of possibility he prefers to have regard to the whole empirical knowledge of mankind and all the circumstances anywhere to hand at the time the condition occurred, whether they were recognizable by the most superior discernment or had first become recognisable ex post from events following the condition in question.

Von Kries's individual foresight proved to be too narrow for private law cases of objective strict liability and contractual liability, Rümelin's objective hindsight too wide, to exclude with certainty the inequitable results of the condition theory. Rümelin himself accordingly found it necessary to curtail his doctrine, in so far as by the condition in question the injured party was brought into contact in time or in space with the damage-producing event. Traeger avoided the defects in both formulations with the following formulation (Kausalbegriff im Zivil- und Strafrecht (1904), 159): An event is an adequate condition of a consequence if it has in a general and appreciable way enhanced the objective possibility of a consequence of the kind that occurred. In making the necessary assessment account is to be taken only of:

- (a) all the circumstances recognisable by an “optimal” observer at the time the event occurred,
- (b) the additional circumstances known to the originator of the condition.

The factual situation so established is, according to Traeger, to be examined by applying the whole human experience available at the time a decision is made to see whether it appreciably favoured the occurrence of the damage-producing event (cf. Lindenmaier, op. cit., 223–6).

Traeger’s formulation has been followed in essentials by the Reichsgericht since the decision in RGZ 133, 126, 127, more recently in the form that there is an adequate connection “if a fact in general and not under special peculiar quite improbable circumstances, to be disregarded according to the regular course of things, was apt to produce a consequence”.

This formulation expressed until now unaltered in essentials in many decisions (RGZ 133, 126; 135, 154; 148, 165; 152, 49; 148, 38; 168, 88; 169, 91) has also been followed by this Senate, maintaining the grounds for decision laid down by Traeger. Admittedly—as Lindenmaier points out (op. cit., 239, 241)—one must not forget the starting-point of the inquiry: namely the search for a corrective that restricts the scope of the purely logical consequences, in order to produce an equitable result to the imputable consequences. Only if the courts are conscious of the fact that it is a question here not really of causation but of the fixing of the limits within which the originator of a condition can equitably be presumed liable for its consequences, and therefore of establishing in reality a positive condition of liability (Larenz, Vertrag und Unrecht 12, 14; Lindenmaier, op. cit., 239, 241–2), will the danger of a schematisation of the formula be avoided and correct results be guaranteed.

That in the case before us the jamming of the boats was an adequate consequence of the incorrect information (concerning the breadth of the vessel) was accepted by the Court of Appeal without error of law. But the jamming produced no provable damage, since matters were at a standstill and the boats lay quietly on an even keel in the lock chamber. However, the first real damage-producing consequence came later, and in assessing them the Court of Appeal did not pay sufficient attention to the possibly necessary restriction of liability, when, while recognizing it the court declined to consider the failure of the lock personnel. It is true that the Reichsgericht has repeatedly recognized that anyone who has caused an accident must also answer for such consequences as are first produced in the course of conduct made unavoidable by the accident, through an intervening lack of skill, because according to human experience it must be taken into account that not all conduct will necessarily be perfect and accompanied by the desired result (RGZ 102, 230; 105, 264; 119, 204; RG HRR 28, 831; RG JW 1911, 755). This principle, however, does not apply without exception and cannot lead to saddling the person responsible for an accident indiscriminately with all consequences that, without his doing, are brought about in a completely unusual and inappropriate way by persons who are completely unauthorised to intervene (cf. the aforementioned decisions RGZ 102, 230 and JW 1911, 755).

The defendant had pointed out that such an unusual and grossly incorrect intervention of the lock personnel did occur and the Court of Appeal should therefore have made a detailed examination of their behaviour, instead of contenting itself with the remark that “no matter how significant the signs of the failure of the lock personnel they did not suffice for a break in the causal connection, above all because there could be no question of the accident being intentionally brought about by the lock personnel”.

The question raised by the concept of intentional conduct has no place in this connection, which is concerned only with the concept of causation. It requires only an examination of whether an “optimal” observer would normally have been able to take into account the behaviour of the lock personnel as it is presented—and, for the most part, undisputed—at the moment the condition on which liability was based—i.e. the incorrect declaration of breadth—occurred. The omission of that examination not only justifies the procedural objection raised by the application for review that the factual situation was not exhaustively dealt with, but leads to a recognition that the Court of Appeal did not apply the correct standard for distinguishing between imputable and inadequate consequences.

Among the circumstances which could form independent causes of damage according to the factual situation, the following were to be examined:

1. the fact that the lock-keeper neglected, contrary to § 2 no. 2 of the service instructions, to supervise the operation of the lock in person, that he left the operation to the subordinate who had not been appointed as his representative and who had continued it although the marks of rubbing on the lock walls ought to have made him notice that the boats were jammed;
2. the fact that after the jamming the lock personnel and the pump engineer had, of their own volition and contrary to an express prohibition in the service instructions, tried to break the jam by letting in the water, without warning the lock-keeper, who was alone empowered to do so by the instructions, and leaving to him the removal of the obstacle, and all of it although there was no occasion for precipitate action, since the course of events had come to a standstill once the lower water-level had been reached;
3. the fact, asserted by the defendant and established by evidence, that the lock-keeper would have been able to break the jam without danger to the boats, as he had done on several previous occasions, perhaps by removing obstacles created by good fenders and coverings and by carefully raising the water-level, if need be by manually working the sluice-boards;
4. the fact that the raising of the water-level was so quick that within one and a half minutes the freeboard of the Edelweiss, which was only 15 cm high, was bound to be flooded if the jam were not broken and the boats did not float up as intended;
5. the fact of the failure in the electricity supply, which remains unexplained, when and why it happened . . .

It may be that one or even several of these facts fall within the scope of the dangers which experience would lead one to expect, so that their foreseeability, taken one by one, could be affirmed. Nevertheless it should have been examined whether the coincidence of these manifold conditions, in part possibly accidental, were not unusual and outside the scope of normal risks. In that connection it should be noted that conditions were under consideration which reinforced each other and only in combination led to the perilous aggravation of the situation that had little to do with the original creation of the jam.

The Court of Appeal's findings of fact do not go far enough to enable the court of review to decide finally the question of causal connection. The part played by the lock personnel in the course of the accident must be elucidated, if need be with the help of independent experts, and then a fresh conclusion reached on the responsibility of the defendant.

Case 81

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 12 MARCH 1996
BGHZ 132, 164 = NJW 1996, 1533 = JZ 1996, 1178

Facts

The claimant Land ("the claimant") is suing the defendant (on the basis of a right acquired by subrogation from the police officer W) for costs of medical treatment (DM 77,572.73) salary (DM 67,191.43) and damaged uniform (DM 300). The police officers W and M had brought the defendant (then nearly 17 years old) and Ü (also a juvenile) before a magistrate. They had been arrested on suspicion of car break-ins and house thefts. They had numerous previous convictions. After their judicial examination, they escaped through a window about 4 metres above the ground on the first floor of the court building. Ü jumped first. M ran down the stairs in pursuit but W ran to the window. The claimant says he could have caught the defendant there, but the defendant pulled him down with him. The defendant claims that he was about 10 metres away from the building when W jumped after him. Ü was uninjured but the defendant broke his arm. W fractured both legs. He was treated in hospital for about 6 months, and was unfit for work for about a year and a half altogether.

The Landgericht allowed the claim. The appeal of the defendant was unsuccessful. His appeal in law led to quashing and reference back.

Reasons

I. The appeal court left undecided the question of whether the defendant pulled W down with him through the window opening, or whether W jumped after the defendant. Even in the latter case it considered that the defendant would be obliged to provide compensation for harm under § 823 (1) of the BGB in combination with § 95 of the NdsBG. This was because W would then have been provoked by the defendant, in such a way as to give rise to liability, to jump after him. The defendant should in all the circumstances have reckoned on the police officer jumping after him. Admittedly, W also laid himself open to the accusation of negligence, as he must have known that he was exposing himself to a substantial risk by jumping from a height of 4 metres. But this did not lead to a limitation of the defendant's liability, because he had created the quite decisive cause of W's injury.

II. The appeal court judgment does not withstand the arguments against it in the appeal in law in every respect. On the basis of the defendant's claim, assumed by the appeal court to be correct, that W jumped after him through the window opening when he was escaping, the appeal court's view that W's injuries arising from the jump were to be attributed to the defendant in liability law admittedly reveals no error of law. But the appeal court's reasoning, that W was not guilty of any contributory fault which would affect the outcome of the case is not legally tenable.

1. According to the constant case law of the Senate, someone who by his reprehensible conduct provokes another person to behaviour which endangers that other person can be obliged in tort law to provide compensation to him for the harm which has arisen as a consequence of the risk which was increased by the provocation (references omitted). The claimant's voluntary decision must however be based on motivation which deserves approval at least to some extent. The Senate has found tortious liability on such a basis, in particular in cases in which someone seeks to escape from arrest, or provisional arrest, by police officers, or other persons authorised to make an arrest, by flight. The flight has provoked these persons in a reprehensible manner to a pursuit which endangers them and in which they have then suffered harm because of the increased risk (references omitted). In these kinds of cases, motivation deserving approval causing the pursuer to rush after the fugitive in spite of the special associated dangers, can, as the Senate has repeatedly emphasised, be based, amongst other things, on the official duties of the officer responsible for guarding the fugitive (references omitted). The Senate adheres to this case law.

(a) The appeal in law unsuccessfully objects (referring to Steffen [reference omitted]) to the fact that, in cases of the kind present here, the risk associated with the pursuit by the police officer is part of the risks of his employment commitment, and that duties to compensate for harm cannot therefore be based on the behaviour of the fugitive. Undoubtedly for a police officer, the risk involved in the employment commitment covers the "normal" risk of injury which is not especially based on the circumstances of the pursuit (and therefore is part of the general risks of life) and the harm which may result to the pursuer. For a police officer therefore there may be no transfer of the risks to the escaping criminal unless the necessary internal connection with the pursuit exists (references omitted). On the question of transferring to the fugitive an "increased" risk associated with pursuit, (and the case in dispute is only about the realisation of this) it admittedly must be borne in mind that an officer whose official tasks include pursuing criminals in the public interest may feel himself called on to undertake greater risks, in his efforts to fulfil his duty carefully to a greater extent than other people (reference omitted). But, in the Senate's view, this does not lead, when the necessary boundary is drawn between the areas of risk of the pursuer and the pursued, to an unreasonable transfer of risks to the fugitive, if he knows that his pursuer, or potential pursuer, is a person whose job requires him to act in this way. This is because the fugitive must in this case take into account that the pursuer may undertake a higher risk and this may possibly result in the fugitive having to assume an increased responsibility. He can take that into account by behaving in a way which prevents such risks arising. Admittedly on a just division of the risks of a pursuit, it should not be forgotten that the transfer of the increased risk will not lead to the fugitive being liable for the realisation of those dangers to which it was completely inappropriate for the pursuing officer to expose himself (references omitted). The assumption of responsibility for physical injury which arose from increased risk of this kind would not be covered by the protective purpose of § 823 (1) of the BGB.

Whether and to what extent an escaping criminal or suspect has accordingly to bear an increased risk of pursuit is determined by the peculiarities of each individual case; the prerequisites for a division of loss in accordance with § 254 of the BGB can also be fulfilled here. This will need more precise application in the case in question at a later juncture. It must however be emphasised here that, contrary to the view of the appeal in law, even with officers (in particular police officers), the risk they bear because of their work commitment does not exclude the transfer of the increased risk associated with pursuit to a fugitive.

(b) The appeal in law argues that the fugitive, could not be made responsible for harm which befell his pursuer during the pursuit, because action in one's own interest is not criminal. This objection is misconceived. Admittedly a criminal has no legal duty to give himself up to criminal prosecution. But the ground for civil law liability does not lie in the escape as such, as the appeal in law in the end does not fail to recognise. It is based instead on the fact that the fugitive, by the manner of his flight, has in a reprehensible manner provoked the pursuer to a reaction which endangers himself. The conduct of the fugitive which is contrary to duty consists in this pressure at a psychological level, causing the decision to make a pursuit which is required by duty (or which is at any rate desired by the legal order) with the special potential for danger which it holds (references omitted).

2. In the case in dispute, the factual findings of the appeal court support its legal assessment that W's injuries caused by the pursuit are objectively to be attributed to the defendant.

(a) Admittedly (and the appeal in law uses this as an argument) the Senate making the decision in its judgment of the 13 January 1976 (reference omitted) approved the decision at previous instance in that case, that a juvenile sought for the serving of a weekend detention who fled from a toilet window situated at a height of 4.05 metres did not have to assume liability for the fracture of the heel bone of a police officer who leapt after him, which this officer had sustained on impact with the asphalt yard. But this is not inconsistent with an affirmation of the defendant's liability in the present case. For one thing, the facts of each case differ. Apart from the fact that the appeal court did not establish the presence here of an asphalt or similar hard landing surface, there is a substantial difference from the above mentioned Senate's judgment. In the present case it was not merely a matter of arresting a juvenile whose home and place of residence were known for the serving of a weekend detention, but of resolving and punishing serious crimes, namely breaking into cars and house theft. As the two persons arrested had been punished for such crimes on numerous occasions, the commission of further crimes of the same kind was likely following a successful escape. The appropriate relationship between purpose and means, i.e. that the risks of pursuit should not be out of proportion to the goal of apprehending the fugitive, is, however, the essential gauge when examining the prerequisites for provocation to pursue and the transfer of the increased risk of injury to the fugitive (references omitted). If such proportionality is not maintained, physical injury of the pursuer, as already stated, will not fall within the protected area of the liability norm.

When comparing the present case with the Senate's decision of 13 January 1976 (reference omitted), it must finally be considered that the Senate making the decision did not actually deny objective attribution of the physical injury, in spite of the fact that the jump was from a height of 4.05 metres, but left the issue undecided. It let the liability on the part of the fugitive fail on subjective grounds, namely for lack of fault.

(b) On the question of the objective attribution, cases of the kind present here can on other grounds as well take into account other factors besides the height of the jumping-off point (which would in this respect perhaps be entirely a matter of a certain number of centimetres). Admittedly the transfer of the risk of injury to the fugitive is dependent on whether the pursuer should have felt himself called on to jump in pursuit, which, with unusually great heights, is not the case. In the critical area, which covers the present case of a height of about 4 metres, the special circumstances of the case in question must however in the end be the decisive factor. In this connection, besides the nature of the jumping-off point already mentioned above, amongst other things the age and physical condition of the person jumping in pursuit are also of importance. According to the findings of the appeal court, these factors in the present case gave no cause for the 31-year-old W to refrain from jumping.

(c) In examining the question of objective attribution, the court must finally also bear in mind (as did the appeal court) that W, in pursuing the defendant, had to make up his mind very quickly about whether to jump after him; and that therefore, as the appeal court explains, there was scarcely any time and opportunity left for him to weigh up the risks of a jump. On that account also, the requirements for deciding whether he was justified in feeling called on to act cannot be too high. For W, the way the situation presented itself was that two people had already jumped out of the window in front of him and both had then still been able to run away. The fact that in these circumstances W thought the danger of a substantial injury was not great enough to prevent him from jumping justifies (contrary to the view of the appeal in law), in the context of the peculiarities of the present case set out above under a and b, the appeal court's view that W could have felt himself to be called on to pursue in the sense of the case law on this subject.

3. The appeal court made no legal error in also attributing the physical injuries of W to the defendant in a subjective sense.

(a) The subjective side of the liability, i.e. the accusation of having culpably caused the physical injury of his pursuer, assumes that the fugitive had to take into account that he was being followed, and that he could also foresee that his pursuer might be harmed in the pursuit. It is not a necessary prerequisite for his liability that the fugitive was actually aware of the pursuit as such (reference omitted). The conduct which has provoked a pursuer (prepared to pursue out of motives deserving approval) to a reaction which endangers himself is no less in breach of duty just because the fugitive rushes away so fast that he cannot see whether the person he provokes actually commences pursuit. The fugitive can also be the "controller of events" in the sense of the case law (reference omitted) by forcing special potential for danger on his pursuer, if he prevents the person provoked by his escape from being able to consider carefully before going into a situation of increased danger. For this very reason he must take into account the possibility of a pursuit even into these special dangers. Any different view would, especially in relation to a jump from a window, as here, (where the fugitive himself can possibly not be aware of the pursuit at all) not take proper account of the fact that he has reprehensibly exposed his pursuer to an increased potential danger. Accordingly, the Senate making the decision has always considered as the only decisive factor the question of whether the fugitive by running away created, in a way that was attributable to and recognisable by him, a situation of increased risk of injury for the pursuer and whether he should have taken pursuit into account (references omitted). Even if the defendant therefore (on the basis of the description of the facts assumed by the appeal court, that he had already distanced himself 10 metres from the building when W jumped after him) was not to know of the pursuit by W, this is not a barrier to liability on his part.

(b) The appeal in law challenges the finding of the appeal court that the defendant should have taken into account that the police officer would jump after him, simply by reference to the special danger of a jump from a height of 4 metres. But this argument was already considered above not to be effective, when examining whether W ought to have felt himself to be provoked to make the jump. The grounds mentioned there suggested that, for the defendant (who of course exposed himself to the risk of injury from jumping), W, who was responsible for guarding him, would not be any less likely to do the same. The danger that W could be injured in so acting was likewise known to the defendant; it is also described by the appeal in law as clearly recognisable and obvious.

4. The judgment under challenge cannot however stand in relation to the appeal court's reasoning in refusing to divide the loss on the basis of § 254 (1) of the BGB.

(a) The appeal court proceeded without legal error on the basis that the accident was partly caused by W's fault. The fact that the defendant, as has been explained, provoked him in a reprehensible manner to jump after him and therefore in such a way as to oblige him to pay compensation, is not inconsistent with this. The connection in liability law between the psychological pressure to pursue and the injuries to the pursuer which occurred in the pursuit does not only exist when the person pursued is solely responsible for the harm. Allocation of the loss in cases of psychological causation admittedly assumes, as the Senate has stated on a number of occasions, that the person intervening ought to feel himself to be called on to act not merely in a general sense, but exactly in the way he chose (references omitted). But this limitation is only to exclude those cases in which the person intervening has taken on a risk which is so excessive that allocating it in law to the person who set the chain of causation in motion would cause the risk of liability to become infinite (reference omitted). For cases of the present kind, it does not follow from the above that, on a jump from a window from up to a certain height, the fugitive should be fully liable for his pursuer's injuries, and where this height is exceeded he should not be liable at all. Instead there remains room, as the Senate has already stated (where the pursuit should have been foreseen by the fugitive and its potential for harm does not exceed the unacceptability threshold mentioned above) for balancing the special circumstances of its actual execution in accordance with § 254 of the BGB (reference omitted). An "all-or-nothing" principle in such cases would often prevent a just assessment of each individual case, because a differentiated balancing exercise could not take place (reference omitted). The Senate making the decision has therefore already repeatedly approved decisions in which the judge of fact divided the loss on such a basis (references omitted).

(b) In the present case the facts established by the appeal court justify its view that W was partly responsible for his injuries. The fact that, as explained above, he had to decide very quickly whether he should jump after the defendant through the window opening, or perhaps like his colleague M take up the pursuit by the stairs, admittedly diminished the requirement for the care to be expected from him within the framework of § 254 of the BGB (reference omitted). But this did not relieve W of every duty of care in respect of his own interests (references omitted). He could also therefore, despite the required haste, recognise and bear in mind in his decision that the window was a considerable height above the ground and that a jump from the first storey of the building gave rise to a risk of not inconsiderable injuries, even though the defendant, and earlier the co-suspect Ü, survived their jumps apparently without serious injury. Therefore, as the appeal court explains, on careful consideration there were reasons for W not taking the risk of injury associated with the jump. Admittedly no protracted consideration was needed for the protection of his own interests which was required of him within the framework of § 254 of the BGB. But even with the need for a rapid decision, W could have considered and avoided the potential for danger which would come to mind with a jump from a height of 4 metres. The fact that W did not take account of this justifies the accusation of contributory fault.

(c) The partial responsibility which W bears cannot, however, on the basis of the considerations on this issue laid down by the appeal court, be regarded as so insignificant that it could be left entirely out of consideration within the framework of the balancing exercise under § 254 of the BGB for the allocation of loss. In taking the view that the defendant was solely liable, because he had provoked W and thereby created the quite decisive cause of his injury, the appeal court did not consider all the circumstances of the present case which were relevant in this respect, and this issue is subject to re-examination in the appeal in law (reference omitted). As the Senate has explained in its judgment of 12 July 1988 which has just been mentioned, in relation to division of liability under § 254 of the BGB it should be taken into account as a decisive factor whether the behaviour of the one or other party made the onset of the harm probable to a significantly higher degree. Here this requires balancing the extent to which the defendant and W could recognise and avoid of the risk of injury, according to an attribution appraisal, and this has not so far been undertaken by the appeal court. It also requires an explanation evaluating the grounds for saying whether and to what extent the defendant's provocation to take increased risks (as against W's exposing himself to a position of danger) made the onset of harm more probable.

III. The judgment of the appeal court relieving W from any participation in the harm must therefore be quashed and the matter referred back to the appeal court. The Senate making the decision cannot make a conclusive decision itself under § 565 (3) no. 1 of the Civil Procedure Code. For one thing the balancing of the responsibilities under § 254 of the BGB is for the judge of fact to assess and this information is only available to the court dealing with the appeal in law to a limited degree (reference omitted). For another thing, the appeal court has left open so far whether the defendant pulled W down with him when he jumped. As this could lead to full liability on the defendant's part, the appeal court will also have to make the necessary findings on this point, insofar as this should in its opinion now be material.

Case 82

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 24 APRIL 1952
NJW 1952, 1010 = VERSR 1952, 352

The husband/father of the plaintiffs was in 1937 struck by an automobile belonging to the defendant. In consequence of the accident, his right leg was amputated; he bore therefore an artificial leg and had to walk with the aid of two sticks. In a lawsuit it was established that the defendant was obliged as a joint debtor to make good all the damage arising from the accident of 1 February 1937.

In 1945 the husband/father of the plaintiffs was injured by artillery fire and died of that injury. He used at the time in question to set out in the evening to go to a bunker with the plaintiffs. In the afternoon of 31 March 1945 the place lay under artillery fire. The plaintiffs' family first stayed at home, and only when the firing stopped, set out for the bunker. While the three of them were on their way, the firing suddenly started up again. The first plaintiff ran to a house where he took shelter. The second plaintiff hurried to the bunker. The husband/father of the plaintiffs set out on the road but could cover the ground only slowly because of his lameness. Before he reached either a house or the bunker he was injured by a shell fragment.

The plaintiffs, considering the death of their husband/father as a further consequence of the 1937 automobile accident, demanded of the defendant compensation for the support they were deprived of in consequence of the death.

Reasons

Even if the laming of the first plaintiff's husband is looked upon as a conditio sine qua non (BGHZ 2, 138, 140 ff. = NJW 51, 711) for the injury from the shell fragment, it cannot be the basis for the defendant's liability, for there is no adequate causal connection between the laming due to the accident and the death resulting from the artillery fire. An adequate connection exists only "if according to general experience and not under especially peculiar, quite improbable circumstances, not to be contemplated according to the regular course of things, were apt to produce a consequence" (RGZ 113, 126, 127 and the later constant case-law of the RG). Whether there is "adequacy" is not really a question of causation but of setting the limits within which liability can equitably be attributed to the originator of the condition. Since in so doing we are concerned with an assessment which of its nature affords some room for judicial discretion, an element of uncertainty cannot be excluded, especially at the lower limit, in deciding whether the condition favoured the result to an appreciable degree. Such an uncertainty cannot be avoided either by applying other important legal concepts such as offending against good morals, important reason and, above all, against the principle of good faith. Only the idea of adequate causation can provide a sufficient guide. The question whether and in what measure a causal connection induces liability can never be exhaustively answered by abstract rules but can be decided in doubtful cases only by the judge according to his unfettered discretion having regard to all the circumstances; and only when it is borne in mind that the doctrine of adequate causation as a way of limiting liability is based on § 242 BGB, will the danger of schematising the formula be avoided and correct results obtained (BGHZ 3, 261, 267; Lindenmaier in Zeitschrift für das gesamte Handelsrecht und Konkursrecht 113, 239–43).

In agreement with both courts below, an adequate causation must be rejected, without any need to go into the formulations set out in the books, which are concerned with whether foreseeability of the consequence must be required and by what rules it must be determined. "Adequacy" is here excluded because the laming, by its general nature, did not enhance in what experience would show to be an appreciable degree, the probability of being struck by artillery fire. For a causal connection exists in a legal sense, as has already been mentioned, only when the condition originated by the person doing the damage is in a general way apt to produce the damage in question—especially peculiar and quite unusual circumstances which would not be taken into account in the regular course of things, being excluded. In examining, therefore, the facts, it must be determined whether a "general" favourable tendency exists, but a tendency will be disregarded which is so considerable that no account would be taken of it in ordinary experience (Lindenmaier, op. cit., 227; Enneccerus-Lehmann, Schuldrecht (13th edn., 1950) 63, fn. 6). Such a consequence, outside ordinary probability, must be treated as accidental and not imputable. That is so in the present case because a laming as such cannot in any case according to general experience be regarded as enhancing to an appreciable extent the danger of being wounded. Shell fire may make anyone, even healthy persons, liable to be hit. It is in no way foreseeable how hostile fire may be directed. For the civil population being struck by a shell was a "new and independent event" of a purely accidental character. The danger might be avoided to a certain extent by seeking shelter at once. Whether it was generally "right" to run to a neighbouring house or a bunker could be at least doubtful. The probability that the plaintiffs could be hit, when they ran to seek shelter, was, according to general experience, not less than the danger for the injured party in case he remained standing or lying down. In view of this "accidental effect" of a few shots happening at short intervals, running away might have proved "wrong" and standing or lying down "right". In view of the combinations of purely accidental conditions the injury to the first plaintiff's husband from shell fragments can no longer be regarded as an imputable consequence of the 1937 traffic accident.

Case 83

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (THIRD CIVIL SENATE) 25 SEPTEMBER 1952
BGHZ 7, 198 = NJW 1953, 700 = VERSR 1952, 430

The orphan plaintiffs claim compensation from the defendant for the damage they suffered from their mother's death as the consequence of an abortion carried out by the defendant. She felt herself pregnant in May 1949 as a result of intercourse with Sp. The defendant, who practises as a doctor, was at her request ready to perform an abortion in consideration for a fee. For that purpose he visited Frau S at Sp's home and with his help operated on her. He felt, but misunderstood, a peculiar structure in her womb and thought he noticed the remains of an afterbirth. After douching the womb with Sp's help he placed the patient on a sofa, and ordered her to rest in bed for three days and to see him in his surgery in 14 days. He left the house a few minutes before 4 p.m. Some 20 to 25 minutes later the patient complained of severe pains in her abdomen. At her request, Sp. hurried to the defendant's surgery, reported that Frau S was in pain, and obtained from him a pain-killer. When, after about an hour's absence, he came home, he found that her condition had deteriorated further. When a gynaecologist was eventually called in, arriving about 6 p.m., he found a severe internal haemorrhage, so he arranged for an immediate transfer to a hospital; and after about three-quarters of an hour he operated and found a rent in the womb and ascertained that the womb artery had been torn. Although he bandaged the source of blood and made a blood transfusion, the plaintiffs' mother died before the operation was complete.

The plaintiffs claimed compensation from the defendant in contract and delict for medical and hospital expenses together with payment of an annuity and also a declaration that they were entitled to be compensated for all further damage.

Both instances rejected the claim; the appellants demanded the case be sent for reconsideration.

Reasons

1. The Court of Appeal agreed with the Landgericht that the defendant caused the death of Frau S from loss of blood by piercing the wall of her womb and thus damaging the womb artery. It came, however, to the conclusion that he was not at fault in causing the injury.

The experts were unanimously of the opinion that an injury such as happened here could have been inflicted by even the most conscientious and experienced medical man in the course of an abortion; in following it the Court of Appeal made no mistake of law. Thus, such an injury could, but need not, have resulted from a careless and improper use of the instruments. The Court of Appeal acted consistently in examining whether such a careless act of the defendant in the present case was to be inferred either according to the prima-facie evidence or by way of circumstantial evidence. It said no to both questions.

(a) Whether this was a typical course of events affording sufficient prima facie evidence required, in the first place, a formulation of the results of experience and then its application to the present situation. Such a formulation is a conclusion of fact inferred from general circumstances and can, in these proceedings, be checked for correctness only in so far as it is drawn from established facts. The facts themselves cannot be checked; they must be proved by the person who seeks to found on them a prima facie case. The burden of proof is thus on the plaintiffs just as the other party must prove the possibility of a deviation from the typical course of events. When, therefore, the Court of Appeal reached the result, on the basis of expert opinions, that “no formulation from the results of experience can be established that the piercing of a womb in an abortion can as a rule be traced to a careless use of instruments by a doctor”, the unassailable finding of fact followed, that according to medical experience the injury in question was “possible even with a careful use of instruments” and could “find its explanation in the peculiar characteristics, not visible to the doctor, of the womb”. That under these circumstances experience afforded no prima-facie evidence was based on no error of law.

(b) The Court of Appeal considered that the defendant was at fault in not affording the required medical care after finishing the operation. But it declined to attribute fault to the general conduct of the defendant, which would also provide, as the plaintiffs contend, prima facie evidence of a faulty use of the instruments and therefore of his being to blame for the injury.

The court took into account various surprising and irregular circumstances such as the use of a camphor injection before the operation; the suspicion that a miscarriage was beginning; the failure to recognise the rupture of the artery; the leaving of an alleged afterbirth in the womb; and finally the omission still to be discussed, of an immediate reference to a hospital. While it adhered to the opinion that they did not constitute errors in medical practice, it saw in both of the last circumstances two blameworthy omissions; yet it considered that they did not disclose a general prolonged lack of medical conscientiousness or care, and that there was, as a whole, no typical conduct justifying a prima-facie presumption that the defendant did the injury to the wall of the womb and the opening of the artery through a careless use of instruments.

Here also no objection can be taken on legal grounds to the Court of Appeal's decision . . .

(c) It is on the other hand possible to treat fault in such a situation as an indication that the doctor was not careful in the operation itself. That point also was not missed by the Court of Appeal. But it considered the evidence insufficient to afford it the necessary certainty. It considered that the proved omissions predominantly disclosed a lack of conscientiousness in the after-care of the patient, whereas a fault in the abortion itself would consist in lack of care in the use of the instruments. The basis of the fault in the two cases would be too different to enable secure enough conclusions to be drawn from the one to the other. The court was entitled to value the indication as a means of information, and that valuation could not be checked in these proceedings, so that no legal error can be found to exist in its judgment.

II. The Court of Appeal, however, rightly found that the defendant was at fault in his neglectful conduct after finishing the actual operation. He ought not to have left a doubtful situation without getting rid of the afterbirth, and he ought, by that time, to have had the patient sent at once to a hospital. That he did not do so was described by the expert, Professor Ph., as "unintelligible", and the Court of Appeal rightly agreed with him. Complications had ensued which required further treatment in hospital, in relation to which it was irrelevant whether the defendant was to blame for them or not.

The Court of Appeal likewise declined to infer liability for the consequences because it denied causality. It inferred indeed from the opinions of the experts that an immediate transfer to the hospital would have improved the patient's chances of survival. But it held that death might have occurred even if there had been immediate transfer after the abortion and an operation without delay. It could "not decide beyond reasonable doubt that if the defendant had done his duty immediately after the operation or even when informed by Sp. that the patient was in pain, her life would have been saved".

These considerations do not make it quite clear whether the Court of Appeal had sufficiently in mind what was needed to prove causation. According to longstanding case-law it is not the strict rule of evidence in § 236 ZPO but that in § 287 that applies here . . . Under § 287 ZPO the court is not prevented from being convinced by the evidence and the circumstances that there is an adequate causal connection, even if the possibility cannot without reasonable doubt be excluded that the damage could have occurred without the defendant's fault. If, as here, the blameworthy conduct consisted in an omission, the question of adequate causation ought to be formulated as "whether that omission was in the ordinary way capable of producing a result, and not only under peculiar, quite improbable circumstances, not to be contemplated in the normal course of events". It is not, therefore, a question of whether other, not remote circumstances could have produced the result, but whether the injurious consequence could not have occurred in the normal course, or rather would have been produced only by special circumstances of that kind. Here the Court of Appeal had merely found that a dutiful conduct would not certainly have prevented the result, and that finding cannot be regarded as sufficient to exclude the omission as the cause of the result. The Court of Appeal ought to have considered in accordance with § 287 ZPO—if need be after further questioning the experts—whether it could have produced such a result.

III. The Court of Appeal started from the position that the operation was an unlawful attack on the mother's bodily integrity, and therefore an infringement of the protective enactments §§ 223, 218 StGB. Yet, it was unwilling to infer any liability from them because it did not see any causal connection between the operation and its fatal outcome. It explained that the defendant undertook the abortion as a doctor and carried it out according to the rules of medical art and science. Permitted abortions with the object of saving the life and health of the patient would be conducted in the same way. According to the expert, Professor Ph., injuries could occur outside the actual purpose of treatment. The doctor need not, however, as a rule take account of them when he started. In particular, complications dangerous to life were conditional on the intervention of peculiar or unfortunate circumstances, such as an opening of the womb artery through an injury to or spontaneous cleavage of the wall of the womb, which must in the normal course be disregarded. Even when such dangerous circumstances occur, the doctor would have means at his disposal to prevent a fatal outcome with some, though not absolutely sure, prospect of success. Thus, the possibility that an abortion undertaken by a doctor would lead to a patient's death was too remote for the assumption of a causal connection, giving rise to liability, between the operation and its fatal outcome.

1. These explanations exaggerate the requirements for adequate causation . . . It need not be decided whether there are medical operations in which complications dangerous to life can be produced only through the intervention of quite unique, quite improbable circumstances which can be disregarded according to the regular course of things. For an operation such as an abortion this was evidently assumed neither by the expert nor the Court of Appeal, for both reckoned with the possibility of such dangers and omitted to consider them only because in this case the doctor had appropriate means at his disposal, to which however the Court of Appeal accords only "some, though not a certain prospect of success".

If one starts from the position—as one must—that the entry of the aforementioned dangerous circumstances falls within the adequate consequences of an abortion, the further adequate causal connection cannot be denied on the ground that there was some possibility of preventing the fatal outcome. This denial of a causal connection is based on a fallacy similar to that which appeared in relation to the causality of the delayed transfer to the hospital. Once a danger to the patient's life appeared in any way, no peculiar and quite improbable circumstances were needed to lead to death, but, on the contrary, medical skill was needed to prevent it. Whether the prospects of success in those attempts to avert it were more or less great cannot alter the fact that a failure is the adequate consequence of a danger to life.

2. Moreover, the liability of the defendant cannot be denied on the ground that there was no causal connection between the illegal operation and its fatal outcome. That connection would be unimportant only if the operation was not illegal on the ground that the deceased not only agreed to but expressly wished it. The Court of Appeal was able to refuse to go more deeply into the question of what significance that wish had. It confined itself to the statement that consent to an abortion is forbidden and therefore legally inoperative . . . A consent is inoperative not only when influenced by a defect of the will, but also when it is repugnant to a legal prohibition or good morals and is therefore invalid (§§ 134, 138 BGB). That presupposition is here affirmed by the Court of Appeal on the ground that an infringement of § 218 StGB makes both the doctor and the patient punishable.

It is also not a defence to a claim that a plaintiff is acting deceitfully and in bad faith if he claims damages from a person whom he asked to afford a particular kind of medical assistance, so long as he keeps within what he was asked for. This invocation of good faith must also be denied to one who so severely infringes a prohibition of the Criminal Code. The legal position is not altered by the fact that a portion of the public, for various reasons, demands an abolition of the prohibition.

3. By undertaking the operation, the defendant not only deliberately injured the body of Frau S, but also infringed the protective enactments contained in §§ 233, 218 StGB. Although the second paragraph aims in the first place at protecting the living embryo, it serves also to protect the pregnant woman; and that is enough to satisfy the conditions of § 823 II BGB. If, however, they are satisfied, it follows, as the Reichsgericht has pertinently said . . . that the defendant is liable for all the injuries caused by his operation, even if they are not his fault. That, contrary to the Court of Appeal's opinion, there was a causal connection between the death of Frau S and the operation is shown above at (1).

For these reasons also the legal dispute is not yet ripe for decision, since the defendant can rely on the consent and wish of the deceased in so far as that, too, implied fault in the undertaking of the operation. As matters stood, if she had not energetically desired the operation, the defendant would not have performed it . . . That fault will have to be balanced against the defendant in respect of causality (§ 254 BGB), and the defence arising from it must affect the plaintiffs also in accordance with § 846 BGB.

Case 84

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (THIRD CIVIL SENATE) 17 OCTOBER 1955
BGHZ 18, 286 = JZ 1956, 177 (with approving note by K Sieg)

In 1946 the husband and the father of the plaintiffs had to undergo the general inoculation against typhus, which was carried out in virtue of an ordinance of the Oberpräsident of the then province of Hanover of 22 January 1946 with the approval of the British military government. He had three inoculations in all, after which he suffered an illness, in the course of which a malignant swelling appeared. On 27 February 1948 he died.

The plaintiffs claimed compensation from the defendant State on the ground of its breach of official duty and—in a subsidiary way—for public sacrifice in being deprived of their right to support by the death of their breadwinner. They alleged that the death of their husband and father was caused by the typhus inoculation and the doctor was to blame for the death.

The lower courts applying the rules on sacrifice for the public good declared the claim justified in principle but otherwise dismissed the action.

The defendant's application for review failed for these

Reasons

I. . . .

II. In agreement with the Landgericht the Court of Appeal finds it proved, on the basis of the evidence adduced, that the typhus inoculations applied to the deceased produced a staphylococcus suppuration which within 1½ to 2 years developed into a malignant swelling of sarcoma appearance, from which death resulted. Against this interpretation of the evidence no doubt is raised by the applicant. An attack is made on the view taken by the Court of Appeal that the inoculation constitutes not only an incontrovertible condition in the physical sense (conditio sine qua non) for the death, but also the cause in the legal sense, i.e. an adequate condition for the occurrence of the death. That attack is, however, unfounded. In this connection it is of importance—as the Court of Appeal conclusively observed—that the inoculation led to the death not through the intervention of independent acts of third persons or the deceased himself, but that death ensued without the co-operation of any further intervening causes. Admittedly the findings of the Court of Appeal must lead to the conclusion that a staphylococcus suppuration only seldom results from a typhus inoculation and also, in particular, that the development of such a suppuration into a fatal sarcoma belongs to the class of rare medical phenomena. All the same, neither such a suppuration nor its further development into a fatal sarcoma can be regarded as circumstances outside all medical experience which, according to the case-law of the Reichsgericht, further developed by the Bundesgerichtshof (cf., e.g., BGHZ 3, 261, 265–7) could not be described as an adequate casual connection. It must be noted that the question of adequacy between condition and consequence cannot be answered in a purely logical, abstract way by numerically computing the frequency of the occurrences of such a consequence, but that in a value-judgment those out of the many conditions in a physical sense must be excluded which on a reasonable view of things cannot be regarded as circumstances giving rise to liability; in other words, the limit must be found by a value-judgment “up to which a liability for the consequences of a condition can be equitably imputed to its originator” (BGHZ 3, 267). In making such a value-judgment it must be of importance (for the purposes of setting the limits of liability) whether the originator of the condition consciously took into account the more or less remote possibility of damage resulting from it or would not have acted otherwise if he had thought of the possibility of such damage. In that case the limit of liability may be set relatively wide. There would have been no decision not to order a general typhus inoculation if a possibility—though extremely rare—of death had been envisaged. Accordingly, the typhus inoculation (carried out in virtue of an official ordinance) must be imputed to the State as the cause creating the death, even though the manner in which the inoculation led to the death belonged to the class of exceptional medical phenomena.

Moreover, for the following reasons a liability-creating causal connection between the inoculation and the death cannot be called in question: That an inoculation—whatever be the kind—leads to the death of the person inoculated does not lie beyond the bounds of experience. That is the ground for example for § 6 of the North Rhine–Westphalian Act on Inoculation Injuries of 10 February 1953 (GVBI 166). If, therefore, an inoculation has directly caused a death, i.e. without the co-operation of further intervening causes, an adequate causal connection between inoculation and death must be said to exist irrespective of the precise manner in which it came about (e.g. through infection, as in this case, or because of a particular predisposition of the inoculated person).

III. The applicant goes on to object that the Court of Appeal granted to the plaintiffs a claim for compensation, as only indirectly injured, by an analogous application of § 844 BGB. The Senate, however, shares the Court of Appeal’s opinion.

The right to compensation is, indeed, governed by the principle that only the person directly injured is entitled to compensation. None the less we have here to do with the exceptions contained in §§ 844, 845 BGB. These exceptional provisions, which in the case of a person's death afford compensation to persons who suffer indirect damage, correspond to the quite general opinion prevalent before the BGB came into force, which developed at a very early date in modification of Roman law and had already found a place in the positive law of different countries (cf. for the historical development RGZ 7, 139, 141–4). Parties of the kind of interest here, who have suffered only indirect damage are allowed damages not only in the case of culpable unlawful acts but also where the duty to compensate rests exclusively on strict liability (§ 3 II Haftpflichtgesetz; § 10 II StrVerkG; § 21 II LuftVerkG of 21 August 1936). Further, the principles laid down in §§ 844, 845 BGB apply, if not generally, certainly partly to the law of contract by virtue of express provisions (§ 618 III, § 62 III, § 76 I BGB) and are to that extent regarded as capable of an analogous application (RGZ 167, 85, 89; BGHZ 5, 62 ff., with further references). Likewise, it is generally recognised that these principles are also to be applied in the sphere of public law (RGZ 11, 22, 23 and 112, 290, 297); Enneccerus-Lehmann, Recht der Schuldverhältnisse (1954) 971). Our law is accordingly widely governed by the principle that, where compensation is payable to the injured party for bodily injury, compensation must also be afforded in a case of death to those deprived of their legal right to maintenance. This principle, according to what has been said, cannot without further ado be applied to all cases in which compensation would have to be paid for a mere bodily injury (e.g. not simply in the field of pure contract law). If, however, in general a claim for compensation is afforded for violent attacks on bodily integrity, then within the scope of compensation claims a corresponding application of § 844 BGB to killing cannot be refused. The state of facts that gives, outside all contractual relations, a claim for compensation on the ground of sacrifice for the public good for attacks on bodily integrity are from the points of view of interest here so close, both in law and in fact, to the states of fact in which compensation is to be paid for similar damage under §§ 823 ff. BGB or on the basis of strict liability that those who are legally entitled to support in case their breadwinner is killed cannot in any circumstances be denied redress for the loss of their right to support. The legal result is unacceptable that, on the one hand, interference by a public authority with corporal integrity leading to an injury must be compensated while, on the other hand, if the interference leads not only to corporal injury but to death, and the person concerned has made a far bigger “sacrifice” the relatives entitled to maintenance, who are only affected indirectly but particularly hard by this sacrifice should be left wanting. Such a result would also, as the Court of Appeal has already conclusively remarked, be incompatible with the principle of a social law-abiding State (Article 20 GG) and would clash with the constitutionally guaranteed protection of the family (Article 6 GG). The Court of Appeal, therefore, rightly awarded to the plaintiffs (i.e. the widow and the sons of the deceased) compensation on the ground of sacrifice for the public good in compliance with § 844 BGB.

The amount of compensation to be awarded to those entitled to support in accordance with the general rules on sacrifice for the public good by the analogous application of § 844 BGB, already limited by § 844 to the actual loss of support cannot—as the applicant would wish—be further limited quite generally by the courts, to conform to the corresponding rules of social insurance law. That can only be done by express legislative provision, such as is, for example, contained in § 6 of the North-Rhine–Westphalian Act on Inoculation Injuries.

*Case 85BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 22 APRIL 1958 BGHZ 27, 137 = NJW 1958, 1041 = JZ 1958, 742 (with lively approving article by G Boehmer)

The plaintiff's motor cycle collided on a main road passing through a village with a motor-car coming in the opposite direction which belonged to the defendant's husband, since deceased, as the latter turned left to enter a side street. The plaintiff was injured. Both vehicles were damaged.

Criminal proceedings were instituted against both drivers. The defendant's husband was convicted of causing bodily harm in a negligent manner but then died. The death was not connected with the accident and occurred before the order of the court could be served upon him. The plaintiff was also sentenced by the Amtsgericht to pay DM 30 for speeding. On appeal the Bavarian Oberstes Landesgericht quashed this judgment and remitted the case to the Court of First Instance for rehearing. The plaintiff was then acquitted for lack of evidence.

He claimed from the defendant, as heir of her husband, compensation for the costs he had incurred in defending himself in the criminal proceedings.

The Landgericht declared his claim justified as to four-fifths and rejected any further claim. On appeal by the defendant, the Oberlandesgericht rejected the claim for the costs. The plaintiff lost his appeal against the decision for the following.

Reasons

The parties are still in dispute only over the question whether the defendant must also pay the plaintiff four-fifths of the costs which he had to pay to defend himself in the criminal proceedings. The Court of Appeal gave a negative reply on the ground that no causal connection existed between the bad driving of the defendant's husband and the incurring of the defence costs. Whether the attacks against this decision of the Court of Appeal are justified may be left undecided since in any case the view of the Court of Appeal that this claim for compensation of the plaintiff is to be rejected must in the result be approved.

A finding of adequate causation is not decisive for the decision of the dispute. The current mode of thought which looks at the question of limiting liability only from the point of view of adequate causation is not always capable of providing a proper solution . . . In previous judgments the Bundesgerichtshof has already made clear its view that the formula of adequate causation does not suffice to solve the problem of limiting liability (cf. BGHZ 8, 325, 329; 10, 107, 108; 20, 137, 142, 143). In a search for other means, von Caemmerer has justly focused on the question whether the facts for which compensation is demanded lie within the area of the protection of the rule that has been broken. This formulation of the question is commonly applied and recognised in determining liability for breach of a protective statute (§ 823 II BGB). Here, as this Senate also declared in its judgments (BGHZ 12, 213, 217 and 19, 114, 126), following the case-law of the Reichsgericht, it is a condition of liability that the damage lies within the scope of the interests protected by the protective enactment, that is to say that the damage arises from the injury to a legal interest for the protection of which the rule was made. This limitation applies no less, if, as here, claims are raised under § 823 I BGB. Here, too, it must first be asked whether the damage in question lies within the protective purpose, in other words whether it concerns dangers which fall within the scope of the risks for which the rule was made. For this reason the sense and scope of the rule violated by the defendant must first be inquired into . . .

The plaintiff, in demanding compensation for his defence costs, in claiming that damage be made good that he suffered in his estate, that is to say economic damage. It is generally accepted that by § 823 I BGB, under which he primarily makes his claims, the estate as such is not protected. The only question therefore is whether the damage falls within another aspect of the field of dangers dealt with in § 823 I BGB, namely the integrity of the body, health, and property. Its intention is to protect against all risks that arise from an infringement of those rights. Only the consequences of that infringement are imputed to the wrongdoer and only within that scope are the interests of the injured party protected by it.

If anyone, like the plaintiff, is injured in an accident and his motor vehicle is damaged, the costs of restoring his health and repairing the vehicle are undoubtedly within the protective purpose of § 823 I BGB. That applies also to his loss of earnings, because his injury makes him unable to continue his calling, and also to the loss of the use he makes of the vehicle in his business. All of these are consequences of the accident which are connected with the personal injury and the damage to the vehicle. Although to some extent economic damage is involved, they fall within the protection of § 823 I BGB. It is quite different with the expenditure the criminal proceedings brought upon the plaintiff. So far no dangers that were protected against by the law have materialised through the accident. This had nothing to do with the personal injury and property damage suffered by him through the accident, for it arose from his being suspected of committing a criminal offence and from the decision of the prosecuting authority to institute proceedings against him. The risk of becoming involved in criminal proceedings is a general risk that affects every citizen. It is independent of the personal injury and property damage suffered in an accident, for it occurs even where an accident produces neither of them, and even when the driving complained of leads to no accident at all. The risk of having to spend money in defending oneself against a criminal charge is not one that the law intends to avert when casting the protection of § 823 I BGB over the integrity of health and property. Thus that provision disappears as a foundation for a claim to have that damage made good, irrespective of whether there is an adequate causal connection between the conduct of the wrongdoer and the damage done by him.

Moreover, the plaintiff cannot claim compensation for his defence costs under § 823 II BGB, in combination with § 13 StVO. For § 13 StVO . . . apart from protecting the orderly movement of traffic, also protects only the health and property of those engaged in it, but not their economic interests. The only damage that is still in dispute, the defence costs, touches neither the health nor the property of the plaintiff, but interests that are not protected by it . . .

None of the legal considerations that have been adduced support the plaintiff's claim to have his defence costs made good.

Case 86

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 16 FEBRUARY 1972
BGHZ 58, 162 = NJW 1972, 904 = JZ 1972, 559 (and important article by E Deutsch in JZ 1972, 551 = VERSR 1972, 560)

On 21 June 1968 there was a traffic accident on L Street in B. A lorry of the Dutch armed forces, in an attempt to overtake an automobile which was in course of parking, collided with an oncoming car. Both drivers left their vehicles in the narrow passage made by the parking vehicle, waiting for the arrival of the police. In consequence the highway was, for the time, blocked for the following car drivers. Thereupon several drivers, who could not make headway because of the lorry in front of them, drove round on to the sidewalk to the right of the scene of the accident. About fifteen minutes later, when the police arrived, substantial damage had been done to the sidewalk. The city of B, as owner of the highway, had to spend DM 1736.58 to clear it up.

The drivers who drove on the sidewalk have not been identified.

The Bundesrepublik, under the provisions of NATO Armed Forces Statute, compensated the owner of the car struck by the army lorry. The plaintiff city contended that the Bundesrepublik must also make good the damage done by those drivers in driving on the sidewalk.

Whereas the Landgericht rejected the claim, the Oberlandesgericht allowed it.

On appeal, by leave of the Oberlandesgericht, the Bundesgerichtshof restored the judgment of the Landgericht for the following.

Reasons

The Federal Republic, as is agreed between the parties, has, under the provisions of the NATO Armed Forces Statute, assumed liability for damage done by the lorry of the Dutch armed forces as if it had been done by a lorry of the German forces. The claim is based on § 839 BGB, in combination with Article 34 of the Constitution, so that liability under §§ 831, 823 BGB combined with the provisions of the Road Traffic Ordinance is excluded. According to the second sentence of § 839 I BGB, the plaintiff city would have had to show that it could not have obtained compensation in any other way for the damage—in particular, not from the drivers who had actually caused the damage and who, if they had been ascertained, would doubtless have had to make it good.

There is no dispute between the parties that the conditions for this liability are satisfied. For, as the judgment under attack establishes, the driver of the lorry was even at fault, since the strict liability is not excluded by unavoidable circumstances (§ 7 II StVG). The only question is whether the damage that the drivers who were forced to halt behind the lorry did in driving round on the sidewalk would be traced back to a conduct giving rise to liability, in this case the occupational hazard of this lorry, for which the operator is responsible. The Court of Appeal said yes.

II. This standpoint cannot be accepted.

1. Admittedly, approval must be given to the Court of Appeal's holding that the causal connection between the conduct of the lorry-driver and the damage to the sidewalk was even in this case adequate (the decision of the District Court of Düsseldorf in the "Greenbelt" case, is, to this extent, sound). It is well known that in cases like this drivers constantly—no doubt in breach of traffic regulations and subject to punishment for malicious damage (§ 303 StGB)—do not wait long enough for passage to be possible or for a diversion to be allowed by the traffic police. In view of the experience that the conduct of such drivers will always recur, it may also be assumed that a driver must foresee that an accident caused by him in the flow of traffic may lead to such reactions on the part of following drivers, with ensuing damage to the public streets, private front gardens, fences, and so on. Nevertheless, in the present case, there is no absolute need to discuss fault as a ground for liability, because the plaintiff city can base its claim on § 7 StVG.

The appeal wrongly casts doubt on the view of the Court of Appeal that the lorry was “in operation” when such drivers passed over the sidewalk. The lorry had not been taken out of circulation when it came to a stop but prevented other vehicles from going forward. For the purposes of § 7 StVG the operation of an automobile lasts as long as the driver leaves it in circulation and the danger involved by it persists (BGHZ 29, 163, 166). Moreover, the diversion made by the impatient drivers is still in close connection, in both time and place, with the collision caused by the lorry (cf. BGHZ 37, 311, 318). If a following automobile, in an attempt to avoid striking the lorry in front of it, braked and skidded and so invaded the sidewalk, the damage caused would certainly fall within the operational hazard of the lorry. Nor would it be different if a following driver, in order not to collide or not to be overrun by subsequent participants in the traffic, had deliberately turned on to the sidewalk.

2. If, therefore, the adequate causal connection and the connection with the operational hazard of the lorry are admitted to exist, the decision of the dispute depends on whether such consequences also can be imputed to a causer of damage as rest upon the “free” decision of a third party (so-called “breach of the causal connection” or “no recourse”). That question does not depend, in cases of this kind, on whether the injured party bases his claim on § 823 II (in combination with the provisions of the StVG) or on § 823 I BGB or on § 839 BGB or, as here on the ground that the highway was blocked by an automobile, on §§ 7, 18 StVG.

(a) Despite the contention of the appellant this imputation is not to be rejected on the ground that such impatient drivers acted deliberately and unlawfully in driving on the sidewalk.

The imputation of damage is not automatically excluded by the intervention of a third party (BGHZ 12, 206, 211; 17, 153, 159; 24, 263, 266). Only when the causal nature of the first state of facts is completely irrelevant to the second event can it be said that the causal connection is “broken” (BGHZ 3, 261, 268; 17, 159). That is not the case here. That such drivers caused the damage unlawfully does not stand in the way of the imputation. Whether the intervention of the third party was unlawful is of no decisive importance for the question of imputation.

Just as irrelevant is it that a person is acquitted of liability for damage done by a third party on the ground that the latter acted wilfully. Accordingly, the driver and operator, whose automobile collided with a lorry so that its load fell on to the highway, must compensate not only for the goods that were damaged by the fall, or could not be put in safe-keeping, but also the goods stolen from among those strewn on the highway. There the person liable for the fall cannot refer the injured party to his claim against the thieves; that damage also may be imputed to him, on the ground that he created the danger of their being stolen. That those consequences of his conduct causing liability (that is to say the operation of the damage-causing automobile, or the traffic blunder of his driver) no longer fell into the class of risks for the avoidance of which rules of liability are prescribed (§§ 7, 18 StVG; §§ 823 ff. BGB, in combination with the provisions of the StVG), cannot be accepted (cf. BGHZ 27, 137, 140). Such duties to assume risks may also be established by statute. Thus, under certain circumstances, the duty of care of a person participating in traffic may extend so far that he must take care that he does not, by defective behaviour, induce third parties to contravene wilfully the road traffic rules. Above all, the operator of an automobile is answerable for all damage that is connected with the operation of his vehicle, irrespective of the way its dangerous character has caused damage in a particular case; he is liable also for damage a joy-rider knowingly and deliberately causes by his vehicle, even for the reckless killing of a human being (BGHZ 37, 311, 316/317).

(b) On mature consideration, however, the case to be decided appears to be different. The drivers, once they came to a halt on the road, drove onto the sidewalk of their own free will. That was connected with the accident, and so with the manner of driving the lorry and the operational hazard involved in it, only so far as the accident and its blocking of the road provided an occasion for the behaviour of the drivers. This was, however, no more than an external circumstance which gave the motivation for wilful conduct, without regard for the public safety, of the drivers. It cannot, therefore, be regarded as a sufficient foundation for an imputable connection (cf. also BGHZ 25, 86, 90; Senate decision of 12 February 1963—VI ZR 181/62). Above all, it cannot be said here that the conduct of the lorry-driver and the blocking of the highway “provoked” the conduct of the drivers (cf. BGHZ 57, 25, 28). The blocking of the highway did not constitute such a situation compelling the intervention of the third parties. As regards the damage to the border strip, the impatient drivers alone, and not the lorry-driver, were “masters” of their injurious conduct. Accordingly, the present case affords no opportunity for examining whether, in discussing “provocation” of the reckless conduct of a third party, effect should be attributed to the degree and importance of the danger caused to the property of others. The decision of the dispute follows from the principle that the activities which are important in deciding the imputation of a damage must always be made the subject of a valuation (BGHZ 18, 286, 288; 30, 154, 157; Senate decisions of 8 January 1963—VI ZR 80/62 and 12 February 1963—VI ZR 181/62—823 BGB).

In making the valuation there is no connection sufficient to ground liability between the conduct of the lorry-driver and the damage, even if, in the plaintiff’s interest, attention is focused not only on § 7 StVG, but also on the fault of the lorry-driver which led to the collision. Here the law, and above all the traffic ordinance, clearly distinguished the spheres of liability: the driver and operator of the lorry were liable for the collision and its consequences to others involved in the accident as well as for all objects thereby damaged. For the damage to the sidewalk on the other hand, only the drivers who drove on it are answerable. The current instructions and prohibitions applicable to the lorry-driver protected the interests of those who, with their property, were near the highway only to the extent that the driver was not allowed to invade the pedestrian path with his lorry or to afford an occasion for other vehicles to swerve onto the ground next to the road in order to avoid a collision. But what happened after the accident, as a result of other vehicles driving over the sidewalk in order to get on more quickly, does not fall within his sphere of duty. The lorry-driver was not in a position either in fact or in law to hinder them. That the imputation made by the Court of Appeal goes too far is also plain because the plaintiff city, if it were correct, could claim also against the operator of the car with which the lorry collided, if he did not succeed in exonerating himself under § 7 II StVG; and in certain circumstances the concurrent liability of the automobile which was being parked on the right might have to be considered. It would also be going too far to hold an operator liable for the damage done by the following drivers driving onto the sidewalk if, as a result of failure in its equipment, the lorry had slid across the road.

3. After all, it was not here the operational hazard of the lorry or the driver's way of driving that in any imputable way led to the damage of the sidewalk. That might, to be sure, have happened because the driver of the lorry left it standing until the police arrived in answer to their call. If the resulting hindrance to traffic (cf. § 1 StVG) had no longer had a reasonable justification, this conduct could have created a liability for the damage done by the impatient drivers (§§ 823 I and II, 839 BGB), so that the operator also (according to § 831 BGB, here the defendant according to Article 34 of the Constitution) might be liable. But a liability on this ground must be legally distinguished from the liability due to the preceding conduct for the actual consequences of the accident. The liability could also affect anyone who blocked the highway not by a vehicle or had not been to blame for the accident.

Under what conditions such a liability should be allowed to exist needs no examination here. The plaintiff city has made no complaint against the driver on these lines.

III. The plaintiff city therefore can have recourse to those drivers only for the damage done by them. It runs the risk, if their identity can no longer be ascertained, of having ultimately to bear the damage. That is, however, a general loss that falls on anyone who has property adjoining a road used for traffic and one that it cannot shift off onto the defendant. In consequence the decision appealed from cannot stand.

Case 87

COURT OF APPEAL OF STUTTGART, 24 NOVEMBER 1964 NJW 1965, 112 = JZ 1966, 189

The defendant drove his car, in which were two workmates, down a street in Heilbronn. Unfit to drive because he had a blood-alcohol proportion of 1.80, he drove into a stationary lorry. In the collision his car caught fire. The plaintiff, who saw the accident from his parents' petrol station, hurried with an extinguisher and, together with a passerby, rescued the defendant and his two passengers from the burning car . . . He suffered severe burns and was unable to work for two weeks.

The defendant's insurer paid compensation for the pecuniary damage, but denied liability to pay for pain and suffering. The Landgericht rejected the claim, but the plaintiff succeeded on appeal for the following.

Reasons

In so far as compensation was awarded to the plaintiff for his material damage, the judgment was not attacked by the defendant. The plaintiff has appealed against the rejection of his claim to be compensated for his pain and suffering.

Contrary to the view of the Landgericht, the plaintiff is also entitled to be paid for his pain and suffering in delict under §§ 823 I, II, and 847 BGB. The finding that the defendant's driving while unfit to drive did not afford an adequate cause for the plaintiff's injury cannot be accepted. Admittedly, it is not every conditio sine qua non that constitutes an adequate cause, but only such a one as, generally and in accordance with an objective judgment or experience, is apt to produce such a consequence, or one that in general appreciably enhances the possibility of its occurrence, and therefore adequate causes do not include conditions which according to general human experience are completely irrelevant to its occurrence that according to common opinion they cannot reasonably be taken into account. All the same, the finding cannot be accepted that in the present case the bodily injuries to the plaintiff lay outside what was to be normally and objectively expected as a consequence of the accident. It is of course true that it occurred here only because of a further act, due to the free decision of the plaintiff, namely his intervention in order to rescue the defendant and his passengers. That does not, however, exclude an adequate causal connection between the unlawful act and the consequences. It is not correct that where there is an independent and voluntary intervention by a third party an adequate causal connection can only be recognised to exist if the intervention served to ward off an especial danger to the public and therefore was in performance of a legal or moral obligation. Admittedly in RGZ 29, 121 and 50, 223, where an adequate connection was held to exist between the insufficient securing of a team of horses drawing a vehicle and the injuries to a person who tried to hold them up, attention was directed to the fact that the rescuer had acted in performance of a legal or moral duty. In RGZ 50, 223 attention was also expressly directed to the fact that the injured party had intervened to avoid a threatened accident to persons in the village street, and especially children coming out of school precisely at that moment. Nevertheless the Bundesgerichtshof in NJW 1964, 1363, when holding that an adequate causal connection existed between the conduct of a hit-and-run driver and an accident to a pursuing driver caused by an increase of speed, expressly said that the recurrent allusion in those decisions of the Reichsgericht to the fact that the rescuer's intervention had been in accord with a legal or moral duty should not be understood to limit liability to such cases, but only to show that in such cases the intervention of the self-sacrificing third person is nearly always automatic, so that the injuries suffered in doing so were undoubtedly adequate consequences of the wrongful act. In the above-mentioned decision, the court drew the conclusion that in less threatening situations it turns on the circumstances whether the situation produced by the wrongdoer is generally to be considered apt to produce rescues by third persons and, if so, in the present form. In the case then decided the court went on to say that after a sufficiently serious traffic accident it is not at all unusual for other drivers to take up the pursuit of a hit-and-run driver independently, and that such traffic camaraderie, even if it may not reach the level of moral duty, is a fact which prevents us from regarding such a pursuit of the escaping driver as the quite improbable and gratuitous intervention of a third party in the causal continuity. Thus, one may start from the position that even where such an intervention is the immediate cause, an adequate connection may be held to exist between the damage and the event that was the initial occurrence, if the conduct of the third person was justifiable. It is therefore irrelevant that in the present case the plaintiff was not expected to assist and, therefore, under no legal duty to help. It can also be left undecided whether there was a moral duty to rescue. In any case there was a justification. Indeed morally his conduct was of a high standard. Although in the circumstances his intervention required considerable courage and intrepidity, one cannot agree with the Landgericht that the possibility of it must have appeared to an observer so remote that it could not reasonably have been taken into account . . .

Moreover, one cannot agree with the judgment under appeal in regarding the injury to the plaintiff as not an imputable consequence of the defendant's unlawful act . . . It shows a misunderstanding of Larenz's position in invoking his opinion that even where there is an adequate causal connection between the rescue by the plaintiff and the defendant's unlawful act, that act must be regarded as a meaningless condition of the rescue and the ensuing injury to the plaintiff, which must no longer be imputable as a consequence of the unlawful act, since although the defendant could in any case be blamed for negligence in relation to the plaintiff's injuries, the latter bears the full responsibility for his deliberate conduct and therefore a quite predominant share of responsibility falls on him. As the plaintiff in his grounds for appeal aptly says, Larenz was merely upholding the view that even where several persons caused, because they one after another provided conditions for the eventual consequence, one of them can be regarded as its author because he intended the act as his own and thereby reduced the condition that the others provided to the status of an indifferent and legally meaningless condition; side by side therefore with the responsibility of the one who deliberately produced the consequence by his unlawful act, that of another person who merely provided an adequate condition, even though he acted negligently, appears meaningless, so that the consequence cannot be imputed to him as his act. Thus, the Landgericht failed to see that the plaintiff, who, as has already been explained, had a justification for his deliberate intervention, and whose conduct was of a high moral order, acted neither contrary to law nor in blameworthy fashion. Moreover, it failed to see that Larenz, when referring to the above-mentioned decisions of the Reichsgericht in RGZ 164, 125, expressly said that the free but faultless act of a third party did not exclude the imputation to the one who had provided an adequate condition . . . Further, the defendant was also to blame for the damage to the plaintiff through his negligence, because it was foreseeable not only objectively, as has already been said, but subjectively, and here also, just as objective foreseeability is required for an adequate causal connection, infrequent and exceptional consequences are to be taken into account and only quite remote possibilities are to be left out of account. Such a remote possibility, however, as has already been discussed in connection with the intervention of the plaintiff, was, neither objectively nor, from the defendant's point of view, subjectively, in question.

The defendant, therefore, is liable for the damage suffered by the plaintiff under § 823 I and II BGB. The plaintiff, therefore, is entitled to damages for pain and suffering under § 847 BGB. Admittedly, in the cases decided by the Bundesgerichtshof (NJW 1964, 1363) only compensation for material damage was dealt with and not pain and suffering. There was no question at all of personal injury to the driver pursuing the hit-and-run driver, but only damage to his car. This, however, seems immaterial. What is essential is that the court affirmed liability for a delict.

It follows that where a person suffers personal injuries he can claim damages for pain and suffering. Moreover, the Reichsgericht, in the case already mentioned of the rescue of passengers from a burning vehicle (RGZ 164, 125), expressly awarded damages for pain and suffering to the injured rescuer against the objection of the defendant.

Since the plaintiff's claim for damages for pain and suffering is based on an unlawful act, there is no need to go more deeply into whether a claim for damages for pain and suffering also lies under the head of negotiorum gestio. [Discussion followed about the amount of damages for pain and suffering.]

Case 88

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 30 JUNE 1987
BGHZ 101, 215 = NJW 1987, 2925 = JZ 1988, 150

Facts

When 13 years of age, on 6 February 1976, the plaintiff was injured while engaged in sport. Since it was suspected that her spleen had been damaged the doctor attending the accident sent her to the hospital in E which is run by the rural district. The surgeon Dr H, in his capacity as the Second Senior Registrar acting in the absence of the Chief Surgeon, examined the plaintiff and decided to open the abdominal cavity. Finding that the left kidney had been damaged, he removed it. On the following day the plaintiff was transferred to the University clinic in H as a result of acute renal failure. It was discovered there that she lacked a right kidney from birth and that consequently her only existing kidney had been removed in the District Hospital in E. In the hospital in H she was first treated temporarily by means of an artificial kidney. Upon the advice of the resident medical staff the plaintiff's mother expressed her readiness to donate one of her own kidneys. On 31 March 1976 one of her kidneys was removed and implanted in the plaintiff. At the end of April the plaintiff was sufficiently well to be discharged from the hospital for further treatment at home.

The plaintiff sued Dr H and the District Council for damages in respect of her own economic loss and for pain and suffering. To that extent the action has been concluded. As a result it is also undisputed that the removal of the plaintiff's kidney constituted a negligent course of treatment. If the correct medical procedure had been followed, the kidney could have been saved. The plaintiff now asks for a declaration that the defendant Rural District must compensate her mother for any economic damage which the latter suffered as a result of the removal of her own kidney on 31 March 1976, subject to any assignment of the claim—by operation of law—to the authority administering social security. For this purpose the plaintiff has accepted an assignment of her mother's claims.

The District Court allowed the action for a declaration. The appeal by the defendant was rejected by the Court of Schleswig. At the same time, on an appeal against a supplementary judgment of the Court below it, the Court of Appeal increased the assessment of costs. A second appeal by the defendant against these decisions remained unsuccessful.

Reasons

I. The Court of Appeal, whose decision dated 3 October 1986 was published in FamRZ 1987, 384 and NJW 1987, 710, has held that the mother's claim for damages is well founded. Its conclusions amount in essence to the following:

The action for a declaration was admissible, irrespective of who was entitled to assert the claim. Even if she had not been assigned the claim, the plaintiff had a legal interest of her own in the declaration demanded by her if for no other reason than because she was then potentially exposed to future claims by her mother on the ground of negotiorum gestio. The need to avoid that any claims for damages might be caught by the rules on limitation of actions was, in itself, a reason for an immediate declaration. A real possibility existed that the plaintiff's mother would suffer physical damage.

The plaintiff's mother was entitled to damages in her own right against the defendant by virtue of §§ 31, 89, 823 I BGB in respect of that damage which could not be treated as expenses in restoring the plaintiff's health.

The surgeon Dr H, acting on his own responsibility in his capacity of deputy of the chief medical officer of the hospital's surgical department, was to be regarded as a representative of the defendant Rural District which was responsible for his wrongful treatment. As in the cases of action to save a person or to assist in an emergency, considered by the practice of the courts and in the literature, the donation (by the mother) of one of her kidneys was called for by the tort committed against the plaintiff. Despite the voluntary character of the decision of the plaintiff's mother, a causal link (operating mentally) existed between the tort attributable to the defendant, the physical damage resulting from the donation of a kidney, and the requisite connection between them. Nor did the mother's consent to the operation to remove the kidney exclude the illegality of the bodily injury as far as the defendant was concerned.

II. The objections against these conclusions put forward in the second appeal are unfounded. The Court of Appeal has held correctly that the action for a declaration, which has as its object any future physical damage to the plaintiff's mother, is well founded. This Senate also holds that the plaintiff's mother has to this extent a claim of her own for damages according to §§ 31, 89, 823 I BGB which the plaintiff, as an assignee, may pursue by way of an action for a declaration.

1. Contrary to the view expressed by the appellant, no objections exist against the admissibility of the action for a declaration. The fact that the Court of First Instance by its decision, which has since obtained the force of res judicata, has held the defendant liable in respect of future physical damage is not an obstacle. It only dealt with damage suffered by the plaintiff, but did not include damage suffered by the plaintiff's mother, which is in issue here. As the Court of Appeal has stated correctly, the plaintiff may, in certain circumstances, be exposed to subsequent claims by her mother based on negotiorum gestio, if the latter incurs expenses in consequence of the loss of the kidney which she donated.

2. The question, denied by the Court of Appeal, as to whether the plaintiff's mother also has claims against the defendant based on negotiorum gestio in view of §§ 683, 670 BGB in respect of future expenses resulting from the loss of the kidney need not be examined here. As the Court of Appeal has held correctly, she is entitled in any event to claim compensation in tort, according to § 823 I BGB from the defendant in respect of future damage as a result of the physical injury caused culpably by Dr H.

(a) Contrary to the view put forward by the appellant, such a claim is not excluded on the ground that the surgeon Dr H was not to be regarded as an organ representing the authority responsible for the hospital where he removed the kidney. In the absence of the chief medical officer of the surgical department, Dr H, in his capacity as the latter's deputy, was charged with the function of a chief medical officer. In law his position does not differ from that of the chief medical officer himself, had he been present. In so far as the appellant doubts whether also the chief medical officer in charge of a department of a hospital (and not only the chief medical officer in charge of the entire hospital) acts as an organ of the authority responsible for the hospital, his references are to a judicial practice which is outdated and has been abandoned [references]. The question, which had been left open by the Federal Supreme Court [reference], has been decided in the meantime by the present Senate to the effect that the heads of individual sections of a hospital must be regarded as the properly appointed representatives of the local authority responsible for the hospital [references]. This certainly holds good as long as the authority responsible for the hospital does not show that in the particular instance the organisation of the hospital must lead to a different conclusion. The defendant has not made any allegations to this effect in the court below dealing with the facts. On the contrary, the liability of the defendant according to §§ 31, 89 BGB for its organs was never disputed in respect of the culpable acts of Dr H.

(b) When the Chief Medical Registrar, Dr H, removed the plaintiff's only kidney in violation of a medical practitioner's duty of care, he did not only damage the plaintiff's body and health. In addition he thereby created a dangerous situation which could, above all, cause near relatives of the plaintiff to accept an injury to their own body in order to save the life and health of the plaintiff, by offering a kidney for implanting into the plaintiff. This enforced sacrifice of personal bodily integrity is an injurious act. Leaving aside some special aspects remaining to be discussed, which cannot however lead to a different legal assessment, it can, as in other cases of rescue and emergency, also result in a duty of reparation on the part of the person responsible for the situation calling for rescue or emergency—assistance towards those engaged in the rescue or assistance towards those who suffer injury in the course of it.

(aa) There can be no question that a causal nexus, which is relevant for the purpose of legal liability, exists between the removal of the plaintiff's sole kidney, for which the defendant must assume responsibility, and the mother's donation of her kidney. The possibility of a kidney transplant, including a donation by a living person, was known at the time, and the donation of a kidney by a close relative was not so remote as to leave it out of legal consideration. Contrary to the appellant's view, it is to be expected that, upon the advice of medical practitioners, a mother will be prepared to make this sacrifice for her child. Nor is the causal nexus broken by the fact that the donation of the kidney was due to a voluntary decision of the plaintiff's mother; this decision was solely induced by the dangerous situation, for which the defendant is responsible, faced by the mother as a result of the wrong medical treatment, which alone led to the rescuing action. As the practice of this Senate shows [reference], a mentally induced cause can also suffice to establish liability. Writers agree almost unanimously on this. Nor does the appellant challenge this conclusion.

(bb) The practice of the Federal Supreme Court, too, has recognised for a long time that the resolution to expose oneself to the risk of injury in order to rescue another who is in danger does not in principle create a new chain of causation which attributes liability for injuries of this kind to the "rescuer" himself and relieves from liability the person who is responsible for endangering the "object of the rescue". On the contrary it was the Reichsgericht which extended the liability of the latter to injuries of this kind suffered by the "rescuer", at least in those cases where the act of rescue was not disproportionate to the impending danger and its prevention (RGZ 28, 120 ff.: restraining bolting carriage horses; RGZ 50, 219, 223: restraining bolting riding horses; RGZ 164, 125 ff.: saving passengers in a bus; OLG Stuttgart NJW 1965, 112: saving passengers in a burning motor-car). This Senate followed that practice in the so-called pursuit cases [references]; and at least in principle it is approved unanimously by writers [references]. It is true, as this Senate has made clear on another occasion, that no duty exists to protect others against harming themselves and, conversely, no general prohibition against inducing another to imperil himself [references]. Social co-existence involving manifold contacts between human beings means that one person may influence another in many ways, without having to incur liability. Only if the person causing the injury is to be blamed for having created a dangerous situation which is so serious and calls so urgently for action by the rescuer and emergency-helper the risk assumed by the latter, together with the danger created for the person to be rescued, must be attributed to the person causing the injury, having regard to the circumstances. He must be held liable for any self-inflicted injury of the rescuer and emergency-helper. The reason is that he has created a situation which, although the rescuer and emergency-helper are not required to intervene, at least makes such intervention reasonable and praiseworthy. In such circumstances, it is no longer permissible to consider the intervention on the part of the rescuer and emergency-helper in isolation, distinct from the creation of the "aggravated dangerous situation" [reference] by the person inflicting the injury. Thus the present Senate has repeatedly spoken of a culpable "challenge" by the person inflicting the injury to the injured party to imperil himself.

(cc) In order to give concrete expression to this assessment of liability this Senate has already formulated a number of principles. The intervention of the rescuer and emergency-helper must not be completely of his own accord; it must have been suggested by the initial act and been "challenged" by it, as this Senate has expressed it in the decisions referred to above. In addition the acceptance of the peril and the injury to oneself must be commensurate with the possible success of the intervention, and its motivation must at least be acceptable according to the recognized rules of social conduct [references]. In the absence of these criteria limiting liability, which in their formulation are only defined very generally and require to be developed in greater detail in each individual case, the liability of a person who has injured another for the resulting intervention by a third party would no longer be covered by the protective range of the duty of care not to bring about situations which constitute a call for rescue or emergency aid. Outside this range, the fact that a rescuer or emergency-helper imperils or injures himself will fall within his own sphere of action for which he is only responsible to himself. He acts "at his own risk". (For the necessary restriction of liability in the case of a mentally transmitted causality see inter alia [references].)

(dd) These legal principles permit it, in the case for decision involving the donation of a kidney and the injury to the body and the health of the plaintiff's mother, to attribute legal liability to the defendant in respect of the conduct of the Senior Medical Registrar, Dr H. The donation of the kidney was caused precisely by the fact that Dr H, by injuring the child, placed the plaintiff's mother in a situation in which she may have felt called upon to make such a sacrifice. Undoubtedly her conduct must deserve high praise morally and must therefore be approved and recognised by the law. The attempt, which was medically indicated, to improve the plaintiff's physical and health situation by the donation of a kidney and at least to shorten the period of treatment by dialysis, is reasonably and proportionately commensurate with the injury to herself which the mother accepted. Her decision was based specifically upon the detailed advice by the medical officers attending the plaintiff.

(ee) Contrary to the appellant, the causal nexus is not to be denied on the ground that the mother did not make up her mind to donate a kidney under the direct impression of an acute emergency but that she had time to consult the medical officers and could ponder the grounds for and against. If an intervention by the rescuer and emergency-helper is suggested, it is irrelevant whether the latter has acted, so to say, on the spur of the moment or whether he was able to assess in advance the chances and risks of his intervention. This does not alter the “challenging situation” in any respect; and the causal nexus between the damaging act of the injuring person and that by which the rescuer and emergency-helper imperils or injures himself remains in any event. It is not unusual for a rescuer to have sufficient time for reflection. It must be admitted that the notion of “rescue”, understood as an induced intervention for the purpose of averting or containing of damage resulting from a perilous situation brought about culpably by the person committing the injurious act, normally does not extend to help in overcoming the damage, especially if it represents mere assistance in restoring it. From the point of view of legal liability, such assistance can no longer be attributed to the damaging act by the person inflicting the injury. The answer to the question as to when the sacrifice by a person who wishes to reduce the actual damage or at least to contain it still amounts to a rescue and to emergency aid requires an assessment which must take into account the intimate relationship with the challenge of the situation and undoubtedly also the connection in time and space. Regarded from this angle, the donation of a kidney by a near relative—in this case by the mother—for the benefit of the injured child can still be held, without straining the argument, to have been a measure, responding to a challenge, of rescuing the child whose life and health was imperilled. The mother’s sacrifice is directly connected with the dangerous situation caused by the defendant medical practitioner by removing the child’s only kidney. The delay in making the sacrifice is due not so much to the fact that only after the child’s health had been damaged remedial measures were initiated, but that in the circumstances the rescuing donation of the organ could not be carried out immediately, but only after some time. For this reason, the donation of the kidney by the plaintiff’s mother is to be regarded in the case for decision as a consequence of the injurious act for which the defendant must assume liability. (To the same effect Deutsch, Arztrecht und Arzneimittelrecht, 1983, p. 205 marginal note 305; in Anglo-Saxon law on the basis of the “rescue doctrine” Urbanski v. Patel, Manitoba Queen’s Bench, 25 January 1978, 84 DLR 3d 650 on the one hand; Sirianni v. Anna 21 December 1967, 55 Misc. 2d 553, 285 NYS 2d 709 (1967); Moore v. Shah 30 December 1982, 458 NYS 2d 33; 90 AD 2d 389 and Ornelas v. Fry, Court of Appeals of Arizona 6 May 1986, 727 P. 2d 819 (Ariz.1986) on the other hand.) It need not be considered whether the Senior Medical Registrar Dr H or the defendant authority responsible for the hospital were under a legal duty to arrange for a kidney transplant. This consideration cannot serve as the criterion whether the plaintiff’s mother made an “induced sacrifice”.

(ff) Contrary to the arguments of the appellant, the claim of the plaintiff’s mother does not fail for the reason that she accepted not only the possibility of injuries to herself, as it seems to happen in most cases of rescue and emergency aid, but that she submitted to this injury by donating her kidney, thus sacrificing her health with her eyes open. This fact, too, does not modify in any respect the challenge of the situation nor does it give cause for assessing liability restrictively. Any restriction of liability could only be justified if the self-inflicted injury was disproportionate to the chance of saving the injured person or if the self-inflicted injury exceeded the boundaries of moral approval. Neither is the case here. On the contrary, this Senate has no doubt that the necessary nexus with the tort for which the defendant is responsible is not disproportionate and not reprehensible.

(gg) Finally, this Senate cannot accept the appellant's contention that, from the legal point of view the plaintiff's mother has not suffered a bodily injury giving rise to damages because she consented to the operation for the removal of the donated kidney. It is true that therefore the surgical removal of the kidney by the medical practitioner entrusted with this task was lawful. The author of the injurious act who has caused, and is liable for, what from this point of view is a voluntary sacrifice of health and a consensual bodily injury, is precluded on his part from arguing that the bodily injury of the intervener was voluntary and therefore lawful. He cannot do so either if, as in the case, another person must first commit an act of bodily injury in order to enable the rescuer and emergency helper to carry out his rescue operation. In agreeing to the removal of a kidney the plaintiff's mother did not also give her consent to Dr H to being placed in a situation where she had to sacrifice her health in order to save her child. Therefore the tort committed against her retains its illegal character.

Case 89

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 29 FEBRUARY 1956
BGHZ 20, 137 = VERSR 1956, 305

The plaintiff, born in 1911, suffered a fractured skull when he was twelve years old. On 2 April 1940, while riding a motor cycle, he collided with a railway belonging to the defendant mining company and suffered an injury to the right side of his forehead coupled with a concussion. By a judgment which has the force of res judicata it was held that the defendant is liable to pay three-quarters of the damage suffered by the plaintiff. Up to 31 December 1944, the defendant made to the plaintiff periodic payments.

The plaintiff contends that as a result of the accident he became permanently unfit for work and demands a monthly payment of DM 300 from 1 January 1951 until he reaches the age of sixty-five. The defendant alleges that all the effects of the accident had long disappeared and, in particular, that the plaintiff's ability to work is no longer restricted.

The claim was rejected by the District Court of Essen and by the Court of Appeal of Hamm. A second appeal was also unsuccessful for the following

Reasons

1. . . .

2. . . .

3. . . . the question is whether the Court of Appeal, relying on its own findings and of the observations of the expert, Professor Dr K, rightly rejected the plaintiff's claim. The appellant denies this and refers to the well-known practice of the Reichsgericht in the matter of accident neurosis. He contends that according to this practice the existence of a causal nexus must be admitted between the accident of 2 April 1940 and the condition of the plaintiff which, while constituting a neurosis inspired by the device to obtain periodical payments, was nevertheless one which paralysed the plaintiff's working capacity and power of mental resistance.

It is true that contrary to the previous practice of the Reich Insurance Office [reference] the Reichsgericht held in principle that a causal connection exists even if the accident was suffered by a person who, owing to his neurotic and labile condition, could not resist sufficiently purpose-and-desire-inspired fantasies. In particular, the Reichsgericht pointed out repeatedly that it is not possible to limit liability to pay damages to physically ascertainable injuries and to exclude nervous or emotional disturbances caused by the accident on the ground that they are due to a special predisposition of the victim. According to the Reichsgericht, a tortfeasor who has injured a person weakened by bad health cannot expect to be treated as if the victim had been healthy. It made no difference whether the fact of bad health was caused by a physical ailment or by an emotional weakness based on his personal make-up [reference].

This point of view was consistently opposed by the medical profession; the dispute was further seriously complicated by the fact that the two sides relied on different notions of causality. In the face of these attacks and the change in the practice in matters of social insurance the Reichsgericht adhered to its view and pointed out, in particular, that a court must always determine in accordance with legal considerations whether a causal nexus exists. Nevertheless, in special cases the Reichsgericht approved a refusal to grant damages [references] and showed in its decision [reference] a clear tendency to restrict liability in the light of a "purely external nexus" between the accident and the neurotic condition. Further, the Reichsgericht sought to counter an excessively broad liability by relying on § 254 BGB. This Division, in its decision of 8 July 1953 [reference], agreed in principle with the practice of the Reichsgericht and affirmed the possibility that an adequate causal connection can exist between an accident and a "psycho-reaction" initiated by it.

It would be unnecessary to reopen this question if it were evident that the plaintiff consciously practised deception in simulating the existence of complaints . . . However, the observations of the Court of Appeal in connection with the expert evidence appear to permit only the conclusion that the conduct of the plaintiff borders on simulation and conscious aggravation, but yet that it is primarily to be characterised by the fact that the plaintiff, who is emotionally labile, influenced by purpose-and-desire-inspired fantasies had acquired and retained the fixed idea that he suffered from the consequences of an accident and . . . the fluid transition from intentional to automatic effects is characteristic [of this illness]. The exaggerated symptom results finally in a childish psychotic state akin to pseudo-dementia, in which the patient remains caught. It is therefore impossible to reject a claim for damages in reliance on § 254 BGB without further considerations; contributory negligence could only be held to exist if it could be said that a neurotic person is able to control his will in response to the requirements of the situation and to resist effectively his wishful fantasies. Especially those whose neurotic tension makes them take refuge in the fantasy that they are sick and are entitled to claim against the community or against the tortfeasor to have their livelihood guaranteed are unable to exercise this control and to offer this resistance [reference].

This Division reaffirms the principle that a tortfeasor must also pay compensation for any damage resulting from emotional reactions of the victim if the accident constituted the adequate cause. The fact alone that a certain behaviour is interpreted as a psychogene reaction does not necessarily rule out a connection between the occurrence which caused the accident and the condition which inhibits the ability to work and to resist. Much as the courts must familiarise themselves with the new ideas of medical and psychological sciences about the nature and the causes of neurotic conditions of behaviour, it must not be forgotten that the question of causality is a legal question, and from the legal point of view causality is not restricted to the functioning of the body and its organs. The attempt to restrict liability for neurosis on the ground that these are “outwardly connected only” does not supply a test for achieving a correct delimitation. If this should mean that the existing complaint and inhibitions would in all probability have manifested themselves even if the accident had not occurred, the court in the exercise of the power conferred by § 287 of the Code of Civil Procedure to assess the evidence quite independently, in particular the conclusions of the medical experts, can deny the existence of a causal nexus altogether. If, on the other hand, it would appear in favour of the plaintiff that his emotional condition which impedes his integration into working life would not have arisen without the occurrence of the accident, the causal nexus cannot be denied, even if the emotional disposition of the plaintiff was an important contributory factor.

If, therefore, it is useless to attempt to limit liability for neurosis by reference to considerations of causality, it is necessary nevertheless to restrict liability for other reasons. In according a claim for compensation to a victim of a corporeal injury, the law wishes to assist him and to facilitate his speedy recovery. It would be contrary to the purpose of the claim for damages if the fact that another must pay the damages would render integration into social life and obligations more difficult or even impossible. For this reason medical opinion points out regularly that the legal regulation of damages must not result in supporting the flight into illness of neurotics set on obtaining damages by way of pensions and in assisting their “infantile regression . . .” [reference]. If the expert evidence shows that the psychological state of the plaintiff, especially his apathy, is to be explained primarily by his—admittedly unconscious—aim to obtain an advantageous settlement of his livelihood or as a fixation on an imaginary legal position—the accident forming an excuse for avoiding the struggle of daily life—it is equitable not to attribute these consequences to the tortfeasor. For the latter cannot be required to contribute to the perpetuation of a condition which, in the end, is harmful to the physical and mental health of the plaintiff. For this reason claims of neurotics with a fixation on asserting legal rights and damages by way of pensions must be set a limit inspired not by the absence of a causal nexus but by the purpose of compensation owed by equitable considerations. As the First Division of the Federal Supreme Court has pointed out appositely [reference], similar considerations moved legal theory and practice to restrict liability for damages to the adequate consequences of the occurrence which caused the damage, although the Code does not lay down such a restriction. If the principle of liability is not to be extended excessively, as it would if the court were to follow the test of strict causality, liability to pay damages must also be limited correspondingly in the present case. Thus the justified interests of social medicine are also satisfied.

Naturally, only a very detailed and careful assessment of the plaintiff’s personality will make it possible to determine correctly the manner and the causes of his neurotic condition. For this purpose, it will be particularly important to establish the boundary between the emotional disturbance caused by the gravity of the accident, the resulting shock, or the physical medical treatment and that which is inspired, following the ensuing legal position, by fantasies of demands [reference].

4. Even if the Court of Appeal has not considered the decisive legal problems correctly in every respect, its findings suffice to enable it to reject the claim for damages in respect of loss of earning capacity . . . The Court of Appeal was therefore correct in the result in rejecting the claim of the plaintiff for damages in respect of loss of earning capacity.

Case 90

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 11 NOVEMBER 1997
BGHZ 137, 142 = NJW 1998, 810 = JZ 1998, 680

Facts

The plaintiff is claiming compensation for a traffic accident of the 3 February 1986, for the consequences of which the defendant has to assume liability under the liability insurance undertaking. In the accident, the car insured with the defendant struck the front of the plaintiff's car obliquely and damaged the side of it substantially, as a result of which the plaintiff who was wearing a seatbelt struck his head on the door frame. A radiological examination in a hospital outpatients department, in findings that are not conspicuous in simple neurological terms, established bruising of the skull with trauma associated with the twisting of the cervical vertebrae but without external injuries or signs of concussion. According to the opinion of the doctor there was a five-day unfitness for work and outpatient GP care would suffice. Subsequently the plaintiff claimed for further physical impairment and symptoms of immobility, which he traced back to the injuries suffered in the accident. On the basis of these disorders in 1987 he gave up a furniture business which he had carried on since 1982. By his claim he asks for refund of his loss of earnings of DM 3,360 per month (less monthly payments of pension insurance), and compensation for pain and suffering over and above the pre-trial payment of DM 7,000, for which he regards a total sum of DM 50,000 as reasonable. He also seeks a declaration that the defendant was under a duty to provide compensation for future harm, insofar as the claims have not passed to the Department of Social Security.

The Landgericht rejected the claim. The Court of Appeal rejected the plaintiff's appeal. His appeal in law led to quashing of that judgment and reference back.

Reasons

1. The Court of Appeal, in contrast to the Landgericht, does not regard the plaintiff's claims for compensation for harm as time barred. But it considers that neither his inability to earn nor his further physical infirmities are, in tort terms, traceable to the road traffic accident.

The problems in the region of the lumbar vertebrae were the subject of a predisposition or based on degenerative prior harm. Whether this also applied to the problems in the region of the cervical vertebrae could be left undecided as these problems were in any case not based on organic changes caused by the accident. It was instead a case of psychogenic physical disorders. According to the convincing report of the expert witness, the plaintiff had already suffered before the accident from a so-called narcissistic personality disorder which in combination with work and partnership problems had been activated by the accident. The plaintiff had thereby accentuated and extended the problems, which had originally come into existence through the accident injury, in connection with which wishes for security and compensation had played a role. Although the defendant had in principle to be responsible even for adverse psychological effects of the consequences of the accident, and the plaintiff's special susceptibility to harm had also to be accounted for by him, boundaries were nevertheless set to such a liability. Thus case law had denied liability for compensation neurosis or wish neurosis because the plaintiff in his neurotic striving for assistance and security merely took the accident as a pretext for evading the difficulties and burdens of a working life. This was the case if the psychological consequences of the accident had only been produced purely coincidentally by the accident and could possibly also occur in the same or a similar manner through other trivial causes. That was the state of affairs here. As it had been a case of an accident with only quite trivial consequential injuries, the psychological reactions of the plaintiff were in gross disproportion to this cause and were therefore not comprehensible. The plaintiff's existing personality disorders (as well as his work and marriage situation) would also have led to this reaction through other events unavoidably occurring in everyday life, so that the infliction of harm had formed at most a crystallisation point for a wish neurosis. As no further consequences of the accident were to be expected, the request for a declaration could also not be complied with.

II. These deliberations do not stand up to the arguments of the appeal in law.

1. [Paragraph relating to limitation issue omitted].
2. The appeal in law does not question the assessment of the plaintiff's physical harm by the Court of Appeal. However, it successfully claims that the reasoning by which the Court of Appeal has denied attribution in tort terms of his psychological harm is not in accord with the case law of this Senate. The Court of Appeal is, nevertheless, correct in its legal approach when it says that the defendant must in principle also be responsible for adverse psychological effects which have the effect of extending liability, provided there is sufficient certainty that this consequence would not have occurred without the accident [references omitted].

In the judgment of the Senate of 30 April 1996 [references omitted], which is of fundamental importance for the attribution of psychological harm, this Senate explained that the attribution of such harm was not defeated by the plaintiff's particular susceptibility as a result of physical or mental anomalies or dispositions. This was because the defendant had no claim to be put in the same position as if he had injured a person who had been hitherto healthy. But the Senate has set out in more detail in this judgment and in the judgment of 25 February 1997 [references omitted] the cases in which boundaries are set to the attribution in tort law of such harm. The Court of Appeal has failed to recognise the principles developed here. In the case in dispute it confirmed the prerequisites for an exception from liability on the basis of insufficient findings of facts. In this connection the deliberations of the Court of Appeal do not clearly reveal whether it is denying an attribution of liability from the point of view of the triviality of the harm or of a wish neurosis. However, in both cases the reasoning is not able to support the contested judgment.

(a) The Court of Appeal emphasises that it is a question of an accident with quite insignificant consequential injuries and the psychological reaction of the plaintiff to this is in gross disproportion to the cause and not comprehensible. It is true that it is considering here a category of cases for which, according to the principles explained in the judgment of the Senate of the 30 April 1996 [references omitted] the attribution of the harm can be excluded can be excluded in tort. These are cases in which the event causing the harm is quite insignificant in the sense of being a triviality.

(aa) The appeal in law however correctly contests the assumption that the accident in question is to be regarded as a trivial matter in the sense of those principles. As this limitation of liability is obviously an exception from the attribution in liability law of harm connected to the accident, strict requirements must be made for the assumption that the case is trivial. The deliberations of the Court of Appeal do not reveal that it was conscious of this principle. The findings of fact cannot support the assessment of the event causing the harm as completely insignificant.

It is true that account must be taken in this respect only of the primary injury suffered by the plaintiff in the accident. This cannot however be described as insignificant in the sense of trivial harm. The Court of Appeal proceeds on the basis of bruising of the skull with trauma associated with twisting of the cervical vertebrae. Even if these injuries can be healed organically without consequences, they were not in any case, when they arose, as insignificant as would be necessary for an exceptional case in the sense explained. When deciding if the injuries are so insignificant that they can exceptionally involve the exclusion of liability for harmful psychological consequences, the same principles must apply as those which the Senate has developed for the denial of compensation for non-material harm in accordance with § 847 BGB in relation to trivial injuries. This denial, likewise, only applies in exceptional cases. According to these principles, compensation can be denied in the case of insignificant injuries of body or health without substantial prejudice to lifestyle and without lasting consequences. It must only be a case of passing interference with the body or with mental health, typical in daily life and frequently arising from other reasons than a special case of harm. This, therefore, means interferences, which are quite insignificant not only in their intensity but also in the type of primary injury involved. They will normally not make a lasting impression on the plaintiff because he is already accustomed to being exposed to similar disturbances to his situation because of community life with other human beings [references omitted].

But the established injuries of the plaintiff here obviously go beyond such a model of harm, as is evident from the fact that bruising of the skull with trauma associated with twisting of the cervical vertebrae is not typical of daily life. It is always connected with a special case of harm. Here the injury also unquestionably had as its consequence an incapacity for work on the part of the plaintiff, which lasted several days.

(bb) If (contrary to the opinion of the Court of Appeal) one accordingly cannot proceed in the case in dispute on the basis of a completely insignificant occurrence of harm, attribution of liability for harmful psychological consequences is not excluded simply on this account. Therefore the further objection of the appeal in law that the Court of Appeal failed to consider that the defendant had encountered a special predisposition of the plaintiff to harm is immaterial. In this respect it is certainly correct that attribution of harmful psychological consequences can exceptionally be justified if the occurrence causing the harm has encountered a special predisposition to harm on the part of the plaintiff and not merely his general susceptibility to the development of neuroses. This is true even where the harm is trivial in the sense explained, according to the principles in the Senate's judgment of the 30 April 1996. This follows from the fact that psychological harm is in principle equated with physical harm as to which the defendant must likewise accept a special predisposition to harm on the part of the plaintiff.

The allusion to the special predisposition to harm in the literature has been understood to the effect that an attribution of liability is ruled out in cases of insignificance and special predisposition to harm on the part of the plaintiff [reference omitted]. This rests on a misunderstanding of the last-mentioned judgment of the Senate, because according to this such susceptibility can on the contrary exceptionally lead to an attribution of liability. There is of course only room for this additional criterion of special susceptibility to harm if there is some question of excluding liability on account of the triviality of the harm. This is however not the case here.

(b) The appeal in law also successfully contests the view of the Court of Appeal that the plaintiff had a wish neurosis and therefore an attribution of liability could not follow. This assessment is not supported by sufficient factual findings, as the appeal in law correctly argues.

(aa) The Court of Appeal seeks to rely on the case law of this Senate. According to this, the attribution of harmful psychological consequences is ruled out if the plaintiff has a compensation neurosis or wish neurosis. The plaintiff would thus be using the accident merely as a pretext in his neurotic striving for assistance and security in order to evade the difficulties and burdens of the working life [references omitted]. The denial of compensation for harm in the case of such neuroses is based on the idea that the psychological disorder obtains its character from a conscious or unconscious "wish" idea to safeguard one's life or exploitation of an assumed legal position. It is so prominent that the necessary attributable connection with the accident cannot be affirmed. This is so despite the fact that a direct causal connection between such neuroses and the preceding accident exists.

From this starting point, the appeal in law correctly claims that the necessary finding for the assumption of a wish neurosis, i.e. that neurotic striving for assistance and security played a determining part in the degeneration of the plaintiff's mental health, is lacking. It correctly points out that the expert Dr P has merely stated in his opinion that in the face of the plaintiff's work situation in 1986 the possibility could not be dismissed that, besides the remaining symptoms which the expert had discussed in detail, psycho-dynamic desires for security and compensation had played a role. That does not suffice for the assumption of a wish neurosis, especially as the Court of Appeal has made no further findings in this direction beyond [referring to] these statements of the expert. The Court of Appeal's view was that because of the plaintiff's personality disorders and his marriage and work situation, he could have had the same adverse reaction to other unavoidable occurrences in everyday life. This could acquire significance in the legal sense of a hypothetical development of the harm or supervening causality only if the relevant findings of the Court of Appeal were free from procedural errors. However, the appeal in law refers to the fact that the work and marriage difficulties of the plaintiff had first resulted from the neurotic disorder induced by the accident and the plaintiff had also stated this to the expert. The Court of Appeal will therefore have to investigate this further.

(bb) Moreover, the appeal claims that the Court of Appeal has inferred from the statements of the expert that the infirmities are based on a narcissistic disturbance of the plaintiff's personality. These are to be traced back to so-called near-conscious conversions, so that one should not proceed on the basis of a wish neurosis but on the basis of a conversion neurosis. In this respect also the appeal in law reveals extensive doubt about the judgment under challenge.

In the face of the statements of the expert about the neurotic condition of the plaintiff, the Court of Appeal would have had to examine whether the degeneration of his psychological condition does not rather indicate a conversion neurosis in which a mental conflict is changed into physical disorders [references omitted]. Such a neurosis is likewise based on an adverse effect of the accident, which is unconsciously taken as a pretext to compensate for latent inward conflicts, even if, unlike wish neurosis, not actually in respect of the wish not to have to work any more. Here therefore in principle an attribution of the causal connection takes place [references omitted]. Accordingly, it could be decisive for the assessment of liability whether the neurotic condition of the plaintiff is decisively shaped by “wish” ideas.

The expert in the current case on the one hand proceeded on the basis of an—admittedly near-conscious—conversion with the plaintiff, but on the other hand also addressed his wishes for security and compensation as components in the formation of the neuroses. The Court of Appeal ought not therefore simply to have denied the attribution of this neurotic condition to the event causing the harm, but should have subjected this condition to comprehensive elucidation—perhaps by additional questioning of the expert.

A further elucidation of the matter is, according to the above, necessary. In undertaking this, the Court of Appeal will certainly not be able to ignore the fact that according to recent psychological findings, frequently even in cases in which at first a compensation neurosis has been assumed, the wish for compensatory income has certainly been a symptom, though not the substantial or only decisive pathogenic factor. Even with psychologically abnormal behaviour of this kind, the personality structure of the person affected, as well as the adverse effects or substantial stresses in the personal area which could come to the surface through an accident, played a significant role [references omitted].

The appeal in law claims these complicated psychological interrelations in this case and on the basis of the findings of fact so far they cannot simply be dismissed. In the face of these interrelations it may be asked how, in accordance with the exact understanding of the plaintiff’s neurotic disorder which is needed, a susceptibility on the part of the plaintiff to “wish” ideas which has possibly been established operates. Taking these considerations into account, it should follow that the disorders asserted by the plaintiff have their foundation not only in unconscious “wish” ideas but also in a conversion-neurosis-type development. But attribution in tort law can still not be denied from the point of view of either compensation neurosis or wish neurosis.

III. The judgment of the Court of Appeal was therefore to be quashed and the matter referred back to the Court of Appeal for further elucidation, in connection with which the Senate making the decision has made use of the possibility of § 565 I 2 ZPO.

The Court of Appeal at this point on the legal basis described and after the further findings to be made might conclude the defendant to be liable for the harm based on the plaintiff’s neurosis. It will then have to be taken into consideration that his special psychological characteristics and within this framework also possible “wish” ideas contributing to the neurotic development can be of importance for the calculation of the harm. This is to be ascertained, as to the sum involved, in accordance with § 287 ZPO within the framework of compensation for pain and suffering as well as in connection with the loss of earnings. In calculating compensation for pain and suffering fairly, according to the constant case law of the Senate [references omitted] a special susceptibility to harm on the part of the plaintiff can be considered; this also applies to his psychological disposition and the risks based on it. In ascertaining the loss of earnings, the judge has to undertake a prognosis of the usual course of events, as they would have developed without the accident, taking all points of view into account which were available at the time of the last oral hearing (§ 252 BGB). In this respect it is not only a question of the assessment of possible supervening causalities but also of the ascertainment of harm as such on the basis of the facts of the case as it would probably have presented itself in the future.

Within this framework, it is important to ascertain whether (and with what probability) comparable harmful effects would have sooner or later occurred because of the original psychological condition of the plaintiff even without the actual accident. One must also take into consideration the risk which existed for the plaintiff's future work situation through possible unconscious "wish" ideas as they—as has been revealed in the neurosis—were built into the plaintiff's psychological make-up. In order to elucidate these risks and to obtain a sufficient factual basis for the assessment of the chances for and limitations to the plaintiff's career path, the judge of fact needs to obtain expert advice. He must therefore discuss the questions relating to this in detail with the expert and seek to clarify them.

On the basis of such findings of the facts of the case serious risks may give rise, with a probability which suffices for the purpose of the application of § 287 ZPO, to fears of a substantial strain on his work options in the long term, even independently of an accident. This is because of plaintiff's the inclination to adverse neurotic effects from the various vicissitudes of life and, in some cases also, an unconscious striving to withdraw himself from the "battle of life". The judge of fact must consider this in the prognosis that has to be undertaken for the loss of earnings. This can be important both for the duration as well as for the level of loss of earnings. Just as with difficulties in prediction because of a business life which shows little structure [references omitted], here also consideration can be given to a percentage deduction from the business receipts to be expected without risks of this kind.

Case 91

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (FIRST CIVIL SENATE) 29 JANUARY 1969
NJW 1969, 789 = VERSR 1969, 406

[A collection of jewellery owned by the plaintiff was being carried in the trunk of a car by their traveller K, then a general agent and now a partner in the firm. In the middle of June 1965 K hired a room in the defendant's hotel, as he had often done before. On returning to the hotel one evening at about 10 p.m., he gave the night porter the keys of the car (including the key of the trunk) and told him to have the car garaged. The garage in question was nearby but it was not part of the hotel: it belonged to B, a firm which serviced and rented cars. If a guest wished his car garaged, this was the garage which the defendant hotel used. The porter called B and had the car fetched by one of his employees.

There were notices in hotel rooms about this service in June 1965. They said “Contract Garaging. Day and Night. Cars Fetched and Returned”.

One of B’s employees collected the car and the porter handed him the keys of the car and its trunk. The car was returned next morning by a different employee at about 9 a.m. and left in front of the hotel. In the middle of the afternoon K and his colleague T drove to H to see a customer, and when T went to the trunk to collect the jewellery he found it locked. K and T then looked through the collection and saw that a number of wrist-watches had been stolen from it. The lock of the trunk was undamaged, and police enquiries proved fruitless.]

The plaintiff claims compensation both in his own right and as assignee of the rights of K. The Landgericht dismissed the claim and the Oberlandesgericht dismissed the appeal. On the plaintiff’s appeal, the judgment below is reversed and the case remanded.

Reasons

I. . . .

II. 1. . . . 2. . . .

3. (a) The Court of Appeal clearly assumed that if the defendant were liable in contract for the loss of the wrist-watches the plaintiff could claim for its loss on the basis of an assignment to it by K. This is correct. The principle of Schadensliquidation des Drittinteresses is applicable. It is implicit in the agreement between the defendant and K, already a contractual guest in the defendant’s hotel, for the deposit of the car for reward, that the defendant’s contractual liability for the protection of the car applies even if the car belongs to a third party, it being irrelevant whether the defendant knew or should have known or had any ground for supposing that it did so belong (BGHZ 15, 224, 228).

(b) On the other hand, there are objections in law to the view of the Court of Appeal that the contract of deposit in this case did not cover the contents of the trunk. By its very nature the contract of deposit applies to the moveable which is handed over to the depositor for protection as an entirety, whether it consists of a single object, a collection of objects which are legally or physically discrete, or of one single thing which contains a number of objects which are legally or physically separate. So far as can be seen, this has never been doubted before (see BGH NJW 1968, 1718). Thus the defendant’s contractual duty extended to safeguarding the contents of the trunk.

Given the findings made by the Court of Appeal, that the watches were stolen while the car was in B’s garage, the defendant had the burden of proving that its inability to return the property was not due to matters for which it was responsible (§ 282 BGB). It is not enough for the defendant to prove that it took all necessary care, which in any case it has not yet done. The circumstances here (the trunk being opened without harming the lock, the removal of the more valuable objects from the collection, the employment in the garage of a person who, according to the district attorney was “well known to be a burglar and confidence trickster”) strongly suggest that it was the fault of the defendant or one of its agents for performance (§ 278 BGB) that the goods have gone, so the defendant can exculpate himself only by proving what in fact caused their loss (RGZ 149, 284 ff.; BGH NJW 1952, 1170). This has not been done.

(c) The outcome of the case now depends on whether the defendant has a total or partial defence on the ground that the plaintiff or its partner K was at fault under § 254

BGB. This defence was raised by the defendant, but the Court of Appeal naturally did not consider it.

As will be seen, this court cannot conclusively apportion responsibility for the harm under § 254 BGB, since the requisite facts have not been found by the Court of Appeal. The judgment of that court must therefore be vacated and the matter remanded to it for further proceedings and decision on the merits and on costs, taking the following considerations into account.

4. The Court of Appeal will have to verify whether fault on the part of K or the plaintiff contributed to the loss in issue, so as to reduce, perhaps to nothing, the damages payable by the defendant (§ 254 BGB). Given such a fault, then the amount of responsibility to be attributed to K and therefore to the plaintiff depends in the first instance on how far the harm was preponderantly caused by one or other party; the critical factor here is whether the conduct of one party not only enabled the harm to occur but made its occurrence substantially more probable than did the behaviour of the other party. The temporal order of the events which caused the harm is not critical (BGH NJW 1952, 537, 539; NJW 1963, 1447, 1449). Only if one cannot conclude from the respective causal efficacy of the conduct of both parties that the harm was preponderantly caused by either of them should the degree of fault of the two parties be considered. Then the first thing to do, before proceeding to apportionment, is to determine the amount of the fault of each party.

The first factor to consider is that K left the jewellery in the trunk of the car without telling the porter or anyone else on the defendant's staff that it was valuable and that the risk of loss was consequently very high (§ 254 II 1 BGB). If the trunk had a separate key—this is not clear—the fact that K gave it as well as the car key to the porter would increase the plaintiff's contribution.

K's behaviour seems intrinsically to be grossly negligent of his own interests, but various considerations, some undisputed, others inferable from the plaintiff's evidence, make it seem less grave. There is the standing of the hotel to be considered and the quality of service which guests would expect. Guests want to be spared the bother of parking their car, but they also expect it to be safeguarded as they themselves would do. According to the defendant, the garage ticket states that no liability is accepted for the contents of the trunk, but since the plaintiff's evidence is that the ticket was not handed to K before, or even at the time when, the car was handed over, the defendant would not be showing the careful service to be expected of such a hotel unless he told K that the garage-owner's exclusion of liability make it risky to leave things in the trunk. There is the further fact in this case, according to the plaintiff, that K had been a frequent guest in the defendant's hotel in recent years. It was known to the hotel staff who looked after him that he carried a valuable collection of jewellery with him in the car and they never sought to dissuade him from leaving it in the trunk, as he sometimes did. Furthermore, on the present occasion the staff knew that K had the jewellery with him. It is true that K did not always leave the jewellery in the car, but he may have been induced to believe that when the car was securely garaged the jewellery in its trunk would also be safe. It is not clear on the evidence whether K knew where the car was garaged or how it was secured, so he could perhaps infer from the information provided in the hotel that his car would be looked after in a manner appropriate to its standing. The Court of Appeal will have to investigate these circumstances, determine the causal potency of the conduct of both parties, and apportion the responsibility between them.

Case 92

REICHSGERICHT (THIRD CIVIL SENATE) 27 JUNE 1913

RGZ 83, 15

In December 1908 the plaintiff, a travelling decorator, suffered an injury to the little finger of his right hand, and went to the defendant for medical treatment. The defendant washed the wound with raw carbolic acid, and put a carbolic acid bandage on it for over twelve hours. As a result there developed a so-called carbolic gangrene which required prolonged medical attention. The fingernail came off and the finger itself became pink and shiny, thick in parts and stiff overall. To the plaintiff's claim for damages the defendant objected that the plaintiff would be able to work just as well as before the accident if only he had the finger amputated. It was clear, according to the defendant, that the plaintiff would have had the finger amputated if the injury had been due to an accident or something of the sort and there were no third party to pay for his loss of earnings. Experts would testify that the operation was simple and free from risk. Of course there was no question of forcing the plaintiff to undergo the operation, but if there was some method by which his loss of earning capacity could be reduced and he chose not to employ it, this must be at his own expense and not at the expense of the defendant. The plaintiff could therefore claim compensation for only such loss of earning capacity as would subsist after such an operation.

The plaintiff contested this defence. Experts would testify that the operation was attended with pain and risk, and that so far from necessarily improving his earning capacity as travelling decorator, it might lead to the whole hand becoming stiff; under these circumstances he could not be expected to expose himself to the danger and trouble of an operation.

The defendant was held liable at first instance and in the Court of Appeal, but his further appeal to this court is now allowed. The decision of the courts below is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings and judgment.

Reasons

The appellant first complains that the Court of Appeal paid no attention to his defence that all or most of the harm in respect of which the plaintiff is suing would have been avoided by the amputation, partial or total, of the useless little finger on his right hand, since such an operation would restore or greatly improve his ability to work . . . This defence the Court of Appeal wholly ignored, to the extent of not even referring to it in its judgment. It will be clear from what follows that the point raised by the defendant cannot be so easily passed over.

In RGZ 60, 147, the Sixth Civil Senate considered the rights of the parties when a person who has been injured in an accident at work refuses to enter a hospital for medical treatment although the prognosis of a cure of great improvement is good. They held that a person who is responsible for the consequences of an accident has a defence under § 254 BGB if a treatment exists which experts agree would lead to a cure or significant diminution of the injury, and if the victim should have been aware of the existence of, and in a position to benefit from, such treatment. If this is established, then a victim who has declined to undergo this treatment must explain why. The court must then weigh his reasons in order to determine whether a reasonable man who was paying due attention to the interests of the party responsible for the harm would likewise refrain from having the treatment in question. A reasonable person would certainly have such treatment if it involves no risk to life, no great bodily pain, and no expense—the expense being borne by another (RGZ 60, 151, 153). The same Senate of the Reichsgericht, in JW 1907, 740 no. 6, applied this principle to operations of the kind in question before us, and approved the formula enunciated by the Court of Appeal: a victim can be expected to undergo an operation if its success is guaranteed—so far as guarantees can exist in medical matters—and if the victim is convinced that the operation is free from risk. The Senate added that all the circumstances of the individual case must be taken into account, including the gravity and danger of the operation and the greater or lesser prospect of success.

These principles must now be amplified and defined with greater particularity. We must remember, when a defendant invokes § 254 II BGB against a victim of personal injuries whose capacity to earn could be restored or improved by undergoing an operation, that the victim has a basic right to decide freely and at his own discretion whether he wishes to undergo such an invasion of his bodily integrity. Before the BGB came into force, lawyers therefore used to hold that it was wrong to treat a victim as being at fault if in the exercise of his free right over his body he refused to undergo a surgical operation simply to reduce the liability of the person responsible for the harm. There was the additional consideration that even in the case of operations which are normally safe, some unforeseen circumstance may cause further harm, even death, and that it may not be as successful as expected. It was thus unjustifiable, they believed, to use the threat of refusing full compensation for all the victim's harm in order to cause him to undergo an operation, even one which is normally safe and effective, just to protect the tortfeasor.

This is a one-sided view which takes account only of the victim's rights, and since the BGB came into force, writers and courts alike have rightly abandoned it. There must be some limit to the victim's right of free self-determination over his body, and that limit is reached when the exercise of this right is purely capricious, a selfish and inconsiderate exploitation of the fact that the defendant is liable. The right is not to be used to equip the victim with the means of living a life of idleness when his capacity to work could be restored by a safe and relatively painless operation. This is required by Treu und Glauben, a principle to which the exercise of the right to claim compensation for harm is subject. We can leave aside the question whether a passion for a pension is, as we have recently been taught, an actual disease, so-called compensation hysteria, and to be treated as such. For our purposes the only thing that counts is the objective situation in the individual case.

It follows that certain requirements must be fulfilled before the victim's failure to undergo an operation can constitute a defence. First, the operation must, in the view of experts, be free from danger in so far as in the current state of medical knowledge any operation can be said to be free from danger, that is, it must be safe in the absence of unforeseen circumstances. This removes from consideration immediately any operation which calls for a general anaesthetic, as opposed to a purely local anaesthetic, for with chloroform there is always a risk of death even if the preliminary physical examination of the patient is carried out with scrupulous care. This is in line with the decisions of the Reichsversicherungsamt [reference omitted]. Next, the operation must be one which does not involve any significant pain; after all, it is only as a result of some act for which the defendant is responsible that the victim is in the situation where he must take steps to restore his earning capacity, so the principle of Treu und Glauben can hardly require him to undergo significant pain for the defendant's benefit. Thirdly, the operation must, on the evidence of experts, be sure to bring about a major improvement in the victim's earning capacity, that is either restore it completely or improve it very greatly. Finally, the defendant must have let the victim know that he is ready to arrange for the operation to be carried out at his expense in an appropriate place and by professional doctors, or to pay the cost of the operation in advance and let the victim arrange it himself; for a victim whose recovery is otherwise complete is not obliged to use money of his own to have an operation carried out simply to reduce the liability of the defendant who, whether he be the person actually to blame or only the party responsible for him, is bound to make good the harm.

Often, it is true, a victim proceeds spontaneously to an operation just to relieve an intolerable physical condition, and then he is personally responsible to the surgeon for the fee; but cases of that sort are not before us now.

It follows that if, contrary to expectation, the operation fails, the defendant is automatically responsible for any further harm it may cause, for such harm is also in a causal relationship with the original injury for which he was responsible. His liability follows naturally from his requiring the victim to undergo the specified operation in order to restore or improve his earning capacity.

If the defendant makes a demand which satisfies these requirements and the victim refuses to undergo the operation in question, the defendant has a good defence to the victim's claim for damages to the extent that the victim's earning capacity would have been restored or improved by the operation. It is then for the victim by way of reply to explain the special reasons for his refusal, as laid down by the Reichsgericht in RGZ 60, 151 ff. . . .

Case 93

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 14 MARCH 1961
BGHZ 34, 355 = NJW 1961, 655 = JZ 1961, 602 (with approving note by W Flume)

The plaintiff in this claim for damages was involved in a motor accident when he was sixteen-and-a-half years old. Like the first defendant, then nearly twenty years old, he was an apprentice motor mechanic in a workshop in H. Every week they had to visit D in order to attend the local training college there. On 21 February 1957 they drove to school in a colleague's Volkswagen. The first defendant, who was at the wheel, was the only one with a driving licence. In the lunch break he suggested to the plaintiff and to two other fellow apprentices, the second defendant and J, then nearly seventeen and seventeen-and-a-half years old respectively, that they should drive to V to have lunch with his parents. On the way there, the second defendant entreated the first defendant to allow him to drive the car but the first defendant refused because, like the plaintiff, he knew that the second defendant had no driving licence. On the way back, however, the second defendant renewed his entreaties and the first defendant relented and allowed him to take the wheel for a spell. They changed places with the motor still running. Though the road was quite steep, the second defendant drove down it at about 60 km per hour, and failed to reduce this speed a few hundred metres on where the road curved slightly to the left. He lost control of the car, and it crossed the highway and struck a tree. The second defendant suffered a cranial fracture, the first defendant a knock on the head, and J a bruise to the left eye. The plaintiff suffered brain damage and a severing of the left ocular nerve: vision in his left eye is reduced to about 10 per cent and is unlikely to improve.

The plaintiff alleged that he had warned the second defendant against driving, though only from fear of a police check.

Accepting that he was 20 per cent to blame, the plaintiff claims appropriate damages for pain and suffering from the defendants as common debtors, and seeks a decree that they are liable as common debtors for four-fifths of any harm he may suffer in the future.

The defendants urge that the claim be dismissed on the ground that the plaintiff was acting at his own risk: not only did he consent to the wheel being taken by the second defendant despite his having neither experience nor a licence, but he himself had even sought to drive and so put his companions at risk.

The Landgericht awarded DM 4,000 as damages for pain and suffering and decreed that the defendants were liable as common debtors for two-thirds of any future harm suffered by the plaintiff.

On appeal by the defendants the Court of Appeal dismissed the plaintiff's claim in its entirety. The plaintiff now appeals to this court. The judgment below is vacated and the case is remanded.

Reasons

I. The Court of Appeal held that there was no implied agreement which excluded the defendants' liability in tort, any such agreement by a minor like the plaintiff being in any case invalid without the consent of his legal representative. But the court held that the defendants were nevertheless entitled to be relieved from liability on the ground that the plaintiff had been acting at his own risk. The plaintiff had sufficient insight, so the court found, to appreciate the clear risk involved in the second defendant's taking over the wheel. Just as he himself had been ready to imperil his companions by driving the car, so it was in full knowledge of the risk that he had agreed to the second defendant's attempting to drive despite his lack of skill and experience. Though he objected at first, this was only through fear of a police check, and even this objection he did not maintain. The accident was due exclusively to the second defendant's being an inexperienced and incompetent driver. This being so, it would be contrary to Treu und Glauben to hold the defendants liable for the results once the risk materialised. Since it was reasonable that the defendants be released from liability, their release should not be prejudiced by the application of § 107 BGB, which need not be applied where there was a "community of danger among the young", as here. So to hold was consistent with the view recently adopted by the courts, that the effect of a young person's consent to surgery depends not on the law relating to contractual declarations but on his factual ability to appreciate the situation (BGHZ 29, 33).

II. We quite agree with the Court of Appeal that the defendants' liability was not effectively excluded by contract. However, its observations on the doctrine of acting at one's own risk require us to make a decision of principle.

At present lawyers speak of a person as acting at his own risk when, without any sufficient reason, he puts himself in a position of imminent danger although he is aware of the particular circumstances which make for the danger in question. If this risk results in injury, the question arises whether the injured party can claim damages from another person who would otherwise be liable, whether under the law of strict liability or under the rules of contract or tort law. At first the courts applied § 254 BGB in such cases unless they found an implicit contractual exclusion of liability, which they were very reluctant to do. The doctrine of acting at one's own risk only became an independent force in litigation when the Reichsgericht used it to avoid imposing strict liability towards a victim who had consciously exposed himself, without any legal, professional, or moral obligation, to a hazard he might well have avoided (RGZ 130, 162). This was a way of avoiding the imposition of strict liability in cases to which the legislative reason for imposing strict liability did not seem to apply. The Reichsgericht adopted the idea that a conscious exposure of oneself to danger might amount to acting at one's own risk in order to mitigate strict liability in accordance with the supposed purpose of the legislature. In so doing the Reichsgericht emphasised that when the defendant's liability arose under § 823 BGB, the fact that the plaintiff had acted at his own risk need not necessarily lead to a dismissal of his claim for damages: in such a case there might be an apportionment under § 254 BGB which could take account of the particular facts (RGZ 130, 162, 169; see also RG JW 1911, 28).

Not until its judgment of 19 June 1933 (RGZ 141, 262) did the Reichsgericht . . . adopt the view that a person who rides in a vehicle with knowledge of special attendant dangers thereby consents to any personal injury which may arise therefrom during the journey. If the agreement was valid and relevant, it neutralised the illegal quality of the defendant's conduct with the result that though he caused the harm, he was not liable for it. Such consent to an invasion of a legal interest was a declaration of will, needing to be received by its addressee and, if uttered by a person with limited legal capacity, valid, in view of its adverse effect, only if his statutory representative agreed to it. The Reichsgericht adhered to this view (RGZ 145, 390), and the Third Civil Senate of the Bundesgerichtshof adopted it in BGHZ 2, 159 (see also BGH VersR 1952, 420). This Senate has assumed the soundness of the doctrine that acting at one's own risk is a complete defence, although in none of the cases it has decided were its requirements found to be satisfied. We permitted the plaintiff to appeal in this case because we wish to depart from the decisions of the Reichsgericht and the Bundesgerichtshof.

III. As long ago as 25 March 1958 (NJW 1958, 905), this Senate expressed doubts about the way of treating conscious self-imperilment introduced by the Reichsgericht in RGZ 141, 262, and scholars have increasingly objected to treating a person who "acts at his own risk" as giving a consent to a possible invasion of a legal interest which operates as a justification. They stress that it is artificial and unrealistic to view the situation in this way, that it is inappropriate to employ the concept of the "legal act", and that this construction tends to lead to unsatisfactory results [references omitted]. We agree with these criticisms and now depart from the doctrine of the Reichsgericht.

1. The commonest case involves carriage by an incompetent driver. Here it is clearly unrealistic to suppose that the passenger who is aware of the driver's incapacity is consenting to the personal injuries which may arise during the journey. It is normally a case of conscious negligence rather than of conditional intention, to use a distinction which is drawn when one person injures someone else rather than himself: the passenger is aware of the danger, but hopes that it will not materialise. We blame him because in imperilling himself he is acting recklessly: it is normally a gross fiction to hold that such conduct by the passenger constitutes a consent to personal injury.

2. Furthermore, it is only within the rather narrow limits of §§ 134, 138 BGB and § 226a StGB that any such agreement could serve as a justification for the defendant's conduct.

Should the injury prove fatal, the defendant's conduct clearly cannot be justified by any such agreement (BGHSt 4, 88, 93). And if the resulting personal injuries are serious, especially if they involve loss of vital organs, the victim's agreement still cannot justify their infliction, since this is morally offensive and legally discountenanced, regardless of the victim's consent (see BGHSt 6, 232, 234 [other references omitted]). Thus to treat putting oneself at risk as raising an issue of consent inevitably makes the legal outcome depend on the gravity of the harm, which for tort lawyers should be irrelevant. Furthermore, there is no need for any justification at all in cases of strict liability, since strict liability does not depend on the illegal nature of the conduct (GSZ in BGHZ 24, 21, 26).

3. Another unsatisfactory consequence of treating a person's consent to the invasion of a legal interest as constituting a declaration of will is the requirement that it needs to be received and must therefore "reach" the addressee. There can be no good reason for making the defendant's liability depend on whether he knew or could have known that the victim was consciously putting himself at risk (compare the facts of the case before the Senate on 8 December 1954 (VersR 1955, 120)) . . .

4. Nor is the doctrine any better when the victim is under age. Why should liability towards minors, who are themselves capable of being liable in tort, depend on whether their statutory representative consents which is in practice extremely uncommon since normally the decisions involved are sudden and spontaneous?

5. In cases involving drunk-driving the view we now reject meant that whether there was a complete defence or a more elastic apportionment under § 254 BGB depended on whether the passenger, himself often drunk, was conscious of the risk or whether he had simply rendered himself incapable through gross negligence of appreciating it. This is a very subjective matter, and in cases like these where things happen very quickly it is hard to come to any firm conclusion on it. Thus even in the typical case the test which stems from RGZ 141, 262 proved impracticable: applying it led to unpredictable results.

6. We note finally that the view of the Reichsgericht leads to a difference in the way the illegality of an actor's conduct is judged in private and in criminal law. In criminal law the victim's conscious self-exposure to harm is not accorded the same justificatory force where personal injuries are negligently inflicted as it has been in private law since RGZ 141, 262 (see BGHSt 4, 88, 90 [other reference omitted]). Furthermore, in dealing with consent to an invasion of one's corporeal integrity, the criminal law does not invoke the private law principles of Willenserklärung at all [reference omitted]. Thus so long as a person's exposure of himself to danger is to be treated as a justificatory declaration of will, our legal system can never achieve a unitary method of judging the illegality of conduct.

IV. In the view of this Senate, the problem under discussion gives rise to issues of illegality and justification only when the victim's conduct really and without any artificial construction amounts to a consent to an envisaged invasion of his legal interest. This may happen in certain dangerous sports (compare BGHSt 4, 88, 92), but in the common case before the courts today the sole question is almost always whether, and if so to what extent, a person's liability in damages is affected by the fact that the victim had consciously exposed himself to the danger when it was imminent. If in such cases it seems more or less offensive that the damage should be shifted from the victim to the other party, that is because in claiming compensation the victim is acting in a manner inconsistent with prior conduct of his own and for which he is answerable. To go against one's own act conflicts with the principle of Treu und Glauben, and it is this which makes it wrong for the victim to invoke the liability of the defendant without taking account of the fact that he himself consciously created or helped to create the dangerous situation which enabled the defendant's contribution to it to cause the harm. Once this is realized, we see that the correct way to deal with the problem is by means of the value-judgment expressed in § 254 BGB. This rule, which provides that a defendant's liability may be affected, or even extinguished, if conduct for which the victim is responsible, especially his capricious exposure of himself to danger, contributes to the harm, is essentially based on the concept of inconsistent behaviour which is rooted in § 242 BGB. Specific application of this principle to damages law is found in § 254 BGB [references omitted]. Thus if a judge, in apportioning responsibility under § 254 BGB, gave great weight to the views here put forward, he would not be invoking any consideration extraneous to that rule; on the contrary, if he failed to take sufficient account of the victim's conscious exposure of himself to the danger and his inconsistency of conduct, the judge would not be doing justice to the particular circumstances in which the harm, and responsibility for it, arose.

It is true that if the commonest cases of self-exposure to danger are to be dealt with under § 254 BGB, we will be abandoning the familiar rigid principle that to act in the knowledge of specific existing danger is to act at one's own risk and thus to forfeit one's claim to damages. But in our view it will do nothing but good if this principle is abandoned. Even the practice of the courts hitherto has failed to give effect to this principle in a full and logical manner; they have been forced to adopt unrealistic exceptions in order to limit its effect. Furthermore the courts have tended to set almost impossibly stringent requirements for the proof of the plaintiff's knowledge of the special source of danger, simply because they wished to be free to apply § 254 BGB, which they believed to be more appropriate.

As to the question when liability should be excluded in a case where the victim has exposed himself to danger, and when there should simply be a reduction of the damages, we are of opinion that no precise rule can be laid down. The types of case involving conscious self-endangerment are so various that clarity and certainty of law could not be achieved by any inflexible and uniform rule. Certainly, when a victim has clear knowledge of a specific danger and exposes himself to it without any good reason and is hurt, or indeed when he helps to create the dangerous situation, there will be good reason to relieve the defendant of all liability. But it would be one-sided to concentrate, to the exclusion of all the other features of the individual case, on the fact that the plaintiff voluntarily endangered himself. Other factors may be of great weight, for instance how the danger arose, how much the defendant was to blame for the existence and actualisation of the risk, what the relationship between the parties was, and how obvious the danger was (see also the decision of this Senate on 2 December 1958 (VersR 1959, 368)). A person's psychological state is very hard to ascertain, and a decision which focused exclusively on the plaintiff's attitude at a particular moment of time would often be unrealistic and unfair. § 254 BGB permits the trial judge to do justice in the particular circumstances of the individual case in a judicially responsible manner, and he will be assisted in making a just and proper exercise of his discretion in applying this provision if he pays attention to the principles evolved by the courts in relation thereto and to the principle of inconsistency in conduct.

The Third Civil Senate has stated that it no longer wishes to adhere to the doctrine of "acting at one's own risk" as laid down in BGHZ 2, 159, so it is unnecessary to convoke the Great Senate for Civil Matters under § 136 GVG.

V. It is well-established law that if the victim is a minor, his contributory fault under § 254 BGB is to be judged in accordance with the relevant principles of delictual law. If a sixteen-and-a-half-year-old like the plaintiff is personally at fault in consciously putting himself at risk, one must therefore look to his actual ability to recognise the dangerous nature of his conduct and to behave accordingly. To this extent we agree with the Court of Appeal. But as has been explained in IV, above, we cannot follow the Court of Appeal in holding that the defendants must be released from liability just because the plaintiff consciously endangered himself. This very case shows how unjust a result may follow from undue concentration on this point.

The following factors in particular should be noted. It is true that the plaintiff's failure to maintain his objection to the second defendant's taking over the wheel counts against him, as does the fact that he himself was ready to take the wheel in lieu of the second defendant and so imperil his fellow-travellers. On the other hand, the plaintiff was not the first to suggest that someone other than the first defendant should drive. In view of the way young people behave, the conduct of the plaintiff as a whole, while certainly culpable, is not incomprehensible. Young people like the plaintiff are especially ductile if an older comrade sets a bad example. In the circumstances, the plaintiff's fault in remaining in the vehicle when the second defendant was driving it certainly cannot be described as gross. The second defendant, by contrast, was the origin of the suggestion that an unqualified person should drive, and it was his unreasonable and incompetent driving which caused this serious accident. The first defendant was especially to blame, for it was he who had control of the car; furthermore, as the only person with a driving licence, he must have known the probable consequences of letting the second defendant drive; finally, he was the oldest of the group and should have asserted himself more strenuously.

These observations are not intended to prejudge the final decision which in view of the change in the law and the possibility of further evidence must necessarily be left to the trial judge. We make them only in order to show that on the evidence so far adduced it would be wrong that the defendants, who have apparently suffered only slight injuries, should be entirely released from liability to the plaintiff, who is maimed for life. This case is entirely different from the hypothetical case put by the Court of Appeal, where three youths of the same age who do not know how to drive and have no licence take turns at driving a car they have stolen and are badly injured in an accident while one of them is at the wheel. There is really no comparison between the situations. Nor does the very vague idea of "community of danger among the young", which weighed with the Court of Appeal, provide any legal basis for refusing to hold the defendants liable to the plaintiff.

Case 94

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 17 SEPTEMBER 1991
NJW 1991, 3275 = VERSR 1991, 1293

Facts

The plaintiff Land brought a claim for damages by way of the right of subrogation in respect of injuries suffered by K who was injured in a road accident on 11 February 1962. At the time of the accident, K was employed by the Land as a police officer. As a result of the consequences of the accident, K had to take early retirement on 1 February 1964. The defendants in the action were the insurers of R (the other driver), whose responsibility for the accident is not in dispute. As a result of a declaratory binding judgment dated 9 January 1969, the defendants are obliged to compensate the plaintiff inter alia for the costs which the latter will incur up to 30 November 2000 in respect of maintenance payments which it must make to K. The amount of the compensation payable is the difference between what K would have earned as a police sergeant and his earnings as a computer programmer. This is because since July 1964 K has been working as a programmer at the firm of T. Soon afterwards K was earning more in his new job than as a police officer. On 1 March 1982, however, he left the employment of T and joined the firm of S, owned by his brother. The intention was that after about one year's experience working for this firm he would take over the management of a newly established subsidiary company of S. Soon after opening, this subsidiary had to cease trading as its economic prospects were poor. K left the employment of S on 30 September 1983. Subsequently, he was employed as a sales representative for a publishing company, and then as an insurance agent. Since 1984 his income has been less than that of a police sergeant. The plaintiff therefore sought to recover in respect of the maintenance payments made between 1984 and 1987, based on the difference between what K actually earned and the earnings of a police sergeant, namely DM 101,219.69.

The LG gave judgment for the plaintiff; the OLG rejected the defendants' appeal. The defendants' appeal to the BGH was successful.

For the following

Reasons

I. The judgment of the OLG is based on the assumption that were it not for the accident, K would have remained in the police force and during the period of time in question would have had the earnings of a police sergeant. The claims for loss of earnings brought by the plaintiff by way of the right of subrogation (§ 99 NRWBG) were losses resulting from the accident. An adequate causal link exists between the loss and the accident. Developments such as those which have occurred in a case like the present one, whereby the professional activity initially taken up is subsequently abandoned with the result that the victim has a lower level of earnings, are not wholly improbable. There were therefore no grounds for the defendants to be exonerated from the duty to make good the damage resulting from K's loss of earnings according to the principles which have been developed by the case law on the protective scope of the norm and on the breaking of the chain of causation.

II. The judgment of the OLG is incorrect in law. The defendants' appeal must succeed and the claim must be rejected.

1. The OLG is correct to affirm that the pre-requisites are satisfied which would normally suffice for the defendants to be liable, such that they would be responsible for the loss of earnings in accordance with the provisions of § 823 I and § 842 BGB read in conjunction with § 3 of the Act on Compulsory Insurance (PflVG). Thus it is not in dispute that the defendants are bound to make good in full the loss of earnings suffered by K as a result of the accident. In contrast to the view put forward at the oral hearing on behalf of the applicants, it must also be assumed that K's accident is a scientific and factual cause of the loss of earnings for which the claim has been brought. For the OLG has established—and its underlying procedure has not been called into question by this appeal—that this loss would not have occurred but for the road accident. The judgment of the OLG is also correct in holding that there is an adequate causal link between this loss and the accident. It is not wholly improbable (to use the general definition [references omitted]) that a person injured in an accident who can no longer exercise his earlier profession because of the injuries he has suffered and must therefore earn his living in a different way, may also give up this professional activity, even if it is better paid, in order to seek greater job satisfaction elsewhere or in order to earn more, but that the result of the further change in job may be that his earnings fall behind what he was earning previously. Such a chain of events lies within the sphere of what experience has indicated can be expected to occur.

2. These general preconditions for liability will not, as this court has repeatedly stated, suffice in every case as the basis for the tortfeasor's duty to make good a particular consequence of the accident. Even though the loss may have been "adequately" caused by the accident, there may not, in exceptional cases, be the necessary internal connection between the infringement of the legally protected interest and the "resulting loss" as defined by § 823 I BGB for which the injured victim claims compensation required to generate a duty to compensate on the part of the defendants. If, as appears from the evaluation so far made of the facts, there is no more than a purely external, so to speak coincidental connection between the conduct which caused the injury and the consequential loss for which recovery is sought, then there is no relevant justification for attributing responsibility for this consequence of the original accident to the tortfeasor [references omitted]. Such is the case here.

(a) The necessary connection, such as is required for there to be a duty to compensate on the part of the defendants, with the range of risks to which the defendants, through their tortious conduct, subjected the victim, may be missing, in particular where the victim himself decides to take a certain course of action and thus himself has been the true cause of the consequential loss for which he now seeks recovery. In such a set of circumstances, an evaluatory assessment can lead to the conclusion that the loss thereby caused belongs exclusively to the normal risks of life of the victim himself. Thus it is recognised that the causal connection with the original tortious act is broken where conduct of the victim which causes the loss is wholly unusual or inappropriate [references omitted]. The same may apply where a decision of the victim which brings about the loss is so far removed from the risk created by the tortfeasor and is embedded within the victim's own sphere of risk such that the tortfeasor cannot legitimately be made liable for this consequence. It was with this reasoning and in the same circumstances as those at issue here, in which the victim of the accident changed job and thus suffered loss, that this court decided that further consequential loss fell outside the sphere of risk for which the defendant was responsible, provided that the change of professional activities was such that the accident was no more than the external trigger for this development (NJW-RR 1991, 854).

Such an exception will only apply subject to strict conditions. The principle of full compensation which applies to the law of damages requires that such an evaluation can only be undertaken in exceptional cases. It is necessary that there is a clear break which is externally visible, which shows that the injured person has accepted as his own the risks resulting from his decision to pursue a different professional goal [reference omitted].

If in a particular case there are unequivocal factors which indicate that with his decision to change careers the victim separated his future professional activities from the accident, then the principle of full compensation does not require the victim to be exonerated from the negative consequences of his career choice or the tortfeasor to take the burden of those consequences which, on an evaluatory assessment, have nothing more to do with the injury which was suffered or with the career change which this brought about, simply because the victim's career took a different path as a consequence of the accident and there is thus a causal connection with the loss. Where there is such a change of career, the victim—who may benefit from increased promotion and earning opportunities without being asked to account for these [references omitted]—acts at his own risk. He is not protected by the liability of the tortfeasor against the effects of all the incorrect vocational decisions he may make or against all the misfortunes which may occur from the moment of the accident to the time when he ceases work.

(b) In the case in question, K took up a post as a programmer in Firm T after the accident; he worked there for nearly 18 years. Soon afterwards, he earned more than in his previous job as a police sergeant. It is not claimed, nor is it the case, that K did not feel “wholly valued” in his new job or that he did not have the same social standing as in his previous job [references omitted]. K's decision to leave Firm T in 1982 and to switch to his brother's Firm S was not for instance based on any continuing effects upon his health of the road accident which occurred long before, but was simply based on K's wish to take up a new job which promised success and higher remuneration. These circumstances, taken as a whole and evaluated as this court is entitled to do on the basis of the findings of fact of the first instance court, make it apparent that there is a break in the chain of causation between the road accident on 11 February 1962 and the professional failures of the plaintiff after 1982. By taking a decision, which was no longer influenced by the accident, to leave his established job of 18 years with Firm T and to switch to his brother's firm, K decided to take his subsequent professional fate into his own hands, as would have been the case if any employee of Firm T, regardless of whether he or she had suffered a road accident, had decided to change jobs. So long as he was earning the level of salary paid by Firm T, K was suffering no loss of earnings as a consequence of the accident. There is evidence that this would not have changed up to the end of working life. If, in these circumstances, K were to feel the need to change jobs, then he was free to do so; however, there is no question of him making the person who caused an accident which happened 20 years earlier responsible for his professional failures which were caused by a decision by K which was brought about neither by the injuries caused in the accident, nor by any alleged “lesser value” of his work for Firm T. The road accident and K's subsequent employment at Firm T which was brought about by the accident were only relevant to his renewed decision to change jobs and work for Firm S to the extent that were it not for the accident he would have shied away from the possibility of working in his brother's business, given his permanent position in the public service as a police sergeant. This circumstance alone does not change the position as regards the factors set out above which indicate clearly that K was acting on his own responsibility, and does not undermine the argument that the chain of causation is broken between the road accident and the loss of earnings which is claimed. It follows that the disadvantageous consequences can no longer, with regard to the accident, be construed as “damage arising therefrom”.

(c) Contrary to the view put forward by the respondent in its argument, it is not necessary to reach a different conclusion on the grounds that his professional situation with

Firm T might have been a contributing factor in K's decision to move to his brother's business and that consequently it was necessary to establish the facts further in this respect. It is not necessary to decide whether the tortfeasor will always be liable in respect of the loss of earnings suffered by the victim which might occur considerably later after his forced change of job as a result of a reorganisation by his new employer. For the decision of the OLG does not leave it open as to whether the reason for K's move to his brother's business was attributable to his professional situation with Firm T, but rather it stated in the grounds for decision—and these were not challenged in the appeal—that K gave up his job as a programmer in order to take up a senior post in another business. In addition, as was apparent from the facts presented in the OLG judgment, the plaintiff, himself, did not even argue that K would no longer have been able to work for Firm T when it moved its data processing department, in which he worked, to the town of W; on the contrary, the plaintiff argued that the reason for K's move to his brother's business was that K did not want to move to W. Whether this would suffice as a ground for imposing the burden of the consequential loss of earnings which would have resulted from K's refusal and the subsequent change of job upon the person who caused the accident can be left open in this context since, as was said, the OLG found that the reason for K's change was his decision to take up a senior post in his brother's business. The professional misfortunes which resulted from this decision are, as stated here, no longer attributable to the acts of the tortfeasor.

Notes to Cases 76–94

1. The twenty cases reproduced above deal with various aspects of causation: cases 89, BGHZ 20, 137, and 80, BGHZ 3, 261, contain oft-quoted definitions of the adequate cause theory; cases 85, BGHZ 27, 137, and 86, BGHZ 58, 162, provide the leading examples of the operation of the “scope of the rule theory” of causation; case 78, RGZ 155, 37, deals with the problem of predispositions, while no. 89 discusses the thorny question of accident neurosis; case 87, OLG Stuttgart NJW 1965, 112, looks at the issues associated with rescues; case 92, RGZ 83, 15, deals with the plaintiff's duty to mitigate his loss and so on. All these points have been developed in section A of chapter 2, 5, above; and excellent collections of American materials can be found in: Franklin and Rabin, 293–381; Epstein, 363–459; Henderson and Pearson, 127–174; 521–575; Posner, 543; Prosser, Wade, and Schwartz, 252–355 etc. Dobbs, The Law of Torts, 405–492, nowadays provides one of the clearest treatise accounts. All of these also give abundant references to the rich periodical literature, so these notes can be kept to a minimum.

2. The literature may be extensive and some of the problems intellectually fascinating, but causation must be approached with the following warning in mind:

The problem [of causation] is a difficult one, but the length of the treatment in this casebook and the amount of time allocated it in most courses may perhaps give an exaggerated impression of its importance. In the great majority of negligence cases, the problem does not arise at all; it comes up only in the fraction of negligence actions that involve unusual fact situations. (Prosser, Wade, and Schwartz, 349.)

This down-to-earth remark applies equally to German and American law.

Prosser et al. also state in their case-book that “The principle task of the court is to do justice as between these parties in their present situation. For this purpose, a weighing evaluative process is required, rather than a clear-cut rule of law”. (pp. 349–50) This is not so different from the point the German Federal Court made in its famous judgment of 23 October 1951, BGHZ 3, 261, (case 80) where, after reviewing the many variants of the adequate cause theory, it concluded that the answer must, in the end, be found in common sense and a reasonable choice between competing policy factors. Once again Americans and Germans are thus not so far apart. For in both these countries academics have not managed to conceal their fascination with the subject which, in the end, they are forced to admit is of relatively small practical value and should be approached in a common-sense way (Hart and Honoré, ch. 2).

3. The differences between adequate causation and foreseeability have been discussed above (chapter 2, section 2.A 5(b)). “But foreseeability”, to quote Prosser et al. again (ibid. 350), “is an accordian concept, depending upon the detail and precision with which foresight is required.” In modern times it has thus been stretched (over-stretched in some cases, see, for example, Meah v. McCreamer [1985] 1 All ER 367), so that it is legitimate to enquire whether it has lost much of its usefulness as a device controlling liability. Was not that one of the reasons why the Re Polemis rule [1921] 3 KB 560 was abandoned in England (but not the USA; see Friendly J’s remarks in Petitions of Kinsman Transit Company 338 F. 2d 708 (1964)) by the Wagon Mound (No. 1) [1961] AC 388? In Germany, von Caemmerer has reached the same conclusion about the effectiveness of the adequate cause theory (“Das Problem des Kausalzusammenhangs” Gesammelte Schriften I, 395, 402, 408); and the German Federal Court is not tuning down its doubts about the concept of adequacy in general (for example see BGHZ 79, 259). Not unnaturally, the search for more normative theories of causation can thus be found in both systems, though once again the similarity between the views of Rabel and Green is, to say the least, coincidental but uncanny. Such theories, as we have seen, can help keep liability under control; but they can also lead to irreconcilable decisions: cf., for example, De Haen v. Rockwood Sprinkler Co. 258 NY 350, (1932); Di Caprio v. New York Cent. RR Co., 131 NE 746 (NY1921); Kernan v. American Dredging Co., 355 US 426, 78 S. Ct. 394 (1958) and, of course, the classic English case of Gorris v. Scott, LR 9 Exch. 125 (1874). Little wonder that in view of such ambiguities and uncertainties some authors have expressed open scepticism about the utility of the notion of causation (see, for example, Coase, “The Problem of Social Cost” 3 J. Law and Econ. 1, 2 (1960); Calabresi, The Cost of Accidents 6, n. 8 (1970)). But can terms like “cheaper cost avoider” avoid causal language?

4. In view of this, the selection of cases translated above more than usually reflects personal tastes and predilection. But even here a note of warning must be sounded. The judgments reproduced usually deal with one facet only of the problem selected for inclusion and discussion. For example, take the rescue case reproduced above (case 87, OLG Stuttgart NJW 1965, 112). This obviously invites comparison with Wagner v. International Ry Co. 133 NE 437 (NY 1921). The result is the same, since the policy behind the judgments is the same. But the terminology is different (causative language instead of duty of care). The use of the one rather than the other does not really matter, as most American books which discuss the problem say quite categorically. (In any event, terms such as “duty”, “foreseeability”, “adequate causation” in these cases barely conceal policy dictates.) But the difference in literary style cannot be passed unnoticed. Cardozo’s romantic imagery has justly been immortalized; dry causative language, on the other hand, can only make the law appear even more remote from real people and their problems than most of us perceive it to be. But the equivocation between concepts can be found in both systems; and once grasped, makes their comparison much easier in so far as one does not get too hung-up by concepts and notions.

Giving a rescuer an action is right only under certain circumstances. The German judgment, along with other different systems, hints that the solution will be different if his intervention is rash or the result of pure intermeddling with the affairs of others. Other problems arise. What, for example, if the person rescued negligently puts himself in a position of danger? What if the rescuer injures the rescued person or a third person? What about the rescuer’s rescuer? In the casuistic Common law, most of these problems have been litigated (see Prosser, Wade and Schwartz, 331–3); in German law the answers are usually canvassed in the literature; but in practice the solutions, again, should not be different, since the same policy issues are at work in both systems. The references given in the principal German case confirm this.

5. Foreseeability and rescue have also been considered in a novel context that has arisen, in part, because the law has not kept up with the rapid forward leaps of medical technology. The point can be easily put: should a medical practitioner who culpably removes the sole kidney of an injured child be liable for the damage which a close relative (typically mother or father) suffers by donating one of his kidneys? Case 88, BGHZ 101, 215, and Canadian law (Urbanski v. Patel, 84 DLR 3rd 650, 671 (1978)) have said “yes” to such claims—the courts in the USA have decided otherwise. (See Sirianni v. Anna 285 NYS 2d 709 (1967); Moore v. Shah, 458 NYS 33 (1982); Ornelas v. Fry, 727 P. 2d 819 (Ariz.1986).) What are the arguments for and against recovery?

First, there is a hint, but no more than that, to suggest that the donor’s intervention may be unforeseeable and unexpected. This must have been particularly true when cases like Sirianni v. Anna (1967) were decided when organ transplants were still rare. This argument, however, is unlikely to carry much weight today when, as the Canadian Court put it in Urbanski v. Patel, “a kidney transplant is an accepted remedy in [cases of] renal failure”.

A second argument, considered in Moore v. Shah, was that foreseeability alone is not enough to lead to the discovery of a “duty of care” and thereby to the imposition of liability. This is certainly true as far as English law is concerned though it is somewhat surprising to see it coming from the pen of American judges. For, as Professor John Fleming has put it, “In California [at least] foreseeability has for most purposes become a sufficient test for ‘duty’” (The American Tort Process (1988), 118). Equally surprising is the fact that American judges, who are in practice quick to usurp the (inactive) legislature’s role, are in this context suggesting that if a remedy is needed it should come from the legislator (Sirianni v. Anna at p. 713).

A third objection considered by the Moore court is that the imposition of liability would extend the physician’s liability “beyond manageable limits” since they could not “foresee each and every person other than his patient who might conceivably be affected by his negligence”. But quite apart from the fact that the floodgates argument has never held out much appeal in instances involving physical injury, the fact is that in these cases one is only concerned with a limited and usually identifiable group of close relatives who, for medical reasons (tissue matching), or from an understandable moral compulsion, are, in practice, the only ones likely to come forward in order to save the injured primary victim. In any event, the floodgates argument seems to be effectively countered by the criteria which the German courts say must be evaluated ad hoc before the rescuer’s intervention is deemed worthy of support.

The fourth objection is that in the view of the American courts this situation is incompatible with Cardozo’s phraseology in the Wagner case. There Cardozo had talked of “the act of rescue, if only it be not wanton, is born of the occasion”; and “wanton” was in the kidney cases interpreted to mean “wilful”, later elaborated into “wilful, intentional, voluntary”. Do you think that is what “wanton” means? Since every rescue, even one attempted on the spur of the moment, is intentional and voluntary, should not “wanton” here be taken to imply “reckless”?

Fifthly, in the USA the rescue doctrine was not applied to the present situation on the grounds that the rescuer/donor had time to reflect on his action. How does the German court counter this point? Which view do you find more convincing?

Finally, the sixth objection against recovery is the presence of consent on the part of the donor/plaintiff. With respect, however, the argument is misleading. For no one is saying that the kidney was removed without consent; if it had been, there would be an action for battery! What one is saying is that the defendant’s negligence placed the donor in a position in which, morally and socially, he felt compelled to act the way he did. Indeed, wider policy considerations should encourage such donations, not penalise them by not rewarding them. The German court, influenced by such motives, had no doubt that “consent” could not in this case be used as a defence. Do you agree with its view or do you prefer the American reasoning? How much has policy influenced the outcome of those cases? Which view do you think the English courts should/will adopt?

6. The problem of accident neurosis is represented in this selection by two cases only (no. 89, BGHZ 20, 137, and 90, BGHZ 137, 142) though many have reached the courts. It is best understood if read in conjunction with the cases 1–3 on nervous shock annotated above. The difference here, however, is that the victim, as primary victim, does not need to fulfil any additional criteria (“ties of love and affection” etc.) before he can recover. The main problem in these cases is to exclude such psychiatric illness as is too remote and ought not give rise to a cause of action. Generally speaking, the tortfeasor has to accept that the victim has a predisposition for the illness; i.e. the harm has only arisen because of the special condition of the plaintiff. A psychological susceptibility, which leads to disorders and consequential harm—perhaps incapacity to work—which would not have occurred in the case of the vast majority of human beings, can be included in these individual conditions. In principle, the plaintiff—according to the egg shell rule—has to compensate for such consequential harm. At the same time, it is clear that the law has to impose some limits to the extent of liability. German courts have developed two major exceptions to recovery. The first concerns the so-called “rent neurosis” (Rentenneurose. “Rent” must here be understood in the sense of “periodic payments” which is the form that many injury awards take in Germany). In these cases the claimant (whose illness is not in doubt), in his desire for financial security, merely takes the accident as a welcome opportunity to avoid the hardship of having to earn his livelihood in his profession. Awarding compensation in such a case would be counterproductive and would hinder the claimant’s recovery (see case 89 above, BGHZ 20, 137 and BGHZ 56, 163). The main problem here is of course to prove that that is the case. The second exception concerns cases where the accident concerns a minor incident (Bagatelle). If the psychiatric illness is not due to a clear predisposition of the victim, and there is a clear disproportion between the accident and its consequences, liability will, again, be denied (see BGH NJW 1997, 1640). For a useful summary of the case law see case 90, which also emphasises that the two exceptions mentioned above must be construed narrowly. This case also shows that the BGH, unlike its common law counterparts, is increasingly taking psychiatric illnesses seriously (see Schiemann JZ 1998, 684). Given the limitations of space we cannot go into more details; but this is also regrettable since the interaction of law and medicine is here, as elsewhere, fascinating. The medical aspects of this problem are discussed by a consultant neurologist in a book which is intelligible even to non-specialists (Trimble, Post Traumatic Neurosis (1981)); and one of the points made there is that attitudes towards this problem are changing. Thus, while during the nineteenth century stress was put on “organic” material changes, during the greater part of our century the emphasis has shifted to psychological interpretation of the symptoms. More recently, however, there is a certain return towards more “organic” interpretations as the functioning of the human brain becomes better understood. The notion that in most of these cases plaintiffs are not guilty of malingering may (subject to what has been said in relation to the Rentenneurose), in part, explain the greater willingness to provide compensation. Certainly medical science has shown that illness following injury seems susceptible to manipulation by compensation factors. Clearly there is here more room for interdisciplinary work (incidentally, the BGH justified its more victim-friendly attitude in BGH NJW 1998, 810 by referring to new medical research). By the way, the same interest in the increased ability of medical science to explain and understand these complaints is also evidenced in the (English) Law Commission’s learned report entitled “Liability for Psychiatric Illness” (Consultation Paper No 137, 1995). But this new learning has still failed to budge English judges from their fears of endless litigation. The result? English law on the subject is in a hopeless tangle from which, some judges seem to think, only the legislator can save it.

7. Case 81, BGHZ 132, 164, deals with a different question: under what conditions can liability be imposed if the victim brings the injury upon himself. The aspect of the question we wish to consider has arisen in cases where law enforcement officers are injured while pursuing the perpetrators of crime. Two points must be considered.

In such cases, the first step is to establish in what circumstances the tortfeasor owes a duty of care to his pursuer. The German court suggested that it was not the flight, as such, that created liability but the manner in which it was executed. We have already noted in the context of the nervous shock cases (see notes to cases 1–3, above) that although there is no duty of care to abstain from injuring oneself, the situation might be different where self-harming also causes injuries to another person. Conversely the suspect—assuming the position of the BGH is correct—has no duty to help the police to arrest him. But if he seeks to escape the pursuit, he is under an obligation to do this in a manner that will not endanger the health of the pursuing officers. Since, as is clear to him, it is their duty to enforce the law and to arrest him, the suspect owes them a duty of care not to provoke a dangerous pursuit. The problem has been identified above (chapter 2, section 2.A 5(a)) as one of causation while the BGH prefers the language of “objective attribution”, objektive Zurechnung. (The older case law assumed that the chain of causation was interrupted, see Emmerich JuS 1996, 846) This may be more a matter of terminology than substance. Nonetheless, it is remarkable to note how much effort the court expended in trying to define the circumstances under which a duty of care would arise. Equally interesting is the fact that it did not openly analyse the problem as one of causation even though the theory of “the protective scope of the rule” can be framed as a problem of legal cause. This indicates yet again how interchangeable the different approaches really are (scope of the duty owed, duty of care, and causation). One obvious advantage of approaching the case on the basis of § 254 BGB (mitigation) is that it allows a partial reduction of damages (as was actually held in the present case). A causative analysis on the other hand could entail an all or nothing result. (See for a similar approach in English cases, Hart and Honoré Causation in the Law (2nd edn. 1985) p. 141.)

The second issue raised by the case is how to weigh the interests involved. It is not necessary to repeat the reasoning of the court, which repays careful reading. Suffice it to say that the BGH requires that the police’s decision to pursue is not wholly unreasonable (which is determined by a comprehensive balancing of interests). Additionally, it must be shown that the loss was caused because of the increased danger situation inherent in the pursuit and was not part of the general risks of life (allgemeines Lebensrisiko). (For details see Teichmann’s note in JZ 1996, 1181.) The notions are interesting; indeed, they make much sense. But, as always, the devil lies in the detail.

Maps of Europe and Germany

MAP 1. Pre-codification map of Germany reproduced by kind permission of the Niedersächsische Staats- und Universitätsbibliothek in Göttingen.

MAPS OF EUROPE AND GERMANY

MAP 2. Re-united Germany.

A Note on the Jurists that Follow

Selection is an invidious task; and it becomes almost impossible to perform when the list of distinguished German jurists is so extensive. From the outset, it was clear to me that focusing on the better known names of the 19th century would have been wrong on two counts. First and foremost this is a work on contemporary German law. Secondly, to concentrate on the past would imply that the present offers unworthy successors. This is patently wrong; and a variety of factors, including the cultural “fall out” of the Second World War, can account for the fact that modern German law (and its lawyers) is less known in the university class rooms of today. Incidentally, from the moment the decision was taken to include pictures of distinguished German jurists, I was clear in my mind that I would not include jurists, however distinguished they might have been, who had played an active part in the National Socialist regime in the thirties and early forties.

A second question that had to be resolved was whether this “pantheon” should be limited to academics. Given the strong academic content of German law, such a decision would have been perfectly possible and defensible. Yet one of the theses of this work is that modern German law is highly dependent on its case law. So judges had to be included, though that did not answer the question how to select those who merited inclusion.

The difficulty is caused by the fact that no individual judgments are delivered in the German Courts (except the Constitutional Court); and it is difficult to trace an individual’s contribution in a collective judgment. The possibility of finding in German law an individual stylist such as Cardozo’s or Holmes’, Blackburn, Atkin or Denning simply does not exist. After consulting my German friends, I decided that selecting from those who had served as Vice President’s or Presidents of the Federal Supreme Court in the fifties and sixties was an objective a criterion as I could get. Their short biographies that I have prepared to accompany each photograph shows that all were not only senior judges but also had impressive academic credentials. If my list is still not to everyone’s liking, the possibility of a fifth edition of this book is the only hope of redemption that I can offer.

German Jurists

Friedrich Carl von SAVIGNY (1779–1861). He was a descendant of a well-to-do family from Lorraine, which moved to Germany in 1730 because of its Protestant beliefs. He studied law in Marburg between 1795 and 1799 where he wrote his doctoral dissertation in Latin. He then held Chairs in Marburg (1803), Landshut, in Bavaria (1808), and Berlin (from 1810 where he co-founded the Prussian University and was its first Rector from 1812–1813). He was the founder of the Historical School and the Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte. He taught the Crown Prince subsequently King Frederick William IV of Prussia. His first major work on The Law of Possession appeared during his first year in Marburg. The book was translated forty-five years later into English by Sir Erskine Perry, Chief Justice of Bombay who described it as a “most valuable work to Indian practitioners.” This appreciation was later echoed by John Austin who referred to it in his Lectures on Jurisprudence as “of all books upon law, the most consummate and masterly. But Savigny had already won acclaim as polemicist, opposing any rapid moves at German (political) and legal unification. This battle began when, in 1814, Thibaut, a Professor at Heidelberg, wrote his famous tract Über die Nothwendigkeit eines allgemeinen bürgerlichen Rechts für Deutschland, proposing a general Civil Code for Germany along the lines of the recently enacted French Code. Savigny replied with his equally forceful tract Vom Beruf unserer Zeit für Gesetzgebung und Rechtswissenschaft arguing that the time was not ripe for such a project which should be preceded by a thorough study of the existing, indigenous legal material. Savigny’s magnum opus was his System des heutigen römischen Rechts published in 8 volumes between 1840 and 1849 (the last chapter of which on conflict of laws was translated into English.) Savigny, was remarkable in devoting much time to his friends and among the many beneficiaries of such generosity of spirit was our own John Austin and Jacob Grimm—one of the Brothers Grimm of the Fairy Tales—whom he helped by getting him a chair at Berlin. Grimm, whose substantial correspondence with Savigny survives and provides excellent insights into the difficult (and not always compatible) characters and aspirations of both men, repaid the compliment by dedicating to Savigny his Deutsche Grammatik—one of the most important works ever written for German philology. Savigny’s work received State recognition of the award of the Order Pour le Merit (pronounced in French), which was originally instituted by Frederick the Great as a military order but was later extended to cover a very limited number of luminaries from the world of arts and sciences. It is still Germany’s highest distinction, held by a limited number of persons at any one time, and thus in many ways analogous to our own Order of Merit.

GERMAN JURISTS

Rudolph von JHERING (1818–1892) is an ideal subject for biography, especially if his life is examined, as it must be, in close connection with his work and his times. Peripatetic as a student—he studied in Heidelberg, Munich, Göttingen and Berlin—he proved just as mobile as a Professor, confirming the statement that Goethe put in Faust’s mouth “It is only through restlessness that one proves one’s worth”. He thus held chairs successively in Berlin (as an Associate) and then as ordinarius in Basel, Rostock, Kiel, Giessen, Vienna (from which, on departure, he was given the Knight’s Cross in the Order of Leopold which carried with it the title of von which he proudly used ever after) and, finally, Göttingen (while refusing “calls” to Leipzig and Heidelberg). His interests were just as varied, ranging from music to art, gardening, and particularly growing wines. His spread in law was just as impressive, ranging from Roman law—with his Geist des römischen Rechts being his most original work—to jurisprudence with his Kampf ums Recht where he boldly asserted that law triumphs only when citizens assert their rights. Even more widely acclaimed was his Der Zweck im Recht, where he dared to challenge the German establishment’s attachment to Hegel and the idea that law was the expression of the general will. (For Jhering, like Ulpian, “Jus privatum quod ad singulorum utilitatem special.”) But the work is wider than the few lines above suggest, as it contains in its second volume some remarkable views on teleology, the theory of morals, as well as a fascinating study on courtesy—Höflichkeit—in relation to manners, dress, symbolism, and speech. Humour is also not absent from his interests, represented by a later work Scherz und Ernst in der Jurisprudenz—a work, which also contains some original ideas about the need to maintain a close link between academic law, practice, and legal education. Jhering lived in an era of political giants (Bismarck, was his hero) and legal luminaries of the highest order. (He was almost an exact contemporary of Sir Henry Maine at the time when the latter was doing his best work). As a scholar he may have lacked the precision of Dernburg (whom he followed in his study of the law of possession) or the investigative gifts of Mommsen. But the vivacity of his style and the force with which he put forward his views not only made him a great teacher but the best selling legal author of his time. Moreover, he was a visionary, who did not allow his scholarly interest in Roman law to obscure his conviction that the time had come to go, as he put it, “through Roman law, above and beyond it.” This vision is also evident in his attack on parochialism that came with the triumph of the sovereign state of the 19th century, arguably making him a precursor of some contemporary ideas of legal globalisation.

GERMAN JURISTS

Otto von GIERKE (1841–1921). Son of a Prussian judge who served first as Associate Professor in Berlin (1866) and then as full Professor in Breslau (1872), Heidelberg (1884) and Berlin (from 1887). His principle work was his Genossenschaftsrecht in 4 volumes which appeared between 1869 and 1913. He provided a useful contribution to the preparation of the Code through his polemical piece Der Entwurf eines Bürgerlichen Gesetzbuchs und das deutsche Recht published in 1889. He was a severe critic of the 19th century bourgeois liberal ideas that came to be enshrined in the Code; and as the leading “Germanist” of his age, he often criticised the predominant influence that Roman law had on the drafting of the new Code.

GERMAN JURISTS

Hans Carl NIPPERDEY (left) (1895–1968). Started his legal career as an Associate Professor in Jena. His first major work which brought him to national attention was published in 1920 and was entitled Kontrahierungszwang und diktierter Vertrag. From 1925 onwards he was Professor at Cologne mainly writing on the General Part of the Civil Code (Ennecerus/Nipperdey Allgemeiner Teil des Bürgerlichen Rechts) and (with Alfred Hueck) on labour law (Lehrbuch des Arbeitsrechts). From 1954 to 1963 he held the post of President of the (supreme) Federal Labour Court and concentrated his efforts on developing the uncodified labour law on a case-by-case basis, paying particular attention to the constitutionally guaranteed basic rights.

Werner FLUME (right) (1908–). He was a pupil of the famous Romanist Fritz Schulz. In the beginning, his career under Schulz flourished with a scholarly work on the accessory nature of guarantee stipulations in Roman law. After 1933, however, the persecution of Schulz by the Nazis affected his career as well and he had to earn his living as a practising lawyer specialising in business and tax law. Academic recognition finally came in 1945 when he was elected to a Chair in the University of Bonn. Important works followed: in 1948 his Eigenschaftsirrthum und Kauf and later (between 1965 and 1977) his three-volume Allgemeiner Teil des Bürgerlichen Rechts along with numerous articles on company and tax law. Flume spoke on a number of occasions to the German Association of Lawyers giving his views on many matters of tort law, his severe criticism of the “Gentleman Rider” case being one of them.

GERMAN JURISTS

Ernst von CAEMMERER (1908–1985). Born and raised in Berlin. Studied law in Munich and Berlin and then became judge at the Berlin Landgericht. Later he became legal adviser to the Dresdner Bank. While in Berlin he met Ernst Rabel and was persuaded to join as an Assistant the famous Kaiser Wilhelm Institut für ausländisches und internationales Privatrecht. In the long run, Rabel's influence on von Caemmerer and his work proved decisive. But in the thirties his association with this great jurist (who had by then sought refuge in the United States) hindered his career which seemed to be grinding to a halt. During the war he served as a naval officer on a mine sweeper. The breakthrough came in 1946 when he completed his Habilitation in Frankfurt under Walter Halstein (who was later to become Germany's first Foreign Affairs Minister) and a year later was called to a full Chair in Freiburg where, despite many attempts to entice him away, he stayed for the rest of his life. Von Caemmerer defies the usual pattern of a German academic career depending for advancement on the writing of learned monographs or large treatises. But his influence on the German law of torts, unjust enrichment, and the law of international commerce was enormous and it came through numerous scholarly articles and notes which still attract much attention in Germany.

GERMAN JURISTS

Robert FISCHER (left) born in 1911 in Hessen studied law in Tübingen and Breslau. His doctoral thesis in 1935 was on a subject of company law which qualified him well for his subsequent work in the Legal Department of the Deutsche Bank. From 1945 to 1950 he served as the Director of the Landgericht of Göttingen and then was offered a seat in the Bundesgerichtshof becoming the youngest person ever to reach such a post at the age of thirty-nine. He subsequently turned down an offer of a Chair at Cologne University choosing, instead, to concentrate his efforts on his work as President of the Second Civil Senate. Between 1968 and 1977 he served as President of the entire Federal Court. His influence on the court's case law, especially in the areas of commercial and company law, was very great.

Bruno HEUSINGER (right) (1900–1975). Originated from Lower Saxony. Studied history at the University of Göttingen where he wrote a doctoral dissertation on the Servitium Regis (dealing with the economic relations of the German Monarchy between 900 and 1250 A.D.) He later switched to law and from 1929 he served as judge in the Landgericht and later in the Oberlandesgericht of Braunschweig of which he had become president by 1934. In that year, however, the Nazis demoted him to his first rank. It was not until 1948 that he was allowed to return to his earlier judicial post as president of the Court of Appeal, a post which was followed by that of President of the Oberlandesgericht of Celle. Two years later the supreme recognition of a distinguished judicial career finally came with his appointment as President of the Bundesgerichtshof a post which he held until his retirement in 1968.

GERMAN JURISTS

Fritz HAUSS. Born 1908 in Münster, Westfalia. He studied law in Innsbruck, Münster, Berlin and Marburg where he defended his thesis in 1931 on Die Pfändung der Eigentümergrundschild. His first judicial post was at the Oberlandesgericht of Hamm. In 1952 he was promoted to the Bundesgerichtshof where he was assigned first to the Sixth Civil Senate—where, it is believed, many tort cases dealing with the emerging right of privacy bear his mark—and later made President of the Fourth Civil Senate which deals with problems of family law, succession, and insurance. Between 1971 and 1977 he was Vice President of the entire Bundesgerichtshof and also managed to carry out (on a part time basis) the duties of a Visiting (later Honorary) Professor at Heidelberg. His academic work, which includes many publications on the law of civil liability, has been recognised by an honorary doctorate from the University of Tübingen. Hauss also holds the post of Chairman of the Appellate committee of the German Press Council.

GERMAN JURISTS

Walter STIMPEL. He was born in 1917 in Saxony and served in the Luftwaffe as officer for “air force personnel”. Between 1947 and 1950 he studied law in Kiel and then pursued post graduate studies in the Yale law school in the USA. From 1954 he served as judge in the Landgericht and Oberlandesgericht of Braunschweig. In 1965 he was promoted to the Bundesgerichtshof and assigned to the Second Civil Senate which deals with matters of company law, banking law and maritime law. From 1971 he served as President of that Senate and as Vice President of the entire court. From 1984 he held a teaching position in the University of Heidelberg and, later, was made an honorary Professor of the same University; and his many publications (especially on company law) have also been recognised by the award of an honorary doctorate from the University of Tübingen.

Liability for Others, Labour Law, and Stricter Forms of Liability

SECTION A. COMMENTARY

1. §§ 831 AND 278 BGB

Select bibliography

Brüggemeier, “Organisationshaftung—Deliktische Aspekte innerorganisatorischer Funktionsdifferenzierung”, AcP 191 (1991), 33; Von Caemmerer, “Wandlungen des Deliktsrechts, Hundert Jahre deutsches Rechtsleben”, Festschrift zum 100 jährigen Bestehen des Deutschen Juristentages II (1960) 49, 115 ff., reproduced in his Gesammelte Schriften (1968) 452; idem, “Reformprobleme der Haftung für Hilfspersonen”, ZfRV (1973) 241; Deutsch, “Die neuere Entwicklung der Rechtsprechung zum Haftungsrecht”, JZ 1984, 308, 314 ff.; Diederichsen, “Zum Entlastungsbeweis für Verrichtungsgehilfen”, ZRP (1968) 60; Hassold, “Die Lehre vom Organisationsverschulden”, JuS 1982, 583; Helm, “Rechtsfortbildung und Reform bei der Haftung für Verrichtungsgehilfen”, AcP 166 (1966) 389; Hübner, “Zur Reform von Deliktsrecht und Gefährdungshaftung”, NJW 1982, 2041; Jakobs, “Über die Notwendigkeit einer Reform der Geschäftsherrenhaftung”, VersR 1969, 1061; Kiser, “Die Haftung des Fuhrparkhalters nach § 831 BGB hinsichtlich Auswahl und Beauftragung des Fahrers”, VersR 1984, 213; Kupisch, “Die Haftung für Verrichtungsgehilfen (§ 831 BGB)”, JuS 1984, 250; E. Schmidt, “Zur Dogmatik des § 278”, AcP 170 (1970) 502, 520 ff.; Steindorff, “Repräsentanten- und Gehilfenversagen und Qualitätsregelungen in der Industrie”, AcP 170 (1970) 93; Weitnauer, “Aktuelle Fragen des Haftungsrechts”, VersR 1970, 585, 593 ff. For comparative discussions see Eörsi, in International Encyclopedia of Comparative Law XI, chap. 4; Kötz, “Strict Liability in German Law”, In Memoriam Jean Limpeus (1984) 75 ff.; Lawson and Markesinis, Tortious Liability for Unintentional Harm in the Common Law and the Civil Law (1982), I, 163 ff.; Zweigert and Kötz, An Introduction to Comparative Law (1998) para. 41, p. 629, with further references to English and French literature.

(a) General observations

Up to now we have been envisaging liability for one’s own acts or omissions. Its importance remains crucial in today’s world; and in fairly primitive or simple societies, with agrarian economies and a fairly elementary system of labour, it was the most crucial form of tort liability. But economic growth, industrialisation, the increase of commerce and of economic activity in general, necessitated the introduction of a more elaborate system of work which enabled one person or business entity to use the services of other persons in the furthering of their economic interests. Since these persons or entities—the masters as they were once called—derived the benefit from the services of those working for them—the “servants” or, nowadays, employees—it was only natural to think of making the former liable for the harmful conduct of the latter. Besides, the masters were often in a position to take steps to prevent the harm or—at a later stage—to carry insurance against the risk. Such a way of looking at things also offered considerable advantages to the victim, for he was thus offered a person worth suing in the place of the often, impetuous servant who had actually caused him the harm. Arguments such as these led to the strengthening and extension of what Common lawyers call vicarious liability; subject to the points made below, they are to be found as much in German law as they are in the other systems.

But the urge to make the “master” liable instead of or in addition to the servant could be approached in two ways. The one most consistent with the reasons we gave above was to make the master liable strictly for the faults (or unlawful acts) of the servants. The master’s own liability, therefore, was strict in the sense that it did not depend on any fault on his part; but fault there had to be on the part of the servant. (But on this point, as well, note that German law presents a variant.) This is, indeed, the position taken by most of the legal systems of the world. But the German Civil Code opted for a weaker rule of “vicarious” liability: the master’s liability would be based on his own fault of bad selection or supervision of the servant but it would be rebuttable in accordance with what will be said very shortly. Liability of masters is thus one way of making a person liable for the harm caused by another—§ 832 BGB being the other. (It is discussed below at pp. 700f.)

There are a number of reasons that account for this different approach taken by German law. An historical explanation lies in the fact that the nineteenth-century Pandectists had convinced themselves that the doctrine of culpa in eligendo, which they were introducing into § 831 BGB, was the only one known to Roman law. That this was so in a number of individual factual situations is beyond doubt; but to develop from the casuistic Roman approach a generalised doctrine that the master could only be liable if he himself was at fault was incorrect. (For more details see Seiler, “Die deliktische Gehilfenhaftung in historischer Sicht” JZ 1967, 530; Kaser, Das römische Privatrecht (1955) I, 527ff., and, in English, Lawson and Markesinis, op. cit., I, 160–3; Zimmermann, Law of Obligations (1990) 1121–6.)

A more pragmatic objection to the introduction of the “true” notion of vicarious liability was the fear that it would bring in its wake unwanted economic consequences, and in particular, increased economic burdens for small industry. And it was the aspirations and interests of this small industry, populated by the rising middle class, which the Civil Code had at heart. Not for the first time, therefore, the Code was to give effect to these ideas, oblivious to the fact that in the wider industrial field the enactment of such statutes as the Imperial Liability Act of 1871 had imposed strict liability on railway companies and, in this context, completely overtaken the notion of fault. In the end, therefore, the Code chose, as we shall see in section A.3, below, to leave the regulation of special matters to specialised legislation. Instead, it sanctioned as a general principle the idea that the master would be liable for the unlawful conduct of his servants only if fault could be imputed to him, the master, personally, in the choice and supervision of the servants. (If the master was a legal entity, the fault had to be imputed to its “duly” appointed representatives: § 31 BGB.)

We shall discuss this subject under four headings (b)–(f): (b) master–servant relationship; (c) damage in the course of employment; (d) unlawfulness; and (e) the master’s exculpatory proof. A concluding section (f) will deal with the many ways devised to the unfortunate effects of § 831 BGB.

(b) Master–servant relationship

For the master to be liable, the damage must have been caused by a person to whom the master had “entrusted the performance of a function” (zu einer Verrichtung bestellt). Who qualifies as a servant (Verrichtungsgehilfe) is a mixed question of law and fact for the court to determine. Often, one encounters the term “dependency” (Abhängigkeitsverhältnis). Thus, Esser/Weyers, op. cit. II 2, p. 210); but like most of these terms, its utility depends on precise definition and this is not always possible. The most widely applied test, used to determine this relationship, is that of “direction and control” which means that salaried and wage-earning employees will, invariably, be classed as servants. (A classic formulation can be found in RGZ 92, 345, 346.) The limitations of this test, in a society with sophisticated labour and economic relations, have become apparent in Germany as they have elsewhere. The need was thus felt to widen the test so as to render, for example, hospitals liable for the wrongs of their surgeons, anaesthesiologists, and technical staff over whom, obviously, the master (hospital) had no direct and detailed control. Thus, it has on several occasions been stressed that the right to direct and control need not cover details. In one case (no. 104) the court expressly said that the right to give instructions need not cover details. It is sufficient that the master has the right to limit the worker’s activity or withdraw it or circumscribe it as to time or circumstances. (BGH 30 June 1966, BGHZ 45, 311, 313. See, also, BGH 25 February 1988, BGHZ 103, 303.) The relaxed way in which the control test has been understood has thus allowed a hospital to be held liable for the harm caused by one of its doctors (BGH 26 April 1988, NJW 1988, 2298) and a doctor for the harm caused by one of his locums. (BGH 16 October 1956, NJW 1956, 1834.) The onus of proving the requisite relationship is on the plaintiff. (BGH 21 June 1994, ZfS 1995, 7.)

Clearly, even this redefined test will not solve all difficulties, and borderline cases will always exist. So, for example, a problem area well known to Common lawyers can be found in cases dealing with “borrowed servants” (usually “let out” by their masters with complicated modern machinery). If they cause damage while operating this machinery, who will be held responsible—the permanent or temporary master? Much will depend on the facts of each case but as in England (see Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Coggins & Griffiths (Liverpool) Ltd. [1947] AC 1), so in Germany (see BGH VersR 1956, 322), there is a certain tendency to retain the responsibility of the permanent master since he usually retains the greater degree of overall control. The solution adopted sometimes in the USA, to hold both employers liable to the employee and then let them sort the situation out among themselves (as in Strait v. Hale Constr. Co., 26 Cal. App. 3d 941, 103 Cal. Rptr. 487 (1972)), has thus not found favour. It will be noticed, however, that there is an increasing tendency to think in terms of the possibility of command and not, necessarily, actual command—a development which tends to extend the area of vicarious liability.

This trend is further reinforced by the fact that actual and not legal subordination will suffice to render the master liable (see Enneccerus, Kipp, and Wolff (Lehmann) 980; cf. Restatement (Second) of Agency, (1959) § 220, which talks in terms of “control or right to control”). Moreover, the subordination need not be constant: a student working on a part-time basis may render his employer liable and this even if the services he is rendering to him are gratuitous.

Determining whether a person is an employee or, alternatively, what Common lawyers would call an independent contractor is essential, since, in principle, there will be no liability for the wrongs committed by the latter category. To achieve this, German lawyers are increasingly following the Common law example and looking at the entire economic relationship, not merely enlarging or adapting the control and direction test. Thus, von Caemmerer has candidly suggested (“Reformprobleme der Haftung für Hilfspersonen” in Zeitschrift für Rechtsvergleichung 1973, 241, 254) that this enquiry should be directed towards such matters as which person is in a better position to carry the risk or is economically more suitable to take out insurance. Once again, though individual solutions may occasionally receive a different answer, the German approach is, on the whole, quite similar to that taken by Common law lawyers, so no further details need be given.

This similarity is also to be found in the exceptions to the rule that one is not, in principle, liable for the torts of independent contractors (Cf. §§ 410–29 Restatement (Second) of Tort.) However, here, too, German lawyers have felt the need experienced by their Common law colleagues to develop rules of responsibility analogous to our non-delegable duties. Thus, the master will be liable under § 823 I BGB if he himself has negligently selected the independent contractor and, on occasion, also if he failed to control him in the exercise of his task. The extent and nature of this duty will vary from case to case, but in cases of large building works—especially when neighbouring buildings or their foundations are endangered—such additional obligations will readily be imposed on the employer of the independent contractor. The decision of the Bundesgerichtshof of 7 October 1975 (JZ 1975, 733) provides another illustration, akin to the English notion of extra-hazardous activities. In that case, a chemical factory engaged a firm of specialist contractors to dispose of some very toxic waste for their benefit. The waste was improperly removed and the chemical factory was held responsible for this bad execution of the work. It will be noticed that, as in English law, these duties are stricter than the normal duties of care in so far as they impose a duty to see that care be taken; but that they do not actually impose truly strict liability. Some German writers, however, have advocated that a strict duty be imposed in such cases upon the employer (see Vollmer, JZ 1977, 371).

(c) The damage must have been inflicted by the servant “in the exercise of the function assigned to him” (in Ausführung der Verrichtung)

Behind this not very informative expression lies one of the most litigated aspects of the whole law of vicarious liability as Common lawyers who have grappled with the equivalent notion of “course of employment” will readily understand. To solve it the courts have used—as we shall note below—a variety of terms or notions. Perhaps we could attempt to simplify the problem by saying that in practice there is one rule. Either the servant is within the “course of employment” (and so if the other conditions are satisfied will render his master liable), or he is not (in which case there is no liability for the master). Whether he is in the course of his employment or not is really a question of fact. In a sense, the situation here is not dissimilar from that found when discussing the elements of negligence or carelessness. For there, as well, there is a simple rule: if a person has behaved carelessly, he is liable (subject to certain other conditions being fulfilled); if he was not careless, he is not liable. The question whether his behaviour was careless or not is, once again, one of fact. Just as there are guidelines (not rules) to help in determining carelessness, so there are guidelines, and no more, which help in determining “course of employment” (or the equivalent German expression). The decision is, therefore, often impressionistic. The only permissible generalisation is that the area of activity falling within the “scope of employment” seems to be widening. This may be partly as a result of the increase in motor traffic (and the compulsory insurance schemes that go with it) and partly because the scope of acceptable risk has widened as legal entities have taken over from human beings the position of “master”.

However, one must immediately qualify the last sentence by pointing out that German law has consistently taken a stricter view on this matter than other systems have done (e.g. the French). It has thus excluded acts done by the servants merely because their employment provided them with the occasion or opportunity for performing these acts (Enneccerus, Kipp, and Wolff (Lehmann) 979; Larenz I, § 20, viii, p. 401; Larenz/Canaris II 2, § 79 III, p. 480; see, also, case 96, BGHZ 49, 19, below). Thus, if the wrong is something incidental to the work assigned (bei Gelegenheit der Verrichtung) to the worker, his master will not be “vicariously” liable (under § 831 BGB) for it, unless it can be shown that he himself was at fault (§ 823 I BGB) in introducing this risk. A practical joke played by one employee on another will therefore not justify the employer’s vicarious liability though it may attract his own personal liability if it can be shown that he was aware of the employee’s mischievous or irresponsible propensities. (For English law see Hudson v. Ridge Manufacturing Co. Ltd. [1957] 2 QB 348 (personal liability); Chapman v. Oakleigh Animal Products Ltd (1970) 8 KIR 1063 (vicarious liability).) Once again, however, one can do little more than note the terms and underlying ideas; and then add that in practice one can always find examples where liability is imposed on the employer simply because the employment significantly enhanced the chance of the tort being committed. (Thus, see, BGH 4 November 1953, BGHZ 11, 151 where it was said that a theft committed by an employee working in a building site could render his employer liable.)

On the other hand, the employer’s liability may be engaged even if the act accomplished by his employee is not exactly the one he was entrusted to perform. For this to happen, however, it must fall within the range of measures which can be properly linked to the exercise of the entrusted functions (see BGHZ 49, 19, 23). Sometimes this idea is also expressed in causal language. This is so whenever the court speaks of an internal, direct connection between the function assigned to the servant and the activity that has caused the harm—(BGH NJW 1971, 31). In practice this means that if the servant’s act amounts to a bad way of performing the entrusted function (rather than doing something completely different), the master will—all other conditions being satisfied—be liable for the wrongful result. So, using a vehicle of the employer’s in a forbidden manner will not necessarily absolve the employer from all liability (see BGH VersR 1966, 1074; BGH NJW 1971, 31). On the other hand, if the servant gives a free ride to the injured plaintiff in the employer’s car, despite the latter’s express prohibition, then the employer may not be liable (BGH NJW 1965, 391). (Compare and contrast the following English cases: Limpus v. London General Omnibus Co. (1862) 1 H. & C. 526; 158 ER 998 and Conway v. George Wimpey & Co. Ltd. [1951] 2 KB 266. More recent pronouncements can be found in Rose v. Plenty [1976] 1 WLR 141.) The same is true of the so-called “deviation” cases where the servant while on duty deviates from the prescribed route or even goes off on a trip of his own and then causes damage. The answer here will largely depend on the extent of the deviation (see RG LZ 1930, 589).

The case law on this topic is, as one would expect, rich (see also RG DR 1942, 1280 and cf. OLG Munich MDR 1959, 391) and, it is submitted, not all decisions can be reconciled with one another. On the other hand, as already noted, this is something which should not cause too much consternation; and the Common lawyer will again realise that this is almost inevitable in this area of the law. (For a brief comparison with English (and Commonwealth) law see Fleming, Law of Torts, 9th (ed.) (1998), 420 et seq., Markesinis and Deakin, Tort Law 4th edn. (1999), chapter 6; for a summary of American law see Dobbs, The Law of Torts (2000), 910 et seq.)

(d) “Unlawful” damage

§ 831 BGB further requires that the damage caused by the servant be inflicted “unlawfully”. The element of unlawfulness and the element of culpa (fault, which is not mentioned in § 831 BGB) were discussed in chapter 2 under the heading of § 823 I BGB, but since they raise difficult problems in this context as well, they must be re-examined briefly.

It will be remembered that there exist two theories on the definition of “unlawfulness”. The traditional one looks at the result, and if this is an interference with one of the interests enumerated in § 823 I BGB, then the element of unlawfulness is satisfied. The more modern theory looks at the conduct and treats as unlawful only those interferences with the enumerated interests, which also amount to a breach of one of the duties of care. It will be remembered also that we stressed that, according to the traditional theory, the element of culpa—fault—is only considered after the element of unlawfulness is satisfied in accordance with the above. On the other hand, according to the new theory, unlawfulness and culpa tend to be merged into the same phase of the enquiry. Finally, it will be remembered that we said that save in some exceptional circumstances the two theories will, almost certainly, produce the same practical results.

§ 831 BGB is one of those exceptional circumstances where the two theories could produce different results. This is because, § 831 BGB, unlike § 823 I BGB, makes no mention of culpa—and, apparently, only requires an unlawful infliction of damage on the part of the servant. (Contrast on this point French and English law which require fault on the part of the employee.) If unlawful is taken to mean a simple interference (even if committed without fault) with one of the enumerated interests, then the master will be presumed liable unless he can then adduce his exculpatory proof in accordance with what we shall say below under (e). To put it differently, a logical application of the traditional theory on unlawfulness would require the plaintiff/victim merely to prove that he had been injured, even by a non-faulty act of the servant. Then, and only then, would the presumption of fault (of the master) under § 831 BGB come into play; and it would be for him to adduce the exculpatory proof envisaged by this provision.

The new theory on unlawfulness would look at things in a different way. An interference with one of the protected interests of the plaintiff is not, per se, unlawful; it will be so if, in addition, the servant does not attain the standard of care required in the circumstances. To put it differently, if the servant’s activity was in breach of one of the duties of care and also interfered with an enumerated interest, then and only then, would it be unlawful. Both these things are matters for the plaintiff/victim to prove and only if they are established will § 831 BGB be invoked and the defendant/master will have to produce the required exculpatory proof.

The different distribution of the burden of proof, resulting from the application of one or other of the theories of unlawfulness, could have important practical consequences. A servant/driver, for example, who through no fault of his own, injures the plaintiff because black ice forces his car into a skid, will have acted unlawfully if the traditional theory is applicable, but lawfully if the new theory is used to determine the nature of his conduct. Let us take another example from a case decided by the Bundesgerichtshof in 1954. The plaintiff was injured by a telephone post, which collapsed due to a heavy storm. The interference with the plaintiff's life and limb was clear, and according to the traditional view, the element of unlawfulness was satisfied. This means that § 831 BGB should have been applicable, and the defendant/Post Office (owner of the post that had collapsed) should have been called upon to adduce the exculpatory proof envisaged by § 831 BGB. The Bundesgerichtshof, however, felt that this stage had not been reached since the plaintiff had not shown that the accident was also due to a fault on the part of the team of employees responsible for the maintenance of the posts (BGH NJW 1954, 913). Unfortunately, the problem of who has to prove exactly what is not only linked with the view one takes on the notion of unlawfulness. In fact our last illustration reveals the kind of uncertainties and difficulties that persist in this field.

In a decision handed down in 1957, the Great Senate of the Federal Supreme Court had to deal with the following problem (For fuller details, see the judgment reproduced below, case 109, BGHZ 24, 21). The plaintiff was injured while getting into a tram due to the fact that the tram departed before the plaintiff had completed his entry. It could not be established whether the plaintiff's injury was caused because he tried to jump onto the tram after it had started moving, or whether the accident was the result of the conductor giving the departure signal prematurely. If the old theory of unlawfulness was applied, then the servants of the defendant (tram) company had acted unlawfully and the burden of producing the exculpatory proof of § 831 BGB would have shifted to the defendant company. If, on the other hand, the new theory applied, then the defendant would not have to be called to produce such evidence, since the plaintiff had not proved (nor, given the uncertainty we mentioned, could he prove) that the conductor had culpably and prematurely given the departure signal.

The Great Senate clearly opted for the new theory on unlawfulness and, as we have already noted, this has commended itself to most modern lawyers (but not to all lower courts). But when it came to applying it to the burden of proof it did not take the attitude that has been described above but chose, instead, a different manner of distributing the burden of proof. The injured party was thus merely obliged to prove an interference with one of his protected rights. It was then for the master to prove that the conduct of his servant was correct in the circumstances and thus not unlawful. If he did not do this (and, in the present case, given the uncertainty as to what had happened, he could not), then he would have to rebut the presumption of his own fault in accordance with § 831 BGB.

The convoluted reasoning as well as the result has not been welcomed (except for the part of the judgment that sanctioned the new theory of unlawfulness). The reason is clear. As Professor Kötz has remarked (Deliktsrecht, no. 281), "this decision has the absurd consequence that where the facts of the accident are not clear, the injured party will be in a more favourable position if his injuries have been caused by the servant, and not the master himself". For if a pedestrian is run down by a van belonging to a pharmacist and it is not clear whether the accident could be attributed to the driver, the condition of the van, or the pedestrian himself, then the pedestrian's claim may be rejected. This will be the case if the pharmacist (master) was at the wheel, himself, (since the action would then be based on § 823 I BGB) and the plaintiff would have to prove the defendant's fault. (Incidentally, for the reasons we shall give below, section A.5 (iii), the Road Traffic Act 1952 might also not be applicable in this case.) If, on the other hand, the van was being driven by the pharmacist's servant, then the victim would (by invoking § 831 BGB) be able to see his claim succeed unless the pharmacist could produce the exculpatory proof provided by this paragraph.

(e) The master's exculpatory proof

If all the above-mentioned conditions are satisfied, the defendant/master will be presumed at fault and will be made liable unless he shows one of two things. Thus, he must show that he was careful in the selection, instruction, and training of his servants and that he properly supplied them with the right kind of equipment. Alternatively he must show that the damage or injury would have occurred even if he (the master) had fulfilled the above-mentioned duties. Paragraph 831 BGB thus establishes a simple presumption of responsibility. (Widerlegliche Vermutung)

Producing evidence that the servant was properly selected, instructed, and supervised has become an increasingly heavy burden for employers—especially in those cases where the accident is caused in the context of carriage of passengers by buses, trains, trams, and the like. Here, as the cases reproduced below (cases 105 and 106) show, the degree of supervision required is very high and can include such things as random checks and regular warning notices. (See, for instance, BGH VersR 1966, 364; BGH VersR 1969, 518; KG NJW 1966, 2365. More recently, BGH VersR 1984, 67, contains a good description of the master's duties to select and supervise his employees carefully). When such accidents occur, and the action proceeds on § 831 BGB, the attention of the court is thus switched away from the details surrounding the accident, which the victim could conceivably discover or reconstruct. Instead, it becomes focused on the kind of internal supervision system that the defendant/master had devised in order to avoid or minimise the chance of the accident. In these cases, however, the plaintiff/victim has little knowledge of what has gone wrong. So, often, rather than be faced with such uncertainties and the cost of prolonged litigation, he will settle for the lesser sums provided by the strict liability Acts such as the Road Traffic Act or the Strict Liability Act (discussed below, section A.4 (iii)).

Where large organisations are concerned, proof that every employee has been carefully selected or supervised is, of course, impossible. So the practice developed in Germany of allowing the master to show that "leading employees", who stand in a hierarchically intermediate position (for example a foreman who had chosen and was supervising the "guilty" servant), had been properly chosen and supervised. This system of "decentralised exoneration" (dezentralisierter Entlastungsbeweis), which substitutes the intermediary employee for the "real" master and makes the former liable instead of the latter, is undesirable both economically and in terms of labour-management relations. Not surprisingly, it has thus not been followed by other systems such as the Swiss which, in this area of tort law, has otherwise closely followed the German model. (Oftinger, Schweizerisches Haftpflichtrecht II, I (2nd edn. 1960) 139, 159). But German lawyers, as well, came to realise the unfortunate nature of this rule, and the Supreme Court itself discovered a way to neutralise it by finding fault in the real master for the way he has organised his business and thus made the accident possible. This creation of the Organisationspflicht, allowed the German courts to fall back on § 823 I BGB and, in this way, provided a way of bypassing the unfortunate § 831 BGB. (See BGHZ 4, 1, 2 below, case 107. See also BGH VersR 1964, 297 and BGH NJW 1980, 2810.)

(f) Methods developed in order to avoid the effect of § 831 BGB

It will have been noticed that despite the fact that the German courts impose strict requirements for the exoneration of masters, the possibility of such proof being adduced is always there with the result that the victim can then only sue the usually penniless employee. This result is not only incompatible with the rationale of true vicarious liability; it is also economically unsound given the employer's greater ability to insure and to spread the cost with a minimum of social dislocation. For some time now the courts have therefore been eager to discover ways to bypass § 831 BGB and four of them will be discussed here.

The first device that neutralises the exculpatory proof available to the master under § 831 BGB originates in labour law. If in the course of his employment an employee negligently causes loss to a third party he acquires, under certain circumstances, a right to an indemnity against his employer in respect of any claim which the victim may have against him, personally. So, in these cases the "innocent master" will shoulder the consequences of the employee's negligence even though his careful selection and supervision of the employee should have, normally, exonerated him (the master) from all liability. The conditions under which the liability is transferred (back) to the employer are examined below in section 3(a). So here suffice to say that once it is established that the conduct of the tortfeasor is sufficiently linked to his employment the courts will be likely to grant the employee the right to an indemnity from his employer. (This is the reverse of a situation better known to the Common law (but also known to German law) and involving the master seeking contribution or a full indemnity from the employee for having been held liable towards a third party because of his employee's fault. In English law this is, nowadays, covered by the so-called "gentlemen's agreement" of 1959 by which employers' insurers waived their entitlement to exercise subrogation rights against the "guilty" employee. It is discussed in (1959) 22 MLR 652 and in Morris v. Ford Motor Co [1973] 1 QB 792. For Australia, see Insurance Contracts Act 1984, section 66; Employees Liability Act 1991 (NSW), section 3 (2).)

The second is particularly applicable to legal entities of a private (§ 31 BGB) or a public law (§ 89 BGB) character. (BGH NJW 1985, 1838.) The legal entity's liability for the torts committed by its organs, i.e. members of its board, or other "duly appointed representatives", is absolute without any possibility of exoneration so long as the tort was committed by the representative in the "carrying out of his duties". The potential sphere of application of this provision was, initially, rather limited, but in more recent times it has been expanded considerably, especially by giving a very wide meaning to the phrase "duly appointed representative". Consequently, the original requirement that this liability be applied only for the acts of organs who had a legal power to represent the legal entity in legal transactions was abandoned in favour of a wider definition. (See RG, 25 Oct. 1943, DR 1944, 287; BGHZ 49, 19, 21 reprinted as case 96, below.) Representatives who have the right to make independent decisions in their own sphere of work, subject only to general instructions, will thus be included in the definition. This will be so even though they may not have the wider power of legal representation and their powers are not specifically defined in the articles of association. And the legal entity may also be liable for the torts of persons who have been authorised to act for it ad hoc in lieu of the person who should have acted in accordance with its articles (RGZ 157, 228, 235 ff.). Liability of the entity for its own defective organisation, in accordance with what is said in the next paragraph, may also be invoked.

The third way round § 831 BGB is by discovering a “defect in the structure of the enterprise” for which the master/entity is made liable. We are here talking of liability under § 823 I BGB and no longer of liability under § 831 BGB. Two cases reproduced below (99 and 100) show how effective is this method of bypassing § 831 BGB.

In the first case (BGH NJW 1956, 1106; case 99) the plaintiff was hurt while in the defendant’s hospital as a result of risks inherent in the treatment he was receiving but of which he had not been adequately warned. The defendant/hospital was successful in adducing the exculpatory proof required by § 831 BGB but was found liable under § 823 I BGB for its own culpable failure to guide its doctors as to how they should discharge their duties to warn and explain matters to patients. Similarly, in the second case (BGH NJW 1971, 1313; case 100) the defendant’s employees carelessly damaged an underground gas-pipe which caused an explosion which led to the destruction of the plaintiff’s house. The track record of the employees was perfect and the defendant was able to adduce the exculpatory proof imposed upon him by § 831 BGB. The Supreme Court, however, was not interested in this line of reasoning and chose to hold the defendant liable for his own fault.

It should be noted that though the grounds of liability are distinct, there is no reason why in practice the result could not be based on both. A decision of the Supreme Court in 1955 (BGHZ 17, 214) illustrates this. In that case, the Federal Railways used wagons to transport animal foodstuffs. The wagons had not been properly cleaned and the foodstuffs were contaminated, thereby causing serious damage to the plaintiff’s cows. Both the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court had no difficulty in holding the defendant railway company liable on both grounds, i.e. liable for not properly inspecting their employees (§ 831 BGB) and for their own failure to adopt a safe system of work (i.e. liability under § 823 I BGB). The importance of this type of liability for defective organisation of an enterprise cannot be overstated since out of it grew the modern approach to product liability under the heading of Produzentenhaftung long before strict liability was imposed on manufacturers (and others) under the ProdHaftG. (See Brüggemeier Prinzipien des Haftungsrechts (1999) pp. 116 ff.)

The advantage of the heading “defective organisation of the enterprise” meant that liability could be based on the master’s fault (for failing to organise his business properly) independently from his servant’s negligence. It was a small step from there to hold the master liable by simply reversing the burden of proof for a deficient organisation of the production process where the injury was caused by a defective product. This heading of liability for faulty organisation of an enterprise emerged as a way of by-passing § 831 BGB. Having achieved this, it was then transplanted to liability for defective products. (This occurred in the famous chicken pest case in 1968, BGHZ 51, 91, reproduced above, as case 61). Shifting the burden of proof was prompted by the kind of considerations that also underlie the presumption of fault of § 831 BGB. For it will be difficult if not impossible for the victim to prove that the organisation of the manufacturing process was defective and ascertain the cause of the product’s defect. As the BGH remarked in the “chicken pest” case the manufacturer “surveys the field of production, determines and organises the manufacturing process and the control of delivering the finished products.” As a consequence, the manufacturer needs to furnish the proof of exoneration. As in the instances of organisational fault outside the field of product liability, the courts allow the “master” to rely on a system of decentralised exoneration alluded to in the previous section.

2. THE ESCAPE INTO CONTRACT: § 278 BGB

The fourth way of evading § 831 BGB is for comparative law purposes the most intriguing. In one sentence, it meant invoking the adaptable law of contract in order to remedy the deficiencies of the law of tort. This, of course, is not the first time a civil law system has had to turn to its law of contract in order to remedy the shortcomings of its law of tort. For example, we have already noted how the non-recognition of purely economic loss as a compensable type of harm under § 823 I BGB forced German (and French) lawyers to “discover” contracts in the negligent misstatement cases which, in the Common law system, are resolved through the law of tort. The converse was true of the Common law systems: the doctrine of consideration—especially where it was taken rather seriously (e.g. in English Common law)—meant that contracts could not be discovered where the plaintiff had not “paid” for the information he received. The law of product liability is another example, for in this area as well, civil law has shown a tendency to extend the law of contract to do the work of the law of tort. We have noted (above, chapter 2, section A.4 (c)) how German law has moved away from this position. (Cf. French law where the ultimate purchaser’s rights in product liability cases are still in many instances viewed as an extension of the rights conferred by the law of sale to the immediate purchaser (Articles 1641 ff. French CC) though, in recent times, tort law has reasserted its position.) The problems posed by § 831 BGB provided the third, though by no means least, important impetus to side-step tort law and have recourse to contract; § 278 provided the much-needed escape provision.

§ 278 BGB states that a “debtor”—which in the instances that concern us means the employer—“is responsible for the fault of his statutory agent and of persons whom he employs in fulfilling his obligation, to the same extent as for his own fault”. It thus imposes upon the debtor “strict” liability for faults of the persons he uses in the course of fulfilling his contractual obligations. The possibility of exoneration, which can be found in § 831 BGB, is absent in this case. Moreover, the terms used in § 278 BGB suggest that the debtor’s liability may cover the faults of persons whom he uses in the performance of these obligations, but who may not, strictly speaking, be “servants” (in the sense of § 831 BGB). Both these points, and especially the first, make the plaintiff’s position more advantageous than it might otherwise be if his action were based on § 831 BGB. There are other advantages for the plaintiff who can shift in this way the basis of his claim from tort to contract. It will suffice to mention three. First, pure economic loss is more easily recoverable in a contract action. Secondly, the contractual period of limitation used to be longer, though not always (see BGHZ 61, 227 and § 558 BGB). (For the recent reform see H P Mamsel, NJW 2002, 89.) Finally, the burden of proof may be more favourable for the plaintiff if the action is based on § 278 BGB (see § 282 BGB and BGHZ 66, 51; BGH NJW 1976, 712, case 90, now § 280 I 2 BGB). But these advantages for the plaintiff are also bought at a price: § 278 BGB will only apply in the fulfilment of a contractual obligation; and the range of remedies it may offer the victim/plaintiff may be more restricted than it would be if the action were based on tort. These two points require further elaboration.

Since § 278 BGB requires a contract (or, more precisely, a Schuldverhältnis = a relationship creating obligations), in order to come into force, the courts set about discovering such contracts where none would be immediately obvious to a Common lawyer. This meant extending the contract to the pre-contractual phase and also extending its scope to include persons other than the immediate contracting parties. Eleven cases dealing with these types of situations are reproduced below (section B.2) so here we shall limit our remarks to a few general points.

The famous linoleum case (RGZ 78, 239, case 111) marks historically the first attempt to extend contractual remedies to the pre-contractual phase of negotiations through the concept of culpa in contrahendo. This doctrine was developed by the famous German jurist Rudolf von Jhering. (Culpa in contrahendo, Schadenersatz bei nichtigen oder nicht zur Perfektion gelangten Verträgen, in Jahrbuecher für die Dogmatik des heutigen römischen und deutschen Privatrechts (1861).) (See now § 311 II BGB.) It was extended from certain contractual situations to cases, such as the one before the Reichsgericht in 1911, which were essentially delictual in nature. In that case, the prospective purchaser entered the store, asked to inspect some carpets and, while doing so, was injured by two rolls, which fell from the shelf. The court took the view that the demand to see the carpets and the fulfilment of this demand resulted in a relationship preliminary to the sale and similar to a contract and imposed duties of care with respect to the person and property of the parties. The wording of this judgment makes frequent references to the “prospective purchaser” and, therefore, makes it clear that this extension of the “contract” to the pre-contractual phase will not be attempted in all instances. The demarcation line is left for future courts to draw. (See also case 112.) Probably, the same contractual protection will be extended to cover not only the prospective purchaser who, for example, is queuing to pay for the goods he has already selected, but also the “potential purchaser” who enters the shop “to look around” but with as yet no fixed intention to purchase anything in particular. The shoplifter, on the other hand, who slips on spilt yoghurt, will not be protected in this way (BGH NJW 1976, 712 obiter). In between these “extremes”, one can envisage other possibilities, for example the citizen who seeks refuge in the store during a heavy storm. The solution and the casuistic approach of the German courts should neither surprise nor disturb the Common lawyer. Given the greater willingness to discover “duties of care” these days, the answer to our hypothetical problem should be sought in the law of delict and not the law of contract. And the disadvantage that this might create for the plaintiff—the return to § 831 BGB—could be avoided by arguing that the store’s potential liability should be justified by reference to § 823 I BGB. In other words, it should be based on the shop keeper’s own fault in the running of his business.

The expansion of the contract to the pre-contractual phase was not enough; the protective sphere of the contract had also to be expanded to cover persons other than the immediate contracting parties. In BGH NJW 1976, 712 (case 112) the person injured was not the prospective purchaser but her young daughter who was accompanying her in order to help her with her shopping. In the court’s view, good faith required that the child should be included in the protective sphere of the contract (which was about to be concluded); indeed, the court felt that even mere “bystanders, who do not themselves participate in a contract”, should be included under the contract’s protective umbrella. This, of course, is precisely the kind of situation, which could not receive a satisfactory solution through the medium of § 831 BGB. It thus forced the German courts to develop, under juristic guidance, the concept of contract with protective effects towards third parties, which was briefly described in chapter 2.2 (d) (iii) above. But resorting to § 278 BGB provided a partial answer at best. For the drawback of § 278 BGB lies precisely in the fact that the nature of the liability established by this provision is contractual. This means that the plaintiff’s damages in these cases will be limited to his economic loss alone. To put it differently, because of § 253 BGB, the plaintiff who is basing his claim on § 278 BGB will not be allowed to claim damages for pain and suffering. If, on the other hand, the liability could be based on tort (in case a right listed in § 847 BGB has been infringed), then such damages could be claimed (§ 847 BGB establishing a specific exception to § 253 BGB). A decision of the Supreme Court in 1957 brings this point out very clearly (BGHZ 1, 383, case 120; see, also, RGZ 112, 290, case 121, below). In that case the plaintiff was referred to the defendant hospital as an outpatient for a minor ailment in his foot. The second defendant—who was the hospital’s chief doctor—administered a mild anaesthetic before attending to the patient’s foot but failed to make the plaintiff lie down properly on a couch and instead made him sit temporarily on a narrow kind of settee used for gynaecological examinations. As a result of the injection of the anaesthetic, the plaintiff temporarily lost consciousness and fell off the settee and severely injured his cervical column. He claimed his economic loss and compensation for pain and suffering from both defendants and the Court of Appeal granted him both these claims. The Supreme Court adopted a more nuanced approach. The contract of hospital treatment was between the hospital/first defendants and the plaintiff’s union, who had referred him to the hospital. Yet this was a contract in favour of third parties—with protective effects vis-à-vis third parties we would say today—and thus the hospital was liable to the plaintiff for the doctor’s careless behaviour under § 278 BGB. This action could cover the plaintiff’s economic loss but not—because of § 253 BGB—his claim for pain and suffering. But the plaintiff had a further cause of action against the second defendant—the doctor—and since this was delictual in nature, based on § 823 I BGB, it could justify, under § 847 BGB, a claim against the doctor (but not the hospital) for compensation for pain and suffering. Before we conclude it may be worth pausing for a moment to consider a possible consequence of the recent reform proposals. If damages for “pain and suffering” become available in contractual actions, it may well be that plaintiffs in cases such as the ones we have been discussing above will have even less of an incentive to base their case on § 823 I BGB. For the contract route, with its more favourable § 278 BGB, will then provide a means of obtaining full compensation, including damages for non-material harm.

3. LIABILITY REGIMES IN LABOUR LAW

Suggested reading

The reader will have a better appreciation of the debate sketched in the next few paragraphs if he consults some of the following works. Blomeyer, “Beschränkung der Arbeitnehmerhaftung bei nicht gefahrgeneigter Arbeit”, JuS 1993, 903; Brox and Walker, “Die Einschränkung der Arbeitnehmerhaftung gegenüber dem Arbeitgeber”, DB 1985, 1469; Denck, “Zur betrieblichen Tätigkeit als Voraussetzung für die privilegierte Arbeitnehmerhaftung”, DB 1986, 590; Dütz, “Gefahrgeneigte Arbeit”, NJW 1986, 1779; Pfeifer, “Neueste Entwicklungen zu Fragen der Arbeitnehmerhaftung im Betrieb”, ZfA 1996, 69; Richardi, “Abschied von der gefahrgeneigten Arbeit”, NZA 1994, 241; Schnauder, “Die Grundsätze der gefahrgeneigten Arbeit”, JuS 1995, 594; Seewald, “Gefahrgeneigte Arbeit bei allen Tätigkeiten des Arbeitslebens?” DB 1986, 1224.

Making the employer of the tortfeasor liable for the damage the latter has caused may provide compensation for the victim and, in that sense, largely fulfil the function of tort law as a system of compensation for accidents. Yet achieving this result will not mark the end of the problems that have to be faced by the law. Thus, further issues have to be resolved which are of interest to tort law and insurance law (should insurers have such subrogation actions? Is this not tantamount to their having their cake (i.e. collecting premiums) and eating it (i.e. being given subrogation claims) unless, perhaps, someone can prove that by having such rights and exercising them they can (and do) keep premiums at lower levels?). But even more questions have to be answered. Should the actual wrongdoer—the employee—go scot-free because policy considerations related to the smooth functioning of labour relations demand this? Will such a solution lead to more accidents by making employees less careful? Is it economically advisable to place part of the risk on a worker who might be without personal insurance? These concerns of different parts of private law come together when one sees these cases in the context of increased industrial accidents, modern insurance practices, collective labour agreements, and an ever-increasing volume of litigation with the delays this phenomenon brings in its wake. Little wonder then that this problem of the employee's liability towards his employer has given rise to considerable debate but little agreement in Germany. The revirement of the case law of the Bundesarbeitsgericht must be seen in this light. But its understanding will be made easier if we explain first the kind of factual configurations in which these problems arise. They can, in fact, be three.

The first will be easily recognisable to English lawyers. The employer is held liable (either under Common law principles of vicarious liability or under § 831 BGB) for the harm caused to a third party by his employee and then seeks a contribution or an indemnity from the latter.

The second variant, mentioned earlier on, is more Germanic in its nature and stems from the possibility that is open to the employer to avoid liability by invoking the exculpatory proof contained in § 831 BGB (careful selection/supervision of employee.) In this case, the employer may not be liable. But if the employee is sued by the victim and is made liable to him can he—the employee—then seek an indemnity from the employer? As stated, German labour law allows this to happen and, as a result, § 831 BGB is, in practice, circumvented.

The final and in practice most important variant is where the employee negligently causes harm to his employer and, as a consequence is sued by the latter. For instance, the defendant/employee drives mini cabs owned by the plaintiff/employer. Because of the negligence of the defendant, a collision takes place with a third party in which the plaintiff's car is also damaged. Can the plaintiff/employer seek damages from his employee/defendant? (See BAG NJW 1988, 2816. Currently, the governing decision can be found in case 110.) From the discussion that will follow it will be noticed that German law treats—with some measure of justification—all these three variants in the same manner for, in substance, in all three it sets out to alleviate the employees' personal liability. The real question, thus, was how extensive should this "immunity" be? Moreover, a workable method had to be discovered that would distinguish those cases where the employee was liable to pay a contribution or a full indemnity from those where his potential liability could be engaged.

Since the decision of the Great Senate of 25 September 1957 the BAG limited the employee's liability towards his employer where the activity carried out was not "danger-prone". Moreover, liability would follow provided further conditions were satisfied. Notably, it had to be shown that the employee had acted with "gross" negligence. (BAGE 5, 1. The first decision where the criterion of dangerous work was utilised to restrict a worker's liability was ArbG Plauen ARS 29, 62 from 1936).

The partial or total immunity granted to the employee was and still is difficult to reconcile with general principle. More precisely, the fundamental assumption of the rules on reparation and compensation (§§ 249 ff. BGB) is that if the conditions of liability are met (in particular if the tortfeasor is shown to have acted negligently) he will be held liable for all the loss caused by the wrong. The only express exception to this doctrine is found in § 254 BGB: contributory negligence. However, in the line of cases examined here it is not contended that the employer contributed negligently to the loss of the third party. The damage is caused exclusively by the fault of the employee. Hence, in 1957 the BAG had to assert that there was in fact a “concealed” gap in the Code and that it was entitled to modify the rules applicable to the special relationship arising by reason of a labour contract (§ 611 BGB).

The reason why German law (especially the BAG) has come to regard the employee’s full and unconditional liability as being contrary to equity (Billigkeit) is this. The employee acts at the instance and in the interest of the employer. The latter determines the production process or more generally how the company is organised. The employee’s pursuit of his job is directed by his integration into the business organisation and the actual conditions of the work process. The employee cannot influence the risk inherent to the activity assigned to him by the employer, and he cannot avoid these pre-determined conditions of work either factually or legally. Nor will his wages normally reflect or cover the risk if anything goes wrong. So, although the employee is under the general legal obligation of neminem laedere, German courts have argued, it is justified to limit his liability in specific circumstances.

However, as already suggested, this alleviation of the employee’s liability depended—until recently—on whether the employee could establish that his activity was “danger-prone”. This requirement was meant to “preserve” an area where the employee could be held accountable. But the criteria for this category became increasingly open-ended once the BAG no longer applied them in an abstract and typified way but took account of the specific circumstance of the individual case. Thus, in one case—case 110—the BAG did not regard the activity of supervising the driver of a bulldozer as dangerous, even though the activity of the driver of the machine was undoubtedly so. (Paradoxically, an earlier decision had treated such supervisory work as inherently dangerous. BAG AP § 611 Haftung des Arbeitnehmers Nr. 80. That (earlier) case was distinguished on the basis that the construction site involved was large and more difficult to organise than the present.) The unworkable nature of the criterion of “danger-prone activity” was also revealed by the tragic case of BAG NZA 1986, 91. There, an experienced nurse accidentally dropped a baby twelve days old. As a result of the fall, the baby suffered a skull fracture. In earlier proceedings the child had sued the nurse and her employer and had been held entitled to recover all losses resulting from the accident. In the case at hand, the nurse sought an indemnity from her employer in respect of the child’s claims. The BAG came to the conclusion that in the circumstances the activity of taking a baby out of its bed was not “danger-prone”. The consequence of such a determination would have been that the nurse would shoulder full responsibility—a result which was widely considered as unacceptable. (The case settled so we do not know what happened in the end.) In its decision of 12 June 1992, BAGE 70, 337 (case 110) the Great Senate of the BAG responded to this wide-spread criticism and decided that the time had come to abandon altogether the criterion of “danger-prone” activity. Since the BGH (in NZA 1994, 270) agreed as to the result, it was not—in the end—necessary for the Common Great Senate of the Supreme Courts to decide the issue. The case thus reproduced in the book reflects the current state of the law.

The criterion that replaces that of the dangerous character of the activity carried out by the employee is that of an intrinsic link between the activity and the duties assigned to the employee. From a methodological point of view it is interesting to note that the BAG felt the need to assert once again its powers to change and develop the law in this area. The irony is that in its latest judgment the BAG was departing from its own jurisprudence and not the rules of the BGB. This is somewhat concealed behind general observations on the role of the judiciary.

Though by its decision the BAG, essentially widened the scope of the employee's immunity, the other conditions of liability remained untouched. This should not, however be taken to indicate that the remaining conditions of liability have not generated their own problems. Evidence of this is provided by the tergiversations of the BAG. The pedigree of the present rules is reflected in the different editions of this book (thus see the decision on page 572 of the second edition which was overruled by the decision on page 762 of the third edition (annotated at pp. 690–692). The first of these decisions (7th Senate, NZA 1984, 83) confined the employee's liability to gross negligence and intentional conduct. The second (8th Senate, NZA 1988, 579) restored orthodoxy and re-established the old threefold approach which hinges on the degree of fault of the employee. (The different forms of negligence are discussed in chapter 2, section 3(b).) The current position of the BAG, found in case 110, confirms the threefold approach.

In the case of gross negligence, the employee must, as a rule, bear the total loss alone. At the other end of the spectrum, in the case of the slightest negligence, he is not liable at all. For normal negligence, the loss is, as a rule, to be divided between the employer and the employee proportionately. In such cases, all the circumstances regarding the causing of the harm and its consequences are to be balanced against each other in a reasonable way and in accordance with the principles of fairness. In weighing up the circumstances of the individual case the following factors can, according to the Great Senate of the BAG, be taken into account. The danger involved in the activity. Whether the risk in question can be taken into account by the employer and covered by insurance. The position of the employee in the business is also important. As are the level of salary (i.e. whether the employee is paid a risk premium) and the personal circumstances of the employee. For instance, how long has he has been part of the business; his age; his family circumstances, as well as the employee's conduct so far under his contract of employment. From these the insurability of the risk by the employer is certainly the most difficult to determine in practice (see Tschöpe and Henninge MDR 1995, 135, 137). In the case of gross negligence it will be decisive whether the remuneration of the employee is out of proportion to the risk of damages that has materialized as a result of the grossly negligent conduct. In BAGE 90, 148 for instance a lorry driver caused an accident because he had ran a red light. His attention was distracted as he was speaking on the mobile phone installed in the cabin. The lorry was damaged and the court found that he had been grossly negligent. The court held him liable to the full extent of the loss because the loss was not out of proportion to his wage (it was less than the sum of three monthly gross wages, which amount is taken as a first indication).

Two further comments are desirable.

First, the theoretical basis of the limitations of the employee's liability towards the employer is now explained by reference to § 254 BGB (which is in fact applied by analogy only given that the employer is not "negligent"). The true basis for the exception can thus be found in the policy considerations outlined in the introductory comments of this section. It is thus quite puzzling that in its most recent pronouncement the BAG sought to justify the exception also by reference to the indirect (horizontal) effect (mittelbare Drittwirkung) of Article 2 I GG (personality rights) and Article 12 I GG (free exercise of the employee's vocation). To the extent that this construction is convincing, it can be seen as providing yet another illustration of the constitutionalisation of private law mentioned in the first chapter of this book. Yet this construction may not be without its flaws. For, while the radiating effect of these provisions of the Constitution into labour law is generally accepted, the consequences drawn by the BAG in applying these provisions to the case in point appear questionable. It suffices here to draw the reader's attention to the following argument.

The BAG stated that unlimited liability for all negligently caused harm should not be imposed for otherwise the employee would be burdened with the risk of unreasonable financial burdens and in particular the danger to his economic existence. This would represent a disproportionate infringement of the above-mentioned constitutional rights. However, if the employee is to be protected from the danger to his economic existence, then liability ought to be restricted irrespective of the employee's fault to the extent that this danger is imminent. This would be at least the natural consequence of this particular approach. But the BAG does not consider these potentially far-reaching implications of its stance. (The BAG's derivation of the liability regime from the danger to the employee's economic existence was expressly rejected by the BGH in NZA 1994, 270; see also Blomeyer op. cit. 906; Richardi op. cit. 244; Schnauder op. cit. 597.)

Secondly, the brief discussion of the German agonising over this issue also reveals German law to be true to reputed form: theoretical, un-necessarily nuanced, and, in its most recent pronouncements, of dubious wisdom in its attempt to make a difficult subject even more difficult by discovering in it a constitutional dimension. To these doctrinal objections we add one last thought. The obvious favouring of the helpless employee may have much to support it. But it has still to be demonstrated how much it has added to the production costs of German industry thereby making it internationally less competitive. This is clearly a political and economic issue; yet it is raised here to demonstrate how legal rules, supportable by reasons of fairness or equity may also have political dimensions.

4. OTHER INSTANCES OF PRESUMED FAULT OR STRICT LIABILITY IN THE CIVIL CODE

The Code provides for the reversal of the onus of proof in three more situations; § 832; §§ 833–4, and §§ 836–8 BGB. § 829 BGB imposes an "equitable" obligation to pay compensation independent of culpability.

(i) § 832 BGB makes those who are under a duty to supervise (Aufsichtspflichtige) other persons (minors, mentally or physically incapacitated adults, etc.) liable for the damage caused by these persons to third parties or to their property. The obligation to supervise may stem from the law (kraft Gesetzes). Persons under such duties include the parents of a child (§ 1626 I; § 1631 I BGB) and the legal guardian (§§ 1793, 1800 BGB). Alternatively, the obligation to supervise may derive from contract (kraft Vertrages). This category usually includes those in charge of kindergartens, boarding schools (but not State schools, which are liable, if at all under § 839 BGB: BGHZ 13, 27), holiday camps, orphanages, private nursing-homes, and the like. (For doctors and nurses in psychiatric hospitals see: BGH NJW 1984, 2574; BGH 19 January 1984, NJW 1985, 677). In yet other instances, difficult demarcation problems may arise (e.g. a grandparent or a neighbour looking after a child: is this always a purely factual situation or can it amount to a legal relationship bringing into operation § 832 BGB?) As for those doing an “apprenticeship”, the courts seem to distinguish between apprentices who are lodged with their masters and those who are not. In the first case, the master may be liable for all harm caused by his apprentice, while in the second the master’s liability may be engaged only if the harm occurred during working hours. (BGH 24 June 1958, VersR 1958, 549.) (On all these points see Larenz/ Canaris, II 2, § 79 IV, p. 485–7 with references. For further details on § 832 see: Albilt, Haften Eltern für ihre Kinder? (1987); Rauscher, “Haftung der Eltern für ihre Kinder”, JuS 1985, 757; M. J. Schmid, “Die Aufsichtspflicht nach § 832 BGB”, VersR 1982, 822.)

The liability of the supervisor arises the moment the “tortfeasor” has realised the objective conditions of a particular rule of liability. If such an unlawful infliction of loss has occurred, the supervisor will be presumed to have culpably failed to discharge his own duty to supervise. He will then be liable to the victim, either solely or jointly with the “tortfeasor” depending on whether the latter is capable of some fault (§§ 827–8 BGB). The supervisor’s liability will be avoided only if he proves that he had exercised the requisite standard of care or if he can show that the harm would have occurred in any event.

The requisite standard of care in supervision obviously varies from case to case, the Reichsgericht having stated that it will depend on “the age, disposition, characteristics, development, education, and all other individual features of the minor” (RGZ 52, 73). A “difficult” child will, thus, have to be kept under closer control (BGH 10 July 1984, NJW 1984, 2574). The vagueness and flexibility of such phrases is deliberate but it should not conceal a discernible trend in recent cases to raise the standard of care expected of modern parents. Courts have taken a stern view in cases of damage caused by children playing with matches. (See: BGH 17 May 1983, NJW 1983, 2821; OLG Karlsruhe VersR 1985, 599); in BGH VersR 1983, 734 the court held liable the parents of a seven-year-old child which started a fire having got hold of an easily accessible box of matches. (See, also, BGH 2 May, NJW 1990, 2553.) But no “supervision” duty was imposed on the parents of a fifteen-year-old boy playing football (OLG Stuttgart NJW 1982, 2608); and the courts demonstrate their reluctance to impose such duties as children approach majority and their supervision is accepted as being difficult if not impossible. (BGH 26 November 1979, NJW 1980, 1044.)

If the supervisor succeeds in exculpating himself, and the “tortfeasor” is incapable of all fault according to §§ 827, 828 BGB (and, therefore, not personally liable), the innocent victim might run the risk of being left without any compensation. This, in fact, was the solution adopted by French law until the Court of Cassation changed its case law in 1964 (Cass civ. 2ème 18 déc. 1964, D. 1965, J. 191). The German legislator, however, foresaw this eventuality and included a provision in the Code—§ 829 BGB. This enables the judge to take into account the financial position of the parties (including the insurance situation) and to oblige the innocent tortfeasor to pay the equally innocent victim/plaintiff such compensation as equity demands. The factors that are to be taken into account in establishing that the minor is under an equitable obligation to pay compensation are the seriousness of the injury; how close the culpability of the minor was in relation to the threshold of § 828 BGB; and, crucially, the economic situation of the defendant. Two things should be noted in this context.

(ii) § 829 BGB can apply also in the reverse situation where the minor is the victim and where he is not culpable, i.e. contributory “negligent”, under § 828 BGB. More important is the second observation. Although this section is often referred to as the “millionaire provision” the minor, himself, need not be wealthy. The question is whether his liability insurance is a factor that can found his liability under § 829 BGB. The role of insurance in the context of § 829 BGB was considered and in principle accepted by the Federal Court in a number of decisions, BGHZ 76, 279; BGH NJW 1958, 1630; BGH NJW 1962, 2201 but never relied on to establish liability. The most recent pronouncement of the BGH in this area, BGH NJW 1995, 452, (reproduced below, case 144) has clarified a number of controversial points and in particular states that liability can flow from the fact that the defendant was insured. There is, however, an important theoretical problem in imposing liability based on the fact that the defendant was insured.

The so-called Trennungsprinzip is a fundamental principle of tort law. Indemnity insurance follows liability but liability cannot flow from the fact that the tortfeasor is insured. Therefore, deriving the minor’s liability from his insurance amounts to an exception to this principle. The BGH acknowledged this in the recent decision. However, in its view the imposition of liability could be nevertheless justified by a number of considerations. Thus, first, the exception to the principle is confined to mandatory insurance as in the case of traffic accidents. It is noteworthy that the BGH stated that in this field the function of mandatory insurance has undergone a change, now serving mainly to protect the interest of the victim. (Sceptical, Kötz and Wagner, Deliktsrecht, no. 328.) Secondly, the insurance factor must not be the only one that points to liability. The situation must be such that in the particular circumstances it would be wholly unsatisfactory not to hold the minor liable. This means thirdly that to the extent that the victim can recover damages on the basis of strict liability imposed by the traffic statute (§ 7 Road Traffic Act—StVG, as to which see below), the victim cannot rely on § 829 BGB. In the present case the defendant was epileptic (which excluded in the circumstances his liability under § 823 BGB according to § 827 BGB but not his liability under the Road Traffic Act). Hence, § 829 BGB will be relevant mainly in relation to damages for pain and suffering (§ 847 BGB) and in cases where the defendant is not liable under the Road Traffic Act (this concerns minors). (See for the interrelations between §§ 829, 847 BGB also below, chapter 3, section 3(c). According to recent reform proposals (discussed below, chapter 4 section A 2(c)), the culpability of minors for traffic accidents (crucial in relation to § 823 I BGB) is relaxed (starting at the age of ten compared to seven at present), which would suggest that § 829 BGB becomes even more important.)

(iii) §§ 836–8 BGB impose a similar (compared to § 832 BGB) presumption of fault in the context of damage or personal injury caused by collapsing buildings, or man-made structures (e.g. walls, fences, flag-poles etc.) (See, BGH WM 1990, 1878.) Responsibility here is placed on a number of persons meticulously defined in §§ 836–7 BGB. Thus, while the person usually liable will be the owner, liability may also be imposed on a mere possessor (§ 836 I and III BGB), a former possessor (§ 836 II BGB), or even a builder or constructor (§ 837 BGB). At Common law some of the above would, for certain purposes, probably be treated as the occupier of the premises and be made liable accordingly.

These provisions, which derive in part from Roman law and can also be found in a less elaborate form in civil codes such as the French, do not impose risk-based liability. In reality, they widen the area of liability for unlawful omissions which is further intensified by a presumption of fault. Thus, the possessor will be held responsible for personal injury and/or property damage suffered by a third party as a result of the collapse of a building on his land. Such liability, however, will be avoided if the possessor proves that he took all necessary steps to avert the danger. Where a former possessor is being sued, he must prove that he took all necessary steps while he was the occupier of the premises or that a later possessor could have avoided the danger by observing the appropriate standard of care. In any event, the liability of the former possessor is potentially limited to damage caused within one year after the termination of his possession (§ 836 II BGB).

The wording of § 836 BGB makes clear its potential limitations. The damage must be the result of the collapse of a building (or part thereof) or some other structure attached to land, and to the consequence of defective construction or inadequate maintenance, not otherwise. Thus, for example, the Federal Supreme Court has ruled that building material falling as a result of demolition work will not be included in the protective ambit of this provision (BGH VersR 1978, 1160). In this case liability, if any, will be imposed on the demolition contractor and will be based either on the breach of some statutory duty or the violation of the general duties of care (§ 823 I and II BGB). One must, therefore, be always alert to the in-built limitations of this provision and be prepared to consider the alternative or parallel application of the general rules of liability. All in all, however, the resulting intricate web of overlapping legal rules is not a feature unique to German law. English Common lawyers in particular have faced similar problems. And, they too, have had to combine different torts (like negligence or private or public nuisance) with statutory instruments (like the Occupiers' Liability Act 1956 or the Defective Premises Act 1972) in order to solve the potential liability of owners, occupiers, possessors, or landlords of dangerous or defective premises towards, visitors, next-door neighbours, and users of adjoining public roads.

(iv) §§ 833–4 BGB are the last provisions to be discussed under this subheading. Here a distinction has to be made between § 833 sentence 1 and 2 BGB. For the first imposes genuine risk-based liability (the only one to be found in the Code) for damage caused by certain kinds of animal—luxury animals (Luxustiere)—whereas the second merely establishes a rebuttable presumption of fault against the keeper of “domestic or useful animals” (Haustiere, Nutztiere). The term “domestic animals” refers not just to tame animals (or animals domesticated in Germany in the sense that the English Animals Act uses this notion) but tame animals that are used “to aid the business, the earnings, or the prosperity of the keeper”. Thus a gamekeeper's dog, a farmer's pigs, herd of cows, or working horses, a shepherd's dog, will come under this category; but dogs (generally), cats, or birds, which simply provide for their owner's pleasure, come under § 833 sentence 1 BGB. In between one finds some doubtful cases. For example, there is some ambiguity as to which part of § 833 should apply to a blind man's guide-dog. On the other hand a policeman's dog or horse, assisting him in the execution of his professional duties, have been brought under the second sentence of § 833 BGB (RGZ 82, 226). The privilege afforded to keepers of “useful animals” is no longer justified since a keeper might well be in a position to insure against the risk of being liable. However, the BGH in NJW 1986, 2501 could not bring itself to abolish the distinction and decided that it was the task of the legislator to make the correction. (Comparison with the Common law and the English Animals Act 1971 is fruitful and can reveal some interesting differences but cannot be attempted here. (For an amusing case of strict liability being imposed on the keeper of a dog which destroyed the plaintiff's valuable carpet see LG Karlsruhe, 22 March 1994, MDR 1994, 453.)

The liability provided by § 833 BGB falls on the keeper (Halter) and that is the person who, irrespective of ownership, is in charge in a real and durable manner of the animal in question. Temporary loss of control will thus not transfer the quality of keeper to another person (BGH 19 January 1988, NJW-RR 1988, 655). It is, however, otherwise, in the case of theft when the thief is likely to be held as the animal's keeper and thus liable for any damage caused while it remains under his control. The keeper is liable for all damage caused by the animal through its own movement or volition (e.g. biting, kicking etc. The term used in German is that the damage must occur “through” the animal: durch ein Tier). The injury must be the result of the realisation of a risk specific to animals. In some instances this can be controversial. For instance, a driver attempts to avoid running over an animal that has strayed onto the highway. In the process of so doing, his car capsizes. Subsequently, a second car crashes into the capsized vehicle. The keeper of the animal would be strictly liable to the first car under § 833 BGB; but does his liability under this section extend towards the driver of the second car? Is this risk still peculiar to the animal’s movement? (Example taken from Kötz and Wagner, no. 360). But this provision of the Code is inapplicable where the harm was caused by a movement instigated by a human being in control of the animal at the relevant time. (BGH 25 September 1952, NJW 1952, 1329.) Liability in this case will have to be based on some other provision of the Code (typically, § 823 I BGB.) This approach that requires that the damage can be linked to a risk peculiar to the animal is part of a broader concept of legal cause to which recourse is had in order to define and limit effectively the scope of strict liability; see next section 5(b)(iii). In the case of § 833 sentence 2 BGB (domestic or useful animals), the liability of the keeper is presumed, but he can avoid it by proving either he took all care necessary in the circumstances or showing that the harm complained of would have occurred in any event. This defence is, of course, not available to the keeper of a “luxury” animal where liability is strict (§ 833 sentence 1 BGB).

§ 834 BGB imposes a similar liability on the person (Tierhüter) who, pursuant to a contract, undertakes to look after an animal on behalf of its keeper. The liability of such a person, however, is the same whatever kind of animal he may happen to be looking after. In this instance, therefore, no distinction is made between house and luxury animals.

For further detailed discussions see: Baumgärtel, “Neue Tendenzen der Beweislastverteilung bei der Tierhalterhaftung”, 25 Jahre Karlsruher Forum, Sonderbeilage zu VersR (1983) 85; Deutsch, “Die Haftung des Tierhalters”, JuS 1987, 673; idem, “Gefährdungshaftung für laborgezüchtete Mikroorganismen”, NJW 1976, 1137; Dunz, “Reiter wider Pferd oder Versuch einer Ehrenrettung des Handelns auf eigene Gefahr”, JZ 1987, 63; Herrmann, “Die Entwicklung der Tierhalterhaftung nach § 833 Satz 1 in der modernen Judikatur und Literatur”, JR 1980, 489; Honsell, “Beweislastprobleme in der Tierhalterhaftung”, MDR 1982, 798.)

5. STRICT LIABILITY

Select bibliography

Bauer, “Erweiterung der Gefährdungshaftung durch Gesetzesanalogie”, Festschrift für Ballerstedt (1975) 305; von Caemmerer, Reform der Gefährdungshaftung (1971); Deutsch, “Methode und Konzept der Gefährdungshaftung”, VersR 1971, 1; idem, “Gefährdungshaftung: Tatbestand und Schutzbereich”, JuS 1981, 317; idem, “Das Recht der Gefährdungshaftung”, Jura 1983, 617; idem, “Das neue System der Gefährdungshaftungen: Gefährdungshaftung, erweiterte Gefährdungshaftung und Kausal-Vermutungshaftung”, NJW 1992, 73; Dunz, “Gefährdungshaftung und Adäquanz in der neueren Rechtsprechung des BGH”, VersR 1984, 600; Esser, Grundlagen und Entwicklung der Gefährdungshaftung (1941); idem, “Die Zweispurigkeit unseres Haftpflichtrechts”, JZ 1953, 129; Filthaut, Haftpflichtgesetz, 3rd ed. (1993); Kötz, “Haftung für besondere Gefahr. Generalklausel für die Gefährdungshaftung”, AcP 170 (1970) 1; idem, “Empfiehl sich eine Vereinheitlichung und Zusammenfassung der gesetzlichen Vorschriften über die Gefährdungshaftung im BGB” Gutachten und Vorschläge zur Überarbeitung des Schuldrechts (1981) 1779; Medicus, “Gefährdungshaftung im Zivilrecht”, Jura 1996, 561; Stoll, “Nochmals: Gefährdungshaftung und Adäquanz in der neueren Rechtsprechung des BGH”, VersR 1984, 1133; Ullmann, “Gefährdungshaftung in der Schifffahrt?”, VersR 1982, 1020. Will, Quellen erhöhter Gefahr (1980, with complete comparative references). In English: Zweigert/Kötz, para. 42, 646; Lawson and Markesinis, Tortious Liability for Unintentional Harm in the Common Law and the Civil Law (1982) I, 142 ff. Finally, for the historical background see Bienenfeld, Die Haftung ohne Verschulden (1933); Ogorek, Untersuchungen zur Entwicklung der Gefährdungshaftung im 19. Jahrhundert (1975); Rümelin, “Culpahaftung und Causalhaftung”, AcP 188 (1988) 285.

(a) General observations: the statutory method

Tort liability was in German law traditionally based on fault. This was certainly true of the lex Aquilia, in a sense the fons et origo of Roman law which, in its turn, became the basis of the Gemeines Recht that prevailed in a large part of central Germany during the pre-codification era. The Prussian Code, in force mainly in the north and the east of the country, had also based tort liability on fault; and so, of course, had the French Code which, as we have noted, had also been adopted by yet another group of German States in the Rhine region. Apart from history, logic also dictated—and dictates—that “bad” people must pay for the harm they cause and, usually, the greater the degree of their blameworthiness the greater the amount that they have to pay. (This correlation between degree of blameworthiness and legal consequences is characteristic of criminal law. But it is also used by some tort lawyers to deny tort liability in cases where the consequences are disproportionate to the defendant’s fault.) But during the nineteenth century—especially in its latter half—the reverse of this proposition was also advocated by many lawyers: if there was no fault there should be no liability and the loss should be left to lie where it fell. The mixture of moralistic, economic, and other arguments that led to the adoption of this attitude are reviewed by Professor Tunc in his excellent introductory chapter to the tort volume of the Encyclopedia of International and Comparative Law. But, as Tunc has shown—and his observations though couched in broad comparative terms, also apply to German law—these arguments are hardly convincing.

It could, of course, be argued that it would be asking too much of the nineteenth-century draftsmen of the German Civil Code to see the weaknesses of the proposition that there can be no liability where there is no fault. The nineteenth century was the century when the fault rule reigned supreme. Yet, interestingly enough, some courts did make limited attempts to introduce strict liability automatically by discovering fault in particular activities. (Much later, and in the context of liability towards guest passengers in cars, the French courts adopted the theory of faute virtuelle to achieve more or less the same result.) More importantly, during the latter part of the nineteenth century the German Parliament had enacted a number of specific but important statutes, which introduced risk liability (Gefährdungshaftung). So, if there was one national legislator in Europe at that time that had realized the limitations of the fault principle, it was the German. The problem of the foundation of tortious liability could thus have received a more unified and innovating treatment than was, in the end, actually accomplished. But legal tradition prevailed. Apart from one minor exception found in the Code (§ 833 BGB) dealing with “luxury animals”, the Code refused to be moved from the principle that liability for fault was the only acceptable basis for any obligation to compensate the victim. The specific legislation alluded to above, was treated as exceptional and denied the moral superiority attributed to provisions found in the Code itself. This approach had many consequences. Notable among them are two. First, it set the pattern of the future development of strict liability in German law and in this respect set it apart from other civil law systems, notably the French. Second, it created a dual regime of liability, partly to be found in the Code and partly in specific statutes, with resulting difficult problems of demarcation. The difficulties of demarcation, and the gaps that have resulted from this dual system of treating accidents, will be noted later on as particular aspects of these enactments are considered more closely. Here suffice it to note that the Janus-like nature of the German legislator, displaying a “social” outlook in his special legislation, while remaining strongly “individualistic” in his general Code, did not pass without criticism even at the time. An extract from Gierke’s scathing comments brings out clearly the inconsistencies and dangerous consequences of this approach. He wrote:

[I]t is a fatal error—an error committed by the draft of the German Civil Code—to think the social work can be left to special legislation so that the general private law can be shaped, without regard to the task that has thus been shifted, in a purely individualistic manner. There thus exist two systems ruled by completely different spirits: a system of the general civil law that contains the “pure” private law, and a mass of special laws in which a private law, tarnished by and blended with public law, governs. On the one side a living, popular, socially coloured law full of inner stimulus, on the other an abstract mould, romanistic, individualistic, ossified in dead dogmatics. The real and true private law can now develop in all its logical splendour oblivious of the heretical special laws . . . But the general law is the native soil out of which the special laws also grow. By contact with the general law our youth learn legal thinking. The judges take their nourishment from it. What a fatal abyss opens before us! What a schism between the spirit of the normal administration of justice and the administrative jurisdiction that is being extended further and further! What a . . . danger of stagnation and degeneration of jurisprudence . . . (Die soziale Aufgabe des Privatrechts (1889) 16–18; trans. by von Mehren and Gordley, The Civil Law System (2nd ed. 1977), 693.)

In the remainder of this subsection we shall concentrate on the peculiarly German method of introducing strict liability in the legal system. Then, in the next subsection (ii) we shall note some features shared by these enactments and, finally, in subsection (iii) we shall take a closer look at some of the most important statutes: the Strict Liability Act, the Road Traffic Act, Environmental Liability Act and related statutes, and the Products Liability Act.

The passing of strict liability statutes is not a phenomenon unique to Germany. One can find specific statutory interventions in the Common law system (for example the English Animals Act 1971) and in other civil law systems (for a list of French statutes see Viney, Les obligations: la responsabilité (1982) 25 ff.). What is, however, typically German is the development of a legal tradition, going back to the first Prussian Railway Act of 1838, that the introduction of strict liability into the legal order is a prerogative of the legislature. This mentality, along with the carefully, and on the whole restrictively, drafted articles of the Civil Code had an important consequence. It made it difficult for German judges to develop the kind of general, all-embracing rules which their French counterparts were able to create thanks to the wide if not amorphous delict provisions found in their Code. As a result, though there are a number of situations where fault can be presumed, there is no general presumption of liability for damage caused by things (whether dangerous or not) under one’s control analogous to that established by the famous first line of Article 1384 French CC, or in a much more limited fashion in England (Rylands v. Fletcher [1868] L.R. 3 H.L. 330), or any general rule dealing with “extra-hazardous” activities. Nor has German law adopted the bold attitude taken by the French Supreme Court in the Desmares decision (and subsequently incorporated in the French Road Traffic Act of 5 July 1985) to ignore the contributory negligence of the victim in certain instances of strict liability. Once again, clear statutory provisions to the contrary make this impossible.

The next thing to note is that the introduction of strict liability was the result of different though not necessarily mutually exclusive factors, which influenced the mind of the legislator. (Indeed, looking at the strict liability acts one can trace the evolution of industrial and technological developments in modern Germany.) So, for example, it has for some time now been recognised that the social security legislation of the early 1880s, namely the Sickness Insurance Act of 1883 (Krankenversicherungsgesetz) and the Accident Insurance Act of 1884 (Unfallversicherungsgesetz), had predominantly political not legal motives. For they were largely prompted by Bismarck's political calculation that the satisfaction of certain legitimate needs of the working classes concerning conditions of work and accident insurance would go a long way in "taking the wind out of the sails" of the socialist movement which was at that time, in Germany and elsewhere, slowly gaining wider political support. (For further details see Lawson and Markesinis, op. cit. 1, 158.)

In other instances it was the novelty of the danger coupled perhaps with the risk of serious injury resulting from the operation in question. This was so, for example, in the case of the Prussian Railway Act of 1838 (later incorporated in the Imperial Act on Liability of 1871) and the Road Traffic Act (Strassenverkehrsgesetz), both of which dealt with potentially dangerous (and, at the time of their enactment, also novel) activities. In all instances, however, the utility of rail and, later, motor vehicle transportation was perceived. Clearly, increased benefit was accompanied by increased dangers. The solution was obviously to permit these activities and, indeed, to encourage them in various ways, but only on condition that they were saddled with the cost of the risks they entailed.

In yet another group of cases the enormity of the possible damage resulting from the activity in question was such that the activity could only be allowed to continue "at a very high price". The "Act Relating to the Peaceful Use of Nuclear Energy and the Protection Against its Dangers" (Gesetz über die friedliche Verwendung der Kernenergie und den Schutz gegen ihre Gefahren) 1959—more briefly referred to as the Nuclear Energy Act—therefore imposes absolute liability on the operator of installations which are concerned with nuclear fusion or fission. This is also the case according to § 33 ff. of the Air Traffic Act (Luftverkehrsgesetz) of 1936. In both these instances, liability is truly "absolute" in the sense that even the defence of force majeure is denied to the "operator" (of the nuclear installation) and custodian (of the aircraft). Finally, the enormity of the potential harm that can be caused by water pollution must explain the (financially) unlimited liability imposed by the Water Supply Act of 1957 (Wasserhaushaltsgesetz). This is imposed on anyone who "introduces" substances into water (which includes lakes, rivers, streams, ponds etc.), thereby altering the quality of the water so as to render it harmful.

The Imperial Act on Liability of 1871 (Reichshaftpflichtgesetz), originally imposed strict liability for death or personal injury suffered by persons "in the course of operation of a railway" (§ 1). The legislator had a variety of aims in mind when, in 1940 it extended the statute to cover property damage and in 1943 extended it further to cover death or personal injury caused, under certain specific circumstances, by gas, electricity, or steam. (The present version—the Haftpflichtgesetz of 1978—includes harm caused by gases, fumes, and piped fluids.) Notable among these aims was the desire to facilitate the evidentiary burden of proof cast on the unfortunate victims of what the French, at that time, called the “anonymous accidents” caused by modern industrial machinery. (See Josserand, Cours de droit civil positif français (2nd edn., 1933) ii, no. 415.) To some extent the same is also true of the most recent of these strict liability statutes—the Act on Pharmaceutical Products of 1976 (Arzneimittelgesetz). But arguably from the beginning, and certainly, with the passage of time, it became obvious that the imposition of strict liability in the above instances also aimed at placing the risks of these activities on the shoulders of those who could best carry them. For all these industrial concerns were in a far better position to spread the cost of accidents either by reflecting it in the form of minute increases in the cost of their products or, later, by their greater ability to insure. The same motive can also be found in modern product liability law, though the 1989 Product Liability Act had, as its immediate cause, the EEC’s desire to try to achieve greater harmonisation of the law of the Member States. Be that as it may, the fact is that in our modern mechanised society a variety of policy aims accounted for the steady increase of legislative enactments, each dealing with a fairly narrowly defined activity or risks emanating from ownership of potentially dangerous things or substances. Some of the problems raised by this patchy growth of the law will be noted in the next subsections.

(b) Some general characteristics shared by all or most of these enactments

(i) Similar or analogous clauses

Though one of the ideas behind specific legislation is to allow the legislator to word his provisions in a way most appropriate to the particular risk or industry being regulated, this has not prevented the appearance in most of these enactments of almost identical provisions. One such provision—imposing maxima for monetary compensation—can be found in all but one of the statutes, and because of its importance it will be discussed separately, below. Another common provision (for example § 12 of the Strict Liability Act 1978; § 16 of the Road Traffic Act 1952) preserves the validity of the “Common law”—which, in effect, means the Civil Code—so that a victim can recover further sums by relying on the fault-based articles of the Code. This, as we shall note, is often necessary. For, first, the monetary maxima imposed by these statutes (and discussed below) may not be sufficient. Secondly, and perhaps more importantly however, is the fact that compensation under these statutes does not include sums for pain and suffering. These can thus be claimed only if the fault-based provisions of the Code can be successfully invoked. (The only exception to this last rule can be found in § 53 III of the Air Traffic Act.) According to recent reform proposals this artificial restriction is abandoned. Damages for pain and suffering will then be available also if the plaintiff bases his claim not on § 823 BGB but on the defendant’s strict liability under the various specialized statutes. Details are discussed in chapter 4 section 3 below. At this stage, it is, perhaps, worth observing that other systems, which have on the whole adopted the German way of introducing strict liability by means of specific statutes, have not followed the German example of imposing monetary maxima or excluding from the statutory provisions compensation for pain and suffering. As a result of this arguably more logical approach to the problem, these systems have been able to provide for the exclusion of the ordinary rules of civil responsibility. The Swiss Road Traffic Act—in force in its latest form since 1 August 1975—provides such an example. (For a good summary of Swiss law see Deschenaux and Tercier, La responsabilité civile (1975) 138 ff.)

A third type of common clause reduces the liability of the tortfeasor by taking into account the contributory negligence of the victim. (See, for example, § 2a of the 1871 Imperial Act on Liability—now § 4 of the 1978 Strict Liability Act; § 27 of the 1959 Nuclear Energy Act.) The reduction of the damages awarded to the victim will be decided in accordance with § 254 BGB after weighing the victim's own fault against the typical risks connected with the activity in question (the so-called "business risk") and the causative connection with the victim's hurt (BGHZ 2, 355). In extreme cases this could mean either that the victim could lose his entire claim for compensation (see, for example, BGH VersR 1963, 874) or the reverse, i.e. receive full compensation despite some negligence on his part (see, for example, BGH VersR 1969, 736). In the context of traffic accidents, the recognition of this defence has meant a net increase in contested cases. For there is hardly an incident in which the keeper of the vehicle will not invoke this defence and start a usually lengthy dispute into the exact facts of the accident. Many of the advantages of a strict liability statute can thus soon be lost in a controversy over facts which have little or reduced significance given today's insurance background. In this context, it is therefore important to note with approval the solution advocated by the Court of Cassation in the Desmares decision which refuses to take into account the victim's own fault in the realization of his harm. (see Cass. 2^{ème} civ. 21 juillet 1982, D. 1982, 449; see, also, the Law of 6 July 1985, reprinted as Addendum 2 to B. 3). This approach, however, has not prevailed in Germany, insurers arguing that the abolition of the defence would affect the level of motor insurance premiums. (For a look of the German position by a knowledgeable French insurer see, Margeat, "Nos voisins européens et la protection des victimes de la circulation", Gaz. Pal. 31 May/2 June 1992, 3. The text of the French statute is reproduced below at pp. 850 ff.)

(ii) Monetary maxima imposed on compensation paid under these statutes

Save in the case of the Water Act (and also in the case of § 833 BGB) all other strict liability statutes impose maximum amounts, which can be paid in the form of compensation under their respective provisions. However, recourse to the fault-based provisions of the Civil Code for additional compensation for pecuniary losses, as well as for pain and suffering, is in all cases expressly permitted. (See §§ 12 of the 1978 Strict Liability Act; 16 of the 1952 Road Traffic Act; 37 of the Air Traffic Act; 31, 38 of the Nuclear Energy Act.) Here the only limitation on the tortfeasor's liability is, practically speaking, his capacity to pay or, if he is insured, the ceiling of his insurance coverage. Thus, if a person is killed or injured through the operation of electricity, gas, steam, or current escaping from a cable or a pipeline or a plant for the provision of such energy or material (§ 2 of the Strict Liability Act, 1978), then the concern in question will be liable to indemnify to the full his medical expenses (§ 6) and to compensate him for his lost earnings by paying him an annuity of not more than DM 30,000 per annum per victim. And the liability under the Act (§ 10) for property damage will not exceed DM 100,000. (This figure applies even if more than one objects was damaged in the course of the same accident; but it does not apply to damage to buildings.) In the case of motor vehicle accidents, to which the Traffic Act of 19 December 1952 applies, the sums are DM 30,000 in the form of an annuity or a maximum lump sum of DM 500,000. Where several persons are killed or injured in the same accident, the liability of the person responsible cannot exceed in total the amount of DM 750,000. The total liability under the Act for damage to property is, again, DM 100,000 and this even where several objects are damaged in the same accident (§ 12 1; see also § 37 of the Air Traffic Act and § 30 of the Nuclear Energy Act). It should be noted however that if recent reform proposals become reality these maxima are considerably raised. (The recommended provisions are reproduced alongside the Act). These figures represent true maxima so that if, for example, more than one person or car is injured or damaged in the same accident the total amount available will have to be shared between them all. Who, in the case of a traffic accident, is responsible to pay these sums will be discussed in greater detail in subsection 3, below. Here suffice it to state that since the enactment of the Obligatory Insurance Act in 1939, the “holder” of any car is obliged to take out third-party insurance which, as a minimum, covers the above sums. Needless to say, the growing cost of road accidents, coupled with the very real possibility of the “holder” of the car being made additionally liable under § 823 I BGB, has meant that insurance policies covering risks in excess of one million marks are increasingly common these days. (In practice the extra coverage, typically of the order of 2 million DM, can be obtained at a very small extra premium.) Incidentally, these maxima can be (and have over the years been) readjusted by governmental decree in order to take into account inflation and other rising costs.

As stated, the regulation of compensation through statutory maxima makes it increasingly likely that in cases of serious accidents the “Common law”—i.e. the BGB—will be invoked. This, of course, means that the victim is then thrown back into the fault system with all the theoretical and practical disadvantages that this entails (delays, costs, uncertainty of result, increasing the load of court work). Even so, the victim’s position has, once again, been improved in recent years by the development of three devices. The first is the “discovery of new duties of care” which were discussed above, in chapter 2, A 4). The second way is to treat many of the provisions of the Road Traffic Act as “protective laws” and allow the victim to bring an action under § 823 II BGB (discussed in the next chapter). Finally, the German courts are, in many cases, willing to invoke the doctrine of prima-facie proof—Anscheinsbeweis—which is analogous to our doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. In practice, this can often result in the surreptitious introduction of strict liability in a system which, judging by the letter of its Civil Code, remains faithful to the idea of fault.

(iii) The courts’ role in defining the precise ambit of the statutes

As one would expect, all these enactments contain terms or notions, which though simple and obvious at face value, have given rise to many difficulties of proper demarcation. In the face of these observations, the courts have not been inactive and the rich case law that has emerged clearly presents great interest both to the academic and practising lawyer. Here, for reasons of space, we shall limit our observations to three points. First, is the use of normative theories of causation as a means of defining the proper ambit of the statute in question. Second, comes the occasional tendency to construe narrowly certain provisions. Finally, we note the tendency in other, more numerous, instances to define more widely a particular statutory term and thus, to enlarge the scope of the statute in question. In all these instances we find illustrations of how the courts have exercised the rather limited role ascribed to them by legal tradition in the area of strict liability.

1. Compensation under the strict liability rules will clearly be limited to the extent that the harm complained of represents the realisation of precisely that danger which prompted the legislator to enact the strict liability rule. The search for the protective aim of the violated norm thus becomes as important in this area of the law as it is when discussing causation problems arising from the violation of fault-based rules (§ 823 I and II BGB; see above, chapter 2, section A.5). The limits of the liability will, therefore, be determined by discovering whether the type of harm in suit and the manner of its infliction was of the kind which the statute wished to prevent. The search for an answer to such questions will, obviously, start by looking at the wording of the relevant statute. For example, was the plaintiff injured “in the course of the operation of a motor vehicle”? (beim Betrieb des Fahrzeuges: § 7 I of the Road Traffic Act.) Or was he killed “in the course of the operation of a railway” (§ 1 of the Strict Liability Act)? In all these cases, the end-result will largely be determined by the judge’s value judgment of the situation, which will often lead him to an interpretation of the enactment against the background of contemporary socio-economic demands. A decision of the German Supreme Court in 1959 brings this point out very clearly (BGH 9 September 1959, BGHZ 29, 163, case 122, below). The court in that case had to decide whether a stationary vehicle could be brought under § 7 I of the Road Traffic Act. This, as will be explained below, imposes strict liability upon the keeper of a motor vehicle which “in the course of operation” injures or kills another person. In the court’s view since the legislator has not provided any . . . explanation, it is for the judge to interpret this ambiguous rule [accident in the course of operation]. The judge is, therefore, not prohibited from interpreting § 7 StVG broadly if in so doing he conforms to the sense and purpose of the enactment to protect participants in traffic against the dangers of motor traffic. It is therefore entirely within the scope of permissible interpretation if this protection . . . is extended also to the dangers produced by stationary vehicles in present-day traffic conditions.

Clearly, continued the court,

“even if the legislator of 1909 (when the first Road Traffic Act came into force) saw the chief danger of motor vehicles, in their rapid movement due to engine power . . . that would not exclude the adaptation of the concept ‘in the operation of a motor vehicle’ to the experiences and requirements of present-day traffic”.

In the end, therefore, the use of normative theories of causation can lead—as Anglo-American lawyers have also discovered—to a considerable flexibility. In turn, this can produce an extension (and not only a restriction) of liability, rendering the defendant liable for all the “typical” consequences inherent in his business activity. (Cf. in this respect the views of Ehrenzweig in his Negligence Without Fault (1951) reprinted in 54 Cal. L. Rev. 1422 (1966); see also “Vicarious Liability in the Conflict of Laws—Towards a Theory of Enterprise Liability under ‘Foreseeable and Insurable’ Laws III”, 69 Yale L. J. 978, 989 (1960).)

2. An example of narrowing liability can be found in the area of application of § 833 BGB in so far as it imposes strict liability. Here, it must be shown that the harm caused was the result of the specific dangers arising from the animal’s nature. Damage caused by a bolting horse—even where the cause of its fright is an external noise—or from a biting dog, would clearly be the kind of typical harm that animals of this kind can cause. But the injury suffered by a rider who borrowed from a friend a horse, which he knew to be unruly when ridden by strangers, in order to demonstrate his greater riding skills, would not lead to strict liability of the owner of the horse. (BGH NJW 1974, 234; NJW 1977, 2158). Nor, as Professor Kötz has suggested (Deliktsrecht, no. 360), would a cyclist, who collided in darkness with the corpse of a dead dog, be able to sue its owner under § 833 BGB. For in such a case, the hurt of the plaintiff cannot be traced back to a special risk inherent in the animal. (But see OLG Celle VersR 1980, 431. Liability under § 823 I BGB is another matter.) The example may seem far-fetched; but this kind of reasoning produced the same (negative) conclusion in a case where the plaintiff's cellar was flooded as a result of his drains being blocked by cow-dung from the defendant's cows (LG Köln, 13 July 1960, MDR 1960, 924). Further illustrations were given in the previous section 4(iii).

At this point a brief excursus can show how the same kind of legal reasoning can be found in precisely the same area of the law in the Common law system. Thus, s. 4 I of the Animals Act, enacted in England in 1971, imposes strict liability for "damage" done by straying livestock "to the land or to any property on it". The definition of damage in this section is narrower than the general definition given in s. 11, which includes personal injury and disease. The narrower definition of s. 4 I is generally taken to prevail in this case since it is regarded as lex specialis. (For example, Winfield and Jolowicz, On Tort (15th edn. by W V H Rogers) 577 and n. 68.) For our purposes, however, it could be seen as a statutory embodiment of the scope of the rule theory. In other words, it can be said that the legislator wished to impose strict liability only when the typical consequences resulting from cattle trespassing actually occurred (damage to land, crops etc.). When other harmful consequences flowed from such straying livestock (e.g. human beings were trampled down) then liability should be based on the possible fault of their owner and not on the statute.

A similar narrow interpretation of the rules of strict liability has been adopted in other instances outside the area of the Civil Code. The Water Supply Act imposes, as we have seen, strict liability on anyone who "introduces" (leitet ein, bringt ein) substances into water, thereby prejudicially altering its physical, chemical, or biological characteristics. The deliberate discharge by factories of pollutants into nearby rivers, lakes, ponds, or estuaries is, of course, caught by this provision. But so is the discharge of substances, which do not affect the quality of water and marine life therein, even if its effects are not known to the person (legal or physical) who is carrying on these activities. On the other hand, the courts insist that for harmful conduct to be brought under this statute it must be shown that there was "a positive act objectively aimed at the water". As stated, this would include the above activities of "discharge" of substances, but would exclude, for example, a collision between two petrol tankers which led to one of them falling into a nearby river and thereby accidentally emptying its contents into the water. (See Larenz/Canaris, II 2, § 84 V; idem in VersR 1963, 593, 602. (In the 12th edn., § 17. ix, p. 731, another illustration is given: bridge collapsing under the weight of a petrol tanker.) See also BGHZ 46, 17; 57, 170, 173; 62, 351, 355. For other examples see the discussion in 3(iii), below.)

3. More often than not, however, the courts use the avowed purpose of the rule imposing strict liability in order to give an extended meaning to a term or phrase to be found in one of the enactments. A number of illustrations will be given in 3(ii), below, when we talk about traffic accidents. Here we shall, therefore, concentrate on one of the best-known examples which can be found in the definition of a "railway" in § 1 of the old Imperial Act on Liability—now included in the 1978 Strict Liability Act.

Today, there is no doubt that "railway" includes all types of transport moving on rails—whether wide or narrow gauge, or moving above or beneath the metal rails in question; indeed, the Strict Liability Act has made this clear by expressly including cable-cars and suspension railways. But the statute also requires that the accident happened "in the course of the operation of a railway . . .". The question thus arises whether this statute can be extended to cover other activities carrying with them risks not unrelated to the kind of dangers peculiar in some sense to the operation of a railway. This question as to whether the accident can be regarded as a “business accident” (Betriebsunfall) and thus covered by the statute was, in a sense, linked with the question of proper definition of a railway. Both were raised in one of the early cases that came before the Reichsgericht in 1879 (RGZ 1, 247).

In that case the defendant, a building contractor, was engaged in the business of constructing a railway and was moving earth around in tipping-wagons operated on a narrow-gauge rail when the accident occurred. The Court of Appeal refused to apply § 1 of the Imperial Act on Liability of 1871. Its decision was reversed by the Reichsgericht in a judgment most notable for its polemical style against all attempts (favoured by some judges and academics) to give a narrow interpretation to the recent Imperial enactment. The Supreme Court openly alluded to the policy factor briefly mentioned at the beginning of this paragraph. It concluded that any narrow interpretation of the wording of the statute, of the kind adopted by the Court of Appeal, would lead to the emasculation of the new statute and should, therefore, be rejected. As a result of this bold judgment, and after many others took a similarly broad view of the notion of “business accident”, German law has now come to include under the protective ambit of this paragraph not only typical accidents connected with railways, such as deaths or injuries resulting from sudden application of brakes (even where this is caused by the totally unexpected appearance of a child or animal on the tracks: RGZ 54, 404; BGH VersR 1955, 346), swaying or swinging of carriages, derailments, or accidents caused by faulty signalling, but also cases where passengers are injured on platforms when jostled by other passengers during rush-hour. For this to happen, however, there must exist a “direct external local and temporal connection between the accident and a particular business procedure or business installation belonging to the railway” (BGHZ 1, 17, 19). This rather verbose statement can lead to some fine distinctions so that, for example, if the plaintiff’s injury is caused by the kind of jostling that takes place in crowded stations or results from an uneven or slippery surface of the platform, the railway concern will be liable. But if the injury resulting from the fall was caused by, say, the presence of black ice, formed by freezing rain, then the liability of the railway would have to be based on fault (i.e. pleaded under § 823 I BGB). However, it is always possible in this case to try and argue that the water that froze, and caused the fall of the plaintiff, came from a railway engine or found its way onto the platform because of a defect in the station roof. If such an allegation is substantiated, then one could again be back under the heading of “business accident” and thus be able to invoke strict liability. Given the desirability of avoiding such niceties and, one might add, given the prevalence of modern insurance, it is not surprising to note a very clear tendency to interpret the statute “generously” and thereby afford maximum protection to victims. A result, one might add, that the French courts have also very largely managed to achieve through the medium of Article 1384 French CC, or the discovery of implied contractual terms (obligations de sécurité) in the contract of carriage. (For a summary of the French approach, which moves freely between contract and tort, see Terré, Simler and Lequette, Droit civil, les obligations, 5th ed. (1993) nos. 543, 565 and references in note 7.)

(iv) Is analogical extension of the statutory rules possible?

We have already noted how the German courts carved out for themselves an important area of activity in this otherwise statute-dominated part of the law. Yet they stopped short of taking the most vital step, which would have placed them on an approximate par with the legislature, when they refused to arrogate to themselves the right to extend analogically specific statutes to new situations raising similar issues of public policy. The important judgment of 1912, RGZ 78, 171, that marked the beginning of this judicial attitude towards this matter, is reproduced below as case 128. (For other instances see RGZ 147, 353; BGHZ 54, 332.)

The litigation was provoked by an accident caused when one of Count von Zeppelin's experimental airships was forced by bad weather to land and then broke its moorings, injuring one of the many spectators who had spontaneously gathered to witness this novel sight. An attempt to extend analogically the recently enacted (3 May 1909) Road Traffic Act was rejected by the Supreme Court on the ground of the exceptional nature of this piece of legislation. Yet, the policy reasons behind the legislator's decision to enact the Traffic Act (novel form of transport, increased dangers etc.) were, arguably, equally to be found in airships; and, indeed, other German-inspired systems, such as the Austrian, have allowed their courts to extend statutes analogically, imposing strict liability (see cases cited by Zweigert and Kötz, An Introduction to Comparative Law, (1998), p. 657). In 1912, however, the German Supreme Court refused to accept this and has since repeatedly adhered to this position (see, for example, BGHZ 55, 229 and cases cited previously). The "tame" language employed in that famous judgment thus stands in stark contrast to the "bold" approach adopted some thirty years earlier when, for a moment, the court seemed to indicate its willingness to play a part in expanding the grounds of strict liability.

(v) A critical epilogue

Though necessarily brief, our sketch of the German way of introducing strict liability has already revealed some of the system's cardinal weaknesses. The notion that only the legislator can introduce strict liability has resulted in a delayed, patchy, and complicated system for handling accidents resulting from new technology and more generally, the risks of modern life. It has been delayed because, inevitably, there always was, and always will be, a time-lag between new technological developments and the time when the legislator intervenes in order to regulate them. The result is that until such intervention occurs, the courts have to step in and handle as best they can the problems posed by new technology. (Some illustrations can be found in RGZ 17, 103 (protection of property before the enlargement of § 1 of the Imperial Act on Liability, discussed in section (iii) and below); RG JW 1938, 1234; RGZ 147, 353 (liability of electricity companies before the 1943 extension of the Imperial Act on Liability); RG DJZ 11, 1316 (car accident before the enactment of the 1909 Road Traffic Act).)

It was patchy, since each statute only handled specific problems, on the basis of scientific and technological information available at the time of their enactment, while leaving often-related activities or risks outside their purview. The inability to extend these enactments analogically, only aggravated the difficulties. Thus Professors von Caemmerer, Kötz, and others have for some time now been pointing out the capriciousness of the existing law and advocating the adoption of a more generalized provision to deal with this subject. So, for example, why cannot the dangers inherent in operating an explosives factory be assimilated to those of the gas industry dealt with by § 2 of the Strict Liability Act? Could it not be said that the operation of a large river dam poses risks broadly analogous to those found in nuclear stations regulated by § 25 of the Nuclear Act? Should the spraying of a poisonous insecticide lead to strict liability only if it contaminates water, in accordance with § 22 of the Water Supply Act, but not when it destroys or dangerously contaminates useful crops? Or why should a contractor using a tipping-wagon for the construction of a railway be strictly liable for any damage he causes, but only be liable upon proof of fault if he is simply helping build a factory or a large block of flats? Other systems have provided for strict liability not only in the case of specifically mentioned activities, but also in all those instances where an activity carries with it an increased danger for others.

Finally, the system is complicated because the imposition of maxima for monetary compensation and the exclusion under these statutes of all compensation for pain and suffering often means recourse to the ordinary, fault-based liability rules to be found in the Civil Code. If these “limitations” imposed by the statutes were dictated by fears of unlimited liability and unbearable economic consequences, especially at a time when insurance was not as widely spread as it is today, then the time has surely come to reconsider the validity of this kind of argument. Certainly, the absence of any maxima in compensation paid under the Water Act has caused no problems. In motor vehicle insurance, coverage in excess of the maximum amount provided by the statute (i.e. DM 750,000) is widely obtained without a considerable increase in premium cost. Finally, the Swiss experience, quite different in this respect from the German, has not justified the fears expressed in Germany concerning an extension of the rules of strict liability. A more unified treatment of its problems would, it is submitted, be a considerable improvement on the status quo. But, despite many rumblings, and even more proposals for reform, the present system seems unlikely to be greatly changed in the near future. Thus, in this as in so many other areas of civil liability (e.g. § 831 BGB; express recognition of the right of personality etc.) the codal framework has proved too resistant to much-needed change.

(c) Four specific statutes on strict liability

(i) The Strict Liability Act 1978

It was stated earlier in this section that the history of the German strict liability statutes follows closely the development and expansion of modern industry. The Strict Liability Act of 1978 brings this point out very clearly.

The origin of this Act can, in a sense, be traced back to the 1838 Prussian Railways Act—by any reckoning, a most pioneering enactment. For when it was enacted, the Kingdom of Prussia had less than 100 kilometres of rail tracks so there was really no pressing practical need for such a measure. But capitalism in those days also had its paternalistic aspects; and, in any event, the economic consequences resulting from the imposition of strict liability for harm to persons or property “resulting from carriage on the railway” (§ 35) hardly affected the mainly land-owning dominant class.

The importance of the railway system for the economy and, later, the defence of the realm, was quickly perceived by the German leaders. The investment in an efficient national railway system was considerable and with the unification of the Reich, the 1838 enactment was to serve as the model of the Imperial Insurance Act of 1871. This statute introduced strict liability for railway carriage throughout the entire Reich. But the 1871 version of the statute it was also narrower than its model—which remained in force in Prussia and certain other parts of Germany (and also served as the model of an Austrian enactment of 1869). For § 1 of the 1871 Act limited strict liability to cases of death or personal injury only (and excluded property damage) resulting from the “operating of the railway”. This discrepancy between the old, geographically limited but in one respect wider statute and the Imperial enactment posed difficult problems which a number of courts tried to resolve by extending strict liability to property damage caused by the operation of railways (cf. RGZ 17, 103). These attempts, however, achieved only limited success and, on the contrary, attracted some hostile academic criticism. It was not, therefore, until the enactment of the 1897 Commercial Code that some measure of uniformity was achieved in the area of liability for carriage of goods. This trend was firmly consolidated in 1940 when a special statute, amending the 1871 Imperial law, introduced strict liability for property damage, as well (Gesetz über die Haftpflicht der Eisenbahnen und Strassenbahnen für Sachschäden). This position is, of course, now also clearly reflected in § 1 of the 1978 consolidating enactment.

Apart from this “retrograde” step, connected with the exclusion of property damage from the scope of the 1871 statute, the Imperial Insurance Act was a far-reaching enactment. § 2, for example, imposed what we would call true vicarious liability on the operators of mines, quarries, pits, and factories for the damage caused by the faults of their authorised agents or representatives. This was a great step forward for those persons working in these industries and most exposed to their dangers. And the progress was even greater if taken together with another set of provisions of the Act—§§ 6 and 7—which greatly increased the discretion of the courts in evaluating the evidence and the amount of damages to be awarded. This “free evaluation” principle, as it became known was a great innovatory step when compared with the rigid rules of procedure applicable at the time. (It was subsequently widely adopted by the Code of Civil Procedure of 1871 with the result that §§ 6 and 7 of the Imperial Insurance Act became redundant and were abolished.) But the more equitable treatment of industrial accidents did not stop there. The passing of the social security legislation of the early 1880s gave even greater protection to the working classes for accidents at work, and the consolidation of the entire law of social insurance by the 1911 Reichsversicherungsordnung removed accidents at work from the province of the law of tort. A bird’s-eye view of this system will be given in the next subsection.

The expansion of the Imperial Insurance Act continued well into the twentieth century. Apart from the enlargement that took place in 1940 in order to include property damage, a further amendment was introduced in 1943. This extended the ambit of the statute to cover injury to persons or damage to property resulting from the operation of electricity, gas, steam, or current escaping from cables, pipelines, or plants for the provision of such energy or materials (see § 2 of the 1978 statute). The 1978 Haftpflichtgesetz of 4 January 1978 (extended strict liability further so as to include gases, fumes, and piped fluids but in other respects it can be regarded as a consolidating act.

Finally, one should note that the Strict Liability Act contains the usual defences—contributory fault of the victim (§ 4) and force majeure (höhere Gewalt) (§ 3), which is interpreted in a very stringent manner (and thus is more demanding a test than that of unavoidable event: unabwendbares Ereignis). Thus, in one case (BGHZ 7, 338) the young plaintiff was electrocuted when his kite—secured by a metal wire and not, as is usual, by a string—came into contact with an overhead electricity cable. Though the facts of the case were, clearly, very atypical, the Supreme Court refused to treat this as a case of an unavoidable accident and held the electricity operators liable to the victim. (For the full text of the 1978 statute see below, p. 853)

(ii) Accidents at work and social security legislation in modern German law

Since 1884 Germany has had a no-fault compulsory insurance scheme covering accidents at work, gesetzliche Unfallversicherung (statutory accident insurance). This has been amended and expanded in various ways by subsequent enactments and now forms part of a wider and more comprehensive system of social security that covers such things as permanent incapacity for work as well as sickness.

Here we shall limit our comments to the treatment given to accidents at work, a phrase which should be taken to include not only injuries sustained while actually at work but also accidents occurring while travelling to and from work. (Hence in practice we have, here, a considerable overlap with the compensation system established by the Road Traffic Act discussed below.)

The importance of this statutory insurance can be seen from the fact that two thirds of the population of Germany are currently covered (Kötz/Wagner, no. 581). Awards are made to all those in paid employment (whether German nationals or not), certain groups of self-employed persons. Since 1971, children and students have been covered by the schemes. The latter group is certainly not negligible: in 1998 alone about 688 million DM were paid out for these so-called "education accidents" (Kötz/Wagner, no. 618).

Compensation in the above cases is made through various schemes which are administered by trade co-operatives or institutes (Berufsgenossenschaften) which are separate legal entities, usually in close contact with one another, and under the general supervision and responsibility of the Minister of Labour and Social Security. The institutes function on a territorial basis and are organised to cover different commercial or other activities. There are in all some thirty-four industrial accident insurance institutes; nineteen agricultural institutes; thirteen municipal accident insurance organisations; eleven State funds; four Federal insurance institutes; and a number of other smaller autonomous funds—some ninety institutes in all. The first two of these, however, are the most important, covering between them some 90 per cent of work accident insurance. These institutes are self-governed by boards or councils, usually composed of equal numbers of employers and employees. Every employer is automatically a member of the institute appropriate to his firm's activities in the locality in which it carries on its business. Institutes may provide voluntary insurance for the self-employed in their areas and some actually make this compulsory.

The financing of the various institutes is a complicated affair. Generally speaking, revenue from taxes funds those institutes, which insure public employees; and the funds of agricultural institutes are subsidised by the central (Federal) government. The thirty-four industrial accident insurance institutes, on the other hand, derive their funds entirely from contributions made by employers, though there is the possibility (realised once only) of mutual financial help. The contributions vary depending on the risk factor attendant on the branch of industry to which the member belongs as well as on the risk-rating of the firm in question. These figures are reviewed periodically and contributions tend to vary from 1 to 12 per cent of earnings.

The awards are made by the officials of the appropriate institutes; and there is an intricate system of appeals to local State and Federal courts. A basic assumption of the system is that if an employee is entitled to compensation under SGB VII (for an accident suffered at work), save in cases of intentionally inflicted injury, the injured victim cannot claim any further compensation by relying on the ordinary tort rules of the BGB: the employer or any other colleague of the victim who may also be responsible for the accident enjoy an immunity (§§ 104, 105 SGB VII. Previously §§ 636, 637 RVO). Hence, this is the only main area in which tort law has been completely replaced by a compulsory and statutory insurance scheme in Germany. It is interesting to note that one of the main objects of tort—to provide incentives to reduce the risk of accidents—has been apparently achieved by other means. In 1976 the institutes running the system introduced a system by which the contribution of the individual employer depended also on the number of accidents in his company. As a result, the overall number of accidents has decreased significantly. (Cf. Kötz and Schäfer AcP 189 (1989), 501.)

The statutory scheme just described thus provides a number of advantages/incentives to employers. But is the system acceptable also from the employee's perspective? One of the main advantages is that the employee will be able to obtain compensation from a solvent debtor and he will not have to establish the fault of the employer. Nor will his own contributory fault be taken into account to reduce his "damages". This highlights once again the overall aim of social protection of the system. Its main disadvantage is, of course, that the employee cannot recover damages for pain and suffering (§ 847 BGB). On the other hand, the system of awards tends to be closely connected with the victim's pre-accident earnings and the sums recoverable can thus often be quite generous. More precisely, the system of an abstract assessment of the victim's earning disability tends—to some extent—to generate windfall payments. Professor Kötz (op. cit. no. 589) gives the example of a legal representative who while on a business trip has an accident and loses his right arm. This means that according to the disability guidelines his earning capacity will be diminished by 75 per cent. Generally speaking, whether or not he subsequently learns to write with his left hand and performs his duties just as he did before the accident will not be taken into account. (Limited exceptions from this are contained in §§ 85, 87 SGB VII.) Moreover, pensions and other periodic payments are index-linked. What is awarded depends largely upon whether the case is one of personal injury or death.

Awards for personal injuries will cover medical costs, including the costs of nursing, convalescence, and rehabilitation. The vast majority of cases will be dealt with under the general sickness insurance schemes (which are financed by contributions from both employers and employees). But the accident insurance institutes will meet all costs after the eighteenth day and, in about 15–20 per cent of the cases, depending on the type and seriousness of the injury, they take over responsibility from the outset and handle the case through their own specialists and hospitals. The institutes will also pay varying sums for loss of wages depending on the degree of invalidity incurred (minimum 20 per cent) and the period it lasts, but during the first six weeks of incapacity the employer remains responsible for paying the victim's wages. Total incapacity will usually produce approximately 65 per cent of the pre-accident wages for the first thirteen weeks of the incapacity and from then onwards a pension equal to two-thirds of the pre-accident wages within certain maximum limits. In the case of partial incapacity, the sums payable represent the proportion of the sum payable in the case of total incapacity that corresponds to the actual degree of incapacity and these sums are increased by small amounts if the injured person has dependants. In the case of fatal accidents, a sum equal to one month's earnings plus the funeral expenses becomes payable immediately. In addition to this sum, a widow would receive a pension, which is usually 30 per cent of the deceased husband's pre-accident income. This sum can be increased to 40 per cent where the widow is over the age of forty-five or her own earning capacity is reduced by at least 50 per cent, or if she has children to look after. Children can also receive a pension, which is higher where both parents are dead and lower if one of the parents has died. The sums are, once again, calculated on the pre-accident earnings of the parent, are index-linked, and cease to be paid when the child becomes eighteen. A widower, too, can claim a pension, but only where he can show that his wife was mainly responsible for the maintenance of the family and that he is, through incapacity, unable to support himself. Naturally, this applies if the wife died in an industrial accident as defined above.

A final issue that is of great practical importance in this context of accidents at work is whether the insurance institution can recoup from the tortfeasor the compensation it has paid to the victim. According to § 110 SGB VII the employer (or another employee) is liable to the extent that the insurer paid the victim; this is however subject to the crucial condition that the accident was caused intentionally or by gross negligence. In the case of a deliberately caused accident this seems perfectly sensible. But this may be more difficult to justify in the case of gross negligence since the advantages of certainty and simplicity of the social security system may thus be undermined. If on the other hand a third party caused the accident negligently then the victim's claim in tort against the third party will be transferred to the insurer (cessio legis), § 116 SGB VII. This has given rise to difficulties in cases where both, the employer and a third party, have caused the injuries. The question then is whether the third party is fully liable or whether his liability ought to be limited to his share of the blame. The courts have adopted the latter view (BGH 51, 37; see more recently NJW 1987, 2669). Otherwise the third party (who might be 10 per cent responsible) would be required to pay compensation for 100 per cent of the loss sustained by the victim, while at the same time he could not claim any contribution from the employer, who is 90 per cent to blame, but who enjoys an immunity from liability as against the victim, § 104 SGB VII. This cannot be right. The aim of the statutory insurance scheme is not to deprive third parties of their right to contribution (§§ 840, 426 BGB) but to protect the employer who finances the insurer by paying premiums. Thus, the insurer will be able to recover only 10 per cent of the loss in our example.

It goes without saying, as the example given also shows, that the rights to recoup awards of compensation raise intricate issues and require a special infrastructure to deal with them. In certain areas, where the third party is, himself, insured, the social security institutions sometimes enter into so called general "loss-sharing-agreements" with the private insurer (Teilungsabkommen). The claim is then settled on the basis of previous statistical experience without looking at the facts of the individual case. This saves the cost of establishing the respective portions of negligence in the individual case but it also departs from the idea of personal responsibility for one's acts under § 823 I BGB. This is most likely the case in the area of car accidents, for here insurance is compulsory (where the figure of payments under such agreements amounted in 1999 to 2.073 million). (For further details see Kötz/Wagner, no. 614–615 with references.)

(For the historical background of the Unfallversicherungsgesetz of 1884: Kaltenborn, "Die Sozialgesetzgebung des Reichskanzlers Fürst Otto von Bismarcks", JZ 1998, 770. The subsequent Reichsversicherungsordnung (RVO) was replaced in 1997 by the provisions in Sozialgesetzbuch (SGB) Book VII. Its purpose is to protect employees against risks specifically associated with their activities as employees, namely to suffer an accident at work (Arbeitsunfall, § 8 SGB VII), or to sustain an illness that is related to specific health risks of the task assigned to the employee (Berufskrankheit, § 9 SGB VII). In the period between 1996 and 1998 there were around two million accidents in employment per annum where the employee was not able to work for more than three days (including roughly 90.000 cases of "professional" illness). See Kötz/Wagner, no. 206.)

(iii) The Road Traffic Act 1952

(a) General observations. The twentieth century presented tort law with challenges never before encountered during its long history. A set of legal rules, originally devised for human beings, were increasingly applied to legal entities. Rules, which are meant to regulate the consequences of blameworthy conduct were used to determine the allocation of risks. Modern insurance and social security meant that more and more of those who met the cost of accidents were innocent absentees. One could go on and on with this list with the intention either to criticise the “antiquated” tort system and recommend its reform or abolition or, alternatively, to marvel at its ability to survive such changes. This is not the place to do either. But it is, perhaps, appropriate to remind the reader that the topic that has revealed the greater weaknesses of tort law, has prompted some of its most imaginative writing, and has proved a veritable hot-bed for ideas for reform, is the law of traffic accidents.

The practical significance of the topic is undisputed. In Germany, with whose system we are here primarily concerned, the cost of car accidents, in both human and financial terms, is enormous. In 1999 there were about 50 million licensed cars. In the same year the police registered 2.412.641 car accidents in which 7.777 people were killed and 520.902 injured. Given the complexity of the compensation system—which draws its funds both from social security and private insurance—it is difficult to give an accurate idea of the financial cost. What is clear, however, is that insurance payments for personal injury, death, and property damage were around 27.7 billion DM in 1999. (See Kötz/Wagner, no. 207, 511.) Moreover, in the first half of the 1990’s, roughly 12 per cent of all civil claims brought before the Amtsgericht and 8.5 per cent of those brought at the Landgericht were related to traffic accidents. See Greger Haftungsrecht des Straßenverkehrs 3rd edn. (1997), Einleitung, no. 2.) Whatever else these figures may suggest, they certainly make one wonder whether and to what extent has the strict liability statute succeeded in accelerating compensation for victims of traffic accidents and reducing the volume of civil litigation.

Clearly, the topic is one of those that could justify on its own an “advanced course in tort law”. Here we shall only outline the German approach under three headings. In the first we shall sketch briefly the gradual expansion of the statute law in order to assure a more comprehensive protection of victims of car accidents. In the second, we shall describe the main liability provisions of the Road Traffic Act of 1952. In the third, we shall consider some of the shortcomings of the present law in the light of some brief comparative observations. Before tackling these points, however, some reference must be made to the very rich legal literature on this subject.

Further reading

On German law (written in German) see Becker-Böhme, Kraftverkehrshaftpflichtschäden. Die Regulierung in der Praxis, 20th edn. (1997); Bauer, Die Kraftfahrtversicherung (1976); Becker, Kraftverkehrs-Haftpflichtgesetz (18th edn., 1992); Birkmann, “Die Rechtsprechung des BGH zum Verkehrshaftpflichtrecht”, DAR 1989, 201; Drees/Kuckuk/Werny, Strassenverkehrsrecht Kommentar (7th edn., 1992); Gelhaar/Thuleweit, Das Haftpflichtrecht des Strassenverkehrs (1969); Gessner/Kötz, “Verkehrsunfälle vor Gericht. Eine rechtstatsächliche Untersuchung”, JZ 1973, 82; Greger, Haftungsrecht des Straßenverkehrs, 3rd ed. (1997); Grossfeld, “Haftpflichtversicherung im Wandel” VW 1974, 693; Hanau, “Rückwirkungen der Haftpflichtversicherung auf die Haftung”, VersR 1969, 291; Jagusch/Hentschel, Strassenverkehrsrecht (35th edn. 1998); Weyers, Unfallschäden, Praxis und Ziele von Haftpflicht und Vorsorgesystemen (1971); Wussow, Das Unfallhaftpflichtrecht (14th edn. 1996).

For a brief account in English see Pfennigstorf, “Analysis of the German Auto Accident Compensation System” in Comparative Studies in Automobile Accident Compensation, 33ff., published by the US Department of Transportation in 1970; idem, German Insurance Laws (trans. and annotated in English) and published by the American Bar Foundation in 1975 and 1977 (Supplement).

For proposals for reform of the German law see Bollweg, "Gesetzliche Änderungen im Schadensersatzrecht?", NZV 2000, 185; von Caemmerer, Reform der Gefährdungshaftung (1971); Güllemann, Ausgleich von Verkehrsunfallsschäden im Licht internationaler Reformprojekte (1969); von Hippel, Schadensausgleich bei Verkehrsunfällen, Haftungsetzsetzung durch Versicherungsschutz (1968); idem, "Schadensausgleich bei Verkehrsunfällen, Mögliche Wege einer Reform", ZRP 1973, 27; Kötz, "Empfiehl sich eine Vereinheitlichung und Zusammenfassung der gesetzlichen Vorschriften über die Gefährdungshaftung im BGB", Gutachten und Vorschläge zur Überarbeitung des Schuldrechts (1981) 1779; Krause, Das Risiko des Strassenverkehrsunfalls, Zuordnung und Absicherung (1974); Schmeer, "Haftungsetzsetzung durch Versicherungsschutz?", VersR 1973, 390; "Soziale Sicherung gegen Unfälle im Strassenverkehr?" Verhandlungen der Tagung des Deutschen Sozialgerichtsverbandes in Berlin am 17./18. 10. 1974 (1975).

Finally, excellent comparative law insights can be obtained by reading Professor Tunc's "Traffic Accident Compensation: Law and Proposals" in vol. XI, chapter 14 of the International Encyclopedia of Comparative Law (1971) and the most recent collection of essays on his latest proposals on the subject entitled Pour une loi sur les accidents de la circulation (1981).

(b) Increasing protection through statutory interventions. We have already noted that the introduction of strict liability in German law has been a closely guarded legislative prerogative. In this area of the law, legislative intervention on two fronts (the purely delictual and the insurance front) has been coupled with a close regulatory function on the part of the State. In different ways both have tried to improve the protection given to victims, the public in general, and in some cases, the insured keepers of the cars.

The process has been a gradual one. The first attempts to introduce strict liability were made nearly two years after the BGB came into force. A conference of lawyers then passed a resolution demanding the extension of the Imperial Insurance Act of 1871 to motor vehicles (even though at that time there were less than 2000 cars on the road) and, what is particularly interesting, proposing the creation of a mandatory co-operative risk-spreading association. (Verhandlungen des Sechszwanzigsten Deutschen Juristentages I, 27–55; III, 163–207 (Berlin 1902, 1903).) The idea met with some success with the government, which even went so far as to present Parliament in 1905 with a Bill. But by that time the motor car lobby was also gaining strength. So the Motor Vehicle Act (Gesetz über Verkehr mit Kraftfahrzeugen) that was finally enacted on 3 May 1909, was a compromise. For. (i) it introduced maxima for monetary compensation, which the 1871 Imperial Liability Act in its original form did not contain; (ii) it included no proposals for some kind of insurance scheme (as proposed by the 1902 conference), and (iii) it excluded from its application death or injuries suffered by the driver or non-paying passengers. The idea behind this last restriction was that the rationale of strict liability for car accidents was the danger posed to road-users by fast-moving objects. Strict or stricter forms of liability by means of specific statutes were first introduced by Denmark in 1903 (and were considerably extended by a 1918 amendment). Sweden followed suit in 1906 (and its statute was further amended in 1916), then came Greece in 1911, Norway in 1912, Finland in 1925, Switzerland in 1932, and the Netherlands in 1935. A readable account of the very different evolution of the English Common law during this same period can be found in an Article written by J. R. Spencer in [1983] Cambridge Law Journal 65 ff..

After various amendments and re-enactments, the 1909 Motor Vehicles Act became the Road Traffic Act (Strassenverkehrsgesetz) of 19 December 1952 and has since then survived basically unchanged. But the introduction of strict liability helps the victims of traffic accidents only so long as the tortfeasors can and will pay. In the absence of obligatory insurance this could not originally be guaranteed, even though many German drivers voluntarily obtained insurance coverage after the enactment of the 1909 Act. In the 1930s, however, a new trend started to manifest itself. In 1931 warehouse operators were, under certain circumstances, obliged to carry insurance; in 1936 the same was true for airplanes. Obligatory third-party liability insurance for cars was clearly not far away. In fact, it became a reality on 7 November 1939, when the first Obligatory Insurance Act came into force imposing on the “keeper” of a motor vehicle an obligation to carry insurance for himself and for the authorised driver of his vehicle. But there were still important gaps and, following the 1959 European Convention on Compulsory Insurance against Civil Liability in Respect of Motor Vehicles (European Treaty Series no. 29), the 1939 Act was revised and re-enacted under the short title Pflichtversicherungsgesetz of 5 April 1965. The main two loopholes that were closed by this enactment concerned (i) uninsured cars and (ii) hit-and-run accidents. In effect, the Act “legalised” an unofficial agreement that the insurance industry had operated since 1955. A private non-profit corporation, controlled and managed by the insurers, was created and compensation was provided out of its funds to the victims of the above-mentioned type of accidents. But compensation from the fund was limited in two important ways. First, it was entirely secondary in nature and could be claimed only if no compensation could be obtained from any other source. Second, it was limited to the statutory maxima (now, as we have seen, DM 750,000) and was and is further limited to claims for actual pecuniary damages arising from death or injury. Property damage, therefore, and pain and suffering are not compensated under this scheme save in very exceptional circumstances of real hardship. The other insurance gap that remained to be filled was connected with the possibility of an insurance company going bankrupt and being unable to meet its obligations. Though not something that has happened frequently—indeed so far as one can discover there exists only a handful of such incidents—German insurers decided to intervene in this area as well. Thus, in 1968 they created a private law corporation known as the Aid for Traffic Victims Fund (Verkehrsoferhilfe e.V.) which meets to the full all claims made against insolvent members, subject to a small deduction.

The increased legislative intervention described in the preceding paragraphs has created a regulatory background against which the modern insurance market operates under the supervision of a Federal Office situated in Bonn. The intricate nature of the rules so established stems partly from the need to regulate the interrelationship with the social security system of compensation, notably through the establishment of a complicated system of subrogation. The complexity also becomes inevitable when one remembers that one is here trying to protect at one and the same time the interests of (i) the public at large, (ii) the injured person, and (iii) the insured himself.

The protection of the public at large is assured first of all by the creation of the obligatory system of liability insurance. (Only the Federal State, the States of the Federal Republic and certain public institutions are exempt from this requirement.) Second, this protection is ensured by imposing an obligation on insurers to provide the minimum mandatory coverage (application for insurance coverage cannot be refused except in certain narrowly defined cases given in § 6 of the 1965 Obligatory Insurance Act). Third, the protection is ensured by the establishment of an elaborate administrative system by which no car is put on the road without a valid licence and, for this to be obtained, a valid certificate of insurance must be produced. Operating a car in contravention of the above is made a criminal offence, and penalties are also imposed if the termination of an insurance policy is not notified without delay to the licensing authority.

The protection of the injured person is, clearly, also furthered by all the above rules. In addition, however, since 1965 the victim has been given a direct right of action against the insurer (§ 3 I of the Obligatory Insurance Act, following the French model of the action directe). The victim can rely on the insurance policy even after its cancellation, but only if the claim is made within one month from the cancellation being notified to the licensing authority. Moreover, the victim's rights against the insurer are protected against the risk of the contract being void or voidable or the insurer having some other defence against the insured. Defences of the insurer are that the insured failed to pay the insurance premiums on time, or that the insured breached some other collateral "obligation" arising from the internal relationship between the insured and insurer. The most important example of this is found in cases where the insurer claims that the victim increased considerably the risk of an accident by driving under the influence of alcohol or not keeping the car in safe condition for driving. Finally, since 1965 the insurer is also liable for the damage caused by unauthorised drivers of vehicles for which their keeper is not liable under § 7 III of the Road Traffic Act. This is because the insurance covers the respective driver of the insured whether he may be authorised by the keeper or not. As a result of all these statutory provisions, the victim's protection under the compulsory insurance scheme is almost absolute. This can be understood only if one acknowledges that this comprehensive insurance coverage serves mainly a social purpose. This is to protect the injured but at the same time to spread the risk of this immensely useful but also highly dangerous activity to the whole community of those carrying out the activity.

The general rule as to statutory insurance schemes is that the insurer's liability to the victim is limited to the amounts, if any, that the victim cannot recover from other sources—notably the social security system (§ 158c IV VVG, Insurance Contracts Act). It should be noted however that this rule does not generally apply in the context of car insurance. (§ 3 Nr. 6 of the Obligatory Insurance Act.) The insurer's liability is not excluded by the fact that the injured is entitled under a social security system. In these cases the victim's medical expenses and even lost earnings are met by the appropriate social sickness insurance or social accident insurance. Given the dominant role in the compensation system played by the various social security schemes, the insurance companies tend to be brought into the picture at a later phase when the social insurance carrier wishes to be subrogated to the compensation claims of the insured. (The victim's claim is assigned by operation of law to the social security carrier, § 116 I SGB X.) The subsidiary liability of the car insurer is, in turn, subject to an exception where the insured breached one of the collateral "obligations" (Obliegenheiten) owed to the insurer, the insurer is then relieved from his liability to the victim. (See Greger op. cit. Anh II no. 99–175. A brief description in English of these complicated subrogation agreements can be found in Pfennigstorf's account of German law quoted in the Further Reading above.) Needless to say, an insurer who has paid the victim or his social security carrier may, in his turn, seek reimbursement from the insured person in accordance with the relative insurance laws and will be entitled to do so under § 3 Nr. 9 S. 2 of the Obligatory Insurance Act if the insured breached an obligation owed to the insurer. It should not be overlooked, however, that the insurer's claim against the insured is in most cases limited by statute to an amount of 10,000 DM (§ 5 III 1 KfzPflVV). (There is no such limit in the case of reimbursement claims by social security carriers. Where the injured is covered by social security legislation and in addition the insurer is not liable under § 3 of the Obligatory Insurance Act, the combined effect of the above rules will be that the insured will be held personally liable to the full extent. This is the case if certain obligations owed by the insured to the insurer are breached. See for details Greger op. cit. Anh II no. 156 ff.)

In practice, as was already alluded to, the insurer will seek reimbursement from the insured in cases where the insured is in some way in breach of the contract of insurance. This will be the case where, for instance, the car is used by an unauthorised or unlicensed driver, or is used for unauthorised racing. The same would be true if the contract was concluded under fraud or misrepresentation or there was a failure to pay agreed premium etc. Thus, as Professor Kötz points out (no. 419), the rules which govern the question whether the insured is protected by the policy acquire the function of determining whether and to what extent the keeper or driver of the car will be held personally liable for the accident. This is remarkable for this was originally the purpose of the rules governing ordinary delict and strict liability.

Finally, the interests of the insured (and, arguably, once again the public at large) were safeguarded by a stringent supervisory control exercised over the one hundred or so insurance companies that are involved in the car insurance field. This regulatory function was by any standard quite stringent and included such things as the control of the standard terms of insurance contracts as well as an effective control on premiums to be charged and the criteria for differentiating between premiums. Needless to say, this last point had been very controversial, critics of the old regime arguing that it prevented effective competition between insurance companies and thus helped in keeping insurance premiums unrealistically high. (For further details on this see Gärtner, Privatversicherungsrecht (1976) 235.) The enactment of the “third generation” Council directive on non-life insurance brought about a major change: control of standard terms by way of authorisation had to be abolished (there is only a post-market abuse control); the same happened with regard to the premiums (they are “controlled” only insofar as they may represent a danger for the financial health of the insurance company). See for details: W.-H. Roth, “Die Vollendung des europäischen Binnenmarktes für Versicherungen”, NJW 1993, 3028.

(c) The salient features of the Road Traffic Act 1952. The leading provision of this enactment is, undeniably, § 7. (The full text of the liability section of the Act is reproduced below, B.4.) § 7 imposes upon the “keeper” or “holder” (Halter des Fahrzeugs) of a “motor vehicle” strict liability for personal injury, death, and property damage resulting from the “operation of a motor car”. These three terms must be examined more closely.

Motor vehicle. This includes, according to § 1 II of the Act, all land vehicles, which are driven by mechanical force and are not attached to railway tracks. § 8, however, excludes from the purview of the Act all slow-moving vehicles, i.e. those whose maximum speed at ground level does not exceed 20 kilometres per hour (12.5 m.p.h.). Given the evidence that we now have that most lethal traffic accidents occur at speeds of under 30 mph, this provision of the statute seems of dubious validity.

Keeper. The liability is primarily imposed on the keeper of the car. The keeper is the person who uses the car at his own expense and who has the power of disposal that goes with such use (see RGZ 127, 174, 175; BGH 29 May 1954, BGHZ 13, 254 etc.). The owner is usually deemed to be, but need not always be, the keeper. Cars driven by the employees of the keeper and causing damage will render him liable under the Act, the defence of bad selection or supervision, provided by § 831 BGB (discussed in chapter 3, section 3 A.1), not being available in this case. A person using a car on a short-term hire agreement will, usually, not be treated as its keeper (see BGH 23 May 1960, BGHZ 32, 331; 37, 306). But in the case of a long-term hiring agreement, the user of the car may become its keeper if he is saddled with all the running costs. (BGH 22 March 1983, BGHZ 87, 133.) If the car is used with the consent of the keeper, or it has been stolen because the keeper's negligence facilitates such a theft, the keeper (along with the user: Benutzer) will remain liable under the Act (§ 7 III). But if the car is used without the keeper's knowledge and consent—by a so-called “joy-rider” (usually a thief)—then that person and not the keeper will be liable under the Act. The danger that could result from this rule to a victim of a car accident (impecuniosity of the “joy-rider” and, hence, inability to meet the victim's claims) has, as we have seen, been removed by the insurance legislation of 1965 which renders the insurer liable. The German statute—unlike those of Austria and Switzerland—also regulates in § 18 the liability of the driver. This, however, is only a prima-facie liability, which the driver can rebut by proving that he was not negligent when driving the car. In practice this exculpatory proof is very difficult to adduce, the courts imposing on drivers a very high standard of care indeed, and thus rendering the driver jointly liable with the keeper of the vehicle. When this is so, § 17 is brought into operation and the extent of the compensation to be paid as between keeper and driver will be determined in accordance with the usual rules of contributory fault (§ 254 BGB).

Damage caused in the course of the operation (running) of the car (beim Betrieb des Fahrzeuges). This is the last positive requirement for strict liability to be imposed on the keeper. As already indicated, this term has given rise to a very rich case-law which is marked by the courts' desire to extend the protection of the victims of traffic accidents. (Though, once again, their value judgments are often couched in causative language. See, for example, BGH NJW 1972, 1808.) Naturally, the term “in operation” includes the typical way harm is caused, namely through collisions with moving or even immovable objects (other cars, cycles, pedestrians, sign posts etc.). But no contact with the car that causes the injury is required; for example a sudden turn of a car which causes a cyclist, who is coming behind it, to swerve, lose his balance, and fall can render its driver liable under the Act. (BGH 10 October 1972, NJW 1973, 44.) A leakage of oil on the road or dropped cargo, which then causes an accident, can also be brought under this heading. An accident is caused by the “operation” of a car even where the car is stationary and not, strictly speaking, “running” on the road. Abandoned stationary vehicles (because the driver is having a rest or because they have broken down) which have caused an accident have thus also been brought under this heading (see, for example BGHZ 29, 163, case 122); though a police car or a motor cycle which was parked in the middle of the road with its lights on to serve as a “signal” that there was an accident ahead, was not included under the term “in operation” (OLG Celle DAR 1973, 183, 187 cited by Kötz/Wagner no. 388). Likewise, not in operation (for the purposes of the statute) is a motorcycle placed on the road with its engine running simply in order to use its headlamp in order to light up the path ahead. (BGH VersR 1961, 369) The case law, in its desire to invoke the strict liability of the Act and afford greater protection to victims has, in fact, gone even further than the above examples may suggest (though these results have not escaped criticism). In one case when a tank smashed a paddock fence thereby enabling a horse to escape into the highway causing an accident, it was held that the accident had occurred in the course of “operating a motor vehicle” (OLG Celle NJW 1965, 1719). In another, more extreme case, the same was held to be so when the car that caused the plaintiff's death was deliberately driven into him in order to facilitate the driver's escape from arrest. But it remains very doubtful that this was the type of “mischief” that prompted the legislator to impose strict liability. A proper application of the scope of the rule theory should have then produced the opposite result. Thus, in other cases a more correct result has been reached by observing the proper purpose of § 7 of the Road Traffic Act. One such case is BGH NJW 1975, 1886, which is reproduced below (case 124), not only because it illustrates the point just made, but also because it shows how casuistic the approach of German courts is in this respect. In that case the engine of a stationary specialised motor vehicle was kept “running” in order to help to discharge its cargo in a silo. One of the questions the court had to decide was whether damage caused during this operation could render the keeper of the vehicle liable under § 7 of the Road Traffic Act. The Supreme Court, overruling the Court of Appeal, held that it could not since, in principle, the statute only applied to “such perils . . . which emanate from the motor vehicle in its capacity of an engine serving transport”. The court continued, “Since our legal system does not know of a general principle of strict liability for operating engines supplying power at work, § 7 of the Road Traffic Act cannot be applied to accidents which occur in consequence of technical processes which cannot any longer be reasonably connected with the character of the engine employed as part of a motor vehicle.”

If the above requirements are satisfied, then the keeper of the vehicle will, usually, be liable to the extent provided by the Act (see §§ 10, 11, and 12) and perhaps, additionally (see § 16 of the Act) in accordance with the general rules of the law of delict (namely § 823 I or II BGB). But the liability under the 1952 Act will be excluded if he, the defendant, succeeds in proving that the accident was caused by an unavoidable event. An “unavoidable event” is defined by § 7 II 2 as “an event that (inter alia) . . . is due to the conduct of the injured party or of a third party (who is not an employee) or of an animal and if both the keeper and the driver of the vehicle have applied that care which is required in the light of the circumstances”. This concept peculiar to the Road Traffic Act is difficult to classify. For on its face it raises fault connotations that cannot be squared with the nature of strict liability. It cannot come as a surprise therefore that the defence has been interpreted in a very strict way, the courts demanding proof of “extreme concentration and circumspection” on the part of the driver (BGH VersR 1962, 164). And, it is made even harder by expressly stating (§ 7 II 1) that an event is not unavoidable if it is due to a defect in the construction of the vehicle or a failure of one of its component parts (e.g. defective axle, brake failure, etc.). Moreover, the courts have assimilated to this “mechanical” failure of the car any “human” failure of its driver so that, for example, the loss of consciousness on the part of the driver, perhaps because of a sudden and unexpected brain haemorrhage, will not count as an “unavoidable event” (BGHZ 23, 90). In practice, therefore, adducing this exculpatory proof is difficult though not necessarily impossible, e.g. unexpected appearance of black ice. (See Kötz/Wagner, no. 389 ff. and references given therein.) At the time of writing, the most recent reform proposal of 24 September 2001 (2. Gesetz zur Änderung schadensersatzrechtlicher Vorschriften) draws the consequences from this and abolishes the concept of Unabwendbarkeit. However, in line with other strict liability statutes, the keeper’s liability will not be absolute and the defendant will be able to raise the defence of force majeure (“höhere Gewalt”). This, however, does not mean that the plaintiff’s overwhelming responsibility cannot be taken account of. His causal contribution to the accident will acquire weight in the context of § 254 BGB (contributory negligence) and, accordingly, his claim can be reduced, in extreme cases to zero. The reform is thus not likely to have a major practical impact—as the proposal readily admits—though it will enhance consistency in the law.

Apart from the above—and the exclusion of the liability of the keeper for damage caused by a “joy-rider”—the Act also contains one more important exceptional case where its application is excluded. This can be found in § 8a which states that the Act does not apply (i) to injury or death caused to any non-paying passenger travelling in the car (and this is taken to include the driver—see BGHZ 37, 311, 318) and (ii) to damage to property carried in the car unless it is carried by a paying passenger on himself. Naturally, in these cases the victim’s claims can be based on the ordinary provisions of the Code (§ 823 I and II BGB). In this respect, therefore, we note a significant difference between German law and French law, since the latter changed its case law in 1968 on the so-called transport bénévole. Otherwise, one should not see a considerable convergence between French and German jurisprudence on such key definitions as the involvement (implication) of the car in the accident in question. And there is hope for further convergence. For the reform proposal (already referred to in the previous paragraph) proposes the abolition of this peculiarity of German law which can only be explained as a historic relic. (See also the recommendations of the 1995 Verkehrsgerichtstag). Thus, it will no longer be material whether the injury occurred while the victim happened to be in- or outside the car.

Finally, as was already alluded to, according to § 9 of the Act, the injured party’s contributory fault will also be taken into account. This can mean that, either this fault will be deemed to be the sole or main cause of the accident, or more likely, the victim’s fault will be considered as a contributing factor to his hurt and the damages awarded to him will be reduced in accordance with § 254 BGB. It is of first importance to observe how the nature of liability under the Road Traffic Act transforms the defence of § 254 BGB. It is not necessary for the defendant to invoke or establish the fault of the other driver or keeper if two or more cars are involved in an accident (§ 17 I of the Act). Decisive is the risk inherent to the respective vehicle in the circumstances (Betriebsgefahr). This means that if two cars collided and both drivers were without fault then each driver will be able to recover 50 per cent of his loss from the other provided that the two cars posed roughly the same degree of danger. It should be noted that this is by no means rare. One must consider that fault needs to be proved by the plaintiff and this will be often difficult. Hence, in most cases an (expensive) expert will be instructed by the parties to reconstruct the accident and often it will remain impossible to ascertain the exact degree of negligence involved on either side. The expert will in effect determine the outcome of the trial either way. If fault is established on either side the respective rate of liability will shift accordingly up to a maximum of 100 per cent where the risk peculiar to the plaintiff’s car is totally outweighed by the defendant’s share of responsibility (for instance because he was grossly negligent). (A detailed account of the jurisprudence is given by Greger, op. cit. § 17 StVG, no. 57–155.)

(d) A comparative epilogue. Despite the fact that over the years a number of loopholes affecting traffic accident victims have been closed, German law on this subject still retains much of its vitality and controversial nature. Many of the criticisms have been voiced in a comparative way and it is appropriate in a book such as this to adopt a similar attitude.

The German approach to traffic accidents via a strict statutory liability is not unique. As already noted, Austria, Greece, the Netherlands, Switzerland, and the Scandinavian countries have all followed the same path and one can find quite similar (though not German-inspired) enactments even in the Common law world (the Saskatchewan Motor Vehicle Insurance Act 1947 being, probably, the best-known example). This way of regulating traffic accidents is markedly different from the French approach through the Code (but see now the 1985 Act at p. 854 below) and the Common law’s persistent tendency to treat traffic accidents as a branch of the law of negligence. But in addition to being different, the German approach was, despite gaps, also pioneering in so far as it introduced strict liability at a very early stage in the life of the motor car. (The Scandinavian countries took a similar approach at about the same time.) Yet, even allowing for the progressive closing of the gaps of the original enactment and recognising as undeniable the extension of the protection given to car accident victims, German law still remains, in some respects at least, less wide and less generous to victims than some of the more contemporary European systems. Two of its main weaknesses will be discussed below while a third—the extreme complexity of the compensation system—will be ignored since this accusation can also be levied against the English and French systems.

Subject to the reform proviso explained above the first weakness of German law is the exclusion from the Traffic Act of injuries suffered by non-paying passengers. True, the position of the gratuitous passenger may not be as bad as it can be in some US jurisdictions where his recovery will depend on proof of gross negligence on the part of the driver; but it does remain unjustifiable given modern insurance practice. By contrast, in this area the most conceptually antiquated French system managed to break new ground when in the late sixties it decided to extend the strict liability of Article 1384 CC to such cases. The older arguments invoked against such an extension (consent of the victim; impropriety of suing one's "benefactor" without at least proving some fault on his part), advanced in all systems, have been increasingly recognized for what they are—fictions, appropriate to an era when third-party liability insurance was not compulsory, but objectionable relics now that modern insurance practices have transformed this part of the law. Old practices, however, die hard, especially when the insurance lobby wishes to retain them.

Insurance arguments also point to another weakness of the German system; the decision to reduce (and in extreme cases even eliminate) the victim's damages because of his own contributory fault. The abolition by the courts of this defence is impossible in German law given the express statutory provisions of the main Act; but even the desire to do this has often been lacking. For proposals for reform have always been met with moralistic arguments that any such move would not only increase the number of accidents but it would also sap tort law of much of its moral content. Empirical evidence, however, has shown that the first objection at least is not convincing. Many would thus be prepared to treat the legalistic arguments in favour of retaining the defence of contributory fault as a smoke-screen concealing the vested interests of certain members of the legal profession who vehemently oppose the abolition of this lucrative source of revenue. Tort law is thus increasingly seen in the area of law accidents as little more than a "forensic lottery" (the title of a pioneering monograph by Professor Isson). Tort litigation (especially in France and in Common law jurisdictions) has cluttered the overburdened courts even further. And tort law has itself been forced to encourage the growth of fictions (e.g. the tendency to discover negligence in cases of unfortunate but statistically inevitable inattentions) in order to avoid the harshness of its rules. Here, again, French law has proved its flexibility and given a lead by recently advocating the abandonment of the defence of contributory fault. True, the pioneering decision of the Second Chamber of the Court of Cassation was rendered in a car accident case based on Article 1384 CC; and the problem now exercising the French courts is whether it should be limited (as Professor Viney has argued in Dalloz Chronique 1982, 201) to cases where insurance is obligatory or, at least, widely prevalent. That it should is not seriously disputed though how this can be achieved, given the wide wording of Article 1384 CC ("One is responsible for the damage caused by the things in one's care"), is another difficult matter (see Durry, 1983 Rev. trim. dr. civ., 752). But whatever the difficulties of delimitation, the fact remains that the French experiment (which has still to receive the blessing of the plenum of the Court of Cassation) has given an interesting lead and has generated legal literature which can be consulted with profit even by the non-comparatively minded Common lawyer. (See now the 1985 Act reproduced below at p. 850.)

This brings us to the next point that at least American students of the modern civil law should bear in mind. The study of the European systems (including the English), fruitful as it may be, must always be undertaken bearing in mind some essential differences in the legal background. Thus it must be remembered that in Europe (including England) civil action claims arising from car accidents are not tried by juries. Likewise, the American style contingent fee system for legal remuneration is banned, and most importantly, a highly developed social welfare system plays an important part in the overall compensation of car accident victims. All these factors can help to explain the lower levels of awards and other differences in the substantive law. Finally, though Germany (like the USA) is a Federal State, tort law (and hence, traffic accident law) is the same in all the States of the Federation. Thus, one does not find in Germany the regional variations that the American (or Canadian) lawyer has come to accept in his own system.

This comparative epilogue should, perhaps, end by reminding the reader that, once again, the study of the subject can be greatly enhanced by an interdisciplinary approach. The contact with insurance, in particular, must never be forgotten; and it could provide the “unifying link” in any comparative study that sought to argue that legal borrowing is possible even in an area where historical and conceptual differences might at first sight seem to discourage it.

(iv) *Environmental liability*¹

Further reading

A. Texts of German Environmental Laws: Klopfer, Umweltschutz, Textsammlung des Umweltrrechts der Bundesrepublik Deutschland (looseleaf collection of virtually all German environmental laws); B. Books: Landsberg and Lülling, Umwelthaftungsrecht—Kommentar (1991) (the first and best commentary on the ELA co-written by one of the drafters of the ELA); Salje, Umwelthaftungsgesetz—Kommentar (1993); Schmidt-Salzer, Kommentar zum Umwelthaftungsrecht (1992); Schmitt, Haftungs- und Versicherungsfragen bei Umweltrisiken (1990); C. Articles: Diederichsen, “Die Haftung für Umweltschäden in Deutschland” Produkthaftpflicht international (PHI 5/92) (Sept. 1992); Hager, “Europäisches Umwelthaftungsrecht”, ZEuP 1997, 9; W. Hoffman, “Germany’s New Environmental Liability Act: Strict Liability for Facilities Causing Pollution”, 28 Neth. Int’l L. Rev. 27–41 (1991) (a fully annotated text providing the basis for this note); W. Hoffman, “Environmental Liability and its Insurance in Germany”, 43 Fed’n of Ins. & Corp. Couns. Q. 147–65 (1993); Michalski, “Das Umwelthaftungsgesetz”, Jura 1995, 617; Nicklisch, “Umweltschutz und Haftungsrisiken”, VersR 1991, 1093; Salje, “Die Entscheidungspraxis zum UmweltHG”, VersR 1998, 797; Wagner, “Die Aufgaben des Haftungsrechts—eine Untersuchung am Beispiel der Umwelthaftungsrechts-Reform”, JZ 1991, 175.

1. Environmental Liability under German Law Prior to 1991

Environmental liability in the Federal Republic of Germany has been the subject of many provisions widely dispersed throughout public and private law. Numerous public law provisions prohibit specific polluting activities, and various civil liability laws require polluters to compensate for losses caused by pollution. See Kloepfer, Umweltschutz (collecting texts from over 100 separate pieces of German legislation regulating and providing liability for activities harmful to the environment).

¹ Subject to some updating, this section draws heavily on a note prepared for the third edition of this book by William C. Hoffman, International Legal Counsel, Cologne Reinsurance Co., Cologne, Germany. We are grateful to Mr Hoffman for his assistance in this matter.

Thus, German environmental law in force prior to 1991 consists of a patchwork of various laws, each having a relatively narrow scope of application. Many individual federal laws regulate single activities, such as construction, mining, railroads, streets, hunting, hotels, x-rays, and the removal of animal bodies, to name only a few. Each law contains restrictions deemed appropriate to curb pollution with respect to the particular activity. As a result, approximately 30 separate federal laws regulate water pollution arising from different sources and activities.

As will be discussed below, the ELA is an attempt to provide a broader and more comprehensive liability scheme supplementing the numerous pre-existing laws. An understanding of the ELA therefore requires a review of the most significant pre-existing laws, including: state police power, § 906 BGB, and special laws providing strict liability for damage caused by water pollution or by certain inherently dangerous facilities.

Police Power to Prevent Pollution

The several states (Länder) of the Federal Republic have police power to regulate directly conduct causing pollution, including conduct that threatens to pollute. Liability is strict, and force majeure generally is not a defence; in many cases, no proof of causation is required at all. The police power is, however, generally preventative only, and permits State and local authorities only to issue orders enjoining future pollution but not to order the clean-up of past pollution or to order payment of police-response costs. See Schmitt, Haftungs- und Versicherungsfragen at 50–3, 58.

In short, while public liability for police-response costs does not exist per se, in some cases authorities can, in effect, order “clean-up” operations by reference to a future threat to public health. However, the police power is not a source of tort law, and does not provide for civil damages as compensation for injury to persons or property. For a damages remedy, the claimant must sue under the various liability laws.

§ 906 BGB and the “Common Law” of delict

A claim for nuisance arises under §§ 906, 1004 BGB. Liability for nuisance is strict. The action will lie where one landowner infringes the right of another to make use of the land. Generally, however, the offending neighbour is liable only for emissions that substantially deprive the claimant of use of the land. According to § 906 I BGB the landowner cannot prevent emissions of “unweighable materials” (unwägbare Stoffe), such as airborne substances, vibration, noise, or similar emissions from another plot that have a negligible impact only on the use of the land (unwesentlich beeinträchtigt). If the emissions exceed levels customary for the area, and it is also economically reasonable to require the offending landowner to reduce the emissions (§ 906 II 1 BGB), the plaintiff will be granted an injunction (§ 1004 BGB). If on the other hand it is not reasonable to demand that the emissions are reduced, the landowner is required to tolerate the interference under § 906 II 1 BGB. However, in this case § 906 II 2 BGB entitles the land-owner to compensation for the economic consequences of the interference. In the case of certain plants and facilities that are subject to the Bundesimmissionsschutzgesetz (BImSchG) § 14 BImSchG is lex specialis. Those rules are very similar. If the landowner is not allowed to prevent the emission he will be entitled to compensation.

Thus, § 906 BGB affords protection to private use interests in land and does not extend to other kinds of injuries that pollution can cause. Personal injury or damage to personal property cannot give rise to a claim under § 906 BGB. For example, in the “Smelting Oven” (Kupolofen) case from 1985, BGHZ 92, 143, it was held that an industrial landowner was not liable under § 906 for damage which airborne ashes, emitted by its facility, caused to the paint of cars parked on neighbouring industrial property. A further problem is that proving the elements of causation can be exceedingly difficult in environmental cases. § 906 BGB generally defines the unlawfulness of emissions. It acquires thus importance also in the context of claims based directly on § 823 I BGB, which is mainly relied on in claims for personal injury. However, plaintiffs in environmental cases benefit from a (to some extent) reversed burden of proof. For, in analogy to the product liability jurisprudence, the BGH reverses the burden of proof in claims based on § 906 BGB. (See BGHZ 92, 143, 146–147; JZ 1998, 358–359.) It is thus for the defendant to prove that the emissions are within the limits imposed by law and/or in that particular area customary. If that is not the case, the operator of the facility must further establish that he has undertaken all reasonable or economically sustainable precautions to prevent any damage that the emissions may cause. The rationale of reversing the burden of proof is clear. (It must be remembered that German law does not normally provide for procedures of pre-trial disclosure.) Only the company running the facility is able to control the emissions and to give evidence whether these have been such that the safety standards have not been violated. If the defendant establishes that the emissions are below certain levels prescribed by statutory instruments, then the plaintiff must prove that the defendant has not done enough in the special circumstances of the case. A third limitation results from the negative criterion that the emissions are customary in the respective area. This, potentially, inhibits the imposition of pro-active measures that increase the safety of the facility. It should be further noted that the main impetus for basing claims in personal injury cases on the general law of delict was § 847 BGB, namely the availability of damages for pain and suffering, which, if the already discussed reform proposal becomes reality, will no longer be the case. Such damages will then be recoverable under the special strict liability statute.

Increasingly, the German legislature responded to the inherent limitations of § 906 BGB and similar provisions by enacting a number of pollution laws of special scope.

Water Resources Act

By far the most significant civil environmental liability act in force prior to 1991 is the Water Resources Act of 1957 (WRA) (Wasserhaushaltsgesetz). § 22 WRA imposes strict liability for bodily injury, property damage and—unlike §§ 906 or 823 BGB—pure economic loss resulting from any change in the physical, chemical, or biological composition of a water source. Liability for pure economic loss may arise under the WRA where, for example, water contamination causes a loss of income to a fisherman or to another business dependent on the water source.

§ 22 I WRA provides for non-facility liability and § 22 II for facility liability. The facilities caught by the Act are those which process or store materials that typically pose a danger of pollution to water. This was denied for instance (BGH NJW 1993, 2029; see, also, case 95) in the case of a facility that stored plastic materials to be used in the assembly of caravans. It burned down and dangerous substances escaped together with the water used to extinguish the fire. The material stored in the warehouse did not represent a typical danger against which § 22 II WHG afforded protection. As was explained by way of introduction (section 5(b)(iii)) the main control device of strict liability is the concept of legal cause. It focuses on the specific danger which was meant to be prevented by imposing strict liability, and the present case is a further example of this. Multiple tortfeasors are jointly and severally liable. Further, in 1971 the BGH construed the WRA to give rise to a presumption of causation. If the polluting substance is “inherently suited” (geeignet) to cause the harm suffered, then causation may be presumed; BGHZ 57, 257, 264. This presumption applies, however, only if it not clear which of several facilities caused the damages. But in relation to a single facility the claimant bears the full burden of proving causation.

Other Facility Liability

Other strict liability laws enacted since the WRA have also used the “facility liability” approach. These laws apply only to certain types of facilities deemed inherently dangerous. Usually, the types or categories of facilities are listed in an appendix to the law. Under the most significant of these laws, strict liability exists for injury or damage arising from mining facilities (Bundesberggesetz), from nuclear reactors (Atomgesetz), from electricity plants and other energy production facilities (Haftpflichtgesetz), and from certain other facilities that release emissions harmful to the environment (BImSchG).

2. The Environmental Liability Act

As shown, the state of German environmental law in force prior to 1991 was a patchwork of numerous individual provisions enacted piecemeal and each having a relatively narrow objective. This state of the law gave rise to a need for a broader and more comprehensive statute. It will be remembered in particular that the WHG of 1957 covers only damage caused through polluting water.

On 1 November 1986, the Rhine was severely polluted following a fire at a large chemical plant in Schweizerhalle, Switzerland. Water that had been used for extinguishing the fire drained into the river, washing highly toxic substances released during the fire into the environment. As a result, from Basel, Switzerland to Rotterdam in the Netherlands, the Rhine became extremely contaminated and virtually all fish and much other wildlife were destroyed. This event prompted the German government to announce, in 1987, that a strict liability law was desired, not only for water damage but also for damage caused by air and soil pollution.

The act that emerged after a hotly debated legislative process is the Environmental Liability Act of 1990 (Gesetz über die Umwelthaftung). This was adopted in spite of harsh criticism by the industry which had feared disadvantages in international competition. However, none of these fears seem to have actually materialized. This may be partly due to the balanced approach adopted by the ELA. Thus, it does not impose liability for abstract “ecological” damage to the environment. For liability to arise, a protected interest (property, life or health) of a particular individual must be violated through the ecological mediums of air and soil (§ 16). The ELA contains a mixture of public, criminal and administrative law but it is also a liability law providing a civil damages remedy for harm caused by pollution of air, soil or water. As such, the ELA has a broader scope than prior liability laws but it does not pre-empt or supersede any of the prior laws. Rather, the ELA coexists with and complements them, although some overlap is apparent.

Nature, Scope and Elements of Liability Under the ELA

The ELA imposes strict liability of up to DM 160 million for bodily injury and DM 160 million for property damage caused by any one environmental impact on air, soil or water. Liable persons are the “operators” (Inhaber) of certain facilities listed in Appendix 1 of the Act. Thus, facility operators may be liable for a total of up to DM 320 million per impact, per facility.

Unlike the WRA, however, the ELA does not provide for recovery of damages for pure financial loss or non-material harm. A claimant seeking compensation for pure financial loss must therefore establish liability under other provisions permitting recovery for such losses, such as the WRA (permitting recovery of pure financial loss caused by water pollution) or § 847 BGB (damages for pain and suffering; pending reform).

The nature and scope of liability under the ELA in general are set out in § 1 of the Act, which provides: “If anyone suffers death, personal injury, or property damage due to an environmental impact emitted from one of the facilities named in Appendix 1, then the operator of the facility shall be liable to the injured person for the damages caused thereby.” Liability is “strict” under § 1 ELA. Polluters are liable for damage caused by their pollution regardless of whether the environmental impact was intended or negligent, known or unknown, occurred within a short span of a few minutes or over a prolonged period of many years. Causation alone, if proved under the ELA’s provisions discussed below, provides the basis of liability. Further, the ELA as enacted contains no development risk exclusion, so that it is no defence against liability to assert that the state of scientific or technical knowledge at the time did not permit the defendant to know of the potential harm to the environment. Moreover, strict liability can attach under the ELA for amounts of pollution that are authorised or tolerated by existing regulatory laws, if the claimant can establish the element of causation.

Liability seems to be joint and several among multiple defendants under the ELA but the issue is controversial. A draft bill containing a pro rata apportionment among multiple defendants was blocked by the Upper House in October 1990, and one of the provisions that were unacceptable to the Upper House was the pro rata provision. That provision was deleted from the ELA as enacted. The better view now seems to be that multiple ELA defendants are subject to general tort principles, including joint and several liability under § 840 BGB. This means that any one of several defendants held to be jointly liable may be liable for the entire amount given by the judgment (regardless of what percentage of the damage that particular defendant might have caused in fact). However, recently the OLG Düsseldorf adopted a different approach. (See its judgment of 19 June 1998, JZ 1999, 684.) In that case, the plaintiff proved that the defendant’s emissions caused damage to the paint of his adjoining house and claimed the cost of repainting it. The defendant objected that part of the damage resulted out of the “general pollution” of the air in that particular neighbourhood. The court followed this and apportioned liability, allocating to the defendant a share of 50%. Under § 840 BGB this would not be the case. If other polluters contributed to the damage, then the defendant remains liable in full and may seek contribution from the other polluters. It is clear that identifying the other polluters and holding them responsible would not have been easy in the case at hand. So, on final analysis, the question is who bears the risk of “general air pollution”. If one approaches the problem from general principle it should clearly be on the defendant (cf. Salje JZ 1999, 685 ff.). In tort law it suffices that the defendant contributed to the damage. Furthermore, the operator of the facility alone is able to control the risk of causing the damage by taking protective measure and avoiding that the overall pollution reaches critical levels. It is therefore somewhat puzzling that the court departed from this and in effect seems to have restored the pro rate apportionment principle that had been rejected by Parliament (even though it limited the ruling to the specific case).

Several exclusions from liability delimit the scope of the ELA. § 4 ELA excludes liability for damage caused by force majeure (höhere Gewalt). Further, § 5 ELA excludes liability for property damage that is “only insubstantial” or that the impairment is “reasonable according to the local conditions” if the facility was “operated properly”, i.e., according to all applicable regulations and no interruption of operations has occurred.

In order to establish liability under the ELA, a claimant must prove three elements: (1) that the defendant operates a facility named in Appendix 1; (2) that an environmental impact was emitted from the defendant’s facility; and (3) that this environmental impact caused the damage complained of. The following paragraphs examine each of these elements briefly.

Facility

The ELA applies only to a “facility” as defined in its provisions. Because the ELA imposes liability on a “per impact, per facility” basis, the definition of “facility” would play an important role, for example, in determining whether the ELA defendant might be subject to multiple limits of liability, e.g., where more than one “facility” may be said to have given rise to an “environmental impact”.

§ 3 II ELA defines “facility” (Anlage) to mean a “permanent structure such as a place of business or warehouse”. The same provision states that “facility” also includes any “machines, instruments, vehicles and other mobile technical structures”, and “outbuildings” which “stand in a spatial or technical relation to a facility or part thereof and could be significant for the occurrence of an environmental impact”. Thus, the existence of a “facility” seems to be tied to a structure, vehicle, or instrument of some kind. Under § 2 ELA, uncompleted or unfinished facilities and finished facilities no longer in use are included in the definition.

Appendix 1 of the ELA contains a list of 96 specific types of facilities. These are grouped into ten general categories of facilities engaged in the processing, manufacture, or handling of certain materials and include industries engaged in:

- (1) mining, energy and heat production;
- (2) the manufacture of products from stone, earth, glass, ceramic, and other construction materials;
- (3) the processing and manufacture of steel, iron, and other metals;
- (4) the manufacture of chemical, pharmaceutical, or petroleum products or their further processing;
- (5) treatment with organic materials and the manufacture of artificial materials;
- (6) the processing of wood and wood pulp;
- (7) the production of food, feed, and agricultural products;
- (8) the treatment of waste;
- (9) the storage and disposal of certain materials; and
- (10) other facilities, including paint, printing ink, asphalt, etc. production.

This list of facilities is more extensive than prior facilities appendices, and includes certain toxic waste disposal and burning facilities not previously subject to major environmental legislation.

Environmental Impact

§ 3 I ELA defines “environmental impact” (Umwelteinwirkung) to mean an impact from “material, vibration, noise, pressure, rays, gasses, steam, heat, or other phenomena which are emitted into soil, air, or water”. Thus, the ELA applies to all emissions already specifically prohibited by § 906 BGB, and also overlaps with the remedy for bodily injury and property damage caused by water pollution under the WRA. Strict liability for bodily injury and property damage resulting from impacts on soil and air is, however, new under the ELA.

Causation

The element of causation presents the core problem of proof under the ELA. Causation can present nearly insurmountable difficulties in cases of gradual pollution arising from sources located far away, such as chemical emissions from a distant smokestack, toxic waste seeping into a water source, etc. The drafters of the ELA drew on the experiences from the WRA and attempted to compensate for this difficulty with a presumption of causation.

At the time of its passage through the legislature, the ELA’s most controversial provisions were those located in § 6 ELA. § 6 I ELA provides that the element of causation will be presumed upon a prima facie showing that the particular facility is “inherently suited” (geeignet) to cause the damage. Thus, the drafters of the ELA codified the judge-made presumption of causation that had its origins under the WRA in the 1971 decision, cited supra. This presumption reverses the burden of proof: it eases the claimant’s evidentiary burden by shifting to the defendant the task of showing an absence of causation. However, unlike its predecessor under the WRA, the presumption of causation under § 6 I ELA applies equally in cases against single facilities. Once the presumption applies, the defendant may be held liable unless the presumption can be precluded or rebutted.

§§ 6 II, III and IV ELA provide that the presumption of causation set out in § 6 I is precluded from arising, and has therefore no application, if the defendant can show that his facility was “properly operated”. “Proper operation” means that the facility fulfilled all “special operational duties” and that no disruption of operations occurred. “Special operational duties” refers to all applicable administrative regulatory duties aimed at preventing pollution. In a sub-presumption aiding the defence, the ELA provides that compliance with a “special operational duty” may be presumed for purposes of excluding the presumption of § 6 I. If (1) documented checks are required by law and (2) such checks do not allow for an inference of a violation, then compliance with the applicable laws will be presumed.

A defendant may rebut the presumption of causation under § 6 I by using the provisions of § 7 ELA. In cases of single or multiple facilities inherently suited to cause the claimant’s damage, the presumption of causation is rebutted if another “circumstance” (Umstand) also appears “inherently suited” to be the cause.

Substantively, perhaps the most far-reaching effect of the ELA’s presumption of causation occurs in connection with joint and several liability. In cases against multiple defendants, the presumption may form the basis of liability as against all defendants who fail to exclude or rebut it.

It must be noted, however, that neither §§ 6 II–IV ELA nor § 7 ELA operates as an absolute defence. In other words, even if a defendant successfully precludes § 6 I’s presumption of causation from arising under §§ 6 II–IV, or rebuts it under § 7, this alone will not necessarily relieve a defendant of liability. Rather, the effect of these provisions is merely procedural; the claimant thereby loses the benefit of the reversed burden of proof. In such a case, the claimant bears the full evidentiary burden on the element of causation which, if met, nevertheless establishes liability.

Perhaps the drafters of the ELA did not foresee that § 7 ELA may turn out to be the exception that swallows the rule. The broader the courts construe the language “inherently suited” in § 6 ELA, the easier it will be for a defendant to point to facts giving rise to a “circumstance” to rebut the presumption under § 7. With a little imagination, a clever defendant might easily point to facts raising an issue as to whether another “circumstance” satisfies a broadly construed “inherent suitedness” test. Thus, § 6 I’s presumption, together with § 7’s rebuttal thereof, could operate to blunt the teeth of the ELA. But these fears have not been confirmed, for the BGH has taken a clear, plaintiff-orientated stance on this matter and has interpreted these exceptions narrowly. However, as the language “multiple facilities” in § 7 makes clear, in no case can another defendant facility be the other “circumstance” justifying the exclusion. Thus, § 7 prevents multiple defendants from using each other to deflect use of that presumption.

It comes as no surprise then that the first BGH decision on liability under ELA deals almost exclusively with this key issue of ecological liability: causation and burden of proof. (BGH, 17 June 1997, NJW 1997, 2748 = JZ 1998, 358, with an approving note by Hager). In this case the plaintiff suffered from headache, insomnia and was feeling unwell for several years. She sued the operator of two varnishing facilities which were located at a distance of three kilometres. The difficulty in this case was that the defendant could prove that, overall, it had respected the limits imposed by statutes on toxic emissions. Accordingly, the claim failed in the lower courts. But the BGH reversed those decisions and remitted the case for re-hearing. The Court of Appeal had not decided whether the emissions were suited to cause the injury and thus whether the presumption of causation (§ 6 I ELA) was raised. For it had stated that in any case the presumption would be rebutted. This provoked harsh criticism from the BGH.

First, as to § 6 II, the court applied a strict approach and required that the judge needed to establish specifically and in detail that the level imposed by law for the respective emissions was respected and that thus the plant was “properly operated”. In this context the judge had also to take account of the evidence offered by the plaintiff that the plant was not run properly (this proof is presumably easier to adduce than to establish causation itself).

Secondly, as to § 7, the requirements were also considerably toughened. It does not suffice to refer in a general manner to circumstances that might constitute an alternative (to the emissions of the defendant’s facility) cause of the injuries. On the contrary, the alternative cause must be identified and scrutinised specifically before the exception can apply. Again, the proof offered by the plaintiff may be relevant and indeed essential in this context (the lower courts had simply ignored it). (The judgment arrives at remarkably similar distinctions in the context of § 823 I BGB; however, the relevance of this is limited as soon as damages for pain and suffering will become more broadly available).

Right to Disclosure

In a highly unusual provision for German law, the ELA confers on claimants and defendants rights to obtain information pertinent to ELA claims. Generally, German civil procedure does not provide for party-initiated fact gathering. See John H Langbein, "The German Advantage in Civil Procedure", 52 Univ. of Chi. L. Rev. 823, 824 (1985). There is a substantive-law-based right to disclosure; but this remedy is a limited one. It will help the plaintiff to calculate the damages, for instance in the field of intellectual property law, where the holder of the infringed right may calculate damages on the basis of the profits made by the defendant.) §§ 8 and 9 ELA grant claimants a right to seek disclosures from facility operators and from administrative agencies. § 10 ELA grants defendant facility operators a similar right. In further provisions, these rights are made subject to other laws, more firmly imbedded in German legal tradition, providing for secrecy. See §§ 8 II, 9, and 10 II ELA.

Mandatory Insurance of ELA Appendix 2 Facilities

§ 19 ELA imposes a provision-of-coverage requirement for the facilities named in Appendix 2 of the Act. The operators of those facilities must ensure that compensation will be provided for losses caused by an environmental impact issuing from such a facility. This § 19 ELA coverage may take the form of (1) a liability insurance provided by an insurance company licensed to do business in Germany; (2) an indemnity agreement with the federal government or a state; or (3) an indemnity agreement with certain credit institutions if the security provided is comparable to an insurance coverage.

The mandatory insurance requirement of § 19 ELA will not come into effect until the Ministry of Justice issues a decree setting the terms of the insurance. The decree has not been issued as of 1 October 1993. When issued, it will establish, for example, what coverage limits will be required. If the recently issued genetic damage insurance regulation is any indication—and some believe that it is—the mandatory minimum amount of coverage might be between 10 million and 30 million DM. On the other hand, one cannot dismiss summarily the view that the special hazards posed by ELA Appendix 2 facilities may prompt the Ministry of Justice to require some higher amount of coverage, particularly since the ELA itself imposes a potentially far greater amount of liability.

The drafters of the decree will also resolve issues arising from the nature of mandatory insurance of ELA Appendix 2 facilities. For example, § 19 I ELA provides in part: "If a facility that is no longer in operation presents a special hazard, the competent public agency may order the person who operated the facility at the time of the ceasing of operations to provide for coverage for a period not to exceed ten years." Based on this provision, the Ministry of Justice could require facility operators to purchase an "extended reporting period" of up to ten years for claims based on damage caused by a facility's operations but discovered after operations cease.

Competence of the Court and Extraterritoriality

Generally, the proper German court for a claim in tort is the forum delicti commissi. See Code of Civil Procedure (Zivilprozeßordnung) § 32 (the proper court is the court of the district "in which the tort was committed").

This rule does not always designate a single forum in environmental cases because damage occurring in one forum may be due to pollution emitted in another. As with other multi-jurisdictional torts, the locus delicti (or "place where the tort occurs") can be either the place of the emission or the place where the claimant's damage is located. A claimant in a border-straddling case therefore may choose the more favourable of two proper courts.

However, the ELA abolished the claimant's choice of forum in domestic cases. The ELA amended the Code of Civil Procedure to provide that an ELA action must be brought in the district court where the facility emitting the pollution is located (§ 32a ZPO). If, however, the facility emitting the pollution is located beyond German borders, then this rule does not apply. Thus, in cases of emissions from abroad causing damage in Germany, the general procedural rule of claimant's choice of forum applies. (Note that Article 5 Nr. 3 of the Brussels Convention or Article 5 Nr. 3 of the Lugano Convention will have to be applied with priority.)

3. Liability for Genetically Modified Products

In 1990 the German Parliament also passed the Genetic Engineering Act (Gentechnikgesetz, GenTG); (BGBl 1990 I. 1080). This statute mainly regulates the conditions for the licensing of facilities that produce or research genetically modified products. But it also provides for a strict liability regime of such facilities in § 32 GenTG. Like the ELA the statute does not exclude liability for so called "development risks", i.e. risks that could not have been foreseen at the time when the product was put into circulation. Similarly, it is required that physical damage to one of the protected interests (life, health, property) has occurred (§ 32 VII GenTG). According to § 34 I GenTG if the damage was caused by a genetically modified product it is presumed that the damage was caused by the specific alteration of the genetic structure of that product. This presumption is displaced (§ 34 II GenTG) if the damage is likely to have been caused by some other property of the product. The legislator adopted here a far more cautious approach than under the ELA. It may be perhaps due to this restrictive approach that so far there seems to be only one reported case in which a plaintiff sought to establish liability under this provision. In LG Stuttgart NJW 1997, 1860 a farmer claimed the cost of effectuating (precautionary) examinations of the harmful effects of the genetically modified crop growing on the adjoining plot, which was administered by a polytechnic for research purposes. His claim failed as he could not establish that he actually suffered damage.

4. Conclusion

Comparatively speaking, Germany is a leader in matters of environmental liability legislation in Europe. Indeed, German law has provided for strict liability for a wide variety of environmentally-related damage since the WRA entered into force in 1960. Thus, German strict environmental liability pre-dates by many years the experience of the United Kingdom under the Environmental Protection Act 1990 and of the United States under the Comprehensive Environmental Restoration, Compensation and Liability Act of 1980 (CERCLA).

However, it must be noted that the patchwork of German environmental laws seems to result in a less comprehensive body of law than, say, in the United States, where civil liability, police power to order clean up, and enforcement provisions are combined in CERCLA. In Germany, civil liability for harm caused by pollution arises under entirely separate laws than does the power to order clean up. Whether or not this patchwork approach makes a substantial difference in the effectiveness of German law to regulate and deter pollution, as well as to compensate for pollution-related harm, is a far more difficult question, the answer to which will have to be based in part on future experience under the ELA.

(v) The products' liability regime (including the Pharmaceutical Products Act)

The Products Liability Act (Produkthaftungsgesetz) of 15 December 1989 follows in its structure largely the European Community's Directive of 25 July 1985 to which it aimed to give effect. Products to which it applies includes all moveables, excluding agricultural produce and animals. These products must, further be defective in the sense that they lack the security one is entitled to expect from them. The definition of defect is thus stricter than that found in § 434 BGB of the law of sales which defines the defect by reference to the reduced value or utility of the sold object. This liability envisaged by the statute falls primarily on the manufacturer (Hersteller): (§ 4). If more than one is implicated, their liability is in solidum (gesamtschuldnerisch: § 5). Clearly manufacturers of finished products, component parts, and new materials are subject to the new regime (§ 4 I of the 1989 Act reflecting Article 3(1) of the Directive). But the Directive (Article 3(1)) and the 1989 Act (§ 4 I) resolves an ambiguity that existed in German law prior to 1989 by subjecting anyone "who presents himself as the producer by affixing to a product his name, trade name, or other distinguishing feature". Dealers were also not normally liable for not testing products (BGH NJW 1980, 119), though there was a greater inclination to find dealer-importers liable given the difficulty of enforcing judgments against foreign manufacturers. Immunity, however, seemed the rule rather than the exception (BGH NJW 1987, 1009). Again, the new regime is stricter. § 4 III of the 1989 Act thus follows Article 3 III of the Directive, making the supplier liable under the Act whenever the producer cannot be identified.

The Act covers personal injury and damage to (other) property but not economic loss or the so-called, insidious spreading loss (Weiterfresserschaden). In the case of death, funeral expenses can also be claimed; and, in what is an interesting illustration of claimable ricochet damage, the statute expressly allows dependants to claim their own loss of support. (§ 7 2). But the victim has to carry himself the first DM 1,125 of his damage. The liability is avoided if one of the six possible defences mentioned in §1 of the statute applies; but all kinds of exemption clauses are null and void. § 13 of the statute, following Article 11 of the Directive, provides that an action under the new law will expire ten years after the producer has put the actual product that caused the harm into circulation. This is the absolute outer limit for § 12 I of the Act (again following the Directive: Article 10) provides for a limitation period of three years from the moment when the claimant knew or ought to have known of the damage (pending reform of the BGB: according to the new § 199 BGB the limitation period will start to run from the end of the year when the plaintiff knew or ought to have known).

The new statutory regime, expressly predicated on no fault liability, does not exclude in any way the application of other rules which may be more favourable to the plaintiff. Thus, if his harm is under the above-mentioned deductible of DM 1,125 an action based on the rules of the "ordinary" law may be the only remedy. The same is true if the exact opposite occurs namely, the plaintiff's damages exceed the maxima provided by the statute (or he wishes to claim money for his non-pecuniary harm such as his pain and suffering.) Recourse to the "ordinary" law here means the law of torts for the German courts, unlike their French counterparts, have not allowed an extension of the contractual remedies. But the obstacles that this might create in terms of fault have been considerably lessened by the presumptions of fault or the reversal of the onus of proof, which the German courts have introduced in a number of cases. The continued vitality of the "ordinary" law, described above in chapter two, remains obvious and, indeed, one is struck by the paucity of decisional law ten years after the coming into effect of the said Act. The reader must read the text of the statute (reproduced below at p. 872) in conjunction with what has been said in the earlier chapter.

Another way in which the plaintiff may choose to base his claim is on one of the other, related statutes of strict liability. The Gentechnikgesetz of 20 June 1990 is one (discussed in the previous section (iv)³) at the border line between environmental liability and product liability; the very long (over ninety paragraphs) Law of Pharmaceutical Products (Arzneimittelgesetz of 24 August 1976 (BGBl 1976 I. 2445, modified on 9 August 1994, BGBl 1994. I. 2071) is another. All of these statutes have their own “peculiarities” and complexities but, clearly, they represent too specialised an area of tort law practice to warrant a more detailed consideration in a comparative law textbook. For fuller details one must therefore consult such leading treatises as Deutsch, Arztrecht und Arzneimittelrecht, 2nd ed, (1991). The periodic literature is also large; and has grown as a result of the AIDS contaminated blood cases which made their appearance all over Europe in the mid 1990’s and, inter alia, led most European courts to increase considerably their quantum of damages. (On the AIDS cases see: Durquet-Turek, “La responsabilité du fait des produits en Allemagne. Le problème de sang porteur du virus du SIDA”, Gaz, Pal. 27–29 Sept. 1992, 7. On the case law in general after the coming into effect of the act see: Kullman, “Die Rechtsprechung des BGH zum Produkthaftungsrecht in der Jahren 1994–1995”, NJW 1996, 18. On the effect of the AIDS cases on the level of damages, von Bar, Festschrift Deutsch.

SECTION B. CASES

1. § 831 BGB

Case 95

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 7 OCTOBER 1975
NJW 1976, 46 = JZ 1975, 733

The plaintiff, the Gas–Electricity and Waterworks of the City of K, as holders of the right to draw water for their undertaking, claimed damages in respect of expenses incurred or likely to be incurred in the future as a result of the pollution of the water-table by petroleum waste. The plaintiff alleged that the fourth defendant, a petrochemical enterprise, had engaged the first defendant on the recommendation of the second defendant—an independent expert on damage by mineral oil and de facto manager of the first defendant—to carry and safely to dispose of their oil waste consisting mainly of a mixture of oil and water. In carrying out this assignment, the first defendant had installed ovens and barrels in a gravel-pit filled with refuse situated in an area which had been designated by the government as a protected water-zone for the use of the waterworks. No licence had been obtained, although the first defendant had been given to understand by the competent authorities that it would be forthcoming, if certain conditions were complied with.

On being alerted by an outsider that the oil waste had not been disposed of expertly, the plaintiff caused boreholes to be sunk and excavations to be made which disclosed that the water-table was covered by an extensive body of oil. In the action against the fourth defendant the plaintiff sought to be reimbursed for the expense of drilling observation wells and of collecting and examining samples of water and soil.

The District Court, by a separate judgment, rejected the claim against the fourth defendant while allowing the other actions to proceed. On appeal by the plaintiff, the Court of Appeal of Cologne quashed the judgment of the District Court and referred the case back. A second appeal was unsuccessful for the following

Reasons

I. The Court of Appeal has held that the fourth defendant is liable in tort (§ 823 I BGB), as well as on the ground that the plaintiff had acted on his behalf in his interests and in accordance with his actual or presumed intention (§§ 683, 677, 670 BGB), to pay the expenses claimed by the plaintiff if further evidence to be obtained by the District Court reveals that the first defendant has contaminated the water-table to the plaintiff's detriment by disposing inexpertly of the waste entrusted to him.

1. The plaintiff's pleadings do not support any liability of the fourth defendant according to the provision of § 22 of the Water Preservation Act (WHG) which establishes extensive strict liability for such expenses in the instances enumerated there.

(a) § 22 I WHG cannot serve as a basis of the claim, if for no other reason, because no act of the fourth defendant was objectively capable of allowing the waste produce to seep into the water-table [references]. The fourth defendant has not even envisaged and accepted the possibility that the oil waste might be disposed of in this manner nor were the measures taken by him for the destruction of the waste in fact capable of allowing the waste to seep into the water. The circumstance that by handing the waste over to the first defendant he enabled the latter to dispose of it improperly, contrary to a contractual arrangement, does not suffice to attract liability under § 22 I WHG. This provision was not intended to create such an extensive liability for the unauthorised conduct of third parties . . .

(b) The fourth defendant cannot be held liable under § 22 II WHG because the noxious substances infiltrated into the water-table from the first defendant's installation but not from that of the fourth defendant from which they had already been carried away.

2. Liability for damage caused by the fact that waste materials seeped into the water-table is not, however, confined to the situations enumerated in § 22 WHG. This provision was intended to reinforce the protection against interference with the quality of water by introducing strict liability; in the absence of an express statement to this effect this provision, like any other establishing strict liability, does not preclude claims based on tort or on quasi-contract [acting for another without authorization; references].

The Court of Appeal was also correct when considering this ground of liability that the right of the plaintiff enjoyed by virtue of §§ 46 ff., 200, 203 of the Prussian Water Act was not affected by subsequent legislation [references]. The right to extract water is an absolute right in the meaning of § 823 I to be respected by everybody [reference], capable of being violated by the pollution by noxious substances to the water-table in the area of the intake operated by the plaintiff's waterworks [reference]. The Court of Appeal was right in holding consequently that the fourth defendant must prevent as far as possible any such interferences with the right to extract water by waste products and that if he fails to act in accordance with the care required in daily life he must, inter alia, pay for the necessary measure to avert the danger to the supply of drinking-water by the waterworks as a result of a pollution of the water-table [references].

II. 1. As stated, the producer of such industrial waste which is a source of danger to the environment in the absence of special measures is liable, irrespective of other special rules of conduct and of the legal consequences resulting from their infringement under § 823 I BGB, to take the necessary steps in the execution of the general duty of care to safeguard the public in general [Verkehrssicherungspflicht] derived from § 823 I BGB to avoid that the (potential) danger results in damage to third parties. Just as the producer of goods is subject to this duty in respect of goods introduced into commerce [references] the producer of industrial waste must also seek to avert within the limits of what is practicable any usual dangers emanating from by-products "of negative value". It is irrelevant in this connection that they are not for sale, as is also that their manufacture is allowed. The fact alone determines that the manufacturer has created the source of danger and must render it safe for third parties within the limits of what is possible and can be expected of him. This general principle of the law of tort [reference] has its counterpart, as regards objective imputation, in the maxim which also dominates in public law relating to the environment to the effect that he who causes damage to the environment must also pay for it [references] . . .

2. The Court of Appeal has found, without contravening the law, that the waste containing petroleum constitutes a special danger for the maintenance of the water-table if it is stored or destroyed inexpertly. Given the danger to the environment, especially having regard to the quantity of petroleum waste products produced by the fourth defendant (about 570 tonnes in approximately two months), strict care was required in storing and disposing of it. The Court of Appeal stressed correctly in this connection that a harmless disposal of the waste was technically difficult and therefore demanded a special method and a special installation for destroying it if the danger of inexpert or incomplete destruction was to be avoided; and that at least greater storage capacity and longer storage was necessary with its attendant perils.

3. The Court was right, moreover, in holding that the fourth defendant was not obliged to store, and dispose of, the waste himself, but could delegate this task to an independent enterprise which could not be regarded as its aide in the meaning of § 831 [editor's note: the judgment refers wrongly to § 832] BGB in the absence of a relationship of dependency. In such circumstances, the fourth defendant was, however, bound to see to it that the necessary safety measures were taken properly in order to prevent damage to third parties by the disposal of the oil waste.

(a) Naturally the supervision of a specialized enterprise is limited by the need for a trusting collaboration, and by the independence and the immunity from orders of the agent; it would mean straining excessively the requirements of care in the face of economic and technical reality if the principal were asked to control at every step the manner in which the agent operates. On the other hand, those subject to duties of care to safeguard the public in general are not always released of their responsibility for the sources of danger which they have created if another is equally bound to take safeguarding action by virtue of a contract. Instead they may be obliged, if the circumstances so require—as for instance in an acutely dangerous situation [reference: fireworks] or if serious reasons exist for doubting whether the agent will take sufficient account of the dangers and the need to safeguard against them [reference: Mosel Lock construction]—to control the work by the enterprise entrusted with it or to intervene in case of necessity [reference]. In particular, the duty is not discharged if an enterprise is employed which does not offer a sufficient guarantee that the necessary safety measures will be taken; for in those circumstances the delegation to such an enterprise of the duty to safeguard the public only increases the danger of damages to third parties. In such a case those subject to a duty of care to safeguard the public in general cannot plead that by the interposition of an independent enterprise their power controlling the source of danger has been curtailed. They had the opportunity to select the agent carefully; the more their influence is limited by the independence of the enterprise to which the task is delegated, the more the duty to select the enterprise carefully must be taken seriously. They are liable if the danger materializes, since they themselves brought it about by employing an unreliable enterprise.

(b) The appellant argues that petroleum waste is no more dangerous than the petroleum produced by the fourth defendant. Since the fourth defendant cannot be held liable for damage caused by an inappropriate use of the petroleum after it has been delivered to his customers he cannot be liable either if an enterprise engaging in the destruction of waste employed by him disposes of the waste in an improper manner contrary to a contractual arrangement.

This argument cannot be accepted—at least in this generalization. It need not be decided whether and to what extent the manufacturer of goods can also be held liable for damage to third parties when the product is used contrary to its intended use, if the manufacturer ought in this respect to have had doubts about the reliability of the customer [references]. In determining and delimiting the respective spheres of liability it is decisive that the waste incidental to the manufacture of petroleum and its disposal are, so to say, the “negative aspect” of the manufacture and that, according to the general view, its destruction is and remains a matter for the manufacturer, while the “destruction” of the petroleum is in the hands of the customer according to its purpose. If a manufacturer decides to engage in the production of petroleum, he must provide for safe destruction of waste, the more so since this normally requires special measures; certainly resort may also be had to his liability in private law if somebody is damaged by the waste. If the manufacturer employs a third party for the disposal of the waste, he complies with his own duty to safeguard the public in general through the interposition of the third party . . .

4. No legal objections exist against the finding of the Court of Appeal that in the course of the enquiries, which were necessary and could be expected to be carried out before delegating the task, the fourth defendant should have realised that the enterprise employed by him did not at the time offer a sufficient guarantee that the waste would be disposed of safely and that, if the enterprise should have disposed of it in the way the plaintiff alleges, dangers did materialise for which the fourth defendant is liable, not having used sufficient care in selecting the enterprise.

(a) The Court of Appeal is correct in law when it bases its critical appreciation of the first defendant’s action on the primitive conditions in which the installation, established provisionally only, was operated . . . This method did not comply with the provisions of § 34 II 1 WHG according to which even outside a water protection zone materials may only be stored or deposited so as not to create the fear that the water-table may become polluted or that its quality may be affected in any other way. The fact that the installation was set up on a foundation of clay which had been spread over the refuse did not exclude with the necessary degree of certainty a pollution of the water-table—by seeping oil—if only as a result of mixing it with oil [reference], the more so since it was uncertain whether the layer was resistant to water and fluids throughout [reference]. For this reason special measures had to be taken for the protection of the water-table so as to prevent effectively that oil should escape because the containers begin to leak as a result of corrosion, of defective materials or construction, or in consequence of spilling in the course of filling or emptying [references] . . .

At all events the fourth defendant should have realised, when he gave the order, that the installation lacked the simplest safety mechanism for protecting the water-table and that in its actual state the harmless destruction of the waste was not guaranteed, keeping in mind the amount of waste to be destroyed. If so, he should have entertained doubts about the reliability of the management of the enterprise which has so flagrantly disregarded the simplest requirements of safety. In view of such manifest flagrant omissions the fourth defendant could also have foreseen that the first defendant in destroying the oil waste would not seriously consider the protection of the water-table . . .

(b) Having regard to its duty to safeguard the public in general [Verkehrssicherungspflicht], the fourth defendant was obliged to inform himself of the operational conditions of the first defendant before entrusting him with the waste oil. The fact that at the time malpractices in disposing of industrial waste had not seriously concerned the public and the industries involved, as the appellant contends, does not relieve the fourth defendant; given his experience he must have been aware of the possibility and the resulting danger of an improper destruction of such waste . . .

In agreement with the Court of Appeal it must be held that the fourth defendant could not rely on the recommendations of the second defendant, even if he got to know him as a reliable expert on the prevention of damage by oil and that he had been recommended as such by the water authorities and by the department head of the fourth defendant's insurers. Whether the same considerations would apply also if the second defendant had not been personally connected with the first defendant need not be decided here. At any rate . . . the fourth defendant knew that the second defendant had founded the enterprise together with his wife, who was only nominally the manager, and that in fact he managed the affairs of the first defendant himself.

III. 1. In view of those considerations, the Court of Appeal had held correctly that if the fourth defendant had applied the standard of care required of him, he should not have left it to the first defendant to dispose of the waste, at least not without taking special measures for controlling the destruction. Consequently, the fourth defendant is liable, certainly from the angle of damages due according to § 823 BGB, to compensate the plaintiff for the expenses necessarily incurred in restricting the dangers to the supply of drinking-water, in so far as they are caused by the alleged inexpert operations of the first defendant and would not have occurred if the fourth defendant had properly complied with his duty of care to safeguard the public in general.

Case 96

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SEVENTH CIVIL SENATE) 30 OCTOBER 1967

BGHZ 49, 19 = NJW 1968, 391 = VERSR 1968, 92

The plaintiff finances hire-purchase agreements of motor-cars by providing loans for the purchasers. The money representing the loans is paid direct to the vendors in discharge of the purchase price. The plaintiff only grants a loan if title to the motor vehicle is transferred to him by way of security, if the seller becomes a surety, and if a report concerning the purchaser's creditworthiness is favourable.

The defendant carries on the business of an information agency with branches in sixteen cities of the Federal Republic. The branch in Bonn was managed from 1955 onwards by Z, its "commercial representative" (until he died in March 1962). For many years Z provided the motor car dealer F—who has since lost his fortune and was adjudicated bankrupt at his request—with "information concerning the financial standing" of about 1500 clients of F. This information was supplied on paper with the name of the defendant at the letter-head. In twenty-six cases the information was invented; the persons did not exist; in five other cases the persons existed, but the information was too favourable. In these twenty-six cases Z wrote the letters at short notice without having engaged in any enquiries or examination, relying exclusively on the information supplied by F, and concealed their existence from the defendant. Using these letters, F deceived the plaintiff into making him pay over the "loan". The District Court found, and it is now undisputed, that Z was aware of the danger to the plaintiff's assets as a result of his conduct, but that he took the risk.

The plaintiff claims from the defendant damages in respect of the loss, alleged to be DM 201,145.08, caused by F and Z. The defendant disputes the claim both as to its basis and its extent. He also pleads contributory negligence . . .

The District Court and the Court of Appeal of Frankfurt rejected the claim. Upon a second appeal the claim was admitted in principle and the case referred back to ascertain the amount for the following

Reasons

The plaintiff argues that the defendant is liable under § 31 BGB for the torts committed by Z to the detriment of the plaintiff. The Court of Appeal denies this.

1. It holds that Z is not the defendant's representative appointed in accordance with the statutes in the meaning of § 31 BGB. He lacked the necessary independence in his dealings with third parties and a sphere of administration of his own within functions of management of the defendant.

These arguments are not free from error in law. The facts as found by the Court of Appeal compel the conclusion that Z was the representative of the defendant in the meaning of § 31 BGB.

(a) According to this provision, a legal entity is responsible for the damage to a third party by its representative, appointed in accordance with the statutes, as a result of an act "in the execution of the duties allotted to him" which engages liability to pay damages. The legal concept of "representative appointed in accordance with the statutes" has been extended increasingly in practice and in the literature. The Court of Appeal has overlooked this.

Representatives appointed in accordance with the statutes are not only those persons whose activities are envisaged by the statutes of a legal entity, nor need they possess the right to represent the entity in legal transactions. It is not necessary either that the range of tasks falls within the managerial administration of the legal entity. It suffices if the representative is entrusted with handling important and essential functions of the legal entity by the general system and functioning of the enterprise [references]. In such circumstances it would be inequitable to permit the legal entity to exonerate itself in reliance on § 831 BGB.

(b) These conditions were fulfilled in the present case as regards Z.

(aa) It is undisputed that he managed the office of the defendant in Bonn as a "one-man business" in complete independence. With the permission of the defendant he described the office as a "branch" of the latter. In agreement with the defendant he used the latter's business stationery and reference forms and a stamp to the same effect. Thus, in his dealings with third parties he clearly did not act as an "independent commercial agent" on behalf of the defendant; the Court of Appeal was wrong in holding that in fact he managed the defendant's office in Bonn as an independent agency of information.

(bb) In view of the agreed conduct in dealings with third parties, it is irrelevant that, as between Z and the defendant, their legal relationship was governed by the "contract of agency" of 11 August 1955 in accordance with the law relating to commercial agents. This does not rule out the conclusion that in his relations with third parties Z was the representative of the defendant in accordance with § 31 BGB.

(cc) By providing references on paper bearing the letter-head of the defendant, Z made the statements contained therein in the name of the defendant. Nothing in these letters indicates that these are not statements of the defendant, but only of Z. Obviously, the value of these references for the recipient consisted in the fact that they emanated from the reputable defendant, a big information agency known throughout the world. It is not disputed that the defendant knew of this general practice of Z, although the particular thirty-one “references” which form the basis of the present claim were concealed from him.

(dd) The Court of Appeal has found that the defendant himself engages in the business of an information agency, that he has set up and maintains a network of information offices, that it provides these offices with the sources from which to draw their information and permits these offices to use its business name. In so doing it has, to a wide extent, delegated to the managers of its “offices” the independent discharge of its characteristic functions (to provide information). Thus, the defendant has also delegated to Z the task of supplying references independently in the area of Bonn. It need not be stressed that the provision of references on creditworthiness by an information agency is a very responsible activity; if carried out carelessly much damage can be caused, as the present case shows clearly.

2. By way of a subsidiary argument the Court of Appeal denies that the defendant is responsible for Z under § 31 BGB on the ground that his torts had not been committed “in the execution of the functions allotted to him”, but only on their “occasion”. This conclusion, too, is wrong having regard to the facts as found by the Court of Appeal.

(a) An act is done in the execution of the duties entrusted to a person if it remains within the range of measures which constitute the execution of the functions entrusted to him. The act must be in close objective connection with those measures. The liability is not excluded if the order is exceeded or the power is abused. An international tortious act may well be committed in close objective connection with the allotted functions; this is the case, in particular, if the tortious act violates the allotted specific duties [references].

(b) The defendant refers to the decision [references]. However, that case must be distinguished. A credit agent who had been entrusted with a single sale of a motor vehicle had falsely represented to a third party that the order had been carried out, in order to get hold of the moneys involved. In so doing, the agent had severed himself from his allotted range of functions objectively as well. As is pointed out in that decision, the conclusion would have been different if he had sold the vehicle intentionally on his own account and had embezzled the purchase price; this act would still have been sufficiently connected with the functions allotted to him. This is not the case here. It is true that Z gave false references, but they were references and thus he operated exactly within his real sphere of functions. The close objective connection is not destroyed by the fact that he exceeded his powers arbitrarily and intentionally illegally.

3. The Court of Appeal relies on an additional subsidiary argument to the effect that the plaintiff’s contributory negligence excludes altogether a possible obligation of the defendant to pay damages . . .

The judgment of the Court of Appeal does not show clearly whether this statement refers only to liability under § 831 BGB or whether the Court of Appeal also wishes thereby to rule out any claim under § 31 BGB which, as was shown here, is alone in issue.

If the latter should be the case, the decision of the Court of Appeal cannot be approved. Faced with intentional acts of representatives appointed in accordance with the statutes in accordance with § 31 BGB, contributory negligence on the part of the injured party can never be regarded as so serious as to preclude a claim for damages altogether.

Case 97

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 6 OCTOBER 1970
NJW 1971, 31 = VERSR 1970, 1157

For the purposes of his business the defendant owns a lorry and a lorry-train consisting of a lorry with a trailer. In addition to a number of drivers employed by him, he is assisted by his brother. He instructed the latter on 16 June 1965 to fetch 10 tonnes of coal. The brother used the lorry-train and not the single lorry, which would have required two journeys. Since the trailer was parked on the market in K, he fetched it from there and drove the empty vehicle to the place where the coal was located. On the way he had to pass through a village where the road made a sharp bend to the left. Since the road was wet he braked. As a result the trailer skidded on to the left side of the road and collided with the plaintiff's car. The plaintiff suffered severe injuries, and his car was badly damaged.

The defendant's brother was fined for negligently causing bodily harm. In these proceedings an expert stated that the brakes of the trailer were too weak with the result that it tended to skid on a wet surface and to leave its side of the road. In these circumstances the defendant insurer refused to pay for the entire damage and has only accepted liability in favour of the plaintiff up to DM 150,000 in accordance with §§ 158 ff. of the Act concerning Contracts of Insurance.

The plaintiff sued the defendant's brother and the defendant claiming damages amounting to DM 24,216 and asking for a declaration that both brothers are also liable to compensate him for any other damage arising or likely to arise in connection with the accident. The plaintiff also sued the defendant's brother for damages for pain and suffering.

The District Court, dealing with part of the claim, allowed damages for pain and suffering as well as DM 14,363 in respect of general damages and reserved its decision as regards the remaining DM 9,853. In addition it granted the declaration asked for by the plaintiff.

After the brother of the defendant had paid the sum of DM 14,363, the defendant lodged an appeal limited to the grant of the declaration that he was also liable to the plaintiff in respect of future damage. The Court of Appeal of Düsseldorf rejected the appeal. A second appeal was unsuccessful for the following

Reasons

B. . . .

II. Contrary to the contentions of the appellant, the Court of Appeal applied § 831 BGB correctly.

1. It is undisputed that the defendant, in asking his brother to fetch the coal with the motor vehicle, appointed him to execute a function. The appellant questions, however, whether the brother of the defendant acted illegally in the meaning of § 831 BGB [reference] and argues that the brother had been engaged in a "frolic of his own"

[Schwarzfahrt] for which the defendant was not liable. In both respects the Court of Appeal was right.

(a) The brother of the defendant has injured the plaintiff illegally. Even if the test employed here is not that of an “effect tort”, i.e. whether the plaintiff was injured, the defendant must prove at least that his brother observed “proper traffic practices” when he passed the sharp bend with his lorry-train. This is not, however, the case, even if he had not hit the plaintiff’s motor car. If a motor vehicle skids and bars the road, it cannot be said that the driver—whose personal culpability is not immediately relevant in applying § 831 BGB—drove in accordance with “proper driving practices”. Even if the defendant’s brother had examined the brakes of the trailer before starting and had found them in good order, it has not been shown and proved that his manner of driving at the time of the accident complied with the legal regulation of traffic to such a degree that it could not be condemned as illegal. This would only be the case if the brother of the defendant had acted in a manner which complied entirely with the demands and prohibitions of the traffic regulations [reference]. In the present case the question remains open, to the detriment of the defendant, whether his brother entered the sharp bend at an excessive speed in contravention of § 9 of the Road Traffic Act with the result that despite the dangerous wet road he had to apply the brakes of the lorry-train—with the behaviour of which he was not familiar in any case, as the defendant alleges. The Court of Appeal is therefore justified in stating that the insufficient operation of the trailer’s brakes had been a “contributory cause” of the accident.

(b) It is true that the reversal of the burden of proof laid down by § 831 BGB only affects the principal if the person entrusted with the execution of a function has caused the damage in the course of executing the function, and not merely on its occasion. A direct intrinsic connection must exist as to manner and purpose between the function entrusted to him, on the one hand, and the injurious act on the other hand [references]. Contrary to the objections raised by the appellant, the Court of Appeal has correctly found that such a connection exists.

It must be admitted that the keeper of a motor vehicle is not liable for a “frolic of his own” by the driver against his will; the principle is that he is not liable either under § 7 of the Road Traffic Act or under § 831 BGB [references]. However, in the present case the brother of the defendant was not on a “frolic of his own”; he had undertaken the journey not against his brother’s will, but with his consent; both the time of the journey as well as the route chosen by him corresponded to the latter’s intention. It is true that the principal may not be liable in certain circumstances for the faults of his assistant if the damage would not have occurred had the driver followed a certain prohibition imposed by his principal. This Division has so held in a case in which the driver, in disregard of a prohibition, had given a ride to an acquaintance who was injured in an accident [references]. The appellant is mistaken in contending that the present case is similar. In the former case, the injured party had accepted a lift by a driver on a journey on which only goods were to be transported; in the present case the third party was injured not in the course of making use of the vehicle, but as a road-user. It must be assumed in favour of the defendant that his brother fetched the trailer which caused the accident in disregard of the express prohibition by the defendant and connected it. According to a constant practice, however, acts of a person entrusted with the execution of certain functions do not fall outside the range of these functions even if he contravened the principal’s orders intentionally and on his own [references]. In the present case, when the brother of the defendant hitched on the trailer contrary to his orders, he did so in order to avoid having to make two journeys, and thus in order to carry out the task more quickly. Therefore this, and in particular the journey, in the course of which the accident occurred, stood in a relation not only of adequate causality but also, which is decisive, of intrinsic connection with his order to fetch 10 tonnes of coal. The fact is irrelevant that the defendant, as he alleges, forbade his brother to take the trailer because he did not wish to entrust him with driving the lorry with a trailer on the grounds of his advanced age.

Case 98

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (THIRD CIVIL SENATE) 14 JANUARY 1954

BGHZ 12, 94 = NJW 1954, 913

The plaintiff, who was insured by M, while riding his motor cycle at night collided with one of four telegraph poles which were lying across the road and suffered a severe fracture of his skull. The District Court allowed his claim for damages, but the Court of Appeal of Frankfurt rejected it. Upon a second appeal the judgment below was quashed and the case referred back for the following.

Reasons

I. The defendant, the Federal Post, is only liable for the consequences of the accident if the case falls within the ambit of a particular statutory provision. The law in force at present does not provide for liability "according to general principles"; in particular it does not contain a principle that everybody is liable to make good any damage caused by his property unless he can prove that he is not to be blamed for the fact that the location of the property imperilled others. Absolute strict liability of the defendant in respect of the telephone lines maintained by it deserves even less consideration.

II. The plaintiff complains that the defendant did not maintain its installations in a safe condition for traffic and that its employees did not take measures for removing the recent obstacle to traffic. None of these considerations is sufficient to hold the defendant liable under § 839 BGB and Article 131 of the Constitution of Weimar; even in the case of public operations both the duty to maintain an installation adequately for traffic purposes as well as the duty to remove sudden obstacles to traffic are obligations which do not arise out of a special relationship of protection between the public authority and a third party who happens to have been affected accidentally; the real reason is that objectively a dangerous situation has been created. Where such obligations to take safeguarding measures are concerned public corporations are not to be treated differently from private persons, even if the activity in question may bear the character of an act jure imperii. The liability of the public corporation is therefore governed by §§ 823, 831 BGB. Following the practice of the Reichsgericht, this Division in its decision [reference] has given detailed reasons for so holding; the observations made there as to the duty to safeguard the public in respect of a public path apply here as well. The appellant is wrong in relying in this connection on the argument that according to the practice of the courts the activity of the Federal Post has been regarded increasingly as being exercised jure imperii. The appellant is also wrong in referring to the decision of the Reichsgericht [reference]; it is there stated expressly that the principle set out here applies also to damage caused by the laying of telephone cables; as regards “third-party outsiders” no liability arises under § 839 BGB; liability in the exercise of official functions to protect a third party against damage exists only in favour of those who are obliged, by virtue of the Law concerning Telegraph Lines to suffer interference with their property. However, this is not the case.

III. The Court of Appeal has held correctly that the defendant is not liable for having failed to remove the fallen telegraph poles from the highway in time.

1. The objection of the appellant to the conclusion of the Court of Appeal that the defendant is not liable under § 831 is unfounded.

(a) According to a constant practice no liability arises under § 831 BGB, even in the absence of separate evidence in exoneration, if the employee has acted in such a manner as any carefully selected person would have done [reference].

(b) The technical supervisor acted, however, as any other employee, including he who acts with the necessary care, would have acted. It may be that the night in question was stormy and that this could also be observed at the Post Office in L. It cannot be said, however, that in these circumstances an employee of the Post Office, acting with the necessary care, on noticing a partial disruption of the telephone lines would have dispatched immediately a repair column during the night. Since only seven out of thirty lines failed to function, it could not be assumed that poles had fallen and that the lines had collapsed. The defendant has stated, and the plaintiff has not disputed it, that such interruption had also occurred previously due to the fact that damp had penetrated the cables and because ‘lead fatigue’ had affected the strength of the cables. The parties agree that during the night when the accident happened the weather was wet. It is understandable, therefore, that the technical supervisor also attributed this disruption of the lines to the causes which had been observed previously. It must be conceded to the defendants that little purpose would have been served in attempting to remedy this disruption if a repair column had been sent on a search errand during the night. The Act on Telegraph Lines, too, assumes, as § 12 III shows, that disruptions are normally dealt with during daytime only.

2. In these circumstances, the appellant is wrong in contending that the telephone business had been supervised inadequately by the defendant and that it was therefore liable for the damage—directly in accordance with § 823 BGB—thus ruling out the need to prove that one of its organs had been at fault. Such liability has been held by the practice to exist, e.g. if a public corporation has failed to take any measures at all which serve to control its installations in order to ensure the safety of traffic [references]. During the night from 15 to 16 February 1948, too, an employee of the Post Office had been charged with supervising the functioning of the telephone lines. It need not be decided whether the technical supervisor could be regarded as an “organ” of the defendant in the meaning of §§ 89, 30, 31 BGB; the Court of Appeal has rightly denied that he acted negligently. The observations made above in respect of the question whether a carefully chosen employee would have acted in the same way have shown that he did not act culpably. It has not been demonstrated either that during the night when the accident occurred another employee of the defendant or one of his organs negligently omitted to attend to the telephone lines. No claims arise therefore on the ground that the obstacle to traffic had not been discovered and removed in time.

IV. The plaintiff also bases his claim on the ground that the defendant had not maintained its telephone poles properly; the accident had occurred because the storm had felled a rotten pole which by means of the telephone cable had in turn pulled down the other poles which had been secured inadequately. This allegation has not been considered entirely satisfactorily by the court below.

1. The Court of Appeal does not consider this allegation as forming a basis of the claim because in its opinion the fact has not been proved and is incapable of being proved that the accident actually occurred in the way alleged by the plaintiff; the possibility should not be ruled out that an American lorry had collided with a pole and had thus caused the collapse of the telephone lines.

In so far as the appellant argues that the Court of Appeal had misunderstood the burden of proof, seeing that faced with an actual situation in violation of the traffic rules the defendant bore the burden of proof “that it is not responsible for the dangerous condition of its installation”, his contention cannot be accepted. It is for the plaintiff to prove that the damage was caused by faulty maintenance of the installation not only where the claim is based on § 823 BGB but also in the case of § 836 BGB [reference]. This follows from the principle that a claimant must prove that the factual conditions exist for the creation of a right.

2. The Court of Appeal overlooks, however, that the defendant may be liable even if an American lorry had collided with the pole, thus leading to the collapse of the telephone lines. The Court of Appeal is of the opinion that the possibility of the lorry by colliding with it made a strong impact on one of the poles is to be ruled out. In the absence of any traces on one of the collapsed poles, experience shows that, if at all, the collision would only have had a weak impact on the pole. If, however, even a slight impact with the pole could have resulted in a complete collapse of a part of the installation, the possibility would exist that inadequate maintenance of the installation was in fact a contributory cause of the accident. It must be considered whether the rotten condition of one of the poles, conceded by the defendant itself, was so considerable and, apart from this the other poles had been secured insufficiently so as to render them no longer safe for traffic. It need not be decided whether the storm or the lorry broke the pole. Neither does a natural event create liability nor does the act of a third party exclude liability in all cases. This principle applies also in respect of § 836 BGB. In dealing with the question of causality, the determining factor is whether the structure was so inadequately maintained or secured that even a minor impact, to be taken into consideration as normal, could lead to its collapse. The “last” cause may perhaps never be ascertained, and yet liability may not be excluded for this reason.

If upon further examination it should appear that the telephone poles were deficient in the sense indicated here, the defendant would be liable under § 823 BGB in conjunction with §§ 89, 31, 30, unless it proves that none of the organs is to blame; the fact alone that another dangerous situation was allowed to persist is a sufficient indication that the care was lacking which is required for safeguarding traffic . . .

In view of the special features of this case, liability under § 823 BGB would exist if it should be established that the telephone lines were inadequately maintained, unless the defendant can exonerate himself. In these circumstances it is unnecessary to discuss the question raised by the appellant as to whether liability under § 836 BGB can arise even if the damage has not been caused by the “mobile force” of the collapsing structure but by the fact that the collapsed structure is allowed to lie on a road which carried public traffic.

§ 836 does not involve a different type of case but only a reversal of the burden of proof [reference]. Thus § 836 can be disregarded if within the framework of § 823 BGB the debtor is called upon exceptionally to prove that he is not to blame.

Case 99

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 10 JULY 1954
NJW 1956, 1106

The plaintiff was a patient in the neurological clinic of the Municipal Hospital in B between 25 May 1951 and 9 February 1952. He suffered from introspective-endogenous depressions. On 24 May 1951 he received electro-shock treatment and on 28 May 1951 he underwent a lumbar puncture. On 6 and 7 June the electro-shock treatment was repeated. In the course of it he suffered a fracture of the twelfth vertebra from which he recovered after having lain in plaster for six and a half months. Since then his right leg is paralysed and he suffers from intestinal and heart trouble. The medical expert of the Social Insurance Office of the Land regards him as incapable of work. The Court of Appeal of Bremen allowed the plaintiff's claim for damages against the hospital of the defendant. A second appeal was unsuccessful for the following.

Reasons

The Court of Appeal has found that the plaintiff entered the clinic of the defendant as a patient supported by social security. It has held correctly that in these cases the legal relationship between the municipal hospital or clinic and the patient is of a private law nature. According to a constant practice of the Reichsgericht, followed by the Federal Supreme Court [references], the reception of a patient supported by social security creates a contract with the hospital in favour of the patient with the result that the patient acquires a right of his own to be treated expertly. If a doctor, who has been charged with the treatment of such a patient supported by social security commits a mistake culpably, the defendant as owner of the clinic is liable according to § 278 BGB for the mistake of the doctor appointed by him to perform the duties of the latter.

On the other hand, as the Court of Appeal has pointed out, a claim for pain and suffering against a doctor in charge on the ground of assault causing bodily harm cannot be based on § 278 BGB, but only on § 831 BGB, unless direct liability under § 823 BGB is in issue.

II. 1. The appellant is wrong in alleging that the plaintiff had validly consented to the electro-shock treatment and that this consent could only have been annulled in accordance with §§ 161 ff. BGB. This view would only be correct if

(a) the plaintiff had been aware of the typical dangers of electro-shock treatment and, in particular, of a fracture of the spine and if with knowledge of these dangers his consent had included these factors, or

(b) the doctor in charge could so understand and interpret the general conduct of the plaintiff in the particular circumstances of the case and having regard to the views current in human relations between reasonable people that the plaintiff was aware in outline of the dangers connected with shock treatment and that he had accepted the risk.

As to (a): It is a constant practice in cases where a passenger in a motor vehicle is injured that an exemption from liability based on the assumption of a risk can only be presumed if the victim went on the journey conscious of the possibility of danger and thus consented expressly or tacitly to a possible danger arising out of the driver's conduct, whether culpable or not. Such a consent does not include dangers which the victim merely ought to have noticed [references]. Similarly, the Reichsgericht has pointed out [reference] that physical treatment by a doctor involving the corporeal inviolability of a patient is only covered by the contract and not illegal in so far as the consent of the patient extends to it. According to the Reichsgericht, [reference] before applying any physical treatment the doctor must make certain of the patient's consent, which must be done based upon correct ideas concerning the nature and consequences of the treatment, even if naturally it does not cover all details. In [reference] the Reichsgericht upheld this view. The Federal Supreme Court has affirmed this view [reference], even if in the case before it the existence and the extent of the consent was not in issue, but whether it was void on the ground of illegality or contrary to bonos mores. These principles must be applied here. The Court of Appeal agrees [reference] . . . by requiring that a valid consent presupposes that the person who gives it knew the significance and the extent of the physical treatment by the doctor, at least in outline. No objections can therefore be raised against its legal conclusions.

As to (b): As the Reichsgericht [reference] and the Federal Supreme Court [references] have stated, the declared and not the subjective intention of the plaintiff counts. The Court of Appeal has found that the doctors administering the treatment assumed that the plaintiff had consented. However, according to the Court of Appeal they should have realised that real consent was lacking. They had therefore assumed negligently that consent had been given. This conclusion cannot be faulted in law. The court has thereby correctly made it clear that all the plaintiff's declarations, oral, tacit, or to be presumed, could not and should not have been regarded by the doctors treating him, having regard to the attendant circumstances and according to good faith, as constituting a valid consent which included the possible dangers connected with the physical treatment . . .

2. The appellant denies that, as the Court of Appeal held, he was obliged to inform the plaintiff of the possible consequences of the electro-shock treatment. The Court of Appeal, in examining whether the doctor was under a duty to give information, rightly relied on the practice of the Reichsgericht according to which the substance and the extent of the duty to inform a patient is influenced by the degree of danger which the physical treatment affecting corporeal inviolability involves.

The duty to respect the freedom to allow physical treatment affecting corporeal inviolability cannot be denied on the ground that the relationship between patient and doctor requires the use of a special standard. It is the ethical task of a doctor to listen to the patient and to inform him in detail about undesirable side-effects of the therapy to be used. If the right of personality is properly appreciated, it cannot be said that this appreciation discloses a tendency, flowing from a mistaken notion of freedom, to enmesh in a network of legal provisions the special relationship between doctor and patient. On the contrary, this duty to give information concerning the possible injurious consequences of the therapy is part of a doctor's calling which must not fail to pay regard to personality and corporeal inviolability. It is no answer to point out that in certain cases it may perhaps be advisable not to enlighten the patient. It is unnecessary here to determine the extent of the duty to provide information as regards diagnosis and therapy and what the doctor can and must say, for in the present case no information was given at all. The Court of Appeal has also rightly referred to the decision of the Reichsgericht [reference] where it is stated that as a matter of principle the individual must remain free to determine the fate of his body even in relation to his doctor [reference]. Naturally the doctor would attempt to spare the patient injurious fear and not to remind him unnecessarily of the possible serious consequences of his illness. However, this consideration had to give precedence to the necessity for the doctor to ensure before any physical treatment is begun that the patient has given clear consent, based upon accurate ideas concerning the kind and the consequences of the corporeal treatment. In so far as the information provided in order to obtain the patient's consent led to a lowering of his mood or even of his health in general, it was an inevitable disadvantage which had to be accepted.

It is unnecessary here to discuss the cases decided by the courts concerning physical treatment without consent where danger lies in delay, for this situation does not arise here. Every doctor knows that physical interference with the inviolability of the patient against his will is not permitted. A doctor may not disregard this even if he disagrees from his professional point of view [reference]. The consent of a patient who is capable of giving it is required and, in principle, is to be obtained by the doctor, but does not, however, extend necessarily to treatment which, according to medical experience, especially in its after-effects, cannot be regarded as relatively harmless. The Court of Appeal has found that electro-shock treatment gives rise to such dangers so as to rule out the possibility of calling them atypical and not worth mentioning . . .

If, therefore, the Court of Appeal speaks in these circumstances of a danger which cannot be regarded as atypical, it has done so without committing an error of law. If, for this reason, it held that the doctor was obliged to inform the plaintiff of the therapy and its consequences, no criticism can arise against this either . . . Since during the period in question electro-shock treatment could not be regarded as harmless according to the details given in the literature, and particularly in the light of the contradictory conclusions about its results, the Court of Appeal has rightly held that the doctors engaged in the treatment were under a duty to inform the patient . . . The treatment in the absence of the consent required in this case, based on adequate information, is therefore illegal. The duty to inform the plaintiff remained, despite his tendency to depressions. It is another question how the patient is to be informed of the consequences, having regard to his personality and what details are to be intimated.

III. It is true that the extent of the duty to inform is disputed. The medical profession points out, in particular, that the relationship of trust between doctor and patient is an important factor. Nevertheless, a doctor cannot take the view, without incurring the charge of negligence, that he need not inform his patient at all about a therapy which is not without danger. Since this is a legal problem, a doctor cannot without further consideration follow the view which is occasionally expressed by medical circles, but is rejected by a constant practice of the courts [reference]. The fact that the plaintiff suffers from a psychotic illness could not induce the doctors to believe that they were entitled to interfere to a considerable extent with his physical inviolability without informing him [reference]. It is irrelevant in this connection whether . . . fractures normally heal without further complications . . . The Court of Appeal has recognised that the information need not always be complete in every detail. However, it holds the doctors responsible for having omitted to give any indications. It has not been suggested that at the time of the electro-shock treatment the clinic had gained special experience of its own which could have justified the opinion that this treatment was entirely free from danger . . . The Court of Appeal was therefore right in holding that the doctors treating the plaintiff had been negligent.

The finding of a causal nexus cannot be faulted either. It need not be decided whether any finding of fact would have been relevant to the effect that the plaintiff would have given his consent, had he been properly consulted, seeing that in the present case an illegal interference with his corporeal inviolability did in fact take place. Since the Court of Appeal was unable to make such a finding, having regard to all the circumstances, it has held correctly that the defendant is liable to the plaintiff for the consequences of the corporeal treatment in accordance with §§ 611, 275, and 278 BGB.

IV. The Court of Appeal was correct in law when it regarded the doctors administering the treatment as persons allotted the execution of a function in the meaning of § 831 BGB. The Court of Appeal credits the defendant with having selected with care the doctors administering the treatment. The Court of Appeal had held, however, with justification that the directors of such a clinic owe a duty of guidance and control, for the violation of which those setting up the clinic are liable. Naturally, purely medical questions of therapy cannot be subject to guidance by the administration in individual cases. The duty to provide information incumbent upon the doctors in respect of therapy . . . is not, however, a purely medical matter, exempt from the duty to give guidance, even if it need not be decided here whether the doctors in its employ must be given guidance as to the extent itself of the information. The Court of Appeal has rightly criticised the absence of all instructions and control in respect of the information to be given to patients. In the present case it has not been established whether a doctor was among the directors. If so, the defendant would be liable for the medical director's failure to give the necessary instructions [references]. However, even if the directors of the clinic did not include a medical expert and only one doctor, in his capacity as chief medical officer, had been entrusted with the control and determination of all questions concerning medical matters, in the absence of any provision in the statutes, the defendant would be liable for the absence of control and for having culpably omitted to provide instructions. This would be all the more the case if neither the directors of the defendant had given the necessary instructions since they were not experts nor had any expert individual been charged with this task. Irrespective of the reason why the necessary control in this case or the instruction concerning the duty to provide information was lacking, the Court of Appeal was correct in also holding the defendant liable to pay damages for pain and suffering.

Case 100

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 20 APRIL 1971

NJW 1971, 1313 = VERSR 1971, 741

On 8 July 1964 the first defendant's excavator, used to dig a ditch (for the purpose of moving a new electric-light cable), hit the pipe across the street which connected the house of the plaintiff with the main gas pipeline. Gas escaping into the cellar of the house caused an explosion which damaged the house so severely that it had to be pulled down. The plaintiff sued the defendants as joint and several debtors for compensation in respect of the damage to the house and to his business. The claim against the first defendant was based on his own culpable act (§§ 31, 823 I BGB) as well as on the culpable acts of the second and third defendants (§ 831 BGB).

The Court of Appeal of Koblenz rejected the claim. A second appeal was successful for the following.

Reasons

The Court of Appeal denies that the first defendant as a legal entity is liable under §§ 31, 823 I BGB and holds that it had discharged the burden of proof required to exonerate it from liability under § 831 BGB for the second defendant, the local construction manager, and the third defendant, the chief supervisor of excavations, having regard to what it treats as undisputed pleadings.

1. The Court of Appeal is of the opinion that the second defendant, having been in charge of the local construction works, is liable for the occurrence at the place of construction.

As a graduate civil engineer with considerable experience in road building he had the necessary qualifications to carry out tasks on his own in accordance with the relevant technical guide-lines and restrictions as well as those provided by his firm. He had been in charge of big construction works, showing great circumspection, and was familiar with all construction operations and safety measures connected therewith. He had executed conscientiously many construction works of the first defendant on his own and had never given cause for complaint. The managers and building specialists of the customer of the first defendant regarded him as a particularly reliable and conscientious specialist.

The third defendant, too, who had been in the employ of the first defendant for twenty-seven years, had much experience in civil engineering and had excelled in training younger leading construction workers.

2. These statements do not suffice, however, to show that the first defendant has discharged the burden of proof incumbent upon him for exonerating himself. Instead, the undisputed pleadings themselves disclose that the first defendant's organisation is to blame.

(a) According to the practice of the highest courts and to the dominant view in the literature, civil engineers undertaking construction work on public roads of cities must take into account the existence of subterranean service ducts and must exercise the utmost caution in the knowledge of the exceedingly great danger which can be caused if electricity, gas, water, or telephone lines are damaged. The life and health of human beings is imperilled if such works are carried out inexpertly, especially through contact with power cables or the escape of gas. Moreover, the failure of the supply lines often causes considerable damage to industrial and commercial enterprises, to hospitals and others. Consequently, civil engineers whose work brings them into contact with supply lines, especially by the use of excavators and similar heavy gear, are under a particularly heavy duty to make enquiries and to take safety measures concerning any existing supply lines; a civil engineer is obliged to obtain the information within the limits of general technical experience which is necessary for the safe execution of the operations to be carried out [reference].

In this connection a civil engineer is bound, in particular, to acquaint himself adequately with the lay-out of the gas pipes as well as the other supply lines by inquiring at the place where the relevant reliable details are available.

Since supply lines are normally laid down and maintained without the collaboration of the communal building authority, it is not sufficient to make enquiries with the latter; instead, information must normally be obtained from the competent supplier of the services. In a number of cases evidence of this can be found, as is shown by the cable information leaflet of the electricity works of Koblenz . . . These instructions do not have the character of legal rules. They show, however, the extent of the duty to safeguard the public in general (§ 823 I BGB) incumbent upon civil engineers using excavators. If the necessary information cannot be obtained by inspecting the documents in the possession of the supplier of the service, the position of the supply lines must be ascertained by other means before the excavators begin their work . . .

In general, an inspection of these maps will provide the civil engineering enterprise with a sufficient amount of information concerning the position of the subterranean lines and individual connections with houses . . .

It must not be decided either whether their duty to obtain information, which the first defendant had assumed, additionally by contract [reference] is always incumbent upon the management itself of the civil engineering enterprise [references]. In the case of enterprises which are as big as the first defendant, this may be difficult, even if the manager of the branch in K should be regarded as its statutory representative. In any event, if the gathering of information is delegated to employees, the civil engineering enterprise must give clear, emphatic instructions to the local construction manager and to the supervising foreman when and how they must ascertain the position and extension of the supply lines, including the individual connections of houses on the basis of reliable documentation by the supply undertakings in question. In view of the particularly grave danger if gas, water, and power installations are damaged, the instructions must point out imperatively not to be satisfied with oral information of a general kind not containing specific figures—especially as to the depth at which the ducts are located—which is clearly not based on maps.

Such a duty to ascertain the location of the existing supply lines must be said to exist where the excavations involve the creation of a ditch to a depth of 0.60 metres, especially if it is to run under the pavement and thus in the neighbourhood of connections with houses; experience shows that the latter run at a lesser depth than the main ducts.

The duty to make enquiries existed even if information was supplied by . . . on the occasion of a previous examination. When as a result of the extension of the order for excavations—as it was in the present case—the danger is increased, the additional operation requires further information if on the previous occasion only oral information of a general kind was provided without precise details and also clearly without the assistance of maps or other papers. Moreover, the first defendant should have given general instructions to the two other defendants concerning the need for a renewed investigation if an additional order of this kind is received.

The defendant failed to give instructions dealing with the various aspects as was required here.

The first defendant would not be exonerated if, as he contends, the connection of the gas pipe with the house was located at a depth of 45 centimetres. It is not true that if a ditch is dug by an excavator to a depth of 60 centimetres, the possibility of hitting a gas pipe could be disregarded altogether . . . [references]. The first defendant should therefore have considered the possibility that gas pipes, particularly connections with houses, may be located at a depth much less than one metre.

(b) The failure to give the necessary instructions to the second and third defendants also constituted the cause of the damage which occurred . . .

Case 101

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 3 NOVEMBER 1964
NJW 1965, 391

Reasons

...

II. The second appeal by the first defendant must succeed.

1. The legal position would be favourable to the plaintiffs (the dependants of O, who was killed), if they could rely on the liability under § 831 BGB. The District Court gave judgment against the first defendant on the basis of this provision. The Court of Appeal did not consider this aspect. In the light of the facts as found it is indeed not possible to hold the first defendant liable on the strength of § 831 BGB (in conjunction with § 844 BGB). It is true that the Reichsgericht has held occasionally that an employed driver continues to act "in the execution of the function entrusted to him", if contrary to his instructions he gives a lift to outsiders in the course of a journey ordered by his employer [references]. In the opinion of this Division it cannot be stated generally, at least, that in such cases the employer is liable for the damage, unless he has been able to exonerate himself. In the present case, the first defendant had ordered the second defendant to transport goods and has expressly forbidden him to carry persons other than those connected with the business in his lorry. Having regard to the circumstances of the journey it was not reasonable either for O to assume, without making further enquiries, that the first defendant would agree to it that O would be carried in his lorry over a considerable distance at night. O entrusted himself exclusively to the second defendant, who was an acquaintance of his. In these circumstances the employer of the driver, and owner of the lorry, cannot be held liable for the personal safety of O. If the functions of the driver have been restricted by his employer, these restrictions are also effective in relation to such a user. Consequently a direct connection between the activity entrusted to the driver and the damage cannot be said to exist, even if the journey itself was not undertaken outside the scope of the employment [reference]. Even if in the absence of exoneration (§ 831 I first sentence BGB) the first defendant would be liable to a person in the street who had been injured owing to the negligence of the second defendant, irrespective of the fact that the latter had deviated from the timetable fixed by the office [reference], it does not follow that the first defendant is similarly liable to an unwanted passenger. His position is different; in so far as he is concerned, the employee entrusted with the execution of tasks allotted to him [Verrichtungsgelilfe] has exceeded his function, a fact which is relevant in excluding liability, seeing that the passenger's damage falls outside the operational risk attracting liability under § 831 BGB [reference]. Therefore claims by the dependants under §§ 831, 844 BGB are also excluded.

Case 102

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 11 DECEMBER 1956
NJW 1957, 499 = VERSR 1957, 165

Reasons

According to § 17 I of the Rules for the Prevention of Accidents issued by the Bavarian Builders' Confederation in the wording of 1 July 1941, then in force, unauthorized persons were to be prohibited by notices from entering a building site. The District Court has found that this was done in the present case. Thereby the builders involved in the conversion of the house have complied with their duty to safeguard the public in general [Verkehrssicherungspflicht] in so far as third persons are concerned who were not employed on the building site. By means of the warning notices they indicated in a usual and generally comprehensible way that the parts of the building which were being converted were barred to "unauthorised persons" in view of the danger connected with the building operations. The plaintiff, too, was to be regarded as an unauthorised person, although she came to speak to her husband who was employed on the site. This follows clearly from § 17 II of the Rules for the Prevention of Accidents according to which even insured persons are only permitted to visit building sites if this is necessary in the performance of tasks allotted to them.

No need existed according to § 17 I of the Rules for the Prevention of Accidents cited above to protect the building site against the entry of third parties otherwise than by the erection of warning notices. In particular it was unnecessary to specify particular rooms in the course of conversion or to indicate the particular dangers which threatened unauthorized visitors, for they came within the danger zone if they obeyed the general prohibition of entry. The plaintiff cannot therefore base her claim on § 70 of the Rules for the Prevention of Accidents which requires special safety measures for rooms with ceilings or floors which are not load-bearing; these provisions exist to protect persons who are endangered while entering the room with permission, i.e. primarily workers operating there. It is neither the purpose of the Rules for the Prevention of Accidents to protect unauthorized visitors against the many dangers lurking on a building site, nor can the owner or the builders employed there normally do so or be expected to do so. It is unnecessary to determine here whether stricter requirements exist in special circumstances, as for instance if children play frequently near a building site, for the plaintiff is an adult who could understand the meaning of the warning notices on the building site and who did so, as the Court of Appeal found, despite her simple-mindedness.

Case 103

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SECOND CIVIL SENATE) 27 FEBRUARY 1952
BGHZ 5, 321 = NJW 1952, 658 = VERSR 1952, 166

In late November 1946 the plaintiff hurt his right hand and went as a private patient to Dr D, a senior doctor in the defendant hospital. A few days later the plaintiff became an in-patient in the defendant hospital in one of Dr D's private beds. On 9 December he there received a blood transfusion administered on Dr D's instructions by an assistant, Dr J. The donor of the blood was A, who had given blood at the defendant hospital on many previous occasions. In 1948 it was discovered that both A and the plaintiff were suffering from syphilis. A had first given blood at the defendant hospital in early August 1946. On that occasion, the only test administered to him was a Wassermann reaction test, which proved negative: there was no visual inspection or any other kind of examination. Between August 1946 and November 1947, A gave blood on twenty-five occasions for twenty-four different recipients, twenty of these occasions being at the defendant hospital. During this period he had no further tests. Only in the middle of January 1948 did a different doctor cause blood tests to be made on A. In both cases the Wassermann test proved to be extremely positive, a fact which A communicated to Dr J on 14 February. Dr D then examined the plaintiff and ascertained that he too had syphilis.

The plaintiff asserts that his infection resulted from the blood transfusion effected in the defendant hospital on 9 December 1946. He asserts that the defendant was at fault in failing to follow the requirements of the Blood Donor Ordinance of 5 March 1940 [reference omitted] and in particular in failing to give A the prescribed tests. The serious result of this was that the disease was diagnosed in the plaintiff only at a very late stage, when the prospect of cure was much poorer. The plaintiff sought a decree that the defendant hospital, Dr D, and Dr J were liable to him as common debtors in respect of all the resulting harm, as well as for damages for pain and suffering.

The Landgericht held that the claim was well-founded. The Oberlandesgericht dismissed the defendant hospital's appeal by separate decree. The hospital's further appeal is now dismissed for the following.

Reasons

1. The appellant's first objection is to the Court of Appeal's finding that it was under any contractual obligation to the plaintiff regarding the provision of medical treatment. When the plaintiff became one of Dr D's private out-patients in late November 1946, a contract for medical treatment was formed between him and Dr D, a contract which was not terminated on 7 December 1946 when the plaintiff was admitted to the defendant hospital. It followed, according to the appellant, that the contract whereby he was admitted to the hospital did not extend to any medical treatment, the plaintiff's medical treatment being a matter for Dr D alone, but simply called for the provision of bed and board.

We cannot agree with the appellant.

(a) We need not decide whether the contract which the plaintiff made with the hospital on 7 December 1946 was what is called a "total hospital contract" which involves the provision of medical treatment, for even if one accepts the appellant's assertions that in a case like the present the contract formed between doctor and patient before the patient is admitted to hospital is not affected by his admission to the hospital, it does not at all follow that the contract by which the patient later enters the hospital covers only bed and board. On the contrary, the in-patient who has made an independent contract with his doctor for medical treatment and then makes a further contract with a hospital for nursing care expects the hospital to provide him with all necessary medical treatment which is not provided by the doctor himself but is usually provided by hospital staff using hospital equipment. This would include administering drugs, giving injections, taking X-rays, and much else. The hospital itself evidently has the same expectation, since it makes the equipment available and not only performs these tasks but charges for them as well. Into this category fall blood transfusions such as the present plaintiff had, for the apparatus required for blood transfusion is normally found only in hospitals and the transfusion itself is normally performed by someone other than the principal doctor.

There is therefore no doubt that Dr J, the doctor who carried out the blood transfusion in this case, was acting as the defendant hospital's contractual assistant. The defendant is therefore responsible under §§ 276, 278 BGB for any mistakes which Dr J made in carrying out the transfusion.

The Court of Appeal held that in performing the transfusion, the assistant, Dr J, failed to follow the safety procedures laid down in the Decree of 5 March 1940. Like any other doctor in charge of a blood transfusion, Dr J should have been aware not only of how the transfusion should be effected from the technical point of view but also what steps were required for it to be effected with the greatest safety. The Court of Appeal also held that in failing to follow the prescribed tests and other safety measures, Dr J was at fault and that this fault was a cause of the plaintiff's being infected with syphilis. The Court of Appeal was therefore correct to hold that the defendant's liability for faulty breach of its contractual duty to afford the plaintiff proper medical treatment was established.

(b) But the defendant's contractual liability can be based also on the fact that it failed to take care to bring to the notice of the doctors in the hospital the provisions regarding the safety rules to be followed in giving blood transfusion. The failure was due to Dr L, who from 1940 to 1946 was the doctor in charge of the hospital and one of its statutory representatives under § 31 BGB. In this capacity he became aware of the Decree of 5 March 1940 regarding the precautions to be taken in blood transfusions, but he culpably failed to pass this information, which was important to all doctors, to the other departments in the hospital. It was his duty to do this even though his position vis-à-vis the other senior doctors was not that of a director. Since the hospital's contractual duty remained unfulfilled by reason of a faulty omission on the part of one of its statutory representatives, the hospital is liable (RG DR 1941, 1937).

The Court of Appeal was thus correct to hold that the failure to inform the doctors in the surgical and gynaecological departments of the hospital of the provisions of the Circular of 5 March 1940 was a cause of A's being used as a blood donor for the plaintiff and also of the plaintiff's being infected by A's blood. This was not, however, as suggested by the Court of Appeal and the appellant, a so-called organisational fault but rather a breach of the defendant hospital's own duty through a member of its executive committee, the said Dr L. This failure is equally a basis for the defendant's liability.

2. But Dr L's negligence renders the defendant hospital liable to the plaintiff not only in contract but also, and more extensively, in tort. The Court of Appeal established that it was because the doctors in the surgical department of the defendant hospital were not informed of the security precautions required by the Minister in cases of blood donors that Dr D and Dr J were insufficiently apprised of these security measures and therefore failed to check that the prescribed tests had been administered to A. It was therefore a cause of syphilis being transferred from A to the plaintiff. It follows that the defendant is liable for the harm suffered by the plaintiff under §§ 31, 843 I, 847 I BGB as well.

Case 104

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SEVENTH CIVIL SENATE) 30 JUNE 1966
BGHZ 45, 311 = NJW 1966, 1807 = JZ 1966, 645 = VERSR 1966, 959

Defendants G and T are partners in civil law (Gesellschafter einer Gesellschaft des bürgerlichen Rechts) in a motor vehicle garage. The plaintiff had an accident as a result of defects in repairs to his automobile that had been made at the garage. He brought a claim for damages against the defendants. The Oberlandesgericht adjudged G and T liable to pay for only half the damages in view of the contributory fault of the plaintiff. On the revision brought by the defendants, the liability of defendant G for damages was denied.

The court holds that defendant T, who actually repaired the vehicle, is liable under § 823 BGB for defects in the repairs which caused the brake fluid to leak out and the brakes to fail at the time of the accident. The court also holds that defendant G is not liable under § 823 BGB since he did not repair the vehicle, and that he cannot be held liable under § 31 BGB since that section does not apply to his partnership.

Accordingly, [with respect to G] only liability under § 831 BGB comes into consideration. The appellate court held that such liability existed. Nevertheless, the factual basis for imposing it is absent.

One assigned a task within the meaning of § 831 BGB is simply one who is dependent upon the instructions of the person assigning it. The right to give instructions need not extend to details. It is sufficient that the worker's activity may be limited at any time or withdrawn or circumscribed as to time and circumstances. These requirements are not met with regard to the work which defendant T did on the plaintiff's automobile. Dependence in the sense just described cannot be deduced from the fact that both defendants bound themselves to a partnership contract in which each had the obligation to conduct repairs pursuant to the purpose of the partnership. In such cases, as a rule, two prerequisites for imposing liability under § 831 BGB are absent, namely the possibilities of limiting the task by use of an authority to give instructions and of ordering that the task not be performed. [Citations omitted.]

Case 105

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 18 FEBRUARY 1969
VERS R 1969, 518

A bus owned by the defendant pulled up to a bus-stop without coming close enough to the kerb to enable passengers to step directly from the kerb into the bus. Plaintiff, a sixty-year-old woman, stepped into the street to board the bus and slipped on a patch of ice. As the plaintiff was regaining her feet, the conductor of the bus gave the signal to start the vehicle, the driver set the bus in motion, and the bus struck the plaintiff. She sued the bus company under § 831 BGB for her injuries. The court held that "in view of the great danger of accidents [during departures at icy bus-stops], and especially of accidents caused by inopportunistically placing the bus in motion, it is not enough that, as witness J testified, the driver received instructions during his training as to the need for appropriate conduct". The defendant had to supervise the driver and conductor on a continuing basis.

The appellate court correctly reasoned that, from a practical and legal standpoint, the measures for training and supervision demonstrated by the first defendant are insufficient to guarantee sufficiently the proper conduct of bus personnel and, in particular, their conduct in stopping and supervising departures from the bus at icy bus-stops. In view of the great danger of accidents during these departures, and especially of accidents caused by inopportunistically placing the bus in motion, it is not enough that, as witness J testified, the driver received instructions during his training as to the need for appropriate conduct. Unless the driver and the conductor were given continual oral reminders, it was at least required that a written notice be kept before them in an accessible place advising them of precisely these dangers and the means for avoiding them. The first defendant, who has the burden of exoneration, has presented no evidence on such measures, and has also failed to prove that the personnel were instructed concerning the special dangers of icy bus-stops.

The appellate court also justifiably criticised the proof offered on the grounds that the inspections, which were only described in the testimony of witness J, should have been directed to the proper starting of the vehicle and to the attention required at icy bus-stops. Finally, the appellate court correctly reproached the defendant for not having been able to present any evidence of both occasional unanticipated inspections and occasional covert inspections (the latter being normally impossible when personnel known to the driver are used). In view of the special responsibility of public commercial enterprises, such inspections by reliable employees cannot be neglected.

Case 106

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 25 JANUARY 1966
VERSR 1966, 364

[The first defendant was employed by the second defendant as a butcher boy and driver. While delivering a load of meat and sausage, the first defendant negligently collided with a vehicle parked by the kerb. The owner of the vehicle brought suit, and the second defendant, arguing that his employee had been adequately selected and supervised pursuant to § 831 BGB, prevailed in the lower courts. The plaintiff's Revision was unsuccessful.]

Notwithstanding the opinion of the Revision, the conclusion of the appellate court that the second defendant adequately supervised his driver can be supported without proof being made of unexpected or covert inspections. The judge of the facts was aware that particular observation of a driver's conduct is frequently necessary in order to satisfy the strict requirements governing supervision of one employed as a driver. He nevertheless held that the question whether such additional measures were taken no longer arises when the employer and his representative—here the second defendant's brother—participate in the trips so frequently that their presence is no longer perceived as an inspection and the vehicle driver accordingly drives so as to show his customary behaviour. If no objection arises to his behaviour after this sort of observation, then no further information should be expected from following the driver occasionally in another vehicle, a procedure in which the possibilities for observation are limited. This point of view is in agreement with the decisions of this Senate which have repeatedly emphasised that, although supervision must be strict, it must still be conducted in accordance with what the individual case requires and that no simple catalogue of required measures can be given. Thus, in a very similar case, it was held to be sufficient that the driver had proved his ability by making trips for about two years without any accidents and that the owner or his representative had provided continual supervision by frequently accompanying the driver on these trips. Under such circumstances, it would be exaggerated to require particular inspections in addition, such as those conducted for the most part in large businesses and in any event in public enterprises. It has also been decided that a well-founded belief in the ability of the driver, based on careful selection and supervision, could possibly make exceptional and unexpected inspections unnecessary. The same must apply to the training, instructions, and supervision of speed which the Revision asserts is lacking here.

If a need for such measures does not arise when the owner and his representative accompany the driver on trips that are no longer perceived as supervision, then the question whether such additional measures were taken cannot be decisive. The plaintiff has not cast doubt on the fact that the first defendant was actually supervised in the manner alleged without any objections arising to his conduct. Accordingly, there are no legal grounds for objecting to the conclusion of the appellate court that the second defendant has fulfilled his duty of oversight.

Case 107

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (THIRD CIVIL SENATE) 25 OCTOBER 1951
BGHZ 4, 1 = NJW 1952, 418 = VERSR 1952, 166

The defendant is the owner of an estate. His manager, K, assigned B, a sixteen-year-old agricultural labourer employed on the estate, to transport gasoline. B used a cross-bred horse. The horse bolted and seriously injured the plaintiff.

The defendant contests the plaintiff's claim on the grounds that the horse had been gentle, B had been a careful driver who was accustomed to driving horses, and the horse had pulled a milk wagon every day and was accustomed to jolting vehicles.

The Landgericht denied recovery, the Oberlandesgericht reversed, and the Revision results in reversal and remand.

Reasons

The appellate court held that the proof of exoneration required of the defendant had not been made because the defendant had paid no attention to the transport of the gasoline. It held that the defendant has violated the duty of supervision incumbent on him because he himself did not take care that his manager gave adequate instructions to the boy for the particular trip with the cross-bred horse, which was not without its dangers. The appellate court thought it had been demonstrated that manager K told B that he should drive carefully on this trip; however, it is thought that this instruction was not sufficient and that, in view of B's youth, the disused street, and the use of a cross-bred horse (which, as a matter of common experience, is difficult to ride), K ought to have given more particularised instructions.

In so far as the appellate court derived the liability of the defendant from the fact that he did not personally concern himself with the trip, its opinion cannot be accepted.

In the present case, the manager hired B and supervised his work. He intervened as an intermediate party between B, the worker, and the defendant, the proprietor. According to the decisions of the Reichsgericht, the proprietor of a large enterprise is not to be expected to select and supervise the entire personnel. If a number of persons are employed in a manner such that one is subordinate to another, then the employer's proof of care extends only to the selection and supervision of the higher employee chosen by him, the manager.

This easier proof for purposes of § 831 BGB is to be permitted, in the Reichsgericht's view, on the basis of what is equitable and consonant with the section's purpose. It is certainly true that the employer must institute a system of controls sufficient to guarantee reasonable supervision and conduct of business. Even if only the manager were required to exercise immediate personal oversight of the agricultural labourer, it remains the task of the estate owner to attend to the general regulation of the supervision which provides the guarantee for orderly conduct of the enterprise. If there is a defect in the organisational structure, then the employer is liable for negligence in providing general oversight as required by § 823 I BGB.

Some writers have opposed the Reichsgericht's basic principles for the liability of large enterprises. They feel that this easier burden of proof is inequitable and inconsistent with the Code. If an intermediary between the employer and the worker is employed, then it should not be sufficient for the employer to prove that he carefully selected and supervised this intermediary, but he should also prove that the intermediary acted carefully in the selection of subordinate employees. If the employer had appointed a legal representative (Vertreter) to make this selection, he would answer for the fault of this representative as though it were his own (§ 278 BGB); otherwise, moreover, one would reach the inequitable result that an entrepreneur with large capital resources could escape liability even though the higher employees were not in a position to pay large damages.

Nevertheless, these objections do not provide a basis upon which the Reichsgericht can discharge its task of deciding cases. Prevailing law distinguishes as to whether the basis for liability for the conduct of employees rests on contractual or on non-contractual principles. If the provisions of § 278 BGB, which pertain to contractual liability, are applicable in a variety of cases involving relationships similar to contracts, such as the public law responsibility for the safekeeping of objects (Verwahrungsverhältnis), it is still not possible to expand these provisions to cover the case of tortious liability for which the code has expressly provided the particular dispositions of § 831 BGB. This provision makes it possible for the employer to make a proof of exoneration, and also provides that his liability does not rest on whether his employee has committed a fault. This general principle of § 831 BGB is not dependent on the size of the enterprise. There were large enterprises in existence at the time the Civil Code was enacted, and it was impossible then, in these enterprises, for the selection and oversight of every single employee to be left to the owner or a legal representative (gesetzlicher Vertreter) chosen pursuant to § 831 BGB. If establishment of a particular rule governing such enterprises had been desired and, in particular, if the expansion of the legal concept contained in § 278 BGB to include delictual liability had been desired, it would have been expressed in the Code.

Accordingly, in the present case, the principal matter to be demonstrated was whether the defendant used the requisite care in the selection and supervision of his manager K.

...

Case 108

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 11 NOVEMBER 1956
MDR 1957, 214 (with approving note by Josef Esser)

In February 1952, as the plaintiff was leaving a house on S Street in Hamburg where he had been visiting his sister, he slipped on a walk which bordered the house and was separated from the sidewalk of S Street by strips of greenery, and suffered a compound fracture of the upper thigh. He contends that his fall was caused by a slippery patch of snow. He claims the defendant is liable for his accident as owner of the house and sidewalk because of a violation of a duty to sand the walk. The Landgericht rejected the claim. The appellate court held the claim for damages to be legally grounded. It granted the demand for a fixed sum of money and periodic payments, provided the claim was not paid by a publicly owned insurer. It also entered a judgment subject to the same reservation, declaring the defendant to be liable.

The Revision is without success.

Reasons

The appellate court found that it had been demonstrated that the walk had a slippery patch of snow and had not been sanded and that the defendant was under a duty to pay compensation under § 823 BGB because, as owner of the walk which was used by the general public and, in particular, by the residents of neighbouring houses and the customers of three stores located in them, the defendant had a duty to clean and sand the sidewalk according to the provisions of the Hamburg Road Cleaning Ordinance of 10 January, 1940 [reference] and regulations made under this Act on the same day [reference]; and that the responsibility falls on the defendant for not having taken care to fulfil the duty to sand the walk in the required way.

[The court rejects the defendant's contention that sanding the sidewalk was not required on the day of the accident under the Act and regulations just cited, because weather conditions that day would have made the sanding of the walk useless.]

Moreover, the conclusion that the defendant committed a fault stands up against legal scrutiny.

In this regard, the appellate court maintained that the assignment of the duty to clean and sand the walk to a married couple, W, living on the ground floor by a contract of lease had legal effect only in relations between the defendant and these lessees. The prerequisites for finding that the married couple W had a duty with public law effects to clean and sand the sidewalk under the provisions of the Road Cleaning Ordinance are absent. Therefore, as what is involved is a violation of a duty required of the defendant itself, and as the plaintiff's claim for compensation is based on § 831 BGB, the case does not turn on proof of exoneration under § 831 BGB. The defendant, indeed, is a large enterprise, which must employ the help of others to fulfil its duty to sand. The appellate court did not reject that the defendant had entrusted the lessees of the buildings with this task. But it correctly took as its premise that the defendant must organise the carrying out of the duty to sand so as to guarantee that it will be reliably performed.

The appellate court found that the defendant apparently placed the duty to clean and sand walks on the inhabitants of the ground floors of its buildings by simply inserting such provisions in form contracts of lease, and that the married couple W became obligated in this way without regard to whether the wife W, after the death of her husband and after attaining the age of seventy-six, still possessed the physical ability to do the cleaning. The appellate court took the view that the method used by the defendant for the employment of persons for sanding the walk does not satisfy the requirements imposed on him.

The Revision contests this view as too extensive, arguing that the customary practice in Germany is for the lessee living on the ground floor to be responsible for the performance of the duty to clean and sand the sidewalks, and that an objection to this practice should not be made if the owner of the building demonstrates that the lessee adequately performs this duty by himself or with the help of a third person.

The question can be left open whether placing the duty to clean and sand the sidewalks on the person living on the ground floor by a form contract of lease is consistent with the content of the duty of care in selecting persons to sand the sidewalks, a duty which concerns the building owner in the area of its responsibility under § 823 BGB to no less extent than the duty of care which falls on the employer under § 831 BGB concerning the selection of an employee. The owner of the building has at the least a duty of supervision which is sufficiently broad for it to be required to ensure that the lessee actually performs—or has another perform—the obligations assigned the lessee in a regular manner. The duty of general supervision rests on one who makes a careful selection of persons to whom he, as the one responsible for fulfilling a general duty, assigns the actual performance of this duty. This applies particularly and in very large measure when regard to the competence and reliability of these persons was not a decisive factor at the time they were employed.

According to the findings of the appellate court as to the factual situation, the defendant failed to provide the supervision required of it. The measures taken by the defendant consisted of the employment of a building manager for three different blocks of housing, located six to ten minutes apart and containing a total of thirty separate buildings. It need hardly be argued here that, as a general rule, it must be held insufficient for an enterprise leasing houses to employ only one man for a housing area of this size to supervise the performance of the duty to clean and sand walks by lessees. The manner in which Mrs W performed the duty assigned her of cleaning and sanding the walks had given cause for complaints before the day of the accident—that the place where the accident occurred was often not adequately sanded. The defendant could not have remained in ignorance of this if it had organised supervision in the manner required by the duty just described to provide oversight. As a result, the conclusion of the appellate court that the plaintiff's accident was caused by the neglect of the defendant must be accepted. The defendant is accordingly liable on the basis of §§ 831 and 823 BGB.

Case 109

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (DECISION OF THE GREAT SENATE) 4 MARCH 1957 BGHZ 24, 21 = NJW 1957, 785 = JZ 1957, 543 (see article by F Wieacker in JZ 1957, 535 = VERSR 1957, 288, 517, 783)

Reasons

1. The case submitted to the Great Senate for Civil Cases is based on the following facts:

The plaintiff took part in a family celebration and intended about 1.30 a.m. to return on the tramway run by the defendant enterprise from the "Apotheke" stopping-place. When he tried to mount the forward platform of the tramcar he fell: he was run over by a car and his right foot so severely injured that his leg had to be amputated below the knee. The plaintiff made the defendant, the driver, and the conductor of the vehicle responsible for the damage and put forward the following grounds for his claim:

The fall occurred because the tramcar started too soon. The conductor gave the departure signal and the driver started although both could have seen that the plaintiff was still just about to mount the forward platform. He had stood in front of the door when it started and had already grasped both the entrance handles. The driver did not stop immediately on getting the emergency signal from the conductor.

In his action the plaintiff demanded damages from the defendant, the driver, and the conductor of the tramcar.

The defendant, the driver, and the conductor admitted his claims in part . . . Otherwise they claimed that the action should be dismissed and urged that:

The conductor gave the signal to start and the driver set the tramcar in motion only after the invitation to enter had been given and no one else was prepared to enter. The plaintiff had been standing by a group of persons who had not intended to ride, but had then hurried after the moving tramcar and tried to jump on. When the emergency signal was given the driver stopped at once. The plaintiff had been drunk and had only himself to blame for the fall.

The Landgericht allowed the claim, reduced to one-half.

On appeal by the plaintiff and counter-appeal by the various defendants, the Oberlandesgericht dismissed the action against the driver and conductor and declared the defendant tramway company liable to pay compensation up to two-thirds.

On appeal the defendant company moved for a complete dismissal of the action.

2. It was disputed in the first place whether the defendant company also was liable under § 831 BGB for the damage caused by its employees. This question required examination because the plaintiff's claims were not completely supported by the Reichshaftpflichtgesetz, in particular in so far as he demanded damages for pain and suffering.

The Court of Appeal found that the defendant company was responsible under § 831 BGB for the damage to the plaintiff, because the driver, and perhaps also the conductor, had caused the physical injury unlawfully and because the defendant company had not produced the proof necessary for exonerating itself under § 831 I sentence 2, case 1 BGB from liability for its "employees". The Court of Appeal came to the conclusion that the way the fall occurred was not clear. It was possible that the plaintiff's allegations of fact were correct, but it was also possible that the accident happened in the way described by the defendant. In view of this negative result of the evidence, the Court of Appeal felt that the possibility could not be excluded that a causal connection did exist between a presumable failure of choice and supervision on the defendant company's part, and the occurrence of the damage (§ 831 sentence 2, case 2 BGB).

3. The Sixth Civil Senate had doubts whether to follow the Court of Appeal's findings of law. The doubts were directed above all against the view that an "employee" (for the purposes of § 831 BGB) engaged in tramway or railway traffic did damage unlawfully merely by causing physical injury. It is a matter for discussion whether the basis of the unlawfulness must be further gone into in order to show whether the conduct of the employees is objectively contrary to good traffic practice. For that purpose, reference is made to the traffic rules which regulate the conduct of participants in traffic in ever-greater detail. Recourse must also be had to the legal concept of social adequacy and to developments in modern criminal theory, more especially because according to this the concept of negligence includes essential requirements which relate to unlawfulness and not to fault. If a finding of unlawfulness in traffic accidents does not automatically follow from the resulting consequence but (is satisfied) only if a breach of the traffic regulations has occurred, then it seems probable, in view of the report laid before us, that the conception of the burden of proof hitherto followed in applying § 831 BGB can no longer be upheld. That must be true in particular of cases which resemble the one in question and are distinguished by the fact that, in view of the failure to clarify what happened on the occasion of the accident, no objectively irregular conduct on the part of the "employees" can be established.

The Sixth Civil Senate attaches fundamental importance to the clarification of these questions of law. In accordance with § 137 GVG it submits them for decision to the Great Senate for Civil Cases and formulates them as follows:

Does a person employed in tramway or railway traffic do damage unlawfully to another within the meaning of § 831 I BGB merely by injuring his life, body, health, or property? Or is it a further condition of unlawfulness that the participant employed in the traffic conducted himself in an objectively irregular way? Is the employer who fails to exonerate himself from the charge of defective selection or supervision liable under § 831 BGB even if according to the evidence the possibility remains open that the “employee” observed the objective duties of care and, in particular, the rules governing highway or rail traffic?

1. When § 831 BGB makes the employer’s liability depend on whether his “employee” did unlawful damage to another person in executing his task, this requirement connects it with the factual situations of the law of delict in which the unlawful acts involving a duty of compensation are described and delimited. Not every doing of damage produces liability, but only such as falls within a liability situation of the law of delict, and, therefore, is an “unlawful act” in the sense of §§ 823 ff. BGB. Accordingly, for the purpose of traffic accidents as here in question, in the first place a reference is needed to § 823 BGB, especially § 823 I. Claims for damages are constantly recurring from injuries to life, body, health, or property in tramway and railway traffic. Now the wording of § 823 I BGB requires that the injury to the enumerated legal interest be unlawful, that is to say repugnant to the legal order. The legislator, however, when describing in legal terms the factual basis of illegality, indicates that he regards the breach of the legal interests listed in § 823 I BGB as normally unlawful. By adding “unlawful”, however, he indicates that the mere breach does not necessarily involve unlawfulness, but that unlawfulness can for special reasons not exist. It may be questionable whether that indication was needed. It is certainly useful in applying the law, by making judges attentive to the fact that any factual description of unlawful conduct is bound to be incomplete and that therefore they are under a duty to examine whether a finding of unlawfulness based on a fulfilment of the factual conditions must be withdrawn on special grounds. Further, the BGB does not provide an exhaustive formulation for defining when there is a legal justification. The initial provision about consent as a justification was struck out in the discussion of the draft because it was desired to leave to practice the task of marking out the limits of justification. Moreover, the jurists and judges have also developed slowly those principles to which they may have resort for the purposes of excluding unlawfulness, such as on the basis of negotiorum gestio, the protection of vested rights, or the balancing of interests. There is, therefore, no exhaustive legal catalogue of justifications, no numerus clausus which would set limits to legal development. Accordingly, the matter must be gone into now that the report of the Sixth Civil Senate has submitted for discussion the question whether, in the special field of tramway or railway traffic, conduct fulfilling on its face the factual condition of § 823 I BGB must no longer be adjudged unlawful if it was in harmony with the legal regulations laid down for the traffic.

The line of thought in that direction found in the report must in principle be approved. The draftsmen of the BGB may indeed not have recognized that these are matters for discussion which concern objective unlawfulness and not merely fault in the sense of personal blameworthiness. Only with the technical development of traffic and the increase in its dangers did modern mass traffic produce problems calling for regulatory legislation. The legislator was faced with the need to regulate by increasingly detailed provisions the duties of participants in traffic, so that the possibilities of danger should be reduced to a minimum. At the same time, the legal provisions dealing with liability for risks were developed in order to apportion with social fairness in their economic effects the dangers and risks rendered inevitable by modern traffic. In the process, it was more and more recognised that what was in question was not a liability for wrong but a duty on those in control of dangerous operations to assume responsibility for certain typical risks. With that legal development there is no longer any place in the law of delict for a doctrine that looks upon unavoidable injuries in tramway and railway traffic as unlawful injuries to persons or property and denies liability only for lack of fault. The legal order, in permitting dangerous traffic and prescribing in detail to its participants how to conduct themselves, declares that conduct conforming to those prescriptions is within the law. It is not right that conduct which takes full account of the orders and prohibitions of the traffic regulations should nevertheless be adjudged unlawful. The actual consequences do not afford sufficient ground for it, for, in deciding whether conduct is unlawful within the meaning of the BGB provisions about delicts, one cannot leave unconsidered the act that produced the consequences. The rule must therefore be laid down that orderly conduct of a participant in tramway or railway traffic conforming to traffic regulations does not produce unlawful damage.

Whether the result implies a special application of the legal idea of so-called social adequacy may be left unanswered. Since the question here is restricted to the field of traffic law, there is also no need to go into whether the same result could equally be obtained through reliance on modern criminal theory, which splits up the concept of negligence by treating the enquiry into the observance of objectively required care as appertaining to unlawfulness, and only the question whether the disapproved conduct should be imputed to an individual doer as an inquiry into fault. Doubt must in any case be expressed as to whether, if this complex concept of negligence in modern criminal theory were to be taken over into civil law, in the law of civil responsibility, also, under cover of a special enquiry into fault, a special standard of judgment should be imposed on the conduct of the doer of damage that took account of his personal characteristics. That might, indeed, appear to harmonise the legal concepts, but it would not allow for typical differences which arise from the specific characteristics and purposes of two different branches of the law. In particular, this view would not be in accord with the provisions of § 276 I 2 BGB as it has always been understood in applying the law.

2. The question submitted to the court now makes it necessary to enquire what are the consequences produced by the standpoint adopted for apportioning the burden of proof. Here it must be recalled that the legislator, by establishing a separate factual basis for delicts, intended to lighten the judges' task of examining whether a wrongful act exists or not. Unlike the cases where delict is governed by a general clause, leaving a wide scope for judicial interpretation (§§ 823—25 BGB), in describing casuistically the wrongs giving rise to liability, the legislator affords a solid basis for applying the law, by suggesting, at least provisionally, the criterion of unlawfulness. Thus, an injury to one of the legal interests especially named in § 823 I BGB to which the law affords a preferred protection, needs a special justification if it is not to be adjudged unlawful. That applies irrespective of whether the act was done intentionally. This relation of rule and exception established as part of the system of our law of delict and upheld in its application has, in accord with the recognised principles of the law of evidence, the consequences that the proof of a justification is for the person who infringes a protected legal interest. In this respect, the justification afforded by conduct according to rules in tramway and railway traffic can claim no separate status.

This apportionment of the burden of proof in applying § 823 I BGB to traffic accidents means that the doer of damage can provide a basis for justification by proving that his conduct conformed to traffic rules. If the proof is supplied, proof of fault ceases to have any substance, because there is to start with no unlawful infliction of injury. If on the other hand the question whether his conduct in traffic was regular is not cleared up, one starts with an unlawful injurious act. The question of liability however is not yet decided; for § 823 I also requires the injurious act to have been intentional or careless. The injured party must therefore prove that the doer acted intentionally or negligently, in the meaning of § 276 I 2 BGB, that is to say omitted to take the care required in daily intercourse. For that enquiry also it will, of course, be essential to know whether the provisions of the traffic regulations have been observed. That the question of conduct according to the traffic rules can be significant for unlawfulness and fault is due to the shape and legal classification of the concept of negligence. For the practical application of the law it remains that the injured party must prove in full the conditions of a claim for compensation under § 823 I BGB and that accordingly—unless there is a prima-facie case—an insufficient elucidation of the facts is to his disadvantage.

The apportionment of the burden of proof in applying § 831 BGB is different. There the legislator consciously made the employer's liability depend only on the "employee's" acting unlawfully and not also on his doing the damage intentionally or negligently. In so far therefore as concerns the "employee's" conduct, only those principles governing the burden of proof apply that affect the sphere of unlawfulness. Thus, the injured party must prove that the "employee" by an adequately causal act injured one of the legal interests protected in § 823 I. On the other hand, it is for the employer to prove that the "employee's" conduct was regular, because it conformed to the legal rules of tramway or railway traffic. So far, doubt is to the disadvantage of the employer. On the other hand, if regular conduct of the "employee" is proved, the conditions for a claim under § 831 BGB are unfulfilled, so that there is no longer any need to go into whether proof can be provided that there was no causal connection between the prima-facie presumption of faulty selection or supervision, and the damage. From that last-mentioned point of view the Reichsgericht had denied the employer's liability when the judge was convinced that even a carefully chosen and supervised "employee" could not have acted differently in the given case. That the production of the exoneratory proof under § 831 I and II BGB makes it unnecessary to go into the question of unlawful injury is self-evident.

It is clear that as regards a traffic accident the cause of which remains obscure, the regulation of the burden of proof set out above makes it better for the injured party if the "employee" and not the employer himself has caused the accident. In the latter case the employer's liability is as a rule excluded, because no fault can be established, whereas where it is caused by the employee, the employer is liable if he cannot exonerate himself from the charge of imperfect choice and supervision. This preferential treatment was clearly intended by the legislator, for there is here a certain allowance for the fact that otherwise the injured party's legal position is quite unfavourable because exoneration is possible and usually successful. It is precisely for that reason that it would be wrong in applying the law to do away with the part favourable to an injured party in the regulation of the BGB of delictual liability for "employees". If one observes that emphasis is there placed—even though incompletely—on responsibility for enterprise risks, it is not unfair to impose on the one in whose sphere of influence the risk originated the burden of proof about the way the damage occurred, which he is usually, though not always, in a better position to satisfy than the one to whom it occurred. Also so far as the provision of “appliances and implements”, which include the means of transport, is concerned, the law has for the same reason imposed on the employer within the framework of § 831 BGB an enhanced duty of elucidation and proof. If the evaluation of the employee’s conduct is under discussion, attention must also be paid to the point of view that the employee—-that is the meaning of the reversal of the burden of proof—-must be considered to have been unfit for his task, until the employer proves that he showed the care described more fully in § 831 I 2 BGB.

Case 110

BUNDESARBEITSGERICHT (GREAT SENATE) 12 JUNE 1992
BAGE 70, 337 = NJW 1993, 1732 = JZ 1993, 908 = NZA 1993, 547

Facts

The claimant, who runs a building business, had to build a boundary wall around a house plot. Its foreman for this work was the defendant. Ditches 80 cm deep and 16 cm wide had to be dug with an excavator for the foundations. The claimant’s director showed the defendant the site in the presence of a fellow employee. During the excavation, the excavator driver damaged a gas pipe. Gas escaped into the cellar rooms of the house and exploded. Damage amounting to DM 244,263 was done to the house. The claimant seeks compensation from the defendant for the part of the loss not covered by its business liability insurance. It claims that the defendant had been shown the location of the pipe from the gas main to the cellar and that the plan and the street excavation had shown where the house connection ran. The defendant had been advised that in this area the digging ought only to be by hand. Nevertheless, he had failed to instruct the excavator driver accordingly, and told him that he did not need to take care, as there were no pipes there.

The claim was unsuccessful at earlier instances. The LAG stated that there was no liability as the defendant was not grossly negligent. It considered that, contrary to the case law of the highest courts, this should also apply to non-dangerous work, as here. The claimant lodged an appeal in law. The 8th Senate of the BAG wished to depart from the view of the Great Senate, and apply the principles developed by the case law about limiting employee liability in the case of dangerous work to non-dangerous work as well, if it results from the business and is carried out on the basis of the employment relationship. It has therefore asked the Great Senate of the BAG to decide on this legal issue under § 45 (2) sentence 1 of the Labour Courts Act.

Reasons

The Great Senate of the BAG agrees with the legal opinion of the 8th Senate to the effect that the limiting of employee liability is not conditional on the dangerous nature of the work. The limiting of employee liability should instead apply in all cases in which an employee causes harm in connection with work which is carried out for business reasons.

I.1. The BAG since the decision of its Great Senate of 25 September 1957 (references omitted) proceeds on the basis that, for harm which an employee has negligently caused in the carrying out of dangerous work, he is only liable to his employer in accordance with the following principles: In the case of gross negligence the employee has as a rule to bear the total loss alone. In the case of the slightest negligence he is not liable. For normal negligence the loss is as a rule to be divided between the employer and the employee proportionately and in this connection all the circumstances regarding the causing of the harm and its consequences are to be balanced against each other in a reasonable way in accordance with the principles of fairness (references omitted). But these principles alleviating liability which evolved by development of the law apply (according to the case law so far) only where dangerous work is concerned. The Great Senate considers it necessary no longer to limit the alleviation of liability to cases of dangerous work, because otherwise, under §§ 276 and 249 of the BGB, employees who do not carry on any dangerous activity would in principle have to bear the whole of the loss where there is a violation of duties of care and protection in the employment contract which leads to loss for the employer. To burden an employee with such a risk of liability is not justified, having regard to the possible extent of the harm (and also that present here) and the fact that compensation for it can lead to serious inroads into his lifestyle. It would contradict the principle of proportionality (reference omitted).

2. The Great Senate is authorised, according to Article 20 para. 3 of the Basic Law and § 45 (2) of the Labour Courts Act, to adapt employee liability law to actual business conditions by developing it beyond the existing case law (reference omitted).

(a) The provisions of the BGB do not contain a closed regime for employment contract law (reference omitted).

Even on the enactment of the BGB, a gap in the law was assumed in relation to employee liability. In the materials, a special statutory regime for employment contracts “inclusive of compensation law questions” was demanded “as soon as possible” (reference omitted). In addition to this, employees have been increasingly exposed to liability risks since the time when the BGB came into force. Formerly, harm caused by employees was kept within boundaries, but since those days it has become capable of leading to unreasonable levels of liability for employees because of the substantially higher value of the means of production used by employers. In this respect, because of the gap in the BGB’s regime which was present from the outset, there is an obvious defective development which must not be accepted. Not just because of the special nature of work, but also because of the increase in value of means of production, the employee is exposed in the world of work today to a very much higher risk of harm, which in part threatens his very existence.

(b) Until now, in spite of various plans, no statutory liability regime for employees has been enacted nor is this issue at present the subject of pending legislation . . .

II. The Great Senate of the BAG takes the view that as to all harm caused by employees in the employment relationship which arises in connection with activities which are business related, limitation of employee liability is required. This view is propounded in the academic literature almost unanimously, although on the basis of differing reasoning (references omitted).

1. According to § 254 of the BGB, the duty to compensate as well as the amount of compensation to be provided depends on the circumstances and in particular on how far the harm has been caused mainly by the one or the other party. § 254 of the BGB is applied to circumstances beyond its wording (that the person harmed has himself contributed in the origin of the harm) when the person harmed is jointly responsible for the harm which has arisen on the basis of a property or business related danger for which he has to take responsibility. This will occur if he has been involved in the origin of the harm in a way that can be attributed to him. At the same time, it is recognised that a division of the harm can range from full liability of the tortfeasor and his complete exoneration, depending on assessment of the circumstances in the individual case (references omitted).

2. These legal principles also apply in the employment relationship in relation to employee liability. The BAG proceeds—admittedly with the further prerequisite of the presence of a dangerous activity—in constant case law (references omitted) on the basis that the business risk has to be considered from the employer's side. The employer cannot simply shift the loss which business risk brings with it on to the employee just because he has entrusted him with the execution of work to be carried out in the interests of the business. As the employer claims the results of the business activity for himself, he must assume liability for the risks associated with it. The business risk relates to the danger of e.g. the production plant, the production itself or the manufactured products and thereby encompasses only part of the sources of business related harm.

3. Over and above this, there is the ground of attributability, and therefore of liability or joint liability, of the employer within the framework of § 254 of the BGB arising from his actual organisational and staff authority and the legal formulation of the employee's personal dependence and responsibility to obey instructions. This justifies also imposing on the employer the organisation risk, as an element of the general risk of the undertaking. The employer puts at the disposal of the business the organisation predetermined by him. He can thereby direct the work process organisationally and technically. The employee is integrated into this business in order to realise, alone or together with the employees employed in the business, the technical work purpose of the business by activity which is directed by instructions. The employer can determine the technical work purpose of the business on his own responsibility, can formulate the business organisation in accordance with his plans and needs, and can exert influence over the employee's activity. The employee's pursuit of his job is directed by his integration into the business organisation and the actual conditions of the work process (e.g. the type of technical plant available (which is often particularly valuable) and the arrangement of the work organisation and of the production process, with qualitative and quantitative requirements in relation to the work products).

The employee cannot avoid these pre-determined conditions of work either factually or legally. The employer, on the basis of his right to give instructions, determines the performance of work owed under the employment contract in a concrete sense. He can decisively influence the conditions of the performance of work (e.g. by organisational or technical measures). He can also authoritatively shape the temporal components of the performance of work within the framework of the maximum permitted limits. And finally he can lay down the place of performance of work in accordance with the regime in the employment contract. The organisation of the business established by the employer thereby determines the risk of liability for the employee. By virtue of his power in the organisation, the employer can create, maintain or alter conditions for risks of harm e.g. he can take steps to prevent danger factors by alteration of the work process, better supervision, safety precautions or other planned risk protection, like effecting insurance. In a risk situation of this kind created by the employer, he himself must allow risks of harm to be attributed to him within the framework of § 254 of the BGB and cannot, or cannot only, offload them on his employee even if the employee is at fault in the causing of the harm.

III. The protective scope of the regime under § 254 of the BGB in the employment relationship is also influenced by constitutional law guarantees under Article 12 para. 1 sentence 2 in combination with Article 2 para. 1 of the Basic Law.

1. According to the constant case law of the Federal Constitutional Court, the basic right norms do not only contain subjective defensive rights of the individual against the state. They also embody at the same time an objective order of values which applies as a basic constitutional law decision for all areas of law and thus also for civil law, and gives directives and impulses for legislation and case law. No civil law provision may exist which contradicts the principles which are expressed in the basic rights. This applies primarily for those provisions of private law which contain compulsory law and therefore set limits to private autonomy (references omitted).

2. The statutory regime under § 254 of the BGB admittedly gives no indication that it intrudes into the basic rights contained in Article 2 para. 1 and Article 12 para. 1 of the Basic Law or that it secures basic right protection. However the scope of the protection which these basic rights are meant to secure can also be affected by provisions which have a close internal connection with the exercise of a vocation and display a tendency to regulate it (references omitted). These prerequisites are present here, because, depending on how employee liability law is formulated legally, there is a tendency for an intrusion into the employer's economic freedom of action and activity, the development of the personality of the employee and the exercise of the vocation of the employer and the employee. If the employee is liable for harm for which he is responsible, this has an effect on the development of his personality and affects the exercise of his vocation. If the employer is liable wholly or partly, this intrudes into his economic freedom of action and activity and the exercise of his vocation.

3. Article 2 para. 1 of the Basic Law guarantees the general freedom of action in the full sense (reference omitted). It includes on the one hand the freedom of economic activity as an employer and at the same time gives with this an appropriate amount of space for development of entrepreneurial initiative (reference omitted). On the other hand this basic right protects the general right of personality (reference omitted) and thereby the development of the personality of the employee. This increases in importance specifically in view of modern developments in working life and the new dangers to the human personality associated with this. The vocational activity for which Article 12 para. 1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law guarantees the necessary scope for the employer as well as for the employee does not only serve the personal development of the working man in society. It also guarantees citizens who have to rely on the use of their capacity to work the possibility to make for themselves an economic basis for existence (references omitted). In the framework of employment law, this typically occurs through contracts in which the employer and the employee reciprocally limit their vocational freedom of action in the exchange of stipulated counter obligations. Vocational freedom under Article 12 para. 1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law thereby protects the exercise of the vocation of the employer as well as that of the employee with a view to the free development of their individual capacity to earn a living and provide services (reference omitted).

4. Proceeding from this constitutional law basis, an unlimited liability for harm on the part of the employee represents a disproportionate intrusion into the employee's right to the free development of his personality (Article 2 para. 1 of the Basic Law) and into his right to free exercise of his vocation (Article 12 para. 1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law).

(a) The duty of protection under Article 12 para. 1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law to guarantee the exercise of vocation represents a substantial part of the realisation of the right of personality (reference omitted) and, in combination with the social state principle in Article 20 para. 1 of the Basic Law, secures the general requirements for life and the minimum for existence (reference omitted) as the lowest prerequisite for an existence consistent with human dignity. On the basis of the value order of these interests protected by the basic rights, a disproportionate interference with the exercise of the right of vocation must be assumed if, in an employment relationship, unreasonable financial burdens or even danger to the economic existence of the employee can arise through general risks of harm associated with business. This would be so in an employment relationship if the employee had to assume unlimited liability for all negligently caused harm, even where the negligence was only slight. The employer is by the organisation of the work, with regard to the actual and legal arrangement of the activity as well as through integration into the business organisation, exposed to risks which he cannot avoid. These conditions created by the employer and the value of the means of production used by the employer determine the extent and scope of the employee's risks of liability (see, on this issue, II 3 above). With such an extensive determination of the work by another party, the employee's interests protected by the basic rights are violated if the income from the work is substantially disproportionate to the level of the harm to be compensated for, or if the employee's duty to compensate leads to his economic existence being endangered. Such an excessive and therefore disproportionate financial burden for the employee represents an unacceptable disturbance of the relationship of equivalence between salary and harm to be compensated for. It compels the employee and his family to live with the minimum for existence which is determined by the limits to enforcement proceedings for a lengthy or even unforeseeable period. This can have the ultimate consequence of leading to every incentive for a further exercise of the employee's vocation being taken away from him, because it seems to him to be useless.

(b) Over against this, the basic right position of the employer is not unreasonably affected by the imposition of risks of liability in the scope in question here. The employer must put up with limitations of his freedom of economic action and activity (Article 2, para. 1, of the Basic Law) and exercise of his vocation (Article 12, para. 1, sentence 2 of the Basic Law) as protected by the basic rights, because he sets the conditions of work and business himself on his own responsibility and is thereby jointly responsible for the employee's risks of harm (see II 3). In these factual and legal conditions, there is no equality of power between the parties to an employment contract, so through the regime of § 254 of the BGB, a proper balancing of interests by limitation of the employer's freedom of exercise of vocation should be allowed. The possession and use of assets available in the business must take second place to the employee's ability to work and perform services if this is necessary for the protection of his existence. Therefore the attribution of the risk situation created by the employer on his own responsibility should be seen as a socially adequate formulation of the employer's freedom of economic action and activity and exercise of vocation.

(c) Such an attribution is not unreasonable, having regard to the legal position in favour of the employer which is at issue in constitutional law. The question of whether and, if appropriate, in what sum the harm is to be attributed to the employer should be governed by the circumstances of the individual case as a whole having regard to the causes of the harm and its consequences. Besides this, the points of view mentioned in the case law so far (references omitted), insofar as they are based on the work relationship, are to be considered within the framework of § 254 of the BGB, on weighing up the circumstances of the individual case. This includes, for example, the danger involved in an activity, a risk which can be taken into account by the employer and covered by insurance, the position of the employee in the business, the level of salary, the personal circumstances of the employee, as for instance how long he has been part of the business, his age, his family circumstances as well as the employee's conduct so far under his contract of employment.

5. So as not to burden the employer with the general risks in life of the employee, the activity which has led to the harm must be caused in connection with the business and based on the employment relationship. Activities caused in connection with the business are those activities of the employee which have been entrusted to him for business purposes or which he carries out in the interests of the business, which are in close relationship with the business and his area of operation in the business and which in this sense are caused in connection with the business (references omitted) . . .

2. § 278 BGB (OR § 831 BGB)

Case 111

REICHSGERICHT (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 7 DECEMBER 1911

RGZ 78, 239 = JW 1912, 191

Reasons

According to the findings of the Court of Appeal the plaintiff, after making several purchases in the defendant company's department store, went to the linoleum department to buy linoleum floor-cover. She mentioned this to W, the sales assistant who served there, and looked through the patterns which he displayed for her to make a choice. W, in order to pull out the roll she pointed to, put two others aside. They fell, hit the plaintiff and her child, and struck both of them to the floor. The purchase of the linoleum was not completed because, in the plaintiff's words, she became seriously disturbed by the fall.

The Court of Appeal rightly attributed the plaintiff's accident to W's fault, on the ground that he had put the rolls, which were not stable enough because of their relatively small bulk, insecurely on one side, instead of furnishing them with lateral protection on leaning them against the wall, and this even though he could have foreseen that the plaintiff, as usually happens with the buying public, would approach the place where the goods she had asked to be displayed were stored. The Court of Appeal's view is comprised in the simple conclusion that the rolls would not have fallen if W had placed them carefully and regularly on one side.

The Court of Appeal's opinion that the defendant company is liable for W's fault under § 278 BGB cannot, in spite of the appellant's contention, be rightly objected to; and it conforms to the case-law of this Senate. W was acting for the defendant company (§ 164 BGB, § 54 HGB) when he entered into negotiation with the plaintiff. The plaintiff had asked for a piece of linoleum to be laid out for inspection and purchase. W had acceded to her request in order to make a sale. The proposal and its acceptance had for their purpose the conclusion of a sale, and therefore the production of a legal transaction. That was no mere factual proceeding, a mere act of courtesy, but a legal relationship came into existence between the parties in preparation for a purchase; it bore a character similar to a contract and produced legal obligations in so far as both seller and prospective buyer came under a duty to observe the necessary care for the health and property of the other party in displaying and inspecting the goods.

The judgments of this Senate have already proceeded on similar grounds, and it has been recognised in several decisions of the Reichsgericht that duties of care for the life and property of the other party can arise from bilateral or unilateral obligations, which have nothing to do with the legal nature of the relation in a narrower sense, but nevertheless follow from its factual character.

The defendant company made use of W's services for the fulfilment of the aforesaid obligation to the prospective purchaser, and is therefore answerable for his fault. This is in line with the thought expressed in § 278 BGB, that whoever himself owes a performance that he must carry out with the required amount of care must, when he makes use of an employee, answer for his careful performance, and that accordingly the other person to whom the performance is due must not be put in a worse position because he does not do it himself but commits it to an employee. It would be contrary to the general feeling of justice if in cases where the person in charge of the business of displaying or laying out goods for exhibition, sampling, trial, or the like carelessly injures a prospective purchaser, the proprietor of the business—with whom the prospector wished to make a purchase—should be answerable only under § 831 BGB and not unconditionally, so that the injured person should, if the proprietor succeeds in exonerating himself, be referred to the usually impecunious employee.

There is no need to go here into the legally questionable view of the Court of Appeal that the mere entry into a department store of a prospective purchaser or even a visitor without any intention of buying creates a contractual relation between him and the proprietor, including the widely discussed duties of care . . .

Case 112

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (EIGHTH CIVIL SENATE) 28 JANUARY 1976
BGHZ 66, 51 = NJW 1976, 712 = JZ 1976, 776 with approving note by K F Kreuzer = VERSR 1976, 589

The plaintiff, who at the time of the accident was fourteen years of age, went with her mother to a branch of the defendant's, a small self-service store. Whilst her mother, after selecting her goods, stood at the till, the plaintiff went round to the packing counter to help her mother pack the goods. In doing so she fell to the floor and suffered an injury which necessitated lengthy treatment. Alleging that she had slipped on a vegetable leaf, she sued the defendant for breach of his duty to provide safe access. The Court of Appeal, having dismissed as time-barred the claim for damages for pain and suffering, the parties are now in dispute only on the question whether the defendant is obliged to compensate the plaintiff for her economic loss as well as prospective damage.

The Landgericht rejected the claim as time-barred. The Court of Appeal granted it—after deducting one-fourth for contributory fault. The defendant's further appeal was unsuccessful for these

Reasons

I. The Court of Appeal found as proved that the plaintiff slipped on a vegetable leaf lying on the floor near the packing counter and suffered injuries which necessitated the expenditure in question and may possibly lead to future loss. These findings disclose no legal error; they are in fact undisputed on appeal.

II. According to the Court of Appeal's opinion the defendant had not furnished the proof incumbent on him that he had taken all necessary care for the safety of movement in his store and that the accident could only be attributed to the fact that another customer had shortly before let a vegetable leaf fall to the floor. These findings also cannot be faulted legally. They conform to the settled case-law of the BGH (NJW 1962, 31; cf. also RGZ 78, 239) both on the duty of a shopkeeper to ensure safety of movement and on the reversal of the burden of proof required by § 282 BGB in cases of claims for damages based on culpa in contrahendo. This point also is not contested on appeal.

III. The defendant therefore is liable—so continued the Court of Appeal—after taking the contributory fault of the plaintiff into account, for three-quarters of the existing and prospective loss, and that not only in delict, but also for fault in concluding contract, since in opening the self-service store he infringed the contractual duty of protection and care which he had undertaken to the plaintiff. Moreover, the plaintiff also has a claim for damages under a contract with protective effects towards a third party because her mother was during the accident preparing to contract with the defendant and the plaintiff was being included as an assistant within the scope of that contract-like obligation. For claims, however, arising from fault in concluding a contract the limitation period is thirty years, so that the claim was brought in good time.

IV. These explanations stand up to examination—at least in result. Admittedly, the main line of the Court of Appeal's reasoning, that the defendant is directly liable to the plaintiff for fault in concluding the contract, irrespective of whether a contract with protective effects towards a third party needs to be brought into the picture, gives rise to doubts. Liability for culpa in contrahendo, which in cases like the present one is more favourable to a plaintiff than the general liability in delict for breach of the duty to provide safe access—because of the increased liability for employees (§ 278 BGB in contrast to § 831 BGB), the longer limitation period (§ 195 BGB in contrast to § 852 BGB), and the reversal of the burden of proof (§ 282 BGB)—rests on a legal obligation created by way of supplement to the written law. It arises from the process of bargaining for a contract and is largely independent of the actual conclusion or efficacy of a contract (BGHZ 6, 330, 333). The liability for a breach of the duties of protection and care arising from this obligation finds, in cases of the present kind, its justification in the fact that the injured party entered the other party's sphere of influence for the purpose of negotiating for a contract and can therefore rely on an enhanced carefulness in the other party to the negotiation (cf. also BGH NJW 1960, 720). This is borne out exactly by the present case in which the mother entered the sales department of the defendant for the purpose of making a purchase and in doing so had to subject herself to a risk involved in the increased congestion, especially near the till, in a self-service store. It is, however, always a presupposition of liability for culpa in contrahendo in this type of contract of sale that the injured party enters the sales department with the purpose of contracting or of entering into "business contacts"—and therefore at least as a possible customer, though perhaps without a fixed intention to purchase (cf. BGH NJW 1962, 31). It need not be decided whether it is enough, in view of the peculiarities of sale in a self-service store, for a customer (when entering the sales department) to have intended at first only to have a look at the objects offered and be possibly stimulated to buy or only to make a preliminary comparison of prices with those in competing enterprises. In any case there is insufficient justification for a contractual liability for culpa in contrahendo stretching beyond liability for delict when the person entering the store never intended to buy, perhaps because—leaving aside the shop-lifter mentioned by the Court of Appeal—he is sheltering from a shower or using the store as a way through to another street or even only to meet other persons. The line may be difficult to draw in particular cases, above all because it depends on the difficult proof of unexpressed intention. In the present case, however, it is beyond dispute that the plaintiff from the start did not intend to make a contract herself but only to accompany her mother and help her in buying. A direct application of liability for fault in concluding a contract with the defendant is therefore excluded.

V. Nevertheless, the appellate judgment is proved right in result, because it is supported by supplementary considerations.

1. If the plaintiff's mother had been injured in the same way as her daughter, there would have been no objection to making the defendant liable for culpa in contrahendo—as is also clearly stated in the appeal. In that case nothing need be said about the question, disputed in academic circles, whether in a self-service store the display of the goods constitutes an offer and the contract of sale is concluded by the buyer's accepting it in presenting the selected goods at the till—thus reserving a final decision until that moment—or whether the display of the goods constitutes only an invitation to make offers, which the customer for his part makes by showing them to the cashier and the latter accepts by registering it on behalf of the self-service store. In any case, the general run of the reasons for the judgment, even though it contained no express statement by the Court of Appeal, makes it obvious that at the moment of the accident the goods intended for the purchase had already been finally chosen and a legal obligation already existed between the defendant and the plaintiff's mother justifying liability for culpa in contrahendo.

2. It is on the legal obligation that the plaintiff can rely to justify her contractual claim for damages. It accords with the long-standing case-law of this Senate in particular that in special circumstances even bystanders who do not themselves participate in a contract are included in the protection afforded by it, with the consequence that although they have no claim to have the primary contractual duty performed, they are entitled to the protection and care offered by the contract and can make good in their own name claims for damages arising from the breach of those subsidiary duties . . . It is not necessary to consider here the theoretical question whether such a contract with protective effects toward third parties, on which the courts have proceeded hitherto, is derived from the supplementary interpretation of a contract incomplete to that extent (§§ 133, 157 BGB), or whether, as is increasingly accepted in the literature, direct quasi-contractual claims arise on grounds independent of the hypothetical intention of the parties, perhaps from customary law, or on the basis of legal developments by the courts. In any case, according to both views it is essential that the contract, according to its sense of purpose and the requirements of good faith, demands an inclusion of third parties in its sphere of protection; and that one party to the contract can in honesty—and in a manner discernible by the other party—expect that the care and protection owed to it will be equally extended to a third person. There is no good reason to exclude sales in general from this legally possible configuration as this is shown in particular by sales in shops to which buyers, in certain circumstances, must enter the sphere of influence of the seller. And that is also the view of the Sixth Senate in BGHZ 51, 91, 96.

3. Admittedly the inclusion of third persons in the sphere of protection of a contract—if the contract between contractual and delictual liability established by the legislator is not to be destroyed or blurred—needs to be confined to narrowly defined cases. Whether the mere fact that the customer makes use of a third person in initiating and concluding a purchase in a self-service store is enough for the protected effect to be accepted as possible may be left undecided; for in the present case it must be added that the plaintiff's mother was responsible for her daughter “for better or worse” (BGHZ 51, 91, 96) and therefore—and this should be known to the defendant also—for that reason alone it could reasonably be inferred that the daughter accompanying her should enjoy the same protection as herself. In such a close family relationship the courts have always seen themselves justified in extending contractual protection.

4. That in the present case the sale was not concluded at the moment of the accident is, in the result, unimportant. If one looks upon the duty of protection and care as the determining element of the legal obligation based on negotiating for a contract, and if one considers that the other party owes this duty of care both before and after the conclusion of the contract, the inclusion of third persons (who are equally worthy of protection) in the obligation follows. Moreover, there would be no rational ground for making the contractual liability depend on the chance of whether the negotiations had already led to a contract when the damage occurred; that is impressively shown by the present case, where the “sale negotiations” had, in essence, been completed and the conclusion of the contract—possibly subject to a delay on the mother's part in completing it at the till, and for which the plaintiff's mother was not responsible—was in any case imminent. The appellant's contention that a cumulation of liability for culpa in contrahendo and inclusion of a third party in the protective effect of a contract would lead to an unforeseeable widening of the risk on a seller, is directed in principle against justification of both institutions in general. The danger of a flood of litigation, which cannot be dismissed out of hand, has, as has already been explained, long been taken into account by the courts, which have imposed strict requirements on the inclusion of third parties in the protective sphere of a contract. As regards to merely pre-contractual relations some reservation may be indicated. But in any case with so narrow a limitation there is no objection to an extension of protection if—as here—the person causing the damage could not reasonably have opposed any desire expressed by the mother, when negotiating for a contract, to have from the start the same protection expressly given to the child who was subsequently injured herself. Finally, in so far as the appellant contends that the long limitation period—combined with the reversal of the burden of proof—would intolerably worsen the evidentiary position of anyone sued for damages in such situations, the remedy must be found in laches (Verwirkung) of the existence of which there is no indication in this case.

Case 113

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (THIRD CIVIL SENATE) 10 MAY 1951
BGHZ 2, 94 = NJW 1951, 596

The plaintiff was leaving the hospital where his wife was a private patient when he fell and suffered concussion, a fractured skull, and a cerebral haemorrhage. He alleged that the accident was due to the dangerous condition of the main entrance of the hospital, and claimed damages from the defendant. So far as his action was based on breach of contract it was dismissed at all levels of jurisdiction.

Reasons

The Court of Appeal held that the defendant was not liable on its contract with the plaintiff for the hospitalisation of the plaintiff's wife. It accepted that under a contract of lease the tenant's family have a contractual claim against the landlord if there is a defect in the leased dwelling or its approaches which is attributable to him and they suffer harm thereby; and it agreed that the hospitalisation contract is like a lease in certain respects; it found, however, that the lease features of a hospital contract are really very subsidiary: the patient has no claim to any particular form, and the primacy of the medical treatment reduces the significance of the premises as compared with a contract of lease. Therefore no contractual liability of the defendant arose under § 278 BGB.

In contesting these views, the appellant emphasises the fact that he himself made the contract whereby his wife was taken in by the defendant as a private patient. The contract bound him to pay the hospital bill and bound the defendant not only to care for his wife (§ 328 BGB), but also, as a subsidiary duty, to enable him to visit his wife in safety. Given that he was a principal contracting party, it is irrelevant, says the plaintiff, whether, had he not been, the defendant would be liable to him under § 328 BGB in the way the landlord is liable to the tenant's family.

Contrary to the appellant's view, the contractual liability of the defendant for the accident which the plaintiff suffered as he was leaving the hospital by the front steps cannot depend on whether it was the plaintiff himself or his wife who entered into the hospitalisation contract. It is true that a contract is formed when a private patient is taken into a hospital, even a hospital run by a public body (RGZ 64, 231; 83, 72; 111, 263; see also RGZ 108, 87), and that the plaintiff as husband acquired contractual rights against the defendant (RGZ 64, 233); yet it is not from the formation of the contract but from its content that a duty to take care of the plaintiff's safety must arise. If in addition to the primary obligation towards the patient to give him medical treatment, the terms of the contract include an obligation towards certain third parties, the hospital would be contractually liable to those third parties regardless of whether they had participated in the formation of the contract or not.

The hospitalisation contract is doubtless a contract of services (Dienstvertrag) (RG JW 1938, 1246 [other references omitted]), whereby the patient is to be provided with bed and board as well as with medical treatment and care. The medical treatment is, however, the essential and critical element, the bed and board being by contrast rather subsidiary (see RGZ 112, 60 [other references omitted]). There is thus no occasion to infer any subsidiary contractual duty to ensure that the patient's husband be safe in visiting the hospital. But the result would be just the same even if one held, in view of the purposes of the hospitalisation contract, that there was an independent contract for lodging and meals collateral to the main contract for medical services; the result would be the same, too, if a separate contract with different terms were made with a doctor (RG JW 1936, 3182 no. 6), for example, if the patient were taken into the hospital on the referral of the doctor treating her so that the treatment could be continued there. For even if there were a separate contract with the hospital for lodging and meals, the plaintiff as husband would have no contractual claim to safe access to his sick wife, despite the lease features of the contract. It is true that under the law of lease the tenant's family have the same rights against the landlord regarding the safety of the premises as the tenant himself (RGZ 91, 21, 24; 102, 232; 152, 177; 169, 87 [other reference omitted]). In accordance with the purpose of the contract, rights are granted under § 328 BGB to those who belong to the tenant's household, members of the family and domestic help; but no such rights are granted to guests: the precondition is living together in the rented premises. The tenant intends (and his intention, though inexplicit, is perceptible by the landlord) to have the lease include the members of his family and respect their needs; to persons outside the home, who stand in no particular relationship to the leased premises, this does not apply. The recognition of the tenant's implicit contractual purpose to put his family in the optimum legal position may have led to giving a child a direct claim for proper medical treatment when the treatment is arranged by its statutory representative (RGZ 152, 175), but even so it is only the child being treated who has a direct claim for the contractual performance arising out of the contract. When the husband takes his wife to hospital, he admittedly has a contractual claim that she be properly treated, but apart from that he is in no special relationship with the hospital and has no contractual claim for care towards his own person; and therefore cannot demand safe access to his wife in the hospital on the basis of the hospitalisation contract. We need not decide whether it would make any difference if the husband, with the consent of the hospital management, had stayed in the hospital, even overnight, in order to be near his wife. On the facts, the plaintiff had no claim against the defendant for breach of a contractual duty of care.

Case 114

OBERLANDESGERICHT DÜSSELDORF, 3 OCTOBER 1974
NJW 1975, 596 = VERSR 1975, 863

The plaintiff's son was stabbed in a brawl and was taken to the defendant's hospital where the chief surgeon saw to the stab wound in the skin and stomach-lining. The youth died. At the post-mortem it transpired that there were other wounds which had not been cared for, in the rear stomach-lining, in the upper and lower intestine, and in the left kidney. The plaintiff asserted that the chief surgeon had caused his son's death by failure to attend to these wounds, and claimed damages for loss of support.

The Landgericht rejected the claim. Before the Oberlandesgericht the plaintiff sought to answer the defendant's proof of exculpation under § 831 BGB, first by asserting that the defendant was also to blame in failing to provide an assistant surgeon for the operation, and then by arguing that the defendant was personally liable in contract and must answer for the fault of the chief surgeon as its agent for performance. The plaintiff's appeal was dismissed.

Reasons

The plaintiff has no claim for damages against the defendant. There can be no claims under §§ 242, 276 BGB for breach of contractual duty since there was no contract between the parties. The hospitalisation contract with the defendant under which the plaintiff's son received medical treatment and care in the hospital was made not with the plaintiff but with the local General Health Insurance Scheme (AOK). It is true that the AOK did not actually refer the plaintiff's son to the hospital—this was an emergency case—but the contract was formed later when AOK agreed to pay the bill. It is not argued that any contractual negotiations took place between the parties, and it is clear that there were none.

Nor did this contract have any protective effect for the plaintiff. Such protective effect only applies to the insured and not to his dependants (RG JW 1937, 926; BGHZ 2, 94). Normally, the protective effect of a contract is limited to those persons who, by their connection with the creditor, come into contact with the debtor's performance, and whose safety is, to the debtor's knowledge, as important to the creditor as his own. This requirement is normally met only when the creditor has a joint responsibility for the protection and care of the third party (BGHZ 51, 91, 96; BGHZ 56, 269; BGH NJW 1959, 1976; 1970, 38). This is not the case with the plaintiff here. The decision of the Bundesgerichtshof to which the plaintiff refers (NJW 1959, 1676) is of no assistance to her, for in that case the third party was one of the plaintiff's employees, that is, a person who came into contact with the debtor's performance through the creditor and to whom the creditor owed a duty of care and protection. These preconditions are not satisfied here: the defendant's performance did not affect the plaintiff and AOK is not bound to afford her care and protection. Nor can it be said that the plaintiff was "close to the performance" (Leistungsnähe). The performance which was owed by the defendant, namely medical care and attention in its hospital, did not affect the plaintiff. She was not the patient. Furthermore, the plaintiff in this case was in no relationship to the creditor AOK. She cannot acquire a claim against the defendant by founding it on her relationship with the third party, her son (under § 328 BGB), or on his duties towards her . . .

Case 115

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SEVENTH CIVIL SENATE) 7 NOVEMBER 1960

BGHZ 33, 247 = NJW 1961, 211 = JZ 1961, 169

(with approving article by W Lorenz)

On 11 April 1953 two adjoining ferro-concrete plates became loose from the 16–18 m high roof of the steelworks at W belonging to the Siemens-Martin-Stahlwerk and fell on two persons at work in the works, namely the works engineer S and the steel-worker L. S died at once, leaving a widow and two children. L was severely injured.

The roof had been erected by the defendant company between October 1952 and March 1953. In making use of the old roof construction, ferro-concrete plates developed by the defendant company were substituted for the former concrete layers (which formed the ceiling).

The plaintiff association claims to be recouped for the payments made as an accident insurer to the surviving relatives of the works engineer S and to L.

It bases its claim on delict and on a "positive breach of contract" (positive Vertragsverletzung) (§§ 328, 618 BGB), in each case in combination with § 1542 RVO (right of subrogation).

The defendant company denies that it did an unsatisfactory job in performing the steelworks contract. It pleads in addition that the steelworks were jointly at fault in defectively altering the roof. This share of the fault must be imputed to the plaintiff. The defendant company also pleads that the claim is time-barred.

The Landgericht dismissed the claim. On appeal, the Oberlandesgericht found the claim for payment justified in principle and granted the declarations applied for.

The defendant company's appeal led to the decision being quashed and the case being sent back for reconsideration for the following

Reasons

1. (a) The Court of Appeal left open the question whether the claim in delict of the injured parties (and therefore of the plaintiff) was time-barred. It granted them a direct claim against the defendant company on a "positive breach of contract" under §§ 328, 618 I and III, 844 BGB. The contract between the defendant company and the steelworks included a subsidiary duty on the defendant company to see that no damage should occur to the other party in doing the job. That obligation bound the defendant company under § 618 I BGB to the customer's work-force also; they had acquired direct claims for damages through the breach of the obligation.

(b) That is in conformity with the opinion developed in the case-law of the Reichsgericht and the Bundesgerichtshof. According to it the basis of this liability is a contract for the benefit of third parties in the sense that in its protection are included the persons to whom the promisee on his part owes essential duties of care and protection.

(c) The Court of Appeal was not in error in including those injured in the accident within the circle of those so benefited. That circle must of course be limited and easily ascertainable. But it was so here. Both the victims belonged to the work-force and were employees who were regularly active in the shop roofed by the defendant company. It was a numerically limited and spatially confined group to which the employer owed a special duty of care in fitting out the workshop. It was only that circle that the Court of Appeal included in the protection afforded by the construction contract, not, as is said in the appeal, the several thousand employees of the steelworks' work-force.

2. Nor was the Court of Appeal in error in affirming the transmission of the claims of the injured persons to the plaintiff under § 1542 RVO. That paragraph is, as the Senate has already decided (BGHZ 26, 365), applicable also to claims for contractual damages.

3. The Court of Appeal properly held that the defendant company contributed by its fault to the accident and was therefore bound to make good the damage on the ground of a "positive breach of contract" [point discussed but not reported].

4. It left open the question whether the steelworks contributed at all by their fault to the accident, because in its opinion this was irrelevant.

That was rightly attacked in the appeal.

The question whether in such a case the injured third party must have imputed to him under § 254 BGB a contributory fault of the other party to the contract with the person causing the damage has been answered in the affirmative by the Reichsgericht and the Bundesgerichtshof only where that party is the statutory representative or the employee of the injured party (BGHZ 9, 316; 24, 325; LM No. 2 to § 254 BGB) that “inclusion of the plaintiff in the contractual protection” implies that “he must along with the widening of his legal protection, take into account the legal disadvantages bound up with it” points in this direction and shows also that the solution found here conforms to equity.

It follows that the judgment under attack, in so far as it disregards any contributory fault of the steelworks, cannot be upheld.

5. It could of course stand if the plaintiff’s claim could also be supported in delict, for to that extent the contributory fault of the steelworks must not affect the liability of the defendant company.

The Court of Appeal—consistently with its standpoint—did not examine that question. In particular, it had left open the question whether this claim was time-barred. For want of the necessary findings, the Senate is itself not in a position to arrive at a decision.

The judgment under attack must therefore be set aside and the matter referred back to the Court of Appeal.

The view is taken further in the legal literature that the person who owes compensation may quite generally, even when the other party to the contract—as here—is not the statutory representative or the employee of the injured third party, plead against the latter under § 254 BGB the contributory fault of that party to the contract.

That view must—contrary to the Court of Appeal’s opinion—be accepted. As in every contract for the benefit of third parties, so also in a contract of the kind in question, the protected third party derives his rights against the doer of the damage only from the contractual relations between the immediate parties. That follows already from the legal principle underlying § 334 BGB, according to which defences under the contract available to the promisor can also be pleaded against the third party. The words in the decision of the Bundesgerichtshof in LM 2 of § 254 BGB(E) that “the inclusion of the plaintiff in the contractual protection” implies that “he must along with the widening of his legal protection take into account the legal disadvantages bound up with it” points in this direction and shows also that the solution found here conforms to equity.

It follows that the judgment under attack, in so far as it disregards any contributory fault of the steelworks, cannot be upheld.

6. It could of course stand if the plaintiff’s claim could also be supported in delict, for to that extent the contributory fault of the steelworks might not affect the liability of the defendant company.

The Court of Appeal—consistently with its standpoint—did not examine that question. In particular it had left open the question whether this claim was time-barred. For want of the necessary findings, the Senate is itself not in a position to arrive at a decision.

The judgment under attack must therefore be set aside and the matter referred back to the Court of Appeal.

*Case 116REICHSGERICHT (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 10 FEBRUARY 1930
RGZ 127, 218 = JW 1930, 1720 (with approving note by A Elster)

The plaintiff acted from the middle of April until the end of June 1926 as daily help to the widow M. On 10 and 11 August 1926 she was helping Frau M to move to a new dwelling; as from 15 August she had accepted a new post as a maidservant. Frau M had employed the defendant firm to move the gas meter in the bathroom of her new dwelling. At the end of July the firm instructed their leading fitter B to do the job. On 11 August the plaintiff noticed a smell of gas in the dwelling, as she had done the day before. To discover the place of the leak she climbed a ladder in the bathroom and lit the gas burner with a match. The leaking gas was set alight and the plaintiff suffered appreciable damage to the upper part of her body. The gas escape was due to the looseness of an overflow screw on the meter. The screw had been installed by B. The Court of Appeal found that he had been grossly negligent in the unworkmanlike execution of the job.

The plaintiff first sued the widow M for damages in preliminary proceedings. At that stage the present defendant firm appeared as "co-defendant" with Frau M. The action was dismissed on the ground that in any case the plaintiff was predominantly to blame (§ 254 BGB).

The plaintiff now sued the firm B & R and also B as co-defendants for damages and an annuity, and for a declaration of liability for further damage.

The Landgericht found the claim against both defendants justified as to two-thirds. The Oberlandesgericht reduced the award to one-half.

The appeal of the firm B & R (hereinafter called the defendant) was unsuccessful, apart from a determination of the duration of the annuity.

Reasons

The essential grounds on which the Court of Appeal based its judgment were the following. The defendants were strictly liable without exoneration for damage caused by B under the contract made with Frau M. That contract bound the defendants to take the care normally required in carrying out the job; moreover, in performing that duty they made use of their employee B and must therefore take responsibility for him under § 278 BGB. Not only was Frau M entitled as a contracting party to have that care taken, and to be compensated for the damage caused by the neglect of it, but the plaintiff was also entitled in so far as the contract must be taken to have been a contract for the benefit of third parties.

Whether a contract was intended to bring § 328 I BGB into operation, so that the third party should acquire directly a right to claim the promised performance must, under § 328 II BGB and in the absence of any special provision, be decided on the facts of each case, with particular reference to what can be recognised by both parties to have been the purpose of the contract.

The contractual purpose here signifies the objective means of determining the terms of the contract so that an agreement must be taken as covered by the contractual intention which the contracting parties could have arrived at if they had faced up to the elaboration of the details according to the purpose of the contract. Whether the extent of their agreement had actually been realised was beside the point. The application of these principles led to the conclusion that there was here a contract for the benefit of third parties. When a contract is made for the execution of a job in a customer's dwelling the danger is involved for anyone using it, the customer must be assumed to have intended—and this intention is capable of being observed by the contractor—that the interest of relatives living with him would be respected and that they should, for this purpose, have the same rights as he himself has to be compensated for damage done to them through the performance of the job. For without such an extension of the contractual duties, injured dependants would be limited to non-contractual claims. Such a different treatment of the customer and his dependants would offend against a sound instinct for justice and be out of accord with the contractual intent of the customer who, as the contractor must have been aware, would not wish to place his dependants in a worse position than himself as regards claims for compensation.

The position of the customer's domestic servants is the same. Here, too, the intention—capable of being recognised by the contractor—must be implied that he will respect the interest of the domestic staff, who must work on the premises where the contractor does the job and would have a claim to a safe system of work against the customer (§ 618 BGB). Where the customer contracts for a performance of a dangerous character, the contractor must know that he intends the performance to be carried out so as not to cause damage either to himself or to the members of his family or domestic staff, and that he is to stand in no better position than those belonging to his immediate household.

Now the plaintiff was indeed not a domestic servant but only a daily help, and therefore, was not a member of the domestic community. But, when making the contract, the head of the household must have intended—and this intention must have been understood by the contractor—to ensure that, over and above the circle of family dependants and domestic staff, all those persons to whom a master owes a duty of protection shall enjoy the special protection of a personal claim to have care taken of them under § 618 BGB. The daily help belongs to that class. This interpretation, however, must be subject to the limitation that only such persons must be regarded as benefiting from § 618 BGB as stand towards their employer in a relationship of some duration from which arises at least a moral duty on the employer to increase his protection. For a master must not be taken to intend to contract for the benefit of persons who serve only occasionally and temporarily on his premises and with whom he does not form any close attachment, such as arises from a longer use of their services and a more frequent contact, and even the creation of personal relations. The plaintiff stood in no passing relation to Frau M for she was in regular service with her for about a quarter of a year and was also, as is stated more fully, in a long-standing relationship with her.

But even if that no longer applied to 11 August 1926—so says the appellate decision—a contract for the benefit of third parties would exist as regards the plaintiff. For during the removal and the putting in order of the new dwelling, the dangers involved in the furnishing were so much greater than in ordinary housekeeping that the occupier must be taken to have intended to provide special protection to all taking part in the removal. The contract for the benefit of third parties must be taken to have imposed a duty of care upon all taking part in it.

Against this the appeal contends that a contract for a job of work cannot be taken to include the protection of all those permanently or temporarily in a dwelling; for principles worked out for leases cannot be applied to contracts for a job of work.

This attack cannot succeed, in particular because the appellate judge's interpretation of the contract of work between the defendant and the widow M, to the effect that it was a contract of work for the benefit of the plaintiff is free from legal error, above all in his application of §§ 133, 157, 328 BGB. Whether his definition of the circle of those benefited was entirely correct need not be discussed. In any case it includes persons who are entitled to damages from the customer under § 618 BGB.

The fundamental considerations on which the Court of Appeal proceeded are to the point, and are established by case-law of the Reichsgericht. It is in particular correct that the contract for the benefit of a third party can be an implied one and that the decision whether a contract is to be regarded as having been made for the benefit of a third party also and whether the third party shall acquire rights immediately against the promisor depends essentially, in the absence of a special term, on a finding of the facts in each case. For that purpose, regard must be had to the intention of the parties, the purpose of the transaction, and business usages; especial attention must be paid to the supplementary interpretation of contracts. The business intention of the parties provides an objective indication; whether the parties were aware when contracting of the scope of their declarations is irrelevant. Finally, there is no requirement that the identity of the third party should be ascertained when the contract is made; it is enough for it to be ascertainable.

On this basis, more recent judgments of the Reichsgericht have followed its earlier case-law in recognising more and more contracts for the benefit of third parties in cases where a third party has suffered damage [there follows an exposition of the slowly developing practice of the Court].

If, now, one comes to decide the present case, one arrives at the following conclusions. The plaintiff was a daily help in a long-term relationship with the widow M. Accordingly she was entitled and obliged, in the interest of her own health but also in the furtherance of her employer's business, to enter the bathroom from which the smell of gas seemed to come. The gas escape rendered the premises in which she was bound to serve unfit to afford her protection against danger to life and limb. The unfitness was due to the grossly negligent way B, the defendant's "employee", performed the job of fixing the gas meter (§ 278 BGB). Under § 618 BGB Frau M was subjected to obligations which the legislator considered so essential that their exclusion or limitation by contract was made illegal (§ 619 BGB). Under them Frau M was liable to compensate the plaintiff, although she was not herself to blame. For liability under § 618 BGB is contractual and hence § 278 is applicable, so that Frau M had to answer the plaintiff for the defendant's fault.

Now, Frau M's purpose, as the defendant could well realize, in making the contract was to have the gas meter properly fixed, and in particular that the execution of the job should produce no danger to life and limb either to herself or to any persons to whom she might become liable under § 618 BGB. No obligation to point of law can be taken to the further finding that the appellate made in interpreting the contract by way of supplementation, according to § 157 BGB, that Frau M and the defendant would have agreed to the direct liability of the latter for all damage for which Frau M might become liable to compensate persons through an improper fitting of the gas meter, if the parties, when making the contract, had contemplated such a possibility. For Frau M would have made the assumption of such direct liability a term of the contract and the defendant would, in order to get the order, have accepted such a term, all the more so because he had in any case to do a perfect job and it made no essential differences to him whether he exposed himself to a direct claim for damages by the employee of Frau M or for an indemnity by the latter.

*Case 117REICHSGERICHT (THIRD CIVIL SENATE) 3 JUNE 1921
RGZ 102, 232

The plaintiff and her husband lived on the third floor of a house belonging to the defendant and rented from him by the husband. On the morning of 23 October 1918 her husband was found dead and she was found unconscious in their bedroom. This was due to gas poisoning, the gas having come, according to the plaintiff, from the floor below. On the floor below the defendant was having gas replaced with electricity, and had retained G, a master plumber, to remove the gas pipes. At the end of his work on 21 October, one of G's workmen failed to plug the gas pipe leading from the gas meter to the apartment of one Gr., a publican. The gas meter was turned off at the time, but it was turned on by Gr. on 22 October, and gas then flowed out of the unstopped pipe and filtered through the ceiling into the living quarters above, those of the plaintiff and her husband as well as those of Gr. himself.

The plaintiff claimed compensation for her own illness and for the loss she suffered through her husband's death, the claim being based on the contract of lease which her husband had entered as well as on tortious negligence. The defendant denied the plaintiff's assertions about the gas poisoning and contended that the accident had occurred because a gas tap in their apartment had carelessly been left on either by the plaintiff or by her husband.

Both lower courts dismissed the claim, but the plaintiff's appeal was allowed.

Reasons

The Court of Appeal accepted the plaintiff's version of the cause of the gas poisoning. It held, in accordance with decisions of this court (see, for example, RGZ 91, 24), that the contract of lease concluded by the plaintiff's husband was one for the benefit of the plaintiff under § 328 BGB and that therefore the plaintiff had a personal contractual claim against the landlord for breach of his contractual duty of care under §§ 536, 538 BGB. It is held, correctly, that the landlord was contractually bound to each of his tenants not to damage them by works being effected on the premises and to indemnify them for any harm due to culpable breach of his duty. The court nevertheless rejected the plaintiff's claim because the defendant was neither personally at fault nor liable for the negligence of an agent for performance (§ 278 BGB). There was no personal fault in the defendant because the person to whom he had entrusted the work, the master plumber G, was a specialist. He had thereby fulfilled his duty of care to see that the works were carried out properly and in a manner not involving risk to the occupants of the house, all the more so since what was involved was a simple and easy task which the chosen specialist could be expected to carry out properly. It was not common practice for the landlord himself to supervise specialist tasks which he was in no position to evaluate, nor to appoint a representative to do so for him. It therefore could not be expected that the defendant should supervise G's work. Nor was the defendant liable under § 278 BGB, because the work being done on the gas pipes was not in execution of any duty owed by the defendant to the plaintiff, but of a duty owed by the defendant to the occupant of the lower apartment; G and his workmen could therefore not be regarded as the defendant's agents for performance vis-à-vis the plaintiff.

The appellant criticises the Court of Appeal's opinion of both points. Criticism of the finding that the defendant was not personally at fault is without merit. In the case of work such as was here entrusted to the master plumber G, the defendant was under no duty, either personally or through a clerk of works, to see that the work was being carried out properly or to check it as soon as it had been completed. A subsequent inspection, perhaps in the defendant's own interest, would not have prevented the accident.

On the other hand, the appellant is right to say that there has been misapplication of §§ 278, 536, 538 BGB. The Court of Appeal itself recognised that the landlord has a contractual duty to all his tenants not to injure them by work being done on the premises. This duty stems directly from the basic duty imposed on the landlord by § 536 BGB, which is not simply to make the rented property available at the outset of the lease in a condition suitable for use in accordance with the contract, but also to maintain it in this condition for the duration of the lease. But this is not a duty merely to avoid doing harmful work on the premises, it is a positive duty to see that the rented property is maintained in a condition suitable for contractual use. It therefore includes the duty to take care that the tenant's use of the premises is not unacceptably affected by any work being done on the premises, including the work done in parts of the building other than those demised to the tenant for his exclusive use. If the landlord allows work to be done in the house which runs the risk of affecting the tenanted premises, he is bound under the contract of lease so to effect these works that this danger is averted, regardless of where in the house or why the work is being done. The landlord of a house whose ground floor needed strengthening or whose gas or water supply was defective at any point would clearly be contractually bound as against tenants anywhere on the premises who were endangered thereby to do any repairs properly. If he entrusts the work to someone else he is using that other person for the performance of his duty towards all such tenants: he must therefore answer for his assistant's fault under § 278 BGB as if it were his own. The same is true if the danger arises from works undertaken in rooms rented to others. For example, suppose a supporting wall on the ground floor is to be removed in order to enlarge the window. The landlord's contractual duty to do these works is owed only to the tenant of the ground floor and not to other tenants, but if he actually engages on the work, he owes to all the tenants in the house a contractual duty so to manage it that the rooms they rent are not adversely affected. To this extent, therefore the workmen whom the landlord employs for modification of the building are his agents for performance under § 278 BGB not only as against the tenants of the ground floor but also as against all tenants whose rooms could be affected by the work of reconstruction. So here, taking the plaintiff's assertions as true, although the defendant was indeed under no contractual duty towards the plaintiff to replace the gas pipes by electric wiring, he was responsible to the plaintiff and to the other tenants in the house for seeing that the gas pipes were removed without risk of gas flowing into their rooms. Those persons to whom the defendant entrusted the removal of the gas pipes were consequently his agents for performance vis-à-vis the plaintiff too.

Such an application of § 278 BGB in respect of the landlord's obligation to maintain the leased property so that it remains fit for contractual use is correlative to the tenant's liability for his employees arising from his duty to treat the leased property properly: those whom the tenant engages in the business he runs on the tenanted premises are his agents for performance of his duty to treat the premises properly, even if he owes the landlord no duty whatever to run the business in which those persons are employed (see RGZ 84, 222) . . .

*Case 118REICHSGERICHT (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 7 JUNE 1915
RGZ 87, 64 = JW 1915, 1018

On 20 July 1913, there was a collision between a tram belonging to the plaintiff and a taxi belonging to the first defendant and driven by the second defendant. The passengers in the taxi, Sch., an accountant, and his wife and daughter, were injured. They claimed damages from the plaintiff tram company under the Imperial Act on Liability. The plaintiff now alleges that the accident was entirely due to the fault of the second defendant, for which the first defendant is responsible, and seeks a declaration that the defendants are bound to indemnify it for all loss arising from the accident.

The lower courts granted the claim, and the defendant's appeal is dismissed.

Reasons

1. The court below did not misapply § 278 BGB, as the appellant contends. Doubts may certainly be entertained about the reasoning of the Court of Appeal that in a case like the present the taxi-driver may regard all of his passengers as contractors, and may look to each of them for the fare. We need not decide this, however, since in any case there is no doubt that a contract was made with the accountant Sch., who boarded the taxi at the same time as his wife and daughter. But that does not mean that he is the only person with a contractual claim arising out of the contract of carriage. On the contrary, the contract of carriage is a contract in favour of the wife and daughter who were travelling with him; they were "third parties" under § 328 BGB, and acquired a direct right to demand performance, namely proper and safe carriage. There is therefore no reason to doubt the Court of Appeal's conclusion that the first defendant was liable under the contract of carriage to all three passengers, and that he must answer for the fault of the second defendant, who in this respect was his agent for performance under § 278 BGB . . .

*Case 119REICHSGERICHT (THIRD CIVIL SENATE) 5 OCTOBER 1917
RGZ 91, 21 = JW 1918, 95 (with approving note by K Friedrichs)

The male plaintiff is a senior assistant on the railways. When he was moved to J, he was provided with accommodation which had previously been used by Dr, the station supervisor. A few months after moving in, his daughter, the female plaintiff, contracted tuberculosis, and had to go on a voyage for her health. The plaintiffs attribute this illness to the fact that the dwelling was infected with tuberculosis bacilli, Dr's wife having had pulmonary trouble, and that the defendant State failed to disinfect the dwelling until five or six days after they moved in. They therefore claim damages for the loss attributable to the disease, not all of which may have manifested itself.

The Landgericht allowed the claims. The Oberlandesgericht rejected the defendant's appeal in respect of the male plaintiff's claim, but allowed it in respect of that of the female plaintiff, whose claim was therefore dismissed. The female plaintiff's appeal was allowed, and the defendant's appeal was dismissed.

Reasons

On the basis of the evidence, the Court of Appeal concluded that the female plaintiff became ill because the service dwelling in which she lived had been infected with tuberculosis bacilli during the illness of Mrs Dr, but it held that the only person to whom the defendant was liable was the male plaintiff: he had a claim, based on an analogous application of §§ 618, 278 BGB, for the damage he had suffered through his daughter's illness. The court said that the delay in disinfecting the house was due to the fault of Dr D, the railway doctor appointed by the defendant who attended to Mrs Dr. It was the duty of Dr D to inform the railway authorities of all cases of tuberculosis which came to his notice in his capacity as railway doctor, and if he had performed this duty, the house would have been disinfected at the right time. But the Court of Appeal disallowed the female plaintiff's claim for damages on the ground that she had no contractual or similar relationship with the defendant, and that her claim in tort failed because the defendant, having adduced exculpatory proof under § 831 BGB, was not liable for Dr D.

So far as the male plaintiff's rights are concerned, the Court of Appeal was correct in the result but wrong in the reasons, and so far as the female plaintiff's rights are concerned, it was wrong in both regards.

Since the male plaintiff is an official, the solution must be looked for in public law; and since there are no relevant tests, it must depend on the principles which emerge from the nature of the case in the light of the legal ideas which control decisions in analogous relationships subject to private law. It is established by the Reichsgericht that the State and other bodies of public law owe their officials a duty of care such as is implied into the contract of employment by § 618 BGB. Thus it has been held that under the Prussian Act on Conditions of Service of Teachers in Public Schools of 3 March 1897, local authorities are bound to ensure that the accommodation they provide for teachers are safe and properly maintained, and that they are liable for any injury or illness caused to the teacher by culpable breach of this duty (RGZ 71, 243). This duty of care is closely related to the fact that the accommodation is provided so as to enable the occupant to perform his service obligations or to perform them more easily. Being required to use the service dwelling for the performance of his duties, the official can expect the local authority to protect him adequately against defects in the dwelling which imperil his health. This leads to the conclusion that in respect of official accommodation, the State owes the same duty of protection to the dependants whom the official is entitled to lodge in the dwelling as to the official himself. For if the official is bound to use the accommodation provided, so, too, are they, in the interests of maintaining the family community.

So far as the official himself is concerned, the protective duty owed to him means that he can hold the State responsible for its breach, not only when his own health suffers but also when he suffers loss through injury to the health of a dependant. Just as the official's entitlement to compensation when his own health is affected is based on the application of § 618 BGB by analogy so, when a dependant's health is affected, private law powerfully suggests that the dependant has a claim for damages as well as the official himself. If a landlord is responsible for unhealthy conditions on the leased premises and a member of the tenant's family suffers thereby, the tenant can sue the landlord under § 538 BGB for the consequent harm he may suffer (RGZ 77, 99, 101). But in addition the dependant himself can normally sue the landlord for his own harm (though not for his pain and suffering). Unless very peculiar circumstances indicate a different conclusion, the tenant of a family dwelling who concludes a lease must be taken, as the landlord must know, to intend to obtain the maximum protection for the members of his household and to acquire for them the same rights in relation to the safety of the premises as he himself enjoys against the landlord (§ 328 BGB). If the landlord's contractual duties are not extended in this manner, injured dependants would be restricted to claim in tort, and would not have the benefit afforded to the tenant by §§ 278, 538 BGB, that the landlord is strictly liable for any defects in the premises existing at the time of the contract. To give such different rights to the tenant and to his dependants is offensive to proper legal sentiment and false to the tenant's purpose in contracting, for, as the landlord is bound to know, he wants his dependants to be as well placed as himself to sue for damages. So, too, in the contract of employment of private law where the employer provides the employee with a family house so as to facilitate the rendering of the contractual services, the employee must be taken to intend the employer to assume the duty, as regards the condition and maintenance of the living quarters, to protect his dependants from danger to life and limb to the same extent as himself (§ 618 BGB) and to have them acquire rights of their own to this effect. Now, if an official who is directed to live in service quarters could not claim from the State protection against dangerous defects in the living premises for those dependants who are entitled to stay in the dwelling, and if his dependants did not have a claim of their own to the effect, there would be an intolerable difference in the treatment of cognate legal relationships in public and private law. Such differential treatment would be all the more unjustifiable as the official and his dependants do not have the freedom of choice which is open to the tenant or employee and their dependants, but are bound to use the accommodation provided. This extension to the dependants of the State's duty of care is also in line with the development in public law of the state's duty to look after the family of its officials. It is one of the benefits to which officials are entitled, not by way of contractual counter-performance for their services, but as a means of assuring their position in life.

In the case for decision, the State has failed to satisfy its duty of care, since it failed to take steps to ensure that its service accommodations were disinfected sufficiently soon after the departure of an occupant in whose family tuberculosis had broken out. The rules certainly provide that in such a case the station-master is to undertake the disinfection. A duty is also imposed on railway doctors and supervisors to inform the railway authorities of any cases of tuberculosis in the families of railway employees which come to their knowledge. If this duty is performed, the railway authorities would be in a position to give the station-master due notice of any required disinfection. But if no such notification is given, as may easily happen, the regulations make no provision for securing the object in question. The dangers to which officials are exposed in the absence of such notification is such that the defendant should have provided for steps to be taken which would permit the premises to be disinfected at the right time, possibly by making inquiry of the station doctor before assigning accommodation to a new occupant.

Case 120

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SECOND CIVIL SENATE) 11 APRIL 1951

BGHZ 1, 383 = NJW 1951, 798

The plaintiff, who had in-growing toe-nails, was referred for out-patient treatment to the defendant city's hospital by the local Medical Union of which he was a member. He was made to sit down on a three-piece settee, about 30 inches high, designed for gynaecological examinations but used as an auxiliary operating table, the back part having been fixed in a horizontal position. The second defendant, who had been the hospital's chief doctor for many years, gave the plaintiff a local anaesthetic, an injection of 2 per cent novocaine solution, in either one big toe or both. While waiting for this to work, the plaintiff suddenly lost consciousness and fell off the settee. He injured his cervical column in the fall, and has since experienced severe stiffness and loss of function in both arms. At the time of the accident, the second defendant was standing at the door of the small operating theatre, speaking to his chauffeur, and the operating sister was quite close to the plaintiff, treating a patient for burns.

The plaintiff claims that the defendants are liable on the following grounds. No one told him to lie down after the injection, so he was still sitting when he suddenly became unconscious. Had he known he should lie down, he would have done so, and not fallen. The second defendant should have realised and guarded against the risk of a sudden faint, in particular by making him lie down, but instead of taking any such steps he left the plaintiff to his own devices after giving him the injection. This was the sole reason for the accident, which had rendered him wholly and, as it seemed, permanently unfit for work. The plaintiff claims an annuity for lost earnings and damages for pain and suffering from both defendants.

The Landgericht rejected the claim, but the Oberlandesgericht held the plaintiff entitled to a monthly sum for loss of earnings and damages for pain and suffering. The defendants' appeal was successful only in part.

Reasons

The plaintiff has a good contractual claim against the first defendant. The Reichsgericht always held that when a General Health Insurance Scheme (AOK) refers a member to a hospital, the contract it makes with the hospital is one in favour of the patient whereby, under § 328 BGB, the patient acquires a direct claim to proper treatment against the operator of the hospital (RGZ 165, 106). The first defendant entrusted to the second defendant the treatment of the National Health patient referred to it, so he became the first defendant's agent for performance and the first defendant is accordingly responsible to the plaintiff under § 278 BGB for any fault committed by the second defendant in the execution of his professional medical activity.

Between the plaintiff and the second defendant there were no direct contractual relations. A hospital doctor's contractual duty to undertake the proper treatment of National Health patients is normally owed only to the hospital which appoints him. But if a hospital doctor actually does embark on the treatment of a union patient and injures him in his health by infringing a widely recognised rule of medical science, he is liable to the patient under §§ 823 ff. BGB, whether or not he has any contract with the patient. It is immaterial whether the fault of the doctor is one of commission or of omission. The doctor may be under no obligation to the patient to treat him at all, but if he does so, he must avoid injuring him in body or health by breach of the rules of medical science [reference omitted].

In the instant case the Court of Appeal was right to find that it was the second defendant's fault that the plaintiff did not lie down after the injection; he should have told him himself or got the operating sister to do so.

The appellant contends that the failure to tell the plaintiff to lie down was not an adequate cause of the consequent harm. This is not so. The decisions of the Reichsgericht cited by the appellant on consequences for which the actor is not responsible because the causal connection is not adequate refer to consequences which occur only under extremely peculiar circumstances and through quite improbable concatenations of events and which can be ignored in the normal course of things. The consequences here, according to the expert, are not of this kind. On the contrary, the expert expressly emphasised that the reason for the good old rule that a patient should always be prone or supine during all manipulations and injections is precisely the possibility of a faint and a fall; it may be true that this rule cannot always be observed in practice and often is not, but such practical considerations cannot relieve the doctor of the charge that he ignored a duty of care. In such a case there can be no question of any interruption of the adequate causal connection. The appellant is also wrong to say that the Court of Appeal pitched the doctor's duty of care too high. The court was right to follow the expert, whose evidence was based on his knowledge of the rules of the medical art, and who stated in clear terms that there was undeniable negligence in this case unless perhaps it could be proved that the sister had been enjoined to attend to the patient and that the patient had disobeyed her instruction to lie down.

It follows that the plaintiff's claim for monthly payments is established against the first defendant under §§ 276, 278 BGB and against the second defendant under § 823 BGB. However, the second defendant alone is liable for the damages for pain and suffering under § 847 BGB. Only under § 831 BGB could the first defendant be held liable for such damages. The defendant city asserts that it has satisfied the requisite exculpatory proof. We agree. It was common ground that the second defendant had been chief doctor in the first defendant's hospital for many years and that the nurse had served as operating sister for nine years without any criticism. The plaintiff did not even assert, much less prove, anything that tended to show that the second defendant had been guilty of any fault during his twenty years' service in the defendant city's hospital. Under such circumstances, the hospital management cannot be expected to adduce any further exculpatory proof.

Case 121

REICHSGERICHT (THIRD CIVIL SENATE) 8 JANUARY 1926

RGZ 112, 290

On 8 January 1919 and the following days several people went to the All Saints Hospital in B to be treated for scabies. They were rubbed with an ointment which, though thought to be the normal sulphur ointment, was in fact extremely poisonous with chromium. The treatment resulted in the death of Joh. Sch. and of Ha., a coachman, whose mother and heirs are respectively plaintiffs, and in severe injury to Miss Ch. H. The fatal ointment had been supplied to the city B by an independent apothecary.

These are suits for damages against the city B. Miss Ch. H seeks an indemnity for her medical expenses, loss of earnings, and damaged clothing, as well as damages for pain and suffering and a decree that the defendant is liable for any future damage due to the chromium poisoning. Mrs Sch. claims burial expenses and an indemnity for the support her son would have provided had he lived. Ha.'s widow and children likewise claim for loss of support.

The Landgericht gave judgment for all the plaintiffs. The Oberlandesgericht dismissed the claims of Ch. H and of Ha.'s heirs, and dismissed also the city's appeal in the case of Frau Sch. Appeal has been brought to this court by Ch. H, the heirs of Ha., and the city. The judgment below is vacated, and the matter remanded to the Court of Appeal for further proceedings.

Reasons

All Saints Hospital is primarily a charitable institution through which its owner, the city B, performs its public welfare functions by providing poor patients with free medical treatment and, in suitable cases, free board and nursing as well. Its relationship with these patients is purely one of public law with no private law elements. But other patients pay a fee, fixed according to a sliding scale, for treatment and nursing in the hospital, and these people are admitted under a contract of private law, whether of services or of some other kind (see RGZ 64, 231; 83, 71; 91, 134 and 263). Thus the duties of the city and the consequences of their breach are determined for the first class of patients by public law, and for the second class by the contract law of the BGB, unless, of course, tort law applies.

Ch. H, Joh. Sch., and Ha. were treated in the All Saints Hospital with a poisonous chromium mixture instead of the normal sulphur ointment. Sch. and Ha. died, but Ch. H regained her health after a long period in hospital. The fatal ointment was first used on 8 January 1919. According to the Court of Appeal, the mere fact of this occurrence betokens no fault on the part of the city. The court accepted the testimony of Professor J that the nurses who were applying the ointment would not be alerted by the fact that it was greenish in colour rather than yellow: the usual ointment used to vary in colour because the Vaseline used during the war and immediately thereafter was not uniform. The poisonous ointment was purchased from an independent apothecary. Of course, the hospital doctors were not bound to test the ointment before using it: it would take far too much of a doctor's time and energy if he had to check the composition of every medicament he prescribed. For this occurrence, then, only the apothecary is responsible.

But the Court of Appeal found that on the first application of the ointment on 8 January, many of the patients screamed and one of them had a fit of vomiting. Such reactions are normally rare and sporadic, so the number of them on this occasion should have led the nurses to inform Dr U or some other doctor in the hospital immediately, and the doctor should then have had the ointment checked forthwith. Then its odd colour would have confirmed the suspicion that it had been incorrectly made up. Had this happened, the Court of Appeal found, the poisonous quality of the ointment would have been discovered that very day, and the fateful events of the following two days would have been avoided. As it was, either the nurses failed in their duty to inform the doctors, or the doctors failed in their duty to investigate.

Up to this point the views of the Court of Appeal are logical and correct, but hereafter their analysis of the case, both factually and legally, is inadequate.

1. When the clinic accepted Ch. H for treatment as a charity patient, there arose between her and the city a relationship in public law which imposed on the city a public law duty to treat her in an appropriate way without endangering her life and limb, and gave Ch. H a right in public law to have such treatment. Thus there was superimposed on the city's general welfare duties a specific obligation to Ch. H with a defined content such as to render the city liable if this obligation were broken by the fault of the person whose services the city used in the performance of its obligation. As this Senate held on 11 March 1921 (RGZ 102, 6; see also RGZ 98, 343), the legal idea which applies in private contract law by reason of its expression in § 278 BGB applies in public law relationships as well, unless there is some special feature in a case which excluded its application. No such feature is present here; indeed, to hold that the principle of law contained in § 278 BGB was inapplicable to the public law relationship between a commune and a charity patient in a communal hospital would be to pervert the very notion of welfare.

Ch. H was given the ointment treatment on 8 January, and very early on that day, since she presented herself at the clinic at 7 a.m. and was back home two and a half hours later. As has been established, neither the nurses nor the doctors were negligent in the original treatment, but if the requisite care had been taken and the ointment investigated, then, as the Oberlandesgericht found, the dreadful mistake made by the apothecary would have been discovered that very day. The city should then have informed Ch. H immediately—for her name and address were in their books—of any possible counter-measures. This would have been not just an act of humanity, but part of its public law duty towards her. The judges of fact must therefore investigate, with the aid of experts if need be, whether Ch. H's injuries could have been avoided or reduced if such a communication had been made, that is, whether and how far the failure to make it was a cause of the plaintiff's suffering. Even if this question is resolved in favour of Ch. H, however, she will still have no claim for damages for pain and suffering, for according to § 253 BGB, money damages can be awarded for non-economic harm only in the cases prescribed by law. The idea here expressed by the legislator is that in the normal case one does not have to pay for the so-called immaterial harm one may cause. An exception is made in § 847 BGB which imposes an obligation to repair such harm in cases of injury to body and health, but it only applies when such harm results from an unlawful act as laid down in the BGB. Thus § 847 BGB cannot give rise to a claim when the defendant's liability is based only on faulty breach of a contractual obligation (see RGZ 65, 17; JW 1910, 112 no. 13). Just as this exceptional rule cannot be applied by analogy to breach of contractual duties, so it cannot be applied to faulty breaches of public law obligations.

Only if the city were liable in tort as well as for breach of its public law duties would Ch. H's claim for damages for pain and suffering be good. On this point also the views of the Court of Appeal seem inadequate. There is nothing wrong with its finding that the city was free from fault with regard to the provision of the ointment, and in its choice and appointment of its doctors and nurses. There was no need to direct or supervise the application of the ointment, as such a mechanical task was well within the competence of trained nurses. Thus the city cannot be made liable under § 831 BGB. But that does not conclude the matter. One must distinguish between the duty of a business or institution to supervise the performance of individual tasks and its general duty to supervise, monitor, and instruct, for breach of which it may be liable under § 823 BGB, a liability which attaches to a commune if the breach is due to one of its constitutional representatives under §§ 31, 89 BGB. What the precise implications are of this general duty of supervision must depend on the individual case, and especially on whether the execution and supervision of tasks has been entrusted to knowledgeable persons who are familiar with them and who have proved themselves reliable. It will only be very rarely that a business or institution will be able to exempt itself entirely from its duty to exercise this control (see RGZ 53, 53 and 276; 82, 206; 95, 181; 96, 81; JW 1906, 547 no. 13; JW 1906, 75 no. 16; JW 1909, 659 no. 10).

In the present case, the city is performing a welfare function, and poor patients trust it with their greatest assets, namely their health and life. It follows that the city must issue instructions through its top management that it is the duty of nurses to inform the doctors whenever any medicament has an unexpected effect and whenever anything unusual occurs on its being administered and that it is the duty of the doctors, if so informed, to make an immediate investigation. But this does not exhaust the city's duties in the matter. It is not enough simply to issue these instructions: the city must also see to it by suitable occasional checks that they are being followed. From the opinion below we cannot tell whether the city has satisfied its general duties of instruction and supervision, any breach and its causal effect being for the plaintiff to establish, with any possible assistance from the rules regarding prima-facie proof. The tort aspects of Ch. H's suit therefore require further investigation.

2. With regard to the death of young Sch., the Oberlandesgericht held that although he paid no fee to the hospital when he was accepted for treatment, he thereupon entered into a private law contract with the city. Were this so, then his mother's suit must fail, for in a contractual claim she could only claim for the harm which her son had suffered as a result of breach by his contractor, and her claim was for a loss which had befallen the mother rather than the son, namely the loss of the support which Joh. Sch. would have been bound to provide had he lived. Such a claim, which is at odds with the general principle that compensation may be claimed only by the person directly affected, could only be based on § 844 II BGB, and that provision requires that her son's death be attributable to a tort for which the city is responsible through its constitutional organs. § 844 II has no application in the law of contract, any more than § 844 I (see JW 1907, 710 no. 18; JW 1908, 9 no. 9). Now the Oberlandesgericht gave no reason for holding that there was a private law contract in this case. One almost has the impression that the only reason was that unlike Miss Ch. H, Sch. did not return home after the treatment but was kept in hospital while the scabies were to be cured. But gratuitous admission to the hospital is just like gratuitous treatment to an out-patient: it is an act of public law welfare which gives rise to public law relations between the in-patient and the city. But even though the Court of Appeal was wrong to invoke private law, the decision it reached is correct in public law.

The poisonous ointment was applied to Sch. on 9 January, so his death was indubitably due to negligence on the part of either the doctors or the nurses. Now just as the principle that a debtor must answer for the fault of his assistants as he does for his own applies in public as well as private law, so do the legal ideas expressed in § 844 BGB. If it were otherwise, public law would be intolerably and unjustifiably defective. Nevertheless, we cannot yet affirm the decision of the Oberlandesgericht in favour of Frau Sch. since it is possible that even though Sch. did not actually pay the hospital as required by the tariff for money patients, he might nevertheless be under a duty to pay and so have entered into a private law contract with the city. Thus in this case also we need further facts, including whether the city was guilty of any breach of its general duty of supervision (see §§ 823, 31, 89 BGB) . . .

Notes to Cases 95–121

1. Most of these cases illustrate (i) the difficulties experienced by German law as a result of § 831 BGB and (ii) the ways used by the courts to produce a more sensible result. Thus, cases 100,

105, 106, and 107 show how the employer must supervise his employee properly and constantly or otherwise run the risk of being held liable under § 823 I BGB for breach of his own primary duty; case 96 discusses issues relevant to § 31 BGB; cases 98 and 109 discuss the thorny question of “unlawfulness” in the context of § 831 BGB (though much of the reasoning in the latter case appears to have become obsolete); cases 111–121 illustrate what is, perhaps, the most ingenious way of bypassing § 831 BGB, namely by invoking the aid of the law of contract. As Zweigert and Kötz have put it (An Introduction to Comparative Law, 2nd ed. II, 147):

The sole purpose of these decisions is to put the accident victim in a better position than if his only claim for damages were based on delict. Under German law, with regard to prescription, burden of proof and especially vicarious liability, a victim is in a much better position to claim damages if he can claim in contract for the harm he has suffered. Not the slightest blame attaches to the German courts for using the contract for the benefit of third parties in order to get round the misconceived legal policy contained in § 831 BGB; nor is there anything wrong with what they have done as a matter of positive law. Nevertheless, it must be seen that these are cases where the harmful consequences of accidents are attributed to the person responsible, not because he is guilty of any breach of specifically contractual duties but because he has committed a breach of general duties of care imposed by the law of delict. The position of German law may be excused by the necessity caused by the unfortunate policy of § 831 BGB, but the comparative lawyer has to classify problems according to the true significance of their actual facts. These cases must therefore be put in the law of tort, as is done everywhere else in the world. In doing so, the comparatist must realise that it may be necessary to study a person’s contractual relations with third parties in order to discover to whom he owes his delictual duties of care not to cause harm.

But this solution is, at best, only a partial one. Claims formed in contract cannot, because of another troublesome provision (§ 253 BGB), compensate the plaintiff for his pain and suffering (contrast § 847 BGB). The return to the law of delict thus not only produces an intellectually neater classification; it can also benefit the victims (see case 120). The growing tendency to invoke § 823 I BGB, by discovering what the Common lawyers would call non-delegable duties, may then be described as a move in the right direction (for illustrations see cases 95, 101, 114, 115 etc.). From the little said in this paragraph, it should be clear that these cases must be read in close conjunction with the text of Chapter 3, section A.

2. The cases and the preceding commentary make it clear that there exist some important structural differences between German law on the one hand and the Common law on the other. One further difference of classification must also be noted with American Common law: in the latter, vicarious liability is a subject, which is shared between agency and tort and the two relative Restatements. Thus, the master–servant relationship and the notion of “scope of employment” are defined in §§ 220 and 229 of the Restatement (Second) of Agency, (and are reproduced below in Addendum 1). On the other hand, liability for independent contractors is treated in §§ 409–29 of the Restatement (Second) of Torts. Tort books that discuss (briefly) the matters raised in this chapter include Dobbs, The Law of Torts (2000), pp. 905 et seq.; Fleming, The Law of Torts, 9th ed. (1998), pp. 409 et seq.

3. Once the above points are well digested, the comparatist should experience no difficulty in understanding what is happening in “the other system”, the differences being differences in emphasis or detail rather than substance. Thus, the rationale for imposing vicarious liability is the same everywhere: the belief that it is more efficient to place the risk on the employer’s shoulders than on the employee’s. The same rationale also seems to favour the more modern tendency not to allow masters (or, more likely, their insurers) the right to claim contribution or an indemnity from the servant unless the latter’s conduct was intentional and grossly negligent. (For English law see Markesinis and Deakin, Tort Law 4th edn. (1999), chapter 6; for American law see Comment, 34 La. L. Rev. 79 (1973); Note, 53 Or. L. Rev. 366 (1974).) The tendency to make employers rather than employees liable also accounts for the increased willingness to give a wide meaning to such inherently ambiguous notions as “course of employment”. As already noted, German law is, perhaps, the strictest in this respect, with French and American law showing a clear willingness to include even acts of violence which the servant’s employment merely gave him the opportunity to commit. The French decision which held the employer of a cinema attendant vicariously liable for the latter's rape of a cinema patron (Crim. 5 nov. 1953, D. 1953, J. 698) has happily not been followed in the US: see Mays v. Pico Finance Co., 339 So. 2d 382 (La. App. 1976). But there are other just as grotesque examples; thus in Miller v. Keating 349 So. 2d 265 (La. 1977) the attempted murder of a company employee by some of his co-employees was held to be within the scope of their employment since the corporation (the Common employer) was the beneficiary of the victim's insurance policy—a conclusion which led one commentator to remark that “cynicism reaches new heights when attempted murder becomes regarded as ‘fair and reasonably incident’ to corporate offences”! (Comment, 52 Tul. L. Rev. 443, 450 (1978).) But, as stated in section A of chapter 3, this point need not be laboured too much: aberrant cases can always be found and the vagueness of such notions as “course of employment” may also be their main virtue since it provides the desirable degree of flexibility in decisions. (For French law and the possibility that the insurance factor may in some cases account for such wide interpretations see Hassler, “La responsabilité des commettants” D. Chron. (1980) 125–8; Markesinis, “La perversion des notions de la responsabilité civile délictuelle par la pratique des assurances”, Rev. int. dr. comp., 301 (1983).)

4. Lack of space prevents a more detailed annotation of the cases but three more points can be made briefly. First, in the case of borrowed servants, American law until recently took a different view from English and German law and tended to make the “special or temporary employer” liable for the torts of the borrowed servant on the grounds, inter alia, that he had (at the moment of the accident) the benefit of the services of the borrowed servant. See Lewis v. Potter, 149 Mont. 430, 427 P. 2d 306 (1967). Recent decisions, however, suggest an opposite movement (for example, Salsgiver v. E S Ritter Co., 42 Ore. App. 547, 600 P. 2d 951 (1979); LeSuer v. LeSuer, 350 So. 2d 796 (Fla. App. 1977)); and, as stated, Californian courts have favoured plaintiffs further by allowing the victim to sue both employers and then let them solve their internal relationship: Strait v. Hale Constr. Co., 26 Cal. App. 3d 941, 103 Cal. Rptr. 487 (1972).

Secondly, American courts have developed the family purpose doctrine which, in some circumstances, makes car owners vicariously liable for harm caused by persons to whom the vehicles were loaned or made available. Although attempts to introduce the doctrine in England were made by Lord Denning MR in Launchbury v. Morgan, they met with the disapproval of the House of Lords which felt that the matter should best be left to the legislator to settle. Needless to say, the legislator these days does not have the time to intervene in such matters of relative detail with the result that in cases such as these the English victim may be in a less favourable position than his American counterpart.

Finally, § 831 BGB and the growth of the non-delegable duty device in Germany and England must be compared carefully with §§ 409–29 of the American Restatement (Second) of Torts. The text of the basic rule (§ 409 on liability of torts of independent contractors) and the exceptions are reproduced below in Addendum 2. A glance at these rules makes it clear that the exceptions are gradually swallowing up the rule, a result which led one American court to say that “. . . it would be proper to say that the rule is now primarily important as a preamble to the catalog of its exceptions”. (Pacific Fire Ins. Co. v. Kenny Boiler & Mfg. Co., 277 NW 226 (1937)).

Addendum 1

Restatement (Second) of Agency

§ 220. Definition of servant

(2) In determining whether one acting for another is a servant or an independent contractor, the following matters of fact, among others, are considered:

(a) the extent of control which, by the agreement, the master may exercise over the details of the work;

(b) whether or not the one employed is engaged in a distinct occupation or business;

- (c) the kind of occupation, with reference to whether, in the locality, the work is usually done under the direction of the employer or by a specialist without supervision;
- (d) the skill required in the particular occupation;
- (e) whether the employer or the workman supplies the instrumentalities, tools, and the place of work for the person doing the work;
- (f) the length of time for which the person is employed;
- (g) the method of payment, whether by the time or by the job;
- (h) whether or not the work is a part of the regular business of the employer;
- (i) whether or not the parties believe they are creating the relation of master and servant; and
- (j) whether the principal is or is not in business.

§ 229. Kind of conduct within the scope of employment

- (1) To be within the scope of employment, conduct must be of the same general nature as that authorized, or incidental to the conduct authorised.
- (2) In determining whether or not the conduct, although not authorised, is nevertheless so similar to or incidental to the conduct authorised as to be within the scope of employment, the following matters of fact are to be considered:
 - (a) whether or not the act is one commonly done by such servants;
 - (b) the time, place, and purpose of the act;
 - (c) the previous relations between the master and the servant;
 - (d) the extent to which the business of the master is apportioned between different servants;
 - (e) whether or not the act is outside the enterprise of the master or, if within the enterprise, has not been entrusted to any servant;
 - (f) whether or not the master has reason to expect that such an act will be done;
 - (g) the similarity in quality of the act done to the act authorised;
 - (h) whether or not the instrumentality by which the harm is done has been furnished by the master to the servant;
 - (i) the extent of departure from the normal method of accomplishing an authorised result; and
 - (j) whether or not the act is seriously criminal.

Addendum 2

Restatement (Second) of Torts

§ 409. General principle

Except as stated in §§ 410–29, the employer of an independent contractor is not liable for physical harm caused to another by an act or omission of the contractor or his servants.

§ 410. Contractor's conduct in obedience to employer's directions

The employer of an independent contractor is subject to the same liability for physical harm caused by an act or omission committed by the contractor pursuant to orders or directions negligently given by the employer, as though the act or omission were that of the employer himself.

§ 411. Negligence in selection of contractor

An employer is subject to liability for physical harm to third persons caused by his failure to exercise reasonable care to employ a competent and careful contractor

- (a) to do work which will involve a risk of physical harm unless it is skilfully and carefully done, or
- (b) to perform any duty which the employer owes to third persons.

§ 412. Failure to inspect work of contractor after completion

One who is under a duty to exercise reasonable care to maintain land or chattels in such condition as not to involve unreasonable risk of bodily harm to others and who entrusts the work of repair and maintenance to an independent contractor, is subject to liability for bodily harm caused to them by his failure to exercise such care as the circumstances may reasonably require him to exercise to ascertain whether the land or chattel is in reasonably safe condition after the contractor's work is complete.

§ 413. Duty to provide for taking of precautions against dangers involved in work entrusted to contractor

One who employs an independent contractor to do work which the employer should recognize as likely to create, during its progress, a peculiar unreasonable risk of physical harm to others unless special precautions are taken, is subject to liability for physical harm caused to them by the absence of such precautions if the employer

- (a) fails to provide in the contract that the contractor shall take such precautions, or
- (b) fails to exercise reasonable care to provide in some other manner for the taking of such precautions.

§ 414. Negligence in exercising control retained by employer

One who entrusts work to an independent contractor, but who retains the control of any part of the work, is subject to liability for physical harm to others for whose safety the employer owes a duty to exercise reasonable care, which is caused by his failure to exercise his control with reasonable care.

§ 414A. Duty of possessor of land to prevent activities and conditions dangerous to those outside of land

A possessor of land who has employed or permitted an independent contractor to do work on the land, and knows that the activities of the contractor or conditions created by him involve an unreasonable risk of physical harm to those outside of the land, is subject to liability to them for such harm if he fails to exercise reasonable care to protect them against it.

§ 415. Duty to supervise equipment and methods of contractors or concessionaires on land held open to public

A possessor of land who holds it open to the public for any purpose is subject to liability to members of the public entering for that purpose for physical harm caused to them by his failure to exercise reasonable care to protect them against unreasonably dangerous activities of, or unreasonably dangerous conditions created by, an independent contractor or concessionaire employed or permitted to do work or carry on an activity on the land.

§ 416. Work dangerous in absence of special precautions

One who employs an independent contractor to do work which the employer should recognize as likely to create during its progress a peculiar risk of physical harm to others unless special precautions are taken, is subject to liability for physical harm caused to them by the failure of the contractor to exercise reasonable care to take such precautions, even though the employer has provided for such precautions.

§ 417. Work done in public place

One who employs an independent contractor to do work in a public place which unless carefully done involves a risk of making the physical condition of the place dangerous for the use of members of the public, is subject to liability for physical harm caused to members of the public by a negligent act or omission of the contractor which makes the physical condition of the place dangerous for their use.

§ 418. Maintenance of public highways and other public places

(1) One who is under a duty to construct or maintain a highway in reasonably safe condition for the use of the public, and who entrusts its construction, maintenance, or repair to an independent contractor, is subject to the same liability for physical harm to persons using the highway while it is held open for travel during such work, caused by the negligent failure of the contractor to make it reasonably safe for travel, as though the employer had retained the work in his own hands.

(2) The statement in subsection (1) applies to any place which is maintained by a government for the use of the public, if the government is under the same duty to maintain it in reasonably safe condition as it owes to the public in respect to the condition of its highways.

§ 419. Repairs which lessor is under a duty to his lessee to make

A lessor of land who employs an independent contractor to perform a duty which the lessor owes to his lessee to maintain the leased land in reasonably safe condition, is subject to liability to the lessee, and to third persons upon the land with the consent of the lessee, for physical harm caused by the contractor's failure to exercise reasonable care to make the land reasonably safe.

§ 420. Repairs gratuitously undertaken by lessor

A lessor of land who employs an independent contractor to make repairs which the lessor is under no duty to make, is subject to the same liability to the lessee, and to others upon the land with the consent of the lessee, for physical harm caused by the contractor's negligence in making or purporting to make the repairs as though the contractor's conduct were that of the lessor.

§ 421. Maintenance of structures on land retained in lessor's possession necessary to tenant's enjoyment of leased land

A possessor of land who, having a part of the land, is under a duty to maintain in reasonably safe condition the part retained by him, and who entrusts the repair of such part to an independent contractor, is subject to the same liability to the lessee, and to others upon the retained part of the land with the consent of the lessee, for physical harm caused by the negligence of the contractor in failing to maintain such part of the land in reasonably safe condition, as though the lessor had himself retained the making of the repairs in his own hands.

§ 422. Work on buildings and other structures on land

A possessor of land who entrusts to an independent contractor construction, repairs, or other work on the land, or on a building or other structure upon it, is subject to the same liability as though he had retained the work in his own hands to others on or outside the land for physical harm caused to them by the unsafe condition of the structure

- (a) while the possessor has retained possession of the land during the progress of the work, or
- (b) after he had resumed possession of the land upon its completion.

§ 422A. Work withdrawing lateral support

One who employs an independent contractor to do work which the employer knows or should know to be likely to withdraw lateral support from the land of another is subject to the same liability for the contractor's withdrawal of such support as if the employer had retained the work in his own hands.

§ 423. Making or repair of instrumentalities used in highly dangerous activities

One who carries on an activity which threatens a grave risk of serious bodily harm or death unless the instrumentalities used are carefully constructed and maintained, and who employs an independent contractor to construct or maintain such instrumentalities, is subject to the same liability for physical harm caused by the negligence of the contractor in constructing or maintaining such instrumentalities as though the employer had himself done the work of construction or maintenance.

§ 424. Precautions required by statutes or regulation

One who by statute or by administrative regulation is under a duty to provide specified safeguards or precautions for the safety of others is subject to liability to the others for whose protection the duty is imposed for harm caused by the failure of a contractor employed by him to provide such safeguards or precautions.

§ 425. Repair of chattel supplied or land held open to public as place of business

One who employs an independent contractor to maintain in safe condition land which he holds open to the entry of the public as his place of business, or a chattel which he supplies for others to use for his business purposes or which he leases for immediate use, is subject to the same liability for physical harm caused by the contractor's negligent failure to maintain the land or chattel in reasonably safe condition, as though he had retained its maintenance in his own hands.

§ 426. Negligence collateral to risk of doing the work

Except as stated in §§ 428 and 429, an employer of an independent contractor, unless he is himself negligent, is not liable for physical harm caused by any negligence of the contractor if

- (a) the contractor's negligence consists solely in the improper manner in which he does the work, and
- (b) it creates a risk of such harm which is not inherent in or normal to the work, and
- (c) the employer had no reason to contemplate the contractor's negligence when the contract was made.

§ 427. Negligence as to danger inherent in the work

One who employs an independent contractor to do work involving a special danger to others which the employer knows or has reason to know to be inherent in or normal to the work, or which he contemplates or has reason to contemplate when making the contract, is subject to liability for physical harm caused to such others by the contractor's failure to take reasonable precautions against such danger.

§ 427A. Work involving abnormally dangerous activity

One who employs an independent contractor to do work which the employer knows or has reason to know to involve an abnormally dangerous activity, is subject to liability to the same extent as the contractor for physical harm to others caused by the activity.

§ 427B. Work likely to involve trespass or nuisance

One who employs an independent contractor to do work which the employer knows or has reason to know to be likely to involve a trespass upon the land of another or the creation of a public or a private nuisance, is subject to liability for harm resulting to others from such trespass or nuisance.

§ 428. Contractor's negligence in doing work which cannot lawfully be done except under a franchise granted to his employer

An individual or a corporation carrying on an activity which can be lawfully carried on only under a franchise granted by public authority and which involves an unreasonable risk of harm to others, is subject to liability for physical harm caused to such others by the negligence of a contractor employed to do work in carrying on the activity.

§ 429. Negligence in doing work which is accepted in reliance on the employer's doing the work himself

One who employs an independent contractor to perform services for another which are accepted in the reasonable belief that the services are being rendered by the employer or by his servants, is subject to liability for physical harm caused by the negligence of the contractor in supplying such services, to the same extent as though the employer were supplying them himself or by his servants.

3. ROAD TRAFFIC ACT OF 19 DECEMBER 1952 [BGB1 I., 837] (AS AMENDED)

CONTENTS

I	Traffic Rules sections 1–6 d .
II	Liability sections 7–20.
III	Penalties and Administrative Fines sections 21–7.
IV	Central Traffic Register sections 28–30.

II Liability

§ 7 Liability of the Keeper of a Vehicle

(1) If in the course of the operation of a motor vehicle a person is killed, the body or the health of a person is injured or an object is damaged, the keeper of the motor vehicle is obliged to compensate the injured party for the damage resulting therefrom.

(2) The duty to compensate is excluded, if the accident was caused by an unavoidable event which is not due to a defect in the construction of the vehicle or to the failure of its mechanism.

An event is deemed to be unavoidable in particular if it is due to the conduct of the injured party or of a third party who is not an employee or an animal and if both the keeper and the driver of the vehicle have applied that care which is required in the light of the circumstances.

(3) If somebody uses the vehicle without the knowledge and consent of the keeper of the vehicle that person is liable to pay compensation for the damage in the place of the keeper; in addition the keeper himself remains liable to pay compensation if the use of the motor vehicle was facilitated by his negligence. The first sentence of this paragraph does not apply if the person using the vehicle was employed by the keeper for the purpose of operating the vehicle or if he was entrusted with the vehicle by the keeper.

§ 8 Exceptions

The provisions of § 7 do not apply, if the accident was caused by a vehicle which cannot proceed at a speed exceeding 20 kilometres on level ground or if the injured person was employed in operating the motor vehicle.

§ 8a Liability to Passengers in the Course of Commercial Transport of Persons

(1) If a passenger in a motor vehicle has been killed or injured, the keeper of the vehicle is only liable in accordance with § 7 if a commercial transport of passengers for remuneration is involved.

If an object has been damaged which was carried by a motor vehicle, the keeper of the vehicle is only liable under § 7 if a person who is carried in the vehicle in the circumstances envisaged in § 7 carries the object on himself or with himself.

The commercial character of a transport of passengers in the meaning of the first and second sentences is not excluded by the fact that the transport is performed by a corporation or institution governed by public law.

(2) The duty of the keeper to pay compensation in respect of the death or injury suffered by a passenger in accordance with para. 1, final sentence, in conjunction with § 7 cannot be excluded or restricted. Any provisions or arguments to the contrary are invalid.

§ 9 Contributory Negligence of the Injured Party

If the injured party contributed to the damage by his negligence, § 254 BGB applies with the proviso that if an object was damaged, negligence on the part of the person exercising factual control over the object is treated as equivalent to negligence on the part of the injured party.

§ 10 Extent of Liability in the Case of Death

(1) In the case of death, damages to be paid comprise compensation for the expenses of an attempted cure and for the economic loss which the deceased has suffered because his earning capacity was destroyed or reduced during his illness or because his needs were increased. The person liable to pay damages must also reimburse the cost of the burial to the person responsible for it.

(2) If at the time of the injury the deceased stood in a relationship to a third party by virtue of which he was legally bound to maintain the latter, or might become so liable, and if as a result of the death the third party has lost the right to maintenance, the person liable to pay compensation must pay damages to the third party to the extent that the deceased would have been liable to pay maintenance during the probable duration of his life. The duty to compensate arises even if the third party was conceived at the time of the injury, but had not yet been born.

§ 11 Extent of Liability in the Case of Injury to the Person

In the case of injury to the person or to health, the damages comprise compensation for the expenses of the cure and for the economic loss which the injured party suffered because his earning capacity was temporarily or permanently destroyed or reduced as a result of the injury or because his needs have increased.

§ 12 Maximum Amount of Liability

(1) The person who is bound to pay compensation is liable to pay:

1. Where one person was killed or injured a lump sum of up to DM 500,000 and no more or periodic payments up to DM 30,000 per annum;

2. Where several persons were killed or injured in the same event, notwithstanding the limits laid down in (1), a total lump sum of DM 750,000 and no more or periodical payments of DM 45,000; this restriction does not apply, however, in the cases of § 8a, para. 1, first sentence in so far as the liability of the keeper of the vehicle is concerned;

3. Where an object was damaged, up to an amount of DM 100,000 even if several objects were damaged in the same accident.

(2) If the damages to be paid to several claimants involved in the same event exceed in total the maximum amount enumerated in 2., first part of the sentence, or in 3., the damages payable to each individual are reduced in proportion of the total in relation to the maximum amount.

§ 13 Periodical Payments as Damages

(1) In the future, damages in respect of the loss or the reduction of earning capacity or because the needs of the injured party have increased as well as the damages due to a third party under § 10, para. 2, must be paid by way of periodical amounts.

(2) The provisions of § 843, II to IV of the BGB apply by way of analogy.

(3) If at the time when judgment was given for periodical payments the judgment debtor was not asked to give security, the person entitled to the payment may demand security nevertheless, if the circumstances of the judgment debtor have deteriorated considerably; in the same circumstances he can demand that the security fixed by the judgment should be increased.

§ 14 Period of Limitation

The period of limitation is determined by the analogous application of the rule of the Civil Code governing the limitation of actions in tort.

§ 15 Duty to Give Notice—Laches

The claimant for damages forfeits the rights granted by the provisions of this law, unless he had given notice of the accident to the person liable to pay compensation within six months after having ascertained the damage and the identity of the person liable to pay compensation. Forfeiture does not take place if the failure to give notice was due to circumstances for which the claimant for damages is not responsible or if the person liable to pay compensation has come to know of the accident by other means during the period set out above.

§ 16 Liability due to Other Legal Provisions

Any Federal provisions are unaffected according to which the keeper of a motor vehicle is more extensively liable for damage caused by the vehicle than according to the provisions of the present law or according to which another person is liable.

§ 17 Contribution among Several Persons Liable to Pay Compensation

(1) If damage is caused by several motor vehicles and if the keepers of the vehicles involved are bound by law to pay compensation to a third party, the liability to pay compensation of the keepers of the vehicles and the extent of the compensation to be paid as between themselves depends upon the circumstances, especially according to whether the damage has been caused predominantly by one or the other of the parties. The same applies to the liability of one of the keepers of the vehicles if the damage was caused to another keeper of a vehicle involved in the accident.

(2) The provisions of para. (1) apply by way of analogy if the damage is caused by a motor vehicle and an animal or by a motor vehicle and a railway.

§ 18 Liability of the Driver to Pay Compensation

(1) In the circumstances covered by § 7 I, the driver of the motor vehicle is also liable to pay compensation in accordance with the provisions of §§ 8–15. No liability exists if the damage was not caused by the blameworthy conduct of the driver.

(2) The provisions of § 16 apply by way of analogy.

(3) If in the circumstances covered by § 17 the driver of a vehicle is also liable to pay compensation, his liability in relation to the keepers and duties of the other vehicles involved, to a keeper of animals or a railway undertaking is determined by the analysis application of the provisions of § 17.

§ 19 (Abrogated.)

§ 20 Local Jurisdictions

Claims based on this Act fall also within the jurisdiction of the court of the district in which the event occurred which caused the damage.

Reform proposal of 24 September 2001 concerning some of the above provisions

§ 7 (1) sentence 2

If the motor vehicle was connected to a trailer at the time of the accident, the keeper of the trailer as well as the keeper of the motor vehicle is obliged to provide compensation to the person suffering harm.

§ 7 (2)

The duty to compensate is excluded if the accident is caused by force majeure.

§ 7 (3) sentence 3

Sentences 1 and 2 are to be applied accordingly to the use of a trailer.

§ 8

The provisions of § 7 do not apply,

1. if the accident was caused by a motor vehicle which cannot travel on level ground at a higher speed than twenty kilometres per hour, or by a trailer connected to such a vehicle at the time of the accident,

2. if the injured person was operating the motor vehicle, or
3. if an object has been damaged which was being transported by the motor vehicle or by a trailer connected to it at the time of the accident, unless a person who is being transported is carrying the thing on him or takes it with him.

§ 8a

In the case of commercial transport of persons for remuneration, the duty of the keeper to compensate in accordance with § 7 because of the death or injury of persons transported cannot be either excluded or limited. The commercial character of a transport of persons is not excluded by the fact that the transport is performed by a body or institution governed by public law.

§ 11 sentence 2

In this case, fair compensation in money can also be demanded for harm which is not economic in accordance with § 253 para. 2 of the BGB.

§ 12 (1)

The person who is bound to pay compensation is liable to pay

1. where one person was killed or injured, a lump sum of up to 600,000 Euro or periodic payments of up to 36,000 Euro per annum;
2. where several persons were killed or injured in the same event, notwithstanding the limits laid down in 1, a total lump sum of up to 3,000,000 Euro or periodical payments of up to 180,000 Euro per annum; this restriction does not however apply to a keeper of a motor vehicle who is under a duty to compensate in the case of commercial transport of persons for remuneration;
3. where an object was damaged, a sum of up to 300,000 Euro, even if several objects are damaged in the same event.

§ 12a

(1) If dangerous goods are transported, the person bound to pay compensation is liable to pay

1. where several persons were killed or injured in the same event, notwithstanding the limits laid down in § 12 para. 1 no 1, a total capital sum of up to 6,000,000 Euro or periodic payments of up to 360,000 Euro per annum,
2. where immovable objects are damaged, even if several objects are damaged in the same event, a sum of up to 6,000,000 Euro, in so far as the damage is caused by the characteristics which make the transported goods dangerous. In other respects § 12 para. 1 remains unaffected.

(2) Dangerous goods in the sense of this Act are substances and objects whose transport on the road is forbidden, or allowed only under certain conditions, in accordance with Appendices A and B to the European Convention of 30 September 1957 on the International Carriage of Dangerous Goods by Road (ADR) (reference omitted) in the version applying at that time.

(3) Paragraph 1 is not to be applied in the case of exempted transports of dangerous goods or transports in limited quantities within in the limits laid down in marginal number 10 011 of Annex B to the Convention mentioned in paragraph 2.

(4) Paragraph 1 is not to be applied when the damage on transport has arisen within a business in which dangerous goods are produced, treated, processed, stored, used or destroyed, in so far as the transport takes place on a self-contained site.

(5) § 12 para. 2 applies accordingly.

§ 12b

§§ 12 and 12a are not to be applied when damage is caused by the operation of an armoured caterpillar vehicle.

§ 17 (2)

The provisions of paragraph 1 are to be applied accordingly when the damage is caused by a motor vehicle and a trailer connected to it at the time of the accident, by a motor vehicle and an animal, or by a motor vehicle and a railway.

§ 18 (3)

If in the cases in § 17 the driver of a motor vehicle is also obliged to pay compensation for the damage, the provisions of § 17 are to be applied accordingly to this duty in his relationship with the keepers and drivers of the other motor vehicles involved, with the keeper of the trailer connected to another motor vehicle involved at the time of the accident, with the keeper of the animal or with the railway undertaking.

Case 122

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 9 DECEMBER 1959

BGHZ 29, 163 = NJW 1959, 627

The plaintiff's lorry (motor vehicle and two trailers) remained stationary on the right side of the Karlsruhe–Frankfurt autobahn in the night of 7–8 March 1951 because of damage to the engine. About 1.15 a.m. the carrier K—husband of the defendant Sophie K and father of the defendant Herbert Bernhard K—driving a motor lorry with a trailer ran into the plaintiff's stationary lorry. Both lorries sustained considerable damage. K, who had been driving his lorry, suffered such serious injuries that he died on the way to hospital.

The plaintiff contends that the collision is exclusively attributable to the fault of K; for he would have been bound, if he had been attentive enough, to notice the red light of the stationary lorry and the hurricane lantern which had been set up, and could have deviated in time on to the lane for overtaking. He demanded damages from K's heirs.

The District Court upheld the claim in principle. The Court of Appeal, on the other hand, in principle affirmed the defendant's liability in damages, limited only as to one-half. The plaintiff's application for review, in which he sought to have the judgment of the District Court restored, failed for these

Reasons

I. According to the findings of the Court of Appeal the carrier K, with his long-distance lights turned on, ran with the whole width of his vehicle into the stationary lorry, without braking in time or turning off to the left. During the previous one and a half hours several other vehicles had driven past the plaintiff's lorry, whilst it stood on the autobahn. According to the Court of Appeal's view K also would have been bound to notice the stationary lorry if he had been attentive enough, even if it had been completely unlit, and could then still have moved on to the lane for overtaking. It went on to say: the fact that K did not react at all to the obstacle before him proves that he was guilty of gross inattention or, alternatively, that despite his being blinded by the light of oncoming vehicles he drove on with undiminished speed into a space where he could not see. On the basis of the established facts, this view of the Court of Appeal is unexceptional in law. It therefore also held rightly that the defendants, as heirs of K, must under §§ 823, 1967 BGB make good the damage to the plaintiff.

II. The applicant for review objected that the Court of Appeal applied § 17 StVG and awarded to the plaintiff in principle compensation for only half his damage.

He alleges that §§ 7, 17 StVG are not applicable, because the plaintiff's lorry was no longer in operation and urges that a vehicle is no longer in operation, even when it has not reached the end of its journey, if it has come to a full stop from lack of fuel or a mechanical fault. Even if a failure of its engine causes it to stop on a traffic highway and it stays there for a not wholly inappreciable time, it is generally regarded as no longer in operation, since it has lost the capacity to move.

This view of the appellant corresponds in result to the practice of the Reichsgericht and of several Courts of Appeal. According to that practice, a vehicle is no longer in operation in the sense of § 7 StVG if it is reduced to a complete standstill and owing to failure its engine can be set again in operation only after considerable time (e.g. RGZ 122, 270; 333, 132, 262). In so holding, the Reichsgericht also did not start from the engineering notion of operation, according to which a vehicle is in operation only as long as the engine is working directly or indirectly. It preferred the traffic-orientated point of view and even then attributed an accident to the operation of a motor vehicle if it stood in a close local and temporal connection with a particular operation or a particular operating mechanism, irrespective of whether the engine propelled the vehicle or not. According to the Reichsgericht's point of view, approved by the Bundesgerichtshof, the operation of a vehicle is therefore not interrupted as a rule when it stops on the highway with the engine switched off. But even in adopting this traffic-orientated point of view, the Reichsgericht has interpreted the concept of the operation of a motor vehicle strictly, and assumed that the operation comes to an end when, for more than a short time, the vehicle can no longer move under its own power because of engine failure or lack of fuel.

The Bundesgerichtshof is unable to follow this practice of the Reichsgericht because, in view of the enormous increase of motor traffic and its dangers, it no longer conforms to the sense and purpose of § 7 StVG. The purpose of the Act, to protect participants in traffic against the increasing dangers of present-day motor traffic, makes it necessary to give a broad interpretation to the concept "in the operation of a motor vehicle" [references]. In that decision this Senate denied that the vehicle was inoperative and so exempt from strict liability where a driver has left his lorry on the carriageway of a federal highway to have a good night's rest. The Senate also attributed the accident that ensued because a car ran into the stationary lorry to the operation of the stationary vehicle in the sense of § 7 StVG. No other conclusion can be reached if similarly an accident occurs because a lorry remains standing for a considerable time on the carriageway of a high-speed highway owing to engine failure. The case that now calls for decision differs from the earlier one only because the lorry here had lost the capacity to proceed under its own power, whereas there, although its engine was turned off, it was ready to move on the highway. That distinction is irrelevant in applying § 7 StVG if one looks at the concept of operation in that provision from the traffic-orientated point of view, as the prevailing opinion now does. The risks which the motor vehicle produces in traffic emanate not only from the engine and its effect on the vehicle but, with the increase of traffic, more and more from its general flow and in particular from motor vehicles which stop or park on the carriageway portion of a high-speed highway. It is precisely on the autobahn on which the present accident occurred that stationary vehicles raise a typical risk for other participants in the traffic. In this case, as the Bundesgerichtshof observed in its judgment of 8 April 1957 [references] the risk of a stationary motor vehicle may even be greater than of a moving one. It is therefore permissible and justified by the sense and purpose of the provisions on liability of the Road Traffic Act to attribute an accident produced by a collision with a stationary vehicle not only to the operation of the moving but also of the stationary vehicle and hence to make both drivers strictly liable in damages. It is irrelevant whether the driver voluntarily pulled up for a break or was forced to stop on the carriageway owing to a defect in the vehicle. The decisive factor is that in both cases other participants in the traffic are put at risk by his vehicle standing on the highway. That an accident due to a defect in the vehicle or a failure of its mechanism should lead to liability of the driver is clear from § 7 StVG which expressly denies that this case constitutes an avoidable event which excludes liability. This liability for accidents which are attributable to a technical defect in the vehicle would, as the Court of Appeal of Karlsruhe (VersR 1956, 260) accurately emphasizes, be rendered nugatory to a considerable extent if it were held that an accident during a halt due to a technical failure was not within the operation of the vehicle and therefore did not lead to liability under § 7 I StVG. The wording of section II of that provision shows that the strict liability established by it extends also to accidents of this kind.

This result follows a line which originated with the decision of the Reichsgericht, RGZ 170, 1. There the Reichsgericht held that an accident was within the course of operation of a lorry in a case where a railway train collided with a lorry stuck in a hole in the road, the left rear part of its loading flap extending over the rails and unable to move under its own power because the lifting arrangement had been torn off. In that case, the Reichsgericht held that the operation of the motor vehicle continued. It explained that the lorry had moved to the place of accident and had thereby in the course of its operation set the cause which produced the collision. It is not essentially different when a lorry, as in the present case, blocks a portion of the highway because of engine failure. Here also the lorry drove up to the place of accident and therefore produced in the course of its operation a situation endangering traffic.

In examining the question whether in such a case § 7 StVG is to be applied, one cannot neglect the criterion of how long a motor vehicle stands on the carriageway. If the defect in the vehicle can be remedied in a short time and it can soon go on its way, it is now generally accepted in accordance with the practice of the Reichsgericht that the operation of the vehicle, for the purpose of § 7 StVG, is not interrupted by that halt (cf. inter alia RG JW 1929, 2055 no. 7 in a case where the petrol lead was blocked). If now one considers that the dangers from a stationary vehicle increase the longer it forms an obstacle for other participants in the traffic, it would be illogical from the traffic-orientated standpoint to treat favourably as regards liability the driver of a vehicle which is stationary for a longer period and which therefore creates a greater risk. It is wrong to exempt him from liability while a slighter operative risk of the vehicle attracts strict liability. If, as in the present case, a vehicle must stay for a longer time on the carriageway because it cannot be repaired at once, then if another vehicle collides with the obstacle, that accident must also be attributed to the operation of the stationary vehicle [references]. The operation of this vehicle continues as long as the driver leaves the vehicle in the midst of the traffic and the dangerous situation thus created continues. For the purpose of § 7 StVG the operation is only interrupted when the vehicle is withdrawn from the carriageway and is placed somewhere away from the regular traffic. Only thus the interruption of the operation is made known to others, but also that typical risk is eliminated which arises if motor vehicles are stopped or parked on the fast traffic lane of the carriageway. Whether as Walther [reference] contends, the answer should be different when an unauthorized user leaves a vehicle standing in the middle of the traffic, never to use it again, need not be examined since such a case is not in issue here. In the case for decision the lorry was on the way to a particular place and it was planned to continue the journey.

This view is criticised by Roth Stielow [reference] on the ground that it goes beyond the limits which the judge must observe in interpreting legislation. He starts by assuming that there is a "clear statutory direction to the contrary" which it infringes. But this starting-point is wrong. The enactment does not provide a detailed definition of the concept "in the operation of a motor vehicle" and, as Boehmer (VersR 1957, 587) correctly explains, says nowhere that it only constitutes an accident within the operation if the vehicle is in motion or its engine is running. But if the legislator has not provided any further explanation, it is for the judge to interpret this ambiguous concept. The judge is therefore not prohibited from interpreting § 7 StVG broadly if in so doing he conforms to the sense and purpose of the enactment to protect participants in traffic against the dangers of motor traffic. It is therefore entirely within the scope of permissible interpretation if this protection of the participants is extended also to the dangers produced by stationary vehicles in present-day traffic conditions.

Even if the legislature in 1908 saw the chief danger of motor vehicles in their rapid movement due to engine power and hence regarded the mechanical aspect of the concept of operation as paramount, that would not exclude the adaptation of the concept "in the operation of a motor vehicle" to the experiences and requirements of present-day traffic. As was already emphasized in another connection, according to experience modern traffic risks arise, not only from the engine as such and its effect on the motor vehicle, but from the movement of traffic as a whole. The motor vehicle itself creates a substantial danger as part of the traffic. Accordingly, Wussow [reference] rightly remarks that it is precisely from the point of view of risk, which the legislator takes as his starting-point, that the traffic-orientated aspect becomes much more prominent than the danger produced by the engine. The judge would not be true to his task if under these circumstances he clung to the concept, which is far too narrow, of a mechanical operation. His duty towards legislation and to law (Article 20 II GG) allows him not only to develop the law by interpretation in the direction of its further evolution, but obliges him to do so if the finding of a just decision requires it. The wording of the enactment gives way to its sense and purpose. To give effect to them in applying the law in the individual case and to provide an equitable and reasonable solution to the dispute is the judge's task [references]. As Radbruch [references] expresses it, not only must he follow the thoughts of the legislature, but he must also think them through to their final conclusion. But the judge does nothing else when he adapts the concept of operation in § 7 StVG to the experiences and requirements of the modern age in order to give effect to the legislative intent which is to afford extensive protection against the dangers of motor traffic.

In any case, it cannot be assumed that the characterisation of the concept of operation from the traffic-orientated point of view, which has long prevailed in the courts, conflicts with the intent of present-day legislature, for while it has repeatedly altered other provisions of the Road Traffic Act, it has retained the wording of § 7 I StVG, although it was aware of the long-standing practice concerning the term “in the operation of a motor vehicle”.

III. In view of these considerations, the Court of Appeal was right in dividing the damage of the plaintiff according to § 17 StVG, and, when examining how far it was caused predominantly by the one or the other side, considered in the first place the risk arising from the operation of both lorries. [A discussion of the apportionment follows.]

Case 123

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 23 NOVEMBER 1955
BGHZ 19, 114 = NJW 1956, 217 = VERSR 1956, 36, 126

On 23 December 1948 the A H Limited Partnership held a Christmas party for its personnel in a restaurant. E, the partner personally responsible, instructed the defendant, a bookkeeper in the firm, to take home two drunken employees, Sch. and H, in the firm's car. The car was struck by a train on a level-crossing and H was killed.

The appropriate professional association claimed from the plaintiff reimbursement of its payment under § 1542 of the Imperial Public Insurance Act (henceforth referred to as RVO) and the provisions of the Reichshaftpflichtgesetz. The plaintiff, the German Federal Railway, met the claim of the professional association. It demands of the defendant compensation for its disbursements on the ground that he had alone caused the accident by his gross negligence.

Its claim for compensation failed in all instances for these

Reasons

I. The Court of Appeal rightly proceeded from the principle that the plaintiff can under § 17 of the Road Traffic Act (StVG) claim from the defendant compensation for the payments made to the professional association only if the defendant as driver of the car involved in the accident was bound by statute to make good the damage suffered by the dependants of the deceased. For that purpose it is material whether H lost his life in an industrial accident and whether the defendant's liability is excluded by § 899 RVO in combination with § 898 RVO.

1. The appropriate professional association acknowledged that the fatal accident of H was an industrial accident requiring compensation. The court is bound by this decision under § 901 RVO.

If the defendant were to be regarded as an agent or representative of the entrepreneur, or as a superintendent of his business and work, he would be liable to H's dependants under § 899 in combination with § 898 RVO only if it was established in criminal proceedings that he caused the accident intentionally. Since no such finding was made, and the defendant was only convicted of a criminal act committed negligently, it is necessary to examine first of all whether the defendants belong to one of the classes of persons who are assimilated to the entrepreneur in § 899 RVO.

The Landgericht and Oberlandesgericht regarded the defendant as a superintendent of the business and work. The Court of Appeal came to that conclusion on the basis of the following findings:

The defendant supervised the whole business in the absence of the managing partner. He had prepared and carried through the staff Christmas party on the entrepreneur's instruction. That the managing partner, on leaving the party about four o'clock in the morning with his co-partners, entrusted to the defendant, and not to one of the professional drivers who were present, the task of taking the drunken employees home was not only because he seemed to be quite sober but because the whole conduct of the party had been placed in his hands. The managing partners, on leaving the party, had wished to hand over the responsibility for its smooth ending to the man who possessed the highest authority in their absence. By virtue of the order given him, the defendant had to perform independently and responsibly the task of getting the inebriates properly and safely home and, in accordance with the entrepreneur's duty of care, to assure the safety of the employees who were his passengers.

Contrary to the view of the applicant for review, these findings justify the conclusion that the defendant enjoys the protection of § 899 RVO.

The applicant maintains that the Court of Appeal drew the character of superintendent too widely and therefore misunderstood it. That is not correct. In its judgment the Court of Appeal accurately started from the principles regarding the notion of character of a superintendent of business and work developed by the Reichsgericht in its decision RGZ 167, 685 and 170, 159. It did not fail to realize that the only person who can be regarded as a superintendent is a member of the work-force who has the duty to supervise others so engaged or at least one of the departments of the enterprise. As the Reichsgericht (RGZ 170, 159) correctly states, he must stand out from among the other employees by the fact that he must care for the co-operation of several employees or for the smooth interlocking of the establishment and the plant, and therefore for the harmonious interplay of personal and technical forces and must be responsible for these. It must be conceded to the appellant that this is of course not generally the case of a car driver who has no other duties. The performance of the necessary journeys and the care and upkeep of the car are not a supervisory activity contemplated by § 899 RVO. It is established, however, that the defendant was not appointed as chauffeur. As the Court of Appeal found, even when he undertook the fatal journey he did not act only as a chauffeur but was engaged in a task that exceeded the general duties of a driver. As the Court of Appeal found, he was given the responsibility for the smooth ending of the party after the managers had left, and therefore a position was entrusted to him that raised him above the other employees. The applicant is in error in maintaining that the order did not fulfil the conditions for rendering him responsible for the regular co-operation of several employees or the smooth interlocking of the establishment and the plant, for such a range of duties demanded a delegation of at least some duration. There is no need here to decide whether the position of a superintendent of business and work requires that the responsibility is to be delegated for a longer period, for in the present case there is a finding, overlooked by the applicant, that the defendant had the task not only for the time being, but generally of supervising the business in the managing partner's absence. In this situation the Court of Appeal's characterization of the defendant as a superintendent of business and work is free from objection. It can therefore be left undecided whether he was also an agent in the sense of § 899 RVO, because in driving several employees home on the order of the entrepreneur he discharged the latter's duty of care. In any case, the finding of fact makes it free from doubt that, even on the journey which led to the accident, the defendant acted as a person assimilated to the entrepreneur as mentioned in § 899 RVO.

2. Moreover, the application of §§ 898, 899 RVO is not excluded by § 1 second sentence of the Act of 7 December 1943 (RGBl. I 674) on the extended admission of claims for damages arising out of service and industrial accidents. According to that provision, insured persons and their surviving dependants can make good their claims for compensation without limit against the persons mentioned in §§ 898, 899 RVO, if the accident occurred when they were participating in general traffic. On this point the Court of Appeal followed the case-law of the Supreme Court for the British Zone, according to which there is no participation in the general traffic if the injured person was a passenger in a private vehicle driven by the person who caused the injury and the injured party stood in causal and organic connection with the employment (BGHZ 1, 245 = NJW 1949, 263). It assumed that such was the case here.

The present Senate decided (BGHZ 8, 330, 336 ff.) that so-called works traffic (constant transport of workers in a works vehicle to the place of business) constitutes transport within the business and that the transported workers do not participate in general traffic. It left unanswered the question whether also in the case dealt with in the Supreme Court of the British Zone, in which the entrepreneur took an employee from the place of work in his own car, there was no participation in the general traffic. In the dispute between the present parties there is also no need to decide whether the principle established by the Supreme Court is invariably to be followed. In any event in the present case, in agreement with the Court of Appeal, no participation in the general traffic can be said to have taken place.

The Act of 7 December 1943 deals principally with accidents suffered by a worker on the way from or to the place of work and which count as industrial accidents according to § 543 RVO. If an entrepreneur or a person assimilated to him (§ 899 RVO) should run down an employee on the way to the place of work, §§ 898, 899 RVO would exclude claims of a private law nature against the entrepreneur and the persons mentioned in § 899 RVO, although in such cases only a slight connection exists between the accident and the worker's activity in the business. The Act, according to its preamble, wishes to do away with the unfairness that was produced because in cases of this kind a person injured in the course of service or work is placed in a worse position than other participants in traffic. This unfair disadvantage was to be removed in all cases where the accident occurs in the course of participation in general traffic. As this Senate has already said (BGHZ 8, 330 [337]), in deciding whether there is such participation it must first be asked whether the insured person suffered the accident as an ordinary participant in traffic or as an employee. Whether the former or the latter is the case or predominates must be decided on the facts of the particular case. If an employee, like H in the present case, is driven home after a staff party in a works car on the entrepreneur's order, that journey is occasioned by the operation of the enterprise and is so closely connected with the enterprise and with the injured party's membership of the enterprise that the character of the passenger as a participant in the traffic recedes into the background. That applies especially if the journey, as here, served only to take the employees home and, as the Court of Appeal also found, was ordered out of a feeling of care for the drunken employees. That an insured person in a case of this kind does not participate in the general traffic, in the meaning of § 1 II of the Act on the extended admission of claims for damages arising from service and industrial accidents, conforms to the principles on which both the courts and writers proceed in similar cases. The prevailing opinion recognises that taking an employee home as a passenger from the place of work in the works car is not a participation in the general traffic [references].

The Court of Appeal thus held correctly that the Act of 7 December 1943 on the extended application of claims for damages arising out of service and industrial accidents does not stand in the way of applying §§ 898, 899 RVO in the present case.

II. The applicant for review also asks for an examination as to whether the statutory exclusion of liability in § 898 RVO affects the claim for compensation at all. He refers to the judgment of 3 February 1954 (BGHZ 12, 213) in which this Senate decided that a contractual exclusion or reduction of liability, e.g. between driver and passenger, cannot adversely affect the claim for contribution by a second tortfeasor under § 17 StVG or § 426 BGB. The applicant wishes to apply to the present case the notion that the effectiveness of such an exclusion of liability would stultify the equitable contribution intended by the legislator, and maintains that since the entrepreneurs and those assimilated to them under § 899 RVO are liable to the professional association for his expenditure according to § 903 RVO, the limitation of liability under §§ 898, 899 RVO is only justified in relation to the person directly injured in order to avoid litigation within the enterprise. But the legislator, the applicant continues, cannot have intended by this provision to interfere with the rights of third persons and thus to curtail provisions whose purpose is to produce an equitable compromise. Since the professional association sought the reimbursement of its expenditure from the plaintiff only but did not make any claims against the defendant under § 903 RVO, the plaintiff, who was responsible only on the ground of strict liability, was saddled with the damage, whereas the defendant, who was to blame, was not called upon to pay. The applicant regards this as unfair and as an infringement of §§ 898, 899 RVO and 17 StVG.

These arguments of the applicant for review cannot be of help to it. It may, of course, at first sight appear unfair that the plaintiff, who has to answer for the damage only on the basis of strict liability, must perform in full, whereas the defendant, who was to blame, is relieved of responsibility. But this objection of the applicant does not take sufficiently into account the special conditions of accident insurance law, which consciously aims at protecting the entrepreneur, agent, and business superintendent against claims exceeding the liability under § 903 RVO [reference]. The provisions, indeed, of §§ 898, 899 RVO serve also, as must be conceded to the applicant, the purpose of avoiding, in the interest of industrial peace, disputes between workers and employers over the responsibility for business accidents (BGHZ 8, 330 [339]) . . . It is, however, essential here that the Act has in relation to industrial accidents excluded claims for compensation by injured parties against an entrepreneur because the latter has to bear the burden of accident insurance and because the insured are allowed claims for compensation when the entrepreneur and his agents are not to blame and even if the employer himself has caused the accident through his own negligence. Likewise § 899 RVO in principle relieves agents as well as business and work superintendents of liability towards the workers because under § 903 RVO they must reimburse the professional association the expenses incurred by the latter, if they caused the accident intentionally or by carelessly neglecting their official, professional, or industrial duties. Hence the exemption of the entrepreneur as well as his agents and superintendents from liability towards the injured constitutes a compensation for the latter in return for their statutory liability to the professional association (RGZ 170, 159 [160]; cf. also RGZ 153, 38, 41, 42 and BGHZ 8, 330 [338]). This compensation would only be incomplete if the entrepreneur, agents, and superintendent were exposed, along with the liability under § 903 RVO, to a further claim and had to pay damages to a second wrongdoer in whole or in part by way of compensation. That would contradict the purpose of the law of social insurance, for the protection afforded by it to the business entrepreneur and those assimilated to him according to § 899 RVO would in that way be nullified again. That cannot be the intention of the statute. It shows that as a rule the insured has no claim against the individual entrepreneur, agent, or superintendent and that such a claim lies only in the exceptional case, not in issue here, where the entrepreneur, agent, or superintendent causes the accident intentionally (cf. RGZ 153, 38 [43]). If, however, the injured party has no claim whatever against them, an essential condition is lacking for a claim to contribution by the second wrongdoer. Contribution is a consequence of the common duty of several wrongdoers to pay damages and hence presupposes as a matter of principle that several wrongdoers are liable as joint debtors for the damage (BGHZ 11, 170 [174] and 12, 213). Since in the case to be decided the liability of the defendant to the injured party's surviving dependants is excluded, a joint debt is lacking and with it the foundation for a claim to contribution.

It is another question whether the plaintiff could have resisted the professional association's claim to payment, on the ground that it would be contrary to good faith, in spite of the possibility of recourse against the defendant (§ 903 RVO) to claim the full payment from the plaintiff. That question, however, need not be decided here.

III. The applicant for review now maintains that the claim has none the less a basis in § 426 II BGB. Both parties are alleged to be liable to the professional association as joint debtors, the defendant under § 903 IV RVO and the plaintiff because the claim of the surviving dependants under § 1542 RVO had been assigned to the professional association. Since the plaintiff has satisfied the association, their claim has passed to the plaintiff under § 426 II BGB.

It must be conceded to the applicant that both parties were debtors of the association for the reasons adduced by it. But that could lead to a duty of contribution between them under § 426 BGB only if to that extent they had stood in a true joint debtor relationship towards the association (BGB RGRK 10 edn. § 426 n. 1 and § 421 n. 1c). That, however, is not the case. A true joint debtor relationship presupposes an internal connection of the two obligations in the sense of a legal community of purpose (BGHZ 13, 360 [365], Great Civil Senate with references to practice of the Reichsgericht). That is missing from the obligations on which the claims were based which the association had against parties to the present dispute. It has lodged against the plaintiff a claim of the dependants of the injured party which is based on the Reichshaftpflichtgesetz and falls within the sphere of private law; it had been assigned to the association by operation of law (§ 1542 RVO). On the other hand, the association had against the defendant in its own right a claim to compensation of a special kind based on a statutory provision forming part of public law (§ 903 RVO) against which a contributory fault of the injured party could not be pleaded (RGZ 96, 135; 144, 31 [35]). It is adapted to the structure of accident insurance in the Reich Insurance Ordinance and to the relationship of the association to enterprises belonging to it which must pay contributions and has the purpose of indemnifying the association for its expenditure arising from the accident. Admittedly the existence of a true joint debt is not absolutely excluded by the differing bases of the obligations and of their origins. Instead it is decisive that in the present case an internal connection is lacking between the two obligations in the sense of a legal community of purpose. Both claims stand only in loose economic connection with each other, for they both had for their object the reimbursement of payments which the association was bound to make on the occasion of the accident arising out of the enterprise. The plaintiff and the defendant thus owed identical performance to the same creditor (the professional association) to the extent that the economic purpose of the obligation is attained by a single performance to the creditor who can therefore claim only one payment. This happened, however, without the internal connection required for a true joint debt. Since there was no legal community between the debtors, which is required by § 426 BGB as a presupposition for a duty to contribute (cf. BGHZ 13, 360, 365), only a joint debt in a non-technical sense can be envisaged. §§ 421 ff. BGB, and in particular the regulation of contribution in § 426 BGB, do not cover a relationship of this kind. Hence there is also no room for an analogous application of that provision.

This emerges also from another point of view. The Reichs Insurance Act does not wish to force the professional association to make claims on its members to cover its expenditure if they only acted negligently. Accordingly § 905 RVO provides that the meeting of members of the professional association or, if the by-laws so permit, the directors can renounce their right to recourse. If the directors wish to claim reimbursement, § 906 RVO allows the person liable to appeal to the meeting. Accordingly, the question whether a claim should be made on a member of the association under § 903 RVO is referred to the exclusive decision of the association. If the plaintiff were to be granted a claim for contribution by an analogous application of § 426 BGB, that would indirectly involve an outsider bringing a claim against the tortfeasor indirectly, which the professional association did not wish to make. This would be an admissible attack on the insurer's authority to decide.

This view of the Senate that the plaintiff cannot bring a claim for contribution under § 426 BGB conforms to the practice of the Reichsgericht. It took the same standpoint in its decision in Seuffarch, 65 no. 32; and in its judgment published in DR 1940, 1779 no. 10 dealing with a similar case without, however, going more deeply into the matter it came to the same result that no joint debt and therefore no duty to contribute existed [reference].

IV. Before the Court of Appeal the plaintiff, by referring to the fact that the defendant had endangered transport, also based its claim on § 823 II BGB. The Court of Appeal regarded this as a modification of the claim which was inadmissible owing to irrelevance (§ 264 ZPO). It can be left undecided whether the arguments of the Court of Appeal on this question merit approval, for even from that legal standpoint contrary to the view of the applicant, a claim by the plaintiff for the reimbursement of its expenditure is not well founded.

The plaintiff does not allege that as a result of the defendant's conduct it suffered damage to its locomotive or any other direct damage to itself. It relies only on the damage which is suffered because it was called upon to pay under the Reichshaftpflichtgesetz. A claim for compensation of that damage cannot be derived from § 823 II BGB in combination with §§ 315, 316 StGB. It is true that those criminal law provisions are protective statutes, which also serve to protect the plaintiff. Moreover, the mere circumstances that the sum which the plaintiff claims involves indirect damage does not, contrary to the view of the respondent, lead to a rejection of the claim, since, according to a general principle of civil law, a person who has suffered direct damage can claim compensation not only in respect of any direct but also of any indirect damage which he suffered. It is however always a presupposition that the damage falls within the scope of the interests protected by the protective statute, i.e. that it arose from the invasion of a legal interest for the protection of which the legal rule was enacted [references]. In the case for decision the danger which the protective statute is intended to avert did not in fact arise. The provisions on endangering the operation of a railway (§§ 315, 316 StGB) protect the health and property of railway entrepreneurs and the other persons directly affected by railway traffic, but not their general economic interests [references]. The damage that the plaintiff suffered through the claim for compensation on the basis of the Reichshaftpflichtgesetz affects only its general economic interests and therefore a sphere of interests which is not protected here. Hence § 823 II BGB, in combination with §§ 315, 316 StGB, also fails to provide a legal basis for the claim made in the plaintiff's action.

Case 124

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 27 MAY 1975

NJW 1975, 1886 = VERSR 1975, 945

The plaintiff owned a chicken-farm. The hens were housed in a building where they were arranged in so-called batteries. The first defendant supplied the plaintiff with concentrated chicken feed. On 8 September 1969 the second defendant, employed by the first defendant, delivered ten tons of chicken feed loaded on a lorry which was equipped with two tanks in which the feed was contained. The chicken feed was to be deposited in a silo attached to the building. The walls of the silo consisted of chipboard sheets of a thickness of 20 millimetres. On the outside of the silo, a feed-pipe leading to within 70 centimetres below the roof turned vertically into the silo and terminated at a distance of 1.25 millimetres from the opposite chipboard wall. The second defendant connected the tanks of the lorry with the feed-pipe by means of a hose-pipe. Using a compressor attached to the lorry, he blew the feed into the feed-pipe in order to deposit the feed in the silo. The force of the pressure broke the chipboard sheets of the opposite wall and the escaping feed was deposited on the adjacent roof of the building which collapsed under the weight. Many laying hens were killed or had to be destroyed. The plaintiff claimed damages in respect of the damage to the roof and to his livestock.

The Court of First Instance allowed the claim and the Court of Appeal of Aldenburg rejected an appeal by the defendant. Upon a second appeal the judgment below was quashed and the case referred back for the following

Reasons

I. The Court of Appeal left it open as to whether the first defendant is liable in contract, as the Court of First Instance has held. Instead it found that the first defendant was liable under § 7 I of the Road Traffic Act because an object belonging to the plaintiff had been damaged "in the course of operating the defendant's motor vehicle". According to the Court of Appeal, the necessary connection existed in space and time between a certain operational use or installation and the accident, at any rate if, as in the present case, a load was discharged from a vehicle with the aid of a motor, thereby causing an accident.

II. These conclusions cannot be maintained in face of the objections raised by the appellant. It is impossible to accept the view of the Court of Appeal that the accident occurred “in the course of operating a motor vehicle” in the meaning of § 7 I of the Road Traffic Act.

1. According to the so-called engine-orientated view, which was enlarged by the traffic-orientated view first put forward by the Reichsgericht [reference] and subsequently adopted and developed by the Bundesgerichtshof [reference] in respect of certain cases, a motor vehicle is “in operation” if its motor has been started and moves the vehicle or one of its operational parts. To that extent, as the Court of Appeal states correctly, it makes no difference whether during the operational activity the motor vehicle is located on a public highway or (as here) on private land (building site [reference]; works compound [reference]).

As a result of technical developments, the motor power of motor vehicles is being used not only to transport persons and goods, but also for other works processes which can hardly be regarded as merely loading or unloading goods for transport. Thus many specialised vehicles exist today which are constructed for special tasks but serve ordinary purposes at the same time. The heavy goods lorry of the defendant was also such a specialised vehicle, since it was fitted with special containers for transporting feed and was provided, inter alia, with a mechanical installation for discharging it. If an accident occurs in the course of employing operational installations of such special vehicles which do not serve directly the purpose of transport, it is not obvious that such an accident has occurred “in the course of operating a motor vehicle” in the meaning of § 7 of the Road Traffic Act. In the present case, this cannot be said to have happened, contrary to the view of the Court of Appeal.

(a) The Court of Appeal, too, states that the question is whether the accident is still to be regarded as arising from the operation of the motor vehicle. According to the Court of Appeal the test is whether the accident was “closely connected in space and time with an operational process” of the heavy goods vehicle (for this notion see the decisions of this Division [reference]). This formula indicates, in the first place, that a link of adequate causality must exist between the operation of the motor vehicle and the actual damage. However, the meaning of this formula is not completely expressed thereby. To that extent it only defines a minimum requirement for a causal link to exist. In addition, the effect caused by the operation of the motor vehicle for which damages are to be paid must be covered by the meaning and the purpose of the rule creating liability, i.e. by the protective range of § 7 I of the Road Traffic Act [references]. It is insufficient for the Court of Appeal to argue that the process of discharge falls within the sphere of operation of the lorry because the compressor employed for the purpose of discharging the load was impelled by the motor of the lorry. This establishes only the causal link between the operation of the motor and the damage which, however, cannot be in doubt. On the other hand, contrary to the opinion of the Court of Appeal, the occurrence is not to be attributed to the operation of the lorry, against the danger of which § 7 I of the Road Traffic Act is to provide protection, as the appellant correctly points out.

(aa) It is true that in accordance with the recent practice of the Courts of Appeal the discharge of a vehicle with the assistance of its motor constitutes a use of an operative installation corresponding to the purpose of the vehicle and therefore takes place “in the course of its operation” [references—all concerning either the loading or discharging of oil by a tanker lorry]. These decisions are frequently cited in the literature, albeit without a more detailed discussion of possible objections against them [references]. This Division has expressly left the question open in the cases which have come before it hitherto on appeal from the Courts of Appeal of Nürnberg and Hamm as to whether an accident caused on the occasion of oil being loaded or discharged by a road-tanker can be also attributed to the operation of the latter in the meaning of the Road Traffic Act [references]. The decision of this Division dated 25 April 1956 [reference] also does not show any other attitude in principle. It is true that this Division held that a “close connection in space and time with the operational process” existed in the case where a motor lorry dropped its load on a rubbish dump with the help of its engine power and thereby caused an accident. However, in that case, too, this Division observed that no need arose to decide whether such a connection “always” exists when damage is caused on discharging a motor lorry.

(bb) Whether, as in the present case, an accident caused in the course of the unloading of a specialised motor vehicle with the assistance of its engine is still to be attributed to the operation of a vehicle in the meaning of the Road Traffic Act depends upon the answer to the question against what perils § 7 of the Road Traffic Act is to provide protection and whether the user of this “operative installation” which led to the accident still falls within this range of protection. Naturally only such perils are involved which emanate from the motor vehicle in its capacity of an engine serving transport (see §§ 1, 2 of the Road Traffic Act). As soon as a connection no longer exists with the purpose of the motor vehicle as a means of transport in traffic, and the motor vehicle is only used as a means of performing work, the danger emanating specifically from a motor vehicle used for its natural purpose has ceased to exist. (See also the Reichsgericht [reference omitted], concentrating on the nature of a motor vehicle as a means of transport.) Since our legal system does not know a general principle of strict liability for operating engines supplying power at work, § 7 of the Road Traffic Act cannot be applied to accidents which occur in consequence of technical processes which cannot any longer be reasonably connected with the character of the engine employed as part of a motor vehicle. As this Division has already stated in its decision of 10 January 1961 [references] it is not decisive that the engine of the motor vehicle has been started up if this is done independently of an operational process characteristic of a motor vehicle for purposes other than moving it [reference]. In the case referred to, the engine of a moped served only to operate its lights which were required as a source of illumination for purposes other than to drive the moped (but see critically Boehmer [reference]).

In what circumstances the power of the engine and the operational installations of the vehicle driven by it have lost their connection with the latter’s function as a means of transport and with road traffic, with the result that from the point of view of legal liability only the function of the engines as a source of power is in issue, can only be determined in the individual case, having regard to all the circumstances. If, as in the present case, the engine is used for purposes of unloading, it will be decisive whether the damage was caused by the special construction of the vehicle and the operational installations connected therewith (as for instance in the case of discharging a load with the help of a tipping-device; see the decision of this Division of 25 April 1956 [reference] or in the case of a towing vehicle equipped with a crane or of a vehicle for transporting long loads which is provided with a grip [reference]) or whether its function as a source of working power was predominant, as for instance in the case of a mobile building-crane.

If the present case is examined in accordance with these principles it follows that it is not to be regarded as part of the operation of a motor vehicle if feed is blown into a silo with the engine of the motor vehicle running the compressor. The occurrence of damage is entirely independent, both technically and legally, of the specific peril emanating from a motor vehicle, be it even a specialised vehicle. Instead, the only peril is that flowing from the engine providing power for work, which is supplied by the engine of the motor vehicle. The damage thus caused does not come within the range of protection provided by § 7 of the Road Traffic Act.

(b) The traffic-orientated approach to the term “operation” in § 7 of the Road Traffic Act does not lead to any different conclusion. It was developed for the protection of those involved in traffic in order to cover the after-effects of the perils created by a motor vehicle present in the area of public traffic, even if the motor vehicle which had been put “in operation” had come to a standstill [reference]. A dangerous situation of this kind has not occurred in the present case. The motor vehicle was standing on private land belonging to the plaintiff and did not represent an obstacle for other users of the road in the place where it stood.

Case 125

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 6 JUNE 1989

BGHZ 107, 359 = NJW 1989, 2616 = JZ 1989, 1069

Facts

The plaintiff, who suffered from high blood pressure, was involved in a road accident around midnight on 28 April 1984 while driving his wife’s car. His car collided with another vehicle driven by M. The liability insurer for this car was the defendant. Soon after the accident had occurred and the police had taken the details of the accident, the plaintiff suffered a stroke. Since then, he has been unable to work and draws disablement benefit. Between the parties it is not disputed that the defendant must compensate the plaintiff for all the damages of the accident. On the basis of these facts, the plaintiff claimed from the defendant compensation for his loss of earnings, a declaration of the defendant’s continuing responsibility for the loss since the claim was brought, and damages for pain and suffering; in particular the plaintiff made the following allegations: the stroke, which occurred as a result of the rupture of a blood vessel and a resulting brain haemorrhage, was caused by the excitement brought on by the conduct of M and his three passengers after the accident and the measures taken by the police officer who was at the place of the accident in order to test whether the plaintiff was driving under the influence of alcohol. After the accident, M and his passengers approached the plaintiff in a threatening manner. One of the passengers ran at him and shouted, incorrectly, that he was driving too fast. Another of the persons accompanying M drove his vehicle to the side of the road, so that he feared that it would no longer be possible for the facts of the accident to be clarified. All four occupants of M’s vehicle falsely alleged to the police that he was under the influence of alcohol; that caused the police officer to breathalyse him, although the results of the test were negative. As a consequence of this test and the subsequent conduct of M and his fellow passengers, the shock which he had suffered as a result of the accident grew more intense. When he later drove on, he experienced symptoms of paralysis which were the symptoms of his stroke.

The plaintiff's claim was unsuccessful in both lower courts, and his application to the BGH was rejected.

For the following

Reasons

I. [According to the OLG] . . . the claim as a whole had no legal basis. A direct claim against the defendant on the basis of § 3 Nr. 1 PflVG [Pflichtversicherungsgesetz = Act Concerning Compulsory Insurance] failed because the loss claimed by the plaintiff was not suffered as a consequence of the operation of the vehicle insured by the defendant (§ 10 I AKB [Allgemeine Bedingungen für die Kraftverkehrsversicherung = General Conditions for Motor Vehicle Insurance]). Furthermore, M himself was not liable to the plaintiff. There was no liability under §§ 7 and 18 StVG [Strassenverkehrsgesetz = Road Traffic Act] because the invasion of his health alleged by the plaintiff did not occur in the context of the use of the vehicle by M. There was no liability under § 823 I BGB because there was no basis for holding that M was at fault. A claim for compensation based on § 823 II BGB failed because even if there were a breach of a protective law (§§ 164 and 185 et seq. StGB = Criminal Code), a reasonable bystander would not have expected the occurrence of a stroke as a consequence of the damage inflicted upon the plaintiff.

II. The plaintiff's appeal fails. The judgment of the OLG is correct in its result, even if not in its reasoning (§ 563 ZPO).

The claim has no basis in law. The prerequisite for a claim against the defendant on the basis of § 3 Nr. 1 PflVG is that the plaintiff has claims for compensation in respect of the alleged loss against M or the keeper of the vehicle driven by M (§§ 823 et seq. BGB and §§ 7 and 18 StVG) and that the loss is caused in the context of the operation of the motor vehicle insured by the defendant (§ 1 of the PflVG; § 10 I AKB). That is not, however, the case here.

1. A claim for compensation against M based on tort (§§ 823 et seq. BGB), which is the only way a claim for damages for pain and suffering could be justified (§ 847 BGB), has no basis in law.

(a) Loss of earnings and non-pecuniary loss on the part of the plaintiff should not be recoverable from M under § 823 I BGB simply because M caused damage to the plaintiff's property as a consequence of the crash caused by his fault and was consequently guilty of an interference in the ownership rights of the plaintiff and because the impairments claimed by the plaintiff could be seen as consequential loss. First, the property damage caused by M to the car driven by the plaintiff was suffered not by the plaintiff, but by his wife as the owner of the vehicle. Furthermore, there is no evidence from the pleadings that the state of excitement which the plaintiff believes led to his stroke was in any way caused by his being upset by the damage to the vehicle [emphasis added].

(b) The plaintiff's request for damages is furthermore not justified in so far as it is based on an argument that there was an invasion of the plaintiff's health actionable under § 823 I BGB.

(aa) Following the plaintiff's arguments, and rejecting the view of the OLG, it must be concluded that M did make a contribution to the injury to the plaintiff's health in so far as he acted unlawfully and negligently by contravening the priority rules (§ 8 StVO = Strassenverkehrsordnung) and consequently causing the crash. For by causing the accident he led the plaintiff to become upset and thus created one precondition which, in conjunction with the consequent conduct of M and his passengers, and the attendance at the accident by the police, caused the plaintiff to suffer a critical increase in blood pressure in his brain and led to the rupture of the blood vessel and the consequential brain haemorrhage when the plaintiff later drove away from the accident [references omitted]. It is not relevant to his responsibility in tort that M did not cause the impairment of the plaintiff's health through a physical invasion of his bodily integrity; an invasion of the plaintiff's health can occur, as here, through a psychological impact upon the victim [references omitted].

Contrary to the view of the OLG, it is equally irrelevant to the tortious responsibility of M that the impairment to the plaintiff's health may only have occurred because, unbeknown to M, the plaintiff was suffering from high blood pressure. For it is established case law that a person who causes loss must also take responsibility for those consequences of his actions which are the result of the fact that the victim is already suffering from some form of bodily injury or some other weakness in his constitution [references omitted]. A tortfeasor must always reckon with the possibility that a person affected by his breach of the priority rules may be a person suffering from high blood pressure. It is also not wholly unforeseeable that as a consequence of the upset caused by the accident that such a person may suffer impairment to his health. It is not necessary to foresee the precise circumstances in which this might occur or how the risk might result in the occurrence of damage [references omitted].

(bb) The linkage of the invasion of health suffered by the plaintiff and the infringement of the priority rules by M for the purposes of liability is, however, precluded by the fact that this damage in fact only occurred as a result of the conduct of M and his passengers after the accident and the events which occurred when the police attended the scene of the accident. For the traffic rule contained in § 8 StVO breached by M is not intended to provide protection against the possibility that an accident caused by a failure to observe this provision leads to the plaintiff suffering a stroke in the manner alleged by the plaintiff as a consequence of pressures experienced by the victim solely as a result of the upset occurring in the context of the aftermath of the accident.

It is also established case law that in the context of damages claims which are based on § 823 BGB it should be examined whether the event in respect of which compensation is claimed falls within the protective scope of the norm, and thus whether the risks materialised through the event which breached the rule of conduct was intended to protect against [references omitted]. This condition is not satisfied here. For the provision contained in § 8 StVO breached by M is intended, according to the basic principle set out in § 1 II StVO, to protect above all the bodily integrity of other persons; its protective scope extends, however, as is apparent from § 1 I StVO, to cover only the prevention of the risks of accidents and the prevention of injuries to health associated with primary threat to life and health. These can include those injuries which occur in the aftermath of the accident, for example in the context of salvage work or while making the accident report, which themselves constitute the realisation of one of the risks of road traffic at the scene of the accident. It is the view of this court that this argument cannot extend to cover psychological pressures associated with disagreements regarding the clarification of how the accident occurred or regarding the question of fault, such as those which were primarily responsible for the plaintiff's stroke, leaving aside the impairment of his condition caused by the accident itself. In this case the plaintiff, himself, admitted that the breach of the priority rules by M engendered in him merely a state of general excitement which, in itself, did not represent an invasion of his health [references omitted]. The fact that this state of excitement became more intense as a consequence of the subsequent conduct of M and his passengers before and during the presence of the police, and the fact that this led to the plaintiff suffering a brain haemorrhage leading to a stroke, fall beyond the protective scope of § 8 StVO. It is not the task of this provision of road traffic law to protect the person who had priority on the highway against the psychological and physiological impairment which he might suffer as a consequence of a criminal investigation or criminal proceedings being mounted against him, or against his own need to take action in civil or criminal proceedings to recover his loss. Nor is this provision aimed at providing protection against an invasion of the plaintiff's health suffered as a consequence of a state of excitement regarding the police attendance at the accident, whether this is caused by measures taken by the police, or by statements made by the tortfeasor or third parties which make it more difficult to clarify the issue of responsibility. Protection against detriment stemming from errors or attempts to manipulate the facts when the circumstances of the accident are being clarified is subject to separate rules; it is not included within the scope of the rule of conduct contained in § 8 StVO which is intended to ensure the safety of traffic on the roads.

Having regard to the assessment which has been made, it must be concluded that as a matter of the ascription of responsibility, the stroke suffered by the plaintiff was linked to the conduct of M and his passengers after the accident. However, even from this perspective the conduct of M cannot give the plaintiff an action for damages under § 823 I BGB. For the fact that, as the plaintiff alleges, M and his fellow passengers might have given an incorrect description of the accident to the police officer charged with making a report after the crash or might have "invented" allegations about the plaintiff having driven too fast or being under the influence of alcohol does not, of itself, render their conduct unlawful. Such an attempt by those using the highway to shift the blame for an accident onto the other side does not in itself violate, in the absence of other circumstances, the standard of conduct which is to be expected of every person who uses the roads but who has no claim for compensation, after an accident. The same applies to the unsubstantiated allegation made by the plaintiff (though only before the OLG) that the passengers in the other vehicle came towards him "in a threatening manner" [references omitted].

Finally, it is not possible to conclude that the conduct of M after the accident was unlawful simply because the OLG, when it was examining the plaintiff's claims which it ultimately rejected, reached the conclusion under § 823 II BGB that M and his passengers had breached the protective laws contained in §§ 164 and 185 et seq. StGB as a result of their conduct following the accident. Quite apart from the fact that the defendant, as the insurer, could only be liable for the conduct of M and not for that of his fellow passengers (cf. § 10 I d AKB), the findings of the OLG should be viewed as findings of law, not as findings of fact, that is as a presumption of the truth of the plaintiff's allegations. For the facts as pleaded by the plaintiff reveal no evidence of a breach of the provisions of the criminal law by M.

2. As a result, the OLG was correct to deny, on the basis of § 3 Nr. 1 PflVG, a claim for compensation by the plaintiff leading to the liability of the defendant under §§ 7 I and 18 I StVG. Such a claim, which in accordance with § 11 StVG can in any case only extend to compensation for pecuniary loss, presupposes that the invasion of the plaintiff's health occurred in the context of the operation of the vehicle driven by M and that the loss claimed by the plaintiff is attributable to the risks associated with the operation of this vehicle. The OLG was wrong to conclude that the first condition was not present; the second requirement is not, however, fulfilled.

(a) Damage occurs "in the context of the operation" of a motor vehicle where the risk which emanates from the vehicle as such has had an impact upon how the damage actually happened, and thus where the occurrence of damage has in this way been (partially) shaped by the motor vehicle. Evaluated from this perspective, the case law of this court leads to the conclusion that the condition of liability that the damage must occur "in the context of the operation" of a motor vehicle must in principle be construed extensively in accordance with the broad protective scope of § 7 I StVG [references omitted].

(b) In this case, however, as was stated above in the context of liability under § 823 BGB, the accident caused by M's operating the vehicle in breach of the road traffic rules did contribute to the stroke suffered by the plaintiff as a result of the impairment of the general condition of a victim such as the plaintiff who suffered from high blood pressure. However, as with liability in tort, the responsibility of M under §§ 7 and 18 StVG requires that the loss suffered should fall within the protective scope of the norms in question [references omitted]. Any attribution of this loss to the risk of the operation of the vehicle driven by M must, however, be denied on the same grounds as those which justified the refusal to link, as a matter of the law of tort, the loss with the wrongful breach by M of the provisions of § 8 StVO. For since liability under § 7 StVG represents, so to speak, the price for the fact that the use of a vehicle on the roads offers a permissible source of risk, then the responsibility of the keeper and the driver which is based on this provision must be limited to those losses which represent the realisation of precisely those risks which result as such from motor vehicles. It is not possible to establish the necessary internal link between the risks of operation of a motor vehicle and the loss in the form of the plaintiff's stroke and the damaging consequences of that stroke. In this context, rather, it is a separate sphere of risk which is involved also as regards the risk-based liability contained in the Road Traffic Act, and this sphere of risk must, according to the standards imposed for this form of liability, be attributed to the general risks of life.

Case 126

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 13 APRIL 1956

BGHZ 20, 259

In order to enter a private driveway, the defendant made a sharp left-hand turn from the right-hand side of the highway. The plaintiff came round a bend behind him on a 490 cc. motorcycle, and struck the defendant's vehicle near the left-hand kerb. The plaintiff was thrown on to the sidewalk and suffered serious injuries.

The Landgericht granted the plaintiff's claim for damages for pain and suffering, and held the defendant liable for all other damage as well. On the defendant's appeal, the Oberlandesgericht held that the claim for damages for pain and suffering should be allowed only as to two-thirds, and that the defendant was liable only for a like proportion of the other harm suffered by the plaintiff. The plaintiff sought to have the decision of the Landgericht reinstated and the defendant sought to have the claims dismissed. Both appeals were unsuccessful.

Reasons

It was alleged that the plaintiff could and should have foreseen the defendant's improper left turn in time to brake or swerve and so avoid the collision. The trial judge, however, held—unobjectionably in law—that this was not established. But an accident does not constitute an “unavoidable event” in the sense of § 7 II KrfzG (Motor Vehicle Act) (now StVG (Road Traffic Act)) just because the plaintiff is not proved to have been at fault in contributing to it. Supposing that the defendant, as is possible, had put out his direction indicator and was proceeding slowly, and that the plaintiff had been driving with abnormally scrupulous care, alertly and attentively focusing all his faculties on the situation (NJW 1954, 185 no. 1), then the plaintiff might, despite the unexpectedness of the defendant's manoeuvre, have avoided the damaging collision by braking or swerving, given that his own speed was perhaps only 20 m.p.h. If in this sense the accident could possibly have been avoided by the plaintiff, the danger attributable to his motorcycle is a factor which must be taken into account in any claim he may make (BGHZ 6, 319).

It is true that some writers have criticized the decisions of the Bundesgerichtshof (BGHZ 6, 319; VersR 1953, 337) to the effect that, except in the case of an unavoidable event, the claim of the injured custodian is subject to reduction by reason of any contribution made to the accident by the danger due to his vehicle (references omitted), but despite these criticisms this senate proposes to adhere to the established case-law. If someone else as well as the custodian of a car is liable to an injured third party and the question is how the loss should be borne as between the two of them, it is quite obvious that the custodian will have to bear part of his loss. The same must apply when the custodian of a vehicle which the legislature has stigmatised as dangerous, suffers damage while in the vehicle whose dangerous nature contributed to the accident, even if he himself was not at fault, or not provably so. Theoretically one might avoid splitting the loss in this way by drawing a distinction between the capacities of custodian and occupant, and attaching strict liability only to the capacity of custodian, but this would be unduly theoretical and quite unrealistic. The danger attributable to the custody of a motor vehicle exists equally if the custodian happens to be in his own car, as passenger or driver, and so in such a case also he must bear the consequences which flow from having it in his custody. It is irrelevant that § 8 StVG exempts him from liability to any other occupant. Berchthold is wrong to draw the conclusion that even a scrupulously careful custodian will always have to bear part of the loss he suffers (see also BGH VersR 5, 251, 253), since if the event is unavoidable, the dangerous nature of the vehicle has no part to play. If the danger does fall to be taken into account, the trial judge must in each case determine whether and to what extent the loss should be divided. Even then, as Gelhaar and Wussow have pointed out with reference to decisions of this senate, the custodian is not inevitably saddled with part of his loss. As against a tortfeasor whose conduct was gross or reckless, it might be right to ignore an insubstantial contributory danger. On the other hand (and this supports the view here put forward), it would not be right to require a person who has been only slightly negligent to bear the whole of the custodian's loss when the custodian's vehicle made a significant contribution to the harm.

The same must apply when a custodian-occupant brings a claim for damages for pain and suffering. It is true that in JW 1931, 3315, the Reichsgericht stated that the loss should not be divided unless the custodian would have been liable to any third party injured in the accident, and it refused to use § 17 KrfzG to curtail the claim for damages for pain and suffering brought by an injured custodian who was responsible for nothing other than the custody of a dangerous motor vehicle. On the other hand, in RGZ 149, 213, the Reichsgericht held that the part of the loss which an injured custodian must bear if he himself was in part responsible was not subject to the monetary limit laid down by § 12 KrfzG. To this extent, therefore, according to the Reichsgericht, different rules may apply on the same facts depending on whether the issue is one of liability to a third person or of the duty to bear part of one's own loss. It is certainly clear that the main reason the legislature set the monetary limit on the strict liability introduced by the KrfzG was to enable custodians of vehicles to insure themselves against liability without undue cost (see RGZ 149, 213, 215 and the reasons there given).

But the idea of so limiting the amount of a claim based on strict liability has no application when the question is whether the plaintiff should bear an appropriate part of his own harm. It would be irrational to say that the custodian need not bear any part of his loss when his claim is based on the BGB (loss of income, § 842; loss of services, § 845; damages for pain and suffering, § 847) but that his claim is reduced if it is based on the StVG when it is in any case limited in quantum (§§ 10–12 StVG). The result would be that a reduction would take place only in those very claims whose satisfaction the legislature thought particularly urgent, as the enactment of the KrfzG/StVG shows. The legislature cannot have intended this result to flow from the limitation on the amount of the defendant's liability. It is rather for the judge whenever the situation is appropriate for a division of the loss between the victim and the person who caused the injury, to apply § 17 I, 1 StVG, which is analogous to § 254 BGB, and decide whether the victim is to bear an equitable part of his own loss.

This conclusion is logically consistent with the decisions of the Bundesgerichtshof on the question of contribution between common debtors liable for the same harm under § 17 StVG (BGHZ 6, 319, 322). The relationship between common debtors and their respective contribution claims depends exclusively on the actual facts, especially the extent to which they respectively contributed to the harm, and not on the basis of their legal liability to the victim; the adjudication of contribution claims is entirely divorced from the legal basis of the individual debtor's liability, to the point where it is irrelevant whether the actual causes of the harm were a ground of liability to the victim (reference omitted). Now, since the same considerations apply, and the results should be the same, when one is weighing up the respective responsibility for harm as between several common debtors on the one hand (§ 17 StVG) and as between those causing and suffering harm on the other (§ 254 BGB), so in the latter case also one should take no account of the basis of liability, but only of the totality of the facts, especially the extent to which each contributed to the harm as a matter of causation (reference omitted). Just as one is to ignore the legal basis of liability in the individual case when it comes to dividing the loss (BGH VersR 5, 163), so one should ignore the question whether the harm is of such a kind that a third party could claim in respect of it. The only safe way to an equitable division of the loss is to have the judge make the custodian bear part of it by applying the standards of § 17 I, 1 StVG, as would be the result of applying § 17 StVG and § 254 BGB [reference omitted].

Accordingly, the Court of Appeal was right to hold that the plaintiff's claim for damages for pain and suffering was also affected by the danger contributed by his motor cycle.

*Case 127BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 16 JUNE 1959
BGHZ 30, 203 = NJW 1959, 1772

About 9 p.m. on 5 September 1952 the plaintiff was riding his moped out of town on V. St. He crossed the intersection with I. St., and was about to pass the E. gas station on his right when the defendant E. drove out of the gas station in his Opel Olympia 1937 and turned right into V. St. in front of him. In overtaking E.'s car, the plaintiff got between the tramlines in the middle of the highway. He overtook E.'s car but had not yet regained the right hand side of the road when he collided head-on with B.'s Mercedes 170S, 22 metres before the intersection with E. St. The plaintiff suffered serious injuries in the collision, and his left leg had to be amputated.

The plaintiff asserts that E. came out of the gas station right in front of him, so that he was forced to overtake. In doing so the plaintiff had to get between the sets of tramlines in the middle of the road, because E.'s left hand wheels were over the right hand tram lines by reason of cars parked on the right hand side of the road. The plaintiff took some time to overtake because E. accelerated as he was doing so, and he was therefore unable to regain the right hand side of the road in due time. The defendant B. had also crossed the tramlines while overtaking a car in front of him, and would have seen the plaintiff if he had been paying proper attention.

The plaintiff claims compensation from the defendants for one-half of the damage he suffered, and the defendants answer that the accident was entirely due to the plaintiff's fault.

The Landgericht dismissed the claim against E., and granted the claim against B. as to one-fifth of the total damage.

On appeal by the plaintiff and B., the Oberlandesgericht held that both defendants were liable under the Strassenverkehrsgesetz (StVG) for two-fifths of the total harm, and that the defendant B. was also liable under the Civil Code (BGB) for two-fifths of the amount claimed by the plaintiff.

The defendants' appeals were allowed in part, the Bundesgerichtshof holding that while each defendant was liable for one-fifth of the total damage, they were not together liable for more than one-third.

Reasons

The Court of Appeal was right to hold that the defendant E. was liable for one-fifth of the plaintiff's total damage, so E.'s appeal on this point must be dismissed. B.'s appeal equally fails in so far as it argues that he is not liable at all.

The Court of Appeal then added together the two liabilities for one-fifth each, and consequently held the defendants jointly liable for two-fifths of the total harm (four-fifths of the amount actually claimed by the plaintiff, for he claimed for only one-half of his harm). The defendants are right to object to this.

1. The Court of Appeal was right to start out by weighing the plaintiff's contributory fault against each of the defendants separately, and correctly applied § 254 BGB first as between the plaintiff and E., and then as between the plaintiff and B. This separate apportionment is necessary because the plaintiff has an independent claim for compensation against each defendant. Each defendant is responsible for providing an adequate cause of the harm, and has thereby met the conditions of statutory liability (§ 823 BGB, §§ 7, 18 StVG). Had the plaintiff sued only one of the defendants, he could claim only one-fifth of his total damage (= two-fifths of the sum actually claimed). The fact that he sued both defendants in one suit does not justify an apportionment under § 254 BGB on the basis that the responsibility of the two defendants should be treated as a unit and compared as such with that of the plaintiff.

Where several persons have caused harm, there is only one case where it is right to combine their spheres of responsibility and thus make each responsible for the contribution to the harm made by the others, and that is when the requirements of § 830 I, 1 BGB are met, namely that the various persons causing the harm caused it by means of “a wrongful act committed jointly”. There is no question of that here. Indeed, it may be that this provision is inapplicable on the mere ground that whereas E. was guilty of an unlawful act in the sense of § 823 BGB, B. was liable only on the basis of the strict liability in §§ 11, 18 StVG. Be that as it may, there was here no “act jointly committed” by the defendants. True though it is that together they produced the harmful result, this was through different independent individual acts, not through a common act. To several acts of negligence of this kind (fahrlässige Nebentäterschaft), § 830 I, 1 BGB is not to be applied [reference omitted]. If in RGZ 58, 357 the Reichsgericht indicated otherwise, this court cannot agree. When the harm has been caused by the concurrence of several individual acts, the fact that these acts may coincide closely in time and place does not justify an apportionment which burdens each debtor with the contributions of the others. Nor did the Reichsgericht itself hold that when several drivers had caused an accident by various independent acts of bad driving they were “joint actors” (Mittäter) in the sense of § 830 I, 1 BGB.

2. The Court of Appeal believed that § 840 BGB empowered them to add together the portions of the harm, namely one-fifth each, for which the defendants were responsible. In this they failed to see that since under § 840 I BGB the debtors’ obligations must coincide before there can be a relationship of common debt, the defendants could be common debtors only in respect of one-fifth of the plaintiff’s harm. In contrast with § 830 I BGB, there is here no legal basis for treating the contributions of the two defendants as a unit imputable to both and opposing it to the plaintiff’s quota of responsibility. Such a solution is irreconcilable with the recognised principles concerning the factors relevant to an apportionment under § 254 BGB. It would improperly extend the limits within which the law of tort allows the imputation to one person of another person’s fault. And it is inequitable because each of several defendants would bear the risk of the insolvency of the others, whereas the plaintiff would not be exposed to this risk at all, even though he was equally to blame, if not more so.

3. According to the decisions of the Reichsgericht and those of the Bundesgerichtshof hitherto (BGHZ 12, 213, 220; VersR 1957, 167), several tortfeasors whose liability as a result of the individual weighing process is equal in amount (as with the defendants here, one-fifth each) are liable for that amount as common debtors under § 840 BGB, and the plaintiff must bear the remainder of the loss himself. This is an unsatisfactory solution, because it gives the victim less than he should, if one views the accident as a whole, recover. The example given by Dunz in JZ 1955, 727 makes this quite clear. If ten people, all equally at fault, cause damage to an eleventh, the victim can claim the full amount of his loss from any of the ten. But if one of the ten who are equally careless is himself the victim, the result of the individual weighing is that each of those causing the harm is liable to the plaintiff for half of his harm. If we apply the rule of common debtors as the courts have done until now, the victim recovers only half of his harm altogether whereas, if all the debtors are solvent, he should get nine-tenths. On the other side, the effect of contribution proceedings would be that each person causing the harm would pay only one-eighteenth of it.

The main reason for the unsatisfactory nature of the law hitherto applied in such cases is that the rules of common debt have been applied too soon and too formalistically. Of course § 840 I BGB applies in the case of several as well as joint tortfeasors (see BGHZ 17, 214). This makes for no difficulty if the several tortfeasors are each liable for the whole harm, for then we have the situation which is characteristic of a common debt, namely that performance by any one debtor satisfies the whole of the creditor's interest. But this identity of the content of performance is lacking to some extent if the victim is himself guilty of contributory fault so that his damages claims against the several tortfeasors fall to be reduced under § 254 BGB. It is also lacking in the case before us today, for the one-fifth for which E. is liable as a result of the individual apportionment is neither economically nor legally identical with the one-fifth of the harm which B. has to pay. Payment of one of these two parts of the harm does not give the victim of the accident all he ought to get from E. and B. together. This is the second reason for the unsatisfactory nature of the law applied until now: the traditional comparison of the contribution of the victim with that of each individual causing the harm fails to give a global view of the accident and leads to a division of the loss which, on a global view, is unsatisfactory.

4. It might seem that one could equitably deal with the consequences of an accident by dividing the harm between the parties involved in the occurrence of the harm in relation to their respective contributions to it, and burdening each only with the appropriate portion of the harm he has caused. In support of such a view one might adduce the idea that all those involved in an accident, including the responsible victim (§ 254 BGB, §§ 7, 17, 18 StVG), form a kind of community, entailing a duty to resolve it so that no member has to bear more of the loss than is appropriate under § 17 StVG or § 254 BGB. Such a method brings the apportionment of the loss between the various persons who caused it (the inner or contribution relationship) into the suit brought by the victim against any or all of the persons causing the harm (external liability). There are several reasons which render this unacceptable.

There is no statutory basis for such apportionment proceedings. In admiralty law, indeed, there is such a rule (§ 736 HGB): if a collision between two or more vessels results from the fault of the crews involved, the owners of these ships are only liable in proportion to the gravity of their respective faults, at any rate so far as concerns damage to the ships themselves or to property on board, personal injury being dealt with otherwise. Here, several liability is introduced in lieu of joint liability, and the division between external liability and internal contribution which the law has maintained for good reason in other areas is abolished. But § 736 I HGB only applies in this particular area of admiralty law: it cannot be applied to the law of road traffic or to the general law of tort. Certainly nothing in § 17 StVG would justify abandoning the distinction between external liability and internal contribution in the case of a collision between motor-cars and making the drivers and custodians involved in the accident liable to the victim only for their several parts (see also BGHZ 15, 123, 135). Several liability such as is exceptionally provided for by § 736 I HGB would often be detrimental to the victim, for it would deprive him of the security and advantages offered to him by the principle of joint liability and by the separation of external liability and internal contribution. To take Dunz's example once again, if several liability existed, the plaintiff could recover only one-tenth of his harm from each person causing it; yet each of them had provided an adequate cause for the harm and was, in relation to the plaintiff, as much to blame for it as the plaintiff himself, so it would seem right to give him a claim for half his harm against each individual causing it. Finally, several liability would greatly complicate the trial of many tort cases. Very frequently, the victim does not sue all those liable for the harm resulting from an accident; to minimise the risk, he often sues only the person whose liability can most easily be established. Now if the principle of several liability applied, one could only decide how much the defendant must pay by ascertaining the extent to which all the other persons responsible for the accident were to blame and contributed to it as a matter of causation. Thus in every traffic accident case, one would have to ask whether anyone not in court might be liable for the harm, though any such determination would lack the force of res judicata against such a person. Wide-ranging enquiries would often be necessary although the actual issue was quite simple. To complicate matters like this would conflict with the policy of the Code, especially § 421 BGB, to assist the victim, even when he, too, is at fault, for it is in the victim's interests to limit the issues in trial and to make a quick decision possible.

For all these reasons the principle of several liability does not provide a solution.

5. Solutions are suggested by Dunz (JZ 1955, 727 and 1957, 371) and Engelhardt (JZ 1957, 369) but as Dunz himself admits in his second Article, they are not ideal.

6. In order to achieve a satisfactory result one must somehow harmonise the principle of common debt (joint liability) with the principle of apportionment of § 254 BGB (§ 17 StVG) and combine the individual apportionment with a global apportionment achieved by looking at the accident as a whole. An example may make this clear. Suppose that A is injured in an accident due to his own carelessness and the careless driving of B and C. If the contribution of all three parties is equal, and the damage suffered by A amounts to DM 3,000, the individual apportionment will be that A's contribution to the accident is equal to that of B (1:1). A may therefore claim DM 1,500 from B. The same applies as between A and C. Now if A claims damages from B and C together, one must follow this individual apportionment by taking a global view of the accident, and asking how much each of them contributed to it. Since from this point of view A, B and C are each responsible for one-third, A should have to bear only one-third of his harm (DM 1,000) and should be able to claim a total of two-thirds (DM 2,000) from the others. The results of these two processes of apportionment (the individual and the global) leads to the conclusion that: "B and C together must pay A total of DM 2,000, but neither of them need pay more than DM 1,500", or, to put it another way: "A may claim DM 1,500 from B, and he may claim DM 1,500 from C, but he may not claim more than DM 2,000 in all." The question of contribution between B and C remains a matter of their relationship inter se. If B has paid A the DM 1,500 he owes him, then C owes B DM 500 as contribution under § 17 StVG. C remains liable to A, but only for DM 500, since A has already received DM 1,500 from B.

While maintaining the legal structure of joint liability, this solution accommodates it to the particularities of the law of tort liability arising from the principle of apportionment of § 254 BGB and related provisions, and the solution is a just one in that all those involved in an accident bear the loss in a measure which reflects their responsibility for it. By linking individual and global apportionment, it avoids the disadvantages to which the victim has hitherto been exposed when claiming damages from several defendants (hitherto A has obtained judgment for DM 1,500 against B and C as common debtors, and had to bear half his loss himself). On the other hand, the individual apportionment ensures that no person causing the harm pays more to the victim than is fair in view of their relationship inter se (B pays A here DM 1,500, and so does C). So far as these debts overlap, the victim has the security and other advantages which the principle of joint liability is designed to give him (§§ 840, 421 BGB).

The step of making the global apportionment and ascertaining the respective quotas of harm is naturally only to be taken when the victim sues several persons at the same time, or if there are successive suits.

7. We can now apply these principles to the case in hand, taking the individual apportionments made by the Court of Appeal as correct in law. Here as between plaintiff and E. the total harm must be divided in the proportion 4:1, and likewise, under the StVG, in the same proportion of 4:1 as between the plaintiff and B. Taking the global view next, as we must, the harm must be divided between the three parties involved so that the proportion of the harm borne by the two defendants remains the same and that on the other hand the proportion of four to one is maintained both in the relationship between the plaintiff and E., and in the relationship between the plaintiff and B. It follows that the global apportionment must be in the ratio 4:1:1. This means that the plaintiff is responsible for four-sixths (= two-thirds) and the defendants are each responsible for one-sixth. In the end result, the plaintiff will have to bear two-thirds of the total loss, and the defendants must make good one-third, though each defendant is liable only for one-fifth of the harm and B. is liable only under the StVG. The plaintiff's claim being limited to half of his total harm, the end result is that his claim succeeds against E. for two-fifths and against B. for two-fifths under the StVG, subject to this, that the total sum he may recover from both is not to exceed two-thirds of the sum he has claimed.

Notes to the Road Traffic Act

1. Traffic accidents represent a major area of accident compensation; arguably, they have also presented traditional tort law with its major challenge. The result was inevitable: revealing empirical studies, a vast literature, and numerous proposals for reform. Comparing the German law with other systems of compensation (whether in existence or merely proposed) makes it look both pioneering and in need of further reform. But change is hard to achieve and the role of a reformer is rarely a happy one. In some countries such as the USA no-fault statutory schemes have been challenged on constitutional grounds. See, for example, Kluger v. White 281 So. 2d 1 (Fla. 1973); Lasky v. State Farm Insurance Co. 296 So. 2d 9 (Fla. 1974). In other countries, like France for example, proposals for reform have met with strenuous if not at times undignified reactions on the part of various specialised pressure groups (insurers, practising lawyers).

2. Any comparative summary of such a topic is bound to be incomplete if not misleading. The decision was thus taken to depart from the pattern adopted throughout this book. Instead of comparing German law with Common law, the reader is invited to look at an imaginative French proposal and then compare it with German law and his own law.

3. The French proposal can be best understood by looking at the French legal background and discovering its own deficiencies. Good brief accounts of this can be found in von Mehren and Gordley's The Civil Law System, chapter 9, (2nd ed. 1979), and Lawson and Markesinis, Tortious Liability for Unintentional Harm in the Common Law and the Civil Law, chapter 3. Professor Tunc—the author of the proposed French Bill—has also provided more detailed accounts in 31 Am. J. Comp. Law 489 (1983) and in 16 Rev. Jur. Uni. Interam. Puerto Rico 125 (1981). André Tunc is also responsible for a masterly comparative account of the subject in vol. XI, chapter 14 of the International Encyclopedia of Comparative Law. The literature in French on the Tunc proposals is enormous. One of the most recent and interesting collections of essays on the proposed Bill have been published under the editorship of Tunc under the title Pour une loi sur les accidents de la circulation (1981). The reader is invited to compare Tunc's proposals (Addendum 1) with (a) the Desmares decision and (b) the 1985 Act (Addendum 2). The difficulties caused by some of the Act's terms (particularly the words faute inexcusable) have given rise to much case-law reviewed by Margeat, Landel, Thiry, and Besson, Accidents de la circulation: Loi du 5 juillet 1985—Bilan et perspectives, published in 1988 by the Gazette du Palais.

Addendum 1

A BILL CONCERNING THE COMPENSATION OF VICTIMS OF ROAD TRAFFIC ACCIDENTS, PROPOSED BY ANDRÉ TUNC

Part I. Obligation to insure

Article 1

Every owner or possessor of a motorised vehicle must, before putting it into "circulation", take out an insurance policy covering, according to the provisions of the present law and despite all contrary clauses, the damages that may result from a road traffic accident in which the said vehicle is involved.

For the purposes of the present law, the word "vehicle" denotes a motorised land vehicle, its trailer, or semi-trailer and their load; any vehicle not immobilised in a private garage is considered to be in circulation.

For the purposes of the present law, public bodies exempted from the obligation to insure their vehicles, will assume with regard to their vehicles the rights and obligations of an insurance company.

Part II. Corporeal damage

Article 2

Every victim of personal injury, resulting from a road traffic accident in which a vehicle has participated, has the right to be compensated in accordance with the provisions of Articles 3–12, below.

Article 3

The victim has a right to be reimbursed for all expenses reasonably incurred as a result of the injury, whether for care, rehabilitation, aid, special equipment for or adaptation of the home, travelling expenses for members of the family, repair or replacement of clothes, or items worn at the time of the accident and damaged as a result of the latter.

Article 4

The victim has the right to be compensated for loss of salary or professional earnings resulting from a temporary disablement.

Article 5

If the victim is permanently disabled, he has the right:

(a) to be compensated for the loss of salary or professional earnings which would arise from the normal course of events concerning a person in the same position as himself;

(b) to compensation for purely physiological harm in accordance with a table taking into account the degree of his disablement and his age—this table, and also the medical scale used to calculate the degree of his disablement, to be established by Decree.

Article 6

Loss of salary or professional earnings in the sense of Articles 4 and 5, above, should be taken to mean only the actual loss not compensated by employers' contributions, social security, or any other organisation for social welfare.

Article 7

Compensation will only be paid for loss of salary and professional earnings not exceeding x times the index-linked minimum wage.

Article 8

When the permanent disability of the victim entails the loss of salary or professional earnings of at least 30 per cent, compensation of this loss will take the form of an index-linked annuity in accordance with the provisions of the law of 27 December 1974, and will be reviewed as the victim's physical condition develops.

This annuity will be liable to be reduced should the beneficiary refuse without valid reason a measure of examination, observation, treatment, or adjustment reasonably suggested by the insurance company.

It will not be subject to attachment any more than would have been the salary or professional earnings it is meant to replace.

Article 9

When the victim dies as a result of the accident, his heirs and next of kin are entitled to be reimbursed for expenses which they must reasonably have incurred as a result of the accident. The persons who paid the funeral expenses are entitled to be reimbursed.

Article 10

The persons who as the result of the victim's death are deprived of (financial) assistance which they were receiving or could reasonably have expected to receive from him are entitled to compensation within the limits provided by Article 7 of the present law. This compensation will take the form of an index-linked annuity in accordance with the provisions of the law of 27 December 1974.

Article 11

The obligation to pay the compensation envisaged in Articles 3–10 of the present law falls upon:

- (a) the insurer of the vehicle in which the killed or injured victim was being transported or,
- (b) if the victim was not being transported [in a vehicle], the insurer of the vehicle which participated in the accident.

When more than one vehicle has participated in the accident, each insurer will be obliged to compensate the victim (to the full extent), the cost of the damages to be divided either in equal parts or in proportions to be agreed amongst them.

Article 12

When a stolen vehicle has participated in an accident, the thief and the handler of the stolen car forfeit all rights to compensation under the present law.

Part III. Material damageArticle 13

Damage suffered by colliding vehicles is compensated in accordance with percentages determined by types of circumstance fixed by Decree. The same Decree will specify the elements of compensable loss.

Damage occasioned to goods carried in or on vehicles will only be compensated in cases of collision with or transport by professional carriers and then only within the limits laid down by Decree, subject to any more extensive compensation envisaged by the contract of insurance.

All other material damage caused by a vehicle (to a furnished building) must be compensated.

Part IV. Miscellaneous provisionsArticle 14

The rights provided for by the law exclude all other rights of compensation resulting from a road traffic accident with the exception of the following:

- (1) the victim has a right to seek further compensation in accordance with the ordinary rules of civil liability against the manufacturer, seller, or repairer of the vehicle;
- (2) the insurer, obliged to pay compensation under the provisions of this law, is entitled to be subrogated against:
 - (a) any person who intentionally caused a type of damage covered by this law;
 - (b) the manufacturer, seller or repairer of the vehicle, responsible under the ordinary rules of civil liability;
 - (c) the highway authorities under the ordinary rules of civil liability. These subrogation rights will be for lump sums even where the compensation is to be paid in the form of an annuity.

Article 15

Whenever a person is, because of his involvement in an accident, condemned to imprisonment of . . . [a certain period] the criminal court can order as an additional penalty the payment of a sum not exceeding 50,000 fr. to be made to the Fonds de Garantie.

Article 16

The courts cannot be seized of a dispute arising from the application of this law until it has been submitted to a Commission for Reconciliation, the membership and functions of which will be decided by Decree.

Article 17

The actions of personal injury and property damage are statute-barred in three months and one year respectively from the moment the victim becomes aware of the damage.

Article 18

The premium to be paid by the insured will be adjusted every twelve months depending on the number of accidents in which the vehicle has participated. A Decree will regulate such details as no-claims bonuses and upward adjustments of premiums.

Addendum 2

Law no. 85-677 of 5 July 1985

Aiming at the improvement of the position of victims of traffic accidents and the acceleration of the compensation process. (JO of 6 July 1985, 7584.)

Chapter 1. Compensation of traffic accident victimsArticle 1

The provisions of the present chapter apply to victims of traffic accidents, whether transported by virtue of contract or not, involving (impliqué) a land motorised vehicle as well as trailers and half-trailers with the exception of trains and trams running on fixed rails.

Section 1. Provisions relating to compensationArticle 2

The driver or guardian of a vehicle mentioned in Article 1 above cannot plead against victims, including drivers, [the defence] of force majeure or act of a third party.

Article 3

Victims, excluding the drivers of motorised land vehicles, are compensated for damage resulting from injuries to their person without it being possible to invoke against them their own fault with the exception of their inexcusable fault [negligence] in so far as it was the exclusive cause of the accident.

The victims designated in the preceding sub-paragraph, whenever they are below the age of sixteen or over that of seventy, or whenever, irrespective of their age, they have at the time of the accident been recognised as suffering from a permanent incapacity or invalidity of at least 80 per cent, will in all cases be compensated for damages suffered as a result of personal injuries.

However, in the cases envisaged in the preceding sub-paragraphs, the victim will not be compensated by the tortfeasor for harm resulting to his person when he voluntarily sought the damage that he suffered.

Article 4

The fault committed by the driver of a motorised land vehicle has the effect of limiting or excluding the compensation of the damages that he has suffered.

Article 5

The victim's [contributory] fault results in the exclusion or limitation of his compensation for damage suffered by his property. However, compensation for supplies and equipment provided on medical prescription is made in accordance with the rules applicable to compensation for personal injury.

Wherever the driver of the motorized land vehicle is not its owner, the fault of such driver can be opposed against the owner for compensation of damages caused to his vehicle. In such cases the owner has a right to sue the driver.

Article 6

The loss suffered by a third party as a result of the damage caused to the direct victim of the traffic accident is made good by taking into account the limitations or exclusions applicable to the compensation of such damage.

Section 2. Provisions relating to insurance and fonds de garantie Articles 7–11 contain amendments and conditions to the Code of Insurance.

Section 3. Concerning the offer to pay compensationArticle 12

The insurer who guarantees the civil liability resulting from a motorised land vehicle is bound, within a maximum period of eight months from the date of the accident, to make an offer of compensation to the injured victim. In the event of death of the victim, the offer is made to his heirs and, where appropriate, the spouse.

The offer must also be made to the other victim within a period of eight months reckoning from the date of the request for compensation.

The offer includes all compensatable headings of damage including the elements relating to property damage whenever they have not been the object of preliminary settlement.

They may be of a provisional nature whenever the insurer has not, within three months of the accident, been informed of the stabilisation of the state of the victim's [health]. The definitive offer for compensation must in this case be made within five months of the insurer being informed of such stabilisation.

In the case of plurality of vehicles, and if there are many insurers, the offer is made by the insurer authorised by the others.

The preceding provisions are not applicable to victims to whom the accident caused only property damage.

Article 13

On the occasion of his first correspondence with the victim, the insurer is bound [subject to] relative nullity of any agreement that might be reached [result] to inform the victim that he can obtain through a simple request a copy of the report of the police enquiry and to remind him that he may obtain the assistance of a lawyer and, in the case of a medical examination, [the assistance] of a doctor.

Under the threat of the same penalty, the above-mentioned correspondence must inform the victim of the provision of sub-paragraph 4 of Article 12 and of Article 15 [of this law].

Article 14

When the insurer could not, without fault on his part, have known that the accident had occasioned disbursements to the paying third parties envisaged in Articles 29 and 33 of the present law, these [third parties] lose all rights of reimbursement against the insurer and the author of the damage. However, the insurer cannot invoke such ignorance vis-à-vis organisations that make social security payments.

In all cases, failure to produce the claims of paying third parties, within a period of four months from the moment of the request made by the insurer, will entail the forfeiture of their rights against the insurer and the author of the damages.

In the case where the demand that emanates from the insurer does not mention the stabilization of the victim's health, the claims made by the paying third parties may have a provisional character.

Article 15

Whenever, through the conduct of the victim, the paying third parties have not been able to assert their claims against the insurer, they will have a right of recourse against the victim to the extent of the indemnity he has received from the insurer under the same heading of damages and within the limits provided for by Article 31. They must act within a period of two years from the demand of payment.

Article 16

When the offer has not been made within the period allowed by Article 12, the amount of compensation offered to the victim by the insurer or granted to him by the judge, automatically attracts interest at double the rate of the legal interest from the moment of expiry of the permissible period up until the moment when the offer or the judgment becomes definitive. This penalty can be reduced by the judge because of circumstances not attributable to the insurer.

Article 17

If the judge who determines the compensation is of the view that the offer made by the insurer is manifestly insufficient, he will, of his own initiative, condemn the insurer to transfer to the fonds de garantie envisaged by Article 420–1 of the Code of Insurance a sum of at [most] 15 per cent of the compensation awarded [by the court] without prejudice to any damages and interest due to the victim for this conduct.

Article 18

The insurer must submit to the juge des tutelles or the conseil de famille—depending on which of the two is appropriate—all proposals of settlement concerning minors or adults subject to guardianship [tutelle]. Similarly, he must give informal notice to the juge des tutelles, at least fifteen days in advance of the payment of the first instalment of an annuity or of any sum due to be paid as compensation to the legal representative of the protected person.

Any payment which has not been preceded by the requisite notice or any unauthorized transaction can be annulled at the request of any interested party or one of the ministère public but not of the insurer.

Any clause by which the legal representative of a minor or of an adult subject to guardianship, guarantees the ratification [by the said persons] of the acts mentioned in the first sub-paragraph of this Article is void.

Article 19

The victim may, by means of a registered letter accompanied by a request for its receipt, denounce the settlement within fifteen days of its conclusion.

Any provision in the settlement that deprives the victim of this right is void.

The above-mentioned provisions reproduced very clearly in the offer proposing a settlement and in the settlement itself [at the risk of] relative nullity of the latter.

Article 20

Payment of the agreed sums must take place within one month from the expiry of the period within which denunciation is permitted according to Article 19. Sums not paid will automatically [produce] interest at 50 per cent above the legal rate for the first two months [of the delay] and twice the legal amount for any period thereafter.

Article 21

In the event of payment being ordered by the court (even by a provisional decision) the rate of legal interest is increased by 50 per cent after the expiry of two months and it is doubled after the expiry of four months counting from the day when the decision was made whenever the case was contested. In all other cases [time runs] from the day on which the decision was notified [to the defaulting party].

Article 22

The victim can, within the period provided for by Article 2270–1 of the Civil Code, demand from the insurer compensation for the increase of the damage he has suffered.

Article 23

Whenever the insurer invokes an exception of legal or contractual guarantee, he is bound to comply with the provisions of Articles 12 to 20 on account of the party concerned; the resulting settlement can be contested before the judge by the person on whose account it was made without challenging the amount of money allocated to the victim or those deriving rights from him.

Article 24

For the purposes of Articles 12 to 20, the State and all public entities, enterprises or organizations not obliged to carry insurance or having by virtue of Article 211–3 of the same Code obtained [a waiver from the duty to take out insurance] are assimilated to an insurer.

Article 25

The provisions of Articles 12 and 13 to 22 are applicable to the fonds de garantie in its relations with the victim and those deriving rights from him. However, the times provided for in Article 12 run against le fonds from the day when it has received information justifying its intervention. The application of Articles 16 and 17 are not obstacles to the [specific] provisions that cover actions against the fond. Whenever the fonds de garantie is bound to pay the interest provided for by Article 17, this is payable to the Treasury.

Article 26

Under the control of public authority a periodic publication will provide an account of the amounts of compensation awarded by the courts or agreed upon as a result of private settlements.

Article 27

A decree of the Council of the State will fix the necessary measures for the application of this section. In particular it will list the causes of suspension and prorogation of the delays mentioned in Article 12 as well as the reciprocal information that must be supplied by insurer, victim and paying third parties.

4. STRICT LIABILITY ACT 1978

HAFTPFLICHTGESETZ OF 4 JANUARY 1978 (BGBL. I, 145—AS AMENDED)

§ 1. Liability of the entrepreneur

(1) If in the conduct of a railway or cable-way a human being is killed or suffers injury to body or health or a thing is damaged, the entrepreneur [the undertaking] is bound to make good to the injured party the damage arising therefrom.

(2) The duty to make good is excluded if the accident was caused by force majeure. Nevertheless in so far as the railway was operated within the travelled portion of a public highway, the duty to make good is excluded if the accident was caused by an unavoidable event which is due neither to a defect in the condition of the vehicle or lay-out of the railway nor to a failure of its management. An event is deemed to be unavoidable in particular when it is traceable to the conduct of the injured party or of a third person not concerned in the undertaking or of an animal and both the entrepreneur and the persons engaged in the undertaking observed the care required of them by the circumstances of the case.

(3) The duty to make good is also excluded if:

1. an object accepted for safekeeping is damaged;
2. an object being transported is damaged, unless a passenger is wearing or carrying it with him.

§ 2. Liability of the proprietor of an energy establishment

(1) If a human being is killed or suffers injury to body or health or an object is damaged through the operation of electricity, gas, steam, or current escaping from a cable or pipeline or a plant for the provision of such energy or material, the proprietor of the plant is bound to make good the damage arising therefrom. The same applies if the damage, without being due to the operation of the electricity, gas, steam or current, is traceable to the existence of such plants, unless they were in a proper state when the damage was caused. A plant is in a proper state as long as it conforms to the recognised technical rules and is intact.

(2) Subsection 1 does not apply to plants which serve only for the transmission of signs or sounds.

(3) The duty to make good under subsection 1 is excluded:

1. if the damage occurred inside a building and is traceable to a plant discoverable therein (subsection 1) or if it occurred inside a plot in the possession of the proprietor of the plant;
2. if the damage was caused by force majeure, unless it is traceable to fall of cable wires.

§ 3. Liability of other entrepreneurs

Anyone who operates a mine, quarry, pit, or factory is liable to compensation if an authorised agent or representative or anyone employed in the direction or supervision of the undertaking or of the workmen causes by a fault in the carrying out of the service arrangement, death or bodily injury to a human being.

§ 4. Contributory fault

If a fault of the injured party contributed to the occurrence of the damage § 254 BGB applies; where an object is damaged, the fault of the person who exercises the factual control over it is equivalent to the fault of the injured party.

§ 5. Extent of the compensation for death

(1) In the case of death, compensation must be made by making good the cost of the attempted cure as well as of the pecuniary damage which the deceased has suffered therefrom by having his earning capacity destroyed or diminished during the illness, or by having his personal needs increased. The person bound to make compensation must also make good the funeral expenses to the person who is under a duty to bear those expenses.

(2) If the deceased at the time of the injury stood to a third party in a relation by virtue of which he was, or could have become under a statutory duty of maintenance, and if the third party is deprived of the right to maintenance as a result of the death, the person bound to make compensation must compensate the third party for the period of the deceased's presumed life expectancy. The duty of compensation arises also if the third party at the time of the injury was conceived but not yet born.

§ 6. Extent of the compensation for bodily injury

In case of bodily injury, the compensation (§§ 1, 2, and 3) must be made by making good the cost of cure as well as the pecuniary damage which the injured party suffers by having his earning capacity temporarily or permanently destroyed or diminished or by having his personal needs increased by reason of the injury.

§ 7. Compulsory law

The duty of compensation under §§ 1–3 of this Act may not, in so far as personal injury is concerned, be either excluded or restricted for the future. The same applies to the duty of compensation under § 2 of this statute to damage to objects, unless the exclusion or restriction of liability has been agreed to between the proprietor of the plant and a public corporation or fund or a businessman by the terms of a contract relating to the conduct of his business. Provisions and agreements to the contrary are void.

§ 8. Money annuity or lump sum settlement

(1) Compensation for destruction or diminution of any earning capacity and for increase in the personal needs of the injured person as well as compensation to be paid to a third party under § 3 II is due only for future losses and payments must take the form of an annuity.

(2) The provisions of §§ 843 II–IV BGB apply mutatis mutandis.

(3) If in the sentencing of the person bound to pay a money annuity no decision is made as to the provision of security, the person entitled to compensation can nevertheless demand that such security be provided if the financial status of the person bound to pay it has appreciably worsened; in similar circumstances, he can demand an increase in the security fixed by the judgment.

§ 9. Limit of liability

The entrepreneur or the proprietor of the plant indicated in § 2 is liable in cases under § 8 I only up to an annuity of DM 30,000 for each person killed or injured.

§ 10. Limit of liability for damage to objects by energy plants

(1) The entrepreneur or the proprietor of a plant listed in § 2 is liable for property damage only up to the sum of DM 100,000, even if several objects are damaged by the same event.

(2) If, by reason of the same event, compensation is payable to several persons, which together exceeds the highest permissible sum of DM 100,000, the individual awards are reduced in the proportion to which their total sum stands to the highest permissible sum.

§ 11. Prescription

With regard to prescription the provisions of the BGB applicable to unlawful acts apply mutatis mutandis.

§ 12. Further liabilities

Statutory provisions remain unaffected according to which a person bound to make compensation is liable to a greater extent than under the provisions of this Act or another person is responsible for the damage.

§ 13. Several persons liable

(1) If several persons are bound to make good property damage to a third person, as regards the mutual relations of those bound to make compensation, the duty to compensate and its extent depend on the circumstances, and in particular on how far the damage was caused by one or the other. The same applies if the damage occurred to one of those bound to compensate, to the liability that attaches to another of them.

(2) Subsection (1) applies mutatis mutandis where, along with those bound to compensate under §§ 1 and 2, another person is legally responsible for the damage.

§ 14. Optional jurisdiction

Actions based on these provisions may also be brought in the court, in whose district the event causing damage took place.

Case 128

REICHSGERICHT (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 11 JANUARY 1912

RGZ 78, 171

On 5 August 1908, while flying from Mainz to Friedrichshafen, the defendant's airship was forced by engine failure to land on a field near Echterdingen. Since thousands flocked to see the sight, the landing area was sealed off by the military, while the fire brigade, and various army units were placed at the defendant's disposal. Around 3 p.m. a sudden storm caused the airship to break loose from its moorings and to be dragged for some 1,200 metres before exploding and burning up. The plaintiff, who was among the spectators standing near the place of anchorage, was struck by the anchor-chain. He sued the defendant for damage alleging that the accident was caused by the defendant's negligence.

Both lower courts rejected the plaintiff's claim and his application for review was denied for the following.

Reasons

1. The claim was considered by the Court of Appeal in the light of §§ 823 and 831 BGB and it refused to consider the applicability of other statutory provisions imposing liability for dangerous objects (Gefährdungshaftung). This conclusion is entirely justified by existing law. In cases such as this, where the plaintiff's injuries have been sustained outside any contractual relations, the provisions of the Civil Code dealing with torts are the only ones that can apply. According to these provisions, however, the defendant can only be liable to the plaintiff if the latter's damage is due to the former's culpable conduct. Special provisions of the Civil Code imposing liability without fault, e.g. § 833 BGB concerning the liability of keepers of animals, the principles of the Imperial Act on Liability (Reichshaftpflichtgesetz), or of the statute of 3 May 1909 (Strassenverkehrsgesetz) concerning automobile accidents, which (statutes) impose liability based on risk, cannot be applied to aerial navigation given their exceptional character.

2. With regard to liability for damages resulting from illegal acts, the older view can no longer be accepted which postulated with respect to the dangerous nature that constitutes a fault (Verschulden). Consequently, it cannot be said that because aerial navigation is fraught with great dangers the defendant, as initiator of this dangerous undertaking, can be regarded as being at fault in the sense required by § 823 I BGB. This approach has not been misapplied by the Court of Appeal taking the view, which pays due attention to the requirements of general safety and which is legally correct, that in the circumstances the defendant was under a duty to take particular care. The Court thus held the defendant was under a duty to take exceptional care, not least because at the time of the accident there was little experience in landing such an airship . . .

3. Given that in view of the above points the position taken by the Court of Appeal is free from legal error, the question arises whether the findings of fact justified it in holding that the defendant had discharged this duty. The plaintiff denies this on two grounds.

(a) First, he insists that the defendant was at fault, if for no other reason than the fact that he decided to go ahead with the flight even though he had insufficient experience in landings. In his appeal he therefore alleges that the defendant should not have gone ahead on the assumption that everything would necessarily proceed smoothly. At the very least he should have, from the outset, warned the public of all incidental dangers; and, if common sense and experience suggested that such warning of possible dangers would not be sufficient to avert them, then he should have cancelled the flight altogether.

This argument is misconceived. The facts of this case show that the defendant embarked upon this journey, which would have lasted for several days, in excellent weather conditions and was aided by an experienced crew. As the Court of Appeal suggested, he had every reason to believe that a carefully executed landing would pose no dangers to any crowd assembled for the spectacle. His principles of anchorage were correct and his means for anchoring were ample. And the defendant knew that wherever this happened competent assistance would be on hand. In his opinion his experience in such matters was more than adequate and he entertained no doubt that, even in the event of a storm he would be able to anchor his airship safely. Given all this he could undertake this flight without hesitation. And past experience had also shown that public warnings against possible future risks were ineffective. Instead he is entitled to believe that if need be injuries could be prevented by a cordon and by warning the crowds.

In view of the above no legal error can be found in the conclusion that the defendant's conduct during the preparation of the flight was careful in the sense of § 276 BGB. The applicant's view that the defendant should have had absolute certainty that the flight posed no dangers whatsoever is too far-fetched. Any enterprise of this type is bound to entail some dangers, also for third parties, and this could never be entirely eliminated, even if great care was taken. In the circumstances, therefore, it would be unjust to demand that such flights were banned altogether because their inherent dangers cannot be entirely eliminated. All that one can demand is that all care required in the circumstances should be taken. This, indeed, occurred since the defendant undertook the flight after proper preparations were carried out in accordance with prevailing experience. The flights went ahead when the weather conditions were good and everything could normally be expected to go well and safely. Consequently, he is not guilty of any recklessness constituting a danger to the community nor, indeed, can he be regarded as having carelessly breached his duty to take care.

(b) The applicant's second complaint is against the finding of the Court of Appeal that the defendant took sufficient measures at the landing-field both in respect of his anchoring his airship and in cordoning off the landing-space.

This argument, too, is unacceptable. With regard to the anchoring the Court of Appeal found the following facts. Prevailing experience, on which the defendant was entitled to rely, clearly suggested that since the emergency landing was only expected to last a few hours, the airship was quite properly anchored. Thus at the front, where it pointed downwards, the ship was secured to the ground by means of an anchor and posts and sacks while at the rear end the airship was held down by men, and deliberately kept in suspension so that it could swing in the direction of the wind. Forty men held the anchor rope and the front cabin of the ship while thirty men, properly instructed as to how to handle the side-movements of the airship, controlled the ship's rear cabin. And reinforcements were also at hand should the need arise. When the defendant left the airfield, the weather did not indicate that there might be any change in the direction of the wind, but even if such a change occurred, the airship was sufficiently secured to remain on the ground so long as its back remained free to swing in the new direction of the wind. The Court of Appeal also examined how, despite the above, the airship could cut loose from its anchor. In its view what happened was that the first gust of wind was quite suddenly followed by a second and extraordinarily violent gust which hit the airship on its side before it had time to swing to its direction and raised it with great force. Whatever method of anchorage was adopted there was no absolute proof that it would have managed to secure the ship to the ground.

The applicant is also wrong in arguing that since no one was to be responsible to the defendants for such extraordinary occurrence, he should have taken precautions against such an exceptional situation. This allegation is unsupported by the findings of facts. For given the initially prevailing favourable weather conditions, no sudden changes of wind were foreseeable at the time of the landing; thus, the defendant was not in breach of the duty of care required in the circumstances given that he had anchored his ship in accordance with the dictates of human experience and knowledge believing that his anchor could hold well even in a storm. That the airship was nevertheless torn away, as a result of the unexpected and violent gust of wind, and would probably have been torn away whatever system had been adopted for the anchoring, must be seen as the consequence of an act of God (höhere Gewalt).

As for the cordoning off of the landing-place, the Court of Appeal admitted that the plaintiff would probably not have been hurt if the cordon had been considerably wider. But again it is established that in taking these measures the defendant had done all that could have been expected of him. Thus, towards Echterdingen—from where the wind was blowing—ropes were used and soldiers were employed, while in the direction of Berhausen soldiers alone were posted at a close distance since no more ropes were available to drive the surging crowds back over and over again.

Nevertheless, the applicant feels that the defendant took insufficient precautions in this respect and insists that ropes should have been used in the direction of Berhausen; and soldiers could also have been used at much shorter intervals. But on the findings of facts this argument, too, fails. For as stated, the defendant cordoned off the place with all disposable means and achieved this as best he could despite the fact that curious crowds kept surging in the direction of the airship. If this forced landing, which was only meant to last for a few hours and carried out in favourable weather conditions, had not been disturbed by an unforeseeable change of weather, taking place against all reasonable expectation, the cordon would have been perfectly sufficient and no accident would have occurred. The defendant had no reason to anticipate that a storm, the result of an act of God, would suddenly blow up and tear his airship away from its moorings and then carry it over the heads of the public at such low height as to cause injury to some bystander. The requisite standard of crew did not, therefore, require the taking of such precautions that might protect the public against dangers which could in no way be foreseen as the likely consequence of a more or less normal forced landing . . .

Notes to the Strict Liability Act

1. Reading the text of the Strict Liability Act in conjunction with the commentary in chapter 3, section A, above, one immediately becomes aware of the considerable historical and methodological differences that exist between the German law on the one hand and the French and Common law on the other in the area of strict liability. For the French, unlike the Germans, have, by skilfully developing—one might even say perverting—an unpromising provision of their Code, brought strict liability within the codal context. This technique, however, has not blinded them to the advantages of special legislation dealing with specific areas where strict liability is desirable.

By contrast, the English Common law has experienced some difficulty in abandoning the idea that where there is no fault there can be no liability. On the whole, the attack on the notion of fault has not been a frontal one, but has taken the form of guerrilla warfare (waged through the concept of res ipsa loquitur and the objectivisation of the notion of negligence) thus affecting the fringes only of the notion. The position is considered by many to be unsatisfactory; and the Pearson Committee recommended that strict liability should be introduced in a number of areas of tort law. At the time of writing, however, the prospects of that happening appear slim with the result that in English law strict liability can only be found in a limited number of statutes (e.g., the Nuclear Installations Acts 1959–65); in the rule of Rylands v. Fletcher (1868) LR 3 HL 330 (considerably restricted over the years by successive timorous judicial pronouncements); and in certain instances of damage caused by animals. Incidentally, this latter subject is now embodied in the Animals Act 1971—a prime example of the long-winded and unnecessarily complicated English drafting techniques.

2. As is often the case, the position in the United States is much more interesting and, indeed, advanced than it is in England. The traditional strict liability areas—animals, Rylands v. Fletcher—can be found there, as well. But the reception that the latter rule has had in the different parts of the United States has varied depending on the prevailing socio-economic and geographical conditions of the area in question. A well-known extract from Turner v. Big Lake Oil Co. 62 SW 2d 491 (Tex. App. 1933) makes this clear:

In Rylands v. Fletcher the court predicated the absolute liability of the defendants on the proposition that the use of land for the artificial storage of water was not a natural use, and that, therefore, the landowner was bound at his peril to keep the waters on his own land [Citations omitted]. This basis of the English rule is to be found in the meteorological conditions which obtain there. England is a pluvial country, where constant streams and abundant rains make the storage of water unnecessary for ordinary or general purposes. When the court said in Rylands v. Fletcher that the use of land for storage of water was an unnatural use, it meant such use was not a general or an ordinary one, not one within the contemplation of the parties to the original grant of the land involved, nor of the grantor and grantees of adjacent lands, but was a special or extraordinary use, and for that reason applied the rule of absolute liability. This conclusion is supported by the fact that those jurisdictions which adhere to the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher do not apply that rule to dams or reservoirs constructed in rivers and streams, which they say is a natural use, but apply the principle of negligence. [Citations omitted.] In other words, the impounding of water in streamways, being an obvious and natural use, was necessarily within the contemplation of the parties to the original and adjacent grants, and damages must be predicted upon negligent use of a granted right and power; while things not within the contemplation of the parties to the original grants, such as unnatural uses of the land, the landowner may do only at his peril. As to what use of land is or may be a natural use, one within the contemplation of the parties to the original grant of land, necessarily depends upon the attendant circumstances and condition which obtain in territory of the original grants, or the initial terms of those grants.

In Texas we have conditions very different from those which obtain in England. A large portion of Texas is an arid or semi-arid region. West of the 98th meridian of longitude, where the rainfall is approximately 30 inches, the rainfall decreases until finally, in the extreme western part of the State, it is only about 10 inches. This land of decreasing rainfall is the great ranch or livestock region of the State, water for which is stored in thousands of ponds, tanks, and lakes on the surface of the ground. The country is almost without streams; and without the storage of water from rainfall in basins constructed for the purpose, or to hold waters pumped from the earth, the great livestock industry of West Texas must perish. No such condition obtains in England. With us the storage of water is a natural or necessary and common use of the land, necessarily within the contemplation of the State and its grantees when grants were made, and obviously the rule announced in Rylands v. Fletcher, predicated upon different conditions, can have no application here.

Again, in England there are no oil wells, no necessity for using surface storage facilities for impounding and evaporating salt waters therefrom. In Texas the situation is different. Texas has many great oil-fields, tens of thousands of wells in almost every part of the State. Producing oil is one of our major industries. One of the by-products of oil production is salt water, which must be disposed of without injury to property or the pollution of streams. The construction of basins or ponds to hold this salt water is a necessary part of the oil business. . . .

Other references are given by Leon Green, "Tort Law Public Law in Disguise", 38 Tex. L. Rev. 1, 5 (1959), who puts great stress on the "environmental factor". But not all courts have taken such a hostile view and the trend is to adopt in substance, if not always in name, the Rylands v. Fletcher rule. See, for example, Cities Service Co. v. State 312 So. 2d 799 (Fla. App. 1975). But if the accumulation and escape of liquid substances have at times left the courts divided, blasting operations have been dealt with greater severity and uniformity. See, for example, Sullivan v. Durham 161 NY 290, 55 NE 923 (1900) (and many others since). The underlying idea here is that extra-hazardous activities must pay their own way (cf. Smith v. Lockheed Propulsion Co., 247 C.A. 2d 774, 56 Cal. Rptr. 128 (1967)).

The Restatement (Second) of Torts has phrased the rule, which stems from Rylands v. Fletcher but is also stripped of many of its limitations, in the following way:

§ 519 (1) One who carries on an abnormally dangerous activity is subject to liability for harm to the person, land, or chattels of another resulting from the activity, although he has exercised the utmost care to prevent such harm.

(2) Such strict liability is limited to the kind of harm, the risk of which makes the activity abnormally dangerous.

§ 520. In determining whether an activity is abnormally dangerous, the following factors are to be considered:

- (a) whether the activity involves a high degree of risk of some harm to the person, land, or chattels of others;
- (b) whether the gravity of the harm which may result from it is likely to be great;
- (c) whether the risk cannot be eliminated by the exercise of reasonable care;
- (d) whether the activity is not a matter of common usage;
- (e) whether the activity is inappropriate to the place where it is carried on; and
- (f) the value of the activity to the community.

3. For further discussion of the rich case law see Franklin and Rabin, 498 ff.; Henderson, Pearson and Siliciano, 481 ff. Rylands v. Fletcher, and its reception in the USA, has given rise to an interesting socio-legal literature. Thus see, inter alia, Bohlen, "The Rule in Rylands v. Fletcher" 59 U. Pa. L. Rev. 298, 373, 423 (1911); Molloy, "Fletcher v. Rylands—A Re-examination of Juristic Origins" 9 U. Chi. L. Rev. 266 (1942). These have, in turn, been scrutinised by Professor Simpson's masterly "Legal Liability for Bursting reservoirs: The Historical Context of Rylands v. Fletcher" (1984 13 Jo. LS. 209, reprinted in a slightly different form as ch. 8 of his Leading Cases in the Common Law (1995).

4. In addition to the above-mentioned developments of "traditional" strict liability doctrines, one can also find in the US new areas of strict liability. The modern law of product liability offers such an example in the key provisions of the Restatement (Second) of Tort. Good accounts and further references to this dynamic part of modern tort law can be found in all the textbooks and case-books referred to throughout this work.

One must further note the existence of new compensation systems which have emerged as alternatives to the system of tort liability based on fault. Some of these, e.g. workers' compensation schemes (replacing in all but some isolated instances the Common law tort action) have already acquired a respectable history. The Massachusetts statute enacted in 1911 (Mass. Gen. Laws, ch. 152) is a fairly representative example. No-fault automobile insurance is, on the other hand, a relative newcomer and despite many statutory variations and even more proposals for reform, has never quite aspired to replacing tort law completely. Finally, what was in the 1970s described as the "medical malpractice crisis" prompted many to contemplate the possible advantages of a no-fault system of compensation for this type of injury. An example of such thinking can be found in a feasibility study prepared in 1979 by the American Bar Association on Medical Professional Liability. These "alternatives" discussed at varying lengths by Henderson, Pearson and Siliciano, 721–748; Franklin and Rabin, 785–863; Prosser, Wade and Schwartz, 1190–1214. The American Bar Association also published in 1979 a useful annotated bibliography of the growing literature on this topic under the title Tort Reform and Related Proposals: Annotated Bibliographies on Product Liability and Medical Malpractice, (ed. B. A. Levin and R. Coyne) but the literature, which has grown further since those days, must be sought elsewhere.

5. The legal aspects of case 128, RGZ 78, 171, are discussed at p. 723; but its non-legal background is also interesting for the accident described in the case happened in the process of perfecting the lighter than air dirigible aircraft first manufactured by the Frenchman Giffard in 1852—his airship was steam-powered and could travel at 5 m.p.h.—but perfected by the German Count Ferdinand von Zeppelin. (The British did not, initially, enter this Franco-German race; and it was only in 1917 that their first airship—the R33—was successfully launched, though its design was based on a German Zeppelin—the L33—which was brought down in England in September 1916 in an almost intact condition.)

The accident described in the leading case happened as the airship was returning to its base in Friedrichshafen, the old capital of Württemberg, on the north-eastern side of lake Constance where Zeppelin had set up his famous factory. During the First World War the Zeppelin was put to military use; and some fifteen years later, again in Friedrichshafen, another lethal air machine—the Dornier—was manufactured.

The French competed with the Germans not only in the manufacture of these dirigibles but also in making legal history through their misfortunes. See: Coquerelc. Clément-Bayard, Cass. Req. 3 août 1915, D.P. 1917, 1. 79.

5. ENVIRONMENTAL LIABILITY ACT OF 10 DECEMBER 1990
(TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN BY THE COLOGNE RE.)

With the consent of the Bundesrat, the Bundestag has enacted the following into law:

Article 1

Environmental Liability Act (ELA)

§ 1. Facility liability for environmental impacts

If a person suffers death or injury to his body or health, or if property is damaged, due to an environmental impact that issues from one of the facilities named in Appendix 1, then the operator of the facility shall be liable to the injured person for the damage caused thereby.

§ 2. Liability for non-operating facilities

(1) If the environmental impact issues from a facility that is not yet completed and arises from circumstances forming the basis of the hazard posed by the facility after completion, then the operator of the not yet completed facility shall be liable pursuant to § 1.

(2) If the environmental impact issues from a facility that is no longer in operation and arises from circumstances forming the basis of the hazard posed by the facility prior to its ceasing operations, then the operator of the facility at the time of the ceasing of operations shall be liable pursuant to § 1.

§ 3. Definitions

(1) Damage arises from an environmental impact if the damage is caused by materials, vibrations, noises, pressure, rays, gasses, steam, heat, or other phenomena that have been dispersed in soil, air, or water.

(2) Facilities are permanent structures such as plants or storage facilities.

(3) Facilities include:

- (a) machines, instruments, vehicles and other mobile technical structures, and
- (b) ancillary structures that stand in a spatial or operational relation to the facility or part thereof and could be significant for the occurrence of an environmental impact.

§ 4. Exclusion of liability

No liability shall exist insofar as the damage has been caused by force majeure.

§ 5. Limitation of liability for property damage

If the facility has been operated properly (§ 6 II second sentence), then liability for property damage shall be excluded if the property has only been impaired insignificantly or to a degree that is reasonable according to the local conditions.

§ 6. Presumption of causation

(1) If a facility is inherently suited, on the facts of the particular case, to cause the damage that occurred, then it shall be presumed that this facility caused the damage. Inherent suitedness in a particular case is determined on the basis of the course of business, the structures used, the nature and concentration of the materials used and released, the weather conditions, the time and place at which the damage occurred, the nature of the damage, as well as all other conditions which speak for or against causation of the damage in the particular case.

(2) Paragraph (1) shall not apply if the facility has been properly operated. A proper operation is present if the special operational duties have been complied with and no disruption of operations has occurred.

(3) Special operational duties are those duties imposed by administrative permits, requirements, and enforceable administrative orders and regulatory laws, insofar as their purpose is to prevent such environmental impacts that could be considered to be the cause of the damage.

(4) If, for the purpose of supervision of a special operational duty, controls are prescribed in the permit, in requirements, in enforceable administrative orders or in regulatory laws, then compliance with this operational duty shall be presumed, if:

1. the controls were carried out during the period in which the environmental impact in question may have issued from the facility, and these controls give rise to no inference of a violation of the operational duty, or
2. at the time the claim for compensation is made, more than ten years have passed since the environmental impact in question occurred.

§ 7. Rebuttal of the presumption

(1) If multiple facilities are inherently suited to cause the damage, then the presumption shall not apply if another circumstance is, on the facts of the particular case, inherently suited to cause the damage. Inherent suitedness in a particular case is determined on the basis of the time and place at which the damage occurred, the nature of the damage, as well as all other conditions which speak for or against causation of the damage.

(2) If only one facility is inherently suited to cause the damage, then the presumption shall not apply if another circumstance is, on the facts of the particular case, inherently suited to cause the damage.

§ 8. Injured party's right to disclosure from facility operator

(1) If there are facts justifying the assumption that a facility has caused the damage, then the injured party may demand information from the operator of the facility insofar as this is needed to determine the existence of a claim for damages pursuant to this Act. The demand shall be limited to data about the structures used, the nature and concentration of the substances used or emitted, and other effects issuing from the facility as well as the special operational duties as provided in § 6 (3).

(2) The right to disclosure pursuant to paragraph (1) shall not exist to the extent that the events must be kept secret pursuant to legal norms or the countervailing interests of the facility operator or of a third party requiring secrecy.

(3) The injured person may demand from the facility operator an opportunity to review existing documents insofar as the assumption is justified that the information provided is incomplete, incorrect, or insufficient, or if the information is not provided within a reasonable time. Paragraphs (1) and (2) shall apply accordingly.

(4) §§ 259–261 of the Civil Code shall apply accordingly.

§ 9. Injured party's right to disclosure from administrative agency

If the facts justify the assumption that a facility has caused the damage, then the injured party may demand information from administrative agencies that have issued a permit in respect of the facility, that supervise the facility, or that are responsible for recording impacts on the environment, insofar as this is needed to determine the existence of a claim for damages pursuant to this Act. The agency shall not be required to provide information if to do so would impair the performance of the tasks of the agency, if the disclosure would disserve the well-being of the Federal Republic or of a state thereof, or to the extent that the events must be kept secret pursuant to law or due to their nature, in particular due to lawful interests of the parties or of third parties. § 8 I, second sentence, shall apply accordingly for those agencies which have issued a permit in respect of the facility or which supervise the facility; information regarding the name and address of the facility operator, his legal representative, or agent for service of process may be demanded from these agencies.

§ 10. Facility operator's right to disclosure

(1) If a claim pursuant to this Act is brought against the operator of a facility, he may demand from the injured person or from the operator of another facility information or an opportunity to review documents or demand information from the agencies named in § 9, insofar as this is needed to determine the scope of his liability to the injured person or of his claim for indemnity against the other operator.

(2) The provisions of § 8 (2), (3) sentence 1, and § 8 (4) shall apply to the right to disclosure from the injured person; § 8 (1) sentence 2 and (2)–(4) shall apply to the right to disclosure from an administrative agency pursuant to § 9.

§ 11. Contributory negligence

If the fault of the injured person contributed to the cause of the damage, § 254 of the Civil Code shall apply; in case of property damage, the fault of the person having actual control of the property shall be considered to be the fault of the injured person.

§ 12. Scope of liability for death

(1) In case of death, compensation shall be paid for the costs of healing efforts as well as for the financial loss which the deceased suffered because his earning capability was eliminated or diminished or his needs were increased during the illness. In addition, the liable person shall pay funeral costs to the person who has to bear these costs.

(2) If, at the time of injury, the deceased stood to a third party in a relationship whereby he was obligated to that person, as a matter of law, to provide support or could become so obligated, and if the third party is deprived of the right of support as a consequence of the death, then the liable person shall pay to the third party damages to the extent that the deceased would have been obligated to provide support during his presumed lifetime. Liability shall also attach if, at the time of the injury, the third party was conceived but not yet born.

§ 13. Scope of liability for bodily injury

In case of bodily injury or injury to health, compensation shall be paid for the costs of treatment as well as for the financial loss which the injured person suffers thereby because his earning capability is eliminated or diminished temporarily or permanently or his needs are increased.

§ 14. Compensation by annuity

(1) Future compensation for elimination or diminution of earning capability and for increased needs of the injured person, as well as future compensation to a third party pursuant to § 12 (2), shall be provided by means of an annuity.

(2) § 843 (2) of the Civil Code shall be applied accordingly.

§ 15. Maximum limits of liability

The person liable shall be liable for death, bodily injury or injury to health only up to a maximum amount of 160 million Deutsche Mark and also for property damage only up to a maximum amount of 160 million Deutsche Mark, insofar as the damage is caused by a unitary environmental impairment. If the multiple losses to be indemnified on the basis of a unitary environmental impairment exceed the applicable maximum amounts provided in the first sentence, then the amount of each indemnification shall be reduced in the proportion that the total bears to the maximum amount.

§ 16. Expenses incurred for restoration measures

(1) If damage to property also impairs nature or scenery, then, insofar as the injured person restores the condition that would exist but for the occurrence of the impairment, § 251 (2) of the Civil Code shall apply, but the expenses incurred for restoring the prior condition shall not be considered unreasonable for the sole reason that they exceed the value of the property.

(2) Upon demand by the person entitled to compensation, the person liable shall make advance payment for the necessary expenses.

§ 17. Limitation of actions

The limitation provisions of the Civil Code pertaining to torts shall apply accordingly.

§ 18. Effect on liability under other laws

(1) This Act shall have no effect on liability arising under other legal provisions.

(2) This Act shall not apply in case of a nuclear event insofar as the Atomic Act applies in connection with the Paris Convention on Atomic Liability of 29 July 1960 (as published on 15 July 1985, BGBl. 1985 II p. 963), the Brussels Convention on Reactor-Powered Ships of 25 May 1962 (BGBl. 1975 II p. 957, 977) and the Brussels Convention on the Transportation of Nuclear Materials by Sea of 17 December 1971 (BGBl. 1975 II p. 957, 1026), as amended.

§ 19. Provision of coverage

(1) The operators of facilities named in Appendix 2 shall ensure that they are able to fulfil their legal obligation to provide compensation for damages that arise from a person suffering death or injury to his body or health, or from property being damaged, as a result of an environmental impact that issues from the facility (provision of coverage). If a facility that is no longer in operation presents a special hazard, the competent administrative agency may order the person who operated the facility at the time of the ceasing of operations to provide for coverage for a period of up to ten years.

(2) Coverage may be provided

1. in the form of liability insurance issued by an insurance company licensed to do business in the territory in which this Act applies;
2. in the form of an indemnity agreement or guarantee made by the Federal Government or by a state; or
3. in the form of an indemnity agreement or guarantee made by a credit institution licensed to do business in the territory in which this Act applies if such agreement or guarantee provides security comparable to that provided by liability insurance.

(3) The persons named in § 2 (1), Nos. 1 to 5 of the Compulsory Insurance Act as published 5 April 1965 (BGBl. I p. 213), last amended by the Act of 22 March 1988 (BGBl. I page 358), are exempt from the duty to provide for coverage.

(4) The competent administrative agency may prohibit, in whole or in part, the operation of a facility named in Appendix 2 if the operator does not comply with his duty to provide for coverage and fails to prove, within a reasonable time to be set by the competent agency, that coverage has been provided for.

§ 20. Authorisation to issue executive orders

(1) The Cabinet shall, with the consent of the Upper House of the German Parliament, issue executive orders regulating:

1. the point in time after which the operator of a facility shall be required to provide for coverage pursuant to § 19;
2. scope and amount of the provision of coverage;
3. the requirements to be set for indemnity agreements and guarantees by credit institutions;
4. the procedures and powers of the administrative agency having jurisdiction to monitor the provision of coverage;
5. the proper office pursuant to § 158 c (2) of the Insurance Contract Act and the giving of notice pursuant to § 158 c (2) of the Insurance Contract Act;

6. the duties of the operator of a facility, of the insurance company, and of a person making an indemnity agreement or guarantee to the administrative agency having jurisdiction to monitor the provision of coverage.

(2) Any executive order shall be presented to the Lower House before presentment to the Upper House. The order may be amended or rejected by resolution of the Lower House. The resolution of the Lower House shall be presented to the Cabinet. If, after three session weeks following receipt of an executive order, the German Lower House has not deliberated on it, the order shall be returned to the Cabinet unamended. The Lower House shall deliberate on an executive order upon petition by the number of members required for forming a parliamentary group.

§ 21. Criminal penalties

(1) Any person who

1. fails, wholly or partly, adequately to provide for coverage in violation of § 19 (1), sentence 1, in connection with an executive order pursuant to § 20 (1), No. 1 or 2; or
2. violates an enforceable order issued pursuant to § 19 (1), sentence 2, shall be imprisoned for a term not to exceed one year or fined.

(2) If the violation is committed negligently, the imprisonment shall not exceed six months or the fine shall not exceed 180 day-sentences (Tagessätze).

§ 22. Administrative penalties

(1) Any person who violates an executive order pursuant to § 20 (1), Nos. 3 to 6, commits an administrative offence insofar as the particular order refers to this provision on administrative penalties for a specific violation.

(2) The administrative offence may be penalized with a fine of up to ten thousand Deutsche Mark.

§ 23. Transitional provisions

Where the damage was caused before the entry into force of this Act, this Act shall not apply.

Article 2

Amendment to the Code of Civil Procedure

The Code of Civil Procedure, as revised and published in the Bundesgesetzblatt, Part III, 310–14, most recently amended by Schedule 1, chapter III, Area A, Section II No. 1 of the Unification Treaty of 31 August 1990 in connection with Article 1 of the Act of 23 September 1990 (BGBl. 1990 II pp. 885, 921), shall be amended as follows:

The following shall be inserted after § 32:

“§ 32a Jurisdiction in actions against the operator of a facility named in Appendix 1 of the Environmental Liability Act seeking compensation for damage caused by an environmental impact shall be vested exclusively in the court sitting in the district in which the impact issued from the facility. The aforesaid shall not apply if the facility is located abroad.”

Article 3Transitional Provision

Insofar as the damage was caused before the entry into force of this Act, the Code of Civil Procedure, unamended by this Act, shall apply.

Article 4Amendment to the Federal Emissions Protection Act

The Federal Emissions Protection Act, as published on 14 May 1990 (BGBl. I p. 880), as amended by Schedule 1, Chapter XII, Area A, Section II of the Unification Treaty of 31 August 1990 in connection with Article 1 of the Act of 23 September 1990 (BGBl. 1990 II pp. 885, 1114), shall be amended as follows:

The following § 51b shall be inserted after § 51a:

“§ 51b Provision for service of documents

The operator of a facility for which an operating permit is required shall ensure that certain documents may be served on him within the territory to which this Act applies. If service may be ensured only by the appointment of an agent for service, then the operator shall provide the name of the agent to the competent administrative agency.”

Article 5Entry into force

This Act shall enter into force on 1 January 1991.

6. CONSUMER LEGISLATION AND DEFECTIVE PRODUCTS

(i) EEC Council Directive of 25 July 1985, on the approximation of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the Member States concerning liability for defective products

Article 1

The producer shall be liable for damage caused by a defect in his product.

Article 2

For the purpose of this Directive “product” means all movables, with the exception of primary agricultural products and game, even though incorporated into another movable or into an immovable. “Primary agricultural products” means the products of the soil, of stock-farming and of fisheries, excluding products which have undergone initial processing. “Product” includes electricity.

Article 3

1. “Producer” means the manufacturer of a finished product, the producer of any raw material or the manufacturer of a component part and any person who, by putting his name, trade mark or other distinguishing feature on the product presents himself as its producer.

2. Without prejudice to the liability of the producer, any person who imports into the Community a product for sale, hire, leasing or any form of distribution in the course of his business shall be deemed to be a producer within the meaning of this Directive and shall be responsible as a producer.

3. Where the producer of the product cannot be identified, each supplier of the product shall be treated as its producer unless he informs the injured person, within a reasonable time, of the identity of the producer or of the person who supplied him with the product. The same shall apply, in the case of an imported product, if this product does not indicate the identity of the importer referred to in paragraph 2, even if the name of the producer is indicated.

Article 4

The injured person shall be required to prove the damage, the defect and the causal relationship between defect and damage.

Article 5

Where, as a result of the provisions of this Directive, two or more persons are liable for the same damage, they shall be liable jointly and severally, without prejudice to the provisions of national law concerning the rights of contribution or recourse.

Article 6

1. A product is defective when it does not provide the safety which a person is entitled to expect, taking all circumstances into account, including:

- (a) the presentation of the product;
- (b) the use to which it could reasonably be expected that the product would be put;
- (c) the time when the product was put into circulation.

2. A product shall not be considered defective for the sole reason that a better product is subsequently put into circulation.

Article 7

The producer shall not be liable as a result of this Directive if he proves:

- (a) that he did not put the product into circulation; or
- (b) that, having regard to the circumstances, it is probable that the defect which caused the damage did not exist at the time when the product was put into circulation by him or that this defect came into being afterwards; or
- (c) that the product was neither manufactured by him for sale or any form of distribution for economic purpose nor manufactured or distributed by him in the course of his business; or
- (d) that the defect is due to compliance of the product with mandatory regulations issued by the public authorities; or
- (e) that the state of scientific and technical knowledge at the time when he put the product into circulation was not such as to enable the existence of the defect to be discovered; or

(f) in the case of a manufacturer of a component, that the defect is attributable to the design of the product in which the component has been fitted or to the instructions given by the manufacturer of the product.

Article 8

1. Without prejudice to the provisions of national law concerning the right of contribution or recourse, the liability of the producer shall not be reduced when the damage is caused both by a defect in product and by the act or omission of a third party.
2. The liability of the producer may be reduced or disallowed when, having regard to all the circumstances, the damage is caused both by a defect in the product and by the fault of the injured person or any person for whom the injured person is responsible.

Article 9

For the purpose of Article 1, “damage” means:

- (a) damage caused by death or by personal injuries;
- (b) damage to, or destruction of, any item of property other than the defective product itself, with a lower threshold of 500 ECU, provided that the item of property;
 - (i) is of a type ordinarily intended for private use or consumption, and
 - (ii) was used by the injured person mainly for his own private use or consumption.

This article shall be without prejudice to national provisions relating to non-material damage.

Article 10

1. Member States shall provide in their legislation that a limitation period of three years shall apply to proceedings for the recovery of damages as provided for in this Directive. The limitation period shall begin to run from the day on which the plaintiff became aware, or should reasonably have become aware, of the damage, the defect and the identity of the producer.
2. The laws of Member States regulating suspension or interruption of the limitation period shall not be affected by this Directive.

Article 11

Member States shall provide in their legislation that the rights conferred upon the injured person pursuant to this Directive shall be extinguished upon the expiry of a period of ten years from the date on which the producer put into circulation the actual product which caused the damage, unless the injured person has in the meantime instituted proceedings against the producer.

Article 12

The liability of the producer arising from this Directive may not, in relation to the injured person, be limited or excluded by a provision limiting his liability or exempting him from liability.

Article 13

This Directive shall not affect any rights which an injured person may have according to the rules of the law of contractual or non-contractual liability or a special liability system existing at the moment when this Directive is notified.

Article 14

This Directive shall not apply to injury or damage arising from nuclear accidents and covered by international conventions ratified by the Member States.

Article 15

1. Each Member State may:

(a) by way of derogation from Article 2, provide in its legislation that within the meaning of Article 1 of this Directive “product” also means primary agricultural products and game;

(b) by way of derogation from Article 7(e), maintain or, subject to the procedure set out in paragraph 2 of this Article, provide in this legislation that the producer shall be liable even if he proves that the state of scientific and technical knowledge at the time when he put the product into circulation was not such as to enable the existence of a defect to be discovered.

2. A Member State wishing to introduce the measure specified in paragraph 1(b) shall communicate the text of the proposed measure to the Commission. The Commission shall inform the other Member States thereof.

The Member State concerned shall hold the proposed measure in abeyance for nine months after the Commission is informed and provided that in the meantime the Commission has not submitted to the Council a proposal amending this Directive on the relevant matter. However, if within three months of receiving the said information, the Commission does not advise the Member State concerned that it intends submitting such a proposal to the Council, the Member State may take the proposed measure immediately.

If the Commission does submit to the Council such a proposal amending this Directive within the aforementioned nine months, the Member State concerned shall hold the proposed measure in abeyance for a further period of 18 months from the date on which the proposal is submitted.

3. Ten years after the date of notification of this Directive, the Commission shall submit to the Council a report on the effect that rulings by the courts as to the application of Article 7(e) and of paragraph 1(b) of this Article have on consumer protection and the functioning of the common market. In the light of this report the Council, acting on a proposal from the Commission and pursuant to the terms of Article 100 of the Treaty, shall decide whether to repeat Article 7(e).

Article 16

1. Any Member State may provide that a producer’s total liability for damage resulting from a death or personal injury and caused by identical items with the same defect shall be limited to an amount which may not be less than 70 million ECU.

2. Ten years after the date of notification of this Directive, the Commission shall submit to the Council a report on the effect on consumer protection and the functioning of the common market of the implementation of the financial limit on liability by those Member States which have used the option provided for in paragraph 1. In the light of this report the Council, acting on a proposal from the Commission and pursuant to the terms of Article 100 of the Treaty, shall decide whether to repeal paragraph 1.

Article 17

This Directive shall not apply to products put into circulation before the date on which the provisions referred to in Article 19 enter into force.

Article 18

1. For the purposes of this Directive, the ECU shall be that defined by Regulation (EEC) no. 3180/78, as amended by Regulation (EEC) no. 2626/84. The equivalent in national currency shall initially be calculated at the rate obtaining on the date of adoption of this Directive.
2. Every five years the Council, acting on a proposal from the Commission, shall examine and, if need be, revise the amounts in this Directive, in the light of economic and monetary trends in the Community.

Article 19

1. Member States shall bring into force, not later than three years from the date of notification of this Directive, the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to comply with this Directive. They shall forthwith inform the Commission thereof.
2. The procedure set out in Article 15(2) shall apply from the date of notification of this Directive.

Article 20

Member States shall communicate to the Commission the texts of the main provisions of national law which they subsequently adopt in the field governed by this Directive.

Article 21

Every five years the Commission shall present a report to the Council on the application of this Directive and, if necessary, shall submit appropriate proposals to it.

Article 22

This Directive is addressed to the Member States.

(ii) The German Product Liability Act of 15 December 1989

§ 1. Liability

(1) If, as a result of a defect of a product, a human being is killed, is injured or affected in his health, or a thing is damaged, the producer† is obliged to compensate the person who suffered the damage for the ensuing harm. In the case of damage to property this rule applies only if an object other than the defective product is damaged and if this object is normally intended for private use or consumption and has been used by the injured party primarily for this purpose.

(2) The obligation to pay damages is excluded if:

1. the producer has not put the product into circulation;
2. it is to be assumed, having regard to the circumstances, that the product was not yet defective when it was put into circulation;
3. the producer has neither manufactured the product for sale or for any other form of distribution for a consideration nor has manufactured or distributed it in the course of his occupational activities;
4. the defect is due to the fact that at the time when the producer put the product into circulation it complied with mandatory legal provisions;
5. the defect could not yet be discerned, having regard to the state of art [literally: science and technique] at the time when the producer put the product concerned into circulation.

(3) In addition, the maker of the part of the product is exempt from the obligation to pay compensation if the defect was caused by the construction of the product into which the part was inserted or by the instructions of the maker of the product. Sentence 1 applies mutatis mutandis to a producer of a basic substance (Grundstoff).

(4) The person who has suffered the harm has the burden of proving the defect and its causal connection with the harm. In a dispute as to whether the obligation to pay compensation is excluded according to sub-paragraphs (2) or (3), the producer bears the burden of proof.

§ 2. Products

Product in the meaning of this Act includes every moveable object, even if it forms part of another moveable or of an immovable as well as electricity. Produce of the soil, of animal husbandry, bee farming, fishing, and hunting are exempt, unless they have undergone the first stage of processing.

§ 3. Defects

(1) A product is defective if it does not provide that degree of safety which can be justifiably expected, having regard to all the circumstances, in particular

- (a) its presentation;
- (b) its use which may be reasonably expected;
- (c) the time when it was put into circulation.

(2) A product is not defective for the sole reason that later on an improved product was put into circulation.

§ 4. Producer

(1) Producer in the meaning of this Act is the person who has manufactured the final product, a basic substance or a component part of the product. Furthermore, whoever represents himself as a producer by attaching his name, trademark or other distinctive mark is regarded as the producer.

(2) Notwithstanding sub-paragraph 1, a person is also treated as a producer who, within the range of his commercial activity, imports into the area covered by the Treaty for the Establishment of the European Economic Community a product with a view to sale, hire, hire-purchase or any other form of distribution.

(3) If the manufacturer of the product cannot be ascertained, every distributor is treated as its producer, unless he indicates to the injured party within one month of receiving the latter's relevant request who is the producer or the person who supplied him with the product. The same applies to an imported product in respect of which the person referred to in sub-paragraph (2) cannot be ascertained, even if the name of the producer is known.

§ 5. Several tortfeasors

If several producers are co-liable for the damage, they are jointly and severally liable. Between the debtors themselves, in the absence of provisions to the contrary, the liability to pay compensation and its extent depends upon the circumstances, in particular as to whether the damage has been caused predominantly by one or the other of them; furthermore §§ 421–5, 426 sub-paragraph 1, second sentence and sub-paragraph 2 BGB apply.

§ 6. Reduction of liability

(1) If the injured party is partly to be blamed for having caused the damage, § 254 BGB applies; if an object has been damaged, any blame attached to the person exercising physical control over it is treated as that of the injured party.

(2) If the damage has been caused at the same time by a defect of the product and by the act of a third party, the liability of the producer is not reduced. § 5 second sentence applies.

§ 7. Extent of damages in case of death

(1) In case of death, the expenses incurred in an attempt to restore health must be compensated together with the pecuniary loss suffered by the deceased in consequence of the loss or reduction of his earning capacity or of his increased needs. Damages also include the funeral expenses payable to the person responsible for them.

(2) If at the time of injury the deceased was connected with a third party by a relationship which rendered him, actually or potentially, liable by law to maintain that person, and if the third party lost his right to maintenance in consequence of the death, he is entitled to damages in so far as the deceased during the period of his life expectancy would have been liable to maintain him. This liability arises also if the third party was conceived at the time of death but not yet born.

§ 8. Extent of damages in case of injury to the person

If injury was caused to the body or to health, the expenses incurred in restoring health must be compensated together with the pecuniary loss suffered by the injured party resulting from the temporary or permanent loss or reduction of his earning capacity or from his increased needs.

§ 9. Damages by way of periodical payments

(1) Damage arising in the future as a result of the total or partial loss of earning capacity and of increased needs together with the damages payable to a third party in accordance with § 7 sub-paragraph (2) is to be compensated by periodical payments.

(2) § 843 sub-paragraphs 2–4 BGB apply.

§ 10. Maximum rate of damages

(1) If death or injury to the person has been caused by a product or by products of the same kind affected by the same defect, the liability to pay damages is limited to a maximum of DM 160 million.

(2) If the damages payable to several injured parties exceed the maximum rate set out in sub-paragraph (1), the individual damages are reduced in proportion of their total to the maximum rate allowable.

§ 11. Extent of compensation in case of damage to goods

Where goods are damaged, the person who suffered the damage has to bear the loss up to DM 1,125.

§ 12. Limitation of actions

(1) An action according to § 1 shall not be brought after the expiration of three years from the time when the claimant knew or could have known of the damage and of the person liable to pay damages.

(2) Time does not run if negotiations are pending between the persons liable to pay and to receive compensation until the continuation of the negotiations has been abandoned.

(3) Furthermore, the provisions of the BGB relating to limitation of actions apply.

§ 13. Extinction of claims

(1) A claim according to § 1 is extinguished after the expiration of ten years from the date when the producer against whom the claim is made has put the product into circulation. This does not apply where a law suit or summary proceedings are pending.

(2) Sub-paragraph (1), sentence 1 does not apply to a claim which has become res judicata or to a claim covered by another executory title. The same applies to a claim which is the subject-matter of an out-of-court settlement or which has been recognised by a legal act.

§ 14. Mandatory character

The liability of a producer in accordance with the Act cannot be excluded or restricted in advance. Any agreement to the contrary is void.

§ 15. Liability according to other legal provisions

(1) If, due to the application of a pharmaceutical product destined for human use and sold in the area of application of the Pharmaceutical Products Act, a person is killed or his body or health otherwise affected, the provisions of the Product Liability Act will not be applicable.

(2) Liability in accordance with other provisions remains unaffected.

Notes

The Act establishes a parallel regime of liability which can be similar or more extensive to that found in the “Common law” (based on § 823 BGB and described above, ch. 2, section A. 4 (c)). Under the Act, liability depends on the product being “defective”, i.e. not meeting the degree of safety normally required from such a product. Whether this will in practice lead to different results than the case law built on § 823 I BGB is a matter of some doubt. (See Kötz/Wagner, Deliktsrecht, no. 461). § 2 of the Act provides a list of situations where liability can be excluded. § 4 is worthy of special attention since it defines the persons likely to be liable; and it may be rendering non-manufacturers more extensively liable than they are under the “Common law” regime. Finally, note that (like all German strict liability statutes) the Act sets limits to the amounts of damages that can be claimed under it. Compensation for pain and suffering (immaterial damages) also presupposes that the claim is based on the tort provisions of the Code so they are not claimable under the Act. For a fuller discussion see references given in ch. 3, section A. 5(b). It is, of course, left to the plaintiff to decide whether he will base his claim on the “Common law” regime and/or that established by the Act.

(iii) The [UK] Consumer Protection Act 1987

I. Product Liability

1 (1) This Part shall have effect for the purpose of making such provision as is necessary in order to comply with the product liability Directive and shall be construed accordingly.

(2) In this part, except in so far as the context otherwise requires “agricultural produce” means any produce of the soil, of stock-farming or of fisheries;

 “dependant” and “relative” have the same meaning as they have in, respectively, the Fatal Accidents Act 1976 and the Damages (Scotland) Act 1976;

“producer”, in relation to a product, means

(a) the person who manufactured it;

(b) in the case of a substance which has not been manufactured but has been won or abstracted, the person who won or abstracted it;

(c) in the case of a product which has not been manufactured, won or abstracted but essential characteristics of which are attributable to an industrial or other process having been carried out (for example, in relation to agricultural produce), the person who carried out that process;

“product” means any goods or electricity and (subject to subsection (3) below) includes a product which is comprised in another product, whether by virtue of being a component part or raw material or otherwise; and

“the product liability Directive” means the Directive of the Council of the European Communities, dated 25 July 1985, (no. 85/374/EEC) on the approximation of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of the member States concerning liability for defective products.

(3) For the purposes of this Part a person who supplies any product in which products are comprised, whether by virtue of being component parts or raw materials or otherwise, shall not be treated by reason only of his supply of that product as supplying any of the products so comprised.

2 (1) Subject to the following provisions of this Part, where any damage is caused wholly or partly by a defect in a product, every person to whom subsection (2) below applies shall be liable for the damage.

(2) This subsection applies to

- (a) the producer of the product;
- (b) any person who, by putting his name on the product or using a trade mark or other distinguishing mark in relation to the product, has held himself out to be the producer of the product;
- (c) any person who has imported the product into a member State from a place outside the member States in order, in the course of any business of his, to supply it to another.

(3) Subject as aforesaid, where any damage is caused wholly or partly by a defect in a product, any person who supplied the product (whether to the person who suffered the damage, to the producer of any product in which the product in question is comprised or to any other person) shall be liable for the damage if—

- (a) the person who suffered the damage requests the supplier to identify one or more of the persons (whether still in existence or not) to whom subsection (2) above applies in relation to the product;
- (b) that request is made within a reasonable period after the damage occurs and at a time when it is not reasonably practicable for the person making the request to identify all those persons; and
- (c) the supplier fails, within a reasonable period after receiving the request, either to comply with the request or to identify the person who supplied the product to him.

(4) Neither subsection (2) nor subsection (3) above shall apply to a person in respect of any defect in any game or agricultural produce if the only supply of the game or produce by that person to another was at a time when it had not undergone an industrial process.

(5) Where two or more persons are liable by virtue of this Part for the same damage, their liability shall be joint and several.

(6) This section shall be without prejudice to any liability arising otherwise than by virtue of this Part.

3 (1) Subject to the following provisions of this section, there is a defect in a product for the purposes of this Part if the safety of the product is not such as persons generally are entitled to expect; and for those purposes “safety”, in relation to a product, shall include safety with respect to products comprised in that product and safety in the context of risks of damage to property, as well as in the context of risks of death or personal injury.

(2) In determining for the purposes of subsection (1) above what persons generally are entitled to expect in relation to a product all the circumstances shall be taken into account, including

- (a) the manner in which, and purposes for which, the product has been marketed, its get-up, the use of any mark in relation to the product and any instructions for, or warnings with respect to, doing or refraining from doing anything with or in relation to the product;

(b) what might reasonably be expected to be done with or in relation to the product; and

(c) the time when the product was supplied by its producer to another;

and nothing in this section shall require a defect to be inferred from the fact alone that the safety of a product which is supplied after that time is greater than the safety of the product in question.

4 (1) In any civil proceedings by virtue of this Part against any person (“the person proceeded against”) in respect of a defect in a product it shall be a defence for him to show

(a) that the defect is attributable to compliance with any requirement imposed by or under any enactment or with any Community obligation; or

(b) that the person proceeded against did not at any time supply the product to another; or

(c) that the following conditions are satisfied, that is to say

(i) that the only supply of the product to another by the person proceeded against was otherwise than in the course of a business of that person’s; and

(ii) that section 2(2) above does not apply to that person or applies to him by virtue only of things done otherwise than with a view to profit; or

(d) that the defect did not exist in the product at the relevant time; or

(e) that the state of scientific and technical knowledge at the relevant time was not such that a producer of products of the same description as the product in question might be expected to have discovered the defect if it had existed in his products while they were under his control; or

(f) that the defect

(i) constituted a defect in a product (“the subsequent product”) in which the product in question had been comprised; and

(ii) was wholly attributable to the design of the subsequent product or to compliance by the producer of the product in question with instructions given by the producer of the subsequent product.

(2) In this section “the relevant time”, in relation to electricity, means the time at which it was generated, being a time before it was transmitted or distributed, and in relation to any other product, means

(a) if the person proceeded against is a person to whom subsection (2) of section 2 above applies in relation to the product, the time when he supplied the product to another;

(b) if that subsection does not apply to that person in relation to the product, the time when the product was last supplied by a person to whom that subsection does apply in relation to the product.

5 (1) Subject to the following provisions of this section, in this Part “damage” means death or personal injury or any loss of or damage to any property (including land).

(2) A person shall not be liable under section 2 above in respect of any defect in a product for the loss of or any damage to the product itself or for the loss of or any damage to the whole or any part of any product which has been supplied with the product in question comprised in it.

(3) A person shall not be liable under section 2 above for any loss of or damage to any property which, at the time it is lost or damaged, is not

(a) of a description of property ordinarily intended for private use, occupation or consumption; and

(b) intended by the person suffering the loss or damage mainly for his own private use, occupation or consumption.

(4) No damages shall be awarded to any person by virtue of this Part in respect of any loss of or damage to any property if the amount which would fall to be so awarded to that person, apart from this subsection and any liability for interest, does not exceed £275.

(5) In determining for the purposes of this Part who has suffered any loss of or damage to property and when any such loss or damage occurred, the loss or damage shall be regarded as having occurred at the earliest time at which a person with an interest in the property had knowledge of the material facts about the loss or damage.

(6) For the purposes of subsection (5) above the material facts about any loss of or damage to any property are such facts about the loss or damage as would lead a reasonable person with an interest in the property to consider the loss or damage sufficiently serious to justify his instituting proceedings for damages against a defendant who did not dispute liability and was able to satisfy a judgment.

(7) For the purposes of subsection (5) above a person's knowledge includes knowledge which he might reasonably have been expected to acquire

(a) from facts observable or ascertainable by him; or

(b) from facts ascertainable by him with the help of appropriate expert advice which it is reasonable for him to seek;

but a person shall not be taken by virtue of this subsection to have knowledge of a fact ascertainable by him only with the help of expert advice unless he has failed to take all reasonable steps to obtain (and, where appropriate, to act on) that advice.

(8) Subsections (5) to (7) above shall not extend to Scotland.

6 (1) Any damage for which a person is liable under section 2 above shall be deemed to have been caused

(a) for the purposes of the Fatal Accidents Act 1976, by that person's wrongful act, neglect or default;

(b) for the purposes of section 3 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1940 (contribution among joint wrongdoers), by that person's wrongful act or negligent act or omission;

(c) for the purposes of section 1 of the Damages (Scotland) Act 1976 (rights of relatives of a deceased), by that person's act or omission; and

(d) for the purposes of Part II of the Administration of Justice Act 1982 (damages for personal injuries, etc., Scotland), by an act or omission giving rise to liability in that person to pay damages.

(2) Where

(a) a person's death is caused wholly or partly by a defect in a product, or a person dies after suffering damage which has been so caused;

(b) a request such as mentioned in paragraph (a) of subsection (3) of section 2 above is made to a supplier of the product by that person's personal representatives or, in the case of a person whose death is caused wholly or partly by the defect, by any dependant or relative of that person; and

(c) the conditions specified in paragraphs (b) and (c) of that subsection are satisfied in relation to that request, this Part shall have effect for the purposes of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1934, the Fatal Accidents Act 1976 and the Damages (Scotland) Act 1976 as if liability of the supplier to that person under that subsection did not depend on that person having requested the supplier to identify certain persons or on the said conditions having been satisfied in relation to a request made by that person.

(3) Section 1 of the Congenital Disabilities (Civil Liability) Act 1976 shall have effect for the purposes of this Part as if

(a) a person were answerable to a child in respect of an occurrence caused wholly or partly by a defect in a product if he is or has been liable under section 2 above in respect of any effect of the occurrence on a parent of the child, or would be so liable if the occurrence caused a parent of the child to suffer damage;

(b) the provisions of this Part relating to liability under section 2 above applied in relation to liability by virtue of paragraph (a) above under the said section 1; and

(c) subsection (6) of the said section 1 (exclusion of liability) were omitted.

(4) Where any damage is caused partly by a defect in a product and partly by the fault of the person suffering the damage, the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act 1945 and section 5 of the Fatal Accidents Act 1976 (contributory negligence) shall have effect as if the defect were the fault of every person liable by virtue of this Part for the damage caused by the defect.

(5) In subsection (4) above "fault" has the same meaning as in the said Act of 1945.

(6) Schedule 1 to this Act shall have effect for the purpose of amending the Limitation Act 1980 and the Prescription and Limitation (Scotland) Act 1973 in their application in relation to the bringing of actions by virtue of this Part.

(7) It is hereby declared that liability by virtue of this Part is to be treated as liability in tort for the purposes of any enactment conferring jurisdiction on any court with respect to any matter.

(8) Nothing in this Part shall prejudice the operation of section 12 of the Nuclear Installations Act 1965 (rights to compensation for certain breaches of duties confined to rights under that Act).

7 The liability of a person by virtue of this Part to a person who has suffered damage caused wholly or partly by a defect in a product, or to a dependant or relative of such a person, shall not be limited or excluded by any contract term, by any notice or by any other provision.

8 (1) Her Majesty may by Order in Council make such modifications of this Part and of any other enactment (including an enactment contained in the following Parts of this Act, or in an Act passed after this Act) as appear to Her Majesty in Council to be necessary or expedient in consequence of any modification of the product liability Directive which is made at any time after the passing of this Act.

(2) An Order in Council under subsection (1) above shall not be submitted to Her Majesty in Council unless a draft of the Order has been laid before, and approved by a resolution of, each House of Parliament.

9 (1) Subject to subsection (2) below, this Part shall bind the Crown.

(2) The Crown shall not, as regards the Crown's liability by virtue of this Part, be bound by this Part further than the Crown is made liable in tort or in reparation under the Crown Proceedings Act 1947, as that Act has effect from time to time.

(iv) Notes on the consumer protection enactments

1. Individually, each of these texts has inspired many articles in legal journals and many more will no doubt follow. The critical comparison of the texts is, if anything, an even more difficult task and one that cannot be undertaken within the confines of this book. Here, however, are some basic points with the main emphasis naturally being placed on German law (described briefly in section A.4(c) above).

2. The Directive is the progenitor of the three texts reproduced above and is, itself, the result of (a) the consumer movement that gained momentum in Europe in the late 1960s and 1970s as well as (b) the EC Commission's desire to harmonise the law within the EEC. The first provides the political motive, the second the excuse for the European Community's intervention. Both points are important though the EEC would stress the latter. But have the national laws been harmonised? Cf. for example the attitudes of the Member States towards the defence of the state of art. Existing differences are also (to some extent) maintained where existing laws (e.g. the German Pharmaceuticals Act) are more generous to consumers. Otherwise, has the Directive frozen existing national laws? Put differently, has the national legislator been deprived of the right to pass future legislation that is more generous to the consumer than is the text of the Directive? And what about national case-law? Can it improve the consumer's lot and remain faithful to the spirit of the Directive?

3. The Directive creates no direct rights but obliges the Member States to implement it by national laws. England and Germany are among the countries which have done so. But what if the text of a national law departs from the text (and intentions) of the Directive? For example, s. 4(1)(c) of the UK Act says that the producer is not liable if he proves "that the state of scientific and technical knowledge at the relevant time was not such that a producer of products of the same description as the product in question might be expected to have discovered the defect if it had existed in his products while they were under his control". On the other hand, Article 7(c) of the Directive gives the producer immunity if he proves "that the state of scientific and technical knowledge at the time when he put the product into circulation was not such as to enable the existence of the defect to be discovered". The Confederation of British Industry prefers the subjective wording of the Act; the Directive, by contrast, has opted for an objective wording, while the UK government has tried to argue that its wording states more clearly the intentions of the Directive (see Lord Lucas of Chilworth, HL Deb. vol. 487 c. 785 (14 May 1987)). What do you think? Other (permissible) derogations include the exemption from strict liability for the producers of primary agricultural products (where the farming lobby is strong, as it is in England, this derogation has not been taken up) and the possibility of limiting damages for a particular effect (10 million ECU, or about £40 million).

4. The Confederation of British Industry strongly and successfully opposed the abandonment of the defence of the state of art. One of its arguments was that inventiveness would be stifled and industry would suffer. Has the German pharmaceutical industry—one of the best in the world—suffered by adopting the opposite view? Did anyone do a comparative study of the two systems, look at the insurance situation, study the market? Or do British businessmen like British lawyers go into a tizzy when the words change and reforms are mentioned?

5. The Product Liability law now has many sources. As stated, the old tort rules to some extent remain in force; and they are expected to co-exist along with the new regime. Indeed, the old law is still relevant for damages to products and other forms of economic loss. Additionally, contract law remains alive; and here not only liability is strict; it is also not subject to any state of art defence. The different sources of product liability law have also given rise to much confusion in the USA as a quick glance at any specialized book will reveal.

6. Each European state has, following its own drafting techniques, implemented the Directive in a different way. Assuming that this was quite genuinely inevitable and preferable to giving the text of the Directive direct effect, what should happen when there is a significant difference between the wording of the Directive and a national enactment? The Directive, for example, excludes from the regime of strict liability primary agricultural products so long as they have not undergone “initial processing”. The UK legislation, on the other hand, has excluded from strict liability agricultural produce before it has undergone an “industrial process”. Does the use of hormones, pesticides, fertilisers, additives, etc. remove the exemption and subject these products to strict liability? In the case of the above examples the answer is probably a negative one; but the exception for its strict liability regime must surely be lost when, say, vegetables or fruit are frozen in a factory. Compare the wording of the English, French, and German Acts with the Directive and decide which of them is closer to the “model”.

7. In one of the best Hamlyn Lectures ever given, Professor Honoré thundered that “England does not have a genuine legal culture”. Anyone who compares academic law in our Universities at the turn of the century with, say, the situation in Germany at that time will immediately appreciate the validity of this condemnation. But Professor Honoré attributes this state of affairs in part to our inability to make laws “as clear, elegant, and rational as they could be”. (The Quest for Security: Employees, Tenants, Wives (1982), 119.) True though this may be about Common law statutes, what do you think of modern civil law statutes? The French text (still not accepted by Parliament) is exceptionally long and complicated. It is also inelegant in that it purports to add 29 product liability articles to the French Civil Code when a mere 5 cover the entire law of torts. Are the French (and the Germans for that matter) following our (bad) example? Compare in this respect the equally long-winded French Road Traffic Act of 1985.

8. There is no doubt that the Directive and its national progenies will add to the complexity of the law; but will the new enactment make it substantially different from how it was before this costly exercise was undertaken? For countries like Germany and France the answer is, on the whole, negative. The Italians and the Greeks, however, may find that membership of the EC also carries with it some responsibilities. Nevertheless, the Directive does take a more open stand on some issues. Here are some:

(a) Liability is now strict in theory as well as in practice (except for development risks in non-pharmaceutical products). All that the victim will have to show is that the product was defective and the defect caused his injury. This is not to say that all will be plain sailing since (a) causation (despite presumptions) may be difficult to prove and (b) the Directive (and the national laws) retain quite an array of defences. For details see the texts.

(b) When is a product defective? Note again the different national formulations as well as the Directive's emphasis on "user expectations". Can American case law help in this respect?

(c) In the many happy hours of reading that will be necessary to understand the emerging law, the following articles in English may help (detailed references to the German literature are given in chapter 2, section A.4(c) above): Borrie, "Product Liability in the EEC" 9 Dublin U. L. J. 82 (1987); Dielmann, "The European Economic Community's Council Directive on Product Liability" 20 The Int'l Law 1391 (1986); Lord Griffiths, De Val, and Dormer, "Development in English Product Liability Law: A Comparison with the American System" 62 Tul. L. Rev. 353 (1988); Newdick, "The Future of Negligence in Product Liability" 103 (1987) LQR 288; Stapleton, "Product Liability Reform—Real or Illusory?" (1985); Whittaker, "The EEC Directive on Product Liability" Y. B. of Eur. L. 233 (1985); Whittaker, "European Product Liability and Intellectual Products" 105 (1989) LQR 125.

The Remaining Grounds of Liability in the Civil Code and the Law of Damages

SECTION A. COMMENTARY

1. TWO MORE GENERAL CLAUSES

(a) § 823 II BGB

This important provision of the BGB imposes an obligation to make amends on anyone who violates a statutory provision intended for the protection of others. The element of unlawfulness which, as we saw in the context of § 823 I BGB, is defined by reference to the violation of the specifically enumerated interests, the so-called Rechtsgüter, is here made to depend upon the notion of a violated protective norm (Schutzgesetz). The term Gesetz, is taken here widely to refer to statutes (of private and public law), government decrees, local by-laws or ordinances (Verordnungen), food and drugs regulations, and police orders. Along with § 823 I BGB, paragraph II of this Article contains the second of the so-called small general clauses of the Code. In its ambit, however, it is both wider and narrower than the first paragraph of the same Article. (Wider since it covers economic loss but narrower since the illegality is defined by reference to the scope of the particular statute (which may be narrow) and not on the consequences of its violation.)

The literature on this important paragraph is extensive. See, inter alia: Canaris, “Die Haftung für fahrlässige Verletzung der Konkursantragspflicht nach § 64 GmbHG”, JZ 1993, 649; Dörner, “Zur Dogmatik der Schutzgesetzverletzung”, JuS 1987, 522; Kothe, “Normzweck und Interessenabwägung bei der Auslegung des § 823 II BGB”, Jura 1988, 130; Karollus, Funktion, und Dogmatik der Haftung aus Schutzgesetzverletzung (1992); Knöpfle, “Zur Problematik der Beurteilung einer Norm als Schutzgesetz im Sinne des § 823 Abs. 2 BGB”, NJW 1967, 697; Lutter, “Gefahren persönlicher Haftung für Gesellschafter und Geschäftsführer einer GmbH”, DB 1994, 129; Peters, “Zur Gesetzestechnik des § 823 II BGB”, JZ 1983, 913. A list of laws recognised as containing protective norms in the sense of this paragraph can be found in: Palandt, § 823 BGB, no. 145ff. and Münchener Kommentar-Mertens, § 823 BGB, nos. 166ff. They include certain statutory provisions from the area of company law (e.g. § 92 II Aktiengesetz; § 64 I GmbH-Gesetz), § 5 of the Arzneimittelgesetz, many provisions of the Criminal Code (e.g. §§ 142, 185), and so on. More interesting is the classification of these various Schutzgesetze according to their purpose. Thus, according to Professor Medicus these statutes may wish to protect one of three things. First, they may wish to protect the essential legal rights and values (e.g. human freedom, corporeal integrity etc.). Secondly, they may wish to prohibit a dangerous behaviour (e.g. dangerous driving). Finally, they may wish to protect (in a measured way) a person’s “estate” (including his economic interests), which, it will be recalled, are not covered by the first paragraph of § 823 BGB. But liability for violation of a protective norm under § 823 II BGB is not exclusive and may overlap with liability arising from the violation of some other provision of the Code. For example, in the chicken-farm case (case 61) we saw that the manufacturer of the defective vaccine that killed the plaintiff's poultry was in breach of a special statute which was held by the court to be a protective statute in the sense of § 823 II BGB. However, readers will also remember that his liability overlapped with liability based on § 823 I BGB and in fact it was this part of the judgment that made history. Sometimes the overlap may exist with the provisions of some other enactment. As already stated, a breach of the Road Traffic Act (or police regulations made pursuant to it) will often be treated as a breach of a protective norm. In such cases liability for a breach of the Road Traffic Act will co-exist with liability based on § 823 II BGB. Indeed, liability may further be based on § 823 I BGB. § 823 II BGB is thus an additional cause of liability, not a reason for excluding liability that may arise from another legal source.

This overlap, however, does not mean that the requirements of liability are the same in all these cases. As we have already noted, liability under the Road Traffic Act does not depend on fault. On the other hand, liability under § 823 I and II BGB is fault-based liability. The second sentence of § 823 II BGB makes this abundantly clear by stating that where breach of a particular statute can engage liability irrespective of fault—something which often happens these days—additional civil liability under § 823 II BGB will be imposed only if some fault can be found in the wrongdoer. In this instance, however, the case law has reversed the onus of proof and placed it squarely on the defendant. (Esser/Weyers, II 2, p. 201.) So fault will be presumed unless the defendant can positively disprove any fault on his part (BGHZ 51, 91; BGH NJW 1968, 1279). In this sense, therefore, § 823 II BGB is more favourable to the plaintiff. But, as stated, it is also more favourable in another respect as well, notably in its recognition of the compensability of purely economic loss. This explains why the plaintiffs in the cable cases, reviewed earlier on (cases 11–13), tried to base their claims on § 823 II BGB. These observations, however, should not be taken to imply that plaintiffs can, as a matter of course, base their claims on this paragraph of the BGB every time there has been a violation of some statute. The requirement that the violated statute is a protective norm provides the greatest obstacle and the most interesting condition of this provision of the Code. It is to this, therefore, that we must now turn our attention.

Now the first thing to note in this respect is that the German legislator expressly states that, subject to what is said below, the breach of a particular statute will always give rise to a civil remedy. By so doing he has successfully avoided one of the problems that has literally plagued the English (and American) courts and forced them to search for the real or imaginary intention of the legislator on this matter. (See in this respect Lord Denning's remarks in Ex. p. Island Records Ltd [1978] Ch. 122, 135A.) But the civil remedy will be granted only if the violated norm was a protective statute. This means that the plaintiff must show that the mischief that occurred was in fact the one that the legislator wished to avoid. Moreover, he must show that he himself belongs to the class of persons to which the legislator intended to grant a civil remedy. Both of these propositions are quite simple to state; and they contain nothing that will surprise a Common lawyer. But the answer to these questions is by no means easy to find; it invariably involves difficult questions of statutory construction, which varies from case to case and in practice it has given rise to a very rich case law. The detailed study of this case-law presents little interest to any course of lectures or book that aims at introducing students to the study of foreign or comparative law so we shall limit ourselves to a few illustrations. (For further details see Peters, “Zur Gesetzestechnik des § 823 II BGB”, JZ 1983, 913.)

When looking at these cases, the first thing one can note is the fact that a statute meant to protect the public at large does not necessarily mean that it was not also intended to include within its protective ambit a particular (legal or physical) person. For example, during the First World War the German Government imposed stringent regulations concerning meat imports. Powers to control such imports, regulate their qualities and internal distribution (in order to avoid food shortages), and if necessary to confiscate illegally imported consignments of meat, were vested in a state-owned Central Purchasing Corporation. On one occasion one of the Corporation’s employees, working near the Netherlands border, wrongfully authorised the import of an excessive quantity of meat which reached an accomplice of his and was subsequently sold to their mutual gain. The Corporation’s action for damages against both these persons was successfully based on § 823 II BGB in conjunction with the relevant government order that had created the Corporation and vested in it the powers described above (RGZ 100, 142, 146. See, also, BGHZ 46, 23). As the court said, the fact that the order creating the Corporation was issued for the protection of the common well did not prevent it from conferring a special right of action on the Corporation in accordance with § 823 II BGB. It would be wrong, however, to argue the reverse and say that all statutes passed in the interest of the public at large also automatically conferred rights on its individual members. This point was made very clear in one of the cable cases—and which need not be repeated here.

The question whether the particular plaintiff is included in the protective ambit of the violated statute naturally turns on the wording and the often elusive intention of the legislator. The search for this can be aided by consulting the travaux préparatoires. If these are ambiguous, and often they are, then “the question must be attacked directly, whether the creation of an individual claim for compensation appears meaningful, sensible, and tolerable in the light of the whole system of liability” (BGHZ 66, 388; see, also, BGH NJW 1980, 1792). Three cases, reproduced below (cases 129–141) provide interesting illustration of how the above guiding principles are applied in practice.

In the first case (BGHZ 26, 42), the defendant was granted under statutory powers a licence to operate a bus service, but was prohibited from operating on a regular line between points A and B. Despite this express prohibition, he did operate that line and was sued by the Federal Railways. One of the questions before the court was whether the Federal Railways could base their claim under § 823 II BGB and the violation of the Act on Carriage of Persons on Land under which the original licence had been granted. The main question was connected with the proper construction of the law subjecting land transport to State licensing and regulation. In the court’s view this was meant to protect the interests of the general public in the establishment of an orderly transport system which has always occupied a special position in the country’s transport policy. The action by the Railways was thus accepted.

In case 130 (BGHZ 15, 315), an association was formed in order to protect the interests of tenants of leased premises. Among the services that the association provided for its members was the availability of legal advice on legal points and this was done in consideration of a fee which was fixed in accordance with the professional fee-scales applicable to the members of the Bar. The plaintiffs, another association formed to protect the economic and professional interests of the members of the Hamburg Bar, applied for an injunction requesting that the defendant tenants’ association cease to provide legal counselling services. Once again, the outcome depended on discovering the purpose of the relevant statute concerning the provision of legal services by qualified members of the Bar. The court took the view that this had a double purpose. The first was to ensure that the public received proper counselling from a well-qualified and disciplined body of professionals. The second was to protect the interests of the Bar against competition coming from persons or bodies who were not subject to the same disciplinary and other restrictions as were professionally qualified lawyers. The claim that the association of tenants could not charge full fees was accepted, though the court also took the view that a more modest charge could be made simply in order to cover the association's expenses.

BGHZ 29, 100 (case 131) is our last example. In that case the plaintiff, an unsecured creditor of a company in liquidation, sued one of its directors alleging that in breach of statutory duty (§ 64 of the Companies Act) he had failed to commence liquidation proceedings at a given date. As a result of this inaction, the plaintiff had suffered financial loss by advancing credit to the company. The defendant's argument, that the obligation to commence liquidation proceedings on time was solely meant to safeguard the public interest, was not accepted. The court took the view that the purpose of this enactment was also to safeguard the position of creditors of the company against precisely this type of risk. Moreover, this was true even for those creditors who had advanced credit after the date when the liquidation proceedings ought to have been commenced. (See, further, Medicus no. 622 giving further references. See, also, the more recent decision BGHZ 100, 19.)

It is not enough for the plaintiff to prove that he belongs to the class of persons that the violated statute wished to protect; he must also show that the mischief that has occurred was the one that the statute wanted to avoid. Only if both these points are proved will the plaintiff be able to base his claim on § 823 II BGB.

The liquidation case, mentioned in the previous paragraph, provides an illustration for this point as well. Another and arguably better example can be found in one of the cases discussed earlier under the heading of manufacturers' liability (BGHZ 39, 358, case 74). It will be remembered that in that case a local authority was being sued because cracks appeared in a building, the foundations of which had not been properly inspected. No personal injury or damage to other property was pleaded and the claim was rejected. For the court took the view that the purpose of the statute imposing upon local authorities an obligation to inspect foundations was to prevent injury to human beings and damage to other property but not to safeguard potential buyers against the risk of paying an excessive price for a worthless building. (For another illustration see BGHZ 66, 388, BGHZ 19, 114, 125 and cases 12, BGHZ 66, 388, and 123, BGHZ 19, 114, respectively. See, also, Deutsch, JZ 1984, 308, 311–12 and JZ 1990, 733.)

(b) § 826 BGB

Select bibliography

Braun, Rechtskraft und Restitution. Erster Teil. Der Rechtsbehelf gem. § 826 BGB gegen rechtskräftige Urteile (1979); Kohte, "Rechtsschutz gegen die Vollstreckung des wucherähnlichen Rechtsgeschäfts nach § 826", NJW 1985, 2217; Koller, "Sittenwidrigkeit der Gläubigergefährdung und Gläubigerbenachteiligung", JZ 1985, 1013; Larenz, "Grundsätzliches zu § 138 BGB", Juristenjahrbuch 7 (1966/7) 98; Prinz/Wanckel, "Vorsätzliche sittenwidrige Schädigung einer Privatbank durch unwahre Presseberichterstattung", EWiR 1998, 171; Prütting-Werth, Rechtskraftdurchbrechung bei unrichtigen Titeln, 2nd edn. (1994); Sack, "Das Anstandsgefühl aller billig und gerecht Denkenden und die Moral als Bestimmungsfaktoren der guten Sitten", NJW 1985, 761; Simitis, Gute Sitten und ordre public. Ein kritischer Beitrag zur Anwendung des § 138 I BGB (1960); Teubner, Standards und Direktiven in Generalklauseln, Möglichkeiten und Grenzen der empirischen Sozialforschung bei der Präzisierung der Gute-Sitten-Klauseln im Privatrecht (1971); Wieacker, "Rechtsprechung und Sittengesetz", JZ 1961, 337; Wolf, "Der Ersatzberechtigte bei Tatbeständen sittenwidriger Schädigung", NJW 1967, 709.

This is the third and last general provision of the Code and was, in fact, intended from the outset as an all-purpose residual provision, able to accommodate future expansion in the growth of the law of torts. In the event, however, the limitations built into this provision did not facilitate such growth. The result was that some of the most significant extensions of tort liability have been achieved either through § 823 I BGB, or the expansion of the law of contract into what otherwise would properly be described as the province of the law of torts.

§ 826 BGB is subjectively the narrowest of the three general provisions, since it will be satisfied only if intention can be shown to exist. For present purposes, mere negligence is thus not an acceptable mens rea. Intention is taken to include dolus directus and dolus eventualis. An example of the first can be found whenever the defendant knows the consequences of his conduct and wishes to bring them about; an illustration of the latter can be seen in those cases where the defendant is aware of the consequences of his conduct which he accepts as inevitable even though he may not specifically desire them. What must be intended is the damage in suit, though its full extent and the precise way it is brought about need not have been specifically anticipated.

Though subjectively narrow § 826 BGB is objectively wide—in fact the most general, indeed amorphous provision of the Code. In this instance the pervading notion of unlawfulness is not determined by reference to the violation of a carefully enumerated list of protected interests; nor is it linked with breaches of statutory provisions to be found outside the Code. Here, the determination of the element of unlawfulness is left to the judge to decide by reference to the flexible notion of boni mores. Though as we shall see this does not mean that the outcome depends on the personal views and predilections of the judge, in practice this formula does confer wide praetorian powers.

It will have become obvious from the above that intentionally inflicted loss will not, of itself, bring § 826 BGB into operation. Economic competition—the basis of all modern free economies—often means that the economic ruin of one person is the price of success for the competitor. Though nowadays there is an increasing tendency to limit some of the excesses of capitalism, the fact remains that in all systems intentionally causing economic loss to another person will not alone suffice to create tortious liability. Thus, just as English law imposes the additional requirement that the loss be inflicted "unlawfully", so does German law require that the activity be intentional and contra bonos mores. This, then, becomes the crucial notion of this paragraph: crucial and, one should also add, elusive.

The difficulty of definition lies largely in the fact that because of historical reasons, German law chose to cover a multitude of wrongs under one broad and abstract formula instead of treating each factual situation as giving rise to different torts and requiring its own concepts and definitions. To put it differently, this separate pigeonhole approach which can be found in England did not commend itself to the Germans. Thus deceit, passing off, intimidation, procuring a breach of contract, unfair competition, malicious prosecution, etc., which are all actionable as separate torts in the Common law, in German law are brought under one heading. Clearly, these wrongs are so disparate that if one formula is to cover them all it has to be a very wide one. This, as stated, accounts for the different approach and, indeed, has encouraged the abstract if not philosophical writings on the subject. But whatever the merits or demerits of this different approach—and one is inclined to think that in this instance the English casuistry has its advantages—the problems (and often the solutions) are quite similar in both systems. But to return to the basic notion: when is an activity contra bonos mores?

Apart from a brief interlude during the Nazi period, when this provision of the Code (as so many others) was subverted to the cause of National Socialism (cf. RGZ 150, 1, 4), good morals have received a fairly constant definition. Thus “the sense of propriety of all good and right-thinking members of society” (BGHZ 17, 327, 332) has often been quoted as the yardstick to be used in these cases. This is a flexible test, capable of accommodating change, and particularly useful in the context of problem situations which arise within the context of family life (e.g. RGZ 58, 248; BGH NJW 1962, 958). But in a modern pluralistic and less homogeneous society, is it always possible to discover a prevailing morality? Or is it practicable to introduce “moral” considerations in the most typically litigated disputes involving some kind of excessive or improper competition? Should the actual practice of businessmen be used as the model instead? Or should the standard be derived not from extra-legal rules of morality but from the various rules of the positive legal system, including the Constitution itself? The idea that good morals is a notion much more akin to the English concept of public policy or the French ordre public has gained support, and in turn, become the target for criticism. It is difficult—especially for a Common lawyer looking at the German law—to say which of the many theories best explains the case law. It is safer to assert with some measure of confidence that (i) the notion of boni mores has undergone some change since the War and, perhaps, (ii) that no one theory can be said to be able to cover the whole spectrum of disparate cases. To use Dean Prosser’s description of the tort of nuisance, this is not a tort but a field of tortious liability. Perhaps, therefore, the best one can do is to give a series of examples from actually litigated cases and thus demonstrate to the Common law student the amplitude of this provision. For convenience’s sake these illustrations are grouped under four headings. (For a comprehensive account of this very rich jurisprudence Staudinger-Oechsler, 13th edn. (1998), § 826 BGB, nos. 145–562.)

(i) Misstatements

1. If a person gives in good faith false information and then subsequently becomes aware of its falsity he may, under certain circumstances, be under a duty to correct it and if he does not do so he will be liable under § 826 BGB (RGZ 76, 318; BGH JZ 1979, 725).
2. If the directors of a company produce what to their knowledge is a false balance sheet in order to attract a potential investor they will be liable under the same paragraph (RG JZ 1908, 448).
3. If an employer intentionally gives to a third party an untrue reference about one of his employees he may be liable to the third party for the loss resulting therefrom (RG DJZ 1905, 697; see also BGH NJW 1970, 2291; BGHZ 74, 281).
4. If a person gives recklessly false information about the credit of a third person he may be liable to the recipient of this information under § 826 BGB (BGH WM 1956, 1229; BGH WM 1979, 428).

5. Failure to disclose relevant information in the course of a business transaction may be actionable under § 826 BGB, especially where the defendant's conduct constitutes an abuse of his dominant economic position. (BGH NJW 1982, 2815.)
6. If a person recklessly issues fictitious receipts and collusively collaborates with the employee of the victim he may be liable to the recipient of the receipt under § 826 BGB (BGH NJW 2000, 2896).
7. For other decisions under this broad heading see: BGH NJW 1983, 1850; BGH WM 1984, 221; BGH NJW 1992, 3167.

(ii) Obtaining a judicial decision by fraud etc

1. If a person perjures himself and thereby causes another to be condemned to pay a debt which that other has in fact already discharged, he will be liable to that person for the loss suffered thereby (RGZ 46, 75).
2. A person who obtains a divorce by fraud can be liable under this paragraph (RGZ 75, 213).
3. A person who executes a judgment which he knows to be wrong can be liable under § 826 BGB, though this heading and the conditions that have to be satisfied, are controversial (BGHZ 50, 115; BGHZ 101, 380; BGHZ 26, 391; BGHZ 112, 54).

(iii) Inducing breach of contract and other trade disputes

Liability under § 826 BGB may be incurred in the following situations:

1. Intimidation of employers by trade unions not to employ non-union members (RGZ 104, 327).
2. Boycott (under certain circumstances) (RGZ 60, 94, 104; 64, 57, 61; 66, 379, 384; 76, 35; 86, 152; 105, 70; BGHZ 19, 72; BGH NJW 1985, 60, 62).
3. Inducing breach of contract (RG JW 1913, 866; RGZ 78, 14, 17; RG JW 1913, 326; BGH NJW 1981, 2184; BGH NJW 1994, 128; BGH JZ 1996, 416). Mere "co-operation" in the breach of a contract with a third party will not suffice (BGH NJW 1969, 1293 ff.). In reaching a decision all the surrounding circumstances must be considered. (BGH NJW 1981, 2184.)
4. Under certain circumstances, strikes can also be caught by this provision (RGZ 130, 98).
5. A person who induces a vendor of sold but undelivered goods to hand them over to him (rather than to their purchaser) (RG JW 1931, 2238; BGHZ 70, 277).
6. Disclosing confidential information acquired during previous employment may be actionable in contract (§ 74 HGB and § 242 BGB) as well as being actionable under § 826 BGB (BAG NJW 1983, 135). BGH NJW 1981, 1089 ("Wallraff-Fall") is particularly noteworthy not only because of the public interest it attracted, but also because it discussed the position of § 826 BGB within the context of the wider constitutional order. In that case Wallraff—the second defendant—wrote a book, which was to be published by the first defendant, and in which he described how a well-known Hanover newspaper was run. This information he had acquired while working under a false name for the editor of this newspaper. The latter's action—based inter alia on § 826 BGB—to prevent the publication of the said account was dismissed on the grounds that § 826 BGB in this instance had to give way to the constitutionally protected freedom of expression (Meinungsfreiheit) (Art. 5 I of the Constitution of Bonn). See BVerfG NJW 1984, 1741.

(iv) Miscellaneous matters

1. Malicious falsehood (RGZ 76, 110).
2. Abuse of rights (BGHZ 26, 391, 396).
3. Passing off (RGZ 144, 41, 45).
4. Malicious prosecution (BGHZ 17, 327; BGH NJW 1951, 597).
5. Wrongful use of monopoly power (RGZ 132, 273; cf. BGH MDR 1980, 121).
6. Other underhand activities (OLG Celle NJW 1983, 1065; BGH WM 1984, 850 (touting)).
7. Rejected applications to join business or social “societies” or “clubs” can also under certain circumstances found actions on § 826 BGB (BGHZ 29, 344ff.; BGH NJW 1969, 316ff.; BGH NJW 1980, 186; BGHZ 93, 151).

2. OTHER HEADINGS OF TORTIOUS LIABILITY

(a) Some specific torts of the BGB

§ 824 BGB imposes civil liability for oral or written statements which are likely to endanger the credit of another person or otherwise damage his earnings or prosperity. Liability under this heading may overlap with the crime of insult or defamation (§§ 185, 186 StGB) and the civil consequences envisaged by the treatment of these provisions as protective statutes within the context of § 823 II BGB. But § 824 BGB is also wider in so far as it covers (i) intentional and negligent activities and (ii) statements which may endanger a person's credit or economic interests, even if they do not actually affect his reputation.

The statement must refer to an identified or identifiable plaintiff and not merely a wider class to which he belongs. Moreover, § 824 BGB refers to statements of facts and not expressions of opinion or other value judgements. (See BGH NJW 1987, 2225.) The truth of the asserted fact will, normally, provide a full defence. If the facts are untrue—and the burden of proving their inaccuracy lies on the plaintiff—the maker of the statement may still avoid liability if he or the receiver of the communication had a lawful interest in it. But this privilege only applies if the maker of the statement did not know that his statement was incorrect. The defence of “justified interest”, as this defence is called, will be upheld only where an “objective assessment of the contents of the communication, its form and all the surrounding circumstances suggest that it is the appropriate and necessary means for achieving a legally acceptable objective” (BGHZ 3, 281). If the elements of liability are satisfied, the plaintiff will, normally, be entitled to demand the retraction of the statement and compensation for costs reasonably incurred in order to mitigate his loss (§ 249 BGB). In some (but not all) of these cases the courts have also allowed the plaintiff the costs of inserting a “correcting statement” in the national press (see on this BGHZ 66, 182, 191 ff.).

§ 825 BGB contains the elements of another specific tort: the unlawful inducement of a woman to extra-marital cohabitation. The gist of the tort lies in the unlawful means used to coerce the woman’s will: cunning, threats etc. Compensation for this tort will include economic loss (e.g. medical expenses incurred for curing a sexually transmitted disease; miscarriage or costs of giving birth to a child) as well as appropriate damages for pain and suffering and impairment of the victim’s reputation (§ 847 BGB). The antiquated nature of the tort and the emergence of the new and wider right to one’s personality have rendered this provision almost entirely obsolete in practice. However, the reform proposal already referred to, suggests that the provision should be extended to males. This seems odd since the Proposal also acknowledges that § 825 BGB has no importance in practice for the reasons mentioned above. Thus retaining the provision must be seen as merely symbolic act of little practical value.

(b) Liability under § 839 BGB

Paragraph 839 BGB—dealing with liability for breach of official duty—is one of the most important “special” provisions of the tort section of the Code and has given rise to a rich case law. Before analysing the elements of liability, three preliminary observations should be made. (For more detailed discussions see Esser/Weyers, II 2, § 59 I, p. 220).

First, one must note that this paragraph provides for the personal liability of the official. In most cases, however, the victim/plaintiff will be anxious to engage the liability of the State (or other local authority or agency). When and how this can be done depends on the nature of the act of the official.

This brings us to the second preliminary observation. The official may be exercising a “sovereign act” or he may be pursuing ordinary, private law activities on the part of the State. The distinction between acts iure imperii and gestionis, never entirely satisfactory, has become more difficult in recent time as the modern State has entered the market place. Nevertheless, as we shall note further on, the distinction is of great significance in the context of § 839 BGB.

Finally, one must always remember that § 839 BGB is a specific enactment and as such overrides the provisions of the other more general clauses of the Code (BGHZ 3, 94, 102; BGH NJW 1971, 43, 44). This is important to bear in mind since often the same act (by the official) can be brought under §§ 839, 823 I or II, or 824 BGB. Where this is the case, § 839 BGB will prevail and this may have serious repercussions on the position of the plaintiff given the various restrictions of liability provided in § 839 BGB. In this sense, therefore, § 839 BGB represents a narrowing of liability. On the other hand, the paragraph is also wider than some of the other general clauses (e.g. § 823 I BGB) in so far as it imposes liability for any damage arising from the unlawful conduct of the official. This means that under this heading even claims for negligently inflicted purely economic loss may succeed.

In German law, tort liability of public bodies is widely discussed. Reform has been considered for over twenty years. Its unquestioned aim is a modern, unified responsibility for wrongs committed by public bodies—mostly, but not entirely, independent of fault, and based on statute. At present, however, most of the law is judge-made; it is secreted in many different kinds of causes of action, and it is not always clear. In this book, however, we will concentrate solely on those situations where damages are sought for breach of an official duty (Amtspflichtverletzung)—comparable to the factual situations found in many English cases. In this section we will be dealing only with the liability of public bodies and not with the liability of their employees. The latter will result from BGB § 839 only if there is no liability of the public body according to the combined application of Article 34 of the Constitution and BGB § 839 and only if the employee has the status of a civil servant (Beamter). Other employees will be liable in accordance with BGB, §§ 823 et seq. where no state liability is envisaged.

This liability of public bodies flows from the combined application of Article 34 of the Constitution and § 839 of the BGB. This means that public bodies are liable in damages to individuals injured by their own (or their employees') culpable failure to perform properly any official duty owed to the individual. Liability is excluded where, first, the breach of a duty is due to a negligent act only and the individual injured can obtain redress from another source (§ 839 I 2 BGB). Secondly, liability is also excluded where the victim did not make use of any legal remedy which could have mitigated his damages (§ 839 III BGB). Finally, the same is true where a statute expressly provides for such an eventuality. (For example, BNotO (Bundesnotarordnung, which is the Federal Law on Notaries), § 19, which provides for the personal liability of the notary public; RBHaftG Reichsbeamtenhaftungsgesetz (Law on Liability of Civil Servants), § 5 No. 2, which excludes liability for certain political acts in the diplomatic service; for further discussion especially on the constitutionality of such restrictions on state liability, see Ossenbühl, Staatshaftungsrecht 5th edn., 1996, 79 et seq.) Here, it will suffice to draw the reader's attention to two elements of the cause of action: "fault" and the fact that "the duty must be owed to the individual plaintiff" and not the public at large.

The requirement of culpability has to be seen against the code's historical background: § 839 BGB was designed originally to cater solely for the liability of a public official himself. The old (Roman law) principle—si excessit, privatus est—known also in English law, along with disputes over the legislative competence for state liability rules, induced the draftsmen of the civil code to refrain from any rule on public liability (leaving this issue to the member states), although not from rules on liability of public bodies acting fiscally (see §§ 89, 31 BGB). (For further details, see Entwurf eines Einführungsgesetzes zum BGB für das Deutsche Reich, 1. Lesung nebst Motiven, (1888), 185.) The central idea (first introduced to the whole of Germany by the Beamtenhaftungsgesetz of 1 August 1909 (GS 691) and, subsequently, acknowledged in Article 131 of the Weimar Constitution 1919) was that such an official should bear liability in damages only where he is at fault. Individual responsibility is of less significance where the state takes over liability. In the current debates, over reforms, German writers remain convinced that the fault requirement should be loosened, but there is considerable disagreement as to the extent that this should happen. (Cf. Pfab, Staatshaftung in Deutschland (1997), passim.) These debates should not, however, conceal the fact that the concept of fault in German civil law (in contrast to the concept of fault in criminal law) is already understood in a very broad way. So, as in English law, the standard of care in cases of negligence is an objective one, concentrating on the reasonable person in general and—with regard to particular groups or professions—on the special high standard of care one can expect from such particular group or profession. In practice, the test thus often comes close to the notion of strict liability; and it has been demonstrated that in most litigation concerning breach of official duty the issue of fault is rarely an obstacle for plaintiffs. Zur Reform des Staatshaftungsrechts, rechtstatsächliche Erkenntnisse in Staatshaftungssachen, Verwaltungserhebung und Gerichtsauswertung (1976), edited by the Bundesministerium der Justiz, 34, 202—only 14.1 per cent of the claims failed because of the absence of fault.

Secondly, discretionary acts of public bodies (or their employees) are, in Germany, subject to judicial review to a far greater extent than in English law. Thus, a German judge may rule on and find fault even where the official acted within the ambit of his discretion (as will be shown in detail below). The discretionary character of an act is not in principle, therefore, a bar to justiciability; nor does it hinder the proof of careless decision taking within the ambit of the discretion. The test applied by German courts is much wider than the Wednesbury (Associated Provincial Picture Houses v. Wednesbury Corporation [1948] 1 KB 223, CA) test of reasonableness that prevails in English law.

If the requirement of fault is no real obstacle to state liability the same is not true of the second element, namely “that the duty must be owed to the individual to protect his interests”. This serves as an effective filter to remove from all public wrongs those cases where the state itself might be liable in damages. The duty must not exist solely for the benefit of the general public, but must at least also protect the individual or a class to which the individual/plaintiff belongs. The claimant must thus be such a protected individual or a member of a protected group, and the duty must exist to protect especially those interests of the individual that have been injured. The parallels here with the English requirements of liability for breach of statutory duty are evident. Nevertheless, one must remain conscious of the dangers that would accompany any complete assimilation. Although there are many decisions on this issue leading to some uncertainty over the exact application of this requirement in given cases, the approach of German law seems to be stricter than that found in English cases. Thus, where it is open for policy considerations to play a part in the outcome of a dispute, they tend to focus on the relevance and meaning of the official duty. (Münchener-Kommentar, Papier, (3rd edn., 1997) § 839, no. 227; for proposals to streamline the discussion, see: Ladeur, “Zur Bestimmung des drittschützenden Charakters von Amtspflichten im Sinne von § 839 BGB und Art. 34 GG—insbesondere bei Aufsichtspflichten”, DÖV 1994, 665.) By contrast, less attention is paid to the wider (open ended?) considerations of justice, fairness and economic efficiency which one finds in English decisions. One, therefore, starts with the premise that fairness and justice require the state to be held liable to the individual for public wrong, except where the official duty is owed only to the public at large. Although the element of “duty towards the individual” (drittbezogene Amtspflicht) is phrased as a requirement and not only in a negative form as an obstacle to the claim, the relation of rule and exception in English and German law seems in many instances to be the reverse. This is obvious in the decision of the Federal Court of Justice with regard to the banking control system, where the court inferred from the silence of the statutory rule that the duty was owed towards the individual. (BGH 15 February 1979, BGHZ 74, 144, 147 = NJW 1979, 1354; BGH 12 July 1979, BGHZ 75, 120, 122 = NJW 1979, 1879. For doubts on the constitutionality of the amendments of the statute (Kreditwesengesetz, as amended on 20 December 1984), Münchener-Kommentar, Papier (3rd edn., 1997), § 839, no. 250, 251.) This may be further illustrated by contrasting the indicators of such a “duty towards the individual” with the requirements of state liability in English law laid down by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in the Bedfordshire case.

It is well established that there is a “duty towards the individual” when the (particular) individual has a right to claim performance of that duty (öffentlich-rechtlicher Erfüllungsanspruch). Claim of and duty towards the individual are two sides of the same coin. For example, an applicant may claim the issue of a building permission where he has complied with certain requirements. If the permission is not issued, or is issued too late, or is (illegally) made subject to a supplementary condition, a private law cause of action will arise. (BGH 14 December 1978, NJW 1979, 641, 642; BGH 10 March 1994, NJW 1994, 1647; BGH 13 July 1989, NJW 1990, 505 (marriage officer arriving too late in the hospital for the marriage ceremony, the fiancée having died already); compare also BGH 6 May 1993, NJW 1993, 2303, 2304; BGH 24 February 1994, NJW 1994, 2091; Münchener-Kommentar, Papier, § 839 no. 228; Wurm, JA 1992, 1, 2.) Of course, these situations are less problematic and do not arise frequently in practice because the individual may usually, launch an appeal against the decision and thereby obtain what he or she is entitled to claim. Although not identical, this class of case comes close to those situations in English law where Lord Browne-Wilkinson referred to breaches of statutory duty simpliciter. (X (Minors) v. Bedfordshire C. C. [1995] 3 WLR 165, 166).

Another instance giving rise to a duty towards an individual is where the public body and the individual have entered into a special relationship. The duties of protection and care arising from such relationship are owed to the individual and also to third parties included in the realm of protection (Schutzwirkung zugunsten Dritter). See for instance: BGH of 20 June 1974, NJW 1974, 1816, 1817—a slaughterhouse owed a duty towards the employee of the butcher, who had to use the slaughterhouse; this notion of third party protection is known not only in tort law but especially in contract law, where contractual duties may involve the protection of persons close to the parties. Another example can be taken from the education context. A school owes a special duty of care towards its pupils. (BGH 27 April 1981, NJW 1982, 37, 38; BGH 10 March 1983, FamRZ 1984, 1211 (both concerning the negligent control of a school bus stop).) In most cases there will be no liability of the school and its responsible body because damage will be covered by statutory insurance against school accidents. This exception will not apply, however, when violations of the right of personality (Persönlichkeitsrechtsverletzungen) are at issue and money compensation for pain and suffering is sought: OLG Zweibrücken 6 May 1997, NJW 1998, 995: the responsible body had to pay DM 1,600 to a pupil who had consistently been made fun of by his teacher in front of the class causing the pupil great psychological harm. In addition, a school has the duty to prevent pupils from causing harm to others. Thus, if a pupil damages the car of X during a school excursion, the responsible body may be liable towards the car owner. (LG Hamburg 26 April 1991, NJW 1992, 377; in that case a cause of action against the pupil himself would have been unsuccessful due primarily to his lack of means.) It is tempting here to draw parallels with the Dorset Yacht case, although one might also be inclined to compare this element of the “duty towards the individual” with the requirement of proximity found in the Caparo test. (Caparo Industries Plc. v. Dickman [1990] 2 AC 605.) There are also differences, however, insofar as, in general, the required proximity need not exist between the tortfeasor and the injured person but between the injured person and the person protected by a special relationship with the tortfeasor. In addition, this duty has been extended—in contrast to contract law—towards those individuals who come into contact with the person protected: the duty of the public body encompasses the duty to prevent harm from the entrusted person as well as to prevent that person from doing harm to others. Thus, the scope of the duty is much broader than the duty of care considered in the Dorset Yacht case.

A “duty towards the individual” will also arise where the public body directly infringes absolute rights of an individual, namely his life, body, health, freedom, property (and other rights or interests of comparable weight, for example the right of personality), but not his purely economic interests (BGH 1 February 1982, NJW 1983, 627, 628; Münchener-Kommentar, Papier, § 839, no. 229.)

If none of these indicators are present, a “duty towards the individual” may arise from the protective purpose of the rule (Schutzzweck der Norm);—the rule which imposes a certain duty on the public body—must have been created, inter alia to prevent the mischief that occurred. But this need not necessarily follow from the express intention of the legislator. It suffices that such protection for the individual arises from the nature of public dealings and the circumstances of such dealings, even if the rule has been laid down primarily for the protection of the public in general. One indicator of the protective purpose of the duty is the availability of a public law remedy for an injured person; another indicator is the special danger for the life and health of an individual resulting from these dealings. If public dealings create a special situation where an individual can rely on the duty of care owed to him by a public body, this indicates that duties arising from public dealings also have the purpose of protecting individuals. But the extent of the protective purpose may be limited to certain goods, especially to absolute rights and interests. This is especially the case with regard to the duty to ensure safe traffic on the roads (Straßenverkehrssicherungspflicht). This exists towards every individual road-user, (the German cases differ considerably from the English cases, as exemplified by Ancell v. McDermott [1993] 4 All ER 355) but only with regard to life, body, health, liberty, property and other rights and interests of comparable weight. Generally speaking, the duty does not extend to protection against economic loss (BGH 18 December 1972, NJW 1973, 463.) Thus, if traffic lights are installed wrongly and, as a result, an accident occurs which causes injury to individuals and damage to property, the public authority will be liable for all these damages. However if, due to the wrong installation of traffic lights traffic congestion occurs, no liability will arise towards individuals who suffered economic loss because they were caught in the resulting traffic jam were caught in the resulting traffic jam. An interesting example is BGH 26 January 1989, BGHZ 106, 323 = NJW 1989, 976 (Altlasten, i.e., planning by local authorities on polluted soil). The protective scope of the duty owed by the local planning authority was geared towards the protection of the health of those who would be living in the respective area. However, it was not regarded as necessary for the liability under § 839 BGB to arise that the inhabitants actually suffered physical damage. The purchasers of the uninhabitable land could recover their purely economic loss. (Contrast case 74, and see, also, notes to cases 68–75, note no. 1, above.)

If there is a duty towards the (respective) individual, and the protected rights and interests of the individual have been injured, there will be no further room for policy arguments and the state will be held liable—provided, of course, that the other requirements mentioned above are fulfilled. No duty towards the individual, however, exists with respect to legislative acts, such as the failure to provide necessary laws or the violation of individual rights by virtue of unjust or improper laws. Legislative acts—in comparison to specific acts towards individuals or groups of persons—are owed only to the public in general and, thus, cannot constitute a duty towards an individual or a violation of an individual's rights, unless specified by administrative or judicial acts. Other principles, however, apply with regard to “legislative wrongs” under European law; see Joined Cases C-6 and 9/90 Francovich v. Italy [1991] ECR I-5357.

At the beginning of this section we alluded to the distinction between acts of government and acts of ordinary (commercial) administration. The preceding paragraphs have focused on the state's liability for the first kind of act. We now conclude with some observations about the second.

It is important to note that the liability of the Federal Government (State or other public body) is not limited to the acts of State officials (as the term is defined in administrative law) but can include the conduct of any other person. This includes a private enterprise or private individual, so long as they are performing acts which fall within the realm of “sovereign” activities of the State. The position is different when officials (in the public sense) breach official duties while pursuing the private law interests or obligations of the State. For such acts the State can only be liable, either under § 31 BGB (acts of a constitutionally appointed representative) or under the rules of vicarious liability of § 831 BGB, both of which have been discussed in chapter 3. Whether and how the liability of the State can be engaged will thus depend on how the activity will be characterised. Since the distinction between sovereign and private law acts is not clear, a rich case law has, inevitably, developed in this area. Thus, some activities (e.g. running the police, the post office, etc.) are described as sovereign acts attracting the direct liability of the State under Article 34 of the Constitution, while others (e.g. running the Federal Railways system (but excluding the activities of the railway police), the maintenance of public buildings, operation of State hospitals, etc.) are treated as private law acts leading first and foremost to the liability of the official under § 839 and, possibly, the State under §§ 31 or 831 of the BGB.

Before we conclude it is worth pausing briefly over a reform proposal in the context of state liability that may have wider implications in the context of expert liability. It will be remembered that if an expert makes a false statement to a third party and causes pure economic loss to that party the expert can be held liable by a German court provided he owed a contractual duty to the third party. It is interesting to note that the recent reform proposal makes a first inroad into this contractual approach to negligent misstatements. The draft § 839a BGB (reproduced above, p. 21) establishes the expert’s liability in tort for negligently prepared reports prepared for a court whilst appointed by it to act as expert. The courts had refused to regard the forensic expert’s employment by them as acquiring protective effects towards the actual parties of the proceedings. As a result, at present, the expert is liable only under § 823 II BGB in connection with the criminal provisions that prohibit false statements under oath, § 154 StGB (and § 826 BGB). See for details: Staudinger-Oechsler, 13th edn. (1998), § 826 BGB, no. 223. The reform seeks inter alia to close this liability gap which arises if and when the expert does not testify under oath. Three features of the draft provision are noteworthy. First, pure economic loss is recoverable in such actions. Secondly, liability is, however, limited to gross negligence, purportedly, to encourage the expert to write the report without “fear” of becoming liable. The real reason, however, must surely be the wish to dissuade the party that lost the case to attempt to reverse the decision by suing the expert. Finally, generally speaking, the expert does not exercise a “sovereign” act. This means in the context of the proposed new section § 839a BGB that the expert’s liability would not be transferred to public bodies and does not become state liability under Article 34 GG. So in the end we face here a limited and pragmatic exception to § 823 I BGB which imposes liability for negligent misstatements for pure economic loss in tort in an instance where the contractual route that prevails elsewhere was not, or could not be utilised by the courts, thus leaving the parties without protection.

Further reading

The literature on this topic is extensive. The leading treatise is that of Professor Fritz Ossenbühl, Staatshaftungsrecht, currently in its 5th edn. (1998). For a comparative account in English see: Markesinis, Auby, Coester-Waltjen, Deakin, Tortious Liability of Statutory Bodies—A Comparative and Economic Analysis of Five English Cases (1999). On German law see also e.g.: Detterbeck/Windthorst, Staatshaftungsrecht (2000); Ehlers, "Die Weiterentwicklung des Staatshaftungsrechts durch europäisches Gemeinschaftsrecht", JZ 1996, 776; Giesberts, "Amtshaftung für überplante Altlasten auf ehemaligen Industrie-, Gewerbe- und Deponieflächen", DB 1996, 361; Hidien, Die gemeinschaftsrechtliche Staatshaftung der EU-Mitgliedstaaten (1999); Krohn, Enteignung, Entschädigung, Staatshaftung (1993); Mader, "Zur Amtshaftung der Gemeinde für rechtswidrige Beschlüsse des Gemeinderats", BayVBl 1999, 168; Meysen, "Der haftungsrechtliche Besamtenbegriff am Ziel?", JuS 1998, 404; Motsch, "Gedanken zur Staatshaftung aus zivilrechtlicher Sicht", JZ 1986, 1082; Windthorst, "Staatshaftungsrecht", JuS 1995, 791 and JuS 1996, 894.

(c) The remaining provisions of the Code

In an introductory book such as this, the remaining provisions of the Code need not concern us for long. Thus, §§ 827, 828 BGB deal with cases of infliction of damage by persons of diminished responsibility—in the case of the former paragraph because of mental disturbance preventing the free exercise of the will, in the case of the latter paragraph because of youth. Under certain circumstances, no liability will be imposed for harm thus caused, though another person may be made liable for such loss, for example, under § 832 BGB (parents or legal guardians).

§ 828 II BGB stipulates that a person who has completed his seventh but not his eighteenth year is not responsible for any damage which he does to another if, at the time of committing the damaging act, he did not have the understanding necessary for realizing his responsibility. This provision governs also the question of whether the youngster was contributory negligent. But if such a person does realize what he is doing, he may be held liable for the consequences of his behaviour. The imposition of unlimited liability under § 828 II BGB has, in such circumstances, been repeatedly criticised—especially in the context of liability for traffic accidents. (See Bollweg NZV 2000, 185, 186 with references). The main argument for reform stems from the insight that children below that age are typically not capable of coping adequately with the demands of everyday traffic even though they have in principle the understanding for realising the fatal consequences of a traffic accident. For instance, they are less able to estimate distances; infants of that age are impulsive, less concentrated and tend to follow the movement of groups. Thus, imposing unlimited liability may violate the infant's personality rights (Article 2 I and 1 I GG). In a decision of 13 August 1998 the BVerfG (NJW 1998, 3557) expressed doubts as to whether the unlimited liability of infants according to § 828 II BGB was in conformity with the Constitution but entrusted the task of finding a satisfactory solution to the courts. (See Rolfs, JZ 1999, 233 for an overview of how the problem could be solved de lege lata—e.g. by regarding the victim's claim against the minor as being contrary to § 242 BGB "good faith", cf. Canaris, JZ 1987, 993, 1001. An alternative solution would be to restrict the subrogation rights (§ 116 SGB X) of the social security carrier. Under § 76 II Nr. 3 SGB IV such rights may not be enforced if it was not equitable to do so.) However, the details of this development need not detain us here, for the above-mentioned concerns have now been acknowledged in a recent reform proposal which increases the threshold of liability of youngsters for causing traffic accidents to 10 years. (2. Gesetz zur Änderung schadensrechtlicher Vorschriften; a translation of the envisaged changes is provided at pp. 21 and 820.) Alternatively, § 829 BGB may be relied upon in order to make the innocent tortfeasor pay the equally innocent victim equitable compensation. Thus, § 829 BGB becomes a central provision for the liability of infants under the age of ten (as was explained in chapter 3 section A 4, above).

§§ 830 and 840 BGB deal with the important practical problems raised by torts committed by several persons, their liability to the victim and their rights and duties against each other.

The first of these paragraphs deals expressly with the problem of joint tortfeasors. This is the case where the parties commit a breach of a joint duty or act in pursuance of a common design. If this element of common design is satisfied it is irrelevant how significant is the contribution of each party in causal terms. Even mental participation in the form of helping out with the planning of the act or merely providing friendly support will suffice. § 830 II BGB treats instigators and accomplices in the same way.

§ 830 I, second sentence, applies the same rule to a different situation where several persons participate in a course of conduct which, though not unlawful in itself, is potentially dangerous to others. The difference between this and the previous situation lies in the fact that whereas in the former case of joint tortfeasors the loss is caused by several persons acting in consort, in the latter case only one person has caused the loss but it is difficult if not impossible to say which one has done so. (The classic illustration is that of the huntsmen who discharge their guns simultaneously and the pellets from one unidentifiable gun hit an innocent passer-by.) In this case, as well, § 830 BGB adopts the same rule and makes all the participants liable to the victim for the full extent of damage.

The problem of several concurrent tortfeasors (Nebentäterschaft) does not receive express treatment by the Code but in principle there is little doubt as to how it should be dealt with. In the absence of specific proof showing what damage each tortfeasor caused, the courts will apply the rules stated above and hold them all responsible for the full amount.

§ 840 BGB deals with the status of joint debtors and their internal claims for adjustment. Joint debts will arise in many ways: the tortfeasors may be joint tortfeasors, they may be several concurrent tortfeasors, or they may have participated in a dangerous activity as described in the previous paragraph. Alternatively, the joint debt may arise because of a master–servant relationship (§ 831 BGB) or because one debtor is the owner of an animal (§ 833 BGB) that has caused damage and the other is its custodian (§ 834 BGB). The possessor of a building may also be liable along with a former possessor or a constructor (§ 836 BGB) and the owner of a vehicle may be liable under the Road Traffic Act along with the driver who may be liable under § 823 I BGB (though in this case the first debtor's liability will be subject to the statutory maxima provided by the Road Traffic Act). All of these persons will be liable to the victim for the full amount of his loss. As between themselves, § 426 I BGB envisages equal contributions unless otherwise provided. §§ 840 I and II and 841 BGB do, in fact, specify certain exceptions. (The text of these provisions is set out in chapter 1, section 3, above; and for a fuller discussion of these issues the reader must consult more specialised works. Larenz I, § 37, II; II, § 74 gives further references. For interesting causative explanations of these solutions see Honoré in International Encyclopedia of Comparative Law XI, chapter 7 passim. For discussions in German see: Bodewig, "Probleme alternativer Kausalität bei Massenschäden", AcP 185 (1985) 505; Brambring, Mittäter, Nebentäter, Beteiligte und die Verteilung des Schadens bei Mitverschulden des Geschädigten (1973); Brehm, "Zur Haftung bei alternativer Kausalität", JZ 1980, 585; Eberl-Borges, "§ 830 BGB und die Gefährdungshaftung", AcP 196 (1996), 491; Ries, "Zur Haftung des Nebentäters nach § 830 und § 840 BGB", AcP 177 (1977), 543; Weckerle, Die deliktische Verantwortung Mehrerer (1974).)

3. COMPENSATION AND SATISFACTION

Select bibliography

Berger, "Abkehr von der konkreten Schadensberechnung?", VersR 1985, 403; Däubler, "Sachen und Menschen im Schadensrecht", NJW 1999, 1611; Ebel, "Schadensersatz bei Personenschäden (§§ 844–6 BGB)", Jura 1985, 561; Flessner, "Geldersatz für Gebrauchsentgang", JZ 1987, 271; Gro, "Die Entwicklung der höchstrichterlichen Rechtsprechung im Haftungs- und Schadensrecht", VersR 1996, 657; Grunsky, "Neue höchstrichterliche Rechtsprechung zum Schadensersatzrecht", JZ 1986, 170; idem, Aktuelle Probleme zum Begriff des Vermögensschadens (1968); idem, "Neue höchstrichterliche Rechtsprechung zum Schadenersatzrecht", JZ 1983, 372; Lange, Schadensersatz (2nd edn. 1990); E. Lorenz, Immaterieller Schaden und "billige Entschädigung in Geld", Eine Untersuchung auf der Grundlage des § 847 BGB (1981); Lipp, "Der Ausgleich des Integritätsinteresses im KFZ-Schadensrecht", NZV 1996, 7; Looschelders, Die Mitverantwortlichkeit des Geschädigten im Privatrecht (1999); Medicus, "Naturalrestitution und Geldersatz", JuS 1969, 449; idem, "Schadensersatz und Billigkeit", VersR 1981, 593; Mertens, Der Begriff des Vermögensschadens im bürgerlichen Recht (1967); Schiemann, Argumente und Prinzipien bei der Fortbildung des Schadenrechts (1981); Stürner, "Der Erwerbsschaden und seine Ersatzfähigkeit", JZ 1984, 412–16, 461–8; Thüsing, "Das Schadensrecht zwischen Beständigkeit und Wandel", ZRP 2000, 126; Wussow/Küppersbusch, Ersatzansprüche bei Personenschäden (5th edn., 1990). For comparative analysis see Fleming, "Damages or Rent" 19 Univ. of Toronto L. Jour. 295 (1969) and McGregor and Stoll in vol. IX, chs. 9 and 8 respectively of the International Encyclopedia of Comparative Law.

(a) Preliminary observations

The concluding section of this chapter deals with the scope and extent of remedial relief that a victim of a proved tort may claim from his tortfeasor. Clearly, the two main issues that have to be discussed here are compensation for personal injury and for damage to property. For reasons of space, injunctive relief and self-help will not be discussed in this book even though in some cases it may provide the most appropriate remedy as far as a particular plaintiff is concerned. Before this is done, however, it is advisable to make a few preliminary observations.

The first thing to notice is that for the traditional Common law everything that pertained to the notions of damage and damages was within the province of the jury and not the judge. As a result, for much of its history the Common law was weak in the elaboration of legal principles; indeed, at times one could have been forgiven to think that they were non-existent. Interestingly enough the same can still be said of French law which gives great powers to the trier of fact (under the rubric pouvoir souverain du juge), does not oblige him to give reasons for his assessment of the damage award, and gives restricted possibilities to the Cour de Cassation to intervene and correct an award, or establish visible principles of adjudication.

The above statement must now be qualified as far as the English Common law is concerned. The abolition of juries in personal injuries cases may be a comparatively recent phenomenon. (It was decided by the full Court of Appeal in Ward v. James [1966] 1 QB 273; see especially Lord Denning's reasons at 299–300). Remarkably however, in the thirty five years that have elapsed since this important decision was handed down, a clear body of legal principle has emerged, making the comparison with German law easier than it would have been in days gone by. Indeed, in the pages that follow, the presentation of German law has, once again, been accompanied by frequent excursus into English Common law in order to show how a different history and a different methodological approach have, yet again, failed to produce significant differences in outcome. Indeed, in many respects the similarities between the two systems is quite remarkable; and if a contrast is to be drawn it should with the French law which, to English eyes and for the reasons already given, may even appear to be shrouded in mystery. Overall, one must also note that the levels of compensation are quite similar in both England and Germany.

However, we must immediately stress how very different is the methodological approach adopted by the two systems. German law, a creation of the universities and the product of a constant move towards abstraction and systematisation, immediately reveals these features in its law of damages. For it is these characteristics that account for the reduction of the vast English casuistry into a mere handful of Articles: §§ 842–7 BGB dealing with personal injury; §§ 848–51 BGB dealing with damage to property. However, provisions dealing directly or indirectly with compensation can also be found in the various strict liability statutes. Such are, for instances, the rules found in the Strict Liability Act §§ 5–10; Road Traffic Act §§ 9–13; Air Traffic Act §§ 35–8, 46–51, etc. (Incidentally, one should note that though §§ 842, 843 BGB are in the tort section of the Code, many authors believe that they contain rules of general application and that they are, therefore, also relevant to the law of contract.) And it is the tendency to be ruthlessly systematic and logical that accounts for the fact that the provisions that crucially supplement the above-mentioned Articles of the Code are to be found in the general part of the law of obligations and not in the tort section of the BGB. Thus § 249 BGB states that a person who is obliged to make compensation must restore the situation which would have existed if the circumstances, which render him liable to make amends had not occurred. This provision is to be found in the general part of the law of obligations quite simply because an obligation to pay compensation can arise from breach of contract and/or the commission of a tort. German authors thus apply it directly to tort situations. The second point that must be stressed, therefore, is that once again the Common lawyer must be prepared to find the guiding principles in different parts of the Code. Learning how to jump over these hurdles of classification will resolve much of the apparent difficulty of finding the law in the foreign codes.

A rule that must satisfy both contract and tort inevitably must be widely phrased and abstract. Abstract generalisations may be good for codes. Without more, however, they will be of little use to practitioners. Often they must be transformed into concrete rules of thumb, especially if out-of-court settlements are to be encouraged. Theory must yield to the demands of practice and the codal bones must acquire flesh and muscle before they can function properly. Indeed, the regulation of compensation by the Code hardly does justice to the subject (though, on the other hand, it is infinitely more detailed than the French civil code, which is entirely silent on this as so many other crucial matters. Unjustified enrichment is one example; the rules of formation of contract is another.). This is where the courts come into the picture and it is through their work that the comparative lawyer can start to perceive the real similarities that the abstract apparatus of the Code tends to obscure. Once again the understanding of foreign law is enhanced if it is studied through its case law.

Another area in which the two systems come closer together is where “satisfaction”—a notion taken over from Swiss law but given a different meaning in German law—takes over from “compensation” and the court is instructed by the legislator to weigh all the surrounding circumstances when deciding the level of the award. In those cases, as we shall note later on, insurance considerations at last come to the surface of the German judgments, giving a greater sense of reality to what the judges are really trying to achieve.

The same is true of wider considerations of “equity” or fairness, which are sometimes very obviously taken into account but in most cases tend to be concealed. An excellent example of the former can be found in a decision of the Bundesgerichtshof of 22 June 1993 (MDR 1993, 847). For the decision there, handed down in the aftermath of German re-unification, stated that the calculation of damages had to start by taking into account the practice in the (former) East Germany. But the figure thus reached (for pain and suffering) should then be adjusted upwards to take into account the differing economic realities that had followed re-unification and, in many cases, caused much hardship to the population of the former DDR. Thus, even the judicial literature—traditionally sombre and concept-orientated—can reveal a refreshing interest in the problems of real people and real life. Its famous and earlier attempts to flesh out the famous good faith provision of the Civil Code (§ 242 BGB) has given it, of course, good training!

The third point that must be made absolutely clear is that the advent of social security has dramatically affected the function and purpose of the rules concerning compensation. This is, of course, true in all systems; but it is particularly noticeable in Germany where these days social security covers most of victims’ needs and then takes over the tort actions against their tortfeasors. (§ 116 Sozialgesetzbuch Book X.) At this point it is important to stress three points. First, the breadth of this subrogation mechanism is manifest from the range of entities that it covers. Thus, for instance, the statutory health insurance scheme, the retirement pension scheme, and the accidents at work insurance scheme will all, automatically, be subrogated to these claims. Secondly, the reader must realise that this subrogation occurs at the moment of the accident and results in the victim automatically and immediately losing all control over the claim (or parts of the claim) which he may have. Finally, it might be worth clarifying the fact that we are here talking only of claims for material losses in cases of personal injury. Incidentally, the typical feminine designation of the plaintiff—die Klägerin—which usually refers to either die Kasse (the social security carrier) or die Gesellschaft (the private insurance company), underscores the fact that the bulk of the personal injury litigation is these days undertaken by these two types of subrogees. Or, to put it differently, those who nowadays pay in tort cases are “innocent absentees” namely, social security carriers, insurers and employers. In such circumstances, compensation of the victim can no longer be the prime purpose of the tort rules (even though German judges and jurists, inordinately it would appear, enjoy stressing this function). Rather, seen from a distance, they have come to form a part of the intricate complex of rules, which help allocate risks or, in some cases, seek to promote deterrence. To put it differently, the tort action, when it is taken over by the social security carrier or the insurer, helps to put the cost of accident back on the shoulders of the wrongdoer (or his insurer). Of course, if allocation of risks and costs is nowadays a prime purpose of tort law one should perhaps discuss at the liability phase of the enquiry which of the two parties is in a better position to carry the risk or channel the loss. But with few exceptions, such an open economic approach to tort law does not figure in German tort books; nor is it greatly favoured by the courts. American ideas tend to reach Europe with a jetlag of about twenty years or more. In practice, therefore, actions by injured victims against their wrongdoers only take place whenever the social insurance scheme has not fully covered the actual loss.

Be that as it may, the fact remains that modern tort law has been forced to take into account the fact that its rules are no longer the only ones that determine compensation for loss. The need to regulate the interrelationship between all these disparate rules of compensation has thus arisen in Germany as it has elsewhere. This topic should and has been approached with one guiding principle in mind: the tort victim must be indemnified for his loss but he must not make a profit out of it (e.g. Kötz/Wagner, Deliktsrecht, no. 508 et seq.). In this respect German law is different from American law since, on the whole, the latter appears to take a very generous view about cumulation of different benefits partially, no doubt, because a substantial part of the award goes towards financing the costs of tort litigation. Though this “background” difference (between English and American law) may thus seriously affect the operation of tort law in practice, it seems rarely to be openly acknowledged. There does, however, exist the occasional, frank judicial admission which makes such an idea plausible and thereby underscores the need to study legal rules within their wider political and socio-legal context in which they operate. In Helfend v. Southern California Rapid Transit Dist. (2 Cal. 3d 1, 465 P. 2d 61 (1970)) the Supreme Court of California did just that. It thus argued that: “Generally the jury is not informed that plaintiff’s attorney will receive a large portion of the plaintiff’s recovery in contingent fees or that personal injury damages are not taxable to the plaintiff and are normally deductible by the defendant. Hence [the plaintiff] rarely actually receives full compensation for his injuries as computed by the jury. The collateral source rule partially serves to compensate for the attorney’s share and does not actually render ‘double recovery’ for the plaintiff.”

The general approach of German law is, in this respect, much closer to English law than it is to American law. Historically, however, there were also differences as to how one should avoid double compensation. Thus, originally, English law provided that in the case of certain benefits there should be a partial deduction from damages for personal injury, amounting to half the social security payments made to the plaintiff up to a maximum period of five years from the cause of action. Benefits both paid and likely to be paid after the judgment were deductible, but in calculating future benefit entitlement, no account was taken of likely increases in the levels of payment. The courts read the Act as implying that beyond the five-year period, no deduction was to be made in respect of the specified benefits. (S. 2(1) of the Law Reform (Personal Security) Act 1948). This rule was widely criticised, partially on the ground that it “subsidised” tortfeasors and, eventually, it was replaced by the Social Security Act 1989 which, in s. 22, changed the law by introducing a scheme of state “recoupment” of social security benefits from damages awards above a statutory threshold set initially at £2,500. All the significant benefits which are concerned with income replacement and with the expenses of accident victims are included in the scheme. The court must now disregard these specified benefits when making its assessment of damages. However, the tortfeasor must then pay to the Department of Social Security the full amount of any of the benefits, which the plaintiff has received in respect of his injury or accident. The Department of Social Security is not formally subrogated to the plaintiff’s claim (as in German law) but the effect is very similar. Thus, the tortfeasor must now pay in full but, as a result of these reforms, the plaintiff is worse off than he was under the old regime as a complete reduction of benefits is made. This scheme applies to accidents and injuries occurring after 1 January 1989.

As already suggested, this is not the German approach. Here, the entity (social security, insurance) that has compensated the victim will be subrogated to his tort action and will be able to claim from the tortfeasor the full amount that it has paid to the victim. According to the German Insurance Act (Versicherungsvertragsgesetz) of 1908 the same, broadly speaking, is true of payments made by a private insurer. The position more precisely is as follows. In respect of certain types of insurance contracts (e.g. loss insurance but not personal injury insurance), the rights of the insured are ex lege transferred to the insurer to the extent that he has indemnified the latter (§ 67 I 1 VVG). In other types of insurance contracts, however, e.g. medical costs insurance, only “conventional” subrogation is envisaged, i.e. the right of subrogation depends upon the insured having contractually conferred on the insurer a legal right to take over his claim. In this latter case the victim will thus have to cede to the insurer his right of action against the tortfeasor and will not be entitled to cumulate the insurance benefit and the tort damages. The point is widely accepted as just, though one could argue against it that the insurance money is the product of the victim’s own thrift and foresight and that it is bad policy to take it away from him. (For further details Kötz/Wagner, nos. 507–12.)

The last preliminary point that has to be made is that the plaintiff’s damages will be reduced (and in some circumstances even completely wiped out) in order to take into account his contributory fault. The term “contributory fault” is here used instead of the more familiar Common law term “contributory negligence” not only because it is the one employed by German (and, incidentally, French) law; but also because it is wider than the Common law term in at least two respects. For in the first place contributory fault includes intentional as well as negligent conduct. Secondly and, perhaps, more importantly it includes the conduct of the injured party/plaintiff after the occurrence of the initial harm as well as before it. However, though the German Code distinguishes the fault of the injured party that positively contributes to his harm and his failure to minimise it once it has happened, it subjects both these types of contributory fault to the same rules.

In the matter of contributory fault, German law departed from the old Roman law rule (also found in pre-1945 English Common law and still accepted by those American jurisdictions that have not introduced the notion of comparative negligence). This rule, as is well known, decreed that the injured party could not recover if his injury was due to his own fault unless the tortfeasor’s conduct was intentional. Instead, § 254 I BGB states that “if any fault of the injured party has contributed to the occurrence of the damage, the duty to compensate and the extent of the compensation to be made depend upon the circumstances, especially upon how far the injury has been caused predominantly by the one or the other party”. In this respect the German approach could be termed to be more “modern” than that of traditional Common law; but German law has not taken the next step to ignore altogether the fault of the victim. This, it has been noted, has already happened in French law in the context of traffic accidents; and according to the view of some German authors it should also be introduced in German law, especially in the context of injuries caused on the roads. For there appears to be hardly a traffic accident case which in theory should be dealt with expeditiously under the strict liability of the Road Traffic Act but which in practice does not become a prolonged and convoluted affair because the defendant raises the plaintiff’s contributory fault. Nonetheless, a move towards the modern French solution has not been made, largely because of feared consequences on the levels of insurance premiums.

When then is there such contributory fault? In Common law there has been some discussion as to whether negligence in the defendant is the same thing as negligence in the plaintiff. The answer is negative since in the former but not the latter case a breach of a duty has to be proved. Likewise, in Germany it has been debated whether fault in the context of § 254 BGB has the same meaning as it has in §§ 823, 276 BGB—the better view being that a negative answer is appropriate since the notion of unlawfulness is relevant only in the latter instance. (See Kötz/Wagner, nos. 552–3.)

The answer to the question when is there fault on the part of the victim depends on the facts of each case. Certain factual situations, however, have come almost automatically to indicate that there is fault on the part of the plaintiff/victim. So, for example, a motor cyclist who does not wear a crash helmet will be deemed to be at fault (BGH NJW 1965, 1075) and the same rule applies to mopeds (BGH NJW 1979, 980). But an injured cyclist is not guilty of contributory fault if he is not wearing a helmet (BGH NJW 1979, 980). The occupants of a vehicle will also be contributorily negligent if their injury can be partly attributed to not wearing safety belts. (BGH VersR 1979, 536; BGHZ 74, 25.) Nor will a passenger who had not fastened his seat belt have his damages reduced if he can show that his injuries would have occurred even if he had secured his seat belt (BGH NJW 1980, 2125 and cf. Froom v. Butcher [1976] QB 286). Incidentally, the wearing of seat-belts became compulsory in German law in 1976 (new § 21a of the Road Traffic Ordinance (Straßenverkehrs-Ordnung = StVO).

The vast majority of illustrations of contributory fault comes from traffic accident cases but one group of cases which is not always connected with accidents arising from cars deals with incidents involving infants. The case-law is clear that an infant's contributory fault will be taken into account only if he was capable of committing fault in accordance with § 828 II BGB and had acted culpably in the sense of § 276 BGB. § 828 II BGB adopts a rather arbitrary test by providing that "A person who has completed his seventh year but not his eighteenth year of age is not responsible for any damage which he does to another if, at the time of committing the damaging act, he did not have the understanding necessary for realising his responsibility . . .". Academics, on the other hand (e.g. Esser/Schmidt, Schuldrecht I, 36), are not so categorical, some arguing that the infant's contributory negligence should be counted against him even where he was incapable of recognizing the danger to himself, while others maintain that policy reasons require that it should be ignored. Recent reform proposals restrict the infant's liability in the context of traffic accidents. See Section 2(c) for details.

Contributory fault may, as has already been stated, arise after the damaging occurrence and will consist in the victim's own failure to mitigate his loss (§ 254 II BGB). Thus, if the plaintiff's vehicle is damaged in an accident and can be repaired he will, normally, have the right to have it repaired at the defendant's expense. But what if the cost of repair significantly exceeds the cost of replacement of the car with another one of approximately the same value? In such cases the plaintiff will be obliged to mitigate his loss and opt for the lower cost of replacement (cf. Darbishire v. Warran [1963] 1 WLR 1067, which reached the same result and with the same reasoning). Difficulties, however, can arise when the destroyed item is unique and the question how the replacement value will be calculated can also raise nice problems (on which see Kötz, "Die Abwicklung des Kraftfahrzeug-Totalschadens" in Festschrift Hauss (1978) 181).

The same duty to mitigate the loss arises in personal injury cases so that, for example, an injured person must where reasonable obtain medical treatment as soon as possible (RGZ 139, 131, 136). This means that he should submit himself to any reasonable operation that could help restore his health (RGZ 129, 398; OLG Oldenburg NJW 1978, 1200). (For further references Stürner, "Der Erwerbsschaden und seine Ersatzfähigkeit" JZ 1984, 412 ff. and 461 ff.) What of course is reasonable depends on a variety of factors and will, ultimately, be a question of fact. (BGH 13 May 1953, BGHZ 10, 18.) These facts will include such things as the age of the person injured, the degree of danger involved in the operation, the chances of acquiring alternative employment after the operation (which may depend on the condition of the labour market), and so on. (See, RGZ 129, 398; cf. also OLG Oldenburg NJW 1978, 1200). Equally, the injured person must mitigate his loss by seeking alternative employment, which if necessary may even mean changing his profession (BGHZ 10, 18 though this again may raise nice problems). Alternatively, the plaintiff may have to take part in a retraining scheme, naturally at the defendant's expense (RGZ 160, 119; BGHZ 10, 18); and, in another case (BGH VersR 1971, 82) it was said that a self-employed individual may have to employ an assistant rather than give up his business altogether. The similarities here with Common law are such that they need not be laboured any further. On the whole one can match English and German cases fairly neatly.

(b) Personal injury (pecuniary losses)

Personal injury can cause primary and consequential loss. The first term is taken to refer to such items as medical expenses incurred as a result of the injury and compensation for the injury itself (loss of an arm, eye, etc.). On the other hand, the second heading would include future loss of earnings and expenditure incurred as a result of further deterioration in the health of the victim flowing from the accident itself, e.g. subsequent development of epilepsy as a result of severe cranial injuries. This distinction between primary and consequential loss, with its strong causal undertones, is made both in cases of personal injury and damage to property and is usually adopted by textbook writers. Here, however, we shall adopt the English distinction between pecuniary and non-pecuniary losses, partly because it appears to be neater but mainly because it will help in the comparative presentation of the German law. (Another set of terms that might be appropriate is material and non-material harm.) It should also be noted that the following remarks apply equally to claims based on the tort law provisions in the BGB as well as to those based on the provisions of special statutes of strict liability. The technique used in the latter case is one of special provisions and partial cross-referencing linking these statutes to the paragraphs of the BGB on damages. (For instance, see sections 10–13 of the Road Traffic Act). With regard to pecuniary losses, the most important deviation from the general rules of the BGB is found in the imposition of monetary maxima in most cases of strict liability. (For instance, section 12 of the Road Traffic Act and the earlier discussion contained in chapter three.)

When the injured party's loss is pecuniary, i.e. it can be estimated in money terms, then the guiding principle is that of restitutio in integrum. This is true of English law (Livingstone v. Rawyards Coal Co. (1880) 5 App. Cas. 25, 39 per Lord Blackburn) as it is of German law. § 249 sentence 1 BGB expressly authorises the restoration of the position in which the plaintiff would have been in had the injury not occurred, which in personal injury cases means ordering the defendant to meet the plaintiff's costs (see § 249 sentence 2 BGB). It follows that all reasonably incurred medical expenses, including such items as hospitalisation, nursing, physiotherapy, radiotherapy, post-operative convalescence, the acquisition of special, e.g. orthopaedic aids, cosmetic surgery etc., will be met by the tortfeasor or, more likely, his insurer etc. (Once again, the position is identical in England: see Markesinis and Deakin, Tort Law, 710 et seq.) The cost of private medical care may also be claimable if reasonably incurred and is usually claimed and awarded in the more serious types of injury where long and costly treatment or convalescence is necessary (see BGH VersR 1964, 257). In England failure to use the facilities of the National Health Service will not affect the reasonableness of the plaintiff's expenses which will thus be claimable (see Harris v. Brights Asphalt Contractors Ltd. [1953] 1 QB 617, 635 per Slade J).

In German law medical expenses cannot be claimed if they have not been actually incurred or, at the very least, it can be shown that the plaintiff does not intend to use the money for medical treatment. (14 January 1986, BGHZ 97, 14, case 142.) Prior to this decision, courts had, occasionally, awarded damages for personal injury even though the plaintiff did not intend to spend the money for the required treatment. (For instance, OLG Celle VersR 1972, 468; OLG Stuttgart VersR 1978, 188.) This attitude is dictated by § 253 BGB which excludes, as a general rule, recovery of damages for non-pecuniary losses. If the plaintiff does not use the damages, for instance in order to have cosmetic surgery, but pockets the award, it is argued that he would be in effect receiving compensation for a non-pecuniary loss. However, as we shall see below (section 3 (f)) the rule is different with regard to damage to property; and the most recent case provides plausible (but not overwhelming) reasons for maintaining such a distinction. Some questions, however, still remain unanswered. For instance, what happens if the plaintiff subsequently changes his mind and simply puts the money into his pocket? (Cf. Zeuner, JZ 1986, 640, 641.)

Further limits may be placed by § 242 BGB (good faith) and § 251 II BGB (the cost of the treatment must not be disproportionate). § 251 II BGB provides for monetary compensation if the cost of curing the defect is disproportionate. This presents formidable difficulties in cases of personal injury and in particular where the cost of cosmetic surgery is claimed. For apart from the cost of actually restoring the plaintiff's health, his interest is non-pecuniary. Because of the human dignity one cannot resort to a diminution "in value" measure. At the same time in some extreme cases there may be reasons for rejecting claims for cost of medical treatment for personal injury. The BGH ingeniously solved this problem by relying on § 242 BGB ("good faith") and thus bridged the gap in the Code. On this basis, the BGH, in a decision rendered on 3 December 1974 (BGHZ 63, 295), denied the plaintiff's claim for DM 2,590 requested in order to pay for an operation to remove a 2.5 cm scar located next to his right ear. The BGH stressed that reasonableness depends on the circumstances of each case. Accordingly, a balancing operation had to be undertaken and it would weigh the severity of the injury, the scale of the claimed cost, and the motives of the plaintiff. The court reaffirmed that as a general rule cost of purely cosmetic surgery could be recovered as part of the restoration owed by the defendant under § 249 BGB. But the BGH also accepted the Court of Appeal's finding that awarding compensation would be unreasonable in the present case. It seems that this was because the scar was regarded as insignificant and, in any event, hardly visible and likely to disappear over time. Incidentally, we stress "it seems" for the facts are not fully and clearly stated—something which marks out German from Anglo-American cases which have to consider facts in detail if they are to perform the distinguishing function which is so central to the Common law process of deciding cases. Finally, the court also pointed out that the plaintiff was awarded a correspondingly higher amount of damages for pain and suffering. Hence, the court in effect arrived at a solution which is surprisingly close to § 251 II BGB. Where cost of reinstatement to the status quo ante appears unreasonable, the plaintiff may obtain some other monetary compensation, for instance in the form of an increased award of damages for pain and suffering.

Lost future earnings often form the largest item in the damages packet. According to the figures of insurance payments made in the context of traffic accidents for the year 1999, approximately one billion DM was paid under this heading. This must be compared to 300 million DM paid for the cost of medical treatment. The largest amount of money—1.7 billion DM—was, however, reserved for compensating pain and suffering. (See Kötz/Wagner, no. 511).

As in English law, the purpose of the award is to put the plaintiff in the same position, financially, as if he had not been injured. Where future lost earnings are claimed the plaintiff is not restricted to restoration of the status quo ante but can ask to be put in the (hypothetical) position he would have been in but for the injury. Therefore in the calculation of lost future earnings increases in pay, promotions, and the like will be taken into account when deciding the amount of compensation. Where the victim is self-employed, his future prospects will have to be estimated as best as possible. But, in keeping with the pro-plaintiff predilection, some the courts have suggested that “the guessing process” should not be subjected to over rigorous proof at the expense of the plaintiff. (BGH 6 July 1993, MDR 1994, 43.) In any event, all loss of earnings will have to be compensated. (BGH 20 March 1984, VersR 1984, 639.) If the plaintiff/victim, has been forced to settle after his accident for a less well paid job, or has otherwise experienced a loss of gains, he will be allowed to claim these amounts. (BGH 22 February 1973, VersR 1973, 423.) Income from an illegal or immoral source, however, tends not to be taken into account (see, however, the controversial decision of BGHZ 67, 119 dealing with the income of an injured prostitute). Damages are not awarded (or are reduced) if the defendant can show that the injured party/plaintiff would have lost his income in any event, e.g. through an imminent dismissal (BGHZ 10, 6; BGH VersR 1963, 674—predisposition).

Not infrequently, relatives of the victim come to his assistance thereby incurring travelling expenses and often more serious loss of income (e.g. mother giving up her job to look after her injured child). German and English law are, in principle, at one on this by accepting that the victim may recover from the tortfeasor these expenses. (See BGH VersR 1961, 272; VersR 1964, 532 and cf. Donnelly v. Joyce [1974] QB 454, also BGH NJW 1989, 766; BGH VersR 1991, 559, and Seidel, “Der Ersatz von Besuchskosten im Schadensrecht”, VersR 1991, 1319). However, a fair number of decisions also seem to take a harsher view on such claims whenever the visits cannot be genuinely linked to the condition of the victim (BGH NJW 1990, 1037; NJW 1991, 2340). Both systems also agree that if compensation is decreed for the victim it is then for him to decide whether he will reimburse these relatives with the sums he has recovered from the tortfeasor. Equally, however, in both systems attempts have been made to impose a legal obligation on the victim to reimburse the relatives who have come to his aid and thereby suffered loss. In Germany this could arguably be satisfied by having recourse to § 683 BGB (management without mandate) and in England by utilizing the trust mechanism (see Cunningham v. Harrison [1973] QB 942, 952 per Lord Denning MR). In both these systems, however, these attempts have met with little success in the courts. The intricacies of this topic come to full light in case 58 and are further discussed in the accompanying notes.

As was explained in the section dealing with “accidents at work” (chapter 3 section A 5(c) (ii)) in this area of the law social security system has almost completely replaced tort law. But even outside this special field, the victim’s loss (including his lost earnings) are often met by some social security carrier or insurer who is then subrogated to the victim’s tort action to the extent that he has indemnified him. It is clear, however, that the social security systems will provide a minimum coverage regardless whether the victim has a right to compensation against another person. Generally speaking, it is also immaterial whether the injury is caused by a “negligent” conduct of the injured itself (Bundessozialgericht NJW 1986, 1572). Thus, in these cases where the victim is entitled to social security services and payments, the purpose of tort law is, in effect, to determine whether the social security carrier can seek reimbursement from the tortfeasor or his insurance. (Cf. Kötz/Wagner, no. 510). In accordance with what was said earlier on, the right of the insurer is here provided by § 116 SGB X. Likewise in England social security benefits, as well as NHS costs of treatment of traffic accident victims, are generally recouped by the State. (Cf. R. Lewis Deducting Benefits from Damages for Personal Injury (1999) 127 ff., 223 ff.) If the social security carrier has only partially compensated the victim, the latter naturally retains his tort action for the difference. An obvious example is damages for pain and suffering).

The statutory health insurance system is the main social security system which is likely to offer relief to those suffering personal injury. The legal regime that governs these cases is set out in Book V of the Sozialgesetzbuch. In 1998 roughly 90 per cent of the population (then 82 million) had potential entitlements under this scheme while out of the remaining 10 per cent a further 7.3 million were privately insured. (Figures from Kötz/Wagner, no. 214.) Victims are entitled to all ambulance and hospital treatment that is necessary and also to the cost of appropriate medication (§ 27 SGB V). In other cases the victim's earning incapacity may be compensated under the retirement insurance scheme (Rentenversicherung, Sozialgesetzbuch VI) which applies to employees. (In 1999 44,9 million fell into this category in Germany. Kötz/Wagner no. 224.) If the employee has (totally or partially) lost his earning capacity and has paid premiums for a minimum period of five years he will be entitled to the payment of a rent (annuity) which will be calculated in the usual way. This will be on the basis of his income and the duration of the period during which he paid premiums (§§ 43, 67 SGB VI). German law, also imposes a legal obligation on employers to continue paying the wages or salaries of their injured employees for a period of six weeks (See § 3 of the Entgeltfortzahlungsgesetz (EFZG) of 1994 (BGBl. I 1014).) After this period has come to an end, the health service will take over and pay normally 70 per cent of the previous income for a further 78 weeks. (§ 47 SGB V). In such cases, therefore, the loss falls on the employer and not the injured employee so it should be the former who should have the right to take over the tort action to the extent that he has paid the victim/employee. This result has been accepted by the courts. (Cf. BGHZ 43, 378.) But it did not pass unquestioned by some writers, not least because the loss suffered by the employer (paying wages without receiving any services in exchange) is purely economic loss and, as we have seen, it is not covered by § 823 I BGB. For a time the above undoubtedly sensible result was explained by some arguing that the employee retained his independent action against the tortfeasor but implicitly assigned it to his employer. This "legal construction" means that in the event the tortfeasor is made to pay; the victim was not doubly compensated; and the employer was not left to carry the loss. (Cf. BGHZ 7, 30; 42, 76; 43, 378.) The problem, however, has been solved by the aforementioned EFZG of 1994 (§ 6) and the cessio legis envisaged by it. It should be noted that in English law whenever the employer is under a legal duty to continue paying the wages of the injured employee, the latter cannot claim them from the tortfeasor. (Since it would appear that the employer is equally unable to recover sums thus paid, the only one who stands to gain from such an arrangement is the tortfeasor.) But where the employer has made ex gratia payments, these will probably not be set off against the lost earnings (Dennis v. London Passenger Transport Board [1948] 1 All ER 779; Cunningham v. Harrison [1973] QB 942. Likewise in German law: RGZ 92, 57; BGHZ 10, 107). However, the BGH recently held that the payment of an early retirement pension made by the employer to a disabled employee had to be taken into account in assessing the loss of the victim. (BGH 7 November 2000, NJW 2001, 1274.) This seems at first sight difficult to reconcile with a line of cases where such socially motivated benefits were regarded as collateral benefits and were disregarded when assessing damages. Thus, as we have seen, sick-pay (whether paid by the employer during the first six weeks, or by the health service afterwards) is res inter alios acta. (BGHZ 90, 334; 139, 167.) This is also the case with disability pensions under the statutory pension scheme. (BGHZ 10, 107.) In the present case, however, the court stressed that the early retirement pension did not aim at compensating the victim for the consequences of the accident and therefore did not fulfil the function of providing care to victims of accidents. The rent had been granted primarily because the employee was 58 years old and not because of the accident. The policy behind the scheme was to relieve pressure from the labour market. Thus, to the extent that the employee received these payments, he did not suffer a loss of earnings. The practical effect of this is that the employer will not be able to recoup such payments made to the employee from the tortfeasor or his insurer. For if the employee does not have a right of action he cannot assign it to his employer.

In Parry v. Cleaver [1970] AC 1 a police constable was severely injured by a car driven negligently by the defendant. The plaintiff was entitled to a police pension on discharge for disablement. The House of Lords held that the police pension should be ignored in assessing the plaintiff's loss. It would be unjust that money spent by an injured person on premiums should enure to the benefit of a tortfeasor; and a contributory pension is a form of insurance as also the reward for pre-injury services (at 14, 16 per Lord Reid; at 42 per Lord Wilberforce). This ruling is more favourable to plaintiffs in these kind of cases and would appear to set the two systems apart. Nevertheless, the two legal systems may not be as far apart as they appear to be. For, in the final analysis, both look for the purpose of the payment when determining whether it ought to be taken into account. The object of the retirement pension in the recent BGH case was thus, arguably, of a special nature. (Cf. Smoker v. London Fire and Civil Defence Authority [1991] 2 AC 502.)

Finally, it should be noted that private accident insurance also plays an increasing role in the compensation of accidents. Professor Kötz has thus estimated that in 1999 40 per cent of the population older than 14 years had a private accident insurance which provides additional coverage of the risk of earning incapacity (op. cit. no. 222).

Up to this point the presentation of German law will have caused no difficulties to the Common (especially English) lawyer. When we move, however, to the form of the award and the method of its calculation, some important differences of approach become obvious. Surprisingly, however, once again they seem to be attenuated in practice. The source of the difference lies in the attitude any given system is prepared to take towards lump sum awards and periodical payments. Of course, whenever a debate about this issue takes place one must remember that it refers to the form the compensation will take for future economic loss. For no system objects to capitalising earnings lost up to the time of the judgment. And the same is true for sums awarded to "compensate" for pain and suffering—the relevant paragraph of the BGB (§ 847 BGB) being silent on this point. The dispute as to the form the payments should take is thus limited to such items as loss of future earnings, future medical expenses, and in the case of wrongful death loss of future support.

The question "what form should these payments take?" can receive four possible answers. At the one extreme one finds Common law systems with their unequivocal preference for lump sum awards. The task of the court in assessing damages for personal injuries is to arrive at a lump sum which represents as nearly as possible full compensation for the injury which the plaintiff has suffered. However, by Section 2(1) of the Damages Act 1996, a court may make an order for the whole or part of the damages to take the form of periodical payments, provided the parties agree to this. (For American law an illustration can be found in Slater v. Mexican Nat'l RR Co. 194 US 120, 24 S. Ct.

581 (1904).) At the other end of the spectrum one could find in the past certain socialist systems which only allowed periodical payments or annuities, as they were most commonly called. (Rudden, Soviet Insurance Law (1966), chapter 7; idem, "Soviet Tort Law" 42 NYUL Rev. 583, 609 ff. (1967).) In between lie the vast majority of legal systems, though their approach can be further divided into two categories: the first includes those systems which are, technically speaking, neutral as to what form the award will take, accepting that either lump sums or periodical payments are perfectly acceptable. (France and Switzerland belong to this category.) The systems that belong to the second group, in which we find German law, accept that awards can take either form but expressly state their preference for periodical payments. §§ 843 I BGB and 844 II BGB state this preference in unequivocal terms. (According to §§ 843 II and 760 BGB annuities are paid three months in advance (but monthly annuities are commonly agreed). The duration of the annuity will be estimated at the time of the judgment on the basis of his estimated earning years but for the accident: BGH 10 October 1987, VersR 1988, 464.) The only exception to the annuity rule is provided by § 843 III BGB where it is stated that a capital sum can be allowed instead of a periodical payment only if "a serious reason" exists (ein wichtiger Grund). Many events or things may amount to a sufficiently "serious reason" to by-pass the rule. Thus, accident neurosis has for a long time been recognised as a sufficient ground for granting a capital sum. (RGZ 73, 418, 420; 136, 373.) The danger of the defendant going bankrupt would also constitute a serious reason: OLG Stuttgart OLGE 2, 440, 441. The victim's wish to use his compensation award to start a new professional life has also been accepted as a good reason for awarding a lump sum (RG JW 1933, 840). So has the fact that the person paying the compensation normally resides abroad or changes his residence permanently, making the collection of the annuity hazardous or difficult. (OLG Nürnberg FamRZ 1968, 476, 478. See also RGZ 93, 209, 210 and Palandt, § 843 BGB, no. 21.) According to Larenz/Canaris, II 2, p. 587, the cost of retraining for a new job in order to pursue gainful employment after the injury would also justify the demand of a lump sum. But the fact that both parties wish to have the payment take the form of a lump sum is not, in itself, a "good reason" for the judge to make such an award (though if they agree to this extra judicially, the judge will give effect to such an agreement).

This different approach taken by the two systems to the question of how the damages will be paid calls for a number of observations.

The first is to invite the reader to examine the merits and demerits of the lump sum versus the periodical payments method of compensation and consider whether in the light of comparative observations the controversy can be seen in a different light. (For an excellent study see J Fleming, "Damages or Rent" 19 UTLJ 295–325 (1969).) Such a comparative approach can reveal that some of the disadvantages of the periodical payments system of compensation (which are correspondingly treated as advantages of the lump-sum method) can effectively be countered in practice. For example, the alleged disadvantage of the annuity system that it can expose the plaintiff to the danger of the defendant going bankrupt can be countered by the fact that defendants nowadays tend to be insurance companies (which, in theory, are less likely to go bankrupt than ordinary individuals). The risk can further be diminished by the courts' power to order defendants to provide adequate security to ensure the continued payment of the award. § 843 II BGB expressly gives this discretionary power to the court, though it is generally taken not to confer upon the plaintiff a right to demand that he be provided with such a security. (By contrast, the Swiss Code of Obligations makes the provision of security mandatory in such cases: Article 43 II CO). Another supposed disadvantage of the annuity system is that it requires defendants to set up complicated and time consuming mechanisms for the continued payments of awards. This, too, may be less convincing when one, again, realises that in most of these cases the typical defendants are insurers who are equipped to deal with the problems of periodical payments. The finality of the award is also widely regarded as the real virtue of the lump-sum method of compensation. In reality, however, it is also its great drawback, since it does not allow the court (or any other body) to correct errors in the forecasts that the judge has to make when fixing the lump sum. Thus, the medical condition of the plaintiff may get better or worse and thus prove the award too generous or inadequate. The same can happen with the plaintiff's employment prospects. In German law, courts view capital awards as settlements that cannot be revised because of subsequent change in circumstances. See, BGH 8 January 1981, BGHZ 79, 187 even though academic writers seem to dislike this view. But awards involving periodic payments can and are revisable. (See, for instance, BGH 20 December 1960, BGHZ 34, 110.)

These imponderables affect the English Common law method of calculation of future pecuniary losses. The multiplier and multiplicand method of compensation (described in detail in Markesinis and Deakin, Tort Law, 757 et seq.) allows the judges to reflect all these imponderables in their "rough-and-ready" calculations (recently made more precise by the House of Lords judgment in Wells v. Wells [1999] 1 AC 345.) Moreover, the Administration of Justice Act 1982 has provided a new mechanism which is limited to certain instances of personal injuries and which allows the court to abstain from this guessing game and make an award on the basis that the feared eventuality (deterioration of health of the victim) may not be realized. But if it is (for example the plaintiff's cranial injuries caused by the defendant lead many years later to the development of epilepsy), the plaintiff will be given the chance to return to the court and seek an upward adjustment of the award.

A further difficulty is that awarding a lump sum could lead to overcompensation since part of the money can be invested and earn interest. At the same time, it is clear that money will not retain a constant value. The solution adopted by the House of Lords is this. When assessing damages for anticipated future losses and expenses the court should fix the award by assuming that the plaintiffs will invest their damages in index-linked government stocks (Wells v. Wells [1999] 1 AC 345) and make a discount accordingly. The purpose of the discount is to eliminate the element of overcompensation that results from the damages reaching the plaintiff in one large sum and then being invested for him to produce income. The difficulty was that prior to Wells v. Wells the award was "discounted" by reference to the rate of financial return which one could expect from investing in equities—i.e. something in the order of 4–5 per cent per annum—instead of the lower yield but safer investment (in such stocks as Index Linked Government Securities) which were more appropriate to plaintiffs. Their Lordships decision, which led to an increase in the multipliers used and, correspondingly an increase in awards is, undoubtedly, going to have some impact on insurance premiums. But this was something that they were prepared to accept not only because it expressed their dislike for the earlier rough and ready way of selecting the multiplier. Additionally, they also decided to act because they felt that something had to be done for the fact that in modern times money was losing its value and these kind of claimants needed better protection.

Almost exactly the same words were used by the BGH in its seminal judgement of BGHZ 79, 187 in which it held that in assessing the lump sum awarded under § 843 III BGB the courts must also take into account future developments. This should include a rise in wages even if this is necessarily uncertain and might cause an overall increase in insurance premiums. Hence, in German law where lump sums are awarded the annual income tends to be computed with a figure (capitalisation factor) arrived at in a manner not very dissimilar to the English method.

The German method of calculating the annuity is no less complicated. German judges, too, have to indulge in all sorts of calculations before they can reach a final figure for the annuity. Useful guidelines were laid down by the BGH in its decision of 8 January 1981 (BGHZ 79, 187). In this task the judges are greatly assisted by the traditional requirement that the plaintiff itemise his losses as precisely as possible, something which has led to an almost complete neglect of § 287 ZPO and the discretion it offers judges to estimate freely the amount of damages. But at least they do have the possibility of adjusting the amounts upwards or downwards so as to take into account changes in circumstances. (Incidentally, in French law an award can only be adjusted upwards.) And in one area at least, this different method of payment has altogether avoided a problem which has caused considerable difficulties to many Common law judges. The problem we are referring to is linked with the judge's duty to evaluate the chances of remarriage of a widow when assessing the size of the lost dependency. This unsavoury exercise led to the partial abolition of this duty in English Common law by the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1971 (now § 3 II of the Fatal Accidents Act 1976). Nowadays judges are thus not obliged to take into account the remarriage of the widow or her prospect of remarriage. But the duty to indulge in this exercise remains when the courts have to evaluate the chances of remarriage of a widower (claiming loss of economic support from his deceased wife). More importantly, this exercise still has to be attempted when calculating the loss of support of orphaned children (since if their mother remarries and the new father takes them into his home he assumes a legal obligation to maintain them). The old law was, as already stated, greatly resented by judges and feminist organisations; but the new solution, partly because of the inconsistencies mentioned above, and partly because it can lead to over-compensation, is also treated as an anomaly. German law, on the other hand, with its attachment to the periodical payment system, seems to have avoided this problem altogether as it has avoided another problem that occupied English courts in the 1970s, namely that of inflation.

The final observation that one may make is, perhaps, the most intriguing of all. For despite the differences of approach that have been described, and the apparent superiority of the rent system over the lump sum award, the Germans (and the French) whenever possible seem to opt for the lump sum method of payment. Thus Professor Fleming has estimated that in Germany 99 per cent of all compensated claims take the form of a lump sum award. Practice has in his words "dwarfed [the codal orthodoxy] into statistical insignificance". (Dr McGregor in his excellent chapter 9 of vol. XI of the International Encyclopedia of Comparative Law, 26 states that the same figure applies to French law, as well; see also Nehl's "Kapitalisierung von Schadensersatzrenten", VersR 1981, 407, 412.) It thus becomes essential to enquire first why practice has bypassed the codal solution and secondly the way this evasion has been accomplished given the clear contrary wording of the Code.

The deviation from the wording of the Code is clearly due to the fact that whatever the theoretical merits of the rent system, both plaintiffs and defendants prefer the lump sum award. In many cases the plaintiff will in fact not be the victim. The plaintiff in such cases is a social security carrier (exercising its right to subrogation) and the defendant will be the tortfeasor's insurer. For obvious practical considerations, both may have an interest in the award of a lump sum. (Kötz/Wagner, no. 534.) Such defendants (in practice insurance companies perfectly able to cope with the mechanics of periodical payments) are, understandably, anxious to “close their books”—something which only lump sum awards allows them to do. But there are other reasons why the plaintiffs may also prefer lump sums. Two can be mentioned here.

The first is because they are encouraged in this by their lawyers who know that any fees they may have negotiated with their clients (additional to those provided by statute and paid by the losing party) will be met more promptly and with less resentment by their client if they are taken out of a large lump sum award rather than from periodical payments. The second is due to the attractions offered by larger awards. This is particularly true in Germany where as we have seen the bulk of medical and other pecuniary losses will be paid by a social security carrier in the form of periodical payments. With his basic needs thus being met, it becomes particularly attractive to a plaintiff to receive the top slice of the future economic loss award (along with the compensation for pain and suffering) in the form of a large lump sum. For this will enable him to indulge in purchases etc. which before the accident may have been entirely outside his financial means.

As for the method of circumventing the wording of the Code this can be found in the practice of extra-judicial settlements which are encouraged or even “suggested” by the courts. In other words, once the liability issue has been determined, the lawyers and the court may encourage the parties to agree on a lump sum award and even “suggest” its level. As a result, in Professor Fleming’s words (op. cit., 299) “the lump sum settlements have like termites reduced the rent system to but a hollow shell”.

This then is an area of the law of torts where the use of the comparative method can be profitably employed by both legal families (Common law and Civil law) since both could benefit from the study of each other’s weaknesses and strengths. For example, would it not be preferable if each system (English, German) adopted a more flexible mixed system which would allow the parties (or, in the last resort, the court) to decide which method of payment was more appropriate in their case, than opt for rigid schemes or preferences? From a didactic angle the study of this topic is also useful in so far as it reveals to the Common lawyer (and, perhaps, to the Civil lawyer) how unrealistic the treatment of the law can be in civil law textbooks. For their emphasis on what the law is according to the code rather than how it works in practice can be misleading to say the least. The subject we have just briefly discussed offers an excellent illustration.

(c) Personal injury (non-pecuniary losses)

Personal injury does not only lead to pecuniary losses of the kind described above; typically it also entails non-pecuniary losses such as pain and various forms of mental suffering. The German term Schmerzensgeld is wider than any equivalent found in the Common law and it should thus be made clear that it encompasses such headings of damage as pain and suffering, loss of amenity, disfigurement, loss of expectation of life etc. These distinctions and sub-divisions are not always made clear in the German books on the subject; yet they are in the judges minds when fixing the level of compensation for Schmerzensgeld as is seen from the actual decisions and books which contain summaries of awards. Yet, it is in a certain respect narrower than some of its common law counterparts. For an award of Schmerzensgeld presupposes that the victim suffered personal injury. In short, the object of an award of Schmerzensgeld is to compensate for all kinds of non-material harm suffered as a consequence of personal injury. (In this book, however, instead of Schmerzensgeld (which is quite a mouthful to pronounce) we have, for convenience's sake, used the term "pain and suffering" whilst also warning the reader not to understand it in the technical English sense.) The indemnification of the victim for such losses has caused difficulties of a similar kind both in England and in Germany. For though both systems, unlike those of the socialist and Islamic worlds, are prepared to take cognisance of such losses, both realize that they are dealing with unquantifiable items of loss where restitutio in integrum is not possible. Instead, the idea of "fair compensation" (Ausgleich) or "satisfaction" (Genugtuung) is introduced into the legal vocabulary, suggesting not only an inability for precise calculation, but also a desire for a certain degree of uniformity of awards. (Once again, where, as in America, juries have the last word, such uniformity is often impossible to attain and, in turn, its absence must hinder the out-of-court settlement process.) The above, however, should not be taken to suggest that money paid for pain and suffering is an insignificant part of the total award. On the contrary, there is a clear tendency to increase the size of the awards under this heading. Academic opinion in particular is, on the whole, firmly behind this trend and argues in favour of further increases (see Teplitzky, "Umwelt und Recht", NJW 1966, 388; Kötz in Festschrift von Caemmerer (1978) 389; Foerste "Schmerzensgeld bei brutalen Verbrechen", NJW 1999, 2951 etc.). Ott and Schäfer, "Schmerzensgeld bei Körperverletzungen", JZ 1991, 563, give the example of compensation for the loss of one eye which in 1952 was DM 2,000 but had risen to DM 45,000 by 1980, which represents a substantial increase even if the figures are adjusted to take account of inflation. (See also the table at p. 569 where the average "tariffs" up to 1984 are compared.) The reader should note from the outset that all examples of awards given throughout this section refer exclusively to damages for pain and suffering. So, for instance, cost of medical treatment, loss of earnings, and other pecuniary heads of damages are not included in these sums but are awarded separately over and above the damages for pain and suffering.

Since these charts were compiled, one can observe further significant increases in awards. For instance, in 1996 a court awarded to a three-year old child DM 500,000 as damages for pain and suffering for total blindness. The claim arose from a product liability incident when a bottle of sparkling lemonade exploded and injured the child. (Decision no. 1418 = OLG Frankfurt ZfS 1996, 131, confirming LG Hanau = no. 2010; the no. refer to the database IMM-DAT, and the decisions can be found for instance in Beck'sche Schmerzensgeldtabelle 4. ed. (2001).) Other illustrations will be given below. Ott and Schäfer approach the problem of the "right" level of awards from the angle of economic analysis and in 1991 concluded that in cases of serious injuries there should be a drastic (threefold) increase in payments. Though they accepted that this would result in a rise in insurance premiums they also thought that this hike in damage wards would provide incentives for avoiding personal injury and enhance the use of mechanisms for loss prevention. Not everyone, of course, agreed; nor have they been converted since. But it is, nonetheless, interesting to observe that a similar discussion has taken place in England.

Thus, in 1999 the Law Commission (Law Com. No. 257) proposed a large increase in damages for pain, suffering, and loss of amenity. (In the case of current awards above £3,000 by a factor between 1.5 and 2; a series of tapered increases for awards below £3,000 and above £2,000 by less than a factor of 1.5.) Rather unusually the Commission also recommended that, at least initially, legislation should be avoided and the task of adjusting the levels of awards left to the courts. The Court of Appeal and the House of Lords were thus urged to use their existing powers to lay down guidelines. (Para. 5.10 of the Report.) A specially constituted Court of Appeal considered the Commission's proposal in a conjoined appeal of eight test cases: Heil v. Rankin [2000] 2 WLR 1173. The Court accepted the task set by the Commission but did not follow all its recommendations as to substance. Lord Woolf MR handed down a judgment to which each member of the court had contributed. He stated (at pp. 1200 ff.) that there was no need to increase awards which were at present below £10,000. However, awards at the highest level should be increased by one third, while the extent of the adjustment of the awards in between should taper downwards (see graph at p. 1219). Illustrations are provided by the actual decisions reached in the test cases. (See, also, R Lewis (2001) 64 MLR 100.) So, for instance, if in the case of brain damage the award was £150,000 (which is the threshold for the "highest level") it will be increased by a third to £200,000 while in the middle of the range, for instance, an award of £80,000 is to be increased by 17 per cent to £95,000. The Court doubted some of the evidence relied upon by the Commission and, most interestingly, it stated that it would attach more importance than the Commission to the level of awards in other member states of the E.U. (at p. 1201). (The Commission had confined its comparative survey to jurisdictions closely allied to the English, mainly Irish. See, para. 3.90.) Despite these real or apparent limitations highlighted by the Court of Appeal, the Report contains invaluable information for anyone who wishes to approach the problem from a wider perspective. The following remarks can naturally provide only first and tentative guidelines as to the position in Germany.

Fair compensation for injury to body or health or for deprivation of liberty is expressly provided for by § 847 BGB. Section II of this Article, displaying its rather antiquated origins, provides the same for a woman who has been the victim of an immoral crime or has been induced by cunning or threats or abuse of a relationship into an extra-marital cohabitation. These provisions were necessary because of the general principle enunciated by § 253 BGB, which prohibits the award of monetary compensation for non-pecuniary losses except where the law expressly provides for an exception. It must be also remembered that a claim under § 847 BGB will be allowed only if the action is based on the breach of one of the tort provisions of the Civil Code. If, on the other hand, the action is based on the violation of one of the provisions of a strict liability statute, then no claim for pain and suffering will be allowed. (The only exceptions can be found in § 53 III of the Air Traffic Act and in 29 II Atomic Energy Act. For further details see Ch. 3, Section A.5.). The same is true, if the cause of action is contractual; and that is why the attempt to circumvent the unfortunate § 831 BGB through § 278 BGB has not been entirely satisfactory. One way of bypassing this drawback is to base the action on both contract and tort. Case 52 shows how this can be done in the context of medical malpractice where the hospital is sued on the basis of § 278 BGB and the doctor on the basis of § 823 I BGB, see, also, cases 53–55.

Much of the above may change if the aforementioned proposed 2. Gesetz zur Änderung schadensrechtlicher Vorschriften becomes law. (At the time of writing: Government proposal of 24 September 2001). Following recommendations of the Verkehrsgerichtstag of 1995, 1998, and 2000, the reform proposal suggests that § 847 BGB is repealed and a more general exception introduced as § 253 II BGB. (A translation is provided at p. 21.) In practical terms this will mean that damages for pain and suffering will henceforth become available also in cases of breach of contract and for liability under strict liability statutes. Personal injury remains, however, an essential condition of recovery. The main impetus for reform came from the belief that the injured person deserves fuller protection also in cases of strict and contractual liability. In the seminal case of BGHZ 18, 149 the court held that the object of an award of damages for pain and suffering is twofold. On the one hand it serves to compensate the victim for a non-pecuniary loss, while on the other it serves the purpose of satisfying the victim for the wrong done to him. The traditional reason for confining compensation for pain and suffering to § 823 BGB was, accordingly, the belief that the second purpose did not apply to strict—i.e. no fault—liability. This argument is no longer considered to be compelling for three reasons.

First, the BGB, itself, has provided for damages for pain and suffering in the context of strict liability, namely in the context of § 833 BGB sentence 1 (“luxury” animals). Though this is, admittedly, a minor provision of the Code, the rule it contains would seem to undermine the above-mentioned rationale of not awarding damages for pain and suffering in strict liability cases. Secondly, and more importantly, most German lawyers would nowadays accept that the compensatory function of the award has become increasingly central in the jurisprudence of the BGH. Thirdly, the underlying idea behind the notion of compensation is, itself, sufficiently strong to justify extending liability to other grounds. The absence of fault may thus, in the future, be reflected in lower awards being made whenever the harm is not the result of proven fault. (In this sense the reasons accompanying the proposal at p. 10.) However, one must also note that if courts were minded routinely to award lower amounts in the case of strict liability (compared to “simple” negligence) there will remain a lingering incentive to invoke § 823 I BGB and thus defeat one of the aims of liability without fault. Finally, the present state of the law is unsatisfactory. Since plaintiffs are forced to base their claim also on § 823 BGB, the strict liability statutes have been undermined de facto if not de iure. Their purpose to provide a simple and efficient risk allocation in their respective areas of liability becomes futile if in almost every case the court is also obliged to investigate whether the plaintiff was negligent in the sense of § 823 I BGB. Moreover, the duties of care developed by the courts in these areas approximate in many cases to the rules of strict liability. (For a recent example of this trend see ch 3 section A 5 (c) (iv) 2, BGH JZ 1998, 358, concerning the Environmental Liability Act.)

In addition, the proposed Bill also seeks to refine the conditions of recovery. It has, for instance, been argued that damages for pain and suffering should not be awarded in the case of minor or trivial injuries. The proposed reform adopts a balanced approach and seeks to avoid the consequence of a rise in insurance premiums (see Bollweg NZV 2000, 185, 187). The means to achieve this is to exclude minor injuries from the scope of § 253 II BGB (in which, at present, courts award amounts less than DM 1,000). However, given that the threshold will be controversial, this might diminish the effect of simplifying procedures. (In that sense, the recently retired President of the BGH, Dr Karlmann Geiß in DAR 1998, 416, 420.) Consequently, the new § 253 II BGB stipulates that if damages for pain and suffering are to be awarded the injury must not be insubstantial (“nicht unerheblich”) in nature and duration. This limit, however, will not apply where the injury was caused with intent (“vorsätzlich”).

Unlike § 844 II BGB which, as we have seen, expresses a clear preference for the annuity system, § 847 BGB is silent as to the form the award has to take. In the event, it provides one of the clearly exceptional cases where the lump sum is the solution both favoured by theory and adopted by practice. This, however, does not mean that annuities cannot be paid in addition to or in lieu of lump sum awards if the circumstances of a particular case make this the more appropriate form of payment (see BGH NJW 1957, 383). But annuities for pain and suffering cannot be index-linked (BGH NJW 1973, 1653).

The leading case on this topic (BGHZ 18, 149) is reproduced in full (case 140) and it deserves careful reading. In the words of the Great Senate, “. . . damages for pain and suffering have a dual function. They are meant to provide the injured party with adequate compensation for that kind of damage. At the same time, however, they are meant to indicate that the tortfeasor owes the victim ‘satisfaction’ for what he has done to him.” This latter element, however, brings the tort award close to the realm of criminal law and since punitive damages in civil actions are, on the whole, frowned upon in the civil law systems, this heading has caused considerable discussion. (See, however, BGHZ 35, 363; von Bar, “Schmerzensgeld und gesellschaftliche Stellung des Opfers bei Verletzungen des allgemeinen Persönlichkeitsrechts”, NJW 1980, 1742; E. Lorenz, Immaterieller Schaden und “billige Entschädigung in Geld”. Eine Untersuchung auf der Grundlage des § 847 BGB (1981).) Apart from this doubtful situation therefore, the notion of punitive damages in a civil action, so well known to American (and less so English) law, is (in theory) ignored by the German system.

Fair compensation and satisfaction are notions so inherently vague that they inevitably allow much room for judicial discretion. The courts accept that they must undertake the task in an “equitable manner” (billiges Ermessen). (BGH MDR 1993, 847.) One of the most important elements that can be taken into account is the relative economic strength of the parties so that on occasion it may be equitable to increase the tortfeasor’s liability in a way that will reflect his economically robust position. Whether the tortfeasor is insured or not is also a factor that can be taken into account and this irrespective of whether the insurance is obligatory or simply widespread (BGHZ 18, 149, 165). (Cf. English law where the financial means of the defendant are not taken into account, and awards are not adjusted upwards (if the defendant is properly insured—e.g. Fletcher v. Autocar and Transporters Ltd. [1968] 2 QB 322, 335, per Lord Denning MR), nor downwards (if the award will be ruinous to him—as per Lord Lloyd’s statement in Wells v. Wells [1999] 1 AC 345, 373). Apart from § 829 BGB, this is the only other paragraph in the Code that allows such economic factors to be openly considered by the courts when determining the level of awards. However, according to § 829 BGB both the ground for holding a person liable as well as the extent of his liability are determined according to the principles of equity, while according to § 847 BGB only the extent of liability is so to be fixed. (The differences and similarities of the two sections are usefully considered in case 140.)

In fixing these awards the German courts tend to attach much importance to the pain suffered by the victim. The great intensity and duration of the pain will thus help push the awards higher (BGH VersR 1960, 401; BGHZ 18, 149; BGH 16 December 1975, NJW 1976, 1148.). It comes as no surprise, therefore, to see that the various special Tables of Cases, which collect and systematise the case law, structure their account of awards for damages for pain and suffering according to the injury suffered by the victim. For instance the Beck’sche Schmerzensgeldtabelle 4. edn. (2001) comprises more than 2700 judgments ordered in such a fashion. Needless to say that this kind of book ensures at a general level the uniformity of awards by providing judges with a starting guideline which they can then adjust to fit their own case. But the actual award must, nonetheless, be calculated de novo taking the circumstances of the individual case into account; and the judge must give his reasons for the sum he has reached. (BGH 8 June 1976, VersR 1976, 967.) The mere fact that a comparable award was made in a similar (or apparently similar) case is not sufficient justification. (BGH, 24 May 1988, NJW 1989, 773.)

The way the material is presented in these works is also interesting. For in almost all cases the information given about the facts of the case is confined to the type, duration, and further peculiarities of the injury suffered. For instance how many operations were necessary, how quickly the plaintiff recovered from it etc. The personal details of the plaintiff are also given—e.g. his age and health and whether the injury affected the exercise of his profession—but little if anything said about the wrong itself, the degree of the defendant's fault etc. As we noted earlier, this underlines the general observation that in most cases the purpose of compensation clearly stands in the forefront of awarding damages for pain and suffering. The aim of satisfying the plaintiff for the wrong done to him may play a role in the individual case, in particular if the defendant was grossly negligent but has generally come to weigh less in the mind of the judge. The same is true if the claim is based on an infringement of privacy carried out in order to make a profit. But the plaintiff's satisfaction is by no means the overriding consideration. It is interesting to note that the defendant's conduct after the tort may, in exceptional cases, also be a factor. For instance, where the settlement of the claim is unnecessarily delayed by the defendant's insurer, the award may be increased considerably. (E.g. OLG Frankfurt NJW 1999, 2447, doubling the regular award).

Generally speaking, this is regarded as a subjective heading of damage. So, if pain is not experienced, either because the victim was rendered unconscious by his injuries or because pain-killers have helped reduce his pain, the sum awarded was, until fairly recently, diminished or even be obliterated (see BGH NJW 1982, 2123, reproduced in the 3rd edn. of this book at p. 959). In some instances (BGH 16 December 1975, BGH NJW 1976, 1147; BGH 22 June 1982, NJW 1982, 2123) the BGH felt that the money awarded should be seen as a "symbolic atonement" "for the interference with rights and interests unconditionally protected by the legal order". Thus for these courts, the unconsciousness removed the element of "compensation" and "satisfaction" from the notion of Schmerzensgeld. Such phrases, however, help to confuse rather than clarify the issues, especially if one is trying to see German law from the optic of the English Common law. For the use of words such as "atonement" can again appear to be trespassing into the area of criminal law. More importantly, it could be argued that German law, which on the whole does not follow rigidly to the English headings of damages, was in some of these cases trying to compensate the victim's loss of amenity and not his pain and suffering which he clearly was not experiencing. Such an interpretation, if plausible, would bring the two systems closer together. For, once again, it would approximate the result achieved in England (H West & Son Ltd v. Shephard [1964] AC 326) where loss of amenity is compensated objectively, i.e. irrespective of whether the victim is aware of the loss. (On the above see E. Lorenz, op. cit.) But whatever the merits of such a "conciliatory" approach, it is now been overtaken by the important decision of the BGH of 13 October 1992, case 143, BGHZ 120, 9 (with an approving note by Gießen, JZ 1993, 519; followed in BGH NJW 1993, 1531), which adopts a more generous position towards plaintiffs.

First, the court felt compelled to depart from the previous case law if it were to give adequate weight to the victim's right to have his personality protected (Article 1, 2 I GG). Secondly, the purpose of an award of damages for pain and suffering was not primarily to satisfy the victim for the wrong done to him. This is necessarily subjective and was relied on by the older judgments. In the decision of 1992 the BGH stressed that the purpose of compensation provided the real basis of recovery in such a case and that accordingly damages were not to be reduced if the victim was not aware of the loss. The "objective" predicament of the victim's personality as such called for compensation. It was thus inconsequential that the plaintiff did not suffer pain. The damages that must thus be awarded to unconscious plaintiffs must be calculated by reference to all the relevant circumstances (angemessene Entschädigung). The court also felt that the notion of Schmerzensgeld does not only perform a “compensatory” function but also helps serve the notion of human dignity (Würdefunktion). In the light of this, it may no longer be necessary to reduce visibly the plaintiff’s compensation because of his unconsciousness.

A similar approach was deployed in the controversial decision of BGH 9 November 1993, BGHZ 124, 52 (annotated by Laufs, NJW 1994, 775; Taupitz, JR 1995, 22; Rohe, JZ 1994, 465). In that case the plaintiff knew he would become infertile as a result of an operation. Therefore, he instructed the defendant to preserve his sperm in order to be able to have children after the operation. The sperm was negligently destroyed. It was held that the donor was entitled to damages for pain and suffering (§§ 823 I, 847 BGB). In order to arrive at this conclusion the court had to surmount another obstacle. It had to show that the destruction of the sperm amounted to physical damage to the plaintiff’s “body” (§ 823 I BGB). The court affirmed that the destruction of the sperm constituted the violation of one of the protected interests in § 823 I BGB, namely bodily integrity. Yet, in the ultimate analysis, liability was based on the protection of the plaintiff’s personality (Article 1 I, 2 I GG). The court argued that taking the possibilities of modern medicine into account it was necessary to define “body” in the light of the victim’s right of self-determination. Thus, if part of the body is separated from it, it will be decisive whether the plaintiff intended to make use of the separated part’s function (sperm) or to re-implant the severed part (blood donation) at a later stage. In assessing the amount of damages, the court stressed that the knowledge of no longer being able to ever have children was a heavy burden upon the plaintiff. On the other hand the defendant’s negligence was only slight. On balancing these factors the court arrived at an amount of DM 25,000 of damages for pain and suffering.

Apart from pain, mental suffering is also compensated. English law usually tends to use a global term such as “loss of amenity” or “enjoyment of life” for all sums given to the victim to alleviate his anguish for loss of a particular enjoyment or pastime or pleasure. Clearly, a footballer who has lost his legs or a pianist who has lost his fingers will have to receive additional compensation for these very personal losses. This is certainly true in German law as it is in English law, though in the former mental suffering appears classified under different subheadings. Thus mental suffering occasioned by disfigurement (especially in the case of a woman) will be compensated; and this sum will be additional to any economic loss claimable as a result of the disfigurement (BGH NJW 1959, 1031; OLG Celle NJW 1968, 1677). Mental suffering caused by loss of marriage occasioned by disfigurement will also be compensatable (BGH NJW 1959, 1031). On the other hand, German law has not known (as English law did until the Administration of Justice Act 1982 abolished it) an independent heading for “loss of expectation of life”. But anguish caused by the realization of a shorter life expectancy can be and has been taken into account when calculating the sum for satisfaction (BGH VersR 1961, 374).

Perhaps one should conclude by saying that the above are mere illustrations of some of the headings of recoverable harm. For a fuller list and the amount of damages recoverable one must consult the case law and the “Tables of Damages for Pain and Suffering” already referred to and which are customarily used by judges as the starting-point for their calculations. So here we shall only give a first impression of the current general level of awards. (The examples are taken from Beck’sche Schmerzensgeldtabelle 4. edn. (2001)).

Starting at the lower end one must note the great number of cases where awards are below DM 3,000. Courts can disregard only obviously trivial injuries (Bagatellverletzungen); but the criteria appear to be strict. (BGHZ 132, 341; BGHZ 137, 142 reproduced above, case 90; BGH VersR 2000, 372; all concerning psychiatric illness.) As was already stated, in the reform proposals very minor injuries will not, in the future, justify an award of damages for pain and suffering. Such injuries are at the moment compensated with sums that are below DM 1,000. (See, for instance, decisions no. 47, 896, 2491, 55 etc. all concerning the so-called "HWS-Syndrom" (whiplash) and in which between DM 100 and 200 were awarded.) In the overwhelming majority of cases in which the plaintiff suffers from whiplash the awards are below DM 2,000 (references in op. cit., pp. 518 ff.). This syndrome is one of the typical effects of a car accident and is therefore also one of the most common claims brought under § 847 BGB. By excluding minor injuries the reform might well have a major impact in this area. In any case, one finds only 9 decisions where more than DM 10,000 were awarded for this condition and in all of them the injury was serious and had long term effects.

Awards in nervous shock cases (see above, cases 1–3) where close relatives suffered from psychiatric injury from learning of the death of the victim are also relatively small, usually in the area of DM 10,000 or less. But notable exceptions can be found. Examples of cases of "distant" shock, where the "secondary victim" was merely informed of the death, are: no. 606 (LG Gießen ZfS 1987, 39). There the mother suffered from a severe depression when her 10 year old daughter was attacked and killed by two shepherd dogs. The award was DM 10,000. Case no. 2719 (OLG Oldenburg, 1998) concerns a father who suffered from "medium" depression after receiving the news of the death of his 17 year old (adopted) daughter. He was awarded DM 20,000. In case no. 2036 (OLG Nürnberg DAR 1995, 447), the plaintiff suffered from severe depression, his three children were killed in a traffic accident caused by the gross negligence of the defendant. DM 70,000 were awarded. This seems to be the current maximum. It is interesting to note that the awards are not significantly higher where the "secondary" victim actually witnessed the incident. The highest amount seems to be that of Case no. 711, LG Verden 1982, DAR 1988, 320, where the father witnessed his youngest son being run over by a drunk driver. DM 15,000 were awarded. An extreme case is no. 2467 (OLG Nürnberg, 1998) where two infants witnessed how their mother was shot. Despite the horrific nature of the incident, only DM 10,000 were awarded. Similarly, in cases where the "primary victim" suffered nervous shock as a result of the accident the awards are also not higher than in the case of "distant" shock. The highest award seems to have been DM 25,000 in no. 799, BGH VersR 1986, 241, victim in constant medical treatment, accident neurosis. Another area where the awards are small involves injuries such as bruises, contusions, or lacerations (references, op. cit., pp. 588 ff.). The range is from zero to DM 25,000 (no. 2655, LG Braunschweig), while most awards are below DM 2000. In the case decided by the LG Braunschweig the victim had additionally suffered brain damage and lost the sense of smell completely. This leads us to the more serious types of injuries.

The awards in cases of brain damage are naturally among the highest (references, op. cit., pp. 123 ff.). So for instance the OLG Hamm (no. 780) awarded in 1997 DM 500,000 of damages for "pain and suffering" to a 14 year old child which needed constant care and was borne with serious brain damage as a result of medical malpractice. One can find at least 14 further examples of decisions from the last decade where the awards exceeded DM 200,000 and where the injury consisted in serious brain damage with the consequence that the plaintiff could no longer take care of himself (pp. 135–138). Similar figures can be found in cases where the brain damage caused blindness (p. 138) or deafness (p. 142) etc.

Awards are also high where arms or other extremities had to be amputated. See, for instance, case no. 1881 (OLG Frankfurt) where DM 135,000 were awarded for pain and suffering (The victim had also incurred serious knee injuries). An extreme case is no. 824 (OLG Hamm) where the 17 years old victim lost all her fingers except her thumbs. She was awarded DM 30,000 (in 1988). In the case of quadriplegia (Querschnittslähmung), references, op. cit., pp. 326 ff., the awards are regularly around DM 100,000 depending on the circumstances of the case and can go up to and above DM 300,000 (15 decisions from the last ten years or so from different regions). In two cases the plaintiff was awarded DM 500,000 (no. 2469, LG Flensburg, 1997, and no. 1067, LG Oldenburg, 1989; in both cases the plaintiff was a child when injured).

A special category form the cases of infringement of personality rights (references, op. cit., pp. 685 ff.) where in the wake of the “Caroline” jurisprudence of the BGH (discussed above, notes to cases 39–49) the level of awards was drastically increased. (In the Caroline case, itself, no. 2298, OLG Hamburg, 1996, the final award was DM 180,000 (note however that three newspaper articles violated the plaintiff’s rights which, in common law terms, count as three separate causes of action.) So far this seems to be also the maximum award). (For further details on privacy cases see discussion above, chapter 2, section A.2, 3(iv).) In this category one can also include unlawful restrictions of personal freedom, where the maximum award has been DM 500,000 (no. 1997, LG Marburg, 1995). In this case the plaintiff was locked up in a psychiatric hospital for 9 years and treated with 2.3 kg of anti-depressant drugs (Neuroleptika) during this period. The defendant was the doctor who had negligently diagnosed the plaintiff’s condition and had led to his incarceration.

Article 3 I of the Constitution requires, in essence, that similar cases should be treated in the same way. This provision, which embodies a fundamental principle of justice, can also have indirect horizontal effect with important procedural consequences: in principle plaintiffs could seek to rely on Article 3 GG if awards in one area are unjustifiably lower than in some other area and bring the case before the BVerfG. For instance, after the Caroline jurisprudence awards in the field of personality rights are likely to increase substantially. Is it fair then if victims of nervous shock are awarded—on average—lower amounts? Recently, this question came before the BVerfG. (See, decision of 8 March 2000, NJW 2000, 2187, case 146). In that case, (already referred to above OLG Nürnberg, no. 2036) the plaintiffs suffered nervous shock upon learning that their three children died in a car accident negligently caused by the first defendant (the second defendant being the first defendant’s insurer). The Court of Appeal awarded them DM 70,000 and DM 40,000 respectively and founded its decision primarily on the seriousness of the psychiatric illness. The BGH dismissed an appeal against the size of the award. The plaintiffs then referred the case to the BVerfG. The Constitutional Court thus had to decide whether the award was arbitrary in so far as the level of damages was below what can nowadays be given in cases where the right to one’s personality had been violated. The court held that the different levels did not entail an unjustified discrimination between different categories of plaintiffs. (To put it more explicitly: between claimants such as Caroline of Monaco who complain about an unfair or misleading newspaper article and are awarded DM 180,000, and “ordinary” parents who lose their children in horrific circumstances.) The judgment of the civil courts thus did not violate the plaintiffs’ right “to equal treatment” under Article 3 I of the Constitution. The reason why the apparently “unequal” treatment was justified is this. In cases of infringements of the right to privacy (Article 1 and Article 2 I GG, discussed below) the rationale of awarding substantial (by German standards) non-pecuniary damages is that without such awards, violations of one’s dignity would very often not entail any legal sanctions. One of the main considerations in assessing such damages is, therefore, deterrence (and, incidentally, assume thus also a restitutionary function). This, in turn, requires one to take account of the expected profit that will have resulted from the intrusion. (Interestingly enough, the court remarked that these damages were not restitutionary in the sense that all profits were to be handed over.) On the other hand, in the case of damages for shock no such deterrent reasoning was called for. For nervous shock cases arose typically in the context of car accidents—as the present case clearly illustrated—and were not deliberately caused or motivated by commercial motives. As a result, the judgment of the civil court did not violate any rights of the plaintiffs under the Constitution. As to whether or not the assessment of damages in the instant case was accurate, this was not for the Constitutional court to determine. The decision is remarkable not only because it demonstrates once again the difficult task of the Constitutional Court to strike a balance between upholding constitutional values and respecting the jurisdiction of civil courts, but also in the way that this conflict was finally resolved. Thus the implicit invitation to treat the high awards in the “Caroline” cases (of recent vintage and approved of by the BVerfG, see case 47) as a basis for increasing the level of damages under § 847 BGB on a large scale was turned down and potentially far-reaching financial consequences were skilfully averted by the Constitutional court. An interference with the competence of the “ordinary” courts to assess damages on the merits of the individual cases was also avoided, the Constitutional court exercising self-restraint and accepting that in privacy cases there were other material factors which justified a more generous approach.

So far we have been considering the case of an accident victim who survives his injuries. If the victim dies, problems of a different nature arise. Some of them are related to the new cause of action, which is given to his dependants and will be discussed in the next section (in English law known as the Fatal Accident action). The problem that will be dealt with here, however, is different and concerns the issue of active transmissibility of the victim’s action to his heirs. (Since the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act of 1934 English law has recognised this possibility without any restrictions, save that in the case of defamation the cause of action dies with the injured person; also penal damages cannot be claimed by the estate.)

Until recently the position of German law was opaque and unsatisfactory. This was because according to § 847 I, 2 BGB the right devolved upon the victim’s heirs only if the injurer recognised this by contract before the victim’s death or if a legal action had been commenced before that time. Whatever the original justification for this limitation, in practice it caused much dispute and an unsavoury scramble to institute actions as soon as possible after the accident lest the victim die too soon (see BGHZ 69, 323; BGH NJW 1984, 2348). The position was thus deemed unsatisfactory (see Deutsch, Haftungsrecht I (1976), 477; Kötz, Festschrift von Caemmerer (1978) 389, 404) and, in the end, transmissibility facilitated by the legislative abolition of § 847 I 2 on 14 March 1990. (BGBI. I, 478.) For more details on the old position see page 684 of the 2nd edition of this work. For the transmission of the deceased’s Schmerzensgeld to his heirs see: BGH 6 December 1994, NJW 1995, 783. So the victim’s heirs will obtain—through his will or the rules of intestacy—the amount awarded to the deceased for his pain and suffering. The amount thus awarded to the deceased (or, rather, his estate) will, of course, vary depending on how long he lived between injury and death. The above will, however, make clear that no damages are awarded to the “dependants” of the deceased victim. This is because the rules that determine their rights can be found § 844 BGB and this provision does not allow such a heading of damages. In the final result German law thus, once again, comes closer to English law (which also does not allow solatium except in the limited sense provided by the Administration of Justice Act 1982) than to French or American law which take a more liberal approach towards this matter.

Further reading

Coester-Waltjen, “Der Ersatz immaterieller Schäden im Deliktsrecht”, Jura 2001, 133; Deutsch, “Pläne zur Reform des Schmerzensgeldes”, ZRP 1998, 291; idem, “Schmerzensgeld für Vertragsverletzungen und bei Gefährdungshaftung”, ZRP 2001, 351; von Gerlach, “Die prozessuale Behandlung von Schmerzensgeldansprüchen”, VersR 2000, 525; Jäger, “Schmerzensgeldbemessung bei Zerstörung der Persönlichkeit und bei alsbaldigem Tod”, MDR 1998, 450; Scheffen, “Tendenzen bei der Bemessung des Schmerzensgeldes für Verletzungen aus Verkehrsunfällen, ärztlichen Kunstfehlern und Produzentenhaftung”, ZRP 1999, 189

(d) Ricochet damage in the context of fatal accidents

When the victim dies from his injuries, third parties can suffer further loss. A young girl may lose her father’s much needed financial support; an ageing relative the services of a younger member of the family; an employee may see his job disappear as a result of the death of his employer; a football club may be deprived of a sizeable transfer fee when one of its star players is killed (the facts of a classic French case: Colmar, 20 avril 1955, D. 1956, 723). The list of ricochet victims can be endless; the harm they suffer can range from emotional distress to severe pecuniary loss. Three main questions arise under this heading: the first is whether a new cause of action should be created for this type of situation, the second is to whom should it be given, and the third is what should it be for. An important supplementary issue is connected with the victim’s own fault and the effect it should have on the dependant’s claims. We shall look at all these points in turn.

The first question is whether a new cause of action should arise whenever there is a fatal accident. The answer given by all systems is a positive one, but the ways this result is achieved differ. In one group of systems (French, Belgian) the amorphous delict provisions of the Code (e.g. Article 1382 French CC) are wide enough to justify this extension. Another way is to be found in the English Fatal Accident Acts and their American derivatives, (known as the Wrongful Death statutes). These opt for specific statutory enactments expressly creating such rights, which otherwise were not recognised by the Common law. Yet a third group of systems include special provisions in the delict sections of their Codes. Germany belongs to this group and, incidentally, so do Austria (Article 1327 Austrian CC), Switzerland (CO Arts. 45, 47), and Greece (Article 922 Greek CC).

German law, always striving for logic and terminological precision, makes a distinction between loss of support, which is regulated in § 844 BGB, and loss of services, which is the subject of separate treatment (§ 845 BGB). The former, as we shall note below, typically consists of an action brought by a wife and/or child for the loss of the breadwinner/father. The latter, statistically more rare in practice, is brought by an “older” person for the loss of the services of a younger member of the family. Natural and adopted children are, in certain circumstances, under a duty to provide such services to their parents (see §§ 1619 and 1754 BGB) so that if they are injured the parents can claim their loss. (BGH 25 October 1977, BGHZ 69, 380.) When the wife is injured she can claim under § 842 BGB for amongst other things her inability to continue to provide services to her family; but where she is killed a claim for loss of support under § 844 II BGB may be available to her husband (BGHZ 51, 109). On the other hand, her work as “housewife” does not qualify as a service (Dienstleistung) to justify an action under § 845 BGB. (BGH 20 May 1980, BGHZ 77, 157.) Since similar rules apply to both §§ 844 and 845 BGB, and cases tend to overlap as the previous illustration demonstrates, it is not entirely clear that anything is really gained by this distinction between loss of support and loss of services.

To the second question mentioned above—who will be given the new right of action—three answers are, once again, possible. The most generous, adopted both by a number of German-inspired systems (e.g. Swiss CO Article 45 III; former East German Code, § 332 II) as well as by the Romanistic legal family (France etc.), grants this action to anyone who can actually prove to have suffered a loss. This approach may, in theory, cause some uncertainty to the extent that the courts have to deal with each case on its merits, but it can also produce more equitable results in a few, deserving situations. Besides, its apparent disadvantages can be exaggerated by ignoring the fact that in practice the courts have, through a cluster of causative notions, managed to keep liability very much under control. (On this see B S Markesinis, “A Comparative Look at Certain Problems of Pure Economic Loss”, published in The Cambridge Lectures 1981 (ed. N. Eastham and B. Krivy) 45–61.)

The exact opposite way is to leave it to the legislator to determine which persons will be classified as dependants in law and be given the right to sue. This is the Common law method as seen in the Fatal Accident legislation. Interestingly enough, however, the list of dependants in these Acts has been greatly widened over the years and in practice the results reached by English and French law are more similar than the different starting-points would suggest.

German law has opted for a third method. According to § 844 II BGB only those persons to whom the deceased owed a statutory duty to provide support will be allowed to sue. (Typically this includes spouses (§ 1360 BGB) and children, including adopted children and adopted parents: § 1766 BGB). This right of maintenance must exist at the time of the injury. So, if a couple gets married after one of them has been injured and then dies, the surviving spouse will not have a right of action since there existed no right to support at the time of the injury. But if the legal relationship, from which the duty to support flows, exists at the time of the injury, then the right to sue will not be affected by the fact that at that time no support was yet being provided.

This can give rise to considerable difficulties where parents claim for the loss of their child. In many cases, the parents of a young or very young child will not, at the time of issuing the writ, be in a position to make a maintenance claim from the child. On the one hand, even a future entitlement may be seen as speculative since the child might never be able to support the parents. Awarding damages in such a case could thus, in effect, be seen as amounting to a claim—and what is more a potentially substantial one—for bereavement, which is not recognised in German law. On the other hand, it would seem harsh to deny claims merely because it is difficult to assess the award. In such cases German law has thus resorted to procedural devices to reconcile these concerns. In our example, therefore, no fixed amount will be awarded until the parent actually becomes entitled to claim maintenance from the child. Nonetheless, the parents are entitled at the time of the trial to a (merely) declaratory judgment (Feststellungsklage) recognising such a right for the future. Even this “contingent” recognition, however, will not come easily. For the parents will be required to establish that it is not “wholly unlikely” that the deceased would have supported them in the fullness of time. Thus, in BGH, NJW 1952, 741, the parents’ claim was allowed even though the child was only five years of age at the time of the trial. This result was reached because of the danger that the parents’ claim would become time-barred. A right of suit was also confirmed in the case of the death of a 12-years-old daughter. (BGHZ 4, 133). Before reaching its decision, the court took account of the education planned, the “character” of the child etc. The decision is reminiscent of the English Taff Vale Ry Co. v. Jenkins [1913] AC 1; and also has American counterparts. (See, for instance, Gary v. Schwartz, 339 NYS 2d 39 (1972)—awarding to a widowed mother $98,000 (subsequently reduced on appeal to $52,000) for the loss of her sixteen-year old son who intended to become a dentist. See, also, Hart v. Forchelli, 445 F.2d 1018 (2d Cir. 1971)—a case involving the death of an eighteen-year-old boy with “tentative plans to become an attorney”.) But some American courts have extended this attempt to do “justice” to borderline situations (Haumersen v. Ford Motor Co., 257 2d 7 (Iowa 1977) awarding $100,000 for the loss of a seven-year-old child “with a talent as a cartoonist”); while a handful have literally gone overboard. (See: Andrews v. Reynolds Memorial Hospital, Inc., 499 SE 2d 846 (W.Va. 1997) where the court awarded $1.75 million for lost of future earnings attributable to the death of a one-day-old baby! Note, however, that not all courts have been willing to depart from the original model of the Fatal Accident Acts. Thus, see, Prather v. Lockwood, 310 NE 2d 815 (1974).) Such generosity is, from a legal point of view, extremely dubious if justified under the heading of loss of future maintenance. So, if it is to be tolerated or even encouraged, it is best done under a carefully circumscribed (and, preferably, legislatively authorised) new heading of damage which, in the last thirty years or so has become known in the USA as a “loss of companionship” claim. This has, indeed, happened in some States in the USA (Fla. Stat. Ann. § 768.21; Hawaii Rev. Stat. § 663–3; W.Va. Code Ann. § 55–7–6; and in some it has been accompanied by caps. (See, Kan. Stat. Ann § 60–1903: $ 100,000; Me. Rev. Stat. Ann. Tit. 18, § 2552: $50,000.) As always, however, one concession usually leads to another. In this instance the result has been that some States now even allow claim for pure grief for the death of a loved one. (See: Ark. Stat. Ann. § 27–909; Kan Stat. Ann. § 60–1904.) The resulting dichotomy between emotional harm which is not compensated in personal injury cases involving no physical injury and grief that is compensated in cases of wrongful death claims may thus not be easy to justify.

In the light of the above, the German procedural device may, therefore, be more flexible than English law without incurring the risk of giving the green light to “gold digging” actions of the kind that we find in some American litigation. Generally speaking, therefore, courts are willing to hold in the abstract that the plaintiff is entitled to the payment of a rent as soon as he would have been entitled to maintenance from the deceased. (See, also, RG JW 1909, 314; BGH MDR 1954, 160; VersR 1966, 735.) The equitable balance thus struck between the English and American positions has not, however, addressed all the problems that arise in such cases. Thus, when calculating the award, does the court have to take into account whatever amount the parents saved by not incurring the costs of bringing up the child? This is left open by the leading case, BGHZ 4, 133. So, while in theory this approach appears to be well balanced, one must question how attractive it is and, above all, how often it is encountered in practice. For, such declaratory judgments do not have much practical value. It thus comes as little surprise then that the number of reported cases seems to be very small and it seems that none of them concern the plaintiff's actual claim for maintenance: all are Feststellungsklagen. (E.g. LG Braunschweig VersR 1972, 567; OLG Hamm 1992, 44.)

An important group of potential claimants who are left without an action in German (and, very likely, English) law are fiancés (of both sexes) since before their marriage there is no obligation to provide support (KG NJW 1967, 1089). Mistresses are also treated with similar harshness and, for the same reasons, denied any right of action. Finally, to give one last example, stepsons are also denied compensation even where it can be shown that the deceased had maintained and would have continued to maintain his stepson to whom he was very attached. In the last two instances (mistresses, stepsons), English, French, and Swiss law would provide an action. In practice the right to sue under § 844 BGB will thus be given to surviving spouses, direct relatives, adopted children since in all these cases there is a statutory duty to support (see §§ 1360, 1601, 1766 BGB). The loss of a "housewife" is, like in English law, usually assessed by reference to the cost of hiring a nanny, housekeeper etc. (Kötz/Wagner, no. 536; Palandt, § 844 BGB, no. 11). To foreign eyes, German law thus appears excessively preoccupied with legal certainty even if this can lead to injustice in a number of deserving cases.

What will the "dependants" be allowed to claim? Once again there is no unanimity in the systems. For some (e.g. Common law) the action should be limited to "pounds, shillings and pence" though most recently the English Administration of Justice Act 1982 (new section 1(A) of the Fatal Accidents Act 1976) recognised a right to claim a fixed sum (at the moment £3,500) for bereavement. Rather anomalously, however, this new right is limited to a spouse claiming for the loss of the other spouse or parents claiming for the loss of a child, but not vice versa. (For details see Markesinis and Deakin, pp. 773–774.) French law, on the other hand, is again the most generous, allowing a claim for both pecuniary losses and moral damage. The German solution is very much like Common law, though where the victim has suffered nervous shock as a result of the death of a relative, he may be able to claim for it under § 823 I BGB and also recover damages for pain and suffering under § 847 BGB. Perhaps, at this stage, we should make it clear that we are always talking about the dependants claiming for their moral damage in a fatal accident action. The victim's own damages (for the period during which he was alive) will, of course, now be claimable by his estate. (For the transmission of the primary victim's Schmerzensgeld see BGH 6 December 1994, NJW 1995, 783.)

Two further points concerning the assessment of the award deserve mentioning. The first concerns the scope of § 844 I BGB. Under this provision "funeral expenses" can be recovered. In BGH NJW 1989, 2317 (case 2), the plaintiffs attempted to persuade the courts to adopt an extensive "interpretation" of this provision. The plaintiff parents had lost their twenty-two year old son one day before they were due on a holiday cruise. "Shocked" by his death they stayed at home. They claimed the price of the missed journey, which was roughly DM 10,000 inter alia as "funeral expenses". The BGH denied their claims on the ground that they did not suffer from a physiological or psychological condition in the meaning of § 823 I BGB. (Nervous shock, for which see notes to cases 1–3, above). The disappointment for a lost holiday could not be brought under the heading "funeral related costs". Some might regard this restrictive approach as a missed opportunity to extend § 844 BGB to other heads of consequential loss beyond lost maintenance and thus, in effect, award some compensation for non-material harm. But the legislative history and the wording of § 844 I BGB did not enable the court to take this step; and English law (though not the law in the USA) would seem to share this philosophy. (On German law see, also, Deutsch and Schramm, "Schockschaden und frustrierte Aufwendungen", VersR 1990, 715).

Secondly, the dependant's claim regularly raises delicate issues of res inter alios acta. They concern the question whether pecuniary "benefits" that result from the death of the person who provided maintenance are to be taken into account. English law has moved from a restrictive approach (under which pecuniary advantages flowing from the death were generally taken into account to reduce the tort award) to a more plaintiff-orientated stance. This is now found in section 3(4) of the Fatal Accidents Act 1976 as amended by the Administration of Justice Act 1982 and states that benefits which may accrue as a result of the death shall be disregarded. This formula excludes from the assessment of damages all the pecuniary gains a dependant is likely to receive as a result of the death of the person killed, including insurance money, return of premiums and gratuities. (For details: Markesinis and Deakin, pp. 776–777.) In practice the most pressing question is whether benefits that accrue from the deceased's estate must be taken into account in assessing the dependant's damages. The BGH clarified early on that, generally speaking, the value of the inheritance as such is res inter alios acta, but that the interest earned must be taken into account and deducted from the tort award. (BGHZ 8, 325; cf. RGZ 130, 258.) But in this area of the law the German courts adopt a pragmatic approach. For instance, they make a full deduction where the defendant can prove that the dependant would have been excluded (disinherited) from the succession had the deceased survived.

Another issue that can give rise to difficulties is connected with the widow's remarriage, especially if, by the time of the trial, she is financially supported by her new husband. The general rule is that the provision of maintenance by a third party is not taken into account (§§ 843 IV, 844 II BGB). However, in the case of remarriage the courts have made an exception to this rule. Damages are reduced to the extent that the widow is supported by her new husband. (BGH NJW 1970, 1127.) Mere prospects of remarriage are, however, not considered as relevant in the assessment of the award so the unsavoury task of calculating the chances of re-marriage of the plaintiff have always been avoided. (Incidentally, German law has never made any distinction between man or woman, husband or wife in these cases.) It should also be noted that the widow's claim appears to be merely "suspended": if she divorces the new husband (or he dies) the right to the lost dependency under § 844 BGB revives. (For the position of English law see Markesinis and Deakin, 774 ff.).

The last point to which we must turn our attention is that of contributory negligence on the part of the deceased/victim of the tort. Once again, there is an express provision in the Code that deals with this matter in conjunction with § 254 BGB. This is § 846 BGB which, quite simply, declares that the dependants' claim will be reduced to take into account the victim's own fault in the realisation of the harm. The solution is similar to that adopted by the English Fatal Accident Act 1976 and is irreproachable. More debatable, perhaps, is the recent extension of this principle to another factual situation (see BGH NJW 1971, 1883). Thus, it will be remembered that the widow of a victim cannot claim for her mental anguish under the German fatal accident action but can claim under § 823 I BGB for the nervous shock that she may have suffered as a result of seeing or being told of her husband's death. § 846 BGB, discussed above, will not be applicable here since the widow is not suing under § 844 BGB but proceeding under § 823 I BGB. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court held that reasons of equity dictated that once again the deceased person's own contributory fault should be taken into account and reduce accordingly the widow's own claim under § 823 I BGB. This result, which is not compatible with earlier decisions (e.g. RGZ 157, 11), has been severely criticized by Professor John Fleming in 20 American Journal of Comparative Law 485 (1972).

(e) Interference with honour and reputation

This subsection deals briefly with indemnification for interference with the general right to one's personality. This has already been discussed in chapter 2, section A.2, 3(iv) so the comments made here must be read in conjunction with the earlier observations and the notes accompanying the translated cases reproduced in chapter 2, section B.11 and 12.

The starting-point must again be § 249 BGB which, as already stated, ordains restitution in kind. In most of these cases this will mean the publication of a correction of the statement or representation that gave rise to the dispute. The correcting statement must, normally, receive the same prominence as the offending statement and it is usually the defendant who is asked to publish the correction in his paper or journal. If he refuses to do so, the complainant may claim from him the cost of a correction inserted by him. But this cost must be reasonable, so in one case where the plaintiff tried to correct his tarnished image by inserting full-page statements in some fifteen national papers, he was not allowed to claim his enormous cost of about DM 300,000 (BGHZ 66, 182).

Monetary compensation is, therefore, treated as the ultimate remedy and is most commonly claimable where pecuniary loss results from the offending statement. This will clearly arise where, for example, the victim/plaintiff has lost a lucrative contract as a result of the statement made about him. But considerable amounts have, as we have seen, been awarded in cases where no proof of such loss was forthcoming. (See, for example, the case of the Canon Law Professor, no. 41.) Here damages are awarded to provide "satisfaction" to the plaintiff rather than compensation so they are, as the Common lawyers would put it, at large (note the Supreme Court's views in the "Gentleman rider" case (no. 40, above), to provide guidelines for the calculation of the awards). This development, of course, meant bypassing the obstacles posed by § 253 BGB; but common sense dictated this result and we have seen that the Constitutional Court gave it its blessing.

A more important limitation in the granting of monetary compensation is the court's insistence that the tortfeasor's fault be serious and the intrusion into the victim's private sphere objectively serious. The laudable purpose of these limitations is to prevent individuals making capital out of the slightest intrusion into their private lives. The ultimate decision is thus made to turn on the facts of each case. BGH NJW 1971, 698 (case 145) offers an excellent illustration. In that case, a professional actress took part in a sex education film, which involved some rather explicit sexual scenes. Provocative pictures from this film were subsequently used by the defendants without her permission in order to advertise a certain product. For this she brought an action complaining of unauthorised invasion of her privacy and she succeeded. In reaching the conclusion that the interference was both grave and unwarrantable the Supreme Court took into consideration the following factors: (i) the wide circulation of the magazine that carried the advertisements; (ii) the impression given that the actress had given her permission for the use of the photos in consideration for a fee; (iii) the desire to make a large profit from the advertisement (which contrasted sharply with the educational aims of the film-makers); and, finally, (iv) the effect that this affair could have on the plaintiff's future career as a serious actress. The case is thus typical of the careful balancing of interests that is attempted by the courts in this part of the law when deciding (a) the issue of liability and (b) the quantum of damages appropriate under this heading. Overall, one could conclude this section by saying that there are, apparently, no empirical studies available providing details of such awards, the average amount is rather low (estimated to be in the order of DM 7–8,000). A first indication was given above at the end of section c. Few awards seem to exceed DM 10,000 and there seems to be less than a dozen cases that have surpassed DM 50,000. On the other hand, the reader must be reminded that there are the sums awarded for “pain and suffering” resulting from the actionable invasion of one’s privacy and that further financial losses are recoverable if properly proved. (See, for example, OLG München NJW 1988, 915.) One must also note that the Caroline cases, discussed in the privacy sections of the book, have opened the way for large awards to be made. Finally, one must note that the calculation of the damages may, in some cases, proceed on the compensatory principle of tort law but in other instances may be based on restitutionary ideas. The differences are discussed by Professor Peter Schlechtriem, among others, in Protecting Privacy, (Markesinis ed.) (1998) pp. 131 et seq. and Professor Gerhard Wagner, “Geldersatz für Persönlichkeitsverletzungen”, ZEuP 2000, 200.

(f) Damage to property

Once again the rather inadequate and fragmented delict provisions of the Code (§§ 848, 849 BGB) must be supplemented by the general provisions found in §§ 249–52 BGB. The starting-point is, in fact, the restoration of the status quo (first sentence of § 249 BGB). Taken literally, it suggests that the defendant must through his own efforts restore or repair the damaged property. However, the second sentence of § 249 BGB enables the plaintiff in the case of physical damage to property to claim the cost of restoration instead. In practice it is the plaintiff who has his property repaired or replaced and then seeks to recoup his expenditure from the defendant. Once again, therefore, what is presented by the second sentence of § 249 BGB as the possible exception to sentence one of that provision is, in practice, the rule. Monetary compensation is, however, openly recognised to be the rule where restoration in kind is impossible (§ 251 I BGB); or requires a disproportionate economic expenditure (§ 251 II BGB).

The defendant’s obligation is to make good all primary and consequential losses occasioned by the damage to the plaintiff’s property, subject of course to the rules of legal cause. Normative theories of causation (such as the scope of the rule theory) can, once again, be used to impose effective legal limits on the extent of the obligation to compensate. The evaluation takes the form of a mathematical calculation, which estimates the difference between the state of the damaged property if the damaging act had not occurred and the actual state of the property after the damaging act or event. A more recent trend favours a more liberal assessment of the damage. Older codes—e.g. the Prussian Code of 1794—made the compensation of lost profits depend on other factors (e.g. a higher degree of fault: §§ 287 1, 5, 288, and §§ 7 1, 6, 10–15; see also §§ 1325, 1331 of the Austrian Civil Code of 1811). But § 252 BGB specifically authorizes the compensation of actual damage and of lost profits. According to the second sentence of § 252, “Profit is deemed to have been lost which could probably have been expected in the ordinary course of events, or according to the special circumstances, especially in the light of the preparations and arrangements made.” However, even though this rule favours the injured plaintiff, it does not allow him to claim for a possible chance. Thus the BGH has ruled that a tenderer to a public contract which was unjustifiably cancelled could not claim his costs for preparing his offer so long as he could not establish that he would have been awarded the contract (BGH NJW 1981, 1673). The loss of a 10 per cent chance of receiving an X DM amount will not entitle the victim to 10 per cent of that amount. For losses that are certain to arise in the future but have not yet arisen at the trial, plaintiffs are often advised to seek declaratory judgments stating their relevant rights. This may be particularly relevant in order to prevent the action becoming statute barred by the three-year prescription period (Feststellungsklage).

The bulk of claims for damage to property arise in the context of car accidents. The grounds of liability were discussed in chapter 3 section 5 c (iii). (There were 2.4 million traffic accidents in 1999, 84 per cent involving only material damage. The annual pay out by the insurance companies for 1999 was 27.7 billion DM, 74.5 per cent of which concerned property damage.) This then is an important topic on which we can concentrate for our illustrations. But it is also interesting from a didactic point of view to focus our attention on this topic since it reveals very clearly how the needs of practical life (quick settlements of disputes—not always achieved in practice) have helped fashion a series of detailed rules that concretise the rather abstract provisions of the Code.

(For a comprehensive account of the jurisprudence see: Greger Haftungsrecht des Strassenverkehrs 3rd ed. (1997) Anhang I “Schadensberechnung bei Sachschäden”; and for a more recent overview Kötz/Wagner Deliktsrecht 9th edn. (2001) nos. 481–505. Recent reform proposals are discussed by Bollweg “Gesetzliche Änderung im Schadensersatzrecht?,” NZV 2000, 185. See, also, the discussion of the previous reform proposal of 27 January 1998 which then failed due to pressure from lobby groups: Geiß, DAR 1998, 416; Huber, DAR 2000, 20; Müller, ZRP 1998, 258.)

Clearly, one of the primary losses likely to be suffered by the owner of a damaged vehicle is the cost of repair. The cost of repair can also include what is sometimes referred to as the “commercial inferiority” of the repaired vehicle (“merkantiler Minderwert”). This occurs whenever the damaged vehicle, though fully repaired, becomes “marked” as a repaired vehicle and thereby loses some of its resale value (BGHZ 35, 396). It is not material in this context whether the plaintiff intends to sell the car or whether he intends to go on using it. In Payton v. Brooks [1974] 1 Lloyd’s Rep. 241 the plaintiff alleged, but failed to prove, that the value of the damaged new car was diminished even though repairs were well done. Roskill LJ, as he then was, elegantly summarised the applicable principles in the following passage:

“There are many cases which arise, whether in the field of contract law or of tort, where the cost of repairs is a prima facie method of ascertaining the diminution in value. But it is not the only method of measuring the loss. In a case where the evidence justifies a finding that there has been, on top of the cost of repairs, some diminution in market value—or, to put the point another way, justifies the conclusion that the loss to the plaintiff has not been fully compensated by the receipt of the cost of complete and adequate repairs, because of a resultant diminution in market value—I can see no reason why the plaintiff should be deprived of recovery under that head of damage also. I would only add one word of caution. This conclusion is not a charter under which infuriated plaintiffs, who have the misfortune to have their cars damaged by careless drivers, acquire an unfettered right to recover diminution of value in every case in addition to the cost of repairs. It is essential in such a case, in my judgment, for appropriate evidence to be called to prove diminution in value.”

The reverse situation arises where repairing the car has actually (and substantially) increased its value compared to the status quo ante. In principle it would be unfair to allow this to stand, for the defendant cannot be required to improve the plaintiff's overall financial position. The courts' approach is a pragmatic one. So if the replaced part would have normally lasted for the car's "lifetime" then damages are not reduced (KG Berlin NJW 1971, 142). On the other hand, if the part is already worn off and is replaced by a new part then the "betterment" must be taken into account (so called "Abzug neu für alt"); BGHZ 30, 29 (in tort). In this case the defendants burned down the plaintiff's house. The house was rebuilt and the defendants argued that it should be taken into account that now the plaintiff had a new house and therefore more than he would had but for the tort. The BGH accepted this in principle and made a reduction. However, it added that it must be sensible to make a reduction in the specific circumstances. So, for instance, if the plaintiff is not capable of paying for rebuilding the house himself it would be unfair to take the betterment into account and award him a lower amount of cost of repair than that which will be actually necessary to rebuild. (A similar approach was adopted in British Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Co. Ltd. v. Underground Electric Railways Co. of London, Ltd. [1912] AC 673, 690 (Viscount Haldane) in a contract case. The defendant supplied defective turbines. The plaintiff after having used them for a time replaced them by the other turbines which proved very efficient. Even if the original turbines had complied with the contract, it would still have been to the pecuniary advantage of the railway company at their own cost to have replaced them by other turbines. Damages were accordingly reduced. Cf. BGH NJW 1996, 584 (in contract). A more cautious note is struck in other cases. In Harbutt's "Plasticine" Ltd. v. Wayne Tank and Pump Co. Ltd. [1970] 1 QB 447 for instance the betterment caused by rebuilding a factory according to a new design was not deducted. It may have also been relevant that the plaintiffs apparently were not allowed to rebuild following the old design.)

Cost of repair will be borne by the defendant even if the plaintiff did not carry out the necessary repairs. The amount claimable in such cases will be equal to the sum that the garage would have charged had it carried out the repairs. In practice the plaintiff will claim damages on the basis of the estimate of an expert instructed by him (or by the defendant's insurance company) to prepare a report on the necessary repairs. But the plaintiff is then not required to use the compensation given him to carry out the necessary repairs. It is no concern of the law what the plaintiff does with the damages. He may thus use them for a holiday or for some other unrelated purpose. Indeed, a great number of plaintiffs resort to this method of assessing damages. (In 1998 the figures amounted to 12 per cent of the total of awards for damage to property, around 3 billion DM; figures from Geiß DAR 1998, 416, 421.) The theoretical basis of such "fictitious" damages is said to be § 249 sentence 2 BGB according to which the plaintiff may claim the cost of repair instead of having the property repaired by the defendant. However, as Professor Greger has pointed out (op. cit., § 7 StVG, no. 204), the provision does not compel one to adopt such a view since it has not addressed the question expressly. Furthermore, in personal injury claims, the plaintiff must intend to spend the money on the necessary medical treatment. Otherwise, it is said, he would be awarded compensation for a non-pecuniary loss and this would be contrary to § 253 BGB. (It will be remembered that this provision excludes as a general rule compensation for non-pecuniary loss.) But this distinction between damages for personal injury and damage to property is by no means self-evident even though the BGH (as stated above, section 3(b)) has provided some plausible arguments in its defence. (BGHZ 97, 12.) Overall, therefore, the present practice of awarding “fictitious” damages in cases of property damages must be seen as an example of the (perhaps too) generous attitude of German courts towards compensation for physical damage to chattels. Further illustrations of this trend can be found throughout the rest of the section.

The “peculiarities” of German law do not cease there. The figure claimed in the case of “fictitious” damage can, rather oddly, also include the amount of VAT which the garage would have added to its bill. (BGH NJW 1973, 1647; BGH NJW 1982, 1864.) This amount clearly exceeds the plaintiff’s real loss. Following the recommendations of the 20th Verkehrsgerichtstag of 1982 the proposals to reform the law of compensation alluded to above—2. Gesetz zur Änderung schadensrechtlicher Vorschriften—already envisage the abolition of the VAT claim where the repairs have not been carried out. (Recommended section § 249 II BGB).

“Fictitious” damages are also awarded where the plaintiff legally deprives himself of the chance of carrying out the repairs, for example, by selling the damaged vehicle (BGHZ 66, 239. But the issue is controversial. See: Greger, op. cit., no. 67 for references). This line of cases is difficult to reconcile with BGHZ 81, 385 (confirmed by BGH NJW 1993, 1793) where the plaintiff’s claim in tort failed because he had sold a damaged building to a third party. The italicised word gives a clue to the court’s reasoning. For it sought to distinguish damaged buildings from damaged cars by pointing out that cost of repair of cars was standardised. But the distinction seems weak; and a different result has been reached in the Scottish case of GUS Property Management Ltd v. Littlewoods Mail Order Stores Ltd (1982) SLT 533. (Negligently damaged building transferred at book value to an associated company. See, also BGHZ 99, 81, which concerned a claim for breach of contract.) Recently, however, the BGH departed from BGHZ 81, 385 in BGH, 4 May 2001, NJW 2001, 2250. It allowed the original owner to recover the cost of repairs in tort even after the building was transferred to a third party provided that the original owner had assigned his claim in respect of the building to the third party. The court was obviously keen to avoid awarding to the original owner what it regarded as a windfall payment.

Where the cost of repair and replacement are approximately the same, the owner of the damaged vehicle will be free to decide what he will do. It must be remembered, however, that § 254 II BGB always obliges the plaintiff to mitigate his loss. Furthermore, according to § 251 II BGB, the cost of repair must not be disproportionate. A further and more specific principle has been developed by the courts in the context of § 249 sentence 1 BGB. According to this provision, only costs that are “necessary” can be recovered. From this the courts have inferred the requirement that the plaintiff’s conduct must be reasonable from an economic point of view (Wirtschaftlichkeitsgebot). This means that if there are several ways of restoration within the meaning of § 249 BGB the plaintiff must choose the most cost-effective. Cost of replacement and cost of repair serve both the same purpose. So, generally speaking, if the cost of replacement is lower than the cost of repair, the owner of the vehicle will have to take the former option, however much he may wish to repair and retain his original car. If the plaintiff’s estimate of the cost of repair is proved wrong and the cost of repair is actually higher than the cost of replacement then he may recover nevertheless the actual cost provided that he was not responsible for the error. (Cf. Greger, op. cit., no. 42.)

A limited exception is made if the plaintiff has a legitimate and special interest in having the damaged car repaired. To give an example: a car that is particularly fitted for the needs of a disabled plaintiff (AG Lahr NZV 1990, 356). Somewhat surprisingly, the BGH extended this exception to used cars in general. Thus, the cost of repair can be claimed provided that it does not exceed by 30 per cent the cost of buying a comparable car (BGH VersR 1972, 1024. The principle and this arbitrarily fixed sum were subsequently confirmed by a decision dated 15 October 1991. BGHZ 115, 364, case 149, with an approving note by Lange, JZ 1992, 480). The BGH there argued that the interest in the integrity of the car (Integritätsinteresse) deserves special protection and it, therefore, justifies a higher award provided it does not exceed 130 per cent of the cost of buying an equivalent car. However, this seems questionable (Greger, op. cit., no. 38) if one takes into account that used cars can nowadays be easily replaced and do not reflect any specific value (as Harman LJ remarked in Darbyshire v. Warran [1963] 1 WLR 1067: a used car is not generally speaking an irreplaceable article). It is important, however, to note that cost of repair can be recovered in all these special cases only if the victim actually uses the money for repairs. Similarly, in BGH JZ 1992, 481, the court sought to limit the impact of its decision in BGHZ 115, 364 by adding a limiting rider. If the cost of repair is actually 150 per cent of the replacement value, the owner can only claim 100 per cent. The attempt that he be reimbursed for 130 per cent (paying the remaining 20 per cent himself) was rejected on the grounds that the extra repair cost cannot /should not be split into two parts. The rationale of this—to foreign eyes strange rule—seems to be that the BGH is getting cold feet with its previous decision and is trying to avoid inflated claims. (A similar solution—cost of replacement is awarded if cost of repair considerably exceeds cost of replacement—was reached in the Court of Appeal in Darbyshire v. Warran [1963] 1 WLR 1067. Unique items (e.g. vintage car), however, are not covered by this rule (cf. O'Grady v. Westminster Scaffolding Ltd [1962] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 238)).

More problematical, though equally well compensated in practice, are the so-called “consequential” losses. § 252 sentence 1 BGB makes it clear that lost profits—for example resulting from the immobilisation of a van during its repairs—can be claimed from the tortfeasor. According to § 252 sentence 2 BGB, “profit is presumed to have been lost which could probably have been expected in the ordinary course of events, or according to special circumstances, especially in the light of the preparations and arrangements made”. This means that for instance if the car is used for commercial purposes the owner will be able to recover the consequential loss of profit that results from the non use the car. This presumption, however, can be rebutted by showing, for example, that the owner of the damaged van had other spare vans that could be used for the same purpose. But what if the plaintiff deliberately keeps and maintains an extra vehicle precisely for this eventuality? Can he in such a case claim from the tortfeasor the monthly cost of maintenance of this spare vehicle? The point is disputed. (See for details Greger, op. cit., § 7 StVG, no. 199.) From a theoretical point of view it is difficult to see how an expense incurred before the accident can be treated as its consequence. But the Supreme Court has on occasion sanctioned such claims. (BGHZ 32, 280; cf. also BGHZ 79, 199.) The cost of instructing an expert to evaluate the extent of the damage may also be recovered as consequential loss (Greger, op. cit., no. 141).

It should be noted, however, that the BGH regards the cost of hiring a substitute car as part of the reparation owed by the defendant under § 249 sentence 1 BGB and does not treat it as consequential loss (§ 252 BGB). This is because these costs restore the position in which the plaintiff would have been in but for the tort. An important consequence of this is that the costs must be “necessary”. Such claims can be maintained only if the plaintiff is in some way economically affected by the loss of use of the car. The manner in which the courts interpret these criteria have far-reaching consequences. For this head of damage is the second largest of awards for damage to property and often it exceeds the cost claimed for repairing the car. Insurance payments covering the cost of hiring substitute cars amounted to 1.5 billion DM in 1994 (Greger, op. cit., Rn. 94). In the case of commercially used cars, this will not—in most cases—present major problems. (It will be remembered that while the cost of a substitute car is part of the cost of restoration (§ 249 sections 2 BGB), if the victim sustains loss of profit because he could not use the car, this is regarded as consequential loss. (§ 252 BGB).)

That the courts are generous in allowing such claims under § 249 BGB for a substitute car can be seen from the following example. The cost of a substitute car can sometimes be recovered even if the lost profit that would have been incurred if no car had been rented is less than the cost of hiring the car. In case 150 (BGH NJW 1993, 3321) the plaintiff claimed the cost of hiring a substitute cab which was more than double the amount he actually earned during the relevant period. The case raises three points.

First, although German compensation law proceeds on the basis of total reparation and thus aims for restitutio in integrum (all costs are to be reimbursed which are necessary for the complete restoration of the plaintiff's property) the rules for the compensatable harm are subject to limitations. If monetary compensation is required for restoration, the sum asked for by the plaintiff must be "necessary": § 249 sentence 2 BGB. The plaintiff cannot, therefore, take as a basis for his computation of the damage the most expensive way to restitutio in integrum if other ways exist for getting better value for money. Besides this, § 251 II BGB limits the applicability of the yardstick of restitutio in integrum. If this requires disproportionate expenditure, the plaintiff can only ask for a—lesser—"equivalent" or, if there is no such equivalent, liability is totally excluded. (For a similar rule in English law see: Ruxley Electronics & Construction Ltd. v. Forsyth [1996] 1 AC 344—a contract case. In a comparable case in Germany, however, no loss of amenity could have been awarded because of § 253 BGB). In interpreting the concept of "disproportionate", the costs of the restoration are to be compared with the plaintiff's loss that results to him from the damage to his property. When vehicles used for business are damaged, the profit, which the plaintiff loses, is therefore to be compared with the costs of restitutio in integrum by hiring of a replacement vehicle.

Secondly, it is interesting to note how the Bundesgerichtshof has approached the issue of "reasonableness". In case 150 the BGH explained that only a price for the hiring of a replacement vehicle which is "entrepreneurially unjustifiable" (in comparison with the profit which the plaintiff would have obtained with the vehicle) will be regarded as "disproportionate". In the case at hand the BGH regarded the proportionality requirement to be fulfilled although it was at pains to emphasise that the case was special (Christmas and New Years Eve trade was affected) and at the very end of the scale of tolerable conduct. The BGH's plaintiff-oriented attitude ultimately derives from respecting the victim's right to self-determination in economic terms. The court stressed that the costs were not automatically out of proportion when the vehicle hire costs are more than 100 per cent (or some other percentage) in excess of a predictable loss of profit. This was "because it is part of the nature of entrepreneurial organisation and the freedom to make business arrangements to put up with short term losses, even if these are considerable, for the sake of longer term advantages".

Finally, in this case, the rules of mitigation must arguably be interpreted in the light of the importance of the right of self-determination in the economic sphere (Article 2 I GG) and the right to the free exercise of one's vocation (Article 12 GG). (This would give these provisions an indirect, horizontal effect (mittelbare Drittwirkung). Cf. Bernicke, JuS 1994, 1004, 1008.) Generally speaking, it is for the plaintiff to determine whether it is reasonable to try to earn a living from carrying out his profession.

The same generous attitude prevails where the owner of the damaged vehicle is a private individual rather than a commercial firm. As already stated, the BGH requires that the plaintiff must be economically affected by the loss of use of the car. This is clearly not the case for instance where the plaintiff was unable to use the car because he was injured. It seems, however, that the plaintiff need not change his lifestyle and is not required for instance to use public transport if he has not done so on a regular basis prior to the accident. The victim of a road accident is entitled to hire a replacement car provided that he can show that he has regularly used the car. However, it is not a condition that the victim used the car in a commercially relevant sense, for instance to go to work. (Against such an extensive approach is Schiemann JZ 1996, 1077, 1079, arguing that, in effect, it extends liability into the realm of non-pecuniary loss). All this, however, must be constantly viewed against the duty to mitigate so that, for example, a plaintiff who happens to have an extra car available, will have to use it and will not normally be allowed to claim the cost of substitute hire. Also, if it is clear in advance that the substitute car will not be regularly used, then such costs cannot be awarded. If the plaintiff establishes according to these considerations that it was reasonable to rent a car then what can be claimed is the cost of hiring an appropriate substitute which, quite simply, means that the owner of a damaged Volkswagen cannot go out and hire a Rolls-Royce at the defendant's expense. This is self-evident.

The problem in recent years has been however that at least most hire companies have introduced special tariffs for accident car hire. It is doubtful whether these tariffs are really justified by reason of a better, enhanced service. What is even more worrying is that there is no incentive for the victim to shop around for a better price because he will be able to recover the cost of hiring a substitute from the tortfeasor's insurer. Some lower courts had attempted to limit this relatively extensive liability for car hire costs by denying recovery of special "accident tariffs"; but the attempts have proved controversial. (See Greger, NZV 1994, 337 and Tschöpe, MDR 1996, 1091 with references.) The BGH came to a different conclusion in case 151.

If the plaintiff does not have an alternative way of achieving restitutio in integrum the point of departure is the principle of mitigation which the BGH usefully summarised in the present case. The victim must choose the more economical way of rectifying the loss, within the scope of what can be reasonably expected of him. The requirement that rectification of loss should be sensible from an economic point of view does not, however, call for the victim to economise for the benefit of the tortfeasor. This is because the victim will often make sacrifices or efforts which, in his relationship with the tortfeasor, are over and above his obligations and which the tortfeasor cannot, therefore, demand from him. One must thus not lose sight of the basic concern: if the tortfeasor is fully liable, the victim should receive compensation for loss which is as complete as possible. Therefore, in examining whether the victim has kept the expenditure within sensible limits, the loss must be considered in the context of the actual circumstances. Thus, account must be taken of the special situation of the victim, especially of his individual opportunities for knowledge and influence as well as the difficulties which he might have. A more recent decision (of 30 November 1999, BGHZ 143, 189) provides us with a good illustration. Where the victim has the damaged car valued by a professional surveyor and sells it at that price, this is regarded as reasonable even if the tortfeasor informed him about a more profitable opportunity to sell the car but which would have required an additional effort in selling it.

In the case at hand the issue was whether the victim of an accident who hires a replacement car can recover the costs of hire even if the hire company charges a special “accident car replacement tariff” (up to 25 per cent above the normal rate). Such practices can be contrary to fair-trading (see BGH NJW 1995, 2355); and it is questionable whether they are founded on any reasonable extra-effort by the hire company. (See Albrecht, NZV 1996, 49.) The rationale of the present decision seems to be that these market practices in the hiring sector, dubious though they may be, cannot work to the victim’s disadvantage in the relationship between the tortfeasor and victim. The victim has no choice but to accept the market as it is and is required only to choose a reasonable tariff among the existing accident car replacement tariffs. (It should be noted that the BGH adopts a very “consumer” friendly approach also in this respect. Thus, the victim is required to compare rates only if it is foreseeable that the replacement car will be needed for a considerable period of time; see e.g. BGH VersR 1985, 1090: three weeks are sufficient; LG Freiburg Schaden-Praxis 1997, 75: two weeks). The BGH insinuated that the victim would have to lie about his motives to rent a car in order to obtain a standard tariff; this however cannot be reasonably required. Yet, the court merely assumed that the victim cannot as a matter of fact openly choose a different tariff. Whether this is really the case must remain open to doubt. (See Freyberger MDR 1996, 1091, 1092.) Moreover, the only way to put an end effectively to such practices is to deny the victim recovery of the increased cost. Calls for boycott by an insurer for instance were held to interfere with the car hirer’s right to an established and operating business (see case 35 above).

A similar situation had to be confronted by the House of Lords in Dimond v. Lovell [2000] 2 WLR 1121. Mrs Dimond’s car was negligently damaged in an accident caused by Mr Lovell. While the car was in a garage for repairs she needed a replacement vehicle to go to work. She hired a car from a car accident hire company called 1st Automotive at a rate that exceeded the usual rate of hiring an equivalent car. The only issue relevant here, namely whether the increased cost of hiring a car from an accident car hire company could be recovered (or whether the normal cost of hiring a replacement car was the maximum amount allowable) did not arise for decision. Yet Lord Hoffmann invited their Lordships to express an opinion on this point given its importance in daily life. The majority stated obiter that such damages cannot be recovered since the victim fails to mitigate his loss.

Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead dissented (pp. 1124–1125). Much of his reasoning reminds one of the line taken by the BGH even though the two cases differ in one important respect. For unlike Dimond v. Lovell, the plaintiff in the German case had actually already paid for the hire. Lord Nicholls based his argument mainly on the interests involved in the former type of situation. Normal insurance, he explained, does not provide for a replacement car; and there are a number of factors that deter victims to make arrangements for hire of a replacement car themselves. They may be required to produce the hire charge up front or may hesitate to rent a car because they are put off by the prospect of having to sue the negligent driver for the relatively small amount of hire. So accident hire companies full fill a real need. The hirer does not have to produce any money; the hire-company pursues the allegedly negligent driver’s insurers. For this additional service they charge more than the usual hiring rate (in the present case double). As suggested, this consideration does not apply with equal force to the situation in case 151. But since in Germany most hire companies charge a higher “accident tariff”, the victim will find it dif-difficult to avoid the higher tariff and would be in the end burdened with the costs of the doubtful trading practice. However, there are also schemes in operation which are similar to that used by 1st Automotive: the victim does not need to pay for hiring a replacement car but merely assigns his claim against the insurance to the care hire company. (See e.g. LG Gießen, ZfSch 1997, 454.) Lord Nicholls also pointed out the Achilles' heel of such a scheme (regardless whether the hire company offers the additional service of pursuing the claim or not). It is this aspect that raises a point of general interest. Does tort law provide rules which can deal satisfactorily with situations where there is no market mechanism to control the adequacy of the bargain? Since the victim does not have to bear the cost of the hire he will, in the end, be much less critical towards the price of such hiring arrangements. It lies in the nature of such a scheme (someone else, the insurance company, is paying for the service) that there is no market mechanism to contain the price of the service. (See in particular Schiemann, JZ 1996, 1077, 1078 and also Jaffey [2000] LMCLQ 449, 455). Lord Nicholls sought to accommodate this fear by limiting the damages recoverable to "a reasonable charge". A similar approach was adopted in Giles v. Thompson [1994] 1 AC 142 where the question was whether the accident hire contract was champertous. Lord Mustill held that this was not so provided that the charge did not exceed the market rate for car hire companies (at p. 165). It follows also from the German case law that once such extended liability is accepted the only realistic control factor is whether the rate is a reasonable one compared to the average accident tariffs which will be at an inflated level already. Hence, Lord Hoffmann was justified in warning of the danger of inflated claims. (At p. 1126.) For this reason, most German commentators have strongly criticised the decision of the BGH. (See Hootz, BB 1996, 2215 with further references.) In their view the consequence of the decision of the BGH is that the public at large through insurance premiums pays the price for the unreasonable.

From the above it should be clear that additional expenditure incurred as a consequence of damage to vehicles can, in principle, be claimed. But what if the owner of the car has incurred no such expenditure because, for example, he has not hired a substitute vehicle? The case law is rich on the subject, and generalisations can be misleading. It is clear that cost of hiring a substitute can be awarded only if a substitute has been actually hired (as explained a different approach is adopted in relation to cost of repair). If no substitute has been hired the plaintiff is in effect seeking compensation for the mere loss of use of the car. The theoretical difficulty raised by such claims is whether loss of use does, in itself, embody a financial loss or is merely a possible source of further financial loss. In principle, however, one can say that the Supreme Court has characterised the "loss of the possibility of using a car" as property loss and thus treated it as an indemnifiable item of damage. See BGHZ 40, 345; BGHZ 45, 212. The Great Civil Senate reaffirmed its stance BGHZ 98, 212, 9 July 1986, case 148. This area of the law has nevertheless remained extremely controversial (see Greger op. cit. no. 127ff. with references).

If the owner of the vehicle would not or could not have used it anyway because he, himself, was injured in the same accident, a claim will not usually be allowed because the plaintiff has not been really affected (fühlbar beeinträchtigt) by the loss of use of the car (BGH NJW 1968, 1778). The reason for this requirement becomes immediately clear if one considers the rationale behind awarding damages for loss of use. The cost of a substitute car can be claimed as was explained if the loss of use of the car affects the plaintiff economically. It was also suggested that the criteria applied by the courts in this respect were anything but strict. At the same time a plaintiff who does not hire a substitute car even though he was entitled to do so would get nothing. But in many cases using other means of transport rather than hiring a car is certainly more reasonable, prudent, and cost-effective. Therefore, awarding damages also where the plaintiff did not rent a substitute undeniably serves as an incentive not to hire a substitute and also as a gift to those who exercise self-restraint and save expense. (This point is emphasised by Medicus Schuldrecht AT I 11th edn. (1999) p. 300). It goes without saying that the amount of compensation for (simple) loss of use must be less than the cost of the substitute. In practice roughly 30% of the normal rate of hiring a comparable car are awarded and the relevant figures are published in specialised and up-to-date tables.

It will have been noticed that by calling this type of loss “property loss” the courts have bypassed once again the obstacles of § 253 BGB. However, in order to try to maintain the impression of consistency a number of theories have, finally, been developed to explain why the exception was only “apparent”. According to one view the loss of use as such represents an economic value capable of sounding in damages (Kommerzialisierungstheorie). In this sense BGHZ 45, 212. This may be plausible at first sight, but it fails to explain why the BGH awarded no such damages in the case of objects that do not typically fulfil a vital or central role in everyday life. This has been accepted for cars and for the matrimonial home (BGHZ 98, 212), but claims were denied in the case of “luxury” objects such as a racing boat (BGHZ 89, 60), a swimming pool (BGHZ 76, 179), a caravan (BGHZ 86, 128) or even a garage (BGH NJW 1993, 1793). Thus, this “evasive” action is not always possible. However, all these uses have commercial significance; evidenced by the fact that there is a market for them. The restriction of “vital” use must however be seen as an attempt to keep liability under control and the floodgates shut. In the meantime the principal area of application are claims in the context of traffic accidents. To mention just one further “theory” it suffices to refer to the “frustration” approach. The plaintiff invested in being able to use an object. Being deprived of this use amounts to a frustration of his investment. The drawback of this is that it is difficult to see why it should be relevant whether the car was a gift or whether it was bought. (This highly controversial problem is thoroughly reviewed in BGH NJW 1986, 2037 = VersR 1986, 189 and, in a less clear manner, in BGHZ 98, 212 = NJW 1987, 50 = JZ 1987, 306, reproduced below as cases 147 and 148.)

A further interrelated problem arises in the context of the lost enjoyment of a holiday. Thus, a damaged car may frustrate a family’s carefully planned holiday arrangements. Can the “lost holiday” be claimed as consequential loss? The answer really depends upon whether we are faced here with a claim for disappointment and frustration or something, which is capable of being equated with a pecuniary loss. Where there is no wasted expenditure incurred prior to the accident, the better view is to deny such claims (BGHZ 60, 214). But in another famous case (BGH NJW 1956, 1234) the German customs authorities were held liable under § 839 BGB to a young married couple whose luggage was delayed as a result of their negligence thereby ruining their honeymoon in the Canaries. (In BGHZ 86, 212 the Supreme Court tried to reconcile BGHZ 60, 214 with BGH NJW 1956, 1234.) Perhaps one should add that in recent times a number of decisions pleaded on breach of contract have allowed sums for “disappointed holidays”; and an enactment—the Reisevertragsgesetz of 4 May 1979, § 651 f II BGB, one of the few exceptions in the Code where damages for non-pecuniary loss are provided for—has adopted the same view in the narrow context of travel contracts. But what is particularly interesting in these judgments is a growing tendency to look at holidays as representing a pecuniary interests which can give rise to material loss if they are wholly or partially ruined (BGHZ 63, 98; in similar vein BGHZ 77, 116; 80, 366; 82, 219; 85, 50). This must suggest that the recognition of such claims in tort actions may be imminent though a recent decision (BGHZ 86, 212, case 141), pleaded in tort, refused to sanction such a development.

Until this happens, German law will thus differ from English law. (See Jackson v. Horizon Holidays Ltd. [1975], 1 WLR 1468 (in contract); Ichard v. Frangoulis [1977], 1 WLR 556 (in tort).) But this difference is certainly not great from a practical point of view as far as the holiday cases are concerned. The difference may be greater in relation to claims for the loss of use of a car. Thus, in Alexander v. Alpe Jack Rolls Royce Motor Cars Ltd. [1996] RTR 95 the Court of Appeal refused to apply by analogy the rule in Jackson v. Horizon Holidays Ltd. in the context of the loss of use of a car. Breach of a contract to repair a motor car, even as prestigious as a Rolls Royce, does not give rise to a liability for damages for distress and inconvenience or loss of enjoyment in the use of the car. This ruling reveals also a crucially different point of departure of the German and English courts. The English court asked whether the defendant owed a duty to the plaintiff not to cause distress by depriving him of the loss of the enjoyment of the chattel (non-pecuniary loss), while the German courts inquired whether the object is of such central importance to the plaintiff that its use acquires economic value. In English law, the cost of actual hire must be proved as special damage. It is not certain whether compensation for a pecuniary loss can be recovered by basing the claim on (simple) loss of use. (See Burrows Remedies for Breach of Contract and Tort 2nd edn. (1994) 164–165.) Occasionally, however, English courts appear to have allowed such claims. For instance in The Mediana [1900] AC 113 the plaintiff recovered damages for the loss of use of a non-profit-earning ship (and even though the plaintiff maintained a substitute ship as cover). More recently, however, Lord Mustill remarked in Giles v. Thompson [1994] 1 A.C. 142, 167 regarding claims for loss of use of a car: “In principle, if such a claim is made it will often be quantified by reference to the cost of hiring a substitute vehicle, and will be recoverable upon proof that the motorist needed a replacement car whilst his own was off the road.”

From the extensive literature on these problems see: Brinker, Die Dogmatik zum Vermögensschadensersatz (1982); Dunz, “Schadensersatz für entgangene Sachnutzung”, JZ 1984, 1010; Flessner, “Geldersatz für Gebrauchsentsgang”, JZ 1987, 271; Jahr, “Schadensersatz wegen deliktischer Nutzungsentziehung—zu den Grundlagen des Rechtsgüterschutzes und des Schadensersatzrechts”, AcP 183 (1983), 725; Hagen, “Entgangene Gebrauchsvorteile als Vermögensschaden?”, JZ 1983, 833; Kötz/Wagner, nos. 497 et seq.; Lange, Schadensersatz, § 6 VII 4b; Larenz, Schuldrecht I, § 29 II (p. 499); Medicus, “Nutzungsentsgang als Vermögensschaden”, Jura 1987, 240; Ott/Schäfer, “Begründung und Bemessung des Schadensersatzes wegen entgangener Sachnutzung”, ZIP 1986, 613; Schwertner, “Grundzüge des Schadensersatzrechts”, Jura 1987, 143, 304, 475; Weber, “Entschädigung für den entgangenen Gebrauch eines Kraftfahrzeuges”, VersR 1985, 111.

SECTION B. CASES

1. § 823 II BGB

Case 129

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 12 NOVEMBER 1957
BGHZ 26, 42

The defendant was the owner of a business running omnibuses. On 6 February 1950 he was granted a licence by the competent authority permitting him to operate two omnibuses to be employed for hire or on excursions. The licence stated expressly that the employment of the buses on regular service between specified places was prohibited.

The plaintiffs, the German Federal Railways, alleged that the defendant had regularly conveyed persons between G and L with his buses. They argued that, since most of these persons would otherwise have used the Federal Railways, they had suffered damage as a result of this unlicensed regular traffic. The plaintiffs asked for an account of the number of journeys and passengers and claimed a sum representing part of their damage. The defendant denied that he carried on regular services and contended that the Act on the Carriage of Persons is not a law serving to protect the German Federal Railways. Moreover it violated the Constitution by restricting the commercial activities of transport undertakings.

The District Court rejected the claim, the Court of Appeal of Hamm allowed it. A second appeal was unsuccessful for the following

Reasons

1. The Court of Appeal was correct in regarding as a protective law in the meaning of § 823 II BGB in favour of the plaintiffs the provisions of the Act concerning the Transport of Persons on Land which require a licence by the administrative authorities for the operation of regular traffic with land-based vehicles and provide penalties for such operations without a licence. The crucial question is whether the legislature, in providing regulations for public traffic, also wished to protect the special interest of the Federal Railways [reference]. This question must be answered in the affirmative without hesitation. The special position of the German Federal Railways within the legal framework of public passenger transport is shown by the fact that § 14 of the Act on Passenger Transport exempts them from licensing and that § 27 II only requires them to give notice of the intended establishment of a regular route. According to § 5 of the Decree for the Execution of the Act on Passenger Transport, the Federal Railways must be consulted if a dispute arises as to whether a traffic undertaking is subject to the provisions of the Act on Passenger Transport or to which type of traffic the traffic undertaking belongs. § 9 I 2 of the Decree requires the competent regional directorate of the Federal Railways to be heard if an application is submitted for a licence to operate a regular cross-country route. According to § 11 II of the Decree a licence for a regular service is not to be granted if a new enterprise constitutes inequitable competition for an existing traffic undertaking.

Together these provisions show clearly that in the proceedings of consultation the Federal Railways are granted a right to intervene as the guardian of the public interests concerning traffic but that they may also plead any adverse effects upon their own interests. This is the reason why the Federal Railways are accorded the right to start proceedings in the administrative courts if their objections have been overruled [references]. The fact that according to §§ 17 and 24 of the Act on Passenger Transport the administrative authorities also control the price and the conditions of travel is a safeguard against a ruinous competition by undercutting at the expense of the Federal Railways. The importance of the Act on Passenger Transport consists precisely in the fact that it restricts competition between the various transport undertakings because the legislature allots to each branch of transport those tasks which it can fulfil best within the framework of traffic as a whole and of the economy. In so doing, the legislature has attached special significance to the interest of the Federal Railways on the assumption that the maintenance of their efficiency must be assured in the public interest.

2. The appellant is wrong in asserting that the provisions of the Act on Passenger Transport which pursue this goal contravene Article 12 of the Constitution (GG). Article 12 I of the Constitution guarantees the right to choose an occupation freely but reserves the exercise of an occupation or trade for regulation or statute. It is generally recognised that the legislature is not prohibited in principle from regulating, in particular, the conditions for carrying on a profession or exercising a trade and from requiring a licence by the administrative authorities for commercial activities. It is equally recognized that in establishing the conditions for exercising a profession the legislature is not completely unfettered and that the essence of the fundamental right to carry on a trade must not be touched [reference]. Opinions are divided as to how the limits set for the legislature are to be drawn in detail and as to when, in particular, the essence of the right to carry on an occupation is being fettered. In this controversy the view of the Federal Administrative Court which grants the legislature a considerable measure of discretion is to be contrasted with the very restrictive view of the First Civil Division of the Federal Supreme Court expressed in its references to the Federal Constitutional Court, but these do not bind this Division [references].

The first opinion stresses that all fundamental rights contain their own intrinsic limits and is less concerned with the compelling reasons for these restrictions than with the problem of what remains of the fundamental right, once these restrictions have been recognized.

The restrictive opinion allows fundamental rights to be limited for reasons of urgent necessity only and requires the encroachment to be as small as possible in the light of the circumstances, guided by the desire to leave the fundamental right an extensive scope. Nevertheless, the First Division [references] acknowledges that the legislature may also enact laws in the interest of individual groups if this should be necessary in the public interest and does not arbitrarily detract from the interest deserving protection of other parties. In its decision the First Division also recognizes that the legislature enjoys a measure of discretion in the sphere of Article 12 I of the Constitution and points out that the judicial control of the legislature is limited correspondingly.

It is unnecessary here to discuss in detail the many attempts to determine and to circumscribe the extent of the prohibition expressed by Article 19 II of the Constitution. Even if a statutory restriction of occupational activities is only regarded as constitutional within narrow limits, it cannot be said that the Law on Passenger Transport has infringed illegally the essence of the fundamental right enshrined in Article 12 I of the Constitution by having made the commercial operation of a regular traffic route of land-based vehicles subject to a licence for the reason, inter alia, in order to save the Federal Railways from inequitable competition by motorized traffic undertakings. In this connection it is important that despite an increase in motorized traffic the Federal Railways deal with the major portion of public transport. The pre-eminent interest of the community in the efficiency of the Federal Railways is expressed in the organization of the Federal Railways by the Act of 13 December 1951 concerning the Federal Railways. The act treats the discharge of the functions of the Federal Railways as a public service and requires that in the administration of the Federal Railways the interests of the German economy are safeguarded [references]. For this reason, the operation of the Federal Railways is subject to a number of restrictions which could not be justified from a purely commercial point of view. They cannot in their discretion discontinue routes which are unprofitable and, in particular, they are not free to determine the fares. (Fares must be established, must be equal, serve social needs, and must offer free passes.) Moreover the Federal Railways are burdened with extensive maintenance obligations towards their present and past employees which private traffic operators do not have to carry. The Federal Railways would no longer be able to fulfil their function in the service of the community if private commercial motor transport operators were allowed to exploit the economically profitable routes, which alone are of interest to them, with the result that the Federal Railways would be relegated increasingly to carrying out less profitable transport services. For this reason alone, the legislature must be interested in the maintenance of the efficient operation of traffic by rail, since the service of mass traffic by the railways is indispensable in present conditions and since any interruption in the ability of the railways to function would lead to a crisis. In this connection it is relevant that any shift of public passenger traffic from the railways to motor vehicle traffic is restricted if for no other reason than because the capacity of the German road system is strictly limited. The special character of public transport makes it appear unlikely that the regulating effect alone of offer and demand can achieve a satisfactory solution to the far-reaching problems of public transport which satisfies the needs of the community. This explains why § 99 of the Act against Restrictions of Competition of 27 July 1957 [reference] does not apply to the Federal Railways and other public traffic institutions.

The Federal Administrative Court has pointed out rightly that the safeguarding of orderly operations of public traffic is one of the protected legal interests essential for the existence of the community [reference]. It is a primary task of the legislature which is concerned with maintaining and extending an efficient transport system to regulate and to plan public transport by a process of adjustment and balancing [references]. This Division cannot discern in the discharge of this task by the legislature, which must necessarily include the regulation of the competition between rail and road traffic, an act of unconstitutional interference in the freedom of commerce, all the more since public transport had already been regulated by statute at the time when the Constitution was being enacted. Moreover, it does not appear that in enacting the Constitution the intention was to question the validity of this regulation on the ground that freedom of occupation was being restricted or to restrict the legislature and the administration to measures for controlling safety and the proper conduct of trade [references]. If the public interest in an efficient system of passenger transport must be the principal object of the legislation measure for regulating traffic, the legislature was justified for this reason in regarding the protection of the Federal Railways as especially important where route transport is concerned and in fashioning its traffic regulations accordingly [reference].

The enactment of the Act on Passenger Transport does not constitute a closure of the occupation for private transport enterprises but the control of their commercial activity dictated by the overriding interests of the community. This control does not interfere with the essence of the fundamental right enshrined in Article 12 I; on the contrary, in the opinion of this Division the statutory provisions fall within the framework of the task set for the legislature by Article 12 II inasmuch as, by requiring the consent of the administration, the legislature wishes to ensure that the Federal Railways are protected against inappropriate competition and that every traffic institution is allotted that task which it can best perform in the interest of the common good.

. . . even if the refusal of a transport licence on the sole ground of insufficient need is regarded as illegal, the need for a licence remains justified in the opinion of this Division inasmuch as, apart from other reasons, the just interest of the Federal Railways in averting inequitable competition must be taken into consideration. Consequently there are no objections from the point of view of Article 12 of the Constitution against regarding the penal provision of § 40 I of the Act on Passenger Transport as a valid protective law in the meaning of § 823 II BGB in favour of the Federal Railways by penalising unlicensed route transport (as the dominant practice holds [references]). The view taken by this Division is in keeping with its decision of 27 March 1956 [reference] where the comparable provision of the Act concerning Milk and Fats regulating that market were found to protect by an action in tort dairies, the economic activities of which had been interfered with in the absence of a licence [reference]. Finally, the First Civil Division in its judgment [reference] allowed a claim under § 823 II BGB by chemists against drug stores which had contravened the Act on Medicaments.

3. . . .

Case 130

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (FIRST CIVIL SENATE) 30 NOVEMBER 1954
BGHZ 15, 315

The plaintiff is a registered association founded in 1946. According to § 1 of its statutes its purpose is to protect and to further the professional and economic interests of the Hamburg Bar.

The third defendant is an association founded in 1890 as a legal entity. According to § 2 of its statutes its purpose is to better the “tenancy and housing conditions” of the population and, especially, to protect the legitimate interests of its members. According to § 2(d) and (e) of its statutes this goal is to be achieved by providing free oral advice as well as written advice for a fee for all members of the association; in addition it offers to represent them for a fee in dealings with public authorities, civil and administrative courts. The fees payable to the association are the same as those charged by legal counsellors.

The first and the second defendants are the legal advisors of the third defendant who are entitled, according to § 8(6) of the statutes, to represent the members before public authorities and courts. Until 1 October 1952 they were paid their own expenses and 80 per cent of the fees after deducting the expenses incurred by the association. The parties disagree as to what fees are paid to them after 1 October 1952.

The plaintiff contends that the first and the second defendants have contravened the Act against Abuses in the Field of Legal Advice and the Unfair Competition Act (UWG) and that the third defendant had enabled them to carry on their illegal activity, and had assisted them.

The plaintiff has asked that the first and second defendants be ordered to desist from advising the members of the third defendants gratuitously or against a fee and from representing them in court and to order the third defendant to desist from according to the first and second defendants the right to give free advice or advice for a fee and to represent it in court.

The defendants have denied that the plaintiff has a legal interest calling for protection. They argue that the first and second defendants do not give legal advice on a commercial or professional basis. Nor did their conduct constitute unfair competition.

The District Court rejected the claim. On appeal, the plaintiff has asked as an alternative to prohibit the third defendant from handling legal matters professionally, especially by charging fees similar to those of procedural representatives or the like, and to prohibit the first and second defendants from collaborating with the third defendant in handling legal matters. The Court of Appeal of Hamburg rejected the entire claim. The plaintiff's appeal was successful in most respects for the following

Reasons

The plaintiff has based his claim for orders to desist primarily on § 823 II BGB in conjunction with § 1 I of the Act concerning Legal Counsellors. Since this act aims at protecting the citizen against the dangers arising from the employment of unqualified and unreliable persons, but also seeks to protect the Bar against competition by such persons who engage in legal advice who are not subject to the constraints relating to professional etiquette, fees, and the like created in the interest of the administration of justice, it cannot be doubted that it bears the character of a protective act . . .

The appellant is wrong in contending that the third defendant must not demand any "consideration", for his legal services, not even to reimburse him for his expenses.

The claims of the members of the association to receive assistance in legal matters follows from their membership. The expenses incurred by the association in satisfying this claim must naturally be covered somehow, be it by contributions by all members, or by special payments to those members who ask the association for assistance in legal matters. It is an internal matter to be decided as such by the association as it sees fit. The question as to whether in so doing it exceeds the limits set by § 7 I of the Act concerning Legal Counsellors is not necessarily identical with that as to whether the association may only provide "gratuitous" assistance in legal matters or whether it can do so also for "remuneration". For, as will be shown later on, even to claim actual expenses only, i.e. to provide assistance in legal proceedings gratuitously in the strict meaning of the word, may be illegal in certain circumstances; e.g. if the association grants the persons who act for it in assisting in legal proceedings a remuneration in accordance with the scale of fees for lawyers or for legal counsellors and then seeks to recover it from the members as actual expenses. The plaintiff contends, in agreement with the literature and practice, that "remuneration" in the meaning of § 7 I of the above-mentioned law consists of any money payment by a member of the association, even if it only represents a reimbursement of expenses and not a genuine remuneration. However, this Division cannot accept his view that the assistance in legal proceedings by the association must be "gratuitous" in this sense.

Contrary to the view of the appellant the wording of § 7 I of the Act concerning Legal Counsellors . . . does not indicate that this exceptional provision is to apply only if the assistance in legal matters is “gratuitous”. In so far as § 1 VII of the Act concerning Legal Counsellors permits the association concerned acting within the limits of their established task to “provide” advice and assistance in legal matters for their members, the word “provide” does compel the conclusion that the legislature only wished to allow a gratuitous activity . . . The Court of Appeal was therefore correct in holding that a comparison of § 7 I and § 1 I does not lead to the conclusion that the advice and assistance must only be gratuitous. . . .

Nevertheless, the objections of the appellant must succeed in so far as they are directed against the assessment of the remuneration in accordance with the official scale of fees. The appellant is right in stating that to allow remuneration to be charged on the scale of charges fixed for legal counsellors (§ 2(e) of the statutes) is incompatible with the provision of § 7 I of the Act concerning Legal Counsellors and therefore illegal.

§ 7 I of the above-mentioned Act is based on the consideration that voluntary legal assistance is to be judged by different standards than those activities which, in looking after the legal affairs of others, serve a gainful purpose [reference]. An association is only exempt from the need to have a licence if advice and assistance is provided within the framework of its professional duties. Its activity must be strictly limited to these tasks; it becomes illegal if the association, in exceeding the limits set to it, e.g. by the way in which it regulates the remuneration payable by its members, participates in the pursuit of economic gain, which in the case of legal advice is only permitted by the law in strictly fixed circumstances.

According to § 1 I of the above-mentioned Act, not only physical persons but also legal entities and other associations which intend to act for others in legal matters require a licence. In this connection the legislature has established special protective measures for entities which appear in the form of corporations, especially private companies and similar associations of persons. The grant of the licence depends not only on the consideration that the circumstances of the individual case justify the desired legal form for the operation [reference] but it presupposes also that the exercise of the profession is limited to the persons who are designated by name in the licence [reference]. Moreover, like individuals these associations are subject to the supervision by the President of the District Court and are controlled as to the proper conduct of their operations [reference]. The intention of the legislature expressed in these provisions to protect the community against damage and to protect the Bar which is subject to extensive restrictions against competition by an immeasurable number of persons must not be evaded or frustrated. § 7 I of the Act concerning Legal Counsellors must be interpreted in accordance with this purpose of the law. The meaning and the purpose of this Act would be reversed if the associations which have a professional basis were allowed to exercise an activity which, in the main, distinguishes them no longer from the circle of persons who require a licence. If an association with a professional or similar basis looks after the legal affairs of others in a manner which comes near to the activity of an individual or association requiring a licence to such an extent that a member of the association occupies a position in relation to the association which does not differ essentially from that towards a person covered by § 1 I of the above-mentioned Act, that association can no longer claim that its activity is permitted by § 7 I. Such is the case, in particular, if the professional association which looks after the affairs of a member demands a fee which is assessed on the scale of fees for advocates and legal counsellors. Only advocates and, to a certain extent [reference], legal counsellors [reference] may claim fees on this scale. The reason is that this profession, which is required for the administration of justice, must be guaranteed an adequate remuneration for its service and thus a dignified position in life [reference]. This consideration does not apply, however, to an association formed in accordance with § 7 I of the above-mentioned Act. It is true that such an association cannot be prohibited from seeking reimbursement for those expenses and costs incurred in the course of safeguarding the legal interests of their members. The association must therefore remain entitled to bill its members—either all of them or only those requiring legal assistance—for the salaries actually paid to its employees and for the compensation paid to an agent as well as for other general office expenses by apportioning them in its discretion without undue need for restrictions. However, the association exceeds the legal limits set for its operations if it provides assistance and support for its members on the basis of a scale of fees which is only permitted in entirely different circumstances to a circle of persons to which admission is by registration or by a licence according to § 1 of the above-mentioned Act. It is irrelevant in this connection whether in the end by using this scale of fees the association in fact made a profit by rendering assistance in legal proceedings. It is common experience that a scale of fees of this kind at least encourages the tendency to make a business out of looking after the legal affairs of others. If so, all the dangers facing those seeking advice would be allowed to materialize which persuaded the legislature to require a licence for gainfully engaging in looking after the legal affairs of others. If the professional associations were given dispensation by § 7 I of the above-mentioned Act from the need to apply for a licence the reason was because, and to the extent that, a genuine activity of assistance appeared to exclude these dangers from the outset. This privilege is, however, no longer justified if as a result of the method of determining the remuneration for its activities the association creates the same dangerous situation which the requirement of a licence sought to meet in the case of non-privileged individuals and associations.

By providing in its statutes that its fees are to be those applicable to legal counsellors, the third defendant has therefore contravened § 1 I of the above-mentioned law in conjunction with § 823 II BGB. He is therefore obliged to refrain from doing so in so far as he allows his members to be advised or to be represented in court by the first and second defendant in consideration of fees as they are established for legal counsellors . . . Since it may be assumed without hesitation that the first and second defendants were familiar with the statutes of the third defendant, they are equally liable for having contravened § 823 II as accomplices or accessories and are therefore equally under the obligation to desist.

Case 131

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 16 DECEMBER 1958
BGHZ 29, 100

The defendant and B, a merchant, were the sole shareholders and directors of a . . . private company [GmbH]. On 17 July 1954, on the application of the company, bankruptcy proceedings were started against it.

The plaintiff, who had supplied raw materials to the company over many years, claimed DM 26,604 as a non-privileged creditor. According to the report of the trustees in bankruptcy, the assets only sufficed to satisfy in part the claims of the privileged creditors.

Claiming only part of the sum registered in the bankruptcy proceedings, the plaintiff sued the defendant personally on the ground that he had neglected in several respects his duties as a director of the company and that the plaintiff had suffered considerable damage as a result. In particular he had failed, in contravention of § 64 of the Act relating to Private Companies [henceforth cited as GmbHG] to initiate bankruptcy proceedings in time, although the company had been insolvent and overburdened with debts for some time.

The District Court rejected the claim; the Court of Appeal of Hamburg allowed it. Upon a further appeal the judgment of the Court of Appeal was quashed and the case referred back for the following

Reasons

I. The managers of a private company are obliged under § 64 I GmbHG to apply for the start of bankruptcy proceedings as soon as the company becomes insolvent or if the annual or an interim balance sheet shows that the debts exceed the assets . . . The Court of Appeal regarded this provision as a law for the protection (§ 823 II BGB) of the creditors of a private company and held that the defendant had culpably violated his duty to initiate bankruptcy proceedings . . .

II. The appellant denies that § 64 I GmbHG is a protective law in the meaning of § 823 II BGB in favour of the creditors of a private company. He contends that this conclusion was ruled out by § 64 II GmbHG which hardly made any sense if § 64 I bore a protective character. This view cannot be accepted. § 64 II GmbHG only establishes the consequence as between the directors and the company if bankruptcy proceedings are begun too late. It provides that the directors must compensate the company in respect of payments made after the company became insolvent or overburdened with debts if these payments cannot be reconciled with the case of a merchant. It does not follow therefore that this provision determines exhaustively the responsibility of the directors for their dereliction of duty and that the creditors of the company are denied protection in their own right. The Act relating to Private Companies does not state whether the directors are liable to the creditors, and this question must therefore be determined in accordance with the general principles of private law [references].

The plaintiff may claim damages based on a violation of § 64 I GmbHG in conjunction with § 823 II BGB if this provision of the Act relating to Private Companies is also intended to protect the creditors of a private company and to afford them the type of protection which the plaintiff claims for himself [references]. Whether this is so must be determined in the light of the substance and the purpose of § 64 GmbHG.

1. § 64 I GmbHG provides that the directors must initiate bankruptcy proceedings as soon as the private company becomes insolvent or if the balance sheet discloses that the debts exceed the assets. If the directors fail to initiate these proceedings in time they are liable to imprisonment or a fine in accordance with § 84 I GmbHG. Clearly these provisions are intended to protect the creditors of the company as well. They, in particular, always suffer damage if bankruptcy proceedings are not begun or are not begun in time. It is obvious that the duty to apply to the court laid down by § 64 I GmbHG is also to protect them. This protection of the creditors is all the more called for as the partner shareholders of a private company are not liable personally for the debts of the company. The Reichsgericht, too, has held in a constant practice that § 64 GmbHG is a law for the protection of the creditors of the company. It has held that, while this provision does not protect everyone, particularly not those persons who are extraneous to the company, it is intended to protect not only the interests of the company but also the creditors [references].

2. The appellant argues further that even if § 64 GmbHG bore the character of the protective law, it could only protect the creditors existing at the time when bankruptcy proceedings should have been begun. If, as the Court of Appeal has held, the defendant should have started bankruptcy proceedings in January 1954 at the latest, the plaintiff could not, as regards claims arising after this date, be placed in a better position than other subsequent creditors for the reason that other claims of his were of an earlier date. At best he could claim damages in respect of the loss resulting from the fact that the dividend in respect of his claims outstanding in 1954 was smaller owing to the delay in starting bankruptcy proceedings than it would have been otherwise. However, the plaintiff had not incurred such a loss for he had admitted himself that his claims arising during the period up to January 1954 had been satisfied. As regards goods supplied between 31 January and 15 July 1954, which were alone in issue, the plaintiff could not claim any damages against the defendant on the basis of § 823 II BGB, § 64 GmbHG.

The appellant is wrong in believing that § 64 GmbHG only protects those persons who were already creditors of the company when the conditions for the operation of § 64 I GmbHG materialised [reference]. The duty of the directors to start bankruptcy proceedings continues even after this date, as long as the company's debts exceed the assets or the company is insolvent. No reason exists for restricting this continuous duty to apply to the court to the claims of old creditors, that is to say, creditors whose claims already existed at the time in which the delay occurred in making the application. The duty of a director to initiate bankruptcy proceedings exists also towards a creditor who after this date supplies goods to the company on credit or who becomes its creditor otherwise. As a present creditor of the private company he is protected against subsequent infringements of § 64 I GmbHG in the same way as are old creditors. Therefore, contrary to the appellant, the protection accorded to the plaintiff extends also to claims against the private company which arose after 31 January 1954.

3. The question remains as to how far the protection extends which the plaintiff enjoys for this period by virtue of § 64 I GmbHG. The plaintiff seeks as damages the full price of the goods which he supplied after 31 January 1954, i.e. after the date when, in the plaintiff's opinion, the defendant should have started bankruptcy proceedings at the latest. The plaintiff can claim compensation for this damage on the strength of § 823 II BGB only if the entire damage falls within the range of dangers to protect against which § 64 GmbHG was enacted [reference]. If a statute serves to protect certain persons they can only claim compensation for such damage which occurred within the range of the interests protected by the statute. Therefore, before it is possible to apply § 249 BGB on which the plaintiff relies, it is necessary first to examine the range of protection afforded by § 64 I GmbHG and to determine, first of all, whether this provision is intended to provide that protection which the plaintiff claims in his favour.

In examining the question of the meaning and the purpose of this provision it appears, first of all, that the purpose of the legislature is to secure a prompt initiation of bankruptcy proceedings in the case where the debts are no longer covered by the assets. Therefore, the legislature in requiring the directors to start bankruptcy proceedings as soon as the annual balance sheet or an interim balance sheet discloses an excess of debts over the assets, clearly aims primarily at preventing that the company assets necessary for satisfying the creditors are not available for this purpose. The intention is to preserve the company assets for the benefit of the creditors so as to allow them to receive payment and to protect them against excessive losses as a result of the bankruptcy. This protection alone, which is clearly the primary purpose of the Act, cannot assist the plaintiff, however, for the plaintiff's claim for damages is not based primarily on the ground that owing to the delay in initiating bankruptcy proceedings the assets available to the creditors have been diminished and that therefore his claim lost totally or partially. Instead the plaintiff holds the defendant liable in the first place for the fact that the plaintiff still gave a credit to the private company, the debts of which exceeded the assets. According to § 823 II BGB the defendant is only liable to pay damages for loss occasioned thereby if § 64 I GmbHG protects the interests of the creditors also in this respect, i.e. if it seeks to protect them quite generally against the dangers resulting from the continuing operation of a company the debts of which exceed its assets. It is true that the community is in fact protected in this respect as well as by the existence of § 64 GmbHG. This fact alone cannot suffice, however, to attribute to § 64 GmbHG the character of a protective act having such an extensive range. For this purpose not the effect of the law but its substance and aim must be considered, more particularly whether the legislature intended to provide such a far-reaching protection or at least accepted it [references]. This cannot be assumed, however. Confidence in the solvency and the creditworthiness of another does not enjoy special protection in trade and commerce. He who makes a mistake and suffers a loss must normally prove that § 826 BGB or § 823 II BGB in conjunction with § 263 of the Criminal Code applies, unless he can rely on contractual claims. The Act does not indicate that a different rule is to apply in relations with private companies and that those dealing with private companies are to be given more extensive protection. Gadow and Weipert [reference] and Bergenroth justify the need for special protection of the public on the ground that public and private companies are legal entities whose shareholders are not liable for the debts of the company with their entire assets. It must be admitted that a need exists for this reason to protect the creditors. The legislative history of the Act concerning Private Companies [GmbHG] shows that the fact that only the assets of a private company are liable for its debts led to the provision that bankruptcy proceedings are to be begun against the company not only if the company is insolvent, but also if its debts exceed its assets [references]. No indications exist that in enacting § 64 I GmbHG the legislature also intended, in addition to the protection mentioned above, to protect the creditors against giving credit to a private company which is overburdened with debts or from entering into business relations with it at all. If they suffer damage in this way such creditors, like creditors of an individual or of a partnership, are therefore restricted to the protection offered by § 826 BGB and by other provisions such as § 823 II BGB in conjunction with § 263 of the Criminal Code, leaving aside any contractual claims.

It follows that the plaintiff can only claim damages against the defendant on the basis of § 823 II BGB in conjunction with § 64 I GmbHG if, and to the extent that, at the time when his claim for the payment of goods sold arose he would have participated in the distribution of the assets. It is not clear whether and to what extent this was the case. Certainly the plaintiff cannot, on this interpretation of the law, contrary to the view of the Court of Appeal, receive the full price of the goods sold, which he claims as damages.

Therefore, the judgment appealed against cannot be maintained, having regard to the reasons given by the Court of Appeal . . .

Notes to Cases 129–131

1. In all the systems under comparison a rich case law can be found under the heading of tort liability for breach of statute, but there is no need to give more than a few illustrations. For, as Professor Medicus has said about German law (op. cit., no. 621), each case turns on its facts and the construction of the wording of the statute in question. Yet, some basic principles do exist and they have been discussed briefly in chapter 4, section A1(a), above. For English law see Clerk and Lindsell, On Torts (18th edn. chapter 11), and the older but seminal article of Glanville Williams, “The Effect of Penal Legislation in the Law of Tort,” 23 MLR 233. For American law see Prosser, Wade, and Schwartz, 205 ff.

2. As we have already noted, German judges are spared the need of discussing whether the legislator intended to allow a civil remedy when a particular statute has been breached—§ 823 II BGB providing, subject to what we said above, a clear positive answer. But the court still has to discover the purpose of the statute: Was the mischief that occurred the one the statute wished to avoid? Was the plaintiff the person the statute wished to protect? (For an illustration see BGHZ 108, 134.) Cases 107–109 give some idea of how the German courts tackle these problems; but other decisions, reproduced elsewhere, have also discussed this problem. (See, for example, cases 9 and 54.)

3. The search for the purpose of the statute only thinly disguises the value judgements that have to be made in each case by the court. Policy thus strongly determines the result, though it is done under the guise of statutory construction. Thus, where more valuable interests are at stake (e.g. life and not just the protection of property) the courts tend to construe the statute in a way that is favourable to the plaintiff (cf. Kornan v. American Dredger Co. 355 US 426, 78 S. Ct. 394 (1958) with Gorris v. Scott LR 9 Exch. 125 (1874)). And where certain types of plaintiffs are involved (e.g. children, workmen etc.) the courts will, again, have their interests very much at heart when “construing” the relevant enactments. (See Prosser, Wade and Schwartz, 246.)

4. Courts often talk of the “purpose” of a statute, but is there any reason why a statute should not have more than one? (See, for example, Hines v. Foreman (Tex. Comm’n. App. 1922) 243, SW 479.) Could it be that looking for “one” aim or purpose makes it easier to limit liability, if that is what the judge wishes to achieve?

2. § 839 BGB

Case 132

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (THIRD CIVIL SENATE) 30 APRIL 1953

LM § 839 [FG] BGB NO. 5

Reasons

The defendant asks first for a re-examination of the appeal court’s opinion that the police officers were under an official duty to take action against the members of a gang of thieves, two of whom later committed a break-in at the plaintiff’s residence. The appeal in law refers in this connection to the decision of 11 June 1952 [reference omitted]. There is no ground to deviate from the principles set out in this decision. Accordingly, it cannot be doubted that the police officers were under a duty to take action against those members of the gang who were known to them and who were committing crimes in their area of operation. According to the indisputable facts of the case, it was known to H [one of the police officers] that, among other things, N, who took part in the later break-in at the plaintiff's residence had committed a burglary with two other people. However, in his examination as a witness in the main proceedings before the Schöffengericht (lay assessors court) because of this theft, he deliberately gave false evidence in order to help N, who was in fact acquitted, as were the other perpetrators, for lack of evidence. Shortly afterwards, K as well as H found out the names of all those involved in the burglary. Both, however, still failed to bring a criminal charge. H and K therefore had definite knowledge of the serious crimes committed by the gang and in particular of the co-perpetrators of the break-in later committed at the plaintiff's. This left them no room for discretion when deciding whether measures were necessary against the perpetrators known to them. Criminal prosecution of law-breakers and preventing crimes came within the scope of the official tasks of the two officers as police officers. Non-intervention by them in the given situation could not be justified by any sort of objective or policing considerations. Remaining inactive was unambiguously outside the boundary of discretion of "harmfulness". A situation of danger was present which made action by the police officers an unconditional duty.

The question was raised in the said decision of how the establishment of the boundaries of discretion of "harmfulness" or of "excess" is to be treated in the individual case. Was it a pure issue of law and to be undertaken by the court "in accordance with relevant considerations" [reference omitted]? Or was it a question here of a "pure issue of discretion" to be decided by the appropriate authority, which the judge cannot generally re-examine [reference omitted]? No final position needs to be taken here on this question. Even if the establishment of the boundaries of discretion is in principle regarded as a "pure issue of discretion" which cannot generally be re-examined judicially, the police officers involved were still under a duty to take action. This is because we have a case here in which even a decision based on discretion (which is not in principle subject to judicial re-examination) can still be subjected to such a re-examination. The officer's failure to act was not based on a weighing-up of the arguments for and against in accordance with objective considerations but was based exclusively on irrelevant and purely personal grounds. They therefore have acted with such a high degree of impropriety that their behaviour—and this needs no further explanation in the given circumstances—is irreconcilable with the requirements of proper police administration and does not satisfy the needs of proper administration from any possible point of view [references omitted].

2. The further question of whether the official duty violated by the police officers by failing to act against the gang also existed against the plaintiff as a "third party" in the sense of § 839 of the BGB was, likewise, correctly answered in the affirmative by the appeal court.

According to the case law of the Reichsgericht [reference omitted], which the Senate followed in [reference omitted], the question of whether an official duty is owed by an official to a third party is to be adjudged taking into consideration the officer's official area of activity and the type of work which he is carrying out. In this connection the main emphasis is on the purpose which the official duty is to serve. If this is imposed on the officer in the interests of individual persons, everyone whose interests are, according to the special nature of the official business, affected by it will be a third party. But if the purpose of the official duty is only the maintenance of public order or the interest which the state has in officials carrying out the responsibilities of their office properly, the official owes no duty to third parties, even if there is indirect intrusion into the interests of third parties by the exercise of this duty. The task of preventing crimes is not however owed by the police in the interest of the general public alone, but, as to crimes which also intrude directly into the protected legal sphere of the individual, to the endangered individuals as well. If the police do not properly fulfil this task, this not only violates a duty owed by the police to the general public but also a duty owed by it to the endangered individuals.

The appeal in law refers in this connection to the decision of the Reichsgericht in [reference omitted] in which the duty imposed on the state prosecutor by § 152 (2) of the Criminal Procedure Code to prosecute for crimes is described as a task serving exclusively the interests of the general public. It then takes the view that in this respect the task of the police could not be regarded in any different way. But it can be left open in this case whether and, if appropriate, how the area of responsibility of the state prosecutor and of the police is to be judged differently in relation to the prosecution of crimes. This is because the issue is not the duty of criminal prosecution incumbent on both authorities but the duty to prevent crimes, which falls on the police as a task arising directly from their duty of protection from danger. For the state prosecutor a general direct responsibility to prevent crimes does not exist; at the most it arises only insofar as the purpose of prosecution for crime is to prevent further crime. In this respect therefore the reference to the decision of the Reichsgericht mentioned above misses the point.

The appeal in law further takes the view, having regard to [references omitted], that the general duty of protection by the police (and therefore also their duty to prevent crimes) is not a duty owed to third parties but only to the general public. This would be so at least as long as no concrete relationship to a definite third party has yet developed and the actual person harmed has not so far stood out from the mass of people who could be harmed. In the present case, no such actual relationship to a particular person harmed has yet been established. The possible crimes which lawbreakers known to police officers might commit could have been directed against simply any inhabitant of the area concerned and therefore against an entirely undetermined circle of people. The duty of the officers was owed only to the general public and not the plaintiff as a member of the general public, which should be protected. That cannot however be agreed. A person who stands out from the mass of people at risk because he was specially at risk is not the only person to be regarded as a third party to whom the police owe a duty to prevent crimes, as was the case with the facts which formed the basis of the decision [reference omitted]. The circle of third parties should be drawn much more widely. Thus the Reichsgericht has, among other things, regarded the fulfilment of the general protective duty of care (subject to the prerequisite that exercise of public power is in question) as among the official duties owed by an official to every third party [reference omitted] and confirmed that the official duty of a teacher supervising a ball game is owed to anyone not participating who could come into the area of the game [reference omitted]. Accordingly, the duty of an official to prevent improper use of service vehicles has also been described by the Senate in the decision [reference omitted] as an official duty which exists against every highway user with whom the vehicle could come in contact while it is being improperly used. Therefore the duty of the police to prevent crimes must also be regarded as an official duty which is owed to anyone whose legal interests are endangered by a violation of this duty.

In the present case the following additional considerations also arise in this connection. All officials entrusted with the exercise of public power have an official duty to refrain from any misuse of their office. An official can make himself guilty of an improper exercise of office by omitting to act within the framework of the public power entrusted to him. That is always the case when the official duty unambiguously requires such action but the action does not take place because of completely irrelevant, purely personal and reprehensible reasons. It needs no further discussion that the police officers H and K have made themselves guilty in this respect of a misuse of office. However, the duty to refrain from any misuse of office is owed by the officials to anyone who could be harmed by the misuse [references omitted]. It cannot therefore be doubted that the official duty of the police officers to act as police against the gang was also owed to the plaintiff.

Case 133

BUNDESGERICHTHOF (THIRD CIVIL SENATE) 10 JULY 1980
NJW 1980, 2194 = VERSR 1980, 946

Facts

The plaintiff demands compensation from the defendant city because of violation of the duty of protective care in relation to highways. On 3 June 1975 at about 9.45 pm the plaintiff's wife, who was driving the plaintiff's car, turned left at a dual carriageway (the A Ring). There was a hedge (which has since been removed) approximately 1.2 metres in height on the central reservation. The plaintiff's wife crossed the lane which led to her right, drove through a gap in the central reservation, tried to turn into the lane leading left and collided with a car approaching from the left. The plaintiff claimed that his wife edged carefully into the lane and could not see the other vehicle in time because the hedge was too high.

Reasons

I. The appeal court found no violation of the defendant's duty of protective care and in this connection stated that the central reservation did not form part of the highway. It was true that a duty to warn about limitations on visibility, which were not obvious (or to remove them), could also exist for areas outside the street. But here the restriction on visibility caused by the hedge was obvious anyway. The danger was in the end due to the conduct of the plaintiff's wife, who turned to the left without taking sufficient precautions. A reasonably experienced driver would have been able to cope with the situation in question. Besides this, a claim under § 839(1), sentence 2 of the BGB would not arise as the plaintiff has another option for compensation by claiming against his wife.

There are fundamental legal objections to this judgment.

II. 1. The appeal court's starting point, that a violation of the duty of protective care in relation to highways by the officers of the defendant is to be assessed in accordance with the provisions on official liability (§ 839 of the BGB, Article 34 of the GG), is certainly correct. According to § 10, paragraph 1 of the Highways Act of Lower Saxony of 14 December 1962 [reference omitted] the building and maintenance of public highways (inclusive of the federal trunk roads) and surveillance of their safety for traffic falls on the organs and public employees of the body dealing with them, as an official duty in exercise of state activity. This formulation contained in the public law statutes of the state (Land) of the duties of the office holder of a municipality (Gemeinde) in ensuring traffic safety on public highways is—as the Senate has explained in the judgments [references omitted]—permissible in the context of the division of legislative competence between the Federation and the states. Nor are there any other constitutional law objections to it derived from the Basic Law.

2. The Senate's judgment [reference omitted] explains in detail that a body liable for breach of official duty cannot rely on the provisions of § 839(1) sentence 2 of the BGB as they contradict the basic principle of the equal treatment of highway users in liability law. These principles also apply, as the Senate has explained in more detail in the judgment [reference omitted] (issued after the publication of the judgment in the appeal) for cases like this one involving surveillance of traffic safety on a public highway, if this duty falls on the office holder as a state responsibility. The official duty to ensure safety of road traffic is closely related to the duties owed by an official as a public highway user. Accordingly the defendant city cannot exonerate itself by reference to the possibility that the plaintiff's wife is liable for the accident.

3. The appeal court's finding that there was no violation of the duty of protective care in relation to highways cannot be endorsed either.

(a) The official duty formulated in public law to ensure the safety of road traffic corresponds in its content to the general duty of protective care [references omitted]. Its scope is determined by the type and frequency of use of the highway and its importance. It includes the necessary measures for the creation and maintenance of road conditions, which are sufficiently safe for road users. It is true that a road user must in principle adjust to the given road conditions and accept the highway in the form in which it appears to him. A party under a duty of protective care must, in an appropriate and objectively reasonable manner, remove (and if necessary warn about) all those dangers (but no others) which are not visible or not visible in time for a highway user who is exercising the necessary care and to which he cannot adjust or cannot adjust in time.

(b) In applying these principles to the present case, an official duty by the public employees of the defendant must be accepted to keep the hedge at a height which prevents serious obstruction of visibility for road users on turning into the highway from an access. The appeal court interprets the concept of the highway too narrowly when it includes in it, apart from the carriageway, only those surfaces which “also serve traffic in some way or other e.g. for escape in case of emergency . . .”. According to both § 2II No. 1 Lower Saxony Highways Act and § 1IV No. 1 Federal Highways Act in 1 October 1974 version [reference omitted] separation strips, verges, and marginal and safety strips are also included in public highways [references omitted]. As federal and state law agree here, it has no significance for the outcome of the case whether the A Ring was a federal, state or municipality highway. According to these statutory rules, the duty of protective care extends to the central reservation as a part of the highway. It is therefore not necessary to fall back on the case law cited by the appeal court according to which the duty of protective care extends to things not forming part of the highway insofar as they represent a danger for the use of the highway, as for instance trees and shrubs in front gardens [references omitted]. Nor is it necessary to refer to the duties, which fall on the owner of the hedge as such.

(c) A high hedge created special dangers in a place where there was a gap in the central reservation to enable highway users to turn in and out of it. Drivers turning in could only be sure of seeing the traffic on the other side of the hedge if the hedge was at least, for an appropriate distance from the entrance, kept low enough for it not significantly to conceal moving vehicles behind it. Contrary to the view of the appeal court, this danger did not cease in whole or in part to arise just because the hedge could be seen, and because this was so even in darkness, with the help of street lighting and car headlights. The danger was not the hedge itself, but the hindrance to visibility, which it caused, and this hindrance did not cease to exist just because the hedge was visible.

(d) The defendant city claimed in its submissions that it complied with these principles. According to these submissions, hedges are cut once-yearly, and twice-yearly at traffic focal points, and kept in “shape”. The end sections of a hedge before and after accesses are cut back further than the middle parts of the hedge. Actually, however, the defendant has not kept to these principles in the area of the site of the accident, according to the findings of the appeal court. The shrubs situated on the central reservation had reached a height of about 1.2 metres on the day of the accident. The appeal court has described the hindrance to visibility consequently occurring as “obvious” and in another place has spoken of a hedge height “undoubtedly hindering visibility”. But it regarded this as insignificant for the outcome of the case, because every driver could escape the threat of danger which this caused, either by increased attention on turning in or out or by the choice of another driving route. This view is, it should be acknowledged in support of the appeal in law, affected by legal error.

(aa) A driver must certainly in principle accept the highway as it presents itself to him, and therefore make his own investigations as to whether he has sufficient visibility. The hedge height of about 1.2 metres could however seriously hinder the necessary visibility even for an attentive driver, and the appeal court has not paid sufficient attention to this. According to the findings of the Landgericht, the height of vision of the plaintiff’s wife in his car used in the accident—was 1.1 metres, and that of an assessor of the Landgericht 1.2 metres. Cars of the usual construction, as is revealed by type surveys in the press, are without exception between 1.3 and 1.5 metres high. Cars of this type protruded, at the most, only marginally above the hedge. The extent to which they were visible depended to a large degree on their type of construction. The defendant city could in any case not act on the basis that drivers would, on turning at the site of the accident, see cars approaching behind the hedge in time in every case. This possible danger which, as the appeal court has pertinently explained, could not be removed by a warning sign, resulted in the hindrance to visibility caused by the 1.2 metre high hedge at the site of the accident being dangerous even for an attentive driver. A careful tentative entry—which the appeal court did not even consider to be necessary—into the lane situated on the other side of the hedge could not remove these dangers. This is because a sufficient view could not be obtained of this lane before turning into it. That follows from the finding of the appeal court about the effect which the hedge had in restricting visibility.

(bb) The duty of ensuring traffic safety did not cease to apply, as the appeal court thought it did, just because no driver had to turn in at the place in question. It cannot in principle be held against highway users by a party under a duty of protective care that they should have avoided dangerous places. This would enable the party to shift its responsibility to the driver in an impermissible manner. It is the task of the party under the duty of protective care either to remove or at least to defuse danger spots which it can recognise as such so far as is reasonable and as soon as possible.

(cc) The party under the duty of protective care must further protect traffic from the mistakes which, according to experience, are exactly what has to be reckoned with in heavy traffic in large cities—here, underestimating the dangers caused by restriction of visibility and possible violations of the right of way. The principle of trust, which applies to the mutual relationship of highway users, has no application in the relationship between the party under a duty of protective care and highway users. On the contrary, the duty of protective care can include in individual cases those measures which have the purpose of protecting traffic from the consequences of inappropriate conduct of individual highway users [reference omitted].

These prerequisites are present here. In the heavy traffic in inner cities, violations of rules of priority are not rare. If visibility of the road having priority is substantially impaired, and a particularly careful driving style is indicated (taking up more time than usual), one must reckon on more frequent violations of these duties. The defendant city could also have recognised this. Regular cutting of the hedge down to 70–80 centimetres in height was therefore obviously required. This relatively simple and cheap measure was to be expected of the defendant—and pertinently the appeal court accepted this.

4. The disputed judgment also cannot be based on different reasoning. It is not possible to proceed on the basis that the violation by the defendant city of the duty of protective care is completely superseded by the contribution of the plaintiff's wife to the accident. According to her statement as witness, the plaintiff's wife—in contrast to the case decided by the Kammergericht which was otherwise similar [reference omitted]—did not turn into the space behind the hedge without any regard to the restriction on visibility. Instead, she claims at first to have stopped briefly and only after starting off again to have collided with the other car, which had approached in the meantime. It may be that, as a result of carelessness, she did not pay attention or sufficient attention to the distance and speed of this vehicle, because it approached on the left lane of the carriageway (its driver wanting to turn to the left further on). Nevertheless, it cannot be assumed that there would have been a collision even without the restriction of visibility by the hedge, especially as it has to be borne in mind that the driver of the other car was also unable to see, in sufficient time, the car driven by the plaintiff's wife turning in because of the hedge.

5. The matter must be referred back to the appeal court, because the weighing-up in accordance with § 254 of the BGB of the extent of the contributions to the accident from both sides is not possible according to the findings which have been made, and must remain an issue for the judge of fact.

Case 134

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (THIRD CIVIL SENATE) 28 MARCH 1996
NJW 1996, 2373

Facts

The A Group offered facilities for investment of capital for small investors. In October 1987, because of a fall in share prices, the group suffered heavy losses so that the whole capital investment was exhausted. This was concealed from the investors, and the group carried on advertising investment facilities. The state prosecutor took investigatory proceedings against those responsible. The group's money deposited with a bank was first of all seized, but the Amtsgericht (district court) quashed the seizure and the state prosecutor discontinued the investigatory proceedings. Five months later, the plaintiff made a financial management contract with the A Group. Over a year later the A Group suffered further heavy losses and the investigatory proceedings were recommenced against those responsible which led to their conviction for deceit. The plaintiff, who had lost about three-quarters of his capital, claimed compensation from the defendant state (Land).

Reasons

The case is not of significance on an issue of principle; and the appeal in law has no prospect of success [reference omitted].

1. The appeal court denied that the official duty of the state prosecutor to pursue crimes, to carry out investigatory proceedings against the perpetrators and, if necessary, to start a public prosecution is owed to third parties. It stated that this duty was exclusively to serve public interests, namely the fulfilment of the criminal powers of the state. The arguments raised in the appeal in law against this are unsuccessful. The introduction of investigatory proceedings in criminal law, the initiation and execution of a search order, a decision about the starting of a public prosecution and measures in proceedings for fines can represent violations of the official duty owed to the suspect if they are undertaken without justification [references omitted]. But there is no official duty on the part of the state prosecutor to intervene in the interest of a person possibly affected by a crime—in contrast to the position in relation to the police (see Senate, LM § 839 [Fg] BGB No. 5). The duty of the state prosecutor to pursue crimes, to arrest an accused, etc., exists only in the public interest. Failure to carry it out cannot therefore, as a rule, violate an official duty against the person harmed by the crime [references omitted]. It can be otherwise if concrete protective duties to the person harmed by a crime are acquired by the state prosecutor in current investigatory proceedings, perhaps to secure stolen property in the interests of the person from whom it has been stolen [references omitted]. The principles set out above also apply to the prevention of crimes, which is the issue in the case of plaintiff.

2. As the appeal court further states, the plaintiff did not, in May 1988, come within the category of those who had already paid their money to the A Group. They could not therefore possibly have been protected from harm by the seizure being kept in force and the proceedings against the suspects being pursued on the grounds that those steps would have deprived the suspects of access to further accounts. As the plaintiff first made his investment on 18 June 1988, he was not directly affected by the decision of the state prosecutor to order the quashing of the seizure and to discontinue the proceedings on 2 May 1988 [reference omitted]. The harm he has suffered is based on the fact that the accused persons had not been forced to give up their activity. It can however be left undecided whether, if an official duty on the part of the state prosecutor owed to third parties suffering harm could be accepted, this would stand in the way of including the plaintiff within the circle of those protected (see Senate, LM § 839 [Fg] BGB No. 5), as the duty is not owed to third parties.

3. The appeal court judgment does not reveal any other legal errors, which are significant in the context of the decision and are to the disadvantage of the plaintiff.

Case 135

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (THIRD CIVIL SENATE), 16 OCTOBER 1997
NJW 1998, 751 = MDR 1998, 43 = VERSR 1998, 493

Facts

The plaintiff was until the end of 1988 a member of the board of directors of the KHG AG. On the application of the state prosecutor, the Amtsgericht (district court) ordered the arrest on the 27th February 1990 of the plaintiff and others for suspected breach of trust (Untreue) to the detriment of KHD. He was arrested on the 14th March 1990 in Italy, and brought to Germany. On the 11th May 1990 he was released from custody on conditions. The order for arrest was later revoked and the investigatory proceedings against the plaintiff discontinued. The order for arrest was based effectively on an accusation by B (who himself was in custody awaiting trial). B had claimed that he had arranged with the plaintiff at a hunting event in the Westerwald in 1983 to manipulate accounts for wood deliveries to the detriment of KHD (“the hunting hide agreement”); and that the plaintiff had received substantial sums of money for this. This accusation was substantially incorrect. At the time of his arrest the plaintiff was also managing director of the V-GmbH and had a consultancy contract with the P firm, at an annual fee of DM 50,180. This firm terminated the contract on the 11th May 1990 with immediate effect after the press had reported the arrest of the plaintiff. On the 15th May 1990, the plaintiff and the V-GmbH agreed to cancel the managing director’s contract. The Amtsgericht decided that the plaintiff should be compensated for the harm resulting from the arrest from the 14th March to the 11th May 1990 in accordance with the Compensation for Measures related to Criminal Prosecution Act. The plaintiff claimed as material harm his loss of earnings with the V GmbH and the P firm and legal and other expenses. The Ministry of Justice of the defendant state (Land) accepted liability for material harm in the sum of DM 16,664.64. This sum consisted of part of the legal and other expenses.

In the present claim the plaintiff seeks amongst other things compensation for loss of earnings due to the termination of the consultancy contract with the P firm, further legal costs and a finding that any further harm resulting from the termination of the consultancy contract should be compensated.

Reasons

II. The investigating state prosecutor when examining whether an order for arrest should be made against the plaintiff, stated there was strong suspicion of breach of trust (§ 266 of the Criminal Code and § 112 (1) sentence 1 of the Criminal Procedure Code). The appeal court regarded this as a culpable violation of official duty on his part. That satisfies legal examination in the end result.

1. According to the case law of the Senate certain measures by the state prosecutor, which include application for issue of an order for an arrest are not to be examined in official liability proceedings for their “correctness” but only as to whether they are justifiable [references omitted].

Proceeding from this legal principle, the appeal court held that the assumption by the state prosecutor that there was strong suspicion at that time of breach of trust by the plaintiff was unjustifiable. It interpreted the statements of B, on which the state prosecutor principally based his assessment, as meaning that the plaintiff and B in their conversation of August / September 1983 (the hunting hide agreement) had agreed to a future manipulation of accounts. This would mean that the manipulations would only have begun after this point in time. In reality, so the appeal court found, it was already obvious at the point in time of the application for the order for the arrest (on the basis of witness statements and other documents on the investigatory proceedings) that accounting manipulations of this kind had been going on since the nineteen sixties. In these circumstances, the accusation made by B was incredible from the start, and the application for the order for arrest was unjustifiable.

This assessment can only be examined by the court hearing the appeal in law by considering whether the judge of fact misunderstood the concept of justifiability, violated rules of logic or general principles of experience and considered all the circumstances which were of significance for the judgment [references omitted]. The appeal in law does not reveal mistakes of this kind. Insofar as it complains of a violation of rules of logic it puts its own assessment of the facts in place of those of the appeal court in a manner which the rules about appeals in law do not permit. The procedural objections raised by the appeal in law in this connection have been examined by the Senate and not considered to be decisive. No ground was therefore found here either (§ 565 a of the Civil Procedure Code). It accordingly has been established in a binding manner that the assumption of strong suspicion on which the application by the state prosecutor for an order for arrest was based was unjustifiable and making the application for an order for arrest was therefore contrary to official duty.

2. The appeal court also, without any legal error, found the investigating state prosecutor to be culpable. In this connection it basically assumes that no blame as a rule attaches to an official if a collegial court with several legal experts sitting on it has regarded the official action as objectively lawful [references omitted]. According to the view of the appeal court, this general principle, from which the Senate has repeatedly permitted exceptions [references omitted], did not apply here. There are no legal grounds for objecting to this in the end result.

(a) The appeal court denied that the principle applied here, even though the civil chamber of the Landgericht regarded the conduct of the state prosecutor as justifiable and therefore as objectively in accordance with his official duties. It considered that the chamber basically proceeded in this assessment from a legally flawed approach. Whether this is correct does not need to be considered, because in any case there is another ground for the said principle not applying here.

The principle is based on the consideration that a better understanding of the law cannot as a rule be expected and demanded from an official than from a collegial court with several legal experts sitting on it [reference omitted]. This justifies a denial of culpability only in those cases in which the collegial court—after careful examination—has affirmed the legality of the official action. If on the other hand the collegial court has merely approved the action on the basis of a yardstick for testing—here the yardstick of justifiability—which is reduced in comparison with the official's own duty of testing, this does not necessarily mean that the conduct of the official should be assessed as lawful.

Whilst therefore in cases like the present one the official himself has a duty to regulate his conduct entirely by the yardstick of legality, the judicial examination in the official liability proceedings decides merely on the basis of the reduced yardstick of justifiability whether he has acted in accordance with his official duty. In such cases the principle becomes subject to a further exception over and above the group of cases decided by the Senate so far. The defendant state cannot therefore successfully rely in the present case on the first instance judgment for saying that no accusation of culpability can be levelled at the investigating state prosecutor.

(b) The appeal court was also right in not considering itself to be required to apply the general principle by the decision of the 14th great criminal chamber of the Landgericht in the proceedings concerning the complaint about arrest. This is because a comprehensive and careful examination of the issue of lawfulness which could justify the application of the principle did not, according to the findings of the appeal court, take place in those proceedings. The appeal court explained in this respect, in its assessment as a judge of fact of the circumstances which influenced the proceedings concerning the complaint about arrest, that the criminal chamber had “tested in an extremely summary fashion” the question of strong suspicion “and instead of this, concentrated on the question of the . . . danger of flight”. It concludes this from the fact that the decision by the chamber was issued on the same day as the decision by the Amtsgericht that there would be no review. In a “fast-track” procedure of this kind, a dependable formation of opinion by the collegial court was not possible in the light of the scope of the documentation. This assessment, the real core of which was not addressed by the appeal in law, is confirmed by the content of the decision about the complaint:

The Amtsgericht in the original order for arrest had suspended its execution. The state prosecution service complaint against this only disputed the exemption from arrest. The attention of the criminal chamber was therefore principally directed to the question of whether the danger of flight was to be assessed as so small that a suspension of execution should be considered. It is true that the criminal chamber was also obliged of its own motion to examine the question of strong suspicion. In this respect however it contented itself, according to the wording of its decision, with referring to the order for arrest and pointing out that this was essentially based on the testimony of the co-accused B, who severely incriminated the plaintiff. This reasoning makes it clear that the assessment of strong suspicion which influenced the order for arrest and formed the basis of the application for the order for arrest, and which the appeal court regarded without any legal error as unjustifiable, has left its mark on the decision by the Landgericht about the complaint.

On the basis of the findings made by the appeal court the starting point must accordingly be that the criminal chamber did not assess the established facts of the case carefully and exhaustively; or it formed its conclusion that there was strong suspicion from facts established on the basis of procedural irregularity. In such cases the general principle does not apply [references omitted].

3. The statements of the appeal court about the extent of the claim for official liability awarded to the plaintiff and about the calculation of the period covered by the declaration are not challenged by the appeal in law.

*Case 136OBERLANDESGERICHT OLDENBURG, 20 MAY 1988
VERS R 1991, 306Facts*

On the 22nd December 1982, the plaintiff was committed to the secure section of the state (Land) hospital X at the request of the defendant. On the same day the defendant applied for committal of the plaintiff in accordance with §§ 10 ff. of the PsychKG ND. The medical opinion supporting the application diagnosed "paranoia (delusions of jealousy and persecution)". It said the illness was a risk to the plaintiff and others. Dr D, the defendant's medical officer, signed the opinion after telephone conversations with the doctor in attendance, Dr F, who also signed it. Dr D did not personally examine the plaintiff.

The Amtsgericht (district court) decided on the 23 December 1982 to commit the plaintiff for a maximum of six weeks for observation. From the 29 December 1982 to 4 January 1983 the hospital gave him leave of absence. He lodged a complaint, and the Landgericht quashed the committal decision on the 13 January 1983.

By a letter of the 18 July 1983 the defendant's road traffic division asked the plaintiff to submit a medico-psychological report about his fitness to drive. He did not reply, so the defendant withdrew his driving licence on the 29 August 1983. It did not order immediate implementation of this decision. The Oberverwaltungsgericht (upper administrative court) quashed the defendant's decision, because the plaintiff had not been proved unfit to drive. No severe mental illness had been shown for the period from the end of 1982 to the beginning of 1983. The plaintiff was justified in refusing to undergo the examination demanded.

The plaintiff now claimed from the defendant payment of compensation for distress estimated at DM 100,000, and payment of loss of earnings of DM 140,626.60. He also wanted a declaration that the defendant was obliged to compensate for future material harm.

The plaintiff claimed that the medical officer, who had approved the committal without making his own investigation, and the official in the administrative office, who had ordered the committal without a previous court decision, had violated their official duties. There was no risk to either to the plaintiff himself or others. This was not the typical consequence of paranoia, and the official would have realised this if he had shown proper care. Even the withdrawal of the driving licence had been a breach of duty because it had been based on the unlawful provisional committal (or the temporary committal) without a proper investigation. The withdrawal of the driving licence had resulted in the plaintiff losing his job.

(The Bundesgerichtshof in its decision of the 29th March 1990 (III ZR 160/88) (BGH VersR 1991, 308) rejected the plaintiff's appeal in law against the judgment set out here).

Reasons

The plaintiff has a claim against the defendant for compensation for distress in the sum of DM 5,000 for unlawful deprivation of freedom. On the other hand he cannot ask for compensation for his loss of earnings because it cannot be established that the loss claimed was caused by a culpable violation by the defendant of official duty. The plaintiff's claim for a declaration in relation to his future harm is accordingly likewise unfounded.

1. The prerequisites for the granting of compensation for distress in accordance with § 847 of the BGB are present. The plaintiff has been deprived of freedom by a tort by the defendant in the sense of § 839 of the BGB in combination with Article 34 of the Basic Law. The medical officer in the service of the defendant, Dr D has violated an official duty owed by him to the plaintiff in that he signed a medical certificate for the instigation of the committal procedure, without making it sufficiently clear that the findings of Dr F which formed the basis of it had been made several days before the submission of the opinion. Therefore a provisional committal of the plaintiff on this basis in accordance with § 16 of the PsychKG ND could not be considered. The opinion which was sent to the administrative section of the defendant on 22 December 1982 contains no date. Nor can it be deduced from the text of the opinion when the plaintiff was examined and when the findings which were decisive for the opinion were ascertained.

And yet the opinion form signed by the medical officer gives the impression that it was filled up immediately after the ascertaining of the findings. This is because in the first line (which contains the word "Urgent" in bold) and in the text of the request before the signatures of the doctors (which asks for an immediate decision) it is made clear that the committal procedure could not be postponed and that the medical experts had also taken that into account.

But actually the plaintiff had last spoken with the doctor in attendance, Dr F, on 15 December 1982, as the medical officer indicated in his testimony in the investigatory proceedings. Further contacts after this point in time, for instance on 21 December 1982, indisputably broke down. The medical officer himself did not examine the plaintiff at any time.

The medical officer was under a duty to provide appropriate explanations in his area of work and therefore in particular in the content of the opinion. It was true that it was not part of the responsibility of the medical officer to arrange directly for the committal of the person affected or to apply to the court. It should however have been obvious to him that the competent official in the administrative section of the defendant would rely on the statement by the doctors and because of the urgency of the matter would very probably first of all arrange for a provisional committal in accordance with § 16 of the PsychKG ND. It was therefore a duty of the medical officer, which he owed to the person affected, to ensure that this foreseeable unlawful provisional committal did not take place.

The violation of duty by the medical officer led with adequate causality to the unlawful deprivation of the plaintiff's freedom. The responsible officer in the administrative office relied on the statements in the opinion without himself investigating at what point in time the findings were ascertained and he arranged for a provisional committal of the plaintiff in accordance with § 16 of the PsychKG ND.

It is true that the defendant has not expressly issued a formal administrative act in respect of the committal. The plaintiff was however indisputably moved to the state hospital X with the official assistance of the police before the issuing of the judicial committal decision. This amounts to conclusive conduct (schlüssiges Handeln) on the part of the defendant which was made known to the plaintiff when it was carried out. If the point in time when the findings were ascertained had been known to the official of the administrative office, the provisional committal would not have taken place, since it must be assumed that the authorities would act in accordance with their duties.

It can be left open whether the plaintiff, had the medical officer acted lawfully, would possibly on the 22 December 1982 have been examined again, perhaps compulsorily, whether the diagnosis would have been confirmed and whether he then would likewise have been provisionally committed. This is because the defendant cannot rely on the fact that it could have achieved the deprivation of freedom in a lawful manner which would have not formed the basis of a duty to compensate (reliance on lawful alternative action).

When a person causes harm by a breach of duty, the question of the extent to which the consequences of his conduct can rightly be assessed as attributable to him is to be answered according to the protective purpose of the violated norm involved [references omitted]. In the present case, there has been a violation of the conditions laid down in § 16 of the PsychKG ND. This provision is the expression of a constitutional guarantee according to which the state is only permitted to limit the freedom of a person on the basis of a formal statute and only if it takes into account the provisos described in it (Articles 2 and 104 of the Basic Law).

The protective purpose of the statute thus lies in permitting a deprivation of freedom only under the conditions prescribed in it. In this particular case it should also be ensured that, up to a point directly before the decision to commit, the state of health of the person concerned has not improved to such an extent that deprivation of freedom is no longer justified. The special urgency of immediate deprivation of freedom must thus be accepted in each case. Unless it is certain that the state of health will continue, the deprivation of freedom must not occur.

It is therefore a question of a fundamental protective norm to guarantee the rights of the citizen, which is not allowed to lose its significance in the context of compensation law just because some form of alternative action would have been lawful [references omitted].

On the same basis the argument of the Landgericht that the Amtsgericht, if it had been in a position to make a decision on the relevant day, would have ordered the committal cannot exonerate the defendant either. Here also the protective purpose of the violated norm excludes appeal to lawful alternative action.

The medical officer has also acted culpably. By using the required care, he could recognise and foresee that the official of the administrative section would see himself as compelled, on the basis of the dangerous situation for the plaintiff and other third parties as certified in the opinion, not only to arrange for a judicial committal but also to order immediately a provisional committal in accordance with § 16 of the PsychKG ND to avert the danger. (Details are given).

The defendant must therefore pay to the plaintiff compensation for distress for the non-material detriments suffered in consequence of the deprivation of freedom. In this connection, when calculating the amount of the damages for distress not only must the length of time of the provisional committal to be taken into account, but also that of the judicial committal. This is because it can be assumed that the court also would have come to another conclusion in its decision in accordance with § 15 of the PsychKG ND if it had known that the last examination of the plaintiff by the medical expert had taken place a week ago.

Taking into account all the circumstances, damages for distress of DM 5,000 seem fair but also sufficient to the Senate. The plaintiff was committed from 22 to 29 December 1982. According to his own account he was given leave of absence on 29 December 1982 so that the consequences of the deprivation of freedom did not continue beyond this point in time. At the most the possibility remained of the further detriment of revocation of the leave of absence. This however did not happen. Long term harm to the plaintiff did not therefore occur.

Even if freedom is to be regarded as a legal interest worthy of the highest protection, the plaintiff's ideas about compensation (DM 10,000) for distress seem greatly exaggerated. They bear no relationship to the compensation which is payable for unjustified criminal arrest. Admittedly the plaintiff was temporarily arrested by the police in order to implement the committal order, and these circumstances and the fact of committal in his home town have been talked about and have had a disadvantageous effect on his social relationships and his reputation. But even bearing these matters in mind compensation for distress in the approved sum is the most that should be considered.

The claim of the plaintiff is not excluded by § 839 (1) sentence 2 of the BGB. Firstly Dr D has disregarded the protective provisions of PsychKG ND not merely negligently but (at least) grossly negligently. Besides this the plaintiff has no other option for compensation available.

The issue of whether a possibility exists of obtaining compensation from the state can remain open, as this is also a public law body and the claim would therefore likewise be directed against the public sector; and it is necessary to proceed on the basis of the unity of the public sector [reference omitted]. The plaintiff can also not claim against the other medical expert, Dr F. (Details are given).

II. On the other hand the plaintiff has no claim against the defendant under § 839 of the BGB and Article 34 of the Basic Law to compensation for his loss of earnings nor to a declaration that the defendant is obliged to compensate for future harm. This is because it can neither be established that the defendant has culpably violated an official duty in taking proceedings for withdrawal of the driving licence nor that the alleged harm to the plaintiff arose as a consequence of the measures taken by the defendant.

In the present case no blame, as the Landgericht has already pertinently explained, attaches to the defendant in any case, since in relation to this measure, a collegial court in which three professional judges sat, namely the Verwaltungsgericht, has adjudged its conduct to be objectively justified. The conditions developed in this respect for justifying a denial of the culpability of the office holder are present. The Verwaltungsgericht in its decision used the right facts as a basis, evaluated these carefully and in its assessment of the legal situation neither misjudged clear and unambiguous rules nor blatantly falsely interpreted unambiguous rules.

With reference to the grounds of the court decision of 27 November 1984 the Verwaltungsgericht proceeding on the basis of the relevant provisions (§§ 4 (1) of the Implementation of Punishment Act (StVG) and 15b (1) of the Road Traffic Licences Order (StVZO)) looked carefully at the documents which were available about the plaintiff's psychological condition and came to the conclusion that they justified doubts about the fitness of the plaintiff to drive.

It accepted that this, together with the plaintiff's lack of preparedness to dispel the doubts by producing a medico-psychological opinion, justifies the conclusion that the plaintiff wanted to conceal defects which made him unfit to drive a vehicle. One must therefore, so it explained, proceed on the basis of his unsuitability to drive vehicles. These considerations of the Verwaltungsgericht do not violate rules of logic. The legal views referred to are at least defensible, taking into consideration the provisions cited.

Beside this it is not evident that the withdrawal of the driving licence was the cause of the harm claimed by the plaintiff. (Details are given).

Case 137

OBERLANDESGERICHT HAMM, 15 JULY 1992

NJW-RR 1994, 394 = FAMRZ 1993, 704 = VERSR 1994, 677

The plaintiff married couple and their adopted son, the former third plaintiff, sought compensation from the defendant town because of violation of official duty in connection with an adoption placement.

Reasons

The appeal of the defendant is permissible, but unsuccessful.

I.

The Landgericht was correct in accepting the plaintiffs' claims for official liability against the defendant on the basis of § 839 of the BGB in combination with Article 34 of the GG and allowed the demands for payment and a declaration.

1. The appropriate officials who were involved in preparing and carrying out an adoption by the plaintiffs have negligently violated their official duties owed to the plaintiffs by not informing them that there was a suspicion that the child N, who was very disturbed, was mentally retarded.

(a) It is necessary to proceed on the basis that the actions of the Youth Welfare Department in the area of adoption placement, even according to the legal situation in the years 1981 to 1983 (which is the relevant period here), are the exercise of public office in the sense of Article 34 of the GG [reference omitted]. Action in exercise of public office occurs if the real objective in the context of which the official is acting is part of the area of sovereign activity of a public body. There must also be an internal and external connection between this objective and the act (or omission) which causes the damage, so that the act (or omission) must also be regarded as belonging to this area of sovereign activity [reference omitted]. Such a connection exists for the actions of the Youth Welfare Department in the framework of adoption placement. According to § 2 (1) sentence 1 of the Adoption Placement Act in its 2nd July 1976 version [reference omitted] adoption placement is a task for the Youth Welfare Department (and for the State (Land) Youth Welfare Department). Adoption placement is bringing together children under the age of majority and persons who want to adopt a child (adoption applicants) with the object of adopting it as well as providing the evidence of adoption (§ 1 of the Adoption Placement Act). Leaving exceptions aside, the Youth Welfare Departments who have set up an Adoption Placement Office and the State Youth Welfare Departments have a placement monopoly (§§ 2 (1) sentence 2 and 5 (1) of the Adoption Placement Act). The actions of the Youth Welfare Department in the area of adoption placement are accordingly a public task, the purpose of which is to find appropriate and suitable parents who are prepared to adopt for a child who does not have the care of its natural parents. These actions are therefore to assist the young.

(b) The employees of the Youth Welfare Department of the defendant acted contrary to their official duty because they neglected to inform the plaintiffs as adoption applicants about the suspicion of mental retardation due to brain damage which was known to them and not dispelled. The content and scope of the official duties of a public employee are determined by the provisions regulating the area of his tasks and duties, whether they are statutes, regulations, administrative provisions or individual directions in the context of employment; and from the kind of tasks to be carried out [reference omitted]. The duty to inform the plaintiffs about the suspicion which existed arose in the present case from the kind of tasks to be carried out by the officials within the framework of the adoption placement.

The Adoption Placement Act itself admittedly contains no express regulations which make it a duty of the Adoption Placement Office to inform the adoption applicants about the state of health of the child to be adopted. However, according to § 7 (1) sentence 1 of the Adoption Placement Act, the Adoption Placement Office must make without delay the enquiries which are necessary for preparing for a placement, and these must also extend to the state of health of the child. Admittedly the implementation regulations provided for in § 7 (2) of the Adoption Placement Act have not so far been made. But the Working Group of the State Youth Welfare Departments has worked out guidelines which at that time applied in the version of the 3rd edition of 1966 and which provided in para. 2.22 that the physical as well as the mental and psychological state of health of the child was to be ascertained by a doctor experienced in these areas—if possible a paediatrician or a psychiatrist specialising in the young. Further, it says in para. 2.23 (1) that an investigation by a specialist, if necessary even in-patient observation, was to be arranged if inquiries revealed that the child has educational difficulties, suspicion of illness or unexplained abnormalities. Even if these guidelines (which were replaced in the meantime by the “Recommendations of the Federal Working Group of State Youth Welfare Departments and Non-local Education Committees on Adoption Placement”—Version of 28 November 1988) were merely for practical work assistance, and they therefore did not represent legal or administrative provisions, they nevertheless express what a proper individual adoption placement requires. This is that the adoption applicants should be able to decide to adopt a child in the knowledge of all important facts, so that a successful parent-child relationship which is free from anxiety can come into existence for the welfare of the child. § 9 (1) of the Adoption Placement Act which makes it a duty of the Adoption Placement Office to give detailed advice and support not only to the child and its natural parents but also to the adopters is in harmony with this. It follows from the duty of inquiry mentioned above (§ 7 (1) of the Adoption Placement Act) as well as from the duty of advice owed by the Adoption Placement Office (§ 9 (1) of the Adoption Placement Act) that the adoption applicants have a right to be notified of all the relevant circumstances affecting the child, and especially of suspicion of an illness [reference omitted]. The guidelines of the Working Group of the State Youth Welfare Departments, if and so far as they required that the state of health of the child was to be established by medical examination, therefore corresponded with these requirements. Admittedly the adoption of children with physical or mental peculiarities should also be facilitated. But that can only be considered if the adopters feel they are ready for this in the knowledge of all the circumstances and the consequences of their decision (para. 2.23 (2) of the Guidelines).

(c) The defendant’s officials knew of the suspicion of mental retardation on the basis of brain damage parentally or in early childhood.

That emerges clearly from the memorandum by the witness N dated 7 October 1981, in which the possibility of mental retardation on the basis of inborn brain damage was expressly taken into consideration. Even the official doctor, Dr M, who had examined the child, regarded the mental retardation as so significant that, according to the memorandum of the witness M referred to above, she thought a “very meticulous examination” in a hospital was necessary. Arrangements were consequently made to examine the child in the children’s clinic B; but this did not happen. But the doctors at the children’s clinic at the St V hospital in P, according to their letter of 11 November 1981, of which the defendant’s Youth Welfare Department received a copy, diagnosed not only wildness and behavioural disturbance in the child but also the suspicion of mental retardation, which could have meant that this retardation had its cause in brain damage. The appropriate officials could not regard this suspicion of mental retardation as dispelled by the interim report of the 8 December 1981 by the witness T. The only thing which emerged from this report was that a particular positive development had occurred on the basis of psychotherapeutic treatment by the witness T. No grounds for saying that N had been subjected to a detailed specialist examination were revealed by the interim report. T made no comment at all in it on the question of mental retardation based on brain damage. From the outcome of the evidence taken by the Senate, it is not possible to proceed on the basis that the witness T (who in any case was not a neurologist or a psychiatrist, but a psychologist) explained to the witness M (as it says in her memorandum of 4 December 1981) that the child had a normal intelligence and no mental handicap could be established. The witnesses T and M who were heard on this issue made contradictory statements. The witness T denied having expressed himself in this way to the witness M. But even if T had so expressed himself to the witness M, as she describes, the employees of the defendant cannot reassure themselves by saying that the suspicion of mental retardation was dispelled. This is because the statement by T did not in any case mean anything more than that he—as a psychologist—had not established any such damage.

(d) The employees of the defendant did not tell the plaintiffs about the suspicion which existed of mental retardation.

The witness M has stated that she did not speak about this with the plaintiffs. According to her testimony, the witness Ü had had nothing to do with the adoption placement. The claim by the defendant that the plaintiffs had been advised in detail by the witness T as well as by the Adoption Placement Office is unsubstantiated, as it cannot be deduced from this allegation whether the plaintiffs were also informed about the suspicion which existed of mental handicap. According to the account of the defendant’s representative in the hearing before the Senate of 15 May 1992, nothing was known to the witness B who was summoned to this hearing of the suspicion of mental handicap, so she could not explain about this to the plaintiffs. As the witness M was at least informed by the defendant’s Youth Welfare Department about the suspicion which existed, she would have had to take care that the plaintiffs were correctly, clearly, unequivocally and completely informed about this suspicion. That did not happen.

2. This duty to inform was also owed to the plaintiffs as third parties in the sense of § 839 (1) sentence 1 of the BGB. This follows—for the reasons given more precisely above—from the fact that the adoption applicants should have been able to make their decision to adopt in the knowledge of all the important facts and that this is not ensured if such facts—even if it is only a question of suspicion of a serious illness—are not communicated to them.

3. The employees of the defendant culpably, i.e. negligently, did not inform the plaintiffs about the suspicion which existed of the child N being mentally handicapped, although they must have realised that the knowledge of this suspicion was of fundamental importance for the plaintiffs as adoption applicants. They ought not, without arranging a detailed specialist examination to make matters clear, to have proceeded on the basis that the suspicion was dispelled by the interim report of the witness T, a qualified psychologist, or in some other way. Without satisfying themselves in this respect, they ought not to have relied on T informing the plaintiffs about a suspicion of mental retardation. It is true that the employees of the Youth Welfare Department cannot be assumed to have the knowledge of a doctor or a psychologist. But they had medical statements before them about the child N, from which it was to be inferred that there was suspicion of mental retardation. They ought to have informed the plaintiffs about this, so that they could then freely decide whether they wanted nevertheless to adopt the child.

4. The violation of official duty was also the cause of the harm which is the subject of the claim.

(a) It has to be asked here what course things would have taken if the official had acted in accordance with his duty and what the financial position of the injured parties would have been if the official had not committed the breach of official duty, but had acted in accordance with it [reference omitted]. This question is to be decided in accordance with § 287 of the Civil Procedure Code. If—as here—the violation of official duty consists in an omission, then there is only a causal connection with the harm if action according to duty would have prevented the occurrence of the harmful consequences [reference omitted].

(b) If the appropriate officials had informed the plaintiffs about the suspicion which existed, they would not have adopted the child N. This follows from the fact that the plaintiffs had stated with sufficient clarity in the application form that they did not want to adopt a mentally handicapped child. This is not changed by the fact that they had made this declaration subject to limitations which did not affect its essential content.

(c) It would certainly have been possible for the plaintiffs, after receiving information about the suspicion of mental retardation, to have made the adoption dependent on a prior detailed neurological or psychiatric examination. Such an examination could not be expected to have dispelled the suspicion which existed, in the face of the child's evident behavioural symptoms. Such an examination would either have—as in the case of the later examinations in the children's hospital O and in the University clinic—revealed the presence of childhood brain damage or would have had an outcome which was admittedly unclear, but which would not have dispelled the suspicion. But even in the latter case, the plaintiffs would have refrained from adopting the child N because of the risk of adopting a mentally handicapped child. As they did not want to adopt such a child, they would also not have taken the risk of possibly having to bear the responsibility and burdens of such a child.

5. (a) The plaintiff can claim from the defendant compensation for her loss of earnings in the undisputed sum of DM 30,610.44. The plaintiffs have, without being contradicted, argued that the plaintiff giving up her job had been a prerequisite for the adoption placement. According to the testimony of the plaintiff, which likewise remained uncontradicted, when she gave evidence at the Senate hearing of 15 July 1992, she had given up her job on 16 December 1981, when the plaintiffs took N into their care. The plaintiff would have not have suffered loss of earnings if the defendant's officials had fulfilled the duty to inform which they owed to the plaintiffs; because then no adoption would have taken place and the plaintiff would not have needed to give up her job for the time being. The defendant, in this respect under a duty of explanation, has not substantiated that the plaintiffs, who certainly wanted to adopt a child, would have had the actual opportunity before the lapse of 19 months—reckoned from 16 December 1981—to adopt another child, and that the loss of earnings would therefore still have arisen in whole or in part.

(b) On the same grounds the court costs and notarial expenses borne by the plaintiff in the undisputed sum of DM 91.59 are to be compensated.

6. The claim for a declaration by the plaintiffs in relation to the duty of the defendant to compensate for possible future harm is also well founded. The prerequisite for the issue of a declaratory judgment is merely that there is a certain probability that claims have arisen or could arise from the legal relationship which is to be established [reference omitted]. The prerequisite is fulfilled in this case. The future harm exists predominantly in the expenditure on maintenance which the plaintiffs must provide for the handicapped child, possibly for the whole of its life. The duty to compensate for harm is not limited to the additional expenditure on maintenance which arises through the special needs of a mentally handicapped child. The defendant must instead reimburse the plaintiffs for the whole of the expenditure on maintenance. The provision of information about all the important facts and circumstances of the adoption to the adoption applicants which was due from the employees of the Youth Employment Department is not only to protect them from the additional expenditure which they incur for the maintenance of a handicapped or sick child. The fulfilment of the duty to give information is also to ensure freedom of decision by the adoption applicants, and this consists of not adopting a mentally handicapped child at all. If such a child is adopted, the risk of providing full maintenance has been realised, and fulfilment of the duty to provide information should protect the adopters from this. In this respect the legal situation is similar to the one which arises when a doctor advises a pregnant woman during early pregnancy incorrectly or incompletely about the possibilities on early recognition of damage to the foetus which would have provided legal justification for the wish of the mother to terminate the pregnancy. Even in this case, the BGH has not limited the claim of the parents to compensation for harm to the additional expenditure on maintenance, but extended it to the complete maintenance requirement for the child who has been harmed [reference omitted]. In this case, the issue cannot be decided otherwise.

II.

No contributory fault for the origination of the harm can be laid at the door of the plaintiffs in connection with the adoption of the child N (§ 254 (1) of the BGB).

III.

The appeal is accordingly rejected.

*Case 138OBERLANDESGERICHT HAMM, 20 NOVEMBER 1996
ZfJ 1997, 433Facts*

K was born in February 1976. The plaintiff was her mother and the sole person entitled to look after her.

In November 1992 K presented herself at the Youth Welfare Department of the defendant district and told them about recent domestic difficulties with the plaintiff. (K had already been accommodated for a time by the Youth Welfare Department in the children's home B in M, in early 1991). She explained to the officer in charge, Me, that she could not stand things at home any more. She refused a mediation interview with the plaintiff. But K and the plaintiff had a conversation of at least one and a half hours on the morning of 17 November 1992. Me was present for part of the time. No settlement was reached.

The Youth Welfare Department applied to the Guardianship Court C, which arranged a hearing on the afternoon of 17 November 1992. K was heard first, and she repeated to the judge her statements contained in the report of the Youth Welfare Department, and said she did not want to go back home. Then the plaintiff was heard. The Guardianship Court tried to arrange a settlement between K and the plaintiff, but failed. It made a temporary order taking away the plaintiff's right to determine K's place of residence, and transferring this to the Youth Welfare Department as guardian.

K was then accommodated by the Youth Welfare Department at first in the Youth Protection Centre in D and from 10 December 1992 in the children's home B in M. On 5 September 1993 K left the home of her own accord and returned to the plaintiff.

On 27 September 1993 the Guardianship Court transferred full custody rights back to the plaintiff. But because of a new argument, the plaintiff finally excluded K from home on 11 November 1993. The two have since lived separately from one another.

The plaintiff lodged a complaint against the decision of the Guardianship Court. This was rejected by the Landgericht M on 2 July 1993 because K's wish not to return home had to be respected.

The plaintiff claimed compensation from the defendant district including damages for distress because the Youth Welfare Department deprived her of K in a manner contrary to their official duty.

The action and the appeal were unsuccessful.

Reasons

The prerequisites for a claim for official liability under §§ 839 and 847 of the BGB in combination with Article 34 of the GG, which is the only for basis a claim to be considered here, are not present.

I. The work and tasks of youth assistance—and along with this the official duties of the Youth Welfare Department—arise from § 2 of the KJHG. This work includes amongst other things educational assistance and supplementary services (§§ 2 (2) nos. 4, 27–37, 39 and 40 KJHG), and the other tasks include amongst other things taking children and young people into care (§§ 2 (3) Nos. 1 and 42 KJHG SGB VIII).

On this basis, the Youth Welfare Department of the defendant district has not violated any official duties which could be the cause of the plaintiff's alleged harm.

1. The decision of the Youth Welfare Department to take K into care on 16 November 1992 and to seek a decision of the Guardianship Court on 17 November 1992 was in accordance with their official duty.

(a) According to § 42 (2) of the KJHG the Youth Welfare Department is under a duty to take a young person into care if he or she asks for this. It has to inform the person having custody about the taking into care without delay.

These prerequisites are fulfilled in the present case. K asked to be taken into care by the Youth Welfare Department of the defendant district on 16 November as a so-called "voluntary admission". The duty of the Youth Welfare Department to take into care applies without any limitation, regardless of the grounds on which the young person asks for care and of whether these grounds are convincing; the requirements to be placed on the content of these grounds must not be too high [references omitted].

The plaintiff as the person having custody had unquestionably been notified of the taking into care, and in this connection it does not matter for the purpose of the decision whether this notification was based on her own initiative or on that of the Youth Welfare Department.

(b) According to § 42 (2) sentence 3 of the KJHG the Youth Welfare Department must, if the person having custody challenges the taking into care, either hand the young person over to the person having custody (option 1) or obtain a decision by the Guardianship Court about the necessary measures for the welfare of the young person (option 2). These steps must take place without delay.

(aa) Unquestionably, the plaintiff challenged the taking into care in the conversation on the morning of 17 November 1992. She accuses the Youth Welfare Department of not having kept the appointment arranged at 12 o'clock for the continuation of the discussion, but it is not evident that this would have made a difference in the context of the plaintiff's challenge. On the evidence of the memorandum of the hearing before the Guardianship Court, the plaintiff still stated to the court that she did not agree with the taking into care—at any rate not unconditionally.

(bb) In this situation, the Youth Welfare Department was under a duty to make an "immediate" decision. No objection can be raised to the fact that it chose, out of the two alternatives to be considered, not to hand K over to the plaintiff, but to invoke the Guardianship Court. This was in accordance with their official duty.

In the literature [reference omitted] the view is taken that when a person having custody challenges a taking into care, the Youth Welfare Department is always obliged to bring in the Guardianship Court even if the Department considers there is no danger to the child's welfare. According to another view [reference omitted] the Youth Welfare Department only needs to obtain a decision of the Guardianship Court (and also must, without there being any discretion) if the welfare of the young person is endangered. Both opinions lead here to the same conclusion.

In making its decision, the Youth Welfare Department could (and had to) take into account that help for K's upbringing had already been necessary (in January / February 1991), that there were unquestionably school, alcohol and drug problems and that again K absolutely refused to go back home. As K was at that time already nearly 17 years old, the Youth Welfare Department could take this refusal seriously.

Assuming a danger to the child's welfare in this situation, and bringing in the Guardianship Court, were not contrary to the Youth Welfare Department's official duty. It could regard the decisions of the Guardianship Court and of the Landgericht based on §§ 1666 and 1666a of the BGB (endangering of child's welfare) as retrospectively confirming this assumption. The urgency of the measures to be taken by the Youth Welfare Department also did not permit—contrary to the view of the plaintiff—the making of further enquiries, in particular the hearing of the witnesses who were later heard by the Guardianship Court. The necessary elucidation of the matter was ensured because the Guardianship Court was under a duty to investigate of its own motion (§ 12 of the FGG).

2. The Youth Welfare Department would certainly have acted contrary to its official duty if it had “wangled” the right to determine K's accommodation by—as the plaintiff claims—influencing K by insinuation to make untrue statements to the Guardianship Court.

But the plaintiff has not substantiated this sweeping accusation in any greater detail, either in writing or at her examination in accordance with § 141 of the Civil Procedure Code at the Senate's hearing; so taking evidence did need to be considered here. The plaintiff has merely asserted that the Youth Welfare Department stated to K that she must only stick to her point of view and say that she did not want to return home in any circumstances. The Senate cannot see any improper influencing of K in this.

The decision of the Guardianship Court is based in substance on K's wish, as stated to it, that she did not want to go back home. This stated wish was not however inconsistent with the truth.

The plaintiff herself admitted on her personal examination before the Senate that K, at the point in time in question, did not in fact want to go back home and that even in the conversation on the morning of 17 November 1992 there were no prospects of this. Moreover, K stated this wish approximately eight months later to the Complaints Chamber of the Landgericht. There is no allegation that the facts of the case were presented to the Guardianship Court in some other way which was inconsistent with the truth and based on improper influence by the Youth Welfare Department.

3. The Youth Welfare Department has also not violated its official duties by accommodating K after the decision of the Guardianship Court, at first in the Youth Protection Centre Ka in D and afterwards in the children's home B in M.

(a) On the basis of the decision of the Guardianship Court, the right to determine K's place of residence was provisionally transferred to the Youth Welfare Department as guardian (§§ 1631 (1), 1666 and 1666a of the BGB). The Youth Welfare Department could therefore decide on K's place of residence without the agreement of the plaintiff [reference omitted]. The right to determine a place of residence also includes the authority to exercise care of the person concerned to the extent necessary for a parent. This includes entrusting the person to a family or—as here—the houseparents in a home. This authority is part of the right to determine the place of residence.

(b) Besides this, the plaintiff shows no alternative to accommodation in a home—which was in any case only provisional for the period of the temporary order—especially as she and K could not agree at the hearing before the Guardianship Court on accommodation with another appropriate care person. Accommodation with the plaintiff herself was out of the question as a serious alternative after the Guardianship Court had just taken this aspect of guardianship away from her.

4. Finally it cannot be established that the Youth Welfare Department violated its official duty just because it did not, following the decision of the Guardianship Court, provide any services—additionally to accommodation in the home—under § 2 (2) of the KJHG.

(a) In this connection, the Senate can leave open the question of whether the Youth Welfare Department, under the given circumstances of the plaintiff, ought to have offered such services, namely educational assistance (§ 27 of the KJHG) educational advice (§ 28 of the KJHG) or socio-pedagogical family assistance (§ 31 of the KJHG). The Senate can therefore also leave open the question of whether it was due to lack of readiness on the part of the Youth Welfare Department or on the part of the plaintiff that this did not occur; even at the Senate hearing this could not be resolved by examination of the parties on both sides.

(b) But this does not need to be resolved in order to decide the legal dispute; that is why it is not necessary to go into the question of whether the memoranda submitted by the defendant district were—as the plaintiff asserts—made out after the event or not. Because even if the Youth Welfare Department breached its duty in not offering to the plaintiff and K services in accordance with § 2 (2) of the KJHG, it cannot be established within the framework of the necessary examination of causality that matters would then have taken such a course that the harm which is the subject of the plaintiff's claim would not have arisen.

(aa) Even according to the plaintiff's own allegation, no sufficient grounds were present for saying that if services under § 2 (2) of the KJHG had been obtained the relationship between the plaintiff and K would have improved. The plaintiff herself described K as a "very egocentric girl with a very strongly demanding nature". K's behaviour, in so far as this is of importance for the resolution of the legal dispute, confirms the plaintiff's own assessment. Within the framework of § 287 of the Civil Procedure Code, which is to be applied here, success from services under § 2 (2) of the KJHG cannot in any case be established or even assumed; demonstrating this is the responsibility of the plaintiff who is under a duty of explanation and proof in respect of causality.

(bb) Even if a different view is taken, there is nothing to indicate within the framework of § 287 of the Civil Procedure Code that services under § 2 (2) of the KJHG would have succeeded so quickly that the harm which is the subject of the plaintiff's claim would thereby have been avoided or at least reduced; demonstrating this also falls to the plaintiff who is under a duty of explanation and proof in respect of it.

The harm to her reputation which the plaintiff asserts—and the sale of her house in H associated with this—is based only on the taking into care under § 42 (2) of the KJHG, the ensuing deprivation of the right to determine the place of residence by the Guardianship Court and the subsequent accommodation of K in the Youth Protection Centre Ka and in the children's home B. Even the legal costs and the costs of visits and telephone calls arose exclusively in connection with the taking into care, the deprivation of the right of determination of the place of residence and the accommodation. This harm would therefore also not have been avoided by additional services by the Youth Welfare Department under § 2 (2) of the KJHG. The same applies to the impairment which the plaintiff claimed occurred to her health. Apart from the fact that, according to the statements of the plaintiff to the expert D, this impairment must for the most part have existed previously, there is nothing to indicate that it would have been avoided or even significantly reduced by services by the Youth Welfare Department under § 2 (2) of the KJHG.

Case 139

OBERLANDESGERICHT HAMM, 23 MARCH 1990

AZ: 11 U 108/89 (NOT PUBLISHED)

Official liability for refusing to allow a sick child to participate in special tuition.

[Headnote: Officials of the Education Office and head teachers can breach their official duties as against the mother of a child who is required to attend school but who suffers from school phobia if they do not ensure that the child can take part in special tuition in accordance with SchpflG NW § 7 (1). The mother can demand in such a case that the costs spent on private tuition are reimbursed in accordance with principles of official liability.]

On the plaintiff's appeal (Berufung) (in other respects rejected) the judgment of the third civil chamber of the Bochum Landgericht, delivered on 24 April 1989, is amended. The defendant Land is ordered to pay to the plaintiff DM 2,500.00 with interest at 4 per cent from 12 January 1990. The remainder of the claim is rejected. . . .

Reasons

The appeal of the plaintiff is permissible and is largely successful. It results in judgment against the defendant Land for payment of DM 2,500.00 with interest.

II.

The plaintiff is entitled in her own right to a claim for damages in the sum of 2,500.00 DM against the defendant Land under § 839 (1) of the BGB in combination with Article 34 of the Basic Law. This is because the employees of the education office for the . . . town and the head teachers of the . . . Grammar School and the . . . Secondary School did not ensure (or did not ensure in time) that the plaintiff's son was given special education in the form of home tuition.

1.

(a) It was a breach of official duty for the competent officials of the Education Office (in particular the educational supervisor, but also the head teacher of the W Grammar School and the head teacher of the . . . Secondary School) not (or not at the right time) to take steps which ensured that the plaintiff's son was given special tuition. The setting up of special tuition was unreasonably delayed as a result.

It must be assumed that a sick child has a subjective public right to schooling in a special school or to take part in special tuition, which corresponds to his or her duty to attend a special school or to take part in special tuition which is regulated in § 7 (1) of the SchpflG. But the entitlement following from this provision is limited by the educational standards of primary and secondary schools, so that no breach of official duty falls to be considered insofar as the Education Office has not enabled the plaintiff's son to take part in special tuition at grammar school level.

According to § 7 (1) sentence 2 of the SchpflG, the education authority to be designated by the Minister of Education and the Articles by statutory instrument decides on the special tuition in which children required to attend school have to take part. The competent education authority is the Education Office (§ 1 of the Education Office Competence Regulations in combination with para. 2 of the Appendix). The official duties of the Education Office officials and the head teachers arise from the Circular of the Minister for Education and the Arts of 17 July 1980, amended by the Circular of 10 and 23 October 1984 and the Circular of 16 November 1987. Until the amendment of the Circular of 17 July 1980 by the Circular of 16 November 1987 (with effect from 15 February 1988) a pupil had a claim to special tuition if he was prevented from attending school on the grounds of illness for longer than eight weeks (six weeks from 15 February 1988). If it is established from the start that a pupil will have to stay away from school lessons for more than eight weeks, special tuition can be given earlier (para. 1.1 of the said Circular). According to para. 5 of the Circular of 10 October 1984, applications for special tuition (home tuition) through the direction of the school so far attended by the pupil are to be directed or referred on to the Education Office. The Education Office then decides on the application in accordance with para. 6 of the Circular and arranges the special tuition (home tuition). Before the decision it has to be established by medical opinion—in cases of doubt by the medical officer—whether the prerequisites for special tuition are present and whether the pupil is in a position to take part in the special tuition (para. 3 of the Circular of 17 July 1980; but different provision is made in § 7 (1) sentence 3 of the SchpflG, in which the obtaining of an opinion of the Public Health Department is essential).

Until the report of the head teacher of the . . . Grammar School of 5 March 1986 [reference omitted], the plaintiff's son had been absent from lessons for about 1½ years i.e. from 3 September 1984 to 6 March 1986. This occurred without the responsible head teacher of the Grammar School and the Education Office having arranged anything to secure the fulfilment of the duty to attend school in accordance with §§ 1 (1) and 7 (1) of the SchpflG. The pupil had been ill from the 3rd September 1984. It is revealed by the report of the head teacher to the Education Office for the town of . . . of 5 March 1986 that the plaintiff had submitted to the school a psychological certificate which stated that her son had acute attacks of school anxiety and declared that school attendance was not possible for half a year for this reason. Even at that time the head teacher of the . . . Grammar School ought, according to the legal and administrative provisions previously mentioned, to have considered the giving of special tuition and arranged for the plaintiff to make an appropriate application. Then the Education Office would also have been immediately involved in the matter. According to the psychological certificate (possibly relating to certification by the qualified psychologist . . . of 4 October 1984) it was certain from the start that the pupil would have to be absent from school lessons for more than eight weeks. When the certificate had run out and the plaintiff appeared at the school with her son on 1 March 1985, he refused to attend school of any kind. It may admittedly have been proper to refer the plaintiff to an education advice centre. But no-one at the Grammar School and the . . . Secondary School at which the plaintiff's son was enrolled then troubled any further about the educational fate of this pupil. There was no co-ordination of any kind between the two schools. The Education Office too was not brought in at first, so it became possible for the plaintiff's son to miss several years of compulsory schooling. It was true that the persons having the right of upbringing have, according to § 16 (2) of the SchpflG, to see to it that a child who is under a duty to attend school takes part regularly in lessons and in the other events of the school. But as the pupil had school phobia, which emerges from the certification of the clinics of the state capital D of 24 November 1987 and their opinions of 16 December 1987, the plaintiff could not urge her son to take part in lessons at the school.

In this situation, the Education Office had to ensure that the necessary special tuition was given to the plaintiff's son. In the same way as the persons having the right of upbringing, it has the task of encouraging pupils to fulfil the duties incumbent upon them (§ 14 (3) sentence 2 of the SchpflG). These include in particular that the pupils should comply with their duty to attend school to the required extent. For this purpose, the Education Office has to ensure that it learns of school absences of long duration in good time, so that it can if necessary take the measures needed to fulfil the duty to attend school. Substantial absences must have occurred here, because a pupil could not otherwise have received no lessons for more than three years. Even after the receipt of the report of the head teacher of the . . . Grammar School of 5 March 1986, it was more than a year until the attempt at setting up special tuition from 6 July 1987 was undertaken. As indications of the existence of school anxiety emerged from the report anyway, the Education Office ought immediately to have clarified whether the pupil had a school phobia which made the arrangement of special tuition (home tuition) necessary. It should have done this by obtaining an opinion from the Public Health Office. The lawyer's letter of 10 February 1987 in which it was announced that the pupil would attend a boarding school with immediate effect changed nothing in this respect, because it was immediately overtaken by the further lawyer's letter of 16 February 1987 in which it was stated that the best thing would be to give private tuition to the boy until his psychological condition had been overcome. It was only on the basis of the letter by the plaintiff's legal representative of 8 December 1987 that private tuition at home was set up, but admittedly only four hours a week initially.

(b) The officials of the defendant Land, in particular the employees of the Education Office, have negligently breached their duties in that they did not arrange and expedite the setting up of the special tuition in a purposeful manner. Even the head teachers involved did not take sufficient steps to ensure compulsory school attendance and thereby likewise negligently breached their official duties. They have violated unambiguous legal and administrative provisions. Every official must possess or acquire the knowledge of law and administration necessary for the conduct of his office.

(c) The defendant Land is liable in accordance with Article 34 of the Basic Law for the breaches of official duty. According to this provision, the liability applies in principle to the body which the official who acts contrary to duty serves. Here that is the Land of NW. The head teachers of the named schools are officials of the defendant Land. The same applies to the employees of the Education Office. Admittedly the Education Office in a town which is an administrative district in its own right (. . . is such a town) consists of the chief executive and the educational supervisor (§ 18 (2) sentence 1 of the SchVG). It is not however here a question of breaches of the official duty of the chief executive, who is in principle a local official. It can therefore be left undecided whether on breaches of official duty by the chief executive as a member of the Education Office, the town of . . . or the defendant Land is the body liable in the sense of Article 34 of the Basic Law. The breaches of official duty established in the case in question are to be laid at the door of the educational supervisor. According to the Circular of the Minister for Education and the Articles of 10 October 1984 (para. 7) competence for special tuition (home tuition) was to be transferred at the Education Office into the overall charge of an educational supervisor. According to the standing orders for the Education Office—§ 3 (3) sentence 2 of the Circular of the Minister for Education and the Articles of 4 December 1984—the arrangement and carrying out of the special lessons is in any case predominantly in the educational service area. The former defendant's reply to the appeal, which the defendant Land has clearly adopted, also proceeds on this basis. The educational supervisor is however an official of the defendant Land.

2.

The official duties which have been breached do not only exist as against the pupil but also as against the plaintiff as the person having the right to bring him up. Whether in the individual case the person harmed belongs to the class of third parties in the sense of § 839 (1) of the BGB is not to be judged according to whether the official duty—even if not necessarily solely—has the purpose of looking after the interest of the person harmed. It must follow from the provisions which form the basis of the official duty and which outline it, as well as from the nature of the official business, that the person harmed belongs to the group of persons whose interests are to be protected and promoted according to the goal and legal purpose of the official business. Only then will a duty to compensate exist as against him following a culpable breach of duty. On the other hand, no duty to compensate is established as against other persons, even if the breach of official duty has had a more or less disadvantageous effect for them. A special relationship must therefore exist between the official duty breached and the third party harmed (constant case law of the Bundesgerichtshof, see e.g. BGHZ 106, 323, 331 with further references). Such a special relationship exists here between the official duties breached and the plaintiff. It arises from the fact that education of her son (who is required to attend school) is incumbent on the plaintiff and she therefore has a paramount interest in his well ordered school education in the same way as the pupil. According to Article 8 (1) sentence 2 of the Constitution of the Land of NW it is the natural right of parents to determine the instruction and education of children. The defendant Land has taken over the public school system and exercises supervision over it. The competent officials are therefore breaching their official duties as against the parents as the persons having the right of upbringing, if they do not ensure (or do not ensure in time) that a pupil who has a long lasting illness receives that special tuition which is provided for and formulated in the relevant legal and administrative provisions.

3.

It cannot be in doubt that substantial deficits in the pupil's education have occurred through the lengthy delays by the responsible officials. This is also expressly emphasised in the letter of the Institute for Remedial Education and Psychotherapy of the town of . . . of 23 February 1987. These deficits could not be made up for by the special tuition which was given in the end after a long wait. The expenditure claimed by the plaintiff for the giving of private tuition is therefore adequately caused by the breaches of duty by the officials of the defendant Land. On the basis of the credible testimony of the witness . . . Sch, it is established that the plaintiff's expenditure on the private tuition amounted to at least DM 2,500.00. The witness stated that in the period from the end of September or the beginning of October 1987 to the end of June 1988—with the exception of school holidays—she gave the plaintiff's son a double hour of private tuition twice each week for a payment of DM 20.00 per hour. Altogether the plaintiff paid her almost DM 3,000.00, but at least DM 2,500.00. The last named sum is to be taken as a basis for the measurement of the harm. A higher level of harm cannot be established with certainty in the face of the testimony of the witness, especially as receipts are not available.

4. Contributory fault by the plaintiff for the origin of the harm (§ 254 (1) of the BGB) cannot be established. Contributory fault by the plaintiff could at best be deduced from the fact that in 1987 she did not arrange earlier for the Institute for Remedial Education and Psychotherapy of the town of . . . to give an opinion about her son and then make the report available to the Education Office. This first happened with the letter of the 23rd April 1987 by the plaintiff's legal representative. But then the substantial deficits in education which were caused by the delays on the part of the officials of the defendant Land had already occurred. Also, it was not until the beginning of 1988 that the special tuition for the plaintiff's son was at last arranged.

5. Finally, the plaintiff can also not be blamed for the fact that she omitted to avert the harm by the use of legal redress. The raising of a complaint in the administrative courts for failure to act would not have been able to change anything in relation to the onset of the harm, especially as the plaintiff might fairly have hoped that she could have achieved the arrangement of special tuition without taking legal action in the administrative courts. . . .

3. COMPENSATION AND SATISFACTION

Case 140

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (GREAT CIVIL DIVISION) 6 JULY 1955

BGHZ 18, 149

The Great Civil Senate has answered as follows the question referred to it by the Sixth Civil Senate as to whether in assessing the amount of reasonable compensation in money in accordance with § 847 BGB all the circumstances must be taken into account, including the financial circumstances and the degree of blameworthiness of the person liable to pay damages:

In assessing equitable compensation in money in accordance with § 847 BGB all circumstances of the case can be taken into account, among them the degree of blameworthiness of the person who is liable and the financial circumstances of both parties. In this connection account must also be taken of the extent to which the person who is liable is indemnified by a liability insurance or a claim for redress.

Reasons

According to § 847 BGB "equitable compensation" in money may be claimed in case of injury to the body or to health even in respect of damage which is not pecuniary. The older view, held in particular by the Reichsgericht, was that compensation under § 847 BGB must be "equitable" in respect of all the circumstances which characterise the damaging event in issue; it therefore took into account not only the extent and the duration of the pain, disfigurement, suffering, and intrusion, which were always matters of primary concern, but also particularly the economic situation of the injured party and of the tortfeasor, the degree of blameworthiness, and the circumstances which led to the damage (e.g. gratuitous transportation). According to a more recent view the compensation must only be “equitable” with reference to the purpose, which is to compensate non-pecuniary damage; it therefore only takes into account the extent and the duration of the pain, disfigurement, suffering, and intrusion as well as the means necessary to compensate for non-pecuniary damage; thus it takes into account only the general circumstances of the injured party. This more recent view was adopted by the Third Civil Senate in its decision of 29 September 1952 [reference] to the extent that in assessing the amount of damages for pain and suffering it did not take into account the economic circumstances of the tortfeasor, while leaving open the question as to whether the degree of this blameworthiness should also not be considered.

I. 1. The modern practice bases its view on the ground that claims for damages for pain and suffering, too, are true claims for damages; it therefore regards as decisive the non-pecuniary damage which the injured party suffered as a result of the tort; as in all cases of claims for damages it seeks to take into account only those consequences which the act giving rise to damages has had for the injured party.

This view assumes correctly that as a result of the treatment of the Civil Code of claims in respect of torts—including those based on non-pecuniary damage—it is impossible to attribute to them a direct penal function. This applies equally to claims for non-pecuniary damage. However, by denying the penal character of claims for non-pecuniary damage no final answer has been given to the question for decision in the present case which is in respect of what circumstances damages to be awarded under § 847 BGB must be “equitable”.

2. First of all the provision of § 847 BGB must be considered as part of the system of the Civil Code as a whole, which in the most diverse places determines the extent of a performance in accordance with “equitable discretion” or allows “equitable compensation”. In these cases the Code intends normally that account should be taken of all the circumstances of a case which are relevant according to equitable considerations, and more particularly the situation of all the parties involved.

(a) If a performance is to be fixed in accordance with “equitable discretion”, as §§ 315, 317 BGB require, or an act must be carried out in accordance with “equitable discretion”, as §§ 1246, 2048, 2156 BGB demand, it means undoubtedly in these cases that not only the economic circumstances of the creditor, but also those of the debtor must be taken into account.

(b) In connection with claims for damages, too, the Civil Code refers not only in § 847 but also in §§ 829, 1300 to equitable compensation or to damages in accordance with the requirements of equity.

When § 829 BGB speaks of equitable considerations, the Code refers expressly to “the circumstances of the parties involved”, and thus the economic circumstances of the parties must also be taken into account. It is true that normally § 847 BGB presupposes that the tortfeasor is to be blamed, while § 829 establishes strict liability. Moreover, according to § 829 both the ground for holding a person liable as well as the extent of his liability are determined according to the principles of equity, while according to § 847 only the extent of liability is so to be fixed. Nevertheless, it is the express intention of § 829, also in so far as it determines the extent of the claim for damages in accordance with equity, that the circumstances of those involved should be taken into account, albeit on the basis of detailed particulars. It is not possible either to refer to § 829 in order to further the argument in support of a restrictive interpretation of § 847, as adopted by the more recent practice, if only for the reason that the Civil Code by requiring that something is to be performed in accordance with the principles of equity intends not only in that case, but regularly, that all circumstances are to be taken into account which may be relevant.

(c) A closer connection than that between § 847 and § 829 BGB exists between the claims arising under § 847 and the claim for defloration under § 1300 BGB, in respect of which the law provides also that “equitable compensation” in money is to be granted. It must be admitted that the liability under § 1300 arises from the breach of an agreement which forms part of Family Law while that under § 847 is based on a tort. However, in both cases the extent of liability is to be determined in accordance with equity.

This history of § 1300 BGB shows that the legislature intended the considerations which had led it to allow “equitable compensation under § 1300” to apply equally to “equitable compensation in § 847”. Thus the proposal to replace the expression “equitable compensation” in what is now § 1300 by the term “adequate compensation” was rejected together with the further proposal to grant, instead of “equitable compensation”, “compensation which takes into account the financial circumstances of either party to the engagement to marry as well as the reduced expectation of another marriage”. One of the reasons was that § 831 of the Bill, now § 847, which was followed by § 1283 of the Bill, now § 1300, also referred to equitable compensation and that in the case of a claim for damages under what is now § 1300, which follows closely the claim for damages under what is now § 847, no danger existed that the previous practice (opposed by the second proposal) in the case of claims for defloration would be continued.

The substantive considerations expressed in respect of § 1300 and applicable also to § 847, as appeared above, emerge from the reasons which accompany the rejection of the proposals referred to above. The first of these proposals was rejected on the ground that “the term ‘equitable’ had a clear established technical meaning”. The second proposal was met by the argument that “it was not just in assessing the damages to take no notice at all of the financial circumstances and the situation in life of the girl, as might be feared, if the proposal were accepted; the best means of ensuring the development of a realistic practice of the Court was not in any way to restrict the judges in assessing damages”. Another proposal to fix the damages under § 1300 at a minimum of fifty times the normal local daily wage was “countered by the argument that individual provisions concerning the assessment of damages were not advisable . . .”.

Therefore the preparatory materials for the Civil Code permit the conclusion in respect of § 847 as well that it was the intention of the legislature not to constrain the courts to disregard certain circumstances in assessing damages for non-pecuniary losses. This means that in fixing equitable compensation the courts may, as a matter of principle, take into consideration all the circumstances which may arise.

3. Contrary to the modern view the same conclusion follows from the legal purpose of damages for pain and suffering. In law damages for pain and suffering have a dual function. They are meant to provide the injured party with adequate compensation for that kind of damage, for those handicaps which are not of a pecuniary nature. At the same time they are meant to indicate that the tortfeasor owes the victim satisfaction for what he has done to him.

Of these two functions, that of compensation or redress is prominent. The purpose of the claim is redress for the loss suffered. The latter cannot, however, be assessed arithmetically. The underlying idea may perhaps be formulated as follows: the tortfeasor, who has not only inflicted pecuniary damage upon the injured party but also gravely affected his life, is to help the latter by his payments to alleviate his burden as far as possible. Having regard to this purpose of damages for pain and suffering it must be admitted that considerations of the seriousness, acuteness, and duration of the pain, suffering, and the disfigurement constitute the main basis for assessing equitable damages. The sum required to provide this redress, therefore, depends primarily upon the extent of this damage. It is the merit of the decision of the Third Division of this court [reference] to have shown this, with the result that damages for pain and suffering were treated more seriously than hitherto not only as to their legal significance, but also as to their factual evaluation. Since, however, the Code requires equitable compensation in the meaning set out above (I.2), the purpose of making good cannot determine alone the amount of damages, particularly since this purpose is insufficient alone to fix the amount with something approximating certainty.

Furthermore, even if claims in tort for damages, including damages for non-pecuniary losses, no longer bear any penal character directly, nevertheless something inherent in the purpose of making good is a reminder of its former function as a fine or, to use the opposite term of the corresponding Swiss institution, as satisfaction. Legal history shows that damages for pain and suffering have their origin in criminal law and that in the laws of the German States in modern times different types were fashioned according to the respective stages of development, which still reflect in some respects their antecedents in criminal law. The following is significant: wherever damages for pain and suffering were not excluded altogether, as for instance in § 112 I 6 of the Prussian Allgemeines Landrecht of 1792 in respect of the persons other than “peasants or common citizens” or in Article 14 of the Württemberg Act concerning the effects in private law of crimes and penalties of 5 September 1839 [reference], the laws provided expressly that in assessing the amount of damages also certain circumstances were to be taken into account which cannot be reconciled with a limited notion of damages restricted to making good. Such are the degrees of blameworthiness mentioned in §§ 168, 125 I 6 of the Prussian Allgemeines Landrecht, or the degree of blameworthiness and “the financial circumstances of the tortfeasor” as stated in § 15 of the Baden Act concerning the effects in private law of crimes of 6 March 1845 [reference] or if, according to the Saxon decree of 1 August 1856 [reference] damages were to be fixed “in the discretion of the judge, having regard to the pain inflicted on the victim”, which latter provision was interpreted to mean that the status and the financial circumstances of the claimant were to be taken into account [reference]. Similar considerations influenced the unanimous view of the practice of the courts and writers up to the thirties of this century in dealing with § 847 BGB to the effect that in assessing damages for pain and suffering all circumstances must be taken into account which colour the individual case.

It is true that the legislature has given the claim for pain and suffering the form of a claim for damages according to private law. However, in substance it does not bear the character of a usual claim of this kind, which is for compensation in respect of pecuniary damage. Its purpose to effect restitution cannot be achieved through restitution in kind, as is the case where the damage is pecuniary. To that extent restitution is impossible. Certainly an attempt is to be made to make good, but it cannot be done arithmetically. It is impossible to concentrate on the notion of making good, because non-pecuniary damage can never be expressed in terms of money and since the possibility itself of making good by means of money payments is very limited. Contrary to a view to be encountered occasionally, non-pecuniary losses concern "assets not to be valued in money terms". The amount of money necessary to make good cannot be determined by "so to say balancing pain with those pleasures which are intended to wipe out the victim's memory of his sufferings". Even where it is to a certain extent possible to compensate physical and mental suffering by amenities and comforts, widely differing possibilities almost always exist as to how redress is to be effected and the purpose alone of the damages to make good does not provide a sufficient measuring-rod. The purpose of making good alone only provides a very rough standard for assessing damages the greater the non-pecuniary loss. This appears particularly if the non-pecuniary loss is so extensive that it is difficult to conceive of making it good, as for instance when restitution can hardly be achieved because the body of the victim has been extensively destroyed. This becomes particularly clear where the type of non-pecuniary damage cannot be made good at all, as for instance frequently in the case of psychological effects. It is generally recognized that damages for non-pecuniary losses must also be awarded if an assault, false imprisonment, or interference with physical integrity resulted in psychological and not in physical injuries. Especially in the case of psychological disturbances it will frequently be impossible to compensate the feelings of unhappiness since the injured party himself is not conscious of his damage. Nevertheless, damages for pain and suffering have been rightly awarded even in this case. The award of damages under § 847 BGB, it must be admitted, serves to make good non-pecuniary loss; it is not, however, a condition for awarding damages for non-pecuniary loss that this purpose can be achieved. The same would be the case if the injured party is so situated financially that no amount of money could raise a sense of happiness which would make good his non-pecuniary damage.

Precisely in these situations of non-pecuniary damage, the function of making good, which is intimately connected with the legal regulation of damages for non-pecuniary loss, acquires its special significance. The function of making good underlines that the injurious act has created a certain personal relationship between the tortfeasor and the victim—which, by its nature demands that in assessing how much the tortfeasor must pay the victim all the circumstances of the case must be taken into account. This appears also from the special provision that this claim dies with the claimant and cannot be assigned.

II. In accordance with the foregoing observations, the severity and the extent of the reduction in the enjoyment of life must be considered in the first place for the purpose of assessing damages for pain and suffering. This is the preponderant aspect. In addition, other circumstances may, however, be taken into account as well which are salient features of the injurious act.

1. One of these is the degree of blameworthiness on the part of the tortfeasor. The degree of blameworthiness is not only relevant, as the more recent interpreters of § 847 BGB would have it, with regard to its effect upon the injured party: the fact that the injury was caused by the reckless or even intentional behaviour of the defendant, may naturally have left the injured party embittered, while he may be more inclined to accept as his fate an injury caused by slight negligence. Leaving aside the reaction of the injured party, it may accord with equity and the notion of satisfaction in assessing compensation under § 847 BGB if, in the individual case, intention and recklessness count against the tortfeasor, while especially slight negligence counts in his favour. It would be incomprehensible if the trial judge could not award higher damages for pain and suffering in the case of a crime than where the external consequences are the same, but occurred as result of an error in normal human intercourse which might be committed by anybody. For this reason many foreign legal systems, too, have taken, and still take, into account the degree of blameworthiness of the tortfeasor in assessing the amount of damages payable by him. The fact that German law does not offer this opportunity where the damage is pecuniary does not preclude its use where the Code offers it in arriving at the equitable compensation for non-pecuniary loss. On the contrary, this possibility is a great merit of the regulation of damages for non-pecuniary losses.

Apart from the degree of blameworthiness, the cause of injury or of the injurious act may be relevant in certain circumstances. Even if the degree of blameworthiness is the same, different acts may bear very different characteristics (injury in the course of the enjoyment of some pleasure on the one hand, or in connection with the exercise of a profession, the administration of help, or any other necessary activity on the other hand). This is particularly valid in those cases in which the tort was committed on the occasion of an activity which the tortfeasor carried out in order to oblige the injured party and which the latter welcomed—perhaps even gratefully—as, for instance, where the victim suffers an injury on the occasion of a journey as a gratuitous passenger in the car of the tortfeasor as a result of the latter's negligence who sought to do him a favour. In such a case it may even be inequitable if the victim claims damages for pain and suffering to an amount equal to that which a pedestrian could have claimed who had been run down by the tortfeasor.

2. Possibly the economic circumstances of the injured party may also influence the assessment of damages on grounds of equity.

The economic circumstances of the victim may, for instance, affect the notion of making good inasmuch as the function of making good is less significant if, for example, the injured party is so favourably circumstanced economically that sums of money paid by the tortfeasor can hardly make good the non-pecuniary damage suffered to him. In such cases the function of damages as satisfaction assumes primary importance. On the other hand, it is not impossible that in individual cases the higher standard of living to which the victim is accustomed may also lead to increased damages for pain and suffering.

3. Finally, the economic circumstances of the tortfeasor may also be taken into account in assessing the damages under § 847 BGB.

(a) Viewed from the angle of equity, i.e. by taking into account the circumstances of both parties, the idea of making good should not normally result in the tortfeasor's serious and lasting penury. It is true that here, too, the need to offer satisfaction and to make good the damage is preponderant. The fact that the tortfeasor is not well off must be of greater or lesser importance having regard to the cause of the damaging event, and especially to the degree of blameworthiness. Any behaviour of the tortfeasor which is especially reprehensible, such as inconsiderate recklessness or, even more so, acting intentionally, may consign into the background any concern to preserve him from economic distress. On the other hand, if the tortfeasor's economic situation is particularly favourable it may appear equitable in the exercise of the court's discretion to award higher damages. Moreover, the smaller the amount of damages required to make good non-pecuniary losses, the more it will be possible to disregard the economic circumstances, in particular those of the tortfeasor. Equally the economic circumstances of the victim may be relevant in this connection. If the victim is comfortably off, it may appear equitable in assessing the damages to exercise in favour of the tortfeasor the power of discretion inherent in the consideration of the economic circumstances. On the other hand, if the victim is in straitened circumstances it may seem equitable to exercise this discretion in favour of the tortfeasor to a lesser extent than if the victim is well situated financially. However, even if the tortfeasor is penniless considerations of his financial position can never release him from the duty to pay damages for pain and suffering, for the financial position of the tortfeasor constitutes only one aspect among many, and not even the most important, which must be taken into account.

(b) Any such consideration of the economic circumstances of the parties involved is not contrary to the intention of positive law—express or implied. It is, however, true that in the case of a debt consisting of fungibles the debtor is always liable, even if he cannot supply them and that therefore in the case of a debt of fungibles, he cannot plead his adverse economic circumstances. The significance of any considerations of the economic circumstances of the tortfeasor, is, however, completely misunderstood by those who argue that, as a result of his adverse economic circumstances damages for non-pecuniary loss which are appropriate “as such” are reduced and that therefore the victim is receiving less than is due to him “as such”. This view assumes that in fixing equitable damages only the extent of the losses is to be taken into account. In reality the amount of damages for pain and suffering is ascertained only when all the circumstances of the individual case have been considered. Taking into account all the financial circumstances of the tortfeasor does not reduce in any way the damages which are appropriate “as such”; instead “equitable damages” are being assessed for the first time in accordance with § 847 BGB by taking into account all circumstances which can be evaluated, including the economic circumstances of the parties involved; without considering all the circumstances, and thus also where appropriate the economic circumstances, no assessment would be possible. For this reason it cannot be contended that such an interpretation amounts to “breaching the principle which governs the entire area of law in the matter, which is that the extent of an obligation is always independent of the ability of the debtor to perform”. This principle applies to pecuniary damages. On the other hand, the Code intends the extent of the damages for non-pecuniary losses envisaged by § 847 BGB to be assessed having regard to all the circumstances of the case. For the same reason it follows that an injured party whose economic circumstances are taken into account in his favour cannot be awarded more than his damage. The decision DR 1941, 280 does not permit the conclusion that the Reichsgericht abandoned its current practice and assumed that there is something like damages for pain and suffering “which are appropriate as such”. If such a complete change of practice had taken place, it would certainly have been accompanied by more detailed arguments; where the Reichsgericht employed the term “damages for pain and suffering which are appropriate as such”, it clearly used an imprecise formulation.

If it is acknowledged that the economic circumstances of the parties involved may be taken into account as one of the possible bases for assessing the amount of pecuniary damages for non-pecuniary losses, this constitutes a facet of the facts before the court, as are also the extent of the non-pecuniary damages and the possibility of providing an opportunity for making good. It is therefore wrong to say that it is contrary to the principle of equality to take the economic circumstances of the parties into account; for if the same victim suffers non-pecuniary damage inflicted by two tortfeasors whose economic circumstances differ from each other, the two situations are not identical. It is not clear why, as is said occasionally, the consideration of the economic conditions of the parties involved should be regarded as unsocial. Surely the fundamental principles of a social state based on law are not violated if in assessing damages the economic circumstances of the parties involved are balanced against each other.

(c) Considerations of the economic circumstances of the parties do not lead to insoluble difficulties either.

The view that considerations of the economic conditions of a penniless tortfeasor must—in strict logic—lead to a complete denial of damages under § 847 BGB has already been refuted above.

The view is also incorrect that the principle of taking into account the economic conditions is breached in those cases where the Fiscus is the tortfeasor. It must be conceded that in these cases, and also where the tortfeasor is a “charitable institution” of public law, the practice of the courts, especially that of the Reichsgericht, does not take notice of the financial situation of the tortfeasor. The reason is that the assets of the Fiscus serve public purposes and are tied to this extent. The conclusion is drawn therefrom that these assets do not reflect a financial situation in the nature of private enterprise; they cannot therefore be related to the assets of the victim, representing private enterprise, so as to balance them against each other. In the light of this view of the assets of the Fiscus, the financial situation of the Fiscus and that of the injured party are so different as to preclude a comparison. In these cases the tortfeasor (i.e. the Fiscus) lacks a characteristic (i.e. the economic circumstances) which, if existing, would have to be taken into account where engaging in considerations of equity. In the case of the Fiscus “economic” circumstances defy evaluation. They mitigate neither in favour of nor against the Fiscus as a debtor. The Fiscus can never plead straitened economic circumstances, just as the victim cannot point to the particularly favourable circumstances of the Fiscus which is liable to pay damages for pain and suffering.

No objections can be raised against the admissibility of considerations concerning the economic circumstances of the parties on the possible ground that the assessment of damages for non-pecuniary losses, which is difficult in any event, will be “rendered unpredictable and complicated” if the economic circumstances of the parties are taken into account. Apart from the fact—stressed more than once before—that the amount of damages depends primarily on the extent of the damage, the possibility of making good, and the amount of the means necessary to achieve this, none of these conceivable difficulties rules out the admissibility of considering economic circumstances, now that the legislature has abolished the more or less fixed rates for assessing damages to be awarded for non-pecuniary losses. The view that “non-pecuniary damage can be assessed and also that certain maximum and minimum amounts can be laid down as to how objectively ascertainable non-pecuniary losses can be compensated” results of necessity in the re-adoption of the fixed tariffs which were established by the law of some German States (e.g. §§ 113, 118 I. 6 of the Prussian Allgemeines Landrecht; § 1497 of the Saxon Civil Code) which were abolished by the Civil Code. Not only does the variety of possible non-pecuniary losses preclude the adoption of such “maximum and minimum tariffs” altogether or the latter would not do justice to the individual character of non-pecuniary damage, but it restricts the opportunity created by the code of reaching a decision based on the discretion of the court.

Moreover, the fact that the adverse economic circumstances of the tortfeasor are taken into account does not make it difficult or inequitable if later on, in the course of execution (by way of a judicial adjustment, a composition with creditors, or of bankruptcy), the tortfeasor seeks to obtain a reduction of his debts and thus also of his liability to pay damages under § 847 BGB which had already been fixed as appropriate in view of his unfavourable economic situation. The conclusion derived therefrom that in these cases the adverse financial position of the tortfeasor leads twice to a reduction of the claims under § 847 BGB is influenced by the incorrect assumption that damages which are appropriate “as such” are being reduced if the economic circumstances of the tortfeasor are taken into account. Here, too, the damages awarded under § 847 BGB are “reduced” only once, i.e. in the course of execution. Moreover, regarded from the economic point of view, the same result is reached not only in § 847 BGB but wherever the amount of the performance owed depends upon the economic circumstances of the debtor, as for instance where the extent of a performance or act is to be determined “in accordance with equitable discretion under §§ 315, 317, 1246, 2048, 2156 BGB, where a contractual penalty is to be reduced in accordance with § 343 BGB, or where damages for breach of promise under § 1300 are in issue”.

(d) Once it is realized that where the claim is for non-pecuniary losses, damages which are appropriate “as such” do not exist and cannot therefore be increased or reduced in view of the economic circumstances of the parties, the case where several tortfeasors acting together have committed a tort resulting in non-pecuniary damage—which is that before this court—can be solved without difficulty. Here, too—if necessary—damages under § 847 BGB must be assessed independently in respect of each tortfeasor. The same task is incumbent upon the courts if, as regards pecuniary damage, one tortfeasor is only liable under § 7a of the Haftpflichtgesetz (Strict Liability Act), § 12 of the Strassenverkehrsgesetz (Road Traffic Act), or § 23 of the Luftverkehrsgesetz (Air Traffic Act) while the other has incurred more extensive liability under § 843. The two tortfeasors are only liable as debtors in common to the extent that the amount of their liability is the same; as regards the excess, that tortfeasor is only liable who must pay higher damages.

In taking into account the economic circumstances, the question may arise as to whether in so doing the possibility of compensation between the tortfeasors should be considered. Since the fact that the economic circumstances are taken into account means that economic potential counts and since, on the other hand, economic potential is increased if enforceable claims for redress exist against the co-tortfeasor, it follows naturally that such enforceable claims for redress must be taken into account in determining economic potential. It must be admitted that if several tortfeasors who are liable in common have claims for redress against one another, each is liable in the end to pay only a portion of the total damages. The reason is that even in the presence of several tortfeasors the victim can only demand to be compensated once. This principle is not violated if the damages for non-pecuniary loss are fixed at a higher level because the value of the claims for redress against other tortfeasors is taken into account in determining the economic potential of one of the tortfeasors. In this case, too, the injured party can only recover once the sum of money which was awarded to him in respect of non-pecuniary losses. Therefore, no principle of positive law is being violated in this respect either.

(e) It was much disputed—especially in recent times—whether in considering the economic circumstances of the tortfeasor it is relevant that he is insured against liability.

The view was expressed in particular by the Reichsgericht at an early stage, that the claims of the tortfeasor arising out of liability insurance could not be taken into account since the purpose of liability insurance was to indemnify the insured in respect of payments which the latter was obliged to make because he was liable, and that this must be established first. However, this view concentrates exclusively on the relationship between the tortfeasor and the insurer of his liability; in reality the question must be as to whether and how the fact that the tortfeasor is insured against liability can affect the extent of his liability towards the injured party. For this purpose the following consideration applies quite generally to damages according to § 847 BGB: a tortfeasor who is entitled to be reimbursed by the insurer against liability to the extent of the amount insured is in a more favourable financial position than a tortfeasor who carries himself alone the burden of paying damages. The claim acquired by the payment of premiums to protection by the insurer is a financial asset in so far as any payment of compensation for damage caused is concerned.

Since in taking this financial approach it is only relevant whether the tortfeasor must bear the cost of the damages himself or will be reimbursed—at least in part—on the strength of his liability insurance, it can make no difference whether the insurance against liability is voluntary or compulsory.

Finally, it cannot be concluded that liability insurance must be disregarded because the assets of the insurer against liability constitute a special fund which is dedicated to a special purpose, similar to the assets of the Fiscus, which must be disregarded. This view overlooks that the assets of the Fiscus are not assets in the meaning of private law for the reason that they are not only dedicated to a special purpose, but because the special purpose is a public one. Therefore they cannot be related to the assets of the injured party, which are within the private sector, so as to balance them. The assets of a liability insurer, however, contrary to those of the Fiscus fall within the private sector. For this reason alone the reference to the treatment of Fiscal property is inappropriate. Moreover, in taking into account the existence of liability insurance no “purpose linked special fund” of the insurer is being considered, but the claims of the tortfeasor to be indemnified by the liability insurer.

Consequently it is admissible in assessing damages under § 847 BGB to take into account also that the tortfeasor can demand an indemnity from the insurer—up to the amount of the sum insured.

(f) In taking into account the economic circumstances of the tortfeasor it may be relevant that the damages for pain and suffering are not being awarded in the form of a lump sum but of periodic payments. Thereby the result can be achieved in some cases that the victim receives damages for pain and suffering which are largely in keeping with their purpose, namely to make good, even if the tortfeasor’s financial circumstances are unfavourable, seeing that such periodic payments do not burden him that heavily for the time being. If damages for pain and suffering are assessed in the form of a right to periodic payments the question arises, however, as to whether a subsequent change in the financial circumstances of the tortfeasor must be taken into account under § 323 of the Code of Civil Procedure [ZPO]. The answer must be in the affirmative. It is true that when the amount of damages for pain and suffering is fixed by a judgment or a compromise, the claim for damages in respect of non-pecuniary loss loses its character as a claim for damages in money; thus the amount of the claim under § 847 BGB is henceforth fixed for the future, at least in principle. However, just as any consequences of the injurious act which occurred or manifested themselves subsequently, and therefore had not been taken into account in assessing damages under § 847 BGB, may give rise to a supplementary claim under § 847 BGB, so no objections exist in principle against reviewing the periodic payments if the conditions laid down by § 323 ZPO are fulfilled, especially if a fundamental change in economic circumstances has occurred, in particular on the part of the tortfeasor.

4. As stated above on several occasions, among the circumstances to be taken into account on grounds of equity, the extent, the severity, and the duration of pain and suffering must always contribute the determining criteria; the non-pecuniary damage inflicted, the adverse effect on life always occupies the first place among the circumstances to be taken into account. For the rest, it is impossible to establish a general order of priorities among the circumstances to be considered, for their extent and importance in assessing equitable compensation emerges only when they coincide in the individual case, as was shown above, especially in II. 3 (a). It is therefore necessary to consider the individual case. The extent to which the circumstances enumerated previously, or any other which may be relevant, affect the assessment of damages for pain and suffering must be determined in accordance with equity. Such an examination may also lead to the conclusion that certain circumstances, as for instance the financial situation, should be disregarded in fixing damages for pain and suffering.

In the light of the foregoing, the question had to be answered in the general terms in which it had been formulated by the Sixth Senate of the court, for only thus the substance of the question could be treated exhaustively. Nevertheless, it seemed appropriate to stress already by the manner in which the answer is formulated that not all the circumstances which have been mentioned must be taken into account in each individual case, but only that they may be considered, having regard to the facts. In order to eliminate doubts it also appeared appropriate to include at this stage the treatment of possible claims of the tortfeasor for an indemnity under a policy of liability insurance or for redress against other tortfeasors.

Case 141

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 11 JANUARY 1983
BGHZ 86, 212 = NJW 1983, 1107 = JZ 1983, 390

The plaintiff, a general medical practitioner, was run down by a lorry on 20 September 1976 while walking in Bad Schönborn. The lorry was insured against accidents by the defendant who admitted liability in principle without reservation. The injuries of the plaintiff consisted in several abrasions, bruises, and haemorrhage; in addition he alleges that he suffered a renewed and more severe attack of tachycardia and palpitations, while the defendant denies that these are the results of the accident.

In the proceedings before the Court of First Instance the plaintiff claimed damages on the ground that between 20 September and 19 October 1976 he was not able to attend to his practice and had thus suffered a loss of income.

The District Court of Karlsruhe rejected the claim on the ground that the allegation of the plaintiff in specifying his damages had not been proved. On appeal the plaintiff pursued his claim to a reduced extent only. He pleaded now—correctly, as the defendant admits—that he had closed down his practice as early as 15 September 1976, when he started his vacation for reasons of health in Bad Schönborn. As a result of the accident he had lost twenty-one days of vacation.

The plaintiff contends that the sum of DM 10,873 represents the expenses of a resumed holiday on the basis of the hypothetical cost of a locum tenens and in running expenses for employers and maintenance. He argues that the lost vacation must be compensated according to these principles.

The Court of Appeal of Karlsruhe rejected the appeal to this effect. A further appeal by the plaintiff was unsuccessful for the following.

Reasons

I. The Court of Appeal has held that the plaintiff's claim for "spoilt holidays", which admittedly he did not resume, is not justified, even having regard to the practice initiated by the decision of the Federal Supreme Court [reference]. It referred to the criticism of this decision in the literature and is of the opinion that in any case these principles cannot be extended to the sphere of unjustifiable enrichment. In this context, non-economic damages are here in issue which according to § 253 BGB could only be recovered where an express provision so required.

II. The decision under review cannot be faulted, at least in the result.

1. The Court of Appeal rightly starts from the premise that the plaintiff cannot claim damages equal to the "value of the vacation" for having suffered the loss of a holiday which was not taken up later on.

(a) In so far as the law of tort is concerned, the damages for the economic consequences to be recovered in the case of injury to the person are mainly restricted to losses of gains and future earnings (§ 843 BGB). The practice of the courts has with good reason interpreted these notions broadly. However, this has not modified the principle that according to the intention of the legislators all loss of enjoyment can only result in damages for pain and suffering (§§ 253, 847 BGB). Thus a direct "commercialisation" assessment of the vacation is excluded.

Accordingly, the Federal Supreme Court has, for instance, denied damages if, as a result of his injuries, a person could not exercise his licence to hunt which he had acquired for payment [reference]. The Court also denied damages for the loss of use of a damaged motor car if during the period in question he was unable to use it—even if the inability of the plaintiff to use the motor car was the result of a personal injury suffered on the occasion of the same accident [references]. The temporary inability to work, too, does not constitute a recoverable head of damages, unless it results in a loss of income [reference].

Similarly, the Federal Supreme Court has disallowed damages for the "value of a vacation" resulting from damage to an object (a motor car) [reference]. This judgment shows that the Third Civil Senate also shares the opinion that generally a lost period of vacation cannot be treated as an economic loss resulting from the violation of the legal interests mentioned in § 823 I BGB. Normally the same applies in the case of violations of protective laws (§ 823 II BGB). The fact that in an earlier decision [reference] . . . the Third Civil Senate held differently in a case of liability for the violation of official duties (§ 839 BGB) may perhaps be explained by the special connection between the error committed by the customs authorities and the vacation; however, it is unnecessary in this context to discuss this question any further.

(b) This practice is to be maintained in the sphere of torts having regard also to the more recent pronouncements of the Seventh Civil Senate. According to the chain of authorities initiated by the decision [references], it is indeed admissible to claim damages for “lost holidays” as economic loss if breaches of contract are involved concerning the arrangement for or the performance in kind or by means of services connected with the form of the holidays. These efforts of the Seventh Civil Senate to start a new practice have been superseded by the statutory regulation of the travel contract (§ 651a–k), but its substance has been maintained in essence.

The Seventh Civil Senate clearly intended to create a solution for this (contractual) sphere in particular, which satisfies the interest concerned in the absence of a statutory regulation to this effect. The legislature, too, has restricted to this area the new rule, which may be said to limit to a certain extent the principle expressed in § 253 BGB, which also applies in principle to the law of contract. The Seventh Civil Senate did not regard its practice established before the legislative change as conflicting with the practice regarding the law of tort referred to in (a) above, of which it was aware [references]; the reason was that it did not regard itself as precluded from adhering to this practice because it was only concerned with contractual claims. Moreover, it regards its aim as mainly satisfied by the new regulation in the Civil Code which is limited to the law of contract [reference].

Consequently, the present Senate is not precluded from adhering to its practice pertaining to the law of tort. It is unnecessary to determine whether the above-mentioned decisions of the Seventh Civil Senate and the majority of writers [references] have only sought to find a solution by relying on a notion of economic damage which is devised to be of general validity. Objections might be raised against such an attempt. Less emphasis must be placed on the notion of economic damage, the details of which have given rise to theoretical disputes, and stress should be laid on the question whether, having regard to the purpose of the respective grounds of liability, any deleterious effect is still to be treated as economic damage. (For the attribution of consequential damage in the light of the purpose of liability in general, see the recent decision of this Senate—reference.) Accordingly, it seems entirely appropriate to treat the enjoyment of holidays in commercial terms when—and only when—the enjoyment of holidays has been made directly or indirectly the object of a contractual performance and if this obligation has been breached. To this extent such a close and clear relationship exists between the contractual duty to act and the interest in enjoying the holiday which had, so to say, been entrusted to the other contracting party that it appears justifiable to attribute to the enjoyment of vacations a commercial character based on the contractual agreement. This court finds support for its view in the observations of Stoll [reference] which are shared to a great extent by Lange [reference]; see also Steffen [reference]; Hagen [reference]. The need to relate the commercial qualifications of damages for loss of enjoyment to the purpose of the basis of liability is also underlined by the decision of the Third Civil Senate of 3 November 1980 [reference] which—contrary to the above-mentioned judgment of this Senate [reference]—envisaged the possibility of damages in respect of the loss of the pleasure of earning a licence to hunt in a case where this licence to hunt had been frustrated illegally.

If it is correct that the loss of enjoyment (in the present case as regards the period of vacation) can only be taken into consideration if another legally protected interest has been violated (e.g. in the present case by injuring health, but also where an object is damaged, such as a motor car needed for holiday travel), it remains necessary to observe the purpose of the provision of § 253 BGB in the absence of a special statutory rule. This is not only in accordance with the statute, but takes into account the undisputable consideration that otherwise an unpredictable expansion of liability in tort would have to be expected. The practice of the Seventh Civil Senate does not fail to perceive this either [references]. The reason is that the loss of the enjoyment of holidays is only one of many conceivable cases in which the loss of enjoyment, while not directly capable of being assessed in economic terms, can nevertheless be attributed a "commercial" value in certain circumstances. The fact that the area of damage may be incalculable is absent precisely in those cases where the enjoyment of a vacation is directly and clearly connected with the failure to perform contractual duties.

Consequently, this Senate does not believe that its view conflicts with the results of the decisions of the Seventh Civil Senate. The fact that in their reasoning these decisions differ in part from its own considerations is not determining in the view of this Senate, which approves the results reached by those decisions. Therefore they are not opposed to the present decision.

2. The foregoing considerations would not, however, exclude the possibility that in assessing the amount of damages for pain and suffering due to the plaintiff account may be taken of the fact that his injuries (which have proved to have been relatively light) have resulted in the loss of three weeks' vacation . . .

Case 142

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 14 JANUARY 1986
BGHZ 97, 14 = NJW 1986, 1538

Facts

The claimant claims compensation for injuries suffered in a road traffic accident on 10 January 1981, from the first defendant as keeper and driver of the motor car involved and the second defendant as insurer of it.

The dispute is not about liability but only about whether the claimant can demand the anticipated costs for removing abdominal scars resulting from an operation to the small intestine which was required by the accident. She cannot yet decide whether to have this operation because of its uncertain outcome, but she claims its cost assessed at DM 10,668 on the basis of private report obtained by her. The defendants are prepared to pay for an operation actually undergone by her, but not merely fictitious costs.

The Landgericht and the Oberlandesgericht rejected the claim to payment of DM 10,668. The appeal in law by the claimant was unsuccessful.

Reasons

I. . . .

II. The appeal court correctly assumes in this case that the claim to compensation under § 249 sentence 2 of the BGB for accident injuries suffered also covers, in principle, expenditure on the cosmetic removal of a scar caused by an accident, even if no further disturbance of functions results or even is merely feared from the scar. As the Senate has already stated in its judgment of 3 December 1974 (reference omitted), those means are to be put at the disposal of the victim which are necessary in order, if possible, to restore his physical integrity in this respect. The appeal court is however of the view that the claimant's claim to payment is not well founded at the present time, for the following reasons. According to § 249 sentence 2 of the BGB, the victim could admittedly demand, instead of restoration, the sum of money necessary for it. In the case of a physical injury, however, this claim would assume a firm and recognisable intention on the part of the victim actually to rectify the injuries inflicted on him and / or their consequences. That was lacking here. On the harming of non-material interests—as with harm to persons—one would have to assume a commitment of the costs of restoration to their purpose if the provisions of § 253 of the BGB were not to be circumvented.

Over against this, the appeal in law takes the view that the victim is completely free in the use of the means placed at his disposal. A sum of money which is paid for a necessary operation would not have to be used by him for this purpose. He could therefore even demand compensation for the costs of a fictitious operation.

The deciding Senate—in agreement with the courts of earlier instance—cannot accept this.

1. When a motor vehicle is damaged, the Senate has admittedly approved in principle a claim to compensation for the so-called fictitious costs of repair (references omitted). Contrary to the view of the appeal in law, it has however not so far recognised in principle in the case of harm to persons a claim by the victim to compensation for fictitious costs. The decision of 3 December 1974 (reference omitted) expresses no view on this subject . . .

In the published case law of the courts of first instance, the compensability of fictitious costs of cure is variously dealt with . . .

In the academic literature opinions are also divided . . .

2. The provisions of § 249 sentence 2 of the BGB are the basis of the claim for compensation made by the claimant. According to this sentence, when a person is injured or a thing damaged, the victim can demand, instead of the restoration of the former state of affairs as required under § 249 sentence 1 of the BGB, “the sum of money necessary for this”.

a) The deciding Senate has, since the seminal decision of the 23rd March 1976 (reference omitted), granted this claim to payment of the necessary costs of restoration to a victim when his motor vehicle is damaged in cases where right from the outset he has no intention at all of having the vehicle repaired. He intends to deal with the situation in some other way, perhaps by continuing to use the unrepaired vehicle or, as in that case, by giving it, unrepaired, in exchange on the purchase of a new vehicle. The Senate saw the justification for this awarding of “fictitious” repair costs in the victims' freedom of disposition, which it previously accepted by reference to the history of the provision's origin (references omitted). According to this, the victim is in principle free to decide whether he really wants to apply for this purpose the sum necessary for the restoration in accordance with § 249 sentence 2 of the BGB, or whether he wants to use it in some other way. Whether the person suffering harm makes the decision about use of the compensation money for some other purpose only after receipt of the money, or whether he has already acted accordingly before the payment, makes no difference in this connection.

All the cases in which the Bundesgerichtshof has accepted this freedom of disposition by the victim related to claims to compensation because of damage to objects (references omitted). In cases of this kind, the victim's decision about how he uses the sum of money (and, associated with this, his total or partial relinquishment of the right to restoration to which this sum of money relates) does not in substance amount to anything more than a disposition of property with a view to a transfer of the loss within his assets. The need for repair of the damaged object finds expression only within the assets of the victim and it remains expressed in these alone, regardless of how he decides to use the sum of money (reference omitted). If he has the object repaired, he will have to bear the necessary costs of this. If he disposes of the object while unrepaired, he will obtain appropriately lower proceeds from the sale. Even if he continues to use the object while unrepaired, his assets will remain burdened in so far as the value of the damaged object is smaller than that of the undamaged object. The state of the victim's assets is restored again by payment of the necessary repair costs (reference omitted). How the victim then actually structures his assets—whether he repairs the object, buys a new one or makes dispositions of a completely different kind—is his affair, which is, in principle, no concern of the tortfeasor.

b) This freedom of disposition on the part of the victim in relation to the sum of money due from the tortfeasor for restoration purposes cannot be transferred to personal injury. In this case, restitution in kind, for which the victim can demand a sum of money under § 249 sentence 2 of the BGB, is directed to the restoration of physical integrity and therefore to the removal of non-economic loss. To understand a victim's relinquishment here of a right to restitution as a mere disposition of assets, appropriately valued by the sum of money from § 249 sentence 2 of the BGB, is by the nature of the case out of the question. The decision of the victim not to submit himself to medical treatment—perhaps because of the risks associated with this or the doubtful outcome—and to continue to live with the untreated injury relates to a different plane to a disposition of assets with a sum of money from § 249 sentence 2 of the BGB. The decision is in principle no more commensurable with such a disposition than is the injury itself with which the victim remains burdened. The law grants him monetary compensation for this in the form of damages for pain and suffering. The victim who is relinquishing any kind of treatment can no more claim from the tortfeasor costs of treatment for a form of restitution which he simply does not want, than he can demand from the tortfeasor under § 249 sentence 2 of the BGB the costs of a (dearer) operation when he decides in favour of (cheaper) conservative treatment. If the victim demands the costs of treatment even though he does not want to have the treatment carried out, he is in reality demanding compensation for the continuing impairment of his health. The legal order only grants compensation of this kind to the victim in accordance with § 253 of the BGB subject to the prerequisites of § 847 of the BGB. If the victim were to be granted the fictitious costs of medical treatment which is not carried out, this would lead to evasion of § 253 of the BGB. In the cases in which the prerequisites of § 847 of the BGB are not present for the granting of damages for pain and suffering, the victim would receive such damages when they are not awarded to him under the law. In other cases he would be able to increase damages for pain and suffering awarded to him in accordance with § 847 of the BGB in a manner not provided for by the law. For the reasons explained, in personal injury cases the victim cannot in principle have any freedom of disposition in relation to the use of the costs of restoration. Instead, the costs of restoration in the personal injuries field are committed to their purpose. Therefore the victim can only demand costs of treatment under § 249 sentence 2 of the BGB if he has the intention of actually having the treatment carried out.

2. As a rule this intention will emerge simply from the need for treatment of the injury and the measures taken for its treatment.

In the present case the appeal court has, however, not been able to establish that the claimant will have the removal of the scars carried out . . .

Case 143

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 13 OCTOBER 1992
BGHZ 120, 1 = NJW 1993, 781

Facts

The first claimant (the claimant) claims from the first defendant (the defendant), a consultant at the University women's clinic at M, damages for pain and suffering for serious damage to her health suffered on her birth on the 3rd July 1979.

The claimant's mother (then aged 40) had had medical check-ups at the clinic. She was told that her child was in the breech position and she would have to give birth by Caesarean section. She gave written consent for this.

She went to the clinic two weeks early on the 3rd July 1979 because of the onset of contractions. At around 1pm the defendant took over the treatment and carried out the procedures for a natural birth. He discovered that there was a footling presentation. Because there was no progress after appearance of the child's feet, the defendant decided to carry out an extraction. Because of complications, the claimant was, at around 1.24pm, born severely harmed.

The Landgericht ordered the defendant to pay as damages for pain and suffering a capital sum of DM 50,000 and DM 500 a month. On the defendant's appeal, the Oberlandesgericht ordered the defendant to pay as such damages a capital sum of DM 30,000 and DM 250 a month. In other respects it rejected the claimant's claim and referred the defendant's more extensive appeal back. The claimant's appeal in law led to the quashing of the judgment in so far as it had been decided against her. The defendant's cross appeal in law was unsuccessful.

Reasons

II. The claimant's appeal in law.

The claimant's appeal as to the level of damages for pain and suffering is however successful. The appeal in law correctly argues that the setting of the level of damages for pain and suffering has been influenced by legal errors.

1. The appeal court was admittedly correct in linking the assessment of damages for pain and suffering primarily to the serious damage to the claimant's health . . .

In mental and emotional respects, the claimant's state of development equates to that of a baby of a few months old. Her capacity for awareness scarcely goes beyond perception and reflex reaction. Her formation of concepts and ideas as the basis of capacity for experience is limited to the most simple categories like “pleasant / unpleasant” . . . Her capacity for experience is further limited by the administration of anti-epileptic medication . . .

2. These statements are open to serious legal objections. The Senate cannot even approve the starting point of the appeal court’s decision. This was that damages for pain and suffering would largely lose their function because of the substantial limitation of the claimant’s capacity for feeling; and this would have to have the effect of reducing the level of damages for pain and suffering.

It is admittedly correct that the function of damages for pain and suffering is, according to constant case law, to give to the victim compensation for the non-material harm suffered and, further, reparation for the pain inflicted on him (BGHZ 18, 149; other references omitted) . . .

On the other hand, the court treated as a determining factor the absence to a large extent of the functions of damages for pain and suffering and took this into account by reducing the level of the compensation. The appeal court is, however, even in cases in which the personality is almost completely destroyed or, as here, the basis for its development has been taken away by fault on the part of an obstetrician, attaching central significance for the assessment of the damages for pain and suffering to the sensation which the victim experiences of his fate. It is taking this very circumstance (which for the person affected constitutes the special severity of the impairment which is the subject of the compensation) as a cause for a decisive reduction of the damages for pain and suffering. This amounts to a curtailment of the function of damages for pain and suffering . . .

The appeal court can admittedly rely for its view on the case law of the Senate . . . Although the Senate in such cases considered payment of damages or pain and suffering as necessary, this derived from the consideration that at least symbolic reparation would have to be granted to the victim as a gesture of expiation.

Such a reduction of the damages for pain and suffering to merely symbolic compensation is no longer considered by the Senate, after a fresh examination, to be justified. It does not do justice to the almost complete destruction of the victim’s personality in cases of severe brain damage. In this respect the Senate will no longer adhere to its past case law, as expressed in the above mentioned decisions. Impairments of such an extent, as in the claimant’s case, demand, having regard to the constitutional value decision contained in Art. 1 of the Basic Law, stronger weighting, and preclude a merely symbolic assessment.

From this angle, the concept of expiation (which does not generally hold good for civil liability and compensation law) is less important. For negligent acts it can only play a minor role anyway. There is instead a link with the non-material harm which a person suffers through physical injury or harm to health, and which has to be compensated under § 847 of the BGB by a money payment. Such harm does not only consist in physical or mental suffering and thus in negative sensations and feelings of aversion as a reaction to the bodily injury or the damage to health. Instead, damage to the personality and the loss of personal quality as a consequence of severe brain damage represent in themselves non-material harm which is to be compensated for independently of whether the person affected feels the impairment. That does not mean that non-material harm is generally only manifested in physical impairment. A substantial manifestation of non-material harm can consist in the victim being conscious of his impairment and therefore suffering from it to a special degree. This point of view can therefore be very important for the assessment of damages for pain and suffering.

Accordingly the compensatory function of damages for pain and suffering is not exhausted in promoting mental well-being by compensating for emotional suffering or other negative mental sensations. The appeal court is not therefore taking the nature of damages for pain and suffering sufficiently into account when it merely considers that the claimant's life could be made to some extent easier and she could in particular be made happy by loving human attention. Over and above the mere bestowing of comforts, the loss which consists in what is more or less the virtual destruction of the personality, and which in itself represents non-material harm, has to be compensated for by a fair monetary sum. In this sense, the Great Senate for civil cases has in its decision of 6 July 1955 referred to the fact that "size, intensity and duration of pain, suffering and disfigurement" form the most significant basis for assessing the compensation (reference omitted). It thus proceeds on the basis that besides pain and suffering, physical impairment as such represents a decisive factor for the assessment of damages for pain and suffering. Anyway, as the Great Senate for civil cases further stresses in this connection, the sum of money to be granted as compensation could not be discovered by—so to speak—balancing sufferings with pleasures by which the victim is to eradicate the recollection of his sufferings. It is precisely in the case of psychological disturbance that compensation for feelings of aversion will frequently not be possible, because the victim has no subjective consciousness of the harm. In spite of this, entitlement to compensation for non-material harm has been correctly recognised even in such cases (reference omitted).

. . . Within the framework of this judgement it is primarily a question here of giving, in assessing loss, appropriate recognition to the fact that the extensive destruction of the basis for the capacity for perception and sensation, for which the tortfeasor is responsible, affects the victim in the core of her being and therefore has a significance for her which is related to her very existence. Harm of this kind constitutes an independent group of cases in which the destruction of the personality by the cessation or denial of the capacity for sensation is the central issue. It must therefore, in assessing compensation under § 847 of the BGB, be given an independent valuation which does justice to the central significance of this loss for the person. In this connection the judge can make gradations according to the extent of each impairment and the degree of capacity for experience and sensation which remains for the victim, to take account of the peculiarities of each individual case of harm. On the other hand, the judge is not allowed to take his bearings from an imaginary picture which is characterised by a undiminished capacity for sensation and suffering and then make reductions having regard to the complete or virtual ending of the capacity for sensation . . .

3. . . .

4. The appeal in law, however, is unsuccessful in objecting to the appeal court's failure, having regard to the reparation function of damages for pain and suffering, to express any view on the question of whether the fault on the defendant's part in relation to the treatment is to be assessed as gross. It is not necessary for this question to be considered, because in cases of the present kind, feelings by the victim on the subject of reparation by payment of damages for pain and suffering (for which the assessment of the fault in treatment as gross could play a role) are absent.

*Case 144BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL DIVISION) 11 OCTOBER 1994
BGHZ 127, 186 = NJW 1995, 452Facts*

The claimant demands from the defendants compensation for pain and suffering for injuries which she suffered in a road traffic accident on 17 July 1989. The first defendant ("the defendant") who was then 21, turned to the right in his car, which was insured with the second defendant against third party liability. As he did so, he lost control of the vehicle, veered on to the opposite side of the road and struck the claimant, who was then 18 years old, who was coming towards him on a bicycle. She suffered severe injuries in the accident to, amongst other things, her head and legs. She was treated in hospital until 16 September 1989, and was incapable of work until the middle of February 1990. As a result of her injuries she could neither squat nor kneel, her hearing was impaired and her capacity to work was reduced to 20 per cent. She receives incapacity benefit as well as state education grants. Her training course was extended by half a year as a result of the accident. She is at the moment unemployed and intends to pursue an alternative career because of the consequences of the accident. The claimant's material harm was dealt with under the Road Traffic Act and fully compensated. The defendants have refused payment of compensation for pain and suffering, claiming that the defendant was incapable of committing a tort at the time of the accident.

The lower courts rejected the claim. The claimant's appeal in law (which is admissible) led to quashing of the decision and reference back.

Reasons

I. The appeal court denies that there is a claim under §§ 823 (1) and 847 of the BGB because the defendant was, at the time of the accident, in a condition which excluded the free exercise of his will (§ 827). In the court's view, the expert Dr B had convincingly explained that the defendant had gradually developed a convulsive disorder which led for the first time to an epileptic semi-conscious state, over which the defendant had no control when it started to occur, during the journey on 17 July 1989. There were no grounds for saying there was any other cause of the accident. The defendant was also not to blame for the fact that he had not attached any special importance to headaches and disturbances of concentration which had occurred before the accident, after no indications had come to light of a disturbance of the functioning of the brain on an examination by a medical specialist.

According to the appeal court's view, liability on the grounds of fairness under § 829 of the BGB does not come into consideration. Even though the claimant's injuries caused by the accident were substantial and were not healed without adverse consequences, the claimant was not harmed by them in such a way as compellingly to require compensation, from the point of view of fairness, for the non-material consequences as well. Her training had merely been extended by half a year; she had received an annuity to compensate for the reduction in her earnings. The defendant had also been harmed in the long term by his illness which had been established on the occasion of the accident. In spite of successful medical treatment, he still had to put up with the uncertainty that cysts would form again. Because of this, the consequences of the claimant's accident were not so significant that, simply on the basis of the fate of the two parties, compensation for the non-financial harm was irrefutably necessary in addition to the compensation for the material harm.

There was just as little ground for saying that a comparison of the financial positions of both persons involved in the accident requires compensation. The defendant's monthly income of DM 3,800 gross as an office worker was not so high that a substantial commercial difference arose from this, especially as the cost of living in the region in which the claimant lived compared with that of the defendant was clearly lower and, apart from this, the claimant was seeking more highly qualified employment. The claim to reimbursement on the basis of the existing third party vehicle insurance cannot be regarded as part of the defendant's assets. In any case, the existing insurance cover alone could not justify liability from the point of view of fairness without the presence of further circumstances.

II. The appeal in law is admissible in its full extent. . . .

III. The appeal is also well founded.

1. . . .

2. However, the judgment does not stand up to the material legal challenges in the appeal in law. On the ground of the undisputed facts, the appeal court proceeded on the basis—admittedly without any more detailed explanation on this subject—that the defendant had, in an objective sense, behaved in a manner contrary to traffic regulations and had thereby committed an act which obliged him to provide compensation. There are no legal objections to this. But the Senate is not able to follow the reasoning by which the appeal court denied a claim on the basis of fairness under § 829 of the BGB. In this respect, the appeal in law is correct in arguing that the appeal court's statements on the question of whether a comparison of the financial situations of both parties to the accident required the awarding of compensation for pain and suffering from the point of view of fairness are influenced by legal error.

a) The appeal court, in examining fairness, has wrongly left out of consideration the existence of third party insurance on the part of the defendant. It is necessary, at least in the case of compulsory insurance, as here, to recognise the fact that insurance protection exists for the person causing harm in the accident as an important factor in the defendant's financial position.

aa) Certainly the case law on the question of whether the existence of third party insurance can be considered in connection with the duty to compensate for damage as a factor in favour of a person injured in an accident has not been uniform. The Reichsgericht in 1944, abandoning its previous case law, considered the existence of third party insurance for the first time as capable of being taken into consideration for calculation of the level of compensation for pain and suffering in respect of the duty to indemnify for tortious fault (reference omitted). The Bundesgerichtshof followed this (references omitted). The Senate held this factor to be significant for the level of compensation in respect of the duty to indemnify on the ground of fairness liability under § 829 of the BGB on the basis of corresponding considerations (references omitted). On the other hand it has until this judgment rejected the existence of insurance protection as a factor worthy of consideration when it forms the basis of a claim ([references omitted]; likewise when considering a contribution to the harm by the victim under § 254 of the BGB, on the mirror image application of § 829 of the BGB to his disadvantage [references omitted]).

In the judgment of 18 December 1979 referred to (reference omitted), the Senate abandoned this distinction, when considering third party insurance protection, between the ground and the level of the claim under § 829 of the BGB as unusable. But at the same time it emphasised that a limit must be drawn in considering whether this compensation claim could be made, in order to take account of the purpose of third party insurance which was primarily to protect of the policy holder from liability claims and not to create a basis of liability. In this connection, the Senate, in view of the criticisms made in the academic literature of the case law so far, considered whether a change in the function of third party insurance which had since occurred in the socio-economic structure would in a quite general way permit insurance protection, as a component of the tortfeasor's wealth, to be included fully within the test of fairness under § 829 of the BGB. It was not able to convince itself of such a change of function, at any rate for the area of voluntary third party insurance and therefore refused to take into account the insurance protection from such a voluntary third party insurance to the extent, in appropriate cases, of the highest amount of cover available. On the other hand, it acknowledged the concept—as employed so far—of considering the insurance merely to correct the level of the sum to be paid.

bb) These limitations cannot, however, contrary to the judgment challenged, be carried over to compulsory vehicle insurance as it existed for the defendant. The purpose of this insurance is primarily related to the protection of the victim. This goal was already served by the Introduction of Compulsory Insurance for Vehicles Act of 7 November 1939. As follows from the official reasons (reference omitted) and as the Reichsgericht (reference omitted) and, following it, the Senate in the judgments of 10 April 1954 (reference omitted) of 13 June 1958 (reference omitted) and of 24 June 1969 (reference omitted) have explained, compulsory insurance should, on the basis of this statute, secure for the victims of traffic accidents the compensation for harm which was due to them. A protection which was as free as possible from gaps should be provided for the victims, and especially in those cases in which the tortfeasor is not able to pay. This is reflected above all in § 158c of the Insurance Contracts Act (VVG) (which was newly formulated at that time) according to which, amongst other things, the duty of the insurer still remains when he is wholly or partially released as against the policy holder. This protection of the traffic accident victim was further strengthened and extended by the Compulsory Insurance Act of 5 April 1965, and its subsequent amendments, with the direct claim against the insurer and the compensation fund (references omitted).

This special determination of the purpose of compulsory insurance in relation to vehicle traffic justifies letting the victim have the benefit of the tortfeasor's existing insurance protection in deciding whether the claim can be made within the framework of § 829 of the BGB as well. It is no obstacle to this that the separation principle, according to which the insurer's duty to indemnify follows the claim and not the other way round, is thereby broken. For the special claim under § 829 of the BGB the purpose of the third party vehicle insurance, which is protection of the victim, must prevail over this principle. The Senate has acknowledged the necessity of breaking this principle (which should as a rule be adhered to) in other cases as well (references omitted).

cc) Consideration of insurance protection under compulsory vehicle insurance by the tortfeasor admittedly does not mean that, simply because of it, the claim on the basis of fairness under § 829 of the BGB should always be allowed. In examining the question of whether fairness requires the injured party to be indemnified, it must instead be borne in mind that liability under § 829 of the BGB, which is independent of fault, forms an exception in the tortious liability system of the BGB. Therefore consequent on the wording of the provision, according to the constant case law of the Senate, a claim to compensation for harm under § 829 of the BGB is not to be granted simply when fairness permits it, but only when all the circumstances of the case really require liability on the part of a blameless tortfeasor on the grounds of fairness (references omitted). This exceptional character of § 829 of the BGB compels the prerequisites under which an indemnification of the victim is to be seen as fair to be set at a high level even in these cases.

In this connection it must further be borne in mind that, in relation to road traffic accidents, the material harm to the accident victim is already covered by strict liability under the Road Traffic Act (StVG) which is independent of fault. Thus the claimant is receiving full compensation for all her material harm, in particular the cost of cure and the loss of income. In this respect, the case in question differs quite substantially from the cases decided in [reference omitted] and in the Senate's judgments of 13 June 1958 and 24 April 1979 (references omitted), in which it was first a question of providing the victim with compensation for material harm with the help of § 829 of the BGB. But if the victim is already receiving full compensation for his material harm, as in this case, then there only remains the question of whether fairness requires him to be given compensation for pain and suffering over and above the compensation for material harm. Within the framework of § 829 of the BGB, there is only room for compensation for pain and suffering on the grounds of fairness in the case of serious injuries, in particular lasting harm. All in all, the granting of compensation for pain and suffering, considering the exceptional character of § 829 of the BGB, accordingly only comes into consideration, if, bearing in mind the fact that in traffic accidents caused without fault, compensation for pain and suffering is not forfeited as a rule, its refusal in the individual case blatantly contradicts feelings of fairness. In this respect the approach for the examination of fairness in § 829 of the BGB is a different one from that in § 847 of the BGB, to which the Senate referred in its judgment of 18 December 1979 (reference omitted).

b) The judge of fact must decide whether, under these prerequisites, awarding compensation for pain and suffering is required in the individual case on the grounds of fairness. He has to consider all the circumstances of the case in this connection. Besides the economic relationship of the parties to the accident, the intensity of the invasion of the protected legal interest can be of importance in this connection, as well as—for instance in relation to deliberate acts—the unusual character of the action giving rise to the duty to compensate for harm (references omitted).

In this respect also the remarks of the appeal court give cause for serious doubts. The appeal court compares the claimant's accident injuries, which had resulted in a lengthening of her original training "by merely half a year", with the defendant's illness established on the occasion of the accident, by which he additionally suffered long term harm and the uncertainty that the formation of cysts might be repeated in spite of the successful medical treatment. In the light of this uncertainty, the consequences of the accident, according to the view of the appeal court, did not have such weight for the claimant (who was harmed on a long term basis in relation to certain physical postures and in her hearing capacity) that, on the basis of the fate of the claimant and the defendant, compensation for non-material harm as well was irrefutably necessary.

These remarks are not free from legal errors. The burden of uncertainty about the future development of the defendant's health may admittedly be serious for him. But it cannot be regarded as equivalent to the claimant's accident injuries. The appeal court did not take into account that the impairment of the defendant's health was determined by fate and had nothing to do with the accident. The claimant's injuries were, on the other hand, caused by an objectively serious failure of the defendant in connection with the driving of his vehicle. The defendant at any rate suffered no injuries through the accident. The appeal court should have taken account of this circumstance, because there can be no doubt that, in connection with the considerations of fairness which are to be employed under § 829 of the BGB, a substantially smaller weight is due to harm to health which is not dependent on the accident than to that which is based on the accident.

c) From the above considerations, it follows that the reasoning by which the appeal court has denied a claim for a declaration cannot stand.

Case 145

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 26 JANUARY 1971 NJW 1971, 698 = VERSR 1971, 465

The plaintiff is an actress who participated in 1968 in the production of a film for sex education. In a printed sheet advertising the film her picture appeared on the back page in a close embrace with her partner. The defendant sells aphrodisiacs. In nos. 10, 11, and 23 of the 1969 issue of the periodical Stern the defendant published advertisements which contained a picture measuring 12 by 50 millimetres, the price (DM 24), and the defendant's address together with the following text:

"Paris love potion. The intimate means for men and women. A modern inducement to love. Overwhelming—seductive—irresistible. A few drops suffice for an immediate reaction".

The picture included in the advertisement consisted of a partial reproduction measuring 12 by 35 millimetres of the above-mentioned picture of the plaintiff and her partner which figured in the printed sheet advertising the film. The plaintiff did not give her consent to the reproduction of her picture for the purposes of the defendant.

The plaintiff claimed DM 8,000 as damages of non-economic loss. The court awarded the plaintiff DM 4,000 in respect of non-economic loss and rejected any further claim. The Court of Appeal of Munich rejected the claim in its entirety. The Federal Supreme Court admitted a second appeal, quashed the judgment, and referred the case back to another Senate of the Court of Appeal.

Reasons

The plaintiff does not claim compensation for economic loss which she may have suffered because as a result of the unauthorized publication of her picture she failed to receive a fee. Instead, her claim is expressly for pecuniary compensation in respect of non-economic loss. This is undisputed by the parties. The Court of Appeal, too, proceeds from this assumption.

I. 1. Contrary to the Court of First Instance, the Court of Appeal has rejected the claim simply because it refuses as a matter of fundamental legal principle to award pecuniary damages in cases of violations of the right to personality as compensation for non-economic loss. The Court of Appeal acknowledges that in so holding it acts contrary to a constant and well established practice of the Federal Supreme Court.

2. As the Federal Supreme Court, and in particular this Senate, has consistently held, a person whose right to his personality has been severely violated in a culpable manner may demand pecuniary compensation for non-economic loss if it is otherwise impossible to compensate satisfactorily for the inflicted harm. The court has felt entitled and also bound in accordance with Article 1 III of the Constitution to grant this extended remedy in order to take into account in the sphere of the protection of personality of the principles expressed in Articles 1 and 2 I of the Constitution. The Federal Supreme Court has responded repeatedly to the attacks directed against this development of the law [references]. The observations in the decision appealed against which reproduce a summary of these opinions and adopt them in the result do not constitute a reason for this Senate to discuss this problem again in detail. Its practice, which has since become well established, will be maintained [references].

Other Senates of the Federal Supreme Court have also followed the same practice in principle [references], as have a considerable number of writers [references].

3. In so holding the consideration that an imperative need must exist for granting compensation of this kind is taken into account by two restrictions.

In the first place, the victim of an attack on his right of personality is not to be awarded pecuniary damages unconditionally and in all cases. Instead certain aggravating circumstances must exist if an imperative need is to be recognised for allowing the injured party at least a limited amount of compensation for his non-economic loss by awarding him pecuniary damages. This is only the case if the injury is to be regarded as severe [references].

Further, according to the practice of this Senate the victim of a severe culpable attack upon his right of personality can only demand payment of pecuniary damages by the tortfeasor if the harm which has been inflicted cannot be compensated sufficiently by other means [references]. The grant of a right to pecuniary compensation is based in essence on the idea that otherwise the right of personality would lack sufficient legal protection. In the light of this consideration, the right to pecuniary damages is to be postponed if the injury can be compensated sufficiently by other means; according to the facts of the case the right to demand an order to desist and in particular to retract—rights which have equally been developed by the courts by way of an extension of the law some time ago—may supply an adequate and suitable measure.

In this connection the Court of Appeal is of the opinion that it is sufficient if the victim can redress his injury by means of the other “remedies” (Rechtspositionen) provided by private law, and it refers to the (prevention) injunction. This overlooks that the possibility of applying for an order to desist is directed, according to its purpose and function, against the future infliction of harm but does not affect harm which has already been caused. Moreover—and for this very reason—this possibility fails if there is no danger of repetition. The additional possibility of asking for a retraction is also not suitable in many cases of violation of the right of personality to provide sufficient compensation [reference]. This applies also when—as in the present case—a retraction cannot be considered having regard to the nature and the manner of the injury (by violation of the right to one's own likeness).

4. In the limited circumstances mentioned above, an award of pecuniary compensation for non-pecuniary damage must also be considered in principle when the violation of the right of personality consists in an infringement of the right to one's likeness, as is the case here [references].

5. For these reasons alone the decision of the Court of Appeal, which relied on the arguments set out above, cannot be upheld. Since additional facts must be considered and ascertained, this Senate cannot pronounce itself a final judgment in this matter.

II. The Court of Appeal, correctly having regard to its point of view, did not examine whether by this conduct the defendant has culpably violated the plaintiff's right of personality (§ 823 I BGB) by violating the plaintiff's right to her own likeness (§ 22 of the Act on the Copyright in Works of Art); nor did the Court of Appeal investigate whether according to the principles established by the Federal Supreme Court the existence of non-pecuniary damage suggests a claim to pecuniary damages.

1. The Court of First Instance held that the right to one's own likeness had been violated. The defendant denied this in the proceedings before the District Court but did not argue this point before the Court of Appeal. There are indications that the defendant himself now admits that the plaintiff's right of personality has been violated at least objectively. At any rate, the facts before this Senate are sufficient to permit the court below so to hold, at least initially.

(a) The court below will have to ascertain as a fact whether the plaintiff could be identified in the advertisement complained of. The circumstance that the partial reproduction was small in size does not exclude that the plaintiff's features are visible and therefore recognisable [reference]. Even if in the present case the picture was published without appending a name, the features taken from the film and reproduced on the back of the sheet advertising it, which has a wide circulation (Film Kurier), can lead to the identification of the plaintiff. It suffices for a violation of the right of personality if the person represented by the picture has reasonable grounds for believing that, having regard to the manner of the picture, he can be identified [reference]. Thus this Senate has also stated [reference] that the person affected cannot be required to prove who of the many spectators—the reproduction of a picture in a cinema was in issue—had recognized him in the weekly review of events and had gained the impression that he was a murderer.

(b) It is undisputed that the plaintiff did not consent to the reproduction of her picture for the purposes of the defendant (§ 22 of the Act on the Copyright in Works of Art). It cannot either be disputed seriously in law that the reproduction in issue here was not included by the consent given to the producer of the film. This consent did not extend to a publication which merely served to advertise a product which is not connected with the film, moreover in a manner which violated the right of personality in a particularly harmful manner, as will be shown below. For this reason alone the plaintiff has not lost her entitlement to the rights arising out of such a violation, as the defendant has argued before the Court of First Instance, quite apart from the fact that in the present case her claim for compensation in respect of non-economic loss resulting from an invasion of the right to her personality is in issue.

The publication was also not lawful without her consent (see § 23 of the Act on the Copyright in Works of Art). Even if, as the defendant argued in addition before the Court of First Instance, the plaintiff was to be counted among the personalities of contemporary history—in the meaning of § 23 I, no. 1, of the Act on the Copyright in Works of Art, which need not be decided here, the publication by the defendant is not covered by this exceptional position. The anonymous picture of the plaintiff was not reproduced in her capacity as a personality of contemporary history, as the manner of the publication shows. The publication served exclusively the business interest of the defendant and not a justifiable need of the public to receive objective pictorial information [references].

Furthermore, § 23 II of the Act on the Copyright in Works of Art would create an obstacle. Even if he is a personality of contemporary history, the person whose picture is published can decide whether he is willing to allow his picture to be used as an advertisement for goods or for commercial services.

2. By reproducing the picture of the plaintiff her right of personality was infringed. The infringement is characterized, in particular, by the fact that the defendant used the plaintiff's picture for the purpose of advertising, particularly in a denigrating manner. The publication in the form of a pictorial supplement to the advertisement for the "Paris love potion" offered by the defendant could lead to the misleading inference that for a consideration the plaintiff had given her consent to an advertisement of this kind.

3. The Court of Appeal, correctly having regard to its point of view, has also not considered and determined whether an objective infringement of the plaintiff's right of personality can be imputed to the defendant as a culpable act in the meaning of § 823 I BGB. When considering this aspect the court below will have to take into account the following:

Having regard to the previous decisions alone, the defendant, acting in accordance with the care required in mutual dealings, could not assume that he was entitled to reproduce the picture of the plaintiff without the latter's consent [reference]. The main question is, however, whether the defendant has failed in his duty of care by omitting to ascertain that the plaintiff had given her consent before he reproduced the preview of the film. Generally speaking, a person who wishes to publish a picture of another must examine of his own motion the extent of his right to reproduce. Consequently, it can be stated with some certainty that, observing the necessary care in mutual dealings, the defendant should have enquired of the printers that supplied the matrix whether the plaintiff had given her consent [reference]. This would seem to apply even more so in the present case, where a photograph of a woman is employed to advertise an aphrodisiac potion.

However, even if the court below should come to the conclusion that the plaintiff's right of personality has been infringed culpably and that therefore liability exists according to § 823 I BGB, the plaintiff is not entitled to a pecuniary compensation in respect of non-pecuniary damage as a matter of course and in all circumstances.

4. According to the practice of the Federal Supreme Court, and in particular of this Senate, as was pointed out before, the imperative need to grant the injured party at least a certain amount of compensation for non-pecuniary loss by awarding pecuniary damages is to be admitted in special aggravating circumstances. As this Senate has stated on several occasions, it must be examined in each individual case, having regard to the manifold possibilities of infringement of the right to personality, whether the injured party whose non-pecuniary loss cannot be compensated by other means is to be awarded pecuniary damages on equitable grounds. An affirmative answer can only be given if the violation is to be regarded as severe. The question as to whether it is to be treated as a severe invasion of personality as a separate protected interest can only be answered on the basis of all the facts of the individual case. For this purpose the manner and the severity of the harm inflicted and the degree of blameworthiness must be considered in particular, as well as the cause and the nature of the act. (Constant practice [references].) On this basis the results of the proceedings hitherto disclose that the following aspects may be significant for the court below in reaching a decision:

In order to assess the severity of the infringement it may be relevant that the plaintiff was associated with an advertisement for an aphrodisiac. The impression was created that against payment she allowed her person to be used for such an advertisement by means of her picture. This unfavourable impression was possibly increased by the fact that five additional advertisements by the defendant on p. 156 of Stern no. 11, where the advertisement complained of was published, make it clear to the reader that the defendant, as a mail order business also sells other sex appliances and explicit sex literature.

In this connection the contention of the plaintiff may also be relevant that she was known as a film actress and that she appears in the theatre in classical plays. The plaintiff has stated further that she had gone through an apprenticeship in classical works and that in the theatre where she had her first engagement she had played almost exclusively classical roles. In this capacity in particular she had also appeared as a guest in various theatres. The discriminatory (sic) publications had, above all, placed her guest engagements in jeopardy. Finally, the objective severity of the infringement may be gauged by the fact that the advertisement appeared in three successive issues of the magazine Stern which has a big circulation, and that therefore it became widely known.

As regards the degree of blameworthiness of the defendant—an affirmative finding in principle to this effect still remains to be made by the Court of Appeal, as was pointed out before—the Court of Appeal will have to consider whether the failure to make enquiries may not have to be regarded as negligent in the light of the special circumstances. The First Civil Senate has given an affirmative answer to this effect in [reference] and has characterised the blameworthiness of the defendant in that case as gross negligence. In this connection the statement of the plaintiff may assume additional relevance that by a letter dated 14 March 1969 written by her lawyer she had warned the defendant after the first advertisement had appeared on 9 March 1969, no. 10 of Stern.

The cause and the motive of the defendant in acting as he did were clearly egotistic commercial interest and not the satisfaction of a need deserving legal protection to provide information. It certainly does not exclude a finding that the infringement was severe in the meaning of the practice of this court.

Case 146

BUNDESVERFASSUNGSGERICHT (FIRST SENATE, FIRST CHAMBER)

8 MARCH 2000, NJW 2000, 2187 = FAMRZ 2000, 943

Facts

The original proceedings related to a road traffic accident which occurred in 1986 and in which the complainants' three children were killed. The accident was caused by the first defendant, whose vehicle was insured with the second defendant. Under the influence of alcohol, the first defendant drove on to a major road at a speed of about 100 to 110 kilometres per hour, ignoring a stop sign. He collided with a car which contained the complainants' children aged between 17 and 21. Their death had a very serious physical and psychological effect on the complainants. They claimed, amongst other things, damages for pain and suffering of between DM 120,000 and DM 150,000.

After obtaining a number of medical opinions in relation to the first complainant, the Landgericht assessed damages for pain and suffering at DM 70,000 for the first complainant, and at DM 40,000 for the second complainant. The complainants appealed against this judgment asking for an increase in the damages for pain and suffering to DM 150,000 (first complainant) and DM 120,000 (second complainant). The Oberlandesgericht rejected the appeal. An appeal in law was not accepted. In their constitutional complaint, the complainants claim violation of Article 3 para. 1 of the Basic Law, of their general right of personality under Article 2 para. 1 in combination with Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law, and of Article 6 para. 1 of the Basic Law. The constitutional complaint was unsuccessful.

Reasons

The constitutional complaint has no sufficient prospect of success . . .

1. The judgment of the OLG under challenge does not infringe the complainants' basic rights under Article 3 para. 1 of the Basic Law. The same applies for the decision of the Bundesgerichtshof confirming the judgment. The provisions of § 847 of the BGB on which the OLG has based its decision are not open to objection in constitutional law. For the very reason that it uses the vague legal concept "fair compensation", it permits differentiations which facilitate application in a manner corresponding to the equality principle . . .

a) Article 3 para. 1 of the Basic Law is violated when a group of people to whom the norm is addressed is treated differently in some substantial respect in comparison to other addressees of the norm, even though no differences exist between the two groups of such kind and weight as to justify the unequal treatment. Such a violation of the basic right is not only present when the legislator treats several groups of persons differently without a sufficient objective ground, but likewise when the courts by way of interpretation of statutory provisions make the kind of differentiation which is forbidden for the legislator . . .

b) The unequal treatment objected to by the complainants, which relates to physical harm to health as compared with violations of the right of personality, in particular within the framework of media related cases, does not infringe their basic rights under Article 3 para. 1 of the Basic Law. Here it must be assumed that the deciding senate of the OLG would, in violations which are of this kind but which involve the right of personality, if need be grant higher damages for pain and suffering than the DM 40,000 or DM 70,000 allowed here, or would consider circumstances to which in the present case no importance has been attached and which would raise the level of damages for pain and suffering. Only on this prerequisite is it possible to assume unequal treatment in the concrete area of the OLG's competence.

However, there are objectively based differences between these two types of case which could provide justification in constitutional law for the different treatment. In this respect it must first be considered that the claim to monetary compensation in the case of violations of the right of personality is not (any longer) directly based on an analogy with § 847 of the BGB (reference omitted). Instead granting monetary compensation is based on a right which originates in the protective function of Article 1 and Article 2 para. 1 of the Basic Law and finds its foundation in § 823 (1) of the BGB in combination with these provisions (references omitted). From a material point of view, granting monetary compensation rests on the idea that without such a claim, violations of the dignity and honour of a person would frequently remain without any sanction, with the consequence that legal protection of the personality would atrophy (reference omitted). (The difference from damages for pain and suffering shows itself, apart from the different legal basis, in divergent terminology). In addition, the determination of the level of compensation partly results from considerations which are different from those used for fixing damages for pain and suffering. Thus, according to the opinion of the BGH, the level of monetary compensation should genuinely inhibit ruthless marketing of the personality when a press undertaking has deliberately broken the law in using violation of the personality as a means of increasing its circulation and thus of pursuing of its own commercial interest. Here the compensation should, by its level as well, form a counterbalance to infringement of personality rights for the obtaining of profit. Admittedly this is not a genuine case of “creaming off the profit”; the attempt to obtain profit is (merely) an assessment factor in the decision about the level of monetary compensation (references omitted). Preventative considerations, which lead, in calculating monetary compensation in personality right cases, to a distinct increase in the compensation allowed, are thus decisive.

Such a consideration is not however operative in physical injury or nervous shock cases in connection with liability for road traffic accidents. Grounds can be cited for the difference in treatment. The violation of the right does not occur intentionally in typical road traffic accidents, nor is it motivated by the pursuit of commercial interests. Since the idea of intentionally obtaining profit plays no role here, the purpose of prevention is not a starting point for similar consideration as a calculation factor for the level of damages for pain and suffering. It is also not as a rule to be expected that a person potentially responsible for an accident will be induced by an appropriate increase in the damages for pain and suffering to observe the requirements of care in road traffic. Another reason why such an effect is scarcely to be expected is because compensation in the end result—in the present case as well—is not born by the tortfeasor himself but by the insurer.

Because of these objective differences, there is no objection in constitutional law from the point of view of the equality principle to the fact that the judgment of the OLG under challenge did not, in the case of the complainants, take into account preventative considerations as a calculation factor to increase the damages for pain and suffering. Whether, when, and in what form the legislator could eliminate the incongruity objected to by the complainants can remain open.

c) . . .

In constitutional law it has merely to be examined whether the damages for pain and suffering actually granted to the complainants in the sums of DM 70,000 or DM 40,000 violate the equality principle. This cannot however be established. The OLG calculated the damages for pain and suffering—not in this respect differently from the case of pure physical harm—chiefly on the basis of the injury to health which occurred according to the experts' opinions obtained at first instance, and also included in the considerations here the especially severe consequences for the complainants. Whether these consequences are, as the complainants claim, comparable with paraplegia and possibly justify the granting of higher damages for pain and suffering cannot be examined by the Federal Constitutional Court. That is a question of the application of ordinary law to the individual case, which is the obligation of the specialist courts (references omitted). It is not possible to deduce from the judgment any fundamental underestimation of the complainants' sufferings in comparison with purely physical harm, at any rate in the end result. First the OLG did not see itself as bound by the relatively low levels of damages for pain and suffering granted so far in connection with nervous shock, which were in the region of DM 3,000 to DM 10,000 at the time of the decision (reference omitted). Instead it regarded significantly higher damages for pain and suffering as appropriate in the complainants' case and expressly based this on the special situation and the severity of the pain suffered by them according to the outcome of the evidence . . .

2. The decisions under challenge also do not violate the complainants' general personality right under Article 2 para. 1 in combination with Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law. In the end result, the radiation effect of this basic right on the ordinary law in the calculation of damages for pain and suffering has been taken into account, at least in a manner which cannot be objected to in constitutional law. In this respect, the above statements have corresponding application. The supplementary argument of the complainants that there is a parallel with the decision of the BGH of 13 October 1992 (reference omitted) cannot be sustained. In this decision the BGH, in the light of the high value which the Basic Law in Articles 1 and 2 attaches to the personality and the dignity of the human being, abandoned its earlier case law granting merely symbolic compensation in cases of serious brain damage. There can however be no question here of such merely symbolic compensation; the OLG considered the actual harm to the complainants in the individual case and allowed it to influence the level of the damages for pain and suffering.

Case 147

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (FIFTH CIVIL SENATE) 22 NOVEMBER 1985
NJW 1986, 2037 = JZ 1986, 387

The following questions are submitted to the Great Senate by the Fifth Civil Senate:

1. If the owner of a thing which he uses himself, such as an owner-occupied house, is temporarily unable to use it by reason of a tortious interference with his ownership, does this represent a compensatable economic loss in the absence of any extra expenditure or lost revenue?

2. If such a loss of use is compensatable, how is it to be quantified?

Facts

The plaintiff owns a plot of land on which there is a substantial and well-appointed dwelling, with a living area of about 260 square metres. On the land sloping steeply away from the plaintiff's property the defendant was building some terraced houses. The excavations were improperly executed and the plaintiff's house was rendered temporarily unstable. The city issued an evacuation order, prohibiting occupation of the house between 12 August and 16 September 1981. Repairs to the façade and interior of the house cost DM 5851.75 and DM 340 respectively. In addition to these sums and interest, the plaintiff claimed DM 3000 as compensation for the fact that during the validity of the evacuation order she and her husband had had to live in their dormobile nearby.

The Landgericht upheld the claim for repairs of DM 5998.29, but dismissed the rest of the claim. The Oberlandesgericht dismissed the plaintiff's appeal, but allowed the defendant's appeal on the ground that the plaintiff had received "new for old" and reduced the damages to DM 3334.90. With the leave of the Oberlandesgericht the plaintiff appealed only as to the claim for DM 3000 for loss of use of the house. The Fifth Civil Senate laid the matter before the Great Senate for Civil Matters.

Reasons

II. As regards the claim in issue the court below found that between 12 August and 16 September 1981 the plaintiff and her husband were unable to occupy their house by reason of the local authority's evacuation order, and had instead lived in their dormobile which was equipped with all proper conveniences. The court held that the temporary loss of use of their dwelling, though complete, did not constitute an economic loss but only a non-economic loss incapable of compensation.

III. The Fifth Civil Senate was of the same opinion but regarded the question as one of principle and sought a decision from the Great Senate for Civil Matters as being necessary to resolve divergent views in the courts (§ 137 GVG).

IV. There is indeed a divergence of views between five of the senates of the Bundesgerichtshof on the question of damages for loss of use of chattels and realty.

1. At the outset we have decisions of the Third and Sixth Civil Senates on the temporary loss of use of a motor vehicle involved in an accident [references].

(a) Decisions of 1964 and 1966 [references] recognize that the owner of a motor vehicle, including one for private and personal use, which he is unable to use while accident damage is being repaired can claim lump-sum damages for economic loss even when he has not hired a substitute or incurred extra expenditure or lost any income (most recently BGHZ 89, 60 (63) = NJW 1984, 722).

(b) In order to stem the tide of liability numerous limitations have been introduced, as to the basis and quantum of the claim. Money damages (§ 251 BGB) are awarded only if the loss of use is "actually felt" by the victim (ibid.). No compensatable harm thus arises when a purely abstract possibility of use is frustrated (BGHZ 45, 212 (219) = NJW 1966, 1260) or when a power of disposition is affected (BGHZ 55, 146 (150) = NJW 1971, 796—the hunting rights case); the courts require an ability and an intention to use (BGH NJW 1985, 2471—military ambulance). Compensation has even been refused when the reason the owner could not have used his vehicle while under repair was that he himself had been injured (BGH NJW 1968, 1778).

Exceptions to these exceptions are made where the vehicle would have been used by members of the owner's family or even his fiancée (BGH NJW 1975, 922).

Damages for loss of use were denied in a case in which the victim could reasonably be expected to use a second car which was not needed for other purposes [references]. In other cases damages for the maintenance cost of a vehicle held in reserve have been allowed (BGHZ 32, 280 (284) = NJW 1960, 1339—tram in Bremen; BGHZ 70, 199 (201) = NJW 1978, 812—bus in Bremen; see also BGH NJW 1985, 2471).

A victim who rents a smaller car cannot add to the actual hire costs a sum representing the difference in use-value of the two vehicles (BGH NJW 1967, 552) but instead of claiming the hire for the rented car he may claim a lump sum for the loss of use of his own car (BGH NJW 1970, 1120).

If purely personal reasons prevent the owner from using his vehicle, for example where his driving licence has not been properly safeguarded, the Third Civil Senate finds no compensatable harm (BGHZ 65, 170, 173 ff. = NJW 1975, 2341), but if there is an invasion affecting the thing itself, the loss of use is in principle compensatable, and the courts find such an invasion even where there is no physical damage but use is prevented by some factual or legal obstacle (see BGHZ 85, 11 (15, 16) = NJW 1982, 2304; but note that the Fleet case there mentioned (BGHZ 55, 153 (159) = NJW 1971, 886) was a case of lost profits under § 252 BGB). The Third Civil Senate has occasionally allowed cases where the car's documents were withheld (BGHZ 40, 345 (351) = NJW 1964, 542) or a garage entry blocked (BGHZ 63, 203 (206) = NJW 1975, 347).

(c) The Bundesgerichtshof has also sought to limit the amount of the lump sum payable for loss of use. In order to avoid any element of profit, the Sixth Civil Senate deducts from the gross hire charges for a comparable substitute all the elements of cost which the commercial hirer adds to the 'true use value' (BGHZ 45, 212, 220 = NJW 1966, 1260; BGHZ 56, 214, 218 ff., 222 = NJW 1971, 1692), and makes a further deduction for the plaintiff's savings, taking the notional rental cost of a similar car as merely an "indicator" (see BGH NJW 1970, 1120). Finally it regarded as sufficient a sum "well in excess of the cost of a car not in use" (BGHZ 56, 214 (215 ff.) = NJW 1971, 1692). In the end result the daily tariff amounts to 25–30 per cent of the hire cost of a comparable vehicle. The details are given in tables prepared for the use of liability-insurers and the courts, and endorsed by the Bundesgerichtshof as legally accurate [references].

2. The Eighth Civil Senate has carried these decisions over into the area of contractual liability and extended them to cases where a debtor is in delay in delivering a car or its documents (BGHZ 88, 11 = NJW 1983, 2139, where the Court of Appeal awarded DM 21.50 per day, a total of DM 1075 for 50 days' loss of use).

3. In cases involving chattels other than motor cars the Bundesgerichtshof has not yet treated loss of use as a form of economic harm.

In BGHZ 63, 393 (= NJW 1975, 733) the purchaser of a fur coat in a claim for damages for non-performance sought DM 1700 because the coat had been unusable for four years while futile alterations were constantly being made, but the Eighth Civil Senate held that this was not economic harm. The same Senate held likewise in the caravan case (BGHZ 86, 128 (130) = NJW 1983, 444) where a camping site operator who had leased space for the caravan refused access to it for 311 days under the pretext that the rent had not been paid. Here the plaintiff claimed DM $311 \times 15 = \text{DM } 4665$.

In the motor-boat case (BGHZ 89, 60 = NJW 1984, 722) the boat was damaged in a road accident and rendered unavailable for the owner's holiday and subsequent weekends. He claimed DM 6160 as forty days' loss of use at DM 154 per day (the daily hire cost for a similar boat being DM 280), but the Sixth Civil Senate saw in the temporary loss of use only a “diminution of the individual’s pleasure” and a “non-economic harm”.

4. Divergent decisions have also been rendered in cases involving temporary loss of use or deprivation of enjoyment of real property.

(a) In the case decided by the Third Civil Senate on 11 July 1963 (NJW 1963, 2020) the plaintiff property owner had been badly affected by excessive noise and smell emanating from an official military clubhouse, but had remained in occupation and had not had to accept a lower price for the house. The Third Civil Senate did not award damages for economic harm, but awarded compensation for the reduction of the “monthly enjoyment-value of the property”. In BGHZ 91, 20 (28) = NJW 1984, 1876 the Third Civil Senate awarded “compensation for expropriatory invasion” to the owner-occupier of a dwelling affected by smells emanating from a communal distillery, and approved the quantum awarded by the trial court with reference to the probable reduction in the monthly rent hypothetically obtainable.

(b) When an owner was temporarily unable to use his house owing to malfunction of the heating due to the fault of the outgoing tenant, the Eighth Civil Senate awarded him damages for the abstract loss of use, and said that it was immaterial if the house had been used for purposes other than occupation (NJW 1967, 1803). Whether the same result would have been reached in tort was left open.

(c) The Fifth Civil Senate has twice denied the existence of economic harm in assessing damages for delay. In BGHZ 66, 277 = NJW 1976, 1630 a person for whom a dwelling was being constructed could not move into it until seven months after the due date, owing to the contractor’s fault, and had to stay in his previous smaller house during that period. The Senate denied that the loss of enjoyment, valued at a monthly rental of DM 2000, constituted economic harm. The decision was the same in BGHZ 71, 234 = NJW 1978, 1805, concerning a claim by the purchaser of an apartment yet to be constructed, where the Senate said that neither the servicing of the capital deployed during the eight month delay (for the price had been paid on time) nor the community taxes assessable during that period constituted economic loss.

(d) In the swimming-pool case (BGHZ 76, 179 = NJW 1980, 1386) the Seventh Civil Senate hesitated to adopt the view of the Fifth Civil Senate that temporary loss of the chance of using a dwelling or apartment does not constitute economic harm, but found no economic harm when a private swimming pool for a housing complex had been badly designed and was unusable for the eight months it took to put it right. By contrast in a decision on 10 October 1985 (NJW 1986, 427) the Seventh Civil Senate, applying the law relating to the contract for work and materials, held that economic harm did exist when an underground garage with six parking places to service an apartment block was unusable for twenty-two months because of inadequate corrective measures.

(e) In a tort case of blast-damage (BGHZ 75, 366 (370 ff.) = NJW 1980, 775) the Fifth Civil Senate held that there was no economic harm where the use of property had been partially obstructed rather than totally prevented. In that case the authorities had temporarily forbidden the use of a house in danger of collapse, but the owner had nevertheless established a bedroom in the cellar and had continued to occupy half of the ground floor despite the prohibition.

V. This divergence of decisions in the Bundesgerichtshof on the question of damages for loss of use is not calculated to advance legal certainty. The decisions contain no clear criterion to distinguish between economic harm and non-economic harm (§ 253 BGB) or to distinguish the different types of case; nor is it clear whether the question should be treated differently in contract and in tort. The variety and incompatibility of the reasoning offered in support of the decisions reflects itself in different tests for the quantum of recovery.

...

VI. 1. According to the decisions of the Bundesgerichtshof the question whether compensatable economic harm has occurred is to be answered with reference to the theory of difference: one compares the economic situation produced by the occurrence said to involve liability with the situation which would exist had it not occurred [references]

...

2. According to the theory of difference no economic harm exists in the present case . . .

3. There do not seem to be any plausible, let alone compelling, reasons for holding that the mere loss of the benefit of use constitutes economic harm calling for compensation . . .

[The Senate discusses invasion of 'exclusive rights' and industrial property rights.]

(bb) To recognise as compensatable the harm consisting of loss of use in these cases would conflict with the principle of the law of liability expressed in § 252 BGB. It is true that § 252 sentence 2 BGB modifies the burden of proof in cases of lost profit (BGH NJW 1983, 758) but it permits rebuttal. If the victim intended to profit from the use of the thing (such as a commercial vehicle) during the period it was out of commission he is entitled to the profit presumed by the law unless the defendant proves that that profit would not have been made even if the damage had not occurred. The money damages legally due are payable not for the abstract loss of a possibility of use but because in the particular circumstances the occurrence probably made an economic difference [references]. The loss of the possibility of use is a source of potential harm, not an economic harm in itself [references]. The law allows the defendant to show that the planned use would have been wasteful rather than profitable [references]. Otherwise the law of liability would be preferring consumption to production, and nothing in the positive law justifies such a paradoxical result. Only in certain exceptional cases does the law provide for computation of harm in abstracto in order to facilitate the disposition of certain obligational relationships, usually arising by way of contract (see § 376 II, III HGB).

(ee) In sum, the values implicit in the law afford no basis for saying that in cases of invasion of an absolute right of disposition, damage to use in the abstract should be recognized, let alone at the rate of a hypothetical rental. All the more recent cases avoid adopting such a wide principle which would indeed undermine the effort of all the Senates concerned to restrict the extension of liability for loss of use.

(b) In its decision of 11 July 1963, already cited, the Eighth Civil Senate invoked decisions of the Bundesgerichtshof relating to loss of use of motor vehicles. Even in the special area of motor accidents the reasoning is open to question, and the desirable tendency of several Senates of the Bundesgerichtshof has been not to generalize this principle but to confine it to that particular area (most hesitant, BGHZ 66, 277 (279 ff.) = NJW 1976, 1630; ‘The doctrinal basis for decisions concerning the use-potential of motor cars is insufficiently insecure to justify its extension to other areas’).

(aa) The main argument which already figures in BGHZ 45, 212 (216) = NJW 1966, 1260 was one of fairness, that it is an ‘unsatisfying result’ to allow the tortfeasor (and his liability insurer) to escape all liability for lost use simply by an unjustified refusal to meet the (temporary) claim for natural restitution in the form of provision of, or payment for the hire of, a substitute vehicle under § 249 sentences 1 and 2 respectively BGB. But this is to ignore the basic distinction drawn by the legislator: whereas the primary remedy of restitution in natura is not limited to the replacement of economic losses and provides certain other advantages, the secondary and subsidiary remedy of money damages (§§ 251, 252 BGB) expressly excludes compensation for non-economic harm. Such differences as exist between restitution in natura and compensation in money result from the structure deliberately adopted by the legislator.

A further argument of fairness has appeared since BGHZ 56, 214 (216) = NJW 1971, 1692, namely that it is unfair that the tortfeasor should benefit from the victim’s decision to forgo the convenience of a substitute vehicle. But this is inconsistent with the legislator’s decision that compensation for mere inconvenience and discomfort can be granted only in the exceptional cases of §§ 847, 1300 BGB (see now § 651 BGB). This argument loses its force where liability is strict, as in the case of the guardian of a motor vehicle under § 7 StVG, and is in any case incompatible with the attempt of the courts to grant only the cost of keeping, not using, the car rather than the full cost of a hypothetical rental: for this too confers a deplorable ‘benefit’ on the tortfeasor and his insurer.

(bb) The so-called “commercialization” idea is not convincing either (leading case: BGH NJW 1956, 1234; followed in BGHZ 40, 345 (349 ff.) = NJW 1964, 542). This holds that a pleasure or convenience, far from being uneconomic, constitutes an independent economic value if it is commonly capable of being obtained for money, that is “bought” or “commercialised”; to diminish such a pleasure is to depreciate its monetary equivalent. Writers have rightly criticised the baselessness of the premise that economic harm arises every time anything “commercialised” is affected [references]. So many pleasures today are to be had for money that this test hardly serves to distinguish economic from non-economic harm, and recent cases, rather sceptical of the ‘commercialisation’ idea, use it as subsidiary, if at all [references]. This Senate shares such reserve [references].

(cc) The prevalent view of the Bundesgerichtshof is that the only valid and decisive touchstone for discerning economic harm as regards compensation for loss of use of vehicles and other things, moveable or not, is ‘public perception’. (The Fifth Civil Senate has stood aloof (BGHZ 66, 277 (279) = NJW 1976, 1630).) The Third Civil Senate [references] and even more the Sixth Civil Senate [references] find it decisive that in the public perception today, the temporary loss of use of a vehicle is seen as economic loss because the availability of a car is apt to save time and effort even outside working hours so that the advantages thereby afforded are regarded as “money” [references].

...

As a matter of principle it must be said that “public perception” is not a source of law

...

One factual objection is that this “public perception” is not usually ascertained empirically but is simply assumed by the judges in the case. Reference to “public perception” not empirically ascertained may often be a shorthand justification for a solution prompted by the value judgements of the court [references]. This can lead to an unacceptable degree of legal uncertainty, and has actually done so on this very question. Courts that actually wanted to ascertain the relevant “public perception” would be led into an unduly and impractically wide range of related sociological questions.

(ee) In order to limit liability for loss of use several Senates of the Bundesgerichtshof have adopted the test of whether it was “actually felt”. This is inconsistent with positive law.

Thus in BGHZ 40, 345 (353) = NJW 1964, 542 the Third Civil Senate said that there were cases “in which the temporary loss of possession or potential use of a vehicle was not felt by the victim and so involved, from the economic point of view, no loss”. The Sixth Civil Senate has adopted this test (BGHZ 45, 212 (219) = NJW 1966, 1260), and both Senates have drawn consequences from it, some of which limit its scope.

These limitations may have been necessary as a matter of policy in order to contain the spread of liability in cases of motor accidents, but this is only a further indication that the original decisions on loss of use of a vehicle went too far. The requirement that an economic loss be “felt” in order to be compensatable is foreign to the law of liability. A millionaire who loses a small profit can claim compensation for that loss by the clear terms and obvious intent of § 252 BGB even if the effect of his failure to increase his wealth is imperceptible to him; at the other end, a person hopelessly burdened with debt can claim compensation for a further liability even if it does not perceptibly worsen his economic plight [references]. To limit compensation for harm to such harm as is “actually felt” runs counter to the legal principle of reparation in full [references].

(c) Finally, it is not really a question whether any standards otherwise recognised by law can be found for the evaluation in money terms of a temporary loss of use [references]. The absence of such standards indeed suggests that loss of use is not a separate economic loss [references], but not vice versa. The value of the use of a thing is not a value separate from and independent of the value of the thing itself, but is indiscernibly involved in its market value. A diminution of the value of the use of a thing usually leads to a drop in its market value, and making up the market value automatically compensates for loss of use-value [references].

As a matter of accounting there is an additional loss related to the duration of the loss of use which is not compensated if the loss is subsequently made good, namely periodic costs not related to actual use, which must be incurred if the thing is to be available for use [references]; in the case of a motor vehicle these would include the vehicle licence fee and the liability insurance premium. These are independent of the individual circumstances of the owner and, unlike purchase price where there is no price control, can be compensated without practical difficulties because they are the same for all and are easily ascertained. Nevertheless, there are serious objections to giving damages even in respect of these items.

These costs are not caused by the occurrence which leads to the loss of use [references], and in principle damages are payable only for harm caused by the occurrence which entails liability [references]. To the extent that the basic cost of keeping a vehicle in reserve in order to forestall harm is treated as compensatable [references] this is because of the close connection between preventing harm and mitigating harm (as required by § 254 BGB; see BGHZ 32, 280 (295) = NJW 1960, 1339); these decisions can also be justified on causal grounds if one regards the deployment of the reserve vehicle as an effect of the tortious occurrence [references].

...

One can get round these causal problems by concentrating not on the expenditures themselves but on their “equivalent”, namely the use of the thing so facilitated, and treating the expenditures as a measure of the monetary value of the loss of use [references]. This does not, however, get us any further forward. It is true that a rule limited to these basic costs (tax, insurance) is not open to the usual objection that a thing does not have value simply because money has been spent on procuring it, much less the value of the expenditure [references]. But it is open to the objection that contrary to the principles of the law of liability it leads to a preference for consumption over production (see above VI. 3(a), (bb)). In the case of a thing put to commercial use, such as an apartment block used for rent, these basic costs reduce the profit and so diminish the damages payable for lost profits, the only compensatable item (§ 252 BGB); thus these costs are at the risk of the owner. It would be inconsistent with this legislative apportionment of risks to make the tortfeasor pay for the “frustrated” basic costs in cases of the loss of consumer use of goods.

...

VII. Should the Great Senate decide, on whatever grounds, to hold that damages may be claimed in tort for loss of use of things used by their owner personally, such as an owner-occupied house, there will be the further problem of the quantification of such loss.

...

2. In the light of the decided cases the position of the Fifth Civil Senate is as follows:

(a) The Sixth Civil Senate is right to hold that the notional rental value of a substitute (or the reduction in rental value in cases where enjoyment is merely impaired) cannot be used directly as a standard of measurement. The enjoyment of a thing by its owner is not profit-orientated but constitutes consumption of investment in future enjoyment, so no loss of profit is involved in the temporary loss or impairment of enjoyment. Since tort law must not result in enrichment, the notional rental must be purged of all elements of profit. Accordingly the notional rental cannot, contrary to the view of the Seventh Civil Senate, be treated as the ‘decisive’ factor in the computation [references].

(b) The best approach is that of the Sixth Civil Senate, namely to do the sums “from the bottom up”, though indeed the basic costs (tax, insurance) are non-compensatable in the light of § 252 BGB, as was shown by the comparison with loss of use of commercial property (above VI. 3(a), (bb)). But the idea of “modest addition” must be rejected as unsupported by any sound doctrine, despite the attempts by Dunz to support it [references]. For Dunz the “addition” is simply “a rebuttable lump-sum for typical consequential harm” [references]. In relating this “addition” to the extra time and effort spent by the victim on the widespread assumption that “time means money” even outside working hours, Dunz is being inconsistent with positive law (above VI. 3(b), (dd)). To the extent that he has in mind extra expenses such as tram tickets and gratuities to courtesy drivers, one would have to set against them the petrol costs, maintenance costs, wear and tear and other, probably higher, expenses, involved in using one’s own vehicle. The “modest addition” is unjustified and unnecessary.

Case 148

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (GREAT SENATE) 9 JULY 1986
BGHZ 98, 212 = NJW 1987, 50 = JZ 1987, 306

The Fifth Civil Division submitted the following questions to the Great Senate:

- (1) If the owner of a thing which he uses himself, such as an owner-occupied house, is temporarily unable to use it by reason of a tortious interference with his ownership, does this represent a compensatable economic loss in the absence of any extra expenditure or lost revenue?
- (2) If such a loss of use is compensatable, how is it to be quantified?

The Great Senate gave the following answer:

The owner of property which he himself uses, such as an owner-occupied house, who is temporarily deprived of its use as a result of a tort may be able to claim damages therefore as constituting an economic loss, despite the absence of extra expense or lost revenue.

Reasons

...

III. The Great Senate is of the view that, leaving aside cases involving cars for personal use, a compensatable economic loss arises when the owner of a thing is temporarily deprived of its use by a tort if (1) his domestic economy depends on the constant availability of the thing, such as the house he occupies, and (2) he would actually have used it during the period of deprivation. With this limitation the award of damages is permitted by law and does not imperil legal certainty; indeed, it is necessary to give compensation for such deprivations in order to ensure the full and just compensation of economic losses.

1. The BGB does not define the concepts of “patrimony” or “economic harm”, but leaves it to writers and courts to flesh them out. In order to ascertain whether the plaintiff has suffered patrimonial harm, the Bundesgerichtshof generally follows the Reichsgericht in applying the “difference method”, and compares his present economic situation with what it would have been had the harmful occurrence not taken place. The Fifth Civil Division is right to say that the temporary loss of personal use is not reflected in such a computation, which apart from replacement costs discloses only the income lost if the thing would have been used to produce income or the savings made if it would have involved costs and liabilities.

(a) But the Bundesgerichtshof has come to realize that while this accounting operation is value-neutral, the courts must still determine what items are to be included in the account in the light of the protective function of tort liability and the compensatory function of damages.

In this sense the difference method, which is not actually enjoined by the law [references], takes on a normative aspect [references]. While it is true that economic loss will always reflect itself in an increase on the debit side or a decrease on the credit side, it is for the law to decide what items are to be included on the balance sheet for the purposes of compensation.

(b) Such a balance-sheet must take account of the fact that wealth is significant not just in its actuality but also in its potentiality, as enabling its owner to realise his goals in life [references], a function protected by law.

If, looking only to money, the system gave compensation only for loss of the commercial use of property, it would be ignoring the gain that comes from domestic use also, deprivation of which, though not expressed in loss of income, can comparably affect the owner's economic sphere. Thus a motor vehicle not only often represents the major item in a private person's property but is commonly the very basis of his domestic economy and lifestyle, especially if he uses it for his profession. Even more clearly, the decision to answer one's living needs by buying a home is largely based on economic considerations.

The price reflects the market's valuation of such goods precisely as domestic goods, and recognizes their temporary loss as a devaluation of them. If it puts an evident constraint on the owner's housekeeping, as when he would otherwise have used the thing, only an approach which dealt exclusively in monetary loss and gain, an approach not required by the notion of 'patrimony', would regard this as economically insignificant.

2. Nor is § 252 BGB compelling here. Where a thing is put to productive commercial use, loss of use is essentially shown by loss of profit, compensation for which is expressly provided for by § 252 sentence 1 BGB. This provision emphasises the importance attached by the legislator to loss of productive use in goods in commerce, and there is no comparable provision for the domestic use of goods.

But we cannot agree with the Fifth Civil Division that the law has set its face against damages for deprivation of domestic use of goods not resulting in any loss of income. Unlike provisions in earlier codes, § 252 BGB is principally designed to make it clear that damages extend to the whole economic loss regardless of the degree or type of fault which causes it [references]; to this extent the provision follows through the mandate of full compensation implied in § 249 BGB; § 252 sentence 2 BGB fits into this scheme, though hitherto the courts have seen it only as alleviating the burden of proof so as to let the plaintiff obtain proper compensation for harm which is often difficult to prove, an aim also furthered by § 287 ZPO [references]. Though the law is geared to productive use, it can be extended so as to embrace analogous domestic use without putting such a claimant in a better position as regards proof as feared by the Fifth Civil Division provided that damages are not given in abstracto, which the BGB permits only exceptionally (see §§ 288, 290, 849 BGB). For this purpose the courts have added the requirement, in the case of motor vehicles, that the loss of use be 'actually felt', that the victim was willing and able to use the vehicle during the period of deprivation and would actually have used it. If this limitation is carried over to other property, the victim's position as regards proof will be comparable in cases of commercial and domestic use respectively, and it will be easy enough to relate damages for loss of domestic use to the actual harm affecting the victim's estate without setting up any tariff for different types of case.

...

4. Any such extension of the law must certainly be limited to property on whose continuing availability domestic arrangements typically depend. Further extension would go beyond the need to give similar treatment to commercial and domestic property and might lead to granting compensation for non-economic harm, contrary to § 253 BGB; the law might become unpredictable and damages difficult to assess.

(a) In permitting compensation only for economic loss, § 253 seeks to limit damages to cases where objectively measurable harm occurs: when awarding damages the judge should find not on the uncontrollably subjective valuation tendered by the victim but on the valuation generally attributed to that interest by the market. The legislator also wanted to avoid any monetisation of "ideal" interests [references]. If things one uses in private life are rendered unusable, one's mode of life is inevitably affected, but compensation cannot be given for all such inconvenience without giving damages for purely personal harm, which § 253 definitively renders non-compensatable, in cases of tort at any rate. It may be different on contract cases since the parties may contract out of § 253 just as they may agree that economic interests should have less protection. But so far as goods of vital importance to general daily living are concerned, there is no risk of an undue extension of damages in the non-economic area, for not only does their use in the domestic economy clearly relate to the economic sphere [references] but their prevalence and function make it possible to measure at least their economic core by means of objective standards, eschewing subjective factors peculiar to the victim personally. To this extent, at any rate, the fact that such anfractuosités would not show up in a commercial balance sheet is not a conclusive argument against their compensatability.

...

(c) Decisions of the Bundesgerichtshof have staked out the bounds of liability for loss of use of motor vehicles, a situation where the plethora of cases makes it necessary to ignore some of the differences between individuals as regards the importance of the thing.

We need not now determine the range of property, apart from motor cars, whose temporary loss of use calls for compensation on the principles already stated. But the temporary loss of use of a home tortiously affected, as in the case in hand, can clearly constitute an economic loss.

It hardly needs saying that one's domestic economy and mode of life centre on the home and that its continuing availability for occupation is a central item in daily life and intrinsic to one's whole wealth. This very instance shows how unfair it would be to limit damages to loss of commercial use, to regard loss of domestic use not as a loss in itself but only as a source of possible loss, and to leave uncompensated the person who forbears to rent alternative accommodation: it would be an unjustifiable preference for investment in production over investment in consumption. It may be justifiable to refuse damages in cases of temporary impairment of use which the victim can reasonably temper by alternative measures he can be expected to adopt, but where the house in which the owner would have lived is rendered wholly uninhabitable even for a time, the principle that economic harm must be paid for in full requires compensation to be made.

IV. It must be for the courts to work out on a case-by-case basis methods for quantifying loss of use which are suited to the kind of property involved and the way it is treated. The only legal constraints are that quantification must satisfy the requirements of compensation, that is, apply objective standards as indicated by § 253 BGB and treat like cases alike.

It would be wrong in principle to grant damages on the basis of what it would have cost the owner to rent a substitute article for the period of deprivation. We are concerned with compensation, not reparation, and compensation is based not on the savings effected by having a thing of one's own but on the monetary value of having one's own thing to use. Nor can the owner claim what he might have charged the tortfeasor for the use of the thing. Such a method of computation may be justified in special instances of conflicting interests, but it is inconsistent with the general principles of damages law. Compensation is for the loss of domestic use, not for the loss of profit from a rental contract with a third party which the owner never dreamed of entering.

Nevertheless the rental market may provide a basis for measuring the loss once the rental charge has been carefully purged of all elements related to profit making. So, too, may the basic post-acquisition costs related to the period of loss of use (interest in capital tied up, recurrent costs of keeping the property available, depreciation). And, contrary to the view of the Fifth Civil Division there is nothing wrong in this context with adding a modest supplement to the minimum sum at which the market would put the basic costs of having a thing to use, in order to take account of the fact that the fall-out effects on a person's economy of the unavailability of such property may be very difficult to track down in detail. The mention of these possible ways of measuring the loss is not, however, intended to exclude other appropriate methods.

Case 149

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 15 OCTOBER 1991
BGHZ 115, 364 = NJW 1992, 302

Facts

The claimant claims compensation from the defendants in respect of an accident in which his car was seriously damaged.

The claimant had his car repaired by his car repair business at a cost (according to expert opinion) of DM 93,396.30. He claimed DM 5000 for depreciation in value. While his car was out of service he hired a Mercedes 300 E from the 4 August to 22 September 1988 at a cost of DM 20,495.70. The claimant also claimed DM 1680 for a further 12 days for loss of use; and DM 1508 for expert's costs and costs of towing away. (The claimant also made ancillary claims for the loss caused by the accident but unrelated to his car).

The Landgericht awarded DM 95,204.52 plus interest on the basis that the defendants were 80% liable. The Oberlandesgericht awarded DM 105,084.71 plus interest on the basis that the defendants were fully liable. To the extent that the appeal in law has been accepted, the claimant is pursuing by it his claims to compensation for vehicle damage, in so far as they were rejected, as well as for payment of vehicle hire costs and for loss of use. The Bundesgerichtshof allowed these claims for payment of DM 122,080 plus interest.

Reasons

1. The appeal court has incorrectly assessed the damage to the claimant's vehicle under § 287 (1) of the Civil Procedure Code, on the basis of the necessary expense for providing of a replacement, at only DM 75,000. The claimant can claim the repair costs of DM 93,396 plus the depreciation in value of DM 5000 to compensate for this damage, as this expense, measured against the costs of providing a replacement vehicle, satisfies the test of economic viability.

a) The victim who himself undertakes restoration of the former state of affairs after damage to an object is entitled under § 249 sentence 2 of the BGB to demand from the tortfeasor the necessary sum of money for this. The tortfeasor can only give him monetary compensation for the loss in value suffered if and in so far as restoration is not possible or is not sufficient for compensation (§ 251 (1) of the BGB) or requires disproportionate expenditure (§ 251 (1) sentence 1 of the BGB). Disproportionality in the case of possible restitution in kind thus forms the limit beyond which the victim's claim to compensation is no longer directed to restoration (restitution in kind) but only to recompense for the loss in value of his assets (monetary compensation). To this extent restitution in kind has priority over compensation.

b) It cannot admittedly be deduced from this scheme in the law relating to damage that, when someone's motor vehicle is damaged, he may always have it repaired at the tortfeasor's cost if the expenditure is anything less than the limit of disproportionality. The comparison between the costs of restitution and the mere value of the damaged object as an item in the victim's assets is certainly important, under § 251 (2) sentence 1 of the BGB, in ascertaining the ceiling up to which the tortfeasor has to relieve the victim of the costs of restoration (references omitted; see also now the new statutory regime for injured animals in § 251 (2) sentence 2 of the BGB). However to answer the question which matters for the decision in this case (which is whether the victim can have his vehicle repaired at the expense of the tortfeasor, and if so to what level of expenditure, if he can get himself a replacement vehicle of equal value at a lower cost) the issue is not, as will be explained in greater detail below, the boundary between restitution and compensation. Here also, therefore, disproportionality does not form the limit to repair expenditure in the comparison required by § 251 (2) sentence 1 of the BGB; its limit has already been drawn by the aim of restoration in § 249 sentence 1 of the BGB and the concept of necessity in § 249 sentence 2 of the BGB.

aa) The victim who takes the rectification of the harm to his motor vehicle into his own hands has as a rule two methods for this at his disposal: he can have his vehicle repaired or he can obtain a replacement vehicle (of equal value). Even the latter form of elimination of the harm is, as the Senate has repeatedly stated and to which view it continues to adhere, a form of restitution in kind (references omitted). This is because the goal of restitution is not limited to restoration of the damaged object; it consists, according to § 249 sentence 1 of the BGB, of something more comprehensive: restoring the state of affairs which, seen from a business point of view, corresponds to the situation which would have existed without the event causing the harm (references omitted).

bb) Where there are several possible types of restitution in kind leading to recompense for the harm, the victim must in principle choose the one which requires the least expenditure. The Senate has stressed this requirement of a businesslike approach on several occasions (references omitted). It finds its statutory expression in the characteristic of necessity in § 249 sentence 2 of the BGB, but arises in the end simply from the concept of harm itself. This is because the victim's loss is, even from the point of view of the interest which is at issue for the purposes of § 249 of the BGB (i.e. the preservation of his assets in their objective composition) not greater than what must be spent in order to transpose the assets in a reasonable manner into a condition which is equal in value in economic terms to the original one—taking into account the damaged component as well.

The requirement to eliminate harm in a manner which is sensible in business terms does not, it is true, require the victim to economise so as to benefit the tortfeasor or to behave in each case as if he would have to bear the harm himself (references omitted). Nevertheless, the latter point of view can be important for the question of whether the victim has kept the expenditure within sensible limits (references omitted). This is because he can only take from the tortfeasor under § 249 sentence 2 of the BGB those expenses which from the standpoint of a sensible business-minded person in the position of the victim appear appropriate and reasonable for elimination of the harm (references omitted). In examining whether the victim has kept within this framework, consideration must admittedly be given to his special situation, and thus in particular to his individual opportunities to know and act as well as the difficulties which may exist for him alone, because § 249 sentence 2 of the BGB, takes account of restitution being in the hands of the victim. This subject-related examination of the harm does not however mean that unreasonably incurred expenditure would have to be examined only from the point of view of a violation of the duty to mitigate harm under § 254 (2) of the BGB; the duty to compensate for harm exists from the outset only insofar as the expenses are kept within the framework of business prudence (references omitted).

cc) . . .

dd) In comparing repair costs with replacement costs, it admittedly has to be borne in mind that if the victim selects, in accordance with appropriate information, the method of elimination of the harm which he presumes will involve less expenditure, the tortfeasor must bear risks associated with the workshop or with the prognosis, unless exceptionally fault (in selection) in this respect can be laid at the door of the victim (references omitted).

ee) Above all it must be considered that repair of the vehicle with which the victim is familiar may as a rule satisfy his interest in preserving the state of his assets (“integrity interest”) to a greater degree than a replacement (references omitted). It is therefore in harmony with the principles of the law about damage that costs of repair which exceed the expenditure on a replacement, are, within limits, to be awarded to the victim who decides to effect a repair and demonstrably carries this out. This appears to be justified for the further reason that, even taking fully into account advantageous compensation of “new for old”, in particular with older vehicles, repair, according to its costs alone, would not as a rule stand up to a comparison with the costs of obtaining a replacement.

So far as concerns the extent of this area of tolerance, the deciding Senate has repeatedly approved judges of fact in the exercise of their discretion under § 287 (1) of the Civil Procedure Code granting an addition of 30% (references omitted). It is however disputed in the case law of the courts of first instance and in the literature how this tolerance limit is to be calculated: according to one opinion, in making the comparison, the (expected) costs of repair of the vehicle and a possible depreciation in its value are to be set against its replacement value, i.e. the full costs of obtaining a replacement (reference omitted); according to the other view the comparison is undertaken merely with the replacement expenditure, i.e. the replacement value minus the residual value of the damaged vehicle (references omitted).

The deciding Senate has not thus far needed to provide an answer to the issue in dispute, but it has now to be decided. The Senate endorses the view that in cases in which—as here—the victim actually has repairs carried out, in making the comparison with the obtaining of a replacement, the replacement value need not generally be reduced by the residual value. Admittedly it must be recognised that the requirement for business prudence will as a rule cause the victim who faces the alternatives of repair or obtaining a replacement to include the residual value of the accident vehicle in his calculations when he makes his decision. The particular financial burden is the decisive factor and this in concrete terms is principally on the one hand the costs of repair including the possible depreciation in value and on the other hand the expenditure for obtaining a replacement which appears as the difference between the replacement value and the residual value of the damaged vehicle. The consequent significance which attaches to the residual value in reducing the expenditure on replacement does not however, according to the view of the Senate, require this value to be included in the comparison as an independent item in the calculation. This is because the residual value (at any rate in so far as it can be brought into this cost comparison as the price the victim can obtain when he trades in his accident vehicle on the purchase of a replacement vehicle from a responsible used car dealer, depends on the costs of repairs. It is therefore already represented in them: the higher the repair costs are, in the case of a fixed replacement value (because this is independent of the extent of the harm), the lower is the residual value of the damaged vehicle, as a rule, and vice versa. . .

c) The Senate realises that leaving the residual value out of the cost comparison leads, if an “integrity addition” (not used up by the claimant here) is retained unaltered, to a raising of the “victim limit”, up to which the victim may have his damaged vehicle repaired at the cost of the tortfeasor. But this result appears, apart from simplifying the treatment of the damage, justified in order to give better protection to the integrity interest. This is because for vehicles with slight accident damage and high residual value (which for this very reason are particularly worth repairing) deduction of the residual damage from replacement value, which is frequently not substantially higher, often leads, in spite of an addition of 30 per cent to the difference, to the repair costs exceeding the 130 per cent boundary and the victim therefore no longer being allowed to have his vehicle repaired at the cost of the tortfeasor. This would amount to a reduction of interests which is not required by the law of damages. If on the other hand the victim’s vehicle no longer has significant residual value after an accident, then according to the view of the Senate, even repair costs of up to 130 per cent of the unreduced replacement value do not, as a rule, exceed the boundary of what can be demanded from the tortfeasor as compensation for the victim’s “integrity interest”. Besides this, it must always to be borne in mind that the “integrity limit” of 30 per cent is not a rigid limit, but a recommended value, which leads as a rule in the vast majority of cases of motor vehicle damage to a just result, but which, depending on the peculiarities of the individual case can be raised or lowered (reference omitted). In addition, it must always be considered that comparison of repair costs with the replacement value can cease to be meaningful for the victim's entitlement to repair, if the periods of non-availability of the vehicle in the cases of repair and replacement are in gross disproportion to each other. This could have the result that the costs of a hired car claimed by the victim while the repair is carried out are significantly higher than in the case of a replacement and in the comparison of the total costs of both methods of restitution, the 130% limit is exceeded on this ground to a significant extent. In cases of this kind the victim may need on grounds of economic viability to be directed to the cheaper method of obtaining redress, above all when the percentage "victim limit" has already been reached according to the basic assessment, even without the comparison of these bridging costs, because of the discrepancy with the hired car costs. But that is not the way things are here. . .

2. The statements of the appeal court on the level of the hired car costs to be refunded to the claimant are also not free from legal error.

a) As the claimant was permitted, as has been explained, to have his vehicle repaired at the cost of the defendants, the costs of hiring a replacement vehicle during the period of repair must also in principle be reimbursed to him in the light of the concept of restitution in kind (§ 249 sentence 2 of the BGB). This is because these costs were necessary to restore of a state of affairs of equal economic value to the original one. . .

Case 150

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 19 OCTOBER 1993
NJW 1993, 3321 = VERSR 1994, 64 = MDR 1994, 37

Facts

The plaintiff hires out vehicles that can be used as taxis. [In this action] he seeks compensation on the basis of an assigned right for vehicle hire costs arising from an accident that occurred on 13 December 1989 in which the taxi business proprietor L and the driver of a car insured with the defendants were involved. In this accident L's Mercedes Benz 250 D was—according to the plaintiff's assertion the only taxi used by him at the time—substantially damaged. The duty of the defendant to make good in full [the damage inflicted on the plaintiff] is, in principle, beyond dispute. The damaged vehicle was being repaired during the period 13 December 1989 until 4 January 1990. By a contract of the 14 December 1989 L hired a replacement taxi from the plaintiff in which he assigned to insurers his claim for compensation against the defendant in relation to the vehicle hire costs. Until 4 January 1990 L travelled 5,875 km with the hired taxi for business purposes. Between 14 and 31 December 1989 he thereby earned a total of DM 6,211.50. His income during the early days of January 1990 has not been supplied. The plaintiff charged L vehicle hire costs for the total hiring period in the sum of DM 13,422.19 (without VAT). In the present legal action the plaintiff at first claimed the full vehicle hire costs against the defendant.

The Landgericht rejected the claim. In the appeal proceedings the plaintiff limited its money claim to a sum of DM 11,408.86 taking into account the expenditure saved by L by the non-use of his own vehicle of an estimated 15 per cent of the vehicle hire costs.

The Court of Appeal—rejecting the remainder of the plaintiff's appeal—gave judgment against the defendant in the sum of DM 4,032.39 with interest. The plaintiff's appeal on a matter of law was successful for the following.

Reasons

1. The Court of Appeal is of the view that L's claim for compensation assigned to the plaintiff does not justify claiming from the defendant the cost of hiring the replacement taxi.

It was true that a taxi proprietor could, in principle, when his vehicle was damaged, claim for harm he suffered by asking for reimbursement of the costs of a hired replacement taxi. A claim of this kind would, however, be denied to the taxi proprietor if the boundary set by § 251 II BGB were overstepped because the expenditure were disproportionately high. This would be so if the claiming of a hired vehicle by a business-minded plaintiff, as he would have seen it at the time, were simply indefensible. That was the case here. In this respect, the vehicle hire costs (subject to deduction of his own expenditure thereby saved) were to be set against the loss of earnings, which the taxi proprietor would have suffered without the hiring of the replacement vehicle. For this expected loss of earnings, the takings actually obtained with the hired vehicle were to be taken into account. One should start with L's income between 14 and 31 December 1989 (DM 6,211.50). To this one should add the takings for the period from 1 to 4 January 1990. Because of the lack of more exact information, these could [only] be assessed from an average calculation on the basis of the months of October and November 1989 at DM 137.11 daily. Thus the gross income, resulting for the above hire period, was DM 6,759.94 altogether. Value added tax, saved overheads which could be estimated at 30 per cent of the takings for diesel vehicles, as well as expenditure which L had effected in the hiring period for assistant drivers, were to be deducted from this. There then remained a fictitious profit yield of DM 4,032.39 which was to be compared with the reckonable vehicle hire costs in the sum of DM 11,408.86. This led to a ratio of 1:2.83. The limit of disproportionate expenditure in the sense of § 251 II BGB was thereby exceeded.

The Court of Appeal was of the view that in general one should proceed on the basis of expenditure being disproportionate if the vehicle hire costs amounted to more than double the loss of earnings to avoid which the replacement vehicle was hired. By this limit, the interest of the taxi undertaking in the maintenance of its business was sufficiently taken into account. Otherwise there would be the threat of a violation of the principle that the plaintiff should not profit from the damage-causing event. To be sure, special circumstances could lead to an approval of proportionately higher vehicle hire costs. This could, for instance, happen where a taxi proprietor was particularly dependent in his business on a regular clientele and, as a result of a temporary loss of his vehicle (and the suspension of his activities), the existence of his business was seriously under threat. Such a state of affairs was, however, not present in this case. Instead, it had been foreseeable here that the hiring of the replacement taxi would be completely uneconomical. Thus L should not have done this and, instead, should have calculated his harm on the basis of his lost earnings. This was because he was, as a plaintiff, obliged to choose from amongst several possibilities leading to compensation for the harm the one that required the least expenditure. In these circumstances it was also not justified to allow the plaintiff a part (within the limits of § 251 II BGB) of the vehicle hire costs as compensation for the harm. On the other hand, the claim was not completely unfounded as the plaintiff had a claim to compensation on the basis of the fictional loss of earnings that was to be assumed to be 4032.39 DM.

II. The judgment appealed against does not stand up to legal scrutiny insofar as the remainder of the plaintiff's appeal has been rejected and the claim to compensation for the vehicle hire costs denied.

1. The appeal court proceeded correctly in law from the principles laid down in the judgment of the Senate of 4 December 1984 [references omitted] on restitution in kind on the loss of a motor vehicle used exclusively for business purposes by the hiring of a replacement vehicle:

§ 249 S.1 BGB requires the restoration of the status quo as it existed before the event causing the harm. In the case of damage causing the loss of a motor vehicle, whether this is used privately or for business, restoration is usually best achieved by the plaintiff hiring a replacement vehicle for which the defendant has to pay: (§ 249 S.2 BGB). In such cases the limit to which restitution in kind (through the hiring of a replacement vehicle) can be asked for, is determined by § 251 II BGB. According to this, monetary compensation (here allocating to the plaintiff compensation for the gain he did not obtain) will only take the place of restoration if the latter is possible only with disproportionate expenditure. In assessing whether to proceed on the basis of such disproportionality, it is important to compare the cost of hiring a replacement vehicle and the threatened loss of earnings if the hiring does not proceed. But this is only one of a number of aspects within the global consideration to be undertaken of the interests of the plaintiff in the undisturbed continuance of his business. This is because his other interests that are worthy of protection must also be considered. [This means] for instance [taking into account] his desire not to endanger the good reputation of his business, to have at his disposal a full fleet of vehicles, and not to have to place excessive demands on the capacity of the remaining vehicles etc. The boundary of § 251 II BGB is not overstepped simply because the costs for the obtaining of a hired vehicle exceed (even significantly) the loss of profit which is otherwise threatened. But it is [exceeded] if the hiring of the replacement taxi is simply indefensible from an entrepreneurial point of view for a business-minded plaintiff . . . [but] this will only exceptionally be the case.

2. The observations which led the Court of Appeal to find that in the instant case the proportionality boundary of § 251 II BGB had been overstepped do not meet these principles in the required manner.

a) A decision as to whether the prerequisites of § 251 II BGB are present is primarily a matter for assessment by the judge of fact when applying § 287 I ZPO. However, this appeal may examine whether the relevant circumstances and standards, especially all the essential calculation factors, have been considered in the required manner [references omitted].

b) This appeal unsuccessfully challenges the calculations of the Court of Appeal on expected lost profit in the case where no replacement vehicle is hired.

aa) The judge of fact is not prevented in this respect from putting the net vehicle hire costs (reduced by the expenditure which the taxi proprietor has saved) against the profit which he has in fact made by use of the hired vehicle [reference omitted]. The figures relating to the turnover here which L made with the replacement taxi in the greater part of the hiring period namely between 14 and 31 December 1989 were available to the Court of Appeal. An average turnover, applying § 287 ZPO, had to be estimated for only a few days (1 to 4 January 1990) on the basis of the turnover figures of the previous months. The Court of Appeal's method of proceeding here is not open to objection. Even a differently attempted calculation of the turnover, which proceeded on the basis of the total of 5,875 kilometres travelled with the hired vehicle and which charged a turnover of DM 1.20 for every kilometre travelled (which was, all along, regarded by the plaintiff as realistic), would still produce a total turnover which is not significantly higher. (DM 7,050 as against the sum reached by the Court of Appeal of DM 6,759.94).

bb) There are no legal objections to the fact that the Court of Appeal deducted from the gross turnover an estimated 30 per cent for value added tax and saved overheads. (This is not challenged by the appeal in law). Contrary to the appellants' view, the Court of Appeal correctly deducted from the net turnover a further sum of DM 390 as payment for assistant drivers. Payments to drivers of taxis only have to be left out of consideration if they are fixed costs independent of performance which would have had to be paid by the taxi proprietor even if he had not hired a vehicle [references omitted]. But such costs are not involved when paying assistant drivers who are not in a fixed employment relationship but are called upon for work from case to case at irregular intervals. The Court of Appeal could, on the basis of the party's submissions and without violating the law, come to the conclusion that the expenditure here for assistant drivers would not have arisen for the taxi proprietor L if he had not hired the replacement taxi and therefore had not used any assistant drivers.

c) The appeal, however, correctly objects to the standards on the basis of which the vehicle hire costs which have arisen were considered by the Court of Appeal to be disproportionate expenditure, in the sense of § 251 II BGB, by comparison with the threatened loss of profit. In particular the considerations on which the appeal court might always regard the boundary of disproportionality of the vehicle hire costs as exceeded if the latter amounted to more than double the loss of earnings give cause for serious doubts.

aa) By indicating that the taxi proprietor L was, as plaintiff, under a duty to choose from several possibilities leading to compensation the one which required the least expenditure—in this case the calculation of the loss of earnings—the Court of Appeal calls upon a principle of liability law which is not suited to the making of an assessment within the framework of § 251 II BGB. The plaintiff has to choose the most economical alternative from several possibilities of remedying harm only if they are equivalent in outcome (for instance between two alternatives which both lead to restitution in kind [references omitted]). But here it is not a question of choice between two equivalent alternatives. Instead, only the hiring of a replacement vehicle represents restitution in kind for the taxi proprietor, and he can ask for this up to the limit of disproportionate expenditure determined in § 251 II BGB. It is true that this provision also, like liability law in general, is subject to the postulate that the remedying of the damage be economical. But the legislator has, by drawing the limit of disproportionate expenditure, emphasised that restoration in kind has priority over monetary compensation and this does not have to be given up simply because monetary compensation requires a lesser expenditure for the defendant.

bb) The observation in the judgment appealed against, that exceeding of the loss of earnings by the vehicle hire costs by 100 per cent—which was barely acceptable—could only be justified if the taxi proprietor was to be allowed a special interest in the maintenance of his business and the retaining of a regular clientele, also shows that the Court of Appeal has not adequately satisfied the standards to be applied within the framework of § 251 II BGB. The taxi proprietor, suffering harm, has as a rule a claim to restitution in kind on the basis of § 249 S.1 and S.2 BGB. This in principle needs no special justification even if he requires expenditure which exceeds—if necessary, even substantially—a compensation interest of the plaintiff (consisting here of the lost profit if no step was taken to cover for the loss of the accident vehicle). On the other hand the denial of restitution under the prerequisites of § 251 II BGB according to the state of the law represents the exception, which the defendant needs to show and provide a basis for, to the rule in § 249 BGB. This rule-exception relationship has not been taken into account in an appropriate way in the considerations of the Court of Appeal.

cc) The Court of Appeal also seeks to justify the “200 per cent limit” which it considered to be correct because otherwise there is no longer any conformity with the principle that the plaintiff should not make a profit out of the damage-causing event. However, the taxi owner suffering damage, who has hired a replacement vehicle (and has to pay for this), does not gain from the event causing the harm, regardless of whether the vehicle hire expenditure is kept within the framework of the proportionality limit of § 251 II BGB or not. This is because the compensation by the defendant for the vehicle hire costs does not remain with the plaintiff, increasing his own assets; but passes to the person hiring out the replacement vehicle.

d) The argument of the Court of Appeal in favour of establishing a “boundary rule” of double the loss of earnings for the compensability of the vehicle hire costs of the taxi owner is not only legally inappropriate. Such a “boundary rule”, also favoured by the 31st German Verkehrsgerichtstag 1993 [reference omitted], is also unjustified in this case. This is because the delimitation of the exceptional case envisaged by § 251 II BGB is a matter of fact that depends on all the surrounding circumstances of each case and should not be made to turn on the existence of a general threshold, whether this is fixed by reference to double the lost profit or on any another proportion.

aa) The assessment of the disproportionality of the expenditure in the sense which is relevant here depends on a variety of factual issues which cannot be assessed by a set figure. Importance attaches to circumstances that relate to the taxi undertaking of the person suffering harm and its place in the market as well as to those which concern the accident itself and its consequences. For instance, the following points can be relevant and therefore are to be taken into overall consideration. They include: size and development of turnover of the undertaking; period of existence so far and intensity of penetration of the market; number of taxis available and used in the undertaking; degree of utilisation of the vehicles and the drivers; personnel and cost structure of the undertaking (for instance drivers in permanent employment, assistant drivers etc), composition of its clientele (regular customers, one-off journeys); structure of the market (e.g. in a large city or in a rural area); competition situation; conditions of connection to the radio centre; possibilities of co-operation with other taxi businesses; extent of and period for repair of the accident vehicle; business prospects for taxis during the repair period (“high season” because of holidays, congresses or the like).

This wealth of individual aspects which characterise the overall picture to be obtained within the framework of § 251 II BGB, forbids the determination of the exceptional case (in which there must be a deviation from the principle of restitution in kind) in a normative way from a “rule boundary”.

bb) In the face of the given price situation, the costs of a hired vehicle will as a rule exceed the predictable loss of earnings of a taxi proprietor. The hiring of a replacement taxi can however only be rated as disproportionate if it is indefensible for a business minded plaintiff and was thus from the point of view of a sensible businessman simply a question of a stupid decision. Such a judgement cannot automatically be made when the vehicle hire costs are more than 100 per cent or some other percentage in excess of a predictable loss of profit. This is because it is part of the nature of entrepreneurial organisation and the freedom to make business arrangements to put up with short term losses, even if these are considerable, for the sake of longer term advantages, at least for a foreseeable period of time. For this reason, it will seldom appear indefensible from the viewpoint of a sensible businessman to accept hire costs for several weeks that will probably substantially exceed the output to be obtained from the thing hired. This will be the case if he can thereby maintain his business undisturbed, secure the entrepreneurial “goodwill”, keep his regular clientele, remain present in the market and in the organisation of the radio centre and so on. Accordingly, the compensability of the hiring costs has been accepted in the case law of the courts of first instance even in cases in which this was distinctly more than 100% in excess of the loss of earnings [references omitted].

cc) In the “normal” case, therefore, in which a replacement taxi, the full utilisation of which is within a framework consistent with business practice, is hired for an average repair period, there will be no cause, having regard to § 251 II BGB, to deny reimbursement of vehicle hire costs which are in line with the market price. The plaintiff can only be confined to monetary compensation for the amount of his loss of earnings if consideration in business terms of the circumstances of the individual case as a whole leads to the conclusion that exceptionally the business decision to hire a replacement vehicle is no longer defensible. In this framework, besides all those interests of the plaintiff worthy of protection, comparison will have to be made between the hire costs and the probable loss of profit of the taxi undertaking and also the level of the hiring charge as such can play a significant role.

3. Bearing these principles in mind, the limit to the proportionality of the hiring expenses in the sense of § 251 II BGB cannot in the present case be regarded as yet exceeded. This is so, even though the hiring charge for the replacement taxi may lie in the upper regions of what is defensible in business terms. The Senate can make this decision finally itself as no more findings need to be made by the judge of fact which are important for the decision. The Court of Appeal has not given the legally required status to the relevant circumstances here.

a) If, as the plaintiff has claimed, the taxi proprietor L had at the time of the accident only one taxi in operation—the accident vehicle—he would have been obliged, had he not hired a substitute, to shut down his taxi business for the entire period of the repair. Thus, he would neither have been able to serve his regular clientele nor would he have been available to the radio centre for the providing of occasional journeys.

If a taxi proprietor, who has several taxis, loses one as a result of an accident he has a legitimate interest to secure the undisturbed continuance of his business by hiring a replacement vehicle so as to continue working with a complete fleet of vehicles [references omitted]. The interest of the “one-taxi proprietor” in not having temporarily to shut down his business on the loss of his single vehicle must, if anything, be rated much higher. This is because the compulsion for temporary suspension of independent vocational activity means a very severe interference for the person affected even if financial harm arising from this can be compensated for in a sufficient manner. It cannot therefore, in principle, be [an economically] indefensible practice for a taxi proprietor, in order to avoid the temporary closing of the business with all the resulting loss, to hire a replacement taxi for a foreseeable repair period, . . . even if this involves expenditure which significantly exceeds the profit expected from its use.

b) But even if L had not been a “one taxi proprietor”, but at the time of the accident used further vehicles, the expense of the hiring—which here certainly appears high—could, according to the principle for the “normal case” explained above, still not be assessed as disproportionate in the sense of § 251 II BGB. One must also note the fact that the enforced temporary interference with the business, even through the loss of only one of several taxis, would have affected the pre-Christmas, Christmas and New Year’s Eve trade. This is a period in which—according to the findings of the Court of Appeal also—the need for taxis is especially great and the opportunities for custom and earning money are especially favourable. In this period, an undisturbed maintenance of business by means of a hired replacement taxi—even accepting a higher expenditure—could appear to a sensible business minded taxi proprietor more the obvious thing to do than at any other time. The other circumstances, as they are to be deduced from the established facts of the case and the party’s submissions, give no cause to find here an exceptional case in which L would have had to give up restitution in kind.

III. The judgment of the Court of Appeal must, therefore, be quashed insofar as the appeal of the plaintiff was rejected. As further elucidation of the case is no longer needed, the plaintiff’s appeal is to be allowed according to his appeal application in accordance with § 565 III no.1 ZPO.

Case 151

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL DIVISION) 7 MAY 1996

BGHZ 132, 373 = NJW 1996, 1958 = JZ 1996, 1075

Facts

The claimant seeks compensation in respect of a road accident. His car (a BMW 318i) was damaged when the first defendant ran into it with her car on 12 February 1993. The first defendant and the second defendant (who is liable to indemnify her) are unquestionably fully liable for the claimant’s loss. After the accident, the claimant’s car was towed to a garage at T, where the claimant lived. By arrangement with the garage, the claimant hired a BMW 316i on the afternoon of the day of the accident (a Friday) from the K car hire business at a daily rate of DM 330. His damaged car was looked at by an expert on 15 February 1993. As the expert calculated that the repair costs would be considerable, and the repairs were expected to last for 10–11 working days, the claimant did not carry out the repairs, and obtained another car. Before this was authorised, he gave back the hired car on 26 February 1993. The parties are only in dispute about the car hire costs. The Landgericht only allowed the claimant DM 2,122.68 of the DM 5,926.96 charged by the K firm. The Oberlandesgericht allowed him a further 1,306.62 DM. By the appeal in law the claimant sought reimbursement of the remainder of the car hire costs of DM 2,497.66. The defendants cross-appealed against the award of DM 1,306.62 by the appeal court. The appeal in law led to the quashing of the judgment and reference back. The cross appeal in law was rejected.

Reasons

I.–II. 1. The appeal court correctly proceeds on the basis that the claimant (who—as is no longer in dispute—was allowed to hire a BMW 316i for 14 days) can demand compensation from the defendant for the hire costs which were objectively necessary under § 249 sentence 2 of the BGB as restoration expenses (references omitted). According to the constant case law of the Senate, those expenses which a sensible business-minded person would make in the position of the victim are to be regarded as necessary (references omitted). If the victim can influence the level of the costs to be spent to eliminate his loss, he must, in view of the duty to mitigate loss, choose the more economical way of rectifying the loss, within the scope of what can be reasonably expected of him (references omitted). This follows from the concept of loss and purpose of compensation for it and from the legal concept in § 254 II 1 BGB, which in the end derives from § 242 BGB. The requirement that rectification of loss shall be sensible from an economic point of view does not, however, as the Senate has already explained, call for the victim to economise for the benefit of the tortfeasor or to behave in every case as if he had to bear the loss himself (references omitted). This is because in the latter case the victim will often make sacrifices or efforts which, in his relationship with the tortfeasor, are over and above his obligations and which the tortfeasor cannot therefore demand from him. In the effort to objectify the need for restitution within the framework of sentence 2 of § 249 BGB in an economically sensible way, the basic concern in this provision must not be lost sight of, i.e. that if the tortfeasor is fully liable the victim should receive compensation for loss which is complete as possible (references omitted). Therefore, in examining whether the victim has kept the expenditure on rectifying loss within sensible limits, the loss must be considered in the context of the actual circumstances i.e. account must be taken of the special situation of the victim, especially of his individual opportunities for knowledge and influence as well as the difficulties which he may possibly have (references omitted). In this respect, the position for the victim who hires a replacement vehicle with a well known car hire undertaking on the conditions offered him there appears similar to the trading in of a vehicle damaged in an accident to a respected used car dealer (reference omitted). Just as with the latter type of rectification of loss, the victim only needs, when hiring of a replacement vehicle, to go to the market which is open to him in his situation.

2. The considerations on which the appeal court arrived at a reduction of the car hire costs claimed by the claimant here cannot be reconciled with this understanding of the content of the authority to compensate in § 249 sentence 2 BGB, even within the framework of the freer scope which the judge of fact has to measure the loss under § 287 I of the Civil Procedure Code.

a) The appeal court leaves undecided the question of whether the K firm's hire price list was shown to the claimant, as he asserts, before the hiring of the replacement vehicle. That is not a decisive issue. This is because this list indisputably included ten further well known hire firms, also active nationwide, who were all dearer than the K firm. The appeal court has not established that the prices given for those undertakings were possibly incorrect; instead that court itself explains in another context that the list would have correctly reproduced the accident replacement tariffs named in it. Even the reply to the appeal in law does not claim anything different. Accordingly, the claimant has, in hiring the replacement vehicle, kept to the lower margin of the prices demanded by respected hire firms with their accident replacement tariffs.

b) The appeal court's view that the claimant had violated the requirement of economy by the very hiring of the replacement vehicle at the accident replacement tariff cannot be followed by the Senate.

aa) The appeal court's accusation in this connection that the claimant did not obtain any comparative offers before hiring the replacement vehicle has no effect with reference to the accident replacement tariffs demanded by the vehicle hire firms, for the simple reason that the tariff of the K firm was, as has been explained, at the lower margin in the context of the accident car replacement business. If the claimant was therefore justified in hiring a vehicle according to such a tariff (which is yet to be discussed below), his possible violation of a duty to inquire has had no effect. Therefore it can remain open here whether the duty of the victim to obtain at least one or two competitive offers (which the Senate has stated to apply before the use of a hired car for a holiday journey of three weeks or longer (references omitted)) also exists in principle when—as in the present case—the replacement vehicle is expected to be needed for only one to two weeks.

bb) The decisive issue in the legal dispute is therefore whether the victim of an accident, like the claimant in this case, is allowed to hire a vehicle in accordance with the accident replacement tariff. This question, which is disputed in the case law of the courts of first instance, is in principle to be answered in the affirmative, according to the view of the Senate.

(a) According to the constant case law of the Bundesgerichtshof (and the appeal court also proceeded on the basis of this), the victim does not first need to conduct a kind of market investigation before hiring a replacement vehicle, in order to find the vehicle hire undertaking with the most favourable price (references omitted). If the tariff at which he hires a replacement vehicle is within the framework of what is usual, the costs expended are to be refunded to him by the tortfeasor; it is only when the victim can easily recognise that the undertaking chosen by him demands car hire charges which are outside what is usual that he will not be allowed to conclude a hire contract on such conditions at the cost of the tortfeasor (reference omitted).

(b) According to the claimant's argument, only the replacement tariff is offered by car hire undertakings to road traffic accident victims. The appeal court also proceeds on the basis that the claimant, if he answered the relevant question truthfully, would likewise only have been able to obtain a vehicle after an accident from some other hire firm at the accident replacement tariff (references omitted). In view of this market practice, the car hire charges demanded by the K firm were not outside what was usual in such cases.

(c) The fact that the claimant could, as is the view of the appeal court, have found car hire undertakings on appropriate inquiry which would have granted him a special tariff which was more favourable than the accident replacement tariff does not, contrary to the view of the appeal court, cause the hire price demanded by the K firm to fall outside the scope of “necessary expense” in the sense of § 249 sentence 2 BGB. This is because the claimant had no obligation to the defendant to make such a search for a more favourable special tariff (references omitted). As the appeal court explains, hire firms offer a number of other tariffs besides the accident replacement tariff, which they describe as, amongst other things, leisure, flat rate, basic, weekly, monthly, weekend, economy, credit card or special tariff. It is not generally possible to proceed on the basis that an accident victim knows of such tariffs and that he knows of their differences from the accident replacement tariff which is offered to him as suitable for his circumstances (reference omitted). The appeal court has not established that the claimant might have had such knowledge. The circumstances in which he would be expected to try to obtain another tariff if he had such knowledge can therefore remain undecided.

It also emerges from the tariff descriptions mentioned above that numerous distinctions exist between the individual conditions. The complex tariff network of car hire firms cannot, contrary to the view of the appeal court, easily be understood by a victim. The appeal court reaches a different view on the ground that the K firm’s hire price list showed that a comparison was perfectly possible. But this argument is mistaken, because that list only cites the respective accident replacement tariffs of the car hire undertakings and says nothing about the peculiarities of the other tariffs. Besides this, the accident replacement tariffs do not at all appear to be always the dearer tariffs as the appeal court thinks they are. The judgment of the Bundesgerichtshof of 5 April 1995 (reference omitted), amongst others, shows that the opposite also occurs.

(d) The claimant, sustaining an accident at midday on Friday, was allowed, according to the principles explained at the start in relation to the authority to compensate in § 249 sentence 2 BGB, to hire a replacement car on the general market accessible to him and within reach of T, the country town where he lived, at the time of the accident (and therefore specifically from a well known undertaking in the car hire sector which was active nationwide) in accordance with the tariff mentioned to him as appropriate for his purposes. He was also allowed in this connection to answer truthfully the question by the hire firm as to whether he had had an accident. If the tariff which was thereupon offered to him was within the scope of what was usual in such cases for comparable car hire suppliers, as was the case here with the accident replacement tariff of the K firm, the costs of the hire vehicle count as necessary restoration expenses in the sense of § 249 sentence 2 BGB.

(e) The question of whether up to 25 per cent higher costs are justified in the accident replacement vehicle business in comparison with the so-called free or cash business (which the appeal court denies in spite of its reference to the higher risk of non-payment in that business) has no effect on the relationships of the parties in the law on loss calculation (reference omitted). This is because even if the hire firms, by omitting to refer to a more beneficial inclusive tariff and demanding a higher accident replacement tariff, made themselves liable to compensation to their hirers for loss, as the appeal court considers, these market practices in the hiring sector cannot work to the victim’s disadvantage in the relationship between the tortfeasor and the victim (references omitted). The tortfeasor’s liability insurer may in such a case take a transfer from the victim, if he reimbursed him for the car hire costs expended as being necessary in his situation, of possible claims to compensation for loss against the hire firm in application of the legal concept in § 255 BGB (references omitted).

c) In the present case, the car hire costs must therefore be reimbursed to the claimant on the basis of the agreements made by him with the K firm, as necessary expenditure. [Details are given].

Index

- Abortion, 28, 48, 150, 156, 163–66, 183, 536, 537, 645
See also Wrongful life
- Absolute rights, 69, 148
- Accidents, 245, 253, 573, 609, 620, 630–31, 666, 705–6, 760–63, 770, 803, 811, 903
See also Wrongful life
fatal, 153, 645–49, 769, 794–95
traffic, 50, 52, 110, 119, 121, 136, 138, 143, 507–8, 535, 592, 652–53, 654–57, 668–73, 678–91, 728–29, 758–60, 773–74, 803, 822–26, 832–35, 846–47, 905–6, 932, 994–97, 1000–1004, 1008–11, 1032–36 work, at, 592, 676–78, 705–6, 725–28, 795–96, 826–27
- Accountants and auditors, 292–93, 295–97
- Act of God, 858
- Actio confessoria*, 26
- Actio negotaria*, 26
- Actio quasi negotaria*, 27
- Action for a declaration, 661
- Action directe*, 558
- Action, transmissibility of, 924
- Adequacy theory, 106, 108, 113
- Admiralty law, 844
- Adoption:
official duty, violation of, 968–72
- Adultery. See Family law
- Advertising, 417, 420, 479, 559, 930, 1004–8
- Advice, negligent, 268
- Agent's fault, negligence, 274, 556, 695–96, 757, 801, 803, 806
- Air traffic, 856–59, 861
- Allegations, careless, 432, 434
- Allgemeine Sorgfaltspflicht*, 81
- Amending the Code, 38–39
- American Law, 27, 144, 310, 409, 475, 477, 481, 592, 620, 688, 811, 854
- Animals, 24, 859
strict liability, 720–21
- Annuity, 912, 916
- Anti-compensation rule, 55
- Apportionment of liability, 40 global, 845 individual, 845 principle of, 845
- Äquivalenzinteresse*, 103, 613
- Architects, 61, 228, 239, 275–76, 280–83, 548–49, 600–601, 615–28, 770
- Arrêts d'espèce*, 236
- Artistic creation, 76
- Artistic endeavour, 399, 400, 418–19
- Assault, 763
- Association, 946
- Attorney, liability of, 58, 60
- Auskunftsvertrag*, 280
- Ausreisser*, 99
- Australian law, 925
- Austrian law, 931
- Authorities, liability of, 211, 221, 424, 661, 804, 888
- Average user, 100
- Bailee, bailment, 238
- Bankruptcy, 222, 949–53
- Banks, 265, 269, 273–75, 299, 412
direct debits, 269–73
unrecoverable credit and, 265, 273
- Barrister, liability of, 330–31
- Basic rights, 32–38
- Bedingung*, 103
- Befundsicherungspflicht*, 587–89
- Bei Gelegenheit der Verrichtung*, 697
- Belgian law, 53, 925
- Beneficiary, independent, 60
- Berufsgenossenschaften*, 726
- Berufung*, 5
- Beschuldigter*, 434
- Betriebsbezogenheit*, 212
- Bibliographical survey, 40–42
- Body and health, 45, 514, 660, 677, 836–37, 847, 917
- Boni mores*, 369, 392, 764, 889
- Bonus pater familias*, 84, 535
See also Reasonable man
- “Born alive” requirement, 150
- Boycott, 72, 392
- Breach of duties, 89
- Breach of promise, 361
- Bribery, 429–35
- Broadcasting:
radio and television, 423, 434, 483–84, 487, 493
- Building law, 61, 228, 239, 275–76, 280–83, 548–49, 600–601, 615–28, 770
- Burden of proof, 85, 88, 94, 99, 430, 435, 561, 572, 581, 594, 605, 699, 703, 731, 762, 767, 777, 779, 886
- Business. See Companies; Enterprise
- “Cable” cases, 10–11, 55, 56, 109, 203–19, 886
See also Economic loss
- Canadian law, 246, 264, 688
- Care, 84
duty of, 63, 81, 85, 97, 110, 240, 243, 277, 506, 540–55, 646, 662, 696, 752, 777, 796, 801, 805, 858 expected, 331
standard of, 84, 333, 527
- Carelessness. See Negligence
- Carriage of goods by sea, 303
- Case law. See Precedent
- Casual connection, breach of, 43
- Casus*, 84
- Catering, 579–84, 674
- Causation, 25, 43, 48, 103–15, 122, 137, 138, 148, 206, 224, 240, 269, 300, 539, 560, 561, 567, 572, 628–93, 766, 803, 826, 839, 841, 900, 1017–18
abortion, 645
accidents, 637–38, 666
accidents at work, 676–78
action for a declaration, 661 adequate, 48, 83, 106, 108, 113, 137, 146, 206, 216, 220, 629–30, 631, 635, 644, 647, 650, 655, 658, 688, 760, 806, 845, 857 authorities, liability of, 661
catering, 674
chain of, 686, 925
conditions and causes, 103–6
contributory negligence, 110
death, 645–49, 650
drunk driving, 681
fatal accidents, 645–49
fault, 25, 79, 88, 543–54, 629–30, 647, 698
foreseeability, 643–45, 655
good faith, 612, 649

- gross negligence, 675
 hospital, liability of, 661 injured party, fault of, 674 injury, physical, 628–29 justification, 657
 legal cause, 106–9
 loss of earnings, 676, 684 medical malpractice, 645, 660–65, 676–78
 motor vehicle, 678–83
 multiple sufficient, 106, 637–38, 656–57
negotiorum gestio, 659, 661
 neurotic reactions, 666, 689
 normative, theories of, 108, 138, 688
 objective hindsight, 635
 observer, “optimal”, 636, 637 omissions, 647
 overtaking, 105, 111
 pain and suffering, damages for, 657
 physical injury, 645, 651, 653, 660, 676
 predispositions, 111–12, 632, 650, 666, 687
prima facie rule, 646
 probability theory, 644, 658
 protective law, 647
 provocative behaviour, 638–43
 proximate, 113, 635
 public authorities, liability of, 651
 recklessness, 656, 689
 remoteness of damage, 647
res judicata, 661, 664
 rescuers, 110–11, 662–63
 risk, 656
 Roman law, 651
Schadensliquidation des Drittinteresses, 674 shock, 667
 social security, 651
 strict liability, 651
 traffic accidents, 652–53, 654–57, 668–73, 678–91
Treu und Glauben, 677, 679, 681
 unlawfulness, 665
 Censorship, 490, 526
 Chattels, 57, 238, 606, 816
 Child, children, 29, 45, 80, 150, 160, 370, 479–80, 536–37, 542–48, 683, 925
 culpability, 899
 foetal injuries claims. See Pre-natal injury illegitimate, 356
 maintenance payments for, 45, 370
 pre-natal injury. See Pre-natal injury rights to claim, 45, 160, 181
 Codal background to judgments, 13–14
Code Civil, 22, 23
Code Napoléon, 22
 Cohabitation:
 extra-marital, unlawful, 893
 inducement to, 357, 893
 Commercial agent, 757
 Companies:
See also enterprise structure, liability, 701
 Compensation, 24, 26, 110, 111, 151, 224, 376, 416, 420, 438, 475, 491, 548, 553, 555, 596, 601, 613, 631, 645, 755, 782, 805, 826, 829, 846, 849, 900, 915, 953, 1019–22 double, 904
 equitable, 904
 maximum and minimum, 819, 989 methods of payment, 819, 855, 865, 911–12 monetary, 45, 50, 52
 no-fault, 860
 Competition, 205, 381, 385–91
 Components, 100, 101
Conditio sine qua non, 103, 104, 105, 635
 Condition, 103
 Conflict:
 balance of interests, 383, 396, 414, 424, 429, 432
 Congenital disability 154. See also Pre-natal injury Consent, 80, 536
 abortion, to, 648
 medical treatment, to, 80, 508–20, 521–24, 527–34, 536–40, 648, 661, 679, 689, 763 risk, to, 512–19
 vaccinations, 521–24
 Consideration, doctrine of, 59, 94, 703
 Constitutionalisation of private law, 2, 27, 29, 211, 220, 392–412, 438
 American Law, 409
 artistic endeavour, 399, 400
boni mores, 392
 conflict, balance of interests, 396
 defamation, 410
 democratic principles, 396
Drittwirkung, 394
Drittwirkung der Grundrechte, 394
 film industry, 393, 410
 freedom, 394
 art, of, 399, 400
 expression, of, 394
Generalklausel, 395
gute Sitten, 395
 human rights, 411
 morality, 393
ordre public, 395
 personality right, 395, 401, 402–9 political parties, banning of, 410
 printing and publishing, 397
Verfassungsbeschwerde, 394, 395, 396, 402
 Construction law, 54
 Construction work, 766–69
 Consumer, protection of, 95, 573–74, 623
 Contamination, 239, 751–55
 Contempt of court, 479
Contra bonos mores, 43, 109, 369, 889, 890
 Contract, 10, 26, 55, 68, 87, 94, 178, 214, 228, 261, 266, 332, 513, 548, 569, 593, 604, 611, 651, 680, 702, 703–4, 791–92, 804, 811, 833 breach of, 70, 158, 161, 212, 221, 239, 328–29, 560, 563, 604, 703, 772, 793–94, 798, 801, 806, 811, 889, 891, 940 gift, of, 23 labour, of, 23
 obligations, 23, 87, 94, 95, 556, 560 pre-contractual phase and, 212, 334, 704 preliminary obligation of, 59
 privity, 62 protective effects towards third party, 213, 215, 328–29, 334, 335, 548–49, 607, 803 sale of, 23
 secondary obligation of, 59 services, of, 23, 213, 674
 third party and, 213, 334, 704–5
 tort and, 212, 793–94, 801, 810, 1013
 Contractor, 61, 227, 228, 239, 334, 548–49, 607, 803, 808
 independent, liability for, 548–49, 600–601, 696, 811, 812, 813
 subcontractor and, 60, 61, 229, 333
 Contributory negligence, 25, 88, 110, 117, 124–25, 269, 376, 605, 674–75, 682, 689, 757–58,

- 772–73, 779, 796, 818, 841, 844, 864, 905
 Copyright, 413, 425, 1006
 Cost of repair, 906
 Cost of replacement, 906
Cour de Cassation, 8
 Courts, 1
 Criminal action, 49, 434, 838, 919
Culpa, 527, 698, 1007
 in contrahendo, 560, 704, 790, 791
 in eligendo, 694
 Culpability, 49, 604
 Cumulation of actions, 69
 Customary law, 30
- Damage, 98, 416–17, 492, 557, 567, 569, 631, 654, 798, 849, 901 assessment of, 159, 416, 423, 546, 610, 845–46
 caused by the product, 93, 618
 caused to the product, 57, 93, 280, 593, 596, 618, 625, 837
 consequential, 376, 573, 612, 836
 diminished responsibility, 14, 899
 direct and indirect, 148, 190, 557
 economic loss. See Economic loss methods of calculation and payment, 911, 913–14, 915, 983–84 mitigation of, 110, 899, 906, 935
 moral, 476
 non-pecuniary, immaterial, 363, 416, 421, 436, 579, 809, 837 pain and suffering, 45, 115, 119, 122, 124, 160, 187, 421, 435, 437–38, 508, 546, 579, 631, 657, 679, 705, 763, 807, 809, 840, 893, 931, 982, 997–99, 1000–1004 “particular”, 239
 pecuniary. See Economic loss physical. See Physical injury property, to, 55, 56, 68, 93, 99, 215, 235, 240, 250, 596–628, 907, 931–41 remoteness of, 52, 64, 83, 113, 138, 611, 631, 647
 ricochet, 247, 925–30
- Damages, 27, 28, 47, 78, 110, 116, 145, 148, 162, 186, 189, 213, 224, 226, 270, 357, 370, 416–17, 438, 476, 482, 488, 544, 548, 553, 555, 569, 579, 596, 602, 613, 617, 659, 666, 767, 792, 803, 829, 837, 842, 857, 901, 905, 917, 950, 990, 1020 assessment, 981–91
 measure, 333
 quantum of, 931, 1011–22
- Dangerous activities, 87, 566, 753, 764, 781, 814, 816, 840, 856, 860–61
- Death, 645–49, 650, 818, 854–55, 864
 fatal accidents, 153, 645–49, 769, 794–95
- Debtor and creditor, 563, 703, 830–31, 888, 900, 950
 joint debtors, 900
- Debtors liability, 266, 269
- Deckungsverhältnis*, 282
- Deckungsvorsorge*, 102
- Defamation, 26, 27, 31, 382, 383, 392, 410, 438, 479, 482, 486, 534, 892
- Defaulting party, 64
- Defects, 57, 91, 98
 damage to products, causing, 596–628 design, of, 98, 99–101 goods, 91–103, 594–95 instructions, of, 101
 manufacture, of, 98, 99, 228
 manufactured goods, 91–103
 materials, 100, 552–55, 562, 568–79, 607, 617–28 premises, liability for, 87, 617
 products, 91–103, 594–95
- Defence, 80, 333, 486, 674
- Delict, 14, 22, 26, 87, 413, 597, 659, 796, 931
- Delictual protection, 70
- Democratic principles, 396
- Design, 69, 99, 376
- Development risks, 98, 102
- Deviation from duties, 697
- Dezentralisierter Entlastungsbeweis*, 700
- Dienstvertrag*, 793
- Diminished responsibility, 14, 899
- Direction and control. See Master
- Directness of interference, etc., 207, 209
- Direkter vorsatz*, 83
- Disclosure, duty of, 864, 891
- Discretion, 74, 945
- Distress, 45, 115, 119, 122, 124, 160, 187, 421, 435, 437–38, 508, 546, 579, 631, 657, 679, 705, 763, 807, 809, 840, 893, 931, 982, 997–99, 1000–1004
- Divorce. See Family relationships
- Doctor’s liability, 48, 80, 103, 145, 147, 156, 509, 513–14, 564–68, 660–65, 806
- Dolus directus, eventualis*, 84, 292, 889
- Dolus eventualis*, 84
- Dominant position, abuse of, 891
- Dommage moral*, 154
- Dommage par ricochet*, 247, 249
- Drittschadensliquidation*, 59, 64–67, 96, 214, 216, 329, 332, 553, 557
- Drittwirkung der Grundrechte*, 28, 31, 394
- Drunk driving, 681
- Dutch law, 53
- Duty, 25, 597, 664, 768
 act, to, 575, 597, 664, 905
 care, of, 63, 81, 85–115, 240, 243, 277, 506, 540–55, 646, 662, 696, 752, 777, 796, 801, 805, 858.
 See also Duty of care
 non-delegable, 812 prevent birth, to, 160 provide services, to, 926
 supervision, of, 506, 553, 618, 695, 899
- Duty of care, 85–115
 building law, 548–49
 causation:
 fault and, 543–54
 children, 542–48
 compensation, 548, 553, 555
 contract, 548
 in favour of, with protective effects towards third party, 548–49
 contractor, 548–49
 independent, liability for, 548–49
- damage:
 assessment of, 546
 damages, 544, 548, 553, 555
 defects:
 materials, 552–55
Drittschadensliquidation, 553
 duty,
 supervision, of, 553
 economic loss, 544
 compensation, and, 544
 evidence, 546
 exemption clauses, 540–42
 fault, 542–58
 landlord and tenant, 554
Nutzungs- oder Äquivalenzinteresse, 550
 pain and suffering, damages for, 546

- restitutio in integrum*, 550, 555
 risk, 551
 self-employed, 545
 tort, 544, 548, 553
- Economic circumstances of parties, 986, 987, 988
- Economic loss, 11, 43, 52–56, 57,
 58, 71, 93, 120–21, 151, 203, 212,
 214, 217, 219, 235, 244, 266, 270,
 280, 363, 417, 544, 593, 596, 601,
 618, 622, 626, 657, 703, 809,
 839, 888, 893, 907, 950, 1004, 1013, 1019, 1021
- cable cases, 203–19
 authorities, liability of, 211
 Betriebsbezogenheit, 212
 causation, 206
 adequate, 206, 216
 competition, 205
 constitutionalisation of private law, 211
 contract, 214
 breach of, 212
 pre-contractual phase
 and, 212
 protective effects towards third party, 213, 215
 services, of, 213
 third party and, 213
 tort and, 212
 damage:
 property, to, 215
 damages, 213
 directness of interference, etc., 207, 209
 Drittschadensliquidation,
 214, 216
 economic loss, 212, 217
 electricity, protection of users, 204
 enterprise,
 established and operating business, 204, 205, 208, 212 industrial and commercial, 204, 208
 foreseeability, 211, 216
 insurance, 215
 interference, 206, 216
 liability, 204, 210
 limitations on, 206
 negligence, 204, 207
 protective law, 209, 210, 212 recovery of loss, 215, 217
 remoteness, 217
 Schutzgesetz, 212
 sonstiges Recht, 207
 tort, 211
- Verkehrssicherungspflicht*, 204
- warranties, express and
 implied, 215
- compensation, and, 120–21,
 151, 544, 911, 987
- development of land,
 interference with, 230–35
- false information. See negligent statements below
- future, 911
- insurance, 53, 66, 98, 215, 258, 260, 331, 535, 694, 696, 705, 812, 835, 847, 903, 905, 990
- legal malpractice, 328–56
 Albazer principle, 346–47
 barrister, liability of, 330–31
 care:
 expected, 331
 standard of, 333
 conceptual difficulties, 339–43
 contract, 332
 breach of, 328–29
 impact, 348–56
 pre-contractual phase
 and, 334
 protective effects towards
 third party, 334, 335
 third party and, 334
 contractor, 334
 subcontractor and, 333
 contractual approach, 345–46
 damages:
 measure, 333
 defence, 333
 Drittschadensliquidation,
 329, 332
 exemption clauses, 333, 334
 experience in Germany, 343–44
 fiduciary relationship, 329
 insurance, 331
 intention, 347
 jurisdiction, 332
 lawyer's liability and mistakes, 328–56
 liability:
 insurance, 331
 limitations period, 333
 Lloyd's Names, 337
 malpractice, 332
 medical, 332
 moral blame, 336
 omission, 332
 protective effects towards
 third party, 328–29
 reliance, 337–38
 third party, 328
- tort, 332, 347–48
 transferred loss, 344–45
 unlimited claims, 348
- loss of use, 219–65
 accidents, 245, 253
 arrêts d'espèce, 236
 authorities, liability of, 221
 bailee, bailment, 238
 bankruptcy, 222
 building law, 228, 239
 Canadian law, 246, 264
 causation, 224, 240
 adequate, 220
 chattels, 238
 compensation, 224
 consequential loss, 227
 constitutionalisation of private law, 220
 contract, 228, 261
 breach of, 221, 239
 contractor, 227, 228, 239
 subcontractor and, 229
 damage:
 “particular”, 239
 property, to, 235, 240, 250
 ricochet, 247
 damages, 224, 226
 defects:
 manufacture, of, 228
 development of land,
 interference with, 230–35
 dommage par ricochet, 247, 249 duty of care, 240, 243
 economic loss, 235
 enterprise, 223
 equity, 230
 established and operating business, 220
 expropriation, 224
 foreseeability, 237, 240, 254, 256, 265
 fraudulent claim, 242
 French law, 246
 insurance, 258, 260
 factor, 258
 interests and rights, 243, 252 interference, 221, 235
 with right to business
 enterprise, 220, 224
 intuitus personae, 248, 249
 liability, 220, 225, 226
 limitations on, 228, 243, 252, 259, 265
 loss:
 consequential, 246
 transferred, 250
 loss-bearing ability, 257
 malicious intent, 255

- malpractice:
 legal, 243
 misleading statements, 255
 moral blame, 240, 257
 negligence, 219, 238, 240
 nuisance, 238
 ownership of rights, 224
 pollution, 239
 precedent, 246, 258
 premises, 224
 proximity, 256, 257
 public nuisance, 236, 239
 public policy, 240
 pure economic loss, 242
 recovery of loss, 244, 262
reiner Vermögensschaden, 242 relational economic loss, 244, 258
 remedies, 225
 representatives, 221
 risk, 227, 259
 shipping, 219, 222, 226, 238
sonstiges Recht, 225
 standard of care, 245
 strict liability, 239
 third party liability, 226
 unfair competition, 235 negligent statements, 265–328
 accountants and auditors, 292–93, 295–97
 advice, negligent, 268
 agent's fault, negligence, 274
 American Law, 310
 banks, 265, 269, 273–75, 299
 direct debits, 269–73
 unrecoverable credit and, 265, 273
 building law, 275–76
 carriage of goods by sea, 303
 causation, 269, 300 consideration, 301
 contract, 266, 305–6
 contributory negligence, 269
 damage caused to the product, 280
 damages, 270
 debtors liability, 266, 269
dolus directus, eventualis, 292
 duty:
 care, of, 277
 economic loss, 266, 270, 280
 expert opinion, 275, 278
 “floodgates” argument, 266
 foreseeability, 298–99
 forwarding agents, 289–91
 good faith, 272, 277
 heirs, 295
 intention, 292
 lawyer's liability and mistakes, 280
 liability, 292
locus standi, 277
 misstatements, 266, 274
 premises, 275–76
 protective law, 271, 296
 receivership, 283–88
 risk, 279
Schutzgesetz, 296
 special relationships, 299
 third party, 277, 301–5, 319–20
 United States, 310–19
Wohl und Wehe, 293
 pure, 242, 886, 911
 remoteness of, 86, 113
 Education:
 official duty, violation of,
 977–81
 EEC Directive on Product
 Liability, 99, 101, 102, 582
Ehestörer, 70
Eigentum, 617
 Electricity, protection of users,
 204 Elimination, method, theory of, 104 Emotional harm. See Pain and suffering
 Employee, 583, 693–94, 761, 769 agent, responsibility of, 753, 756 contractor, independent. See
 contractor liability for acts of, 788–89 liability to employer, 583, 618, 695, 769
 superintendent, 826
 Employer, 706, 853 duty of care for selection and supervision, 624, 694, 700, 753, 766, 768, 769, 773–75, 778, 810, 813, 826–27
 entrepreneur, 853
 exculpatory proof, 769
 liability of, 695, 771, 779, 790, 794–95, 797, 801–2, 810, 811, 812, 826–27, 910
 right of indemnity, 910 Employment, in the course of, 696, 891
En ventre sa Mère, 145
 Energy, 854, 855–56
 Enforcement of claim, 989
 English law, 53, 112, 476, 812, 890, 925
 Enterprise, 223, 853
See also companies
 established and operating business, 70, 71–73, 82, 204,
 205, 208, 212, 220, 372–92, 525, 753
 industrial and commercial, 204, 208, 774, 950
 Entrepreneur. See Employer
Entwicklungsfehler, 102
 Environmental factor, 859–60
 Environmental liability, 738–51, 862–68
 administrative penalties, 867 annuity, compensation by, 865 bodily injury, liability for, 865
 contamination, 239, 751–55
 contributory negligence, 864
 criminal penalties, 867
 death, liability for, 864–65
 delict, 739–40
 disclosure, 745–46, 863–64
 Environmental Liability Act, 741–43, 862–68
 causation, 744–45
 environmental impact, 744 facility, 743
 mandatory insurance, 746
 exclusion of liability, 862 executive orders, 866–67 facility liability, 862
 genetically modified products, 747 limitation of liability, 862
 mandatory insurance, 746
 maximum limits of liability, 865 non-operating facilities, liability for, 862
 police power to prevent pollution, 739
 pre-1991 position, 738–39
 presumption of causation, 863 restorations measures, 865
 water resources, 740–41
 Equitable discretion, 981–91
 Equity, 92, 230, 929, 986–87
Erfolgeinstandshaftung, 576
Erfolgsunrecht, 80
 Established and operating business:
 boycott, 392
 compensation, 376
 competition, 381, 385–91
 conflict, balance of interests, 383
 damage:
 consequential, 376
 defamation, 382, 383, 392
 design, 376

- fact:
 questions of, 373
 freedom,
 expression, of, 392
 good faith, 392
 industrial and intellectual property, 375–76
 injury, 374
 interference, 374
 unintentional, 374
 justification, 383
 misleading statements, 379
 morality, 380
 negligence:
 contributory, 376
 gross, 378–79
 “other rights”, 375
 patents, 376
 printing and publishing, 378–79, 381
 unfair competition, 375
 unlawfulness, 375, 377, 381
 Estate, claims of, by, 151
 Evidence, 98, 432–33, 546, 562,
 572, 579, 646, 807
Ex gratia payment, 910
 Excuse, recognised, 79
 Exemption clauses, 333, 334,
 540–42, 596, 599
 Expectation, 97, 607
 Expert liability, 63
 Expert opinion, 275, 278
Expertenhaftung, 63
 Expropriation, 224
 Extra-hazardous activity, 860
 Extraordinary expenses, 191

Fabrikationsfehler, 99 Facility. See Enterprise
 Fact, 9
 questions of, 373
 untrue statement of. See
 Economic loss
Fahrlässigkeit, 83, 843 grobe, 83
leichte, 83
 Failure to perform, 604
 Fair compensation. See
 Compensation
 False imprisonment, 49
 Family relationships, 29, 30, 70, 362, 365, 368, 370, 537
boni mores, 369
 breach of promise, 361
 child, children, 370
 illegitimate, 356
 maintenance payments for, 370
 cohabitation:
 inducement to, 357
 conjugal misconduct, rights and duties of married person, 29, 359
contra bonos mores, 369
 damages, 357, 363, 370
 economic loss, 363
 illegitimate children, 360, 370
 intention, 369
ius cogens, 365
 liability, 364
 loss, 371
 maintenance, 370, 371
 misleading statements, deliberate, 370
 misstatements, 370
 mistress, 371
 morality, 359
 New Zealand law, 372
 personality rights, 363, 368
Pflichtteilsberechtigter, 358
räumlich-gegenständlicher Bereich der Ehe, 371
 satisfaction, 363
 tort, 360, 363, 371
 Fatal accidents, 153, 645–49, 769,
 794–95
 Fault, 27, 43, 50, 83, 106, 111, 505–40, 542–58, 606–9, 617,
 647, 674, 698, 857, 886, 905
See also Unlawfulness and
 fault
 contributory fault, 111, 736, 737, 842–43, 854, 905, 906 fault based liability, 24, 79, 579
 food poisoning, 579–84
 injured party, of, 110, 111, 674 presumption of, 563, 863 serious, 930
Faute, 25, 846
Faute de la victime, 25
Faute inexcusable, 847
Fernwirkung, 122
 Fiancé, 928
 Fictitious costs:
 claims for, 994–97
 Fiduciary relationship, 329
 Film industry, 393, 410
 Finished product, 101
Fiscus, 990
 “Floodgates” argument, 139, 143,
 266
 Foetus. See Pre-natal injuries
 Food poisoning, 579–84
Force majeure, 716
 Forseeability, 83, 113, 137, 139, 147, 189, 211, 216, 237, 240, 254, 256,
 265, 298–99, 425, 568, 574, 614,
 627, 631, 643–45, 655, 687,
 688–89, 837, 840, 858
Forum delicti commissi, 332, 820, 856
 Fraud, 536, 889, 891
 Fraudulent claim, 143, 242, 891
 Freedom, 49, 394
 art, of, 399, 400, 418–19
 association, 946–49
 business, to do, 944, 946–49 commerce, of, 945
 expression, of, 72, 392, 394, 422, 423, 474, 479, 526, 892 faith, creed, and religion of, 49 information, of, 423, 425, 433, 489–90
 movement, of, 49
 occupation, profession, 944 speech, of, 49
 unlawful deprivation of,
 964–68
 French law, 22–25, 53, 110, 246,
 697, 703, 811, 812, 847, 859, 890,
 912, 925
 Funeral expenses, 121, 153, 928
 Future earnings, loss of, 136
 Future payments, 991

Gefährdungshaftung, 857
Gefahrverlagerung, 64
Gemeines Recht, 76
 General clauses, 71
 General conditions of trade, 61,
 599, 603
 standard conditions, 570, 596, 602
Generalklausel, 28, 395
 Genetically modified products,
 747 Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag, 23
Gesellschaft desbürgerlichen
Rechts, 772
Gesetzlicher Vertreter, 776
 Good faith, 10, 62, 272, 277, 392,
 505, 612, 649, 704–5, 908
 Good Samaritans, 90
 Greek law, 25, 925
 Gross negligence, 783–88
Grundgesetz, 28
Grundrecht, 28
Grundsätzliche Bedeutung, 7
 Guarantees, 61, 215, 569, 593, 596, 602, 608, 612, 620, 623, 627
 Guardianship:
 official duty, violation of,
 972–77
Gute Sitten, 395

Haftungsausfüllende Kausalität, 106
Haftungsbergründende Kausalität, 106

- Handlungsunrecht*, 81 Harm. See Damage
 Harmful effects, 102
 Health, 111, 115, 120, 123, 145, 148, 157, 195, 515, 660, 804, 837
 Heirs, 295, 924, 928
Herrschende Meinung, 9 Highways,
 maintenance, 815
 protective care, duty of, 956–59
Hinwegdenken, 104
 History of judgments, 12
 HIV/AIDS, 46
Höhere Gewalt, 735, 858
 Holidays: claim for spoil, 991–94
 Honour. See Personality rights
 Hospital, liability of, 147, 508, 512, 661, 702, 763–66, 771, 793–95, 805–10
 Human error, 561
 Human rights, 411
 basic rights, 32–38

 Illegitimate children, 29, 360, 370
 Immoral crime, 919
 Impossibility of performance, 94
 Incidental danger, 857
 Indemnity, 991
 Independent contractor, 548–49, 600–601, 696, 811, 812, 813
 Indirect possession, 51
 Individual foresight, 107
 Industrial accidents, 592, 676–78, 705–6, 725–28, 795–96, 826–27
 Industrial or commercial enterprise. See Enterprise
 Industrial and intellectual property, 375–76, 1014–15
 Information, false. See Economic loss Inherent risks and dangers. See Risk Inheritance, right of, 48
 Injunction, 475, 477, 497
 Injury, 26, 45, 55, 181, 189, 374, 419, 422 physical, 45, 55, 68, 115, 422, 519, 592, 626, 645, 651, 653, 660, 676, 680, 765, 806, 818, 855, 865, 901, 907–12, 915–25 pre-natal, 48, 144–56
 Insolvency, 950
 Instructions to consumer, 101
Instruktionsfehler, 101
 Insult, 76
 Insurance, 53, 66, 98, 215, 258, 260, 331, 535, 694, 696, 705, 812, 835, 847, 903, 905, 990
 factor, 258, 535, 626, 903 importance to case, 11
Intefritätsinteresse, 607
 Intention, 43, 79, 292, 347, 369, 782, 889, 985–86
 Interests and rights, 76, 243, 252, 423, 432
 Interference, 81, 206, 216, 221, 235, 374, 525, 538, 612–15, 752, 930, 1019–22 intentional, 81, 187
 with right to business enterprise, 206, 220, 224, 525
 unintentional, 81, 374
 Interpretation, limits to, 825, 889
 Intimidation, 889
Intuitus personae, 248, 249
 Israeli law, 59
Iure gestionis, imperii, 760, 893
Ius cogens, 365

 Joint and several liability, 830, 843, 856, 900
 Judge-made law, 11, 30, 71, 889
 Jurisdiction, 332, 820, 856
 Jury, juries, 143, 901
 Justification, 383, 657

Konstruktionsfehler, 99, 607
Kraft Gesetzes unterhaltspflichtig, 45
Kunsturheberggesetz, 76, 416

 Labour law, 23, 705–9
 Laches, 819
 Landlord and tenant, 87, 519, 554, 777, 793, 801, 803, 888
 Landowner's liability, 814
 Lawyer's liability and mistakes, 280, 328–56, 947
 See also Economic loss;
 Malpractice, legal Legal advisors, 947
 Legal education, 12–13
 Legal entities, 701, 767, 948
 Legal personality, 162
Leistungsnahe, 95, 795
 Lesse, lessor, rights of, 51
 Lessee and lessor, rights of, 23
Lex Aquila, 55
 Liability, 24, 43, 57, 68, 86, 162, 204, 210, 220, 225, 226, 292, 364, 487, 602, 842
 absolute, 860
 civil, 43, 556, 885
 exclusion of, 570, 600, 862
 insurance, 102, 331, 835, 847, 1015
 joint and several, 830, 843, 856, 900
 limitations on, 97, 206, 228, 243, 252, 259, 265, 644, 651, 652, 659, 855, 861, 865, 1017, 1019
 limitations period, 333 potential, 59, 97, 140, 704
 product, 589–92
 several, 820, 830, 845
 state, of the, 898
 strict. See Strict liability
 tortious, 62, 109, 162, 837, 888, 890
 without fault 24, 559, 698, 846, 861
 See also Strict liability
 Libel, 495
 Liberty, 26, 49, 418
 Licensing, 947, 948
 Life, value of, 44, 921, 986
 Limitation clauses, 333, 334, 540–42, 596, 599
 Literary works, 76
Locus standi, 277
 Loss, 110, 371, 653, 904
 additional, 1018
 amenities, of, 921 calculation, of, 904, 910
 consequential, 227, 246
 earnings, of, 52, 653, 667, 676, 684, 807, 835, 836, 907, 910
 expenses, of, 119
 future, 911
 mitigation of, 110, 687, 841, 899, 906
 non-pecuniary, 907, 989 pecuniary, 907, 930 primary, 907, 931
 recovery, 67, 119, 142, 188, 215, 217, 244, 262, 685, 904, 1005 revenue, of, 1019, 1021–22
 services, of, 925
 support, of, 925
 transferred, 66, 68, 96, 250
 use, of, 57, 219, 614, 939, 1011–19
 value, of, 614–15, 939
 Loss-bearing ability, 257
 Loss-sharing agreements, 728

 Maintenance, 157, 162, 182, 192, 370, 371, 928
 Malice, 282
 Malicious falsehood, 495, 496–97, 498, 892
 Malicious intent, 255
 Malicious prosecution, 889, 892
 Malpractice, 332
 legal, 58, 243, 299, 328–56, 888
 medical, 332, 535–36, 564–68, 576, 592, 645, 649, 660–65,

- 676–78, 763–66, 770–71, 795, 861
Mangelfolgeschäden, 603
 Manufacturer's liability, 91, 97, 98, 559, 562, 564–71, 608–9, 610, 754
 Marriage. See Family relationships
 Master, 505, 759, 801, 810–11, 813 defective organisation of the enterprise, 702
 exculpatory proof, 700
 Material harm, 117
 Material security, 569
 Meddling, 128–30, 662–63
 Media: freedom of expression, 72, 392, 394, 422, 423, 474, 479, 526, 892
 printing and publishing, 378–79, 381, 397, 414, 420–23, 429, 436, 487–88, 493–99, 525, 1006–7
 radio and television, 423, 434, 483–84, 487, 493
 Medical expenses, 52, 188, 189, 807, 907
 Medical law, 48, 80, 103, 145, 147, 156, 509, 513–14, 564–68, 660–65, 806 Medical preparations, 102 duty to inform, 156
 Medical treatment:
 consent, 80, 508–20, 521–24, 527–34, 536–40, 648, 661, 679, 689, 763
 Mental distress, 122, 509, 631, 915
 See also Pain and suffering;
 Shock
 Mentally disordered persons:
 detention of, 964–68
 Middleman, 569
Minderung, 602
 Minors, 80
 See also Child, children
 Misleading statements, 255, 266, 274, 279, 295, 379, 437, 635, 702, 890
 deliberate, 370
 economic loss. See Economic loss negligent, 274, 280, 295, 892
 Misstatements 57, 68, 71, 255, 266, 274, 370, 890, 892.
 See also Economic loss
 Mistress, 371, 928
Mittäter, 843
Mittelbare
 Schädigungshandlungen, 82
 Monopolies, abuse of, 892
 Moral blame, 240, 336, 679, 799, 984, 1008
 Morality, 257, 359, 380, 393, 414, 525, 890
 Motor vehicle, 678–83, 817–22
 assessment of damage to, 1022–32
 liability, 657–58, 683, 758–60, 817–22, 832–39, 840 operation, 657, 682, 823, 832–35, 836, 839
 traffic accidents, 50, 52, 110, 119, 121, 136, 138, 143, 507–8, 535, 592, 652–53, 654–57, 668–73, 678–91, 728–29, 758–60, 773–74, 803, 822–26, 832–35, 846–47, 905–6, 932, 994–97, 1000–1004, 1008–11, 1032–36
 Movables, 93
 Multiple causes, 105

Nasciturus, 47, 48
Nebentäterschaft, 843
 Necessity, 80, 536
 Negligence, 11, 43, 58, 79, 84, 101, 204, 207, 219, 238, 240, 507, 592, 594, 625, 697, 782, 813, 889 contributory, 25, 88, 110, 117, 124–25, 269, 376, 605, 674–75, 682, 689, 757–58, 772–73, 779, 796, 818, 841, 844, 864, 905
 gross, 378–79, 675, 800
 Negligent misstatements, 57, 68, 266, 891
 See also Economic loss
Negligentia, 84
Negotiorum gestio, 23, 660, 661, 780
 Nervous shock, 115–56
 absolute rights, 148
 American Law, 144
 causation, 122, 137, 138
 adequate, 137
 normative, theories of, 138
 contributory negligence, 117 control mechanisms, 128
 damages, 116, 118
 distant, 122
 economic loss, 120–21
 compensation, and, 120–21
 father as plaintiff, 130
 Fernwirkung, 122
 “floodgates” argument, 139, 143
 foreseeability, 137, 139
 fraudulent claim, 143
 funeral expenses, 121
 future earnings, loss of, 136
 health, 115, 120, 123
 hospital, liability of, 147
 jury, juries, 143
 loss:
 expenses, of, 119
 material harm, 117
 medical law, 147
 mental distress, 122
 Normzweck, 143
 pain and suffering, damages for, 115, 119, 122
 physical injury, 115
 policy, role of, 127–28 potential liability, 140 primary and secondary victims, 125–26, 127, 128, 141
 proximity, 142
 recovery of loss, 119, 142
 remoteness of damage, 138
 rescuers, 128–30
 Schmerzensgeld, 117
 self-inflicted injuries, 130–35
 traffic accidents, 119, 121, 136, 138, 143
 Vertrag mit Schutzwirkung für Dritte, 143
 vexatious claim, 143
 victim, primary, 118
 wrongful death, 123, 142
 Zurechnungszusammenhang, 121
 Neurotic reactions, 631, 666, 689
 New Zealand law, 372
 Nominate torts, 109
 Non-liability rule, 53, 55
 Non-performance of contract, 70, 158, 161, 212, 221, 239, 328–29, 560, 563, 604, 703, 772, 793–94, 798, 801, 806, 811, 889, 891, 940
 Non-physical damage 363, 416, 421, 436, 579, 809, 837.
 See also Economic loss
 Norm, protective, 209, 210, 212, 271, 296, 508, 561, 618, 647, 832, 885, 886, 946, 950, 953
Normzweck, 143
 Notary, liability of, 58
 Notice, duty to give, 819
Notstand, 540
Notwehr, 540
 Nuisance, 26, 238, 478, 890, 892
Nutzungs- oder Äquivalenzinteresse, 550

Obhutspflicht, 557
 Objective hindsight, 107, 635
Objektive Wertordnung, 28
Objektiver

- Zurechnungszusammenhang*, 576
- Obligation, 23, 25, 847
See also Duty of care
 contractual, 23, 87, 94, 95, 556, 560
- “Obscurity” rule, 599
- Observer, “optimal”, 107, 108, 636
- Occupier, 87, 88, 892
- Offer and acceptance, 24
- Official’s duty, 616, 628, 804, 892
 liability of official, 616, 628, 662, 804, 892
- Omission, 86, 332, 647, 693, 754
- Onus of proof, 85, 88, 94, 99, 430, 435, 561, 572, 581, 594, 605, 699, 703, 731, 762, 767, 777, 779, 886
- Operation, consent to undergo, 80, 508–20, 521–24, 527–34, 536–40, 648, 661, 679, 689, 763
- Operators, 864, 944
- Ordre public*, 395, 890
- “Other rights”, 375
- “Overtaking cause”, 106, 111
- Owner: rights of, 1019
- Ownership, 49–51, 1019
 transferred, 598
- Pain and suffering, damages for, 45, 115, 119, 122, 124, 160, 187, 421, 435, 437–38, 508, 546, 579, 631, 657, 679, 705, 763, 807, 809, 840, 893, 931, 982, 997–99, 1000–1004
- Pandecists, 25, 694
- Participation in tort, 900
- Partnership, 772–73
- Passing off, 478, 495, 497, 889, 892
- Patents, 69, 376
- Patients:
 medical law, 48, 80, 103, 145, 147, 156, 509, 513–14, 564–68, 660–65, 806 operation, consent to undergo, 80, 508–20, 521–24, 527–34, 536–40, 648, 661, 679, 689, 763
- Patrimonial harm, 1019
- Patrimony, 1019
- Pecuniary damage. See Economic loss
- Penalties:
 administrative, 867
 criminal, 867, 984
- Period of limitation, 570, 600, 603, 703, 796, 819, 855, 865
- Periodic payments, 1022
- Personal injury, 45, 55, 68, 115, 422, 519, 592, 626, 645, 651, 653, 660, 676, 680, 765, 806, 818, 855, 865, 901, 907–12, 915–25
- Personal integrity, 161, 162
- Personality rights, 70, 74, 363, 368, 395, 401, 402–9, 412–505, 526, 930, 1005, 1007
- Personenrechtliches Fürsorgeverhältnis*, 95
- Pflichtteilsberechtigter*, 358
- Pharmaceuticals, 102
- Physical harm and integrity, 45, 148, 500
- Police:
 failure to act, 953–56
- Policy, 11
See also judge-made law;
 liability, extension of
- Political parties, banning of, 410
- Pollution, 239
 water, 751–55
- Pornography, 524–27
- Positive Vertragsverletzung*, 560, 563, 599, 796
- Possession, 51
- Post and telecommunications, 760
- Pre-natal injury, 144–56
 abortion, 150
 accidents:
 fatal, 153
 “born alive” requirement, 150
 causation, 148
 adequate, 146
 child’s, 150
 compensation, 151
 congenital disability, 154
 damage:
 direct and indirect, 148
 damages, 145, 148
dommage moral, 154
 economic loss, 151
 compensation, and, 151
en ventre sa Mère, 145
 estate, claims of, by, 151
 foreseeability, 147
 funeral expenses, 153
 health, 145, 148
 medical law, 145
 physical harm and integrity, 148
 stillbirths, 150
 tort, 145
 unborn child, 149
 wrongful death, 150, 151
- Precedent, 7, 246, 258, 621
- Predispositions:
 causation, 111–12, 632, 650, 666, 687
- Pregnancy. See Abortion;
 Unwanted pregnancies;
 Wrongful life
- Premises, 87, 224, 275–76, 794, 803
- Press:
 freedom, 72, 392, 394, 422, 423, 474, 479, 526, 892
- Press Complaints Commission, 501–5
- Press Complaints Tribunal, 502
- Presumption of fault, guilt, 563, 863
- Presumption of innocence, 434
- Prima facie* rule, 98
- Primary obligation, 59
- Primum nil nocere*, 566–67
- Printing and publishing, 378–79, 381, 397, 414, 420–23, 429, 436, 487–88, 493–99, 525, 1006–7
- Privacy, 26, 31, 70, 74, 75–78, 82, 435, 438, 481–84, 492, 495, 498, 930
 advertising, 417, 420, 479
 allegations, careless, 432, 434
 American Law, 475, 477, 481
 artistic endeavour, 418–19
 authorities, liability of, 424
Beschuldigter, 434
 bribery, 429–35
 censorship, 490
 children, 479–80
 compensation, 416, 420, 438, 475, 491
 conflict, balance of interests, 414, 424, 429, 432
 constitutionalisation of private law, 438
 contempt of court, 479
 copyright, 413, 425
 criminal action, 434
 damage, 416–17, 492
 assessment of, 416, 423
 moral, 476
 non-pecuniary, immaterial, 416, 421, 436
 damages, 416–17, 438, 476, 482, 488
 defamation, 438, 479, 482, 486
 defence, 486
 delict, 413
 divorce proceedings, 469–72
 economic loss, 417
 English law, 476
 evidence, 432–33
 foreseeability, 425
 freedom:
 art, of, 418–19
 expression, of, 422, 423, 474, 479

- information, of, 423, 425, 433, 489–90
- injunction, 475, 477, 497
- injury, 419, 422
 - physical, 422
- interests and rights, 423, 432
- Kunsturhebergesetz*, 416
- liability, 487
- libel, 495
- liberty, 418
- malicious falsehood, 495, 496–97, 498
- misleading statements, 437
- morality, 414
- nuisance, 478
- pain and suffering, damages for, 421, 435, 437
- parazzi photographs, 444–49, 450–62
- passing off, 478, 495, 497
- personality:
 - rights to ones image, likeness, 415, 425, 430
- personality rights, 412–505
- physical harm and integrity, 500
- politicians, 438–43
- Press Complaints Commission, 501–5
- Press Complaints Tribunal, 502
- presumption of innocence, 434
- printing and publishing, 414, 420–23, 429, 436, 487–88, 493–99
- privacy, 438, 498
- proof, 432–33
 - burden of, 430, 435
- public authorities, liability of, 424
- “public domain”, 430
- public interest, 423, 424, 484
- public officials, 429, 486
- radio and television, 423, 434, 483–84, 487, 493
- right(s):
 - reply, of, 501
- Schmerzensgeld*, 437, 473
- sexual abuse allegations, 462–69
- sexual activities, disclosure of, 482
 - medical abnormalities: disclosure of, 482
- sexual offences, 480, 487
- Swiss law, 422
- telephone conversations, publication of, 439–44
- telephone tapping, 480–81
- tort, 430, 435, 438
- trespass, 478, 495, 497
- unjustified enrichment, 417
- wardship, 479
- Probability theory, 112, 658
- Product, 562
 - damage caused to, liability for, 596–628
 - damage to, 57, 93
 - liability, 27, 86, 91–103, 558, 562, 572, 576–77, 579–89, 605, 607–8, 613, 623, 624, 626, 703, 754
 - liability insurance, 98
 - safety, 577, 579
- Product, damage caused to:
 - abortion, 613
 - accidents, 609, 611, 620
 - fatal, 614
 - American Law, 620
 - Äquivalenzinteresse*, 613
 - building law, 600–601, 615–28
 - causation, 607, 612, 614, 622, 625
 - adequate, 608, 612, 616, 619, 626
 - multiple sufficient, 611
 - predispositions, 603
 - proximate, 608
- chattels, 606
- compensation, 596, 601, 613, 620, 623
- conditio sine qua non*, 607, 612, 619
- consent:
 - abortion, to, 618
 - medical treatment, to, 618
- contract, 604, 611, 621
 - breach of, 604
 - in favour of, with protective effects towards third party, 607
- contractor, 607
 - independent, liability for, 600–601
- culpability, 604
- damage, 625
 - assessment of, 610
 - caused by the product, 618
 - caused to the product, 618, 625
 - consequential, 612
 - remoteness of, 611, 616
- damages, 613, 617
- death, 614, 619
- defects:
 - materials, 607, 617–28
 - premises, liability for, 617
- delict, 597
- dolus directus, eventualis*, 627
- duty, 597
 - act, to, 597
 - care, of, 614
 - supervision, of, 618
- economic loss, 596, 601, 618, 622, 626
- Eigentum*, 617
- employee, liability to employer, 618
- employer:
 - duty of care for selection and supervision, 624
- evidence, 614
- exemption clauses, 596, 599
- expectation, 607
- failure to perform, 604
- fault, 606–9, 615, 617
- foreseeability, 611, 614, 625, 627
- general conditions of trade, 599, 603
- good faith, 612, 618
- injury:
 - physical, 613, 621, 623, 626
- insurance:
 - factor, 626
- Intefritätsinteresse*, 607
- interference, 612–15
- Konstruktionsfehler*, 607
- liability, 607–8, 616, 624, 625
 - exclusion of, 600
 - limitations on, 612, 620, 623
- loss, 623
 - earnings, of, 623
 - use, of, 614
 - value, of, 614–15
- malpractice:
 - medical, 613, 618
- Mangelfolgeschäden*, 603
- manufacturer’s liability, 608–9, 610
- Minderung*, 602
- misleading statements, 607
- negligence, 625
 - contributory, 605
- non-performance of contract, 604
- objective hindsight, 608
- “obscurity” rule, 599
- observer, “optimal”, 608, 609, 610
- official’s duty, 616
 - liability of official, 616
- omission, 615
- ownership:
 - transferred, 598
- period of limitation, 600, 603
- positive Vertragsverletzung*, 599
- precedent, 621
- predispositions, 620
- prima facie* rule, 614

- probability theory, 612
product,
 liability, 613, 623, 626
product, damage caused to:
 consumer, protection of, 623
 unlawfulness, 622
proof:
 burden of, 605
property, 610, 614, 617
protective law, 616, 618
public authorities, liability of, 616, 621, 622
public interest, 616
public officials, 616
public order, 616
public policy, 625
recklessness, 627
risk, 607, 608, 627
 risk-based liability, 623
Roman law, 620
second-hand goods, 602–3
shipping, 605, 623–24
social security, 621
standard conditions, 596, 602
Stoffgleichheit, 607, 621
strict liability, 620, 625, 626 substantial similarity or identity of loss, 610, 611–12 substantially identical harm or damage, 607, 608, 621
third party, 623
 liability, 616
tort, 604, 619
tortfeasor, innocent:
 tortious act, 607
traffic accidents, 622
unlawfulness, 614, 619
Wandelung, 602
warranties, express and implied, 596, 602, 608, 612, 620, 623, 627
Product liability, 868–83
 accidents, 573
 work, at, 592
 action directe, 558
 advertising, 559
 agent's fault, negligence, 556
 American Law, 592
 Befundungspflicht, 587–89
 catering, 579–84
 causation, 560, 561, 567, 572
 consumer, protection of,
 573–74
 contract, 569, 593
 breach of, 560, 563
 contractual obligations, 556, 560
 culpa:
 in contrahendo, 560
 damage, 557, 567, 569
 caused to the product, 593
 consequential, 573
 direct and indirect, 557
 non-pecuniary, immaterial, 579
 damages, 569, 579
 dangerous activities, 566
 debtor and creditor, 563
 defects:
 materials, 562, 568–79
 products, 594–95
 Drittschadensliquidation, 557
 duty:
 act, to, 575
 economic loss, 593
 EEC Directive on Product
 Liability, 582
 employee, 583
 liability to employer, 583
 Erfolgestandhaftung, 576 evidence, 562, 572, 579
 fault:
 fault based liability, 579
 food poisoning, 579–84
 food poisoning, 579–84
 foreseeability, 568, 574
 human error, 561
 injury, physical, 592
 liability:
 civil, 556
 exclusion of, 570
 product, 589–92
 without fault, 559
 malpractice:
 medical, 564–68, 576, 592
 manufacturer's liability, 559, 562, 564–71
 material security, 569
 medical law, 564–68
 middleman, 569
 negligence, 592, 594
 Obhutspflicht, 557
 objektiver
 Zurechnungszusammenhang, 576
 period of limitation, 570
 positive Vertragsverletzung, 560, 563 presumption of fault, guilt, 563
 primum nil nocere, 566–67
 product, 562
 liability, 558, 562, 572, 576–77
 safety, 577, 579
 proof, 560–61
 burden of, 561, 572, 581, 594
 prima facie, 572, 575, 576
 reversal of, 576, 579
 protective law, 561
 proximity, 580
 quasi-contractual relationship, 559
 risk, 557, 558, 562, 573
 sale of goods, 557
 scope:
 risk, of, 573
 services, 580
 special relationships, 556
 standard conditions, 570
 strict liability, 559, 566, 576, 594 technology, state of, 562
 teeth, damage to, 589–92
 third party, 557, 593
 tort, 564, 573, 592
 traffic accidents, 592
 warranties, express and
 implied, 569, 593
Products liability:
 regime, 748–49
Profit, loss of, 939
Proof, 48, 432–33, 560–61, 698, 858, 1020–21
 burden of, 85, 88, 94, 99, 430, 435, 561, 572, 581, 594, 605,
 699, 703, 731, 762, 767, 777, 779, 886
 exculpatory, 700, 807
 prima facie, 85, 98, 572, 575, 576
 reversal of, 98, 576, 579
Property, 26, 49–51, 525, 610, 614, 617, 1019
Prosecutor: duty to prosecute, 960–63
Protective law, 209, 210, 212, 271,
296, 508, 561, 618, 647, 832, 885,
886, 946, 950, 953
Proximity, 142, 256, 257, 580
Prussian law, 22
Public authorities, liability of,
424, 616, 622, 628–29, 651, 893–98
“Public domain”, 77, 430
Public interest, 423, 424, 484, 526,
616, 891, 944
Public law duties, 89
Public nuisance, 236, 239
Public officials, 429, 486, 616,
898
Public order, 525, 616
Public perception, 1017
Public policy, 71, 240, 625
Public transport, 945
Punitive damages. See damages
Quasi-contractual relationship,
55, 58, 94, 559
Radio and television, 423, 434,
483–84, 487, 493

- Railways, 694, 702, 803, 826, 853
protected rights of, 943–46
Räumlich-gegenständlicher Bereich der Ehe, 371
Reasonable man, 84, 85, 527, 534
Receivership, 283–88
Recht am eigenen Bild, 69
Rechtfertigungsgrund, 25, 80
Rechtsgüter, 885
Rechtspositionen, 1005
Rechtsstaat, 28
Rechtswidrigkeit, 25, 79, 108
Rechtswidrigkeitszusammenhang, 108
Reckless behaviour. See dolus directus, eventualis
Recklessness, 84, 656, 680, 689, 891, 985
Recovery of loss, 67, 119, 142, 188, 215, 217, 244, 262, 685, 1005
double, 904
Redress, 66, 70, 984, 990
Rei vindicatio, 26
Reiner Vermögensschaden, 52, 242
Relational economic loss, 244, 258
Reliance, 96
Relief, 11
Remarriage of widow, 914
Remedial relief, 901, 930
Remedies, 58, 78, 93, 225, 886
Remoteness, 86, 113, 217
damage, of. See Damage Repair, cost of, 932, 939
Reparation, symbolic. See Satisfaction
Representatives, 221, 700, 756, 776, 777, 797, 898
Reputation. See right to one's personality
Res judicata, 661, 664, 845
Rescuers, 110–11, 662–63
nervous shock, 128–30
Restitutio in integrum, 550, 555, 907, 916
Restitution, 78, 985, 1016
Revision, 7
Ricochet damages, 925–30
Right(s), 76
absolute, 69
health, of. See Health information, of, 509, 515, 538
life, to, 15 one's own likeness, to, 1006 ownership, of, 224
personality, 70, 74, 363, 368, 395, 401, 402–9, 412–505, 526, 930, 1005, 1007
reply, of, 501
Risk, 67, 86, 227, 259, 279, 551, 557, 558, 562, 573, 608, 635, 656, 662, 676, 679–80, 696, 762, 770, 776, 791, 816, 837, 889, 903, 1017
risk-based liability, 25, 102, 653, 694, 780–81, 839, 860
Road traffic, 89, 507–8, 817–26, 832–35, 840, 842–47, 943–46
accidents, 50, 52, 110, 119, 121, 136, 138, 143, 507–8, 535, 592, 652–53, 654–57, 668–73, 678–91, 728–29, 758–60, 773–74, 803, 822–26, 832–35, 846–47, 905–6, 932, 994–97, 1000–1004, 1008–11, 1032–36 compensation to victims, 850–53
Roman law, 22, 26, 55, 651, 905
Safe conditions, 760
Sale of goods, 557
Satisfaction, 363, 901, 902, 903, 919, 930, 1022
Scandinavian law, 22
Schadensliquidation des Dritinteresses, 674
Schadensverlagerung, 64
Schmerzensgeld, 117, 437, 473
See also Pain and suffering
Schuldverhältnis, 704
Schutzgesetz, 43, 212, 296, 885
Schutzzweck der Norm, 108
Schwarzfahrt, 759
Scope:
employment, of, 813
risk, of, 573
Seat-belts, 906
Second-hand goods, 602–3
Security for payment, 912
Self-defence, 18, 525, 526, 540
Self-employed, 545
Self-help, 18–20
Separation of powers, 30
Servant, 693–94, 813
See also Employee
Services, 580, 767, 925, 947
legal, 947
Settlements, 915
Severity of infringement, 1008
Sexual activities, disclosure of, 482
medical abnormalities:
disclosure of, 482
Sexual offences, 480, 487
Shipping, 219, 222, 226, 238, 505–6, 623–24, 633
Shock, 47, 48, 115, 122, 137, 139, 144, 156, 667, 928 damage for, 118
distant, 122
nervous. See Nervous shock
Slander, 76
Social security, 651, 763, 903, 910
Solicitors:
economic loss. See under Economic loss
malpractice, 58, 243, 299, 328–56, 888
Sonstiges Recht, 43, 51, 69, 207, 225
Sorgfaltspflicht, allgemeine, 81
“Sovereign” acts, 893, 898
Soviet law, 110
Sozialadäquanz, 81
Special relationships, 299, 515, 556, 798, 830, 845
Sprungrevision, 5
Standard of care, 84, 245, 333, 527, 890, 898
Standard conditions, 570, 596, 602
Ständige Rechtsprechung, 10
Stare decisis, 10
Statements, damaging to person or enterprise 72, 74
See also Economic loss
Statute, breach of, 209, 210, 212, 271, 296, 508, 561, 618, 647, 832, 885, 886, 946, 950, 953
Sterilisation, failed, 192–203
Stillbirths, 150
Stoffgleichheit, 607, 621
Strict liability, 25, 85, 96, 97, 99, 102, 106, 239, 559, 566, 576, 594, 625, 626, 651, 680, 693, 752, 840, 853, 857, 859, 902, 919
absolute, 716
accidents, 725–28
action in tort, 731
air traffic, 716
animals, 720–21
Austrian law, 724, 733
Berufsgenossenschaften, 726
causation, 719
civil code, in, 709–13
compensation, 716, 731
maximum and minimum, 724, 731
contingent fee system, 738
contributory negligence, 716, 718, 725
Danish law, 730
death, 730
Dutch law, 730
economic loss, 724
energy, 725
English law, 715
fault, 714
fault and, 25, 85

- faute virtuelle*, 714
 Finnish law, 730
force majeure, 716, 725, 735
 French law, 715, 737
Gefährdungshaftung, 714
gemeines Recht, 714
 Greek law, 730
Halter des Fahrzeugs, 733 hit-and-run, 730–31
höhere Gewalt, 735
 industrial waste, 720–25
 injury, 725
 physical, 725
 insurance, 725, 737
 jury, juries, 738
lex Aquila, 714
 loss:
 earnings, of, 727
 maintenance, 727
 medical expenses, 732
 motor vehicle, 730, 733 joy-riding, 736 liability of driver, keeper, 719, 733, 735 operation of, 733 stolen, 734
 Norwegian law, 730
 nuclear power and energy, 716
 obligation, 722
 obligatory insurance, 730
 operators, 716, 720, 730–31
 pain and suffering, damages
 for, 717
 pharmaceuticals, 716
 physical injury, 726–27
 pollution, 716, 720–55
 Prussian law, 714, 724
 railways, 716, 721–22, 724
 res ipsa loquitur, 719
 risk-based liability, 714
 road traffic, 716, 728–29, 732
 Scandinavian law, 736 sickness insurance, 727
 social security, 731, 751
 standard conditions, 732
 Swedish law, 730
 Swiss law, 717, 724, 734
 technology, state of, 723
 third party, 731
 tort, 714
 traffic accidents, 719, 728–29, 736 typical consequences, 720 “unavoidable event”, 735
 vicarious liability, 720
 Subcontractor, 60, 61, 229, 333
 Subrogation, 905
Subsidiarität, 73
 Substantial similarity or identity of loss, 610, 611–12 Substantially identical harm or
 damage, 607, 608, 621
 Suffering. See Pain and suffering
 Swiss law, 25, 422, 700, 730, 912, 925
 Technical equipment, 100, 767
 Technology, state of, 102, 562
 Teeth, damage to, 589–92
Teilungsabkommen, 728
 Telephone conversations, publication of, 439–44
 Telephone tapping, 480–81
 Tenant, 87, 519, 554, 777, 793, 801, 803, 888
 Theft, 674
 Theory of difference, 1005
 Third parties, 20–21, 277, 328, 557, 593, 623, 754, 792, 796, 924
 liability, 226, 277, 616, 756, 829
 Tort, 23, 27, 55, 57, 93, 145, 161,
 211, 332, 360, 363, 371, 430, 435,
 438, 544, 548, 553, 564, 573, 592,
 604, 619, 663, 679, 702, 953, 1020 Tortfeasor, innocent:
 tortious act, 24, 607, 1012
 Trade disputes, 891
 Trade unions, 891
 liability of, 891
 Traffic accidents, 50, 52, 110, 119,
 121, 136, 138, 143, 507–8, 535,
 592, 652–53, 654–57, 668–73,
 678–91, 728–29, 758–60, 773–74, 803, 822–26, 832–35,
 846–47, 905–6, 932, 994–97,
 1000–1004, 1008–11, 1032–36
 Traffic safety, 86
 Transferred loss, 66, 96
 Transmissibility of action, 924
 Trespass, 26, 88, 478, 495, 497, 525
Treu und Glauben, 677, 679, 681
 Unborn child, 45, 149
 Underhand activities, 892
Unelaubte Handlungen, 23
 Unfair competition, 235, 375, 889
Ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung, 23
 Unification process, 22
 Unjustified enrichment, 23, 417
 Unlawfulness, 9, 25, 79, 161, 181,
 183, 375, 377, 381, 527, 631, 652, 665, 697, 699, 780
 fault and. See Unlawfulness and fault
 Unlawfulness and fault, 79, 505–40
 abortion, 536, 537
 body and health, 514
 bonus pater familias, 535
 care:
 standard of, 527
 causation, 539
 censorship, 526
 child, children, 536–37
 consent, 536
 medical treatment, to,
 508–20, 521–24, 527–34, 536–40
 risk, to, 512–19
 vaccinations, 521–24
 contract, 513
culpa, 527
 defamation, 534
 duty:
 care, of, 506
 supervision, of, 506 enterprise, established and operating business, 525 family law, 537 fraud, 536
 freedom:
 expression, of, 526
 good faith, 505
 health, 515
 hospital, liability of, 508, 512
 insurance, 535
 factor, 535
 interference, 525, 538
 with right to business
 enterprise, 525
 landlord and tenant, 519
 malpractice, medical, 535–36
 master, 505
 medical law, 509, 513–14
 mental distress, 509
 morality, 525
 necessity, 536
 negligence, 507
Notstand, 540
Notwehr, 540
 pain and suffering, damages
 for, 508
 personality rights, 526
 physical injury, 519
 pornography, 524–27
 printing and publishing, 525
 property, 525
 protective law, 508
 public interest, 526
 public order, 525
 reasonable man, 527, 534
 right(s):
 information, of, 509, 515, 538
 road traffic, 507–8
 self-defence, 525, 526, 540
 shipping, 505–6
 shock, nervous, 512
 special relationships, 515

- traffic accidents, 507–8, 535
 trespass, 525
 vaccinations, 521–24
Unterhalt, 45
 Untrue statements, 74
 Unwanted pregnancies, 192–203
 See also Wrongful life
 health, 195
 maintenance, 192
 sterilisation, failed, 192–203
 Use, loss of. See under Economic loss Usufruct, 51

 Vaccinations, 521–24
Venire contra factum proprium, 282
Verfassungsbeschwerde, 28, 394, 395, 396, 402
 See also Constitutionisation of private law
Verhaltensnorm, 81
Verkehr, im, 81
Verkehrssicherungspflicht, 86, 204, 752, 754, 770
Vermögensschaden, reiner, 52
Verrichtungsgehilfe, 695, 769
Verschuldenshaftung, 23
Versculden, 68, 81, 857
Verständlich, 47
Vertrag mit Schutzwirkung für Dritte, 59, 60, 62, 95, 143
Vertreter, 776
Vertwirkung, 793
 Vexatious claim, 143

 Vicarious liability, 25, 59, 95, 510, 694, 695, 811
 Victim: fault of, 25, 88, 110, 117, 124–25, 269, 376, 605, 674–75, 682, 689, 757–58, 772–73, 779, 796, 818, 841, 844, 864, 905 primary and secondary, 118, 125–26, 127, 128, 141 Volenti, 88
Vorwerfbarkeit, 81

Wandelung, 602
 Wardship, 479
 Warning labels, 101
 Warranties, express and implied, 61, 215, 569, 593, 596, 602, 608, 612, 620, 623, 627
 Water resources, 740–41
Wichtiger Grund, 912
 Wilful acts, 12
Wohl und Wehe, 62, 293
 Wrongful birth. See Wrongful life
 Wrongful conception. See Wrongful life
 Wrongful death, 44, 123, 142, 150, 151, 161, 186, 188
 See also Death
 Wrongful life, 10, 47, 156–92
 abortion, 156, 163–64, 183
 action in tort, 161 child's rights to claim, 160, 181
 contract, 178
 breach of, 158, 161
 damage:
 assessment of, 159
 direct and indirect, 190
 damages, 162, 186, 189
 duty to prevent birth, 160 extraordinary expenses, 191
 foreseeability, 189
 health, 157
 hereditary genetic disorders, avoiding, 164–71
 injury, 181, 189
 interference, intentional, 187 legal personality, 162
 liability, 162
 tortious, 162
 maintenance, 157, 162, 171–78, 182
 medical expenses, 188, 189
 medical law, 156
 medical preparations, duty to inform, 156
 pain and suffering, damages for, 160, 187
 personal integrity, 161, 162
 recovery of loss, 188
 tort, 161
 unlawfulness, 161, 181, 183
 unwanted pregnancies, 192–203

Zufällige Schadenverlagerung, 64
Zugewinnngemeinschaft, 29
Zurechnungszusammenhang, 121