Preface to the Fourth Edition

THIS IS the fourth edition—fifth if one counts as a new edition the corrected and with some additions reprint of 1997—of The German Law of Torts and it takes place sixteen years after this work first saw the light of day. This must be a record of sorts for a book, which is substantial in size, not cheap in price, and specialised in nature. The initial proposal to the OUP to publish the book succeeded only because of the unflinching support of my former Oxford colleague and friend Tony Honoré and the tenacity and imagination of Richard Hart who had to fight hard to create an interest in foreign and comparative law. It is thus fitting that the book should now appear in the lists of Hart Publishing; and it does so in a substantially revised, up-dated, and enlarged form. Though the book still bears my own brand of comparative methodology, and I have done much work myself to up-date both its German and Common law parts, the new edition also owes a great deal to my (and Professor Francis Reynolds's) former Oxford student Dr Hannes Unberath. For his brilliant D.Phil. dissertation—Recovery of Third Parties' Losses in Contractual Actions—a Comparative Study of English and German Law—prepared him well for the task of comparing systems. Indeed, as readers will soon discover when it sees the light of day, it has provided a new benchmark for anyone who wishes to undertake as Dr Unberath did a perceptive, measured, and comparative examination of a foreign legal system. The result of our combined efforts is that very few parts of the book have escaped a substantial re-writing or, at the very least, an updating revision. The number of decisions reproduced in translated form has also increased dramatically from 86 in the first edition to 151 in the present. More will follow in the years to come in the website I have set up at the Institute of Global Law of University College London making the richness of German legal culture more widely available to Common lawyers.

The commercial success of this book has been surpassed only by the critical acclaim that it has received from numerous comparatists. They include such luminaries as (in alphabetical order) Professors Christian von Bar, Hein Kötz and Werner Lorenz from Germany and John Fleming, Kurt Lipstein, Barry Nicholas, Bernard Rudden and, of course, Tony Honoré from our own legal world. In one sense even more important is the judicial approbation that the book has also received from such eminent judges as Lord Bingham, Lord Goff and now Professor Dr Walter Odersky, emeritus President of the Supreme German Federal Court whose case law this book discusses in some detail and who is therefore more qualified than most to judge its contents. His Foreword shows that he has done this carefully; and both of us are deeply in his debt for his generous suggestions and kind endorsement. My own debt to him in fact goes back quite a few years since with his encouragement I repeatedly drew on his immense learning and experience. My German friends have never let me down; nor I them. Of a different nature but equally profound is my debt to Sir Stephen Sedley. For not only did he generously accept the onerous task of reading the entire manuscript and contributing an “endorsing” Foreword to the book. In his professional life he has also managed to combine the role of judge and jurist, thus doubly (as well as significantly) influencing legal thought in this country.

But how can one explain the success of this book? It would be nice for the author(s) to claim the major part of the credit but I suspect the reasons are wider and thus much more noteworthy.

I suppose the first and foremost reason is that the study of foreign law and the quest of ways of presenting it to British lawyers is growing as we are increasingly coming within the gravitational force of Europe. If a section of the political world refuses to accept this, the City and the legal profession have taken stock of this change. A few years ago, I looked at this phenomenon in my inaugural lecture as Corresponding Fellow of the Royal Netherlands Academy of Arts and Sciences focusing, of course, on the growing impact that the case law of Luxembourg and Strasbourg are having on our own law. But the last decade and a half have also seen our courts (as well as those of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa) slowly but steadily entering into the realms of foreign—especially German—law, private as well as public. The citations to this book suggest that its ideas and the material made available by it have facilitated this trend. Certainly, the subsequent appearance of other books or case-books dealing with tort law in a comparative context also shows that the topic this book dealt with first has now almost acquired a niche of its own in the legal curricula of many European Universities.

My own belief is that the “more the merrier”. Yet I have still to convince most writers in this field that our prime target should be judges and practitioners and not academics. For judges, including our own, are increasingly thirsting for new ideas when confronted with problems that do not have obvious or satisfactory answers in the national law. If it becomes known that the judges have an interest in foreign law, as I think they do, practitioners will oblige. Indeed, they are already obliging; and if they go on obliging, the subject will come out of the “ghetto”, as one academic once put it, and acquire a student following that it has not hitherto enjoyed. In the years to come, the growing numbers of law students spending study time abroad will, I am sure, strengthen this trend. It will also increasingly make mature English lawyers aware of the fact that in both the areas of private as well as constitutional law they have a choice to make from different alternatives. For the days when one looked for inspiration to the law of the USA only are, I think, decreasing and the shrewd and intellectually agile lawyer will want to consider not only the American model for, say, federalism or speech rights but also the Canadian, the Australian, and the German. If this book assists this trend it will not only have helped create a new way at making foreign law more user friendly to national lawyers; it will have also helped broaden legal minds. For someone who started and is ending his life as a teacher that can be no mean achievement.

Acknowledgements

A WORK of this size is not written without substantial intellectual debts being incurred towards a host of colleagues and friends who have assisted in its preparation. Thus, first and foremost, I wish to thank my colleagues at the Law Faculty of the Ludwigs-Maximilians University of Munich in Bavaria. For they hosted my stay with them for five consecutive summers, first as a holder of a Senior Prize awarded by the Deutsche Forschungs Gemeinschaft and then as a Visiting Professor at the famous Law Faculty. It was during this time that this substantial revision took place in the excellent library of the Institute of Comparative Law run so competently by Herr Rols Riss. To the Director of the Institute, Professor Dr Dagmar Coester-Waltjen as well as her predecessor—for many years my mentor in matters of German and comparative law—Professor Dr Dr hc Werner Lorenz I extend my warmest and most profound thanks.

The Munich Law Faculty has always been a hothouse of ideas and, naturally, I benefited greatly from many conversations I have had with some of my colleagues there. It is the nature of such discussions that they do not produce precise debts. Still, I wish to record my thanks to (in alphabetical order) Professors Michael Coester, Dagmar Coester-Waltjen, Claus-Wilhelm Canaris, Andreas Heldrich, Stephan Lorenz, Gerhard Ries, and Peter Schlosser while hastening to add the usual disclaimer that they bear no responsibility for what is contained in this book. Dr Unberath would like to express his gratitude to Professor Joachim Hruschka of the University of Erlangen-Nürnberg to whose chair he was attached while working on this book. Thanks are also due to Professor Reinhard Greger for guidance and advice on the Road Traffic Act regime.

Dr Unberath and I, likewise, benefited greatly from the fact that almost the entirety of our text was carefully read by Professor Dr Wulf-Hennig Roth of the Law Faculty of the University of Bonn. In my experience German scholars excel in the thoroughness with which they scrutinise texts submitted for their comments. Professor Roth did even more. For he corrected with elegance and style and even willingly accepted the possibility that on some matters views could legitimately diverge. He, as well as Dr Jörg Fedtke, formerly of the University of Hamburg and now DAAD/Clifford Chance lecturer in German Law at University College London saved us both of many errors and contributed many helpful additions for which we are both most grateful. We are likewise grateful to Ms Maria Schuster for preparing with exemplary diligence the list of cases that appear at the beginning of this book.

The writing of this book, which started in Germany, was completed in the marvellous Jamail Research Centre of the School of Law of the University of Texas at Austin where its Director Professor Roy Mersky and his helpful staff, notably Jon Pratter and Keith Ann Stiverson, do not know the sentence “this book does not exist”! My debt to Joe Jamail is, however, also a personal one since the Chair I hold at Texas (thanks to the exertions of two Deans—Michael Sharlot and Bill Powers—and my good friend, the late Charlie Wright) is yet another tangible sign of Joe’s uniquely generous spirit. Joe has made for himself a great name as a formidable tort litigator. I hope this book does justice to the subject he has made his own during a lifetime in court.

The second major debt is towards the colleagues and friends who helped with the translations contained in this book. In fact just under half of this book is taken up by translations of German decisions that come from the pens of Kurt Lipstein, Tony Weir, Raymond Youngs, Josephine Shaw, Irene Snook, and the late Harry Lawson (with some help from his late wife Elspeth and myself). The list that follows provides a detailed attribution; but to all these colleagues I wish—yet again—to express my sincere thanks for the professional work they did and the cheerful way they put up with my (occasional) interferences! Harry Lawson, Kurt Lipstein and Tony Weir, of course, deserve additional thanks since for over thirty years now not only have they helped with translations but also instructed, inspired, intellectually provoked, and even “ticked me off.”

Foreword to the Fourth Edition

This is the fourth edition of The German Law of Torts by Professor Basil S. Markesinis and with Dr Hannes Unberath appearing for the first time as a co-author. The three previous editions of the book, despite being modestly subtitled A Comparative Introduction, already presented a comprehensive and excellent comparative account of the German law of torts. That is why from the very outset this work proved such a remarkable success among jurists the world over. This success has been confirmed by the fact that the work has seen four editions in the space of about sixteen years. It was thus a great honour for me to be invited to write the foreword to its latest edition. The writers of the earlier forewords included two Senior Law Lords, Lord Goff of Chieveley and Lord Bingham of Cornhill, colleagues for whom I have the highest esteem and to whom I feel bound by ties of true friendship.

The high regard I have always had for the previous editions of this work also extends to the companion volume entitled The German Law of Contracts and Restitution, which Professor Markesinis wrote together with two other German colleagues. Taken together the two volumes present a full and complete account of the German law of obligations. Now I have read through the latest edition of The German Law of Torts I note that a large number of its passages have been changed, some substantially expanded, and all entirely updated. For the first time the book also includes more than 150 fully translated decisions of German courts, most of them being accompanied by highly stimulating and informative notes.

The material in this book is throughout presented in an elegant and most instructive way. For the authors display their thorough learning with a lightness of touch and, even humour—a feature of English writing which we Germans so often admire.

This work has been written primarily for the English-speaking jurist in mind: the student and, as Lord Goff convincingly argued in his earlier and learned foreword, the practitioner as well. Nonetheless, I would like to add that it is also a most inspiring book for someone who has been educated in German law and practises law in Germany. This is not only because the subject matter has been handled in such an intellectually stimulating manner. One can also benefit directly from seeing how problems encountered in one's own system (and the methods developed to solve them) have been handled from the Common law perspective. It was thus with great pleasure that I read the passages in the Introduction under the title "Style, form, and content of the judgments of the BGH". For it was rewarding to see one's own experience reflected through the eyes of a foreign colleague and one, whom I might add, is willing to look at my system in a benevolent and perceptive manner. The exercise was invaluable in broadening and complementing my own perception of my experience in this matter.

It seems logical to the German reader that each section contains a self-contained dogmatic part followed by cases most of which are followed by highly instructive and informative notes. The latter undoubtedly reflect the case-law approach of the Anglo-American systems. I would like to stress however that the importance of precedents has increased significantly in Germany as well over the last few decades. For though in German law there is formally no doctrine of stare decisis, as a matter of fact past decisions determine the entire legal reality—in and outside the courtroom. This is particularly true of the decisions of the Bundesgerichtshof. A distinguished comparative lawyer, Professor Andreas Heldrich, currently Rector of the Ludwig-Maximilians University of Munich (where Professor Markesinis did so much of his work on this book), examined this important question in his lecture celebrating 50 years since the founding of the Bundesgerichtshof on 1 October 2000. (“50 Jahre Rechtsprechung des BGH—auf dem Weg zum Präjudizienrecht?” ZRP 2000, 497). There he concluded that despite differences in emphasis, judge-made law and statutory law were in equal ways the cornerstones of the Anglo-American and German systems.

We live in an age of ever-increasing co-operation between the European nations and we can consider ourselves privileged to be witnesses of this process. Its future success will crucially depend on finding the right balance between convergence on a broader scale and conserving the particular characteristics and traditions of the individual legal systems. The same can be said about the harmonisation brought about by the European Institutions. However, the desire to preserve one’s own tradition should not prevent one from studying the weaknesses and the strengths of the legal system of one’s neighbours. On the contrary, doing so will be extremely rewarding and will contribute to one’s own strength. Where the native legal system encounters difficulties or novel situations, it is particularly desirable to rely on arguments derived from comparative law while searching for the appropriate answer to such difficulties elsewhere. This book greatly assists this process.

In a letter which he once wrote to me Basil Markesinis mentioned that The German Law of Torts “has been the work of my life for over twenty years”. This remark, uttered in the most modest and endearing of ways, deeply impressed me. The author, having completed the fourth edition of his book (together with Hannes Unberath), has truly taken his vision of generating greater understanding between Anglo-American and German jurists to new heights. I am thus confident that I speak on behalf of all my colleagues at the Bundesgerichtshof when I say we wish this remarkable book the continuing success it so richly deserves.

Foreword to the Fourth Edition

I KNOW that I shall be forgiven if, in a foreword to the fourth edition in only sixteen years of this path-breaking book, I do not traverse the high ground covered with such distinction by my predecessors Professor Lorenz, Lord Goff and Lord Bingham. There is nothing in this new edition which does not justify their praise, and much—not least the judgments in translation—which gives fresh grounds for it.

Instead let me reflect briefly on the significance of the point of time at which the book appears. It is a moment when the United Kingdom, by now accustomed to the supremacy of the law of the European Union, has newly patriated the European Convention on Human Rights and is learning to live with its occasionally demanding norms. It has in consequence found its own law of torts under unexpected pressure as the Strasbourg court has found unacceptable the sometimes high thresholds being set by the common law for access to justice against state entities. Such decisions provoke regular journalistic and political assaults on an undifferentiated place called “Europe” where foreign judges ordain how the United Kingdom should be run.

Germany (and its juridical predecessor, the Federal Republic) has travelled this road for much longer than we have, but without quite the same sense of imposition. Its postwar Grundgesetz has been the primary source of those civil rights for which we look first to the common law and then to the European Convention. Its civil code, like other codes, is not a comprehensive set of answers but a framework for finding them, and in that respect not very different from the common law. So it is unsurprising to find a strong emergent parallelism not only between the problems each jurisdiction has had to deal with but between the modes of reasoning by which they are resolved. One sees it in the tentative movement of the United Kingdom’s courts towards the kind of indirect horizontal application of rights with which German theory and practice are already familiar. When, as has begun to happen, the United Kingdom’s courts have to decide how far they are called upon to protect the privacy of individuals from unwanted intrusion, they will have the reasoning and experience of the German courts—the French courts too—to call upon. It is reasoning and experience which extends into areas that are familiar but still extremely troublesome to our courts, such as state liability and economic loss, and into others which we are still coming to grips with, such as wrongful procreation.

On these and some of the many other topics which it covers, The German Law of Torts has already been cited in the judgments of anglophone courts from Australia to Canada to South Africa, as well as those of England and Wales. This is its great and growing value. It no longer represents, as comparative law used to represent, an absorbing academic pursuit. It represents a body of working jurisprudence developed by able lawyers to cope with problems common to both our jurisdictions, and doing so on a largely shared foundation of basic rights and norms. To an increasing extent judges as well as practitioners will turn to books like this (in the too-rare instances where they exist) for workable ways of developing law for the new millennium in the United Kingdom and elsewhere. Whether convergence or divergence follows, it will be time and effort well spent.

Once again, by making educated inquiry possible and furnishing a wealth of otherwise inaccessible information about the German law of torts, Professor Markesinis, with his new co-author Dr Unberath, has earned the gratitude of more people than he will ever know.

Foreword to the Third Edition

THE German Law of Torts has, within a remarkably short period, become a classic of European legal literature. Three editions in under eight years: the record speaks for itself. For the monoglot English-speaking reader, Professor Markesinis' book has no peer and no rival.

The reasons for the book's outstanding success are not hard to divine. First is the intrinsic interest and importance of the subject. Only a small part of the German Civil Code is devoted to the law of torts, but it is an important, perhaps increasingly important, part. And the Code itself, described by Maitland as "the most carefully considered statement of a nation's law that the world has ever seen", is a work well worthy of serious study. That is a truth which our fathers perhaps overlooked, but of which our grandfathers were fully aware.

A distinguished scholarly survey of the tort paragraphs in the German Code would be achievement enough. But it would scarcely earn the widespread acclaim with which successive editions of the book have been greeted. That is the product of the book's second great virtue: its treatment of German tort law not as a series of abstract principles or general theories but as a code of legal rules worked out and refined by practical application in the courts to actual human beings in real situations. So the law comes to life in a way readily understood by the common lawyer, and congenial to him, not as the dream of a legal philosopher but as a source of solutions to practical problems, a system deeply rooted in the untidy earth of ordinary life. This is as much a casebook as a treatise on jurisprudence.

It is, however, the book's third great virtue which assures it a place in the library of the well-armed practitioner (and even judge). That virtue, proclaimed in the full title to the book, lies in the expert and skilful comparisons persistently drawn between the solutions achieved by German judges applying the Code and judges in the United Kingdom and other common law jurisdictions applying rules derived from statute and authority. Problems which have exercised, and often baffled, common law judges—responsibility for economic loss, the scope of duties of care, liability for psychiatric damage, the protection of privacy, environmental liability—are here set in a comparative context which yields fresh insights, suggests new possibilities and stimulates the jaded imagination.

Professor Markesinis has chosen his moment well. As the countries of Western Europe draw closer together, as frontiers disappear and barriers fall, opportunities to learn from the experience of others become more plentiful and the need to take advantage of those opportunities more obvious. This important book may fairly be seen as contributing to that increase in mutual understanding upon which international harmony and co-operation so closely depend.

Foreword to the Second Edition

I AM honoured to be invited to contribute a Foreword to the Second Edition of this remarkable and, certainly to me, most valuable book.

The theoretical case for the study of comparative law has long been made out. The problem now is not whether comparative law should be taught in our universities, and studied by our law students. The problem is rather how it should be presented, not merely as an aspect of legal culture, but as a subject which is capable of influencing our work, whether as scholars or as practising lawyers in the development, exposition and application of legal principles, in the context of our own domestic legal system.

It must never be forgotten, by those who teach and write about law, that, for those who study it and those who practise it, our own domestic law bristles with difficulties which are hard to master, and problems which are difficult to solve. In working through a heavy university curriculum, and in the helter-skelter of professional life (whether in practice or on the bench), it is not at all easy to accommodate the introduction of material from other legal systems, and especially from civil law systems with which we are unfamiliar. Even in appellate tribunals, it is hard enough to master and to reconcile existing English material—statutes, cases and academic writings. Moreover, in the great majority of cases, the point is a relatively narrow one which is subjected to intensive examination; and it is the practical implications of any particular solution which exercise, perhaps, the greatest influence.

It is only by grasping the practicalities of university study, of professional lawyers' practices, and of work in the courts, that it is possible to conceive an appropriate vehicle for bringing comparative law to bear, as a useful tool, and as an effective influence. For these purposes, books on comparative law which are general in nature, however admirable in themselves, however educational in a cultural sense, are of little direct use. To be influential in a more practical way, comparative law material has to be far more closely focused; and, not only that, it has to be readily comprehensible, practically orientated, and thoroughly reliable, by which I mean both accurate and up to date.

It stands to Professor Markesinis' great credit that he has fully grasped the realities of the situation in which the comparative lawyer finds himself. He understands how necessary it is that work on comparative law should be closely focused, for it to be of practical benefit to English lawyers. He understands how necessary it is that such work should be thoroughly reliable, demonstrating the author's deep and genuine understanding of this subject, set in the practical and theoretical context of its own legal system. He understands how necessary it is that it should be readily comprehensible; for example, despite his own mastery of languages, he recognises the need to present the primary sources in copious and felicitous translation for the English lawyer. He understands, too, the need for it to be practically useful, by travelling far beyond the provisions of codes to the real cases which trouble the courts and by including reported judgments from those cases, set in their theoretical context as seen by indigenous lawyers.

It is perhaps even more to Professor Markesinis' credit that he is not only capable of mastering fully a substantial topic from a foreign system of law demonstrating his expertise to the satisfaction of leading lawyers from that legal system; he also has the courage to embark upon so exacting a task as the critical exposition of such a topic, and the determination and industry to carry that task through to its fulfilment.

I speak, of course, of the present book, his Comparative Introduction to the German Law of Torts. It came as no surprise to me that the first edition of the book was so successful and was so warmly received. I know of no more directly useful book on comparative law than this. It is a book which can not only be usefully consulted by creative lawyers in this country; it is one which is capable of influencing directly the solution of problems with which we have to grapple in our own domestic law. Too often, German law is presented to us as over-theoretical and ridden with concepts. Here, however, we can see German judges at work, tackling the same problems as we have to tackle, coming up with solutions sometimes the same as ours, sometimes different—and, when they are different, sometimes (it may be thought) better than those which we have chosen. It has truly been said that the most beneficent effect of the study of other systems of law is that we learn more about our own. In this book, Professor Markesinis has taught us all how comparative law is best presented to achieve that admirable objective.

I gladly commend this new edition. As with all new editions of successful law books, it has grown in size. But, as the reader will soon discover, this is no mere update; it has involved substantial rewriting, as well as the incorporation of much new and valuable material, from Anglo-American law as well as from German law. In the result, it will be even more useful to us than its predecessor; and I am bold enough to predict that it will be even more successful.

House of Lords

ROBERT GOFF

Foreword to the First Edition

WHEN I was invited to write a few words of introduction to this book I accepted immediately and without any hesitation, even though at that time I had not yet read the manuscript. Lawyers usually are cautious people, but in this case there was no risk involved. Since I knew the author's previous publications dealing with the law of tort on a comparative basis, I had no doubt that his project of a Comparative Introduction to the German Law of Tort would be a great success. There were two further reasons why I gladly accepted this invitation. For many years the author co-operated most fruitfully with the late Professor Lawson, who some decades ago was my tutor in Oxford. Both Dr Markesinis and I owe this great comparatist very much, for he had the rare gift of illuminating difficult problems by quick and penetrating observations. The other reason is the author's connection with Cornell Law School, which encouraged and supported this book. This brings back to my memory the wonderful time I spent there working in Rudi Schlesinger's team exploring the common core of legal systems in the area of formation of contracts—a project of comparative law conducted under the auspices of the Cornell Law School which has been favourably received by scholars all over the world.

The present book, I am sure, will not merely serve its immediate purpose of introducing the reader to the German law of tort; no doubt it will also open many new perspectives for the general understanding of this legal system belonging to the civil law. Apart from family law, which has undergone rapid changes in most countries since 1945, the law of liability is an area where many important developments have taken place. Even a superficial look at the index of any of the ninety volumes of the official collection of civil cases decided by the Federal Supreme Court will suffice to confirm this impression: the number of reported cases on problems of civil liability is remarkable. Many of them have given rise to vivid discussion in German legal literature, thus confronting the courts with new ideas. This had led to a fruitful exchange of ideas between bench and scholars unknown in most of the other legal systems. The care with which the Federal Supreme Court considers critical views put forward against its opinions is sufficient evidence of this.

The importance of the law of liability and its special value for academic teaching in the Federal Republic of Germany is further stressed by the somewhat complicated interaction of contract and tort which has reached the point where the boundaries between these two areas of the law have become blurred. The different approaches taken by the German Civil Code in regard to vicarious liability in contractual relations on the one hand, and in the law of tort on the other, have certainly contributed much to the tendency to enlarge the field of contractual liability, thus filling gaps found to exist in the law of tort. However, the much disputed § 831 of the Civil Code dealing with the responsibility of employers for tortious acts committed by their employees in the course of employment which used to be a stumbling-block for plaintiffs in former times has lost much of its significance in actual legal practice, because increasingly the courts have shifted the emphasis on the basic rule contained in § 823 I Civil Code. This means that they will look into the relevant business organisation rather than try to establish the employer's fault in the selection or supervision of an individual, thereby depriving the employer of the chance to exculpate himself. The burning problem nowadays is whether purely economic loss must be made good in ordinary negligence cases, where the parties have not been in contractual relations stricto sensu. Liability for negligent misstatements is but one group of cases in which this problem has arisen. Here as elsewhere in this book Dr Markesinis has succeeded completely in selecting those cases which are most instructive. Therefore the reader obtains all the information he needs in order to find out how the law stands in such important fields as, for instance, products liability, medical malpractice, and traffic accidents. However, it is the thorough, comparative discussion accompanying each group of cases that makes reading this book a great pleasure even for one already familiar with the material. Although this book was written for students belonging to the Anglo-American legal family I would, therefore, like to recommend it to students of other legal backgrounds as well, because the problems dealt with are of a universal nature in the sense that each developed legal system has to deal with them.

“What is striking and mysterious in comparing two legal systems is the ways they are similar and the ways they are different. Much of what follows will be of immediate use to [Common] lawyers only in so far as the contrasts between German and [Common] law make them more sharply aware of the fundamental character of their own legal system. By seeing how another . . . advanced culture can make entirely different arrangements for things they have always supposed to be matters of course—things that obviously must be this way and not the other—they also may gain a critical outlook and an expanded capacity for adapting their own system’s traditional institutions to the practical needs of real life as they evolve. On the other hand, much in this book addresses problems that are virtually identical in both systems. Recognising and solving a problem becomes remarkably easier when it shows up wearing a peculiar foreign costume.”*

Introduction

1. A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF THE ORGANISATION OF THE GERMAN COURTS IN CIVIL MATTERS

THE idea of a German Supreme Court can be traced back to at least the end of the fifteenth century and the creation in 1495 of the Reichskammergericht of the Holy Roman Empire, which originally sat in Frankfurt. The prevailing political fragmentation, however, prevented it from exercising any effective influence, especially in the area of the unification of the law, and even the Emperor himself held his own court in Vienna which often competed with the Reichskammergericht. A truly central Supreme Court had thus to await the unification of Germany which was eventually realised under Bismarck's strong hand in 1871. This occurred when the Second German Reich came into being, embracing Prussia (which retained a special status and dominated the new federal state), the kingdoms of Bavaria, Saxony, and Wurttemberg. Also incorporated were eighteen "lesser" states, the three "free" cities of Hamburg, Bremen, and Lübeck, and the so-called Reichsland (imperial territory) of Alsace-Lorraine which was ceded to the Empire by the Treaty of Frankfurt of 10 May 1871 but which for some time thereafter retained a special status (indeed was until 1879 administered directly from Bismarck's office). This was a complicated constitutional arrangement, as were many that had preceded it. But before a British lawyer hurriedly condemns it as "typically" German, he should pause for a moment and reflect on the difficulties faced by his Continental counterparts trying to comprehend the equally complex constitutional arrangements between England and Wales, Scotland, and Northern Ireland, not to mention the special status of the Channel Islands. Here then, again, history provides, if not a convincing justification, at least an explanation for the existing complications.

We need not reflect here on the extent to which this unification can, just over one hundred and thirty years later, be judged as satisfactory or, even, complete. Certainly, those who know Germany well will be quick to mention both substantial differences in the language (there are over one hundred dialects) and lingering mutual suspicions between the various States that form the Federation. Yet again, however, the English lawyer (who has also assumed the role of speaking for the Welshman while ignoring the historically more cosmopolitan Scot or his counterpart from Northern Ireland) can easily overstate the cohesiveness (especially since the reunification of the two Germanies on 3 October 1990) or understate it if he is—subconsciously perhaps—concerned about the size and power of the new state. The Germans, themselves, seem to share this ambivalence, so it is fortunate that the tort lawyer need not explore these fascinating questions any further. For present purposes it will suffice merely to say that the political union, which was forged in the 1870s made inevitable the legal union, that followed. Indeed, if a common reason often invoked for codification is the need for "simplification, clarification and unification", the German Civil Code of 1900 satisfied all three. (On the other hand, as Van Gerven and others have been quick to point out, "the codification movement on the European Continent has done a lot to undo the ius commune which previously existed". Cases, Materials and Text on National, Supranational and International Tort Law 2nd ed. (2000), 9.)

Even then it was some years before the Reichsgericht came into being on 1 October 1879, this time, however, sitting in Leipzig. This was truly the first Supreme Court for the whole of Germany, and though other high federal courts subsequently saw the light of day, jurisdiction at the highest level was never divided. Indeed, the personal that staffed these administrative and financial courts was not, until the coming into force of the Constitution of 24 May 1949, given the rank and tenure of "ordinary" judges. (Wolf, Gerichtsverfassungsrecht aller Verfahrenszweige, 6th ed. (1987), 91.) The Reichsgericht thus survived until the end of the Second World War (1945). During the next few years, while Germany lay in ruins and under foreign occupation, there was no federal Supreme Court, and as a result there followed an immediate and disturbing fragmentation of the law administered in the different parts of the country. The first attempts to re-establish some semblance of unity were made in 1947 in the British-occupied zone when a special Court of Justice was entrusted with this task. However, it was not until 1 October 1950, a year after the enactment of the Constitution of Bonn (known as the Grundgesetz and abbreviated as GG), that the Bundesgerichtshof was established, this time in Karlsruhe. The scene was thus set for a "judicial recovery" from the traumatic years of the Nazi period and the post-war chaos—a recovery which, in some respects, is as admirable as the more publicised "economic miracle" of the 1950s which so symbolises the tenacity and determination of the German people.

Though in most respects modelled on the Reichsgericht, the Bundesgerichtshof was no longer accepted as the unique, supreme federal court. The desire for increased specialisation, which is an important characteristic of the contemporary German judicial structure, meant that along with the Bundesgerichtshof, which became the Supreme Court for civil and criminal matters, four other Supreme Courts also came into being. Each was placed at the head of a separate set of courts with its own organisation and personnel and dealt with, respectively, administrative law, financial matters, labour matters, and social legislation (Art. 95 GG). Alongside these, the Federal Constitutional Court (Bundesverfassungsgericht) was entrusted with the task of ensuring the preservation of the new Constitution and the control of the constitutionality of legislation (Arts. 93, 94 GG). These six courts, and the Federal Patent Court (Bundespatentgericht) (which, however, acts and ranks as a Court of Appeal) are federal courts; all other courts are State courts (i.e. equipped and maintained by the now (since reunification) sixteen States (Länder)). Two differences thus spring to mind with the United States where a federal structure has been adopted by the Constitution. First, in Germany unlike the USA, the Federal Government maintains no federal courts at the first and second level (the Patent Court, mentioned above, being the only exception). Secondly, however, in Germany and unlike America, each State has its own Constitutional Court, which is meant to ensure that the State constitution is observed. The patterns of federalism are thus truly almost endless (See Fig. 1.), and if we ever have to tow with the notion ourselves we must not commit the error of having the USA alone before our eyes.

This proliferation of supreme courts in Germany has brought with it the possibility of jurisdictional conflicts, positive or negative in nature (e.g. two or more courts asserting or denying jurisdiction over the same dispute, now largely regulated by the Gerichtsverfassungsgesetz as amended in 1960). There is, as well, the likelihood of a diverging case law on matters of substance. To resolve this latter conflict, and in order to ensure the unity of the federal law, Art. 95 of the Constitution of Bonn provided for the creation of a highest federal court (Oberstes Bundesgericht). This, however, never came into being, and a constitutional amendment, effected by means of a special statute on 18 June 1968 (BGBl. 1968.I., 657) provided, instead, for a “Common Senate” (Gemeinsamer Senat) composed of judges from the other five Supreme Courts. The task of this court is to rule whenever one of the Supreme Courts “consciously” departs (or proposes to depart) from the case law of another Supreme Court or a holding of the Common Senate. This body, which meets on average twice a year, does not seem to see its task as being one to force a compromise but come up with the most appropriate solution so, often it has sided with one rivalling court or the other. (Thus, see, Common Senate 24 October 1973, BGHZ 60, 392. On this court see, inter alia, Miebach, “Der Gemeinsame Senat der obersten Gerichtshöfe des Bundes” Schriften zum Prozeßrecht, vol. 25, p. 129.) Since in this work our emphasis will be on the civil law, the remaining observations will be devoted to the organisation of the civil courts and the civil side of the Bundesgerichtshof. In Germany this is known as the “ordinary jurisdiction” (ordentliche Gerichtsbarkeit) so as to be distinguished from the jurisdiction of the other courts (labour, administrative, financial etc.)

The lowest court on civil matters is the Amtsgericht of which there are a large number (693 in the reunited Germany receiving over 1.2–1.4 million applications/writs per year—a figure which excludes the family side of their business). They sit as single judge courts and have limited and specifically ascribed jurisdiction which included disputes up to the value of DM 10,000. As of 1 January 2002 the threshold is 5,000 € (§ 23 Nr. 1 Gerichtsverfassungsgesetz as amended by the Zivilprozeßreformgesetz of 27 July 2001).^{*} In addition they deal with such varied matters as disputes between landlords and tenants; claims for financial support arising from marital or extramarital relationships; the supervision of guardians, executors, and trustees in bankruptcy; and the handling of various registers including the all-important land register. Since 1977 all family matters, especially those associated with divorce proceedings, matrimonial property, alimony, etc., are heard by a special division of the court, the Familiengericht, and from there an appeal lies directly to the appropriate Oberlandesgericht. Appeals from all other decisions of an Amtsgericht can be filed with the appropriate Landgericht (Berufung). (Provided the amount in dispute exceeds DM 1,200; § 511a ZPO. As of 1 January 2002 the amount in dispute must exceed 600 €; in other cases an appeal may be allowed if the case concerns questions of fundamental importance: § 511 ZPO as amended by the Zivilprozeßreformgesetz of 27 July 2001). Though hierarchically inferior courts (and, in some respects, analogous to our County Court), the Amtsgerichte are courts of singular importance to the average citizen who in his lifetime is usually spared the agony and the cost of the more prolonged or difficult type of litigation. These are also courts where legal representation is not obligatory (though in about in the vast majority of cases one party at least is represented by a lawyer). They are also courts which seem to dispatch their work expeditiously, the average time of a case before them being, depending on its complexity, between four and five months.

It is in the Landgericht (cited as LG), however, that one finds the equivalent of the English High Court, and their large number (116) brings out clearly the second important characteristic of the German judicial organisation, namely the considerable decentralisation in the administration of justice. The Landgericht is a court of general jurisdiction and sits as either a trial court or a court of review from any Amtsgericht of its district—legal representation by a lawyer (Rechtsanwalt) being, in this case, obligatory. The Landgericht is usually divided into sections (or chambers) each of which includes a presiding judge and two associates (all three being professional and academically trained judges.) Lay representation exists in the Kammer für Handelssachen (the commercial division) which is composed of one professional judge (acting as president) and two laymen, experienced in commercial matters. Since the 1993 reforms (Gesetz zur Entlastung der Rechtspflege, BGBl. I. 1993 p. 50 on which Markwardt, “Das Rechtspflege-Entlastungsgesetz bei den Zivilgerichten”, MDR 1993, 189), the bulk of this court’s work is heard before a singly judge. The recent reform brought about by the Zivilprozeßreformgesetz of 27 July 2001 strengthens this trend and in most instances introduces a “single judge” (§§ 348, 348a ZPO). Henceforth, a three-judge panel will sit only if the legal issues involved are highly complex or of fundamental importance. The Landgerichte process 325,000–360,000 writs they receive (on average) per annum. (To this figure one must add the approximately 80,000 appeals from the Amtsgerichte.) The higher complexity of the civil procedure, however, means a growing backlog of work which, in Germany as elsewhere, is the subject of periodic complaints and talk of reform.

From these courts an appeal (Berufung) lies to one of the twenty-four Courts of Appeal which is called the Oberlandesgericht (cited as OLG) except for the one that sits in Berlin, which has always been known as the Kammergericht. (Again, the amount in dispute must exceed 600 €; in other cases an appeal may be allowed if it concerns questions of fundamental importance: § 511 ZPO as amended). Some Länder (namely Bremen, Hamburg, Hessen, Saarland, and Schleswig-Holstein) have only one Court of Appeal; others (e.g. Bavaria) have more. (Bavaria, in fact, also has an Oberstes Landesgericht (ObLG) which handles applications for revision related to State law.) Quite exceptionally, a Court of Appeal can be bypassed and an appeal against a decision of the Landgericht can be lodged directly with the Bundesgerichtshof provided that leave to appeal is granted. This, however, is likely to occur only where the facts of the case are not in dispute and both parties, desirous of an early solution to their dispute, are willing to utilize this leapfrogging procedure (Sprungrevision) (§ 566a ZPO; as of 1 January 2002: § 566 ZPO).

Before we turn to the Revision (appeal on questions of law) and the Bundesgerichtshof a few words must be said about the recent reform of the Berufung (appeal on questions of fact) brought about by the Zivilprozeßreformgesetz of 27 July 2001. Until 1 January 2002 the right to Berufung meant, in theory as well as in practice, that the litigants could effectively have a second trial. The reform seeks to change this and transform the nature of the Berufungsverhandlung by enhancing the importance of the decision of the first instance (be it a decision of an Amtsgericht or a Landgericht) and limiting the scope of review of the Berufungsgericht. Henceforth, the parties must present all available evidence on time, namely before the court of first instance. If they do not, they will normally be precluded from arguing points of fact on appeal (§ 531 ZPO as amended). This means also that the appeal court (Berufungsgericht) will, to a great extent, be bound by the findings of the court of first instance (§ 529 ZPO as amended). Only exceptionally, where the findings are inconsistent or give rise to doubts, or new evidence can be admitted in accordance with § 531 ZPO, will the appeal court be able to make its own findings. The details of this—controversial—reform have yet to be worked out by the courts.

The Bundesgerichtshof (henceforth BGH in short) stands, as already stated, at the apex of the judicial hierarchy in civil and criminal matters, now hearing cases from all courts of the re-united Germany. (Cases from the “new” Länder can be found reported from vol. 117 of the BGHZ; Z stands for Reports of Civil cases). It is divided into twelve Civil Senates

(or Divisions) and five Criminal Senates (of which one always sits in Leipzig). Each Senate specialises in different matters. The Sixth Civil Senate, for example, deals with problems of delictual liability; the Seventh Civil Senate with various types of contract and cases of unjust enrichment; the Eighth Civil Senate handles disputes related to sales of goods, leases, etc. When deciding a case each Senate is composed of one presiding judge and four other Supreme Court judges, and the entire Bundesgerichtshof is now staffed by over one hundred and ten Supreme Court judges who are aided by specialist staff. (Supreme Court justices are nominated by a special committee (Richterwahlausschuß), composed of the Ministers of Justice of the Lander and an equal number of members of the Lower House. This committee is convened by the Federal Minister of Justice, who does not have the right to vote, but whose consent is necessary before a nomination, decided by a majority of this committee, can be passed on to the Federal President to make the appointment.)

The large number of sections makes it once again necessary to provide for a mechanism, which will solve potential conflicts between them and ensure the unity of the case law at the highest level. This task is entrusted to the Great Senate (Grosser Senat für Zivilsachen) and there is also a Great Senate for criminal matters, which performs a similar function for the five Criminal Senates. The Great Senate is composed of the President of the entire court and eight other judges and is seized of a dispute whenever one of the Civil Senates wishes to depart from the case-law of another Civil Senate or the case-law of the Great Civil Senate itself. Before this happens, however, the Senate about to embark on a different course will enquire of the other Senate whether the latter wishes to abide by its jurisprudence. If it does not, then there is no reason to convene the Great Senate; but if the second Senate does not wish to alter its case-law, then the Great Civil Senate becomes seized of the dispute. The Great Civil Senate may also become involved in a case even where there is no dispute in a narrow sense between various Senates of the court, but one of them is anxious that the Great Civil Senate pronounce its opinion on a matter of particular significance. Conflicts between one of the Civil Senates and one of the Criminal Senates (or between one of them and the Supreme Civil Senate of the other branch) are resolved by the Combined Great Senate (Vereinigte Grosse Senate) which includes judges from both civil and criminal sections of the court.

The decision to take a case to the Bundesgerichtshof can be taken by both litigants. However if both of them are content with or acquiesce in the result reached by the Court of Appeal the case can never reach the Supreme Court (even where a gross and obvious error of law has been made at the lower level). But though the parties decide whether they will take their case to a higher level the decision whether their appeal will be admissible does not rest with them. There is a right of appeal (or, more technically, of a revision) only if the case was for technical reasons deemed inadmissible by the Court of Appeal. The reason for this exception is to ensure that all parties have at least two chances of having their case heard by a court of law. Review is also available as of right where the Court of Appeal has departed from a decision of the Bundesgerichtshof or of the Common Senate of the highest courts. Otherwise, a distinction used to be made between pecuniary and non-pecuniary disputes.

The former, included cases which refer to a dispute estimable in money terms (e.g. disputes over contracts, delicts, etc.); the latter related to cases such as marriage or filiation proceedings, etc. In non-pecuniary cases and in pecuniary cases, which did not exceed DM 60,000, the admissibility of the review depended on permission being granted by the Court of Appeal. This would be granted where the legal issues involved were of fundamental importance (grundsätzliche Bedeutung, § 546 ZPO), but not otherwise, the idea being to shield the Supreme Court from overwork. In pecuniary matters exceeding DM 60,000, the lodging of an appeal did not depend on the permission of the lower court. The Supreme Court itself could refuse by a two-thirds majority to consider the case if the matter of law was not of fundamental importance (§ 554b ZPO).

This exception has now become the general rule. As of 1 January 2002 an appeal on questions of law (Revision) to the Bundesgerichtshof can only be lodged if leave to appeal has been granted by the appeal court (Berufungsgericht); § 543 ZPO as amended by the Zivilprozeßreformgesetz of 27 July 2001. Leave to appeal must be granted if the legal issues involved are of fundamental importance or the appeal is necessary to ensure the conformity and consistency of the case law. The decision denying leave to appeal can itself be appealed (§ 544 ZPO). If the appeal is of fundamental importance, the review will take place, and a motivated judgment will be delivered either rejecting the appeal, or accepting it and remitting the case to the lower court for retrial or, finally, substituting the court's own judgment in the place of the decision that is quashed.

What is an important or fundamental matter has never been authoritatively defined. In one of its early decisions—BGH 5 July 1951, BGHZ 2, 397—the Supreme court talked in terms of the matter being of general not particular importance (Allgemeine Bedeutung des Rechtsstreits, Nicht bloß den Einzelfall berührend). In a later decision—BGH 26 September 1978, NJW 1979, 219—it clarified, that the (potential) appellant's own interest was never, on its own, sufficient to give the appeal this characteristic however great it may be. On the whole, therefore, the vagueness of the terms has enabled the Courts of Appeal to act out efficiently their roles as gatekeepers. (On the whole matter, Prütting, Die Zulassung der Revision (1977) suggesting at pp. 164 ff. that permission is granted with restraint.)

One should conclude this section by stating that the doctrine of binding precedent is, in principle, not known to German law. We shall again refer briefly to this point in the next section when discussing how this may affect the style and form of a judgment. But it must be mentioned here, as well, since a "right" to take a case before the Supreme Court may arise if one of the exceptional rules of binding precedent has been violated. For present purposes, the most important instances where decisions can be binding on other courts are the following three. First, binding is a decision of the Federal Constitutional Court on the constitutional organs of the Federal and State government. Secondly, a decision of one Senate of the Federal Supreme Court departing from an earlier ruling of another Senate of the same court, if it has obtained a special ruling by the Great Senate (on civil or criminal matters, as the case may be). Thirdly, if, after an appeal on a point of law (Revision), the Bundesgerichtshof has reversed a decision of a Court of Appeal or District Court and sent the case for retrial before a lower court. This latter court is then bound by the ruling of the Bundesgerichtshof on the matter of law, which was before it.

2. STYLE, FORM, AND CONTENT OF ARGUMENT IN THE JUDGMENTS OF THE BGH

A judgment of the German Supreme Court presents some marked differences both in style and form from the judgments of, say, the House of Lords or the French Cour de cassation. In terms of length, the contrast is greater with the French decisions (especially of the Cour de cassation), which are unparalleled in terseness and peculiarity of grammatical style. For example, a typical German judgment dealing with a contractual or delictual matter will run to about 2,000–2,500 words—in a minority of cases reaching the 5,000–word range. (Judgments of the Federal Constitutional Court tend to be much longer, some like the abortion cases, reaching truly gigantic proportions!) In length they thus tend to be closer to the average American decision than to the longer judgments of the House of Lords. One also acquires the impression—though to our knowledge no empirical study has been conducted on this matter—that the average decision of the Reichsgericht was shorter during the nineteenth century and the earlier part of this century than it has been since the end of the Second World War. If that is true, there is a parallel here with modern English practice which is also producing longer judgments than it did in the past. The trend, if a trend it is, is understandable, not least if one takes into account the growing volume of authority that the courts have to take into account. Whether it is all commendable is another matter.

Like the French decisions, but unlike the Anglo-American equivalents, the decisions of the German Supreme Court are unanimous decisions of the entire court. Clearly this does not mean that there are never any disagreements between the judges trying a particular case; but it does mean that in the published decision there are no open dissents. The court decides by simple majority (judges voting in inverted order of seniority, the presiding judge voting last). Thus, on occasion, the phrasing of the judgment requires very careful drafting in order to express the compromise formula agreed upon by the members of the court. By contrast, dissenting judgments are allowed in the Federal Constitutional Court and the judges there make frequent use of this right.

Typically the report of a judgment will commence with a couple of paragraphs (Leitsätze) containing in abstract form the propositions of the law supported by the decision. This section of the report forms no part of the decision and in the translations reproduced in this book it has, consequently, been omitted. These paragraphs will be followed by references to the Articles of the Civil or Criminal Code (or other enactments) that had to be construed and applied in the case. The section of the court that had to decide the case will then be given and this will be followed by the date on which the trial was concluded. The initials of the parties to the action will also be given but never their names, famous cases thus becoming known through some other attribution e.g. "the chicken pest case”, “the gentleman rider case”. (Exceptions to this rule are found more often in the case law of the Constitutional court and in unfair competition and intellectual property cases decided by the Supreme Court. Thus, for instance, the “Lüth” case, “the Soraya” case, “the Lebach,” the “Strauss Placard” case.) The above is the form adopted in the semi-official reports quoted as BGHZ and followed by the number of the volume and the page on which the decision is reproduced. Other reports—the NJW, or the JZ for example—follow a slightly different order of presentation. An important case, reported in various journals, will usually be cited by giving all its references. But the text in the official report will usually be given first. (Thus, for instance, BGHZ 2, 397 = NJW 1951, 762 = ZZP 64, 474.)

The facts of the case will then follow—usually—an abbreviated form of the judgment of the Court of Appeal. Quite frequently, sections of the legal reasoning of the Court of Appeal will also be reproduced and the court will then indicate whether it agrees or disagrees with the reasoning and/or the result. It will then proceed to consider the grounds for appeal advanced by the appellant and give its own reasons for its conclusions.

The extent to which the facts will be given in detail will vary from case to case. Sometimes the court merely states them, as found by the lower court. It then gives its opinion on the question of law and finally, refers the case back to the lower courts to discover the relevant facts in the light of the law as stated by the court. But the statement of facts is rarely as detailed as it is in English (or American) judgments and never as colourfully presented. For the German courts are not obliged to attempt the detailed consideration of material which is necessary in the Common law whose courts must decide whether the case under consideration is covered by earlier authority or whether, on the contrary, it is materially different and thus distinguishable from earlier precedents.

The legal arguments that follow are presented in an abstract manner, which is not always easy for a Common lawyer to follow or even to translate accurately. For first of all, the tone of the argument can be highly conceptual, even metaphysical. Sections of the judgments dealing with the protection of human personality (see below, cases 36–49) are just that, and they will, in turn, generate academic literature which can reach heights of abstraction un-thought of in the Common law. The discussion of the notion of “unlawfulness” in the decision of the Great Senate (below, case 109) provides yet another example of this phenomenon (though this controversial judgment is now, for all practical intents and purposes, obsolete). Clearly, on its face, the decision is incomprehensible (even to a young German lawyer) and some explanation of the problem and the disputes it has generated must precede any study of the problem with which it is concerned.

Another difference—especially from English decisions—is the detailed consideration of the views of contemporary (and past) academic writers dealing with the subject before the court. In particular, what is usually referred to as the “dominant opinion” (herrschende Meinung), which is the opinion on a certain matter as reflected in the majority of writings and decisions, will enjoy strong persuasive authority. Sometimes judgments contain more than a mere reference to academic literature. When this happens, one may end up with an admirably lucid summary of the views of the academic world. On some occasions, the court may, however, add—one suspects with a tinge of despair—that the solution to the problem should, in the end, depend on common sense and not theoretical constructions, however admirable they may be. One of the leading judgments on legal cause (case 80)—a subject that has greatly attracted the German legal mind—offers an excellent illustration, and should act as a caution for those who over-stress the Germanic tendency towards conceptualism and abstraction. The “chicken-pest” case (below, case 61) furnishes yet another example of the court’s willingness to take into account the views of academic writers, if only to reject them at the end and then offer its own solution. This judgment is, in fact, a teacher's dream in so far as it offers an excellent springboard from which to consider the various theories behind modern products liability law. Moreover, the interesting thing about this dialogue between court and academics is that it helps perpetuate this interaction from which, apparently, both branches of the profession stand to gain. For writers will respond to such judicial criticism and often come up with new theories or modifications of existing theories, which may later be accepted by the court. The overall impression that one gets is one of mutual respect and reciprocal influence and it is not uncommon to find the court expressly adopting the views of a certain writer on a particular problem. Thus, to give but one example, the whole doctrine of contract with protective effects towards third parties (as a variant of the classical contract in favour of third parties regulated by the BGB in §§ 328 ff.) was largely taken over by the courts from the teachings of the late Professor Karl Larenz. Another example of this close cooperation between academic writers and the courts can be found in the judicial development of § 242 BGB (good faith) which is discussed in greater detail in the first volume of this work.

The previous case-law—especially of the Supreme Court itself—is also considered and quoted in the judgments but again in a manner quite different from that adopted by the Anglo-American courts. Rarely will a quote be given in order to distinguish one case before the court from the previous one. More often, it will be given to show what the established practice of the court is on a particular matter and to reinforce the present argument. Many of the differences with Anglo-American law are obviously due to the doctrine of stare decisis which, subject to the rather few special occasions already alluded to in the previous section, is not known to German law. This is not to say, of course, that an inferior court will easily depart from the line taken by the BGH—especially if there is a series of decisions (ständige Rechtsprechung) substantially to the same effect. Also, the BGH has repeatedly stressed that it will overrule a long-lasting and steady adjudication concerning a certain legal issue only if overpowering reasons compel it to do so. (See e.g. BGHZ 85, 64. For an overview: Bydliński, “Richterrecht über Richterrecht” in 50 Jahre Bundesgerichtshof Vol. 1 (2000) 1)

Statute and custom are, therefore, technically the only true sources of law (though unlike England (until recent times) published preparatory works have always been used in order to discover the intention of the legislator). On the other hand, it is not unknown for the various State Courts of Appeal to “rebel” against a particular decision of the Supreme Court. Sometimes—as in the case of the recognition of the general right to one's personality—the rebellion will be short-lived and within a relatively short period of time the Supreme Court will manage to assert its will. In other instances, however, the reaction of the Courts of Appeal may be stronger and more persistent, which can then force the BGH to reconsider its own decision on this matter. As we shall see (below, case 11), this is what happened in the context of the “cable” cases and the reparation of purely economic loss through § 823 II BGB. In the wrongful life/birth cases we face yet another “peculiarity” of German law: the Constitutional court saying one thing and then inviting the ordinary courts to take its views into account. This, they courteously do, but if the opinion of the Constitutional court does not refer to the constitutionality of a particular decision, the ordinary courts may and do abide by their own case law. To a Common lawyer, the resulting “conflict” is troublesome; and it becomes positively irritating when the two parts of the Constitutional court, itself, are unable to agree on a common position. (We shall encounter further down one or two instances of this phenomenon e.g. in the case of claims for wrongful birth.) The history of the German Constitutional court accounts for this peculiarity; but to foreign eyes at least it is hardly justified.

German judges (and lawyers generally) could be accused of leaving nothing to the imagination. Certainly the elegance, humour, and high literary style achieved by some English and American judges are often sacrificed at the altar of accuracy and thoroughness (and the strongly felt need to keep humour out of official business.) For example, the Lord Denning type of presentation of facts, with the judge in the middle of the human drama rather than in the role of an impersonal adjudicator, is quite unknown in Germany. Equally, the desire to express in accurate and impersonal terminology a particular problem can deprive the judgment of elegance, even of life. An excellent illustration of this can be found by comparing two rescue cases—one German and one American (below, case 87 compared with Wagner v. International Ry Co., 232 NY 176, 133 NE 437 (1921)). The problem and the solution proposed are identical. This should cause no surprise, since the policy reasons behind the similar results are the same. But Cardozo J's memorable words: "Danger invites rescue. The cry of distress is the summons of relief . . ." are replaced by dry, causative language of the type which helps create the popularly conceived image of German law and its lawyers.

Like all generalisations, however, the above observations must be treated with some caution. For the contact with "reality" and the true forces that shape the law can often be found in the short but clear references to various policy factors that the judges are increasingly making. The fear of "innumerable claims", if negligently inflicted economic loss were to become compensatable, is clearly voiced in some of the "cable" cases (11 and 12). If this is read in conjunction with the writings of modern commentators on this subject, one realises that this policy factor (and others, such as insurance) lie behind the refusal to compensate cases of negligently inflicted economic loss. All of a sudden, the impressive conceptual armoury used by the courts to deny the plaintiff's claim becomes a façade; the concepts are nothing but devices that formulate the conclusions of the judges but do not really explain them. (For the importance that insurance may have on the outcome of a dispute see case 144.) A wise Munich colleague, much learned in our law, thus always warned me that all German judgments contain two reasons for their results: the published ones and the real ones. The realisation that the true reasons for a decision may lie elsewhere is an important one for it will accustom the comparatist to take his research beyond the text of a judgment to other sources such as preparatory works and, of course, academic commentaries. Only when this task has been performed fully and properly will the real similarities between the different legal systems begin to be understood.

The "contact" with the real world and its sufferings is also seen in many contract cases. The revalorisation cases of the early and middle twenties, discussed in volume one in connection with § 242 BGB, reveal the German judges at their boldest and most human (and for some the most controversial). Incidentally, this is not only one of the most remarkable areas of judge-made law in a country of codes. It also offers the interested student excellent material for an excursus into sociology, politics, and economics and an opportunity to see how law is shaped by the changing demands of social life. In one of these leading cases the Reichsgericht thus stressed that: "The first and noblest task of the judge is . . . to satisfy in his decisions the imperative demands of life and to allow himself in this respect to be guided by the experience of life" (see RGZ 100, 129). (For more details, see chapter eight of the first volume of this work.)

Finally, a few words must be added about the form the arguments take and the reasons behind them. This is particularly important given the recent tendency of contemporary British judges to give elaborate, often sophisticated, accounts of the policy reasons, which have dictated their conclusions. This is rarely obvious in the judgments of the BGH.

A judgment of the Bundesgerichtshof reveals much about German legal history, the kind of education German judges receive at University, the impact that a largely written/codified system has on the way German judges perceive their job, and much else besides. Let us look briefly at these points under three different headings: history, legal education, and the existence of a codal text.

(i) History. The original versions of the German judgments reproduced in this book show that reference to earlier decisional law is smaller than is the case with Anglo-American judgments. In Germany the frequency with which a court will make use of earlier judicial work is, in fact, even less significant than these figures suggest. This becomes obvious when, through careful reading of the judgments, one realises that the earlier case law is either quoted as an illustration of a particular view or as an example of an established practice. Rarely if ever, though, is this case law scrutinised in the way an English court would consider its earlier decisional law. There is thus little or no evidence of the previous cases having been used as building blocks for the new decision. The reason for this different treatment is, of course, to be found on the combined impact that the three factors—history, legal education and codal background—have had on the nature of German judicial work. Equally important is the fact that for the German judge the primary building block is the Code that has to be applied, followed only by the academic exegesis to which this enactment has been subjected. Incidentally, we refer to the Code as the primary building block for two reasons. The first, and better known to English lawyers, is the fact that the judge’s reasoning process starts by reference to a particular provision or provisions in the Code and proceeds deductively to the facts before him. But the second, less noticed yet crucial for present purposes, reason, is the fact that the codal text often spares the German judge the trouble of having to do and formulate some of the basic thinking that his English colleague has to do for himself. The arguments, for example, that militate (or seem to militate) against the recognition of a tort action to recover pure economic loss need not be mentioned by the judge since they were considered when the Code was being drafted and the basic decision not to “recognise” pure economic loss was taken by the legislator. Likewise, if we move to another topic, the tortious liability of statutory bodies, the decisions of principle—should the government be liable; should the negligent official, himself, be liable—were discussed by the drafting committee of the code and their decisions on these topics are reflected in their § 839 BGB.

(ii) Legal education. The education received at law school is also different and, thus, both the result and the cause of the above-mentioned difference in the finished product. For at law school, especially the so-called academic phase of his training which will culminate with the first State exam, the aspiring German judge will be taught how to use the codes, learn how to inter-link their various parts (and then combine the Codes with one another) and—to begin at least—to apply the texts he has been taught deductively. In all this, he will be expected to make as logical and as consistent a use as he can of the many concepts that will be drummed into his head during a period of at least seven—if one includes the preparation for the second state exam—years of training. Though references to cases figure increasingly in lectures—and appear even more frequently in the so-called privately financed repetitoria which are attended by most German students—the constant refining and re-defining of earlier case law, with the frequent use of the untested hypothesis, is absent from the legal training which is otherwise both long and very thorough. Thus, once again, the German judgment reflects this difference which merges very much with that mentioned under the previous sub-heading. For the same two reasons German judgments, as a rule, also make greater use of academic literature than their English counterparts. (For figures and an interesting discussion see Kötz, “Scholarship and the Courts: A Comparative Survey” in Essays in Honour of Henry Merryman on his Seventieth Birthday (1990) pp. 190 ff.)

(iii) The Codal background. As stated under (i), the Code—and we are here concerned with the Civil Code—and its preparatory works has, in most cases at least, provided for the German judge some of the decisions of principle. Paragraph 823 I BGB has thus told him that pure economic loss is not included among the list of protected interests. As stated, the German judge thus does not have to search for wider—we could call them policy—reasons “of principle” that will lead him, as they lead his English counterpart, to the conclusion to “strike out a claim” for pure economic loss. The wider issues concerning floodgates, insurability, and the like will thus not be invoked (or even hinted at) in the German judgment whereas they will play a major part in the Common law counterpart. It is only when the German judge feels that circumstances require a deviation from the basic codal text that he will feel the need to start being inventive. Sticking with the same subject—pure economic loss—we thus see this where recovery has, despite the general rule, been allowed. This has necessitated either the creation of a new protected interest—e.g. the right to an established and operating business—or an ingenious (or ingenuous) use of some other concept in order to cover the perceived legal gap. (Such as that of Weiterfresserschaden, Vertrag mit Schutzwirkung für Dritte or Drittschadensliquidation which are discussed in the section on pure economic loss.) It should be noted, however, that Drittschadensliquidation is one of the rare instances where the legislator left it to, or even encouraged, the courts to fill the gap, see Mugdan, Materialien zum BGB, vol. 2, (1899) reprinted 1979, 517–18. Incidentally, the Law Commission in its Law Com. No. 242 (1996) arrived at a similar conclusion in respect of the promisee’s remedy to recover damages on behalf of a third party. That is what Drittschadensliquidation is all about, and the relevant passage of the Law Commission paper reads almost as a word for word translation of the Materialien: “Our recommendation is that this is a matter at present better left to the evolving common law. Certainly we would not wish to forestall further judicial development of this area of the law of damages.” (para. 5.15). In the end, therefore, devices such as these have allowed “deviations” from the original position of the Code. Characteristically, however, these innovations have not come about painlessly but, on the contrary, have caused much discussion and dispute in German academic and judicial circles. (See, for instance, the reaction that followed BGH of 24. 11. 1976, BGHZ 67, 359. Thus, Hager, “Zum Schutzbereich der Produzentenhaftung”, AcP 184 (1984), 413. But cf. Steffen, “Die Bedeutung der ‘Stoffgleichheit’ mit dem ‘Mangelunwert’ für die Herstellerhaftung aus Weiterfresserschäden”, VersR 1988, 977.)

Likewise, background differences—such as different history and different constitutional texts—largely explain the differences that exist between German and American law when it comes to the clash of free speech and reputation and privacy. In Germany, the statutory regime—Constitution and Code—have here encouraged the judge to seek an ad hoc reconciliation of the competing values and only occasionally has it given textually a hint as to which value should prevail. By contrast, the American Constitution has, in its First Amendment, made up the mind for all subsequent judges by giving a predominant, some would say, exaggerated preference to the value of free speech and, effectively, deprived them of the opportunity even to attempt any balancing of values. (Thus in Konigsberg v. State Bar 366 US 36, 61 (1961) Mr Justice Black said: "I believe that the First Amendment's unequivocal command that there shall be no abridgement of the rights of free speech and assembly shows that the men who drafted our Bill of Rights did all the 'balancing' that was to be done in this field . . ." Italics added.) Finally, to return to one last illustration, the same is true in the German cases that deal with the liability of statutory bodies (discussed towards the end of this book: cases 132–139.). Much of the discussion about the desirability of the courts second-guessing other parts of the Administration or weighing the economic consequences of a liability rule, which appears in the comparable English (and American judgments), in Germany was done by the legislator when the Code was drafted. (For instance, Protokolle, vol. II, at p. 662, about the value of the "economic-consequences argument" as a reason for not imposing liability or, more recently, when its revision was planned. (Thus, see, Zur Reform des Staatshaftungsrechts (1976), p. 5, 71.) The result of all this is that much of what appears in the English judicial opinion will not figure (and does not have to figure) in the comparable German judgment. But, as we have already suggested, this does not mean that the issues that have occupied the English judges have escaped the attention of their German legal establishment. What it does mean is that consideration of some of those issues has almost certainly taken place in a different forum and must be searched for in different texts. For those involved in the comparative examination of legal systems, this undoubtedly adds both an intellectual challenge and considerable complexity to their work. The scholar who studies a foreign legal system, though advised to start his research in a narrow and focused manner, is thus eventually forced to cast his research net more widely than he originally thought was necessary if he is to obtain a decent understanding of the foreign system. How he does that is something that is acquired through reading and experience and no easy short cuts can be recommended.

3. THE DELICT PROVISIONS OF THE BGB

§ 823. A person who wilfully or negligently injures the life, body, health, freedom, property, or other right of another contrary to law is bound to compensate him for any damage arising therefrom.

The same obligation attaches to a person who infringes a statutory provision intended for the protection of others. If according to the purview of the statute infringement is possible even without fault, the duty to make compensation arises only if some fault can be imputed to the wrongdoer.

§ 824. A person who maintains or publishes, contrary to the truth, a statement calculated to endanger the credit of another, or to injure his earnings or prospects in any other manner, must compensate the other for any damage arising therefrom, even if he does not know of its untruth, provided he ought to know.

A communication the untruth of which is unknown to the person making it does not thereby render him liable to make compensation, if he or the recipient of the communication has a justifiable interest in it.

§ 825. A person who by fraud or threats, or by an abuse of the relation of dependence, induces a woman to permit illicit cohabitation is bound to compensate her for damage arising therefrom.

§ 826. A person who wilfully causes damage to another in a manner contra bonos mores is bound to compensate the other for the damage.

§ 827. A person who does damage to another in a condition of unconsciousness, or in a condition of morbid disturbance of the mental activity, incompatible with a free determination of the will, is not responsible for the damage. If he had brought himself into a temporary condition of this kind by spirituous liquors or similar means, he is responsible for any damage which he unlawfully causes in this condition in the same manner as if negligence were imputable to him; the responsibility does not arise if he has been brought into this condition without fault.

§ 828. A person who has not completed his seventh year of age is not responsible for any damage which he does to another.

A person who has completed his seventh year but not his eighteenth year of age is not responsible for any damage which he does to another, if at the time of committing the damaging act he did not have the understanding necessary to realize his responsibility. The same rule applies to a deaf mute.

§ 829. A person who in any one of the cases specified in §§ 823–6 is by virtue of §§ 827, 828 not responsible for any damage caused by him, must, nevertheless, to the extent that compensation cannot be obtained from a third party charged with the duty of supervision, make compensation for the damage in so far as according to the circumstances—in particular according to the relative positions of the parties—equity requires indemnification, and he is not deprived of the means which he needs for his own maintenance according to his station in life and for the fulfilment of his statutory duties to furnish maintenance to others.

§ 830. If several persons have caused damage by an unlawful act committed in common, each is responsible for the damage. The same rule applies if it cannot be discovered which of several participants has actually caused the damage.

Instigators and accomplices are in the same position as joint-doers.

§ 831. A person who employs another to do any work is bound to compensate for damage which the other unlawfully causes to a third party in the performance of his work. The duty to compensate does not arise if the employer has exercised ordinary care in the choice of the employee, and, where he has to supply appliances or implements or to superintend the work, has also exercised ordinary care as regards such supply or superintendence, or if the damage would have arisen, notwithstanding the exercise of such care.

The same responsibility attaches to a person who takes over the charge of any of the affairs specified in para. 1, sentence 2, by contract with the employer.

§ 832. A person who is bound by law to exercise supervision over a person on account of minority, or of his mental or physical condition, is bound to make compensation for any damage which the latter unlawfully does to a third party. The duty to compensate does not arise if he fulfils his duty of supervision, or if the damage would have occurred notwithstanding the proper exercise of supervision.

The same responsibility attaches to a person who takes over by contract the exercise of supervision.

§ 833. If a person is killed or injured, or the health of a person is affected, or a thing is damaged by an animal, the person who keeps the animal is bound to compensate the injured party for any damage arising therefrom. The duty to make compensation does not arise if the damage is caused by a domestic animal which is intended to serve the profession, the business activities, or the support of the keeper of the animal and if the keeper of the animal has either exercised the requisite care in supervising the animal or if the damage would have occurred notwithstanding the exercise of such care.

§ 834. A person who undertakes to supervise an animal under a contract with the keeper of the animal is responsible for any damage which the animal causes to a third party in the manner specified in § 833. The responsibility does not arise if he has exercised the requisite care in the supervision of the animal, or if the damage would have occurred notwithstanding the exercise of such care.

§ 836. (1) If, by the collapse of a building or other structure attached to a piece of land, or by the detachment of parts of the building or structure, a person is killed or injured, or the health of a person is affected, or a thing is damaged, and if the collapse or the detachment was caused by defective construction or inadequate maintenance, the possessor of the land is bound to compensate the injured party for any damage arising therefrom. The duty to make compensation does not arise if the possessor has exercised the requisite care for the purpose of averting danger.

(2) A former possessor of the land is responsible for the damage if the collapse or the detachment occurs within one year after the termination of his possession, unless during his possession he exercised the requisite care, or unless a subsequent possessor could have averted the danger by the exercise of such care.

(3) The possessor within the meaning of these provisions is the proprietary possessor.

§ 837. If a person in the exercise of a right possesses a building or other structure on the land of another, the responsibility specified in § 836 attaches to him instead of the possessor of the land.

§ 838. A person who undertakes for the possessor the maintenance of a building or a structure attached to land, or who has to maintain the building or the structure by virtue of a right of use belonging to him, is responsible in the same manner as the possessor for any damage caused by the collapse or the detachment of parts.

§ 839. (1) If an official wilfully or negligently commits a breach of official duty incumbent upon him towards a third party, he shall compensate the third party for any damage arising therefrom. If only negligence is imputable to the official, he may be held liable only if the injured party is unable to obtain compensation otherwise.

(2) If an official commits a breach of his official duty in giving judgment in an action, he is not responsible for any damage arising therefrom, unless the breach of duty is subject to a public penalty to be enforced by criminal proceedings. This provision does not apply to a breach of duty consisting of refusal or delay in the exercise of the office.

(3) The duty to make compensation does not arise if the injured party has wilfully or negligently omitted to avert the injury by making use of a legal remedy.

§ 840. If several persons are together responsible for damage arising from an unlawful act, they are liable, subject to the provisions of § 835, section 3, as joint debtors.

If, in addition to the person liable under §§ 831, 832 to make compensation for the damage caused by another, that other person is also liable, as between themselves only the latter is liable, or in the case provided for by § 829, only the person who has the duty of supervision.

If, in addition to the person liable under §§ 833–8 to make compensation for any damage, a third party is also liable for the damage, as between themselves only such third party is liable.

§ 841. If an official whose public duty requires him to appoint another person for the purpose of acting for a third party or to supervise such an activity or to co-operate in this activity by giving his consent to legal transactions is responsible with the other person for the damage caused by him through neglect of his duties to that other party, between the two of them, is solely liable.

§ 842. The obligation to make compensation for damage on account of an unlawful act directed against the person of another extends to the detriment which the act occasions to his earnings or prospects.

§ 843. If, in consequence of an injury to body or health, the earning capacity of the injured party is destroyed or diminished or an increase of his necessities arises, compensation must be made to the injured party by the payment of a money annuity.

The provisions of § 760 apply to the annuity. Whether, in what manner, and to what amount, the person bound to make compensation has to give security is determined according to the circumstances. Instead of an annuity the victim may demand a lump sum settlement, if a serious reason exists for it.

The claim is not excluded by the fact that another person has to furnish maintenance to the injured party.

§ 844. In the case of causing death the person bound to make compensation must make good the funeral expenses to the person on whom the obligation of bearing such expenses lies.

If the deceased at the time of the injury stood in a relation to a third party by virtue of which he was or might become bound by law to furnish maintenance to him, and if in consequence of the death such third party is deprived of the right to claim maintenance, the person bound to make compensation must compensate the third party by the payment of a money annuity, in so far as the deceased would have been bound to furnish maintenance during the presumable duration of his life; the provisions of § 843, sections 2–3, apply mutatis mutandis. The obligation to make compensation arises even if at the time of the injury the third party was only en ventre sa mère.

§ 845. In the case of causing death, or of causing injury to body or health, or in the case of deprivation of liberty, if the injured party was bound by law to perform services in favour of a third party in his household or industry, the person bound to make compensation must compensate the third party for the loss of services by the payment of a money annuity. The provisions of § 843, sections 2–4, apply mutatis mutandis.

§ 846. If, in the cases provided for by §§ 844, 845, some fault of the injured party has contributed to cause the damage which the third party has sustained, the provisions of § 254 apply to the claim of the third party.

§ 847. In the case of injury to body or health, or in the case of deprivation of liberty, the injured party may also demand an equitable compensation in money for the damage which is not a pecuniary loss.

A like claim belongs to a woman against whom a crime or offence against morality is committed, or who is induced by fraud, or by threats, or by an abuse of a relation of dependence to permit illicit cohabitation.

§ 848. A person liable to restore an object of which he deprived another unlawfully is also liable if it perished accidentally, if its return has become impossible accidentally for any other reason, or if it deteriorated accidentally, unless the destruction, the impossibility to return it for other reasons, or its deterioration, would also have occurred if it had not been taken.

§ 849. If a party can claim damages because he was deprived of an object or because it had been damaged and has suffered in value, he can claim interest on the sum representing damages from the time which serves to determine its taking.

§ 850. Where the person liable to restore an object unlawfully withheld has incurred outlays in respect of that object, he is entitled, as against the injured party, to claim the same rights as the possessor of an object has against the owner for outlays incurred.

§ 851. If a person bound to make compensation for any damage on account of taking or damaging of a moveable compensates the person in whose possession the thing was at the time of the taking or damage, he is discharged by so doing even if a third party was owner of the thing, or had some other right in the thing, unless the right of the third party is known to him or remains unknown in consequence of gross negligence.

§ 852. (1) The claims for compensation for any damage arising from a delict is barred by prescription in three years from the time at which the injured party obtained knowledge of the injury and of the identity of the person liable to make compensation, and without regard to such knowledge in thirty years from doing the act.

(2) If negotiations are pending between the party liable and the party entitled to compensation with regard to the compensation, the running of the period of prescription is interrupted until one of the parties continues the negotiations.

(3) If the person liable has acquired anything by the delict at the expense of the injured party, he is, even after the running of the period of prescription, bound to return it under the provisions relating to the return of unjust enrichment.

§ 853. If by an illegal act a person acquires a contractual claim, the injured party may refuse to perform even if the time has passed for hearing the contractual claim.

4. OTHER RELEVANT PROVISIONS OF THE BGB

§ 31 The association is liable for any damage which the board, a member of the board, or other duly appointed representative may, in carrying out his duty, cause a third party, if the act obliges the making of compensation.

§ 226. The exercise of a right is inadmissible if it can only have the purpose of causing damage to another.

§ 227. An act required by self-defence is not unlawful.

Self-defence is that defence which is necessary in order to ward off from oneself or another an actual unlawful attack.

§ 228. Anyone who damages or destroys a thing belonging to another in order to ward off from himself or another a danger threatened by it, does not act unlawfully, if the damage or destruction is necessary to ward off the danger and the damage is not out of proportion to the danger. If the person acting is to blame for the danger, he is bound to make good the damage.

§ 229. Anyone who for purposes of self-help takes away, destroys, or damages a thing or for purposes of self-help apprehends an obligor suspected of intending flight or overcomes the resistance of the obligor to an act which the latter is bound to suffer, does not act unlawfully if the help of the authorities cannot be obtained in good time and there is danger that unless he acts at once the realisation of the claim will be frustrated or appreciably impeded.

§ 230. Self-help must not go further than is necessary to ward off the danger.

In case of the seizure of things, in so far as compulsory execution is not effected, leave to distrain must be applied for.

In case of the apprehension of the obligor, in so far as he is not set free again, leave for the precautionary detention of his person must be applied for to the District Court in whose district the apprehension has taken place; the obligor must be brought before the Court without delay.

If the application is delayed or rejected, the restitution of the things seized and the liberation of the person apprehended must follow without delay.

§ 231. Anyone who does one of the acts specified in § 229 under the mistaken assumption that the necessary presuppositions for the exclusion of illegality are in existence, is bound to compensate the other party, even if the mistake is not due to negligence.

§ 249. The person who is bound to make compensation must restore the situation which would exist if the circumstance making him liable to compensate had not occurred. If compensation is to be made for injury to a person or damage to a thing the creditor may demand, instead of restitution in kind, the sum of money necessary to effect such restitution.

§ 250. The creditor may by notice to the person liable to compensate, fix a reasonable period for the restitution in kind with a declaration that he will not accept restitution after the expiration of the period. After the expiration of the period, the creditor may demand the compensation in money if the restitution is not effected in due time; the claim for restitution is barred.

§ 251. If performance in kind is impossible or insufficient to compensate the creditor, the party obliged to provide reparation must do so in money.

The party obliged to provide reparation may do so by paying money only if performance in kind requires disproportionate expenditure. Expenditure incurred in healing an injured animal is not disproportionate for the reason alone that it exceeds its value considerably.

§ 252. The damage to be made good includes also lost profits. Profit is deemed to have been lost which would have been expected with probability according to the ordinary course of things, or according to the particular circumstances, in particular, according to the preparation and provisions made.

§ 253. For an injury which is not an injury to property compensation in money may be demanded only in the cases specified by law.

§ 254. If any fault of the injured party has contributed to the occurrence of the damage, the duty to compensate and the extent of the compensation to be made depend upon the circumstances, especially upon how far the injury has been caused predominantly by the one or the other party.

This applies also if the fault of the injured party was limited to omission to call the attention of the debtor to the danger of unusual serious damage, of which the debtor neither knew nor ought to have known, or to an omission to avert or mitigate the damage. The provision of § 278 applies mutatis mutandis.

§ 255. The person who is to make compensation for the loss of a thing or of a right is bound to make compensation only upon an assignment to him of the claims which belong to the person entitled to compensation by virtue of his ownership of the thing or by virtue of his right against third parties.

§ 276. The debtor is responsible, unless otherwise provided, for recklessness and negligence. A person who does not exercise the care expected in daily affairs acts negligently. The provisions of §§ 827 and 828 apply.

The debtor may not be released beforehand from responsibility for recklessness.

§ 277. The person who is answerable only for such care as he is accustomed to exercise in his own affairs is not relieved from liability for gross negligence.

§ 278. A debtor is responsible for the fault of his statutory agent, and of persons whom he employs in fulfilling his obligation, to the same extent as for his own fault. The provision of § 276 II does not apply.

Promise of performance for the benefit of a third party

§ 328. (1) A contract may stipulate for performance to a third party, so that the third party acquires a right to demand performance.

(2) In the absence of express stipulation it is to be deduced from the circumstances, especially from the object of the contract, whether the right of the third party shall arise forthwith or only under certain conditions, and whether any right shall be reserved to the contracting parties to take away or modify the right of the third party without his consent.

§ 329. If in a contract one party binds himself to satisfy a creditor of the other party without assuming the debt, it is not to be presumed, in case of doubt, that the creditor shall acquire a direct right to demand satisfaction from him.

§ 330. If, in a contract for life insurance or an annuity, payment of the insurance or annuity to a third party is stipulated for, it is to be presumed, in case of doubt, that the third party shall directly acquire the right to demand the performance. The same rule applies, if in a gratuitous transfer of property the duty to perform the act to a third party is imposed upon the recipient, or if a person, on taking over the whole of another person's property or goods, promises an act of performance to a third party for the purpose of settling the latter's debts.

§ 331. (1) If the performance to the third party is to be made after the death of the person to whom it was promised, in case of doubt the third party acquires the right to the performance upon the death of the promisee.

(2) If the promisee dies before the birth of the third party, the promise to perform to the third party can be revoked or altered only if the right to do so has been reserved.

§ 676. A person who gives advice or a recommendation to another is not bound to compensate for any damage arising from following the advice or the recommendation, without prejudice to his responsibility resulting from a contract or delict.

§ 803. The owner of a thing may deal with it in his discretion and exclude others from any interference, subject to the laws or to the rights of third parties.

§ 904. [Emergency] The owner of a thing is not entitled to prohibit the interference of another with the thing, if the interference is necessary for the avoidance of a present danger and the damage threatened is disproportionately great compared to the damage caused to the owner by the interference. The owner may demand compensation for the loss suffered by him.

§ 906. [Interference from adjacent land]

(1) The owner of a piece of land is not entitled to prohibit the intrusion of gases, vapours, smells, smoke, soot, heat, noises, shocks and similar interferences emanating from another piece of land to the extent that the interference does not or only immaterially prejudices the use of his piece of land.

(2) The same applies in so far as a substantial prejudice is caused by the use of another piece of land in conformity with local custom and it cannot be prevented by measures, the financing of which can be reasonably expected of users of this kind. If by virtue of this, the owner must tolerate an interference, he may demand from the user of the other piece of land an appropriate settlement in money, if by the interference in conformity with local custom the use of, or income from, his piece of land is prejudiced over and above the expected degree.

(3) The causing of intrusion through a special conduit is not permissible.

§ 907. [Works threatening prejudice]

(1) The owner of a piece of land may demand that on adjacent land no works be installed or maintained as to which it is to be foreseen with certainty, that their existence or use will result in an inadmissible interference with his piece of land. If a plant satisfies the provisions of the State law, which prescribe a certain distance from the boundary or other protective measures, the removal of the plant may not be demanded until the inadmissible interference actually results.

(2) Trees and bushes do not belong to works within the meaning of these provisions.

§ 1004. [Claims for removal and for injunction]

(1) If the ownership is interfered with otherwise than by dispossession or withholding of possession, the owner may demand from the disturber the removal of the interference. If further interference is to be apprehended, the owner may sue for an injunction.

(2) The claim is excluded, if the owner is obliged to tolerate the interference.

5. REFORM PROPOSALS CONCERNING SOME OF THE BGB PROVISIONS REPRODUCED ABOVE DATED 24 SEPTEMBER 2001

§ 249 (2) sentence 2 added

When an object is damaged, the necessary sum of money in accordance with sentence 1 only includes VAT if and in so far as it is actually incurred.

§ 253 (2) added

If compensation is to be made because of injury to the body, health, freedom or sexual self-determination, fair compensation in money can also be demanded for harm which is not economic if

1. the injury was caused intentionally or
2. the harm is not insubstantial having regard to its type and duration.

§ 825 amended

A person who induces another by deceit, threat or abuse of a relationship of dependence to undertake or suffer sexual acts is obliged to compensate him for the harm arising out of this.

§ 828 amended

(2) A person who has completed his seventh but not his tenth year is not responsible for the harm which he has inflicted on another in an accident with a motor vehicle, a railway or a suspension railway. This does not apply if he has caused the injury intentionally.

(3) A person who has not completed his eighteenth year is, in so far as his responsibility is not excluded under paragraphs 1 or 2, not responsible for the harm which he inflicts on another, if, on commission of the act causing the harm, he does not have the understanding necessary for recognition of responsibility.

New § 839a introduced (Liability of a forensic expert)

(1) If an expert nominated by the court submits an incorrect report intentionally or with gross negligence, he is under a duty to compensate for the harm which arises for a party to the proceedings through a court decision which is based on this report.

(2) § 839 para 3 is to be applied accordingly.

§ 847 BGB repealed (but see § 253 (2) as amended)

6. THE BGB-REFORM IN FORCE AS OF 1 JANUARY 2002*

§ 195. The regular period of limitation is three years.

§ 199. (1) The regular period of limitation starts from the end of the year in which

1. the claim arises and
2. the creditor obtains knowledge or but for his gross negligence ought to have obtained knowledge of the circumstances that found his claim as well as of the debtor's identity.

(2) The claims for damages arising from injury to life, body, health, or violation of freedom are time-barred irrespective of when the claim arises and the victim obtains, or with gross negligence fails to obtain, knowledge after thirty years from the time at which the wrongful conduct occurred, the duty was breached, or the other event occurred that caused the damage.

(3) Other claims for damages are time-barred

1. irrespective of whether the victim obtains, or with gross negligence fails to obtain, knowledge within ten years from the time at which the claim arises
2. irrespective of when the claim arises and the victim obtains, or with gross negligence fails to obtain, knowledge within thirty years from the time at which the wrongful conduct occurred, the duty was breached or the other event occurred that caused the damage. Whichever of these limitation periods is shorter, prevails. . . .

§ 241. (1) The effect of an obligation is that the creditor is entitled to claim performance from the debtor. The performance may consist of refraining from acting.

(2) Each party to the obligation may according to the content of the obligation be required to apply proper care as to the rights and interests of the other party.

§ 276. (1) The debtor is responsible for recklessness and negligence, unless a stricter or less strict liability is otherwise provided or is to be inferred from the content of the obligation, especially if the debtor guaranteed performance or undertook the risk of supply. The provisions of §§ 827 and 828 apply.

(2) A person who does not exercise the care expected in daily affairs acts negligently.

(3) The debtor may not be released beforehand from responsibility for recklessness.

§ 280. (1) If the debtor violates an obligation he is liable to the creditor for the damages arising therefrom. This does not apply, when the debtor did not act wilfully or negligently. . . .

§ 311. . . . (2) An obligation involving duties according to § 241 (2) may also arise by

1. entering into contractual negotiations,
2. establishing contacts with a potential contract partner which allow this partner to affect the rights or interests of the other party, or
3. similar business contacts.

(3) An obligation involving duties according to § 241 (2) may also arise with regard to persons who are not meant to become a party to the contract. Such duties arise especially where a third party claims special trustworthiness for itself and thereby considerably influences the contract negotiations or the conclusion of the contract.

§ 852. If the person liable has acquired anything by the delict at the expense of the injured party, he is, even after the expiry of the limitation period, bound to return it under the provisions relating to the return of unjust enrichment. This claim is time-barred in ten years from the time it arose, or irrespective of the time at which the claim arises in thirty years from the time at which the wrongful conduct occurred or the other event occurred that caused the damage.

* A selection of provisions from the BGB affecting some of the material discussed in this book as amended by the Gesetz zur Modernisierung des Schuldrechts of 26 November 2001, BGBI I, 3138.

7. SOME PRELIMINARY OBSERVATIONS ON THE BGB IN GENERAL AND THE DELICT PROVISIONS IN PARTICULAR

A. The German Parliament passed the German Civil Code (BGB) on 1 July 1896, and it was promulgated by the Emperor on 18 August of the same year. Its coming into force on 1 January 1900 not only marked the end of the long codification process which had commenced with the appointment of the first Commission on 2 July 1874, but more importantly it also completed the unification of the modern German State. This “unification process” was tortuous and convoluted. But the landmark dates are three. First, is 1843, when the German Customs Union abolished the “internal” customs regulations between the various German States while, at the same time, erecting a common tariff wall to protect the “internal” economy from foreign competition. Then comes 1871, when the German Empire was founded under the strong hand of Bismarck. The last stage (as far as the civil law is concerned) is 1900, the year when the BGB came into force ending the fragmentation of the legal system that existed until that date.

The extent to which German law was fragmented prior to the codification is rarely fully appreciated. A glance at contemporary maps of Germany would give one an approximate idea of the different systems applicable in Germany on the eve of codification. In reality, however, even this picture would be misleading for two reasons. First because it would convey the impression that there were five legal “systems” vying for superiority whereas, in fact, alongside these there were—according to a memorandum submitted to the Reichstag—a multitude of other “systems”, mostly hybrids of sorts. Secondly, maps showing the component parts of the German Empire might convey the impression that each “system” was limited to a particular “State” or locality, which was not the case. For example, the Prussian Code (Allgemeines Landrecht für die Preussischen Staaten)—enacted in 1794—applied to only seven of the eleven provinces of Prussia, but it also was in force in some parts of Bavaria and other localities of Germany linked with the Kingdom of Prussia. In fact in 1896, out of an estimated population of forty-two million, eighteen million lived under the Prussian Code. A further fourteen million were subject to the Common (mainly Roman) German law. Seven and a half million inhabitants were subjected to the Napoleonic Code, which was adopted in the Prussian Rhine Province, the Rhenish part of the Grand Duchy of Hesse, and the Bavarian Palatinate. Two and a half million lived under a Code enacted by the State of Saxony in 1863, and, finally, half a million more were subject to Scandinavian law. Voltaire’s quip, that in his time in France one changed one’s law as often as, when travelling, a man changed his horses, thus applied to Germany as well. The enactment of the Civil Code thus put an end to a confusing diversity of local law (Landesrecht e.g. the Bavarian and Prussian Codes), municipal law (Stadtrecht, e.g. Lübeck), customary law (Gewohnheitsrecht), French Code civil (applicable to the territories lying on the west side of the Rhine and Bade), and gemeines Recht which was the Roman law in those areas that had “received” it.

The picture of diversity was partly mitigated by the enactment, prior to codification, of a number of statutes, which applied to all the States. The Bill of Exchange Act (Allgemeine Deutsche Wechselordnung = ADWO) was the first such Act enacted by various States between 1848 and 1850 (following the Customs' Union of 1848). Others, dealing with such matters as criminal law, (Strafprozeßordnung), bankruptcy law, and commercial law (Allgemeines Deutsches Handelsgesetzbuch of 1861, replaced in 1900 by the Handelsgesetzbuch, many times updated and adapted since) followed and were later re-enacted as Imperial laws of the Reich.

Further reading

An account of German legal history and of the emergence of the West German State lies clearly outside the scope of this work. German legal history is usually taught either as part of constitutional history—usually called Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte—or focuses more on the institutions of private law and is called Deutsches Privatrecht. Fehr and Schwerin–Thieme have written treatises using the first title and their popularity and rich references have ensured successive editions. (Fehr's work is now in its 6th edn. (1962).) Mitteis–Lieberich have written on Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte, a work which is currently in its 19th edn. (1992). Hübner's Grundzüge des deutschen Privatrechts (1982) (reprint of 1930 edn.) was also translated into English in 1918 and appeared in the Continental Legal History Series under the title A History of Germanic Private Law. Other works on the subject have been written by: Coing, Epochen der Rechtsgeschichte in Deutschland (4th edn., 1981); Koebler, Rechtsgeschichte (4th edn., 1990); Kroeschell, Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte (I, 8th edn., 1987; II, 7th edn., 1989; III, 1st edn., 1989); Laufs, Rechtentwicklungen in Deutschland (5th edn., 1996); Schlosser, Grundzüge der neueren Privatrechtsgeschichte (8th edn., 1996); Wesenberg–Wesener, Neuere deutsche Rechtsgeschichte im Rahmen der europäischen Rechtentwicklung (4th edn., 1985) and last but by no means least the excellent work by Wieacker, Privatrechtsgeschichte der Neuzeit unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der deutschen Entwicklung (2nd edn., 1967). A more than adequate and very readable account in English of the development of modern European law can be found in von Mehren and Gordley, The Civil Law System (2nd edn., 1977) 3–96. For a more detailed account see: J P Dawson's classic The Oracles of the Law (1967). English accounts of the history of the codification can also be found in Schuster, "The German Civil Code" 12 LQR 17 (1896), Freund, "The New German Code", 13 Harv. L. Rev. 627 (1899–1900), Michael John's excellent Politics and the Law in Late Nineteenth-Century Germany (1989). This last work, however, may prove heavy going for those students who know little about 19th century German history. Mary Fulbrook's A Concise History of Germany (1990) offers to all "beginners" a most readable and informed introduction. For further references see also Zweigert and Kötz, An Introduction to Comparative Law (1998), para. 10, p. 132.

B. The BGB consists of 2,385 articles or, as they are more usually referred to, paragraphs. The BGB devotes thirty paragraphs (not including § 835 BGB which was repealed) to the law of torts—and they form the twenty-fifth title of the second book dealing with obligations. The term unerlaubte Handlungen is often used to cover the domain that Anglo-American lawyers would ascribe to "torts" but the term used precisely is best understood to cover faulty conduct (Verschuldenshaftung). The wider term Deliktsrecht probably covers better liability that is both based on fault (proved or presumed) and is strict. Contractual obligations, on the other hand, are covered by some 570 paragraphs (§§ 241–811 BGB) of which the first 191 (§§ 241–432 BGB) refer to problems common to all obligations. The remainder deal with specific contracts. They include sale and exchange (§§ 433–515 BGB), gift (§§ 516–34 BGB which, in the civil law systems, is regarded as a contract), lease (§§ 535–97 BGB), basic rules of labour law (§§ 611–30 BGB) and contract of labour and services (§§ 631 et seq., BGB) and others. The law of negotiorum gestio (Geschäftsführung ohne Auftrag) follows in §§ 677 BGB while unjustified enrichment (ungerechtfertigte Bereicherung) is regulated by §§ 812 ff BGB.

The thirty paragraphs devoted to the law of tort represent a marked difference from the five articles devoted to this matter by the French Civil Code (Articles 1382–6 CC). This more systematic treatment of a subject is symptomatic of the more exhaustive approach taken by German lawyers. It also reflects the fact that between 1804—the year of the enactment of the French Code—and 1900—the year when the BGB came into force—legal science had made great forward strides and had considered in detail problems which were non-existent or relatively unimportant during the early part of the nineteenth century. The treatment offered by the two Codes on other matters, besides torts, supports the accuracy of this observation. Unjustified enrichment, for example, receives no particular treatment in the French Code, but, as stated, has eleven articles dedicated to it by the BGB (§§ 812–22 BGB). Similarly, the problems of offer and acceptance have, in France, been worked out by the courts without any legislative guidance beyond the requirement that there be consent. The BGB by contrast devotes (cross-references not included) thirteen articles to this subject (§§ 145–57 BGB) though, naturally, the case law has added considerable flesh to these bones.

The fairly detailed regulation of tort law, however, also represents a compromise to a dispute, which divided the members of the codifying Commission. For the authors of the first draft had reached the conclusion that widely drafted provisions were necessary in order to achieve full protection against tortious conduct. The first draft of the BGB thus contained in its § 704 (1) a general clause, which in substance if not in its number of words came very close to the general provision of § 1382 of the Code civil. (This Article still differed from its French predecessor insofar as it made use of the notion of “unlawfulness” which German law had inherited from the Roman law notion of iniuria. More, below (at p. 79). Indeed, both the Prussian and Austrian Codes contained such general clauses so the technique was far from unknown to the German jurists. On the other hand, the more casuistic approach to tort law—well known to Common lawyers—was also the method adopted by Roman law and this, it must be recalled, formed part of the legal heritage of most of Germany. In addition, many felt that a general clause type of regulation of the matter would only transfer the burden from the shoulders of the legislator to those of the judges. This was disliked. But even more suspect was the open-ended case law that could be found in France and which was treated with great scepticism by the Germans. In the end, therefore, the Code finally opted for a compromise, adopting three general provisions—§§ 823 I, 823 II, and 826 BGB—and some specific provisions, which dealt with a number of rather narrowly defined tortious situations. Thus § 824 BGB deals with cases where untrue statements damage one’s credit. § 825 BGB imposes an obligation to pay compensation on anyone who has indecently induced a female person to have sexual intercourse with him. § 834 BGB deals with the liability of animal supervision; and § 836 BGB deals with liability to ruinous buildings, § 839 with the liability of public officials, etc. Such a mixture of the general with the particular was thus deemed the best compromise between the manifesto provisions of the French Civil Code and the pigeon hole approach derived from the English writ system.

A different and, perhaps, more meaningful way of dividing these tort provisions of the Code is as follows. One should first mention the provisions, which impose liability for fault. §§ 823 I and II, 824–6, 830, and 839 BGB come under this category and it should be stated immediately that (subject to the minor reservations given below) the Code system of liability is a system of fault-based liability. Then one should mention the provisions of the Code, which make liability depend on a rebuttable presumption of fault. §§ 831, 832, 833 (second sentence), 834, 836–8 BGB belong here. Thirdly, one should mention liability for created risks, independent of fault. A number of independent statutes deal with these situations, the most important being certain sections of the Strict Liability Act and the Road Traffic Act extracted below (chapter 3, section B. 3). Finally, in some cases one person is liable strictly but for some other person's fault. In the Common law of vicarious liability we find the best example. As we shall see, German law does not take this view; but various proposals for reform, if enacted, would place vicarious liability in this group. Certain provisions of strict liability statutes (e.g. § 3 of the Strict Liability Act) also fall into this category.

Three further preliminary points must also be made at this stage.

First, it must be stressed that the BGB is a typical product of the Pandectist scholarship, abstract, conceptual, and meticulous in the extreme. (For a more detailed sketch, see chapter one of volume one of this series.) It is a Code which addresses itself to lawyers—if not university professors—and thus lacks the vivacity and style of the French or Swiss Codes, though it is certainly superior to its French competitor when it comes to fullness, accuracy and consistency in the use of terms. Its influence has thus been felt in countries as far apart as Greece and Japan (to mention just two countries). This impact was largely because of the Code's intellectual power (which once led Maitland to describe it as “the best code the world has yet seen”) rather than to its immediate appeal to the people whose lives it is meant to regulate. But there were other reasons, as well. In Greece, for instance, the Roman law origins of the law were common to other countries; and it was reinforced since the Bavarian Royal family provided in the nineteenth century the first Kings of Greece.

The BGB's abstract conceptualism is immediately obvious in the first delict provision—§ 823 I BGB—where the cardinal notion of unlawfulness (Rechtswidrigkeit) has provoked rivers of ink to flow in an attempt to give it a precise meaning (see below, chapter 2, section A. 3). In fairness, however, one must equally state that the Common law notion of “duty of care” and the French notion of faute have given rise to similar difficulties in their respective countries. Later on, we shall thus stress that for the purposes of comparison these concepts should be down-played, where possible, and the lawyer should, instead, look for the functions they wish to fulfil.

Second, §§ 823 ff. BGB are not independent and self-sufficient provisions of the Code but must often be read in conjunction with other parts of it, particularly the general part of the law of obligations. Numerous such cross-references will be encountered in the pages that follow, but four important illustrations may be given at this stage.

The question of contributory negligence of the victim, which was the subject of considerable controversy in French law during the 1970s and 1980s (in particular the faute de la victime in the context of Article 1384 CC) is, essentially, regulated by § 254 I BGB. This makes the obligation to compensate the negligent plaintiff depend on how far the injury has been caused predominantly by the one or the other party (plaintiff/defendant).

Another illustration of this trend can be found in the interpretation of the troublesome concept of unlawfulness. This, according to one school of thought (see below, chapter 2, section A. 3), is satisfied whenever one of the interests enumerated by § 823 I BGB has been infringed in the absence of a legally recognised defence (Rechtfertigungsgrund). But to determine this one must, inter alia, look at §§ 227–31, 904 BGB and their interpretation by the case law.

A third illustration can be found in § 847 BGB, which allows monetary compensation for injuries to body or health or for the deprivation of liberty. The full significance of this paragraph can only be appreciated when it is realised that it forms an exception to the general rule enunciated in § 253 BGB which prohibits monetary compensation for harm which is not damage to pecuniary interests unless otherwise provided by the Code. As will be explained later on one of the difficulties to which these provisions give rise is whether § 847 BGB can be extended analogically to cover instances other than the ones which it expressly provides for in the light of the categorical phrasing of § 253. This, incidentally, can raise the acutely controversial problem as to whether judges can also make law and not merely interpret the Code. It will be discussed briefly in section 6 of this chapter and also in the section dealing with the judicially created right of privacy (see below, cases 39–49). Finally, to complete this brief list of illustrations, mention should be made of § 278 BGB which has been closely linked with many attempts to circumvent the unfortunate provision of § 831 (discussed in detail in chapter 3, below).

The final preliminary point is really a warning to the Common lawyer not to expect to find in the law of tort all the material included in his own tort courses. Defamation, for example, is primarily a crime, though it may also have tort consequences if used in conjunction with § 823 II BGB (see also the rather limited provision in § 824 BGB). Liability for failure to act to save another person who is in danger appears primarily in the law of crimes (§ 323c StGB but serves more of an “educational function” than any real need in every day life). More importantly, perhaps, trespass to land and nuisance are not normally included in the German law of tort, but in the German law of property—though they may also attract the operation of the law of tort.

History can explain this difference. Roman law—from which most of the Western European systems derive—was, as is well known, a system based on a set of actions and conveyances. But with the progress of time—certainly by the middle of the third century AD—the emphasis shifted steadily from the form of action to the cause of action and from there to the right which the plaintiff was wishing to enforce. As actions became subservient to the rights they were designed to enforce, they inevitably started to move away from the law of actions into the law of property or obligations. The law relating to the formation and extinction of contracts and the law of delict easily slid into the law of obligations. The actions that helped assert proprietary rights caused more difficulties. Yet there was no doubt that in the end these actions, having shed their substantive content and, as a law of mere procedure, being thrust outside the Civil Code, would go with property rather than obligations. Thus, when the civilians, and above all the natural lawyers, began to tackle the work of classifying the law, many parts of it went into quite different pigeonholes from those which are familiar to Common lawyers with their forms of action abolished only the day before yesterday. Common lawyers must thus be prepared to find much of their law of torts in the civil law of property; the same is also true of the extensions (by analogy) of the proprietary actions dealing with matters which a Common lawyer would expect to find in his law of tort. The tort of nuisance is one such example.

Rei vindicatio was the Roman form of action that helped to establish property rights. That its progenies in modern German (and French) law would be regarded as incidental to ownership and thus be dealt with in the property sections of the codes (the third book of the BGB) is easy to comprehend. The same is true of the actio confessoria which helped protect rights less than ownership such as easements and life interests, and the actio negatoria which was given to an owner who wished to assert the freedom of his land from an easement. But then came the extension in the medieval and modern law. For suppose your neighbour does not walk across your land under a claim to an easement, but merely sends fumes across your land or makes life unbearable by noise. Can he not then be said to be really claiming something in the nature of an easement to these things even though no such easement would be recognised by the law? On that fictitious reasoning you can claim the freedom of your land from his encroachment as if it had been an easement, and your action will be an actio quasi-negatoria, which will sound in property and not in delict. From the substantive point of view, what will be in issue will be the ambit of ownership, not the personal duty of your neighbour not to commit a delict of encroachment. Incidentally, this attitude of mind led German law and some of its derivatives to restrict the remedy, if no fault were proved in the neighbour, to a declaration or injunction. French and Swiss law, on the other hand, which do not take their classifications so seriously, have found it possible to award damages as well. But to Common lawyers this is the tort of nuisance and hence a tort, for we think instinctively, even now that we have got rid of the forms of actions, of the wrong rather than the right. To the Common lawyer, therefore, the civilian classification is not always easy to understand and one of his first tasks will be to learn how to jump over the barriers of classification, which his own system has adopted.

8. THE CONSTITUTIONALISATION OF PRIVATE LAW

Traditional comparatists have, on the whole, underplayed the importance of public law compared to private law. For at least half of this century this may have been understandable as far as the English comparatists are concerned. For they, like the rest of the English lawyers, were under the pervading influence of Dicey who, through his misunderstanding of the French scene, had stunted all interest in administrative law during the first half of the twentieth century. Yet, paradoxically, even the French comparatists were (and still are) primarily privatistes and one explanation for this must surely be found in the dominant belief of the day that the study of the civil codes lay at the core of the legal formation.

In recent times, however, interest in comparative public law has grown; and the impact that the constitutional law background has had on the development of private law is also attracting increased attention. The phenomenon is not limited to Germany. For example, students of American law are aware of the fact that in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan (376 US 254, 84 S. Ct. 710) the American common law of defamation yielded much ground to the constitutional requirement that free speech be safeguarded. (Attempts to extend these ideas to the area of products liability, e.g. defectively written manuals, have so far failed; but they are nonetheless indicative of the American tendency to constitutionalise much of the private law. On this see: Note, “Products Liability and the First Amendment” 59 Indiana LJ 503 (1984).) Similarly, Roe v. Wade (410 US 113, 93 S. Ct. 705 (1973)), by accepting that women had a constitutional right to choose to terminate their pregnancy, had an impact in other areas of tort law e.g., actions for wrongful birth. (Berman v. Allan 404 A. 2d 8; Procanik v. Cillo 97 NJ 339, 478 A. 2d 755, 1984.) For a doctor’s negligent failure to warn a pregnant woman of the fact that, say, she was infected by rubella during the critical months of pregnancy, deprived her of her right to abort. In turn, this justified the award of damages (initially for emotional suffering only) in an action for wrongful birth.

The constitutionalisation of the civil law has, if anything, been even more dramatic and influential in Germany—though not in this area of the law, probably because the Constitutional Court, itself, is divided on the issue. (See notes to cases 6–9.) But the growing impact of the Constitution on the private law of the land is a fact, so it is necessary to mention it, albeit briefly, even in a book devoted to the law of torts.

A principal aim of the Constitution of Bonn of 1949 (Basic Law—Grundgesetz) was to establish unequivocally the liberal, social, democratic order of the new state based on the principle of legality (Rechtsstaat). The memory of the national-socialist background, with its many attempts to discover and revive traditional Germanic values, had affected the law in almost all its aspects and was still alive well into the middle of the last century. So the framers of the Constitution, departing from the Weimar model, deliberately placed at the head of the constitutional text nineteen articles dealing with fundamental human rights (Grundrechte). (For the Nazi period see: Laufs, Rechtentwicklungen in Deutschland; Weinkauff and Wagner, Die deutsche Justiz und der National-Sozialismus (1968). Articles 1–19 are reproduced in the next sub-section, below.) These rights primarily protect the citizen in his various dealings with the state. To what extent do they also regulate the relations between individuals? This is the so-called problem of Drittwirkung der Grundrechte and some authors (including some courts, e.g. the Bundesarbeitsgericht) have favoured the direct application of these constitutionally proclaimed rights in the area of private law. See, for example BAGE 4, 240 (employees have constitutionally protected rights of free speech against employers). Likewise, BAGE 1, 258 (labour agreements providing for lower wages for women may be invalidated), and BAGE 4, 274, (agreement which gives the employer the right to terminate contract on marriage of his employee may be invalidated. For a more recent example see: BAGE 46, 98.) The Federal Labour Court has in many cases maintained this stance despite the Lüth decision of the Constitutional Court which, as is explained in the text, refused to follow the “direct applicability” theory primarily expounded by the author and judge Hans Carl Nipperdey. The prevailing view, however, espoused by the Bundesverfassungsgericht (its important Lüth decision is reproduced below as case 36) has opted for a theory of indirect influence first strongly advocated by the distinguished constitutional lawyer Günter Dürig in “Grundrechte und Zivilrechtssprechung”, Festschrift zum 75. Geburtstag von Hans Nawiasky (1956) 158 ff. According to this the basic rights form an “objective system of values” (objektive Wertordnung). This, via the medium of the general clauses of the BGB (e.g. §§ 134, 138, 242, 826, etc., (used and abused by the Nazis: Hedemann, Die Flucht in die Generalklauseln (1933); Adami, “Das Programm der NSDAP und die Rechtsprechung”, Deutsches Recht, 1939, 486), influences the private law. Thus, an injured party may, irrespective of nationality, by means of a constitutional appeal (Verfassungsbeschwerde wegen Grundrechtsverletzungen; Article 93 I, no. 4a, GG), complain of any direct and actual (unmittelbar und gegenwärtig) violation of his rights. Such a complaint will be received by the Constitutional Court only after all other remedies have been exhausted; and, if successful, it will lead to the annulment of the offending law, decree, or judgment. (During the first thirty years of the court’s life over 50,000 “requests” have been considered, the vast majority complaining about violations of fundamental rights.) Where, then, did this constitutionalisation of private law first manifest itself?

The answer must surely be first in the area of family law and then in a narrow but no less spectacular way in the creation of a general right of privacy. The latter creation will be considered in more detail in later sections of this book, so at this stage a few general observations will suffice.

What brought about the court revolution of the 1950s in the area of family law was the neglect of Article 117 of the Constitution of Bonn of 1949. This proclaimed that all legal norms (including those in the Civil Code) that were incompatible with the newly proclaimed equality of sexes (Article 3, II, GG) would have to be abolished by 31 March 1953. (On this see: Nipperdey, "Gleicher Lohn der Frau für gleiche Leistung. Ein Beitrag zur Auslegung der Grundrechte" in Recht der Arbeit, 1950, 121 et seq.) This, however, did not happen since—in Professor Rheinwein's words—"the politically dominant group [in the ruling Christian-Democratic party included] both Catholic and Protestant [believers] who tend[ed] to identify the Christian pattern of family and society with the ancient pattern of the patriarchal family and general male dominance. [And] they were not overly zealous to implement a command that happened to find expression in the Constitution". ("The Law of Family and Succession" in A. Yiannopoulos (ed.), Civil Law in the Modern World (1965) 25–57, reprinted in his Gesammelte Schriften (ed.), H. G. Leser) (1972) 212, 219–20.) The combined action of the Constitutional Court (BVerfG NJW 1954, 65; BVerfGE 3, 225) and the Federal Court (in its earlier advisory opinion of 6 September 1953, BGHZ 11, 34) were the catalysts to this change. For these courts declared §§ 1354 BGB (the final word on all matters concerning marriage, including residence and domicile, belongs to the husband except where he is abusing this right) to be incompatible with the idea of equality between sexes. They took the same view with regard to § 1387 BGB (husband bears certain litigation costs during marriage). Having "tasted blood" the courts went further and, in a manner which is unique in the modern civil law systems, they pushed the entire law of marriage into a state of legislative vacuum in which, one by one, they fashioned the rules that they deemed compatible with the Constitution. This first phase did not come to an end until the Gleichberechtigungsgesetz of 18 June 1957, BGBl. 1, 609 (Act Concerning Legal Equality of Men and Women in Matters of Private Law) came into force.

Yet old attitudes die slowly and even though the new Act improved, among other things, the property rights of women after divorce by introducing the system of "community of acquired benefits" (Zugewinnngemeinschaft), it left untouched other aspects of male predominance. For instance, the father's pre-eminent powers in the context of parental authority (old § 1627 BGB) still remained alive. But the Constitutional Court having won the first round of battles with the Bundestag, again forced a change in the law, this time through its decision of 29 July 1959 (BVerfGE 10, 59). This process of rejuvenation of German family law was, in a sense, completed by the decision of 29 January 1969 (BVerfGE 25, 157; FamRZ 1969, 196) where the complete equality of legitimate and illegitimate children was established. If anything, this was an even more remarkable result than the previous ones since in this case there was no time limit imposed by the Constitution on legislative reform, as there had been by Article 117 in the case of equality of the sexes. The intervention was, however, constitutionally inspired, based on Article 6 V, which required that legislation be passed to that effect.

A sketch of great judicial developments even as brief and as inadequate as the above, is bound to be crass. Yet it suffices to support the following statements. First, it shows that accounts (both by English and continental European lawyers) concerning case law in continental Europe and its significance in the development of the law hardly do justice to the subject. At best, they convey to a Common law reader a diminished picture of the role of the courts in the civil law system and confirm—tacitly at least—his misconception of civil law judges as law bureaucrats mechanically applying the Codes. Bureaucrats (in the sense of civil servants) they may be; automata deprived of will and vision they are not. Indeed, Article 132 of the Law Concerning Judicial Organisation expressly confers upon German judges a substantial power of judicial development of the law (richterliche Rechtsfortbildung) which is not (openly) matched in France and has hitherto received insufficient attention in the Common law world.

Secondly, the study of the case law itself gives the lie to the statement that the courts are not a creative source of law. Of course, this does not mean that the judge can create law by giving effect to his own personal views or considerations of expediency. Things, however, are different where the constitutional legislator has established a general and enforceable guiding principle (i.e. that of equality) as it did in Article 3 II of the Constitution. (Contrast with this, Article 109 of the Weimar Constitution.) In this case the legislator has, in effect, “transferred part of the law to be regulated by judicial decision” (BGHZ 11, 34). This is perfectly possible according to the Constitution which, though it gives the legislature a dominant position in the making of laws, it does not treat it as an exclusive one. According to the same decision “the doctrine of separation of powers which is constitutionally guaranteed is not violated whenever the judge is left to find the law within the parameters of a general norm” (such as that contained in Article 3 II). Indeed, the decision goes on, Article 117 I assumes that “as of 1 April 1953 the judge, through the gradual development of judge-formulated and accepted customary law, will progressively transform the general norms about equality into a more precise and generally binding set of rules”. And the court concludes this part of the judgment by openly admitting that the combined effect of the aforementioned articles of the Constitution is to “entrust it with the task of bringing about the [constitutionally desired] equality of sexes by means of a judge-made law in the Anglo-Saxon fashion”.

These are bold words and the court, itself, has on different occasions tried to disguise somewhat its creative role. But the disguise is thin at best, as the following statement of the Constitutional Court (taken from the development of the right of privacy) itself shows:

Occasionally, the law can be found outside the positive legal rules erected by the state; this is law which emanates from the entire constitutional order and which has as its purpose the “correction” of written law. It is for the judge to “discover” this law and through his opinions give it concrete effect. The Constitution does not restrict judges to apply statutes in their literary sense when deciding cases put before them. Such an approach assumes a basic completeness of statutory rules which is not attainable in practice . . . The insight of the judge may bring to light certain values of society . . . which are implicitly accepted by the constitutional order but which have received an insufficient expression in statutory texts. The judge’s decision can help realise such ideas and give effect to such values (BVerfGE 34, 269).

Thirdly, the product of these judicial interventions was original. In fact it was more than that. For many of the ideas are transplantable and, in some cases, have expressly been followed by legislative attempts to reform other systems which, like the English, have shown themselves to have been more conservative (backward some might say) in matters of family law. In English, good accounts of the constitutional background can be found in Koch’s A Constitutional History of Germany (1984) and Kommers’ The Constitutional Jurisprudence of the Federal Republic of Germany 2nd ed. (1996) and Currie, The German Constitution (1997). A basic introduction (in English) to the Drittwirkung doctrine can be found in Markesinis, “Privacy, Freedom of Speech and the Horizontality of the Human Rights Bill” 1998 Wilberforce Lecture, 115 (1999) LQR 47–88. See, also, Markesinis and Enchelmaier, “The Applicability of Human Rights as Between Individuals under German Constitutional Law” in Protecting Privacy, (1998) (ed. Basil Markesinis). (The English literature on Drittwirkung is growing with the passion which one finds in newly discovered pleasures. Yet, though impressively good at analysing the wording of the Human Rights Act of 1998 (on which any attempts to introduce the idea in English law will have to depend) this literature seems to be text-oriented and doctrinally poor when compared with the German. What, in particular, is missing from the contemporary English discussions is any theoretical consideration of the need to abandon the traditional conception of human rights as binding only on the State and extending human rights to regulate the activity of “others” who wield excessive power such as trade unions, multinational corporations, and the Press. Also lacking all discussions is consideration of the dangers which the abandonment of the traditional doctrine about human rights could have for other basic principles of the law such as freedom of contract. But if this discussion has been poor in England, this is not the case in other “common law/mixed systems” such as that of the modern State of Israel where the Germanic ideas and even language have made great inroads largely as a result of the fertile mind of Chief Justice Barak.)

But family law was not the only area of private law that succumbed to constitutional dictates. The law of defamation and the development of the protection for human privacy offer further evidence of the encroaching cohabitation. We need do no more than mention them here for two reasons. The first and most important is because these topics will receive detailed attention later on in this book. (See below, p. 74) But there is a second reason why the subject need not detain us further at this stage and that is easy to state. For though reputation and privacy are protected in private law against offending or invading speech, they both form part of the wider notion of human dignity; and dignity like speech belong primarily to the constitutional sphere. Seen in this light, the invasion of constitutional ideas into the sphere of private law seems less brutal. But, later in the next chapter we shall encounter a new right—the right of an established and operating business—which the German courts created from the early part of the twentieth century in order to offer greater protection to the proper and efficient functioning of commercial enterprises. Or more capitalist and private law concern there thus could not be. And when later, the German courts discovered that protecting the economic life of the enterprise could mean curtailing the expression rights of those who criticised it, they opted, as is their style, for a balancing exercise of competing interests that was in strict adherence to the purest dictates of the proportionality principle. (See the Konstanz decision of the BGH of 26 October 1951, BGHZ 3, 270, reproduced in translated form, case 34). Yet this approach changed and the constitutional idea of free speech began to gain momentum from the time the “Hellfire” decision of the BGH was handed down in 1966. (BGH 21 June 1966, BGHZ 45, 296.) Longer translated extracts of the case are reproduced in van Gerven, op. cit., at pp. 230–2. Here suffice to state one statement only where the Court tersely stated that “. . . the protection of personal legal interests must sometimes give way in order to secure the free discussion of important social issues.” The Court was thus taking a stand here, in the area of commercial interests, as it was later to take the same stand in the area of personality rights. (See the Greenpeace decision of the BGH of 12 October 1993, NJW 1994, 124.) And the position of principle was simply. “There was a presumption that speech prevailed if it represented a contribution to the free discussion of important social issues.” Many of the cases reproduced below in the privacy section of this book are thus replete with such statements giving the lie to those who argue that because Germany has an effective law of privacy it has down plaid speech rights. The result is a happy one; and we owe it to the cohabitation of private and public law.

9. THE HUMAN RIGHTS PROVISIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY OF 8 MAY 1949 (AS SUBSEQUENTLY AMENDED)

1. Basic Rights

Article 1 (Protection of human dignity)

(1) The dignity of man shall be inviolable. To respect and protect it shall be the duty of all state authority.

(2) The German people therefore acknowledge inviolable and inalienable human rights as the basis of every community, of peace and of justice in the world.

(3) The following basic rights shall bind the legislature, the executive, and the judiciary as directly enforceable law.

Article 2 (Rights of liberty)

(1) Everyone shall have the right to the free development of his personality in so far as he does not violate the rights of others or offend against the constitutional order or the moral code.

(2) Everyone shall have the right to life and to inviolability of his person. The liberty of the individual shall be inviolable. These rights may only be encroached upon pursuant to a law.

Article 3 (Equality before the law)

(1) All persons shall be equal before the law.

(2) Men and women shall have equal rights. The state shall promote the actual implementation of equal rights for women and men and take steps to eliminate disadvantages that now exist.

(3) No person shall be favoured or disfavoured because of sex, parentage, race, language, homeland and origin, faith, or religious or political opinions. No person shall be disfavoured because of disability.

Article 4 (Freedom of faith and creed)

(1) Freedom of faith, of conscience, and freedom to profess a religious or philosophical creed, shall be inviolable.

(2) The undisturbed practice of religion is guaranteed.

(3) No one may be compelled against his conscience to render military service involving the use of arms. Details shall be regulated by a federal law.

Article 5 (Freedom of expression)

(1) Everyone shall have the right freely to express and disseminate his opinion by speech, writing, and pictures and freely to inform himself from generally accessible sources. Freedom of the press and freedom of reporting by means of broadcasts and films shall be guaranteed. There shall be no censorship.

(2) These rights are limited by the provisions of the general laws, the provisions of law for the protection of youth, and by the right to inviolability of personal honour.

(3) Art and scholarship, research and teaching, shall be free. Freedom of teaching shall not absolve anyone from loyalty to the Constitution.

Article 6 (Marriage, Family, Illegitimate children)

(1) Marriage and family shall enjoy the special protection of the state.

(2) The care and upbringing of children are a natural right of, and a duty primarily incumbent on, the parents. The state shall watch over their endeavours in this respect.

(3) Children may not be separated from their families against the will of the persons entitled to bring them up, except pursuant to a law, if those so entitled fail or the children are otherwise threatened with neglect.

(4) Every mother shall be entitled to the protection and care of the community.

(5) Illegitimate children shall be provided by legislation with the same opportunities for their physical and spiritual development and their place in society as are enjoyed by legitimate children.

Article 7 (Education)

(1) The entire educational system shall be under the supervision of the state.

(2) The persons entitled to bring up a child shall have the right to decide whether it shall receive religious instruction.

(3) Religious instruction shall form part of the ordinary curriculum in state and municipal schools, except in secular (bekennnisfrei) schools. Without prejudice to the state's right of supervision, religious instruction shall be given in accordance with the tenets of the religious communities. No teacher may be obliged against his will to give religious instruction.

(4) The right to establish private schools is guaranteed. Private schools, as a substitute for state or municipal schools, shall require the approval of the state and shall be subject to the laws of the Land. Such approval must be given if private schools are not inferior to the state or municipal schools in their educational aims, their facilities, and the professional training of their teaching staff, and if segregation of pupils according to the means of the parents is not promoted thereby. Approval must be withheld if the economic and legal position of the teaching staff is not sufficiently assured.

(5) A private elementary school shall be permitted only if the education authority finds that it serves a special pedagogic interest, or if, on the application of persons entitled to bring up children, it is to be established as an inter-denominational or denominational or ideological school and a state or municipal elementary school of this type does not exist in the commun[ity] (Gemeinde).

(6) Preparatory schools (Vorschulen) shall remain abolished.

Article 8 (Freedom of assembly)

(1) All Germans shall have the right to assemble peaceably and unarmed without prior notification or permission.

(2) With regard to open-air meetings the right may be restricted by or pursuant to a law.

Article 9 (Freedom of association)

(1) All Germans shall have the right to form associations and societies.

(2) Associations, the purposes or activities of which conflict with criminal laws or which are directed against the constitutional order or the concept of international understanding, are prohibited.

(3) The right to form associations to safeguard and improve working and economic conditions is guaranteed to everyone and to all trades, occupations, and professions. Agreements which restrict or seek to impair this right shall be null and void; measures directed to this end shall be illegal. Measures taken pursuant to Article 12a, to paragraphs (2) and (3) of Article 35, to paragraph (4) of Article 87a, or to Article 91, may not be directed against any industrial conflicts engaged in by associations within the meaning of the first sentence of this paragraph in order to safeguard and improve working and economic conditions.

Article 10 (Privacy of posts and telecommunications)

(1) Privacy of posts and telecommunications shall be inviolable.

(2) This right may be restricted only pursuant to a law. Such law may lay down that the person affected shall not be informed of any such restriction if it serves to protect the free democratic basic order or the existence or security of the Federation or a Land, and that recourse to the courts shall be replaced by a review of the case by bodies and auxiliary bodies appointed by Parliament.

Article 11 (Freedom of movement)

(1) All Germans shall enjoy freedom of movement throughout the federal territory.

(2) This right may be restricted only by or pursuant to a law and only in cases in which an adequate basis of existence is lacking and special burdens would arise to the community as a result thereof, or in which such restriction is necessary to avert an imminent danger to the existence or the free democratic basic order of the Federation or a Land, to combat the danger of epidemics, to deal with natural disasters or particularly grave accidents, to protect young people from neglect or to prevent crime.

Article 12 (Right to choose trade, occupation, or profession)

(1) All Germans shall have the right freely to choose their trade, occupation, or profession, their place of work and their place of training. The practice of trades, occupations, and professions may be regulated by or pursuant to a law.

(2) No specific occupation may be imposed on any person except within the framework of a traditional compulsory public service that applies generally and equally to all.

(3) Forced labour may be imposed only on persons deprived of their liberty by court sentence.

Article 12a (Liability to military and other service)

Article 13 (Inviolability of the home)

(1) The home shall be inviolable.

(2) Searches may be ordered only by a judge or, in the event of danger in delay, by other organs as provided by law and may be carried out only in the form prescribed by law.

(3) If particular facts justify the suspicion that any person has committed an especially serious crime specifically defined by a law, technical means of acoustical surveillance of any home in which the suspect is supposedly staying may be employed pursuant to judicial order for the purposes of prosecution the offence, provided that alternative methods of investigating the matter would be disproportionately difficult or unproductive. The authorization shall be for a limited time. The order shall be issued by a panel composed of three judges. When time is of the essence, it may also be issued by a single judge.

(4) To avert acute dangers to public safety, especially dangers to life or to the public, technical means of surveillance of the home may be employed only pursuant to judicial order. When time is of the essence, such measures may also be ordered by other authorities designated by a law. A judicial decision shall subsequently be obtained without delay.

(5) If technical means are contemplated solely for the protection of persons officially deployed in a home, the measure may be ordered by an authority designated by a law. The information thereby obtained may be otherwise used only for purposes of criminal prosecution or to avert danger and only if the legality of the measure has been previously determined by a judge; when time is of the essence, a judicial decision shall subsequently be obtained without delay.

(6) The Federal Government shall report to the Bundestag annually as to the employment of technical means pursuant to paragraph (3) and, within the jurisdiction of the federation, pursuant to paragraph (4) and, insofar as judicial approval is required, pursuant to paragraph (5) of this Article. A panel elected by the Bundestag shall exercise parliamentary control on the basis of this report. A comparable parliamentary control shall be afforded by the Länder.

(7) Interferences and restrictions shall otherwise only be permissible to avert a danger to the public or to the life of an individual, or, pursuant to a law, to confront an acute danger to public safety and order, in particular to relieve a housing shortage, to combat the danger of an epidemic, or to protect young persons at risk.

Article 14 (Property, Right of inheritance, Expropriation)

(1) Property and the right of inheritance are guaranteed. Their content and limits shall be determined by the laws.

(2) Property imposes duties. Its use should also serve the public weal.

(3) Expropriation shall be permitted only in the public weal. It may be effected only by or pursuant to a law which shall provide for the nature and extent of the compensation. Such compensation shall be determined by establishing an equitable balance between the public interest and the interests of those affected. In case of dispute regarding the amount of compensation, recourse may be had to the ordinary courts.

Article 15 (Socialisation)

Land, natural resources, and means of production may for the purpose of socialisation be transferred to public ownership or other forms of publicly controlled economy by a law which shall provide for the nature and extent of compensation; the third and fourth sentences of paragraph (3) of Article 14 shall apply mutatis mutandis.

Article 16 (Deprivation of citizenship, Extradition)

(1) No one may be deprived of his German citizenship. Loss of citizenship may arise only pursuant to a law, and against the will of the person affected only if such person does not thereby become stateless.

(2) No German may be extradited to a foreign country.

Article 16a (Right of Asylum)Article 17 (Right of petition)

Everyone shall have the right individually or jointly with others to address written requests or complaints to the appropriate agencies and to parliamentary bodies.

Article 17a (Restriction of basic rights for members of the Armed Forces etc.)

(1) Laws concerning military service and substitute service may, by provisions applying to members of the Armed Forces and of substitute services during their period of military or substitute service, restrict the basic right freely to express and to disseminate opinions by speech, writing, and pictures (first half-sentence of paragraph (1) of Article 5), the basic right of assembly (Article 8), and the right of petition (Article 17) in so far as this right permits the submission of requests or complaints jointly with others.

(2) Laws for defence purposes including the protection of the civilian population may provide for the restriction of the basic rights of freedom of movement (Article 11) and inviolability of the home (Article 13).

Article 18 (Forfeiture of basic rights)

Whoever abuses freedom of expression of opinion, in particular freedom of the press [paragraph (1) of Article 5], freedom of teaching [paragraph (3) of Article 5], freedom of assembly [Article 8], freedom of association [Article 9], privacy of posts and telecommunications [Article 10], property [Article 14], or the right of asylum [paragraph (2) of Article 16] in order to attack the free democratic basic order, shall forfeit these basic rights. Such forfeiture and the extent thereof shall be pronounced by the Federal Constitutional Court.

Article 19 (Restriction of basic rights)

(1) In so far as a basic right may, under this Basic Law, be restricted by or pursuant to a law, such law must apply generally and not solely to an individual case. Furthermore, such law must name the basic right, indicating the Article concerned.

(2) In no case may the essential content of a basic right be encroached upon.

(3) The basic rights shall apply also to domestic juristic persons to the extent that the nature of such rights permits.

(4) Should any person's right be violated by public authority, recourse to the court shall be open to him. If jurisdiction is not specified, recourse shall be to the ordinary courts. The second sentence of paragraph (2) of Article 10 shall not be affected by the provisions of this paragraph.

10. AMENDING THE CODE

Legal systems which adopt Codes, especially codifications of private law, treat them with great respect. Hierarchically, a Code stands below the country's constitution but no higher than any other piece of ordinary legislation. But in the national psyche it occupies a special place; and can even be seen as one of the country's symbols. There are many reasons for this. First, a code is the product of wide consultation and, invariably, a long—or very long as is the case with the BGB—period of gestation. It is thus not seen as an embodiment of the party political will of the government that enacted it. Secondly, it attempts to provide a comprehensive regulation of the area of the law that it is codifying and, usually, this demands much effort to achieve consistency among its various parts. This was certainly true in the case of the German Civil Code and, in turn, made it difficult to tamper with one part of it without affecting others. In this book we shall thus encounter many situations where the tort answers are inter-related with positions adopted in other parts of the Code such as its General Part or its Family or Property law. Thirdly, through its language the code should be able to perceive and address problems in a broad way, thus making judicial development and adaptation of its text possible. Again, we shall encounter in the chapters that follow many examples of this even though at times the interpretation of a text borders upon a complete rejection of what the draftsmen had in mind. Fourthly, the German Code also facilitated its organic growth through its general clauses—such as the famous §§ 242 or 826 BGB—which gave judges even more room for creative work than the bulk of its provisions normally allow. All these attributes have enabled the German Code to withstand fairly successfully the enormous social, political, and economic challenges that confronted it throughout the twentieth century. This, however, does not mean that legislative amendments to its text did not also take place.

This is no place to discuss the precise form that they took. Thus, in some cases, individual provisions of the Code were either removed, amended, or new ones put in their place. (E.g. §§ 13, 14, 355–359 BGB, concerning consumer protection). In other cases, lengthier amendments/innovations were made and introduced into the Code (e.g. 651a–651l BGB, travel contract) while in yet others a new regime was created, governing a particular legal problem, but took the form of a statute that stood alongside the Code. An important example of proceeding in this way is found in the Law of General Conditions of Business. This enactment, which largely codified existing judge-made law, was probably kept outside the main framework of the Code because the legislature was anxious to enact it quickly and felt it unwise to wait for the longer process that would be involved if it tried to tamper with the text of the Code, itself. However, recently this enactment was incorporated into the code (§§ 305–310 BGB). For our purposes, a more relevant example can be found in the many strict liability statutes which are discussed below in chapter four. Here, however, one reason why this “new” material was kept outside the Code was because the view prevailed that the codal regime should remain consistent with the notion of fault-based liability. Yet in another group of cases, the Courts struck the first blow invalidating large parts of the 1900 Code as being incompatible to the new and hierarchically superior Constitution of 1949. This, as we noted earlier on, was the case with large parts of the family book of the Code until the legislator himself re-drafted it in the mid 1970s. As this book is about to go to print, we are experiencing changes in the law of obligations. The main impetus for reform is the Council Directive 1999/44 on Certain Aspects of the Sale of Consumer Goods and Associated Guarantees. However, the implementation of this directive forms part of a more comprehensive reform of the German law of obligations (Gesetz zur Modernisierung des schuedrechts, extracts are reproduced above, 6). The reform affects tort law only marginally. The reader should note, however, the following three points. First, the limitation period for tort claims remains three years (§ 195 BGB), though its starting point is slightly altered (compare the old § 852 with § 199 I). § 199 II and III BGB now contain objective maximum periods of limitation. Secondly, § 280 BGB introduces a common remedy of damages for irregularities of performance; the burden of proof as to the debtor's fault is placed on him. Thirdly, a number of concepts developed by case-law have now been included in the Code. For instance, § 311 II BGB incorporates the idea of culpa in contrahendo into the code, while § 311 III deals with obligations arising in relation to strangers to the contract. Noteworthy is sentence 2 of § 311 III which mentions the factor of reliance. This may acquire particular relevance in "negligent misstatements" cases. (For a fuller discussion see pp. 59 ff., and notes to cases 19–24.) Yet, in assessing the impact of the reform one should bear in mind that the new texts show signs of the doctrinal disputes that must have taken place between the various members of the drafting committee. With respect, however, they also leave a fair number of points open to further discussion—a bait which the German academic world will, no doubt, be quick to take. Our prediction thus is that it will take years before the full meaning of the reformed provisions becomes clear by court decisions. (For a fuller discussion in English of this part of the law, imminently to be reformed, see Markesinis et al, The German Law of Contract and Restitution, (1997) chapter 6. From the abundant material on the highly controversial reform see for instance: Honsell, "Die EU-Richtlinie über den Verbrauchsgüterkauf und ihre Umsetzung in deutsches Recht", JZ 2001, 278; Heldrich, "Ein zeitgemäßes Gesicht für unser Schuldrecht" NJW 2001, 2521; and the papers of Professors W.-H. Roth, Ulmer, Canaris, Westermann, H. Roth, and Leenen in issue no. 10 of the Juristenzeitung 2001; all with further references).

From the perspective of tort law it suffices here to mention briefly one possible consequence of the reform. In chapter 2 section B.16 (cases 68–72) we will give examples from the jurisprudence of the BGH, in which damage to the product itself was regarded as physical damage to property within the meaning of § 823 I BGB (so called: Weiterfresserschaden). The advantage of tort in this area is the relatively long limitation period contained in § 852 I BGB, now § 195 BGB (three years). The specific criteria developed in order to decide when a buyer could rely on § 823 I BGB and avoid the short limitation period of § 477 I BGB (six month) have given rise to intricate and prolonged debates among academics as well as practitioners. (See notes to cases 68–75.) The reform entails a convergence of the limitation periods (contracts of sale: now two years compared to six month under the old § 477 BGB) and thus reduces the practical relevance of this issue. At least this is what the drafters hope to achieve. (Contrast Dr. Geiger's account in JZ 2001, 474 with the more sceptical views of Professor Zimmermann et al in JZ 2001, 684, 692). In England the parallel "complex structure theory" emerged in the context of interferences with buildings, not chattels, and was finally abandoned in Murphy v. Brentwood DC [1991] 1 AC 398. Recently, the BGH, 12 December 2000, NJW 2001, 1346, took a step in the opposite direction. It confirmed that the concept of Weiterfresserschaden stemming from the area of product liability could in principle also apply to buildings and their components. This is not to say, however, that problems of distinguishing damage to "components" of products from damage to "other property" than the product itself do not arise in English law in the area of product liability. (See Tettenborn, "Components and Product Liability: Damage to 'Other Property'", [2000] LMCLQ 338.)

Other proposed reforms will affect areas of the law of tort more directly and these we shall mention in the appropriate section of this book. But these tort-related reforms have not thus far received the same degree of attention as the ones previously mentioned. On the contrary, at the time of writing they are still at the stage of Regienurgsentung entous. (See, above, 5, and p. 820, below.) The account that will thus be given in the appropriate parts of the text must not be assumed to describe the new law but only give an indication of the re-orientation which is currently thought to be desirable.

11. BIBLIOGRAPHICAL SURVEY

The literature of the German law of torts is vast and growing faster than ever. For present purposes we can ignore references to classic works such as Enneccerus and Lehmann, Recht der Schuldverhältnisse (1958). However, for the sake of relative completeness three standard treatises must be mentioned: Staudinger's multi-volume Kommentar zum Bürgerlichen Gesetzbuch—Recht der Schuldverhältnisse II, §§ 823–825 (13th edn., 1999); §§ 826–829 (13th edn., 1998); §§ 830–838 (13th edn., 1997); §§ 839–853 (12th edn., 1986); Palandt's Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch (60th edn., 2001), and the newer but highly regarded Münchener Kommentar zum Bürgerlichen Gesetzbuch—Schuldrecht (Special part) 5, §§ 705–853 (3rd edn., 1997). All these are, essentially, reference works which, because of their frequent citations of the case-law, present a particular appeal to practitioners.

More academically oriented, but by no means less authoritative, are five excellent works: Larenz, Lehrbuch des Schuldrechts I (General part, 14th edn., 1987), II (Special part, first vol., 13th edn., 1986; second volume containing the law of torts, continued by Canaris, is in its 14th edn., 1994); Esser/Schmidt Schuldrecht (General part, first volume, 8th edn., 1995, second volume, 8th edn., 2000); Esser/Weyers, Schuldrecht (Special part, first volume, 8th edn. 1998, second volume containing the law of torts, 8th edn., 2000); Deutsch, Allgemeines Haftungsrecht (2nd edn., 1996); Fikentscher, Schuldrecht (9th edn., 1997).

Larenz's book is the classic post-war work on the subject, and its author, whose Methodenlehre der Rechtswissenschaft (6th edn. 1991) can also be usefully consulted, has justly enjoyed a great reputation in Germany. Esser/Weyer's work is no less erudite than Larenz's and often gives a different approach to problems of tortious liability; but, to foreign readers at any rate, it may appear more difficult to follow. Deutsch's book is a comparative newcomer in this class of books, but has had considerable impact on both the academic and judicial world. It contains in particular excellent accounts of such topics as "unlawfulness" and "culpability" on which the author had earlier written a notable Habilitation (Fahrlässigkeit und erforderliche Sorgfalt, 1963). The same author has entered the short textbook market also with his informative Unerlaubte Handlungen, Schadensersatz und Schmerzensgeld (4th edn., 2000). Other valuable works in this category include: Schlechtriem Schuldrecht II (Special part, 5th edn. 1998), Brüggemeier Deliktsrecht (1986).

Because of their smaller size Medicus's Schuldrecht II (Special part, 9th edn., 1999) (but see also his Bürgerliches Recht (18th edn., 1999)), and Kötz's Deliktsrecht (9th edn., 2001; together with Wagner) would probably be described by an American readership as "small-horn" books. Their size, however, should in no way detract from their great value; nor does it hide the indisputable scholarship of their authors. Medicus's work is a masterpiece of conciseness which, despite its size, does not eschew difficult or controversial points and often gives the author's own trenchant criticisms of the law. Multum in parvo aptly describes this work. Kötz's book is equally informative, and for a foreign reader even more readable than that of Medicus. Moreover, its author often uses his considerable comparative expertise to criticise in a stimulating and policy-orientated manner the positive law. The present work has been greatly influenced both in content and arrangement of material by these two excellent short books. Finally, from the growing literature that adopts the economic analysis of law, see Adams, Ökonomische Analyse der Gefährdungs- und Verschuldenshaftung (1985).

The periodic literature on the subject is enormous and references to it as well as to leading monographs will appear at the head of various sections of this book as well as in its footnotes. However, one work in particular must be singled out: it is von Caemmerer's “Wandlungen des Deliktsrechts” in Hundert Jahre deutsches Rechtsleben, Festschrift zum hundertjährigen Bestehen des Deutschen Juristentages, 1860–1960 (1960), reprinted in his Gesammelte Schriften (Collected Works) (1968) 452 ff. A long Article rather than a book, this masterly account of the changes in the law of delict brought about by the courts gives a general view of the whole law of civil responsibility. Von Caemmerer’s influence on German delict law is probably unparalleled in our times and, in a sense, it is all the more remarkable since it has been exercised through learned articles rather than a fully fledged treatise—a form of writing so appreciated by the German legal mind.

The English literature on the subject is, on the whole, very poor. The most updated translation of the text of the Code (BGB) is by Forrester, Goren, and Ilgen entitled The German Civil Code (1975) (with an up-to-date supplement published in 1981), while certain portions of the BGB have also been included in translated form in Lawson and Markesinis, Tortious Liability for Unintentional Harm in the Common Law and the Civil Law, 2 vols. (1982) and von Mehren and Gordley, The Civil Law System (2nd edn., 1977).

Until recently English-speaking readers had to content themselves with two books: Rayan’s An Introduction to the Civil Law (1962) (dealing with French and German law) and Cohn’s Manual of German Law, 2 vols. (1968, 1971). Though the latter was in many respects the more satisfactory of the two, they were both elementary, their aim being to give the general reader some knowledge of the German legal system as a whole rather than to provide him with a detailed knowledge of a single branch of German law or supply him with further aids for research. They also make little or no use of the rich case-law. More recently, another introductory book has appeared written by Professors Horn, Kötz, and Leser. It is entitled German Private and Commercial Law: An Introduction (1982) and despite some shortcomings (see this author’s review in [1982] Cambridge Law Journal 360) it is in many respects a useful book which will, no doubt, be greatly appreciated by the complete beginner. But its delict section (chapter 9) is largely based on §§ 17–20 of Zweigert and Kötz’s An Introduction to Comparative Law and if the reader has a choice of reading either of these books, he is advised to use the latter rather than the former work. Nigel Foster’s recent German Law and Legal System (1993) is the latest book about German law written in English which, in a mere 336 pages provides a brief but good introduction to the entire legal system.

At a more sophisticated level mention should be made of six works. First and foremost is vol. XI of the International Encyclopaedia of Comparative Law edited by Professor A Tunc. Some of the leading authorities on the subject have collaborated to produce a book, which, though its parts are uneven in some respects, represents a work of great erudition and a veritable mine of information, though it is rapidly becoming out of date.

The second work that must be singled out here is Zweigert and Kötz, An Introduction to Comparative Law (3rd edn., 1998). Superbly translated into English by Tony Weir, it achieves a closely-knit exposition of the American, English, French, and German law of contract and tort and is indisputably one of the masterpieces of comparative law literature.

Von Mehren and Gordley, The Civil Law System (2nd edn., 1977) is the third significant work in this field. A selection of translated cases, accompanied by other supporting material and the authors’ own pertinent commentary, has for many years made this work the ideal book for the comparative study of the law—especially for American law schools which are accustomed to operate through case-books.

Lawson and Markesinis, Tortious Liability for Unintentional Harm in the Common Law and Civil Law, 2 vols. (1982) should, perhaps, also be added to this section of the bibliography. Though by no means a textbook in the usual format taken by this species of legal works, it is a work essentially for law students. Its main aim is to attempt a “thematic” exposition of certain problems of the law of torts in America, England, France, and Germany and to single out the similarities rather than the differences that exist between these four legal systems. Each chapter of vol. I contains extensive bibliographical references and vol. II provides a selection of materials (mainly French and German cases). It can be used either on its own or as a “companion volume” to vol. I.

Walter van Gerven’s Tort Law (full title: Cases, Materials and Text on National, Supranational and International Tort Law) 2nd edn. published in 2000 must also be mentioned here. As the title suggests, this is a casebook, accompanied by lengthy and often perceptive annotations. The unusual feature of this book is that it does not limit its scope to German law but includes approximately equal number of references to French law and a somewhat small number of extracts to other European systems.

Finally, we must mention Professor Christian von Bar’s massive Common European Law of Tort, 2 vols (English text, 1999 and 2000). This remarkable work, the fruit of a collective research effort under the guidance and leadership of Professor von Bar, is likely to be of more use as a reference work than a classroom tool.

More specialised literature in English on German law is referred to in various sections of this book. A full list can be found in the impressive work that Professor Szladits has for many years now been conducting for the Parker School in New York. It is published periodically under the title A Bibliography of Foreign and Comparative Law. Finally, references to Anglo-American law can be found in the introductory sections of each chapter but especially in the notes that accompany the translated German judgments.

Liability under § 823 I BGB

SECTION A. COMMENTARY

1. INTRODUCTORY REMARKS

AMONG the three general provisions of the BGB—§§ 823 I, 823 II, and 826—§ 823 I has, traditionally, been accorded a special pre-eminence even though we shall see that § 823 II BGB is nowadays considered as a close rival, and for some writers, has an even wider potential ambit. Compared with § 826 BGB, § 823 I BGB is both wider and narrower. It is “objectively” narrower, in so far as it can be invoked only if one of the enumerated interests (discussed below) has been violated, whereas there is no such limitation with § 826 BGB. In practical terms, the “kind of harm” which is not protected by § 823 I BGB is economic loss (unless it results out of the violation of the interests and rights protected by § 823 I BGB; i.e. unless it is consequential upon physical damage or it follows from the violation of intellectual property rights, the right to free movement etc.), whereas claims for economic loss are the most usual claims brought under § 826 BGB. § 823 I BGB is, however, “subjectively” wider than § 826 BGB in so far as it covers intention as well as negligence, whereas § 826 BGB is limited to intentional activities which, in addition, must be contra bonos mores. On the other hand, the ambit of § 823 II BGB is made to depend on the notion of “protective law” (Schutzgesetz). Its effect is to give rise to civil liability in the event of a violation of some statute or other enactment—usually of a criminal nature—if this enactment is a “protective law” in the sense that will be explained below. The only additional requirement introduced by this section is that if the protective law in question imposes liability irrespective of fault, additional civil liability will not be engendered unless the defendant was also guilty of fault. (See chapter 4, below.)

For an action to be based on § 823 I BGB the following requirements must be satisfied. First there must be a violation through human conduct of one of the enumerated rights (Rechte) or interests (Rechtsgüter), namely, life, body, health, freedom, property, or any “other right” (sonstiges Recht). The use of these concepts allows German law to restrict liability from the very outset in a clear and manageable manner. In essence, therefore, this approach does for German law what the notion of duty of care does for the Common law though it is done in a pre-determined (and thus arguably clearer) manner. Secondly, this interference must be unlawful (Rechtswidrigkeit). Thirdly, it must be culpable (intentional or negligent). Finally, there must be a causal link between the defendant’s conduct (which can be an act or an omission) and the plaintiff’s harm as defined by this paragraph. We shall examine these four elements in turn.

(a) Life

Interference with “life” here means killing a person, in which case the claim for compensation rests with third parties, their claim being based on §§ 844–6 BGB (see below). This, of course, is principally the action which an English Common lawyer would describe as the fatal accident action and American lawyers would consider under their Wrongful Death Statutes. It is, in other words, the new action given by statute both in Anglo-American law (since it was never recognised by the Common law) and the German Code (§ 844 BGB) to the “dependants” of the deceased (primary) victim for their loss of dependency. (Reimbursement of funeral expenses (Beerdigungskosten) by whomsoever has legally incurred them is also available.) The question of the deceased’s own action—to be brought by his estate—is, of course, another matter and one which—in the civil law systems in general—is related to the part of the law which deals with succession or the administration of the estates. However, the delict section of the Code does contain one provision, which is relevant to this matter. It is § 847 I BGB, which, principally deals with monetary compensation for pain and suffering for living plaintiffs (and thus forms a clear legislative exception to the restrictive § 253 BGB). But it also allows such a claim to be brought by the plaintiff's estate for the deceased's pain and suffering, suffered between accident and death. But, unlike other systems (e.g. French law, the USA under the headings of loss of consortium etc.), German law gives no damages for solatium, bereavement, or other forms of pain and suffering to the deceased's dependants.

§§ 844–6 BGB deal, as stated, with the new action given to the victim's "dependants". They are discussed in greater detail in chapter 4, below. The reader is urged to read (if not study) this material at an early stage so that the (relevant) points made in this section are fleshed out in a more satisfactory way. For present purposes, it will suffice to note that § 844 II BGB specifies the "dependants" by reference to those persons whom the deceased would have been "obliged to support by law" (kraft Gesetzes unterhaltspflichtig). Who these people are can be found in the family law section of the BGB. They, obviously, include spouses and minor children (§§ 1360, 1602 BGB), all ascendants in the direct line (§ 1601 BGB) and (in certain circumstances) even separated (§ 1361 BGB) and divorced spouses (§§ 1569 ff. BGB), subject always to the detailed provisions contained in the family law book of the BGB. In his meticulousness, the German legislator has also provided at the end of § 844 II BGB that a child conceived but unborn at the time of the injury is not excluded as a potential claimant.

(b) Body and health

These headings cover any adverse interference with the person without consent (which is discussed below at pp. 536 ff.). Terminological precision has, again, dictated the use of two words—the first signifying any interference with the body of the plaintiff, such as severing his finger, breaking his leg, or external abrasions of the kind typically found in car accident cases. Interference with the plaintiff's health, on the other hand, refers to externally provoked malfunctions of his inner body. Internal infections, gastro-enteritis, bacterial infection, inhalation of poisonous fumes, etc. would come in this category as, might in appropriate circumstances, loss of sleep. (On this possibility see: BGH 25 September 1970, MDR 1971, 37: noise from neighbouring land preventing plaintiff from sleeping.) Psychological disturbances that we would classify under the heading of psychiatric injuries would also be brought under this heading though not, of course, mere pain, grief and suffering. Under this heading, the BGH has also held that the transmission of the aids virus constitutes an injury to health even when it has not yet developed into AIDS. Rendering the plaintiff HIV positive is thus actionable under the heading of interference with health even though the infection has "not apparently affected the plaintiff's physical condition". "For the contamination of blood with HIV is known to have devastating consequences for the person affected and those who come in close contact with him . . .". (BGH 30 April 1991, NJW 1991, 1948). In all these instances, the interference must emanate from a source external to the plaintiff. Nevertheless, even when this requirement is satisfied, the full extent of the plaintiff's hurt may be partly attributable to the external factors and partly linked with his own constitution or predisposition as, for example, some kind of dormant cancer. Whether this result, as well, can be attributed to the defendant's conduct is a question of legal cause and will be discussed in § 5, below.

In German law (as in other systems) physical injury is widely compensated. In The Hua Lien ([1991] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 309, 328–9) Lord Brandon maintained that "in most claims in respect of physical damage to property [and, one might add, personal injury] the question of the existence of a duty of care does not give rise to any problem, because it is self-evident that such a duty exists and the contrary view is unarguable." This "duty" language may not be entirely appropriate to German law, but the general idea expressed by the statement is as true of German law as it is of English and American law. In this spirit of generosity, the BGH has since 1993 also treated the accidental destruction of frozen sperm deposited in a "sperm bank" as amounting to physical harm. It thus awarded to the donor who had deposited the sperm in the bank in the light of his impending sterility damages worth DM 25,000 for pain and suffering (BGH 9 November 1993, NJW 1994, 127 = JZ 1994, 464.) The judgment held that parts of a human body, once detached from it, can be treated for the purposes of tort law as "things". But if they are destined to be "re-introduced into the body" or perform a function typically ascribed to the human body, then interference with them should be treated as interference with the human body for the purposes of § 823 I BGB. Understandably, the decision, reversing a contrary decision of the Court of Appeal, has not passed without comment. (See: Laufs, "Schmerzensgeld wegen schuldhafter Vernichtung deponierten Spermias?", NJW 1994, 775.) Nonetheless, it is a remarkable proof of judicial inventiveness when faced with the problems that result from new medical technology. (The case is translated in van Gerven, pp. 147–9.)

To the above possibilities for compensation arising from the "ordinary" regime one must now also add specific statutory regimes such as the AIDS Act of 24 July 1995 (Gesetz über die humanitäre Hilfe für durch Blutprodukte HIV-infizierte Personen). The earlier French statute—Loi 91—1406 of 31 December 1991—dealing with this problem is briefly discussed in English by van Gerven, Cases, Materials and Texts, op cit., pp. 629 ff. Though the reason behind these enactments is the same in both countries, the way they have handled the problem is different so the comparison of the two regimes offers an interesting comparative exercise. In both systems, the question of the inter-relationship of these new, special regimes and the ordinary, tort rules can raise delicate questions. The same points can, incidentally, be raised of the traffic accident regimes of both of these countries. The relevant German Act is discussed below at p. 728). To deal with this problem, the German statute has set up a Foundation, endowed with a substantial capital provided by the Federal Government, the Länder, major pharmaceutical companies, and the blood bank of the German Red Cross. Independent persons who must perform their duties in absolute secrecy administer this fund. Persons proving to have received a blood transfusion in Germany prior to 1 January 1988 and producing a medical certificate stating that they are now HIV positive (or suffering from AIDS), will be presumed to have suffered the illness from the transfusion. Without more, they are then entitled to receive DM 1,500 per month in the first instance or DM 3,000 in the second. Special provisions in the statute also extend these rights to a number of other persons such as the spouses, fiancés, or cohabitantes of the recipients of the infected blood. Decisions taken by the Administration Council of the Foundation (Stiftungsrat) can be appealed before the normal administrative courts.

Notwithstanding the above general generosity that the legal system adopts towards physical injury, there do exist (in German as well in Anglo-American law) three "types" of physical injury which have given rise to considerable difficulties. These situations involve nervous shock, pre-natal injuries (including pre-conception injuries) and claims for "wrongful birth and wrongful life." To these last claims, one must also add an interesting variant—the so-called wrongful conception (and failed sterilisation) cases.

Nervous shock, or as it is nowadays more accurately called “psychiatric illness”, is one kind of interference with a person’s health which has given rise to many difficulties in German law, as well as English and American law. It should be noted at the outset that in Germany private or social insurance schemes, to be discussed in chapter 4, will often take care of the matter. Shock may be the result of fear generated for one’s own safety and personal integrity or it may be the result of witnessing some gruesome accident. Should recovery here be limited only to nervous shock suffered by close relatives of the victim or to persons who only saw or heard the accident with their own unaided senses (but not to those who some time after the accident became aware of its consequences, perhaps through hearsay)? And should well-intended rescuers, who come to the accident scene to offer their services and are subject to horrifying sights, be all allowed to claim damages for their shock? Three cases dealing with these matters are reproduced below (cases 1–3) and should be read in conjunction with their annotations in order to obtain a fuller picture of German law. (In chapter 4 at p. 922 the reader can find an overview of current awards for non-pecuniary harm in cases of nervous shock.) Here suffice it to say that psychiatric injury is, clearly, injury to health in the sense of § 823 I BGB, so long as it entails medically recognisable physical or psychological consequences which would not have been suffered by the ordinary, not over-sensitive, citizen.

The decision of the BGH of 11 May 1971 (BGHZ 56, 163 = Case 1, below), though not without its critics, is still good law. It illustrates, especially when read in conjunction with other similar decisions, the strong emphasis that German courts put on the seriousness and extraordinary nature of the shock before they treat it as compensatable (for a more recent confirmation see: BGH NJW 1989, 2317 = Case 2, below). The expression often used is that the shock must be an “appropriate” and “understandable” (verständliche) consequence of witnessing or being told of the accident. The italicised words suggest an area of difference with Anglo-American law; otherwise, however, the terms used imply flexible standards which, more often than not, do not seem to work in favour of plaintiffs. Thus, shock suffered as a result of being told that one’s car was damaged has not been allowed. (LG Hildesheim, VersR 1970, 720). Likewise, no compensation was given for shock suffered by the plaintiff when he was told that the police were investigating a close relative. (LG Hamburg NJW 1969, 615.) Further, though a close family relationship with the primary victim will, typically, make it easier for the plaintiff to obtain damages for his nervous shock, it is by no means obvious that this is seen as a rigid, additional condition for recovery. The issue has not been decided by the BGH. However, in OLG Stuttgart VersR 1988, 1187 the court restricted the scope of claims based on distant shock to relatives.

Thus, non-relatives of the prime victim have often been denied recovery (LG Tübingen NJW 1968, 1187; LG Stuttgart VersR 1973, 648). But an accompanying fiancée has succeeded; and, in similar circumstances, so might a partner in a “serious love relationship” (LG Frankfurt NJW 1969, 2286). If the shock leads to a premature birth, the nasciturus may also be entitled to sue for any damages that he may have suffered (BGH NJW 1985, 1391). (For further details see: Münchener Kommentar-Grunsky, Vor § 249 BGB, nos. 54 and 54a)

Can one draw any preliminary conclusions from such a brief sketch? Three, perhaps, can be put forward here, though somewhat tentatively since cases such as those cited above technically have no value as precedents and can only serve as indications of how a court might decide a case.

First, German law is more generous than the Common law in cases of distant shock; this may be due in part to the absence of juries and a smaller and more closely-monitored medical profession which reduces the chances of “faked” medical evidence. It is also potentially more open-minded towards claims brought by non-relatives. Secondly, in other contexts the greater “generosity” of German law may be more apparent than real. This seems reasonable enough to infer from the fact that (a) many claims which would be unacceptable to the Common law are also rejected by the German courts and (b) that damages awarded under this heading to successful claimants seem to be modest. Finally, and from a purely conceptual point of view, it may be worth noting that German courts tend to approach problems of nervous shock in terms of causation (rather than duty). Increasingly, however, German writers are recognising that the demarcation line really depends on policy considerations and that causative language merely provides the technical device to draw these lines rather than explaining why some plaintiffs fall on their wrong side. To these writers, therefore, the main attraction of the German approach may, lie in the fact that it makes the seriousness of the harm the determinative factor rather than basing recovery on such fortuitous elements as the plaintiff’s proximity to the scene of the accident or his familial relationship with the primary victim.

Pre-natal injuries is the second kind of “physical” injury that has given rise to considerable difficulties both in German law and the Common law systems. There are a number of reasons why this is so. First, the nasciturus—as the child still in the womb is often called in the civil law systems—though a “living entity” is not a person. If it is to be accorded legal rights, these may be in conflict with those of the mother (e.g. right to live and to abort). Secondly, it may be thought proper to vest some of these rights immediately (e.g. after a certain period, usually the twenty-fourth week of pregnancy, you may not kill the embryo) while others will mature upon live birth. The right to inherit belongs to this category (§ 1923 II BGB). As we shall observe in the notes to cases 4 and 5 (reproduced below), German and English law adopt the same position with regard to the right to sue for injuries sustained while in utero: the rights of the nasciturus vest only upon live birth. On the other hand, some (but not all) American courts do not require “live birth” and are willing to grant tort actions to persons who were merely “viable” at the time of the injury (even if there was subsequently no live birth). This solution can accentuate the third difficulty that these cases create namely, difficulties with causation and proof.

The protection afforded by German law goes beyond this point as the decision in BGHZ 8, 243 (reproduced below as case 5) clearly shows. In chronological terms this is a pioneering decision, allowing an action to a child born with impairments as a result of a tortious act which took place prior to conception. In the main, the Common law solutions in this context are similar to the German.

The third and last category of “physical” injury cases which have given trouble to the courts (both in Common law and Civil law jurisdictions) involve three kinds of actions. These include the so-called “wrongful life” and “wrongful birth” cases (involving the birth of impaired children) and the “wrongful conception” cases (involving birth of healthy (but sometimes also impaired) children following a failed sterilisation operation). All these are claims more modern in origin and raise profound philosophical questions as well as difficult questions of evaluation of damages. This time, developments in this field started in the USA and later spread to European systems. BGHZ 86, 240 (reproduced as case 6) and the decision of the Supreme Court of New Jersey in Procanik v. Cillo (reproduced as an appendix to the German decision) bring out very clearly most of the relevant points. For further details the reader is thus referred to the notes that accompany these two leading cases. (See, below, pp. 178–186) Here suffice it to say that German law has produced a rich and not always easily reconcilable case law. The German picture is further confused by the existence of two important decisions of the Constitutional Court, which have given diametrically different opinions on this issue. In fact, the first of these (BVerfGE 88, 203, reproduced as case 7) left the BGH singularly unimpressed. (BGH NJW 1994, 788, Case 8). On the other hand, the second decision of the Constitutional Court generally sided with the traditional liberal view that allowed such claims. (See, BVerfGE 96, 375, Case 9).

(c) Freedom

Any interference with the person’s liberty and freedom of movement (körperliche Fortbewegungsfreiheit) will (if the other elements of § 823 I BGB are satisfied) give rise to a civil claim and, often, a criminal action as well. Torts like that of false imprisonment (Einspernung) and even threats with menaces are covered by this heading as are instances of false information given to the police in order to have the plaintiff arrested. However, freedom of religion or speech are not covered by this term nor, more generally, freedom to act (Fikentscher, Schuldrecht (9th edn., 1997) § 103, I, 3; Staudinger-Hager, § 823, no. B53 ff. etc. contra Leinemann, Der Begriff Freiheit nach § 823 I BGB (1969).) Overall, therefore, the notion of freedom in § 823 I BGB is, as a leading textbook suggests, interpreted “restrictively” (Larenz/Canaris, § 76 II 2, p. 385.) and its field of application seems analogous to that of Article 5 of the European Convention of Human Rights.

(d) Property

(i) Ownership

Ownership, the cardinal property right regulated by §§ 903 ff. BGB is, of course, completely protected by § 823 I BGB against culpable interferences. The interference with the substance of a thing (whether moveable or immovable), of the type that one would encounter in, say, a traffic accident case, would thus form the typical kind of interference under this heading. Likewise, preventing an owner from using his property will amount to an actionable interference, certainly if the deprivation of use is total. (BGH 21 June 1977, NJW 1977, 2264.) Likewise, the contamination of animal foods by pharmaceutical products which then makes the herd that eat them impossible to sell, will also be actionable under this heading. (BGH 8 November 1988, MDR 1989, 244.) Removing the property from where its owner wished it to be may also be actionable under this heading, as would any defacement or denigration of it, for instance, by means of graffiti. Even the use of a thing without the permission of its owner, would be actionable as an interference with property, although it did not entail its destruction or damage. Dropping the plaintiff's engagement ring in the river, or grazing one's animals on the plaintiff's land without his permission, would thus be covered by this provision. The reverse, i.e. deprivation of use by the owner, may also be actionable under this heading, even though such interference is not with the substance of the property and really leads to pure economic loss being the only harm suffered by the owner. It would seem, however that the German courts allow such actions under this heading only if the deprivation of use is total (BGH 21 December 1970, BGHZ 55, 153) and prolonged (BGH 21 June 1977, NJW 1977, 2264). One test that has been considered is whether the property, as a consequence of the interference with its use, is less worth. In BGHZ 55, 153 the value of the ship that was trapped in the harbour certainly declined for the time being, while a ship outside the harbour kept its value. But if such actions can succeed, the theoretical explanation is disputed in academic literature. (Cf. Larenz/Canaris, pp. 388–90). They are also treated as “exceptional” in the sense that they have never been extended to cover economic losses suffered by car owners trapped in traffic jams. (Thus, Kötz/Wagner, no. 60.) Also actionable under the heading of property is damage caused to a car by dust emanating from a neighbouring factory, though here the German courts are careful to merge the provisions of tort law and property law and not to impose liability if the substantive requirements of § 906 (2) BGB are not met. (BGH 18 September 1984, NJW 1985, 47, translated in van Gerven, pp. 192–5.) All of the above, varied instances involve some kind of physical interference with the property. But physical interference is not always necessary. Legal interference with the right of ownership will also be actionable under the same rules. (BGH 7 December 1993, MDR 1994, 254; borrower selling loaned item.) Incidentally, this right for compensation could arise only if the other elements of § 823 I BGB (and particularly the requirement of fault) were satisfied. (Though cf. BGH NJW 1985, 47.) In the absence of fault, the owner would have to rely on the remedies given him in the third book of the Code dealing with the law of property. Thus, § 985 BGB gives him a real action for dispossession; or § 1004 BGB which provides a remedy for interferences which do not amount to dispossession (right to demand a cessation of the interference and/or an injunction for the future); or the remedy given by § 906 BGB which is analogous to the Common law injunctions in nuisance cases. Ownership is also protected by the Constitution, which contains special provisions concerning expropriation for the “public good”; but this topic lies outside the ambit of this book.

The illustrations given above demonstrate that a wide—by Common law standards almost excessive interpretation—given to the term “ownership” may in part be prompted by the desire to escape the rigidly-phrased rule that pure economic loss is not actionable under § 823 I BGB. This thought prompts another and related one. The judicial creation of the Recht am Gewerbebetrieb (discussed below) may also have been prompted by this desire; and these two developments taken together may illustrate the difficulties that flow from any written attempts to exclude the compensation of pure economic loss through tort actions. By contrast, the Common law's supple way of achieving this result through the notion of duty of care has avoided such "debatable" extensions though done so at the cost of the uncertainty that accompanies the notion of duty of care. In the end, therefore, all one can say is that there are different ways in which one may pursue the same policy, each with its own merits and drawbacks.

(ii) Possession

Difficulties have arisen with regard to the concept of possession, which the Code treats more as a physical relation to a thing than a right. § 854 BGB thus states that "possession of a thing is acquired by obtaining actual power of control over the thing".

Possession is thus, clearly, not "ownership"; but could it be regarded as sufficiently akin to this latter notion to receive protection under the words "or other rights" (sonstiges Recht) of § 823 I BGB?

The paragraphs that follow § 854 BGB make clear that possession is given special protection by the law regardless of the possessor's title and this, partly because the law wishes to discourage—within certain limits (see § 859 BGB)—self-redress, but also because possession is often in practice the outward manifestation of ownership. But does a possessor, whose physical relationship with a thing has been disturbed, also have the right to claim monetary compensation under § 823 I BGB?

Professor Medicus gives the following illustration using, incidentally, the statutory notion of "indirect possession". This is defined by § 868 BGB and deals with a person exercising factual control over a thing but in pursuance to a contract with another person (the mediate or indirect possessor). The typical example is a lease. Now suppose that a lessee fails to vacate an apartment that has been leased from the lessor who has given him legal notice to terminate the contract. If the lessor forcibly ejects the lessee, the latter's remedies—set out in §§ 859, I, III and 861 BGB—include a limited right of self-help as well as the right to demand the return of possession. But can he also demand damages—for example to cover his expenses for staying in a hotel—under § 823 I BGB? As stated, the position of possessors is, in this respect, not entirely clear, but according to Professor Medicus (no. 607; see also Esser/Weyers, Schuldrecht II, 2, § 55 2b, p. 163) the answer should depend upon whether the possessor is in a position similar to that of an owner, i.e. he has the "negative" advantage usually associated with ownership (e.g. right to stop others from interfering), but also the "positive" advantages, namely the right to use and exploit the thing (§ 903 BGB). This would include all lawful possessors but also a bona fide possessor during pending litigation. The solution to the hypothetical example, therefore, should be that the lessee could obtain damages for his loss sustained for the period during which—in accordance with the rules of civil procedure (§§ 721, 765a ZPO)—he might have obtained a reprieve from the eviction. (For rich references to case-law on this and related matters see Deutsch in JZ 1984, 308; JZ 1990, 733.)

Similarly, other limited property rights like servitudes (§§ 1018 ff. BGB) and usufruct (§§ 1030 ff. BGB) should also receive protection by being included under the heading "other [absolute] rights" of § 823 I BGB.

(iii) Economic loss

It will have been noticed that the protection of wealth (Vermögen) as such is not included in the list of enumerated interests of § 823 I BGB. This does not mean that economic losses will never be compensated. A person who is injured and incurs medical expenses will receive monetary compensation both for his pain and suffering (in accordance with § 847 BGB) as well as for his economic loss (e.g. medical expenses, lost earnings, etc.). Equally, a person whose car has been damaged in a traffic accident will be able to claim compensation for it, which may also include the cost of hiring a substitute. Finally, to give one last illustration, if the defendant’s negligent activities lead to the severing of an electricity cable, thereby causing a power cut which affects the plaintiff’s electrically operated egg-hatching machines, the plaintiff will be able to claim both the value of the eggs and the profit he would have made on those eggs which would have statistically hatched into chickens and then been sold (BGHZ 41, 123 = BGH NJW 1964, 720 but see Hager’s criticisms in JZ 1979, 53 ff.). In all these cases we are talking of economic loss immediately consequential to injury to the person or property and the only problem that the court will have to face will be one of remoteness: how much of the plaintiff’s loss to allocate to the defendant’s conduct. By contrast, when we move to pure economic loss (reiner Vermögensschaden) the difficulties experienced by German law are multiplied; in addition, they are experienced in areas which are well known to Common lawyers. Indeed, it could be argued that in no other area of its law of torts does German law demonstrate such an ideological affinity with the Common law as in its refusal to compensate pure economic loss through the medium of tort rules. Yet, as we shall note below, in both systems this basic premise has, in recent times, come under constant and ingenious attacks with practitioners (and judges) showing in many instances a willingness to probe for weak points in the wall of the citadel. Such an attitude, inevitably, gives rise to the question why should this be so. The question becomes more pressing (and, to some extent has defied a conclusive answer) whenever the problem is examined against the background of French law (and its derivatives). For these systems have adopted the exact opposite solution, equated for all intents and purposes economic loss with physical injury, and have not incurred the dire consequences that Common lawyers and German lawyers so fear.

Stripped to its essentials, the first argument is that economic loss (like nervous shock), tends to give rise to difficulties of an administrative nature such as, for example, a potentially indeterminate number of claims (and, it should be stressed, it is the indeterminacy that matters rather than the number of claims itself), unreliable evidence, and collusive actions. These fears were succinctly voiced as early as 1861 by the great German jurist Rudolf von Jhering who wrote:

What would it lead to if one could be sued in non-contractual relations generally for gross negligence as well as intent! A careless utterance, carrying a tale, giving false information and bad advice, uttering a thoughtless judgment, recommending an undeserving housemaid one used to employ, answering a traveller’s question about the way or the time, and so on, in a word, everything and anything, if grossly negligent, would make one liable for the harm it caused in spite of all bona fides; and in the course of such an extension the actio de dolo would become the veritable scourge of commercial and social intercourse, free conversation would be greatly inhibited, the most innocent word would become a snare! (R. Jhering, “Culpa in Contrahendo”, Jahrbücher für die Dogmatik des heutigen römischen und deutschen Privatrechts 4 (1861) 1, 12.).

This clearly echoes what was to become one of the best-known aphorisms of Cardozo J in his famous judgment in Ultramares Corp. v. Touche 255 NY 170, 174; NE 441, 444 (1931). Similar concerns have been voiced in England. In a free market economy financial harm of some kind to some persons is to be expected: “Competition involves traders being entitled to damage their rivals interest by promoting their own.”: Home Office v. Dorset Yacht Co. Ltd. [1970] AC 1004, 1027 per Lord Reid. Or, as Robert Goff LJ (as he then was) put it in his Court of Appeal judgment in The Aliakmon [1985] QB 350, 393: “The philosophy of the market place presumes that it is lawful to gain profit by causing others economic loss, and that recognised wrongs involving interference with others contracts are limited to specific intentional wrongs such as inducing a breach of contract or conspiracy.” The same justification for the exclusion of economic loss is given in German law. The most audible exponent of this view is probably Professor Canaris (Larenz/Canaris, p. 357) who concludes that the rule against recoverability of pure economic loss serves the purpose of guaranteeing individual freedom. However, this does not necessarily exclude the desirability (in Germany de lege ferenda) of well-defined exceptions in specific circumstances. The main concern is to keep these exceptions under control in the light of the individual’s right to self determination in a market economy (see also Lord Goff’s comments in Markesinis (ed.), The Gradual Convergence (1994) p. 130 and Picker “Gutachterhaftung” in Beuthien and others (eds.), Festschrift für Dieter Medicus (1999) 397, 433). In any case, the methodological differences between English and German law in the field of negligent misstatements, where such exceptions have been mainly discussed, may be less significant than one might expect, see notes to cases 19–26.

Another argument is that “insurance considerations” often favour the non-liability rule. It is useful to put this argument in such a stark manner since lawyers in Europe, especially Continental Europe, are less accustomed to analysing tort cases in an overtly economic manner. The German decisions bear witness to the validity of this assertion, though it is no longer entirely true of academic literature. (But see, case 144, below.) Yet the assumption that the “insurance factor” always favours the non-liability rule is simply not correct. The decision of the Canadian Supreme Court in Canadian National Railway Co. v. Norsk Pacific Steamship Co. Ltd. [1992] 1 S.C.R. 1021 (reproduced below, p. 243) contains one of the interesting (if long) judicial discussions of the subject. (But it has not pleased all academics. Thus, see, Stapleton, “Tort, Insurance and Ideology” (1995) 58 MLR, 820 ff.)

In the early 1980s there were signs that English law was slowly relaxing the attitude towards economic loss even though no one was predicting that it would reach the very liberal position of French, Belgian, or Dutch law where tort compensation for pure economic loss is, quite simply, a non-problem. (See Fokkema and Markesinis, “All or Nothing? The Compensation of Pure Economic Loss in English and Dutch Law” in Ex Iure (a collection of essays published in 1987 by Gouda Quint) 63; Herbots, “Le ‘Duty of Care’ et le dommage purement financier en droit comparé” ((1985) Revue de droit internationale et de droit comparé 52.) In England the move expressing a dissatisfaction with the status quo received its first major boost in some wide propositions about the tort of negligence in Anns v. Merton London Borough Council [1978] AC 728, and it peaked with the decision in Junior Books Ltd. v. Veitchi Co. Ltd. [1983] 1 AC 520. The result reached in this last case is arguably fair and right on its facts. Yet some unnecessarily wide and inadequately thought out dicta precipitated a spectacular demise, first by means of clumsy attempts to show that Junior Books was not really a case of economic loss at all (Tate & Lyle Industries. v. GLC [1983] 2 AC 509) and then by more sustained attacks (e.g. in Governors of the Peabody Donation Fund v. Sir Lindsay Parkinson & Co. Ltd. [1985] AC 210; Leigh and Sullivan v. Aliakmon Shipping Co. Ltd. [1986] AC 785; Yuen Kun Yeu v. A. G. of Hong Kong [1988] AC 175) leading to the ignominious statement by a Court of Appeal judge in Simaan General Contracting Co. v. Pilkington Glass Ltd. (No. 2) [1988] 2 WLR 761 at p. 778, that even citing the case served no “useful purpose”. This process of dismantling Anns was completed by the House of Lords in Murphy v. Brentwood DC [1991] 1 AC 398, a decision, however, which may have created its own considerable difficulties and which has not, on the whole, met with a warm reception from all British academics. (See: Markesinis and Deakin, “The Random Element of Their Lordships’ Infallible Judgment: An Economic and Comparative Analysis of the Tort of Negligence from Anns to Murphy”, (1992) 55 MLR 619 and further references to academic literature on page 621, n. 15.) Yet even if the discrediting of Anns turns out to be short lived, the potential “abandonment” of Murphy is unlikely to be followed by a move towards the “French position”. Rather, it may signal a move towards a more flexible attitude, which will make recovery easier but dependant on factual circumstances grouped under characteristic headings. This approach has already been advocated by a number of academics (e.g. Professor Feldthusen in Canada: Economic Negligence: The Recovery of Pure Economic Loss, 2nd edn. (1989); idem, “Economic Loss in the Supreme Court of Canada: Yesterday and Tomorrow” 17 Can. Bus. L.J. 356 (1990–91)); and it can also find some (influential) judicial support in the Common law world. (E.g. in the majority in Norsk, op. cit., above). It is also largely adopted in this book since it makes the comparative presentation of the rich and varied material more digestible. Overall, however, there is no denying the fact that English law on this topic is confused and often contradictory. In Murphy v. Brentwood DC [1991] 1 AC 398 the House of Lords significantly reduced recourse to the law of tort to provide efficient remedies for deficient work in the area of construction law. Interestingly enough, one can observe in recent cases a trend towards contract law whereas previously claimants would resort to the “Anns type of remedy”. Thus far, the new Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 has not played much of a role; and the construction industry appears to be keen to exclude its application for the future. It must also be noted that the expansion of contract has come about incrementally through the activity of the courts. (Thus, see, Linden Gardens Trust Ltd. v. Lenesta Sludge Disposals Ltd. [1994] 1 AC 85. See, also, Darlington BC v. Wiltshier Northern Ltd. [1995] 1 WLR 68 (Court of Appeal), containing a highly influential attack by Steyn LJ (as he then was) on the traditional doctrine of privity, though now only of historic interest.) This trend reached its provisional peak in Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd. v. Panatown Ltd. (No 1) [2001] 1 AC 518 (extracts of which are reproduced below, p. 320) and stems from a newly discovered flexibility of contractual reasoning in cases where the performance of a contract also affects a third party. The details of this new approach are controversial; and have yet to be worked out by the courts. However, it can be safely stated that in effect these cases allow a building employer to recover substantial damages even though a third party to the building contract suffers the financial loss caused by the defective performance. These cases remind one of the German concept of Drittschadensliquidation, though if one scrutinises the reasoning of the minority in Panatown other parallels to German contract principles surface. For a more detailed discussion of the interplay between contract and tort in the area of economic loss see also notes to cases 19–26 below.

In the USA one finds a similar attempt to confine recovery of pure economic loss by decisions like State of Louisiana ex rel. Guste v. M/V Testbank (752 F. 2d 1019 (1985)), reproduced in part in the 2nd edn. of this book, pp. 184–203 and 3rd edn. pp. 211–216). For in this case the majority tried (and to a large extent succeeded) in halting the more liberalising rules found in such important, earlier decisions as Petitions of Kinsman Transit Co. (388 F. 2d 821) and Union Oil Co. v. Oppen (501 F. 2d 558). This attempt to adopt “bright line” rules (e.g. economic loss is compensatable only if connected to physical injury or property damage) seems to have succeeded, though one also finds some important decisions in the opposite direction. Thus see: People Express Airlines, Inc. v. Consolidated Rail Corp. 100 NJ 246, 495 A. 2d 107 (1985); J’Aire Corp. v. Gregory 598 P. 2d 60 (1979). Selecting cases for inclusion in works such as this is not easy; and, to some extent, it must reflect personal ideas and preconceptions. Nevertheless, the selection has been made on the basis of methodological criteria as well as for the intrinsic merit of the judgments reproduced. In the case of economic loss two leading cases have been selected for special treatment. The first—Norsk—comes from Canada and adopts a “liberal” approach; the second, delivered by the US Supreme Court—East River S.S. Corp. v. Transamerica Deleva Inc. 476 US 858 (1986)—is more traditional but no less impressive for that. The two decisions may not be as irreconcilable as they appear at first sight if one adopts the more nuanced view that recovery for economic loss may be desirable in some factual situations but not in others.

In Germany, too, the rigid anti-compensation rule has been doubted by some academics and severely eroded in some situations by the courts, themselves, despite strong academic criticism. But, overall, the challenge has, again, been unsuccessful since the non-liability rule was clearly incorporated in the Code in accordance with the demands of both the socio-economic environment of the nineteenth century and Roman legal tradition. For the socio-economic environment clearly ranked tactile forms of property above pure economic interests, and what is more, expressed a clear preference for land over moveables. And legal tradition was also hostile towards pure economic loss, since the lex Aquilia and classical Roman law formed part of the German Common law and this system of compensation was devised for damage to physical objects.

Many consequences follow from this basic attitude of German law. Here we can only outline a few fundamental points; and further details will be given in the annotations to the translated decisions.

First one must note that as a result of the rigidity of tort law, German contract law has been expanded (many academics would argue excessively), to meet new situations calling for a pro-plaintiff solution. More about this (and recent similar trends in England) in the notes on the cases dealing with liability for negligent statements and the liability of attorneys towards non-clients.

Secondly, the expansion has often been the result of bold judicial creativity. This creativity has not, as already alluded, been met with “enthusiasm” by the academic side of the profession. In this context, therefore, the harmonious collaboration between the two sides of the legal profession, so much the hallmark of German law (and so different from English law), has been ruptured.

Thirdly, despite the above, there exist large areas of tort law where no recovery is allowed for pure economic loss and, in this sense, German law is very close to English law in result if not in methodology. The “cable cases” provide an obvious example; but many others exist. Thus, for example, if the defendant injures the plaintiff’s employee, or debtor, an English plaintiff has no longer (i.e. since 1982) an action in tort for his economic loss (though some Common law systems—Australian, New Zealand, Canadian—may, in limited instances, allow such claims.) According to the prevailing view, interferences with contractual or quasi-contractual relations are not actionable under § 823 I BGB. (See, however, Koziol, Die Beeinträchtigung fremder Forderungsrechte (1967); Löwisch, Der Deliktsschutz relativer Rechte (1970); Mincke, "Forderungsrechte als 'sonstige Rechte' im Sinne des § 823 Abs. I BGB", JZ 1984, 862). Thus, the famous French decision (Colmar, 20 avril 1955, D. 1956, 723), which allowed a football club to claim the economic loss it suffered as a result of the injury of one of its leading players, would be decided differently in Germany. And so would be a number of other such cases which have received more generous treatment at the hands of French courts (though see Professor Durry's remarks in 1976 Rev. trim. dr. civ., 134).

Fourthly, demarcation lines cannot always be drawn easily, especially in cases involving pure economic loss. The distinction between damage to "property" and economic loss has thus caused many difficulties. For example, A damages B's cable and C's factory comes to a halt. Molten material in his electrically operated machines solidifies and has to be discarded. This, clearly, is physical damage, actionable under § 823 I BGB. But what if the solidified material can be re-melted—no doubt at an extra cost—and re-used? In trying to answer this question, German courts have come up with some rather abstract analyses. (See, for example, OLG Hamm NJW 1973, 760 and notes by Isenbeck in NJW 1973, 1755; Möschel, JuS 1977, 5.)

Fifthly, the different methodology—dictated by the Code, German legal history, or legal education should not deter the reader from using "constructively" the German ideas which may yet be transplantable into the Common law. At the very least, these ideas should provide the Common lawyer with food for thought. This point will be amplified in the sections that follow, and in the notes to the legal malpractice and negligent misstatement cases. Decisions such as that of the House of Lords in Henderson v. Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 AC 145 (reproduced in part at p. 348), where comparative law was put to practical use, will surely encourage jurists to engage in such exercises in the future, in this field and elsewhere. In his leading speech, Lord Goff of Chieveley, after having carefully reviewed the available solutions in French and German law, opted for a concurrence of contractual and tortious actions. The German model, and the way it had worked in practice without any problems, clearly aided the learned Law Lord to reach his own conclusion as to what English law should be.

Finally, for the reasons already given, the economic loss cases will be grouped under different headings and discussed separately, the assumption being that different factual situations call for different legal (and economic) analyses and, therefore, different solutions.

Cable cases. The first three cases (BGHZ 29, 65; BGH NJW 1976, 1740; BGH NJW 1977, 2208, cases 11–13) deal with a problem that has also exercised the English courts. Their annotations will bring out particular points and provide the reader with further bibliographical references. Three points, however, should also be made at this stage. The first is the fact that English and German law essentially reach the same result in this factual situation. It is by no means clear what is the right answer to this problem. If—and we need not give a conclusive answer at this point—the law ought to be changed, the question then arises as to how this should be done, given the rigid phrasing of § 823 I BGB. Of course, it should be noted that German attorneys have not been short of ideas in their attempt to circumvent the leading tort provision. But the Supreme Court, apart from a brief period of hesitation, has been as quick to reject them as the practising lawyers have been to invent them.

Secondly, the cases are also noteworthy in their relatively open allusion to policy and, in this respect, they can easily be compared with some of the more recent English decisions. The awareness that policy will decide the outcome is also increasingly shared by the academics who have commented on these decisions. Once again, the Norsk decision contains a good discussion of the issues.

Finally, both the English and German cases reveal how various legal devices have been used interchangeably in order to produce the desired result. This equivocation between the various elements of liability must be clearly stressed, for it will accustom the Common lawyer to the fact that he must often seek to find in the German theory of legal cause the answers which he tends to produce through the notion of duty. For comparative studies on this subject see: Hilgenfeldt, Der Ersatz von Vermögensschäden bei der Unterbrechung von Versorgungsleitungen (1981); Schulze, "Die Beschädigung von Erdkabeln und sonstigen Erdleitungen der Energieversorgungsunternehmen durch unerlaubte Handlungen Dritter, insbesondere durch Tiefbauunternehmen", VersR 1998, 12; Taupitz, Haftung für Energieleiterstörungen durch Dritte (1981).

Loss of use. Two cases (BGHZ 55, 153 and BGH NJW 1977, 2264) dealing with this issue are reproduced below (cases 14 and 15). The annotations to them will make it clear that the results achieved by the courts have been seriously questioned by many academics. These cases also show how difficult it is to draw a line between what constitutes an interference with property, actionable under § 823 I BGB, and what should be called pure economic loss.

Damage caused to the product. This is an economic loss which, arguably, should be left to contract rather than tort. Nevertheless, in Germany, tort law is increasingly expanding to cover this type of economic loss, mainly to circumvent some shorter limitation periods in contract. A number of cases reproduced in section B. 16 of this chapter deal with this problem and their annotations will make it obvious to the Anglo-American reader that the problem is not unknown to the Common law world. Perhaps they will also make clear that—to quote Professor Kötz's words (Deliktsrecht, nos. 65–6)—letting the [tort] bull into the [contract] china shop can create serious demarcation problems and entail unbearable economic consequences. This judicial trend seems well entrenched; but the literature is divided. Broadly supportive is Hager, "Zum Schutzbereich der Produzentenhaftung", AcP (184) 1984, 413. The judges who have created this case law have also defended it extra-judicially. See: Steffen in VersR 1988, 977 and Kullmann in NJW 1991, 675. For criticism and further references, see: Kötz/Wagner, Deliktsrecht, pp. 27 et seq. Staudinger-Hager, § 823 BGB nos. B105 ff. Cf. also the views of the US Supreme Court in East River Steamship Corp. v. Transamerica Delaval, Inc. Note also that German law seems to have applied different rules to defective chattels (which damage themselves: case 68) and to immovables (case 74).

Economic loss as a result of negligent misstatements. Here, too, we are dealing with economic loss which in the Common law systems will, if at all, be actionable in tort. The development of the tort action in England and the United States was largely brought about by the doctrine of consideration which (especially in England) made the expansion of the notion of contract impossible. (See Lord Devlin's judgment in Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd. [1964] AC 465, 529.) In Germany the pressure was the reverse. A tort action under § 823 I BGB was and is impossible; and an action under § 826 BGB tends to be limited to the most opprobrious forms of misconduct. Though § 826 BGB has, in recent times, received an expansive interpretation, it is still unable to deal with the most common situations. The expansion of contractual or quasi-contractual remedies was the only answer German law could produce. (Note, however, that in both systems great use is made of the notion of reliance, which can transcend the classical distinction between contract and tort and in cases like negligent misstatements make it almost meaningless.) A number of translated German decisions deal with this problem which, in recent years, has also occupied the House of Lords in such cases as Smith v. Eric Bush; Harris v. Wyre Forest DC [1990] 1 AC 831 and Caparo Industries plc v. Dickman [1990] 2 AC 605. Though the results reached by the German courts are often identical to those accepted by the English courts Caparo, for example, could have been decided in the same way under German law. However, one must also note that recently the BGH extended liability in this field. (See the controversial decision reproduced as case 24.) Notwithstanding the possible convergence in solutions, the reasoning used by these two national courts remains different. This may be largely due to the fact that in these disputes the sources of the law are multiple and highly complex. More about the contractually “flavoured” methodology will be said in the next sub-section; and the complexity of the sources that must be used by German judges to solve these cases will be discussed in the notes to the translated decisions.

The case that follows (27) deals with a related topic. A notary, solicitor, or attorney is negligent in the drafting of the will of the testator and, as a result, a potential legatee is deprived of the benefit he would have otherwise derived from the will. The lawyer’s contractual and/or delictual liability towards his client is not, of course, in doubt. But can he be made liable to the “third” party/potential legatee? German law (as indeed English and American law) has given a positive answer, but has again justified it in contractual, not delictual terms. Common lawyers have opted for a different justification of the same result, but the comparison of the various cases shows that the problem—the limit of the potential liability—is the same. Incidentally, in these cases liability can often be said to result from what the lawyer says (i.e. negligent statement); but it can also result from what the lawyer does. In the annotation in this case we shall examine the English and American approaches to the problem. The advantages of contract over tort are set out in section B, the notes to case 27, below.

Economic loss at the borderline of contract and tort. The divide between contract and tort, not always easy to draw, becomes very vague when the tortious conduct produces pure economic loss instead of the more typical physical injury or property damage. This division, explicable by reference to history, is more rigidly maintained by the Common law where some of its jurists have even produced eloquently pithy but, it is submitted, not always persuasive reasons for its maintenance. (See, for example, Weir, International Encyclopaedia of Comparative Law (1975), XI, ch. 12, “Complex Liabilities”, 5 and, more sceptically, Markesinis, “An Expanding Tort Law—the Price of a Rigid Contract Law” LQR 103 (1987) 354, 384 ff.). This is not so in the modern civil law in general and the German law of torts in particular. For there, contract and tort are seen as species of the wider notion of obligation. In this system, codal provisions or other reasons have forced lawyers, while not abandoning the search for doctrinal clarity, to cross often the boundaries of contract, law, and negotiorum gestio in an attempt to find a solution (not necessarily the best one) to a problem. We shall note later on (in the section on products liability and liability for harm caused to third parties) how this has worked out in specific instances of potential liability. Here suffice it to sketch two of the main contractual solutions devised to overcome shortcomings of the German law of tort. They are contracts with protective effects vis-à-vis third parties (Verträge mit Schutzwirkung zugunsten Dritter) and the (untranslatable) concept of Drittschadensliquidation; and their treatment in Germany is usually found in books dealing with the law of contract or the “general part” of the law of obligations.

(i) Contracts in favour of third parties

Contracts in favour of third parties (Verträge zugunsten Dritter) giving, under certain circumstances, a third party the right to demand that a promisor in a contract perform his primary obligation to him (and not to the co-contractor/promisee) are regulated by §§ 328–35 BGB. They are similarly recognized by section 302 Restatement (Second) Contracts, Article 4 of the 1982 Contracts (Privity) Act of New Zealand and, indeed, by other legal systems (e.g. Israel). Not so, however, by the English Common law which, until recently, remained rigidly faithful to all the facts of its doctrine of consideration. (For a recent thoughtful and critical discussion of the English Common law, see: Law Commission “Privity of Contract: Contracts for the Benefit of Third Parties”, Law Com. No. 242 (1996). See, also, Beatson, “Reforming the Law of Contracts for the Benefit of Third Parties. A Second Bite at the Cherry” (1992) Current Law 1, where one also finds some interesting insights about the Law Commission’s research into foreign (including German) law. Finally, however, the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 (reproduced in part at p. 319) did make considerable inroads into the doctrine of privity and introduced the concept of a contract for the benefit of a third party into English law. (The 1999 Act is annotated in the notes to cases 19–26, see p. 301). But this is not the contractual device that concerns us here. What is of interest here is the judicially created variant of contract with protective effects vis-à-vis third parties which brings strangers to a contract under its protective umbrella and allows them to entertain an action for damages for breach of one of the contract’s secondary obligations. The situations in which this concept has provided a solution originally involved physical injury; and this contractual device enabled the German courts to overcome the restrictive provision of liability for harm caused by third parties found in § 831 BGB (discussed below in chapter 3). The German equivalent of cases like Cavalier v. Pope ([1906] AC 428 cf. RGZ 102, 231; see, also, RGZ 127, 218, reprinted below as case 116) show the difference with the more traditional concept of contract in favour of third parties (§§ 328 ff. BGB). For the problem in Cavalier v. Pope (and the German equivalents) is not whether the plaintiff (wife of the lessee of premises) can sue the lessor for delivery of the leased premises (the primary obligation of the contract). The disputed point is whether she is entitled to claim damages if she is injured as a result of a breach of one of the secondary obligations imposed on the lessor by law or the contract (e.g. the duty to keep the premises in good repair). (see, now, § 311 III 1 BGB.) In German law, in this and other similar cases, the defendant often benefits from the immunity given to him by the narrow rule or, to be more precise, the absence of true “vicarious liability”. For in § 831 the BGB stipulates that the defendant is liable for his own negligence in selecting or supervising his servant but does not impute the servant’s negligence to him. (This can be achieved only by relying on § 278 BGB which, in turn, applies only in a contractual context. For more details on this see chapter 3, below.). So the German courts (as is explained below in chapter 3. 2) have been forced to resort to various contractual devices (including that of contracts with protective effects vis-à-vis third parties) in order to provide greater protection for plaintiffs. Clearly, such a convoluted technique was never necessary for the Common law (and, indeed, for those systems (e.g. French) that opt for the true vicarious liability rule). The German “refinement” of the traditional contract in favour of third parties has thus, understandably, escaped the attention of most Common lawyers. Yet, German law may, in this context as well, hold out some interesting ideas for discerning Common lawyers dealing with the Ross v. Caunters [1980] Ch. 297 type of situation. (Attorney’s liability towards a non-client/third party which has suffered pure economic loss as a result of the attorney’s negligence.) The same may be true in cases where a sub-contractor causes, through his negligence economic loss not just to his co-contractor (the general contractor) but also the owner of the building. (E.g., Junior Books v. Veitchi [1983] 1 AC 520 (England); J’Aire Corp. v. Gregory 24 Cal. 3rd 799, 598 P. 2d 60 (1979) (USA).) For, it will be argued (in the notes to the relevant German cases), that in almost all of these situations (for an exception see case 23) the defendant (attorney or sub-contractor, as the case may be), must not be made more extensively liable towards the third party than he would be if sued by his co-contractor. For this to be achieved, however, the cause of action against such defendants will have to be contractual. If, for whatever reasons, tort terminology is chosen, it will have to be made clear that the scope and extent of any tortious duty will have to be determined by the underlying contract between attorney/client or owner/contractor. (See: Lorenz and Marquesinis, “Solicitors’ Liability Towards Third Parties; Back into the Troubled Waters of the Contract/Tort Divide” (1993) 56 MLR 558, replying to Beatson, op. cit. (1992) Current Law, 1.)

At this juncture a clarification is necessary. For it is important to note that German courts have deployed the concept of a contract with protective effects in two quite different groups of cases. In the first category the function of the Vertrag mit Schutzwirkung is to frame certain protective duties of care as collateral obligations under the contract (or in pre-contractual situations as culpa in contrahendo) in order to avoid the weak vicarious liability rule contained in § 831 BGB. The well-known decision in Cavalier v. Pope provides an excellent English illustration of the problem that has to be solved. These cases involve physical damage to property or to the person and, clearly, this aspect of the concept is of less interest to English lawyers. The second type of situation in which the notion of Vertrag mit Schutzwirkung has been used is, however, much more interesting and it concerns the so-called “liability of experts”. Here the absence (in Germany) of a tortious exception to the rule that pure economic loss is not recoverable in tort (such as the Hedley Byrne principle) has prompted German courts to extend contractual reasoning. It is thus in this context that the German case law deserves attention and provides useful insights into the scope and nature of liability for the negligent performance of services by professionals. For this category of liability causes great conceptual difficulties in both systems. (For a more detailed account see notes to cases 19–24 and case 27. The need to differentiate between these two groups of cases is highlighted by Kötz, “The Doctrine of Privity of Contract” (1990) 10 Tel Aviv Univer. Studies in Law, 195 and Martiny, “Pflichtenorientierter Drittschutz beim Vertrag mit Schutzwirkung für Dritte”, JZ 1996, 19.)

Yet the option of framing the action in contract has also crossed the minds of some lawyers. In Cavalier v. Pope, mentioned earlier on, the possibility was considered but rejected on the grounds that the plaintiff’s wife was not a party to the contract of lease. In J’Aire the case was initially also pleaded in contract on the ground that the plaintiff could be regarded as an intended beneficiary of the contract between the owner of the premises and the defendants. This argument, however, was later abandoned by the plaintiff's attorney, probably in the belief that the court would not have accepted it. Nevertheless, a Californian commentator has come out in favour of the contractual approach arguing that it would have been less drastic to discover a contract in favour of the plaintiff than to grant the plaintiff's claim by extending tort to cover negligently inflicted economic loss. (Schwartz, "Economic Loss in American Tort Law: The Examples of J'Aire and of Products Liability" 23 San D. L. Rev., 40 ff. Contrast Rubin's view in "Tort Recovery for Negligently Inflicted Economic Loss: A Reassessment" 37 Stan. L. Rev. 1513 (1985). Also, Junior Books v. Veitchi has also been seen by an English tort expert as supportable "in a legal system which admits that [a third party] beneficiary of a contract can sue" (Weir, A Casebook on Tort, 5th edn. (1983) 34).) However, the Law Commission was at pains to emphasise that the 1999 Act does not cover situations such as White v. Jones or Junior Books and expressly clarified that its reform proposal did not make allowance for the German concept of a contract with protective effects towards third parties. Whether this has been sufficiently expressed in the wording of the Act is controversial and gives rise to considerable uncertainty. (Cf. Bridge [1996] JBL 602, 604; Macaulay (2000) 16 Constr LJ 265, 268.) But the German experience suggests that it is possible to apply the distinction between a classic contract for the benefit of a third party entitling to primary performance and other situations in which a third party seeks to enforce only isolated secondary obligations in practice. Hence, tort techniques will continue to dominate the reasoning in such cases outside the scope of the 1999 Act with one notable exception: the availability of an exclusion clause in the main contract to third parties who are employed in the exercise of the main contractor's duties.

It would appear that German law has found a better practical way round this problem—at least in the context of building contracts of the type envisaged in both Junior Books and J'Aire. (If so, this might well be a point that the Royal Institute of British Architects might wish to study carefully. For it is, we understand, common practice in Germany for contractors, using the general conditions of trade, to assign in advance all claims they may have against their sub-contractors arising from breach of warranties. This means that one does not have to structure the relationship of the parties in such a way as to make it difficult (if not impossible) to make the sub-contractor liable to the employer for the bad quality of the work. But a building owner accepting such an assignment (of the contractor's claims against the sub-contractor) does not thereby lose his possible claims against the main contractor. (For details see: BGHZ 62, 351; 67, 101; 74, 258. See, also, § 11 no. 10(a) of the AGB-Gesetz of 1976 which is the German equivalent of our Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977. See, now, § 309 no. 8 b) aa) BGB.) Indeed, so common this practice appears to be, the Junior Books type of case apparently has not been litigated in the courts. Well-known academic writers, however, have speculated that, if no assignment had taken place and/or the main contractor was not worth suing, a result similar to that reached by the House of Lords would be achieved by German courts through the medium of contract with protective effects vis-à-vis third parties. (Schlechtriem, "Deliktshaftung des Subunternehmers gegenüber dem Bauherrn wegen Minderwerts seines Werks—Eine neue Entscheidung des House of Lords", Versicherungsrecht, 25 Jahre Karlsruher Forum (1983), 64, 65, especially in view of BGH NJW 1965, 1955 and BGH NJW 1982, 2431. Neither case, however, deals with building contracts. Lorenz in Essays in Memory of Professor F. H. Lawson (1986) 86, 97, seems to agree. On the other hand, BGH NJW 1981, 1779, case 17 below, in what appears to be an obiter dictum, denies a direct action against the subcontractor.) As stated, the advantages of this contractually flavoured action will be considered more carefully below. Here suffice it to state that the contract with protective effects vis-à-vis third parties makes contractual protection possible while avoiding all the consequences of a fully-fledged contract in favour of third parties.

Clearly, then, the above technique goes some way towards solving the kind of problem faced by Anglo-American courts in cases like J'Aire and Junior Books v. Veitchi. However, it also challenges the doctrine of contractual privity, which is accepted by German law as it is by the Common law systems. Some kind of workable compromise is thus needed if a right balance is to be preserved between the traditional doctrine and the judicially fashioned deviation. It follows that if the ambit of contract is to be enlarged—as it is by constructions such as the contract with protective effects vis-à-vis third parties—special care must be taken so that the expansion is kept under control. For if it is not, the dividing line between contractual and tortious liability may be blurred or, even, abolished. The way German lawyers have grappled with these, at times, incompatible aims is instructive for a number of reasons.

Noteworthy is first of all the fact that we are here faced with a judge-made doctrine. True, courts and academics have tried—as is customary in German law—to pin their views on some article of the Code. Thus, sometimes the expansion of the contract has been based on § 157 BGB. (Broad interpretation of the contract; implied intentions of the parties; end-aim of the transaction. RGZ 87, 292; 98, 213; 106, 126; 127, 218 (an interesting decision); 152, 177. The BGH continued this practice. Thus see: BGHZ 1, 383, 386; 5, 378, 384; BGH NJW 1956, 1193.) In others the even more amorphous § 242 BGB (good faith) has been invoked to render respectability to what is a clear example of judicial activism. (Larenz, Schuldrecht I (1st edn. 1953), 16. III; idem, NJW 1956, 1193; NJW 1960, 79. Larenz's work changed not only the theoretical foundation of the new concept. Indeed, it also helped distinguish it from the traditional contract in favour of third parties regulated by §§ 328 ff. BGB creating a new notion for German private law.) This problem has greatly exercised academics but the courts, in what I have elsewhere called fits of “pragmatism” (“Conceptualism, pragmatism and courage: a common lawyer looks at some judgments of the German Federal Court”, 34 A. J. Comp. L. 349 (1986)) have refused to resolve this “theoretical” issue, preferring to focus on the narrow aspects of each action before them. (Thus in BGHZ 56, 269, 273 the theoretical basis of the concept was deliberately left undecided; and in BGH NJW 1977, 2073, 2074 it was regarded as irrelevant!)

A second interesting feature is, as we shall see, the emphasis on the relationship between contractual creditor and plaintiff/third party (which is known to the defendant/debtor) rather than on the foreseeability of the plaintiff/third party by the contractual debtor/defendant. The weakness of the latter (tort) approach is the potential open-endedness of the liability; an open-endedness which could, given the vagueness of the foreseeability test, lead to the blurring of contractual and tortious liability. Nevertheless, we can notice over the years a gradual weakening, or as some might say, erosion of the requirement of an interest of the creditor in including the third party into the protective scope of the contract (in one sense the most important element). As the concept of Vertrag mit Schutzwirkung was first applied to situations such as Cavalier v. Pope involving physical damage to a third party, it was natural to demand that the creditor was responsible for the well being (Wohl und Wehe, “for better or worse”) of the third party. Any injury to the latter could be analysed as an injury to the creditor himself which in turn explained the third party's inclusion in the contract (BGHZ 51, 91, 96). However, the extension of the Vertrag mit Schutzwirkung into the realm of pure economic loss in the context of misstatements or other services by professionals prompted also a shift of the emphasis from the relationship creditor/third party to that between third party/defendant. Here in this category of cases, of what has been called above “expert liability” (Expertenhaftung), the criterion of the creditor’s interest in the third party’s well being is much less appropriate and as a consequence was soon abandoned (see Medicus, Schuldrecht AT (11th edn. 1999) p. 374). This last point is particularly obvious from recent decisions (taken from what one might describe broadly as the banking/financial area, as well as the provision of expert opinions and legal service). Cases 19–24 illustrate this trend, which many (even in Germany) regard as dangerously expansive. The widening of the protective ambit of the contract is obvious not only in the fact that the courts no longer insist that the protected third party may be specifically identified in advance. More importantly, it is evident from the fact that the third party no longer needs to be in a close, personal, relationship with the creditor. Instead, the paramount question is “in what circumstances the objective interests involved [sic] permit the inference that the parties [debtor/creditor] have [even] implicitly stipulated a duty of care towards third parties” (BGH NJW 1984, 355, 356). While the BGH still founds the concept on implied terms reasoning and thus derives the rights of the third party from the contract between creditor and defendant, the third party’s (reasonable) reliance on the accuracy of the statement and the special skill of the defendant attains special weight in the individual case. (See, now, § 311 III 2 BGB, which stresses the importance of reliance.) It comes as little surprise therefore to see that more recent decisions apply the concept also to situations where there is a potential or actual conflict of interest between the contractual creditor and the third party (BGHZ 127, 378; for details see note to case 23). This move away from the requirement of the creditor’s interest points towards a gradual convergence with the approach established in Hedley Byrne. But the reader should be aware that in this area of the law it is difficult to generalise from individual cases. For instance, in a recent decision the tenth senate of the BGH reasserted the contractual foundations of the concept. (See, BGH NJW 2001, 514.) The Court of Appeal Frankfurt had argued that certain heads of damages were not included in the scope of the duty owed by the surveyor. This was confined to the creditor’s (or for that matter the third party’s) reliance on the correctness of the commissioned report concerning the presence of toxic substances in the soil of the development site. The BGH rejected this line of reasoning as being too restrictive. In this context the court stressed that once the third party was included in the contract and had a relation with the promisee, reliance was not the main element in determining the extent of the surveyor’s liability.

Let us then turn to the conditions required for what we shall call “the opening of the contractual umbrella”. We note that they are—in theory—three. (Rich references to the case-law illustrating these requirements are given by Sonnenschein, “Der Vertrag mit Schutzwirkung für Dritte—und immer neue Fragen”, JA 1979, 225, and Beyer, “Vertraglicher Drittschutz”, JuS 1996, 473.) First, the third party must come into contact with the performance of the contractual debtor and be endangered (or otherwise affected) by any misperformance in (roughly) the same way as the contractual creditor. This is commonly known as the requirement of proximity of performance (Leistungsnähe). Secondly, according to what is probably the better view and subject to the qualifications already made, the contractual creditor must have some interest in protecting the third party, and thirdly, the above two elements must be known to the debtor/defendant at the time of conclusion of the contract (or the commencement of the contractual negotiations).

This, as stated, is a subject rich in case-law where most generalisations are dangerous; not all decisions are clearly reconcilable with one another (as German lawyers readily admit); and where the only discernible trend is for the courts—despite academic doubts—to move towards an expansion of the contractual umbrella.

(ii) Drittschadensliquidation

The advantages, if any, that the contractual approach offers over the tort reasoning will be considered in the note to cases 25 and 26, below. Here, let us look briefly at the other concept devised by German lawyers to solve cases of pure economic loss in cases like (arguably) Ross v. Caunters [1980] Ch. 297 and Leigh and Silavan v. Aliakmon Shipping Co. Ltd. (The Aliakmon) [1986] AC 785.

Drittschadensliquidation is a judge-made doctrine which allows a creditor (the promisee) to a contract to claim (in contract) for loss resulting from the non-execution or bad execution of the contract, which falls not upon him (the creditor) but upon a third party provided that the third party has suffered a loss instead of the promisee. (For a similar approach see Lord Clyde's speech in Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd. v. Panatown Ltd. (No. 1) [2001] 1 AC 518, 529). It is of first importance to note that the third party is entitled to have the right assigned. The principle involves an exception to the so-called doctrine of the creditor's interest according to which as a general rule a claimant can recover for his own loss only. Unlike the concept of the Vertrag mit Schutzwirkung it does not affect the notion of relativity of contract for it does not enable the third party to sue directly.

Sometimes, however, a contract action may not be available, for instance where a third party to a contract of carriage damages goods in transit in an accident. If the buyer is on risk the seller will not suffer a financial loss as he remains entitled to claim from the buyer the price of the goods (see § 447 BGB). Yet, if the seller is the owner of the goods at the time of the accident, only he is entitled to bring an action under § 823 I BGB. BGHZ 49, 356 allowed the action of the seller and applied the concept of Drittschadensliquidation. From this perspective the concept appears as a general question of the law of damages. Still if the contract route is available the action will most likely be in contract due to the absence of true vicarious liability in tort, which will be examined more closely in chapter 3.

The main rationale of the doctrine of Drittschadensliquidation is to ensure that the defaulting party in the contract (or the tortfeasor) does not benefit from the fact that in these cases the loss has been shifted (Gefahrenlastung, zufällige Schadensverlagerung) from the creditor to the third party. If this exception to the doctrine of the creditor's interest had not been accepted, the defaulting party would not be liable to his creditor (since the latter has suffered no loss). Nor would the guilty party been liable (in contract) to the third party in the absence of any contractual link between the two of them. Like all judge-made rights, however, this right is kept under close scrutiny lest it get out of control and expose the contractual debtor to an unlimited number of claims. Thus, the third party will be allowed to rely on the doctrine and seek assignment of the creditor's rights against the promisor or the tortfeasor only where special relations between him and the creditor to the contract cause the interest (and the loss) to be shifted on to him. Drittschadensliquidation applies only in certain traditionally recognised situations. These are mainly three: certain agency situations, given that German law does not accept undisclosed agency; trust and bailment cases; and, finally, in relation to carriage of goods. Indeed, the courts are reluctant to extend its scope except in an incremental manner. Thus, the BGH dismissed Drittschadensliquidation as an inappropriate way of solving the problem of product liability (see case 61); and denied its application to the factual context of the cable cases (see case 13). These two cases contain very useful comments on the scope and rationale of the doctrine.

The fons et origo of this development seems to be a decision of the Court of Appeal in Lübeck (Seufferts Archiv II (1857), 36 at p. 47), where an agent was allowed to claim damages suffered by his “undisclosed” principal. The need for a concept such as Drittschadensliquidation becomes obvious if one takes into account that German law does not accept undisclosed agency. (See Zweigert and Kötz pp. 436 ff.) This is so even though many situations occur which involve factually analogous situations; see in particular §§ 383 ff. HGB (contract of commission) and §§ 453 ff. HGB (forwarding agents). Thus, on the one hand the agent does not sustain loss because he is acting on account of the “principal” who reimburses him, but on the other hand the “principal” cannot sue directly on the contract. Hence, the agent is allowed to sue on behalf of the “principal”. (E.g. RGZ 75, 169; 115, 419; BGH NJW 1989, 3099.) An equally important example of the application of the theory can be found in cases where the risk (but not the property) in goods has passed from the seller to the buyer (e.g. §§ 446 and 447 BGB). In this type of situation German law has for a long time now (see e.g. RGZ 62, 331, 335; BGH VersR 1972, 1138; VersR 1976, 168) accepted that the seller can recover damages from the wrongdoer in order to hand them over to the buyer or assign this claim to the buyer. (Indeed, because of § 281 BGB he is obliged, if requested, to do so.) One should add, however, that in cases involving carriage of goods by land the contract of carriage is normally treated as a contract for the benefit of the consignee which is a source of additional rights. (On this see the recently reformed § 421 HGB and Herber, NJW 1999, 3297, 3302). Drittschadensliquidation has also been applied to cases of carriage of goods by sea where, as in English law, the rights under the bill of lading are transferred upon indorsement. (See: BGHZ 25, 250.)

Simplifying the facts of The Aliakmon, one notes that there the buyer, who had the risk but not the property in the purchased goods and who was not the carrier’s contracting party, failed in his action against the ship owner whose negligent storage had damaged the goods resulting in the plaintiff’s economic loss. BGH VersR 1972, 1138 was a decision involving land transport. The seller was the contracting party as also the owner of the goods, while the buyer was on risk. The BGH, following established case-law (starting with RGZ 62, 331), had no difficulty in resorting to the theory of Drittschadensliquidation. This meant that the seller, was entitled to recover damages in respect of the buyer’s loss, and since this right had been assigned to the plaintiff buyer, the latter was allowed to recover damages for his own loss from the defendant carrier. In German law the plaintiff buyer in The Aliakmon would have been entitled to require the promisee, the seller, to assign his remedy against the carrier (by relying on § 281 I BGB). In practical terms, this addresses Lord Goff’s main objection against a contractually-founded theory of transferred loss. See, The Aliakmon ([1985] 1 QB 350, 390); White v. Jones [1995] 2 AC 207, 257; and most recently in Panatown [2001] 1 AC 518, 544–545: “The shortcomings of this rule must, I imagine, have been that it left the initiative with the seller, rather than with the consignee who was the person who had suffered the loss of or damage to the goods”. Thus, the doctrine of Drittschadensliquidation also provides a solution in those cases where the promisee might not have an incentive to enforce the right on behalf of the third party. (Whether or not such a solution would be available in English law is a matter for speculation. Thus, contrast Lord Diplock’s (unfavourable) dicta in The Albazero [1977] AC 774, 845 (a case involving associated companies) with Professor Goode’s forceful criticism in (1987) 103 LQR 433, 457.)

The appropriateness of this approach to solve the kind of problem that faced the English courts in The Aliakmon or The Albazero and also to address some of the difficulties that occurred in cases such as Panatown is obvious to a comparative lawyer. This belief is reinforced by Lord Justice Robert Goff's judgment in the Court of Appeal ([1985] QB 350) where the learned judge, in effect, invented his "parallel" theory of "transferred loss" without being aware of the German counterpart (see his comments in Markesinis (ed.), The Gradual Convergence (1994) p. 129). However, his theory of "transferred loss" differs in so far as it aimed at creating a direct right of action in tort of the third party, i.e. the plaintiff buyer. Although in some instances the German concept may also serve to found a—concurrent—action in tort, it is a prerequisite of such an action that the plaintiff has a proprietary interest in the goods. So for instance if the goods are carried at the buyer's risk but property passes late, the seller may recover the buyer's loss in tort. Unlike the principle of "transferred loss" suggested by Goff LJ in The Aliakmon, the German concept does not establish a direct third party right but merely entitles the buyer to have the seller's remedy assigned.

Ironically, in the House of Lords, Lord Brandon of Oakbrook rejected the principle of "transferred loss" as a principle of tort law by arguing that contract law provided sufficient and adequate protection in the field of carriage of goods. But the doctrine he relied upon in this context, The Albazero principle ([1977] AC 774), is a contractual device that is a functional equivalent of Drittschadensliquidation and was later (following the House of Lords' retreat from Anns in Murphy) to be extended to cover construction cases. Thus, once again, we can notice here how closely interrelated are the two areas of pure economic loss and contract law. The trend in English law now seems to be to apply reasoning similar to Drittschadensliquidation instead of extending recoverability of pure economic loss in tort. It will be interesting to see how those Common law jurisdictions which have not followed Murphy will react to Panatown. (E.g. Canada: Winnipeg Condominium Corp. v. Bird Construction Co. Ltd (1995) 121 DLR (4th) 193; Australia: Bryan v. Maloney (1995) 182 CLR 609; New Zealand: Invercargill City Council v. Hamlin [1994] 3 NZLR 513; [1996] AC 624 (PC, NZ)). Nowadays, the situation in The Aliakmon is covered by the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1992 which simplifies the transfer of the rights under the contract of carriage contained in the bill of lading. This Act was introduced in Parliament by Lord Goff, himself, as a private peer's Bill. (For a fuller examination see notes to cases 25–26.)

What unites the large miscellany of cases which the Germans have systematically brought under the heading of Drittschadensliquidation are two common elements. (Täger's Die Geltendmachung des Drittschadens (1938) was groundbreaking in identifying these common features.) First is the fact that in these cases the invocation of the flood-gates argument—the "shop soiled" argument of the timorous as Professor Fleming calls it in his Introduction to the Law of Torts (2nd edn. 1985, p. 3)—is inappropriate since one person only suffers loss. This feature, incidentally, also serves to distinguish the concept from the wider Vertrag mit Schutzwirkung für Dritte. Secondly, the co-contractor of the defaulting party—in our two examples the testator or the seller of the goods—will have no incentive to sue (or may simply no longer be around to sue!). As German lawyers argue, in these cases the person who has suffered the loss has no remedy while the person who has the remedy has suffered no loss. If such a situation is left unchallenged, the defaulting party may never face the consequences of his negligent conduct; his insurer may receive an unexpected (and undeserved) windfall; and the person on whom the loss has fallen may be left without any redress; a meritorious claim would go down a "legal black hole” to use the more vivid English term. The question to our mind is not whether the plaintiffs should be allowed to recover—we believe the answer must be in the affirmative. The real question is whether the defaulting defendants should run the risk of incurring greater liability towards these plaintiffs than they would have incurred had they been sued by their co-contractor. The German reply is negative; and their contractually flavoured solutions offer a neater explanation of this result than the tentative English attempts to harness tort for an answer.

(iii) Some preliminary reactions to the German concepts and techniques

The comparatist must first describe a foreign system to his readership and then see what conclusions can be drawn from it to benefit his national law. The picture of German law given thus far is, inevitably, a simplified one. The reality is infinitely more complex, if not inscrutable to the foreign observer who treads on perilous ground when expressing a critical view of this system. But even the potentially distorted appreciation of foreign law by the comparatist may be of use to the national lawyer. Four points should, thus, be made at this stage.

First, the test that will determine who is to be included within the protective umbrella of the contract is crucial if the concept of contract with protective effects vis-à-vis third parties is to be employed. Most German lawyers agree that the list of such persons must be limited; but they differ greatly as to the criteria that must be employed to achieve this aim and, as a result, as to who precisely enjoys such protection. The traditional emphasis on the creditor’s interest to protect the third party/plaintiff seems to me to be the most precise test without being excessively restrictive. In any event in our opinion it is probably more workable to place the emphasis on the relationship between creditor and third party/plaintiff (which is known to the debtor/defendant) than to operate, as the Common law does, on the basis of the amorphous foreseeability test applied to the plaintiff/defendant relationship. However, as recent developments show, this approach might reach its limit where there is a potential conflict of interest between creditor and third party. This demonstrates that recourse must also be had to the reliance placed on the special skill of the professional in addition to the purpose and scope of the defendant’s undertaking to the contractual creditor.

Secondly, one might venture the thought that the more recent attempts to enlarge the circle of contractually protected persons threatens to undermine the security and (relative) predictability provided by the older tests. If the current trend remains limited, however, to the banking/financial services, it is understandable if not necessarily justifiable. For in these cases the German courts are essentially faced with variations of the Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd v. Heller & Partners Ltd ([1964] AC 465) problem which they cannot solve through tort law because of the restrictive provision of § 823 I BGB. The way they expand contract is thus, essentially, as arbitrary as our own attempts to limit tort duties in similar factual situations. Though the pressures are exerted in different directions in the two systems, the problem is the same: discovering the proper bounds of liability which modern insurance practices tend to expand outwards.

Thirdly, the concept of contract with protective effects vis-à-vis third parties and the theory of transferred loss originally had a different area of application. The first was used in cases of physical injury and property damage (mainly in order to avoid the problems created by § 831 BGB); the latter applied to cases of pure economic loss, which had not always received full and adequate regulation by the positive law. In this original context the two notions presented one further difference. In the former, the risk of the contractual debtor was widened by the inclusion of a third party within the contractual umbrella. For example, in the Cavalier v. Pope type of situation, the landlord's liability was extended to cover injury suffered by the tenant's family as well as by the tenant himself. On the other hand, in the "transferred loss" type of case, all that happens is a "fortuitous" shift of liability as the loss is transferred from the contractual creditor to the third party. As stated, however, the concept of contract with protective effects vis-à-vis third parties was extended in 1965 by the legal malpractice case (concerning the defective will) to cover pure economic loss. Therefore, one now has two essentially contractual devices for dealing with these cases of economic loss.

Fourthly, and most important, I am inclined to think that German law, once stripped of its many technicalities and competing theories, is characterised essentially by one central idea that could be useful to both English and American Common lawyers. This is that these actions are contractual not tortious in nature. No matter that this approach grew out of the necessity to avoid defective or narrow tort provisions. No matter which device is used to accomplish the end aim (contract with protective effects vis-à-vis third parties or "transferred loss"). In the end, what matters is that the result achieved through the medium of contract ensures that the plaintiff succeeds in these cases but that the defendant's liability remains similar to that which he had agreed with his co-contractor. This is not the right approach for all instances of pure economic loss; but it seems to be eminently suitable for those cases that straddle the traditional contract/tort divide. (This is, certainly, the position de lege lata, de lege ferenda, however, some German lawyers (e.g. von Bar, Gutachten und Vorschläge zur Überarbeitung des Schuldrechts—herausgegeben vom Bundesminister der Justiz) who have studied the Anglo-American scene believe that the answer may lie in expanding tort law. As already stated, this is perfectly acceptable provided one then makes it clear that, generally speaking, the "tort" duty is shaped, both in its scope and extent, by the underlying contract. If, however, this is accepted, the discussion about contract/tort becomes entirely academic.)

(e) Other rights (sonstige Rechte)

(i) Generally

The term “other rights” sounds and is open-ended giving judges a relatively free hand in the determination of its scope and that is why some German authors (Medicus, for instance, Schuldrecht II (9th edn., 1999) no. 744) refer to it as a mini-general clause (kleine Generalklausel). But this judicial freedom is relative in the sense that it has always been understood that the rights and interests protected by this formulation must be absolute rights, i.e. rights which can be interfered with by everyone and which can be asserted against everyone. We have thus seen how possession can—in certain circumstances—be covered by § 823 I BGB (and, incidentally, asserted even against the rightful owner) (BGH 13 July 1976, VersR 1976, 943; BGH 18 November 1980, VersR 1981, 161.); and the same goes for other “real” rights (dingliche Rechte) such as servitudes (Dienstbarkeit), pledges (Sachpfandrecht) and mortgages (Hypothek). (BGH 6 November 1990, NJW 1991, 695.) Other absolute rights are patents (see § 47 of the Patent Law), copyrights, trademarks, and also the name of a physical or legal (commercial) person (§§ 12 BGB and 37 of the HGB). The right to one’s image (or picture) (Recht am eigenen Bilde = §§ 22 ff. of the Act on Artistic Creations) is also included under this heading. But not every attempt to create new entitlements will succeed under this heading. The Bundesarbeitsgericht, for instance, in its judgment of 4 June 1998 (NJW 1999, 164) refused to hold that there was a “right to one’s employment” that could be brought under this rubric. More importantly, relative rights, such as rights arising under a contract and owed by one contractor to the other, are not included in this article. The breach of an obligation, which arises only from a contract (e.g. failure to repay a debt) and does not also amount to the commission of a tort (e.g. dentist negligently removing the wrong tooth), will not be actionable in tort. But if the same set of facts amounts to a breach of contract and a tort, the plaintiff is free to choose the type of action, which is more favourable to him. For German law—unlike French law—ignores the rule against cumulation of actions (RGZ 88, 433, 434–5; BGHZ 55, 392, 395). Equally, as already stated, if one person induces another person to break his contractual obligations towards a third party, he will not be liable under § 823 I BGB towards this third party for his economic loss. He may, however, be liable to him under § 826 BGB if the other conditions of liability in this paragraph are satisfied.

Three types of situation have given rise to considerable literature and case-law and they must now be examined. The first is related to the possible use of § 823 I BGB within the context of family relations; the second deals with the right of an established and operating business; and the third with the general right to one's personality and privacy. The last two "rights" are very important judicial creations and seventeen decisions dealing with them are reproduced below (cases 32–49).

(ii) Delictual protection of family relationships

It is by no means clear to what extent a person's family status and his legal rights thereunder are protected by § 823 I BGB. In some cases, the answer seems clearer than in others. "Parental power" is, generally, regarded as an "other" right. Thus, if in the course of his divorce proceedings, a father has lost the right to exercise those powers and refuses to hand the child over to the mother, he may be held liable under § 823 I BGB (see RGZ 141, 319). But do spouses have an absolute right erga omnes to demand the respect of their marital bond? Though in some cases the BGH has given a positive answer to the above question (see, for example, BGHZ 6, 630 where a wife was given redress (maintenance) against an unfaithful husband), the attitude of the Supreme Court is, on the whole, quite negative. Thus the "marital intruder" (Ehestörer) will not be liable to the husband in tort for enticing his wife away and then causing the husband the cost of instituting adultery and divorce proceedings (BGHZ 23, 279). Neither will the wife be liable to the husband on this ground (BGHZ 23, 215 and, more recently, BGH NJW 1990, 706).

Though this solution has not passed without criticism, it does appear to be correct. As the Supreme Court itself remarked in the above decisions, vis-à-vis the parties in the marriage there is no reason for the law of delict to operate, their relationship being the exclusive concern of the provisions of the family law section of the Code. Equally, the third party should not be held liable for causing the breach of the marriage, since marital fidelity is something that concerns the spouses and them alone. This approach, that marriage as an institution is subject to its own rules and lies outside the protective ambit of the rules of the law of tort, has also been adopted by even more recent decisions of the Supreme Court (e.g. BGH JZ 1973, 668). However, not all lawyers are convinced by this kind of reasoning so the debate cannot be regarded as being closed. Nevertheless, it should be made clear that those academics who argue against the established view are only arguing for a limited extension of § 823 I BGB so as to allow certain claims. What, more precisely, they have in mind are the costs of divorce, delivery of a child born of an adulterous relationship, litigation for illegitimation proceedings (BGHZ 57, 229), and maintenance of the child (before 1998 there was a special maintenance provision in § 1615 b II BGB for illegitimate children; since then they are covered by the general maintenance provision of § 1601 BGB).

(iii) The right of an established and operating business

This is a judge-made right (BGH 21 June 1966, BGHZ 45, 307) which, came into existence soon after the Code came into effect and gradually developed its present contours. Like the next right (on human personality), it has developed into a kind of general clause intended to protect commercial enterprises against the infliction of certain types of rather vaguely defined interferences with their economic interests. These include such varied topics as area of operations, customers, commercial rights not already covered by patent or copyright law, boycotts etc. Its emergence may be due to certain gaps that were found to exist in the delictual provisions of the Code and the system of private law as a whole. Nonetheless, it is remarkable not only as a judicial creation but also because in a free-enterprise economy, where free competition is both the justification and the result of the system, the protection afforded to business entities cannot be as extensive as that given to property. This is why the contours of the right are rather vague and have to be determined with caution by the courts.

As stated, the development of this right began only four years after the BGB had come into force when the courts realised that the protection given by the Code in cases of pure economic loss was very limited. § 826 BGB, for example, only caught intentional activities which were contrary to “public policy”; and § 824 BGB caught only untrue statements damaging the credit of another person. Nor was § 823 I BGB of any help in many instances.

The first cases were mainly concerned with one type of conduct, which hindered the business activities of a competing enterprise. The noxious activity typically took the form of the defendant claiming unjustifiably that the plaintiff had no right to use a particular industrial property right (patent, registered design) held by him (the defendant). If the plaintiff ceased his activities, thereby suffering economic loss, but subsequently discovered that the defendant’s claim was groundless and also was made in a careless manner, then he should be and was allowed to claim his loss. From the very beginning, therefore, it was made clear, and was subsequently repeatedly confirmed, that this kind of protection could only avail business or commercial enterprises and not, for example, a legal partnership or a trade union or a club. This distinction, which has not passed without criticism, was perhaps explained by the desire of the courts to keep within reasonable bounds the newly created right which, however, was destined to develop even further.

Four decisions are reproduced below (32–35) to illustrate the development of this new right and the accompanying annotations show that the literature to which it has given rise is considerable. (To these four cases one should add two of the cable cases (11 and 12) which also contain clear evidence of the desire of the courts not to extend unduly the ambit of the new right. This is obvious also from: BGH JZ 1983, 857.)

The doubts expressed about this right are understandable, not only in view of the fact that court-made rights are typically followed by an expression of concern by the judges that the new right (or tort) be kept within reasonable bounds. (Cf. the debates, especially among academics, after the decision of the House of Lords in Anns v. Merton London Borough Council [1978] AC 728.) These doubts are also explicable by the fact that the new right was soon expanded to cover cases where issues (like freedom of expression) were involved alongside the right of a business enterprise to safeguard its financial interests. This was the case with the extension of the right in order to protect entrepreneurs against criticisms that adversely affected their business but which were not caught by either §§ 824 or 826 BGB. For example, organising boycotts of the plaintiff's business or making factually true statements about it which the defendant culpably knew would severely affect the plaintiff but which he had no legitimate interest to make (see a call for a boycott in a commercial setting, case 35, BGH NJW 1999, 279). As stated, the danger of inhibiting free speech in these cases is considerable; and the need to "balance" the competing interests before giving judgment is also very great. (This balancing is, incidentally, a feature of the rights that are brought under the heading of sonstige Rechte. For interference with them does not, automatically, satisfy the requirement of unlawfulness (as it does with, say, interference with body or property); it must be weighed against competing rights before the element of unlawfulness is satisfied.)

Not every call for an economic boycott will be censured. The famous Lüth decision (BVerfGE 7, 212 of 15 January 1958; a translation of the key parts of this important decision is reproduced as case 36) shows that the motives of the boycott caller (defendant in that ensuing action) may save him from censure and give protection to his speech. But the Blinkfüer case (26 February 1969, BVerfGE 25, 256) also demonstrates the limits of this immunity. The litigation was born of the cold war, which was intensified when the Berlin wall was erected in 1961. An important publishing group—the Axel Springer group—instructed its dealers and distributors not to handle journals, which contained information about television programmes made in what used to be Eastern Germany. Dealers who refused to comply with this instruction would, in future, be barred from selling Springer newspapers. The letter was mainly directed against Blinkfüer, a small, left wing publication. It immediately sued Springer, relying on § 823 I BGB and claiming that the call for a boycott was "unlawful" under that paragraph of the Civil Code which protects its rights as an established and operating business and was causing it a 10 per cent reduction in its trade. Springer's defence, that the call for the boycott was that, notwithstanding the provision of the Civil Code, it was constitutionally protected along the lines of Lüth. But the argument was turned down since Springer's call for a boycott was different from Lüth's in so far as the latter "was simply an appeal to the moral and political responsibility of his audience". (BVerfGE 25, at 267. The translation is taken from Professor Kommers, The Constitutional Jurisprudence of the Federal Republic of Germany, 2nd edn. (1997), 374.) Moreover, Lüth's call for a boycott [in the earlier litigation] "was incapable of directly and effectively restricting the human and artistic freedom of . . . Harlan [the plaintiff in that earlier action who complained of the call to boycott his work] for Lüth [unlike Axel Springer, the defendant in the second action] had no means of coercion at his disposal . . .". In the end, therefore, Springer's economic might, its "financial grip" over its distributors, and the threatening tone in which the letter calling for a boycott was written, all weighed against them. The court thus treated the call for boycott as a self-seeking speech worthy of no protection in law. But the Constitutional Court, true to its self-appointed task of weighing each case separately, refused to go as far as saying that all calls for economic boycott were worthy of constitutional protection. “The Constitution”, reasoned the Court in some interesting obiter dicta, “does not bar the economically more powerful from engaging in the intellectual struggle of opinion . . . provided that the means employed by the person who calls for a boycott [are] constitutionally acceptable”. This would have been the case, for instance, had Springer called for a “reader” boycott rather than tried to exploit the economic dependence of the subjects of the boycott. Once again, the reasoning is nuanced and the result not that different from that reached in the USA where, for instance, courts have held that picketing aimed at encouraging consumers to boycott a secondary business does not enjoy First Amendment protection. (Cf. NLRB v. Retail Store Employees Union Local 1001 447 US 607 (1980).) In this context one should also look at case 18 (BGH NJW 1998, 377) in which the German court came to a very similar conclusion. In that case, a blockade by protesters (who sought to exercise their rights under Articles 5 and 8 GG) was, somewhat unusually, not dealt with under the heading of the right of an established and operating business (as in BGHZ 59, 30; BGHZ 63, 124; BGHZ 89, 383). The balancing of interests thus took place in respect of the right to possession of the equipment which the contractors brought on to the proposed industrial park.

One should also note that the desire of the courts to keep this new right within manageable bounds has also been expressed in the form of an imperative that the interference with the established and operating business is “direct” before it can become actionable under this heading. The notion of directness, however, as Common lawyers know only too well from their experience with the “remoteness” cases, is an invitation to the judge to hide his own value judgment behind an apparently unimpeachable concept. Not surprisingly, perhaps, it also gave rise to numerous other attempts to discover the right test. Perhaps, the most often quoted test is in fact one given by the BGH itself. Thus, for the Supreme Court the conduct of the defendant will constitute an invasion of the plaintiff’s right if it is “business-connected”. According to this court, this means that it must be “in some way directed against the business as such . . . and must not simply affect rights and interests which are separable from the business as a functioning unit”. This formula, as many academics have admitted quite bluntly, is nothing but an empty shell of words, and perhaps the courts should attempt more openly to weigh the reciprocal interests rather than to indulge in the creation of opaque formulae.

Finally, since the element of “unlawfulness” (on which see below 3(a)) has to be positively established in each single case, the result is that the new general clause has to receive its precise content by continuous judicial activity. This, in fact, has been happening, as Deutsch points out most clearly in JZ 1984, 308. The right of an operating and established business is further restricted by the subsidiary nature of the right (Subsidiarität) which means that the right can only be invoked in the absence of any other relevant provision (on which, for example, see BGH 5 November 1962, BGHZ 38, 204.)

(iv) The general right to one's personality

In the united Germany, as indeed in the United States, the first attempts to recognise a general right of privacy (and, more generally, a wider protection of the human personality) were made by distinguished academics towards the end of the nineteenth century. (Thus, Kohler "Das Recht an Briefen", Archiv für bürgerliches Recht VII, 94ff.; Gierke, Deutsches Privatrecht I, 707; III, 887) On a more regional basis, however, one must note the Civil Code of Saxony of 1863—greatly admired at the time—gave judges the discretion to award damages in cases involving the "dissemination of untrue statements about a person's life, personal abilities, conduct of office, established business, or other relations." Of course, the emphasis on untrue statements brings this provision closer to defamation than privacy. This caveat, however, does not really affect the pioneering nature of the Code given the feeling, widely accepted at that time, that interferences with honour, reputation, and other such personal interests should not be vindicated through an action for damages. (See, for example, various obiter in RGZ 7, 295, which reflects the view taken by most German courts.) This sceptical attitude towards a general right was, however, also adopted by the Committee, which was entrusted with the task of drafting the BGB. Indeed, in its Report, it expressed its doubts in uncompromising (and socially divisive) terms when it stated that "it [would be] repugnant to the dominant opinion among the population to place non-material values on the same level as property interests and to make good with money interferences with non-material interests. The Code [which was being drafted at the time]" continued the Report, "should not ignore this view, especially prevalent among the better circles of society [sic]. Only the worst elements [of society] would try to take advantage [of such a provision]. Pursuit of profit, selfishness, and covetousness would be promoted and wrongful proceedings, started from ulterior motives, would be encouraged." (Protokolle der Kommission für die Zweite Lesung des Entwurfs des Bürgerlichen Gesetzbuchs, vol. I (1897), pp. 622–3).

Clearly, the times were not yet ripe for the recognition of any wide-ranging rights of personality; and the "toughness" of living conditions at that time made the average citizen quite indifferent towards such "lesser" interferences with his daily life. Inevitably, therefore, German law opted for a more gradual extension of the protection of the various aspects of the human personality. It was not until the Nazi holocaust demonstrated its utter disregard for human beings, their life, and their dignity, that the need for a greater legal protection began to be felt. And even then it was strongly resisted by sections of the Press which managed to scupper two legislative attempts to deal with this problem. The next move was thus facilitated by the post-war climate, the newly sanctioned Bill of Rights (contained in the first twenty articles of the Constitution of Bonn of 1949), and the growing willingness to entertain the possibility that human rights provisions could be applied not only vertically (to control the State) but also horizontally affecting (but not directly regulating) the relations of private citizens. What happened next is explained in the translated cases and their annotations—more than usually detailed since many comparatists would take the view that the German law of privacy holds some interesting lessons for the English Common law. Here, therefore, only four general observations will be made.

First, the judicially created general right of personality covers invasions of privacy of human beings and (less convincingly) legal entities (Palandt, BGB (60th edn. 2001) § 823 BGB, nos 181 et seq.); but it also goes well beyond what we, in the Common law, understand as privacy rights. Thus, in German law, damages—calculated on a compensatory or restitutionary basis—or injunctions (Unterlassungsanspruch), have been granted for varied violations of personality rights. They include the following. “Appropriation of likeness” (BGH February 14, 1958, BGHZ 26, 349). Unlawful release of an insured person’s medical record (BGH April 2, 1957, BGHZ 24, 72.). “Neighbour snooping” (OLG Köln 13 October 1988, NJW 1989, 720; DM 7,000 were awarded to the successful plaintiff). Unnecessary publicity about an impending divorce of a member of the aristocracy (OLG Hamburg 26 March 1970, NJW 1970, 1325. Since the case involved a member of the Hohenzollern family the court carefully considered (and, in this case rejected as inapplicable) the possible (statutory) exception which applies to “persons of contemporary history”. An injunction against publication was thus granted to the plaintiff. If the “private” information is already in the public domain, the courts will be reluctant to accord privacy protection. Yet even in such cases the courts will investigate whether a full identification of the complainant is necessary or, in effect, is part of a gold-digging operation on the part of the defendant/publisher. Thus, see, BGH 26 January 1965, JZ 1965, 411; BGH 24 November 1987, NJW 1988, 1984. But cf. BGH 15 April 1980, NJW 1980, 1790). The removal of organs from a dead body without permission. (LG Bonn, 25 February 1970, JZ 1971, 56.) The right to one’s sexual identity, which includes the right of a transsexual to obtain a correction of his/her birth certificate recording the change of sex. (1st Division of the Constitutional Court of 16 March 1982, BVerfGE 60, 123.) The publication (by Der Stern magazine) of an unlawfully recorded telephone conversation (made by persons unknown) between two leading politicians. (BGH 19 December 1978, BGHZ 73, 120. The court decision is noteworthy for the detailed balancing of privacy rights versus speech rights. The conversation was between Helmut Kohl (at the time of writing, former Federal Chancellor) and Kurt Biedenkopf (former Prime Minister of the State of Saxony). Incidentally, this is a rare example of a suit brought by Mr. Kohl who, unlike the former Prime Minister of Bavaria Josef Strauss, avoided recourse to the courts.) The false signing of a painting with the name of a famous, contemporary German painter. (BGH 8 June 1989, BGHZ 107, 384.) The false and thereby damaging attribution of a statement to an important contemporary personality. (BVerfGE 3 June 1980, NJW 1980, 2070.) The unauthorised opening of sealed mail (BGH 20 February 1990, VersR 1990, 531. The opening of the sealed letter violates the personality rights of both sender and receiver.) The unauthorised imitation of the voice (of a recently deceased actor) for the sake of advertising a product (OLG Hamburg 8 May 1989, NJW 1990, 1995) and, most recently, photographing a public figure in a public place (BGH 19 Dec. 1995, BGHZ 131, 332 = NJW 1996, 1128 (third Caroline case, case 46). In a fourth and contemporaneous decision, known as the Caroline Son case—BGH 12. 12. 1995, BGH NJW 1996, 985—the court placed great emphasis on the defendant's obvious commercial motives in the taking of the prince's photographs.) That these results were achieved through an often bold re-appraisal of codal provisions of the Civil Code which, in the event were found to be outdated, can only be seen as a sign of open-mindedness on the part of the German judiciary.

Secondly, one must stress that the absence (until the Schacht decision of 1954) of a general right of personality did not mean that the protection afforded by German law (at any rate while the democratic order was respected) was inadequate, let alone non-existent. Nonetheless, the way the courts managed to afford protection was, at times, achieved in a somewhat crude legal manner and, in some respects, the current casuistic method of the English courts. When, for example, in 1899 the defendants broke into Bismarck's death chamber and photographed his corpse, public resentment was such that the court that had to hear the case against the photographers had to discover a way to deny the offenders the financial advantages of their conduct. In the event, the defendants were forced to hand over to the plaintiffs the negatives of the photographs. The actual decision, however, is more complicated than this summary suggests, since it had to be decided according to the old Gemeines Recht—i.e. the usus modernus Pandectarum—and was related to a bankruptcy question (since the defendants were insolvent): were the negatives part of their estate? (RGZ 45, 170). By 1907 this rather primitive protection was further extended by the Act on Artistic Creations (Kunsturhebergesetz) which, in §§ 22 et seq., prohibited the publication of a person's picture without his consent unless he was a "public figure" (though see KG JW 1928, 363). The unauthorised publication of private letters was also increasingly restricted, though in the beginning the protection afforded to the "author" (or, more typically, his heirs wishing to prevent publication of letters that were in their possession) depended upon whether the letters in question could be considered as "literary works". This move started with RGZ 69, 401 where the Imperial Court demonstrated great ingenuity when Nietzsche's sole heiress sought to prevent the publication of letters written by the philosopher, which the heirs of the addressee wished to publish. In the absence of a general right of personality, the court reasoned that the ownership in the letters had passed to the addressee (and to his heirs). But if the letters could be regarded as "artistic creations", they could then be given copyright protection. Thus, to start with, the publication of private facts, lying outside the range of fiduciary relations, received little or no publicity. Fifty years later, however, the Federal Court in the second Wagner case (BGHZ 15, 249), which involved the private diaries of Cosima Wagner written during her marriage to the great composer, held that the publication of private notes or records could be enjoined on privacy grounds. This was so, even if they fell short of the standards of "literary merit" that would ensure them protection under copyright laws. Other aspects of the human personality received more clearly defined protection by the Civil Code or other enactments. Thus, § 12 of the BGB protects the human name and § 826 BGB can also, on occasion, be of use. § 824 BGB can give an action against a person who publishes wrong facts which endanger the credit of the plaintiff and which he knows or ought to know are false. Finally, the crime of insult or slander (§ 185 of the Criminal Code) can be used in conjunction with § 823 II BGB to give rise to a civil action.

Thirdly, one should note that the new right created in 1954 and added to the list of other rights ought to have been modelled on the interests of life, body, health, and freedom. If the Code were ever to be redrafted, the protection of personality should be added to the list of those interests with which it is more related, rather than be treated as another right analogous, perhaps, to that of ownership. One must add, however, that such redrafting of the Code seems unlikely; at any rate, it has failed up to now to materialise since the protection of one person's personality and privacy can mean that another person's freedom of speech can be curtailed. The issues raised by this new right are highly sensitive. One must thus never forget that the right to be protected against an often irresponsible Press must be counterbalanced by the equally important need to preserve the freedom of the Press guaranteed by Article 5 of the Constitution (see also § 193 of the Criminal Code). Where the line will be drawn will thus depend on the circumstances of each case and the rich case law will, at best, provide useful guidelines but not binding rules. The famous "Lebach decision" (BVerfGE 35, 202), case 42, illustrates how difficult it can be to balance on the one hand the right to publish information and, on the other, "the right to anonymity". (The anonymity of criminals and, more, generally persons prosecuted for offences, has been discussed in a number of cases. Interesting dicta can be found, inter alia, in: OLG Düsseldorf NJW 1980, 599; OLG Hamburg NJW 1980, 842; OLG Hamm NJW 1982, 458; OLG Köln NJW 1987, 2682—the last one linking German domestic law with the European Convention on Human Rights.) It would appear, however, that the more active a person becomes in the "public domain" the less he will be able to argue successfully that criticisms of his conduct amount to actionable invasions of his privacy. (Thus, see BGHZ 36, 77, 80; BGH NJW 1964, 1471 and many others.) In the light of the above, the German courts have adopted a much-nuanced approach. On an ad hoc, basis they thus tend to take into account the following criteria, the rationality of which must be compared with the English tendency to stretch or adapt the parameters of old torts. Thus, in cases where speech clashes with privacy we find German courts weighing such factors: (a) the motives of the publisher. (Contrast BVerfGE 7, 198 (Lüth) with BVerfGE 25, 256 (Blinkfuer).) In the context of privacy protection, this has been taken to mean that if the invasion was motivated by a wish to make money at the expense of the plaintiff, damages should be assessed in a way that would deprive the tortfeasor of his ill-gotten gains. (See, for instance, BGH 19 September 1961, BGHZ 35, 363, 369ff and, more recently and in a more elaborated manner, BGH 15 November 1994, BGHZ 128, 14–16. This introduction of "punitive" damages into German law has generated much (and not always favourable) comment from academic commentators. See, for instance, Stoll, Haftungsfolgen im bürgerlichen Recht (1993), 57–67; 79–82; 210 ff.; Rosengarten, "Der Präventionsgedanke im Zivilrecht", NJW 1996, 1935–1938.) (b) the importance of the speech e.g. does it advance knowledge and public debate or merely benefit the speaker financially. (BVerfGE 7, 198, 219 (Lüth). For more interesting pronouncements on this sensitive point see: BGH 12 October 1993, NJW 1994, 124, translated in van Gerven, pp. 179–182.) (c) The way in which the information about the plaintiff was obtained: illegal means, (BVerfGE 66, 116 (1984) (Bild-Wallraff).) telephoto lens (indicating to the "intruder" that the plaintiff wished to be left alone: BGH 19 Dec. 1995, BGHZ 131, 332. The overall damages for Princess Caroline's harassment were fixed at 180,000 DM: OLG Hamburg, 25 July 1996, NJW 1996, 2870.) (d) The extent of the dissemination of the information is also a factor. (BVerfGE 35, 202 (Lebach); OLG Saarbrücken NJW 1997, 1376, 1379.) (e) The accuracy of the statement or whether it was fabricated by a news medium. (See: BVerfGE 34 269 (1973) (Soraya), case 38; BVerfGE 54, 208 (1980) (Böll); BGHZ 128, 1 (first Caroline Case). (f) The breadth of the restriction which the plaintiff wishes to place on the defendant's speech rights must also be reviewed; unnecessary restrictions will be denied or cut down to size. (BVerfGE 42, 143 (1976).) (g) Other, wider societal objectives which may be involved in the dispute BVerfGE 35, 202 (1973) (Lebach); BGH 12 October 1993, NJW 1994, 124 (Greenpeace).) and so on. (BGH 5 May 1964, NJW 1964, 1471 offers a good example of the position taken by German courts that not everything that interests the public can be published in the public interest. In that case, the defendant magazine, wrote an article about a criminal prosecution brought against the plaintiff. In it, it also referred to his repeatedly adulterous life. The court stressed that, normally, such revelations will be treated as amounting to actionable instances of violated privacy. In this case, however, the revelation was left un-punished since the plaintiff had, in the past, held himself out as a moralist.) The courts also take the view that a severe attack may justify an otherwise excessive counter-attack. (The Gegenschlag theory of speech: BVerfGE 12, 113 (1961) (Schmid-Spiegel), re-confirmed by BVerfGE 54, 129 (1980) (Art critic.) Despite the above-mentioned and, it is submitted supportable wide protection of different aspects of the human personality the German courts—ordinary and constitutional—have stressed from the early days of this jurisprudence that the balancing process must be undertaken with care and that, if in doubt, there is a kind of presumption in favour of the right of freedom of expression and opinion. (See, for instance, BGH 2 April 1957, BGHZ 24, 72; BGH 9 November 1993, NJW 1994, 127 and our discussion accompanying the translated extracts of cases given below in sections B. 11, 12.)

Finally, as has been already noted, the development of the new right was prompted by the Constitution's protection of the human personality (Articles 1 and 2). That this constitutional provision should be given material effect on the civil law plane was desirable and necessary. Less straightforward, however, was the method of widening the remedies available to the aggrieved plaintiff in order to make this protection more complete. Thus, in the first decision that recognised the new right—the Schacht case (case 39)—the court decreed, and the plaintiff was content to demand, reparation in specie (correction of statement published in a newspaper). In the second important judgment—the Herrenreiter case (case 40)—the court argued in favour of the analogical extension of § 847 BGB while in case 41 the court finally decided to base the award of monetary compensation on § 253 BGB in conjunction with Article 1 of the Constitution. If natural restitution is insufficient under § 253 BGB—reasoned the court—then that paragraph should be interpreted to allow even monetary compensation. The constitutional text, in its express desire to protect human dignity and personality, makes this extension of this civil remedy (damages) both desirable and necessary. This last part of the reasoning may be doubtful (see Medicus, no. 615). But given the legislative inactivity in the field, the Federal Supreme Court has repeatedly upheld it; indeed, the Constitutional Court itself held in a long and interesting judgment (BVerfGE 34, 269) that this “extension” in no way violated the constitutional order.

3. UNLAWFULNESS AND FAULT

(a) Unlawfulness

Unlike French law, German law has kept the element of fault (Verschulden) separate from that of objective unlawfulness (Rechtswidrigkeit). The first is understood as an attitude (the attitude of a person who intentionally or negligently causes damage to another) while the second simply indicates the violation of a legal norm in the absence of a legally recognised excuse. How far these two concepts can actually be kept apart is a matter of considerable controversy and what follows is a bird's-eye view of one of the most hotly debated—but essentially—theoretical areas of the German law of torts.

The traditional school of thought on the matter, which still enjoys much support with the courts, takes the view that the element of unlawfulness is automatically satisfied whenever one of the names rights or interests in § 823 I BGB has been violated. (Matters are, as we have seen, slightly more nuanced when one is talking of some of the new interests that have been brought under the term “other rights”.) For example, running over the plaintiff or damaging his property is an act, which brings about a consequence, which deserves the disapproval of the legal order. Unlawfulness, in other words, depends on the harmful result (Erfolgsunrecht). The only thing that can remove the “unlawfulness” is the presence of a legally recognized defence (Rechtfertigungsgrund). Action taken in order to repel an actual unlawful act upon oneself or another person is, according to § 227 BGB, such a defence (Notwehr). Equally, the destruction of a thing belonging to another person will, according to § 228 BGB, also be a lawful defence, so long as it does not represent a disproportionate reaction to the threatened danger (Notstand). Various forms of self-help can, within limits, remove the element of unlawfulness in the defendant’s conduct. (§ 228 BGB, for example, allows one to destroy the object from which the danger emanates; § 904 allows one—in certain circumstances—to destroy an object other than the one, which is the source of the danger). §§ 561, 859 and 1029 BGB contain specific applications of the same general rule in the context of possession and ownership. Another legally recognised defence is found in § 34 StGB (necessity).

Consent (Einwilligung des Geschädigten) can also have a bearing on the issue under consideration if it is lawfully given with full knowledge of all the facts and prior to the accomplishment of the activity complained of. How this works in the field of medical operations (where it is most relevant) is a matter of some dispute. For some academics, (e.g. Laufs, NJW 1969, 529) a properly performed medical operation forms part of the process of healing the plaintiff, it is an act done in his interest and, therefore, the element of unlawfulness is not satisfied. Case law takes the opposite view and regards every medical intervention as tantamount to an interference with a person’s corporal integrity. (Constant case law since BGH 16 January 1959, BGHZ 29, 179.) The patient’s consent will, however, remove the “unlawfulness” of the interference but only if it was “informed” i.e. given after all the information necessary to him to decide has been provided by the doctor. The need to obtain consent in advance of the medical intervention is taken very seriously in Germany and so is the need that it be “informed”. Thus, if the risk of an impending operation is summarily or inaccurately described in the form signed by the patient, the paucity of the information on the form will not be compensated by the fact that the doctor gave the patient ample opportunity to question him about the risks. (BGH 2 November 1993, NJW 1994, 793.) On the whole, if doubts are raised about the amount of information given to the patient, it is for the doctor to prove that he satisfied the appropriate standard. It goes without saying that in practice many difficulties can arise. This is especially true in cases of minors (who can give their own consent provided they are possessed of the required capacity of discernment). The same great care is taken in cases concerning the degree of information that the doctor has to supply to the patient (concerning the gravity of his illness) in order to obtain his consent (case 52–55, in section B deal with this problem). Clearly, other factors may come into play and the solution may, for instance, be affected by the likelihood of causing a neurotic plaintiff even greater injuries by revealing to him the full extent of his illness. All that can be said here is that these difficulties are in no way restricted to German law. (On problems of medical malpractice see, notes to cases 50–56, below, pp. 535 ff and also: Kern, “Fremdbestimmung bei der Einwilligung in ärztliche Eingriffe”, NJW 1994, 753; for more recent developments see the articles by A. Laufs in NJW 1994, 1562; NJW 1995, 1590; NJW 1997, 1609; NJW 1998, 1750; NJW 1999, 1758; and NJW 2000, 1757.)

If the defendant produces no justification, and a protective interest or right has been shown to have been violated, the element of unlawfulness is satisfied. The plaintiff must then go on to prove the defendant's fault, at least in those cases where the liability is not strict or based on presumed fault. The question whether the defendant acted intentionally or negligently becomes then the second phase of the inquiry and more about this will be said in sub-section (b) of this section.

This approach was challenged in the late 1950s and 60s by a host of distinguished academics like Nipperdey, von Caemmerer, Esser, and others. According to these authors, unlawfulness should be determined by looking not at the result of the conduct but at the conduct itself (Handlungsunrecht). The mere violation of one of the enumerated interests of § 823 I BGB, if done unintentionally, does not necessarily satisfy the element of unlawfulness. According to this school of thought, something more is required to do this and the missing element can be supplied by proof that the defendant's conduct has failed to measure up to the standard of conduct imposed by a particular imperative rule applicable to the occasion in question (Verhaltensnorm). Alternatively, it could be shown that the defendant's conduct violated the general duty imposed upon all human beings to take care not to inflict injury on others. The need for such a duty is obvious in every civilised society. And the scope and content of this general duty of care (allgemeine Sorgfaltspflicht), should be deduced from § 276 BGB, which imposes upon human beings the obligation to exercise in their ordinary daily affairs (im Verkehr) the care that the occasion demands. So the objective approach will determine what the defendant's behaviour should have been. Moreover, in determining this standard, the social utility of the activity in question will have to be taken into account (Sozialadäquanz). Indeed, influential authors who favour this type of approach have openly stated that policy considerations should ultimately determine the existence as well as the limits of such duties. When we discuss the "duties of care" in the next section, ample illustrations will be provided of how all this has worked in practice.

It was inevitable that a system like the German, which flourishes on legal theories, would respond to this approach with a stream of legal literature accepting, condemning, or varying the new theory. For present purposes these variations on the new theme are irrelevant. In any event, all authors agree that the new theory has no application to intentional acts. The intentional interference with any of the enumerated interests cannot and will not be condoned by the legal order. But for unintentional interferences, the kind of inquiry described in the previous paragraph will have to be conducted before the defendant's conduct can be treated as unlawful.

What is the difference between these two approaches? Theoretically, the answer is obvious. The first approach (the wrongful consequence approach) treats unlawfulness and fault separately; the latter will only be considered if the former has been satisfied. The wrongful conduct theory, on the other hand, is prepared to regard lack of reasonable care as being part of the concept of unlawfulness and to understand fault (Verschulden) more in the sense of imputability (Vorwerfbarkeit). In practical terms, however, these two theories will, in the vast majority of cases, produce the same result, for it makes little practical difference if one's liability under § 823 I BGB is excluded for lack of fault or unlawfulness. As Professor Kötz has remarked (Deliktsrecht, no. 99) "one can scarcely imagine a case which the proponents of the old and new theories would solve in a different manner". In view of this remark some attempt must be made to explain briefly the reasons for the (apparently) greater popularity of the new approach which, incidentally, has also received the approval of the Supreme Court (see case 109).

Thus, first of all, this more subtle approach in determining the unlawfulness by the defendant's activity seems more appropriate for the two new rights—the right of the established and operating business and the right to one's privacy. Both are vague, and as indicated, require this careful balancing of interests before their violation can be established. (See, for example, Deutsch in JZ 1984, 308 at 309.) In these instances, it makes little sense to attempt this weighing of conflicting interests at the later stage of the inquiry when the defendant's fault is being considered, for without such weighing of interests the interference cannot be branded as unlawful in the first place. The traditional theory about unlawfulness may be suitable for the clearly defined and delineated rights and interests of § 823 I BGB; but it is less satisfactory in the case of the new rights created by the Federal Supreme Court.

Secondly, the new theory may even be appropriate in the case of the enumerated rights and interests of § 823 I BGB. For example, if the manufacture of certain goods is statistically bound to lead to the death or injury of people and/or damage to their property. Is such an activity to be branded as unlawful without more ado? In Germany some 7,000 people are killed on the roads every year. It would be theoretically possible for every car manufacturer to calculate, by reference to his share of the car market, the number of deaths or injuries related to his cars. Since we are talking of positive acts (the manufacturing of the cars), leading to an interference with one of the protected rights or interests, the element of unlawfulness is fulfilled and the answer to our question must be positive: the activity is unlawful. This qualification is absurd; and in order to avoid going a step further and imposing liability on the manufacturer one is forced to deny fault or, even more artificially, deny "adequate causation". This latter way of denying liability is clearly very artificial, for the result (death or injury) is neither an atypical nor an improbable consequence of the activity (the manufacturing of cars), so adequate causation must be there. What may render the manufacturer liable for the harmful consequence is not whether it is (or is not) adequately linked to his activity, but his violation (if that be the case) of one of the duties which the law imposes upon persons in comparable situations. Only if one of those duties has been violated should the manufacturer be held liable to the plaintiff. This idea can be generalised. The duty-based approach is the more appropriate approach in all cases involving a so-called indirect interference (mittelbare Schädigungshandlungen) with the interests protected in § 823 I BGB, while in cases of a direct interference with these interests, the unlawfulness of the conduct may be presumed. (E.g. Larenz/Canaris, § 75 II, p. 366). To use a well-known example of a direct interference (which was envisaged by the fathers of the BGB as the paradigmatic case): a nurse injects a lethal dose of poison into the victim's arm. The courts and most academics have meanwhile, accepted this distinction between direct and indirect interference. Naturally, it can be criticised for some measure of artificiality. But it is certainly a step in the right direction. The presumption of unlawfulness in § 823 I BGB does not only cease to be an adequate response to modern areas of tort law; it is also contrasts unfavourably with the English more flexible duty of care concept. The theory of indirect interference requires the violation of a specific duty of care to establish unlawfulness. Moreover, in cases of presumed unlawfulness, a German lawyer will have to inquire whether there was a duty of care at the stage of determining negligence in the meaning of § 276 II BGB, for to establish fault a priori entails stating that a duty of care was breached. The nature of the inquiry is surely somewhat cumbersome. But if one looks at the substance rather than the form, the duty of care is just as much a central concept to German tort law as it is to the Common law. The importance of the duty concept can be also seen from the significance given by German courts to the scope and purpose of the duty owed which for a long time now has replaced the criterion of adequate causation as the main controlling factor of causation. (For further details, see the section in causation below). So the common lawyer should not be deterred by the apparent differences between § 823 I BGB and the table of content of any English textbook on tort.

Common lawyers, accustomed to dealing interchangeably with the same problems under different rubrics (duty, duty owed to the plaintiff, carelessness, or foreseeability), should not be surprised at this equivocation between the various concepts, nor dismayed by the fact that the same issues emerge for consideration under separate headings. If there is some advantage in considering some of these points under the heading of unlawfulness (or duty) instead of adequate causation (remoteness/foreseeability) it is, in Dean Prosser's words, that it can "serve to direct attention to these policy issues which determine the extent of the original obligation and of its continuance, rather than to the mechanical sequence of events which goes to make up causation in fact" (Law of Torts (4th edn., 1971) 244).

Thirdly, the new theory may in some limited instances lead to a different way of looking at problems and producing a different result. When the element of unlawfulness in the context of § 831 BGB is considered this statement will be made clearer (see below, chapter 3, § A1(d)).

Finally, one should, perhaps, add that this new approach, and the increased willingness to think in terms of duties of care, has had a considerable impact on the law relating to liability for omissions as will become clear from the discussion in the next section.

Notwithstanding all these points one must, however, repeat that one is going into these matters not because of their true significance in practice but because one wishes to give Common lawyers a taste of a German academic debate!

(b) Fault

A number of decisions are given below as illustrations. Generally speaking, however, and subject to one point only, the treatment which this topic receives in German law greatly resembles that found in common law textbooks.

The difference which sets German law apart can be found in its tendency to analyse the problems of fault in a highly abstract manner and to categorise the various types of fault under five, arguably six, different headings. Thus, a distinction is drawn between: (a) dolus directus (direkter Vorsatz); (b) dolus eventualis (bedingter Vorsatz); (c) gross negligence (grobe Fahrlässigkeit); (d) ordinary negligence (mittlere Fahrlässigkeit) and (e) light negligence (leichte Fahrlässigkeit). These categories can best be illustrated by means of specific examples. (Ordinary negligence is defined in § 276 BGB and we shall return to it further down. In addition to the above headings, recklessness may form a separate heading of fault).

(a) Dolus directus. It can come in two forms, e.g. I aim at a child standing behind a house window and I kill it. Alternatively, I set fire to a house in order to burn it knowing that a young child is inside and knowing (and accepting) that the inevitable result of my burning the house will be the death of the child.

(b) Dolus eventualis. For instance, I hit a man on the head with the intention of injuring him; but I also realise that he may die as a result of the blow. Despite this knowledge, I persist with my action.

(c) Negligence. The differences between the three types mentioned above is one of degree. In most tort cases the distinction between the various types of negligence (particularly light and average or normal negligence) is of little significance (though see case 110 as to liability regimes in labour law, discussed below in chapter 3); but it is of some importance for contract law.

A further distinction is made and it seems of particular importance to criminal law. This is between advertent negligence (luxuria) and inadvertent negligence (negligentia). Sometimes these terms are rendered into English as conscious and unconscious negligence. Advertent negligence comes close to intention (dolus eventualis) in the sense that the actor (personally) foresaw the criminal consequences as likely to materialise. The difference, however, is that in the case of dolus the actor accepts the result whereas in the case of luxuria he does not. (Indeed, he goes ahead with his action in the belief that the criminal event will not materialise). Inadvertent negligence, on the other hand, approximates the notion of casus. The difference is that negligentia (unlike casus) is a form of culpability since the actor could, had he applied himself, foreseen and avoided the consequences of his act.

At the beginning of this section, the state of recklessness (Leichtfertigkeit) is suggested as an independent heading of fault. This is because many lawyers would find it difficult to say how it differs in practice from gross negligence. The theoretical answer often given is that recklessness is a slightly worse form of conduct than gross negligence, involving a higher degree of deviation from the accepted norm. In practice, however, non-German observers are likely to take the view that their German colleagues are, in this instance, splitting hairs. Additionally, one has the impression that recklessness is a term reserved more for the criminal law while gross negligence is used in the context of civil law—contract and tort (e.g. § 826 BGB which requires dolus; the BGH, however, is content with recklessness: e.g. BGH NJW 2001, 3115, 3118).

§ 276 II BGB contains the definition of negligence. The person who fails to observe the ordinary care, which is required in everyday life, is guilty of negligence. This means doing what the reasonable man (or woman) would not have done or not doing what they would have done. As in English and American law, the standard of care is objective and the test—the bonus pater familias, as the man on the Clapham omnibus is sometimes called—is wide enough to allow plenty of room for judicial creativity. If the defendant belongs to a particular group or profession he will be judged against the standard expected to be attained by members of that profession. So a general medical practitioner will have to demonstrate the standard of care expected of general medical practitioners and not the standard of the specialised consultant. In our example, however, he will be negligent if he realizes (or ought to realise) that a specialised second opinion on the state of the health of his patient ought to have been obtained but was in fact never obtained.

Personal shortcomings of the defendant will not normally be taken into account and German writers often quote as an illustration of this the learner-driver who commits the kind of error of judgment which his experienced colleagues would have avoided. The reasoning is similar to that given by Lord Denning MR in Nettleship v. Weston ([1971] 2 QB 691) and it is clear that negligence in these cases does not necessarily involve any moral blameworthiness. One is also tempted to speculate that, as in Nettleship v. Weston, compulsory motor car insurance may account for this very high (if not unattainable) standard of care. Certainly, one case reproduced below (case 36), which has French and English equivalents, suggests that negligent liability often is strict liability in everything but name. Having stressed the objective standard of the test, one must add that there is also room for certain subjective elements to enter into the equation. Thus, the defendant's conduct will be measured against the conduct of the hypothetical reasonable man who was in the same external circumstances as was the defendant.

As stated, the reasonable man is nothing more than the anthropomorphic conception of justice. German judges, like their English, French, and American counterparts, will thus formulate their value judgment in the light of such factors as the probability of harm, the cost of avoidance, and the magnitude of danger if it is realized. German case law is very rich on this point and it really serves no purpose to provide further details since the examples and reasoning are very similar to those found in other systems. It is noteworthy, however, that mathematical formulae, which attempt to work out negligence on the basis of a yield-cost analysis, and which are so favoured by many American judges and academics, can also be found in German legal writings. It is unclear, however, whether this suggests that the German legal literature is ready for a more economic analysis of legal problems such as is found in American academic literature.

One should, perhaps, conclude this section by stating that the "objectivization" of negligence represents one of the inroads into the fault principle. The theoretical distinction between fault and risk-based liability is often very blurred in practice, especially where it is aided by a statutory (e.g. §§ 836 and 833(2) BGB) or case-law-created (e.g. § 823 II BGB) reversal of the onus of proof. The same is true whenever the notion of prima-facie proof, which is analogous to our doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, can be invoked. This change has involved a transformation or even perversion of traditional doctrines and notions and may be largely due to the impact that the insurance factor has had on the modern law of torts.

4. THE DUTIES OF CARE

(a) Generally

It has already been noted how the duty concept has been introduced into the notion of unlawfulness. Acts, according to this view, which indirectly infringe one of the protected interests, are not automatically unlawful unless it can be shown that the defendant has failed to satisfy the standard of care demanded by society. This duty-oriented approach becomes even more obviously necessary in the case of liability for omissions. From Roman times to today, it has been well known that liability for an omission could be imposed if a previous duty to act could be discovered. In early times, statute and contract were the main progenitors for duties of affirmative action. Later, the area of liability for omissions was widened, even though technical administrative difficulties, as well as ideological objections (especially in the Common law), strongly militated against such an extension. In German law, one of the most fertile sources of the development of liability for omissions and, indeed, of the whole law of tort, was the development of the idea that a preceding dangerous (or potentially dangerous) activity or state of affairs should give rise to a duty of care. From this idea, the courts slowly but steadily developed the famous Verkehrssicherungspflichten. The term Verkehrssicherungspflicht is not easy to translate. But its meaning could be summarised by saying that whoever by his activity or through his property establishes in everyday life a source of potential danger which is likely to affect the interests and rights of others, is obliged to ensure their protection against the risks thus created by him.

It has been a matter of some dispute where these duties of care should be considered. Should they be examined under the heading of conduct or unlawfulness or even remoteness? For present purposes it is not necessary to enter into these disputes, not least because once again the final practical result is not so very different. However, the purpose of these duties of care must be made clear. They are there to delineate the range of relationships which will be protected by careless interference; they are also there to limit (more effectively than the theory of adequate cause can do) the range of persons who could be held liable for a particular harmful result. To put it differently, does the relationship between the parties put one of them under a duty to take care vis-à-vis the other? Whether this is so, as well as the precise content of the duty, is a matter of judicial policy. This will be largely determined inter alia by the kind of factors we have already considered in the previous section, namely gravity of harm, probability of occurrence, cost of prevention and so on. As one would expect, the case law is extremely rich. And once one excludes theoretical disputes, the factual situations considered and the solutions given to the problems they raise are very similar in American, English, and German law.

The way the rich case law can be classified may vary. Situations giving rise to risks (and hence, duties) can be and are often classed alphabetically. Alternatively, the duties may be said to derive from family or business relationships, or where no relationship (in the usual sense of the word) exists, this last heading, for example, including a discussion of the problem of products liability. In this section one important group of cases dealing with safety on highways and premises will be examined, and the next section will discuss certain problems related to the law of product liability.

(b) Traffic safety on highways and places open to the public including dangerous premises

Historically, this is the area where the duties of care made their first appearance and they cover a large number of different factual situations which have exact equivalents in both English and American law. Thus, plaintiffs injured on public highways (or, indeed, smaller roads of all types), business premises, factories, shops, or homes may have a right of action against those who opened these facilities to the public or are in some way responsible for their upkeep. As the Imperial Court put it in its seminal judgment of 23 February 1903

(RGZ 54, 53) “. . . a person who makes his land available for use by the public is obliged to do so in a manner which accords with public safety.” (Longer extracts can be found in van Gerven, op. cit., p. 288, from where the above quotation is taken.) The following are illustrations from the recent case law; and they are noticeable for the fact that they have also figured in Common law litigation.

Thus, the President of a sports club who instructed a 14-year-old boy to mow the playing field with a self-propelled mower which, according to safety regulations should not be operated by anyone under 16 years of age, owes a duty of care to children injured nearby. (BGH NJW-RR 1991, 668). Likewise, the organiser of a hockey match owes a duty of care to his spectators who are hit by the ball because he failed to protect them by interjecting between them and the playing field a sheet of protective plexi-glass. (BGH 29 November 1983, NJW 1984, 801.) The proprietor of a restaurant should foresee that some of his customers may have difficulty with walking and should thus take appropriate measures to protect them against the dangers of a very slippery floor (BGH NJW 1991, 921). Organisers of a mass spectacle are under a duty to ensure that the public is given safe ways to enter and exit the area where the event is being organised (BGH NJW 1990, 905). The owner of a building is prima facie liable if one of its visitors is injured on its escalators. (BGH 14 December 1993, NJW 1994, 945. Onus of proof reversed in favour of plaintiff.) Examples such as these abound in the books; and, of course, it need not be repeated in detail here that all these are cases of fault-based liabilities.

Such duties are owed towards all people and, therefore, are classified under the law of delict. But additional contractual liability is not excluded. As English Common lawyers say when discussing their Occupiers Liability Act 1957, occupation of premises is a ground of liability not a reason for excluding other rules of liability. This can be the case, for example, where a customer is injured in a shop after he has concluded his purchases. Contractual and tortious duties may, in this case, coexist; but they do not overlap in the sense that each is subject to its own rules about limitation, measure of damages, proof, and responsibility for the unlawful conduct of other persons. Indeed, the tort remedies may, in this respect, be distinctly inferior to contractual remedies. This is why, as we shall see below (chapter 3, section A.2), the German courts have expanded the contractual remedies to cover the time before the contract is concluded (in our case before the customer has agreed to buy the goods). Indeed, the expansion has gone further and included even third parties accompanying the potential purchaser (see below, case 112).

The duty to take reasonable care to protect (lawful) entrants to premises (and their property) is primarily imposed on the owner of the premises but it may also be imposed upon a hirer or lessee, depending on their degree of control. The problems here and the solutions they receive by German courts are, essentially, no different from the ones encountered in Anglo-American law. Thus, for example, a contractual agreement between a landlord and his tenant, that only the latter will be responsible for the maintenance and safety of the premises and be liable to third parties, will have only limited effect vis-à-vis the injured third party. (But it may well be valid with regard to the internal relationship between owner–lessee: see RGZ 95, 61). Where the owner has delegated the performance of his duties to a third party, he remains answerable for his own fault in selecting and supervising the third party. Sometimes express statutory law permits such delegation and grants immunity to the delegating person for the bad performance. This is often the case with local communities who, for example, are allowed to subcontract to private companies their duty to clear snow from roads and spread salt in order to make them safer.

In such cases their responsibility will, normally, be limited to careful selection and supervision.

So far the discussion has been limited to the owner's general liability towards persons injured while on his premises. In principle, German law has not made the sharp distinction that the Common law made between lawful visitors and trespassers, and even less has it opted for the irrational distinctions adopted by the old Common law between different types of lawful visitors. These duties are owed towards all persons, the underlying idea being is that the "occupier" of the land is, usually, in a better position to know the risk and prevent it from materialising, and also to insure against its occurrence. Thus, the "occupier's" liability towards a trespassing child will, invariably, be upheld, a result, which is increasingly accepted as fair in the Common law jurisdictions as well. But liability towards the more obnoxious type of intruders (such as burglars) can and will be limited in various ways. Thus the court may not protect such persons either on the ground that their presence was not foreseeable (causative grounds); or because they may be found guilty of contributory fault (contributory negligence or volenti in the Common law). Alternatively, protection may be denied because the requisite standard of care has been satisfied by the defendant/occupier (cf. the humanitarian duty in British Railways Board v. Herrington [1972] AC 877). Equally, "no trespass" signs, if clearly phrased, may afford some (or full) protection to the occupier, though other factors (including statutes prohibiting such clauses) may also have to be taken into account. (Note, also, the parents' obligation to look after their children.) The extensive case law is reviewed by Marburger in Jura 1971, 481 and Stoll, Das Handeln auf eigene Gefahr, eine rechtsvergleichende Untersuchung (1961) and, on the whole, its comparison with the Common law is both easy and fruitful.

The liability of an occupier of premises may be engaged otherwise than by means of one of the duties of care. §§ 836–8 BGB are, in this respect, particularly noteworthy for two reasons. First, because they can be regarded as particular statutory expressions of the general principle discussed in this section. Quite simply, this is that anyone who exercises a sufficient degree of control over a particular thing (moveable or immovable) which is likely to cause danger is under a duty to take reasonable care to ensure that this danger does not materialise. Secondly, and more importantly, because they contain rules of presumed fault. In such circumstances it is, therefore, for the defendant to exculpate himself and not—as is normal—for the plaintiff to prove the former's fault.

The overlap between these two sets of rules (§§ 836–8 BGB and the duties of care) is not complete. § 836 BGB—more or less like the analogous rules contained in Article 1386 of the French Civil Code—deals with collapsing buildings or other structures attached to land. Collapsing walls or scaffolding, falling tiles, windowpanes that become detached from their frames, are all included under this heading. But snow falling off rooftops, tree branches being broken off, or even a falling gravestone which injures a passer-by would be covered not by the aforementioned paragraph of the Code, but by the duties of care. As stated, the precise content of those duties would vary from case to case. The measures necessary to prevent a "roof avalanche" would depend on a variety of local factors, such as frequency and volume of the snowfalls, the slope of the roof, the frequency of such accidents, and so on (cf. BGH NJW 1955, 300; OLG München, MDR 1965, 905). Damage from collapsing trees or branches might entail liability if proper checks on the state of the health of the trees were not carried out at the correct intervals (BGH NJW 1965, 815). Irregularly maintained gravestones could render liable not only the owners of the burial plots so long as they have control over them (BGH NJW 1971, 2308), but also the cemetery authorities who open this area to the general public (BGHZ 34, 206). Other instances from the very rich case law, which can in every way be matched by Anglo-American cases, include the following. A self-service store may be liable to a customer (or potential customer) who slips on a vegetable leaf or other slippery substance (BGH NJW 1976, 712; cf. Ward v. Tesco Stores Ltd [1976] 1 WLR 810). The same may be true of organisers of a motor-car race who fail to take the necessary precautions in order to prevent spectators being injured (BGH NJW 1975, 533; cf. White v. Blackmore [1972] 2 QB 651). A house-owner has been held liable to his visitor who is injured by defective banisters (BGHZ 5, 378; cf. Wheat v. E. Lacon & Co. Ltd [1966] 1 QB 355). Landowners can be liable to a plaintiff whose car was damaged by a train passing through an unfenced crossing on the defendant's land (BGHZ 11, 175; cf. Commissioner for Rly. v. McDermott [1967] 1 AC 169). House owners are liable to persons injured because the steps leading to their home have not been swept of ice and snow (RG 23 February 1903, RGZ 54, 53) or pavements not gritted. (BGH 27 January 1987, NJW 1987, 2671; BGH 15 December 1992, NJW 1993, 655; BGH 1 July 1993, MDR 1994, 256.) (A local authority will be liable if it fails to trim a hedge, which obstructs the view of users of a highway and leads to a car accident. (BGH 10 July 1980, BGH NJW 1980, 2192; contrast Stovin v. Wise and Norfolk County Council [1996] 3 WLR 388. The case is reproduced below as case 133.) One can practically match every case that exists in English tort books with a German equivalent.

With regard to accidents happening on highways or Federal roads, the actions will be directed against the authorities entrusted with their upkeep and maintenance. In the case of Federal roads, this body is one of the States (Article 90 of the Constitution). Local towns or districts are responsible for the smaller roads.

Less clear are the legal grounds of liability. Theoretically, this can be justified either by reference to § 823 I or § 839 BGB. The latter, in conjunction with Article 34 of the Constitution, makes the State (or other public authority) liable for breaches of official duties. From the State's point of view, this second method is preferable since § 839 I 2 BGB provides that in cases of negligence the official (and the State) will only be liable if the injured party is unable to obtain compensation from elsewhere. But liability under § 839 is not avoided if the victim is entitled to any insurance funds and this irrespective of whether their source is a private or a public insurance. (See Münchener Kommentar, § 839 BGB, no. 264; BGHZ 79, 26; BGH NJW 1983, 2181.) In this respect, matters are simplified whenever statute expressly designates such duties imposed on the state as public law duties, for in such cases the State is liable under Article 34 of the Constitution in conjunction with § 839 BGB. By contrast, the situation can become more obscure whenever the nature of the duties has not been expressly designated. (For further details see Münchener Kommentar § 839 BGB, no. 156. See, also, BGHZ 68, 217 and the discussion below, p. 893)

(c) Good Samaritans

Nowhere is the difference between the individualistic English Common law and the more socially impregnated Civil law seen more clearly than in the area of potential liability for failure to come to the rescue of another human being. Nineteenth century English philosophical thinking ensued that the medieval reasons for not punishing people for not being good but only making them pay damages when they were bad ensured the non-liability rule in England. For a time America followed suit and thus the Common law contrasted sharply with the Civil law systems which, through varying formulations, adopted the Good Samaritan precept and obliged persons to come to the aid of endangered strangers if they could so without danger to themselves. In ethical terms, the civilian solution was so obviously placed on high ground that, eventually, it even found support in some American States. (The states that passed so-called Good Samaritan statutes are: Florida (Fla. Stat. Ann. § 794.027), Hawaii (Rev. Stat. § 663-1.6 (a) 1985), Massachusetts (Ann. Laws ch 268 § 40), Minnesota (Minn. Stat. Ann. § 604.01 (1) (Supp. 1999), Nevada (N.R.S. 202.882 (1999)), Ohio (Rev. Code Ann. § 2921. 22 (A), (I)), Rhode Island (Gen. Laws § 11-56-1 (1994)), Vermont (Vt. Stat. Ann. tit. 12 § 519 (1973)), Washington (Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 9.69.100 (4) and Wisconsin (Wis. Stat. Ann. § 940.34.) Yet in pragmatic terms, the rule poses serious problems and has proved difficult to invoke in practice. Thus a study of what the systems do rather than proclaim reveals them to be much closer than the mere study of their books would suggest. This is true of English and American law. (The Vermont statute—the oldest of the batch, in force since 1968—has produced two cases: State v. Joyce 433 A. 2d 271 (Vt. 1981) and Sabia v. State 669 A. 2d 1187 (Vt. 1995). Hawaii’s 1984 statute, produced a case in 1991: State v. Cabral 810 P. 2d 672 (1991). Likewise, Minnesota’s statute seems to have been applied only once in Johnson v. Thompson Motors of Wykoff Inc. 2000 WL 136076 (Minn. App. 2000). Further references are unnecessary for this paper.) And it is also true of English and German law, which has confined its § 323c StGB to a state of an attractive ornament that rarely occupies its courts. (Thus, during the decade of 1990–2000, only nine cases were found dealing with 323 StGB. The six that bear some (faint) proximity to our topic are: OLG Düsseldorf, NJW 1991, 2979 and NJW 1995, 799 respectively. Two more cases, heard by the BGH, were remanded back to Court of Appeal for more findings: BGH NJW 1993, 1871 and NSTJ 1997 127. In the last two, the accused were acquitted: OLG Köln, NJW 1991, 764 and BGH, MDR 1993, 721.) These actions, of course, are criminal actions; and on the rare occasion where they succeed, they result in modest fines (approximately US$1,500) but not in civil damages. In the light of the above, one is entitled to enquire whether the insertion of such rules in the statute book achieves anything than a programmatic statement? (i) Introduction

The law of product liability—and German lawyers have adopted this American term—was one of the most hotly debated issues during the 1960s and 1970s, the voluminous literature and case-law constantly proving the theoretical and practical interest in the subject. American lawyers will not be surprised at this since they, too, have managed to turn this subject into a prime area of tort law, often used as an ideal course for advanced tort classes. What will, however, come as a surprise is how "new" this area of the law is to the Germans. That is not to imply, of course, that product liability cases cannot be found before the sixties. But it does mean that until about the late fifties important instances of product liability would not only remain uncompensated; they would also pass almost unnoticed by the law reports and the academic literature. In 1956, for example, the Federal Supreme Court had to deal with a claim brought by a plaintiff whose bicycle suddenly collapsed and injured him. The accident was not due to a defect in design but in the production of the particular bicycle. But the court had little sympathy with the plaintiff's complaint and dismissed it in a cavalier manner with the statement that "common experience suggests . . . that such technical defects cannot be prevented". In the court's view, the accident should have been treated as one of those unfortunate things that happen in life and must remain uncompensated. That the case was only reported in a specialised legal journal also indicates that it was not treated as one of general interest. With two interesting exceptions of dissertations written in the 1930s under the direction of the famous Ernst Rabel, the academic literature showed equal lack of enthusiasm for a topic, which nowadays is, if anything, overworked.

The change came in the early 1960s when Professor Werner Lorenz published an article, which for the first time made the majority of German lawyers aware of development in this field in the United States. The article, making excellent use of the comparative method—Lorenz had studied in Oxford with the late Professor Lawson and later worked at Cornell with Professor Schlesinger—appeared at the right time even though in the beginning legal practitioners vehemently opposed the introduction of American ideas. However, the 1960s and 1970s were decades that witnessed a number of spectacular products liability accidents, which triggered off public interest in this problem. In 1967, for example, nearly 800,000 owners of Ford cars were informed of design defects in a particular model and were advised to take certain precautionary steps. A year later, Volkswagen in Germany had to recall some 160,000 defective cars; and then the thalidomide scandal broke out leading to the birth of thousands of seriously incapacitated children and to worldwide litigation. These events, coupled with a general increase in consumer-orientated legislation, resulted in the development of the law; that the protection afforded now, some forty years later, might be seen by some to have gone too far is another matter. These problems are too complicated to receive a summary answer here.

(ii) Damage to the product

Before we proceed to examine the further development of the law we should try to delineate the province of product liability. It has traditionally been assumed that this topic refers to personal injury or damage to other things caused by the defective product. Damage to the thing rather than damage caused by the thing is not included under this heading. The distinction is conceptually convincing and economically sound, but it is not always easy to draw. For, in between the black and white areas lies contested ground, which has given rise to many problems. One of them is when the defective product causes further damage to itself, or, which is a variant, when a defective component of the product “spreads” the defect to the whole product and thus reduces its efficiency and/or value. Once again, we are here talking of the troublesome distinction between property damage and economic loss.

We have already touched upon this subject and stated that this type of loss cannot be brought under the heading of damage to property under § 823 I BGB. Two cases reproduced below (74 and 75), dealing with negligent inspections of buildings under construction which lead to the reduction of their value (economic loss) but not to injuries or damage to other property, show how clearly the German judges have understood the problem in question. As the Supreme Court said (BGHZ 39, 366) “To make someone the owner of a defective building is not to invade an already existing ownership”. Incidentally, the annotation to this case will also show how superior the German reasoning (arguably) is compared to the less satisfactory analysis adopted in the late 1970s in similar cases in England. Some ten years later, however, English law moved slowly closer to the position expressed in cases 74 and 75, while, in the meantime the German case law has shifted towards the position previously adopted in England, though many uncertainties still remain.

There is more than a desire for conceptual clarity, however, that dictates (or should dictate) a denial of a tort remedy in such a situation. To allow tort to demolish contract in such circumstances can have important and not necessarily welcome consequences. For contract law can produce a more complete and subtle distribution of risks. Moreover, burdening the manufacturer with claims of this kind might have insupportable economic and insurance consequences.

Despite these objections against extending delictual remedies to cases of damage to the product, German courts, presumably under the prevailing climate of consumer protection, have not applied the above-mentioned sound rule to defective movables. Thus, cases 68–73 show how tort actions have succeeded in such instances; but their solutions have attracted considerable criticism from academics and the demarcation problems to which they can give rise have not yet been fully worked out. This becomes quite obvious when one studies the shifting views of the Supreme Court on this subject. (See notes to these cases and p. 39, above.) It is little comfort to tell German lawyers that the Americans have faced similar difficulties. However, the decision of the US Supreme Court in East River S.S. Corp. v. Transamerica Delaval Inc. (476 US 858, 106 S. Ct. 2295, reproduced below as addendum 2 to B. 14) has done much to clarify matters and will repay careful reading.

(iii) Contractual or quasi-contractual solutions to the problem

To return to our main topic, we should now discuss briefly how the modern law came to be developed although it should be noted from the outset that contractual solutions to the problem of product liability are only of historic interest. Broadly speaking, one can divide this development into two phases. The first, which culminates with the seminal judgment of the Supreme Court in 1968 (BGHZ 51, 91), is basically preoccupied with finding a legal basis for this essentially new heading of liability. The second was one of consolidation, elaboration, and even expansion of the delictual action firmly established since 1968. The latest phase, not significantly different from the previous one, will be dominated by the adjustments made by the Product Liability Act of 1989 giving effect to the European Community's Directive of 25 July 1985. (Both documents are reproduced in section B. 15 below, along with the English equivalent enactment.)

The leading judgment of 1968 clearly reflects the preoccupations of academics to find a legal basis for products liability in so far as it devotes much space to the detailed consideration of the various contractual or quasi-contractual theories developed in the 1960s to meet the new situation. If a Common lawyer were to express surprise that this search for a juristic basis would be conducted in the area of contract law rather than tort law he should then consider the following two points.

First, one must repeat what was said earlier on, namely that the law of contracts has proved more pliable and able to expand on the civil law systems than it has in the Common law. The doctrine of consideration is the main reason why the Common law was forced to develop its law of torts. But wherever consideration has been taken somewhat less seriously—e.g. in the United States—the concurrent growth of contractual and delictual remedies has been a notable feature. The UCC doctrine of “warranty without privity” is one of these developments and, incidentally, brings American law quite close to French law, which has developed its strict law of products' liability through the law of sales but has also accepted strict or semi-strict tortious liability.

For details on this see J. Ghestin, Conformité et garanties dans la vente (produits mobiliers) (1983); La responsabilité des fabricants et distributeurs (1975) (collection of essays, ed. by Professor Gavalda); La responsabilité civile du fabricant dans les états membres du Marché Commun (1974) with interesting essays by Professors Bigot (213), Ghestin (17), and Malinvaud (131).

Secondly, one should note the considerable advantages that a plaintiff could obtain if his action was dubbed by German law contractual or quasi-contractual. Two of them should be mentioned here. The first is related to the burden of proof. Though in the civil law systems (unlike the Common law) fault is an element of an action for breach of contract as well as tort, the burden of proof may be different in these two actions. Thus, § 282 BGB, which was applied, by analogy, to other contractual remedies, provided that, “If it is disputed whether the impossibility of performance is the result of a circumstance for which the debtor is responsible, the burden of proof falls on the debtor”, i.e. if contested, the defendant has to disprove his fault. (This result follows now from § 280 2 BGB.) On the other hand, according to the general rules of tort law, in a product liability case the plaintiff had to show that the product left the defendant's enterprise in a faulty condition and that the defendant, or his legally appointed representative, had not organised his business in such a way as to enable the defect to be detected. The second, and not entirely unrelated, reason that made contractual actions preferable to those founded in tort could be found in § 831 BGB. This deals with the problems of vicarious liability and will be discussed in greater detail below (chapter 3, A. 1 and 2). Here suffice it to say that it does not establish a true rule of vicarious liability but makes employers liable for the unlawful acts of their employees only where they are themselves guilty of negligent selection or supervision of the employees. In contrast debtors are, according to § 278 BGB, fully liable for the faults of the persons whom they employ in the execution of their contractual obligations. Finally, one should also bear in mind the relatively short period of limitation applicable to tort claims (§ 195 BGB) (though, admittedly, in some instances the period of limitation may be shorter in contract than it is in tort and this has caused a flight into tort. Thus, see the cases discussed in section 16, and p. 93).

Having stated the reasons, which prompted German lawyers to turn to the law of contract rather than the law of tort initially, one should look briefly at the various contractual or quasi-contractual methods advanced by academic writers. The brief comments that follow should be read in conjunction with the relevant passages of the leading case (No. 61) which is reproduced below (chapter 2, section B. 15).

One way of making the manufacturer liable to the ultimate consumer is by discovering an express or implied guarantee, which is directed to the ultimate consumer and on which he relies to his detriment. The difficulties with this approach are the same that eventually forced American lawyers to abandon a similar kind of reasoning—widely prevalent in the United States during the 1950s—but which proved to be inadequate in practice.

A second contractual method can be found in the various attempts to discover a contract in favour of a third party or a contract with protective effects vis-à-vis third parties. The first type of contract (Vertrag zugunsten Dritter) is regulated by §§ 328 ff. BGB and is not unknown to American lawyers who, since Lawrence v. Fox, 20 NY 268 (1859), have broken away from the English tradition on this matter. As already explained, this type of contract allows a third party (the ultimate consumer) to require performance of the contract concluded between the creditor and the debtor (for example, the manufacturer and the wholesaler). On reflection, however, this is a rather awkward notion. For what the third party/consumer needs is not the right to enforce the prime contractual obligation (delivery of the thing in exchange for payment of the price). Rather, his need is to be included under the protective umbrella of the subsidiary contractual obligations (in our case to deliver the thing in good order and with clear instruction, etc.). This way of reasoning led German courts to develop, under the influence of Professor Larenz, a variant to the contract in favour of third parties which can be called a contract with protective effects vis-à-vis third parties (Vertrag mit Schutzwirkung für Dritte). In this way, third parties can be given the protection afforded to the main creditor which emanates from a cluster of subsidiary obligations which would be included in every such contract in accordance with § 242 BGB (contracts to be performed according to good faith).

However, we have already noted the need to keep this expansion of the contractual umbrella under control lest it undermine completely the relativity of the contractual bond. To put it differently, who will be treated as a third party and receive such protection? Though as already stated the requirement of “proximity to the performance” (Leistungsnähe), a close relationship (personenrechtliches Fürsorgeverhältnis) between the contractual creditor and the third party has been relaxed by some recent decisions, this has not occurred in the context of products liability. Indeed, it is noteworthy that even those authors who have argued in favour of expanding the circle of “protected” third parties have refused to apply their theories to this area of the law. (See, for example, Canaris, “Die Produzentenhaftpflicht in dogmatischer und rechtspolitischer Sicht”, JZ 1968, 494, 499 ff.)

The theory of “transferred loss” (or, to give its German name, Drittschadensliquidation) has also been considered but rejected. In the chicken pest case the Supreme Court, disagreeing with the Court of Appeal, would not allow the veterinarian to demand from the pharmaceutical company (which had sold him the defective vaccine) the loss suffered by the owner of the chickens which died as a result of the inoculation. (If such a claim had been recognised it could have been transferred by the veterinarian to the plaintiff and pursued by the latter.)

For further reading concerning the concepts of Drittschadensliquidation and contracts for the benefit of a third party see the references given in section 2 (d)(iii), above pp. 59 ff.

In addition to the above contractual theories, the court also dealt with a number of others, which share some common elements including the desire to justify a strict or semi-strict type of liability. Two of them deserve a brief look since they are expressly referred to (and rejected) by the court.

The first, advanced by a leading expert in the field (Diederichsen, Die Haftung des Warenherstellers (1967) 297 ff., 327 ff., 345 ff.) can, in a rather crass manner but for simplicity’s sake, be reduced to two basic propositions. First, the basic relationship in these cases is that between manufacturer and ultimate consumer. This is one of “reliance”, irrespective of any awareness of any advertisements by the manufacturer so long as the defective goods were purchased from a sales network set up by the manufacturer and were already defective at the time they left his factory. Secondly, that this relation is sui generis, not regulated by the written law and must thus be shaped in its details by the judge. A corollary to this is that the liability is strict.

The court’s dislike of any theory, which cannot be pegged on a clear provision of the Code, is obvious from the way this theory is dismissed. Equally obvious—and in tune with the court’s long-established practice—is its refusal to discover new headings of strict liability in the absence of legislative intervention (see below, chapter 3, section A. 5). A third objection, not mentioned by the court but stressed by academics, is the following. If the manufacturer of goods is to be strictly liable, why should this liability be limited to cases where his goods were sold bearing his name (or through a sales network set up by him) and excluded whenever the same goods were sold unidentified in a department store or, even, bearing the latter’s commercial brand?

Lorenz’s theory (“Warenabsatz und Vertrauensschutz” Karlsruher Forum (1963) 8, especially 14 ff.) shares a number of common points with some other theories also considered and rejected by the court (see the work of Canaris in the Select Bibliography, above p. 91). He, too, for example, puts the emphasis on the relationship between producer and ultimate consumer and he, also, is prepared to attach considerable significance to the reliance that one person (the consumer) places on the conduct of another (the manufacturer). Like other writers, Lorenz also accepts that we are here faced with a lacuna in the written law which must be filled in a way that will ensure that the plaintiff is given a protection equal to (if not greater than) that enjoyed by contracting parties (moving towards strict liability). Unlike other authors, however, Lorenz makes a clear attempt to base his solution on a specific provision of the Code and this, in his opinion, is § 122 BGB.

This provides that if a declaration of an intention is void, either because it was made in error or because it was not seriously intended, the person who made the declaration must compensate the other party for the damages he has sustained as a result of relying upon the validity of the declaration. (Incidentally, the damages in this case cover only the reliance interest and not the expectation loss). This provision, according to Lorenz, can be analogically extended to cover the present problem, since the manufacturer, through the advertising of his products, leads the ultimate consumer to expect that his products will be free of all defects. In its judgment the Supreme Court directs its criticism mainly towards Lorenz's point about the significance of modern advertising techniques and the effect they can be taken to have on the ultimate purchaser. It is submitted, however, that Lorenz's view has two further weaknesses: first, it is by no means clear (to a non-German lawyer at least) that § 122 BGB, which envisages an entirely different situation, is capable of such an extension. It would appear more likely that Lorenz is trying to make in a very ingenious way the best of a bad situation, i.e. to use the Code to solve a problem which could not have really been envisaged by its draftsmen. Secondly, even if § 122 BGB could be so extended, it would lead to the imposition of strict liability on the manufacturer towards the ultimate consumer (with whom the manufacturer has no contract), but to liability based on fault (in accordance with the contract of sale) towards his (the manufacturer's) immediate purchaser—a solution which seems neither very reasonable nor attractive. (Lorenz himself accepted in a later article the limitations of § 122 BGB: see “Die Haftung des Warenherstellers” Band 28 der Arbeiten zur Rechtsvergleichung (1966) 51–2.)

(iv) The decision of 1968 and the move from contract to delict

The contractual or semi-contractual theories considered and rejected by the Supreme Court in its 1968 decision suffered from one further defect which was shared by all of them. For they all aimed at protecting the person who was in some way involved in the sales-chain and somehow could justify a “relationship” with the manufacturer by means of reliance or a guarantee or some other manifestation on his part concerning his goods. True, some theories went further by trying to include within the protective circle other persons such as the family of the ultimate consumer or others living or working in his household. But if the policy reasons for imposing liability on the manufacturer are correct—and these include his greater ability to detect and correct a defect, to insure against the risk, and to shift the cost of accident when it is realised—then the same type of protection should be afforded even to third parties, such as the proverbial bystander who is injured by the exploding ginger-beer bottle. Basing liability on tort, and in particular § 823 I BGB, provided the necessary breakthrough. The court realised that contract law had exhausted its limits and the time had come to utilise the law of tort. When studying the judgment (case 61) the reader should, among other points, also note the following.

It is first worth noting that the court could and did base liability on § 823 II BGB since the defendant (vaccine manufacturer) was in breach of a special statute which was correctly deemed to be a protective statute in the sense of § 823 II BGB. This is important since the manufacturer's duties of care will, in most cases, be judge-made; but they can also emanate from the breach of duties laid down by specific statutes. The Machinery Protection Act (Maschinenschutzgesetz) of 24 June 1968, for example, renders manufacturers (and distributors) of a whole range of machinery, tools etc. liable for personal injury or death (but not property damage or economic loss) suffered by all users. Many instances of accidents resulting from defective equipment will thus easily lead to the imposition of liability. The Pharmaceuticals Act (to be discussed below) and the food and drug legislation should also be included in this category and can easily dispose of the manufacturer's liability in the kind of situations which provided the first opportunities to American courts to deal with products liability problems. But the significance of the decision lies in the fact that it did not stop at § 823 II BGB but, instead, proceeded to state that § 823 I BGB should also apply.

As stated, the difficulty with § 823 I BGB is its requirement that the plaintiff prove the defendant/manufacturer's fault. One way round this problem would be for the court to invoke the prima-facie rule (not dissimilar to the Common law doctrine of res ipsa loquitur); indeed, this had been done successfully in several cases involving § 831 BGB. However, the court considered this to be an inadequate measure since all too often the owner of a business can show that the defect in the product might have been caused in a way that does not point to his fault—evidence which generally relies on activities in his business and which is difficult for the injured party to disprove. Consequently, when damage has arisen within the range of the manufacturer's business risks, he cannot be regarded as exonerated merely because he points out that the defect in the product might have arisen without any organisation fault of his. On the contrary, he must supply positive and complete evidence that the defect in the product is not due to his fault.

The courts had already (as we shall note below, chapter 4, section A. 1) reversed the onus of proving fault in the context of § 823 II BGB. They now saw no good reason why the same should not also be done with § 823 I BGB, given the special features of product liability and in particular the victim's de facto inability to know what was happening in the manufacturer's enterprise. The development of a separate category of liability under the heading of the so-called Produzentenhaftung brought about a further significant departure from orthodox reasoning, namely §§ 831 and 31 BGB. § 831 BGB which—originally—was confined to negligent selection or supervision of employees was re-interpreted and widened to encompass also the very organisation of the company. It also served to found an obligation to put schemes of production in place that would ensure that the product is free from dangerous defects. The appropriateness of § 31 BGB, which imputes the negligence of members of the management to the company, also seems doubtful. Both these provisions do not fit easily into the problem of product liability. In this category we are not in fact dealing with issues of vicarious liability. For the duties of care are primarily addressed to the manufacturer, who has to avoid putting into circulation dangerous products. (This can be seen clearly from the Directive and the relevant national statutes.) Thus, the company and not its employees or executives is the direct addressee of these duties of care to structure the manufacturing process in an adequate way. The difficulties to which this slight discrepancy between the written law and law in action has given rise to, come to light more fully in the cases regarding the liability of employees or executives themselves under the heading of product liability (cases 65 and 67).

As expected, the decision resulted in the insurance market promptly producing a new form of products liability insurance for industrial enterprises. It also gave rise to a rich case law which German scholars discuss under four different headings: (I) defects in manufacture; (II) defects in design; (III) defects in instructions, and (IV) development risks. These distinctions are likely to remain in use even though, following the European Community's Directive, there now exists a parallel regime of liability governed by the 1989 Product Liability Act.

(v) The various forms of product liability

(a) The producer's liability for defects in manufacture (Fabrikationsfehler). Here one is talking of an individually defective product, the defect usually being due to some kind of negligence or inattention in the manufacturing process. The leading case was precisely one of those cases so, strictly speaking, its ruling as to the burden of proof was directed only to this type of products liability situation. It will be noted, however, that subsequent cases have extended the application of the rule to include categories (b) and (c) discussed below.

In these instances the plaintiff's task is usually limited to proving that his hurt emanated from the area of the producer's organisation and the risks attendant on it, and that it resulted from an objective defect of the product which made it unsuitable to be put into circulation. (BGHZ 51, 91, 105; BGH NJW 1973, 1602). This burden is easily discharged save in those cases where the evidence may suggest that the defect arose after it had left the manufacturer's zone of influence. (See on this Lorenz's observations in "Beweisprobleme bei der Produzentenhaftung", AcP 170 (1970) 366, 381 ff., where, once again, he makes extensive use of the American case-law).

Once the plaintiff has established the above, the onus shifts to the defendant (manufacturer). He must then show that he, himself, was not in breach of one of his duties of care (imposed by statute or the case-law) and that all persons in his employment were equally innocent of such a breach. In theory, therefore, a manufacturer of an isolated defective product—sometimes referred to as a "runaway" (Ausreisser)—can escape liability. Nevertheless, this exculpatory proof under § 831 BGB requires the manufacturer—at any rate whenever the manufacturing process is not fully automated—to name every individual involved in the manufacturing process and prove his "innocence" (BGH NJW 1973, 1602, 1603). This is clearly a burden of proof which makes this in name only fault-based liability but, in effect, greatly approximates the strict tort liability that is imposed by American courts. Once again, this misuse of terms has not passed without criticism, not least because the fault-based system can increase the time and cost of litigation and impede settlements out of court. This tendency to extend the area of quasi-strict liability was also underscored by a decision of the Supreme Court in 1975 (BGH NJW 1975, 1827) which held that the above-mentioned liability would be imposed not only on the manufacturer but also on his "high-ranking" employees. This result, however, appears to be very dubious to say the least; and it has not been adopted by the EEC-inspired legislation. (For criticisms see Lieb, note to BGH 3 June 1975 in JZ 1976, 526; Stoll, "Haftungsverlagerung durch beweisrechtliche Mittel" in AcP 176 (1976) 145, 170; contra, Schmidt-Salzer BB 1975, 1031.) However, the possibility of avoiding liability for "runaways" has been removed, strict liability having been openly introduced in this context.

(b) The producer's liability for defective design (Konstruktionsfehler). It has been noted that the leading case dealt with an individually defective product. But the case law did not stop there. It extended the new rule to apply also to cases of defective design (see BGHZ 67, 359, 362) and in these instances, since many products may be involved, the defendant may be held liable to extensive damages. On the other hand, the plaintiff's position in this case may be more difficult than in the previous one, since he will not only have to prove that the product was defective (in the sense that the defective design was avoidable given existing scientific and technical knowledge). He will also have to persuade the court that its design was defective in a way that it created an unreasonably great risk of danger for him and/or third parties. Whether this is so, will depend on the court's appreciation of all the circumstances in accordance with the formula already given. Factors to be taken into account include the normal or extraordinary conditions of use, the type of average user, and the kind of dangers that may be specific to this type of product. Product liability may also extend to risks which arise from improper use of a product where the manufacturer should foresee that, in the light of the conditions under which the product was used, it would not always be used with the utmost care. (OLG Köln NJW-RR 1991, 285.) The court may also weigh carefully whether an alternative design would be economically feasible and to what extent it would reduce the risk of such damage occurring. (See, Kötz, Deliktsrecht, nos. 445–450. For interesting illustrations raised by the problem of defective design see: BGH VersR 1960, 1095; VersR 1967, 498; VersR 1972, 559; NJW 1990, 906.) If such a defect in design is proved, then the manufacturer's breach of the required standard of care will also be established.

Nowadays, many administrative regulations determine the standards that must be met by particular products. For example, the Gerätesicherheitsgesetz (GSG), (Act on the Safety of Technical Equipment, of 24 June 1968, BGBl. I. 717 as amended on 18 February 1986, BGBl. I. 265 (1986)) requires that "technical equipment"—a term widely construed to include factory and sports equipment, household appliances, safety devices (such as belts and masks), and even toys—meets certain standards when sold in Germany. § 3 I of the Act talks in particular of "generally recognised technical principles and rules" (allgemein anerkannte Regeln der Technik)—an important catch-all term which has no official legal definition. In many cases the rules and standards are set by officially recognized legal institutions (e.g. the Deutsches Institut für Normung (DIN), the Technischer Überwachungs-Verein (TÜV), etc.) and conformity with these rules will, invariably, improve the manufacturer's/defendant's position in a lawsuit involving one of his products. Compliance with mandatory regulations may now even afford a manufacturer with a complete defence in accordance with Article 7(d) of the Council Directive (para. 1 (2) no. 4 of the 1989 Act). Some commentators, however, feel that compliance with minimum standards may not, necessarily, exonerate the manufacturer.

The picture described above could become more complicated where the ultimate damage could be attributed to a defective component. The permutations here are innumerable. The defective component—provided by a supplier—might have been incorporated in the final product by the main manufacturer. Should his liability depend on whether he checked or ought to have checked the component before incorporating it in his product? Should the answer be different if the component was manufactured to his specifications? And what if the defect is not due to the component but is due to the way the components were put together?

The rich case-law made a general answer impossible (see BGH NJW 1968, 247; BGH NJW 1975, 1827; BGH BB 1977, 1117); but Professor Kötz summarised the guiding principle of the law (as it then stood) as follows:

In all these cases the strict rules of the law of products liability are applicable only in so far as their policy aims make them suitable for the occasion. This will be the case whenever the defendant is under an obligation to take the necessary measures within the organisation and area of his responsibility in order to prevent or remove the kind of defects which have led to the harm in suit (Deliktsrecht, 2nd edn. 204).

This, for example, was the result whenever components were incorporated in a product which was finally marketed and sold under the manufacturer's own name (e.g. BGH NJW 1985, 2420). Liability was also, invariably, imposed where components were not carefully selected, tested, or constructed in accordance with the manufacturer's specifications. (See, for example, BGHZ 86, 256; BGH NJW 1985, 2420; OLG Köln NJW RR 1990, 414.) As a result of the 1989 Act, however, the new products liability law will apply alike to manufacturers of finished products and component parts. (The manufacturer of the component is not liable if the deficiency is due to instructions given by the manufacturer of the finished product or is attributable to the defectiveness of the finished product.) Similarly, dealers and importers who were generally not liable under the old regime (BGH NJW 1980, 121 and BGH NJW 1987, 1009 respectively), may now be saddled with liability in accordance with the 1989 Act.

(c) The producer's liability for defective instructions (Instruktionsfehler). Once again the scope and extent of these duties of care are in principle fixed by the rich case law (e.g. BGHZ 64, 46; BGH NJW 1972, 2217; NJW 1981, 2514; NJW 1986, 1863). The duty to provide instructions arises at the time when the product is put into circulation though the manufacturer is under a duty to monitor new developments and, if necessary, alter the instructions that originally accompanied his product. The law on this subject was reviewed by the BGH in the "apple-scab" case (BGHZ 80, 186; NJW 1981, 1603). Where apple producers suffered serious production losses after having used a spray which was meant to prevent apple scab but which became useless after repeated use. Laboratory experiments (already published at that time of the accident) had mentioned this possibility, but the manufacturers of the spray had failed to bring this information to the attention of the apple producers. Had the knowledge that the spray was ineffective emanated from the manufacturers' own sphere of control, then the usual reversal of the onus of proof would have operated in favour of the plaintiffs; but since it was generally available at the time of the incident, their claim was rejected. (Cf. Kötz/Wagner, Deliktsrecht, no. 457.) In another contemporaneous judgment the BGH held that the duty to provide information is linked to the intended use of the product. Thus, a manufacturer is under no duty to provide warnings against dangers, which will arise if the product is put to a use other than that for which it was intended (BGH NJW 1981, 2514). The degree of danger posed by the product and the interests likely to be affected (life, property, etc.) will, however, ultimately influence the scope and standard of duty of the manufacturer. Thus, warning labels must clearly specify the kind of dangers, which may arise from the use of a particular product. If considerable injury to body or health may result from the product's misuse, the consumer must be able to discern from the warning label why the product may be dangerous (BGH NJW 1992, 560). And if infants develop cavities from constant sucking of sweetened children's tea drunk out of plastic bottles, the manufacturer of the tea is liable if he failed to place a clear warning on the product (BGHZ 116, 60 (Kindertee I); BGH NJW 1994, 932 (Kindertee II); BGH NJW 1995, 1286 (Kindertee III)). Thus, adequate warnings must always be given in the case of pharmaceutical products likely to be misused—especially those likely to be misused by children. There is no special heading for instruction defects in the European Directive; but the issue is dealt with under the general heading of product defects (Article 6).

(d) The producer's liability for development risks (Entwicklungsfehler). The problems here are, essentially, different from those discussed in the earlier sections and thus make the return to the fault principle easy to recommend. Typically, in these cases the product will have been manufactured in accordance with the technological knowledge of the time, but subsequently acquired information reveals its potentially harmful effects. Many believe that to make manufacturers carry such a risk could hinder technological progress. To make them strictly liable for such development risks would also run counter to the rationale of imposing such a strict liability in the first place. For, it will be remembered, one of the justifications of imposing strict liability on the manufacturer is his ability to detect and avoid the defect. In the present instance, however, by definition this is not possible and the manufacturer's duties are limited to an obligation to warn consumers or even withdraw their products once they become aware (or ought to become aware) of the defect or of their potential harmful consequences. The rules of the leading case have thus not been extended to this category. Article 15(8) of the European Directive gives Member States the option of deleting the defence of state of art contained in Article 7(e) but the Federal Republic has not exercised this right so the defence has been retained. (Note, however, that the defence is not available under the Pharmaceutical Act; and the relationship between this enactment and the 1989 Act has not been clarified.) The retention of the state of art defence will not, however, absolve the manufacturer from continuously observing his products and warning users of (and if necessary recalling) products that are subsequently revealed as defective. (BGH NJW 1987, 1009 = WM 1987, 126, is an interesting case since it extends the manufacturer's post-marketing duties concerning his own product to the performance of component parts.)

The Act on Pharmaceutical Products of 1976, in force since 1 January 1978, is the leading exception in this respect. This enactment imposes strict liability on pharmaceutical concerns which introduce into the market drugs for human use or consumption which produce harmful results that go beyond those which current medical opinion regards as acceptable. The risk-based liability is incurred irrespective of whether the damage is the result of bad development, production, or labelling. But like most German laws of strict liability, the Pharmaceutical Products Act lays down certain maxima for monetary compensation. (Lump sums of up to DM 500,000 or annuities of up to DM 30,000 where one person is killed or injured or, in cases of defects in mass production killing or injuring more than one person, 200 million or 12 million DM respectively per incident). And payment of these sums is ensured by obliging the pharmaceutical concerns to create special "cover funds" (Deckungsvorsorge) which, in practice, means taking out liability insurance. Victims who wish to attempt to recover further compensation are, of course, free to make use of the normal fault-based provisions of the Code.

5. CAUSATION

French lawyers, paraphrasing Voltaire's dictum about the existence of God, have often teased the Germans by saying that if causation did not exist as a subject it would have to be invented so that German lawyers would have something to exercise their minds. There is a great deal of truth in this statement though it could also convey a misleading picture in at least two respects. For, if one is thinking in terms of the volume of the legal literature, the Germans are not alone in having devoted a great deal of effort to this topic. The Americans, for instance, have rivalled this literature in size and, probably, in ingenuity. Secondly, the theoretical preoccupation of German scholars with this subject has not prevented their courts from stating more than once that the solution should, in the end, be one dictated by common sense and equity (see, for example, BGHZ 3, 261, 267; BGHZ 30, 154, 157, etc.).

(a) Conditions and causes

The Germans (like the Americans and the English but more clearly so than the French) adopt a bifurcated approach to problems of causation. This they do by insisting that the defendant's conduct (or the event for which he is to be held responsible) cannot claim to be a legal "cause" of the plaintiff's hurt, unless it is previously established that it is at least a "condition" (Bedingung) of that harm. This leads to a two-phased inquiry, the first being preoccupied with the question whether the defendant's conduct played some role in bringing about the plaintiff's hurt, while the second seeks to discover which of the many conditions of the harm will also be treated as its legal cause. This first phase of the inquiry is strongly causative rather than normative in nature and hence American scholars often refer to it with some justification as the cause-in-fact stage of the inquiry. This labelling of this phase as factual or causative is correct, especially if it is compared with the second phase of the inquiry, which is more normative and policy-orientated. This does not mean, however, that it cannot involve issues of valuation and therefore acquire strong normative overtones as well. This becomes clear in those cases where the "standard" test (to be discussed in the next paragraph) cannot be operated without serious injustice.

The test used to determine whether a particular piece of conduct is a condition of the plaintiff's hurt is that of the conditio sine qua non, better known to Common lawyers as the "but-for" test (also referred to as the Äquivalenztheorie). Would the plaintiff's harm have occurred but for the defendant's conduct? If it would, then the defendant's conduct is not a cause of the harm. A doctor who negligently examines (or treats) a patient who dies from another ailment will not be causally linked with (and hence will not be responsible for) that death. Equally, a chemist who negligently renews a prescription without previously consulting the patient's doctor will not be liable once it is shown that the doctor, had he been asked, would certainly have continued the treatment with the same drug (RGSt 15 (1886) 151; RGSt 63 (1929) 211). The point need not be laboured, since it raises no issues, which are not already known to a Common law audience. Where the German thoroughness emerges quite clearly is in the effort to determine how the defendant's conduct (or the event complained of) will be deemed to be or not to be a conditio sine qua non of the plaintiff's harm. One of the first to attempt an answer to this problem was the Austrian criminal lawyer Glaser who in 1858 (Abhandlungen aus dem österreichischen Strafrechte I, 298; translated by Hart and Honoré Causation in the Law 2nd edn. (1985), 443) wrote:

If one attempts wholly to eliminate in thought the alleged author (of the act) from the sum of events in question and it then appears that nevertheless the sequence of intermediate causes remains the same, it is clear that the act and its consequences cannot be referred to him . . . but if it appears that, once the person in question is eliminated in thought from the scene, the consequences cannot come about, or that they can come about only in a completely different way, then one is fully justified in attributing the consequences to him and explaining it as the effect of his activity.

This has been termed the method of elimination (Hinwegdenken) since it assumes the notional elimination of the propositus from the scene, the other conditions remaining exactly the same. It should be contrasted with a different method—that of substitution—which, far from eliminating the propositus from the scene, assumes, on the contrary, that he was there and acted lawfully, the other conditions remaining the same except in so far as they would have been altered by the lawful conduct of the person in question.

The elimination theory seems more acceptable when the alleged cause is a positive act. What we have to do is to reconstruct the sequence of events, omitting the tortfeasor's conduct. If, despite this, the sequence of events remains unaltered, then the conduct has no causal relation to subsequent events. If, on the other hand, the final result is changed as a consequence of the theoretical suppression of the tortfeasor's act, then that act must have played an active and necessary part in producing the plaintiff's harm. Thus, if A shoots B and A's shot is eliminated, then B's death goes also. In the case of omissions, however, the situation is more complex, for if the "procedure of elimination without substitution is adopted no omission can ever be treated as a conditio sine qua non of an event" (Hart and Honoré, Causation in the Law (1959) 403). What is necessary here is the substitution of the act that the defendant omitted. Would the harmful result nevertheless have occurred? If it would, then the defendant's omission is not the cause of the result. Let us look at an example often given by German textbooks to illustrate how the above works in practice.

Suppose that a passenger ship is not properly equipped with lifebuoys and one of its passengers falls into the sea. If the shipowner's wrongful omission is eliminated and the correct conduct is substituted, we must assume that adequate lifebuoys would have been provided. That, in itself, however, provides no solution to the question whether the drowning was connected with the absence of lifebuoys. A partial substitution of the wrongful conduct by lawful conduct is not enough. What we must further do, in addition to eliminating the wrongful omission is to assume that the ship's crew could and would have used the lifebuoys promptly and that the passenger would have seized one in time. The answer to our question, therefore, can be provided only if we substitute the right for the wrong conduct and then enquire what further changes would have taken place in that event. In the case of omissions, therefore, total substitution (as the above process is sometimes referred to) is, in principle, necessary in order to produce a reasonable result (BGHZ 12, 94). Only if all the conditions mentioned above are satisfied, can the drowning be attributed to the absence of lifebuoys.

A further difficulty occurs if the victim, himself, intervenes in the chain of causation. Normally one would assume that the application of the conditio sine qua non formula is at least problematic in such a case. "The general principle of the traditional doctrine is that the free deliberate and informed act or omission of a human being, intended to exploit the situation created by the defendant, negatives causal connection." (Hart and Honoré Causation in the Law (2nd edn. 1985) p. 136). The BGH was inter alia confronted with the problem in a series of cases concerning police pursuits (see case 81). The court, apparently, did not deny the causal nexus between the defendant's flight and the injury of the policemen in the course of his pursuit (the but for test is, on its face, fulfilled). However, liability is not imposed per se, but depends on whether the victim's conduct was provoked by the defendant's behaviour. The BGH prefers the somewhat open-textured principle of "objective attribution", probably in order to maintain a more flexible and policy-orientated approach. (See, also, next section on legal cause.) However, the rationale of the decision clearly reflects that the but for test does not provide—even prima facie—the solution to these cases in which the victim, himself, inflicts the injury.

The above represents little more than a crass abridgement of the difficulties and diverging views that one can find on this subject. Perhaps, one could thus say that the choice between the elimination and the substitution theories is, in the end, one of policy. The former can lead to more extensive liability (especially in cases of hypothetical causes) and was, apparently, preferred by the Reichsgericht (RGZ 141, 365); the latter can reduce liability within narrow limits and has received the support of the Bundesgerichtshof (BGHZ 10, 6). (For a more detailed analysis consult Honoré, International Encyclopaedia of Comparative Law XI, ch. 7, 74–6, 79 ff.)

In the examples given up to this point the conditio sine qua non rule has been able to produce acceptable results. But there are many instances where the test breaks down completely. This, for example, is the case whenever it can be shown that the event complained of could have been brought about in more than one way. Suppose, for example, that two motorcyclists simultaneously pass the plaintiff's horse in a way that makes it bolt and it is subsequently proved that either of them alone could have caused the fright of the horse. Or imagine two chemical factories releasing independently of each other toxic liquids into a nearby river and thus affecting the riparian owner's fishing-rights. Or, finally, suppose that a garage sells a car which has defective brakes to the plaintiff who, at the critical moment, makes no attempt to apply them. Would the horse have bolted in our first example but for the conduct of the first motorcyclist? The answer is yes, because of the way the other motorcyclist rode quickly past it. The same reasoning can be applied to our other examples. It is thus clear that a strict application of the conditio sine qua non test would hold that neither of the motor-cyclists in the first example, nor the polluting factories in the second, nor the garage in the third, would be held liable since each of these acts was a sufficient cause of the plaintiff's hurt. But, however impeccable the logic of this approach may be, the solution is patently unjust, and unless we hold liable each of the persons who has done enough to bring about the harmful result, the victim will remain uncompensated. The word "enough" supplies the clue for one possible solution. This is found in the adoption of the "substantial factor" formula which was first applied by the Minnesota court (Anderson v. Minneapolis, St. P. and S.MRY Co. 146 Minn. 430, 179 NW 45 (1920)) some eighty years ago and has more recently been sanctioned by the American Restatement Second, Torts § 432.2. According to this theory, the defendant's conduct is a cause of the plaintiff's harm if it was a material element and a substantial factor in bringing it about. There is nothing to stop a German judge from following a similar reasoning and eliminating the insubstantial factors at this stage of the enquiry. On the whole, however, one is left with the impression that this "evaluation process" will be attempted later and at this cause-in-fact stage of the process all activities will be retained as "conditions" of the plaintiff's harm.

In the last three examples we have been faced with what have been termed "multiple sufficient causes" in the sense that each is normally "sufficient" to produce the harmful result. In the first two examples they have both operated simultaneously and have been positive in nature; in the third example, the second cause was negative in nature (i.e. failure to apply the brakes). But the most fiercely debated of “multiple sufficient causes” are the so-called “overtaking causes” (see von Caemmerer, “Das Problem der überholenden Kausalität” in Gesammelte Schriften I, 411). Examples include the case of the medical practitioner who blinds the patient who would, in any event, have subsequently become blind. Another is the case of a house which is damaged by a negligently caused explosion of gas but which would, in any event, have been destroyed by a subsequent bombing attack. In these cases the second cause, i.e. blindness, bomb attack (commonly referred to as the “overtaking” cause but, in actual fact, the cause “overtaken” by the “operative” cause for which the tortfeasor is responsible), is sufficient by itself to produce the harmful result in question. In actual fact, however, it does not do so since the causal process initiated by the tortfeasor prevents, or has already prevented, this from happening. In such cases, can the propositus rely on the second sufficient cause and argue that he did not occasion the whole or part of the harm, or that if he did so, he ought for some other reason (causal or equitable) to be relieved from at least part of the liability? One can envisage a host of possible answers ranging between two extremes, namely, that of completely disregarding the overtaking cause (RGZ 169, 117, 120), and that according to which damages must always be assessed by taking into account events subsequent to the appearance of the cause of action but before trial (BGHZ 10, 6). Larenz’s solution occupies the middle ground. (See his Schuldrecht I, § 30 I, pp. 481 ff.) He distinguishes between the damage caused to the protected interest as such (i.e. a chattel) (so called Objektschaden) and consequential loss. As far as the Objektschaden is concerned the right of action accrues instantly and therefore the hypothetical cause cannot be taken into account, while in respect of consequential loss the hypothetical cause is relevant. All these are issues, which are hotly debated in Germany and cannot be discussed in a book of this kind which has, as its primary aim, to introduce foreign readers to the mysteries of German law. But we shall glance briefly, at the end of this section, at one of these overtaking causes, namely the victim’s predispositions.

(b) Legal cause

The simplicity (or apparent simplicity) of the conditio sine qua non theory led some authors to consider extending its application to the domain of legal cause. Indeed, this is still the case in the area of criminal law since in that branch of the law the element of fault (invariably intention though there do exist criminal offences where negligence will suffice, e.g. §§ 222, 229 StGB) provides a good corrective device against the risk of extensive liability. But in the context of private law, where liability often does not depend on fault, this theory met with little success—German authors opting instead for one of the variants of the adequate causation theory. (German authors make a distinction between causation giving rise to the violation of a protected interest (haftungsbegründende Kausalität) and what we would call remoteness of damage (haftungsausfüllende Kausalität). See Deutsch, 141; Larenz I, § 27, III, 435; Esser/Schmidt I, § 33, II; Traeger, Kausalbegriff, 219.)

This theory was first expounded by the German physiologist von Kries (Die Prinzipien der Wahrscheinlichkeitsrechnung; über den Begriff der objektiven Möglichkeit) and its central idea was simple enough. The defendant’s conduct (or specified event for which he is responsible), which must be a condition of the plaintiff’s hurt, will further qualify as an adequate cause of that harm if it is such that it significantly increases the risk of the type of harm which actually occurs. Theoretically, this approach tends to achieve a compromise between the extension of liability which the theory of direct consequences (known to Common lawyers from the Re Polemis litigation) is capable of producing, and the greater restriction of liability which could result from the use of the foreseeability theory. For, it could be argued, the adequacy theory can set realistic limits of liability by relying on common sense notions of causal connection. Put differently, a “significantly increased probability” is a test less vague than the notion of foreseeability. So, at least, runs the traditional argument for it was eventually realised that the real problem behind these notions is, essentially, one of responsibility and not of causality. A value judgment, foreign to the notion of causation, could and should in the end determine the difficult cases that reached the courts. This became obvious the moment one had to determine how the increased probability of the harm would have to be assessed. Academic writers were quick to offer their views. For von Kries—the originator of the theory—the valuation should be undertaken on the basis of all the circumstances which were known, or ought to have been known, to the originator of the condition at the time of its entry (ex ante) and also taking into account general practical knowledge (ex post) based on experience. Rümelin, on the other hand, advanced the theory of “objective hindsight”. For him consideration should be given to the whole empirical knowledge of mankind and all the circumstances anywhere to hand at the time the condition occurred, whether they were recognisable by the most superior discernment or had first become recognisable ex post from events following the condition in question.

Von Kries’s “individual foresight” approach proved too narrow for private law cases of objective (no fault) liability and contractual liability; Rümelin’s “objective hindsight” theory was, on the other hand, too wide to exclude with certainty the inequitable results of the condition theory. The Wagon Mound I ([1961] AC 388) litigation, for example, would have been decided differently if the objective hindsight test was applied. For it will be remembered, that by the time of the second Wagon Mound II ([1967] 1 AC 617) trial, scientific opinion had changed with regard to the crucial factor which had led to the fire damage in that case (i.e. possibility of oil igniting in water). So a compromise solution was proposed by yet another author—Traeger (Kausalbegriff im Zivil- und Strafrecht (1904), para. 159)—and this came to be adopted by the courts. According to this view, an event is an adequate condition of a consequence if it has in a general and appreciable way enhanced the objective possibility of a consequence of the kind coming about. In deciding this, account is to be taken of (i) all the circumstances recognisable by an “optimal” observer at the time the event occurred and, (ii) the additional circumstances known to the originator of the condition. The factual situation so established must be examined in the light of the whole human experience available at the time the decision is made, to see whether it appreciably favoured the occurrence of the damage-producing event.

A number of cases are reproduced below (see case 80) which show that the case law is not clear and the problems of applying these tests in practice are not solved. In particular, how much knowledge should be credited to the “optimal” observer? Professor Larenz takes the example of a plaintiff who is slightly injured by the defendant but who dies as a result of a heart condition from which he is already suffering and continues:

Is the observer to be credited with knowledge of the heart condition if it was then unknown but could have been discovered by a competent physician? Or need the observer know only that the possibility of such a condition was not completely remote? In that event, the fatal outcome was not wholly unlikely and should have been taken into consideration as well. Or should the observer be taken to know that a pillar struck by a truck had been so weakened that ordinary strains would cause it and the entry of the building to collapse, when this knowledge would have been possessed by an expert in building construction but not by an ordinary worker? The more one credits the observer with knowledge of circumstances which produced the event in question but which could be known only with difficulty, the more one expands the area in which consequences are to be adjudged “adequate”. For the “optimal” observer described by the Bundesgerichtshof, almost nothing is secret; he is practically omniscient. For the omniscient, the actual course of events is always foreseeable, however abnormal it may have been. If one takes the Bundesgerichtshof’s standard of the optimal observer seriously, then the criterion of adequacy loses most of its ability to limit the area of responsibility of the person liable (Lehrbuch des Schuldrechts (11th edn., 1976) 354ff. trans. by von Mehren, in von Mehren and Gordley, The Civil Law System (2nd edn., 1977) 586; in the 1st edn. the text can be found on pp. 436–7).

In view of the above, it is not surprising that more recent court decisions have shown a marked inclination to state that the problem they have to solve is not “exactly one of causality but rather the discovery of a corrective device which can limit the purely logical consequences in the interests of equity”. (See BGHZ 30, 154, 157 and also BGHZ 3, 261, 267). Seen in this light, the adequacy theory has proved an inefficient controlling device. Von Caemmerer has thus argued that an exhaustive examination of the case-law of the Reichsgericht shows that only in a handful of cases the court was able (or willing) to deny the existence of a causal link on the basis of this theory. (Das Problem des Kausalzusammenhangs, in Gesammelte Schriften I, 395, 403ff.) An effort to combine the adequate cause theory with a more normative theory of causation was thus inevitable; the development of the “scope of the rule” theory was its result.

This theory, first elaborated by Rabel (Das Recht des Warenkaufs (1936) 495ff.) in relation to breaches of contractual duties, and more recently, also adopted by tort lawyers, postulates that there should be no recovery if the harm in suit is not within the scope of the rule violated. This may be because the harm is not within the protective purpose of the rule in question (Schutzzweck der Norm) (i.e. it is not the mischief the statute was designed to prevent) or, according to a variant, because it has not come about in an unlawful manner (Rechtswidrigkeitszusammenhang). Interestingly enough, Lord Hoffmann appears to have attempted to establish a similar approach in English law which is—like its German counter-part—founded on the purpose and scope of the duty owed. (This is primarily in the field of tort law but it seems, as the German jurisprudence also demonstrates, that the test can be applied to both areas of the law of obligation.) (For Lord Hoffmann’s views see his speech in South Australia Asset Management Corp. v. York Montague Ltd. [1997] AC 191.) However, it has not yet been worked out how this new approach fits in with the other traditional requirements of remoteness in English law, so it will be interesting to observe its further development. Two leading German cases applying this theory are reproduced below (cases 64 and 65); and for a more recent illustration see BGH NJW 1985, 791; BGH NJW 1991, 3275. Here one could add two English examples, which can illustrate the above propositions. In Gorris v. Scott ((1874) LR 9 Ex. 125) a statute provided that sheep carried as deck cargo should be enclosed in proper pens. They were not, and during rough weather they were washed overboard. The plaintiff’s claim for damages was dismissed on the ground that the purpose of the requirement of the fencing was to prevent the spreading of contagious disease among the animals and not to safeguard them against the perils of the sea. In other words, the mischief that occurred was not the one the statute wanted to prevent. Two more cases (reproduced below, cases 74 and 75), dealing with the duties of local authorities to inspect the foundations of buildings, also provide an illustration of how this normative theory of causation can be used to exclude compensation.

In other instances the plaintiff may not belong to the class of people the statute intended to protect or, alternatively, the statute may have meant to protect only the general interest and not individual interests. This point is illustrated in the cable case reproduced below (case 11). Finally, the harm may have been inflicted in a manner not envisaged by the statute. In Close v. Steel Co. of Wales Ltd. ([1962] AC 367), for example, the House of Lords was concerned with the proper construction of a section of the English Factories Act which provided for the “fencing in” of dangerous machinery. The plaintiff was injured by material which “flew out” of the machinery. The House of Lords took the view that he could not avail himself of this provision since it was designed to protect workmen from coming into contact with moving parts of the machinery and not to protect them from injury inflicted through fragments flying out of the machine itself. Examples such as these abound in German textbooks. (For more details see Larenz, Schuldrecht I, 508 ff.)

It would be futile to add that the new theory has not solved all problems or that it has led to the formulation of a number of variations. But one of its limitations must be stressed. Though the new theory can work well whenever it is easy to assign a particular purpose to a particular rule, it breaks down almost completely when it is difficult or impossible to define with precision the scope of the rule in question. Thus, it works rather well in cases of tortious liability resulting from breach of statutes or subsidiary regulations, and also in the case of some “nominate torts”. But it becomes almost unworkable in the cases of widely conceived tortious conduct (e.g. liability contra bonos mores under § 826 BGB or even § 823 I BGB, on which see Professor Kötz’s comments in his Deliktsrecht, pp. 75–81). Of course, it can be and has been argued that even in these cases the purpose of the rule that is violated can be discovered. For “all rules of conduct, irrespective of whether they are the product of a legislative act or are a part of the fabric of the court-made law of negligence, exist for a purpose. They are designed to protect some persons under some circumstances against some risks” (Malone, 9 Stan. L. Rev. 50, 73 (1956–7)). Yet, as stated, where wrongful conduct is only vaguely defined or definable, it is well-nigh impossible to ascribe a specific purpose to the rule in question, and to invite a judge to do so is to invite him to fix the limits of recovery for himself. This may be desirable whenever reasons of expediency or of policy militate for or against the imposition of liability. In these cases, the “scope of the rule” theory has the clear advantage of making the judge aware of his quasi-legislative functions in deciding the kind of damage which shall be compensated. But this solution is more doubtful when the harm in suit is one, which is clearly recognized but the manner of its infliction is dubious or unusual. Here recourse to the probability or explanatory theories may supply better guidance.

(c) Some special problem areas

It has been noted that causation theories do not really solve all problems. In particular, there are some factual situations which have given rise to considerable difficulties and, incidentally, shown that these theories offer only a conceptual framework within which the judges express their value judgments. Three of these factual situations will be briefly examined in the remaining part of this chapter. The first deals with the fault of the injured party, the second with rescue cases, and the last with the predispositions of the victim/plaintiff.

(i) Fault of the injured party

It will be noticed that we are using here the continental term “fault of the injured party” rather than the approximately equivalent Common law term “contributory negligence”. This is because in the modern civil law fault of the injured party is wider than contributory negligence in so far as it includes intentional activities on behalf of the victim. More importantly, fault of the injured party is often taken to include not only his fault in the production of his hurt but also his failure to minimise its consequences after the harmful result has occurred. The German Civil Code makes this distinction most clearly and regulates the fault of the injured party to mitigate his damage in § 254 II BGB. The distinction, however, is more the result of the wish to establish conceptual clarity rather than the desire to dictate a different treatment. Thus in both cases the victim’s responsibility will be taken into account to reduce his damages. It will be noticed that the legislator leaves considerable freedom to the judge to determine how to work out the reduction of damages. Everything will depend on the circumstances of each case, though the Code does mention one particular factor, which must be carefully weighed by the judge: “How far the injury has been caused predominantly by the one or the other party.” The causative potency of the victim’s conduct in producing his hurt will thus be vital but not the unique factor to be taken into account. For example, the victim’s failure to obtain medical treatment after his injury (RGZ 139, 131, 136), to submit to a medical operation (RGZ 129, 398), or to accept a retraining job because he can no longer pursue his original calling (RGZ 160, 119), will all have to be assessed from a point of view of fault. Only if the tortfeasor can show that the victim’s failure to pursue one of these courses and mitigate his loss was unreasonable, will the victim’s failure to minimise his loss be held against him. (Likewise in English law: Steele v. Robert George & Co. [1942] AC 497; Richardson v. Redpath, Brown & Co. [1944] AC 62. Contra Selvanayagam v. University of the West Indies [1983] 1 All ER 824.) Incidentally, German law requires the tortfeasor to meet the reasonable costs of a retraining programme in order to give the victim the chance to minimise his loss of earnings (BGHZ 10, 18). Beyond stating these general rules, it is difficult to say how far the courts lean over backwards in order not to “discover” contributory fault and thus give the victim his full compensation. It could be argued that they appear to be more eager to discover fault in defendants—especially where insurance is obligatory or prevalent—than they are to find it in plaintiffs. If this “impressionistic” reaction is correct, and there is some authority in England to support this (see, for example, Gough v. Thorne [1966] 1 WLR 1387 and Daly v. Liverpool Corp. [1939] 1 KB 394), it would certainly be in tune with the more modern trend to disregard the victim’s own fault unless it is particularly flagrant or obnoxious, and to let him recover full compensation. This view has been officially adopted by the 1964 Soviet Civil Code and sanctioned by the French Cour de Cassation in the context of traffic accident actions based on Article 1384 CC. (On this last point see Cass 2ème civ. 21 juillet 1982, 1982 D. 449 and Gazette du Palais, 18–19 mars 1983, with rich references to the case-law and literature, and see, now, the Law of 5 July 1985, Article 3 reproduced below.)

(ii) Rescue cases

If the victim is injured while attempting to avert or minimize harm to another he could be said to have brought about (caused) his own hurt or to be at fault. The problem of his compensation can thus be approached in terms of causation, fault or, for the Common law system, duty of care: does the tortfeasor owe a duty not only to the immediate victim but also to the rescuer? How one approaches the problem is a matter of technique and legal tradition and, for present purposes, is less important. The case reproduced below (87) shows that German lawyers prefer the causative approach. The practical answer, however, is not in doubt: reasonable attempts to avert or minimise harm will not be treated as faults; or (which is another way of putting it) they will not interrupt the original chain of causation and hence the rescuer will be entitled to claim compensation. This can be justified slightly differently depending on which of the many causal theories one wishes to adopt—but the end result is not in doubt: unless entirely foolhardy, the rescue will not render the victim's harm too remote. The fact that in § 323c of the Criminal Code the German legal system imposes a limited duty to come to the aid of others, only helps accentuate this greater willingness to be lenient towards rescuers, even where they are acting beyond the requirements of § 323c.

(iii) Predispositions

We spoke at the beginning of the section of overtaking causes which were described as additional causes capable of bringing about the harm in question which the tortfeasor's conduct has actually produced. Some of them can be referred to as external overtaking causes. For example, A damages B's car in a way that makes respraying necessary. Subsequently, C damages the car so that there would have to be a respraying even if there had been no previous collision. C, if sued, can argue that he caused no new damage and A, if sued, could rely on the but-for test and argue that he is not the cause of B's damage for it would have occurred even if he (A) had not committed the tort. Other overtaking causes can be described as internal and here one includes the plaintiff's predispositions. We must, of course, hasten to add that here we are not talking of the state of the plaintiff's health which is due to his own fault. The fact that he is an alcoholic, for example, may in some way increase the harm he has suffered. This, if at all relevant, will be discussed under the heading of contributory fault. But what if the injured party suffers from a hereditary abnormality (e.g. he is a haemophiliac) which increases the extent of the injury inflicted by the defendant? Whether the susceptibility or defect of the injured party is latent, quiescent, or whatever, the general principle of German law (and, indeed, other systems as well, including the Common law) is that the defendant must take his victim as he finds him. (See BGHZ 20, 137. For more recent examples see BGH NJW 1982, 168—man bitten by a dog in the stomach; war wound had resulted in an unusually thin abdominal wall which resulted in the bite having more serious consequences than otherwise would have been the case; court found for plaintiff and refused to hold him contributorily negligent for not wearing a protective belt or corset—and BGH VersR 1986, 812.) This has been extended to include not only physical but also psychological weaknesses (RGZ 133, 270, 272; BGH NJW 1958, 1579) and, indeed, any further weaknesses caused by the accident. (For a more recent case see OLG Frankfurt JZ 1982, 201 with a disapproving note by Stoll which shows, for example, how a defendant who injured the plaintiff was held responsible for the latter's death caused by influenza contracted in the hospital where the victim was taken for treatment for the original injury.) Needless to say, various causal explanations have been advanced to support this conclusion but, clearly, they are all strained in the extreme and the explanation must be sought in the realm of policy—namely the growing desire to afford the maximum possible protection to human health and life. An even more extreme application of this kind of reasoning can be found in case 58. There the tortfeasor was held liable not only for the amputation of the plaintiff's leg caused by the tortfeasor's act, but also for the injury suffered by the victim twenty years later and due to the fact that he had never become accustomed to the artificial leg fitted after the first injury. These results are so obviously incompatible with all probability theories of causation that they put in question the whole policy decision to protect the victim. One wonders in other words whether, in some cases at least, it would not be sounder policy to oblige a person with a given weakness or predisposition to take greater care for himself rather than make the tortfeasor face the bill of even the remotest consequences of his conduct (see Stoll's criticism in Kausalzusammenhang und Normzweck im Deliktsrecht (1968) 43). This willingness to "take the tortfeasor's side" and deny the victim all his demands is clearly visible in certain types of neurotic reactions which can follow an accident. Thus, the victim may suffer a neurotic fear, which may impede his return to work (accident neurosis). Or he may demonstrate a neurotic refusal to return to work, prompted by the desire to continue receiving periodical payments or damages (compensation neurosis). Or he may display similar symptoms, prompted by the anxiety caused by litigation (litigation neurosis). All these instances could easily be attributed to a pre-existing weak or even defective psychological state and could thus impose unacceptably far-reaching liability on the tortfeasor, besides giving a premium to the victim's lack of personal effort to overcome these emotional reactions and return to work. Whenever this is particular evident, the German courts will ignore causation theories and openly deny compensation. In these cases one can even find an open allusion to policy which militates in favour of a denial of compensation in order to facilitate the victim's "return" to social life (see BGHZ 20, 137, 142).

What is true of the physical condition of the victim is to a great extent also true of his economic position. If the tortfeasor injures a man who happens to look like a tramp but is actually a skilled neurosurgeon he will have to pay more (though this is, strictly speaking, a rule of compensation and not a rule of remoteness of damage) since it is concerned with unexpected costs of expected consequences). This may, at first sight, sound unfair and it is, undoubtedly, a relic of a highly individualistic age. And it is ill at ease with social security systems, which limit disability benefits to "average" earnings and, in the end, it may even be abandoned. But for the time being this is, with few exceptions, the position taken by most systems. The greater the economic strength of the victim, the greater the size of the compensation. But if the victim's great economic robustness affects the quantum of his damages should not his weakness also be taken into account? The problem has arisen in cases, which have to decide whether the victim should be allowed to claim a sum of money to buy a substitute for the property destroyed by the tortfeasor. Logically, the solution should be the same; the German courts have in fact allowed victims the cost of acquiring substitute property.

(d) Comparative conclusions

The Common law reader of the preceding pages should have had no difficulty in following the exposition of the German law. True, some different solutions to specific problems can be found here and there; and the English Common lawyer (but not the American) may find the German theoretical approach to be in stark contrast to his own pragmatic appraisal of the problems of causation. But, as already observed, even this difference can be overstated; and the similarities can be just as striking. Striking if not at times uncanny when, for example, one considers how, within a short space of time, Rabel in Berlin and Green in Texas could come up with more or less the same theory. Thus, this comparative excursus need not be too long. (For details see Honoré's excellent contribution on this subject in the International Encyclopaedia of Comparative Law XI, ch. 7 and for a more brief comparative discussion Lawson and Markesinis, Tortious Liability for Unintentional Harm in the Common Law and the Civil Law (1982) I, 106–41 both providing extensive bibliographical references.)

The first thing to note is that the adequate causation theory has come to mean slightly different things to different people. But in its less expansive form (to be found, for example, in France) it tends to produce results very similar to those achieved by the foreseeability theory, which is favoured by the Common law system. Indeed, one of France's leading contemporary jurists—Professor Carbonnier—has described the adequate cause theory as a variant of the foreseeability approach (Droit Civil IV, 323). Nevertheless, the foreseeability test is primarily a test for remoteness of damage for the tort of negligence and—since the Wagon Mound II litigation—also for the tort of nuisance. The adequate cause theory, on the other hand, is applied to all forms of tort liability and is not limited to cases of liability based on fault. However, its practical value is limited since it does not effectively exclude problematic cases and imposes a very low threshold. As a result, yet another theory had to be created, based on protective purpose of the duty in question (Schutzzwecklehre). This approach is flexible, as it can react to the peculiarities of each case. More importantly, it very often makes it easy to import policy arguments while maintaining a legalistic tone (this will be noted in greater detail when we discuss the examples of its application, e.g. wrongful life, state liability). Secondly, the Common law systems also possess an additional doctrine—that of the unforeseeable plaintiff. To put it differently, there is often a tendency to rephrase certain problems of legal or “proximate” cause in terms of legal duty. Given that the same test (foreseeability) determines both the “remote plaintiff” (illustrated by the leading cases of Palsgraf v. Long Island Ry Co. (248 NY 339, 162 NE 99, (1928) and Hay (Bourhill) v. Young ([1943] AC 92)) and the “remote damage”, one wonders whether anything is gained by this “dichotomy” of what is essentially one subject: the subject of remoteness. This, however, is essentially a problem of classification or, as Dean Prosser once observed (Law of Torts (4th edn., 1971) 244), to opt for “duty” rather than “proximate cause” only restates the problem but does not solve it. The only conceivable advantage of opting for the “duty” approach is that it can help—in Prosser's words again—“direct attention to the policy issues which determine the extent of the original obligation and of its continuance, rather than to the mechanical sequence of events which goes to make up causation in fact”.

Noting this difference is more important than trying to defend the Common or civil law approach. For, as has been stated in the preceding pages, many problems such as nervous shock and rescue cases will in one system be treated in the causation section of some books and in the duty section of others. The comparatist will have to learn to jump over these artificial hurdles of classification and, in so doing, reflect once again on how policy and not concepts or theories determine the ultimate result.

SECTION B. CASES

1. NERVOUS SHOCK

Case 1

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 11 MAY 1971
BGHZ 56, 163 = NJW 1971, 1883 = VERSR 1971, 905, 1140

On 6 March 1965, when he was sixty-four years old, the plaintiff's husband was fatally injured in a collision with the defendant's motor vehicle. The plaintiff was fifty years old at the time. In this suit she claims damages for the injury to her health which she suffered through the death of her husband.

The Landgericht allowed the claim in full, the Oberlandesgericht in part. The defendant appealed with permission, and his appeal was allowed. The judgments below were vacated, and the case remanded to the Court of Appeal.

Reasons

A . . .

2 (a) . . .

(b) The Court of Appeal was wrong to find that the plaintiff suffered any real injury to her health as a result of hearing of the accident (see BGH VersR 1966, 283, 285 ff.; OLG Freiburg, JZ 1953, 705, 709).

Apart from a few special instances not here in point, our law consciously rejects any claim for harm due to psychical pain unless it results from injury to the plaintiff's own body or health. This is a policy decision of the legislator. It does not, however, prevent our granting an independent claim to the exceptional person who is "traumatised" by being involved in an accident, or hearing of one, and who in consequence suffers real damage to body or mind. Nor, if we leave aside the cases of "purposive neuroses" and supervening causes, for which special rules have been developed, is it an objection to granting such a claim that the only reason the victim's reaction was so severe was that he had a pre-existing organic or psychical weakness which was triggered by the accident. The opposite view is taken by Stoll in his paper for the 45th German Juristentag 1964, 20, but we cannot agree with it, if only because such an unusual reaction normally lies outside the victim's control as well as the defendant's.

On the other hand it is a matter of common knowledge that the pain, grief, and fright arising from a very negative experience can have a very marked effect on one's physiological system and one's ability to cope. Yet to treat such disturbances as invasions of health in the sense of § 823 I BGB would be inconsistent with the binding decision of the legislator (Stoll, idem, 19 ff.). Except in cases where the injury was intended by the actor, liability for harm psychically occasioned, even though it may be adequately caused according to the traditional formula, must be limited to cases where the man in the street, and not only a medical practitioner, would describe it as injury to body and health [reference omitted]. Under certain circumstances, therefore, injuries which are medically ascertainable but do not amount to a “shock” to the system will go uncompensated. Accordingly, no claim can be made in the normal case of deeply felt grief, which, as everybody knows, may have quite serious effects on a person’s general well being.

(c) In the light of these principles, the opinion of the Court of Appeal cannot stand.

The Court of Appeal laid weight on the expert’s finding that “the plaintiff naturally suffered severe psychic shock on first hearing of the death of her husband”. But the court read too much into this. The court had formally asked the expert to report on whether the plaintiff had suffered “a severe psychic shock which altered her personality and made her depressed, unduly excitable, sleepless, tearful, and apt to shiver on the slightest occasion”, taking these terms from the written evidence of Dr C, the plaintiff’s general practitioner, evidence of which the expert was somewhat critical. In his reply the expert simply confirmed in general terms that there had been a “severe psychological shock”, though it is doubtful, in view of what he said immediately thereafter, whether he intended this to constitute a medical finding. As to the other symptoms about which he was asked, he made no positive finding, but rather indicated that he himself had not observed them. It would require stronger evidence than this before the Court of Appeal could properly hold that the plaintiff had suffered an injury to health sufficient to ground a claim.

In everyday speech the phrase “severe psychological shock” denotes a violent temperamental reaction which may have nothing in common with an illness of any kind. Medical men do not use the notion of shock to describe a psychopathological condition. Used to describe a pathological condition (apart from the special case of shock therapy) “shock” denotes simply an acute disturbance of the circulation [reference omitted] which can result from experiencing an accident or, more rarely, hearing of one. This is naturally of a transitory nature, though it can lead to lasting organic damage. It is by no means clear that the expert believed this to have occurred. A person who experiences an accident, and less often a person who hears of one, may also suffer psychopathological effects. Doctors call this “neurosis” (not necessarily a purposive neurosis of the kind for which no compensation may be given) or in serious cases even “psychosis” [reference omitted]. The expert’s affidavit does not suggest that he was testifying to any illness of this kind. It is not enough that he did not say there was none: a positive finding is necessary or the plaintiff will fail to meet her burden of proof.

IV. To the extent, therefore, that it grants the plaintiff a claim for damages on her own account, the judgment under appeal cannot be sustained.

When the Court of Appeal re-examines the matter it will need to be convinced, before it can allow the plaintiff’s claim even in part, that on hearing of the accident she not only experienced the normal reactions of pain, grief, and depression, but also directly suffered a “traumatic” injury to her physical and psychological health. Further expert evidence may be required, and if the expert testifies to such a condition, it will be necessary to ask to what extent he is relying on the evidence of the general practitioner, which is inadmissible in its present form.

B. I. If, after further investigation, the Court of Appeal holds that the claim should be admitted, the question of the deceased husband’s contributory fault will arise. This must be dealt with in a different manner.

1. The Court of Appeal held that in cases like the present one cannot apply § 846 BGB by analogy, and in so holding it was consciously deviating from a view laid down by the Reichsgericht (RGZ 157, 11; RG DR 1940, 163) and supported by some scholars [reference omitted]. We agree with the Court of Appeal on this point: the opinion of the Reichsgericht is unacceptable in the form in which it was expressed. It was certainly right to emphasize that the basic rule of law is that only the direct victim of a tort may sue, a rule to which exceptions are made by §§ 844 and 845 BGB in favour of surviving dependants and persons entitled to services. But it was in error to treat the claim by a third party who suffers injury to his own health when someone else is injured or killed as if this were another case of “indirect injury to a third party” and to apply § 846 BGB to it by analogy. The difference between this case and those in §§ 844, 845 BGB is essentially that here the third party is affected in one of the legal interests specified in § 823 I BGB and that he is therefore a direct victim with an independent claim of his own under that section. Claims by the indirect victim under §§ 844, 845 BGB presuppose that the primary victim’s harm resulted from a tort done to him (BGH VersR 1961, 846, 847) and that is why § 846 BGB provides that any fault on the part of the primary victim which contributed to the harm suffered by the third party must be taken into account in any claim the third party may bring under §§ 844, 845 BGB. This provision is perfectly sensible in relation to claims brought under §§ 844, 845 BGB, but it cannot apply to an independent claim brought under § 823 I BGB, for it must be irrelevant to a claim for harm done directly to the third party that it occurred by means of an injury to someone else. Indeed, the third party’s rights may arise regardless of whether the primary victim of the accident had or has any claim for damages at all [OLG Munich NJW 1959, 819d; other reference omitted].

2. Yet we must agree with the result reached by the Reichsgericht, at least in cases of the kind before us, that in considering the personal claim of the indirectly injured widow one must take account of any contributory fault of the deceased husband. This, however, results from an analogical application of § 254 BGB, itself a specific application of the more general principle of law contained in § 242 BGB (BGHZ 4, 355).

(a) This is quite clear in relation to a claim for damages for pain and suffering (Schmerzensgeld; § 847 BGB), to which equitable principles apply. The Bundesgerichtshof has held (VersR 1962, 93) that a claim for damages for pain and suffering, unlike a claim for material damage, may be reduced because the victim was especially vulnerable to harm by reason of his bodily or psychical constitution, and that the personal contributory fault of the victim, which does not arise in this case, is only one of the factors to be taken into account in estimating the damages which are equitable in the circumstances (BGHZ 18, 149, 157). The same must be true of other factors in the victim’s area of responsibility which contribute to the harm, such as a close personal relationship to the primary accident victim, as in this case.

(b) But even in cases of material harm the result reached by the Reichsgericht is correct. Where, as here, injury to health is caused at a distance, so to speak, the contributory fault of the damaged must be laid to the plaintiff’s account. For here the accident to her husband was only able to cause the harm supposedly suffered by the plaintiff because as a result of their close personal relationship his tragedy became hers. One cannot imagine a person suffering in this manner on hearing of a fatal accident to a total stranger; indeed, if it happened, it would be so unusual that one would decline to impute it to the defendant on the ground that it was unforeseeable. But if the critical reason for the plaintiff’s suffering this injury to her health was her close personal relationship to her husband, it is only fair that her claim should be affected by his fault in contributing to the accident. We must apply by analogy the basic idea of § 254 BGB, that a person's claim for damages must be reduced to the extent that the occurrence of the harm was due to a contributory factor from the plaintiff's sphere of responsibility. In this connection we must make a further observation. If the husband's death had been solely attributable to his failure to take care of himself, the plaintiff would have had no claim whatever for compensation for the consequent injury to herself. A person is under no legal duty, whatever the moral position may be, to look after his own life and limb simply in order to save his dependants from the likely psychical effects on them if he is killed or maimed: to impose such a legal duty, except in very peculiar cases, for instance, wherever a person commits suicide in a deliberately shocking manner, would be to restrict a person's self-determination in a manner inconsistent with our legal system.

It will be seen from this that unsatisfactory results follow from the view adopted by the Court of Appeal and some writers, which is that the primary victim's contributory fault is not to be taken into account when shock damage is caused at a distance. We have seen that, contrary to the view expressed by the Reichsgericht (RGZ 157, 11, 14) and by some of the writers, a tortfeasor cannot claim contribution under §§ 840, 254 BGB from the heirs of the primary victim, since the primary victim is not liable to the shock victim at all, much less as a common debtor. It follows that unless our present view is adopted, the tortfeasor would owe the shocked widow a full indemnity for her lost earnings even if the husband was so much more to blame for his own death than the tortfeasor that in a suit by the husband the tortfeasor would be wholly exonerated under § 254 BGB. This would be quite unacceptable.

Now it is true that in principle when a tortfeasor is sued he bears the risk of there being no solvent joint tortfeasor from whom he can claim contribution. But there are exceptions. For example, the courts have held that if, by reason of personal relationship with him, the victim releases one tortfeasor from liability in advance, the other tortfeasor should be protected (BGHZ 12, 213). In our case the third party has not been exonerated by release or by capricious conduct on the part of the creditor, but it is none the less true that the primary victim has, though involuntarily, had an adverse effect on the health of the shock victim in respect of which he is not liable. Once again, in these peculiar cases, the harm is caused only because of the very close personal relationship between the plaintiff and the primary victim, thanks to which the plaintiff adopts as her own the harm done to another, and the loss of his life becomes a loss, a serious loss, to her. In such a case, where it would be wrong to require the primary victim or his heirs to make contribution to the tortfeasor, it is only fair that the primary victim's causal contribution to the accident should be borne not by the stranger who triggered the harm but by the dependant who was hurt only because of her personal relationship with the primary victim and her identification with him. It was equitable considerations such as these that led the legislator to enact § 846 BGB though, as we have said, it covers a different case. In relation to that paragraph the Protokolle (vol. 2, II, 638 ff.) explain that to treat the third party's claim against the tortfeasor as entirely independent is too theoretical and logically extreme, and that to apply that view strictly would lead to unjust and inequitable results; the claims of a dead man's survivors result from his death, and if his careless conduct conduced to or accelerated his death, it is only right, in view of their relations with him, that the survivors should have to bear the consequences.

The claim for shock damage which arises in this distinctive manner is a judge-made claim, and though the Court of Appeal would like to extend it beyond the limits set by the Reichsgericht, we are not persuaded by any of the objections which its position on this question has elicited. It only remains to say that, contrary to what is stated in a number of the books, the Reichsgericht was always perfectly clear (see RGZ 162, 321) that cases of shock damage are cases of direct injury to a legal interest protected by § 823 I BGB and not simply instances of indirect harm of the kind covered by §§ 844, 845 BGB.

(c) The present case does not raise the issue of how the decision would be if the occurrence of the harm were wholly or partly independent of any personal relationship, or indeed how far a tortfeasor might be liable at all if the persons suffering the damaging reaction were third parties in no way related to the primary victim.

Case 2

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 4 APRIL 1989
NJW 1989, 2317

Facts

The plaintiff and her husband had booked a cruise in the eastern Mediterranean scheduled to start on April 26, 1984 and paid the organisers the full price of DM 10,130. On April 21, 1984 the plaintiff's son C, then aged 22, was killed in a road accident. It is not contested by the parties that the defendant is liable in full for the damage resulting from the accident. On account of the pressures placed upon them, the plaintiff and her husband were unable to take the cruise which began one day after the funeral. They were not able to claim reimbursement of the DM 10,130 from the organisers. The plaintiff claimed for the loss of potential support under § 845 BGB arising from her rights as the mother of the victim of the accident and from her husband's corresponding rights which were assigned to her. In addition she claimed compensation for the expenditure on the lost holiday.

Although the LG rejected the claim based on § 845 BGB, it awarded her DM 10,130 as compensation for the holiday expenses. The OLG dismissed the appeals of both parties, but the defendant's appeal to the BGH was successful in respect of the lost holiday expenditure. The plaintiff's cross-appeal for the loss of support was denied.

For the following reasons:

I. The OLG accepted the claim brought by the plaintiff for the recovery of money spent on the holiday booked but not taken and made the following findings of law:

As a result of their son's death, the plaintiff and her husband were harmed in respect of their "right of health" protected by § 823 I BGB. The general view is that damages for pain and suffering are only available in respect of loss in the form of nervous shock which has the degree of severity of an illness. This does not necessarily mean that psychological impairment can only represent an infringement of a right protected by § 823 I BGB when it has the degree of severity of an illness. On the contrary, any form of invasion of the plaintiff's general bodily condition such as the infliction of worry and discomfort is sufficient for there to be damage to the plaintiff's health. Furthermore, the court believed the plaintiff's assertion that she and her husband were psychologically incapable of going on holiday as a result of the death of their son. The principles developed by the case law on the "Vorhaltekosten" [costs of maintaining a replacement vehicle whenever the plaintiff's own vehicle is out of circulation as a result of an accident] must be applied in this case and, as a result, the expenditure on the holiday must be treated as a recoverable form of damage.

II. The appeal judgment cannot be upheld in law.

1. On the basis of the facts as established, the OLG sees the plaintiff and her husband as having suffered an injury to their right of health protected under § 823 I BGB as a direct consequence of the accident suffered by their son. As a result, it held that the defendant was under a duty to make good the lost expenditure on the holiday as a consequence of the injury.

(a) This approach is not correct as a matter of law. True, the case law has long recognised [references omitted] that the concept of injury to the health within the meaning of § 823 I BGB not only covers physical impairment of the body, but also impairment of a psychological form. However, the law at present denies recovery for mental pain in so far as this is not a consequence of the effects of the injury to the (plaintiff's own) body or the (plaintiff's own) health. Feelings such as sorrow and pain, which are generated by the negative experience itself, are always linked in serious cases with disturbances in the plaintiff's physiological make-up and can, therefore, be directly relevant in a medical sense to the plaintiff's bodily state. To recognise these matters in law as injuries to the plaintiff's health within the meaning of § 823 I BGB . . . would contradict the intention of the legislator to limit tortious liability in § 823 I BGB to clearly defined sets of circumstances by restricting the range of protected interests and the prohibited forms of conduct. In particular, the BGB [never intended] to give a remedy, except where §§ 844 and 845 BGB apply, in cases where the interference with the protected interests of a person has an effect on third parties, unless the latter have suffered an injury in their own right. Thus, precisely in cases such as the present one, the close relatives will normally experience an effect upon their psychological and mental condition on hearing of the victim's death in an accident and as a consequence will suffer not only non-pecuniary, but also pecuniary loss. Nevertheless, the law has restricted recovery for pecuniary loss in the case of the person "indirectly" injured by a death to the more precisely defined types of loss set out in §§ 844 and 845 BGB. This legislative determination in favour of a basic limitation of tortious liability to recovery by the person "directly" injured, would be undermined if those types of psychological and mental effects resulting from the experience of the death of a close relative amounted to recoverable injury to health under § 823 I BGB simply because they are recognised by medical science. Consequently, this court has, since its decision in BGHZ 56, 163 [references omitted], only recognised a right to compensation in these types of cases for those types of psychologically inflicted impairments which have psychopathological effects lasting for some time, which exceed by some degree the already not inconsiderable detriment caused by a painful trauma for a person's general state of health, and which can therefore "be regarded in accordance with the general view as injuries to the body or to the health of the victim" [references omitted]. For this reason it is wrong for the OLG to take the view, in cases such as the present one where the loss is in the nature of psychological pressure upon the relatives as a result of the death, that even in the context of psychological injuries any invasion of the plaintiff's general bodily condition, or any infliction of worry and discomfort would suffice even if it did not display the severity of an illness. This point of view is not even supported by the references cited by the OLG itself such as Thomas in Palandt in BGB Kommentar, 48th Edition, § 823 note

3b. In that commentary upon the law relating to injuries to mental and bodily health through psychological effects [reference omitted] it is stated that “in accordance with the protective purpose of § 823 I BGB a claim for compensation should exist only where the injury to health exceeds, in the type and degree, that which close relatives must expect to suffer by way of impairment in these kinds of cases.” In making this statement, Thomas also cited the judgment of this court of May 11 1971 (NJW 1971, 1883 [other references omitted]). The court confirms the approach taken there according to which the only psychological impairments which will amount to injuries to health under § 823 I BGB are those which display the characteristics of an obvious pathology and which will, therefore, be seen by the general public as injuries to the body or the health of the victim [references omitted]. Findings of fact to this effect were not discussed by the OLG and were not advanced by the plaintiff.

(b) If an injury to the health of the plaintiff or her husband within the meaning of § 823 I BGB as a consequence of the fatal accident involving their son cannot be established, then it may be left open whether, if such psychological impairments did in the particular circumstances of this case lead to a genuine injury to the plaintiff’s health in the sense defined above, lost expenditure on a holiday which was booked but not taken could be brought within the scope and purpose of the legal norm which has been violated [references omitted]. There is also no need to decide whether, for example, recovery for such a form of detriment is excluded as a form of recoverable compensation for injury to health because experience would indicate that regardless of whether the psychological and physical impairments which they might have suffered as a result of the traumatic event had the degree of severity of an illness as required by § 823 I BGB, parents would not, normally, go on holiday one day after the funeral of their child.

2. The appeal judgment is further unsustainable on other legal grounds. Consideration should be given in this context to § 844 I BGB. Even if with respect to this claim for damages (which here accrues to a third party due to his duty to bear the funeral costs) one could give the term “funeral” expenses a wide meaning to include all expenditures associated with an appropriate and dignified burial, the presence of proximate cause (Zurechnungszusammenhang) would be questionable. This is because the plaintiff, according to her own pleadings, failed to take the holiday because of the psychological pressures she was experiencing as a result of the accident and not because of the timing of the funeral.

However, even if the focus were solely upon the funeral, it must be held that expenditure upon a holiday which is booked but not taken falls outside the protective scope of § 844 I BGB. For as exceptions to the general principle of the law of tort, that only persons who are directly injured by an accident will normally have a claim for compensation, §§ 844 and 845 BGB are to be narrowly interpreted. This means that in the context of § 844 I BGB it is the duty of the victim’s heirs to bear the costs of the funeral which must form the focus of attention; but the concept of funeral expenses cannot be extended to cover expenditure which has been wasted because the third party (plaintiff) had to attend the funeral. Even if, exceptionally, § 844 I BGB can be construed as encompassing also the recovery of the travelling expenses of close relatives to attend the victim’s funeral [references omitted], compensation for the above types of expenditure would go beyond the scope of liability set by the legislator. This court finds itself precluded from giving a wider interpretation of § 844 I BGB both by the terms of the law, itself, and the place of § 844 I BGB within the [wider] systematic framework of the law of tort.

1. The previous two and the next one case deal with the compensation of what used to be known in English law as nervous shock but nowadays goes by under the name of psychiatric injury. In the United States the term used is emotional harm and this is wider than the English term for two reasons. First, because, as we shall note below, in some jurisdictions this is seen to include distress, anxiety, and diminished enjoyment of life, types of harm which are seen with greater distrust both by English and German law. Secondly, American lawyers award compensation for emotional harm in factual instances such as discrimination (sexual or racial), violation of religious freedom, sexual harassment, and other such instances in which English and Continental European courts (and the legislature) have yet to make comparable inroads. In these notes we shall thus focus on the factual situations covered by the three German cases, all of which involve psychiatric injury inflicted as a result of experiencing unusually distressing scenes. Seen in this context, the first two cases raise four important points.

2. The first is connected with the problem of distant shock. Endorsing the view of earlier courts—of which RGZ 133, 270 is reproduced below as case 3—the court took the view that recovery should not be confined to eye-witnessing relatives but should also be allowed where the injurious effect was distant (Fernwirkung). This point, though never seriously contested, has been reaffirmed in more recent times by the Federal Court. (BGH 5 February 1985, BGHZ 93, 351 = NJW 1985, 1390 with note by Deubner at p. 1392). In that case the plaintiff was en ventre sa mère when the latter was told of her husband's serious injuries in a traffic accident. As a result, the mother suffered severe physiological and psychological reactions, which affected the birth process and led to the plaintiff being born seriously impaired. The child's claim for a declaratory judgment that she was entitled to damages was accepted, the court rejecting the defendant's argument that there was no causal nexus between the mother's shock and the plaintiff's injury. This is one of the crucial issues in nervous shock cases and is discussed more fully in the notes to the next case. For a summary of German law see chap. 2, A. 2, (c), above.

3. The second point decided by the Federal Court was that recovery should be limited to cases of psychiatric injury. See: Attia v. British Gas Plc, [1988] QB 304, 317, 320, per Bingham LJ. Cf. Toms v. McConnell, 45 Mich. App. 647, 207 NW 2d 140 (1973). See, also, De Franceschi v. Storrier (1989) 85 ACTR 1. This includes cases where there is a recognisable medical illness entailing such consequences as sleeping disorders, headaches, vomiting, speech disturbances, inability to concentrate, loss of libido and, in the most serious types of cases, even suicidal mania. (A fuller list can be found in Alcock v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire [1992] 1 AC 310, 317.) Attempts by German lawyers to enlarge the definition of compensatable harm to include life's general risks—allgemeines Lebensrisiko—such as pain, grief, and other expenses connected with the “inconvenience” suffered as a result of the death of a close relative, have been rebuffed by the courts. (See BGH NJW 1989, 2317, reproduced above as case 2. Point re-confirmed in BGH 9 April 1991, NJW 1991, 2347. Likewise in English law—Lord Lloyd in Page v. Smith [1996] 1 AC 155—and in most but not all the jurisdictions of the United States.) However, the dividing line between, on the one hand psychiatric injury with recognised medical symptoms, and on the other hand “ordinary” pain and grief is sometimes more easy to state than to apply. An able lawyer and a sympathetic court can also manipulate it in favour of the plaintiff—if operating under a jury system. Case 2 shows how, with the help of a wider, teleological interpretation of all the relevant provisions of the Code, the temptation has been avoided in Germany. In this context, therefore, German law greatly resembles the English approach, though the juxtaposition of the German and English decisions (e.g. Hinz v. Berry [1970] 2 QB 40, 42) reveals some interesting differences at the level of writing style. (Cf. in this respect, the comments of Professor Kötz in La Sentenza in Europa: Metodo Tecnica e Stile (1988), Einführungsvortrag, 129.) On the other hand, in German law, “. . . it is not a precondition of the tortfeasor’s liability that the psychological effects had a physical cause. It is sufficient if it is clear enough that the psychological impairment would not have occurred but for the accident.” (BGH 9 April 1991 NJW 1991, 2347; trans. by Weir taken from van Gerven, op. cit., p. 92.)

4. The diversity of American solutions makes comparisons with the law in the USA more difficult, especially with the legal scene of the last thirty years ago. For here one finds diametrically different trends and a continuing and bewildering state of flux. The comments in this note must thus be read in conjunction with what is said in the notes to the next case and with the important caveat that in the United States one can find decisional law that can support almost every conceivable proposition. Such uncertainty and flux are unlikely to make American law a model for exportation, though landmark decisions such as Dillon v. Legg, 68 Cal. 2d 728, 69 Cal. Rptr. 72, 441 P. 2d 912 (1968), have had an important impact on other systems, including the English, and still repay careful reading.

In the United States, the first (and liberalising) trend manifested itself in the late seventies and early 1980s and was mostly to be found in the Western States of America. Those courts, which adopted it, inclined towards a wide (but erratic) interpretation of Dillon, undermining the calm authority of the case. They thus seemed willing to consider sympathetically claims for “emotional distress” unaccompanied by obvious physical manifestations. See Molien v. Kaiser Foundation Hospitals, 27 Cal. 3d 916, 616 P. 2d 813 (1980); Whitmore v. Euroways Express Coaches Ltd, The Times, 4 May 1984. In the Molien case the main controlling device introduced by the court was the requirement that the emotional harm suffered by the plaintiff be “serious”. This was defined in Rodrigues v. State, 52 Haw. 156, 472 P. 2d 509 (1970) (and approved by Molien) as “serious mental distress . . . found where a reasonable man, normally constituted, would be unable to adequately cope with the mental stress engendered by the circumstances of the case”. If the italicised words are properly utilised they could be sufficient: but the Hawaiian courts have certainly not taken it seriously: see the bizarre case of Campbell v. Animal Quarantine Station 63 Haw. 557, 632 P. 2d 1066 (1981). There, five plaintiffs recovered a total of $1,000 for the anguish they suffered when they were told over the phone that their ageing dog had died the previous day after it had been forgotten in an unventilated van for over an hour exposed to the Hawaiian sun! (Some of these decisions, which are not without parallels in other systems such as the French, are discussed by Wise, “Recovery of Common Law damages for Emotional Distress, Loss of Society, and Loss of Companionship for the Wrongful death of a Companion Animal”, 4 Animal Law 33 (1998).) But this shift towards plaintiffs courted a reaction which came with a vengeance as the changed of political climate in the 1980s put more conservatively inclined judges on the Bench. The decision of the Supreme Court of California in Elden v. Sheldon 250 Cal., 254 (1988), is an excellent example. Thing v. La Chusa, 48 Cal. 3d 644, 257 Cal. Rptr. 865, 771 P. 2d 814 (1989), another “leading” case, confirmed this swing; and it presents a particular interest to English lawyers in so far as it involved facts very similar to those of the English case of McLoughlin v. O’Brian [1983] 1 AC 410. But in the California case, the mother who rushed to the scene of the accident after it had occurred to find her son bloody and apparently dead, failed to recover for her own emotional distress whereas in the England the opposite result was reached. This antithesis of the late 1980s to the thesis of the previous ten years thus marks a return to a more traditional understanding of the meaning of emotional distress. It also radically restricts the range of claimants under the Dillon v. Legg rule. This will be discussed briefly in the notes that accompany the translation of the third German decision on nervous shock.

5. But the battle between liberal and conservative judges is not over. Molien, allowing recovery for mental anguish even in the absence of physical injury, now seems to be accepted by some ten states with the Texas Supreme Court joining this move in its majority decision in Moore v. Lillebo 722 SW 2d 683 (1986). As is explained in greater detail in the note 4 to the next German decision, Tennessee and Montana are also showing signs of being content to rely on foreseeability as the main if not sole controlling device. Even California has in one sense swung back to a more liberal stance in its decision in Burgess (discussed in the next note). It remains to be seen whether this emerging “independent” cause of action for pure emotional distress will displace the Dillon v. Legg rule. On this see the notes to the next German case and, inter alia, Nola and Ursin, “Negligent Infliction of Emotional Distress: Coherence Emerging from Chaos” 33 Hastings LJ 583 (1982). See, also, Hughes, “Recovering Damages for Mental Anguish in Wrongful Death Suits: The Elimination of the Physical Injury/Physical Manifestation Requirement” 18 Texas Tech. L. Rev. 893 (1987). An interesting compromise is proposed by Miller, “The Scope of Liability for Negligent Infliction of Emotional Distress: Making ‘the Punishment Fit the Crime’” U. Haw. L. Rev. 1 (1979). Cases such as these prompt many questions. Here are some:

(i) How does one define mental anguish that merits compensation? Some Texas courts have understood the term to imply “a relatively high degree of mental pain and distress. It is more than mere disappointment, anger, resentment, or embarrassment, although it may include all of these . . .”, Trevino v. Southwestern Bell Tel. Co., 582 SW 2d 582, 584 (Tex. Civ. App. 1979). But Rodriguez (cited above) shows that it is easier to formulate a test than to apply it.

(ii) What is the legal position of absent members of a community hit by a natural disaster? See Labin, “Dealing with Disasters: Some Thoughts on the Adequacy of the Legal System” 30 Stan. L. Rev. 281 (1978).

(iii) What if the victim suffers mental anguish because physical harm may follow the negligently caused event, e.g. in the case of a man who had a homosexual relationship with another man who, unbeknown to him, was infected by AIDS? Courts have allowed damages for fear of future cancer—cancerphobia—as a result of exposure to toxic substances, e.g. Jackson v. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 781 F. 2d 394 5th Cir. (1986); Herber v. Johns-Manville Corp., 785 F. 2d 79 (1986); Eagle-Pitcher Indus. Inc. v. Cox, 481 So. 2d 517 (1987), rev. denied, 492 So. 2d 1331 (1986). On this see: Gale and Goyer, “Recovery for Cancerphobia and Increased Risk of Cancer” 15 Cumb. L. Rev. 723 (1985); Dworkin, “Fear of Disease and Delayed Manifestation Injuries: A Solution or a Pandora’s Box?” 53 Fordham L. Rev. 527 (1984); Note, “Tort Liability for the Transmission of AIDS Virus: Damages for Fear of AIDS and Prospective AIDS” 45 Wash. and Lee L. Rev. 185 (1988); “Emotional Distress Damages for fear of Contracting AIDS: Should Plaintiff have to show exposure to HIV?” 99 Dick L. Rev. 779 (1995). Some courts have made recovery depend on “actual exposure”; and have understood this notion restrictively. Thus in K.A.C. v. Benson, 527 NW 2d 553 (Minn. 1995) a woman who was subjected to gynaecological examinations by a doctor who had lesions in his hands and forearms and had tested HIV positive, was refused recovery. Others, however, have taken the view that subjecting the plaintiff to reasonable fear of exposure to AIDS infection is sufficient and in similar circumstances such as the one just given have allowed recovery. See: Faya v. Almaraz, 329 Md. 435, 620 A. 2d 327 (1993); Williamson v. Waldman, 150 NJ 232, 696 A. 2d 14 (1997); Hartwig v. Oregon Trail Eye Clinic, 254 Neb. 777, 580 NW 2d 86 (1998). The recovery however tends to be limited for the period until testing can assuage the fears.

(iv) How does one reconcile the law’s general reluctance to allow recovery for pure emotional harm if the plaintiff has not suffered recognisable physical or psychological effects with the statutes and decisions in some States which allow damages for mere grief in wrongful death settings? This heading, which goes beyond the more widely recognisable claim for “loss of companionship”, (discussed below in chapter 4) has emerged as a result of legislative intervention (e.g. Kan. Stat. Ann. § 60–1904) as well as judicial creativity. (See, St. Louis Southwestern Ry. v. Pennington, 261 Ark 650, 553 SW 2d 436 (1977).)

6. The problem of contributory negligence examined in the leading German case is a difficult one; and in England it recently surfaced in an interesting judgment by Cazalet J reproduced as an addendum, below. The German case concerned the deceased’s (primary victim’s) own contributory fault and whether this should be taken into account when calculating the plaintiff’s damages. (The plaintiff was the primary victim’s wife who claimed for the psychiatric injury that resulted from her being told of her spouse’s death.) The German court’s decision was affirmative; but its reasoning has to be studied carefully before it is fully understood. Two points thus need to be separated from the outset.

First, it is clear that any claim brought by the plaintiff as a dependant under the English Fatal Accidents Acts (or the German equivalent) will be affected by the contributory negligence of the deceased; in both cases the relevant statutory material says so. (§ 846 BGB.) The more difficult question is the second one namely, whether the same apportionment should take place in the case of any personal claims which the plaintiff/secondary victim might have for his or her nervous shock. Now in German law such a plaintiff's nervous shock claim will be an independent claim based on § 823 I BGB and not a derivative one based on §§ 843–4 BGB (wrongful death). Put in this way, it is prima facie difficult to see how the primary victim's own contributory fault could be imputed to his wife/plaintiff. The German court by-passed this difficulty by basing its decision on the pervading notion of good faith (embodied in § 242 BGB). The Kammergericht Berlin has subsequently followed this approach, in its decision of 10 November 1997, VersR 1999, 504, though this solution has not been without its critics. (Thus see the strong doubts expressed about the first decision by the late John Fleming in 20 A. J. Comp. Law 485, 488–9 (1972).) (The rationale behind imputing the "primary" victim's negligence is further examined in note 7, below.)

Prior to Greatorex v. Greatorex [2000] 1 WLR 1970=[2000] 4 All ER 769 (reproduced as an addendum, below), common law courts do not appear to have faced this problem squarely in the context of nervous shock—at any rate in England—though in his judgment Cazalet J alluded to some inconclusive Commonwealth authority. The picture in the USA may not be much clearer, though Dillon v. Legg (441 P. 2d 912 (1968)) contains some (seemingly) confused views on the subject. (In Dillon the majority, at p. 916, asked the question whether the contributory negligence of the victim and the plaintiffs should affect their claims whereas the minority, at p. 928, asked the very different question whether the deceased child's negligence can affect the living plaintiffs' claims.) However, the same point (about contributory negligence) may also arise in "rescue" cases and in those States (in the United States) which still recognise actions for "loss of consortium" or loss of "parental or children's companionship". In the first instance, and perhaps also in the second, the current tendency is to treat the claims as "independent", but to reduce them to take into account the contributory negligence of the physically injured spouse. (For a review of the case law, see Blagg v. Illinois F.W.D. Truck and Equipment Company 572 NE 2d, 920 (with references at p. 925.) See, also, Mallett v. Dunn [1949] 2 KB 180 (England); Feltch v. General Rental Co., 383 Mass. 603, 421 NE 2d 67 (1981), reviewing the contradictory American case law and Handeland v. Brown, 216 NW 2d 574 (Iowa, 1974) where the conflicting views of the majority and the dissent repay careful reading and reveal that many of the problems in US law may be linked to the differing views adopted towards contributory and comparative negligence. Imputed contributory negligence is discussed in detail in Gregory, Kalven, and Epstein, 716 ff., especially 730 ff. and Harper, Fleming James Jr and Gray, vol. II, chap. 8.8 and 8.9. In Germany, as far as the rescue situation is concerned, it has been argued that, since there is a duty to rescue under § 323c StGB, a person wishing to commit suicide has a duty to carry it out in a way which does not "provoke" any rescue by third parties; otherwise he may be liable for any damage suffered during the rescue. (See Medicus Schuldrecht BT (9th edn.) (1999) p. 302.) The point, however, does not appear to have been settled by the courts.

7. Greatorex v. Greatorex raised the question whether a "primary victim" owed a duty of care to a "secondary victim" not to harm himself. The (first) defendant was injured in an accident caused by his grossly negligent driving. The plaintiff, his father, a professional fire officer, suffered nervous shock as a result of attending his son at the scene of the accident. As stated, Cazalet J acknowledged that there was no binding authority on this issue. Interestingly enough, his conclusion was, to a large extent, influenced by BGHZ 56, 163 (case 1) which was cited to him by counsel. The question the judge asked himself was whether a person owes a duty of care to other persons not to harm himself. It will be recalled that the BGH had suggested that the imposition of such a duty would unduly restrict the person's right of self-determination. We also noted that an exception might have to be considered where the suicide was committed in a "deliberately shocking manner". (Similarly, in BGH ZIP 1990, 1485, the court held that as a general rule a lessor did not owe a contractual duty to the lessee not to commit suicide and as a result the estate was not answerable for the termination of the lease. To impose such a duty would have amounted to an unjustifiable intrusion of the right of self-determination of the lessor.) Cazalet J expressly followed the reasoning of the BGH and regarded the argument derived from the right of self-determination in case 1 as “powerful”. (See also the Law Commission’s report on Liability for Psychiatric Illness Law Com. No. 249 (1998) para. 5.34–5.44.) Matters might be different where, by harming himself, the “primary victim” causes damage other than nervous shock to another. (See A v. B’s Trustees (1906) 13 SLT 830.) The ethical duty not to harm oneself becomes a legal duty as soon as the self-harming activity also causes physical harm to another person. From this perspective the “primary victim’s” immunity from liability for nervous shock (suffered by others) constitutes an exception. In other words, the “primary victim’s” right of self-determination prevails only if we regard this injury as special. Cazalet’s J constant reference to “policy” lends credence to this view and illustrates, once again, the difficulty the legal system has coping with the ramifications of nervous shock and emotional injuries.

In case 1, above, the issue was whether the contributory negligence by the primary victim could be imputed to the secondary victim and his claim for damages against a third party accordingly reduced. At this stage, it is useful to reconsider the argument in favour of imputing the primary victim’s contributory negligence to the secondary victim in the light of Cazalet’s J analysis of the “primary victim’s” (limited or non-existent) liability to others for causing harm to himself. For the two issues are interrelated.

The rationale seems to be this. If, generally speaking, a person (“primary victim”) does not owe a duty of care to others (“secondary victims”) not to harm himself, then “it is only fair” that if a third person causes physical injury to the primary victim, the secondary victim should bear the primary victim’s causal contribution to the accident. This problem has occurred also in other contexts of adjustment among multiple “debtors” and the BGH has (not always consistently) applied similar considerations. (Thus, e.g. BGH, JR 1989, 60, but see BGHZ 12, 213.) Because of special circumstances, characteristic of the relationship between primary and secondary victim, the secondary victim does not have a cause of action against the primary victim (all other conditions of liability for nervous shock being fulfilled). This is because such a cause of action would be contrary to the primary victim’s right of self-determination; but one could easily replace this with an exclusion clause. So the secondary victim sues the third party (case 1). If the third party could subsequently claim contribution from the primary victim, then in the end the primary victim would be held liable for his causal contribution to the accident. (Albeit the risk of insolvency of the primary victim would be transferred from the secondary victim to the third party.) But this result of holding the primary victim liable is regarded as undesirable (because of his right of self-determination). Therefore, the third party cannot claim contribution from the primary victim even if the latter was primarily responsible for the accident. (Cf. Alcock v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1992] 1 AC 310, 418 per Lord Oliver.) This result may not be satisfactory. It would not seem fair in such circumstances, the BGH stressed, to impose full liability on the third party, especially if his contribution to the harm was in causative terms very low and that of the primary victim very high. Why should the third party (rather than the secondary victim) bear the primary victim’s causal contribution to the accident? After all, it is because of special circumstances arising out of the relationship between primary and secondary victim, that the primary victim cannot be made liable for causing nervous shock. It is therefore plausible to apply the rationale of § 846 BGB also to claims of secondary victims in respect of nervous shock and to reduce the secondary victim’s claim accordingly. This implies that where the primary victim is solely answerable for the accident, the secondary victim cannot recover. We are thus back to our point of departure.

8. There is a final issue that needs to be considered and it concerns the level of damages that are recoverable. Pecuniary losses caused by the psychiatric illness induced by the accident are, of course, recoverable. (For instance lost earnings, case 1). But an English lawyer will also need to know the level of damages that can be recovered for “pain and suffering” under § 847 BGB. Are they/should they be high or low? And should they be influenced by the level of awards found in other cases? These questions are examined in detail in chapter 4 section A.3(c).

Facts and proceedings

On 11 April 1996 the first defendant had been drinking with a friend, who is the defendant in the proceedings made pursuant to Part 20 of the Civil Procedure Rules. The first defendant was driving a car belonging to the Part 20 defendant, who had given him permission to drive the car and was a passenger in it. Whilst overtaking on a blind brow the first defendant negligently drove over on to the wrong side of the road and was hit by an oncoming vehicle. The Part 20 defendant was uninjured. The defendant's head was injured and he was unconscious for about an hour. Initially he was trapped inside the car. The police, ambulance and fire services attended the scene of the accident. Among the fire officers who attended the scene was the plaintiff. He is the defendant's father. At the time of the accident he was employed as a leading fire officer. He was nowhere near the scene of the accident when it happened. He went there in the course of his employment. Having been informed that his son had been injured, he attended to him. The plaintiff was later diagnosed as suffering from long-term, severe, post-traumatic stress disorder as a result of the accident. The first defendant was subsequently convicted of driving a motor vehicle without due care and attention, driving without insurance and failing to provide a specimen. The plaintiff brought proceedings claiming damages against the first defendant, his son. Since the first defendant was uninsured at the time of the accident, the Motor Insurers' Bureau has been joined as the second defendant. The second defendant has in turn brought proceedings under Part 20 of the Civil Procedure Rules against the Part 20 defendant seeking an indemnity from him on the basis that he allowed the first defendant to drive his car without insurance against third party risks in breach of the Road Traffic Act 1988. On the basis of these facts the court had to determine the following three preliminary questions of law:

"1. Does a primary victim (i.e. the first defendant) owe a duty of care to a third party in circumstances where his self-inflicted injuries caused that third party psychiatric injury? 2. On the agreed facts, did the first defendant owe the plaintiff a duty of care not to harm himself? 3. On the agreed facts, did the first defendant owe the plaintiff a duty of care not to cause him psychiatric injury as a result of exposing him to the sight of the defendant's self-inflicted injuries?"

CAZALET J.

The role of policy considerations

It is not in dispute that the onus is on the plaintiff to show that a duty of care exists, either on the basis of existing authority or by the application of established principle. It is well settled that whilst foreseeability is a necessary condition for the existence of such a duty it is not of itself a sufficient condition. It must, in addition, be fair, just and reasonable for a duty of care to be imposed in a particular situation. The law was encapsulated by Lord Bridge of Harwich in Caparo Industries Plc v. Dickman [1990] 2 AC 605, 617–618 in the following well known passage:

"in addition to the foreseeability of damage, necessary ingredients in any situation giving rise to a duty of care are that there should exist between the party owing the duty and the party to whom it is owed a relationship characterised by the law as one of "proximity" or "neighbourhood" and that the situation should be one in which the court considers it fair, just and reasonable that the law should impose a duty of a given scope upon the one party for the benefit of the other . . . the concepts of proximity and fairness embodied in these additional ingredients are not susceptible of any precise definition as would be necessary to give them utility as practical tests, but amount in effect to little more than convenient labels to attach to the features of different specific situations which, on a detailed examination of all the circumstances, the law recognises pragmatically as giving rise to a duty of care of a given scope.”

These observations apply with particular force in the field of negligently inflicted psychiatric injury, where policy considerations loom large. This is evident from each of the quartet of decisions in which the House of Lords has reviewed this area of the law in the last two decades, [Then follow references to McLoughlin v. O'Brian [1983] 1 AC 410, 420 per Lord Wilberforce; Alcock v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1992] 1 AC 310, 411 (the first of two House of Lords decisions arising out of the Hillsborough football stadium disaster) per Lord Oliver of Aylmerton; Page v. Smith [1996] AC 155, 197E per Lord Lloyd of Berwick; and Frost v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1999] 2 AC 455, 493A (the second of the Hillsborough disaster cases) per Lord Steyn].

The control mechanisms

The control mechanisms which restrict the scope of the duty of care where damages for psychiatric injury arising out of an accident are claimed by claimants who were not directly threatened by the accident but learned of it through seeing it or hearing of it were defined in Alcock v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1992] 1 AC 310. In Frost v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1999] 2 AC 455, 502 Lord Hoffmann conveniently stated them in summary form:

“(1) The plaintiff must have close ties of love and affection with the victim. Such ties may be presumed in some cases (e.g. spouses, parent and child) but must otherwise be established by evidence. (2) The plaintiff must have been present at the accident or its immediate aftermath. (3) The psychiatric injury must have been caused by direct perception of the accident or its immediate aftermath and not upon hearing about it from someone else.”

Primary and secondary victims

In Page v. Smith [1996] AC 155, 197 Lord Lloyd, with whose speech Lord Ackner and Lord Browne-Wilkinson agreed, placed emphasis upon the distinction in nervous shock cases between the position of a primary victim of an accident, who is directly involved as a participant and is within the range of foreseeable physical injury, and that of a secondary victim, whose psychiatric injury is caused by witnessing or participating in the aftermath of an accident which causes or threatens death or injury to others. Among the principal consequences of this distinction are that the primary victim, unlike the secondary victim, can recover damages for his psychiatric injury even if such injury was unforeseeable, and that he can do so even if he suffered the psychiatric harm because he lacked normal fortitude or “ordinary phlegm.”

I turn to the competing arguments which have been urged upon me as to whether a duty of care situation arose on the facts of this case.

The plaintiff as a rescuer

Mr Mason, for the plaintiff, first submits that the first defendant owed the plaintiff a duty of care in his capacity as a rescuer, separate and apart from, for the purpose of this submission, the fact that he was also a close relative of the first defendant.

It seems reasonably clear that prior to the decision of the House of Lords in Frost rescuers were treated as coming within a special category. Lord Oliver in Alcock v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1992] 1 AC 310, 408 summarised the position of the rescuer as it was then seen to be as follows:

“Into the same category, as it seems to me, fall the so called ‘rescue cases.’ It is well established that the defendant owes a duty of care not only to those who are directly threatened or injured by his careless acts but also to those who, as a result, are induced to go to their rescue and suffer injury in so doing. The fact that the injury suffered is psychiatric and is caused by the impact on the mind of becoming involved in personal danger or in scenes of horror and destruction makes no difference. ‘Danger invites rescue. The cry of distress is the summons to relief . . . the act, whether impulsive or deliberate, is the child of the occasion: “Wagner v. International Railway Co (1921) 232 NY 176, 180–181, per Cardozo J.” . . . However, in Frost v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1999] 2 AC 455 the House of Lords concluded by a majority of three to two that for policy reasons rescuers should no longer be regarded as coming within a special category. Lord Steyn and Lord Hoffmann, with both of whose speeches Lord Browne-Wilkinson agreed, concurred in dismissing claims by police officers who had suffered psychiatric injury as a result of their experiences at the Hillsborough disaster. The effect of the majority decision is that in order to recover compensation for pure psychiatric injury suffered as a rescuer the plaintiff has at least to satisfy the threshold requirement that he objectively exposed himself to danger or reasonably believed that he was doing so, although it is not necessary for him to establish that his psychiatric condition was caused by the perception of personal danger. Where this element of personal danger is lacking his position is no different from that of other secondary victims who are subject to the control mechanisms to which I have referred above: see the Frost case, at pp. 497, 499, per Lord Steyn: at pp. 509–511, per Lord Hoffmann.

The speeches of Lord Steyn and Lord Hoffmann are to be compared with the no less powerful dissenting speeches of Lord Griffiths and Lord Goff of Chieveley, both of whom were of the opinion that rescuers should remain in the special category in which they had previously appeared to be placed. Both Lord Griffiths and Lord Goff accepted, however, that it should only be in exceptional cases that rescuers who were not in any physical danger should be permitted to recover for their psychiatric injury. Lord Griffiths said, at p. 465:

“If the rescuer is in no physical danger it will only be in exceptional cases that personal injury in the form of psychiatric injury will be foreseeable for the law must take us to be sufficiently robust to give help at accidents that are a daily occurrence without suffering a psychiatric breakdown. But where the accident is of a particularly horrifying kind and the rescuer is involved with the victims in the immediate aftermath it may be reasonably foreseeable that the rescuer will suffer psychiatric injury . . .”

Lord Goff having described the circumstances in which the rescuer found himself in Chadwick v. British Railways Board [1967] 1 WLR 912 (the Lewisham train disaster case) as “wholly exceptional,” stated, at p. 484: “It must be very rare that a person bringing aid and comfort to a victim or victims will be held to have suffered foreseeable psychiatric injury as a result.” Both Lord Griffiths and Lord Goff regarded the circumstances of the Hillsborough disaster as falling within that exceptional category.

Mr Mason urges me not to follow the majority opinion in the House of Lords on the ground that it constituted an unwarranted departure from previous authority, which, he submitted, had firmly established the rescuer claiming damages for psychiatric injury as being within a special category. He submits that the minority views of Lord Griffiths and Lord Goff should be followed. He argues that in the case of a particularly horrific accident in which the rescuer finds himself in exceptional circumstances justice may cry out for compensation for the psychiatric harm he suffers in consequence, even if he is not exposed to any physical danger and does not reasonably apprehend such danger.

It seems to me that this submission is nothing less than an attempt to reopen the argument which was rejected by the majority opinion in Frost v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1999] 2 AC 455. The majority decision in that case has made it clear that the rescuer seeking to recover damages for purely psychiatric injury is to be regarded as a secondary victim having no special status. It is clearly not open to me to decline to follow that decision. The consequence is that on the agreed facts of the present case, it being accepted on all sides that the plaintiff was never in any physical danger nor in fear of such danger, his claim qua rescuer must fail.

I would add, for the sake of completeness, that even had I been persuaded by Mr Mason to discard our doctrine of precedent and follow the minority views of Lord Griffiths and Lord Goff in the Frost case, my conclusion on the agreed facts would not have been any different. Although the accident involved a potentially serious injury to the first defendant, the circumstances in which the rescuers involved in the aftermath of that accident found themselves in no way approached the horror of the circumstances in which the rescuers found themselves in the Lewisham train disaster or in the Hillsborough football stadium disaster. Even on the minority view in the Frost case, a rescuer who suffered psychiatric injury in consequence of his experiences after arriving at the scene of this accident would not on the facts of this case be entitled, as a rescuer, to recover damages for his injury.

Accordingly the plaintiff cannot succeed in this case on the sole ground that he was a rescuer.

The plaintiff as father

Mr Mason next submits that the plaintiff, as the first defendant's father, meets the requirements of each of the control mechanisms applicable to claims by secondary victims, to which I have referred above. Mr Eklund, for the second defendant, the Motor Insurers' Bureau, concedes that on the agreed facts both the first requirement, that there must be close ties of love and affection between the primary and the secondary victims, and the third requirement, that the psychiatric injury must have been caused by direct perception as opposed to hearing about the accident from someone else, appear to be satisfied. He contends, however, that the plaintiff does not satisfy the second requirement, that he must have been present at the accident or its immediate aftermath.

In McLoughlin v. O'Brian [1983] 1 AC 410 the plaintiff was held by the House of Lords to have been present at the immediate aftermath of the accident when she attended hospital to see her injured family somewhat over an hour after the accident. In contrast, in Alcock v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1992] 1 AC 310 Lord Ackner, at p. 405, and Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle, at p. 424, were both of the opinion that a visit to the mortuary some eight or nine hours after the disaster could not qualify as being within its immediate aftermath. In the present case the plaintiff was at the scene of the accident very shortly after its occurrence, at a time when the first defendant was still trapped in the wreckage and in urgent need of help from the emergency services. The facts of the present case are much stronger than the facts of McLoughlin v. O'Brian, both as regards timing and as regards location. I therefore reject Mr Eklund's submission.

I find that the plaintiff meets the requirements of each of the control mechanisms, which govern a claim for psychiatric injury suffered by a secondary victim of an accident.

The plaintiff as rescuer and father

... On analysis, what is said to be the unique feature of the present case is the fact that the plaintiff happens to be a professional rescuer. That feature of the case, adds nothing to the strength of his claim. Lord Hoffmann's observation in the Frost case, at p. 510, seems in point:

"... I have no doubt that most people would regard it as wrong to award compensation for psychiatric injury to the professionals and deny compensation for similar injury to the relatives." ...

Duty owed by victim of self-inflicted injuries: the authorities

There is no reported English decision on the question whether a victim of self-inflicted injuries owes a duty of care to a third party not to cause him psychiatric injury. Lord Ackner referred to the issue in Alcock v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1992] 1 AC 310, 401:

"As yet there is no authority establishing that there is liability on the part of the injured person, his or her estate, for mere psychiatric injury which was sustained by another by reason of shock, as a result of a self-inflicted death, injury or peril of the negligent person, in circumstances where the risk of such psychiatric injury was reasonably foreseeable. On the basis that there must be a limit at some reasonable point to the extent of the duty of care owed to third parties which rests upon everyone in all his actions, Lord Robertson, the Lord Ordinary, in his judgment in the Bourhill case, 1941 SC 395, 399, did not view with favour the suggestion that a negligent window-cleaner who loses his grip and falls from a height, impaling himself on spiked railings, would be liable for the shock-induced psychiatric illness occasioned to a pregnant woman looking out of the window of a house situated on the opposite side of the street.”

Lord Oliver also considered the question and said, at p. 418:

“Whilst not dissenting from the case-by-case approach advocated by Lord Bridge in McLaughlin’s case, the ultimate boundaries within which claims for damages in such cases can be entertained must I think depend in the end upon considerations of policy. For example, in his illuminating judgment in Jaensch v. Coffey (1984) 155 CLR 549, Deane J expressed the view that no claim could be entertained as a matter of law in a case where the primary victim is the negligent defendant himself and the shock to the plaintiff arises from witnessing the victim’s self-inflicted injury. The question does not, fortunately, fall to be determined in the instant case, but I suspect that an English court would be likely to take a similar view. But if that be so, the limitation must be based upon policy rather than upon logic for the suffering and shock of a wife or mother at witnessing the death of her husband or son is just as immediate, just as great and just as foreseeable whether the accident be due to the victim’s own or to another’s negligence and if the claim is based, as it must be, on the combination of proximity and foreseeability, there is certainly no logical reason why a remedy should be denied in such a case. Indeed, Mr Hytner, for the plaintiffs, has boldly claimed that it should not be. Take, for instance, the case of a mother who suffers shock and psychiatric injury through witnessing the death of her son when he negligently walks in front of an oncoming motor car. If liability is to be denied in such a case such a denial can only be because the policy of the law forbids such a claim, for it is difficult to visualise a greater proximity or a greater degree of foreseeability. Moreover, I can visualise great difficulty arising, if this be the law, where the accident, though not solely caused by the primary victim has been materially contributed to by his negligence. If, for instance, the primary victim is himself 75 per cent responsible for the accident, it would be a curious and wholly unfair situation if the plaintiff were enabled to recover damages for his or her traumatic injury from the person responsible only in a minor degree whilst he in turn remained unable to recover any contribution from the person primarily responsible since the latter’s negligence vis-a-vis the plaintiff would not even have been tortious.”

Jaensch v. Coffey (1984) 155 CLR 549, referred to by Lord Oliver, was a decision of the High Court of Australia. It has been considered in other decisions in that jurisdiction. It is right that I should take into account further Commonwealth authorities bearing upon the issue which I have to decide. I can do no better than refer to the words of Lord Goff in Frost v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1999] 2 AC 455, 471–472:

“In this, as in other areas of tortious liability in which the law is in a state of development, the courts proceed cautiously from one category of case to another. We should be wise to heed the words of Windeyer J spoken nearly 30 years ago in Mount Isa Mines Ltd v. Pusey (1970) 125 CLR 383, 396: ‘The field is one in which the common law is still in course of development. Courts must therefore act in company and not alone. Analogies in other courts, and persuasive precedents as well as authoritative pronouncements, must be regarded.’”

In Jaensch v. Coffey, 155 CLR 549 a motor cyclist suffered severe injuries in a collision with a vehicle which was driven negligently. The motor cyclist’s wife, who was not at the scene of the accident but who saw him in hospital and was told that he was “pretty bad,” suffered nervous shock as a result of what she had seen and been told. The wife succeeded in her claim for damages on the basis of her relationship with her husband and the fact that the events which had caused the nervous shock to her were part of the aftermath of the accident resulting from the defendant’s negligence.

Deane J, at p. 604, in referring to the duty of care to avoid psychiatric injury unassociated with physical injury, said:

“such a duty of care will not exist unless the reasonably foreseeable psychiatric injury was sustained as a result of the death, injury or peril of someone other than a person whose carelessness is alleged to have caused the injury . . .”

Dawson J appears to have inclined towards the same view. He said, at p. 612:

“On the other hand, there appear to be strictures upon liability for the infliction of nervous shock which are not readily explicable in terms of foreseeability and which may be seen to be the result of the application of policy considerations. For example, if no action will lie in negligence against a defendant who carelessly injures himself and thereby inflicts nervous shock upon the plaintiff, there would seem to be a limit imposed which is outside the test of foreseeability.”

These observations were not necessary for the decision in the case and thus were plainly obiter.

Mr Eklund has referred me to a number of other Australian authorities in which the issue in question has received consideration. [Harrison v. State Government Insurance Office [1985] Aust Torts Rep 80–723, a decision of the Supreme Court of Queensland, was considered] . . .

Mr Eklund further pointed out that the same conclusion was reached in a decision of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, Cady v. Anderson [1993] BCWLD 200. In that case the plaintiff was prevented from recovering for psychiatric injury caused by witnessing the death of her fiancé in a car accident caused by his negligence. One of the two grounds given for this decision was the fact that the fiancé was the tortfeasor.

The weight of the Commonwealth authorities to which I have been referred clearly tends to support Mr Eklund’s submission that there is no duty of care in the situation presently under consideration.

Whilst acknowledging that the authorities to which I have made reference were not helpful to his case, Mr Mason submitted that the decision of the Scottish Outer House in A v. B’s Trustees (1906) 13 SLT 830, a decision much closer to home than the Commonwealth cases, provided authority for the sustainability of the plaintiff’s claim for nervous shock, notwithstanding that the first defendant’s injuries were self-inflicted. The action was brought at the instance of a lady and her daughter, landladies of a furnished apartment in Glasgow, against the trustees and executors of a man to whom the apartment had been let, seeking damages in respect of nervous shock suffered by them as a result of his having committed suicide in the bathroom of that apartment. The action succeeded. Mr Mason submitted that the ratio decidendi of the decision was that a tortfeasor is liable for psychiatric illness caused by his self-inflicted injuries. On analysis of the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, Lord Johnston, I do not consider the case to have been decided on that basis. The following passage from the judgment of Lord Johnston, at p. 831, shows that he based liability on contract:

“Is it one of the purposes of renting lodgings that they should be taken for the purpose of committing suicide? I think that it is not, and that in so using the lodgings in turning the bathroom into a slaughter house, this man was performing a wrongful act, an act in breach of the contract under which he received possession of the premises.”

In Bourhill v. Young [1943] AC 92, 120 Lord Porter stated that the decision in A v. B’s Trustees, 13 SLT 830 may be explained as “founded on contract or on the fact that the material damage might have been anticipated.” Leaving aside any question of breach of contract, in my view such a claim, if made in tort, would now fail for want of the close ties of love and affection.

Accordingly I do not consider that the decision in A v. B’s Trustees is of assistance to the plaintiff’s case.

Mr Mason went on to submit that Deane J’s approach in Jaensch v. Coffey, 155 CLR 549 that as a matter of law no claim can be entertained where the primary victim is the negligent defendant himself and the shock to the plaintiff arises from witnessing the victims self-inflicted injury, is not only unworkable but also unjust in that, for example, it would preclude claims such as those of train drivers who suffer nervous shock when a person throws himself in front of their train in order to commit suicide. Although I shall be referring to potentially relevant policy considerations later in this judgment, it seems convenient to deal with this submission at this stage, because Mr Mason relies upon authority in support of it. . . .

It is clear, however, that the case of the train driver falls into a particular category of cases, including Dooley v. Cammell Laird & Co Ltd [1951] 1 Lloyd's Rep 271, in which a duty of care has been held to exist, and which was described by Lord Oliver in Alcock v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1992] 1 AC 310, 408 in these terms:

“where the negligent act of the defendant has put the plaintiff in the position of being, or of thinking that he is about to be or has been, the involuntary cause of another's death or injury and the illness complained of stems from the shock to the plaintiff of the consciousness of this supposed fact” . . .

Whether claimants in this category are to be treated as primary victims, as Lord Oliver treated them, or as secondary victims, its Lord Hoffmann [in Frost at pp. 507–508] appears to have viewed them, does not seem to me to be a matter of critical importance. There is room for the law to make provision for them on either basis.

My conclusion on this issue is that cases which fall into this particular category raise materially different considerations from those which arise in the instant case, and that the authorities would not necessarily preclude such cases from receiving separate treatment were I to rule against the plaintiff on the preliminary issue which I have to decide. I therefore do not find myself assisted by the submission based on the case of Watkins LJ's engine driver.

Duty owed by victim of self-inflicted injuries: policy considerations

Although it appears from the body of authority referred to above that the preponderance of opinion is unfavourable to the concept of a victim of self-inflicted injuries owing a duty of care to a third party not to cause him psychiatric harm in consequence of his injuries, there is no decision on the point which is binding upon this court. Accordingly the court, in the light of such guidance as has been given, including such assistance as may be gleaned from the Commonwealth decisions, must reach its own conclusion. It is at this stage that policy considerations come into play.

I observe, first, that since a claim for psychiatric illness suffered by a secondary victim in consequence of injury to a primary victim is not admitted by our law unless the three elements of the control mechanism are present, it follows that it will normally only be in cases where close family ties exist between the primary and secondary victim that the particular issue with which this case is concerned will arise. For reasons which will shortly appear, I regard that as a matter of significance.

In the second place, the issue which I have to resolve raises, as it seems to me, a question which impinges upon a person's right of self-determination. Mr Eklund has drawn my attention to a decision of the German Bundesgerichtshof (Sixth Civil Division) (11 May 1971), where this problem was identified. A translation of an extract from that judgment (translated by Mr Tony Weir) which appears in Markesinis The German Law of Torts, 3rd edn (1994), p. 109 was produced to the court [case 1 above]. That case concerned a wife's claim for damages for psychiatric injury suffered by her as a secondary victim of an accident in which her husband had died and which had been partly caused by his own negligence. I shall describe in a moment how the court dealt with the question of contribution between joint tortfeasors in that case. The immediately relevant passage in the judgment of the German court relates to the court's observation that if the death of the primary victim had been exclusively caused by his own negligence, the plaintiff could not have recovered anything in respect of her injuries. The court reasoned, at p. 113 of that translation:

“A person is under no legal duty, whatever the moral position may be, to look after his own life and limb simply in order to save his dependants from the likely psychological effects on them if he is killed or maimed: to impose such a legal duty, except in very peculiar cases, for instance, wherever a person commits suicide in a deliberately shocking manner, would be to restrict a person's self-determination in a manner inconsistent with our legal system.”

Both counsel maintain that self-harming, whether by negligence or deliberately, would not be expected to give rise to any criminal liability. Mr Eklund, relying upon the opinion of the Bundesgerichtshof, argues that to impose the proposed liability for psychiatric harm caused to another through such acts would be to curtail the right of self-determination and the liberty of the individual. There is, of course, a duty not to cause foreseeable physical injury to another in such circumstances, but in my judgment to extend that duty so as to bring within its compass purely psychiatric injury would indeed be to create a significant further limitation upon an individual's freedom of action. That seems to me to be a powerful objection to the imposition of such a duty. Mr Eklund maintains that there are strong policy reasons for holding that the victim of self-inflicted injury, whether caused negligently or deliberately, should not owe a duty of care to someone who suffers psychiatric injury as a result of seeing him in an injured state. He postulates certain examples, in each of which A causes himself harm and B, who fulfils all the preconditions for classification as a secondary victim, suffers psychiatric injury as a result of seeing A in his injured state: (1) A commits suicide and the body is found by B, his son; (2) A negligently wounds himself with a kitchen knife in front of B, his wife; (3) A suffers extensive loss of blood as a result of a fall caused by his own negligence and is found by B, his mother. In all these circumstances, he submits, public policy ought to prevent B from suing A or A's estate if he or she suffers psychiatric injury in consequence of what he or she has seen.

His argument is as follows. The first Alcock control mechanism means that such claims must of necessity be between close relatives. Regrettably, the suffering of close relatives for self-induced or natural reasons is an inherent part of family life. It is only when someone else inflicts the injuries that the incident is taken out of the category of everyday family life and into the law of tort. There seems to me to be force in this argument. Tragedy and misfortune may befall any family. Where the cause arises within the family there would, in my view, have to be good reason for further extending the law to provide a remedy in such a case.

That takes me to a related point, which in my view is of some importance. Home life may involve many instances of a family member causing himself injury through his own fault. Should the law allow one family member, B, to sue another family member, A, or his estate in respect of psychiatric illness suffered as a result of B either having been present when the injury was sustained or having come upon A in his injured state? Mr Mason argues that such claims will be rare, because such events will not normally cause psychiatric illness, and because the courts may be expected strictly to enforce the requirement that a secondary victim must show that the circumstances were such that a person of normal fortitude might foreseeably suffer psychiatric harm. That may be so, but experience shows that it is not only successful claimants who sue. To allow a cause of action in this type of situation is to open up the possibility of a particularly undesirable type of litigation within the family, involving questions of relative fault as between its members. Issues of contributory negligence might be raised, not only where the self-inflicted harm is caused negligently, but also where it is caused intentionally. To take an example, A, while drunk, seriously injures himself. B, his wife, suffers nervous shock. What if A raises by way of defence the fact that he had drunk too much because B had unjustifiably threatened to leave him for another man or had fabricated an allegation of child sexual abuse against him? Should the law of tort concern itself with this kind of issue? In a case where A's self-harm is deliberate, the possibility that B's claim may be met by a defence of contributory negligence, alleging that B's behaviour caused A to harm himself, is an alarming one. And that is without allowing for the further impact of possible Part 20 claims being brought against other members of the family.

I appreciate, of course, that one member of the family may already sue another family member in respect of physical injury caused by that other, so that in cases of physical injury there is already the potential for personal injury litigation within the family; but the fact that family members have the same right as others to make a claim for physical injury does not necessarily mean that they should have the right to make a claim for a different kind of harm in respect of which, because of the first Alcock control mechanism, others have no such right. Further, where a family member suffers psychiatric harm as a result of the self-inflicted injuries of another family member, the psychiatric illness in itself may well have an adverse effect upon family relationships which the law should be astute not to exacerbate by allowing litigation between those family members. In my judgment, to permit a cause of action for purely psychiatric injury in these circumstances would be potentially productive of acute family strife.

Mr Mason's best point in answer to these policy considerations, as it seems to me, derives from the passage in Lord Oliver's speech in Alcock v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1992] 1 AC 310, 418 to which I have already referred, where Lord Oliver referred to the anomaly that might arise where an accident, though not solely caused by the primary victim, has been materially contributed to by his negligence. Lord Oliver pointed to the unfair situation which would arise if a claimant were to recover damages in full for his or her traumatic injuries from a person who had in fact been responsible in only a minor degree whilst he in turn remained unable to recover any contribution from the person primarily responsible, since the latter's negligence vis-a-vis the plaintiff would not even have been tortious.

I fully recognise the force of this objection to a denial of a duty of care in the type of situation under consideration in this judgment, but it does not seem to me to outweigh the policy considerations to which I have referred above. There is no easy answer to the point, save to observe that, as has often been pointed out, the area of law relating to so-called nervous shock cases is bedevilled by inconsistencies. The particular anomaly identified by Lord Oliver, which springs from the wording of section 1(1) of the Civil Liability (Contribution) Act 1978 providing that a tortfeasor may recover contribution "from any other person liable in respect of the same damage," is perhaps more easily capable of remedy by Parliament than some of the other problems created by the existing limitations on liability for negligently caused psychiatric harm. One possibility is suggested by the judgment of the Bundesgerichtshof (Sixth Civil Division) to which I have already referred. In that case the court held that the secondary victim's damages ought to be reduced to the extent of the primary victim's contributory negligence. The court pointed out (The German Law of Torts, p. 112):

"if the critical reason for the plaintiff's suffering this injury to her health was her close personal relationship to her husband, it is only fair that her claim should be affected by his fault in contributing to the accident."

I note that this is not a suggestion which has found favour in the Law Commission Report on Liability for Psychiatric Illness (1998) (Law Com No 249), which states, at paragraph 5.39:

"It would be contrary to the underlying principle that the defendant owes a separate duty of care directly to the plaintiff, and would mean that the plaintiff was unable to obtain full compensation for his or her psychiatric illness."

That is of course true, but the competing policy considerations in this area of the law are such that I suspect that any statutory reform is likely to have its own drawbacks and imperfections.

Mr Eklund submits that any decision that there should be civil liability to a secondary victim who suffers psychiatric harm in consequence of a primary victim's self-inflicted injuries is better left to Parliament than taken by the courts. It seems to me that there is substance in this submission. There is ample support in the authorities to which I have referred for the argument that Parliament is the best arbiter of what the public interest requires in this difficult field of the law. Indeed, in Alcock v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire Police [1992] 1 AC 310, 419, Lord Oliver, in a passage immediately after the passage to which I have referred above, said:

"Policy considerations such as this could, I cannot help feeling, be much better accommodated if the rights of persons injured in this way were to be enshrined in and limited by legislation as they have been in the Australian statute law . . ."

In this context, it is interesting to note that in Jaensch v. Coffey, 155 CLR 549, 601–602 Deane J drew attention to the fact that three states in Australia had introduced legislation to deal with this area of the law and that in none of them did the legislation extend to cover liability in respect of nervous shock sustained as a consequence of the death, injury or peril of the person whose negligence caused the accident.

The Law Commissions report on Liability for Psychiatric Illness, at paragraphs 5.34–5.44, considered the very question which is before me as a preliminary issue. The report gives weight to the argument that to create a duty of care in the situation under consideration would place an undesirably restrictive burden on a person's self-determination, but it appears not to take account of the potentially destructive impact upon family relationships of the introduction of such a duty. It recommends that legislation should provide for such a duty to exist where the defendant has negligently harmed himself, but for the courts to have scope to decide not to impose the duty where the defendant has chosen to harm himself. The purpose of the latter provision would be to allow room for respect to be accorded to the defendant's right of self-determination. At common law, a claimant who has a cause of action where he is injured by the defendant's negligent act has a stronger claim if the defendant acted intentionally. If the Law Commission's proposal commends itself to Parliament, a somewhat paradoxical situation will arise, in which it will be in the defendant's interest to argue that the act by means of which he caused the harm was deliberate, while the plaintiff will be seeking to persuade the court that it was inadvertent.

Conclusion

I have come to the conclusion that the policy considerations against there being a duty of care in the situation under consideration in this judgment clearly outweigh the arguments in favour of there being such a duty. Reinforced in my conclusion by the authorities to which I have referred, I find that there is no duty of care owed by a primary victim of self-inflicted injuries towards a secondary party who suffers psychiatric illness as a result of those injuries.

I therefore answer the three questions of law as follows. 1. A primary victim does not owe a duty of care to a third party in circumstances where his self-inflicted injuries caused that third party psychiatric injury. 2. On the agreed facts the first defendant did not owe the plaintiff a duty of care not to harm himself. 3. On the agreed facts the first defendant did not owe the plaintiff a duty of care not to cause him psychiatric injury as a result of exposing him to the sight of the first defendant's self-inflicted injuries.

REICHSGERICHT (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 21 SEPTEMBER 1931 RGZ 133, 270 = JZ 1929, 914 (with a note by Bezold and Plum)

On 5 October 1929 the second defendant, driving the car belonging to his father, the first defendant, mounted the pavement and killed the plaintiffs' seven-year-old son. In criminal proceedings he was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment. The plaintiffs now sued both defendants as joint and several debtors for liquidated damages in respect of the cost of medical attempts to save the child's life, burial, and loss of business profits, and asked for a declaration of liability in respect of loss of future maintenance and services by the plaintiffs' son as well as for damages arising from the nervous breakdown of the plaintiff wife. The defendants paid RM 850 and alleged to have discharged their liability thereby.

The District Court of Cologne held the defendants jointly and severally liable to make periodic payments to the plaintiffs to the extent that the deceased would have been obliged during his estimated life-span to provide them with maintenance and services; in other respects it dismissed the claim. On appeal the Court of Appeal of Cologne allowed the claim for RM 1,200 in respect of loss of business profits due to the reduced earning capacity of the plaintiff wife and held that the costs of attempted medical care and of the burial had been discharged; in addition it held the defendants liable as joint and several debtors to compensate the plaintiffs in respect of the loss suffered by them as a result of the past or future injury to the health of the plaintiff mother arising from the accident, including the present or future loss of services, until she reached the age of sixty-five. The appeal by the defendants was successful in part for the following

. . . in this appeal the question is only whether the defendants are also liable for the effects of the plaintiff wife's nervous breakdown which she suffered upon receiving the news of the accident, but which she did not witness herself . . . the Court of Appeal found that the emotional excitement on hearing of her child's death caused the plaintiff wife's nervous breakdown, which had affected her earning capacity and was likely to continue to do so in the future.

The Court of Appeal has held correctly that the damage in question is not indirect in the sense that it is only covered by the duty to compensate under § 823 BGB in the exceptional circumstances of §§ 844, 845 BGB. Indirect damage is that damage suffered by a person who is not himself a victim of a tort but is only affected by its reflex effect upon his assets. In the present case, however, the plaintiff wife herself has been injured in her health by the tort, and the plaintiffs sue in respect of this injury to health. It has never been stated in the practice of the Reichsgericht that the legal interests or rights enumerated in § 823 I BGB must be violated directly and that an indirect violation does not suffice [reference]; the view to the contrary, put forward by the appellants, is unfounded. However, two questions must be examined in such cases; firstly, whether the causal nexus can still be regarded as adequate and, if this question should be answered in the affirmative; secondly, whether the indirect violation could be foreseen. The Court of Appeal has examined both questions and has answered them in the affirmative.

It is normally to be expected that a fatal accident of her child will greatly excite the mother emotionally, and it is not unusual if a grave emotional excitement of this kind results in a nervous breakdown which affects the capacity to work. Thus adequate causality exists [reference]. One can go even further and add . . . that this result could be foreseen. The contention of the appellants that the second defendant could not even have known whether the seven-year-old boy had any parents cannot be accepted. The question is not whether the defendant could know but whether he ought to have considered the shock of the parents and the possible effects of the shock. In answering these questions in the affirmative the Court of Appeal has not broadened the concept of negligence excessively.

These statements only apply to liability according to the general rules of tort. In the case of the second defendant, his liability under § 823 BGB has been sufficiently justified by the judgment of the Court of Appeal. For, having regard to findings of fact of the accident, it cannot be doubted that the second defendant caused it negligently . . . On the other hand, the Court of Appeal has not given sufficient grounds for holding the first defendant liable, as it does on the basis of § 831 BGB. The appellants point out rightly that it has not been established at all whether and now the first defendant had appointed the second defendant to carry out this 'task'. . . The fact that the first defendant denied the claim to a limited extent only does not permit the conclusion that he appointed his son to carry out the task. In so far as the claim is based on the injury to her health suffered by the plaintiff wife, the defendants have denied its substance throughout. The Court of Appeal will therefore have to examine again whether the first defendant has incurred liability, which it had held to be the case without restricting it to the provisions of the Act on Motor Vehicles.

If the defendant should only be liable under § 7 of the Act on Motor Vehicles, in addition to the conditions set out above in which liability to compensate the plaintiff wife in respect of injury to her health would exist, the problem would arise whether this injury to her health had occurred “in the course of operating” the motor vehicle. The courts below have held that it did. From their point of view this finding was superfluous, since judgment against the defendants was based on §§ 823, 831 BGB. However, the affirmative answer to this problem cannot be approved. The Court of Appeal itself refers to the decision of the Reichsgericht [reference] where that court refused to regard as an injury to health “in the course of operating” a railway, a mental illness suffered by a father as a result of the shock occasioned by a railway accident involving his daughter. This decision is in keeping with the constant practice of the Reichsgericht in applying the Act on the Tortious Liability of the Reich. The onset of the mental illness was not directly connected with the operational process or with a specific installation of the operation; nor could it be traced to a danger peculiar to the operation of railways [reference], but it could have happened as a result of any accident or fright. The Court of Appeal believes however . . . that the words in § 7 of the Law on Motor Vehicles bear a different meaning from the corresponding words in § 1 of the Law on the Tortious Liability of the Reich. The . . . [reference] legislative history of § 7 shows clearly, however, that in this respect the Law on the Tortious Liability of the Reich was copied deliberately by the Law on Motor Vehicles in order to make use of the extensive practice and literature on the law on liability. . . . Nevertheless it is conceivable that in individual cases the determination may differ as to whether an accident is to be regarded as having occurred “in the course of operating”, given the technical differences between operating railways and motor vehicles. It is difficult to perceive, however, how a difference can be established in the present case. In both situations the question is whether the effect of a shock suffered by a relative on the occasion of an operational accident is still to be regarded itself as an injury to health in the “course of operating”. The difference in the types of operations is irrelevant for this purpose . . . Accordingly the first defendant can be held liable under § 831 BGB for the nervous breakdown of the plaintiff wife if the conditions for its application should have been fulfilled but not under the Law on Motor Vehicles. It is a different question, not in issue here, whether the determination must be different, if the plaintiff wife had been present where the accident occurred and whether in such a case the opinion expressed in [reference] can be maintained [reference].

It follows that the judgment against the first defendant must be quashed and the case referred back. On the other hand the appeal of the second defendant must be rejected.

Notes to Case 3

For a number of reasons this is a very important case.

1. First of all it shows the tendency of German law (and modern civil law in general) to use normative concepts of causation in cases where Common lawyers would more evidently have recourse to the notion of duty of care. Note, however, that this was not always so: Victorian Railways Commissioners v. Coultas (1888) LR 13 App. Cas. 222, 226 (the earliest English case on nervous shock, decided before the concept of duty had started its meteoric rise). This equivocation between “duty” and “remoteness” will figure in other cases as well (e.g. economic loss, rescue etc.) and is discussed, inter alia, by Fleming, “Remoteness and Duty: the Control Devices in Liability for Negligence” 31 Can. Bar. Rev. 471 (1953) (a seminal article) and Lawson and Markesinis I, ch. 2. See also Prosser’s remarks at 244–5.

2. Secondly, the German decision addresses itself to the key issue of distant nervous shock and opts for the more liberal view according to which compensation is not limited to persons suffering shock as a result of witnessing the accident. Bystanders or “secondary” victims, may also, under certain circumstances, be compensated. However, it seems that strangers who are not closely related to a primary victim of an accident will have difficulties to prove their case. So we note that in none of the cases 1–3 was the claimant a stranger to the victim. However, as in English law so in German law, this restriction does not apply to primary victims: BGH NJW 1986, 777. In that case the claimant was severely injured in an accident that was negligently caused by another person who had crossed the motorway on foot and who was killed in the accident. The claimant also suffered “nervous shock” and it was this part of his claim that was the subject matter of the dispute. He was allowed to recover damages for pecuniary losses and for pain and suffering from the deceased’s estate. The court argued that it was immaterial that the claimant did not have any “ties of love and affection” to the deceased who had, through his own conduct, caused the accident because the claimant was directly involved in the accident and suffered physical injury as a result. It was left to a subsequent court to decide whether additional requirements would be necessary as far as “secondary victims” (the court called them “indirect victims”) were concerned.

3. This approach, which has been followed many times since the principal case was decided in 1931, arguably places German law in a more pioneering position when compared with the English and American law. (See, also, RGZ 157, 11; BGH NJW 1971, 1883, BGHZ 93, 351 = NJW 1985, 1390, and further references and commentary by von Hippel, in “Haftung für Schockschäden Dritter”, NJW 1965, 1890) But even if one does not like the German approach one must, at least, credit the system with the fact that, in its essentials, it has remained constant. The same cannot be said of the House of Lords, which in fifty years, has revisited the topic five times and—some would say—made it more confusing than ever. Their Lordships tergiversations can be seen when the following cases are read in their chronological sequence. Bourhill v. Young [1943] AC 92 (restrictive view); McLoughlin v. O’Brian [1983] 1 AC 410 (liberal adaptation to new conditions); Alcock v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire [1992] 1 AC 310 (the beginnings of a retreat to a more cautious approach); Page v. Smith [1996] AC 155 (confusion resulting from a well-intended attempt to make use of a sensible distinction); White v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire [1999] 2 AC 455 (back to a conservative position justified by an open appeal to policy). Ironically, these multi-judgment decisions have provided a steady stream of dicta, which practising lawyers can use ad infinitum to “argue” minor embellishments. They are thus defeating the current judicial preference for a bright line rule in favour of restricted liability. The latest decision—again from the House of Lords and sixth in number if we added to the above list—that leaves many questions unanswered is W v. Essex County Council [2000] 2 WLR 601. The following position of bystanders or “secondary” victims is thus attempted with some trepidation.

Traditionally, the view was that the plaintiff should have heard or seen the accident with his own unaided senses. In the early 1980s, however, the House of Lords awarded damages to a mother and wife who rushed to the hospital to see her injured family a few hours after the accident had occurred and then suffered shock (McLoughlin v. O’Brian [1983] 1 AC 410). The decision though criticised, is remarkable for the frankness of the judicial turnabout vis-à-vis the value of the “floodgates” argument, which up to that point had received an almost exaggerated respect. (In part this result must be credited to the pioneering remarks of Tobriner, J in Dillon v. Legg 68 Cal. 2d 728, 441 P. 2d 912 (1968) which was cited by Lord Wilberforce.) However, the liberating effect of McLoughlin was neither immediate nor radical nor long lasting. To be sure, in the early 1990s it led to two interesting decisions at first instance, which through interesting pronouncements effected a further extension in the law. Thus, in Hevican v. Ruane [1991] 3 All ER 65 compensation was granted to a father who suffered nervous shock as a result of being told of his son’s death and subsequently seeing his body in the mortuary. And in Ravenscroft v. Rederi AB Transatlantic [1991] 3 All ER 73 the same result was reached in the case of a mother who, however, never saw the body of the killed son. But these decisions were soon to be discredited by pronouncements in Alcock v. Chief Constable of South Yorkshire [1992] 1 AC 310 where the House of Lords sounded a cautious retreat from its earlier position. The facts of the case that gave rise to this retrenchment were, admittedly, difficult. They involved claims by relatives and friends of the victims of the Hillsborough Stadium disaster, some of whom saw on live television the spectators crushed to death against the stadium railings that were meant to prevent the crowds from getting onto the football pitch. The reason for this horrifying accident was the decision taken by the police locally to allow extra people to enter a restricted area without foreseeing the sudden surge of the crowd, which caused the disaster. A carefully argued decision of the Court of First Instance in favour of some of the claimants (in the first, test action) was overturned both by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords relying largely on the usual grounds advanced against psychiatric injury. However, unlike some recent American pronouncements, the House of Lords did not limit (potential) recovery to close relatives. The key sections of Lord Keith's leading speech deserves to be quoted in full since it provides a sensible test for solving this aspect of the problem and one which, incidentally, could have produced results approximating those of German law. He said (at p. 397):

"As regards the class of persons to whom a duty may be owed . . . I think it sufficient that reasonable foreseeability should be the guide. I would not seek to limit the class by reference to particular relationships such as husband and wife or parent and child. The kinds of relationship which may involve close ties of love and affection are numerous . . . They may be present in family relationships or those of close friendship, and may be stronger in the case of engaged couples than in that of persons who have been married to each other for many years. It is common knowledge that such ties exist, and reasonably foreseeable that those bound by them may in certain circumstances be at real risk of psychiatric illness if the loved one is injured or put in peril. The closeness of the tie would, however, require to be proved by a plaintiff, though no doubt being capable of being presumed in appropriate cases. Psychiatric damage to [a bystander] would not ordinarily be within the range of reasonable foreseeability, but could not perhaps be entirely excluded from it if the circumstances of a catastrophe occurring very close to him were particularly horrific."

Alcock is an interesting decision, which will repay careful reading. Here, for lack of space, two further points will be mentioned. First, Lord Keith departed from Lord Wilberforce's dicta and denied that liability could arise if the shock had been induced from witnessing the scenes on television. Broadcasting rules prohibit the showing of the suffering of recognisable individuals; and warnings usually advert viewers to the imminent showing of distressing pictures. If by some per-adventure, pictures of identifiable victims were shown, Lord Keith thought this might amount to a novus actus interveniens and interrupt the causation between negligence and hurt. But what then of the possible liability of the news medium itself? Neither the decision (nor its commentators) seems to have considered the possibility of a media defendant being held liable for showing a distressing scene on air. Would, for example, liability depend on whether "identifiable" victims were shown on the screen (not the case here)? What effect would "warning notices" have? More importantly, would such (potential) liability have a "chilling effect" on news reporting and thus amount to a restriction on free speech? In the USA such an argument would, probably, have a crucial effect on the issue of liability, but in England it might prove less decisive. Secondly, the overruling of some of the earlier, more liberal decisions (e.g. Hevican, Ravenscroft) will, inevitably, cast doubts over some interesting dicta, which they contained. In Ravenscroft, for example, Mr. (now Lord) Justice Ward stressed that the need to prove "psychiatric illness" and "causation" were hurdles that "not many [litigants] will jump" and this would, inevitably, allay "fears of the floodgates opening too wide" ([1991] 3 All ER 73, 76). It is submitted that there is much to be said for the view that psychiatric injury can, nowadays, be treated as a form of injury in its own right, that the plaintiff need not be seen as a "secondary victim" of the accident, and that the seriousness of the injury, coupled with rigid causal proof can be workable controlling devices, sufficiently countering the fear of numerous suits. (See Markesinis and Deakin ch. 2). This was clearly rejected as an option by White—the most recent, major pronouncement of the House of Lords. But discussion of this case makes sense only after we have said a few words about Page, the decision of the House of Lords that came immediately before it.

Page, by a majority, drew a clear distinction between primary and secondary victims. The first category included those who suffered psychiatric injury either because they were themselves physically injured or put in fear of injury. For persons in this category one question only had to be asked: was it foreseeable that they suffered injury—physical or psychiatric? If physical injury were foreseeable, recovery would be allowed even if psychiatric injury, which was not foreseeable, resulted. Matters, however, were different where “secondary” victims were involved. These were persons who were neither injured physically nor threatened by such injury. In such cases, foreseeability of psychiatric injury was a necessary but not sufficient condition for liability. Additional, arbitrary, factors had to be satisfied. These included the need to prove that the shock was the result of the accident. (So, one who suffers psychiatric injury as a result of caring for a loved one seriously injured in an accident will not be compensated under this heading. Jaensch v. Coffey (1984) 155 CLR 549, 569 (per Brennan J), cited with approval by Lord Ackner in Alcock, [1992] 1 AC 310, 403.) It was also necessary to show that the victim had witnessed the shock-producing event either directly or upon coming upon its immediate aftermath. Finally, it was necessary to show that the relationship with the accident victim was sufficiently proximate in the sense defined by the cases.

White—by a majority—took the process of non-assimilation of physical and psychiatric harm a step further while admitting its open attachment to policy as well as the fact that this did not result in neatness and consistency in the law. (Contrast Lord Goff’s powerful dissent.) The claims of the policemen, who attended the Hillsborough incident, were also rejected, the House of Lords considering it unfair to treat their claims differently from the claims of the ordinary by-standers, which had been dismissed by Alcock. Thus, recovery will now be allowed only if the following conditions are satisfied. The plaintiff was (a) not abnormally susceptible to psychiatric illness; (b) his psychiatric harm occurred through shock; (c) he was in physical proximity to the accident or its aftermath, and (d) he had a close personal or familial relationship with the accident victim. One casualty of this restricted approach was “rescuers”, traditionally favoured by English law. (Chadwick v. British Railways Board [1967] 1 WLR 912.) But the plaintiff in that case was disingenuously treated as a “primary” victim (which he was not) so the case ceased being of any relevance to the policemen/plaintiffs in this case since, clearly, they were in no physical danger when helping in the Stadium. Rescuers can thus nowadays recover only if they can show that because of their physical proximity to the scene of the accident, they had been in fear of physical injury.

4. Comparative lawyers accustomed to the fact that ideas these days tend to move from West to East (and no longer the other way round) will be surprised to see how cautious American courts are in this area of the law. True, the original impact rule, which insisted on contemporaneous personal injury before nervous shock was compensated, was increasingly found to be too rigid and nowadays it has gone out of fashion. (Woodman v. Dever, 367 So. 2d 1061 (Fla. App. 1979) shows its unfairness; and Payton v. Abbott Labs, 386 Mass. 540, 437 NE 2d 171, 176 (1982), discusses judicial dissatisfaction with the rule. Florida, however, still retains this rule: Champion v. Gray, 478 So. 2d 17 (1985).) Most jurisdictions, in conformity with s. 313 of the Restatement (Second) of Torts, still require the plaintiff to be in the danger zone before he can recover. (Henderson and Pearson, 363; Prosser, Schwartz, and Wade, 458 ff.; see also Rickey v. Chicago Transit Authority, 98 Ill. 2d 546, 457 NE 2d 1 (1983); Stadler v. Cross, 295 NW 2d 552 (Minn., 1980) and the courts of some twenty jurisdictions). The pioneering decision of Dillon v. Legg (above) is thus still the subject of mixed feelings: see, for example, Pearson, in 34 U. Fla. L. Rev. 477 (1982).

Dillon, which nevertheless contains one of the best discussions on the subject, extended recovery to bystanders (outside the immediate danger zone). This could happen only if (1) the plaintiff was located near the scene of the accident . . . (2) the shock resulted from a direct emotional impact upon plaintiff from the sensory and contemporaneous observance of the accident, as contrasted with learning of the accident from others after its occurrence, [and] (3) . . . plaintiff and the victim were closely related . . .” (441 P. 2d 912 at 920). The requirements of “physical proximity”, “temporal proximity” and “relational proximity” have been the subject of much discussion, both inside and outside the courtroom. Nowadays, there is a tendency to give this last requirement—relational proximity—a very narrow interpretation. It is certainly narrower than that adopted, in theory at least, by German law. This has occurred wherever (in the USA) the decisions of the California Supreme Court in Elden v. Sheldon 758 P. 2d 582 (1988) and Thing v. La Chusa 771 P. 2d 814 (1989) are used as models. For the first denied the plaintiff recovery for his shock upon seeing his injured girl friend on the grounds that he was not married to her while the second reached the same result in the case of a mother who suffered shock in circumstances not dissimilar to those in McLoughlin. Elden reminds one of the old French debates about “concubinage” though the (at times) sanctimonious tone of the American judgment exceeds the moral revulsion which French Catholics claimed to have felt whenever a single woman claimed compensation for the loss of support resulting from the tortious killing of her lover.

A similar, narrowing tendency may be developing for the other two kinds of “proximity” (spatial and temporal) stressed by Dillon. (See Prosser On the Law of Torts, 5th edn. (1984), 366 and supplements.) These requirements of “nearness, heariness, and dearness” have certainly proved difficult to define as, indeed, the dissent in Dillon had predicted (p. 926). Californian courts have thus much vacillated and the confusing case-law—reviewed in Justus v. Atchison, 19 Cal. 3d 564, 565 P. 2d 122 (1977), and by Quai-Smith, “The Negligent Infliction of Emotional Distress” 19 Indiana L. Rev. 809, 818 ff. (1986)—has not been unravelled (as it could have been) by the decision of the Supreme Court of California in Ochoa v. Superior Court 39 Cal. 3d 159, 703 P. 2d 1 (1985). Thus cases like Justus suggest that only plaintiffs who have observed the accident will be allowed to recover. See also Parsons v. Superior Court, 81 Cal. App. 3d 506, 146 Cal. Rptr. 495 (1978) and contrast this with the McLoughlin judgment. On the other hand, in General Motors Corp. v. Grizzle 642 SW 2d 837 (Tex. App. 1982) a mother, who arrived at the scene shortly after the accident and saw her injured daughter, succeeded in her action for damages. All one can say, therefore, is that spatial and temporal proximity will remain crucial factors even though they are likely to be understood differently by different courts. See, for example, Cohen v. McDonnell Douglas Corp., 389 Mass. 327, 450 2d NE 581 (1983). However, these problems, too, must now be approached bearing in mind the restrictive philosophy of decisions like Thing v. La Chusa 771 P. 2d 814 (1989) though beyond that it is dangerous to attempt any specific predictions.

5. Yet even the above do not complete the summary of the differing American trends. That is because for every thesis, an antithesis soon appears; and the mixed reception it receives from other American jurisdictions, only goes to prove that in the United States the richness of the case law. Thus the following three variations to the theme of non-recovery described above must also be born in mind.

First, one must note cases as Sanchez v. Schindler, 651 SW 2d 249 (1983) which suggest yet a different approach to this problem. It relies on a wider interpretation of the Wrongful Death Statute (in that case, the Texas version) and allows parents the right to recover damages for mental distress resulting from the death of their child. This solution—praised by some Texan commentators (e.g. Mendel in 26 South Texas Law Journal, 305 (1985))—is, however, dubious. For not only is it contrary to the intentions of Lord Campbell’s Act (on which the Texas Wrongful Death Statute is, apparently, based); but, more importantly, it produces the strange result of making the parents’ right of recovery depend on their child’s death.

More importantly, one must note the innovation introduced by the California decision of Burgess v. Superior Court 2 Cal. 4th 1064, 831 P. 2d 1197, 9 Cal. Rptr. 2d 615 (1992). In that case the defendant doctor treated the plaintiff during her pregnancy. When the day of birth arrived, problems were detected and for reasons which are unclear from the judgment a caesarean delivery was delayed for nearly an hour with the result that the child was born deprived of oxygen and suffering from severe brain damage. It sued and so did its mother. The claim could have been excluded on the grounds that the mother may not have experienced a contemporaneous observance of her child’s condition. (Again, the facts are not clearly stated.) Nevertheless the mother’s claim succeeded on the grounds that the physician’s duty to the mother was independent from whatever duty he may have owed to the child. Professor Dobbs neatly summarises the new theory of recovery thus (op. cit., 849):

“When the defendant owes an independent duty of care to the plaintiff, there is no risk of unlimited liability to an unlimited number of people. Liability turns solely on relationships accepted by the defendant, usually under a contractual arrangement. Consequently, the duty extends only to those for whom the contract was made. When the defendant contracts to provide services for childbirth, he is on notice that negligent acts will likely cause emotional harm. For these two reasons, the zone of danger and contemporaneous awareness rules are not needed to limit liability to an appropriate sphere. An assumed duty or a special relationship with a duty imposed by law might arguably eliminate other restrictive rules, for example, those requiring a physical manifestation or symptom of harm and those requiring a sudden event . . .”

Finally, whether the assumed or independent duty approach alluded to above prevails or not, the fact is that other courts have also manifested a tendency to abolish restrictive rules and rely solely on foreseeability and other such devices. The Montana and Tennessee courts seem to be veering in that direction with their decisions in Sacco v. High Country Indep. Press, Inc., 271 Mont. 209, 220, 896 P. 2d 411 (1995) and Camper v. Minor, 915 SW 2d 437 (Tenn. 1996). The guess can thus be made that American courts may be about to go around the same circle again, vacillating between conservative and liberal views. It would be unwise to try and predict whether in the end they will adopt the current conservative model that one finds in England or they will ever opt for the (theoretically) more open German model which treats psychiatric injury as a species of physical harm.

6. Finally, students should note how articulate the Anglo-American decisions are about the policy issues, which have justified first the strict and then more relaxed treatment of claims for nervous shock. The best discussions in America can be found in Amaya v. Home Ice, Fuel & Supply Co. 59 Cal. 2d 295, 29 Cal. Rptr. 33 (1963); Dillon v. Legg (above), and in England, McLoughlin v. O'Brian (above) including the judgments in the Court of Appeal: (1981) QB 599. By contrast the German decisions give little away about policy. There is no doubt, however, that the same policy reasons are at work in this system as well, and contemporary writers are prepared to admit that the problem is not one of causation but one of policy. (See von Hippel in NJW 1965, 1890 at 1891. Huber in Festschrift E. Wahl, 301ff. agrees.) Thus, increasing reliance can be found on more normative theories of causation (like the Normzweck approach); and even the contractual concept of Vertrag mit Schutzwirkung für Dritte has been mentioned as a possible source of inspiration. See Berg in NJW 1970, 515.

7. Though articulated in different ways the policy reasons are mainly three. First is the fear of fraudulent or vexatious claims. Tobriner J's answer (in Dillon v. Legg, above) that “. . . the possibility that fraudulent assertions may prompt recovery in isolated cases does not justify a wholesale rejection of the entire class of claims in which that potentiality arises” seems to be winning the day. Secondly is the “floodgates” argument which has prompted the development of numerous rules of thumb (impact theory, danger zone theory; relatives only can recover etc.). Though not without some merit, this objection, too, is falling into disfavour as an increasing number of dicta in English decisions (dealing with economic loss as well as nervous shock) clearly suggest, though the California cases of Elden and La Chusa show that it still finds favour with cautiously-inclined judges. Finally, one might argue with Professor Atiyah (Accidents, Compensation and the Law (3rd edn., 1980) 80) that “. . . the claims of such a person [i.e. one who suffers distress and/or shock as a result of witnessing an accident] must have a low priority when it is remembered that thousands of victims with physical injury go uncompensated every year because they are injured in accidents not caused by negligence”. Further policy reasons are discussed by Professor Dobbs, op. cit., at pp.821–4.

8. In this note the approach of three systems was compared briefly. Is there any other factor (not mentioned above) that has to be borne in mind when explaining the differences between them? Could the absence of civil juries in England and the European continent explain why these systems can afford to disregard the floodgates argument more easily than, perhaps, American courts can?

To what extent can this ebb and flow of the law be linked to changing attitudes in society? Could the decisions of the Supreme Court of California in Elden v. Sheldon 758 P. 2d 582, denying damages for nervous shock to the plaintiff who actually witnessed the death of his girl friend (with whom he had a “stable and significant relationship”) be linked to policy factors such as the State’s need (real or perceived) to discourage extra-matrimonial cohabitation? Would not this argument appeal more to the wave of “conservative” judges who were appointed (or elected) from about the mid-eighties onwards? Incidentally, this “conservative” approach found favour with some French judges in the 1940s, 50s, and 60s (in the slightly different context of wrongful death actions), but was abandoned in the early 70s as being legally unconvincing and morally sanctimonious. For further details on this see: Lawson and Markesinis, Tortious Liability for Unintentional Harm in the Common Law and the Civil Law I, (1982), chap. 2. The importance of such background factors in the development of American tort law is fully explored in Professor Fleming’s The American Tort Process (1988), his observations being particularly useful to European lawyers trying to understand tort law in America.

2. PRE-NATAL INJURIES AND PRE-CONCEPTION INJURIES

Case 4

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 11 JANUARY 1972

BGHZ 58, 48 = NJW 1972, 1126 = JZ 1972, 363

(with an approving note by H Stoll = VERSR 1972, 372)

On 7 June 1964, the plaintiffs, husband and wife, were severely injured in a collision between their motor car and that of the defendant, who was solely to blame. At the time of the accident, the plaintiff wife was six months pregnant. On 16 September 1964 she gave birth to a child, the third plaintiff, who was a spastic because he suffered from brain damage. The parties disputed as to whether this was caused by the injury to the mother. Both instances below allowed the claim. A second appeal by the defendant was unsuccessful for the following

Reasons

A. . . .

B. The action by the third plaintiff for a declaration

I. The Court of Appeal has assumed without discussion that the plaintiff could demand damages under § 823 I BGB for injury to his health, although he was not yet born at the time when the defendants committed the tort. Clearly the Court of Appeal relied on the decision of the Bundesgericht of 20 December 1952 [reference] which had no hesitation in applying § 823 I BGB, even if a child which was born with a defect was not even conceived when the tort was committed against the mother.

This approach, which was adopted by the judgment appealed against, must be applied. In the present case, too, the plaintiff must be treated as “another person” in the meaning of § 823 BGB, whose health was injured by the defendant; for the purpose of this provision establishing liability the plaintiff is a “human being” even if he was injured before birth en ventre sa mère [references]. Similarly § 25 of the Nuclear Energy Act of 23 December 1959 refers to injury to a human being, but includes in this term also those who have suffered injuries to their health before birth and even before their conception [references]. The fact that the plaintiff suffered the injury to her health before birth cannot be determining if these preceding processes provided by nature and by creation are considered in their own setting.

The objections against applying § 823 BGB, which are mainly conceptual, must and can be overcome; true, in cases of this kind it does not assist that the liability of a tortfeasor does not presuppose the existence at the time of his action of the object, the violation of which leads to liability (distance tort). In the cases now under consideration the (illegal) act injures the foetus directly; the only “distance” consists in that between this injury and the moment in which the injuries to health become apparent when the child is born, that is to say the moment in which the object of the liability first reaches its existence. In particular, difficulties arise in applying § 823 BGB if it is considered that at the time of the injury the foetus was not yet a human being and cannot therefore be regarded as “another person” [references].

Nevertheless, no objections exist against applying § 823 BGB, a view shared in the literature, albeit for a number of different reasons [references].

1. The provision of § 823 BGB protects the right of a human being, once born, to the integrity of his body and his health; nobody is allowed to injure the health of a human being. It is unnecessary in the present case to consider the question as to whether in the case of an injury to the foetus the protected interest is the health and corporeal integrity of a person alive (later on) or whether a right of a foetus to integrity and health is to be recognised [references]. In the present case the issue is not one of compensation for damage which the foetus has suffered—if it were to be granted limited legal personality (see § 844 II BGB, second sentence)—but the injury to health which the child has suffered, being born alive but sick [reference]. In these circumstances it is only necessary to take into account in favour of the tortfeasor that this claim for damages does not arise, if no live birth occurs [references], or if the injury to the foetus has disappeared by the time of the child’s birth and has therefore not affected the health of the newly born. It is also clear that the claim for damages only comes into being with the birth, irrespective of the conceptual ground on which it is based (see reference). Apart from this, the fact that the injury was suffered by the foetus before a human being came into being and before legal personality was acquired does not preclude the application of § 823 BGB. This cannot be doubted, not only if, for instance, the tortfeasor injures a pregnant woman intentionally or if the injury is caused by a professional mistake of a gynaecologist who examines her or of the midwife or the doctor etc., in the course of the birth, but also before its conception. The foetus is destined to enter life as a human being; it is identical with the child born subsequently, a fact of nature which the law concerning liability must take into account. Therefore an injury to the foetus becomes an injury to the health of a human being, at least upon birth, for which the tortfeasor must pay damages under § 823 BGB.

2. Nor do any doubts against the applications of § 823 BGB arise in the light of the legal system as a whole. In this connection it need not be considered that by the prohibition of abortion, i.e. of its destruction, criminal law provides a certain protection for the foetus. The fact that a mere injury to the foetus, which is in issue here, is not punishable does not exclude the view that a human being is protected in private law at least as far as a claim for damages is concerned, if an injury to his health is derived from preceding damage inflicted during his embryonic state. Even at that stage of his development he is exposed to dangers and to biological damage which result later on in injuries to his health in the meaning of § 823 BGB; he therefore requires protection. Private law protects developing human beings by numerous special provisions. It accords therefore with its spirit if for the purposes of the law relating to liability in tort developing life is also capable of being injured, with the result that the human being who is born subsequently has the same rights to damages as the person who is injured only at the moment after he has seen the light of day.

II. . . .

2 (a) . . .

(aa) . . . If the Court of Appeal should have assumed that the damage alleged by the child was only a “reflected damage” resulting from the injuries which the defendant has inflicted upon the mother, it would have been wrong in law. The claim for damages in issue in this case is a claim of the child and not part of the mother’s claim for damages [references]. As regards legal liability, two injured parties stand side by side, with the result that each claim must be examined separately [references]. . . .

(b) . . .

III. On the basis that the paralysis of the plaintiff child was caused by the accident, the consequences must also be attributed to the defendant.

It cannot be doubted that these consequences are connected by a link of adequate causation with the accident for which the defendant is to blame. It is impossible equally to fault the view of the Court of Appeal that the defendant’s negligence extended not only to the injuries suffered by the mother but also to those of the embryo and therefore of the child. This does not follow simply because the defendant is to blame for having injured the mother and is therefore liable for all consequential damage suffered by her. However, the child need not prove that the defendant could foresee the possibility of injuring a pregnant woman or an embryo as such. It need not be considered here whether this means that mother and child constitute a "unit of life" [references]. It suffices to render the person liable who inflicted the injury if he should have realised the possibility of a damaging result in general; it need not be foreseeable what form the damage would take in detail and what damage might occur [references].

Case 5

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SECOND CIVIL SENATE) 20 DECEMBER 1952

BGHZ 8, 243 = NJW 1953, 417 = JZ 1953, 307

(with an approving note by R Schmidt)

On the occasion of the birth of a previous child, the plaintiff's mother was a patient in the defendant hospital from 29 August until 9 September 1946. On that day she received a blood transfusion which was administered by Dr A who was an employee of the hospital where the donor had first offered himself for this purpose. Dr A had called for a blood test which did not disclose any syphilitic infection, but had not conducted any further examination of the donor. When the donor was again examined in January 1948, the Wassermann test was positive. The defendant hospital, on learning this, recalled all those patients who had been recipients of the donor's blood. It appeared after a further examination that as a result of the transfusion the plaintiff's mother had been infected with syphilis and that, in consequence the plaintiff, who was born on 13 October 1947, was suffering from congenital syphilis.

The plaintiff applied for a declaration that the defendant hospital was liable to pay damages in respect of all damage caused to her now or which might arise in the future as a result of the infection of her mother with syphilis on the occasion of the blood transfusion on 9 September 1946, and for the payment of damages for pain and suffering. The judgments by the courts below allowing the claim were upheld for the following

The Court of Appeal has found that the mother of the plaintiff was infected with syphilis because the medical officer at the defendant hospital, when carrying out the blood transfusion on 9 September 1946, did not follow the measures prescribed by the order and the guide-lines of the Reichsminister of the Interior dated 5 March 1940 concerning the examination of donors of blood. According to the Court of Appeal the omission to take these measures was due to the fact that the medical staff of the hospital had not been informed of the guide-lines published by the Minister of the Interior. It is undisputed that the Chief Medical Officer, Dr X, who was a member of the defendant's board in 1940, failed to give notice to the departments of surgery and gynaecology of the hospital of the order and the guide-lines of the Reichsminister of the Interior. This Division has had occasion to state before in the judgment of 27 February 1952 [reference], which had rejected a second appeal by the defendant in an action by the mother of the plaintiff, that this situation involves not only contractual negligence towards the plaintiff's mother who had been received by the hospital as a patient under the medical insurance scheme but also a tort by the defendant hospital committed by Dr X, a member of the board, for whom the defendant is responsible according to § 31 BGB. In the present case liability for the damage suffered by the plaintiff can only arise in tort. Such a claim is well founded in the present case.

1. The act of the defendant hospital is to be found in the failure to take the necessary precautions on the occasion of the blood transfusion administered to the mother of the child at a time before the child was conceived. Thereby the defendant has violated a legal duty incumbent upon it. Even if at first this act affected directly the health of the mother alone, the same act had nevertheless caused subsequently an injury to the health of the plaintiff as well, who was born on 13 October 1947. The appellant defendant is wrong in arguing that the injury is indirect with the result that it cannot render the defendant liable. For a claim for damages to arise it suffices if the act causing the damage violates directly or indirectly one of the protected interests or absolute rights set out in § 823 I BGB, provided only that a causal nexus exists in the meaning of the theory of adequate causation between the act creating the damage and the resulting violation of a protected interest [reference]. This can be assumed to exist in the present case, for it is common experience that an infection of a married woman with syphilis is likely to transmit this illness later on to a child conceived by her.

2. The appellant objects above all that in the present case the application of § 823 I BGB is logically excluded because at the time when the act causing damage occurred the plaintiff was not in an intact state which could have been violated by an act causing damage. The appellant argues that § 823 I presupposes logically that damage can only be claimed by those who were intact at one time. If such a state never existed, however, because the egg or the foetus was already sick from the moment of conception as a result of the mother's illness, no interference had ever occurred with the state of health of a child born subsequently. The same view had been expressed in a decision of the Third Civil Division of this court [reference]. Upon enquiry, however, the Third Division has replied that it no longer maintains this view, and therefore this Division is not bound by the above-mentioned decision. The arguments of the appellant cannot be accepted. They are based on a purely concrete manner of thinking which proceeds on the whole from the individual rights, ownership, and the other absolute rights enumerated in § 823 I BGB but does not pay sufficient attention to the special character of the values of life to which § 823 I BGB refers above all. The difference between these values of life and individual rights on the other hand was stressed by the Reichsgericht as early as 1902, following the observations of Planck [reference]. These values of life themselves are clearly not individual rights, instead it is only possible to state that every individual is entitled to have them granted to him, just as the Constitution of Bonn speaks of the right of every person to life and physical integrity [reference].

Absolute rights are clearly determined by law. Accordingly it is logically impossible, e.g. to damage property before any property has come into being. However, it is fundamentally wrong in law to apply to interference with the values of life protected by § 823 I BGB the principles concerning the distinction between injurious acts affecting absolute rights and injurious acts causing damage to other resources. Therefore one must also reject the observations of Rudolf Smend [reference], according to whom, in the case of injury to health the circumstances in which that tort can be committed must be interpreted in the same distinctive manner as in the case of a violation of individual absolute right, as distinct from that of damage to other resources.

The view rejected here is met by the decisive argument that it pays insufficient attention to the special character of the values of life protected by § 823 I BGB. These values precede the legal system. They express the individuality of human beings as part of nature and of creation. They represent life itself, the essence of all that is alive and derive their substance from it. Every human being has a right to these values of life and is therefore entitled to expect that organic growth will not be disturbed or curtailed by human hand. Every deprivation or disturbance by human beings which hinders or curtails natural growth and natural development constitutes a violation of these protected interests. Thus injury to health has been described accurately as “causing a disturbance of the internal processes of life” [reference]. Common parlance too adopts this attitude in describing a child, such as the plaintiff, whose health was severely impaired at birth, as being a sick child, that is to say as a child whose internal processes of life are disturbed and who has not been endowed with that degree of health with which creation and nature has predisposed the living organism of a human being. In this respect the legal order must follow the phenomenon of nature; it cannot and must not disregard the facts of nature. What is an injury or a curtailment of health cannot therefore be determined by the logical concepts of legal techniques, but is, like the gift of health itself, predetermined by creation and nature which must be recognised as natural reality by the legal system, if it is to derive therefrom any legal conclusions in law.

Following these considerations it is not possible to apply to the health of human beings, which is protected by § 823 I BGB the legal principles based on formal legal technique which governs the violation of individual rights.

It is not possible, either, to agree with the appellant who argues that § 823 I presupposes the existence of a physical person and that it cannot therefore be applied to injuries affecting those who were not yet conceived when the tort was committed, since in such a case “another person” in the meaning of § 823 I BGB does not exist . . . the plaintiff was conceived in the body of the mother who suffered from syphilis and developed in it as a human being affected by syphilis by absorbing the illness. This would not have happened without the tortious act or omission of the defendant; in short without it she would not have become a person suffering from syphilis.

The object of the argument is thus not damage to a foetus or to an unborn child, but the damage which the plaintiff has suffered by the fact that she was born a sick person affected by syphilis. As stated before, her damage is connected by a link of adequate causation with the infection with syphilis of her mother by the defendant. This damage was suffered by the plaintiff when she was born and constituted an injury to her health. Thus the conditions of § 823 I BGB exist for allowing the claim.

Notes to Cases 4 and 5

1. Prenatal injuries typically involved an impact on a pregnant woman that also harmed the later-born child. Could it recover for its injuries (if born alive); and could a wrongful death action be brought if it died? The latter cases, have been the more difficult of the two; and the original problems confronting the law have now become greater as foetal toxic harm has multiplied the difficulties of causation. We shall return to this aspect of the problem under 6, below.

2. For evidentiary and conceptual reasons Common law courts originally displayed a marked reluctance to sanction damages for pre-natal injuries. The evidentiary obstacles were primarily connected with the difficulties of establishing a causal link between accident and foetal injury. (Note the grotesque results in Montreal Tramways v. Léveillé [1933] 4 DLR 337 (Quebec) where club-feet, a congenital defect, were treated as the result of a traffic accident! For a more troublesome (and recent) example see: Mulcahy v. Eli Lilly & Co. 386 NW 2d 67 (1986).) The conceptual difficulties were connected with the foreseeability of the victim (in this case the foetus) and, more importantly, to the question whether a foetus could be treated as a “person”. This controversy in turn raised many conceptual, religious, medical, and philosophical issues—in the US highlighted further by Roe v. Wade 410 US 113, 93 S. Ct. 705 (1973)—as to the rights of a foetus and its mother. The question, does a foetus enjoy the same rights as a person has received a varied response. Thus, for the purposes of property, and particularly inheritance, the foetus has traditionally been treated as a person: In Re Trattner's Estate 394 Pa. 133, 145 A. 2d 678 (1958). On the other hand, in criminal law the killing of a foetus has not been treated as homicide: People v. Greer, 79 Ill. 2d 103, 402 NE 2d 203 (1980) but has been handled under some, lesser, criminal offence. The question how the foetus' rights can be dove-tailed with its mother's have raised an even greater controversy; and the aspect that is most relevant to our subject, will be discussed briefly below.

3. The traditional hostile view of the courts can be found clearly expressed in Dietrich v. Inhabitants of Northampton, 138 Mass. 14 (1884). Neither its causative nor conceptual objections to recognising a cause of action are convincing. (See, Dobbs, 781); but it took American courts over sixty years to abandon a position that had enjoyed the support of the great Holmes. One of the earliest decisions to make a break with this approach was Bonbrest v. Kötz 65 F. Supp. 138 (DDC 1946) which, interestingly enough, also referred to Justinian's Digest and Blackstone's Commentaries (ibid. 140). The change in other Common law jurisdictions came somewhat later. For Australia see Watt v. Rama [1972] VR 353; for Canada see Duval v. Seguin [1973] 40 DLR 3d 666; and for England see Congenital Disabilities (Civil Liability) Act 1976. In chronological terms, therefore, German law gave an early lead.

4. Todd v. Sandidge Construction Co., 341 F. 2d 75 (4th Cir.1964) can, in some respects, be treated as an equivalent to case 4; Renslow v. Mennonite Hospital, 67 Ill. 2d 348, 367 NE 2d 1250 (1977) as an analogue to case 5. But see comments in paragraph 5, below. (Contrast, however, Albala v. City of New York, 54 NY 2d 269, 429 NE 2d 786 (1981).) Note also that whereas Todd permits token recovery even where the foetus is born dead (so long as it was viable at the time of the accident), the German decision and the English Act (reproduced below) require that the child be born alive. Which of these variants is preferable and why? Opinions differ; and so do their consequences. On the "born alive" requirement the American courts seem divided. Most take the view that live birth is not necessary for a wrongful death action. Thus Volk v. Baldazo, 103 Idaho 570, 651 P. 2d 11 (1982); Dunn v. Rose Way, Inc., 333 NW 2d 830 (Iowa 1983); Summerfield v. Superior Court, 144 Ariz. 467, 698 P. 2d 712 (1985); Moën v. Hanson, 85 Wash. 2d 597, 537 P. 2d 266 (1975). Others, probably under the influence of Roe v. Wade, 410 US 113, 93 S. Ct. 705 (1973), have held that live birth is a prerequisite of recovery. Thus, see, State ex rel. Hardin v. Sanders, 538 SW 2d 336 (Mo. 1976); Justus v. Atchison, 19 Cal. 3d 564, 565 P. 2d 122 (1977); Chatelain v. Kelley, 322 Ark. 517, 910 SW 2d 215 (1995). A number of recent decisions have adopted this position, often reaching this result on the ground that a stillborn foetus is not a "person" under applicable wrongful death legislation. Thus: Witty v. American Gen. Capital Distrib. Inc., 727 SW 2d 503 (Tex. 1987); Milton v. Carey Medical Center, 538 A. 2d 252 (Me. 1988); Giardina v. Bennett, 545 A. 2d 139 (NJ 1988)—criticised in 21 Rutgers L. Journ., 227 (1989). A final variation to this kaleidoscope of differing solutions can be found in cases that refuse wrongful death actions where foetus' are born dead, but allow the mother to recover for her mental anguish. Thus, see, Tanner v. Hartog 696 So. 2d 705 (Fla. 1997); Giardina v. Bennett, 545 A. 2d 139 (1988); Krishnan v. Sepulveda, 916 SW 2d 478 (Tex. 1995). Though these last cases do not come anywhere near representing the majority of jurisdictions, they seem to have much to commend them since, at least, they seem to have grasped the nettle. Simply put, this is that compensating parents under wrongful statute clauses seems inappropriate given that these enactments were always intended to compensate the loss of a provable pecuniary advantage i.e. the lost dependency. In our cases, however, such pecuniary advantage is extremely speculative; and if it could somehow be divined, tort law rules would require that they be reduced to take into account the "savings" made by the parents (who did not have to bear the cost of upbringing these children). So, in these cases, all one is really trying to achieve is to compensate the parents lost dependency but give the mother some money for her emotional harm (on top of course to that which she may, herself, be able to claim for her own injury). The drawback of the proposed solution—and drawback it will be to all those who tend to favour plaintiffs indiscriminately—is that the father of the killed foetus cannot claim anything (unless he witnessed the commission of the wrong and suffered personal, psychiatric injury). So whatever, the equity reasons in favour of a remedy to the mother for the death of her child, it is difficult to justify given the intention and the wording of the original statutes.

In America, the legalistic (but not substantive) objections to such an extended interpretation of the Wrongful Death Statutes have been addressed by those States which have amended the wording of their statutes to allow overtly “loss of companionship” claims. For these claims are not meant to make up for loss of future support but are intended to compensate spouses for the interference with their right to “affection, solace, comfort, companionship, society, assistance, and sexual relations necessary to a successful marriage.” (Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Alexander, 868 SW 2d 322, 328 (Tex. 1993)). These “companionship” claims are also widely (but not uniformly) recognised in the kind of situations discussed here where the death of a young child is involved; and since they 1980s have even been extended to the reverse situation allowing children to claim for the loss of parental consortium. (See, Giuliani v. Guiler, 951 SW 2d 318 (Ky 1997)). Though not up-to-date, the most informative Article on this point is by Love, “Tortious Interference with the Parent-Child Relationship: Loss of an Injured Person’s Society and Companionship” 51 Ind. L.J. 591 (1976). Even more sporadic seems to be the making of companionship awards for severely injured children (Masaki v. General Motors Corp., 780 P. 2d 566 (1989)), or parents (Robert C. Theama and others v. City of Kenosha, 344 NW 2d 513 (Wisc. 1984); contra, Joe Bennight v. Western Auto Supply Company, 670 SW 2d 373.).

5. When comparing the American and German cases the reader should note that the issues of “viability” and “live birth” are often discussed in the context of who can sue. Putting the emphasis on “live birth” means that the child that was injured while a foetus or because of an injurious act to its mother prior to conception can sue for its injuries; and this is the point made in case no. 4. But if one accepts that viability at the time of the injury will be sufficient to give rise to a cause of action (and no live birth is required) then two questions may arise. The first is that the estate of the unborn child might have a right to claim pecuniary compensation relying on a survival action. The second is that its survivors might wish to sue invoking the appropriate Wrongful Death Statutes and claim their lost dependency. To a non-American lawyer the first possibility appears little short of monstrous. (Cf. Scott v. Kopp, 494 Pa. 487, 491, 431 A. 2d 959, 961 (1981).) But the second, where it is allowed, is no less unorthodox since it represents a marked departure from English law which, through the medium of Lord Campbell’s Act of 1846, originally inspired the USA. (But see discussion about more recent developments in American law in previous paragraph.) The solution ceases to be unorthodox and becomes bizarre in those American jurisdictions which allow punitive damages to be claimed under Wrongful Death Statutes. (See: Moeller, “Punitive Damages in Wrongful Death Actions”, 39 The Univ. of Kansas L. Rev., 199 (1990).) A further point that is sometimes forgotten is that such awards to the survivors of the still-born foetus are often cumulated with the personal claims that the survivors may have themselves (for example for shock or loss of companionship) and where this occurs, double compensation is a real danger. (See the points raised at the end of the previous paragraph.) Most American courts and academics (see, for instance, Dobbs, 783) however, do not seem to be unduly concerned by these considerations.

6. It was noted that prenatal injuries were originally inflicted through impact upon the mother. Nowadays, however, the bulk of these injuries are brought about as a result of the (licit or illicit) use of drugs, alcohol, environmental toxins and workplace exposures to harmful substances. The problem with this manner of infliction of the harm is that it is slow and surreptitious and thus likely to raise considerable difficulties with causation. One way around these difficulties is to relax the rules of causation: see, for instance, Berger, “Eliminating General Causation: Notes Towards a New Theory of Justice and Toxic Torts”, Colum. L. Rev. 2117 (1997). But such calls have been counteracted by others who are anxious to protect possible defendants and who have thus argued for more demanding standards. Thus, see, Boston, “A Mass-exposure Model of Toxic Causation: the Content of Scientific Proof and the Regulatory Experience”, 18 Colum. J. Environ. L. 181 (1993). The important thing to note, however, is that the scientific literature that explains how these substances can affect a foetus is growing in numbers and sophistication. Thus, see Gideon Koren (ed.) Maternal-Fetal Toxicology:

A Clinician's Guide, 2nd edn., (1994). An interesting slant to these problems can also be found in cases which have attempted to address the dangers of mass exposure—including foetal exposure—to toxic substances through the use of injunctions. Thus, see, Williamsburg Around the Bridge Block Association v. Giuliani, 223 A.D. 2d 64, 644 N.Y.S. 2d 252 (1996), where a New York court prohibited the sandblasting of a bridge in order to remove lead paint on the ground that the resulting dust could have serious consequences on the children of pregnant women in the area. (On the effect of lead on a developing foetus see: Dietrich and others, "Low-Level Lead Exposure Effect on Neurobehavioral Development in early Infancy", 80 Pediatrics 721 (1987).)

7. The legal problems can be compounded where the toxic substance has been in the workplace. The question that then has to be addressed is whether the workers' compensation regimes, which exclude tort remedies, also operate against claims brought by children affected in utero by their mother's exposure to the hazardous materials. The limited case law that exists suggests that these restrictions do not affect the claiming children. See: Hitachi Chemical Electro-Products, Inc. v. Gurley, 219 Ga. App. 675, 466 SE 2d 867 (1995); Snyder v. Michael's Stores, Inc., 16 Cal. 4th 991, 945 P. 2d 781, 68 Cal. Rptr. 2d 476 (1997).

8. There is not much case law that deals with the parents' duties to the foetus; but there is little doubt that the use of licit or illicit substances during pregnancy can cause harm to it. The question then is, can it sue its parents? The answer has often been linked to the wider issue of parental immunities and their varied fate over the years in the different states. One claim, brought by children against their parents which has consistently failed is that of causing their birth outside wedlock: Slawek v. Stroh, 62 Wis. 2d 295, 215 NW 2d 9 (1974). A child's action against its mother for negligent driving while pregnant has also failed: Stallman v. Youngquist, 125 Ill. 2d 267, 531 NE 2d 355 (1988). Neither case was a toxic substance case but the reasoning used in the second of these clearly alluded to the mother's autonomy, privacy, and control of her body etc all of which would suggest that the mother's rights would prevail over those of the unborn foetus and thus deprive it of a tort action. A subsequent decision from Texas, dealing with a cocaine inhalation by a pregnant mother, supports this conclusion. See: Chenault v. Huie, 989 SW 2d 474 (Tex. App. 1999). There is no German decision raising these points directly. However, in case 7 (below) the BVerfG stated that, as a matter of constitutional law, the mother, generally speaking, was under a duty to give life to the unborn child. If that is the case it may be argued that tort law imposes some duty of care on the parents towards the unborn child.

9. No student of American law will be surprised to be told that on the pre-conception front American courts have, once again, divided. Adamantly opposed to any duty being owed to the unconceived child are the New York courts. See Albala v. City of New York 54 N.Y. 2d 269, 445 N.Y.S. 2d 108, 429 NE 2d 786 (1981); Park v. Chessin, 46 N.Y. 2d 401, 413 N.Y.S. 2d 895, 386 NE 2d 807 (1978). The reasons for such a rejection are two. The first is metaphysical: the plaintiff was not a person in existence at the time of the defendant's negligence. This point has been well addressed by the German court. The BGH has thus forcefully argued that unlike the concept of "subjective rights" (namely property), which is determined by law, the value of life and the gift of good health must be recognised by the legal system as natural phenomena and thereby be seen logically to precede the application of legal techniques. Thus, every deprivation of the choices of actions of a future human being that curtails its natural development constitutes a violation of the interests of that (future) human being with respect to these values of life. The second stems from the fear that such a duty might place health carers—who are the typical defendants in these cases—in a possible position of conflict; for what might be advisable for the mother might entail dangers for the as yet not conceived child. The latter argument is, prima facie, more noteworthy than the former. Yet interestingly enough, no case thus far litigated has indicated anything other than that both interests have been coterminous. (In the event that they were not, no doubt the conflict could be solved by giving the mother the information needed to make an informed choice.) For these reasons but, also because the arguments have not been fully aired by counsel before any courts, the New York position seems to be an isolated one, though one or two other jurisdictions have produced inconclusive pronouncements that seem to lean in the same direction. Thus, Loerch v.

Eli Lilly & Co., 445 NW 2d 560 (Minn. 1989). At the other end of the spectrum stand a dozen or so courts, with the Illinois case of Renslow cited above as a leader, which have gone the other way and found a duty in favour of the not conceived child. Finally, a small minority has taken a different view and limited such duty to care professionals who are treating the mother. On this approach, a drug manufacturer has been held not to be expected to foresee the harm that one of his drugs administered to the mother may one day cause to her grandchild: Grover v. Eli Lilly & Company, 63 Ohio St. 3d 756, 591 NE 2d 696 (1992). For further details see: Greenberg, "Reconceptualizing Preconception Torts" 64 Tenn. L. Rev. 315, 349 ff. (1997).

11. In the USA, the law concerning survival actions and Wrongful Death Statutes is complicated. To an outside observer, the topic also appears to be inadequately covered in the law curriculum. The following summary may thus be of some use to lawyers who wish to compare the German cases here reproduced with their American analogues but find themselves confused by the somewhat sloppy use of terms by many State courts.

(i) When someone dies, his estate can claim the damages he could have claimed for the period he remained alive after the accident. In the USA this is commonly referred to as the "survival action" and in England as the Law Reform Action. If the victim dies instantly, only funeral costs can be claimed. In the USA the claim for such expenses may depend on whether the estate was legally obliged to incur them.

(ii) If the injured person is compensated while alive and later dies, his dependants will not be able to bring a claim under the Wrongful Death Statutes. The same is true if the injured person allows his claim to become statute-barred or, otherwise, settles his claim with the defendant. In a very narrow area of American maritime law the position may be different. See: Miles v. Apex Marine Corp., 498 U. S. 19, 111 S.Ct. 317 (1990); Sea-Land Services Inc. v. Gaudet, 414 US 573, 94 S. Ct. 806 (1974). Gaudet (allowing dependants of deceased longshoreman to recover damages for loss of companionship) nowadays applies only to widows of longshoremen who died in territorial waters i.e. within a marine league from the shore. The distinction between such cases and all other maritime death cases is so bizarre that it must indicate a good chance that the Supreme Court will overrule Gaudet when it next has the chance to do so.

(iii) If the deceased dies without having been compensated through his personal action, certain dependant relatives may have a cause of action under the Wrongful Death Statutes. This will depend primarily on the wording of the relevant (State) statute, whether it lists the claimants as proper dependants, whether it has mutually exclusive classes of beneficiaries, and so forth.

(iv) In England, compensation for wrongful death is governed by the Fatal Accidents Act of 1846 as repeatedly amended. Many American statutes, passed from about the 1860s onwards, are modelled on the English Act. With significant exceptions (see, for example, Moragne v. State Marine Lines Inc., 398 US 375, 90 S. Ct. 1772 (1970); Gaudette v. Webb 362 Mass. 60, 284 NE 2d 222 (1972)), American courts take the view that there is no Common law (i.e. non-statutory) right to recover for a fatal accident.

(v) In wrongful death cases, English courts have always allowed only claims for monetary losses. No compensation has been given for dommage morale, loss of companionship, solatium etc., though, since 1982 there is the possibility to claim a small, fixed amount for bereavement.

(vi) In some USA jurisdictions, the wording of the statute has been interpreted to allow bereavement claims. But since this is a question of statutory interpretation, this extension, though “novel” to English eyes, cannot be regarded as wrong.

(vii) Some US statutes also allow punitive damages. The award of punitive damages to the dependants, even when authorised by statute, is, de lege ferenda very dubious.

Addendum: The Congenital Disabilities (Civil Liability) Act 1976

1 (1) If a child is born disabled as the result of such an occurrence before its birth as is mentioned in subsection (2) below, and a person (other than the child’s own mother) is under this section answerable to the child in respect of the occurrence, the child’s disabilities are to be regarded as damage resulting from the wrongful act of that person and actionable accordingly at the suit of the child.

(2) An occurrence to which this section applies is one which:

- (a) Affected either parent of the child in his or her ability to have a normal, healthy child, or
- (b) affected the mother during her pregnancy, or affected her or the child in the course of its birth, so that the child is born with disabilities which would not otherwise have been present.

(3) Subject to the following subsections, a person (here referred to as “the defendant”) is answerable to the child if he was liable in tort to the parent or would, if sued in due time, have been so; and it is no answer that there could not have been such liability because the parent suffered no actionable injury, if there was a breach of duty which, accompanied by injury, would have given rise to the liability.

(4) In the case of an occurrence preceding the time of conception, the defendant is not answerable to the child if at that time either or both of the parents knew the risk of their child being born disabled (that is to say, the particular risk created by the occurrence); but should it be the child’s father who is the defendant, this subsection does not apply if he knew of the risk and the mother did not.

(5) The defendant is not answerable to the child, for anything he did or omitted to do when responsible in a professional capacity for treating or advising the parent, if he took reasonable care having due regard to then received professional opinion applicable to the particular class of case; but this does not mean that he is answerable only because he departed from received opinion.

(6) Liability to the child under this section may be treated as having been excluded or limited by contract made with the parent affected, to the same extent and subject to the same restrictions as liability in the parent’s own case; and a contract term which could have been set up by the defendant in an action by the parent, so as to exclude or limit his liability to him or her, operates in the defendant’s favour to the same, but no greater, extent in an action under this section by the child.

(7) If in the child’s action under this section it is shown that the parent affected shared the responsibility for the child being born disabled, the damages are to be reduced to such extent as the court thinks just and equitable having regard to the extent of the parent’s responsibility.

2. A woman driving a motor vehicle when she knows (or ought reasonably to know) herself to be pregnant is to be regarded as being under the same duty to take care for the safety of her unborn child as the law imposes on her with respect to the safety of other people; and if in consequence of her breach of that duty her child is born with disabilities which would not otherwise have been present, those disabilities are to be regarded as damage resulting from her wrongful act and actionable accordingly at the suit of the child.

3 (1) Section 1 of this Act does not affect the operation of the Nuclear Installations Act 1965 as to liability for, and compensation in respect of, injury or damage caused by occurrences involving nuclear matter or the emission of ionising radiations.

(2) For the avoidance of doubt anything which:

(a) affects a man in his ability to have a normal, healthy child; or

(b) affects a woman in that ability, or so affects her when she is pregnant that her child is born with disabilities which would not otherwise have been present is an injury for the purposes of that Act.

(3) If a child is born disabled as the result of an injury to either of its parents caused in breach of a duty imposed by any of ss. 7 to 11 of the Act (nuclear site licensees and others to secure that nuclear incidents do not cause injury to persons, etc.), the child's disabilities are to be regarded under the subsequent provisions of that Act (compensation and other matters) as injuries caused on the same occasion, and by the same breach of duty, as was the injury to the parent.

(4) As respects compensation to the child, s. 13(6) of the Act (contributory fault of person injured by radiation) is to be applied as if the reference there to fault were to the fault of the parent.

(5) Compensation is not payable in the child's case if the injury to the parent preceded the time of the child's conception and at that time either or both of the parents knew the risk of their child being born disabled (that is to say, the particular risk created by the injury).

4 (1) References in this Act to a child being born disabled or with disabilities are to its being born with any deformity, disease or abnormality, including predisposition (whether or not susceptible of immediate prognosis) to physical or mental defects in the future.

(2) In this Act:

(a) "born" means born alive (the moment of a child's birth being when it first has a life separate from its mother), and "birth" has a corresponding meaning; and

(b) "motor vehicle" means a mechanically propelled vehicle intended or adapted for use on roads.

(3) Liability to a child under s. 1 or 2 of this Act is to be regarded:

(a) as respects all its accidents and any matters arising or to arise out of it; and

(b) subject to any contrary context or intention, for the purpose of construing references in enactments and documents to personal or bodily injuries and cognate matters.

as liability for personal injuries sustained by the child immediately after its birth.

(4) No damages shall be recoverable under either of those sections in respect of any loss of expectation of life, nor shall any such loss be taken into account in the compensations payable in respect of a child under the Nuclear Installations Act 1965 as extended by s. 3, unless (in either case) the child lives for at least forty-eight hours.

(5) This Act applies in respect of births after (but not before) its passing, and in respect of any such birth it replaces any law in force before its passing, whereby a person could be liable to a child in respect of disabilities with which it might be born; but in s. 1(3) of this Act the expression "liable in tort" does not include any reference to liability by virtue of this Act or to liability by virtue of any such law.

3. “WRONGFUL LIFE” AND “WRONGFUL BIRTH”

Case 6

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 18 JANUARY 1983
BGHZ 86, 240, JZ 1983, 447 with note by Deutsch at 651

The first plaintiff, born on 24 February 1977, is the legitimate daughter of the second and third plaintiffs (henceforth called the plaintiffs). The first plaintiff suffered severe damage to her health because the second plaintiff, her mother, had caught German measles (rubella) during the first weeks of her pregnancy. The plaintiffs charge the defendant gynaecologist with having failed to diagnose the mother’s illness with the result that the pregnancy—which had been desired in principle—had not been terminated.

The child and her parents ask for a declaration that—subject to a statutory assignment—the defendant is liable “to pay compensation in respect of all the damage which they have suffered or will suffer in the future as a result of the second plaintiff’s infection with German measles during her pregnancy”.

The District Court dismissed the first plaintiff’s claim but granted the parents the declaration which they had sought. The Court of Appeal of Munich rejected the first plaintiff’s appeal and, upon the defendant’s appeal, rejected the parents’ claim as well [reference].

Upon a second appeal by the three plaintiffs the decision of the Court of Appeal was quashed in so far as the claims of the parents were concerned for the following.

Reasons

A

The Court of Appeal has held that the claims of all the plaintiffs are unsubstantiated. In particular it has held:

I. Even if an error had occurred in the treatment of the patient, the defendant had not injured a protected interest or a right of the first plaintiff. It was true that according to a constant practice an act could result in damages if the party whose health had been adversely affected had not been born or not been conceived at the relevant time. In the present case, however, the defendant had not caused the injury to the first plaintiff; instead he was responsible for the fact that the first plaintiff was alive and enjoyed legal capacity. The foetus had no right to its abortion if only for the reason that, in so far as the abortion was legally admissible, the decision was that of the mother alone. Furthermore, the alternative between existence and no existence could not be expressed in legal terms of damage. Finally, by impeding an abortion the defendant had not violated a law for the protection of the plaintiff.

Admittedly the contract for treatment concluded between the defendant and the second plaintiff also exercised a protective effect in favour of the first plaintiff. However, the defendant's duty to explain to the second plaintiff the risks in the pregnancy itself and the possible injury to the foetus was only incumbent upon him in the interest of the second plaintiff.

II. In the opinion of the Court of Appeal the claims of the parents amount to a claim for a declaration by the second plaintiff in respect of non-pecuniary damages (owing to the difficult birth requiring a Caesarean delivery) while the claim of the first plaintiff was for pecuniary damages. It rejected both claims.

(a) Claims of the second plaintiff

(aa) The Court of Appeal held that it was not called upon to decide whether the burden of economic maintenance (increased in the present case) could be regarded as damage. In any event, the principles developed by this Division in the two decisions of 18 March 1980 [references] did not apply in the present case. An error in treatment on the part of the defendant . . . would of course have adequately caused the second plaintiff's burden of maintenance. However, abortion, as distinct from sterilization was an act of killing [references] and according to some was only not punishable, but remained unjustified. Apart from this, unlike in the case of a request for sterilization, the defendant was not obliged in the present case also to take into account the financial interests of the second plaintiff. The defendant was only obliged to explain the medical and eugenic aspects of a pregnancy in so far as the life and health of the second plaintiff was endangered. In the present case the only concern had been to spare the first plaintiff a life under the severest conditions. In addition, financial considerations may have played a role, but these alone would not have justified a termination of the pregnancy. An excessive financial burden, which was also considered by some as a justification had not been proved. Consequently, the contractual duties of the defendant did not include the protection of those financial interests which had been pleaded. To this intent, too, the claim for damages was not justified.

(bb) Claims of the third plaintiff

Any contractual claims, alone in issue in the case of this plaintiff, were ruled out for the reasons set out when dealing with those of the second plaintiff, although the third plaintiff was included in the sphere of protection created by the contract between the second plaintiff and the defendant [reference].

B

These conclusions are valid in so far as the first plaintiff's (the child's) appeal is directed against them, but do not as a whole stand up against the appeal by the parents:

I. 1. In the light of the undisputed facts it cannot be doubted that the defendant, in his capacity as a medical practitioner, received and accepted the mandate of investigating the danger of serious injury to the first plaintiff (the child) as a result of the infection of the mother (the second plaintiff) with German measles during the first weeks of her pregnancy. The District Court has found that he carried out this mandate negligently.

The facts as found leave no doubt, moreover, that the second plaintiff, who had some medical knowledge, was particularly concerned, in consulting the defendant, to prevent any likely serious danger of permanent damage to the infant which had just been conceived, by terminating the pregnancy. It is also to be presumed in this second appeal that if the defendant had acted in accordance with his mandate he would have confirmed this fear and would thus have made a timely termination of the pregnancy possible as the sole remedy. Consequently, in these circumstances the defendant has caused by his negligent breach of the contract to treat the plaintiff the damage complained of by the latter.

2. It could be doubted whether the defendant had broken his contract, if it were assumed that a termination of a pregnancy, which is only regulated in criminal law (§ 218 ff. of the Criminal Code), is merely exempt from penalties, but remains illegal as a crime of killing. This view is supported generally by Sax [references]. However, as Sax himself observes expressly [references], it seems contrary not only to the view of the legislature but also to generally accepted opinion, as the Court of Appeal realized also. This Division sees no reason for going into this dogmatic dispute. It holds, in accordance with the generally accepted view, that an abortion which is exempt from penalties according to § 218 ff. of the Criminal Code is certainly not illegal. This view is borne out not only by the Preparatory Materials accompanying the present statutory provisions but also by the position taken by the Federal Constitutional Court [reference] which [reference] supports a clear distinction between lawfulness and illegality.

Consequently an abortion which is exempt from penalties according to § 218 of the Criminal Code can form the object of a valid contract with a medical practitioner . . .

The Court of Appeal does not question that an infection with German measles during the particularly vulnerable period of early pregnancy may justify the mother in deciding to terminate it. Such an infection involves the risk, which is not overwhelming but at least highly likely, that the child will be born with severe or even extremely severe injuries [references]; the evidence in the present case is to the same effect. In these circumstances the future mother must have the right and the possibility, having regard to the present law, to call for an abortion. It is irrelevant in the present circumstances that the medical adviser is not under a direct duty to collaborate. The defendant has not alleged that he would have refused the plaintiff mother's request, had the danger been diagnosed.

No different conclusions can be derived from the fact that the statute does not concentrate on the prognosis for the welfare of the child but on whether the mother can be required to bear the burden. This does not mean that the test is only restricted to considerations of the danger facing the mother of a severe financial and work-load, as well as of the mental anguish through sharing the fate of a severely handicapped child. In addition, the ethical interest of the mother who is the sole person, according to what seems to be the general opinion, entitled to take this decision, must be taken into account. It is not to be held against her and she must not reproach herself for having failed, by a decision placed in her hands, to have spared the child a life which may be often painful and makes integration into society difficult.

Consequently it is generally believed, and held on the facts in practice, that an infection with German measles at a period when it may have dangerous repercussions is a ground which entitles the mother to demand an abortion.

II. In the opinion of this Division the negligent breach of contract by the defendant which constitutes at the same time an injury to the second plaintiff (the mother) may certainly lead to claims by the plaintiff parents, though not to a separate claim by the child.

1. Claims of the parents

In recent literature the predominant view appears to be that, in principle, claims of the parents may arise in the circumstances [references]. However, the decision forming the present appeal is mentioned several times with approval. The possibility of such claims is denied, in particular, by those who hold, for various reasons, that abortion is merely not visited with penalties, but illegal [reference]. This Division, as stated before, shares the former opinion.

(a) Claims of the mother

(aa) One starts from the fact that with the birth of the child the danger has materialised which the mother had decided to prevent by having an abortion. The total damage suffered by the child . . . is so grave that a mother who was prepared to undergo an abortion, if necessary, would have decided not to give birth to the child, had she been cognisant of the damage in advance. The damage suffered by the mother as a result was caused by the defendant's breach of contract and, generally speaking, he is therefore liable to repair it. The damage, being pecuniary damage due according to the law of contract, can consist in the additional expenses, financial and material (labour) which the mother will have to assume in toto or in part, possibly for her whole life. Plaintiff's counsel has stated expressly that their claim is limited to the additional expenses and is not concerned with the amount of maintenance which a healthy child would have required; therefore this Division can limit the decision to that claim in the case before it. The fact that this additional expense, too, arises from a duty of support imposed by family law, does not prevent its characterisation as pecuniary damage, in so far as a third-party liability is concerned [reference].

It follows that—as in the case of a child born owing to a failure of preventive measures—also in the case of a child which the mother did not wish to be born in a condition as the present, i.e. handicapped, at least the additional expenses caused by the handicap can be claimed as damage to be made good (a point still left open [reference]). Of course, this is true only if and to the extent that the danger to be avoided has in fact occurred, so as to show that the severity of the actual damage—if it could have been foreseen—would have made it unreasonable to let the child be born. This must be assumed in the present appeal.

This is the only means of providing reparation for the defendant's negligence which imposed upon the mother a burden not required by law to be borne by her and which she was entitled to evade.

(bb) In addition this Division holds that, having regard to need for a Caesarean operation, the question must be considered whether the mother is entitled to damages for pain and suffering.

As distinct from the other cases referred to above decided by the Federal Supreme Court (Civil Division), the pregnancy, as such, was not due to the medical adviser's negligence, but was freely chosen or at least accepted by the mother (the second plaintiff). Thus, the defendant did not interfere directly with the personal health of the second plaintiff by involving her in an unwanted birth (as distinct from [reference]). Therefore this Division holds that only that infliction of pain and suffering can justify a claim according to § 847 BGB which, as an aspect of damage, exceeds the inflictions which accompany a birth without complications. This may happen if—once again the evidence is not available—the Caesarean operation only became necessary because the child was injured, as the plaintiffs maintain. In assessing damages, it would have to be considered, on the other hand, that thereby the mother was spared an abortion which—as the defendant contends—would not have been without complications, and which she would have suffered if the defendant had fulfilled his obligation.

No additional claims of the mother arise by applying § 847 literally or by way of analogy. Nor did the Court of Appeal discern such a claim in the plaintiff's pleadings, a conclusion which remains unchallenged in the present appeal. For this reason it may be observed in passing only that such a claim based on the mental burden, not amounting exceptionally to an illness, resulting from being burdened with a severely handicapped child would be alien to German law (contrary to several foreign legal systems, as evidenced, e.g., by Howard v. Lecher, decided by the Court of Appeals of New York, 366 NE (2d) 64 (1977)—“mental and emotional suffering”). The practice of the Federal Supreme Court, which grants damages similar to those for pain and suffering within a strictly defined area in respect of the right to one's personality [reference], cannot be extended to the present issue. In particular, no pecuniary damages can be awarded, contrary to principle underlying the statutory provisions, in respect of a violation of the “right to plan a family” as an emanation of the general right to one's personality [references] if a decision involving the personality of the party affected was only frustrated in fact—as was the case here.

(b) Claims of the plaintiff husband

The husband is entitled to expenses in money and kind to the same extent as the wife. To this extent he was included in the sphere of protection resulting from the contract for medical treatment; as far as the liability to pay damages of the responsible medical practitioner is concerned it is irrelevant to what extent the burden created by him is distributed between the spouses. The principle laid down by this Division [reference] apply here as well. The present case shows clearly that normally no other conclusion can be reached for at least according to the allegations of the plaintiff parents—the father, acting as a “houseman”, has now assumed the time-consuming care of the handicapped child, in order to enable the mother to continue her professional career and thus to provide the financial means for maintaining the family.

No claims of the third plaintiff for damages other than financial are in issue.

2. Claims of the child

In the present case the highest German Court is confronted for the first time with the problem which has been described in Anglo-Saxon parlance as “wrongful life”. As stated above, the defendant did not cause the child's deplorable condition; nor is it contended that by taking special measures he could have prevented it. However, in breach of his obligation towards the mother to treat her, he failed to prevent by means of an abortion the birth of a child, the health of which was severely endangered and in whose person this danger materialised in a severe form. To this extent this Division agrees with the Court of Appeal that the child cannot raise any claims based on these facts.

As stated above, little German practice has come to light. Apart from the decision under appeal here, an appeal against a judgment of the Court of Appeal of Hamm of 25 January 1982 [reference] is pending before this Division in which, however, claims by the child itself were not considered for procedural reasons. Foreign judgments, which for the reason alone that they are based on different laws are only of limited relevance for German law, appear to have been rendered in England and the United States. In England a claim by the child has recently been rejected (Court of Appeal, 19 February 1982, McKay v. Essex Health Authority and Another [1982] 2 WLR 890). In the meantime, legislation has excluded a claim by the child altogether. In the United States, too, this opinion has been generally accepted for some time (Court of Appeal, California, Curlender v. Bio-Science (1980) 165 Cal. 477).

Writers on the law of the Federal German Republic relating to this topic are divided, but the majority denies a claim to the child. Such a claim is, however, advocated by Deutsch [reference] and probably also by Plum [references]. On the other hand, claims by the child itself are denied not only by all those who do not accept failure to facilitate an abortion as a ground for liability, but also by those writers who would allow claims by the parents in these circumstances [references]. In rejecting a claim by the child based on “wrongful life” or “wrongful birth” this Division is guided by the following considerations:

(a) A direct duty, enforceable by an action in tort, to prevent the birth of a child on the ground that in all probability it will be affected by an infirmity which makes its life appear “valueless” in the eyes of society or in its own presumed opinion (for which naturally no evidence can be produced) would be alien to the duties sanctioned by the law of tort which are normally centred on the protection of personal integrity. No such duty exists. This applies even in cases—different from the present—where there exists not only a danger of damage, but, e.g. where a fairly reliable prognosis of a serious genetic defect is possible, e.g. by means of amniocentesis—as in the case of mongolism. This principle holds good, although according to what is probably the dominant opinion as well as the actual legal practice the birth of such children should be prevented. Human life, which at the conclusion of implantation includes also the foetus, is a legally protected interest of the highest order deserving absolute protection. No third party may determine its value. For this reason it is recognised that the duty to save the life of a sick person or one who is seriously injured must not be made to depend upon a judgment as to the value of the life to be saved. Only when the question is whether isolated single human functions are to be sustained by artificial means without any hope of improvement, this principle may have to yield [references].

Such is not the case here. Quite generally, having regard to the experience under the national socialist regime of lawlessness, the practice of the courts in the Federal Republic does not permit, with good reason, any legally relevant judgment about the value of the lives of others [reference].

(b) Therefore any breach of duty which might render the defendant liable in damages could only be derived from the contract to treat the mother.

(aa) On the one hand, it is possible that contractual duties, including those towards third parties, may constitute duties to be accounted for in tort [reference]. In this respect reference may be made to what has been stated before. Neither the fact of bringing life into being nor of failing to prevent it (as distinct from affecting the quality of life by an act of omission) violates the legal interest protected by § 823 BGB. This is not merely a dogmatic consideration. It is also supported by the fact that the ethical evaluation by public opinion of permissible abortions is not uniform (it is true that the defendant has never relied on ethical scruples; if so, he would have had to refuse to advise and to treat the mother).

Above all, seeing that no interest of personal integrity is involved, it is impossible to determine with binding effect whether a life affected by serious handicaps as an alternative to absence of existence can be regarded at all in law as damage, or whether it is a better condition that the latter [Stephenson LJ [1982] 2 WLR 890: "Man, who knows nothing of death or nothingness, cannot possibly know whether that is so"]].

(bb) Thus it remains only to examine whether the defendant is bound by a direct contractual obligation which obliged the latter to protect the child as a result of the protective effect of an agreement (possibly implied only) in favour of the unborn child. Once again this Division is unable to give an affirmative answer, although such a contract for medical treatment may well have protective effects in favour of the child in other respects, as the Court of Appeal has also recognised.

It would not be an obstacle that at the time when the defendant committed the act resulting in his liability the plaintiff child did not yet enjoy legal personality (§ 1 BGB). In the law of tort, too (see above) it is recognised that an act causing liability may be committed before the injured party was born [reference] and even before he was conceived [reference]. The same applies to a claim for damages which is based on a contractual duty in favour of the unborn child.

This Division is, however, unable to find that such a protective effect was stipulated since the law in force at present expressly authorises the mother in her own interest alone to demand an abortion. This attitude of the law may not be convincing in its reasons; also, as far as can be ascertained, it does not exist in other countries, where the law does not reject abortion in principle. Nevertheless, the attitude taken by German law must be respected within the confines of the Federal Republic, if only for reasons of constitutional law [reference]. Consequently it precludes not only a broad interpretation of the contract to treat the mother so as to benefit the child, the birth of which was to be prevented, but also as already stated, any direct guarantee actionable in tort of the medical adviser towards the child arising from the assumption of the mandate to treat the mother.

(cc) Leaving aside the special features of the German rules on abortion, this Division regards the denial of claims by the child itself as imperative in such cases. Such claims are only admissible if the child's interest in personal integrity has been violated culpably by human activity which, as stated before, may have occurred even before the child was conceived. For the rest, the question is not so much one of arguments based on formal logic, also relied upon by the Court of Appeal, as for instance to the effect that those having legal personality cannot conceivably derive claims from acts which gave rise to the claimant's existence and legal personality [reference]. Instead, this Division believes that in cases such as the present the limits within which claims can be adjudicated according to law have been reached altogether and even exceeded. As a matter of principle a human being has to accept his life as nature has endowed him and has no claim against others to be born or to be eliminated. If a mother—and she alone—is nevertheless accorded such a choice by the law, this does not mean either that the child is granted a right as against her not to exist. It is irrelevant that the mother's decision may legitimately have been influenced by compassion for the severely injured life [reference].

If a decision to the contrary were to be reached against the medical adviser, it would follow that liability would also have to be admitted in other cases; for example that of parents who, although suffering from severe genetic defects, gave life to a child, and whose liability consists at present, as the case may be, in an increased duty of maintenance; or that of persons who are responsible for those genetic defects, even if these defects were known to the parents, who are primarily liable, when they produced the child (as distinct from the case [reference] where the issue was the infection of the mother with lues as a result of a blood transfusion . . .). Thus liability to pay damages could arise for several generations, a possibility which has already led to suggestions to restrict liability to the first generation [references].

These considerations show in the opinion of this Division, as stated before, that an area has been touched on in which the legal regulation of liability for far-reaching fateful and natural developments is neither reasonable nor acceptable.

(dd) This Division is not oblivious of the fact that as a result seriously handicapped children remain without financial protection, once the duty of the parents to maintain them comes to an end—as for instance when they die. This must be accepted, just as when the mother could not make up her mind to call for an abortion or if the period set by law for having an abortion has been allowed to pass, for no matter what reason.

In all these cases a fateful development takes place the interruption of which cannot be demanded by the child and the effects of which must be made good by the community within the bounds of the possible.

Case 7

BUNDESVERFASSUNGSGERICHT (SECOND DIVISION) 28 MAY 1993
BVERFG 88, 203 = NJW 1993, 1751

Reasons

D V 6. The duty of the State to protect the nasciturus does not require that contracts are classed as non-binding which were concluded with doctors and hospitals for abortions which are not punishable under the (new) counselling programme. The programme rather requires that the mutual tie of obligations between doctor and patient take the form of a legal relationship so that all obligations are fulfilled for valid legal reasons. Irrespective of any specific contractual consequences, §§ 134, 138 BGB are inapplicable. Doctors and hospitals only take part in abortions on the basis of a valid contract which safeguards their claim for payment and outlines their duties. It is in particular the doctor's duty towards the unborn child and the patient's health which needs contractual safeguards. As a consequence, faulty performance of the duties to provide counselling and treatment must in principle be able to trigger contractual and tortious sanctions.

However, in the light of the Constitution this result needs to be differentiated. A civil law sanction for faulty performance of the contract or for tortious infringement of the patient's physical integrity is basically necessary; this entails not only the duty to pay back any wasted fees, but also the duty to compensate for damage under the provisions of §§ 823, 847 BGB, including compensation for pain and suffering resulting from a failed abortion or from the birth of a handicapped child. But as a result of Article 1 I GG, the child's existence cannot legally be classified as damage. The duty of all public bodies to respect every human being for its own sake, prohibits maintenance for a child to be classified as damage. In the light of this fact, the case law of the civil courts on liability for medical mistakes in counselling or in performing failed abortions needs to be reconsidered (see for abortion BGHZ 86, 240 et seq.; 89, 95 et seq.; BGH NJW 1985, 671 et seq.; VersR 1985, 1068 et seq.; VersR 1986, 869 et seq.; VersR 1988, 155 et seq.; NJW 1992, 1556 et seq.; for sterilisations see BGHZ 76, 249 et seq.; 76, 259 et seq.; BGH NJW 1984, 2625 et seq.). However, the doctor's duty to pay damages to the child for damage caused in the course of an unskillfully attempted and thus failed abortion remains unaffected (see BGHZ 58, 48 [49 et seq.]; BGH NJW 1989, 1538 [1539]).

Case 8

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 16 NOVEMBER 1993
BGHZ 124, 128 = NJW 1994, 788

Facts

The first and second plaintiffs are the parents of a girl born in 1982 with a mental and physical handicap. Suspecting that they might have an abnormal genetic disposition, they were, in August 1983, referred by their GP to the Department of Clinical Genetics (run by the first defendant) of the Institute of Anthropology and Human Genetics of the University (third defendant), because they wished to be advised, prior to deciding on a second pregnancy, of the possibility of an adverse hereditary disposition. The second defendant, a doctor at the Institute's clinic, made tests and on 27 October 1983 and wrote a report, which was signed by himself and the first defendant. Copies of this report, informing the two plaintiffs that an inherited adverse disposition was very unlikely and that the couple should not be dissuaded from further pregnancies, were also sent to their GP. On 6 March 1985, the third plaintiff was born with the same mental and physical handicaps as the first child. The plaintiffs, believing that the genetic consultation and advice had been faulty, claimed damages from the defendants. The first and second defendants requested the court to clarify whether they were liable to make compensation for any current and future material losses stemming from the third plaintiff's brain damage, as far as these claims have not been transferred to the social security bodies. The second and third plaintiffs also demanded damages for pain and suffering.

The Landgericht rejected the claim. On appeal by the first and second plaintiff, the Oberlandesgericht declared that the first defendant must compensate the (first and second) plaintiffs for all current and future losses originating from the birth of the third plaintiff, including the entire costs of living. The Court also decided that the first and second defendant are liable as joint and several debtors to pay the second plaintiff damages for pain and suffering for the birth of the third plaintiff. The Court rejected all other claims. By this further appeal, the first and second defendants requested that the Landgericht decision be restored; the first and second plaintiff (hereinafter: "the plaintiffs") claimed that the third defendant should be included in the decision on liability. The third plaintiff's further appeal was withdrawn. This Division only accepted the first defendant's further appeal in so far as it concerned the claim for financial losses. The further appeal was unsuccessful.

Reasons

- I. The Appeal Court held that the first defendant was liable for his breach of the consultation contract, including his liability for the breach committed by the second defendant as employee performing his obligation (§ 278 BGB). . . .
- II. The further appeal fails to challenge the Appeal Court's reasoning.

1. In respect of the contract of genetic consultation, the further appeal unsuccessfully challenges the first defendant’s status as the mainly liable contractual partner. . . .

According to the findings of the Court of Appeal, the plaintiffs were referred for genetic counselling by their GP to the department run by the first defendant of the institute run by the third defendant. The Appeal Court also correctly ascertained that the first defendant was authorised by the National Health Service to provide this kind of service. . . .

In view of this situation, the Appeal Court followed the principle repeatedly expressed by this Division (BGHZ 100, 363 [367 et seq.]; BGHZ 105, 189 [194]; BGHZ 120, 376 [382 et seq.]) that the first and second plaintiffs only entered into a contract with the first defendant, since the out-patient treatment of National Health patients is not first and foremost the duty of the body running the hospital, but is rather that of the approved National Health doctor or the chief consultant appointed for National Health patients. As a result, a National Health patient only enters into a contract with the chief consultant running the out-patient National Health department, and not with the hospital even where the GP’s referral names the hospital (BGHZ 105, 189 [194]). . . .

A genetic consultation is not an alternative to out-patient and in-house treatment but is rather a form of out-patient treatment . . . The first defendant, not the Institute itself, was the person authorised by the National Health organisation to provide such counselling, . . . Internal arrangements as to payment between the doctor and the Institute cannot alter the fact that as regards the consultancy contract, the duly appointed chief consultant was the plaintiffs’ contractual partner.

2. The further appeal unsuccessfully challenges the opinion of the Court of Appeal that the counselling by the second defendant (for which the first defendant is responsible) was wrong . . .

(a) . . . According to the undisputed findings of the Court of Appeal, the question whether the first-born child suffered from genetic or prenatal damage was at the time of consultation left unanswered. The Appeal Court, therefore, held that the letter written on 27 October 1983 by the first and second defendants, stating that (a) an adverse inherited disposition was extremely unlikely and an as yet unknown prenatal damage was the most likely cause of the disabilities; (b) a repetition was not to be expected; and (c) a further pregnancy should not be dissuaded, misrepresented this uncertainty. In view of the open-ended medical results, the advice which the parents derived from this letter was not sound enough. The genetic counselling should have made this point clear.

The further appeal submits that the letter had been sent to the GP, and the plaintiffs had only been sent a copy of it . . . In view of the clear statements contained in the defendants’ letter, the further appeal fails to show how the GP could have advised his patients as to possible risks along any other lines . . . For its opinion that the risks had been assessed too optimistically and that the recommendations had been insufficiently safe, the Appeal Court could unreservedly rely on expert advice. . . .

The Court of Further Appeal does not doubt that the lower court’s findings show a connection between the tortious act (the wrongful consultation) and the resulting damage; had the consultation been complete and correct, the plaintiffs would not have had another child. The Appeal Court correctly held that the damage claimed resulted from a breach of duty which the first defendant had under the consultancy contract, since the genetic consultation was intended to prevent the birth of a genetically damaged child by allowing the parents to make a reasoned decision. The Appeal Court held that there existed a sufficient with the protective purpose of the consultancy contract if any kind of genetic damage to the third plaintiff was at least a factor contributing to any mental or physical handicap. In view of the facts of the case this could be easily ascertained: both children had the same symptoms of damage, suggesting a combination of genetic and exogenic damage. As regards the third plaintiff, mere prenatal damage could, for all intents and purposes, be ruled out . . . The fact that the exact nature of the third claimant's established genetic damage could not be exactly ascertained, prevents neither the finding of a causal connection between the wrongful advice and the birth of a genetically damaged child, nor the inclusion of the damage to health under the scope of protection of the consultancy contract since by this contract all possible genetic damage was to be excluded . . .

3. The further appeal fails in so far as it opposes the finding that the plaintiffs' claim for damages comprises the total costs of living necessary for the third plaintiff. . . .

(b) In view of the findings of the Court of Appeal that the plaintiffs would have refrained from having another child if they had fully and correctly been advised on the genetic implications, the opinion of the Court of Appeal is in line with the case law of this Division, according to which the costs of maintenance resulting from the birth of the further child can be claimed from the wrongly advising doctor as damages for breach of the consultancy contract. This Division has decided this point on a number of occasions for comparable groups of cases, i.e. for cases of (a) wrong advice on the prevention of the birth of a severely prenatally damaged child (BGHZ 86, 240 et seq.; BGHZ, 89, 95 et seq.; NJW 1987, 2923), (b) failed sterilisation (BGHZ 76, 249 et seq.; BGHZ 76, 259 et seq.; VersR 1980, 719; NJW 1981, 630; NJW 1981, 2002; NJW 1984, 2625; NJW 1992, 2961), and (c) failed (permissible) abortions (BGHZ 95, 199; NJW 1985, 2752; NJW 1985, 671; NJW 1985, 2749; VersR 1986, 869; NJW 1992, 1556). The facts of this case provide no reasons why the principles developed for those cases cannot be applied to a case where the parents of a handicapped child, before procreation of another child, undergo genetic counselling in order to prevent the risk of giving birth to a second handicapped child.

(c) The Second Division of the Bundesverfassungsgericht (Federal Constitutional Court) in its decision of 28 May 1993 (NJW 1993, 1751 et seq.), headnote no. 14, and in its reasons under D V 6, expressed its doubts as regards the decisions of this Division. Although the remarks of the Bundesverfassungsgericht are not binding on this Court, and this Division has already repeatedly and critically reviewed its own previous findings (see BGHZ 76, 249 [252] and NJW 1984, 2625), a further detailed analysis of the legal position is called for.

The Bundesverfassungsgericht decided that the legal possibility that a child's existence may be a source for damages is constitutionally barred under Article 1 I GG. The duty of all organs of the state to honour every human being in its existence, (and here reference is made to Part I 1 a of the decision) prohibits, in itself, the view that maintenance of a child can be seen as financial loss. The case law of the civil courts on liability for medical errors in counselling on failed abortions should therefore be reviewed.

This Division fails to find this remark of the BVerfG a reason why in the case here under investigation expenses for maintenance cannot be seen as financial loss.

(aa) The legal classification of expenses for maintenance proceeds from the contractual liability of the doctor to full all medical requirements in order that the treatment or consultancy undertaken by him be successful. Such legal liability can, however, only be used as a starting point for contracts whose legality is not in question. As regards abortions without legal justification which, as a result of the Constitutional decision of 1993 must now be regarded as illegal (for instance because the previously applied justifications are no longer accepted as valid . . .), this Division can here leave undecided, whether in such cases the need to prevent economic loss arising from a child's existence is at all relevant for the contractual relationship and, even where such need existed, if it could be the starting point for a claim for damages.

On the other hand, (a) consultancy contracts intended to prevent, as here, the procreation or, in other cases, the birth of a genetically damaged child; or (b) sterilisation contracts aimed at preventing the birth of any, or any further, children or (c) contracts for the legally permitted abortion of a pregnancy, (for instance in cases where such termination is undertaken for criminological or embryopathic reasons), are all contracts intended to reach a legally permissible objective. If there are no qualms about the legal validity of a contract for sterilisation (see this Division BGHZ 67, 48 [51 et seq.] and NJW 1984, 2625), there should, a fortiori, be none in cases like the present. The plaintiffs' intended to have a second, but not as handicapped child as their first, and in order to prevent the damage feared as a result of the first child's handicap, they wished to make procreation dependant on the outcome of a consultation. Such intentions cannot meet with moral qualms. Such behaviour is due to a high degree of parental responsibility.

Where a contract is geared to reaching a legally permitted aim, i.e. the birth of a child (in this case potentially genetically impaired), the doctor is responsible for obtaining the contractually agreed aim by fulfilling his accepted duties. The Division cannot see any constitutional doubts. In the cited decision, the BVerfG in its reasons expressly points out that faulty performance of medical duties in respect of treatment or advice can in principle lead to civil liability. The constitutional and general legality of contracts such as the ones described above is reflected in the contents of these contracts in so far as they are geared to prevent economic burdens incurred from the birth of children. Where this was properly contractually agreed, such economic protection is part of the duties which the doctor accepted and the legal order condones. Thus, this Division adheres to its previously reasoned opinion that the doctor's liability includes liability for the prevention of this economic consequence where, as part of the specific aims of the contract for treatment and consultation, he had also accepted that of the prevention of such losses. This Division has affirmed this result for cases of sterilisation for reasons of family planning (BGHZ 76, 249 [256]; 76, 259 [263 et seq.]; NJW 1981, 630; NJW 1981, 2002 and NJW 1984, 2625). In a case similar to this one, where during pregnancy a consultation took place aimed at preventing the birth of a severely disabled child, this Division (BGHZ 89, 95 [104 et seq.]) held that even in such cases the prevention of economic burdens is part of the protection envisaged by the consultancy contract, even where this is not its paramount reason, as in cases of sterilisation for economic reasons.

Where in the course of such contracts the doctor commits a medical error leading to the birth of a child, his liability includes his duty to reimburse the contractual partner for all economic losses which the contract was intended to prevent. Accepting a medical duty aimed at attaining a permitted contractual purpose makes the doctor legally responsible and has consequences for his liability. In the last instance the protection afforded to the contractual partner, which stems from the doctor's liability, is a consequence of medical progress which, within the boundaries of the law, opened up the possibility of preventing the birth of a child.

(bb) Given these facts, it would be a grave incursion into the parties' contractual interests if the doctor were free from consequential liability in cases of culpable breach of contractual duties. Even when considering the BVerfG's opinion, this Division cannot detect any constitutionally-based reason why such a grave incursion into contractual liability is needed. Here, protection of a nasciturus from abortion is not at issue. This point of view is also obviously not the starting point of the BVerfG's criticisms, which are directed, without differentiation, at this Division's jurisdictional principles. Nor can an opposing constitutional reason be derived from the view that the economic burden which must be borne by the doctor as a result of his breach of contract actually consists of the costs of living of a child.

(i) This Division shares the views underlying the reasoning of the BVerfG in its decision of 28 May 1993 (NJW 1993, 1751 et seq.) that it is constitutionally prohibited (Article 1 GG) to classify the very existence of a child as damage, even within the laws of contract and tort. This Division has repeatedly expressed this view (BGHZ 76, 249 [253 et seq.]; NJW 1984, 2625).

But in its leading decision (BGHZ 76, 249) this Division has already pointed out that to use the slogan "child as damage" is an inappropriate and legally useless way of looking at the problem. Instead, the Court in this and later decisions, especially in its decision of 19 June 1984 (NJW 1984, 2625) declared that the damage consists of the costs of maintenance incurred by the unplanned birth of the child. The Court held that in this respect the distinction between the child's existence and its undoubted value as a person on the one hand, and the parents' maintenance burden on the other, does not represent an artificial disintegration or a "dissection of the child's personal integrity" (see for instance Lankers in FamRZ 1969, 384), but is rather a logical consequence of looking at the problem from the point of view of the law of damages. In order to reach the consequences of the law of damages here under discussion, neither the legal provisions of the law of damages nor those of family law, nor an unrestrained contemplation of the entire facts, require that the very existence of the child is seen as the damaging event. It is only the ensuing financial burden to the parents, i.e. the cost of maintaining the child, which represents the damaging economic loss. The provisions on liability do not exonerate the parents from their own duty to provide maintenance for their child. Their own duty to the child and their costs in maintaining the child are only partially met by the doctor's liability.

(ii) According to the opinion of this Division, considerations of liability and damage are not precluded by the fact that the economic burden takes the form of maintenance for a child. The legally necessary comparison of the economic situation with and without the damaging event does not mean that the child's existence and its non-existence are compared in the sense that the child's non-existence is regarded as a positive and its actual existence as a negative economic factor. This point of view would certainly meet with constitutional objections under Article 1 GG. But such a comparison would also be wrong under the law of damages. When the considerations of liability and damage are solely restricted to the economic side of the complex facts which the birth of a child involves, the conclusion is reached that for the person liable to provide maintenance, the comparison of the two economic situations needed to determine the actual loss merely comprises the economic situation with and without the duty to provide such maintenance.

In this respect, the Division is aware that the economic burden is only brought about by the child's existence. But this is merely a causal link provided by natural science, which in itself is free from value judgments. Even in the case of a "longed-for child", the parents' duty to provide maintenance is expressed as a burden on their finances without any negative consequence for the relationship between the parents and the child. Moreover, even in cases where the BVerfG has expressly acknowledged the duty to compensate for losses incurred in connection with the birth of a child, the birth must be seen as the “source of loss” intended by the BVerfG, if this expression has any relevance at all to the law of damages (for the different view held by Deutsch, see NJW, 1993, 2361 [2362]). This Division has also contemplated whether in consultancy cases such as this one or in cases of failed family planning, it could, for constitutional reasons, be necessary to acknowledge a claim to fair monetary compensation for immaterial damages on the basis of breach of the parents’ personal rights, as has been considered in academic literature (see Diederichsen, VersR, 1981, 693 [696]; Stürner VersR 1984, 305 and FamRZ 1985, 753 [760 et seq.]; H. Lange, Schadensersatz, 2. edn., section 6 IX 7h). However, this point of view does not dispense with a comparison with the situation had the child not been born. A classification as immaterial damage to its parents would have a more direct and graver effect on the child as a person than the ascertainment of the parents’ economic burden for which the doctor must (partially) relieve them. Moreover, as regards questions of liability, such a stance seems rather dubious, since the economic burden arising from the birth of the child would indirectly affect the calculation of compensation, since under this legal concept (damages for pain and suffering) compensation for economic losses is not possible. The differences between economic and immaterial losses would be blurred.

(c) In cases where the burden of the costs of living was meant to be prevented through a contract with a doctor, an economic approach in assessing the burden does not negatively affect the views of the value of the child’s person and existence. According to the compensatory nature of the law of liability and damages, the doctor’s share of the economic burden is reduced to a mere financial obligation which neither taints the child nor questions its right to live. Neither the law nor the practice on damage and compensation links the term “damage” to such negative value judgements; if this were the case it would necessarily be prohibited to classify the birth of a child as damage. The classification of maintenance costs as losses in the relationship between parents and doctor means, however, neither that a value judgment is made in respect of the child nor that its personality is degraded by connection with the term “damage”. According to the opinion of this Division, the term “damage” does not include such connotations which, in the light of the Constitution, would in any case be objectionable. When the BGB was enacted, the legislator deliberately refrained from clearly defining the terms “financial and economic losses” and instead left their interpretation to jurisprudence and the courts. From the very beginning the courts interpreted economic losses as the diminution of assets and the increase of debts, calculated by way of a mathematical comparison between the economic situation brought about by the damaging event and the situation which would have existed had the event never occurred (Großer Senat für Zivilsachen BGHZ 98, 212 [217 et seq.]). This method of calculating the difference through a neutral mathematical operation cannot, however, dispense with an assessment of the various mathematical positions to be employed when calculating the difference; these need to be evaluated according to the protective purpose of all liability and the compensatory function of damages (BGHZ 98, 212 [217 et seq.]) But where a contract with a doctor was intended to prevent the parents being burdened with maintenance costs, and this burden is incurred as a direct result of a breach of contract, the protective purpose of the contract and the purpose of damages as equalisation of burdens demand that it be seen as economic loss. The fact that this balancing of losses cannot result in a “negative value judgement” of the child as a person follows from the above-outlined restriction of the assessment of losses to the economic aspect of the facts of the case. Nor does this comparison under the law of damages between the two economic situations reduce the human existence in a degrading manner to a mere item of accounting and balancing. The comparison is merely the basically value-free method of calculating economic consequences on which the law of damages always relies and whose classification as a mere tool for establishing facts affects the meaning of term “loss”. This is the ultimate purpose of the law of damages; to compare economic situations and to provide economically expressed differences for the purposes of the law of liability which then establishes who is responsible for the creation of the burden and to whom it must accordingly be attributed. This function of the law of damages does not involve a negative value judgement of the economic difference as “loss”. If compensation is nowadays understood as a just allocation of burdens according to the various criteria of liability, and not as a sanction for damaging behaviour, this Division sees no reason why the classification of maintenance costs as “loss” should be detrimental to the honour of the child.

This Division is rather of the opinion that, especially in cases such as this, granting compensation not only has no detrimental effect on the child, but can rather be beneficial to it, since it improves its financial situation and possibly even its standing within the family. The shifting of the maintenance burden to the attending doctor appears especially satisfactory where, due to his faulty consultation, he is co-responsible for the economic burden which, if a severely handicapped child is in constant need of care, can even threaten the family’s existence. As this Division has previously stated (BGHZ 76, 259 [266 et seq.]), even in cases where the doctor is fully liable for all extra expenditure calculated by means of an economic comparison, the parents are still burdened with the total personal care of the child and also with a certain amount of financial losses and sacrifices which they cannot transfer to the person who created the damage. The Court fails to detect any constitutionally objectionable attack on the honour of the child from this partial economic alleviation of the parents’ burden. Should the parents in fact treat the child badly because they blame it for the additional maintenance costs, such behaviour would not be improved by the legal order refusing to shift some of the burden to the person who, by his breach of contract, created it. . . .

4. As regards consultancy contracts of the kind here under investigation, the compensatory purpose of damages prohibits a restriction of the claim for damages to the amount of extra expenditure incurred by reason the child’s congenital handicap . . .

(b) As this Division has previously stated, a doctor who culpably breaches his duty to provide a proper consultation, and who is therefore liable for maintenance costs, must, within the limits set out by this Division, pay compensation for the entire maintenance costs of the child and not only for the additional expenditure caused by the handicap. After a further review, the Court has decided to uphold its previous opinion even for cases such as the present. As far as liability is concerned, there are no grave differences between the two cases of consultancy. In both instances the parents required medical advice in order not to give birth to a congenitally damaged child. If, in view of the risk of having a second handicapped child, they intended to forego a second pregnancy if the doctor advised them in that direction, it is clear that they would not have given birth to the child had they been correctly advised. According to the parties’ intentions, the scope of protection afforded by a consultancy contract always includes those losses arising from financial expenditure on severely handicapped children which the parents intended to prevent, for themselves and the child, by consulting a doctor. As this Division stated in its decision (BGHZ 89, 95 [105]), these maintenance costs cannot be split into those which are legally expected to be incurred by parents of a (hypothetically healthy) child and the additional costs which stem from the child's handicap. The necessary expenditure for safeguarding the existence of a severely handicapped child is indivisible. Moreover, this Division is of the opinion that it is irreconcilable with the respect for the child's person in the sense of Article 1 I GG to measure its existence and the various corresponding needs by using the yardstick of a “normal” child. Compensating the parents for the entire costs of maintenance is thus no disregard of the child's honour but rather an appropriate means of protecting it from losses, and of guaranteeing such protection.

Case 9

BUNDESVERFASSUNGSGERICHT (FIRST SENATE) 12 NOVEMBER 1997
BVERFGE 96, 375 = NJW 1998, 519 = JZ 1998, 352

The constitutional complaints are dismissed.

Reasons

A.

The constitutional complaints, joined together for a joint decision, concern the case law of the civil courts, according to which the duty to maintain a child in the case of unsuccessful sterilisation or defective genetic advice can constitute a loss which has to be compensated.

I.

Case 1 BvR 479/92

1. The complainant is a practising urologist. He advised the husband of the claimant in the original proceedings on questions of family planning and carried out on him a medical operation for the purpose of sterilisation. The sterilisation was unsuccessful and the patient was not told of this. His wife gave birth in May 1984 to their fourth son. The complainant and his liability insurer refused claims for compensation for loss.

2. a) In the original proceedings the wife asked for compensation for maintenance expenditure for the child as well as compensation for pain and suffering because of the unwanted pregnancy and the birth of the child.

The Landgericht ordered the complainant to provide the basic maintenance which would be payable for illegitimate children and to pay a supplement of 70 percent of that basic maintenance for expenditure on care. As the mother had sued alone, only half of the total maintenance expenditure to be paid was awarded to her, in accordance with the legal concept expressed in § 1360 sentence 2 and § 1606 (3) sentence 2 of the BGB. Besides this, the Landgericht held compensation for pain and suffering in the sum of DM 6000 to be appropriate.

II.

Case 1 BvR 307/94

1. The first and second claimants in the original proceedings are the parents of a daughter who was born in 1982 and was mentally and physically handicapped from birth onwards. Because they feared a genetic disposition to the procreation of handicapped children, in August 1983 they visited the department for clinical genetics of a university institute, which was at that time headed by the complainant, to have the risk of hereditary diseases clarified before deciding to have a further child. The complainant signed a doctor's letter a copy of which was shown to the two claimants. According to this, a hereditary disorder was extremely unlikely; the couple need not be advised against a further pregnancy. In March 1985, a second daughter was born with the same mental and physical handicaps as her sister.

2. (a) The Landgericht dismissed the claim to compensation for maintenance (by the parents) as well as the claim to damages for pain and suffering (by the mother and the handicapped daughter) on the basis that the claimants had not succeeded in proving that the advice given was in breach of duty.

(b) The Oberlandesgericht awarded the parents on their appeal compensation for the material harm which had arisen and would arise for them in the future from the total expenditure on maintenance for the handicapped child. It granted to the mother damages for pain and suffering in addition to this. It refused claims by the child herself.

(c) The child withdrew the appeal in law which had originally been submitted. The appeal in law by the complainant was only accepted and referred back by the Bundesgerichtshof in relation to the contractual liability for compensation for harm (reference omitted).

In the grounds, it states as follows. The Senate adheres to its case law that a doctor's contractual liability can include expenditure on maintenance of a child. This case law was applicable to the case of defective genetic advice before the conception of a child. It was true that the Second Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court in its judgment of the 28 May 1993 in the 14th paragraph of the summary, as well as under D V 6 of the reasons, (reference omitted) raised doubts about this point. Even if no binding effect is to be attributed to these statements and although the Senate has subjected its case law to critical examination on several occasions, they do however make a further detailed scrutiny of the legal situation necessary. The Senate cannot however infer from this reference by the Federal Constitutional Court any reasoning which would prevent adjudging maintenance expenses to be loss in the present case.

III.

The Second Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court has expressed itself in the form of a decision of the 22 October 1997 on the present case. The majority was of the opinion that the legal view expressed in [reference omitted] to the effect that it was not permissible on constitutional grounds (Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law) to see the duty to maintain a child as loss was a legal view fundamental to the decision of the Senate. Further, the majority took the view that the deciding of the preliminary question of whether a legal view was of fundamental importance ought to be by a plenary session of the Court if the Senate which expressed the legal view stated that it was of fundamental importance, whilst the other Senate held it not to be fundamental.

An inquiry under § 48 (2) of the Standing Orders of the Federal Constitutional Court by the First Senate has not taken place.

B.

The constitutional complaints are unfounded. The decisions under challenge do not exceed the boundaries which are set constitutionally for the development of the law by judicial decisions (I). They also do not in their material content violate the basic rights (II).

I.

The decisions under challenge by which the complainants have been ordered to pay compensation for harm and for pain and suffering adhere to the principle that the judge is bound by statute and law, so a violation of the basic rights from this point of view is eliminated.

1. The provisions of the civil law of contract and tort which form the basis of the judgment (in particular §§ 611, 276 and 249 as well as §§ 823 (1) and 847 of the BGB) do not meet with any doubts in constitutional law. They have always served the judge as a sufficiently definite basis for deciding questions of liability.

2. The interpretation of these provisions by the civil courts does not overstep the boundaries of the judges' authority to make decisions, which arises from Article 20 paras. 2 and 3 of the Basic Law.

a) The interpretation of simple statute law (inclusive of the choice of the method to be used in this connection) is a matter for the specialist courts and not to be investigated by the Federal Constitutional Court as to its correctness. The Federal Constitutional Court only has to ensure that the requirements of the Basic Law are observed in this respect.

Article 20 para. 2 of the Basic Law gives expression to the principle of separation of powers. Even if this principle was not formulated in the Basic Law in the sense of strict division of functions and monopoly of each power by a single organ (references omitted), it in any case excludes the courts from claiming powers which have been conferred unambiguously on the legislator by the Constitution (references omitted). Article 20 para. 3 of the Basic Law binds the judiciary to statute and law. It would be incompatible with this if the courts progressed from the role of applying of norms to that of setting norms and thus, from an objective point of view escaped from being bound by law and statute (references omitted).

These constitutional principles admittedly do not prohibit the judge from developing the law. On the contrary, in the face of accelerated change in social relations and the limited possibilities of reaction by the legislator, as well as the open formulation of numerous norms, the adoption of applicable law to changed circumstances is part of the tasks of the third power [ie the judiciary]. That applies especially as the distance in time between the statutory command and the judicial decision in the individual case increases. The Federal Constitutional Court has made this point with regard to the Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch (reference omitted).

The judge certainly cannot escape here from the meaning and purpose of the statute laid down by the legislator. His task is limited to bringing it into effect in the most reliable way under changed conditions. If, in the changed conditions, new possibilities of action or influence are created by scientific and technical progress, finding the law will as a rule consist of widening of the field of application of an interpretation which is already current. The legislator's prerogative of setting the purpose is not generally affected by this.

As the development of the law affects the ordinary law, answering the question of whether and to what extent changed circumstances require new legal answers is likewise incumbent on the specialist courts. The Federal Constitutional Court is not therefore in principle allowed to replace their assessment by its own. Its control is limited from the point of view of Article 20 of the Basic Law to whether the specialist court, in developing the law, has respected the basic statutory decision and has followed the recognised methods of statutory interpretation.

b) The decisions under challenge satisfy this standard in relation to contractual liability for the maintenance of children as well as with reference to compensation for pain and suffering because of a pregnancy and birth which have occurred contrary to the woman's intention.

In relation to contractual liability the decisions under challenge are based on the conventional understanding of financial harm, according to which, in principle, duties to maintain can be seen as harm in the sense of § 249 of the BGB. The decisions are also based on the ascertaining of harm according to the "difference" method. The Bundesgerichtshof measures contractual liability by contractual purpose—avoidance of conception and birth of a legitimate child on economic grounds as well—and limits the area of protection of the contract to the marriage partner. The decisions rest on the principles on general contractual liability which have been developed over a long period, and which have been extended to new cases of medical professional activity. Whether a development of the case law on compensation for harm would have been possible in another direction needs no discussion here, as the Federal Constitutional Court does not in principle have to test questions of civil law doctrine in the ordinary law sphere. It corresponds in any case to the consequence of medical liability law as developed over a long period that, in cases of the present kind, the civil law has sought to give appropriate answers to new possibilities of influence and direction in reproductive medicine. It cannot be raised as an objection to this that the Bundesgerichtshof has, in laying down the scope of the duty to compensate for harm, held that limitations on the development of the law are necessary. The Bundesgerichtshof has, in its case law, restricted the liability of doctors in the light of value decisions at the point where problems of compensation law and family law meet. That does not call in question the route to ascertainment of harm.

The boundaries of judicial discovery of law are also not exceeded by the decisions giving to women who did not want to be pregnant damages for pain and suffering for the pain associated with pregnancy and delivery. The objection that this is an impermissible widening of § 253 of the BGB does not sufficiently take into consideration the fact that § 847 of the BGB expressly permits monetary compensation for non-material harm. The Bundesgerichtshof is keeping within the framework of conventional civil law doctrine when as it assesses an undesired pregnancy as a substantial unauthorised invasion of physical integrity and therefore as physical injury.

II.

The decisions, which are made by permissible judicial interpretation and development of the law, are also reconcilable with the Basic Law in their material content.

The subject matter of the examination here is the interpretation of norms which are not open to objection in constitutional law and the outcome and basis of the discovery of law by civil court decisions. The complainants object to the fact that they should have to be liable for the maintenance of a child when they have not fulfilled their contractual duties in relation to sterilisation and a child comes into the world as a result; or when, as a consequence of defective genetic advice, parents refrain from a form of contraception which they would otherwise have chosen and a disabled child is conceived and born.

According to their view, for constitutional reasons, neither the duty of the parents to maintain ought to be understood as harm in the sense of contract law, nor the pains associated with pregnancy and birth as harm in the sense of tort law.

1 . . .

2. The decisions to be examined are likewise not to be measured against the basic right of freedom of vocation under Article 12 para. 1 of the Basic Law. The civil law consequences of defective performance of contracts and liability for harm which arises from tort arise independently of whether the prerequisites for liability in the exercise of the profession are fulfilled or not. Neither the underlying norms of civil law nor their application in the original proceedings concern sanctions specific to a profession. The duty to provide compensation for harm can in any event have indirect effects on the exercise of professional activity as it emphatically underlines the expectation of careful fulfilment of the contract whilst observing professional standards; and it also has an effect on the scope of the required liability insurance. Contract law and tort law are not however norms which only concern in marginal areas those who not acting professionally and which therefore have a close relationship with the exercise of a profession. Objectively they have no tendency to regulate professions (references omitted).

3. There accordingly remains, as a standard for testing the imposition of requirements to pay money, the general freedom of action which is protected in Article 2 para. 1 of the Basic Law. The basic right is admittedly only guaranteed within the framework of the constitutional order. All the legal norms which are formally and materially compatible with the Basic Law are included in this. Article 2 para. 1 of the Basic Law is violated if, in the interpretation and application of such norms, objective constitutional law is contravened. In this connection, it can remain undecided here how far Article 2 para. 1 of the Basic Law, in its character as guarantee of the general freedom of action, enables a complainant to rely on the violation of objective constitutional law where the protective purpose of the concrete basic right norm cannot be attached to him unambiguously (references omitted); this purpose is rather intended to protect the legal position of the successful opponent in the original proceedings. This is because the complainants complain of a violation of Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law and therefore of a fundamental principle of the Constitution and the chief basic value of the free democratic basic order (references omitted). Whether the complainants could complain of a violation of Article 6 paras. 1 or 2 of the Basic Law needs no final examination because these provision have no independent weight here as against Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law.

(a) The answer to questions of value in civil law is influenced by the objective decisions of principle which are expressed in the catalogue of basic rights in the Constitution. The specialist courts are accordingly under a duty on constitutional grounds to have regard to the basic rights as “guidelines” in the interpretation and application of civil law provisions. Just as with the interpretation of general clauses, special consideration must be taken of the constitutional law basic decisions in development of the law. If the courts overlook or misjudge their radiation effect in a decision in an actual case, they as exercisers of public power violate the basic rights of the party thereby affected (references omitted). A power of control (limited, though, to questions of constitutional law) arises from this for the Federal Constitutional Court. It only concerns mistakes in interpretation which reveal a fundamentally incorrect view of the meaning of a basic right, especially of the extent of its area of protection, and are also of some weight in their material scope (references omitted).

In this constitutional control of civil court judgments, it ought also to be borne in mind here that the protective content of the basic rights can also be required to be put into the balancing process on the side of the person who benefits from the decisions under challenge. In this case it is a question of the point where medical responsibility and the family sphere meet. When the further development of medicine facilitates medical assistance in the extremely private sphere of conception, for which the sexual partners are independently responsible, the tortious and contractual liability law of the Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch acquires in particular the function of safeguarding the personality rights of parent and child thereby endangered, the physical integrity of the wife and the personal right of self-determination of the parents. The detailed balancing of conflicting interests here is left to the judiciary, insofar as existing liability law is open to such a development. It ought to be borne in mind here that the married couple would unilaterally carry the risk of a medical mistake if culpable medical treatment remained to a large extent without sanction in this area.

(b) The Bundesgerichtshof has taken sufficient account of the radiation effect of Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law in the shaping of the conditions for liability.

(1) A human being's social value and claim to respect, which prevents him or her being made a mere pawn of the state or exposed to treatment which in principle puts his or her quality in question, is connected with human dignity as the highest value in the Basic Law and a fundamental constitution principle (references omitted). It is inherent in each human being without regard to his or her qualities, achievements and social status. The worth and claim to respect which arises from it is capable of being violated (reference omitted). What respect for human dignity requires in detail cannot be completely detached from the social circumstances of the time (reference omitted). A violation of the claim to respect can exist not only in humiliating, denouncing, persecuting or ostracising people (reference omitted) but also in commercialising human existence.

(2) The decisions under challenge do not contain any mistake which is relevant here.

That applies first of all to the assumption that sterilisation and genetic advice before the conception of a child are to be approved by the legal order and are legitimate. Further, the assumption that a doctor who undertakes such tasks under a contract must take responsibility for culpable mistakes is not open to doubt. The case law of the Bundesgerichtshof that the duty to maintain a child on the facts to be assessed here is to be seen as loss does not represent commercialisation which robs the child of its personal worth. The liability structure of civil law does not in principle affect human dignity, even where a claim to compensation for harm is directly linked to the existence of a human being. Human beings are not thereby reduced to objects i.e. replaceable quantities within the framework of contractual or tortious relationships. The civil law provisions and their interpretation by case law are planned on a just division of burdens. They do not result in fundamental areas of personality being commercialised. The application of the law of compensation for harm to personal relationships does not turn the human being as a person or his inalienable rights into a commodity. No more does the—partial—transfer of the burden of maintenance to third parties contain a negative value judgement against the particular person entitled to maintenance.

The personal recognition of a child does not rest on the acceptance of duties of maintenance by the parents. Even according to civil law, the existence of a child is only one of the defining conditions for the burden of maintenance arising under §§ 1601 ff. of the BGB. Not every child needs maintenance (§ 1602 (2) of the BGB). The duty of maintenance and parenthood can separate (references omitted). A full duty to maintain does not follow the adoption of children who have only lost one parent (§ 1755 (1) sentence 2 of the BGB in combination with § 48 (6) of the Social Code VI). Even the Reichsgericht differentiated between the existence of a child, which was not seen as loss, and the duty to maintain applying to the father which was classified as financial loss for him (reference omitted). The Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch forms the basis of relationships in compensation law between the members of a family under a duty to maintain and a person causing harm, without any debasing or objectification of the person entitled to maintenance being expressed thereby (§ 844 (2) in combination with § 843 (4) of the BGB). The same concept of compensation is taken up in numerous modern statutes on product, environmental and traffic liability (reference omitted). The inclusion of the foetus in accident insurance also presupposes that the dignity of the child is not violated by the persons under a duty to maintain it receiving a partial release (reference omitted).

No decision has to be made on what form of compensation for harm would be better to bring it into harmony with civil law doctrine. The Bundesgerichtshof has chosen the route of contractual liability for material harm, and not that of compensation for non-material harm, which it also considered. It has taken into account here that determination of harm by the “difference” method, as well as fair indemnification in money for the harm which arose though the unwanted conception, do not relieve the court from comparing the situations in life of parents with or without a child. It is only of importance in constitutional law that the division of burdens which the Bundesgerichtshof seeks to achieve, having regard to the statutory duties of maintenance accruing to the parents, does not violate Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law.

It is also not the task of the Federal Constitutional Court to examine the arguments of the Bundesgerichtshof in all their details. They are not inconsistent with Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law. The doctors ordered to pay compensation have freely undertaken contractual duties which are not disapproved of by the legal order. Medical assistance in family planning through sterilisation or advice about genetic risks before the conception of a child do not affect Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law. If such advice conflicts with the personal ethical convictions of a doctor, he can refrain from concluding a contract; defective performance of a contractual duty willingly undertaken can find no justification here.

Insofar as doctors are active in this area, their specialist medical competence is in the service of responsible parents, if the parents do not want to have further children because they wish to protect economically children already born or because they are concerned about being overtaxed (here, by the birth of a second severely disabled child). Civil law liability for defective performance can, in cases of this kind, increase the parents’ acceptance of the children who are nevertheless born and accepted into the family, as the Bundesgerichtshof has plausibly explained.

The arguments presented by the constitutional complaints that the case law of the Bundesgerichtshof contradicts the system of maintenance in family law, or that the child could be threatened with psychological harm if it heard that its conception should have been avoided, do not affect the basic concepts of Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law. In this respect it is claimed that financial relief for the parents does not prevent different losses in view of the complexity of family relationships. That concerns questions of civil law appraisal which the Bundesgerichtshof has tackled in detail.

In the original proceedings it was a question of children to whom the parents have committed themselves after conception. Thwarted family planning, which has been used here by the Bundesgerichtshof as a basis of liability, can become known to children in many ways. Whether harm is produced by this does not depend on economic relief for the parents but on the parent-child relationship after birth. The claim for compensation for harm which has been allowed does not assume any alienation from the child (references omitted). There is also no fear that the judgments under challenge could give rise to or reinforce a negative attitude of the parties against the unplanned life which has been conceived. It cannot be assumed that doctors will advise abortion contrary to their ethical conceptions only because of the threatened liability or its effect on their professional liability insurance. It is even less likely that parents, because of the economic burdens from a further or a disabled child, would decide against the child, if relief is granted to them in this respect. The Bundesgerichtshof excludes any duty to reduce harm by means of an abortion. From the point of view of the parents, the case law under challenge here gives effect instead to the necessary protection against risks which are threatened for the parents' rights of personality and self-determination within the framework of planned parenthood as a result of medical involvement in sterilisation or genetic advice.

C.

The above judgment does not, in view of the decision of the Second Senate of the 28 May 1993 (reference omitted), require the calling of a plenary session of the Federal Constitutional Court. The prerequisites of § 16 of the Federal Constitutional Court Act and of § 48 para. 1 of the Standing Orders of the Federal Constitutional Court are not present. (However, see the decision of the Second Senate of the Federal Constitutional Court of the 22 October 1997.)

D.

The decision is made as to section B by 6 votes to 2 and as to section C by 5 votes to 3.

Notes to Cases 6–9

1. Case 6 is an important decision both for the purposes of teaching and applying the comparative law method and for the substantive issues it raises. As far as the first is concerned two things must be noted. First is the German, indeed civil law, tendency to turn to contract rather than tort when trying to solve a new problem. Thus, almost half of the judgment deals with claims based on contract rather than tort—something, which clearly does not happen in the Anglo-American equivalents. The approach adopted by the BGH is to ask whether there was a contractual duty to protect the mother against the economic burden resulting from the maintenance of the child. (See, for a more recent illustration, BGH NJW 2000, 1782). Secondly this, as far as one can tell, is one of a handful of decisions of the German Supreme Court which have made an open allusion to a foreign system. (The other decisions are reproduced in English as nos. 88 and 130, below.) Unlike decision 130, however, which looked at the much more “similar” Swiss law, the present decision, as well as decision 88, refer to the more “different” Common law. In the present context this means Curlender v. Bio-Science Laboratories, 106 Cal. App. 3d 811, 165 Cal. Rptr. 477 (1980) and McKay v. Essex Health Authority and Another [1982] 2 WLR 890. The “suspicion” of the German court towards the Common law is evidenced by its cursory statement that the foreign judgments are “of limited relevance [since] they are based on different laws”. This is a surprising statement, not only because the German court admits that the problem of “wrongful life” is novel to German law and, therefore, one would have thought that inspiration from foreign system should have, at least, been permissible. It is also odd given that the German reasoning in the tort section of the judgment reveals similarities with the philosophical opinions expressed by the Anglo-American decisions which we must assume were known to the German judges. One should, perhaps, add that in such cases, it is primarily for counsel to notify national courts of foreign decisions and to press the analogies where such exist and can be of use to the development of national law. (On the impact of foreign and comparative law on German case-law see Drobnig, RabelsZ 50 (1986) 610 ff. and nn. 48–9 on p. 621 and, more recently, Kötz, “Der Bundesgerichtshof und die Rechtsvergleichung” 50 Jahre Bundesgerichtshof (2000).)

2. The issue of substance raised by the German decision has proved controversial in that country as it has in the USA. The decision of the Second Division of the Constitutional Court (BVerfGE 88, 203 = NJW 1993, 1751 “second abortion” case)—known for its conservative tendencies—thus echoes the doubts expressed in the USA by those who sympathise with the pro-life position. Some (lower) courts immediately heeded the advice of the Constitutional Court to reconsider the question of civil damages and took a similar, conservative stance on the issue. (Thus, LG Düsseldorf 2 December 1993, NJW 1994, 805, refusing to follow the BGH decision of 16 November 1993, NJW 1994, 788, decided only a fortnight earlier. Likewise, OLG Zweibrücken, 18 February 1997, NJW—RR 1997, 666). In some instances, they were able to do this on the technical argument that the case before them involved a maintenance claims for a healthy child (whereas the BGH decision of 16 November had been concerned with the claims of the parents of an impaired child). But other courts refused to accept this as a valid distinction and abided by the more liberal position that awarded full maintenance costs to the parents. (OLG Düsseldorf, 15 December 1994, NJW 1995, 788.) In this steadfastness, these courts found an ally in the BGH. For this court not only had bypassed skilfully the Constitutional Court by drawing a distinction between the “existence of the child” and “the obligation to maintain it” (BGH 16 November 1993, NJW 1994, 788, case 8); it had also been quick to reaffirm its views in a quick succession of judgments. (For instance, BGH 23 March 1995, NJW 1995, 1609, case 10.) The subsequent and most recent decision of the First Division of the Constitutional Court (BVerfG, 12 November 1997, BVerfGE 96, 375 = NJW 1998, 519, case 9)—which, unlike the Second Division, is known for its liberal tendencies—has broadly followed the line of the BGH. And the decision not to refer to the Plenum of the Court the dispute between its two rivalling Divisions (BVerfG, 22 November 1997, NJW 1998, 523) suggests that the status quo is unlikely to be disturbed in the near future. The position in private law thus seems to have settled in the following way. (i) Both parents have a contractual claim for wrongful birth and pregnancy cases; (ii) this entitles them to full maintenance costs (whether the child is healthy or not; if it is not the measure of damages may be greater to cover the extraordinary medical expenses); (iii) the mother may additionally claim pain and suffering in cases of wrongful birth that result from a complicated birth. In all these actions, the child, itself, had no claims.

Before leaving this point one must note the unsatisfactory result of the same issue being decided by two different senates of the Court each of which is effectively an independent court, each with its own philosophical orientation and traditions. This unsatisfactory result is due to the fact that, for historical reasons, constitutional complaints (Verfassungsbeschwerde) are usually heard by the First Chamber whereas the so-called Normenkontrolle, reserved for the review of legislation, is mainly carried out by the Second Chamber.

3. The position in the USA is well discussed in all the American textbooks. See, for instance, Franklin and Rabin, 257 ff. Prosser, Wade and Schwartz, 472–5. for England see Mason and McCall, Law and Medical Ethics 4th edn. (1994); Markesinis and Deakin, Tort Law, 273 ff. Here then a few general points will suffice.

First, a point of terminology. “Wrongful birth” and “wrongful life”, as terms go, are unfortunate. As an American court noted: “Any ‘wrongfulness’ lies not in the life, the birth, the conception, or the pregnancy, but in the negligence of the physician. The harm, if any, is not the birth itself but the effect of the defendant’s negligence on the [parents] resulting from the denial to the parents of their right . . . to decide whether to bear a child or whether to bear a child with a genetic or other defect” (Viccaro v. Milunsky, 406 Mass. 777; 551 NE 2d 10 n. 3.) The various terms are also not used consistently in the American periodical literature and this can lead to confusion. It is too late to alter existing terminological practice, however unfortunate it may be; but in order to minimise confusion we have, at the end of this section, provided a glossary of how we think the terms should be understood. The German term “ungewolte Schwangerschaft”—unwanted pregnancy—suffers from no similar defects. However, in its neutrality it could be said to be too opaque in so far as it gives no hint whether the pregnancy was always not wanted or subsequently became so. Related to these question, is another namely, does it involve a healthy or unhealthy child—a point once taken by some courts but nowadays one that may have lost its significance. It is a weakness shared by most German textbooks that they leave these points (mostly) open and that the brevity of the treatment given to this subject leaves the student unaware how the contradictory German cases can be made to dovetail with one another. (Professor Peter Schlechtriem, who has one of the more jurisprudentially oriented accounts, devotes in his learned textbook a mere twenty-five lines. (Schuldrecht, Besonderer Teil, 5th edn. 1998, no 747. Another famous student textbook—Medicus, Bürgerliches Recht, 18th edn. 1999—ignores the subject altogether.)

Secondly, we must note that here the movement of ideas is from America to Europe and not the other way round. (See the judgments in McKay, above, and Udale v. Bloomsbury Area Health Authority [1983] 1 WLR 1098.) Though the imitation in Europe is obvious (and likely to increase as more European lawyers follow graduate law courses in the USA) it is not slavish. Thus, when noting the differences that exist between American and German law, one must also be ready to seek explanations for them in the wider context of each system. Thus, the Procanik decision (reprinted below) to grant the plaintiff boy “special” damages appears to be more generous than the German which denies them to him. Yet the difference is more apparent than real if one remembers that in German law the parental maintenance does not cease (as it does in most American jurisdictions) upon the child attaining majority. But if the different German law of maintenance helps minimise the differences between Case no. 6 and Procanik, it does not completely eliminate them. We get a clue of this towards the end of the German judgment where the court, itself, accepts that its solution to grant the parents special damages may not be enough “once the duty to maintain [the child] comes to an end, as for instance, when they die”. Here, as stated, the American solution appears if not preferable certainly more generous to the child; that is until one notes the way the German court completes the above-mentioned thought. “In all these cases” says the court “a fateful development takes place . . . and the effects of which must be made good by the community within the bounds of the possible.” An admission here, that the social security net (effectively absent in the USA) will thus take over, but also a very important explanation for the fact that American tort law is so often more generous than its European counterparts. For social security will provide only a limited relief—“within the bounds of the possible”—and will thus be less generous than the tort/damages system of compensation. So the verdict at the end of this complicated journey into the recesses of German family and social security law is that the German solution is roughly as good as the American and vice versa!

Thirdly, it is clear that the vast majority of courts—both in the USA and in Germany—have little or no difficulty in allowing parents to recover at least some elements of damage in “wrongful birth” actions. (Though in the United States, a few courts have, on a variety of policy grounds, denied altogether wrongful birth claims. See: Wilson v. Kuenzi, 751 SW 2d 741 (Mo. 1988); Azzolino v. Dingfelder, 315 N.C. 103, 337 SE 2d 528 (1985).) Note, however, that (most) American courts award mothers damages for emotional distress as well, which German courts do not. (Awarding such damages: Berman v. Allan, 80 NJ 421, 404 A. 2d 8 (1979); Keel v. Banach, 624 So. 2d 1022 (Ala. 1993); Greco v. United States, 111 Nev. 405, 893 P. 2d 345 (1995). Denying recovery for emotional harm: Siemieniec v. Lutheran General Hosp., 117 Ill. 2d 230, 512 NE 2d 691 (1987); Smith v. Cote, 128 N.H. 231, 513 A. 2d 341 (1986).) On the other hand the claim of children for what the Common law calls “general damages” in “wrongful life” actions have failed in all three systems—English, German and American—the decision of the California Court of Appeal in Curlender, above, being the boldest on this point. The issue finally came before the California Supreme Court in Turpin v. Sortini, 31 Cal. Rptr. 3d 220, 643 P. 2d 954 (1982) which disagreed with Curlender that damages for pain and suffering should be awarded to the child for being born. The Supreme Court, however, was prepared to grant the child—for the reasons given in the previous paragraph—special damages for costs connected with its handicap. (As Procanik explains clearly, these will not overlap with the damages given to the parents for the child’s maintenance.) Such a “limited recognition of a wrongful life” claim can also be found in New Jersey (Procanik v. Cillo 478 A 2d 755 (1984) and Washington (Harbeson v. Parke-Davis, Inc. 656 P. 2d 483 (1983)). Otherwise, however, it remains the exception. The significance of these three Supreme Court decisions is dubious for they could be seen as a step both forwards and backwards. Forwards in so far as they represented a move closer towards accepting in principle claims for wrongful life; backwards in that they stopped short of considering the full consequences of such a move. This ambiguity, plus a certain tendency to inflate where possible the parents’ claims, may suggest that the move towards recognising claims for wrongful life, proper, has lost most of its urgency. In the USA, this “braking trend” may have also been reinforced by the dislike of the pro-life lobbies of abortion and, by extension, the claims discussed in this section.

4. The arguments put forward against the recognition of claims for “wrongful life” are as follows. (cf. Viccaro v. Milunsky 406 Mass.777, 551 NE 2d 8 (1990). The issues here are also discussed in a note in 71 Calif. L. Rev. 1278 (1983) and in the literature given in number 8, below.)

(i) In Gleitman v. Cosgrove, 49 NJ 22, 227 A. 2d 689 (1967) the court refused to recognise claims for wrongful life on the ground that damages would be impossible to assess. One American court thus put the dilemma in the following way: “Determining damage from the birth of a child [is] an ‘exercise in prophecy’. Such a weighing process might be applied at the end of a life but not at the beginning”. (Emerson v. Magendantz, 689 A 2d 409, 413 (R.I. 1997).) This point was also taken in the McKay case, above. However, can it really be considered as decisive? Have not English courts for many years awarded damages for “loss of expectation of life” (now abolished by the Administration of Justice Act 1982)? Kaus J in Turpin v. Sortini thought otherwise when he said that “. . . there is a profound qualitative difference between the difficulties faced by a jury in assessing general damages in a normal personal injury . . . and the task before a jury in assessing general damages in a wrongful life case”? (Italics supplied.)

(ii) A second reason that is often given is that the child/plaintiff has not suffered a “legally cognisable injury”. This is often presented in philosophical terms, namely that “impaired life” is preferable to “non life”. A host of constitutional arguments, especially after Roe v. Wade, above, can be used to strengthen this point (see Berman v. Allan, 80 NJ 421, 404 A. 2d 8 (1979)). However, as Procanik v. Cillo admits, decisions such as Roe v. Wade can also improve the mother’s right to claim for wrongful birth; see also Stephenson LJ in McKay, 902). But how convincing are such arguments? In any event, why should the court decide this question and not someone else, e.g. the parents, or the plaintiff himself if and when this is possible?

(iii) McKay also tried to justify its result in terms of “duty”. True, in one sense it may be grotesque to say that a doctor owes the foetus a duty to kill it; but if such a duty can, under circumstances, be owed to the mother, why can it not be owed to the foetus? In any event, is it not true to suggest that recourse to the language of “duty of care” really conceals an unwillingness on the part of the judge to decide the real policy issues?

(iv) Alternatively, in cases with facts like those of McKay (foetus already infected by rubella; doctor negligently fails to discover it and give the mother the chance to abort) one could argue that there is “no damage”. (In this sense Weir in a critical note of the McKay decision in 41 CLJ 225, 227 (1982).) For damage is to make something worse, not to make simpliciter; and the fact is that in this case if the doctor had done his duty the child would not have been better, but she would not have been at all. Weir’s comparison of McKay with the defective premises case of Dutton v. Bognor Regis Urban DC [1972] 1 QB 373 is, in conceptual terms, interesting. But the analogy totally underestimates the human and philosophical aspects of the McKay type of case. Disapproval for the Weir “analogy” can be found in German works of authority as well. See Larenz/Canaris, p. 385; and it was, in any event, rejected by the BGH in Case no 4, above.

Overall, therefore, how do these arguments fare? It is difficult to deny that they have some strength. Equally it is impossible to accept them as conclusive. If that is so, could it be that at present the courts (and public opinion) are not (yet?) ready to cope with this problem and are merely grasping at any argument or concept that is available?

5. In part 2 of its judgment the court in Case 6 states that in this case [it] “is confronted for the first time [italics supplied] with the problem of . . . ‘wrongful life’”. This is not so, however, with claims brought by the parents—the so-called “wrongful birth” actions, which had occupied the courts before 1983 and several times since. (See, for example, BGH NJW 1984, 2625; NJW 1984, 688; NJW 1985, 2749; NJW 1985, 671 with note by Deutsch.). In fact the first such claim (brought by a distraught father against a pharmacist who negligently sold him enzymes instead of the requested contraceptives) was upheld by the Court of First Instance of Itzehoe (LG Itzehoe, FamRZ 1969, 90; VersR 69, 265. In actual fact there exists a strange case which can, probably, claim to be the first to raise the question of the cost of maintaining an unwanted child. Thus, in 1924 the Reichsgericht imposed on a mental institution the cost of maintaining an unwanted child conceived by one of its nurses who had sexual intercourse with a mentally retarded patient (RGZ 108, 87.).

6. In the US the picture is quite complicated. Generally speaking it would appear that many courts are prepared to grant parents the expenses involved in raising the child. See Annotation, 83 ALR 3d 15 (1978). Others, however, have denied recovery on the (not always convincing) ground that the benefit of having a child exceeds the cost of raising it. See Cockrum v. Baumgartner, 95 Ill. 2d 193, 447 NE 2d 385 (1983). In Hartke v. McKelway, 526 F. Supp. 97 (DDC 1981) the court held that claims for raising a healthy child born after an unsuccessful sterilisation operation would be rejected where the purpose of the sterilisation was for therapeutic and not economic reasons. On this see Einheuser in 61 University of Detroit Journal of Urban Law, 651 (1984). See also Franklin and Rabin, pp. 257–268. The questions raised by unsuccessful abortions are discussed in case 10, and its notes. This follows addendum 2 below. There, we shall also deal with the cognate problem of measure of damages given in the event of failed sterilisations. (Wrongful conception or pregnancy claims.)

American cases have, in this context, considered one further point: should the parents of a healthy child born after an unsuccessful sterilisation operation be under some kind of duty to mitigate their loss? Under the avoidance of consequences doctrine envisaged by s. 918 of the Restatement (Second) of Torts, some courts have considered the mother’s duty to abort or the parents’ duty to place the child for adoption. A few courts have taken the view (mainly in obiter) that, as a matter of law, reasonable mitigation includes abortion when pregnancy is discovered during the first trimester. See Ziembra v. Sternberg, 357 NYS 2d 265 (1974); Sorkin v. Lee 434 NYS 2d 300 (1980). Most courts, however, have taken a different view, tending to leave the issue to the jury. See Univ. of Arizona Health Sciences Center v. Superior Court, 667 P. 2d 1294, 1301 (1983). The option to place the child for adoption seems to have encountered less opposition, though in Marciniak v. Lundborg, 153 Wis. 2d 59, 450 NW 2d 243, 247 (1990) the court rejected as unreasonable “the argument that parents must select either abortion or adoption as a method of mitigation . . .”. This view has much to commend it, even though the relinquishing of the child for adoption may well produce a sound economic result. For, as Professor Dobbs has rightly pointed out, “. . . the tort [in these cases] is not exclusively an economic tort. The defendant, having deprived the mother of one choice, has no right to force upon her another choice she does not want to make.” (Dobbs, 801.) The relevant case law that has considered these unattractive and legalistic options that encourage litigation has been collected in Note, “Wrongful Birth: The Avoidance of Consequences Doctrine in Mitigation of Damages”, 53 Fordham L. Rev. 1107 (1985). The same point about mitigation could, in theory, be raised in order to reduce damages in a claim for wrongful birth brought by the parents of an impaired child.

7. When considering the points raised in this section the reader, especially the non-American reader, should bear in mind that the usually inactive (in tort matters) American legislator has, in this context, been mobilised into action by the pro-life movement. The result has been either statutes prohibiting wrongful life actions against parents (e.g. see West’s Ann. Cal. Civ. Code para.

43.6) or prohibiting wrongful life and wrongful birth actions, though (arguably in some cases) allowing wrongful pregnancy actions. (See Minn. Stat. Ann. para. 145.424.) In a book such as this, precise details need not be given so suffice it to say that during the 1980’s nine States—Idaho, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, North Carolina, Pennsylvania and Utah—passed statutes barring wrongful birth and wrongful life claims. Indiana and North Dakota barred only wrongful life actions; and South Dakota barred wrongful pregnancy suits as well. One State—Maine—passed a statute, which explicitly details which damages are recoverable for each of the prenatal tort actions. (24 Maine Rev. Stat. Ann. S 2931 (1985). The attempt to curtail these actions has met with some opposition. See: Note, “Wrongful Birth Actions: The Case Against Legislative Curtailment”, 100 Harv. L. Rev. 2017 (1987); Kowitz, “Note, Not Your Garden Variety Tort Reform: Statutes Barring Claims for Wrongful Life and Wrongful Birth are Unconstitutional”, 61 Brook. L. Rev. 235 (1995); Gold, “An Equitable Approach to Wrongful Birth Statutes”, 65 Fordham L. Rev. 1005 (1996); Gantz, “State Statutory Preclusion of Wrongful Birth Relief: a Troubling Re-Writing of a Woman’s Right to Choose and the Doctor-Patient Relationship”, 4 Va. J. Soc. Policy and L. 795 (1997).

Three general points, though, ought to be made and, perhaps, attract some discussion in the classroom.

First, the reason for shielding doctors from such actions appears less compelling than the reason for granting immunity to (one or both) parents. Note, in this respect, the immunity granted by the (English) Congenital Disabilities (Civil Liability) Act 1976 to the mother (in the slightly different context of foetal injuries). Note, also, that even that immunity is lifted where the mother is covered by obligatory insurance (s. 2, dealing with the case where the pregnant mother injures the child while driving a car—third party liability insurance being obligatory in England and other European states). Doctors, too, are (and should be) insured—in Europe, in many cases by the state. Why, then, should they not pay for their negligent diagnoses? What reason, other than pressure from the medical/insurance lobby can you invoke in favour of conferring immunity upon doctors?

Secondly, the majority of States allow a cause of action for wrongful birth, though the level of damages awarded differs depending whether the child born is healthy or impaired. Illinois (Siemieniec v. Lutheran General Hosp., 512 NE 2d 691 (1987), Colorado (Lininger v. Eisenbaum, 764 P. 2d 1202, 1988—a treasure source, at p. 1208, n. 9, of similar case law), Maryland (Reed v. Campagnolo, 630 A 2d 1145 (1993), and New Jersey (Procanik v. Cillo, 478 A. 2d 755 (1984), are in this category. Even more States—approximately thirty five—have recognised wrongful conception (or pregnancy) cases i.e. claims arising out of failed sterilisation operations. (Emerson v. Magendantz, 689 A 2d 409, 411 (R.I. 1997). A few, including New York, seem to have taken a very restrictive view, even for failed sterilisation claims. (Abbariao v. Blumenthal, 483 NYS 2d 296 (N.Y. App. Div. 1985).)

Thirdly, in the USA these tort actions were, as is made clear in Procanik, greatly facilitated by Roe v. Wade. In the late 1980s Roe was progressively eroded by the prevailing “conservative” climate of the day; and this, undoubtedly, assisted the passing of the statutes mentioned in the previous paragraphs. Matters, however, may again be about to change, though few can tell how such changes will affect this part of tort law. This, incidentally, is a (wider) aspect of American law which European lawyers (teachers and practitioners) tend to underestimate, often to their detriment. For changing views on, for example, such (apparently non-political) topics as forum non conveniens, can have important consequences for transnational litigation.

8. The position in English law was, for some time, unclear, especially in the light of dicta in the McKay case which suggested that no action for wrongful birth (or life) could lie under the Congenital Disabilities Act 1976. Academic position was divided but the point was not tested in the courts. The discussion was re-opened when attempts were made to impose liability on Hedley Byrne principles and the question then arose whether the House of Lords dicta in McFarlane v. Tayside [2000] 2 AC 59 (a case of a failed sterilisation leading to the birth of a healthy child, excerpted in the addendum to case 10, below) would prevent the award of damages on the ground that the birth of a child should really be regarded as a “gift”. The guiding rules, as they stand now and until the matter receives more authoritative formulation by a higher court, can be found in Hardman v.

Amin [2000] Lloyd's Rep. Med. 498 and Lee v. Taunton and Somerset NHS Trust [2001] 1 FLR 419. All have opted for generous awards for the parents of the impaired children (though some uncertainty still remains as to the compensatable headings of damage).

Just as important is the fact that all of these courts rejected in strong terms the view that such claims would offend public policy for treating life as a kind of harm or damage. The judicial reasoning on this point was reinforced by the text of the Abortion Act 1967 (S 1 (1) (d)) which permits abortions for eugenic reasons when there is a danger of the child being affected by a serious impairment. This can certainly be seen as implicitly accepting the view that not every life, however, impaired, is to be seen as gift. Mr Justice Toulson was, arguably, the most explicit, when he thus said in his judgment in Lee (at p. 430; italics supplied) that:

"I do not believe that it would be right for the law to deem the birth of a disabled child to be a blessing, in all circumstances and regardless of the extent of the child's disabilities; or to regard the responsibility for the care of such a child as so enriching . . . that it would be unjust for a parent to recover the cost from the negligent doctor on whose skill that parent had properly relied to prevent the situation."

The two decisions dealing with the wrongful birth claims are also noteworthy for the relatively large amounts awarded to the claimants by these courts. The Lee case, for instance, is an interim judgment; but it makes an interim award of £100,000 which, if added to an interim payment of £120,000 already paid to the plaintiffs, makes a total of £220,000 paid thus far. The total award could thus be much larger. Additionally, one must note that fairly large amounts have also been given to the parents for their distress in discovering either that a new child was on its way despite their attempts to achieve sterility or their shock, and pain for the birth of an impaired child. These sums have also been fairly generous. Thus, in one of the earliest of the "recent" cases—Rand v. East Dorset Health Authority [2000] Lloyd's Rep. Med. 377—the court awarded the parents £50,000 despite the attempts of Counsel for the defendants to reduce this heading of the award to about one tenth of its actual size. Continental European lawyers should be slow to ascribe this trend of the English courts to an "assumed" greater generosity of English law compared to that of France or Germany. For such evidence as exists, especially coming from the area of medical malpractice and personal injury cases suggests that the overall difference in the size of awards in the two systems is less pronounced than many assume it to be. In fact, in both French and English law, the overall level of awards seems to be only slightly lower than the highest awards obtained in Germany.

Who gets the money in such cases is the last question which must be answered. This is essential if wider conclusions are to be drawn about wrongful birth and wrongful life actions in the three systems compared in this work: American, English, and German.

The tradition of giving the money to the parents is maintained in all of these English cases. This technique ensures that justice is done without getting embroiled in the philosophical problems which the wrongful life claims raise more acutely. Yet arguably what the English courts are doing is moving towards the more honest (but controversial) position adopted by the French Cour de cassation in an important judgment handed down by the Assemblée Plénière on 17 November 2000. (JCP 13 déc. 2000, no. 50, p. 2293; arrêt Perruche). This view is arguable for three reasons.

First, though the money was in the English cases given to the parents, the judges repeatedly stated that it was meant to compensate the child's needs. It is implicit in some of these cases (E.g. in Hardman at p. 507) that the life expectancy that is taken into account in fixing these damages is that of the child not the parents (though in some cases, and given the nature of the handicap, these children may not live a full life). But implicit is not as good as explicit!

This linking of the award to the child's needs can also be seen by the fact that the courts do not take into account what the parents could have spent to help the child but calculate the award by reference to its needs and not its parents means. Finally, the sheer size of the awards suggests that the courts are conscious of the need to provide proper compensation for the impaired child.

Yet the method of granting all this money to the parents rather than giving the child, itself, the awarded amounts remains unsatisfactory. For what if the parents obtain the award and then put the child in care? Have they not then been enriched and it denied the chance of a better living? And if the money is given to the parents (and calculated to last for as long as their obligation to maintain the child lasts i.e. until it reaches the age of eighteen), is not the child, once again, worse off than it would be had it received the money, itself? To these arguments one must add a third. In English law damages are awarded as lump sums at the end of the trial and not as annuities. Annuities stop when those entitled to them die. If the mother dies and the impaired child is still alive, it gets nothing for the remainder of its life. Thus, from that moment onwards, the state takes over; and we all know, as Frederick the Great of Prussia used to say, that the protective cloak of the state is warm but it is also small. Would it thus not be more honest to do what some American courts—Turpin v. Sortini, 31 Cal.3d 220, 643 P. 2d 954 (1982); Procanik v. Cillo, 478 A 2d 755 (1984); Harbeson v. Parke-Davis, Inc., 656 P. 2d 483 (1983)—have done and give the child the money it needs to look after itself once the parental obligation has come to an end?

The correct inference from the size of awards of the recent English decisions is crucial. For if the arguments put forward above are correct, then part of the award made to the parents under their wrongful birth actions is, in effect, a claim for special damages by the child along the lines followed by the four American jurisdictions mentioned above. But by being disguised it may not be achieving the aim of the judges or, at any rate, of justice itself.

9. The periodic literature in the USA is growing (though some articles are worth consulting mainly for the references they provide and little more). For England see: Grubb, “Conceiving: A New Cause of Action?” Current Legal Problems, Special Issue (1988) 121 ff. In the USA, Capron’s “Tort Liability and Genetic Counselling” 79 Colum. L. Rev. 619 (1979) is an oft-cited piece. Cillo*, reproduced below as addendum 2, offers the best introduction to the subject.

Addendum 1

The terminology used by the courts is not always clear; indeed some courts have condemned the use of the word “wrongful” and have attempted to avoid labels altogether. See: Burke v. Rivo 406 Mass. 764, 551 NE 2d 1 (1990); Viccaro v. Milunsky 406 Mass. 777, 551 NE 2d 8 (1990). The (inexperienced) reader may also not realise that often many different claims are involved. The following may thus be of use:

1. Wrongful life claim. Action brought by the handicapped child; it includes among other things, a claim for pain and suffering and for extraordinary medical expenses. The first has failed everywhere; the second has succeeded in three States in the USA.

2. Wrongful birth claim. Brought by the parents in the above-mentioned situation and includes claims for emotional harm and medical expenses. The cost of bringing up the child tends to be the major item of such claims.

3. Wrongful conception (or pregnancy) claim. Brought by parents for the birth of a (usually) healthy but unplanned child.

4. Wrongful death claims (known in English law as the Fatal Accident Acts claims). Brought, in England, by the dependants of a deceased person—in most cases the breadwinner. In the USA claims for speculative dependency are allowed, though sometimes the award is made to compensate the loss of “future companionship”.

5. Parents’ personal claims. Often the parents of an injured person (typically a child) have their own claims, for example for shock for witnessing (or more controversially) of being told of the accident. So-called “loss of consortium” claims may be included in this category.

6. Foetal injuries claims. Typically to be made by a foetus once born alive. Jurisdictions which do not require “live birth”, but content themselves with “viability” at the time of the injury, may allow these claims to be brought by the estate.

7. Pre-conception claims. Claims made by a child for an injurious act (e.g. defective blood transfusion) to the mother prior to conception.

Though awards made under these headings may often be low (by US standards at any rate), the total amount for all or most of these headings may soon mount up. Litigants (and some courts) are not always aware of the danger of double compensation. Thus, despite frequent references to appealing ideas and attractive ideals, gold-digging actions are possible if not, indeed, frequent.

Procanik by Procanik v. Cillo 97 NJ 339, 478 A. 2d 755 (1984)

I. . . the complaint contains three counts. In the first count, Peter, through his guardian ad litem, seeks damages for birth defects and impaired childhood; in the second count, his parents seek damages for emotional distress and extraordinary medical expenses attributable to Peter’s defects; and in the third count, his parents assert a claim for malpractice against their former attorneys.

The defendant doctors, Joseph Cillo, Herbert Langer, and Ernest P Greenberg, are board-certified obstetricians and gynaecologists who apparently conduct a group practice. On 9 June 1977, during the first trimester of her pregnancy with Peter, Mrs Procanik consulted the defendant doctors and informed Dr Cillo “that she had recently been diagnosed as having measles but did not know if it was German measles”. Dr Cillo examined Mrs Procanik and ordered “tests for German Measles, known as Rubella Titer Test”. The results “were ‘indicative of past infection of Rubella’”. Instead of ordering further tests, Dr Cillo negligently interpreted the results and told Mrs Procanik that she “had nothing to worry about because she had become immune to German Measles as a child”. In fact, the “past infection” disclosed by the tests was the German measles that had prompted Mrs Procanik to consult the defendant doctors.

Ignorant of what an accurate diagnosis would have disclosed, Mrs Procanik allowed her pregnancy to continue, and Peter was born on 26 December 1977. Shortly thereafter, on 16 January 1978, he was diagnosed as suffering from congenital rubella syndrome. As a result of the doctors’ negligence, Mr and Mrs Procanik were deprived of the choice of terminating the pregnancy, and Peter was “born with multiple birth defects”, including eye lesions, heart disease, and auditory defects. The infant plaintiff states further that “he has suffered because of his parents’ impaired capacity to cope with his problems”, and seeks damages for his pain and suffering and for his “impaired childhood”.

In April 1983, while this matter was pending in the Appellate Division, Peter moved to amend the first count to assert a claim to recover, as special damages, the expenses he will incur as an adult for medical, nursing, and related health care services. In its opinion, the Appellate Division denied without prejudice leave to amend. Although this claim was not raised before the trial court and not considered by the Appellate Division, fairness, justice, and judicial efficiency persuade us to consider the claim for special damages.

The complaint, which was filed on 8 April 1981, contains two other counts. In the second count, Peter’s parents seek damages for their emotional distress and for the extraordinary medical expenses attributable to Peter’s birth defects. Before the trial court they stipulated, however, that they knew they had a potential cause of action by January 1978, nearly three years before instituting suit. The trial court ruled, therefore, that the parents’ claim was barred by the two-year statute of limitations . . . Before us, however, the parents contend that their claim is derived from Peter’s claim and that [the statute], which tolls the statute of limitations during infancy, protects their claim. Hence, the parents ask us to recognise their claim.

In the third count, the parents assert a claim for malpractice against their former attorneys, alleging that they consulted defendant attorney Harold A Sherman, who undertook to advise them of their legal rights. Mr Sherman consulted with defendant attorneys Greenstone, Greenstone & Naishuler, a professional corporation specialising in medical malpractice claims. After conferring with Mr Goldsmith of that firm, Mr Sherman advised the parents on 2 May 1979 that they did not have a cause of action, and he never informed them that this Court had granted certification in Berman v. Allan on 5 September 1978.

In Berman, 80 NJ 421, 404 A. 2d 8, which was decided on 26 June 1979, we recognised that parents may recover for emotional distress for the “wrongful birth” of a child born with birth defects. The defendant attorneys, however, never advised Mr and Mrs Procanik that they had a cause of action, and the two-year statute of limitations ran on their claim on 16 January 1980. The trial court did not rule on the attorney malpractice claim, and that issue is not before us.

II. In this case we survey again the changing landscape of family torts. See Schroeder v. Perkel, 87 NJ 53, 71, 432 A. 2d 834 (1981). Originally that landscape presented a bleak prospect both to children born with birth defects and to their parents. If a doctor negligently diagnosed or treated a pregnant woman who was suffering from a condition that might cause her to give birth to a defective child, neither the parents nor the child could maintain a cause of action against the negligent doctor. Gleitman v. Cosgrove, 49 NJ 22, 227 A. 2d 689 (1967).

Like the present case, Gleitman involved a doctor who negligently treated a pregnant woman who had contracted German measles in the first trimester of her pregnancy. Reasoning from the premise that the doctor did not cause the infant plaintiff’s birth defects, the Gleitman Court found it impossible to compare the infant’s condition if the defendant doctor had not been negligent with the infant’s impaired condition as a result of the negligence. Measurement of “the value of life with impairments against the nonexistence of life itself” was, the Court declared, a logical impossibility. Id. at 28, 227, A. 2d 689. Consequently, the Court rejected the infant’s claim.

The Court denied the parents’ claim for emotional distress and the costs of caring for the infant, because of the impossibility of weighing the intangible benefits of parenthood against the emotional and monetary injuries sustained by them. Prevailing policy considerations, which included a reluctance to acknowledge the availability of abortions and the mother’s right to choose to terminate her pregnancy, prevented the Court from awarding damages to a woman for not having an abortion. Another consideration was the Court’s belief that “[i]t is basic to the human condition to seek life and hold on to it however heavily burdened”. 49 NJ at 30, 227 A. 2d 689.

In Berman, the parents sought to recover for their emotional distress and for the expenses of raising a child born with Down's Syndrome. Relying on Roe v. Wade, above, 410 US 113, 93 S. Ct. 705, 35 L. Ed. 2d 147, the Court found that public policy now supports the right of a woman to choose to terminate a pregnancy. Berman v. Allan, above, 80 NJ at 431–2, 404 A. 2d 8. That finding eliminated one of the supports for the Gleitman decision—i.e. that public policy prohibited an award for depriving a woman of the right to choose whether to have an abortion. Finding that a trier of fact could place a dollar value on the parents' emotional suffering, the Berman Court concluded “that the monetary equivalent of this distress is an appropriate measure of the harm suffered by the parents”. 80 NJ at 433, 404 A. 2d 8.

Nonetheless, the Court rejected the parents' claim for “medical and other expenses that will be incurred in order to properly raise, educate, and supervise the child”. Id. at 432, 404 A. 2d 8. The Court reasoned that the parents wanted to retain “all the benefits inhering in the birth of the child—i.e. the love and joy they will experience as parents—while saddling defendants with enormous expenses attendant upon her rearing”. Id. Such an award would be disproportionate to the negligence of the defendants and constitute a windfall to the parents. Id.

The Berman Court also declined to recognize a cause of action in an infant born with birth defects. Writing for the Court, Justice Pashman reasoned that even a life with serious defects is more valuable than non-existence, the alternative for the infant plaintiff if his mother chose to have an abortion. Id. at 429, 404 A. 2d 8.

More recently we advanced the parents' right to compensation by permitting recovery of the extraordinary expenses of raising a child born with cystic fibrosis, including medical, hospital, and pharmaceutical expenses. Schroeder v. Perkel, above, 87 NJ at 68–9, 432 A. 2d 834. No claim on behalf of the infant was raised in that case, id. at 61, 432 A. 2d 834, and we elected to defer consideration of such a claim until another day. Id. at 66, 432 A. 2d 834. That day is now upon us, and we must reconsider the right of an infant in a “wrongful life” claim to recover general damages for diminished childhood and pain and suffering, as well as special damages for medical care and the like.

III. [1, 2] The terms “wrongful birth” and “wrongful life” are but shorthand phrases that describe the causes of action of parents and children when negligent medical treatment deprives parents of the option to terminate a pregnancy to avoid the birth of a defective child. See Schroeder v. Perkel, above, 87 NJ at 75–6, 432 A. 2d 834 (Handler J concurring and dissenting). In the present context, “wrongful life” refers to a cause of action brought by or on behalf of a defective child who claims that but for the defendant doctor's negligent advice to or treatment of its parents, the child would not have been born. “Wrongful birth” applies to the cause of action of parents who claim that the negligent advice or treatment deprived them of the choice of avoiding conception or, as here, of terminating the pregnancy. See Comment, “‘Wrongful Life’: The Right Not To Be Born” 54 Tul. L. Rev. 480, 484–5 (1980); A Capron, “Tort Liability in Genetic Counseling” 79 Colum. L. Rev. 618, 630–57 (1979).

[3] Both causes of action are distinguishable from the situation where negligent injury to a foetus causes an otherwise normal child to be born in an impaired condition. See e.g. Smith v. Brennan, 31 NJ 353, 157 A. 2d 497 (1960); W Prosser, Law of Torts § 55 at 335–8 (4th edn., 1971). In the present case, the plaintiffs do not allege that the negligence of the defendant doctors caused the congenital rubella syndrome from which the infant plaintiff suffers. Neither do plaintiffs claim that the infant ever had a chance to be a normal child. The essence of the infant's claim is that the defendant doctors wrongfully deprived his mother of information that would have prevented his birth.

Analysis of the infant's cause of action begins with the determination whether the defendant doctors owed a duty to him. The defendant doctors do not deny they owed a duty to the infant plaintiff, and we find such a duty exists. See Berman v. Allan, above, 80 NJ at 444, 404 A. 2d 8 (Handler J concurring and dissenting); Gleitman v. Cosgrove, above, 49 NJ at 50, 227 A. 2d 689 (Jacobs J. dissenting). In evaluating the infant's cause of action, we assume, furthermore, that the defendant doctors were negligent in treating the mother. Moreover, we assume that their negligence deprived the parents of the choice of terminating the pregnancy and of preventing the birth of the infant plaintiff.

Notwithstanding recognition of the existence of a duty and its breach, policy considerations have led this Court in the past to decline to recognise any cause of action in an infant for his wrongful life. The threshold problem has been the assertion by infant plaintiffs not that they should not have been born without defects, but that they should not have been born at all. Gleitman v. Cosgrove, above, 49 NJ at 28, 227 A. 2d 689. The essence of the infant’s cause of action is that its very life is wrongful. Berman v. Allen, above, 80 NJ at 427, 404 A. 2d 8. Resting on the belief that life, no matter how burdened, is preferable to non-existence, the Berman Court stated that the infant “has not suffered any damage cognisable at law by being brought into existence”. Id. at 429, 404 A. 2d 8. Although the premise for this part of the Berman decision was the absence of cognisable damages, the Court continued to be troubled, as it was in Gleitman, by the problem of ascertaining the measure of damages. Id. at 428, 404 A. 2d 8.

The courts of other jurisdictions have also struggled with the issues of injury and damages when faced with suits for wrongful life. . . .

Even when this Court declined to recognise a cause of action for wrongful life in Gleitman and Berman, dissenting members urged recognition of that claim. . . . Extending through these opinions is an awareness that damages would be appropriate if they were measurable by acceptable standards.

Recently we recognised that extraordinary medical expenses incurred by parents on behalf of a birth-defective child were predictable, certain, and recoverable. Schroeder v. Perkel, above, 87 NJ at 68–9, 432 A. 2d 834. In reaching that conclusion, we discussed the interdependence of the interests of parents and children in a family tort:

The foreseeability of injury to members of a family other than one immediately injured by the wrongdoing of another must be viewed in light of the legal relationships among family members. A family is woven of the fibres of life; if one strand is damaged, the whole structure may suffer. The filaments of family life, although individually spun, create a web of interconnected legal interests. This Court has recognised that a wrongdoer who causes a direct injury to one member of the family may indirectly damage another. [Id. at 63–4, 432 A. 2d 834.]

When a child requires extraordinary medical care, the financial impact is felt not just by the parents, but also by the injured child. As a practical matter, the impact may extend beyond the injured child to his brothers or sisters. Money that is spent for the health care of one child is not available for the clothes, food, or college education of another child.

Recovery of the cost of extraordinary medical expenses by either the parents or the infant, but not both, is consistent with the principle that the doctor’s negligence vitally affects the entire family. . . .

[4] Law is more than an exercise in logic, and logical analysis, although essential to a system of ordered justice, should not become an instrument of injustice. Whatever logic inheres in permitting parents to recover for the cost of extraordinary medical care incurred by a birth-defective child, but in denying the child’s own right to recover those expenses, must yield to the injustice of that result. The right to recover the often crushing burden of extraordinary expenses visited by an act of medical malpractice should not depend on the “wholly fortuitous circumstance of whether the parents are available to sue”. Turpin v. Sortini, above, 31 Cal. 3d at 328, 643 P. 2d at 965, 182 Cal. Rptr. at 348.

[5] The present case proves the point. Here, the parents’ claim is barred by the statute of limitations. Does this mean that Peter must forgo medical treatment for his blindness, deafness, and retardation? We think not. His claim for the medical expenses attributable to his birth defects is reasonably certain, readily calculable, and of a kind daily determined by judges and juries. We hold that a child or his parents may recover special damages for extraordinary medical expenses incurred during infancy, and that the infant may recover those expenses during his majority.

Our decision is consistent with recent decisions of the Supreme Courts of California and Washington. The Supreme Court of California has held that special damages related to the infant's birth defects may be recovered in a wrongful life suit. Turpin v. Sortini, above, 31 Cal. 3d at 238, 643 P. 2d at 965, 182 Cal. Rptr. at 348. Following Turpin, the Supreme Court of Washington has held that either the parents or the child may recover special damages for medical and other extraordinary expenses incurred during the infant's minority, and that the child may recover for those costs to be incurred during majority. Harbeson v. Parke-Davis, 98 Wash. 2d 460, 656 P. 2d 483 (1983).

In restricting the infant's claim to one for special damages, we recognise that our colleagues, Justice Schreiber and Justice Handler, disagree with us and with each other. From the premise that "man does not know whether non-life would have been preferable to an impaired life", at 369, Justice Schreiber concludes that a child does not have a cause of action for wrongful life and, therefore, that it is "unfair and unjust to charge the doctors with the infant's medical expenses". At 370 Justice Handler reaches a diametrically opposite conclusion. He would allow the infant to recover not only his medical expenses, but also general damages for his pain and suffering and for his impaired childhood.

We find, however, that the infant's claim for pain and suffering and for a diminished childhood presents insurmountable problems. The philosophical problem of finding that such a defective life is worth less than no life at all has perplexed not only Justice Schreiber, but such other distinguished members of this Court as Chief Justice Weintraub, Gleitman, above, 49 NJ at 63, 227 A. 2d 689 (Weintraub CJ dissenting in part), Justice Proctor, Gleitman, above, 49 NJ at 30, 227 A. 2d 689, and Justice Pashman, Berman v. Allan, above, 80 NJ at 429, 404 A. 2d 8. We need not become preoccupied, however, with these metaphysical considerations. Our decision to allow the recovery of extraordinary medical expenses is not premised on the concept that non-life is preferable to an impaired life, but is predicated on the needs of the living. We seek only to respond to the call of the living for help in bearing the burden of their affliction.

[6] Sound reasons exist not to recognize a claim for general damages. Our analysis begins with the unfortunate fact that the infant plaintiff never had a chance of being born as a normal, healthy child. Tragically, his only choice was a life burdened with his handicaps or no life at all. The congenital rubella syndrome that plagues him was not caused by the negligence of the defendant doctors; the only proximate result of their negligence was the child's birth.

The crux of the problem is that there is no rational way to measure non-existence or to compare non-existence with the pain and suffering of his impaired existence. Whatever theoretical appeal one might find in recognising a claim for pain and suffering is outweighed by the essentially irrational and unpredictable nature of that claim. Although damages in a personal injury action need not be calculated with mathematical precision, they require at their base some modicum of rationality.

Underlying our conclusion is an evaluation of the capability of the judicial system, often proceeding in these cases through trial by jury, to appraise such a claim. Also at work is an appraisal of the role of tort law in compensating injured parties, involving as that role does, not only reason, but also fairness, predictability, and even deterrence of future wrongful acts. In brief, the ultimate decision is a policy choice summoning the most sensitive and careful judgment.

From that perspective it is simply too speculative to permit an infant plaintiff to recover for emotional distress attendant on birth defects when that plaintiff claims he would be better off if he had not been born. Such a claim would stir the passions of jurors about the nature and value of life, the fear of non-existence, and about abortion. That mix is more than the judicial system can digest. We believe that the interests of fairness and justice are better served through more predictably measured damages—the cost of the extraordinary medical expenses necessitated by the infant plaintiff's handicaps. Damages so measured are not subject to the same wild swings as a claim for pain and suffering and will carry a sufficient sting to deter future acts of medical malpractice.

As speculative and uncertain as is a comparison of the value of an impaired life with non-existence, even more problematic is the evaluation of a claim for diminished childhood. The essential proof in such a claim is that the doctor's negligence deprives the parents of the knowledge of the condition of the foetus. The deprivation of that information precludes the choice of terminating the pregnancy by abortion and leaves the parents unprepared for the birth of a defective child, a birth that causes them emotional harm. The argument proceeds that the parents are less able to love and care for the child, who thereby suffers an impaired childhood. Schroeder v. Perkel, above, 87 NJ at 72, 432 A. 2d 834 (Handler J concurring and dissenting) Berman v. Allan, above, 80 NJ at 434, 404 A. 2d 8 (Handler J concurring and dissenting).

[7, 8] Several considerations lead us to decline to recognise a cause of action for impaired childhood. At the outset, we note the flaw in such a claim in those instances in which the parents assert not that the information would have prepared them for the birth of the defective child, but that they would have used the information to prevent that birth. Furthermore, even its advocates recognise that a claim for “the kind of injury suffered by the child in this context may not be readily divisible from that suffered by her wronged parents”. Berman v. Allan, above, 80 NJ at 445, 404 A. 2d 8 (Handler J concurring and dissenting). We believe the award of the cost of the extraordinary medical care to the child or the parents, when combined with the right of the parents to assert a claim for their own emotional distress, comes closer to filling the dual objectives of a tort system: the compensation of injured parties and the deterrence of future wrongful conduct.

The final issue is whether the time-barred claim of Mr and Mrs Procanik may be revived as a claim that derives from the infant's timely action. At one time Mr and Mrs Procanik had independent claims for their emotional distress, Berman v. Allan, above, 80 NJ 421, 404 A. 2d 8, and for the extraordinary medical expenses arising from Peter's multiple birth defects. Schroeder v. Perkel, above, 87 NJ 53, 432 A. 2d 834.

[9, 10] The trial court ruled that the parents' claims were barred by the two-year period of limitations contained in NJSa 2A: 14-2. Although the parents recognise that their claim, if viewed as independent, is time-barred, they contend that the claim should be viewed as derivative from the infant's claim and, therefore, that it should not have been dismissed. In making that contention, they rely on NJSa 2A: 14-2.1, which pertains to a parent who “has a claim for damages suffered by him because of an injury to a minor child caused by the wrongful act, neglect or default of any person . . .”. A parent in such a case may commence an action “within the same period of time as provided” for the commencement of the minor's action. Just three years ago, however, in Schroeder v. Perkel, above, 87 NJ 53, 432 A. 2d 834, we declared that the parents' claim was independent from that of the child's. The defect in the parents' argument in the present case is that their right to recover is not “because of injury” to their child, but because of direct injury to their own independent rights. Consequently, the parents' right to recover is not derivative from the claim of the child and is, therefore, barred by NJSa 2A: 14-2.

Our decision today recognises Peter's right to recover the extraordinary expenses necessitated by his birth defects and also recognizes that the parents, even if they had instituted a timely action, could not recover a second time for those expenses. Finally, Peter's right to recover the costs of his health care is separate from his parents' claim for their own pain and suffering, and recognition of Peter's right to recover does not resuscitate the expired independent claim of the parents.

4. UNWANTED PREGNANCIES FOLLOWING FAILED STERILISATIONS OR FAILED ABORTIONS*Case 10*

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENAT) 28 MARCH 1995
BGHZ 129, 178 = NJW 1995, 1609

Facts

The claimants claim compensation for a failed abortion in September 1979 in connection with the birth of their child E on the 5 April 1980. The operation was carried out by the defendant gynaecologist on emergency grounds (§ 218a (2) no. 3 of the Criminal Code in the version of the 15th Criminal Amendment Act of the 18 May 1976 (hereafter called § 218a of the Criminal Code, old version)). The claimants say the defendant made mistakes in treatment and seek, amongst other things, compensation for maintenance expenditure on E. The appeal court dismissed the claim on the 26 February 1985. The Senate quashed this judgment on the 15 April 1986 and referred the case back to the appeal court for another hearing and decision. After further elucidation of the matter, the appeal court on the 16 January 1991 amongst other things ordered the defendant to pay DM 188 a month from June to December 1988 as maintenance compensation, but rejected the rest of the claim. The Senate on the 25 February 1992 referred the case back to the appeal court, as claims to compensation for further material harm had been disallowed. The parties agreed to settle the main issue by payment of DM 4936 with 4 percent interest from the 5 February 1991, but the claimants applied for interest on this sum at 4 per cent from the 15 March 1982 to the 4 February 1991 and for payment for E of maintenance increasing incrementally to the end of E's eighteenth year. They also asked for a declaration that the defendant was obliged from then on to make periodic payments in accordance with the then current Standard Subsistence Order, so as to relieve the claimants from their duty of maintenance if E could not work or received long term academic or vocational education, and to compensate them for all additional financial burdens in connection with the birth of E, insofar as third parties had no duty to provide an indemnity for these. The first claimant's claim is limited to a sum equal to the monthly interest on the owner-occupied flat and expenses exceeding the normal duty of maintenance.

The appeal court awarded the interest claimed and otherwise rejected the claimants' appeal. The claimants' appeal in law was unsuccessful.

Reasons

I. The appeal court states that, having regard to the judgment of the Federal Constitutional Court of the 28 May 1993 (reference omitted), doubts existed about following the case law of the BGH so far on failed abortion in respect of the claims made in the present proceedings. It was in fact to be deduced from this judgment that expenditure on maintenance for an undesired healthy child could not in any case be the basis of a claim to compensation, for constitutional reasons (Article 1 of the Basic Law). Therefore the material claim to compensation on defective performance of the doctor's contract in cases of this kind was limited to the payment back of the remuneration given and to compensation for the woman for the failed abortion. Nor could any different view be derived from the judgment of the deciding Senate of the 16 November 1993 (references omitted) which instead left open whether contracts about abortions could still be the basis of a claim for compensation within the framework of the earlier abortion time limit or in cases of so-called emergency grounds . . .

II. These statements withstand the challenges in the appeal in law in the end result.

1. (a) The deciding Senate admittedly does not agree with the appeal court in its view, referring to the judgment of the Federal Constitutional Court of the 28 May 1993, that Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law prevented the claimants in the present case from asking for compensation for their burden of maintaining their son E from the defendant doctor, because it violated the basic right of the child to respect for his human dignity to conceive of the duty of the parents to provide maintenance for him as harm. Certainly Article 1 of the Basic Law prevents the existence of a child being assessed as harm. However, in cases in which the doctor has bound himself by contract to avoid the burden of maintenance resulting from a child, the classification of this burden as harm to the other party to the contract for which he must provide compensation does not lead to such an assessment. The deciding Senate has given more precise reasons for this in its judgment of the 16 November 1993. It also explains that the statements of the Federal Constitutional Court in the judgment of the 28 May 1993 do not acquire any binding force on this point. The Senate makes reference to this.

(b) Nevertheless the judgment on appeal still stands in the end result. The basis of the case law of the deciding Senate so far on such claims was the view that a contract for the undertaking of an abortion where one of the grounds described in § 218a of the Criminal Code, old version, here the so-called emergency ground under paragraph 2 no. 3, was present, could be effective in law and in the case of defective performance could be the starting point for a claim for compensation in civil law (references omitted) . . .

In the light of this interpretation of the Constitution, by which the deciding Senate considers itself to be bound, the initial question of whether and to what extent the contract about the abortion gave rise to legal consequences, which has so far been given a positive answer by the Senate in the present case, needs fresh examination.

(aa) Until the decision of the Federal Constitutional Court of the 28 May 1993, and therefore also in the present case, the Senate proceeded on the basis that abortion in order to prevent the danger of an emergency for the pregnant woman was not only unpunishable but also legal if it fulfilled the material prerequisites of § 218 (2) no. 3, (3) of the Criminal Code, old version, the pregnant woman had taken advice in accordance with § 218b of the Criminal Code, old version, and the emergency had been established by a second doctor in accordance with § 219 (1) of the Criminal Code, old version, as well as by the doctor entrusted with the abortion itself. In this connection the Senate has attached central importance to the findings of the doctors concerned for affirming the presence of such a ground . . .

(bb) These findings do not suffice to allow the intended abortion to appear as legal according to the interpretation of the Basic Law by the Federal Constitutional Court in its judgment of the 28 May 1993, which binds the courts. It is true that according to this (reference omitted) an abortion on the basis of a social or personal psychological emergency in respect of the pregnant woman can exceptionally be declared by the legislator not only to be unpunishable but also to be legal. However the prerequisite for this is the imposition of a burden on the pregnant woman which requires such a degree of sacrifice of her own basic human values that the duty to carry a child to full term cannot be required of her. As the Federal Constitutional Court has further stated, this only applies for emergencies of the kind under consideration here if the severity of the social or personal psychological conflict is so clearly recognisable that—looked at from the viewpoint of unreasonableness—congruity is preserved with the other grounds, namely medical and criminological grounds, and even (assuming it is sufficiently precisely defined) the ground of abnormality of the embryo. Such an exceptional state of affairs could additionally, so the Federal Constitutional Court states, only provide justification if its prerequisites have been assessed and established, having regard to the claim to protection of the unborn human life, by the courts or by third parties whom the state can trust by virtue of their special position of duty and whose decisions are not beyond any review by the state (reference omitted).

(cc) On this basis an emergency ground justifying the abortion cannot be assumed on the ground of the stress syndrome claimed by the second claimant. Admittedly the deciding Senate in the present case, as on other occasions, proceeded on the basis that for the emergency ground, as an exceptional state of affairs justifying the abortion, requirements were to be placed on the situation of conflict for the pregnant woman which were comparable to those for the medical ground or the ground of abnormality of the embryo. The Senate has particularly emphasised this by the reference to the judgment of the Federal Constitutional Court of the 25 February 1975 (reference omitted). However the Federal Constitutional Court has in the judgment of the 28 May 1993 asked for special requirements in respect of the guarantee for these prerequisites being really fulfilled in the actual case. These requirements do not permit such an emergency ground to be assumed simply from the carrying out of counselling and medical examination procedures until proof of the contrary by the defendant doctor. Instead, concrete findings of an exceptional situation, which is clearly demonstrated as such for the benefit of the courts as well, are necessary here. The appeal court has however not been able to make such findings even after repeated examination of the claimants' arguments. It is not evident that it had made any requirements in this connection which were legally incorrect.

(dd) Therefore it must be assumed that the abortion to which the defendant committed himself was not justified by an emergency ground, even on fulfilment of the prerequisites for freedom from punishment. Whether in the present case the contract is therefore to be regarded as void under §§ 134 or 138 of the BGB or whether it fulfills the prerequisites under which, according to the judgment of the Federal Constitutional Court of the 28 May 1993 (reference omitted), these provisions, in the case of defective performance, may not on constitutional grounds in principle stand in the way of more precisely described contract law sanctions, can remain open. In any case, the contract cannot be the basis for a contractual claim for compensation, at least at the economic level, to restore the result which the parties intended by the contract, which was avoidance by the claimants of the social and economic burdens of another child, which is disapproved by the legal order under the given circumstances. Therefore the basis is removed from the claimants' request for compensation for their maintenance expenses . . .

Notes to Case 10

1. In the (former) West Germany abortion was regulated since 1976 by §§ 218–219d of the German Criminal Code and is legal—broadly speaking—if: (a) the continuation of the pregnancy poses serious danger to the life or physical or mental health of the woman which cannot be averted in any other reasonable way; (b) the child is likely to be born with severe defects which would make it unreasonable for the woman to continue with the pregnancy; (c) the pregnancy was the result of an illegal act on the woman and (d) the pregnancy results in serious hardship that cannot be otherwise avoided. For a translation of the relevant texts see 27 IDHL 562 (1976); and for an excellent discussion of some of the issues see Mary Ann Glendon's Abortion and Divorce in Western Law (1987). On the other hand, in what used to be East Germany, a much more liberal regime prevailed until recently with the consequence that in practice the State met all such expenses. When in 1990 Germany was re-united, the regime in the East was expressly retained in force by the re-unification treaties until such time as a new law was passed by the German Parliament. Such an Act was, indeed, passed in 1992, but the (mainly) Catholic Government of the State of Bavaria and 249 deputies of the ruling Christian Democratic Party immediately challenged its constitutionality. On 28 May 1993 the Constitutional Court ruled that abortion was in principle illegal, though it allowed it to remain unpunishable if carried out during the first three months of the pregnancy and provided certain carefully laid down guidelines had been observed. Among these is the obligation to seek "counseling" before the operation can be carried out, the purposes of such counseling being to try and dissuade the woman from proceeding with her plan to abort. The decision has sparked off a debate similar to that found in the USA (though, probably, not of the same intensity). It has also fuelled the fear that its main effect will be to deny State funds to clinics carrying out abortions for the poor thus making them available only to those who can afford the $250–$700 that are usually required for the operation. The decision, of 28 May 1993, long and fairly legalistic in tone, has been reported in BVerfGE 88, 203 = NJW 1993, 1751 = EuGRZ 1993, 229. It has spawned critical articles (e.g. Hermes and Walther, "Schwangerschaftsabbruch—zwischen Recht und Unrecht" NJW 1993, 2337—2347) as well as the passing of a further law attempting a complex political compromise (Schwangeren- und Familienhilfeänderungsgesetz of 21 August 1995, BGBl 1995. I. 1050), which, happily, falls to be discussed by specialist works, see Schönke/Schröder Strafgesetzbuch Kommentar (26th edn. 2001) Vorbem. §§ 218 ff. nos. 1–54 for details and references.

2. The principal case (case 10) shows that even after the reform of abortion law and the more conservative approach adopted by the BVerfG in its second abortion decision of 28 May 1993 (abortion is as a general rule illegal but tolerated for most purposes) the cost of maintenance of the child can be claimed if the (failed) abortion would have been legal. This is only exceptionally the case, as for instance if the abortion is necessary to save the mother, on eugenic grounds, or in other cases of necessity which have the same quality as the two aforementioned: BGHZ 129, 178 (confirmed in BGH NJW 2000, 1782). In all other cases, no compensation can be obtained since the purpose of the contract of abortion is not recognised by the law. The mother's pain and suffering may also be compensated—a point which many academics find grotesque. (Thus, Larenz/Canaris, op. cit., p. 383. Contrast, however, how this element of damage was the first to be recognised in the USA.) The case on failed abortion which was reproduced in the 3rd edn. on p. 166 (BGH NJW 1985, 671) must be read with caution in the light of the more restrictive approach advocated in case 10. Yet, at a basic level, the approach has remained the same. Liability for the economic consequences of the unsuccessful abortion arises in principle, provided that the abortion is "permitted" or, to be more precise, is "legally recognised". What has changed therefore is that there are now fewer instances of legally recognised abortions, a fact highlighted by case 10. The court's stance should however be contrasted with the even more restrictive second abortion decision of the BVerfG (case 7) which denied compensation altogether. BGH NJW 1985, 671 also considers the difficult point of whether—time permitting—the mother may be under an obligation to submit herself to a second abortion. The academic literature on all these points is divided. See, for example, Deutsch, NJW 1985, 674; Stürner, FamRZ, 753; Waibl, NJW 1987, 1513.

3. In BGH NJW 1985, 2749 (wrongful conception) the mother/plaintiff, who had had four previous complicated pregnancies, decided to interrupt her fifth pregnancy when she discovered it in the eighth week. The abortion was unsuccessful but by the time this was discovered it was too late to have a second abortion. The pregnancy was uneventful and resulted in a healthy child being born. The mother's claim for pain and suffering was successful but her attempt to obtain maintenance failed on the ground that the purpose of the contract (to carry out an abortion) was to prevent injury to the mother and the child and no such injury had, in fact, resulted. (The same solution would have been reached if the purpose of the abortion was an eugenic one but the child that had been born was healthy.) A similar point arose in BGH NJW 2000, 1782. The mother was examined in order to determine whether she was pregnant because—and this was crucial—she had to undergo an operation which could have had harmful effects to the child. Her pregnancy was not noticed, but no injury to the child occurred in the course of the operation that did ensue. The parents claimed that had they known about the pregnancy they would have decided to have an abortion on eugenic grounds. Their claim for maintenance costs failed. The BGH argued that under the circumstances, the cost of maintenance was not a head of damage that was included in the protective scope of the specific duty owed to the mother. The object of the examination was to eliminate health risks resulting out of the operation. As a matter of fact these risks did not materialize since the child was born healthy. We can see here how the Schutzzwecklehre (focusing on the scope of the duty owed) can be successfully used to exclude heads of damages that are too remote, see chapter 2 section A5(b).

4. Another instance of “wrongful conception” is found in “failed sterilization” cases resulting in unwanted pregnancies. However, while since 1993 a more restrictive approach is applied in failed abortion cases, depending on whether the abortion could be legally recognised, failed sterilisation cases have not been affected by the second abortion decision of the Constitutional Court (BVerfGE 88, 203, case 7). The first decision where the BGH refused to follow the dicta of the BVerfG in case 7 was BGHZ 124, 128 (case 8). It concerned a wrongful birth claim (the mother became pregnant after the defendant had failed to diagnose a specific genetic disposition). The parents were in principle allowed to recover full maintenance costs. However, the court also stressed that the case would have been decided in the same way had the pregnancy resulted out of a failed sterilisation. The scope of the duty owed to the parents was the same, namely to prevent the economic burden of raising a child. The sterilisation aims at reducing the family’s living costs and therefore the costs of maintaining the child are recoverable. These remarks were obiter but, more recently, the Federal Court (BGH 27 June 1995, NJW 1995, 2407) expressly allowed damages. Thus, once again the BGH has refused to be budged on this issue by the views of the Second Senate of the Constitutional Court. Prior to that case, the BGH had repeatedly allowed recovery by parents of expenses connected with the upbringing of a healthy child born after a sterilisation attempt. (See the two leading decisions of 18 March 1980, BGHZ 76, 249 and 259; confirmed in e.g. BGH NJW 1981, 630; NJW 1981, 2002; NJW 1984, 2625; NJW 1992, 2961.) Finally, the issue of failed sterilisation came before the First Senate of the Constitutional Court in case 9: BVerfGE 96, 375. One of the two constitutional complaints (namely 1 BvR 479/92) concerned a failed sterilisation the purpose of which was family planning. The First Senate of the BVerfG held that awarding the full cost of maintenance to the parents in cases of failed sterilizations did not violate the dignity of the child. It expressly approved of the jurisprudence of the BGH. It should be noted that all these cases concerned failed sterilisations leading to the birth of a healthy child. The result and reasoning of these German decisions could not be more different from Lord Steyn’s approach in the Tayside case reproduced as Addendum, below. Yet, this topic is so inherently difficult, that the sketch attempted in this section, cannot be completed without mentioning the fact that divisions exist even within the Germanic world. Thus in a judgment handed down in 1999, the Austrian Supreme Court, while following German law in cases where the child born is impaired, chose to strike out in a different direction and refuse the parents maintenance costs in the case of a healthy but “unwanted” child. 5. American courts have also uniformly awarded damages for failed sterilisations. Emerson v. Magendantz, 689 A 2d 409 (R.I. 1997), contains a fairly exhaustive review of the case law of most of the States. But it also reveals that American courts have considered three models when it comes to fixing the level of damages. The vast majority of States opt for a “limited” recovery which means that they limit compensation to the medical expenses of the failed sterilisation, hospital expenses for the pregnancy, costs of subsequent sterilisation (where this occurs), lost wages during the above periods and, occasionally, emotional distress. Three States—Arizona (Univ. of Arizona Health Sciences Center. v. Superior Cour, 667 P. 2d 1294 (1983)), Connecticut (Ochs v. Borrelli, 445 A 2d 883 (1982)), and Massachusetts (Burke v. Rivo, 551 NE 2d 1 (1990))—allow full recovery. This includes the cost of rearing the child but these States also expect the courts to balance these costs (and reduce the damages) to take into account the benefits—emotional and financial—of having the child. (Severely criticised by the House of Lords in McFarlane v. Tayside Health Board [2000] 2 AC 59. On the other hand, the Dutch Supreme Court recently took the view that a mother/claimant in a failed contraception case could claim maintenance costs (as well as damages for an loss of personal income resulting from her reasonably giving up her job in order to look after her child). But money thus obtained from the defendant was not subject to a reduction because of the pleasures associated with having the child. Hoge Raad, 21 February 1997, NJ 1999, 145. A translation of the key passages can be found in van Gerven, Tort Law, 2nd edn., pp. 134–5.) Finally, two States—Wisconsin (Marciniak v. Lundborg, 450 NW 2d 243 (1990)) and New Mexico (Lovelace Medical Ctr. v. Mendez, 805 P. 2d. 603 (1991))—have gone even further and have allowed full recovery of foreseeable costs without demanding a “balancing” exercise (to take into account the said benefits.) (On all this see 83 A.L.R. 3rd 15, 3a 2000).

6. English law, as well, has experienced difficulties with this topic. In Scuriaga v. Powell (1979) 123 SJ 406, a negligently performed abortion failed to terminate the plaintiff’s pregnancy and, as a result, she gave birth to a healthy child. The court took the view that she was entitled to damages for loss of earnings, for pain and suffering, and for diminution of her marriage prospects. In Udale v. Bloomsbury Area Health Authority [1983] 1 WLR 1098, which had analogous facts, the mother was allowed damages for pain and suffering and discomfort but was denied damages for the cost of rearing the child until it was 16. The main reason for this was the metaphysical argument that it was impossible to value the life of the child in order to set it off against the considerable financial disadvantages that its unwanted birth brought to its family. On the other hand, a more recent English case—Thake v. Maurice [1985] 2 All ER 513—granted to the parents of a healthy child, born after an unsuccessful vasectomy operation, the cost of its upkeep. Adopting a reasoning which is very similar to that of the majority in Sherlock v. Stillwater Clinic, 260 NW 2d 169, 174–5 (Minn.1977), Peter Pain J held that the birth of a healthy child was not always “a blessing” (p. 526). Other cases followed and mirrored the difficulties experienced by other systems. The uncertainty was finally resolved in 1999 when the House of Lords in McFarlane v. Tayside Health Board [2000] 2 AC 59, reproduced in part as Addendum opted for the view that currently prevails in the USA (and denied to the plaintiffs the costs of rearing their child.) The judgments are noted for their use of the comparative method, which Lord Steyn was quick to praise as “providing the inestimable value of sharpening our focus on the weight of competing considerations.” On this and related matters see: Grubb, “Conceiving: A New Cause of Action?,” Current Legal Problems, Special Issue, (1988) 121 ff.; Reichman, “Damages in Tort for Wrongful Conception: Who Bears the Cost of Raising the Child?” 3 Sydney L. Rev. 568 (1985).

In McFarlane v. Tayside Health Board [2000] 2 AC 59, the House of Lords had to deal with a case of a negligently performed sterilisation which led to the birth of a healthy child. The parents’ attempt to claim its maintenance costs failed. Irreconcilable dicta from five law lords—some of wider philosophical import—have re-opened the debate about failed sterilisations. The point fell to be decided by the Court of Appeal in P v. St. James and Seacroft University Hospital NHS Trust ([2001] 3 All ER 97). The view there taken was that Lord Steyn’s dicta applied only to healthy children and not impaired ones, whose parents were thus entitled to claim substantial damages. However, the award of compensation was limited to the special upbringing costs associated with rearing a child with a serious disability. (Likewise, the issues are also relevant in wrongful birth actions on which see note 8 to cases 6 to 9, above. Presumably, the same principles would apply to failed abortions—where impaired children are concerned.)

It seems questionable whether such a distinction can or should be made. In the end it rests on the fact that in Tayside Lord Steyn held on principles of “distributive justice” that “ordinary people” would not regard awarding compensation for bringing up a healthy child as necessary, while the court in Seacroft held that on such principles “ordinary people” would consider it to be “fair” for the law to make an award (e.g. Seacroft para. no. 50). So far there seems to be no decision of the BGH which, like the Seacroft case, concerned a failed sterilisation leading to a seriously disabled child. The cases referred to above (note no. 4) dealt with the birth of a healthy child. However, it can be stated with some confidence that a German court would have also awarded damages in a case like Seacroft. Dicta in case 8, BGHZ 124, 128, suggest that it is irrelevant whether the child is born healthy or whether the failed sterilisation leads to an impaired child. The decisive issue is whether the economic burden is included in the ambit of the duty owed to the parents. For, as the court put it, “If under such contracts the doctor makes a mistake, which leads to the birth of the child, his liability includes the contractual partner’s release from economic burdens that the contract with the doctor was aiming to avoid. But the measure of damages remains the same whether or not the purpose of the sterilisation or the abortion was to prevent the birth of a disabled child. For according to the intention of contracting parties, the area of protection covered by the consulting contract regularly also includes the financial burden for a heavily disabled child, which the parents are anxious to avoid for themselves as well as for the child. As the Senate explained in its opinion in BGHZ 89, 95, 105, these maintenance costs cannot be split into one part that covers the parents obligations under family law to a hypothetically healthy child and another that depends on the child’s disability. The necessary costs for the livelihood of a heavily disabled child cannot be separated into two parts.”

Addendum

McFarlane v. Tayside Health Board House of Lords (Scotland) [2000] 2 AC 59

LORD STEYN.

My Lords, a surgeon wrongly and negligently advised a husband and wife that a vasectomy had rendered the husband infertile. Acting on his advice they ceased to take contraceptive precautions. The wife became pregnant and gave birth to a healthy child. The question is what damages, if any, the parents are in principle entitled to recover.

It may be helpful to state at the outset the nature and shape of the case before the House. First, a distinction must be made between two types of claims which can arise from the failure of a sterilisation procedure, resulting in the birth of a child. There is the action (if permitted) for “wrongful life” brought by a disadvantaged or disabled child for damage to himself arising from the fact of his birth. The present case does not fall within this category. It is what in the literature is called an action for “wrongful birth.” It is an action by parents of an unwanted child for damage resulting to them from the birth of the child. Secondly, the claim before the House is framed in delict [i.e. in tort]. Counsel cited observations to the effect that it is immaterial whether such an action is brought in contract or in delict. The correctness of this assumption may depend on the nature of the term of the contract alleged to have been breached. Usually, since a contract of services is involved, it may be an obligation to take reasonable care. On the other hand, the term may be expressed more stringently and may amount to a warranty of an outcome. It is unnecessary in the present case to consider whether different considerations may arise in such cases. My views are confined to claims in delict. Thirdly, the claim is brought under the extended Hedley Byrne principle (Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v. Heller & Partners Ltd [1964] AC 465) as explained in Henderson v. Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 AC 145 and Williams v. Natural Life Health Foods Ltd [1998] 1 WLR 830 that is, it is based on an assumption of responsibility by the doctor who gave the negligent advice.

The unwanted child

In 1989 Mr and Mrs McFarlane already had four children. They decided to move to a bigger house. They needed a larger mortgage. In order to meet the increased financial commitments Mrs McFarlane returned to work. They further decided not to have any more children and that Mr McFarlane would undergo a vasectomy operation. On 16 October 1989 a consultant surgeon performed the operation on Mr McFarlane at a hospital for which Tayside Health Board is responsible. The operation was carried out without complication. One of the risks of a vasectomy operation is spontaneous recanalisation of the divided vas. For this reason Mr and Mrs McFarlane were advised to adopt contraceptive precautions until sperm samples had been analysed. In January and February 1990 that was done. On 23 March 1990 the consultant surgeon wrote to Mr McFarlane saying "your sperm counts are now negative and you may dispense with contraceptive precautions." Mr and Mrs McFarlane acted on this advice. Nevertheless in September 1991 Mrs McFarlane became pregnant. On 6 May 1992 Mrs McFarlane gave birth to a healthy daughter, Catherine. Mr and Mrs McFarlane love their daughter and care for her as an integral part of the family.

The legal proceedings in Scotland

The parents sued the Tayside Health Board in delict. The claim is divided into two parts. First, Mrs McFarlane claimed a sum of £10,000 in respect of pain, suffering and distress resulting from the unwanted pregnancy. Secondly, Mr and Mrs McFarlane claimed a sum of £100,000 in respect of the financial cost of bringing up Catherine.

The issues

The statement of facts and issues summarised the questions to be considered as follows. (i) Are the pursuers entitled to damages? (ii) Is the second pursuer entitled to claim solarium? (iii) Are the pursuers entitled to claim for the financial consequences of pregnancy and the birth of the child? (iv) Is a claim for the financial consequences of the pregnancy and birth excluded as being for pure economic loss? (v) Does public policy exclude the pursuers' claims for damages in whole or in part? (vi) Does the fact that the pursuers now have, as a result of the alleged negligence, a live healthy child, disentitle them to damages in whole or in part? These issues overlap. Different considerations apply to the two heads of claim and it will be necessary to consider them separately. It will be convenient first to consider the claim of the parents for the total cost of bringing up Catherine and then to consider the smaller claim of Mrs McFarlane for a solatium for pain, suffering and distress resulting from her pregnancy. It is common ground that in regard to the sustainability in law of the two heads of claim there are no material differences between the law of Scotland and the law of England.

The cost of bringing up Catherine

It will be convenient to examine first the line of English cases on which the Inner House founded its decision that the cost of bringing up Catherine is a sustainable claim. In Udale v. Bloomsbury Health Authority [1983] 1 WLR 1098 Jupp J rejected a claim for the cost of bringing up an unwanted child. The judge observed, at p. 1109, that the birth of a child is "a blessing and an occasion for rejoicing." In Thake v. Maurice [1986] QB 644 Peter Pain J refused to follow Udale's case and allowed such a claim. He observed, at p. 666G, that social policy, which permitted abortion and sterilisation, implied that it was generally recognised that the birth of a healthy child was not always a blessing. In Emeh v. Kensington and Chelsea and Westminster Area Health Authority [1985] QB 1012 the Court of Appeal had to consider divergent approaches in the cases of Udale and Thake. But the unwanted child in Emeh's case had been born with congenital disabilities. The defendants' contention was that the cost of upbringing should be limited to the extra costs attributable to the child's disabilities. Full costs were allowed but in a modest sum of the order of £6,000. Angus Stewart QC in “Damages for the Birth of a Child,” (1995) 40 JLSS 298, 300 pointed out:

“The issue [in Emeh] possibly presented as one of deceptive simplicity given that the claim was by the mother alone: it was held that the compensable loss extended to any reasonably foreseeable financial loss directly caused by the unexpected pregnancy. The formulation equates pregnancy with personal injury giving rise to consequential (as opposed to pure) economic loss which includes upbringing costs.”

That I regard as a perceptive explanation of the context of the judgment. In unreserved judgments the Court of Appeal chose to follow the judgment of Peter Pain J rather than the judgment of Jupp J. This decision has been considered binding on lower courts and on the Court of Appeal in regard to claims by parents for wrongful birth of a healthy child. It is the critical decision in the line of authority in England. It is unnecessary to discuss the subsequent English decisions which followed Emeh's case but I list them in chronological order: see Thake v. Maurice [1986] QB 644; Gold v. Haringey Health Authority [1988] QB 481; Benarr v. Kettering Health Authority [1988] NLJR 179; Allen v. Bloomsbury Health Authority [1993] 1 All ER 651; Salih v. Enfield Health Authority [1991] 3 All ER 400; Robinson v. Salford Health Authority [1992] 3 Med LR 270; Fish v. Wilcox [1994] 5 Med LR 230; Watkin v. South Manchester Health Authority [1995] 1 WLR 1543; Goodwill v. British Pregnancy Advisory Service [1996] 1 WLR 1397. It is only necessary to mention one specific matter about those decisions. In Benarr's case the court held that health authorities were liable to pay for private education of the unwanted child.

It is right to point out that the Court of Appeal decision in Emeh's case predates the full retreat from Anns v. Merton London Borough Council [1978] AC 728 which was announced by the decision of the House in Murphy v. Brentwood District Council [1991] 1 AC 398. Since then a judicial scepticism has prevailed about an overarching principle for the recovery of new categories of economic loss. Here the father's part of the claim for the cost of bringing up the unwanted child is undoubtedly a claim for pure economic loss. Realistically, despite the pregnancy and child birth, the mother's part of the claim is also for pure economic loss. In any event, in respect of the claim for the costs of bringing up the unwanted child, it would be absurd to distinguish between the claims of the father and the mother. This feature of the claim is important. The common law has a great capacity for growth but the development of a new ground of liability, or a new head of such liability, for the recovery of economic loss must be justified by cogent reasons. Even before Murphy's case there was unease among judges about the decision in Emeh's case. This was memorably articulated in Jones v. Berkshire Area Health Authority (unreported), 2 July 1986, another unwanted pregnancy case. Ognall J said:

“I pause only to observe that, speaking purely personally, it remains a matter of surprise to me that the law acknowledges an entitlement in a mother to claim damages for the blessing of a healthy child. Certain it is that those who are afflicted with a handicapped child or who long desperately to have a child at all and are denied that good fortune, would regard an award for this sort of contingency with a measure of astonishment. But there it is: that is the law.”

In Gold v. Haringey Health Authority [1988] QB 481, 484F Lloyd J (with the agreement of the other members of the court) cited this observation and said that “many would no doubt agree with this observation.”

In the present case your Lordships have had the advantage of considering this issue in the light of far more analytical and comprehensive arguments from both counsel than were put before the Court of Appeal in Emeh's case. Counsel took your Lordships on a valuable tour d'horizon of comparative jurisprudence. Claims by parents for the cost of bringing up an unwanted but healthy child as opposed to more limited claims by the mother in respect of pain, suffering and distress associated with the pregnancy have proved controversial in foreign jurisdictions: compare the valuable comparative article by Angus Stewart QC, 40 JLSS 298, 300. In the United States the overwhelming majority of state courts do not allow recovery of the costs of bringing up a healthy child:

see the review in Johnson v. University Hospitals of Cleveland, 540 NE 2d 1370; Annotation, 89 ALR 4th 632 (May 1998), passim. In Canada the trend is against such claims: see Kealey v. Berezowski (1996) 136 DLR (4th) 708, 724–730, which contains a review. By a majority the New South Wales Court of Appeal in C.E.S. v. Superclinics (Australia) Pty Ltd, 38 NSWLR 47 held that the plaintiff had, through the negligence of the defendants, lost the opportunity to have an abortion which would not necessarily have been unlawful. The court ordered a retrial on the issue as to whether an abortion would have been unlawful. Kirby P considered that damages could be awarded for the cost of bringing up the child. Priestly JA was prepared to allow a limited recovery for “wrongful birth” but not for child-rearing expenses. Meagher JA agreed with Priestly JA on this point, though in a dissenting opinion he concluded that public policy was an absolute bar to the award of damages in “wrongful birth” cases. In New Zealand there is a no-fault compensation scheme. It is, however, instructive to note that the Accident and Compensation Authority held that there was no causal connection between the medical error and the cost of raising the child: In re Z [1982] 3 NZAR 161 and XY v. Accident Compensation Corporation [1984] 4 NZAR 219. In Germany the Constitutional Court has ruled that such a claim is unconstitutional inasmuch as it is subversive of the dignity of the child. But the Bundesgerichtshof has rejected this view and permits recovery of the costs of bringing up the child. The Federal Court observed that compensation not only has no detrimental effect on the child, but can be beneficial to it: see BS Markesinis, The German Law of Obligations, vol. II: Torts, 3rd edn. (1997), pp. 155–156. In France the Cour de Cassation has ruled that “whereas the existence of the child she has conceived cannot in itself constitute for the mother a loss legally justifying compensation, even if the birth occurred after an unsuccessful intervention intended to terminate the pregnancy:” see Mlle. Xc. Picard (Cour de Cass. Civ. 1 re 25 June 1991 D. 1991, 566).

Such claims are not allowed. From this comparative survey I deduce that claims by parents for full compensation for the financial consequences of the birth of a healthy child have sometimes been allowed. It may be that the major theme in such cases is that one is simply dealing with an ordinary tort case in which there are no factors negating liability in delict. Considerations of corrective justice as between the negligent surgeon and the parents were dominant in such decisions. In an overview one would have to say that more often such claims are not allowed. The grounds for decision are diverse. Sometimes it is said that there was no personal injury, a lack of foreseeability of the costs of bringing up the child, no causative link between the breach of duty and the birth of a healthy child, or no loss since the joys of having a healthy child always outweigh the financial losses. Sometimes the idea that the couple could have avoided the financial cost of bringing up the unwanted child by abortion or adoption has influenced decisions. Policy considerations undoubtedly played a role in decisions denying a remedy for the cost of bringing up an unwanted child. My Lords, the discipline of comparative law does not aim at a poll of the solutions adopted in different countries. It has the different and inestimable value of sharpening our focus on the weight of competing considerations. And it reminds us that the law is part of the world of competing ideas markedly influenced by cultural differences. Thus Fleming has demonstrated that it may be of relevance, depending on the context, to know whether the particular state has an effective social security safety net: see Fleming, The American Tort Process (1988), pp. 26–27.

I will now eliminate the grounds upon which I would not decide against the parents’ claim for compensation for financial loss arising from the child’s birth. Counsel for the health board rightly did not argue that it is a factor against the claim that the parents should have resorted to abortion or adoption. I cannot conceive of any circumstances in which the autonomous decision of the parents not to resort to even a lawful abortion could be questioned. For similar reasons the parents’ decision not to have the child adopted was plainly natural and commendable. It is difficult to envisage any circumstances in which it would be right to challenge such a decision of the parents. The starting point is the right of parents to make decisions on family planning and, if those plans fail, their right to care for an initially unwanted child. The law does and must respect these decisions of parents which are so closely tied to their basic freedoms and rights of personal autonomy.

Counsel for the health authority argued as his primary submission that the whole claim should fail because the natural processes of conception and childbirth cannot in law amount to personal injury. This is a view taken in some jurisdictions. On the other hand, it is inconsistent with many other decisions, notably where limited recovery of compensation for pain, suffering and distress is allowed. I would not follow this path.

After all, the hypothesis is that the negligence of the surgeon caused the physical consequences of pain and suffering associated with pregnancy and childbirth. And every pregnancy involves substantial discomfort and pain. I would therefore reject the argument of the health authority on this point. In the alternative counsel argued that, if money spent on Catherine is regarded as a detriment to her parents, it is outweighed by the many and undisputed benefits which they have derived and will derive from Catherine. While this factor is relevant in an assessment of the justice of the parents' claim I do not regard such a "set-off" as the correct legal analysis of the position.

It is possible to view the case simply from the perspective of corrective justice. It requires somebody who has harmed another without justification to indemnify the other. On this approach the parents' claim for the cost of bringing up Catherine must succeed. But one may also approach the case from the vantage point of distributive justice. It requires a focus on the just distribution of burdens and losses among members of a society. If the matter is approached in this way, it may become relevant to ask of the commuters on the Underground the following question: "Should the parents of an unwanted but healthy child be able to sue the doctor or hospital for compensation equivalent to the cost of bringing up the child for the years of his or her minority, i.e. until about 18 years?" My Lords, I have not consulted my fellow travellers on the London Underground but I am firmly of the view that an overwhelming number of ordinary men and women would answer the question with an emphatic "No." And the reason for such a response would be an inarticulate premise as to what is morally acceptable and what is not. Like Ognall J in Jones v. Berkshire Area Health Authority, 2 July 1986, they will have in mind that many couples cannot have children and others have the sorrow and burden of looking after a disabled child. The realisation that compensation for financial loss in respect of the upbringing of a child would necessarily have to discriminate between rich and poor would, surely appear unseemly to them. It would also worry them that parents may be put in a position of arguing in court that the unwanted child, which they accepted and care for, is more trouble than it is worth. Instinctively, the traveller on the Underground would consider that the law of tort has no business to provide legal remedies consequent upon the birth of a healthy child, which all of us regard as a valuable and good thing.

My Lords, to explain decisions denying a remedy for the cost of bringing up an unwanted child by saying that there is no loss, no foreseeable loss, no causative link or no ground for reasonable restitution is to resort to unrealistic and formalistic propositions which mask the real reasons for the decisions. And judges ought to strive to give the real reasons for their decision. It is my firm conviction that where courts of law have denied a remedy for the cost of bringing up an unwanted child the real reasons have been grounds of distributive justice. That is of course, a moral theory. It may be objected that the House must act like a court of law and not like a court of morals. That would only be partly right. The court must apply positive law. But judges' sense of the moral answer to a question, or the justice of the case, has been one of the great shaping forces of the common law. What may count in a situation of difficulty and uncertainty is not the subjective view of the judge but what he reasonably believes that the ordinary citizen would regard as right.

In my view it is legitimate in the present case to take into account considerations of distributive justice. That does not mean that I would decide the case on grounds of public policy. On the contrary, I would avoid those quicksands. Relying on principles of distributive justice I am persuaded that our tort law does not permit parents of a healthy unwanted child to claim the costs of bringing up the child from a health authority or a doctor. If it were necessary to do so, I would say that the claim does not satisfy the requirement of being fair, just and reasonable.

This conclusion is reinforced by an argument of coherence. There is no support in Scotland and England for a claim by a disadvantaged child for damage to him arising from his birth: see McKay

v. Essex Area Health Authority [1982] QB 1166. Given this position, which also prevails in Australia, Trindade and Cane, The Law of Torts in Australia, 3rd edn. (1999), p. 434, observe:

“it might seem inconsistent to allow a claim by the parents while that of the child, whether healthy or disabled, is rejected. Surely the parents’ claim is equally repugnant to ideas of the sanctity and value of human life and rests, like that of the child, on a comparison between a situation where a human being exists and one where it does not.”

In my view this reasoning is sound. Coherence and rationality demand that the claim by the parents should also be rejected.

Two supplementary points remain to be mentioned. First, I have taken into account that the claim in the present case is based on an assumption of responsibility by the doctor who gave negligent advice. But in regard to the sustainability of a claim for the cost of bringing up the child it ought not to make any difference whether the claim is based on negligence simpliciter or on the extended Hedley Byrne principle. After all, the latter is simply the rationalisation adopted by the common law to provide a remedy for the recovery of economic loss for a species of negligently performed services: see Williams v. Natural Life Health Foods Ltd [1998] 1 WLR 830, 834G. Secondly, counsel for the health board was inclined to concede that in the case of an unwanted child who was born seriously disabled the rule may have to be different. There may be force in this concession but it does not arise in the present appeal and it ought to await decision where the focus is on such cases.

I would hold that the Inner House erred in ruling that Mr and Mrs McFarlane are entitled in principle to recover the costs of bringing up Catherine.

The claim for a solatium simply alleges that Mrs McFarlane became pregnant and had to undergo a pregnancy and confinement and the pain and distress of giving birth to the child. It will be recalled that I have already rejected the argument that Mrs McFarlane suffered no personal injury. The considerations of distributive justice which militated against the claim for the cost of bringing up Catherine do not apply to the claim for a solatium. The constituent elements of a claim in delict are present. There is nothing objectionable to allowing such a claim. And such limited recovery is supported by a great deal of authority worldwide. I would uphold it. The pleadings also allege that the wife gave up work during the later stages of her pregnancy. Counsel for the health authority concedes that if a claim for limited recovery is allowed such an ancillary claim would also be sustainable. This consequential relief is within the spirit of the limited recovery principle and I would endorse it.

For the reasons I have given I would uphold the decision of the Inner House on this part of the claim.

The disposal of the appeal

I would allow the appeal on the cost of bringing up Catherine and dismiss the appeal on the claim for a solatium by Mrs McFarlane.

5. ECONOMIC LOSS (“CABLE CASES”)

Case 11

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 9 DECEMBER 1958

BGHZ 29, 65 = NJW 1959, 479

(with an approving note by H Lehman in NJW 1959, 670)

The plaintiff was the owner of a factory. In September 1955 an employee of the defendant, a civil engineer, operating an excavator on the premises of M, an enterprise engaged in graphic work, damaged a subterranean power cable belonging to the electricity works in E, which led from M's works to the plaintiff's factory. At approximately 9.40 am on 18 June 1956, another employee of the defendant excavating a pit intended for an oil-tank cut the cable once again at a distance of about 60 metres behind the previous break. As a result production in the plaintiff's factory was interrupted until 6.30 am on 19 June.

The plaintiff contended that the power cable, which from the place of the break onwards served only the graphic enterprise and his factory, was part of his enterprise from an economic point of view. The defendant, in cutting the cable had interfered illegally and culpably with his enterprise and was liable for the damages caused by the interruption of production. Alternatively, he contended that the defendant had failed to observe the necessary care for the safety of others. The defendant argued that the plaintiff's enterprise had only been indirectly affected by the cutting of the cable and that only direct interference would have rendered him liable. He also contended that he had exercised the necessary care in selecting and supervising his employees.

The Landgericht in Bielefeld and the Court of Appeal of Hanover allowed the claim. Upon a further appeal the claim was dismissed for the following

Reasons

1. The courts below both held the defendant liable in damages on the ground that by cutting the power cable leading to the plaintiff's factory with the result that the supply of power was interrupted, the defendant had illegally and culpably interfered with the plaintiff's established and active commercial or industrial enterprise. The Court of Appeal held the defendant liable on the basis of § 823 I BGB in conjunction with § 831 BGB in as much as the defendant had failed to produce sufficient evidence to exculpate himself. It also held him liable on the basis of § 823 I BGB alone for having failed to observe the required care for the safety of others (Verkehrssicherungspflicht).

The appellant objects against the treatment of the cutting of the power cable as an interference with an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise.

The appeal must be successful in the result

(a) The Reichsgericht has acknowledged in the constant practice that the right in an existing commercial or industrial enterprise is "another right" in the meaning of § 823 I BGB.

As early as its decision RGZ 58, 29 it has regarded the right in an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise as an individual right which can be violated directly; any direct disturbance or interference with the commercial or industrial enterprise is, therefore, a violation of a right protected by § 823 I BGB. During the ensuing period the Reichsgericht at first accorded the protection of § 823 I BGB to an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise only if interference involved the existence of the commercial or industrial enterprise; that is to say if an enterprise was in fact obstructed, if it was alleged to be illegal, or if its restriction or closure was demanded; sometimes the Reichsgericht has expressed it in the terms that the bases of the commercial or industrial enterprise must be directly affected [references]. According to this practice, which was developed in dealing with problems of competition and boycott, acts which damaged the commercial or industrial enterprise indirectly only were not regarded as illegal acts in the meaning of § 823 I BGB. Examples are: if the person carrying on a commercial or industrial enterprise is only deprived of economic profit [references], or if the relationship with suppliers is affected detrimentally [reference] or that with the range of customers [reference], or, finally, if only the prospect of gain is diminished or endangered [references]. The protection of § 823 I BGB was granted in those cases especially where the termination of the commercial or industrial activity of another was demanded on the ground that the activity violated an industrial or commercial right protected by law of the person seeking the termination (design, patents), and it appeared later on that no such right existed, the allegation to this effect having been made falsely due to the objector’s negligence at least [references]; further, e.g. if in the course of a boycott, clients had been prevented from entering an eating-house by picketing and by force [references].

The strict requirements for protecting the right in an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise were relaxed by the subsequent practice of the Second Civil Division of the Reichsgericht, the final indication appeared already in the decision of 7 June 1929 [reference] where an order of the local Sickness Insurance Office that no payments would be made for certain branded medicines was treated as an act endangering deliberately the commercial or industrial enterprise engaged in the production of the branded medicines, seeing that the full effect of the order of the local Sickness Insurance Office was to force the producer to curtail production. In its decision of 9 October 1934 [reference] the Second Division abandoned clearly the principle that only the existence of the enterprise was being protected and expressed the view that it sufficed to render § 823 I BGB applicable in making the law concerning trademarks and competition if a claim for damages was based on a culpable interference with the commercial or industrial activity of another. This was confirmed by the same division in its decision of 19 December 1938 [references]; the court stated there that in so holding it took into consideration that every owner of an enterprise could demand to be protected against illegal disturbances which prevented his enterprise from devoting its full potential based on the totality of its components and means employed, even if the disturbance did not threaten the existence of the enterprise as such [references]. The Second Division considered further [references] whether the same principle did not apply also outside the sphere of the law of competition and designs. In its decision of 3 October 1936 [reference] the First Division of the Reichsgericht expressly approved the view of the Second Division that for the purpose of applying § 823 I BGB a direct attack on the existence of the enterprise was not required where the commercial or industrial activity of another had been interfered with culpably (but see to the contrary the Fifth Division of the Reichsgericht [reference]).

According to the practice of the Bundesgerichtshof, the protection of § 823 I BGB is granted in respect of any interference with the right of an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise, if it constitutes a direct interference with the commercial or industrial activity, even if it does not involve competition and industrial property rights [references]. In the decision cited here [reference] it is stated that the right in an existing commercial or industrial enterprise—like ownership—must be protected by § 823 I BGB against direct interference not only in its substantive existence but also in its various manifestations, which include the entire sphere of commercial and industrial activity. This practice must be followed.

(b) In consequence of the practice of the court to range the right in an existing or commercial industrial enterprise among the number of “other rights” mentioned in § 823 I BGB this right is placed on an equal footing for the purpose of protection with the other protected legal interest and rights enumerated there, i.e. life, health, liberty, and property. Therefore it must also be examined in the case of a violation of a right in an existing commercial or industrial enterprise whether its consequences, for which damages are claimed, are covered by the protection of the law (the decision of this division [references]).

Admittedly in so far as the protection of an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise is concerned, the question is not unlike the above-mentioned fundamental judgment of this division regarding the limits of liability, as to whether damage complained of resulted from the violation of a protected interest, the safeguarding of which is the purpose of the law. The reason is that when § 823 I BGB was formulated, the legislature had not yet envisaged the protection of established and active commercial or industrial enterprises. In the present case, the question as to the limits of liability is therefore to be considered and decided mainly from the angle as to what is the object of protection accorded by the practice of this court to established and active commercial or industrial enterprises.

The notion of a commercial or industrial enterprise includes everything which in its totality enables the enterprise to develop and to operate in the economy. Thus it includes not only the premises and the land used by it, machinery and tools, furniture and stock but also business connections, the circle of clients, and debtors. The protection accorded and gradually extended by the practice of the courts to established and active commercial or industrial enterprises is intended to safeguard the enterprise against legal interference with its economic activity and functioning. Even if the Bundesgerichtshof in a previous decision [reference] regarded the individual situation in which the commercial or industrial activity is carried out as determining the extent of the area of commercial or industrial activity, nevertheless all the cases in which the Bundesgerichtshof had held that a right in an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise had been violated involved the protection of those characteristics of a commercial or industrial enterprise which are specifically its own. The objects of protection are the substance and the emanations of the commercial or industrial enterprise to the extent that they constitute its natural and characteristic features of economic and technical activities.

(c) Then as now, as the Court of Appeal has observed correctly, the interference with the sphere of the commercial or industrial enterprise must be direct if § 823 I BGB is to apply [references]. The plaintiff is wrong when he refers to the decision of the Reichsgericht [references] in support of a view to the contrary; it was held there only that to restrict the right in an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise to the protection of its substance was too narrow and that every culpable interference with the commercial or industrial activity of another was sufficient to render § 823 I BGB applicable; the requirement that the interference must be direct was not affected thereby. It is true, of course, as the Court of Appeal has stated, that the notion of “direct interference” has not been defined by the practice of the courts. Baumbach and Hefermehl [references] point out correctly that the difficulties in drawing the line between direct and indirect interference are particularly great in the case of such a complex legal term as enterprise. Contrary to the view of the appellant the purely linguistic distinction between “indirect” and “direct” cannot yield the criteria for the necessary delimitation of these notions. The question as to when interference with the right in an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise is direct cannot be answered either by reference to the doctrine of causality alone, and the absence of so-called intermediate causes is also not decisive, as the Court of Appeal has pointed out in agreement with the practice of the Bundesgerichtshof [references; contra RGZ 163, 21, 32 where the court relied on directness of the causal nexus; similarly the Court of Appeal of Munich, 21 March 1956, NJW 1956, 1769]. The suggestion of Larenz [reference] in his note to the aforementioned decision of the Court of Appeal of Munich—upon which both parties rely in support of their legal position—does not lead to a sufficiently clear limitation of direct and indirect interference. Larenz argues that whether an interference is direct must be determined teleologically, i.e. in the sense that the act of interference must have the purpose of restricting the commercial or industrial activity, and that, consequently, the purpose must disclose the direction towards inflicting damage upon the commercial or industrial enterprise. Inasmuch as Larenz wishes to treat as "direct" every interference with a commercial or industrial enterprise the purpose of which is, or at least could have been, to reduce or to affect detrimentally the difficulties become obvious immediately when the interference was due to negligence. Nevertheless it is not possible to agree with Baumbach and Hefermehl [references] that in view of the existing difficulties of delimitation the requirement that the interference must be direct should be abandoned and that instead the effect of the interference upon the sphere of activity should be decisive in favour of the retention of the requirement of directness [references].

The Court of Appeal, relying on the decision of this Division dated 14 April 1954 [reference] is of the opinion that the notion of directness was characterised by its objective. From this it concluded that a workable delimitation could be established in the case of intentional acts; if they were committed negligently it was sufficient if in the circumstances the act might have been intended to affect the commercial or industrial enterprise adversely and the person so acting had been aware of this consequence of his act, but had hoped that the consequence would not materialise. The Court of Appeal held that in the present case a negligent interference causing liability to pay damages had in fact taken place. This Division in the decision cited above has held that an act to constitute a violation of the right in a commercial or industrial enterprise must somehow be directed against the enterprise as such. For this reason this Division did not regard as illegal interference in a commercial or industrial enterprise the fact alone that one unfounded claim for the restitution of a parcel of land attached to the enterprise had been raised by a claimant seeking restitution under the Military Government no. 52, resulting in the administration of the land by trustees. The reason was that the attack was directed against the owner of the enterprise, but not against the enterprise itself, even if thereby it may have caused damages to the commercial or industrial enterprise indirectly. Similarly it is not an interference with commercial or industrial activities if as a result of injuries to persons an enterprise is deprived of the personnel which is indispensable for its operation [reference]. These decisions which require that in order to be covered by § 823 I BGB an attack must be directed against the industrial or commercial enterprise itself indicate the general approach of the predominant practice. It is to avoid an excessive extension of the right in an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise which would run counter to the casuistic enumeration in the German legal system of situations constituting torts. Voices have been raised by courts and in legal literature which advocate a return to the older practice of the Reichsgericht according to which only an interference with an industrial or commercial enterprise which affects its substance is to be regarded as an attack against an absolute right [references]. These opinions are clearly inspired by the view that, in the words of Lehman [reference], the recognition of an excessively broad general protection of commercial or industrial enterprise might easily lead to a surreptitious creation of rules.

Certainly the protection which was originally accorded only to the existence of a commercial or industrial enterprise was extended when subsequently the Reichsgericht and then the Bundesgerichtshof in a constant practice have held that every illegal direct interference with commercial or industrial activity constitutes a violation of an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise which is protected by § 823 I BGB even if the attack is directed not against its existence but against any one of its emanations. This does not mean that by the circuitous route of protecting commercial or industrial enterprises protection is being granted to contractual rights which, in contrast to absolute rights, only bind certain persons and are therefore not “other rights” in the meaning of § 823 I BGB [references] or that economic aspects as a whole are being protected, although these are only given protection by the law of tort in special circumstances, e.g. by § 826 BGB; to protect either of these would be alien to the present legal system. In addition the need to enquire carefully in connection with the question of illegality whether, having regard to the principle of balancing the respective interests and duties, the defendant can perhaps rely on special grounds of justification [reference] has a restrictive effect. In fact the extent and the limits within which the right in an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise is to be protected must be determined precisely by an appropriate amplification of the notion that the interference must be “direct”.

Direct interference with the right in an existing commercial or industrial enterprise against which § 823 I BGB provides a remedy is only that which is somehow directed against the enterprise as such, i.e. which is aimed at the enterprise and does not affect rights or legal interests which can be detached from the enterprise without difficulty. All the cases in which the Bundesgerichtshof acknowledged that a right in an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise had been violated involved interferences of this kind which were aimed at the enterprise. Just as an injury to an employer or the destruction of or damage to a lorry belonging to an enterprise is not specifically connected with the enterprise, the cutting of the cable by the defendant or his employee operating the tractor is not so connected either; the defendant’s enterprise operating the excavator had damaged a power cable which apart from supplying power to the graphic working of M, almost by chance serves in addition the plaintiff’s enterprise only, although it could equally well have been intended to supply electric current to other customers. Furthermore the supply of electric current by a cable and the right to receive it does not constitute a natural characteristic of an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise, but represents a relationship based on the duty to supply current incumbent upon the public supply undertaking, identical with that which connects, e.g. household and members of the professions with the electricity works. Consequently the fact that a cable has been damaged on land not belonging to the enterprise concerned resulting in a cut in the electricity supply cannot, in the absence of special circumstances which do not exist here, be regarded as an interference aimed at the area of operation of the enterprise concerned. It is true that when the defendant’s excavator cut the power cable leading to the plaintiff’s factory, the material and technical bases were already affected whereby the plaintiff could and did receive electric power from the electricity works in accordance with the contract existing between them. However this does not constitute interference with an established and active commercial or individual enterprise; to do so would exceed the range of protection accorded to commercial or industrial enterprises by the practice of the courts; instead the issue involves a violation of property in the cable belonging to the electricity works and of the right of the plaintiff against the electricity works for the supply of electric power, limited by the latter’s general conditions of trade.

If, therefore, the plaintiff’s claim cannot be based on a violation of his right to an established and active commercial or individual enterprise, it cannot be supported either, contrary to the view of the Court of Appeal, on the ground that the defendant had violated the required care of the safety of others [Verkehrssicherungspflicht].

Case 12

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 8 JUNE 1976
BGHZ 66, 388 = NJW 1976, 1740 = VERSR 1976, 1043

The defendant company, which ran a building enterprise, was on 23 November 1973 carrying out excavations on private property in the Württemberg town W. An electric cable was negligently damaged. This led to a 27-minute interruption of the current used in the plaintiff's manufacturing business. The plaintiff estimated that the interruption led, through a failure of production, to a loss of DM 1157. The plaintiff claims that amount as damages from the defendant.

Both lower instances rejected the claim. The plaintiff is granted leave to apply for review, but is unsuccessful for the following reasons:

I. 1. The appellate court is of opinion that:

(a) The claim can find no support in § 823 I BGB; for not property of the plaintiff's was damaged or destroyed by the electricity failure. Moreover, no legal injury was done to the plaintiff's right of an established and active business, since there was no direct interference with it.

(b) Moreover, the appellate court rejects a claim for compensation under § 823 II BGB; for the defendant's contravention of § 18 III of the Baden-Württemberg Building Regulations (LBauO) did not constitute a breach of an enactment designed for the plaintiff's protection. The provision says:

“Public spaces, supply, run-off and warning apparatuses and also hydrants, survey marks, and boundary marks must be protected during the process of building and, where necessary, be kept accessible subject to the necessary precautions.”

In essentials the appellate court says: The language of this provision contemplates damage only to things, not persons. Moreover, the Regulations as a whole belong to the law of public security and order. § 18 III cannot be assumed to afford to electricity users a claim to compensation not otherwise provided for, all the more since it would lead to a great and intolerable extension of liability. It would also be consistent with the fact that § 1 II no. 1 of the Regulations affords no private law right to compensation where a similar accident occurs in the course of building in places open to public traffic. This reasoning is in open conflict with the BGH decision of 12 March 1968 about the corresponding regulations of Land Nordrhein-Westfalen.

It is against this reasoning (i.e., of BGH NJW 1968, 1279) that this appeal is lodged. In support of the appeal a question is raised whether, contrary to the principles laid down by BGHZ 29, 65 (74) = NJW 1959, 479, an interruption of electricity supply is not to be regarded as an invasion of the right of an established and active business, in the sense of § 823 I BGB.

II. The appeal is unsuccessful.

1. The Senate deciding the case agrees with the appellate court in holding that the plaintiff cannot invoke § 18 III 1 of the Regulations as a protective enactment for the purposes of § 823 II BGB. In so far as this runs counter to the principles of the aforementioned decision of the BGH of 12 March 1968, the Court rejects them. The decision of 12 March 1968 is not followed.

(a) [Earlier decisions elsewhere are in agreement.]

(b) There are convincing reasons for approving the appellate decision. That certain provisions of the Regulations, especially those for the protection of neighbours, can be treated as protective enactments for the purposes of § 823 II BGB does not stand in the way. For no such purpose can be detected in favour of electricity users.

(aa) The provision of the Regulations here in question is not an enactment for the protection of the plaintiff. Although admittedly most rules of a public law character operate in a general way to protect and further the interest of individual citizens, it does not follow that that general operation also specifies the cases where a protective enactment in question affords him an individual protection. That is not difficult to establish if the protective function of a rule can be detected in the statement of its purpose; but if, as often happens with recent enactments, the travaux préparatoires give only an imperfect indication or none at all, it is of no use to consider legislative purpose in the abstract: nor has this been done so far by the Federal High Court, despite some ambiguous formulations. In the last resort the question must be attacked directly, whether the creation of an individual claim for compensation appears meaningful, sensible, and tolerable in the light of the whole system of liability. Only by doing so can a development, rightly feared by the appellate court, be avoided, namely that the increasing tendency to base claims on § 823 II BGB might undermine Parliament's ruling against a general liability for purely economic loss. In this connection it may be useful to ask whether in such cases an individual claim for an injunction would be sensible and tolerable.

(c) There is no need to go further into these aspects of the decision; for it appears from what has been said that the appellate court properly decided that the Regulations afforded no individual protection to users of electricity against possible economic damage.

(aa) According to the basic principle of liability laid down by federal law there is, as a rule, no liability for indirect damage (economic damage that a third party suffers by mere reflex operation through injury to another's property); and this includes damage to an electricity user resulting from damage to a cable owned by an electricity supplier. That the failure to afford compensation is not felt to be intolerable is shown inter alia by the fact that the responsibility of electricity suppliers even for vital failures is excluded by regular nation-wide conditions of supply. Although the possibility cannot be absolutely excluded that this principle may be set aside by protective Land legislation, nevertheless, such legislation should be interpreted to extend protection only if the need for it arises from a state of affairs in the law of the Land which could not have been anticipated on a federal level. Since that is obviously not the case here, the constitutional distribution of powers makes it unlikely that the Land legislator wantonly intended to extend protection by action repugnant to the federal rule.

(bb) But even apart from this constitutional aspect, based on the concept of constitutional demarcation of authority, the appellate decision must be approved. There is nothing to be said for the view that the Regulations, when regulating building, intended to afford to electricity users an abnormal individual protection when a cable is damaged. The appellate court rightly points to the lack of any corresponding provision in § 1 II of the LBauO (Landesbauordnung), where danger to cables is especially to be anticipated, that is to say, where works are conducted in places open to public traffic. In other fields also electricity users have no individual protection, for instance where cables are endangered in traffic, mining, or agricultural accidents. The possibility that a building regulation intends to afford a protection so much out of line in this particular field is very remote. The official statement of motives leading to the Regulations here in question lends no assistance. Moreover, it is noticeable that the basic duty of care already existed in the general law and was not originally created by the Regulations as part of Land law. Its inclusion in § 18 III only serves to sum up precautions required to be taken in works regulated by statute, and to form a basis for prosecution. There is nothing to show that an arbitrary individual protection was aimed at, alien to federal law and as part of a generally inappropriate set of regulations.

2. The appellate court also appropriately rejects any liability to compensate for an interference with the plaintiff’s business. It finds itself in agreement with the Senate decision of 1959 which dealt with a case on all fours with this one. The Senate, on reconsideration, holds fast in principle to its decision in spite of some loudly expressed academic criticism. The need to relate to a trade, as established by the 1959 judgment, which is denied in cases such as the present one, is essential if the protection provided by case-law in the event of a violation of the right of an established and active business is not to be enlarged into a general delictual rule for the protection of traders. The highest court has always taken this point into account although the boundaries of this “residual right” affording special protection to traders have never been fully defined and much could be said in favour of a restrictive application of this delictual rule. In any event, matters cannot be otherwise in the case of a power cut of this nature which affects everyone and which is liable to cause widespread financial loss to persons who do not exercise any trade and to whom the general law of delict affords no claim for damages.

The above cannot be countered with the argument that where damage is caused by an electricity failure a distinction between physical and economic damage makes little sense. In fact the Senate has so far awarded damages for physical damage in business according to § 823 I BGB. This, it must be admitted, somewhat surprising limitation—von Caemmerer calls it “crude”—rests on a binding general decision of the delictual law in force. It is impossible to recognize any reason for departing from it in favour of businesses. In any event, might not the danger of less foreseeable and perhaps much greater physical damage involved in such accidents justify a partial exemption of the tortfeasor from a risk that the electricity supplier frees himself from with state approval? But the present case affords no occasion for such an examination, since physical damage is neither manifest nor even doubtful.

Case 13

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 12 JULY 1977
NJW 1977, 2208 = JZ 1977, 721 = VERSR 1977, 1006

The defendant was carrying out earth removal operations required in the construction of an aqueduct and reservoir for the city B and the local water authority. In the course of the works a mechanical digger operated by one of the defendant’s men damaged an electric cable which supplied several concerns. As a result current to the plaintiff’s business was interrupted for 32 minutes, and the work of its 1385 employees brought to a halt.

The Landgericht and the Oberlandesgericht dismissed the claim for damages. The plaintiff's appeal was also dismissed.

Reasons

I. 1. The Court of Appeal held that the plaintiff had no tort claim under § 823 I BGB, since no legal interest protected by this rule had been invaded: in having to pay wages when no work could be done owing to the lack of current the plaintiff suffered a purely economic loss. The court also held that there had been no invasion of an established and operative business. Furthermore, no claim arose under § 823 II BGB, for although there was a provincial regulation regarding the safeguarding of electric cables during building operations (§ 18 III Provincial Building Ordinance of Baden-Württemberg—BadWürttBauO), it did not have the character of a protective law (Schutzgesetz) in favour of customers supplied from the national electricity grid.

2. This is perfectly in line with the decision of this court.

(a) This court has frequently stated the preconditions which must be met before damages are payable for affecting a business (BGHZ 29, 65; 41, 123; 66, 388, 393). Those principles involve the conclusion that the damage done by the defendant's mechanical digger to the electric cable was not an invasion of the plaintiff's business as such, since there is lacking the requirement of intimate connection with the business (Betriebsbezogenheit). In a similar case (BGHZ 29, 65, 74) the court said that the breaking of an electric cable supplying a factory is no more intimately connected with the business than injury to its employees or damage to its vehicles: it is not an essential characteristic feature of an established and operative business that it have an uninterrupted supply of electricity, especially as all the other customers connected to the same cable have the same legal relationship with the utility that supplies the current. We need not dwell on this point since even the appellant does not contest it.

(b) Although it had previously held otherwise (see, for example, NJW 1968, 1279), this court in its decision of 8 June 1976 (BGHZ 66, 388) stated that § 18 III BadWürttBauO (and the similar provisions of the building ordinances of other Länder) are not protective laws in favour of subscribers who suffer economic loss through a lack of current due to damage to a cable. Accordingly there are no legal objections to the view of the Court of Appeal, which evidently was unaware of that decision. Nor, indeed, does the appellant himself contest this part of the judgment.

II. The plaintiff also puts forward a contractual claim both in his own right and by assignment. The Court of Appeal rejected this. The underlying facts are that representatives of the parties had a meeting on site with representatives of the water authority and the city, that the plaintiff's business manager and the city representative drew attention to the presence of the main electric cable where the earthworks were about to begin and stressed how vital it was for the plaintiff's business, and that the defendant's clerk of works was then told that any digging in the neighbourhood of the cable must be done by hand rather than by machine. The Court of Appeal analysed these facts correctly, and its holding that the plaintiff was not drawn into the protective ambit of the contract of services between the water authority and the defendant cannot be faulted.

1. Case-law recognises that persons not immediately involved in a contract may yet be drawn within its protective ambit, with the result that although they cannot bring a claim for performance, as would be the case if it were a true contract for the benefit of third parties under § 328 I BGB, they may nevertheless have a contractual claim for damages if they suffer harm owing to faulty conduct by the debtor in breach of contract (on this see BGHZ 49, 350; NJW 1975, 344; NJW 1954, 874; BGH VersR 1955, 750; NJW 1956, 1193; NJW 1959, 1676; BGHZ 51, 91, 96).

The cases agree that whether third parties are to be included in the protective area of a contract when they were not involved in its formation and have not been expressly covered by the parties, depends on the meaning and purpose of the contract and its construction in accordance with the principle of good faith (§ 157 BGB) (see BGHZ 56, 269, 273); in the long run what is critical is not so much the relationship between the contractors themselves as the special relationship between the creditor and the third party whose inclusion is in question (see especially BGHZ 51, 91, 96). In order to avoid an intolerable extension of contractual duties of care beyond what the principle of good faith can demand of the debtor of the contractual performance, the court has frequently observed that the duties of care and protection can only be extended beyond the actual parties to the contract if the principal creditor (here the water authority) has some responsibility for the well-being of the third party, as owing him protection and care (see especially BGHZ 51, 91, 96; NJW 1974, 1189). This requirement, which is needed so as to avoid blurring the line between contractual and tortious liability in an insupportable manner and contrary to the will of the legislature, is normally present only when there is a legal relationship of a personal nature between the contractual creditor and the third party, such as commonly arises in family relationships, in employment, and in landlord and tenant cases (see BGHZ 51, 91, 96).

2. Contrary to the appellant’s contention, the Court of Appeal acted consistently with these principles in holding that the requirements for including the plaintiff in the protective area of the contract for work between the defendant and the water authority were not satisfied in this case.

(a) In particular the water authority here was in no way responsible for the well-being of the plaintiff. For the contractual creditor, the plaintiff was only one of a large number of subscribers that might be affected by damage to the cable. As this court said in its judgment of 3 November 1961 (VersR 1962, 86, 88), contractual duties must not be extended in cases where faulty work or failure to take security measures could cause harm to people of all kinds—houseowners, tenants, entrepreneurs, and so on—for then the class of people protected by the contract would be unlimited and unenforceable. The mere fact that the plaintiff’s business was apt to suffer a considerable economic loss through interruption of the electricity supply does not justify holding that the water authority which could itself suffer if the plaintiff was damaged, must look out for its well-being. Even if it be true that the contractual creditor had a certain interest in the safety of the cable, this interest was only a general one, and not one solely or predominantly related to the needs of the plaintiff for which the plaintiff could claim protection from the creditor.

(b) Nor can it be said that the meeting on site modified the contract of works between the defendant and the water authority. The water authority was bound to give such instructions before the work started in order to enable the defendant to take the necessary steps to protect the utility cables (including telephone cables—§ 317 StGB), and the special reference to the harm the plaintiff might suffer if the current were interrupted was insufficient to bring it within the protective area of the contract contrary to the principles already stated. It is important that at the time he concludes the contract, the contractual debtor should be able to see what risk he is undertaking, and this would be impossible if the creditor could later determine what third parties were to be included in its protective area by making a unilateral declaration to the debtor or to some unauthorised employee.

3. The Court of Appeal was also right to hold that the plaintiff had no assigned claim for damages from the water authority. The requirements of Drittschadenliquidation are not met (BGHZ 51, 91, 93 ff.). There is no special legal relationship between the plaintiff and the water authority, the defendant's contractual creditor, such as would justify holding that in law it was not the creditor but the plaintiff who suffered the harm. Only if, at the time of the wrong, the creditor's interest is vested in, or has passed to, the third party, does the party liable have to make good to the creditor what is lost by reason of the creditor's legal and economic relations with the third party. Apart from a few exceptional cases (e.g. BGHZ 40, 91, 100) this only applies when the creditor has contracted on the third party's account (e.g. BGHZ 25, 250, 258) or when the object which the debtor was to safeguard belonged not to the creditor but to the third party (as in BGHZ 15, 224). No such fact situation is present here (see also NJW 1959, 479). We need not now enquire what the case would be if the defendant contractor had undertaken by contract a specific duty of care towards the third party since, as has been stated, no such agreement is shown to have been made.

Notes to Cases 11–13

1. These cases represent one facet of the wider problem of compensability of purely economic loss which remains, both in German and Anglo-American law, a central topic of the law of torts: (i) because it impinges (as cases 19 and 27 also show) on the uneasy relationship between contract and tort and (ii) because the decisions on this topic show how judicial fashions change vis-à-vis the concepts used to limit liability for negligence. We shall return to these more general points later; here suffice it to make a few general remarks about these “cable cases”.

2. The factual situation is, typically, the following: A damages B's property and as a result C, (and, perhaps, others) suffer economic loss. Cases 8, 9, and 10 fall into this pattern and find an excellent English equivalent in Spartan Steel v. Martin and Co. [1973] 1 QB 27 and an American parallel in Beck v. FMC Corporation, 385 NYS 2d 956; aff'd, 369 NE 2d 10 (1977). A factual variant, raising analogous problems, is the following: A, a water company usually under a contractual obligation with a local authority B to provide water and maintain proper water pressures, fails to do so. As a result of this, firemen are unable to extinguish a fire that breaks out and consumes C's house. In all but four American jurisdictions C's claims against A are turned down, H. R. Moch Co. v. Rensselaer Water Co., 247 NY 160, 159 NE 896 (1928) being, perhaps, the locus classicus. These negative results of Anglo-American and German law call for a comment, not least because they are in stark contrast with the attitude taken by other systems (e.g. the French).

3. It is interesting to compare case 12 with Spartan Steel, above, and discover the true reasons that lie behind these judgments. Which of these judgments do you find most convincing? How many of the reasons given by Lord Denning MR, whose judgment is extracted below, can also be found in the German decision? Zweigert and Kötz, § 5, maintain that “style” is one of the most important distinguishing features between Common law and modern civil law (though they do not specifically discuss judicial styles). How different do you find the style of: (i) the American and German judgments; (ii) the American and English judgments?

4. A policy factor which gets short shrift in these judgments is the insurance factor. The American water cases display an amazing ingenuity in utilising every legal concept under the sun to turn down these claims while at the same time avoiding talking openly about insurance considerations. In these cases two types of insurance can be envisaged: loss insurance (which would justify the status quo) and liability insurance (which would argue in favour of a change in the law). Which of the two is cheaper and more efficient and why? A good discussion of the insurance factor can be found in 51 Cornell Law Rev. 142 (1965) and, most recently, in the decision of the Canadian Supreme Court in Norsk Pacific Steamship Co. Ltd. v. Canadian National Railway Co. [1992] 1 S.C.R. 1021 (extracts of which are reproduced below, pp. 243 ff.). The insurance aspect of the case is also increasingly considered by the German legal literature which seems divided as to whether a change in the law is desirable. For further details see Hager, “Haftung bei Störung der Energiezufuhr”, JZ 1979, 53 and Bürge, “Die Kabelbruchfälle . . .”, Juristische Blätter 1981, 57. The two most thorough monographs on the subject are by Hermann, Zum Nachteil des Vermögens (1979) and Taupitz, Haftung für Energieleiterstörungen durch Dritte (1981).

5. In England the attitude of the courts towards economic loss has vacillated in the late 1970s, the 1980 and the early 1990s. Though these doubts can also be found in other Common law jurisdictions such as Australia, Canada, and New Zealand the trend has, if anything, been towards a renunciation of the categorical exclusion rule. This is certainly the case in the last two of the aforementioned countries whereas the first seems to have opted for a nuanced approach. (For Canada see: Kamloops v. Nielsen [1984] 2 SCR 2; Norsk Pacific Steamship Co. v. CNR [1992] 1 SCR 1021; Winnipeg Condominium Corp. No. 36 v. Bird Construction Co. Ltd. [1995] 1 SCR 85 = (1995) 121 DLR (4th) 193. For New Zealand see Invercargill CC v. Hamlin [1994] 3 NZLR 513—a decision which forced the Privy Council—[1996] 2 WLR 367 P.C.—to accept that Commonwealth jurisdictions could agree to differ among themselves! For Australia see Bryan v. Maloney (1995) 182 CLR 609 but, also, Hill v. Van Erp (1997) 188 CLR 159. The different Commonwealth authorities are discussed by Mullany Torts in the Nineties (1997), chapter 1. The cable cases, however, in England (and elsewhere) have remained unaffected so one is forced to cope with some fine distinctions they have provoked and which can also be found in America.

One situation where recovery is allowed is where the plaintiff can prove that his economic loss is immediately consequential upon damage to property. Cf. Newlin v. New England Tel and Tel Co., 316 Mass. 234, 54 NE 2d 929 (1944) (USA); SCM (UK) Ltd. v. W J Whittal and Son Ltd [1971] 1 QB 337 (England); and BGHZ 41, 123 and, more recently, BGH VersR 85, 1147 (Germany). This distinction helps to keep litigation under control, but it is crude and it has not passed uncriticised. (See the powerful dissenting judgment of Edmund Davies LJ in the Spartan Steel case.) The comparison of two American cases, Beck (above) and Dunlop Tire and Rubber Corp. v. FM Corp., 53 App. Div. 2d 150, 385 NYS 2d 971 (1976), offers a good illustration of the problem.

In Beck an explosion in factory A (FMC) damaged an electric power plant B (Niagara Mohawk) which supplied electricity to C (a Chevrolet plant). During the power cut, C laid off its hourly-paid work-force, and refused to pay it. D, one of the workers, sued B for breach of warranty and negligence, and A for negligence. The contract-based action was dismissed on the convincing ground that D was only an incidental beneficiary of the contract between B and C. The tortious actions against A and B were dismissed on the ground that no duty was owed by either of them to D. The reasoning begs the question, but the court let the cat out of the bag when it said that any “. . . contrary determination would unduly extend the liability of this defendant to an indefinite number of potential beneficiaries”.

Dunlop's facts were slightly different, though the action arose out of the same incident at FMC's factory. In Dunlop the explosion in A, besides damaging the power company B, also caused stones and debris to fall on C's (Dunlop's) plant. (Dunlop was about a mile closer to the centre of the explosion than Chevrolet was in the Beck case.) C (Dunlop) sustained lost profits of $170,000 due to the power cut and a further $16,445 due to the power cut as well as the prejudicial effect that the explosion had on its machinery. With regard to the latter, the court felt that Beck's case did not apply since C's claim was not “vicarious or derivative” (by which the court must have meant ricochet). But is C's tortious action in Dunlop really different from that of D in Beck? Was Beck adequately distinguished, or was the real reason for granting the claim in Dunlop connected with the fact that it was closely linked with material damage? This crucial point is only raised as a secondary point by the court.

Dunlop's first and main claim for their purely economic loss was rejected. This time, however, causative language was used.

"Logically [said the court] if damage from the loss of power was foreseeable, then the interruption of production was also foreseeable and the lost profits resulting from the interruption should be compensatable, if proved and if, indeed, lost profits are recoverable at all in a tort action. However, while there is some limited authority that lost profits may be recovered [citations] such damages are subject to the general rule of certainty which requires that the plaintiff prove the extent of the damage and the causal relationship between the defendant's negligence and the damage."

And the court concluded: "A stoppage in production . . . does not necessarily result in lost profits and the damage which a manufacturer may sustain for a 24-hour shut-down of electrical power may well be too remote and speculative to be compensated." Can this reasoning be squared with that in Beck? The reasoning of the Dunlop court suggests that the floodgates of litigation can be controlled through the medium of foreseeability and remoteness. If that is so why use (as Beck did) the duty concept and frustrate recovery in all cases?

6. If distinctions are to be made what about the following situations?

(a) A damages B's cable which has been installed to service only C's factory. Can C recover? The point does not appear to have been decided in either England or Germany but an Australian case has given an affirmative answer. Caltex Oil (Australia) Pty v. The Dredge "Willemstad" (1976) 11 ALR 227. Here the floodgates argument cannot be invoked. Could this case be solved by applying Lord Goff's theory of "transferred loss" or the Germanic equivalent of Drittschadensliquidation? (See discussion above, p. 214.) In the Caltex case the Australian High Court distanced itself from the broad exclusionary rule so favoured by England courts. But the rich variety of views found in the multi-judgment decision makes it difficult to extract a common ratio decidendi and for this reason its precedential value in subsequent "leading" cases—such as Norsk—seems to have been limited.

(b) If A damages B's cable and C's molten material solidifies during the power cut and has to be thrown away, C has suffered material damage and can therefore recover damages for it (and for consequential loss of profits). But what if the solidified material can be remelted and used after the restoration of the power? A German court (OLG Hamm NJW 1973, 760) held that this was not interference with property since there was no permanent interference with its substance. The reasoning appears too abstract and conceptual, and perhaps it would be more convincing to accept that there is material damage. That the damage was only temporary should thus only influence the quantum of damages rather than the characterization of the loss as material or economic. On these points see Möschel, "Der Schutzbereich des Eigentums nach § 823 I BGB", JuS 1977, 1, 5; Isenbeck, note on OLG Hamm in NJW 1973, 1755.

7. Case 9 also considers whether a claim can be based on § 823 II BGB (see discussion in text, chapter 4). In the late 1960s the Supreme Court held that it could: BGH NJW 1968, 1279. The State Court of Appeals refused, however, to follow suit (see, for example, BayObLG NJW 1972, 1085; OLG Hamm NJW 1973, 760; OLG Saarbrücken VersR 1976, 176) and in the end forced the Supreme Court to recant. The answer, however, once again depends on unexpressed policy views about the issues. How else can one explain the fact that identically phrased statutory provisions have received different characterisations in Germany, Austria, and Switzerland? On this see the exhaustive treatment of Bürge in Juristische Blätter 1981, 57.

Addendum

Extracts from Lord Denning MR's judgment in Spartan Steel v. Martin and Co. [1973] 1 QB 27, 36.

At bottom I think the question of recovering economic loss is one of policy. Whenever the courts draw a line to mark out the bounds of duty, they do it as matter of policy so as to limit the responsibility of the defendant. Whenever the courts set bounds to the damages recoverable—saying that they are, or are not, too remote—they do it as matter of policy so as to limit the liability of the defendant.

In many of the cases where economic loss has been held not to be recoverable, it has been put on the ground that the defendant was under no duty to the plaintiff. Thus where a person is injured in a road accident by the negligence of another, the negligent driver owes a duty to the injured man himself, but he owes no duty to the servant of the injured man—see Best v. Samuel Fox and Co. Ltd [1952] AC 716, 731; nor to the master of the injured man—Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Hambrook [1956] QB 641, 660; nor to anyone else who suffers loss because he had a contract with the injured man—see Simpson and Co. v. Thomson (1877) 3 App. Cas. 279, 289; nor indeed to anyone who only suffers economic loss on account of the accident—see Kirkham v. Boughy [1958] 2 QB 338, 341. Likewise, when property is damaged by the negligence of another, the negligent tortfeasor owes a duty to the owner or possessor of the chattel, but not to one who suffers loss only because he had a contract entitling him to use the chattel or giving him a right to receive it at some later date—see Elliott Steam Tug Co. Ltd. v. Shipping Controller [1922] 1 KB 127, 139 and Margarine Union GMBH v. Cambay Prince Steamship Co. Ltd [1969] 1 QB 219, 251–2.

In other cases, however, the defendant seems clearly to have been under a duty to the plaintiff, but the economic loss has not been recovered because it is too remote. Take the illustration given by Blackburn J. in Cattle v. Stockton Waterworks Co. (1875) LR 10 QB 453, 457, when water escapes from a reservoir and floods a coal mine where many men are working. Those who had their tools or clothes destroyed could recover, but those who only lost their wages could not. Similarly, when the defendants’ ship negligently sank a ship which was being towed by a tug, the owner of the tug lost his remuneration, but he could not recover it from the negligent ship, though the same duty (of navigation with reasonable care) was owed to both tug and tow—see Société Anonyme de Remorquage à Hélice v. Bennetts [1911] 1 KB 243, 248. In such cases if the plaintiff or his property had been physically injured, he would have recovered: but, as he only suffered economic loss, he is held not entitled to recover. This is, I should think, because the loss is regarded by the law as too remote—see King v. Phillips [1953] 1 QB 429, 439–40.

On the other hand, in the cases where economic loss by itself has been held to be recoverable, it is plain that there was a duty to the plaintiff and the loss was not too remote. Such as when one ship negligently runs down another ship, and damages it, with the result that the cargo has to be discharged and reloaded. The negligent ship was already under a duty to the owners of the cargo, and they can recover the cost of discharging and reloading it, as it is not too remote—see Morrison Steamship Co. Ltd v. Greystoke Castle (Cargo Owners) [1947] AC 265. Likewise, when a banker negligently gives a reference to one who acts on it, the duty is plain and the damage is not too remote—see Hedley Byrne and Co. Ltd v. Heller and Partners Ltd [1964] AC 465.

The more I think about these cases, the more difficult I find it to put each into its proper pigeon-hole. Sometimes I say: “There was no duty.” In others I say: “The damage was too remote.” So much so that I think that the time has come to discard those tests which have proved so elusive. It seems to me better to consider the particular relationship in hand, and see whether or not, as a matter of policy, economic loss should be recoverable, or not. Thus in Weller and Co. v. Foot and Mouth Disease Research Institute [1966] 1 QB 569 it was plain that the loss suffered by the auctioneers was not recoverable, no matter whether it is put on the ground that there was no duty or that the damage was too remote. Again in Electrochrome Ltd v. Welsh Plastics Ltd [1968] 2 All ER 205, it is plain that the economic loss suffered by the plaintiffs’ factory (due to the damage to the fire hydrant) was not recoverable, whether because there was no duty or that it was too remote.

So I turn to the relationship in the present case. It is of common occurrence. The parties concerned are: the electricity board who are under a statutory duty to maintain supplies of electricity in their district; the inhabitants of the district, including this factory, who are entitled by statute to a continuous supply of electricity for their use; and the contractors who dig up the road. Similar relationships occur with other statutory bodies, such as gas and water undertakings. The cable may be damaged by the negligence of the statutory undertaker, or by the negligence of the contractor, or by accident without any negligence by anyone, and the power may have to be cut off whilst the cable is repaired. Or the power may be cut off owing to a short circuit in the power house and so forth. If the cutting-off of the supply causes economic loss to the consumers, should it as matter of policy be recoverable? And against whom?

The first consideration is the position of the statutory undertakers. If the board do not keep up the voltage or pressure of electricity, gas, or water—or, likewise, if they shut it off for repairs—and thereby cause economic loss to their consumers, they are not liable in damages, not even if the cause of it is due to their own negligence. The only remedy (which is hardly ever pursued) is to prosecute the board before the magistrates. Such is the result of many cases, starting with a water board—Atkinson v. Newcastle and Gateshead Waterworks Co. (1877) 2 Ex. D. 441; going on to a gas board—Clegg, Parkinson and Co. v. Earby Gas Co. [1896] 1 QB 592; and then on to an electricity company—Stevens v. Aldershot Gas, Water and District Lighting Co. Ltd best reported in (1932) 31 LGR 68; also in 102 LJKB 12. In those cases the courts, looking at the legislative enactments, held that Parliament did not intend to expose the board to liability for damages to the inhabitants en masse: see what Lord Cairns LC said in Atkinson v. Newcastle and Gateshead Waterworks Co. 2 Ex. D. 441, 445 and Wills J in Clegg, Parkinson and Co. v. Earby Gas Co. [1896] 1 QB 592, 595. In those cases there was indirect damage to the plaintiffs but it was not recoverable. There is another group of cases which go to show that, if the board, by their negligence in the conduct of their supply cause direct physical damage or injury to person or property, they are liable: see Milnes v. Huddersfield Corporation (1886) 11 App. Cas. 511, 530 by Lord Blackburn; Midwood and Co. Ltd v. Manchester Corporation [1905] 2 KB 597; Heard v. Brymbo Steel Co. Ltd [1947] KB 692 and Hartley v. Mayoh and Co. [1954] 1 QB 383. But one thing is clear: the statutory undertakers have never been held liable for economic loss only. If such be the policy of the legislature in regard to electricity boards, it would seem right for the Common law to adopt a similar policy in regard to contractors. If the electricity boards are not liable for economic loss due to negligence which results in cutting off the supply, nor should a contractor be liable.

The second consideration is the nature of the hazard, namely cutting off the supply of electricity. This is a hazard which we all run. It may be due to a short circuit, to a flash of lightning, to a tree falling in the wires, to an accidental cutting of the cable, or even to the negligence of someone or other. And when it does happen, it affects a multitude of persons: not as a rule by way of physical damage to them or their property, but by putting them to inconvenience, and sometimes to economic loss. The supply is usually restored in a few hours, so the economic loss is not very large. Such a hazard is regarded by most people as a thing they must put up with—without seeking compensation from anyone. Some there are who install a stand-by system. Others seek refuge by taking out an insurance policy against breakdown in the supply. But most people are content to take the risk on themselves. When the supply is cut off, they do not go running round to their solicitor. They do not try to find out whether it was anyone's fault. They just put up with it. They try to make up the economic loss by doing more work next day. This is a healthy attitude which the law should encourage.

The third consideration is this: if claims for economic loss were permitted for this particular hazard, there would be no end of claims. Some might be genuine, but many might be inflated, or even false. A machine might not have been in use anyway, but it would be easy to put it down to the cut in supply. It would be well nigh impossible to check the claims. If there was economic loss on one day, did the claimant do his best to mitigate it by working harder next day? And so forth. Rather than expose claimants to such temptation and defendants to such hard labour—on comparatively small claims—it is better to disallow economic loss altogether, at any rate when it stands alone, independent of any physical damage.

The fourth consideration is that, in such a hazard as this, the risk of economic loss should be suffered by the whole community who suffer the losses—usually many but comparatively small losses—rather than on the one pair of shoulders, that is, on the contractor on whom the total of them, all added together, might be very heavy.

The fifth consideration is that the law provides for deserving cases. If the defendant is guilty of negligence which cuts off the electricity supply and causes actual physical damage to person or property, that physical damage can be recovered: see Baker v. Crow Carrying Co. Ltd. (unreported) 1 February 1960; Bar Library Transcript No. 45, referred to by Buckley LJ in SCM (UK) Ltd. v. W J Whittall and Son Ltd. [1971] 1 QB 337, 356; and also any economic loss truly consequential on the material damage; see British Celanese Ltd. v. A H Hunt (Capacitors) Ltd. [1969] 1 WLR 959 and SCM (UK) Ltd. v. W J Whittall and Son Ltd. [1971] 1 QB 337. Such cases will be comparatively few. They will be readily capable of proof and will be easily checked. They should be and are admitted.

These considerations lead me to the conclusion that the plaintiffs should recover for the physical damage to the one melt (£368), and the loss of profit on that melt consequent thereon (£400); but not for the loss of profit on the four melts (£1,767), because that was economic loss independent of the physical damage.

6. ECONOMIC LOSS (LOSS OF USE; OTHER POSSIBLE HEADINGS)

Case 14

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SECOND CIVIL SENATE) 21 DECEMBER 1970 BGHZ 55, 153 = NJW 1971, 886 = VERSR 1971, 418

The defendant Federal Republic of Germany was the owner of a navigable channel which connected a mill with the port of B. During the night of 21 October 1965 part of the wall forming the bank collapsed bringing down part of the external wall of a dwelling house based on it. In order to prevent a further collapse of the house, its owner, acting in accordance with an order of the competent authority, the City of B inserted beams as support. Two of these were inserted between the two banks of the channel immediately upon its surface. Thus the channel was effectively closed until the bank of the channel was provisionally restored during the middle of 1966. As a result the plaintiff's motor vessel Christel was immobilised at the mill; nor could the plaintiff approach the mill with his other vessels, as he was contractually bound to do, in order to carry goods to and from the mill. He claimed damages amounting to DM 31,061 for loss of earnings.

The Landgericht Stade and the Court of Appeal of Celle allowed the claim. Upon a second appeal, the claim was rejected in part for the following.

Reasons

I. . . .

II. . . .

1. The Court of Appeal is correct in holding that the case of a culpable violation of the duty incumbent upon the defendant by its constitutionally appointed organs to maintain the channel, § 823 I, §§ 89, 31 BGB must be considered as forming the basis of the claim, and not, as the appellant contends § 839 BGB in conjunction with Article 34 of the Federal Constitution (GG) . . .

Prior to and at the time of the collapse of the wall forming the bank the duty to maintain it was vested (by State) in a particular authority. The culpable violation of this duty gives rise to claims under § 823 I BGB [references] . . .

2. . . . it follows from the existing duties of the defendant [references] to keep the channel open to navigation that it is also obliged to prevent the threatening collapse of the wall of the channel by suitable safety measures which the owner must tolerate . . .

In the special circumstances the duty of the defendant to secure the navigability of the channel included not only the duty to restore it when obstructed or rendered impassable, but also the duty to remedy by suitable measures any immediate danger which endangered the navigability of the channel owing to the state of the walls or the banks.

3. As the Court of Appeal has held with justification, the authority constitutionally appointed by the defendant has culpably violated this duty . . .

The appellants is wrong in contending that the culpable violation of this duty was the adequate causation for the closure of the channel and therefore for the losses of the plaintiff resulting therefrom. It is true that the immediate cause for closure of the channel was the order of the city of B of 22 October 1965 and the propping-up of the house, street no. 10 in the execution of this order. Both were only the adequate consequence of the preceding violation of the duty incumbent upon the authority constitutionally appointed by the defendant. For it is not outside common experience that the failure to secure a defective wall of a bank which supports an external wall of a building, can lead to consequences of this kind.

4. The Court of Appeal denies that the provisions concerning the duty to maintain a waterway constitute a protective law in the meaning of § 823 II BGB. This is correct in law [references]. Nevertheless it holds the defendant liable in damages for the loss incurred by the plaintiff through the closure of the channel because the conduct of its constitutionally appointed organ in violation of its duty is to be regarded as an inadmissible interference with an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise. This reasoning, and partly also the result, are open to legal doubts.

(a) Liability based on interference with the right to an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise is subsidiary in character and is incurred only if no other remedy exists, and if the rules in force governing a certain topic viewed as a whole disclose the existence of a gap, which must be closed with the help of § 823 I BGB [reference]. An examination of the case from this angle leads to the following conclusions.

As regards the plaintiff's motor vessel Christel, any claim for damages on the ground of interference with a right to an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise is ruled out to the extent that damage to property has occurred which leads to loss. For property is damaged not only if the substance of an object is adversely affected but also by any other actual interference with the right of an owner [references]. In the present case property of the plaintiff in the motor vessel Christel has been damaged inasmuch as the vessel was forced to remain at the loading stage of the mill because the channel was closed. It was consequently unable to move beyond that area of the channel between the loading-stage and the beams which formed a bar. It was therefore practically eliminated as a means of transport and was incapable of normal use. The "imprisonment" of the vessel therefore constituted a factual interference with this vessel which affected the rights of the plaintiff as an owner. In denying an interference with property in a similar case the Reichsgericht [reference], contrary to the present Division, clearly proceeded from the assumption that an interference with property in the meaning of § 823 I BGB can exist only in an interference with the substance of an object, but not in any other kind of interference [reference]. Such a narrow interpretation of § 823 I BGB does not, however, accord with the purpose of this provision. This is to protect the rights enumerated therein against any culpable illegal violation. The defendant, who is responsible for the conduct of its constitutionally appointed representative (§§ 89, 31 BGB), who, in violating its duty caused damage, is therefore liable to pay compensation to the plaintiff for the damage arising from the “imprisonment” of the motor vessel Christel: § 823 I BGB. To this extent any liability of the defendant is excluded on the ground of illegal culpable interference with the rights of the plaintiff in an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise. Moreover it must remain undecided as to whether any such interference has taken place at all.

As regards the claim for damages in respect of the river boats which could not use the channel the answer must be different. To this extent the defendant has not interfered with the property of the plaintiff for the reason that the river-boats were not affected in their capacity of means of transport by the closure of the channel and were thus not diverted from their natural use. This conclusion is not altered by the fact that the plaintiff was unable to dispatch the river-boats to the loading-stage of the mill while the channel was closed. This cannot be regarded as an interference with property, but is a restriction of the plaintiff in the enjoyment of the common use of the channel together with all others who engage in shipping. Such common use is not, however, “another right” in the meaning of § 823 I BGB [reference].

(b) Therefore the question as to whether the violation of their duty by the constitutionally appointed authority is to be regarded as an inadmissible interference with an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise is only relevant in respect of the plaintiff’s claim for damages arising out of the closure of the channel. This court disagrees with the Court of Appeal which answered the question in the affirmative. The appellant is, however, wrong in arguing that in the present no right of the plaintiff in an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise has been violated if only for the reason that such a violation cannot be committed by an omission. The rights and legal interest which are protected by § 823 I BGB can also be violated through an omission [reference]. The appellant is right, however, in contending that the observations of the Court of Appeal as to whether in the present case the defendant has directly interfered with the plaintiff’s established and active commercial or industrial enterprise is not open to legal objections, at least in so far as they concern the amount of damages in issue.

It is recognised by the practice of the courts that not every illegal and culpable interference with the business activity of another gives rise to claims for damages in accordance with § 823 I BGB. Instead, this is only the case if the interference touches directly the sphere of the commercial or industrial enterprise, therefore centred on the enterprise and does not affect rights or protected interests which can be separated without difficulty from the commercial or industrial enterprise [references]. In the present case no such interference aimed at the plaintiff’s enterprise has taken place. The navigability of a waterway does not fall within the ambit of the commercial enterprise of a person engaged in shipping. A temporary closure of a waterway which also concerns others engaged in shipping does not therefore interfere with the plaintiff’s commercial enterprise. The Court of Appeal wishes to come to a different conclusion in the present case on the ground that the plaintiff’s vessels had used the channel, before its closure, more than others engaged in shipping—at times almost exclusively—and that the closure has temporarily prevented the plaintiff from complying with his contractual obligations towards the mill; but this reasoning cannot be accepted. The existence of such obligations does not mean that the navigability of a waterway, which a person engaged in shipping has to use within the framework of his contractual obligations, is to be regarded as falling within the sphere of that person's commercial enterprises. The contrary opinion of the Court of Appeal cannot be supported either by the consideration that at the time when the river-wall collapsed the journeys of the plaintiff's vessel on behalf of the mill represented an important part of the plaintiff's commercial activities. The question as to what falls within the commercial enterprise of a person engaged in shipping cannot be determined by the fact that one or several of his vessels are principally employed on certain river routes, seeing that this depends on the offers to load them made by third parties. The Court of Appeal is therefore wrong in holding that in the present case the defendant is liable to pay damages for having interfered with the plaintiff's established and active commercial enterprise also in so far as he could not for a time use the channel for his vessels. If this opinion were accepted it would mean that common users would be protected under the heading of "any other rights" of § 823 I BGB, if only by the circuitous route of a right in an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise.

It follows that the judgment appealed against is only to be upheld to the extent that it declares the plaintiff's claim arising out of the "imprisonment" of the motor vessel Christel to be justified (DM 24,086). The additional claim (DM 6965) must be dismissed.

Case 15

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 21 JUNE 1977
NJW 1977, 2264 = VERSR 1977, 965

The defendant was the liquidator in the bankruptcy of a limited partnership and of its deceased partner D who was personally liable. The partnership had conducted the business of a major petrol depot. In May 1972, a motorised petrol tanker belonging to a third party attended the depot in order to take on petrol. Owing to the negligence of the tanker's driver, a fire broke out, but the partnership as owners of the premises and the deceased partner were also to be blamed for having failed to prevent the negligent handling of the loading process by the driver of the tanker. Fearing that the fire might spread to the depot as a whole, the police ordered the temporary closure of the plaintiff's business premises for two hours and blocked for another three hours the access roads in order to keep them clear for the fire brigade. The plaintiff, on whose premises work had stopped for five hours, claimed damages representing wages paid and general expenses incurred in respect of the period of closure. He sued the defendant, the owner of the tanker and his employee.

The Court of First Instance and the Court of Appeal of Bamberg gave judgment for the plaintiff. Upon a second appeal by the defendant the judgment of the Court was quashed and the case was referred back to the Court of First Instance for the following.

Reasons

I. The Court of Appeal is of the opinion that the bankrupt is liable to pay damages because he has negligently damaged the established and active commercial enterprise of the plaintiff ("another right" in the meaning of § 823 I BGB). It held that in view of the existing danger to life the police could not allow the persons necessary to run the plaintiff's business to remain; thus the head office of the enterprise had ceased to function between 8.30 am and 10.30 am. Thus the fire had directly affected the running of the plaintiff's enterprise. Therefore the non-productive expenditure of wages and other running costs covering the five hours during which business was interrupted, as alleged by the plaintiff, constituted a direct damage to be compensated in accordance with § 823 I BGB. In this respect it held that the claim for damages was well founded. The Court of Appeal refrained therefore from determining whether the claim could also be maintained on the ground that the plaintiff's property in the business premises had been violated or on the basis of § 823 II BGB in conjunction with the Decree concerning Inflammable Liquids of 5 June 1970 (henceforth called the Decree) [reference].

II. The arguments cannot be supported in law for several reasons. It must be objected in the first place that the Court of Appeal has wrongly simplified the account of the facts referred to in the plaintiff's pleadings seeking to establish liability. A distinction must be drawn between the first period of two hours during which the business premises of the plaintiff were in immediate danger and were evacuated upon the order of the police and the ensuing period when, because of the fire in the tank depot, vehicles of the police and the fire brigade only blocked the (public) access road to the plaintiff's business premises, as a result of which, as the plaintiff alleges, no vehicles could leave the premises, thus making it impossible to supply the building lots for which he was responsible.

These two situations must be considered separately from the legal point of view. During the first period the plaintiff's premises and his power to dispose of them were directly curtailed. Subsequently however, the plaintiff was only prevented from enjoying the common use of a public highway, although he may have been particularly affected, since his premises border on to it, particularly as it provided the only access. The facts as found by the Court of First Instance do not disclose whether this interruption of traffic was damage resulting from the dangerous situation which threatened the plaintiff's premises or was the result of the measures to remove the danger.

1. Damage resulting from the closure of the business premises during the final two hours

(a) In this respect it is altogether questionable why the Court of Appeal was able to affirm that an interference with an established and active commercial enterprise had occurred. It is noted in the judgment and admitted that the Bundesgerichtshof regards it as imperative that the interference must be aimed at the enterprise [references] and that the Bundesgerichtshof is concerned above all to counter any excess, contrary to the legal system, of this special remedy in tort [reference]. The requirement that the interference must be aimed at the enterprise, to be meaningful, can only be understood in the sense that he who interfered must have violated those duties of conduct incumbent upon him in view of the particular needs of protection of a commercial or industrial enterprise. Nothing else can be deduced either from the dogmatic considerations contained in the aforementioned decision of this Division [reference], contrary to the Court of Appeal. It is necessary, however, to enlarge on this aspect. Precisely for the reason that the special remedy in tort created by the practice of this court is only intended to fulfil a need peculiar to commercial or industrial enterprise, it only concerns a situation not covered otherwise [references] which must give way to other legal grounds [references]. For this reason alone it was therefore wrong for the Court of Appeal, without considering other grounds for the claim, to proceed immediately to an examination as to whether a right in an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise had been violated.

(b) In fact, to the extent that it is based on the temporary evacuation on the order of the police and the acute danger of a fire and an explosion which was the reason for it, the plaintiff's claim for damages is justified under § 823 I BGB because his ownership and possession were infringed.

It is true that the substance of the premises and of the installations of the enterprise were not touched; this, however, is not essential [references]. As this Division has already stated in its decision of 14 February 1967 [references], the deprivation of an object, even if unaccompanied by damage or destruction, may constitute a violation of ownership in the meaning of § 823 I BGB [references]; the same applies to interference with an object which renders its use impossible [references]. On the other hand the mere fact that an object was endangered physically was not always treated as a violation of property [references]. This Division cannot share that view in a case such as the present where the existence of an acute danger obviously precluded any use, at least for a while. Moreover the right of ownership of the plaintiff (§ 903 BGB) was seriously restricted by the order of the police to evacuate the premises, even if only temporarily. For both these reasons those responsible for the fire in the petrol depot are liable for the violation of another's protected legal interest.

Thus the claim, to the extent considered at this stage, is justified as a violation of property (§ 823 I BGB). It need not be decided here whether the same result could be reached by applying § 823 II BGB in conjunction with the Decree or with § 309 of the Criminal Code.

2. Damage resulting from the blocking of the public access road

According to the plaintiff's pleadings . . . after the evacuation of his premises at the orders of the police had come to an end, he was prevented from dispatching his vehicles loaded with materials because the feeder road providing access to the business premises of the plaintiff continued to be blocked by vehicles of the police and of the fire brigade. Their presence, it would appear, no longer served the direct purpose of protecting the plaintiff's premises but in order to secure and to guard the place of the fire itself (see above, Introduction to II). It would seem that in the opinion of the Court of Appeal, the plaintiff's claim in respect of the ensuing loss was justified. This Division cannot accept this conclusion even in principle—unlike in the situation dealt with in (1), above.

(a) As stated previously, there are no indications that the damage is connected with the temporary danger to and evacuation of the premises of the plaintiff's enterprise. Consequently the damage cannot, to this extent, be the result of the violation of property examined in (1), above. It would also be wrong to regard the short-time interruption of public traffic on the access roads to the plaintiff's premises as an interference with the ownership of business premises. The difference from the case decided by the Bundesgerichtshof in [reference] (an inland waterways vessel being detained for months in a channel of a river) is obvious. The plaintiff has not put forward this view either; further, it is unnecessary to take into account that the Court of First Instance—the Court of Appeal left the question open—rightly requested the negligent conduct of the bankrupt owners of the petrol depot as involving several violations of provisions of the Decree. The reason is that there are no indications that these provisions of § 309 of the Criminal Code are intended to provide protection individually for traffic users [reference] whose freedom of movement is restricted temporarily as a result of the closure of a road for the purpose of extinguishing a fire and for safety measures. It is insufficient that the plaintiff, as the owner of neighbouring premises, was particularly affected by the closure.

The special remedy intended to cover a situation not provided for otherwise, namely for interference with a facility and an active or commercial or industrial enterprise cannot assist either. It is not the purpose of this special remedy to provide businessmen with a claim for damages in respect of losses which others would have to bear in similar circumstances without being able to make any claim. This applies at all events where the common user of a public highway is obstructed temporarily. For it is recognized that a common user is not “another right” protected by § 823 I BGB [reference]. This principle must not be evaded by granting protection to an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise. For the same reason any such interference must not be regarded as aimed at an enterprise [reference]. In the absence of evidence to the contrary it cannot be so aimed if every other interested person is exposed to the same impediment and must bear his own losses having regard to the substantive principles which attribute liability in damages. Such is the case where the common user of a public highway is interrupted temporarily. As regards the provisions of the Decree and of § 309 of the Criminal Code this conclusion was reached before. The same applies to infringements of the law which typically leads to a temporary standstill of traffic, in particular if provisions of the Road Traffic Regulations are contravened. In such cases the practice of the courts has attributed to the guilty party accidents suffered by others which resulted from a continuing situation creating a danger [reference]. On the other hand, it would seem that claims for damages by such users of a public highway have never been allowed under § 823 II BGB in conjunction with the traffic regulations which had been violated, if the claimants suffered pecuniary losses as a result of a hold-up of traffic following an accident. Here the argument applies once again that the purpose of traffic regulations cannot be to provide protection to that extent, seeing that such adverse consequences must be accepted without compensation by every person using public highways as a matter of chance.

(b) If this is so, no special right can exist either viewed from the perspective of a right in an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise. Instead those carrying on a commercial or an industrial enterprise can be expected to bear without compensation such losses as does everyone else living under the same law who suffers severe pecuniary damage through loss of time. This applies certainly to such restrictions in the common user of a public highway which, while they may be particularly serious for a commercial or industrial enterprise, remain on the whole within those limits which other road users must also tolerate without compensation. This applies in the present case. In view of the facts the question must not be decided here possibly in the light of the law relating to expropriation or of sacrifice for the public good as to whether a tort by a private person may so affect a common user adversely as to require that person to pay damages, at least when the interference is of long or even indeterminate duration [reference]. In such a case the commercial or industrial enterprise would be seriously prejudiced while any interference which may even last for several weeks would have to be tolerated without compensation [reference], and it would then have to be considered whether a tort had been committed by interference with an established and active commercial or industrial enterprise.

III. 1. . . .

The Court of First Instance, to which the issue will be referred back to determine the amount of damages will have to take into account in particular that the plaintiff cannot, as he has done hitherto, specify his damages in the abstract in accordance with the extent of his expenses which have turned out to be useless. No legal rule requires that all expenses which have become useless as a result of the damaging event must be compensated, [reference] . . . Instead the Court of First Instance will have to examine on its own to what extent the plaintiff has been lastingly deprived of profits as a result of those incidents of interference with his business which give rise to a claim for damages.

Case 16

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SECOND CIVIL SENATE) 9 APRIL 1984
NJW 1984, 2569 = VERSR 1984, 584

Facts

In the summer of 1980 the plaintiff started to construct an inner harbour wall about 230 metres long out of steel shuttering. The employer and owner of the harbour was the city. On 16 March 1981 while building operations were still in train, the barge TS on entering the harbour collided with and damaged the part of the wall, which had been constructed. The plaintiff repaired the wall and sued the defendant as owner of the barge for its expense in so doing, claiming both in its own right and as assignee of the city.

The Rhine Navigation Court held the claim admissible, but the Rhine Navigation Court of Appeal dismissed it. The Bundesgerichtshof reversed and remanded.

Reasons

1. The owner of a ship is answerable for damage done to a third party by the fault of any of the crew in the execution of his functions (§ 3 (1) BinnSchG). Not only must causative fault on the part of a crew member be shown but that person must actually be liable to the third party [references]. The relevant basis of liability here is § 823 I BGB.
2. The Court of Appeal did not decide whether any of the crew were at fault in the collision with the coffer-dam, nor whether the navigational signs at the harbour entrance had been correctly positioned by the city, as the plaintiff alleged. For the purposes of this appeal both assumptions must be made in favour of the plaintiff.
3. According to the Court of Appeal the plaintiff cannot complain of damage to property because the plaintiff did not own the part of the wall which was damaged: it belonged to the city.

The piles driven into the harbour bed were firmly attached to it and formed an essential component of the harbour itself, which was vested in the city. The piles were not there as a merely temporary measure: they were to remain there for the duration of the works. It is irrelevant that at the time of the accident the city had not yet accepted the half-built wall. Important as acceptance is for the contractual relations between the plaintiff and the city (see §§ 640ff. BGB) it is irrelevant to the question of the ownership of the constructed part of the wall. That falls to be determined by §§ 94, 946 BGB, as the court below correctly stated. This turns on objective factors (permanent fixture to the soil) and not on the attitudes of the contractor and owner of the land. To the extent that these have a role to play under § 95 BGB, the appellant is bound by the finding that the piles were driven into the ground for the duration and not for subsequent removal, so that there can be no question of this being “a purely temporary measure” [references].

4. The Court of Appeal further held that the plaintiff could not base a claim on interference with possession. It held:

At the time of the accident the plaintiff was certainly still in possession of the standing portion of the wall; for the purpose of executing its building operations, it had direct physical control of the building site, the piles already installed, and the wall, on which they were still working. But possession is protected by § 823 I BGB only in so far as it confers a right to possession, use, or enjoyment. The claim under § 823 I BGB is geared in principle to the replacement of the injury to possession, not to injury to the thing itself; but the plaintiff’s claim is addressed to injury to the thing itself so that it does not lie under the heading of interference with possession.

Contrary to the view of the Court of Appeal the plaintiff’s possession of the cofferdam is a sufficient basis for its claim, on the factual assumptions made for the purposes of this appeal (2. above). The plaintiff was still bound to complete the work after it had been damaged (see §§ 631, 644 BGB). Until the city accepted it, the plaintiff bore the risk of having to repair at its own expense any damage to the wall caused by third parties, and until that was done the city was bound neither to accept the work nor pay the agreed fee. Thus the plaintiff’s possession of the wall was associated with responsibility for its condition. This is enough to support a claim for the cost of the repairs. The case is akin to those where a tenant or lessee is contractually liable to the landlord or lessor for damage done to the thing by a third party. The tenant and lessee have been granted a claim for damages against the third party based on their possession [references]. Those are admittedly cases of “liability-harm” [reference], whereas here it is by reason of his duty of performance vis-à-vis the site owner that the possessor suffers. Nevertheless, this is equally a consequential loss attributable to invasion of a legally protected interest, and it is irrelevant that it is purely economic in nature [reference]. The Court of Appeal was in error to suppose that in NJW 1970, 38 ff. the Sixth Civil Senate had held that a building contractor had no claim based on possession against another contractor for damaging work done by the first contractor and not yet accepted. On the contrary, the judgment expressly left this question open, the first contractor in that case being no longer in possession of the work. . . .

Case 17

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SEVENTH CIVIL SENATE) 23 APRIL 1981

NJW 1981, 1779 = WM 1981, 773

In 1973 as the general building contractor for the District of M the plaintiff built a centre for the disabled. The plaintiff delegated to the defendant the tiling operation of the proposed structure. For this purpose they agreed that the standard contract VOB/B (1952) should apply, but they made special provision concerning delivery and conditions and warranties in respect of legal or physical defects. According to the list of work to be done, the surrounds of the swimming pool of the Special School were to be covered with tiles made of artificial stone which were to be “non-slip as a cover of the bottom”. The architect K, who was appointed by the District of M, selected the tiles from samples submitted by the defendant.

When the swimming pool was opened, it appeared that the tiles submitted by the defendant did not prevent slipping. At first the District asked the plaintiff to remedy the defect free of cost. The plaintiff refused and referred the District to its remedy against the architect.

Thereupon the District instructed the plaintiff by an additional contract and against further payment to replace the unsuitable tiles by others which prevented slipping. The plaintiff once again employed the defendant for the fixed price of DM 7992 and received in return DM 9000 from the District. To the latter extent the District claimed damages from the architect on the ground that he made a mistake in selecting the tiles. The latter’s Insurance Company paid this sum in full and in subsequent proceedings sued the plaintiff for the payment of two-thirds of this amount. The District Court of Essen, by a decision of 5 November 1976 condemned the plaintiff to pay one half of the amount (i.e. DM 4500). The plaintiff accepted this and, in turn, claimed compensation from the defendant.

The District Court rejected the claim. The Court of Appeal of Düsseldorf gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff for DM 1500. Upon leave to lodge a second appeal the judgment of the District Court was restored.

Reasons

The Court of Appeal allowed the plaintiff’s claim to the extent of one half of the sum paid to the Insurance Company of the architect on the ground that the defendant’s performance was fundamentally defective in the meaning of § 13 nos. 1 and 7 of the standard contract. It held that in selecting the tiles both the defendant as well as the clerk of the works had failed, in violation of their duty according to § 4 no. 3 of the standard contract, to make an examination and to give advice; as a result the work had been defective.

The liability of the defendant in respect of defects was not ruled out by the fact that the plaintiff had not asked the defendant to remedy the defect. It was true that, had the owner of the building sued the plaintiff as the principal contractor for damages in respect of defects, the plaintiff would have been obliged to give the defendant in his capacity of sub-contractor the opportunity to make good the defect. However, instead of asking for the defects to be remedied the District M had instructed the plaintiff to replace the defective tiles by non-slip tiles and had demanded with justification that the architect should pay for the expenses in remedying the defects. In the opinion of the Court of Appeal the plaintiff had been under an obligation to compensate in part the architect’s insurance company and had been unable to rely in relation to the latter, upon its right to ask for the defect to be removed—even if the claims of limitations or if liability had been restricted by agreement. As between the principal building contractor and the sub-contractor it would be inequitable if the latter, who was the real cause of the damage, could effectively plead that he had not been asked to remedy the defect, while the principal contractor was precluded from relying on this defence. If the latter was liable to pay, he should also be entitled to hold the sub-contractor liable for the consequence of the defect.

The conclusions of the Court of Appeal cannot be accepted. They are contrary to the particular legal nature of sub-contracting.

1. Since no question arises as to claims sounding in tort, the plaintiff's claims against the defendant can only result from the instructions given on 4 April 1973. The contract of the general or principal building contractor with the sub-contractor is an independent contract to perform building operations; it creates mutual rights and duties which are independent of those which may exist between the owner of the building or others connected with the building operation and the principal building contractor and of the extent to which they rely on them [references].

The liability of the principal building contractor does not as such have any repercussions upon his contractual relationship with the sub-contractor. Neither the letter appointing the sub-contractor nor the documents accompanying the contract provide, in addition to liability for defects, for liability of the sub-contractor by way of recourse in the sense that he must assume liability for pecuniary obligations of the principal contractor, if the sub-contractor is liable in the last resort for the basis of this obligation. Such a right of recourse cannot be derived either from a general liability for a breach of contract by a positive act. If the breach of contractual duties to examine and to advise does not result in more than a defective performance, any liability of the sub-contractor—as the Court of Appeal does not fail to recognise—can only be based on the responsibility for defective performance (see §§ 4 no. 3 and 13 no. 3 of the standard contract); it cannot be based in addition on the failure to observe the general duty to protect the other party to the contract against loss [references].

2. Since the defendant fitted tiles on the surround of the swimming pool which were not anti-slip and thus were contrary to the contract and unsuitable, without having drawn the attention of the plaintiff that the tiles selected by the architect in the presence of the clerk of the works were unsuitable, the plaintiff has a claim to have the tiles replaced or—if the defendant should refuse to do so—for damages in remedying the defect. However, the plaintiff has forfeited this claim not only because he failed to invite the defendant to remedy the defect, as required by § 13 no. 7 of the standard contract [reference], but also because he gave additional instructions, accompanied by the promise of payment, to exchange the tiles for others [reference]. Thereby any claim for damages according to § 13 no. 7 of the standard contract was lost [reference].

3. It is true that the principal contractor is liable for the culpable acts of the sub-contractor as his aid in performing the contract; however they are not co-debtors of the owner of the building and of others connected therewith as regards their liability for defects. The sub-contractor owes his duty to the main contractor, not to the owner of the building, and thus § 421 BGB does not apply. A claim by the architect of the building owner against the main contractor for partial compensation cannot therefore be brought against the sub-contractor at the same time. The plaintiff, too, did not acquire a claim for partial compensation against the defendant by repaying to the architect and his insurance company half of the expenses in remedying the defects.

4. The plaintiff cannot either base his claim on considerations of equity.

(a) It is true that according to § 242 BGB reasons of equity may result in the reduction or even in the rejection of claims. On the other hand, reasons of equity cannot create claims which do not exist in law or in contract [reference].

(b) The rejection of the claim by the District Court is also not inequitable.

When the plaintiff received, on 20 June 1974, the additional order, he was not prevented from requesting the defendant to replace the tiles on the ground of liability for defects, seeing that they were clearly defective [references]. If the plaintiff should have regarded this as inequitable, having regard to the additional order received from the owner of the building, he could at least have reserved his right of recourse, in case the architect who was involved in the wrong selection should be sued by the owner of the building in respect of the defects in the building which were partly caused by the architect, but by the architect, who would ask for partial compensation, if sued by the owner of the building. A main or general contractor can provide adequately for such a risk in his contracts with the sub-contractors. If he fails to do so, he cannot shift the legal consequences to the sub-contractor on the ground that they are inequitable.

The plaintiff as the main contractor has received a higher remuneration than the sub-contractor in respect of the same performance. The fact that as the main contractor he received a higher remuneration is justified, in particular, by the higher risk run by the main contractor as a co-debtor side by side with the architect and other specialists.

Case 18

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 4 NOVEMBER 1997
BGHZ 137, 89 = NJW 1998, 377

Facts

In this case a commune in Saxony is claiming damages in respect of the harm caused by unlawful interference with development on its land. Shortly after the reunification of Germany the plaintiff decided, against the wishes of a number of citizens, to construct an industrial park. It entered into a development contract with H., an architect, who entrusted the work to two named building contractors. The plans having been approved by Ministry for Economy and Employment in Saxony and the appropriate government committee, work was due to start on the morning of 22 April 1991. On that day, however—and, according to the plaintiff, the following day as well—demonstrators from the civic movement made it impossible for any work to be done. The plaintiff charges the defendants with taking part in the demonstration and collaborating in a plan to disrupt the work, thereby causing damage to the contractors which they put at DM 62,909.66. This sum the plaintiff paid to them and now, having prudently taken an assignment of the contractors' claim, seeks to recover it from the defendants.

Reasons

I. The court below was of opinion that the first, second, third and fifth defendants were liable to the plaintiff either in tort or in unjustified enrichment, regardless of whether the plaintiff had actually paid the sum in issue to the contractors: if it had paid, it could bring a condictio against the defendants under § 267(1) BGB as a third party who has paid off a debt due from the defendants; if they had not, they could sue in tort on the basis of the contractors' claim for damages duly assigned to it.

The court held that the defendants were at fault and had unlawfully infringed an interest of the contractors which was protected under § 823 I BGB, namely their lawful possession of the construction machinery, interference with its use being a relevant infringement. The members of the civic movement who foregathered on the morning of 24 April did so with the intention of disrupting the construction work. The disruption continued until the afternoon of the following day and only came to an end when, pursuant to a conversation with the mayor's office, the citizens were shown the documents authorising the works. During those two days the demonstrators positioned themselves so close to the machines that the work could not proceed in safety: they were effectively blockaded. This blockade was unlawful, and not protected as the exercise of fundamental rights under Article 5(1) and 8 of the constitution. The defendants were liable as collaborators and assistants for the harm resulting from this infringement of the contractors' protected interests, for they had all been present at least for part of the demonstration and had endorsed and helped in the blockade: the third defendant had acted as spokesperson for the demonstrators, the first defendant had furthered its purposes in an administrative capacity by making telephone calls to the authorities and so on, and the second defendant had posed in the shovel of a mechanical digger for a spectacular press photograph.

Further details were required of the loss of use of machinery and vehicles suffered by the contractors, but the claim for VAT on their losses could be dismissed right away. There was no question of contributory fault on the part of the contractors or of the present plaintiff.

Some of the appellants' criticisms of the decision below are justified: the judgment is not fully supported by findings of fact, some of which are procedurally flawed. [1, 2. Procedural points; 3. Discussion of the claim in unjust enrichment, and the validity of the assignment.]

The court below was right to start out from the position that the two-day blockade of the machines allocated to the construction work was an unlawful infringement, by persons at fault, of one of the contractor's protected interests. This in principle gave the contractors a claim under § 823 I BGB even under the conditions prevailing in the newly incorporated provinces so shortly after reunification.

(a) We may leave aside the question where and under what circumstances conduct such as is here alleged constitutes an unlawful infringement of an established and operative business (on which see BGHZ 59, 30, 34 = NJW 1972, 1366). For the court below did not err when it held that the contractors' lawful possession of the machinery was a legally protected interest which the blockade infringed.

(aa) It is established by case law that if an owner is prevented from using his property as intended, this may constitute an infringement of his ownership (BGHZ 55, 153, 159 = NJW 1971, 886).

(bb) The same must be true of the right of lawful possession: if the thing possessed is to be used in a particular way and such use is unlawfully inhibited, this is an infringement of a legally protected interest under § 823 I. The equipment which the contractors brought on to the proposed industrial park on the morning of 22 April 1991 was to be used for the work of construction they had undertaken. Conduct of the kind found by the court below which resulted in a total blockade of the machines so that they could not be used for two full working days—no negligible or fleeting disturbance (NJW 1977, 2264, 2265)—can amount to a tortious infringement of the contractors' lawful possession. In the circumstances we need not ask if the contractors actually owned the machines, since the appellants do not deny that the machines were in the contractors' lawful possession.

(b) On the basis that it was right to charge the defendants with the two-day blockade and consequently with an infringement, objectively speaking, of the contractors' possession under § 823 I BGB, the court below cannot be criticised, contrary to the view of the appellants, for holding that it was unlawful.

(aa) The appellants are right, however, to argue that the blockade cannot count as the "violence" required by § 240(1) Criminal Code for the crime of oppressive coercion (Nötigung). For demonstrators to place themselves in the immediate vicinity of vehicles, machinery and so on and thereby stymie the operations by bringing moral rather than physical pressure on the contractors' personnel does not amount to the violence required by that provision (for details see BVerfGE 92, 1 = NJW 1995, 1141). But this does not mean that such conduct cannot count as an unlawful infringement of a protected interest under the private law of tort.

(bb) But even conduct which objectively infringes an interest protected by § 823 I BGB is not unlawful if it is legitimated as the exercise of a constitutionally protected right. The relevant right here is the right of assembly under Article 8 GG, but it does not cover a blockade of the kind and extent found by the court below. A defendant who deliberately uses direct pressure against a particular protected interest of another cannot normally invoke the constitutional right of assembly (BGHZ 59, 30, 35 f. = NJW 1972, 1366), for this right, like that of freedom of expression of opinion, is designed to safeguard the right of a group to publicise their views by intelligible means when there is a conflict of opinions such as is inherent in a democratic society (BGHZ 59, 30, 36 = NJW 1972, 1366).

(cc) Even if contained within constitutional limits, the exercise of the basic right under Article 8 GG may well infringe the rights of others. If so, this must just be accepted. This may be the case when demonstrations have results which, though inevitable, are unintended (such as interference with traffic movements or access to the streets, squares and other places where the demonstration is being held), or when the intentional interferences are inconsiderable and of very short duration, as when, in this case, demonstrators climbed on to the machines for a media photo-call. But when, instead of exchanging views, presenting the other side of a dispute or making a protest as such, one actively puts pressure on third parties to prevent them from exercising their rights, one leaves the area protected by the freedom of assembly. The right of assembly protects attempts to convert opponents to one's own opinion, not measures designed to force others to submit against their will. The latter is the case here if, as the court below held, the demonstrators positioned themselves right beside the construction machinery and thereby, as intended, prevented the execution of the work for two full days.

(dd) Although these events took place in one of the newly incorporated provinces only a few months after reunification this does not, contrary to the view of the appellants, affect the decision that this conduct was unlawful. The special conditions facing the citizens in the new provinces at this period of abrupt change on all fronts may indeed be taken into account in the balancing and weighting of the parties' interests which is necessary in every case. Nevertheless the appellants cannot usefully invoke the "confrontational culture" which existed in the DDR when, in order to bring about changes in the one-party regime, citizens made frequent and intensive use of the right of demonstration. At the time of the events now in question the rule of law was already established in the new provinces, and it would be inconsistent with it to make the lawfulness of conduct depend on standards appropriate to conflict with the previous regime. Under the constitution, which was fully in force there at the time, the lawfulness of the exercise of a fundamental right and the unlawfulness of an infringement of the legally protected interests of third parties cannot be affected by considerations of what would have been licit or desirable during the events which triggered change in the DDR.

(c) There is no evidence that the defendants' experiences with the previous regime in the DDR actually led them to think that their actions were lawful, but in any case this would be relevant only to the question of whether they were at fault (see BGHZ 59, 30, 39 f. = NJW 1972, 1366). The judgment below hints that the failure of the police to intervene may have led the demonstrators to think that their actions were justified, but, as the court held, only if such a mistake of law were unavoidable could failure to realise the unlawfulness of their actions in the given circumstances prevent a finding of fault (BGHZ 118, 201, 208 = NJW 1992, 2014). If the defendants here supposed, without making any inquiries, that the conduct charged against them was lawful, they are guilty of negligence at least.

5. The appellants are right, however, to criticise the findings of the court below as to the extent and effect of the conduct of the several defendants against whom it entered judgment. The court based its holding that the contractors had a good claim for tortious infringement of their lawful possession on the view that the assemblies which hindered the construction works lasted for the whole of 22 and 23 April and that, as was intended, the use of the machines for their proper purpose was wholly prevented during that period. The findings underlying this conclusion are procedurally flawed.

(a) We cannot on review uphold the appellants' objection to the finding that, as the demonstrators intended, the blockade of the machines lasted for the whole of 22 April. This finding was open to the judge of fact, though it was based on very slender evidence. Nor, contrary to the view of the appellants, was it a fault of procedure that the judges whose decision was based on the evidence of M did not actually hear him give that evidence: that would be relevant only if it had had important aspects which did not figure in the written report.

(b) By contrast the finding that the demonstrators blockaded the construction machinery for the whole of the following day is flawed.

6. The court below held that the defendants' participation in the blockading measures rendered them liable in tort. The appellants are right to object to this: the findings of fact do not satisfy the requirements of § 830 I (1) and II BGB as to the liability of joint tortfeasors and accessories.

(a) The court below started out correctly by noting that the question whether a person who participates in conduct involving delictual liability falls within these provisions as a joint tortfeasor or accessory depends on principles developed in criminal law (BGHZ 63, 124, 126 = NJW 1975, 49; BGHZ 89, 383, 389 = NJW 1984, 1226). The participation must therefore be with knowledge of the facts and at least some degree of intention on the part of the individual to commit the act in conjunction with others or to facilitate the act of another; objectively there must in addition be some actual participation in the execution of the act which in some way advances its commission and is material to it. Thus a person who participates in a demonstration will be liable if he knows it is intended to create a blockade which infringes rights and causes harm (BGHZ 59, 30, 42 = NJW 1972, 1366).

There is no need to distinguish between co-authors and accessories since in tort law both are treated alike under § 830 II BGB. The assistance lent by an accessory need not be physical in nature—moral support may be sufficient (BGHZ 63, 124, 130 = NJW 1975, 49)—but it must be established, consistently with the requirements of the criminal law relevant to § 830 I (1) and II BGB, that each individual was guilty of conduct which supported the unlawful infringement of the rights of another and was associated with knowledge of the facts and the intention to commit such an infringement.

(b) In the light of these principles the third defendant is the only one for whose liability for participating in the blockade the court below has laid a proper foundation. The third defendant acted as spokesperson for the demonstrators so the court could rightly hold that she not only had a significant influence on the actual course of the demonstration but also, subjectively, intended that the harmful conduct should take place. To this extent the role and functions adopted by her in the demonstration may elucidate her inner intentions (BGHZ 63, 124, 128 = NJW 1975, 49); the court below could well base its judgment on the third defendant's leading role in the way the demonstration developed.

(c) However, the liability of the other defendants is not supported by the findings made thus far.

(aa) This is clearest in the case of the fifth defendant. On the wholly conclusory evidence of S, the court held that the fifth defendant participated in the demonstration on 22 April but it made no finding as to the nature, extent or duration of such participation. But temporary presence at the place of the demonstration and unspecified participation in the assembly are not enough in themselves to imply co-authorship or accessoryship as regards the infringements of rights here in issue. Mere "participation in an assembly" may be a permissible way of evincing in public one's opinion on the matter in issue, and thus be constitutionally protected by Article 5(1) and 8(1) of the constitution (see BGHZ 89, 383, 395 = NJW 1984, 1226). This is true not only of presence at mass demonstrations but also of participation in smaller and less unwieldy gatherings, provided that such participation does not go beyond what is permitted by the exercise of the rights mentioned, that the individual has no part in a project to invade rights, does not subjectively endorse the harmful conduct of the others and does not join the demonstration in knowledge of its intention to create a blockade (see BGHZ 63, 124, 128 = NJW 1975, 49). At present there is no sufficient finding that the fifth defendant in fact contributed even morally to the infringement of the contractors' rights in any legally relevant manner, much less any findings about his mental attitude.

(bb) Nor has any sufficient foundation been laid for the liability of the first defendant.

The court below relied essentially on the evidence of S, who testified that "he had spoken with her in the street and that she had said she was one of the demonstrators"; it was error in law for the court to hold that this was evidence of intentional support for the blockade and of sufficient practical assistance.

The finding actually amounts to no more than that the first defendant attended the demonstration for a short time (indeed not even on the construction site but "in the street", very close to where she lived), and it is not explained how such conduct, in so far as it might exceed what is permitted in the exercise of fundamental rights under Article 5(1) and 8(1) of the constitution, could be construed as intentional support for the unlawful measures of the blockade. Nor is it enough that the first defendant spoke on the telephone to senior members of the commune and province, for the court did not inquire whether these calls were made in aid of the blockade or in an attempt to broker a “peaceful” solution. In view of the first defendant’s constitutional rights it was wrong to conclude without more that she was guilty of tortious interference with the rights of others.

(cc) Finally the facts found are insufficient to render the second defendant liable for relevant participation in the infringement of the contractors’ rights. The court below founded particularly on R’s evidence that at 1630 hours on 22 April he saw the second defendant taking part in the demonstration. Here again there is no legal justification for inferring from his brief presence at the demonstration in the late afternoon that he approved of, adopted and furthered the unlawful blockading. Nor does it follow from the fact that he briefly climbed into the shovel of a digger in response to a photo-call; such conduct, as has already been stated above, may well be covered by Article 8(1) of the constitution and need not constitute a relevant unlawful infringement of the rights of the contractors.

7. Finally the court has not found with the clarity required of a final judgment what harm, if any, was suffered by the contractors.

III. The decision below must therefore be vacated and the matter remanded, with leave to the defendants to raise again by way of appeal their objections to the prior findings of that court.

Notes to Cases 14–18

1. Purely economic loss can result from an infinite variety of factual situations—the cable cases, discussed above, offering but one example. Many other instances can be given. Unfair competition is one example, indeed the only instance of economic loss, which has troubled some systems (e.g. the French). Financial loss can also result from the death of a key employee. French law is, in theory, more generous than English and German law which deny such claims (see also chapter 4, section A). Economic loss can also be occasioned to the ultimate purchaser of a defective product who, though not actually injured by it, is forced to spend money to put the defect right. The point is discussed in cases 68–73. The same can happen where a local authority fails to exercise a statutory right to inspect the foundations of buildings under construction with the result that cracks appear on the ceilings causing loss of heat (and, hence, higher electricity bills) or requiring redecoration. This type of economic loss is discussed in cases 74 and 75, where one will find a spectacular U-turn by the English courts which has brought them closer to German solutions. Cases 14 and 15 deal with the situation where no property is damaged, but its owner is deprived of its use. Technically the loss is again purely financial but the decisions reproduced above rightly adopted a more subtle approach.

2. The canal case, like the cable cases, explores various ways of allowing the claim. One is the judge-made right of an established and operating business (discussed above), but its subsidiary nature prevents it from being invoked if there is another applicable rule. The plaintiff’s argument that he was entitled to expect the proper maintenance of the canal did not fare better, the court refusing to hold that the statutory obligation to maintain the canal was a protective norm and therefore actionable under § 823 II BGB (see below, chapter 4). This is a debatable interpretation; and in Germany it has not pleased everyone. (See: Medicus, op. cit., but cf. Möschel JuS 1977, 1, 3.) The crux of the decision lies clearly in its teleological interpretation of § 823 I BGB. Interference with property, reasoned the court, must be taken to include not only interference with its substance but also with the rights and the authority of the owner. This is sensible enough, but demarcation lines must also be drawn. For the court the dividing line was between the vessel trapped for an indefinite time and the vessel which, though unable to perform its contract, has retained its freedom of movement. The distinction is repeated and refined in the next case 15, the crucial factor here being the duration of the interference. Both judgments raise as many problems as they solve and that, perhaps, explains why they have remained, if one can borrow the French expression, arrêts d'espèce. Must the interference be complete or prolonged, or both, before it is actionable? What if the vessel could return to its starting-point but by means of a circuitous and very expensive route? Why is an obstruction of someone else's waterway that hinders the use of my vessel actionable, while the interference with someone else's cable that stops me from using my machinery is not? Casuistry appears to have kept alive for so long the rule prohibiting the compensation of purely economic loss. It also explains why there are so many exceptions to the rule and why the law has become so difficult to present in a simple way. (See also BGH JZ 1983, 857; BGH NJW 1983, 812, and Deutsch, JZ 1984, 308–9.) Finally, the reader must be reminded of a point made earlier. Perhaps these cases—which turn on a wide interpretation of ownership (Eigentum)—are really reactions to the categorical exclusion of pure economic loss from the list of protected interests of § 823 I BGB. The acceptance of this explanation would ensure that little effort was spent on the kind of theoretical debates which one finds in the German literature and which—to foreign eyes—border on the abstract and legalistic for ignoring the realities of the situation. (Thus, see, the Larenz/Canaris, pp. 388–9, distinctions between a “locked in” (Einsperrung) and “locked-out” (Aussperrung) vessel (in the context of the “trapped ship” case and the search for the purpose of protection and the damage (Schutzzweckzusammenhang) leading to distinctions between an interference with the substance of the property (Substanzschaden) and the ability to use it (Gebrauchsschaden). Larenz/Canaris, pp. 390–1. Contrast Mertnes in Münchener Kommentar, § 823 at 1477–8, who brings into play yet another notion “the market value” (Marktwert). Thus, the nicest thing one can say about these debates is that they are too Germanic to be exportable. See, also, Ch. 2 2(d)(i).)

Case 16 raises similarly intricate points. The property inflicted was vested in the harbour authority. The construction firm had lawful possession of the wall. However, the infliction caused damage to the substance of the wall; the loss did not result out of loss of use of the wall. Therefore, one might object that the harbour authority as owner and not the actual plaintiff (possessor) was entitled to claim damages for the damage to the wall. The construction firm sued because in the end the loss fell on it: it could not charge the employer, the harbour authority, with the increased cost of building the wall under the risk provision of § 644 BGB. But then was this not a case of Drittschadensliquidation, of “transferred loss”, allowing the owner to sue on behalf of the construction firm? Yet, the court did not consider this route.

3. It has been impossible to find an exact factual equivalent in English and American law. English law has, in some instances, used the tort of public nuisance. In Rose v. Miles (1815) 4 M and S 101, 103; 105 ER 773, a barge-owner navigating a creek obstructed by the defendant's barges was allowed to claim his extra costs for unloading the cargo from his barges and transporting it by land to its ultimate destination, since in Lord Ellenborough's view he had suffered greater damage than other members of the public who might have been contemplating using the creek. The decision, incidentally, has impeccable origins that can be traced back to Iveson v. Moore (1699) 1 Ld. Raym. 486 (another case allowing recovery for purely economic loss resulting from highway obstructions).

Analogous cases in the USA have taken a similar stand. See In re China Union Lines Ltd, 285 F. Supp. 426 (1967) and In Re Lyra Shipping Co. Ltd, 360 F. Supp. 1188 (1973). Both these decisions, however, were overruled by the Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit in its decision Louisiana v. M/V Testbank of 11 Feb. 1985; 752 F. 2d 1019. Extracts were reproduced in the third edition of this book at pp. 211–216. In July 1980 two vessels collided in the Mississippi River Gulf Outlet. A large quantity of toxic chemicals was lost overboard one of the ships and, fearing greater contamination, the authorities closed the outlet to navigation for about twenty days. Fishing, shrimping, and other “related” activities were also suspended for a short while in a surrounding area of about four hundred square miles. Forty-one lawsuits were filed and were eventually consolidated. The plaintiffs came under various (fairly) distinct categories namely: commercial fishermen; recreational fishermen; operators of marinas; bait and tackle shops; cargo terminal operators; restaurants etc. (Presumably, these were “test” cases for, otherwise, the number of claims is very small.) The Court of First Instance dismissed all the claims save those brought by the commercial fishermen. A panel of the Court of Appeal affirmed, but since a minority felt that the problem of the compensability of pure economic loss was ripe for re-examination, the case was heard by the full Court of Appeals of the Fifth Circuit sitting en banc. The majority judgment, affirming the decisions below, was delivered by Judge Higginbotham. Six judges dissented and their dissent was delivered by Judge Wisdom. The majority argued that the bright line rule of damage to a proprietary interest had “the virtue of predictability with the vice of creating results in cases at its edge that are said to be ‘unjust’ or ‘unfair.’ Plaintiffs point to seemingly perverse results, where claims the rule allows and those it disallows are juxtaposed—such as vessels striking a dock, causing minor but recoverable damage, then lurching athwart a channel causing great but unrecoverable economic loss. The answer is that when lines are drawn sufficiently sharply in their definitional edges to be reasonable and predictable, such differing results are the inevitable result—indeed, decisions are the desired product.” The rule, by making results more predictable, operated as a rule of law and allowed a court to adjudicate rather than “manage”. In the case of a disaster inflicting large and reverberating injuries through the economy first party or loss insurance was preferable to a liability system of third party insurance in terms of costs of administration (see p. 1029). The emphasis placed by the majority on the impact of insurance practice on modern tort law is most welcome. But is its apparently unqualified preference for first party insurance always preferable? (See Professor Atiyah’s comment in (1985) 3 Oxford J. L. Studies 485, 489: “. . . it is really high time (in both England and America) that lawyers informed themselves about such fundamental matters of insurability in new tort cases and saw to it that the courts were also informed.” See also Rizzo in 11 J. Leg. Stud. (1982) where the author’s economic analysis suggests that the majority’s preference for first party insurance is wrong in situations like Testbank.) The case also raises the question whether one should try to solve the Testbank type of disaster by means of statute or international treaties imposing strict liability on the carriers of the polluting substances subject to certain monetary limits. On this see: Gaskell, “The Amoco Cadiz” 3 Journal of Energy and Natural Resources Law, 169 (1985).

One can hazard a guess, however, that the German solution would appeal to those jurisdictions which are moving towards recognising claims for economic loss. The following casuistry may support this statement.

(i) Negligent interference with existing contracts with resulting economic loss has not been traditionally actionable in the USA. Robins Dry Dock and Repair Co. v. Flint, 275 US 303, 48 S. Ct. 134 (1927) is the locus classicus for the proposition. Petitions of Kinsman Transit Co., 388 F. 2d 821 (1968) marked a strong move towards the other direction, even though in that case the plaintiff’s claim was rejected on causative grounds. (See, generally, Note, “Negligent Interference with Contract: Knowledge on a Standard for Recovery” 63 Va. L. Rev. 813 (1977).) See also the interesting Canadian case of Seaway Hotels v. Canada Craggs and Consumers Gas Co., (1959) 17 DLR 2d 292.

(ii) Even in the absence of contract the parties may negligently be deprived of a prospective economic benefit. Their plight has not been dealt with consistently by the courts. Frustrated beneficiaries who lose their legacies due to the negligence of a lawyer advising the testator can usually recover (see case 19 and its notes); but in other cases the courts have not been so generous. In Weller and Co. v. Foot and Mouth Disease Research Institute [1966] 1 QB 569, a live virus escaped from the defendant’s laboratory due to their admitted negligence and caused a cattle disease. As a result, cattle auctions were prohibited for a period of time and the plaintiffs, cattle auctioneers, tried to claim their lost profits from the defendants. Their action failed. In Rickards v. Sun Oil Co., 23 NJ Misc. 89, 41 A. 2d 267 (Sup. Ct. 1945) a ship crashed into and destroyed a bridge which provided the only access to a small island town. The island businessmen claimed their lost profits for the period when outsiders could not visit their town but the action was turned down on the grounds that the damage was not foreseeable. (Do you agree with this or would it have been better to deny the claims on the grounds that the type of loss incurred (purely economic loss) was not recognized by the law?)

(iii) Loss of a chattel is not treated as economic loss. A bailee, for example, who has negligently lost the bailed chattel will be responsible to the bailor for its value. Bailment, however, is very “close” to contract so the theoretical difficulties concerning compensation are in this case minimised.

(iv) Where the tort of negligence fails the plaintiff, the older tort of nuisance may come to his aid. Obstructions on the highway—including access to the highway—may thus be actionable in nuisance, and here recovery of purely economic loss has traditionally been allowed. This could provide a remedy in the kind of factual situation envisaged in case 12; though the duration of the obstruction would again be crucial. Rose v. Miles (1815) 4 M and S 101 is also interesting. There the plaintiff’s barges were prevented from navigating on a public navigable creek. The court allowed him to claim the extra cost he incurred by having to convey his goods overland. Cf. In Re Lyra Shipping Co. Ltd., 360 F. Supp. 1188 (1973).

4. Only in exceptional cases does German tort law provide compensation for negligently caused pure economic harm. Case 18 illustrates the difficulties that must be surmounted by the court before compensation can be decreed and is yet another example of the constitutionalisation of private law. In this case construction equipment was immobilised for a short period. Normally damages can be claimed in tort only if a particular right or legal interest, listed exhaustively in § 823 I BGB, has been infringed. This rule has, however, proved to be unduly restrictive, so the German courts have evolved various ways of granting compensation for pure economic harm. Thus the courts “discovered” the “right of an established and operative business”—actually invoked by the plaintiff in this case (see II 4 a)—and included it as an “other right” under § 823 I BGB, and it was under this heading that blockades had been discussed in the past, see chapter 2, section A. 2 (e) (iii). Again the courts gave a very wide interpretation to “infringement of ownership” and held that physical damage was not required: prevention of use is now sufficient, as the present case confirms. Finally the courts further enlarged the scope of § 823 I BGB by holding that lawful possession is an “other right”: damage to a thing or loss of its use may now be compensated without having to ask whether the claimant was actually owner. This can be seen in the instant case: the court could deal with the interference with the use of the construction equipment in the possession of the contractors without having to decide whether they owned it or not. It is noteworthy that two days of being unable to use the equipment already sufficed to amount to an interference with the lawful possession of it (contrast case 14 where the vessel was immobilised for as long as eight months). Thus, future litigants might decide to base their claim on possession rather than the right of an established and operating business governed by the somewhat ambiguous “directness” requirement; (the directness requirement is normally fulfilled only if the interference was intentional; with regard to possession as a right, negligence will suffice; see Ch. 2, section A. 2 (e) (iii).) Moreover, if the non-usability of the machines for two days constitutes an infringement under § 823 I BGB this decision is extremely difficult to reconcile with the cable cases (11 et seq.). From this perspective the case should have arguably been solved on the basis of the right of an established and operating business. Once again the difficulties in keeping § 823 I BGB in bounds and at the same time allow for the compensation for loss of use become apparent. Having dealt with this problem the court then had to surmount another: how to accommodate the protection of the contractors’ interests (ownership or possession or, on a better view, the right of an established and operating business) with the exercise by the defendants of their right of assembly.

The court drew the line between demonstrations which simply seek to persuade people and influence opinion on a contested matter and those which are designed deliberately to bring pressure on others to prevent them using their rights as they wish. The court stressed that in the present instance the interference was not a mere side-effect of a demonstration but it was the very object of the protest to prevent access to the site. From a dogmatic point of view this required an elaborate balancing of interests before the unlawfulness of the demonstration could be positively established (see also Kullmann LM BGB § 823 (Ae) Nr. 6). The third relevant point of the decision concerns the liability of associates and assistants. In general tort liability requires a causal contribution to the infringement and the damage. In the case of group action the requisite contribution may take the form of moral support by the defendant for those whose acts directly cause the harm. But it is often difficult for the victim to establish the causal effect of any such moral support, so § 830 I(1) and II BGB lay down that associates and assistants are fully liable as joint tortfeasors even if the victim cannot establish their actual causal contribution. Such contribution is, however, presumed only of those whose association or assistance was voluntary and who with knowledge of the facts intended to act along with those who directly caused the harm. This may not be at all clear in the case of mass manifestations that get out of control so that infringements occur which some of the participants never intended. This was critical for the defendants here, as some of them were eager to persuade others to their point of view but were not ready to infringe their rights, such as those of the building contractors.

5. Older cases dealing with particular problems of economic loss must nowadays be constantly reviewed against the background of recent, wide pronouncements on the subject, e.g., Union Oil Co. v. Oppen 501 F. 2d 558 (1974); J'Aire Corp. v. Gregory 24 Cal. 3d 799, 598 P. 2d 60; Junior Books v. Veitchi Co. Ltd [1983] 1 AC 520. Other relevant "economic loss" cases are reviewed by Markesinis, "An Expanding Tort Law: The Price of a Rigid Contract Law" 103 [1987] LQR 354; Robertson, "Recovery in Louisiana Tort Law for Intangible Economic Loss: Negligence Actions and the Tort of Intentional Interference with Contractual Relations" 46 Louisiana L. Rev. 737 (1986); Goldberg, "Recovery for Pure Economic Loss in Tort: Another Look at Robins Dry Dock v. Flint" 20 The Journal of Legal Studies 249 (1991); Gonynor, "The Robins Dry Dock Rule: Is the "Bright Line" Fading?" 4 University of San Francisco Maritime Law Journal 85 (1992); Jutras, "Civil Law and Pure Economic Loss: What are we Missing?" 12 The Canadian Business Law Journal 295 (1986-7); Tetley, "Damages and Economic Loss in Marine Collision: Controlling the Floodgates" 22 Journal of Maritime Law and Commerce 539 (1991).

J'Aire Corp. v. Gregory, 24 Cal. 3d 799, 598 P. 2d 60, 157 Cal. Rptr. 407 (1979).

BIRD CJ

Appellant, a lessee, sued respondent, a general contractor, for damages resulting from the delay in completion of a construction project at the premises where appellant operated a restaurant. Respondent demurred successfully and the complaint was dismissed. This court must decide whether a contractor who undertakes construction work pursuant to a contract with the owner of premises may be held liable in tort for business losses suffered by a lessee when the contractor negligently fails to complete the project with due diligence.

The facts as pleaded are as follows. Appellant, J'Aire Corporation, operates a restaurant at the Sonoma County Airport in premises leased from the county of Sonoma. Under the terms of the lease the county was to provide heat and air conditioning. In 1975 the county entered into a contract with respondent for improvements to the restaurant premises, including renovation of the heating and air-conditioning systems and installation of insulation.

As the contract did not specify any date for completion of the work, appellant alleged the work was to have been completed within a reasonable time as defined by custom and usage (Civ. Code, § 1657). Despite requests that respondent complete the construction promptly, the work was not completed within a reasonable time. Because the restaurant could not operate during part of the construction and was without heat and air-conditioning for a longer period, appellant suffered loss of business and resulting loss of profits.

Appellant alleged two causes of action in its third amended complaint. The first cause of action was based upon the theory that it was a third-party beneficiary of the contract between the county and respondent. The second cause of action sounded in tort and was based upon negligence in completing the work within a reasonable time. Damages of £50,000 were claimed.

Respondent demurred on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The trial court sustained the demurrer without leave to amend and the complaint was dismissed. On appeal only the sustaining of the demurrer to the second cause of action is challenged.

. . . The only question before this court is whether a cause of action for negligent loss of expected economic advantage may be maintained under these facts.

Liability for negligent conduct may only be imposed where there is a duty of care owed by the defendant to the plaintiff or to a class of which the plaintiff is a member (Richards v. Stanley (1954) 43 Cal. 2d 60, 63, 271 P. 2d 23). A duty of care may arise through statute or by contract. Alternatively, a duty may be premised upon the general character of the activity in which the defendant engaged, the relationship between the parties, or even the interdependent nature of human society. Whether a duty is owed is simply a shorthand way of phrasing what is “the essential question—whether the plaintiff’s interests are entitled to legal protection against the defendant’s conduct” (Dillon v. Legg (1968) 69 Cal. Rptr. 72, P. 2d 912).

This court has held that a plaintiff’s interest in prospective economic advantage may be protected against injury occasioned by negligent as well as intentional conduct. [Reference omitted.] For example, economic losses such as lost earnings or profits are recoverable as part of general damages in a suit for personal injury based on negligence. Where negligent conduct causes injury to real or personal property, the plaintiff may recover damages for profits lost during the time necessary to repair or replace the property. [Reference omitted.]

Even when only injury to prospective economic advantage is claimed, recovery is not foreclosed. Where a special relationship exists between the parties, a plaintiff may recover for loss of expected economic advantage through the negligent performance of a contract although the parties were not in contractual privity. [Biakanja, Lucas, and Heyer] held that intended beneficiaries of wills could sue to recover legacies lost through the negligent preparation of the will. [Reference omitted.]

In each of the above cases, the court determined that defendants owed plaintiffs a duty of care by applying criteria set forth in Biakanja v. Irving. [Reference omitted.] Those criteria are (1) the extent to which the transaction was intended to affect the plaintiff, (2) the foreseeability of harm to the plaintiff, (3) the degree of certainty that the plaintiff suffered injury, (4) the closeness of the connection between the defendant’s conduct and the injury suffered, (5) the moral blame attached to the defendant’s conduct, and (6) the policy of preventing future harm. [Reference omitted.]

Applying these criteria to the facts as pleaded, it is evident that a duty was owed by respondent to appellant in the present case. (1) The contract entered into between respondent and the county was for the renovation of the premises in which appellant maintained its business. The contract could not have been performed without impinging on that business. Thus respondent’s performance was intended to, and did, directly affect appellant. (2) Accordingly, it was clearly foreseeable that any significant delay in completing the construction would adversely affect appellant’s business beyond the normal disruption associated with such construction. Appellant alleges this fact was repeatedly drawn to respondent’s attention. (3) Further, appellant’s complaint leaves no doubt that appellant suffered harm since it was unable to operate its business for one month and suffered additional loss of business while the premises were without heat and air-conditioning. (4) Appellant has also alleged that delays occasioned by the respondent’s conduct were closely connected to, indeed directly caused its injury. (5) In addition, respondent’s lack of diligence in the present case was particularly blameworthy since it continued after the probability of damage was drawn directly to respondent’s attention. (6) Finally, public policy supports finding a duty of care in the present case. The wilful failure or refusal of a contractor to prosecute a construction project with diligence, where another is injured as a result, has been made grounds for disciplining a licensed contractor (Bus. 6 Prof. Code, § 7119). Although this section does not provide a basis for imposing liability where the delay in completing construction is due merely to negligence, it does indicate the seriousness with which the Legislature views unnecessary delays in the completion of construction.

In the light of these factors, this court finds that respondent had a duty to complete construction in a manner that would have avoided unnecessary injury to appellant's business, even though the construction contract was with the owner of a building rather than with appellant, the tenant. It is settled that a contractor owes a duty to avoid injury to the person or property of third parties. As appellant points out, injury to a tenant's business can often result in greater hardship than damage to a tenant's person or property. Where the risk of harm is foreseeable, as it was in the present case, an injury to the plaintiff's economic interests should not go uncompensated merely because it was unaccompanied by any injury to his person or property.

To hold under these facts that a cause of action has been stated for negligent interference with prospective economic advantage is consistent with the recent trend in tort cases. This court has repeatedly eschewed overly rigid Common law formulations of duty in favour of allowing compensation for foreseeable injuries caused by a defendant's want of ordinary care. See, e.g., Dillon v. Legg [reference omitted]; Rowland v. Christian [reference omitted]; cf. Brown v. Merlo [reference omitted] (liability of automobile driver for injury to non-paying passenger); Rodriguez v. Bethlehem Steel Corp. [reference omitted] (liability for loss of consortium). Rather than traditional notions of duty, this court has focused on foreseeability as the key component necessary to establish liability: "While the question whether one owes a duty to another must be decided on a case-by-case basis, every case is governed by the rule of general application that all persons are required to use ordinary care to prevent others from being injured as the result of their conduct . . . Foreseeability of the risk is a primary consideration in establishing the element of duty" (Weirum v. RKO General, Inc. [reference omitted]). Similarly, respondent is liable if his lack of ordinary care caused foreseeable injury to the economic interests of appellant.

In addition, this holding is consistent with the legislature's declaration of the basic principle of tort liability, embodied in Civil Code, § 1714, that every person is responsible for injuries caused by his or her lack of ordinary care. (See Rowland v. Christian [reference omitted].) That section does not distinguish among injuries to one's person, one's property, or one's financial interests. Damages for loss of profits or earnings are recoverable where they result from an injury to one's person or property caused by another's negligence. Recovery for injury to one's economic interests, where it is the foreseeable result of another's want of ordinary care, should not be foreclosed simply because it is the only injury that occurs.

Respondent cites Fifield Manor v. Finston [reference omitted] for the proposition that recovery may not be had to negligent loss of prospective economic advantage. Fifield concerned the parallel tort of interference with contractual relations. There a non-profit retirement home that had contracted with Ross to provide him with lifetime medical care sued a driver who negligently struck and killed Ross. The plaintiff argued it had become liable under the contract for Ross's medical bills and sought recovery from the driver, on both a theory of direct liability and one of subrogation. Recovery was denied.

The critical factor of foreseeability distinguishes Fifield from the present case. Although it was reasonably foreseeable that defendant's negligence might cause injury to Ross, it was less foreseeable that it would injure the retirement home's economic interest. Defendant had not entered into any relationship or undertaken any activity where negligence on his part was reasonably likely to affect plaintiff adversely. Thus, the nexus between the defendant's conduct and the risk of the injury that occurred to the plaintiff was too tenuous to support the imposition of a duty owing to the retirement home. In contrast, the nexus in the present case between the injury that occurred and respondent's conduct is extremely close. Fifield does not entirely foreclose recovery for negligent interference with prospective economic advantage.

Respondent also relies on Adams v. Southern Pac. Transportation Co. [reference omitted]. In Adams plaintiff employees were held unable to sue the railroad whose cargo of bombs exploded, destroying the factory where they worked. It should be noted that the Court of Appeal in Adams clearly believed that plaintiffs should be permitted to maintain an action for negligent interference with prospective economic interests. It reluctantly held they could not only under the belief that Fifield precluded such recovery. Adhering to the Fifield rule, the Court of Appeal in Adams did not determine whether the railroad owed plaintiffs a duty of care. In the present case, plaintiff's injury stemmed directly from conduct intended to affect plaintiff and was more readily foreseeable than the damage to the employer's property in Adams. To the extent that Adams holds that there can be no recovery for negligent interference with prospective economic advantage, it is disapproved.

The chief dangers which have been cited in allowing recovery for negligent interference with prospective economic advantage are the possibility of excessive liability, the creation of an undue burden on freedom of action, the possibility of fraudulent or collusive claims, and the often speculative nature of damages . . . Central to these fears is the possibility that liability will be imposed for remote consequences, out of proportion to the magnitude of the defendant's wrongful conduct.

However, the factors enumerated in Biakanja and applied in subsequent cases place a limit on recovery by focusing judicial attention on the foreseeability of the injury and the nexus between the defendant's conduct and the plaintiff's injury. These factors and ordinary principles of tort law such as proximate cause are fully adequate to limit recovery without the drastic consequence of an absolute rule which bars recovery in all such cases. Following these principles, recovery for negligent interference with prospective economic advantage will be limited to instances where the risk of harm is foreseeable and is closely connected with the defendant's conduct, where damages are not wholly speculative and the injury is not part of the plaintiff's ordinary business risk.

Accordingly, this court holds that a contractor owes a duty of care to the tenant of a building undergoing construction work to prosecute that work in a manner which does not cause undue injury to the tenant's business, where such injury is reasonably foreseeable. The demurrer to appellant's second cause of action should not have been sustained. The judgment of dismissal is reversed.

Notes to J'Aire

1. For some time now, California has supplanted New Jersey in its role as trend-setter in the USA. The decisions of its Supreme Court attract particular attention. J'Aire is no exception and it is, therefore, regrettable that it has not been thought out fully; indeed, it is a shame that so many of its legal protagonists gave evidence of sloppiness which in the classroom would have earned them low marks.

2. Take, first, counsel for the plaintiffs. The case was originally argued in contract (first cause of action) and tort (second cause of action). Under laboratory conditions, one would have been inclined to argue that, given the nature of the plaintiff's loss (pure economic loss), the first cause of action was more likely to produce a pro-plaintiff decision. Yet in the judgment we are laconically told that "on appeal only the sustaining of the demurrer [by the trial court] to the second cause of action [was] challenged." Many a teacher may have spent much time speculating what strategic reasons may have led to this decision. Yet the answer is much more mundane; and we owe it to Professor Schwartz who had the brilliant idea of asking the attorney in question why he did this, only to be told that "contracts were never my strong point at [law] school." (Schwartz, "Economic Loss in American Tort Law: the Examples of J'Aire and of Products Liability", 23 San Diego L. Rev. 37, 43 (1986)). If one is willing to treat this as an answer containing an element of the truth, it can give rise to much comparative discussion about the "compartmentalised" way law is taught in American law schools.

3. So let us turn to the judgment of the Chief Justice. Early in her judgment, she tells us that "This court has held that a plaintiff's economic advantage may be protected against injury occasioned by negligent . . . conduct." Two illustrations are given to support this proposition, one of economic loss flowing from personal injury, the other from property damage. Neither is appropriate, for in both these cases economic loss causes no difficulties, the limits of recovery being set by the rules of factual and legal cause. The problem we are discussing here, and which confronted the court in J'Aire, is the (different) problem of pure economic loss. (How right those Germans are with their desire to be precise with the terms = reine Vermögensschäden.) If this were a tutorial essay, one would be inclined to scribble in the margin "not relevant".

4. The Chief Justice continues in similar vein, placing great reliance on the decisions in Biakanja, Lucas, and Heyer. These, however, are cases of legal malpractice; they involve different types of relationships, different kinds of insurance arguments, and do not raise the spectre of unlimited liability which (indirectly) plays such a determinative role in pure economic loss cases. The decision thus compares unfavourably with the more subtle and carefully researched judgment of La Forest in Norsk, extracts of which are reproduced below.

5. The actual result in J'Aire may be supportable; indeed it may be reasonable, provided it is produced through contract (or, at least, a tort action, shaped in its scope and consequences by the underlying contract). This point is discussed in greater detail in the notes to the legal malpractice cases; and is made even more obvious when considered against the background of German law (also discussed briefly in these notes).

6. One final (minor) point—interesting from the point of view of comparative methodology. German lawyers studying the Common law always have some difficulty with the notion of duty of care. Conversely, Common lawyers cannot find this key concept in the codal provision which, instead, talks of “protected interests”. The following sentence from Chief Justice Bird’s judgment is, therefore, particularly interesting: “Liability for negligent conduct may only be imposed where there is a duty of care . . . whether a duty is owed is simply a short hand way of phrasing what is the essential question—whether the plaintiff’s interests are entitled to legal protection . . .”. Comparatists should rejoice at such sentences and treat them as the literary equivalents of musical cadenzas. For they offer a chance to escape the strictures imposed by textbooks, and an excellent opportunity to attempt one’s own excursus into legal history, drafting techniques, and the merits and demerits of comparing systems via their concepts or through the functions which their concepts are meant to perform.

Addendum 2

Norsk Pacific Steamship Co. v. Canadian National Railway, [1992] 1 S.C.R. 1021

Summary of the facts

The New Westminster Railways Bridge, which spans the Fraser River near Vancouver and carries a single track, is owned by the Department of Public Works of Canada (PWC). A barge, towed by a tug owned by the defendants (Norsk), and negligently navigated by its captain, damaged the bridge, necessitating its closure for several weeks while it was being repaired. As a result of this closure, the Canadian National Railway (CNR), who were the plaintiffs in this action, had to re-route traffic over another bridge, incurring considerable additional expense. CNR, who accounted for 86 per cent of the use of the bridge, had a licence contract with PWC which, inter alia, obliged them to provide PWC with inspection, consulting, maintenance, and repair services for the bridge as and when requested by PWC and at PWC’s expense. Since the marine traffic using the Fraser river was, at the site of the bridge, heavy and had, in the past, occasioned structural damage to the bridge leading to its closure, the licence agreement between CNR and PWC provided that the former could not claim damages from the latter in the event of closure of the bridge in an emergency. Finally, one should, perhaps, note that CNR owned the land (and tracks) on either side of the bridge (but not the rails on the damaged bridge). CNR’s tort action for its economic losses was accepted at First Instance, by the Court of Appeal, and by four judges out of seven in the Supreme Court.

[Three long judgments were delivered in this case by McLachlin, Stevenson, and La Forest JJ. For reasons of space, only extracts from one of them are reproduced here. They are taken from the “dissent” since it, arguably, provides one of the most thorough judicial discussions of the problem of pure economic loss; but the case will be best understood if read in its entirety.]

La Forest J. (dissenting)—This case concerns recovery in tort for economic loss. Though some of the arguments are framed as if the case turned on the broad question whether such damages are generally recoverable, the specific issue is much narrower. It is whether a person (A) who contracts for the use of property belonging to another (B) can sue a person who damages that property for losses resulting from A's inability to use the property during the period of repair. (I call this "contractual relational economic loss", a convenient if somewhat barbarous phrase.)

The issue arises in a context where a barge collided with a bridge while being pulled by the defendants' tug, thereby preventing the plaintiff (CN) from making use of it. Ordinarily, a person whose operations are disrupted by damage to a bridge belonging to another cannot at common law pursue the person who caused the damage. But the plaintiff claims that it may do so by reason of its particular relationship with the owner of the bridge and with the tortfeasor. As in the case of three other railways, it has a contractual right to use the bridge for railway purposes, but the plaintiff relies on additional facts to establish its special relationship. It is by far the major user of the bridge, which is a central link in its operations, so much so that many of those who operated on the river, including the master of the defendants' tug, thought it belonged to the plaintiff. As well, CN's contract requires it to repair and maintain the bridge when necessary at the request of the owner; CN also owns land close to the bridge.

The courts below and my colleagues, Justices McLachlin and Stevenson, are all of the view that CN's claim should be upheld. But this unanimity is more apparent than real, for they do so for different reasons and, indeed, there is significant disagreement on the determining issues. I take the opposite view. For sound policy reasons, the courts have established a clear rule (the "bright line" rule) that persons cannot sue a tortfeasor for suffering losses to their contractual rights with the owner of property by reason of damages caused to that property by the tortfeasor. That rule, I have no doubt, may be subject to exceptions for clear and overriding policy reasons, but as I will indicate, I have been unable to determine any reason for excluding CN from the general rule in the present case.

[A detailed statement of the facts follows at this stage taking up 7 full columns of the SC Reports.]

The Issues

.....

Analysis

Part I: The Need to Recentre the Analysis on Contractual Relational Economic Loss

To phrase the key issue in this case as a simple one of "is pure economic loss recoverable in tort?" is misleading. I do not doubt that pure economic loss is recoverable in some cases. It does not follow, however, that all economic loss cases are susceptible to the same analysis, or that cases of one type are necessarily relevant to cases of another. Nor does it follow that the constellation of policy concerns that have grown up around the issue of economic loss can be ignored. The fact is that different types of factual situations may invite different approaches to economic loss, and it seems to me to be at best unwise to lump them all together for purposes of analysis. Professor Feldthusen distinguishes five different categories of economic loss cases which involve different policy considerations: see Feldthusen, "Economic Loss in the Supreme Court of Canada: Yesterday and Tomorrow" (1990-91), 17 Can. Bus. L.J. 356, at pp. 357-8. They are as follows:

1. The Independent Liability of Statutory Public Authorities;
2. Negligent Misrepresentation;
3. Negligent Performance of a Service;
4. Negligent Supply of Shoddy Goods or Structures;
5. Relational Economic Loss.

The present case fits into his fifth category. In my view, both policy and precedent justify narrowing the focus in the present case to loss cases of the kind described in that category.

.....

Policy

Cases of contractual relational loss have a number of specific characteristics that differentiate them from other economic loss cases, and certainly from other non-relational loss cases. The first is that in such cases, the right of action of the property owner already puts pressure on the defendants to act with care. The deterrent effect of tort law, to the extent that it survives the advent of widespread insurance, is already present. In this case PWC collected substantial damages. Consequently, Norsk was already under a substantial incentive to take care with respect to the bridge since its liability to the bridge owner would and did require the payment of substantial damages. In most cases of this type, imposing further liability cannot reasonably be justified on the grounds of deterrence (unless a policy of full internalisation of all losses resulting from accidents to the party who could have avoided the accident is to be pursued at all costs).

This is a critical difference with respect to the other types of economic loss cases. Professor Feldthusen underlines the importance of this first key aspect of contractual relational economic loss cases, in the following passage dealing with relational loss generally ((1990–91), 17 Can. Bus. L.J. 356, at p. 377):

... in each of [the first four] categories [identified above], the issue is whether the law of negligence applies at all to sanction the defendant's careless conduct. Relational loss cases are different because the defendant will be held liable to the victim of physical damage. The issue is whether additional liability to third parties is warranted. The better analogy is not to how the claim in Hedley Byrne or Rivtow Marine was resolved, but to how an additional claim brought by the best customer of the plaintiffs in each of those cases would have fared. [Emphasis added.]

I come now to a second distinction. A firm exclusionary rule in this area does not have the effect of necessarily excluding compensation to the plaintiff for his or her loss. Rather, it simply channels to the property owner both potential liability to the plaintiff and the right of recovery against the tortfeasor. The property owner is both entitled to recover from the tortfeasor and potentially liable under contract to the plaintiff. Here, the licence agreement explicitly rejected any liability, so the plaintiff cannot recover under it against PWC. In contracts between sophisticated parties such as those in the case at bar, who are well advised by counsel, such exclusions of liability often result from determinations regarding who is in the best position to insure the risk at the lowest cost.

A third distinction is that perfect compensation of all contractual relational economic loss is almost always impossible because of the ripple effects which are of the very essence of contractual relational economic loss. This aspect has been recognized as critical from the very beginning. It is in this sense that the solution to cases of this type is necessarily pragmatic and involves drawing a line that will exclude at least some people who have been undeniably injured owing to the tortfeasor's admitted failure to meet the requisite standard of care.

In other types of economic loss cases, ripple effects may not be of concern. Thus cases like the present are significantly different from the situation in Rivtow Marine Ltd. v. Washington Iron Works, [1974] S.C.R. 1189, in which Rivtow was the sole victim of the type of damage for which it claimed. Full compensation of all those to whom a private law duty is owed is also realistically possible in the situation dealt with in Kamloops (City of) v. Nielsen, [1984] 2 S.C.R. 2. In cases like the present, claims that the denial of recovery in the type of case here would be "unjust" must take into account that other "just" claims are inevitably denied in this type of case.

Finally, contractual relational economic loss cases typically involve accidents. This distinguishes them from both products liability economic loss cases like Rivtow, in which by definition there is no accident, and negligent misrepresentation cases like Hedley Byrne & Co. v. Heller & Partners Ltd., [1964] AC 465. This aspect is of fundamental importance with respect to tests of liability founded on the foreseeability of an individual plaintiff or an ascertained class of plaintiffs, which I shall discuss in Part III.

In light of these substantial differences between contractual relational economic loss cases and other pure economic loss cases, I agree with Professor Feldthusen, that "it assists little, if at all, to generalise on the basis of proximity from other types of economic loss cases to the relational loss cases” ((1990–91), 17 Can. Bus. L.J. 356, at p. 376). For the purposes of the present case, it is not necessary to proceed to an exhaustive categorisation of economic loss cases. There is, in my view, at the very least a clear difference between economic loss in three types of cases.

In the first type, which involves what has been termed consequential economic loss, the plaintiff claims for economic loss in addition to his claims for property damage or personal injury. Focusing on the issue of remoteness of damage, the courts have established guidelines regarding the availability of damages for economic loss in these cases.

In the second type, which can be termed non-relational economic loss, the plaintiff claims for pure economic loss unrelated to any personal injury or property damage suffered by either the plaintiff or any third party. The law in this area is developing. In view of my analysis of the issues in this case, it is not necessary for me to say much about these cases. I doubt, however, that this group can be analyzed in terms of a single rule. The extract from Professor Feldthusen above contends that this group can be further broken down into four distinct categories. It is sufficient to say that I fully support this Court’s rejection of the broad bar on recovery of pure economic loss in Rivtow and Kamloops. I would stress again the need to take into account the specific characteristics of each case. I agree with McLachlin J that Murphy v. Brentwood District Council, [1991] 1 AC 398, does not represent the law in Canada.

The present case, however, is of a third type. It involves a claim for contractual relational economic loss by the plaintiff as a result of damage caused to someone else’s property.

Precedent

The English Background . . .

[There follows a brief review of Canadian and US law before La Forest turns his attention to the civil law systems.]

Civil Law Systems

Since my colleagues have also supported their conclusions by forays into comparative law, and notably their understanding of the civil law experience, I find it necessary to enter into some discussion of that experience. I say at the outset that it does not seem to me to provide as much comfort for my colleagues’ views as they seem to derive from it.

It is undeniable that not all legal systems have isolated cases like the present as presenting specific problems. Some civil law systems do not apply any particular rules either to pure economic loss cases or to contractual relational economic loss cases. The opinions of my colleagues in this case particularly rely on the law of France and Quebec. The argument from French and Quebec law is really about the floodgates argument. Since those systems allow recovery for pure economic loss without breaking down, the argument goes, we should not be deterred by floodgates arguments: see Jutras, “Civil Law and Pure Economic Loss: What Are We Missing?” (1986–87), 12 Can. Bus. L.J. 295, at p. 310. In my opinion the relevant comparative reference is to contractual relational economic loss, not to the broad question of pure economic loss. To consider comparative law at the level of generality of “economic loss” is not, in my view, helpful. I have already explained why I think the cases grouped under the rubric of economic loss deserve a more refined analysis. The same narrowing of the question should be employed in the recourse to comparative law. The legal system of every society faces essentially the same problems and solves these problems by quite different means, though often with similar results: see Zweigert and Kötz, Introduction to Comparative Law, Volume I—The Framework (2nd edn. 1987), at p. 31. While some of these systems have not retained the concept of “economic loss” as a limiting factor, they have generally not recognized claims of the type put forward here.

Second, the French and Quebec approach involves applying the same criteria to a case of this type as to any other tort claim. Although some scholars argue that the Common law should change its focus entirely to a concern with causation as the limiting factor (see Tetley, “Damages and Economic Loss in Marine Collision: Controlling the Floodgates" (1991), 22 J. Mar. Law & Com. 539, at p. 584), this does not appear to me to be an advisable option. Our current causality test of foreseeability is clearly insufficient to control liability. The directness criterion was rejected in Overseas Tankship (UK) Ltd. v. Morts Dock & Engineering Co. (The Wagon Mound), [1961] AC 388, for determinations as to remoteness and does not seem to me to provide much predictive value: see SCM (United Kingdom) Ltd. v. W J Whittall and Son Ltd., supra, at p. 343.

A close examination of French law in this area reveals that the floodgates problem is resolved by the use of a number of control devices such that liability is very rare. French delict doctrine treats the question of dommage par ricochet in relation first to the requirement that the injury suffered must have a "personal character"; see Viney, "Les obligations: La responsabilité: conditions" (1982), in Ghestin, Traité de droit civil, nos. 288 et seq. Undoubtedly, in general terms, French law allows generous recovery for dommage par ricochet: see Viney, at no. 309. However, with respect to persons who were contractually linked to the initial victim, Viney writes as follows, at no. 312:

[Translation] The courts have from time to time had before them claims made by some customer, supplier or creditor, or by a partner, employee or employer, of the initial victim when the latter's death endangers their interests. In general, the courts have so far been very hesitant to allow such claims, especially those made by a creditor, employer or partner; but at the same time a more liberal solution may well be envisaged in the case of employees who are thrown out of work by the employer's death.

The position in French law is no more harsh in this respect than that of foreign systems of law, which generally refuse to take into consideration this type of repercussive damage. . . . [Emphasis added.]

The distinction of the case of the employee is not specifically justified, but the most obvious rationale for distinguishing that particular case is surely that the employee is least able to protect himself or herself from the consequences of the accident. As for mere créanciers of the primary victim like CN, recovery is generally denied. The 1975 Cour de cassation case which left open the issue of recovery for a creditor whose debtor died as result of the defendant's fault, Cass. civ. 2^e, June 25, 1975, Bull. II no. 195, eventually returned to that court in 1979: see Cass. civ. 2^e, February 21, 1979, Bougues-Montès, J.C.P. 1979, IV, 145. The finding that the damages were indirect and hence unrecoverable was, as noted by Durry, partly justified by the fact that the lender should have protected himself by contract by requiring his debtor to contract life insurance; see "Obligations et contrats spéciaux" (1979), 77 Rev. trim. dr. civ. 610. Larroumet speaks of recovery in such cases (other than in cases of contracts concluded intuitus personae) as an [translation] "academic hypothesis" and notes that [translation] "it is rarely found in the cases": see Bordeaux, May 17, 1977, D.1978, I.R. 34, note Larroumet.

Cases in which contractual relational economic loss have been awarded as a result of property damage to a third party are even more rare. These cases are admittedly also subject to the same basic framework of analysis. However, the Cour de Cassation exercises its control over the lower courts' determinations of causality; see Starck, Droit civil: Obligations: I. Responsabilité délictuelle (3rd edn. 1988), by Roland and Boyer, at no. 851. Recovery is rarely allowed. Durry describes the state of the law in this area as follows, "Obligations et contrats spéciaux" (1976), 74 Rev. trim. dr. civ. 132, at p. 134:

[Translation] Physical repercussive damage to one who is neither parent, relative, fiancé or mistress of the immediate victim responds to a well-known dialectic: though in principle compensation may be obtained it in fact rarely is.

Markesinis' comparative examination of English and French law in this area (Markesinis, "La politique jurisprudentielle et la réparation du préjudice économique en Angleterre: une approche comparative", [1983] Rev. int. dr. comp. 31, at pp. 44-5), also points out the remarkable similarity of result despite the different analytical approaches:

[Translation] The first point to note is that French judges are fully aware of these dangers. Some fifty years ago the Tribunal civil of Bordeaux indicated it had no doubts on the matter when it said "that extending entitlement to damages to everyone who might in some way suffer tangible or intangible injury from a quasi-delict would amount to creating a kind of social disorder which can never be the purpose of the law . . . Accordingly, what is special about this judgment is that it openly expresses the philosophy of many judgments which have followed and which, though in theory they admit the possibility of compensation, have in many if not all cases proceeded to a denial of the right of action in practice. Consequently, what is interesting in these cases is to examine the method used to arrive at the result which English law obtains in a generally and rigidly applicable manner.

A variety of “causal” dispositions, which sometimes seemed to involve duplication, have been skilfully (and at times arbitrarily) used to attain this result. In some cases, it is said that the victim assumed the risk; in other cases, that the injury suffered is only indirect; and in still others, that it is only hypothetical and not certain; but in all cases, the possibility of compensation is recognized in theory. [Emphasis added.]

Recovery has been allowed in a few contractual relational economic loss cases. The first is where the contract that is disturbed is intuitus personae, i.e., a personal service contract where the particular individual cannot be replaced. In one case, a soccer club recovered for damages incurred as a result of the death of a star player: see Cour d’appel de Colmar (chapter détachée à Metz), 20 April 1955, D.1956.723 (Football Club de Metz c. Wiroth). Even here, however, the law is not certain: recovery was denied to an opera director for the loss caused by an injury to the leading tenor: see Cass. civ. 2^e, 14 November 1958, G.P. 1959.1.31 (Demeyer c. Camerlo). In a preliminary procedure at first instance, recovery was allowed to employees whose unemployment was caused by the tortfeasor who damaged their hair salon: see Trib. gr. inst. Nanterre, 22 October 1975, G.P. 1976.1.392 (Brunet c. Rico et Caisse mutuelle d’assurance et de prévoyance).

Marcailloux v. R.A.T.V.M., Cass. civ. 2^e, April 28, 1965, D.S. 1965.777, cited by McLachlin J, involved a traffic accident that led to a traffic jam. The person who caused the accident was held liable for damages of 39 francs to the local transport authority for the loss of receipts caused by the resulting delay to the circulation of its vehicles. It is unclear what distinguishes this claim from other potential traffic jam claims. The note by Professor Esmein in the Marcailloux case observes that the characterisation of a particular damage as direct or indirect, far from being a factual inquiry, is simply the statement of a conclusion as to recovery; in this regard, it plays a similar function to the concept of proximity in our law. See Note under Cass. civ. 2^e, 28 April 1965, D.S. 1965.777.

In Quebec, the expansive interpretation of “another” in Article 1053 of the Civil Code of Lower Canada referred to by McLachlin J has served to shift the analysis to the terrain of causality: see Baudouin, La responsabilité civile délictuelle (3rd edn., 1990), at no. 177. Baudouin recognizes the difficulty of generalizing with respect to determinations of directness but he considers that a trend toward an exclusion of liability is discernible, supra, at no. 354:

[Translation] The problem of determining what is “direct” damage is complex and here again any attempt at generalisation would be presumptuous. However, one trend seems to be clear. The courts will not recognise loss the immediate source of which is not the fault itself but some other injury already caused by the fault. In other words, damage resulting from damage, repercussive damage, “second degree” damage, is indirect.

However, as the author recognises, this is at most a trend. He further notes that Quebec courts have tended to consider causality as a question of fact: supra, at no. 349. This would constitute a significant difference with the French regime. However, the author notes that the decision of this Court in Morin v. Blais, [1977] 1 S.C.R. 570, considered the question of causality to constitute a question of law. Recovery of contractual relational economic loss has been allowed in a few cases in Quebec. Employers have been allowed to recover for the loss of the services of their employees.

In my view, the French and Quebec experience remains inconclusive. Although the cases are theoretically not subject to any special requirements for recovery, cases of recovery of contractual relational economic loss are few. The rarity of the cases has resulted in little doctrinal discussion of the issues raised and the brevity of the reasons makes the grounds for determination difficult to analyse. While French law does not establish an absolute bar, it is very close to establishing a de facto bar through the use of the dual requirements of directness and proof of causality. The number of cases in which recovery has been allowed is very few when one considers that relational losses occur as a result of practically every accident causing property damage in the commercial area.

Furthermore, one is at pains to establish the grounds for distinguishing successful claims from other relational claims. What little doctrinal discussion there is appears to be both keenly aware of the potential for open-ended liability and conscious that recovery is generally denied. Such analysis also points to factors entering into the directness and causality analysis that would exclude CN's claim, factors such as the intuitus personae nature of the contractual relationship and the inability of the plaintiff to protect itself through contract or otherwise. I shall have occasion to consider such factors later.

In addition, civil law scholars have remarked on the lack of emphasis in French and Quebec law on the problems raised by the nature of particular protected interests; see Jutras, supra, at pp. 295–6 and 310–11. In civil law systems such as the German system which, unlike the French system, have focused significant attention on the problems posed by the nature of different protected interests (see Limpens, Kruihof and Meinertzhagen-Limpens, 'Liability for One's Own Act', in International Encyclopedia of Comparative Law, vol. XI, Torts, chapter 2, IV.), recovery is denied for contractual relational claims based on the type of damage; see Markesinis, A Comparative Introduction to the German Law of Torts (2nd edn. 1990), at pp. 39 et seq. Other civil law systems have strict exclusionary rules. Switzerland apparently excludes le dommage par ricochet, allowing only recovery for wrongful death; see Herbots, "Le 'duty of care' et le dommage purement financier en droit comparé" [1985], Rev. dr. int. et dr. comp. 7, at p. 32.

What conclusions can be drawn from the civil law? First, I think there is general agreement that economic loss cases cannot simply be subjected to the same analysis as cases involving other types of damage: see Atiyah, supra, at p. 270. No one is suggesting, after all, that we modify the rules adopted in Hedley Byrne for an undifferentiated Donoghue test in economic loss cases.

There remains the argument that French and Quebec experience puts the lie to the floodgates problem in this area. In my view, this is simply not borne out. First of all, as Markesinis points out, French judges are acutely aware of the potential for unlimited liability. They use different analytical tools to reach much the same result.

One can of course attempt to meet the floodgates argument by contending that recovery for contractual relational economic loss will remain exceptional even if the exclusionary rule is relaxed. This is perhaps the most that can be drawn from the civil law experience: the replacement of an exclusionary rule with what amounts to very close to a de facto bar will not lead to many cases being brought forward. Unlike the civil law rules in these areas, however, the traditional control devices in our tort law have been elaborated to deal with damages that are generally by their nature limited.

I am principally concerned about the relative advisability of attempting to draw a line within the group of contractual claimants as opposed to distinguishing based on the nature of the interest at stake. Specifically, I am concerned about the nature and the workability of the criteria used to distinguish valid claims. In my view, any incursions into the exclusionary rule should be carefully justified on policy grounds. With respect to this question, I do not find any theory put forward in either France or Quebec that would aid in making distinctions amongst contractual claimants on valid policy grounds; see the discussion by Mayrand JA of the difficulties in making the directness determination with respect to "victims by ricochet" in JE Construction Inc. v. General Motors du Canada Ltée, [1985] CA 275, at pp. 278–9.

To the extent that recovery has been allowed, the inability of doctrine to elucidate the characteristics leading to recovery or to a finding of directness gives the lie to the idea that allowing recovery in a few cases of this nature will provide material for an ex post rationalisation that the court is incapable of formulating beforehand. I do not share McLachlin J's confidence that turning this issue over to the Common law to decide cases on the basis of proximity will lead to the gradual formation of categories of recovery that make sense in policy terms, and nothing in the civil law experience with findings of directness leads me to greater confidence in this regard: see Herbots, supra, at p. 21.

The narrow exclusionary rule distinguishes between property claims and contract claims and excludes the latter in cases of property damage. This bright line test has been in the past extended to the wider field of pure economic loss; in this wider field, it is in retreat in a number of areas. In my view, this case presents the court with the following problem: should the court eliminate the bright line test in the narrow area of contractual relational economic loss in favour of a test that will discriminate differently, this time amongst the class of contractual claimants, those who merit recovery and those who do not? If yes, what criteria should govern recovery?

Before dealing further with the question of contractual relational economic loss, however, it is necessary to consider a different set of arguments advanced by the respondent.

Part II: Alternative Interest Theories

Introductory Remarks

CN argues that its case does not rest on a mere contractual interest. It seeks to avoid the application of the narrow exclusionary rule by arguing that it has alternative interests at stake that differentiate it from the ordinary contractual claimant. It does not seek to place itself under a long-standing exception to the exclusionary rule enunciated in Simpson & Co. v. Thomson, supra, at p. 290, which involves cases allowing recovery to a plaintiff with a proprietary or possessory interest. If CN could argue that its interest in the bridge was analogous to the interest of a demise charterer in the chartered ship, it would be able to recover since it would be, vis-à-vis third parties, the temporary owner of the bridge; see Scrutton on Charterparties and Bills of Lading (19th edn. 1984), at pp. 47–52; Baumwoll Manufactur von Carl Scheibler v. Furness, [1893] AC 8 (HL); The “Father Thames”, [1979] 2 Lloyd’s Rep. 364. A demise charterer’s interest typically entirely supplants the interest of the owner of the ship, even in the repair of physical damage: see Candlewood, supra, at p. 18. For example, in Rivtow, the plaintiff was a demise charterer. No argument was directed to contesting Rivtow’s interest.

CN’s licence agreement gives it no proprietary or possessory interest. This state of affairs was surely not entirely fortuitous in light of the fact that the existence of such an interest was a central consideration in the Gypsum Carrier case. CN’s contract with PWC establishes no proprietary or possessory interest in the bridge, and it did not attempt to argue that its contract resembled that of a demise charterer.

Unable to contend for the existence of a possessory right to the bridge, CN, we saw, put forward essentially two arguments to the effect that its interest is more than that of a mere contractor. First, it says, it suffered from a transferred loss of use. Secondly, it maintains, it is involved in a common adventure with PWC. These arguments are centred on the relationship between the plaintiff and the property owner, i.e., between CN and PWC.

Transferred Loss Theories

CN frames its argument with respect to transferred loss in two different ways. First, it submits that “P.W.C. initially suffered the physical loss for the damage to the bridge, but pursuant to their contracts with the railways all costs are ultimately borne by the railways, substantially by the C.N.R.”. Along a similar line, it contends that PWC “acted like a trustee” in providing the bridge to the railways and particularly CN. The second manner in which it frames its argument on transferred loss involves arguing that granting judgment to CN in this case would not impose additional liability on the defendants over and above what they would normally be incurred by the owner of commercial property. I will deal with these in turn.

The respondent’s first argument, as I understand it, is that the contract provides for a particularly mechanical passing through of the costs of the accident to the eventual users. CN’s claim is thus different from the typical contractual relational claim.

I find this unconvincing. The rates are not set after all the costs are established. Canada unilaterally sets the rate for each three-year period of the licence after the initial three-year period, in light of the principle set out in the preamble of “total recovery to Canada of all the costs of operating and maintaining the Bridge” (see Recital E of the Preamble of the License Agreement). After each renewal of the contract the railway has a guaranteed unit rate for three years. CN is less exposed to costs incurred by the property owner than the typical consumer, for whom the costs incurred today are often passed through almost immediately. Before any such costs are passed through to CN, the current unit rate must expire and CN must decide that it wishes to renew the contract for another three-year period.

Second, it must be noted that PWC recovered damages as property owner in this case. Since PWC was fully compensated, none of the costs of property damage in this case will be passed through, even in the future. The only transferred loss in this case concerned a loss of use.

Third, the real reason all the loss of use costs appear to be passed through in this case has nothing to do with any special characteristics of CN or of the licence agreement. Rather, it results from the fact that PWC runs the bridge on a non-profit basis. PWC did suffer a loss of use of its fee-earning capacity; its pricing policy is such that the economic value of its loss of use is zero. In most cases, the owner of a profit-making chattel damaged by the tortfeasor will suffer a loss of use in the form of reduced payments by users. Here, the loss of use appears to be transferred in toto only because PWC does not use the bridge to earn a profit so it incurs no financial loss owing to interruption of transit fees. PWC’s pricing policy, which happens to be particularly advantageous to CN and the other users at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada, does not mean that any more transferred loss of use occurred in this case than in the typical case.

Fourth, the toll structure does not support the “unique relationship” theory since all railways were equally situated with respect to this factor. The loss of use in this case was initially spread over the four railways. A wide range of people and companies were undoubtedly affected by the unavailability of the bridge. People who contracted for carriage of their goods by the railways, for example, may well have had shipment of the goods delayed in transit. The eventual bearer of this loss would be determined by the terms of the contract of carriage.

As the appellants rightly suggest, the contract CN had for the shared use of the bridge puts it in no better position to recover its loss than a time charterer who contracts for the sole use of a vessel. Recovery has been regularly denied in the time charterer cases: see Konstantinidis v. World Tankers Corp. (The World Harmony), [1967] P. 341, at p. 362.

The unique features of the toll structure are not such as to found an alternative legally protected interest over and above the contractual interest of the plaintiff. A fortiori, they also are not such as to justify a characterisation of PWC as a trustee.

The second manner in which the respondent frames its loss of use argument involves arguing that granting judgment to CN in this case would not be extending the liability of the defendants over and above what they would normally incur to the owner of commercial property. Here, the respondent essentially argues that the defendants’ liability should not be reduced merely because it was fortunate enough to strike a bridge being used by railways. Had PWC, i.e., the owner, been using the bridge, it could have recovered loss of use profits as consequential economic loss.

I am uncertain whether it is advisable to so extend recovery to a type of damages that would normally be recovered by an owner. I am certain, however, that to extend recovery to everything that could be recovered by an owner would be impractical.

To accept wide recovery for transferred loss as proposed by the plaintiff here would have the effect of entitling the plaintiff to compensation in all cases dealing with contracts for the use of another’s property. If loss of use is extended to include the costs of finding alternate sources for the same benefits, it goes considerably beyond what is normally payable to the owner in commercial cases, although admittedly it could be payable to the owner.

True transferred loss cases involve a claim which is in essence a claim for property damage which the owner himself would have recovered, had the loss not fallen on the plaintiff because of their contract. A true transferred loss case requires that the risk of property damage have passed, as in the case of goods damaged in transit after the risk (but not the property) has passed to the buyer. In such a case, unless the buyer is given a right of action, the carrier will be liable to neither party: not to the seller because he has suffered no loss, nor to the buyer who has no protected interest; see Fleming, The Law of Torts (7th edn. 1987), at pp. 164–5.

Even in that type of case, recovery was denied in the recent House of Lords decision in Leigh and Silavan Ltd. v. Aliakmon Shipping Co., supra, essentially on the ground that contract law provided a sufficient protection in the circumstances of that case. It was only the particular variation of the contract to which the buyers agreed that deprived them of their usual right of action.

The present is not a true transferred loss case. PWC has collected for the property damage it has sustained. The transferred loss claimed in this case is thus not with respect to the property damage claim. Rather, it is a claim for the transferred loss of use, or transferred economic loss.

In these circumstances, I fail to see how the respondent suffered a transferred loss such as to create an alternative protected interest to its contractual interest.

Common Adventure or Joint Venture

...

Part III: The Proposed Tests

CN argues that even if we reject its “alternative interests” argument and find its interest merely contractual, the existence of other factors is sufficient to constitute a special relationship with the tortfeasor and to ground recovery for its contractual claims in this case. In particular, it points to the high degree of subjective and objective foreseeability in this case as sufficient to constitute a special relationship between Norsk and CN, but other factors are invoked as well. The respondent does not deny the existence of the rule in Cattle. It contends, however, that the rationale for Cattle is simply that the mere disruption of contractual rights without more is insufficient to ground recovery. These arguments represent an attempt to qualify the application of the contractual relational economic loss exclusionary rule.

My colleague McLachlin J has set forth guideposts for the search for the answer to the issue in the case at bar. In brief, she underlines the need for limits to liability, the need for the limits to be reasonably clear and the need for the rule to respond to considerations of policy and fairness. She also recognises that a single rule for all economic loss cases is probably unattainable. I am in substantial agreement with her on these points but I consider that a number of additional aspects are relevant to the choice of a rule in this area.

First, with respect to the need for limits to liability, it is important to underline that perfect justice is not possible in this area; it is impossible to compensate everybody who suffers loss owing to their contractual relationships with the property owner. Some losses, which were undoubtedly incurred as a result of a defendant’s negligence, are going to remain uncompensated. The challenge, then, is to come up with a rule that divides the winners and the losers in the best possible manner.

A good test should distinguish on a rational basis between potential plaintiffs, all of whom were injured by the defendants’ negligence. The plaintiff’s proposed rule should offer a convincing and practical rationale for distinguishing its claim from those other claims, contractual or otherwise, which are to be rejected. Victims whose claims are to be denied must perceive a minimum of justice in the result. In my view, none of the theories that involve the acceptance of CN’s claim but which would lead to the rejection of the claims of the other railways can be accepted as just from this perspective.

A test for recovery in cases of economic loss to contractual entitlements caused by property damage to another party should reflect the characteristics of this type of litigation, described in Feldthusen, Economic Negligence, supra, at pp. 207–8:

The defendants in this type of case are not typically heinous wrongdoers, but rather individuals and enterprises engaged in common and useful social activity. The same is true of the plaintiffs who are inadvertently harmed by some unfortunate and often inevitable consequence of modern life. Few important moral, social or symbolic issues are involved. Here, if anywhere, the economists' suggestion that the law should devise rules which permit the occasionally incompatible activities of plaintiffs and defendants to continue at the lowest possible total social cost should be taken seriously. This includes rules which encourage both parties to take cost-efficient accident prevention measures. And in respect of the unavoidable accidents which remain, it suggests that the loss should be borne by the party who can insure against it at the lowest cost. [Emphasis in original.]

This description is pertinent in the present case. A good rule should thus place some incentive on both parties to act in an economically rational manner to reduce total accident costs.

The rule must, of course, also confront the problem of indeterminacy. It is often suggested that this is the only problem the rule must confront. This was perhaps natural in light of the importance of potential indeterminate liability in negligent misrepresentation cases and the fact that the breakthrough in allowing recovery for economic loss came in Hedley Byrne. However, this confusion between the two issues tended to obscure the variety of issues raised in different kinds of economic loss cases. If the principal reason lying behind the broad exclusionary rule for pure economic loss is the concern over indeterminate liability, then the exclusionary rule can be easily discarded in favour of a more direct test of whether liability would be indeterminate. The plaintiff's case here is essentially built on this proposition and they offer this Court a wide variety of factual distinctions which they contend respond to the concern about indeterminate liability. As the above discussion indicates, I do not agree with that approach; a rule in this area should serve to do more than simply exclude indeterminate liability. However, in contractual economic loss cases, the proposed rule must certainly confront this issue.

What then does it mean for a particular liability to be determinate? The first critical question is whether the liability needs to be determinate before or after the accident. It is important to underline that since most claims of this nature occur in the commercial area, the requisite certainty should exist before the accident occurs. A company like CN should be able to consult legal counsel and receive reasonably clear advice with respect to potential recovery in the case of an accident that it as common as a ship hitting a bridge. So should a company like Burlington Northern Railway. Even more importantly, when the shoe is on the other foot, CN should also be able to get some reasonably clear guidance from counsel with respect to its potential liabilities in a case where a train derailed and damages a factory. Estimating such liability is, of course, a key aspect to the pricing of insurance for potential tortfeasors. Under the exclusionary rule, liability is determinate before the accident; unless the contract is such as to create a joint venture or a possessory interest, all parties are aware that no recovery will lie for damage to those contractual interests.

The second important point is that the objection is not simply to a large number of claims since an accident may injure a large number of people or cause extensive property damage. But in physical damage cases, the number of potential first-victim claims is usually foreseeable even when large. Even more importantly, it is rare for multiple physical damage claims to ripple down a chain; physical injury to one person rarely gives rise to physical injury to others down a chain: see Stapleton, supra, at p. 255. Such ripple effects are on the contrary the very essence of contractual relational economic loss. The concern is that the volume of claims is indeterminate and therefore difficult and expensive to insure against.

A third important consideration is the indeterminacy of each claim. Recovery for contractual expectancies requires analysis of who bore the loss. What would happen if CN effectively passed on any increased costs incurred owing to the unavailability of the bridge to its customers? Refusing to address this question could result in a very expensive tort case leading to compensation for a party who suffered no loss. In a multi-stage chain of contracts, it becomes very difficult to analyse the economic effects of an accident on a particular link in the chain. A related concern is with false or inflated claims: see Spartan Steel, supra.

The problem with this case from the perspective of indeterminacy is that it involves a type of accident that will very likely lead to a great number of claims. It so happens that on the facts of this case, the number of injured parties is small. The fact that Norsk was fortunate enough to hit a bridge with few users does not make its potential liability for contractual relational economic loss any less indeterminate. Its liability after the accident is, of course, determinate; but beforehand, when potential tortfeasors are looking for insurance, they and their insurance company do not know which bridge will be hit. It seems odd to establish one set of rules for negligent tortfeasors who hit busy bridges—liability for economic loss is excused because of indeterminacy—and a different set for those who hit bridges used by few users.

Foreseeability of the individual plaintiff or of an ascertained class of plaintiffs

CN heavily stressed the defendants' undoubtedly high level of subjective and objective knowledge that CN as a particular company would suffer loss. My colleague Stevenson J relies on this factor as his principal ground for finding liability in this case. There is no question that Norsk knew and ought to have known that CN would suffer loss. Indeed, the facts reveal that the tug captain thought CN would suffer even more than it did, since he erroneously thought the bridge belonged to it. I am unable to see the importance of this "excess of foresight" in policy terms, however.

First, the subjective view of the defendants with respect to the ownership of the bridge is obviously not sufficient to ground a claim. Such an error does not, of course, negate the defendants' duty with respect to the actual owner of the property. Why should it have the effect of creating new duties in the absence of a protected interest? It remains true, however, that Norsk could reasonably foresee that a specific plaintiff, CN, would suffer loss as a contractual claimant. Should this factor distinguish CN from other contractual claimants?

Two judges in Caltex suggested versions of an individual plaintiff test, at least one that would allow recovery in this case. At the level of a general test for all cases of pure economic loss, Mason J. adopted what can be termed the specific individual test. "A defendant", he held at p. 274, "will then be liable for economic damage due to his negligent conduct when he can reasonably foresee that a specific individual, as distinct from a general class of persons, will suffer financial loss as a consequence of his conduct". Gibbs J also incorporated the known plaintiff test into his analysis as a necessary but not sufficient condition for liability (at p. 245). As he saw it, the existence of a common adventure or physical propinquity may have supporting roles, but are neither necessary nor sufficient. The ascertained class test would allow recovery where the defendant knows or has the means of knowing that the persons likely to be affected by his or her negligence consist of a definite number of persons.

In Candlewood, supra, at p. 24, the House of Lords rejected the individual plaintiff test and the ascertained class of plaintiffs test in the following terms:

Their Lordships have carefully considered these reasons for the decision in the Caltex case, 136 C.L.R. 529. With regard to the reasons given by Gibbs and Mason JJ, their Lordships have difficulty in seeing how to distinguish between a plaintiff as an individual and a plaintiff as a member of an unascertained class. The test can hardly be whether the plaintiff is known by name to the wrongdoer. Nor does it seem logical for the test to depend upon the plaintiff being a single individual. Further, why should there be a distinction for this purpose between a case where the wrongdoer knows (or has the means of knowing) that the persons likely to be affected by his negligence consist of a definite number of persons whom he can identify either by name or in some other way (for example as being the owners of particular factories or hotels) and who may therefore be regarded as an ascertained class, and a case where the wrongdoer knows only that there are several persons, the exact number being to him unknown, and some or all of whom he could not identify by name or otherwise, and who may therefore be regarded as an unascertained class? Moreover much of the argument in favour of an ascertained class seems to depend upon the view that the class would normally consist of only a few individuals. But would it be different if the class, though ascertained, was large? Suppose for instance that the class consisted of all the pupils in a particular school. If it was a kindergarten school with only six pupils they might be regarded as constituting an ascertained class, even if their names were unknown to the wrongdoer. If the school was a large one with over a thousand pupils it might be suggested that they were not an ascertained class. But it is not easy to see a distinction in principle merely because the number of possible claimants is larger in one case than in the other. Apart from cases of negligent misstatement, with which their Lordships are not here concerned, they do not consider that it is practicable by reference to an ascertained class to find a satisfactory control mechanism which could be applied in such a way as to give reasonable certainty in its results.

In Kamloops, supra, Wilson J also questioned the advisability of the individual plaintiff test. At pages 30–1, she stated:

It is quite apparent that Gibbs and Jacobs JJ, and possibly Stephen J also, were seeking some means of permitting recovery for pure economic loss while avoiding the undesirable consequences of applying the reasonable foreseeability rule, namely indeterminate liability to an indeterminate class. They saw the solution in limiting foreseeability to specific individuals rather than members of a class. I am not sure, however, that their exception solves the problem. It may make the class determinate but it gives no guarantee that it will be small.

Both Lord Fraser of Tullybelton's unanimous opinion and Wilson J's majority opinion stressed the practical difficulties in applying such a test. I agree that the practical difficulties of applying such a test are considerable to say the least.

In my view, problems also exist at the level of principle. In the absence of any malicious intent on the part of the defendant, of what significance is the fact that the defendant knew that the individual plaintiff would suffer? In my view, its only role is to limit liability. The individual plaintiff or class of plaintiff or special relationship test serves a very different and more focused policy function in the context of the negligent misrepresentation cases where it has been employed: see Hedley Byrne, supra; Candler v. Crane, Christmas & Co., [1951] 2 KB 164. Professor Feldthusen remarks as follows on its function in those cases ((1990–91), 17 Can. Bus. L.J. 356, at pp. 376–7):

... the duty of care is derived from a business relationship between the parties which antedates, and is independent from, the negligent act. The assumption of responsibility or special relationship duty tests and the known limited class remoteness test were developed to deal with transaction-specific negligence. The defendant makes a reflective transactional undertaking to a third party which affects (and is probably intended to affect) the plaintiff. The defendant is actually contemplating advice or service and its consequences in the transaction. It makes some sense to speak of parties known to be at risk from the contemplated transaction. The entire thrust of misrepresentation and services law is to limit liability to contemplated transaction-specific situations. One may describe this in proximity language, but it is a different use of the proximity principle than in a relational case. [Emphasis added.]

Those cases involve the defendant's making a representation voluntarily. It makes sense to impose upon the defendant a requirement that he or she put his or her mind to the question of who might be affected, since the defendant has the opportunity to reflect on this issue before making the representation: see Haig v. Bamford, supra.

Here we are dealing with an accident. There is no intention to affect the plaintiff; rather the effect on the plaintiff is merely a result of the accident. Norsk cannot be said to contemplate a particular act of negligence, a particular plaintiff or a particular loss in the same sense as a bank manager who provides financial information. Knowledge of the individual plaintiff serves solely to eliminate "indeterminate liability": it operates arbitrarily both in terms of singling out defendants and in terms of singling out plaintiffs.

In the context of an accident, this criteria has thus no link with fault or with a lack of care; surely no one is suggesting tort law should strive to protect bridges with high profile users more than bridges used by anonymous users, or that defendants who damage bridges with high profile users are more guilty than others. Its sole function is to distinguish one plaintiff from another and thus "solve" the indeterminacy problem, a function that could be as effectively performed by a rule based on the colour of CN's trains.

Allowing CN's claim to be distinct from the other contractual victims by virtue of its particular foreseeability as an individual victim would in my view give rise to an unjust rule owing to its sheer arbitrariness. It serves neither to distinguish particularly meritorious victims, nor to single out particularly careless tortfeasors. Its sole function is to reduce the class of claimants to a small group, a function that could be equally well performed by any other factual distinction. Further, the test would have the effect of singling out the wrong parties for relief. It would offer a premium to notoriety, a premium for which I can find no legal or social justification, particularly since such persons are most likely to advert to the matter and to contract out or insure against the harm.

The defendant's foresight with respect to the specific nature of the loss incurred by the plaintiff

The second factor put forward as founding proximity is that Norsk foresaw the specific nature of the loss incurred by CN. The argument based on the foreseeability of the specific nature of the loss would presumably found recovery for all three railroads, so it sits rather awkwardly with CN's unique relationship claim. It is also clearly insufficient to function on its own as a limit on indeterminate damages, since even if there were thousands of users of the bridge, the specific nature of the losses incurred would be foreseeable for all users. In practically all cases of this type, the defendant will be aware that the "specific nature of the loss" will be the loss of use of the property he or she has damaged.

Additionally, the tortfeasor does not actually know the specific nature of the loss, since the allocation of the loss will depend primarily on the terms of the contract between the plaintiff and the property owner as well as on other contracts between the plaintiff and the other parties. It is certain that Norsk knew that CN's use of the bridge would be interrupted. What is less clear and in fact quite doubtful is whether Norsk knew about the allocation of risk of bridge failure in the contract between CN and PWC.

It is thus incorrect to say that, because Norsk knew that CN's use of the bridge would be interrupted, it knew the "precise nature of the loss" CN would incur. The precise nature of the loss, and in fact whether any loss is incurred at all, would be a result of the contractual allocation of risk, of which Norsk would normally be unaware. In many cases of contractual relational loss, the variety of contractual entitlements will be much greater and more complex.

Physical propinquity

The third factor that is said to found proximity is the physical proximity of CN's property to the accident. CN's property is closely joined to the bridge on both sides of the river and the bridge forms an integral part of its railway network. CN relies here primarily on the judgment of Jacobs J in Caltex. Jacobs J there recognised that where the plaintiff's loss arises solely from a contractual relationship with a third party, recovery will be denied (at p. 279). However, he held, at p. 279, that if the damage arose owing to "physical effect on the person or property of the plaintiff, it will not be irrecoverable simply because it is economic loss". The judge, at p. 278, defined physical effect short of physical injury as an act or omission that prevents physical movement of a person or physical movement or operation of property. In that case, the physical effect was the immobilisation of the flow of crude oil through the pipeline.

CN does not, in my view, meet this physical effect test, even if such a test were adopted. Its trains have certainly not been immobilised. Its land has not been damaged and it makes no sense to speak of its being immobilized. In the absence of such a "physical effect", physical propinquity of property cannot constitute an alternative potential interest. As the appellants rightly point out, the other railways suffered identical damages despite not owning any property in physical propinquity to the accident.

The application of this test would also lead to minimal damages even if it were met. Jacobs J describes the damages that flow from his test as being limited to those resulting from the physical effect. In the Caltex case, the quantification of the damage was conceded. No inquiry was required as to whether all the crude oil for which alternative arrangement had to be made was “at the time of the incident already in physical propinquity to the place of the incident”. In the case at bar, however, damages under this test would presumably be recoverable only as regards those trains that were in “physical propinquity” to the bridge when the barge hit the bridge. How close they would have to be is a matter for speculation.

My colleague McLachlin J has adopted a geographic proximity factor as one element of her proximity analysis. With respect, I am unable to discern any policy significance in the fact that a particular plaintiff owns property in proximity to an accident.

Proximity

The fourth approach taken by the respondent is more general and involves deciding economic loss cases on the basis of proximity. To this end it puts forward not only the three above-mentioned factors regarding its relationship with Norsk but also the aspects of its relationship with PWC which I examined, i.e., the alleged common adventure and the transferred loss. In fact, it provides the Court with a lengthy list of factors which, it alleges, create the necessary proximity in this case.

Stephen J in Caltex adopted this approach. My colleague McLachlin J also relies on this approach. I agree with Stevenson J that the concept of proximity is incapable of providing a principled basis for drawing the line on the issue of liability for the reasons expressed by him (at p. 1178). As he notes, it expresses a result, rather than a principle.

The argument from morality

...

CN's argument

CN, of course, concedes that a line must be drawn and that not all losses can be compensated. It suggests, however, that the line be situated somewhere on the other side of its recovery. It suggests that although its own and at least some other contractually based claims should be allowed, the Court should re-erect a bright line barrier excluding all plaintiffs who are not contractually linked with the property owner victim. In particular, co-contractors of CN, whatever the circumstances with respect to foreseeability and other traditional tort doctrines, “clearly cannot recover” owing to the lack of a direct contractual relationship with PWC. It is unclear to me why drawing a new bright line around potential claimants in this manner is a significantly better solution.

Part IV: A Refined Proximity Analysis in Contractual Relational Economic Loss Cases

The crucial problem with the various formulations of the proximity test examined so far is that they look at the problem strictly from the perspective of the defendant. The defendant's negligence places it in a position of liability vis-à-vis the entire world. However, if it can show that its liability would be indeterminate, it can be excused. In my opinion, given the eminently pragmatic and policy basis of decisions about liability in this area, the situation of both the defendant and the plaintiff needs to be examined in cases of this kind. In particular, the plaintiff's ability to foresee and provide for the particular damage in question is a key factor in the proximity analysis.

The legitimacy of this type of consideration

In my view, it is legitimate to consider which party is the better loss bearer in this type of case. This term requires definition. Determining which party is best able to bear the loss essentially involves asking which party is in a better position to predict the frequency and severity of CN's economic loss when bridges are damaged, and to plan accordingly. Analysis of loss bearing ability emphasizes how the parties deal with accidents that tort law has not succeeded in preventing, rather than with preventing accidents.

The question of which party is best able to bear the loss should be distinguished from the question of which party is best able to avoid the accident's occurring. Analysis of the issues pertaining to deterrence, or accident avoidance, involves the question of the relative ability of parties to act in a way that will reduce the risk of occurrence of the type of accident in question and is widely recognized as relevant in tort law. In my view, analysis of loss bearing ability is particularly relevant in determining whether proximity exists in the context of contractual relational economic loss cases.

Tort law has not generally given much consideration to analysis of loss bearing ability. This type of approach is obviously ill-suited to personal injury cases. In property damage cases involving the primary liability of the tortfeasor, the courts have often rightly been more concerned to ensure deterrence by placing liability on the party best able to avoid the accident's occurring. Under modern conditions, deterrence may, of course, be difficult to effect through tort law; nonetheless, placing liability on the injurer serves to internalise the costs of accidents legitimately to the accident-causing activity. In many cases, loss shifting to the better loss bearer runs squarely into the powerful objection that it is not also the better risk avoider. When the case involves the question whether that party will be held liable at all, the concern for deterrence overrides the concern about loss-bearing ability. Thus, in cases involving primary liability for accidents, tort law has given priority to preventing accidents by requiring those who cause accidents to pay for their damage or more likely to pay for insurance.

Consideration of loss bearing ability is by no means entirely absent from the cases, however, and it has been increasingly recognized in recent cases. In Leigh and Silavan Ltd. v. Aliakmon Shipping Co., supra, at p. 819, Lord Brandon relied on the fact that the plaintiff had open to it an adequate avenue of protection in contract in refusing liability. A recent article by Stapleton, supra, at pp. 270–1, has suggested a formulation that seems to me to encapsulate this aspect of that case and may well be of more general application, as the author suggests, in cases of economic loss. She writes:

The power of this neglected argument [that the plaintiff had available to it an adequate avenue of protection] is that it does not depend on a circular proposition about where “principle” or precedent has in the past drawn the tort boundary. It is an argument explaining where that boundary should, on clear and stated principle, be placed. In our agenda of considerations, then, about where a tort duty in respect of economic loss should be recognised, we could place alongside the necessary (but not sufficient) condition of the absence or controllability of floodgates problems, a second requirement: the necessary but not sufficient condition that the plaintiff did not have, nor could reasonably be expected to have acquired, protection against the risk of economic loss.

In Smith v. Bush, [1990] 1 AC 831 (HL), the House of Lords, in allowing recovery in a case where a purchaser acquired defective property in reliance on the competence of a professional adviser, considered whether the plaintiff could have protected herself by contract. Prompted by the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977, 1977 (UK), c. 50, the House expressly acknowledged the difficulty purchasers of small houses have in affording a second survey. The issue of indeterminacy became by the same token of lesser concern, since the ambit of liability was confined to a relevant vulnerable sub-set of property acquirers—those buying modest dwellings: see Stapleton, supra, at pp. 278–79. Moreover, as I noted in reference to comparative law, in those systems that in theory allow recovery for relational economic loss, recovery has apparently been denied in some cases where the plaintiff had adequate means of protecting itself.

Increasingly, our courts have openly addressed the issue of insurance as one of these policy concerns. In Lamb v. Camden London Borough Council, [1981] QB 625 (CA), at pp. 637–38, Lord Denning MR wrote as follows:

On broader grounds of policy, I would add this: the criminal acts here—malicious damage and theft—are usually covered by insurance. By this means the risk of loss is spread throughout the community.

It does not fall too heavily on one pair of shoulders alone. The insurers take the premium to cover just this sort of risk and should not be allowed, by subrogation, to pass it on to others. . . . It is commonplace nowadays for the courts, when considering policy, to take insurance into account. It played a prominent part in Photo Production Ltd. v. Securicor Transport Ltd. [1980] AC 827. The House of Lords clearly thought that the risk of fire should be borne by the fire insurers who had received the full premium for fire risk—and not by Securicor’s insurers, who had only received a tiny premium. That, too, was a policy decision. . . .

So here, it seems to me that if Mrs Lamb was insured against damage to the house and theft, the insurers should pay the loss. If she was not insured, that is her misfortune.

See also Fleming, supra, at p. 202 and p. 224.

The judges in Caltex implicitly or explicitly deny the importance of insurance considerations in resolving the pragmatic question of where to draw the line in this type of case. Four of the five judgments did not consider insurance issues at all. Stephen J explicitly denies the court any role in this regard. In his view, the task of the courts remains that of fixing loss rather than spreading loss, and if this is to be altered it is a matter for direct legislative action rather than for the courts (at p. 265).

With respect, I do not agree with Stephen J that the consideration of insurance changes the task of the courts from loss fixing to loss spreading. Insurance considerations are merely one element in an analysis of where it is appropriate to fix the loss, in a case where a solution is necessarily pragmatic. Many of the extensions of tort liability that have occurred over the last 50 years would have been inconceivable in the absence of insurance. Many cases have referred to insurance considerations to justify extending liability: see, for example, Laskin J. in Rivtow, supra, at p. 1221. To reject, as does Stephen J, the open consideration of insurance as “covert judicial action” is paradoxical, since what is proposed is to bring insurance considerations into the open rather than merely expressing conclusions in terms of proximity. Fleming notes that Stephen J’s concern that the new policy dimension may appear more germane to the legislative than to the judicial function, but responds, in my view accurately, that “the change in perspective is dictated by inescapable external developments, to ignore which would be deliberately short-sighted and self-defeating”: see Fleming, supra, at p. 11. I agree with my colleagues McLachlin J and Stevenson J that insurance deserves to be considered in cases of this kind; however, I disagree with them as to its relevance.

In the context of contractual relational economic loss, policy concerns with respect to which party can best bear the loss are particularly important for three reasons. First, policy concerns with respect to deterrence and cost internalisation are generally at least substantially met by the tortfeasor’s primary liability to the property owner. In cases where the property damage is inconsequential, it might make sense to impose additional liability on deterrence grounds; that is not the case here, however, and I expressly reserve that question.

Second, they can be raised since current law denies recovery; rather than pose the risk of a revolutionary result, the approach merely articulates another policy lying behind a well-established rule. In some areas of the law, an examination of relative loss bearing ability might lead to arguments for fundamental changes in the law, changes best left to Parliament. Here, however, such considerations simply serve to establish a new rationale, or perhaps more accurately, to articulate explicitly an underlying rationale for a long-standing rule in an area of the law where the importance of policy considerations is now clearly recognised. As the law of torts has evolved, the courts have not been averse to modifying their mode of analysis of cases and have not waited for the legislature to do so. One imagines with difficulty a statute henceforth requiring the courts to take such considerations into account.

Finally, in this field the crucial problem remains that of limiting liability. All recognise that recovery of this type of claim must remain exceptional, if only because the potential number of claims of this type is practically unlimited. In these circumstances, a significantly higher threshold for recovery is, in my view, entirely justified. In other areas of tort law, where the trend has been towards extending liability, placing an onus on the plaintiff is inconceivable. In this area, however, there is an overriding need for strict controls on potential liability.

In my view, it is legitimate for these reasons to consider explicitly the ability of the plaintiff to bear the risk of loss in this type of case.

Turning then to an application of these criteria to this case, a determination of which party is the better loss bearer is relatively straightforward. CN is undoubtedly in a better position to bear the loss than Norsk. First, in light of the significant information available regarding bridge failure and CN's long use of the bridge, CN was probably at least equally competent in terms of estimating the potential risks of bridge failure. This aspect seems to me to be clear in light of the facts.

Second, CN would clearly be in a better position than PWC to estimate the potential costs of bridge failure to CN's operations. CN knows exactly how much use it gets out of the various bridges crossed by its trains. It also knows what the alternatives are in cases of bridge failure. Norsk, of course, is very poorly placed to estimate the value of the use that various people and companies get out of the bridges that cross the rivers its tugs sail on. It is also poorly placed to estimate the potential costs to those users of an interruption in bridge service. Unlike the first factor, which depends to a large degree on the facts of each case, this factor tends to weigh heavily in favour of the defendant in almost every case of this type.

Third, CN was better placed to protect itself from the consequences of those losses. This point requires further discussion. It is hard to imagine a more sophisticated group of plaintiffs than the users of railway bridges. These parties have access to the full range of protective options: first party commercial insurance or self-insurance, contracts both with the bridge owner and with the railway's customers.

Insurance

My colleague McLachlin J rejects the idea that insurance considerations justify a denial of liability and relies on an article by Bishop: see Bishop, "Economic Loss in Tort" (1982), 2 Oxf. J. Legal Studies 1. Bishop argues that the insurance argument must overcome two difficulties in the context of economic loss. First, he states that to eliminate recovery for economic loss would reduce the incentive to take care. With respect, I do not find this argument persuasive in the context of relational economic loss cases, since the primary liability of the tortfeasor to the owner of the bridge is largely sufficient to create incentives to take care. This, as I noted earlier, is one of the key distinguishing features that justifies separate treatment of relational economic loss cases.

Bishop's second argument is that insurance is unavailable at reasonable cost. He argues in particular that insurance for loss of profits is not available. Insurance companies understandably refuse to insure profitability. However, that is not the issue here. CN is not claiming for loss of profit, but rather for the costs occasioned by the interruption of its access to the bridge. That risk is analogous to a business interruption. Many businesses have interruption insurance covering interruption caused by factors other than breach of contract: see Waddams, The Law of Damages (2nd edn. 1991), at § 14.330. Even if insurance is not available in the commercial market, CN is ideally situated to self-insure.

Undoubtedly in certain cases, an affected business will not have purchased insurance. However, as James has noted, if the business community accepts a rule of non-liability for indirect economic losses without securing insurance protection against them by a relatively inexpensive method, then this fact at least suggests that these losses do not present a social problem serious enough to justify the cost to society in providing for their compensation by the most expensive method in its arsenal—liability based on fault: see James, supra, at p. 114. In other words, if the business community is insured, then there is no point in shifting the loss from one insurance company to another at high cost. If the business community is not insured, then that reveals that other ways of defraying such losses are perceived as superior to insurance and the problem is not that serious.

Conclusions about the insurance market are of course somewhat tentative and it would behoove lawyers, as Atiyah notes, to inform themselves about fundamental matters of insurability in new tort cases and to see to it that courts are also informed: see Atiyah, "Note: Economic Loss in the United States" (1985), 5 Oxf. J. Legal Studies 485. However, the weight of opinion is certainly to the effect that first-party insurance is a cheaper and more effective method of protecting against loss than liability insurance, particularly where the liability is of uncertain amount; see Photo Production Ltd. v. Securicor Transport Ltd., [1980] AC 827, at p. 851; Smillie, "Negligence and Economic Loss" (1982), 32 UTJ 231, at pp. 240–2; James, supra, at pp. 113–16. In my opinion, the burden of showing otherwise must rest on those who would have the court overturn a long-standing rule excluding recovery.

Contract

I agree with McLachlin J that in many cases the contractual allocation of risk does not supply a rationale for refusing recovery. Inequality of bargaining power is in fact only one of a number of reasons why contract may not be a real alternative in a given case. In many cases, protecting oneself from economic losses through contract is not possible. In the cases involving interruptions in services provided by utilities, the service is often supplied by a monopoly supplier on standard form contracts. Any shifting of the risk from consumer to utility company may even be statutorily excluded. Such cases involve contracts in name only. Or again, the risk which materializes may be so unusual that the parties never contemplated it. Though there may be other reasons for denying liability, in all of these cases the argument from the contractual allocation of risk is not convincing.

In this case, however, it is. The facts in this case establish that all parties were well aware of the risk of bridge failure. CN knew what it was doing. The very bridge at issue here had been damaged on a number of previous occasions, and various studies of the problem had been carried out. CN participated actively in at least one of these studies. CN was even aware of the traditional legal rule; as I noted, it brought a very similar claim for bridge failure in similar circumstances in 1973 for which recovery was denied.

In my view, a denial of recovery in this case is justified in light of CN's overwhelmingly superior risk bearing capacity on the facts of this case.

Before leaving the issue of CN's ability to protect itself, it should be noted that the rule proposed by my colleagues will still require parties such as CN to protect themselves since they will never know before the particular accident whether they will be part of the determinate class. It is to say the least difficult to predict whether a particular railway bridge will be knocked out by someone who knows you by name. Alternatively, it is difficult to know whether of the many possible bridges that will be damaged, the one that will be damaged is the one next to which you own property. As a result, the only solution for the prudent railway will be to purchase insurance. Presumably, the cost of this insurance will reflect the value the insurance company places on the possibility of its recovering from the tortfeasor.

The critical effect of allowing recovery is that it would ALSO require defendants in Norsk's position to insure for potential contractual relational economic loss as well, since they will obviously never know beforehand whether the bridges damaged by its tugs will be used by plaintiffs whose name it knows or who have property nearby. The principal beneficiaries of the rule proposed by my colleagues would be insurance companies, who would benefit from the existence of a new and highly uncertain risk against which companies likely to inflict property damage would need to insure.

The rules suggested by my colleagues thus will require that both parties insure at considerable additional social cost. The only gain will be a slight reduction in the plaintiff's first party insurance costs to take into account the possibility that the insurance company will recover from a tortfeasor under the new doctrine.

A further practical difficulty should be noted. In cases where the tortfeasor is either not insured or insufficiently insured with respect to the initial property damage or personal injury claim or the relational claim or both, serious problems will arise with respect to the primacy of one type of claim over another. For example, if the tortfeasor is liable for both a $500,000 personal injury claim and $500,000 in relational claims but his total assets and insurance only cover half of that amount, the actual compensation of the personal injury claim will presumably be halved in order to allow recovery for a relational claim which as noted will often involve recovery for a subrogated insurance company: see Feldthusen, Economic Negligence, supra, at p. 207.

Conclusion

It is unclear to me why the current state of the law on contractual relational economic loss, which channels claims to the property owner, is unsatisfactory at least in the commercial area involving sophisticated parties. It is also unclear whether significant amounts of court time should be expended in distinguishing between contractual relational economic loss sufferers—those who are proximate to the tortfeasor and those who are not.

There is no question that the outcome of cases of this nature under the exclusionary rule depends upon the terms of the contract. This operates in two ways: the contract may create a possessory interest or a joint venture or it may provide for an indemnity from the property owner. The question to be resolved is whether allowing the contract to determine whether the plaintiff has the requisite interest and where the loss falls is more arbitrary, unfair or unworkable than the various tests referred to above.

The arguments against recovery in this case can be summed up as follows. First, the arguments for recovery are weak. It is not necessary to impose liability to ensure that tortfeasors like Norsk are dissuaded from damaging bridges. The increase in deterrence that would result from imposing the additional liability called for in this case would not likely have much impact on the behaviour of potential tortfeasors. The only purpose served by recovery in this case to which the judgment of McLachlin J refers, at pp. 1162–63, is “the purpose of permitting a plaintiff whose position for practical purposes, vis-à-vis the tortfeasor, is indistinguishable from that of the owner of the damaged property, to recover what the actual owner could have recovered”. In my view, the argument that CN is indistinguishable from the owner founders on the fact that CN does not qualify under the well-established cases in which the law provides for recovery by the contracting party where it in fact has a proprietary or possessory interest. CN’s interest is merely contractual.

CN argues that restricting recovery to the owner or person in possession is based on pragmatism not logic, and therefore to require logical support for an exception to a pragmatic rule which in a particular case results in an injustice, is in itself illogical. In my view, cases such as Rivtow and Kamloops which have allowed recovery for pure economic loss have established criteria that do provide logical support for an exception to a pragmatic rule.

The argument that Norsk was at fault and CN was innocent and that fault should justify recovery is also unconvincing here. Fault alone cannot justify recovery in this area since some admittedly injured claimants will have their claims denied. Since the whole exercise in this kind of situation involves drawing a line amongst those who are undeniably injured by the tortfeasor who was undeniably at fault, appeals to fault beg the question. The defendants were equally at fault with respect to other claims that will be denied. CN is unable to show any special damage different in kind from that suffered by the other potential contractual claimants. None of the factual distinctions the company puts forward has any relevance with respect to the defendants’ fault.

The second group of reasons focus on the weaknesses of the proposed rules that would allow recovery. The tests that would allow recovery do not meet the criteria that a rule should have in this area. The concept of a “special relationship” is not applicable to cases involving accidents. None of the facts put forward by CN as indicative of its special relationship has any other policy significance than to attempt to meet, after the fact, the problem of indeterminate liability. The individual plaintiff test would presumably preclude recovery by the other railways that suffered losses identical in nature to those suffered by CN. If the test were extended to cover a foreseeable class of plaintiffs such as users of the railway bridge, it would simply restate the general requirement that the plaintiff be foreseeable and recovery would be allowed whether the users of the bridge were four or four thousand. The proximity test has practically no predictive value; it remains impossible to say whether that test would lead to recovery for the other railways in this case, let alone its application in other cases.

Finally, there are the reasons supporting the exclusionary rule. These are, of course, essentially pragmatic, as has been recognised in cases of this type from the very beginning. First, denial of recovery places incentives on all parties to act in ways that will minimise overall losses, a legitimate and desirable goal for tort law in this area. Second, denial of recovery allows for only one party carrying insurance rather than both parties. Third, it will result in a great saving of judicial resources for cases in which more pressing concerns are put forward. The difficult job of drawing the line is at least done quickly without a great deal of factual investigation into the various factors that found proximity. The right to recover can be most often determined from the face of the contract. Fourth, it also eliminates difficult problems of sharing an impecunious defendant's limited resources between relational claims and direct claims. Fifth, the traditional rule is certain, and although like any pragmatic solution, borderline cases may cause problems, the exceptions to the rule in cases of joint ventures, general average contributions, and possessory and proprietary interests are reasonably well defined and circumscribed. This case, in my view, does not even constitute a borderline case in this respect, since CN has no property interest of any kind. The consequence of that certainty is that contracting parties can be certain of where the loss with respect to the unavailability of property will lie in the absence of any contractual arrangement.

I add one final consideration. This case is one of maritime law, which in large measure encompasses a global system. The bright line exclusionary rule against recovery has for nearly a century been in effect in that system, and continues to be followed by the major trading nations, in particular Great Britain and the United States. In making arrangements for allocating risks in essentially maritime matters, those engaged in navigating and shipping should, as much as possible, be governed by a uniform rule, so that they can plan their affairs ahead of time, whether by contract or insurance against possible contingencies.

In my view, to justify recovery in cases of this nature, the plaintiff would, at the very least, have to respond effectively not only to the concern about indeterminacy but also show that no adequate alternative means of protection was available. Other concerns may also need to be met. At the very least, the requirement that the plaintiff not have had any commercially reasonable method of protecting itself is an important addition to what remains a conceptually difficult ex post facto inquiry into the "determinate nature" of the particular victim and damage from the perspective of the defendant.

The question of whether recovery should be allowed in the residual cases in which these two barriers are overcome does not require an answer in the context of this case. Individuals and small businesses may be incapable of effectively protecting themselves in any meaningful fashion. In some cases, of course, contractual relational economic loss may occur in a different form such as loss of salary and the failure to protect against it by first-party insurance cannot be said to lead to an inference of social unimportance. In such cases, however, the indeterminacy problem is often very acute. If the number of potential individual plaintiffs is great, recovery will be denied on the grounds of "indeterminacy", even though the plaintiffs may not have had any real ability to protect themselves. Where the plaintiff passes the indeterminacy tests, it will often be sophisticated. The argument that recovery should be denied to those who could have protected themselves does not support a bright line in and of itself. Rather, it complements the indeterminacy analysis. It suggests that those who are most likely to emerge from the indeterminacy analysis are those with the ability to protect themselves and questions the advisability of a rule with the effect of allowing recovery to only that group of contractual claimants, rather than denying recovery to all.

The exclusionary rule is not in itself attractive. It excludes recovery by people who have undeniably suffered losses as a result of an accident. It also leads to some arbitrary but generally predictable results in cases at the margin. The results with respect to time charters may be "capricious", but time charterers know their rights and obligations from the start and can act accordingly. The rule only becomes defensible when it is realised that full recovery is impossible, that recovery is in fact going to be refused in the vast majority of such claims regardless of the rule we adopt, and when the exclusionary rule is compared to the alternatives. In my view, it should not be disturbed on the facts of this case.

I should add a few words about McLachlin J's suggestion that the essential difference between her approach and mine lies in the flexibility allowed by her approach. She characterises my approach as providing for recovery depending exclusively on the terms of the formal contract between the plaintiff and the property owner. She considers an approach based on the terms of the contract involves a "rigid categorisation which denies the possibility of recovery in new cases which may not meet the categorical test" (at p. 1164), a problem that is avoided under the proximity test she sets forth.

I do not see the essential difference between our two approaches as that between certainty and flexibility. In my view, the key difference is between a principled flexibility, which adheres to a general rule in the absence of policy reasons for excluding its application, and arbitrariness. Among the policy factors considered in the course of this opinion that might justify relaxing the rule are the ability of the plaintiff to protect itself and the quantum of property damage caused by the tortfeasor with its attendant impact on the issue of deterrence. I have not found it necessary to consider the precise role of these factors in this case since CN was clearly able to protect itself and the property damage sustained was sufficient to afford deterrence. Whether such factors would in fact provide workable criteria sufficient to provide for recovery despite the strong arguments in favour of the long-standing exclusionary rule, based on certainty and other factors, is an open question. What I have decided is that in the absence of all of these factors, there is no reason to disturb the rule.

Thus I do not say that the right to recovery in all cases of contractual relational economic loss depends exclusively on the terms of the contract. Rather, I note that such is the tenor of the exclusionary rule and that departures from that rule should be justified on defensible policy grounds. The Court should do more than simply establish a rule that allows judges to resolve cases as they see fit. That, as I see it, is the effect of the approach proposed by my colleague.

Disposition

I would allow the appeal and dismiss the claim for damages.

Notes to Norsk

1. One must again warn the reader that the extracts reproduced above only convey part of the picture and that the strengths and weaknesses of this decision will only become fully apparent when all three of its judgments are carefully read.

2. Omitted from the extracts are the sections on the current state of Canadian law; but they, too, should be read by anyone who wishes to see how Canadian law has departed from the English "model" and adopted a less hostile view towards pure economic loss. The divergences between major Common law jurisdictions (Australia, Canada, New Zealand and, of course, the United States) must also be noted. Also noteworthy is the fact that English, Canadian, Australian and New Zealand courts refer to each others decisions and to American decisions. Nowadays, however, it is rare to find American courts referring to English or Commonwealth decisions. Is this due to over-work? Too much "local" material? Growing "local" confidence (or arrogance) which encourages the belief that they have "nothing to learn" from other (closely related) systems? All three? Is this "divergence" a healthy phenomenon? Or are there areas of the law where it should be avoided?

4. The "swing" judgment in this case was delivered by Stevenson J yet, strangely, it is the least effective of them all. For, first, his decision is, essentially, a variation of the views of Gibbs and Mason JJ in Caltex Oil (Aust.) Pty v. The Dredge Willemstad (1976) 136 C.L.R. 529. (The plaintiff should recover because the defendant knew or ought to have known that a "specific individual . . . as opposed to a general or unascertained class of the public" was likely in this instance to suffer the foreseeable kind of loss.) This approach has never met with much approval; and it seems to place too great a premium on “notoriety”. (For more criticisms see: pp. 1107–1112.) The second drawback of Stevenson J’s judgment is that it weakened the overall result of the case by expressly disapproving of McLachlin J’s proximity test (p. 1178). Thus, the most disturbing aspect of the case as a whole is that it has not left us with a clear ratio decidendi. For the proximity test advocated by the majority is espoused only by three justices out of seven; and if one looks at the case purely from a Common law point of view (and thus removed from the majority camp the Quebec judge), one is left with only two justices out of six advocating proximity as the appropriate controlling device. Those who like “bright line rules” will, no doubt, stress this point as Norsk’s major defect.

5. Notwithstanding the force of the above-mentioned objection one must also stress the many areas where majority and minority found common ground. Thus both agreed that the “more flexible approach set out in Anns” was preferable to the Murphy reasoning, which was expressly stated as not representing the law in Canada (pp. 1054, 1163). In the words of La Forest J, who delivered the minority judgment; “I fully support this court’s rejection of the broad bar on recovery of pure economic loss . . .” (p. 1054). The dispute thus centred around what was termed “relational economic loss”, i.e. economic loss suffered by the plaintiff as a result of property damage caused to a third party. Secondly, all agreed that “the law of tort does not permit recovery for all economic loss” (p. 1163). Thirdly, there was full agreement that cases like Norsk required a discussion of the underlying economic and wider policy considerations. Fourthly, all three judgments accepted Stevenson J’s view that “the case at bar is a good example of how useful comparative law can be” (p. 1174). Finally, both majority and minority came within a whisker of bringing the case within the ambit of the rule in Morrison Steamship Co. Ltd v. Greystoke Castle (Cargo Owners) [1947] AC 265, long recognised as one of the allowable “exceptions” to the non-liability rule. Where they disagreed was in “the test for determining joint venture.”

6. The case is a shining example of comparative law “in practice” since the judgments quote 32 academic writers (covering seven countries) and 62 decisions (from five different, international, jurisdictions). La Forest J’s use of the rich material led him to conclude that (a) even the most liberal foreign systems (i.e. the Romanistic group) are “acutely aware of the potential for unlimited liability”; (b) they avoid it by establishing “a de facto [if not de iure] bar” to recovery; (c) they do this through a rich variety of “causal” devices, and (d) that the civilian experience could be taken to support the view (promoted by the majority) that “recovery for contractual relational economic loss [could] remain exceptional even if the exclusionary rule [were] relaxed” (p. 1985). This is an important concession since it shows that the “floodgates” argument, currently in vogue with the House of Lords, is not empirically substantiated.

7. For a number of commentators Norsk scores heavily (both in methodology and content) over its British contemporary “leading” judgment—Murphy. On this see, Fleming, “Economic Loss in Canada” (1993) Tort L. Rev. 68–74; Markesinis, “Compensation for Negligently Inflicted Pure Economic Loss: Some Canadian Views” (1993) 109 LQR 5–12, and decide which of the two judgments—the English or the Canadian: (a) provides you with a better introduction to the problem of economic loss; (b) comes up with the most satisfactory answer. Consider also the potential impact that research assistants (Clerks) may have in the style and thoroughness of a judgment.

7. ECONOMIC LOSS (NEGLIGENT STATEMENTS)

Case 19

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 12 FEBRUARY 1979

WM 1979, 548 = NJW 1979, 1595

The plaintiff claims damages from the defendants, an international bank, for loss suffered as a result of inaccurate information supplied to her by their German branch (and concerning the creditworthiness of a third party).

Towards the end of 1970 the plaintiff was looking for a profitable way to invest some DM 130,000 and a finance broker, L, recommended the hotel P, built by U and opened to the public a few months earlier. U had financed his hotel by a number of loans including one for 2.5 million DM raised from the defendants and secured by a land charge. U, requiring a further 3.5 million DM, decided to raise this from private individuals with the help of advertisements and brokers offering 12 per cent interest on all loans as well as a land charge for security. More precisely, he registered a land charge for 3.5 million DM in favour of the defendants which was divided into smaller parts each securing sums of DM 10,000 and DM 25,000. The defendants, in consideration for the usual fee, were willing to assign these "part land charges" to lenders and place the funds in a blocked account for U until the completion of all formalities. On 3 February L, the broker, gave the plaintiff the following information which was written on the defendants' paper but gave neither date nor address: "Hotel P, George U. This is a newly built luxury hotel, with some 440 beds and conforming with international standards, was officially opened in June 1970 in the presence of many dignitaries. So far as we know it has already entered into long-term arrangements with a number of international travel agencies. It is owned by U, whom we know as a client and as a competent business man. U also owns a hotel in Tenerife and two sanatoria run by reputable persons. Owing to a great increase in building costs, U needs a further 3.5 million DM which is to be found on the open market. Any money advanced for this purpose will be credited to a blocked account with our bank, and after the notary has confirmed that the terms of the contract have been complied with, it will be credited to the hotel's current account. We ourselves have in the past made substantial payments to U against security but, due to an increase in building costs, U's liquidity is, at present, tight."

On 17 February, 1971 the plaintiff paid DM 130,000 which the defendants immediately credited to U's account. Three days earlier the defendants had asked U to repay their loans by 23 February and on 16 March they extended the repayment date to the end of May 1971. Meanwhile U was getting deeper and deeper into financial difficulties and on 23 December he applied for a composition with his creditors. Four months later bankruptcy proceedings followed. Both plaintiff and defendant withdrew from the auction of the hotel and the plaintiff will receive nothing from the bankrupt's estate.

The plaintiff brought an action claiming DM 65,000 since legal aid was granted to her only for this amount due to her contributory negligence. She argues that her loss is due to the defendant's letter which gave information which they knew to be false. The defendants deny that the information was wrong and also deny liability on the grounds that they had not entered into any contract to supply her with information.

The Court of First Instance awarded the plaintiff DM 32,500, and ruled that she should bear the rest of the loss herself because of her contributory negligence. The defendants' appeal was rejected and their further appeal on points of law is also dismissed.

Reasons

I. The Court of Appeal accepted that the defendant is liable according to the law of contract. Their appeal on points of law fails.

1. The Court of Appeal found that the defendants knowingly and deliberately composed the notice (quoted above) and put it into circulation with the view to its being shown to potential private lenders to U.

(a) The Court of Appeal (also) found that the information it contained was both in form and content intended to reach a circle of private potential investors. Stripped to its essential the notice gives information which is intended to appeal to private individuals. This is true both of the description of U and of his other businesses. For instance, the reference to the official opening of the hotel in the presence of local dignitaries could only have aimed at making his business appear reliable in the eyes of private persons. Much of this material would clearly have been written in a different way if the document had been intended to be used solely for internal banking purposes. Its contents make sense only if they are seen as aiming from the outset to attract private prospective investors. And this is corroborated by the statement in the notice that the money lent would be transferred from the blocked account with the defendants to the hotel's account only after a notary had confirmed that the terms of the contract had been complied with. This method of concluding a contract is less important to a bank than the encumbrances which are not mentioned in the notice. But it is calculated to dispel doubts that may arise in the mind of an individual, inexperienced in money matters, reading the preceding passages which explain why the extra sums are required. The outward appearance of the notice also speaks in favour of this interpretation. Thus, it bears the business name and the description of the defendant but gives no indication of the person addressed, or the date or any other details that usually accompany letter writing.

This interpretation is not only possible, but, indeed, necessary, the more so when one realises that the defendants, who were asked to handle the loan, were aware that only private individuals would be considered as lenders. The appeal is thus not able to reveal any error of law committed by the Court of Appeal when characterising the sense and purpose of the notice.

The argument that the Court of Appeal failed to take into account the fact that the defendants gave this kind of information in response to enquiries made by banks is also unsuccessful for if this is taken to imply that the defendants supplied information to banks only, it runs clearly counter to the defendants' submissions before the lower court. There the defendants maintained that information concerning U was given only to individuals making specific enquiries . . . On the appellate level, therefore, one must assume that the defendants gave information not only but also to banks. This does not necessarily run counter to the Court of Appeal's interpretation. Since only private individuals would be considered as lenders, the banks must have enquired on their behalf and thus the information so acquired must have been destined only for their clients and not for themselves.

(b) Once it is accepted, as it must be, that the information supplied by the defendants was meant for potential investors, one must then also accept the further finding of the Court of Appeal, namely that the defendants circulated this information so that it would be presented to a group of prospective investors. The assumption that the defendants intended to give the information to individual enquirers only, and had not agreed to its being passed on to other interested parties, is inconsistent with the purpose of preparing the information, namely to appeal to a group of individuals who might be interested in becoming lenders. Given that the defendants were themselves substantial creditors of U, and were anxious to relieve him of his financial difficulties, their intention was to bring the information to the notice of as many prospective lenders as possible. The assertion that the defendant supplied information concerning U only to individual enquirers does not rule out the possibility that the bank, in conformity with its purpose, approved of the information being passed on to other lenders. In any event, the defendants have failed to adduce any evidence to show that their notice had been brought to the attention of only a small group of individuals. The Court of Appeal was thus free to look at the objective contents of the notice.

2. The Court of Appeal was also not in error in finding that the defendants were fully aware that their information would be of great importance to the recipients and would be used as a basis of important investments. Since its prime purpose was to help attract finance for the hotel P, it is obvious that it was intended to help prospective investors to decide whether to lend money to U to the extent of at least DM 10,000 and was designed with that purpose in mind . . .

3. The Court of Appeal considered the information given to have been false in so far as it concealed facts which ought to have been disclosed. Thus, the reference to U's other properties created the impression that they also were available as additional security even though in actual fact they were already encumbered up to the hilt. The reference to the defendants' own substantial secured loans to U was also false since they had already called for their repayment at the time when the information (in the notice) reached the plaintiff . . . The inaccuracy of the notice is evident from a number of other undisputed facts such as, for example, the concealment of the various charges on the sanatoria properties. To a lender such information is particularly important when making up his mind as to whether to make a loan or not . . . Contrary to the view advanced in this appeal, it must be said that it is customary to mention all substantial charges when information is given about land by a bank. According to the findings of the Court of Appeal, when the information was issued by the defendants, the entire hotel facilities as well as the sanatoria had not been paid for and U was no longer in a position to honour any bills drawn for them. These circumstances, which would normally point towards an extremely delicate economic situation, should have been made clear by the defendants at the time of issuing of their notice since they would have had great bearing on the decision of the lenders. The defendants did not argue that they were unaware of the above, indeed this would have been unlikely for a bank like theirs, whose function it is to grant credit to borrowers. Nor did the defendants fulfil their duties by stating in their notice that U was faced with liquidity problems since this would not normally indicate to a private individual that bills had already been protested. All these findings are sufficient to characterise the information as false.

II. All the factual elements necessary to impose contractual liability for negligent advice are thus satisfied. According to the cases where information is supplied by a bank a contractual or quasi-contractual relationship already exists between the bank and the enquiring party whenever the information supplied by the bank is of manifest significance to the inquiring party and it is clear that the latter will be relying on it in making substantial capital allocations (cf. decision of the Senate of 6 July 1970, WM 1970, 1021 . . .). The situation in this present case is just that. In this case the bank addresses itself to a quite clearly defined group of prospective lenders who are interested in advancing money for a specific project. The information is aimed at this group, which the defendants wish to attract, and which they know will use this information to make vital economic decisions. This being clearly the purpose of the information it can make little difference in law whether the seeker (of the information) directs himself to the bank or the bank to him. Given the purposes to be achieved by the information, the bank must realise that the persons likely to rely on it must understand it in the sense of a legally binding declaration (the distributor of the notice is a mere messenger). That is why in this case good faith causes a contractual relation to arise when a potential addressee has relied on it in making his decision. The appellant's argument, unsubstantiated by the facts of this case, that the information was only intended for banks, is immaterial since this does not preclude the fact that banks were then allowed to pass it on. The Court of Appeal is indeed wrong in treating this as a case of "information to whom it may concern". The Supreme Court has repeatedly insisted that it is, in principle, not possible to assume that a bank when giving information is willing to put itself under an obligation to an indeterminate and incalculable number of persons . . . However, this is not the case here for, though the information is directed to persons still unknown to the bank, those persons can be determined by virtue of their interest and form part of a calculable group of persons.

III.

1. Given that a contract to supply information was thus concluded by the parties, it became incumbent upon the defendants to supply objectively correct information. This the defendants negligently failed to do (§§ 276, and 278 BGB) since as bankers they knew, or ought to have known, that the facts they failed to mention in their notice were important for the lenders in order to reach their decision.

2. The appeal before this court also claims unsuccessfully that the Court of Appeal erred on the aspect of causation . . . Practical experience however shows that the plaintiff would not have made U a loan if the defendants had given her adverse information by disclosing to her U's actual financial status.

IV. The argument raised in this appeal, that the defendant's negligence is overshadowed by the plaintiff's contributory fault in so far as she accepted the advice of the finance broker L against the advice of her bank and her tax accountant, cannot affect the judgment currently under appeal. For the Court of Appeal, in its exercise of its judicial functions, concluded all legal and factual aspects of the case, and the appellants can point to no legal error prejudicial to them. Their argument that these facts should, from a point of view of law, be now differently appraised cannot thus be accepted.

Case 20

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SECOND CIVIL SENATE) 28 FEBRUARY 1977 BGHZ 69, 82 = NJW 1977, 1916

The plaintiff, in the course of current business transactions delivered limestone to the building firm GmbH, until the latter was declared bankrupt on 7 August 1973. GmbH had agreed in 1972 that the claims of the plaintiff arising from its sales should be settled by directly debiting its account, and had on 13 September 1972 given a revocable instruction to the defendant Volksbank, where it kept an account, to pay the creditor upon the receipt of its invoices and to debit its account with the defendant. It is disputed whether GmbH authorised the plaintiff in addition to collect its claims. During the period in issue here the plaintiff, who had no business relations with the defendant, lodged with the Bank für Gemeinwirtschaft, where it had a giro account, the following invoices to be collected by directly debiting the account of GmbH with the defendant: on 30 May 1973 for deliveries on 29 May amounting to DM 13,100.25; on 6 June for deliveries on 31 May amounting to DM 15,672.83; on 14 June for deliveries on 13 June amounting to DM 15,672.83; on 14 June for deliveries on 13 June amounting to DM 6016.88; on 20 June for deliveries on 19 June amounting to DM 12,835.18; and on 27 June for deliveries on 26 June amounting to DM 17,468.75. All these invoices carried the imprint: "The recipient of the payments holds an authorisation from the debtor to collect the amounts outstanding." When the invoices were received by the defendant the account of GmbH was overdrawn. Therefore the defendant did not credit the plaintiff. For reasons which form the object of a dispute between the parties, the invoices remained for the time being with the defendant and were only returned on 29 June 1973 to the Bank für Gemeinwirtschaft which had submitted them. According to the plaintiff he only got to know on 4 July 1973 that the invoices had not been paid, because on this day his account with the Bank für Gemeinwirtschaft had been debited again to the amount of the invoices previously credited to his account.

In the present proceedings the plaintiff claims damages in respect of losses suffered by him in that he continued to supply goods to GmbH on 13, 19, and 26 June 1973, to the value of DM 36,321.81 which remained unpaid. The plaintiff contends that if the defendant had returned the invoices immediately on 30 May 1973, the plaintiff would have known of the failure to pay by 8 June 1973 at the latest. He would then only have made the subsequent deliveries against pre-payment.

The Court of First Instance at Osnabrück and the Court of Appeal at Oldenburg rejected the claim. Upon a second appeal by the plaintiff the judgment below was quashed and the case referred back for the following.

Reasons

The plaintiff in setting out the facts has shown conclusively that he has suffered damage because the defendant bank kept the invoices submitted to it for direct debit until the end of the month without taking action. If, instead, it had returned the invoices immediately, the plaintiff would have known on 8 June 1973 at the latest that no further payments could be expected. The plaintiff would then not have made the deliveries which remained unpaid for. . . . The plaintiff in asking the defendant to compensate him for this loss is also established conclusively, contrary to the views expressed by the courts below; its basis is contractual.

1. The Court of Appeal has held correctly that the plaintiff was not entitled to claim any performance by the defendant which may lead to claims for damages. No direct contractual relations are created between the creditor and the debtor's bank as a result of direct debiting. Thus the situation is similar to that of giro proceedings. In the latter situation the fact that the transferor and the recipient of the transfer maintain giro accounts with different banks did not create a direct contractual relationship between the recipient and the bank of the transferor nor do the legal relationships between the transferor and his bank or between the individual banks constitute contracts in favour of the recipient of the transfer as a third party. The situation is no different in direct debit proceedings; they are a kind of "transfer in reverse". The recipient (creditor) is only contracting with his own bank. The debtor bank, which receives the invoices for payment, only acts upon instructions which the creditor bank (or another bank interposed by it) gives in its own name within the framework of giro activities between the banks concerned (again not in favour of the creditor). The debtor, on his part, either instructs his bank in writing to credit directly invoices submitted by a particular creditor (procedure of direct crediting); as in the case of instructions to transfer money it constitutes an instruction (general in these circumstances) in the meaning of §§ 665, 675 BGB within the contract of giro between himself and his bank, with which the creditor is not concerned. Alternatively the debtor authorizes the creditor in writing to collect the payments which are due by way of debiting his account with the debtor bank ("Procedure authorising Collection"). Thereby, too, the creditor does not obtain a claim against the debtor bank. The procedure of direct debiting serves mainly the interest of the creditor in settling his affairs and involves additional risks for the debtor; in the light of the interests involved no reason exists for assuming that the debtor wishes to grant to the creditor more rights than he would enjoy if the payments were made by bank transfer. Finally, the Agreement between the Principal Organisations of Credit Institutions concerning the Principle of Direct Debiting [references] only creates rights and duties between the credit institutions involved. Contractual claims by clients of banks for performance by the banks concerned are not to be derived from this Agreement according to Part IV no. 1 of the Agreement itself. Contrary to some other legal problems arising from the procedure of direct debiting this represents essentially the general opinion [references].

2. The plaintiff's claim for damages is, however, presented conclusively from the point of view that a protective duty has been violated. It is to be derived in favour of the creditor of the direct debit from the legal relationship arising between the banks involved in carrying out the procedure of direct debit.

Claims for damages arising from a violation of a protective duty can arise in general if a legal relationship between two parties is not sufficient to fulfil the requirements of § 328 BGB, but where the inclusion of certain third parties in its protective sphere is indicated according to good faith by the purpose of the contract and in view of the apparent effect upon them of the contractual performance. In order to avoid a flood of claims of this kind to an incalculable extent and to establish limits beyond which the protection of third parties is restricted to the law of tort, the practice of the courts has stated repeatedly that such an inclusion of third parties can normally be considered only if the internal relationship between the creditor and the debtor discloses aspects of a personal law character and shows that the creditor acts on behalf of a third party for whom he shares responsibility and to whom he owes a duty of care. In so far as characteristics of a personal law nature are thus required, the principles developed in the light of individual agreements as to what should apply according to good faith, are unnecessarily narrow where—as in the present case—bulk transactions of a certain type are in issue which follow a uniformly practised procedure provided on a general scale for legal transactions based upon the confidence that they will be settled properly and with due regard for the interests involved. In these circumstances the inclusion of third parties in the protective sphere of the contractual relations in issue may be possible and indicated according to good faith, if the mechanism entails for the third party who employs it certain risks inherent in it and if the participants charged with handling the mechanism can be called upon without further discussion to keep these risks down. Such is the case in so far as in direct debit proceedings the debtor bank must return invoices because the payments cannot be made in the absence of funds. According to the Agreement of the Banks concerning direct debits, invoices exceeding DM 1,000 not met by payment must be returned together with a notice of dishonour either on the same day to the first payor (the creditor's bank) or latest on the second working day by the reverse process of claiming payment from the first payor, accompanied by a notification by telegram, telephone, or telex (Part II no. 1 para. 2). This solution may have been adopted primarily in the interest of the creditor bank concerned. When the invoices are submitted to it, it credits the creditor's account with the amount to be debited (subject to a proviso) and normally allows the creditor to dispose of it. Therefore it runs the risk of losing that sum when the invoices are not honoured if the customer has disposed of the amount in the meantime and is no longer able to repay it. Consequently the creditor bank has an interest that the "critical" interval between crediting the amount and a possible failure to honour the invoices is kept short; the debtor bank should therefore immediately provide the necessary information by returning the dishonoured invoices or in some other way, on the strength of which the creditor can be debited again. The interest of the creditor is, however, involved to an even greater extent since he issued the instruction to collect the debt. Firstly, he will be interested quite generally, having regard to his business arrangements, not to be surprised by a re-debiting; instead he wishes to be informed in good time that the amount credited to him provisionally on the strength of the invoices is not at his disposal in reality. Secondly, if he employs the procedure of direct debiting for the purpose of collecting outstanding monies, he will normally be engaged in current business relations with the debtor. If these relations extend over a longer period he has a considerable interest which goes beyond collecting whatever amount may have fallen due, to receive early notice of any difficulties in the operation of these relations. The fact that invoices are not honoured is often an alarm signal that the debtor is in payment difficulties. If the creditor is not notified in time but remains ignorant because the invoices are not dealt with, he will continue the business relationship in good faith and will be prevented, to his detriment, from discontinuing them or from continuing them subject to the usual measures of security. While not sharing an identical interest, the creditor bank and the creditor nevertheless share what is at least an equal interest, based on a similarity of risks, in the immediate return of unpaid invoices after having received and examined them, or in immediate notification. Every bank if interposed as the creditor's bank, must protect this interest of the creditor as if it were its own in relation to all other participating banks, having regard to the contractual fiduciary relationship with its own customer, since every bank acts from case to case either as the creditor or the debtor bank in the many proceedings of direct debiting; all other banks are aware of this and treat it as a matter of course. For these special reasons and because legal relationships rely upon the observance of the practice of the banks confirmed by the Agreement on Direct Debits, the duty to return dishonoured invoices constitutes not only a contractual obligation of the debtor bank towards the creditor bank which was created between the banks themselves in virtue of the Agreement, but also a protective obligation of the debtor bank, based on good faith, in favour of the particular creditor claiming a direct debit. In individual cases where the creditor bank sends invoices to the debtor bank direct this protective duty is based on the legal relationship between the two banks which is created in respect of the individual direct debit on the basis of the giro contract. If, however, additional banks are interposed in carrying out direct debiting procedures between the creditor bank and the debtor bank, this protective duty is based upon the legal relationship between the bank which is the last to be interposed and the debtor bank. The reason is that interposed banks, too, are bound, having regard to the chain of contractual relations which leads back to the creditor bank, to follow through to the debtor bank the obligation of the creditor bank to protect the interests of the creditor. From this follows naturally that the duty of protection incumbent upon the debtor bank for the benefit of the creditor of the direct debit is not excluded by Part IV no. 1 of the Agreement on Direct Debits, contrary to the contention of the defendant, although the Agreement is intended to create “only rights and duties between the participating credit institutions”. The protective duty is not based upon the Agreement but on the legal relationships described above, their contractual purpose and the principle of good faith, and moreover this duty would also have to be recognised if the agreement between the banks did not exist. For the same reason the claims for damages of the creditor of the direct debit against the debtor bank are not affected by the internal special arrangement of Part IV no. 2 of the Agreement, if the protective duty has been violated.

In the present case the defendant bank, by failing to handle the invoices for a long time, has therefore violated the protective duty incumbent upon it and must compensate the plaintiff for the loss resulting therefrom, unless the defendant . . . had retained the invoices with the express consent of the plaintiff’s manager . . .

Case 21

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (FOURTH CIVIL SENATE) 28 AUGUST 1982
NJW 1982, 2431 = WM 1982, 762

The plaintiff, a Danish private bank, claims damages against the defendant because it was induced by an expert valuation made by the defendant and by information supplied by him to the Danish Consul in Munich to grant a credit which could not be recovered later on. The firm of P was the owner of a considerable area of building land. It intended to develop it by building an extensive holiday village. The project had been approved in principle in planning proceedings. No detailed building plans had, however, been drawn up. Only a draft existed which had been prepared by a private architect appointed by the firm of P in agreement with the local commune. At the request of the firm of P the defendant submitted on 10 August 1974 an expert opinion in which he concluded that the area of building land as a whole had a commercial value of DM 200,000,000. On 19 December 1974 the Danish Consul telephoned the defendant and informed him that the Consulate had received an enquiry as to whether the defendant was in fact an officially appointed and sworn expert. Upon receiving an affirmative reply, the Consul asked whether the expert valuation of the area of the holiday village, which the defendant had supplied, was still valid; in so doing he referred to the growing fall of prices in the market of immovables. The defendant replied that he had not heard anything since in this matter. However, in the meantime the proceedings for the approval of the plans should have been advanced. If so, the increased readiness of building operations was a positive factor which balanced the negative development on the market for immovable property. In particular the fact had to be taken into account that according to the practice of planning consent prevailing now, other projects of this kind would no longer receive approval. At the Consul’s request the defendant wrote a letter to the Danish Consulate in which he stated: “In supplementation of my detailed expert opinion of 10 August 1974 I confirm that the value of the object mentioned above has remained unchanged to the present time. The negative effects of the general development on the market of immovable properties are balanced by the fact that the land is ready to be built upon. Moreover, no consent for further comparable projects in the German region of the Alps can be expected either at present or in the future.” On 6 June 1975 the plaintiff entered into a contract for a loan of DM 15,000,000 with the firm of P. The two managers of the firm and the Danish firm of N became independently liable sureties; the Danish Export Council on its part became a surety for the last mentioned firm. In addition the loan was secured by a charge amounting to DM 18,000,000 on the immovable property of the firm of P. On 14 March (August) 1975 the net loan amounting to DM 14,305,000 was paid over. Subsequently the project of the holiday village was not pursued and the interest which had fallen due was not paid. Consequently the loan agreement was rescinded. Based on its charge over the land the plaintiff levied execution against it by way of a sale by auction and bought it on offering DM 1,900,000. The plaintiff contends that the firm of P had sought contacts with sources of money in order to obtain a loan of at least DM 15,000,000 for its planned holiday village. In this connection the firm had entered into negotiations with the Danish firm of N. It had held out the possibility of an order for the delivery of 600 prefabricated houses, if N would assist P in obtaining a credit of DM 15,000,000. In a letter of 28 September 1974 P had not set out its financial situation and the state of the project; in this connection P had referred to the annexed expert valuation by the defendant. N had approached the Danish Ministry of Commerce in order to obtain a guarantee by the State; for this purpose it had submitted the expert valuation by the defendant. The Ministry of Commerce had interposed the plaintiff as a bank, which was to be secured by way of reinsurance by a guarantee of the Danish State. In order to ascertain whether the conditions existed for granting the loan the Danish Export Credit Council had instructed the Danish Consul in Munich to obtain details from the defendant; it had been agreed between the Export Council and the plaintiff that the Consul had told the defendant expressly that a Danish enterprise intended to participate in the project by way of a guarantee or by granting a credit.

The plaintiff's claim was rejected by the courts, below. Upon a second appeal the judgment was quashed and the case referred back for the following.

Reasons

1. The Court of Appeal holds that the plaintiff is not entitled to damages in its own right. In making his enquiry the Consul had not made it clear that he acted as the plaintiff's agent. The information was not information "for those whom it may concern" which might have the consequence that the defendant was liable in contract "to any third party".

From the point of view taken by the Court of Appeal, it should also have been examined whether the plaintiff was included in the protection sphere of the contract. The practice of the courts—and to a great extent also the literature—acknowledges the admissibility of contracts with protective effects for the benefit of third parties [references]. The articles by Ziegler [reference] and Sonnenschein [reference] to which the defendant refers do not cause this Senate to deviate from this well established legal rule. Since the Consul obviously lacked any personal interest in examining the creditworthiness of the firm of P, it could be assumed, at least if it was denied that the Consul acted in the name of another, that future suppliers of credit were to be included in the protection sphere of the contract. The Court of Appeal should have examined the claim from this point of view as well.

In this connection the Court of Appeal adds: the expert valuation had clearly anticipated and assumed an expected development—namely the award of the necessary consent, division, and sale—although in law the possibility of developing the land had not yet been assured. The estimate of a value which was only expected to materialise could not as such have been of interest to third parties, especially credit institutions. However, on p. 2 of the expert valuation, the defendant stated expressly that he had been instructed to ascertain the “commercial value at the relevant time”. It is true that in carrying out the instruction to supply an expert valuation the defendant had to take the future development into consideration. According to the customs of trade the (present) commercial value of an immovable is determined not only by the factual circumstances at the time when the valuation is made, but also by the expectation of future events (e.g. that it will be capable of development as building land). It is obvious that a credit institution which intends to secure a future loan by a mortgage of charge will be interested in the commercial value of the land to be encumbered. As the Court of Appeal has found, the Consul made it clear to the defendant that the information given by him was required for the purpose of deciding whether the loan was to be granted. The Consul was not content with the information given over the telephone, but asked for a written confirmation; thereby he demonstrated to the defendant that his expert opinion was to serve as the basis of a far-reaching decision. The question as to whether the defendant made it sufficiently clear in his expert opinion that the planning permits necessary for the development of the area in issue may be important in assessing the blameworthiness of the defendant and any possible contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, but it is irrelevant for determining whether the plaintiff can make any claims at all because the contract for the supply of information has been violated.

2. The Court of Appeal regards it as possible that in concluding the contract for the supply of information the Consul asked as a representative of the Danish State. If this point of view is adopted the question arises as to whether the Danish State can claim damages from the defendant because the contract to supply information has been violated. According to the plaintiff’s pleadings, the Danish Export Council—apparently as representing the Danish State—became a surety for the credit to be granted. The plaintiff contends that the Export Credit Council had assigned to the plaintiff any possible claims for damages by the Danish State against the defendant; by way of a subsidiary argument the plaintiff relies also on this claim for damages. By the reference back the plaintiff is enabled to amplify its pleadings in this respect and especially to set out to what extent the Danish State has suffered damage. It will be useful if in this connection the plaintiff provides some information concerning the legal position of the Export Credit Council, and in particular whether it is an organ of the State which became a surety in the name of the Danish State and also whether on the latter’s behalf it has assigned the claim to the plaintiff.

Case 22

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (FOURTH CIVIL SENATE) 2 NOVEMBER 1983
NJW 1984, 355 = WM 1984, 34

The defendant is an officially appointed sworn expert for building construction and for valuing land and buildings. On 5 September 1977 he was asked by S, a merchant, to supply an expert opinion concerning the market value of and the estimated income from premises in N. The meeting, in the course of which the defendant received the order, was attended by S, who was accompanied by the plaintiff and by L, a banker. In his written opinion dated 19 September 1977 the defendant intimated that the apartment house erected in 1953 would bring in a gross annual income of DM 91,990 and a net annual income of DM 68,918. He assessed the market value of the premises at DM 1,447,715. The opinion failed to take into account that the premises are subject to restrictions connected with social housing. On 15 November 1977, the plaintiff bought the house on his own account for DM 540,000; S did not participate in the purchase. The premises were conveyed, but the transfer of title was not entered in the land register. The plaintiff financed the purchase by arranging for a loan of DM 500,000 from the City Savings Bank in N, which was secured by a charge on the newly acquired premises. By a contract dated 27 June 1978 the sale agreement of 15 November 1977 was rescinded in toto with effect from 1 July 1978. On 28 May 1978, the defendant wrote a letter to B, who was then interested in acquiring the premises, which contained, inter alia, the following passage: "Mr S instructed me on 5 September 1977 to value the premises. He indicated clearly in the presence of witnesses that he or the connections behind him intended to acquire the premises with a view to converting them into ownership flats. I do not know whether the premises were put up by private finance or whether they represent social housing. It is not the task of a sworn expert to consider this question. I took great care in ascertaining the rental values in the neighbourhood and, having consulted the City administration in N, I came to conclusion that the value of DM 7.50 per square metre is entirely appropriate . . ." The plaintiff alleges that the defendant knew that he and the witness S intended to acquire the premises together. He had bought the premises relying on the accuracy of the defendant's opinion. When the first rents had come in he had found out that the gross value of the income amounted only to DM 25,729.08, which meant that the income was substantially less than the annual payments of interest. For this reason, he had been compelled to rescind the contract of sale. If the defendant had assessed the annual income from the premises incorrectly, the plaintiff would not have bought the premises. As a result he would not have been liable to pay the agent's fee of DM 17,982; local charges of DM 3,973.09; interest on the loan amounting to DM 25,479.76 and notary's fees of DM 6,170.93 totalling DM 53,605.78. He claims this sum.

The District Court rejected the claim. An appeal to the Court of Appeal of Nuremberg was unsuccessful. Upon a second appeal the judgment below was quashed and the case referred back for the following

Reasons

The Court of Appeal denies that the instruction given to the defendant by the witness S to supply an expert opinion constitutes a contract in favour of third parties. No serious objections can be raised against this view. The circumstances indicate that the defendant only intended to assume a duty to perform an act—namely the duty to supply an expert opinion—in favour of the witness S; at least no legal reasons exist for criticising the court below which found the facts in having interpreted the agreement to this effect.

These considerations alone do not exclude the locus standi of the plaintiff to prosecute his claim for damages. It is necessary, in addition, to examine whether the plaintiff is included in the area protected by the contract. It is recognised today, both in the literature and by the practice of the courts, that a contractual obligation may create duties of care towards third parties who themselves are not entitled to seek performance of the principal obligation. As this Senate has stated [reference] this consideration applies also to contracts with officially appointed and sworn experts. The circumstances of the present case indicate the need to examine the facts from this point of view.

It is undisputed that the witness S, accompanied by the plaintiff, called upon the defendant. According to the plaintiff the defendant knew that the premises were to be purchased jointly by S and the plaintiff. The Court of Appeal, it is true, was not convinced that this allegation was correct; consequently it cannot be taken into account by this court. However, the defendant does not deny to have known that a consortium behind the witness S was contemplating the purchase of the premises. He said so clearly in his letter of 28 May 1978. He has also adhered to this account of the facts in the present dispute; he merely claims that he was not aware who belonged to this group. However, this fact is not decisive. Duties of care can also be created in favour of those persons who are not mentioned by name to the other contracting party. Nor is it necessary that the contracting party should know the correct number of persons to whom a duty of care is owed. The practice of the Federal Supreme Court has recognised in several cases that a contract includes a duty of care towards third parties even if the party owing the duty of care was ignorant of the number and the names of the persons to whom the duty was owed [references]. It is essential, however, that the group to whom the duty of care is owed should be capable of being determined objectively . . .

The District Court was of the opinion that the present contract did not include a duty of care towards third persons for the reason that the witness S did not himself owe a duty of care and protection towards the plaintiff. This consideration, too, does not exclude the locus standi of the plaintiff. In principle the parties are free to fashion a contract; they are only restricted in their freedom of choice by the binding rules of law and by the moral requirements to be observed in accordance with § 138 BGB. The parties are therefore at liberty to determine which persons are to be included in the duty of care owed by the contract; they can even extend this duty of care to persons who are not in the charge of either “for better or for worse” [reference]. This cannot be doubted in so far as the parties have inserted express provisions. Where the extent of the duty of care is to be implied from the unequivocal conduct of the parties, the conclusion must be the same; for in the absence of rules requiring the observance of particular formalities an implied declaration of intention is equivalent to one which is express. It is true that in several instances the Federal Supreme Court, in deciding whether a certain person is owed a duty of care by virtue of a contract, has examined whether the other contracting party, to whom the duty of care was owed, was in charge of that person for better or for worse [references]. These decisions must not, however, be interpreted in the sense that the Federal Supreme Court affirmed the legality of this type of contract only in these circumstances. Instead they only concern the question in what circumstances the objective interests involved permit the conclusion that the parties have implicitly stipulated a duty of care towards third parties—i.e. where neither any express statements by the parties nor their conduct otherwise offer any concrete evidence. Even within this approach which relies on typical situations the practice of the Federal Supreme Court [references] requires only that normally, but not always, a contracting party should have been in charge for better or for worse of the person to whom the duty of care is owed. It is another question, however, whether an extension of the duty of care arising from a contract beyond the contracting parties must be presumed having regard to the special circumstances of the particular case. It often happens when an expert is being engaged that the opinion to be supplied is to serve as a basis for a decision by persons who are not linked to the expert by contract [references]. In such a case the court ascertaining the facts must examine in accordance with the general principles of interpretation in the light of the circumstances whether the contracting parties intended to create a duty of care in favour of that person. In this connection, too, it may be relevant whether the instructing party was charged with the care of the third party in question; it is not, however, a necessary prerequisite for holding that such a duty of care exists. In the present case it will have to be considered that an interested party who asks for an expert opinion to form the basis of a decision by a certain group, will normally seek to protect not only his personal interests but also those of the other members of the group; consequently it will not normally be his intention, in entering into the contract, to limit the duty to pay compensation to damage which he suffers personally. In this connection the interests of the expert must also be taken into account; he must not be burdened unreasonably with the duty to pay compensation to third parties; it cannot be expected according to good faith (para. 157 BGB) that the other contracting party will assume such an obligation. In this respect it will have to be considered that the damage which may be suffered by a group of buyers in acquiring a house, if the expert opinion was wrong in estimating its value, are not normally higher than those which would be suffered in similar circumstances by an individual buyer.

Whether in an individual case the duty of care arising under the contract extends to third parties is a matter of interpreting the contract.

2. The Court of Appeal has examined the question whether in his expert opinion the defendant indicated expressly or by implication that he intended to be liable “to whom it concerns” for the accuracy of his report; it found that he did not. No legal reasons exist for contesting this view; in fact no indications exist that the defendant intended to assume liability towards persons who did not belong to the group of buyers behind the witness S.

3. No legal objections can be raised either against the rejection by the Court of Appeal of near-contractual liability of the expert. Those who commission an opinion frequently use the expert opinion of an officially appointed and sworn expert by referring to this opinion in their negotiations with third parties, e.g. in order to justify as vendors the amount of the purchase price demanded or in order to demonstrate that a certain object is credit-worthy. If an expert must assume that his expert opinion will be used for such purposes and is intended to serve as a basis for important financial transactions by third parties, he may be liable to these third parties for the accuracy of the expert opinion (see for this aspect the decision of the Federal Supreme Court [reference] concerning a bank reference and a certificate by a chartered accountant). No such use was, however, envisaged in the present case nor has it occurred in fact. The expert opinion was merely intended to inform the witness S and the group of buyers behind him; it was not meant to support statements in negotiations with third parties.

II. By way of a subsidiary argument the Court of Appeal states that the claim would have to be rejected, even if the plaintiff had a locus standi. In calculating the annual income he was not obliged to examine whether the house contained apartments which had been financed privately or by social housing aid. Since his instructions did not provide any relevant information, he was entitled to assume that the apartments had been financed privately; consequently he was only bound to rely on “the rental obtainable on the free housing market for the apartments of the premises”. These statements cannot be supported in law. An expert opinion must be based on facts and not on guesses or assumptions. Therefore the defendant could only proceed on the assumption that the apartments had been financed privately, if he had reached the conclusion that this assumption was correct. If the expert is ignorant of the relevant circumstances for coming to a conclusion, he must enquire of those instructing him and must, if necessary, also make other investigations (as, for instance, by making enquiries with the authorities). If these attempts remain fruitless he may base his expert opinion on assumptions, but he must indicate this clearly in his opinion. Every expert valuer of premises must know that in assessing the rental of an apartment and, as a result of the income of an apartment house, the legal status of the apartments according to the Rent Control legislation is determining. The fact that the defendant has failed to take this into account may support the charge of negligence. The defendant argues in defence that even if the apartments had been financed privately the rents stated by him would not have been recoverable without further action; it would have been necessary to initiate proceedings for an increase in rents in accordance with § 2 of the Act regulating the Amount of Rent; in many cases this would have involved litigation. This pertinent argument only serves to increase the charge of negligence against the defendant. Precisely for the reason that the owner of the premises cannot enforce automatically the payment of rents which are objectively appropriate, the defendant was negligent to base his calculation of the annual income of the premises on purely theoretical considerations without taking into account the actual situation according to the Rent Control legislation. It is not alleged that, contrary to the usual practice, the defendant had been instructed to determine the hypothetical value of the house irrespective of any restrictions under the Rent Control legislation.

III. The Court of Appeal is of the opinion that the plaintiff is guilty of contributory negligence. It criticises him for not having asked the owner of the premises for his annual accounts and for having failed to call for details about the size of the rents. Such a risky undertaking required the greatest caution, diligence, and scrutiny on the part of the plaintiff. He could not argue successfully that as a layman and a student he was totally ignorant of the fundamentals of valuing. This argument only applied to the individual valuation by the expert but not to the actual rental income, which the plaintiff could have ascertained simply by making enquiries with the other contracting parties or through his agent. If he had received these details, he could have asked the defendant whether as a result his expert opinion had to be modified.

These statements, too, cannot be supported in law. S and the plaintiff realised clearly that they lacked the necessary technical knowledge in order to assess correctly the risk connected with the purchase. For this reason they called upon the expert assistance of the defendant. In his expert opinion the defendant has estimated the net annual income to be DM 68,918; it is not indicated anywhere that this valuation is purely theoretical, that the actual income might be considerably lower, that everything depended upon what rent had been paid hitherto and that, for this reason, it was desirable to make inquiries. The witness S and the plaintiff could assume that the annual income mentioned by the defendant could be obtained without difficulties, even in the case that the rents paid hitherto had been lower than those estimated by the defendant. In this case, however, the rental income in the past would have been irrelevant for the purpose of estimating the income in the future.

The plaintiff cannot be reproached either for not having considered that according to general experience the attempt to increase rents meets with difficulties and thus for having failed to entertain doubts about the accuracy of the expert opinion. Every contract for the supply of advice for a consideration (including in a broad sense also instructions to prepare an expert opinion) is based on the assumption that he who gives the advice possesses more knowledge and insight than he who receives it. The professional training and experience of the adviser is to supplement the deficient expertise of the other contracting party. Consequently it is obvious that the expert adviser is required to possess a greater degree of insight than the party instructing him. If the latter does not detect the mistakes made by the adviser or expert, this cannot normally be regarded as contributory negligence; in the present case it might possibly be found, inter alia in the fact that the plaintiff was not struck by the considerable difference between the valuation made by the defendant and the actual price demanded by the seller . . . In no circumstances can the plaintiff's contributory negligence, if it should be found to exist, be regarded as so serious as to exclude the liability of the adviser or expert altogether [references].

IV. The plaintiff can only claim damages if the faulty estimate of the net annual income by the defendant determined the plaintiff's decision to purchase the premises . . . If the view of the Court of Appeal should be correct that the group of buyers behind the witness S intended to convert the premises to be purchased into apartments to be sold to the occupiers, it is difficult to understand why the amount of income to be obtained through letting should have influenced the decision of the plaintiff at all. It must be admitted that, if this should be the case, it is equally difficult to understand why the defendant should have included in his expert opinion any details about the prospective rental income; in those circumstances it would have been more appropriate to state in the expert opinion what price could be obtained if the apartments to be constructed were to be placed on the property market.

Case 23

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (THIRD CIVIL SENATE) 10 NOVEMBER 1994
BGHZ 127, 378 = NJW 1995, 392

Facts

[The case concerns the question of the protective scope of a report prepared by an architect / building expert submitted to the owner of the building pursuant to a contract concluded between the expert's employer and the owner of the building. The report concerned the value and state of repair of the said building. It was used as the basis for a purchase contract concluded between the plaintiff / purchaser and the owner of the building. After the transaction was completed, grave defects were detected in the building. Since the vendor had excluded his liability for visible or hidden defects, the purchaser sued the expert for damages. The Appeal Court dismissed the claim but the Federal Supreme Court quashed the judgment below and referred the case back for the following reasons.]

Reasons

1. The Appeal Court failed to discuss whether the plaintiffs had a claim for damages as a result of a direct contractual relationship in the form of a tacitly concluded contract to supply information (Auskunftsvertrag). (References omitted).

This cannot be challenged for legal reasons since prior to the conclusion of the purchase contract the parties had no direct contacts.

2. The Appeal Court interprets the contract to provide an expert report to the effect (§§ 133, 157 BGB) that, out of that contract with the owner, protective duties arose that the expert owed towards the plaintiffs. For the court, the crucial point came when the son of the owner, who concluded the contract on his behalf, stated that the property valuation report was needed for the purposes of selling the property. The inclusion of the plaintiffs within the protective scope of the contract for a report on the state and value of the property is legally sound.

(a) In particular, and in this instance, the existence of a contract with protective effect for third persons cannot be denied with reference to the fact that the interests of the plaintiffs and the person who commissioned the report were contradictory. Where an expert report is requested from a person possessed of particular knowledge—which is certified or attested by official documents—for the purpose of using the report in contractual negotiations with a third person, the person commissioning the report normally has an interest in it as means of evidence. This can only be guaranteed if the report was prepared objectively, conscientiously, and in full knowledge of all facts and where its author accepts responsibility for its contents as towards third persons. Accordingly, the Federal Supreme Court has previously decided that in such a case the juxtaposition of interests of the person commissioning the report and the third person does not rule out the latter's inclusion in the protective scope of the contract authorising the preparation of the report (references). It is irrelevant that the defendant, when compiling his report, was unaware that his assessment was to be submitted to that particular plaintiff. Acknowledging his duty of care does not presuppose that the person so duty-bound knows the number or names of the persons to be protected. It suffices that the defendant knew that his valuation was intended for a (potential) buyer. (References omitted.)

[There follow passages dealing with the particular personal qualifications of the defendant, whose professional standing, duties in respect of the expert report submitted, and the inclusion of the plaintiff in the protective scope of the contract to provide the report, were likened to those of a publicly-appointed expert.]

(b) Contrary to the doubts raised in the defendant's reply to the further appeal, the existence of a contract with protective effects for third persons can arise even where, during inspections of the premises, the owner's representative deliberately concealed the defects of the property. This fact may be an indication that he was not interested in an objectively correct expert opinion on the value of the property that would take into account the interests of the buyer. But this hidden and unrevealed reservation has no bearing on the question as to what was objectively declared when an order was made for a valuation, i.e. in respect of the purpose of the report and a possible inclusion of third persons in the protective scope of the contract.

3. [There follow statements as to the specific duties to inspect fully the object to be valued, possible breaches of these duties by the expert, and their effects. The court also deals with the vicarious liability of the architect's/builder's employer.]

On the basis of the undisputed facts it must be assumed that the defendant, who under § 278 BGB is responsible for the acts of the expert, has performed his contractual duties badly and that this breach led to the submission of a report whose contents were incorrect. The Court of Appeal was convinced that an accurate expert opinion would have discouraged the buyer from concluding the purchase contract, i.e. that the defendant's wrongful act caused the damage.

4. The Court of Appeal held that—as towards the plaintiff—the defendant is not liable for damages according to the principles of “positive breach of contract” (positive Forderungsverletzung). [The lower court’s reasoning follows].

The reasoning of the lower court is legally unsound.

(a) The Court of Appeal rightly assumed that a person commissioning a report, who deliberately intends it to reflect wrongly the actual state of repair of the object of the report, has no claim for damages against the author of the report.

Contracts for the provision of expert reports, like the one before the court, must be qualified as contracts for the production of work (§ 631 BGB). This means that in cases of an intentionally wrong assessment of real property, the person commissioning the report has either a claim for damages under § 635 BGB or a claim for positive breach of contract if the damage arose as a consequence of the first defect (Mangelfolgeschaden): in this case the original faulty report (reference). Such a claim for damages would not be affected by the knowledge of the commissioning person that the expert’s report is flawed, since it is only in respect of claims listed in §§ 633, 634 BGB that § 640(2) BGB requires the commissioning person, at the point of acceptance, to reserve his rights. This provision does not apply to claims for damages (reference). But the person who commissions the report and who deliberately brings about a misleading expert report, exposes himself to the defence of abuse of right if he later bases his claims for damages on this defect (references). This defence of malice will be upheld even where the charge of “contradictory behaviour” (venire contra factum proprium) is based on the actions of a representative (§ 166 1 BGB) (reference).

(b) The starting point of the Appeal Court’s reasoning is also in line with the Supreme Court’s case law according to which the protected third person, who derives his rights from the contractual relationship between the initial contractual partners, has basically no wider rights than the tortfeasor’s direct contractual partner. The courts deduced from this fact that the third person, deliberately damaged by the person liable to protect him will, under § 254 BGB, face the tortfeasor’s defence that the contractual partner was co-responsible for the damage, unless this partner was a legal representative of the third person or employed by him to fulfil his own obligations (§ 278 BGB) (references). The same result applies for a contractually agreed exemption from liability (reference). This limitation of the third person’s protection is based on the legal maxim expressed in § 334 BGB and the principle of good faith (§ 242 BGB).

Both arguments show that we are dealing here with merely a legal rule (reference) and not with an unshakeable principle. As far as the maxim of good faith is concerned, this fact is self-evident. Nothing different can be derived from the legal argument behind § 334 BGB or—as the Appeal Court held—from an analogous application of § 334 BGB.

The provisions of § 334 BGB which deal with the true contract for the benefit of a third person are of an optional nature. According to those provisions, the promisor can use contractual defences even against the third person. Their application can, even tacitly, be excluded as can be seen, in particular, from the nature of the covering (or underlying) relationship (Deckungsverhältnis) (reference). There is no apparent reason for applying more stringent rules in cases like the present where, when interpreting the contract in order to establish how and to what extent a third person was protected, these legal provisions are to be applied either directly or according to their underlying maxim. The lower court misjudged this point.

When interpreting the expert report, the Appeal Court should have considered that the “nature of this particular contract” resulted in an exception to the rule according to which the liability of a person who owes protection to a third person does not exceed his liability towards his direct contractual partner.

The defendant knew that the expert valuation had been commissioned for sales purposes. Accordingly, not only could he expect that his report would be submitted to interested buyers. He should further assume that, given the special trust which prospective buyers normally place in the reliability and expertise of an approved expert, the statements made in his report would probably be given a greater weight than the information provided by the seller. The maker of report should have thus assumed that his report was apt to disperse possible doubts of prospective buyers in the veracity of the seller’s information. Herein lies the obvious and particular value that the report has for the vendor, i.e. its ability to promote the chances of a sale. Above all, it matches the obvious interests of a prospective buyer in legal protection for his trust in the veracity of the report, especially in cases where the seller dishonestly tries to conceal the true condition of the sales object. Where, therefore, a contract for the production of an expert report must be taken to include prospective buyers within its protective ambit, it must be assumed that the third person’s trust in the expert’s statements must be protected even where the incorrectness [of the report] was (also) instigated by the principal. This result does not depend on the effects which this inducement has on the liability of the supplier as against the principal (references).

Such contractual interpretation will not burden the expert with an unreasonable risk of liability. More precisely, it will, certainly, render him liable for the dishonesty of the person who commissioned the report from him. True, when providing his report, the expert can use information provided by his principal—and he will often be forced to do so—wherever he cannot himself verify the facts. But he must then make this clear in his report (reference). Normally, he will thereby indicate that he excludes his liability for the truth of these statements.

5. The reasoning of the Appeal Court, in denying the defendant’s liability as towards the third person included in the protective scope of the contract, is thus legally flawed and its decision must, therefore, be quashed.

[There follow instructions as to the re-interpretation of the contract and the court’s opinion that the plaintiffs cannot be held to have been co-responsible for the damage merely because they have not personally found any defects when inspecting the premises.]

Case 24

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (THIRD CIVIL SENATE) 2 APRIL 1998

BGHZ 138, 257 = NJW 1998, 1948 = JZ 1998, 1013

Facts

The plaintiff is the receiver of the assets of the G AG. Its predecessor (G GmbH & Co.) acquired from H, the sole member of the S GmbH (hereafter called STN) all the shares in the business by a notarised contract dated the 12 October 1992. This was immediately after H had brought in to this company the real property company which owned the business premises and the buildings on them which were let to STN in accordance with § 20 of the Conversion Tax Act. The purchase price was 2.5 million DM, payable immediately.

The plaintiff demands from the defendant auditors compensation for incorrect information. The defendants had been commissioned by H to carry out a compulsory audit in accordance with §§ 316 ff HGB. They had been occupied since July 1992 with the audit of the annual accounts of STN for the year 1991, drawn up by the accountant R. Their complaints led to the annual accounts being altered by R and showing a balance of DM 21,891,249.03 and an annual surplus of DM 2,666,467.37 higher than that in the earlier accounts.

The defendants by a letter of 8 October 1992 to STN for the attention of H (and a further Telefax letter of 9 October 1992 to the B GmbH for the attention of the accountant St who had been consulted by the G GmbH & Co) stated that the now current annual accounts would not be changed by them and could be confirmed by them.

Later irregularities in STN's accounting came to light. H had at the end of 1991 incorrectly credited nine sums for a total of almost 25 million DM. The final annual accounts, for which the defendants issued a limited note of confirmation on the 30th March 1993 in accordance with § 322 HGB, showed a deficit of DM 11,049,361.15 instead of a surplus of DM 2,666,467.37.

The claim was in the end for 2.5 million DM. In it the plaintiff alleged that the G GmbH & Co would not have acquired the shares in the business in the knowledge of the actual business yield in 1991 (or would only have done so at a symbolic purchase price of DM 1). It was unsuccessful at first instance. The plaintiff lodges an appeal in law against this decision.

Reasons

The appeal in law leads to a quashing of the appeal judgment and a reference of the matter back to the appeal court.

I.

1. The appeal court, whose judgment is printed in [reference omitted], accepts that liability on the part of the defendants would come into consideration, because the subsequent insolvent has been included in the protected area of the audit contract between STN and the defendants. The appeal in law accepts this assessment as favourable to it. On the other hand, the reply to the appeal in law considers that the instructions for the compulsory audit, the communication about the status of the audit and the foreseeable outcome of it could not result in any protective effect in favour of third parties.

(a) According to § 323 para. 1 sentence 1 of the HGB the auditor of the accounts is under a duty to carry out a conscientious and unbiased examination and a duty of secrecy. If he breaches his duties intentionally or negligently, he is under a duty to compensate the company (and, if a connected undertaking has been harmed, this as well) for the harm arising from this (§ 323 para. 1 sentence 3 of the HGB). In the academic literature, it is deduced from this that according to § 323 para. 1 sentence 3 of the HGB ie for the area of the compulsory audit, where there is a violation of the duties of the auditor third parties are not entitled to any claims against him [references omitted].

Insofar as the duty to compensate for harm is extended to connected undertakings, this would rest—as a correlative—on this undertaking's duty of presentation and provision of information to the auditor of the accounts for the group in accordance with § 320 para. 2 sentence 2 of the HGB [references omitted]; the connected undertaking's entitlement to compensation presupposes that the auditor is violating a duty incumbent on him and owed to the connected undertaking [references omitted]. An extension of the duty to compensate to further third parties for harm by way of interpretation or analogy would therefore be forbidden [references omitted].

Besides this, an extension of the liability to shareholders/members or creditors of the company would run counter to the goal of—in cases of negligent breach of duty—limiting the risk of liability of the auditor (§ 323 para. 2 of the HGB). It would give rise to concern that the company would have to share its claims, which are in any case limited, with third parties [reference omitted].

(b) The Senate endorses this in principle. Liability of the defendants to the purchaser, who does not belong to the group of persons mentioned in § 323 of the HGB as entitled to compensation, does not therefore come into consideration from this point of view. The breach of duty of which the defendants are accused certainly belongs technically to the area which is covered by the regime of § 323 of the HGB. It is therefore here a matter of the more extensive question of whether and under what conditions an auditor who is entrusted with a compulsory audit can also be made liable for appraisals, certificates or other statements which are connected with the object of audit, to persons who are not contractual parties to the audit contract and are also not included in the associated undertakings addressed in § 323 of the HGB.

(aa) The appeal court takes into consideration (correctly here) the principles according to which protective duties can arise from a contract for the benefit of a third party, who himself has no claim to the main obligation under the contract. The case law has in particular accepted such protective effects for contracts by which the client commissions a report or an expert's opinion from a person who has at his disposal a particular specialist knowledge recognised by the state (eg publicly appointed expert, auditor, tax adviser) in order to make use of it as against a third party [references omitted].

As the purpose of the report is to induce trust in and possess evidential value for the third party, a conflict of the interests of the client and the third party is not an obstacle to the latter's incorporation into the protective area of the contract [reference omitted].

There are no difficulties about also applying these principles in cases in which an auditor of accounts is entrusted with the compulsory audit of a company provided that it appears sufficiently clear to him that on this audit a particular work product is wanted from him which is to be used as against a third party who trusts in his expert knowledge. If § 323 para. 1 sentence 3 of the HGB (only) regulates a statutory liability to the company and the associated undertaking, this does not mean that contractual liability of the auditor to third parties according to the principles developed by the case law on the third party liability of experts would thereby be excluded from the outset.

Such exclusion of the possibility of creating conditions of liability (which are justified by the interests involved and take account of the principle of private autonomy) cannot be inferred from this provision in this sort of generality. A third party liability which is essentially based on the fact that it is for the contracting parties to determine against whom a duty of protection is to be established [reference omitted] is not affected by the area of direct application of § 323 para. 1 of the HGB. It also does not signify, as Ebke/Scheel [reference omitted] think, a disregard of a basic decision of the legislator in favour of a limited liability of auditors expressed in this provision. This provision, according to paragraph 4 of which the duty to compensate may neither be excluded nor limited, does not pursue such an extensive purpose.

(bb) Nor does § 323 of the HGB create a material exclusionary effect against liability of the auditor in the run up to the issue of the certificate. The provision does not for instance connect the liability to the issue of the certificate as such; it presupposes instead a fault-based breach of duty in the carrying out of the audit in accordance with para. 1 sentences 1 and 2. Whether—in the relationship of the auditor to the company—mistakes in the context of the notification of a certificate are included as well, can be left undecided. There is in any case no ground for leaving the trust (which is worthy of protection) of a third party, who has been included within the protected area of the audit contract, that such a publication is correct simply without any sanction in liability law.

(cc) Certainly, the legislative intention which is expressed in § 323 of the HGB to limit appropriately the risk of the auditor's liability needs to be considered within the framework of the auditor's contractual liability to third parties. Incorporating an unknown number of creditors, members or acquirers of shares within the protective area of the audit task would militate against this. It cannot be assumed as a rule that the auditor will be ready to take on such an extensive risk of liability.

It is different however if the parties to the contract on the commissioning of the work (or possibly even at a later point in time) proceed on the agreed basis that audit is to be carried out in the interest of a certain third party as well and the outcome is to assist this third party as the basis for a decision. In any case, in such cases the undertaking of the task includes a conclusive declaration of the auditor that he intends to carry out the audit conscientiously and without bias in the interest of the third party as well. There is no ground in a case of this kind for denying to a third party claims against an auditor who breaches his duty in the audit [references omitted].

(c) The appeal court infers from the way the letter of the 9 October 1992 was addressed that it was recognisably intended for the use of a third party; it also considers that the defendants could have reckoned on their information being of importance for decisions by recipients with a business background. These findings are accepted by the appeal in law as favourable to it. They are unsuccessfully disputed by the reply to the appeal in law which claims on the contrary that the defendants did not have to reckon with a third party basing a purchase decision on a communication regarding the expected outcome of an audit, because in the legal world if need be an intermediate status report could be a basis for a decision of that kind.

The significance to be attributed to the letter of the 9 October 1992 is a question of interpretation which the judge of fact has to undertake, taking into consideration all the decisive circumstances, which can include the discussions preceding the letter. The appeal court will in the further proceedings have an opportunity to look at the objection raised by the reply to the appeal in law insofar as the letter of the 9 October 1992 contains no certificate corresponding to § 322 of the HGB and therefore also cannot form a basis for trust which is worthy of protection.

(d) The defendants also have an opportunity in the further proceedings to give a more precise basis to their objections, raised in the appeal in law, to the assumption by the appeal court that they had breached their audit duties and given an incorrect confirmation just because they had failed to obtain confirmation of the balances.

2. (a) The appeal court denies that the defendants are liable even though it bases its decision on a breach of duty. This was because the plaintiff has not proved that the insolvent would not have acquired the shares in the business of STN if the deficit for the year 1991 had been known to it. The appeal in law objects (correctly here) that its case was to the effect that the shares in the business would not have been acquired on the conditions of the contract of the 12 October 1992 if the deficit for the year 1991 had been known.

Besides this the appeal court considers the statements of the witnesses called by the defendants, in particular in relation to the calculation of the purchase price in the purchase contract, to be contrary to logic and experience and does not consider the plaintiff's argument on this issue. The circumstance that no special point of reference was established for the value of STN in the calculation of the purchase price and the piece of land included was the decisive valuation factor for the calculation of the purchase price does not justify the conclusion expressed by the appeal court that it was a matter of indifference to the purchaser whether STN had a value at all.

Even if the managing director of the subsequent insolvent should have declared in the purchase contract negotiations that the firm was no longer worth anything anyway and he did not want to pay anything for it, it does not follow from this that the purchaser would have been prepared to put its money into an undertaking which was heavily in debt by more than 10 million DM a good nine months previously. In this connection it may remain open in proceedings in the appeal in law exactly how the purchase price clause in § 4b of the purchase contract is to be understood. The decisive factor is that the annual account for the year 1991 addressed by the defendants in the letter of the 9 October 1992 revealed an annual surplus of about 2.6 million DM whilst the annual account which was later provided with a note of confirmation by the defendants documented a deficit of more than 11 million DM. It cannot be inferred from the statements of the witnesses who have been examined that such a difference did not influence the calculation of the purchase price.

In § 10 of the purchase contract the seller warrants that the principles of proper accounting had been observed and to his knowledge no liabilities of the business existed which were not evident from the accounts. The appeal in law correctly points out that this provision argues against the appeal court's assumption that the operative value of STN was without any significance for the purchase price. In the face of this provision and the fact that STN's inadequate financial cover existing at the end of 1991 could only be balanced by the bringing in of the business premises, it cannot be denied that the breach of duty by the defendants (which was accepted by the appeal court) caused the purchase decision on the basis which it gave. In fact, there is a prima facie case in favour of it.

(b) Also, if the appeal court had doubts about whether the breach of duty caused the purchase decision, it should not have disregarded the evidence of the witness Dr B who was called on this issue. Even if the negotiations about the purchase of the shares in the business were concluded on the 8 October 1992, the parties to the purchase contract were only finally bound by the documentation of the 12 October 1992. Therefore events between these two points in time could still be of importance. This applies for instance to the bringing in of the real property company by the seller on the day of the documentation of the purchase contract. Further, the appeal court itself—in spite of the conclusion of the negotiations on the 8 October 1992—proceeds decisively on the basis that the defendants' letter of the 9 October 1992 was a ground of liability.

But then prima facie evidence which refers to the causality of this letter is also important. The prima facie evidence ought not to be left out of consideration, as the reply to the appeal in law thinks it should be, just because the plaintiff has not explained why the witness should have had such an insight into the events relating to the decision. This is because there was a letter of the 7 October 1992 written by this witness, who represented the purchaser, which the appeal court mentioned in its version of the facts of the case and from which important circumstances for the calculation of the purchase price arise.

3. The appeal in law also correctly objects to the fact that the appeal court has denied damage. The deliberations of the appeal court are based in this respect on the legally incorrect idea that the shares in the business of STN were, insofar as they concerned the operative value of the company, without significance for the calculation of the purchase price, and it was only a matter of the value of the business premises which had been included. Whether damage has resulted to the purchaser, which has asserted that if it had been correctly informed about the circumstances of STN at the end of 1991 it would not have acquired the shares in the business or would only have acquired them for a symbolic purchase price of DM 1, can only be established by inclusion of the value of the undertaking as a whole. It cannot be ascertained solely by the purchase price which has been paid—as the claim of the plaintiff seems to suggest—nor solely by the value of the business premises which has been brought in.

II.

The Senate cannot make a decision in the case itself, because further findings by the judge of fact are necessary on the questions addressed under I. The appeal court will also have to investigate the argument of the defendants that the purchaser had been informed about the business circumstances of STN and it was in any case attributable to it as contributory fault that it had had no intermediate status report prepared. It will further have the opportunity within the framework of its new assessment to go into the question again of whether a claim by the plaintiff can be based on an information contract or on tort. Where liability which is merely based on the protective effect of the audit contract is being considered, the limitation of liability in § 323 para. 2 of the HGB is to be taken into account. This is because the provisions of § 323 of the HGB—in this respect also—take precedence as a special regime over the contract law provisions of civil law [references omitted].

Case 25

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (FIRST CIVIL DIVISION) 10 MAY 1984
NJW 1985, 2411 = WM 1984, 1233

Facts

The first plaintiff had a continuous business relationship with the defendant, a forwarding agent, since November 1976. In accordance with an agreement from 26 January 1978 the first plaintiff stored goods in one of the defendant's storehouses. The second plaintiff owned the goods. The first plaintiff is the parent company of the second plaintiff. On 19 December 1979 the first plaintiff discovered that some of the goods had been stolen. The plaintiffs seek to obtain declaratory judgments to the effect that the defendant is liable in damages for the loss of the goods . . . The Court of First Instance and the Court of Appeal have rejected the claim. The appeal against these decisions was allowed.

...

II. 2. The Court of Appeal denied the first plaintiff's entitlement to a contractual action on the following ground. The second plaintiff had direct rights of action founded on a contract for the benefit of a third party and on delict. In the view of the Court of Appeal it followed that the promisee could not recover damages in respect of the third party's loss (Drittschadensliquidation). The reasoning of the Court of Appeal is flawed.

(a) Only the contracting party to that contract, i.e. the first plaintiff as promisee, can enforce the contractual right of action derived from the agreement from 26 January 1978. The fact that the second plaintiff suffered the loss and not the first plaintiff is not a bar to that right of action. In cases like the present, where a bailor enters into a contract with a bailee whereunder the bailee undertakes to store and guard the goods the promisee or bailor is entitled to recover damages in respect of the loss suffered by the third party owner of the goods [references omitted].

(b) The second plaintiff could have enforced the rights under the agreement from 26 January 1978 instead of the first plaintiff only if the first plaintiff had assigned his contractual rights against the defendant to the second plaintiff or if the contract between the first plaintiff and the defendant from 26 January 1978 had been one for the benefit of the second plaintiff or at least with protective effects towards the second plaintiff. However, this is not the case here. . . .

(c) Therefore the second plaintiff's claim is exclusively founded on the law of delict. This direct right of action of the second plaintiff does not prevent the first plaintiff from pursuing his contractual claim founded on Drittschadensliquidation against the defendant. The first plaintiff may sue in addition to the action brought by the second plaintiff. The fact that the first plaintiff's claim flows from the same acts or omissions of the defendant as that of the second plaintiff does not indicate otherwise. The claims pursued by the plaintiffs in contract and tort respectively are independent from each other in that each right of action follows its own rules, they are also equally valuable each in its own right [reference omitted]. It follows that the contractual claims can be brought in addition to and independently from an action in delict. The fact that the plaintiff is exposed to both claims does not amount to a double recovery prohibited for reasons of the law of civil procedure. . . .

To allow the first plaintiff to sue on the basis of third party loss compensation does not prejudice the defendant debtor in any interest that needs protection. The promisor does not lose the right to invoke limitations of liability, contributory negligence, limitation periods or other defences. This is true also for an extinction of the obligation by performance. If the promisor fulfils his obligations towards one of the creditors his obligations towards the other creditor cease to exist as well (see § 428 BGB; RGZ 170, 246, 250). . . .

Case 26

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SEVENTH CIVIL DIVISION) 25 NOVEMBER 1971 VERS R 1972, 274 = MDR 1972, 316

Facts

The plaintiff is the owner of a castle X. where he runs a hostel for the needy. The building has a mineral oil heating system. The oil is stored in two tanks. A mixer tap connects the two tanks. In May 1965 a company B. employed the first defendant, a mineral oil wholesale firm, to supply and install two devices the function of which is to detect leaks in the tanks. It is disputed whether the first defendant also undertook to remove the mixer tap. The plaintiff is economically linked with the company B. B. contracted in its own name but on the account of the plaintiff. The first defendant employed the subcontractor R who in turn instructed the second defendant to actually carry out the construction works.

Oil leaked from one of the tanks into the estate's soil and subsequently into the estate's lake by the end of August 1965. The leakage was caused by a defective weld. An employee of the second defendant had welded the respective airing pipe. However, the oil in the tank would not have spilled over had the mixer taps not been wrongly adjusted.

In the action before the Court the plaintiff seeks compensation from the defendants as joint and several liable debtors for the loss caused by the leaked oil. The loss has been provisionally estimated to amount to DM 171,589.88. The Court of First Instance (Landgericht) and the Court of Appeal (Berufungsgericht) allowed the claim. The appeal is rejected.

Reasons

I. 1. The Court of Appeal held that the plaintiff is entitled to a contractual remedy against the first defendant in respect of the loss although he is not a privy to the contract between the company B. and the first defendant. The company B. contracted in its own name but on the account of the plaintiff. Therefore, B. acted as indirect agent on behalf of the plaintiff. In view of these findings, the Court of Appeal applied the concept of recovery of damages in respect of a third party's loss (Schadensliquidation im Drittinteresse). According to this principle the promisee may authorise the third party to sue the defendant in its own name and claim compensation for the loss that falls on the third party. This line of the reasoning of the Court of Appeal is supported by a series of decisions substantially to the same effect (BGHZ 51, 91, 93 = VersR 69, 155, 156; BGHZ 40, 91, 100 = VersR 63, 1172, 1173; BGHZ 25, 250, 258 = VersR 57, 705, 706 with further references). This part of the judgment is not put into question by the defendant's submissions. . . .

4. According to the Court of Appeal the first defendant's breach of contract (positive Vertragsverletzung) for which he is liable lies in the fact that the airing pipe was not properly welded. The first defendant is legally answerable for this defect; the defect is at least a contributory cause for the loss. The fact that the mixer tap was not adjusted properly is contrary to the opinion of the defendant irrelevant because the leakage would have been avoided if the airing pipe had been sealed off properly. In that case the leakage would have been noticed on time. This suffices to meet the requirement of causality.

5. The Court of Appeal further assumes correctly that the first defendant is responsible for the fault of the employees of the second defendant according to § 278 BGB and that these employees have acted negligently; they have not taken sufficient care when welding the airing pipe. The first defendant could not convince this Court of the contrary.

II. 1. In the view of the Court of Appeal the liability of the second defendant is founded exclusively on the law of delict (§ 831 BGB). . . .

2. A pre-condition for § 831 BGB is physical damage to property, just as it is for § 823 I BGB. However, the second defendant's contention that the Court of Appeal did not positively establish that he has caused physical damage to property is not correct. Such physical damage was caused by the second defendant. . . .

3. In the view of the Court of Appeal the second defendant did not successfully prove that he had carefully selected and supervised his employees; according to § 831 BGB he bears the burden of proof. This finding is not questioned by the second defendant and the reasoning of the Court appears to be correct.

III. The Court of Appeal found that the plaintiff was not contributory negligent. . . .

Notes to Cases 19–26

1. Cases 19–24 deal with economic loss caused by negligent statements—typically taking the form of some certification. The law on this subject is complicated for two reasons. First because the potential liability flows from words and it is generally believed that people utter words with less care than they usually put in their actions. Words also “travel” far and thus, it is said, can cause more widespread harm. Neither argument is entirely convincing. In these days of worldwide class actions the asbestos, silicon breast implants, Dalcon Shield or defective heart valves disputes have put paid to this assertion. Nor is the distinction between words and actions always as easy or as obvious as those who advocate them believe. Thus, are negligent certifications words or documents based on negligent investigations i.e. acts or omissions? More likely, therefore, that the real problem here is, once again, the systems' dislike for pure economic loss, aggravated on occasion by the above-mentioned characteristics assigned to words. Whatever, the true reason, and often it is an accumulation of reasons that dictates an “attitude”, the three legal systems examined in this book can boast an extremely rich case law which is not free from contradictions. This complexity is further increased if one bears in mind that the problems here discussed find their solutions sometimes in judge-made law and sometimes in statutes (which in Germany also show the signs of EC influences). For a legal rule that can claim its existence to a multiplicity of sources invariably courts interpretative difficulties.

German law can claim two additional interesting features. First, the “statutory” law, perhaps because it was drafted under the influence of powerful pressure groups, shows marked signs of being more “protective” of accountants and auditors. There are no such signs of leniency in the case law which, in its boldness, is provoking academics and testing the codal philosophy to its limits. For the academic lawyer in general, the comparatist in particular, this may well be one of the most striking features of the German position. For, as a Common lawyer with unique insights into German law once observed, it underscores “. . . the German willingness, indeed eagerness, to extend tort protection . . . [despite] the Civil Code’s categorical exclusion of tort damages for pure economic loss and the great weight reputedly given by German law to theoretical orthodoxy over pragmatism.” (Fleming (1989) 105 LQR, 508.) In this trend (rather than in the details of German law) may also lie the greatest lesson for the Common lawyer who, additionally, would not have to go to the same pains to justify similar results if (or when) he decided to adopt a more flexible attitude towards pure economic loss. Finally, many of the ideas, notions, and trends discussed in this section are also evident in two other areas of economic loss. The first is concerned with the consequences of mistakes made by lawyers (and is discussed in the next section); the other deals with damage caused to products (and is considered by the cases reproduced in section 15 and the notes that accompany them).

In the light of these introductory remarks, it is self-evident that an account such as the one that follows is bound to be somewhat crass—certainly to the extent that it attempts to summarise such an enormous volume of decisional law. Here more than elsewhere the reader should thus look at what follows more in search for signposts for further study of the law than as a source of detailed answers. If the material assembled here and the notes that accompany it also succeed to make the reader “think” that can only be regarded as a welcome bonus.

2. At first sight, German law is cautious and conservative. § 676 BGB provides that “A person who gives advice or a recommendation to another is not bound to compensate for any damage arising from following the advice or recommendation, without prejudice to his responsibility arising from contract or delict.” Since the main tort provision (§ 823 I BGB) excludes, as we have seen, pure economic loss from its list of protected interests, liability in tort can only be based on § 824 BGB, § 826 BGB or § 823 II BGB. The first has minimal importance, while the second also has a limited application. This is despite the fact that in recent times the courts have widened the meaning of intention (in § 826 BGB) to include not only dolus directus but also dolus eventualis (a notion somewhat akin to our concept of reckless behaviour). Thus, in one decision (BGH NJW 1987, 1758–9) the court eased the fault requirement stating that (for the purposes of liability under § 826 BGB) it would suffice to show that the auditor expected his report to be used in connection with credit negotiations and that (if it were incorrect) it would cause harm to the relying creditor. Professor von Bar has, in fact, gone further by arguing that “a person who gives information off the cuff must . . . recognise that it could be false; and the very fact that he still goes ahead and gives that information demonstrates that he has reckoned with the possibility of damage to others and has accepted it.” (“Liability for Information and Opinions Causing Pure Economic Loss to Third Parties” in The Growing Convergence (ed. B S Markesinis) OUP (1994). See, also, Palandt-Thomas, § 826 nos. 25–28.)

3. Because of the above strictures of the tort provisions of the Code the courts have had recourse to the notion of contract with protective effects vis-à-vis third parties with the result that the liability of auditors has been taken significantly further than the wording of § 826 could ever possibly justify. The absence in the German law of tort of any liability for negligently inflicted pure economic loss has resulted in a number of substitute legal constructions. One such device is the so-called contract with protective effects for third parties, a judicially-created variant of the better-known notion of contract in favour of third parties (see chap. 2 section A (d)(iii) and now § 311 III BGB). This construction makes it possible to treat pure economic losses of third persons, resulting from a faulty performance of contractual (or non-contractual) duties, as actionable harm resulting from a breach of a contractual duty. This contractually-based liability towards third parties for their pure economic loss, though now well acknowledged in principle, remains controversial; and the controversy rages as much over detail as it does over the dogmatic basis of the solution.

In German law (and often but not invariably in the Common law), liability, essentially, depends upon reliance on the report; and whether this was reasonable or not depends on the contract (commissioning the audit report) as well as all other relevant circumstances. (BGH NJW 2001, 534 now casts doubt on the relevance of reliance to determining the extent of the loss that can be recovered; the court regarded the scope of the duty owed as the decisive factor; see, also, above, Ch. 2A(d)(iii), p. 63. That case is noteworthy also in a different respect; the surveyor although a professional did not have a formally acknowledged expertise.) Thus, third parties may be able to sue for damages under contracts to which they are not signatories (BGH JZ 1986, 1111); or where their protection under the contract commissioning the report arises not from its wording but from necessary implication (BGH NJW 1987, 1758, 9). In order to adapt and apply the concept of a contract with protective effects towards third parties to the negligent misstatement situation—the so called “expert liability” category of cases—the Federal Court has held that for the protective effects to arise, it is no longer necessary for the requirement of “Wohl und Wehe” (for better or for worse) to be fulfilled. Until roughly 1984, this requirement had served as one of the main control factors of the concept since it limited its scope to situations where the promisee was responsible for the “well being” of the third party. This, for instance, was easily satisfied in the context of family relationships but also in employment settings where the employer’s duties of care towards his employees were involved. But it was not adequate to cover relationships of commercial nature, so it was dropped. (See BGHZ 69, 82, 86; BGH NJW 1984, 355, 356; BGH NJW 1998, 1059.) A further bold step towards increasing the range of persons included under the “protective umbrella” of the contract was taken when the BGH abandoned the view that third party protection should be denied when there was a real or potential conflict of interests between the commissioning principal of the report and the third party. (BGH NJW 1987, 1758–9). This trend is continued in case 23. The decision deals with the problem whether and to what extent the co-responsibility of the contractual partner of the surveyor should be taken into account in an action by the third party/purchaser of the land. In this instance the site owner, who intended to sell the property, commissioned a report from a surveyor to estimate the value of the house. The surveyor over-valued the house. This was because he negligently relied on the misleading information given to him by the site owner. The third party/purchaser relied on the surveyor’s report and bought the house at an unrealistic price. The court allowed the action of the third party. The actual result of the decision surely appears reasonable (in that sense, Medicus, JZ 1995, 309). In the final analysis, however, the BGH took another step in the direction of an extra-contractual/ tortious liability for certain cases of economic loss. But the court was not willing to adopt the language of a tortious “duty of care” towards certain third persons. Instead, it sought to derive this result from the intention of the parties to the contract of employment of the surveyor which was given protective effect towards the third party/purchaser. The BGH resorted to two fictions to achieve the “desired” result on the basis of contract.

The first was that the site-owner had a real interest in including the buyer in the protective scope of the contract. In fact he had not, since he and the purchaser were on opposite sides of the bargain and, as a result, the survey gave rise to a conflict of interests. (While the site-owner is clearly interested in a favourable valuation, the purchaser/plaintiff is interested in a valuation at the lower end of the scale). It is, therefore, difficult to argue that the site-owner wished to benefit the third party/plaintiff. Such an intention could only be “discovered” if one could show that had the parties openly discussed the issue they would have agreed that good faith required that the site-owner also contract for the benefit of the purchaser. Such a construction, however, is so unconvincing that, in reality, it shows that it is the law that is imposing upon the surveyor such a duty towards the purchaser and not the will of the parties.

The second fiction is even more striking. It is inherent in the derivative nature of the third party’s cause of action that the promisor/ surveyor can avail himself towards the third party of any defences available to him against the promisee (§ 334 BGB, which corresponds to Contracts (Rights of Third Parties, Act 1999 s. 3(2)). In an action by the site owner the surveyor could have objected that the site owner who commissioned the report, had acted contrary to good faith in concealing a crucial defect of the property. The BGH held that the promisor could not avail himself of this defence as against the third party/purchaser. The court relied on a device—which is not always available—to solve this problem, namely implied term reasoning. Thus, it assumed that in the contract that created the “duty of care” towards certain third parties, the surveyor tacitly waived his right to avail himself of any defence against the plaintiff/potential purchaser which he, the contractual debtor, had against his contractual partner (the person commissioning the report). This waiver, the BGH stated, was justified by the fact that the expert knew that his performance was intended to form the basis of the financial calculations of the purchaser of the land (who, one might add will—reasonably—rely on the report). It goes without saying that these considerations might also justify imposing liability under the Hedley Byrne principle of reasonable reliance and assumption of responsibility. However, it is more difficult to see how this result, imposing liability, can be derived from applying the concept of a contract in favour of the third party. For not only is this result incompatible with the traditional model of a contract in favour of third parties; it is also doubtful that the surveyor would have accepted such a waiver had it been discussed before entering into the contract. Once again, such analysis indicates that the duty is imposed by law and does not flow from the will of the contracting parties. It also casts new doubt on the whole construction of a contract with protective effects towards the purchaser. (See Ebke JZ 1998, 991, 993 ff. who suggests that “implied term” reasoning is in such cases used to make up for the exclusion of pure economic loss from the list of protected interests in § 823 I BGB).

In the light of the above, it comes as no surprise to discover that some academic commentators have argued in favour of abandoning the contract with protective effects as theoretical basis of the decisions of the court—at least in cases such as the present one. But the BGH remains to be convinced and has yet to give any signs that it is about to change its present stance (see ch. 2 A(d)(iii)). See e.g. Canaris “Die Reichweite der Expertenhaftung gegenüber Dritten”, ZHR 163 (1999) 206 and “Schutzwirkungen zugunsten Dritter bei ‘Gegenläufigkeit’ der Interessen”, JZ 1995, 441. Professor Canaris submits that at least in situations like the present the theoretical basis of the liability of the “expert” for negligent misstatements in German law ought to be culpa in contrahendo (see now § 311 II BGB and § 311 III 2 BGB which refers to reliance). Such an analysis would entail a number of advantages such as a better explanation of the independence of the action from the contract between the person who commissioned the statement and the expert. It would also cater for the need to limit liability in relation to third parties by disclaimers etc. One is reminded here of the reasoning in Smith v. Eric S Bush [1990] 1 AC 831 (recently applied by the Court of Appeal in Merrett v. Babb [2001] 3 WLR 1). Professor Picker on the other hand (e.g. “Gutachterhaftung” in Festschrift für Dieter Medicus (1999) p. 397) rejects the reliance-based culpa in contrahendo model. Instead, he favours a limited and overt exception to the rule that pure economic loss is not recoverable in the law of delict (which would cover this and other similar cases of negligent mis-statements.) Whether this is de lege lata possible in German law is not for us to decide. But the discussion prompted by case 23 certainly indicates that the contractual approach currently prevailing in Germany may also have its shortcomings.

4. Cases 19–24 also highlight one of the main structural differences between German tort law and English law. German law has not developed a general exception to the general rule that pure economic loss cannot be recovered in the law of delict outside the framework of §§ 823 II, 826 BGB and apart from the “creation” of the protected interest under § 823 I BGB of an established and operating business. As a result, it has, once again, been forced into contractual thinking. As the cases reproduced above show, its contract law has proved flexible enough to accommodate the desire to hold liable those who give advice (or perform other services such as auditing or surveying) even if in a strict sense there is no privity of contract between the parties. This, for instance, could happen when third parties rely on statements by professionals given in the course of their employment by a different person. From a comparative perspective this confirms the insight formulated many years ago by Zweigert and Kötz and which still cannot be bettered. For, in their Introduction to Comparative Law (3rd edn. 1998) p. 44, the authors remarked that: “. . . when the process of comparison begins, each of the solutions must be freed from the context of its own system.” And they continued: “Here, too, we must follow the principle of functionality: the solutions we find in the different jurisdictions must be cut loose from their contextual context and stripped of their national doctrinal overtones so that they may be seen purely in the light of their function, as an attempt to satisfy a particular need.”

The problem of negligent misstatements has caused major conceptual difficulties in both systems. The preferred option of English courts is, as we have seen, to extend liability in negligence to cover pure economic loss—a type of harm traditionally belonging to the realm of contract law. By contrast, the German predilection for contract appears at first sight to have an axiomatic advantage. On closer re-examination, however, it raises serious doubts whether liability really flows from the intention of the parties (essential if one is to remain faithful to contract theory) or whether it is more accurately imposed by the law. (For instance the contract route encounters difficulties if the contract is void; the issue has not been decided but the better view seems to be that liability to third parties should not cease in such a case.) The realisation that the theoretical basis might not, after all, lie in the intention of the parties has finally come to full light, especially in recent cases such as BGHZ 127, 378 (case 23). We must conclude therefore that in this area, if any, a functional approach is capable of providing insights of general interest. As Professor Schlechtriem remarked recently it is not so much the theoretical basis that counts. What really matters is that the specific criteria for imposing liability receive attention and are developed rationally on a case by case basis. (See his “Schutzpflichten und geschützte Personen” in Beuthien and others (eds.) Festschrift für Dieter Medicus (1999) p. 529.) More specifically his view is that the main emphasis should be laid upon the scope and purpose of the duty owed in the individual case. In his opinion, the relevant test is to be found in Lord Hoffmann’s speech in South Australian Asset Management Corp. v. York Montague Ltd. [1997] AC 191, 211 where the learned Law Lord argued that the claimant has to show “that the duty was owed to him and that it was a duty in respect of the kind of loss which he has suffered”. Against this background, the comparative study of each other’s systems can provide useful insights to both of them and make the lawyer—student or practitioner—understand better what he is trying to achieve. Another and perhaps more important lesson that can be drawn from comparing liability for negligent misstatements is that in this field of “professional negligence” the traditional compartmentalisation of obligations into contractual and tortious lacks explanatory power. (Cf. Cartwright (1997) 13 Constr LJ 157). These observations will be best understood if read in conjunction with the text in chap. 2 section 2(d)(iii), above, and the notes to cases 11–13. (For further details about the topics discussed above see in addition to those already referred to: Bamm, “Entwicklungstendenzen der Expertenhaftung”, JZ 1991, 373; Ebke, “Die Haftung des Wirtschaftsprüfers für fahrlässig verursachte Vermögensschäden Dritter”, WM 1991, 398; Hopt “Nichtvertragliche Haftung außerhalb von Schadens- und Bereicherungsausgleich”, AcP 183 (1983) 608; Lang, “Die Rechtsprechung des Bundesgerichtshofes zur Dritthaftung der Wirtschaftsprüfer und anderer Sachverständiger”, WM 1988, 1001; Müller, “Wirtschaftsprüfer und vereidigte Buchprüfer als Sachverständige und Gutachter”, WPK-Mitt 1991, 3; Schneider “Die Reichweite der Expertenhaftung gegenüber Dritten”, ZHR 163 (1999) 246 and Bosch ibid. at p. 274 with further references.)

5. The (German) case law regime just described is, as indicated at the beginning of this section, modified wherever the statutory regime takes precedence. This is the situation in the Caparo type of case where the result reached by the House of Lords is acceptable also to German law. (Cf. von Bar’s comprehensive review of the Caparo case from a comparative perspective “Liability for Information and Opinions Causing Pure Economic Loss to Third Parties” in The Growing Convergence, ed. Markesinis, (1994) 98, 125). Contrast now case 24 on statutory audit under § 323 HGB. Caparo, it will be recalled, dealt with a “statutory” audit, prepared for the company but relied upon (to their detriment) by (a) existing and (b) potential shareholders of the said company. The Court of Appeal allowed the first (but not the second) to recover their losses, but the House of Lords overturned the decision denying both categories of plaintiff all redress against the negligent accountants. The same solution as in Caparo would still follow in German law if the result were to be determined solely by the wording of § 323 of the Commercial Code (HGB) which specifically regulates the legal position of auditors in the case of “mandatory audits” (Pflichtprüfungen viz., the formation audit, the annual audits, and “special” reports) and which limits the auditor’s liability for negligent breach of his duties to the company only. (For an English version of the text see: Business Transactions in Germany, Gen. Ed. Ruester, N.Y., Matthew Bender (1990). For a more detailed account in German see: Ebke, Wirtschaftsprüfer und Dritthaftung (1983), esp. pp. 38–43; 56–60.) Shareholders and potential shareholders are, thus, excluded for the purview of this paragraph. (This has been confirmed in case 24 though see, below, comments on the wider effect of this case which introduced a significant extension of this type of liability for statutory audit and, to that extent, may have caused the two systems to part company). And they are also denied an action under § 823 II BGB because § 323 HGB is not regarded as a protective norm (Schutzgesetz). (This has been well established for some time. See: Aktiengesetz Kommentar, 13th edn. by Baumbach, Hueck and Schulze (1968) § 168, no. 7; Aktiengesetz Kommentar by Gessler, Hefermehl, Eckhardt and Kropff, vol. III (1973) § 168, no. 31; Kölner Kommentar zum Aktiengesetz by Zoellner, vol. II (1971), § 168, no. 16. These are commentaries on § 168 of the Aktiengesetz which is now to be found as § 323 of the Commercial Code, quoted in the text above. See now Hopt Handelsgesetzbuch Kommentar (30th edn., 2000) § 323 HGB no. 8.) This restrictive interpretation is reinforced by § 340b (5) of the Aktiengesetz which deals with the potential liability of auditors in the event of mergers. For in this second instance, liability is expressly extended towards “the companies participating in the merger and their shareholders”.

As already indicated in the previous paragraph, § 323 I HGB provides that if the auditor negligently fails to comply with his duties he is liable only to the company in question (and if an associated company sustains loss also to this company). Until this seminal judgment was published this was understood as implying that any other third party was prevented from suing the auditor. It thus came as a surprise that the BGH, in case 24, did not endorse fully this widely held view. While the court there acknowledged that the “legislative intention” which was expressed in this provision was “to limit appropriately the risk of the auditor’s liability”, it also stressed that this provision did not have an “exclusionary” effect. The consequence of such an approach is that the auditor could in principle owe a duty also to persons not expressly mentioned in § 323 HGB. This was the case where the auditor (contractually) undertook to perform his service without prejudicing the interests of a third party, in the instant case a purchaser of the company. It is not entirely clear whether this requires that the auditor issues a statement in addition to the actual audit before his liability widens to include third parties. In the somewhat unusual facts of the case in question, the auditor had confirmed to a second auditor employed by the purchaser that he would stand by the views expressed in the annual report. (The better view would seem to be that this extended liability is engaged only if such an additional statement is made. On this, see Canaris ZHR 163 (1999) 206, 208.) A consequence of this restrictive reading would be that in respect of the statutory audit, itself, no liability would arise in relation to third parties. But that does not affect the striking feature of the decision which is that such an undertaking was said to flow from the intentions of the parties and that it had been conclusively declared. Once again, therefore, one must express serious doubts as to whether the auditor was actually willing to accept liability beyond that which normally flows from § 323 HGB, especially in the light of the pre-existing and restrictive understanding of that provision. (See Ebke, “Abschlußprüfer, Bestätigungsvermerk und Drittschutz”, JZ 1998, 991, 993.) The inescapable impression thus is that the duty is imposed by law with consequences which may not have yet been fully fathomed by the (German) courts. For, as Professor Ebke remarked: “If the intention of the parties as expressed in the contract no longer determines the existence and extent of liability and this is allowed to turn on ‘objective interests’ and the third party’s reliance, then the choice of the [contracting] parties and their right to determine the extent of their obligations will take second place. A result-orientated risk allocation that does not flow from the will of the parties will then become predominant.” This in turn is difficult to reconcile with those decisions in which it was held that § 323 HGB was not a provision which acquires protective effects towards third parties within the framework of § 823 II BGB already referred to, not to mention traditional contract dogma.

6. In this context, of particular interest is a decision of the BGH in 1985 where one reason given for the enlargement of the auditor's liability was the existence of mandatory liability insurance according to § 54 of the Accountants' Regulations (Wirtschaftsprüferordnung, WPO). (See, BGH WM 1985, 450, nos. 6 and 8). Also relevant may be the fact that under the WPO the auditors are allowed to make use of the General Commissioning Terms for Chartered Accountants (Allgemeine Auftragsbedingungen für Wirtschaftsprüfer) which restrict or (in certain circumstances) eliminate their liability. Statutes such as the General Conditions of Business of 1977, now contained in §§ 305–310 BGB, may also help define the ambit of liability and thus, de facto, limit litigation by reference to the amount of insurance coverage. (See: BGH NJW 1987, 1758, 1760.) One should add that if third parties are entitled to sue auditors, now subject however to the uncertain implications of the decision in case 23 above, they can be opposed by all the defences that may be available to auditors as a result of their contracts with the commissioning company. The contractual nature of this action makes this point obvious, whereas it would be more problematic if the action were tortious in nature.

7. Negligent statement relied upon by third persons have proved as troublesome in the USA as in other systems and, if anything, the case law here is both enormous in its volume and not possible to reconcile. The reasons for the difficulties inherent in this subject are many. First is the belief—not always factually correct—that words travel more than acts and can thus raise the spectrum of truly “indeterminate liability” in terms of time and persons. Second is the fact that the audited client retains a good deal of control over the records upon which the auditor bases his report. Thirdly, and not entirely unrelated to the previous point, is the fact that auditors will rarely be in a position to estimate anywhere near as accurately as will be necessary, the extent of their potential liability. This “informational asymmetry” has been examined more in the USA than in England by academic literature. (See, for instance, Siliciano, “Negligent Accounting and the Limits of Instrumental Tort Reform”, 86 Michigan L. Rev. 1929 (1988). Finally, a few courts in the USA have also argued that its in most cases open to the plaintiff/lender to arrange to become a client of the auditor if he really wishes to be able to rely on his report. (See, Bily v. Arthur Young & Co., 834 P. 2d 745 (1992). Situations of negligent misrepresentations can take an infinite variety of factual forms. These have been systematically analysed by Lorenz, “Das Problem der Haftung für primäre Vermögensschäden bei der Erteilung einer unrichtigen Auskunft”, Festschrift K. Larenz (1973) 575. Here suffice it to divide them into two groups.

In the first, the defendant makes a statement (usually a report) to the person who asked for it (and, invariably, paid for it) but knows that it will be relied upon by a specified third person. OLG München BB 1956, 866 is such a case and it is discussed along with other similar cases in Lawson and Markesinis, I, 83 ff. In the USA this situation is usually described as being covered by the “privity or near privity rule”. It finds an excellent illustration in Glanzer v. Shepard, 233 NY 236, 135 NE 275 (1922). That German law based its solution on contract whereas the American law opted for tort is mostly a matter of “emphasis”, as Cardozo J put it, adding that if necessary he, too, could have based his decision on contract. (For further German decisions see, inter alia, BGH WM 1965, 287; BGH WM 1963, 913.)

Real difficulties appear in the second type of situation where A commissions the (negligently prepared) report from B and then shows it to others who rely on it to their detriment. Case 19 (WM 1979, 548) is such a case and it is here that the problem of “indeterminate liability”, so well identified by Cardozo J in Ultramares Marine Corp. v. Touche, 255 NY 170, 174 NE 441 (1931), rears its ugly head. The courts, if they abandon strict adherence to the privity requirement (as they are nowadays inclined to do), are, in such cases, forced to seek a balance between two opposing positions. The first is liability resting on pure foresight (or some equivalent concept). The second is liability based only on a form of direct nexus between the representor and the representee of the kind found in the aforementioned decision of the Court of Appeal of Munich or in the Glanzer decision. (Yet a third option, available to some plaintiffs, is to rely on statutory enactments such as ss. 11 and 12 of the (American) Securities Act of 1932 or s. 18 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934. But such actions have been of limited use to ordinary investors or creditors besides suffering from the drawback of a short—one year—limitation period. For the protection currently afforded by federal securities law see Kraakman, “Gatekeepers: The Anatomy of a Third-Party Enforcement Strategy?” 2 J. of Law, Econ. and Org. 53 (1986).)

The USA provides, as one would expect, the greatest variety of court-devised techniques to avoid the strictures of the Ultramares rule. Thus some courts, while not overruling Ultramares, appear to be extending the rationale of the Glanzer decision (third party can recover only if he is “the end and aim of the transaction”). See, for example, White v. Guarente 43 NY 2d 356, 372 NE 2d 315 (NY 1977); Credit Alliance Corp. v. Arthur Andersen and Co., 476 NYS 2d 539 (1984); rev’d in 483 NE 2d 110, 493 NYS 2d 435 (1985); amended 489 NE 2d 249 (1985). According to this approach, if A prepares a report for B for a particular purpose knowing that C will, in furtherance of that purpose, rely upon the said report, then he will be liable to C if there is evidence of some conduct linking A to C and evincing A’s understanding of C’s reliance on his report. Though these conditions may represent a modification of the Ultramares tough stance, the court in Credit Alliance was eager to stress its willingness to adhere to the policy objectives set out in Ultramares. So, in the absence of some actual and meaningful contact between A and C—for instance a mere telephone exchange between A and C will not suffice. (Security Pacific Business Credit, Inc. v. Peat Marwick Main & Co., 597 NE 2d 1080.)—there will be no liability. A New Jersey statute (New Jersey Stat. Ann. 2A: 53A-25) adopts a similar position and spares the accountant of all liability unless he knew the specific plaintiff and the specific transaction for which his report was intended; and four further States—Arkansas (Ark Code Ann § 16-114-302, (1995)), Illinois (Ill Ann Stat chap. 225 (1993)), Kansas (Kan Stat Ann § 1-402 (1991)), Utah (Utah Code Ann § 58-26-12 (1996)) and Wyoming (Wyo Stat § 33-3-201 (1995)) have passed analogous but differently phrased limiting legislation.

A more middling or flexible approach is that advocated by the Restatement (Second) of Torts, para. 552 (1977) which rejects the private requirement and renders accountants liable not only to those persons whom they intended to influence but also towards the persons whom the accountants know that their clients intended to influence. Rusch Factors, Inc. v. Levin, 284 F. Supp. 85 (DRI 1968) offers an early illustration, the court in that case being influenced by a tentative draft of the Restatement. (Note that the Rusch decision (at p. 93) talks of an “actually foreseen and limited class of persons” [italics supplied]. Whereas the German decision, while agreeing with the idea that the identity of the relying person need not be known to the representor, insists that he must be “part of a calculable group of persons”.) Ohio (Haddon View Investment Co. v. Coopers and Lybrand, 436 NE 2d 212, 70 Ohio St. 2d 154 (1982)) and New Hampshire (Spherex, Inc. v. Alexander Grant and Co., 122 N.H. 898, 451 A. 2d 1308 (1982)) were among the early converts to this rule. For other important decisions see: Raritan River Steel Co. v. Cherry, Bekaert & Holland, 367 SE 2d 609 (1988); Bily v. Arthur Young & Co., 834 P. 2d 745 (1992) (indisputably a leading case); Boykin v. Arthur Andersen & Co., 639 So. 2d 504 (1994); Nycal Corp. v. KPMG Peat Marwick LLP, 426 Mass. 491, 688 N.E 2d 1368 (1998). But the interpretative “refinements” attempted by some courts may have also made possible for “daring” practitioners or judges to go beyond the (undoubtedly) ambiguous wording of the Restatement (which, itself, has not escaped criticism). Thus in Marcus Bros. Textiles, Inc. v. Price Waterhouse, LLP, 350 NC 214 (1999) the Supreme Court of North Carolina “clarified” its aforementioned judgment in Raritan and held that actual knowledge by the accountant of those persons who might rely on the accountant’s opinion is not necessary under Restatement 552, general business practices from which such reliance can be inferred being sufficient. And NYCAL Corp. v. KPMG Peat Marwick LLP, 426 Mass 491 (1998) the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, while following the Restatement rule, emphasized that its test would be construed in a way as to require the accountant to have actual knowledge of the limited—though unnamed—group of potential [third parties]” (Emphasis added.).

Finally, a number of minority decisions have moved towards the adoption of the most liberal test namely that of pure foreseeability. Thus see: H. Rosenblum, Inc. v. Adler, 93 NJ 324, 461 A. 2d 138 (1983) (now rejected by the legislator: see statute mentioned above). See, also Citizens State Bank v. Timm, Schmidt and Co. 335 NW 2d 361 (1983); International Mortgage Co. v. John P Butler Accountancy Corp. 223 Cal. Rptr. 218 (1986); Touche Ross v. Commercial Union Ins., 514 So. 2d 315 (1987) (Mississippi). Yet even in these States, a variety of limitations help keep matters under control.

Wisconsin, for instance, the Supreme Court in its aforementioned decision in Citizens State Bank was eager to stress that liability would not be imposed where the harm was found to be too remote, disproportionate, or financially crushing. This approach may evince some awareness of the realities that troubled Cardozo; but it also suggests judicial reliance been placed more on causative notions rather than on the duty of care (with all the drawbacks that this approach may entail, especially in a jury dependant system.) Additionally, all States insist that “justifiable reliance” is a sine qua non. Thus a North Carolina court held that reliance on the audit, not directly but through a summary of it produced in a Dun & Bradstreet report, was not sufficient. (Raritan, above.)

The literature on the subject is enormous. An excellent review can be found in Guerici, “Liability of Independent Accountant to Investors or Shareholders”, 48 ALR 5th 389 (1997). From the more recent literature see: Sinason, “Gaining a New Balance in Accountants’ Liability to Nonclients for Negligence: Recent Developments and Emerging Trends”, 103 Com. L.J. 15 (1998); Young et al., “Financial Reporting and the Accounting Profession: The Whirlwind Continues”, 1151 PLI/ Corp 95 (1999).

8. English law, too, has vacillated on this topic in a manner which has been as confusing as it is difficult to summarise with any pretence to accuracy. The modern law starts with Candler v. Crane Christmas and Co. [1951] 2 KB 164 which, though denying recovery to the plaintiff, opened the door for future developments through the prophetic dissent of Denning LJ (as he then was). Some fifteen years later heresy was transformed into orthodoxy by the seminal judgment of the House of Lords in Hedley Byrne and Co. Ltd. v. Heller and Partners Ltd. [1964] AC 465. The rule was then settled that there would be liability for careless statements causing pure economic loss provided there was a “special relationship” between the plaintiff and the defendant and there was no disclosure of liability. “Special relationship” has obviously been a key phrase; and it has been subsequently interpreted to include a friend giving advice seriously though not in a professional context (Chaudry v. Prabhaker [1989] 1 WLR 29). Earlier attempts to narrow the Hedley Byrne rule only to cases where the party making the statement professed to give that kind of advice or held himself out as possessing special skills also proved unsuccessful. See: Mutual Life and Citizens’ Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Evatt [1971] AC 793; Esso Petroleum Co. Ltd. v. Mardon [1976] QB 801.

The 1960s and 1970s found the English courts in an imaginative and expansionist mode. This can be seen in English administrative law, but it is also obvious in the decisions dealing with liability for negligent misstatement. Thus, in Ministry of Housing and Local Government v. Sharp [1970] 2 QB 223 two further extensions were made to the Hedley Byrne principle. (In Hedley Byrne A made a false statement to B who relied on it to his detriment; in Sharp A made the statement to B (who never repeated it to C) but it was C who suffered the loss and was allowed to recover. Secondly, in Hedley Byrne the plaintiff’s loss was actual expenditure whereas in Sharp the harm suffered was failure to recover a sum that had become due). And a potentially more far-reaching extension came in JEB Fasteners Ltd. v. Marks, Bloom and Co. [1981] 3 All ER 289. For there liability was not based on the Hedley Byrne rule (which requires the establishment of a “special relationship”) but on the more amorphous neighbourhood rule of Donoghue v. Stevenson [1932] AC 562 (which also provided the justification for the legal malpractice rule of Ross v. Caunters [1980] Chap. 297. In the latter case, however, it will be recalled that the economic loss was not caused by a false statement but by a negligent attestation of a will.

More recently, however, this expansionist mood has been checked. And in some cases this was accompanied by severely restricting dicta found in a long series of decisions expressing disapproval of the liberal tendencies which peaked with the decision of the House of Lords in Junior Books v. Veitchi [1938] 1 AC 520. (The case also involving pure economic loss though caused by negligent deeds, not words). In the context of negligent misstatements, the leading judgment can be found in Caparo v. Dickman [1990] 2 AC 605 where the House of Lords overruled an interesting and well thought-out judgment of the Court of Appeal. For in that case the House of Lords refused to hold that the auditors of a company owed a duty of care towards the shareholders of the company who suffered losses by purchasing shares in that company by relying on that report. The judgments of at least two Law Lords—Lords Bridge and Jauncey—suggest that liability can only arise if the statement was both intended to be relied upon for a particular purpose and was, in fact, relied upon. This, in the opinion of their Lordships, was not satisfied in this case. See, also, Al Saudi Banque v. Clarke Pixley [1990] Chap. 313 (company auditors not liable to a bank who lent to the company on the strength of their report); The Morning Watch [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep. 547 (Lloyds Register, reporting on the condition of a vessel at the request of the owner, not liable to potential purchaser who relies on their report). As always, the plethora of dicta, often with relatively minor verbal variations, may one day enable a shift to more liberal positions, analogous to those one finds in some leading German judgments. For the time being, however, the following statements may provide a general indication of the current state of English law. Thus, in Smith v. Eric S Bush; Harris v. Wyre Forest District Council [1990] 1 AC 831, 865, Lord Griffiths stressed "that in cases where the advice has not been given for the specific purpose of the recipient acting upon it, it should only be in cases when the adviser knows that there is a high degree of probability that some other identifiable person will act upon the advice that a duty of care should be imposed." Likewise, in Caparo Industries Plc v. Dickman [1990] 2 AC 605, 621 Lord Bridge argued that in these cases it is essential to prove "that the defendant knew that his statement would be communicated to the plaintiff, either as an individual or as a member of an identifiable class, specifically in connection with a particular transaction or transactions of a particular kind (e.g. in a prospectus inviting investment) and that the plaintiff would be very likely to rely on it for the purpose of deciding whether or not to enter upon that transaction or upon a transaction of that kind."

See, also, Lord Oliver's remarks at p. 652.

9. As a postscript one might add that inadequate consideration has been given to a point raised by Lord Justice Bingham in the Caparo case ([1989] QB 653, 689 et seq.) namely that the finding of a duty situation in such cases will by no means always lead to liability. For most claims would very likely fail (or would be settled at a very early state in the proceedings) on the grounds that no negligence can be proved or that the causation link between negligent misstatement and the loss has not been established. Banque Financière de la Cité SA v. Westgate Insurance Co. Ltd. [1991] 2 AC 249 supports this assertion though, given the paucity of case law on this point, this view in the text is only advanced as a tentative one.

10. As has been suggested in Chap. 2 A (d) (iii), the different points of departure of German and English law are linked to the understanding of the doctrine of consideration in England (but not the USA). This has led to a “rigid” contract law which, in turn, has encouraged the expansion of tort law in order to meet new legal challenges, less known in the nineteenth century, such as product liability, liability for negligent statements and the like. In Germany the legal pressures were in the reverse. Strict if not rigidly conceived tort provisions (e.g. § 823 I BGB, § 831 etc) have meant that the pressure to meet the very same challenges had to be applied to the inherently more pliable law of contract since German tort law could not meet them. (On this see Markesinis (1987) 103 LQR 354; as late as 1993 Fleming arrived at a similar conclusion, (1993) 5 Canterbury L Rev 269, 279.) More recent developments require that the above picture be now modified, at any rate as far as English law is concerned. For, despite the fact that as we have seen some academic commentators would favour an extra-contractual approach to the problem of professional negligence, the BGH does not seem to be inclined to abandon the contractual analyses. But in recent years, English law has seen two remarkable developments that have a considerable potential to boost contract law and open new routes of recovery which might diminish the need to resort to the tort of negligence in the field of economic loss.

The first check on the expansion of tort law has come about with the adoption of the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 (extracts of which are reproduced as Addendum 2) which implemented the long-standing proposals of the Law Commission. (See, Law Com No. 242 (1996).) With the new Act, much of the criticised rigidity of the English law of contract has disappeared. This, of course, does not mean that the recognition of contracts for the benefit of a third party will bring about the abolition of the rule that a third party cannot, generally speaking, derive rights from the contract. German law, which has known this institution for a long time now, proves as much. But it does mean that the 1999 Act adds another and wide-ranging exception to the privity doctrine even if it does not replace it with a different general rule. (See Treitel Law of Contract (10th edn. 1999) p. 600.) The doctrine of privity or, to use the German term “relativity of contract”, will thus continue to apply “to prevent strangers from enforcing a contract.” (Flannigan (1987) 103 LQR 564.) But the effect of importing the concept of a contract for the benefit of a third party into English law will be to allow a third party whom the original parties intended to benefit from their agreement to enforce such an agreement. The question, therefore, arises whether the Act will enable the range of claimants who previously resorted to tort remedies to base henceforth their claims on the new Act rather than to try and dress them up in tort clothing.

Under the Act the third party has a direct remedy in contract against the promisor. At this point, comparative analysis leads one to include a word of caution. Although in Germany contracts for the benefit of a third party have long been recognised, German jurists have been compelled to develop additional techniques and devices to deal with those problems which are also the most difficult ones to slot into the “correct” category. Cases involving negligent misstatements are an example. The central provision of the English Act is its test of enforceability contained in s. 1(1). According to this section a contract is for the benefit of a third party if it purports to confer a benefit on an expressly identified (including identifiable by class) third party, s. 1(3). Under the first limb of the test, s. 1(1)(a), the parties expressly declare the contract to be one in favour of a third party. The more difficult to apply is, obviously, the second limb, s. 1(1)(b). It is interesting to note that the English Act opted for a presumption in favour of such a contract if the contract confers a benefit on a third party, a solution which was rejected by the fathers of the BGB as being too sweeping (see § 328 BGB). (See, Kötz "Rights of Third Parties" in International Encyclopaedia of Comparative Law Vol. VII chap. 13 (1992), p. 22.) One might be tempted therefore to conclude that the scope of application of the Act is extremely wide. However, on closer analysis one can see that this will not be the case. For the presumption is founded on a specific preconception of a classic contract for the benefit of a third party which is very similar to that presupposed by § 328 BGB. The wording is meant to convey this even if the restriction envisaged by the Commission is not an easy one. The distinction relevant to the second limb is that between "to confer" a benefit and merely being (incidentally) "of" benefit. The first situation triggers the presumption and corresponds to the classic contract for a benefit of a third party. The special feature of it is that the third party is meant to be able to enforce the contract as a whole, s. 1(5), including for instance the right to rescind a contract or, where available, to seek specific performance. In the case of negligent misstatements these considerations do not apply. In these cases the promisee is entitled to the remedies under the contract and is meant to be the only party who can do so. It is only where the service is performed negligently and causes damage to a third party that the third party might acquire a right to hold the promisor liable in damages. But this isolated interest in the performance of the contract is not sufficient to bring the negligent misstatement cases under the principles flowing from the classic contract for the benefit of a third party. This insight lies at the heart of the contract with protective effects towards third parties. The BGH, following the teachings of Professor Larenz, (NJW 1959, 1976) did not regard the situations in the cases reproduced above to justify the application of § 328 BGB. These provisions apply only by analogy; and as case 23 shows the analogy does not always point to the right direction either (regarding § 334 BGB which corresponds to s. 3(3)). The Commission expressly sought to exclude White v. Jones (reproduced in part as Addendum to case 27 below and which will be discussed in more detail in the next section, No. 7) from the application of the Act, where primary performance was not owed to the third party but where the third party was, nonetheless, affected by a defective performance of the contract (Law Com. No. 242 (1996) para. 7.17–7.52). This analysis applies mutatis mutandis to most of the negligent misstatement cases. Another indication that the Commission regarded the second limb as confined to cases where the parties intended to grant the third party "primary enforcement" is contained in para. 7.25, note 22. The commissioners stressed that the intention test did not embrace the wider German concept of a contract with protective effects towards third parties (reference to Markesinis (1987) 103 LQR 354). Ironically enough, as a result of these refinements of the presumption contained in s. 1(1)(b), the 1999 Act is limited in a very similar way as the German (classic) contract for the benefit of a third party. However, unlike German law, these provisions cannot be applied analogically to those situations traditionally falling under the contract with protective effects towards third parties. So the tort of negligence, as explained in cases such as White v. Jones and Henderson v. Merrett (extracts of which are reproduced below as Addendum to case 27), will continue to play a crucial role in establishing liability. If the second limb of the enforceability test will be constructed in the way the Commission suggests, comparative law could thus provide invaluable assistance in deciding in which circumstances a contract "confers a benefit" in a third party, i.e. the presumption is raised. (See for "typical fact situations" in which § 328 BGB applies: Kötz International Encyclopaedia of Comparative Law Vol. VII chap. 13 (1992) pp. 27ff.; Lorenz "Contracts and Third-Party Rights in German and English Law" in Markesinis (ed.) The Growing Convergence (1994) pp. 65ff. and Markesinis et al. The German Law of Obligations vol. I, pp. 261ff.) Finally, it should be noted also that there is one clear exception from the principle that the third party is entitled to "primary performance" of the contract. The 1999 Act applies where an exclusion clause is meant to benefit a third party, then the third party can enforce this (and only this) isolated provision of the contract. The fact that this is an exception is also confirmed by the realisation that the parallel situation in German law is regarded as an instance not of the classic contract for the benefit of a third party but as one of the contract with protective effects towards third parties. (See case 57 and also notes to case 27, below.)

11. At this juncture, a brief excursus into a related area is desirable. It deals with the reform in the area of carriage of goods by sea introduced by the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1992. (Within its scope of application the 1999 Act does not apply (according to s. 6(5)) to these cases, except that a third party may in reliance on s. 1 avail himself of an exclusion or limitation of liability in such a contract). One of the problems that the Act tried to address was that in some cases loss and remedy part company. Thus, while one party may have had the interest in the goods (or carried the mercantile risk), the rights under the bill of lading might lie in the hands of another. In The Albazero [1977] AC 774 the House of Lords favoured a contractual solution to the problem allowing, in principle, recovery of damages in a contractual action on behalf of a third party. However, the perceived drawback of this solution was that the third party could not compel the promisee to bring such an action. In the Court of Appeal in The Aliakmon ([1985] QB 350) Robert Goff LJ was thus persuaded to attempt to create a tort remedy based on the "principle of transferred loss". This would have enabled the third party to sue the carrier directly even though he did not have a proprietary interest in the goods or possession of them at any material time. In the House of Lords ([1986] AC 785, 817–818), Lord Brandon of Oakbrook refused to follow this line of reasoning mainly because he did not accept that there was, in this respect, a lacuna of English law. The learned judge was also suspicious of the new remedy on doctrinal grounds since, in his eyes, it amounted to a derivative action, which was contrary to its tortious nature. For the special feature of the transferred loss principle was that the liability of the carrier was "contractually flavoured" in so far as the duty owed to the third party was shaped by the underlying duty to the goods owner. This, in turn, was determined by the exclusion and limitation clauses contained in the contract of carriage as contained in or evinced by the bill of lading. In 1992 the problem was remedied by statute, Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1992. (The main impetus for the Act, however was not the decision in The Aliakmon but difficulties arising from modern forms of carriage, in particular the carriage of goods in bulk. (On this see Reynolds [1986] LMCLQ 97). The transfer of the rights under the bill of lading was no longer dependant upon a transfer of ownership in the goods but turned on the claimant's capacity as lawful holder of the bill of lading. Thus, Lord Goff's concerns were addressed and his ingenious theory did not have to be pursued any further. Not for the time being at least.

12. The second and perhaps more significant extension of contract occurred in the context of the promisee's remedies in respect of a third party's loss. In St. Martins Property Corporation Ltd. v. Sir Robert McAlpine Ltd. [1994] 1 AC 85 the principle in The Albazero was transferred to construction law. The essence of this development is an increasingly liberal attitude towards contractual claims by which a promisee is not suing for loss sustained by himself but is seeking to recover damages on behalf of a third party. (This area of the law has, in both systems, expressly been left to the courts; see chap. 2 A 1.). The key decisions are St. Martins, Darlington BC v. Wiltshier Northern Ltd. [1995] 1 WLR 68 and, most recently, Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd. v. Panatown Ltd. (extracts of which are reproduced as Addendum 3). In these cases contractual remedies were extended to cover situations where a building employer is not the owner of the development site at the time of the breach of the building contract and, as a result, (arguably) suffers no financial loss. The builder/defendant in these cases based his defence on the "no loss argument". However, the courts allowed recovery in contract of substantial damages in respect of the site owner's loss. To hold otherwise, they stressed, would mean allowing a meritorious claim to disappear into a “legal black hole”. The need for a contractual solution, or, more crucially, the very danger of the “black hole”, can be traced to the change of heart by the House of Lords in Murphy towards the builder’s liability in tort. For, prior to that case, third parties to a building contract (for instance third party purchasers) could often avail themselves of the Anns type of remedy and recover pure economic loss in tort. In the seminal case of Panatown this re-orientation towards and rediscovery of contract principles reached a new peak. For not only was the contract route to recovery reinforced; but by a majority their lordships laid the foundation for an even more flexible approach to contractual actions where the performance of a service benefits as a matter of fact a third party. This new approach lays emphasis on the fact that a building employer is entitled to substantial damages because he does not get what he bargained for, whether or not he suffered a financial loss as a result of the breach. (See Lord Griffiths’ speech in St. Martins, Beale (1995) 9 Journal of Contract Law 104 and Coote [1997] CLJ 537) It also brings English contract law closer to the typical features of German contract law. In the present context it is, of course, impossible to appreciate fully the impact of this remarkable decision. (For details of this development see Cartwright (1996) 10 Journal of Contract Law 244; Coote (2001) 117 LQR 81; Treitel (1998) 114 LQR 527 and Wallace (1999) 115 LQR 394). A few remarks, however, may help bring out more clearly our comparative observations and explore some future developments.

There is little doubt that the Panatown line of cases re-opens contractual avenues in the area of construction law. For they enable promisees to recover substantial damages even though they were not the owners of the development site at any material time and, arguably, did not suffer a financial loss as a result of the breach. Whether this remedy is more satisfactorily analysed as a remedy whereby one recovers a third party’s loss (or his own) cannot be decided here. For this depends on a series of intricate points such as the promisee’s accountability to the third party, the relevance of direct third party rights, and so forth. Suffice it, however, to say that a majority in Panatown denied recovery of damages on both grounds where the third party could sue himself, regardless of the theoretical basis of the promisee’s remedy. In the present instance, the building owner could have sued on the basis of a so-called duty of care deed. This result seems somewhat harsh. For that limited, direct right of action was merely meant to fill the gap left by Murphy and provide protection to subsequent purchasers or tenants (cf. Lewis (1997) 13 Constr LJ 305) but arguably not to substitute liability under the building contract itself. (Cf. Lords Millett and Goff dissents). St. Martins also presents an ironical twist. For Lord Clyde saw it as an example of Lord Goff’s theory of “transferred loss” (at p. 529). The latter, however, though the inventor of the theory (in The Aliakmon), and user of it in White v. Jones ([1995] 2 AC 207,267) in relation to the construction cases (St. Martins), abandoned it in Panatown in the belief that he had not used the term with “any great accuracy”. (See, p. 557.) One wonders, however, whether the principle of transferred loss should be discarded without more since it performs a useful function. (See, Unberath (1999) 115 LQR 535.) Moreover, this “retreat” from the principle of transferred loss is all the more regrettable as that principle shows similarities to the German concept of Drittschadensliquidation, at least in so far as its function is concerned. Thus, contrary to Lord Goff’s pessimistic statement that “the concept is not an easy one for a common lawyer to grasp”, it enhances the comparability of the positions adopted in the two jurisdictions. Lord Goff had himself emphasised this extra judicially (The Gradual Convergence (Ed. B Markesinis) (1994) at pp. 129 f.). His hesitation to base his decision on a concept that allowed recovery of third party loss must however be understood in the light of his overall strategy in the latter case. Lord Goff preferred to explain the promisee’s remedy as being founded on loss suffered by himself rather than the building owner. The employer did not get what he bargained for: a building according to the specifications of the contract. It would be “absurd” if he could not recover substantial damages (measured by the cost of cure) as a result. Thus Lord Goff followed the direction indicated by Lord Griffiths in St. Martins. Seen in this light, his reluctance to adhere to a principle “invented” by him in The Aliakmon for taking care of third party losses, was understandable.

13. In any event, the solution favoured by Lord Goff is not far removed from the German approach, as the learned Lord was ready to admit. For he pointed out that the rights of a building employer under §§ 633–639 BGB were vested in the customer and that there was no indication that the situation was different if a third party owned the property on which the work was done. Certainly the right to have the defect remedied by the builder, restitution in lieu of termination, price reduction are not dependent upon the building employer having sustained a financial loss as a result of a defective performance. (The position is more difficult to ascertain in relation to the right to recover damages.) Thus far then we can indeed observe that the solutions of the two systems coincide. There is only a conceptual difference in that the employer's right is according to Lord Goff framed in terms of a right to substantial damages measured by the cost of cure while the rights mentioned above are not rights which entitle the promisee to recover damages, especially the right to have the defect cured is a variant of specific performance. The rationale behind this approach has been best described by Professor Treitel in the International Encyclopedia of Comparative Law Vol. VII chap. 16 (1976) p. 6 as the concept of "enforced performance". From this point of view Lord Goff's approach constitutes a remarkable step towards protecting the right to the performance of a contract and a departure from a mere loss focussed theory of contractual remedies. In respect of the right to recover damages for defective performance the position of German law is more difficult to ascertain. It should be noted however that German courts also allow recovery of damages in respect of a third party's loss (the site owner) in contract. Cases 25 and 26 illustrate this point. Case 25 first of all shows that such claims by a promisee on behalf of a third party are meant to enable the promisee to enforce the contract and therefore are not excluded by a direct right in tort. One might add for the sake of completeness that in carriage of goods (by land) situations German law combines the contract for the benefit of a third party with third party loss recovery and as a consequence allows recovery of damages on behalf of a third party even if the third party has a direct action in contract (§ 421 HGB; cf. Basedow Münchener Kommentar zum HGB vol. 7 (1997) § 429 Rn. 52; Herber NJW 1999, 3297, 3302; Helm Haftung für Schäden an Frachtgütern (1966) 164). Case 26 suggests that even though German law follows the principle accurately described as enforced performance it is sometimes nevertheless necessary to allow recovery of damages in respect of a third party's loss, for instance in the case at hand as far as consequential loss is concerned. We can note that overall German law is characterised by a great degree of flexibility with regard to the rights of a promisee to enforce the contract but also regarding recovery of third party loss. One caveat must be added. The concept of Drittschadensliquidation is confined to particular types of situations and is not freely available to third party claimants (see cases 13 and 61 which contain guidelines as to when it is available, and pp. 64 ff.). It has for instance not been applied to problems of product liability or the negligent misstatements situations discussed above, for they do not involve a transfer of a loss to a different person than the contracting party but increase the risk of liability: the product or the statement might cause loss to the contracting party but also to a per se indeterminate number of third parties. Therefore, additional controlling factors are necessary which reasonably limit liability and which are not and cannot be provided by the more limited and special principle of transferred loss (see notes 1–5 above).

Finally, it is important to stress that Lord Clyde, as well, drew comparisons with German law. He referred to German law in order to underline that the concept of a contract for the benefit of a third party may provide a satisfactory solution in certain so-called "homely" examples, for instance in the notorious Jackson v. Horizon Holidays Ltd. [1975] 1 WLR 1468 situation. (Cf. Law Com. No. 242 (1996) para. 7.40). Lord Clyde's comments must be welcomed. For English law, after its over due abolition of the traditional doctrine of privity can benefit from the experience that German law has gained by working on this concept over many decades. (Cf. Steyn's LJ, strongly expressed dissatisfaction with the traditional doctrine of privity in Darlington BC v. Wiltshier Northern Ltd. [1995] 1 WLR 68, 76).

14. So let us conclude by returning to our starting point, namely to the interrelation between economic loss and contract. These two developments in contemporary English law—the privity reform and the increased availability of contractual remedies where third parties are affected by the defective performance of a contract for the performance of a service—reveal an important reversal. (Especially if compared with the pre-Murphy v. Brentwood District Council [1991] 1 AC 398 state of affairs.) The conservative approach to economic loss in that case has been weighed down by an unforeseen extension of contractual devices. This interrelationship between contract and tort (in the area of economic loss) is reinforced more specifically by the observation that the extension in the area of construction was prompted by the change of approach to economic loss in Murphy, itself.

However, one should bear in mind that the thesis of an expanding tort law before Murphy and an expanding contract law after Murphy have to be understood as mere generalisations of a general trend to which well-established exceptions existed and continue to exist. First, as far the period before Murphy is concerned, it is crucial to note that in the area of carriage of goods the “primacy” of contract was not successfully challenged. The attempt by Lord Goff in The Aliakmon to establish a limited exception to the exclusion of economic loss for a case of relational economic loss was not followed by the House of Lords in the light of the already existing flexibility of contractual solutions. Against this background the recent construction cases appear merely as a natural development, as a rediscovery of the already developed flexibility of contractual remedies in the area of shipping law. Secondly, the contractual solutions developed by English law do not seem to be available to litigants in the area of negligent misstatements; in as much the existing tort law approach founded on Hedley Byrne retains its importance. The Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 will, likewise, rarely apply to Hedley Byrne situations. The other contractual device, the rule in The Albazero, will also be of limited assistance, as was suggested in White v. Jones which will be discussed in more detail in the next part. White v. Jones is, itself, typical of the pre-Murphy period in that the tort solution adopted in that case was preceded by an extensive discussion of the inadequacy of contractual remedies. There is thus room for further expansion and, more importantly, creative comparative thinking.

Extracts from Caparo Industries Plc v. Dickman, House of Lords [1990] 2 AC 605

LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH [After considering the general approach to the duty of care, his Lordship continued:]

The damage which may be caused by the negligently spoken or written word will normally be confined to economic loss sustained by those who rely on the accuracy of the information or advice they receive as a basis for action. The question what, if any, duty is owed by the maker of a statement to exercise due care to ensure its accuracy arises typically in relation to statements made by a person in the exercise of his calling or profession. In advising the client who employs him the professional man owes a duty to exercise that standard of skill and care appropriate to his professional status and will be liable both in contract and in tort for all losses which his client may suffer by reason of any breach of that duty. But the possibility of any duty of care being owed to third parties with whom the professional man was in no contractual relationship was for long denied because of the wrong turning taken by the law in Le Lievre v. Gould [1893] 1 QB 491 in overruling Cann v. Wilson (1888) 39 Chap. D 39. In Candler v. Crane Christmas & Co [1951] 2 KB 164 Denning J, in his dissenting judgment, made a valiant attempt to correct the error. But it was not until the decision of this House in Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v. Heller & Partners Ltd [1964] AC 465 that the law was once more set on the right path.

The salient feature of all these cases is that the defendant giving advice or information was fully aware of the nature of the transaction which the plaintiff had in contemplation, knew that the advice or information would be communicated to him directly or indirectly and knew that it was very likely that the plaintiff would rely on that advice or information in deciding whether or not to engage in the transaction in contemplation. In these circumstances the defendant could clearly be expected, subject always to the effect of any disclaimer of responsibility, specifically to anticipate that the plaintiff would rely on the advice or information given by the defendant for the very purpose for which he did in the event rely on it. So also the plaintiff, subject again to the effect of any disclaimer, would in that situation reasonably suppose that he was entitled to rely on the advice or information communicated to him for the very purpose for which he required it. The situation is entirely different where a statement is put into more or less general circulation and may foreseeably be relied on by strangers to the maker of the statement for any one of a variety of different purposes which the maker of the statement has no specific reason to anticipate. To hold the maker of the statement to be under a duty of care in respect of the accuracy of the statement to all and sundry for any purpose for which they may choose to rely on it is not only to subject him, in the classic words of Cardozo CJ, to “liability in an indeterminate amount for an indeterminate time to an indeterminate class” (see Ultramares Corp. v. Touche (1931) 255 NY 170 at 179), it is also to confer on the world at large a quite unwarranted entitlement to appropriate for their own purposes the benefit of the expert knowledge or professional expertise attributed to the maker of the statement. Hence, looking only at the circumstances of these decided cases where a duty of care in respect of negligent statements has been held to exist, I should expect to find that the “limit or control mechanism . . . imposed on the liability of a wrongdoer towards those who have suffered economic damage in consequence of his negligence” (see the Candlewood case [1986] AC 1 at 25) rested on the necessity to prove in this category of the tort of negligence, as an essential ingredient of the “proximity” between the plaintiff and the defendant, that the defendant knew that his statement would be communicated to the plaintiff, either as an individual or as a member of an identifiable class, specifically in connection with a particular transaction or transactions of a particular kind (e.g. in a prospectus inviting investment) and that the plaintiff would be very likely to rely on it for the purpose of deciding whether or not to enter on that transaction or on a transaction of that kind. . . .

[His Lordship reviewed other authorities, and then considered the position of auditors in relation to the shareholders of a public limited company arising from the provisions of the Companies Act 1985.]

No doubt these provisions establish a relationship between the auditors and the shareholders of a company on which the shareholder is entitled to rely for the protection of his interest. But the crucial question concerns the extent of the shareholder’s interest which the auditor has a duty to protect. The shareholders of a company have a collective interest in the company’s proper management and in so far as a negligent failure of the auditor to report accurately on the state of the company’s finances deprives the shareholders of the opportunity to exercise their client powers in general meeting to call the directors to book and to ensure that errors in of skill management are corrected, the shareholders ought to be entitled to a remedy. But in practice no problem arises in this regard since the interest of the shareholders in the proper management of the company’s affairs is indistinguishable from the interest of the company itself and any loss suffered by the shareholders, e.g. by the negligent failure of the auditor to discover and expose a misappropriation of funds by a director of the company, will be recouped by a claim against the auditor in the name of the company, not by individual shareholders.

I find it difficult to visualise a situation arising in the real world in which the individual shareholder could claim to have sustained a loss in respect of his existing shareholding referable to the negligence of the auditor which could not be recouped by the company. But on this part of the case your Lordships were much pressed with the argument that such a loss might occur by a negligent undervaluation of the company’s assets in the auditor’s report relied on by the individual shareholder in knowing deciding to sell his shares at an undervalue. The argument then runs thus. The shareholder, qua shareholder, is entitled to rely on the auditor’s report as the basis of his investment decision to sell his existing shareholding. If he sells at an undervalue he is entitled to recover the loss from the auditor. There can be no distinction in law effect between the shareholder’s investment decision to sell the shares he has or to buy would additional shares. It follows, therefore, that the scope of the duty of care owed to se for him by the auditor extends to cover any loss sustained consequent on the purchase of additional shares in reliance on the auditor’s negligent report.

I believe this argument to be fallacious. Assuming without deciding that a claim by a shareholder to recover a loss suffered by selling his shares at an undervalue attributable to an undervaluation of the company’s assets in the auditor’s report could be sustained at all, it would not be by reason of any reliance by the shareholder on the of the auditor's report in deciding to sell: the loss would be referable to the depreciatory effect of the report on the market value of the shares before ever the decision of the sundry shareholder to sell was taken. A claim to recoup a loss alleged to flow from the purchase urn, in of overvalued shares, on the other hand, can only be sustained on the basis of the for an purchaser's reliance on the report. The specious equation of "investment decisions" to sell or to buy as giving rise to parallel claims thus appears to me to be untenable. Moreover, the loss in the case of the sale would be of a loss of part of the value of the shareholder's existing holding, which, assuming a duty of care owed to individual shareholders, it might sensibly lie within the scope of the auditor's duty to protect. A loss, on the other hand, resulting from the purchase of additional shares would result from a wholly independent transaction having no connection with the existing shareholding.

I believe it is this last distinction which is of critical importance and which prove demonstrates the unsoundness of the conclusion reached by the majority of the Court of Appeal. It is never sufficient to ask simply whether A owes B a duty of care. It is always necessary to determine the scope of the duty by reference to the kind of damage from which A must take care to save B harmless:

"The question is always whether the defendant was under a duty to avoid or prevent that damage, but the actual nature of the damage suffered is relevant to the existence and extent of any duty to avoid or prevent it."

See Sutherland Shire Council v. Heyman (1985) 60 ALR 1 at 48 per Brennan J.

Assuming for the purpose of the argument that the relationship between the auditor of a company and individual shareholders is of sufficient proximity to give rise to a duty of care, I do not understand how the scope of that duty can possibly extend beyond the protection of any individual shareholder from losses in the value of the shares which he holds. As a purchaser of additional shares in reliance on the auditor's report, he stands in no different position from any other investing member of the public to whom the auditor owes no duty.

I would allow the appeal and dismiss the cross-appeal.

LORD OLIVER OF AYLMEYTON: [After considering the general approach to the duty of care, his Lordship said:]

What can be deduced from the Hedley Byrne case . . . is that the necessary relationship between the maker of a statement or giver of advice (the adviser) and the recipient who acts in reliance on it (the advisee) may typically be held to exist where (1) the advice is required for a purpose, whether particularly specified or generally described, which is made known, either actually or inferentially, to the adviser at the time when the advice is given, (2) the adviser knows, either actually or inferentially, that his advice will be communicated to the advisee, either specifically or as a member of an ascertainable class, in order that it should be used by the advisee for that purpose, (3) it is known, either actually or inferentially, that the advice so communicated is likely to be acted on by the advisee for that purpose without independent inquiry and (4) it is so acted on by the advisee to his detriment. That is not, of course, to suggest that these conditions are either conclusive or exclusive, but merely that the actual decision in the case does not warrant any broader propositions. . . . My Lords, no decision of this House has gone further than Smith v. Eric S Bush, but your Lordships are asked by Caparo to widen the area of responsibility even beyond the limits to which it was extended by the Court of Appeal in this case and to find a relationship of proximity between the adviser and third parties to whose attention the advice may come in circumstances in which the reliance said to have given rise to the loss is strictly unrelated either to the intended recipient or to the purpose for which the advice was required. My Lords, I discern no pressing reason of policy which would require such an extension and there seems to me to be powerful reasons against it. As Lord Reid observed in the course of his speech in the Hedley Byrne case [1964] AC 465 at 483, words can be broadcast with or without the consent or foresight of the speaker or writer; and in his speech in the same case Lord Pearce drew attention to the necessity for the imposition of some discernible limits to liability in such cases. . . .

In seeking to ascertain whether there should be imposed on the adviser a duty to avoid the occurrence of the kind of damage which the advisee claims to have suffered it is not, I think, sufficient to ask simply whether there existed a “closeness” between them in the sense that the advisee had a legal entitlement to receive the information on the basis of which he has acted or in the sense that the information was intended to serve his interest or to protect him. One must, I think, go further and ask, in what capacity was his interest to be served and from what was he intended to be protected? A company’s annual accounts are capable of being utilised for a number of purposes and if one thinks about it is entirely foreseeable that they may be so employed. But many of such purposes have absolutely no connection with the recipient’s status or capacity, whether as a shareholder, voting or non-voting, or as a debenture-holder. Before it can be concluded that the duty is imposed to protect the recipient against harm which he suffers by reason of the particular use that he chooses to make of the information which he receives, one must, I think, first ascertain the purpose for which the information is required to be given. Indeed, the paradigmatic Donoghue v. Stevenson case of a manufactured article requires, as an essential ingredient of liability, that the article has been used by the consumer in the manner in which it was intended to be used (see Grant v. Australian Knitting Mills Ltd [1936] AC 85 at 104, and Junior Books Ltd v. Veitchi Co Ltd [1983] 1 AC 520 at 549, 552). I entirely follow that if the conclusion is reached that the very purpose of providing the information is to serve as the basis for making investment decisions or giving investment advice, it is not difficult then to conclude also that the duty imposed on the adviser extends to protecting the recipient against loss occasioned by an unfortunate investment decision which is based on carelessly inaccurate information. . . .

I do not believe and I see no grounds for believing that, in enacting the statutory provisions, Parliament had in mind the provision of information for the assistance of purchasers of shares or debentures in the market, whether they be already the holders of shares or other securities or persons having no previous proprietary interest in the company. It is unnecessary to decide the point on this appeal, but I can see more force in the contention that one purpose of providing the statutory information might be to enable the recipient to exercise whatever rights he has in relation to his proprietary interest by virtue of which he receives it, by way, for instance of disposing of that interest. I can, however, see no ground for supposing that the legislature was intending to foster a market for the existing holders of shares or debentures by providing information for the purpose of enabling them to acquire such securities from other holders who might be minded to sell. . . .

In my judgment, accordingly, the purpose for which the auditors’ certificate is made and published is that of providing those entitled to receive the report with information to enable them to exercise in conjunction those powers which their respective proprietary interests confer on them and not for the purposes of individual speculation with a view to profit. The same considerations as limit the existence of a duty of care also, in my judgment, limit the scope of the duty and I agree with O’Connor U that the duty of care is one owed to the shareholders as a body and not to individual shareholders.

To widen the scope of the duty to include loss caused to an individual by reliance on the accounts for a purpose for which they were not supplied and were not intended would be to extend it beyond the limits which are so far deducible from the decisions of this House. It is not, as I think, an extension which either logic requires or policy dictates and I, for my part, am not prepared to follow the majority of the Court of Appeal in making it. In relation to the purchase of shares of other shareholders in a company, whether in the open market or as a result of an offer made to all or a majority of the existing shareholders, I can see no sensible distinction, so far as a duty of care is concerned, between a potential purchaser who is, vis-à-vis the company, a total outsider and one who is already the holder of one or more shares. I accordingly agree with what has already fallen from my noble and learned friend Lord Bridge, and I, too, would allow the appeal and dismiss the cross-appeal.

Summary of Facts and Proceedings Below

This litigation emanates from the meteoric rise and equally rapid demise of Osborne Computer Corporation (hereafter the company). Founded in 1980 by entrepreneur Adam Osborne, the company manufactured the first portable personal computer for the mass market. Shipments began in 1981. By fall 1982, sales of the company's sole product, the Osborne I computer, had reached $10 million per month, making the company one of the fastest growing enterprises in the history of American business.

In late 1982, the company began planning for an early 1983 initial public offering of its stock, engaging three investment banking firms as underwriters. At the suggestion of the underwriters, the offering was postponed for several months, in part because of uncertainties caused by the company's employment of a new chief executive officer and its plans to introduce a new computer to replace the Osborne I. In order to obtain "bridge" financing needed to meet the company's capital requirements until the offering, the company issued warrants to investors in exchange for direct loans or letters of credit to secure bank loans to the company (the warrant transaction). The warrants entitled their holders to purchase blocks of the company's stock at favorable prices that were expected to yield a sizable profit if and when the public offering took place.

Plaintiffs in this case were investors in the company. . . . Several plaintiffs purchased warrants from the company as part of the warrant transaction. Others purchased the common stock of the company during early 1983. . . .

The company retained defendant Arthur Young & Company (hereafter Arthur Young) . . . to perform audits and issue audit reports on its 1981 and 1982 financial statements. . . . In its role as auditor, Arthur Young's responsibility was to review the annual financial statements prepared by the company's in-house accounting department, examine the books and records of the company, and issue an audit opinion on the financial statements.

Arthur Young issued unqualified or "clean" audit opinions on the company's 1981 and 1982 financial statements. Each opinion appeared on Arthur Young's letterhead, was addressed to the company, and stated in essence: (1) Arthur Young had performed an examination of the accompanying financial statements in accordance with the accounting profession's "Generally Accepted Auditing Standards" (GAAS); (2) the statements had been prepared in accordance with "Generally Accepted Accounting Principles" (GAAP); and (3) the statements "present[ed] fairly" the company's financial position. The 1981 financial statement showed a net operating loss of approximately $1 million on sales of $6 million. The 1982 financial statements included a "Consolidated Statement of Operations" which revealed a modest net operating profit of $69,000 on sales of more than $68 million. . . .

II

The Audit Function in Public Accounting

Although certified public accountants (CPA's) perform a variety of services for their clients, their primary function, which is the one that most frequently generates lawsuits against them by third persons, is financial auditing. . . ." In an audit engagement, an accountant reviews financial statements prepared by a client and issues an opinion stating whether such statements fairly represent the financial status of the audited entity." (Siliciano, 86 Mich.L.Rev. at p. 1931.) . . .

For practical reasons of time and cost, an audit rarely, if ever, examines every accounting transaction in the records of a business. The planning and execution of an audit therefore require a high degree of professional skill and judgment. Initially, the CPA firm plans the audit by surveying the client's business operations and accounting systems and making preliminary decisions as to the scope of the audit and what methods and procedures will be used. The firm then evaluates the internal financial control systems of the client and performs compliance tests to determine whether they are functioning properly. Transactions and data are sampled, vouched for, and traced. Throughout the audit process, results are examined and procedures are reevaluated and modified to reflect discoveries made by the auditors. . . .

The end product of an audit is the audit report or opinion. The report is generally expressed in a letter addressed to the client. The body of the report refers to the specific client-prepared financial statements which are attached. In the case of the so-called "unqualified report" (of which Arthur Young's report on the company's 1982 financial statements is an example), two paragraphs are relatively standard.

In a scope paragraph, the CPA firm asserts that it has examined the accompanying financial statements in accordance with GAAS. GAAS are promulgated by the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants (AICPA), a national professional organisation of CPA's, whose membership is open to persons holding certified public accountant certificates issued by state boards of accountancy. . . .

In an opinion paragraph, the audit report generally states the CPA firm's opinion that the audited financial statements, taken as a whole, are in conformity with GAAP and present fairly in all material respects the financial position, results of operations, and changes in financial position of the client in the relevant periods. . . .

Arthur Young correctly observes that audits may be commissioned by clients for different purposes. Nonetheless, audits of financial statements and the resulting audit reports are very frequently (if not almost universally) used by businesses to establish the financial credibility of their enterprises in the perceptions of outside persons, e.g., existing and prospective investors, financial institutions, and others who extend credit to an enterprise or make risk-oriented decisions based on its economic viability. The unqualified audit report of a CPA firm, particularly one of the "Big Six," is often an admission ticket to venture capital markets—a necessary condition precedent to attracting the kind and level of outside funds essential to the client's financial growth and survival. As one commentator summarizes: "In the first instance, this unqualified opinion serves as an assurance to the client that its own perception of its financial health is valid and that its accounting systems are reliable. The audit, however, frequently plays a second major role: it assists the client in convincing third parties that it is safe to extend credit or invest in the client." (Siliciano, 86 Mich.L.Rev. at p. 1932.)

III

Approaches to the Problem of Auditor Liability to Third Persons

The complex nature of the audit function and its economic implications has resulted in different approaches to the question whether CPA auditors should be subjected to liability to third parties who read and rely on audit reports. Although three schools of thought are commonly recognised, there are some variations within each school and recent case law suggests a possible trend toward merger of two of the three approaches.

A substantial number of jurisdictions follow the lead of Chief Judge Cardozo's 1931 opinion for the New York Court of Appeals in Ultramares, supra, 174 N.E. 441, by denying recovery to third parties for auditor negligence in the absence of a third party relationship to the auditor that is "akin to privity." (See part III (A), post.) In contrast, a handful of jurisdictions, spurred by law review commentary, have recently allowed recovery based on negligence to third parties whose reliance on the audit report was "foreseeable." (See part III (B), post.)

Most jurisdictions, supported by the weight of commentary and the modern English common law decisions cited by the parties, have steered a middle course based in varying degrees on Restatement Second of Torts section 552, which generally imposes liability on suppliers of commercial information to third persons who are intended beneficiaries of the information. (See part III C, post.) Finally, the federal securities laws have also dealt with the problem by imposing auditor liability for negligence-related conduct only in connection with misstatements in publicly filed and distributed offering documents. (See part III (D), post.)

A. Privity of Relationship (In this section the CJ considers the Ultramares ruling and its subsequent (slight) enlargement by the Credit Alliance case; see notes above.)

B. Foreseeability (This section reviews the case law of those courts which have opted for the most "liberal" approach which lays great store on the notion of foreseeability. On the judicial studies, one of its greatest advocates was Judge Wiener in "Common Law Liability of the Certified Public Accountant for Negligence Misrepresentation, 20 San Diego L. Rev. 233.)

C. The Restatement: Intent to Benefit Third Persons

Section 552 of the Restatement Second of Torts covers "Information Negligently Supplied for the Guidance of Others." It states a general principle that one who negligently supplies false information "for the guidance of others in their business transactions" is liable for economic loss suffered by the recipients in justifiable reliance on the information. (Id., subd. (1)) But the liability created by the general principle is expressly limited to loss suffered: "(a) [B]y the person or one of a limited group of persons for whose benefit and guidance he intends to supply the information or knows that the recipient intends to supply it; and (b) [T]hrough reliance upon it in a transaction that he intends the information to influence or knows that the recipient so intends or in a substantially similar transaction." (Id., subd. (2).) To paraphrase, a supplier of information is liable for negligence to a third party only if he or she intends to supply the information for the benefit of one or more third parties in a specific transaction or type of transaction identified to the supplier. . . .

Although the parties debate precisely how many states follow the Restatement rule, a review of the cases reveals the rule has somewhat more support than the privity of relationship rule and much more support than the foreseeability rule. At least 17 state and federal decisions have endorsed the rule in this and related contexts.² Whatever the exact number of states that have endorsed it, the Restatement rule has been for many, if not most, courts a satisfactory compromise between their discomfort with the traditional privity approach and the “specter of unlimited liability.” (Briggs v. Sterner (S.D.Iowa 1981) 529 F.Supp. 1155, 1177.)

In attempting to ascertain the presence of an intent to benefit third parties from the facts of particular audit engagements and communications with auditors, the Restatement rule inevitably results in some degree of uncertainty. Dean William L Prosser, the Reporter for the Restatement, reflected on the difficulty of formulating a comprehensive rule in this area: “The problem is to find language which will eliminate liability to the very large class of persons whom almost any negligently given information may foreseeably reach and influence, and limit the liability, not to a particular plaintiff defined in advance, but to the comparatively small group whom the defendant expects and intends to influence. Neither the Reporter, nor, it is believed, the Advisers nor the Council, is entirely satisfied with the language of Subsection (2); and if anyone can do better, it will be most welcome.” (Rest.2d Torts, Tent. Draft No. 11 (Apr. 15, 1965) § 552, p. 56.)

Analysis of Auditor’s Liability to Third Persons for Audit Opinions

“Every person is bound, without contract, to abstain from injuring the person or property of another, or infringing upon any of his rights.” (Civ.Code, § 1708; all further statutory references are to this code unless otherwise indicated.) Civil liability for injury to others is imposed based on causes of action in tort, which include, insofar as relevant to this case: negligence, negligent misrepresentation, and fraud. . . .

A. Negligence

The threshold element of a cause of action for negligence is the existence of a duty to use due care toward an interest of another that enjoys legal protection against unintentional invasion. (Rest.2d Torts, § 281, subd. (a); 6 Witkin, Summary of Cal. Law (9th ed. 1988), Torts, § 732, p. 60.) Whether this essential prerequisite to a negligence cause of action has been satisfied in a particular case is a question of law to be resolved by the court. (6 Witkin, supra, § 748 at p. 83.)

A judicial conclusion that a duty is present or absent is merely “a shorthand statement . . . rather than an aid to analysis. . . . [D]uty, is not sacrosanct in itself, but only an expression of the sum total of those considerations of policy which lead the law to say that the particular plaintiff is entitled to protection.” (Dillon v. Legg (1968) 68 Cal.2d 728, 734, 69 Cal.Rptr. 72, 441 P.2d 912, quoting Prosser, Law of Torts (3d ed.) pp. 332–333.) . . .

We have employed a checklist of factors to consider in assessing legal duty in the absence of privity of contract between a plaintiff and a defendant. In Biakanja v. Irving (1958) 49 Cal.2d 647, 320 P.2d 16, a notary public undertook to prepare a will for the decedent and then negligently failed to have it properly attested. We allowed the decedent’s brother, the sole beneficiary under the will, to recover from the notary public. In permitting negligence liability to be imposed in the absence of privity, we outlined the factors to be considered in making such a decision: . . . (Id. 49 Cal.2d 647 at pp. 650–651, 320 P.2d 16.) . . .

Viewing the problem before us in light of the factors set forth above, we decline to permit all merely foreseeable third party users of audit reports to sue the auditor on a theory of professional negligence. Our holding is premised on three central concerns: (1) Given the secondary “watch-dog” role of the auditor, the complexity of the professional opinions rendered in audit reports, and the difficult and potentially tenuous causal relationships between audit reports and economic losses from investment and credit decisions, the auditor exposed to negligence claims from all foreseeable third parties faces potential liability far out of proportion to its fault; (2) The generally more sophisticated class of plaintiffs in auditor liability cases (e.g., business lenders and investors) permits the effective use of contract rather than tort liability to control and adjust the relevant risks through “private ordering”; and (3) The asserted advantages of more accurate auditing and more efficient loss spreading relied upon by those who advocate a pure foreseeability approach are unlikely to occur; indeed, dislocations of resources, including increased expense and decreased availability of auditing services in some sectors of the economy, are more probable consequences of expanded liability.

In a broad sense, economic injury to lenders, investors, and others who may read and rely on audit reports is certainly “foreseeable.” Foreseeability of injury, however, is but one factor to be considered in the imposition of negligence liability. Even when foreseeability was present, we have on several recent occasions declined to allow recovery on a negligence theory when damage awards threatened to impose liability out of proportion to fault or to promote virtually unlimited responsibility for intangible injury.

In placing explicit limits on recovery for negligent infliction of emotional distress by accident bystanders, we commented: “[Foreseeability] . . . is endless because [it], like light, travels indefinitely in a vacuum.” (Thing v. La Chusa (1989) 48 Cal.3d 644, 659, 257 Cal.Rptr. 865, 771 P.2d 814.) “[It] proves too much. . . . Although it may set tolerable limits for most types of physical harm, it provides virtually no limit on liability for nonphysical harm. . . . It is apparent that reliance on foreseeability of injury alone in finding a duty, and thus a right to recover, is not adequate when the damages sought are for an intangible injury. In order to avoid limitless liability out of all proportion to the degree of a defendant’s negligence, and against which it is impossible to insure without imposing unacceptable costs on those among whom the risk is spread, the right to recover for negligently caused emotional distress must be limited.” (Id. at pp. 663–664, 257 Cal.Rptr. 865, 771 P.2d 814, citations omitted.)

Emphasising the important role of policy factors in determining negligence, we observed that “there are clear judicial days on which a court can foresee forever and thus determine liability but none on which that foresight alone provides a socially and judicially acceptable limit on recovery of damages for [an] injury.” (Thing v. La Chusa, supra, 48 Cal.3d at p. 668, 257 Cal.Rptr. 865, 771 P.2d 814; see also Nally v. Grace Community Church (1988) 47 Cal.3d 278, 297, 253 Cal.Rptr. 97, 763 P.2d 948 [“Mere foreseeability of the harm or knowledge of the danger, is insufficient to create a legally cognisable special relationship giving rise to a legal duty to prevent harm.”]; Elder v. Sheldon (1988) 46 Cal.3d 267, 274, 250 Cal.Rptr. 254, 758 P.2d 582 [“[P]olicy considerations may dictate a cause of action should not be sanctioned no matter how foreseeable the risk . . . for the sound reason that the consequences of a negligent act must be limited in order to avoid an intolerable burden on society.”].)

In line with our recent decisions, we will not treat the mere presence of a foreseeable risk of injury to third persons as sufficient, standing alone, to impose liability for negligent conduct. We must consider other pertinent factors.

1. Liability out of proportion to fault

An auditor is a watchdog, not a bloodhound. (In re Kingston Cotton Mill Co. (1896) 2 Ch. 279, 28S.) As a matter of commercial reality, audits are performed in a client-controlled environment. The client typically prepares its own financial statements; it has direct control over and assumes primary responsibility for their contents. (See In re Interstate Hosiery Mills, Inc. (1939) 4 S.E.C. 721 [“The fundamental and primary responsibility for the accuracy [of financial statements] rests upon management.”].) The client engages the auditor, pays for the audit, and communicates with audit personnel throughout the engagement. Because the auditor cannot in the time available become an expert in the client’s business and record-keeping systems, the client necessarily furnishes the information base for the audit. . . .

Client control also predominates in the dissemination of the audit report. Once the report reaches the client, the extent of its distribution and the communications that accompany it are within the exclusive province of client management. Thus, regardless of the efforts of the auditor, the client retains effective primary control of the financial reporting process.

Moreover, an audit report is not a simple statement of verifiable fact that, like the weight of the load of beans in Glanzer v. Shepard, supra, 233 N.Y. 236, 135 N.E. 275, can be easily checked against uniform standards of indisputable accuracy. Rather, an audit report is a professional opinion based on numerous and complex factors. . . .

2. The prospect of private ordering

Courts advocating unlimited auditor liability to all foreseeably injured third parties often analogize the auditor's opinion to a consumer product, arguing that the demise of privity as a barrier to recovery for negligence in product manufacture implies its irrelevance in the area of auditor liability as well. (See, e.g., Rosenblum v. Adler, supra, 461 A.2d at pp. 145–147.) Plaintiffs advance similar arguments. The analogy lacks persuasive force for two reasons. Initially, as noted above, the maker of a consumer product has complete control over the design and manufacture of its product; in contrast, the auditor merely expresses an opinion about its client's financial statements—the client is primarily responsible for the content of those statements in the form they reach the third party.

Moreover, the general character of the class of third parties is also different. Investors, creditors, and others who read and rely on audit reports and financial statements are not the equivalent of ordinary consumers. Like plaintiffs here, they often possess considerable sophistication in analyzing financial information and are aware from training and experience of the limits of an audit report “product” that is, at bottom, simply a broadly phrased professional opinion based on a necessarily combined examination.

In contrast to the “presumptively powerless consumer” in product liability cases, the third party in an audit negligence case has other options—he or she can “privately order” the risk of inaccurate financial reporting by contractual arrangements with the client. (Siliciano, 86 Mich.L.Rev. at pp. 1956–1957.) For example, a third party might expend its own resources to verify the client's financial statements or selected portions of them that were particularly material to its transaction with the client. Or it might commission its own audit or investigation, thus establishing privity between itself and an auditor or investigator to whom it could look for protection. In addition, it might bargain with the client for special security or improved terms in a credit or investment transaction. Finally, the third party could seek to bring itself within the Glanzer exception to Ultramares by insisting that an audit be conducted on its behalf or establishing direct communications with the auditor with respect to its transaction with the client. (Siliciano, 86 Mich.L.Rev. at pp. 1956–1957.)

As a matter of economic and social policy, third parties should be encouraged to rely on their own prudence, diligence, and contracting power, as well as other informational tools. This kind of self-reliance promotes sound investment and credit practices and discourages the careless use of monetary resources. If, instead, third parties are simply permitted to recover from the auditor for mistakes in the client's financial statements, the auditor becomes, in effect, an insurer of not only the financial statements, but of bad loans and investments in general.³

3. The effect on auditors of negligence liability to third persons

Courts and commentators advocating auditor negligence liability to third parties also predict that such liability might deter auditor mistakes, promote more careful audits, and result in a more efficient spreading of the risk of inaccurate financial statements. For example, the New Jersey Supreme Court reasoned: “The imposition of a duty to foreseeable users may cause accounting firms to engage in more thorough reviews. This might entail setting up stricter standards and applying closer supervision, which would tend to reduce the number of instances in which liability would ensue. Much of the additional cost incurred because of more thorough auditing review or increased insurance premiums would be borne by the business entity and its stockholders or its customers. . . . Accountants will also be encouraged to exercise greater care leading to greater diligence in audits.” (Rosenblum v. Adler, supra, 461 A.2d at p. 152.)

We are not directed to any empirical data supporting these prognostications. From our review of the cases and commentary, we doubt that a significant and desirable improvement in audit care would result from an expanded rule of liability. Indeed, deleterious economic effects appear at least as likely to occur.

In view of the inherent dependence of the auditor on the client and the labor-intensive nature of auditing, we doubt whether audits can be done in ways that would yield significantly greater accuracy without disadvantages. (Siliciano, 86 Mich.L.Rev. at pp. 1963–1968.) Auditors may rationally respond to increased liability by simply reducing audit services in fledgling industries where the business failure rate is high, reasoning that they will inevitably be singled out and sued when their client goes into bankruptcy regardless of the care or detail of their audits. As a legal economist described the problem: “The deterrent effect of liability rules is the difference between the probability of incurring liability when performance meets the required standard and the probability of incurring liability when performance is below the required standard. Thus, the stronger the probability that liability will be incurred when performance is adequate, the weaker is the deterrent effect of liability rules. Why offer a higher quality product if you will be sued regardless whenever there is a precipitous decline in stock prices?” (Fischel, The Regulation of Accounting: Some Economic Issues (1987), 52 Brooklyn L.Rev. 1051, 1055.) Consistent with this reasoning, the economic result of unlimited negligence liability could just as easily be an increase in the cost and decrease in the availability of audits and audit reports with no compensating improvement in overall audit quality. (Id. at pp. 1055–1056; Siliciano, 86 Mich.L.Rev. at pp. 1960–1965.) . . .

[4] For the reasons stated above, we hold that an auditor’s liability for general negligence in the conduct of an audit of its client financial statements is confined to the client i.e., the person who contracts for or engages the audit services. Other persons may not recover on a pure negligence theory.⁴

There is, however, a further narrow class of persons who, although not clients, may reasonably come to receive and rely on an audit report and whose existence constitutes a risk of audit reporting that may fairly be imposed on the auditor. Such persons are specifically intended beneficiaries of the audit report who are known to the auditor and for whose benefit it renders the audit report. While such persons may not recover on a general negligence theory, we hold they may, for the reasons stated in part IV (B) post, recover on a theory of negligent misrepresentation.

B. Negligent Misrepresentation

One difficulty in considering the problem before us is that neither the courts (ourselves included), the commentators, nor the authors of the Restatement Second of Torts have made clear or careful distinctions between the tort of negligence and the separate tort of negligent misrepresentation.

⁴ In theory, there is an additional class of persons who may be the practical and legal equivalent of “clients.” It is possible the audit engagement contract might expressly identify a particular third party or parties so as to make them express third party beneficiaries of the contract. Third party beneficiaries may under appropriate circumstances possess the rights of parties to the contract. (See Martinez v. Socoma Companies, Inc. (1974) 11 Cal.3d 394, 400–403, 113 Cal.Rptr. 585, 521 P.2d 841; Outdoor Services, Inc. v. Pabagold, Inc. (1986) 185 Cal. App.3d 676, 681–684, 230 Cal.Rptr. 73; see also § 1559.) This case presents no third party beneficiary issue. Arthur Young was engaged by the company to provide audit reporting to the company. No third party is identified in the engagement contract. Therefore, we have no occasion to decide whether and under what circumstances express third party beneficiaries of audit engagement contracts may recover as “clients” under our holding.

The distinction is important not only because of the different statutory bases of the two torts, but also because it has practical implications for the trial of cases in complex areas such as the one before us.

Negligent misrepresentation is a separate and distinct tort, a species of the tort of deceit. “Where the defendant makes false statements, honestly believing that they are true, but without reasonable ground for such belief, he may be liable for negligent misrepresentation, a form of deceit.” (5 Witkin, Summary of Cal.Law (9th edn. 1988) Torts, § 720 at p. 819; see also § 1572, subd. 2 [“The positive assertion, in a manner not warranted by the information of the person making it, of that which is not true, though he believes it to be true”]; § 1710, subd. 2 [“The assertion, as a fact, of that which is not true, by one who has no reasonable ground for believing it to be true”].)

[6, 7] Under certain circumstances, expressions of professional opinion are treated as representations of fact. When a statement, although in the form of an opinion, is “not a casual expression of belief” but “a deliberate affirmation of the matters stated,” it may be regarded as a positive assertion of fact. (Gagne v. Bertran (1954) 43 Cal.2d 481, 489, 275 P.2d 15.) Moreover, when a party possesses or holds itself out as possessing superior knowledge or special information or expertise regarding the subject matter and a plaintiff is so situated that it may reasonably rely on such supposed knowledge, information, or expertise, the defendant’s representation may be treated as one of material fact. (Gagne v. Bertran, supra, 43 Cal.2d at p. 489, 275 P.2d 15; Cohen v. S & S Construction Company (1983) 151 Cal.App.3d 941, 946, 201 Cal.Rptr. 173; see also 5 Witkin, Summary of Cal.Law, supra, Torts § 680 at pp. 781–782; BAJI No. 12.32.) There is no dispute that Arthur Young’s statements in audit opinions fall within these principles.

But the person or “class of persons entitled to rely upon the representations is restricted to those to whom or for whom the misrepresentations were made. Even though the defendant should have anticipated that the misinformation might reach others, he is not liable to them.” . . .

Of the approaches we have reviewed, Restatement Second of Torts section 552, subdivision (b) is most consistent with the elements and policy foundations of the tort of negligent misrepresentation. The rule expressed there attempts to define a narrow and circumscribed class of persons to whom or for whom representations are made. In this way, it recognises commercial realities by avoiding both unlimited and uncertain liability for economic losses in cases of professional mistake and exoneration of the auditor in situations where it clearly intended to undertake the responsibility of influencing particular business transactions involving third persons. The Restatement rule thus appears to be a sensible and moderate approach to the potential consequences of imposing unlimited negligence liability which we have identified.

We recognise the rule expressed in the Restatement Second of Torts has been criticised in some quarters as vague and potentially arbitrary. In his Article advocating a foreseeability rule, Justice Wiener generally criticised the Restatement rule as resting “solely on chance considerations” and “fortuitousness” (e.g., the “state of the mind of the accountant” and the scope of his engagement) having, in his view, nothing to do with increasing the flow of accurate information. (Wiener, supra, 20 San Diego L.Rev. at p. 252.)

We respectfully disagree. In seeking to identify a specific class of persons and a transaction that the supplier of information “intends the information to influence,” the authors of the Restatement Second of Torts have applied basic factors of tort liability recognised in this state and elsewhere (see Biakanja, supra, 49 Cal.2d 647, 320 P.2d 16). By confining what might otherwise be unlimited liability to those persons whom the engagement is designed to benefit, the Restatement rule requires that the supplier of information receive notice of potential third party claims, thereby allowing it to ascertain the potential scope of its liability and make rational decisions regarding the undertaking. The receipt of such notice justifies imposition of auditor liability for conduct that is merely negligent.

Moreover, the identification of a limited class of plaintiffs to whom the supplier itself has directed its activity establishes a closer connection between the supplier’s negligent act and the recipient’s injury, thereby ameliorating the otherwise difficult concerns of causation and of credible evidence of reliance. Finally, no unfairness results to those recipients who are excluded from the class of beneficiaries because they have means of private ordering—among other things, they can establish direct communication with an auditor and obtain a report for their own direct use and benefit. For these reasons, the rule expressed in the Restatement Second of Torts represents a reasoned, not an arbitrary, approach to the problem before us.

Additional criticism has been leveled at the Restatement approach because of the vagueness of its “intent to benefit” language. As we read section 552 of the Restatement Second of Torts, it does not seek to probe the state of mind of the accountant or other supplier of information. Rather, it attempts to identify those situations in which the supplier undertakes to supply information to a third party whom he or she knows is likely to rely on it in a transaction that has sufficiently specific economic parameters to permit the supplier to assess the risk of moving forward. As the authors of section 552 observe, liability should be confined to cases in which the supplier “manifests an intent to supply the information for the sort of use in which the plaintiff’s loss occurs.” (Id., com. (a), italics added.) This follows because the “risk of liability to which the supplier subjects himself by undertaking to give the information . . . is vitally affected by the number and character of the persons, and particularly the nature and extent of the proposed transaction.” (Id., com. (h); italics added.)

The “intent to benefit” language of the Restatement Second of Torts thus creates an objective standard that looks to the specific circumstances (e.g., supplier-client engagement and the supplier’s communications with the third party) to ascertain whether a supplier has undertaken to inform and guide a third party with respect to an identified transaction or type of transaction. If such a specific undertaking has been made, liability is imposed on the supplier. If, on the other hand, the supplier “merely knows of the ever-present possibility of repetition to anyone, and the possibility of action in reliance upon [the information] on the part of anyone to whom it may be repeated,” the supplier bears no legal responsibility. (Rest.2d Torts, § 552, com. (h).)

The Restatement Second of Torts approach is also the only one that achieves consistency in the law of negligent misrepresentation. Accountants are not unique in their position as suppliers of information and evaluations for the use and benefit of others. Other professionals, including attorneys, architects, engineers, title insurers and abstractors, and others also perform that function. And, like auditors, these professionals may also face suits by third persons claiming reliance on information and opinions generated in a professional capacity. . . .

By allowing recovery for negligent misrepresentation (as opposed to mere negligence), we emphasize the indispensability of justifiable reliance on the statements contained in the report. As the jury instructions in this case illustrate, a general negligence charge directs attention to defendant’s level of care and compliance with professional standards established by expert testimony, as opposed to plaintiff’s reliance on a materially false statement made by defendant. The reliance element in such an instruction is only implicit—it must be argued and considered by the jury as part of its evaluation of the causal relationship between defendant’s conduct and plaintiff’s injury. In contrast, an instruction based on the elements of negligent misrepresentation necessarily and properly focuses the jury’s attention on the truth or falsity of the audit report’s representations and plaintiff’s actual and justifiable reliance on them. Because the audit report, not the audit itself, is the foundation of the third person’s claim, negligent misrepresentation more precisely captures the gravamen of the cause of action and more clearly conveys the elements essential to a recovery. (Garcia v. Superior Court, supra, 50 Cal.3d at pp. 737, 741–744, 268 Cal.Rptr. 779, 789 P.2d 960.)⁵

[9] Based on our decision, the California standard jury instructions concerning negligent misrepresentation should be amended in future auditor liability cases to permit the jury to determine whether plaintiff belongs to the class of persons to whom or for whom the representations in the audit report were made. For the guidance of trial courts, we suggest the jury be instructed on the elements of negligent misrepresentation as set forth in BAJI No. 12.45 with the addition of the following instruction in lieu of BAJI No. 12.50:

“The representation must have been made with the intent to induce plaintiff, or a particular class of persons to which plaintiff belongs, to act in reliance upon the representation in a specific transaction, or a specific type of transaction, that defendant intended to influence. Defendant is deemed to have intended to influence [its client’s] transaction with plaintiff whenever defendant knows with substantial certainty that plaintiff, or the particular class of persons to which plaintiff belongs, will rely on the representation in the course of the transaction. If others become aware of the representation and act upon it, there is no liability even though defendant should reasonably have foreseen such a possibility.”

Extracts from the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999

1. (1) Subject to the provisions of this Act, a person who is not a party to a contract (a “third party”) may in his own right enforce a term of the contract if—
 - (a) the contract expressly provides that he may, or
 - (b) subject to subsection (2), the term purports to confer a benefit on him.
 (2) Subsection (1)(b) does not apply if on a proper construction of the contract it appears that the parties did not intend the term to be enforceable by the third party.
 (3) The third party must be expressly identified in the contract by name, as a member of a class or as answering a particular description but need not be in existence when the contract is entered into.
 (4) This section does not confer a right on a third party to enforce a term of a contract otherwise than subject to and in accordance with any other relevant terms of the contract.
 (5) For the purpose of exercising his right to enforce a term of the contract, there shall be available to the third party any remedy that would have been available to him in an action for breach of contract if he had been a party to the contract (and the rules relating to damages, injunctions, specific performance and other relief shall apply accordingly).
 (6) Where a term of a contract excludes or limits liability in relation to any matter references in this Act to the third party enforcing the term shall be construed as references to his availing himself of the exclusion or limitation.
 (7) In this Act, in relation to a term of a contract which is enforceable by a third party—
 “the promisor” means the party to the contract against whom the term is enforceable by the third party, and
 “the promisee” means the party to the contract by whom the term is enforceable against the promisor.
2. (1) Subject to the provisions of this section, where a third party has a right under section 1 to enforce a term of the contract, the parties to the contract may not, by agreement, rescind the contract, or vary it in such a way as to extinguish or alter his entitlement under that right, without his consent if—
 - (a) the third party has communicated his assent to the term to the promisor,
 - (b) the promisor is aware that the third party has relied on the term, or
 - (c) the promisor can reasonably be expected to have foreseen that the third party would rely on the term and the third party has in fact relied on it. . . .
3. (1) Subsections (2) to (5) apply where, in reliance on section 1, proceedings for the enforcement of a term of a contract are brought by a third party.

- (2) The promisor shall have available to him by way of defence or set-off any matter that—
 - (a) arises from or in connection with the contract and is relevant to the term, and
 - (b) would have been available to him by way of defence or set-off if the proceedings had been brought by the promisee.
 - (3) The promisor shall also have available to him by way of defence or set-off any matter if—
 - (a) an express term of the contract provides for it to be available to him in proceedings brought by the third party, and
 - (b) it would have been available to him by way of defence or set-off if the proceedings had been brought by the promisee.
 - (4) The promisor shall also have available to him—
 - (a) by way of defence or set-off any matter, and
 - (b) by way of counterclaim any matter not arising from the contract, that would have been available to him by way of defence or set-off or, as the case may be, by way of counterclaim against the third party if the third party had been a party to the contract.
 - (5) Subsections (2) and (4) are subject to any express term of the contract as to the matters that are not to be available to the promisor by way of defence, set-off or counterclaim.
 - (6) Where in any proceedings brought against him a third party seeks in reliance on section 1 to enforce a term of a contract (including, in particular, a term purporting to exclude or limit liability), he may not do so if he could not have done so (whether by reason of any particular circumstances relating to him or otherwise) had he been a party to the contract.
4. Section 1 does not affect any right of the promisee to enforce any term of the contract.
5. Where under section 1 a term of a contract is enforceable by a third party, and the promisee has recovered from the promisor a sum in respect of—
- (a) the third party's loss in respect of the term, or
 - (b) the expense to the promisee of making good to the third party the default of the promisor,
- then, in any proceedings brought in reliance on that section by the third party, the court or arbitral tribunal shall reduce any award to the third party to such extent as it thinks appropriate to take account of the sum recovered by the promisee. . . .
7. (1) Section 1 does not affect any right or remedy of a third party that exists or is available apart from this Act. . . .

Extracts from Alfred McAlpine Construction Ltd. v. Panatown Ltd. [2001] 1 AC 518

[Panatown employed McAlpine to build a building on land owned by UIPL. The work was defective. Panatown did not suffer any financial loss itself. UIPL owned the defective building, which required a significant expenditure for its repair, and was unable for a considerable period to put the building to a profitable use. Panatown sought to recover, by way of an arbitration, from McAlpine the loss which UIPL had suffered. The appeal thus concerned the circumstances in which the employer in a contract of services may claim from the contractor on the ground of breach of contract damages in respect of a loss which has been suffered by a third party. However, in addition to the contract with the employer, the building contractor, McAlpine, also entered into a duty of care deed (DCD) with the site-owner, UIPL. By that deed the owner acquired a direct remedy against the contractor in respect of any failure by the contractor to exercise reasonable skill in relation to any matter within the scope of the contractor's responsibilities under the contract. The arbitrator rejected the building contractor's objection that the employer, having suffered no loss, was not entitled to recover substantial damages under the contract. The judge reversed that ruling and the Court of Appeal restored the arbitrator's decision. The House of Lords allowed McAlpine's appeal by a majority (Lord Goff of Chieveley and Lord Millett dissenting). There were mainly two routes of recovery. Under the so-called narrow ground Panatown would recover substantial damages on behalf of the building owner. This route was somewhat problematic since in previous cases it had been suggested that if the third party can sue himself the narrow ground ceases to apply and in the present instance the building owner could have proceeded directly on the basis of the DCD. The alternative route, the so called "broader ground" would allow Panatown to recover as building employer substantial damages because it did not get what it bargained for regardless whether Panatown suffered any financial loss as a result of the defective performance, this principle had however never been unequivocally established by the House of Lords. The DCD appeared much less relevant according to this latter approach. The House of Lords was divided in several respects. Lord Clyde rejected the broad ground, Lords Goff and Millett did not apply the narrow ground, while Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle and Lord Browne-Wilkinson rested their decision on both grounds but somewhat surprisingly came to the conclusion that the availability of a direct action under the DCD also excluded the application of the broader ground.]

LORD CLYDE:

. . . The proposition which I refer to as The Albazero exception, as described by Lord Diplock (at p. 844), was:

"that the consignor may recover substantial damages against the shipowner if there is privity of contract between him and the carrier for the carriage of goods; although, if the goods are not his property or at his risk, he will be accountable to the true owner for the proceeds of his judgment."

If by a special contract the goods were the property or at the risk of the consignor then the loss would be his. That indeed was recognised in Dunlop. The second part of the passage which I have quoted however advances beyond such a position. What is there propounded is, as was noticed by my noble and learned friend Lord Goff of Chieveley in White v. Jones [1995] 2 AC 207, 267, a case of transferred loss. This is not a situation where the loss is that of the promisee. It is a loss suffered by the third party but transferred to the promisee who is then accountable to the third party. Thus the loss becomes that of the employer instead of and in place of the third party, a point emphasised by Hannes Unberath in his recent Article in (1999) 115 LQR 535. The promisee is deemed to have suffered the loss so that it is he and not the third party who is able to pursue the remedy in damages.

The justification for the exception to the general rule that one can only sue for damages for a loss which he has himself suffered was explained by Lord Diplock in The Albazero [1977] AC 774, 847. His Lordship noted that the scope and utility of what he referred to as the rule in Dunlop v. Lambert 6 Cl. & F. 600 in its application to carriage by sea under a bill of lading had been much reduced by the passing of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 and the subsequent development of the law, but that the rule extended to all forms of carriage, including carriage by sea where there was no bill of lading:

"and there may still be occasional cases in which the rule would provide a remedy where no other would be available to a person sustaining loss which under a rational legal system ought to be compensated by the person who has caused it."

The justification for The Albazero exception is thus the necessity of avoiding the disappearance of a substantial claim into what was described by Lord Stewart in J. Dykes Ltd. v. Littlewoods Mail Order Stores Ltd. 1982 S.C. (HL) 157, 166 as a legal black hole, an expression subsequently taken up by Lord Keith of Kinkell in this House at p. 177. . . .

The Albazero exception will plainly not apply where the parties contemplate that the carrier will enter into separate contracts of carriage with the later owners of the goods, identical to the contract with the consignor. Even more clearly, as Lord Diplock explained at p. 848, will the exception be excluded if other contracts of carriage are made in terms different from those in the original contract. In The Albazero the separate contracts which were mentioned were contracts of carriage. That is understandable in the context of carriage by sea involving a charterparty and bills of lading, but the counterpart in a building contract to a right of suit under a bill of lading should be the provision of a direct entitlement in a third party to sue the contractor in the event of a failure in the contractor's performance. In the context of a building contract one does not require to look for a second building contract to exclude the exception. It would be sufficient to find the provision of a right to sue. Thus as my noble and learned friend Lord Browne-Wilkinson observed in the St. Martins case [1994] 1 AC 85, 115:

“If, pursuant to the terms of the original building contract, the contractors have undertaken liability to the ultimate purchasers to remedy defects appearing after they acquired the property, it is manifest the case will not fall within the rationale of Dunlop v. Lambert 6 Cl. & F. 600. If the ultimate purchaser is given a direct cause of action against the contractor (as is the consignee or endorsee under a bill of lading) the case falls outside the rationale of the rule.”

In the St. Martins case the employer started off as the owner of the property and subsequently conveyed it to another company. In the present case the employer never was the owner. But that has not featured as a critical consideration in the present appeal and I do not see that that factor affects the application of the exception. . . . I have no difficulty in holding in the present case that the exception cannot apply. As part of the contractual arrangements entered into between Panatown and McAlpine there was a clear contemplation that separate contracts would be entered into by McAlpine, the contracts of the deed of duty of care and the collateral warranties. The duty of care deed and the collateral warranties were of course not in themselves building contracts. But they did form an integral part of the package of arrangements which the employer and the contractor agreed upon and in that respect should be viewed as reflecting the intentions of all the parties engaged in the arrangements that the third party should have a direct cause of action to the exclusion of any substantial claim by the employer, and accordingly that the exception should not apply. . . .

I turn accordingly to what was referred to in the argument as the broader ground. But the label requires more careful definition. The approach under The Albazero exception has been one of recognising an entitlement to sue by the innocent party to a contract which has been breached, where the innocent party is treated as suing on behalf of or for the benefit of some other person or persons, not parties to the contract, who have sustained loss as a result of the breach. In such a case the innocent party to the contract is bound to account to the person suffering the loss for the damages which the former has recovered for the benefit of the latter. But the so-called broader ground involves a significantly different approach. What it proposes is that the innocent party to the contract should recover damages for himself as a compensation for what is seen to be his own loss. In this context no question of accounting to anyone else arises. . . .

The loss of an expectation which is here referred to seems to me to be coming very close to a way of describing a breach of contract. A breach of contract may cause a loss, but is not in itself a loss in any meaningful sense. When one refers to a loss in the context of a breach of contract, one is in my view referring to the incidence of some personal or patrimonial damage. A loss of expectation might be a loss in the proper sense if damages were awarded for the distress or inconvenience caused by the disappointment. Professor Coote (“Contract Damages, Ruxley, and the Performance Interest” (1997) C.L.J. 537) draws a distinction between benefits in law, that is bargained-for contractual rights, and benefits in fact, that is the enjoyment of the fruits of performance. Certainly the former may constitute an asset with a commercial value. But while frustration may destroy the rights altogether so that the contract is no longer enforceable, a failure in the obligation to perform does not destroy the asset. On the contrary it remains as the necessary legal basis for a remedy. A failure in performance of a contractual obligation does not entail a loss of the bargained-for contractual rights. Those rights remain so as to enable performance of the contract to be enforced, as by an order for specific performance. . . .

At the heart of the problem is the doctrine of privity of contract which excludes the ready development of a solution along the lines of a jus quaesitum tertio. It might well be thought that such a solution would be more direct and simple. In the context of the domestic and familial situations, such as the husband instructing the repairs to the roof of his wife's house, or the holiday which results in disappointment to all the members of the family, the jus quaesitum tertio may provide a satisfactory means of redress, enabling compensation to be paid to the people who have suffered the loss. Such an approach is available in Germany see W. Lorenz "Contract Beneficiaries in German Law" in The Gradual Convergence: Foreign Ideas, Foreign Influences, and English Law on the Eve of the 21st Century ed. Markesinis (1994), pp. 65, 78, 79. It may also be available in Scotland (Carmichael v. Carmichael's Executrix 1920 S.C. (HL) 195). But we were not asked to adopt it in the present case and so radical a step cannot easily be achieved without legislative action. Since Parliament has recently made some inroad into the principle of privity but has stopped short of admitting a solution to a situation such as the present, it would plainly be inappropriate to enlarge the statutory provision by judicial innovation. The alternative has to be the adoption of what Lord Diplock in Swain v. The Law Society [1983] 1 AC 598, 611 described as a juristic subterfuge "to mitigate the effect of the lacuna resulting from the non-recognition of a jus quaesitum tertio." The solution, achieved by the operation of law, may carry with it some element of artificiality and may not be supportable on any clear or single principle. If the entitlement to sue is not to be permitted to the party who has suffered the loss, the law has to treat the person who is entitled to sue as doing so on behalf of the third party. As Lord Wilberforce observed in Woodar Investment Development Ltd. v. Wimpey Construction UK Ltd. [1980] 1 WLR 277, 283, "there are many situations of daily life which do not fit neatly into conceptual analysis, but which require some flexibility in the law of contract."

It seems to me that a more realistic and practical solution is to permit the contracting party to recover damages for the loss which he and a third party has suffered, being duly accountable to them in respect of their actual loss, than to construct a theoretical loss in law on the part of the contracting party, for which he may be under no duty to account to anyone since it is to be seen as his own loss. The solution is required where the law will not tolerate a loss caused by a breach of contract to go uncompensated through an absence of privity between the party suffering the loss and the party causing it. In such a case, to avoid the legal black hole, the law will deem the innocent party to be claiming on behalf of himself and any others who have suffered loss. It does not matter that he is not the owner of the property affected, nor that he has not himself suffered any economic loss. He sues for all the loss which has been sustained and is accountable to the others to the extent of their particular losses. While it may be that there is no necessary right in the third party to compel the innocent employer to sue the contractor, in the many cases of the domestic or familial situation that consideration should not be a realistic problem. In the commercial field, in relation to the interests of such persons as remoter future proprietors who are not related to the original employer, it may be that a solution by way of collateral warranty would still be required. If there is an anxiety lest the exception would permit an employer to receive excessive damages, that should be set at rest by the recognition of the basic requirement for reasonableness which underlies the quantification of an award of damages. . . .

LORD GOFF OF CHIEVELEY:

. . . There are, as I understand the case, essentially two questions which your Lordships have to consider: (1) whether Panatown is entitled to recover substantial damages from McAlpine in respect of the assumed breaches by McAlpine of the building contract, notwithstanding that at all material times Panatown had no proprietary interest in the site of the development; and (2) if so, whether the existence of the direct right of action by the owners of the site, UIPL, against McAlpine under the DCD precluded Panatown from recovering substantial damages from McAlpine.

I turn therefore to the first question. Here Panatown presented its case primarily on the basis of Lord Griffiths' broader ground in the St. Martin's case [1994] 1 AC 85; though in the alternative it was prepared, if necessary, to fall back on the rule in Dunlop v. Lambert, 6 Cl. & F. 600 as adopted by the majority of the Appellate Committee in the St. Martin's case. It was, however, submitted on behalf of McAlpine that it was not open to Panatown to invoke the broader ground. Its submission was that the prospect of imminent legislative reform of the privity rule, in the form of the Contract (Rights of Third Parties) Bill already before Parliament, both removed the need for, and rendered illegitimate, any further judicial activism in the field which was subject of the appeal; and that the present case therefore fell to be decided solely on the basis of the exception to the “privity/loss rules” as laid down in the The Albazero [1977] AC 774, and explained and applied by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in the St. Martin’s case. There is, I believe, little doubt that the choice by the parties of their respective grounds was largely dictated by the possible impact of the DCD upon Panatown’s claim to substantial damages under the building contract. On McAlpine’s approach, it was open to it to argue that, by reason of the exception identified by Lord Diplock in The Albazero, the existence of the DCD precluded any claim by Panatown to substantial damages for breach of the building contract; whereas, by invoking Lord Griffiths’ broader ground, Panatown could at least avoid that trap, though a claim on the broader ground presented its own difficulties.

Two questions therefore arise at the threshold of the argument in this case: (1) Which is the preferable approach to the appeal? And (2) What is the impact, if any, of the imminence of statutory reform of the old privity rule? I shall now consider the first of these two questions, which is a fundamental question which lies at the heart of the case. The second question I shall postpone to a later stage.

(A) As we all know, from an early time the common law adopted a rule of privity of contract, by virtue of which only a party to the contract could enforce the contract. The rule, seen in the abstract, is rational and very understandable in a law of contract which includes the doctrine of consideration; but it has given rise to great problems in practice—because, both in commerce and in the domestic context, parties do enter into contracts which are intended to confer enforceable rights on third parties, and a rule of law which precludes a right of enforcement by a third party can therefore fail to give effect to the intention of the contracting parties and to the reasonable expectations of the third party. The existence of these problems led first of all to the recognition of a number of exceptions to the rule and ultimately, only last year, to its abolition by the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999.

(B) “There is, or is widely thought to be, a general rule that, where A commits a breach of his contract with B, then B can recover damages only in respect of his own loss and not in respect of loss suffered by a third party, C.” I adopt the words of Professor Treitel in (1998) 114 LQR 527, because, as I have already indicated, I share his scepticism about the existence of this “rule.” Plainly it is right that a contracting party should not use the remedy of damages to recover what has been described by Oliver J (as he then was) in a notable judgment (in Radford v. De Froberville [1977] 1 WLR 1262, 1270 as “an uncovenanted profit,” or indeed to impose on the other contracting party an uncovenanted burden. But if the supposed rule exists, it could deprive a contracting party of any effective remedy in the case of a contract which is intended to confer a benefit on a third party but not to confer on the third party an enforceable right. It is not surprising therefore to discover increasing concern on the part of scholars specialising in the law of contract that the supposed rule, if rigidly applied, can have the effect of depriving parties of the fulfilment of their reasonable contractual expectations, and to read of doubts on their part whether any such rule exists.

It is, I believe, important to keep these two problems distinct in our minds when addressing the basic question which arises in the present case. With this distinction in mind, let us look first of all at the rule in Dunlop v. Lambert 6 Cl. & F. 600. As Lord Diplock himself explained, this rule should be seen in context of commercial contracts concerning goods, and in particular of contracts for the carriage of goods by sea. It is a commonplace of such contracts that the goods may be shipped pursuant to a contract of sale, under which the property in the goods may pass to the consignee while the goods are in transit. However, the rule of privity of contract requires that, if the contract of carriage is (as it usually is) made between the consignor and the carrier, it can be enforced only by the consignor and not by the consignee. This creates manifest problems where the goods are lost or damaged in transit after the property in them has passed to the consignee. The rule in Dunlop v. Lambert provided a practical solution to these problems by giving the consignor the right to recover damages for such loss or damage for the benefit of the consignee, to whom he was accountable. The shortcoming of this rule must, I imagine, have been that it left the initiative with the seller, rather than with the consignee who was the person who had suffered the loss of or damage to the goods. It is not surprising, therefore, that Parliament intervened only fifteen years later, in 1855, to pass the Bills of Lading Act of that year, under section 1 of which a person to whom the property in the goods had passed upon or by reason of the consignment to him of the goods or the indorsement to him of the bill of lading acquired a direct right of action against the shipowner on the terms of the bill of lading. (The Act of 1855 has recently been repealed and replaced by the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1992.) The more effective remedy given by statute must have meant that the useful life of the rule in Dunlop v. Lambert was relatively short. For present purposes, however, the important point is that the function of the rule was to escape the undesirable consequences of the privity rule in a particular context, though it had the incidental effect that, if there is a rule that a party can only recover damages for breach of contract in respect of his own loss, then the rule in Dunlop v. Lambert constitutes an exception to that rule.

Let me turn next to consider in this context Lord Griffiths' broad ground in the St. Martin's case. It is at once plain that Lord Griffiths was not concerned with a problem of privity of contract; on the contrary, he was concerned that a contracting party who contracts for a benefit to be conferred on a third party should himself have an effective remedy. He was moreover addressing not a special problem which arises in a particular context, such as carriage of goods by sea, but a general problem which arises in many different contexts in ordinary life, notably in the domestic context where parties may frequently contract for benefits to be conferred on others, though it may well arise in other contexts, such as charitable giving or even, as the present case shows, a commercial transaction. His problem was not, therefore, privity of contract; it was the rule, or supposed rule, that a party can only recover damages in respect of his own loss.

The purpose of this analysis is to demonstrate that, in my opinion, the invocation of the rule in Dunlop v. Lambert 6 Cl. & F. 600 in the present context is, I believe, inapposite. This is because we are not here addressing a problem of privity of contract. The problem is not that UIPL had no enforceable rights against McAlpine arising under the building contract: it was the evident intention that UIPL should not have such rights, its rights against McAlpine being restricted to different rights under a separate contract, the DCD. That the rule in Dunlop v. Lambert is inapposite in the present context is illustrated in particular by the irrelevance, in this context, of any contemplation that the property of the contracting party should be transferred to a third party—a feature which was regarded by Lord Diplock as a prerequisite of the application of the rule in Dunlop v. Lambert, and was fortuitously present in the St. Martin's case [1994] 1 AC 85. An indication that any such prerequisite is irrelevant in the present context may be derived from the fact that, in the next case in which the St. Martin's case was applied, Darlington Borough Council v. Wiltshier Northern Limited [1995] 1 WLR 68, there was no such feature and yet its absence was ignored by the Court of Appeal, no doubt because they felt that it did not matter. The same applies to the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the present case. In truth, what we are concerned with here is the effectiveness of the rights conferred on Panatown under the building contract itself. . . .

It follows, in my opinion, that the principal argument advanced on behalf of McAlpine is inconsistent with authority and established principle. This conclusion may involve a fuller recognition of the importance of the protection of a contracting party's interest in the performance of his contract than has occurred in the past. But not only is it justified by authority, but the principle on which it is based is supported by a number of distinguished writers, notably Professor Brian Coote and Mr Duncan Wallace QC.

However, as I have already recorded, it was the submission of McAlpine that your Lordships should regard any such development in the law as a matter for legislation, presumably after a reference to the Law Commission. This submission was made on the basis that the Lord Chancellor had introduced into Parliament a Bill—the Contract (Rights of Third Parties) Bill, based on a Report by the Law Commission, designed to bring about a radical reform of the privity rule, and that the prospect of this imminent legislation rendered illegitimate any further judicial activism in the field which was the subject of the present appeal. That Bill is now on the statute book: see the Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999.

I am unable to accept this submission. As I have previously explained, this case is not concerned with privity of contract. There is no question of a third party here seeking to enforce a jus quaesitus tertio—i.e., of UIPL enforcing a right arising under the contract between McAlpine and Panatown. On the contrary, the reason why Panatown contracted as employer under the building contract with McAlpine was so that UIPL, although the owner of the site, should not do so. Even if the new Act had been in force at the material time, it would not have given UIPL any right to enforce the building contract, or any provision of it, against McAlpine. . . .

Furthermore, as I have just indicated, full recognition of the importance of the performance interest will open the way to principled solution of other well-known problems in the law of contract, notably those relating to package holidays which are booked by one person for the benefit not only of himself but of others, normally members of his family (as to which see Jackson v. Horizon Holidays Ltd. [1975] 1 WLR 1468), and other cases of a similar kind referred to by Lord Wilberforce in his opinion in the Woodar Investment case at p. 283—cases of an everyday kind which are calling out for a sensible solution on a principled basis. Even if it is not thought, as I think, that the solution which I prefer is in accordance with existing principle, nevertheless it is surely within the scope of the type of development of the common law which, especially in the law of obligations, is habitually undertaken by appellate judges as part of their ordinary judicial function. That such developments in the law may be better left to the judges, rather than be the subject of legislation, is now recognised by the Law Commission itself, because legislation within a developing part of the common law can lead to ossification and a rigid segregation of legal principle which disfigures the law and impedes future development of legal principle on a coherent basis. It comes as no surprise therefore that, in its Report on “Privity of Contract: Contracts for the Benefit of Third Parties, (1996) (Law Com. No. 242) para. 5.15, the Law Commission declined to make specific recommendations in relation to the promisee’s remedies in a contract for the benefit of a third party (here referring to The Albazero [1977] AC 774 and Linden Gardens Trust Ltd. v. Lenesta Sludge Disposals Ltd. (the St. Martin’s case) [1994] 1 AC 85 as cases in which “the courts have gone a considerable way towards developing rules which in many appropriate cases do allow the promisee to recover damages on behalf of the third party”), and stated that the Commission “certainly . . . would not wish to forestall further judicial development of this area of the law of damages.” This certainly does not sound like a warning to judicial trespassers to keep out of forbidden territory; see also para. 11. 22, concerned with the problem of double liability—which I shall have to consider at a later stage.

The present case provides, in my opinion, a classic example of a case which falls properly within the judicial province. I, for my part, have therefore no doubt that it is desirable, indeed essential, that the problem in the present case should be the subject of judicial solution by providing proper recognition of the plaintiff’s interest in the performance of the contractual obligations which are owed to him. I cannot see why the proposed statutory reform of the old doctrine of privity of contract should inhibit the ordinary judicial function, and so prevent your Lordships’ House from doing justice between the parties in the present case. As I have said, the principal function of this submission of McAlpine appears to have been to restrict the argument of Panatown to the narrower ground in Dunlop v. Lambert 6 Cl. & F. 600 and by so doing to enable McAlpine to argue that, on that basis, the cause of action by Panatown under the building contract was excluded by the separate contractual right afforded to the building owner, UIPL, under the DCD. That is a matter which I will have to address when I come to consider the second issue in the case. . . .

Your Lordships were assisted by a presentation by Mr Jeremy Nicholson, junior counsel for Panatown, on the applicable German law, for which I was grateful. This was founded upon advice received from Hannes Unberath, recently a graduate student at Worcester College, Oxford, and the author of an interesting case note on the present case in the Law Quarterly Review: see (1999) 115 LQR 535. His thesis is that, in Germany, the present case would be decided in favour of Panatown on the basis of a principle called Drittschadenliquidation, which has been loosely translated into English as “transferred loss”—an expression which I have myself adopted from time to time, though not I fear with any great accuracy. Indeed the concept is not an easy one for a common lawyer to grasp; and, with all respect to Unberath, I do not feel sufficiently secure to adopt it as part of my reasoning in this opinion. Even so, I find it comforting (though not surprising) to be told that in German law the same conclusion would be reached as I have myself reached on the facts of the present case. I have however also been struck by the provisions of paras. 633 and 635 of the BGB, falling within the Seventh Title entitled Contract for Work. I note (from Ian Forrester’s translation of 1975) that the remedies under these two paragraphs (for defective work and for non-fulfilment) are vested in “the customer,” and that there is no indication that the situation might be different if the property on which the work is to be done is vested in a person other than the customer. . . .

LORD MILLETT

. . . In the St. Martins case [1994] 1 AC 85, 96–98 Lord Griffiths refused to accept the proposition that in the case of a contract for work, labour and the supply of materials the recovery of more than nominal damages should depend on the plaintiff having a proprietary interest in the subject matter of the contract at the date of breach. He observed that in every day life contracts for work and labour are constantly placed by persons who have no proprietary interest in the subject matter of the contract. He instanced the common case where the matrimonial home is owned by the wife, the couple’s other assets belong to the husband and he is the sole earner. The house requires a new roof and the husband places a contract with a local builder to carry out the work. The husband contracts as principal and not as agent for his wife because only he can pay for the work. The builder fails to repair the roof properly and the husband has to call in and pay another builder to complete the work. Lord Griffiths considered that it would be absurd to say that the husband has suffered no loss because he does not own the property. He suggested that the husband has suffered loss because he did not receive the bargain for which he contracted with the first builder and the measure of damages is the cost of securing performance of that bargain by having the repairs done properly by the second builder. . . .

To my mind the most significant feature of the academic literature is that no one has suggested that the adoption of the broad ground would have any adverse consequences on commercial arrangements. Nor, despite every incentive to do so, has McAlpine been able to suggest a situation in which it would cause difficulties or defeat the commercial expectations of the parties. In my view it would help to rationalise the law and provide a sound basis for decisions like Ruxley Electronics and Construction Ltd. v. Forsyth [1996] AC 344 and Jackson v. Horizon Holidays Ltd. [1975] 1 WLR 1468. If it is adopted, it will be for future consideration whether it would provide the better solution in cases such as St. Martin also. . . .

It must be wrong to adopt a Procrustean approach which leaves parties without a remedy for breach of contract because their arrangements do not fit neatly into some pre-cast contractual formula. When such arrangements have been freely entered into and are of an everyday character or are commercially advantageous to the parties, it is surely time to re-examine the position.

This is the product of the narrow accountants’ balance sheet quantification of loss which measures the loss suffered by the promisee by the diminution in his overall financial position resulting from the breach. One of the consequences of this approach is to produce an artificial distinction between a contract for the supply of goods to a third party and a contract for the supply of services to a third party. A man who buys a car for his wife is entitled to substantial damages if an inferior car is supplied, on the assumption (not necessarily true) that the property in the car is intended to vest momentarily in him before being transferred to his wife, whereas a man who orders his wife’s car to be repaired is entitled to nominal damages only if the work is imperfectly carried out. This is surely indefensible; the reality of the matter is that in both cases the man is willing to undertake a contractual liability in order to be able to provide a benefit to his wife.

The idea that a contracting party is entitled to damages measured by the value of his own defeated interest in having the contract performed was not new in 1994. A strong case for its adoption in the case of consumer contracts was made in an important Article “The Consumer Surplus” [1979] 95 LQR 581, in which the authors explained that this would make a significant difference only in a minority of cases. As I shall show, the language of defeated expectation has been employed in the context of building contracts, at least in ordinary two-party cases like Ruxley, since the nineteenth century. . . .

8. ECONOMIC LOSS (LEGAL MALPRACTICE)

Case 27

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 19 JANUARY 1977 NJW 1977, 2073 = VERSR 1977, 638

The defendant is an attorney who represented the plaintiff’s father in divorce proceedings. In January 1972 the plaintiff’s father and mother met in the defendant’s office, where they signed a divorce agreement drawn up by the defendant. It contained the following clause:

§ 6. As to the house, the parties agree that the half belonging to Mrs M is to be transferred to the three children in equal parts. Mr M hereby agrees not to sell his half but to transfer it to his present legitimate children. An appropriate notarial contract to this effect is to be concluded immediately after the divorce is final. Mr M further promises that once the divorce is final he will indemnify Mrs M against any liabilities arising from the house or its construction. . . .

A divorce decree was granted in February 1972, and the defendant, in the name of the plaintiff’s father, thereupon waived any rights of appeal, as did the mother’s attorney. The plaintiff’s mother now refuses to transfer her interest in the property to the plaintiff and his siblings.

The plaintiff claims damages for breach of the defendant’s duty as attorney. The Landgericht rejected the claim but the Oberlandesgericht allowed it. The defendant was permitted to appeal, but his appeal was dismissed.

I. [the reasoning of the Court of Appeal.]

II. Despite the appellant’s contentions, this reasoning is sound in law.

1. [The defendant was in breach of his duty as attorney.]

2. Nor is there anything wrong in law with the Court of Appeal’s holding that although there was no contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, the plaintiff could sue the defendant for damages for his faulty breach of contract.

(a) The Court of Appeal found that there was here a contract with protective effect for third parties and that the plaintiff’s claim arose therefrom. We do not have to decide whether this is so.

(aa) Certainly an important factor pointing in that direction is that the plaintiff was the son of the attorney’s client and was entitled to care and protection from him (compare BGHZ 61, 227, 233). The usual problem in cases of contracts with protective effects for third parties is whether the victim was someone the debtor could expect to be harmed by a breach of the contract. That is not the problem here. The very words of § 6 of the divorce agreement drawn up by the defendant show that the children were its sole beneficiaries, the only people apt to suffer if the agreement proved invalid.

The only question here is how far the protective effect of this contract works in favour of the children, in particular whether they have any claim for damages for breach of contract in their own right. Now the contract between client and attorney is such, given its nature and structure, that it can only be very seldom, whether one interprets the contract extensively or invokes § 242 BGB (see BGHZ 56, 269, 273; NJW 1975, 977), that the duties it generates can be sued on by third parties, for the fiduciary relationship between client and attorney makes it strongly bilateral and self-contained [references omitted]. Thus the fact that third parties have an interest in what an attorney does will not normally lead to any extension of his liability, even if those persons are named or known to him. However, an exception must be made where a contract drafted by the attorney is designed to vest rights in third parties specified therein, especially third parties who, as in the present case, are represented by the client. It is true that most of the cases where the courts have granted third parties a claim for damages arising out of a contract to which they were not parties have involved personal injury or property damage and its consequences (BGHZ 49, 350, 355; NJW 1955, 257; [other references omitted]), but it is not impossible for a third party to have a personal claim for economic loss caused by breach of subsidiary contractual duties (NJW 1968, 1929; BGH NJW 1975, 344). In drawing the line here one must certainly apply an especially stringent test: the circle of persons to whom the protective effect of a contract extends is to be narrowly drawn, so as to avoid blurring the line between contractual and tortious liability in an unacceptable manner (BGHZ 66, 51, 57; NJW 1974, 1189). It must always be borne in mind, in claims for purely economic loss, that the debtor is not to be made liable for the mere ricochet effect of his conduct on third parties.

(bb) Despite this, we cannot, on the special facts of the present case, fault the Court of Appeal's holding that the plaintiff was drawn into the protective ambit of the attorney's contract. The respondent invokes a decision of this court of 6 July 1965 (NJW 1965, 1955), but this is not quite in point. The court there did allow the daughter of a client to sue the attorney although she was not herself a party to the contract, but the court was reluctant to categorise the contract as one with protective effect for third parties [references omitted]. Contracts with protective effect for third parties are concerned with breach of subsidiary duties by the contractor (see BGH NJW 1975, 344), whereas in that case the question was really whether the attorney could be made liable towards the client's daughter, the third party, for a breach of specific duties of performance [reference omitted]. Our case is clearly distinguishable.

(b) The plaintiff might also base his claim here on the concept of Drittschadensliquidation, a doctrine which borders on, if it does not actually overlap, the area of application of the doctrine of contracts with protective effect for third parties (see BGHZ 49, 350, 355). It would have been quite proper for the defendant's client to indemnify his son, the plaintiff, for the harm he had suffered, and one could then infer from the fact that he brought suit as his son's statutory representative that he was making an assignment of his own claim which the plaintiff, on the threshold of majority, could implicitly accept. But we need not pursue the matter here.

(c) In whatever legal or doctrinal category one puts the present litigated facts, the result must be that the plaintiff has a direct claim against the defendant attorney for compensation for the harm which he suffered as a result of the defendant's failure to tell his father of the need to implement the agreement in § 6 of the divorce document. Any other conclusion would be inconsistent with the meaning and purpose of the attorney's contract here and of the father-son relationship between the client and the plaintiff of which the defendant was well aware.

Notes to Case 27

1. Lawyers can through their negligence harm the interests of: (i) their clients and (ii) third parties. Increased litigation under the first heading, spurned no doubt by liability insurance becoming compulsory (as it is in Germany or France) or widespread (as it is in England and the USA), has led in some countries (e.g. the USA) to the flourishing of courses on Professional Responsibility. England, on the other hand, has for a long time refused to follow suit, steadfastly clinging to archaic immunities accorded to barristers (but not solicitors who, in fact, were the first that had to be insured) for work done in court (see Rondel v. Worsley [1969] 1 AC 191). Recently the House of Lords departed from Rondel v. Worsley in Arthur JS Hall & Co v. Simons [2000] 3 WLR 543. Lord Steyn's speech in particular contains some insights which are especially interesting from a comparative perspective. Their Lordships acknowledged that in the light of changes in the law of negligence, the functioning of the legal profession, the administration of justice, and public perceptions towards lawyers, the time had come to reconsider the immunity of advocates from suit. It was thus held that none of the reasons once advanced in favour of immunity (e.g. "cab rank" rule; the analogy to immunity of witnesses; the duty advocates had towards the court; and the public policy against re-litigating a decision) could nowadays justify it in relation to civil proceedings. A minority was also prepared to abandon the immunity in the context of criminal proceedings Lord Millet remarked (at p. 623): "I think the public would at best regard such a result [majority] as incomprehensible and at worst greet it with derision". It is worth noting perhaps that English barristers, unlike their colleagues on the Continent, do not enter into contracts with their clients (or solicitors); and they may not sue for their fees. Therefore, the principle established in Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v. Heller & Partners Ltd [1964] AC 465 provides the only route of recovery available against barristers. In that case the rule was established that, irrespective of contract, if someone possessed of a special skill undertakes to apply that skill for the assistance of another who relies upon such skill, a duty of care will arise. Seen in a Commonwealth context, the decision of the House of Lords is remarkable. For the High Court of Australia in Gianarelli v. Wraith (1988) 165 CLR 543, and the Court of Appeal of New Zealand in Rees v. Sinclair [1974] 1 NZLR 180, had come to the conclusion that public policy considerations justified the immunity and had followed the Rondel case. Canada on the other hand "had got on perfectly well without an immunity for over a hundred years", as was pointed out by Lord Hoffmann, at p. 567. So the decision not only brings English law closer to Continental European practice than it was before; it also confirms the current trend of disunity in the Common law. Notwithstanding the above result in practice, the attempt to draw on the experience of Continental Europe did not meet with wide approval. The main objection against drawing on the experience of civil law systems was derived from the difference in legal culture. The most sceptical of their Lordships was the Scottish judge, Lord Hope of Craighead, who although in the end also argued against the immunity rule, stressed that "the much wider scope which is accorded to the judicial function under the continental systems makes it very difficult to draw any useful comparisons." (at p. 593). At the other end of the spectrum was Lord Steyn who, as has already been noted, is a keen student of comparative law. The learned Law Lord was thus prepared to downplay the cultural differences between Common and modern civil law because he could see that the absence of an immunity has not caused any practical difficulties in other countries in the European Union. (Lord Hoffmann used the same argument by looking at the Canadian experience.)

For reasons of space we cannot engage in a comprehensive comparison of this point, but a number of observations can be made that would suggest that the divergence between Common and modern civil law may have been somewhat overstated by their lordships. Thus, it is certainly true to say that the control of a civilian judge over the proceedings is greater than that exercised by a judge in England. (See Kötz “Zur Funktionsteilung zwischen Richter und Anwalt im deutschen und englischen Zivilprozeß” in Graveson (ed.) Festschrift für Imre Zajtay (1982) 276–293 who points out that the German system with its proactive judge is geared towards dealing with small claims as well.) The Zivilprozeßreformgesetz of 27 July 2001, which comes into force on 1 January 2002, deepens this divergence by further widening the powers of the judge, thus giving him even more control over the proceedings. But, as Lord Steyn remarked, in the light of the Woolf reforms, the difference as to the role of the judge between England and the Civilian systems may become less significant. (At p. 552.) To this one might add that although the role of the Continental judge is a more interventionist, the ultimate control over the proceedings is entirely in the hand of the parties—a point often either missed or under-estimated by Common lawyers. (Dispositions-maxime; Zöller-Greger Zivilprozeßordnung Kommentar (22nd edn. 2001) vor § 128 Rn. 9.) Thus, the subject matter of the proceedings is defined by the parties, § 308 ZPO; and the judge, though managerial in his role, also has to exercise self-restraint in giving directions or hints to the parties: § 139 ZPO. The civilian judge will also take careful account of the legal arguments made before him just as much the judge in England will do. The BVerfG recently reaffirmed (WuM 1999, 383) that it is the court’s duty to apply and interpret the law according to the principle of iura novit curia. However, the Constitutional court was also keen to stress that if one party puts forward a specific interpretation of the law the court has to take account of its submissions and deal with them in the reasons it gives in its decision. If it does not, it treats the parties as mere objects of the judicial process and violates their rights under Article 103 I GG (“rechtliches Gehör”).

A second allegedly crucial difference between the two systems is this. Lord Steyn accepted that the duty of an advocate in a civilian system was less extensive than in England. For instance, in Germany there is no duty to refer the court to adverse authorities. (See at p. 553.) However, the advocate in Germany assumes a position which (in theory at least) goes beyond that of a mere “service provider” to his client. § 1 Bundesrechtsanwaltsordnung (BRAO) thus states that the Rechtsanwalt is an “independent agent in the development of the legal order” (Organ der Rechtspflege). The advocate thus has to exercise his profession in the light of the trust that is placed upon him in his capacity as advocate. (§ 43 BRAO.) The law imposes a number of restrictions on freedom of contract in this area; for instance it prohibits contingency fees (§ 49b II BRAO) or fees that are below the level prescribed by statute (§ 49b I BRAO). The breach of some of the advocate’s duties also entails criminal sanctions in addition to possible civil liability towards his own client. For an advocate may not act, even indirectly, for both parties at the same time, § 356 StGB; and he must not knowingly make false statements to the court. This brief survey demonstrates that German advocates do owe duties not only to their clients but also to the public at large, even though in some respects they may be less pronounced than the duties that an English barrister may owe to the court. Finally, it is ironic to note that while the German advocate does not owe the court a duty to refer it to authorities that go against the interests of his client—because the court is supposed to know the law—he breaches his duty towards the client if he ignores such authorities and as a result does not accurately advise him as to the outcome of the litigation. The standard applied by German courts in this respect is so high that it has attracted criticism from some authors as being excessive and controversial. (See, Vollkommer Anwaltshaftungsrecht (1989), 63 with references.)

2. In those cases, where liability is possible in theory (but by no means easily engaged in practice), two problems have attracted the attention of the courts. The first is connected with the difficulties of assessing what would the chances have been of the disgruntled client/plaintiff but for the negligence of his legal adviser. The second is connected with the curious, if not unjustified, willingness of some American courts to set the standard of expected care at a very low level (note, for example, Lucas v. Hamm 56 Cal. 2d 583, 364 P. 2d 685 (1961) where the court was prepared to characterise as non-negligent an attorney who failed to take proper notice of the rule against perpetuities on the ground that it is widely misunderstood by the profession!). (For a comparative study of the problems of professional malpractice (including medical malpractice which is treated with less indulgence by the courts) see chapter 6 of vol. XI of the International Encyclopedia of Comparative Law.)

3. Case 27 deals with a different problem: can a lawyer owe a duty to third persons who are not his clients? The German decision invites comparison with such cases as Biakanja v. Irving 49 Cal. 2d 647, 320 P. 2d 16 (1958) (pleaded in tort), Lucas v. Hamm, above, (pleaded in contract and tort) and Heyer v. Flaig (74 Cal. Rptr. 225; 449 P. 2d 161 (1969)) decided in tort in the USA, and Ross v. Caunters [1980] Ch. 297 and White v. Jones (pleaded in tort only) in England. Similarities and differences must again be stressed.

(i) The first point to note is, again, the tendency of German law to base its solution on contract. That contract cannot easily explain all such cases is obvious not only by the court's own review of the precedents but also by a certain unease it experiences in utilising the notion of contract with protective effects vis-à-vis third parties or the theory of "transferred loss" (Drittschadensliquidation), both briefly explained above (chapter 2, section A, 2 (d) (iii) (e)). The first German decision on the subject—BGH NJW 1965, 1955; JZ 1966, 141 note Lorenz—relied on the notion of contract with protective effects vis-à-vis third parties and found for the plaintiff, though one is inclined to believe that the theory of transferred loss might have been an even more appropriate device. (This case is discussed in English by Lorenz in "Some Thoughts about Contract and Tort" Essays in Memory of Professor F. H. Lawson (1986) 86 ff.) Incidentally, the granting of an action against the attorney (for a sum equal to the void legacy) can in practice result in a "double-legacy"—a point that has troubled some commentators. (See Kegel, "Die 'lachenden Doppelerben': Erbfolge beim Versagen von Urkundspersonen", Festschrift für Flume (1978) I, 545. This argument, however, has been rejected both in England (White v. Jones, supra) and in Germany (see: BGH 12 June 1979, Zeitschrift für das Gesamte Familienrecht 1980, 133 and Lorenz and Markesinis (1993) 56 MLR 558 et seq.)

(ii) The contract versus tort approach must not only be noted but also examined, especially since some American decisions (e.g. Heyer v. Flaig, 74 Cal. Rptr. 225; 449 P. 2d 161 (1969)) have gone as far as suggesting that the distinction may be meaningless. It is submitted that it is not, and American law may be the poorer for ignoring some of the practical consequences of a proper doctrinal characterisation. Here are some:

(a) Jurisdiction. The choice-orientated approach adopted by conflicts rules in cases of contract seems more appropriate in these types of cases than the locus of the accident tort approach. In any event, it would be odd if the dispute between plaintiff and defendant/debtor were subject to one rule and the relationship between defendant/debtor and creditor were governed by a different law. (See Fig. 2.) We can, of course, again allow the contractual relationship to influence the tort action (as Tobriner J. suggested in Heyer v. Flaig 74 Cal. Rptr. 225, 449 P. 2d 161 (1969)); but why not opt more openly for the more straightforward contractual reasoning? (The potential impact that the choice of contract or tort can have on jurisdiction can be seen in factual variations of cases such as Bryant Electric Co. v. City of Fredericksburg, 762 F. 2d 1192 (1985) and Blake Construction Co. v. Alley, 353 SE 2d 724 (1987) both of which represent variations on the J'Aire and Junior Books theme.)

(b) Liability for omissions. Traditional tort theory would deny liability where the debtor/defendant has remained inactive rather than acted badly. A contractual solution could make the defendant/debtor liable both for non-feasance and misfeasance. Should this be regarded as excessively onerous for the defendant/debtor it may still be avoided through the use of Drittschadensliquidation or the German notion of contract with protective effects vis-à-vis third parties, since this, it will be remembered, makes the debtor liable only for the bad or delayed performance of the secondary obligations of the contract. (The first German case was one of omission: BGH NJW 1965, 1955; JZ 1966, 141 (with note by Lorenz). Cf. the factually almost identical cases of Gartside v. Sheffield Young and Ellis [1983] NZLR 37 and Hof Amsterdam, NJ 1985, 40—the last two resorting to tort doctrine.)

(c) Measure of damages. The tort and contract measure of damages probably remains different despite Lord Denning's attempt to propose a compromise in H Parsons (Livestock) Ltd. v. Uttley Ingham and Co. Ltd. ([1978] QB 791). A contractual solution would favour the award of full expectation damages to the plaintiff/third party and this, again, is supported by German law. In the USA a tort solution would further justify a claim for punitive damages. Such a ridiculous claim was, in fact, made in Heyer v. Flaig.

(d) The limitation period. Both the length and starting point of the limitation period differ in contract and tort. It is submitted it would be impracticable if one relationship (plaintiff–defendant/debtor) were subject to one rule and the other relationship (debtor–creditor) governed by a different rule. This appears to be in principle the correct starting point but it must be admitted that in some cases it may cause problems. Thus, in the frustrated beneficiary type of case the right of the beneficiary to sue the testator lawyer is not identical to that of the testator since the harm suffered by each is different. Also, if the contractual period of limitation were to apply in exclusion of all tort remedy, it could harm the beneficiaries' interests in those systems where the contractual period of limitation is not substantially longer than the tort period of limitation.

(e) The standard of care. Few lawyers in England or in the USA seem to have considered points (a)–(d). More concern, however, has been shown about the standard of care that would be appropriate to the tort action and whether it would be different from that found in the debtor–creditor (contractual) relationship. German law, proceeding on contract theory, has not experienced this difficulty; and German writers, considering a hypothetical (for them) tort action have had no difficulty in saying that the tort standard of care should be determined by the contract. (Schlechtriem, Lorenz, op. cit.) American courts have taken a similar view; and both Lord Roskill (in Junior Books) and Robert Goff LJ (in The Aliakmon) saw little difficulty in adopting this reasoning in English law. Of course, the contractual solution avoids at a stroke these real or imaginary difficulties.

(f) Exemption clauses/defences. As a general rule in German law the contractual debtor can oppose against the third party/plaintiff all defences, etc., he may have against the contractual creditor (§ 334 BGB, but see now case 23, BGHZ 127, 378, above, as to the possibility of a waiver of this defence). The same reasoning applies where the action is in tort but the defendant is protected by an exclusion clause contained in a contract with protective effects towards third parties (case 57). The contractual solution makes this answer indisputable. In an obiter dictum in The Aliakmon Robert Goff LJ suggested that something similar should happen where the action was founded in tort ([1985] QB 350 at pp. 397–8) but details have not been worked out. Strangely enough, at least one first instance judgment in England has considered a variant to this problem and, incidentally, suggests a misunderstanding as to how contracts in favour of third parties work.

(iii) In Southern Water Authority v. Carey ([1985] 2 All ER 1077) the court was not asked to decide whether the defendant sub-contractor (debtor) could oppose against the owner/plaintiff (third party) the exemption clauses that he (the sub-contractor) had in his contract with the main contractor (creditor); instead the court was faced with a claim by the sub-contractor to oppose against the owner a clause which the main contractor had in his contract with the owner. The court thought he could do so and, I believe, the solution displays a misunderstanding of how this triangular relationship should work. It is submitted that had a contractual explanation been used this misunderstanding would not have occurred.

In Carey the plaintiffs (or, rather, their predecessors in title) engaged the first defendants as consulting engineers and the second defendants as main contractors in the building of certain sewage works. The second defendants in turn engaged the third and fourth defendants as sub-contractors. Clause 30 of the work contract between the plaintiffs and the second defendants (main contractors) contained an exemption clause. Subsection (VI) of this clause stated that “for the purposes of this sub-clause the Contractor contracts on his own behalf and on the behalf of and as trustee for his sub-contractors, servants and agents”. The main contractors having ceased trading, the action for defective workmanship and materials proceeded against the two sub-contractors. At this stage it is worth noting that while the fourth defendant/sub-contractor had in his contract with the main contractor a term almost identical to Clause 30 of the main contract, the third defendants/sub-contractors, when negotiating with the main contractor, had insisted on their own, different, limitation clause. (Though we are nowhere told in what respect the two sets of terms differed, one must assume that the contractor's terms were more advantageous to the defendants/sub-contractors than their own terms, for otherwise why did they try to invoke their protection?) The Court, applying the tort reasoning of Junior Books, accepted that the plaintiff had a cause of action. Unlike Junior Books, however, the plaintiff was faced with a defence put forward by the defendant. This was based on an exclusion clause contained not in his (the sub-contractor's) contract with the main contractor (in which case the position could have been similar to The Aliakmon), but on the exclusion clause contained in the contract between the plaintiff and the main contractor (and which the third defendant/sub-contractor had, as stated, rejected). Diagrammatically the difference from The Aliakmon case can be shown as in Fig. 2.

As stated, the court was prepared to allow a tort action by the employer against the sub-contractor but was also willing to give the latter the protection of the clause contained in the contract between employer and main contractor. One reason was that the nature of this limitation clause was relevant in defining the scope of the duty of the sub-contractor in tort. Another explanation was the use of the notion of volenti. The judge expressly excluded the latter concept (ibid. at p. 1085a); but later in his judgment he appears to have come very close to accepting it (or something very similar to this concept) since he said: "As the plaintiffs . . . did . . . choose to limit the scope of the sub-contractor's liability, I see no reason why such limitation should not be honoured." (Ibid. at pp. 1086 f.) Is the reasoning of this decision and its result acceptable? I confess I have doubts as to both.

It is first of all interesting to note that in Carey the court did not follow The Eurymedon (New Zealand Shipping Co. Ltd. v. A. M. Satterthwaite and Co. Ltd., [1975] AC 154) reasoning in order to achieve its result. The artificiality of the contractual reasoning in that case has been noted by many lawyers; but it was reaffirmed by the Privy Council in Port Jackson Stevedoring Pty. Ltd v. Salmond and Spraggon (Australia) Pty. Ltd., The New York Star ([1981] 1 WLR 138) so the judge in Carey was obviously anxious not to challenge it openly. On the other hand, it was not used either, so those opposed to The Eurymedon result and reasoning might be able to argue that in future it may be limited to the special shipping context of such cases. This still, however, leaves open the question of how to explain Carey.

One could, nowadays, construe Carey as a case of contract in favour of third party (and, for brevity's sake we include in this term the contract with protective effects vis-à-vis third parties). After all, Carey is, in one respect, very similar to Junior Books; the owner could be seen as the third party beneficiary of the contract between sub-contractor (promisor) and main contractor (promisee). This construction, of course, was for a long time unacceptable de lege lata given the traditional English notion of privity. It is now, under Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999 s. 1, conceivable to apply a solution which is very similar indeed to the solution developed by the German courts on the basis of the contract with protective effects towards third parties. (See case 57 which is best understood in conjunction with case 110 concerning liability regimes in labour law). This is somewhat ironic, for the Law Commission indicated that it was not its intention to extend the reform to situations that fall under the German concept of a contract with protective effects (Law Com No 242 (1996) 2.14 n. 22). The present instance is an example where the scope of the contract with protective effects and the 1999 Act overlap. However, this statement retains its validity with regard to other situations such as in White v. Jones and similar cases which are traditionally solved by applying the principle in Hedley Byrne. (See, for instance, example 16, Law Com No 242 (1996) para. 7.43. B & Co's standard form of building contract contains an exclusion clause which excludes the liability of "all agents, servants, employees and subcontractors" engaged by B & Co in the performance of the contract. A & Co, a developer using B & Co's services, discovers that the building is defective. The surveyor engaged by B & Co to carry out the site survey, Mr C, has been negligent. Mr C seeks to claim the benefit of the exclusion clause in A & Co's contract with B & Co to prevent A & Co from recovering against him in tort for negligence. The Commission suggests that "Mr C would succeed under the first limb of our test or, on the basis that the exclusion clause is a promise to confer a benefit (the exclusion of liability) on Mr C, who is expressly identified by class, under the second limb.")

But even if it were accepted it would still not explain the second part of Carey namely the allowing to the promisor the defences that the promisee had against the third party. For in contracts in favour of third parties it is the reverse that is allowed: namely the promisor can oppose against the third party the defences he has in his contract with the promisee.

Can one then justify the outcome through tort reasoning? The judge in Carey did so by allowing the tort action to be shaped by the contract to which the plaintiff was a party but the defendant was not. In this he was clearly influenced by certain dicta contained in Lord Roskill's judgment in Junior Books v. Veitchi. (Lord Roskill refers there to "a relevant exclusion clause in the main contract".) With respect I do not find Lord Roskill's dicta as obvious as that, my inclination being to interpret them as referring to the second contract (sub-contractor–main contractor) and not to the first contract (between contractor and owner). I incline in favour of this view largely because Lord Roskill seemed to rely heavily in his relevant passage on Hedley Byrne; and there, apart from the fact that there were no contractual relations stricto sensu, the exemption clause was inserted by the second bank/defendant when replying to the plaintiff's bank and not by the plaintiff's bank (which was merely transmitting the information) to the plaintiff. The clause, in other words, was in the second not the first relationship. My own understanding of the Roskill dictum is also shared by the Court of Appeal in Muirhead v. Industrial Tank Specialities Ltd. ([1986] QB 507; Reynolds in (1986) 10 LMCLQ 97, 106 probably agrees). On the other hand, it must be admitted that this is not how the judge understood it in Carey; and his interpretation also has the important support of Professor Treitel (in (1986) 10 LMCLQ 294, 302). Clearly, therefore, the dictum has led to some confusion and should be clarified at the earliest possible opportunity. Nevertheless, even if it were eventually to be classified in the way it was understood in Carey it still does not, in my opinion, justify the actual outcome in that case. For in that case we were in fact faced with an interesting variant to the problem we have been discussing. Because in Carey the judge was faced with two sets of exemption clauses, one in the contract between owner and main contractor and one in the contract between main contractor and sub-contractor; and he allowed the sub-contractor the benefit of the first clause even though at the time of conclusion of the relevant contracts the sub-contractor had rejected it in favour of his own clause. I see no commercial reason justifying this result; nor do I think we can say that the plaintiff assented to a limited liability when the defendant, at the time of the making of the contracts, rejected the relevant limitation clause.

4. Contract or tort, the new action must be kept under control, especially where third parties/non-clients are concerned. American decisions are legion—see, for example: Victor v. Goldman, 74 Misc. 2d 685, 344 NYS 2d 672 (1973); Pelham v. Griesheimer, 93 Ill. App. 3d 751, 417 NE 2d 882 (1981), aff'd. 92 Ill. 2d 13, 440 NE 2d 96 (1982); Guy v. Liederbach, 459 A. 2d 744, 501 Pa. 47 (1983); Needham v. Hamilton 459 A. 2d 1060 (DC App. 1983); Flaherty v. Weinberg, 303 Md. 116, 492 A. 2d 618 (1985); Walker v. Lawson, 514 NE 2d 629 (Ind. App. 1987); Stinson v. Brand, 738 SW 2d 186 (Tenn., 1987); Mentzer and Rhey, Inc. v. Ferrari, 367 Pa. Super. 123, 532 A. 2d 484 (1987); Hale v. Groce 304 Or. 281, 744 P. 2d 1289 (1987); Simon v. Zipperstein 32 Ohio St. 3d 74, 512 NE 2d 636 (1987). Schreiner v. Scoville, 410 N.W. 2d, 679 (Iowa: 1987); Licata v. Spector, 225 A. 2d. 28 (Ct.1966) 61 ALR 4th 63–501 suggests that a majority of jurisdictions now favour plaintiffs—at least in the Ross v. Caunters type of situation. The end result, however, is not all that different from the more restrictive European (German and English) approach. Nevertheless the question remains whether the multi-criteria test enunciated in Biakanja v. Irving is more workable and (on balance) fairer than the contractual third party beneficiary doctrine. In this context consider: (i) why the six factors mentioned in Biakanja (320 P. 2d 16, 19) were subsequently reduced to five (the requirement that “moral blame [be] attached to the defendant’s conduct” has been dropped); (ii) whether the various criteria are cumulative or whether one of them is particularly important; (iii) that equal uncertainty seems to prevail on the requirements needed to be satisfied for the invocation of the third party beneficiary doctrine. In particular, who must intend to confer a benefit on the third party: the promisee (better view) or the promisee and the promisor? From the vast literature see: Bauman, “Damages for Legal Malpractice”, 61 Temple L. Rev. 1127 (1988); idem, “Lawyer Liability to Non-Clients”, 97 *Dickinson L. 5. Murphy v. Brentwood District Council [1991] 1 AC 398 undoubtedly marks the end of the expansive period of the tort of negligence that was initiated by Anns v. Merton London BC [1978] AC 728, but it did not put into question the principles established in Hedley Byrne. Thus the criteria of “reasonable reliance” and “assumption of responsibility” have remained a potential source for further expansionist tendencies. Indeed, in the nineties, the House of Lords made use of this possibility. Thus, once again, a series of decisions revealed a tendency to advance the frontiers of liability in negligence by applying Hedley Byrne beyond its factual limitations to performance of services. (Only this time the expansion followed the directions given in Murphy and Caparo and was attempted incrementally) White v. Jones is one example, but there are others. The most important must surely be Henderson v. Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1995] 2 AC 145, though Spring v. Guardian Assurance Plc [1995] 2 AC 296 is also noteworthy. (In that case the “statement”, a reference about an employee, was not addressed to the plaintiff but to his future potential employers. The plaintiff could thus not be said to have relied on the reference). In the Henderson case, the plaintiffs, underwriting members (“Names”) at Lloyd’s, brought proceedings against the defendant underwriting agents in which they alleged that the defendants were negligent in their conduct of the Names’ underwriting affairs and in breach of their legal obligations. The plaintiffs’ claims concerned the liability of members’ agents and of managing agents (to whom the performance of services had been delegated) towards Lloyd’s Names (so called “direct Names” and “indirect Names”, the latter are indirect Names in relation to managing agents since they do not enter into a contract with them).

The House of Lords held that a duty of care was owed by the agents in tort both to direct Names and indirect Names. The existence of such a duty of care was not excluded by virtue of the relevant contractual regime and that the Names were free to pursue their remedy either in contract or in tort. Lord Goff, who delivered the leading speech, explained the Hedley Byrne principle in the following—broad—way (at p. 180). “We can see that it rests upon a relationship between the parties, which may be general or specific to the particular transaction, and which may or may not be contractual in nature. All of their Lordships spoke in terms of one party having assumed or undertaken a responsibility towards the other. On this point, Lord Devlin spoke in particularly clear terms in both passages from his speech which I have quoted above. Further, Lord Morris spoke of that party being possessed of a “special skill” which he undertakes to “apply for the assistance of another who relies upon such skill.” But the facts of Hedley Byrne, itself, which was concerned with the liability of a banker to the recipient for negligence in the provision of a reference gratuitously supplied, show that the concept of a “special skill” must be understood broadly, certainly broadly enough to include special knowledge. Hedley Byrne was, of course, concerned with the provision of information and advice. But the example given by Lord Devlin of the relationship between solicitor and client, and his and Lord Morris’s statements of principle, show that the principle extends beyond the provision of information and advice to include the performance of other services. It follows that in the case of the provision of information and advice reliance upon it by the other party will be necessary to establish a cause of action (because otherwise the negligence will have no causative effect). Nevertheless, there may be other circumstances in which there will be the necessary reliance to give rise to the application of the principle. In particular, as cases concerned with solicitor and client demonstrate, where the plaintiff entrusts the defendant with the conduct of his affairs, in general or in particular, he may be held to have relied on the defendant to exercise due skill and care in such conduct.” The similarity to the criteria developed by the German courts in cases 19–24 and case 27, though obvious, must be stressed again.

6. As far as statements are concerned reliance is crucial to establish the statement’s causative effect: words rarely cause loss directly. It is, therefore, natural to take into account the range of persons who will rely on the statement by acting on it. The problem of an incremental extension of Hedley Byrne to deeds which cause loss more easily, is that “reasonable reliance” does not have the same limiting power. (Cf. White v. Jones [1995] 2 AC 207, 272 per Lord Browne-Wilkinson.) As Bingham LJ, as he then was, remarked in Simaan General Contracting Co. v. Pilkington Glass Ltd. (No. 2) [1988] QB 758, 775: “There is, of course, a sense in which it can be said that every successful plaintiff in an action of negligence has relied on the defendant not to be negligent, as every motorist relies on every other motorist in the vicinity to drive carefully.” Lord Goff, himself, (in the passage quoted above) defined reliance in such a weak sense that it can be hardly distinguished from the formulation of the “assumption of responsibility” principle. Accordingly, additional limiting factors are necessary and it is mainly due to Lord Goff’s approach that the principle of assumption of responsibility came to be viewed as the guiding one. But it should be noted that the principle is controversial. It has thus been often suggested that—being too vague and open-textured to provide a proper criterion of liability—it is merely a label for a conclusion reached on other grounds. (See, for instance, Lord Griffiths in Smith v. Eric S Bush [1990] 1 AC 831, 862. See, also, Cane Tort Law and Economic Interest (2nd ed, 1996), 185 and Whittaker (1996) 16 OJLS 191, 204–205, who prefers limited exceptions to privity to the tort route). Also, the interrelationship with the (though similarly vague) three-stage test in Caparo (foreseeability, proximity, policy) is not easy to ascertain. In Phelps v. Hillingdon LBC [2000] 3 WLR 776 the allegations concerned an educational psychiatrist who gave advice in the knowledge or expectation that the plaintiff would rely upon it. The case was argued on the Hedley Byrne principle.—In his judgment, Lord Slynn of Hadley stressed that the Caparo approach served to establish a sufficient nexus to give rise to a duty of care, while the “phrase of assumption of responsibility” meant “simply” that “the law recognises that there is a duty of care”. Responsibility was thus not deliberately assumed by the professional person but imposed by law under an objective test. (At p. 791.) In Lord Clyde’s view (at p. 807) the question did not arise in the present case, but he conceded that the expression may be “descriptive rather than definitive”. Lord Goff also stressed in Henderson (at p. 181) that the test was objective. However, he also added that, “once the case is identified as falling within the Hedley Byrne principle, there should be no need to embark upon any further enquiry whether it is “fair, just and reasonable” to impose liability for economic loss”.

7. Finally, Henderson v. Merrett (extracts are reproduced below) deserves special attention since it established that where both routes of recovery are available in principle a claimant can choose whether he frames his action in tort or contract. Lord Goff in this respect followed expressly the German model. His observations repay careful reading, not least because they trace the development of English law back to the abolition of the form of actions in the nineteenth century. To avoid a duplication of the arguments pro and con in relation to concurrence of actions, it may be sufficient to deal with one possible objection recently formulated by Mr Weir “The Staggering March of Negligence” in Cane and Stapleton (edd.) The Law of Obligations—Essays in Celebration of John Fleming (1998) 97 at pp. 118 ff. He pointed out that English law now in effect combined the French approach of allowing recovery of pure economic loss in tort with the German principle of concurrency of actions. “England has gone much further than either neighbour” since neither allowed a combination of both aspects. However, it should be clear from the examination of the contract with protective effects that according to that principle of German law liability is just as much imposed by law as it is under the Hedley Byrne principle of assumption of responsibility or reasonable reliance. As was emphasised by way of introduction to the notes to the cases on negligent misstatements, the different conceptual compartmentalisation does not fully reveal the principles in operation in this intricate area of the law. But if one adopts a functional approach, as we have attempted to do throughout these notes, then the alleged difference between English and German is less significant than it might appear at first sight. Outside the Hedley Byrne type of liability however, both English and German law, deny liability for pure economic loss in tort.

Addendum 1

Extracts from White v. Jones House of Lords [1995] 2 AC 207

Facts

The testator had two daughters: Carol White and Pauline Heath. When his wife died in January 1986 a family quarrel ensued as a result of which the testator proceeded to cut both his daughters out of his estate. In his will, executed in March 1986, he distributed his rather modest estate in various ways among three of his grandchildren and Mrs White’s first husband. Soon afterwards a reconciliation took place and the testator, regretting his rash action, informed his two daughters of the will and of his intention to change it. Both he and Mr Heath (a different son-in-law) contacted Mr Jones of the firm of defendant solicitors and gave both oral and written instructions for a new will under which the two daughters would inherit approximately two-thirds of the estate, the remainder being equally divided among all (five) grandchildren. Despite repeated communications, Mr Jones remained inactive though, in mid-August, and before leaving for his annual holiday, he did write an internal memo to a member of the firm's probate division informing him of the need to prepare a new will. A proposed meeting with the testator on 17 September never took place since the latter died a few days earlier. The two daughters, having failed to reach an amicable settlement between them as to the way the estate should be divided, sued the solicitors. At First Instance, Turner J dismissed their action, holding that though the solicitors had committed a serious wrong, they owed no duty of care to the plaintiffs. A unanimous Court of Appeal (consisting of the Vice Chancellor, and Lord Justices Farquarson and Steyn) reversed the decision. The House of Lords, by a majority, dismissed the appeal.

LORD GOFF OF CHIEVELEY

. . . I turn to the principal issue which arises on the appeal, which is whether in the circumstances of cases such as Ross v. Caunters and the present case the testator's solicitors are liable to the disappointed beneficiary. As I have already stated, the question is one which has been much discussed, not only in this country and other common law countries, but also in some civil law countries, notably Germany. There can be no doubt that Ross v. Caunters has been generally welcomed by academic writers (see eg Salmond and Heuston on the Law of Torts. (20th edn, 1992) pp. 215, 217, Winfield and Jolowicz on Tort (13th edn, 1989) pp. 88–89, 96, 106, Fleming on Torts (8th edn, 1993) p. 184 and Markesinis and Deakin on Tort Law (3rd edn, 1994) pp. 95–98). Furthermore, it does not appear to have been the subject of adverse comment in the higher courts in this country, though it has not been approved except by the Court of Appeal in the present case. Indeed, as far as I am aware, Ross v. Caunters has created no serious problems in practice since it was decided nearly 15 years ago. . . .

The conceptual difficulties

Even so, it has been recognised on all hands that Ross v. Caunters raises difficulties of a conceptual nature, and that as a result it is not altogether easy to accommodate the decision within the ordinary principles of our law of obligations. . . .

They are as follows. (1) First, the general rule is well established that a solicitor acting on behalf of a client owes a duty of care only to his client. The relationship between a solicitor and his client is nearly always contractual, and the scope of the solicitor's duties will be set by the terms of his retainer; but a duty of care owed by a solicitor to his client will arise concurrently in contract and in tort (see Midland Bank Trust Go Ltd v. Hett, Stubbs & Kemp (a firm) [1979] chapter 384, recently approved by your Lordships' House in Henderson v. Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1994] 3 WLR 761). But, when a solicitor is performing his duties to his client, he will generally owe no duty of care to third parties. Accordingly, as Nicholls V-C pointed out in the present case, a solicitor acting for a seller of land does not generally owe a duty of care to the buyer: see Gran Gelato Ltd v. Richcliff (Group) Ltd [1992] Ch 560. Nor, as a general rule, does a solicitor acting for a party in adversarial litigation owe a duty of care to that party's opponent: see AI-Kandari v. J R Brown & Go (a firm) [1988] QB 665 at 672 per Lord Donaldson MR. Further, it has been held that a solicitor advising a client about a proposed dealing with his property in his lifetime owes no duty of care to a prospective beneficiary under the client's then will who may be prejudicially affected: see Clarke v. Bruce Lance & Go (a firm) [1988] 1 WLR 881.

As I have said, the scope of the solicitor's duties to his client are set by the terms of his retainer; and as a result it has been said that the content of his duties is entirely within the control of his client. The solicitor can, in theory at least, protect himself by the introduction of terms into his contract with his client; but, it is objected, he could not similarly protect himself against any third party to whom he might be held responsible, where there is no contract between him and the third party.

In these circumstances, it is said, there can be no liability of the solicitor to a beneficiary under a will who has been disappointed by reason of negligent failure by the solicitor to give effect to the testator's intention. There can be no liability in contract, because there is no contract between the solicitor and the disappointed beneficiary; if any contractual claim was to be recognised, it could only be by way of a ius quaesitum tertio, and no such claim is recognised in English law. Nor could there be liability in tort, because in the performance of his duties to his client a solicitor owes no duty of care in tort to a third party such as a disappointed beneficiary under his client's will.

(2) A further reason is given which is said to reinforce the conclusion that no duty of care is owed by the solicitor to the beneficiary in tort. Here, it is suggested, is one of those situations in which a plaintiff is entitled to damages if, and only if, he can establish a breach of contract by the defendant. First, the plaintiff's claim is one for purely financial loss; and as a general rule, apart from cases of assumption of responsibility arising under the principle in Hedley Byrne & Co Ltd v. Heller & Partners Ltd [1964] AC 465, no action will lie in respect of such loss in the tort of negligence. Furthermore, in particular, no claim will lie in tort for damage in respect of a mere loss of an expectation, as opposed to damages in respect of damage to an existing right or interest of the plaintiff. Such a claim falls within the exclusive zone of contractual liability; and it is contrary to principle that the law of tort should be allowed to invade that zone. Of course, Parliament can create exceptions to that principle by extending contractual rights to persons who are not parties to a contract as was done, for example, in the Bills of Lading Act 1855 and the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1924. But as a matter of principle a step of this kind cannot be taken by the Courts, though they can redefine the boundaries of the exclusive zone, as they did in Donoghue v. Stevenson [1932] AC 562.

The present case, it is suggested, falls within that exclusive zone. Here, it is impossible to frame the suggested duty except by reference to the contract between the solicitor and the testator—a contract to which the disappointed beneficiary is no a party, and from which, therefore, he can derive no rights. Second, the loss suffered by the disappointed beneficiary is not in reality a loss at all; it is, more accurately, failure to obtain a benefit. All that has happened is that what is sometimes called spes successionis has failed to come to fruition. As a result, he has not become better off; but he is not made worse off. A claim in respect of such a loss of expectation falls within the exclusive zone of contractual liability.

(3) A third, and distinct, objection is that, if liability in tort was recognised in cases such as Ross v. Caunters, it would be impossible to place any sensible bounds to cases in which such recovery was allowed. In particular, the same liability should logically be imposed in cases where an inter vivos transaction was ineffective, and the defect was not discovered until the donor was no longer able to repair it. Furthermore, liability could not logically be restricted to cases where a specific named beneficiary was disappointed, but would inevitably have to be extended to cases in which wide, even indeterminate, classes of persons could be said to have been adversely affected—

(4) Other miscellaneous objections were taken, though in my opinion they were without substance. In particular—(a) Since the testator himself owes no duty to the beneficiary, it would be illogical to impose any such duty on his solicitor. I myself cannot however see any force in this objection. (b) To enable the disappointed beneficiary to recover from the solicitor would have the undesirable, and indeed fortuitous, effect of substantially increasing the size of the testator's estate—even of doubling it in size; because it would not be possible to recover any part of the estate which had lawfully devolved upon others by an unrevoked will or on an intestacy, even though that was not in fact the testator's intention. I cannot however see what impact this has on the disappointed beneficiary's remedy. It simply reflects the fact that those who received the testator's estate, either under an unrevoked will or on an intestacy, were lucky enough to receive a windfall; and in consequence the estate is, so far as the testator and the disappointed beneficiary are concerned, irretrievably lost.

(5) There is however another objection of a conceptual nature, which was not adumbrated in argument before the Appellate Committee. In the present case, unlike Ross v. Caunters itself, there was no act of the defendant solicitor which could be characterised as negligent. All that happened was that the solicitor did nothing at all for a period of time, with the result that the testator died before his new testamentary intentions could be implemented in place of the old. As a general rule, however, there is no liability in tortious negligence for an omission, unless the defendant is under some pre-existing duty. Once again, therefore, the question arises how liability can arise in the present case in the absence of a contract. . . .

[After describing as obiter dicta remarks made by the House of Lords in Robertson v. Fleming (1861) 4 Macq 167, remarks which clearly supported the defendants' case, his Lordship continued:]

The impulse to do practical justice Before addressing the legal questions which lie at the heart of the present case, it is, I consider, desirable to identify the reasons of justice which prompt judges and academic writers to conclude, like Megarry V-C in Ross v. Caunters, that a duty should be owed by the testator's solicitor to a disappointed beneficiary. The principal reasons are, I believe, as follows.

(1) In the forefront stands the extraordinary fact that, if such a duty is not recognised, the only persons who might have a valid claim (ie the testator and his estate) have suffered no loss, and the only person who has suffered a loss (ie the disappointed beneficiary) has no claim: see Ross v. Caunters [1980] Ch 297 at 303 per Megarry V-C. It can therefore be said that, if the solicitor owes no duty to the intended beneficiaries, there is a lacuna in the law which needs to be filled. This I regard as being a point of cardinal importance in the present case.

(2) The injustice of denying such a remedy is reinforced if one considers the importance of legacies in a society which recognises (subject only to the incidence of inheritance tax, and statutory requirements for provision for near relatives) the right of citizens to leave their assets to whom they please, and in which, as a result, legacies can be of great importance to individual citizens, providing very often the only opportunity for a citizen to acquire a significant capital sum; or to inherit a house, so providing a secure roof over the heads of himself and his family; or to make special provision for his or her old age. In the course of the hearing before the Appellate Committee Mr Matheson (who was instructed by the Law Society to represent the appellant solicitors) placed before the Committee a schedule of claims of the character of that in the present case notified to the Solicitors' Indemnity Fund following the judgment of the Court of Appeal below. It is striking that, where the amount of the claim was known, it was, by today's standards, of a comparatively modest size. This perhaps indicates that it is where a testator instructs a small firm of solicitors that mistakes of this kind are most likely to occur, with the result that it tends to be people of modest means, who need the money so badly, who suffer.

(3) There is a sense in which the solicitors' profession cannot complain if such a liability may be imposed upon their members. If one of them has been negligent in such a way as to defeat his client's testamentary intentions, he must regard himself as very lucky indeed if the effect of the law is that he is not liable to pay damages in the ordinary way. It can involve no injustice to render him subject to such a liability, even if the damages are payable not to his client's estate for distribution to the disappointed beneficiary (which might have been the preferred solution) but direct to the disappointed beneficiary.

(4) That such a conclusion is required as a matter of justice is reinforced by consideration of the role played by solicitors in society. The point was well made by Cooke J in Gartside v. Sheffield Young & Ellis [1983] NZLR 37 at 43, when he observed:

"To deny an effective remedy in a plain case would seem to imply a refusal to acknowledge the solicitor's professional role in the community. In practice the public relies on solicitors (or statutory officers with similar functions) to prepare effective wills."

The question therefore arises whether it is possible to give effect in law to the strong impulse for practical justice which is the fruit of the foregoing considerations. For this to be achieved, I respectfully agree with Nicholls V-C when he said that the court will have to fashion "an effective remedy for the solicitor's breach of his professional duty to his client" in such a way as to repair the injustice to the disappointed beneficiary (see [1993] 3 WLR 730 at 739).

Ross v. Caunters and the conceptual problems

In Ross v. Caunters Megarry V-C approached the problem as one arising under the ordinary principles of the tort of negligence. He found himself faced with two principal objections to the plaintiff's claim. The first, founded mainly upon the decision of the Court of Appeal in Groom v. Crocker [1939] 1 KB 194, was that a solicitor could not be liable in negligence in respect of his professional work to anyone except his client, his liability to his client arising only in contract and not in tort. This proposition Megarry V-C rejected without difficulty, relying primarily upon the judgment of Oliver J in Midland Bank Trust Go Ltd v. Hett, Stubbs & Kemp [1979] Ch 384 (recently approved by this House in Henderson v. Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1994] 3 WLR 761). The second, and more fundamental, argument was that, apart from cases falling within the principle established in Hedley Byrne no action lay in the tort of negligence for pure economic loss. This argument Megarry V-C approached following the path traced by Lord Wilberforce in Anns v. Merton London Borough [1978] AC 728 at 751–752; and on that basis, relying in particular on Ministry of Housing and Local Government v. Shah [1970] 2 QB 223 (which he regarded as conclusive of the point before him), he held that here liability could properly be imposed in negligence for pure economic loss, his preferred basis being by direct application of Donoghue v. Stevenson [1932] itself.

It will at once be seen that some of the conceptual problems raised by the appellants in argument before the Appellate Committee were not raised in Ross v. Caunters. Others which were raised plainly did not loom so large in argument as they have done in the present case. Thus the point founded on the fact that in cases of this kind the plaintiff is claiming damages for the loss of an expectation was briefly touched upon by Megarry V-C and as briefly dismissed by him (see [1980] Ch 297 at 322), but (no doubt for good reason, having regard to the manner in which the case was presented) there is no further analysis of the point. It is however my opinion that, these conceptual arguments having been squarely raised in argument in the present case, they cannot lightly be dismissed. They have to be faced; and it is immediately apparent that they raise the question whether the claim properly falls within the law of contract or the law of tort. This is because, although the plaintiffs' claim has been advanced, and indeed held by the Court of Appeal to lie, in the tort of negligence, nevertheless the response of the appellants has been that the claim, if properly analysed, must necessarily have contractual features which cannot ordinarily exist in the case of an ordinary tortious claim. Here I refer not only to the fact that the claim is one for damages for pure economic loss, but also to the need for the defendant solicitor to be entitled to invoke as against the disappointed beneficiary any terms of the contract with his client which may limit or exclude his liability; to the fact that the damages claimed are for the loss of an expectation; and also to the fact (not adverted to below) that the claim in the present case can be said to arise from a pure omission, and as such will not (apart from special circumstances) give rise to a claim in tortious negligence. Faced with points such as these, the strict lawyer may well react by saying that the present claim can lie only in contract, and is not therefore open to a disappointed beneficiary as against the testator's solicitor. This was indeed the reaction of Lush and Murphy JJ in Seale v. Perry [1982] VR 193, and is one which is entitled to great respect.

It must not be forgotten however that a solicitor who undertakes to perform services for his client may be liable to his client for failure to exercise due care and skill in relation to the performance of those services not only in contract, but also in negligence under the principle in Hedley Byrne v. Heller (see Midland Bank Trust Go Ltd v. Hett, Stubbs & Kemp [1979] Ch 384) on the basis of assumption of responsibility by the solicitor towards his client. Even so there is great difficulty in holding, on ordinary principles, that the solicitor has assumed any responsibility towards an intended beneficiary under a will which he has undertaken to prepare on behalf of his client but which, through his negligence, has failed to take effect in accordance with his client's instructions. The relevant work is plainly performed by the solicitor for his client; but, in the absence of special circumstances, it cannot be said to have been undertaken for the intended beneficiary. Certainly, again in the absence of special circumstances, there will have been no reliance by the intended beneficiary on the exercise by the solicitor of due care and skill; indeed, the intended beneficiary may not even have been aware that the solicitor was engaged on such a task, or that his position might be affected. Let me take the example of an inter vivos gift where, as a result of the solicitor's negligence, the instrument in question is for some reason not effective for its purpose. The mistake comes to light some time later during the lifetime of the donor, after the gift to the intended donor should have taken effect. The donor, having by then changed his mind, declines to perfect the imperfect gift in favour of the intended donor. The latter may be unable to obtain rectification of the instrument, because equity will not perfect an imperfect gift (though there is some authority which suggests that exceptionally it may do so if the donor has died or become incapacitated: see Lister v. Hodgson (1867) LR 4 Ex 30 at 34–35 per Lord Romilly MR). I, for my part, do not think that the intended donor could in these circumstances have any claim against the solicitor. It is enough, as I see it, that the donor is able to do what he wishes to put matters right. From this it would appear to follow that the real reason for concern in cases such as the present lies in the extraordinary fact that, if a duty owed by the testator's solicitor to the disappointed beneficiary is not recognised, the only person who may have a valid claim has suffered no loss, and the only person who has suffered a loss has no claim. This is a point to which I will return later in this opinion, when I shall give further consideration to the application of the Hedley Byrne principle in circumstances such as those in the present case.

The German experience

The fact that the problems which arise in cases such as the present have troubled the courts in many jurisdictions, both common law and civil law, and have prompted a variety of reactions, indicates that they are of their very nature difficult to accommodate within the ordinary principles of the law of obligations. It is true that our law of contract is widely seen as deficient in the sense that it is perceived to be hampered by the presence of an unnecessary doctrine of consideration and (through a strict doctrine of privity of contract) stunted through a failure to recognise a jus quaesitum tertio. But even if we lacked the former and possessed the latter, the ordinary law could not provide a simple answer to the problems which arise in the present case, which appear at first sight to require the imposition of something like a contractual liability which is beyond the scope of the ordinary jus quaesitum tertio. In these circumstances, the effect of the special characteristics of any particular system of law is likely to be, as indeed appears from the authorities I have cited, not so much that no remedy is recognised, but rather that the system in question will choose its own special means for granting a remedy notwithstanding the doctrinal difficulties involved.

We can, I believe, see this most clearly if we compare the English and German reactions to problems of this kind. Strongly though I support the study of comparative law, I hesitate to embark in an opinion such as this upon a comparison, however brief, with a civil law system; because experience has taught me how very difficult, and indeed potentially misleading, such an exercise can be. Exceptionally however, in the present case, thanks to material published in our language by distinguished comparatists, German as well as English, we have direct access to publications which should sufficiently dispel our ignorance of German law and so by comparison illuminate our understanding of our own.

I have already referred to problems created in the English law of contract by the doctrines of consideration and of privity of contract. These, of course, encourage us to seek a solution to problems of this kind within our law of tortious negligence. In German law, on the other hand, in which the law of delict does not allow for the recovery of damages for pure economic loss in negligence, it is natural that the judges should extend the law of contract to meet the justice of the case. In a case such as the present, which is concerned with a breach of duty owed by a professional man, A, to his client, B, in circumstances in which practical justice requires that a third party, C, should have a remedy against the professional man, A, in respect of damage which he has suffered by reason of the breach, German law may have recourse to a doctrine called Vertrag mit Schutzwirkung für Dritte (contract with protective effect for third parties), the scope of which extends beyond that of an ordinary contract for the benefit of a third party: see Professor Werner Lorenz in The Gradual Convergence edited by Markesinis (1994), pp. 65, 68–72.) This doctrine was invoked by the German Supreme Court in the Testamentfall case (BGH 6 July 1965, NJW 1965, 1955) which is similar to the present case in that the plaintiff, C, through the dilatoriness of a lawyer, A, (instructed by her father, B) in making the necessary arrangements for the father's will, was deprived of a testamentary benefit which she would have received under the will if it had been duly made. The plaintiff, C, was held to be entitled to recover damages from the lawyer, A. Professor Lorenz has expressed the opinion (p. 70) that the ratio of that case would apply to the situation in Ross v. Caunters itself. In these cases, it appears that the court will examine “whether the contracting parties intended to create duty of care in favour of” the third person (BGH NJW 1984, 355, 356), or whether there is to be inferred “a protective obligation . . . based on good faith . . .” (BGHZ 69, 82, 85 et seq.). (Quotations taken in each case from Professor Markesinis's Article on “An Expanding Tort Law—the Price of a Rigid Contract Law” (1987) 103 LQR 354, 363, 366, 368.) But any such inference of intention would, in English law, be beyond the scope of our doctrine of implied terms; and it is legitimate to infer that the German judges, in creating this special doctrine, were extending the law of contract beyond orthodox contractual principles.

I wish next to refer to another German doctrine known as Drittschadensliquidation, which is available in cases of transferred loss (Schadensverlagerung). In these cases, as a leading English comparatist has explained:

“the person who has suffered the loss has no remedy while the person who has the remedy has suffered no loss. If such a situation is left unchallenged, the defaulting party may never face the consequences of his negligent conduct; his insurer may receive an unexpected (and undeserved) windfall; and the person on whom the loss has fallen may be left without any redress:” see Markesinis, The German Law of Torts, 3rd ed. (1994), p. 56.

Under this doctrine, to take one example, the defendant, A, typically a carrier, may be held liable to the seller of goods, B, for the loss suffered by the buyer, C, to whom the risk but not the property in the goods has passed. In such circumstances the seller is held to have a contractual claim against the carrier in respect of the damage suffered by the buyer. This claim can be pursued by the seller against the carrier; but it can also be assigned by him to the buyer. If, exceptionally, the seller refuses either to exercise his right for the benefit of the buyer or to assign his claim to him, the seller can be compelled to make the assignment: see Professor Werner Lorenz in Essays in Memory of Professor F H Lawson (1986), pp. 86, 89–90, and in The Gradual Convergence, pp. 65, 88–89, 92–93; and Professor Hein Kötz in Tel Aviv University Studies in Law (1990), vol. 10, pp. 195, 209. Professor Lorenz (Essays, at p. 89) has stated that it is at least arguable that the idea of Drittschadensliquidation might be “extended so as to cover” such cases as the Testamentfall case, an observation which is consistent with the view expressed by the German Supreme Court that the two doctrines may overlap (BGH 19 January 1977, NJW 1977, 2073 = VersR 1977, 638: translated in Markesinis, The German Law of Torts, p. 293). At all events both doctrines have the effect of extending to the plaintiff the benefit of what is, in substance, a contractual cause of action; though, at least as seen through English eyes, this result is achieved not by orthodox contractual reasoning, but by the contractual remedy being made available by law in order to achieve practical justice.

Transferred loss in English law

I can deal with this topic briefly. The problem of transferred loss has arisen in particular in maritime law, when a buyer of goods seeks to enforce against a shipowner a remedy in tort in respect of loss of or damage to goods at his risk when neither the rights under the contract nor the property in the goods has passed to him (see Leigh and Silavan Ltd. v. Aliakmon Shipping Co. Ltd. [1985] QB 350, 399, per Robert Goff LJ and [1986] AC 785, 820, per Lord Brandon of Oakbrook). In cases such as these (with all respect to the view expressed by Lord Brandon [1986] AC 785, 819) there was a serious lacuna in the law, as was revealed when all relevant interests in the city of London called for reform to make a remedy available to the buyers who under the existing law were without a direct remedy against the shipowners. The problem was solved, as a matter of urgency, by the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act 1992, I myself having the honour of introducing the Bill into your Lordships' House (acting in its legislative capacity) on behalf of the Law Commission. The solution adopted by the Act was to extend the rights of suit available under section 1 of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 (there restricted to cases where the property in the goods had passed upon or by reason of the consignment or endorsement of the relevant bill of lading) to all holders of bills of lading (and indeed other documents): see section 2(1) of the Act of 1992. Here is a sweeping statutory reform, powered by the needs of commerce, which has the effect of enlarging the circumstances in which contractual rights may be transferred by virtue of the transfer of certain documents. For present purposes, however, an important consequence is the solution in this context of a problem of transferred loss, the lacuna being filled by statute rather than by the common law. Moreover this result has been achieved, as in German law, by vesting in the plaintiff, who has suffered the relevant loss, the contractual rights of the person who has stipulated for the carrier's obligation but has suffered no loss.

I turn next to English law in relation to cases such as the present. Here there is a lacuna in the law, in the sense that practical justice requires that the disappointed beneficiary should have a remedy against the testator's solicitor in circumstances in which neither the testator nor his estate has in law suffered a loss. Professor Lorenz (Essays in Memory of Professor F H Lawson, p. 90) has said that "this is a situation which comes very close to the cases of 'transferred loss,' the only difference being that the damage due to the solicitor's negligence could never have been caused to the testator or to his executor." In the case of the testator, he suffers no loss because (in contrast to a gift by an inter vivos settlor) a gift under a will cannot take effect until after the testator's death, and it follows that there can be no depletion of the testator's assets in his lifetime if the relevant asset is, through the solicitors' negligence, directed to a person other than the intended beneficiary. The situation is therefore not one in which events have subsequently occurred which have resulted in the loss falling on another. It is one in which the relevant loss could never fall on the testator to whom the solicitor owed a duty, but only on another; and the loss which is suffered by that other, i.e. an expectation loss, is of a character which in any event could never have been suffered by the testator. Strictly speaking, therefore, this is not a case of transferred loss.

Even so, the analogy is very close. In practical terms, part or all of the testator's estate has been lost because it has been dispatched to a destination unintended by the testator. Moreover, had a gift been similarly misdirected during the testator's lifetime, he would either have been able to recover it from the recipient or, if not, he could have recovered the full amount from the negligent solicitor as damages. In a case such as the present, no such remedies are available to the testator or his estate. The will cannot normally be rectified: the testator has of course no remedy: and his estate has suffered no loss, because it has been distributed under the terms of a valid will. In these circumstances, there can be no injustice if the intended beneficiary has a remedy against the solicitor for the full amount which he should have received under the will, this being no greater than the damage for which the solicitor could have been liable to the donor if the loss had occurred in his lifetime.

A contractual approach

It may be suggested that, in cases such as the present, the simplest course would be to solve the problem by making available to the disappointed beneficiary, by some means or another, the benefit of the contractual rights (such as they are) of the testator or his estate against the negligent solicitor, as is for example done under the German principle of Vertrag mit Schutzwirkung für Dritte. Indeed that course has been urged upon us by Professor Markesinis in "An Expanding Tort Law" (1987) 103 LQR 354 at 396–397, echoing a view expressed by Professor Fleming in "Comparative Law of Torts" (1986) 4 OILS 235 at 241. Attractive though this solution is, there is unfortunately a serious difficulty in its way. The doctrine of consideration still forms part of our law of contract, as does the doctrine of privity of contract which is considered to exclude the recognition of a jus quaesitum tertio. To proceed as Professor Markesinis has suggested may be acceptable in German law, but in this country could be open to criticism as an illegitimate circumvention of these long-established doctrines; and this criticism could be reinforced by reference to the fact that, in the case of carriage of goods by sea, a contractual solution to a particular problem of transferred loss, and to other cognate problems, was provided only by recourse to Parliament. Furthermore, I myself do not consider that the present case provides a suitable occasion for reconsideration of doctrines so fundamental as these.

The Albazero principle

Even so, I have considered whether the present problem might be solved by adding cases such as the present to the group of cases referred to by Lord Diplock in The Albazero, Albacruz (cargo owners) v. Albazero (owners) [1977] AC 774 at 846–847. In these cases, a person may exceptionally sue in his own name to recover a loss which he has not in fact suffered, being personally accountable for any damages so recovered to the person who has in fact suffered the loss. Lord Diplock was prepared to accommodate within this group the so-called rule in Dunlop v. Lambert (1839) 6 CI & Fin 600, 7 ER 824 on the principle that —

“in a commercial contract concerning goods where it is in the contemplation of the parties that the proprietary interests in the goods may be transferred from one owner to another after the contract has been entered into and before the breach which causes loss or damage to the goods, an original party to the contract, if such be the intention of them both, is to be treated in law as having entered into the breach of contract the actual loss sustained by those for whose benefit the contract is entered into.” . . . (See [1977] AC 774 at 847.)

Furthermore, in Linden Gardens Trust Ltd v. Lenesta Sludge Disposals Ltd [1994] 1 AC 85 your Lordships’ House extended this group of cases to include a case in which work was done by the defendants under a contract with the first plaintiffs who, despite a contractual bar against assignment of their contractual rights without the consent of the defendants, had without consent assigned them to the second plaintiffs who suffered damage by reason of defective work carried out by the defendants. It was held that, by analogy with the cases referred to in The Albazero the first plaintiffs could recover the damages from the defendants for the benefit of the second plaintiffs. In so holding, your Lordships’ House relied upon a passage in Lord Diplock’s speech that —

“there may still be occasional cases in which the rule [in Dunlop v. Lambert] would provide a remedy where no other would be available to a person sustaining loss which under a rational legal system ought to be compensated by the person who has caused it.” (See [1977] AC 774 at 847.)

The decision is noteworthy in a number of respects. First, this was a case of transferred loss; and Lord Diplock’s dictum, as applied by your Lordships’ House, reflects a clear need for the law to find a remedy in cases of this kind. Second, your Lordships’ House felt able to do so in a case in which there was a contractual bar against assignment without consent; and as a result, unlike Lord Diplock, did not find it necessary to look for a common intention that the contract was entered into for the benefit of persons such as the second plaintiffs, which in this case, having regard to the prohibition against assignment, it plainly was not. Third, the consequence was that your Lordships’ House simply made the remedy available as a matter of law in order to solve the problem of transferred loss in the case before them.

Even so, the result was only to enable a person to recover damages in respect of loss which he himself had not suffered, for the benefit of a third party. In the present case, there is the difficulty that the third party (the intended beneficiary) is seeking to recover damages for a loss (expectation loss) which the contracting party (the testator) would not himself have suffered. In any event, under this principle, the third party who has suffered the loss is not able to compel the contracting party to sue for his benefit, or to transfer the right of action to him; still less is he entitled to sue in his own name. In the last analysis, this is because any such right would be contrary to the doctrine of privity of contract. In consequence a principle such as this, if it could be extended to cases such as the present, would be of limited value because, quite apart from any other difficulties, the family relationship may be such that the executors may be unwilling to assist the disappointed beneficiary by pursuing a claim of this kind for his benefit. Certainly, it could not assist the plaintiffs in the present case, who very understandably are proceeding against the solicitors by a direct action in their own name.

The tortious solution

I therefore return to the law of tort for a solution to the problem. For the reasons I have already given, an ordinary action in tortious negligence on the lines proposed by Megarry V-C in Ross v. Caunters [1980] Ch 297 must, with the greatest respect, be regarded as inappropriate, because it does not meet any of the conceptual problems which have been raised. Furthermore, for the reasons I have previously given, the Hedley Byrne principle cannot, in the absence of special circumstances, give rise to ordinary principles to an assumption of responsibility by the testator's solicitor towards an intended beneficiary. Even so, it seems to me that it is open to your Lordships' House, as in Linden Gardens Trust Ltd v. Lenesta Sludge Disposals Ltd [1994] 1 AC 85, to fashion a remedy to fill a lacuna in the law and so prevent me injustice which would otherwise occur on me facts of cases such as me present. In the Lenesta Sludge case, as I have said, me House made available a remedy as a matter of law to solve the problem of transferred loss in the case before them. The present case is, if anything, a fortiori, since me nature of me transaction was such that, if the solicitors were negligent and their negligence did not come to light until after the death of the testator, there would be no remedy for the ensuing loss unless the intended beneficiary could claim. In my opinion, therefore, your Lordships' House should in cases such as these extend to the intended beneficiary a remedy under the Hedley Byrne principle by holding that the assumption of responsibility by the solicitor towards his client should be held in law to extend to the intended beneficiary who (as the solicitor can reasonably foresee) may, as a result of the solicitor's negligence, be deprived of his intended legacy in circumstances in which neither the testator nor his estate will have a remedy against the solicitor. Such liability will not of course arise in cases in which the defect in the will comes to light before the death of the testator, and me testator either leaves the will as it is or otherwise continues to exclude the previously intended beneficiary from the relevant benefit. I only wish to add mat, with me benefit of experience during the 15 years in which Ross v. Caunters has been regularly applied, we can say with some confidence that a direct remedy by the intended beneficiary against the solicitor appears to create no problems in practice.

That is therefore the solution which I would recommend to your Lordships.

As I see it, not only does this conclusion produce practical justice as far as all parties are concerned, but it also has the following beneficial consequences.

- (1) There is no unacceptable circumvention of established principles of the law of contract.
- (2) No problem arises by reason of me loss being of a purely economic character.
- (3) Such assumption of responsibility will of course be subject to any term of the contract between the solicitor and the testator which may exclude or restrict the solicitor's liability to the testator under the principle in Hedley Byrne. It is true mat such a term would be most unlikely to exist in practice; but as a matter of principle it is right mat this largely theoretical question should be addressed.
- (4) Since the Hedley Byrne principle is founded upon an assumption of responsibility, the solicitor may be liable for negligent omissions as well as negligent acts of commission: see Midland Bank Trust Go Ltd v. Hett, Stubbs & Kemp [1979] Ch 384 at 416 per Oliver J, and my own speech in Henderson v. Merrett Syndicates Ltd [1994] 3 WLR 761 at 777. This conclusion provides justification for the decision of the Court of Appeal to reverse the decision of Turner J in the present case, although this point was not in fact raised below or before your Lordships.

(5) I do not consider that damages for loss of an expectation are excluded in cases of negligence arising under the principle in Hedley Byrne, simply because the cause of action is classified as tortious. Such damages may in principle be recoverable in cases of contractual negligence; and I cannot see that, for present purposes, any relevant distinction can be drawn between the two forms of action. In particular, an expectation loss may well occur in cases where a professional man, such as a solicitor, has assumed responsibility for the affairs of another; and I for my part can see no reason in principle why the professional man should not, in an appropriate case, be liable for such loss under the Hedley Byrne principle.

In the result, all the conceptual problems, including those which so troubled Lush and Murphy JJ in Seale v. Perry [1982] VR 193, can be seen to fade innocuously away. Let me emphasise that I can see no injustice in imposing liability upon a negligent solicitor in a case such as the present where, in the absence of a remedy in this form, neither the testator's estate nor the disappointed beneficiary will have a claim for the loss caused by his negligence. This is the injustice which, in my opinion, the judges of this country should address by recognising that cases such as these call for an appropriate remedy, and that the common law is not so sterile as to be incapable of supplying that remedy when it is required.

Unlimited claims

I come finally to the objection that, if liability is recognised in a case such as the present, it will be impossible to place any sensible limits to cases in which recovery is allowed. Before your Lordships, as before the Court of Appeal, Mr Matheson conjured up the spectre of solicitors being liable to an indeterminate class, including persons unborn at the date of the testator's death. I must confess that my reaction to this kind of argument was very similar to that of Cooke J in Gartside v. Sheffield Young & Ellis [1983] NZLR 37 at 44, when he said that he was not "persuaded that we should decide a fairly straightforward case against the dictates of justice because of foreseeable troubles in more difficult cases". We are concerned here with a liability which is imposed by law to do practical justice in a particular type of case. There must be boundaries to the availability of a remedy in such cases; but these will have to be worked out in the future, as practical problems come before the courts. In the present case Nicholls V-C observed that, in cases of this kind, liability is not to an indeterminate class, but to the particular beneficiary or beneficiaries whom the client intended to benefit through the particular will. I respectfully agree, and I also agree with him that the ordinary case is one in which the intended beneficiaries are a small number of identified people. If by any chance a more complicated case should arise to test the precise boundaries of the principle in cases of this kind, that problem can await solution when such a case comes forward for decision.

Conclusion

For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

Henderson v. Merrett Syndicates Ltd House of Lords [1995] 2 AC 145

LORD GOFF OF CHIEVELEY

The impact of the contractual context

All systems of law which recognise a law of contract and a law of tort (or delict) have to solve the problem of the possibility of concurrent claims arising from breach of duty under the two rubrics of the law. Although there are variants, broadly speaking two possible solutions present themselves: either to insist that the claimant should pursue his remedy in contract alone, or to allow him to choose which remedy he prefers. As my noble and learned friend, Lord Mustill, and I have good reason to know (see J. Braconnot et Cie. v. Compagnie des Messageries Maritimes (The Sindh) [1975]

¹ Lloyd's Rep. 372), France has adopted the former solution in its doctrine of non cumul, under which the concurrence of claims in contract and tort is outlawed (see Tony Weir in XI International Encyclopedia of Comparative Law, chapter 12, paras. 47–72, at paragraph 52). The reasons given for this conclusion are (1) respect for the will of the legislator, and (2) respect for the will of the parties to the contract (see paragraph 53). The former does not concern us; but the latter is of vital importance. It is however open to various interpretations. For such a policy does not necessarily require the total rejection of concurrence, but only so far as a concurrent remedy in tort is inconsistent with the terms of the contract. It comes therefore as no surprise to learn that the French doctrine is not followed in all civil law jurisdictions, and that concurrent remedies in tort and contract are permitted in other civil law countries, notably Germany (see paragraph 58). I only pause to observe that it appears to be accepted that no perceptible harm has come to the German system from admitting concurrent claims.

The situation in common law countries, including of course England, is exceptional, in that the common law grew up within a procedural framework uninfluenced by Roman law. The law was categorised by reference to the forms of action, and it was not until the abolition of the forms of action by the Common Law Procedure Act 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76) that it became necessary to reclassify the law in substantive terms. The result was that common lawyers did at last segregate our law of obligations into contract and tort, though in so doing they relegated quasi-contractual claims to the status of an appendix to the law of contract, thereby postponing by a century or so the development of a law of restitution. Even then, there was no systematic reconsideration of the problem of concurrent claims in contract and tort. We can see the courts rather grappling with unpromising material drawn from the old cases in which liability in negligence derived largely from categories based upon the status of the defendant. In a sense, we must not be surprised; for no significant law faculties were established at our universities until the late 19th century, and so until then there was no academic opinion available to guide or stimulate the judges. Even so, it is a remarkable fact that there was little consideration of the problem of concurrent remedies in our academic literature until the second half of the 20th century, though in recent years the subject has attracted considerable attention.

In the result, the courts in this country have until recently grappled with the problem very largely without the assistance of systematic academic study. At first, as is shown in particular by cases concerned with liability for solicitors' negligence, the courts adopted something very like the French solution, holding that a claim against a solicitor for negligence must be pursued in contract, and not in tort (see, e.g., Bean v. Wade (1885) 2 TLR 157); and in Groom v. Crocker [1939] 1 KB 194, this approach was firmly adopted. It has to be said, however, that decisions such as these, though based on prior authority, were supported by only a slender citation of cases, none of great weight; and the jurisprudential basis of the doctrine so adopted cannot be said to have been explored in any depth. Furthermore when, in Bagot v. Stevens Scanlan & Co. Ltd. [1966] 1 QB 197, Diplock LJ adopted a similar approach in the case of a claim against a firm of architects, he felt compelled to recognise (pp. 204–205) that a different conclusion might be reached in cases “where the law in the old days recognised either something in the nature of a status like a public calling (such as common carrier, common innkeeper, or a bailor and bailee) or the status of master and servant.” To this list must be added cases concerned with claims against doctors and dentists. I must confess to finding it startling that, in the second half of the twentieth century, a problem of considerable practical importance should fall to be solved by reference to such an outmoded form of categorisation as this.

I think it is desirable to stress at this stage that the question of concurrent liability is by no means only of academic significance. Practical issues, which can be of great importance to the parties, are at stake. Foremost among these is perhaps the question of limitation of actions. If concurrent liability in tort is not recognised, a claimant may find his claim barred at a time when he is unaware of its existence. This must moreover be a real possibility in the case of claims against professional men, such as solicitors or architects, since the consequences of their negligence may well not come to light until long after the lapse of six years from the date when the relevant breach of contract occurred. Moreover the benefits of the Latent Damage Act 1986, under which the time of the accrual of the cause of action may be postponed until after the plaintiff has the relevant knowledge, are limited to actions in tortious negligence. This leads to the startling possibility that a client who has had the benefit of gratuitous advice from his solicitor may in this respect be better off than a client who has paid a fee. Other practical problems arise, for example, from the absence of a right to contribution between negligent contract-breakers; from the rules as to remoteness of damage, which are less restricted in tort than they are in contract; and from the availability of the opportunity to obtain leave to serve proceedings out of the jurisdiction. It can of course be argued that the principle established in respect of concurrent liability in contract and tort should not be tailored to mitigate the adventitious effects of rules of law such as these, and that one way of solving such problems would no doubt be to rephrase such incidental rules as have to remain in terms of the nature of the harm suffered rather than the nature of the liability asserted (see Tony Weir, XI International Encyclopedia of Comparative Law chapter 12, para. 72). But this is perhaps crying for the moon; and with the law in its present form, practical considerations of this kind cannot sensibly be ignored.

Moreover I myself perceive at work in these decisions not only the influence of the dead hand of history, but also what I have elsewhere called the temptation of elegance. Mr Tony Weir (XI International Encyclopedia of Comparative Law chapter 12, para. 55) has extolled the French solution for its elegance; and we can discern the same impulse behind the much-quoted observation of Lord Scarman when delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Tai Hing Cotton Mill Ltd. v. Liu Chong Hing Bank Ltd. [1986] AC 80, 107:

“Their Lordships do not believe that there is anything to the advantage of the law’s development in searching for a liability in tort where the parties are in a contractual relationship. This is particularly so in a commercial relationship. Though it is possible as a matter of legal semantics to conduct an analysis of the rights and duties inherent in some contractual relationships including that of banker and customer either as a matter of contract law when the question will be what, if any, terms are to be implied or as a matter of tort law when the task will be to identify a duty arising from the proximity and character of the relationship between the parties, their Lordships believe it to be correct in principle and necessary for the avoidance of confusion in the law to adhere to the contractual analysis: on principle because it is a relationship in which the parties have, subject to a few exceptions, the right to determine their obligations to each other, and for the avoidance of confusion because different consequences do follow according to whether liability arises from contract or tort, e.g. in the limitation of action.”

It is however right to stress, as did Sir Thomas Bingham MR in the present case, that the issue in the Tai Hing case was whether a tortious duty of care could be established which was more extensive than that which was provided for under the relevant contract.

At all events, even before the Tai Hing case we can see the beginning of the redirection of the common law away from the contractual solution adopted in Groom v. Crocker [1939] 1 K.B. 194, towards the recognition of concurrent remedies in contract and tort. First, and most important, in 1963 came the decision of your Lordships’ House in Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd. [1964] AC 465. I have already expressed the opinion that the fundamental importance of this case rests in the establishment of the principle upon which liability may arise in tortious negligence in respect of services (including advice) which are rendered for another, gratuitously or otherwise, but are negligently performed—viz., an assumption of responsibility coupled with reliance by the plaintiff which, in all the circumstances, makes it appropriate that a remedy in law should be available for such negligence. For immediate purposes, the relevance of the principle lies in the fact that, as a matter of logic, it is capable of application not only where the services are rendered gratuitously, but also where they are rendered under a contract. Furthermore we can see in the principle an acceptable basis for liability in negligence in cases which in the past have been seen to rest upon the now outmoded concept of status. In this context, it is of particular relevance to refer to the opinion expressed both implicitly by Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest (with whom Lord Hodson agreed) and expressly by Lord Devlin that the principle applies to the relationship of solicitor and client, which is nearly always contractual: see pp. 465, 497–499 (where Lord Morris approved the reasoning of Chitty J in Cann v. Willson (1888) 39 Ch.D. 39), and p. 529 (per Lord Devlin).

The decision in Hedley Byrne, and the statement of general principle in that case, provided the opportunity to reconsider the question of concurrent liability in contract and tort afresh, untrammelled by the ancient learning based upon a classification of defendants in terms of status which drew distinctions difficult to accept in modern conditions. At first that opportunity was not taken. Groom v. Crocker [1939] 1 K.B. 194 was followed by the Court of Appeal in Cook v. Swinfen [1967] 1 WLR 457, and again in Heywood v. Wellers [1976] QB 446; though in the latter case Lord Denning MR, at p. 459, was beginning to show signs of dissatisfaction with the contractual test accepted in Groom v. Crocker—a dissatisfaction which crystallised into a change of heart in Esso Petroleum Co. Ltd. v. Mardon [1976] QB 801. That case was concerned with statements made by employees of Esso in the course of precontractual negotiations with Mr Mardon, the prospective tenant of a petrol station. The statements related to the potential throughput of the station. Mr Mardon was persuaded by the statements to enter into the tenancy; but he suffered serious loss when the actual throughput proved to be much lower than had been predicted. The Court of Appeal held that Mr Mardon was entitled to recover damages from Esso, on the basis of either breach of warranty or (on this point affirming the decision of the judge below) negligent misrepresentation. In rejecting an argument that Esso's liability could only be contractual, Lord Denning MR dismissed Groom v. Crocker [1939] 1 K.B. 194 and Bagot v. Stevens Scanlan & Co. Ltd. [1966] 1 QB 197 as inconsistent with other decisions of high authority, viz. Boorman v. Brown (1842) 3 QB 511, 525–526, per Tindal CJ, and (1844) 11 Cl. & F. 1, 44, per Lord Campbell; Lister v. Romford Ice and Cold Storage Co. Ltd. [1957] AC 555, 587, per Lord Radcliffe; Matthews v. Kuwait Bechtel Corporation [1959] 2 QB 57 and Nocton v. Lord Ashburton [1914] AC 932, 956, per Viscount Haldane LC. He then held that, in addition to its liability in contract, Esso was also liable in negligence. The other members of the Court of Appeal, Ormrod and Shaw L JJ, agreed that Mr Mardon was entitled to recover damages either for breach of warranty or for negligent misrepresentation, though neither expressed any view about the status of Groom v. Crocker [1939] 1 K.B. 194. It was however implicit in their decision that, as Lord Denning MR held, concurrent remedies were available to Mr Mardon in contract and tort. For present purposes, I do not find it necessary to comment on the authorities relied upon by Lord Denning as relieving him from the obligation to follow Groom v. Crocker; though I feel driven to comment that the judgments in Esso Petroleum Co. Ltd. v. Mardon [1976] QB 801 reveal no analysis in depth of the basis upon which concurrent liability rests. That case was however followed by the Court of Appeal in Batty v. Metropolitan Property Realisations Ltd. [1978] QB 554, in which concurrent remedies in contract and tort were again allowed.

The requisite analysis is however to be found in the judgment of Oliver J in Midland Bank Trust Co. Ltd. v. Hett, Stubbs & Kemp [1979] chapter 384, in which he held that a solicitor could be liable to his client for negligence either in contract or in tort, with the effect that in the case before him it was open to the client to take advantage of the more favourable date of accrual of the cause of action for the purposes of limitation. In that case, Oliver J was much concerned with the question whether it was open to him, as a judge of first instance, to depart from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Groom v. Crocker [1939] 1 K.B. 194. For that purpose, he carried out a most careful examination of the relevant authorities, both before and after Groom v. Crocker, and concluded that he was free to depart from the decision in that case, which he elected to do.

It is impossible for me to do justice to the reasoning of Oliver J, for which I wish to express my respectful admiration, without unduly prolonging what is inevitably a very long opinion. I shall therefore confine myself to extracting certain salient features. First, from his study of the cases before Groom v. Crocker, he found no unanimity of view that the solicitor's liability was regarded as exclusively contractual. Some cases (such as Howell v. Young (1826) 5 B. & C. 259) he regarded as equivocal. In others, he understood the judges to regard contract and tort as providing alternative causes of action (see In re Manby and Hawksford (1856) 26 L.J.Ch. 313, 317 and Sawyer v. Goodwin (1867) 36 L.J.Ch. 578, 582, in both cases per Stuart V.-C., and most notably Nocton v. Lord Ashburton [1914] AC 932, 956, per Viscount Haldane L.C.). However Bean v. Wade (1885) 2 T.L.R. 157, briefly reported in the Times Law Reports and by no means extensively referred to, provided Court of Appeal authority that the remedy was exclusively contractual; and it was that case which was principally relied upon by the Court of Appeal in Groom v. Crocker [1939] 1 K.B. 194 when reaching the same conclusion. Oliver J put on one side those cases, decided for the purpose of section 11 of the County Courts Act 1915, under which a different statutory test had to be complied with, viz. whether the action was one “founded on a contract” or “founded on a tort.”

It is evident that the early authorities did not play a very significant part in Oliver J.’s decision (see [1979] chapter 384, 411C–D). He loyally regarded Groom v. Crocker as prima facie binding upon him. His main concern was with the impact of the decision of this House in Hedley Byrne [1964] AC 465, and of subsequent cases in the Court of Appeal in which Hedley Byrne had been applied. As he read the speeches in Hedley Byrne, the principle there stated was not limited to circumstances in which the responsibility of the defendant had been gratuitously assumed. He referred in particular to the statement of principle by Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, at pp. 502–503, which I have already quoted, and said, at p. 411:

“The principle was stated by Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest as a perfectly general one and it is difficult to see why it should be excluded by the fact that the relationship of dependence and reliance between the parties is a contractual one rather than one gratuitously assumed, in the absence, of course, of contractual terms excluding or restricting the general duties which the law implies.”

Oliver J went on, at p. 412, to quote from the dissenting judgment of Denning L.J. in Candler v. Crane, Christmas & Co. [1951] 2 K.B. 164, 179–180 (a passage approved by Lord Pearce in Hedley Byrne [1964] AC 465, 538) and said, at p. 413:

“Now, in that passage, I think that it is abundantly clear that Denning LJ was seeking to enunciate a general principle of liability arising from the relationship created by the assumption of a particular work or responsibility, quite regardless of how the relationship arose. . . . The inquiry upon which the court is to embark is ‘what is the relationship between the plaintiff and defendant?’ not ‘how did the relationship, if any, arise?’ That this is so appears, I think, with complete clarity from subsequent cases.”

Later he said, at p. 415:

“The matter becomes, in my judgment, even clearer when one looks at the speech of Lord Devlin in the Hedley Byrne case [1964] AC 465, for he treats the existence of a contractual relationship as very good evidence of the general tortious duty which he is there discussing.

He said, at pp. 528–529:

‘I think, therefore, that there is ample authority to justify your Lordships in saying now that the categories of special relationships which may give rise to a duty to take care in word as well as in deed are not limited to contractual relationships or to relationships of fiduciary duty, but include also relationships which in the words of Lord Shaw in Nocton v. Lord Ashburton [1914] AC 932, 972, are “equivalent to contract,” that is, where there is an assumption of responsibility in circumstances in which, but for the absence of consideration, there would be a contract.’”

He expressed his conclusion concerning the impact of Hedley Byrne on the case before him in the following words, at p. 417:

“The case of a layman consulting a solicitor for advice seems to me to be as typical a case as one could find of the sort of relationship in which the duty of care described in the Hedley Byrne case [1964] AC 465 exists; and if I am free to do so in the instant case, I would, therefore, hold that the relationship of solicitor and client gave rise to a duty in the defendants under the general law to exercise that care and skill upon which they must have known perfectly well that their client relied. To put it another way, their common law duty was not to injure their client by failing to do that which they had undertaken to do and which, at their invitation, he relied upon them to do. That duty was broken, but no cause of action in tort arose until the damage occurred; and none did occur until 17 August 1967. I would regard it as wholly immaterial that their duty arose because they accepted a retainer which entitled them, if they chose to do so, to send a bill to their client.”

I wish to express my respectful agreement with these passages in Oliver J’s judgment.

Thereafter, Oliver J proceeded to consider the authorities since Hedley Byrne, in which he found, notably in statements of the law by members of the Appellate Committee in Arenson v. Arenson [1977] AC 405 and in the decision of the Court of Appeal in Esso Petroleum Co. Ltd. v. Mardon [1976] QB 801, the authority which relieved him of his duty to follow Groom v. Crocker [1939] 1 K.B. 194. But I wish to add that, in the course of considering the later authorities, he rejected the idea that there is some general principle of law that a plaintiff who has claims against a defendant for breach of duty both in contract and in tort is bound to rely upon his contractual rights alone. He said, at p. 420:

“There is not and never has been any rule of law that a person having alternative claims must frame his action in one or the other. If I have a contract with my dentist to extract a tooth, I am not thereby precluded from suing him in tort if he negligently shatters my jaw: Edwards v. Mallan [1908] 1 K.B. 1002; . . .”

The origin of concurrent remedies in this type of case may lie in history; but in a modern context the point is a telling one. Indeed it is consistent with the decision in Donoghue v. Stevenson [1932] AC 562 itself, and the rejection in that case of the view, powerfully expressed in the speech of Lord Buckmaster (see, in particular, pp. 577–578), that the manufacturer or repairer of an Article owes no duty of care apart from that implied from contract or imposed by statute. That there might be co-existent remedies for negligence in contract and in tort was expressly recognised by Lord Macmillan in Donoghue v. Stevenson, at p. 610, and by Lord Wright in Grant v. Australian Knitting Mills Ltd. [1936] AC 85, 102–104. Attempts have been made to explain how doctors and dentists may be concurrently liable in tort while other professional men may not be so liable, on the basis that the former cause physical damage whereas the latter cause pure economic loss (see the discussion by Christine French in (1981–84) 5 Otago LR 236, 280–281). But this explanation is not acceptable, if only because some professional men, such as architects, may also be responsible for physical damage. As a matter of principle, it is difficult to see why concurrent remedies in tort and contract, if available against the medical profession, should not also be available against members of other professions, whatever form the relevant damage may take.

The judgment of Oliver J. in the Midland Bank Trust Co. case [1979] chapter 384 provided the first analysis in depth of the question of concurrent liability in tort and contract. Following upon Esso Petroleum Co. Ltd. v. Mardon [1976] QB 801, it also broke the mould, in the sense that it undermined the view which was becoming settled that, where there is an alternative liability in tort, the claimant must pursue his remedy in contract alone. The development of the case law in other common law countries is very striking. In the same year as the Midland Bank Trust Co. case, the Irish Supreme Court held that solicitors owed to their clients concurrent duties in contract and tort: see Finlay v. Murtagh [1979] I.R. 249. Next, in Central Trust Co. v. Rafuse (1986) 31 D.L.R. (4th) 481, Le Dain J, delivering the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, conducted a comprehensive and most impressive survey of the relevant English and Canadian authorities on the liability of solicitors to their clients for negligence, in contract and in tort, in the course of which he paid a generous tribute to the analysis of Oliver J in the Midland Bank Trust Co. case. His conclusions are set out in a series of propositions at pp. 521–522; but his general conclusion was to the same effect as that reached by Oliver J. He said, at p. 522:

“A concurrent or alternative liability in tort will not be admitted if its effect would be to permit the plaintiff to circumvent or escape a contractual exclusion or limitation of liability for the act or omission that would constitute the tort. Subject to this qualification, where concurrent liability in tort and contract exists the plaintiff has the right to assert the cause of action that appears to be the most advantageous to him in respect of any particular legal consequence.”

I respectfully agree.

Meanwhile in New Zealand the Court of Appeal had appeared at first, in McLaren Maycroft & Co. v. Fletcher Development Co. Ltd. [1973] 2 N.Z.L.R. 100, to require that, in cases where there are concurrent duties in contract and tort, the claimant must pursue his remedy in contract alone. There followed a period of some uncertainty, in which differing approaches were adopted by courts of first instance. In 1983 Miss Christine French published her Article on “The Contract/Tort Dilemma” in (1981–84) 5 Otago L.R. 236, in which she examined the whole problem in great depth, with special reference to the situation in New Zealand, having regard to the “rule” in McLaren Maycroft. Her Article, to which I wish to pay tribute, was of course published before the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Central Trust case. Even so, she reached a conclusion which, on balance, favoured a freedom for the claimant to choose between concurrent remedies in contract and tort. Thereafter in Rowlands v. Callow [1992] 1 N.Z.L.R. 178 Thomas J, founding himself principally on the Central Trust case and on Miss French’s Article, concluded that he was free to depart from the decision of the New Zealand Court of Appeal in the McLaren Maycroft case and to hold that a person performing professional services (in the case before him an engineer) may be sued for negligence by his client either in contract or in tort. He said, at p. 190:

“The issue is now virtually incontestable; a person who has performed professional services may be held liable concurrently in contract and in negligence unless the terms of the contract preclude the tortious liability.”

In Australia, too, judicial opinion appears to be moving in the same direction, though not without dissent: see, in particular, Aluminium Products (Qld.) Pty. Ltd. v. Hill [1981] Qd.R. 33 (a decision of the Full Court of the Supreme Court of Queensland) and Macpherson & Kelley v. Kevin J Prunty & Associates [1983] 1 V.R. 573 (a decision of the Full Court of the Supreme Court of Victoria). A different view has however been expressed by Deane J in Hawkins v. Clayton (1988) 164 C.L.R. 539, 585, to which I will return later. In principle, concurrent remedies appear to have been accepted for some time in the United States (see Prosser’s Handbook on the Law of Torts, 7th ed. (1984), p. 444), though with some variation as to the application of the principle in particular cases. In these circumstances it comes as no surprise that Professor Fleming, writing in 1992, should state that “the last ten years have seen a decisive return to the ‘concurrent’ approach” (see The Law of Torts, 8th ed. (1992), p. 187).

I have dealt with the matter at some length because, before your Lordships, Mr Temple, for the managing agents, boldly challenged the decision of Oliver J in the Midland Bank Trust Co. case [1979] chapter 384, seeking to persuade your Lordships that this House should now hold that case to have been wrongly decided. This argument was apparently not advanced below, presumably because Oliver J’s analysis had received a measure of approval in the Court of Appeal: see, e.g., Forster v. Outred & Co. [1982] 1 WLR 86, 99, per Dunn LJ. Certainly there has been no sign of disapproval, even where the Midland Bank Trust Co. case has been distinguished: see Bell v. Peter Browne & Co. [1990] 2 QB 495.

Mr Temple adopted as part of his argument the reasoning of Mr J.M. Kaye in an Article “The Liability of Solicitors in Tort” (1984) 100 LQR 680. In his Article, Mr Kaye strongly criticised the reasoning of Oliver J both on historical grounds and with regard to his interpretation of the speeches in the Hedley Byrne case [1964] AC 465. However, powerful though Mr Kaye’s Article is, I am not persuaded by it to treat the Midland Bank Trust Co. case [1979] chapter 384 as wrongly decided. First, so far as the historical approach is concerned, this is no longer of direct relevance in a case such as the present, having regard to the development of the general principle in Hedley Byrne. No doubt it is correct that, in the nineteenth century, liability in tort depended upon the category of persons into which the defendant fell, with the result that in those days it did not necessarily follow that, because (for example) a surgeon owed an independent duty of care to his patient in tort irrespective of contract, other professional men were under a similar duty. Even so, as Mr Boswood for the Names stressed, if the existence of a contract between a surgeon and his patient did not preclude the existence of a tortious duty to the patient in negligence, there is no reason in principle why a tortious duty should not co-exist with a contractual duty in the case of the broad duty of care now recognised following the generalisation of the tort of negligence in the twentieth century.

So far as Hedley Byrne itself is concerned, Mr Kaye reads the speeches as restricting the principle of assumption of responsibility there established to cases where there is no contract; indeed, on this he tolerates no dissent, stating (at p. 706) that “unless one reads [Hedley Byrne] with deliberate intent to find obscure or ambiguous passages” it will not bear the interpretation favoured by Oliver J. I must confess however that, having studied yet again the speeches in Hedley Byrne [1964] AC 465 in the light of Mr Kaye’s critique, I remain of the opinion that Oliver J’s reading of them is justified. It is, I suspect, a matter of the angle of vision with which they are read. For here, I consider, Oliver J was influenced not only by what he read in the speeches themselves, notably the passage from Lord Devlin’s speech at pp. 528–529 (quoted above), but also by the internal logic reflected in that passage, which led inexorably to the conclusion which he drew. Mr Kaye’s approach involves regarding the law of tort as supplementary to the law of contract, i.e. as providing for a tortious liability in cases where there is no contract. Yet the law of tort is the general law, out of which the parties can, if they wish, contract; and, as Oliver J demonstrated, the same assumption of responsibility may, and frequently does, occur in a contractual context. Approached as a matter of principle, therefore, it is right to attribute to that assumption of responsibility, together with its concomitant reliance, a tortious liability, and then to inquire whether or not that liability is excluded by the contract because the latter is inconsistent with it. This is the reasoning which Oliver J, as I understand it, found implicit, where not explicit, in the speeches in Hedley Byrne. With his conclusion I respectfully agree. But even if I am wrong in this, I am of the opinion that this House should now, if necessary, develop the principle of assumption of responsibility as stated in Hedley Byrne to its logical conclusion so as to make it clear that a tortious duty of care may arise not only in cases where the relevant services are rendered gratuitously, but also where they are rendered under a contract. This indeed is the view expressed by my noble and learned friend, Lord Keith of Kinkel, in Murphy v. Brentwood District Council [1991] 1 AC 398, 466, in a speech with which all the other members of the Appellate Committee agreed.

An alternative approach, which also avoids the concurrence of tortious and contractual remedies, is to be found in the judgment of Deane J in Hawkins v. Clayton, 164 C.L.R. 539, 582–586, in which he concluded, at p. 585:

“On balance, however, it seems to me to be preferable to accept that there is neither justification nor need for the implication of a contractual term which, in the absence of actual intention of the parties, imposes upon a solicitor a contractual duty (with consequential liability in damages for its breach) which is coextensive in content and concurrent in operation with a duty (with consequential liability in damages for its breach) which already exists under the common law of negligence.”

It is however my understanding that by the law in this country contracts for services do contain an implied promise to exercise reasonable care (and skill) in the performance of the relevant services; indeed, as Mr Tony Weir has pointed out (XI International Encyclopedia of Comparative Law., chapter 12, para. 67), in the nineteenth century the field of concurrent liabilities was expanded “since it was impossible for the judges to deny that contracts contained an implied promise to take reasonable care, at the least, not to injure the other party.” My own belief is that, in the present context, the common law is not antipathetic to concurrent liability, and that there is no sound basis for a rule which automatically restricts the claimant to either a tortious or a contractual remedy. The result may be untidy; but, given that the tortious duty is imposed by the general law, and the contractual duty is attributable to the will of the parties, I do not find it objectionable that the claimant may be entitled to take advantage of the remedy which is most advantageous to him, subject only to ascertaining whether the tortious duty is so inconsistent with the applicable contract that, in accordance with ordinary principle, the parties must be taken to have agreed that the tortious remedy is to be limited or excluded.

In the circumstances of the present case, I have not regarded it as necessary or appropriate to embark upon yet another detailed analysis of the case law, choosing rather to concentrate on those authorities which appear to me to be here most important. I have been most anxious not to overburden an inevitably lengthy opinion with a discussion of an issue which is only one (though an important one) of those which fall for decision; and, in the context of the relationship of solicitor and client, the task of surveying the authorities has already been admirably performed by both Oliver J and Le Dain J. But, for present purposes more important, in the instant case liability can, and in my opinion should, be founded squarely on the principle established in Hedley Byrne itself, from which it follows that an assumption of responsibility coupled with the concomitant reliance may give rise to a tortious duty of care irrespective of whether there is a contractual relationship between the parties, and in consequence, unless his contract precludes him from doing so, the plaintiff, who has available to him concurrent remedies in contract and tort, may choose that remedy which appears to him to be the most advantageous.

9. "OTHER RIGHTS" (FAMILY RELATIONSHIPS)

Case 28

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (FOURTH CIVIL SENATE) 30 JANUARY 1957

BGHZ 23, 215 = NJW 1957, 670 = JZ 1957, 342

The parties married in 1941. On 24 March 1949 a child was born. Thereupon the plaintiff husband petitioned for a divorce, the wife cross-petitioned, and the marriage was dissolved on the ground that both were to be blamed, in the case of the wife because she had committed adultery. After the divorce, the plaintiff sought and obtained a decree to the effect that the child was illegitimate.

The plaintiff now claimed DM 1130.05 from the defendant representing the legal costs of the bastardy proceedings.

The Court of First Instance rejected the claim. An appeal to the Court of Appeal of Schleswig and a second appeal to the Bundesgerichtshof were without success for the following

Reasons

The Court of First Instance and the Court of Appeal have rejected the plaintiff's claim for damages representing his costs arising out of the bastardy proceedings on the ground that civil law does not allow a claim for damages in respect of such costs against a spouse who is guilty of a breach of fidelity.

I. The question was already debated at the time when the Civil Code was being drafted as to whether a spouse who was not the guilty party to a divorce should be allowed compensation in respect of those losses suffered by him as a result of the other spouse's dereliction of marital obligations. The Report of the Committee drafting the Civil Code (Motive) [reference] shows that the answer at the time was negative, principally because it was thought that such claims were incompatible with the nature of marriage and that to allow them would be tantamount to a penalty for a divorce; the latter had been deliberately omitted from the Civil Code contrary to its treatment in previous laws. The Reichsgericht adopted this view in its decision reported in [reference] and it was mainly followed by the literature and by the practice of the courts [references].

After the collapse in 1945 an opinion to the contrary made itself felt [references].

II. This Division considered as early as 21 March 1956 [reference] the question as to whether in addition to the claims which the civil law makes available in its provision on family law for the violation by a spouse of the duty of fidelity, further claims can be based on such a violation. This Division gave a negative answer in so far as the application of § 823 BGB was concerned. Although this decision has been criticised, this Division, having examined the question afresh, sees no reason for abandoning this practice. The following are the principal considerations that apply.

1. Civil law contains numerous provisions dealing with the duties arising from marriage and with their contravention [references]. Their specific regulation indicates a general principle that thereby the question was to be solved exclusively and finally as to what are the consequences of a violation of marital obligations.
2. The conclusion is in accordance with the ideas aired at the time when the Civil Code was drafted and as they are set out in the Report of the Committee drafting the BGB [reference].
3. That the provisions in the title on family law are exhaustive is borne out by the consideration that the regulation of the patrimonial relations between spouses would lose much of its meaning, if §§ 823 ff. BGB were to apply. For the duty to pay damages in accordance with the rules on obligations would much exceed the duties laid down by the provisions regulating family law. As a result the provisions regulating family law would become largely superfluous.
4. It is true that the conclusion of a marriage has consequences bearing on family law as well as on the law of property. In principle, however—in accordance with the principle which also found expression in § 888 II of the Code of Civil Procedure—a distinction must be drawn between the duties of the spouses which concern family law and those which involve proprietary rights resulting from the marriage. Those which are purely in the nature of family law, such as the duty to live together and the duty of fidelity, are confined to conduct in accordance with these duties, and if any consequences are to accompany their violation, they cannot be found in the law of obligations; instead, having regard to the nature of the marriage, they must be contained in the provisions of family law proper dealing with such violations. It is incompatible with the nature of marriage as well as with present-day moral sentiment which has not changed in this respect since the time when the Civil Code was drafted, to equate marriage with a transaction in the nature of property law.
5. It is true that in principle an interpretation of the law must be approved which serves to maintain a marital community in keeping with the solemn vows of marriage. This Division has constantly emphasised that aspect, particularly in its practice dealing with § 48 of the Marriage Act. However, to apply the rule on damages of the law of obligations to conjugal misconduct leads to undesirable results.

(a) First of all, an award for damages for a violation of matrimonial duties would equal a penalty in practice. For example, as a result of the unjustified refusal of the wife to cohabit, the blameless husband is forced to rely on a paid help to run the household, and the court gives judgment against the wife on the ground of a violation of § 1353 BGB to make monthly payments to the husband which correspond approximately to the cost of the help until cohabitation is resumed. This would mean in effect that by means of fines the wife is being compelled to resume cohabitation, with the difference that the money does not accrue to the State, as it does in the cases enumerated in § 888 I of the Code of Civil Procedure, but to the husband, and that in addition § 888 I of the Code of Civil Procedure would cease to have effect.

(b) It must be admitted that there are no reasons in equity why a guilty spouse should not bear the costs of proceedings to contest the legitimacy of the child conceived in adultery. The extent of the liability to damages of the guilty spouse is not, however, limited to this aspect, for this liability can only be either recognised or denied in principle. Consequently, if recognized, the blameless spouse could demand in accordance with the principle laid down in § 249 BGB to be placed in every respect in the same position as would have existed if the occurrence which gave rise to the claim for damages, and therefore also the ensuing divorce, had never taken place. The blameless party would be entitled not only to adequate or equitable maintenance by the guilty spouse but to a sum which enables him, contrary to the provisions on maintenance in §§ 58 and 59 of the Marriage Act, to maintain the same living standard as if the marriage still subsisted. In addition the blameless spouse would be entitled on the death of the guilty spouse to be treated as regards the estate of the latter as if the marriage had still existed at that time, leaving open the question as to whether in relation to the estate the blameless spouse is to be regarded as an heir or only as entitled to a compulsory portion (Pflichtteilsberechtigter).

(c) Among those who hold that claims for damages lie, some deny that they lie against a guilty spouse, among them in particular Schwab, while Boehmer, modifying his previous opinion [reference], now wishes to restrict it to the situation where the marriage subsists [references]. Leaving aside the consideration that the law of obligations hardly supports the distinction introduced by Boehmer, the refusal to allow a claim for damages against the guilty spouse is ineffective as soon as the co-respondent is sued for damages; the latter, who would be jointly liable in tort together with the guilty spouse, could claim a contribution from the guilty spouse under § 426 BGB. In this connection the question would arise further as to whether § 254 BGB may be applicable with the result that possibly the guilty spouse must shoulder the greater part of the damages or even the total amount.

(d) To allow a claim for damages may lead to the abuse of the grounds for divorce for base motives in order to make personal gains, a not unusual phenomenon, as the Report of the Committee drafting the Civil Code pointed out.

(e) Another consequence will be in all probability that the number of lawsuits between spouses will increase greatly. In many instances the proceedings for divorce and those for maintenance, if any, will be followed by an action for damages.

(f) In the proceedings for damages the need will arise frequently to make, first of all, exact findings concerning the history of the marriage and the conduct of the spouses. For contrary to the opinion of Boehmer it is common experience that in many cases a divorce is granted not on the ground of adulterous relations with a third party, but despite the existence of such relations for other reasons connected with the person of the guilty spouse alone, such as persistent refusal to comply with matrimonial duties.

(g) Apart from the fact that such suits for damages are prosecuted in a manner which is far from pleasant and constitute an excessive burden for the parties and the courts, the accusatorial character of the proceedings does not offer the same degree of reliability as do divorce proceedings.

(h) Finally, as the Report of the Committee drafting the Civil Code has equally pointed out, the assessment of damages in respect of the loss caused by the adulterous conduct and by the divorce must always remain more or less arbitrary. This, however, makes the law extraordinarily uncertain.

6. Boehmer’s reference to § 893 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not convince. This provision does not create an independent right to damages but only makes it clear that the right to damages existing according to the rules of civil law is not affected by the rules on levy of execution laid down by the Code of Civil Procedure [reference].

III. The foregoing considerations, which lead to the rejection of a claim for damages based on § 823 BGB, apply also if it is alleged, as indeed it is in the present case, that the adulterous conduct constitutes an intentional infliction of damage contrary to decent morals. It is true that as early as in its decision in [reference] the Reichsgericht had admitted that a married woman may be liable under § 826 BGB, and in its decision in [reference] it has accepted the application of § 826 BGB in a case where a married woman had committed adultery resulting in the birth of a child, a consequence which the wife and the co-respondent had considered possible. The practice of the courts and the literature have also followed this opinion of the Reichsgericht to a considerable extent [reference].

The present Division cannot accept this view. It is contradicted by the fact that the provisions dealing with family law regulate exhaustively the consequences of the violation of matrimonial duties and of a divorce. Instead this Division agrees with the opinions of Giesecke [reference] and of Boehmer [reference] that, if claims for damages for violation of marital duties brought on the basis of § 823 BGB are to be rejected having regard to the provision dealing with family law, the same must apply to claims brought on the strength of § 826 BGB. This Division has already held in its decision [reference] that provisions dealing with family law may also exclude the application of § 826 BGB.

Case 29

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (FOURTH CIVIL SENATE) 8 JANUARY 1958
BGHZ 26, 217 = NJW 1958, 544 = JZ 1958, 247

The defendant entertained an adulterous association with the plaintiff’s wife over a lengthy period, and a child was born on 21 September 1953. By a judgment of 17 May 1955 it was declared that the child was not the legitimate issue of the plaintiff and on 11 November 1955 the defendant, by a public document, recognized the child as his own and undertook to pay a monthly sum of DM 50 as maintenance. The marriage of the plaintiff with the mother was dissolved on 5 January 1956 by a decree which declared both to be guilty; but the wife’s degree of blame was held to be predominant.

The plaintiff claimed DM 1457 from the defendant consisting of his expenses in connection with the birth of the child, its maintenance, the costs of the action to have it declared illegitimate, and reimbursement of his repayments to the city of Nürnberg of a child’s allowance.

The Court of Appeal of Nürnberg allowed the claim. Upon appeal the decision below was reversed in part only for the following

Reasons

I. . . .

II. According to § 1715 BGB the natural father is under an obligation to reimburse the mother for the expenses of her delivery. The expenses of the delivery were paid by the plaintiff in ignorance of the fact that the defendant was the real father of the child. By these payments the obligations of the defendant towards the child's mother were also discharged. It is true that in principle a natural father is not relieved of his obligation under § 1715 BGB by the fact that a third party has paid the expenses of the delivery. However, considering the purpose of this provision, which only envisages the normal case of the delivery of an unmarried woman, different considerations must apply if and to the extent that the expenses of the delivery have been paid by the husband of the woman. Thus as a result of the plaintiff's payment the defendant has been saved the payment of the expenses of delivery, without good legal reason, and at the plaintiff's cost. In accordance with § 812 BGB the defendant must therefore reimburse the plaintiff for this sum . . .

III. On the other hand the appeal is justified in respect of the expenses, claimed by the plaintiff, for the perambulator, the baby's bed, its clothes, the contributions to the sickness insurance totalling DM 210 since these expenses must be regarded as part of the expenses of maintaining the child (§ 1708 I, second sentence) and since under § 1710 I BGB maintenance is to be provided by means of money payments; for the period in question these expenses are already covered by the maintenance payments awarded above (I). The plaintiff cannot either claim these expenses on the ground that they represent damages in tort; in this respect the observations set out below apply here as well . . .

IV. Further, the appeal is well founded in so far as the defendant has been condemned to reimburse the plaintiff for the costs arising from the proceedings to contest the legitimacy of the child.

This Division has already dealt several times with the question as to whether a third party can be held liable for the pecuniary losses caused to one spouse as a result of the relations of a third party with the other spouse which are adulterous or in violation of matrimonial fidelity. This Division has denied that such a claim for damages exists [references]. These decisions have been criticized by writers [references]. However, these attacks do not provide any reason for this Division to change its previous practice. Instead the following comments may be made.

1. The decision of 6 February 1957 is being misinterpreted if it is understood to lead to the inevitable conclusion that no damages can be claimed for injuries to a spouse, such as infection with a venereal disease of a wife who had been the victim of rape, even if the requirements of §§ 823 ff. BGB have been complied with. As the reasons set out in para. 3 of this decision [reference] show clearly, this Division has only rejected claims for damages in so far as they are derived from "the destruction of the marriage". If, however, no liability in damages arises from the "destruction of the marriage", it is irrelevant whether the damage caused by the destruction of the marriage is adequate or not.

2. The marital duties which arise mutually between spouses, in particular the duty of fidelity, are personal obligations of the spouses, having regard to the nature of marriage. Therefore they can only be violated by a spouse and not by a third party [reference].
3. § 172 of the Criminal Code, which only provides the possibility for punishing adultery, does not offer any guidance as to the existence of a duty to pay damages. Other violations of marital duties are not punishable according to German criminal law.
4. It is true that in principle a duty to contribute presupposes a duty to pay damages on the part of the person found to contribute [references]. Boehmer affirms in principle that a spouse is liable in damages, but wishes to prevent any enforcement while the marriage persists, with the result that the principles established by the Bundesgerichtshof [reference] would apply without difficulty. However, as Beitzke remarks appositely, the principle of § 242 BGB requires that if a claim lies against the third party involved in the break-up of the marriage in respect of the loss suffered by the other spouse in consequence of the break-up, the third party must not bear the payment of these damages alone; instead his associate, namely the other spouse, who as a rule is principally to blame, must bear his share (see the case decided by the Bundesgerichtshof in [reference] where an exemption clause agreed between the spouses could not deprive the third party of his right to contribution). It is generally agreed that in assessing the amount of contribution the principle of § 254 BGB applies [reference].
5. The provision of § 1359 BGB does not provide any guidance, since in principle it does not bear upon the duty of marital fidelity; it is also impossible to assume that as regards the latter, a spouse is only liable to apply the same degree of diligence as he applies to his own affairs. If this were so, the guilty spouse to a divorce would also have to be held responsible for every other pecuniary damage which the other spouse suffers as a result of the divorce. This conclusion is ruled out in all likelihood, despite the aim stressed generally by Beitzke “to tie a person to the marriage, once it has been concluded, by the threat of liability in damages”.
6. The liability to pay damages laid down by § 1298 BGB in respect of breach of promise referred to by Beitzke does not assist either. On the contrary, the fact that the legislature deemed it necessary to insert this provision appears to indicate that in principle claims for damages arising out of duties imposed by family law are to lie only when the law so provides expressly.
7. The enactment of this provision also militates against the assumption that a general duty to pay damages exists in family law, as Boehmer suggests now, while denying that liability in damages arises under §§ 823 ff. BGB in the case of a guilty spouse. However, until now such claims for damages, as well as those for the violation of other protected interests, have been based exclusively on these provisions, unless allowed expressly by other rules, and claims for damages have been denied in principle where § 1353 BGB has been violated [reference]. Provisions such as those contained in section 151 of the Swiss Civil Code are unknown in German law.
8. Article 6 of the German Constitution (Fundamental Law) does not support a claim to damages either. Leaving aside that the marriage as such is not directly affected by the fact whether damages are paid after its breakdown or not, Article 6 of the Constitution does not concern the personal relationship between the spouses. Boehmer, too, believes that by allowing claims for damages “no tendency towards the enforcement of the duty to comply” is being shown.

9. Equally nothing can be deduced from the rules on maintenance after divorce; in so far as they concern the position of the wife, Beitzke describes them as being in total contradiction to Article 3 of the Constitution. The question is, however, irrelevant in the present case, since the claims here are not brought by the wife.

10. Finally it remains uncertain, despite the arguments of Boehmer, how the amount of damages is to be assessed when a marriage has been broken up culpably. If the duty to reimburse the costs of the proceedings to contest the legitimacy of the child is to be based on the protective function of § 1353 BGB, as Boehmer seems to hold, no persuasive reason exists for denying the existence of a duty to pay damages for any other pecuniary losses arising from the break-up of the marriage, a result which Boehmer himself regards as “impossible”. Any general requirement such as that “the damages claimed must be limited to the protective purpose of the protective rule in question does not permit a clear assessment of the damages. The likely consequences of such a view would be many disputes, the outcome of which must be quite uncertain; such a result does not seem to be desirable for the law’s sake as well.”

V. The Court of Appeal holds that a claim for damages against the defendant in respect of the costs of the proceedings to contest the legitimacy of the child cannot be supported in law as distinct from the costs of divorce proceedings; in the latter case the mutual relations between the spouses provide the basis, the husband is faced in the first instance with his unfaithful partner, with whom prima-facie matrimonial matters should be thrashed out alone while the co-respondent figures behind the wife and can only be reached through the latter. On the other hand, the co-respondent was directly involved in the claim for damages in respect of the procreation of the child, and in the triangle formed by the relationship between the husband, the child, and the third party, the wife figured either not at all or only as a fictional centre. Therefore the issue was not the protection of the marriage as a community of life but the legal relationship between father and child. Moreover, the attack on the legitimacy of the child and the ensuing consequences were independent of the continuation of the marriage.

These considerations, too, cannot support a claim for damages against the defendant based on the costs of the proceedings to contest the legitimacy of the child. First of all, in considering the relations between the husband, the child, and the third party, the wife cannot be excluded; for these relations cannot exist without the wife and her unfaithful conduct, just as the third party and his adulterous relationship with the wife were decisive in the case of the divorce. Claims arising out of the procreation of the child fall therefore into the sphere of family law, just as much as those based on adultery and on a divorce ensuing therefrom. The fact that a marriage may continue independently of an act of adultery and of the bastardisation of a child does not alter the nature of the claims arising therefrom which fall within the sphere of family law. Finally, if the third party were to be held liable in damages, the wife would be under a duty to contribute, as explained in IV(4), above.

Case 30

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 22 FEBRUARY 1973
 JZ 1973, 668 (with approving note by Manfred Löwisch) = NJW 1973, 991 = VERSR 1973, 442

Facts

The plaintiff married in 1965 and was still married at the time of the action, living together with his wife. From 1 October 1968 until 10 October 1968 the wife remained absent from the marital home at the invitation of the defendant with whom she stayed in his flat. It was not disputed that acts incompatible with marital fidelity occurred during the time; according to the plaintiff's allegation adulterous intercourse occurred as well.

The plaintiff contended that by the adulterous conduct of the defendant his general right of personality and his right to the undisturbed existence of the marital community had been violated. He claimed DM 10,000 with interest as “compensation and satisfaction” to be paid either to himself or alternatively to a charity. The claim was rejected in all three instances for the following

Reasons

I. The Court of Appeal assumes, in accordance with the plaintiff's pleadings, that the plaintiff's wife and the defendant committed adultery. Nevertheless, it rejected the claim and held as follows:

The plaintiff was wrong in referring to the practice of the Bundesgerichtshof according to which a person whose right of personality had been injured can in certain circumstances demand pecuniary damages as compensation for his non-pecuniary damage. This claim too—like that for pain and suffering—was a claim for damages, while its function of providing satisfaction was only ancillary. No room existed in addition for a separate claim for satisfaction as understood by the plaintiff. A claim for damages—on whatever grounds—was excluded since special family relations were involved. To this extent the Court of Appeal follows the practice initiated by the decision of the Bundesgerichtshof [reference] and holds that the same principles must apply to non-pecuniary and pecuniary damage (and injury to health). Above all, the damage alleged to be suffered by the plaintiff was caused by the unfaithful conduct of his own wife.

The Court of Appeal believes that any payment to the plaintiff is ruled out in particular for the reason that his marriage continues. The fact that the payment would inevitably also benefit indirectly the wife, who was equally or principally to blame, was clearly unacceptable.

Similarly payment to a third party was excluded. According to the Court of Appeal, it would amount to the imposition of a penalty upon the defendant which was not supported in law.

The Court of Appeal admitted that an intrusion into marital life of the kind alleged in the present case constitutes a violation of the general right of personality of the deceived spouse. However, here again the considerations applied which also excluded other claims based on tort.

II. These considerations cannot be faulted, at least in the result.

1. The plaintiff bases his claims on the fact that the defendant was an accomplice to the breach of fidelity for which the plaintiff's wife was to be blamed. According to a constant practice of the Bundesgerichtshof, maintained until now in the face of attacks by some writers [references], no claims in tort are allowed by the law in force in cases of "intrusion of a marriage" either against the guilty spouse or against the intruding third party. The Fourth Division of the Bundesgerichtshof last reaffirmed this practice in its decision of 3 November 1971 [reference] supported by detailed reasons and accompanied by an account of the present views of writers. In that decision the Fourth Division has given a comprehensive account of its reasons for denying unconditionally and generally that matters of intrusion into marriage involve legal interests protected by the law of tort under § 823 I BGB. The Fourth Division points out that without the co-operation of one of the spouses no interference with the marriage can occur and that, therefore, it constitutes essentially an internal marital matter, which is not sought to be protected by inclusion among the situations attracting liability in tort. In view of its strong link with the conduct of the unfaithful spouse the participation of the third party must be coloured by it as well. It is inadmissible to divide their activities into misbehaviour of the spouse governed by matrimonial law and a tort committed by the third party rendering him liable to pay damages. The Fourth Division has pointed out further that it is difficult, having regard to the multiplicity of possible acts of interference with marital relations, to establish suitable limits for any such liability and that the necessary enquiries, as required in the individual case, would have undesirable effects in various respects. For this reason disputes arising out of marital misconduct are treated exclusively as matrimonial matters, even where third parties are involved. The Division sees no reasons for deviating from these principles. They militate also against the present claim for payment as satisfaction for the non-pecuniary loss of the offended spouse. Even among those writers who are opposed to the practice of the Bundesgerichtshof only very few believe that such a payment is allowed by the law as it stands [references].

2. Contrary to the appellant's main contention, the claim cannot succeed either if in applying § 823 I BGB emphasis is placed on the violation of the plaintiff's general right of personality rather than on that of the integrity of the marital community. It is true that according to the practice of the Bundesgerichtshof, particularly of this Division, a claimant whose general right of personality has been severely infringed may be awarded pecuniary damages for his non-pecuniary loss, provided that additional conditions have been met [references]. However, in so far as the right of personality of a spouse has been infringed because a third party acting together with the other spouse has interfered with the right to the integrity of the marital community, as in the present case, any claims for damages in tort must be denied for the reasons stated above which rule out liability in tort when the right to the integrity of the marital community has been violated. In many cases where a marriage has been subject to interference, and probably in all cases of adultery, the conditions enumerated above will exist for holding that the right of personality has been severely infringed. Therefore, the Court of Appeal, too, assumes that such a violation of the right of personality has occurred. To take such a view of the law would, however, run contrary to the requirements based on the evaluation of the narrower sphere of family law [reference]. This applies at any event in those cases where, as in the present, the violation of the right of personality is restricted to an interference with the matrimonial community of life and fidelity by a third party with the necessary participation of the other spouse.

3. Contrary to the plaintiff's contention no reason exists for taking a different view of the law either because of a fundamental change of public opinion, or because of a conflict with the values expressed by superior norms of the Constitution.

(a) The refusal to enforce matrimonial conduct by public measures, already apparent in the Preparatory Materials for the BGB [reference], has been reinforced still further. An enforceable claim for damages would be equal to such a measure; for this reason it has been recommended expressly as a means of “deterrence” [reference]. The increased aversion of the legislature to such measures is shown by the fact that the provision of a penalty according to the former § 172 of the Criminal Code—which had been hedged around already by narrow conditions (not applicable here)—was abrogated; it is irrelevant in the present connection that this change in the law only took place after the alleged act of adultery.

(b) The rejection of the claim for damages in a case such as the present does not contravene either the values of superior norms of the Constitution on which the Bundesgerichtshof relied in its practice relating to the right of personality. The limits of the general right of personality recognised and protected by § 823 I BGB are flexible. They can always be drawn only with reference to other areas which are protected by law. In the present case these emerge from the observations made above.

The legislature has refrained from enforcing proper marital conduct directly or indirectly by public measures (see also § 888 II of the Code of Civil Procedure), including any penalties and equivalent measures for adultery, and has contented itself with the protection provided by family law. Having regard to the special character of this subject matter, it cannot be included that the importance of the protection of the personality has been misunderstood and has not been taken into account sufficiently. Instead it expresses the conviction that highly personal relations should not be regulated by law, which is at least compatible with constitutional law and corresponds to modern ethics.

(c) Finally, a conclusion to the contrary cannot be based either on the protection of marriage provided by Article 6 I of the Constitution, which the appellant rightly does not cite. Admittedly, marriage is a human institution which is regulated by law and protected by the Constitution and which, in turn, creates genuine legal duties. Its essence, however, consists in the readiness, founded in morals, of the parties to the marriage to create and to maintain it. The provision of Article 6 I of the Constitution is only intended to protect and to promote this unit, which has its origins in a sphere which precedes law; Article 6 does not refer to the personal relations between spouses [references]. Consequently it does not support any demand for the punishment of marital infidelity, nor of third parties who are indispensable participants. It need not be examined here whether different considerations might apply in respect of totally different attacks against the sexual integrity of a spouse (by threats, fraud, or force) if the general law should not provide adequate remedies for compensation.

*Case 31BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (FOURTH CIVIL SENATE) 19 DECEMBER 1989
NJW 1990, 706 = FAMRZ 1990, 367Facts*

The parties, married in 1953, were divorced by judgment of 24 April 1959 on the ground of the fault of the present plaintiff (then defendant). During the marriage two daughters were born, first B and then, on 22 March 1957, S. After the divorce custody of the daughters was awarded to the defendant, and acting as their statutory representative, she sued the present plaintiff for maintenance payments in 1960, 1964 and 1965. In 1960 she garnished the plaintiff's earnings as well as the disability pension which the plaintiff received while occasionally unemployed through TBC. From the summer of 1966, the plaintiff paid maintenance money for the children by agreement and without court order. In 1986 the plaintiff sued for a declaration that S was illegitimate, and the Amtsgericht in W held that S was not the child of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff now sues the defendant for damages in respect of the maintenance payments he has made since the divorce in respect of the child who was not his and whom he was not bound to support. He alleged that in making the claim for maintenance as the daughter's legal representative, the defendant had represented that he was the father of the child. The defendant replied that she had never doubted the legitimacy of S, and had never noticed the lack of resemblance between her and the plaintiff, which was not at all obvious. The Landgericht dismissed the claim, and the Oberlandesgericht dismissed the plaintiff's appeal, as did the Bundesgerichtshof.

Reasons

I. The court below held it doubtful that the plaintiff had any tort claim for economic loss against his ex-wife on the ground of the illegitimacy of the child S. Founding on the constant decisions of the Bundesgerichtshof the court inclined to the view that the sanctions for anti-matrimonial conduct were to be found in family law exclusively, and that the law of delict afforded the plaintiff no further claim.

Even had claims for damages not been excluded by the provisions of family law, the court below would have dismissed the claim, for the defendant had not deceived the plaintiff in such a way as to render her liable in damages, either by making the claims for maintenance which, until the finding of illegitimacy, were vested in her daughter S, or through any culpable failure to disclose: the defendant was under no duty to confess her adultery or admit the possibility that S might have another father. Finally, claims in tort failed for lack of the requisite mens rea: it had not been shown that the defendant had appreciated that the plaintiff was not the father of S, and the mere fact of promiscuity, as to which no findings were made as regards the time of conception, did not establish that she had.

II. We agree with the result reached by the court below.

1. There is no doubt that the plaintiff has suffered economically as a result of the defendant's conduct: for years he has been paying maintenance which he did not owe. As the apparent father of S he was burdened with paying for her upkeep, until the judgment of 25 March 1987 finally declared that S was illegitimate and that it was her true father who had always been liable to make the payments [references].

2. Nevertheless, the law of tort does not permit the plaintiff to sue his ex-wife for this economic loss (BGHZ 80, 235 [238] = NJW 1981, 1445).

(a) When the BGB was in draft the question was already being ventilated whether an innocent spouse (as the law then was) could claim compensation for harm due to breach by the other spouse of the duties assumed on entering the marriage, and since that time it has often been the subject of judicial decision and academic discussion.

Such a claim was originally rejected as incompatible with the nature of marriage, on the view that to grant it would amount to penalising divorce in a way which the BGB, in conscious deviation from prior law, had elected not to follow (see BGHZ 23, 215 [216] = NJW 1957, 670 = LM § 823 (Af) BGB no. 5, with references to the Motive to the BGB, vol. 4, p. 615).

In its first decision on the matter (31 March 1956), the Bundesgerichtshof declared that claims for damages for spousal infidelity under § 823 BGB were ousted by the provisions of family law regarding such conduct. This was criticised, but in BGHZ 23, 215 ff. = NJW 1957, 670 the court adhered to its view, and relied inter alia on the following considerations: The BGB contains many provisions on the duties assumed on marriage and the consequences of their breach (especially the Marriage Act, and §§ 1353, 1361, 1933, 2077, 2335 BGB); the very existence of this special set of rules indicates that in principle the consequences of a breach of spousal duties are to be determined exclusively in terms of those rules. It is true that the personal and economic consequences of getting married must be kept distinct. Those which appertain purely to family law, such as the duty to live together and the duty of fidelity, are fulfilled by appropriate conduct. Should such duties be breached, the consequences are to be drawn not from the law of obligations but, consistently with the nature of marriage, from the provisions of family law relating to such breaches.

In its judgment of 6 February 1957 (BGHZ 23, 279 ff. = NJW 1957, 671) the court applied to the third party adulterer the principle that the anti-matrimonial conduct of a spouse did not give rise to any claim for damages in the law of obligations independently of the provisions of family law, especially the Marriage Law (and compare BGHZ 26, 217 ff. = NJW 1958, 544). Again it stated: “Although anti-matrimonial conduct can undeniably cause harm to the ‘innocent’ spouse, especially if it leads to divorce, the law does not afford any compensation outside the provisions of family law, so anti-matrimonial conduct cannot be treated as an unlawful act grounding a claim for damages under §§ 823 ff. BGB.”

In 1971 the BGH returned to the question (BGHZ 57, 229). Again it rejected the view expressed by academics [Boehmer in many articles, Beitzke, Dölle, Gernhuber and Jayme] that breaches of marriage vows should trigger liability under § 823 I BGB, and asserted that marriage is not one of the relationships whose breach can give rise to general claims for compensation for economic harm. In more detail it confirmed that it would adhere to the view that marriage vows were not among the rights protected by the law of tort in § 823 I BGB. Since the consortium of the spouses could only be disrupted by the participation of one of them, such breaches constitute essentially a matter internal to the marriage, not under the intended protection of the law of torts (BGHZ 57, 229 [232] = NJW 1972, 199).

In a judgment of 22 February 1973 (NJW 1973, 991), the Sixth Civil Senate of the Bundesgerichtshof adopted the view of the Fourth Senate (as it then was). Then the question was whether damages could be claimed on the basis of an invasion of the right of human personality rather than an invasion of the integrity of the community of marriage. The court refused to allow this, on the ground that the rather fluid limits to the general right of human personality had to be drawn in the light of other legal provisions, in this case the considerations stated by the Fourth Civil Senate (as in BGHZ 57, 229 = NJW 1977, 199), and though in many cases of anti-matrimonial behaviour there would be a serious invasion of the right of personality—perhaps always in the case of adultery—yet to impose liability in tort would conflict with the more specific prescriptions of family law.

(b) In BGHZ 80, 235, the mother of a child conceived out of wedlock made false representations to the father and thereby induced him to marry her. This senate made the general observation, in line with the decisions of the Bundesgerichtshof, that obligational claims, especially tort claims for damages, are ousted by the exclusive special rules of family law, the Supreme Court having uniformly held that a husband whose wife had committed adultery and borne a child could not bring an action in tort against the wife or the third party for compensation for the economic harm he suffered as a result of the apparent legitimacy of the child (BGHZ 80, 235 [238] = NJW 1981, 1445). Because of the peculiar facts in that case, however, the point did not fall for decision, but in the present case it does. A pointer in the same direction is the decision of this court on 4 November 1987 (NJW 1988, 2032) that the personal duties arising from the community of marriage can only be fulfilled by the free moral choice of the parties, and that even indirect compulsion by the state, such as a penalty clause or damages, must be excluded.

In this case, where after a divorce the apparent father is suing his ex-wife (not the real father) for damages in respect of the maintenance he has for years been paying for a child not his, this senate has again considered the matter afresh. We adhere to the holdings which the Supreme Court has increasingly confirmed since the introduction of the BGB (on the significance of continuity of holdings and legal certainty, see Grosser Senat, BGHZ 85, 64 [66] = NJW 1983, 228). We endorse the view that matrimonial difficulties which affect the inner social and sexual life of the partners, adultery being the chief of these, represent a matter internal to the marriage which is not within the protective ambit of the rules of tort [references].

This view was formed by the Bundesgerichtshof under the previous law of marriage; ideas have changed, but the view is even more strongly justified after the first reform law of marriage. Whereas under prior law (§ 58 I and II Marriage Act) the party whose adultery led to divorce and who was solely or principally at fault faced sanctions in regard to maintenance—either the loss of a claim for maintenance or liability to provide it—under the present law “fault” which leads to the breakdown of the marriage does not in principle bar the “guilty” spouse from claiming maintenance if in need, save under § 1579 nos. 6 and 7 BGB in cases of hardship. If there was no liability in tort for adultery under prior law which provided for financial sanctions for such conduct, there is no reason now that the fault principle has given way to the principle of the breakdown of marriage to deviate from the previous decisions and allow claims for damages in tort for conduct which impairs the marriage. This senate therefore adheres all the more strongly to its previous position that it is incompatible with the essence of marriage to apply the law of damages to internal matrimonial matters; marriage and family law oust the law of tort.

Thus not only claims based on § 823 II BGB but all suchlike claims in tort between divorced spouses are excluded if the right alleged to be invaded is the “very core of marriage” and the “interest it seeks to protect” or “marriage as an ideal legal interest” (Gernhuber) or the “personal moral bond of marriage” (Soergel-Lange), the “right to fidelity in marriage” (Gernhuber, Enneccerus-Lehmann) or “the maintenance of sexual fidelity” (Wacke), the “right to the protection and continuance of the matrimonial community of living” (Berg, Lüke), the “absolute right of the spouses to complete and exclusive consortium” (Dölle) or—based on § 1353 BGB—a “claim to enjoin conduct which disturbs the marriage in the area of personal duties of marriage” (Jayme).

The sanctions of tort law may, by contrast, apply to marriage in its external objective and spatial aspects (BGHZ 6, 360 ff. = NJW 1952, 975; BGHZ 34, 80 ff. = NJW 1961, 504), normally vulnerable only by third parties, or, as the Fourth Senate (as it then was) stated in BGHZ 26, 217 [221] = NJW 1958, 544, to the invasion of other legal rights, as for example damage to the health of a spouse through infection resulting from adultery (see Tiedemann, NJW 1988, 729).

But as to the internal mutual relations of the spouses inherent in their matrimonial and sexual community, claims for damages in tort are excluded for the reasons given. Thus adultery by itself cannot be treated as conduct generating liability in damages. If, as in the present case, the wife breaches her duty of fidelity, commits adultery and conceives a child which, until a declaration of illegitimacy, rates as the child of the husband who then pays for her maintenance, he cannot after successfully establishing the illegitimacy of the child use the law of tort to claim compensation for the expense he has been put to because the child was apparently his (BGHZ 80, 235 [238] = NJW 1981, 1445).

3. (a) But the fact that claims for damages under the general law of tort in respect of the consequences of adultery are ousted by the provisions of marriage and family law does not mean that if there are further aggravating factors the special tort rule of § 826 BGB may not be applicable. § 826 BGB is a “rule of law at a higher level”, providing a general standard applicable throughout the whole of private and public law, and comparable in this respect with the all-pervasive principle of § 242 BGB. It is true that the former Fourth Civil Senate deviated from the jurisprudence of the Reichsgericht (RGZ 152, 397 ff.) and held that claims arising from anti-matrimonial conduct were barred under § 826 BGB as well (BGHZ 23, 217 [221] = NJW 1958, 544), but that was a case in which there were no special circumstances over and above the adultery which, combined with it, constituted causing harm contra bonos mores. Such factors were, by contrast, present in the case decided by the Reichsgericht (Warn. 1935 no. 184) where the adulterous wife and her lover conspired by false statements to procure the dismissal of the husband’s claim for a declaration of the illegitimacy of the adulterine child. The Reichsgericht was right to allow a claim for damages under § 826 BGB in that case (and see RGZ 152, 397 [400]). In exceptional cases, therefore, § 826 BGB can apply to disruption of the internal and sexual relationship of husband and wife, especially through adultery, if in addition to the adultery the errant spouse is guilty of further immoral damaging conduct, characterised by an intention, albeit a qualified intention, to cause harm. Whether conduct is immoral under § 826 BGB depends on the standards inherent in that text, not on those appropriate to the spousal community. This is not the case when the wife merely fails to make spontaneous avowal of her act of adultery and leaves the husband in the belief that the child is his. The mere fact that the wife concealed her infidelity does not amount to an immoral wrong in the sense of § 826 BGB, for there is no duty, sanctioned by the law of damages, to tell one’s spouse of one’s adultery (RGZ 152, 397 [401]). To require a spouse to make such disclosure would normally be excessive, especially as she would quite often find herself in an insoluble dilemma, for disclosure would not only affect her own interests but also imperil the child’s interest in maintenance.

There might, by contrast, be a claim under § 826 BGB if a wife who had conceived a child in adultery made false statements or outright denials in order to dispel her husband's doubts about its paternity, or if she prevented her husband by deceit or otherwise, say by duress, from pursuing a claim for a declaration of illegitimacy.

(b) No such conduct by the defendant has been established in this case or appears from the facts in evidence.

(aa) The plaintiff himself has not alleged that during the period when he was in contact with the child S he ever expressed any doubts about her paternity which the defendant allayed by false statements or otherwise. He rather claims to have been deceived by the fact that the defendant "never made an issue of paternity" and did not volunteer an admission of her adultery. This is not enough to meet the requirements of § 826 BGB.

(bb) Nor does the conduct of the defendant in "energetically asserting the apparent rights" of her daughter in several court cases constitute an immoral wrong under § 826 BGB, as the plaintiff alleges.

As the statutory representative of S the defendant sued in April 1960 for monthly maintenance payments of DM 75, which the plaintiff had earlier agreed in writing to make. In 1964 the defendant sought an increase to DM 100 per month and in May 1965 a further increase to DM 130, as well as demanding a like sum for her daughter B, who was four years older. The total sums claimed were in line with the figures in the Düsseldorf Tables for the maintenance by persons in the second and third income groups of children between six and ten years old (S) and between ten and fourteen (B), and the amounts were manifestly reasonable.

Nor is § 826 BGB satisfied by the defendant's conduct in garnishing the plaintiff's wages and then his pension when he did not punctually pay the sums he had agreed or been ordered to pay. The daughter S needed the payments to meet her living needs. Until declared illegitimate, she ranked as the legitimate child of the plaintiff (§ 1593 BGB) and he was liable for her maintenance under §§ 1601, 1602, 1603 BGB. As the child's statutory representative, the defendant was bound to see to making these claims in the interests of the child, and in making and enforcing the maintenance claims she was acting in justified pursuance of the interests of the child. If, instead of parental control being vested in the defendant, a curator had been appointed (§ 1629 II, 1795 I no. 3, 1903 BGB) to claim the maintenance payments and resist the claim for a declaration of illegitimacy, such curator would likewise have been bound, until the illegitimacy was established, to sue the defendant for the maintenance payments if necessary, and to enforce them by execution if not voluntarily met (§ 1915, 1793, 1833 BGB). Such conduct by the curator would not have been essentially different from what the defendant did. This shows that in pursuing maintenance claims for S the defendant remained within the limits of the means and methods provided by the legal system and that she cannot on that ground be found guilty of an immoral wrong under § 826 BGB.

(cc) Alternatively the appellant seeks to found his claim for damages on the principles developed by this court in BGHZ 80, 235 ff. = NJW 1981, 1445. He alleges that the defendant's failure to make requisite disclosure and her implicit assertion of his paternity by suing for maintenance prevented the plaintiff from seeking an earlier declaration of illegitimacy, and that this was in law tantamount to the fraudulent inducement to marry in that case.

This is not acceptable. In BGHZ 80, 235 = NJW 1981, 1445 the defendant had conceived the child before marriage and not as a result of adultery in breach of marriage vows, so the facts there were essentially different from this case, where the central question is whether breach of the marriage vows can generate a claim in tort. Furthermore, in that case the mother of the child had expressly and indeed in writing misrepresented the facts by assuring the plaintiff that during the statutory period of conception she had had congress “with him and him alone” and so deliberately allayed his doubts about the paternity of the child about to be born. She thus induced the plaintiff to enter the marriage and procured that the child was born legitimate and would be maintained by the plaintiff until a declaration of illegitimacy. Such deceitful conduct on the part of the mother constituted conduct apt to generate liability in damages for intentionally causing harm in an immoral manner under § 826 BGB as explained. No comparably harmful conduct apart from the adultery itself can be laid at the door of the defendant here.

1. The fourth book of the BGB deals with family law, but problems of family life have also tried to penetrate the law of torts under the heading of “other rights” of § 823 I BGB. (The first decision on the matter was decided by the BGH on 26 June 1952 (BGHZ 6, 360 = NJW 1952, 975) and it was rendered as a result of an action brought by a betrayed wife who sought an injunction to stop her husband’s mistress from residing in the marital home. Though the court recognised that delictual protection should be afforded to the spatial and material sphere of matrimony—räumlich-gegenständlicher Bereich der Ehe—it did not decide whether this should be achieved by means of § 823 I BGB or through the direct application of Article 6 of the Constitution by virtue of Article 1 III of that enactment. As a result of this, wives have been given the right to enter the premises of a company run by the husband (BGHZ 34, 80, 87) or to insist that they be allowed to work at the family bakery (BGHZ 35, 302, 304.) Such attempts have, on the whole, met with varied, perhaps modest success but this has not discouraged litigation. The proper role of tort law in the context of disrupted family relations has also given rise to a lively literature which can be found (along with a neat summary of the various views) in Medicus, nos. 616 et seq. Cases 28–31 come from this area of the law and also show how German judges bring together different parts of their Code and thus try to retain an “internal balance” in the Code. (Earlier cases are reviewed by Markovitz, “Marriage and the State: A Comparative Look at East and West German Family Law” 24 Stanford L. Rev. 116 (1971).) Overall, however, the BGH—rejecting academic suggestions—has shown a preference for the view that “marriage is not one of the relationships whose breach can give rise to general claims for compensation for economic harm”. (See BGHZ 27, 229; BGH NJW 1973, 991; BGHZ 80, 235; BGH NJW 1990, 706 = Case 31, above.)

2. The “innocent spouse’s” losses can be pecuniary or non-pecuniary. The former include such items as the cost of delivery of the child (discussed in case 29), its maintenance, the cost of illegitimation (not allowed by cases 28 and 30), and of divorce proceedings; the latter can refer to the breakdown of the marriage or nervous or other illness resulting from such upheavals. Those who argue against the trend shown in the cases reproduced above are really arguing in favour of a wider recognition of the first type of loss, not the second.

3. These and other analogous cases raise many points. Here are some: If the “innocent husband”/plaintiff pays for the cost of delivery of the child, the natural father is enriched by a corresponding amount and must, therefore, pay the former that amount. The reasoning given for this in case 29, BGHZ 23, 215, (but not the final result) has been doubted (see Medicus, no. 618). Likewise, maintenance paid by the “innocent husband”/plaintiff for an illegitimate child may be claimed from the natural father after the child has been declared as illegitimate. But a husband’s tort action against a divorced wife for the economic loss due to his making maintenance payments to an apparently legitimate daughter (who was actually the product of the wife’s adultery) will fail. So held the BGH in NJW 1990, 706, Case 31 above, restating its motto: “Marriage and family law oust the law of tort.” A claim under § 826 BGB might, however, succeed if the requirement of immorality of this provision were satisfied. Mere marital infidelity will, thus, not do. It would be otherwise, however, if, for example, it could be proved that the woman and her lover had conspired to procure the dismissal of the husband's claim for a declaration of illegitimacy: RGZ 152, 397 which, apparently, is still good law. (For further details, the reader must consult books on family law.) BGH NJW 1990, 706 contains some interesting dicta which explain this pre-eminence of § 826 BGB. The costs of divorce are usually shared by the spouses—§ 93a I ZPO—but the “innocent spouse” can subsequently claim his share of the divorce costs from the “marital intruder”. But no damages can be claimed for the act of infidelity (case 31).

4. Some of these points may not arise at all in Common law jurisdictions; others do, and often receive similar solutions. In the US, for example, attorneys' fees are borne by the parties unless otherwise provided for by statute. To that extent, therefore, case 28 has no equivalent. In England there seems to be no case which has awarded costs or compensation for the expense of proving a child to be illegitimate, though Halsbury, vol. 13, 4th edn., § 970, does not in terms exclude the possibility. Disavowing a child born in legal wedlock can also receive a different treatment. In England it is possible but not easy, there being a presumption of legitimacy. In the United States the answers are more varied, some States adopting irrebuttable presumptions of legitimacy, others imposing a short period of time following birth within which the illegitimation proceedings must be brought (Pounds v. Schori 377 So. 2d 1195 (La. 1979) (six months); cf. Singley v. Singley 140, So. 2d 546 (La. App. 1962) where a child was born more than three hundred days after separation of husband and wife and the husband was permitted to disavow). (See Clark, Law of Domestic Relations, 172 (1968).) But if the father refuses to disavow a child, no one else will normally be allowed to do so. (See Petitioner F. v. Respondent R. 430 A. 2d 1075 (Del. 1981), where a natural father, who sued for custody of the child which was conceived while its mother was married to another man, had his action dismissed for lack of standing to sue.)

5. The problem discussed in case 30, BGH JZ 1973, 668, is still known in some American jurisdictions under the name of criminal conversation. Kremer v. Black 201 Neb. 467, 268 NW 2d 582 (1978) is an example. But most States have abolished such actions and much criticism is still made against those who recognise it. The action is no longer known in English law. (It was abolished by the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1970, section 5.) In the Commonwealth, the action for enticement was abolished somewhat later. Thus in Australia this was done by the Family Law Act 1975, section 120. In New Zealand on the other hand the action for enticement was enshrined in legislative form as late as 1975 (see Domestic Actions Act 1975, section 3); but it was abolished five years later by the Family Proceedings Act 1980, section 190. For further discussions one must consult family law textbooks as well as older editions of Tort treatises.

10. “ESTABLISHED AND OPERATING BUSINESS”

Case 32

REICHSGERICHT (FOURTH CIVIL SENATE) 27 FEBRUARY 1904 RGZ 58, 24

Three designs were entered in the Register of Designs on behalf of the defendant firm . . . In the summer of 1901 the defendant, under threats of an action for damages and a criminal prosecution, forbade the plaintiff to copy the designs. He did so, at all events by a letter of 2 September concerning carpets, mats, and rugs made of jute pile and, under the same date, by letters to two of the plaintiff's weaving managers. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant had also forbidden the manufacture at an earlier date. In consequence the plaintiff had already, on 10 June 1901, discontinued the manufacture of jute pile in his business. On 15 September 1901 the defendant prosecuted the plaintiff for an offence against section 10 of the Act of 1 June 1891, whereupon a preliminary enquiry was instituted against the plaintiff.

Before that enquiry was concluded the plaintiff sued the defendant claiming that he should (i) agree to a cancellation of the design and (ii) pay compensation for the damage arising from the prohibition against manufacture and the prosecution. The claim under (i) was based on the fact that the design was already, at the time of the notice, a matter of common knowledge. The defendant admitted that claim.

The Landgericht granted the claim. On appeal by the defendant the Oberlandesgericht made the order to pay compensation depend on the failure of the proprietor of the defendant firm to deny on oath his knowledge of the design when the notice was sent. On application for review that judgment was set aside for the following

Reasons

The Court of Appeal starts with the statement that the plaintiff ceased manufacturing the Articles corresponding to these designs in consequence of the defendant's demand referring to their registration and that, as a result, the defendant was not entitled to contend that the plaintiff was not forced to accede to his demand. No precise moment is indicated when the demand and the cessation occurred and it is left undecided whether they had not, as the plaintiff alleged, already taken place before the defendant's letter of 2 September 1901 to the plaintiff and his weaving managers. The Court of Appeal finds that the defendant's designs had been wrongly registered since they were not entitled to protection and that, therefore, the defendant had no right to prohibit the plaintiff's business activity. For the damage, however, occurring to the plaintiff from the stopping of production and the prosecution, the court is prepared to make the defendant liable only if there was knowledge of the lack of justification and not merely negligent ignorance. It considers that the evidence so far obtained does not point to knowledge at the critical time and so decides to tender an oath to the defendant proprietors of the firm. According to the original form of the oath, each of the two partners was to swear that on 2 September 1901 he did not know that the registered article was a matter of previous knowledge. The form of the oath was later modified to read that each of them should swear that "It is not true that at the time when the plaintiff was required by our company to stop manufacturing the objects protected by our designs nos. 156083, 156084 and 156465, I knew . . .". Even if one assumes that the appellate judge's view of the law is to be approved, this form of oath must still give rise to doubt. For no precise moment is indicated to the swearer as to which he must affirm on oath the truth of the fact of his ignorance; it is left to his conscience to consider which moment to specify among several possible incidents to which his sworn ignorance would refer. Thus the formulation of the oath contains a serious degree of subjective uncertainty. Whether that alone would suffice to justify setting aside the appellate decision may be left undecided. But there are further grounds. The compensation to which the plaintiff is entitled as a result of the prosecution also depends on the oath. According to the accompanying criminal records the prosecution bears the date 4 September 1901. Hence that moment is decisive for liability under the prosecution. The present uncertain form of oath has its basis in the fact that so far there has been no finding about the factual correctness of the disputed allegation of the plaintiff that the stopping of production consequent on the defendants' demand had already taken place on 10 June 1901. If now the oath is refuted, so that the bad faith of the defendant partners is established, there is clearly no interest in specifying more closely the moment when their knowledge began. Assuming, however, that the oath is sworn and also that the request mentioned in the oath occurred before 4 September, in particular on 10 June 1901, it is obvious that the earlier moment of ignorance would be quite irrelevant to the claim for compensation arising out of the prosecution. These considerations would be enough to lead to a setting-aside of the contested judgment.

The setting-aside, however, must also result for a second and more comprehensive reason. The Court of Appeal makes an error of law when it denies the applicability of § 823 I BGB and, therefore, is prepared to make the defendants' liability depend only on their knowledge that their design lacks protection. At the time when the defendants, invoking their right to have their design protected and threatening civil and criminal proceedings, forbade the production of the jute pile in question, the plaintiff had already taken up the manufacture of those objects in its business, although there is up to now no certainty of the extent to which that had happened. The defendants, therefore, are chargeable with having encroached on the established business of the plaintiff by virtue of a right that did not belong to them and hence in a manner contrary to law. The plaintiff, who claimed that he already at that time had ten looms devoted to the manufacture and would, but for the prohibition, have extended the application to 50 looms, believes that the defendant's conduct constitutes also an invasion of his property rights, in that it had unlawfully hindered the full use of manufacturing installations owned by him. That view can indeed not be approved. Against the property itself of the plaintiff, which was never in question, no invasion was intended or directed. It was and remained in its content and legal signification the same as if the plaintiff had done his manufacturing not on his own but on some one else's looms. On the other hand, it is both accurate and to the point when the appellant, associating itself with the plaintiff's explanation of first instance, adopts the point of view that the business was disturbed.

§ 823 I BGB obliges anyone who recklessly or negligently injures the life, body, health, freedom, property, or other right of another contrary to law to make good all damage that ensues.

It is acknowledged that it is not the liability for doing economic damage as such that is here in question, but only that economic damage which is a consequence of the violation of the particular legal interests and rights specified by the Code. Hence the question is whether the defendants have violated such a particular legal interest or right of the plaintiff.

One can first of all consider the injury as an interference with the plaintiff's freedom inasmuch as the plaintiff was reduced by outside interference with his will to discontinue the manufacture of jute pile. But this point of view would not lead to the desired result. Admittedly, in the dispute about the meaning attached to freedom by the Code, notable authors have expressed the view that it must be understood quite generally as the free exercise of the will. But even if one were willing to follow that broadest interpretation, finding a basis for compensation would always presuppose an unlawful injury to the free exercise of the will, and it is out of the question that the Code intends to declare the encroachment on another's will unlawful for the reason only that there is no particular right so to encroach. The encroachment on the free exercise of the will would acquire the character of unlawfulness only through the form in which it occurs, such as deceit, threats, force, and these facts would also have to include, as in § 826 BGB (which was applied by the Court of Appeal), at least the defendant's consciousness of the legal invalidity of the registration of the designs. (cf. Decisions of the Reichsgericht in Civil Cases, vol. 48, 123.)

Then there is the view that the law raised the interests mentioned by it (life, body, health, and freedom) to the status of objects of an especial right to them and through the words “or a similar right” intended to extend its protection beyond those expressly mentioned to other vital interests. This did not find favour in the case-law of the Reichsgericht. It has been held already that the theory which wished to construct from the not yet limited range of particular interests, special rights to personality and individuality to an extent which has not yet been determined finally does not appear particularly suitable as a basis for interpreting the law. Thus, for instance, it has been denied that either the freedom to do business or the faculty to exploit one’s labour without hindrance is protected by § 823 I BGB. There is no need to go further into this matter. For as distinct from the legal possibility of pursuing the occupation of one’s choice, as it is accorded generally by § 1 of the Gewerbeordnung, it has already been accepted in several decisions of different Senates that a subjective right is to be recognised to an actually established and active business which is capable of being directly infringed. And, it has already been held that attacks on the exercise of a business can lead to an injunction [references follow]; but they can also found a claim for compensation arising from injury to the exercise of a business. This view formed the basis, in part, of the judgment delivered by the Senate on 25 June 1891 (RGZ 28, 248, especially 247, 249) before the enactment of the Wettbewerbsgesetz (Act on Unfair Competition). That the exercise of a business can be the object of legal advice under § 823 I BGB was decided by the IV Civil Senate in a judgment of 6 March 1902 and the VI Civil Senate in a judgment of 29 May 1902 (RGZ 51, 369, in particular 373), and also in a judgment of 14 December 1903 (RGZ 56, 271) though with some reservations. This Senate believes that it ought in principle to take the same position. That the established independent exercise of a business not only involves the free manifestation of the will of the person exercising it, but that will has also found in it its embodiment as an object, is the firm foundation for the acceptance of a subjective right to that exercise. Disturbances and encroachments aimed directly against the exercise of a business may therefore be looked upon as injuries falling under § 823 I BGB. Such an attack, directed against the exercise of a business, clearly exists when the legal admissibility of that exercise is denied to a certain extent and its restriction demanded on the ground of an industrial property right to the contrary. That attack is, however, contrary to law when the alleged protected industrial property right does not in truth exist, because it is no longer a question of permitted competition. The law under certain conditions puts at the disposal of persons exercising a business valuable exclusive rights in the form of the protection of patents and designs, by virtue of which they can secure the products of their inventive activity against attacks by way of parallel competition and reserve them for their own advantage. It is only a counterpart of their privileged position that they also answer for the existence of the right they enjoy to the self-seeking restriction of the free exercise of their business by their opponents, and must not only enjoy the advantages but also bear the risks that are involved in the assertion of such exclusive rights to patents and designs. In taking that view this Senate believes that it does not dissent from the opinion expressed by the VI Senate especially in the second of its decisions, mentioned above. Admittedly the protection of the exercise of a business against unfair competition is said in that decision to be found according to positive law in the provisions of the Wettbewerbsgesetz, of § 823 II BGB in combination with the penal rules concerning defamation and undermining credit, as well as in §§ 824 and 826 BGB, whereas the notion is rejected that any disturbance or encroachment on another person in the exercise of his business constitutes a violation of a law falling, as contrary to law, under § 823 I BGB. That, however, is not to deny that in some circumstances such an attack may be seen to be an injury contrary to law. The VI Civil Senate did not, as now, have to decide the particular case where the encroachment of another's exercise of his business was based on an alleged exclusive industrial property right that did not in reality exist.

Accordingly, the contested judgment cannot be upheld, since by not applying § 823 I BGB it contravenes the law. But on the merits itself no decision is possible. The Court of Appeal has so far only found that, apart from the results of the submission to the oath, the knowledge of the invalidity of their design on the part of the defendants has not been proved. On the other hand the question whether that ignorance is to be treated as negligence or whether there is a sufficient excuse has not yet been examined. Even so the Court of Appeal has indeed affirmed the causal connection between the demand of the defendants which, as stated before, remained somewhat uncertain, and the suspension of the plaintiff's business. It will, however, have to be investigated in addition whether on this occasion the plaintiff's conduct also constitutes contributory negligence that would justify the application of § 254 BGB. Wherein the legal defect in the defendants' design consisted has not yet been sufficiently elucidated. According to certain indications it does not appear to be excluded that already from the start the plaintiff at least suspected the invalidity of the registration and in course of time soon obtained a more exact knowledge of it . . .

Case 33

REICHSGERICHT (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 19 DECEMBER 1918
RGZ 94, 248 = JW 1919, 247 and approving note by Kirchenbauer

On 10 June 1908 a design was entered in the designs register of the Patent Office under no. 342454 on behalf of defendant 2a for socks, the upper portions of which were in whole or in part made of wool, but the lower portions of non-woollen material. The defendant transferred his right to that design to defendant 1, the partnership H. B., which he operated in common with defendant 2b. On 21 March 1911, defendant 1 sent to the firm L. & S. in D, which had obtained from the plaintiff the right to retail his socks, a letter in which, referring to the registered design, it warned them against retailing the socks received from the plaintiff, ordered them to withdraw the offers made by them, and threatened them with a claim for compensation. According to the plaintiff's allegation defendant 1 had sent letters to the same effect to two other firms whom the plaintiff had appointed retailers of his socks. The plaintiff also asserted that defendant 1 had completely succeeded in the aim pursued in his letter, since his customers had, in consequence of defendant 1's letters, cancelled their substantial orders.

The plaintiff also alleges that in consequence he has suffered substantial damage. He demands RM 16,000 in part payment for the damage averring that the proprietors of defendant 1, namely the defendants 2, had known when sending the letters that their design was not entitled to protection, since, inter alia, it lacked novelty.

The defendants, who allege that they were convinced of the validity of the design when they sent the letters and are even now convinced of it, demand the dismissal of the action and offer to show that the plaintiff has no claim whatever against the defendants.

The Landgericht declared the claim justified in principle, but the Court of Appeal invited both defendants 2 to swear upon oath that they were unaware, when they warned the firm L. & S. and two other firms against infringement of the design no. 342454, that already before giving notice of the design socks were being manufactured and put into circulation of which the upper portion was of whole or part made of wool and the lower portion of non-woollen material. If the two defendants swear the oath, the action should be dismissed; if they do not, the claim should be declared justified in principle.

On the plaintiff's application for review, the appeal of the defendants against the judgment at first instance was rejected for these

Reasons

1. The Court of Appeal, in agreement with the judge at first instance, starts correctly from the position that the defendants' conduct constituted an attack on an established business and that this must be regarded as a legal interest protected by § 823 I BGB. That view conforms to the standing case-law of the Reichsgericht (cf. RGZ 58, 24; 64, 52).

The Oberlandesgericht then sets out the content of the defendants' design and finds that in preliminary proceedings brought by the defendants 1 and 2a against the present plaintiff before the Landgericht of Chemnitz, defendant 2a was ordered to approve the cancellation of the registered design no. 342454.

The Court of Appeal attaches no importance to that condemnation for the purposes of the present dispute. In particular it holds that the judgment in that preliminary proceeding, both at first instance and on appeal, ordered the cancellation of defendant 2a's design only because the inventive idea constituted by the socks had not been disclosed in the notice. It followed that the defendants could not have known this legal reason for the invalidity of the design; and, accordingly even apart from the presence of especial circumstances the existence of which was not alleged, they were not bound to make enquiries in that direction.

These considerations should obviously serve to deny negligence in what the Court of Appeal regarded as the objectively unlawful conduct of the defendants. Even so far the explanations of the Court of Appeal do not seem free from objection. It looks as though the Oberlandesgericht attaches to the registration of a design an importance that it does not possess.

In contrast to principles of patent law, whereby the grant of a patent (and the consequent entry in the patent register according to § 19 of the Patents Act) confers on the patent-holder without more ado the exclusive right to manufacture industrially the object of the invention, to put it into circulation, and sell it (§ 4 Patents Act), the person on whose behalf a design is entered in the register of designs acquires an exclusive right to copy the design industrially and put it in circulation only if it serves the purpose of work or use by a new structure, arrangement, or preparation. In other words, the entry in the register of designs confers on the person entering it no right of exclusive use that could empower him to invade another's established business unless the presuppositions exist that are set out in § 1 GebrMustG.

There can therefore be a negligent attack on another's business if anyone on whose behalf a design is registered forbids a tradesman only on the basis of that fact to retail such objects to which the design refers. Whoever makes himself guilty of an attack on another's business on the basis of a design registered for him can therefore in certain circumstances even act negligently within the meaning of § 823 I BGB if he does not convince himself of the efficacy of his design before he seeks registration. For, in contrast to the provisions of §§ 20ff. of the Patents Act governing the grant of a patent, this is not ordered on the basis of an official examination into whether the material presuppositions exist on which § 1 GebrMustG affords to a design a claim to legal protection. The Patent Office must under § 3 GebrMustG order the entry of the design in the register of designs as soon as only the formal presuppositions of § 2 of the Act are fulfilled (cf. also the Reichsgericht decision of 27 February 1900, Via. 347/99).

2. It now appears from the foregoing reasons that the Court of Appeal's opinion that the defendant cannot be charged with negligence on the ground that he had not known of the legal inefficacy of this design is not free from objection. Moreover, its further considerations give occasion for appreciable legal doubt.

In particular, the Court of Appeal went on to say that in both the sets of preliminary proceedings concerning the design no. 342454 brought by the defendants against B₁ (Landgericht Köln) and the present plaintiff (Landgericht Chemnitz) it was alleged that the object of the design was not new at the time of the notice. But in both cases that question did not give rise to a judicial decision. The proceedings against B₁ ended with a settlement and in that against the present plaintiff, the newness of the design was assumed. In the proceedings against B₁, the witnesses K and Sch. had indeed said at their examination of April 1911 that as long ago as twenty-five years their range had included socks of which the lower portion was made of cotton and the upper of woollen yarn. From that the Court of Appeal drew the further conclusion that the evidence of the two witnesses proved the lack of newness of the object of the design here in question. Since, however, their examination took place only after defendant 1's warning letter was sent out, since the latter was under no obligation to enquire what those witnesses would say, and since the defendants could not be held to blame for not waiting for the examination of the witnesses before sending out their warning letter, they could not be charged with negligent behaviour. Nor were they bound, once they knew what the witnesses had said, to withdraw their warning by a corresponding recall, since it appears to be excluded that the statements of the witnesses K and Sch. would have shaken their conviction of the newness of their design. Thus, the defendants were not shown to be negligent in failing to withdraw their warning once they knew of the witnesses' statements.

In these statements it appears even more clearly than in the considerations of the Court of Appeal discussed under (1) that it misunderstood the meaning of the registration of a design. Since that registration conferred on the person registering only a purely formal, but not a material right, he exercised it, as the Senate has already declared in its judgment of 3 July 1916, at his peril and responsibility, in so far as concerns the newness and previous use of the design. Hence "anyone who in reliance on a design encroaches on another's business by a trenchant prohibition against producing and selling the wares and thereby causes damage must constantly examine with the utmost care whether and for how long he is entitled to do it."

If one starts from this fundamental standpoint the conduct of the defendant 1 is already shown to have been negligent by the fact that, although in the preliminary proceedings against B₁ the witnesses K and Sch. had alleged that the object of the design had been openly used in Germany, they had nevertheless sent out the warning letters here in question. For the defendants were bound to take into account that witnesses K and Sch. would confirm the correctness of the then defendant B₁'s statements.

However, the defendants were guilty of a quite exceptionally gross negligence when, after the examination in April 1911 of the witnesses K and Sch. . . . the absence of newness in the object of the design was established, all the same they did not withdraw their warning.

The Court of Appeal, which considers the defendants not obliged to make such a recall, thereby contradicts its own explanations. In particular it lays especial and decisive emphasis on the fact that the warning had already been sent out before the examination of the witnesses K and Sch. From that it follows that even from the Court of Appeal's standpoint the warning letters should not have been sent after the examination of the witnesses. But if that is correct, a recall of the warning letters was under all circumstances essential once the examination of the witnesses had taken place.

The appellate decision, which thereby wrongly denied the negligence of the defendants, is therefore set aside for infringement of § 823 BGB.

Case 34

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (FIRST CIVIL SENATE) 26 OCTOBER 1951 BGHZ 3, 270 = NJW 1952, 660 = JZ 1952, 227 and partially approving and partially critical note by H Kleine

The ladies' journal "C" is published by the plaintiff. The defendant is the publisher of the weekly Church and Life, the church bulletin for the bishopric of M. Each issue of this journal includes for each deanery a "supplement" composed and printed locally, in which notices, mainly of religious services and other deanery news, are published. In the deanery supplement for O, an article was published entitled "The Select Readings of the P. Circle for Every Family", in which the moral conduct of the illustrated journals appearing in the post-war period was criticised. The article contains, inter alia, expressions to the effect that the publishers exploited the apparent collapse of the concepts of decency and dignity, had replaced honest commercial competition and market calculation by unscrupulous reliance on the primitive instincts of a wearied people; the plaintiff's ladies' journal "C" was described very critically; Christian readers of the ladies' journal "C" in receiving the journal, neglected their duty towards the honour of their wives and daughters, and the upbringing of their adolescent children. In addition it states that a Christian could obtain from other journals a picture of the world and a new point of view towards such matters. For the last few months there appeared regularly each week at the wish of the bishop the "Select Readings of the Circle" which, in richness, up-to-dateness, and make-up is not inferior to the products of other enterprises and are more value for money. It then names a number of journals which form a "medley" which offered every responsible thinking Christian joy and relaxation by providing moments of reflection in the evenings and on holidays. Information about these Select Readings was available at each parish office or the headquarters of the P. Circle.

The "Select Readings of the P. Circle" mentioned in that article is distributed by the "Catholic L. e.V." in M, which receives the net profit if any. The "P. Circle" and the "Catholic L. e.V." are economically independent of the defendant.

The above-mentioned article in the deanery's supplement appeared anonymously. The plaintiff company holds the defendant company answerable for the statements made against itself and its journal contained in that article, charging the defendant with breaches of certain statutory regulations [references]. The defendant first knew of the article objected to after its appearance, but has declared that it entirely agrees with the article and declines to withdraw the criticism of the plaintiff's journal printed in it.

The plaintiff claimed that the defendant be ordered to refrain from making and to recall the above-mentioned statements. The plaintiff also asked for a declaration that the defendant is liable to pay compensation and the right to publish the judgment.

Both instances below dismissed the action. The application for review led to the decisions being set aside and the case referred back to the lower court for these

Reasons

The applicant for review cannot successfully object that the Court of Appeal looked upon the statements in dispute as comments and not allegations of fact in the sense of § 14 UWG (Unlauterer Wettbewerbsgesetz), § 824 BGB, §§ 186, 187 StGB. The Court of Appeal did not fail to perceive that an allegation of a fact can be hidden under the form of a comment. Even if the protection of a reputation intended by the legislator requires the fluctuating boundary between allegations of fact and value-judgments or mere statements of opinion to be drawn as broadly as possible in favour of allegations of fact, since every comment rests ultimately on external or internal facts, yet it remains a prerequisite that the disapproving judgment takes as its starting-point tangible occurrences susceptible of proof, since otherwise a proof of truth or falsehood, as it is envisaged by § 186 StGB, § 824 BGB, and § 14 UWG, is logically excluded. The applicant starts from the position that no evidence whatever can be adduced for the truth of the contested statements. Comments, however, which do not admit of proof of truth, which are not related to definite probable acts, are not allegations of fact in the sense of the above-mentioned statutory provisions. It must, indeed, be conceded to the applicant that the complaint of exploitation can contain an allegation of fact. However, in the present case that complaint does not rest on specifically detailed acts but alleges that the apparent collapse of “decency and dignity” is being exploited. If one connects this statement with the further complaints, according to which the personalities standing behind the plaintiff are accused of “unscrupulous exploitation of the instincts of a wearied people”, the view taken by the Court of Appeal must be approved that the expressions in question do not so much conceal a complaint of provable business dishonesty, but rather amount to a moral judgment on the general behaviour and business activity of the persons in question, and, therefore are value-judgments unaccompanied by examinable facts.

The same applies to the further critical statements of the plaintiff’s journal and of the statement that “Christian readers of the journal in receiving the journal neglected their duty towards the honour of their wives and daughters and the upbringing of their adolescent children”. In agreement with the principles established by the Reichsgericht’s decisions in civil and criminal cases on distinguishing between value-judgments and allegations of fact, the Court of Appeal has quite accurately regarded those utterances as general expressions of disapproval, which have not for their object examinable acts of those involved [references follow].

III. In examining, however, the question of who may be sued, the Court of Appeal allows itself to be influenced by erroneous considerations of law which affect its further legal assessment of the facts. Neither the defendant’s responsibility under press legislation nor its declaration of willingness to hold itself responsible for the article published without its knowledge justifies the Court of Appeal in assuming that the defendant must be treated as though it composed or authorised the article. The Court of Appeal failed to realise that the provisions of the Press law bear only on criminal law, not on civil law. The civil liability of the publishing house for infringements committed by its publications is defined by the general principles (RGZ 50, 109, 110; RG JW 1917, 713). In this purpose it is to be assumed that the publisher of periodicals is normally not in a position, and is also not in general bound, to scan the publication before it appears. As a rule responsibility for the contents is borne by the editor, whose name must appear on each number under the strict provisions of § 7 of the Press Act. The publisher, however, is liable for a fault of the editor, if the latter is subject to his instructions, and it is therefore a question of employer's liability. He may then try to prove that he is not to be blamed under § 831 BGB (RGZ 148, 154, 161). The publisher who did not know before publication of an injurious utterance made public by a periodical published by him is, as a rule, liable in damages only in so far as general provisions make him responsible for the faults of third persons. The publisher is, however, independently of any question of fault, the right defendant in a claim for an injunction under § 1004 BGB, against a disturber if a leaflet which is inserted in his publication unlawfully affects a third person and that injurious result is at least indirectly traceable to his will, since he has the possibility of exercising influence on the content of the sale of the inserted leaflet [references follow].

. . . The defendant's declaration that makes the contested utterances her own, combined indeed with an approval of all the circumstances under which the Article complained of appeared, is not without importance for the decision of the claim for an injunction. The defendant has refused to tone down the criticism of the plaintiff's journal in the article in the deanery supplement and has expressed the view that the criticism was, even in its present rigour, required by its opposition to the plaintiff's journal, and was covered by the protection of justified interests. It has also announced that it considered itself justified in publishing similar or equivalent statements in the future. That, however, makes it a "disturber" in the sense of § 1004 BGB, since it has made these declarations in knowledge of the attacks, which have already occurred and must here be assumed to have been unlawful—and does not deny its ability to prevent the insertion of deanery supplements with a content not approved by it. From that admission of the defendant there follows a risk of further impairment and thereby its liability to be made defendant in proceedings for an injunction, without any need so far to examine its responsibility for the existing publications.

IV. The Court of Appeal denied any infringement of provisions protecting competition on the ground that those provisions presuppose acting with a competitive purpose, whereas the defendant in its conduct complained of acted not with a competitive intention but exclusively on religious ground without a gainful purpose.

The contention of the applicant for review, that the Court of Appeal misunderstood the concept of acting with a competitive purpose, is unfounded. Relying on a decision of the Reichsgericht [reference], the applicant puts forward the view that where business men were engaged in a competitive struggle any act which is objectively apt to further one's own or another's competition suffices to fulfil the factual characteristics of acting for competitive purposes, without any need to examine the subjective disposition of the actor. The applicant fails here to recognize that the Reichsgericht, in the decision referred to, treated the knowledge that another's competition was being furthered only as an indication that the then defendant was pursuing, along with other aims, also competitive purposes. That additional presupposition, however, was required because according to a constant practice concept "with competitive purposes" requires a subjective intention directed towards competition [references].

The Senate cannot accept the dissenting view put forward by Reimer [reference] in view of the wording of the Act. Although an intention directed to furthering competition by oneself or another does not need to be the only or an essential aim of the act, yet that competitive purpose must not be neglected as completely irrelevant compared with the principal motives [references].

It may, indeed, generally be correct that experience points to a competitive intention when competitors make statements in commercial intercourse which are objectively apt to further one's own or another's competition. It is not, however, a mistake of law when the Court of Appeal does not consider this evidentiary rule, which is not imperative and is merely found empirically to correspond as a rule to the truth, to be decisive in the particular case which concerns information in a church bulletin.

Whether the factual characteristics of acting "for a competitive purpose" are fulfilled is a matter for the unfettered appreciation of the judge of fact. The Court of Appeal was not wrong in inferring from the circumstance that no reference to the church bulletin published by the defendant was contained in the article and that no financial connection exists between the defendant and the "P. Circle" or the "Catholic L. e.V." selling its select readings that there was no intrinsic probability of a competitive intention to be proved by the defendant. When accordingly, the Court of Appeal—starting from the pastoral duties of the bishop, on whose instructions the defendant acted as the publisher—came to the conclusion that the controversial article would, according to the honest conviction of the defendant, serve only its fight against what it considered the extraordinarily corrupting and dangerous world of journals and magazines, those considerations did not offend against the legal principles laid down by the Reichsgericht for the subjective requirement of acting for competitive purposes [reference].

On the other hand the applicants' complaint for review is well founded that the Court of Appeal ought not to have neglected to take up the offer to provide evidence of the testimony of named witnesses that the controversial article was prepared on the defendant's instructions by the publicity manager of the "P. Circle" for competitive purposes and was provided for the deanery supplement [details follow].

V. The considerations also by which the Court of Appeal rejects §§ 823 I and II, 826, in combination with § 1004 BGB, as grounds of claim do not stand up to legal review.

... First it must be objected that the Court of Appeal regards as decisive whether the defendant acted with a defamatory intent—a question which can be relevant only when the protection of reputation is in issue—without examining whether there was a direct attack on the plaintiff's business through an unlawful impairment of its business activity, which falls within § 823 I BGB. Even utterances which do not fulfil the requirements of defamation but describe the position of a business undertaking, its products, or other performance and thereby disturb the free development of the undertaking, can constitute a direct attack on the right protected by § 823 I BGB to carry on an established business. Since § 14 UWG and § 824 BGB only allow claims arising from allegations of fact, legal protection against injurious comments which do not bear the taint of immorality and therefore do not fall within the general clause of § 1 UWG, § 826 BGB would be incomplete if they could not be treated as injurious acts violating the right to conduct a business.

The Reichsgericht, it must be admitted, affirmed the existence of that right in its earlier decisions only when the attack was aimed directly against the existence of the business. A diminution of the economic profit or of the prospects of gain was not regarded as sufficient [references]. Yet, in later decisions the Reichsgericht went further in the field of the law of trade marks and competition and considered, for the purpose of an injunction, that any unlawful impairment of business activity was sufficient, if it constituted a direct interference with the sphere of the business [references].

But there remains no substantial reason to restrict the concept of the protection of business activity to the field of competition and industrial property. Just as property is protected by § 823 I BGB against direct attack, in all its individual emanations—for instance the impairment of the unrestricted power of disposal—so also, according to this protective provision, the right to an established and active business must be protected against direct disturbances not only in its substance but also in its individual aspects, including the whole field of business activity.

The contested Article which, supported by the highest ecclesiastical authority, strongly warns everyone, but especially the Christian reader, against the plaintiff's journal, and couples that warning with a derogatory reference to the persons behind the plaintiff. It displays a direct attack on the plaintiff's protected right to an undisturbed development of its business activity. This interference with the protected legal sphere of the plaintiff, which infringes the protection of business activity afforded by the law, would only not be illegal if the defendant had a special justification for the interference [references].

For this purpose, contrary to the view of the Court of Appeal, it is not of vital importance whether the facts point to punishable defamation, for it is not the protection of a reputation but the plaintiff's right to unimpeded business activity that is in question. If aspects of unfair competition are absent, such as attach as a rule to a critical comparison of industrial products for competitive purposes, an objective criticism of the plaintiff's journal would not be contrary to law even if it had adverse consequences for the plaintiff since Article 5 of the Constitution allows anyone to express such criticism in the exercise of his right to the free expression of his opinion. But comments disturbing business, which depart from the field of objective criticism, are only not illegal if in accordance with their content, form, or accompanying circumstances they are objectively necessary to protect legally approved interests.

§ 193 StGB, it is true, provides a justification only where defamation is concerned. Yet that rule governs the special case of conflicts of interests which can arise in the protection of reputation, in accordance with an overriding legal doctrine which assumes importance wherever in a conflict between different interests the injury to one legal interest must be accepted. All comments affecting a business which factually fall within § 823 I BGB can be justified as protecting justified interests if the protection keeps within the limits fixed by law. These limits must be drawn according to the principle of balancing interests and duties that govern all conflicts of interests [references].

The conflict between the interest pursued and the legally protected interest that is to be sacrificed to it must be balanced by observing the principles that the Reichsgericht has developed for overriding necessity. The conflict of values can only be resolved in this way, whereby he who can effectively protect a justified interest only by interfering with another's legally protected interest must choose the least violation of law, the most considerate means. Thus injurious utterances are covered by the protection of justified interests only if according to their content, form, and accompanying circumstances they constitute the indicated and necessary means of attaining the legally approved purpose [references].

A mistake as to the need for the severity and extent of the attack on a protected legal good, if innocent, only excludes fault and thereby liability for damages, but not the substantial unlawfulness of the attack [references follow].

It is to be noted that whoever proposes to encroach on another's legal sphere for the sake of his own interests, or of those especially dear to him, must carefully examine whether the injury which he proposes to inflict is necessary as to severity and extent in order to further those interests appropriately. If he neglects that examination, which must take into account the scale of protection of the legal interest under attack, an excessive amount of injury, which is always illegal, cannot be excused even if there is a mistake as to its necessity.

These legal principles were misunderstood by the Court of Appeal. It assumed, indeed quite rightly, that the defendant, as publisher of a bulletin issued by a high ecclesiastical dignitary, held no exceptional legal position, but that its conduct was to be judged according to all applicable legal provisions. The Court of Appeal is also correct in holding that the interests involved in the struggle of the Church against a degenerate Press of which it disapproved affected so closely the defendant as publisher of the Church bulletin that it must be accorded an especial right to protect those interests (RGSt 63, 229 [231]; RGZ 115, 77 [80]). But the Court of Appeal misunderstands the limits to the pursuit of justifiable interests when it considers that the assumed excess in degree of injury is justified on the ground that the defendant acted exclusively for an ethically objectionable purpose and not with a defamatory intent. Even moral motives afford no right to sacrifice the protected interests of another beyond the necessary limits. The view of the law taken by the Court of Appeal, which makes the unlawfulness of the utterances in issue depend on the personal convictions and intentions of the injuring party, would render the right to reputation and the right to an established business defenceless against the grossest attack, if the perpetrator acted not for objectionable reasons but only with the aim of enforcing more effectually the interest pursued by him by excessive attacks which are objectively unnecessary. The Court of Appeal overlooks the fact that the decisions of the Reichsgericht which it cites in support of its opinion to the contrary (RG JW 1914, 368, 371; RGSt 40, 317), deal only with criminal liability—which always presupposes fault—but not with the objective unlawfulness of unduly injurious utterances.

It is also a matter for criticism that the Court of Appeal, contrary to its opinion that the defendant must be treated as though it had prepared or occasioned the article, chooses to justify the conduct of the defendant within the scope of § 193 StGB by the particular state of conflict in which it found it after the publication of the article. If the defendant had no right to express its condemnation in its existing form at the time the article appeared, that right, which the defendant claims also for future publications, cannot be deduced from its position after the publication. The defendant could, when the plaintiff approached it with a request for the withdrawal of the article, reflect at leisure whether the utterances objected to exceeded the measure permitted for the furtherance of its interests; as a champion of ecclesiastical interests its special concern should have been to examine carefully whether the general character of the plaintiff's journal justified such a severe denigration combined with a general attack on the reputations of its publisher and distributors. If the attack was objectively excessive, the defendant, which approved that excess, is in no way excused, as the Court of Appeal wrongly assumes, by the fact that, even if the form of expression were toned down, an objectively necessary contravention of law remains; for only an objectively necessary attack on the interests of others not the unnecessary, so-called excess is justified by the protection of justified interests.

Whether an injurious attack goes beyond the degree objectively permitted for the protection of interests is a question of fact. The Court of Appeal made no finding on it.

Starting from its mistaken opinion that for the utterances complained of also to be objectively unlawful only the subjective conviction of the defendant was decisive that they were necessary, the Court of Appeal considered that the question was irrelevant whether an objectively unnecessary excessive attack existed. In this connection the Court of Appeal is of the opinion that it could not be its task “to take up a position in the fight between two contesting philosophies of life represented here in the publications in question (the plaintiff’s journal and the article for which the defendants were responsible) to examine the correctness of the value-judgments contained in them”. That is correct only in so far as the Court of Appeal is not bound to press judgment on the worth or worthlessness of the philosophical aims pursued by the parties, in so far as they are in opposition. If, however, it must be conceded to the plaintiff’s journal, as is to be inferred from the reasoning in the judgment under appeal, that it may discuss questions relating to the philosophy of life, the Court of Appeal cannot refuse to decide whether the attack directed by the defendant against this journal, objectively considered, in respect of its content, form, and accompanying circumstances, falls within the limits of legally permitted promotion of interests. In this connection it is to be noted that the permitted degree of attack is to be determined differently when it is directed against a journal with a generally licentious content from when it concerns a journal whose pursuit of serious endeavours is—in whole or in part—not to be denied. For that determination the decisive factor is not single contributions to the journal but its general character. When dealing afresh with the dispute, the Court of Appeal must . . . examine . . . whether the plaintiff’s journal (if assimilated to magazines generally regarded as of a scandalous type) has exploited in an unscrupulous and ethically reprehensible way the moral decline of the population for selfish and mercenary ends. In this connection the Court of Appeal will also have to consider that the wide-ranging moral condemnation of the persons behind the plaintiff and its publishing enterprise has been published in the defendant’s periodical. Press attacks, however, have such incalculable and profound effects that the limits within which other legal interest may be violated by the promotion of interests of one’s own must be drawn especially narrowly (RGSt 63, 92 [94]).

On this view of the law it can be left undecided whether the plaintiff as a company can be regarded as capable of being defamed. It is true that the doubts expressed by the Landgericht in that regard cannot be regarded as removed by the formal assignment, since the claim to forbear from uttering defamatory statements, being of a highly personal nature, cannot be assigned [reference]. Yet, if the unlawfulness of the statements in dispute is established, a basis is provided for an action under § 823 I BGB, so that no discussion is needed as to whether the defendant also infringed a statute serving to protect the plaintiff in the meaning of § 823 II BGB, since no wider claims would arise from that protective provision.

Case 35

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 13 OCTOBER 1998

NJW 1999, 279 = JZ 1999, 625

Facts

The claimant runs a car hire business in O and claims an injunction preventing the defendant—a large insurance company undertaking—from statements and actions damaging its business. The claimant alleged that the defendant's experts had in a number of cases told accident victims who had hired cars from the claimant that there had frequently been problems with the claimant's car hire charges and they had tried to persuade them to return vehicles and hire cheaper cars from a firm named by the defendant. The claimant sought an injunction to prevent such action in business contacts for competition purposes and an injunction in the same terms but without the reference to competition. The Landgericht ordered the defendant not (1) to tell the claimant's customers that there were frequent problems in relation to the claimant's car hire charges and not (2) to recommend accident victims who had already hired a vehicle from the claimant (referring to their duty to mitigate their loss) to return it and to hire another with the firm E or another firm in O.

On appeal by the defendant, the Oberlandesgericht rejected the whole of the claim. By its appeal in law the claimant had the judgment of the Landgericht reinstated.

Reasons

I. The appeal court proceeded on the basis that the claimant had accepted the dismissal of its principal applications in competition law. It now only concerned itself with the claimant's claims based on tort law, which had been successful at first instance. It considered these claims not to be acceptable.

Insofar as the claimant objected to the statement that there were often problems with the invoicing of its car hire costs, only § 824 of the BGB needed to be considered as the basis of the claim; it was not possible in this respect to fall back on the framework definition of an interference with an established and functioning business. The prerequisites for a claim based on § 824 of the BGB were not however fulfilled, as here it was question of assertion of true facts by the defendant's experts. Problems with the claimant's invoicing had existed as a matter of fact. These resulted from the defendant, as a leading insurance undertaking, taking the view that the victim of an accident was in principle required, in view of the duty to mitigate loss, to hire a replacement vehicle at the cheapest available hire price on the market. As the defendant had been confirmed in this view by several court decisions in the O Landgericht area and the claimant was not one of the cheap suppliers, the invoicing problems were obvious. Whether the defendant's legal view was accurate, was not of importance; for the question of the alleged invoicing problems, it was only actual implementation mattered. However, not only was there no assertion put forward which was contrary to the truth in the sense of § 824 of the BGB; the defendant and the victims also had a justified interest in the sense of § 824 (2) of the BGB in the communication to which objection was made. It was virtually a requirement for the defendant to mention in good time that it was only ready to allow the hire car costs on the basis of the cheapest supplier and that accordingly there would be problems if cars were hired at higher prices.

The recommendation given to the victims to give back the hired car to the claimant and to hire a vehicle elsewhere was not open to objection on legal grounds either. No illegal interference with the claimant's established and functioning business was to be seen in this. There was no incitement to the victims to break their contracts with the claimant, for the simple reason that the hire contracts were terminable at any time. The proprietor of a business must as a rule accept inducements to cancel contracts without their being breached. Different considerations could only apply if special circumstances were found which amounted to dishonesty. Such a case was not however present here, as the advice given by the defendant’s experts to the victims with regard to the invoicing problems with the claimant had been accurate and it had been in the interests of both sides that these problems had been mentioned in connection with the negotiations about the loss.

II. The judgment of the appeal court does not stand up to the arguments contained in the appeal in law. The claimant is entitled to the claims which have been made for an injunctive relief and which formed the basis of the judgment of the Landgericht.

1. Contrary to the view of the appeal in law, the appeal court was admittedly correct in not including the principles for the claim under competition law in its judgment. Possible claims by the claimant for injunctions under §§ 1 and 3 of the UWG (Unfair Competition Act) were, in view of the position here in procedural law, not the subject of dispute at the level of the first appeal.

No final decision is needed on the question of whether, under what conditions and in what manner a party can in principle, in cases in which claims arise under competition law on the one hand and tort law on the other, restrict the legal examination to the one or the other basis of claim. In any case, in the circumstances given here, the claimant has effectively limited the object of the dispute to be decided by the appeal court at second instance to the examination of claims to injunctive relief in tort law, to which it is entitled from the facts put forward which support the judgment at first instance.

2. The appeal in law correctly objects to the fact that the appeal court considered to be unfounded the claims for injunctive relief in relation to the statement that there had often been problems with the invoicing for the claimant’s hire car prices in the context of the calculation of hire car costs in the accident replacement business (no.1a of the judgment of the Landgericht, concerning the claimant’s first alternative application), and the recommendation to the victims, referring to their duty to mitigate loss, to give back the claimant’s hired vehicle and to hire a vehicle of the same value from another firm instead (no.1b of the judgment of the Landgericht, concerning the claimant’s second alternative application).

In both respects, the request for an injunction is justified from the point of view of an interference by the defendant with the claimant’s established and functioning business.

(a) The considerations which formed the basis of the appeal court’s dismissal of the first alternative application under § 824 of the BGB meet with objections. The appeal court says that the statement that there were problems from time to time with the claimant in the context of calculating car hire costs in the business of accident replacement is about a true fact, since calculation of loss between the defendant and each victim did not actually take place in this respect without problems. Admittedly, this must be agreed. But contrary to the view of the appeal court, this was not the whole content of this statement, as the appeal in law correctly points out. The average victim (whose understanding is what matters here) would have understood this statement as meaning that the claimant was responsible for the invoicing problems which had occurred, because it charged hire car costs at a level not fully recoverable in compensation law. According to the findings made in the appeal judgment, however, the invoicing problems in reality arose because the defendant—inappropriately in law—holds the view that the accident victim was in principle required, from the viewpoint of the duty to mitigate loss, to hire a replacement vehicle at the cheapest hire price obtainable on the market and the victim could not therefore demand compensation for hire prices going beyond this. Such a invoicing practice does not however satisfy the actual legal position (references omitted). Contrary to what the victims would naturally infer from the statement objected to, it was thus primarily the defendant itself which was responsible, by its conduct in relation to the invoicing, for the problems which arose. It can however remain undecided whether one should proceed here on the basis that the defendant was making an incorrect assertion of facts in the sense of § 824 of the BGB or whether this cannot be so because value judgments, namely views of the defendant on the legal position, substantially shaped the statement to which objection is made.

(b) This is because insofar as a claim under § 824 of the BGB is to be denied, the claimant can base its request for an injunction on § 823 (1) of the BGB in combination with § 1004 of the BGB because of the interference with an established and functioning business. It is possible to fall back on this basis of claim if the tort under § 824 of the BGB is not relevant (references omitted).

(aa) The protection of businesses in tort is aimed at business related interferences which concern the business organism or entrepreneurial freedom of decision and go beyond mere nuisance or hindrances which are normal in society (references omitted). An interference of this kind is present here. If the defendant communicates with the claimant's car hire customers as accident victims in the context of its concept for calculating loss, and refers them, in the way it has done, to problems with invoicing for the claimant's car hire prices, this amounts to a deliberate interference with the claimant's business relationships with its customers. This is so even if the defendant's motivation for action of this kind is based on keeping its own insurance payments as low as possible. In view of the fact that the defendant is one of the leading insurance undertakings and accident replacement business is of considerable importance for car hire businesses like the claimant's, action of this kind by the defendant, must lead to a distinct uncertainty on the part of customers in their relationship with the claimant. It interferes with the claimant's protected commercial enterprise in a manner which has legal implications.

(bb) This interference is also to be regarded as illegal. This follows from balancing the interests of the parties, taking into consideration their respective positions as protected not only in civil law but also in constitutional law and especially the basic right of the defendant under Article 5 of the Constitution (references omitted).

The defendant can admittedly not in principle be forbidden to disseminate a legal view held by it, even if this view should be regarded as inaccurate measured by the standards of the case law of the court dealing with appeals in law. Nor is the defendant prevented, within the framework of its own business activity (which includes calculating loss cases under insurance law) from approaching the victims, in order to ensure with them that treatment and invoicing is as efficient as possible and corresponds to the legal duties of all participants. But even taking these principles into consideration, the action of the defendant objected to here should not be regarded as lawful.

The defendant's experts had represented that in the area of calculating car hire costs in the accident replacement business there were problems from time to time in the invoicing of the claimants' car hire prices. The defendant thereby gives to the victims as car hire customers of the claimant the impression that by hiring a vehicle from the claimant they had incurred the risk of having to bear part of their costs themselves. The business relationship with the claimant is thus represented to these customers as an economic risk. But according to the findings which have been made, this action by the experts is based, as already mentioned, on the defendant's view that in principle it must as a vehicle liability insurer only reimburse the car hire costs which arose by hiring a replacement vehicle at the cheapest hiring price available on the market. As this view of the law does not correspond with the legal position and the problems which have occurred on this basis with the invoicing of the vehicles hired by the victims from the claimant are the responsibility of the defendant itself, the statement by the defendant's experts to the victims which is the subject of objection lacks a satisfactory basis.

The defendant has no justified interest in deliberately, on the basis of an inaccurate view of the law (the incorrectness of which, however, remains concealed from the victims), inducing uncertainty in the victims—using the authority of a large insurance undertaking responsible for adjusting the loss of those affected—in their business relationships as car hire customers of the claimant, as has happened here, and thus seriously endangering these relationships to the disadvantage of the claimant's commercial enterprise. By the defendant's action, the victims, who are not as a rule familiar with the law and will be frequently inclined to avoid differences with the defendant in order to ensure speedy loss adjustment, see themselves exposed to pressure not justified by the real legal situation, which affects their behaviour as car hire customers of the claimant, as the defendant intends it should.

In this situation it is not possible to set against the claimant's protected interest in the integrity of its commercial enterprise an interest of the defendant of equal value in the statement by their experts to the claimant's car hire customers who were accident victims, which is the subject of objection here. The interference in the commercial enterprise, for which the defendant cannot in these circumstances rely on its basic right of freedom of expression of opinion, is to be regarded as unlawful.

(cc) No different conclusion can be drawn from the fact that various courts in the Landgericht district of O share (or at least, at the point in time of the statements objected to, shared) the legal view of the defendant as described, on the duty to mitigate the loss of accident victims on the hiring of a replacement vehicle. Contrary to the view of the appeal court, the issue of the alleged invoicing problems is by no means only a question of factual implementation and the local practice of the courts. It is the real legal situation which is decisive. Only implementation which corresponds with this should be regarded as lawful; only references to invoicing problems arising on lawful loss adjustment would be in the justified interest of a party. On the other hand, the legal order cannot recognise any justified interest on the part of someone involved in legal transactions in orientating himself to a practice which is incorrect in law, even if this is supported—temporarily—by locally competent courts.

(dd) The argument that the defendant could not in law be accused of fault in respect of the conduct to be assessed here, because he could refer to a corresponding local court practice at that time and the Senate decision [reference omitted] was not then available, is not of importance in this case. For the claim to injunctive relief (which is the only claim made here), the fault of the defendant is not the issue. The illegality of the interference is the only decisive factor. In this connection danger of repetition in the future must be assumed; from the findings which have been made and the parties' submissions referred to, no sufficient grounds are evident for proceeding on the basis that the danger of repetition has been dispelled.

3. The claimant's request for injunctive relief to prevent the defendant recommending the claimant's car hire customers to give back the claimant's hired vehicles and to hire vehicles of equal value with another (cheaper) firm instead, in view of their duty to mitigate their loss, was dismissed by the appeal court. The appeal in law successfully challenges this. In this respect also, the claimant's claim to injunctive relief is justified from the point of view of the interference with their established and functioning business.

(a) It can remain undecided whether the hire contracts concluded by the victims with the claimant are terminable at any time, which is the view of the appeal court, or whether, as the appeal in law points out, this can be otherwise, at least when the victim has hired a car for the length of his vehicle's repair. This is because the question of whether the defendant is to blame for encouraging the victims to break their contracts, which could be the case for hire contracts which were not appropriately terminable, does not matter in the present case.

(b) The recommendation which, according to the findings made in the appeal judgment, was given by the defendant to the victims represents a business related interference in the claimant's commercial enterprise under the circumstances present here. It is true that a commercial enterprise as such is not in any way generally protected in tort law against inroads into its circle of customers. But here it is a question of a deliberate action by the defendant as a leading insurance undertaking which must inevitably—if the defendant wants to achieve its goal that victims only hire a vehicle with the cheapest supplier—lead to a substantial interference with the claimant in its accident car replacement business. The defendant's action is directed towards making victims decide to behave to the claimant's disadvantage, within the framework of the already existing of business relationships with the claimant, by using its position as liability insurer in relation to loss adjustment.

(c) This interference by the defendant with the claimant's commercial enterprise must be regarded as unlawful. On the balancing of the justified interests of the participants which is required here, the principle must be borne in mind that, within the framework of an order based on a market economy, an interference in the contractual relationships of others is only to be considered as impermissible if special circumstances forming the basis of unfairness are established (references omitted). Contrary to the view of the appeal court, such circumstances forming the basis of unlawfulness are present here.

(aa) The defendant's action which is to be assessed here rests—as must be deduced from the findings which have been made—on the incorrect legal view that the accident victim was required in principle, in view of the duty to mitigate loss, to hire a replacement vehicle at the cheapest obtainable hire price on the market; and could ask for no compensation for hire prices going beyond this. The defendant cannot be allowed any justified interest in implementing a legal opinion of this kind, which contradicts the real legal position, by means of recommendations to the victims and—as already discussed—in particular not even if and in so far as their legal opinion has found recognition in local court practice. An accident victim who has hired a replacement vehicle, within the framework of the so-called accident compensation rates, in such a way that there are no effective legal objections to the full compensability of his costs according to the principles of the judgment of the Senate (reference omitted) is not required by the duty to mitigate loss to change to another car hire firm if he subsequently hears of a cheaper offer. The defendant's action is therefore also not lawful from the point of view that it seeks retrospectively to put the victims as it were “in bad faith” by naming the cheapest supplier of hire vehicles.

(bb) The recommendation made to the victims, who as a rule cannot recognise the incorrect approach in the defendant's opinion, gives them the inaccurate impression that they are under a duty to hire their replacement vehicle with the cheapest supplier named to them by the defendant and that they had committed a mistake by hiring from the claimant; and that this must now be corrected to avoid them suffering economic disadvantages, namely having to bear the hire car costs themselves in so far as they are higher than the cheapest supplier's prices. The victims are bound to fear difficulties based on an invoicing practice not in harmony with the real legal position. They are thereby put under pressure to behave in accordance with the defendant's recommendation to the claimant's detriment. This action is unlawful and in particular in the relationship to the claimant with regard to its commercial enterprise protected in tort law. The claimant does not need to accept such action, if the business relationships which it has entered into with its hire car customers are endangered by pressure being exerted on its contractual partners in a way which does not correspond to the legal position.

(d) Fault on the part of the defendant does not matter as here also it is only a question of a request for injunctive relief. The danger of repetition is in this respect to be assumed, as contrary findings have not been made and furthermore the defendant considers its action to be permissible.

Notes to Cases 32–35

1. These four cases deal with the “right of an established and operating business” which the German courts have added to the list of protected interests mentioned in § 823 I BGB. A brief account of the emergence of this new right can be found above in chapter 2, section A. 2 (e) (iii). As in all judge-made rights one finds here, on the one hand the desire to expand the law and, on the other, the need to set workable and reasonable limits. The element of “directness” is here relied upon and is extensively discussed in case 11, above. In the end, however, there is little doubt that policy dictates the results. Case 14, above, is also interesting in so far as it shows that the courts treat this as a residual right to be invoked only where there is no other remedy available to a deserving plaintiff. (A point clearly established in the important decision of 21 June 1966, BGHZ 45, 296 = NJW 1966, 1617 = JZ 1967, 174.) If, however, a particular factual situation is covered by a specific statutory rule (say, § 824 or § 826 BGB), then that rule must be applied; and if one of its conditions is not satisfied, one cannot fall back on this new right. As already stated, only “business-connected” interests will be protected by this right. What exactly this means is difficult to say and, ultimately, it is for the courts to decide. Thus, see Deutsch in JZ 1984, 308, 309. The decision in case 35, though it did not alter the law or develop it further, should be seen as an example of how the concept of an established and operating business is applied in practice. (The importance of competition law in this field is stressed by Helle JZ 1999, 628). As was explained above (chapter 2 A. 2 (e) (iii)), the element of unlawfulness has to be established positively in each case. The present decision also illustrates the balancing act involved though one should note that the approach is flexible. (The balancing act can also take place in defining the protected interest: see BGH NJW 1998, 2141). The case also highlights the need to justify the solution against the background of the constitutional rights of the actors (generally speaking, criticism of a competitor is, of course, allowed as a corollary of freedom of speech: Article 5 I GG). The actual decision must be understood in connection with case 151 (BGHZ 132, 373), and concerns the relationship between insurer and care hirer. As will be explained in the notes to the latter case, the insurance companies complained about the inflated tariffs for accident car replacement vehicles. The BGH however (unlike the House of Lords) held that such costs were recoverable. As a result, the call for a boycott of such care hire companies could not be justified. The decision leaves open how far insurance companies can go in warning potential claimants. The better view seems to be that they ought to be allowed to make specific proposals and advise the claimant that he has to mitigate his loss. (See Teichmann LM BGB § 823 (Ai) Nr. 74.)

2. The cases reproduced above have no exact equivalents in the Common law, the points they raise falling to be discussed under different headings of the law. Thus Kaplan v. Helenhart Novelty Corp. 182 F. 2d 311 (2nd Cir. 1950) is, to a point, factually analogous to cases 32 and 33, though the decision in that case went in favour of the defendant who had acted in good faith when he gave notice of an alleged infringement of the patent. For further discussion see Choate and Francis, Patent Law (2nd edn., 1981) and Rosenberg, Patent Law Fundamentals (2nd edn., 1980). Case 34, on the other hand, would raise issues which the Common law would, in part at least, discuss under the heading of defamation and freedom of expression. Many cases discussed in the next section (Constitutionalisation of Private Law) deal with this issue. See, for example, BVerfGE 25, 256; BGH NJW 1984, 1956; BGH NJW 1985, 1620.

11. THE “CONSTITUTIONALISATION” OF PRIVATE LAW

Case 36

BUNDESVERFASSUNGSGERICHT (FIRST DIVISION) 15 JANUARY 1958 BVERFGE 7, 198 = NJW 1958, 257

1. Basic rights are primarily to protect the citizen against the state, but as enacted in the Constitution (GG) they also incorporate an objective scale of values which applies, as a matter of constitutional law, throughout the entire legal system.
2. The substance of the basic rights is expressed indirectly in the rules of private law, most evidently in its mandatory provisions, and is best effectuated by the judges' use of the general clauses.
3. Basic rights may be infringed by a judicial decision, which ignores the effect of basic rights on private law (§ 90 Act on Constitutional Court Procedure (BVerfGG)). Judicial decisions on private law are subject to review by the Constitutional Court, only in respect of such infringements of basic rights, not for errors of law in general.
4. Rules of private law may count as “general laws” which may restrict the basic right of freedom of expression under Article 5 II GG.
5. Such “general laws” must be interpreted in the light of the especial significance in a free democratic state of the basic right to freedom of expression.
6. The basic right in Article 5 GG protects not only the utterance of an opinion as such, but also the effect it has on others.
7. The expression of an opinion favouring a boycott does not necessarily infringe proper conduct (boni mores) under § 826 BGB; depending on all the circumstances such an expression may be justified as a matter of constitutional law.

Disposition

The decision of the Landgericht Hamburg of 22 November 1951 infringes the complainants' basic right under Article 5 I, 1 GG and is therefore vacated. The matter is remitted to the Landgericht Hamburg.

Reasons

At the opening of “German Film Week” on 20 September 1950 the complainant, then a Senator of the Free and Hanseatic City of Hamburg and Head of the State Press Office, gave an address, in his capacity as President of the Hamburg Press Club, to an audience of film distributors and directors. He said, inter alia:

The person least likely to restore the claim to morality which the German film forfeited during the Third Reich is the man who directed “Jud Süß” and wrote the script for it. If this very man is chosen to represent the German film industry, who can tell what harm we may suffer throughout the world? True he was acquitted in a formal sense in Hamburg, but substantially the judgment was a condemnation. We must call on the distributors and cinema owners to show character—not cheap, but worth the price. And I want the German film to show character as well. If it shows character in its imagination, visual daring and sterling craftsmanship, it will merit every assistance and achieve what it needs in order to survive: success with the public here in Germany and abroad.

Domnick-Film-Produktion GmbH immediately challenged the complainant to justify these charges against Veit Harlan, under whose direction and with whose screen-play they were making “Unsterbliche Geliebte”.

On 27 October 1950 the complainant released an “open letter” to the Press by way of reply which contained the following:

The court did not gainsay the fact that for much of the Hitler régime Veit Harlan was the “Nazi film-director no. 1” or that his film “Jud Süß” showed him to be a committed exponent of the Nazis' murderous purge of the Jews. Some businessmen here and abroad may not be opposed to Veit Harlan's re-emergence, but the moral integrity of Germany must not be destroyed by hard-faced money-makers. Harlan's return can only reopen wounds barely healed, and resuscitate diminishing distrust fatal to German reconstruction. For all these reasons it is not only the right but the duty of all decent Germans to protest against, and even to boycott, this ignominious representative of the German film industry.

Domnick-Film-Produktion GmbH and Herzog-Film GmbH (the distributor of “Unsterbliche Geliebte” in the Federal Republic), obtained an interlocutory injunction from the Landgericht Hamburg . . . and the Oberlandesgericht dismissed the complainant's appeal. At the complainant's request the two film companies were required to bring suit within a certain time. They did so, and on 22 November 1951 the Landgericht Hamburg issued the following judgment:

The defendant is ordered, on pain of fine or imprisonment as determined by the court, to refrain (1) from calling on theatre managers and film distributors not to programme the film “Unsterbliche Geliebte” and (2) from calling on the German public not to go to see the film . . .

B. I.

The complaint is admissible since the preconditions for the application of § 90 II, 2 BVerfGG are satisfied (decision before exhaustion of legal remedies).

II.

The complainant alleges that the Landgericht's judgment infringes his basic right to free expression of opinion as laid down in Article 5 I, 1 GG.

The judgment of the Landgericht, an act of the public power of judicature, could infringe the complainant's basic right by its content only if the court was bound to take account of the complainant's basic right.

By enjoining the complainant from making statements apt to lead others to endorse his views about Harlan's re-emergence and to follow him in discriminating against Harlan's films, the judgment clearly restricts the complainant's freedom of expression of opinion. The Landgericht granted the injunction as a matter of private law order on the basis that the complainant's statements were tortious under § 826 BGB. Thus the public power has restricted the complainant's freedom of expression on the basis of the plaintiff's private law claim. This can constitute an infringement of the complainant's basic right under Article 5 I, 1 GG only if the applicable rules of private law are so substantially affected that they can no longer support the judgment.

The question whether basic rights affect private law, and if so in what manner, is much debated [references]. The extreme positions are, on the one hand, that basic rights constrain only the state, and, on the other, that basic rights (or at any rate the most important of them) prevail against everyone in private legal relations. Previous decisions of this Court support neither of these extreme positions, the conclusions drawn by the Federal Labour court in its decision of 10 May 1957 (NJW 1957, 1688) from our decisions of 17 and 23 January 1957 (BVerfGE 6, 55 and 6, 84) being unwarranted. Nor is it necessary today to deal with all aspects of the debated question of the "effect on third parties" (Drittwirkung) of basic rights. The matter can be properly resolved by the following considerations:

1. There is no doubt that the main purpose of basic rights is to protect the individual's sphere of freedom against encroachment by public power: they are the citizen's bulwark against the state. This emerges from both their development as a matter of intellectual history and their adoption into the constitutions of the various states as a matter of political history: it is true also of the basic rights in the Basic Law, which emphasizes the priority of human dignity against the power of the state by placing the section on basic rights at its head and by providing that the constitutional complaint (Verfassungsbeschwerde), the special legal device for vindicating these rights, lies only in respect of acts of the public power.

But far from being a value-free system [references] the Constitution erects an objective system of values in its section on basic rights, and thus expresses and reinforces the validity of the basic rights [references]. This system of values, centring on the freedom of the human being to develop in society, must apply as a constitutional axiom throughout the whole legal system: it must direct and inform legislation, administration, and judicial decision. It naturally influences private law as well; no rule of private law may conflict with it, and all such rules must be construed in accordance with its spirit.

The legal content of basic rights as objective norms informs private law by means of the rules which directly control this area of law. Just as new rules must conform to the value-system of the basic rights, so existing and older rules receive from it a definite constitutional content which thereafter determines their construction. From the point of view of substantive and procedural law a dispute between private citizens on the rights and duties that arise from rules of conduct thus influenced by the basic rights remains a dispute of private law. It is private law which is interpreted and applied even if its interpreters must follow the public law of the constitution.

The influence of the value-system of the basic rights is clearest in those rules of private law which are mandatory (zwingendes Recht) and form part of ordre public in the wide sense, i.e. those rules which in the public interest apply to private legal relations whether the parties so choose or not. Such provisions, being functionally related and complementary to public law, are especially exposed to the influence of constitutional law. "General clauses", such as § 826 BGB, by which human conduct is measured against extralegal standards such as "proper conduct" (gute Sitten), allow the courts to respond to this influence since in deciding what is required in a particular case by such social commands, they must start from the value-system adopted by the society in its constitution at that stage of its cultural and spiritual development. The general clauses have thus been rightly described as "points of entry" for basic rights into private law [references].

The judge is constitutionally bound to ascertain whether the applicable rules of substantive private law have been influenced by basic rights in the manner described; if so, he must construe and apply the rules as so modified. This is what is meant by saying that the civil judge is bound by the basic rights (Article 1 III GG). If he issues a judgment which ignores this constitutional influence on the rules of private law, he contravenes not only objective constitutional law by misconceiving the content of the objective norm underlying the basic law, but also, by his judgment, in his capacity as a public official, contravenes the Constitution itself, which the citizen is constitutionally entitled to have respected by the judiciary. Quite apart from any remedies he may have to correct this error in the courts of private law, the citizen can invoke the Federal Constitutional Court by means of a Verfassungsbeschwerde.

The Constitutional Court must determine whether the reach and effect of the basic rights in private law has been correctly ascertained by the regular courts. But this is also the limit of its investigation: it is not for the Constitutional Court to check judgments of civil courts for errors of law in general; the Constitutional Court simply judges of the "radiant effect" of the basic rights on private law and implements the values inherent in the precept of constitutional law. The function of the Verfassungsbeschwerde is to test all acts, whether of the legislature, the executive or the judiciary, for "compatibility with the Constitution" (§ 90 BVerfGG). The Federal Constitutional Court is certainly not to act as a court of review, much less over-review, for the civil courts, but neither may it abjure consideration of such judgments entirely or leave uncorrected any instance which comes to its notice of the misapplication of the rules of basic rights.

2. The basic right to freedom of expression of opinion (Article 5 GG) seems to pose special problems with regard to the relationship between basic rights and private law. As in the Weimar Constitution (Article 118), this right is constitutionally guaranteed only within the limits of "general laws" (Article 5 II GG). Before inquiring what laws are "general laws" in this sense, one might suppose that the constitution's reference to such laws must be to such laws as judicially construed, with the result that no judicial construction of such a law which limited the basic right could be regarded as a "breach" of the basic right.

This is not, however, the sense of the reference to "general laws". The basic right to freedom of expression, the most immediate aspect of the human personality in society, is one of the most precious rights of man (Declaration of the Rights of Man and Citizen (1789) Article 11). It is absolutely essential to a free and democratic state, for it alone permits that constant spiritual interaction, the conflict of opinion, which is its vital element (BVerfGE 5, 85 (205)). In a certain sense it is the basis of freedom itself, “the matrix, the indispensable condition of nearly every other form of freedom” (Cardozo).

Given this fundamental importance for the free democratic state of freedom of expression of opinion, it would be illogical for a constitution to make its actual scope contingent on mere statute (and thus necessarily on the holdings of courts construing it). What was said earlier about the relationship between basic rights and private law applies here also: general laws which have the effect of limiting a basic right must be read in the light of its significance and always be construed so as to preserve the special value of this right, with, in a free democracy, a presumption in favour of freedom of speech in all areas, and especially in public life. We must not see the relationship between basic right and “general laws” as one in which “general laws” by their terms set limits to the basic right, but rather that relationship must be construed in the light of the special significance of this basic right in a free democratic state, so that the limiting effect of “general laws” on the basic right is itself limited.

In its function as ultimate guardian of the basic rights through the medium of the Verfassungsbeschwerde, the Federal Constitutional Court must therefore have the power to supervise the decisions of courts whose application of a general law in this area may unduly restrict the scope of the basic right in the individual case. This Court must be competent to uphold as against all organs of public power, including the civil courts, the special value it represents for a free democracy, and thus to reconcile, as required by constitutional law, the conflicting restrictive tendencies of the basic right and the “general laws”.

3. The concept of “general” law has always been controversial. Leaving on one side the question whether the concept may not be due to an error in the drafting of Article 118 of the 1919 Constitution [reference], we may note that it was then construed to include all which “do not forbid an opinion as such and do not envisage the expression of opinion as such”, but rather “serve to protect a legal interest which deserves protection without regard to any particular opinion”, and protect “a community value superior to the activity of freedom of opinion” [reference]. Exponents of the Grundgesetz agree with this [reference: “laws which do not inhibit the purely intellectual effect of a mere expression of opinion”].

If the term “general laws” is so understood, we may state the protection of the basic right as follows:

It is unacceptable to hold that the Constitution protects only the expression of opinion, and not its inherent or intended effect on others, for the whole point of an expression of opinion is to have “an effect on the environment of ideas” [reference]. Thus value judgments, which always have an intellectual aim, namely to persuade others, are protected by Article 5 I, 1 GG; indeed it is the stance of the speaker as expressed in the value-judgment by which he hopes to affect others which is principally protected by this basic right. To protect the expression and not to protect its effect would be a nonsense.

In this sense the expression of opinion is free in so far as its effect on the mind is concerned; but that does not mean that one is entitled, just because one is expressing an opinion, to prejudice interests of another which deserve protection against freedom of opinion. There has to be a “balance of interests”; the right to express an opinion must yield if its exercise infringes interests of another which have a superior claim to protection. Whether such an interest exists in a particular case depends on all the circumstances.

4. From this point of view the rules of private law may perfectly well be ranked as “general laws” in the sense of Article 5 II GG. If this has not been done by commentators hitherto [reference], that is simply because basic rights have been considered good only as against the state, so it was natural to consider as “general laws” having limiting effect only those laws which regulated state activity vis-à-vis the individual, that is, laws of a public law nature. But if the basic right to free expression of opinion affects relations of private law as well and favours free expression of opinion against the fellow-citizen also, then rules of private law which operate to protect superior legal interests must also be taken into account as possibly limiting the basic right. After all, if provisions of criminal law designed to protect honour or other essential aspects of human personality can set limits to the exercise of the fundamental right to freedom of expression, it is not obvious why similar provisions of private law should not equally do so.

Case 37

BUNDESVERFASSUNGSGERICHT (FIRST DIVISION) 24 FEBRUARY 1971
 BVERFGE 30, 173 = NJW 1971, 1645 = JZ 1971, 544

Reasons

The complainant seeks constitutional review of the injunction obtained by the adopted son and sole heir of Gustaf Gründgens, actor and theatre director, against the printing, distribution, or publication of a book by Klaus Mann entitled Mephisto, a Novel, or How to Get on in the World.

The author left Germany in 1933 and published the novel in Amsterdam in 1936 (Querido Verlag). Seven years after his death in 1949 it was published in East Germany.

The novel portrays the rise of Hendrik Höfgen, a talented actor who in order to make a career for himself as an artist in collusion with Nazi powers, is false to his true political leanings and rides roughshod over all human and ethical considerations. The psychological, intellectual, and sociological factors which made such a career possible are all laid out.

The model for Hendrik Höfgen was the actor Gustaf Gründgens, one of the Hamburger Kammerspieler in the 1920s, when he was a friend of Klaus Mann and briefly married to his sister Erika. Gründgens and his career are reflected in numerous characteristics of Hendrik Höfgen, including his physical appearance, the plays he acted in, and his appointments as State Councillor and Director-General of the State Theatre of Prussia.

Of the relationship between the fictional Höfgen and the real Gründgens Klaus Mann wrote in The Turning Point (New York, 1942):

I visualise my ex-brother-in-law as the traitor par excellence, the macabre embodiment of corruption and cynicism. So intense was the fascination of his shameful glory that I decided to portray Mephisto-Gründgens in a satirical novel. I thought it pertinent, indeed, necessary to expose and analyse the abject type of the treacherous intellectual who prostitutes his talent for the sake of some tawdry fame and transitory wealth.

Gustaf was just one among others—in reality as well as in the composition of my narrative. He served me as a focus around which I could make gyrate the pathetic and nauseous crowd of petty climbers and crooks.

In the revised version which appeared in Germany in 1948 (Der Wendepunkt), we find at p. 334:

The third book published during my exile, in 1936, Mephisto, deals with an unsympathetic character. Why did I write it? The actor I portray has talent, but not much else going for him. He has none of those moral qualities which form what is commonly spoken of as “character”. Instead of “character” Hendrik Höfgen has only ambition, vanity, passion for publicity and desire for effect. He is not a man but a posturer.

Was such a figure worth writing a novel about? Yes, indeed. For the posturer represents and symbolises the regime, posturing, false and unrealistic. In a state run by liars and dissemblers the actor has a triumphant role. Mephisto is the story of a career in the Third Reich.

In a perceptive review in Das Neue Tagebuch in 1937 Herman Kesten rightly suggested that perhaps the author wanted to show a real actor among the bloody amateurs in the horror play. He went on: “The author goes further: he gives us a paradigm of the ‘fellow-traveller’, one of the millions of petty crooks who themselves commit no grand crime but sup with murderers, not principals but accessories after the event; they do not kill but conceal the corpse, and in order to get more than they deserve lick the blood of the innocent from the boots of the mighty. This host of petty toadies and bootlickers are the prop of the powerful.”

This is exactly the type I wanted to draw: I couldn’t have stated my intentions better myself. Mephisto is not, as some people have maintained, a roman-à-clef. The infamously brilliant and cynically ruthless go-getter, who is the central figure of my satire may have certain traits in common with a certain real actor still allegedly with us. Is my character Councillor and Director-General Höfgen a portrait of the friend of my youth, Councillor and Director-General Gründgens? Not entirely. There are many differences between Höfgen and my erstwhile brother-in-law. But even if the character were closer to the original than it is, Gründgens is not the “hero” of my tract for the times, since it is not about an individual at all but about the type. Others could have served as a model just as well. My choice fell upon Gründgens not because he was outstandingly awful (indeed he was rather better than many another idol of the Third Reich) but simply because I happened to know him well. It was precisely our earlier acquaintance which led me to make a novel out of the incredible, fascinating and fantastic story of his rise and fall.

II.

1. In August 1963 the complainant announced the publication of Mephisto, and suit was brought by the adoptive son and sole heir of Gustaf Gründgens, who died in October 1963. The claim alleged that anyone at all familiar with German theatre in the 1920s and 1930s would link Höfgen with Gründgens; that in addition to many recognisable facts the novel contained many hurtful fictions which helped to give a false and highly derogatory picture of Gründgens’s character. The novel was not a work of art but a roman-à-clef written to avenge Gründgens’s marriage to Mann’s sister Erika, which he believed dishonourable.

The plaintiff sought an injunction forbidding the reproduction, distribution, and publication of Mephisto on pain of punishment.

The claim was rejected by the Landgericht Hamburg. Thereupon, in September 1965, the complainant published the novel with a foreword stating “All characters in this novel are types, not portraits. K. M.” On 23 November 1965 the plaintiff obtained an interlocutory injunction from the Hanseatic Oberlandesgericht in Hamburg and the following foreword was included:

TO THE READER

Klaus Mann wrote this novel in Amsterdam in 1936, having left Germany voluntarily on grounds of conscience. In it he gives a critical view, animated by his hatred of Hitler’s dictatorship, of contemporary conditions in the German theatre. While there are undeniable resemblances to actual figures of the day, the characters are primarily creatures of the author's imagination. This is especially true of the principal character, whose conduct and beliefs are at any rate largely imaginary. That is why the author prefaced the book with the explanation: "All characters in this work are types, not portraits."

...

This Court must determine whether in applying the rules of private law the judicial decisions under attack misconceived the meaning of the basic rights of whose infringement the complainant complains or infringed the basic rights themselves [references]. Such constitutional "fall-out effects" depend principally on the scope of the right to artistic freedom (Article 5 III, 1 GG) and the right to freedom of expression (Article 5 I GG), and especially on the relationship between these rights and the protection afforded by these decisions to the human personality of the late Gustaf Gründgens under Article 1 I and 1 II, 1 GG.

III.

Article 5 III, 1 GG declares that along with science, research, and teaching, art is free. By its terms and intention the guarantee in Article 5 III, 1 is an objective value-laden basic norm regulating the relationship between art and the state. It also guarantees the individual freedom of the artist.

1. The field of "art" must be determined by the distinctive structural features of the artistic enterprise. The essence of artistic endeavour lies in the free creative process whereby the artist, in his chosen communicative medium, gives immediate perceptible form to what he has felt, learnt, or experienced. Artistic activity involves both the conscious and the unconscious, in a manner not rationally separable. Intuition, imagination, and knowledge of the art all play a part in artistic creation; it is not so much communication as expression, indeed the most immediate expression of the artist's individuality.

The freedom guaranteed covers the artistic creation as regards both the work produced and the effect produced by it. The two form an indissociable unity. The exhibition and dissemination of the work are as important as its creation for art as the specifically artistic enterprise; indeed, the "area of effect", public access to the work of art, is the ground in which Article 5 III GG is rooted. A glance back at the artistic policy of the Nazi regime shows that to guarantee merely the individual rights of artists cannot ensure the freedom of art: the basic right would prove hollow unless it extends from the personal zone of the artist to the area of impact.

2. It is not here possible to give an exhaustive definition of the scope of the constitutional guarantee of freedom of art in all its various forms. Nor is it necessary for the case in hand, since it is common ground in the courts below, between the parties and probably all experts, that the novel in question ranks as a work of art. We may therefore concentrate on factors relevant to the appraisal of an example of the narrative art which by dealing with actual events courts the risk of conflicting with the rights and interests of the persons portrayed.

In putting real events in a work of art the artist "recreates" them for he sunders them from their actual context and places them in a novel setting dominated by his concern for striking presentation rather than by their own actuality. Artistic unity may, and sometimes must, prime the truth of the occurrence.

The role and purpose of Article 5 III, 1 GG is above all to give protection against encroachment by the public power on any specifically artistic undertakings, actions, and decisions. One cannot without inhibiting the free development of the creative artistic endeavour prescribe how the artist should react to reality or reproduce his reactions to it. The artist is the sole judge of the “rightness” of his response. To this extent the guarantee of artistic freedom means that one must not seek to affect the manner in which the artist goes about his business, the material he selects, or the way in which he treats it, and certainly not seek to narrow the area in which he may operate or lay down general rules for the creative process. As to narrative works of art the constitutional guarantee means that the artist must be free to choose and treat his topic free from attempts by the state to limit the area of specifically artistic judgement by rules or binding value-judgements. This applies also, indeed especially, when the artist is dealing with actual events: “committed art” is not excluded from the constitutional guarantee.

3. Article 5 III, 1 GG is a comprehensive guarantee of the freedom of artistic activity. Thus where intermediaries are needed in order to establish relations between the artist and the public they too are protected by the constitutional guarantee. As a product of the narrative art needs to be reproduced, distributed, and published in order to have any effect on the public, the publisher’s function as intermediary is indispensable, so the constitutional guarantee extends to his activity as well. Thus, as publisher of the novel, the complainant may invoke the basic right contained in Article 5 III, 1 GG (see also BVerfGE 10, 118, (121); 12, 205 (260) on the freedom of the Press).

4. Art having its special nature and rules, its guarantee by Article 5 III, 1 GG is absolute. The clear terms of that provision foredoom any attempt to limit it, whether by narrowing the idea of art in the light of one’s value judgements or by extending or invoking the limitations applicable to other constitutional provisions.

The Bundesgerichtshof was quite right to state that Article 5 II GG which limits basic rights under Article 5 I is inapplicable here. The different guarantees in Article 5 GG are systematically separated, and this shows that the limitations in Article 5 II are inapplicable to matters covered by Article 5 III, since Article 5 III is a lex specialis in relation to Article 5 I. Nor is it acceptable to sever parts of a narrative work of art, call them expressions of opinion under Article 5 I and then apply to them the limitations laid down in Article 5 II. Nor do the travaux préparatoires of Article 5 III support the view that the authors of the Constitution regarded freedom of art as a subspecies of freedom of expression or opinion.

Nor can one accept that the freedom of art is limited under Article 2 I, 2 GG by the rights of others, by the constitutional order or by the moral law. Such a view would be incompatible with the constant holding of this Court that Article 2 I GG is subsidiary and the individual freedoms special [references] in a manner which bars the extension of the community priority of Article 2 I, 2 GG in the light of the use of Article 2 I GG. Nor are these limitations applicable to the area of effect of works of art.

5. Yet there are limits to this freedom. The freedom incorporated in Article 5 III, 1 GG, like all basic rights, is rooted in the Constitution’s conception of man as a responsible person free to develop within society [references]. The absolute nature of the guarantee of artistic freedom means that its limits are to be found only within the Constitution itself. The freedom of art is not subject to mere statute, it cannot be qualified by the general legal system or be at the mercy of any vague clause about essential interests of state and society which lacks constitutional basis and is uncontained by the rule of law. If the guarantee of artistic freedom gives rise to any conflict, it must be resolved by construction in terms of the order of values enshrined in the Basic Law and in line with the unitary system of values which underlies it. As part of this system of basic rights the freedom of art is co-ordinate with the dignity of man as guaranteed by Article 1 GG, the supreme and controlling value of the whole system of basic rights (BVerfGE 6, 32 [41]; 27, 1 [6]). Given the effect which a work of art may have on the social plane, the guarantee of artistic freedom may come into conflict with the area of human personality, equally protected by the Constitution.

A person's claim to respect and value may be affected by an artist's use of details of character and career of actual people as in addition to being an aesthetic reality, such a work also has existence in the realm of social facts and the social effects are not dissipated by being artistically transmuted. Such social effects while taking place beside the artistic effects must nevertheless be appraised with regard to the scope of the guarantee of Article 5 III, 1 GG, since in the work of art the "real" and "aesthetic" worlds are unified.

6. The courts below were right in this connection to invoke Article 1 I GG in their appraisal of its protective effect on the area of personality of the late actor Gustaf Gründgens. It would be inconsistent with the constitutional mandate of the inviolability of human dignity, which underlies all basic rights, if a person could be belittled and denigrated after his death. Accordingly an individual's death does not put an end to the state's duty under Article 1 I GG to protect him from assaults on his human dignity.

In addition the Bundesgerichtshof and Oberlandesgericht held that Article 2 I GG also had radiant protective effects in private law for Gründgens, though to a degree diminished by his death. However, only a living person is so entitled: the right of personality cannot survive death. An essential precondition of the basic right under Article 2 I GG is the existence of at least a potential or a future person. It is irrelevant that a person may be affected during his lifetime by what the legal situation will be after his death, though this weighed with the Bundesgerichtshof. It is no derogation from the freedom of action and self-determination guaranteed by Article 2 I GG to hold that the protection of the personality expires on death.

7. The resolution of the tension between the protection of the personality and the right to the artistic freedom cannot turn solely on the "social" effects of a work of art but must also take account of specifically aesthetic considerations. The conception of man which underlies Article 1 I GG is as much infused with the guarantee of freedom in Article 5 III, 1 GG as the latter is influenced by the value implicit in Article 1 I GG. The individual's claim to social respect and value is not superior to artistic freedom, but neither can art simply ignore the individual's claim to proper respect.

Only by weighing all the circumstances of the given case can one decide whether the publication of a work which artistically deploys true details about an actual person poses a serious threat of encroachment on the protected area of his personality. One consideration must be whether and how far the artistic treatment of the material and its incorporation into the work as an organic whole have made the "copy" independent of the "original" by rendering objective, symbolical, and figurative what was individualised, personal, and intimate. If such an aesthetic appraisal reveals that the artist has indeed produced, or even intended to produce, a “portrait” of the “original”, the outcome will depend on the extent of the artistic alienation and how seriously the “falsification” damages the reputation or memory of the subject.

IV.

This Court must therefore decide whether in balancing the protection afforded by Article 1 I GG to the personality of the late Gustaf Gründgens and his adopted son against the guarantee of artistic freedom under Article 5 III, 1 GG the courts below have upheld the principles just stated. However, in this Court the opinions on that matter are equally divided, so it cannot hold that the decisions under attack infringed the Constitution (§ 15 II, 4 BVerfGG).

...

3. This Court has always held that a Verfassungsbeschwerde empowers it to review judicial decisions only within narrow limits, and that in particular it cannot review the facts as found and evaluated, the construction of mere law or its application in the individual case, which are matters for the regular courts [references]. These principles apply equally when review is sought of the balancing of the protection afforded to the parties to a civil suit by Article 1 I of Article 5 III, 1 GG.

...

This Court is not, like a court of appeal, empowered to substitute its own opinion of the case for that of the proper judge. In cases like these it can only hold that the basic right of the losing party has been infringed if the judge has either failed to recognise that it is a case of balancing conflicting basic rights or has based his judgment on a fundamentally false view of the importance, and especially the scope, of either of those rights.

When the judgements under attack are so tested, it emerges that the Oberlandesgericht and the Bundesgerichtshof recognised that a balancing act was required in order to resolve the tension between the rights emanating from Article 1 I GG and Article 5 III, 1 GG, and that the judgments as a whole do not seem to be based on a fundamentally erroneous view of the importance or scope of the two basic rights.

Case 38

BUNDESVERFASSUNGSGERICHT (FIRST DIVISION) 14 FEBRUARY 1973* BVERFGE 34, 269 = NJW 1973, 1221 = JZ 1973, 662

The plaintiff is Princess Soraya, the ex-wife of the Shah of Iran. At the time in question, after her divorce from the Shah, the plaintiff resided in Germany. The defendants are the publisher and chief-editor of an illustrated weekly paper, which is distributed throughout Germany and known to specialise in sensational society stories.

In April 1961, defendants' paper carried a front-page story purporting to be the transcript of an interview with the plaintiff. The interview, which appeared to reveal much of plaintiff's private and very private life, was wholly fictitious, i.e., it was totally and freely invented by its author, a freelance journalist. Defendants published the story without investigating whether the interview had actually taken place. In July, 1961, defendants' paper carried another story dealing with Princess Soraya, and as a part of that new story the defendants published a brief statement by the Princess to the effect that the alleged April interview had not taken place.

In the present action, the plaintiff seeks damages for "violation of her personality rights." The Landgericht as court of first instance awarded her DM 15,000. The Oberlandesgericht and the Bundesgerichtshof affirmed, and the defendants brought the case before the Federal Constitutional Court by way of a constitutional complaint.

In order to understand the thrust of defendants' constitutional arguments, we must take a brief look at the development and present status of the rules of substantive law which the plaintiff successfully invoked in the courts below.

Apart from a section protecting a person's right to his name, the German Civil Code contains no specific provisions concerning the subjects which we would label as defamation or invasion of privacy. In Germany, as in France, defamation traditionally has been thought of as a crime rather than a tort. Under this traditional view, defamation actions normally have to be brought in the criminal courts, even though such an action ordinarily has to be prosecuted by the victim rather than the public prosecutor. The public prosecutor brings such an action only if this is required in the public interest. German law generally vests the prosecutor with little or no discretion, and requires prosecution whenever there is reasonable cause to believe that the defendant has committed a crime. This general rule, however, is subject to exceptions in the case of certain relatively minor offences, such as defamation. If the defendant is convicted in such a criminal proceeding, he will be fined, or (in a very serious case) subjected to a jail sentence; but the victim cannot recover substantial damages in that proceeding.

Until after World War II, attempts to bring civil actions for defamation or invasion of privacy found little favour with the German courts. The first paragraph of § 823 of the Civil Code authorises tort recovery only if the plaintiff can show injury to his "life, body, health, freedom, property, or some other (similar) right." In order to bring cases of defamation or invasion of privacy within the ambit of this code provision, plaintiffs often argued that a person's interest in his reputation and privacy should be regarded as his "personality right" and should be protected as one of the "other rights" mentioned in § 823. But throughout the periods of the Empire, the Weimar Republic and the Third Reich, the courts essentially rejected that argument.

A different judicial approach to the problem emerged after World War II, and after the adoption of the new West German Constitution, which contains the following provisions: [citation of Articles 1 and 2 follows]

During the 1950s the BGH, explicitly invoking these constitutional provisions, gave up the former narrow interpretation of § 823 of the Civil Code and repeatedly held that a plaintiff's "personality right" is one of the "other rights" which are protected by § 823 against intentional or negligent infringement. This was an important development. It meant that—in contrast to prior law—the German courts now were treating injuries to a person's reputation or privacy as actionable torts. (For a full account, see Harry D Krause, "The Right to Privacy in Germany—Pointers for American Legislation?" 1965 Duke L.J. 481, and most recently Karl-Nikolaus Peifer, "Persönlichkeitsschaden und Geldersatz", 96 Zeitschrift für vergleichende Rechtswissenschaft 74 (1997), also discussing parallel developments in Italy at 76–82.)

Even after this judicial breakthrough, however, a difficult issue remained to be resolved regarding the kind of damages for which recovery could be allowed under German law in cases of injury to the plaintiff's "personality right." The difficulty was caused by one of the Civil Code's provisions dealing with damages. [There follows the citation of some relevant provisions of the Code, including the one of § 253 given above.]

There are a few limited and narrowly defined cases in which an express provision of written law (within the meaning of § 253) permits the victim of a tort to recover money damages for an injury to non-pecuniary interests; the prime example is the case of personal injury, with respect to which § 847 of the German Civil Code explicitly authorises the recovery of money damages for pain and suffering. The draftsmen of the Civil Code clearly regarded this provision of § 847 as an exception to the general rule laid down in § 253: that no money damages can be recovered for an injury to non-pecuniary interests. (See Palandt, Bürgerliches Gesetzbuch, § 847, Anno. la (53rd edn., 1994). Some additional exceptions are provided for in auxiliary statutes. See ibid.)

Neither the Civil Code nor any auxiliary statute provides for the recovery of non-pecuniary damages by a person whose "right of personality" has been injured. Thus when the tort of injury to a person's "personality right" was first developed by the German courts, it was initially thought that a plaintiff, while perhaps entitled to the publication of a retraction or to similar non-monetary relief under § 249, could not recover money damages without proof of what we would call "special damage," i.e., loss of his job, loss of customers, or the like. The plain language of § 253 indeed appears to preclude the plaintiff in such a case from recovering "general" damages for his soiled reputation and injured feelings.

In 1958, however, the German courts broke away from this restriction seemingly imposed by § 253. The occasion was the so-called Herrenreiter case (the case of the gentleman horse-back rider). That case involved a picture of the plaintiff, a well-known equestrian, elegantly positioned on horse-back while jumping over a hurdle. Without plaintiff's authorisation, the picture was publicly and widely disseminated by the defendant as part of an advertisement promoting a sexual stimulant. The plaintiff's "personality right" was seriously injured by this advertisement, not only because it conveyed the impression that the plaintiff had sought to commercialise his great reputation as a sportsman, but also because it implied that he needed and used sexual stimulants.

The lower courts awarded the plaintiff a substantial sum of money as damages for the injury to his reputation and feelings. The BGH affirmed, essentially on the ground that § 847 of the Civil Code should be extended by analogy to cover the case at hand. This analogy argument was questionable, because the word "only" in § 253 explicitly prohibits an analogical extension of provisions, such as § 847, which engraft exceptions upon the general rule of § 253. Recognising this, the BGH subsequently abandoned the analogy argument; but the result reached in the Herrenreiter case was reaffirmed in later cases, on the ground that in many situations the tort of injury to a person's "personality right"—a tort developed in response to value judgments expressed in the Constitution—would be without an adequate remedy if the victim of such a tort could not recover money damages for the violation of his non-monetary interests.

The BGH limited the breadth of these rulings by further holding that such a cause of action for money damages should be recognised only if (a) the injury to the plaintiff's "personality right" is substantial, and (b) the defendant's act is sufficiently culpable to justify the rendition of a money judgment in a sizeable amount. According to the BGH, both conditions, (a) and (b), are clearly satisfied in a case in which a defendant, by way of large-scale promotion of his own commercial interests, has wantonly violated the plaintiff's "personality right." The repetition of such intolerable conduct, the BGH held, should be prevented by announcing a rule of tort law which makes it clear to would-be violators that such conduct is costly for them.

In the decisions dealing with this question, the BGH also pointed to the drastic technological and social changes that have taken place since the enactment of the Civil Code. The development of mass media, hardly predictable in 1900, makes the protection of an individual's personality right more important and more difficult in our day. Therefore, the BGH held, a court which takes the value system of the Constitution seriously can no longer feel bound by § 253 of the Civil Code insofar as that provision denies recovery for non-pecuniary damages even in cases of grave injuries to an individual's personality right.

The lower courts, after some initial reluctance on the part of some of them, generally followed these holdings of the BGH, which were approved, also, by the majority of the commentators. In the instant case, both the lower courts and the BGH itself based their decision on those previous holdings.

The defendants' constitutional complaint was based mainly on the following provisions of the German Federal Constitution:

Article 5. . . . Freedom of the press and freedom of reporting by broadcast and film are guaranteed. . . .

These rights are limited by the provisions of general (written) laws, by statutory measures for the protection of juveniles, and by the right of personal honour. . . .

Article 20. . . . All of the State's power originates with the People. Such power can be exercised by the People through elections and ballots, and by special organs of the legislative, executive and judicial branches of the government.

The legislature is bound by the constitutional order. The executive and the judiciary are bound by statute and law.

In particular, the defendants argued that the substantive rule pursuant to which the lower courts ordered them to pay money damages to the plaintiff had been created by the courts in violation of the principle of separation of powers laid down in Article 20 of the Constitution. The BGH, they argued, had acted contra legem when it developed the right to money damages for violation of an individual's "personality right." This, it was contended, was a usurpation by the courts of legislative power.

The defendants did not question the constitutionality of the view that the personality right of a person is one of the "other rights" mentioned in the first paragraph of § 823 of the Civil Code. Their attack was directed only against the decisional rule which—contrary to the language of § 253 of the Civil Code—permits a plaintiff whose personality right has been gravely injured to recover a money judgment for non-monetary damages.

The defendants did not deny that the recognition of plaintiff's personality right as one of the "other rights" protected by § 823 of the Civil Code was in part dictated by Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitution. But they argued that the rights derived from Articles 1 and 2, like other human rights protected by the Constitution, are essentially defensive in nature. For this reason, the defendants contended, it is not possible to treat those constitutional provisions as the direct foundation of a cause of action for money damages.

In addition, the defendants argued, the money judgment rendered by the courts below violated the constitutional principle of freedom of the press. In the defendants' view, the money damage rule developed by the courts and applied in this case did not constitute the kind of "general (written) law" which pursuant to Article 5 of the Constitution may be used by the law-giver to limit the freedom of the press.)

In holding that the constitutional complaint was unfounded and that the "ordinary" judges were entitled to (re-interpret) § 253 the way they did in the Professor of Canon law decision the Constitutional court included in its judgment the following crucial paragraph.

“occasionally, the law can be found outside the positive legal rules erected by the state; this is law which emanates from the entire constitutional order and which has as its purpose the ‘correction’ of written law. It is for the judge to ‘discover’ this law and through his opinions give it concrete effect. The Constitution does not restrict judges to apply statutes in their literary sense when deciding cases put before them. Such an approach assumes a basic completeness of statutory rules which is not attainable in practice . . . The insight of the judge may bring to light certain values of society . . . which are implicitly accepted by the constitutional order but which have received an insufficient expression in statutory texts. The judge’s decision can help realise such ideas and give effect to such values.”

Notes to Cases 36–38

1. The constitutionalisation of private law is an important and modern development of the law which, on the whole, though studied by national lawyers (especially in Germany and the USA) has, until recently, been receiving, little attention from comparatists. In England, with one notable exception—Andrew Clapham, Human Rights in the Private Sphere (1993)—the Drittwirkung debate was totally ignored until the Human Rights Act 1998, and some articles written on it, made lawyers wake up to the prospect of Drittwirkung coming to our shores. How soon this will happen, is difficult to predict; but those who wish to accept it or reject it, would be arguing their respective positions better if they took into account the views expressed in Germany. One reason for the neglect of this topic and, indeed, the general unwillingness to accept that constitutional law ideas nowadays inform much of the debate in private law, may be due to the fact that comparatists have, traditionally, been private lawyers. (Even their groupings of legal systems into families, has been attempted with private law primarily in mind with the result that existing classifications are not always convincing.) Clearly, in a casebook on tort, one cannot give this topic the attention it deserves. But continuing the innovative approach adopted in the 1994 edition of this book, we provide in the following paragraphs a summary of the German position on this topic. The reader should thus read these three decisions in conjunction with the brief comments contained in paragraph six of Chapter 1 and treat them as providing the constitutional background to the privacy cases discussed in the next section. For in all of these we see a clash of the rights of one individual against another and yet the outcome is largely determined by the Constitution.

2. Though the significance of the Drittwirkung doctrine has been felt strongly in the area of speech and privacy rights, the importance of the above cases, especially Lüth (case no. 36), goes beyond the facts of the dispute which that Court had to resolve. Indeed, the ramifications of the ruling are gradually engulfing much of the traditional area of private law. Arguably, the most important part of Lüth is its “doctrine of interaction” (Wechselwirkungslehre) which shows that the basic human rights contained in Articles 1–19 of the Constitution of Bonn of 1949 do not directly affect relations between private citizens. Rather, the impact is indirect and is manifested largely through the mandatory rules (ius cogens) of private law and, especially, the various general clauses of private law (e.g. §§ 138, 242, 823 I and 826 BGB) which must be interpreted in conformity with the fundamental values of the Constitution. The practical result is that the judge balances the various competing interests before reaching his decision, freedom of expression (Article 5 of the Constitution) being a cardinal but not absolute value (as this is made clear by para. II of that same article, as well as by Article 20). The Lüth doctrine was finally and conclusively incorporated into the civil law by the Höllengefuer decision of 21 June 1966 (BGHZ 45, 296 = NJW 1966, 1617 = JZ 1967, 174). The case, which was encountered when discussing the right of an established and operating business in chapter two, above, shows how this (private law) right had to cede precedence to free speech when the latter is exercised in the public interest. (As always, the nuanced judgment repays careful reading.) The result of the above is that in a public law action between an individual and the state, a constitutional right will directly override an otherwise applicable rule of public law. The constitutional right will also override a statutory provision of private law if it contravenes a constitutional right. This has occurred for instance in the fifties with regard to (pre-constitutional) family law provisions which could not be reconciled with Art 3 GG (equal treatment). However, in private law disputes between individuals where the applicable provisions are not unconstitutional as such constitutional rights [are] said to “influence” rules of civil law rather than actually to override them. It is the duty of the court to adopt an interpretation of private law provisions which is in conformity with the constitutional rights. A certain intellectual content “flows” or “radiates” from the constitutional law into the civil law and affects the interpretation of existing civil law rules. In such cases the rules of private law are to be interpreted and applied in [the] light of the applicable constitutional norm, but it is nonetheless the civil law rules that are ultimately to be applied. A doctrine such as the above, may be condensed (with dangers) within a few lines; but its birth still needs an explanation. More precisely, does it find any basis in the Constitution?

3. There is little doubt that the traditional understanding of human rights is that they apply vertically i.e. bind the State in its relations with its citizens but do not have any horizontal effect, affecting the relations of private individuals. Most German scholars would accept this and would also agree that the text of the Basic Law (Constitution) is ambiguous on the question whether its Human Rights articles (mainly Articles 1–19) are also meant to regulate the relations between private individuals. Apart from invoking the wider philosophical argument that it was not for the state to interfere with the rules of private law which enshrine the belief in “private autonomy”, opponents of any horizontal extension also argued that where constitutional rules were meant to cover private relationships as well, the constitutional draftsman had said so explicitly. But this argument cuts both ways; and the fact that a horizontal extension was not meant to be prohibited by the Constitution is reinforced by the positive and declarative form given to many of its key articles. (For instance Article 2 (1): “Everyone has the right to the free development of his personality . . .” Likewise with Article 1 (1).) This point is backed by the discussions of the Herrenchiessee drafting committee, which are all the more significant given that the same debate (about horizontally) had plagued the previous Constitution of Weimar. (Bericht über den Verfassungskonvent auf Herrenchiessee vom 10. bis 23 August 1948, 2 Akten und Protokolle, 513, 580. On the other hand Hermann von Mangoldt’s authoritative Das Bonner Grundgesetz, vol. I (1953), 34–42, argues that the Constitutional Convention, which from 1 September 1948 continued in Bonn the work of the Herrenchiessee Committee of experts, did not believe that the Basic Law was meant to apply to relations between individuals.) On the other hand, the underlying issues, as we are now coming to realise in our country, are not susceptible to unequivocal answers. In retrospect, it was thus not surprising that a storm of protest broke out when the Federal Labour Court, under the influence of its first President Nipperdey, jumped the gun and declared that freedom of expression had an unmittelbare Drittwirkung—i.e. a direct limiting effect—on the acts of private parties. (BARbGE 1, 185, (1954)) In actual fact, Nipperdey the judge was only following Nipperdey the scholar who, four years earlier on, had in a seminal and still cited article argued in favour of direct horizontality. (“Gleicher Lohn der Frau für gleiche Leistung. Ein Beitrag zur Auslegung der Grundrechte”, Recht der Arbeit 1950, 121 ff. The literature, which followed the decision of the Federal Labour Court, was enormous. Sharply critical was Ehmke in Wirtschaft und Verfassung, 78 ff. (1961). But Nipperdey struck back in “Grundrechte und Privatrecht”, Festschrift Molitor, 17–33 (1962). In its subsequent decisions, however, the Federal Labour Court has modified its language and brought it closer to that used by the Constitutional Court in Lüth. See: BARbGE 47, 363 (1984).) So, what was the reasoning that brought such a sea change?

In its barest outlines Nipperdey’s argument posits that since the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries new threats have arisen to human rights. Whereas before the industrialisation of our society the function of human rights was to protect the freedoms of the individual from incursions by the state, by the time the twentieth century had arrived, new forces had established themselves within society. These were often as powerful as the state, itself; and certainly equally able to determine (adversely) people’s lives. This was certainly true of the modern Press and large employers who, through their action, could stifle speech rights. Thus, for Nipperdey, “The basic right to free expression . . . would be rendered largely ineffective . . . if . . . individuals and others with economic and social power . . . were in a position by virtue of that power to restrict it at will.” (BArbGE 1, 185, 192.) The fact thus was that in the twentieth century, in parallel with industrialisation, the democratisation of society and the rise of popular sovereignty had changed the role and scope of constitutions. For, where formerly they had been “granted” (oktroiert) by the monarch (or, in the traditionally decentralised Germany, the college of reigning princes), constitutions were now seen as the freely agreed fundamental norm which regulated all life in society. Constitutional provisions, therefore, had to be given the widest possible application. In principle, therefore, no area of life could be exempt from their scope.

Nipperdey’s second argument pointed out that in some cases the Constitution itself expressly provides for the horizontal application of human rights. Article 9 (3) GG is a case in point: “Agreements restricting or intended to hamper [the right to form associations in order to safeguard and improve working and economic conditions] shall be null and void; measures to this end shall be illegal.” The open-ended wording of Article 3 (3) GG—“no one shall be prejudiced . . .”—could be taken to point to the same conclusion: what is illegal need not expressly be declared void. Moreover, in the light of what immediately preceded the Constitution of Bonn was it possible for discrimination based on race, political opinion, faith, or sex, to be accepted under any circumstances? In any event, as the state nowadays employs decreasing numbers of civil servants, and the majority of the population works in the private sector, to exempt the terms of private employment from the application of the relevant article would reduce its significance to an unacceptable level. If this sounded convincing in 1950 it is all the more so now, as the new century has dawned.

The latter (teleological) argument is reinforced rather than contradicted by the provisions of Article 1 GG which is, by its position at the beginning of the Constitution no less than because of its content, marked out as the bedrock of the whole Constitution: “(1) Human dignity is inviolable. To respect and protect it is the duty of all state authority. (2) The German people therefore uphold human rights as inviolable and inalienable and as the basis of every community, of peace and justice in the world.” These sonorous proclamations conclude with the more pragmatic order contained in § (3) of this article which states that “The following basic rights shall bind the legislature, the executive, and the judiciary as directly enforceable law. (Italics supplied.)

Since the judiciary is, according to Article 1 (3) GG, bound by Article 3 (3) GG it cannot, Nipperdey argued, uphold contracts or unilateral acts discriminating on grounds outlawed by the Constitution without itself violating its provisions. The fact that the German people, not merely the German State, uphold human rights as the basis of their community must also mean that each and every individual must respect the human rights of others. Similarly, given that the state has to protect human dignity, from which all, specific human rights flow, no public authority could endorse any practice that violated human dignity. The same is true of agreements between private parties; as human rights are inalienable, they must not be abrogated by contract.

These conclusions are not, however, limited to Article 3 (3) GG and the principle of equal pay for equal work. Every single human right protected by the Constitution has to be scrutinised with a view to determining whether it is directed exclusively against the state. This would certainly be the case where incursions by private parties are inconceivable. For instance, individuals can neither grant nor withdraw citizenship, retention of which is protected under Article 16 (1) GG. Where, on the other hand, this is not the case but, on the contrary, freedom needs protection against wider societal forces, the basic rights have to inform private law relationships as well.

4. Lüth accepts that even in such cases the dispute “remains substantially and procedurally a dispute of civil law” (BVerfGE 7, 198, 205–6). What, then, is the precise role of the Constitutional Court? The answer is not, apparently, entirely clear. According to the Mephisto case (BVerfGE 30, 173, 197) the “evaluative” process of the competing interests was to be left to the civil law judges, with the Constitutional Court retaining the right to intervene only if the civil law decision was based on a fundamental misconception of the basic rights and their radiating effect. In some subsequent decisions, however, the Constitutional Court has permitted itself greater latitude for review, especially whenever there was a “serious” invasion of a basic right. See the Deutschland-Magazin case (BVerfGE 42, 143) where the civil court’s decision was not disturbed and the Echter-nach decision (BVerfGE 42, 163) where the State Court decision was reversed. As the court put it (ibid. 168), “The more a civil court’s decision infringes the predicates of free existence and action that are protected by a basic right, the more searching must be the Constitutional Court’s investigation to determine whether the infringement is constitutionally justified.” (Translation by P Quint, op. cit., 322.) Such a willingness to “intervene” has been manifested in “speech cases” with the result that this interest has received growing protection during the last thirty years or so. These and subsequent important decisions (notably in the Böll case (BVerfGE 54, 208) and the Wallraff case (BVerfGE 66, 131),) Strauss Placard case (BVerfGE 82, 43 (1990)) and Soldiers are Murderers case (BVerfGE 93, 266 (1995)), are discussed in Markesinis, “Privacy, Freedom of Speech and the Horizontality of the Human Rights Bill” 1998 Wilberforce Lecture, 115 (1999) LQR pp. 47–88.

5. Lüth, still regarded as the leading case, can be compared with NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 US 886 (1982). Note, however, that the careful evaluative process advocated by Lüth (and also found in the Lebach case) is absent from Claiborne. This preference for ad hoc balancing techniques has not, on the whole, found much favour with American courts in first amendment disputes. Thus, in Konigsberg v. State Bar, 366 US 36, 61, (1961), Mr Justice Black said: “I believe that the First Amendment’s unequivocal command that there shall be no abridgement of the rights of free speech and assembly shows that the men who drafted our Bill of Rights did all the ‘balancing’ that was to be done in this field . . .”. What are the merits and demerits of these differing approaches? What other differences with US law do these German decisions reveal? Consider, for example, the following remarks made by Professor Quint in his thoughtful comparative study, op. cit. 247, 273–5 (notes omitted):

[A comparative] examination . . . indicates that the force of the American Constitution in disputes between individuals is in some instances weaker and in some instances stronger than the effect of the German Basic Law under the doctrine of the Lüth case. In those actions between individuals in which state action is found to exist, the United States Constitution supersedes the “private law”. In contrast, in German cases involving disputes between individuals, the Basic Law only “influences” the rules of private law. The values of private law remain present in the balance and must be accommodated. Moreover . . . the fact that the action remains a private law action may have a significant limiting effect on the scope of the Constitutional Court’s review. In these respects, therefore, the impact of the Basic Law on disputes between individuals appears weaker than the impact of the American Constitution in those disputes in which state action would be found under American doctrine.

In contrast, in those private disputes in which state action does not exist under American doctrine, the impact of the German Basic Law becomes stronger than that of the United States Constitution. Where there is no state action in American law, the United States Constitution ordinarily has no effect at all (or, if there is any indirect constitutionalisation, it takes place through different concepts or doctrines). Under American doctrine, therefore, if there is state action, constitutional rights theoretically apply with full vigour; if there is no state action, there are no constitutional rights. Under the German Basic Law, however, the fact that a certain dispute of private law lies beyond where the state action would be drawn under the United States Constitution has no particular meaning. The rules of private law are still “influenced” by the basic rights of the Constitution. Thus the German Constitution continues to have an impact in cases in which no state action would be found under American law. This difference between German and American doctrine is perhaps most notable in the area of contractual relations—particularly private employment contracts—in which the United States Constitution generally has no impact (or, as stated, has so in an indirect, even invisible manner). In these cases the German Basic Law can have some force. A decision of the Federal Labour Court of 1984 offers an excellent illustration. (BArbGE 47, 363 (1984)) In that case a printer working in a private concern refused to take part in the printing of a book which, in his view, glorified war. Though his action was motivated by deeply held beliefs he was dismissed by his employers and sued for reinstatement. The Labour court took the view that the case raised serious issues relating to Article 2 of the Constitution, which guarantees freedom of conscience. This constitutional provision, for the reasons already noted in the area of free speech, exerts an influence on private law which meant that the “reasonableness” of the employer’s action had to be tested against the wider constitutional background. The court thus resorted to the by now familiar test of balancing. It took the view that the employee's views were deeply held and the book in question did, indeed, glorify war. More importantly, the Court held that the employer had over-reacted by dismissing the employee instead of assigning another employee to perform the said task. The Court thus came down in favour of the (dismissed) employee. Though the decision is interesting in that it used the Lüth reasoning (and not the direct effect reasoning of Nipperdey), in its results it is consistent with a long line of cases, which have used the Constitution to affect private law arrangements. Thus, in BARbGE 1, 185 (1954) condemned the firing of a (private) employee because his employer disagreed with the former's political statements. BARbGE 4, 274 (1957) invalidated a contractual provision which allowed the employer to dismiss his employee if and when the latter married. Thus, the "influence" of the German Constitution on the norms of private law may in some circumstances, lead to something that looks very much like the judicial creation of a constitutional tort action by one private person against another private person to redress a constitutional violation. With respect to the right of free speech, this result was first suggested by the Blinkfüer case, a decision that resembles Lüth in certain important respects [BVerfGE 25, 256].

However, note that American law may, at times, be achieving Drittwirkung results via different concepts. On this suggestion, see Markesinis, "Our Debt to Europe: Past, Present and Future" in The Coming Together of the Common Law and the Civil Law, The Clifford Chance Millennium Lectures, (2000) pp. 37–66 where cases such as BARbGE 1, 185 are compared to factual American equivalents such as Novosel v. Nationwide Insurance Company, 721 F. 2d 894 (1983).

6. The Lüth and Mephisto cases give some indication of how this balancing act is carried out. The first case deals with speech which may affect—indeed aims at affecting—another person's economic interests; the second involves reputation. There is a third category of cases which deals with internal security, treason, and sedition in relation to free speech. This is exemplified by the Spiegel seizure case of 5 August 1966 (BVerfGE 20, 162). Cases like this, as well as decisions banning extreme political parties, e.g. the neo-Nazi party (BVerfGE 2, 1) or the Communist party (BVerfGE 5, 85) invite comparison with Anglo-American law. Many could be taken to suggest that the suppression of extreme political activity, even in the absence of "imminent lawless action" (cf. Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 447 (1969)), may be the result of the German experience in the 1930s. Clearly, at first sight German law appears to be less tolerant than American law; but, it must be stressed again, the decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court must always be seen against the background of the German experience between the two Wars and Article 21 II of the Constitution of 1949, which enables the banning of political parties which aim at abolishing the existing liberal-democratic order. Lack of space makes the further examination of this topic impossible.

7. Lüth (case 36), as stated, was a case dealing with an invitation to boycott films made by a former Nazi sympathiser. Lüth won, and in the balancing process the "purity" of his motives (the wish to protect the cultural interests of the community rather than to make money for himself) seemed to have weighed heavily in his favour. In other instances, however, where excessive economic pressure was applied and monetary gain was at stake, the courts, though following the Lüth dictate that the relevant interests should be balanced, in the end showed less favour for free speech. The Blinkfüer case of 26 February 1969 (BVerfGE 25, 256) is a case in point where the Axel Springer Publishing House tried to stop news dealers from handling a left-wing periodical by threatening to stop supplying them their papers if they continued to handle the periodical in question. The action for damages by the owners of the periodical—desisted on grounds that it impinged on Springer's freedom of expression—failed in the civil courts but succeeded in the Constitutional Court for the reasons indicated above. Other cases, dealing with boycotts and illustrating the courts' balancing process, include BGH NJW 1985, 1620 = JZ 1985, 587; BGH NJW 1984, 1956.

8. The Mephisto case (case 37) is different, dealing with protection of reputation and the clash this can provoke with free speech. Like other cases, e.g. the Schmid-Spiegel decision of 25 January 1961 (BVerfGE 12, 113), it contrasts sharply with cases like New York Times Co. v.

Sullivan, 376 US 254 (1964). Before the reader draws any adverse comparative conclusions, however, he should bear in mind the more detailed, complicated, and inter-related provisions of the German Constitution.

Freedom of expression is limited by Article 5 II of the Constitution by the “provisions of the general laws”—in practice §§ 185–7 of the Criminal Code which deal with the crimes of insult and defamation. But it may also be limited by other constitutional provisions e.g. Article 1 (protecting the inviolable dignity of human beings) and Article 2 (protecting the free development of personality). Lüth required the courts to balance freedom of expression and personal reputation given the facts of each case. In Mephisto the Constitutional Court is balancing two different constitutional freedoms and by a narrow majority came down in favour of human dignity enshrined in Article 1 of the Constitution—a protection that endures even after death. (In another important case involving the well-known writer Heinrich Böll (BVerfGE 54, 208) the action was based on both Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitution. See, also, JZ 1990, 37—a case concerning the painter Emil Nolde. For a further discussion of Mephisto in English see, Markesinis, “Privacy, Freedom of Speech and the Horizontality of the Human Rights Bill” 1998 Wilberforce Lecture, 115 (1999) LQR, pp. 47–88.)

9. These cases and the Privacy decisions reproduced in the next section, require frequent references to the human rights provisions of the Constitution, so the reader must read the cases that follow in conjunction with the relevant articles of the Constitution which were reproduced in chapter one, above. (The translations are by the Press and Information Office of the Federal Government in Bonn and were kindly supplied by the Cultural Office of the German Embassy in London.) Teachers should also set them in their proper historical context in which the ghosts of the Nazi period, combined with the cold-war climate of the 1950s and 1960s, provided an environment which Anglo-American scholars may often find difficult to appreciate. Thus the Lüth controversy was provoked by Veit Harlan’s record as a film director during the Nazi era. One of his films in particular, apparently produced under the general overview of Josef Goebbels (the propaganda minister of the Third Reich), was so violently anti-Jewish that its circulation was, in the post-war era, treated as a criminal offence. Such a record led another post-war criminal court to find Harlan guilty of crimes against humanity, though in the end he was acquitted on the ground that he was acting under “duress”. He was also classified as “exonerated” in the de-Nazification proceedings and, after a brief interlude, attempted to re-enter the cinema world with the (politically innocuous) film that provoked the present litigation. The facts of the Mephisto novel, written by Klaus Mann, son of the well-known author Thomas Mann, are given in the judgment. But the character in the novel was largely modelled on Gustaf Gründgens (an actor and, ultimately, director of the Prussian State Theatre) who was a protégé of Hermann Göring. Gründgens, along with many others (including some eminent academics) who collaborated, benefited, or willingly tolerated the Nazi regime survived, often completely unaffected, into the post-war era. Gründgens, in fact, died naturally in 1963 whereas Klaus Mann committed suicide in 1949. Interesting historical background can be found in: K Mann, Der Wendepunkt: Ein Lebensbericht (1981).

12. PERSONALITY AND PRIVACY RIGHTS

Case 39

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (FIRST CIVIL SENATE) 25 MAY 1954
BGHZ 13, 334 = NJW 1954, 1404 = JZ 1954, 698
(with an approving note by Helmut Coing)

The D Company published on 29 June 1952 in its weekly journal . . . an article by KB with the title “Dr HS & Co.” and the sub-title “Political considerations concerning the foundation of a new bank”. The article contained a comment concerning the new Bank for Foreign Trade founded by Dr S in H, and expressed itself in that connection in opposition to Dr S's political activity during the national-socialist regime and the years after the war.

On the instructions of Dr S the plaintiff, an attorney, sent to the defendant company a letter of 4 July 1952, saying, inter alia:

I represent the interests of Dr S. In terms of § 11 of the Press Act I hereby require the following correction of the above-mentioned article in your issue of Sunday the 6th instant:

1. It is incorrect that . . .
2. . . .

This claim for correction is made under the Press Act, in combination with the BGB, and also the law of copyright.

I ask you to inform me by telephone or in writing on or before midday Saturday 5 July 1952, of your confirmation of the unrestricted execution of the required correction, failing which legal proceedings will be taken.

The defendant company gave the plaintiff no answer. But in the issue of 6 July it published, along with sundry expressions of opinion by readers on KB's article, the following under the heading “Letters from Readers”.

Dr HS & Co.

To the . . . [name of journal]

I represent the interests of Dr HS

1. It is incorrect . . .
2. . . .
Dr M, Attorney

In the contents of 1 there was no reproduction of or extracts from the appropriate Nuremberg judgment concerning Dr S which the plaintiff had introduced in his letter of 4 July 1952. Otherwise they were unaltered.

The plaintiff sees in this kind of publication an injury to his right of personality. The publication of his letter, written in his capacity of attorney for Dr S, under the heading "Letters from Readers" and with its contents falsified by the omissions and the choice of title, constitutes a deliberate misleading of the public. The incorrect impression was thus created that this was a mere expression of opinion by a reader on the previous article on Dr S, as was the case with other readers' letters printed under the same rubric. The plaintiff, however, had kept clear of taking any political attitude and had acted only as an attorney within the scope of his instructions. From a professional standpoint alone the conduct of the defendant company was intolerable. An attorney must be able to ensure that demands for correction made in his client's name must not be circulated in a misleading manner.

The plaintiff demanded that the defendant company be ordered to recall in its next issue under "Letters from Readers" its statement that the plaintiff had sent a reader's letter to the defendant company in the matter of "Dr HS & Co."

The defendant company takes the view that it was not bound to agree to the plaintiff's demand for a correction, because his letter did not conform to the requirements set out in § 11 of the Press Act. It lay therefore within its discretion whether and at what place in its journal to print the communication.

The Landgericht granted the claim under § 823 II BGB, in combination with §§ 186, 187 StGB. The Oberlandesgericht rejected the claim. According to the Court of Appeal's opinion there was, in the abbreviated publication of the plaintiff's letter under the rubric "Letters from Readers", no lawful disparagement of the plaintiff. The method of this publication certainly contained an incorrect statement of fact. The incorrect statement that the plaintiff had sent a reader's letter to the defendant company was, however, not apt to injure his credit, nor to bring him into contempt or lower his dignity in public opinion.

The appeal led to a restoration of the Landgericht's judgment for these

Reasons

The Court of Appeal was in error in failing to examine whether the plaintiff's claim was justified on the basis of a disparagement of his personality rights. It dismissed the action only because it did not consider as proved the objective presuppositions (elements) of a delict in the sense of §§ 823 II, 824 BGB in combination with §§ 186, 187 StGB. This objection is rightly made in the appeal.

It can be left undecided whether the plaintiff's letter of 4 July 1952 was a written work in the sense of § 1 of the Copyright Act and hence fell within the protection of copyright. The Reichsgericht has, indeed, constantly made the protection of correspondence to depend on whether it showed the individual form required for the protection of copyright (RGZ 41, 43 [48]; 69, 401 [403]). On the other hand it has been rightly pointed out in the academic literature that a need for the recognition of a personality right in respect of the use of one's own notes exists equally even when that protection cannot be derived from the personality right of the author, on the ground that they do not possess the form given by an individual intellectual activity . . . The Reichsgericht believed that it must deny such a protection of personality independent of copyright to publications of correspondence because the German law then in force contained no positive statutory provisions on a general personality right (RGZ 79, 397 [398]; 82, 333 [334]; 94, 1; 102, 134; 107, 277 [281]; 113, 414; 123, 312 [320]). It has indeed, in many decisions on § 823 BGB, approved of the protection of personality rights (RGZ 72, 175; 85, 343; 115, 416; 162, 7), but in principle it has recognised personality rights with an absolute power of exclusion only for certain specified personality interests. In the literature, Gierke and Kohler had already pleaded for the recognition of a comprehensive personality right . . .

Moreover, now that the Basic Law [Constitution of 1949] has recognised the right of a human being to have his dignity respected (Article 1), and also the right to free development of his personality as a private right, to be universally respected in so far as it does not infringe another person's right or is not in conflict with the constitutional order or morality (Article 2), the general personality right must be regarded as a constitutionally guaranteed fundamental right.

No further discussion is needed here of whether and how far the protection of this general personality right, the limitation of which requires a balancing of interests, is restricted in particular cases by justified private or public needs, which outweigh the interest in the inviolability of the exclusive sphere of personality; for in this present case it is not evident that the defendant company has any interests worth protecting, which it could use to justify the conduct objected to by the plaintiff. On the contrary, by the defendant company's choice of a way of publishing the request for correction, omitting essential parts of the letter, interests of the plaintiff in the nature of personality rights have been infringed.

Every verbal expression of a definite thought is an emanation from the author's personality, even when the protection of copyright cannot be attributed to its form. It follows that in principle only the author is entitled to decide whether and in what form his notes are communicated to the public; for every publication of the notes of a living person under his name is rightly regarded by the public as proceeding from a corresponding direction of his will. The nature of the notes and the method of their communication is subject to the criticism and valuation of public opinion, which draws conclusions from those circumstances about the author's personality. While an unauthorised publication of private notes constitutes—as a rule—an inadmissible attack on every human being's protected sphere of secrecy, a modified reproduction infringes the personality rights of the author because such unauthorised alterations can spread a false picture of his personality. In general, not only unauthorised omissions of essential parts of the author's notes are inadmissible, but also additions through which his notes presented for publication only for certain purposes acquire a different colour or tendency from what he expressed in the form chosen by him and the kind of publication he had allowed.

In so far as they concern works protected by copyright, those legal principles have long been inferred by the courts from the creator's enjoyment of the personality right of an author, which is only a particular phenomenon of the general personality right (RGZ 69, 242 [244]; 79, 397 [399]; 151, 50). As regards the protection of personality the interest of the author in notes which are protected by copyright is essentially the same.

In the present case the plaintiff had unambiguously sent to the defendant company only a demand for correction and, indeed, in his character as attorney for Dr S. Thereby the defendant company was only empowered by the plaintiff either to publish the text in an unshortened form or, restricting itself to the required correction, to make clear that there had been a demand for correction. Since the plaintiff does not ask for his original desire for correction to be carried out, it is unnecessary for the purpose of this decision to consider whether his letter of 4 July 1952 conformed to the conditions of the Press Act. If, in agreement with the Court of Appeal, this had to be denied, the only consequence would be that the defendant company had a right to refuse altogether to publish the letter. But it was not entitled to publish it under the rubric "Letters from Readers" and, moreover with the omission of the passages that would clearly show that the plaintiff was not putting forward his personal opinion in favour of Dr S but wished to obtain a correction under the Press law.

The Landgericht's decision is to be approved, that this mode of publication—and also the placing of the correction side by side with five other letters on the article on Dr S published by the defendant company—was bound to produce the impression on an impartial reader that the plaintiff's letter gave his personal attitude to the controversy about Dr S. That misleading impression was also not dispelled by the literal reproduction of the plaintiff's introductory sentence; for that sentence, in its generally accepted character, told the reader only that the sender was Dr S's attorney. It did not make sufficiently clear that the content also of the letter in question referred to his instructions as attorney and that it had been composed by him not as a private person but in the exercise of his profession.

Accordingly the Court of Appeal was not in error in holding that the publication of the letter of corrections in shortened form under the rubric "Letters from Readers" contained an untrue statement of facts. This also means that through the mode of publishing it, the letter acquired a meaning not in conformity with its original composition and that this form of publication did not correspond to what the plaintiff had alone given permission for, namely broadcasting to the public the letter of correction in the form he had chosen.

The Landgericht was right in regarding the publication complained of, which according to its findings had become known to an extraordinarily wide circle of persons, as a continuing disparagement and therefore that the demand for revocation was justified.

Case 40

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (FIRST CIVIL SENATE) 14 FEBRUARY 1958 BGHZ 26, 349 = NJW 58, 827 (with a partially approving and partially critical note by Larenz = JZ 1958, 571 and an approving article by H Coing in JZ 1958, 558)

The plaintiff is co-owner of a brewery in X. He is active as a gentleman show-jumper ("Herrenreiter"). The defendant Limited Partnership is the manufacturer of a pharmaceutical preparation which is widely reputed as being able to increase sexual potency. To advertise this preparation in the Federal Republic, and in particular in K, it disseminated a poster with the picture of a show-jumper. Its basis was an original photograph of the plaintiff, which had been taken by a press agency at a show-jumping competition. The plaintiff had not given permission for the use of his portrait.

The plaintiff claimed damages from the defendant for the damage which he suffered as a result of the dissemination of the poster. He alleged that in the given circumstances he could only claim as damages what he would have obtained if he had allowed the defendant to use his portrait. As his professional and social position did not allow him, and his financial means did not compel him, to dispose of his portrait for advertising purposes, and in particular for the defendant's preparation, he would have done this, if at all, only for a fair price, at a rough estimate DM 15,000 at the very least.

The plaintiff applied for an order that the defendant pay by way of damages a fair sum to be fixed by the court.

The defendant denied any fault and pleaded that, after touching up, the plaintiff's features were not recognisable in the poster; and that it had not itself designed or produced the poster nor obtained the portrait from S, but had ordered it from the H advertising agency, which it had trusted as a respectable, competent, and reliable firm, not to injure the rights of third persons. The defendant could not have known that the poster had been designed on the basis of a photograph, or that the photograph showed a "gentleman" rider. Only as the case developed did it discover that it really concerned a portrait of the plaintiff. Thereupon it prohibited without delay any further use of the advertisement.

The Landgericht ordered the defendant to pay DM 1,000 to the plaintiff by way of damages. The Oberlandesgericht ordered the defendant to pay DM 10,000 to the plaintiff. The defendant's further appeal was unsuccessful for these

Reasons

I. The Court of Appeal, in agreement with the Landgericht, found that the depiction of the rider in the poster allowed the plaintiff's person to be recognised despite the retouching. It rightly concluded that the dissemination of the poster without the plaintiff's permission injured his personality rights, namely his right to deal with his portrait, and that the defendant must compensate him under § 823 II BGB in combination with § 2 of the Act on Artistic Creations, if it was found to blame (cf. RG JW 1929, 2257, BGHZ 20, 345, 347 ff.). The Court of Appeal came to that conclusion seeing that the defendant had not observed the care required in the circumstances, since it had obtained in the course of its business the poster prepared by the H advertising agency without making certain that the person depicted had agreed to the intended use of his portrait.

The appellant's attacks on these findings must fail [further discussion not reproduced].

II. In awarding compensation to the plaintiff the Court of Appeal had in mind the licence fee which he could have demanded if a suitable contract had been arrived at between the parties. It held that it was justified in applying a method of assessing damages developed for breaches of copyright, because it was hard for the plaintiff to show whether and to what degree there had been any pecuniary loss. In contrast to the Landgericht, which had thought DM 1,000 to be sufficient, the Court of Appeal decided that DM 10,000 was the more appropriate figure.

Although the appeal is unsuccessful in the result, it must be conceded that the Court of Appeal's reasoning is not entirely appropriate to the peculiar facts of the case.

1. The appellant does not dispute that, even where there is an injury to the personality right to one's portrait, the damage can be estimated according to the payment that would presumably have been arranged if there had been a contract. Nevertheless the appellant argued that this method of assessing damages, which the Senate in its judgment of 8 May 1956 (BGHZ 20, 345 ff.—Dahlke) declared admissible for the unauthorised publication of a portrait, could not be used if it was established that the person portrayed would, for special reasons, never have allowed his portrait to be used for advertising purposes.

If in the case under appeal pecuniary damage had actually been in question, this attack would not have been well founded. For according to settled case-law and academic opinion, where a claim to an appropriate compensation, is recognised, it is not a question of applying the general provisions of the law of damages but of its customary supplementation to make good injury to valuable exclusive rights, based on the equitable consideration that the defendant should not be better off than he would have been if his application for permission had been granted. The claim to appropriate compensation is therefore granted in all cases of unpermitted invasion of exclusive rights where permission is usually made dependent on payment and where, having regard to the kind of the right which has been violated, the invasion is habitually allowed according to the customs of daily life only—if at all—against compensation (BGHZ 20, 345, 353 ff.). It is not at all necessary for a contract actually to have come into existence if the invader's conduct was otherwise unobjectionable.

2. It must, however, be agreed that the Court of Appeal, by the method of assessment it chose, did not really try to work out the economic loss to the plaintiff, but rather to adjust the satisfaction due to him to his non-material disparagement. In particular the reasoning by which it arrived at the amount of the damage to the plaintiff shows that according to its opinion also he did not suffer any tangible pecuniary loss. In truth he claims not compensation for a non-existent pecuniary loss but an appreciable satisfaction for an unlawful attack on his personality protected by § 22 of the Act on Artistic Creations and Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitution. He demands satisfaction for the fact that a widely disseminated poster, by making him, one might almost say, “ride” for the purpose of advertising the defendant's tonic—and a sexual one at that—humiliated him and made him an object of ridicule. In such a situation it is absurd to award damages on the basis of a fictitious licence agreement. This way of estimating damage is appropriate only if one can start with the doing of some kind of pecuniary damage and all that is left is to alleviate the often difficult task of proving its amount. It fails if no pecuniary prejudice at all is in question. It fails also in the present case because it would assume that the plaintiff had done something that not only he, but all others of the same professional and social standing, must consider harmful and as a continuing degradation of his personality. It must convey an imputation that the plaintiff would, after all, voluntarily and for a large sum of money place himself in the unworthy position against which he is defending himself.

The plaintiff's claim therefore cannot be supported by the Court of Appeal's chosen method of assessment, helped out by the fiction of a loss of licence fee.

3. Moreover, basing the claim on unjustified enrichment is precluded because the plaintiff did not experience any pecuniary disadvantage and there is thus no pecuniary shift of the kind envisaged by §§ 812 ff. BGB.

4. If, therefore, the kind of assessment adopted by the Court of Appeal fails, and it is shown that the plaintiff in truth suffered no pecuniary damage, the decisive question comes to be whether he can demand compensation for the immaterial damage which he has suffered as a result of the invasion of his personality following the appearance of his picture in the advertisement. On the facts before it the Senate answers that question in the affirmative.

This Senate has already said in its decision in BGHZ 13, 334, 338 that the sacredness of human dignity and the right to free development of the personality protected by Article 1 of the Constitution are also to be recognised as a civil right to be respected by everyone in daily life, in so far as that right does not impinge upon the rights of others and is not repugnant to constitutional order or the moral law. This so-called general right to one's personality also possesses legal validity within the framework of the civil law and enjoys the protection of § 823 I BGB under the designation of “other right” (cf. also BGHZ 24, 12 ff.).

Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitution protect—and indeed must be applied by the courts in the administration of justice—what is called the concept of human personality; they recognise in it one of the supra-legal basic values of the law. Thereby they are directly concerned with the protection of the inner realm of the personality which, in principle, only affords a basis for the free and responsible self-determination of the individual and an infringement of which produces primarily so-called immaterial damage, damage expressed in a degradation of the personality. To respect this inner realm and to refrain from invading it without authorisation is a legal command issuing from the Basic Law itself. And it follows from the Constitution that in cases of invasion of this sphere, protection must be given against damage characteristic of such an invasion.

On the limited field of portrait protection this was established in 1907 by the special rules contained in §§ 22 ff. of the Act on Artistic Creations, long before the Constitution came into force and at a time when the civil law did not as yet protect a general personality right. For the protection afforded by § 22, according to which portraits may be distributed or shown publicly only with the subject’s consent, rests in essence on the fundamental principle of a person’s freedom in his highly personal private life, in which the outward appearance of human being plays an essential part. The unauthorised publication of a portrait constitutes, as has long been recognised in legal literature, an attack on the freedom of self-determination and the free expression of the personality. The reason why a third person’s arbitrary publication of a portrait is not allowed is that the person portrayed is thereby deprived of his freedom to dispose by his own decision of this interest in his individual sphere.

Once the violation of the right to one’s picture is seen as affecting one’s personality it is possible to seek an answer to the question how to compensate immaterial damage in § 847 BGB. This allows an equitable compensation in money for non-pecuniary loss in cases of “deprivation of liberty”. It is true that deprivation of liberty is here understood to mean deprivation of freedom of bodily movement, as well as compulsion to act, by means of force or threats, whereas § 22 of the Act on Artistic Creations deals with deprivation of the free and responsible exercise of will. Already, however, before the Basic Law came into force, the opinion was often expressed that any attack on the undisturbed exercise of the will was to be regarded as an injury to freedom in the sense of § 847 BGB. Now that the Constitution guarantees a comprehensive protection to the personality and recognises human dignity and the right to free development of the personality as a fundamental value, it has done away with the dogma held by the original draftsmen of the BGB that there can be no civil law protection of general personality right; and since a protection of “inner freedom” without a right to compensation for immaterial damage would be in great part illusory, it would be intolerable to refuse compensation for that immaterial damage. Moreover, there is no obvious reason why § 847 BGB should not be extended by analogy to such attacks as injure the right to free exercise of the will, especially where that deprivation of intellectual liberty, just like deprivation of bodily freedom, renders natural restitution impossible. Where such blameworthy depreciations of the personality right are in question, the effective legal protection offered by the Constitution can, in the absence of any special legal provision, be attained only through its inclusion in the injuries mentioned in § 847 BGB, since their injurious consequences are of necessity primarily immaterial.

This view is not at variance with the sense of § 35 of the Act on Artistic Creations. Of course the injured party can claim under it a penalty for the injury to his right to his portrait, and with it to have his immaterial loss made good, only in criminal proceedings and on condition that the injury was intended; but that special provision shows only that as early as 1907 the legislator regarded an infringement of § 22 as so far-reaching and threatening that it was considered necessary to grant expressly to the injured party a claim to compensation for the disparagement. The restriction of the criminal law claim for a penalty to intentional injuries accords with the legislator's limitation of the threat of punishment for an infringement of § 22 to intentional interference. However, that does not mean that the same must apply to the civil law claims to compensation that are not regulated in the Act on Artistic Creations. On the contrary, since the Constitution now recognizes the general personality right as significant for civil law and has afforded a general civil law protection appreciably exceeding the narrow regulation of § 35 of the Act on Artistic Creations, the special provision of § 35 can no longer be cited in opposition to a more extensive civil law protection of the right to one's portrait. The general provisions of the BGB concerning delicts come into operation instead. That means that, at any rate since the Constitution came into force, by an analogous application of § 847 BGB, any blameworthy injury to the right to one's own portrait involves a duty to make good immaterial damage also.

In so far as the Senate, following the case-law of the Reichsgericht, decided in the Dahlke case (BGHZ 20, 345, 352 ff.) that immaterial damage cannot give rise to a money claim in the absence of express legal provision, its opinion cannot be upheld in the light of the foregoing discussions. The statement was obiter, since the facts disclosed pecuniary damage, which could be estimated on the basis of the usual licence fee.

III. The compensation to be paid to the plaintiff was fixed by the Court of Appeal at DM 10,000. Although starting from a possible assessment according to the satisfaction that might have been paid in a case of contract on the usual terms, the court's arguments fully apply also to fixing the amount of an equitable compensation under § 847 BGB. They also show that the court really awarded the plaintiff compensation for the immaterial damage that had resulted.

As the Grosse Zivilsenat explained in its decision of 6 July 1955 (BGHZ 18, 149), the claim for damages for pain and suffering offers the injured party an appropriate compensation for the depreciation of life (or personality) which is not of a pecuniary kind. But it also takes account of the notion that the doer of damage owes the injured party satisfaction for what he has done to him. It was emphasised in the decision that "satisfaction", which forms an integral part of the award for compensation for immaterial damage, must take into account all the relevant circumstances. This Senate adheres to this view in this present case. If one therefore moves on from that position, it follows that the Court of Appeal was not in error in taking all the relevant circumstances into account in fixing the amount of damages. In particular, that court explained that the fact that the plaintiff had never been ready to take part in any advertising must be a factor in deciding the amount to be paid. It considered it especially serious that the advertisement was for an aphrodisiac, and so was not to be compared with advertisements for other products. The court was right in taking the view that persons would be unlikely to allow their likeness to be used on a poster for this purpose and so run a risk of being recognised by a wider or narrower public, exposing themselves to the innuendos to which the defendant's preparation would give rise. The Court of Appeal also took the plaintiff's social and business position into account, pointing to the fact that he moved in a social circle the members of which were for the most part known to each other and where the risk of making oneself an object to ridicule was especially great. When, after considering and giving weight to all these special circumstances relevant to amount of damages for pain and suffering, the Court of Appeal regarded the sum of DM 10,000 as appropriate compensation (§ 287 ZPO), it cannot be found to have acted contrary to law.

Case 41

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 19 SEPTEMBER 1961
BGHZ 35, 363 = NJW 1961, 2059 (with approving notes by W Rötelmann = NJW 1962, 736 and H Hubmann = VersR 1962, 350, 562)

The plaintiff is a professor in the law faculty of the University of G at which he holds a chair of international and ecclesiastical law. From a stay in Korea he had brought with him a ginseng root, which he placed at the disposal of his friend Professor H, a pharmacologist, for research. The latter mentioned in a scientific article on ginseng roots that he had come into possession of genuine Korean ginseng roots “through the kind assistance” of the plaintiff. This led to the plaintiff being described in a popular scientific article, which appeared in the year 1957 in the H and W journal, along with Professor H and other scientists, as one of the best-known ginseng researchers of Europe.

The defendant company dealt in a tonic containing ginseng. In its advertisement for this tonic the plaintiff was referred to as an important scientist expressing an opinion on its value, and in an editorial note, printed in immediate connection with an advertisement in another journal, allusion was made to its use as an aphrodisiac. Both the advertisement and the journal were very widely distributed.

The plaintiff claimed that he had suffered an unauthorised attack on his personality right; and that the advertisement gave rise to the impression that he had, for payment, issued an opinion on a controversial topic in a department of knowledge not his own, and unprofessionally lent his name to advertising a doubtful product. He had suffered damage to his reputation as a learned man and been made an object of ridicule to the public and above all to his students. In reliance on BGHZ 26, 349 (Herrenreiter) he claimed DM 10,000 as satisfaction for the harm done to him.

The Landgericht awarded him DM 8,000 as damages for pain and suffering. The appeals to both the Court of Appeal and the Bundesgerichtshof were unsuccessful for these.

Reasons

1. By invoking the plaintiff’s scientific authority in its advertising to encourage belief in the effectiveness of its preparation for the mentioned purposes, the defendant company unlawfully disparaged his personality right (§ 823 I BGB). The reference to researches by the plaintiff, which lacked any objective foundation, was in the circumstances calculated to make him an object of ridicule in society and lessen his scholarly reputation. Moreover, he was bound to feel outraged by the way his name was used in advertising a preparation recommended as a sexual stimulant. The defendant company’s conduct was also blameworthy. Before using the plaintiff’s name for its advertisement it ought to have sought his agreement or at least to have ascertained whether and where he had stated what was asserted in its advertisement. The information in a popular article in the

H and W journal ought in no way to have been adopted unseen; it was moreover substantially altered. The Court of Appeal rightly characterised the defendant's conduct as irresponsible. Likewise approval must also be given to the Court of Appeal's finding that the defendant company was also responsible for the note in the M journal which adopted in somewhat modified form the contents of the advertisement. Even if it was the advertising agency employed by the defendant company that caused the note to appear, the information contained in it depended on material supplied by the defendant company. At the very least, the defendant company had not supervised the advertising agency as was necessary.

2. The senate also agrees with the Court of Appeal's view that the plaintiff has a claim to compensation for immaterial damage. The case is, in its main lines, very similar to those decided by the Bundesgerichtshof and reported in BGHZ 26, 349 (Herrenreiter) and 30, 7. In both cases the way a product was advertised attacked the protected sphere of the personality right of persons who claimed compensation for the unlawful injury. In both the conditions for compensation for material damage were absent or at any rate not proved. If, in the circumstances, no permission to use a name or portrait for advertising purposes is in question, it is not possible to estimate pecuniary compensation on the lines of a licence fee according to the principles governing so-called unilateral acquisition without permission. The First Civil Senate awarded damages for pain and suffering to the plaintiff in the case decided by it and reported in BGHZ 26, 349 and also regarded an award of so-called "immaterial damages", with its function of satisfaction, as the adequate compensation that the law must afford to a plaintiff for the violation of his personality right. From the decision reported in BGHZ 30, 7 it must be taken that the standpoint of the Fourth Civil Senate is at least not at variance with that of the First Civil Senate.

This Senate agrees with the First Civil Senate that satisfaction may be awarded to a person affected by the blameworthy infringement of his personality right. It is indeed stated in § 253 BGB that money compensation can be claimed for non-pecuniary damage only in cases expressly designated by the law. When the BGB established that enumeration principle, the high value of the protection of human personality and its special sphere had not received the recognition that it enjoys according to Articles 1 and 2 I of the Constitution. From the standpoint of the BGB, the protection of property interests always stood in the foreground, whereas the personal worth of a human being received only insufficient and fragmentary protection. In recognising a general personality right of mankind and granting it the protection of § 823 I BGB, the courts drew for civil law purposes the consequences resulting from the rank the Constitution assigned to the worth of human personality and the protection of its free development. That protection, however, would be incomplete and full of loopholes if an infringement of the personality right did not give rise to a sanction adequate to the violation. Just as the restriction of protection by the law of delict to specific legal interests of a human being has proved too narrow to afford the protection of personality required by the Constitution, so a narrowing of immaterial damages, for immaterial loss to cover only injury to specifically mentioned legal interests, no longer conforms to the value-system of the Constitution. For Article 1 declares it to be an urgent obligation on the public power to protect the sacred dignity of the human being. Article 2 I puts the right of a human being to free development of his personality at the head of the fundamental rights. If the law of delict, in protecting the personality right in the non-material realm, retreated completely to a position where it merely protected the particular personality interests mentioned in Article 2 II, which are emanations from the personality right, the civil law would not be paying attention to the value-decision of the Constitution. The elimination of damages for immaterial loss from the protection of personality would mean that injury to the dignity and honour of a human being would remain without any sanction of the civil law, which deals with the disturbance of essential values and makes the doer of injury owe satisfaction to the victim for the wrong done to him. The law would then renounce the strongest and often only instrument calculated to ensure respect for the personal worth of the individual.

3. That does not mean that the legal consequences of injuries to body, health, and freedom on the one hand and the violation of the personality sphere on the other hand must be exactly the same or at least largely correspond to each other. A need for differentiation is already indicated by the fact that the factual aspect of an injury to a general personality right is much less specific than where body, health, or freedom is injured. That means that there are many marginal cases where the question is whether the case is one included in the generalised description of violation of the personality and whether, if it does, the unlawfulness is not excluded by the competing rights of the “offender”, among which the right to free expression of opinion deserves particular attention. It is precisely where a so-called balancing of interest must take place that the limits of what is allowed are not always easy to fix. If for every overstepping of the limits, however petty, compensation for immaterial loss were to be awarded to the person affected, there would be a danger that unimportant injuries would be used inappropriately to make a gain. The purpose of awarding satisfaction would then be stultified. It must further be observed that it is more difficult to apply the general criterion of monetary value to measure immaterial injuries to the personality right than the consequences of bodily injuries. In injuries to the general personality right the satisfaction function of damages for pain and suffering advances into the foreground as that of compensation recedes. Hence it will always be necessary to look at the kind of injury to the personality right to see if the person affected, whose injury cannot otherwise be redressed, should be granted satisfaction for the wrong he has suffered. That will in general only be the case when the doer of damage is blamed for a serious fault or when an injury to a personality right is objectively significant. Only when such disturbances are serious may the civil law, taking seriously the protection of personality and its value as such, react against the injury by granting satisfaction to the person affected. Insignificant injuries do not call for satisfaction. Having regard to the special character of an injury to a personality right Swiss law, which has devoted greater attention than the BGB to legal protection of the personality (cf. Article 49 I of the Swiss Code of Obligations) also restricts damages for immaterial loss to serious cases.

4. The conditions for an award of immaterial damages especially occur when—as in a present case—there is a wanton attack on the personality right of another person out of a desire to increase the force of one’s commercial publicity. Such an unfair attempt to succeed can be effectively countered only if it is burdened with the risk of an appreciable loss, and on the other hand, anyone who seeks to make money out of an unfair invasion of the sphere of another’s personality must not feel hurt if he is forced to pay a money compensation. For the plaintiff the outrage inflicted—in particular since the object was recommended for specific purposes—was not at all insignificant, the more so because he ran the risk of readers assuming that he had lent his name for a money consideration. The award of a money compensation by way of satisfaction was justified by the seriousness of the attack as well as by the seriousness of the fault.

The amount of satisfaction to be given was for the judge of fact to assess. It could be attacked on appeal only if it rested on an incorrect finding of the applicable law or if the judge of fact overlooked essential points of view. No such defects, however, are here apparent. The Court of Appeal did right in attaching importance to the spread of publicity, which extended to Austria and Switzerland. It was also an essential factor in fixing the amount of the satisfaction that the defendant company continued the advertising complained of even after being warned by the plaintiff, thus displaying an especially reckless attitude. On the other hand, the Court of Appeal observed in the defendant company's favour that the mention of the name in the advertisement was not especially prominent, so that it might not have been noticed by the cursory reader.

Case 42

BUNDESVERFASSUNGSGERICHT (FIRST DIVISION) 5 JUNE 1973
BVERFGÉ 35, 202 = NJW 1973, 1227

The petitioner had participated in an armed robbery of an arsenal of the German armed forces in the course of which several soldiers on guard duty were killed or severely wounded. The culprits were arrested after a prolonged search and were convicted. The petitioner was convicted as an accessory and sentenced to six years' imprisonment. A German television station commissioned a documentary play based on the crime, its planning, and detection and the background of the culprits, including the petitioner whose homosexual tendencies were stressed. The play showed a likeness of the petitioner and mentioned him frequently by name. The petitioner who had served two-thirds of his sentence and was soon to be released sought an injunction prohibiting the television company from broadcasting the play pending a decision on the merits of his claim that the play violated his right of personality.

The District Court of Mainz dismissed the action for an injunction on the grounds that the petitioner was "relatively a personality of contemporary history" and could therefore not rely on the right to the protection of his personality. The Court of Appeal of Koblenz [reference] affirmed this decision by weighing the respective interests of an individual to be protected against the unauthorised publication of his likeness in accordance with §§ 22 and 23 of the Act on the Protection of the Copyright in Works of Art and Photographs (henceforth cited as KUG) as a projection of the right to his personality covered by Articles 1 and 2 I, of the Constitution on the one hand and the need for objective pictorial information concerning persons in public life, which is recognised in § 23 KUG and must be interpreted in the freedom to express opinions and the liberty of broadcasting stations to provide information, protected by Article 5 I of the Constitution on the other hand. The Court of Appeal held that in this conflict the right to provide information must prevail, especially since the trial had been concluded. The petitioner was "relatively a personality of contemporary history"; his interest in social reintegration had to give way to the interest of the public in general to receive a truthful account of the facts and the persons involved . . .

The German Federal Constitutional Court quashed the decisions of the two courts below on the ground that Article 2 I in conjunction with Article 1 I of the Constitution had been violated and issued a temporary injunction prohibiting the broadcasting of the play in question to the extent that it mentioned the petitioner by name and reproduced a likeness of him.

Reasons

A. . . .

B. . . .

II. For the present case the Court of Appeal has held correctly that several fundamental rights affect the application of private law and that they lead in opposite directions. The right to one's personality guaranteed by Article 2 I in conjunction with Article 1 I of the Constitution conflicts with the freedom of broadcasting stations to provide information, in accordance with Article 5 I, sentence 2 of the Constitution.

1. On the one hand, a televised broadcast of the kind in issue here concerning the origins, execution, and detection of a crime which mentions the name of the criminal and contains a representation of his likeness necessarily touches the area of his fundamental rights guaranteed by Article 2 I in conjunction with Article 1 I of the Constitution. The right to the free development of one's personality and human dignity safeguard for everyone the sphere of autonomy in which to shape his private life by developing and protecting his individuality. This includes the right "to remain alone", "to be oneself" within this sphere [reference], to exclude the intrusion of or the inspection by others [reference]. This includes the right to one's likeness and to one's utterances [reference] and even more to the right to dispose of pictures of oneself. Everyone has the right in principle to determine himself alone whether and to what extent others may represent in public an account of his life or of certain incidents thereof.

However, according to the constant practice of the Federal Constitutional Court, not the entire sphere of private life enjoys the absolute protection of the above-mentioned fundamental rights [references]. If an individual in his capacity as a citizen living within a community enters into relations with others, influences others by his existence or activity, and thereby impinges upon the personal sphere of other people or upon the interests of communal life, his exclusive right to be master of his own private sphere may become subject to restrictions, unless his sacrosanct innermost sphere of life is concerned. Any such social involvement, if sufficiently strong may, in particular, justify measures of public authorities in the interest of the public as a whole—such as the publication of pictures of a suspect person in order to facilitate a criminal investigation (§ 24 KUG). However, neither the interest of the State to clear up crimes nor any public interest always justifies an infringement of the personal sphere [reference]. Instead, the pre-eminent importance of the right to the free development and respect of personality, which follows from its close connection with the supreme value enshrined in the Constitution, i.e. human dignity, demands that any intrusion of the right of personality which may appear necessary to protect such interest, must always be balanced against the protective rule laid down in Article 2 I in conjunction with Article 1 I of the Constitution. Accordingly, it must be determined in the individual case by weighing the particular interests whether the pursuit of the public interest merits precedence generally and having regard to the features of the individual case, whether the proposed intrusion of the private sphere is required by this interest in this form and extent, and whether it is commensurate with the importance of the case [references].

These principles, which were developed by the courts in respect of measures taken by public authorities, must be observed equally when the courts have to determine conflicting interests on the basis of private law. In the course of such a determination the courts are not precluded from taking into account the special position accorded to the media represented by broadcasting and television by virtue of their organisation regulated by public law and their public functions.

2. In this respect the consideration is decisive, as the Court of Appeal has pointed out correctly, that the broadcast in dispute serves a function, the free exercise of which on its part is directly protected by a provision in the Constitution. Freedom of information by broadcasts in accordance with Article 5 I, second sentence of the Constitution (freedom to broadcast), like the freedom of the press, of expression and information is a basic constituent element of a liberal-democratic order [references] . . .

Only when the exercise of the freedom to broadcast conflicts with other protected legal interests, the purpose of the individual broadcast, the manner of its presentation, and its actual foreseeable effect may become relevant. The Constitution has regulated possible conflicts between the freedom to broadcast and the interests of individual citizens, of groups and of the community as a whole, by referring to the legal system as a whole; according to Article 5 II of the Constitution the emission of broadcasts is subject to the restrictions imposed by the general law. According to the constant practice of the Federal Constitutional Court the need expressed by this provision to take other protected legal interests into account must not render the freedom to broadcast a relative one; instead the laws which restrict the freedom to broadcast must in turn be interpreted in the light of the constitutional guarantee and must, if necessary, be equally restricted in order to ensure that the freedom of broadcasting is safeguarded adequately [reference]. Consequently the opposing protected legal interests must be balanced against each other in each individual case in the light of general and specific considerations.

III. 1. The general laws referred to by Article 5 II of the Constitution include also the provisions of §§ 22, 23 of the Act on the Copyright in Works of Plastic Art and Photography of 9 January 1907 (RGBl. 1907) maintained by § 141 no. 5 of the Copyright Act of 9 September 1956 (BGBl. I 1273), which formed the basis of the judgment in issue before this court. These provisions, the wording and the original purpose of which related originally to the right to one's own likeness, have for a long time been interpreted by the courts and by writers to apply also to reproductions of one's likeness, whether accompanied by the person's name or not, as well as to the representation of a person by an actor on a stage [references]. The general approach to these provisions has changed since the Constitution came into force to the effect that the right to one's likeness is regarded as an aspect, as a special feature of the general right of personality which was derived from Articles 1 and 2 of the Constitution [references].

These provisions are in accordance with constitutional law; their somewhat flexible character gives sufficient scope for applying them in keeping with the Constitution and it has been shown in practice that it is possible, in balancing the interest, as required by § 23 KUG, to take sufficient account of the reflex effect of the relevant fundamental rights. In this context, it is irrelevant from the point of view of constitutional law which factual element of § 23 KUG serves as the balancing factor [references].

2. In cases of conflict, such as the present, the general principle applies, on the one hand, that in applying §§ 22 and 23 KUG to televised broadcasts the freedom to broadcast must not be restricted excessively. On the other hand, as distinct from other general laws in the meaning of Article 5 II of the Constitution, it is a special feature of the present case that the restriction of the freedom to broadcast serves in turn to protect an important concern of the Constitution; the interest of the person affected to prohibit the publication of his likeness or any representation of his person, which must be protected with the framework of § 23 KUG, is directly enhanced by the constitutional guarantee of the protection of personality. In solving this conflict it must be remembered that according to the intention of the Constitution both constitutional concerns are essential aspects of the liberal-democratic order of the Constitution with the result that neither can claim precedence in principle. The view of humanity taken by the Constitution and the corresponding structure of the community within the State require both the respect for the independence of individual personality and the guarantee of a liberal social atmosphere; the latter cannot be realised at the present time unless communications are unimpeded. In case of conflict both concerns of the Constitution must be adjusted, if possible; if this cannot be achieved it must be determined which interest must be postponed having regard to the nature of the case and to any special circumstances. For this purpose, both concerns of the Constitution, centred as they are on human dignity, must be regarded as the nucleus of the system of constitutional concerns. Accordingly, the freedom to broadcast may have the effect of restricting any claims based on the right of personality; however, the damage to “personality” resulting from a public representation must not be out of proportion to the importance of the publication upholding the freedom of communication [reference]. Furthermore it follows from these guiding principles that the required weighting of interests must take into account the intensity of the infringement of the personal sphere by the broadcast on the one hand; on the other hand, the specific interest which is being sensed by the broadcast and is capable of being thus served, must be assessed and examined as to whether and to what extent it can be satisfied even without any interference—or a less far-reaching interference—with the protection of personality.

IV. 1. In the light of these general principles the following criteria are relevant from the point of view of constitutional law in assessing televised broadcasts of the kind in issue here.

(a) A public report of a crime in which the name, a likeness, or a representation of the culprit is provided will always constitute a severe intrusion of his personal sphere, seeing that it publicises his misdeeds and gives from the outset a negative slant to his person in the eyes of those to whom the report is addressed. It may be different if the report is designed to create sympathy for the culprit, as for instance in order to achieve a new trial, a pardon, or some other assistance . . .

(b) Disregarding the possibility of an additional infringement by the manner of the representation (polemics, falsification), even a report which seeks to be objective and factual, if televised constitutes normally a much greater invasion of the private sphere than an oral or written report published in the press or over the radio. This is so, in the first place, because the visual impression and the combination of a picture and word is much stronger, but mainly because television commands a much greater audience than the cinema and the theatre, resulting in a special position. Consequently there is a special reason “for watching over the observation of the limits established by the law and to prevent an abuse [sic] of the right of personality which had become more vulnerable. In this respect the law must not give way to technical developments” [reference].

(c) If for the above-mentioned reasons alone a special need exists for protection against violations of the right of personality by televised broadcasts reaching such a wide audience, it must be remembered that the broadcast performance of a documentary play entails specific dangers . . .

In conclusion it can be stated that television broadcasts reporting on a crime naming, depicting, or representing the culprit, especially in the form of a documentary play, will normally constitute a serious invasion of his sphere of personality.

2. On the other hand weighty considerations suggest that the public should be fully informed of the commission of crimes including the person of the culprit, and of the facts which led to them. Crimes, too, are part of contemporary history, the presentation of which is altogether the task of the media. Moreover the violation of the general legal order, the infringement of protective legal interests of the citizens involved or of the community, sympathy with the victims and their relatives, fear of the repetition of such crimes, and the desire to prevent them create a fully justified interest in receiving detailed information concerning the deed and the criminal. This interest will be all the greater the more the criminal act is unusual having regard to the special features of the object of the attack, the manner in which it was carried out, or the severity of the consequences. Where serious crimes of violence are involved, such as that represented in the play in issue, the interest to receive information is based not only on general curiosity and sensationalism but on serious reasons for asking who were the perpetrators, what were their motives, what was done to detect and to punish them, and for preventing similar crimes. For this purpose the desire to know only the facts will be predominant, but as time passes the interest increases to receive a more searching interpretation of the deed, its background, and its social setting. Not least is the legitimate democratic desire in determining to control the organs of the State and public authorities responsible for security and order, the prosecution and the criminal courts . . .

3. In balancing generally the interest in receiving information as circumscribed above by televised reporting within these limits against the invasion of the sphere of personality of the culprit which must follow inevitably, the interest in receiving information must generally prevail in so far as current reporting of crimes is concerned. He who breaks the peace established by law, attacks or violates by his act and its consequences his fellow citizens or legally protected interests of the community, must not only suffer the criminal punishment provided by the law. He must also accept, as a matter of principle, that the public interest in information caused by himself by his own deed is being satisfied in the usual manner in a community which observes the principle of freedom of communication. Moreover, the control of the prosecution and of the criminal proceedings which is assured thereby also benefits the culprit. However, the interest to receive information does not prevail absolutely. The importance of the right to personality, which is a cornerstone of the Constitution, requires not only that account must be taken of the sacrosanct innermost personal sphere [reference] but also a strict regard for the principle of proportionality. The invasion of the personal sphere is limited to the need to satisfy adequately the interest to receive information, and the disadvantages suffered by the culprit must be proportional to the seriousness of the offence or to its importance otherwise for the public. Consequently, it is not always admissible to provide the name, a picture, or any other means of identifying the perpetrator.

It is obvious that the right of personality is only postponed if the reporting is objective and if the interpretation is serious; it is different if the account seeks to be sensational, is intentionally one-sided or misleading. On the other hand, objective reporting of a serious crime justifies not only the publication of the name or of a likeness of the perpetrator; it also includes his personal life in so far as it is directly connected with the act, provides clues about his motive or the setting, and seems relevant for assessing the guilt of the perpetrator in the light of modern criminal law. The actual question as to where the limits are to be drawn in fact seeing that in principle the interest to receive information by reports of contemporary events must prevail, can only be answered having regard to the circumstances of the individual case.

4. The reflex effect of the constitutional guarantee of personality does not, however, allow the media of communication, apart from contemporary reporting, to deal indefinitely with the person of the criminal and his private sphere. Instead, when the interest in receiving information has been satisfied, his right "to be left alone" gains increasing importance in principle and limits the desire of the mass media and the wish of the public to make the individual sphere of his life the object of discussion or even of entertainment. Even a culprit, who attracted public attention by his serious crime and has gained general disapproval, remains a member of this community and retains his constitutional right to the protection of his individuality. If with the prosecution and conviction by a criminal court the act attracting the public interest has met with the just reaction of the community demanded by the public interest, any additional continued or repeated invasions of the personal sphere of the culprit cannot normally be justified.

5. (a) The time-limit when the reporting of current events which is admissible in principle becomes subsequently an inadmissible account or discussion cannot be stated generally; certainly it cannot be stated in months and years so as to cover all cases. The decisive criterion is whether the report concerned is likely to cause the culprit considerable new or additional harm, compared with the information which is already available.

(b) In order to determine the time limit more clearly, the interest in reintegrating the criminal into society and to restore his social position may be treated as the decisive point of reference.

(c) Altogether a repeated televised report concerning a serious crime which is no longer justified by the interest to receive information about current events is undoubtedly inadmissible if it endangers the social rehabilitation of the culprit. The vital chance necessary for the existence of the culprit and the interest of the community to restore his social position must prevail in principle over the interest in a discussion of the crime. Whether and to what extent any exceptions are conceivable such as in the case of an overriding historical interest, of scholarly or other broadcasts which are addressed to a limited range of viewers need not be examined here.

V. 1. Examined in the light of the criteria of constitutional law, the decisions appealed against cannot be maintained. The district court has sought to balance the interests of the petitioner and the broadcasting station exclusively by reference to §§ 22, 23 KUG without taking notice of the reflex effect of the fundamental rights contained in Article 2 I in conjunction with Articles 1 and 5 I of the Constitution.

The Court of Appeal did realise that a conflict exists between the freedom to broadcast by virtue of Article 5 I of the Constitution and the guarantee of personality by virtue of Article 2 I and Article 1 of the Constitution; in balancing, having regard to § 23 KUG, between the right to one's likeness and the interest of the public to receive information it did take the reflex effect of these fundamental rights into consideration. In solving this conflict it did not, however, apply correctly the criteria which are to be derived from the existing constitutional provisions for the determination of cases such as the present, but have not been formulated hitherto by the Constitutional Court; above all, it did not attribute to the interest in rehabilitation the importance which it deserves from the point of view of constitutional law.

2. If sufficient account is taken of the effect of the provisions of the Constitution which are relevant in the present case upon the general law the conclusion must be reached that the petition of the complainant must succeed . . .

Case 43

OBERLANDESGERICHT OF COLOGNE (FIFTEENTH CIVIL SENATE) 2 JUNE 1987
NJW 1987, 2682

Facts

The plaintiff had been a city official and director of the city's Office for Foreigners. In this capacity, he granted residence permits to a number of Syrians who, it emerged, were planning terrorist activities in the Federal Republic. The State Prosecution Authorities decided to investigate the plaintiff's conduct on the suspicion that he had taken a bribe. The investigations were carried out on behalf of the city authorities . . . by the Federal Office of Criminal Investigations (BKA). This body produced its final report in April 1983. After further investigations, the State Prosecution Authorities began proceedings against the plaintiff in January 1985. The Landgericht and the Oberlandesgericht, as the appellate court, rejected the charge at a preliminary stage, refusing to allow it to be taken to trial. A key sentence in the decision of the LG which was approved by the OLG ran as follows: "Above all there is absolutely no evidence which could form the basis at trial of proof of payments of money to the accused in exchange for certain actions which were in breach of his conditions of service."

The defendant is the publisher of a major news magazine. In its issue of 21 February 1983 an article appeared concerning the plaintiff under the title "In the Foreigners Office there is lively trade in illegal residence permits. Amongst those who have benefited from this are Syrian terrorists." The article contained a picture of the plaintiff with the side-line: "Suspended Office Director—did he know about the terrorist activities?". The text of the article began with a paragraph about a "three-man Syrian commando group" and its tasks. Then it continued: "Commando chief F knew his way around the border city in North Rhine-Westfalia. For DM 3,000, he bought himself a thirteen-month residence permit . . ." Later on in the article appeared the following statement: "An internal enquiry conducted by the Federal Office of Criminal Investigations (BKA) is investigating how the applications came to be made and the permits granted". A Director of Criminal Investigations had informed the Federal Office for the Protection of the Constitution, the Federal Information Service, the Interior Ministry, and the criminal authorities of the Land, that "the Syrian terrorist R had been able, using intermediaries, to obtain a residence permit from the Foreigners' Office in Aachen for a payment of DM 300 before his arrival in Germany." The article went on a few lines later: "In fact, when a raid was conducted at the offices, documents about the expelled Syrians R and A were discovered. The Director had once more granted the permits personally. Whether he knew of the terrorist activities of both Syrians is not yet known.” The plaintiff brought an action claiming that he was innocent of the accusations and that the article represented a serious invasion of his general right of privacy. He claimed damages for pain and suffering of at least DM 10,000, plus interest.

The LG rejected the claim. The plaintiff’s appeal was successful for the following.

Reasons

1. The defendant publishing company published a picture of the plaintiff, identified him by name, position, place of work, and age, and also alleged that he provided residence permits in return for money in his capacity as Director of the city’s Foreigners’ Office. This insulting allegation is to be considered under § 823 II BGB, read in conjunction with § 186 of the Criminal Code. It is not covered by the defence of legitimate interest (§ 193 of the Criminal Code). The allegation is also to be seen as untrue, since the plaintiff asserts this point and the defendant, who carries the burden of proving that the allegation is true, has not been able to discharge it, nor will he be able to do so following the result of the criminal proceedings. The defendant has further infringed the plaintiff’s right to his own image (§ 22 KUG) and thus committed a tortious act within the meaning of § 823 I BGB. The question whether a picture of a city official who is suspected of bribery but for which there is no proof, is a picture in the “public domain” (§ 23 I Nr. 1 KUG) [and thus a defence under this Act] need not be decided. For in any case the defendant has infringed a legitimate interest of the plaintiff within the meaning of § 23 II KUG in so far as it published the picture together with the improper text. The picture and text together represented a publication which claimed that the plaintiff was guilty before he had been judged by the competent criminal court and, consequently, infringed the general right of privacy in the form of the presumption of innocence guaranteed by Article 6 II of the European Convention on Human Rights.

2. The words accompanying the text require closer scrutiny.

(a) This contains the allegation that the plaintiff has taken bribes and gives details of this allegation. It is to be found in the headline itself, which talks of a lively trade in residence permits within the Office for Foreigners. Although the headline does not use the plaintiff’s name, the reader is nonetheless alerted to his identity by the picture and the sideline that accompanies it. This contains his name and then asks the question whether he has been aware of the terrorist activities. It is presumed that all along he was responsible for the “trade in residence permits”, and the only doubt that is allowed is related to whether he knowingly took bribes from terrorists. According to the standard established by the OLG (AfP 1976, 132), the headline contains a separate statement. It represents a brief report which is intended to make the reader curious about the text that follows but which is capable of independent evaluation, particularly if taken in conjunction with the picture and the picture sideline. Consequently, it can be expected that readers will have relied on this brief report. Of course it is possible to assume that the average reader of the magazine will be a careful and critical reader. However, it is unrealistic to assume that, given the quantity of information offered by each issue of the magazine, readers will only ever read the headlines in conjunction [emphasis added] with the full text which accompanies them. The allegation in the headline is, moreover, formulated in such a way that the meaning it conveys can no longer be altered by the rather weaker comments made in the text. Such a text would, at most, be a contradiction of the headline.

However, there is in fact no contradiction between the headline and the text. The text contains what is promised by the headline, provided one does not only read those comments which could be put forward to support the defendant's case, but rather reads it in context.

Immediately after the alarming warning that a Syrian terrorist commando armed with explosives has penetrated the Federal Republic, comes the news that the commando chief R is very familiar with the border city in North Rhine-Westfalia, and has bought himself a thirteen-month residence permit for DM 3,000. The fact that the "seller" was the plaintiff is suggested not only by the headline, but also by the picture and the sideline that accompanies it since the linking element is the "Syrian terrorists" and the "terrorist activities". In this way the idea of a "lively trade" is fleshed out with these details.

Later in the article the same events are related in a different form. A Director of Criminal Investigations at the BKA had "informed" the Office for the Protection of the Constitution, the Federal Information Office, and the criminal authorities of the Land that the Syrian terrorist R had obtained a residence permit with the help of intermediaries at the Office for Foreigners having paid them DM 300 before he entered the Federal Republic. This is apparently one and the same set of events which are referred to in the two quite separate parts of the text. The attentive reader will recognise this fact, even though in the second discussion the Syrian is referred to by only one of the three parts of his name and the DM 3,000 is reduced to DM 300, perhaps as a consequence of an oversight. The text employs in this instance a different method of relating the story, compared to the account of the same facts in the earlier part of the article. Whereas in the headline and the earlier part of the article the perspective is that of an author who is precisely informed about the events and who is establishing what has occurred, here it is the Director of Criminal Investigations who is the mouthpiece. It would be quite wrong to conclude from this that the author and the defendant have done no more than communicate, in an impartial manner, a few details from amongst the many uncovered by the investigations. That would contradict not only the clear meaning which is given to the article by the headline and the first paragraphs, but is also something which is denied by the defendant itself. For the telex sent by the BKA Director is announced as an internal communication on the part of the BKA which "reveals" the ways in which the applications came to be made and the permits granted. And revealing means exposing what actually occurred. The style of presentation chosen thus gives the impression that the defendant is only alleging later in the article what the Director has "stated". The figure of the "Director of Criminal Investigations" thus lends an appearance of authenticity to the allegation.

The fact that it was the plaintiff, himself, who was involved in the trade in residence permits and not, for example, another employee of the Office for Foreigners is made clear once more. For, not only is he presented as the Director of the Office for Foreigners who [personally] made the decision on 70 to 80 per cent of the applications made by Arabs; but also that the documents pertaining to the Syrians R and A were discovered when his offices were raided by the police; the Director, once more, granted the permits personally.

The fact that the Syrians R and A, who are both terrorists, are mentioned in the same context gives the reader the impression that both R and A bribed the plaintiff.

The allegation that the plaintiff had taken bribes from Syrian terrorists is in no way diminished or weakened by another statement contained in the Article that the State

Prosecution Authorities are conducting, with the support of the BKA, a wider criminal investigation against a further eleven defendants for bribery, corruption and breach of the Act on Foreigners, and that these defendants included the previous Director of the Foreigners' Office. This part of the text may be unobjectionable since, while it identifies the defendants, it does not prejudice their cases. However, it does not have the effect of reversing the content of the whole of the rest of the article by stating that the investigations are yet to reveal whether the plaintiff has in fact committed the criminal offences of which he is accused.

In fact, the shadow is further cast on the plaintiff as a result of a further statement that "the investigators thought" that, beyond the permits granted to the Syrian terrorists A and R, the plaintiff may have received further payments of between DM 500 and 3,000 per permit "generously" granted to other Turks, Iranians, and Syrians. Of course, this in no way revokes or qualifies the allegation regarding bribery by the two Syrians. What must be assessed is whether the author and the defendant are not themselves adopting what the investigators "believe" in the same way that they allowed the "Director of Criminal Investigations" to speak for them. This point should not, however, be regarded as being at the heart of the decision, for it is not relevant to the decision.

The LG based its rejection of the claim principally on the fact, also referred to by the defendant in its defence, that it was apparent from the article that the plaintiff was still being investigated but that his guilt was not yet definitively established. It is true that the article does not refer to a completed process of investigation, and so does not state that it can with certainty be expected that the plaintiff will be found guilty. This, however, is not the issue. What is decisive is that the defendants in some parts of the article make allegations about the guilt of the plaintiff with the—understandable—encouragement to the readers that they should believe them. Furthermore, these allegations are made without any reference to the fact that (first) the plaintiff contested his guilt or (secondly) to the points which he was putting forward in his own defence.

(b) The defendants did not act in the defence of legitimate interests.

(aa) They did not examine with necessary care the truth of its allegation. On the contrary they made this allegation despite having insufficient information at their disposal. In their written statements the defendants relied upon the following matters:

- a criminal investigation was being conducted into the plaintiff's activities in 1982 on the grounds of suspicion of bribery;
- the investigations were conducted not only by the state prosecuting authorities but also by the Federal Office of Criminal Investigations (BKA);
- the plaintiff was removed from his position as Director of the Foreigners' Office and moved to another office;
- he was later (although after the appearance of the article) temporarily suspended from office.

The defendants could have reported all these matters without infringing the duty to check the truth. These matters did not represent, however, the basis for alleging that the plaintiff had been bribed by Syrian terrorists and for fleshing out this allegation with further details.

During the litigation, the defendants did not say what other information they had at their disposal. The article indicates that the defendants had succeeded in discovering certain details from the investigation documents. It must be doubted whether “the investigating authorities”, that is the state prosecuting authorities or the officials of the BKA, had told the defendants what they “believed”. The final report of the BKA was not yet available. As the decision of the Chamber in Case No. 15 U 177/85 indicated, it was only completed in April 1983. After the report was issued, the state prosecuting authorities continued their investigations for a further two years before they decided to initiate criminal proceedings, which eventually were not allowed to develop into a full trial. As it appears from the decisions of the LG and the OLG which did not allow the case to go to full trial, there was no proof in the form of witnesses or documentary evidence of the allegation that the plaintiff had taken money. The defendant should have concluded, from what it read in the investigation documents, that the grounds for suspicion were not sufficient in order to allege publicly that the plaintiff had been bribed by Syrian terrorists. Once the criminal proceedings were brought, the defendant could have reported these (i.e. the nature of the charges).

In circumstances where the investigatory authorities are considering in depth the suspicion that a criminal act has been committed, and that point is not contested by the defendant but rather confirmed, the duty incumbent upon the media to check the truth of what they report does not allow them to elaborate the grounds for suspicion which they have not gleaned from their own research, but merely derived in a partial and fragmentary manner from the documents relating to an investigation into specific allegations about the guilt of the person in question. This is no longer a case where the media is trying to rouse the awareness of the public in order to bring the truth to light. Consequently, it can only be said that there is a legitimate public interest in the information in so far as the public should be informed of the investigatory activities of the authorities, which was one of the issues covered by the defendant in a short paragraph in its article. To run ahead of the investigating authorities and to communicate its own conclusions from the investigations, even before the authorities have themselves formed a final conclusion, includes a significant risk of misinformation without a corresponding recognisable utility in the provision of such information even though it might be more attractive for readers to be given definite results rather than questions and problems.

Even where an investigation is still in the process of being conducted, there may be situations in which the media may go beyond the information provided to them in this context. This would be the case, for example, where the media are criticising the authorities for dragging their feet in an investigation, or where they are objecting to the presence of irrelevant influences upon the investigation, or the withholding of certain evidence. None of these factors apply here. The defendant only sought to publish the information which it had discovered from the investigation documents and which it had prepared in its own way for publication.

The defendant may not derive a defence from the fact that after extensive further investigations the state prosecuting authorities did decide to bring proceedings against the plaintiff and in fact did seek to claim that the plaintiff was guilty of the acts which the defendant had earlier “established”. At the time of the publication of the article these allegations were not allowed to be made. Nor is it permissible from today’s perspective to repeat them. The intervening time is irrelevant.

Should these arguments be considered incorrect, it is likewise possible to argue that the defendant did not act, from a wider legal perspective, in the defence of a legitimate interest.

(bb) The standard which governs press, radio, and television reports of criminal activities which certain (identified) persons are said to have committed, where these persons are the subject of criminal investigations, is increasingly the standard of the “presumption of innocence” [references omitted]. The presumption of innocence is a principle recognised in all states which adhere to the rule of law, and it has been defined more precisely in Article 6 II European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). This provision is applicable law in the Federal Republic. The addressees of this provision are, inter alia, criminal judges and the investigation authorities, which, for example, must exercise a corresponding degree of caution when making statements to the press; the media are not covered by this provision. However, the effects of the presumption of innocence extend into the realm of privacy and demand that this right is formulated in such a way as to protect the presumption of innocence and that consequently the presumption of innocence is seen as a protected interest for all persons. If the right of personality is understood in these terms, it places limits upon reports of criminal activities, as a counterbalance to the freedom of the press. It was in this sense that this court applied the presumption of innocence in its earlier decision (AfP 1985, 293) which considered proceedings brought by the same plaintiff against another newspaper.

Under Article 6 II ECHR the presumption of innocence operates in favour of the “accused person”. This phrase should not, however, be understood in a strictly technical sense as it is under the rules of criminal procedure. Undoubtedly a suspect is also covered by this provision. Furthermore, the practice of the European Court of Human Rights would appear to cover also an accused person (“Beschuldigter”) as defined by the rules of criminal procedure (see Peukert, EuGRZ 1980, p. 260 who argues that the presumption of innocence should also apply in the preliminary proceedings). In any case, there is no cause for regarding the presumption of innocence, as one aspect of the general right of personality, as arising only once the proceedings themselves begin, since the particular need for protection of a person subject to criminal investigation, who will be required to defend himself in criminal proceedings, arises already at an earlier stage of the procedure, in particular because prejudgments made by the press can have an effect beyond the official inquiries. The plaintiff, who was a person under suspicion at the time when the article was published, was therefore under the protection of the presumption of innocence. This has the effect that when the press alleges the guilt of such a person, and base that allegation on substantial grounds of suspicion, it will not itself be acting on the basis of a legitimate interest. It even follows from the presumption of innocence that such allegations are unlawful right up to the time when the criminal court makes its decision, regardless of whether they are true or untrue. The civil law cause of action which forms the basis for resisting prejudicial statements is consequently to be derived from §§ 823 I and 1,004 BGB. A reason for such a strict application of the presumption of innocence can be found inter alia where the criminal proceedings are not yet concluded and where the proceedings are for an injunction or for some other form of interim order. The fact that the question of truth is irrelevant means that the person who has undermined the presumption of innocence cannot bring evidence that the person who is subject to investigation is in fact guilty. This prevents a situation in which parallel and competing investigations into the guilt of that person are undertaken in the context of the civil and criminal proceedings; it also prevents the judge in the civil proceedings coming to a different conclusion to the criminal court.

Where, however, the criminal proceedings conclude, as here, in favour of the accused, whether he is found not guilty or whether the proceedings never come to trial, then there are no grounds for not including the question of truth. An untrue presumption of guilt constitutes a particularly serious breach of the presumption of innocence. Only on this basis can the severity of the invasion of the right of privacy be evaluated. The appropriate provision for such a case, which is a lex specialis vis-à-vis § 823 I, is therefore § 823 II BGB read in conjunction with § 186 of the Criminal Code; from this conclusion follows a reversal of the burden of proof. The presumption of innocence must be assessed as a matter of law in the context of the defence of legitimate interests and must therefore be evaluated against the fundamental principle of the freedom of the press; this evaluation will generally result in the conclusion that the press is not acting in the defence of legitimate interests where it is alleging the guilt of the person under investigation.

There may be exceptions to this principle where there are circumstances of particular urgency which influence the conduct of the press. For example, those cases which were mentioned above as regards the question of qualifications of the duty to check the truth of statements could be repeated here. However, it must be stated that in this case there are no grounds for recognising an exception. The defendant did not act in the defence of legitimate interests when it alleged that the plaintiff had been bribed by Syrian terrorists.

3. The tort committed by the defendants represents a serious breach of the right of privacy, which justifies the award of damages for pain and suffering under § 847 BGB. The effects of the breach were serious for the plaintiff. This is all the more so since, apart from the words and text, he was exposed to public scrutiny and a negative judgment by the public as a result of the publication of his picture. This makes the interference with the right of privacy more serious than it would have been had it involved the mere citation of a person's name. Also, the fault of the defendant, or more precisely the negligence of those who acted on their behalf, is also to be seen as gross. This is the case because its actions went beyond those laid down in No. 12 of the Press Code established by the German Press Council, which is to be seen as the correct measure of journalistic care. The interference suffered by the plaintiff cannot be made good by any means other than the award of damages for pain and suffering. The short report printed in the "Rückspiegel" in Issue No. 20/86, which stated that the OLG had finally rejected the admissibility of the proceedings had only a very small compensatory effect.

4. The defendants are responsible for the unlawful and negligent acts of the persons who acted on their behalf. In the case of this Article, the story was of a highly sensitive nature, and a constitutionally appointed representative under § 31 BGB should have been required to check it, for which the defendant is unconditionally liable. § 31 BGB is applicable to Kommanditgesellschaften. It is not clear whether this control actually took place. If it did not, then the fault of the defendants lies in an organisational failure for which the defendants are responsible by virtue of § 823 BGB. In addition, the defendant is responsible for the departmental editor under § 831 BGB.

5. Damages for pain and suffering in the amount of DM 10,000 appear to be appropriate in all the circumstances.

Case 44

OBERLANDESGERICHT HAMBURG (THIRD CIVIL SENATE) 21 MAY 1987
NJW-RR 1988, 737 = AFP 1988, 247

Facts

The plaintiff claims damages for immaterial harm resulting from a headline in the defendant's national daily newspaper. The Landgericht allowed the claim in part. The plaintiff's appeal was allowed in part, and the defendant's appeal was dismissed.

Reasons

I. The defendant is guilty of a culpable invasion of the plaintiff's right of personality (§ 823 I BGB).

1. The principal invasion of the plaintiff's right consists in the fact that the main headline in the 19 May 1986 issue of the defendant's newspaper B was so drafted as to suggest that the plaintiff would accept or had accepted DM 80,000 in return for being portrayed in the nude. This would be the impression received by any reader of this number of the newspaper who did not go on to read the full text of the article on the front page. The Landgericht was right to state that such readers would be very numerous. Headlines in this newspaper are set up in order to stimulate interest and curiosity about the article in question and induce readers to buy the paper. That is clear from the layout in this issue. The main headline can be read from quite a distance and can therefore be taken in by a person seeing the paper on a news-stand or being read by someone else.

The front page is so laid out that the reader learns the truth very gradually. The words "K Nude—DM 80,000" were readable from a great distance. Persons closer-to could see the text "K Nude. She wants DM 80,000." Adjoining the headline is a coloured picture of the plaintiff unclad down to the bosom; only closer inspection reveals this to be a drawing. Below the picture one sees, in somewhat larger letters, the words "No smile, the cool look—K in the P-Calendar". Even this does not tell the reader that there was no question of the plaintiff seeking a fee for publicity. The reader is throughout led to believe what the headline suggests. Only when the small print begins does the reader learn the truth, and then only if close enough to read it. The great majority of those unable to read this small print, especially those who do not buy the paper, will conclude to the discredit of the plaintiff that she was ready for a fee to display her body in the nude, partly because of what they have read, but partly also because they expect sensations from the B newspaper. Most readers will never learn the unsensational fact of the matter, namely that the plaintiff was actually claiming damages for having been so portrayed.

Even those who read the text below the drawing would have the same impression, for in the main they would conclude that the plaintiff allowed herself to be portrayed in the nude in the P-Calendar and was now demanding a fee for it. It is quite unlikely that anyone who did not have the paper in his hands would read the full text on page one and appreciate the truth of the matter, which was revealed only in its final sentence.

2. As drafted—and the defendant is responsible for its drafting—the headline invaded the rights of the plaintiff. It is true that any newspaper report is capable of being misunderstood by a cursory reader or of giving rise to false inferences. That is why this court has decided that one must put up with such negative reactions if a press report is accurate and not misleading; on a balancing of the interests involved, such invasions of the personality are not unlawful, for it would constitute a grave constraint on the basic right of freedom of the press if publishers were held responsible for misinterpretations which are, after all, hardly foreseeable. This applies particularly to readers who simply go by the titles of articles in the middle of a paper or journal and pay no heed to the text; the press need not concern itself with such cursory readers.

But it is different when headlines on the front page are calculated to excite the interest of people with no mind to read anything else in the paper, such as those who are wondering whether to buy the paper or glancing at a copy read by someone else in a train or a bus. Such a headline must be considered on its own, independently of the body of the article it heralds, for it can be foreseen that it will often be read cursorily in this way, and the press must certainly strive to avoid recognisable risks of likely misunderstandings, as indeed this court had already said. That is the case here.

3. The defendant was at fault. There was an obvious risk that the mention of the well-known plaintiff's name in conjunction with the idea of nudity and a sum of money would conjure up derogatory assumptions affecting her right of personality. Yet gravely at fault though the responsible editors were, it is not established with sufficient certainty that they deliberately intended to cause the harm.

II. An award of damages for pain and suffering (Schmerzensgeld) is justified in this case.

1. The Bundesgerichtshof has always held that even where there has been an unlawful and culpable invasion of the right of personality, the victim can claim money damages for immaterial harm only when the gravity of the invasion makes such a solatium absolutely necessary. Whether such an invasion is sufficiently grave depends on all the facts of the case, including the seriousness and intrusiveness of the invasion, the dissemination of the publication, the duration of the harm to the victim's interests and reputation, the nature of and reasons for the defendant's conduct and the degree to which he was to blame.

2. Given the very wide circulation of the B newspaper, the headline must have been taken in by a very large number of people who read no further. Thus the misapprehension we have indicated must have been very widely disseminated. The harm to the plaintiff's reputation as a political figure well-known at home and abroad was grave and long-lasting, and her name in the leading headline of the B paper, which would immediately command attention, placed her in a context highly prejudicial to her honour as a woman, diminished her seriousness as a politician and reduced her standing as a public figure. Apart from this, what was published in the B newspaper was not independently defamatory: it was the way the front page was laid out which induced the false impression of what the article went on to state.

The wrong was not, however, as great as might be expected from publication in the B newspaper, for anyone who read the whole of the front page would learn the truth of the matter.

The informational value of the fact that the plaintiff was claiming damages from P cannot be invoked here, for it was trivial. This fact could have been communicated quite licitly without infringing the plaintiff's rights at all, but the fact that the infringement might have been avoided does not mitigate the infringement which occurred. It is, on the other hand, relevant that the B newspaper did publish a correction on the front page of its edition of 24 July 1986. This certainly amounts to an attempt to allay the consequences so far as those who were misinformed by the headline are concerned, but it cannot be said that it significantly diminished, much less neutralised, the effect of the publication in invading the plaintiff's rights: the correction was published in an unobtrusive manner which had none of the dramatic effect of the original publication, and in any case it can have reached only B's regular readers, and not the many other people who were affected by the original invasion of the plaintiff's right of personality.

III. The appropriate sum to award by way of solatium is DM 10,000. The proven defamation is a weighty one, which set the plaintiff as a woman and well-known public person in a most degrading light. Those who read the headline and not the full article were left with the impression that the plaintiff was ready to let herself be portrayed in the nude for a fee—an impression quite at variance with the public esteem in which the plaintiff was held. This was calculated to do lasting harm to the plaintiff's reputation and standing. This needs no elucidation. It is equally obvious that because the plaintiff is a prominent politician, the adverse effect on her is much greater than it would be on a simple citizen known only to a few intimates. Finally, one must remember that those who drafted the headline must have been aware, had they been taking the proper care, of the grave risk of invading the plaintiff's right of personality. On the other hand, this invasion was not the result of a report which was actually false, as we have said above, and this also must be taken into account in determining the amount of solatium. Given that in this case the true facts were given to those who read the newspaper, the invasion was not as serious as it would have been had it resulted from false statements in both the headline and the text. Further, the defendant's published correction went some way towards reducing the damage. Taking all these points into consideration, we must say that the sum awarded by the Landgericht does not seem adequate compensation for the way the plaintiff's right of personality has been infringed. On the other hand, the plaintiff's demand for at least DM 30,000 does not seem appropriate on the facts of this case.

Case 45

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 19 DECEMBER 1978

BGHZ 73, 120 = NJW 1979, 647 = JZ 1979, 349

Facts

On the 3 of October 1974, the first claimant, the chairman of the CDU [the Christian Democratic Union], had had a telephone conversation with the then general secretary of that party, the second claimant, which without the knowledge of either of them was "bugged" by an unknown person and recorded or taken down in shorthand. A written record of the conversation was received, with an anonymous letter posted in Kaiserlautern on the 2 June 1975, at the editorial office of "stern" Illustrated produced in the publishing house of the first defendants, whose editor-in-chief is the second defendant. The second claimant was told about this at an interview with two editors of "Stern". As the editor-in-chief (who was the second defendant) would not give to the claimants the confirmation they requested that publication would not take place, they obtained an interim injunction prohibiting the printing of the telephone conversation. But in the meantime an article about the "bugging affair" had already been printed (with the co-operation of an editor who was the third defendant) with the full content of the conversation and almost completely delivered, so that the claimants could no longer prevent its appearance.

In their claim they ask for the defendants to be prevented from publishing the telephone conversation between them, the claimants, in whole or in part, or otherwise passing it on to third parties.

The Landgericht and the Oberlandesgericht allowed the claim. The defendants' appeal in law, which is admissible, was unsuccessful.

Reasons

1. By publishing the telephone conversation, for which the first defendant as publisher and the second and third defendants as editors are indisputably responsible, the claimants' personalities have been affected in two overlapping protected areas.

(a) Firstly, the publication interferes with the interest of the claimants in not allowing the content of their conversation to reach the public.

Their interest in keeping it secret arose simply because the subject matter of the conversation made it part of their personal sphere. Two friends in the party [the CDU], both in prominent positions within it, were discussing the emergence of the first claimant as a candidate for chancellorship in the face of attacks against him in this context, in particular by "Stern" Illustrated. Their critical concern was the attitude of the leadership and the grass roots of the party to this candidature. They were talking about indiscretions which had resulted in internal party matters reaching the press, and about measures to combat these. Quite personal things were spoken about, even though they referred to the claimants' work in the public sphere. In the conversation, thoughts and feelings were expressed, which a person would only make so frankly to a confidant whose discretion can be trusted, and which he would not let the public hear in that form, even if he had no adverse consequences to fear for himself on this account.

The claimants have also left the defendants in no doubt about their wish for the maintenance of secrecy.

(b) The extent of the interference which the claimants have suffered to their personalities by the publication is not, however, limited to their interest in keeping the content of their conversation secret. Their personalities were adversely affected more strongly than by an indiscretion, because of the area of the personality exposed by the publication of the transcript of the telephone conversation. The individual is especially reliant on this area being protected from the public in order to safeguard and develop his individuality.

Everyone, even a politician appearing in the public arena and seeking publicity, has in principle a claim protected by Articles 1 and 2 of the Basic Law to the safeguarding of his private sphere, to which others only have access insofar as he allows them to see it. In this private sphere he must be safe from control and censorship by the public, otherwise the basis on which his personality can be realised and develop would be endangered. All the events and expressions of life of this personal sphere are in principle protected by the right of the personality to self-determination in this way. This is above all true of a private conversation like the telephone call between the claimants, which did not lose its private character through the political aspect of the conversation. This is because what is said and how it is said depends a great deal on who is taking part in the conversation; a person can only participate uninhibitedly if he has control over the participants or at any rate knows them. This protection is removed if such a confidential conversation is secretly recorded and embodied in a transcript which is made available to the public. In a publication of this kind, therefore, the personality of the person affected is more strongly assailed than if merely something about the content of the conversation gets out; the reason is that it brings the personal sphere in all its complexity into the public eye. The recording does not only fix the content of the statements but also the expressions which the persons themselves have used in the conversation. Moreover, expressions acquire an importance of their own through a recording. All that was associated with the transitory nature of words in conversation and its own "dynamics" is, by being fixed in the transcript, transposed into a "static" condition, which can be accessed and repeated at any time for a completely different circle and a different situation, with a claim to authenticity. It is obvious that the personality in its intrinsic value is, even for that reason, considerably more strongly affected by such objectification, than by a mere indiscretion about a confidential conversation.

In order to protect the personality from such exposure and objectification of its sphere, everyone has the right guaranteed by virtue of the Constitution (and now actually extensively protected in criminal law (§ 201 of the StGB)) that in particular private conversations cannot in principle be recorded on a sound recording system nor played from this and transmitted by third parties without his consent (references omitted). It is also recognised on the same ground that recordings of a confidential character may in principle be published only with the agreement of the author and only in a manner approved by him (references omitted). The case law on the protection of the personality from publication of pictures without approval rests in the end on this basis as well (references omitted).

In the case in dispute it is admittedly not a question of a secret tape recording or the use of it; however, the personality must be protected to the same extent against publication of a written record of a telephone conversation. This is because the personal nature of such a record is scarcely less significant than for a tape recording. It makes the same claim to authentic recording of the individual sphere of the persons participating in the conversation, even though it does not reproduce the sound of the voice. At the same time, the fact that the reader is limited to what he sees carries with it the danger that the transcript acquires an importance of its own which is alien to the personality, and in which sharpening and weakening effects which are only expressed through speech are lost. Therefore, because of this special personal connection, the person affected must in principle keep control over who obtains insight by means of the transcript into his individual sphere and thereby the power of disposition over it.

2. Admittedly the personality is not absolutely protected either against indiscretions about confidential private conversations nor from exposure of its private sphere by an unauthorised record of a conversation, insofar as it is not a question of the inviolable area of the intimate sphere, which is not affected here. In particular, in relation to a press publication, the right of personality guaranteed by the Constitution comes into tension with freedom of the press, which is guaranteed with equal status by the Basic Law (Article 5 para. 1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law). The scope of protection of the personality is therefore to be determined as against that freedom on the basis of a balancing of rights and interests. This has to be orientated to the personal interests of the claimants which are affected and those interests of the press in publishing of the conversation which are worthy of protection, and it must take into account all the circumstances of the actual case (references omitted).

In the end result, the appeal court correctly gave priority to the claimants here over the interest of the defendants in publication. Its statements need clarification, however, in order to avoid misunderstandings.

(a) An absolute ban on use which prevented the press publishing any information from their conversation without regard to its value for the public, because of the claimant's interest in keeping their conversation secret, was not imposed on the defendants. This was not even to be the case if their informant himself had obtained the recording by a sound recording system or a bugging device in a criminal manner. Indisputably, the defendants did not participate in this invasion of the sphere of confidentiality, even though they reaped the benefits of the breach of confidentiality. As the appeal court correctly recognised, their action was therefore not even open to a criminal law conviction; the criminal law protection of § 201 of the StGB did not cover their conduct (references omitted). It is admittedly beyond question that the claimants do not have to accept it simply on that account. Yet the gap which the criminal law creates here indicates that the interest in keeping secret the content of the conversation is not to be simply equated with the interest in the preservation of the confidentiality of the spoken word, as the appeal court possibly thought. The right of personality cannot give absolute protection from indiscretions by the press either. It is true that such limitation may not be required by the mere fact that protection of this kind would scarcely be realisable because the diverse secret areas are of very different structure and the varied ways in which secrets get out can frequently not be investigated. But the need for such limitation follows from the fact that inalienable free communication would be burdened more heavily than in case of indiscretions if it were to be subject to a comprehensive legal control. In this respect the appeal in law refers pertinently to the fact that the constitutional guarantee of a free press would be limited to a questionable extent if publication of information which originates from invasion of the sphere of confidentiality was simply forbidden. It must, especially in questions which must interest the general public, also be allowed to report on events worthy of publicity which are not released for publication by the persons affected, even if they come from private areas which are not automatically accessible to the public.

Even for information which, like the telephone transcript sent to the "Stern", has been obtained by invasion of the sphere of confidentiality which is especially protected in constitutional law by the secrecy of telecommunications (Article 10 para. 1 of the Basic Law), there can in principle be no difference, insofar as the press does not itself participate in this invasion. It can be left undecided here in what way and to what extent the special value which the Basic Law attributes to the inviolability of this area of secrecy has an effect on the legal relationships between private individuals (reference omitted). At any rate, assessment of the question of whether such information is barred from the press because of the constitutional law guarantee of the secrecy of telecommunications must take into consideration the tension with the constitutional guarantee of press freedom. Communication takes place largely in areas which are protected by secrecy of letters, post and telecommunications. To exclude in a quite general or absolute way news from such occurrences from publication in the press would be to reduce the contribution of the press to the formation of opinion (which freedom of the press is to guarantee) to an extent which would not correspond to the status of this basic right. The constitutional law guarantee for the citizen "to inform himself unrestrictedly from generally accessible sources" (Article 5 para. 1 sentence 1) likewise does not put such limits on the press (references omitted). The citizen's freedom of information does not, of course, coincide in subject matter and content with the right to information guaranteed by press freedom (references omitted). It is intended to protect the formation of the citizen's opinion from state limitations, but not to limit the sources of information of the press to "generally accessible" ones. The obtaining of information from not generally accessible sources as well—even if it is by exploiting a breach of confidence by its informant in which it did not itself take part—is not simply "unsuitable" for the press (reference omitted) so long as it keeps itself in this connection within the limits which are drawn for it under Article 2 of the Basic Law.

(b) On the other hand, the knowledge that the information published by the press has been obtained, even if without its help, by invasion of the sphere of confidentiality requires a special degree of consideration towards the person affected.

(aa) As has already been stated, the sphere of confidentiality not only underlines the private character which the statement has according to its content, but this is also to be respected by the public as a part of the personal sphere. The press must take also into account the interest which exists in being able to withdraw oneself from the public eye and which is worthy of protection. The fact that it did not force its way into the sphere of confidentiality itself does not free it from this responsibility. Publications from this area document and deepen the invasion; they also put the person's individual sphere in question. And not least the press must keep in mind that by taking up such information it can encourage third parties to invade that individual sphere.

In balancing the competing interests it is therefore in such cases not only necessary to look at the content of the information (references omitted). The way in which their informant has obtained the information can also limit the right and duty of the press to publish. That does not, however, mean that information obtained illegally may only be published if the general public has a fundamental interest in being informed, as the appeal court seems to assume (references omitted). There is likewise no room for parallels which can be drawn in this connection from the relationship of state power to the citizen, for instance on the limitations on the secrecy of telecommunications by the statute of the 13th August 1968 based on Article 10 of the Basic Law (reference omitted), because here it is a question of the tension between the basic freedoms of the personality and the press, which assumes a different form. As already explained, the press cannot simply be barred from taking up information illegally obtained if it would thereby contribute to formation of opinion in a question which interests the public. Respect for the area of confidentiality from which the information comes, however, requires a limitation of the publication interest to information with a "publicity value" which exceeds the interests worthy of protection in the personal sphere, the preservation of which must matter not only for the person affected but also all citizens. This is especially so if a third party has made an unauthorised invasion of this area and the publication must therefore inevitably strengthen the effects of this illegal invasion. The stronger the private character of the information, the closer the link to it of personal interests in maintaining secrecy and the greater the disadvantages which the person affected has to fear from a publication, the more permanent must its "publicity value" be, if the press wants to disregard his wish not to let it reach the public.

The judge must admittedly take into account the right of the press, likewise guaranteed with press freedom, not to expose its informant insofar as he, in this balancing operation which the judge has to undertake, is required, in favour of the person affected, to investigate the ways in which the information from his sphere of confidentiality reached the press. If the claimant refers to an invasion of his sphere of confidentiality, the proof which he has to provide of this cannot be made easier or even waived just because the defendant is not prepared to substantiate his opposition to such a claim (§ 138 of the Civil Procedure Code). Nor can the judge lay the press open in some other way to the necessity of exposing its information source, in order to protect itself from disadvantages. Otherwise the work of the press, which enjoys the protection of Article 5 para. 1 of the Basic Law in the procuring of information, would be exposed to burdens which come into conflict with the freedom of the press guaranteed by virtue of the Constitution.

(bb) In the case in dispute, the personal interests of the claimants are, as in particular the Landgericht has correctly emphasised, primarily affected by the fact that their personal sphere has been exposed to the public with special intensity by the printing of the record of the conversation. Such exposure is as a rule not offset by the desire of the press to report about the statements of leading politicians as comprehensively as possible. Consideration of the special value which the Constitution attributes to the non-disposability of the personality, requires, as has been explained, that only a very serious need for information on the part of the public can justify assailing a person in this way. But the defendants have not demonstrated such an interest in the publication of the telephone transcript.

They themselves say that the telephone call was even rather boring for a outsider from the point of view of its content. They wanted to publish it in order to show what language the first claimant, as a candidate for the chancellorship, used when he was not standing in front of a microphone; next, to reduce speculation about the "bugging affair" to a factual basis; and finally because of passages in which the other party to the conversation had criticised "Stern" Illustrated. These are not however prevailing grounds justifying the exposure of the individual sphere in this way. The actual personality of a leading politician in the centre of the public interest is affected by throwing open his private conversation for discussion, against his will, by means of a transcript of the conversation, to such an extent that it needs more to justify such an action than a certainly widely held interest in getting to know him in his private surroundings as well. Also the fact that politicians are discussing political and social questions in their private sphere does not of itself give the public access to this area; otherwise there would be no protected private sphere for politician and this should be undeniable for them also (reference omitted). The same applies for the claimants' criticism of "Stern". Such private opinions are quite common. Thus here also they were not so capable of making an impact in characterising political views and intentions of the critic which were of possible interest to the public that they therefore deserved the status, in public debate, of defining his position. There is also the fact that the defendants could get a public discussion going about the claimants' statements regarding "Stern" (if it had to be recognised that they had interests worthy of protection in the matter in this respect) even without printing the telephone transcript, especially as this issue only formed a proportionately small part of the conversation. Their objection, that they could by means of the transcript describe the facts in the greatest detail, is not acceptable; that does not justify them in exposing the personalities of the claimants in their private dealings with each other to such a wide extent. The fact that the telephone conversation in this respect revealed personal relationships and necessarily gave insights into the claimants' personalities could not be overlooked by the defendants; they have themselves admitted that this had been one of the grounds for their decision to publish the conversation.

The fact that the confidentiality of the conversation has since been removed, after it was published, does not prevent a ban on publication or other transmission of the telephone transcript. This is because it emerges from the above considerations that the defendants do not have to enforce the interests of the claimants in keeping the content of the telephone conversation secret but their right that the individual sphere of their personality embodied in the telephone transcript should only be dealt with their agreement. Every unauthorised further use of the recording by the defendants violates this right. The finding of the appeal court that there is in this respect a danger of repetition is likewise not open to objection under the law to be applied in the appeal in law.

Case 46

BUNDESGERICHTSHOF (SIXTH CIVIL SENATE) 19 DECEMBER 1995
 BGHZ 131, 332 = NJW 1996, 1128 = JZ 1997, 39

Facts

In these proceedings the plaintiff, Caroline of Monaco, is objecting to the publication of certain photographs distributed in Germany and France by the defendant, the publishers of the magazines F and B. In issue no. 30 of the F magazine, dated 22 July 1993, the defendant published a total of five so-called “paparazzi” photographs which show the plaintiff with the actor Vincent Lindon in a garden restaurant in S. (France). On the front page, next to a large photograph of the plaintiff (the use of which is not impugned in these proceedings) is a photograph of her, accompanied by reference to an Article entitled “The most tender photographs of her romance with Vincent”. The series of four photographs on pages 4 and 5 is entitled “These photos are proof of the most tender romance of our time”. In issue no. 32, dated 5 August 1993 of the illustrated magazine B, the defendant published on page 88 a photograph of the plaintiff on horseback and on page 89 a photograph of the plaintiff with her children P. and A.; these photographs belong to an Article entitled “Caroline: I don’t think I am the ideal wife”. In issue no 34 of the B magazine, dated 19 August 1993, the defendant published an Article with several photographs entitled “Simple happiness”, showing the plaintiff with her daughter in a paddling boat, going for a walk alone, carrying a wicker basket, riding a bicycle, together with Vincent Lindon in a pub, with Lindon and her son P., and, finally, with another woman in the market. After a lengthy dispute over the admissibility of these publications, the defendant brought an action against the claimant before the Landgericht of Munich requesting that the Court make a declaratory judgment to the effect that the defendant need not in future abstain from publishing these photographs. By these proceedings the plaintiff, who claims that the publication of these photographs infringes her right to personal privacy, requests under German and French law that the defendant in future abstain from any further publication of the photographs. The plaintiff claims that even as an “absolute person of contemporary history” she does not have to put up with the publication of photographs of herself. All of these photographs had been taken from a great distance, without her knowledge, and are said to belong to her private life. The plaintiff is constantly followed by photographers leaving her in no peace outside of her home. Even for her, there must be a protected private area outside of her own home.

The Landgericht found in favour of the plaintiff as far as the distribution within France is concerned but otherwise rejected the claim. The plaintiff appealed against this decision, and the defendant cross-appealed. The Oberlandesgericht has rejected the claim. The further appeal, in so far as it was accepted, is partially successful.

Reasons

III. The reasoning of the Appeal Court is, in legal terms, partly flawed. The further appeal rightly claims that the photographs which show the plaintiff in an outdoor restaurant with Vincent Lindon fall into the sphere of her private life. Their publication infringes her right to personal privacy and is thus prohibited. The other photographs are legally unobjectionable.

A. 1. As far as the distribution of the magazines in Germany is concerned, the Appeal Court has rightly based its decision on German law. According to the principles of international private law, for claims based on tort and therefore, as here, claims to desist from certain actions (Unterlassungsanspruch) said to violate the right to one's own personality (references omitted), the law of the place where the tort was committed applies. For products of the newspaper industry, the place of commission is the place where the product was published and every other place where it was distributed (Senate, NJW 1977, 1590 with further references). As regards the magazines distributed in Germany, the place of commission and the place where the effects of the tort were felt are both in Germany, so that German law applies at least for the German area of distribution. . . .

2. According to German law, the distribution of the photographs referred to above is illegal. In particular, it is not covered by the guarantee of press freedom set out in §§ 22, 23 of the Artistic Creations of the Act (KUG) or Article 5 I, Constitution.

(a) In principle, pictures of a person may only be distributed with the permission of the person depicted (§ 22 KUG). The right to one's own image forms a particular aspect of the general right to one's own personality. It follows that basically only the person depicted is entitled to decide whether and in what way his picture will be shown to the public (references). There is no doubt that the plaintiff has not given such permission.

(b) Pictures belonging to the sphere of contemporary history may, however, be distributed or shown without permission of the person involved, unless legally protected interests of the person depicted are thereby infringed (§ 23 I, No.1, II KUG). Pictures of persons regarded as "absolute contemporary persons" form part of contemporary history. The plaintiff belongs to this group of persons. The further appeal wrongly disputes this fact. Decisive for the classification of a person as an absolute person of contemporary history is the fact that the public regards his pictures as important and worthy of note just because of the particular person shown. The public has a justified interest, based on a real need for information, in seeing pictures of these persons (BGHZ 20, 345, 349 et seq.; Senat, NJW 1996, 985). In particular Monarchs, Heads of State, and eminent politicians belong to this group (see KG JW 1928, 363—Kaiser Wilhelm II; AG Ahrensboeck DJZ 1920, 596—Reichspräsident Ebert and Reichswehrminister Noske; Senat NJW 1996, 593—Bundeskanzler; OLG München UFITA 41 [1964] 322—Kanzlerkandidat). As the eldest daughter of the reigning Prince of Monaco, the plaintiff belongs to this circle of persons as she, herself, has acknowledged. The Senat's decision of 12 December 1995 (NJW 1996, 985) is based on this view.

(c) There are, however, limits to the publication without permission of pictures of persons who form part of contemporary history. According to § 23 II KUG publication is prohibited where the justified interests of the person shown outweigh the other interests at stake. Whether or not this is the case here, must be decided through a process of weighing up the various rights and interests involved so that in each individual case it is established whether the public interest in information protected by the freedom of the press (Article 5 of the Constitution), which the defendant can cite as justification, has precedence over the plaintiff's right to her personality (Article 2 GG) to which she refers. (BVerfGE 34, 269, 282; BVerfGE 35, 202, 221; Senat, NJW 1994, 124; BGHZ 128, 1, 10.)

(aa) The protection of a person's private sphere of life is of special importance when the two legal interests are weighed against each other. The right to respect one's own private sphere of life is an emanation of the general right to one's own personality, which grants every person an autonomous area of personal life within which he can develop and experience his own individuality, free from the interferences of others. The right to be left alone and "to belong to oneself" forms part of this area (BVerfGE 34, 238, 245 et seq.; BVerfGE 35, 202, 220; for the right to be left alone as part of the right to privacy under American law see Katz v. United States 389 Supreme Court (1967), 347, 350 et seq.; Warren/Brandeis, 4 Har. L. Rev. [1980] 193 et seq.; Götting Persönlichkeitsrechte als Vermögensrechte, 1995, 168 et seq., 174). As a result, since 1954, the German courts have, especially in the area of civil law consistently given particular weight to the right to respect one's own private sphere of life, i.e. treated it as a basic right, guaranteed by the constitution, which includes the right to one's own image (BVerfGE 27, 1, 6; BVerfGE 34, 269, 282 et seq.; BVerfGE 35, 202; BVerfGE 44, 353, 372; BGHZ 24, 200, 208 et seq.; BGHZ 27, 284, 285 et seq.; BGHZ 73, 120, 122 et seq.; Senat JZ 1965, 411, 413—Gretna Green; OLG Hamburg UFITA 78 [1977] 252, 257; OLG Hamburg UFITA 81 [1978] 278, 285; OLG Hamburg, NJW 1970, 1325—Haus Hohenzollern).

(bb) The right to respect one's own sphere of private life can be claimed by anyone, and can therefore be claimed by the plaintiff, even if she is a person of contemporary history. For even such persons need not tolerate pictures which depict central aspects of their private life, for instance their domestic surroundings, being taken for later publication without their permission (BGHZ 24, 200, 208; BGH GRUR 1962, 211, 212—Hochzeitsbild; BGH NJW 1965, 2148—Spielgefährtin). Only in exceptional circumstances, can the distribution of pictures from this area be permissible, i.e. where an overriding public interest justifies such an intrusion (see Senat JZ 1965, 411, 413—Gretna Green; OLG Hamburg UFITA 78 [1977] 252, 257—Grace Kelly; OLG Hamburg UFITA 81 [1978], 278, 285; OLG Hamburg NJW 1970, 1325; OLG München UFITA 41 [1964] 322, 324).

(d) The Appeal Court applied these principles. But it was of the opinion that the public's justified interest in information ends "at the doorstep" of the person depicted and, therefore, extends to places open to anyone, e.g. as here, "in front of" a garden restaurant which is open to public view. The Appeal Court, therefore, restricted the private sphere of life to places inside people's homes from which the public is excluded. This view has been widely adopted by the courts and is shared by the legal literature. (KG in, Schulze UrhRspr. KGZ 14; Schricker/Gerstenberg, UrheberR, 1987, § 23 KUG, n. 35; Wenzel Das Recht der Wort-und Bildberichterstattung, 4. edn. [1994], n. 5.46 and 5.60; Evers, Privatsphäre und Ämter für Verfassungsschutz, p. 44.)

This Division cannot share this view. A spatial restriction of the private sphere of life to the domestic area cannot have been intended under the KUG, since the explanatory notes to that Act state that the safeguards of the justified interests of the person depicted, set out in § 23 II KUG, were intended “especially to prevent events being shown to the public which pertain to the personal and domestic life” of that person (reference). This formulation in no way limits the protection of the private sphere of life to the domestic area but, rather, leaves room for a wider interpretation. The necessity of protecting the private sphere of life outside the domestic area is also partially recognised by legal writers, though for different reasons and with varying intentions (Allfeld DJZ 1920, 702; Evers Privatsphäre und Ämter für Verfassungsschutz, 44; Hubmann Das Persönlichkeitsrecht, 2d edn., (1967), p. 322; Helle Besondere Persönlichkeitsrechte im Privatrecht, 1991, 180; Paeffgen JZ 1978, 738, 740; Prinz NJW 1995, 817, 820; Siegert DB 1958, 419, 421; Siegert NJW 1963, 1953, 1955. Likewise LG Köln AfP 1994, 166, 168; see also BGHSt 18, 182, 186—Callgirlaffäre). This Division shares the view that there is a private area worthy of protection outside that of the purely domestic area. This is the case, where a person has retreated to a place of seclusion where he wishes to be left alone, as can be ascertained by objective criteria, and in a specific situation, where he, relying on the fact of seclusion, acts in a way in which he would not have done so in public. An unjustified intrusion into this protected area takes place where pictures of that person are published if taken secretly or by stealth.¹

(aa) Like anyone else, persons who are part of contemporary history have the right which must be respected by all third persons to retreat to places outside their own home where they wish to be alone or, at least, left secluded from the general public. This can even occur in places which are open to the public, i.e. in public places. But this presupposes that in the place and at the point in question the person “shut himself off” somewhat from the public at large; and this seclusion from the public must have been objectively obvious to third persons. This can, for instance, be the case in separate rooms of a restaurant or in hotels, sports grounds, telephone booths, under certain circumstances even in the open, as long as the person does not appear more than just another member of the public.

(bb) Moreover, the right to demand that other persons respect one’s privacy presupposes that the situation in which the person [observed] finds himself is one of a typically private nature. This is the case where a person, relying on the seclusion of the specific place where he finds himself in, behaves in a manner which he would not normally adopt in full view of the public. This may be the case whenever [the observed person] expresses personal emotions which are clearly not intended for the eyes of third persons or is acting in an “unrestrained” manner. Only in such situations can it be assumed and objectively verified that the person did not intend to allow other persons sharing the moment. In such circumstance he is entitled to have the chosen seclusion respected.

¹ Compare the above statement with the following opinion expressed by the Supreme Court of Iowa in Stressman v. American Black Hawk Broadcasting Co., 416 N.W. 2d 685, 687 (Iowa 1987): “It is not inconceivable that Stressman was seated in the sort of private dining room offered by many restaurants. To film a person in a private dining room might conceivably be a highly offensive intrusion upon that person’s seclusion . . . the mere fact a person can be seen by others does not mean that that person cannot legally be “secluded . . . Further, plaintiff’s visibility to some people does not strip him of the right to remain secluded from others.” These are not isolated dicta and strongly suggest that the German reasoning should not be dismissed by any English lawyer as Germanic or un-transplantable. There is no room for prejudice in comparative law; only opportunity to consider (and if necessary reject) new ideas by others.

(cc) It is an unjustified infringement of the sphere of privacy which is worthy of protection if, for reasons of personal gain, pictures are taken/published which exploit the innocence of the person depicted who believes himself unobserved. This is always the case where the person is observed almost as if through a keyhole, or is surprised by the surreptitious taking of the pictures. The same applies where the picture is taken openly but so suddenly that the person photographed has no time to prepare himself. A restriction of the prohibition to these particular circumstances is justified because protection of the private sphere of life is here extended to places which are in theory open to everyone. In these cases the person's privacy is only unjustly infringed where the intrusion happened surreptitiously or by surprise. The courts have always held that the surreptitious taking of photographs by secret means is illegal (BGHZ 24, 200, 208; Senat NJW 1966, 2353, 2355—Vor unserer eigenen Tür; OLG Frankfurt NJW 1987, 1087; see also BGHZ 27, 284—Tonbandaufnahme; BGHZ 73, 120—Telefonabhören; BAG JZ 1988, 108). Up to now, this only applied to the private domain within one's home, where the depicted person's consent was always required for the taking of photographs. But the same protection can legitimately be demanded in circumstances where persons, so to speak, transfer their private sphere of life to a place outside of their home. For the same reasons, photographs may then and there be taken, and later published, only if prior consent was given.

3. In the light of these principles, the weighing up of the rights and interests involved in this case leads to the conclusion that the plaintiff's protected sphere of privacy was violated by photographs taken in a garden restaurant and published in issue no. 30 of the magazine F. under the headline "These photos are the proof of the most tender romance of our time". The plaintiff can prohibit any future publication of these pictures. . . .

(b) When weighing up the various interests involved, the information value of the events depicted plays a significant role. The greater the interest of the public in being informed, the more the protected interests of the person of contemporary history must recede in favour of the public's need for information. Conversely, the need to protect the depicted person's privacy gains in weight as the value of the information which the public obtains from the photographs decreases. In this case, the photographs which show the plaintiff with Vincent Lindon in a garden restaurant contain little, if anything of value. Here, according to the Appeal Court, mere prying and sensationalism, and the public's wish to be entertained, outweighed all other considerations. Such motives, especially the mere wish of the public to be entertained, which is to be satisfied by pictures of totally private events of the plaintiff's life, cannot be recognised as worthy of protection. Our courts have repeatedly acknowledged this. (BVerGE 34, 269, 283; BGHZ 24, 200, 208; BGHZ 128, 1, 12; BGH NJW 1965, 2148, 2149; BGH JZ 1965, 411; OLG Hamburg AfP 1992, 376, 377).

4. However, the further appeal is unsuccessful in respect of the photographs in the other magazines since these are not concerned with the plaintiff's protected private sphere of life.

(a) . . . The plaintiff cannot prohibit the publication of such pictures. As a person of contemporary history, she must accept that the general public has a justifiable interest in knowing where she goes and how she behaves herself in public, be it during shopping trips in the market square, in a cafe or during sporting or other activities of daily life.

This includes the picture reproduced in the issue no. 34 of the magazine B, taken in a restaurant and showing the plaintiff sitting at a table with other persons. This picture differs from the ones taken in the garden restaurant because here the characteristics which made the other ones an unjustifiable intrusion are missing. For here, the plaintiff had not retreated to a place secluded from the general public, and secondly the situation in which she was photographed was not of a somewhat private nature in the sense outlined above. The fact that the plaintiff was not aware of being photographed does not, in itself, provide a reason for demanding that the photo remain unpublished, since persons of contemporary history must normally tolerate unnoticed or even clandestine photographs of themselves if they appear in public (Frank Persönlichkeitsschutz heute, 1985, p. 118, n. 280).

(b) However, what all these pictures have in common is the fact that they do not show the plaintiff performing a public function. They are, instead, concerned with her private life in the wider sense of the term. The plaintiff wishes to prohibit generally the publication of these photographs in Germany and France. But this is not possible under German law. In France under Article 9 of the Code Civil, which is intended to protect private life (vie privée), the publication of a picture requires in principle the consent of the person shown. This can even apply to monarchs and other public figures, unless they are shown performing a public duty (see Cour de Cassation, Bulletin des arrêts Chambres civiles, No 98, p. 67—Farah Diba; Tribunal de grande instance de Paris Recueil Dalloz Sirey 1977, Jur. p. 364 et seq.—Caroline de Monaco; see also Hauser, GRUR Int. 1988, 839, 840; Ehlers/Baumann ZvglRWiss 1978, 421 et seq.; Codes Dalloz, Code civil, 92. ed., [1992–1993], Article 9, n. 9).

Under German law (§ 23 KUG), this result is not possible. As this Division stated in its judgment of 14 November 1996 (NJW 1996, 539), under German law the public can have an undisputed interest in seeing photographs of an “absolute person of contemporary history”. There is no further requirement that that person be performing a public function. As a consequence, within the scope of § 23 I No. 1 KUG, the public’s interest in information which is worthy of protection can be assumed even where the photograph merely shows how a well-known person acts in normal public surroundings, i.e. when not performing public functions. This interest in being informed only needs to give way where, in quite specific situations, the justified interests of the person shown take precedence (s. 23 II KUG). This does not, however, apply to the photographs shown in issues nos. 32 and 34 of the magazine which are in fact quite flattering.

B. As far as distribution of the magazines in France is concerned, contrary to the plaintiff’s contentions in this further appeal, the Court need not decide whether or not the plaintiff’s claim would succeed if French law were applied.

1. As the Appeal Court rightly held, to apply French law in deciding in favour of a claim for an order to abstain from an action is barred by Article 38 EGBGB. According to this provision, claims based on tortious acts committed abroad against a German citizen are limited to the remedies available under German law. This principle also applies in favour of the defendant, a legal person domiciled within Germany (RGZ 129, 385, 388; OLG Hamburg IPRspr. 1930, No. 155; see also BGHZ 86, 234, 237). A comparison of the results under German and French law is thus superfluous when it is clear, as here, that German law provides no basis for a claim BGHZ 71, 175, 177; BGHZ 86, 234, 237; BAG NJW 1964, 990, 991; Prof. v. Bar JZ 1985, 961, 963.

Case 47

BUNDESVERFASSUNGSGERICHT (FIRST DIVISION) 15 DECEMBER 1999
BVERFGE 101, 361 = NJW 2000, 1021 = VERSR 2000, 773

Headnote

1. The private sphere protected by the general right of personality in Article 2 para. 1 in combination with Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law is not limited to the home. The individual must in principle have the opportunity of moving around in other places which are obviously secluded without being pestered by press photographers.
2. The general right of personality is not guaranteed in the interest of commercialisation of that personality. The protection of the private sphere from the taking of pictures takes second place insofar as someone shows himself to be in agreement with certain material usually regarded as private being made public.
3. The protective content of the general right of personality of parents or a parent is strengthened by Article 6 paras. 1 and 2 of the Basic Law, insofar as it concerns publication of pictures which have as their object specific parental attention to children.
4. The guarantee of press freedom contained in Article 5 para. 1 sentence 2 of the Basic Law includes publications and contributions in the nature of entertainment as well as their illustrations. This also applies in principle to the publication of pictures which show people in public life in everyday or private contexts.

Judgment

The judgments of the Bundesgerichtshof of 19 December 1995—VI ZR 15/95—, of the Hanseatic Oberlandesgericht of Hamburg of 8 December 1994—3 U 64/94—and of the Landgericht of Hamburg of 4 February 1994—324 O 537/93—infringe the complainant's basic right under Article 2 paragraph 1 in combination with Article 1 paragraph 1 of the Basic Law insofar as her claim in relation to three pictures published in the Illustrated "Bunte" no. 32 of 5 August 1993 and no. 34 of 19 August 1993 which show the complainant with her children was refused. In this respect and in relation to the decision about costs the judgment of the Bundesgerichtshof is quashed and the case referred back to it.

In other respects the constitutional complaint is rejected.

The German Federal Republic must reimburse the complainant for a third of the necessary expenses.

Reasons

A.

The constitutional complaint concerns the publication of photographs from the everyday and private lives of prominent figures.

I.

1. The defendant in the original proceedings, Burda GmbH, publishes the magazines "Freizeit Revue" and "Bunte". In these magazines, photographs of the complainant Princess Caroline of Monaco were published in various articles. She claimed an injunction to prevent publication of these.

The subject of the original proceedings included at first five photos which were printed in the "Freizeit Revue" no. 30 of 22 July 1993. The complainant could be seen in them together with the actor Vincent Lindon at a table in a garden café in Saint-Rémy (France) in the evening. The photos are advertised on the title page as "The tenderest photos of her romance with Vincent" and show Vincent Lindon kissing the complainant's hand. As the complainant was successful in obtaining from the Bundesgerichtshof an injunction to prevent future publication of these photos, they are not the subject of the constitutional complaint.

The defendant then published in the Illustrated "Bunte" no. 32 of 5 August 1993 the article "Caroline: I don't believe that I can be the ideal wife for a man", in which parts (mostly in indirect speech) of a book about the complainant which appeared in Spain are reproduced. Several photos illustrated the article. A photo on p. 88 shows the complainant riding a horse in a paddock. No other people can be seen in the picture. It has the caption: "Caroline and melancholy. Her life is a novel with countless misfortunes, says the author, Roig". P. 89 contains a photo of the complainant with her children Pierre and Andrea with the caption "Caroline with Pierre and Andrea, her children". In the photo, three people are visible in the foreground; in the background there are vehicles. The complainant is wearing sunglasses.

In no. 34 of the Illustrated "Bunte" of 19 August 1993, an article under the title "Simple Happiness" appeared on pp. 44 to 52 with several photos. On the first page of the article, the complainant can be seen together with her daughter in a canoe, in a close up. The accompanying text to the side states: "It is a hot day this summer. Princess Caroline paddles with her daughter on the Sorgues. This is a small river not far from St-Rémy, the village in Provence where Caroline lives. From New York to London, the rich and beautiful whisper about the Caroline style. A canoe instead of a yacht. A sandwich instead of caviar".

A further photo shows her with a basket slung round her on her way to the market. It includes an accompanying text in small print. "Housewife Caroline Casiraghi. She loves doing the shopping herself". The accompanying text at the side in large print states: "On Wednesday, it's market day. The Caroline style is copied world-wide. Her strap sandals which she wears to the flower market, her pareo which she wears as a skirt". In other photos—not the subject of challenge—within this frame, there are two shops in which the complainant allegedly make purchases, the bistro in which she usually drinks coffee and her country house.

The next photo objected to shows the complainant and the actor Vincent Lindon sitting side by side in a guest house, with other guests around them. The text in small print in the right hand lower corner says: "Every Saturday evening table no. 3 here on the right of the entrance is reserved for Caroline". The accompanying text in large print states: "In the evenings, people sit in the "Sous les Micocouliers" and drink the light red summer wine. Caroline and Vincent Lindon are guests like the baker, the olive farmer or Father Philippe of the Church of St Martin".

southern France) lies at the end of the bumpy track, the ‘Chemin du Pilou’”. It is supplemented by the larger accompanying text: “The end of loneliness approaches. The Caroline style attracts the beautiful and the rich. Lady Di should have instructed an estate agent to find a property for her. Julio Iglesias is also looking”.

The photo on p. 51 shows the complainant together with Vincent Lindon, her son Pierre and another child. It is a close up and shows these persons from behind or from the side as they turn to the child. The text in small print says: “Caroline’s youngest, Pierre, 6, has bumped himself. Vincent and Caroline comfort him”.

The last photo shows the complainant wearing sunglasses with a female companion in the market by a flower stall. The text accompanying the photo states: “Caroline’s body-guard is a woman. She even looks like the princess. They mostly go to the market together”.

2. The determining factor for the assessment of these photos by the civil courts was §§ 22 and 23 of the Statute as to Copyright in Works of Art and Photography of 9 January 1907 ([reference omitted]; from now called the Kunsturhebergesetz—KUG). These provisions state as follows:

§ 22

Pictures of people can only be disseminated or displayed publicly with the consent of the persons portrayed. In cases of doubt, consent is to be taken as having been given if the person portrayed received a payment for letting himself be portrayed. After the death of the person portrayed, the consent of the relatives of the person portrayed is needed until 10 years have elapsed . . .

§ 23

(1) The following may be disseminated and displayed without the consent necessary in accordance with § 22:

1. Pictures of people from the realm of contemporary history;
2. Pictures in which the persons only appear as accessories near a landscape or other locality;
3. Pictures of meetings, processions and similar events in which the persons depicted have taken part;
4. Pictures of people which are not made to order insofar as the dissemination or display serves a higher interest of art.

(2) The authorisation does not however extend to dissemination or display which violates a justified interest of the person portrayed or, if he has died, his relatives.

(a) The Landgericht allowed the claim insofar as it concerned the publication of the photos in magazines sold in France. In other respects it rejected the claim.

(b) The Oberlandesgericht rejected the appeal of the complainant, revised the judgment at first instance on the cross appeal of the defendant and rejected the claim insofar as the Landgericht had allowed it (reference omitted).

3. The Bundesgerichtshof quashed the judgment of the Oberlandesgericht in part, and revised the judgment of the Landgericht in part, so that the defendant in the original proceedings was ordered to refrain from fresh publication of the photographs printed in the magazine "Freizeit Revue" with the picture of the complainant. The remainder of the appeal in law was rejected.

...

II

The complainant contests all the civil court decisions, insofar as future dissemination of the photos was not forbidden, on the ground that they are violations of Article 2 para. 1 in combination with Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law, in particular of the right to pictures of oneself and the right to respect for the private sphere.

...

B.

The constitutional complaint is in part well founded.

I.

The judgments under challenge affect the complainant's general right of personality under Article 2 para. 1 in combination with Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law.

1. The protection of the general right of personality extends to pictures of a person by third parties.

(a) The basic right has the task of guaranteeing elements of the personality which are not the object of the special guarantees of freedom in the Basic Law but which are just as important as these in their constitutive significance for the personality (references omitted.) There is a need for such a guarantee to close up the gaps, particularly in view of new types of danger to the development of the personality which mostly arise with scientific and technical progress (references omitted). The assignment of an actual desire for legal protection to the different aspects of the right of personality must therefore be made with the danger to the personality to be deduced from the actual circumstances of the case primarily in mind.

(b) Authority to publish photographs showing persons in private or every day contexts is to be measured by the right to pictures of oneself and the guarantee of the private sphere which are concrete forms of the general right of personality.

(aa) Contrary to the view of the complainant, Article 2 para. 1 in combination with Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law does not contain a general and comprehensive right of control over pictures of oneself. Insofar as she seeks to deduce such a right from earlier decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court (references omitted), this is an incorrect generalisation of the protective content of the basic right guarantee which is formulated in the light of the actual cases. As the Federal Constitutional Court has already emphasised many times, the general right of personality does not give the individual a claim only to be portrayed by others in the way in which he sees himself or wants to be seen (references omitted). A wide protection of this kind would not only exceed the objective of avoiding endangering the development of the personality, but would also make deep inroads into the area of freedom of third parties.

The complainant also does not find any fault with the way she is portrayed in the disputed photos, which the civil courts have regarded as in every respect favourable.

She is much more concerned with whether photographs of her ought to be taken and published at all, when she was not acting in an official function but in a private capacity or every day context in public. The answer to this question is to be deduced from those expressions of the general right of personality which protect the right to pictures of oneself and the private sphere.

(bb) The right to pictures of oneself (references omitted) guarantees to the individual the opportunity to influence and make decisions about the making and use of photographs or drawings of himself by others. Whether these show the individual in a private or public context does not in principle play any role here. The need for protection arises instead principally from the possibility of removing the image of a person in a certain situation from this situation, recording it as data, and reproducing it at any time before an enormous number of people. (This is similar to the “right to one’s own words”, and the right to pictures of oneself entered the constitutional case law following on from that right.) This possibility has grown even further through progress in photographic technology, which permits the taking of pictures from a great distance (recently even from satellite) and in bad light.

With the help of reproduction technology, the kind of public before which the individual appears can be changed. In particular, the visible public in which one moves in normal public appearances can be replaced by the media public. Thus for instance the public in court, ie the audience present in the court room, differs from the media public produced by television, because the audience experiences events itself and can itself be seen and assessed by the parties to the proceedings (reference omitted). Besides this, the message conveyed by pictorial statements can change, or even be intentionally changed, with the change of the context in which a picture is reproduced.

Out of the different protective aspects of the right to pictures of oneself, though, the only one which is significant here is the one which concerns the production of certain photos and conveying them to a larger public. It is not a question of manipulated photos or falsifications by a change of context, which is the primary object of the protection. On the contrary, the complainant takes as a basis the fact that the photos which are the subject of the dispute (and the accompanying article, which is likewise relevant to their content) reproduce situations from her life accurately and in a manner in which observers who were present could have seen them. She merely does not wish these situations to be recorded in pictorial form and presented to a wider public, because in her opinion they belong to her private sphere.

(cc) In contrast to the right to pictures of oneself, the protection of the private sphere (which is also rooted in the general personality right) does not refer specially to pictures but is determined thematically and spatially. It includes on the one hand matters which are typically classified as “private” because of their information content, because public discussion or display of them is regarded as improper, or because revelation of them is felt to be embarrassing or produces adverse reactions from the surrounding world, as is for instance the case with soliloquies in diaries (reference omitted), confidential communications between married couples (reference omitted), the realm of sexuality (reference omitted), socially deviant behaviour (reference omitted) or illnesses (reference omitted). If there is no protection from the desire of others for knowledge here, soliloquies, uninhibited communications between close relations, sexual development or the obtaining of medical help would be interfered with or made impossible even though conduct protected by a basic right was involved.

On the other hand the protection extends to a spatial area in which the individual can sort himself out, unwind or even let go (reference omitted). It is true that this area also gives the opportunity to behave in a manner which is not intended for the public and for it to be seen or portrayed by outsiders would be embarrassing or disadvantageous for the person concerned. But in essence it is a question of a space in which the individual can be free from public observation and therefore from the self control which this imposes, but without him necessarily behaving differently there than in public. If such areas of retreat no longer existed, the individual could be psychologically overtaxed, because he would always have to be paying attention to the effect he has on others and whether he is behaving correctly. He would lack periods for being alone and adjusting which are necessary for the development of the personality and without which it would suffer lasting damage.

Such a need for protection also exists for people who are subject to special public attention because of their rank or reputation, their office or influence, or their capabilities or actions. A person who, whether willingly or unwillingly, has become a figure in public life does not thereby lose the right to a private sphere which remains concealed from the eyes of the public. This also applies for democratically elected office holders, who admittedly are publicly accountable for the conduct of their office (and must put up with public attention in this area), but not for their private lives in so far as these do not affect the conduct of their office.

The home is generally recognised as constituting such a protected sphere. But because of the reference to the development of the personality, the area of retreat cannot from the outset be limited to it. This is so because the functions which it serves are only fulfilled if it does not end at the walls of the house or the boundaries of the garden. The free development of the personality would be substantially hindered if the individual could only escape from public curiosity in his own house. Necessary relaxation from a public which is marked by the pressure of functions and the presence of the media is to be obtained in many cases only in the seclusion of a natural environment, perhaps in a holiday resort. The individual must therefore in principle be able also to move in open but secluded countryside or in places which are clearly secluded from the general public in a manner free from public observation. That applies in relation to photographic techniques which surmount the spatial seclusion without the person affected being able to notice this.

It cannot be determined in a general and abstract manner where the boundaries of the protected private sphere run outside the house. They can only be determined on the basis of the nature of the place to which the person affected goes. The decisive factor is whether the individual finds or creates a situation in which he may reasonably (and therefore in a manner recognisable to third parties) proceed on the basis that he is not exposed to the eyes of the public.

Whether the prerequisites for seclusion are fulfilled can only be assessed in the situation in question. The individual can in one and the same place justifiably feel himself to be unobserved at times and not at other times. Being in an enclosed area also definitely does not always equate with seclusion. As the question is whether the individual may reasonably expect to be unobserved or whether he has gone to places where he will be in the public eye, seclusion, which is the prerequisite for protection of the private sphere outside one's own home, may also be lacking in enclosed areas.

Places in which the individual finds himself amongst many people lack from the outset the prerequisites for private sphere protection in the sense of Article 2 para. 1 in combination with Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law. They cannot fulfil the need for retreat and therefore do not warrant the basic right protection, which this need serves on the grounds of development of the personality. The individual also cannot define such places as part of his private sphere by, for instance, conduct, which would typically not be exhibited publicly. It is not his conduct, either alone or with others, which constitutes the private sphere, but the objective facts about the locality at the time in question. If he therefore behaves as if he was not being observed, in places which do not have the characteristics of seclusion, he will himself remove the need for protection for types of behaviour which do not in themselves concern the public.

The protection of the private sphere from public attention also does not apply when the individual himself indicates his agreement with certain matters, which usually count as private, being made public, for instance by concluding exclusive contracts about reporting on his private sphere. The protection of the private sphere in constitutional law under Article 2 para. 1 in combination with Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law is not guaranteed in the interests of a commercialisation of the personality. Certainly no-one is prevented from such exploiting of private areas. But he cannot simultaneously appeal for the protection of the private sphere, which is concealed from the public. The expectation that the outside world will not, or will only to a limited extent, take note of matters or types of behaviour in an area which has the function of a retreat must therefore be expressed in a manner which is consistent and covers situations comprehensively. That also applies for the case where the decision to allow or to accept the reporting of certain events relating to one's own private sphere is made retrospective.

(dd) The Federal Constitutional Court has not yet decided what the protection of the private sphere means for family relationships between parents and children. But it is recognised that children need special protection because they must first develop into autonomous persons (references omitted). This need for protection also exists in view of the dangers resulting from the interest of the media and users of the media in portrayal of children. This can disturb the development of their personalities more severely than those of adults. The area in which children feel themselves free from public observation and may develop must therefore be more comprehensively protected than that of adult persons.

Parents are primarily responsible for the development of the personalities of children. Insofar as upbringing depends on undisturbed relationships with children, the special basic right protection of children does not merely have a reflexive effect in favour of the father and the mother (references omitted). Instead specifically parental turning attention to the children falls in principle within the protective area of Article 2 para. 1 in combination with Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law. The protective content of the general right of personality is then strengthened by Article 6 paras. 1 and 2 of the Basic Law which puts the state under a duty to secure those conditions of life for children which are necessary for their healthy development, and to which, in particular, parental care belongs (references omitted).

How the strengthening of protection of the personality by Article 6 of the Basic Law should take effect in detail cannot be generally and abstractly determined. Certainly there will as a rule be no need for protection if parents deliberately enter the public arena with their children, for instance by participating together in public events or even taking a position in the centre of such events. In this respect they lay themselves open to the conditions of public appearances. In other respects the protection of the general right of personality can also however apply in principle in favour of specific parent-child relationships where the prerequisites for local seclusion are absent.

2. The decisions under challenge interfere with the complainant's general right of personality. As the pictures enjoy the protection of this basic right, the judicial finding that they may be published against her will curtails the protection which she can claim the courts should respect even in private law disputes (see BVerfGE 7, 198 [207]).

II.

The judgments under challenge do not completely fulfil the requirements of Article 2 para. 1 in combination with Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law.

1. The provisions of §§ 22 and 23 of the KUG on which the civil courts have based their decisions are certainly reconcilable with the Basic Law.

According to Article 2 para. 1 of the Basic Law, the general right of personality is only guaranteed within the framework of the constitutional order. The provisions about the publication of photographs of persons in §§ 22 and 23 of the KUG are included in this. The regime goes back to a scandal (photographs of Bismarck on his deathbed [reference omitted]) and the ensuing legal and political debate (reference omitted) and seeks to establish an appropriate balance between regard for the personality and the interests of the general public in information (reference omitted).

According to § 22 sentence 1 of the KUG, pictures may only be disseminated or publicly displayed with the consent of the person portrayed. § 23 (1) of the KUG exempts, amongst other things, pictures from the realm of contemporary history (no. 1) from this principle. However, according to § 23 (2) of the KUG, this does not apply for a dissemination by which a justified interest of the person portrayed is violated. By this graduated concept of protection, the regime takes sufficient account of the need for protection of the person portrayed as well as of the public's wishes for information and the interests of the media who satisfy these wishes. That has already been established by the Federal Constitutional Court (reference omitted).

The view of the defendant that the regime contravenes the freedom of the press, because it amounts to a ban with a proviso for permission, gives no cause to assess the matter differently. There is no such ban, simply because the norms merely balance different legally protected interests of private persons. The regime here does not give a one-sided preference to protection of the personality. Admittedly it takes account primarily of the need for protection of the person portrayed at the first and third stages (§ 22 sentence 1 and § 23 (2) of the KUG). But the interests of press freedom (and the freedom to form opinions which lies behind this) come into play sufficiently at the second stage (§ 23 (1) of the KUG). Likewise it offers with its open formulations sufficient room for an interpretation and application which is in accordance with the basic rights.

2. The interpretation and application of the provisions do not however satisfy the requirements of the basic requirements in every respect.

(a) The interpretation and application of provisions of the civil law which are in accordance with the constitution is a matter for the civil courts. They must however, in this connection, have regard to the meaning and scope of the basic rights affected by their decisions, in order that the significance of those rights in prescribing values is preserved even at the level of application of the law (see BVerfGE 7, 198; constant case law). For this purpose a balancing is necessary between the conflicting protective interests under the basic rights. This is to be undertaken within the framework of the features of the civil law provisions which are capable of being interpreted and has to take into consideration the special circumstances of the case (references omitted). But as the legal dispute remains, in spite of the basic right influence, a private law one, and finds its solution in private law (interpreted as guided by the basic rights) the Federal Constitutional Court is limited to examining whether the civil courts have had sufficient regard to the basic right influence (reference omitted). On the other hand, it is not the business of the Federal Constitutional Court to dictate to the civil courts how they have to decide the case in question in its outcome (reference omitted).

A violation of the basic rights will only lead to objection to the decisions under challenge if the fact that basic rights were to be complied with in interpreting and applying provisions of private law which were in conformity with the Constitution has been overlooked; or if the protected area of the basic rights to be complied with has been determined incorrectly or imperfectly or their weight has been incorrectly assessed so that the balancing of the legal positions on both sides within the framework of the private law regime suffers as a result (references omitted) and the decision is based on this mistake.

(b) In the present case, not only is the general right of personality but also the freedom of the press guaranteed in Article 5 para. 1 sentence 2 of the Basic law (which is likewise affected by these provisions) to be taken into consideration in interpreting and applying §§ 22 and 23 of the KUG.

In the centre of the basic right guarantee of freedom of the press is the right freely to determine the type, orientation, content and form of a publication (references omitted). Included in this is the decision whether and how a publication is to be illustrated. The protection is not limited to certain subjects for illustration. It also includes the portrayal of persons. The protection does not depend on the particular nature or the level of the publication or of the report in detail (references omitted). Every difference of this kind would amount in the end to assessment and control by state authorities which would contradict the essence of this basic right (reference omitted).

Press freedom serves the free, individual and public formation of opinion (reference omitted). This can only succeed under conditions of free reporting for which certain objects or methods of presentation are neither prescribed nor excluded. In particular, formation of opinion is not limited to the political realm. It is true that it is of special importance there in the interest of a functioning democracy. Yet the political formation of opinion is embedded in a comprehensive multiply interlinked communication process which cannot be split into relevant or irrelevant zones either from the point of view of personal development or from that of democratic government (reference omitted). The press must be able to decide according to journalistic criteria what it considers to be worthy of the public interest and what it does not.

The fact that the press has to fulfil a function of forming opinion does not exclude entertainment from the constitutional functional guarantee. Formation of opinion and entertainment are not antitheses. Even contributions of an entertaining kind can form opinions. They can in certain circumstances stimulate or influence the formation of opinion even more permanently than exclusively factual information. In addition a growing tendency can be observed in the media of removing the division between information and entertainment in relation to a publication as a whole as well as in the individual contributions and to disseminate information in an entertaining form or to mix it with entertainment (“infotainment”). Many readers consequently obtain the information which appears to them to be important or interesting from entertaining contributions (reference omitted).

But the reference to freedom of formation of opinion cannot be denied from the outset even to mere entertainment. It would be unbalanced to assume that entertainment merely satisfies the wish for diversion, relaxation, flight from reality and distraction. It can also convey images of reality and makes available subjects for conversation. Ongoing discussions and unifying events which refer to attitudes to life, stances about values and behaviour patterns can be linked into this. Entertainment in this respect fulfils important social functions (references omitted). Entertainment in the press, measured by the protective purpose of freedom of the press, is therefore not insignificant or even worthless and is also included in the basic right protection (reference omitted).

This also applies to news reports about people. Personalisation forms an important journalistic means for arousing attention. It awakens interest in problems in many cases for the first time, and creates the wish for factual information. Participation in events and situations is also mostly communicated by personalisation. Besides this, prominent people stand for certain value concepts and stances about life. They therefore provide many people with a means of orientation in relation to their plans for their own lives. They become crystallisation points for agreement or disapproval and fulfil the functions of a model or a contrast. The public interest in the most varied aspects of such persons’ lives is based on this.

For persons in political life, such an interest on the part of the public has always been recognised as legitimate from the point of view of democratic transparency and control. It cannot however in principle be disputed for other people in public life. In this respect, description of people which is not confined to certain functions or events is in line with the tasks of the press and therefore likewise falls within the protected area of press freedom. Balancing against the conflicting rights of personality is needed to determine whether there is a serious and relevant discussion of questions which substantially concern the public or merely dissemination of private matters which only satisfy curiosity (reference omitted).

(c) The judgement of the Bundesgerichtshof overwhelmingly satisfies constitutional law examination in the end result.

(aa) There is no objection in constitutional law to the fact that the Bundesgerichtshof has determined the prerequisites of the definition in § 23 (1) no. 1 of the KUG according to the standard of the general public’s interest in information; and on this basis has regarded publication of pictures of the complainant even outside her representative function in the principality of Monaco as permissible.

§ 23 (1) no. 1 of the KUG exempts the publication of pictures of people from the area of contemporary history from the requirement of consent in § 22 of the KUG. The provision according to its legislative intention (reference omitted) and according to the sense and purpose of its regime takes into consideration the general public’s interest in information and the freedom of press. The interests of the public are therefore to be observed in the interpretation of the features of this definition. This is because pictures of people who are not important in terms of contemporary history may only be made freely available to the public, with the consent of the persons affected. The further feature contained in the definition in § 23 (2) of the KUG of the “justified interest”, which is open to the influence of the basic right, only refers from the outset to persons of importance in terms of contemporary history and cannot consequently sufficiently uphold the interests of press freedom if these interests have been left out of consideration previously by the delimitation of that group of persons.

The concept of contemporary history in § 23 (1) no. 1 of the KUG does not, according to the standard of a judicial determination as to its content, only encompass for instance events of historical or political importance, but is determined by the interest of the public in information (reference omitted). This takes account of the meaning and scope of freedom of the press without cutting down disproportionately on protection of the personality. It is part of the core of freedom of the press and free formation of opinion that the press possesses sufficient leeway within the statutory boundaries within which to decide, according to its journalistic criteria, what the public interest claims; and that it will emerge in the process of formation of opinion what a matter of public interest is. Contributions in the form of entertainment are not, as has been explained, excepted from this.

There are further no grounds for objection to the fact that the Bundesgerichtshof also allocates to the “area of contemporary history” in accordance with § 23 (1) no. 1 of the KUG pictures of persons who have not attracted the public interest to themselves by a certain isolated event of contemporary history but who attract general public attention on the basis of their status and importance, independently of individual events. In this connection, the increased importance which applies to photographic reporting today, in comparison to the time when the Artistic Copyright Act was enacted, is significant. The concept of an “absolute person of contemporary history”, which is usually regarded as related in this connection by the case law and the literature, admittedly does not necessarily arise either from statute law or from the Constitution. It is understood by the Oberlandesgericht and the Bundesgerichtshof as shorthand for persons whose image the public finds worthy of attention because of the person portrayed. The concept is not however open to objection from the point of view of constitutional law as long as there is a balancing related to the individual case between the public’s interest in information and the justified interests of the person portrayed.

The general right of personality does not require limitation of publications not needing consent to pictures which show persons of importance in the context of contemporary history exercising the function which they fulfil in society. A frequent characteristic of the public interest which such persons claim is that it does not only hold good for the exercise of the function in the narrower sense. Instead it can, because of the distinctive function and the effect which this has, extend to information about how these persons generally behave in public, and therefore outside their respective functions. The public has a justified interest in learning if such persons, who are often regarded as idols or examples, bring their functional and personal behaviour convincingly into line.

A limitation of publication of images to the function of a person of importance in contemporary history would on the other hand not take sufficient account of the public interest which such people justifiably arouse. It would also encourage a selective presentation which would prevent the public from making assessments which are necessary in respect of persons of socio-political life because of their role function as models and their influence. This does not open up to the press unlimited access to pictures of persons of contemporary history. Instead § 23 (2) of the KUG gives the courts sufficient opportunity to put into effect the protective requirements of Article 2 para. 1 in combination with Article 1 para. 1 of the Basic Law (reference omitted).

(bb) In principle, the criteria which the Bundesgerichtshof has developed in interpretation of the feature of “justified interest” in the definition in § 23 (2) of the KUG are not open to objection in constitutional law.

According to the judgment under challenge, the private sphere which deserves protection (which the so-called absolute person of contemporary history is also entitled to) presupposes a secluded space into which someone has withdrawn in order to be on his own there in a manner recognisable to others; and in which, trusting in this seclusion, he behaves in a way in which he would not when in the public eye. The Bundesgerichtshof assumes a violation of §§ 22 and 23 of the KUG if pictures are published which have been taken of the person affected in such a situation secretly or by using surprise tactics.

The criterion of spatial seclusion takes account on the one hand of the purpose of the general right of personality of securing for the individual a sphere outside his own home in which he knows he will not to be under continual public observation. He does not therefore have to control his behaviour in view of this observation, but has the opportunity to relax and come to himself. On the other hand it does not restrict the freedom of the press excessively, because it does not completely remove the everyday and private life of persons of contemporary history from photographic reporting, but only makes it accessible for portrayal where it takes place in public. In a case of paramount public interest in receiving information, freedom of the press can even take precedence over the protection of the private sphere, according to this case law (references omitted).
